In 1860 he was elected by the General Conference as assistant corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society, which position he held, having been twice re-elected, until 1872, when he was elected bishop. In this office he has traveled extensively in the United States, and has, also,

He received the degree of "Doctor of Divinity" from Alleghany College in 1856, and that of "Doctor of Laws" from the Baldwin University in 1870. Harrisburg, Pa. (pop. 23,104), the capital of the State, was founded on the site of an old Indian village called Paxton. The first white settlement was made by John Harris, in 1785, who obtained from the proprietor a grant of three hundred acres of land in 1753. The Penn family granted to his son, John Harris, Jr., the right to establish a ferry, long known as Harris's Ferry, and from which the city subsequently received its name, though it had originally been called Louisburg, in honor of Louis XVI. The capital was removed from Lancaster to this place in 1812. The first Methodist Society was organized in 1810, and in 1819 the class consisted of about 20 members. In 1820 the first church was erected, being located on Second Street, and it was dedicated by Jacob Gruber. In 1834 Harrisburg became a station, with Dr. F. A. Hodgson as pastor, the society at that time numbering 175. A lot was purchased on Locust Street, and a church was dedicated in 1838, which was remodeled and improved in 1852. In 1871 this congregation undertook the building of a new church, on State Street, now called Grace church, and a very large and beautiful church has been erected. As the city increased in numbers other congregations were organized, as follows: St. Paul's, in 1860; Ridge Avenue, 1861; Mount Pleasant, 1869; Fifth Street, 1871, and in the same year Baldwin church was organized. The African M. E. Church has also a flourishing congregation. The city was in the Philadelphia Conference until it was placed by the General Conference of 1872 in Central Pennsylvania Conference. The following are the statistics:

Harrison, Gessner, M.D., LL.D., Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of Virginia, was a scholar of very considerable eminence, and was for a number of years chairman of the faculty. He was a native of Harrisonburg, Va.; became a member of the M. E. Church in 1833; at the separation remained in the Church South, and acquired high rank as a teacher and author. He died during the Civil War.

Harrison, N. J. (pop. 4129), is in Gloucester County, and was within the bounds of the old Gloucester circuit, one of the first formed in the State, and was very early traversed by the pioneers of Methodism. Larger and surrounding places, however, gave name to the circuit until 1851, when it first appears on the minutes of the M. E. Church as connected with Mullica Hill, with Samuel Parker as pastor, who reported, in 1852, 214 members. From that time the church has made very fair progress, and changes have been made in its boundaries. It is in the New Jersey Conference, and reports (1876) 185 members, 250 Sunday-school scholars, and $7000 church property.

Harrod, John Jolly, of the Methodist Protestant Church, was a native of Harford Co., Md. He carried on the book business in Baltimore as early as 1806. His store was the headquarters of Methodist preachers in that early day. He was one of the first Reformers, and those questions were often discussed by the traveling preachers and others in his place of business. He became the publisher of The Mutual Rights, and was subsequently for a number of years the agent of the Book Concern and Periodical of the Methodist Protestant Church. He compiled the first hymn-book used by the church, and was prominently associated with its early history. Of an honest and trusting disposition, his business ventures profited the church, but never himself. He is held in Christian veneration by those who knew him. He died in Baltimore, Md., Jan. 6, 1854, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Hart, Virgil C., a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church in China, was graduated from the Garrett Biblical Institute; served in the Christian Commission during the Civil War; joined the Erie Conference in 1865, was transferred to the Black River Conference, and appointed a missionary to China. In 1867 he was selected to open the new mission at Kiu Kiang, and in 1869 was appointed superintendent of the same.

Hartford, Conn. (pop. 37,180), is a flourishing city, situated on the west bank of the Connecticut River, and on the railroad from New Haven to Springfield. It was settled as early as 1635, by Americans from Newtown, Mass. Two years prior to this the Dutch had erected a fort, but soon afterwards surrendered, and the colony remained in the hands of the English. The first Methodist sermon was preached in this city by Jesse Lee, Dec. 9, 1789, and on Nov. 8, 1790, a class was formed, which was, in consequence of removals, afterwards abandoned. In 1790, Jesse Lee formed the Hartford circuit, which embraced the territory on both sides of the Connecticut River, and preaching was commenced at Toland, East Windsor, Windsor, Suffield, Granby, and Enfield. Wilbraham, Mass., was also connected with this circuit at that time. The first pastor regularly appointed to Hartford circuit was Nathaniel B. Mills, in 1790. The following year the entire circuit reported only 28 members. The boundaries of the circuit were changed from time to time until Hartford became a station. It is in the New York East Conference, and the statistics are reported for 1876 as follows:

He was educated and graduated at Alleghany College, in 1845, and shortly afterwards opened a school, comprising six pupils, at Mount Union, Ohio, near Alliance. This was the nucleus of Mount Union College; the school grew rapidly without prestige or means, and in a few years received collegiate powers. Its property is now estimated at nearly half a million of dollars. Dr. Hartshorn has been at its head from the beginning to the present. He was a member of the Pittsburgh Conference, and represented it as a delegate to the General Conference of 1868. He is now a member of the East Ohio Conference.

Hartzell, Joseph C., B.D., born of pious parentage, in Moline, Ill., in 1842. Left home at sixteen to educate himself for the ministry, to which work he felt called from childhood. Supported entirely

In 1873 he established, and became editor and proprietor of, The Southwestern Christian Advocate, a paper published in New Orleans, in the interest of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Southern States. This paper was made an official journal of the church in 1876, and Mr. Hartzell is now (1877) its editor.

Haverhill, Mass. (pop. 13,092), is in Essex County, on the Boston and Maine Railroad, and is a manufacturing place of considerable enterprise. It was settled in 1640, and in its early history suffered from Indian depredations. Methodism was introduced into the adjacent country by Jesse Lee, in the summer of 1790. He organized the Oxford circuit, with which this place became connected. It appears by name in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1826, with Ebenezer Ireson and

Nathan Howe in charge, who reported the following year on the whole circuit 261 members. The charge was divided, and the next year 142 members were reported, but in 1830 it was re-attached to the Oxford circuit. It subsequently became a station, and with the growth of the city a second charge was established. It is in the New Hampshire Conference, and reports as follows:

From his Alma Mater he received, in 1863, the degree of D.D., and was member of the General Conference in 1864. During his pastorate of three years in Bennington, Vt., he was town superintendent of public schools and secretary of the Sunday-School Union of the county. Early in life she united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which her mother had been for many years a devout member. In every position which she has filled she has maintained a high Christian character in her purity of life, her attendance on divine worship, her interest in moral and reformatory enterprises, and in using her influence in behalf of the highest morality and virtue.

Haygood, Atticus G., D.D., president of Emory College, Georgia, was born in Clark Co., Ga., Nov. 19, 1839; converted in early childhood, he united with the M. E. Church South in 1854; was licensed to preach in 1858, and graduated at Emory College in 1859. The same year he was received on trial in the Georgia Annual Conference, and served on various stations and circuits, and as chaplain in the Confederate army until 1867, when he became presiding elder of the Rome district, and subsequently of the Atlanta. In May, 1870, he was elected by the General Conference Sunday-school secretary of the M. E. Church South, and was re-elected in 1874, but resigned to accept, in December, 1875, the presidency of the college which he now fills. Dr. Haygood has written many articles for the press, and is the author of "Go or Send," a prize essay on missions, and of a work entitled "Our Children." Hayti (pop. 850,000), next to Cuba, is the largest of the West India Islands, having an area of 28,930 square miles. The whole island is sometimes called San Domingo. The western part of the island is generally called Hayti, and is an independent republic. The eastern part is called San Domingo. The religious prosperity of the island has been greatly retarded by internal strife and political revolution. The Wesleyan Methodists were the first Protestant denomination to establish a mission here. In 1868 they had 6 chapels and 4 other preaching-places, 210 members, and 890 regular attendants on public worship. Their headquarters are at the capital town, Port au Prince, a city having about 30,000 inhabitants. Rev. Mark B. Bird has been a missionary there for twenty-eight years. There are now 209 members. Recently the African M. E. Church has commenced a mission.

Hayward, Ebenezer, a colored minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, died in New Orleans, July 3, 1873, aged fifty years. He was born in Maryland, and converted about 1838 in Washington City. About thirteen years afterwards he was brought to New Orleans, and at once united with the M. E. Church. He aided largely in building Wesley chapel. In 1852 he was removed by his owner to Bayou Lafourche, where he suffered many persecutions. In 1854 his brother James was shot by the same owner for his devotion to Christ. In 1866 he joined the Mississippi Mission Conference of the M. E. Church, was ordained by Bishop Simpson, and subsequently filled appointments in that Conference. Because of failing health he was not permitted to preach there long. His last hours were full of peace. "He was a man of strength among the people." At the last he said, "I am in Christ. They will ask, Is Ebenezer dead? Tell them, no."

Haywood, Benjamin, a distinguished iron manufacturer of Pottsville, Pa., was a native of England, and emigrated to this country in early life. He established the Palo Alto Iron Works in Pottsville, and has been prosperous and successful in business. He has long been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and an active and efficient local preacher, and is devoted to all the interests of the church, which he liberally supports.

Hazlehurst, Thomas, Esq., of Runcorn, England, has left behind him a name full of fragrant memories. He was converted at the age of sixteen; became a class-leader and local preacher; was diligent in visiting the sick and afflicted poor. He inherited wealth and increased it; and then his great delight was in spending the same for the extension of Methodism and the glory of God. He built St. Paul's chapel, Runcorn, at a cost of £8000, another at Hulton Road costing a similar sum; a third at Frodsham, costing £7500; a fourth at Halton, £4500; besides several others in the neighbouring villages, all free gifts to the connection. At the time of his death he had nearly one hundred silver trowels, artistically arranged, which had been presented to him on laying "memorial stones" of chapels and schools, each representing a gift varying from £20 to £8000. His motto was, "All things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee." He died July 12, 1876, in the sixty-first year of his age.

Hazleton, Pa. (pop. 4317), in Luzerne County, on the Hazleton division of the Lehigh Valley Railroad. In 1837 the Hazleton region was a new field for anthracite coal mining. The boundaries of the borough then included only a few miners' homes. An English local preacher, Robert Moister, formed, in 1837, the first Methodist class, which met in a school-house. In the same year Beaver Meadow mission was established, and Joseph S. Lee was appointed pastor. Hazleton was included in the mission, but services were rarely held in the town. In 1839 the mission was connected with Berwick circuit, a six weeks' circuit, and services were still held here but occasionally. In 1840 George Guyer, having been appointed to Berwick, resided in Hazleton, and services became more regular and frequent. In 1860 the first church was built. In 1867 it was made a station. In 1873 a new and more costly church was erected. It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and reports 275 members, 450 Sunday-school scholars, and $25,000 church property.

Heald, James, Esq., of Parr's Wood, near Manchester, England, was born in 1796, and became one of the most influential and wealthy men in

Methodism. He was a local preacher, taking his appointments punctually. His broad statesmanlike mode of setting forth any object he undertook to represent led the body to repose in the wisdom of his counsels, while his liberality was almost unbounded. The foreign missions drew forth his largest sympathies; for several years he was lay treasurer for the Wesleyan Missionary Society. At one time he represented the borough of Stockport in Parliament. He was deputy-lieutenant of the minister. In 1846 he superannuated. He was a man of sound judgment, was studious, read his Hebrew and Greek Testaments, and was thoroughly devoted to his work.

During the late war he resided in New Orleans, and was an outspoken Union man. In March, 1867, he was appointed mayor of New Orleans by General Sheridan, in which position he served with distinction for two years. In 1870, Mr. Heath and his wife became members of Ames M. church, and almost at once was placed in official position, holding all the official relations until his death. He acquired more than a local fame as a theologian and biblical scholar, and few laymen were better read in theological lore. For over a quarter of a century he was superintendent of the Sunday-school of that charge, being peculiarly gifted for the work. He was noted for his liberal benefactions to the church, and for exerting a beneficial influence upon others in this respect.

Dickinson, A.M. In 1868, Rev. N. C. Springer, A.M., was elected president, and the institution took the rank of a female college and seminary. He was succeeded, in 1872, by Rev. J. G. Evans, A.M., who is now (1877) president of the institution. The first edifice for the college was erected in 1857, and was a substantial two-story brick edi-face 45 by 70 feet. In 1873 a new building 62 by 70 feet, three stories high, with good basement-rooms, was added. The grounds and building are valued at $50,000. In 1875 the special charter under which the college had acted was abandoned, and it was organized under the general corporation law of the State with full collegiate powers. An excellent religious influence has prevailed in the institution, and in the last five years over two hundred students have been converted while attending the college. On one occasion, after Mr. Abbott had spoken to the class, he went to little Elijah and said, "Well, my boy, do you think you are a sinner?" He replied, "Yes, sir." Mr. Abbott then, with vehemence and loud voice, said, "There's many a boy in hell not as old as you are," and most impressively exhorted him to seek religion. Bishop Hedding says of this event, "It not only frightened me but produced real religious concern, as I doubt not it was accompanied by the operation of God's Holy Spirit." When he was about ten years old his parents removed to Vermont. When he was about fifteen or sixteen years of age, a Methodist with his family, from Connecticut, moving into the neighborhood, held meetings at his house, at which he sung and prayed, and young Hedding, being a good reader, was appointed to read one of Wesley's sermons or a portion of Baxter's Call. These meetings were kept up regularly until 1798, when the house became a preaching-place. The lady of the house used frequently to talk with young Hedding privately on the subject of religion. He says, "Her conversation, more than anything else, was the means of my seeking religion. After one of these conversations, on my way home I turned into a grove and kneeled by the side of a great tree and covenanted with God to part with all my idols and seek salvation with all my heart." About six weeks after this he remained in class-meeting after preaching, when the preacher and brethren seeing his distress, kneeled in intercession for him. During the meeting he received spiritual comfort and gave his name as a probationer in the M. E. Church. This was Dec. 27, 1798. Though at that time he received some comfort, he had not clear consciousness of his acceptance and conversion. He says, "About six weeks after this, while conversing with a brother about the Witness of the Spirit, the light of the Spirit broke in upon my mind as clear and perceptible as the sun when it comes from behind a cloud, testifying that I was born of God, and that it was done at the time before named, when my guilt was removed and I found peace in believing." In 1799, though only an exhorter, he supplied the place of Lorenzo Dow, who had left his circuit. In 1801 he was admitted on probation in the Newark Conference. He filled various appointments until 1807, when he became presiding elder on New Hampshire district. In 1811 he was stationed in Boston, and in 1817 was presiding elder on the Portland district. He was subsequently appointed to Lynn Common, to Boston, and Boston district. At the General Conference held in Baltimore in May, 1824, he was elected and ordained a bishop in the M. E. Church. For nearly twenty-eight years he performed the duties of his office with great ability. He was remarkable for promptness in duty, wisdom in council, strict integrity, and deep piety. Anxious days and sleepless nights and strong intercessions with God showed his deep solicitude for the prosperity of the churches. His pulpit power, his excellence as an officer, his administrative ability, gave him prominence in the affections and confidence of the M. E. Church. His last illness was protracted and severe. His mental powers were preserved clear and vigorous to the last. About ten days before his death he said, "With the stroke God gave me wonderful grace, and it has been with me ever since. Not a day, not an hour, not a moment have I had any doubt or tormenting fear of death. I have been times so that it was doubtful whether I would live five minutes, but all was bright and glorious. But to-day I have been wonderfully blessed. I was reflecting upon the wonder of God's mercy,—how a just and infinite and holy God could take such vile creatures to dwell with him in so holy a place: so unworthy, so sinful, so polluted. I thought of his great mercy to me,—how much he had done for me,—and I had such glorious views of the atonement of Christ,—his sufferings and the glory that should follow,—that my soul was filled in a wonderful manner. I have served God more than fifty years. I have generally had peace, but I never saw such glory before, such light, and such gloriousness, such beauty! Oh, I want to tell it to all the world! Oh, had I a trumpet voice,

"Then would I tell to sinners round
What a DEAR SAVIOUR I have found!"

Here emotion overcame him and choked his utterance for a moment. "But I cannot. I never shall preach again: never shall go over the mountains, the valleys, the woods, and the swamps, to tell of Jesus any more. But oh, what glory I feel! It shines and burns all through me, and it came upon me like the rushing of the mighty wind upon the day of Pentecost."

At 3 o'clock on the 9th of April, 1852, his dying struggles commenced. After speaking of his experience confidently in answer to several questions, it was remarked to him that he was almost over Jordan. He answered, "Yes." Then, raising both hands, he shouted,—scarcely above a whisper,—"Glory! glory! glory to God! glory to God! glory to God! glory!" When asked if death had any terrors he replied, "No, none whatever; my peace is made with God. I do not expect to live until sunset; but I have no choice; I leave it all with God." Then placing his hand upon his breast, he said, "I am happy—filled." For clear and strong intellect, broad and commanding views, administrative ability, and deep devotion, combined with amiability and gentleness, Bishop Hedding has had few equals, and possibly no superiors, in the church.

Hedstrom, J. J., was born in Sweden in 1813. At the age of nineteen he arrived in America, and through the instrumentality of his brother, O. G. Hedstrom, was converted. Removing West, he was licensed as a local preacher, and when the Swedes began to emigrate in great numbers to this country he commenced preaching among them. In 1848 he entered the Rock River Conference of the M. E. Church, and was appointed missionary. Though the work was simple in its commencement, before his departure he saw not only its enlargement in America, but its entrance into the fatherland. He was a man of strong faith, large sympathies, and tender heart. He died May 11, 1859, his last words being, "Come, Jesus! come, sweet Jesus!"

Hedstrom, O. G., a pioneer Swedish missionary, was born in 1803, in Kalmer, Sweden, and died in New York, May 5, 1877. His father was a corporal in the Swedish army, and gave to his son a fair elementary education. At the age of twenty-two he embarked in an enterprise for South America, but, after a tempestuous voyage, was landed in New York. His money being stolen, he sought employment: became foreman in a clothing establishment, and in a few years started business for himself. He was led to visit a Methodist church from noticing "a lady in the primitive attire of the early Methodist stamp." In a short time he was awakened and converted, and immediately felt it his duty to engage in the ministry. Returning to Sweden temporarily, he was instrumental in the conversion of his father and of two brothers, both of whom became missionaries among the Swedish and Norwegian population of the West. After his return to America, he was admitted into the New York Conference. For ten years he preached in the English language; but his heart yearning to be of service to his countrymen, he was appointed to the famous Bethel ship for Scandinavian seamen in New York, without any society or a single member. He began by boarding, whenever it was possible, every ship from Sweden, Denmark, or Norway before it touched the shore, distributing Bibles and tracts and informing the emigrants where they might find good temporary homes, and inviting them to visit his ship. His congregation was composed of transient material, but the Bethel ship became known over the world. Converted Scandinavians settled in the West, and societies sprung up through the Northwestern States. He was a man of large frame, good natural ability, fervent, eloquent, of undoubted piety and undaunted courage. His religion was a religion of joy, and he lived to see a large Scandinavian work developed, not only in America, but missionaries having returned, planted young and growing churches through different parts of Scandinavia. Few men have accomplished more according to their opportunities than did Pastor Hedstrom.

Heffner, Edward, was born on Governor's Island, N. Y., Nov. 2, 1809, but removed to Baltimore in his youth, where he has since resided. Converted in his nineteenth year, he has filled all the official relations possible to a layman. In 1839 he was licensed to preach, and subsequently ordained deacon and elder. He was president of the National Association of Local Preachers for one term. Since 1868 he has been president of the Baltimore Local Preachers' Association, perhaps the most efficient local organization in the church. He held an important civil position in Baltimore in 1851-52, and for about a quarter of a century he has been superintendent of Greenmount Cemetery, Baltimore.

Helena, Ark. (pop. 3106), the capital of Phillips County, situated on the Mississippi River, and on the Arkansas Central Railroad. Methodist services were held here for the first time in 1828, by Rev. Fountain Brown. A union church was built in 1841 and used until 1843, when it was blown down. In 1845 the Methodists erected a house of their own, which, having burned down, was replaced by the present one in 1859. This society being on the border, at the division of the M. E. Church, in 1845, adhered to the Church South, and reports (1875) 100 members, 105 Sunday-school scholars, and $7500 church property. The African M. E. Church reports 171 members, 100 Sunday-school scholars, and $1500 church property.

Helpers.—In the early days of Methodism all the members of the Annual Conference, except those who are termed assistants, were called helpers. The assistants had charge of the circuits and administered discipline; the helpers occupied the position of junior preachers. In the Wesleyan minutes the duties of a helper were: "In the absence of a minister to feed and guide the flock; in particular, to meet the society and the bands weekly; to visit the sick, to meet the elders weekly," etc. In the United States the term was employed for a number of years, but was finally merged into the word preacher, and the title of assistant was changed to that of preacher in charge. The section in the Discipline which now speaks of the duty of the preacher was originally applied to the helper.

Hemenway, Francis Dana, D.D., was born in Vermont, Nov. 10, 1830, and converted at the age of twelve. He was for many years a student and teacher in Newbury, Vt. cient Languages in Bowdon College, Bowdon, Ga. Subsequently he was called to the presidency, and filled the position until 1874, when he resigned on account of ill health. He returned to the itinerancy, and is now residing at Bowdon, Ga. He was president of the Georgia Annual Conference three years; a delegate to the General Convention at Montgomery, Ala., in 1867; also to the General Conferences of May, 1870, and 1874. Mr. Hilliard early united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has been a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church South for a number of years. He has displayed fine literary taste, and a volume of his speeches has been published, and also a work entitled "De Vane: a Story of Plebeians and Patricians."

Hillman, Joseph, Esq., was born in Schoharie Co., N. Y., in 1823. His mother dying when he was an infant, took him in her arms and earnestly commended him to God in prayer. At the age of thirteen he was converted, and united with the M. E. Church in Troy, and at eighteen commenced commercial business, in which he has continued for about thirty years. At the organization and building of the Congress Street M. E. church in Troy, he identified himself with that enterprise, the special features of which were free sittings and congregational singing. Jason Lee, in the ship Lausanne in October of that year, reaching Oregon June 1, 1840. His labors in the mission were of the most responsible character, and he also actively participated in the formation of "the provisional government" of Oregon. In 1845 he returned to New York by the way of the Sandwich Islands and China, and resumed his labors in the Genesee Conference until 1853, when he again returned to Oregon, being transferred to that Conference by Bishop Waugh. He served the most important stations and districts of the Conference, and represented his Conference in the General Conference of Buffalo, in 1868. In 1871, while stationed at Oregon City, he was stricken down by hemorrhage of the lungs. For two years he sustained a superannuated relation, and died aged sixty-four. Mr. Hines was the author of two works, one entitled "Missionary Expedition to Oregon," published in 1848, and having a very large sale, and the other, "Oregon and its Institutions," published in 1868. He was a man of great purity of motive and character, an able preacher, a vigorous writer, and has left an enduring mark on the history of Oregon and the church.

Hines, H. K., was born in Herkimer Co., N. Y., in 1828. His early life was spent in Oswego County of the same State, where he was converted in 1843 and became a member of the M. E. Church. At nineteen years of age he was licensed to preach, and at twenty began to travel as an itinerant on Eden circuit, Genesee Conference, into which he was admitted in September of 1849. He traveled in that Conference until March of 1853, filling some of its most important appointments, when he was transferred to the Oregon Conference, and at the first session of that body appointed to the city of Portland. In 1859 was made presiding elder of Salem district, afterwards of Puget Sound district. During this time he served one term of two years as a member and president of the upper house of Washington Territory legislature, and one year as chaplain of the House of Representatives. In 1873 he led the movement for the formation of a new Conference east of the Cascade Mountains, in Oregon and Washington, and was appointed presiding elder of its chief district. The next year he founded the Blue Mountain University, was elected its agent, at the same time serving as presiding elder of one of the largest districts of the Conference, both of which positions he still fills. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1790, and traveled extensively over Western Pennsylvania, presiding in 1795 over a district embracing nearly the entire work west of the Alleghanies. In 1807 he became the traveling companion of Bishop Asbury. In 1808 he was appointed one of the book agents, and discharged the duties of this office with great fidelity for eight years. Subsequently he was presiding elder of the Schuylkill, Monongahela, Potomac, and Carlisle districts. Some of these districts embrace more territory than do some of the Annual Conferences at present. He had excellent business habits, and was regarded as a safe counselor in Conference and in times of difficulty. He died in Washington Co., Pa., in 1825.

Hitt, Washington Willis, M.D., was born in 1801, in Maryland, and died in Vincennes, Ind., Aug. 19, 1876. By the assistance of his uncle, Daniel Hitt, one of the early book agents, he graduated M.D. in the University of Maryland. He removed to Vincennes in 1829, and devoted his time closely to professional duties. He was early a member of the M. E. He was graduated in medicine by the University of Pennsylvania at an early age, and after three years' practice in Powhatan Co., Va., removed to Lynchburg, Va., where he successfully pursued his profession for twenty years. About 1822 he embraced religion, and united with the M. E. Church. Soon thereafter he was licensed as a local preacher, and continued in the work to the period of his death. Practicing his profession, he joined with it regular Sabbath preaching, and had great popularity in both callings. He was a man of extensive literary attainments, and a volume of poems from his pen exhibits very respectable gifts. He was an early advocate of reform in the M. E. Church, and was refused ordination as a supporter of the "Mutual Rights" and lay representation. He was very serviceable with his pen in the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church. Having emancipated his slaves, and subsequently coming into the possession of about one hundred, he removed to Indiana, that by residing in a free State they might also be emancipated, under provision of the will of a relative through whom he received them, which declared them free unless he continued to reside in a Slave State. He remained in the West some fifteen years, and returned to Virginia in 1855. He died February 21, 1867.

The next year he was chosen professor in the same department. In 1849 he was elected corresponding secretary of the American Bible Society. He visited Europe in behalf of the Society in 1859, traveling in England, France, Germany, and Switzerland. He was a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1840, 1848, 1852, and 1860. He is the author of a "Life of Wilbur Fisk," which was published in 1842.

Holiness.—"Holiness, considered as an attribute of God, is his perfect moral purity. It is that perfection of his nature by which he is infinitely averse to all moral evil, and inclined to love all that is good and right. The holiness of God, then, implies the absence of all moral impurity and imperfection, and the possession, in an infinite degree, of all that is morally pure, lovely, and excellent." Holiness, as an attribute of God, expressing his perfect absolute purity, is also indicative of his general character, and as such comprehends all his attributes. The evidence of his nature is found in the Holy Scriptures; in the moral nature with which man was endowed at his creation; and in the law—its nature and design—which was originally given him. It is evidenced also in Providence; in the uniform treatment of all moral beings; in the checks which God has placed upon sin, and the natural rewards held out to the practice of virtue; in the exercise of his primitive justice, as seen in the punishment of angels; in our first parents expelled from Paradise; in the cities of the plain, destroyed for their impurity; and is most clearly revealed in the work of redemption; unfolding unto man God's infinite abhorrence of sin, and his design of restoring men to that state of holiness from which they had fallen, by the substitution and sufferings of Christ, and by his humiliation and perfect obedience. Holiness in man is his triumph over sin in every form, and his likeness to the moral image of God. It is promised as a privilege of the most exalted character, and is enjoined as a duty on the conscience of every true believer. (See SANCTIFICATION and PERFECTION.)

Holland, J. M.—This active Methodist was lay delegate for the West Texas Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Holland, John M., of the Memphis Conference, M. E. Church South, was born in Williamson Co., Tenn., about the year 1803, and in 1822 was admitted on trial into the Tennessee Conference. For twenty years he filled some of the most prominent places in Tennessee, Mississippi, and Memphis Conferences; was several times presiding elder, and was also agent for the Holly Springs University. He died Aug. 13, 1851.

Holliday, Anthony, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the ministry in 1857, and at the last Annual Assembly he was chosen for the presidency. He has been for five years minister of the large and influential congregation worshiping in Brunswick chapel, Huddersfield. He is one of the youngest men ever raised to the chair.

Holloway, Charles H., a lay delegate from the South Carolina Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Charleston, S. C., of a family who have been for a long time associated with the history of Methodism in that city. He is a local preacher, and has done service as steward and treasurer of his church.

Holmes, Charles Avery, D.D., was born in Middletown, Washington Co., Pa., June 2, 1827; was converted and joined the church in Steubenville, O., in 1838; graduated at the Western University, in Pittsburgh, in 1843, and entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1847. After having filled a number of the largest appointments in the Pittsburgh Conference, among which were Steubenville, Washington, and Smithfield and Christ churches, Pittsburgh, he was elected, in 1867, president of the Iowa Wesleyan University, and also served as pastor of Mount Pleasant church. He resigned the presidency and returned to the Pittsburgh Conference in 1869, where, after laboring successfully until 1874, he was transferred to the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and has been stationed in Harrisburg and Williamsport. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1860, 1864, 1868, and 1872, and was a member of the general missionary committee from 1864 to 1868. He was also elected by the General Conference as a member of the Board of Education in 1872.

Holmes, David, D.D., was born in Newburgh, N. Y., March 16, 1810, and died at Battle Ground, Mich., Nov. 14, 1873. Converted in his youth, he was admitted on trial in the Oneida Conference in 1834. He filled a number of appointments, such as Owego, Wilkesbarre, Cazenovia, Auburn, and was also presiding elder of the Susquehanna and Cayuga districts. He was, in 1855, transferred to the Southern Illinois Conference. After effective service of five years he was transferred to the Northwestern Indiana Conference, and from this time to 1866 was principal of Battle Ground Collegiate Institute, and in 1867 was principal of Northwestern Indiana College. In 1868 he returned to the pastoral work. After serving other appointments he was, in 1872, appointed to Battle Ground station, where he died, having been stricken down suddenly by paralysis. "He was a ripe scholar, an excellent logician, a thorough educator, an able preacher, and an author of merited repute. His death was peaceful and happy."

Holmes, George S., of the Pittsburgh Conference, was born in Ireland, March 22, 1795, and died in Elizabeth, Pa., July 8, 1853. He entered the Pittsburgh Conference at its first session, in 1825, and maintained an effective relation until 1852, when failing health compelled him to ask to be made supernumerary. During the twenty-seven years of his active ministry he filled the principal churches of his Conference,—Beaver, Uniontown, Morgantown, Steubenville, Wheeling, Monongahela City, Washington, and Smithfield and Liberty Streets, in Pittsburgh. In many of these places signal revivals attended his labors. He was a member of the General Conference in 1836, and of that in 1840. He was a preacher of the highest order,—scriptural, logical, and emotional.

NATHANIEL HOLMES, ESQ.

Holmes, Nathaniel, Esq., a banker of Pittsburgh, Pa., was born in March, 1782, in Ireland, and in 1807 removed to the United States and settled in Pittsburgh. Shortly before leaving Ireland he was converted, and being industrious and frugal, he gradually increased his property until he established a banking-house, in 1822, which has been continued by his sons and grandsons without interruption, and without having suffered in its credit in any of the financial revulsions through which the country has passed. He was devoted to the interests of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and during the controversy which arose in 1829, when the Reformers seceded from the church, he was one of its firmest pillars and most liberal supporters. He took a prominent part in founding the Liberty Street church, of which he was a steward and trustee, and in the communion of which he died, Aug. 29, 1849. He was a man of pleasant address, clear intellect, and of unwavering integrity.

Holston Conference, M. E. Church.—The Holston Conference, which had been formed in 1824, adhered to the Church South in 1845. During the Civil War, as the armies of the Union took possession of East Tennessee, many of the Methodists desired to have the services of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and under authority given by the General Conference of 1864, a Holston Conference was organized. Its first session was held at Athens, Tenn., June 1, 1865. Prior to the organization of this Conference, and as early as the winter of 1863-64, a number of societies had been organized, but they were not united together in Conference relation. The numbers reported to this Conference at its first session were 48 traveling and 55 local preachers, 6107 members, 2425 Sunday-school scholars, and churches valued at $31,250. According to the Discipline of 1876, it is bounded on the east by Virginia, on the north by Virginia and Kentucky, on the west by the western summit of the Cumberland Mountains, on the south by Georgia and the Blue Ridge, including that portion of North Carolina not within the North Carolina Conference. It reported, in 1876, 105 traveling and 237 local preachers, 23,465 members and 10,413 Sunday-school scholars, 190 churches, valued at $173,485, with 11 parsonages, valued at $7077.

Holston Conference, M. E. Church South, was the first organized in the M. E. Church west of the Alleghany Mountains. At the division (1845) it adhered to the Church South, and reported the following year 95 traveling, 327 local preachers, 34,414 white, 4083 colored, and 108 Indian members.

The General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries of this Conference so as to "include East Tennessee and that part of Middle Tennessee now embraced in the Pikeville District; that part of Virginia and West Virginia which is now embraced in the Rogersville, Abingdon, Jeffersonville, and Wytheville Districts, south of the line of the Baltimore Conference, and including Jacksonville circuit; the line between the Baltimore and the Holston Conferences running straight from Jacksonville, in Floyd County, to Central Depot, in Montgomery County, so as to embrace in the Holston Conference the territory known as the New Hope circuit; that part of the State of North Carolina which lies west of the Blue Ridge; a small part lying east of said ridge, embracing the Catawba circuit and that part now in the Wytheville district; and so much of the State of Georgia as is included in the following boundary: Beginning on the State line of Tennessee at the eastern part of Lookout Mountain; thence to the Alabama State line; thence north with said State line to Island Creek, and with said creek and the Tennessee River to the State line of Tennessee; and thence to the beginning, including the town of Graysville, Georgia."

The report from this Conference (1875) is 171 traveling and 294 local preachers, 38,087 white, 140 colored, and 176 Indian members, 488 Sunday-schools, and 23,226 scholars. The Conference lies principally in the State of Tennessee, in which the Church South has also the Memphis and Tennessee Conferences.

Home Mission and Contingent Fund (English Wesleyan).—This is one of the oldest institutions of Methodism, dating from Mr. Wesley's days; it has borne several designations, and occupies a very conspicuous financial position in the economy of Methodism. It was known first in 1749 as "The Yearly Collection"; in 1795 as "The Contingent Fund"; and at the Conference of 1856 as "The Home Mission and Contingent Fund" for the spread of the gospel in Great Britain and Ireland. Before the Conference of 1756 it was supported by some of the more wealthy members of society, but then it became a connectional institution. At first it was applied to remove chapel debts, to increase the numbers of ministers, to meet the more pressing needs in impoverished circuits, and to meet expenses at law incurred by prosecuting lawless mobs. Its chief design now is to promote more effectually the salvation of the spiritually destitute wherever they may be found.

1st. The Contingent Fund.—There are four special sources from which its funds are derived, viz.: "The Yearly Collection"; "The July Collection" (so called); the subscriptions of benevolent friends; with the proceeds of juvenile associations, etc. At first the collection was made at the usual quarterly visitation of classes. It originated (as we have stated) in 1749. The subscriptions were solicited at Christmas and the sums collected in March. In 1856 it was resolved that a collection should be made in every congregation in the month of July, just preceding the meeting of Conference; that it should be called "The Home Mission and Contingent Fund Collection," and that papers, showing the need and design of the fund, should be sent into every circuit for the use of the preacher, who should make the collection,—the design being "to make the Contingent Fund more equal to the average amount of the demands upon it." This does not supersede but supplement the yearly collection in the classes, which still, as in former times, is expected to average sixpence per member in every circuit. Formerly, in times of serious deficiency, the Book Room made grants out of its profits towards the needed sum; now annual grants are made. Such sources of aid, with occasional bequests and some hundreds of annual subscriptions, together with the results of the public meetings, complete its means of support. The apportionment of the aggregate income is divided under several heads, viz.: ordinary deficiencies, extraordinary deficiencies, and miscellaneous expenditure. Under the first of these are grants to needy circuits; under the second are included grants for traveling expenses in circuit work, for affliction, and for furniture for ministers' houses; the third is devoted especially to carrying on the executive work, as directed by Conference, and the due administration of discipline. The applications for these grants, of which by far the larger proportion belongs to the first division, are made by the several circuits in each district, and are examined and adjusted at the financial meeting in September, and the district meeting in May. In the disposal of these grants all the circuit stewards of the district are invited to attend, and have equal rights with the ministers to speak and vote. For the extraordinary deficiency department there is a mixed committee of management, but every claim must pass through the quarterly meeting and be signed by the circuit stewards before it can be proposed to the district meeting or to Conference. In 1848 it was decided that for the future all grants for furniture for ministers becoming supernumeraries, and for widows, should be paid by the Contingent Fund, instead of the Worn-out Ministers' Fund. The grants for ordinary deficiencies, sanctioned by the financial meetings to circuits requiring such assistance, are to be paid, in all cases, in three equal installments,—one-third to be paid at Christmas, one-third at the May district meeting, and the remaining third at the ensuing Conference. Up to 1835 the Contingent Fund was managed by a committee of traveling preachers only; it was then transferred to a mixed committee of preachers and laymen, by whom its affairs are still conducted. This committee is elected annually at the Conference; the general committee comprising the president and secretary of the Conference, the ex-president, treasurers, secretaries, and assistant secretary of the Home Mission, with fifteen ministers and fifteen laymen. The committee of management is distinct from the above, yet composed of nearly the same, with the addition of one of the treasurers and secretary of the Children's Fund. The lay members of the general committee are chosen by ballot of the circuit stewards at the May meeting; and at the same time one gentleman, being a member of society, is chosen to represent this committee at the Conference by the lay members of the meeting exclusively, and he becomes ex officio a member of the "missionary committee of review," the "education committee," and of those of the "Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove Schools," and "theological institutions."

A week before the Conference the committee of management meet to consider the various claims on the fund, to apportion in the most impartial manner the probable sums that will be needed in the several districts in the ensuing year. When the stations of the preachers are finally revised and fixed the whole is confirmed by the Conference, and the grants to the respective districts published in the minutes; it is then left to the financial meetings in September to divide the sum among the several claimant circuits. At this final meeting, also, the remainder of extraordinary claims is disposed of.

2d. Home Missions.—This establishment also has an ancient origin. Dr. Coke appears to have presented the outline of a plan, which was under the consideration of the Conference of 1805, and adopted in 1806. At that Conference eight districts were supplied with eight ministers, but it was not until 1857 that it became a matter of paramount interest, and laid the foundation of its present position. A warm tribute of grateful respect is due to the memory of its first secretary, the Rev. Charles Prest, who for many years was the main-spring and director of its various movements, and has only, in a ripe old age of usefulness and honor, passed from toil to triumph. In successive Conferences the scheme was gradually developed and matured,—in 1859 it directed "specific attention to the neglected and careless portion of the population of our large towns and the rural districts." Its work may be more fully designated as a going "forth into the highways and hedges;" to the homes of our large cities, towns, and villages; and by house to house visitation, by reading the word of God and prayer, and by personal and heart-searching inquiries after their salvation, to lead the unnumbered thousands of home-heathens to give up their sins, to attend the house of God, to seek salvation through faith in Christ, and a blessed preparation for eternity by living holy lives. This is the work of our Home Missions.

As authorized agents, none but ministers or probationers can be employed,—each must keep a journal to record the number of visits paid and religious services held. All the various work must be set down in detail. Every three months a copy of this, signed by the superintendent, must be sent to the secretary for the inspection of the committee. An annual report must also be made and transmitted. With the exception of an occasional interchange the Home Missionary must devote himself entirely to his own work. Local aid must be obtained in each circuit requesting such agency, towards defraying part of the expense, and grants are made from the fund to supplement and encourage such efforts. All requests must be sanctioned by the quarterly and district meetings, and inquiries are always made at the latter as to whether the regulations of this department have been duly observed. To prevent the recurrence of the pecuniary embarrassments of ministers in times past, an annual reserve from the "Home Mission and Contingent Fund" has been formed, contemplating a provision for furnishing a suitable house for a family at the end of four years at latest; and which constitutes a guarantee fund, to secure all other funds, under an increased number of ministers, from the result of inadequate circuit aid during the infancy of operations. Public meetings are to be held wherever practicable, in all the circuits, for the advocacy of these important claims; and it is strongly recommended that these meetings be connected with preparatory sermons, preached on the Lord's Day; every means being used to make these services thoroughly efficient and productive. For this purpose deputations are annually appointed by Conference to visit the different circuits in each district.

The returns last tabulated give the following gratifying results: Chapels built, 65, at a cost of £109,970, to seat 28,147 persons; besides which 344 regular services have been originated. Increase of members in Home Mission circuits, 11,699, and formation by the same agency of 428 class-meetings. Existing Sabbath-schools have been revived, and 84 new ones opened, with an average attendance of 7435 children. Thirteen day-schools have been formed, and are now connected with the Mission. Grants to the amount of £3700 in the last ten years have been made towards furnishing ninety-three ministers' houses, and thirty-six have been provided. Former stations, numbering thirty-five, have been incorporated with circuits. Ninety-seven Home Missionary ministers have been allocated, besides those engaged as district missionaries, and others specially appointed for army and navy work; and yet in the expenditure thus incurred, and the assistance given to necessitous circuits, we cannot estimate the cost of Home Mission work, but only that part of it which has passed through the hands of this committee. One of the most recent enterprises in connection with the fund is the appointment of a number of ministers, who, as district missionaries, visit the various circuits under the direction of the chairman, with a view to the revival and extension of the work of God. There are at present eight ministers so employed, and it is evident from the records given in the annual report, that thus far the work has been faithfully done and an encouraging measure of success attained. The income of the fund for the year 1876 was £36,919.1.6, being £234.7.1 more than the expenditure, and yet leaving a debt of more than £8000.

The Juvenile Home and Foreign Missionary Association is inseparably connected with the section under review. In 1862 there was a Conference arrangement made, which received subsequent modifications in 1869, which passed these regulations for the future,—that where sums were collected by juvenile associations for Home and Foreign Missions, instead of being divided into two parts (and always on condition that the sum received for Christmas offerings was undiminished), one-third shall be paid to the Foreign Missionary Society, another third to the Home Mission and Contingent Fund, and one-third to the circuit itself, to be expended in local movements of a directly Home Missionary character, under the direction of the superintendent and a committee, duly appointed at the December quarterly meeting.

3d. Metropolitan Auxiliary Home Mission Fund.—This is another branch of the same agency, but having especial reference to the wants of the metropolis, and to the need of furnishing some means which, apart from the usual work of preaching the gospel in places of worship, should be able to reach the lower strata of the destitute thousands of the great city. In 1871 the report of the committee previously appointed was received and adopted. A separate fund was to be raised for the purpose; and, under the usual judicious oversight of official meetings, should be used in the employment of lay agents, including Bible-women, whose efforts were imperatively required to meet the spiritual necessities of this vast population of nearly four millions. The arrangements for the effectual working of the scheme are very extensive, and, with the divine blessing, have already been made exceedingly useful. A similar institution has been established in Manchester; and in both cases, by services held in Mission Rooms, by domiciliary visits, by the distribution of religious tracts, and by open-air preaching, large masses of the population, inaccessible to the ordinary instrumentality, have been cared for and reached. The result of these efforts cannot be tabulated.

4th. The Thames, or Wesleyan Seamen's Mission.—This Mission has been upwards of thirty years in successful operation. During part of that period it was carried on as a local enterprise, without any direct connectional recognition, till at the Conference of 1869 the committee and officers, as well as its ministers, were duly appointed. Its main centre of operations is in the Commercial Road, in a chapel made over on lease from the Mereer's Company to trustees duly appointed, and is in connection with the St. George's circuit, in close proximity to the London Docks. There is a reading-room, appropriated solely to the use of seamen, open to them every evening from six to nine o'clock, and on Sunday afternoons from half-past two to half-past six. A library is also kept open, particularly on Sunday afternoons; a free tea is provided at four o'clock, after which what is termed "The Sailor's Meeting," specially designed for religious conversation and prayer, is held. Two ministers, two lay agents, and a Bible-woman compose the present staff; the latter visits the lodging-houses and Sailor's Homes, to read to the inmates either the Bible or religious tracts. Much unostentatious and effective—though sometimes painful—work is thus performed to secure the spiritual benefit of the seafaring class. The lay agents chiefly board the vessels in the river, but also take their turns in the docks. The ministers attend mainly to the docks, visiting them in succession. Thousands of vessels, representing tens of thousands of seamen, with their captains and officers, are visited from year to year, pastorally, by the band of Christian workers which this Mission employs. In addition to the work done at the reading-room and in the general visitation of ships, valedictory services are held on board vessels which are about starting on long voyages, or which contain emigrants. This Mission is entirely supported by voluntary contributions. During the year 1876 an expense of £1126.1.2 was incurred.

Home Missions (United Methodist Free Churches, England).—Among the Home Missions of the body dependent circuits may be classed. Annual grants are made to these circuits prospectively by the Annual Assembly. It is only over the expenditure of these circuits that any rigid supervision is exercised. Installments of the grant are paid quarterly from the Mission Fund on a schedule of income and expenditure being sent to the missionary secretary. The ministers in these circuits, except in special cases, are paid only the minimum salary. The exempt cases are important stations, such as watering-places, where men of special gifts are required. These circuits are thus helped till they can help themselves. About £3000 were voted prospectively to dependent circuits by the Annual Assembly of 1876. A number of Home Mission stations proper are also supplied with ministers, and wholly or largely supported from the Mission Funds. This is a branch of effort which is encouraged and fostered in every way by the connection. To promote further efforts in breaking fresh ground, a scheme was recently set on foot to assist in the erection of chapels in places where Free Methodism had not previously been planted. This scheme is aided by annual grants of £1000 from the Mission Funds, to be continued for five years. Home Mission stations are worked under special regulations. They may or may not be connected with regular circuits. The connectional committee has control over them, so as to secure the observance of connectional rules. There were twenty Home Mission stations recognized by the Annual Assembly of 1876. Prospective grants, amounting to about £850, were made by that Assembly on behalf of these stations, which are worked chiefly by probationers. Some years ago a scheme was set on foot by London men for aggressive work in the metropolis. In this scheme the London circuits united, but its operations were on a limited scale. These operations were aided by annual grants from the Mission Funds. With a view to make the effort more connectional, and to improve its efficiency, the Assembly of 1876 adopted a series of resolutions. It determined on the continuance of efforts for raising a special fund for missions in the metropolis, and resolved to make an annual grant out of the Mission Fund not exceeding in amount the sum raised by voluntary contributions. It defined the constitution of the managing committee, and determined on the appointment of a minister in full connection to one of the mission stations, who should act as secretary to the mission in general. The duties of the secretary were detailed, and his emoluments fixed. Since the close of the Assembly, Rev. George Lowndes has been chosen as secretary by the connectional committee, and will commence his duties at the Assembly of 1877, when the new regulations come into force. The entire home expenditure in 1876 for purely mission purposes was upwards of £5000. This includes £193.10.7 for Wales, where three brethren labored among the Welsh-speaking population.

Homer College.—Homer College is situated in the town of Homer, Claiborne Parish, La. It was chartered by the legislature of the State of Louisiana in 1855, and in 1856 substantial and sufficiently commodious buildings were erected. It is under the joint control of the Louisiana Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South and a local board of trustees, the powers of each being clearly set forth in the charter. Its patronage, owing to the lack of railroad facilities, has not been as large as was expected or desired,—its students not exceeding 125 at any time. Its graduates adorn the professions; some of whom are itinerant ministers, some lawyers, some politicians, and some engaged in literary pursuits.

Its present president, Dr. Thos. B. Gordon, A.M., is well qualified for the position which he occupies, and has associated with him competent teachers. The healthfulness of the location, the salubrity of the climate, the thoroughness of its curriculum, the ability of its president and faculty, and the superior inducements offered to young men desiring a collegiate education, entitle it to the respect and patronage of the people, especially in North Louisiana and South Arkansas.

Homes for the Aged, The.—The ladies of the Methodist Episcopal Church in several of the Eastern cities have established homes to accommodate such of the aged and infirm members as are destitute of means and of friends who can care for them. The first movement in this direction took place in the city of New York, on the 26th of March, 1850. On the 8th of the following June, the Ladies' Union Aid Society, having the above object in view, was organized, with a board of direction, of which Mrs. M. W. Mason was First Directress; Mrs. Wm. B. Thompson, Treasurer; Mrs. John Kennedy, Recording Secretary, assisted by Mrs. John Adams; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Mary Bangs. A house in Horatio Street was hired, and, upon the 19th of November, 1850, was opened for the reception of inmates; the one qualification for admission required by the board being that the applicant, after establishing her need of care, shall have been a member of the Methodist Church in good standing for ten years, the last five years having been passed in New York City. For six and a half years the house in Horatio Street was occupied, but would no longer accommodate the aged ones that applied for "a home." By the persevering efforts of the lady managers of the society a new building was erected in Forty-second Street, near Eighth Avenue, which was dedicated April 27, 1857. It is a brick edifice, 82 feet in length, 62 feet in width, and four stories high, including the basement, with a front of brownstone. The style of building is of Gothic order, and contains a chapel and infirmary, built over the main entrance. On the basement-floor, which is entirely above-ground, are the kitchen, dining-room, laundry, drying-room, store-rooms, etc. Other portions of the edifice are devoted to sleeping-rooms, parlors, and corridors used by the inmates. Large rooms well adapted to the use of aged married couples are provided in the house. One hundred persons can be accommodated comfortably in this building. During the first twenty-five years of the society's existence it has had under its care 242 persons. No other home was erected until after the close of the Civil War. The ladies in Philadelphia who had been active in the Christian and Sanitary Commissions, when the war ceased, desired to enter upon some other form of benevolent work. Accordingly, a Ladies' United Aid Society was formed. It was organized June 27, 1866; Mrs. Bishop Simpson was elected President; Mrs. Jane Henry, First Directress; Mrs. Mary E. Clark, Second Directress; Mrs. J. Long, Secretary; Mrs. A. W. Rand, Treasurer; and Mrs. J. E. Walker, Corresponding Secretary. A lot of about seven acres, on which there was a large stone building, was purchased, on Lehigh

ment, and several gentlemen gave $1000 each. Jubilee concerts were held by the Sunday-schools, which also netted a handsome amount, so that the entire cost has been fully paid. The current expenses are met by donations from individuals and by the results of festivals held on the anniversary, and collections made from time to time by committees of ladies in the various churches. There are 96 inmates in the home, which is capable of accom-

Avenue, and a temporary home was opened until possession could be secured. On June 9, 1867, the ladies took possession of the new premises, removing the inmates which had been collected to their new home. A larger and more commodious building being required, the corner-stone was laid on the 18th of July, 1868, and on June 11, 1870, it was dedicated, and during the year furnished. The entire cost of the edifice was about $85,000, which with the furnishing amounted to nearly $100,000. The expenses were met by collections made by the ladies, and especially by a series of fairs which were held in the city, in which the ladies of the various Methodist churches united. The first one, held in Concert Hall, in 1867, produced nearly $23,000; a second, $21,000; a third, $16,000; and a fourth, $14,000. The last two having been held in the midst of great financial depression. There was also money subscribed by different individuals: Mr. Amos Phillips, since deceased, gave $5000 to the building, and subsequently $5000 for an endow-modating about 100. Since the new building was opened the old building has been used for a boarding-house to accommodate aged persons of the church, who have small means without proper home surroundings, and who desire to live at a small expense. That department is designed to be self-sustaining. The accompanying engraving, furnished by J. H. Bryson, Esq., one of the founders of Arch Street church, represents the institution.

A movement somewhat similar was subsequently commenced in the city of Baltimore, and through the enterprise of the ladies, of whom Miss Eliza Berry has been one of the most active, a large building was erected, and a company of aged women of the church have been blessed with the comforts of home. In these institutions religious services are regularly held, embracing preaching, social prayer-meetings, and class-meetings, for the accommodation of the inmates, many of whom are wholly unable to attend the various churches.

Hoole, Elijah, D.D.—His entire course of fifty-

three years was identified with the Wesleyan Missionary Society of England. He went to Madras in 1819, served in the South of India nine years, and was a good Tamil scholar. In 1836 he became one of the general secretaries of the Society, and held that office for thirty-six years. He took the liveliest interest in every department of the work, and died in 1872, in the seventy-fifth year of his age. He possessed the meekness of wisdom and the wisdom of meekness.

Hooper, Wesley W., A.M., president of Shaw University, was born in Licking Co., O., Oct. 18, WESLEY W. HOOPER, A.M.

1843. At the age of fourteen he was converted and joined the M. E. Church. In 1861 he entered the army as a volunteer, and served three years, and on his discharge resumed his studies, and graduated at the Ohio Wesleyan University, June, 1872. He was elected, in 1873, Professor of Ancient Languages and Natural Science in Shaw University, and in 1876 was advanced to the position which he now holds. He was licensed as a local preacher in 1870, and joined the Mississippi Conference of the M. E. Church in 1874.

Hopkins, Robert, was born April 6, 1798, in Bourbon Co., Ky., and in 1823 joined the Ohio Conference. In 1825, by division he became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference, where he has filled important charges. For nineteen years he was presiding elder, and for three years book agent at Pittsburgh. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1832, 1836, 1840, 1848, and 1852. In times of church controversy he was remarkable for firmness and loyalty to the church.

Hopkinsville, Ky. (pop. 3136), the capital of Christian County, is one of the oldest towns in the State, and was early visited by the Methodist pioneers, but is not mentioned in the minutes until 1820. It is in the Kentucky Conference, and reports for the M. E. Church 100 members, 50 Sunday-school scholars, and $1000 church property. The Church South reports 55 members, 146 Sunday-school scholars, and $11,000 church property.

Hopper, Hon. P. B., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Queen Anne's Co., Md., Jan. 23, 1791, and was converted at a camp-meeting when about nineteen years of age. He studied law and was admitted to the bar. Subsequently he was elected to the Maryland legislature, but holding his religion above political preferment, he soon began preaching in the local ranks. He was eminently successful in winning souls to Christ. In 1826, by appointment of the governor, he was made judge of the second judicial district. He held the position until the office was made elective, in 1850, when he stood for the suffrages of the district and was elected. He continued to hold the position until his death, March 28, 1858. At the instance of Rev. Ezekiel Cooper, of the Philadelphia Conference, M. E. Church, he became a subscriber to The Wesleyan Repository, the first Reform paper. He embraced the principles of lay representation, and subsequently wrote extensively in defense of them. He was one of the founders of the Methodist Protestant Church. He was a member of its first Convention, and frequently delegate to the Annual Conference and General Conference. He wrote voluminously for the Methodist Protestant under his initials, "P. B. H." He was very active in all the camp and protracted meetings of his vicinage. His hospitality was proverbial, not to ministers only, of whom he was very fond, but no passing traveler asked in vain for the protection of his roof. As attorney and judge, he was intelligent, honest, and true to his convictions of law and right. He took a lively interest in the temperance cause, and was its foremost promoter.

Horne, Daniel H., was born in York Co., Pa., Nov. 26, 1788, and settled in Cincinnati in 1809. He was not only a pillar of strength, but an ornament to the Sixth Street Methodist church, with which he was identified to the end of his life. He was a man of integrity and sincere piety. His benefactions to the church and to the needy were generous, and made without the least ostentation. In 1816 he was a member of what was then known as the "Old Stone Church," since called "Wesley Chapel," and in that year he joined the class led by Father Whetstone. He helped organize the Methodist Church on the "mutual rights" basis, and continued an unwavering friend of the denomination during his whole life. His gifts to the educational and other enterprises of the church were proof of his devotion to it. On Sabbath morning, March 27, 1870, this truly good man passed away, after a long period of affliction.

Horne, James Wesley, late principal of the Monrovia Academy, Liberia, was born on the island of Jamaica, W. I., March 24, 1823. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1852, and was appointed, in 1853, principal of the Monrovia Academy, Liberia, Africa, an institution under the charge of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He returned to the United States in 1858, and engaged in pastoral work in the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Horne, Joseph, Esq., a merchant in Pittsburgh, is a native of Bedford Co., Pa., born Jan. 11, 1826. His ancestry were thoroughly Methodist, his grandfather, who served in the Revolutionary War, being an active Methodist and a licensed exhorter. Mr. Horne was educated at the Bedford Classical Academy; studied medicine, but, because of ill health, abandoned the profession, and entered mercantile life. He located in Pittsburgh in 1847, and became a member of the Liberty Street church. He was one of the founders of Christ church in that city, and has been connected with all its interests, as class-leader, Sunday-school superintendent, and trustee. He is also a trustee of Alleghany College, of the Western University, and was for many years of the Pittsburgh Female College. He is at the head of one of the largest dry-goods and trimming houses west of the Alleghany Mountains, and has been a liberal donor to educational and other enterprises.

Hornellsville, N. Y. (pop. 4552), situated in Steuben County, on the northwest division of the Erie Railroad. Methodist services were held here previous to 1830. In that year Asa Story conducted a series of meetings in the town, and in 1832 Glezen Filmore and William W. Gage organized a society. In 1834 the first M. E. Church was erected, and in 1860 the present one. In the winter of 1876-77 there was a revival of religion, in which 300 persons joined the M. E. church. It is in the Genesee Conference, and reports 450 members, 350 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

Horner, Joseph, D.D., was born in Boroughbridge, England, March 23, 1824, being the son of a Methodist local preacher. Removing to Pittsburgh, he was converted and united with the church in 1842; graduated with honor at the Western University of Pennsylvania, and in 1869 received from Alleghany College the degree of Doctor of Divinity. He was received into the Pittsburgh Conference in 1850, and in 1854 became principal of the Green Academy. He was appointed agent of the Methodist Book Depository in October, 1868, and has continued in that position to the present time. He was a delegate from the Pittsburgh Conference to the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876, in 1876 being secretary of the committee on the state of the church. He has contributed many articles to the press, especially to The Quarterly Review and The Ladies' Repository, and is now preparing a commentary on the minor prophets, being part of the Whedon series on the Bible.

Horton, Jotham, a distinguished member of the New England Conference,—twice elected a member of the General Conference, 1836 and 1840,—who filled important city stations in Maine, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. He was an associate with Orange Scott and La Roy Sunderland in the first "withdrawal," in 1842, from the M. E. Church on account of slavery. He, however, returned to the old church in 1850, and ended his days among his old, early friends, in and around Boston, a few years afterwards.

Hosmer, William, of the Genesee Conference, was for many years prominent in editorial labor. He was elected editor of the Northern Christian Advocate in 1848, and served until 1856. He was very active in the anti-slavery movement, and in 1856 became the editor of an independent paper. He was a member of General Conference from 1848 to 1856.

Hough, A. M., a native of the State of New York, was admitted in the New York Conference of the M. E. Church in 1851. By division he became a member of the New York East Conference. He was sent as superintendent of missions to Montana Territory. Going to California in 1865, he was stationed in Los Angeles, San Francisco, and Sacramento. In 1875, by division, he became a member of the Southern California Conference, and was appointed presiding elder of the Los Angeles district. The same year he visited Europe and the Holy Land.

Houghtaling, J. B., was born in October, 1797. In 1813 he commenced the study of law, at which he remained five years, and subsequently, for a time, was employed as teacher. He was received into the New York Conference in 1828, and filled a number of the most prominent appointments. He had remarkable talent for business, and was employed as secretary of the Troy Conference from the time of its organization until his health failed. He attended the General Conference twice, and was at each chosen assistant secretary. He died in 1857, his last words being, "I am going home to heaven."

House, Erwin, A.M., was born in Worthington, O., Feb. 17, 1824, and died suddenly in Cincinnati, May 20, 1875. He was converted when thirteen years of age, and graduated from Woodward College in 1846. In 1847 he was appointed assistant editor of The Ladies' Repository. From March, 1851, to December, 1852, he had sole editorial charge of this magazine, and was for several years assistant editor of The Western Christian Advocate. He published a number of valuable works, such as "Sketches for the Young," "The Missionary in Many Lands," "The Homilist," "Scripture Cabinet," and "Sunday-School Handbook." He was especially successful as a Sunday-school worker. In an editorial capacity he faithfully and successfully served the church for more than twenty-five years. "He was earnest in his devotion to the church, systematic and generous in his benefactions, and catholic-hearted towards the whole world."

Houston, Tex. (pop. 9382), the capital of Harris County, is situated on Galveston Bay, about 80 miles north of Galveston. Dr. Martin Ruter, who had been president of Alleghany College, Pennsylvania, was, early in 1837, appointed as missionary to Texas, and arrived at Houston December 13 of the same year. He spent a week becoming acquainted with the people and members of the legislature, which was at that time in session in this place, and as the result a small society was organized. In 1838, Rev. Abel Stevens was appointed to Houston and Galveston. In 1839, Edward Fountaine was appointed to Houston station. The Texas Conference was organized in the following year, and Rev. Thomas O. Summers, now editor of The Advocate, at Nashville, the official organ of the M. E. Church South, was appointed to Galveston and Houston, and in 1842 was appointed to Houston alone. A local authority says that Dr. Summers organized the first permanent class in 1841. Mr. Fowler had secured a site for a church in 1837. The corner-stone of the edifice was laid the 2d of March, 1843, which was the seventh anniversary of Texas independence. In 1845, in common with the churches of Texas, it adhered to the Church South, and is now strong in numbers and influence. In 1874 the Washington Street church South was erected, being its second organization. A German church in connection with the Church South has also been organized, and has enjoyed considerable prosperity. At the close of the Civil War the ministers of the M. E. Church were invited into Texas, and a colored congregation was organized in Houston. Since that period a second church has been built, and a German congregation has also been organized. There is also an African M. E. church. The following are the statistics:

Howe, John M., M.D., born in New York City in 1806, was converted in his fourteenth year. He became a local preacher in 1834, and was ordained an elder. In his early ministry he performed a great amount of pulpit work, and for three years was chaplain of the New York Hospital. In 1836-37 his health failed because of pulmonary troubles, and he was providentially led to use an inhaling-tube, and was finally restored to health. Since he graduated in medicine, in 1844, he has made this a specialty. He was one of the founders of the National Local Preachers' Association. For the past eleven years he has been trustee of the State Normal School, of Trenton, and a member of the State Board of Education of New Jersey. He now resides in Passaic, N. J.

Howe, William, a leading layman of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. He is a merchant, and resides in Manchester. He held the office of connectional treasurer for seven years. Advancing years have made it necessary for him to retire from the prominent position he once held in the councils of the body, but he is still an active member of the Theological Institute committee, having served in that capacity ever since its establishment.

Hoyt, Francis S., D.D., editor of The Western Christian Advocate, was born in Vermont in 1823, and was the son of Rev. B. R. Hoyt, many years a presiding elder in the New England, Vermont, and New Hampshire Conferences. Dr. Hoyt was converted in his fourteenth year, fitted for college at Newbury, and graduated with credit at the Wesleyan University in 1844. Two years after his graduation he entered the New Hampshire Conference, but owing to enfeebled health was transferred to New Jersey. Soon after he went to Oregon, under the direction of the Missionary Society, to take charge of an institution known as the Oregon Institute, which afterwards became the Willamette University. After serving in that position for ten years, he was elected by the trustees of the Ohio University to fill the chair vacated by the election of Dr. Harris to the position of missionary secretary. He remained in the Ohio Wesleyan University until the General Conference of 1872, when he was elected editor of The Western Christian Advocate, in which office he still remains, having been re-elected by the General Conference of 1876.

Hoyt, Oliver, a lay delegate from the New York East Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872 and 1876, was born in Stamford, Conn., in 1823. to the purposes of the church, among which may be named his contributions to the building of the church at Stamford, Conn., a gift of $25,000 to Wesleyan University, and one of $2000 to the Wesley Memorial church, of Savannah, Ga. He has been for more than twenty years an active member of the Board of Managers of the General Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has also served as treasurer of the Church Board of Education. He was one of the founders of The Methodist newspaper, and takes an active part in all church work. He has also been a member of the State Senate of Connecticut.

Hubbard, Hon. Chester Dorman, a lay delegate from the West Virginia Conference in the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of 1872, was born Nov. 25, 1817, at Hamden, Conn. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1840, and engaged in business at Wheeling, Va. In 1851 he was elected a member of the House of Delegates of Virginia. In 1853 he was made president of the Bank of Wheeling. He was a member of the Richmond Convention of 1861, and voted in that body against the ordinance of secession. He was afterwards a member of the convention which sat at Wheeling and instituted the State and government of West Virginia. He served in 1863 and 1864 as a member of the State Senate of West Virginia, and from 1865 to 1869 as a member of the House of Representatives in the Thirty-ninth and Fortieth Congresses. He has been engaged in the manufacture of iron and nails at Wheeling, W. Va., and is secretary of the Wheeling Iron and Nail Company.

Hudson, N. Y. (pop. '8615), the capital of Columbia County, is situated on the Hudson River, 115 miles above New York. It was settled in 1783, and was made a port of entry in 1795. The first M. E. church was built in 1790, on the corner of Diamond and North Third Streets. It was replaced by another, in 1825, which in turn gave way, in 1853, to the present commodious edifice. The society belonged to Chatham circuit until 1822, when Hudson circuit was formed, which comprised at that time a large scope of country, but for many years past has been a station. There is also a German M. E. society. The African M. E. Zion Church was organized in 1855, and purchased its present church in 1860. There is also an African M. E. society, which built its church in 1874. Hudson is in the New York Conference, and reports the following statistics:

Hudson, Thomas M., was born in Huntingdon Co., Pa., Nov. 20, 1799. His parents were Presbyterians. He was converted and joined the M. E. Church in 1816, and was admitted on trial into the Baltimore Conference in 1821. He became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference at its organization, in 1825, and still retains his connection with it. Through a long and honored ministry he has been true to his Conference, his church, and his God. He has been thirteen years a presiding elder, four times a member of the General Conference, and has been preacher in charge of the best appointments in the region of his labors. "And now, well on to eighty years of age, few men know so well how to be old. None wears a sunnier face, extends a warmer hand, or carries a greener heart. None seems fitter for earth, or riper for heaven."

Hull, Hope, a pioneer Methodist preacher, was born in Worcester Co., Md., March 13, 1763. He was received on trial at the Baltimore Conference of June, 1785, and was appointed to Salisbury, N. C. Subsequently he was appointed to South Carolina and Georgia, and was a pioneer preacher in that region. He attempted to form a society in the city of Savannah, but encountered such opposition and peril that he left the place; but it was chiefly through his exertions that the first respectable brick building was erected in Washington, Ga., designed to be used as an academy. In 1794 he traveled with Bishop Ashury, and in 1795 took a location. His early education had been limited, but during the ten years of his traveling ministry, besides making himself a good English scholar, he had acquired a respectable knowledge of the Latin language, and after his location he commenced a school in Wilkes County, dividing his time between teaching and preaching. He removed to Athens, and became a member of the board of trustees of the University of Georgia, and was on the prudential committee, which had the more immediate supervision of the affairs of the institution. His whole life was emphatically spent in doing good. He died Oct. 4, 1818.

Hunt, Aaron, a member of the New York Conference, M. E. Church, was born March 28, 1766. When a young man, casually passing old John Street church, he was attracted by the earnest tones of the preacher, and entering, was influenced to become a regular attendant. In 1791 he entered the New York Conference. He was strongly attached to the Discipline of the church and faithful in its administration; was plain and neat in his appearance; always ready for duty, and his whole aim was to exalt Christ. He was an intimate friend of Ashbury, Lee, and Garrettson. He died April 25, 1858, at the age of ninety.

Hunt, Albert Sanford, D.D., was born at Amenia, N. Y., July 3, 1827. He received his preparatory education at Amenia Seminary; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1851; was afterwards a tutor in that institution till 1853, when he was chosen Adjunct Professor of Moral Science in the same. He resigned this position on account of failing health in 1855. Having recovered his health, he entered the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1859, and has since labored continuously in the itinerant work. Dr. Hunt was a member of the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876. He was appointed by the former body chairman of the committee on the reception of fraternal delegates, and was also made chairman of the committee on fraternal relations which was appointed by the same body to visit the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1874, with a view to establishing fraternal intercourse between the two churches. Dr. Hunt has been for many years an active member of the General Missionary Board. He was tendered by President Grant the chaplaincy with its professorship at West Point, but he preferred to remain in the regular pastorate.

Hunt, Andrew, formerly principal of Amenia Seminary, was born in Amenia, N. Y., Oct. 27, 1824. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1849; joined the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1850; was elected classical teacher in Amenia Seminary in 1852, and was afterwards elected principal of the same. He preferred pastoral work in 1856 and 1857, went abroad, and again served as principal of Amenia Seminary from 1861 to 1864. He returned to pastoral work in the New York Conference in 1868.

Hunt, John, was one of the pioneers of the Wesleyan mission to Fiji, where he speedily acquired the language,—translated the New and portions of the Old Testaments. He issued a course of Christian theology, and his translations and other works have been extensively useful. He was a man of amazing energy and zeal. Holiness unto the Lord was impressed on all he said and did. He died at Viwa, 1848, aged thirty-seven years.

Hunt, Sanford, D.D., a delegate from the Western New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Erie Co., N. Y., and was graduated from Alleghany College in 1847. He joined the Genesee Conference in the same year and has since labored in pastoral work within the territory of that and the Western New York Conference. He is the author of a work on "Laws relating to Religious Corporations. A compilation of the statutes of the several States of the United States in relation to the incorporation and maintenance of religious societies, and the disturbance of religious meetings," which is published with an additional article by the Hon. E. L. Fancher, on the "Laws affecting Religious Corporations in the State of New York." He has also written a "Handbook for Trustees."

Hunter, James, a manufacturer of Philadelphia, has been an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church since his youth. He has been connected with a number of church enterprises, among which is the erection of Fletcher chapel, in Hestonville, which is admirably arranged for Sunday-school work, and the special arrangements of which are due to his architectural taste and skill.

In connection with his brother he has been largely engaged in the printing of calico and cotton goods, and is also connected with improvements at Spring Lake, on the Atlantic coast. He is also much interested in microscopy and in the application of chemistry to the mechanical arts.

Hunter, John, is a member of the M. E. Church in Hestonville, Philadelphia. He has held various official positions, and is deeply interested in all church enterprises. He is associated with his brother in a large manufacturing establishment, and was also actively engaged with him, and a most liberal contributor, in building the handsome chapel at Hestonville. Both brothers and their wives have been deeply interested in the Methodist Home for the Aged, to which they have been regular contributors.

Hunter, William, D.D., of East Ohio Conference, was born in Ireland, May 26, 1811. The family emigrated in 1817, and settled near York, Pa. He was converted, and united with the church in 1828, and in 1830 entered Madison College, Uniontown, having been induced so to do by Rev. Dr. Charles Elliott. In pursuing his studies he was dependent on his own labor, and after leaving New York he engaged in teaching. In 1832 he was licensed to preach, and in 1833, having served as a supply on Blairsville circuit, he was admitted on trial into the Pittsburgh Conference, and appointed to Beaver and Brighton, and the following year to Pittsburgh. In 1836 he was elected editor of the Pittsburgh Conference Journal, and being re-elected successively, spent four years in this service. From 1840 to 1844 he was presiding elder on the Clarksburg and Beaver districts, the latter extending from Alleghany City to Massillon. In 1844 he was elected by the General Conference editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, the name of the paper having been changed, and was re-elected in 1848. From 1852 to 1855 he filled pastoral charges in West Virginia Conferences, and in the latter year was elected Professor of Hebrew and Biblical Literature in Alleghany College, where he remained for about fifteen years. In 1870 he returned to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1872 was again elected editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate. In 1876 he fell by residence into the East Ohio Conference, and was appointed, in 1877, presiding elder of Cleveland district. He died suddenly Oct. 18, 1877.

He was a member of the General Conferences of 1844, 1852, 1860, and 1870. He published a few books, chiefly of devotional lyrics. The principal one of these is the "Select Melodies," partly selected and partly original, which has gone through many editions. Probably 150,000 copies have been sold. He is the author also of some hymns which have found their way into a number of the standard church hymn-books, and which are sung in various parts of the world, having been translated into several languages. Among them may be mentioned those beginning, "Joyfully, joyfully, onward I move," "The heavenly home is bright and fair," "We are bound for the land of the pure and the holy," etc. He was a member of the present committee for the revision of the Hymn-Book, and was also a co-laborer on the Whedon "Commentary," having the book of Proverbs allotted to him.

Huntingdon, Lady Selina, Countess of.—Her family was one of the noblest in England. Her father was Washington Shirley, Earl of Ferrers. She was born at Chartley, August 24, 1707. Her first religious awakening came at nine years of age, when in her walks she met the funeral of a child of her own age. She had great love of knowledge, and cultivated her mind to the extent of her opportunity. She was possessed of great dignity of manner, though she lacked personal beauty. In her girlhood, surrounded by fashionable society and worldly amusements, she was marked for simplicity of dress, modest manner, and refined conversation. She married Lord Huntingdon, a young nobleman of high moral excellence and cultured mind, whose attitude towards her religious convictions was liberal and generous. His sisters, persons of most estimable character, had attended the meetings of the first Methodists and had been converted. One of them, Lady Margaret Hastings, labored faithfully with her young sister-in-law, and was the means, under God, of her conversion. A serious illness brought her nearly to the grave and aggravated her conviction of her own sinfulness, when she remembered in her misery that since her own conversion Margaret said she "had been as happy as an angel." She sought this happiness for herself and found it in Christ, who became from this time the portion of her soul. Recovering from this illness, she sent a message to Messrs. John and Charles Wesley, then preaching in the neighborhood, announcing her purpose "to live for him who died for her," and assuring them she was "one with them in heart." In 1738 she began to attend the meetings of the first Methodist society formed that year in the Moravian chapel, Fetter Lane, London, where the preaching of the Wesleys and Whitefield attracted the multitude. Here she was instrumental in encouraging Mr. Maxfield, the first itinerant lay preacher, whose hands she upheld even before Mr. Wesley could be induced to give his sanction to the apparent usurpation of the office. When Wesley and Whitefield and nineteen others withdrew from the society in Fetter Lane, she went with them and made one of the society that met at the Old Foundry. When Whitefield was refused the use of the London churches, she was present often at his field-meetings. At his suggestion she aided in establishing schools among the poor. She identified herself with lay preaching, and listened humbly to John Nelson, Samuel Deacon, and Daniel Taylor, the last of whom had been a servant of her husband's. With such helps from the highest and the lowliest of the teachers of Christ her growth was rapid, and her influence over the minds of her associates of high rank most remarkable. Five years of Christian usefulness passed, terminating in a period of great affliction, which deepened her knowledge of divine things. The terrible disease of smallpox appeared at Donnington Park and took away two sons, one eleven and one thirteen years of age. Two years later followed her husband's death, and there came upon her the cares of a large estate, which she kept until her eldest son was of age. Her own health declined, and for a long period she was a great sufferer. Subsequently she buried the third son and her beautiful and pious daughter Selina, who died in the bloom of early womanhood. These children had shared her own religious views, but her eldest son, the young Lord Huntingdon, over whom Lord Chesterfield had assumed fatherly care, was an avowed infidel. She had great sorrow, too, in the career of her cousin Lawrence, Earl of Ferrers, whose crimes ended on the scaffold. From these sore trials she came forth more eager to labor for the good of men.

Her influence reached people of highest rank, as Lord and Lady Buchan, Lady Chesterfield, the Marquis of Lothian, Lord and Lady Dartmouth, and the Prince of Wales. Among her friends were Dr. Watts and Philip Doddridge, Wm. Grimshaw, Berridge, and Fletcher. She traveled often with the preachers to their posts to aid their work. She organized, as early as 1775, meetings of preachers at her house for worship and consultation. At these conferences, where, she was a leading spirit, a regular exchange of preachers, by her sole appointment, was adopted. The connection so formed was called "Lady Huntingdon's Connection," and the preachers "Lady Huntingdon's preachers." Her authority was considered parental and decisive. She conceived the plan of canvassing England, dividing the kingdom into six circuits, and appointing six eminent revivalists, directing them to preach in every city, town, and village. She held herself responsible for the expenditure required, contributing most generously herself. It was not enough to open her own house for public worship, but for a period of many years she was chiefly instrumental in rearing chapels in London and at many points throughout the country, supplying the money herself when she failed to procure it in other ways. She founded also the "School of the Prophets," for the instruction of men devoted to the ministry. Her benevolent efforts amounted to an expenditure of $500,000. Her interest was not confined to England, but extended to Scotland, and showed in most active effort for Ireland, to which she extended her ministry in 1771. She penetrated nearly every part of Wales, raising up flourishing churches at many points. Her zeal followed Whitefield across the sea to Georgia, and renewed her interest in the Bethesda Orphan House. She selected missionaries for the American field from the "School of the Prophets," and looked upon the sending them forth as the greatest enterprise of her life. When her first scheme failed she still adhered to a noble project for the benefit of the Indians, and with this object in view held a correspondence with Washington. Thus, in efforts unremitting both at home and abroad, involving great simplicity of life, renunciation of many luxuries of her rank, her years passed, till at the age of eighty-four she came to the gate of heaven, whispering as she entered, "My work is done; I have nothing to do but go to my Father." She is buried in the church at Ashby, beside her husband. Her grave bears date of her death, June 17, 1791. She embraced the views of Whitefield and Toplady, and was a decided Calvinist. This led to Mr.

Fletcher's retirement from her seminary and her alienation from Mr. Wesley. The churches founded by her are either known as Calvinistic Methodists or have been merged into the Independents or Congregationalists.

Huntingdon, Pa. (pop. 3034), the capital of Huntingdon County, on the Pennsylvania Railroad. The first Methodist services were held in this place about 1788, when it was connected with a large circuit on which Samuel Breeze and Daniel Combs were preachers, who, in 1789, reported for that territory 189 members. The first class was formed in 1793, consisting of eight persons. In 1802 the first church was built, and was rebuilt in 1832. The present edifice was not erected until 1856. A second church was built in West Huntingdon in 1876. It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and reports 681 members, 589 Sunday-school scholars, and $22,000 church property.

Huntsville, Ala. (pop. 4907), is the capital of Madison County, and is on the Memphis and Charleston Railroad. Methodism was introduced about 1820, and in 1821 the name appears on the minutes, with Thomas Madden as pastor, who reported, in 1822, 61 white and 213 colored members. This place was connected with a circuit for a number of years, but subsequently became a station. It adhered to the Church South at the separation in 1845. Since the close of the war the M. E. Church has been organized, and has established the Rust Biblical and Normal Institute, which was founded in 1870, under the direction of the Freedman's Aid Society. It is doing a good work in educating young ministers and young people of both sexes for teachers. The African M. E. Church has also an organized society. The following are the statistics:

Hurd, Zenas, late principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, was born Oct. 21, 1821. He was graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1846, and in the same year joined the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was elected principal of the Genesee Conference Seminary, Pike, N. Y., in 1856, teacher of Mathematics in the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, Lima, N. Y., in 1859, and principal of that institution in 1860. He returned to the itinerant pastoral work in 1862. In 1864 he served in the Christian Commission at White House Landing and City Point, Va.

Hurlburt, Jesse Lyman, author of works for Sunday-schools, was born in New York City, Feb. 15, 1843; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1869, and was appointed in the same year teacher of Languages in Pennington Seminary and Female Collegiate Institute, New Jersey. He joined the Newark Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1865. He has prepared "The Lesson Compend" on the Berean Sunday-school lessons for several years, and has made other contributions to the literature of the Sunday-school department of the M. E. Church.

Hurlburt, R. H., A.M., is a native of Connecticut. He entered the Erie Conference in the year 1851. He has filled a number of the most important appointments, and has served as presiding elder. He has been four times a member of the General Conference, and has been a contributor of a number of articles to the church papers.

Hurst, Catherine Elizabeth, wife of the Rev. John F. Hurst, was born at Charlotteville, Schoharie Co., N. Y., Oct. 28, 1835. She was graduated at the New York Conference Seminary in 1856, and was married in 1859. She has published the following works: "Anna Lavater: a Picture of Swiss Pastoral Life in the Last Century," "Renata of Este: a Chapter from the History of the Reformation in France," and "Queen Louisa of Prussia, or Goodness in a Palace." An edition of this last work appeared in London in 1876, under the title of "The Royal Disciple." These works, in connection with "Elizabeth Christine, Wife of Frederick the Great," now in preparation, constitute a series under the general title of "Good Women of History."

Hurst, John, Esq., of Baltimore, was born in Dorchester Co., Md., Sept. 19, 1807. In his youth losing both his parents, he was dependent on his own exertions. In 1824, on his seventeenth birthday, he united with the M. E. Church. In 1826 he entered the dry-goods house of Samuel M. Barry, in Baltimore, and subsequently became one of the firm. Uniting with the old Light Street church, he entered the class, and has been a constant attendant of the same class for over fifty years. He was one of the building committee of Charles Street church, and was one of the most active members in its removal to the new and beautiful edifice in Mount Vernon Place, and has been officially related to it for forty years. He was for many years extensively engaged in business as a merchant, was president of the board of directors of the Maryland Penitentiary, and is president of the National Exchange Bank of Baltimore.

Hurst, John Fletcher, D.D., was born near Salem, Dorchester Co., Md., Aug. 17, 1834. He prepared for college at Cambridge Academy, and graduated at Dickinson College in 1854. After teaching ancient languages two years in the Hedding Institute, New York, he went to Germany, where he studied theology in the Universities of Halle and Heidelberg. On his return to the United States, in the latter part of 1858, he entered the Newark Conference. He here had appointments in Irvington, Passaic, Elizabeth, and Staten Island. In the autumn of 1866 he took charge of the theological department of the Mission Institute of the German Methodist Church, in Bremen, Germany, which was afterwards removed to Frankfort-on-the-Main, under the name of the "Martin Biblical Institute," where he continued to be its director for three years, meantime visiting Russia, the Scandinavian countries, France, Switzerland, Italy, Great Britain, Greece, Syria, and Egypt. In 1871 he returned to the United States to become Professor of Historical Theology in the Drew Theological Seminary, at Madison, N. J. In 1873 he was elected president of that institution, retaining his chair of Historical Theology. Dr. Hurst has published a "History of Rationalism," "Martyrs to the Tract Cause," "Outlines of Bible History," "Life and Literature in the Fatherland," "Outlines of Church History," and "Our Theological Century." He has translated and edited Hagenbach's "History of the Church in the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Centuries," Van Oosterzee's "Lectures in Defence of John's Gospel," Lange's "Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans," and the "Moral Essays of L. Annæus Seneca."

Huston, Hon. Benjamin W., a leading lawyer in Northern Michigan, was born in 1828, and has held important civil positions. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of Michigan, and served five sessions in the legislature, and for four years was Speaker pro tem. of the House. In the late Civil War, he served under General Sherman as major of the Twenty-third Regiment of Michigan volunteers. His wealth has been freely dispensed to sustain the church. He was lay delegate of the Detroit Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Hutchinson, David, was born in Maine, Aug. 14, 1781. In early life he became a sailor, and being distinguished for energy of character and integrity, was soon put in charge of a vessel as captain. In 1811 he was brought under deep religious impressions, and his conversion was clear and triumphant. In 1813 he entered the New England Conference of the M. E. Church, and, until 1848, filled a number of important appointments as pastor or as presiding elder. For eleven years he occupied a superannuated relation. He died June 23, 1859. He was a man of sound judgment, of consistent scriptural piety, a good counselor, and an able preacher.

Hyde, Ammi B., D.D., was born at Oxford, N. Y., March 13, 1826. He received his academic education at Oxford Academy, entered the Wesleyan University in 1844, and graduated in 1846, and immediately became Professor of Ancient Languages in Cazenovia Seminary. He united with the M. E. Church in 1837, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1848. In 1862 he resigned his professorship, and was pastor at Rushville; also serving in the United States Sanitary Commission at City Point. In 1864 he accepted the professorship of Greek in Alleghany College, where he still remains. In 1867 he was elected a member of the American Oriental Society.

Hymn-Book, Methodist Episcopal.—In 1784, Mr. Wesley prepared an edition of his hymns, which, accompanied with the Liturgy, were printed and sent by Dr. Coke for the use of the Methodists in America: The Liturgy being omitted, this Hymn-Book was used until 1820. The book was then revised, and in 1836 a supplement was added. This work contains 697 hymns, of which Charles Wesley wrote 500, John Wesley about 30, the others being selected from various writers. The General Conference of 1848 appointed a judicious committee of ministers and laymen to revise the Hymn-Book, and prepare a standard edition, which is the Hymn-Book which has been in use from 1848 to 1876. At the recent General Conference a new committee was appointed to prepare a new Hymn-Book and also a tune-book to accompany it. This committee has performed its work, and the book is now (November, 1877) passing through the press.

Hymn-Book, M. E. Church South.—After the separation of the church and prior to the new edition of the Hymn-Book published in 1848, the Church South appointed a committee to prepare a revised edition. This was very largely under the care of Dr. T. O. Summers. The larger portion of the hymns are the same as those previously in use, but the order of the different parts was changed and some new hymns were added.

Hymn-Book and New Supplement (English Wesleyan).—The Hymn-Book universally used until lately in Great Britain was published in the year 1780. The attachment of the Methodist Church to it cannot be exaggerated; next to the Bible it has been the text-book of the devout meditations and exultant praises of millions of the people of God. A supplement to the same was added in 1830; and when a few years since the copyright of the volume had lapsed, it was found that a favorable opportunity presented itself, as well as a necessity, for the production of a new and enlarged hymnal. It first received notice in the Conference of 1874. A number of ministers were added to the Book Room committee for furthering the design,—as a special committee. It was by them determined that John Wesley's book, with a few trifling variations, should remain intact; but that other compositions should be added, yet none accepted which had not made for themselves a place in English hymnology. Every hymn suggested for adoption was read in committee and a vote taken upon it. Every proposed emendation was carefully studied and voted upon. The selection having been made, it was necessary to make application to the authors or holders of copyright for permission to insert their hymns. In most instances this was most generously accorded; in a few cases it was declined, which may account for the non-appearance in the new book of some popular favorites. The new Hymn-Book was published in the spring of 1876, and is already in use in most of the congregations. Sixteen hymns formerly in the old book have disappeared for various reasons; and in every case but two their places are supplied with hymns by Charles Wesley. Twenty-eight have been removed from the section entitled "Additional Hymns," and from the Supplement of 1830. The new hymns are to be found mainly in the Supplement, containing 469 hymns; of these very many are new, never having been found in any Wesleyan collection before. In the first section of the Supplement are one hundred and one versions of the Psalms,—about one-third are by the brothers Wesley,—and contain a vast variety suited to every phase of human experience, and for all the ordinances of the church; and though contributed by persons holding different opinions, it does not contain one sentiment at variance with the creed of John Wesley and his followers. Fifty-one of the hymns are the composition of Dr. Watts. James Montgomery furnishes fourteen. Bishop Heber two. The Rev. H. B. Lyte contributes six hymns. John Newton five. Eleven are by Dr. Doddridge. Keble gives five. Nine of the choicest of the new hymns are by W. M. Bunting. Dr. Punshon furnishes two. There are also ancient and choice productions by St. Ambrose and St. Augustine. One hymn before its translation was sung for centuries in the churches of Greece and Asia Minor. Others we owe to Bernard, a monk of the Abbey of Cluny. Dean Stanley furnishes one, and Dean Alford one. Three hymns are selected from Dr. Milman's writings. It would be beyond our limits to characterize all; but it must be added that some of the most popular of the new hymns are by ladies. The names of some will bear insertion: Miss Steel, Miss Campbell, Mrs. Codnor, Miss Waring, Miss Borthwick, and Charlotte Elliott. Other ladies—Miss Winkworth especially—have contributed translations from the German; while some half-dozen of the best hymns are anonymous. In the new Hymn-Book there is a large increase of the number of different metres, presenting a grand opportunity of improving and enlarging the connectional psalmody. This has involved the necessity, often recognized but never practically carried out, of a connectional tune-book. The Wesleyans have tune-books of different kinds, but have never had a work comprehensive enough to meet the varied requirements of the church. The new tune-book will be as great a boon to the church as the new Hymn-Book itself, having been compiled with the utmost care. In this new connectional tune-book there is a feature which is entirely new, so far as any Methodist collection in Great Britain is concerned. The hymns are printed with the tunes, each hymn having its own tune, and by this means, in the choir and in the congregation, as well as in the home circle and at family prayer, it will be convenient, as the tune is already selected for the hymn; which, however, may be used or not, as judgment or taste may decide. Again, many of the tunes in the new book have been composed expressly for the hymn to which they are set, and are the productions of men who, with exquisite judgment and ability, have realized and interpreted the sense of the poetry.

Hymns, Wesley's.—Early in his life John Wesley showed no ordinary poetic talent, having composed a number of beautiful sketches. He, however, was so much engaged in preparing other works and in organizing and supervising his societies, that he had little time to cultivate poetic writing. At different periods of his life he translated some of the finest hymns from the German, which in their rendering bear testimony to his superior skill. Charles Wesley was a poet from his youth, and through the course of a long life he wrote an immense number of hymns, together with other poetical articles. After their conversion, in 1738, and while associated as yet to some extent with the Moravians, the Wesleys published their first volume, "A Collection of Psalms and Hymns." They are chiefly from Dr. Watts, but a few of them were original, and were afterwards published by them in their joint names. The following year they published a volume for their societies, entitled "Hymns and Sacred Poems," showing the change which had occurred in their views of the mystic divines. It consists chiefly of their own compositions, with twenty-one translations from the German, two from the French, one from the Spanish, and one from the Latin. From this time forward the Wesleys published not only new editions of the hymn-book, but in tract form hymns on specific subjects or occasions, as hymns on the "Lord's Supper," "Hymns for Times of Trouble and Persecution," and for "Christmas," "Resurrection," "New Year's Day," and "Watchnights;" also, "Hymns for Public Thanksgiving Day," "Grace

Before and After Meat," "Hymns for those that seek and those that have Redemption in the Blood of Jesus Christ," "Hymns of Petition and Thanksgiving for the Promises of the Father." From these various hymns a book was compiled prior to Mr. Wesley's death, which contains the substance of the hymn-books now used by the Wesleyans in England and Canada, and by the various branches of the Methodist Church in America and elsewhere. The great body of these hymns were composed by Charles Wesley, only about 40 out of 600 being written by John Wesley. It is said that during his life Charles Wesley wrote over 6000 hymns, a few of which only are now used in the collections. The Wesleyan Hymn-Book, in England, is composed more exclusively of Mr. Wesley's poetry than the hymn-books used by the Methodists of the United States.

Idaho, Territory of (pop. 14,909), was organized in 1863. It embraces an area of 86,294 square miles, being equal in size to Pennsylvania and Ohio. The surface is uneven and mountainous, but its climate is said to be very healthy. Its capital is Boise City. It is supposed to be rich in the precious metals, and has also large tracts of land suitable for agriculture and grazing. Methodism was introduced from Colorado about 1868, but owing to the fluctuating character of the population the growth has been very slow. In 1872 the Rocky Mountain Conference was formed, which included part of Idaho. At present a part of the Territory is embraced in the Columbia River Conference.

Illinois (pop. 2,539,891) is one of the five States formed out of the Northwestern Territory. The first settlements were made by the French through the enterprise of La Salle. He descended the Illinois River in 1679 and erected a small fort. In 1682 he returned with a colony of Canadians and founded Kaskaskia, Cahokia, and other towns. A dispute concerning boundaries resulted in a war, and the surrender of Canada, in 1763, ended the French authority over all the country east of the Mississippi. In 1809 the Territory was organized by an act of Congress, and the State was admitted into the Union Dec. 3, 1818. The pioneer of Methodism in this Territory was Captain Joseph Ogle, who settled within its bounds in 1785. The first Methodist preacher was Joseph Lillard, who formed the first class in the State, in St. Clair County, and appointed Captain Ogle leader. The second Methodist preacher was John Clark, who had traveled in South Carolina from 1791 to 1796, but removed West to be free from the embarrassments of slavery. He is supposed to have been the first Methodist who preached the gospel west of the Mississippi, in 1798. Hosea Riggs was one of the first, if not the first, local preacher that settled in Illinois. He revived and organized the class at Captain Ogle's which had been formed by Mr. Lillard. The records of the church, however, show no services systematically established from 1798 until 1803, when Benjamin Young was appointed missionary to that State by the Western Conference, then held at Mount Gerizim, Ky. He reported, in 1804, for the State of Illinois, 67 members. From that time appointments were regularly made. In 1806, Jesse Walker was sent to the State,—a man of great energy of character,—who visited frontier settlements and extended the boundaries of the church. He held the first camp-meeting in the State, and as a result, a revival extended through most of the settlements. He reported at the end of the year 218 members. Illinois was then embraced in the Western Conference, which included Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, and the whole Northwest, and so remained until 1812, when the Western Conference was divided into the Ohio and Tennessee, the State of Illinois being included in the latter. In 1816 the Missouri Conference was formed, and Illinois was included within its bounds, which so continued until 1824, when the Illinois Conference was organized, including both Indiana and Illinois. In 1832 Indiana was separated from it, and Illinois Conference included the State of Illinois and the Northwestern Territory. In 1840 the Illinois Conference was divided, and the Rock River Conference was constituted, embracing the northern part of the State, with Wisconsin and Iowa. In 1852 the Southern Illinois Conference was formed, embracing the lower part of the State, and in 1856 the southern part of Rock River Conference was constituted into the Peoria Conference, the name of which was subsequently changed to Central Illinois. There are now in the State four Conferences, containing 827 traveling and 1150 local preachers, 117,403 members, 120,396 Sunday-school scholars, 1319 churches, valued at $4,813,735, and 478 parsonages, valued at $602,258.

There are also parts of the Chicago German, and Northwest German and the Southwest German Conferences which lie within the State, and a Swedish Conference has recently been organized, a large part of which is embraced within the same bounds. There are within the State five colleges under the control of the church, to wit: McKendree College, at Lebanon; Illinois University, at Bloomington; Illinois Female College, at Jacksonville; Hedding College, at Abingdon; and Northwestern University, at Evanston. The Garrett Biblical Institute is now a department of the Northwestern University. There are also several seminaries, as Jennings Seminary, at Aurora, Mount Morris Seminary, and Grand Prairie Seminary, at Onarga. A branch of the Western Book Concern is located at Chicago, where The Northwestern Advocate is published, and also a paper is published in the Scandinavian language. The Methodist Church South has a Conference, chiefly in the southern part of the State, which, including a few appointments in Indiana, numbered, in 1875, 5700 members. The Methodist Protestant Church have two Conferences, the South Illinois and the North Illinois, which also embraces Wisconsin. The two Conferences report about 5000 members, with property valued at $175,000. The African Methodist Church has also an Illinois Conference, which embraces appointments in Iowa and Minnesota, and which has a membership of 3675. The statistics of the various denominations, as reported in the United States Census of 1870, are as follows:

Illinois and Des Moines Conference, Methodist Protestant Church, was reported, in 1877, as having 6 itinerant and 6 nonstationed preachers, 510 members, and church property valued at $11,000. In addition to this Conference, however, the State of Illinois contains the South Illinois Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, and prior to the union, the North and South Conferences of the Methodist Church.

Illinois Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1824, and included the States of Indiana and Illinois. In 1832 its boundaries were changed so as to include the State of Illinois, two circuits in Indiana, and the Northwestern Territory. In 1836 it included the State, two circuits in Indiana, and the upper part of Wisconsin. In 1840 the Rock River Conference was organized, including the northern part of the State of Illinois and the adjacent territory. Since that time the Southern Illinois Conference, embracing the southern part of the State, and the Central Illinois, lying north of it, have been detached, and the boundaries as determined by the General Conference in 1876 are as follows: "Including that part of the State of Illinois not within the South Illinois Conference south of the following line, to wit: Beginning at Warsaw, on the Mississippi River; thence to Vermont; thence to the mouth of the Spoon River; thence up the Illinois River to the northwest corner of Mason County; thence to the junction of the Central and Alton and the Chicago Railroads; thence to the southwest corner of Iroquois County; thence east to the State of Indiana, leaving Bentley, Vermont, Mackinaw circuit, and Normal in the Central Illinois, and Warsaw and Bloomington in the Illinois Conference." The first session of the Conference was held in 1825. It reported 12,978 white and 64 colored members, and 45 traveling preachers. After the organization of the Rock River Conference, which detached the northern portion of the State, there were left, in 1840, 24,607 white and 80 colored members, with 114 traveling and 435 local preachers. Since the organization of the Southern and Central Illinois Conferences, the reports for 1876 give 239 traveling and 300 local preachers, 40,217 members, 38,959 Sunday-school scholars, 443 churches, valued at $1,530,625, and 136 parsonages, valued at $179,248. The Wesleyan University, located at Bloomington, Ill., is in the bounds of this Conference, and enjoys also the patronage of the Central Illinois Conference. There is also a flourishing female college at Jacksonville.

Illinois Conference, M. E. Church South, was authorized by the General Conference of 1866, but did not hold its first session until Oct. 16, 1867, at Nashville, Ill., Bishop Doggett presiding. It reported 41 traveling and 16 local preachers, 2500 white and 4 colored members, 27 Sunday-schools and 1080 Sunday-school scholars. The General Conference of 1874 fixed its boundaries so as to "embrace the State of Illinois, and all Indiana except New Albany and Jeffersonville." It reported, in 1875, 54 traveling and 81 local preachers, 5792 members, 92 Sunday-schools and 4310 Sunday-school scholars.

Illinois Female College is located at Jacksonville, and has been in successful operation since department was opened under Rev. Reuben Andrus. Its first president was Rev. W. Goodfellow. In 1857, Dr. O. S. Munsell, a graduate of Indiana Asbury University, became president, and much of the strength and prosperity of the university was owing to his indefatigable labors. His brother, C. W. C. Munsell, acted for many years as agent, and by their joint efforts and contributions the institution has had a regular and constant growth. Commencing in an humble building, it now has a beau-

1847. It has large and commodious buildings, with chapel and school-rooms suitably arranged and furnished for 250 students. The edifice is heated by steam, lighted by gas, and is supplied with water. The course of study is as extensive and thorough as that usually pursued in first-class schools for young women, and embraces all the branches for a solid mental education. Since its commencement it has graduated 303, many of whom are the first women in society and in usefulness in the communities where they live. It is under the superintendency of Rev. F. W. Short, A.M., who is president, and Professor of Mental, Moral, and Political Sciences, and who is assisted by Miss Mary S. Pegram, preceptress in Mathematics and Astronomy; Miss Emeline M. Allyn, higher English branches; Miss Julia P. Palmer, Latin and Modern Languages; James B. Smith, Natural Sciences; with teachers in the preparatory and ornamental departments.

Illinois Wesleyan University, at Bloomington, Ill., was commenced in 1850. Its preparatory tifful edifice, with a large and handsome chapel. Its present president, Dr. Adams, is a young man of great energy of character, and under whose supervision and efforts an embarrassing debt has been in great part removed, and the prospects of the university are of the most hopeful character. He is assisted by an able faculty in all the departments of the institution, which admits young ladies as well as young gentlemen to its halls. It is under the joint patronage of the Illinois and Central Illinois Conferences, and is doing an excellent educational work, especially in the central portions of the State. Many young ministers who are entering the Conferences have received to some extent a literary training in its halls.

Imposition of Hands is an ecclesiastical ceremony practiced by nearly all the Christian churches. It was in frequent use during the Old Testament history in imparting patriarchal blessings or in consecrating to a sacred office, whether kingly or priestly, and also in imparting healing power to the sick. In the New Testament it has more of a spiritual meaning. It was practiced by our Saviour both in healing and imparting blessings. Christ laid his hands upon the sick and blind, and they were healed. It was used by the Saviour more especially in the impartation of spiritual blessings, as when he took the little children in his arms and blessed them. It was practiced in the apostolic church in ordaining deacons and elders, and in setting apart missionaries. In after-times this ceremony was extended to other than ministerial offices. It was applied not only to candidates for baptism, but to catechumens also when becoming members of the church; hence the practice by the Church of England and the Protestant Episcopal Church not only in the ceremony of ordination but also in that of confirmation. It is practiced by Methodist, Presbyterian, and Congregational Churches only in ordination or consecration. It was formerly omitted in the Wesleyan Church because of their supposed peculiar relation to the Church of England, but it is now used by them in common with the other Methodist bodies. In the Methodist Episcopal Church a bishop is consecrated by the laying on of the hands of three bishops, or at least of one bishop and two elders. If, in consequence of death or otherwise, there should be no bishop in the church, the General Conference may elect a bishop, and the elders, or any three of them who may be appointed by the General Conference for that purpose, may consecrate him according to the ritual of the church. An elder is ordained by laying on of the hands of a bishop and some of the elders who are present. A deacon is ordained simply by the laying on of the hands of a bishop.

Independence, Mo. (pop. 3184), is the capital of Jackson County, situated on the Missouri River. Methodism was introduced into this region about 1830, when the first society was formed. In 1835 the first church was built, and the place then appears in the minutes of the church as connected with Lexington, with R. H. Jordan and W. P. Hulse as pastors. In 1836 Independence circuit was reported separately as having 186 members. At the separation of the church it adhered to the South. The Methodist Episcopal Church, however, organized a society, and has had a fair growth. The African M. E. Church has also a congregation and church edifice. The statistics are as follows:

1867	First M. E. Church.....	134	70	7,000

India Book Concern, M. E. Church.—In 1860 a printing-press was set up at Bareilly, under the care of Rev. J. W. Waugh, who was its superintendent for eleven years. He was succeeded, in 1872, by Rev. J. H. Mesmore. It has since been under the care of Rev. T. Craven. In 1866 the office was removed from Bareilly to Lucknow, and in 1874 was placed in its present location. Four printing-presses are kept in operation, and apartments for lithographing and binding have been added. Books are published in Urdu and Hindi, as well as in English. The International Sunday-School Sessions issued 2700 copies in English, 1150 in Urdu, and 750 in Hindi. A Sunday-school paper is also published in both the native languages. To show the rate of increase, the number of pages issued in 1866 was 1,148,600; in 1870, 3,490,000; in 1875, 3,769,000. During the last ten years probably at least 20,000,000 pages have been printed by the presses of this establishment.

India: Languages and Missionary Literature.—The native languages of India are very numerous, and are divided into two classes, the Aryan and the Dravidian. The Aryan languages are derived from the Sanscrit, which is supposed to have been the language of the Aryan conquerors of the country. It was a highly-developed language, and had a very complete grammatical structure. It is now widely studied, and the knowledge of it is regarded essential to thoroughness in philological scholarship. Its literature is extensive and valuable, and is supposed to embody the earliest religious thought and poetical conceptions of the people from whom the Europeans are descended. These works consist of several series of books of hymns, doctrine, ritual, and commentaries, called the Vedas, Brahmanas, Sutras, and Puranas, and two epic poems, called the Mahabharata and the Ramayana. The date of their composition is unknown, but is conjectured by Prof. Max Müller to have been between 1200 B.C. and 200 B.C.

Of the living languages derived from the Sanscrit, the most important are the Hindi, which constitutes the language of the Hindoo population of the northern part of India, and the Urdu, or Hindostani, which is the language of the Mohammedan population, and is spoken by the cultivated classes of the whole peninsula. It contains a large infusion of Arabic and Persian words. Others are the Bengali, Cashmiri, Punjaubi, Sindhi, Gugerati, Marathi, Oriya, etc. The Pali, a dead language of Aryan origin, is the language of the ancient Buddhist books. These languages use different graphic systems, which are, however, of common origin, and are derived from the Sanscrit, Arabic, and Persian systems.

The most prominent of the Dravidian languages is the Tamil, which is spoken in the Carnatic and the northern part of Ceylon. Next in importance are the Teloo-goo, Canarese, Gondi, Malayalam, and Tuluva. They are the languages of the southern part of the peninsula. The Singhalese, the language of Southern Ceylon, is a modification of the aboriginal tongue by the Sanscrit, with a trifle of Malay, and has many dialects.

The contributions of the missions to the literature of India have been numerous and valuable. Laboring with cultivated races, speaking many different languages, nearly every society has found the production and diffusion of an appropriate literature an indispensable necessity. The Danish missionaries began this work early in the eighteenth century, when they set up a printing-press at Tranquebar, translated the Scriptures, and prepared a grammar and a dictionary in the Tamil language. The English Baptist missionaries engaged in it in the first year of the present century, and in a few years had translated the Bible, or parts of it, into forty languages, besides establishing a periodical and publishing other works. Their example was followed by the missionaries of other societies, and a quantity of books and editions has been produced the mere titles of which would fill a large catalogue. The number of printing establishments in India in 1872 was 25, and in the ten years ending with that year they had issued 3410 new works in 30 different languages, and circulated 1,315,503 copies of Scriptures and parts of Scripture, 2,375,040 school books, and 8,750,129 Christian books and tracts. The literary labors of the Wesleyan missionaries have been principally in the Canarese, Sanscrit, Tamil, Cinghalese, and English languages. The Mysore mission press was established at Bangalore, in the Mysore district, in 1840. The average annual issues of the press during the first ten years were between one and two million pages; during the next ten years they rose to more than three million pages.

The entire Scriptures were printed in the Canarese language in 1861. Among the original works produced at the Mysore mission was a poem composed in 1837 by Arumuga Tambiran, who had just been converted to Christianity, contrasting Christianity and heathenism, which attracted much attention, and was published and circulated in large editions by the missionaries of the American Board and the Religious Tract Society of Madras. The Rev. Jonathan Crowther, who was superintendent of the missions in Madras from 1837 to 1843, published several works in English relating to the mission, which had a considerable general circulation. Among them were "Oriental Illustrations of the Sacred Scriptures," published in 1833, a "Treatise on Caste and its Bearing on Christianity and Missions," published in the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine, and a number of translations from the Tamil language, which were published by the Oriental Translation Society in London. The late Rev. Benjamin Clough was the author of an English and Canarese Dictionary. Of works relating to India, the Wesleyan Missionary Society has published "Madras, Mysore, and the South of India," by the late Rev. Dr. Hoole; "A Mission to the Mysore," by the Rev. William Arthur; "Tamil Wisdom" and "The Women of India," by the Rev. E. J. Robinson; and a sketch of "The Mission to Ceylon and India," by the late Rev. W. M. Harvard, D.D.

The press of the Methodist Episcopal mission was established at Bareilly in 1860, and removed to Lucknow in 1866. At the latter date its general catalogue embraced twenty-six different publications in the Hindu, Urdu, and Persian languages, and in the Roman, Persian, and Deranagari characters, both in typography and lithographed. It has been since kept busily at work, the issues in each year in which a report of it has been published by the society in New York exceeding 2,000,000, and more often exceeding 3,000,000 pages. The number of pages published in 1875 was 3,969,000; the total number of copies distributed during 1876 was 168,181, and the total number of pages published in the same year was 2,900,900. During the latter year seventeen books were published in Roman Urdu, lithograph Urdu, and Hindi, with nine tracts and four periodicals, besides the Berean Sunday-School Lessons in their different forms. Nineteen of the missionaries who have been associated in the work of the mission have prepared books relating to the work, either in English or in one of the native languages. Among the most important of these works may be named the translation of a commentary on the book of Revelation into Urdu, by the Rev. Isaac Fieldbrave; the Concordance of the Bible and the Gospel of St. John in Urdu, by the Rev. Robert Hoskins; the translations of Wesley on "Christian Perfection," of the abridgment of Watson's "Life of Wesley," and Butler's "Analogy," and the "Rules of Biblical Exegesis" into Urdu, by the Rev. H. Mansell; the Bible Dictionary, in English and Urdu, the Urdu Commentary on Matthew and Mark, and the revision and re-translation into Hindi of the Catholic Epistles and the Revelation of the Rev. T. J. Scott; the Commentary on Genesis in Roman Urdu of the Rev. D. W. Thomas; and the "Rhetoric" and the edition of Wayland's "Moral Science" in Urdu of the Rev. John Thomas. The Rev. Dr. William Butler's "Land of the Veda" is a well-known work on India and Indian missions. The Rev. J. Mudge is engaged in the preparation in English of a series of works on Methodism, the first of which, a "Handbook of Methodism," has been published since the beginning of the year 1877. The catalogue of books in the vernacular languages published at the mission press contains about one hundred titles of works, of which more than half are in lithographed Urdu, and the remainder in Hindi and Roman Urdu. The periodicals comprise a weekly paper, the Kaukab-i-Isni, or Christian Star, in Roman Urdu, a fortnightly paper, the Shams-ul-akbār, in lithographed Urdu, two monthly Sunday-school papers, one in Urdu and one in Hindi, and an English newspaper for general circulation, the Lucknow Witness.

India, Methodist Missions in.—India, a large country of Asia, at present for the most part subject to the rule of Great Britain. It is a peninsula, which extends, excluding Cashmere, from latitude 8° to 35° north, and has an extreme length of 1900 and a breadth of 1700 miles, and an area of upwards of 1,500,000 square miles. Its population is not less than 250,000,000, and includes several races and religions. The aboriginal inhabitants are supposed to be represented by the wild tribes known as the Hill tribes, Kals, Gonds, Shemars, Santhals, and others. The next race in the order of settlement were the Dravidians, whose descendants are found among the Telooongs, Tamils, and kindred peoples in the southern part of the peninsula. About the fifteenth century before Christ the country was conquered by the Aryans, a people from Central Asia, of the same stock from which the dominant peoples of Europe are descended. They introduced the religious system known as Brahminism, and were the ancestors of the Hindoos, who ruled the peninsula till the Mohammedan conquest. The Persians, under Darius, reached India about 527 B.C., and Alexander the Great about two centuries afterwards. The Mohammedans first invaded India A.D. 715, and about three hundred years afterwards established their rule under Afghan princes over the whole peninsula. The Moguls, who had also become Mohammedans, conquered the country in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and founded the Great Mogul empire, which was finally destroyed by the British. The native empire of the Mahrattas was established in the Deccan, and flourished during the period of the Mogul rule. The Dutch and Portuguese established trading-posts on the coast in the sixteenth century, and the British East India Company in the seventeenth century, while the French had a trading-post at Pondicherry. The French were driven out at the end of a war between them and the English, after which the English became involved in a series of wars with the Mahrattas and the Mogul chiefs, closing with the mutiny of 1857, the result of which has been to place them in the undisputed possession, with the exception of a few small districts and the extreme northern states, of the whole peninsula. Until 1857 British India was under the exclusive control of the East India Company; but after the suppression of the mutiny, the government was transferred to the Crown, which rules through a viceroy. In 1876 the Queen of England assumed the title of Empress of India, and was so proclaimed throughout the empire on the 18th day of January, 1877.

Hindooism is the religion professed by the mass of the population. It is a perverted and corrupted form of the ancient Brahminism, and as now professed is characterized by idolatry and superstitious rites. The system of caste interposes obstacles to the introduction of improvements or new ideas among this people, and has been found the chief bar to the progress of Christianity among them. The Buddhists number several millions, and, with the Hindoos, make up upwards of 167,000,000 as the heathen population of India. The Mohammedans are estimated to number from 26,000,000 to 40,000,000. They have been for several centuries the dominant race in India, and still retain, subject to the ultimate sovereignty of Great Britain, positions of nominal power and much actual influence in many of the states. A number of native Christians have been found in Malabar. The Roman Catholics claim upwards of 1,000,000 of adherents to their faith, and the Protestant missionary societies report about 250,000 converts. More than 60,000 British-born residents, with their families, should also be included among the Christian population. A small number of Parsees, or fire-worshippers, the remnant of the professors of the ancient religion of Zoroaster, are settled around Bombay. Christianity has existed in India from a very early period. Its introduction is ascribed by tradition to St. Thomas. It was preached on the southern coast in the latter part of the second century, and afterwards by missionaries of the Syrian and Nestorian Churches, and a Christian state is mentioned as having existed about the eleventh century. A small Syrian Church still survives. The Roman Catholic missions were founded by St. Francis Xavier, in the sixteenth century, under the protection of the Portuguese. The policy of the English East India Company was generally not to encourage missionary effort. Since India came under the direct control of the British government, the missions have been regarded as valuable assistants in promoting good order and advancing civilization and the assimilation of the Indian people with the ruling race. The first Protestant mission in India was established in 1706, at Tranquebar, by Messrs. Ziegenbalg and Plutschau, students from Halle, who went out under the auspices of the Danish Missionary Society. The second mission was founded by the Baptist Missionary Society, under the direction of which William Carey established himself at Mudnabutty in 1793. Next followed the London Missionary Society, in 1798, which founded missions at Calcutta and Madras, and the American Board in 1813. The mission of the Wesleyan

Missionary Society was next in order, and was established in 1817. A mission had been begun in Ceylon in 1813, from which Mr. Lynch, the senior missionary, was commissioned to proceed to Madras. He reached that place in January, 1817. A station was opened at Bombay by Mr. and Mrs. Homer in the fall of the same year. In 1819, 150 children were registered in Mr. Lynch's English and Malabar school at Madras, and 160 in Mr. Homer's Mahratta school at Bangalore. Stations were afterwards opened at Negapatam and Serinapatam, and in 1830 the mission returned 9 missionaries, 25 schools, 1000 scholars, and 314 members in society. In 1837, the Rev. Jonathan Crowther was appointed general superintendent of the India missions, and went out with five new missionaries, students of the Theological Institution then recently established by the Wesleyans in England. The same year was marked by several conversions, among them that of a young man of high standing and good education, of the sect of Siva, named Arumuga Tambiran. Goobee, in the Mysore country, was occupied as a station in 1839. In 1843, Mr. Crowther was succeeded as superintendent by the Rev. Joseph Roberts. In 1853 a petition was sent to the Wesleyan Conference by natives requesting the establishment of a first-class English school at Mysore. It was written in the Canarese language, with an English translation, and was signed by 3340 persons, Hindoos and Mohammedans, inhabitants of the city, representing the speakers of nine different languages. The signers promised if half of the expense of the school were paid by the Conference to be responsible for the other half. The school was established in 1854. In 1855 the government announced that it would pursue a more liberal policy with reference to the missions, would take measures to bring European knowledge more speedily within the reach of the people, and would co-operate with the efforts already made to that end. Except for the interruptions occasioned by the mutiny of 1857, the work of the missions has made steady progress since that time, and their usefulness and efficiency as civilizing agents have been proved.

The Wesleyan missions in India were arranged in 1876 into three districts: the Madras district, with 10 stations, 16 missionaries and assistants, and 403 full members; the Mysore district, with 7 stations, 13 missionaries and assistants, and 428 full members; and the Calcutta district, with 4 stations, 4 missionaries and assistants, and 233 full members. These districts reported altogether, in 1876, 67 chapels and other preaching-places, 33 missionaries and assistant missionaries, 34 catechists, etc., 36 local preachers, 1064 full and accredited members, 94 on trial, 35 Sunday-schools, with 80 teachers and 1144 scholars in the same, 110 day-schools, with 341 teachers and 7753 scholars in the same, making, after deducting for those who attended both classes of schools, a total of 8293 scholars and 2251 attendants on worship in the Mysore and Calcutta districts.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in 1852, made an appropriation of $7500 for the establishment of a mission in India, to be applied as soon as a suitable person could be found to undertake the work. The Rev. William Butler, now superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal missions in Mexico, was appointed, in 1856, to open the mission, and North Bengal, or the north-western part of the peninsula, was designated as the most suitable field to be occupied. Mr. Butler, with his wife, reached Benares in November, 1856. Mr. Butler visited the Mission Conference which was held at that place, and decided upon the districts of Oude and Rohilcund as the field, and the city of Bareilly as the central point of operations. Through all this region Mohammedanism is the prevailing religion. Mr. Butler was joined after a few months by the Rev. Ralph Pierce and the Rev. J. H. Humphrey and their wives, the Rev. Ralph Parsons, of the Church Missionary Society, and Joel, a native convert of the Presbyterian mission at Allahabad. Operations were broken up by the mutiny in 1857, and the missionaries were obliged to retire to Nynce Tal, at the foot of the Himalaya Mountains, for safety. This place of refuge has since become one of the favorite summer health-resorts of India, and an important missionary station. After the suppression of the mutiny new stations were occupied at Lucknow and Moradabad. In 1860 the mission reported 28 laborers, 11 Hindustani members, 32 probationers, and 30 children in the orphanages, 1 English member, and 60 English probationers. Hindustani congregations had been formed at Lucknow, Bareilly, Moradabad, and Nynce Tal, with about 125 attendants, and English congregations at Lucknow, Moradabad, and Nynce Tal, with 225 attendants. Orphanages for boys and girls had been established at Lucknow very soon after the work was begun at that place. The boys' orphanage was removed in 1860 to Bareilly, and in 1862 to Shahjehanpore, when the girls' orphanage was removed to Bareilly. The sphere of the work spread very rapidly, one or more new stations being occupied nearly every year, and supplied with American missionaries or efficient native preachers. In 1864, December 8, the mission was organized into an Annual Conference, as the "India Mission Conference," with 17 American missionaries as members; 1 minister was admitted to full connection, and 5 persons, including 4 natives, were admitted on trial. The reports made to the Conference of this year showed that there were then included within its jurisdiction 117 members of the church, 32 probationers, 9 local preachers, 9 Sunday-schools, with 39 officers and teachers, and 397 scholars, and 9 churches and 19 parsonages, the total value of which was $42,830. The work was divided into the Moradabad, Bareilly, and Lucknow presiding elders' districts. The total value of the missionary property at the different stations was given at 146,377 rupees, or about half as many dollars.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society began to co-operate with the work of the mission in 1870, when it sent out Miss Clara Swain as a medical missionary for the Zenanas, Miss Isabella Thoburn, and Miss Fannie J. Sparks. In 1871 the Rev. J. D. Thomas, one of the missionaries, offered a gift of $20,000 in gold for the endowment of a theological school, provided funds were secured with which to put up suitable buildings. Mr. E. Remington, of Ilion, N. Y., offered $5000 for the erection of the buildings, and the missionary committee made an appropriation of $10,000, including the $5000 contributed by Mr. Remington for that purpose. The school was opened at Bareilly on the 15th of April, 1872, with 16 students pursuing a course in theology and the Arabic and Persian languages. The first class of 11 students was graduated in 1874. A Christian village which had been established at Panahpore in 1863, was occupied in 1870 by 34 Christian families, containing 110 souls. In 1872 a new mission was opened at Bombay, under the preaching of the Rev. William Taylor, chiefly among the English-speaking people. A circuit was formed, and the work was marked by extensive revivals in the vicinity. This work was taken charge of by the Missionary Society, and appeared in the report for 1874 as the Bombay and Bengal mission, with 11 appointments and 13 missionaries. The General Conference of 1876 divided the India missions into two Annual Conferences,—the North India Conference including the work in the northwest, in Oude, Rohileund, Cawnpore, Kumaon, and Gurwhal, and the South India Conference including the work in the Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras districts. According to the reports made at the session held in January, 1877, the North India Conference embraced 3 presiding elders' districts and 24 stations and circuits, as follows: Kumaon District—Nynee Tal, one native and one English church, Paori, Eastern Kumaon, Palee; Rohileund District—Bareilly, Shahjehanpore, Boys' Orphanage, Panahpore, Moradabad, Bijnour, Budaon, Khera Bajhera, Sambhal, Amroha; Oudh District—Lucknow, a native and an English church, Seetapore, Purdui, Gondah and Baraich, Barabanki, Roy Barjilly, Cawnpore, an English and a native church. The following is a summary of the statistics of the Conference: Number of members, 1281; of probationers, 757; of local preachers, 51; of baptisms during the year, 375; of churches, 22; of parsonages, 35; probable value of church property, $107,544; amount of receipts for ministerial support, $3817.50; amount of collections for missions, $549.87; number of Sunday-schools, 133; of officers and teachers in the same, 317; of Sunday-school scholars, 6509; number of vernacular and Anglo-vernacular schools, 194; of teachers in the same, 324; of pupils on the rolls (5608 boys, 1803 girls), 7411. So far as is shown by the figures in the tables, the pupils in the vernacular and Anglo-vernacular schools were classed according to their religious affiliations as follows: Christians, 789; Hindoos, 4514; Mohammedans, 1883.

The South India Conference was organized on the 9th of November, 1876, when the work was divided into three presiding elders' districts, with twenty-one stations and circuits, as follows: Bombay District—Bombay, Poona, Tanna, Egutpoorh, Mhow, Nagpore, Kurrachee; Calcutta District—Calcutta, Seamen's church (Calcutta), Darjeeling, Raj Mahal, Allahabad, Jubbulpore, Agra, Meerut, Roorkee; Madras District—Madras, Bangalore, Bellary, Hyderabad, and Secunderabad. The following is a summary of the statistics as they were reported to the Conference: Number of members, 1179; of probationers, 417; of local preachers, 40; of Sunday-schools, 36; of officers and teachers in the same, 224; of Sunday-school scholars, 1687.

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church sustains seven missionaries in India, of whom two are medical missionaries, and employs a considerable number of teachers and Bible-women. It owns a home, a hospital, and an orphanage at Bareilly, a school building and a home at Moradabad, a school building, a home, and a boarding-hall at Lucknow, an orphanage at Paori, and a school building at Gonda. Including the Methodist societies, 29 American, English, and Continental societies have established missions in India, besides which there are several private missions not connected with any large societies. These missions all returned, according to the latest accessible reports, 607 foreign missionaries, 311 native assistants, 266,391 native Christians, and 68,689 communicants.

Indian Mission Conference, M. E. Church South.—The work which was begun among the Wyandot Indians in 1819 gradually spread to other tribes. In 1830, Thomas and William Johnson were sent as missionaries by the Missouri Conference among the Indians in that vicinity. In 1832, Joseph Edmundson was made superintendent of the Indian missions, which were established in Missouri, in Kansas, and in the Indian Territory. In 1844 the General Conference authorized an Indian Mission Conference, bounded as follows: "On the north by Missouri River, east by the States of Missouri and Arkansas, south by Red River, and west by the Rocky Mountains." The first session of the Conference was held at Tablequah, the Cherokee Council ground, fifteen miles east of Fort Gibson. It opened on the 23d day of October, Bishop Morris presiding. W. H. Goode and H. C. Benson served as secretaries. There were twenty-one preachers present, including candidates for admission. Of this number, three were Cherokees, three were Choctaws, and one was a Creek. The session of each day closed with prayer by some one of the Indian preachers.

The number of members reported at that session was 3144. Of these, 70 were whites and 129 were colored. Four preachers were ordained deacons, two of whom were Choctaw Indians. The work was divided into three presiding elders' districts. Twenty-three preachers were appointed to eighteen fields of labor. J. C. Berryman was appointed superintendent of the Conference. This organization was received with great favor by the various Indian tribes. The Conference adhered in the separation the following year to the Church South. The Conference reports, in 1875, 21 traveling and 85 local preachers, 313 white, 281 colored, and 4150 Indian members, with 943 Sunday-school scholars. The boundaries of the Conference at present are: on the north by the State of Kansas, east by Missouri and Arkansas, south by Red River, and west by the Rocky Mountains. In 1848 the Board of Missions of that church, with the help of the United States government, made provisions for enlarging the means of education through the missions. In 1853 the Conference returned 3 districts, 15 circuits, 18 white and 17 native preachers, 3779 members, and 8 schools, besides the Kansas district, with 263 members, which was then attached to the Missouri Conference. In 1860 it reported 2 districts, 25 circuits, and 29 missionaries. According to the report of the Board of Missions for 1876, the Conference now covering the Indian Territory comprehends the Cherokee, Creek, Chickasaw, and Choctaw tribes, with fractions of other tribes, and contains five presiding elders' districts,—the Cherokee, Choctaw, Creek, Chickasaw, and Kiamacsee districts,—31 missions, 25 churches, 35 preachers, 313 white, 4159 Indian, and 281 colored members, 85 local preachers, and 33 Sunday-schools, with 120 officers and teachers and 943 scholars. Its church property was valued at $7400. Two high schools were reported in a flourishing condition, the Asbury Manual Labor School, at North Fork, Creek nation, and the school at New Hope, Choctaw nation.

Indian Territory. The, was set apart by the government of the United States as a permanent home for such Indian tribes as could be persuaded to settle within its bounds. It lies west of Arkansas, between Kansas and Texas, bounded on the west by Texas and New Mexico. It contains an area of 68,991 square miles, and a large portion of it is fertile and beautiful. The Creeks, Choctaws, Chickasaws, and Cherokees were removed from their various localities east of the Mississippi at different periods from 1833 to 1840. The Methodist Church having established missions among them prior to their removal, followed them to their new home and reorganized their churches. They were received with a cordial welcome, and churches and schools were established in several tribes. In 1842 the Choctaws provided for the establishment of a number of academies which were to be manual labor schools. The Fort Coffee Academy was the first one opened. It was established fifteen miles west of Fort Smith, on the Arkansas River. In the spring of 1843, Revs. W. H. Goode and H. C. Benson, of the Indiana Conference, were appointed to that field of labor,—Mr. Goode to be superintendent and Mr. Benson principal teacher. The female branch of the academy was five miles distant, and Dr. E. G. Meek was its first principal. These institutions proved a great blessing to the youth of both sexes, and in the mean time missionaries traveled extensively through the Territory. A Conference was formed in 1844, which has been continued by the M. E. Church South, and there are now contained in the Territory under its control over 4000 members. The Baptists and Presbyterians have also large missions.

Indian Tribes of North America, Methodist Missions to.—Three Indians were returned as members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1789. In the same year Dr. Coke, writing of the condition and prospects of the church, said, "And through the blessing of God we are now determined to use our efforts to introduce the gospel among the Indians." Missionary work among these people was actually begun twenty-six years later, in 1815, and this beginning marks the origin of the whole missionary enterprise of the Methodist Episcopal Church. John Stewart, a free colored man of Virginia, was converted at Marietta, O., in 1815, and became impressed with the duty of going among the Indians and preaching to them. He made his way across the State to a village of the Delawares, on the Sandusky River, and, after singing and preaching there a few times, proceeded to the Wyandots, at Upper Sandusky. He found there a negro, Jonathan Pointer, who had been captured by the Indians in childhood, who consented to serve as his interpreter. He preached first at a feast, the next day to an audience consisting of one woman, the next day to two persons, and the next day, Sunday, with visible effect to several persons. The influence of his efforts spread fast, and soon involved the whole settlement. The Ohio Conference adopted the mission in 1819, and appointed James Montgomery as a colleague to Stewart, placing the work under the charge of James B. Finley as presiding elder. A few months afterwards five of the chiefs, Big Tree, Between-the-Logs, Mononcue, Hicks, and Peacock, joined the church, of whom Big Tree and Mononcue became preachers. A mission school was established on the Wyandot reserve, which received from the government a grant of land. In 1820 reports of the work of the mission were carried to the Wyandots, near Fort Malden, Canada, and were followed by two native evangelists, of the fruit of whose labors it was reported nine years afterwards that there were 9 missionary stations in Upper Canada, 2000 adult Indians in the churches, and 400 pupils in 11 schools. Another branch of the mission was established in 1830 among the Wyandots and Shawnees, of the Huron River, in Michigan. The tribe eventually removed to the Southwest, and fell under the care of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Missions were begun among the Creeks and Cherokees in 1822, and among the Choctaws in 1825,—all of these important tribes then living east of the Mississippi River. The number of converts among the Cherokees had reached 800 in 1828, and in 1830 all the principal men of the Choctaw nation were attached to the church. The progress of the Southern missions was interrupted about this time by the removal of the tribes to the west of the Mississippi. (See INDIAN TERRITORY.) A mission was established among the Pottawatomies, on Fox River, in 1823; one among the Oneidas in 1829, which soon extended to the Onondagas, Menominees, and Kewawenons; missions were founded among the Shawnees and Kansas, west of the Mississippi, and the Iroquois and Kickapoos in Illinois, in 1830; among the Peorias, in 1833; and among the Sioux, Winnebagoes, and the Western Chippewas, in 1834.

To the Methodist Episcopal Church were left, after the separation of the Southern Church, in 1845, only the missions in the Rock River, Michigan, and Oneida Conferences, embracing 8 missions, 11 missionaries, 29 white and 640 Indian members. In 1850 the numbers had increased to 13 missions, 23 missionaries, and 1470 members, with 6 local preachers, and 8 schools, with 15 teachers and 556 scholars.

The missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church were among the earliest advocates of the policy of settling the Indians upon reservations as a means of introducing civilization among them, and the reports from 1856 to 1860 often mention the progress of this policy and its good effects upon the Indians and on the interests of the missions.

In 1860 missions were in operation in the Minnesota, Oneida, Black River, Genesee, Michigan, Detroit, Wisconsin, and Kansas and Nebraska Conferences, in connection with which were reported 16 missionaries, 1041 members, 7 churches, valued at $7800, and 7 parsonages, valued at $3125.

The missions to the Indians of Oregon originated in a visit which four members of the Flathead tribe made to the States in 1832, inquiring for the Christian's Book and the white man's God. Jason and Daniel Lee were appointed to begin the work in this then far distant region, and started for their field in March, 1839, to be followed shortly afterwards by two laymen. Not finding the prospects favorable among the Flatheads, they selected a more eligible site for the mission on the Willamette River. Eight assistants, including a blacksmith and teachers, were sent out in 1836, and three more missionaries in 1837. A mission was begun at the Dalles in 1838. In the same year, Jason Lee came to the States asking for more help, and thirty-four additional laborers were sent out. In 1844, the Rev. George Gary was appointed superintendent of the mission in place of the Rev. Jason Lee. A secular business, which was indispensable at first on account of the primitive condition of the country, had been established in connection with the mission, and had become so large as to interfere with its usefulness. It being deemed no longer necessary, the secular interests were disposed of by the new superintendent. Among the concerns affected by this proceeding was a manual labor school, which afterwards became the Oregon Institute.

The immigration of whites having become very large, it was decided, in 1847, to confine operations hereafter to the white settlements, until labors among the Indians could be established under more favorable auspices. The Oregon and California Conference, in 1851, resolved that the work among the Indians ought to be resumed. The Rev. J. H. Wilbur subsequently took the charge of the Yakima mission, in Washington Territory, which reported, in 1865, 53 members, 3 probationers, and 19 Sunday-school scholars.

Under the "peace policy" adopted by President Grant, the Methodist Episcopal Missionary Society was given the nomination of agents in twenty-one reservations in the States of Michigan, California, and Oregon, and the Territories of Montana, Idaho, and Washington, containing a population of 43,916 Indians. One of these agencies, the Yakima Agency, in Washington Territory, is connected directly with the missions.

The statistics of the missions for 1876, as given in the annual report, are incomplete. The following is a summary of the fuller statistics for 1875:

(For Indian missions in the Southwest, see INDIAN MISSION CONFERENCE, M. E. CHURCH SOUTH.)

The Indian missions in Canada were intrusted, in 1828, to the care of the Canada Conference, and were placed by the Conference, in 1833, under the care of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. The Rev. John Stinson, who was appointed by this society to superintend them, reported, in 1834, after having visited every station, that 1200 Indians, mostly Chippewas, were members of the church, and 2000 children were under instruction in the schools. Six new missionaries were sent out by the Wesleyan Society in 1834, and arrangements made for extending the work. Increased interest in the missions was excited in England, in 1837 and 1838, by the visits of John Sunday and Peter Jones, native chiefs and missionaries. Missions were opened in the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company in 1839, upon the invitation of the company. In 1854 the society reported, in Upper Canada and the Hudson's Bay Territory, 23 missionaries and assistants, 2003 members, and 6320 attendants on public worship. These missions are now under the charge of the Methodist Church of Canada. This church sustained, in 1876, in British Columbia, Saskatchewan, the Hudson's Bay Territory, and the Province of Ontario and Quebec, forty-two missions to Indians, in which 33 missionaries and 6 assistants were employed, and 3334 members were reported. The twenty-five missions to the settlers and half-breeds in the British Columbia, Red River, and Algona districts employed 23 missionaries, and reported 931 members.

Missions have also been established among the Indian tribes by most of the larger Protestant churches of Great Britain and the United States. The earliest were those of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, connected with the Church of England, and of the Moravians, which were begun in the last century.

Indiana (pop. 1,680,637) was originally a part of the French territory which was ceded to the English in 1763, and was recognized as the formation of the United States government as a part of the Northwestern Territory, belonging to Virginia. It was organized as a Territory in 1800, then embracing the whole of the Northwestern Territory west of the State of Ohio. In 1805, Michigan was separated from it, and in 1809, Illinois. It was organized as a State and admitted into the Union in 1816. Methodism was introduced into the southeast part by preachers from Ohio, and by preachers who entered its southern part from the State of Kentucky. Transient visits had been paid as early as 1801. The first pastoral charge organized was Silver Creek circuit, opposite the falls of the Ohio. It is first noticed in the minutes of 1807. Prior to that time preaching-places had been established and classes formed at several points in Clark County, but they were included in the Salt River circuit, of Kentucky. The first Methodist meeting-house was built in 1807. William McKendree, afterwards bishop, preached in Clark County in 1803, and the first camp-meeting in Indiana was in the fall of 1806 or 1807. The small membership which existed in the eastern part of the State, of about 17, was included in the Ohio Conference; the other parts of the State were in the Missouri Conference. Subsequently Indiana was included in the Illinois Conference, but in 1832 the Indiana Conference was organized, and held its first session at New Albany. The church grew with great rapidity, until, in 1843, it embraced 216 ministers and 67,219 members, of whom nearly 14,000 had been admitted in two years. In 1844 the State was divided into two Conferences by the National Road. From 1844 to 1848 there was a decrease of nearly 10,000 members, probably the result, in part, of the reaction of the great excitement occasioned by the Millerites and other adventists, and partly owing to the controversy which arose upon the border in consequence of the separation of the Southern Methodist Church, as many of its families were connected with Kentucky and Tennessee. In 1852 the two Conferences were divided into four; the total number of members in the State then being about 72,000. The reports for 1876 show 580 traveling and 766 local preachers, 105,357 members, 113,405 Sunday-school scholars, 1334 churches, valued at $3,281,775, and 310 parsonages, valued at $452,506. There are also a number of German congregations, which belong to the Central German Conference; and also several congregations of colored members, which report to the Lexington Conference. The Methodist Episcopal Church South has organized several societies in Indiana, near the Ohio River, but the membership is small. The Methodist Protestants have also a number of societies and congregations in different parts of the State, and the African Methodist Episcopal Church has organized a Conference. The African M. E. Zion Church has also a number of societies. The State had early established a university at Bloomington, but after a time it passed practically into the hands of the Presbyterian Church, and was numbered in the public catalogues as a Presbyterian college. The Methodists, becoming dissatisfied because the institution was used to promote sectarian purposes, took measures for establishing an institution of their own, and, accordingly, Greencastle was selected as a site; a charter was secured, and a preparatory school was opened in 1837. The institution has continued to prosper, and is known as the Indiana Asbury University. Beside this university, there is a college established at Fort Wayne, and a female college at New Alpatronized throughout that State. It was founded by the Methodists of Indiana especially because they were deprived in the early history of the State of any influence in the State University, which was virtually managed as a sectarian institution. Application was made for a charter, which, though strenuously opposed by the enemies of the church, was nevertheless granted. A preparatory school which had been opened in the fall of 1836 by Rev. Cyrus Nutt, a graduate of Alleghany College, and subsequently president of the State University, was adopted by the board of trustees, and it became, June 5, 1837, the preparbany, each of which possesses commodious buildings. Other academic schools were originated, and for a time accomplished an excellent work in the education of the people, and some of them, as the Battle Ground Institute, still exist. The necessity for them is not now so urgent, as high schools and academies have been provided by the munificence of the State. The following table shows the denominational statistics in the United States census for 1870:

Indiana Asbury University is located at Greencastle, Ind., and is an institution largely atory department of the university. The cornerstone of the first university building was laid June 20, 1837, by Rev. H. B. Baseom, D.D. The preparatory school was conducted first in the old Methodist church, and subsequently in the town seminary, while the edifice was in process of erection. Rev. M. Simpson, subsequently bishop, was elected its first president, and entered upon his duties in April, 1839. The college building was completed and opened for services in 1840, the governor of the State delivering the charge and presenting the keys. The president having been elected editor of The Western Christian Advocate, in 1848, Rev. E. R. Ames, subsequently bishop, was elected his successor, who, after full consideration, declined to accept. In 1849, Rev. L. W. Berry, D.D., was elected president, and filled the office until 1854, when he was succeeded by Rev. Daniel Curry, D.D. He resigned in 1857, and was succeeded by Rev. Thomas Bowman, D.D., who was inaugurated June 28, 1859. Having held the presidency for nearly fourteen years, he was elected to the office of bishop, and was succeeded by Rev. Reuben Andrus, D.D. In 1875, President Andrus resigned, and was succeeded by Rev. Alexander Martin, D.D., who had been president of West Virginia State University. The institution has been favored from its early history with very able professors, among whom may be mentioned Rev. W. C. Larrabee, LL.D., Cyrus Nutt, D.D., B. F. Tefft, D.D., J. Wheeler, D.D., J. W. Locke, D.D., Henry C. Benson, D.D., and also Professors Downey, Latimore, Fletcher, and Bragdon, together with those who at present so ably fill the chairs. In 1846 a law department was organized, at the head of which was placed Hon. R. W. Thompson, LL.D., now Secretary of the Navy. In 1848 a medical college was established in Indianapolis as a branch of the university. In 1853 an addition to the library of 4500 volumes was received by the bequest of Hon. James Whitcomb, who had been governor of the State. The endowment of the institution, which exceeds $100,000, was chiefly raised in subscriptions of moderate sums, and by the sale of scholarships throughout the State. In 1869, Robert Stockwell, Esq., of Lafayette, gave $25,000 to found a chair of the Greek Language and Literature. On Oct. 20, 1872, the corner-stone of the new university building was laid, a large concourse having assembled from different parts of the State to witness the ceremony. This edifice has since been finished, and is a beautiful building, as seen in the accompanying plate. It contains a number of halls, which have been finished and furnished through the beneficence of liberal individuals. The present faculty are Alexander Martin, D.D., president, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science; Joseph Tingley, vice-president, and Professor of Natural Science; Philander Wiley, D.D., Greek Language and Literature; Lewis L. Rogers, Ph.D., Latin Language and Literature; John Clark Ridpath, A.M., Belles-Lettres and History; John Earp, A.M., Modern Languages and Hebrew; Paterson McNutt, Mathematics; together with assistants and instructors in the preparatory and other departments of the institution. For a few years past young ladies as well as young gentlemen have been admitted to its halls, and the number of students in attendance in 1876 was 509.

Indiana Conference, African M. E. Church, embraces not only Indiana but also a portion of Michigan. It reported, in 1876, 36 local preachers, 3012 members, 2673 Sunday-school scholars, 58 churches, and 11 parsonages, valued at $161,595.

Indiana Conference, M. E. Church, was organized in 1832, having previously been included in the Illinois Conference. At that time it embraced the entire State, with a small part of Michigan and with Elizabethtown, in the State of Ohio. Its first session was held in New Albany, Oct. 17, 1842, and it reported 65 traveling preachers, with 20,035 members. The growth was so rapid that in 1843 there were 216 traveling preachers, 488 local preachers, and 67,219 members. In 1844 the northern part of the State—the National Road being the line—was separated from the Indiana Conference. There remained 110 traveling preachers, 285 local preachers, and 35,686 members. Before 1852 these had increased to 159 traveling and 302 local preachers, and 39,271 members. The Conference was divided in that year into the Indiana Conference and the Southeastern Indiana. At present the Indiana Conference embraces the southwestern part of the State, and is bounded on the north by the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad,—the city of Terre Haute being in the North Indiana Conference, and the southwest part of Indianapolis being in the Indiana Conference. The eastern boundary is a line extending from the Ohio River to Indianapolis, opposite Louisville, Jeffersonville being in the Southeastern Indiana, and New Albany in the Indiana Conference. The General Conference of 1876 authorized the reunion of the Indiana and Southeastern Indiana Conference, if the Conferences desired it; but the measure was not adopted by the Conferences. The Indiana Conference is one of the patronizing bodies of the Indiana Asbury University, which is located just north of its line; and it has also in its bounds the De Pauw Female College, in New Albany. The statistics in 1876 were as follows: 142 traveling and 197 local preachers, 33,261 members, 24,414 Sunday-school scholars, 363 churches, valued at $699,550, and 79 parsonages, valued at $86,950.

Indiana Conference, Methodist Protestant Church.—This Conference, embracing the State of Indiana, was reported at the Convention of 1877 as having in both the Methodist and Methodist Protestant Churches, which were then united, 77 itinerant and 66 unstationed preachers, 7693 members, 88 churches, and 9 parsonages, valued at $95,700.

Indianapolis, Ind. (pop. 48,244), is the capital of the State, situated on White River, near the geographical centre. It is one of the greatest railroad centres in the Union. Methodism was introduced about 1820. The name first appears in the minutes of the church for 1821, with William Craven as pastor, and in 1823, 143 members were reported. The first Methodist church was a hewed log house, purchased in 1824 and subsequently enlarged so that it could hold about 200 persons. Services were held in this house until, in 1829, a brick edifice was erected. This gave way to a fine brick church, but the congregation subsequently removed to Meridian Street church, a large and commodious stone edifice. In 1842 a second charge was formed, under Rev. J. S. Bayless. It met for a time in the court-house, and was organized as the Roberts charge. The corner-stone of the new church was laid in 1843, and services were held in its chapel early in 1845. The edifice cost about $7000. This church purchased a larger plot of ground and built a new church, which was finished in 1876, costing about $140,000. Besides the two churches mentioned, there have since been organized Fletcher Place, Trinity, Grace, Third Street, Ames, Massachusetts Avenue, California Street, and Blackford Street charges. Although the city has grown with great rapidity, Methodism has kept pace with it. There are also a German Methodist church and two African M. E. churches. The city is divided between the Indiana and South Indiana Conferences, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Infant Baptism.—In common with the great majority of Christian churches, the Methodist churches teach that infants are subjects of baptism, as well as adult believers. This they believe to have been the doctrine and practice of the Christian church from the apostolic age. They consider it a glorious privilege that parents may bring their children to Christ in this ordinance, as the mothers brought their children to him personally, when he took them up in his arms and blessed them, saying, "Of such is the kingdom of God." They consider it also an obligation resting upon the parents to publicly commit by this outward act their children to the watch-care of the church, and to make public profession that they believe that as the application of water purifies from external uncleanness, so the Holy Spirit alone can purify and regenerate the heart. The authority for infant baptism rests upon the following grounds: 1. That children were included in the Abrahamic covenant, and were by an outward sign sealed as God's children. Christianity is an enlargement of that covenant, and extends its privileges not only to Jews, but to the whole world, embracing the children of Christendom as well as adults. 2. Infants are included in Christ's act of redemption, and are entitled to the privileges and blessings following therefrom; and as he has said, "Of such is the kingdom of God," so they should be identified with his church on earth. 3. As infants have not in their early age contracted actual guilt, but are in a state of justification through the merits of Christ, so that if they die in infancy they will be received into heaven, they are proper subjects to be associated with the church on earth. 4. The practice of the early Christian church shows clearly the baptism of households, which in all probability contained infant children. The history of the early church also shows that infant baptism was practiced from a very early period, and has been retained in the church continuously to the present time. Origen, Tertullian, Irenæus, Justin Martyr, and others, allude to the prevalence of this practice in their days.

The persons presenting children for baptism are not required by the Discipline of the Methodist churches to be absolutely members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, or of any other particular denomination; but they are required to assume solemn vows to train the children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; which vows require the party presenting the child to be believers in Christ, to accept the Holy Scriptures, and to teach the children the observance of the ordinances of God's house. In other words, they must be Christians in faith, though they may not have become experimentally the children of God. The form or ritual for infant baptism was an abridgment by Mr. Wesley from the ritual of the Church of England. He omitted from it the addresses to godfathers and godmothers, and some of the phrases which seemed to refer to the regeneration of the child by or through water baptism. The American Conference, however, in 1786, omitted one phrase which he had retained: "Sanctify this water to the mystical washing away of sin;" and in 1792 the expression was substituted, "Sanctify this water for this holy sacrament." The Methodist churches utterly reject the doctrine of baptismal regeneration. While they adhere strictly to the propriety of the ordinance, they believe it to be symbolical of the influence of the Spirit on the heart; that it is a profession of faith on the part of the parents or guardians; that it is placing the child under the watch-care of the church, and in such associations as may be of great service to it in subsequent life; and that it is its duty, when coming to mature years, to assume for itself the vows which adult believers assume who have not been baptized in infancy. The ordinance may be administered in private houses in cases of sickness, or for greater convenience, but, as a general rule, the ordinances of the church should be administered in the church. (See BAPTISM.)

Inskip, John S., was born Aug. 10, 1816, in Huntington, England, and came to the United States with his parents when five years of age. He was converted in 1832, under the ministry of Rev. L. Scott, now one of the bishops of the M. E.

Church, and was licensed to preach and commenced traveling under the direction of the presiding elder in 1835. In 1836 he was received on trial into the Philadelphia Conference, and in 1845 was transferred to the Cincinnati Conference. From thence was transferred to the New York East Conference; then to the New York Conference; afterwards to the Baltimore Conference, from which he was transferred to the New York East Conference. He has been an itinerant minister for forty-two years, and has been engaged in holding national camp-meetings for the last ten years. Is now (1877) editor of the Christian Standard, agent of the National Publishing Association, and evangelist at large.

Iowa (pop. 1,194,020) derives its name from one of its rivers. The first settlement was made by a Canadian Frenchman, Julien Dubuque, in 1788, who obtained a grant of land including the present site of the city of Dubuque. He built there a small fort, and engaged in mining lead and trading with the Indians. The Territory originally belonged to the Louisiana purchase, and was successively under the control of Missouri, Michigan, and Wisconsin. In 1838 it was erected into a separate Territory, and in 1845 was admitted as a State into the Union. Its soil is exceedingly productive, and its population rapidly increasing. Methodism was introduced into this Territory among its earliest settlers. Galena mission, which included the region around Dubuque, was established in 1829, and from that time services were regularly maintained. About the same time, or possibly a little earlier, Methodist services were introduced into the southeastern part of the State, in the vicinity of Fort Madison. Iowa is first mentioned in the records of the church in 1835, when L. Bevins was appointed missionary, and at the following Conference 120 members were reported. In 1849 an Iowa district was formed, of which H. Sowers was presiding elder; and the appointments in Iowa were connected with the Illinois Conference. At the organization of the Rock River Conference Iowa was placed within its boundaries. In 1844 an Iowa Conference was organized, which held its first session Aug. 14 in that year, and it reported 5403 members, and 36 preachers were appointed within its Territory. Since that period four Conferences are embraced within the State, to wit: Iowa, Upper Iowa, Des Moines, and Northwest Iowa, with a membership of about 65,000. There have also been established in the State Methodist colleges at several points. The Iowa Wesleyan University is located at Mount Pleasant, Cornell College at Mount Vernon, Upper Iowa University at Fayette, and Simpson College at Indianola. Besides these there are several seminaries, as at Epworth and Algona. The Methodist Protestant Church reports 3607 members, with 57 traveling preachers. The African M. E. Church also has a few societies. The following statistics are taken from the United States census of 1870:

Iowa City, Iowa (pop. 5914), the capital of Johnson County, is situated on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad. It is the seat of the Iowa State University. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1839, when Joseph L. Kirkpatrick was appointed to Iowa mission. The growth of the church was quite rapid, as in 1843 300 members were reported in the charge, which then embraced a number of appointments. It is in the Iowa Conference, and reports 296 members, 301 Sunday-school scholars, and $25,000 church property.

Iowa Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference in 1844, and included all the territory subsequently organized as a State. In 1856 the State was divided into two Conferences, the Iowa and the Upper Iowa. Since the organization of these two Conferences two others have been added within the bounds of the State, the Des Moines and Northwest Iowa Conferences. The present boundaries, fixed by the General Conference of 1876, are as follows: "On the east by the Mississippi River, on the south by the Missouri State line, on the west and north by a line commencing at the southwest corner of Appanoose County: thence north to Marshall County, leaving Knoxville in the Iowa Conference, and Monroe in the Des Moines Conference; thence on the south line of Marshall County due east to Iowa River; thence down said river to Iowa City; thence on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad to Davenport, leaving Davenport and Iowa City in the Upper Iowa Conference, and all intermediate towns in the Iowa Conference." The Iowa Conference held its first session Aug. 14, 1844, and reported 5391 white and 12 colored members, 38 traveling and 60 local preachers. After the formation of the Upper Iowa Conference, in 1856, there remained within the bounds of the Iowa Conference 18,715 members, 120 traveling and 206 local preachers. The last report (1876) shows 132 traveling and 180 local preachers, 20,893 members, 21,204 Sunday-school scholars, 254 churches, valued at $611,400, and 73 parsonages, valued at $74,760. There is within its bounds the Iowa Wesleyan University, at Mount Pleasant, and a German college connected with it.

Iowa Conference, Methodist Protestant Church, is reported, in 1877, as having 57 itinerant and 67 unstationed ministers, 3887 members, 34 churches, and 18 parsonages, valued at $69,500.

Iowa Wesleyan University is located in Mount Pleasant, Iowa, 28 miles west of Burlington. It was its commencement ladies have been admitted to equal privileges with gentlemen, and this institution claims the honorable distinction of being the first under the patronage of the M. E. Church to open the way for the higher education of women. It has had for its successive presidents Hon. James Harlan, LL.D., Rev. L. W. Berry, D.D., Rev. Charles Elliott, D.D., LL.D., Rev. George B. Jocelyn, D.D., Rev. Charles A. Holmes, D.D., Rev. John Wheeler, D.D., and its present president, Rev. W. J. Spaulchartered by the Territorial legislature, under the name of Mount Pleasant Collegiate Institute, in 1849, and had a beautiful plot of 28 acres of ground, and a two-story brick building 30 by 60 feet. It was tendered to the Iowa Annual Conference, which, in 1850, received and adopted it as the Conference university, and pledged to it their support and maintenance as such. The legislature in 1854 amended its charter, changing its name to Iowa Wesleyan University, and bestowing upon it full corporate powers. The charter was accepted by the unanimous vote of the Iowa Conference in 1855, from which period the legal existence of the university dates. In 1854 a new building, 100 feet long by 55 feet wide, and three stories high above the basement, was erected, at a cost of $22,000. From ding, Ph.D. It has also been fortunate in securing an able faculty, who have aimed at maintaining a high standard of scholastic culture. Its graduates number more than 300; many of them are filling important positions in church and state. The number of students in attendance in 1876 was 213, of whom 98 were in regular college classes. The total assets of the university amount to over $100,000. It is well supplied with apparatus for illustrating the natural sciences, and a laboratory is furnished for practical chemistry and pharmacy. The museum has an ample range of minerals and curiosities. Connected with it is a German college, founded through the indefatigable exertions of Dr. John Wheeler. It was incorporated on the 21st of May, 1873, and is designed to be the theological institution for German Methodists in the West, Northwest, and Southwest. The university and the college are independent in finance and control, but intimately connected in instruction. This department possesses a fine large three-story brick building, erected at a cost of about $10,000, on a five-acre plot of ground adjoining the university, and has an interest-bearing endowment of about $25,000. It has been under the charge of Professor G. F. W. Willey, as vice-president.

Irish Methodism.—Methodism was introduced into Ireland by Mr. Thomas Williams, in 1747. In the spirit of enterprise that so notably marked the early preachers, he crossed the Irish Channel and began to preach in Dublin. His only preaching-place was the streets. Yet God owned his labors; a class was formed, a preaching-room secured, and Mr. Wesley was informed of the successful advance. But little is known of the after-life of the evangelist who had the honor of the van. He became a clergyman of the Church of England, and passed away from the records.

On Sunday, Aug. 9, 1747, Mr. Wesley reached Dublin. From that time until his death he visited Ireland every second year, and generally made a tour through the whole country. On his first visit Mr. Wesley found 280 members, whose spiritual experience he examined and highly approved. Mr. Charles Wesley visited Ireland shortly after his brother's return to England, and lost no time in idleness. Somewhat overshadowed by the greater fame of his brother, Mr. Charles Wesley has many claims upon the affectionate regards of "the people called Methodists." His preaching in Dublin was largely owned of God in the conversion of Catholics. Adopting St. Paul's method at Athens, he quoted their own authors, showing from the "Miserere" and "Thomas à Kempis" that Jesus was the only Saviour of men. He bought the first preaching-house in Dublin,—at Dolphin's Barn, in the neighborhood of the present Cork Street chapel. He spent five months in the city, and passing southward reached Cork. Here he encountered severe persecution, and was formally indicted by the grand jury on the following noteworthy bill: "We find and present Charles Wesley to be a person of ill-fame, a vagabond, and a common disturber of his Majesty's peace, and we pray that he may be transported." This outrage on the name of justice greatly encouraged the mob that, under the leadership of one Butler, a ballad-singer, ran through the streets crying, "Five pounds for a Swaddler's head." This nickname came into use after John Cennick preached from the text, "Ye shall find a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger." The name yet lingers in some parts of the country. Methodism was introduced into Limerick in 1749, by Robert Swindells, whose first convert—Mrs. Eliza Benniss—afterwards carried on a most intimate and valuable correspondence with Mr. Wesley on the subject of "Christian Perfection." She emigrated to the United States, and died in Philadelphia in 1802, aged seventy-seven years. Another of his converts, and the greatest, was Mr. Thomas Walsh, who afterwards became "a bright and shining light." Dowered with the richest gifts and graces of the Spirit, he was pronounced by Mr. Wesley to be such a master of biblical knowledge as he never saw before and never expected to see again. He closed his too rapid race in his twenty-eighth year.

The work now increased rapidly. Scores of conversions took place, and several circuits were formed. The preachers who came over with Mr. Wesley visited the "societies," as they were called, regularly, and preached in new places as they were opened to them. Soon preachers from among the natives were raised up. Some of these had been Romanists like Thomas Walsh, and were very successful in preaching to their benighted fellow-countrymen. Many of these preached in Irish,—a language rich in expletives, and peculiarly adapted by idiomatic structure and wealth of phraseology as a vehicle of conveying religious truth and expressing holy emotion. The preacher who possessed a knowledge of Irish found easy access to the hearts of the people, and many believed and turned to the Lord. Year by year Mr. Wesley continued to visit Ireland, and to send over from England some of the best preachers. Many complaints were made as to the time and men spent there, to all which he replied, "Have patience, and Ireland will repay you." Altogether he visited Ireland twenty-one times, extending over fifty years. Crossing the Irish Channel forty-two times, sometimes in wretched vessels, he was never shipwrecked, nor was any preacher ever lost making the same journey. In 1791 Mr. Wesley died. The minutes of Conference of the following year show that there were then 75 preachers and 15,000 members in Ireland. Well might the devout exclaim, "What hath God wrought!"

Immediately after the death of Mr. Wesley, the question of the administration of the sacraments by the preachers began to be discussed, but year after year it was determined "to abide by the old Methodist plan till a change of circumstances renders a change of plan so unavoidable as to justify us in the sight of God and man for making it." (Minutes, 1792.)

Irish Missions were established by Dr. Coke in 1799. They were evangelistic, and were intended to carry the gospel into the remotest corners of the land by means of agents familiar with the Irish language. The first missionaries were the famous Gideon Ousley and his companion, Charles Graham, afterwards called "The Apostle of Kerry." Perhaps no name in Irish Methodism is more widely known than Mr. Ousley's. Of a wealthy family, and a good scholar, a rare controversialist, and of sweet temper, his appearance in the fairs and markets was the signal for a crowd and a service. Amid honor and dishonor, for forty years he continued this special work, which, perhaps, more than anything else, served the cause of Methodism in Ireland, and seems well worthy the consideration of Methodists elsewhere. The "General Mission," as it is now called, continues to this day to receive God's blessing, the chief missionary being Rev. W. Graham Campbell, a descendant of the first missionary, Mr. Graham.

Mission Schools were instituted in 1823, by Rev. Valentine Ward, an agent of the Missionary Society. The special object of these schools was to combine religious with secular instruction in remote and sparsely-populated regions. The teachers were almost always local preachers, and many of them entered the regular work. In the days of their adoption these schools were eminently useful, but with a better understanding of the national system of education established by the government, and from other causes, the need for their existence has ceased to be felt, and they have almost disappeared.

Rise of Primitive Wesleyanism.—The controversy on the ordination of the preachers, and the administration of the sacraments by them, that began on the death of Mr. Wesley, continued to agitate "the societies" for more than twenty years. There were two elements in the debate,—the question of the ordinances, and that of separation from the Established and other churches. Hitherto Methodism was regarded as a "society" within the Established or Non-conformist churches, and it was feared by some and felt by all that if the sacraments were administered by the preachers it would snap the bond between the Methodists and the parish clergy,—between Methodism and the church. But for many years petitions had been sent to Conference from many parts of the country stating their grievances, and asking their own preachers to administer the sacraments and make full proof of their ministry. The Conference, year after year, set apart one of their number—Rev. Adam Averell, an ordained deacon in the Established Church—to visit the people who had petitioned, and grant their request. But he was unable to cover the whole country.

WESLEYAN CHAPEL, THURLES.

The demand grew with the denial, until finally a grave and great division was threatened. Even before Mr. Wesley's death the question of separation had been discussed, but he had stayed it by saying "that the Methodists never will separate from the church—till God calls me hence." (Minutes, 1789.) The last clause of the sentence has since been regarded as prophetic. Several schemes were proposed by those who opposed the preachers, as such, giving the ordinances. One was that a few should be ordained by Episcopal authority for this special work. To this came the reply that no bishop would ordain a preacher, knowing that he would continue a Methodist. Then Presbyterian ordination was proposed only to be rejected, for all the preachers at that time refused to be regarded as Dissenters. Finally, a "Plan of Pâcification" passed the Conference, granting the administration of the sacraments in certain circuits, fencing the privilege with many conditions and stipulations. Yet the separation took place. Mr. Averell and another preacher left the Conference, carrying nearly 10,000 members with them, and organized the Clones Association; hence the term Clonites was applied to the seceders, but who ultimately became known as Primitive Wesleyans. These are not to be confounded with the Primitive Methodists of England. It is a joy, at this writing, to observe that, after sixty years of separation, plans of union have been agreed upon. The sum of $50,000 was subscribed to remove financial difficulties at the Conference of 1877, and it is hoped the formal completion of the desirable union will take place in 1878.

Relation of the Irish Conference to the British.—During Mr. Wesley's life he generally met the Irish Conference every alternate year. Dr. Coke presided in Mr. Wesley's absence, and after his death continued to serve as president for twenty years. This he did in compliance with the request of the Irish Conference, and by appointment of the British. It is to be noted, however, that Mr. Wesley by the Poll Deed made provision for the holding of a Conference in Ireland as often as it should seem expedient to the British Conference. As a question of fact, however, it meets annually, the president being appointed by the British Conference, subject to the following regulation: "The same person shall not be appointed to preside at two successive Conferences." This limitation at first gave great offense to the Irish Conference, who requested its repeal. (Minutes, 1812.) The request was not granted, but an enlarged representation in the "Legal Hundred" was afforded. At present the number is ten. "The delegate" is an officer recently created. He must be a member of the "Legal Hundred," receive the nomination of the Irish Conference, and be confirmed by the British. His duties are to preside in the absence of the president, and to consider all appeals or business affecting the interest of the "connection" during the intervals of the Conference. It will be seen by this that, save in the case of accident, no member of the Irish Conference can be its president. But the relations of the two Conferences are most friendly. In matters of legislation it is sometimes said that the Irish Conference is a spur in the side of the British, but this is counterbalanced by the avoidupois that prevents overhasty legislation,—ever a disease of a warm-blooded people.

Lay Delegation in Conference.—After many years of petitioning and discussion, the Conference has finally agreed to the principle of lay delegation in Conference. No one is eligible for nomination as lay delegate who is not twenty-five years old, and who has not been a "member of society" for at least five years. The election of lay representatives is by vote of ministers and laymen in attendance at the March district meeting. The mixed Conference, constituted of an equal number of ministers and laymen, met for the first time this year (1877), in Cork, and consisted of 143 members. There was one vacancy in the number of laymen, occasioned by the lamented death of Mr. Samuel M. Comas,

J.P., of Dublin,—a long-trying friend of Methodism and a devoted Christian. In all business relating to ordinary matters of administration a majority of those present and voting shall be sufficient to decide any question. But for all new laws, rules, and regulations, a majority of two-thirds of those present and voting shall be necessary before such measures shall be declared to be carried. The action of the Irish Conference on this question has been largely felt in England, and next year the British Conference will follow—etsi non passibus æquis.

Sunday-Schools were originated at the Conference of 1805, and have proved to be a valuable part of the work of Methodism. The Sunday-school in Cork dates from 1791, and is the oldest in Ireland. In 1806 returns were sent in from 25 circuits, showing the existence of 204 schools, with 12,180 scholars, exclusive of Dublin, Cork, Limerick, and Belfast, which sent no returns but had schools. For many years little care was given to the management of these schools by the Conference, but lately a Sunday-School Union has been established, that has already done much to stimulate interest and to introduce better methods. In one of the schools (University Road, Belfast) the Berean Lessons of the M. E. Church are regularly used.

Day-Schools.—These are partly mission schools and partly under the National Board of Education. In the mission schools the religious instruction is given in accordance with the manager's arrangement,—the manager being the superintendent minister; in the National schools it must be given out of regular school hours, the attendance being voluntary. About 30 schools are under the National Board.

Higher Education.—For many years this question has largely occupied the attention of the leading minds in Irish Methodism. From the beginning the education of ministers' sons was cared for by the establishment of the academy in Dublin known as the "Connexional School." This has done good service, many of its boys having entered Trinity College and greatly distinguished themselves. Its prosperity is its present trouble, and the managers propose to erect a larger building, to be called the "New Institution," and for which generous aid has lately been secured in America by Rev. Robert Hazleton. The chief and most creditable effort in this direction, however, is the "Methodist College," Belfast, a noble building, with a goodly staff of professors, a most hopeful outlook for the future, and an already established success. Dr. Robinson Scott, who visited America in its interest twenty years ago, is its president, succeeding the very capable Rev. Dr. Crook, who is now a pastor in New York City. Rev. William Arthur, author of the "Tongue of Fire," was its first president, and did much to give it a firm hold upon the interest of the Methodist people and a secure place among the leading educational institutions of the country. It is now apparent that Irish Methodism is as potent to deal with the educated as with the ignorant. "Intellectual penury" is her reproach no more.

Charitable Institutions.—These are the "Methodist Orphan Society," to aid in the maintenance and education of orphan children of Methodist parents. This society is greatly indebted to Dr. William Crook, the raey editor of The Irish Evangelist. The "Strangers' Friend Society" was instituted by Dr. Adam Clarke, in Dublin, in the year 1790. The object is to visit sick and friendless strangers and to distribute relief. The "Methodist Female Orphan School" was founded in 1804, by Mr. Solomon Walker, of Dublin, and is supported by the interest from a property which he bequeathed the society and by a collection in one of the Dublin chapels yearly. The "Methodist Female Benevolent Society" was established in 1828, and has done much good in its peculiar mission. To these may be added the "Auxiliary Fund for Worn-out Ministers and Ministers' Widows,"—although this is not a "charity," save in the New Testament sense. It is a fund that carries its object in its name. It has $70,000 invested, and receives an annual subscription from the "members of the society" in the classes. It allows supernumerary ministers $60 per year, with $5 additional for each year they have traveled. Widows are allowed $50, with $2.50 for each year of their husbands' traveling.

Present Condition and Influence.—There are 192 ministers in the Irish Conference, of whom 25 are supernumeraries and 27 preachers on trial. The number of members is 20,148; on trial, 591. Number of emigrations, 289. The figures under the last item are unusually small this year, but they direct attention to a characteristic of Irish Methodism. For a century the preachers have applied the prophecy to themselves, "Surely I will no more give thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored. But they that have gathered it, shall eat it, and praise the Lord; and they that have brought it together shall drink it in the courts of my holiness." But the time has not yet come. Who can estimate its influence upon universal Methodism? Mr. Wesley's reply, "Have patience and Ireland will repay you," was soon understood in England. In the first period, Wm. Thompson (president after Mr. Wesley's death), James Morgan, Thomas Walsh, Henry Moore, and Adam Clarke enriched the blood of British Methodism, as Wm. Arthur has at a later period. At a recent session of the Australian Conference all the ministers ordained were of Irish birth. But it is in the United States and Canada that the force of Irish Methodism is most felt. In the latter place to-day, 200 ministers are the fruit of its work, while it is beyond reckoning in the United States. Philip Embury and Robert Strawbridge, the planters of Methodism and the first local preachers, Boardman, the first missionary, Charles Elliot, the great delineator of the great apostasy, came from the "old country," and did pioneer and blessed work in the land of their adoption. In later years, eminent ministers of the Irish Conference, such as Dr. Wm. Butler, of Mexico, Dr. R. Crook, of New York, Thos. Guard, of San Francisco, have made "the States" their home, while many hundreds of local preachers have entered the Conferences as regular ministers and have built up the waste places. Above all, tens of thousands of members have heard the cry of "Westward" and have obeyed. Again and again the Irish preachers have had to report whole classes, and even congregations, having met together and agreeing to emigrate. Irish Christianity indeed was always missionary. In the beginning, the great school and college for Europe, it sent out missionaries to Danes and Saxons. Irish Methodism maintains the traditions, the genius, and the propagandist spirit of the olden times. It deserves the love and prayers of the peoples it has benefited, who may yet see this emerald gem of the isles of the sea freed from all hurtful superstitions and flourishing as the garden of the Lord.

Ironton, O. (pop. 5686), the capital of Lawrence County, situated on the Ohio River, is a manufacturing town, and has had a rapid growth. Methodism was introduced into this region about 1849, when the place first appears in the minutes of the church, with James T. Holliday and Isaac Neff as pastors, who reported from the circuit 151 members. The church has grown steadily with the population, there being now three church edifices. The German Methodists have also organized a congregation and built a church, and the African M. E. Church has an organization. It is in the Ohio Conference, and has for 1876 the following statistics:

Isaac, Daniel, a Wesleyan Methodist minister, was called into the ministry in 1800. He was an able and faithful expositor of God's holy word. "reasoning out of the Scriptures" with a clearness and cogency few could resist. He died in 1834.

Italy, Methodist Missions in.—The kingdom of Italy has been formed since 1859, by the absorption of the petty states and provinces which previously occupied the peninsula of Italy, and the island of Sicily, and also the former kingdom of Sardinia. Its consolidation was completed in 1870.

when Rome was occupied as the capital of the kingdom, and the temporal power of the Pope was restricted to the quarters actually occupied by the officers of the Holy See. Under the former rule the several governments of the country were influenced by the papal court and the Roman Catholic priesthood. The Roman Catholic was the exclusive religion of the states, and no other religion was tolerated. No Protestant churches existed, except the "foreign" churches under the protection of the consulates, and in Piedmont, where the Waldensians had maintained their existence against all obstacles for many centuries. Under the sovereignty of the new kingdom of Italy the dominance of the priests has been abolished, and complete religious freedom has been established. The Protestant churches have improved the advantages offered by the liberal policy of the present government. The Waldensians have strengthened and enlarged their organization, have established missions in different parts of the peninsula, and receive co-operation in their efforts from the Presbyterians of Great Britain and the United States. A new native church, the Free Christian Church of Italy, has been established, which has had a prosperous growth, and is also assisted by Presbyterians and Congregationalists. English and American Episcopal Churches have been organized in some of the cities, the Baptists have several large and prosperous missions, and the Wesleyan and Methodist Episcopal Churches have established societies in many parts of the kingdom.

Methodism was introduced into Italy from France in 1852, when Felix Neff and M. Rostan began to labor in the Waldensian valleys and Piedmont. The work was assisted for a few years by the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as well as by the Wesleyan Missionary Society, under whose jurisdiction, as the patron of the French Conference, it ultimately belonged. It made gradual progress, and several stations were established among them,—one being at Turin, the capital of the kingdom of Sardinia, in connection with the French Conference. The direct operations of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Italy were begun in 1861, when the Rev. Richard Green went to Florence, and was shortly afterwards joined by the Rev. Henry J. Piggot. During this year a translation of Wesley's sermons into Italian was begun, and twelve of them were made ready for the press. In the next year, 1862, the missionaries explored the field, visiting Bologna, Modena, Milan, Florence, Naples, and other places. The Rev. Thomas S. Jones joined the mission in 1862, and Mr. Green returned to England in bad health. Milan was selected as the most suitable place to begin the work, and a girls' boarding-school was opened, a congregation was formed, the building of a church was begun, a depot was established for the sale of books, and the translation of the second catechism was published. The headquarters of the mission were afterwards transferred to Padua. The Wesleyan missionary committee resolved, in 1863, to assist the schools of Signor Ferreti, at Florence, and to aid Signor Gualtieri, a converted priest. The work was extended to the towns of the Lago Maggiore, and a depository for books was established at Parma. In 1865 the new chapel at Milan was occupied, an evening-school was established at Pavia, and a congregation was organized there, and missions were begun at Cremona and Naples. Spezia was occupied in 1866. In 1869 the headquarters of the mission were at Padua and Naples, and the reports showed that it embraced 14 stations or circuits, 2 English and 10 Italian ministers, 709 members, and 10 day-schools, in which 698 children were instructed. In 1870 Messina, in Sicily, was occupied by evangelists. The occupation of Rome by the king of Italy, in 1870, was followed by the establishment of a mission in that city. Premises were bought for the purposes of the missions at Rome and Naples in 1872, and the erection or adaptation of buildings for the use of the missions was begun. The church in Rome, which is situated in the Vin della Scufa, near the palace of the Cardinal Vicar, was dedicated on the 29th of April, 1877, with services by the founders of the mission, the Rev. Messrs. Richard Green and Henry J. Piggot.

The Wesleyan missions in 1876 were divided into two districts, the Rome district and the Naples district. The Rome district included 14 stations,—Rome, Anagni, Spezia, Bologna, Padua, Parma, Reggio, Mezzano Inferiore, Vicobellignano, Cremona, Asola, Milan, Pavia, Intra. The Naples district included 12 stations,—Naples, Fondigrotta, and Pozzuoli; Caserta; Santa Maria, Capua, Vetere; Aquila, Solmona; Salerno; Casenza, Altomonte, etc.; San Marco, Argentano; Messina; Syracuse and Floriolia; Avola; Palermo; Catanzano. The two districts returned a total of 34 chapels and other preaching-places, 2 missionaries, 21 Italian ministers, 13 catechists, 1149 members, 125 on trial, 866 scholars in the Sunday- and day-schools, and 1963 attendants upon the services of the church.

The missionary committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church provided, in 1870, for the founding of a mission in Italy. The Rev. Leroy M. Vernon, D.D., was appointed superintendent of the mission. He began his work during 1872, at Bologna, and was shortly joined by the Rev. F. A. Spencer. At the close of the year 1873, 9 stations had been occupied,—at Bologna, Modena, Forlì, Ravenna, Bagnacavallo, Rimini, Pescara and Chieta, Rome, and Florence. St. Paul's Free School had been opened at Bologna, with 70 scholars, a work of colportage had been begun, a few Methodist books had been translated, and the mission reported 15 actual laborers and about 40 additional hopeful believers. In 1874, 14 places were occupied, 4 students were in training for the Methodist ministry, and the aggregate of members and probationers was returned at 600. Nine of the Italian preachers had been recommended and received on trial at the Germany and Switzerland Conference, two of whom were ordained by Bishop Harris at the annual meeting of the mission, in September. The year 1875 was marked by the dedication, on Christmas-day, of St. Paul's chapel, on Via Poli, in Rome, the first Protestant church built in that city. In 1877 the military church in Rome, with 400 members, having been transferred to the Wesleyans, the mission returned 14 stationed preachers, 1 colporteur, 1 Bible-reader, 2 exhorters, 3 local preachers, 6 Sunday-schools, and 14 baptisms, and reported other statistics of the stations as follows:

Italy—Methodist Missionary Literature.—

The Methodist missionaries began to prepare a Methodist literature in the Italian language almost simultaneously with the beginning of the missionary efforts. The translation of Mr. Wesley's sermons into Italian was begun by the English missionaries in 1861, and a standard edition of a selection of twenty-two of the sermons has been published from the press, at Padua, since 1868. An appropriate accompaniment to this work is the "Breve Storia del Metodismo fino alla Morte di Giovanni Wesley nel 1791," or "Short History of Methodism till the Death of John Wesley in 1791." In 1875 the publication of a quarto journal, Il Corriere Evangelico, was begun.

The Methodist Episcopal missionaries translated in 1873, the first year of their work in Italy, the "Articles of Religion," the "Manual of Instruction for Classes of Baptized Children" of the Rev. Bostwick Hawley, and the "Theological Compend" of the Rev. Amos Binney. The first original work of the mission was published in 1874, "L'Altare ed il Trono" ("The Altar and the Throne: or, the Alliance of the Two Powers against the Liberty of Believing and Thinking"), by the Rev. E. Borelli, pastor at Bologna, of which one thousand copies were distributed. In the same year there were also distributed by the Methodist Episcopal missionaries 78 hymn-books, 670 pamphlets, 1758 religious papers, 6287 tracts, and 52 miscellaneous volumes, a part of which were printed by the mission and a part bought. The distribution of evangelical literature is furthered by the co-operation of the Religious and Foreign Bible Society of London, the "Società dei Trattati Religiosi," of Florence, the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A hymn-book and a few tracts in Italian are published by the Methodist Episcopal Book Concern in New York.

Ithaca, N. Y. (pop. 8462), the capital of Tompkins County, situated on the upper end of Lake Cayuga, and is the seat of Cornell College. Methodist services were introduced in August, 1817, by David Ayres, a layman from New York City. The same year James Kelsey preached the first Methodist sermon in the city; services were held in a large room in a hotel, and a class was formed, with David Ayres as leader. The first M. E. church, costing about $5000, was erected in 1818. Since that time the growth has been satisfactory, and there are now two convenient Methodist churches. The Free Methodists have also a small congregation. It is in the Central New York Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Itinerancy is a peculiar feature of Methodist economy, and is in direct contrast with that of a settled pastorate. It is that system by which ministerial exchanges are made from year to year, or at stated periods, among the different Methodist churches. It does not claim for its peculiar order a direct Divine sanction; and yet it does claim that it follows essentially the example of Christ and of his apostles; as no one of them, for any considerable time, remained in charge of a single congregation, or preached to the same people. Indeed, it is difficult to understand how the command, "Go into all the world and preach my gospel to every creature," could be successfully carried out unless an itinerant system were to be, to some extent, adopted. The apostles traveled from place to place, and the Apostle Paul not unfrequently returned to visit the churches, to instruct them, and to arrange all matters necessary for their growth and efficiency. There was early manifested, however, a tendency to a settled pastorate; though evangelistic labors were continued in the church for many years. In all periods of revival and reformation an itinerancy has for a time prevailed. Luther and his coadjutors traveled from place to place and addressed various congregations, though not in any definite order. In Scotland, in the early period of the Reformation, older and more experienced ministers were appointed to districts, to travel through them, and to assist the pastors in different congregations. Mr. Wesley, deprived through the exclusiveness of the Church of England from preaching in the churches, gave himself fully to evangelistic labors, and it became necessary for him to travel throughout Great Britain and Ireland. He early found assistants who were willing to follow in his footsteps, and whom he sent to supervise his societies in his absence, and to preach in various districts. These directions were at first without any regular system, but were varied according to the exigencies of the case. As early as 1746, however, he attempted to methodize the labor of his helpers, appointing them to distinct and separate circuits. The whole of Great Britain was mapped out into seven of these, and the word "circuit" has since been retained as a technical term in Methodism. Three years afterwards there were 20 of these circuits or "rounds" in England, 2 in Wales, 2 in Scotland, and 7 in Ireland, and at Mr. Wesley's death, in 1791, there were 72 in England, 28 in Ireland, 7 in Scotland, and 3 in Wales. These circuits at first embraced a large number of appointments, the preacher returning to them usually about once in four weeks, and the preachers were changed from one circuit to another, from year to year, as circumstances seemed to require. This itinerant system, which brought the pastors only once a month to the congregations, gave rise to the employment of a local ministry, or local preachers, who were laymen employed in the regular business of life, and who supplied the pulpits in the absence of the itinerant preacher, and thus maintained religious services on each Sabbath. In addition to this, the class-leader, who met a certain portion of the society every week, became a sub-pastor, and a watchful supervision was exercised over all the membership in the absence of the minister. In England, the circuit system is retained to the present day. In the large cities several churches are combined under a single pastorate, and this form has the advantage of securing in succession to the same church, the experience and accumulated wisdom of age in administration, and the energy and activity of youth in abundant labors. In America, the itinerancy was introduced in a regular form by ministers sent by Mr. Wesley. The work had indeed commenced under local ministers, whose week-days were occupied in caring for their families and pursuing other occupations. But when the itinerant ministers arrived, they immediately established the system which Mr. Wesley had so carefully taught. In America, the circuits originally were very large, embracing sometimes a region of country from four to eight hundred miles in extent, the minister sometimes not returning more than once in six weeks; but the local minister and the class-leaders, when societies were formed, kept up services in their absence. In this way Methodism supplied the wants of a sparse population which was unable to support a settled pastorate. It was its itinerant work which gave to early Methodism its great power. As ministers were raised up without a thorough theological training, it became necessary for the purpose of securing careful supervision, and the administration of the ordinances, that some more experienced minister should visit certain portions of the territory, and hence the system arose of traveling presiding elders, while, to complete the system of superintendence, the bishop had the oversight of the church throughout its entire bounds. The itinerancy, though so efficient, was not adopted by Mr. Wesley upon any theory; it arose in the midst of an effort to supply the wants of a people who had but little evangelical attention. He became convinced, however, that it was of great moment for the progress and efficiency of the church. He says, "We have found by long and consistent experience that a frequent exchange of teachers is best. This preacher has one talent, that another: no one whom I ever yet knew has all the talents which are needful for beginning, continuing, and perfecting the work of grace in a whole congregation." The itinerancy is a feature which has been jealously guarded by the Methodist Churches; and those of them which have the Episcopal form have secured it by their Restrictive Rules, which limit the power of the General Conference. To secure the itinerancy more effectively also, presiding elders are prohibited from remaining more than four years on the same district, and traveling preachers can remain only three. While this itinerancy has its disadvantages, in the frequent removal of preachers, and in the breaking up of associations with the church, it has the advantage of removing pastors without the friction which frequently occurs in other churches, and of securing for pastors congregations, and for congregations pastors, without injurious absence or interruptions. The impression has prevailed recently to some extent that while itinerancy is unequaled in spreading the gospel through sparsely-settled sections of the country, it is not so well adapted to cities and to more populous districts. The working of the system, however, in England, in the midst of the densest population, and in some cities and districts in America, shows that the increase of the Methodist Churches under the system of itinerancy is more rapid than where the settled pastorate is preferred; and that in the different forms of Methodism, those which are the most thoroughly itinerant are also the most successful.

Ives, Benoni I., D.D., a delegate from the Oneida or Central New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1868, 1872, and 1876, joined the Oneida Conference in 1845, was appointed chaplain of the State prison at Auburn, N. Y., in 1857, and served in that office for eleven years. In 1872 he was appointed financial secretary of Syracuse University. He has assisted very frequently at the dedications of churches, where his appeals to congregations for subscriptions of money have been very successful.

Jackson, Mich. (pop. 11,447), is the capital of Jackson County, and is an important railroad centre. It first appears on the annals of the M. E.

Church for 1839 as a circuit, with Lorenzo Davis and T. S. Jakway as pastors, who, in 1840, reported 330 members. It became a station, and has made fair progress, and is now well supplied with church facilities for effective work. It is in the Michigan Conference, and reports 480 members, 380 Sunday-school scholars, and $75,000 church property. The Free Methodists have a small society, and report 33 members, 34 Sunday-school scholars, and $1200 church property.

Jackson, Miss. (pop. 4234), is the capital of the State, on the Jackson and Great Northern Railroad. This region was for a long time included in the Pearl River circuit, one of the first formed in the State. Jackson, however, does not appear by name on the annals of the M. E. Church until 1837, and was then connected with Clinton and Raymond, with Charles K. Marshall as pastor, who reported 143 members. Since the war the M. E. Church has organized a colored society here, and it reports, in connection with the Mississippi Conference, 221 members, 75 Sunday-school scholars, and $2200 church property. The M. E. Church South reports 230 members. The African M. E. Church reports 29 members, 32 Sunday-school scholars, and $500 church property.

Jackson, Mordecai W., a lay delegate from the Central Pennsylvania Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Berwick, Columbia Co., Pa. He has been a steward, trustee, and leader in his church. He is engaged in business as a builder of railroad-cars and as a banker, and has been accustomed for several years to give to the church one hundred dollars a month for missions, and a similar sum for church extension.

Jackson, Tenn. (pop. 4119), the capital of Madison County, situated on the Mobile and Ohio Railroad, is noted for its thriving trade as well as for its prosperous educational institutions. This city first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1820. In 1821 it reported 150 members, with Elias Tidwell and Richard Neely as preachers. It is in the Tennessee Conference, and the Church South reports from the First church 293 members, from East Jackson 170 members, and from City Mission 30 members.

Jackson, Thomas, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in Yorkshire in 1783, and died in London in 1873. For twenty years he labored in some of the most important circuits; then for eighteen years as editor of the connectional publications; for the next nineteen he was a theological tutor, and during the last twelve he was a supernumerary. His spotless character was based on a sound conversion and a rich and growing experience of the love of God which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. He gave attendance to reading, and acquired vast stores of knowledge. He had the pen of a ready writer, and for nearly sixty years it was kept in constant exercise. He was twice president of the Conference.

Jacksonville, Fla. (pop. 6912), is situated on the St. John's River, and is the largest and most important city in the State. It was named for General Jackson after his successful military career against the Indians in the South. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1836, with John Jones as pastor. He reported from the circuit of which it was the head 295 members. Subsequently it became a station, and at the separation of the church adhered to the South. After the close of the Civil War the M. E. Church organized a society in Jacksonville, and established a small institute for the education chiefly of the colored people. The following are the statistics:

Jacksonville, Ill. (pop. 9203), the capital of Morgan County, is one of the most flourishing interior towns in the State. It is the seat of the Illinois Female College, founded in 1847, under the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The first Methodist class was organized in 1827, when Thomas Randle and Isaac House were pastors. The first quarterly meeting was held that year, in the log house of Father Jordan. In 1830 the Jacksonville circuit was formed, and John Sinclair was in charge. In 1831 he reported 450 members. In 1833 it became a station, and Thomas J. Starr was appointed pastor, who, in 1835, reported 150 members. From that time the church has greatly prospered. Several of the American branches of Methodism are represented. It is in the Illinois Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Jacoby, Ludwig S., D.D., an eminent German minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born Oct. 21, 1813, in Old Strelitz, Mecklenburg, Germany, and died June 21, 1874, in St. Louis, Mo. His father was of the tribe of Levi, and his mother from the priestly line. He received a good education, especially in the ancient languages. In 1835 he was baptized by a Lutheran clergyman. In 1839 he emigrated to America, and located in Cincinnati, O., as a physician. He also devoted himself to teaching. Attending the religious services held by Dr. Nast, on Christmas-day he was awakened, and converted the following watch-night.

In August, 1841, he was sent to St. Louis by Bishop Morris to start the first German mission in that city, and his labors were blessed with great success. In 1849, having a desire for the conversion of his native countrymen, Bishop Morris, with the co-operation of the Missionary Board, sent him to Germany to begin evangelistic work in Bremen. His labors there resulted in the formation of a Methodist Episcopal society. In his work in Germany a large number of the natives have received instruction. A sketch of the mission premises is herewith given. The school is for both boys and girls, and education is given both in the Tamil and English languages. (See cut on next page.)

Jamaica (pop. 506,154), one of the largest islands of the West Indies, was discovered by Columbus, in 1494. Of its population, only 13,101 are whites. The English Wesleyans, by the labors of Dr. Coke, he labored faithfully as presiding elder, pastor, editor, book agent, and superintendent. Having spent twenty-two years in that work he returned to the United States, and was transferred to the Southwestern German Conference, and stationed at Eighth Street, St. Louis. His health, however, declined, and he at last died, happy in God; imparting blessings like a patriarch to those around him. He was a delegate from the Germany and Switzerland Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Jaffna is a seaport town of Ceylon, near the northern extremity of the island, and has a large commercial trade. Shortly after the English Wesleyans had established their missions fully in Ceylon a school building was erected in Jaffna, where established a mission here in 1787. It early met with violent opposition, the authorities passing laws prohibiting the slaves from attending their services. Hence, from 1807 to 1815, the work was interrupted, and only by the interference of the English home government were the missionaries allowed to proceed. Even after this time the insurrection of the slaves was charged to the ministers. Upon the abolition of slavery, however, the work proceeded more rapidly. In 1846 they reported 26,585 members; after that period there was a large decrease. In 1867 they reported 75 churches, 34,105 sittings, 24,210 attendants, 26 ministers, 14,661 members, 5107 Sunday-school scholars. The Wesleyan Methodists now number 21 circuits and 16,557 members.

The United Methodist Free Churches commenced their missionary labor in 1838, employing Rev. Thomas Pennock, who had been a Wesleyan minister, and recognizing the societies which had formerly been under his care. Two missionaries were also sent out from England, who had a very flattering reception at Kingston, but returned in less than two years. Mr. Pennock, however, did not remain connected with the mission. In 1843 he and about two-thirds of the society withdrew from the body, and instituted suit for the recovery of the chapels.

four persons received justifying faith," and a Long Island circuit was subsequently formed. Jamaica first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1810, with Francis Ward and Isaac Candee as pastors, who reported for the circuit 629 members. For a number of years past it has been a station. The church has continued to prosper till the present time. It is in the New York East Conference, and reports 238 members, 136 Sunday-school scholars, and $40,000 church property.

The litigation continued until 1849, when judgment was given against Mr. Pennock. In 1860, Rev. W. Griffiths was sent to Kingston, who has labored diligently until the present time, and has been followed by other laborers. The returns presented to the Annual Assembly of 1876 showed 8 circuits, 7 itinerant preachers, 22 local preachers, 178 leaders, 2239 members, with 177 on trial, 25 chapels and preaching-rooms, 21 Sunday-schools, 108 Sunday-school teachers, and 1215 scholars. Only two of the ministers are Europeans. For the ministry and day-schools there was raised by local effort in Jamaica in 1876, £1253.27½, and also £46.5.5 for the General Mission Fund. A handsome chapel has been erected recently at Kingston.

Jamaica, N. Y. (pop. 3791), the capital of Queen's County, is a pleasant resort from the cities of New York and Brooklyn. Methodism was very early introduced into this place. In 1767, Captain Webb, having a relative living here, came and hired a house and preached in it, and "twenty-

Dr. James entered the ministry in 1836, was for six years governor and chaplain of Wesley College, Sheffield. He was elected secretary of the Conference in 1870, and president in 1871.

Jamestown, N. Y. (pop. 5336), situated on the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad, and at the outlet of Chautauqua Lake. This region was originally included in the Chautauqua circuit, one of the first formed in this part of the State. Jamestown first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1829, with David Preston and W. Butt as pastors, and they reported for that circuit, in 1830, 528 members. It subsequently became a station. From that time Methodism has kept pace with the growth of the population. It is in the Erie Conference, and reports 489 members, 380 Sunday-school scholars, and $19,000 church property. There is also a Swedish Methodist Church, reporting for the circuit of their appointments 218 members, 30 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $5900.

Janes, Mrs. Charlotte Thibou, was the daughter of Louis Thibou. The family was of French extraction, and traced their descent from a Huguenot family of the same name. She was born in Newark, N. J., in 1808. She was carefully reared, and in early youth became a devout Episcopalian. While in the church her religious life was marked by great fervor, and when about twenty-two years of age she became convinced that her spiritual growth would be increased by a union with the Methodists. She therefore withdrew from the church of her childhood and united with the Methodist Church. This step met with the disapproval of her relatives and the opposition of many of her friends. When in her twenty-fifth year she married Edmund Storer Janes, afterwards bishop of the M. E. Church, but at that time agent for Dickinson College. During his career of work for the church she proved a most exemplary helpmeet, living a life of piety, and exerting a religious influence over all with whom she came in contact. For nearly a year before her death she was a patient sufferer, proving by her sweet and trustful endurance the sufficiency of her faith. She died Aug. 13, 1876, leaving a heritage of precious memories to a large circle of friends. In her devotion to Christ and her non-conformity to the world she should rank among those noble women of the church who sustained by their sympathy the work of its founders. She had the spirit that animated women like Lady Maxwell, Lady Huntingdon, and Mrs. Fletcher. Her knowledge of God, both in his Spirit and his Word, was remarkable, and her interest in the church of Christ remained fresh to the latest period of life. So long as she could talk she talked of Jesus. Almost her last words were, "Out of darkness into light."

Janes, Edwin L., a twin brother of the late Bishop Janes, was born May 27, 1807, in Sheffield, Mass., and died in New York, Jan. 10, 1875. He was converted while engaged as a teacher in Columbia Co., N. Y., and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was received on trial in the Philadelphia Conference in 1832, and filled a number of appointments in Philadelphia, New Jersey, and New York, acting part of the time as presiding elder. He gave forty-three years to the itinerant ministry, and died the oldest member but two of the New York East Conference. In his latter days he was especially earnest in the temperance cause. "As a theologian, he thoroughly understood the Christian system; was eminently capable of discoursing its great principles and doctrines. His preaching was doctrinal, but not dogmatic or speculative." When inquired of by Bishop Janes near the close of his life as to his future, he said, "It is all bright to me."

Janes, Edmund Storer, D.D., LL.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Sheffield, Berkshire Co., Mass., April 27, 1807. He was converted in 1820, and united with the M. E. Church. From 1824 to 1830 he was engaged in teaching, during which time he studied law; but the sudden death of his prospective partner led him to serious reflection, and he gave himself to the work of the ministry. In 1830 he was received into the Philadelphia Conference; and in addition to his theological studies pursued the study of medicine, not with the design of practicing, but to qualify himself more fully for the ministry. After filling various prominent charges, he was, in 1838, appointed agent for Dickinson College, and in 1840 was elected financial secretary of the American Bible Society. On June 7, 1844, in conjunction with the late Bishop Hamline, he was elected to the office of bishop, and was the last of the bishops who received the vote of an undivided church. For more than thirty-one years he discharged the duties of the episcopal office. He traveled in all the States, except Florida, and in most of the Territories. Twice he visited the Pacific coast. In 1859, holding a Conference in Texas, he was confronted by a pro-slavery mob of armed men, who gave him twenty-four hours to leave the State. Fortunately, his Conference work had been about completed. In 1864 he was a delegate from the General Conference to the British Wesleyan Conference, and at the same time held the Conferences of Germany and Switzerland, and visited the missions from Switzerland to Norway. He also represented the American Bible Society before the British and Foreign Bible Society, and attended the French and Irish Conferences. At the time of his death he was president of the Missionary Society, and of the Sunday-School Union and Tract Society of the M. E. Church. He was one of the managers of the American Bible Society, director in the American Colonization Society, trustee of the Wesleyan University at Middletown, and of the Drew Theological Seminary, and president of the Minard Home, at Madison, N. J. Bishop Janes was one of the most remarkable men in the history of American Methodism, with no superior and few equals. He possessed a mind of a high order, capable of the broadest discernment and of the most subtle analysis. He was a model platform speaker,—ready, earnest, and comprehensive,—and a preacher of rare power and grasping eloquence. As an executive officer he especially excelled, presiding with great skill and dignity, and attending diligently to all the details of his office. He was a man of inflexible principle, thorough, conscientious, and untiring in labor and devotion. He had a heart of overflowing sympathy for any who were in distress, and endeared himself to many an afflicted preacher by the kindness of his manner. One has well said, he was as practical as James, as cautious as Peter, as tender and loving as John, as many-sided and comprehensive as Paul. He had been a sufferer for several years from a disease which was gradually impairing his strength. The death of his wife, which occurred Aug. 13, deeply

After suffering for several days, he fell gently asleep at one o'clock, Sept. 18, 1876. A few hours before his death he said, in response to a question, "I am not disappointed."

Japan, Methodist Missions in.—The empire of Japan consists of a number of islands lying off the northeast coast of Asia, between the 30th and 50th degrees of north latitude and the 122d and 153d degrees of east longitude. The principal island is called Nippon, and is about 900 miles long and 100 miles broad, containing an area of 100,000 square miles. The other most important islands are Kiu-siu, having an area of 16,000 square miles, and Sikoke, of 12,000 square miles. The islands of Yesso and Saghalien belong to Japan, but are chiefly inhabited by races less advanced in civilization than those of the more southern islands. The population of the empire is estimated to be between thirty and forty million souls. The Japanese have traditions and a mythology extending back to a very ancient date. What is accepted as their authentic history begins about B.C. 660, although they have no records so early. The empire has been governed by a single dynasty through its entire history. The power of the Mikados, or hereditary emperors, was overshadowed for many centuries by that of their lieutenants, the Tycoons, who exercised the actual authority, but they always ruled in the name of the Mikado, and in nominal subordination to him. The Tycoons were expelled from power in 1866, and the Mikado now reigns actually and in his own name. The Japanese are the dominant race in the southern islands, and a highly-polished people, well advanced in civilization and the arts, and are developing liberal views and an active spirit of enterprise. The northern and outer islands are chiefly inhabited by a people called the Ainos, who are supposed to be the descendants of the aboriginal inhabitants, and are still in a savage state. The prevailing religions in Japan are Shintooism and Buddhism. Shintooism is the religion of the court, and is native to the country. Its distinguishing features are ancestral worship and sacrifices to departed heroes. It recognizes a very great number of deities, the principal of which is the reputed divine ancestor of the Mikado, Ten sho Dai Jin, or Ama Terasu Migami, "Great goddess of the Celestial Effulgence," or the "Heavenly Illuminating Spirit." The doctrine of the divine descent of the Mikado is one of the most formidable obstacles to the recognition of Christianity by the government; for by rejecting it to embrace another religion the ruling dynasty would give up the highest superstitious sanction for its authority. The Shintooists have only obscure notions about the immortality of the soul, a Supreme Creator, or a future state of rewards and punishments, and seek happiness in this life as their chief end. They believe in an infinite number of spirits, and their worship is without materialism. Buddhism was introduced from Corea about the first century of the Christian era, and extended rapidly till it almost entirely superseded Shintooism as the popular religion. It, however, adopted the Shintoo deities, and the two religions became so intermixed that there was hardly any perceptible difference between them.

The government made an effort a few years ago to revive a pure Shintooism and make it the dominant religion, but was not successful, and seems to have abandoned the attempt.

Christianity was introduced into Japan by Roman Catholic missionaries, who entered the country with the Portuguese traders, in 1549, and made such progress that at the close of the sixteenth century 150,000 converts had been enrolled. The pretensions and machinations of the priests aroused the jealousy of the government, and a persecution was instituted which became very savage, and resulted in the entire expulsion of the Portuguese, and the suppression of the Christian religion, in 1639, except that the Dutch were allowed to maintain a small trading port under the most narrow restrictions. The entire country remained closed to foreigners, and the practice and profession of Christianity were prohibited under severe penalties for two centuries. Nevertheless, the Roman Catholics claim that Christianity survived, and that they found several thousand adherents in the empire when it was again opened. Intercourse with foreigners was first restored in 1852, when an American expedition, under Commodore Perry, induced the government to receive an envoy from the United States. Other nations followed, and the restrictions against foreigners were gradually relaxed until several ports were opened to commerce, and diplomatic intercourse was established with all the commercial countries of the West. Having come in contact with Western civilization, the Japanese have manifested eagerness to avail themselves of its advantages. They adopt its mechanical inventions, accept Western customs, and seek to acquire Western learning. They have sent many of their young men abroad to be instructed, and invite Europeans and Americans to establish and conduct schools among them. The edicts against Christianity are still nominally in existence, but they are not enforced. General access to the country is, however, denied. Foreigners are allowed to sojourn and travel, and missionaries to preach and teach, only within the bounds assigned by the government. The opportunities for missionary effort opened in Japan have been improved by a number of the larger missionary societies of the United States and Europe, and the parts of the country which are opened are well occupied by mission stations.

The mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church was begun in 1872, when an appropriation of $25,000 was made by the general committee for the purpose, and the Rev. R. S. Maclay, D.D., formerly of the mission in China, was commissioned as superintendent of the new work. Dr. Maclay, with the Rev. Messrs. J. C. Davidson, Julius Soper, M. C. Harris, and I. H. Correll, with their wives, reached Japan in July, 1873, and began their work in September of the same year. The city of Yokohama was selected as the headquarters of the mission, and stations were established at that place, Yedo (now Tokio), the capital, Hakodadi, and Nagasaki. In 1874, Miss Dora Schoonmaker went out as a missionary of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. In 1875 two circuits, the Bluff church and Furocho, had been formed at Yokohama, residence houses had been built at all the stations, the one at Hakodadi being on land given by the government for the purpose, a church had been built at Yokohama, another church begun at Nagasaki on land given by the government, and property bought for a church at Tokio, and members or probationers, or both, were reported at all the stations, the total number of members being 6, and of probationers 7. In 1876 a church had been built at Nagasaki, a mission house had been erected at Yokohama, the foundation of a chapel had been laid at Tokio, a lot had been bought for a chapel at Hakodadi. Miss Schoonmaker, of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, had been reinforced by the arrival of Miss Olive Whiting, and had bought property for a house at Tokio, and preaching had been begun at Kanagawa and Hachoji. The following is a summary of the statistics of the mission for 1876:

Stations.	Missionaries (American).	Preaching- Places.	Mem- bers.	Prob- ationers.
Yokohama, Ten An Do, or Bluff Station.....	2	2	5	3
Yokohama, Furocho..	2	2	14	8
Tokio.....	2	4	19	10
Nagasaki.....	2	1	3	3
Hakodadi.....	2	2	2	6
Total.....	10	11	43	30

Besides the members and probationers, the mission reported 7 baptized children, making the total number of members, probationers, and baptized children 80, and a force of laborers, in addition to the missionaries and assistant missionaries, of 2 missionaries of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, 4 day-school teachers, and 5 student helpers. The number of baptisms during the year was 42; of pupils in six day-schools, 127, besides 35 pupils in the school of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society at Tokio; of pupils in three Sunday-schools in Yokohama, 110, besides 25 pupils in the Sunday-school of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, at Tokio; average attendance on worship, 320; total value of mission property (5 houses and 2 chapels), $22,225; amount of missionary collections, $71.12; of collections for the poor, $5.86.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist Church of Canada had, in 1876, missions at Tokio and Shidzuoka, with the Rev. George Cochran and Davidson McDonald, M.D., as missionaries, and reported 60 members of the congregations. Mr. Cochran's first convert at Tokio was the principal of a normal school, an eminent Chinese scholar, and a gentleman of high social standing. The Rev. Messrs. Meacham and Charles S. Eby were sent out during the year as additional missionaries, one of whom would establish a mission at Numadzu.

Twelve missionaries are at work in Japan, of which 8 are American, 2 are Scotch, and 2 are connected with the Church of England. The American, British and Foreign, and National Scottish Bible Societies have also agents in the country. All of the societies together employ 79 American and European, and 33 native paid agents. The total number of baptized converts reported is 1004, and the average attendance upon public worship is 3495. The Board of Missions of the Methodist Protestant Church has a mission house and school for the education of native girls at Yokohama, at which, according to the last report of the board (July 10, 1877), 5 girls were reared for and instructed.

Japanese Language and Missionary Literature.—The Japanese language belongs to the polysyllabic branch of the Mongolian division. It has neither common descent with nor family relationship to the Chinese language, and is entirely different from it in grammatical structure, but has been greatly enlarged and enriched by Chinese words, all taken from the written language. The words in common usage—those relating to the names of things, every-day concerns, and family relationship—are native, while Chinese words are found among the technical, philosophical, and scientific terms. In literature, Chinese abounds in the higher compositions, but popular works are composed with native words. The written and spoken language are the same; the alphabet consists of forty-eight letters, derived from the Chinese. The language is very musical in its articulation. The literature of the Japanese has been for the most part developed since the study of the Chinese was begun among them, and has become quite copious, embracing works in all the principal departments, as history, biography, law, poetry, fiction, the Shintoo and Buddhist religions, the drama, philology, and topography. It is rich in histories, of which the earliest were composed in the eighth century. The popular stories and children's books are numerous, peculiar, and entertaining. The scholars of the country are diligent students of European languages, and are fast making themselves acquainted with the treasures of Western literature. The efforts of the missionaries in the Japanese language have been so far directed principally to the translation of parts of the Bible and the publication of tracts. A translation of the Bible is in progress by a committee representing the majority of the Christian churches in the country, under the auspices of the American Bible Society, on which the Rev. Dr. R. S. Maclay represents the Methodist Episcopal mission. This mission has published "A Short Writing of the True God's Mercy," a tract of fifty pages, of which 1120 copies were issued in 1875, and 350 copies in 1876; a "Sunday Sheet," containing the Sundays of the year, arranged according to the days of the month; the Apostles' Creed and the Ten Commandments, of which 7000 copies were issued in 1875; the "Catechism of the M. E. Church," of which 600 copies were issued in 1876; and has circulated a Japanese hymn-book, and copies of several tracts in Japanese and Chinese.

Jaques, Jabez R., D.D., president of Albert College, Canada, was born in England, Dec. 8, 1828, and was converted at Lyons, N. Y., in 1848. He was licensed to preach in 1850, and was received into the East Genesee Conference in 1855. He was principal of the academy at Troupsburg, N. Y., from 1854 to 1856; principal of Classical Seminary, Mansfield, Pa., from 1856 to 1857. From 1857 to 1862 he was pastor in Elmira and Rochester. From 1862 to 1865 he was Professor of Ancient Languages in the Collegiate Institute of Rochester. The next ten years he was Professor of Greek and German in the Illinois Wesleyan University. From this position he was elected president of Albert College, Belleville, Canada, where he still remains. While engaged in educational work, he performs evangelistical labors through the country.

Jaques, Parker, a delegate from the Maine Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Newburyport, Mass., about 1816; was educated at the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, and joined the Maine Conference in 1837, since which time he has labored continuously in the itinerant work.

Jefferson, Mo. (pop. 4420), the capital of the State, is situated on the Missouri River, and on the Missouri and Pacific Railroad. The Methodist Episcopal Church established services first in 1834, and in 1836 erected a house of worship. In 1845 the church, with the State generally, adhered to the South, and this church gave place, in 1875, to another and more tasteful edifice. After the war the Methodist Episcopal Church was reorganized, and in 1858 a small building was erected. In 1865 the society bought the Presbyterian church, and in 1871 began an improvement which has greatly embarrassed it. German Methodist services were introduced as early as 1846, but a church edifice was not erected until 1874, though a parsonage had been built in 1868. The African M. E. Church established services in May, 1861, and built a church in 1866, which gave way to another in 1877. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Jefferson, Texas (pop. 4190), the capital of Marion County, situated on Big Cypress River, and on the Texas and Pacific Railroad. It was early connected with Marshall circuit. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1845, with James W. Baldrige as pastor. The church being divided this year, it adhered to the Church South. Since the close of the Civil War the M. E. Church has organized a small society, which reports 197 members, 100 Sunday-school scholars, and $700 church property. The M. E. Church South erected a very good church in 1868, costing about $30,000. It reports 219 members.

Jeffersonville, Ind. (pop. 7254), is situated on the Ohio River, opposite Louisville, Ky. The first Methodist society was organized in this place about 1807, by a minister from Kentucky. In 1810 Jeffersonville was embraced in Silver Creek circuit, then traveled by Sela Payne. The society then consisted of eleven persons. The first quarterly meeting was held March 11, 1815. In 1833 Jeffersonville became a station, and the first minister appointed was Rev. E. R. Ames, now bishop. The first M. E. church was dedicated in 1835, and was succeeded by a larger one in 1863. It stands upon ground once occupied by the dwelling in which the first class was organized. The Port Fulton church was formed as a mission of Wall Street station, and was erected in 1850. The colored church has a society and a house of worship, erected in 1877. There is also a German M. E. society here. The M. E. Church South has also organized a society and erected a house of worship. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Jenkins, David James, Esq., M.P., of England, was born in Cornwall in 1824, and was educated at Exeter and Teignmouth Grammar Schools. He is a local preacher, and a zealous supporter of Wesleyan institutions; and is an extensive and prosperous ship-owner in London. He was elected member of Parliament for Penryn and Falmouth in 1874.

Jennings, Samuel Kennedy, M.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Essex Co., N. J., June 6, 1771, and died in Baltimore, Md., Oct. 19, 1854. He was a descendant of long and honorable lines of Scotch, English, and American Independents and Presbyterians. His education commenced under the care of his competent parents, and was completed at Rutgers College, New Brunswick. Removing to Virginia, he studied medicine, and became a teacher. He was converted in 1794, and though he had assumed the practice of medicine, for which he was so eminently qualified, he soon commenced preaching. His ministry was very popular and successful: the churches were crowded wherever he went: his manner was so natural, so easy, clear, convincing, that it was esteemed a great privilege to hear him; and few heard him without profit. He removed to Baltimore in 1817. Some time after 1821 he became a patron and contributor of The Wesleyan Repository: and when that was substituted by The Mutual Rights, in 1824, he became one of its editors, and chairman of the publishing committee. In 1827 he, with nine other local preachers and twenty-two laymen, was cited to trial and expelled, for measures connected with advocating a change in the government of the church. In 1845 he removed to Alabama, but having been prostrated by paralysis, after he had somewhat recovered he returned to Baltimore, in 1853, and died during the following year. He was firm in his faith, and happy in his experience and hope. "I am nobody!" he would say, in view of his physical condition. "I never was much, but now I am nothing;" then, with his countenance brightening, "But, I hope to live forever, thank God! I EXPECT to live forever!"

Jersey City, N. J. (pop. 82,546), the capital of Hudson County, opposite to the city of New York. It was originally called Paulus Hook, and in 1802 there was but one family occupying its present site. Methodism was introduced as early as 1827, when the old Trinity church was formed. It was then a small building on posts, the waters of the creek or bay coming close to its location. In 1835, John McClintock, afterwards so well known in the church, was pastor, and reported in the following year 50 members. The old church gave way to the present large and commodious brick church, and from it a large number of charges has been organized, Methodism keeping fair pace with the progress of the city. It is in the Newark Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Jervay, William R., a lay delegate from the South Carolina Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Charleston Co., S. C., in 1847, improved such advantages for education as were allowed him, and served two years during the Civil War in the army of the Union. He was a member of the constitutional convention of South Carolina in 1867.

afterwards served two terms of two years each in the House of Representatives, and one term of four years in the Senate of South Carolina.

Jervis, Kasimir P., D.D., a delegate from the Western New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in 1825, and was graduated from the University of Rochester. He studied law, but afterwards turned to the ministry, and joined the East Genesee Conference in 1851. He has been presiding elder of the Rochester district, and for several years secretary of his Conference. He was also a member of the General Conferences in 1864, 1868, 1872, and 1876.

Jewell, Frank F., D.D., was born in Oneida Co., N. Y., in 1830; was converted in 1852, and entered the ministry in 1859, in the Black River Conference, of which he remained a member till the rearrangement of Conference in 1868, when he became a member of the Central New York Conference. His fields of labor were Hamilton, Malone, Adams, Lion, and Oswego. He served as a secretary of Central New York Conference after its formation as long as he remained a member of it. He was a member of the General Conference in Brooklyn, in 1872. In September of that year he was transferred by Bishop Peck to California, and has been stationed in the Howard Street and Central churches, San Francisco.

Jewett, William, was born in Kentucky, 1789, and died in Poughkeepsie, N. Y., June 27, 1857. At seventeen he was converted, and the year following commenced preaching. In 1808 he entered the New York Conference, M. E. Church, and for forty-four years, during nineteen of which he held the office of presiding elder, his ministerial labors were unabated. The last six years of his life he was superannuated. He was distinguished for decision and firmness of character. As a preacher, he was plain and practical, and many were the seals to his ministry.

Jewett, William D., a member of the East Genesee Conference, was born 1788, and died in Wayne Co., N. Y., in 1855. In 1830 he was admitted on trial in the Conference in which he labored until he was superannuated, in 1845. He was an earnest, faithful laborer, and frequently said, "I owe all I have to the church, and she shall have it when I am done." With the exception of a few trifling legacies, he bequeathed his property, amounting to $3000, to the Bible and missionary interests, and to the Superannuated Preachers' Fund.

Jobson, F. J., D.D., a Wesleyan minister of England, was born in Lincoln in 1812. Evincing a special love for art, he was, by the advice of his friend and tutor, articled to an architect in his native city. With his employer he was intimately associated with A. Pugin, Esq., in the revival of Gothic architecture in the kingdom. Religion early took possession of his heart: its claims upon him were stronger than those of his profession, which, at that time, was opening out to him the most tempting advantages. He elected to devote his energies to the service of God. In 1834 he entered the Wesleyan ministry, and soon was ranked among the most popular advocates of its missions and institutions. In circuit work, which occupied him thirty years, he returned to former circuits beyond what is usual, and three times was stationed three years at City Road, London. In 1856 he was selected to accompany Dr. Hannah as representative of the Conference to the M. E. Church of America, in which country he immediately established his reputation as an earnest and powerful preacher and speaker, and in acknowledgment of his acceptable service the honorary degree of D.D. was conferred upon him. After this Dr. Jobson was selected for the distinguished service of representing the English Wesleyan Conference in Australia. A most interesting narrative of this journey was published, under the title of "Australia, with Notes by the Way on Egypt, Ceylon, Bombay, and the Holy Land." Dr. Jobson is the author of an octavo volume on "Chapel and School Architecture," which in reality revolutionized the style of chapel and school buildings in England. Several other works by Dr. Jobson are named in "Bibliographical Notices." In 1864 he was appointed to take charge of Methodist publications, and has done much to elevate the character and extend the circulation of Wesleyan literature. In 1869 he was elected president of the Conference. Dr. Jobson still preaches as earnestly and powerfully as ever; not only in Methodist pulpits, but occasionally in others. He is a large-hearted and catholic-spirited man, and is the acknowledged friend of prominent men in the Established Church and of non-conformist ministers. Mrs. Jobson is in all respects the best and most complete complement to her husband, and accompanied him on his tour to Australia, etc.

Jocelyn, George Bemis, D.D., was born in New Haven, Conn., Jan. 3, 1824. His parents shortly after removed to Cincinnati, and then to New Albany, Ind. In 1838 he joined the M. E. Church in the latter place. In 1842 he graduated at Indiana Asbury University, and the following year was admitted into the Indiana Conference. Having filled a number of stations, he was transferred, in 1857, to Iowa, and stationed at Des Moines and Burlington. In 1861 he was elected president of the Iowa Wesleyan University, and in 1864 he was chosen president of Albion College, Michigan, in which post he remained, with the exception of two years spent in the pastorate at Grand Rapids, until his death. His great-grandfather was a Methodist preacher, and his father was long a class-leader. He was a member of the General Conference of 1872 and 1876; was an able educator and an eloquent preacher. He died suddenly in Albion, in 1877.

Johnson, Edward, a teacher in schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Lynn, Mass., April 20, 1831, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1856. He was afterwards teacher of Ancient Languages: in 1856, in the East Maine Conference Seminary; 1857, in the Providence Conference Seminary; 1858, in Amenia Seminary; 1862, in Pittsburgh Female College; in 1864, teacher of Ancient Languages and Natural History in Lassell Female Seminary; in 1865, preceptor of Stanstead Academy, Stanstead, P. Q.; and in 1868, proprietor of the Classical School at Lynn, Mass.

Johnson, Edwin A., D.D., was born at Gowanda, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1829; joined the M. E. Church at eleven years of age, and commenced to prepare for college, but owing to asthma was prevented from graduating. He was licensed to preach February, 1849; in 1852 entered the Erie Conference. He occupied important charges from that time till 1868, when he was elected associate editor of The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate. He is the author of "Money and Missions" (a prize tract), "Half Hour Studies of Life," and "The Live Boy, or Charley's Letters." He retired from editorial work in 1872, and is engaged in writing books and occasional papers for the periodical press of the church.

Johnson, Haines, was born in 1801, and died in Newbury, Vt., in 1856. At the age of twenty-eight he was converted, in 1830 entered the ministry, and the following year was admitted on trial in New Hampshire Conference of the M. E. Church, where he labored for twenty-five years. He was a successful preacher and an eminent pastor. "During the ten months previous to his death he made nine hundred pastoral visits. He was often heard to say, 'I am doing work for eternity.'"

Johnson, Harvey F., D.D., president of Whitworth Female College, Miss., was born in 1830,

and removed from North Carolina to Mississippi in 1849, where he studied law and commenced practice as an attorney. He served in the legislature, and one term as district attorney or State solicitor in the Second Judicial District. He entered the ministry in 1859, and filled prominent appointments, as also the office of presiding elder, and was a delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church South in 1874. In 1866 he accepted the presidency of Madison College, at Sharon, Miss., and in 1867 was elected president of Whitworth Female College, in which position he still remains. By his efforts the institution, which then numbered only 50 pupils, with buildings out of repair, and almost unfurnished, has now over 200 students, with three new buildings erected at a cost of some ten or twelve thousand dollars.

Johnson, Herman Merrills, D.D., late president of Dickinson College, was born Nov. 25, 1815, at Butternuts, Otsego Co., N. Y., and died April 5, 1868, at Carlisle, Pa. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1839, and was shortly afterwards elected Professor of Ancient Languages in St. Charles College, Missouri. In 1842 he was elected Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature in the Ohio Wesleyan University, and was, during the first year of his term of service, acting president of that institution. In 1850 he was chosen Professor of English Literature in Dickinson College, and in 1860, president of that institution. He was an industrious student of languages and philology, having begun his studies with modern Greek in 1839, and continued them with Hebrew, Anglo-Saxon, Gaelic, Arabic, Syriac, Ethiopic, Irish, and Welsh. He joined the North Ohio Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1845, and was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference in 1850. He contributed several articles to the Methodist Quarterly Review and other periodicals, and edited a work entitled "Orientalia Antiquaria Herodoti."

Johnson, Matthew, a distinguished layman of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born in Leeds in 1796, and died in Leeds on Jan. 12, 1864. Mr. Johnson may be regarded as one of the founders of the body, having taken an active part in the organ disputes of 1827,—a dispute which led to the secession of one thousand members in Leeds from the Wesleyan body, and the formation of the Protestant Methodist connection. This connection united with the Wesleyan Methodist Association on its organization in 1836, and Mr. Johnson was the first connectional secretary of the new body. On three other occasions he was honored with election to the same high office. He retired early in life from connectional office and honors, but, till his death, he took the deepest interest in the progress of the denomination. To the ecclesiasticism of the Free Churches Mr. Johnson was ardently attached. Of their principles he was the clear expounder and able defender. He was a sage in council, and his calm spirit and conciliatory disposition made him invaluable in cases of intricacy or difficulty.

Johnston, John, LL.D., a professor in Wesleyan University, was born at Bristol, Me., Aug. 25, 1806; was graduated from Bowdoin College in 1832, and was engaged as a teacher in the Oneida Conference Seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y., till 1835, when he was chosen principal of that institution. In the same year he was elected Adjunct Professor of Mathematics and Lecturer on Natural Science in Wesleyan University. In 1839 he was appointed Professor of Natural Science in the same institution. He has prepared, as text-books, editions of Turner's "Chemistry" and Turner's "Elements of Chemistry," a work on "Natural Philosophy" and a "Primary Natural Philosophy," which have been extensively used in the seminaries and colleges of the United States. He prepared, in 1873, a "History of the Towns of Bristol and Bremen, including the Ancient Pemaquid, Lincoln County, Me." He has been an occasional contributor to the American Journal of Science, the National Magazine, the Methodist Quarterly Review, and the New England Historical and Genealogical Register, and is a member of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences and of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Johnstown, N. Y. (pop. 3282), the capital of Fulton County. The town was named after Sir William Johnston, who, in 1771, contributed funds for building a court-house, jail, and an Episcopal church. When Methodism was introduced, Johnstown was included in the Mohawk circuit, which was one of the first organized in that part of New York. Johnstown circuit was organized in 1829, John Moriarty and Merritt Bates being appointed to that work. It was then in the New York Conference. They reported the following year 166 members. Subsequently it was for some time connected with Gloversville. It is now in the Troy Conference, and reports (1876) 275 members, 215 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

Johnstown, Pa. (pop. 6028), on the Pennsylvania Central Railroad, is situated at the foot of the western side of the Alleghany Mountains. Methodism was introduced in 1828, when Rev. Mr. Tudor preached in what was then a little village of about a dozen houses; and in the following November he organized a class. The first M. E. church edifice was a frame building, bought by the Methodists for a nominal sum, in which they worshiped for ten years, when it gave place to a small brick church, rebuilt in 1853. This was succeeded by a fine stone edifice, one of the best in the Pittsburgh Conference, in 1868. The second Methodist church was built of frame, in 1875. In 1833 Johnstown was included in the Conemaugh and Cambria mission, and first appears by name in 1835. It was then merged for a time in the Blairsville circuit, but reappears as a separate work in 1838. It is in the Pittsburgh Conference, and reports the following statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
First Church.....	620	700	$100,000
Second Church.....	89	362	10,000

John Street Church, N. Y., was the first church edifice built by the Methodists in the United States. Near the same time a small log building was erected in what is now Carroll Co., Md., but the ground was never purchased, and the building was never finished. The enterprise in New York was owing to the energy and activity of Barbara Heck, Philip Embury, and Captain Webb. Services had been held first in a private house, then in a rigging-loft, but the place becoming so small, ground was leased, in 1768, on John Street, where the present church stands, and a church was erected of rough stone, faced with plaster. It was 60 by 42 feet, and contained a fire-place and chimney in one corner, to have the appearance of a private house, because the law did not permit dissenters to erect regular churches. It is said the plan was suggested by Barbara Heck. Captain Webb contributed £30, and the citizens of New York contributed liberally to assist the infant church. Philip Embury, who was a carpenter, worked at the building, making the pulpit with his own hands, and preached in it the dedication sermon on the 30th of October, 1768.

OLD JOHN STREET M. E. CHURCH.

It remained for twenty-two years the only Methodist church in New York, until, in 1790, the Forsyth Street church was erected. It had the services of Embury and Webb until Richard Williams arrived, who preceded Boardman and Pilmoor. The pulpit was occupied by one of these until the arrival of Asbury and Wright, in 1771, and of Rankin, in 1773. During the Revolutionary War it suffered in common with other churches. No report of its membership was made for several years, though services were regularly maintained for a large part of the time. At the close of the Revolutionary War, in 1784, the congregation was re-organized, under the care of John Dickins, and in ten years grew from 60 members to over 800. In this church many of the fathers of Methodism preached. It was in its earlier period very plain and uninviting, the fire-place in one corner and gallery in the other end unfinished, and which was ascended for some time simply by a ladder. It had plain benches without backs. As the society increased in numbers it was more comfortably furnished. In 1817 it was torn down, and a large church was erected in its place, which continued to be for many years regarded as the chief church in the city of New York. As, however, population removed from the lower part of the city the congregation diminished, and finding the house larger than necessary, the building was taken down and a new edifice was erected, with stores on either side. This remains the present John Street church, which is now maintained rather and their decision is final. But the Annual Conference adopts its own methods of raising the moneys of which this board has control.

Joliet, Ill. (pop. 7263), the capital of Will County, named after Louis Joliet, one of the discoverers of the Mississippi. Methodist services were introduced in 1833, and the first church edifice was erected in 1837. It was rebuilt in 1850, and again in 1859. A mission church was erected in 1875, and the Richard Street church in 1877. Joliet circuit was organized in 1836, with Stephen R. Beggs as preacher in charge, who reported the following year 237 members. It is in the Rock River Conference, and has the following statistics:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1833	Ottawa.....	304	310	$24,000
1875	Centennial.....	108	230	2,500
1877	Richard Street.....	2,500

Jolley, Hooper, a delegate from the Delaware Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Dorchester Co., Md.; embraced religion in his tenth year; was appointed treasurer of the board of trustees of his church when a boy, and served in that position for fourteen years; was licensed to exhort in 1865, and to preach in 1866, and joined the Delaware Conference in 1867.

Jones, Hiram Augustus, professor in Lawrence University, was born Dec. 3, 1831, at Grafton, Mass.; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1853, and became in the same year a teacher in the Spring Hill Boarding-School, Sandwich, Mass. He was appointed a tutor in Lawrence University in 1857, and was afterwards chosen Adjunct Professor, then Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature in that institution. He was appointed superintendent of the public schools of Appleton, Wis., in 1867, and returned to his former professorship in Lawrence University in 1869. In 1872 and 1873 he held the office of county supervisor of Outagamie Co., Wis.

Jones, James, was born in England in 1790; emigrated to the United States in 1803; was converted in 1810, and in 1820 entered the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church. He afterwards located, but was re-admitted into the Indiana Conference in 1834, where he continued to labor until prostrated by disease. He died Nov. 7, 1856. "He was a sound divine, a man of great faith, a good pastor, and faithful as an itinerant Methodist preacher. Perhaps few preachers have been more successful in winning souls to Christ."

Jones, John A., a lay delegate from the Delaware Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Maryland, Sept. 1, 1803, and joined the church at

as a memorial church, and to accommodate the floating and poorer population of the lower part of the city. The accompanying engravings show the church as it was built in 1768, partly hidden by a small building, and also as it appears at present.

Joint Board of Finance is a financial committee peculiar to the M. E. Church South. It is appointed by the president of the Annual Conference, near the close of its session, and is to continue until the close of the next Conference. It consists of one ministerial member of the Conference and one layman for each presiding elder's district. 1. They are to receive and disburse according to their judgment all funds for superannuated preachers, and the widows and orphans of deceased members of the Conference. 2. They are to estimate the amount necessary to meet these claims and apportion the same to the districts. 3. All matters relating to the financial interest of the Conference are to be referred to this board. 4. They are to make a full report of all their proceedings to the Conference for adoption, modification, or rejection. 5. The recording steward of each charge is to report a full account of all the financial business of the charge to this board. This board decides all matters of difference between the stewards and the preachers or presiding elders, an early age. He has retired from business, and fills the offices of trustee, treasurer, and recording steward of his church.

Jones, John M., was born in England, and educated in France. He was reared under Roman Catholic influence, and identified himself with that church. When a young man he emigrated to Canada, and thence to America, where he was employed as a teacher in a Catholic institution in Prince George County, Md. A revival occurred in the vicinity, and at a camp-meeting, in 1834, he sought and found forgiveness of sin, and attached himself to the Methodist Episcopal Church. Notwithstanding many adverse threats, as well as persuasions, he remained firm and steadfast, and in 1836 entered the Baltimore Conference. His last illness was of short duration. He died in 1855, in the forty-fifth year of his age. He was a man of rare excellence and many virtues, and did the work of an evangelist zealously and acceptably.

Jones, Peter, an Indian minister, named in his own dialect, Kah-ke-wa-qo-ma-by, was the son of a provincial land surveyor and of the daughter of an Indian chief of the Ojibway nation. He was born Jan. 1, 1802, and was left to the care of a heathen mother until he was fourteen years of age, following the Indian customs, without any education, and speaking, with the exception of a few words, only the Indian language. In the year 1816 his father sent him to school at Salt Fleet, where he learned to "read, write, and cipher;" afterwards he removed among the Mohawks, where he was baptized and learned an Anglican catechism. When about twenty years of age he spent another winter at school. Through the labors of Seth Crawford, a young man from near Saratoga, who was teaching in the neighborhood, he was much impressed, and in 1823, at a camp-meeting in Ancaster, he was converted. Elder Case took a deep interest in him, and Rev. Alvin Torrey, being then a missionary, received him into one of his societies. He soon became an active exhorter, and was employed as an evangelist among the Indian tribes. In 1827 he was received on trial as a traveling preacher, in which work he continued until his death, which occurred near Brantford, Canada, June 28, 1856. He steadfastly adhered to the large body of the Canada Conference, and crossed the Atlantic three times, chiefly in the interest of Canadian missions. He was regarded as an intelligent, well-read Christian gentleman, and was a fair preacher in English, and very eloquent in his native tongue.

Jordan, William Harvey, was born at Birmingham, England, Jan. 20, 1832. He was brought up under Wesleyan influences. Arriving in America when seventeen years of age, he settled with his parents near Jacksonville, Morgan Co., Ill. In 1850 he was converted at a New Year's meeting in the Methodist Protestant church, under the preaching of Rev. R. F. Shinn. He immediately felt powerfully impressed that it was his duty to preach the gospel. He was then learning the carpenter trade, and shrank from the duty until 1853, when the "call" and conviction became so pressing that he was licensed as an exhorter, and soon after as a local preacher. In 1855, under an overwhelming sense of duty, he resigned all worldly pursuits and entered the itinerancy of the Methodist Protestant Church, where he continues to this time, 1877. By application to study he has made amends for the educational disadvantages of his early days. He is a frequent contributor to the church periodicals. In 1862 he enlisted in the United States army, but was rejected on account of poor health. He again entered, however, as chaplain of the 150th Illinois volunteers, and served till the end of the war. He was actively engaged in the anti-slavery movement before and during the War of the Rebellion. He has been twice president of the Annual Conference, and once member of the General Conference of the M. P. Church.

Jost, Cranswick, a professor in Mount Allison Wesleyan College, Sackville, N. B., was born in Guysborough, N. S., Aug. 25, 1858; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1862, and in the same year joined the Wesleyan Conference of Eastern British America. He performed pastoral work in the same Conference until 1867, when he was appointed vice-principal of Mount Allison Academy, and Professor of Hebrew, and Acting Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Mount Allison Wesleyan College.

Joyce, Isaac W., D.D., was born in Hamilton Co., O., Oct. 11, 1836. His parents removed to Tippecanoe Co., Ind., in the spring of 1850. He was converted and joined the church July 22, 1852, near Lafayette, Ind., was educated at the Hartsville University; and was admitted into the Northwest Indiana Conference, Oct. 4, 1859. He has filled some of the most important stations in his Conference, and was for four years presiding elder.

Judd, Charles W., missionary to India, was born Jan. 13, 1829. While quite young he was converted, and at once began to prepare for the Christian ministry. He studied in Elmira Academy, Cazenovia Seminary, and Charlotteville. He attended Cazenovia Seminary in 1850-51, and joined the Wyoming Conference in 1854. After five years of pastoral labor, he sailed with others, in 1859, as a missionary to India. Having spent ten years in earnest labor, and his health and that of Mrs. Judd requiring a vacation, they returned and spent two years, making missionary addresses, and in other ways assisting the missionary cause. In 1871 they returned again to India, and are now engaged in missionary labors.

Judd, Gaylord, was born in Connecticut, 1784: licensed as a local preacher in 1809, and in 1821 entered the Genesee Conference of the M. E. Church, which at that time covered a very extensive territory. His labors for twenty years were chiefly in the Susquehanna Valley. "He was a sound, practical, theological preacher, rightly dividing and judiciously applying the word of truth." In 1858 he was on his knees in family worship, when suddenly pausing, it was seen that he had fallen, and in a few moments his life was ended by apoplexy. Three of his sons have been called to the ministry, and one has been a missionary in India.

Judd, Orange, editor and publisher of The American Agriculturist, was born near Niagara Falls, N. Y., July 26, 1822. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1847, and afterwards, from 1850 to 1853, studied analytical and agricultural chemistry in the laboratory of Yale College. He taught in the High School at Portland, Conn., in 1847; was, in 1848 and 1849, teacher of Chemistry and Natural Science in the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass., and in 1852 and 1853 lectured on Agriculture in Windham Co., Conn. He became editor of The American Agriculturist in 1853, agricultural editor of The New York Times in 1855, and sole proprietor of The American Agriculturist in 1866. A German as well as an English edition of The American Agriculturist was begun in 1866. He served with the United States Christian Commission in 1863, and with the Sanitary Commission in 1864, and contracted in the latter service a dangerous illness. In 1868 and 1869 he was president of the New York, Flushing and North Side Railroad, and of the Flushing Railroad, L. I. He was elected president of the Alumni Association of the Wesleyan University in 1866; projected "The Alumni Record of the Wesleyan University," and published a preliminary edition of that work in 1868, and the first regular edition in 1869. He gave $100,000 as a fund for building the Orange Judd Hall of Natural Science of the Wesleyan University, for which ground was broken in 1869; the corner-stone of the building was laid in 1870, and the building itself was dedicated in 1871, all under his auspices. In connection with The American Agriculturist he has built up a large business in the publication of works on agriculture, horticulture, domestic and rural economy, domestic architecture, and cognate arts. His house, the Orange Judd Publishing Company, is the leading house in this branch of trade, and is, in fact, the only house extensively and exclusively devoted to the publication of the class of works which form its specialty.

Judicial Conferences.—Prior to the General Conference of 1872, in the trial of ministers, an appeal could only be taken to the ensuing General Conference. This body meeting but once in four years, oftentimes occasioned an inconvenient delay. The time occupied by the General Conference was also felt to be unnecessarily spent. In 1872, it was determined that each Conference should "select seven elders, men of experience and sound judgment in the affairs of the church, who should be known as 'Triers of Appeals;' and when notice of an appeal should be given to the bishop or president of an Annual Conference, he should proceed, with due regard to the wishes and rights of the appellant, to designate three Conferences conveniently near that from which the appeal is made, whose triers of appeals are constituted a Judicial Conference. It was made his duty to fix the time and place of the Conference, and to give notice thereof to all the parties concerned." In such proceedings the appellant has the right of peremptory challenge, yet so that the number of triers present shall not be reduced below thirteen, which number shall be required for a quorum. A bishop presides over the Judicial Conference, a secretary is appointed, and record made of the proceedings, which papers are to be forwarded to the ensuing General Conference. In all cases of appeal coming before the Judicial Conference, the parties are heard as to the grounds of appeal, and the Conference decides the case. The ensuing General Conference reviews only the decisions or questions of law contained in the records, and in the documents transmitted from these Judicial Conferences. In case of serious error, the General Conference has the power to take such action as it deems that justice and equity require. In case of appeal from Annual Conferences in the United States not easily accessible, the president may select triers from other Conferences than those named. Appeals from Conferences outside of the United States may be heard by Judicial Conferences, called to meet at or near New York by the bishop in charge of such Conference, or they may be made directly to the General Conference. In case of a charge against a bishop in the interim of the General Conference, one of the bishops shall convene a Judicial Conference, to be composed of the triers of appeals of five neighboring Conferences; and this Judicial Conference has full power to try the accused bishop, and to suspend him from the functions of his office, or to expel him from the church, as they may deem his offense requires. The accused has the right of peremptory challenge, yet so that the number shall not be reduced below twenty-one. He has the right of an appeal to the ensuing General Conference. The expenses of such bodies are, under the order of the General Conference, met from the Book Concern.

"Justification is the act of God's free grace, by which he absolves a sinner from guilt and punishment, and accepts him as righteous, on account of the atonement of Christ." In the Ninth Article of Religion of the Methodist Episcopal Church the doctrine is thus set forth: "We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or deservings. Wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine, and very full of comfort." Justification in the New Testament is synonymous with the pardon or remission of sin, the non-imputation of sin, and the imputation of righteousness. It is an act of grace to the sinner: it is the decree of God declaring his pardon, and is a decision consistent with law, and based upon certain conditions. This decision does not, of itself, effect a change in the character of the sinner. To make a man just as to character is a work of grace in the soul wrought by the Holy Spirit. This is called regeneration; but justification is the pardon of sin,—a change of relation by which the sinner is treated as righteous before God. It is not, as the Romanists teach, "the remission of sin and the infusion of new habits of grace," but refers to the relation and not to the character of the sinner. The effect upon the sinner is not subjective, as in regeneration and sanctification. It is something done for him, but not in him. "Justification is a work done for the sinner, changing his relations to law: but regeneration is a work of the Holy Spirit wrought in the mind of the sinner, changing his moral and religious character." The one is to treat a sinner as he would be treated if he were a just man; the other is to make him a just man.

Mr. Wesley affirms "by justification we are saved from the guilt of sin, and restored to the favor of God; by sanctification we are saved from the power and root of sin, and restored to the image of God."

Justification and regeneration are contemporary "in the evidence of consciousness. But in order of thought, faith is first, justification second, and regeneration third." And sometimes the work of the latter is described in the Scripture in terms of the former.

The atonement of Christ is the meritorious cause of the sinner's justification. His life and death become to us the ground of our acceptance with God. "In consideration of this sacrifice God hath now reconciled the world to himself, not imputing to them their former trespasses. For the sake of his well-beloved Son, of what he hath done and suffered for us, God now vouchsafes, on one only condition (which he also enables us to perform), both to remit the punishment due to our sins and to reinstate us in his favor."—Wesley's Sermons, vol. i. pp. 45, 46. The condition of justification is faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. Christ by his active and passive obedience has fulfilled the demands of God's violated law. He has made full satisfaction for the sins of all men, so that God can now consistently offer salvation to all men on the conditions laid down in the gospel. Faith is that condition. Christ is the procuring cause. The redemption in him is possible for all men when that faith is exercised. Faith that justifies is not a substitute for righteousness, but rather an act of obedience to the command of God, by which the sinner is exonerated from suffering of punishment. The believer is saved from penalty, and he stands before God as a righteous man.

Faith as the only condition of justification before God is the distinctive doctrine of Protestantism: separating it from the teachings of the Roman Catholic Church, which affirms faith to be only "assent, and neither the" formal nor "instrumental cause of justification, and the church to be the" general, and the sacraments the especial means by which man is justified. Methodism teaches justification in distinction from the Calvinian Churches, as antecedent to regeneration.

Kaffraria is a country on the southeastern coast of Africa, adjoining the Cape Colony. It is under the control of the English government, though inhabited chiefly by the Kaffirs and Zooloos. The Wesleyans of England established missions among them in 1824. The frontier wars broke them up

There is also an African M. E. Church society, which dedicated a church in 1876. It is in the Michigan Conference, and with the following statistics:

in 1845, and again in 1848. They have since that time had remarkable success in bringing the population under the influence of the Cape Colony. They have built a large number of churches, many of which are very primitive in their style, and they have also founded a number of schools, which have been instrumental in educating and civilizing the natives. Butterworth, of which an engraving is given, and which was named after an eminent Englishman, is the residence of one missionary and eight native evangelists. It reported, in 1875, 626 members.

Kalamazoo, Mich. (pop. 9181), is the capital of Kalamazoo County, and is a flourishing city. Methodist services were introduced in 1832 by J. F. Robe. It was then connected with the Indiana Conference, and reported the following year 156 members. The first church was built in 1842. In 1867 this church was sold, and a new and beautiful edifice was commenced, which was dedicated in 1869.

Kansas (pop. 364,399) is a part of the Louisiana purchase, and embraces an area of 81,318 square miles. Its admission as a State caused a long and bitter controversy on the subject of slavery. In 1820 an act had been passed by Congress prohibiting slavery from the territory north of 36° 30'. In 1854 a bill was presented in Congress to organize two Territories, to be called Kansas and Nebraska, with a provision that the act of 1820 should not apply to these Territories. The question excited the nation, but notwithstanding the bill became a law. The population from the North and from the South flowed rapidly into the Territory, each desirous of getting its control. The first election resulted in the triumph of the pro-slavery interest, and prepared what was known as the Lecompton constitution. The free party assembled in 1859 and prepared a constitution excluding slavery, and the State was finally admitted under this constitution in 1861. This struggle in Kansas was, in fact, the commencement of the struggle with slavery that terminated only during the Civil War. The excitement greatly retarded the spread of religious influence in the State, but after the settlement the population increased with rapidity, and the various churches had a rapid growth.

Methodism was introduced into Kansas by missionaries from the Missouri Conference among the Indians in that Territory about 1830, the Arkansas district forming a part of the Missouri Conference. Indian missions were organized among the Cherokees, Creeks, and other Indians at that date. The following year Kansas missions were particularly mentioned, with Joseph Edmundson as superintendent, and Thomas and William Johnson, missionaries. In 1835, W. Johnson was appointed both to the mission and the school. In 1837, Johnson reported for Kansas mission 3 whites and 1 Indian, and for Indian mission 22 whites and 502 Indians. At the separation of the church, in 1845, the Indian missions were taken charge of by the M. E. Church South. At the Iowa Conference of the M. E. Church, in 1854, a Nebraska and Kansas mission district was organized, and Fort Leavenworth was marked to be supplied. The same year this district was connected with the Missouri Conference, and Fort Leavenworth, Kickapoo mission, Fort Scott, Fort Riley, and Wakarusa mission, were marked as appointments. The following year the Kansas district was reported as embracing 773 members, besides 127 Indians. In 1856 the Kansas and Nebraska Conference was formed, and the work was increased so that in 1860 the Kansas Conference was separated from it. There are now in Kansas two Conferences, which reported, in 1876, 201 itinerant and 275 local preachers, 26,528 members, 17,652 Sunday-school scholars, 107 churches, valued at $290,600, and 81 parsonages, valued at $45,950. The Baker University, which is yet, however, in its infancy, has been established at Baldwin City (see BAKER UNIVERSITY), and has done a good work for that growing State. The German Methodists are also well represented in the State. The M. E. Church South has about 2000 members, and the Methodist Protestants have about 1500. The African M. E. Church has organized a Conference, which reports 31 preachers, 2279 members, with 27 churches and 3 parsonages, valued at $45,750. The statistics of the various denominations were reported in the United States census of 1870 as follows:

Kansas City, Mo. (pop. 32,260), is situated near the western line of the State, on the Missouri River, and is, next to St. Louis, the most populous city in the State. It was not in existence at the time of the separation of the M. E. Church South, in 1845, but the surrounding region was embraced within its bounds. Services were early introduced into the growing village, and as early as 1858 the M. E. Church South reported 79 members, with E. T. Peery as pastor. It is mentioned in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1859, but no pastor was appointed. It was probably previously in connection with other appointments. In 1860, 35 members were reported, but no church or Sunday-school building for the M. E. Church. In 1861 a church was erected, costing about $1000, and it became a station, with 47 members. During the war which followed little progress was made, as the city was on the border and constantly exposed. For some time it was connected with Independence. Since the war the churches have added other organizations, and the M. E. Church has grown rapidly. The statistics are as follows:

Kansas Conference.—The Kansas and Nebraska Conference was organized by the General Conference of 1856, and included Kansas and Nebraska Territories, with that part of the Territories of New Mexico and Utah lying east of the Rocky Mountains. The first session of the Conference was held at Nebraska City, April 16, 1857, Bishop Ames presiding. The statistics for the Territory included within the above-named boundaries were 29 traveling preachers, 1182 members, 4 churches, valued at $11,900, and 1 parsonage, valued at $200; no Sunday-schools were reported. In 1860 the Territory was divided, and the Kansas Conference embraced “the State or Territory of Kansas and the State of Texas, and that portion of New Mexico east of the Rocky Mountains.” In 1864 the boundaries were limited, and the Kansas Conference embraced “the State of Kansas,” and the following year reported 66 traveling and 112 local preachers, with 5423 members. In 1872 the boundaries were made to include not only the State of Kansas, but “so much of the Indian Territory on the south thereof as lies north of the 36th parallel of north latitude.” At the same time permission was given to the Kansas Conference “to divide its territory during the next four years if it judged best and the presiding bishop concurred.” In conformity with this permission the Kansas Conference of 1873 resolved to divide. The first session after the division the Conference met at Atchison. The boundaries of the Kansas Conference now embrace “that portion of the State of Kansas lying north of the south line of township sixteen, including the town of Pomona, which lies south of said line, but which leave Lonisburg, Ottawa, and Baldwin City lying north of said line, in the South Kansas Conference. Baldwin City shall belong to South Kansas Conference after the session of said Conference in 1877." Baldwin City, the seat of Baker University, is near the boundary line of the two Conferences, and has been placed alternately in Kansas and in the South Kansas Conference, as both Conferences are the daughter of Dr. Thomas Hinde, so well known in early Western Methodist history. In his boyhood he was apprenticed to the printing business, which was conducted by the Rev. John Lyle, of the Presbyterian Church. In his sixteenth year he was converted, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was admitted on trial in the Kentucky Conference in 1823, and has been patronizing territories. The statistics for 1876 were as follows: 100 preachers, 12,138 members, 8450 Sunday-school scholars, 60 churches, valued at $176,100, 34 parsonages, valued at $17,750.

Kansas Conference, Methodist Protestant Church, was reported, in 1877, as embracing 37 itinerant and 32 unstationed ministers, 1542 members, and a church and parsonage valued at $1440.

Kavanaugh, Hubbard Hinde, D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Clark Co., Ky., Jan. 14, 1802. His father was of Irish descent. His mother was an effective Methodist minister, filling many of the most prominent appointments, for fifty-four years. He was elected bishop at the General Conference in 1854, which sat at Columbus, Ga., and has been active in the discharge of the duties of his office from that period to the present. As a preacher and as an administrator he ranks deservedly high in his church.

Keeling, Isaac, an English Wesleyan minister, was born in 1789; was received as a probationer for the ministry in 1811, and for more than half a century he continued in active service.

The last six years of his life were spent in retirement. As a public man, Mr. Keeling had the confidence of his brethren. His clear judgment, practical sagacity, and loyalty served the connection in many offices of trust, especially in the presidential chair. He died in the "quietness and confidence" of faith in Jesus, in 1869.

Keener, John Christian, D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Baltimore, Md., Feb. 7, 1819. When he was nine years of age he was taken by Wilbur Fisk, who was visiting at the house of his father, to Wilbraham Academy, and who kept him under his care for three years. When the Wesleyan University was established he removed with Dr. Fisk, Cheshire County, and situated on the Cheshire Railroad. This place was originally enrolled in the older Methodist circuits in New England. It does not appear by name until 1838, when E. B. Morgan was sent to Keene mission, who reported, in 1839, 39 members, and Nelson was connected with it. In 1841 it was connected with Chesterfield, and reported 120 members. In 1852 a church was erected, which gave way, in 1868, to a new and beautiful edifice. It is in the New Hampshire Conference, and has 325 members, 300 scholars, and $40,000 church property.

who was its first president, and was a member of the first regular class formed in the Wesleyan University, graduating in 1835. He was converted in Baltimore in 1838, and served as superintendent of a Sunday-school in Wesley chapel charge for two years; and in this work he felt the divine call to preach. After returning from college, he engaged in a wholesale drug-store, and was doing a prosperous and successful business, when he resolved to close up his business and abandon secular pursuits. He was licensed to preach in Alabama, and was admitted into the Conference in 1843. In 1848 he was sent to New Orleans, which was then considered not only a difficult but a dangerous post. He remained there twenty years, being successively pastor of the Poydras Street, Carondelet Street, and Felicite Street churches, and presiding elder of the New Orleans district. He was also from 1866 editor of The New Orleans Christian Advocate. He was elected and ordained bishop in May, 1870. Since that period he has traveled extensively in the discharge of his episcopal duties, has several times visited Mexico, and has taken a deep interest in the Mexican mission.

Keighly, Joshua, was a native of Yorkshire, England, and was converted in his youth. He was admitted into the Conference in 1780, and was ordained by Mr. Wesley in 1786, and sent to preach in Scotland. The following year he was appointed to Edinburgh and Glasgow, but died Aug. 10, 1787. He administered the sacrament at Elgin two weeks before his death.

Kelk, William, the son of one of the early Methodist preachers of England, was imbued with a love for the spirit and usages of old Methodism. He merits the gratitude of all generations of Methodists for the inception of the most valuable economical scheme in the organization, and which, as chapel secretary, he for many years worked out. He sacrificed his health to his exertions. He had a firm trust in the atonement, and his end was peace in 1866.

Keller, Frederick K., was born near Frankfurt-on-the-Main, Germany, in 1829; received a common school education in Germany, and was converted in New York in 1850. He has been for years a class-leader and trustee, and an active member of the new German M. E. church, Fortieth Street, in that city. He engaged in mercantile life as a provision dealer, and in 1872 he spent considerable time in Europe, especially in Germany and Switzerland. He was elected lay delegate to represent the Central German Conference at the General Conference of 1872.

Kelly, Charles H., an English Wesleyan preacher, entered the ministry in 1857; was the president's assistant the following year. Deeply interested in army and navy work, he spent eleven years in Aldershot, Chatham garrison, Sheerness, and Chelsea. In 1875 he was appointed to the charge of the connectional Sunday-School Union, just then inaugurated, as its secretary and editor. For this post he is eminently qualified, and has already done good service; in a word, the department was fitted for him and he for the department.

Kelso, George W., a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Louisa Co., Va., in 1815, and died Aug. 10, 1843. He was educated at the Nashville University, and was received into the Tennessee Conference in 1835, and was transferred to the Virginia Conference in 1842. He was a faithful and successful minister.

Kelso, Thomas, Esq., of Baltimore, Md., was born Aug. 28, 1784, in Clones, Ireland, and emigrated to the United States in 1791. He was converted in his childhood, but did not join the church until in 1807. He has ever been an active member, and a cheerful and liberal supporter of all its interests and enterprises. Among other gifts may be mentioned $12,000 to the Church Extension Society, about $14,000 to the Metropolitan church at Washington, and $7000 to the Mount Vernon Place church, Baltimore. More recently he has purchased property and endowed an asylum for taking care of the orphans of the church, at a cost of $120,000. He has ever shunned civil office, but was prevailed upon to serve several terms in the Baltimore City Councils. In the business community he has accepted various places of trust, and is now president of the Equitable Insurance Society, vice-president and director of the First National Bank of Baltimore, and principal director and the largest stockholder in the Baltimore Steam Packet Company and the Seaboard and Roanoke Railroad Company, and has for some thirty-seven years been a director in the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company. He has held various official positions in the church, and is now the president of the Preachers' Aid Society, and of the Male Free School and Colored Institute, and is a trustee and manager in others. Though far advanced in life he is still active, and devoted to all the interests of the church.

Kendrick, Bennett, a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Virginia; entered the traveling connection in 1789; filled a number of stations, and served as presiding elder. He died April 5, 1807. He was a studious and skillful minister.

Kennaday, John, D.D., was born in New York, Nov. 3, 1800. He learned the printing business, but devoted all his leisure to literary pursuits. He joined the New York Conference in 1823, and subsequently filled prominent appointments in Philadelphia, Wilmington, Newark, New York, and Brooklyn. Of the forty years of his ministerial life, twenty-two were spent in five churches. "He was eminent in his gifts, in his attainments, and in his devotion to his sacred calling, and in the seals God gave to his ministry." He died Nov. 13, 1863.

Kennedy, William Magee, was born in 1783, in what is now Tennessee. In 1803 he was converted, and received by the South Carolina Conference in 1805. After filling important appointments for more than thirty years, he was struck with apoplexy in 1839, and died in 1840. He was a prudent, devoted, and earnest minister.

Kennerly, Philip, a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Virginia, Oct. 18, 1769, and entered the Baltimore Conference in 1804. On account of disease in the throat he located in 1806; re-entered the Kentucky Conference in 1821, and died the following October. "But his work was done; his temporalities well adjusted; his slaves emancipated; and his sun went down without a cloud."

Kenney, Wesley, D.D., was born May 8, 1808, in Washington Co., Pa., and died in Smyrna, Del., June 24, 1875. In his nineteenth year he was converted, and was admitted on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference in 1832. After serving several charges, in 1852 he was transferred to Newark Conference, and served Central church and Clinton Street church, Newark. In 1855 he was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, and served successively important charges. Because of failing health he was left without an appointment in 1866. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1848 and 1872. Dr. Kenney was well educated, although he had not a collegiate training. As a preacher he was very popular. His grace of oratory and embellishments of language, his pathos, clearness, and deep spirituality, rendered him effective in the pulpit. The later years of his life were passed in physical weakness.

Kenosha, Wis. (pop. 4309), the capital of Kenosha County, on Lake Michigan, is a city of comparatively recent origin. Methodism was introduced in 1837, when the town was called Southport. The society built its house of worship in 1843, and has since remodeled and enlarged it. A parsonage was built in 1845. There is also a German Methodist service established in this place. It is in the Wisconsin Conference, and reports:

Kent, Asa, a minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Massachusetts, May 9, 1780, and joined the New York Conference in 1802. The following year he entered the New England Conference. He filled a number of important appointments, and was presiding elder of the New London district and a delegate to the General Conferences of 1812 and 1816. He died Sept. 1, 1860. He wrote considerably for the church papers, and his writings were characterized by clearness and spirituality.

Kentucky (pop. 1,321,011) was the first Western State formed after the adoption of the Constitution. Daniel Boone is said to have been the first white settler. A portion of the State had been explored as early as 1754, but the Indians were so numerous and hostile that the settlement was very difficult. In 1792 it was admitted into the Union. At the Baltimore Conference of 1786, Bishop Asbury appointed James Haw and Benjamin Ogden as missionaries to Kentucky. They had been preceded, however, by Francis Clark, a local preacher from Virginia, who had emigrated in 1783, and had settled in the neighborhood of Danville. He was diligent and successful, and was assisted by William A. Thomson, from North Carolina, who settled in the same neighborhood, and subsequently became a member of the Ohio Conference. The next preachers who visited Kentucky were Nathaniel Harris, from Virginia, and Gabriel and Daniel Whitefield, from the Red Stone country. Harris settled in Jessamine County, and the Whitefields in Fayette. Philip Taylor and Joseph Furgeson were also among the earliest local preachers, and Furgeson's meeting-house was one of the first erected in that part of the State. Francis Clark, however, is entitled to the honor of being the founder of Methodism in Kentucky. He settled in Mercer County, and organized the first class in the State, about six miles from Danville. Haw and Ogden arrived in the latter part of 1786, and at the Conference in 1787, reported 90 members from Kentucky. The work was divided into two circuits: one charge was called Kentucky, to which Haw was returned, with two assistants; the other was called Cumberland, to which Ogden was appointed; and after laboring one year, he extended the Cumberland circuit so as to embrace what is now known as Southern Tennessee and a small portion of Kentucky. The Kentucky circuit included the whole of Kentucky except the small part embraced in Cumberland, and the following year 480 members were returned. Great success attended the pioneer preachers as they traveled around their vast circuits. In the spring of 1790, Bishop Asbury made his first visit to the State, and held the first annual Conference in that region. He was accompanied by Richard Whatecoat, Hope Hull, and John Seawell. The Conference met at Masterson station, about five miles north of Lexington, where the first Methodist church in Kentucky, a plain log structure, was erected. The Conference was composed of but six members. It lasted two days, during which time they planned a school to be entitled Bethel, and raised a subscription of £300 for its establishment. In 1796, in the minutes there were reported from Kentucky 1750 members. The growth of Methodism in Kentucky, however, was not equal to what it was in Ohio and the States generally of the Northwest. The Presbyterians early founded seminaries, and a large number emigrated from the Eastern States. The Baptists also were eminently successful, and have been from an early period the most numerous denomination of Christians in the State. In 1823, Augusta College was established, being the first Methodist college, after the destruction of Cokesbury, in the United States; but though prosperous for a time, yet, owing to border troubles, the institution has passed away. (See AUGUSTA COLLEGE.) For a short time the Kentucky Conference had the control of the Transylvania University, at Lexington, but relinquished it after a few years.

Kentucky adhered, in 1845, to the South; a few congregations, however, preferred to adhere to the Methodist Episcopal Church, and services were established among them. At present there are two Conferences of the M. E. Church South in Kentucky, to wit: the Louisville and Kentucky Conferences, embracing 218 traveling and 214 local preachers, with 48,821 members and 19,038 Sunday-school scholars. Louisville Conference alone has 300 churches, valued at $613,860, and 38 parsonages, valued at $49,650. The M. E. Church has a Kentucky Conference, which reports 96 traveling and 170 local preachers, 20,440 members, with 8793 Sunday-school scholars, 174 churches, valued at $418,464, and 16 parsonages, valued at $26,050. The larger part of the Lexington Conference, embracing the colored membership, is in this State, and reports about 5600 members, with church property amounting to $77,000. There are also several German churches, numbering 1000 members. The African M. E. Church has a Conference, which reports 5226 members, with a church property of $115,700. The African M. E. Zion Church has also a Conference, which reports about 3000 members, but several of its appointments are in adjacent States. The Colored Church of America reports a Conference, but its statistics are not at hand. According to the tables published in the United States census of 1870, the various denominations stand relatively as follows:

Kentucky Conference, African M. E. Church, includes the State of Kentucky. At its session in 1876 it stationed 57 preachers, and reported 63 local preachers, 5226 members, 55 churches, valued at $115,730, and $145 for missions.

Kentucky Conference, African M. E. Zion Church, was organized in Kentucky in 1863. It reported at the Conference in 1876, 30 traveling and 64 local preachers and exhorters, 2990 members, 1406 Sunday-school scholars, and 34 churches, valued at $55,375.

Kentucky Conference, M. E. Church.—The Conference which had existed in the State of Kentucky in connection with the M. E. Church, adhered South in 1845. In 1852 the General Conference authorized the formation of the Kentucky Conference, which held its first session in connection with the Cincinnati Conference, under the presidency of Bishop Janes, and met for the first time as a separate Conference in 1853. In 1856 its boundaries were arranged by the General Conference so as to include the State of Kentucky, except so much as was included in the West Virginia Conference. In 1876 the boundaries were changed, so as to include simply the State of Kentucky. The first session of the old Kentucky Conference was held at Lexington, Sept. 18, 1821, and, in connection with the Ohio Conference, measures were commenced to found Augusta College. (See AUGUSTA COLLEGE.) Long prior to that time an academy had been established at Bethel, but it had not proved a success. Since the organization of the Kentucky Conference, in 1852, no literary institution has been established within its bounds. The latest statistics (1876) are 20,440 members, 8793 Sunday-school scholars, 174 churches, valued at $418,464, and 16 parsonages, valued at $26,050.

Kentucky Conference, M. E. Church South, was constituted in 1845, by the adherence of the Kentucky Conference of the M. E. Church to the Southern organization. It had originally been formed in 1820, and at that time embraced the Kentucky, Salt River, Green River, and Cumberland districts, and that part of Virginia which was in the Greensburg and Monroe circuits, with the Little Kanawha and Middle Island circuits, which belonged to Ohio. In 1824 its boundaries were changed to embrace the State of Kentucky, and that part of Tennessee which was north of the Cumberland River. At the separation of the church, being on the border, the societies were to some extent divided, though the vast majority adhered to the Church South. In 1846 it reported 97 traveling and 145 local preachers, 21,550 white and 5151 colored members. The growth of the church has been fair throughout the State, but during the Civil War religious progress was greatly retarded. The Conference now embraces only a part of the State, the Louisville Conference having been organized from it. The boundaries as fixed by the General Conference of 1844 are, "all that portion of the State of Kentucky, not included in the West Virginia Conference, lying north and east of the following line: beginning at the mouth of Harrod's Creek, on the Ohio River; thence running south on the northern line of the Middletown and Jefferson circuits to the Bardstown turnpike road; thence with said turnpike to Bardstown; thence with the direct road to Springfield; thence to the towns of Wellsville and Liberty; thence due south to the Cumberland River; thence up said river to the fork; thence up the south fork to the Tennessee State line, including Liberty." It reported, in 1875, 107 traveling and 111 local preachers, 19,306 white and 117 colored members, and 8375 Sunday-school scholars.

Kentucky Conference, Methodist Protestant Church, reported at the Convention in 1877, 18 itinerant and 3 unstationed ministers, with 1795 members.

Keokuk, Iowa (pop. 12,766), is situated in Lee County, on the Mississippi River. Methodism was very early introduced into this part of the State by ministers from Illinois. It first appears by name in the minutes of 1846 as connected with the Des Moines district, of which M. Jennison was presiding elder and L. B. Dennis pastor. There are now two charges in the city. The German Methodists have a society and the African M. E. Church has a congregation. It is in the Iowa Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Kershaw, James, was among the first itinerant Methodist preachers in England. He wrote a comment on the Book of Revelation, in the form of dialogue, which was at the time favorably received.

Key West, Fla. (pop. 5016), is on the southern point of Florida, and contains a number of Spanish inhabitants. Methodism was introduced into this city prior to 1844, as at that date 73 members were reported. It was then connected with Georgia Conference, but without a ministerial supply. In 1845 a Florida Conference was organized; it reported to that body 45 members, and Alexander Graham was sent as pastor. Methodism is now well represented in the city. The M. E. Church South has two churches, the first is a commodious brick edifice, having 254 members, and Spark's chapel 193. There is also an African M. E. Church, with 171 members, 45 scholars, and church property valued at $2000.

Keyes, Josiah, of the Oneida Conference, was born in Canajoharie, N. Y., Dec. 30, 1799. He was converted at twelve years of age: was admitted on trial in the Genesee Conference in 1820, and filled a number of appointments with great acceptability and usefulness. He died April 10, 1836. He was a diligent student, acquired a knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and was a powerful preacher.

Kidder, Daniel Parish, D.D., was born at Darien, N. Y., Oct. 18, 1815, and graduated at Wesleyan University, Middletown, in 1836. He was teacher of languages in Amenia Seminary, New York, immediately subsequent to his graduation, and in the same year joined the Genesee Conference, and was stationed at Rochester, N. Y. In 1837 he went as missionary to Brazil, and during 1839 traversed the whole eastern coast, from San Paulo to Para. He introduced and circulated the Scriptures in the Portuguese in all the principal cities of the empire, and preached the first Protestant sermon ever delivered on the waters of the Amazon. He returned to the United States in 1840, and was transferred to the New Jersey Conference, being stationed at Paterson and afterwards at Trenton. In 1844 he was appointed official editor of Sunday-school publications and tracts, and corresponding secretary of the Sunday-School Union of the M. E. Church,—a post which he held for twelve years. Besides editing The Sunday-School Advocate, he compiled and edited more than eight hundred volumes of books for the Sunday-school libraries. He was likewise the organizer of the Conference Sunday-School Unions, and one of the originators of Sunday-school conventions and institutes. In 1851 the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on him by McKendree College, and subsequently by the Wesleyan University. In 1852-53 he traveled in Europe, making special observations upon Sunday-schools and religious education. In 1856 he was appointed Professor of Practical Theology in Garrett Biblical Institute, at Evanston, Ill., where he remained until 1871, when he was called to a like chair in Drew Theological Seminary, at Madison, N. J., where he still remains (1877). He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1852 and 1868, and a member of the general centenary committee in 1865. His publications include a translation from the Portuguese of Feijo, entitled "Demonstration of the Necessity of abolishing a constrained Clerical Celibacy," "Mormonism and the Mormons," "Sketches of a Residence and Travels in Brazil;" conjointly with Rev. J. C. Fletcher, "Brazil and the Brazilians," "Homiletics," "The Christian Pastorate," and "Helps to Prayer."

Kier, Samuel M., Esq., was born near Saltsburg, Pa., in 1813, but subsequently removed to Pittsburgh, where he engaged in extensive business, and where he died. For a number of years he was interested in transportation companies, and subsequently in the manufacture of fire-brick and pottery, and in coal- and iron-mining and manufacture. In 1844 he discovered oil at his salt-works, and established a refinery, which was the beginning of the immense oil trade in Western Pennsylvania. He was the first to refine petroleum for illuminating purposes, and sold the first lamps for burning. In 1840 he was converted, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, and subsequently served as steward, class-leader, Sunday-school superintendent, and trustee. He was also a liberal donor to its various enterprises, aided in building a number of church edifices, and contributed freely to the missionary cause. He also founded the Kier professorship in Pittsburgh Female College, and continued to be an active member of Christ church until near his death, which took place in November, 1874.

Kilham, Alexander, the founder of the New Connection Methodists, was born at Epworth, Lincolnshire, England, in 1762, and united with the Conference in 1785. He was for a time a good and useful preacher. In 1794 he became dissatisfied with the economy of the Wesleyan societies, and issued several pamphlets, some of which were anonymous, attacking the preachers, terming the government popery and priestcraft. In 1796, having published some very severe reflections on the ministers, he was called before the Conference and requested to substantiate his charges. Failing to do this, he was excluded by the unanimous judgment of the whole body. The following year he was joined by three other traveling preachers and a few local preachers, who formed a separate church, calling themselves the New Itinerancy, or the New Connection. He died suddenly, July 20, 1798.

Kilner, John, an English minister, has spent many years in most effective work in continental India and Ceylon, and is now (1877) one of the secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

Kimball, J. C., an active business man in Atlanta, Ga., served as lay delegate to represent the Georgia Conference in the General Conference of 1872.

Kincaid, James T., Esq., was born in Alleghany Co., Pa., Nov. 22, 1800. Having learned the tin and sheet-iron business, he became, from an employee, a partner, and subsequently sole owner of a large business, in which he continued until he passed his threescore and ten years. He joined the Smithfield Street church, Pittsburgh, Nov. 23, 1832, and was identified with Liberty Street station from its separate organization. He has held the offices of steward, class-leader, and treasurer for forty-two years, and was trustee for about thirty years. He was appointed by the city councils as guardian of the poor, and has served twenty-five years, seven of which he was president of the board. He has also been a manager of the City Hospital and of Dixmont Hospital for the Insane, and is a director in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and a trustee in the city gas-works.

Kincaid, William H., A.M., a local preacher and editor in Pittsburgh, was born in that city Feb. 2, 1825; entered business life in 1839, and united with the Liberty Street M. E. church in 1840. While engaged in active business he was for many years assistant editor of The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, and for five years has spent nearly his entire time in editorial and business departments. He was licensed to preach in 1847. Was for many years a special contributor to the Christian Advocate, The Western Christian Advocate, and other prominent religious and secular papers. He was a special contributor to the daily Christian Advocate at the General Conference of 1872, and assistant editor of that paper in 1876. For twenty years he has been secretary of the National Local Preachers' Association, and for over a score of years an official member and secretary of the stewards' and leaders' meetings in Liberty Street church, and connected with its school since 1831. He has been president of the Young Men's Bible Society of the city, and president of the Young Men's Christian Association.

REV. WILLIAM H. KINCAID, A.M.

King, John, was one of the earliest Methodist preachers in America. He arrived in Philadelphia in August, 1770, claiming to have been a local preacher in Europe. Not having any letter from Mr. Wesley, Mr. Pilmoor declined to receive him. He began religious services, however, on the commons, and on the following Sunday preached to a great multitude in the "potter's fields." Mr. Pilmoor seeing his energy and devotion invited him to preach in the church, and gave him license. He immediately passed into Delaware, and thence into Baltimore, being the first to introduce Methodism into that city. His first sermon was delivered from a blacksmith's block, at the junction of Front and French Streets, and under it Mr. James Baker, deputy surveyor of the county, was awakened, and was shortly afterwards converted. His next attempt to preach was at the corner of Baltimore and Calvert Streets, where he stood on a table; but it being a day of militia training, a large number being intoxicated, the table was overturned, and he was only saved from further insult by the interference of the captain. Possessing great energy and earnestness, he went like a flame of fire throughout the country; but his manner of preaching was too boisterous. In 1775, Mr. Wesley addressed him a remarkable letter, saying, "Scream no more at the peril of your soul. God now warns you by me, whom he has set over you. Speak as earnestly as you can, but do not scream. Speak with all your heart, but with a moderate voice. It was said of our Lord, 'he shall not cry.' The word properly means, he shall not scream. Herein be a follower of me, as I am of Christ. I often speak loud, even vehemently; but I never scream: I never strain myself; I dare not; I know it would be a sin against God and my own soul." Not long after Bishop Ashbury heard him preach, and says, "He preached a good and profitable sermon, but long and loud enough." In 1777 his name appears for the last time in the minutes as preaching in North Carolina. He located and lived in Raleigh, in that State, where he died not long afterwards.

King, Joseph Elijah, D.D., Ph. D., principal of the Fort Edward Institute, was born in Laurens, Otsego Co., N. Y., Nov. 30, 1823. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1847, and became, in the same year, teacher of Natural Science, and in 1848 principal and teacher of Latin in the Vermont Conference Seminary, Newbury, Vt. He joined the Vermont Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1849. In 1854 he was appointed principal of the Fort Plain Seminary, N. Y., and in 1855 became principal and joint financial manager of the Fort Edward Institute, N. Y. He was made sole financial manager of this institute in 1860. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1856 and 1864, and was a reserve delegate in 1868 and 1872.

REV. JOSEPH ELIJAH KING, D.D., PH. D.

King, William F., D.D., president of Cornell College, was born in Ohio in 1830, and was converted at the early age of ten. He graduated with honor at the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1857, and was Professor of Ancient Languages in that institution until 1862, in which year he was received into the Ohio Conference. He was acting president of Cornell College, Iowa, in 1863 and 1864, and was elected president in 1865, in which position he still remains. On account of impaired health he visited Europe in 1863, and returned in 1864. Under his superintendency the college has had great prosperity.

Kingsley, Calvin, D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Annsville, N. Y., Sept. 8, 1812. When about fourteen years of age he removed with his parents to Chautauqua County, in Western New York, where he was trained upon a farm. There he first attended Methodist preaching, and professed conversion at eighteen. He immediately proposed to establish family prayer, to which his parents consented, though not professing Christians, and in a short time both father and mother were happily converted. Feeling called to the ministry, he earnestly desired a college education, but difficulties almost insuperable surrounded him. He was needed on the farm, there were no schools of high grade, nor had he access to books. After studying in a district school, he was employed as a tutor, and the first books for higher studies which he procured he purchased by making maple-sugar on shares and carrying it ten miles to market at Jamestown. When about twenty-three he was licensed to exhort, and two years afterwards to preach. At twenty-four he entered Alleghany College, supporting himself in part by his own labor. His proficiency was so great that in the second year he was appointed tutor in mathematics. Graduating in 1841, he was immediately elected to a professorship in the college, and was received on probation in the Erie Conference. Having good business qualifications, he was afterwards selected as an agent for the college. He was strongly anti-slavery, but at the same time was deeply devoted to the interests of the Methodist Episcopal Church: and his first public debate was in its defense, and he preserved the church in that section from a threatened secession. Preferring the life of a pastor to that of professor he resigned his place, but the trustees refused to accept the resignation, and at the earnest solicitation of Conference he was induced to remain, but he added to the duties of his chair the labor of preaching on adjacent circuits and stations. In 1852 he was elected as delegate to the General Conference, and at that time received forty votes for the episcopacy. In 1853 he received from Genesee College the degree of D.D. In 1856 he was elected editor of The Western Christian Advocate, and filled the place with honor and with great success. In the General Conference of 1860 he was recognized as the leader of the anti-slavery sentiment, was chairman of the committee on slavery, and the report presented was one of great ability. He was elected, for the fourth time, a delegate to the General Conference of 1864, and was chosen and ordained a bishop. In 1865 and 1866 he visited the Conferences on the Pacific coast. In 1867 he presided at the Mission Conferences in the west of Europe. In 1869 he visited the Conferences on the Pacific, and from thence passed to China and India, expecting to return by way of Europe. He sailed from San Francisco, and having visited Japan and China, sailed thence for Calcutta, and by a journey of some 800 miles through the interior reached Lucknow. He arrived at Cairo on the 1st of March, but after making a brief visit, gratified a long-cherished desire of passing from Egypt to the Holy Land. The journey was very fatiguing, as he was already exhausted by labor and his journeying in a tropical land. Having finished his tour, he reached Beyroot and engaged his passage for Constantinople. On the morning of April 6, 1870, about to sail, he arose in good health, and with Rev. Dr. Bannister, of the Garrett Biblical Institute, who was then in Beyroot, he ascended the house-top to enjoy a view of the snowy heights of Lebanon. After breakfast he was seized with neuralgic pain in the left breast, and in a few minutes fell to the floor, and, though immediately lifted to his bed, his heart and pulse were still. A post-mortem examination revealed disease of the heart. Though the youngest member of the episcopal board, Bishop Kingsley had already performed a vast amount of labor, and the church was expecting still greater things from him.

As a man, he was simple and unaffected, genial and social in his spirit: his intellect was strong, keen, and logical. He used a ready pen, and his descriptions were clear and graphic. His sermons were rich in doctrinal truth. His executive power was of superior order, and each successive year his talents were unfolding. As a bishop, he met the highest expectations of the church. In the chair, his decisions were clear and exact, and in making have issued from the press. By the direction of the General Conference a monument was erected in Beyroot, an engraving of which is connected with this article. (See following page.)

Kingston, Canada (pop. 12,407), contains four Methodist churches. Sydenham Street church was built in 1852, and is a stone edifice, 60 by 90 feet, with a seating capacity from 1000 to 1200, at a cost of about $28,000. Queen Street church was built the appointments he manifested great sympathy with the preachers and devotion to the interests of the church. As Bishop Coke, the founder of the Wesleyan missions in India, sleeps in the land which he loved, so the sainted Kingsley sleeps on Asiatic soil, and binds the hearts of the church in this Western world to that land which was once and, in all probability, is shortly to be the theatre of great events. He published a review of Professor Bush's work on the "Resurrection," and since his death his "Letters and Observations on Europe and the East" in 1864. The edifice is of stone; dimensions 48 by 66 feet; a seating capacity of 450; at a cost of $6000. Depot church, a frame building, 30 by 45 feet; a seating capacity of 200; at a cost of $1200. Williamsville, in the suburbs, a brick church, 30 by 60 feet, which will seat 200 persons, and is valued at $800.

preachers visited this section of country, which was for many years connected with the Newburg circuit. It first appears by name in the minutes for 1822, with John D. Moriarty as pastor. He reported from the circuit in 1823, 236 members. It subsequently became a station, and since that time a second church has been built. It is in the New York Conference, and has two churches: St. James, with 326 members, 321 Sunday-school scholars, and $23,000 church property; and Clinton Avenue, with 530 members, 430 Sunday-school scholars, and $18,000 church property.

Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove Schools.—All ministers in connection with the Wesleyan Methodists in England are forbidden to enter on any trade. A few only have means beyond their stipends, and in many circuits these are inadequate to support a family and educate the children respectably. Besides, many ministers finish their active work or their lives before the family has had much education. Were there not in these cases some provision for the children, it would be impossible in many instances, and especially in the case of a widowed mother (with an allowance insufficient to keep herself), to provide for the tuition of the children; to meet this need schools for the education of ministers' sons were first provided. Kingswood is with Methodists "a household word." In 1741 the school, which had been begun by Mr. Wesley "in the middle of Kingswood," was completed; it being his original intention to establish a school there on strictly Christian principles, for the benefit of Methodist children in general; and for many years a number of laymen's sons were educated there. In 1748 the building was enlarged, and the school reopened with religious services, Mr. Wesley preaching from Prov. xxii. 6. After several ineffectual attempts to make it a general school for the connection, it became, step by step, exclusively a school for the education of Methodist traveling preachers' sons, and so it continues to the present. It must, however, have been conducted on a limited scale. The first public collection recorded reached £100; and yet after an interval of ten years not £300 had been obtained. The ground for the building was bought chiefly by the income of Mr. Wesley's fellowship; Lady Maxwell also subscribing £800. After being in use some years and found to be too small for the reception of preachers' sons entitled to admission, the Conference of 1808 appointed a committee "to was subsequently purchased: and, after the necessary alterations and enlargements were made, was opened Jan. 8, 1812, as "The Wesleyan Academy, Woodhouse Grove." In 1847 the premises were greatly enlarged, two wings being added to the principal building. In the year 1851 the old Kingswood School (hallowed by many recollections of its founder, but utterly unfitted for further use) was superseded by the erection of spacious and far more appropriate premises, in a very elevated and suitable position at Lansdowne, near Bath, and designated "The New Kingswood School." Later still (and only recently), the Conference resolved upon the concentration of system in the New Kingswood and Woodhouse Grove Schools, under one governing and one head-master; there is now a higher school located at New Kingswood for senior boys, and a lower school at Woodhouse Grove for juniors. The higher school being bifurcated into classical and modern departments.

The time of entrance was at first fixed at eight years of age; instruction to be continued for six years. Since then the time of entrance was fixed at nine years; and, by recent legislation, if parents prefer it, their sons can enter at ten years of age and remain till they are sixteen. In cases of peculiar proficiency, an additional year may be granted on a payment by the parents of £30, and on the recommendation of the committee. The Conference directs that a certificate of health, signed by a medical practitioner, shall be required at the commencement of each term, in the case of all children received into, or returning to, the connectional schools. At each district meeting the question is asked, "What boys are to be admitted to either of our schools?" A copy of the returns is sent to each of the governors; and, if there be any vacancies, the boys are admitted; this is also regulated according to the seniority of the fathers in the ministry, unless the senior has a boy already in the school. The allowance to sons not gaining admission to the schools is £12 per annum for six years,—the same is now made under similar circumstances to daughters.

There are scholarships and rewards of merit attached to both schools. For Kingswood, the "Conference scholarship" (a gratuitous education, board and lodging for an additional year). "The Bunting medal," "Wesley Hall medal," "Evans medal," and the "Dix medal." And for Woodhouse Grove School, the "Sheffield Wesley College scholarship," value £50 (including education, board and lodging at Wesley College for one year, free of charge). The "Reynolds scholarship," value £75 (given once in two years to one of the first four boys, and including education, board, lodging, etc., free of charge for eighteen months). The "Conference scholarship." Two "Morley scholarships," and the "Jubilee scholarship" (each a year's gratuitous education, etc., at Woodhouse Grove School), also the "Meek gold medal," for proficiency in biblical studies, and the "Bedford silver medal" to the most proficient outgoing boy, and the "Lane silver medal," for proficiency in French and German.

The control and management is vested in a general and local committee (appointed annually) for each school. The first is composed of about twenty ministers and twenty laymen; with them being associated the president and secretary of the Conference, the ex-president, and the general treasurers and secretaries of the schools and Children's Fund, together with all the members of the governing body of the schools; and those gentlemen who may be chosen by the lay members of the district committee. The local committee of each school is also composed of a similar number of ministerial and lay gentlemen, which is the governing body, with which are associated two general treasurers and two general secretaries,—the general treasurers and the general secretary of the Children's Fund; with the chairmen of the Bristol, Bath, Halifax, Bradford, and Leeds districts. Each local committee has a ministerial chairman, a ministerial and lay treasurer, and a ministerial secretary.

These committees meet once a quarter: the minutes of the quarterly meeting are reported at general committee, and that committee reports to Conference. The governors and tutors are appointed for six years. The governor is also chaplain, and is held responsible for all internal arrangements and expenditure.

Kinnear, Francis D., a lawyer of Franklin, Venango Co., Pa., was born Dec. 2, 1821; admitted to the bar August, 1845; was converted and became a member of the church in 1858. He has been steward and trustee during that time, and a faithful attendant in the class organized at Franklin after the revival of 1858, of which David Vincent was appointed and still continues (1877) leader. His parents, William Kinnear and Mary (Allender) Kinnear, were early settlers in Franklin, and, with a very few others, as early as 1804 formed the first Methodist society there.

Kirsop, Joseph, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1851, and was elected president of the Annual Assembly in 1875. Mr. Kirsop has been chosen to succeed Rev. M. Miller as editor of the United Methodist Free Churches' Magazine. A pamphlet of his, entitled "Why am I a Free Methodist?" is often referred to as a brief exposition of the views current in the denomination.

Knowles, Daniel Clark, late principal of Pennington Seminary, was born at Yardville, N. J., Jan. 4, 1836, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1858. He was afterwards, in 1858, teacher of Mathematics in the Troy Conference Academy; in 1859, teacher of Languages in Pittsburgh Female College; in 1860, teacher of Languages in Pennington Seminary and Female Collegiate Institute. In 1861 and 1862 he served in the volunteer forces of the United States, as a captain in the 48th New York Regiment; was at Port Royal, S. C., and participated in the reduction of Fort Pulaski. He returned to Pennington Seminary in 1862, and was elected principal of that institution in 1863. He retired from the seminary in 1866, and joined the New Hampshire Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1867.

Knox, Loren L., D.D., a teacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Nelson, N. Y., Jan. 8, 1811. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1838, and afterwards became a tutor in that institution. He joined the New York Conference in 1840, and performed pastoral duties while continuing to teach in the university. In 1841 he was appointed principal of Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary, N. Y.; in 1851, principal of the East Maine Conference Seminary. In 1857 he was transferred to the Rock River Conference, Illinois, and in the following year was appointed Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature in Lawrence University, Appleton, Wis. In 1861 he was chosen Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in the same institution. In 1864 he engaged in pastoral work in the Wisconsin Conference, and in 1871 took a superannuated relation. He was a delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1856.

Knox, William, one of the oldest members of the Pittsburgh Conference, was born in Tyrone, Ireland, June 8, 1767. At the age of twenty he became a local preacher, and, emigrating to the United States, was received into the Baltimore Conference in 1800. Settling in Ohio, he was successively, by change of boundaries, a member of the Baltimore, Ohio, and Pittsburgh Conferences. From the time he entered Conference until 1844, with the exception of one year, he was always effective. He was a diligent, earnest, practical preacher, and attentive to every part of ministerial duty. He died June 16, 1851, in great peace.

Knoxville, Tenn. (pop. 8682), is the capital of Knox County, and the principal city in East Tennessee. Methodism was early introduced into this region, Jeremiah Lambert having been appointed to Holston circuit as early as 1783. At that time the circuit doubtless embraced all the settlements along the Holston and French-Broad Rivers. A writer says, "It was in these rocky and sublime heights that the itinerants began their movements westward into Tennessee." At that time there were 60 members reported from this region. Lambert was succeeded by Henry Willis and other eminent pioneer preachers. In 1791 the various societies reported upwards of 1000 members. Knoxville first appears in the minutes by name in 1812, with Samuel H. Thompson as pastor, who reported on the circuit 537 members. For several years subsequently it was known as Knox circuit, and embraced a large district of country. The first Methodist church was built on a hill, now known as "Methodist Hill," in East Knoxville, about 1815. It was a substantial frame building, and was used by the whites until 1833, when it was given over to the colored people, and by them occupied until it was destroyed during the late Civil War. Prior to the building of this church, however, preaching and class-meetings had been held for several years in private houses. In 1833 a commodious brick church was built on Church Street, and used by a flourishing congregation until the war, during which it was badly damaged, and has since been torn down. In 1845 the church adhered to the M. E. Church South, and so remained until near the close of the war. On the re-organization of Methodism, a part of the people identified themselves with the Methodist Episcopal Church, while others retained their connection with the M. E. Church South. The M. E. Church erected, in 1868, a substantial and elegant building, known as the First church; and in 1873 the Second church was erected in the northwestern part of the city. This was partly blown down by a storm shortly after its dedication, but has been rebuilt in a more substantial manner. At the close of the war the congregation of the M. E. Church South built a temporary structure on Church Street, in which they have worshiped until recently, but have now erected a large and elegant church on the site of the one built in 1833. They have also a good house, built in 1869, and a thriving society on Broad Street, North Knoxville. The African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church has a large congregation and a house of worship, and the Methodist Episcopal Church has also a small congregation of colored members, without any edifice. The following are the statistics for 1877:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Kobler, John, a pioneer minister, was born in Culpepper Co., Va., Aug. 29, 1768. His parents were eminently pious, and at the age of nineteen he made a personal profession of religion. In his twenty-first year he entered the ministry, and volunteered to go to the Northwestern Territory, as there was then an urgent call for ministers in that field. He labored in that frontier region, often under the most discouraging circumstances, for eighteen years, and became so prostrated that, in 1809, he was induced to locate and return to the East. In 1836 the Baltimore Annual Conference placed his name on the list of its superannuated ministers. He died in Fredericksburg, Va., July 26, 1843.

Kopp, Frederick, of Northwest German Conference, was born Sept. 16, 1827, in Würtemberg, Germany. He removed to America in 1846, and was converted in Wisconsin, in 1849. He was received on probation by the Rock River Conference in 1851. Among his appointments he has been presiding elder of Milwaukee, Red Wing, and St. Paul's districts. He was elected as reserve delegate to the General Conference in 1868, and as delegate in 1872 and 1876.

Kost, John, M.D., LL.D., was born at Carlisle, Pa., in 1819. He went to Ohio in early life, making Cincinnati his home until about 1859. He pursued the profession of medicine from 1840 until 1860. For three years he held a relation with the Ohio Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church as pastor, preaching at Cincinnati. As a physician he was successful in building up an extensive practice. He is the author of six works on the subject, which have circulated widely in the United States and other countries. Two of these have been used as text-books in various colleges. He made several important discoveries in the department of medicine, which have since been utilized by the profession. As a teacher of medicine he held connection with four different colleges,—in Worcester, Mass., from 1847 to 1850; in Cincinnati from 1850 to 1854; in Macon, Ga., for several years; and again in Cincinnati. During his professional life he was ardent in scientific researches, and made extensive collections of objects of natural history. A cabinet donated by him to Adrian College in 1862 was valued at $10,000. He has traveled extensively in the pursuit of professional knowledge, and mingled with the best medical talent of this country and Europe. For six years he was Professor of Chemistry and Geology in Adrian College, Michigan, and for more than two years professor and president of Marshall College, Illinois. He has taken part in most of the Conventions and General Conferences of his church for the last thirty years.

Kramer, Allen, Esq., was a native of Fayette Co., Pa., born in 1802, and learned the business of a hatter in Pittsburgh. He was converted in the Smithfield M. E. church, and was an active member, conducting Sabbath-schools, and was engaged in building the first Methodist church in Birmingham, and subsequently in founding Christ church, Pittsburgh, and the Pittsburgh Female College.

In 1838 he established a banking-house, which for a number of years was widely known. Having accumulated considerable wealth he was exceedingly liberal to the church, having contributed freely to church enterprises, and also laid the foundation for the Kramer Professorship in Alleghany College. He was also class-leader, steward, and trustee for a number of years, and was deeply devoted. Near the close of life he met with financial reverses, and was stricken with paralysis in 1868, of which he shortly after died. He was a man of great moral worth, and was highly esteemed, not only by the church but by the entire community.

Kynett, Alpha J., D.D., was born in Adams Co., Pa., Aug. 12, 1829. His mother's father was a local preacher, and traveled some time under the presiding elder in Maryland and Virginia. His father was a soldier in the War of 1812. Dr. Kynett entered the church in 1846. Two years after, at the age of nineteen, he was appointed class-leader, and in 1850 was licensed to preach. Having served as a supply under the presiding elder, he was admitted into the Iowa Conference in 1851. After filling a number of the most prominent appointments in Davenport, Dubuque, etc., he was, in 1860, appointed presiding elder, and in 1864 he was appointed corresponding secretary of the Upper Iowa Conference Church Extension Society; in which position he labored diligently in saving a number of embarrassed churches and in improving the style of church architecture. He was a member of the General Conference of 1864, and brought forward the plan for the Church Extension Society. On the death of Dr. Monroe he was selected by the bishops as corresponding secretary of the Church Extension Society, and entered on his duties July 1, 1867. He found the condition of the society greatly embarrassed, and exerted himself to rescue it from impending danger. He was re-elected to the same position by the General Conferences of 1868, 1872, and 1876, in which position he still remains. He draughted not only the original constitution, adopted in 1864, but the section in the Discipline which was adopted in 1872. He has been delegate to four consecutive General Conferences, and stood at the head of his delegation in 1868, 1872, and 1876.

L.

Lacon, Benjamin, one of the early Western ministers, was born in Montgomery Co., Md., Aug. 23, 1767. His father dying, the family removed, first to Redstone, and again, in 1793, to Kentucky, where the population was exceedingly sparse. A revival of religion under the ministry of Richard Whatecoat, subsequently bishop, led him into the church in the year 1791. Feeling called to preach, he entered the ministry in 1794, and in 1795 he was admitted on trial in the Holston Conference. He was at once sent in charge of a circuit, where he encountered great difficulties of traveling, poor accommodations in the cabins, and a rude and undisciplined condition of society. His spiritual conflicts were very severe, but he had the assurance of divine love, and he witnessed success under his ministry. In 1798 he located, but in 1800 re-entered the traveling connection, remaining in it as long as his strength allowed. He made abstracts of the books which he read, prepared notes of his sermons, and kept full journals of his labors. He had superior executive ability, was methodical in all his arrangements, was kind and pleasant in society, and was a man of implicit faith. He died suddenly, Feb. 18, 1849.

La Crosse, Wis. (pop. 7785), the capital of La Crosse County, on the Mississippi River, and on the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1851 as a mission, with George Chester in charge. In 1852 he had gathered 50 members. In 1855 there were 60 members, C. P. Hackney was pastor, and a La Crosse district was organized. From that time Methodism was more fully established, and it has made fair progress. It is in the West Wisconsin Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Ladies' Repository, The.—The General Conference of 1840 having been memorialized by the Ohio

Conference in reference to the establishment of a periodical especially for ladies, directed the book-agents at Cincinnati to issue such a publication as soon as proper arrangements could be made. Accordingly, in January, 1841, the first number of The Ladies' Repository was issued as a monthly magazine, under the editorial care of L. L. Hamline, who had been elected assistant editor of The Western Christian Advocate. His sprightly and classical editorials gave character to the publication, and its circulation rapidly increased. Being elected bishop in 1844, he was succeeded by Rev. Edward Thomson, who had been principal of Norwalk Seminary, and under whose care the Repository continued to prosper. Dr. Thomson having accepted the presidency of the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1848, he was succeeded by Dr. Benjamin F. Tefft, who had been Professor of the Greek Language and Literature in the Indiana Asbury University. Under his care the Repository obtained a still wider circulation. When Dr. Tefft accepted the position of president of the Genesee College, at Lima, N. Y., William C. Larrabee, who had been Professor of Mathematics in the Indiana Asbury University, was elected as his successor. Professor Larrabee having accepted the appointment of State Superintendent of Education in Indiana, the book committee elected Davis W. Clark in his place, who was re-elected by the General Conferences of 1856 and 1860. Dr. Clark having been elected bishop in 1864, was succeeded by Isaac W. Wiley, who was re-elected in 1868. He being elected bishop, was succeeded by Erastus Wentworth, in 1872. The General Conference of 1876 elected Daniel Curry as editor, and authorized the appointment of a committee who should have power to change its name and style of publication. The committee on consultation resolved that the title should be changed to that of National Repository (which see), and under that name it has been issued since January, 1877.

Lafayette, Ind. (pop. 13,506), is the capital of Lafayette County, on the Wabash River, and is an important railroad centre. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1831, with Boyd Phelps and Wesley Wood as pastors, but services had been established prior to that time. It was then the centre of a large circuit, which contained the following year 754 members. In 1835 the Indiana Conference was held in the city, and Lafayette was made a station, with H. S. Taylor as pastor, who reported at the end of the year 107 members. The church has had a regular growth from that period. Beside the three American churches, the German Methodists have an edifice, and the African M. E. Church has also a congregation. It is in the Northwest Indiana Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Trinity Church.....	344	300	$100,000
Ninth Street.....	252	191	23,000

Laishley, Peter T., M.D., was born in England, Jan. 1, 1798. His grandparents were members of the societies as organized by John Wesley, and he was one of five sons, all of whom became ministers of the gospel. He emigrated to America in 1819, and was converted at a camp-meeting in Virginia. Soon afterwards he began teaching school in the house where the O'Kelleyites, or Republican Methodists, held their meetings. He was licensed to preach by them Sept. 20, 1820, but subsequently joined the Methodist Protestants. For three years he practiced medicine. On five circuits he became a thorough itinerant minister. He has been elected thirteen times as president of Conference, also delegate to four General Conferences and two Conventions. He is now eighty years of age, and still preaches as frequently as health will permit.

La Junta Mission Institute is located at La Junta, Moro Co., in the Territory of New Mexico. It is on a beautiful site of five acres of land, sloping towards the east bank of the Moro River. The school was opened in November, 1869, with 6 scholars, in an adobe building, 12 by 14, with a clay floor and a clay roof. It has developed into a school of 80 children, with buildings valued at $15,000. The main building is 24 by 44 feet, built of adobes, with a wall 28 inches thick resting on a firm foundation of stone. It was completed and dedicated in 1870. The dormitories, dining-room, etc., are built in the form of a hollow square, facing towards the main school building; the east and west tier of rooms extend 124 feet by 20. The wings extend eastward 50 by 20 feet, are one story, and in the centre of the plat is a well of pure sparkling water. Soon after the erection of these buildings the Jesuits built a respectable school in the immediate neighborhood, and endeavored to destroy the institution. The question of title to the property was contested, the priests and leading Romanists taking part against it. Being in the midst of a population chiefly Romanists the progress has been comparatively slow, but it has accomplished great good. It is under the superintendency of Rev. Thomas Harwood, A.M., who is the superintendent of the mission, and is assisted by Mrs. Harwood and Miss Duncan.

Lamar, Lucius Quintus Cincinnatus, United States Senator from Mississippi, was born in Jasper Co., Ga., in 1826, and graduated at Emory College with the highest honors. Having studied law he removed to Mississippi, and was elected to Congress in 1856. He was also a member at the time of the outbreak of the Civil War, and resigned his seat after Mississippi passed her ordinance of secession. During the war he was sent by the Confederate States on a European mission. In 1872 he was again elected to Congress from Mississippi, and in 1876 was elected to the Senate. He has for a number of years been a member of the M. E. Church South.

Lambertville, N. J. (pop. 3842), is in Hunterdon County, on the Belvidere Railroad. The first Methodist church was erected here in 1838. The present church edifice was built in 1867. The parsonage was erected in 1874. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1844, with John W. Putnam as pastor, who reported 104 members. It is now well supplied with church facilities. It is in the New Jersey Conference, and has 347 members, 230 Sunday-school scholars, and $30,000 church property.

Lanahan, John, D.D., is an eminent minister of the Baltimore Conference. He was received on trial in 1838, and has filled many of the most prominent appointments in the Conference, having also been for several terms presiding elder. He served as assistant book agent at New York, from 1868 to 1872. He has been a member of every General Conference from 1868. During the war he was frequently consulted and trusted by the government, and his influence on the border was of more than ordinary value.

Lancaster, O. (pop. 4725), the capital of Fairfield County, is situated on the Cincinnati and Muskingum Valley Railway. This place was visited as early as 1800 by Rev. James Quinn, but the first permanent Methodist society was not formed till 1812, consisting of ten persons, though a small class had been formed at an earlier period, but had been disbanded. The first church edifice was erected in 1816 or 1817. For many years it was embraced in the Fairfield circuit. In 1819 a Lancaster district was formed, and Lancaster station was organized in 1820, with Thomas A. Morris, subsequently bishop, as pastor, who reported 65 members. The society was shortly after much distracted by the radical excitement, and it ceased for a time to be a separate charge. From 1830 to 1839 it was a half station. It then became a station, and has erected a substantial brick edifice. It is in the Ohio Conference, and has 620 members, 309 Sunday-school scholars, and $4000 church property. The African M. E. Church has 100 members, 81 Sunday-school scholars, and $3000 church property.

Lancaster, Pa. (pop. 20,233), the capital of Lancaster County, on the Pennsylvania Central Railroad. It was for many years the seat of the State government, which was removed finally to Harrisburg, in 1812. The first Methodist service held in Lancaster was conducted by Henry Boehm, in 1803, who preached in its market-house, from a butcher's block. Following this, services were held irregularly for several years, and in 1807, Mr. Boehm organized a class at the house of Philip Benedict, on Duke Street. The first M. E. church was built in 1809. The present edifice of the First M. E. society was erected in 1841-42, and has since been remodeled and improved. The First church has two missions, each of which occupies a neat brick chapel; one purchased in 1868, and the other erected in 1871. St. Paul's M. E. church was organized in 1850. Its present building was erected in 1856. The African M. E. church was built in 1824. There is in this city also a German church of the Evangelical Association, built in 1849, and an English mission church of the same denomination, erected in 1872. This city is in the Philadelphia Conference, and its statistics are as follows:

St. Paul's.....	310	263	16,500

He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1835, and in the following year became a teacher in the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass. In 1838 he was an assistant engineer on the Western and Atlantic Railroad, Georgia. In 1839 he was appointed Assistant Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Wesleyan University; in 1840, Professor of Mathematics and Civil Engineering; in 1843, Professor of the Greek and Latin Languages; in 1848, Professor of the Greek Language and Literature, all in the same institution. In 1861 he retired from the university, and went into business in New York City.

Lane, Hon. Henry S., for several years United States Senator from Indiana, was born in Montgomery Co., Ky., in 1812. In his early manhood he removed to Crawfordsville, Ind., and having studied law he rapidly rose to public position. In 1840 he was elected as Representative to Congress, and served for two terms. During the Mexican war he was lieutenant-colonel of the 1st Indiana Infantry. He was also elected governor of Indiana in 1860, and shortly after was elected United States Senator. For many years he has been a member of the M. E. Church, and by his personal efforts and liberal gifts has aided in its educational and benevolent enterprises. He was elected by an almost unanimous vote as lay delegate from the Northwest Indiana Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Lansing, Mich. (pop. 5241), situated on Grand River, is the capital of the State. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1848, with R. R. Richards as pastor, who reported 70 members. Methodism has prospered in this city. There is a small society of Free Methodists and of the African M. E. Church. The German Methodists have a good congregation. It is in the Michigan Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Lansingburg, N. Y. (pop. 6372), on the Troy and Boston Railroad, and also on the Hudson River. Bishop Asbury visited this town in 1812, during the war, and he records, "I preached in the evening, but did not feel myself at liberty as in Troy." This city first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1827, then connected with Waterford, with Samuel D. Ferguson as pastor. Up to this time it had been included in the Troy circuit. In 1828 the circuit (Lansingburg and Waterford) contained 135 members. Methodism is now well represented in this city. The Free Methodists have a society of about 25 members, 20 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property. It is in the Troy Conference, and has 540 members, 350 Sunday-school scholars, and $31,000 church property.

Laporte, Ind. (pop. 6581), the capital of Laporte County, is situated on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad. Laporte mission appears first on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1832, with James Armstrong as pastor. The church was organized in 1833, and worship was held in private houses and in the court-house. In 1833 the mission embraced 140 members, but does not appear by name in the list of appointments. In 1834 a Laporte district was organized, of which R. Hargrave was presiding elder, and Laporte was included in the South Bend circuit. Laporte circuit was organized in 1835 and placed in charge of R. C. Meek, and had 436 members in 1836. A brick church was erected in 1837; rebuilt in 1850; enlarged in 1859 and 1873. From that time the growth of the church compares well with the increase of the population. It is in the Northwest Indiana Conference, and has 325 members, 275 Sunday-school scholars, and $18,000 church property. The German M. E. Church, which built a church in 1856, has 125 members, 140 Sunday-school scholars, and $4000 church property.

Large Minutes (English Wesleyan).—To many persons this title may convey little information, or an incorrect idea. It is not by this intended to refer to the minutes of Conference generally, nor is it designed to set forth all the rules and regulations of Conference. They were probably called "large" because they were a compilation of numerous minutes, which existed prior to the death of Wesley, but were arranged by Mr. Pawson in 1797, in the Conference of which year they were inserted under the following announcement: "Whereas, we, the undersigned (the president and one hundred and forty-three preachers), have carefully revised the rules drawn up and left us by our late venerable father in the gospel (Mr. Wesley), and which were published by him in one large minutes, to which we consented when we were admitted, and by which we were regulated during his life; and whereas, we have collected together those rules which we believe to be essential to the existence of Methodism, as well as others to which we have no objection, we do now, voluntarily and in good faith, sign our names as approving of, and engaging to comply with, the aforesaid collection of rules or code of laws, 'God being our helper.'" These minutes contain the plan of Discipline as practiced in the Methodist connection during the life of Mr. Wesley. Its intense condemnation of sin and all its accessories; its earnest plea for truth and practical godliness; its vivid portraiture of the duties and responsibilities of a Christian minister; and its wise and pious directions for individual conduct, and for promoting the work of God, all stand out with great prominence. And it was under the influence of these godly counsels that the preachers of those days were trained to act and live. These were the precepts and this the practice (illustrated and enforced by the example of their chief) that constituted the instruction and discipline under which the Methodist preachers were taught to preach the gospel,—which they did through the length and breadth of the land with unexampled success.

Appended to this collection of rules or code of laws, the Minutes of 1797 say, "We have selected all our ancient rules,—which were made before the death of our late lamented father in the gospel,—which are essential rules, or prudential at the present time, and have solemnly signed them, declaring our approbation of them and determination to comply with them." This pamphlet, legally verified by affidavit on oath, was produced once in certain proceedings in Chancery, and recognized as a "code," both by the vice-chancellor and subsequently by the lord-chancellor, in very important cases adjudicated by them. It is a rule still observed, that all candidates for the ministry shall have read the "Large Minutes" and subscribed to them before they can offer themselves; and after ordination, every minister, as a token of being received into full connection, receives a copy of these minutes, on the fly-leaf of which, with his own name and those of the president and secretary, is this inscription, "As long as you freely consent to and earnestly endeavor to walk by these rules we shall rejoice to acknowledge you as a fellow-laborer."

Larrabee, Benjamin Franklin, of the Tuscaloosa Female College, Alabama, was born in Shoreham, Vt., April 6, 1826. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1850, and in the following year was engaged as a teacher of Mathematics in the South Lowell Boys' Academy, N. C. He taught at Summerfield, Ala., in 1852, and was afterwards teacher of Mathematics in the Centenary Institute at that place; founded the Alabama Educational Association, in 1856; was principal in the Columbus Female Institute, Mississippi, from 1857 to 1865; was ordained a local deacon of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1858; was president of Aberdeen Female College, Mississippi, from 1866 to 1868; purchased Tuscaloosa Female College in 1869, and afterwards became its president.

Larrabee, William Clarke, LL.D., a distinguished teacher of the M. E. Church, was born at Cape Elizabeth, Me., Dec. 23, 1802, and died at Greencastle, Ind., May 4, 1859. He was licensed to preach in 1821. He afterwards sought and obtained the means of acquiring a liberal education. He entered the Sophomore class at Bowdoin College in 1825, and was graduated from that institution in 1828. During two terms of his college course he taught in the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, at Kent's Hill, Me. Immediately after graduation he became principal of the academy at Alfred, Me. In 1830 he was appointed tutor to the preparatory class, which was formed at Middletown, Conn., under the direction of the trustees of the Wesleyan University, in anticipation of the opening of that institution the following year. In 1831 he was elected principal of the Oneida Conference Seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y., where he remained till 1835, when he was chosen principal of the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, Kent's Hill, Me. It is estimated that about twenty-five per cent. of the members of the old Maine Conference, as it stood at the time of its division into two Conferences, had been under his instruction at the Maine Wesleyan Seminary. While at this institution, he served as an assistant in the first geological survey of Maine, in 1837, and as a trustee of the Maine Insane Asylum. He represented the Maine Conference in the General Conference of 1840. In the fall of the same year he was elected Professor of Mathematics and Natural Science in the Indiana Asbury University, Greencastle, Ind. He remained connected with this institution twelve years, and served as acting president in 1848-49. In 1852 he was elected editor of The Ladies' Repository, to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Dr. Tefft, but resigned the place to become Superintendent of Public Instruction for the State of Indiana, to which office he had been chosen by the people of the State in October, 1852. The provisions of the new constitution made an entire re-organization of the school system of the State necessary, with radical changes in its theory and the mode of administering it, and Professor Larrabee's whole term was occupied with this work. His term closed in 1854, after which he was appointed superintendent of the Indiana Institute for the Blind, at Indianapolis, but was recalled to the superintendency of public instruction in 1856. He finally retired from this office and from public life in January, 1859, and died four months afterwards. Professor Larrabee joined the Oneida Conference in 1832, and was afterwards connected with the several Conferences within whose bounds he resided, but never took a pastoral appointment. His life was mainly spent in teaching in Conference institutions, and in that career he was very successful. At the time he began his academical studies there were to his knowledge but three Methodist graduates in all New England. A considerable number of the teachers who followed him and built up schools all over the United States were at some period of their student-life under his instruction. He gained in a rare degree the confidence and affection of his students. In literature, he is best known by his contributions to The Ladies' Repository in its earlier years. These contributions were afterwards published in a volume called "Rosabower." His other works, all of which were published at the Western Book Concern of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Cincinnati, are, "Scientific Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion," "Wesley and his Coadjutors," and "Asbury and his Coadjutors."

La Salle, Ill. (pop. 5200), the capital of a county of the same name, is situated at the head of navigation on the Illinois River. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1851, with John W. Stoddill as pastor, who reported a membership of 60. For many years the church grew very slowly. It is in the Rock River Conference, and has 219 members, 225 Sunday-school scholars, and $14,000 church property.

Lasell Seminary, for young women, is the only institution of its kind in New England under the auspices of the M. E. Church. It is beautifully located at Auburndale, on the Boston and Albany Railroad, ten miles from Boston. This seminary had its origin in the public spirit of Edward Lasell,

Professor of Chemistry at Williams College, under whose auspices a building was erected, but who died shortly after its opening. In the spring of 1864, Rev. Charles W. Cushing, who had fifteen years' experience in the Newbury and New Hampshire Conference Seminary, purchased the property, and in the following September took charge of the school. Having succeeded in establishing a seminary, Mr. Cushing sold it to ten public-spirited members of the M. E. Church, who purchased it, not as a speculation, but to make it a permanent seminary, under the patronage of the M. E. Church. A year afterwards the ten increased their number to twenty, in whom, as trustees, the property is now vested. The building was thoroughly refitted, and Prof. Charles C. Bragdon was elected as president. With the increasing interest and patronage of the church the institution has continued to prosper, and the building has been crowded to its utmost capacity. It has fifteen teachers, a part of whom reside in the family. Being in the vicinity of Boston it has the advantage of many able lecturers. It takes special care of the health of the pupils, and insists that girls should be educated with due respect to the delicacy of their organization and for the duties of woman's life. Its alumni for twenty-six years are now dispersed in many parts of this country and others, and are many of them an ornament to society.

Latimer, James Elijah, D.D., of Boston University, was born at Hartford, Conn., Oct. 7, 1826. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1848, and in the same year taught the languages in Newbury Seminary, Vt. In 1849 he was appointed teacher of Latin and Geology in the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary; in 1851, principal of the New Hampshire Conference Seminary, at Northfield, Vt.; in 1854, principal of Fort Plain Seminary, N. Y.; in 1859, teacher of Languages in Elmira Female College, N. Y. He joined the East Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1858, and performed pastoral duties from 1861 to 1868, when he visited Europe, to study the methods of instruction in England and on the Continent. Returning to the United States, he was pastor in 1869 of the Methodist Episcopal church at Penn Yan, N. Y., and was elected in 1870 Professor of Historic Theology in the School of Theology of the Boston University.

Latta, Samuel A., M.D., was born in Muskingum, O., April 8, 1804. He was converted at the age of sixteen, and shortly after was licensed to exhort. He directed his attention to the study of medicine, and became a successful practitioner, but, in 1829, abandoning the practice of medicine, he entered the itinerant ministry. In 1830 he was stationed in Cincinnati, and the following year was agent for the American Colonization Society. Resuming the pastorate, he was connected with several extensive revivals, until, in 1840, he was compelled by an affection of the throat to take a superannuated relation. Settling in Cincinnati, the degree of "Doctor of Medicine" was conferred upon him by the Medical College of Ohio. In the division of the church, Dr. Latta's sympathies were with the South, and identifying himself with it, he became the editor of The Methodist Expositor, a paper which was published for a time in Cincinnati. He also wrote a work entitled "The Chain of Sacred Wonders." He died suddenly of apoplexy, June 28, born free, he was sold into slavery at the age of fourteen. While free he had some school privileges, but was a slave until the emancipation proclamation. After the war he became an active politician in his State. He was mayor of Donaldsonville, La., by election, in 1868, and from 1870 to 1874 was postmaster in the same city. He was a member of the lower house in the State legislature from 1870 to 1874, and was elected to the State Senate in 1874. Mr. Laudry is a local preacher in the M. E. Church, and was a lay delegate to the General Conference of 1872.

Lattimore, Samuel A., LL.D., Professor of Chemistry in Rochester University, New York, was a student in Indiana Asbury University, and graduated in 1850. In 1852 he was elected to the chair of the professorship of Greek in the same institution, which he filled until 1860, when he was elected Professor of Natural Science in Genesee College, New York. Subsequently he accepted the chair of Professor of Chemistry in the University of Rochester, where he still remains. He was admitted into the Indiana Conference in 1860, and was transferred to the Genesee Conference, of which he is still a member. He has been actively engaged in chemical and scientific experiments.

Landry, Pierre, a farmer and politician in Louisiana, was born in Louisiana in 1841. Though

Lawrence, Kan. (pop. 8320), is the capital of Douglass County, and was founded in 1854, by emigrants from the New England States. In 1855 it appears in the Missouri Conference of the M. E. Church as a mission, C. H. Lovejoy being pastor. In 1856 it was connected with the Kansas and Nebraska Conference, and had 83 white and 18 Indian members. In 1857, on account of border troubles, its membership was reduced, and for several years its growth was very slow. After the cessation of the border troubles it began to grow more rapidly. A German church has been built, and there is also a society of the African M. E. Church. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property
Lawrence	239	242	$15,000
North Lawrence	52	75	2,000
German M. E. Church..	80	60	1,500
African M. E. Church..	145	140	9,000

Lawrence, Hon. William, LL.D., was born at Mount Pleasant, Jefferson Co., O., June 26, 1819; graduated at Franklin College, Ohio, taking the honors of his class, in 1838; and graduated at Cincinnati Law-School in March, 1840. He was reporter for the Ohio State Journal during the legislative session of 1840-41; practiced law a short period in McConnellsville, but in 1841 removed to Bellefontaine, where he has since resided. In 1842 he was appointed commissioner of bankrupts for Logan County, and in 1845 was elected prosecuting attorney. He was a Representative in the Ohio legislature in 1846-48, and was several times member of the Senate from 1849 to 1854. He was the author of the Ohio free-banking law of 1851, and took an active part in various reformatory movements. He was judge of the common pleas and district courts from 1857 to 1864, and served during the Rebellion as colonel of the 84th Ohio Volunteer Infantry. In 1863 he was appointed by President Lincoln judge of the United States Court in Florida, but declined the office; was Rep-representative in Congress for ten years, from 1865 to 1877, excepting the term from 1871 to 1873. As an attorney he has had extensive practice in the Supreme Court of the United States, having been engaged in a number of cases affecting the titles to large quantities of land in Kansas and Nebraska. In the contest for the Presidency, Judge Lawrence was selected as one of the counsel to conduct the case before the Electoral Commission. As a judge his decisions have been published, and have found their way into digests and works of high authority.

He is also the author of several books, viz., "The Law of Claims against Governments," "The Law of Religious Societies," and "The Law of Impeachable Crimes." In the legislature and in Congress he originated a number of very important measures, and was the author of reports and speeches which would fill several volumes. He united with the M. E. church at Bellefontaine in 1857, having for years previously been an attendant and supporter of the church. He was lay delegate from the Central Ohio Conference to the General Conferences in 1872 and in 1876, and was chairman of a committee to prepare a code of ecclesiastical jurisprudence.

Lawrence University of Wisconsin, The.—This institution had its inception in the offer (about 1846) of Hon. Amos A. Lawrence, of Boston, Mass., to give $10,000 towards the foundation of a collegiate school to be located in the Lower Fox Valley, in the northern part of Wisconsin, provided the Methodists of Wisconsin would raise an additional ten thousand for the same purpose. The offer was accepted. The amount required was raised, though with much difficulty, and a charter was procured from the Territorial legislature in January, 1847, and the corporation was appointed and organized in due time. The location was fixed at Grand Chute, now the city of Appleton, which was then a wilderness, with hardly a house within many miles. The building for the academic department was one of the first begun in the settlement. This was in 1848. The school opened in the latter part of 1849; Rev. W. H. Sampson, A.M., was the first principal, and the number of students at first was about 60. The accommodations were meagre, the surroundings in many respects forbidding, and the means very scanty. But the school had a good reputation from the start, and even long before any railroad was in operation to the place, and while the means of communication were of the rudest character, the attendance was very large. A college charter was obtained soon after the opening. In the latter part of 1852, Rev. Edward Cooke, D.D., was elected president, and college classes were organized the next year. The first class graduated in 1857, and numbered seven members,—four gentlemen and three ladies.

Like many institutions, especially in the West, this institution has had its hardships, and though by no means free as yet from serious financial embarrassment, it has made an excellent record, and is slowly gaining in its endowment and educational appliances. It now has about $180,000 worth of property, of which some $60,000 is productive endowment, while about $40,000, which at present is in litigation, is expected to be added to the latter.

The main building is a substantial stone edifice,

120 feet by 60, four stories high, standing in a beautiful situation upon a bluff above the river. The college is very fairly furnished with apparatus and has a good cabinet. The library consists of nearly 8000 volumes, and is one of the very best working college libraries in the West. It has a foundation of $10,000 from the estate of the late Hon. Samuel Appleton, of Boston. The number of graduates up to and including 1876 is 186, of whom 62 have been ladies and 124 gentlemen.

River, and on the Indianapolis, Cincinnati and Lafayette Railroad, is the capital of Dearborn County. As early as 1802 its site was included in the Miami circuit, in charge of Elisha Bowman. In 1811 the name of the circuit was changed to Lawrenceburg, and Walter Griffith was appointed to it. Previous to 1821 Methodist services were held in private dwellings and in a log school-house, which stood on the court-house commons, but in that year, when the circuit was in charge of John P. Durbin and

LAWRENCE UNIVERSITY, WISCONSIN.

There are two courses of study in the college,—classical and scientific. There are also preparatory and academical departments, which are largely patronized.

Dr. Cooke resigned the presidency about 1861. Rev. R. Z. Mason, LL.D., was elected in his place. Dr. Mason resigned in 1865, and was succeeded by Rev. G. M. Steele, D.D., the present incumbent. Besides the president, the following compose the present board of instruction: Hiram A. Janes, A.M., Ancient Languages; Rev. Wesley C. Sawyer, Ph.D., Philosophy and Rhetoric; James C. Foye, A.M., Chemistry and Physics; De Forest M. Hyde, C.E., Mathematics and Civil Engineering; Mary E. Harriman, A.M., preceptress, French and Latin; Selina A. Clark, Painting and Drawing; Sarah S. Fitch, Music.

Lawrenceburg, Ind. (pop. 3159), on the Ohio

James Collard, the brick church on Walnut Street was built. In 1838 Lawrenceburg was made a station, and Joseph Turkington was its pastor. The place of worship remained in the brick church on Walnut Street until 1847, when a new church was built on the corner of High and Vine Streets, and dedicated by Bishop Hamline, after whom it was named. In 1869 the parsonage on High Street was bought. The progress of the church has compared well with the increase of population. It is in the Southeastern Indiana Conference, and has 227 members, 175 Sunday-school scholars, and $16,000 church property.

Lay Delegation.—From the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1784 until 1872, the Annual and General Conferences consisted wholly of ministers, without any representation from the laity of the church. According to a provisional plan which had been adopted by the General Conference of 1868, a vote of the entire membership, male and female, was taken as to the desirability of lay delegation, which resulted largely in the affirmative, and the alteration of the Restrictive Rule was adopted by three-fourths of the members of the Annual Conferences, so as to permit the participation of lay delegates in the General Conference. In 1872 the lay members who had been elected according to the provisions of the plan were received by the General Conference, and the proper action having been taken, they were welcomed to their seats as members. The General Conference is now composed of one ministerial member for every forty-five members of the Annual Conferences, and for every fraction of two-thirds, and of two laymen elected from the bounds of each Annual Conference, excepting where there is but one ministerial delegate there is only one lay delegate. The ministerial delegates are chosen by the Annual Conferences, the lay delegates by the Electoral Conferences. (See ELECTORAL CONFERENCE.) In the General Conference ministers and laymen meet, consult, debate, and vote as one body upon all subjects, unless a separate vote is called for by one-third of either body, in which case it requires a concurrent vote to adopt any measure. Lay delegation is adopted only in the General Conference in the Methodist Episcopal Church, but in the Annual Conferences in the Methodist Episcopal Church South lay representation was adopted in 1870, and consists in the General Conference of as many lay delegates as there are ministers, the lay delegates being elected by the lay members of the Annual Conferences. The lay members of the Annual Conference consist of four lay delegates elected from each district by the lay members of the District Conferences. One of these four lay delegates may be a local preacher. Lay delegation was also adopted in 1874-75 by the Methodist Church of Canada and the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Australia, and in 1876 by the Irish Wesleyan Conference, and in 1877 a plan was adopted by the Wesleyan Conference of Great Britain. The New Connection and the United Free Methodists of England, the Methodist Protestants and the Wesleyans of the United States, had adopted the principle of lay representation at the time when they seceded from the parent bodies and organized separately.

History of the Movement.—When the Methodist Episcopal Church was formed, in 1784, population was sparse, traveling very difficult and expensive, and the preachers in America had adopted the plan of the Wesleyans in England, the ministers alone meeting in Conference and transacting all the business. For many years the business of the Conferences was almost purely ministerial, but few financial matters comparatively coming under their review. But as the church grew in strength and in numbers, and as property in churches, in educational institutions, in publishing houses, and in other forms was accumulated, a desire became manifest that the laity of the church should have some voice in arranging its general plans. The first discussion of this subject commenced by the local preachers, who felt that in the delegated Conference, in 1812, they were without any representation and without any authority in the church. The discussion on this subject spread more fully throughout the church between 1816 and 1820, and became connected with the question of electing presiding elders. As the local preachers discussed the subject of their rights, an appeal was made to the laity to assert their rights, and the subject of lay representation became extensively discussed. Everywhere, however, the discussion was connected with the abolition of the episcopacy and the presiding eldership. The General Conferences of 1824 and 1828 having decided against the reformers, a number seceded and formed the Methodist Protestant Church, which introduced lay representation, and rejected the episcopacy and the presiding eldership. (See METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH.) During the anti-slavery discussion various questions of Conference rights became involved, and in 1842 a number seceded, who formed the Wesleyan Church, which, like the Methodist Protestants, introduced lay representation and rejected the episcopacy and presiding eldership. When the separation took place in which the Methodist Episcopal Church South was formed there was no difference as to church government, but, as is already noticed, the M. E. Church South adopted a plan of lay delegation a few years in advance of the M. E. Church. The subject of lay representation, however, was more or less discussed in the church from the time of the secession of the Methodist Protestants, and especially from the time of the secession of the Wesleyans. In 1860 the General Conference adopted a resolution expressive of their willingness to introduce lay delegation into the General Conference whenever the church desired it, and submitting the question to a vote of the lay members of the church, and also of the ministry. The vote was taken in 1861-62, in the midst of the excitement of the Civil War, and resulted in 28,884 members in favor and 47,855 against; 1338 ministers voted for, and 3069 ministers against. After the close of the war the subject was again discussed, and the General Conference of 1868 submitted a plan for lay delegation to the consideration of the people; also, an alteration of the Restrictive Rule to the consideration of the preachers. Not only the male, but the female members were permitted to vote. The result of the vote of the membership showed over 100,000 in favor and about 50,000 against. Of the ministers, more than three-fourths voted in favor of the alteration of the Restrictive Rule, and thus prepared for the admission of lay delegates into the General Conference of 1872. The General Conference of the M. E. Church of 1876 ordered the appointment of a committee, who should consider in the interim of the Conferences the question of the expediency of lay delegation, and if judged to be expedient, should report a plan to the next General Conference.

Lay Preachers.—Methodism, from its earliest history, has urged upon all the members of the church of Christ the duty of working to advance the Redeemer's kingdom. It has encouraged both old and young, male and female, to bear testimony and to offer prayer in its social meetings. It has permitted its members, in connection with these services, to give a word of exhortation; but for the sake of order, it has required that for regular services men should be set apart by the selection and decision of the church. Hence those only are authorized to exhort regularly who have been recommended by the society of which they are members, and having received the vote of the Quarterly Conference, or of the District Conferences, are recognized officially as exhorters; so also none are allowed to preach according to the order of the church without first having been recommended by the society and elected by the Quarterly or District Conferences. But it encourages its young men to participate in public exercises, and to make trial of the gifts which God may have bestowed upon them. When Mr. Wesley commenced his labors he had no thought of employing laymen as preachers, though he called for their services in every other possible way. The young men, however, who led classes, who spoke in exhortation, whose souls were filled with the restless desire to do good and to save, if possible, their fellow-men, soon felt called to preach. Mr. Wesley says, "After a time a young man named Thomas Maxfield came and desired to help me as a son in the gospel: soon after came a second,—Thomas Richards; then a third,—Thomas Westall. These several desired to serve me as sons, and to labor when and where I should direct." Thus he commenced employing laymen as preachers, regarding them as assistants in the great revival in which he was engaged. While Mr. Wesley lived he exercised this authority of licensing men for the ministry; since his death the Wesleyans of Great Britain and other Methodist Churches, both in England and in this country, require that the person applying should be recommended by the society or church of which he is a member, and should be elected by the Conference having authority in the case. In England, local preachers are not eligible to ordination, but in the Methodist Episcopal Churches of America they are eligible after full trial in the ministry and proper recommendation and examination.

Lay Representation in Conference (English Wesleyan).—This has been a mooted point in Methodist economy for many years. Without noting the action of the other branches of the Methodist Church in affiliated Conferences, we shall endeavor to trace the rise and progress of this feeling as it regards the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Great Britain, remarking, at the same time, that the consummation of the scheme is yet imperfect. There are two funds only which are entirely ministerial, viz., the Annuitant and the Book Room Funds; all the rest are managed, and have been for many years, in mixed committees; these, in later years, have been termed "committees of review," meeting for several days before the opening of the Conference, passing in review the distribution of the various funds, and presenting their reports to the Conference. These committees have taken cognizance of and shared in the distribution of all funds contributed by the connection; such as "The Auxiliary Fund," "The Schools and Children's Fund," "The General Education Fund," "The Theological Institution," "The Gospel Fund," and the "Home and Foreign Missionary Funds." For many years these were hallowed festivals of mutual intercourse between the ministers and laity, at the same time a desire, increasing in intensity, seemed to have arisen for a fuller development of the lay element in the counsels and decisions of Conference. In 1873 a committee was appointed to consider how far the committees of review might be improved, and regulations suggested for the conduct of business in these committees. In 1874 a large committee of ministers was appointed to consider the question fully, and submit a report to the district meetings when the lay members were present, to consider the same. In 1875 the Conference resolved "that the time is approaching when a comprehensive plan should be devised for some direct and adequate representation of the laity, in the transactions of the business of the Conference, in consistency with the recognized principles of our economy and the principles of the Poll Deed." In accordance with this resolution two committees were appointed. The first composed of ministers named by the Conference, with one minister from each district, chosen at the September financial meeting; this committee, after considering the whole subject, to present their report to the annual meeting in May. The second committee to embrace the ministers composing the first, with thirty-five lay gentlemen and one lay member from each May district meeting. Before this body was to be presented the report of the ministerial committee, with the observations of the district committees, that a report might be prepared to be submitted to the next Conference. In 1876 the whole scheme assumed a more definite form, and the opinions of counsel having been taken upon the meaning and application of the Deed Poll, the same being favorable, took action as follows: "That as soon as shall be found practicable the Conference will admit laymen to take part in its proceedings, when matters are considered and decided, under the following heads: missions, chapel affairs, schools, Children's Fund, Home Mission and Contingent Fund, Auxiliary Fund, theological institution, education, Lord's day observance, extension of Methodism, temperance, District Sustentation Fund, alterations and divisions of circuits, with all other subjects affecting the general affairs of the connection." The following subjects are to remain within the exclusive province of the Conference when consisting of ministers only, viz.: the formal constitution of the Conference, including appointments of officers; admission and continuance of probationers; examination of candidates to be received into full connection; ministerial character, ability, and discipline; appeals; supernumeraries; obituaries; stations: pastoral address and reports; supervision of connectional literature; official appointments, deputations, and delegations; and everything else affecting the ministerial or pastoral supervision of the connection. The management of the Book Room remaining as at present. There are many minor details yet unsettled. A large committee presents a report to the district meetings in May: their decisions are to be remitted to the same committee, the whole to go for final revision and decision at the Conference of 1877, to come into operation in 1878. The present intention is, that the Conference of that year shall consist of 240 ministers and 240 laymen, selected under certain restrictions. The committee suggests that one-eighth of the lay representatives shall be elected annually by the Conference, when composed of ministers and laymen; but in the case of the first Conference to be held after the adoption of this scheme, by the preceding Conference. That for the present the election of the remaining lay representatives to the Conference shall be by ballot, upon nomination, by the combined votes of the ministers and laymen in the district meetings as now constituted. That the number of laymen to be elected in each district shall be determined by the preceding Conference, when consisting of ministers and laymen; but in the case of the first Conference to be held after the adoption of this scheme, by the preceding Conference. Lastly, the business to be transacted by the Conference, when consisting of ministers only, shall be completed before that which is to be transacted by ministers and laymen conjointly is entered upon.

Laymen is an ecclesiastical term descriptive of the membership of the church as distinguished from the ministry. In all ages of the church persons have been selected from the people to serve in ministerial offices, whether in offering sacrifices or in instructing the people. These persons have been selected in some manner by the great head of the church. Among the Jews the tribe of Levi was set apart for sacred services, and out of that tribe the sons of Aaron were selected to minister more especially before the altar. In the Christian church Christ selected the twelve apostles, and he also sent forth the seventy to teach and to preach. The ministry of the Christian church is not selected out of any one class, such as the Levites, nor of and one family, as the sons of Aaron, but they are, nevertheless, called of God by the operation of the Holy Spirit on each individual heart, and upon the church in recognizing the call of the individual, and by bearing testimony in gracious fruits to the divine call.

In the early days of Methodism Mr. Wesley termed only those who were ordained by the Church of England, as ministers. Those who were sent forth to teach and to preach without this ordination were called lay preachers, and while Mr. Wesley lived, except those who were ordained for and in America, and a few who were ordained for Scotland, with two or three in England, the preachers remained unordained, and were called laymen. Yet in England and America, among the Methodists the preachers were recognized as occupying the ministerial office, while the laity attended to the ordinary duties of the church. Since the establishment of the Methodist Episcopal Church the preachers who are members of Annual Conferences, and are subject to the law of the itineracy, are particularly known as ministers, while those who do not enter the itineracy are recognized as lay or local preachers. According to the Discipline of the church some of these are ordained deacons and elders, and perform all the functions of the ministry, but do not take upon themselves the regular pastorate. After the introduction of lay representation in the General Conference, the question arose as to what position these local preachers occupied,—whether they were to be numbered among the ministers without having any vote for ministerial delegates, or whether they were to be numbered among the laymen and to be eligible for lay delegates. That question was settled by the General Conference in adopting the following resolution: that "in all matters connected with the election of lay delegates the word laymen must be understood to include all the members of the church who are not members of the Annual Conferences." According to this decision local preachers are entitled to vote for lay delegates, to be lay delegates to the Electoral Conference, and to represent the Electoral Conference in the General Conference. In the Methodist Episcopal Church South the same principle prevails, and of the four laymen from each district elected as members of the Annual Conference, it is said, "one of whom may be a local preacher." The same rule applies to the delegates to the General Conference. While the ministers attend to the function of preaching the word, of administering the sacraments, and of supervising the general interests of the church committed to their care, and in the interests of which they spend their time, the lay members manage the ordinary and financial business of the church. A layman is tried by his own peers. He has an interest in all the financial and temporal movements of the church, and, as class-leader and steward, he assists the pastor in the proper pastoral work of the church. The great body of believers, and not the ministry alone, constitutes the church of Christ, and the laymen and ministers associated together, and neither order separately, have power to make rules and regulations for the government and order of the church.

Leader's Meetings.—When class-meetings were instituted the leaders were required to meet Mr. Wesley and the stewards once a week to make report of the moneys collected from their several classes, and also to inform him in reference to the moral deportment and the religious condition of the members. In point of time they were the first official meetings in the societies, and they have continued from that period to be in most of the Methodist bodies an efficient part of the economy. In circuits, however, it was found impracticable for them to meet weekly, and in many smaller stations they do not meet more frequently than once a month. In some places instead of the leader's meetings an official board-meeting is held, composed of the trustees, stewards, and leaders. At this board the chief official business of the society and church is transacted. Where leader's meetings are held strictly according to the Discipline, the pastor is fully informed every week of the condition and state of the church, and reports are made to him of any members who are sick or of any cases which need special attention. Not unfrequently religious services are held in connection with these meetings, which are very profitable to the official members, but they are more important for the systematic and thorough supervision, which can through them be so readily exercised.

Leader's Meetings (English Wesleyan).—The weekly class-meeting has been defined in its origin and character under its proper heading. The office of a leader became necessary to represent the different companies under their weekly oversight; it was their duty to inquire after "disorderly walkers" or absentees; to receive and pay over to those who were appointed for this purpose the moneys contributed for the cause of God. Wherever a large society was formed this became a regular institution, and to carry out the purpose intended the leaders were necessarily called together; hence the origin of "leader's meetings,"—these are now a proper appendage wherever a Wesleyan chapel and society are found. Such a meeting is composed of—1st. All the ministers and preachers on trial whose names appear on the printed minutes as stationed in the circuit; the superintendent minister being ex-officio chairman of the meeting. 2d. All persons duly instituted as class-leaders, in connection with the particular society to which such meeting is attached. 3d. The society and poor stewards duly appointed in association with the society,—the nomination of stewards and leaders being vested in the chairman,—the approval or rejection resting with the meeting. Circuit stewards are ex-officio members of the leader's meeting of the society to which they severally belong,—where a secretary is appointed, he must be chosen from among the members of that meeting. The functions of these meetings since the death of Mr. Wesley have been considerably enlarged. 1st. The ordinary business of the meeting is for the leaders to pay to the society stewards the moneys received from their classes; to tell the minister of any that are sick, or that walk disorderly and will not be reprov'd; and to distribute money to needy members, through their leaders, from the poor's fund. 2d. The ministers alone can determine respecting admissions; but when appealed to by any party concerned, the meeting possesses the right of a veto upon such admissions. 3d. No member can be expelled till his offense has been proved to the satisfaction of the meeting,—the act of expulsion is generally delayed for a week from such conviction. 4th. The fund for the relief of the poor members of society is under their management and control. 5th. Any leader or steward nominated by the superintendent must have his appointment sanctioned by the vote of the meeting. 6th. No steward or leader can be removed from office, except when excluded from membership, save in conjunction with the leader's meeting. 7th. The functions of such a meeting are confined to the affairs of its own society. A chapel steward (according to the Model Deed) may hold office, as such, without being a member of society; but to make such persons members of a leader's meeting is irregular. There is no recognition of the office of assistant leader.

Leaf Cluster is a quarterly Sunday-school publication in the M. E. Church, intended to illustrate the Sunday-school lesson by the principle of object-teaching. It has been very popular in the infant departments of the several Sabbath-schools. It contains fifty-two leaves, one for each Sabbath in the year. In 1876 it attained a circulation of 11,250.

Leavenworth, Kan. (pop. 17,873), is the largest city in the State, and derives its name from Fort Leavenworth, which lies north of the city, and is one of the oldest forts on the Missouri River. This place is first mentioned in Methodist history in 1854, the year in which the city was founded, and was then connected with the Iowa Conference. In October of the same year it was connected with the Missouri Conference, and the appointment was Fort Leavenworth and Kickapoo circuit, with J. L. Conklin as pastor, who reported 125 members. In 1856 the Kansas and Nebraska Conference was organized, and in that year Leavenworth fell into its bounds, and had 21 members, and was connected with the Delaware and Wyandot mission. It was considerably affected by the border troubles, and its growth was but moderate. The first edifice was built in 1858. In 1855 a second M. E. church was formed, known as Sixth Street, which bought a building on the corner of Sixth and Seneca Streets; but in 1871 the building was sold, and it returned to the parent society. In 1858 the M. E. Church South organized a society and built a church. During the war the society was disorganized. In 1866 it was reorganized, and another church was built, which was occupied until 1873, when the society again disbanded. The African M. E. society built its church in 1862. It is in the Kansas Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	267	186	$20,000
African M. E. Church.....	355	315	12,000

Lebanon, Pa. (pop. 6727), the capital of Lebanon County, on the Lebanon branch of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad. Methodist services were held quarterly in a school-house in the vicinity of Lebanon, by Henry G. King, previous to 1828, but the first services known to have been held in the town were in that year, in the house of Edwin Atley, by Francis Hodgson. The corner-stone of the first M. E. church was laid Oct. 12, 1839, and the church was dedicated Aug. 2, 1840. It was abandoned on the erection of a new church in 1866. This town is in the Philadelphia Conference, and has 272 members, 290 Sunday-school scholars, and $29,500 church property.

Lee, Jason, the pioneer of Protestant Christianity on the shores of the Pacific, was born in Canada in 1803, and died near the place of his birth, May, 1844. His early life was spent in the labors of the farm and adventures of the forest, where he acquired that hardihood of body and independence and vigor of mind that so well prepared him for his providential work. In 1828 he entered Wilbraham Academy, under the care of Dr. Wilbur Fisk, and spent some years there as classmate and intimate friend of the late Bishop O. C. Baker. Returning to Canada, he offered himself to the London Wesleyan Missionary Society for missionary work among the Indians of Canada. Pending this offer, an unexpected and providential call came from beyond the Rocky Mountains for missionaries among the Indians, and Dr. Fisk, whose voice was then potent in Methodism, immediately turned to Jason Lee as "the one man" to respond to that call. The Missionary Board made the appointment accordingly, and in the spring of 1834 Mr. Lee left New York, and proceeded to Independence, Mo., where he joined the trading company of Captain Nathaniel Wythe, and spent the summer of that year in the weary journey to the Columbia River. He arrived at Vancouver in the autumn, and soon after selected the site of his mission, on the Willamette River, about twelve miles below the present city of Salem. He devoted himself with great singleness and energy of purpose to the work assigned him among the Indians until the spring of 1838, when the necessities of the mission, the enlarged and multiplying fields, called him to return overland to New York to represent his work and its needs for the future before the Missionary Board.

The following winter and summer were spent in delivering missionary addresses in nearly all the chief cities of the States, and organizing the largest missionary expedition that ever sailed from an American port. With this, in the ship Lausanne, he sailed from New York in October, 1839, and, after touching at Rio Janeiro, Valparaiso, and Honolulu, reached Oregon again in June, 1840. He was now superintendent of the largest force of missionary workers then operating in any part of the heathen world. In 1843 he again returned to New York, by way of Honolulu, thence to the Mexican coast in a small schooner, and overland by way of Mexico City and Vera Cruz. After adjusting affairs with the Missionary Board, he returned to the home of his childhood in Stanstead, Lower Canada, where he died.

In the qualities of a pioneer missionary Mr. Lee was the peer of any man that ornaments the roll of the modern workmen of the church. He also bore a chief part in organizing those influences that resulted in securing Oregon to the United States, in establishing its first provisional government, and in founding the States of the Pacific. Of the Oregon Institute, now the Willamette University, he is, perhaps, more than any other man, entitled to be called founder. Physically, he was a strong man six feet two inches in height; intellectually, he was clear, discriminating, and reliable; morally, without a spot. His record and home are on high.

Lee, Jesse, was one of the most eminent of the early Methodist ministers. He was born in Prince George Co., Va., in 1758. He was converted in his fifteenth year, and in 1783 entered the traveling ministry, in which he continued with great success until his death, Sept. 12, 1816. He preached extensively through Virginia, Maryland, and New York, and enjoyed the honor of first successfully introducing Methodism into Boston and its vicinity, where, during his first visit, finding no house open for him, he preached on the Common, under the famous Big Tree. He was a special friend of Bishop Asbury, and during the illness of the bishop frequently held Conferences for him. In 1800 he received a tie vote for bishop on the ballot before Whatecoat was elected by a majority of only two. At one period he filled the office of chaplain to Congress, and he is known as the first historian of American Methodism; his work having been published in 1809. As a preacher, he was clear, practical, and persuasive; as a writer, his style was plain and perspicuous, and his book is valuable for its faithful record of facts. He filled the office of presiding elder in New England, and on Norfolk district, Virginia, and was for three years the traveling companion of Bishop Asbury, assisting him frequently in his work. His last station was Annapolis, Md. After preaching at a camp-meeting he was seized with a chill, which was followed by a fatal fever. During his illness, which was very brief, he was frequently triumphant, breaking out in expressions such as, "Glory! glory hallelujah! Jesus reigns!"

Lee, Luther, a native of Schoharie, N. Y., was born Nov. 30, 1800, and united with the M. E. Church in his youth. He was licensed to preach in 1821, admitted to the Genesee Conference in 1827, when it extended into Canada, and the roads and trails could only be traveled on horseback. In 1838, then a member of the Black River Conference, he located, and became a lecturing agent for the anti-slavery societies of New York and of New England. From this work, which he prosecuted with great power and success, he again entered the traveling ministry at the organization of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection, of whose first General Conference, in Cleveland, O. (1844), he was president. He was editor of The True Wesleyan, a weekly organ, for eight years; pastor of the Wesleyan churches of Syracuse and of Fulton, N. Y., for four years, and of Felicity and Chagrin Falls, O., for three years. His last position in the Wesleyan body was Professor of Moral and Intellectual Philosophy in Adrian College, Mich., from 1864 to 1867. With many others he then returned to the M. E. Church, and has been pastor of Court Street church, Flint, Mich., Ypsilanti, Northville, and Petersburg, of the same State. For the last three years (1877) he has been superannuated. Dr. Lee is the author of several valuable works, which have had a large sale. Among them, and the best known, are "Universalism Examined," "Systematic Theology," "Immortality of the Soul," and "Slavery Examined in the Light of the Scriptures."

Lee, Wilson, a pioneer minister, was born in Sussex Co., Del., in November, 1764, and entered the traveling connection in 1784. Removing to the West, he was subject to the hardships incident to a frontier residence. He traveled extensively in Western Pennsylvania and in Kentucky for several years, and then returned East. He preached in New York in 1795, and the three following years in Philadelphia. From 1801 to 1803 he was presiding elder in the Baltimore district; but in 1804, his health failing, he was placed on the superannuated list. He died Oct. 11, 1804. He was a laborious, successful, and self-denying minister. He hazarded his life in the West when the Indians were on the frontier. He was well acquainted with both the doctrines and economy of the church.

Leech, John, Esq., was born in Warrington, Pa., Nov. 29, 1767. He was educated as a member of the Society of Friends, where he remained until 1788, when he joined the M. E. Church, of which he remained a member until his death. Removing to Mercer County, the place where he settled has been known as Leech's Corners. He served five terms in the legislature and State Senate; was for more than thirty years justice of the peace, and filled the offices of county commissioner and surveyor. In early times his cabin was a preaching-place and a home of the itinerants. For more than forty years he was class-leader or steward; gave the ground on which the M. E. church in the vicinity is built, and also much of the material for the first structure, erected in 1811. He was an example of regularity and piety, and died calmly and confidently May 1, 1864, in his ninety-eighth year.

Legal Hundred.—See WESLEYAN METHODISM.

Leigh, Hezekiah Gilbert, D.D., was born in Perquimans Co., N. C., Nov. 25, 1795, and was of a family distinguished for its intellectual vigor. In youth he mastered his studies with extraordinary ease and rapidity, and commenced his public life by teaching. He was converted, and united with the church in 1817, and joined the Virginia Conference in 1818. Among his appointments were Raleigh, Norfolk, and Petersburg, where his labors were rewarded by an extraordinary revival. During his ministry in Petersburg he inaugurated the movement to establish Randolph Macon College. In conversation with Hon. G. P. Disosway, then residing in Petersburg, the college project was discussed, and the result was the adoption by the Petersburg Quarterly Conference of a resolution that such an institution was necessary, and Mr. Disosway prepared an address to the Methodists of Virginia. Mr. Leigh secured a large subscription, with which he went before the Virginia Conference; and in 1829 a charter was secured and the college was erected in Mecklenburg County. He fixed his residence near it, and expended time and money for its advancement. He was elected to every General Conference from 1824 to the time of his death, and was one of the North Carolina members of the Convention, in 1845, in which the Methodist Episcopal Church South was organized. "His great power was in the pulpit. Without art, he played upon the chords of the human heart with a masterly hand. His logic was severe, though not always apparent, but his control over his audience was prodigious. He often aroused and swept them as seas are moved by storms. He was instrumental in the conversion of many, and the building up of many churches." He died in Mecklenburg County, near Randolph Macon College, Sept. 18, 1853.

Leigh, Samuel, was the first missionary to Australia and New Zealand, and laid the foundation of the Wesleyan Churches in both those colonies. He was an earnest evangelist, and a clear and forceful preacher; but his labors and privations impaired his constitution, and he had to return to England, where he was seized with paralysis, and died in 1852.

Leslie, David, was born in Washington, N. H., Oct. 16, 1797; was admitted into the New England Conference in 1822, in which he continued until 1836, when he was appointed missionary to Oregon. He sailed from Boston Jan. 7, 1837, arriving at his distant field September 30 of the same year. He took a very active part in the organization of the provisional government of Oregon, and in founding the Willamette University, and was president of its board of trustees for twenty-five consecutive years. He was also president of the Oregon Bible Society, and of the Oregon Conference Missionary Society for many years. He died in Salem, Oregon, March 1, 1869, having served the church in Oregon thirty-two years without ever leaving that country. The services of David Leslie in founding and establishing Christian and educational institutions in Oregon entitle him to rank among the most honored ministers.

Lessey, Theophilus, was one of the most popular and effective preachers in English Methodism. His honored father bore the same name, and the son followed a holy example. He was a most useful and holy man. He was born in 1787; baptized by Mr. Wesley; spent thirty-three years in the ministry, and died in 1841, in the fifty-fifth year of his age. He was president of the Conference in 1839.

Lesson Compend is an annual publication of the Sunday-School Society of the M. E. Church. It is a kind of manual or eclectic commentary upon the Berean Lessons for the year. It is designed especially for teachers, to prepare them thoroughly for instructing the classes. In 1871 it had a circulation of 1500, and in 1875 it had attained to 8000. Its report in 1876 was 5000.

Lesson Leaf, Berean, was first published January, 1870. It is the most popular Sunday-school publication in the M. E. Church. It publishes the Scripture lesson, with appropriate references for reading, and with copious and printed questions, arranged both for adult and infant classes. In 1872 its circulation was 445,000. In 1876 it attained a circulation monthly of 1,260,000. Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., is editor.

Levings, Noah, D.D., was born in Cheshire, N. H., Sept. 20, 1796; united with the M. E. Church in 1813, and was received on trial in the New York Conference in 1818. His first circuit was so extensive that it required each round a ride of not far from 250 miles. While faithful in discharging all his duties he was a diligent student, and thus became an able and successful preacher. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1832 and of 1836, and for a number of years filled the largest stations in the cities, and was presiding elder of the Troy district. In 1844 he was elected financial secretary of the American Bible Society, as successor to Rev. E. S. Janes, who was elected bishop. In 1847, while on a tour through the Southwestern States in behalf of the Bible Society, he was taken ill in Natchez. Attempting to return, he was only able to arrive at Cincinnati, where he was most kindly cared for by Mr. Burton, who had ten years before enjoyed his ministrations. He passed triumphantly away Jan. 9, 1849, having expressed strong living confidence in the presence of his Saviour. He was a minister of more than ordinary intelligence, exceedingly amiable and attractive, and was a general favorite in society.

Lewis College is located in Glasgow, Howard Co., Mo., on the line of the Keokuk and Kansas City Railroad. The surrounding country is rolling, fertile, and beautiful, and the place is one of the most healthful in the State. It is owned jointly by the Missouri and St. Louis Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is under their direct control. It owes its origin to the benevolence of the Lewis family, of Howard County, who desired to consecrate a portion of their wealth to the promotion of general knowledge and religious culture. The first step taken was the establishment of the Lewis Library, by Colonel B. W. Lewis, who bequeathed to the church for that purpose the sum of $10,000. A library building was then erected by Mrs. Elenor Lewis and B. W. Lewis, Jr., and Major J. W. Lewis, at a cost of $26,000. In this edifice the college was organized and opened by Rev. D. A. McCready, in September, 1866. Its commodious building, beautifully situated on elevated grounds, overlooks the city and river. It is now under the presidency of Rev. James C. Hall, A.M., who is assisted by a corps of able and competent teachers. Though comparatively young, it has done a good work in the cause of education.

Lewis, Hon. Abner, was born in Rutland Co., Vt., in 1801, and entered on the practice of law in 1833. Removing to New York, he was elected as a member of the State Legislature, and in 1844 was elected to Congress. At the expiration of his term he was elected judge of Chatauqua County court, in which office he served for eight years. In 1855 he united with the M. E. Church, and removed to Winona, Minn. He has been for many years a devoted class-leader, and a faithful steward and trustee. He had the honor of being the first elected to represent the Minnesota Conference in the General Conference of 1872.

Lewis, Major James W., was born in Virginia in 1822, but removed to Missouri, and settled at Glasgow. He engaged in mercantile business, and also acquired considerable wealth. Being devoted to the interests of Methodism, he has labored for its advancement. Through his gifts and that of other members of the family a college was founded in Glasgow. He represented the Missouri Conference as a lay delegate in the General Conference of 1872.

Lewis, Hon. John W., was born in Franklin Co., Vt., Nov. 2, 1831. He studied law, and commenced to practice at the age of twenty-one. Having removed to Greenville, Mich., he has been in successful law practice ever since. He was converted, and joined the M. E. Church in 1865, and became at once an active Methodist. For a number of years he has held all the official positions,—class-leader, steward, trustee, and Sunday-school superintendent. He has occupied many places of high civil trust, having the confidence of the community. He was reserve delegate, filling the place of Hon. J. W. Stone, for the Michigan Conference at the General Conference of 1876.

Lewisburg, Pa. (pop. 3121), the capital of Union County, is situated on the west branch of the Susquehanna River. Methodist services were first held in this place about the year 1806, by John Driesbach, and they were continued irregularly until 1812, when a society was organized. It was attached to Lycoming circuit, in the Genesee Conference. In 1818 the first M. E. church, a frame structure, was built. In 1832 it was replaced by a brick edifice. In 1851 Lewisburg was made a station, with John Guyer as pastor, and had a membership of 159. In 1853 the present house of worship was erected. It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and has 386 members, 360 Sunday-school scholars, and $19,000 church property.

Lewiston, Me. (pop. 13,600), is situated in Androscoggin County, on the Maine Central and Androscoggin Railroad.

In 1800 a new circuit was formed in this State, called Bethel, and of which Jesse Lee says, "We preached high up the Androscoggin River, and took in most of the new towns and settlements in that part of the country. When we first went into that unimproved part of the country we found but few persons who had a clear sense of the favor of God. We labored under many hardships and difficulties, and had many things to discourage us, but the Lord stood by us and cleared the way before us, and gave us favor in the eyes of the people, and it was not long before we saw some fruit of our labors in that place also." Joseph Baker was the first minister appointed to Bethel circuit, in 1800. This city did not appear on the annals of the M. E. church until 1849, when C. Andrews was appointed to "Lewiston Falls Mission." In 1850 he had gathered 40 members. The work continued to progress, when about 1865 a portion of Park Street church organized the first M. E. Church in Auburn, just across the river. Lewiston is in the Maine Conference, and the statistics are as follows:

Lexington Conference, M. E. Church, was organized at Harrodsburg, Ky., March 2, 1869, and is composed of colored ministers. The General Conference of 1868 had authorized the bishop who should preside in the Kentucky Conference "to organize the colored ministers within the bounds of said Conference into a separate Annual Conference, if said ministers requested it, and if, in the judgment of the bishops, the interests of the work required it." At the request of the colored ministers the organization was made, consisting of 19 traveling preachers, who were divided into two districts. In 1872 the General Conference defined its boundaries so as to include the States of Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana, and in 1876 the boundaries were changed so as to embrace Illinois, in addition to Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana. The Conference reports 67 traveling and 52 local preachers, 7926 members, 3498 Sunday-school scholars, 53 churches, valued at $128,400, and 6 parsonages, valued at $4400.

Lexington, Ky. (pop. 14,807), the capital of Fayette County, is in the midst of a beautiful region of country, and is a place of historical note. It is first mentioned in the records of Methodism for 1788 as a circuit, and the first Kentucky Conference was held near this place. The growth of the church in the town, however, was exceedingly slow. In 1819 the society was very small, and worshiped in a log house, which was afterwards sold, and which was in the east end of the town. The society received at that time a strong religious impulse from a camp-meeting in the vicinity, previous to which there were not a hundred persons in the society. The revival continued during the following year, and a great many young people were added to the church. It adhered to the Church South in 1845, and since the Civil War the M. E. Church has established services and has been blessed with prosperity. The following are the statistics:

Lexington, Mo. (pop. 4323), the capital of Lafayette County, is situated on the Missouri River. The first society was organized about 1835; and the first church was erected in 1844. It adhered to the Church South at the division of the church, and in 1860 a new church was built, costing about $15,000, and also a parsonage worth $3000. Occasional services were established in 1850, and in 1867 the M. E. Church organized a colored congregation, and erected a building in 1868, costing $7000. The African M. E. Church was organized in 1867, and a new church, estimated to cost $8000, is in process of erection. The following are the statistics reported:

Leys School, The, Cambridge.—The opening of this school was the result of the recommendation of a committee which, appointed in 1873, proposed that a school should be established in one of the university towns, such as would afford special facilities for high class education.

A valuable estate was offered in the immediate neighborhood of Cambridge on advantageous terms, and the committee urged upon the Conference the acquisition of this site for the proposed school. This was favorably received; the sum needed for the purchase of the estate, £15,000, has been promised by gentlemen, who, by donations of £50, £100, and upwards, have acquired the right of nominating pupils for admission. The school is entirely under Methodist management, and all the boys are required to attend a Wesleyan place of worship.

The governing body consists of twenty members; three of them directly represent the Conference, viz.: the president, the secretary, and the ex-president; two are elected by the officers of the Theological Institution; three by the education committee; eleven by the donors of £100 and upwards, and one by the assistant masters of the school. It was opened in March, 1875, and consists of three divisions, an upper, a modern, and a junior class.

The object of the founders was to take advantage of the facilities afforded by a university town for obtaining teaching of the highest class, to promote university education in the Methodist connection, and at the same time provide a sound and real training for boys intended for mercantile pursuits; to carry out the main principles of public school discipline, and lay deep the foundations of scriptural knowledge and Christian principle. It is now in successful operation.

License for Chapels (English Wesleyan).—All chapels previously to their dedication must be duly registered as places of public worship; and the certificate of such registration must be publicly read at the opening service.

Light, George C., an eloquent minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in Westmoreland Co., Va., Feb. 28, 1785. In 1806 he entered the itinerant ministry, but located in 1808; was employed as a surveyor in 1822, when he entered the Kentucky Conference. He filled a number of the most important stations in Louisville, St. Louis, and in the State of Mississippi. He died Feb. 27, 1859. Few men had greater control as preachers over the public mind.

Lima, O. (pop. 4500), the capital of Allen County, is situated on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. Methodist services were introduced in 1829 in the vicinity, when Rev. Robert Finley was the first missionary to this part of Northwestern Ohio. In 1830, James B. Austin was missionary, and Lima was one of the appointments of St. Mary's mission, in the Maumee district, which then included the counties of Allen, Auglaize, Van Wert, Putnam, and Mercer. The first quarterly meeting was held in Lima, in 1833, Rev. W. H. Raper being presiding elder. In 1835 the first church was built and dedicated. In 1840 Lima circuit was formed, with Madison Hansley as pastor. In 1852 the old church was replaced by a larger and more substantial structure, at a cost of about $4000, and was dedicated by Dr. Thomson, afterwards bishop. In 1871 the present Trinity church building was commenced; the lecture-room was dedicated in 1873, and in 1876 the audience-room was completed, and was dedicated on the 12th of March by Bishop Foster. It reported, in 1876, 466 members, 420 Sunday-school scholars, and $70,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has 42 members, 42 Sunday-school scholars, and $2500 church property.

Lindley, Lutellus, M.D., was born in Ohio in 1808, and resides at Connellsville, Pa. He is a son of Dr. Lindley, who was for many years president of the Ohio University. He graduated in 1827, and after teaching for two years, studied medicine and practiced in Jefferson, Pa., and subsequently in Connellsville. During a large part of his life he has been a devoted and ardent member of the M. E. Church, has filled various positions, and is widely known in the community.

Lindsay, James, is an enterprising merchant and manufacturer of Belfast, Ireland. He is a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and has been active in its various institutions. He has served on the general committees at Conference; was a contributor in the erection of Belfast College, and is connected with a number of enterprises, religious, social, and civil. He has a beautiful residence at Wheatfield, near the city.

Lindsay, John, an eminent Methodist Episcopal minister, was born at Lynn, Mass., July 18, 1788, and died in Schenectady, Feb. 10, 1850. He was admitted into the New England Conference in 1809, and filled important appointments in that Conference, and also in the New York and Troy. He was presiding elder on the New Haven and Albany districts; was agent for the Wesleyan University, and also for the American Bible Society. He was a successful preacher, and was active in founding the Academy at Wilbraham and the Wesleyan University.

Lindsay, John Wesley, D.D., of Boston University, was born in Barre, Vt., Aug. 20, 1820. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1840, and in the same year entered as a student at the Union Theological Seminary, New York City. He joined the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1843, and continued in pastoral work till 1847, when he was appointed a tutor in Wesleyan University. In 1848 he was elected Professor of Hebrew and Latin in the same institution. He returned to pastoral work in 1860, and continued in it till 1864, when he was elected president of Genesee College. In 1868 he was chosen Professor of Exegetical Theology in the Boston Theological Seminary, and was appointed to the same chair in the School of Theology of the Boston University in 1871. In 1873 he was elected dean of the faculty of the College of Liberal Arts of the Boston University. He was a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1864, 1868, and 1872.

Lippitt, Edward Spalding, a teacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Woodstock, Conn., Sept. 17, 1824. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1847, and was appointed in the same year principal of the Literary Institute and Gymnasium at Pembroke, N. H. He was afterwards, in 1849, teacher of Natural Science and Mathematics in the Wesleyan Female College, Cincinnati, O.; in 1854, principal of the Boys' Classical School, Cincinnati, O.; in 1862, Professor of Mathematics in the University of the Pacific, Santa Clara, Cal.; in 1863, principal and superintendent of the City Schools, Petaluma, Cal.; and in 1868, principal of the Scientific and Classical Institute, at Petaluma. He was ordained a local deacon in the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1854; was admitted to the bar, in Cincinnati, in 1857; was appointed city solicitor of Cincinnati in 1859; served as acting pastor in the Congregational church at Petaluma, Cal., in 1863 and 1868-69; was stationed at the Methodist Episcopal church, Petaluma, from 1864 to 1866, and entered upon the practice of the law at Petaluma in 1870.

Lipscomb, Andrew A., D.D., LL.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Georgetown, D. C., Sept. 6, 1816; converted May, 1831, and licensed to preach 1834. He united with the Maryland Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church in 1835, and after filling important stations he removed, in 1842, to Montgomery, Ala., on account of ill health. He was elected president of the Alabama Conference; received the degree of D.D. from the University of Alabama, and the degree of LL.D. from Emory College, Georgia. Being compelled to retire from the itinerant ministry on account of ill health, he founded the Metropolitan Institute for Young Ladies, Montgomery, Ala., in 1849. He was president of Tuskegee Female College, M. E. Church South, in 1856-59, and was elected chancellor of the University of Georgia, at Athens, Ga., in 1860, and resigned it in 1874. He was a contributor to Harper's Magazine—"Editor's Table" and other articles—for several years; author of "The Social Spirit of Christianity" and "Our Country, its Danger and Duty" (a prize essay). In 1875 he was elected Professor of Philosophy and Criticism in Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tenn., which position he now holds.

Lipscomb, Wm. C., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in King William Co., Va., Sept. 13, 1792. In his fifteenth year he united with the M. E. church of Georgetown, D. C. He was among the first to embrace the principles of Reform in the M. E. Church, though but a young man, and was a pioneer in organizing the Methodist Protestant church of Georgetown, D. C., and with which he is now connected, after nearly seventy-one consecutive years of Christian profession. He was licensed to preach by the Associate Methodist church of Georgetown, D. C., Oct. 3, 1829. He was never an "itinerant" minister, but labored efficiently in the unstationed ranks for many years. He was admitted to membership in the Maryland Annual Conference, as an honorary distinction, in 1869, and assigned a supernumerary relation. He was a member of the first and second Conventions of the Methodist Protestant Church, in 1827-28, and was secretary of the General Convention of 1830. He was frequently delegate to the Maryland Annual Conference in a lay capacity, and a ministerial member of the first General Conference, May, 1834, and secretary thereof. He was president of the General Conference of 1858, at Lynchburg, Va. He is the father of Rev. Dr. A. A. Lipscomb, and an unstationed minister of the Methodist Protestant church of Montgomery, Ala.

List of Reserve (English Wesleyan).—This consists of the surplus of those who, having been received as candidates for the ministry, are at Conference neither appointed to circuits nor drafted into the institutions. The management of this list is left in the hands of the president; and those who are on it are called out by him to fill up any vacancy that may occur in the course of the year, from the illness, resignation, or death of any minister. In the event of any not being called out before the following May district meeting, the superintendent of the circuit where he or they reside must report on their qualifications, as to whether they are proper persons or not to be employed in the work of the ministry; if so, the names must be inserted, and a report given in the district minutes. If called out by the president into the work before Christmas, he is reckoned as having traveled one year. Ministers needing supplies from this list must seek counsel of their chairman before applying to the president.

Litchfield, Ill. (pop. 3852), is situated in Montgomery County, on the Toledo and Wabash Railroad. It first appears in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1857 in the Southern Illinois Conference, with J. D. Gillham as pastor. In 1858 it was made a station, with W. G. Moore as pastor. It is now in the Southern Illinois Conference, and has 274 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and $5000 church property.

Little, Charles J., A.M., Professor in Dickinson College, Pennsylvania, was born in Philadelphia, Sept. 21, 1840, and joined the Fifth Street M. E. church, Jan. 28, 1855. He entered the University of Pennsylvania in September, 1857; graduated in July, 1861; was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference in 1862, and was elected teacher of Mathematics, in Williamsport Seminary, in 1867. He resigned his place to spend a year in Berlin, Germany; and on his return, after a term in the pastorate, he was elected, in 1874, Professor of Philosophy and English Literature in Dickinson College, where he (1877) still remains.

Little Falls, N. Y. (pop. 5387), in Herkimer County, on the New York Central Railroad, was early embraced in the Herkimer circuit, one of the first formed in this part of the State. It does not appear, however, in the minutes, by name, until 1828, with Lesley Whipple and E. W. R. Allen as pastors. For a number of years the society held its services in a union church. The first M. E. church was erected in 1839; and it became a station, with Charles Dunning as pastor. A new and commodious church was erected in 1876. It is in the Northern New York Conference, and reports 190 members, 170 Sunday-school scholars, and $30,000 church property.

Little Rock, Ark. (pop. 12,380), is the capital of the State, and was founded about 1820. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1832, and was reported the following year as a circuit, containing 203 members. In 1836 the Arkansas Conference was organized, and Little Rock became a station, with William P. Radcliff as pastor, who reported the following year 81 members. The church had a fair growth, and adhered to the M. E. Church South in 1845. The progress of the church was greatly retarded during the war. A number of members who had been friendly to the M. E. Church desired its reorganization, which has been partially accomplished, although in the midst of great difficulties. In Little Rock a good church was built, but costing more than had been anticipated, and meeting with unexpected trials, it has become greatly embarrassed. There is a good colored congregation in connection with the M. E. Church. The M. E. Church South has two good churches. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Little Rock Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference of 1866, and took the place of Wachita Conference in the State of Arkansas. It held its first session at Arkadelphia, Ark., Oct. 10, 1866, Bishop Pierce presiding. It reported 67 traveling and 97 local preachers, 6862 white and 641 colored members, 76 Sunday-schools and 2655 Sunday-school scholars. The General Conference of 1874 fixed its boundaries so as to "embrace all that portion of the State of Arkansas not included in the Arkansas and White River Conferences, and a part of Louisiana lying north of Soda Lake and west of Red River." The latest report (1875) of this Conference is 84 traveling and 152 local preachers, 14,641 white members, 203 Sunday-schools and 7141 Sunday-school scholars.

Liturgy (English Wesleyan).—The morning service of the Church of England must be read when the president and ex-president deliver their official sermons. It is not imperative at any other time; but it is read with a few exceptions in the metropolitan chapels, and in some of the large towns, but generally speaking, it is not used farther north than Manchester.

Liverpool Minutes is a title well understood in Great Britain. At a time of severe commercial depression, political excitement, and a sad numerical decrease of members in the connection, the Conference met in Liverpool in 1820, under the presidency of Rev. Jabez Bunting. A dark cloud rested on the minds of the ministers: deep anxiety was felt because of the spiritual dearth; anxious and prayerful discussions took place, and a series of resolutions were drawn up and passed, which have since been known as the "Liverpool Minutes." Of these it is scarcely possible to speak too highly. In a manner equally clear, forcible, and practical, they range over the whole course of a Christian minister's duty. They point out all the principal means by which weakness and decline are introduced into Christian churches, and offer suitable cautions and exhortations for prevention. The dangers of lax discipline are exhibited in their extent and variety, and adequate advice given. Ministers, lay officers, and private members are appropriately warned, directed, and exhorted in the true spirit of the Christian pastorate,—in wisdom, meekness, and love. The whole document breathes a fine, earnest, evangelical tone. Indeed, these minutes, drawn up on a special occasion and for the purpose of meeting a particular case, are fraught with so much wisdom and practical godliness as to be applicable to all times and seasons. They conclude with the recommendation of a special day of fasting and prayer. Under the question of "What is the state of the work of God?" in each district meeting in May, they are appointed to be read, and also at the first preachers' meeting following the September quarterly meeting in every circuit.

Loane, Jabez W., was born in Baltimore, Md., April 11, 1819. He received a common school education, and for many years has been conducting the business of a sail-and tent-maker. He was converted in 1838; was licensed to preach Sept. 9, 1859. He is an active member of the Baltimore Local Preachers' Association, one of the most effective city organizations in the church. He was one of the founders of the National Local Preachers' Association, and was the Centennial president at the annual meeting in Philadelphia in 1876.

Local Preachers.—This class of ministers is peculiar to Methodist Churches. They were very early employed by John Wesley, and under his direction rendered efficient service in England. In American Methodism they have not been less useful. Various directions have been given concerning their employment. As early as 1779 "every exhorter and local preacher was to go by the direction of the assistant where and only where he should appoint." In 1780 it was strictly enjoined on all the local preachers and exhorters that they should not presume to speak in public without a written permission every quarter, and an examination by the assistant or preacher in charge with respect to his life, his qualifications, and usefulness. In 1784 the General Conference of the M. E. Church gave directions that local preachers should be employed to supply the circuits during the sessions of the Annual Conferences, and that they should be paid in proportion to the traveling preachers out of the yearly collection. In 1796 a distinct section was provided in the Discipline concerning local preachers. To obtain a license, the provisions of the Discipline are as follows: "He must be recommended by the society of which he is a member, or by the leaders and stewards' meeting of the church to which he belongs. He must be examined on the subject of doctrines and discipline by the president of the Quarterly or District Conference, and be recommended by a vote of that Quarterly or District Conference as a person worthy to receive such a license. In proof of his appointment as a local preacher, he must further receive such license, signed by the president and secretary of that body." This license must be renewed annually.

Among the Wesleyans of England and its kindred branches, local preachers are not ordained. In the United States, the question of ordaining local preachers was first introduced in 1789, when the bishop received authority from the Conference to ordain them as deacons under specific circumstances. Since that time general rules have been adopted for their ordination both as deacons and elders.

Before a local preacher can be ordained a deacon, according to the present provisions of the Discipline, both in the M. E. Church and the M. E. Church South, he must have held a license as a local preacher for four consecutive years. He must also be examined in the Quarterly or District Conference on the subject of doctrines and discipline, and he must receive a testimonial from the Quarterly or District Conference, signed by the president, and countersigned by the secretary, that he is a suitable person to receive ordination. Besides, he must pass an examination as to character and acquirements at the Annual Conference, and then by a vote of the majority he may be ordained to the office of deacon. He is eligible to ordination as a local elder after he has preached four years, from the time he was ordained a deacon, and has obtained a recommendation from the Quarterly or District Conference of which he is a member certifying to his qualifications and usefulness, which recommendation must be signed by the president and secretary of that Conference. He is, further, to pass an examination at the Annual Conference, and if elected may be ordained to the office of elder. When ordained either as deacon or elder, it is not necessary that his license be renewed annually;

but whether as a licentiate deacon, or elder, he is amenable to the Quarterly Conference where he resides, and is subject to an annual examination of character. Every person who is to become a regular itinerant preacher must first be licensed as a local preacher. His ordination, however, as a local deacon or elder is not necessary to his reception as a traveling preacher. A local preacher, if properly recommended, may be employed by a presiding elder either as preacher in charge or junior preacher; in such case he is amenable to the Quarterly Conference of the charge which he is serving. He is not subject, however, to the appointing power at the Annual Conferences. It is made the duty of the preacher in charge, or of a District Conference, so to arrange the work within the bounds of the charge or the district as to give the local preachers regular and systematic employment.

In 1820, the General Conference being memorialized by the local preachers, organized District Conferences. They were especially designed to promote the interests of the local preachers. In 1836, having proved unsatisfactory, they were abolished, and the powers which had been taken from the Quarterly Conferences and transferred to the District Conferences reverted to those bodies. In 1872 the local preachers of the church memorialized the General Conference, asking for a reorganization of the District Conferences. This was granted, and a plan was provided having more ample powers than the preceding District Conferences.

These ministers are called local preachers, not so much from their being lay preachers as from the fact that they are not members of the Annual Conferences, or are not itinerant preachers, as their title indicates. They are engaged in secular pursuits, and yet devote what time they can to the regular ministry. Their field of labor is local or circumscribed. Their office, however, is truly ministerial. It has so been denominated in the history of the church from the beginning. They are supposed, like itinerant ministers, to be moved by the Holy Ghost to preach the gospel. They answer the same questions at their ordination as candidates for deacon's and elder's orders among the itinerant preachers,—they are ordained by the same authority and in the same form. By so much, then, as a call to preach, a license to preach, and ordination are marks of the true ministry, so are they true ministers, and not laymen. They are only properly designated as laymen when distinguished from the members of the Annual Conferences in questions involving the election of ministerial delegates to the General Conference. All of Wesley's preachers, prior to their ordination, were called lay preachers, yet at the same time he had also local preachers.

There were reported in 1876, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, 12,491 local preachers. As to their usefulness in the church, it is a matter well understood by the careful reader of Methodist history that they have been in many places the pioneers of Methodism. "It may, in fine, be affirmed that not only was Methodism founded in the New World by local preachers,—by Embury in New York, Webb in New Jersey and Pennsylvania, Strawbridge in Maryland, Neal in Canada, Gilbert in the West Indies, and Black in Nova Scotia,—but that nearly its whole frontier march, from the extreme north to the Gulf of Mexico, has been led on by these humble laborers; that in few things was the legislative wisdom of Wesley more signalized than in providing, in his ecclesiastical system, the offices of local preacher and class-leader,—a species of lay pastorate which, alike in the dense communities of England and the sparse populations of America, has performed services which can hardly be overrated. The history of the denomination affords a lesson in this respect that should never be forgotten by Methodists while Christendom has a frontier anywhere on the planet." (Stevens.)

Local Preachers' Institute (English Wesleyan).—It being evident that some educational assistance was needed by many valuable men in this important body of lay helpers, the Conference of 1873 cheerfully acceded to the request of the "committee of review of the Wesleyan Theological Institution" that it should appoint a committee, consisting in part of local preachers, to meet during the year, to ascertain what means can be adopted to assist local preachers in preparation for their important work, and report to the next Conference. This led, in 1874, to the following resolution: "That it is desirable and necessary, considering the exigencies of our work, and the fact that our supply of ministers is drawn from our local preachers, that steps should be taken in every circuit to secure an ample supply of this most useful class of laborers." As the outgrowth of quickened zeal on this subject, a beginning, assuming very important proportions, and under very auspicious management, has eventually been made, and a "Local Preachers' Institute" has been formed, having its headquarters at 2 Ludgate Circus, London. It has its president, vice-president, secretary, and committee. A reading-room and library has been opened, lectures are delivered, a discussion class conducted monthly, class instruction provided in classics, mathematics, grammar, history, Scripture, and general geography; and the result of this establishment augurs a widely-extended success. It is hoped that branches in the country, affiliated to the above, will shortly be formed in many of the circuits in the connection.

Local Preachers' Meetings (English Wesleyan).—Lay preaching, from the very commencement of Methodism, has formed an integral part of its economy; and, as an efficient section of religious agency, has contributed greatly to its establishment and extension. The first lay preacher was Thomas Maxfield, who, being left by Mr. Wesley, in the year 1741, in charge of the society at the Foundry, London, was led, in the fervency of his spirit, to overstep the bounds of church propriety, as then held, and to proclaim from the pulpit the glad tidings of salvation. Many were deeply awakened and brought to a "knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus." Mr. Wesley, after due inquiry, was led to recognize in this movement the hand of God, and shortly after employed Maxfield as one of his itinerant separated helpers. The way was thus opened for other suitably qualified men to be engaged in "calling sinners to repentance." "It may be fairly questioned," writes Dr. Smith, "whether England ever saw an equal number of men engaged in the dissemination of truth more worthy the appellation of Christian ministers than the first Methodist preachers; and, looked at from the present day, their claim to that high character is still unquestionable." At the Conference of 1755, when 63 preachers were present, we learn from an authentic manuscript record of their proceedings that in this number three classes of evangelistic agents were included. The first, with 34 names, is headed, "Our present itinerants;" men wholly separated to the work and office of preachers of the gospel. The second, with 12 names, is designated, "Half-itinerants;" embracing in all probability those who, without giving up their trade or business, traveled under Mr. Wesley's direction. The third class, with 14 names, is headed, "Our chief local preachers." No local preachers' plan is spoken of earlier than the year 1777, when a written copy of appointments was given to each local preacher. Printed plans did not appear for many years after. The earliest record of any local preachers' meeting is found in the Conference minutes of 1796, when the superintendents are directed "regularly to meet the local preachers once a quarter; none to be admitted but those who are proposed and approved at this meeting." From that period quarterly meetings have been regularly held. At all such meetings it is customary—Ist. To inquire into the moral and religious character of each preacher, and his attention to his duties. Every local preacher must meet in class, and conform to the Discipline and regulations of the connection. Local preachers are responsible to their own meeting for every part of their official conduct; but all acts affecting their character and standing as members of society must be referred to the leader's meeting to which they respectively belong. 2d. To receive on the nomination of the superintendent persons on trial as local preachers. (1) Before any candidate comes upon the plan on trial the superintendent shall certify that he has passed a satisfactory examination in the Second Catechism, with the appendix, and in the elements of English grammar. (2) Ordinarily those who feel it to be their duty to exhort sinners to "flee from the wrath to come" are, under the sanction of the superintendent, heard by one or more of the senior local preachers; and on their favorable report are received on trial. 3d. To admit, after due trial and examination, to a place on the plan as fully accredited local preachers those who have satisfactorily passed their term of probation. (1) No candidate can be admitted as a local preacher until he has read the standard sermons of Mr. Wesley and his Notes on the New Testament, and has passed a satisfactory examination in the definitions and Scripture proofs of the leading doctrines of Christianity as there explained. Notwithstanding, in some localities certain persons may be employed, as heretofore, as exhorters, such persons having the approbation of the superintendent of the circuit and the local preachers' meeting. (2) Before any candidate is fully admitted as a local preacher he must have been twelve months on probation. In all cases it is the sole right and duty of the superintendent to nominate the candidate whether for admission or probation, or to a place on the plan as an accredited preacher: the approval or rejection resting with the majority of the local preachers' meeting. 4th. To inquire into the state of those congregations which are supplied chiefly by their labors on the Sabbath-day, and to consult as to what new places shall be added to the plan. Local preachers of three years' continuous standing, after having been twelve months on trial, and resident in the circuit, are ex-officio members of the circuit quarterly meeting. The Conference recommends that wherever practicable a theological class shall be formed in each circuit for the purpose of assisting the local preachers in their theological studies.

Locke, George, of the Indiana Conference, was born in Cannonstown, Pa., June 8, 1797, and died July 15, 1834. In his seventeenth year he was converted, and commenced a life of study and devotion. In 1817 he was licensed to preach, and when nineteen years of age was admitted as a probationer in the Tennessee Conference. Owing to pecuniary pressure he located and engaged in secular business, but finding it to be his duty to re-enter the ministry, he joined the Kentucky Conference in 1823. In 1826 he was transferred to the Illinois Conference, which at that time embraced the State of Indiana, and after filling several appointments, was placed as presiding elder in charge of the Wabash district, which at that time extended from the Ohio River up the Wabash, on both sides, some 30 miles north of Terre Haute, embracing a territory of at least 100 miles from east to west by 200 miles from north to south. His wife engaged in teaching to assist in supporting the family that he might continue in the traveling connection. He passed through many perils in crossing the river, and at one time was almost drowned amidst floating ice. He was rescued, and obliged to ride for ten miles to the next house, but when he reached there he was frozen to his saddle and speechless. He recovered, but the shock had been very severe. Amidst all his labors he was systematically studious, and not only pursued theological reading, but also acquired some knowledge of Greek and Latin, and the higher branches of mathematics. He died of consumption. His last words were, "Glory! glory! glory!"

ful Methodist minister. He united with the Ohio Conference in 1843, and was transferred to the Indiana Conference in 1850. After having filled various appointments and served as presiding elder in the Conference, he was, in 1860, elected as Professor of Mathematics in the Indiana Asbury University, and filled that chair until 1872, when he resigned to re-enter the pastorate. In 1874 he was elected president of McKendree College, in which position (1877) he still remains. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1868 and 1876.

Locke, William H., D.D., was born in Baltimore, Md., March 28, 1828. He was converted in Beaver Street church, Alleghany City, at the age of eleven, and was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference in 1852. Having filled a number of important appointments, at the organization of the East Ohio Conference he fell within its bounds, and is (1877) stationed in Canton. During the war he was chaplain in the army for three years, and is honorably referred to in the State history of the Pennsylvania Volunteers. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Gettysburg, but was released at its close. At the request of his regiment he published an illustrated volume, entitled "The Story of the Regiment." He was for a time Professor of English Literature in Beaver College, was a member of the board of control of Mount Union College, and is now a member of the board of control of Alleghany College.

Lock Haven, Pa. (pop. 6986), the capital of Clinton County, is on the west branch of the Susquehanna River, and on the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad. It was for a long time embraced in the West Branch circuit, and does not appear by name on the annals of the M. E. Church until 1844, with William R. Mills and John W. Elliott, of the Baltimore Conference, as pastors. In 1845 the circuit included 145 members. The M. E. Church has prospered in this city and is now well established. It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and has 470 members, 635 Sunday-school scholars, and $34,000 church property.

Lockport, N. Y. (pop. 12,426), the capital of Niagara County, is situated on a branch of the New York Central Railroad. In 1818, Zachariah Paddock, then commencing his ministry, was appointed to Ridgeway circuit, which included this region. On one of his long journeys around his circuit he stopped to rest under a tree where the city of Lockport now stands, and says "there was not a house within six miles" of where he rested. Methodist services were introduced in 1823, and the first church edifice was erected in 1824, and was rebuilt in 1859. It first appears as a circuit in the minutes of the church for 1828, and was connected with Lewiston, John Cosart and John B. Lanckton being pastors. In 1830 it had 144 members, became a station, and was served by Edmund O'Flyng. The African M. E. church was built in 1877. Methodism is now well represented. It is in the Genesee Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Logan, Colonel Thomas, delegate from the Central Illinois Conference to the General Conference of 1872; entered the Union army in the Civil War as a private, and served in all grades from sergeant to brevet brigadier-general, and commanded the 118th

Illinois Volunteers. For a number of years he has been an active member of the M. E. Church, and has also been devoted to the cause of temperance.

Logansport, Ind. (pop. 8950), the capital of Cass County, is situated on the Wabash River and Toledo, Wabash and Western Railroad. It first appears as a mission in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1829, with S. R. Beggs as pastor, who reported 146 members. It was then connected with the Illinois Conference; was afterwards within the bounds of the Indiana Conference, and is now in the North Indiana Conference. It has now three churches. The African M. E. Church has also organized a congregation. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Lomas, John (English Wesleyan), entered the ministry in 1820, occupied some of the most important circuits till 1861, when for seven years he was theological tutor at Richmond College. In 1868 he was transferred to the new college at Headingley, where he occupied a similar position until he became supernumerary, in 1873. Mr. Lomas was president of the Conference in 1853. He still survives, a man of calm judgment and great piety. One of the few Methodist preachers who have never married.

JAMES LONG, ESQ.

Long, James, Esq., a manufacturer of Philadelphia, was born in Tyrone Co., Ireland, in 1822. He emigrated to America and settled in Philadelphia in his fifteenth year, and since that time has been actively engaged in business. He early united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and for many years has been an efficient member, serving as class-leader, steward, and trustee in the St. John's church, of which he was formerly a member, and in Grace church, in the organization of which he actively engaged, and towards which he has been a large contributor. He has been for a number of years treasurer of the Church Extension Society and of the Home for the Aged, and was a liberal donor towards the establishment of the Methodist Book Room in Philadelphia. Extensively engaged in business, he has served as director in banking, insurance, and railroad companies, and is at present (1877) president of the Board of Education of the city of Philadelphia.

Long Island City, N. Y. (pop. 3867), situated in Queen's County, and on the Flushing and North-side Railroad. It was formerly called Hunter's Point. As an appointment it was originally connected with Greenpoint. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church in 1865, when J. Henson was sent to Hunter's Point, and at that time it had 43 members, and 1 church, valued at $2000, and 260 Sunday-school scholars. It is in the New York East Conference, and there are two churches in this charge, together reporting 136 members, 285 Sunday-school scholars, and $11,300 church property.

Longley, Edmund, Professor in Emory and Henry College, was born in Sidney, Me., April 1, 1819. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1840, and in the same year became principal of the South New Market Seminary, N. H. In 1843 he was appointed tutor in Mathematics in Wesleyan University, and in the same year Professor of Mathematics in Emory and Henry College. He was afterwards elected Professor of English Literature in this institution.

Loomis, George, D.D., late president of Alleghany College, was born at Attica, N. Y., June 30, 1817. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1842, and in the same year was chosen Professor of Natural Science in the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, Lima, N. Y. In 1844 he became principal of that institution. In 1848 he served as a seamen's chaplain, at Canton, China. In 1852 he was appointed president of the Wesleyan Female College, at Wilmington, Del., and in 1860, president of Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa. He joined the Pittsburgh Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1861. In 1875 he was transferred to the Central New York Conference.

Lord, William, an English Wesleyan, was received into the ministry in 1811. Early distinguished by administrative gifts, he was intrusted by his brethren with responsible duties, which he faithfully fulfilled. He was representative to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1836. For two years he was president of the Canada Conference, and was governor of Woodhouse Grove School fifteen years. He died in 1873 in the eighty-second year of his age.

Lord's Day Committee (English Wesleyan).—In 1848 the Conference adopted the following resolution, viz.: "Convinced of the great and growing importance of a careful observance of the Lord's day to the prosperity of the church of Christ and of the nation at large, the Conference appoints a committee to watch over the general interests of the Sabbath, to observe the course of events in reference to it, to collect such information as may serve the cause of Sabbath observance, to correspond with persons who are engaged in similar designs, and to report from year to year the results of their inquiries, with such suggestions as they may think proper to offer to the Conference." A committee of twelve ministers was accordingly appointed. This committee is now chosen annually, and consists of both ministers and laymen. A report of their proceedings is regularly presented to the Conference. The efforts that have been made by worldly and irreligious portions of the community for the opening of places of public amusement, the extension of time for the sale of intoxicating liquors, for bands of music playing in the parks, the proposal for opening the British Museum and other places of recreation on the Sabbath, and the running of excursion trains, etc., have all demanded and received the most indefatigable attention of the Lord's Day Committee.

Lord's Supper, The, is recognized by all Christians, with but slight exception, as one of the holy sacraments. Only those who decline to use any outward ordinance call in question the necessity of attendance on this sacred institution. The article on this subject in the Discipline of the Methodist Churches of America reads as follows:

"The Supper of the Lord is not only a sign of the love that Christians ought to have among themselves one to another, but rather is a sacrament of our redemption by Christ's death; inasmuch that to such as rightly, worthily, and with faith receive the same, the bread which we break is a partaking of the body of Christ; and, likewise, the cup of blessing is a partaking of the blood of Christ. Transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine in the Supper of our Lord, cannot be proved by holy writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture, overthroweth the nature of a sacrament, and hath given occasion to many superstitions. The body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the Supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the Supper is faith. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was not by Christ's ordinance reserved, carried about, lifted up, or worshipped." Attendance on the Lord's Supper was deemed so important by Mr. Wesley, that every minister on being received into Conference was asked, "Do you constantly attend the sacrament?" And this question still remains in the Discipline of the Wesleyan and Methodist Episcopal Churches. The article was by Mr. Wesley slightly modified from that of the Church of England, by omitting such words and phrases as might possibly be misunderstood as leaning towards transubstantiation. The Methodist Churches everywhere invite all true evangelical Christians to meet with them at the Lord's table, wholly rejecting the idea of close communion, and they also reject every shade of transubstantiation or consubstantiation. They regard the Lord's Supper as a most solemn ceremony commemorating the Saviour's death. In its administration the church recommends the communicants to kneel, but gives choice of position to such as prefer other modes. In cities and large towns this ordinance is usually celebrated monthly, but in country places and on large circuits it is seldom administered more than quarterly. The General Conference has strongly recommended that wherever it is practicable the unfermented juice of the grape should be used in its celebration. (See SACRAMENTS.)

Lore, Dallas D., D.D., late editor of The Northern Christian Advocate, was born in New Jersey in 1815, and died near Auburn, N. Y., June 20, 1875. He joined the Philadelphia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1837. In 1840 he was nominated as a missionary to Africa, but circumstances prevented his entering upon the work. He went as a missionary to Buenos Ayres in 1847, and remained there seven years, during which time he successfully founded the Methodist mission at that place. Upon his return from Buenos Ayres, he was sent upon a tour of observation in New Mexico, with a view to the establishment of a mission in that Territory. He reported against undertaking the proposed mission, and his report was accepted by the Missionary Society. He was elected editor of The Northern Christian Advocate in 1864, and re-elected in 1868 and 1872. He was active and influential in calling the New York Methodist State Convention, which met at Syracuse in 1870, and determined upon the establishment of Syracuse University.

Los Angeles, Cal. (pop. 5728), the capital of a county and situated on a river of the same name. From its beauty of situation and excellent climate it was called "City of the Angels." Methodist services were introduced in 1853, and the name first appears in the minutes for 1858, connected with San Bernardino, and was in the California Conference. In 1859 it reported 16 members, and a church property worth $750. From that time it had no regular appointment until 1870, when A. P. Handon was placed in charge. The membership was increased to 40, and a church was built costing about $3000. A new church was erected in 1875, costing $15,000. The M. E. Church South also organized a congregation in 1872. An African M. E. Church was organized in 1870, and German services were introduced in 1873. The following are the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	274	200	$19,000
German M. E. Church.....	42	60
M. E. Church South.....	75	9,000

Los Angeles Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference in 1870, and held its first session at San Bernardino, Cal., Oct. 26, 1870, Bishop Wightman presiding. It reported 11 traveling and 10 local preachers, 475 members, 3 Sunday-schools, and 120 Sunday-school scholars. The General Conference of 1874 fixed its boundaries so as to "include all the territory in the State of California and adjoining regions, between the Pacific Ocean and the Rocky Mountains, lying south of the following line (and not included in other Conferences), viz.: Beginning at a point on the shore of the Pacific Ocean, on the line between San Luis Obispo and Monterey Counties; continuing thence on the line between Kern and Tulare Counties; thence north to the parallel of 36° north latitude; and thence eastward on that line." The latest report (1875) is 21 traveling and 17 local preachers, 1875 members, 12 Sunday-schools, and 521 Sunday-school scholars.

Louisiana (pop. 726,915).—As early as 1682 La Salle descended the Mississippi River, took possession of the territory around its mouth, and named it Louisiana in honor of the king of France. It remained under the government of France until 1762, when it was secretly ceded to Spain, which thus received all the territory belonging to France west of the Mississippi River, and also the islands on which New Orleans is built. In 1763 the remaining territory lying east of the Mississippi was ceded to Great Britain. In 1800 Louisiana was re-ceded to France, and in 1803 was bought by the United States for the sum of $15,000,000. It became a Territory in 1804, and was admitted as a State in the Union in 1812.

Methodist preaching was introduced into Louisiana by Rev. E. W. Bowman, who was sent by Bishop Asbury, in 1805, to visit and preach in the English settlements. He penetrated as far south as the city of New Orleans, and wrote, "When I reached the city I was much disappointed in finding but few American people there, and the majority of them may truly be called the beasts of men. On Sunday, when I came to the capitol, I found the doors all locked and the house inaccessible. I found a few drunken sailors and Frenchmen about the walks of the house, and I preached to them in the open air." From the city he traveled up the river, crossing to the west side, and by the aid of canoes crossed different lakes, and on horseback waded through swamps, until he reached the Opelousas region. Of this he says, "I was surprised to see race-paths at the church-door. Here I found a few Americans, who were swearing at almost every breath, and when I reproved them they told me the priest swore as hard as they did, and they said he would play cards and dance with them every evening after mass." After visiting several other American settlements he writes, "They know little more about the need of salvation than the untaught Indians. Some of them, after I had preached to them, asked me what I meant by the fall of man, and when it was that he fell." Thus he traveled during the year,—swimming creeks, wading streams, and, as he says, "wet from my head to my feet, and some days from morning until night I am dripping with water." Lorenzo Dow had in his eccentric wanderings visited this region, and for some time co-operated with the pioneers. Among the men who penetrated that country were Thomas Laslee, Jacob Young, Richard Browning, John Travis, and James Axley. Axley's path was the Catahouchee and Wichita circuits, where he labored amidst fierce persecution. He went into the forest, cut down pine-trees, hewed them with his own hands, borrowed a yoke of oxen, hauled them together, and with the assistance of the neighbors raised a house, which he covered with shingles with his own hands, built his own pulpit, cut out the doors and windows, and made seats. Announcing an appointment he preached several times, and formed a society of 18 members. The church was named Axley chapel. He thus built the first Methodist church in Louisiana. In 1814 the Louisiana district of the Tennessee Conference reported 173 members. Owing to the large French and Spanish population the growth of Methodism has not been as great in Louisiana as it has been in many of the Southern and Western States, but within a few years the growth has been more rapid. There are now embraced in the State the Louisiana Conference of the M. E. Church South, with part of the Mississippi Conference, the Louisiana Conference M. E. Church, Louisiana Conference African M. E. Church, and also the Conferences of the A. M. E. Zion Church and of the Colored Church of America. The M. E. Church South has for many years published a weekly paper, has a book depository in New Orleans, and has several literary institutions in the State. The M. E. Church has more recently started The Southwestern Advocate, and has established an institute for educating colored young men in New Orleans; it has also an orphan asylum at La Teche. The denominational statistics, as reported in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

Louisiana, Mo. (pop. 3639), is situated in Pike County, on the Mississippi River, and on the Louisiana and Missouri Railroad. It first appears on the annals of Methodism in 1848, in connection with the Missouri Conference of the M. E. Church South, with I. Ebbert as pastor. It was then a large circuit, embracing, in 1849, 487 members. The M. E. Church has a good congregation in the town. It is in the Missouri Conference, and the M. E. Church has 132 members, 130 Sunday-school scholars, and $8500 church property. The M. E. Church South has 136 members.

Louisiana Conference, African M. E. Church, includes the State of Louisiana, Balize and Honduras, Central America, and so much of Arkansas as includes the church connected with the Moorehead mission. At its session in 1876 it stationed 38 preachers, and reported 107 local preachers, 3187 members, 39 churches, valued at $54,300, 5 parsonages, valued at $1700.

Louisiana Conference, M. E. Church, was separated by the General Conference of 1868 from the Mississippi Conference, and was organized by Bishop Simpson at New Orleans, Jan. 13, 1869. Its boundaries "include the State of Louisiana." The large majority of the membership is among the colored people, and owing to the unsettled state of the country, the work has been greatly retarded by the excitement and disorders which have prevailed. There is a good white congregation in Ames church, New Orleans, which is accomplishing much good. There is also a small book depository in that city. The reports of 1876 show 75 traveling and 224 local preachers, 11,287 members, 6703 Sunday-school scholars, 97 churches, valued at $249,900, and 12 parsonages, valued at $3250.

Louisiana Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized in 1846, and reported, in 1847, 53 traveling and 57 local preachers, 4715 white and 3329 colored members. The General Conference of 1874 defined the boundaries so as to "embrace that portion of the State not included in the Mississippi Conference." The reports of 1875 show 80 traveling and 75 local preachers, 13,310 white and 127 colored members, and 4896 Sunday-school scholars.

Louisville, Ky. (pop. 100,753), is the chief city of the State, and is eligibly located for a large trade, being situated just above the Falls of the Ohio. Occasionally services were held prior to 1816, in which year the Ohio Conference met in what was then the young city. The following year the first permanent society was organized. It appears in the minutes of 1818, with Henry B. Bascom as pastor, who reported, in the following year, 117 members. The growth of the church was regular and constant from that time until 1844. In 1845 the Convention which formed the Methodist Episcopal Church South met in this city, and the churches and members adhered to it. An engraving of their beautiful Broadway M. E. church is annexed. A few of the members, however, desired to maintain their connection with the M. E. Church, which subsequently organized a congregation, and which, especially since the war, has had a fair growth. The German churches, established before that time, remained in connection with the Ohio Conference, and are now connected with the Central German Conference of the M. E. Church. Two colored churches have also been established, and a small mission. There are also colored churches belonging to the African M. E. Church, the African M. E. Zion Church, and the Colored Church of America. The following are the statistics, according to the latest reports:

Louisville Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference of 1846, and held its first session in October of that year. It reported 62 preachers, 15,129 white and 3081 colored members. The General Conference of 1874 defined the boundaries so as to "embrace all that part of the State of Kentucky not included in the Memphis, Kentucky, and West Virginia Conferences, and Jeffersonville and New Albany, in Indiana." The latest report (1876) shows 30,164 white and 30 colored members, 9882 Sunday-school

BROADWAY METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH SOUTH, LOUISVILLE, KY.

Erected 1866-7 at a cost of $85,000; located on Broadway near Floyd Street. The audience room has a seating capacity of 700, and the Sunday-school rooms will accommodate 400 children. The membership formerly composed the Brook Street church, which was founded about 1826. The church, as "Broadway," has only had four pastors.

scholars, 297 churches, valued at $613,860, and 38 parsonages, valued at $49,650.

Lounsbury, Edward, of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, was born in 1825; entered the itinerant ministry in 1848, and joined the Conference in 1849. He has served several years as a presiding elder. He represented his church, in connection with Bishop Carman, as a fraternal delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876.

Love-Feasts.—In the early Christian church its members frequently met to partake of a social meal, and these feasts were termed agapæ, or feasts of love. Tertullian says, "The nature of our cæna may be gathered from its name. It is a Greek term for love. However much it may cost us, it is real gain to incur such expenses in the cause of piety, for we aid the poor in this refreshment. We do not sit down to eat until we have first tasted of prayer to God; we eat to satisfy our hunger; we drink no more than befits the temperate; we feast as those who recollect that they are to spend the night in devotion; we converse as those who know that the Lord is a near witness. After water for washing hands and mouths has been brought in, every one is required to sing something to the praise of God, either from the Scriptures or from his own thoughts. By this means, if any one has indulged in excess he is detected. The feast is closed with prayer. Contributions for the poor were frequently made on such occasions."

They were revived by the Moravians and made more strictly religious. As early as 1737 Mr. Wesley joined with the Germans in one of their love-feasts. He says, "It was begun and ended with thanksgiving and prayer, and celebrated in so solemn a manner that the Christians of the apostolic age would have allowed it to be worthy of the churches of the earliest days." He introduced these meetings into the economy of Methodism, making them more simple, however, and more thoroughly religious. In them the members of the church assemble, and after singing and prayer, bread and water are passed around, of which each member is expected to partake, as an indication of fraternal love and of devotion to the cause of the Redeemer. This ended, one and another rise up and testify of the goodness of God. Timid ones are encouraged, weak ones are strengthened, and many fresh resolutions are formed to strive for a higher and more useful life. Usually a collection is taken for the benefit of the poor.

Among the Wesleyans in England these love-feasts generally take place after the quarterly visitations of the classes. In these visitations the ministers have personally seen and inquired into the spiritual condition of the members, and have given to those deserving of membership a ticket with a text of Scripture printed on it, which is a token of recognition admitting the holder to the love-feasts and social services of the church. No love-feast is permitted to be held without the consent of the superintendent of the circuit, and no person except a member is allowed to attend more than once, and then only with a note from the minister. In the Methodist Churches in America in early times the love-feasts were strictly held. The bread was divided into small squares, so it could be more conveniently passed around and received. They were usually connected with quarterly-meeting services, and conducted by the presiding elder when present. With the growth of the church these love-feasts are no longer held as privately as formerly. Tickets are now seldom used, and Christian experience is given in the public congregation; though in some parts of the country they are still continued with closed doors, and are thus more favorable for the timid and the hesitating.

Love-Feast Tickets.—At the rise of Methodism the preacher gave to every member every three months a ticket signifying the approval of religious experience and life. These tickets varied from time to time. In their earliest form there was some picture or symbolical representation, but subsequently a single text of Scripture or a verse of a hymn was plainly printed, and in all cases the name of the person receiving was written upon it by the pastor. When love-feasts were kept with closed doors these tickets were essential for admission. In recent years they are seldom used. On the opposite page may be seen specimens of tickets used at different periods.

Lowell, Mass. (pop. 40,928), is one of the most important manufacturing cities in New England. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1827, with Hiram Waldron as pastor, who reported a membership of 130. From 1830 to 1840 it had a very rapid increase, the membership amounting to 1362. The Wesleyan secession in 1842-43, under Rev. Orange Scott, reduced the membership so that in 1850 there were but 770 reported; since that time there has been a fair increase. The statistics reported in the New England Conference of 1876 are as follows:

was principal of the Third Ward Public School, Cleveland, O., and from 1860 until 1863 was Superintendent of Public Schools in Bellefontaine, O. In 1864-65 he occupied a similar position in Marion, O. In 1865 he was called to the chair of Mathematics in Adrian College, Mich., and in 1867 was elected Professor of History and English Literature, which position he now occupies. He was acting president of Adrian College in 1872-73. Mr. Lowry is a lay preacher in the Methodist Protestant Church.

Lowry, Asbury, D.D., formerly editor of The Christian Standard, is a member of the Cincinnati Conference. He has filled a number of the most prominent appointments, and has served as presiding elder. He was at one time agent for the Centenary Fund. When the National Association for the Promotion of Holiness started The Christian Standard he was selected as its editor, and served in that capacity for some time; subsequently he resigned the office, and has been (1877) traveling extensively in Europe. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1868 and 1876.

Loyalty of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

—In another article may be found the relation of John Wesley, Asbury, and the early Methodist ministry and membership to the cause of the American Revolution. (See AMERICAN COLONIES AND METHODISM.) How much good those early pioneers did in sustaining the moral and religious character of the nation amid the desolations and degradations of war can never be fully estimated. While others were engaged in laying deep and broad the foundation for our civil history, they were also engaged as ardently in laying as deep and broad the foundation for its moral and religious culture. Shortly after Washington had been elected President, Bishops Coke and Asbury, in 1789, with the advice and concurrence of the New York Conference, presented to him an expression of their sentiments, and also those of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In this address they say, "We, the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, humbly beg leave in the name of our society, collectively, in these United States, to express to you the warm feelings of our hearts, and our sincere congratulations on your appointment to the Presidentship of these States. We are conscious, from the signal proofs you have already given, that you are a friend of mankind; and under this established idea place as full a confidence in your wisdom and integrity for the preservation of those civil and religious liberties which have been transmitted to us by the providence of God, and the glorious Revolution, as we believe ought to be reposed in man." In reply, Washington said, "I return to you individually, and through you to your society, collectively, in the United States, my thanks for the demonstration of affection, and the expressions of joy offered in behalf of my late appointment. . . . It always affords me satisfaction when I find a concurrence in sentiment and practice between all conscientious men in acknowledgments of homage to the great Governor of the universe, and in professions of support to a just civil government. . . . I must assure you in particular that I take in the kindest part the promise you make of presenting your prayers at the throne of grace for me; and I likewise implore the divine benedictions on yourselves and your religious community." Asbury and Coke were the personal friends of Washington. The Methodist Church and the Republic of the United States commenced their existence almost together. They have lived and grown up side by side. As early as 1784, John Wesley prepared, among other matters for the American Methodists, a prayer, which was approved by the Conference, for "The supreme rulers of the United States." This was one year after the treaty of peace was signed, and four years before the ratification of the Constitution of the United States, and nearly five years before Washington was inaugurated President. At that Conference, in 1784, was adopted an article of religion entitled "Of the Rulers of the United States of America," in which it was said that "the said States ought not to be subject to any foreign jurisdiction," and that "the Congress, the General Assemblies, the governors, and the councils of state, as the delegates of the people, are the rulers of the United States of America." This is supposed to have been the first ecclesiastical recognition of the new republic. In 1804 a verbal change was made in this article of the church, by which "the Constitution of the United States" was substituted for "the Act of Confederation," and it was declared that the United States was "a sovereign and independent nation." At the General Conference of 1820 a note was appended to this article, intended to apply to all civil governments under which Methodism might be established, and it declares, "As far as it respects civil affairs, we believe it to be the duty of Christians, and especially of Christian ministers, to be subject to the supreme authority of the country where they may reside, and to use all laudable means to enjoin obedience to the powers that be; and therefore it is expected that all our preachers and people who may be under the British or any other government will behave themselves as peaceable and orderly subjects." In 1796, Bishops Coke and Asbury say, "We are debtors to the constitution under which we live (especially in the United States) for all the blessings of law and liberty which we enjoy, and without government to support that constitution all would be anarchy and confusion. It is therefore our duty to support it by bearing with our fellow-citizens an equal proportion of its expenses; and it is as great a crime to rob our country as to rob a private individual."

At the outbreak of the recent Civil War, in 1861, the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church was in session, and it telegraphed to the general government its pledge of loyal support to sustain the government of the United States. This was the first ecclesiastical announcement which the government had received from any church respecting its fidelity and support in that most trying hour. By a happy coincidence this same Conference was the first to telegraph congratulations to the government at the overthrow of the Rebellion by the surrender of Lee. Thus was the Methodist Episcopal Church the first to recognize the new republic by official authority, the first to promise it prayers and fidelity, the first to pledge assistance to suppress the Rebellion, the first to telegraph to the government its rejoicing at the triumphs of civil and religious liberty. During that fearful struggle between the North and the South, its entire denominational press was devoted to the loyal support of the government; and it has been estimated that it gave from its own communion and congregations to fill up the ranks of the soldiery not less than 300,000 men. President Lincoln's recognition of the great support which he had received from this church during those days of darkness and of death has been widely circulated. He declared that it was "no fault in others that the Methodist Church sent more soldiers to the field, more nurses to the hospitals, and more prayers to heaven than any." And among all the churches of the land which rendered him support in such an hour, he designates the Methodist Episcopal as "the most important of all." In 1860, at the Evangelical Alliance at Geneva, Dr. Baird, the representative of the American churches, declared, "We recognize in the Methodist economy, as well as in the zeal, the devoted piety, and the efficiency of its ministry, one of the most powerful elements in the religious prosperity of the United States, as well as one of the firmest pillars of their civil and political institutions."

Luckey, Samuel, D.D., was born in Rensselaerville, N. Y., April 4, 1791, and entered the traveling ministry of the M. E. Church in 1811. He traveled extensively through Canada, New York, and Connecticut. In 1832 he was elected principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, and in 1836 he was elected editor of The Christian Advocate and Journal, in New York. Shortly after retiring from the editorship he returned to the Genesee Conference, where he remained until his death, on Oct. 11, 1869. He filled for a number of years the office of presiding elder, and was chaplain for nine years in the Monroe County Penitentiary. He was appointed, in 1847, one of the regents of the State University. In addition to his editorials, he wrote a treatise on the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, a work on the Trinity, and a small volume of hymns and lessons for children. He was a man of more than ordinary power of intellect, and was thoroughly acquainted with the history and economy of the church.

Lumry, Rufus, was born Aug. 7, 1800, near Albany, N. Y., and was converted in 1823. His zeal and devotion were early exhibited in holding meetings within the bounds of the Oneida Conference. He removed to Illinois in 1835, and traveled extensively, preaching to the early settlers, with no remuneration except traveling expenses. He was an ardent friend of the anti-slavery movement. The Conference of which he was a member—at its session in Chicago for 1842—required him to cease agitating the question of slavery, which led to his withdrawal from the Methodist Episcopal Church. He united with the Wesleyan Connection at Cincinnati, O., at the first session of the Miami Conference. On the Ohio River, his righteous indignation was aroused by the drunkenness and gambling and slave-trading witnessed. An opportunity to preach was given him, and he fearlessly denounced the trio of evils in language which provoked an outburst of wrath against himself. A hoisterous fellow sprang up, bowie-knife in hand, and rushed at him. He stood unmoved, and fearlessly denounced their sins, until one of the bravest of the crowd demanded that he should be heard. Strangely enough, they heard the conclusion of the matter in good order. Well said Mr. Owen Lovejoy of him, "Lumry is a sharp thrashing instrument having teeth, wherewith the Lord thraseth slavery."

His last days were spent in Colorado, with his oldest son. Late in the fall of 1861, with twelve others, he started for the mountains with provisions for starving miners; was hemmed in by deep snows before they reached their destination; was nearly starved before spring; and in company with one old man came within four miles of a mining settlement. Attempting to cross a cañon filled with snow-water, he was entangled in the drift-wood and drowned before help could be secured. He had given life's labor unselfishly for the good of others, and then gave life itself in an effort to save his fellow-men.

Lunt, Orrington, Esq., of Chicago, was born in Maine, and removed to Chicago, where he was for many years actively engaged in business. From his youth he has been a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church; has been an official member in Wabash Avenue and Clark Street churches, and a liberal contributor to various enterprises. He has been a trustee in the Garrett Biblical Institute and the Northwestern University from their commencement. A few years since he traveled extensively in Europe.

Lybrand, Joseph, a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 3, 1793, and died in Harrisburg, Pa., April 24, 1845. He was converted when about ten years of age, and received on trial in the Philadelphia Conference in 1811. He filled a number of important stations, and was presiding elder on Philadelphia district from 1824 to 1828. After thirty-three years of active labor, he retired from the work in 1843. He was an eloquent preacher, and one of the most efficient in the American pulpit. "His name will remain a sweet savor to thousands of our Israel throughout the States of New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, and Pennsylvania." His last words were, "Last year I had such a sweet and precious communion with God, and now I close my eyes to sleep, hoping that, sleeping or waking, my thoughts will be of him and with him."

Lycett, Sir Francis, a distinguished Wesleyan layman of London, is one of the merchant princes, self-raised, and a thorough Wesleyan. Few men have done more for the extension of Methodism. Deeply interested in the spiritual destitution of the metropolis and its environs, he gave £50,000 towards the erection of 50 chapels, each to hold 1000 hearers, on condition that a similar sum was raised to meet it. This has been done. He has recently given £10,000 towards the extension of Methodism in country villages, on the same terms, and these also have been complied with.

Lynch, Thomas M., a minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in Mississippi, Aug. 1, 1826, and died in Coosa Co., Ala., April 18, 1867. He was converted while a student at Emory College, Oxford, and was admitted into the Alabama Conference in 1847. He was a fine scholar and a remarkable orator, endowed with unusual conversational powers, and was deeply devoted to his work.

Lynchburg, Va. (pop. 6825), is situated on the south bank of the James River, and is an important railroad centre. It was frequently visited by Bishop Asbury, who held several sessions of Conference in this place. In 1805 both he and Bishop Whatcoat preached and administered the sacrament. It is mentioned in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1811, with John Weaver as pastor, who reported for the circuit 207 members. At the division of the M. E. Church, in 1845, the society adhered to the Church South, and since the war the M. E. Church has organized only a society of colored members. The following are the latest statistics:

Lynn, Mass. (pop. 28,233), is nine miles from Boston, and is noted for its large manufactories of shoes. Jesse Lee preached the first Methodist sermon in Lynn, Dec. 15, 1790. The first M. E. church was built in June, 1791, in twelve days from its commencement. It was 34 by 44 feet, with plain sides, and with neither laths nor plaster. For several years this was the first regular Methodist society, and the first Methodist church built in Massachusetts. In 1792, Bishop Asbury held a Conference in Lynn, consisting of 8 ministers. In 1811 the Union Street church was built, and in 1812 the first rude meeting-house was replaced by the present church on Common Street, which was remodeled in 1834, and enlarged in 1858. In 1803 the first parsonage was built, which, on the division of church property, was sold. Others have since been erected. Out of the first church in Lynn have grown Union Street, Saugus, South Street, the church in Danvers, Maple Street, Boston Street, and the churches in Swampscott, and in Nahant, and last of all Trinity church, in Lynn. It claims the honor of having organized the first Methodist missionary society in the United States, Feb. 21, 1819, and having sent out and maintained the first regularly appointed missionary of the church. Methodism has had a regular growth, and been eminently successful. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Lyon, John C., a German minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Württemberg, Germany, Feb. 11, 1802. In 1817 he removed to America, and in 1826 united with the Methodist Church. He joined the Baltimore Conference in 1828, and when German congregations were organized under Dr. Nast he entered that department of the work; was stationed in New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and was presiding elder of the New York German district. He superannuated in 1862, and died May 16, 1868. "He was a mighty man of God in the pulpit, a devout and holy man in life, a pleasant companion, a kind husband, a good father, a sweet singer in Zion, a useful laborer, turning many to righteousness."

Lyon, Hon. William P., is a prominent and influential Methodist, residing in Madison, Wis., and is one of the supreme judges of that State. Judge Lyon was elected a lay delegate to represent the General Conference of 1872, but was unable to attend.

Lyons, Iowa (pop. 4088), in Clinton County, on the Mississippi River, is an important and rapidly-growing town. Methodism was established here in 1840, by H. B. Cartwright, who formed the first class. A church was built in 1856, and improved in 1867. In 1873 a church was built about five miles west of Lyons, and connected with the town charges, and in 1874-75 the Lyons society built a parsonage. It is in the Upper Iowa Conference, and has 214 members, 145 Sunday-school scholars, and $11,000 church property.

Lyons, N. Y. (pop. 3350), the capital of Wayne County, is on the New York Central Railroad. Methodism was introduced into Lyons in 1797, by John Coles, an Englishman, converted under the preaching of John Wesley, and who, having emigrated to America, went to Lyons from Maryland. Previous to 1802 or 1803, worship was held either in private houses or in groves. About 1803 a small log building was converted into a church. In 1813 the society erected a new church on Broad Street, near the old log building. In 1834 was erected the third church, which stood until 1850, when it gave way to the present neat brick edifice, which, in 1875-76, was repaired and improved. The first session of the Genesee Conference, July 20, 1810, was held in Lyons. Methodism has grown with the population, and is now well established. It is in the Genesee Conference, and reports 260 members, 403 Sunday-school scholars, and $24,000 church property.

M.

Macaulay, Alexander, president of the British Wesleyan Conference, entered the ministry in 1840. From his earlier appointments in the north of England and Scotland, he was sent to London, and rendered himself essentially useful in pioneer Home Mission work. He found a district in the east of London having a population of at least 250,000 without Wesleyan ministrations. He entered on this new work preaching at first to a few persons in his own house. God blessed his labors. In this very district are now four or five chapels, each holding 1000 persons. Places have been established and consolidated, and "the poor have the gospel preached unto them." He is now the general secretary of the "Home Mission and Contingent Fund," and in 1876 was elected to the chair of the Conference.

Macdonald, G. B., of the British Wesleyan Conference, was the son of the late Rev. James Macdonald. He was converted in early youth, entered the ministry in 1825, and at once gave promise of the ability and usefulness which characterized his labors for nearly forty years. He was loved and honored by all. A ministry of great eloquence, and successful in the conversion of many souls, was suddenly brought to a close in 1863 by illness, from which he never recovered. He died in great peace in 1868, aged sixty-four.

Macdonald, John, Esq., of Toronto, Ontario, is one of the most prominent members of the Methodist Church of Canada. He was born in Perth, Scotland, in 1825. His father being in the army, young Macdonald spent two years with him in Barbadoes and two years in Dominica. He received a classical education at Upper Canada College, in Toronto; was converted and joined the Wesleyan Methodist Church in 1842. From 1847 to 1849 he spent in the ministry, commencing with a mission among the Indians in Canada. His health failing, he was appointed to Jamaica, in the West Indies. Retiring from the ministry, he commenced commercial life in Toronto in 1849, where he has remained until the present time (1877). His business house is in Toronto, but his residence is in the suburb of Yorkville, where he has been the principal agent in erecting a neat brick church. He has filled nearly every position in his church, as trustee, class-leader, superintendent of Sabbath-schools, and local preacher. He is the lay treasurer of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Church of Canada, and was a member of the first General Conference. He is a liberal contributor to church enterprises, giving the one-tenth of his income. He was the most active originator of the Japanese mission, and has made many journeys looking to the interests of the missions in the north-western part of Canada. He is also a warm friend of the Bible Society and of the Young Men's Christian Association. He was recently elected to the House of Commons by acclamation, having previously been at one time a member. He was a fraternal delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1876.

Macfarlane, Samuel, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1852. After laboring in several home circuits he was appointed, in 1873, to Christ church, New Zealand. There is no office of general superintendent in the Free Methodist body; but Mr. Macfarlane may be regarded as taking a general oversight of the missions in New Zealand. He is also editor of a magazine which is published quarterly as the official organ of the body.

MacLay, Robert S., D.D., superintendent of the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Japan, was born about 1823; was graduated from Dickinson College in 1845, and was appointed a missionary to China in 1847, being one of the second company of Methodist Episcopal missionaries who went out to that country in 1848. He was appointed superintendent of the mission at Fuh Chau, and served in that capacity till 1872, when he returned to the United States, and was appointed to the head of the mission established in that year in Japan. During his term of missionary service in China, he visited the United States in 1860-61, and again in 1872. On the occasion of his latter visit, he was delegated by his fellow-missionaries to represent them before the General Conference. While in China he did a large work in the translation and preparation of books for the use of the mission, and circulation among the Chinese. His most important contribution to literature is his "Alphabetical Dictionary of the Fuh Chau Dialect," a book of 1160 pages, which he compiled in connection with the Rev. C. C. Baldwin, of the mission of the American Board, and which was published from the Methodist Episcopal mission press at Fuh Chau. He is also the author of "Life among the Chinese."

MacLay, William James, a delegate from the California Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was graduated from Dickinson College in 1850, and joined the Baltimore Conference in 1851. He was transferred to the Oregon and California Conference in 1852. In the following year he was elected Professor of Ancient Languages in the University of the Pacific, which position he occupied till 1858, when he returned to the regular work of the ministry.

Macon, Ga. (pop. 10,810), is the largest city in Central Georgia, and the capital of Bibb County. It is the seat of the Wesleyan Female College, under the control of the M. E. Church South. Methodist services were introduced about 1820. The Mulberry Street church was erected in a few years, and has since been rebuilt. First Street church was dedicated in 1871. In the same year also the East Macon church was erected. Jones chapel was built in 1870. The African M. E. church, a large and commodious brick structure, was commenced in 1869, and completed in a few years. The Colored M. E. Church of America has a small congregation, but no church property. The churches in this city adhered to the Church South in the division of 1845. It is in the Georgia

Conference, and the following are the statistics reported in 1876:

Macon City, Mo. (pop. 3678), the capital of Macon County, is situated on the northern division of the St. Louis and Kansas City Railroad. Methodist services were introduced in 1858. The first M. E. church, costing about $2000, was erected in 1859. In 1865 the church was enlarged and improved, and again enlarged in 1874. The M. E. Church South erected a frame edifice in 1859, costing about $1000. A new building was erected in 1867, costing about $4000. The African M. E. Church built an edifice in 1867, and rebuilt it in 1876, costing about $2000. The M. E. Church, and the M. E. Church South, had each, in 1859, about 20 members. Methodism has made steady progress in this town to the present time. It is in the Missouri Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Madison College, at Uniontown, Pa., was taken under the patronage of the Pittsburgh Conference in 1827. There had previously been an academy, whose trustees transferred their building for college purposes. H. B. Bascom was appointed president, and Professor of Moral Science; Charles Elliot, Professor of Languages; and J. H. Fielding, Professor of Mathematics. One of the professors had pastoral charge of the church in the town. In 1829, Dr. Bascom resigned the presidency to become agent for the American Colonization Society. In 1831, J. H. Fielding was appointed president, and Homer J. Clark professor. In 1832 the institution suspended, as propositions had been made to the Conference to accept Alleghany College, at Meadville, in its stead; the buildings, library, and apparatus of which were greatly preferable. During the few years of its existence, however, a number of promising young men were educated, and a great impulse was given to ministerial study throughout Western Pennsylvania.

Madison, Ind. (pop. 10,709), is the capital of Jefferson County, on the Jeffersonville, Madison and Indianapolis Railroad. Methodist preaching was introduced by Rev. Walter Griffith, in 1811, when a class of six persons was organized. The class met at the house of Mr. George Burton, possibly about a year before the visit of Mr. Griffith. Elijah Sparks, an attorney and local preacher, officiated in what was then a village. The erection of the first church was commenced in 1815, and it was roofed in before the winter, but remained without seats for nearly two years. The edifice was of brick, about 25 by 40 feet. The first appointment which appears in the minutes of the church was in 1818, with John P. Kent as pastor. The congregation grew rapidly until the agitation on reform, which resulted in the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church, commenced in the society. The result was a division, which drew off some of the best members, who built a better church than that of the old society; the edifice being about 35 by 50 feet. In 1835 Wesley chapel was built, and was a plain but large and commodious church. Unfortunately, in 1842 a division took place on account of a choir, and a new church, called Roberts chapel, was organized, which built an edifice on Third Street in 1844. In 1848 St. John's church was organized, and a building erected in 1850. Trinity church, a new and handsome edifice on Broadway, was dedicated Sept. 6, 1874, by the union of Roberts and St. John's churches, which had taken place in May, 1869. The old Methodist church has long since disappeared, and St. John's and Roberts chapel were sold when the churches united. The German M. E. Church erected a good building in 1847, which was remodeled in 1876. There are also colored Methodist churches, one of which is in connection with the M. E. Church and the other with the African M. E. Church. It is in the South-eastern Indiana Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1873	Trinity.....	368	200	$30,000
1831	Wesley Chapel.....	223	120	9,500

Madison, Wis. (pop. 9176), the capital of the State, is finely situated on the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad, and is surrounded by a number of beautiful lakes. Methodist services were introduced in 1839, by Jesse Bennett. The first church was built in 1850, and was rebuilt in 1876. In 1843 the name first appears in the minutes of the church, with Thomas L. Bennett as pastor. It was then embraced in the Rock River Conference. The growth of the church was slow, as in 1845 there were only 46 members. Since that period the growth has been variable. It is in the West Wisconsin Conference, and reports 230 members, 160 Sunday-school scholars, and $43,590 church property. The German Methodists have 65 members, 29 Sunday-school scholars, and $4500 church property.

Magee, James P., agent of the Boston Depository, was born in Bangor, Ireland, Nov. 16, 1819. Removing to New York, he entered as clerk in a book-store at the age of sixteen, and at nineteen was converted and united with the Bedford Street

M. E. church. In 1849 he accepted a clerkship in the Book Concern, and was at the head of its sales department until, in 1851, he was appointed by the agents to take charge of the depository in Boston. From that time he has remained in his present position, and has built up a large business. He has been an earnest official member in the church where he resides, and has been identified with all the church movements for the last twenty years in New England.

Mahanoy, Pa. (pop. 5533), is situated in Schuylkill County, and on a branch of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1864. In 1866 it reported 108 members, 213 Sunday-school scholars, and a church valued at $8200. It is in the Philadelphia Conference, and has 95 members, 315 Sunday-school scholars, and $12,600 church property.

Maine (pop. 626,915).—In 1639, Sir Arnett Gordes obtained a charter from the council of Plymouth for all the lands now within the bounds of the State; and the territory was purchased from the heirs of Gordes, in 1678, by Massachusetts for £1250. It was admitted as a State into the Union in 1820. While much of the land is forest and mountainous, the population is moral and well educated. Methodism was introduced into this territory by Jesse Lee in 1793. In that year a Conference was held in Lynn, Mass., on the 1st of August, and the following appointment made: "Province of Maine and Lynn,—Jesse Lee." His own account is as follows: "The first Methodist sermon that was preached in the Province of Maine was on Sept. 10, 1793, at a little village called Saco, York County. That place has never been famous for religion, either before or since that time. I traveled through the greater part of that country from September to the end of the year. I went as far as Castine, at the mouth of the Penobscot River; then up the river to the upper settlements, which then were just below the Indian settlements called Old Town; from thence returned by the way of Twenty-five Mill Pond to Kennebec River: thence up to Sandy River and back to Hallowell, and then through to Portland. Although I was a perfect stranger to the people, and had to make my own appointments, I preached almost every day, and had crowded assemblies to hear. After viewing the country, I thought the most proper place to form a circuit would be on the west side of Kennebec River. The circuit was accordingly formed and called Readfield. This was the name of the first circuit that was formed by the Methodists in that part of the country, which was about 200 miles beyond any other circuit that we had in New England. It extended from Hallowell to Santee River." He also gives the following account of the introduction of Methodism into a number of the principal places: "On the 13th of October, 1793, the first Methodist sermon was preached in Hallowell; on the 15th, in Farmington; on the 17th, in New Sharon; on the 18th, in Mount Vernon; on the 19th, in Readfield; on the 21st, in Winthrop; on the 22d, in Monmouth. These were all the towns in that circuit that we preached in until the beginning of the ensuing year. On the 29th of January, 1794, we preached for the first time in Sydney; on the 11th of February, in Fayette; on the 12th, in Livermore; on the 14th, in Wayne; on the 21st, in Chesterville; on the 26th, in Jay; on the 5th of March, in Vassalborough; on the 7th, in Harlem; on the 9th, in Winslow; on the 11th, in Norridgewock; on the 12th, in Canaan; on the 12th, in Clinton; on the 13th, in Fairfield; on the 6th of April, in Green; on the 2d of June, in the New Vineyard; on the 16th, in Strong; on the 17th, in Aron; on the 3d of July, in Leeds; on the 14th, in Lewistown; on the 3d of December, in Starks; and on the 4th, in Anson." The first class was formed in Monmouth about Nov. 1, 1794: the second, shortly afterwards, in Readfield. The first Methodist church was built in Readfield, and was nearly completed by the 1st of December, 1794; the second was built in Monmouth, in 1795. The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was first administered to a Methodist congregation in Readfield on the 14th of December, 1794, and in Monmouth on the 25th of the month. The church in Readfield was dedicated June 21, 1795; the one in Monmouth the middle of May, 1796. The first quarterly meeting was held in Monmouth, commencing June 23, 1795, and the first Annual Conference was held in Readfield August 29, 1798. At that time there were 10 traveling preachers and about 200 members. The second circuit in the State was called Portland, and was organized in 1795, and the third, Penobscot, shortly after. In 1809 there were 18 circuits, and 2848 members. The first assistant preacher which Lee had was Philip Wager, who was sent to Readfield circuit in 1794. The following year he was assisted by Enoch Mudge, Elias Hull, and Joshua Hall. In 1800 the name of Joshua Soule, subsequently bishop, appears as appointed to Union River circuit. Methodism has had a constant growth in the State from its introduction until the present time; but the emigration westward is so large that the numerical increase reported from year to year is comparatively small. There are now within the bounds of the State two Conferences, the Maine and the East Maine, which reported, in 1876, the following statistics: 231 preachers, 24,068 members, 22,145 Sunday-school scholars, 227 churches, and 124 parsonages, valued at $1,089,300. The leading denominations reported, in 1840, as follows: Congregationalists, 16,308; Baptists, 20,490; Methodists, 22,359. The general statistics, as reported in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

Maine Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference in 1824, and its bounds were defined so as to "include all the State of Maine, and that part of the State of New Hampshire lying east of the White Hills, and north of the waters of Ossipee Lake." No change was made in its boundaries until the organization of the East Maine Conference, in 1848, when the Kennebec River formed the chief eastern boundary. Its limits were defined as follows by the General Conference of 1876: "Including that part of the State of Maine west of the Kennebec River from its mouth to the great bend below Skowhegan, and of a line running thence north to the State line, including Skowhegan and Augusta, and also that part of New Hampshire east of the White Hills, and north of the waters of the Ossipee Lake and the town of Gorham." The New England Conference, prior to the organization of the Maine Conference, had held several sessions in the State, the first in 1798, at Readfield, Bishop Asbury presiding. Of this Conference Bishop Asbury says: "It was computed that from 1000 to 1800 souls attended public preaching and ordination. The unfinished, temporary state of the gallery was such that the planks and other parts would crack and break. We had one alarm while ordaining, owing to the people's wish to gratify their curiosity." A second Conference was held July 1, 1802, in an upper room of a private house. Bishop Asbury records that "supplies had come to their assistance from Baltimore and New York Conferences, and there was a goodly number of faithful, zealous young men." He estimated the congregation between two and three thousand, and the ordinations were performed out-of-doors. The first session of the Maine Conference proper was held in 1825, and reported 6957 members. After the East Maine Conference had been separated from it in 1848, such had been its growth that there remained in the Maine Conference 10,634 members, with 106 traveling and 99 local preachers. The latest statistics (1876) are: 138 traveling and 190 local preachers, 13,245 members, 12,186 Sunday-school scholars, 122 churches, valued at $586,500, and 63 parsonages, valued at $90,600.

Maine Wesleyan Seminary and Female College was established in Augusta, Me., as a private school by Elibu Robinson. It was chartered in 1821, as the Readfield Religious and Charitable Society, and was removed to Kent's Hill through the interest and efforts of Luther Samson, Esq., who donated to it the sum of $10,000. This donation in those early days was a most munificent one, and should give to Mr. Samson an honorable place among the noble benefactors of literary institutions. Mr. Samson's chief object was to educate the children of Methodist preachers, and also young men preparing for the ministry. By a donation from the growing demands for the higher education of females. A commercial course, a normal course, a scientific course, a classical course, and a musical course have been recently added as the wants of the school have demanded. In 1870, the semi-centennial of its history, a new building, called Bearce Hall, from S. R. Bearce, Esq., the principal donor, was dedicated. The value of the property now owned by the institution is nearly $200,000, free from all incumbrances. The successive principals have been, Zenas Caldwell, two years; Merritt the State the school became a manual labor seminary, where, theoretically, young men could pursue their studies, learn a trade, and pay their own expenses at the same time. The scheme financially was a failure, though many men now occupying prominent positions in church and state shared its benefits. After having heavily embarrassed the institution, the manual labor department was abandoned in 1840. These embarrassments continued till the trustees were greatly discouraged, and were almost ready to surrender their charter, when Henry P. Torsey was elected principal, with the understanding that the trustees would assume no financial responsibility, and that the tuition-fees must meet the current expenses. He succeeded in infusing new life and energy into the enterprise. The old seminary building was replaced by a safe and more convenient one. The corps of teachers was enlarged, and the number of students greatly increased. In 1860 an additional building—Samson Hall—was completed through the earnest labors of Rev. S. Allen, who acted as agent, and a college course for ladies was established. Thus the seminary was among the first to recognize and meet

Caldwell, six years; William C. Larrabee, five years; Stephen Allen, three years; and Henry P. Torsey, thirty-four years. The whole number of students educated in whole or in part is estimated at 25,000. Of these, about 7000 became teachers, 400 clergymen, 350 physicians, and 300 attorneys. Two hundred and fifty have received diplomas as graduates from the courses. The library consists of about 4000 well-selected volumes, and the institution has three regularly organized literary societies. Dr. Torsey still remains (1877) at the head of the institution, and is assisted by able teachers.

Malcolm, W. D., a delegate from the Vermont Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, and editor of the Vermont Christian Messenger, was born at Albany, N. Y., about 1827, worked as a printer, studied at Newbury Seminary, and joined the Vermont Conference in 1848: he continues engaged in the regular pastoral work as well as attending to the editorial duties upon his paper. He was a member of the General Conference in 1864.

Malloy, W. L., delegate from the Texas Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Caldwell Co., Ky., in 1832, joined the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1852, and subsequently joined the Louisville Conference of that church. He was afterwards transferred to the Arkansas Conference, and thence to the Indian Mission Conference. At the beginning of the Civil War, having dissolved his connection with the Methodist Episcopal Church South, he removed to Texas. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1865, and engaged in pastoral and missionary work in North Missouri and Arkansas. He was afterwards transferred to the Texas Conference.

Manchester, N. H. (pop. 23,536) is situated on the east bank of the Merrimack River, and on the Concord and Portsmouth Railroad. It is embraced within the territory traversed by the early pioneers of Methodism, but being connected with older appointments, does not appear by name in the church minutes until 1819. Methodist services were held for several years in a union house of worship. In 1830 the first Methodist church was erected. The society had only been formed the previous year, as the result of a revival in which 80 persons had been converted. The second church was erected in 1844. It is in the New Hampshire Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Manistee, Mich. (pop. 3343), is situated on Lake Michigan. This town first appears in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1858, with J. Klepper as pastor. In 1859 it had only 2 members, but 150 Sunday-school scholars and $400 church property. In 1862 there were 24 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and $1400 church property. It is in the Michigan Conference, and has (1876) 100 members, 240 Sunday-school scholars, and $1600 church property.

Manitoba Wesleyan Institute is located in the city of Winnipeg, Canada. Its buildings were erected in 1875, at a cost of $3000. It is governed by a board of management consisting of five ministers and eight laymen, and it employs three teachers, and gives instruction not only in English, but also in the classics, mathematics, modern languages, and natural science. Classes are also taught in German, French, and short-hand. It is supported in part by the Wesleyan Education Society.

Manitowoc, Wis. (pop. 5168), the capital of a county of the same name, situated on Lake Michigan, also on the Wisconsin Central Railroad. It first appears in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1848. In 1851 there were 24 members. From that time the church has made steady advancement.

The Norwegian and German Methodists have interesting congregations. It is in the Wisconsin Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	59	70	$4000
German M. E. Church.....	86	138	2000

Mankato, Minn. (pop. 3482), the capital of Blue Earth County, is situated on the Minnesota River, a little below the mouth of the Mankato River. It is first named in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1854, with Louis Bell as pastor, and only 7 members. In 1857 it had 40 members. It is in the Minnesota Conference, and (1876) reports 125 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property. The German Methodists have about 90 members, 50 Sunday-school scholars, and $1000 church property.

Manker, J. J., a delegate from the Holston Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Brown Co., O., in December, 1839; was educated at Ohio Wesleyan University, and joined the Holston Conference in 1866. He served for three years as a professor in East Tennessee Wesleyan University, and was elected president of that institution in 1865, but declined to accept the position. He has been presiding elder and secretary of his Conference.

Manley, Robert W., was born in Muskingum Co., O., Aug. 5, 1830. He studied three years at the Ohio Wesleyan University. Leaving it in 1850, he entered the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church in 1859. He has served a number of the most prominent appointments, and was delegate to the General Conference in 1876.

Mann, John, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born at Canterbury, Sept. 27, 1813. He was converted early in life, and became a local preacher when very young. When the Reform movement commenced, he embraced its principles with characteristic ardor, and labored incessantly for their diffusion. So acceptable were his pulpit services that he was urged to abandon his secular employment, and did so in order to devote himself more fully to the work. On the subsidence of the Reform movement Mr. Mann settled down to the quieter work of the circuit ministry. On the formation of the United Methodist Free Churches, he was recognized as an itinerant minister in full connection, and two years later he was elected president of the body. For years before his death he was a great sufferer. He died in Sunderland on Dec. 13, 1872.

Though not a highly intellectual man, he possessed some remarkable gifts. He was a most vehement speaker; in his best moments the fire of his oratory was electric and irresistible. He had abundance of wit and humor, and none knew better than he how to tell an incident.

Manning, Edward S., one of the assistant secretaries of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Connecticut, served an apprenticeship at the printing business, went through a course of study at Wilbraham Academy, and joined the New England Conference in 1843. He has served as secretary of the New England Conference since 1860. He was a member of the General Conference of 1872.

Mansell, Henry, a missionary, and delegate from the India Mission Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Trumbull Co., O., Nov. 11, 1834, and was graduated from Alleghany College. He joined the Pittsburgh Conference in 1859, and went to India as a missionary in 1863. Besides serving as a preacher in the mission, he has given attention to translations and the preparation of works in the languages of the country. Among his works of this character are translations of an abridgment of Watson's "Life of Wesley," a "Geography in Hindi," an edition of the works of Josephus, Butler's "Analogy," Wesley on "Christian Perfection," and smaller works, all of which have been published from the Methodist Episcopal mission press.

Mansfield, O. (pop. 8029), the capital of Richland County, on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. Methodist worship was conducted here for the first time in 1816, by a local preacher named William B. James. The first regular ministers were A. Gough and S. Rhuars, and the first presiding elder was Jacob Young. In this year a church was built, and occupied until 1835, when it was abandoned for a larger and better one in a more suitable locality. The present church was dedicated July 3, 1870. A German Methodist society was organized in 1862, and a church built, but the society is now disbanded. It is in the North Ohio Conference, and has 515 members, 175 Sunday-school scholars, and $28,000 church property.

Marcy, Oliver, LL.D., professor in the Northwestern University, graduated from Wesleyan University in 1846, and in the same year was appointed teacher of Mathematics in the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, Mass. In 1851 he was elected teacher of Natural Science in Amenia Seminary, and to the same chair in the academy at Wilbraham. He continued in the latter position till 1862, when he was elected Professor of Physics and Natural History in the Northwestern University. In 1870 he became Professor of Natural History in that institution. In 1866 he served as a geologist on the United States survey of the Government road from Lewiston, Idaho, to Virginia City, Montana. In 1865 he was elected a corresponding member of the Boston Society of Natural History; in 1869, a corresponding member of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin; in 1871, a corresponding member of the Lyceum of Natural History, New York City, and of the Wisconsin Academy of Sciences, Arts, and Letters. He is now (1877) acting president of the Northwestern University.

Marietta, O. (pop. 5280), the capital of Washington County, on the Ohio River, is the oldest town in the State, having been settled in 1788, by a colony from New England. Methodism was introduced into the vicinity about 1800. It was then embraced within the bounds of the Muskingum and Little Kanawha circuit, which, in 1803, reported 168 members. In October, 1804, Jacob Young was appointed to this circuit, and on his first visit to Marietta stopped with Dr. McIntosh, and was confined by sickness for some three weeks, during which he received the sympathy of the leading citizens, among whom he mentions John Meigs, Captain James Whitney, and Jonas Johnson. When he recovered from his illness, he found, however, that though they had received him kindly, Methodism was very unpopular, and there was strong opposition to the establishment of services in that place. Finally, Dr. McIntosh opened his private house, a large brick building, and Mr. Young preached to a number of hearers. Shortly afterwards the trustees of the academy permitted him to hold a quarterly meeting in that edifice. Before the close of the year he organized a society of 8 persons. In the fall of 1806 Peter Cartwright was appointed to Muskingum circuit, Little Kanawha having been separated from it. At that time the circuit extended along the north bank of the Ohio River 150 miles, and crossed over the river, ascending some distance up the Little Kanawha. It was about 300 miles around, and the Ohio River was crossed four times to complete the circuit. He says, "I had hard work to keep soul and body together." In 1808 the work was divided, and Solomon Langdon was sent to Marietta circuit, who, in the following year, returned 149 members. In 1815 the number of members on the circuit was increased to over 500. Though the society in the town was comparatively small, yet from this small society went out John Stewart, a colored man, who was made instrumental in commencing a remarkable work among the Wyandot Indians. It subsequently became a station, and a second church was organized. The German Methodists and the African M. E. Church have good congregations. It is in the Ohio Conference, and reports for 1876 as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Centenary.....	187	125	$10,000
Whitney.....	110	162	5,800
German M. E. Church.....	100	158	2,500

Maris, John M., Esq., a leading member of the M. E. Church in Philadelphia. He was educated a Friend, but united with Trinity church, and was one of the chief founders of Arch Street church. He was also one of the earliest friends of lay delegation. He is a wholesale druggist.

Marlay, Michael, D.D., a distinguished Methodist minister, was born of Roman Catholic parents, in Berkeley Co., Va., June 21, 1797. Having removed to Ohio, he united with the M. E. Church in 1821, and in 1831 was admitted into the Ohio Conference. His ability as a preacher and as an executive officer placed him in prominent appointments, and for more than half of his ministry he filled the office of presiding elder. He was a member of the General Conference in 1852 and in 1860, and was appointed as one of the commissioners to manage the suit in reference to the property of the Western Book Concern. He died of cholera during the Cincinnati Conference, in 1866. Bishop Thomson said of him, "He was a great man in private as well as in public life, and one of the strongest proofs of his high moral worth is the fact that of a large family which he leaves behind him every one is an ornament to society."

Marquette, Mich. (pop. 4000), the capital of a county of the same name, is situated on the Lake Superior Railroad. This town first appears in 1854 in the annals of the M. E. Church, having 20 members, with Henry N. Brown as pastor. In 1857 it had 21 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $2250 church property. It is in the Detroit Conference, and (1876) has 141 members, 157 Sunday-school scholars, and $33,500 church property.

Marriage.—The teachings of the Methodist Churches in reference to marriage are in harmony with those of the great body of evangelical Christians. They view marriage as a sacred institution, and as joining together for life the parties who are thus united. While the church has not legislated distinctly on the subject of divorce, it has discouraged all divorces except for the cause of adultery, as stated by the Saviour. The church also discourages its members from being united in marriage with infidel or irreligious persons, because of the influence which such exercise over the whole life. The following rules selected from the Discipline set forth the views of the church: "Many of our members have married with unawakened persons. This has produced bad effects; they have been either hindered for life or have turned back to perdition. To discourage such marriages, 1. Let every preacher publicly enforce the apostle's caution, 'Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers,' II. Cor. vi. 14. 2. Let all be exhorted to take no step in so weighty a matter without advising with the more serious of their brethren. In general women ought not to marry without the consent of their parents. Yet there may be exceptions. For if, 1, a woman believe it to be her duty to marry; if, 2, her parents absolutely refuse to let her marry any Christian; then she may, nay, ought to marry without their consent. Yet even then a Methodist preacher ought not to be married to her. We do not prohibit our people from marrying persons who are not of our church, provided such persons have the form and are seeking the power of godliness; but we are determined to discourage their marrying persons who do not come up to this description." The reason for this advice and for these directions is found in the fact that many religious young people have been led into lives of thoughtlessness, if not wickedness, by their intimate association with the infidel and the immoral. Such advice is in harmony with the teachings of the New Testament. The marriage ceremony in the ritual of the church is very similar to that of the Church of England, from which it was modified, and is one of great beauty and simplicity.

Marriage of Ministers.—The 21st Article of Religion in the Methodist Discipline reads as follows: "The ministers of Christ are not commanded by God's law either to avow the estate of single life or to abstain from marriage. Therefore it is allowable for them, as for all other Christians, to marry at their own discretion as they shall judge the same to serve best to godliness." This is a clear and explicit declaration against the necessary celibacy of the priesthood as taught by the Romish Church. In view, however, of the necessity of study in their younger years, as well as the difficulty of support, young ministers are advised against marriage while serving their probation. In the minutes of the English Wesleyan Conference was this note: "A preacher who marries while on trial is thereby set aside." In the early Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church no provision was made for the support of the family of a minister who married during his first four years. The reasons for these cautions are found in the inability of many societies to support families, and in the conviction that during the years of study young ministers should not be encumbered with domestic cares. The fourth rule for preachers' conduct is: "Take no step toward marriage without first advising with your brethren." This advice was to be obtained from the ministers, and probably those chiefly who were connected by official relations with the younger ministry. One of the objects was to prevent young men from forming unfavorable alliances in the midst of communities where they had not been long acquainted.

Marsden, Geo., an English Wesleyan minister, was a man of a pure, blameless, and honorable life, eminent for the "charity" which "never faileth."

His pulpit ministrations were clear, powerful, and rich in unction. He was for some time one of the general secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society; was twice elected president of the Conference; and in 1833 went as delegate to Canada. In 1842 he became a supernumerary, but continued to work for God as long as any strength remained; he calmly sank to rest in 1858, aged eighty-five.

Marsh, William, a useful Methodist minister, was born in Orono, Me., May 4, 1789. He joined the New England Conference in 1811, and after filling appointments until 1820, he was superannuated, and the following year located. In 1829 he re-entered the Conference, and subsequently filled some of the most prominent appointments, having been presiding elder of the Bangor and Portland districts. His religious experience was deep, and as a preacher he had few equals.

Marshall, Hon. J. W., an educator and civilian, graduated at Dickinson College, and became Professor of Mathematics in that institution. After filling that position for several years, he traveled extensively in Europe. Subsequently he was appointed, in General Grant's administration, First Assistant Postmaster-General, the duties of which office he filled until lately, when he was transferred to another position in the same department. From his youth he has been a devoted member of the M. E. Church.

Marshall, Mich. (pop. 4000), is the capital of Calhoun County, on the right bank of the Kalamazoo River. It is first mentioned in the records of the M. E. Church in 1837, when Marshall circuit was organized and Elijah Crane was preacher in charge, who, in 1838, reported 224 members. It is in the Detroit Conference, and has 188 members, 180 Sunday-school scholars, and $19,000 church property.

Marshall, William K., a delegate from the Kansas Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Ohio, about 1835, and received his early training in Pennsylvania. He was editor of the Brownsville Times when, about 1858, he decided to become a minister. He joined the Pittsburgh Conference in 1860, and was transferred to the Kansas Conference in 1866.

Marshalltown, Iowa (pop. 3218), the capital of Marshall County, is on the Iowa division of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. The first regular Methodist services in the place were conducted by Solomon Dutton, a local elder, in 1852. There was Methodist preaching in the place the year after by Joseph Jameson, who was in charge of Marengo mission, and in 1854 the work at Marshalltown was in the charge of William Armstrong. The society built a church in 1860, and remodeled it in 1875. It is in the Upper Iowa Conference, and has 380 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and $15,000 church property.

Martin, Alexander, D.D., president of the Indiana Asbury University, was educated in Alleghany College, from which he graduated. In 1847

REV. ALEXANDER MARTIN, D.D.

he entered the Pittsburgh Conference, and became teacher in the Northwestern Virginia Academy, at Clarksburg. At the division of the Pittsburgh Conference, in 1848, he fell within the bounds of the West Virginia Conference, and in 1849 was stationed at Charleston. In 1851 he became the principal of the Northwestern Virginia Academy, where he remained until 1854, when he was stationed at Elizabethtown. In 1855 he became professor in Alleghany College, in which he remained until 1864, when he resigned and re-entered the pastorate, and was stationed at Fourth Street, Wheeling, and at Parkersburg. In 1868 he was elected president of the Western Virginia University, at Morgantown, in which position he remained until 1875, when he became president of the Indiana Asbury University, which position he still holds. Dr. Martin was secretary of the West Virginia Conference for a number of years, and was delegate to the General Conference in 1868 and in 1872.

Martin, Hon. Benjamin F., a lay delegate from the West Virginia Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Marion Co., W. Va., in 1828. He was graduated from Alleghany College in 1854, and afterwards entered the practice of law in his native county. In 1861 he was chosen a member of the convention which framed the constitution of West Virginia. In 1872 he was elected to the National House of Representatives from the second congressional district of West Virginia, but was unseated on account of an informality in the day on which the election was held. He was re-elected, and is a member of the present (1877) Congress. He is an active and devoted member of the M. E. Church.

Martin, John T., Esq., of Brooklyn, N. Y., was born in Baltimore, Md., Oct. 2, 1816. He was educated in St. Mary's College, and was early trained in mercantile business in Baltimore. His friends were members of the Protestant Episcopal Church, but at the age of sixteen he joined old Light Street M. E. church. He commenced business on his own account at the age of eighteen in Bellair, but in the year 1835 removed to St. Louis, where he resided for fourteen years, building up a large business, and acting as recording steward and secretary of the Sabbath-school in the Fourth Street church. In that city he formed the acquaintance of Rev. Mr. Jacoby, and becoming interested in the German work, he subsequently built the Martin Institute, in Frankfort-on-the-Main, for the education of young German preachers. Removing to New York, he settled in Brooklyn, and connected himself with the old Pacific Street church, which becoming too small, the present church was erected, of which he was long the president of the board of trustees. His health having suffered from overwork, he retired for a time from business, but at the breaking out of the Civil War he returned to business and supplied the government with clothing and flannels to the amount of nearly $50,000,000; sometimes the government, in periods of difficulty, were owing him from $8,000,000 to $13,000,000. He has since retired from business except continuing as director in several banks and insurance companies. At the General Conference in Brooklyn, in 1872, the unusually pleasant arrangements for the General Conference in the Academy of Music were largely owing to his energy.

Martin Institute, Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany.—In 1858 three young men at Bremen asked for an opportunity to prepare themselves for the ministry, and on the 19th of February, 1858, the Bremen church resolved to begin a school of the prophets, provided the indorsement of the Home Missionary Board at New York could be obtained. Rev. Lewis Nippert was elected President, E. C. Poppe Secretary, and Dr. L. S. Jacoby Treasurer. The school was opened with three students, and the German missions responded so liberally with contributions that at the session of the Annual Conference in 1858, board, clothing, and tuition had been furnished, and a small surplus remained in the treasury. The concurrence of the Mission Board from New York having been received, Rev. L. S. Jacoby, D.D., was appointed director, and Rev. William Schwarz became professor. Seven students entered, and Theodore Garnier and wife, from Friedrichsdorf, became the "Hauseltern," or parents of the young men. As Mr. Garnier broke down in health he left the school in 1859, but gave 450 gulden as the foundation-stone for a home, and the German missions contributed more than 900 thalers, Prussian currency, that year for current expenses. Oct. 1, 1860, the home was dedicated, and in 1861, Dr. Wm. F. Warren, of the New England Conference, now president of the Boston University, was transferred to Germany, and entered as Professor of Theology at the Missions Anstalt. Having previously been a student at Halle and Berlin, he soon became quite conversant with the German language, and by his zeal and fidelity endeared himself to the hearts of the German students. The academical branches were taught by teachers from the city. The school grew, the building became too small, and in the centenary year of American Methodism God moved the heart of John T. Martin, Esq., of Brooklyn, N. Y., to donate $25,000 for the erection of a building. In 1867 the school was more centrally located by removing it to Frankfort-on-the-Main, where a beautiful building was erected, and the name of the institution was changed to "Martin Missions Anstalt."

Dr. J. F. Hurst, now president of Drew Theological Seminary, was transferred to Germany in October, 1866, and very soon became sufficiently proficient in the use of the German language to enable him to be a useful professor. Rev. Lewis

Nippert was made director of the Anstalt in 1869, and holds that position to date, and Dr. Paulus, now professor in German Wallace College, Berea, O., became also associated as professor in the school. Most of the preachers in the Germany and Switzerland Conferences have received instruction in its halls. Dr. Sulzberger, an accomplished scholar and writer, is now at its head. It has been of vast

It was included in the old Berkeley circuit, one of the first circuits organized in the church, and which maintained its identity for many years. The town being small, does not appear on the annals of the M. E. Church until 1850, when Henry Furlong was appointed to the circuit. In 1851 it contained 165 members. It

Martindale, Stephen, a distinguished minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Maryland in 1788, and entered the itinerant ministry in 1808. For fifty-three years he filled important appointments in Philadelphia and New York Conferences. For twenty years he was presiding elder on various districts, and was a member of nearly every General Conference between 1820 and 1856. He died at Tarrytown, N. Y., May 23, 1860.

Marvin, Enoch M., D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Warren Co., Mo., June 12, 1823, his parents having removed thither from Massachusetts. In August, 1839, he united with the church at a camp-ground in St. Charles County. In 1841 he entered the ministry in the Missouri Conference, and in his fourth year was stationed in St. Louis. He was for a time agent for St. Charles College, and was also pastor of the Centenary and First churches in St. Louis. During the Civil War he served for two years as chaplain in the Confederate army under General Price, remaining a part of the time at Marshall station, in Texas. In 1866 he was elected bishop, and spent a little more than eleven years in the episcopacy, being the youngest and yet one of the most earnest and successful in the board of bishops. He traveled extensively throughout the Conferences, and completed a missionary tour around the world on the 10th of August, 1877, having been absent just one year. He was attacked about a week before his death with symptoms of pleurisy, and died of pneumonia, Nov. 26, 1877.

Bishop Marvin had written several works: a small book on "Transubstantiation," another on "Christ's Atonement," and a "Biography of the Rev. W. G. Capels." He had also in press a sketch of his tour around the world, entitled "To the East by Way of the West."

Maryland (pop. 780,894) received its first settlement in 1631, by a party from Virginia under Captain William Clayborne. The following year a charter was granted to Lord Baltimore by Charles I., and the name Maryland was given in honor of Queen Henrietta Maria. About 200 Roman Catholic emigrants arrived in 1632, under the protection of Lord Baltimore. Between them and the previous settlers there was some altercation, and a conflict was frequently threatened. After the British Revolution of 1680, Sir Lionel Copley was sent as governor of the Maryland colony. A dispute as to the boundary gave rise to the appointment of Messrs. Mason and Dixon to survey the line between Pennsylvania and Maryland, and gave rise to the phrase "Mason and Dixon's Line." In 1776 a convention assembled, a constitution was adopted, and the first legislature convened the following year. In 1783, at a session of Congress held at Annapolis, General Washington resigned his commission as commander-in-chief of the army. A new constitution was adopted in 1867. Religious liberty was secured to Maryland, not, as is supposed by some, by the toleration of the Roman Catholics under Lord Calvert, but because the Protestant government of England would not allow a Catholic colony to be constructed, but required free toleration for the exercise of the Protestant religion. The first Methodist society was organized on Sam's Creek, in what is now Carroll County, by Robert Strawbridge or Strobridge. He was a local preacher from Ireland, who settled in what was then Frederick County, probably about 1765. With but little culture, he possessed great earnestness, opened his own house for preaching, and formed a small society. Subsequently a log house was built about a mile from his residence, but was never finished. Mr. Strawbridge preached at various points of the country, though there is no accurate report left us of his work. In 1769 he was joined by Robert Williams, a local preacher from England, a man of considerable culture and fine business qualities, and the following year they were joined by John King, a man of flaming zeal, who introduced Methodism into Baltimore. Under the preaching of Strawbridge, Richard Owen, who soon afterwards became the first native Methodist preacher, was converted: he entered the traveling connection in 1785. No permanent society was established in Baltimore, however, until the arrival of Francis Asbury, who devoted considerable time to that city, in which two churches were built in 1773. At the first Conference held in Philadelphia, in 1773, 500 members were reported in Maryland. These were scattered on the Eastern Shore and through the region north and west of Baltimore. At the breaking out of the Revolutionary War the English ministers, except Asbury, prepared to leave the country, and Baltimore became the great centre of Methodist operations, partly because the first native preachers had been raised up there, and partly because it was less affected by the incidents of the war. The territory having been deserted by many of the ministers of the English church, a number of the leading citizens became connected with the Methodist societies. The work also spread rapidly among the colored population. In 1797 there were reported in Maryland 6982 white members and 5706 colored members. The Light Street church, in Baltimore, was regarded by Bishop Asbury as his special home. He had a room connected with the building, in which he kept his books and manuscripts, and where at long intervals he resided for a few days. The first Methodist college was founded at Abingdon, in this State, in 1785, and after its destruction the institution was established in Baltimore, but the building being destroyed within a year from its commencement, no further efforts were made. The church grew very rapidly, but in 1824 it became the centre of what was known as the "Radical Movement," which resulted in the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church. The organ of the Reformers, The Mutual Rights, was printed in that city, and the first union societies in which the Reformers organized were commenced there. The Convention of 1828, which formed the Associate Methodist Churches, subsequently changing their name to Methodist Protestant, was held in the city. A warm controversy followed, which retarded the growth of the church for some time. Being upon the border, and the Methodist sentiment generally being anti-slavery, the church was affected by the agitation on this subject. The Baltimore Conference adhered closely to the Methodist Discipline, and in 1844 suspended one of their members for having received slaves by marriage and declining to set them free. The appeal was taken to the General Conference, and the decision of the Baltimore Conference confirmed. This was one of the causes which led to the formation of the M. E. Church South. At the division the Baltimore Conference remained connected with the M. E. Church, but suffered, especially in its Virginia border, from the formation of societies of the M. E. Church South and the secession of members. After the action of the General Conference in 1860, a Convention was called, and in 1861 a portion of the Baltimore Conference declared its independence of the General Conference. The breaking out of the Civil War added to the excitement, and there were large secessions from the Methodist Episcopal Church, which, after the close of the war, united with the Methodist Episcopal Church South. There are now in Maryland the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church, which embraces the Western Shore of Maryland, the District of Columbia, and a part of the valley of Virginia, and a small portion of West Virginia; the Wilmington Conference embraces the Eastern Shore of Maryland; the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church South covers the State of Maryland, but also includes the District of Columbia and a portion of Virginia. The Maryland Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church is embraced chiefly in this State. The colored population of the M. E. Church is included on the Eastern Shore in the Delaware Conference, and on the Western Shore in the Washington Conference. There are also Conferences of the African M. E. Church, and of the Zion M. E. Church, which have a considerable membership. The denominational statistics, as reported in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

Maryland Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces all the State of Maryland and that part of Virginia not included in the Virginia district, the State of Delaware, the District of Columbia, and all that part of Pennsylvania west of the Susquehanna River not included in the Pittsburgh district, and that part of the State of Pennsylvania east of the Susquehanna River (except Hummelstown mission) not included in the Pennsylvania district. It shall also embrace Charleston, S. C., and Newark, N. J., until they shall otherwise elect." At the Conference of 1877 it contained 110 itinerant and 53 unstationed preachers, 13,402 members, 12,447 Sunday-school scholars, 204 churches, and 44 parsonages, valued at $785,265.

Marysville, Cal. (pop. 4728), is the capital of Yuba County, on Feather River. At the organization of the Oregon and California Conference, in 1851, Marysville appears as one of the appointments. In 1853 the California Conference held its first session and a Marysville district was organized, and H. C. Benson was sent to Marysville. In 1856 it reported 37 members. It is in the California Conference, and has 98 members, 120 Sunday-school scholars, and $7500 church property.

Mason, John, an English Wesleyan minister, was for many years well known and highly esteemed. He entered the ministry in 1811. In 1824 he became one of the secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. In 1827 he was appointed to the office of book steward, and for nearly thirty-seven years he commanded the confidence and gratitude of his brethren by uninterrupted diligence, fidelity, and success. He never laid aside his ministerial work for secular engagements; was leader of a class at City Road; preached twice every Sunday. He kept at his post and toiled till the last days of his life, and died March 1, 1864, in the eighty-third year of his life.

Mason, Russell Zelotes, LL.D., late president of Lawrence University, was born January 17, 1819. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1844, and joined the Troy Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the same year. He became teacher of Mathematics in the Troy Conference Academy in 1846, went to California in 1849, and returned to the Troy Conference Academy in 1851. In the latter year he was elected Professor of Mathematics and the Natural Sciences in McKendree College. He was transferred, in 1854, to a similar position in the Lawrence University; became acting president of that institution in 1859, and president in 1861. In 1865 he was elected mayor of Appleton, Wis.

Massachusetts (pop. 1,457,351).—The landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth, in 1620, is too well known to need recital. In 1643 the Colonies of Plymouth, Massachusetts Bay, New Haven, and Connecticut formed, for mutual protection, a union, under the title of the "United Colonies of New England." In 1779 a State constitution was formed, and the first legislature under this constitution met in Boston in 1780. During his visit to America, Charles Wesley preached in Boston in 1736, on his way from Georgia to England.

Richard Boardman visited Boston in 1772, and William Black, the founder of Methodism in Nova Scotia, spent several weeks there in 1784. In 1787, Freeborn Garrettsen, passing through Boston, found three persons who had been members of the society formed by Boardman, but the organization had failed for lack of pastoral care. He preached several sermons in private houses, and went South, hoping to return again, but was induced by Bishop Asbury to ascend the Hudson and explore that part of New York. In 1790, Jesse Lee was appointed to this part of New England, and preached his first sermon in Boston on the 9th of July. No house being opened to him, he took his stand on a table under a great elm on the Common, and commenced singing one of the songs of Zion. Before closing he had a crowd of two or three thousand people. The next morning he left Boston, and preached successively in Salem, Ipswich, Newburyport, Portsmouth, New Mills, and Marblehead, and returned to Boston, having traveled in a little more than a week 130 miles on horseback, made his own appointments, and preached nine times. From Boston he went to Lynn, where he organized the first society in the State, Feb. 20, 1791. The society, which consisted at first of but 8 members, soon largely increased, and on the 14th of June he commenced the erection of the first Methodist church in the State, which was raised on the 21st of the month, and dedicated on the 26th, entering it for worship in less than two weeks from the date in which the foundation was laid. Lee had thus formed in Massachusetts one large circuit, and reported to the Conference, in 1791, 1 circuit, 1 society, and 58 members. Additional laborers were sent the following year, and in 1796 there were reported for Massachusetts 824 members. The State is chiefly embraced in the New England Conference, though a portion of the western part is in the Troy Conference, and a portion of the southeastern part in Providence Conference. During the anti-slavery excitement the progress of Methodism was somewhat retarded by the Wesleyan secession in 1842-43. Since that period the progress in the State has been fair, the ratio of growth somewhat exceeding that of population. There are a few Wesleyan and a few Methodist Protestant societies scattered through the State. The African M. E. Church and the African M. E. Zion Church have also a few congregations. The first Methodist literary institution, which continues in prosperity, was founded in this State at Wilbraham, and is widely known. Recently the Boston University has opened its halls under favorable circumstances, and the theological school formerly at Concord has become one of its departments. The denominational statistics, as given in the United States census of 1870, are as follows:

Massillon, O. (pop. 5185), is in Stark Co., O., on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. It first appears in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1848, with James A. Kellum as pastor. It had been for some time connected in a circuit with surrounding towns. In 1849 it had 111 members. It is in the North Ohio Conference, and has 335 members, 324 Sunday-school scholars, and $13,000 church property.

Mather, George, assistant secretary of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, and delegate from the North Ohio Conference, was born in England, and came to the United States in his youth. He was graduated from the Ohio Wesleyan University in 1858, and was in the same year elected Professor of Mathematics and the Natural Sciences in the Wesleyan Female College, at Delaware, O. He retired from this position after four years of service, and engaged in pastoral work in the North Ohio Conference. He was for four years secretary of that body.

Mather, John, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England: entered the itinerant ministry in 1844, and was elected president of the Annual Assembly in 1869. Mr. Mather is a member of the foreign missionary committee, and a trustee and life-governor of Ashville College.

Matlack, Lucius C., D.D., was born in Baltimore, April 28, 1816; converted and admitted to Union church, Philadelphia, in 1832; was licensed to preach and recommended to the Philadelphia Annual Conference in 1837. Because identified with "modern abolitionism" he was rejected at that Conference, by a unanimous vote, both in 1837 and in 1838. For the same reason his name was stricken from the Local Preachers' Association, and license to preach was withheld in 1839. Presuming to preach without license, he was threatened by the pastor with expulsion. In June, 1839, by invitation of Presiding Elder Kilburn, and at the request of the churches, he was made junior preacher with Orange Scott, in Lowell, Mass. He united with the New England Conference in 1840, and was stationed in Holliston and Boston. With O. Scott and others, in 1843, he aided in organizing the "Wesleyan Methodist Connection." Afterwards he

Entering the Union army as chaplain of the 8th Illinois Cavalry, he afterwards became a field-officer in the 17th Illinois Cavalry, with important commands, and when mustered out, in 1866, was colonel by brevet. In 1867 the Philadelphia Annual Conference, by unanimous vote, reversed their position of thirty years previous, and admitted him to their body. His pastoral work has been performed since then in Elkton, Md., New Orleans, Wilmington, and Middletown, Del.

Mattison, Hiram, D.D., was born in Herkimer Co., N. Y., Feb. 8, 1811, and died in Jersey City, Nov. 24, 1868. He was converted in 1834, and received into the Black River Conference in 1836. His health failing, he was superannuated in 1840. In 1850 he again became effective, and subsequently was appointed professor in Falley Seminary. He served for several terms as secretary of his Conference. In 1852 declining health compelled him to take a superannuated relation, and removing to the city of New York, he filled several appointments, and was chiefly instrumental in erecting Trinity M. E. church. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1848, 1852, and 1856. Fancying the church was not sufficiently pronounced against slavery, he withdrew from it in 1861 and became pastor of an independent Methodist church, which he served until 1865, when he returned to the church again and was appointed to Jersey City, where he resided until his death. The last year of his life he was secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union. He was an eloquent preacher, a forcible writer, and a ready debater. He wrote several volumes, among which are "The Immortality of the Soul," "The Resurrection of the Body," "Scriptural Defence of the Doctrines of the Trinity," and also a number of secular books.

Mauch Chunk, Pa. (pop. 3841), is the capital of Carbon County, on the west bank of the Lehigh River. In 1827 a Methodist class was formed by William Colbert, and the next year it was regularly organized and taken into a six weeks' circuit traveled by J. Chattell. In 1830 Mauch Chunk and Port Carbon were made a charge, with the name of Port Carbon mission. In 1833 the work took the name of Mauch Chunk mission, including Nesquehoning, Orwigsburg, Lehighton, and Tamaqua, and was placed in charge of A. K. Street, under whose pastorate the first M. E. church of Mauch Chunk was built. The panic of 1837 threw the society into disorder, and it was absorbed by the Stroudsburg circuit, but in 1838 Mauch Chunk was made a station. In 1843, when it had a membership of 200, a larger church was begun, which was finished in the following year. In 1863 a parsonage was bought. In 1868 the society in East Mauch Chunk was organized and its chapel built, and in 1869 it was set off as a separate charge. In 1870 the chapel in Upper Mauch Chunk was bought, and in 1874 the present beautiful church was erected. It is in the Philadelphia Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Mauch Chunk	157	451	$23,500
East Mauch Chunk...	75	123	12,000
Upper Mauch Chunk	175

Mawson, Henry T., connectional treasurer of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was appointed to this office in 1871, and has been re-elected by the Annual Assembly from year to year. He has retired from business, and resides at Harrogate, Yorkshire. He is a local preacher. He is one of the trustees of Ashville College, which is situated near his own residence.

Maxfield, Thomas, Mr. Wesley's first lay preacher in England, was born about 1720: was converted at Bristol, and was subsequently appointed "to pray and expound the Scriptures, but not to preach," during Mr. Wesley's absence from the Foundry church, London. He soon, however, began to preach with great earnestness, and although Mr. Wesley was at first displeased, yet, after listening to one of his sermons, he gave him permission to preach. He attended the first Methodist Conference in 1744, and the third, in 1746; he suffered in his work both imprisonment and persecution. He was subsequently ordained by the bishop of Londonderry, and in 1764 became separated from Mr. Wesley on account of a doctrinal difference. With Thomas Bell he became the head of a congregation which seceded from the Foundry church. He died in 1785.

Maxwell, Lady Darcy, by birth belonged to a Scottish family of considerable antiquity. Her maiden name was Darcy Brisbane, youngest daughter of Thomas Brisbane, of Brisbane, in the county of Ayr. Her education was commenced at her parental home and continued at Edinburgh. When sixteen years of age she went to reside for a time in London with her uncle and aunt, Lord and Lady Lothian, for the purpose of being presented at court. Her stay in London was cut short by the death of her aunt, the Marchioness of Lothian, and soon after her return home her marriage occurred with Lord Walter Maxwell, Bart., of Pollock. He lived but two years, and their only son survived him only six weeks, leaving Lady Maxwell, widowed and childless, at the age of nineteen years. She is said to have remarked of these trials, "I see God requires my whole heart, and he shall have it." Her early life had been one of peculiar thoughtfulness, but her biographies date her conversion from this period. She rarely alluded to it, as it seemed too intimately connected with her great sorrows. The most that remains on record is this statement to an intimate friend: "God brought me to himself by afflictions." In 1772, nearly ten years later, she alludes to this period in the following manner in the diary which she always kept:

"He gave me to taste of what the world calls happiness, possession of riches, honor, and pleasure. But he saw that I could not bear this, and with a hand graciously severe took all from me, until the language of my heart, almost callous with repeated strokes of his rod, was 'Fate drop the curtain. I can lose no more.' Having thus drawn me into the wilderness, he spoke comfortably to me, drew me with the cords of his love, and taught me, as I could bear them, the lessons of his grace." It was during this period of sorrow that she became acquainted with the Methodists. The early preaching of John Wesley and of Whitefield was, at this time, much esteemed in Scotland, though it met much contempt and opposition in England.

Lady Maxwell first heard Mr. Wesley in Edinburgh, on June 16, 1764. Four days later he wrote her on the subject of her soul's acceptance with God. Clear evidence of this acceptance did not come until four years later, and during this interval the correspondence with Wesley continued. Of her manner of life, it is said that she rose at 4 A.M., attended preaching at 5 o'clock, and the morning, until 11 A.M., was given to her household cares. From 11 to 12 she passed in private devotion. Her afternoons passed in reading, writing, works of benevolence, or society of friends. She read many works on religion. From the time of obtaining justifying grace she believed in, strove for, and experienced sanctifying grace. She believed divine faithfulness and love as equally pledged to deliver from all unrighteousness as to forgive the believing penitent; that the fountain was opened for uncleanness of heart and nature as well as for guilt of conscience. She is described as tall and very erect, with an eye expressive of great intelligence. Great natural dignity sometimes concealed her tenderness, and her plainness of dress did not prevent a majestic and imposing appearance. She is said to have shown the graceful sweetness of bearing that distinguished her at twenty years of age when she had reached nearly seventy. Her thoughts were elevated, her language refined and intelligent. Her piety was sound, deep, and consistent; her benevolence marked. Every institution of public or private charity for all classes of moral, or physical, or spiritual help had her support. Her biographer, who had intimate knowledge of her for eleven years, describes her as a woman worthy to be a model for the modern mothers and daughters of Methodism.

Mayall, James M., was born in York Co., Me., July 25, 1824. At the age of fifteen he made a profession of religion, and was licensed to preach in his eighteenth year. He united with the Boston Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church in 1848. He has been identified with the educational interests of the church ever since his connection with it. Early in his ministry he served two years in collecting funds for a Methodist Protestant College. He has since been agent for Madison College, trustee of Henry College, one of the prime movers of La Harpe Seminary, and a trustee of Adrian College since its transfer. He was president of the Boston Conference three terms, of the North Illinois two terms, and several times has been elected representative to the General Conferences. As editor and publisher he has had considerable experience, being connected with the Olive Branch, Boston, the Olive Leaf, Lowell, and the Adrian Expositor, of the city of Adrian, Mich. He has contributed to various periodicals, and has now in hand "The Church-Members' Manual" and "A Hand-Book for Young Married People," soon to be issued.

Maysville, Ky. (pop. 4705), is the capital of Mason County, on the Ohio River. It was included in the Limestone circuit, which was formed in 1790, when Samuel Tucker and Joseph Lillard were appointed pastors. The flat-boat in which Mr. Tucker and a number of friends were descending the Ohio River to his appointment was attacked by the Indians near Brush Creek, and all the party soon killed but Mr. Tucker, who was mortally wounded; but he continued to load and fire, and thus defend the boat. Just as the boat was landed at Maysville he expired, "shouting the praises of God." That year Mr. Lillard reported 66 members. In 1805 Jacob Young was on the circuit. He found but 14 Methodists in that town. He "preached on Sunday, and had a lively class-meeting." The second year he was on that charge there was a revival at this place, which continued throughout the year. This he regarded as one of his prosperous years. It was the scene of bitter controversy after the separation of the M. E. Church South, as the society was divided. Both churches have still continued. The city is in the Kentucky Conference, and the following are the statistics:

McAnn, Isaac, a delegate from the Vermont Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Ireland, removed to Nova Scotia, where he was engaged for seven years as a teacher, and joined the Vermont Conference in 1852. He has filled various important appointments and has served as presiding elder.

McAnally, David Rice, D.D., editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, was born in Granger Co., Tenn., Feb. 17, 1810. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1831, and preached in Tennessee, North Carolina, and Virginia. In 1843 he was elected president of the East Tennessee Female Institute, at Knoxville, where he remained for eight years. In 1851 he was elected editor of the St. Louis Christian Advocate, in which position he has continued with a slight intermission until the present time. He has written several works: a biography of "Martha Lawrence Ramsay," "Life and Times of Mr. William Patton," "Sunday-School Manual," etc.

McArthur, Alexander, Esq., M.P., of London, England, is the younger son of a Wesleyan minister, the late Rev. J. McArthur, of Londonderry. He was born in 1814, and resided for some years in Sydney, Australia, where, in partnership with an elder brother, he was largely engaged in shipping business as a merchant there and in London. He became a wealthy and influential man, was a member first of the House of Assembly, and then of the Legislative Council, and returned to London, where he now resides. Mr. A. McArthur was a member of the first school-board for London, and is member of Parliament for Leicester. He is also a liberal supporter of all Wesleyan institutions.

McArthur, Wm., Esq., M.P., the eldest son of the late Rev. John McArthur of the Irish Conference, was born in 1810. He was a merchant in Londonderry for many years, but removed to London twenty years ago. He was associated with the Rev. Wm. Arthur and Dr. Robinson Scott on the deputation sent to the United States by the Irish Conference in the interests of the "Fund for the increase of Wesleyan agency in Ireland." He nobly represented the culture and enterprise of the Methodist laymen of the Old World. His wealth and capabilities were soon perceived in London, and civic honors were thrust upon him. He is a member of the "Board of Aldermen," was high sheriff for London and Middlesex in 1868, and has for many years represented Lambeth—one of the city boroughs—in the House of Commons. He was chosen a member of the first Irish Conference that admitted laymen, and did much to promote the union between the Primitive Wesleyans and the parent body. He took a prominent part in the debate in the House of Commons on the "Disestablishment of the Irish church," and rendered efficient aid to Mr. Gladstone and the Liberal party. The recent protectorate of the Feejee Islands by Great Britain was largely brought about by the luminous statements and persistent efforts of Mr. McArthur. The islands, as the scene of the grandest triumphs of Wesleyan missions, are dear to all Methodist hearts, and his labors being finally successful in securing the islanders protection from slave-dealers, have secured for himself permanent fame.

McBride, Jesse, a native of Ohio, and a young member of the Alleghany Wesleyan Conference, was, in 1848, associated with Crooks and Bacon as a missionary to the South. He was arrested, tried, and convicted of misdemeanor, for giving to a little white girl, Lora Kennedy, a copy of "The Ten Commandments," a tract against slavery. The trial was had at the Superior Court, Forsyth Co., N. C., in September, 1849, Judge Manly presiding. The prosecuting attorney was aided by Messrs. Gilmer and Waddel. The defendant employed Messrs. Morehead and Mendenhall. The speeches were from one to three hours long. Two days were occupied with the trial. His sentence was to "stand at the pillory one hour, receive twenty stripes, and be imprisoned one year." An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, but a forfeit of $1000 was imposed by the judge if he circulated any more of "The Ten Commandments!" Before the court sat a mob was raised, and Jesse McBride was driven from the State of North Carolina. He was a very devoted man and zealous preacher, whom the Lord owned and blessed with great success, and after a few years removed him from labor to reward.

McCabe, Charles C., D.D., was born in Athens, O., Oct. 11, 1836; was converted at eight years of age; educated at the Ohio Wesleyan University, and entered the Ohio Conference in 1860. His first appointment was Putnam. In the fall of 1862 he enlisted as chaplain in the 126th Ohio

Infantry, and on the battle-field of Winchester, Va., was captured and sent to Libby Prison, where he remained four months. On his release he rejoined his regiment, but was pressed into the service of the Christian Commission, in whose interests he made large collections. At the close of the war he was stationed in Portsmouth, O., and during his pastorate a large and handsome church was erected. In the centenary year he served as agent for that cause, and in 1868 was appointed agent of the Church Extension Society, and subsequently as assistant corresponding secretary of the Board of Church Extension, which place he still holds. His chief work has been in raising a Loan Fund, in which he has been eminently successful. He took part in preparing the "Winnowed Hymns," which has had an immense circulation.

McCabe, Lorenzo D., LL.D., professor in the Ohio Wesleyan University, is a member of the Cincinnati Conference. After filling various appointments in the pastorate, he was elected to a chair in the Ohio Wesleyan University, and still retains his connection with it. He was for some time acting president of the institution, prior to the election of Dr. Payne.

McCaine, Alexander, was born in Dublin, Ireland, (about) 1768. He was early designated by his parents for the Roman Catholic priesthood; but, emigrating to America at the age of twenty, his mind partook of the freedom which everywhere impressed him in the New World. He was converted at Charleston, S. C., under the ministry of the Rev. William Hammett, in the old Cumberland Street church. Mr. McCaine began preaching in Charleston; and from that city Bishop Asbury took him as his traveling companion. McCaine was a great favorite with the bishop. For several years he gave attention to literature. He was appointed by the bishop to compile a commentary on the Scriptures, which task was never finished. In 1827 he published his "History and Mystery;" in 1829, his "Defense of the Truth;" and in 1850, his "Letter on Episcopacy." As a writer he was scholarly, clear and forcible, although at times caustic and severe. He was a member of the Convention, and also of the committee which drafted the Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church, in 1830. His labors toward the latter part of his life were confined to the South, where he finished his course, and died in peace, at Montgomery, Ala., June 1, 1856.

McCaine Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces all the territory in Texas lying between the Trinity and Brazos Rivers." It reported, in 1877, 11 itinerant and 7 unstationed ministers, 1100 members, and 10 churches valued at $3000.

McCalmont, John Swayze, attorney in Franklin, Pa., where he was born, April 28, 1822; was a student at Alleghany College in 1836-37, and a cadet to West Point in 1838, where he graduated in June, 1842. He served with the army in Florida till July, 1843, when he resigned, read law, and was admitted to practice in 1845. He was appointed president judge of the 18th judicial district in 1853, and was elected to the same position, which he resigned in June, 1861, to take command of the 10th Pennsylvania Reserves, and participated in the combat of Drainesville, in December, 1861. He was allowed to resign with honor, on account of ill health and other causes, in May, 1862. He has been steward, class-leader, and trustee in the M. E. Church, and was a lay delegate to the General Conference at Brooklyn, in May, 1872. He was one of the Board of Visitors appointed by the President of the United States to attend the annual examination of the cadets at West Point, in June, 1877. His parents, Alexander McCalmont and Eliza H. McCalmont, were both members of the M. E. Church. They were early settlers in Franklin. The father was a lawyer, and became president judge of the 18th judicial district, which office he filled for ten years.

McCarty, Rev. J. H., D.D., member of the Louisiana Conference, M. E. Church, was born in Berlin, Pa., Sept. 20, 1830, and was converted at thirteen. He was educated at Alleghany College, Pa., under the presidency of Dr. John Barker. He then studied medicine, and graduated at Cleveland Medical College in 1854. Following the convictions of duty, he entered the ministry in Erie Conference in 1855, where for four years he was a pastor. He was then transferred to the New England Conference, and served churches in Lawrence, Mass., Concord, N. H., and Providence, R. I. In 1865 he was transferred to the Detroit Conference, and until his transfer to Louisiana, in the fall of 1876, he filled prominent charges in Michigan. He is now (1877) pastor of Ames M. E. church, New Orleans. He received the degree of D.D. from the Protestant Methodist College in 1874. Dr. McCarty has been a frequent contributor to periodicals, and is the author of two books, "The Black Horse and Carryall" and "Inside the Gates."

McCauley, James Andrew, D.D., president of Dickinson College, was born in Cecil Co., Md., Oct. 7, 1822. He was converted in Baltimore, in his sixteenth year. After spending some time in a mercantile house, feeling called to preach, he entered Dickinson College in 1844, and graduated in 1847, standing second in his class. After teaching for two years, he was admitted into the Baltimore Conference in 1850, and in the middle of the following year was elected principal of the Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, Va. His close application affected his health and compelled him to resign in the third year of his principalship, and he resumed the regular pastoral work. In 1872 he was elected to the presidency of Dickinson College, in which position he still (1877) remains. In addition to filling important stations, he was a member of the General Conference of 1872, and elected a delegate to the British Wesleyan Conference, which he visited, in connection with Bishop Harris, in 1874.

McClaskey, John, of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in the county of Derry, Ireland, Jan. 2, 1756. Emigrating to America in 1782, he united with the Methodist society, and in 1786 entered the Conference as a traveling preacher. He was stationed in Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York, and was also presiding elder on several districts. The latter part of his life was marked by severe afflictions, and he died Aug. 21, 1814. He was a natural orator and a safe counselor.

McClintock, John, D.D., LL.D., was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 27, 1814, and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1835. He entered the New Jersey Conference in 1836, and was elected Professor of Mathematics in Dickinson College. In 1839 he accepted the chair of Ancient Languages in the same institution. During his connection with the college he aided in translating Neander's "Life of Christ," and prepared, in connection with Dr. Crooks, elementary text-books on Latin and Greek. From 1848 to 1856 he was editor of The Methodist Quarterly Review. In 1856 he was elected by the General Conference as delegate with Bishop Simpson to the Wesleyan Methodist Conferences of England and Ireland, and also was a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance at its Berlin meeting. On his return he became pastor of St. Paul's church,

New York, and in 1860 accepted the pastorate of the American chapel in Paris. During the Civil War he was distinguished for the active part which he took in behalf of the Union, by his pen, on the platform, and in society, in influencing the minds of the people in England and France. In 1864 he returned to the United States, and was again pastor of St. Paul's, which he resigned on account of impaired health. He took an especial interest, in 1866, in the centenary celebration, being chairman of the committee, and was selected, in 1867, as president of the Drew Theological Seminary. His health declined while in this position, and he died in Madison, N. J., March 4, 1870. Dr. McClintock was in many respects a remarkable man. He was an able and eloquent preacher, a close student, and thorough scholar; his convictions on all moral questions were deep and thorough, and his strong anti-slavery sentiments exposed him to a prosecution while he was professor in Dickinson College, out of which, however, he came forth triumphant. The great work of his life was his labor on the "Cyclopedia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature," which he edited in co-operation with Dr. Strong. Only three volumes, however, had appeared prior to his death. While scholarly and studious he was remarkably genial, and was endowed with superior conversational power. Few men have had so wide a circle of admiring friends, or have exercised so commanding an influence.

McCormick, Thomas, of the M. P. Church, was born in Loudon Co., Va., Jan. 5, 1792; was converted at a camp-meeting in 1811, and joined the M. E. Church. In 1817 he was licensed to preach. Having embraced the principles of the Reformers, he was one of the original members of the Union Society of Baltimore, and was among the expelled, and is now the only survivor of that band. In 1816 the General Conference of the M. E. Church was held in Baltimore, and Bishop Asbury having died in Virginia en route to the Conference, his remains were placed in a double coffin and brought to Baltimore. Twelve men were selected to bear his remains on a bier from Light Street to Eutaw Street church, beneath the pulpit of which he was first buried. The whole General Conference and a large concourse of people attended the funeral. Thomas McCormick was one of the twelve pall-bearers, and is the only surviving one of the twelve. He is in the eighty-sixth year of his age, and in the full possession of all his mental faculties, while his physical strength has been remarkably preserved.

McDonald, William, D.D., editor of The Advocate of Holiness, was born in Belmont, Me., March 1, 1820, and converted March 20, 1838. He was licensed to preach in September, 1840, and joined the Maine Conference in 1843, having previously traveled under the presiding elder. Having served various churches for eleven years, in 1855, on account of impaired health, he visited the West, and was a member of the Wisconsin Conference, stationed at Appleton. His health still continuing feeble he returned East, and, having served as a supply, was admitted, in 1859, to the New England Conference, whence he was transferred to organize the Trinity church, Providence. Having remained seven years, he returned to the New England Conference in 1866, and was stationed at Grace church, Boston. In 1870 he was transferred to the New York East Conference, and in 1871 engaged in evangelistic work, in which he has continued, with one year's exception, until the present (1877). In 1872 he was retransferred to New England, where he holds his membership. In 1871 he became editor of The Advocate of Holiness, then published in Boston, but now in Philadelphia.

McDougall, George, chairman of the Saskatchewan district, was born in Kingston, Ont., in the year 1820. In 1839 he was converted, and, though engaged in business for several years, was impressed with his duty to engage in the ministry. Becoming acquainted with Rev. William Case, then in charge of the Industrial School at Alderville, he prepared for the work of an Indian missionary. For a short time he attended Victoria College and the Alderville school, and he was received on trial in 1850 for the missionary work. Having labored successfully at Lake Huron, Garden River, Rossville, and Victoria, his last appointment was to commence a mission at Bow River. As it was too late in the year to commence building operations, he concluded to spend the winter at Morleyville, with his missionary son, John McDougall, then engaged in the erection of a new church in mission premises. In an expedition into the forest he received his death. He was an earnest missionary, and was instrumental in accomplishing great good.

McEldowney, John, D.D., was born in Ireland in 1824; united with the Smithfield Street M. E. church, Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1838, and was ordained elder in the Wesleyan Connection of America in 1847. He is a graduate of Western Pennsylvania University; has spent six years in the pastorate of Wesleyan churches, and six years as professor or president of Leoni and Adrian Colleges, Mich. In 1867 he reunited with the M. E. Church; was professor in Albion College for three years, and has been again in the pastorate for eight years in Detroit and Flint, Mich., and at Salt Lake City. The oversight of the seminary of the Methodist Church in Utah was also assigned to him in 1877.

McElroy, George Beamish, president of Adrian College, Michigan, was born in Pittsburgh, Pa., June 5, 1824. In 1840 he became the subject of converting grace, united soon after with the Methodist Protestant Church, and began to study for the pastoral work. On his eighteenth birthday he was licensed to preach. For the next ten years he filled a number of appointments in Virginia and Pennsylvania, and in 1852 he accepted a position in Madison College, at Uniontown, Pa., the church having assumed control of the institution. After a few years he was elected to the chair of Mathematics and Natural Science, which position he filled for about one year, when he found himself the only Northern member of the faculty. Not feeling satisfied with the state of affairs, he resigned his chair, and after undergoing radical changes, the college was closed. At its reorganization, soon after, by Rev. George Brown, he was induced to return. In 1857 he removed to Henry, Ill., and for five years took charge of North Illinois Institute. He then served as county superintendent and principal of city schools until 1864, when he assumed charge of Alleghany Seminary, then located at Sharpsburg. Here he remained until called to the chair of Mathematics and Astronomy at Adrian College, Michigan. Since 1867 he has been secretary of the board of trustees. During that year he became vice-president, and in June, 1873, president, of the college. He has been delegate to various Conferences and Conventions, and is still the president of Adrian College.

McFarland, Colonel George F., of Harrisburg, Pa., was engaged as teacher in an academical institution at McAllisterville at the breaking out of the Civil War. A large part of the company which he organized was composed of instructors and students in the academy. It is said the regiment contained nearly one hundred school-teachers. At the battle of Gettysburg he was severely wounded and was made prisoner. His wounds required the amputation of one foot and leg, and the other was so injured that he has been obliged to use crutches for the remainder of his life. After the close of the war he was for a time superintendent of the Soldiers' Orphans' School, and aided in laying those plans which have been of such great service to so many suffering families. Since that period he has been engaged in business and in editing The Temperance Vindicator. He is a member of the M. E. Church in Harrisburg, and has held various official positions.

McFerrin, James, of the Tennessee Conference, was born in Washington Co., Va., March 25, 1784, and died Sept. 4, 1840. His father braved the perils of the American Revolution, and fought at the battle of King's Mountain. He was a captain in the war with Great Britain in 1813; and subsequently became colonel in the campaign against the Creek Indians. In 1820 he was converted, and at once began to preach. In 1823 he was admitted into the Tennessee Conference, and in his first two years reported an accession of 673 members. In 1828 he was elected a delegate to the General Conference only two days after he was eligible, and was also a delegate in 1832. He filled a number of prominent appointments and traveled extensively. He kept a brief though exact record of the result of his labors. In 1839 he made the following minute: "Since I joined Conference, Nov. 25, 1823, I have preached 2080 times, baptized 573 adults and 813 infants, and have taken into society 3965 members." As a preacher he was somewhat peculiar in his manner, but possessed an indescribable influence over the multitude. Three of his sons succeeded him in the ministry.

McFerrin, John Berry, D.D., corresponding secretary of the Board of Missions of the M. E. Church South, was born June 15, 1807, in Rutherford Co., Tenn. He was admitted into the Tennessee Conference of the M. E. Church in 1825. He spent fourteen years in the pastoral work, including two years as missionary to the Cherokee Indians. For eighteen years he was editor of the Southwestern Christian Advocate, at Nashville; and in 1858 was elected book agent of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, which position he held for eight years. In 1866 he became corresponding secretary of the Board of Missions, which position he now fills. He has written, in addition to editorials, "The History of Methodism in Tennessee," in three volumes.

McHenry, Barnabas, of the Kentucky Conference, was born Dec. 10, 1767; was converted at the age of fifteen, and entered the itinerant connection in 1787. He traveled a number of frontier circuits in North Carolina, Tennessee, and Western Virginia. He passed through many perils which would have deterred a less heroic spirit. "On one occasion as he was passing the night at the cabin of a friend in the wilderness, after the family had retired, he spent two or three hours reading at a table, by candle-light, with the door of the cabin partly open. The next night the Indians murdered the whole family, and stated that they had gone to the cabin for that purpose the night before, but finding the door open and a light within, they supposed the inmates were prepared for an attack; they therefore postponed the execution of their purpose until circumstances should appear more favorable." Bishop Bascom says, "It was no uncommon thing for the preachers of that day in that region to be found camping out at night amid the gloom of forests and solitudes, surrounded by the Indians, and the next day, at a distance of fifteen or twenty miles, preaching to the frontier settlers in their cabins, forts, or block-houses, as the case might be. The track, the trail, the guttural of the Indian, his camp-fire and the crack of his rifle, watching by day and sleeping under guard by night, were with these men almost an ordinary occurrence. Among all these McHenry held eminent rank, and well and nobly did he serve his generation by the will of God." He died near Springfield, Ky., June 16, 1833.

McIntosh, Hon. James C., an attorney in Indiana, was born in 1827. Judge McIntosh is devoted to education, as well as the interests of the M. E. Church, and is a trustee and patron of the Indiana Asbury University, of which he is a graduate. He represented the Southeastern Indiana Conference at the General Conference of 1872.

McKay, Wm. Joseph, a leading minister of the Irish Conference, of which he became a member in 1840. Always appointed to the principal churches in the Conference, he has for many years held the chief offices. As chairman of district, delegate from the British Conference, and secretary of his own Conference, he has been trusted and successful. In 1872 he was sent as the representative of Irish Methodism to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, where he worthily represented his country and his Conference. He is at present the pastor of Carlisle Circus church, in Belfast, recently erected by James Carlisle, Esq., as a memorial of his only son, and said to be the finest church edifice in British or Irish Methodism.

McKendree College, located in Lebanon, Ill., on the Ohio and Mississippi Railroad, 24 miles east of St. Louis, was founded by the Illinois Conference, Feb. 20, 1828. The late Peter Cartwright, D.D., proposed the first resolution concerning the enterprise. The founders designed that it should be conducted on the plan of Augusta College, Kentucky. It began its work in 1828, under the name of Lebanon Seminary, with E. R. Ames, now bishop, as principal. It had the patronage of the chosen president. A plan was proposed, in 1836, to endow the college by the sale of scholarships; but on account of the disturbed financial condition of the country during the next and succeeding years, the purchasers of the scholarships were unable to pay their notes, and the scheme proved an entire failure. Another plan to raise an endow-

two Conferences, which then extended over the vast region lying west of the State of Ohio and north of the Ohio River. In 1830, Bishop McKendree donated 480 acres of land to the institution, and its name was changed from Lebanon Seminary to McKendree College; but it did not receive its charter until 1834. Among those voting for the charter is found the name of Abraham Lincoln. Shortly after its incorporation, Rev. Peter Akers, D.D., was chosen president. In 1836, Annis Merrill and James W. Sunderland were elected professors, and subsequently Rev. John W. Merrill, D.D., was ment was devised in 1854, which resulted little better than the first, and the trustees abandoned the further sale of scholarships. In 1860, Rev. Nelson E. Cobleigh, D.D., then president, succeeded in securing donations to the amount of $20,000 as a basis for the permanent endowment of the college. This amount has since been increased by small sums to $30,000. In 1875, Mrs. E. M. Riffin, of Lebanon, Ill., bequeathed to the college $13,000, with the addition of $10,000 on the death of her only son. In 1876, Dr. N. M. McCurdy, of Vandalia, Ill., left the college, by his will, $20,000. A portion of these bequests, however, will not be for some years productive of income. To meet its current expenses, the college relies partly upon the interest derived from its endowment fund, and partly upon the tuition-fees collected from its students. The college park, embracing some seventeen acres of high rolling ground, presents a very attractive appearance,

The following is the faculty as now (1877) organized: John W. Locke, D.D., president, and Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy; Oliver V. Jones, A.M., Mathematics and Astronomy; Samuel H. Deneen, Ph.D., Latin Language and Literature, and History; William F. Swahlen, A.M., Greek Language and Literature, and German; E. E. Edwards, A.M., Physics and Natural with its numerous evergreens and noble forest-trees. Its buildings consist of three substantial brick structures, capable of accommodating about 250 students. Its literary character has been well maintained, and its graduates, now more than 300 in number, have won their way into the highest positions of church and state. In 1869 ladies were admitted as pupils, and seventeen have since taken degrees. The libraries of the college contain in the aggregate about 7500 volumes. The cabinet has been formed chiefly by collections in the Mississippi Valley and the West.

History; with special professors in law and other subjects.

McKendree, William, one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in King William Co., Va., July 6, 1757. In the Revolutionary War he was a volunteer in the service of his country, entering as a private, but was advanced to the rank of adjutant, and was placed in the commissary department. He was present at the surrender of General Cornwallis at Yorktown. He was converted in 1787, and shortly afterwards began conversing with his friends on the subject of religion, and making them the subject of his fervent prayers. He soon volunteered to take part in public meetings, and his addresses produced a powerful effect. In 1788 he was received on trial. He remained actively in the work until November, 1792, when, having been influenced by Mr. O'Kelly to join in certain measures of pretended reform, he was greatly disappointed by their failure at the General Conference. Mr. O'Kelly withdrew from the church, and Mr. McKendree, sympathizing with him, sent in his resignation as a minister, but the Conference agreed that he might still preach among the societies. Mr. McKendree soon obtained leave to travel with Bishop Asbury, that he might ascertain for himself whether his impressions had been well founded, and in a short time he was convinced he had been deceived. He devoted himself to a careful examination of the Rules and Discipline of the church as drawn up by Mr. Wesley and as established by the General Conference, and became fully convinced both of their harmony with the primitive church and of their particular adaptedness to the circumstances and wants of the country. In 1796 he became presiding elder, and in 1801 was sent to the West to take the supervision of the societies in Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, Western Virginia, and part of Illinois, and subsequently became presiding elder on the Cumberland district. By his popular talents in the pulpit and his faithful attention to every part of his work, he became widely known and most highly esteemed. In 1808 he was elected to the office of bishop, and from that time traveled with Bishop Asbury, or alone, over every part of the church. After 1816 he was senior bishop for nineteen years. He was a man of great energy and genius, and was deeply pious and modest almost to timidity. His mind was clear and logical, his knowledge varied and extensive, his imagination lively but well regulated, and his eloquence was unusually powerful. He was careful in the administration of discipline, and introduced system into all the operations of the church. When called to preach before the General Conference of 1808, such was the power and unction connected with his sermon, that Bishop Asbury, at its close, said, "That sermon will make McKendree bishop," and it did. His influence was patent everywhere, but especially was he regarded as the father of Western Methodism, to which he had given years of earnest labor, and in the success of which he felt a deep and abiding interest. He died March 5, 1835, at the residence of his brother, near Nashville, Tenn. One of his last expressions was, "All is well."

McLean, John, LL.D., judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, was born in Morris Co., N. J., March 11, 1785. His parents removing in his childhood to Warren Co., O., he worked on a farm until sixteen years of age. In 1803 he commenced studying law in Cincinnati, and began practice in 1807, at Lebanon. He was a member of Congress from 1813 to 1816, when he became judge of the Supreme Court of Ohio. In 1822 he was Commissioner of the Land Office, and in 1823 was appointed Postmaster-General, in which position he remained until 1829, after the accession of General Jackson to the Presidency. He was then appointed associate justice of the United States Supreme Court. He was distinguished for the eloquence and ability of his charges, and for the clearness and strength of his opinions. In 1856 he was the leading competitor with Fremont for the Republican nomination at Philadelphia. He published several volumes of law reports. When engaged in the practice of law he was led to read the Bible with great care, and was subsequently converted, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He remained an active and consistent member during his whole public career, and was a faithful attendant on its duties. He also contributed several volumes, such as the "Life of Gatch" and the "Life of John Collins," to its biographical treasury. He died at Cincinnati, April 4, 1861.

McLeod, Dixon C., was born in North Carolina, March 13, 1802. He united with the church when about nineteen years of age, and was received into the Tennessee Conference in 1825. He was sent as a missionary to the Cherokee Indians in 1827, and remained among them five years, the last two of which he was superintendent. The territory was wild and mountainous; his rides were long and weary, and his accommodations were poor. On one occasion, for his devotion to the interests of his people, he was seized by the pretended officers of justice, deprived of his own horse, and dragged on foot some seventy or eighty miles as a prisoner. But as his only crime had been doing good, he was soon released. He continued to labor in various appointments until his death, in 1840, which was peaceful and triumphant.

McMahon, William, D.D., was born in Dumfries, Va., in December, 1785 or 1786. He was converted in Maryland, and removing West, was appointed a class-leader by Peter Cartwright. He was received into the traveling connection in 1811, and was appointed to Silver Creek, Ind. The next four years he spent in Kentucky, and was so successful that it is supposed that thousands were converted under his ministry. In 1816 he was transferred to Mississippi, but was taken sick at Nashville, and was transferred to Tennessee Conference. His talents soon placed him in a leading position, but failing health compelled him to locate, and he settled in Mississippi in 1835. He was readmitted to the Memphis Conference in 1841, and for several years was eminently useful. Few men have been so widely known and so extensively useful. He died at Paducah, Ky., in 1870.

McMullen, James, a Wesleyan minister in Ireland, "was a man of strong and quick understanding, uniting therewith genuine and solid piety,—inflexible in religious discipline, yet of field. An eminent divine said of him, "I have heard Mr. Walker, Mr. Fordyce, Dr. Blair, etc., but Mr. McNab is a greater orator than any of them."

McOwan, Peter, an English Wesleyan minister, was holy in life, reverent and God-fearing in spirit, faithful in the discharge of every duty, and importunate in prayer for the salvation of souls; a rich an amiable and compassionate disposition." After traveling a number of years in his native country, he volunteered to go as a missionary to Gibraltar, where he fell a victim to a malignant fever. He died in holy triumph in 1805.

McNab, Alexander, was one of Mr. Wesley's itinerants, who traveled both in England and Scotland. He was born in Perthshire in 1735, and entered the ministry in 1766. He was an earnest and useful preacher, though Mr. Wesley said of him, "He is too warm and impatient of contradiction." At one time he was placed temporarily in antagonism to Mr. Wesley, but returned to the Conference, and labored diligently until 1782, when he became the pastor of a small congregation at Shief-

McTyeire, Holland Nimmonds, D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Barnwell Co., S. C., and graduated at Randolph Macon College, Va. He joined the Virginia Conference in 1845, and subsequently served churches in Mobile, Demopolis, Columbus, and New Orleans. In 1854 he was elected editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate, and in 1858 became editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate. In 1866 he was elected bishop, and has traveled extensively throughout the various Conferences. He is the author of "Manual of the Discipline" and the "Duties of Masters." When Mr. Vanderbilt made his large donation to the University in Nashville, he placed it under the care of Bishop McTyeire, who was president of the board of trusts, which position he still holds in connection with his episcopal office.

to the summit of the Blue Mountains, in Oregon, in 1863, and established the famous hotel known as "Lee's Encampment." Without solicitation he was appointed superintendent of Indian affairs, and endeavored to carry into his intercourse with the In-

Meacham, Colonel Alfred B., formerly superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon, was born in Paoli, Orange Co., Ind., April 29, 1826. His parents had removed from North Carolina because of their opposition to slavery, and they instilled into his youthful mind sentiments of freedom. At the age of sixteen he removed with his parents to Iowa, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1850 he removed to California, where his first public speech was made against intemperance. His house was often the preacher's home, and he was active in church matters, and in superintending Sunday-schools. He also filled several civil offices, among which was that of judge. Having met with various afflictions and disasters, he removed dians the principles of morality and religion. For his frankness, owing to misrepresentation made at Washington, he was removed from his position, but the people of Oregon nominated him for presidential elector, and he was sent as messenger to carry the vote to Washington. President Grant appointed him chairman of the ill-fated peace commission to the Modoc Indians. After the establishment of the armistice, officers of the army captured Modoc horses under a flag of truce, and enraged the Indians. He protested against it, but was powerless. He also protested against the meeting on the fatal field, April, 1873, but was overruled by General Canby and Dr. Thomas. He went without hope of returning, and was standing between General

Canby and Dr. Thomas when he fell, pierced by seven bullets. The MODOCS, believing him to be dead, attempted to scalp him, but were frustrated by the heroic efforts of one of the Indian women. His wounds were declared to be mortal, but through divine mercy he was spared. He has written two volumes, the "Wigwam and War-Path," and "Wine-ma," in honor of the Indian woman by whom his life was protected. He also has delivered many lectures on Indian affairs. Colonel Meacham is now starting in Philadelphia a monthly journal called The Council Fire, for the purpose of defending a peace policy, and principles of justice in intercourse with the Indians.

Meadville, Pa. (pop. 7103), the capital of Crawford County, situated on the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad, is the site of Alleghany College. In 1800 this region was included in the Chenango circuit, which then embraced a large part of Northwestern Pennsylvania. A Methodist class was formed a few miles below the town, at Mumford settlement, on French Creek. Methodist preaching was introduced into Meadville, then a small village, about 1806, by Robert R. Roberts, afterwards bishop. It was then included in the Erie circuit, which was so large that it required Mr. Roberts about six weeks to fill the different appointments. He occasionally preached in Meadville on a week-evening, and his first service was held in the bar-room of a hotel. So much opposition was experienced in establishing services that no regular appointment was maintained until 1818. The first class was formed in 1824; and under the labors of Robert C. Hatton, in 1825, a revival of religion ensued, in which a church was permanently established. Its earliest services were held for some time in the upper story of a blacksmith-shop, but in 1829 the society commenced the erection of a brick edifice. They were so limited in means, however, that it was some years before it was completed. The town became a station in 1831, with Joseph S. Barris as the first pastor, who reported the following year 155 members. A large and beautiful stone edifice was commenced in 1867, and was built in part by contributions from the friends of Alleghany College in different parts of Western Pennsylvania. The citizens of the town, however, contributed very liberally. The State Street church was built in 1870. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S.	Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1829	First Church.....	505	480		$85,000
1871	State Street Church.....	147	150		9,000

Means of Grace is a theological expression indicating those services through which spiritual influences usually reach the Christian heart. The Methodist Church does not teach that grace is limited to participants in any services, but that it is freely given to the obedient heart through the operations of the Holy Spirit. While, however, they believe that God's Spirit strives with all men, and that a measure of grace is given to all, they attach great importance to the faithful observance of the means of grace which are prescribed in the Holy Scriptures. These are: attendance upon public preaching of God's word; private, family, and social prayer; Christian conversation and testimony in class or social meetings; reading the Holy Scriptures; baptism, the Lord's Supper, and fasting or abstinence. While Methodists do not believe that any special form of worship is absolutely prescribed, they do believe that wherever there is a sincere desire to please God the person will engage in these varied exercises; and where these are neglected they direct that the delinquent members shall be instructed, admonished, warned, and if willfully and persistently negligent, they shall be expelled from the church.

Melbourne (pop. 210,000), the capital of the Province of Victoria, in Australia, is a city of most rapid growth. In 1836 there were only three houses and three or four sod huts. In the rush to the gold-fields it was almost impossible for immigrants to find lodgings. This led the Wesleyans, in 1852, to erect a Home, costing about $25,000. It provided first for Wesleyans, and then for members of other churches. The building accommodated from two to three hundred persons. It occupies a beautiful site, commanding a fine view of the bay. (See engraving on the following page.) Methodism has grown with the population. There are now 12 ministers, as many churches, a church paper and a college.

Members, Reception of.—When the early Methodist societies were formed they were regarded simply as supplementary associations in which church members sought to increase their piety and usefulness. An admission into the society was gained by the manifestation of a proper spirit, and by forming the acquaintance of a preacher or class-leader. As many sought admission to these societies who were afterwards found to be unsuitable persons, a system of probation was established, under which the person was allowed all the privileges of these meetings but was not received into full fellowship until after a period of six months' acquaintance. The receiving a member into one of these societies, or his dismissal from it, did not affect his membership in the Church of England, to which these societies were supplementary. Since the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, and of the Wesleyans in England and elsewhere, the Methodist societies were changed into regular churches. For years, however, the form of receiving was exceedingly simple. Persons who desired to unite were invited to give their names to the minister, were placed in classes, and if at the end of six months recommended by the leaders, were eligible to be received by the church as full members. Having already enjoyed the means of grace and the fellowship of the society, they were admitted simply by a vote of the leader's meeting or official board. At present the British Wesleyan Conference limits the probation to three months. In 1860 a form of receiving members was adopted by the General Conference of the M. E. Church. The probationer is received by the preacher and placed in class, but at the expiration of six months, the four latter are courts of appeal; the final one is the Conference. A trial at a leader's meeting must precede expulsion. No person can be expelled for immorality unless it is "proved to the satisfaction" of the leader's meeting. This refers to a case where the accused demands a trial. If there is no demand for a trial, and the alleged misconduct be not of the most serious nature, the minister, on the report of the class-leader, quietly excludes the offending member by withholding the "ticket" and erasing the name. But if the member has committed some serious crime, he is ex-

if approved by the leaders, he comes before the church, and in solemn service professes his faith in Christ, his belief in the doctrines, and his readiness to conform to the Discipline of the church, and his determination to live a holy life, and labor for the spread of Christ's kingdom. Having made these professions and taken upon himself these vows, he is welcomed to the communion of the church in a simple but beautiful service.

Membership (English Wesleyan).—There is only one condition required of those who desire admission into the Wesleyan society, "a desire to flee from the wrath to come, and to be saved from their sins." (See RULES.) The leader must give the "rules of the society" the first time they meet. No minister must give tickets to any till recommended by a leader with whom they have met at least two months on trial. The leader's meeting has a right to declare any person on trial unfit to be received into society. The courts of trial, for the arraignment or expulsion of members, are the leader's meeting, special circuit meeting, minor district meeting, annual district meeting, and the Confer-pelled in a formal manner at a leader's meeting. Should the offense be denied, or a trial be demanded, it must take place. If the charge is proved, the whole duty of the leader's meeting has been performed, and it remains with the superintendent to pronounce sentence of reproof, suspension, or of expulsion. To prevent haste in such a case as the latter, it was ordained, in 1835, first, "That no sentence shall be pronounced in the same meeting in which the trial takes place, but must be deferred for one week at least to afford time for further inquiry." Charges should always be preferred in writing, and sent in seven days before the trial.

Memphis, Tenn. (pop. 40,226), is situated on the Mississippi River, and is the largest city between St. Louis and New Orleans. It was originally included within the Wolf circuit, one of the first formed in this part of Tennessee. It first appears by name in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1831, with Francis A. Owen as pastor, who reported in the following year 51 members. In 1836 it had increased to 86 members, and was then connected with Raleigh. Though its early growth was slow, yet its subsequent increase has been very fair. In 1845 it adhered to the M. E. Church South, and so remained until after the close of the Civil War. The services of the M. E. Church and of the African M. E. Church were subsequently introduced. The Colored M. E. Church of America was organized at a later period, under the auspices of the Church South, which transferred to it about 200 members and a property worth nearly $10,000. The statistics, as reported in 1877, are as follows:

Memphis Conference, M. E. Church South, is one of three large Conferences in the State of Tennessee that adhered to the Church South at the division in 1845. The following year it reported 101 traveling and 310 local preachers, 23,111 white and 6003 colored members. The General Conference of 1874 arranged that it should be bounded "by the Mississippi, Ohio, and Tennessee Rivers, and by the State line between Tennessee and Mississippi." The report in 1876 gives 125 traveling and 276 local preachers, 31,627 members, and 15,726 Sunday-school scholars.

Mendota, Ill. (pop. 3546), in La Salle County, an important railroad town. Methodism was introduced in 1854, the first services having been held in a school-house. In 1858 the society erected a handsome church. It is in the Rock River Conference, and has 289 members, 180 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

Menifee, Quinn M., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was the son of Hon. William M. Menifee, and was a native of Texas. When a young man he applied himself to the study of law, and entered upon the practice with great prospects of success. Under conviction of duty, however, he entered the Methodist itinerancy in 1857. In the Civil War he served as a private soldier, and lost a leg at the battle of Sharpsburg. Returning to the ministry, he labored in various appointments until his death, in 1867. He was a young man of generous impulses, and his friends had expected for him a bright future in the ministry.

Mercein, T. F. Randolph, was born in New York, Nov. 27, 1825, and died in Sheffield, Mass., Sept. 15, 1856. At five years of age he was the subject of strong religious impressions, and enjoyed an excellent Christian experience before he was thirteen. He had fine educational advantages, but during his college course was obliged by sickness to abandon his studies. He was trained as a Presbyterian, but in theological reading he was led to reject Calvinism, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. At nineteen he entered upon the duties of the ministry. He was a man of clear intellect, fine culture, bold in the discharge of duty, and yet gentle, amiable, and genial. He was exceedingly popular and useful. He published a small volume on "Natural Goodness," which was very favorably received. For days before his death, to use his own language, he was "penetrated, filled, with a sense of the divine goodness."

Merchant, Elijah, was born in Virginia in 1827, and entered the Baltimore Conference, M. E. Church, in 1850. He was transferred to California in 1852, where he labored diligently for six years. He was a studious, methodical, tireless worker, and a useful minister.

Meriden, Conn. (pop. 10,495), is in New Haven County, on the New Haven and Hartford Railroad. It is first noticed in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1840, in the Cheshire and Meriden mission. The name then disappears from the minutes until 1845, when the appointment appears as Cheshire and Meriden. In 1847 it appears as a separate work, with 141 members, and J. E. Searles as the stationed pastor. It so remained until 1851, when Prospect was attached to it, and the appointment appears as Meriden and Prospect, more or less closely connected until 1862, since which it has remained as a separate station. The first church, built at a cost of about $5000, gave place, in 1868-70, to a new and beautiful structure, which is among the best buildings in the State. (See cut on following page.) It is in the New York East Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are 510 members, 335 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $85,000.

Meriton, John, was a clergyman of the Church of England, who assisted Mr. Wesley in his earlier labors. He had a university education, and was a member of the first Conference which Mr. Wesley held, in 1744. The latter years of his life were spent in accompanying the two Wesleys in their preaching excursions, and in assisting them in the chapels they had built. In 1747 he and Charles Wesley barely escaped with their lives from a mob at Devizes, which had been raised by the curate of the church. He died in 1753.

Merrick, Frederick, D.D., was educated at Wilbraham, Mass., and at the Wesleyan University. At the end of his university course he became a tutor in Amenia Seminary, N. Y. He joined the Ohio Conference, M. E. Church, in 1841, and was appointed to the chair of Natural Sciences in the Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, O. In 1842 he was appointed to Marietta, O., and in 1843 was made agent of the university. In 1845 he was again in the university chair of Natural Sciences, which he occupied until 1854, when he was transferred to the chair of Moral Science and Biblical Literature. When Edward Thomson, afterwards bishop, resigned the presidency, Professor Merrick succeeded him, and continued in it until 1874, when he returned to the post of professor. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1860, 1864, and 1876.

Merrill, Annis, Esq., son of Rev. Joseph A. Merrill, of the New England Conference, was born in Massachusetts; educated at the Wesleyan University, and graduated in 1835. He served three years as Professor of Ancient Languages in McKendree College, Ill. Having studied law, he returned to Boston, and with his brother engaged in practice. In 1849 he went to San Francisco, where he still resides. Having been a member of the M. E. Church from his early youth he identified himself with the First M. E. church, and has served as trustee since the organization of the board. He was one of the founders of the University of the Pacific, contributing liberally for its establishment and support. He has served as president of the board of trustees for the past twelve years. He is an active worker in the church and Sunday-school,—teaching a Bible-class, for which he prepares with as much care as he would write a brief to be presented to the Supreme Court. He was elected a delegate to the General Conference in Baltimore in 1876, but was unable to be present.

Merrill, John Wesley, D.D., late president of McKendree College, was born at Chester, N. H., May 9, 1808. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1834. From 1834 to 1837 he studied in the Andover Theological Seminary, Mass. In 1837 he was elected president of McKendree College, Ill. After serving four years in this position he returned to Massachusetts, and in 1841 organized the first Methodist Episcopal church in East Boston, and became pastor of the same. In 1854 he was appointed Professor of Ethics, Metaphysic, Natural and Historical Theology in the Methodist General Biblical Institute, Concord, N. H. In 1868 he returned to the itinerant work, and in 1873 took a superannuated relation.

Merrill, Joseph A., a leading Methodist minister, was born at Newbury, Mass., Nov. 22, 1785, and died at Wilbraham, Mass., July 22, 1849. He was converted at nineteen years of age, and commenced his ministerial career under Elijah R. Sabin, on the St. Francis River, in Lower Canada. He entered the New England Conference in 1807, and was a faithful pastor and instrumental in powerful revivals. In 1813-14 he was stationed in Boston, and also acted as chaplain to a regiment of soldiers. In 1819 he acted as agent for the Wesleyan Academy, at New Market, and was the first missionary sent into New Hampshire by the Lynn common church. After serving a number of prominent situations and several terms as presiding elder, he received his last appointment at Newburyport, where his health failed, and he took a superannuated relation. He was devoted to all the interests of the church; held the office of trustee and treasurer of the Wesleyan Academy from its commencement to the time of his death; was one of the trustees of the Wesleyan University, and was one of the earliest and most devoted friends of the anti-slavery cause.

Merrill, Stephen M., D.D., one of the bishops of the M. E. Church, was born at Mount Pleasant, Jefferson Co., O., Sept. 16, 1825. His parents subsequently removed to Greenfield, O., where he joined the M. E. Church, Oct. 31, 1842; was licensed to preach April 5, 1845, and was employed under the presiding elder. He was admitted, in 1846, into the Ohio Conference, and appointed to Monroe. To an elementary training he added, by careful study, a knowledge of a wide circuit of literature, and was honored with the degree of A.M., in 1864, from Indiana Asbury University. He was presiding elder on Marietta district when, in 1868, he was elected as a delegate to the General Conference. He took an active part in the debates in that body, and during the session was elected editor of The Western Christian Advocate. Having served four years in that office, he was, in 1872, elected bishop. In the discharge of the duties of his office he has traveled extensively over the United States and has visited Mexico. He is author of a work on "Christian Baptism." He resided for a time in St. Paul, Minn., but his present residence is in Chicago.

affected the educated classes of society. Public morals suffered from the abandonment of religious principles, and from the example of those high in authority. While there were some of the clergy of the Church of England illustrious for intellectual power and for personal piety, many were quite ignorant and even loose in their morals. Writers like Swift and Sterne indulged in licen-

ONE OF THE BISHOPS OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

Methodism is a term usually applied to that system of doctrines and general plan of economy held and professed by the Wesleyan Methodists in England and elsewhere, and by the M. E. Churches of the United States. In its wider signification it is applied to that wonderful religious movement which commenced under the labors of the Wesleys and Whitefield in the first half of the eighteenth century.

At that time the state of religion in Great Britain was deplorable. From the period of the Restoration infidelity was widely diffused, and it had deeply tious humor to the discredit of the pulpit which they occupied, while other clergymen spent their time in hunting, gambling, and intemperance. Doctrinal views were as unsettled as conduct. Arianism and Socinianism were advocated by such writers as Clarke, Priestley, and Whiston, and evangelical piety was degraded as fanaticism. Bishop Burnett deplorably says, "The outward state of things is bad enough, God knows, but that which heightens my fears rises chiefly from the inward state into which we are unhappily fallen." "Of the clergy," he adds, "the much greater part of those who come to be ordained are ignorant to a great degree not to be apprehended by those who are not obliged to know it. Those who have read some few books, yet have not seemed to have read the Scriptures, many cannot give a tolerable account even of the Catechism itself, how short and plain soever, and this does often tear my heart." Dr. Watts, the eminent poet, states that "both among Dissenters and Churchmen there was a general decay of religion in the hearts and lives of men." Archbishop Secker says, "Such are the dissoluteness and contempt of principle in the higher part of the world, and the profligacy, intemperance, and fearlessness of committing crime in the lower, as must, if this torrent of impiety stop not, become absolutely fatal." Southey, as a historian intimately acquainted with the condition of the church, declares "to a great majority of the clergy zeal was wanting." The excellent Leighton spoke of the church as a fair carcass without a spirit. Burnett observes "that in his time our clergy had less authority and were under more contempt than those of any other church in all Europe, for they were much the most remiss in their labors and the least severe in their lives."

It was in such a state of society and such a condition of religion, both in the Established Church and among the Non-conformists, that the Methodist revival began. It commenced in 1729 among a few students in Oxford University, who formed a society to read the Holy Scriptures in the original languages, and to aid each other in mutual spiritual improvement. They sincerely desired to please God and to conform their lives strictly to the precepts of his word. They received the Lord's Supper weekly and fasted twice a week: they systematically arranged their time for self-examination, meditation, prayer, and religious reading. They attended scrupulously upon public worship and all the ordinances of the church: they also stimulated each other to active benevolence; they instructed the children of the neglected poor, visited the sick and the inmates of prisons and almshouses, and gave to them, to the utmost of their power, temporal as well as spiritual aid. Their fellow-students ridiculed their piety, called them Sacramentarians, Bible-Bigots, the Godly Club, and the Holy Club. They were young men of more than ordinary intellectual power and culture. John Wesley, who was then twenty-six years of age, was a Fellow of Lincoln College, had been ordained a priest, and had acted as a curate for a short time; he was an accomplished scholar and a forcible writer. His brother Charles was twenty-one years of age, a Bachelor of Arts and a college tutor, and was then developing that genius for poetry which marked his subsequent life. Mr. Morgan, who died in a few years, was a curator of Christ's church, the son of an Irish gentleman. Mr. Kirkham was a member of Merton College. Of these John Wesley was acknowledged the leader, and was called by those who ridiculed them "the curator of the Holy Club." Other students joined them in 1730, and in 1732 Hervey, the author of the "Meditations," and Ingham, of Queen's College, united with them. The famous George Whitefield joined this company in 1735. They were so faithful in redeeming their time and so methodical in attending to all their duties that one of the students, partly from this fact and partly in derision, termed them Methodists. This name had a century before been applied to those who were very earnest on religious topics, and who were plain in their manners. One writer speaks of the "Anabaptists and plain packstaff Methodists;" and a pamphlet is on record attacking the evangelical principles of the "New Methodists." This term, though often used reproachfully and to express enthusiasm or fanaticism, has become the acknowledged name of one of the largest branches of the Christian church. Notwithstanding the purity and regularity of their lives, these students were subject to reproach, persecution, and even indignities. Whitefield was sometimes pelted with stones by his fellow-students, and subsequently some of the most religious students were expelled from the university.

When the association was formed there was no desire or even thought of organizing any separate church; they simply sought the increase of earnestness and holiness in their own hearts and lives, and in the hearts and lives of professing Christians. The students, among whom it arose, were subsequently divided both upon points of theology and church discipline, and some of them became widely estranged each from the other. After the Wesleys had visited America, and, in association with the Moravians, had experienced a deeper work of grace in their hearts, they, with Mr. Whitefield, who was more ardent and demonstrative, began preaching most earnestly in the churches. Crowds followed them wherever they went, and pulpits were closed against them. Whitefield first commenced preaching in the open air. This was in the year 1739, at Kingswood, near Bristol. "I thought," said Whitefield, "that it might be doing the service of my Creator, who had a mountain for his pulpit, and the heavens for a sounding-board: and who, when his gospel was rejected by the Jews, sent his servants into the highways and hedges." Mr. Wesley, who had been most zealous for the preservation of order in the church, and was tenacious for every point of its authority, was at first horror-stricken when he heard what Whitefield had done, but learning of the gracious results, he in a little time followed Whitefield's example, and being at an assembly near Bristol, where some three thousand gathered, he says, "I submitted to be more vile, and proclaimed in the highways the glad tidings of salvation." His brother Charles was still more tenacious than he, and hesitated for some time, but finally joined his brother and Mr. Whitefield in their great work. In speaking of his effort, he says, "I found nearly a thousand helpless sinners waiting for us in Moorfields; I invited them in my Master's words as well as name, 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' The Lord was with me, even me, the meaneast of my messengers, according to his purpose. . . . My load was gone and all my doubts and scruples; God shone on my path, and I knew this was his will concerning me." From that time forward they preached in all parts of the kingdom. Large crowds followed them, and many were awakened and converted. The dignitaries of the church were shocked at their conduct, and Mr. Wesley and his associates were treated as disturbers of the peace, and were frequently severely persecuted; they were reviled, mobbed, imprisoned. This was the first step which distinguished Methodists from other Christians of their day. Mr. Wesley, believing that it was necessary to watch over the deportment of those who professed conversion, formed religious societies for the purpose of prayer and mutual edification. This was done, not because he designed to constitute any separate church, but because the converts came to him for instruction, and longed for the fellowship of kindred spirits. That these societies might be properly instructed as to their duty, he drew up for them a number of rules, termed the "General Rules" (see GENERAL RULES), and which are held by nearly every branch of Methodism. Mr. Whitefield did not attempt to organize societies, though subsequently some of his followers did. He went like a flame of fire, not only over England, but he crossed the Atlantic thirteen times. Great revivals were produced by his ministry in America as well as in England. Multitudes were aroused, but as no association was formed, he saw but little continued fruit of his labors. There was also another point of difference between Mr. Whitefield and Mr. Wesley. Whitefield was an earnest Calvinist, and so were Mr. Hervey and some others of those who had been associated together in Oxford, and Calvinism was introduced into their public ministrations. Mr. Wesley was an evangelical Arminian in theology, and believing Calvinistic sentiments to be injurious to the progress of the work of revival, he delivered and published a sermon on free grace, which was extensively circulated in England, and which was also published in America. This called out a strong rejoinder from Mr. Whitefield, and a Calvinistic controversy arose, widely affecting the societies. The Countess of Huntingdon, a lady of talent and wealth, gave her whole influence to Mr. Whitefield, and, founding an institution for young ministers, rejected Mr. Wesley and all of similar theological opinions. Howell Harris, an earnest preacher, established Calvinistic societies in Wales, which still exist, and which have adherents among the Welsh population in the United States. Thus Methodism was separated into two great divisions, the Arminian or Wesleyan Methodists, and the Whitefield or Calvinistic Methodists. (Both of which see.) The increase in Mr. Wesley's societies led to the erection of suitable buildings or plain chapels for religious services apart from church hours. For many years Mr. Wesley absolutely forbade any assemblies to be held in these during the hours of worship in the churches, and strongly urged all his people to be faithful and diligent in their attendance on church services.

As the societies further increased leaders were appointed over them, and in the absence of Mr. Wesley these leaders not only engaged in prayer, but added exhortation, and then, gaining experience, began to take texts. When Mr. Wesley, who was absent from London, heard that Thomas Maxfield, whom he had left in charge of his flock, had attempted to preach, he hurried back to interpose his authority, but his mother, a woman of great clearness of intellect, and the widow of a clergyman, seeing his dissatisfaction, inquired the cause. "Thomas Maxwell," said he, abruptly, "is turned preacher, I find." She replied, "John, you know what my sentiments have been: you cannot suspect me of readily favoring anything of this kind; but take care what you do in respect to this young man, for he is as surely called of God to preach as you are." Mr. Wesley listened to her voice, thoroughly examined the qualifications of the young man, and, recognizing his usefulness, permitted him to continue, and from that time forward he accepted the aid of such laymen as he believed God had qualified by the Holy Spirit for such public labor. That these lay-helpers, who were preaching to the people, might be carefully watched over and trained, Mr. Wesley called them together annually with a few regularly ordained clergymen, for the purpose of conversing freely on doctrine and methods of church work. Hence arose the whole system of Annual Conferences. Methodism thus embraced converts organized into classes, some of whom were leaders, praying with and instructing their members, others were exhorters, a few were preachers who labored with their hands, but in hours of leisure spoke where they could find hearers, while others gave their whole time to this holy work. It was a system of earnest, spiritual, evangelical labor, in which every member was permitted to take a part. Yet Mr. Wesley did not design the organization of a church; his effort was to revive pure and undefiled religion. His doctrines were the doctrines of the Church of England: he taught his people to attend faithfully to its ordinances, to be present at its public assemblies, and to be interested in its prosperity. But he desired to add a system of agencies which he believed would be promotive of greater spirituality and of more religious power. Had the authorities of the Church of England been wise enough to have employed within certain limits Mr. Wesley's plans, and to have utilized his labors and those of his co-workers, it is impossible to say what an immense evangelical power the Church of England would have become. But there were many of its dignitaries who had acquired positions, not only of great honor but of great emoluments, who were not men of deep religious life. His conduct seemed to reprove them, and so far from encouraging him, they swelled the tide of opposition against him, and in their opposition they made wider and deeper the chasm between themselves and the earnest disciples of Mr. Wesley. During his long life, however, which was not closed until in his eighty-eighth year, in 1791, no separation from the Established Church took place. He did arrange for a separate church in America, after the country had become independent of English authority. He also arranged partly for separate services in Scotland, which, however, were established for only a time. But in England or Ireland no one of his preachers was suffered to administer the ordinances of baptism or the Lord's Supper, or to assume the functions of the clergy of the Established Church. Many of his people sympathized with him in their attachment to church order, but very many felt that they could have no home in the church, where their services were ridiculed, and where they themselves were oftentimes subject to scorn and reproach. And hence, very shortly after Mr. Wesley's death, the Wesleyan societies took steps for independent organization, and for the administration of the holy sacraments. (For the development of Methodism in England, see WESLEYAN METHODISTS. For its growth in the United States, see METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH.)

As was said in the commencement of this article, in its widest signification Methodism was simply a revival of Christian earnestness, simplicity, and power: and to this day, and in nearly all countries, wherever men preach among the various denominations with unusual earnestness, and wherever they seek the recovery of the outcasts by going from the churches into the open air, and by making extraordinary efforts in their behalf, they are said to preach or act like Methodists. In their organized bodies Methodists have been divided in England into, first, Wesleyan; second, Calvinistic; third, Primitives; fourth, New Connection; fifth, United Methodist Free Churches; sixth, Bible Christians. The same subdivisions exist, though to a limited extent, in Ireland, the Methodists there being chiefly either Wesleyans or Primitives. In the United States the divisions are, first, the Methodist Episcopal Church; second, the Methodist Episcopal Church South; third, the Methodist Protestant Church; fourth, the Wesleyan Methodist Church; fifth, the African Methodist Episcopal Church; sixth, the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church; seventh, the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church of America; eighth, the Free Methodists. There are also a few Congregational, and a few Independent Methodist churches, and a few Primitive Methodist societies, but there is no general organization of any of these branches extending widely over the country. In Canada there is, first, the Methodist Church of Canada, which embraces a union of the Wesleyans and the former New Connection societies; second, the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada; third, the Primitive Methodists. In Australia and the southern islands the Wesleyans have organized an independent church, called the Australasian Wesleyan Methodist Church. The Wesleyans of France are organized into an affiliated Conference; and Wesleyan missions are established in Germany, the West Indies, Africa, India, Ceylon, China, and Japan. The other branches of English Methodism also have societies related to them as missions.

In all the branches of Methodism the chief features of distinction from other churches are to be found in their evangelical Arminian doctrines, which separate them from the Calvinistic branches of the church, and in their class-meetings, love-feasts, and especially in their itinerant ministry, which, in some form, exists in every branch of the family, except among a few, which are termed Independents or Congregationalists. The following statistics present the numbers of different branches as given in the reports of 1876. (In a few instances the reports were for the previous year.)

Methodist Advocate, The, is a weekly periodical, published at Atlanta, Ga., under the control and patronage of the M. E. Church. The General Conference of 1868 authorized the book agents at Cincinnati to publish a periodical, either at Knoxville, Atlanta, or Nashville, the editor to be appointed by the bishops, with the concurrence of the book agents. They were at liberty to discontinue the paper if its publication should involve a greater loss to the Concern than $2000 per annum. After examination, the book agents selected Atlanta. The first number of the paper appeared Jan. 1, 1868, Rev. E. Q. Fuller, D.D., having been appointed editor by the bishops. The subscription-list has averaged a little less than 3000 per year. At the General Conference of 1872, Rev. N. E. Cobleigh was elected editor. On Mr. Cobleigh's death, in 1874, Rev. E. Q. Fuller was appointed to fill the place, and was elected by the General Conference of 1876. Its circulation, as reported to the General Conference of 1876, was 3102, and the list has since increased.

Methodist Church, The.—The question of slavery, which excited the public mind generally, gave rise to warm and protracted discussions in the Methodist Protestant Church. The right of suffrage and of holding office having been given only to white male members, became a special cause of complaint. A Convention was held by the ministers and members of the Protestant churches for the North and West in Cincinnati, in 1857, at which they agreed not to attend the Conference which was to meet in Lynchburg in May, 1858. A memorial was prepared setting forth their terms, which required that the word white should be stricken from the constitution, and that voluntary slave-holding and slave-trading should be made a barrier to membership; that if the General Conference should recommend such action to the Annual Conferences they would remain; otherwise they would hold no further ecclesiastical connection. At the session of 1858 this memorial was presented. The paper was considered and respectfully answered, declining to accede to the terms of the memorialists, but proposing certain measures of pacification. The result was a secession of the Northern and Western Conferences, which carried with them about one-half of the membership. These met in convention first in 1858, and then in Pittsburgh, in November, 1860, and declared their position to be: "This Convention, in the name of the several Annual Conferences herein represented, do now declare all official connection, co-operation, and official fellowship with and between said Conferences and such Conferences and churches within the Methodist Protestant Association as practice and tolerate slave-holding and slave-trading, as specified in the said memorial, to be now suspended until the evil complained of be removed." No changes were made in the Discipline of the church except the removal of those passages complained of.

In November, 1862, a Convention met at Cincinnati, adopted "a solemn declaration of loyalty to the government," declared its General Conference restored to its original authority, and appointed a General Conference to meet at Alleghany, Pa., in November, 1866. At this Conference so appointed, the name of the church was changed to the Methodist Church. Its object was to meet a union movement with the Wesleyan Methodists and other smaller bodies. A Conference for this purpose met at Cleveland in 1867. The attempt to unite the various bodies was not successful: a few entered the union, but the opposition of the great part of the Wesleyans to secret societies, and their determination to make this a term of membership, prevented its full consummation. Emancipation having taken place during the Civil War, the question of slavery was removed from the arena of controversy, and many persons both in the Methodist Protestant and in the Methodist bodies felt that there was no further occasion of separation.

In 1871 a commission was appointed to confer with the Methodist Protestant Church for reunion, and after various negotiations a Convention was called to meet in May, 1877. This Convention assembled in Baltimore, May 11, first as two separate bodies. The Methodist Convention met in the Methodist Protestant church on Green Street, with 85 delegates from the North and West in attendance. The Methodist Protestant Convention assembled in the church on Fayette Street. About 75 delegates were in attendance. L. W. Bates, D.D., was elected president, and L. M. Barnet and R. H. Wills secretaries. After several days spent in separate discussions, a basis of union was agreed upon, and on the 16th of May the two Conventions met at the corner of Lombard and Fremont Streets, and the members joining arm-in-arm marched to "Starr" church, where, on the following day, they organized as the united Methodist Protestant Convention, electing L. W. Bates as president, J. J. Smith as vice-president, and Rev. G. McElroy and Rev. R. H. Wills as secretaries. A new constitution and Discipline were prepared in accord with the basis of the union, and thus closed the existence of the Methodist Church as a separate and distinct body. During its separate existence it had established a Book Concern in Pittsburgh, at which its official paper was published and its general connectional business transacted.

It had also established Adrian College, in Michigan, which has large and commodious buildings, and is in a prosperous condition. The following table shows the condition of the Methodist Church

Island, Newfoundland, and Bermuda were in connection with the British Conference, and formed missionary districts until 1855, when the affiliated Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Eastern British America was formed, under the presidency of Rev. John Beacham. At that time

Methodist Church of Canada, The, is the largest of all the sections of Methodism in the British dominions of North America, and received its present name in 1874, by the union of the Wesleyan Methodists and the New Connection, together with the Wesleyan Methodists in the Eastern Provinces. While the Methodism of Canada was originally connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, the members in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward there were 70 circuits, 88 ministers, 102 local preachers, 222 chapels, 393 other preaching-places, 1162 day scholars, and 91,114 Sunday-school scholars, with 13,136 members in church fellowship and an estimated attendance of 65,690 on public worship. Their relation continued the same until 1874, when the body was merged into the Methodist Church of Canada. In Upper Canada, and also in Lower Canada, the churches had been organized by missionaries from the United States. The War of 1812 for a time embarrassed this arrangement, and all the American preachers were withdrawn from Lower Canada. That part of the work shortly after the war was occupied by the British Conference, while the work in Upper Canada was organized into an Annual Conference in 1824. On its petition to be permitted to organize an independent Methodist Episcopal Church for Canada, the General Conference of 1828 authorized the bishops of the M. E. Church, in case an independent organization was constituted, to ordain bishops for them. In the fall of 1828 the Canada Conference assumed the character of an independent Methodist Episcopal Church, adopting the Discipline used in the United States so far as circumstances permitted. The preachers, however, did not agree in electing any bishop resident in Canada, and the persons who were elected in the United States declined to accept the office. The

Rev. William Case in the mean time was elected as superintendent pro tem. In 1832, the British Conference sent missionaries into Upper Canada, and proposals were made that the Canada Conference should become a part of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of Great Britain. In 1833, the Conference, by a rising vote which was declared to be unanimous, on Oct. 2, 1833, agreed to unite with the Wesleyan Methodist Church, changing its Discipline so as to conform to that of the Wesleyans in England. A few, however, dissatisfied with the change, resolved to continue the former organization. (See METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN CANADA.) In 1840 some differences of opinion having arisen between the representatives of the British Conference and the ministers in Canada, the connection which had been formed was severed, though the church in Canada was still called the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and those who sympathized with the British views were called the British Wesleyans. This rivalry lasted for about seven years. The British Wesleyans at that time had only 3082 members, and the Wesleyans of Canada numbered 21,749.

In 1847 the union in its general features was restored; a new office of vice-president having been created, and the chairmen of districts having ceased to travel through their districts. In 1854, with the sanction of the British Conference, the Wesleyans of Canada, of the Eastern district, and the Hudson Bay missionary work were incorporated into the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, and this arrangement continued until 1874. The territory thus extended from the Atlantic to the Rocky Mountains, and from Lakes Ontario and Erie to the extreme north, and comprised 335 preachers, and a membership of between 39,000 and 40,000. The missionary work extended first into British Columbia, in 1859, and then into Japan, in 1873, and the membership increased until, in 1874, there were 656 ministers and 73,701 members. The church Relief Fund amounted to $2830.73, the Contingent Fund to $6638.32, and the Education Fund to $2961.84. The College Sustentation Fund was $2620.34, Superannuated Preachers' Fund, $13,419.40, and the Mission Fund, $14,354.51. At the same time there existed other bodies of Methodism in the Provinces. After preliminary negotiations three of the bodies united in 1874. First, the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Canada, whose history has thus far been given; second, the Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist Church in Eastern British America, which had been in an affiliated relation to the British Conference, and which has already been alluded to; and, third, the New Connection Methodist Church in Canada, which had been organized by Ryan, Jackson, and others. At one time it had been hoped that this union might have embraced all the Methodist bodies in the dominion, but the other bodies declined to coalesce. The new organization dropped all the distinctive titles, and united under the style of the Methodist Church of Canada, reporting, in 1875, 773 ministers and 102,178 members. The whole work has been divided into six Annual Conferences, viz., Toronto, London, Montreal, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, and the New Foundland. The general locality of these will be recognized by the chief cities named, or by the Provinces. Each Annual Conference is composed of all ministers received into full connection and ordained, who are stationed by it, and who reside within its bounds. Each Annual Conference elects its president by ballot, without debate, and also a secretary; and the ministers are appointed by a stationing committee. This committee consists of the president, chairmen of districts, and other ministers from each district, for whose election the lay members in the district shall also vote, and one of the general missionary secretaries.

The general order of business closely resembles that of the Wesleyans of England. No minister is permitted to remain more than three years successively on the same circuit, except the General Conference officers, missionaries, and ministers in educational work. Each Annual Conference is subdivided into districts. The district meetings are composed of all the members of Conferences and preachers on trial, the recording stewards of the circuits and missions, and one lay representative for every traveling minister from each circuit or mission; but the district meeting preceding General Conference shall also be composed of lay members elected by the quarterly meetings of the circuits. In these district meetings the chairman is required to ask distinctively and successively concerning every brother: 1. Is there any objection to his moral and religious character? 2. Does he believe and preach all our doctrines? 3. Has he duly observed and enforced our Discipline? 4. Has he been punctual in attending business appointments? 5. Has he competent abilities for our itinerant work? A written answer to each of these questions must appear in the district minutes. No preacher is received by the Conference until he has traveled four years, and has been recommended by the District Conference. No minister can be received on trial until he has passed an examination in the district meeting, and is asked by the chairman the same questions which are propounded to candidates for full connection in the Methodist Episcopal Church. If a preacher who has been received on trial, but not into full connection, desists from traveling, unless from want of health, or if he marries while on trial, he shall be dropped in silence. The General Conference is to meet once in four years, and is bound by Restrictive Rules not to change the order of the church except in a specified manner, in which the Annual Conferences participate. The present number of members reported is about 112,000.

Methodist Episcopal Church, The, is the title of the most numerous body of Methodists in the world. Its principal place is in the United States, but it has branches in every quarter of the globe. The name was assumed at the Conference or Convention called by Dr. Coke, at the instance of Mr. Wesley, for the purpose of organizing a church, and which is historically known as the Christmas Conference, which commenced Dec. 24, 1784, and lasted until Jan. 2, 1785. Up to that period the American Methodists constituted simply societies like their brethren in England, and had depended for the sacraments upon the ministers of the Church of England located in the Colonies. The organization of the church grew out of an intense desire to be furnished with the ordinances by their own ministers, and also out of the fact that the ministers of the Church of England, having generally left the United States, the membership was totally deprived of church privileges. Under these circumstances they applied to Mr. Wesley, whom they recognized as their spiritual leader, and under his direction they took the preparatory steps for forming a separate and independent church. Eighteen years before the organization of the church the first Methodist services were held in the city of New York, in the year 1776, by Philip Embury. He had been a local preacher in Ireland, converted under the ministrations of Mr. Wesley in 1752, and had removed to New York, where, finding no congenial spirits, he had neglected to exercise his gifts. An appeal from Barbara Heck, an earnest Irishwoman and a devoted Christian, aroused him to a sense of his duty, and he organized a small class, to which, and to a few friends, he preached in a private house. He was soon joined by Thomas Webb, a captain in the British army, who was barrack-master in Albany, N. Y., but whose duties occupied but a small portion of his time. Hearing of the little society in New York he visited them, and passed thence through New Jersey to Philadelphia and Maryland, and was the chief agent in laying the foundations of Methodism at so early a period. About the same time Robert Strawbridge or Strobbridge, who had settled in what was then Frederick County, Md., and was a local preacher, commenced holding services. They were joined, in 1769, by Robert Williams, and soon after Mr. Wesley sent Richard Boardman and Joseph Pillmoor. These were followed, in 1771, by Francis Asbury and Richard Wright, and in 1773 by Thomas Rankin and George Shadford. A church was built in New York (the Old John Street), and dedicated in 1768, and in Philadelphia, St. George's church was purchased, an unfinished building, but in which services were held. In 1773 ten ministers assembled to hold the first Annual Conference in America. It was presided over by Mr. Rankin, whom Mr. Wesley had designated as general assistant, and the numbers reported were 1160. From this time a Conference was held every year, and, as the work extended southward, a second or Auxiliary Conference was held for the convenience of the preachers, though the Central Conference, which held its first three sessions in Philadelphia, and subsequently in Baltimore, was regarded as the supreme or authoritative body. In the excitement of the Revolutionary War all of the ministers who had come from England, except Francis Asbury, returned to their native land, and from 1788 the work was carried forward, with the exception alluded to, wholly by native preachers. Notwithstanding the disastrous influences of the war, and the difficulties under which the early ministers labored, in 1784 they reported 14,988 members, with several hundred local preachers and 84 itinerants. There were about 60 chapels, though nearly all of them were exceedingly small and plain, and the work had spread, not only along the Atlantic coast, but it also extended beyond the Alleghany Mountains. In 1779 the ministers who met in Virginia, feeling the great need of having the ordinances administered, took steps for the ordination of several of their number. This was strongly opposed by Mr. Asbury and the ministers who met at Baltimore, and, after a thorough discussion, it was agreed that the administration of the sacraments should be suspended, and Mr. Wesley's judgment should be sought. He advised them to continue on the old plan until further consideration. After consultation with his friends, among whom was Mr. Fletcher, he concluded to use the power he believed he held as a presbyter of the church, to ordain a ministry which should meet the demands of those who regarded him as their spiritual head. Accordingly he proposed to Rev. Thomas Coke, LL.D., to receive ordination at his hands as superintendent, and to take charge, associated with Mr. Asbury, of the American societies. After taking full time for reflection, Dr. Coke agreed to the arrangement.

Mr. Wesley first ordained as deacons Richard Whatecoat and Thomas Vasey, being assisted by Dr. Coke and Rev. James Creighton, who were presbyters of the Church of England. On the next day they were ordained as elders, and Mr. Wesley, assisted by Creighton and Whatecoat, ordained Dr. Coke as superintendent of the American societies, using the ritual of the English church for the ordination of bishops. He sent these ministers to America with instructions to aid the societies in organizing a distinct church; and he requested that Francis Asbury should be ordained as joint superintendent with Dr. Coke. To aid them he published a Sunday service containing a liturgy, with a collection of psalms and hymns, the Articles of Religion and the ritual of the church. After conferring with a few brethren in America, an invitation was sent to all the preachers to meet Dr. Coke and Mr. Asbury in Baltimore on the 24th of December. Of the 84 ministers then preaching, 63 assembled. A few were so distant they did not obtain the intelligence; others were ill or otherwise unable to come. Dr. Coke presented a letter from Mr. Wesley, which first alluded to the fact of their having become an independent nation, of his being satisfied that bishops and presbyters were the same order; that while he would not interfere with the established order of the National Church of England, yet that in America there were no bishops who had jurisdiction, and that he considered himself at full liberty to appoint and send ministers. He then added, "I have accordingly appointed Dr. Coke and Mr. Francis Asbury to be joint superintendents over our brethren in North America, and also Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vasey to act as elders among them by baptizing and administering the Lord's Supper; and I have prepared a liturgy a little different from that of the Church of England (I think the best constituted national church in the world), which I advise all traveling preachers to use upon the Lord's day, in all the congregations, reading the litany only on Wednesdays and Fridays, and praying extempore on all other days. I also advise the ministers to administer the Supper of the Lord on every Lord's day." He further said, "As our American brethren are now totally disentangled both from the state and from the English hierarchy, we dare not entangle them again either with the one or the other: they are now at full liberty simply to follow the Scriptures and the primitive church. And we judge it best they should stand fast in that liberty wherein God hath so strangely made them free!" Without a dissenting voice the preachers present agreed to form an independent church, to be known as the Methodist Episcopal Church, adopting the liturgy Mr. Wesley had prepared, and the service for the ordination of superintendents, elders, and deacons, or, using their own language, "following the counsel of Mr. John Wesley, who recommended the episcopal mode of government, we thought it best to become an episcopal church, making the church officers elective, and an elective superintendent or bishop, amenable to the body of ministers and preachers." Asbury declined to accept the office until elected by the ministers, whereupon both Dr. Coke and himself were unanimously chosen.

In his sermon preparatory to ordaining Bishop

Asbury, Dr. Coke used the word bishop or superintendent as of equivalent meaning, and on the revisal of the Discipline in 1787 the word superintendent was changed to that of bishop. This action was displeasing to Mr. Wesley, because he did not wish to seem to interfere with the English church, and because he feared it was an indication of pride upon the part of Asbury and Coke and of the infant church. The Conference which made these changes declined to follow his advice in the election of Mr. Whatcoat as bishop, and rescinded the minute by which they had agreed to obey Mr. Wesley in all matters of church order. His objection to the phrase implied no objection to the exercise of all its functions, for, he said, "I firmly believe I am a scriptural episcopos as much as any man in England or in Europe, for the uninterrupted succession I know to be a fable which no man ever did or ever can prove." The action of the church in 1784, in adopting the episcopal form of government, was submitted to Mr. Wesley on the return of Dr. Coke, and the minutes containing these phrases were published under his own eye. Charles Wesley, who was exceedingly dissatisfied, stated that his brother had "assumed the episcopal character, ordained elders, consecrated a bishop, and sent him to ordain our lay preachers in America." Dr. Coke, when assailed in England, replied publicly that "he had done nothing but under the direction of Mr. Wesley," and Mr. Wesley replied to his brother that the doctor "had done nothing rashly." The Articles of Religion (which see) were copied or abridged from those of the Church of England, as was also the ritual, which omitted some objectionable phrases, as those touching baptismal regeneration, which have since given rise to much controversy in the Episcopal Church. The Convention which thus formed the Methodist Episcopal Church did not, however, fully complete its organization. It left the Annual Conferences independent each of the other. As we have already said, a usage had grown up by which the Central Conference was regarded as chief in authority, and its enactments were regarded by the whole body. But such a system could not continue. The practice was, when any change was desired, it was submitted to the Southern Conferences, as there were two south of Baltimore, and when acted upon favorably by them, the matter was finally decided at the Baltimore Conference. Thus the Discipline was slightly altered in 1786, and was thoroughly revised in 1787. As the number of Conferences increased, and as the work was more widely spread, the need of a central power was deeply felt, and in 1789 the Conferences agreed to the formation of a council, to be composed of the bishop and the presiding elders, who should recommend such changes as they should unanimously agree upon but which were to have force only after being adopted by the several Annual Conferences. (See COUNCIL.) As some objection was made to this power being confided to the presiding elders who were the appointees of the bishop, the council of 1790 was composed of the bishop and of elders elected from each district. But the organization was a powerless one, and the whole plan became unpopular, and resulted in the calling of a General Conference in 1792, to be composed of all the preachers in full connection. We mark, however, in the constitution of the council, and in the submission of its work to the Annual Conferences, the jealousy with which the church at that day regarded the depositing of power with a limited body. It must be unanimous in its action, and then be approved by each Conference, before any change could be made; so tenaciously did they adhere to the fundamental rules of Methodism.

This General Conference, which assembled in 1792, though purely a clerical body, was regarded as holding in itself the full power of the church; but fearful of change, it bound itself not to make any change on any received rule of Methodism without a majority of two-thirds, and this continued to be the practice of the General Conference until the formation of the delegated Conference. It was resolved that the General Conference should meet every four years, and that all legislative power should be vested therein; and thus the organization of the church was fully complete. With but a few alterations, the general outlines of the church have been continued to this day. In 1796, the number of Annual Conferences, which had been changeable according to the supposed convenience of the preachers under the authority of the bishops, was now definitely fixed, and have since that time been altered only by the General Conference, or under express authority given by them. Bishop Asbury's health being delicate, and Dr. Coke having after the death of Mr. Wesley confined his labors almost entirely to England, in 1800, Richard Whateoat was elected bishop; but he died in 1806, and the entire work of superintending the church devolved again upon Bishop Asbury. In 1808 it was determined that the General Conference should become a delegated body, consisting of a representation from each Annual Conference. This arose from the fact that the Annual Conferences which were near the seat of the General Conference, which up to that time had been held exclusively in Baltimore, had the entire control of the legislation of the church: for the minutes show that the ministers in attendance from the Baltimore and Philadelphia Conferences composed at one time about two-thirds of the entire body, and at each session they were a majority; but when this delegated body was formed, with the same scrupulous care to prevent hasty changes in the legislation of the church, restrictions were adopted to prevent the General Conference, as a delegated body, from changing the Articles of Religion or the General Rules of the church, from doing away with the episcopacy or the general itinerant superintendency, from taking away the right of appeal, or diverting the profits of the Book Concern to other than the benevolent objects to which they had been devoted. And so strict were these rules made that no alteration could be made on these restrictions without the vote of the majority of each and every Annual Conference in the church. Though several efforts were made to change the tightness of these restrictions, yet up to 1832 it was impossible to effect a change. Then, the General Conference becoming unwieldy, it was agreed by the vote of all the Conferences that the restriction might be changed so that they could hereafter be altered by the joint vote of two-thirds of the General Conference, and three-fourths of the Annual Conferences, present and voting. Up to this moment, no measure which has been supposed to affect the fundamental principles has been adopted by the General Conference without being submitted to this constitutional method. This mode was pursued in altering the rule on temperance, and on slavery, and in adopting the plan of lay delegation. As now constituted there is a regular gradation of Conferences, which has supervision over all the interests of the church: First. The Quarterly Conference has supervision over a single pastoral charge. It is composed of the pastor and any associate preachers, local preachers, exhorters, stewards, and class-leaders, together with the trustees and Sunday-school superintendents, if members of the church and approved by the Quarterly Conference. Secondly. The District Conference, embracing the church in a presiding elder's district. It is composed of the same members as constitute the Quarterly Conference, except there is only one steward and Sunday-school superintendent representing each charge. Thirdly. The Annual Conference, composed exclusively of ministers, whose functions are purely administrative and chiefly concerned with watching over the members of their own body, and matters of general interest to the Conference. Fourthly. A Judicial Conference, instituted for the trial of appeals from the Annual Conferences, and which consists of seven members selected from three adjacent Conferences, and also for the trial of a bishop, in which case it consist of the triers from five adjacent Conferences. Fifthly. The General Conference, which has supreme supervision over all the interests of the work, which elects the bishops and the secretaries of the various benevolent boards, appoints the members of those bodies, and is vested with full legislative power within the limitations before mentioned.

The officers of the church are also arranged under the same plan of supervision. The class-leader cares for the little company which is assigned to his oversight, and he is to instruct them in religious doctrines and duties. The preacher in charge meets these once a week, and thus is enabled to understand the condition of the whole membership. The presiding elder of the district watches over all the interests of the preachers and churches within his bounds. These again are supervised by the bishops, who are amenable to the General Conference, and whose official work is carefully examined by the episcopal committee. Thus the church has a system of supervising agencies which reach to every part of its work. The bishop presiding in each Annual Conference, and being responsible to the General Conference, sees that church order is observed in all his arrangements, and the presiding elder being under the direct control of the General Conference, through the bishop, preserves the order of the church in every charge. This close supervision is unpleasant, however, to such as do not love order, and who are impatient of restraint; and hence there have been, from time to time, withdrawals and secessions from the ministry. The first of these occurred in 1792, and was led by James O'Kelly, who was unsound doctrinally, and who could not bear to be directed in his ministerial course. The next large secession was in 1816, when the colored membership of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and other places formed the African M. E. Church. This secession arose partly on account of the prejudices of color, but partly also from the unwillingness of certain leaders to submit to the order and government of the church. The question of the mode of appointments was discussed in the church from 1816 to 1828, and in the controversies which arose were involved the episcopacy, the presiding eldership, the rights of local preachers to attend the Annual Conferences and to be represented in the General Conference, and the right of the laity to be represented in both bodies. The advocates of greater freedom proceeded to acts of ecclesiastical insubordination; this led to the exercise of church discipline, and secession followed, which resulted in the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church. The question of slavery became one of exceeding interest, and such excitement followed as resulted in the organization, in 1845, of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, which took with it about two-fifths of the entire membership of the church, and was chiefly sectional in its character.

The separation of the M. E. Church South differed from any that preceded it, in the fact that a provisional plan had been adopted by the General Conference in case a Southern organization should be made. The South claimed that this plan authorized immediate action on their part, while on the other side it was claimed that it depended on certain unfulfilled conditions. A number of persons in the Southern border States memorialized the General Conference of 1848, complaining that they had been unconstitutionally deprived of their membership, and also complaining of violations of the alleged plan. Whereupon the General Conference took the following action:

"1. There exists no power in the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church to pass any act which either directly or indirectly effectuates, authorizes, or sanctions a division of said church.

"2. It is the right of every member of the M. E. Church to remain in said church, unless guilty of the violation of its rules; and there exists no power in the ministry, either individually or collectively, to deprive any member of said right.

"3. This right being inviolably secured by the fifth restrictive article of the Discipline, which guarantees to members, ministers, and preachers the right of trial and appeal, any acts of the church otherwise separating them from said church contravenes the constitutional rights and privileges of the membership and ministry.

"4. The report of the select committee of nine upon the declaration of the delegates in the slaveholding States, adopted by the General Conference of 1844, of which the memorialists complain, and the operation of which deprived them of their privileges as members of the M. E. Church, was intended to meet a necessity which it was alleged might arise, and was given as a peace-offering to secure harmony on our Southern border. It was further made dependent, first, upon the concurrence of three-fourths of the members of the several Annual Conferences, in reference to a part of its regulations; and, secondly, upon the observance of certain provisions respecting a boundary, by the distinct ecclesiastical connection separating from us, should such connection be formed. Without waiting, as this Conference believes, for the occurrence of the anticipated necessity for which the plan was formed, action was taken in the premises by the Southern delegates. The Annual Conferences, by their votes officially received, have refused to concur with that part of the plan submitted to them; and the provisions respecting a boundary have been violated by the highest authorities of said connection which separated from us, and thereby the peace and harmony of many of the societies in our Southern border have been destroyed; therefore, in view of these facts, as well as for the principles contained in the preceding declarations, there exists no obligation on the part of this Conference to observe the provisions of said plan; and it is hereby declared null and void."

Considerable controversy and excitement continued on the border, until all the difficulties concerning slavery were merged in the Civil War. Since its close, steps have been taken to secure fraternal relations, and a kindlier feeling has been recently developed. (See FRATERNAL RELATIONS.)

Two or three years before the separation of the South, a secession had taken place in New England and New York, because it was alleged the principles and actions of the church were not sufficiently anti-slavery. This resulted in the formation of the Wesleyan Methodist Church. Notwithstanding all these secessions or separations, the church has gone steadily forward in her mission of mercy and love, and the reports show that there are now 11,205 traveling ministers and 12,491 local preachers. There are 1,652,291 members, and 1,452,946 Sunday-school scholars. There are 15,600 churches, valued at $71,000,000, with 5200 parsonages, valued at $9,500,000. To assist in spreading scriptural truth, a book-room has been established with a large capital (see BOOK CONCERN), which annually issues a large number of volumes, and circulates a wide-spread periodical literature. The church has established missions in the four quarters of the globe, among various nationalities, which are supported at an outlay of about $600,000 annually. (See MISSIONS and MISSIONARY SOCIETY.) Seminaries, colleges, universities, and theological schools have been established (which see), which are aiding in the education of the young people of the church, and of others who may frequent their halls. A Church Extension Society has been organized, which distributes about $60,000 to aid feeble societies to erect houses necessary for them, and a Church Extension Loan Fund has been funded, now amounting to more than $300,000. (See CHURCH EXTENSION SOCIETY.) A Freedman's Aid Society has also been organized, for the purpose of establishing schools among the freedmen, and especially for preparing young people for ministers and teachers. Sunday-school books and papers of every needed class are regularly issued. While endeavoring to furnish what its own communicants may need, and to extend its borders still more widely, the M. E. Church is always ready to join in fraternal arrangements with other evangelical denominations. Claiming to be a branch of the church of Christ, other evangelical branches are cordially recognized as standing on the same broad platform, and as also entitled to Christian courtesy and confidence.

With the growth of the church a few changes have been made in its economy. In 1864 the ministerial term was extended to three years; and in 1872 lay delegation was introduced into the General Conference. Provision was made, in 1856, for missionary bishops, and Conferences have been constituted in the four quarters of the globe. At present there are 91 Annual Conferences, which reported, in 1876, the following statistics:

* Organized, but not reported separately.

Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, The, is, in doctrine, polity, and usages, very similar to the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States. Methodist services were introduced into Canada in 1778, and among the first members were Barbara Heck, her husband and sons, and the widow of Philip Embury and her son, the latter being class-leader. These were a large part of the first class organized in New York. The work in Canada was connected with the Conference in the United States until 1828, when the Canada Conference was organized into a separate and distinct church. The War of 1812 had given rise to difficulty, and during its continuance the societies in Canada were separated from those in the United States, and, after the close of the war, several of the churches desired to be connected with the Wesleys of England rather than with the churches of the United States. At various times some friction arose between the ministers and missionaries from England and those of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which had previously occupied the territory, and it was finally deemed wiser to permit the Conference in Canada to become independent. In 1824 the work in Canada had been organized into a distinct Annual Conference. This Conference petitioned, in 1828, to become independent, and the General Conference resolved "that if the Annual Conference in Upper Canada, at its ensuing session or any succeeding session previously to the next General Conference, shall definitely determine on this course, and elect a general superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal Church in that Province, this General Conference do hereby authorize any one or more of the general superintendents of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, with the assistance of any two or more elders, to ordain such superintendents for such church in Upper Canada." The Canada Conference of 1828 met at Emestown chapel, Bishop Hedding presiding, and adopted the following resolution: "That it is expedient and necessary, and that the Canada Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church do now organize itself into an independent Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada,—that we adopt the present Discipline of the Methodist Church as the basis of our constitution and discipline, except such alterations as may appear necessary from our local circumstances." William Case was elected general superintendent pro tem. Bishop Hedding presided, and ordained deacons and elders. He visited the Conference again in 1830, and, at the request of the Conference, again ordained deacons and elders. The Conference could not agree upon the election of any bishop among their own brethren, and successively elected Dr. Nathan Bangs, Dr. Wilbur Fisk, and Rev. Mr. Stratton, from the United States, but each of them declined the proffered honor. In 1832 correspondence took place between the missionaries of the British Wesleyan Church and leading men in Upper Canada, and in 1833 the Conference agreed to unite with the British Wesleyan Connection, and change the episcopal polity and order of the church into the discipline and mode of the British Conference. This action took place without any formal and direct consultation with the laity, though the great mass of them cheerfully acquiesced. A few of the ministers and of the membership were dissatisfied with this arrangement, and proclaimed "that the act was unconstitutional, as it had not been submitted to the societies, and that it infringed upon the agreement which had been made between the Canada Church and the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States." A few of the superannuated ministers and local preachers resolved to continue the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and, protesting in 1833, they met in June, 1834, and ordained as their bishop, John Reynolds, a located elder, who, with L. Ryan, had carried the societies through the War of 1812-15. He had been converted under Nathan Bangs in 1803, and had traveled as a member of the New York Conference, and had been ordained elder by Bishop George. After becoming fully organized they found they had nearly one-twelfth of the membership associated with them, but were without schools, parsonages, and churches. A litigation ensued in reference to property, and the decision of the lower courts was in favor of those who adhered to the Methodist Episcopal Church, but the higher courts recognized the Wesleyan Methodists of Canada as the rightful owners of the property. These litigations gave rise to unpleasant feelings, which, though more than forty years have passed away, are not yet entirely obliterated. At the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1835 there were 21 preachers and 1243 members reported. In 1841 it had grown to 6049, and in 1869 to a membership of 19,691. At the present writing (1877) there are 270 traveling preachers and a membership of over 26,000. Beginning, in 1834, without buildings or property, there is now a church property valued at nearly a million and a quarter of dollars. A connectional journal has been established, The Canada Christian Advocate, which was commenced in 1845. Albert University was founded in 1857, with its Albert and Alexandra Colleges, and it has a property estimated at $40,000, with a small endowment. It affords facilities for education to the youth of both sexes. The number of Sabbath-school children nearly equals the number of church members, and a number of missionaries are employed to visit remote and destitute fields. A young Church Extension Society is growing in importance, and Alma College is projected, and subscriptions pledged for some $15,000. Rev. John Reynolds was the first bishop elected after the re-organization, in 1834. Next was John Alley, who had been a member of the Black River Conference, and who was elected and consecrated, in 1845, at a special General Conference. Philander Smith was elected and ordained at the regular General Conference in 1846. In 1858, James Richardson was appointed to the episcopal office, and Rev. Albert Carman, D.D., the present incumbent, in 1874. Dr. Carman is now the only bishop, the others having deceased. There are three Annual Conferences, the Niagara, Bay Quinte, and Ontario.

Methodist Episcopal Church South.—The early history of Methodism, and of the Methodist Episcopal Church, supplies the facts which are common to the Methodist bodies down to the period of separation. The Methodist Episcopal Church South, as a distinct body, was formed by a Convention which met in Louisville, in May, 1845, and its first General Conference assembled in Petersburg, Va., in May, 1846. The occasion for the separation was found in the action of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1844. Rev. Francis A. Harding, of the Baltimore Conference, had been suspended from the ministry for not manumitting slaves belonging to his wife. This decision was confirmed by the General Conference. Bishop Andrew, who resided in Georgia, was married shortly before that General Conference to a lady who was the owner of slaves, the law of Georgia not allowing their emancipation. This circumstance gave rise to a lengthened and excited discussion, at the end of which the General Conference adopted the following preamble and resolution: "Whereas, The Discipline of the church forbids the doing anything calculated to destroy our itinerant and general superintendency; and whereas, Bishop Andrew has become connected with slavery by marriage and otherwise, and this act having drawn after it circumstances which, in the estimation of the General Conference, will greatly embarrass the exercise of his office as an itinerant general superintendent, if not, in some places, entirely prevent it; therefore resolved, That it is the sense of this General Conference that he desist from the exercise of this office so long as this impediment remains." This action was sustained by a vote of 111 for, and 69 against; the entire Southern delegates, except those of the Baltimore Conference, and one other, voting in the negative. A resolution was then offered declaring the action to be advisory only; but this was laid upon the table by a vote of 75 to 68. A resolution proposing the formation of two General Conferences was referred to a committee, which did not agree. The Southern delegates then presented the following declaration: "The delegates of the Conference in the slave-holding States take leave to declare to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, that the continued agitation on the subject of slavery and abolition in a portion of the church, the frequent action on that subject in the General Conference, and especially the extra-judicial proceedings against Bishop Andrew, which resulted, on Saturday last, in the virtual suspension of him from his office as superintendent, must produce a state of things in the South which renders a continuance of the jurisdiction of the General Conference over these Conferences inconsistent with the success of the ministry in the slave-holding States." This paper was referred to a committee of nine, with instructions to devise a constitutional plan for a mutual and friendly division of the church if practicable. This committee made their report, which, after much discussion, was adopted by a very large vote, and is as follows: "The select committee of nine to consider and report on the declaration of the delegates from the Conferences of the slave-holding States, beg leave to submit the following report:

"Whereas, A declaration has been presented to this General Conference, with the signatures of fifty-one delegates of the body from thirteen Annual Conferences in the slave-holding States, representing that, for various reasons enumerated, the objects and purposes of the Christian ministry and church organization cannot be successively accomplished by them under the jurisdiction of this General Conference as now constituted; and whereas, in the event of a separation—a contingency to which the declaration asks attention as not improbable—we esteem it the duty of this General Conference to meet the emergency with Christian kindness and the strictest equity; therefore,

"Resolved, by the delegates of the several Annual Conferences in General Conference assembled, 1. That should the Annual Conferences in the slave-holding States find it necessary to unite in a distinct ecclesiastical connection, the following rule shall be observed with regard to the northern boundary of such connection: all the societies, stations, and Conferences adhering to the church in the South, by a vote of a majority of the members of said societies, stations, and Conferences, shall remain under the unmolested pastoral care of the Southern Church; and the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church shall in no wise attempt to organize churches or societies within the limits of the Church South, nor shall they attempt to exercise any pastoral oversight therein; it being understood that the ministry of the South reciprocally observe the same rule in relation to stations, societies, and Conferences adhering by a vote of a majority to the Methodist Episcopal Church; provided, also, that this rule shall apply only to societies, stations, and Conferences bordering on the line of division, and not to interior charges, which shall in all cases be left to the care of that church within whose territory they are situated.

"2. That ministers, local and traveling, of every grade and office in the Methodist Episcopal Church, may, as they prefer, remain in the church, or, without blame, attach themselves to the Church South.

"3. Resolved, by the delegates of all the Annual Conferences in General Conference assembled, That we recommend to all the Annual Conferences at their first approaching sessions to authorize a change of the sixth Restrictive Article, so that the first clause shall read thus: 'They shall not appropriate the produce of the Book Concern, nor of the Chartered Fund, to any other purpose other than for the benefit of the traveling, supernumerary, super-annuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows, and children, and to such other purposes as may be determined upon by the voice of two-thirds of the members of the General Conference.'

"4. That whenever the Annual Conferences, by a vote of three-fourths of all their members voting on the third resolution, shall have concurred in the recommendation to alter the sixth Restrictive Article, the agents at New York and Cincinnati shall, and they are hereby authorized and directed to deliver over to any authorized agent or appointee of the Church South (should one be organized) all notes and book accounts against the ministers, church members, or citizens within its boundaries, with authority to collect the same for the sole use of the Southern Church; and that said agents also convey to the aforesaid agent or appointee of the South all the real estate, and assign to him all the property, including presses, stock, and all right and interest connected with the printing establishments at Charleston, Richmond, and Nashville, which now belong to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

"5. That when the Annual Conferences shall have approved the aforesaid change in the sixth Restrictive Article, there shall be transferred to the above agents of the Southern Church so much of the capital and produce of the Methodist Book Concern as will, with the notes, book accounts, presses, etc., mentioned in the last resolution, bear the same proportion to the whole property of said Concern that the traveling preachers in the Southern Church shall bear to all the traveling ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the division to be made on the basis of the number of traveling preachers in the forthcoming minutes.

"6. That the above transfer shall be in the form of annual payments of $25,000 per annum, and specifically in stock of the Book Concern, and in Southern notes and accounts due the establishment, and accruing after the first transfer mentioned above; and until the payments are made the Southern Church shall share in all the net profits of the Book Concern in the proportion that the amount due them, or in arrears, bears to all the property of the Concern.

"7. That Nathan Bangs, George Peck, and James B. Finley be, and they are hereby appointed, commissioners to act in concert with the same number of commissioners appointed by the Southern organization (should one be formed), to estimate the amount which will fall due to the South by the preceding rule, and to have full powers to carry into effect the whole arrangements proposed with regard to the division of property, should the separation take place. And if by any means a vacancy occur in this board of commissioners, the book committee at New York shall fill said vacancy.

"8. That whenever any agents of the Southern Church are clothed with legal authority or corporate power to act in the premises, the agents at New York are hereby authorized and directed to act in concert with said Southern agents, so as to give the provisions of these resolutions a legally binding force.

"9. That all the property of the Methodist Episcopal Church in meeting-houses, parsonages, colleges, schools, Conference funds, cemeteries, and of every kind within the limits of the Southern organization, shall be forever free from any claim set up on the part of the Methodist Episcopal Church, so far as this resolution can be of force in the premises.

"10. That the church so formed in the South shall have a common right to use all copyrights in possession of the Book Concern at New York and Cincinnati at the time of the settlement by the commissioners.

"11. That the book agents at New York be directed to make such compensation to the Conferences South for their dividend from the Chartered Fund as the commissioners above provided for shall agree upon.

"12. That the bishops be respectfully requested to lay that part of this report requiring the action of the Annual Conferences before them as soon as possible, beginning with the New York Conference."

At the close of the General Conference the Southern delegates called for a Convention in the ratio of one to eleven of the members of the Annual Conferences, to meet in Louisville, May 1, 1845. The Conferences and churches in the South were found to be very generally in favor of separation. When the Convention met, Bishops Soule and Andrew presided, and after full deliberation, it declared the Southern Conference a distinct church, under the style of "The Methodist Episcopal Church South." Bishops Soule and Andrew were requested to act as bishops in the new organization. Bishop Andrew at once gave in his adhesion; Bishop Soule deferred until the meeting of the General Conference the next year. In addition to the question of slavery, the Southern delegates had at the time of the General Conference joined in a protest against the action in the case of Bishop Andrew, characterizing it as extra-judicial and unconstitutional, claiming that the episcopacy was a co-ordinate branch of the government; and that a bishop could not be subjected, by a delegated Conference, to any official disability without a formal charge, trial, and conviction; and that the action in Bishop Andrew's case was subversive of the union and stability of the church. This protest was allowed to go on the journal, and a reply to it was made on the part of the majority. At the General Conference in 1846, William Capers, D.D., and Robert Paine, D.D., were elected bishops. The Discipline was revised, and those portions relating to slavery were stricken from it. H. B. Bascom, A. L. P. Green, and C. B. Parsons were appointed commissioners to settle financial matters with the M. E. Church. John Early was elected agent, and editors were elected for the church papers. Loving Pierce, D.D., was commissioned to attend the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1848, to tender the fraternal salutations of the General Conference to that body.

In the mean time the Annual Conferences had voted upon that part of the plan which had been referred to them, and had declined to alter the Restrictive Rule: and the question of property was carried by the commissioners of the Church South to the Supreme Court. It was decided in their favor, and the Book Concern was divided according to the ratio of traveling preachers in the two bodies. A publishing house was established in Nashville, and the M. E. Church South, occupying chiefly the Southern States, was in full and successful operation. The breaking out of the Civil War in 1861 greatly embarrassed the action of the church in the border States. Its Book Concern and much of its property was occupied during the military operations by the armies either of the Confederacy or of the Union; and a few of the Conferences were temporarily almost disorganized. Since the close of the war the M. E. Church South has been rapidly recovering from its depression, and some important changes have been made in its economy. The Annual Conferences, formerly composed exclusively of ministers, have now four lay delegates (one of whom may be a local preacher) from each district; and the General Conference is constituted of an equal number of ministers and laymen. District Conferences are held in all the districts, and are composed of an equal number of ministers and laymen, and are presided over by a bishop whenever he is present. Quarterly Conferences are held as formerly, and Church Conferences for each charge are ordered once a month to consider the general interests of the charges. The probationary feature formerly existing has been removed, and applicants are now admitted directly into full membership. The ministerial term is extended to four years. The General Conference ordered a revised edition of the liturgy as prepared by Mr. Wesley to be published, which such churches might use as desired so to do: but it has not been introduced to any extent. The colored membership of the church after the war, in many localities, left the M. E. Church South and united with the African M. E. Church, or the Zion Church, or with the Methodist Episcopal Church. By the advice of leading ministers and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, many of the colored people formed themselves into a new organization, called the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, adopting the Discipline and order of the Church South; and the General Conference of 1870 authorized the bishops to consecrate as bishops for the Colored Church two ministers chosen by them. Nearly all the colored membership which adhered to the Church South are now in this organization. (See COLORED M. E. CHURCH IN AMERICA.) In 1850, H. B. Bascom, D.D., was elected bishop; in 1854, John Early, D.D., and H. H. Kavanaugh, D.D., were added to the number; and in 1866, Geo. F. Peirce, D.D., David S. Doggett, D.D., W. M. Wightman, D.D., E. M. Marvin, D.D., H. N. McTyeire, D.D., and John C. Keener, D.D., were elected to the same office. Bishops Bascom, Capers, Soule, Andrew, and Marvin have deceased. (See BISHOPS.) Seminaries, colleges, and universities have been multiplied, and Vanderbilt University has received a gift of a noble building and a handsome endowment. (See VANDERBILT UNIVERSITY AND COLLEGES.) A number of valuable works have been issued from the publishing house, together with reprints of standard works.

At the time of the separation, in 1845, there were about 450,000 communicants in the Southern Church. In 1860 there were 757,205, of whom 207,766 were colored. These numbers were somewhat reduced during the war, but since that period they have constantly increased, and in 1875 there were 3271 traveling and 5462 local preachers, and 731,361 members, of whom 4335 were Indians, and only 2083 colored. There were also 7578 Sunday-schools, and 346,759 scholars. Missions have been established in China, Mexico, and Brazil. There are 37 Annual Conferences. The statistics were reported, in 1875, as follows:

Methodist Magazine, The.—In 1778, Mr. Wesley commenced the publication of The Arminian Magazine in London, for the purpose of more clearly expounding the doctrines and usages of Wesleyan Methodism, and to serve as a bond of union among his widely-scattered societies. That periodical, now called The Methodist Magazine, still lives. Copying his example, the General Conference of 1796 directed the publication of The Methodist Magazine in Philadelphia, to be patterned chiefly after the style of Mr. Wesley's magazine. It appeared in 1797 and 1798, but Mr. Dickens having fallen a victim to the yellow fever, and the publication having been somewhat embarrassed financially, it was discontinued. In 1816 the General Conference authorized the publication of a magazine, to be entitled The Methodist Missionary Magazine. This was commenced in 1818, but for some unknown reason the word missionary was omitted from its title. It was under the control of the book agents, and was the only organ published by the church until the establishment of The Christian Advocate, in 1826. It was published monthly until 1828, when it was changed to a quarterly, and the title of Quarterly Review was added to that of Methodist Magazine. Under this title it was continued until 1840, when it was merged into The Methodist Quarterly Review, which appeared in a new and enlarged form. The magazine was edited by the book agents until 1832, when Nathan Bangs was elected editor of The Quarterly Review and of the books generally. In 1836 it was under the care of Dr. Luckey, editor of The Christian Advocate. (See QUARTERLY REVIEW.)

Methodist Protestant Church, The.—The ministers and members who formed this organization having originally been members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, its history is to some extent identified with that of the M. E. Church (which see). The economy of the parent church, adopted in 1784, having placed the legislative power exclusively in the hands of the itinerant ministers, there arose from time to time discussion and dissatisfaction. This manifested itself first among the local ministry, and spread from them to the membership. There was also some dissatisfaction occasionally expressed at the mode of making the appointments, and the power vested in the episcopacy. In 1820 the subject of an elective presiding eldership was discussed, and considerable excitement spread through the church. After the close of that General Conference William S. Stockton, a prominent layman of the M. E. Church, commenced the publication of The Wesleyan Repository at Trenton, N. J., which advocated lay representation in the Conferences of the church, and representation of the local preachers; the modification or abolition of the presiding eldership, and the modification or destruction of the episcopacy. Petitions for changes in the form of government were sent to the General Conference of 1824, but that Conference declared such changes to be inexpedient, and the propositions for change were voted down by a decided majority. A meeting was held by the friends of reform in Baltimore, May 21, 1824, at which they resolved to establish a periodical to be called The Mutual Rights of the ministry and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and to form union societies within the church in all parts of the United States to disseminate their principles and to correspond with each other. The Repository which had been commenced at Trenton was merged in The Mutual Rights, and an earnest and exciting controversy was conducted in its pages. The articles published and the formation of societies aroused much feeling in the church, and the result was that a number of persons in Tennessee, Virginia, Maryland, and Ohio were suspended or expelled from the church. The appeals taken to the Annual Conferences resulted in the confirmation of the various sentences. In the Baltimore Conference, Rev. Dennis B. Dorsey was arraigned for having recommended the circulation of The Mutual Rights, which it was alleged contained false and injurious statements in reference to certain ministers and to the character of the church, while the Reformers claimed that the only point at issue was the right to organize for the purpose of effecting desired changes. In 1827 a number of persons were expelled in the city of Baltimore for being members of the union society and taking part in its movements. This expulsion was followed by the withdrawal of a number of their friends, who alleged that the persecution was wholly owing to a difference of opinion about church government. Those who had been expelled and those who withdrew organized themselves January, 1828, into a society called the Associate Methodist Reformers. It embraced about 200 members and 14 preachers. Prior, however, to this organization a General Convention of Reformers had met in Baltimore in November, 1827, composed of about 60 delegates from various sections of country. This body prepared a memorial setting forth their grievances, and which was presented to the General Conference which assembled in Pittsburgh, Pa., in May, 1828. The Conference proposed the restoration of the expelled and suspended parties to membership on condition that The Mutual Rights should be discontinued, and that the union societies within the church should be dissolved. The Reformers declined to accept this proposal, and a General Convention was called to meet in St. John's church, Baltimore, on the 12th of November, 1828. The controversy became more extensive, and expulsions and withdrawals continued in numerous places, and the Associate Methodist societies grew in numbers and influence. The Convention assembled, and continued in session ten days; eleven of the States and the District of Columbia were represented. Nicholas Snethen presided, and William S. Stockton acted as secretary. They reviewed the answer of the General Conference, and replied in these words: "We cannot in conscience admit the correctness of their claims, nor recommend the Reformers to abandon the prosecution of an object which we consider of vital importance to the future welfare of the church." Articles of association were agreed upon, and a provisional church was organized under the name of the Associated Methodist Churches. A committee was appointed to draft a constitution and Discipline, and to compile a hymn-book. They adjourned to meet in General Convention Nov. 2, 1830, in the same place. The Convention of 1830, when assembled, was composed of 114 ministerial and lay delegates, in equal proportion, 83 of whom were in attendance, representing a constituency of some 5000, including about 80 ministers. Francis Waters, D.D., was elected president, and W. C. Lipscomb secretary. After full deliberation the title of the church was agreed upon as the Methodist Protestant Church; a declaration of the principles was prepared, and provisions were adopted for the regulation and government of the church. The whole territory was divided into districts, circuits, and stations. The episcopacy and presiding eldership were rejected. In each district an Annual Conference was to be held, composed of all the ordained itinerant ministers. Each Annual Conference was authorized to elect its president annually. The General Conference was to meet once in seven years, and to consist of an equal number of ministers and laymen, the ratio of representation being one minister and one layman for every thousand persons in full membership: each district, however, being entitled to one minister and one layman. These were to deliberate in one body, but if required by any three members, on the final passage of a question, the ministers and laymen should vote separately, and a concurrent vote should be necessary for the adoption of any article. The same plan was to be observed in the Annual Conferences. The class-leaders were to be elected annually by their classes; but if any class neglected or refused to elect a leader, then the superintendent should nominate and the class elect. The provisions in reference to suffrage and eligibility to office were restricted to white ministers and male members in full connection and of twenty-one years of age. This provision subsequently gave rise to the separation of the church in 1858. It was claimed by some of the Reformers that the occasion for the insertion of this clause was, that a District Conference in Baltimore was dissolved by the votes of nine colored members, who had not previously claimed the right to vote, but were used for the occasion, and that its design was to prevent a similar occurrence, and also to avoid any conflict with State laws. They also adopted a clause that no minister, preacher, or member should be expelled for disseminating matters of opinion alone, except they be such as are condemned by the word of God. Specific rules were also adopted to secure fair and impartial trials, and appeals for accused ministers and members. A provision was also adopted for reaching alleged unlawful action by a General Conference. The General Rules of Mr. Wesley, and the Articles of Religion contained in the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, were adopted in full, and the same means of grace and usages were continued. The itinerant ministry was also preserved with some modifications to suit exceptional cases. A ritual was adopted, in substance the same as has been used in the Methodist Episcopal Church, with two exceptions: in the Lord's Supper no consecration either by word or act is allowed, and in 1874 the order of deacons in the ministry was abolished. A hymn-book was adopted, which had been compiled by John J. Harod, the first book agent, and a committee was appointed to secure a charter for a Book Concern. The Mutual Rights, adding the phrase "and Methodist Protestant," was adopted as an official organ, to be edited by B. Gamaliel Bailey, M.D. The first number of its new series appeared Jan. 7, 1831, and the title was subsequently abbreviated to The Methodist Protestant, which has been published without intermission to the present time. The Methodist Protestants claim that they were not in any fair sense a secession, but having been expelled, as they thought unjustly, or having withdrawn to avoid such a result, they thought it necessary to organize a church for themselves and for their children. As the church property had been secured by the form of deed for the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Reformers were compelled to build for themselves, except in cases where the deeds had been drawn without the usual specification, or where the societies withdrew en masse. A number of the ministers who had written in advocacy of reform declined to enter the new organization, and the members were in many places dependent on local ministers, who were then pressed into active work. Among these some of the most prominent were Dr. Samuel K. Jennings, Dr. Francis Waters, James P. Williams, S. Linthicum, Dr. John French, Dr. E. Finney, Dr. Holcomb, Charles Avery, T. Tolliekofer, George A. Reed, W. C. Lipscomb, and others. The leaders among the itineracy were Asa Shinn, Nicholas Snethen, Alexander McCaine, D. B. Dorsey, George Brown, Eli Henkle, W. C. Pool, Frederick Stier, and others: the first three were especially prominent, but by reason of age they did not long itinerate. The first General Conference met in Georgetown, D.C., May 6, 1834, Nicholas Snethen presiding and W. C. Lipscomb as secretary. At that time 14 Annual Conferences had been formed and the membership had increased to nearly 27,000, and there were about 500 preachers. At this Conference some changes were made in the Discipline. The Book Concern was placed upon a new basis, and the paper was, during the succeeding four years, edited by Nicholas Snethen and Asa Shinn, succeeded by Dr. Davies. A church was organized about this time in Charleston, S. C., which became the nucleus of the South Carolina Conference. Societies were formed for the support of the ministry. A Superannuated Fund Society was chartered in Maryland, whose vested fund now amounts to $60,000. Efforts were also made to institute colleges and seminaries. One was started by Dr. Francis Waters, near Baltimore, which was continued for a number of years. The constitution had provided for a General Conference every seven years, but it was found advisable to have a special Conference called in 1838. The Annual Conferences concurred, and it was held in Pittsburgh, Pa., with Asa Shinn as president, and the recommendation was adopted that the Conference should meet quadrennially. A plan to give the Book Concern more efficiency was matured, and Thomas H. Stockton was elected editor. Subsequently resigning, he was succeeded by E. Yates Reese, who filled the position until 1843. From 1843 to 1846, Augustus Webster, D.D., was editor, when E. Y. Reese was re-elected, and held the position until his death, in 1861. A new hymn-book was prepared by Rev. T. H. Stockton and adopted by the Conference, which continued in use until 1838, when the present book was prepared. In 1838 the number of Annual Conferences had increased to 16.

About this time a new paper was started in Ohio by Rev. C. Springer, called The Western Recorder. It was continued by Rev. A. H. Bassett for a number of years, and finally became The Methodist Recorder, the official organ of the Methodist Protestant Church of the North and West, and is now edited by Alexander Clark, D.D.

At the General Conference of 1842 a few minor changes were made in the Discipline, and a correspondence opened with secedent Methodist bodies in England. The slavery question came prominently before the Conference and was largely discussed, but no decisive action taken. The report of the Book Directory showed a large business, but unsatisfactory results. The periodical was doing well. The Annual Conferences had increased to 21. Fuller statistics were reported to this General Conference than ever before. A recapitulation shows: stations, 49; circuits, 259; missions, 52; ministers and preachers, 634 itinerant and 525 unstationed or local; members, 53,875, whole number, 55,034; church property, $412,225.

The General Conference of 1846 met at Cincinnati, O., and was composed of 71 delegates. The constitution of the church restricts this body to 100 members. To keep it within this bound the ratio of representation is changed pro re nata. Delegates were named from twenty-five Conferences. More discretionary power was given to Annual Conferences with respect to missionary labor. The slavery question also greatly excited the Conference. The following resolution, offered by Rev. Dr. J. S. Reese, was finally adopted: "Resolved, That in the judgment of this General Conference the holding of slaves is, under many circumstances, a sin against God, and in such cases should be condemned by the Methodist Protestant Church; nevertheless it is our opinion that, under some circumstances, it is not sinful. This General Conference does not feel authorized by the constitution to legislate on the subject of slavery, and by a solemn vote we present to the church our judgment that the different Annual Conferences, respectively, should make their own regulations on this subject, so far as authorized by the constitution." A favorable report was made on the condition of the Book Concern and periodical. Twenty-nine Annual Conferences were recognized; in addition, Texas, Missouri, and Wabash had been organized, making thirty-two. The statistical tables of these Conferences show the following aggregates: stations, 67; circuits, 356; missions, 81; itinerant ministers and preachers, 761; unstationed ministers and preachers, 677; members, 59,905; churches, 662; parsonages, 40.

In 1850 commissioners were appointed to consider a proposition from the trustees of Madison College, Uniontown, Pa., to make it a church institution, and it was subsequently opened under the auspices of the general church, Rev. Francis Waters, D.D., being president. The report of the Book Concern and periodical showed them to be in a prosperous condition. The Conference ordered a catechism for children to be drawn up and published. The statistics showed: stations, 63; circuits, 351; missions, 104; itinerant ministers and preachers, 778; unstationed ministers and preachers, 697; members, 64,219; churches, 803; parsonages, 57; value of church property, $708,415.

At the General Conference of 1854 thirty-six Annual Conferences were called. It was crowded with business, and the minutes are voluminous. A Home and Foreign Board of Missions had been established at Pittsburgh, Pa., and its proceedings came under review. Madison College also engaged much attention. Numerous petitions on suffrage, for striking out the word "white" in twelfth article of constitution, and others for retaining it, were presented. The question was finally disposed of by adopting the following, which covers kindred points, as to the sinfulness of holding slaves, etc.: "Resolved, That, according to the constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church, taking the word of God for the rule, the local judiciary, and not the General Conference, is the proper tribunal by which all questions of morality, bearing upon the standing of members of the Methodist Protestant Church, should be determined." The ratio of representation was fixed at one minister and one layman for every 1750 members. The statistics showed 34 Annual Conferences, with an aggregate of 78 stations, 405 circuits, 103 missions, 916 itinerant and 767 unstationed ministers, 70,018 members, 982 churches, 118 parsonages, $1,009,275 value of property. The Book Concern and periodical were removed from under the direct control of the Conference and placed under a convention of Conferences to meet at the same place and time with the General Conference. This measure was inaugurated in the interest of The Western Recorder, and provided for an equitable division of the Book Concern assets and a change of the name from Western Recorder to Western Methodist Protestant.

In the interim of the General Conferences of 1854 and 1858 grave complications occurred in the general church. The slavery question was agitating the whole country. At Madison College the conflict opened. Located in a free State, but with a faculty principally from slave States, strife was soon engendered. Steps were taken to found a college at Lynchburg, Va., and the faculty of Madison were invited to take charge. They tendered their resignations. College buildings were erected at Lynchburg and an organization effected; and Madison soon after was compelled to suspend. The Conferences West and North in 1857 held a Convention in Cincinnati, O. It was agreed not to attend the ensuing General Conference, and a memorial was prepared setting forth their ultimatum.

A delegation appeared at the General Conference of May, 1858, bearing this memorial, which was presented by Rev. William Collier, D.D. (See METHODIST CHURCH.) It was referred to a committee, who gave it full consideration, and reported adversely. Finally, after discussion, a paper was adopted designed as a plan of pacification. This, however, was not acceptable to the Conferences North and West, which called a Convention, and declined to continue further relations with their brethren in the Southern States, and carried about one-half of the membership with them.

Reports were made from Madison College and the Board of Missions at Pittsburgh, Pa. This Conference directed a revision of the hymn-book and the preparation and publication of a larger catechism. The ratio of representation was fixed at fifteen hundred. The Civil War beginning April, 1861, operated most disastrously upon the interests of the church. The Methodist Protestant, the official organ of the church, carefully abstained from all participation, as a religious journal, in the partisan strife, but the establishment of military lines between the combatants cut off more than one-half its circulation, thereby compelling the Book Directory to reduce its size and to sacrifice a large part of its vested fund to meet the expenses of the Book Concern. Its Maryland patrons, however, unitedly gave it full support in its non-political policy. On the 14th of September, 1861, its editor for nearly twenty years, E. Yates Reese, D.D., "ceased at once to work and live." It was then issued by a committee, and a communication was addressed to the Secretary of War, asking permission to supply the subscribers in the South with the church paper by flag of truce. This request was made with the distinct pledge that nothing should appear in its columns favoring either side, as had been its policy in the past, and if necessary a file of the paper was to be kept at the War Department. Permission was soon given by an autograph letter from Mr. Stanton. The post-office department continued to forward the paper by flag of truce via Fortress Monroe until official information was given that the packages were not distributed beyond the lines.

The General Conference of 1862 met in Georgetown, D. C., on the 6th of May. None but the representatives from the Maryland Conference were present. An organization was effected, but no attempt was made to transact business, and the session adjourned after authorizing the officers to call a meeting at such time and place as Providence might indicate. Meanwhile the Conferences south of the Potomac continued to assemble when it was found possible under the disabilities of the war, and followed the old-time policy of the church in abstaining from partisan deliverances, except in a single instance in North Carolina. In Maryland the church maintained her members, and kept the official paper afloat, but all south of her lines churches were burned and fell into decay. The Methodist Protestant was edited gratuitously, by committees of ministers having pastoral charges in Baltimore, until the 13th of May, 1865, when Rev. I. Thomas Murray was formally elected editor by the Book Directory.

The officers of the last General Conference having issued a call, it re-assembled in Georgetown, D. C., in May, 1865. The officers resumed their places, and it was found that, in addition to the Maryland delegates, certain brethren from the North and West appeared and were accorded seats. The Convention on the Book Concern and periodical was organized, and changes made in its regulations. The Conference, as such, was formally received at the Executive mansion by President Johnson, and addresses made. The following paper was also passed in Conference session:

"Whereas, Article 23d of the Articles of Religion of the Methodist Protestant Church declares that the President, the Congress, the general assemblies, the governors, and the councils of State, as the delegates of the people, are the rulers of the United States of America, according to the division of power made to them by the Constitution of the United States and by the constitutions of their respective States, and the said States are a sovereign and independent nation, and ought not to be subject of any foreign jurisdiction; and whereas, Article 5th declares that the Holy Scriptures contain all things necessary for salvation; and whereas, the Methodist Protestant Church has never repealed these Articles of Religion, and never has entertained the purpose of doing so, or of denying any duty enjoined upon it by the Scriptures, we deem it unnecessary to make any further declarations of our principles; but in view of the condition of the country at this time, and our duty at all times, exhort the ministers of the Methodist Protestant Church not only to 'submit to the powers that be,'

but most earnestly to pray for those in authority, that they may be 'ministers of good,' and that we and all our fellow-citizens may be enabled to live 'quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty.' "

The General Conference of 1866 convened in Georgetown, D. C. Most of the Conferences represented at the Conference of 1858 were represented now. A General Convention was called to meet in May, 1867, in Montgomery, Ala. The same place was appointed for the meeting of the General Conference, provisional on a failure to call a Convention, as provided by the constitution. Rev. I. Thomas Murray was elected editor and T. W. Ewing book agent. The course of the Conferences North and West in separating from the church was reviewed in a series of resolutions, the last of which reads as follows: "Resolved, That while this General Conference cannot approve the course pursued by certain Conferences in the North and West in separating themselves from us, and while we disavow responsibility for anything done by said Conferences, individually or in Convention, we also disavow unkind feeling for those who have gone from us, and will most cordially receive any Conference that shall hereafter evince a desire for reunion by conforming to the Constitution and Discipline of the Methodist Protestant Church." The General Conference of the M. E. Church South having adopted their present scheme for lay delegation, overtures for a union were made by that body, in a communication from Bishop McTyeire, through Rev. Dr. Deems as personal bearer. The communication proposed the appointment of commissioners from either body to consummate a union. The messenger was cordially received, and the message carefully considered. It was finally ascertained that the General Conference lacked power in the premises, but it was determined to appoint such commissioners, if a General Convention for May, 1867, should be called.

After March, 1867, owing to financial difficulties, the paper was edited impersonally for three years, the labor being performed by Rev. Dr. S. B. Southerland, Rev. J. D. Valiant, Rev. Dr. E. J. Drinkhouse, and Rev. Daniel Bowers. Then by Rev. Dr. J. J. Murray and Rev. Daniel Bowers. Again by Rev. Dr. A. Webster, Rev. Dr. J. J. Murray, and Rev. Daniel Bowers.

Two-thirds of the Annual Conferences having concurred in the call for a General Convention, it convened at Montgomery, Ala., May 7, 1867. Eight Conferences were represented. Bishops Pierce and McTyeire, and Rev. J. E. Evans were introduced as Commissioners from the M. E. Church South. Rev. Dr. L. M. Lee subsequently joined them. A communication was received from them, and addresses made proposing a union of the two churches. They were cordially received, and the paper properly referred to a commission of one minister and one layman from each Annual Conference represented in the Convention. As the result of many interviews with these commissioners a paper containing fifteen points of difference was submitted from the Methodist Protestant side, and the final answer of the conferring brethren showed that the M. E. Church South commissioners did not have, as was supposed, plenary powers to treat with the Methodist Protestant Church, but were shut up to a proposal to receive the church into the M. E. Church South. It was then proposed in turn that the points of difference be referred for the action of the Annual Conferences of both churches, in view of a subsequent joint meeting of the commissioners on the 1st day of May, 1868, at Lynchburg, Va. The Annual Conference of the Church South took no action, however the meeting at Lynchburg never took place, and the whole scheme failed. Various changes were made in the organic law of the church, the more important being the extension of the "Restrictive Rules," so called, whereby itinerant ministers were allowed, in the wisdom of the Annual Conference, to remain four consecutive years on the same field of labor, instead of two years in stations and three on circuits, as had been the law from 1830; and a change of the law making it possible to hold a General Convention of the church at any time the Annual Conference might appoint. In this interval certain prominent ministers, who had encouraged the union movement with the M. E. Church South, fomented disaffection, and in consequence secessions took place, principally in Virginia and Alabama, of ministers and churches to the M. E. Church South.

The Tenth General Conference assembled in Baltimore, May 6, 1870. But sixteen out of twenty-five Annual Conferences had representatives present. Rev. Drs. T. M. Eddy and John Lanahan, bearers of a paper from the commission of the M. E. Church, were received. This communication expressed fraternal regard, and, after alluding to the sameness of doctrine and "common historic memories," asked if there might not be "a closer bond of union." Subsequently the committee to which it was referred reported, reciprocating the kind and fraternal expressions, and suggesting that the bond of union might be strengthened by an interchange of delegates, by editors refraining from "irritating controversy," and by co-operation in missionary work. Since that period delegates have been interchanged. Delegates were also present from the M. E. Church South, and from the Methodist Church. The latter having expressed a desire for reunion, it was agreed that should the Methodist Church appoint commissioners for the purpose, the president of the Conference should appoint a like number to confer with them.

The Western Maryland College was recognized as an institution of the general church, and recommended to the patronage of the people.

The Eleventh General Conference assembled at Lynchburg, Va., May 1, 1874. Eighteen Annual Conferences were represented. A memorial asking for legislation on the sale and use of intoxicating beverages was received. The Conference declined such action, on the settled policy of the Methodist Protestant Church not to legislate on moral and political questions. A fraternal correspondence by telegraph was held with the General Conference M. E. Church South, then in session at Louisville, Ky. A Board of Home and Foreign Missions was established in Baltimore, Md., Rev. S. B. Southerland, D.D., president. The committee on revision of the Discipline reported favorably on the abolition of the order of deacon in the church, and it was adopted by a more than two-thirds vote. After much discussion a committee of nine was appointed to confer with a like committee from the Methodist Church on the subject of union. The joint committee met in Pittsburgh Oct. 27, 1875, and agreed upon a basis of union, consisting of sixteen articles. These articles were to be submitted to General Conventions of the two churches in May, 1877. The call for such a Convention was issued and concurred in by nearly all the Conferences of both churches.

The Book Directory in 1874 elected, by a two-thirds vote, Rev. E. J. Drinkhouse, M.D., as editor, and he was authorized "to manage all the business pertaining thereto." The minutes were imperfectly reported, but showed from 17 Conferences 546 ministers, 49,319 members, and church property valued at $1,122,351. The Missouri, South Illinois, and McCaine Conferences did not report.

The Conventions met in Baltimore separately on May 11, 1877, and after a few days' deliberation united, May 16, in one body. (See METHODIST CHURCH.) Thus the separation of 1858 ended in the reunion of 1877. The style of the church continues to be "The Methodist Protestant Church," and the Discipline and economy of the church remain essentially the same. The principal college and theological school in the East is at Westminster, Md. (See WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE.) There is also a college at Yadkin, N. C., and one at Bowden, Ga. In the West, Adrian College, in Michigan, is a promising institution. A Book Concern is established in Baltimore, and The Methodist Protestant has a circulation of about 4000. A local paper (The Central Protestant) is also published at Greensboro', N. C. A Book Concern is also located in Pittsburgh, where The Methodist Recorder is published.

Metropolitan Chapel Building Fund (English Wesleyan).—This important fund was established in 1861. Its object was to aid hy grants and loans the erection of chapels in those parts of the metropolis and its environs where there was a deficiency of chapel accommodation. A report was presented to, and received the sanction of, the Conference of 1862. The usual guards were associated with the introduction of the scheme. Every case of erection must, according to existing rules, pass through the quarterly and district meetings, and receive the sanction of the chapel committee. This fund is now fully established, and has from its commencement been attended with encouraging success. A public meeting is held yearly at the Centenary Hall. On each occasion a most gratifying report of the income and expenditure of the "Metropolitan Wesleyan Chapel Building Fund" has been presented. At the Conference of 1870, by the request of the committee of this fund, a minister was set apart to the office of secretary, and the Rev. Gervase Smith, M.A., was appointed to discharge the duties of that office. With princely munificence, Sir Francis Lyeett, in addition to former services and large contributions at the origination and in the promotion of the fund, offered at this Conference to give £50,000 during the next seven years if an equal amount were contributed by friends throughout the connection. At the Conference of 1871, the secretary reported that since the inauguration of the fund in 1862, 21 large chapels had been erected, 2 enlarged, and several school-rooms built, giving accommodation to 25,000 additional persons, at a cost of £134,000. In the short space of two years the promised contributions from the provinces, in response to the challenge of Sir Francis Lyeett, amounted, as reported in 1872, to the sum of £57,072, when it was determined that the list should still remain open for additional contributions. During the year five of the fifty new chapels were opened for public worship. At the last Conference (1876) it was announced that since its commencement the chapel accommodation had been doubled in London. Some of the trusts are now free from debt, and from one of these help has been afforded to a needy case in the same circuit by a contribution of £1000. The Conference now directs that annual collections shall be made and public meetings held in each of the circuits within the metropolitan area.

Mewburn, William, Esq., of Pall Mall, Manchester, Halifax, and Wykham Park, Banbury, England, was born in 1817. Trained as a lawyer, he abandoned the profession on his arriving at manhood for that of a stock-broker at Halifax, and subsequently at Manchester, where his firm (Mewburn & Barker) has the reputation of occupying the first position on the Exchange. Mr. Mewburn is stated to be one of the largest holders of railway stock in the United Kingdom. He retired from active business in 1865, and purchased a large estate, comprising the manor of Wykham, near Banbury, where he now resides. In politics, Mr. Mewburn is a Liberal of the "Manchester School." He contested Banbury in Liberal interests in 1866. Mr. Mewburn is a devoted and generous supporter not merely of Methodism, but of other Non-conformist churches. Together with Sir Francis Lycett, he initiated a gift of £10,000 to the movement for the "Extension of Methodism in rural districts." He has contributed very largely to the erection of numerous chapels in the districts in which he has resided. He is a member of most of the Wesleyan connectional committees.

Mexico, Methodist Missions in.—The republic of Mexico, whose territory adjoins that of the United States, consists of twenty-seven states, one federal district, and one territory, united into a common government under a system similar to, but not identical with, that of the United States. It has an area of 761,640 square miles, and a population of 9,169,707. The people are of several races, of which those of Spanish descent, amounting to about 2,000,000, are dominant, while the Indians, numbering about 7,000,000, are of all degrees of civilization. Nearly all of the inhabitants are attached to the Roman Catholic Church, and a very large proportion of them are exceedingly intolerant. Until the accession of President Juarez, in 1861, the government was under the influence of the Roman Catholic priesthood, who possessed large domains, amounting to more than one-half the value of the land of the country, and exercised control over the political and social life of the nation. President Juarez adopted a policy tending to emancipate the state from this influence. His efforts were thwarted by the conquest of the country by the French and the imperial rule of Maximilian, which was favorable to the church party. Upon his restoration to power, in 1865, President Juarez continued to apply his policy for the separation of church and state, which was completely carried out during his administration and that of his successor, President Lerdo de Tejada. Under it religious liberty has been fully provided for by law, the enormous estates of the church have been appropriated to the service of the state, the monasteries have been suppressed, and monastic vows abolished, and free opportunities have been given for the introduction of modern thought and the establishment of Protestant churches and missions. These opportunities have been improved by the leading churches of the United States, particularly by the Baptist, Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, and Methodist Episcopal Churches. The efforts of the missions, although approved and in a measure protected by the government, met with strong opposition from the people of the church party, which has often ripened into violence.

The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1871 made an appropriation of $12,500 for the establishment of a mission in Mexico. In November, 1872, the Rev. William Butler, D.D., was appointed superintendent of the mission. Bishop Haven was commissioned in December of the same year to visit the country and inquire into the prospects for prosecuting a successful work. He found the situation favorable, and Mr. Washington C. De Pauw, of New Albany, Ind., having given $5000 for that purpose, he opened negotiations which resulted in the purchase of the Cloisters of San Francisco, in the city of Mexico, and of a part of a former church of the Inquisition, in the city of Puebla, for the use of the mission. Dr. Butler reached the city of Mexico Feb. 19, 1873, and was joined there by the Rev. Thomas Carter, D.D., and the Rev. William H. Cooper, D.D., of the American and Foreign Christian Union. At the end of the year five native laborers had been added to the missionary force. English congregations had been organized in the cities of Mexico and Pachuca, with a regular attendance of 105 persons, and seven Mexican congregations had been formed in the city of Mexico, in Puebla, Pachuca, Real del Monte, Orizaba, and Miraflores, with a total average attendance of 219 persons; two class-meetings had been organized, with a regular attendance of 39 persons, English and Mexicans, and three Sunday-schools, with 8 officers and teachers and 47 scholars. In 1874 the missionary force had been increased to four missionaries, twelve native assistants, and two missionaries of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society; five congregations had been organized in the city of Mexico, five day-schools established, with an attendance of 62 boys and girls, and 23 orphans taken in charge. A mission press was established in 1875, from which were issued 62,000 copies of tracts and books and hymns, the first and second catechisms of the church, the ritual in full, and the publication of Mr. Wesley's Sermons was begun. A theological seminary was commenced in the same year at Puebla. The girls' orphanage of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society made its first report in this year.

The following is a summary of the statistical report made by the mission in 1876:

Six theological students were recorded at Puebla and 2 at Guanajuato, making in all 8 theological students. The other statistics of the Mexican work in 1876 are:

Total average attendance on public worship, 803; number of orphans (40 girls in the city of Mexico, 17 boys at Puebla), 57; teachers in day-schools, 9; scholars in the same, 277; teachers in Sunday-schools, 29; scholars in the same, 402; Bible-women, 2; churches (1 in Mexico, 1 in Puebla), 2; other places of worship, 12; parsonages, 6; probable value of the churches and parsonages, $70,398; amount of contributions during the year in Mexico for church building, the press, the orphanage, and the poor, $1030.36.

The five English congregations in the city of Mexico, Miraflores, Orizaba, Pachuca, and Real del Monte, reported 1 missionary, 2 local preachers, 17 full members, 1 probationer, an average attendance on worship of 131 persons, 1 teacher and 25 scholars in the day-school at Pachuca, 12 teachers and 103 scholars in Sunday-schools, church property valued at $975, and contributions of $720. A newspaper, called El Abogado Cristiano Ilustrado, or The Illustrated Christian Advocate, was begun in connection with the mission in 1877. This is a beautiful sheet, and is gaining a good circulation.

The mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in the city of Mexico was begun in 1873, Bishop Keener having previously visited the country and arranged for the work. The Rev. J. T.

Davies was the first superintendent, and was assisted by two native preachers, Sorteney Juarez and José Elias Mota. Mr. Davies returned home on account of ill health in 1875. A church building was begun, which was completed and dedicated on the 22d of August, 1875, and a free school was established for boys and girls. No formal church organization was attempted till the 1st of November, 1875, when a society was duly formed with 25 members, who increased in two months to 60. A Bible-class of 20 young men was also organized, together with a night-school for adults, which was well attended, and day-schools for boys and girls, each with about 30 attendants. In 1876 the mission was represented by one of its members, Francisco Villeyes, as a student at Vanderbilt University, who had begun a translation of Wesley's Sermons into Spanish; by another, Juan Pardo, at Emory College; and by a third, Juan S. Valencia, at Wofford College, Spartanburg, S. C. According to the report of 1877 the mission included 2 ordained native elders as missionaries, 2 teachers, 70 members, 30 pupils in the Sunday-school, and 65 in the day-school.

The first Mexican border missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in Texas were started in 1874, when Dorotea Garcia was licensed to preach, and placed in charge of a small congregation of Mexicans already gathered at Corpus Christi, and Felipe N. Cordova was licensed and appointed to start a mission at San Diego. The two missions reported nearly 100 members to the succeeding Conference. The Mexican border mission district was organized by the West Texas Conference in December, 1874, and placed in charge of the Rev. A. H. Sutherland as superintendent, with three native preachers. At the Conference held in October, 1876, the superintendent reported 10 preachers and nearly 300 members. From that time till June, 1877, there had been 105 adult and 37 infant baptisms. The missionary report of the Methodist Episcopal Church South for 1877 gives the following detailed statistics of the stations: Corpus Christi, 56 members, 1 Sunday-school, with 30 scholars; San Diego, 122 members, 100 Sunday-school scholars, 1 church worth $400, 1 parsonage worth $400; Rio Grande, 13 members, 35 Sunday-school scholars; San Antonio, 55 members, 30 Sunday-school scholars; Lodi, 7 members, 13 Sunday-school scholars. Other stations were at Presensas, Concepcion, Roma, Laredo, Graytown, San Antonio River, Hidalgo, Eagle Pass, and Brownsville, concerning which no report of members is made.

An active missionary work was pursued in Mexico for several years by the American and Foreign Christian Union, an undenominational society, organized for the support of missionary work among non-Protestant Christians. When this society decided to withdraw from foreign countries and devote its attention to the Roman Catholics in the United States, its missions were transferred to other societies.

The Northern Presbyterian Church of the United States has a mission in Mexico, with 4 stations, and several out-stations, 10 churches, 4 American and 12 native missionaries, 2500 communicants, and 243 scholars in boarding- and day-schools. The Southern Presbyterian Church has a mission station at Matamoras, with 2 out-stations at Brownsville, Tex., and Santa Rosalia, 1 American missionary and 4 native helpers, 75 communicants, 86 Sunday-school and 65 day-school scholars, and 3 students for the ministry. The American Baptist Home Missionary Society has organized several churches in Eastern Mexico. The American Board has stations at Monterey and Guadalajara, with 12 churches, 6 missionaries and assistants, and several native helpers; and the Church of Jesus, organized a few years ago, has become a considerable body, affiliated with the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, and has taken the name of the "Mexican Branch of the Church of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Michaux, J. L., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born at St. Domingo, Cumberland Co., Va., Sept. 1, 1824. At nineteen years of age he joined the Methodist Protestant Church at Double Springs camp-meeting, in August, 1843. Six months after he became assistant class-leader; was licensed to exhort within the same year; in 1845 was licensed to preach, and in 1846 commenced the work of a traveling preacher. After filling various appointments, in 1856 a failure of voice necessitated a superannuated station, which continued to 1866. From 1863 to 1865 he edited and published the Conference paper, The Watchman and Harbinger, at Greensboro', N. C. On re-entering the active ranks in 1866, he became executive of the district, and was elected the second time, and at the end of the term was forced back into the superannuated ranks by an almost complete prostration of voice. From 1868 to 1874 he was engaged in secular pursuits. In May, 1874, he became editor and publisher of The Central Protestant, at Greensboro', N. C., organ of the North Carolina Conference, and was a representative to the General Conference of 1874, and to the General Convention of 1877.

Michigan (pop. 1,184,059).—The discovery and early settlement of Michigan were made by the French missionaries and fur-traders. The site of Detroit was probably visited as early as 1610. Soon after the middle of the seventeenth century numerous trading-posts were established. In 1701 an expedition under a French explorer founded

Detroit. The State came under the dominion of Great Britain in 1763. On the expulsion of the French, the Indians resolved on the extermination of the whites, slaughtered several garrisons, and Detroit itself underwent a long siege. At the close of the Revolutionary War, Michigan was not at once surrendered, and Detroit was not taken possession of by the Americans until 1796, from which time it was included in the Northwest Territory. In the War of 1812, Detroit was taken by the British, but they were driven out of the Territory by General Harrison, and in 1814 a truce was entered into with the Indians. In 1819 Michigan was organized into a Territory. In 1835 a constitution was formed, and in 1836 it was admitted into the Union. Methodism had great obstacles in its way at the beginning of its history in this State, both from the ravages of war and the nature of the population. In 1803, a local preacher by the name of Morgan entered the Territory and preached at Detroit. In 1804, Nathan Bangs, having traveled from New York on horseback, passed over from Canada and preached in the city without apparent success. The place was then "wofully depraved, with a conglomerate population of Indians, French, and Americans." Subsequently it was visited from Canada by William Case, who crossed the Detroit River on the floating ice; and shortly after, an Irish local preacher—William Mitchell—organized the first Methodist society in the city, which was also the first in the State. No Protestant church was erected within the bounds of Michigan until 1818. After the close of the War of 1812, immigration commenced, and a few Methodists moved into the Territory. The first preachers who regularly entered the Territory were from the New York Conference, the next from the Genesee, and the third from the Ohio Conference. In 1836 the Michigan Conference was organized, including a part of Ohio, but in 1840 the Ohio portion was separated. At this time there were 78 ministers and 11,523 members. The first Methodist church erected in Michigan was near Detroit, in 1818. It was built of logs, and was then considered a fine edifice. With the growth of the population the church has rapidly increased. There are now two Conferences, the Detroit and the Michigan, together reporting 465 traveling and 426 local preachers, 54,002 members, 57,102 Sunday-school scholars, with 535 churches, valued at $2,581,450, and 253 parsonages, valued at $230,730. The Methodist Protestants have two Conferences,—the Michigan and the West Michigan,—which embrace 104 itinerant and 72 unstationed preachers, 4352 members, 33 churches, and 31 parsonages, valued at $82,490. The African M. E. Church has a number of appointments, included in the Indiana Conference; and the Free Methodists have also several congregations. Albion College, a flourishing literary institution, is under the joint patronage of both the Detroit and Michigan Conferences of the M. E. Church; and a paper—The Michigan Christian Advocate—is published in the city of Detroit. The denominational statistics, as reported in the United States census of 1870, are as follows:

Michigan City, Ind. (pop. 3985), is situated in La Porte County, on Lake Michigan. Methodist services were introduced in 1833, and a society was formed in July of that year, consisting of 10 members. The first church edifice was built in 1837–38, and moved and enlarged in 1860. The city first appears in the minutes for 1844, with John W. Parrett as pastor, who reported the following year a membership of 38. In 1856 a German church was built, and in 1871 the African M. E. Church organized a congregation. It is in the Northwest Indiana Conference, and has (1876) the following statistics:

Michigan Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1836, and included all that part of the State of Ohio not included in the Pittsburgh, Erie, and Ohio or Indiana Conferences, and all the Territory of Michigan except so much as was included in the Laporte district of the Indiana Conference. In 1840 it included the State of Michigan. In 1844 its boundaries included the State of Michigan and the Ojibway missions on the waters of Lake Superior, formerly embraced in the Rock River Conference. At the organization of the Detroit Conference, in 1856, the boundaries were so changed as to include all that part of the State of Michigan lying west of the principal meridian line, and the Indian missions in the lower peninsula were connected with the Michigan Conference. But slight changes have since taken place in the boundary lines. In 1876 the General Conference defined its boundaries so as to include "the State of Michigan west of the principal meridian and the lower peninsula." The first session of the Michigan Conference was held in the spring of 1836, and a second session was held in the fall of the same year, at which time it reported 20,735 white and 40 colored members, 105 traveling and 235 local preachers; and after the organization of the Detroit Conference, in 1856, the Michigan Conference still reported 11,624 members, 100 traveling and 134 local preachers. Its latest report—for 1876—is as follows: 230 traveling and 56 local preachers, 29,553 members, 26,327 Sunday-school scholars, 255 churches, valued at $1,149,100, 126 parsonages, valued at $160,100.

Michigan Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces all that part of the State of Michigan lying east of the meridian line." It reported in 1877, 51 itinerant and 42 unstationed preachers, 2429 members, 18 churches, and 22 parsonages, valued at $53,340.

Middletown, Conn. (pop. 6923), the capital of Middlesex County, is situated on the Connecticut River. This city was at first included in the Hartford circuit. The first Methodist sermon was preached in this city by Jesse Lee, Dec. 7, 1789. In 1792 it was in the Middletown circuit, which reported 124 members. It is the site of the Wesleyan University, and since the establishment of that institution has increased in strength. A second congregation was maintained for several years, but ultimately the two were united. It is in the New York East Conference, and has 507 members, 290 Sunday-school scholars, and $35,000 church property.

Middletown, N. Y. (pop. 6049), in Orange County, on the New York and Oswego and Midland Railroad, was formerly included in the Delaware circuit, one of the earliest and largest in the State. Middletown circuit was organized in 1830, and A. Colder and J. P. Foster were appointed pastors, who, in 1831, reported 876 members. Methodism has prospered in this city. It is in the New York Conference, and has 515 members, 493 Sunday-school scholars, and $60,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has 80 members and 26 Sunday-school scholars, but no church property.

Middletown, O. (pop. 3046), is in Butler County, on the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton Railroad. Methodism was established here in 1818, by John Strange. The first M. E. church was erected in 1825; the second in 1849; the latter improved and refurnished in 1876. The Methodist Protestant society built a church in 1855, and the African M. E. Church erected a church in 1875. Middletown originally belonged to the Miami circuit, one of the first formed in Ohio. It is in the Central Ohio Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	246	140	$15,000
Methodist Protestant Ch.....	190	140	10,000

Miles, W. Y., an active merchant of Columbus, O., was converted early in life, and is a diligent worker in church interests, and specially active in the Sunday-school. He was reserve lay delegate of the Ohio Conference, occupying the place of W.

H. McClintock, of Chillicothe, at the General Conference of 1870.

Miller, Hiram, D.D., was born in Lycoming Co., Pa.; converted in his youth, and admitted to the Pittsburgh Conference in 1847. His first appointment was to Salem circuit. He performed circuit and station work until 1858, when he was appointed presiding elder of McConnellsville district, which he served until 1862. He occupied different important stations until 1872, when he was made presiding elder of South Pittsburgh district, and remained such until 1876, when he was sent to Beaver Station, Pa. Mr. Miller is a frequent contributor to the newspaper literature of the church, and has served twice in the General Conference, being a delegate in 1868 and 1876.

Miller, James A., born in Armstrong Co., Pa., October, 1828; was converted in his early manhood. He was received into the Pittsburgh Conference in 1855, has filled many important appointments, and was presiding elder of the West Pittsburgh and McKeesport district. The General Conference of 1876 appointed him a member of the Publishing Committee of The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Miller, Lewis, Esq., born in Starke Co., O., about 1823: was early converted, and became an active official member of the M. E. Church. In his early manhood he engaged in the manufacture of agricultural implements at Canton, O., and is a member of a firm carrying on a colossal business at that point and at Akron, O., where he now resides. He has by his energy and benefactions aided much in making Methodism a power in both communities. For many years he has made the Sunday-school work a specialty, and he has been president of the "Chautauqua Sunday-School Assembly" since it was organized. He has long been a devoted friend of education, and has endowed a Chair at Mount Union College, of which he is one of the trustees, and has made other large gifts for educational purposes. He represented the Erie Conference, as a lay delegate, to the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876.

Miller, Marmaduke, a member of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. He entered the itinerant ministry in 1852, and was elected president of the Annual Assembly in 1868. To secure his services a large and influential congregation at Huddersfield joined the body in 1866. He remained pastor of that church for six years. During the last year of his pastorate he held the office of editor of the magazines. In 1872 he removed to London, and edited the three magazines of the body, viz., The United Methodist Free Churches Magazine, The Sunday-School Hive, and Welcome Words. He retired from the editorship in 1877, and resumed circuit work. Mr. Miller is well known as a lecturer, and takes a very active part in the movement for disestablishment. He is a member of the executive council of the Society for the Liberation of Religion from State Patronage and Control. A number of his lectures and other productions have been published separately.

Miller, Richard L., D.D., a native of Armstrong Co., Pa., was born February, 1825. He entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1853, and soon occupied prominent charges, and was eight years presiding elder. Dr. Miller received a fair education, since which he has been a diligent student. He has written considerably for the church papers. He was a delegate from the Pittsburgh Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Miller, Wesson Gage, D.D., was born in Worcester, Otsego Co., N. Y., Feb. 8, 1822. His father was a highly respected local preacher. In early youth he developed aptitude for study, and entered Gallupville Academy at the age of thirteen. He entered upon the profession of teaching at seventeen, and was converted the same year. When twenty-two he removed to Wisconsin and entered upon business, and in 1845 he was induced to enter the ministry. Uniting with the Rock River-Conference, he was assigned to labor in Wisconsin, and, at the division of the Conference in 1848, he became a member of the Wisconsin Conference. For more than thirty years he has held a leading place among his brethren. He has been honored three times with a seat in the General Conference; has served four years as a member of the general mission committee; and is now filling his fourth term as a presiding elder, being in charge of the Milwaukee district. Besides miscellaneous contributions to the press, he has published "The Temperance Cyclone," "The Giant Wrong," "Milwaukee Methodism," and "Thirty Years in the Itineracy."

Miller, William Parker, is a native of North Carolina, born Dec. 10, 1818. In his twentieth year he was converted, and joined the M. E. Church. He removed to Alabama in 1839, and was licensed to preach in 1840. He was received into the Alabama Conference of the M. E. Church South in 1850, and spent seven years in the work, four of them as presiding elder. During the war he was a firm friend of the Union, and in 1867 re-entered the M. E. Church, and was appointed to work in the Lower Alabama and West Florida region, where in four years he organized a district with 2000 members. At the same time he interested himself in the cause of education, and was for four years a member of the Alabama State Board of Education. He was also a principal mover in the establishment of the Alabama Conference Seminary, and of the Andrews Institute, at Scottsboro'. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Millville, N. J. (pop. 6101), is situated in Cumberland County, on the West Jersey Railroad. Methodism was introduced into Millville from an appointment in the county, about four miles from the town called White Marsh, where a society of 30 or 40 members existed before there were any Methodists in Millville. About 1810 Methodist services were first held in the town, in a school-house, and then in a stone building purchased and fitted up for that purpose, and soon a class of seven or eight persons was formed. A new church was dedicated in 1846. It was first in the Salem circuit, but was afterwards the headquarters of a large circuit called Millville. It has been frequently visited by extensive revivals of religion. In 1875 near 500 persons united with the two M. E. churches in the city. It is in the New Jersey Conference, and the First M. E. church has 1113 members, 600 Sunday-school scholars, and $34,000 church property. The Foundry church has 495 members, 336 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

Milwaukee, Wis. (pop. 71,440), the capital of Milwaukee County, is situated on Lake Michigan, and the terminus of many important railroads. About one-half of the population is of German extraction. Methodism was early introduced. In 1835, Mark Robinson was sent as a missionary to Milwaukee, and preached the first Protestant sermon in that town. He organized a class of four members, and in 1836 reported 53 members in the circuit. In 1837 a board of trustees was appointed. It was then connected with the Illinois Conference. The first M. E. church (Spring Street) was dedicated in 1841; it was rebuilt in 1844, costing about $10,000. It was a commodious brick structure, with store-rooms beneath the auditorium. In 1847 a secession occurred, and a Wesleyan church was organized. In this year, also, a second M. E. church was organized, at Walker's Point, consisting of 9 members, and soon after they built a church. Other churches have followed, until Methodism is fairly represented. The German Methodists, the Norwegian and the African M. E. churches have good congregations. The city is in the Wisconsin Conference, and the statistics are as follows:

Minard, Abel, was born in Rhode Island, and removed to the State of New York. Early in life he united with the Free-Will Baptist Church, but subsequently changed his relations to the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was for a number of years largely engaged in commercial business and in banking, in which he was successful, and accumulated a handsome estate. He was generous and liberal, aiding a number of worthy enterprises, and in addition to other acts of liberality he founded the Minard Home. He died in the city of Morristown, N. J.

Minard Home was founded by the late Abel Minard. His interest in missionaries led him to plan a home for the education of the daughters of foreign missionaries, and, so far as practicable, the orphan daughters of Methodist ministers. Under the advice of Bishop Janes, who was his personal friend, he erected in Morristown, N. J., a large and substantial building on a plot of about four acres of land, at a cost of nearly $60,000. This he gave to trustees for the Methodist Episcopal Church as a home for the daughters of missionaries. Owing to its lack of endowment it has as yet accomplished but little to meet the design of its founder. A view of the building is given on the following page.

Mineral Point, Wis. (pop. 3275), in Iowa County, on the Mineral Point Railroad, and in the midst of a district rich in lead and copper. In 1834, Mr. Bivian conducted Methodist services in the place, and in that year preaching was regularly established by Hooper Crews, and the society procured a log building for a church. In 1841 a comfortable stone church was erected, and in 1870 a larger edifice. The Primitive Methodists have also a strong society here and a good house of worship, built in 1849. It is in the West Wisconsin Conference, and has 220 members, 310 Sunday-school scholars, and $36,000 church property.

Minersville, Pa. (pop. 3699), in Schuylkill County, is on a branch of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad. Methodist services were introduced, about 1835, by Henry G. King. The first Methodist church was erected in 1837. A new church was built in 1853. The charge was made a station in 1839. The Welsh Methodists have a church building and about 40 members. It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and has 288 members, 408 Sunday-school scholars, and $18,000 church property.

Ministerial Call.—The various denominations are not perfectly agreed as to whether there is a direct divine call to the ministry, or whether reasoning as to qualifications, adaptation, and opportunities, the person is to select the ministry as he would another profession in life. Some writers term the latter the ordinary call, and the former, which they think seldom occurs, the extraordinary call. The Methodist Churches, from their earliest history, have believed in the necessity of a direct divine call to this sacred office; hence they have discouraged parents selecting their sons or educating them directly in view of the ministry. Their view is that parents should pray for divine guidance, and for the blessing of God to rest upon their children; that they should educate them in view of possible fields of usefulness, but that they should not seek to incline them toward the ministry, but trust that the divine spirit will rightly guide in their selection of life's duties. As Christ appointed his apostles, and as he selected the seventy and sent them forth on their mission, so Methodists believe that the great head of the church still selects those whom he designs for that sacred work. They believe that sacrifices, poverty, and anticipated reproach. 2. He must be conscious that he does not incline to the ministry because he feels that he has qualifications for the work, or that it will be a field in which he can display any peculiar power. If he is truly called he will feel that the work is one of such fearful moment that he is utterly insufficient of himself for its performance; and when he thinks of the tremendous consequences and the fearful responsibility connected with the ministry he will shrink from entering upon it. 3. He must feel assured that he is not inclined to it because of the office of the church is not to select persons to be ministers, but to "pray the Lord of the harvest that he would send forth laborers into his harvest," and their duty is simply to recognize as ministers those whom they believe God has called. Not unfrequently, however, the young minister is perplexed to know what constitutes the divine call, as he finds himself the subject of conflicting tendencies and varied emotions. The call, properly speaking, is the work of the divine spirit; but as that spirit operates on our consciousness, not visibly, audibly, or in any way externally, it is sometimes difficult to say with certainty how far any tendency or impulses may be from one's own nature, or from the divine spirit.

There are a few tests which may be of service to the young man thus perplexed. 1. He must have the consciousness that he does not desire the work of the ministry either for ease, influence, wealth, or fame. If called to that work, he will usually find himself almost appalled at its toils, apparent the pathway seeming to lie open, and of its being the most natural and easy method for him to obtain a livelihood: for, generally speaking, peculiar difficulty will seem to lie in his pathway; the condition of his friends, of his business, and his own previous anticipations would all lead in a different direction; and to him it will seem almost impracticable to leave his friends, or to enter on the work. 4. Like other impulses and tendencies, the ministerial call will sometimes be more vivid than others, and if truly called to the work the inquirer will find that when he is specially devoted, when he is living in the pathway of duty and the clear light of God's Spirit shines upon his heart, then the conviction is stronger; and if he mingles in the world and becomes engrossed either by its business or its pleasures, he will less strongly feel the conviction of duty. 5. If from any circumstances he resolves that he cannot comply with this call and is disposed to engage in other pursuits, he will find, if truly called, that his pathway becomes hedged up, and that in the midst of anticipated pleasures a burden presses upon him, until he even doubts of his acceptance with God. Frequently fearing as to his personal salvation, he will say, "Woe is me if I preach not the gospel!" If these several tests combine in personal experience, the young man may safely believe that God designs him for this work. Yet as in nature we find correspondences, as the eye is fitted for light, and bodies are made capable of reflecting it; as the ear is fitted for sound, and bodies are made capable of vibration; so God works also in the spiritual world. He operates by his Spirit, not only on the heart of the individual, but also upon the heart of the church, and leads it to perceive and appreciate the qualifications of those whom he has prepared. While the candidate is perplexed and wondering what is his duty, some devoted Christian, some pious father or mother in the church, will, very probably, ask him whether he does not feel himself so called. Possibly he may have gone from home into some distant section of the country to avoid the solicitation of friends, and yet, as he speaks in the love-feast, or in the class, or takes part in the prayer-meeting, even comparative strangers will recognize in him peculiar qualifications, and he will be advised to engage in more active labor, and in due time to enter on the work of the ministry. When the voice of the church shall thus coincide with his own inward convictions, the inquirer will have increased assurance of the call being divine. There is still another element of perfect assurance: as the young man engages in labor, as he speaks, or prays, or exhorts, or endeavors to persuade, he will find, if truly called, a divine influence resting upon the hearts of those whom he addresses. Whether he speaks to the few or to the large congregation, the close attention, the unbidden tear, the swelling emotion of his hearers will indicate the presence and power of the Divine Spirit. Persons will be awakened and inquirers will be led to God through his instrumentality. This is the divine seal, the attestation of God's Holy Spirit outwardly responding to the inward conviction, and the voice of the church. "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established." If the young man feels conviction in himself, his duty is not to communicate this thought to others, nor to be anxious as to the judgment of the church; he should be prayerful; he should endeavor to do good in the sphere in which he moves, and should studiously prepare himself for the work which he supposes may lie before him. If he views the ministry properly, he will feel that there is no amount of culture too great, there is no study too severe, for one whose life is to be engaged in this holy calling. To the fullest extent of his opportunity let him seek a thorough preparation; let him not be anxious to enter the ministry hastily; for the preparation of a few years may enable him to accomplish vastly more in the succeeding years of his life than were he to enter upon the work unprepared and unqualified. The sturdiest woodman will not think the time lost which is spent in sharpening the axe with which he is to fell the largest trees. Let the young man rather hesitate to go forward than to advance too eagerly, for the church certainly will, guided by the Divine Spirit, recognize sooner or later his fitness for the work. When the voice of the church has urged him to go forward, let him proceed cautiously, and in the mean time continue his preparation by thorough study and devotion to his work. Many a young minister ruins his opportunities for usefulness by attempting to connect some business with the ministry, or by fancying that he can in his early ministry encumber himself with the cares and anxieties of life. Let the young man's first years be years of undivided devotion to his work in the ministry, and to further preparation for the ministry; nor if he sees fruits accompany his labors should he fancy that he has all the qualifications necessary, or that he is called to occupy all his time simply in public work. He should perform faithfully his active duties; he should visit from house to house; but a definite and a proportionally large part of his time should be given to enrich his mind with the treasures of knowledge. When the three marks concur,—the inward conviction, the voice of the church, and the blessing of God upon his labors,—then let him beware how he disobeys that call, or turns aside to other engagements. To be selected for such a position, even should it involve temporal sacrifices, even should it result in martyrdom itself, is an honor from God, and opens up a prospect of eternal rewards which will more than compensate for any possible toil or suffering.

Ministerial Support.—The early Methodist preachers went forth to preach the gospel moved by a divine impulse, and without having societies upon which to depend. Mr. Wesley supported himself by a fellowship which he held in Oxford University, and by the profits on books which he published from time to time. He also aided his ministers, by giving away all that he could possibly spare, limiting himself merely to the supply of his own wants. Many of the early ministers were engaged in business employments, and gave simply their Sabbaths or week-day evenings for service, acting as local preachers now do. As societies were organized, and as they became strong, they contributed for the support of their ministers, who were thus enabled to devote their whole time to their specific calling. The support of the early preachers in the United States was exceedingly meagre, the membership was generally poor, and the ministers were unmarried men, who traveled from place to place, living among the people, and subsisting on small contributions. In 1774, we find an enactment that each preacher should have sixty-four dollars per year and traveling expenses; indeed, the earliest preachers did not receive this sum. Captain Webb, who founded many of the societies, and who, more than any other person, gave early form to American Methodism, supported himself besides contributing to the erection of church edifices. Embury and Strawbridge were married men, but were local preachers, the one being a carpenter and the other a farmer, and they were in part supported by their labor. Asbury, Boardman, Pilmoor, Rankins, Williams, and Shadford were single men. Williams subsequently married and located, and of him it was said, "He was the first American Methodist preacher that published a book, got married, and died." In 1778 paper money had, during the war, depreciated, and the salary was raised to £30 per year, which was nearly equivalent to $80. As some ministers, being greater favorites, received gifts, which added to their support, the Conference of 1782, desiring to equalize the allowances, adopted a resolution that "all the gifts received by the preachers, whether in money or clothing, should be brought into the quarterly meeting and valued by the preachers and stewards, and the preacher who had received the gifts should be considered as having received so much of his quarterage, and if he is still deficient he shall carry to the account such deficiency, that if possible he shall have it made up out of the profits arising out of the sale of books and the annual collections." In 1780 the first notice occurs of the wives of preachers; the fourteenth question reading, "What provision shall be made for the wives of married preachers?" A. "They shall receive an equivalent with the husband if they stand in need." In 1783 we find the answer to the question, "How many preachers' wives are to be provided for?" is "Eleven, and the sum needed for their support is £260." As regards this sum it was said, "Let the preachers make a small collection in all the circuits." That purpose was to equalize the support, or rather, that all the circuits should combine in sustaining the families. In 1784 thirteen preachers were reported as married, and £302 were apportioned to different charges. A collection was also ordered to be taken up in every charge, prior to Conference, to meet the deficiency. This was called the Conference collection. A year after the organization of the church this collection amounted to £300, which was applied to making up the quarterly deficiency and sending out two missionaries. The English Wesleyans have a system of equalization so that large families can be supported by small circuits; the Children's Fund and the Educational Fund being taken up on all the charges, and being distributed according to the number of the family. But this system has not prevailed in the United States. In 1785 the thirty-seventh question of the minutes reads, "What shall be the regular salary of the elders, deacons, and helpers?" To which answer is made, "$64, and no more; and for each preacher's wife $64; and for each preacher's child, if under the age of six years, there shall be allowed $16; and for each child over the age of six and under the age of eleven years, $21.33." This rule in reference to children created dissatisfaction, and the Conference of 1777 resolved that no provision should be made in future for the children of married preachers, and this appears to have been the practice of the church until 1800. In those early days they were strict, even beyond propriety, in reference to all financial matters. One of their rules reads, "We will on no account whatever suffer any deacon or elder among us to receive any fee or present for administering the ordinance of marriage, baptism, or the burial of the dead: freely we have received, freely we give." It is probable that this rule was adopted to prevent jealousy among the ministers, as but few at first were elected to orders. A few years subsequently it was agreed that a present might be received for the marriage ceremony, but it must be reported to the stewards of the circuit, to be applied to the quarterage. This rule continued in force until 1800. At this day it seems surprising how so great a work could have been sustained on such small means. Brave and self-denying were the men who laid the firm foundations of the edifice of Methodism; yet it became almost impossible for men with families to remain in the traveling ministry, and hence nearly all of them located. The loss of so much talent and experience out of the ministry of the church by location greatly grieved Bishop Asbury and other leading minds. In part to remedy this evil, in 1796 the General Conference organized a Chartered Fund, appointing for it a board of trustees. Its design was to supplement the salaries, and to afford some support for the worn-out preachers, their widows and orphans. Prior to that time an effort had been made to support a Preachers' Fund, by requiring every person when admitted to pay $2.67, then one pound American currency, and to contribute annually $2. This organization was on the principle of a mutual aid society; but in 1796 it was merged into the Chartered Fund. An appeal was issued on behalf of this fund, in which we find the following paragraph: "It is to be lamented, if possible with tears of blood, that we have lost scores of our most able married ministers; men who, like good house-holders, could upon all occasions bring things new and old out of their treasury, but were obliged to retire from the general work because they saw nothing before them for their wives and children, if they continued itinerant, but misery and ruin." Until 1860 the salary of a preacher was fixed at $100, and $100 for his wife, and a small allowance was made to the children. The circuits or stations were also required to estimate a sufficient amount for the family expenses. But in 1860 the rule for specific allowances was removed from the Discipline, and the stations and circuits have determined what they consider necessary for ministerial support. This creates a great inequality in the charges, and adds to the embarrassment of arranging the appointments. In too many cases the estimate made is not fully met; but even then the preacher has no claim upon the property of the church as a compensation for his services. The Discipline expressly provides that the church property shall not be mortgaged or encumbered for current expenses. In the large cities, the best charges pay from $2000 to $3000, with a parsonage; in a very few cases the amount is still higher. The greater number of the charges in cities pay from $1000 to $2000, while in the country places the amount varies from $300 to $1000. As already remarked, British Methodism, by, in some measure, equalizing the expenses, gives greater freedom to the appointments.

Ministers—Candidates and Probationers

(English Wesleyan).—The "itinerancy" of Methodism is the fruitage of the opposition of the clergy of the Church of England in 1739. When Mr. Wesley was debarred time after time from preaching in the churches of the land, he was driven into the streets and fields of Bristol, the common of Kingswood, and the waste lands of Moorfields, in London. He who at first had almost thought it sacrilege for souls to be saved outside the church, heard Mr. Whitefield preach in the open air, saw his own duty, and preached the next day, April 2, 1739, near Bristol, to 3000 people. After cutting "the Gordian knot," and with "The world is my parish" for a motto, Mr. Wesley became an itinerant minister to an extent never previously witnessed. Without tracing the progress of a system which is illustrated in every history of the rise and progress of Methodism, some salient points in connection with its present position may be noticed. The minister is set apart from all secular business. After a period of probation he is duly ordained to the work and office of a minister of Christ. The work he undertakes to perform is well defined. It is, in the highest sense, a Christian pastorate to which he is inducted, and to which he solemnly professes to be moved by a divine call of the Holy Spirit, and which, in connection with the preaching of the word, is associated with the care of the young, and the pastoral visitation of all recognized as members of society. The extreme term of residence in one circuit is limited to three years. The quarterly meetings in each circuit have a right, from year to year, to consult and arrange as to the appointment of ministers. The invitation is given in March, for change or re-appointment, and the decision remains with the Conference. The appointments are annual. An examination as to character, doctrine, discipline, and general efficiency takes place twice a year. At the annual district meeting each name is called over, and the colleague, or nearest minister, must answer for the other. At the Conference, they are examined seriatim the second time, and the chairman answers for each one in his district, as called over by the secretary of the Conference, the district secretary answering for the chairman. The trial of an accused minister is provided for as presented under the heading of DISTRICT MEETINGS.

Candidates.—Each must have been a member of society for some time, have passed his trial, and performed the duties of a local preacher for a longer or shorter period, and have read and signed "The Large Minutes," before he can be eligible for examination at the district meeting. He must also have read Mr. Wesley's standard volumes of Sermons, and his "Notes on the New Testament." The first place of nomination is the March quarterly meeting, some members of which have had an opportunity of watching his general conduct, and forming an opinion of his piety and general fitness for the work of the ministry. The quarterly meeting must give its judgment on these three questions, Has he grace? Has he gifts? Has God given him fruit of his labors? The nomination rests with the superintendent; the meeting by vote approves or rejects. If accepted, the candidate must be transferred to the district meeting, before which he must have been heard by three ministers at least, who are chosen by the chairman, and who present their report. The meeting carefully examines him as to his personal experience and his call to preach, and then on the doctrines and institutions of Christianity; also as to willingness to be employed, under the direction of Conference, in any part of the world, or whether the offer is restricted. In July a further examination of those who have passed the district meeting takes place. At this he must answer questions concerning his health, profession, age, attainments, list of reading, etc., and present a written sermon of his own composition. With these are added the results of a medical examination, written answers to theological and literary questions, judgment upon a sermon preached before a minister of one of the London circuits, and an oral examination before the committee. The reports of this committee are prepared and submitted, but the result rests exclusively with the vote of the Conference.

Probationers.—The names of those who are received, and who remain on trial, with the time and degrees of admission, must be entered on the minutes or journal of Conference. The superintendent of a circuit in which a probationer resides must assume a paternal and pastoral oversight, frequently conversing with him (as occasion may offer) respecting his spiritual progress, his studies, and his work. Every probationer is examined by written papers at each district meeting, and these papers are submitted to the supervision of a central board, which fixes their value. They are also required to present a list of the books read during the year. Suitable advice suggested by these lists is often given by the senior ministers in the meeting. When the four years have nearly expired, at the district meeting preceding the Conference at which they are to be received into "full connection," each probationer must give his present religious experience to the meeting, and submit to an oral examination by the chairman. Having passed through this successfully, by the vote of the meeting he is then recommended to the Conference as a candidate for ordination, and for admission to the full work of the ministry. (See ORDINATION.)

Ministers' Children's Association.—In the minutes of 1875 reference is made to the formation of an association, the object of which is to afford pecuniary aid to the children (especially the daughters) of Wesleyan ministers whose cases prove deserving of help. It has special reference not only to pecuniary relief, but to the admission of orphan and afflicted children of such parents into the public institutions of the country, when the connectional schools and funds are not available; to assist in obtaining suitable situations for sons and daughters, and generally to promote their social, educational, and religious interests as occasion may serve.

Ministry of the United Methodist Free Churches, England.—Like other Methodist denominations, the Free Churches have an itinerant ministry separated from secular toil and supported by the churches, and a lay ministry preaching chiefly on the Sabbath, and engaged in various trades and professions. The number of itinerants in 1876, including 25 supernumeraries, was 375. Of these, about 80 were in various stages of their probation, the rest were in full connection. The number of local preachers was 3435. Itinerant ministers go into the work either by immediate appointment to circuit work or after a course of study and preparation in the Theological Institute at Manchester. Candidates for circuit work must be recommended by the circuit to which they belong. Should their application be entertained by the connectional committee they are subjected to a theological examination, and they must also preach a trial sermon and furnish a written discourse. On passing their examination they are appointed provisionally to a circuit for twelve months, and if approved, then at the end of the year they are put on a probation of four years for the itinerancy. During this term they must attend four annual examinations, by printed questions, on a prescribed course of study. The books required to be read are furnished gratuitously to the probationers by an annual grant made for that purpose from the profits of the Book Room. At the end of four years there is another oral examination, and everything being favorable, the brethren are received into full connection and publicly recognized by the Annual Assembly. Candidates for admission to the Theological Institute must also be recommended by their circuit. On their approval by the connectional committee, they are delegated to the institute committee for examination. They also preach a trial sermon and furnish a written discourse. Should they pass their examination, they are admitted into the institute for two years on terms which are a matter of agreement. The lowest terms stated are £10 for the first year and £5 for the second. On leaving the institute, the students are put on probation for four years, and are required to attend two annual examinations by printed questions. They are admitted into full connection precisely as other probationers. Ministers on probation may not marry, but as soon as received into full connection they are entitled to do so. The minimum salary of a probationer is £65 per year, and of a preacher in full connection £100 per year, with furnished house and payment of rent and taxes. These are the salaries paid to ministers in dependent circuits, but many of the more important circuits pay salaries very much higher. In addition to salary, a preacher in full connection has a claim on the Children's Fund of six guineas a year for all the children born to him after he was received into full connection, from their second to their sixteenth birthday. The arrangement as to superannuation allowances will be found under the heading FUNDS OF THE UNITED METHODIST FREE CHURCHES. Local preachers are very extensively employed in free Methodism. In some circuits their labors are chiefly confined to villages, but in others they frequently preach in the most important chapels. No special provision exists for the training of local preachers, and men of very different degrees of culture are found in their ranks. Each circuit has its own regulations in reference to them, but in every case local preachers are accredited after some trial of their gifts and ascertainment of their Methodist orthodoxy.

Minneapolis, Minn. (pop. 18,079), is on the right bank of the Mississippi River, at the Falls of St. Anthony. In October, 1849, before the settlement of Minneapolis proper, Matthew Sorin formed a class of thirteen in St. Anthony, and appointed John Draper leader. The first pastor appointed to this work was E. Stevens, in 1849. The first Methodist church was erected in 1852, and was perhaps the first Methodist Episcopal church in the State. It was enlarged in 1856, again in 1865, and replaced by a new church in 1870-71. The church has increased with the growth of the city, and new charges have been added. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Minnesota (pop. 439,706).—As early as 1680, Hennepin and La Salle penetrated this territory, followed by other French Catholic missionaries, but not until 1812 did the United States exercise authority within its limits. The Territory of Minnesota was established by Congress in 1849. Previous to this period it had been occupied almost entirely by Indians. It was admitted as a State in 1858. The climate is pure and healthful, and immense water-power is furnished by the Falls of St. Anthony. Methodist services were introduced prior to 1849, when a Minnesota mission district was organized by the Wisconsin Conference. At that time Chancey Hobart was appointed presiding elder, and also in charge of St. Paul's mission. A Black River mission had been established the year before, and these two missions reported, in 1849, 39 members. With the growth of population the church has also increased. A large part of the population is of German and Scandinavian birth, and strong churches in these bodies are in connection with the Methodist Conferences. The Hamline University was established at Red Wing, but after a struggle of some years the site was abandoned, and a plot of ground was purchased between St. Paul and Minneapolis. (See HAMLINE UNIVERSITY.) In addition to the Minnesota Conference, the Northwest German Conference and the Northwest Swedish Conference have a number of congregations. The denominational statistics as shown in the United States census are as follows:

Minnesota Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1856, and included "the Minnesota Territory and that part of the State of Wisconsin which lies north and west of a line beginning at the mouth of Black River and running up said river to the mouth of Beaver Creek; up said creek to its source; thence by the dividing ridge between the waters of Black and Trempealeau Rivers to the line between towns twenty-three and twenty-four; thence east along said line to the fourth principal meridian; thence north on said meridian line to Lake Superior." When the State was admitted into the Union the boundaries of this Conference were changed, and in 1876 it was defined as including "the State of Minnesota." It held its first session at Red Wing, Minn., Aug. 7, 1856, Bishop Simpson presiding. It reported 1761 members, with 47 traveling and 45 local preachers. The report from this Conference in 1876 was 151 traveling and 128 local preachers, 15,211 Sunday-school scholars, 11,440 members, 164 churches, valued at $491,225, and 94 parsonages, valued at $84,850.

Minnesota Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces all the State of Minnesota and that part of Wisconsin crossing the river at La Crosse, running east to the southeast corner of La Crosse County; thence north to Lake Superior." It reported, in 1877, 21 itinerant and 3 unstationed preachers, 300 members, and 1 church, valued at $15,000.

Minutes of Conference.—When Mr. Wesley assembled his preachers for consultation, he gave the meeting the name of Conference, and when their proceedings were published these were called the Minutes of Conference. At first they were very small, referring simply to points of doctrine and a few matters of ecclesiastical order, but as the work enlarged various items of business were added, and a number of rules were adopted. These, when arranged, were called the Larger Minutes. The records of the Annual Conferences in America are termed the Minutes of Conference, and embrace the names and appointments of the ministers, the classes of the candidates, the ordinations, obituaries, and statistical tables. The minutes kept by the Annual Conferences are forwarded to the General Conference for examination and criticism.

Missionary Societies.—In the early history of Methodism the whole work was essentially missionary. Heroic men traveled on foot circuits which were assigned to them, while they endured privation sufficient to discourage the stoutest heart. Mr. Wesley out of his own funds, received from publications, and by collections in stronger societies, relieved some of their most pressing necessities. When the first preachers were sent to America, in 1769, the Conference gave a collection of £50 as a present to the church in New York, and £20 to help pay the passage of the missionaries, and collections were taken up in a few churches. At the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church two ministers were sent to Nova Scotia, and a collection was taken for them amounting to £57. The first annual subscription for missions resulted from an address issued by Dr. Coke, in 1786, in which he plead for the islands adjacent to Great Britain, and also for Nova Scotia and the West Indies. Mr. Wesley indorsed his plea, and recommended it to the Christian public. Dr. Coke personally established missions in the West Indies, and continued to superintend the mission work and to take up collections as long as Mr. Wesley lived. At the Conference of 1790, the last which Mr. Wesley attended, a committee of nine, of which Dr. Coke was chairman, was appointed to take charge of mission interests. In 1793 the Conference ordered a collection to be taken in every charge. The Wesleyan Missionary Society, however, was not organized until 1817, after the death of Dr. Coke. Since that period it has been in vigorous operation, and has established missions in British America, the West Indies, France, Germany, West and South Africa, India, China, Japan, Australasia, and the East India Islands. Its receipts for 1876 were £159,106; it has sustained 797 missionaries and 5167 agents and native helpers. Under its care also were a large number of flourishing schools. In the United States, Bishop Asbury collected funds for what he termed the "mite society," and aided the preachers who were sent to the Western frontiers. The Missionary Society was organized in 1819, in New York, under the efforts of Dr. Bangs and Joshua Soule, subsequently bishop. The General Conference of 1820 sanctioned the plan, and the Missionary Society became an integral part of the church. At the General Conference of 1872 it was changed from its organization as a voluntary society to a church board, the managers of which are appointed by the General Conference. Under it, missions have been established in destitute places in the United States, among the foreign immigrants, the Indians, and in Scandinavia, Germany, Italy, India, China, Japan, Africa, South America, and Mexico. The receipts for 1876 were $655,964.44.

The Women's Foreign Missionary Society was organized in 1870, and was approved by the General Conference of 1872. The receipts for 1877 were $72,464.30. It has sent medical young women and teachers to India, China, and Japan, and teachers to Mexico and South America.

All the branches of Methodism have missionary societies more or less extensive.

Missions.—As was intimated in a previous article (see MISSIONARY SOCIETIES), much of the earlier work of Methodism was essentially missionary in its character. The ministers sought the sparse population, followed the pioneer to the wilderness, and encountered all the privations to which the missionary is usually subject. No missions, however, were founded by name until, in 1819, the Ohio Conference adopted a mission which had been started among the Wyandotte Indians by John Stewart, a colored man. From that centre missions were extended among the Indians in Canada and the Western States and Territories. Shortly after that period, missions were established among the colored population South. The first foreign mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church was commenced in Liberia, in 1833. There is now a Conference organized, which reports 2300 members and probationers. The mission in South America was commenced in 1836, though but little was accomplished until within the last ten years. There is now an excellent work in Montevideo and Rosario, with some appointments in the interior. The mission in China was commenced in 1847, with its headquarters in Foochow, and reports 1874 members and probationers, with 71 native preachers. A number of the appointments are self-sustaining. A second mission was commenced in Central China, with headquarters at Kiukiang, in 1868, which has 46 members and probationers, with 2 native helpers. In 1869 a third mission was commenced in North China, with headquarters at Peking, which reports 48 members, with several native helpers. In 1849 a mission was commenced in Germany and Switzerland, which has developed into an Annual Conference, reporting a membership of about 11,000. The Scandinavian mission was commenced in 1854, in Norway, from which it spread into Denmark and Sweden, and the work in Norway and Sweden has developed in each country into an Annual Conference. In 1856 a mission was commenced in India under the superintendence of Rev. Dr. Butler, which has developed into the India Conference. Through the labors of Rev. William Taylor, in 1872, a self-supporting mission was established in Bombay, Bengal, and Madras, which has become the South India Conference. In 1857 missionaries were sent to Bulgaria. The work has been surrounded with great difficulties, however, and through the recent war has been suspended. In 1871 a mission was established under Dr. L. M. Vernon in Italy. Its headquarters are now in Rome, where a neat church has been built, and congregations have been organized throughout Italy. In 1872 missionaries were sent to Japan under the superintendence of Rev. R. S. McClay, who had been previously appointed superintendent of China, and a good opening has been secured. In 1873 mission work was commenced in Mexico, under Dr. Butler, formerly superintendent in India, and a very favorable opening has been made. A press has been established, books are published in the Spanish language, and a neat illustrated sheet is issued in the city of Mexico. Missions have also been established among the various foreign populations, especially the German and Scandinavian, in the bounds of the United States. A Chinese mission is in operation, and is doing a good work in San Francisco. (For the missions of the Wesleyans of England, see WESLEYAN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.) Missions have been established by the Methodist Episcopal Church South in China and Mexico, and by the Methodist Church of Canada in Japan. These missions are in addition to an immense amount of work maintained among the scattered and destitute population within the bounds of the respective churches. Notwithstanding the great depression in financial matters, the contributions for the various missionary societies have fallen off comparatively but little.

Mississippi (pop. 827,925).—The first discoverer of this territory was De Soto, who penetrated into its bounds in 1542. In 1682, La Salle descended the Mississippi River and took formal possession of the adjacent country for the king of France, and the French erected forts at different points for their protection. The territory was ceded by the French to Great Britain in 1763, and was erected into a Territory in 1798. In 1817 it was admitted as a State into the Union. Methodism was introduced, in 1799, by Tobias Gibson, who volunteered to go from South Carolina, though he was in feeble health. With the approval of Bishop Asbury he set out upon his journey, traveling to the Cumberland River, in Kentucky, chiefly on horseback, passing through the wilderness hundreds of miles by simply following Indian trails. Reaching the Cumberland River, he sold his horse, bought a canoe, and, passing his saddle-bags and other articles into it, he glided down the river into the Ohio, and thence 600 or 800 miles down the Mississippi to his destination, where he began his labor eighteen years before the Territory became a State. At the Conference of 1800 he reported from the territory called Natchez 60 members. He continued to work alone until 1802, when assistance was sent him from the Western Conference. In 1801 it was connected with Kentucky district, with William McKendree, subsequently bishop, as presiding elder. In 1803 it reported 102 members, and 4 preachers were appointed to the Territory. In 1806 the Mississippi district was formed, with Learner Blackman as presiding elder. From 1806 to 1808 Lorenzo Dow rendered efficient service in the establishment of Methodism by his successful discussions, especially in the Calvinistic controversy. In 1816 the General Conference authorized the formation of the Mississippi Conference, which then contained the Mississippi and the Louisiana districts. Thomas Griffin was presiding elder of the Mississippi district, with 6 circuits, which reported 1531 white and 416 colored members. With the increase of population the church grew with considerable rapidity. Several literary institutions were established, and in 1844 the Mississippi Conference reported 13,257 white, 7799 colored, and 115 Indian members. It adhered to the Church South in 1845, and so remained the only form of Methodism in the State, except a few Methodist Protestants, until the close of the Civil War. The M. E. Church South has now two Conferences, the Mississippi and the North Mississippi; the first of which, however, embraces a small portion of Louisiana. These Conferences together reported, in 1875, 229 traveling and 366 local preachers, 49,200 members, and 15,814 Sunday-school scholars. The M. E. Church, after the close of the war, organized a Conference, which consists chiefly of colored membership, and reports 102 traveling and 344 local ministers, 28,804 members, 11,589 Sunday-school scholars, 263 churches, valued at $180,920, and 14 parsonages, valued at $5600. The Methodist Protestant Church has two Conferences, the Mississippi and the North Mississippi, reporting 26 itinerant and 114 unstationed ministers, 1880 members, and 20 churches, valued at $5750. The African M. E. Church has also a Conference in this State, and the African M. E. Zion Church and the Colored Church of America have a number of congregations, but of which accurate statistics have not been furnished. The relative condition of the various denominations, as reported in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

Mississippi Conference, M. E. Church, was originally constituted by the General Conference in 1816, embracing at that time the State of Louisiana and Mississippi south of the Tennessee River, together with a large part of Alabama and Florida. Its boundaries were from time to time diminished, until, in 1840, it included "all that part of the State of Mississippi not embraced in the Alabama and Memphis Conferences and all the State of Louisiana." In 1845 it adhered to the Church South. At its first session, in 1817, it reported 1531 white and 410 colored members, and in 1844 it reported 13,257 white, 799 colored, and 115 Indian members. The Methodist Episcopal Church did not organize any work in its bounds until after the close of the war, when Bishop Thomson, under the authority of the General Conference, re-organized the Mississippi Conference at New Orleans, Dec. 25, 1865. It then reported 16 traveling and 13 local preachers, 2692 members, 1386 Sunday-school scholars, and 5 churches, valued at $47,000. In 1876, the Louisiana Conference having separated from it, its boundaries embraced simply the State of Mississippi, and reported 102 traveling and 344 local preachers, 28,804 members, 11,589 Sunday-school scholars, 263 churches, valued at $180,920, and 14 parsonages, valued at $5600.

Mississippi Conference, M. E. Church South, was one of the original Conferences that adhered to the Church South at the division, in 1845. It reported, in 1846, to the Church South 79 preachers, 10,095 white and 5854 colored members. The State of Mississippi embraces also the principal part of the North Mississippi Conference of the M. E. Church South. The General Conference of 1874 defined the boundaries of the Mississippi Conference as follows: "All that part of the State lying south of the southern boundaries of the Washington, Holmes, Attala, Winston, and Noxubee Counties, together with so much of the State of Louisiana as lies north of Bayou Manshaek, Amite River, and Lakes Marepas, Ponchartrain, and Boume, except Baton Rouge." It reported, in 1875, 105 traveling and 162 local preachers, 21,034 members, and 6474 Sunday-school scholars.

Mississippi Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces the State of Mississippi." It reported, in 1877, 8 itinerant and 4 unstationed ministers, 580 members, and 5 churches, valued at $2750.

Missouri (pop. 1,721,295) was acquired by purchase from France in 1803, being part of the Province of Louisiana. Its first settlements were made by French Catholics, at St. Genevieve in 1755, and subsequently at New Madrid, Girardeau, and St. Louis. In 1812 it was organized into a Territory, and was admitted as a State into the Union in 1821. Methodism was introduced about 1805, by Joseph Oglesby, who was appointed to the Illinois circuit, and who "reconnoitred the Missouri country to the extremity of the settlements, and had the pleasure of seeing Daniel Boone, the mighty hunter." According to the minutes of Conference the first appointment was made in 1806, when John Travis was sent from the Western Conference, the whole Territory then containing about 16,000 inhabitants. His circuit was a part of the Cumberland district, which at that time embraced East Tennessee, part of Michigan, Indiana, Arkansas, Illinois, and Missouri.

In 1816 the Missouri Conference was formed, embracing Missouri, Illinois, and a large part of Indiana. Although Jesse Walker was not the first Methodist itinerant, yet he ranks as the principal pioneer in Missouri. He possessed such energy that no obstruction could deter him. As a circuit preacher and presiding elder he braved all opposition, and inspired his co-laborers with such enthusiasm that Methodism superseded the original

French Catholic predominance in that country. In 1845 the vast majority of the societies adhered to the Church South. A few members, however, desired to retain their connection with the M. E. Church, and societies were organized in St. Louis and a few other places. At present the M. E. Church South has in the State three Conferences, the Missouri, St. Louis, and Southwest Missouri, which together report 240 traveling and 340 local preachers, 49,106 members, and 21,588 Sunday-school scholars. The Methodist Episcopal Church has two Conferences, the Missouri and St. Louis, embracing 251 traveling and 362 local preachers, 32,785 members, 20,728 Sunday-school scholars, 293 churches, valued at $667,630, and 83 parsonages, valued at $65,405. There are also about 2700 German Methodists. The Methodist Protestant Church has two Conferences, the Missouri and North Missouri, and which embrace 75 itinerant and 72 unstationed preachers, 3380 members, 23 churches and 4 parsonages, valued at $12,570. The African M. E. Church has a Missouri Conference, which also embraces all the territory west of Missouri to the Rocky Mountains, and which reports 63 preachers, 4603 members, 2515 Sunday-school scholars, 45 churches and 6 parsonages, valued at $161,000.

Missouri Conference, M. E. Church South.—At the first General Conference of the Church South, in 1846, the State of Missouri was divided into the St. Louis and Missouri Conferences. These reported 54 traveling and 93 local preachers, 9611 white and 1025 colored members. The General Conference of 1874 defined its boundaries so as to "include all of the State of Missouri north of the Missouri River." In 1875 it reported 134 traveling and 141 local preachers, 24,854 members, and 11,915 Sunday-school scholars. Two other Conferences are also included in the State.

Missouri Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces that part of the State of Missouri lying south of the Missouri River." It reported, in 1877, 35 itinerant and 45 unstationed preachers, 1879 members, 12 churches and 3 parsonages, valued at $6570.

Mitchell, Daniel P., was born in West Virginia, and admitted to the Pittsburgh Conference of the M. E. Church in 1844. After serving a number of prominent charges he was appointed presiding elder of Alleghany district in 1857. In 1863 he was transferred to the Kansas Conference, and stationed in Leavenworth. Subsequently he became presiding elder of Leavenworth district, and in 1869 chaplain in the State penitentiary. In 1873 he was appointed to Fort Scott district, and, on the division of the Conference, became a member of the South Kansas Conference, to which he now belongs. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1860 and 1876.

Mitchell, F. T., president of Andrew Female College, Texas, was born in St. Clair, Ill., on Jan.

REV. F. T. MITCHELL, D.D.

21, 1821. In his nineteenth year he entered upon the study of law, but before he began to practice was converted, and under convictions of duty devoted himself to the work of the ministry; uniting, in 1841, with the Rock River Conference, he preached for four years, when he was attacked with hemorrhage of the lungs; traveling South for the benefit of his health, he was offered the agency of the American Bible Society for the State of Kentucky. In this field he labored until 1852, when he resigned the agency and removed to Missouri, residing on a farm, but performing all the ministerial labor that his health would permit. In 1869, under the advice of physicians, he removed to Texas, and spent a year on Galveston Bay. His health became perfectly restored, and he re-entered the pastoral work, and was in charge of the Huntsville station when he was elected president of Andrew Female College, which was erected and chartered in the year 1853.

Mitchell, James, M.D., was born in Ireland in 1777. About 1800 he emigrated to America, and in 1806 joined the Philadelphia Annual Conference, and after his ordination was transferred to Genesee. In some of his circuits "he frequently slept in the woods, with his saddle for a pillow and the heavens for a covering." In 1810 he was ordained elder, and the two following years he spent in Canada, where he succeeded in erecting a church building at Montreal, and afterwards was stationed at Quebec. On the breaking out of the war with Great Britain he returned to the United States. His health failing, he entered as a student of medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, and afterwards obtained a situation in the Southern Dispensary. In 1824 he was re-admitted into the Philadelphia Conference as a supernumerary, but continued to practice medicine until his death, which occurred in 1859.

Mitchell, John Thomas, was born Aug. 20, 1810, near Salem, Va. The family early removed to Illinois, and settled near Belleville in 1829. He was converted and united with the M. E. Church, and in 1830 commenced teaching, and in 1832 was admitted into the Illinois Conference. He was a close student, and acquired a general knowledge of science as well as of the Latin and Greek languages. After filling various important charges in circuits, stations, and on a district, he was, in 1844, elected assistant book agent at Cincinnati. At the close of his term he was transferred to the Ohio Conference, and stationed for a number of years in Cincinnati and its vicinity. From the organization of the Cincinnati Conference, in 1851, he was annually chosen as secretary. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1844 from the Rock River Conference, and in 1856 from the Cincinnati. He was an earnest and useful minister, a careful and able administrator, and a wise counselor.

Mitchell, Thompson, D.D., was born in Mifflin Co., Pa., and was admitted to the Baltimore Conference, M. E. Church, in 1839. He served various appointments until 1856, when he was made presiding elder of Northumberland district, which he served until 1860, when he was elected president of Williamsport Dickinson Seminary. By division of the Conference he became a member of East Baltimore Conference in 1857, and of the Central Pennsylvania Conference in 1869. In 1870 he re-entered the pastoral work, and has been presiding elder in the Carlisle, Harrisburg, and Williamsport districts. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1860, 1868, 1872, and 1876.

Mobile, Ala. (pop. 32,034), is the commercial capital of the State, situated on Mobile River, near its entrance into Mobile Bay. Since the last census, as given above, it has grown rapidly, and reports with its suburbs near 40,000 inhabitants. The first record made of the introduction of Methodism into the city is in 1822, when Rev. Alexander Talley was sent as a missionary to Mobile, Blakely, and Pensacola. In 1825, Henry P. Cook was sent to Mobile and Pensacola, and churches were organized, consisting, in the two cities, of 37 white and 47 black members. In 1826-27, Rev. John R. Lambuth, father of the missionary to Shanghai, China, was sent to Mobile, and in 1827 a building of wood was erected on the southwest corner of Franklin and St. Michael Streets, the preacher assisting in hewing the timber for the house. This was occupied as a church until 1849, when it was succeeded by a spacious brick church built on the same spot, and now known as Franklin Street. This church is recognized as the mother church among the Methodists in Mobile. In 1841 a second congregation was formed by 39 members from the Franklin Street church, who rented a building known as the Synagogue, and worshiped in it till their church was finished, in 1844. It is called St. Francis Street church, and from this church, in 1842, a colony went forth, taking the name of the West Ward church, under the care of Rev. J. C. Keener, now bishop. The same year a fourth church was organized. These two subsequently united and formed the St. Paul's church. Prior to the Civil War two commodious churches had been built for the colored population on State Street and Bayou. These have been occupied by the A. M. E. Zion Church, and are served by colored pastors. In the adjacent village of Whistler, where railroad-shops are located, the M. E. Church South has a church and parsonage, and in Toumilin, about two miles from the city, a house was built, chiefly by Mrs. Crawford, mother of Mrs. Vanderbilt, of New York, who resided there. The African M. E. Church has two societies and one spacious edifice, and a second is in process of erection. It has two stationed preachers and eight local preachers. The M. E. Church has a society of colored persons in the city, and one in the country about two and one-half miles distant, which are served by a preacher from the Central Alabama Conference. The Mobile district of the M. E. Church South extends from Louisiana to West Florida, and employs 20 traveling preachers, five of whom reside in the city of Mobile, and eight are employed in Mobile County. The county contains 1514 members and 1517 Sunday-school scholars, with 11 churches, valued at $47,050, and 4 parsonages, valued at $13,500, with additional property amounting to $6350. The summary of the churches in Mobile is as follows:

Model Deeds of the United Methodist Free Churches.—The chapels of the United Methodists are not settled in a uniform manner. Many of them were erected in a time of agitation, when the connectional principle was weakened, and when in frequent cases there was no disposition to give any Conference or Assembly control over chapel property. The greater portion of the chapels are settled on trust, but in many cases the Annual Assembly has no legal authority over them. Some of these private deeds are badly drawn or devised, and gentlemen of legal acumen fear that some of them will eventually be lost to the connection. To prevent the alienation of chapel property, and present trustees with a form of trust that they might safely follow, two Model Deeds have been framed. The first formed is called the Model Deed, and the second, for distinction's sake, the Reference Deed, but both have been adopted and recommended as pattern deeds for the settlement of chapels. The Model Deed was executed in 1842, by the late Wesleyan Methodist Association. The original deed was for the settlement of chapel premises in Deptford, Kent. This deed was extensively followed in the association. The general features of the deed have been authoritatively explained, as follows: "It secures the property to the uses of the society

worshiping therein; authorizes the itinerant preachers appointed by the Annual Assembly, and the local preachers appointed by the circuit, to occupy the pulpit: and makes a provision by which other ministers . . . may be permitted to preach therein; and allows the premises to be used for all the meetings usually held by the United Methodist Free Churches. There is also a provision for holding any extraordinary meeting which may not be objected to by the trustees, or by the leader's meeting, as representing the society, or by the superintendent or senior itinerant preacher, who has to guard the interests and character of the connection, and who is made responsible to the Annual Assembly for the manner in which he exercises the discretion reposed in him." When trustees of chapels settled on this deed desire to relinquish their trust, they must give notice to the Annual Assembly. If the trustees are not effectually released within six months, they may sell the property. Before the Wesleyan Reformers united, in 1857, with the Wesleyan Methodist Association, they had built many chapels, some of which were settled in a very unsatisfactory manner. The Model Deed of 1842 did not meet the views of many, who yet desired connectional safety, and, as far as possible, uniformity in the settlement of chapels. Accordingly, needful steps were taken for the construction of another deed. The Annual Assembly of 1863 requested the connectional committee to consider the subject, which they did most anxiously. A draft deed was prepared by Herbert H. Cozens-Hardy, Esq., of the equity bar, and this formed the basis of the Reference Deed adopted and recommended by the Annual Assembly of 1865. The original deed was for the conveyance of a plot of land in Burnley for the erection of a chapel. II. F. Lawes, Esq., the solicitor employed on the occasion, has defined the principal objects attained by the deed, as—I. Securing the chapels to the United Methodist Free Churches in such a way as to prevent misappropriation in future years. II. Allowing the trustees of each chapel the greatest freedom of action in the management of the trust without undue interference on the part of the Assembly and the preachers. III. Taking special care that trustees have full protection against embarrassment and loss, particularly in cases where they have borrowed or advanced money without taking a legal security. "The Deed provides for the due appointment of preachers, and the proper conduct of religious services, according to the doctrines and usages of the United Methodist Free Churches, in such a way as to prevent, as far as possible, persons immoral in their character, or heterodox in their views of Christian truth, from ministering in" the pulpits of the denomination. Neither of these deeds is imposed upon trustees, but both are recognized and recommended. Both of them are liberal in their provisions. The Reference Deed gives less scope in trust affairs to the Annual Assembly and the superintendent minister than the Model Deed. Both are very careful of the rights of trustees. The returns of 1875 show that out of 1210 chapels possessed by the body in Great Britain, 593 were settled on either the Model or Reference Deed. The relative number, however, is continually changing in favor of chapels settled on one or other of the Model Deeds. In 1867 there were 1120 chapels in Great Britain, of which only 321 were settled on one of these deeds. In eight years the increase of chapels amounted to 90, while the increase of chapels settled, either on the Model or Reference Deed, amounted to 272.

Moline, Ill. (pop. 4166), is situated three miles above Rock Island. Methodist services were introduced in 1835. The first M. E. church was erected in 1850, and rebuilt in 1871. It is in the Central Illinois Conference, and has 195 members, 238 Sunday-school scholars, and $22,000 church property. There is here also a strong Swedish M. E. church, having 160 members, 40 Sunday-school scholars, and $5100 church property.

Molineux, James, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born in Lancashire in 1791. He joined the Wesleyan Society when about twenty years of age, and in 1815 became a local preacher. He took part in the movements of 1835, and on the formation of the Wesleyan Association he became an itinerant minister. He was a popular preacher, an able business man, an excellent administrator, calm and self-possessed, gentlemanly in his conduct, full of dignified courtesy. He soon rose to the front ranks of the body, being elected to the offices of corresponding secretary and twice filling the chair of Conference. He became supernumerary in 1853. He was requested to become Society's missionary and visitor by Bartle Street chapel, and discharged this duty for twenty years, dying in the triumph of faith Nov. 13, 1873.

Mr. Molineux was a great lover of nature, and was distinguished for his botanical lore. He published a work called "Botany made Easy." He was also the author of a compendium of doctrine, compiled, by request of the Assembly, for the use of children. This catechism is still sold by the Book Room.

Monmouth, Ill. (pop. 4662), is the capital of Warren County. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1839, with W. M. Clark as pastor. In 1840 the charge contained 289 members. Before 1857 the charge had become a well-established station. It is in the Central Illinois Conference, and has 289 members, 180 Sunday-school scholars, and $12,000 church property.

Monroe, David S., one of the assistant secretaries of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born at Leesburg, Va.; was educated at Baltimore College, and joined the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1854. He was for several years one of the assistant secretaries of that body, and afterwards a secretary of the East Baltimore Conference. When the Central Pennsylvania Conference was formed, he was elected its secretary in 1869, and has been re-elected to that office at succeeding sessions. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Monroe, John, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Scotland in 1803; emigrated to America in 1820, and afterwards graduated at Kenyon College, Ohio. From thence he went to Missouri, and, in 1834, was engaged as a teacher among the Kickapoo Indians, near Fort Leavenworth. Soon after this he was admitted into the St. Louis Conference, and at the time of his death held a superannuated relation. In his pioneer work he suffered much. He was a faithful, energetic, determined, and unwavering minister. He died at Big Lick, Cooper Co., Mo., Sept. 22, 1873.

Monroe, Joshua, a pioneer Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Alleghany Co., Md., Jan. 14, 1786, and died in Beaver, Pa., Jan. 5, 1874. He was admitted on trial in the Baltimore Conference in 1808, and was immediately sent to the western limits of the church. His appointuents as pastor and presiding elder extended over Western Pennsylvania, West Virginia, and East Ohio. He was superannuated in 1852. "As a preacher he was of fair abilities, sound in doctrine, sober in judgment, concise and industrious in the application of truth, dealing honestly and faithfully with his hearers." He was one of the founders of Beaver College, and was for many years president of the board of trustees.

Monroe, Mich. (pop. 5086), the capital of Monroe County, 40 miles southwest of Detroit. A Methodist society was organized in 1811, but entirely broken up about four years afterwards. In September, 1821, John P. Kent projected a mission which included Monroe, and in 1822 Alfred Brunson and Samuel Baker were appointed to the work. The first church in Monroe was built in 1837, and replaced by a new one in 1868-69. It is in the Detroit Conference, and has 118 members, 240 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property.

Monroe, Wis. (pop. 3408), the capital of Green County, on a branch of the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad. The first Methodist minister who preached in this place was Daniel Harcourt, a local preacher from Indiana, in the autumn of 1835; the first class was formed by James McKane, in 1836.

The first church was erected in 1849; in 1869 it was replaced by a new and beautiful brick edifice. It is in the West Wisconsin Conference, and has 150 members, 140 Sunday-school scholars, and $17,500 church property.

Monrovia Seminary, in Liberia, Africa, was erected in 1854, by means furnished by the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church. It is 53 feet wide by 43 feet long, with foundations of stone and walls of hard-burned brick. A piazza 8 feet wide surrounds the entire building. It was for some time under the superintendency of Rev. J. W. Horn, now of the New York East Conference.

Montana (pop. 20,595), is a Territory embracing an area of 143,776 square miles, being as large as New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Ohio. It extends north to the British possessions, and embraces agricultural and grazing land as well as mineral wealth. Virginia City is the capital, which at present (1877) contains about 4000 inhabitants. Methodism was introduced but a few years since, and services have been held, owing to the disturbed state of the country, at but a few points. It was formerly embraced in the Rocky Mountain Conference, but the distance being so great, and traveling so expensive, under permission given by the General Conference, and at the earnest request of the ministers, the Montana Conference was organized in 1876, containing 16 appointments, which are supplied by 4 preachers from the Conference and such local preachers as can be employed. The denominational statistics, as reported in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

	Organizations.	Edifices.	Sittings.	Property.
All denominations.....	15	11	3850	$99,300

Montana Conference, M. E. Church.—The General Conference of 1876 authorized the Rocky Mountain Conference to divide its territory during the next four years whenever two-thirds of the members present should ask for such division. At the session in July, 1876, this vote was given. Bishop Wiley held the first session of the Montana Conference at Bozeman, Aug. 2, 1877. L. B. Long was elected secretary. There were reported 264 members, 8 Sunday-schools and 481 Sunday-school scholars, 5 churches, valued at $29,000. Two districts were formed, Helena and Butte, of which L. B. Long and F. A. Riggin were made presiding elders. Only four preachers were stationed, including the presiding elders. Six local preachers were reported. The next session is to be held at Virginia City.

Montgomery, Ala. (pop. 10,588), the capital of the State, situated on the Alabama River, about 400 miles above Mobile. Methodist services were held in Montgomery in 1819, by James King. In 1821 a society was formed and made part of Cohoba circuit, traveled by James H. Millard. The society worshiped in a log church about two miles from the town. In 1822, Bishop George, while on his way to the Mississippi Conference, preached in the court-house, and other services were held there afterwards, out of which grew the society in the town, which was organized in 1829. Shortly after its organization, Montgomery became a station. In 1830 the society secured possession of the Union church and used it until 1835, when a new church was built, which stood until 1853, when a third church was erected. Soon after this the colored members erected a house of worship on Holcombe Street, on the site of the present African M. E. Zion church. A Methodist Protestant society was founded here in 1836. The Methodist services were held by the Church South and Methodist Protestant only, until the close of the Civil War. The M. E. Church and the African M. E. Zion Church have since that period established societies. The following are the statistics for 1876:

dist family, among whom are many distinguished Methodist ministers. Thrown in his youth upon his own resources, at fourteen he taught a school of colored youth to acquire means for his college course. He graduated in 1850 from Charleston

College, having taught in the school for colored youth a portion of the time. He joined the South Carolina Conference in December of the same year. He traveled on circuits two years; was in stations six; was missionary to the colored population two years, presiding elder four years; was chaplain in the Confederate army, and assigned to duty in the hospitals in Charleston for two years; traveled in Europe one year, and in 1869 entered on the presidency of Soule University, at Chapel Hill, Texas. On the consolidation of several Methodist colleges into the "Southwestern University" he was elected regent in January, 1873, which position he still retains.

Moore, David H., D.D., president of Cincinnati Wesleyan College, was born near Athens, O.,

REV. DAVID H. MOORE, D.D.

Sept. 4, 1838. He graduated from the Ohio University in 1860, and in the same year was admitted as a probationer in the Ohio Annual Conference. In May, 1862, he volunteered in the Union army, and was captain commanding an Ohio company at Harper's Ferry when General Miles surrendered that post. Released on parole, he was soon exchanged and entered the service as major, and was promoted to lieutenant-colonel. He had command of a regiment during almost the entire Atlanta campaign, his colonel having been placed in command of a brigade. After the fall of Atlanta, his health being impaired, he returned to Ohio, and was immediately employed as a pastor. In 1872 he was transferred to the Cincinnati Conference and stationed in charge of Trinity church. At the close of his pastorate, in 1875, he was elected to the presidency of the college, which position he now holds.

Moore, Edward, is a leading merchant in Stockton, Cal., prominent in Sunday-school work in the M. E. Church, and devoted to all its interests. He was among the youngest of the lay delegates to the General Conference of 1872, as a representative from the California Conference.

Moore, Henry, was the friend and biographer of Wesley. He died in the ninety-third year of his age and the sixty-fifth of his ministry, in 1844.

Moore, H. H., a native of Ohio, was born March 10, 1820, and was converted in his youth. He was educated at Asbury Seminary, and afterwards spent two years teaching in Kentucky. He joined the Erie Conference, M. E. Church, in 1846. In 1857 he was transferred to the Kansas and Nebraska Conference, and in 1858 was stationed at Wyandotte and Quindara. In 1861 he was chosen chaplain of the 3d Kansas Volunteers, and transferred back to the Erie Conference. The next year he was in the South, and was on Morris Island during the siege of Fort Sumter. During this time he was special correspondent of the New York Tribune and Evening Post, and of the Philadelphia Press. In 1864 he went to Florida with the troops under General Seymour. At the close of the war he spent some time in Florida delivering addresses to the freedmen and whites, endeavoring to assist them in adjusting themselves to the new order of things. He bought the Jacksonville Herald and made it a loyal paper, and when the Freedman's Bureau was organized he was attached to it, and made superintendent of education for the State of Florida. In 1866 he returned to the Erie Conference. He is known as a frequent contributor to the periodicals of the M. E. Church, and enjoys the honor of having led the evangelist, Ira D. Sankey, to the Saviour. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Moore, James.—This time-honored minister was born in Centre Co., Pa., in 1794, and died in 1861. He was brought up a Presbyterian, but was early converted under Methodist preaching. In 1818 he was received into the Baltimore Conference. His work being in the western boundary of the Baltimore Conference in 1825, he became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1828 he was a member of the General Conference. His health failed in 1829, and he was superannuated one year. He was elected a delegate to the General Conference of 1832, but in consequence of affliction he was unable to be present. Subsequently he retired from the work, rendering efficient services as much as his health would permit, until his death, March 15, 1861. He was a minister of fine talents and preaching ability, strong native intellect, and a well-cultivated mind. His style was terse, vigorous, and logical, and at times his preaching was attended with equal power.

Moore, James Arminius, a native of Belmont County, born near St. Clairsville, O., Dec. 16, 1836, was converted in January, 1851. He received a good education, including some terms at Richmond College without graduation. For many years he has been a class-leader and steward, and at present is recording steward of South Common church, Alleghany, Pa. In early life he was chiefly occupied in farming, and subsequently was a teacher in public schools. In the fall of 1864 he became identified with the business department of The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Morgan, Littleton F., D.D., is a distinguished member of the Baltimore Conference. For many years he has filled the most prominent pulpits in Baltimore and Washington City, and has been several terms presiding elder. He served for three years as pastor of Christ church, Pittsburgh. He has also been a delegate to the General Conference.

Morgan, Nicholas J. B., D.D., was born in Booth Co., Va., Nov. 23, 1811, and died April 6, 1872, in Anne Arundel Co., Md. He was the oldest son of the Rev. Gerald Morgan, an eminent preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Dr. Morgan was converted in 1825, and immediately entered upon educational preparation for the ministry. He was admitted into the Baltimore Conference in 1829, and appointed to Fincastle circuit. After filling many important appointments in Washington, Baltimore, and other places, he at last closed an eventful and useful life from a severe attack of pneumonia. He had been forty-three years a presiding elder, the length of which service was only exceeded by that of Peter Cartwright. He was elected to the General Conference in 1844, and to every succeeding one but 1876. On account of ill health he did not attend, however, the session of 1868. He lived through some of the most eventful periods of Methodist history in the United States. He knew much of the agitation during the separation of the Methodist Protestant Church, and was actively engaged in the scenes of the division of the church between the North and the South. At that time, though his district was along the border, in Virginia, yet he stood firm to the Methodist Episcopal Church. The only act which he regretted concerning that serious agitation was, that he voted for the so-called "plan of separation." During the slavery agitation, in 1860, he stood firm for the church, and for the anti-slavery antecedents of the church, and it is believed that by his efforts many were saved to the M. E. Church. True also to his country, he stood by the government in the dark hours of the Rebellion.

Morley, George, was intimately associated with Dr. Coke in the establishment of foreign missions. He assisted in the organization of the "Methodist Auxiliary Missionary Society for the Leeds District." In 1821 he was appointed one of the general treasurers of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, afterwards was resident secretary, and was president of the Conference in 1830. The following year received a ball in his right breast, which passed through his body about an inch above his lungs, fracturing his shoulder-blade. Before his wounds were fully healed he received a commission as major, and was in nearly the whole campaign of 1777. He was awakened in 1785, under the preaching of Rev. John Haggerty, and the following year commenced his labors as a local preacher. At the

he became governor of Woodhouse Grove School; he held this office till within two weeks of his decease. He died Sept. 10, 1843.

Morrell, Thomas, of the New Jersey Conference, was born Nov. 22, 1747, in New York. His mother was converted under the preaching of Philip Embury, and was among the first members of the Methodist society in America. He was early engaged in mercantile business, but in 1775, when the Revolutionary War commenced, he formed a company, of which he was elected captain, and was engaged in a number of daring expeditions. In 1776 he was in the battle on the heights of Flatbush, and re-

Conference of 1789 he was ordained an elder, and was appointed a presiding elder in the city of New York, where he continued five years. The latter part of his life he resided at Elizabethtown, traveling sometimes extensively, and preaching as often as his health would permit. He lived to be over ninety years of age, and died Aug. 9, 1838. He was a thorough patriot, remarkably diligent, frugal, and temperate; without extensive learning, he was a practical and oftentimes a powerful preacher.

Morris, Thomas A., D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born near Charleston, W. Va., April 29, 1794. His early training was in the Baptist church. When about nineteen years of age he was converted, and joined the Methodists. He was licensed to preach April 2, 1814, and, after having served as a supply on a circuit, was admitted into the Ohio Conference in September, 1816. From his hard labor and exposure in his early ministry his health suffered, and in 1820 he was placed in a supernumerary relation, but was sent to Lancaster, just constituted a station. Subsequently he was transferred to the Kentucky Conference, and in 1824 he was elected delegate to the General Conference. While performing the duties of presiding elder on the Green River district in 1826, he suffered from a shock of paralysis, and was afterwards transferred to the Ohio Conference. After having been stationed in Cincinnati for several years, he was, in 1833, appointed presiding elder of the Cincinnati district; and in April, 1834, was appointed to edit The Western Christian Advocate, the publication of which had been ordered by the General Conference. In 1836 he was elected one of the bishops of the M. E. Church, having been a delegate to each General Conference after his first election in 1824. From the time of his entering on the episcopal office he was diligent and faithful in the discharge of all its duties, traveling extensively through the circuit of the Annual Conferences, then embracing the whole of the settled part of the United States. He was senior bishop from the death of Bishop Wagh in 1858. For several years he was in impaired health, and was able to do but little official work, the General Conference having by vote relieved him from any regular duties. "To the charming simplicity, both of taste and manners, which eminently characterized him in all the walks of life, he added the graces of a genuine nature and beautiful Christian character. As a preacher, he was chaste, sincere, and many times greatly eloquent. As a bishop, he was considerate, careful, and judicious, and never forgetful of the most humble of his brethren in the administration of his high office." His last illness lasted a little over a week. He died Sept. 2, 1874. An excellent biography has been written by Dr. J. F. Marlay, of the Cincinnati Conference.

Morris, Ill. (pop. 3138), is an important village in Grundy County. In 1842 a class of 7 members was formed by Rev. John F. DeVore. The first church edifice was erected in 1852, and a new and larger building was dedicated in 1869. It is in the Rock River Conference, and has 290 members, 292 Sunday-school scholars, and $16,500 church property.

Morristown, N. J., is a beautiful village, the county seat of Morris County, and is in an elevated and healthful location. The present large and tasteful M. E. church was built in great part by the munificence of Hon. George T. Cobb, now deceased. It is in the Newark Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are 720 members, 545 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $185,000. (See cut on following page.)

Morrow, James, formerly a minister in Ireland, was born in Belfast, graduated at the Wesleyan College, Richmond, London, and entered the Irish Conference in 1865. A lover of American institutions for many years, he finally came to this country in 1872. After spending a few months in Montpelier, Vt., he was sent to take charge of Ames church, New Orleans. In this interesting and important charge he stayed three years, and was then transferred to the Philadelphia Conference and stationed in Grace church.

Morse, Joseph Leland, professor in the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, was born in Wilton, Me., May 4, 1837; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1859, and in the same year became teacher of Mathematics in Falley Seminary, N. Y. He joined the Maine Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1861. In 1862 he was appointed teacher of Latin and Greek in the Maine Wesleyan Seminary and Female College. He was a reserve delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of 1872.

Mosser, Henry R., Esq., born in York Co., Pa., early became a member of the M. E. Church, and an active supporter and worker. For about twenty years he was recording steward at New Cumberland, and for a number of years superintendent of the Sunday-school, and was for years president of the Cumberland Valley Camp-Meeting Association. He is an active business man, chiefly in the lumber trade. He was a lay delegate from the Central Pennsylvania Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Moulton, Horace, a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, and one of the greatest revivalists in the New England Conference, was born in Munson, Mass., Feb. 9, 1799, and died at Stafford Springs, Conn., Sept. 11, 1873. He united with the church in 1832. Soon after this he entered the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, after which he was received on trial in the New England Conference, in June, 1828. He sustained an effective relation thirty-one years, and a superannuated relation thirteen. He was especially successful as a revivalist, organizing many new appointments and circuits, and perhaps no man in the New England Conference did more for the planting of Methodism in various towns than he. He was especially pronounced against American slavery and intemperance. A short time before his departure he said, "The way is all lighted up, and myriads of angels are waiting to escort me over the river."

most profound scholars and erudite divines Methodism has ever reared. In 1858 he was appointed assistant tutor at Richmond, which office he held for ten years; he then became classical tutor. He is one of the staff on the revision of the New Testament. On the establishment of the high-class school at The Leys, Cambridge, he was appointed principal, and has received one (if not the only one) of the results of ripe scholarship of Methodist tutelage, in having the degree of M.A. conferred upon him by the Cambridge University.

Mount Allison Wesleyan College, Nova Scotia, is an institution under the patronage of the Methodist Church of Canada, which has power to appoint the board of trustees, who hold their office for four years, or from one General Conference to that of the next succeeding. The board of education has power to fill vacancies in the interim of General Conference. It comprises both a literary and a theological course. It employs six professors, and received from the board of education for the year 1876-77, $800 for the department of arts and $300 for its theological school.

Mount Pleasant, Iowa (pop. 4245), the capital of Henry County, situated on the Burlington and Mississippi River Railroad. Here also is located the Iowa Wesleyan University, under the control of the M. E. Church. It is first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1840, when Thomas M. Kirkpatrick was appointed to this circuit, though included previously in the Burlington circuit. Methodism has continued to prosper, and is now well established in this city. The African M. E. Church has a good congregation. It is in the Iowa Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Mount Union College, located at Mount Union, O., was commenced by Rev. O. N. Hartshorn, Oct. 20, 1846, as Mount Union Seminary. In its first week only 6 students were enrolled. Its object was to give a good education on the most economical plan to young people who desired to make themselves useful in the world. Its second year commenced with 25 students, but before the year closed it numbered 68. A normal department was introduced in 1850. In 1851 a two-story building, 45 by 60 feet, was erected on an elevated and beautiful site of two acres of ground; the funds for its erection being furnished by citizens, one-half in donations, and the other half to be refunded in tuition. Two other buildings were erected by Robert R. Hilton, the object being to furnish the scholars with good rooms and economical boarding. The first catalogue was published for the year 1851, and the accessibility of the institution was greatly improved by the construction of the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. It is said to occupy the highest ground in Ohio, overlooking the Mahoning River valley, and no intoxicating drinks are sold in the town. The main building for instruction was commenced in 1862, and completed in 1864, the dedicatory address being delivered by the Hon. S. P. Chase, LL.D. It is 116 feet long by 72 feet wide, and three stories high above the basement, having a large clock and bell-tower. There is also connected with it an observatory. The value of this building was estimated at $100,000. It has a hall capable of seating nearly 2000 persons.

In 1864 the building previously occupied for instruction was arranged with a view to furnish boarding facilities, and in 1866 a new, substantial, and excellent boarding-hall was erected, 135 feet long, 47 feet high, and four stories high above the basement. The cost was estimated at $50,000, exclusive of furniture. It was chartered a college in 1853, but was not fully organized until 1858, Dr. Hartshorn having then given to it the grounds, building, furniture, and cabinets which he had previously owned. About eight acres of additional ground were donated by W. A. Nixon and others in 1861, and 630 acres of land by T. C. Hartshorn, D.D., in 1864. In addition, subscriptions were taken for the erection of different buildings. Lewis Miller, Esq., of Akron, C. Miller, Esq., of Canton, and Jacob Miller, Esq., of Canton, O., each donated $25,000 for the purpose of endowing professorships. The college has thus far been supported chiefly by tuition-fees, and is under the patronage of the Pittsburgh, West Virginia, and Eastern Ohio Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The college course embraces various departments, as the academical, normal, musical, art, and business departments. The museum and cabinets are large and well arranged. The number of students in attendance during the year 1877 in all of the departments was 831, of whom, however, a large number were taking but partial studies. The number embraced in the four undergraduate classes was 288.

Mount Vernon, O. (pop. 4876), the capital of Knox County, on the Lake Erie division of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. Methodism was introduced into this place in 1812, by Enoch Ellis, who preached at times in the court-house and in a log cabin. The first M. E. church was built in 1831, on the hill where the Union school-house now stands. There is an African M. E. society here, with a church built in 1876, and also a Methodist Protestant society, with a church built at a recent date. It is in the North Ohio Conference, and the M. E. Church has 315 members, 140 Sunday-school scholars, and $14,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has 40 members. The Methodist Protestant Church has 240 members.

Methodist Churches to penitents, especially such as indicate by some public act their desire of salvation. Sometimes they are invited to kneel at the chancel; sometimes to occupy the front seats; sometimes simply to rise to make known to the congregation their wishes, that prayer may be offered in their behalf.

Mudge, Enoch, one of the pioneers of Methodism in New England, was born at Lynn, Mass., June 21, 1776. He was converted at fifteen, under the ministry of Jesse Lee; entered the Conference in 1793, but was obliged, on account of impaired health, to locate in 1799. He was twice chosen State Representative, and was active in the passage of the "Religious Freedom Bill." He again entered the itinerancy, and labored acceptably until he retired, in 1844. He died April 2, 1850. He was the first minister that Methodism produced in New England. He published a volume of sermons and a number of poetical articles.

Mudge, James, missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church to India and editor of the Lucknow Witness, was born in West Springfield, Mass., April 5, 1844, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1865. He was in the same year appointed teacher of Latin and Greek in Pennington Seminary and Female Collegiate Institute. He afterwards studied in the Boston Theological Seminary, joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1868, and was transferred to the India Conference in 1873. He has since been editor of the Lucknow Witness,—a weekly religious newspaper in the English language, published for general circulation at the American Methodist Episcopal mission press in Lucknow. He has prepared a "Handbook of Methodism," to consist of four parts, viz., "Handbook of Methodism," "History of Methodism," "Methodist Missions," "Doctrines of Methodism," which is in course of publication at Lucknow.

Mulfinger, J. M., a German Methodist minister, was born in Bavaria in 1808. He was a member of the Lutheran Church until, in 1809, under Dr. Nast's preaching, he experienced the forgiveness of sin. He suffered severely from persecution, but bore it with Christian patience. In 1844 he joined the Ohio Conference, and continued to labor successfully until his death, March 4, 1858. He was a man of feeble constitution, but of great diligence and energy, and was very useful. When his friends thought him to be dead, he suddenly raised his hands, and said, "Hear! hear! He is coming! Oh, how great is my joy!" and immediately departed.

Munger, Philip, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in South Brimfield, Mass., in 1780, and died Oct. 19, 1846. He entered the New England Conference in 1802, and after preaching thirty-four years, was supernumerary or superannuated for ten years. He was a studious, gifted, successful preacher, who wrote various articles in church literature, and was for many years a trustee of the Maine Conference Seminary.

Munsey, Thomas K., a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Giles Co., Va., Sept. 7, 1816, and died July 4, 1872. He entered the Holston Conference in 1840, having spent a year in Emory and Henry College. He labored effectively for six years, when he was compelled on account of impaired health to rest. He returned to the work again, but was obliged in 1867, when on the Athens district, to retire from active labor.

Murfreesborough, Tenn. (pop. 3502), the capital of Rutherford County, is situated on the Nashville and Chattanooga Railroad. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1827, and was connected with Lebanon. In 1845 it adhered to the Church South, and this was the only organization until the Civil War. After that time societies were organized by the M. E. Church and the African M. E. Church. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Murray, Grace, an active Christian worker, was born Jan. 23, 1715. Her maiden name was Norman. She was married in May, 1736, to Mr. Alexander Murray, who pursued a sea-faring life. She is said to have possessed "superior personal accomplishments; she had a voice peculiarly sweet and of great compass, and an imagination brilliant and lively in the highest degree." She and her husband were fond of gay and fashionable society and amusements, but her first-born child sickened and died. She was awakened under the ministry of Whitefield and Wesley, and was received by Charles Wesley, in 1740, into the Foundry society. She suffered intense agony of mind for some time; but after some months she received the consciousness of divine approbation. She says, "Whether 'I was in the body or out of the body,' I know not; but I saw what no human tongue can express, neither durst I utter, concerning the glory of the divine persons in the godhead. I was also made sensible that God the Father accepted me in his Son, as if I had not committed one sin, and that the righteousness of the Lord Jesus Christ was imputed to me for justification, with all that he had purchased by his life and death."

On his return from sea, her husband opposed her, and her friends endeavored to have her, under the plea of lunacy, confined in an asylum, but she bore the trial with calmness and was graciously sustained. In 1742 her husband was lost at sea in returning from Virginia. In London she had been appointed by some friends the leader of a band, and also a visitor of the sick, and, having dedicated herself to religious work, she was, on the opening of the Orphan House in New Castle, appointed its matron. There she met both bands and classes. She says, "I had full a hundred in classes, whom I met in two separate meetings, and a band for each day of the week. I likewise visited the sick and backsliders, which was my pleasant meat."

While thus engaged, however, she attended fully to her duties as matron. Subsequently, under Mr. Wesley's direction, she visited several counties of her native land, and also in the sister island. Her ready utterance, her knowledge of the things of God, and her affectionate and winning address caused her to be welcomed everywhere as an angel of light, though she never attempted to preach. Mr. Wesley greatly admired her, and had designed to make her an offer of marriage, but his brother Charles disapproved and encouraged her to accept the addresses of Mr. Bennett, one of Mr. Wesley's preachers. In a severe sickness he had been watched over at the Orphan House by Mrs. Murray; when in imminent danger, she offered earnest prayer in his behalf, and his recovery immediately followed. She was married October, 1749, in the presence of Charles Wesley and Mr. Whitefield. Mr. Bennett remained one of Mr. Wesley's preachers for three years, but embracing Calvinistic sentiments he renounced connection with Mr. Wesley, and settled as a dissenting minister until he died, in 1759. After his death she associated again with the Methodists, and acted as leader of two important classes, a counselor of the young, and a diligent visitor of the sick, and was recognized and honored as a "mother in Israel." She died in peaceful triumph Feb. 23, 1823.

Murphy, Francis, a distinguished temperance lecturer, was born in Ireland. After having suffered from intemperance, he was converted in Portland, Me., and united with the M. E. Church; has lectured extensively over the United States, and has been instrumental in the reclamation of an immense number of inebriates. He urges those who are rescued to embrace at once a religious life as their only safe guarantee against the force of temptation.

Murphy, Thomas C., D.D., a member of the Philadelphia Conference, united with the Conference in 1843. He has filled many of the most important stations, and has served as presiding elder. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1860 and 1868, and has been an active member on several church boards.

Murray, John Jackson, D.D., M.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, born in Hagerstown, Md., May 8, 1824, was converted in Cumberland, Md., in the autumn of 1839. He was licensed to preach Dec. 25, 1841, and began itinerating on Queen Anne's circuit, Maryland Annual Conference, April, 1842. He filled all the prominent appointments within the bounds of the Maryland Conference, and in 1873 was loaned to the Pittsburgh Conference, M. P. Church, and has continued to the present to serve the same church in this relation. He was president of the Maryland Annual Conference, president of the General Conference of the church held at Montgomery, Ala., May, 1867, editor of The Methodist Protestant, and fraternal messenger to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872. He was also a representative in the General Conferences of the Methodist Protestant Church, 1858, 1862, 1866, 1870, and 1874, and a delegate to the General Convention in May, 1877. He received the degree of Doctor of Medicine from Washington University, Baltimore, Md., March, 1850.

Muscatine, Iowa (pop. 6718), is the capital of Muscatine County, on the Mississippi River. It is first mentioned in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1849, though there had been occasional preaching before that time, probably as early as 1842, when it was connected with the Cedar circuit. In 1850 Muscatine mission, embracing the surrounding country, reported 228 members. It is in the Iowa Conference, and has 326 members, 400 Sunday-school scholars, and $35,000 church property. (See cut on following page.) The African M. E. Church has 77 members, 199 Sunday-school scholars, and $7000 church property.

Music.—The early Methodists were exceedingly fond of music, especially such sweet and simple strains as were suited for congregational worship. Mr. Wesley, though not a cultivated musician, was a good singer, and selected with great taste music adapted to the hymns composed by his brother and himself. He exhorted the whole congregation to sing spiritedly. Instruments of music were not used in the Methodist churches until within the last fifty years; and but seldom until within the last twenty-five. The larger churches are now very generally furnished with organs, and the Sunday-schools with smaller organs or melodeons. Sunday-school music has been extensively cultivated by the friends of the church; and among the best composers of music for the Sunday-school and prayer-meeting rank the names of Philip Phillips, Ira D. Sankey, Eben Tourjee, Wm. G. Fischer, and others, who are widely known through their publications.

Muskegon, Mich. (pop. 6002), the capital of Muskegon County, and on Muskegon Lake. Methodist services were introduced here about 1855-56. The first Methodist church was dedicated in 1857. It is in the Michigan Conference, and has 156 members, 135 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

FIRST METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, MUSCATINE, IOWA.

Muskingum Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces all that part of the State of Ohio not embraced in the Ohio and Pittsburgh districts." It reported, in 1877, 64 itinerant and 57 unstationed ministers, 9579 members, 130 churches and 8 parsonages, valued at $161,157.

Mutual Improvement Societies (English Wesleyan).—In many circuits Mutual Improvement

Societies have been formed, which, by meetings for prayer, friendly conversations, and lectures on popular subjects, are endeavoring to secure the best interests of young men, and to assist them in the formation of right habits and correct pursuits. A central agency is about to be formed, with branches in different circuits, and it is expected that the whole will be placed under Conference supervision.

Nashua, N. H. (pop. 10,543), situated at the junction of the Merrimack and Nashua Rivers, is the site of large manufacturing companies. It is in a region early visited by the pioneer preachers, but it first appears on the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1834. Previously it had been connected with surrounding towns, which had given name to the charge. A. P. Brigham was pastor, who reported, in 1835, 70 members. In 1836 the work had increased to 125 members, and in 1857 there were two stations. It is in the New Hampshire Con-

Nashville, Tenn. (pop. 25,865), is the capital of the State, situated on the Cumberland River. It is the seat of the Vanderbilt University, the most flourishing institution of the M. E. Church South, and of the Central Tennessee College, established for the education of the colored youth, under the care of the M. E. Church. It was early visited by the Methodist preachers. In 1787, Benjamin Ogden was appointed missionary to the Cumberland circuit, which then embraced the whole region around Nashville and Carlton. Among the first fruits of Methodism were Isaac Lindsay, William McElroy, and Lewis Graham. The first Methodist church edifice was built of stone, in 1789 or 1790, and stood near the present public square. The first church completed on the north side of the Cumberland River was four miles north of Nashville, called "Hooper's Chapel." In 1801, William McKendree was presiding elder, and in 1802 reports from Nashville and Red River circuit show 742 white and 106 colored members. That year a separate work, called Nashville, was formed, which reported the following year 637 white and 87 colored members. The growth of Methodism surpassed that of the population, and the Nashville Christian Advocate was published several years before the separation of the church. In 1845, in common with the State of Tennessee, it united with the Southern Church, and so remained until during the Civil War. Since that period other branches of Methodism have been established. The Church South, however, has a very large membership and wealth, and has its publishing house in this place. (See out of McKendree church on following page.) Natchez, Miss. (pop. 9057), is the capital of Adams County, situated on the Mississippi River. As early as 1800 Methodist ministers had visited this section of country, and 60 members were reported from Natchez territory, under the ministration of Tobias Gibson. He labored alone in that entire district until, in 1803, Moses Floyd was sent as his assistant, and the report was 87 members. In 1817 the Mississippi Conference was formed, and there were reported from Natchez and Claiborne circuit 259 white and 116 colored members. It adhered to the South in 1845. Since the close of the Civil War the M. E. Church has organized a small colored congregation, consisting of only 16 members. The M. E. Church South reports 195.

National Publishing Association, The, for the promotion of holiness, was organized for the purpose of promoting the sale and circulation of literature relating to the subject of Christian holiness, and has been operating for about six years. It has published a number of tracts and books upon this subject. It also publishes two periodicals.—one an eight-page weekly, and known by the title of The Christian Standard and Home Journal, J. S. Inskip, editor; the other is a monthly, called The Advocate of Holiness, Rev. W. McDonald, editor. Hon. W. C. De Pauw, of Indiana, is the president, and Rev. J. E. Searles is the secretary of the board of directors. The body is incorporated according to the laws of Pennsylvania. The annual meeting is held in November of each year. The publications of this organization are strictly confined to the subject of "entire sanctification."

National Repository, The, a monthly magazine devoted to general and religious literature, is the successor of The Ladies' Repository, as authorized by the General Conference of the M. E. Church in 1876. The agents of the Western Book Concern, the editor of The Ladies' Repository, and the Western section of the general book committee, together with five others of thorough literary culture to be appointed by the bishops, were authorized to change the name or modify the scope and style of The Ladies' Repository as they might deem best. The committee met and adopted the name of The National Repository, and changed the scope of the magazine. It is now illustrated, and adapted to the wants of the general reader. Rev. Daniel Curry, D.D., was elected editor in 1876. It is published at Cincinnati, by Hitchcock & Walden.

Naylor, William, a Wesleyan minister in England, labored for sixty years with zeal and diligence. His preaching was acceptable and useful. He ever sought the promised influence of the Divine Spirit to render his labors successful; and very many souls will be "his joy and crown of rejoicing" in the day of the Lord. He died in 1868, aged eighty-six.

oil Bluffs. In 1854, in the Iowa Conference, we find the Nebraska and Kansas mission district, W. H. Goode being presiding elder. In 1855 it reported to the Missouri Conference. In 1860 there were 22 preachers, 1324 members, 908 Sunday-school scholars, 4 churches, valued at $7700, and 1 parsonage, valued at $600. The first Methodist Conference was held in 1861. The statistics of the M. E. Church for 1876 show 88 preachers, 10,393 members, 8984 Sunday-school scholars, 51 churches, valued at $114,824, 38 parsonages, valued at $2300. There are also a few Methodist Protestant and African M. E. churches. There are also some churches in connection with the Southwest German Conference. The denominational statistics, as published in the United States census for 1876, are as follows :

Nebraska City, Neb. (pop. 6050), the capital of Otoe County, is situated on the Missouri River. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1855, and then as a mission connected with Nebraska mission district of the Iowa Conference, with W. H. Goode as presiding elder. In 1856 it was connected with the Kansas and Nebraska Conference, and reported 45 members. The next year the Conference was held in this city, when it had 76 members. In 1861 the first session of the Nebraska Conference was held in this city. In 1876 it contained 154 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

Nebraska Conference, M. E. Church.—The Territory of Nebraska was from 1856 to 1860 connected with the Kansas and Nebraska Conference. Then it was organized as the Nebraska Conference, embracing the Territory of Nebraska. This Conference held its first session at Nebraska City, April 4, 1861, Bishop Morris presiding. It embraced two districts, Omaha and Nebraska City, and the report was 22 preachers, 1324 members, 4 churches, valued at $7700, 1 parsonage, valued at $600. This included all the Methodism in the State at that time. The State is now divided into five presiding-elder districts. The latest statistics are: 88 preachers, 10,393 members, 8984 Sunday-school scholars, 51 churches, valued at $114,825, 38 parsonages, valued at $24,300, $669 for missions.

Nebraska Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces the State of Nebraska." Its reported statistics are, 8 ministers, 378 members, and $500 church property.

Neill, James, a native of Ireland, was converted in his youth, and entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1836. After preaching for several years he was seized with hemorrhage of the lungs, and was obliged to take a supernumerary relation, and afterwards to commence business. He has been largely engaged in the mining and sale of anthracite coal; but at the same time has preached as often as his health would permit. He was instrumental in assisting to organize the Central, Spring Garden, and Grace Methodist Episcopal churches, in the city of Philadelphia, where he resides.

Nelles, S. S., D.D., LL.D., president of Victoria College, Canada, was born near Brantford, Canada, in 1823. At the age of sixteen he attended Lewiston Academy, in New York, where he was under the tuition of the American poet, John G. Saxe. Subsequently he attended Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, where he devoted his time largely to science. When Victoria College, at Cobourg, was opened, in 1842, as a university, he was one of the first matriculated students under Dr. Ryerson. After two years spent at Victoria College, and a year at home, he attended the Wesleyan University, Conn., where he graduated in 1846. After teaching for a year he entered the ministry of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, in June, 1847. After filling several important appointments he was elected, in 1850, to the presidency of Victoria College, the position which he still holds. He was a delegate to represent the Canadian Conference at the Methodist General Conference in Philadelphia in 1864, at the New Brunswick Conference in 1866, and at the English Wesleyan Conference in 1873.

Nelson, John, was one of Mr. Wesley's earliest and ablest assistants among his lay preachers. He was the chief founder of Methodism in Yorkshire, where the church has remained strong to this day. He was early apprenticed to a stone-mason, a trade at which he worked the greater part of his life. He had long been perplexed with religious thoughts and longings. He was strictly moral, and had great personal courage. In 1711 he heard Mr. Wesley at Moorfields, was converted under his ministry, and immediately began to exhort his comrades. He refused to work on the Sabbath when urged by his employer, although at the risk of dismissal, and commenced to hold meetings in his own house, praying with and exhorting his neighbors. The result was a wonderful reform, which spread all through the neighborhood, and he gained immense power over the common people. He was successful in spreading Methodism, not only in Yorkshire, but in Cornwall, Lincolnshire, Lancashire, and other counties. He was greatly persecuted. "His house at Bristol was pulled down; at Nottingham squibs were thrown in his face; at Grimby the rector headed a mob to the beat of the town drum, and, after supplying them with beer, called upon them to 'fight for the church.' Fighting for the church meant the demolition of the house in which Nelson was living, and its windows were forthwith pulled down and the furniture destroyed." But Nelson's preaching conquered the mob,—the drummer who had been headed by the rector was among the converts next day. The clergy, however, of the Church of England, determining to destroy his influence, caused him to be impressed into the army as a vagrant, and, though he protested that the charge was untrue, he was taken and made a soldier. He was faithful to his calling, and preached to his comrades in the army. He died in 1744.

Nelson, John, a venerable member of the Irish Conference just entered into rest. He was baptized by the Rev. John Wesley ninety years ago, on the occasion of his only visit to Lisbellaw, County Fermanagh. He was a devoted, successful, and well-beloved minister, a true friend, and a holy man. He died in the ninety-second year of his age and the sixty-eighth of his ministry.

REV. REUBEN NELSON, D.D.

New York, was born at Andes, N. Y., Dec. 13, 1818. His academic studies were pursued at Hartwick Seminary. He received his degree of Master of Arts at Union College, and that of Doctor of Divinity at Dickinson College. He was converted at the age of fifteen, was licensed to exhort at the age of seventeen, and a year later became a local preacher. He entered the itinerant ministry in the Oneida Annual Conference in 1838. During his pastoral work he was twice appointed presiding elder of Wyoming district. He was early designated for the work of Christian education, and was for a time principal of Otsego Academy, at Cooperstown, N. Y. In 1844 he founded the Wyoming Conference Seminary, at Kingston, Pa., and became its first principal, a position which he continued to hold (with the exception of a single year in the presiding eldership) for twenty-eight years. For several successive years he held the post of secretary of the Wyoming Conference, which body he also represented in the General Conference for the last five successive quadrennial sessions. In each case he was elected at the head of his Conference delegation. At the General Conference at Baltimore, in 1876, he was elected chairman of the standing committee on episcopacy. At the General Conference in May, 1872, Dr. Nelson was elected to the responsible post of book agent at New York, and with his associate, J. M. Phillips, Esq., took charge of the great publishing interests of the Methodist Book Concern. He was also elected treasurer of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1876 he was unanimously re-elected to both of these important trusts, which he now holds.

Nesbit, Samuel H., D.D., was received on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference, M. E. Church, June, 1847, his first appointment being New Salem circuit. He continued in the itinerant work until 1853, when he became principal of Wellsburgh Female Seminary, a position which he held for three years. He then returned to the regular pastorate. During 1857-58 he was principal of Richmand College, and in 1860 was elected editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, where he remained until 1872. He has since been presiding elder of Canton, Alleghany, and Washington districts. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1864, 1868, 1872, and 1876.

Nestor, George, of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born March 19, 1818, near Nestorville, Randolph Co., Va.; converted December, 1835; and licensed to preach October, 1843, in the Methodist Protestant Church. He joined the Pittsburgh Conference of the M. P. Church, September, 1844, and filled a number of prominent appointments in both the Pittsburgh and West Virginia Conferences. In the latter, he was elected and served as president of the Conference for three several terms. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1866, 1870, and 1874, and was also a member elect of the General Convention in May, 1877.

Nevada (pop. 42,491) was received from Mexico in 1848. In size it ranks third in the Union, containing about 112,090 square miles. It was admitted as a State in 1864. Its early inhabitants were Indians and Mexicans. It contains some very valuable mines, but much of the territory is sterile. Methodism was introduced from California about 1859, and services were held in Carson and Virginia Cities. In 1861 there were reported 75 members, 100 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property, and Nevada district was organized with N. R. Peck as presiding elder. Ten appointments were placed upon the minutes, of which only one received a regularly-appointed pastor. In 1864 a Nevada Conference was organized; separated from California on account of the great distance and the difficulty that then existed of crossing the Sierra Nevada Mountains. It held its first session in 1865, and reported 11 traveling and 11 local preachers, 293 members, 803 Sunday-school scholars, 4 churches, valued at $42,000, and 5 parsonages, valued at $8100. In 1876 the minutes reported 15 traveling and 11 local preachers, 686 members, 1125 Sunday-school scholars, 12 churches, valued at $66,500, and 14 parsonages, valued at $17,600. There are also a few members of the M. E. Church South. Owing to the changing character of the population the growth of the church has not been rapid. The denominational statistics, as reported in the census for 1870, are as follows:

Organizations. Edifices. Sittings. Ch. Property.
All denominations.....	32	19	8000	$212,000
Episcopal.....	5	3	1100	30,000

Nevada Conference, M. E. Church, includes "Nevada and so much of California as lies east of the west summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains." It was organized in 1864, and was separated from the California Conference, though having but few preachers and a small membership, because of the great difficulty of reaching it across the Sierra Nevada Mountains. Its statistics as reported in 1876 are: 15 ministers, 686 members, 1125 Sunday-school scholars, 12 churches, valued at $66,500, and 14 parsonages, valued at $17,600.

New, Charles, a missionary of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born in London, Jan. 25, 1840. He was converted at sixteen years of age, and at nineteen entered the itinerant ministry. After three years of service he consented to go as missionary to the mission station at Ribe, in Eastern Africa. After his arrangements were made news arrived of the death of his brother in Sierra Leone, and that another missionary was believed to be in a dying condition. He only replied, "The greater need I should go there quickly." He sailed from Northampton Dec. 12, 1862; reached Zanzibar April 6, 1863; was detained at Mombassa, and did not reach Ribe until Sept. 1, 1863. There, in conjunction with Mr. Wakefield, he labored for eight years amidst great difficulties. Doubting the suitability of Ribe as a mission station, he made various explorations, in one of which he ascended the summit of Kilima-jara, and ascertained that the whiteness on its summit was owing to snow, which scientific men had supposed could not exist at that elevation in equatorial Africa. In the mean time he was requested by the Geographical Society to join the expedition in search of Livingstone, and the missionary committee gave him the required permission; but before setting out the intelligence arrived that the heroic Livingstone had been found. He returned to England, where he remained a year and a half, attending missionary meetings, and publishing a volume entitled "Life, Wanderings, and Labors in Eastern Africa." Returning, he desired to establish a mission at Chaga, but he was plundered and insulted by the chief, and, dispirited, left the place for Ribe. He died upon the way, and his body was brought to the church mission station, at Rabai, on Feb. 14, 1875.

New, Joseph, a missionary of the United Methodist Free Churches in England, was born in London, Dec. 20, 1835. He was graduated in his fifteenth year, and soon became superintendent of the Sunday-school and class-leader. In 1856 he became a circuit minister among the Wesleyan Reformers. After two years he joined the United Methodist Free Churches, and was sent as its first missionary to Sierra Leone. He had not been long in Sierra Leone when a dreadful epidemic broke out. Mr. New and his wife, at the urgent entreaty of friends, sailed for Madeira, but the authorities would not permit any one to land, and they returned to England. On the subsidence of the epidemic they returned to Sierra Leone. His health became impaired, and while waiting on a colleague whose life was despaired of, he was seized with a severe illness, and died the next morning, Aug. 6, 1862.

New Albany, Ind. (pop. 15,396), the county seat of Floyd County, is situated on the Ohio River, immediately below the falls. Methodism was introduced by John Shrader in 1818. When on Salt River circuit he formed a class of some seven or eight members, and preached and administered the Lord's Supper in a tavern in this town. From that time the church has regularly increased. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1830, when Calvin Ruter was appointed pastor. In 1831 it reported as a station 282 members. In 1857 it contained 5 stations, having an aggregate of 1014 members, 475 Sunday-school scholars, and $40,400 church property. A female seminary was founded by the Conference in 1846, which, after some years of struggling, was cared for by Mr. De Pauw, and it now properly bears his name. It has been of great service to Methodism in South Indiana. This city is in the Indiana Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Newark, N. J. (pop. 105,059), the largest city in the State, is noted for its various manufactures. It was settled in 1666-67 by colonists from Connecticut, who passed a law that no one should hold an office or even vote who was not a member of the Congregational Church. A college was founded, which, in 1756, was removed to Princeton. Methodist services were introduced as early as 1786. They were held only occasionally, and the first class was not formed until 1806. The first church was erected in 1809, and was enlarged in 1828. The present edifice on Halsey Street was erected in 1851. The Franklin Street church was the second built, and was erected in 1831, which was followed by Clinton Street, in 1843. St. Paul's church was organized in 1853, and the chapel was opened at the close of that year. The corner-stone was laid October, 1854, and dedicated Feb. 22, 1856. It was erected at a cost for building and grounds of $80,000, and is one of the best and most commodious churches in the country, seating 1260 persons in the pews. (See cut on following page.) A handsome parsonage was built on the lot adjoining. The first M. E. church in East Newark was organized in 1854, and rebuilt in 1873; since which time the church has grown with the growth of the city, and a large number of buildings have been erected. The German Methodists have a strong society, the Methodist Protestants have a church, and the Free Methodists a small organization. The African Bethel and the African Zion have also congregations. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Newark Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1856, and included "that part of the State of New Jersey not included in the New Jersey Conference, Staten Island, and so much of the States of New York and Pennsylvania as was then included in the Paterson and Newton districts." No change has been made in its boundaries, except that Jersey City district is inserted in the place of Paterson district. It held its first separate session in 1858, having held its session in 1857 with the New Jersey Conference. In 1858 it reported 132 traveling and 103 local preachers, 22,421 members, 17,377 Sunday-school scholars, 176 churches, valued at $689,800, and 54 parsonages, valued at $92,550. The statistics in 1876 were: 205 traveling and 176 local preachers, 40,987 members, 36,990 Sunday-school scholars, 258 churches, valued at $2,727,350, and 109 parsonages, valued at $492,400.

Newark, O. (pop. 6698), the capital of Licking County, is an enterprising and flourishing city. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1833, as a circuit, with J. W. Gilbert and J. M. Goshorn as pastors. It then contained 664 members. It did not become a station for several years. The first edifice was dedicated in 1834, costing $1500. The present edifice was dedicated in 1874, costing $40,000. The German and African M. E. Churches have small congregations. This city is in the Ohio Conference, and the following are the statistics:

New Bedford, Mass. (pop. 21,320), is situated on Buzzard's Bay, 55 miles southeast from Boston. The first Methodist sermon preached in this place was by Jesse Lee, Jan. 30, 1795. He says, "It was a good many years afterwards before we had a society formed in that place." It was connected with the Warren circuit for many years, that being the first circuit organized in the State of Rhode Island. It first appears by name on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1807, with Epaphras Kibby as pastor, with 30 members. The church increased until, in 1857, it contained 5 stations, having an aggregate of 715 members, 509 Sunday-school scholars, and $25,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has a strong congregation here. It is in the Providence Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Newbern, N. C. (pop. 5849), the capital of Craven County, situated on the Neuse River, was very early visited by Methodist pioneers. Bishop Asbury preached in it as early as 1785; at that time there was a small society. In 1802 he visited it, and says, "Newbern is a trading, growing town. There are seven hundred or a thousand houses already built, and the number is yearly increased." The population was then between 3000 and 4000. He made arrangements for preaching each Sabbath. A collection of about $60 was taken to complete the church. The Africans were about beginning a church, and Asbury was much encouraged. The most eminent people of the place attended Methodist services. This church was enlarged in 1804, and $600 were raised for the purpose during the visit of Bishop Asbury. A Conference was held here in 1807, and another in 1813. This charge, with the North Carolina Conference, adhered to the M. E. Church South in 1845. It is in the North Carolina Conference, and the African M. E. Church has 106 members, 75 Sunday-school scholars, and $500 church property. The Church South has 245 members.

New Brighton, Pa., is a flourishing village on the Beaver River, about 28 miles from Pittsburgh.

FIRST METHODIST PROTESTANT CHURCH,
NEW BRIGHTON, PA.

It contains several churches, among which is a handsome M. E. church, and also a neat and commodious Methodist Protestant church, an illustration of which is here given.

New Brunswick, N. J. (pop. 15,058), the capital of Middlesex County, on the New Jersey Railroad, was settled about the close of the seventeenth century. Bishop Asbury visited the place as early as 1797, and "rejoiced that the preacher from Elizabeth had already begun a good work here." In 1798 he drew up a subscription to purchase a house of worship. The name does not appear upon the minutes of the church until 1811, when Joseph Totten was appointed to that circuit. The society appears to have been organized and the first church built during that year. The progress, however, was very slow, as New Brunswick and Trenton were united in one circuit the following year. In 1802, New Brunswick circuit reported 220 white and 40 colored members. It did not become a separate appointment until 1818, when Thomas Smith was appointed as preacher. Subsequently it became a station, and in 1821 reported 21 members, when Charles Pitman was appointed pastor. From that time Methodism has increased more rapidly. The church, which was built in 1811, was destroyed by a tornado in 1835, and rebuilt in 1836 on the same ground. The present Liberty Street church, which succeeded it, was built in 1876. The Protestant Methodist church was built in 1837, but ceased to exist in 1845. An African Methodist church is in a fair condition. The following are the statistics for 1876:

New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island Conference is one of the six Conferences into which the Methodist Church of Canada is divided, and embraces the territories from which it receives its name. Methodism was introduced into New Brunswick by a few Methodists from New York, who accompanied the loyalists at the close of the Revolutionary War, and who settled on the banks of the river St. John. The first minister stationed was Rev. Abraham Bishop, under whose ministry a society was formed. He was afterwards removed by Dr. Coke to Granada, to preach in French to the negroes in that island. At St. Stephen's, near the border of Maine, a solitary brother, named McCill, had been toiling, but who did not see a Methodist preacher until 1791, after which period the work was carried on under the superintendence of William Black, who had been ordained in 1791, by Bishop Coke. The severity of the climate and the toils of the work, and probably a lack of sympathy with the inhabitants on the question of government, led to the retirement of nearly all the preachers who came from the United States. In 1800 scarcely one remained, and only four or five preachers were at that time laboring in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island. In the latter Province Benjamin Chapel had made great effort to secure assistance, and a society was formed at Charlestown, the capital, and at Tryon. Mr. Black, convinced that ministerial help must be sought from Great Britain, attended the Conference in 1800, and returned with four young men, of whom William Bennett and Joshua Marsden became successful laborers. The work from this period assumed more of an English Wesleyan aspect, and the last minister ordained by Bishop Asbury for the provincial work was in 1810. Two very devoted laymen—Messrs. Davison and Arard—watched over the individual societies in Prince Edward Island as far as possible, of whom, the first fell a victim to his earnest labors. A number of emigrants from the island of Guernsey came early in the century, and these and the former Methodists welcomed a minister, who was sent by Dr. Coke, in 1807. The number of missionaries sent out from Great Britain increased until 1817, when the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society having been formed, a larger number of laborers came to the work. For years it was carried on chiefly by English ministers, very few native ministers having been raised up; but in 1835 the native ministers began to increase, and in 1865 they were the majority of the laborers. In 1825 the circuits in New Brunswick, with several of those in Nova Scotia near the former Province, were formed into a district, called the New Brunswick district; and in 1851 the circuits on Prince Edward Island, with a small part of Nova Scotia, were constituted a separate district. In 1851 Bermuda was attached to the British-American work. In 1855, Dr. Beecham was sent from England to form the several districts in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Newfoundland into one Conference, which became known as that of Eastern British America. Methodism does not occupy in New Brunswick more than a third- or fourth-rate position, as the lack of ministers in early days deprived it of many opportunities. It has recently gained by emigration from the mother-country, and many excellent Irish Methodists have found their way to the Province. The value of connectional property in St. John's, N. B., is estimated at $124,000; in Fredericton, N. B., $32,000; in Maryville and Fredericton, $74,000; in Charlotte-town, Prince Edward Island, $73,000. The statistics reported in 1877 are as follows: ministers, 96; members, 7717; Sunday-school scholars, 8796.

Newburg, N. Y. (pop. 17,014), is the capital of Orange County, and is situated on the Hudson River. It was Washington's headquarters during a part of the Revolutionary War. It is mentioned as the head of a circuit in the minutes of the church for 1789. It did not become a station until about 1823, when William Jewett was appointed to Newburg Village, then reporting 88 members. Since that period Methodism has increased with the growth of the population, and now has a very fair standing in the city. The German Methodists have a few members, but no church. It is in the New York Conference, and reports for 1876:

Newburyport, Mass. (pop. 12,595), was settled about 1635, and it is said the first tea destroyed by the Americans was burnt in this place. George Whitefield died while on a visit here, Sept. 30, 1770, and his remains were buried under the pulpit of the First Presbyterian church. The first Methodist sermon after Whitefield's time was preached by Jesse Lee, July 15, 1790. He had been recommended to call on Rev. Mr. Murray, the pastor of the church, but was very coolly received, the pastor informing him that he had heard that a Methodist preacher had held meetings in four different places in one day, and that this was a violation of the rules of the standing order. He succeeded, however in gaining permission to preach in the court-house at a specified time, and, on returning, an effort was made to prevent him, but he succeeded in preaching both that day and the next morning. Bishop Ashbury visited the place in June, 1802, and makes the laconic note, "As in Boston, everything thrives but religion." It was connected for a time with the surrounding points, and first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1829. In 1857 there were two stations, which, in 1876, reported:

New Castle, Pa. (pop. 6164), is the capital of Lawrence County, in Western Pennsylvania. Methodist services were introduced about 1804. The first meetings were held about four miles north of the city, by William Richard, an exhorter. The same year preaching was introduced into New Castle, and in 1810 a class consisting of seven persons was formed by James Watts, then on the Shenandoah circuit. In 1815 the first M. E. church, a log building, was erected. It was succeeded in 1836 by a frame building, and this in turn has given place to a substantial brick edifice. New Castle first appears as a distinct appointment in the minutes of the church for 1821, with S. R. Brockunier as pastor. In 1847 a society near the city (now in the city) was organized, and in 1850 a church was built. A second M. E. church was organized from the first church in 1874, and a building erected in 1875. The African M. E. Zion church was built in 1849, and rebuilt in 1865. The Primitive Methodists built a church in 1869. It is in the Erie Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Newcastle-upon-Tyne, (pop. 128,443) is an old city in the northern part of England. The Romans occupied a stationary camp at this place, and Robert of Normandy, a son of William the Conqueror, built a castle which gave to the place its name. It is widely known for its exports of coal and lead. It was visited by Mr. Wesley as early as 1742, who observes: "So much drunkenness, cursing, and swearing, even from the mouths of little children, do I never remember to have seen and heard before." On the Sabbath morning he took "a position in the poorest and most contempt-

New Educational Institution is located in Dublin, Ireland. The building is in course of erection, and will be completed in January, 1879. It is to take the place of the present Wesleyan Connectional School, and is designed to accommodate 100 boarders and 200 day-pupils, and will contain commoible part of the town, and commenced public worship: preaching again in the evening." After a few visits a small society was formed. Before the close of the year he purchased land for the erection of an Orphan House (which see). There are now reported two large districts, embracing 2100 members, and employing some 10 ministers.

Newcomb, George, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Quincy, Mass., Nov. 8, 1814. For several years he engaged in teaching. In 1856 he became a local preacher, and in 1864 went to Beaufort, S. C., to labor among the freedmen. In 1867 he joined the South Carolina Conference. After laboring successfully in organizing societies on different parts of the Beaufort circuit, in 1870 he was appointed presiding elder of St. John's district, Fla. He commenced his work with great earnestness, traveling extensively, and preaching wherever he went, but his health becoming impaired, he started north, and at Beaufort, S. C., was seized with yellow fever, and died March 2, 1871. "He occupied a large place in the hearts of all who knew him."

dious apartments for the governor and chaplain and resident masters. The entire cost, including purchase of site, etc., is estimated at $70,000. It will be maintained as the present school, which was established in 1845, on a thoroughly Protestant and scriptural basis, as a first-class collegiate and commercial institute. The sons of ministers and of others of limited means will be admitted on very favorable terms. And it is hoped by means of the two Methodist institutions—i.e., the Methodist College, Belfast, and the one in Dublin, of which the above is a sketch—that the cause of education in Ireland will be greatly advanced. Rev. Robert Hazleton was appointed by the Irish Conference agent of the college, and has visited the United States in its interests. His efficient services have largely contributed to the success of the undertaking.

Newell, Ebenezer Francis, an early Methodist preacher, was born in Bromfield, Mass., Sept. 1, 1775, and entered the New England Conference in 1807. After filling various appointments until 1825, he was employed as Conference missionary

In behalf of Maine Wesleyan Seminary. Resuming work again in 1826, he labored diligently until he was superannuated, in 1844, and died March 8, 1867, at Johnsville, S. C.

New England Conference, African M. E. Church, includes the States of Connecticut, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire, and Maine. At its session in 1876 it stationed 14 preachers, and reported 29 local preachers, 1576 members, 796 Sunday-school scholars, and 13 churches, valued at $75,500.

New England Conference, M. E. Church.—At the General Conference of 1796 six Annual Conferences occupied the entire area of the church. The first was New England Conference, under the direction of which were "the affairs of our church in New England and all that part of the State of New York which lies on the east side of Hudson's River; provided that, if the bishops see it necessary, a Conference may be held in the Province of Maine." Its first session was held at Wilbraham, Mass., Sept. 19, 1797. Bishop Asbury being unable to be present, Jesse Lee presided, and says, "The business was conducted to the satisfaction of the preachers, and peace and love dwelt among us. At the close of the Conference the preachers gave me a certificate, signifying their approbation of a proposed plan for me to travel with the bishop, and to fill up his appointments when he could not be present." In 1800 the bounds were changed so as to "include the district of Maine and all the circuits eastward and northward from the bounds of the New York Conference." In 1812 it included part of Vermont and all the New England States east of the Connecticut River. In 1816 it included also Lower Canada east of Lake Magog. The boundaries were gradually contracted until at present it includes "all of Massachusetts east of the Green Mountains not included in the New Hampshire and Providence Conferences." It originally embraced much of the territory now contained in the New York East, Providence, Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire Conferences. In 1798 two Conferences were held in the New England States, one at Readfield, in Maine, the other in Granville, Mass. Bishop Asbury says of the last Conference, "Fifty preachers of different descriptions were present: ten were admitted on probation. We had many weighty and deliberate conversations on interesting subjects in much plainness and moderation." In 1802 New England Conference was divided into two districts, and included 21 charges, reporting 2927 white and 14 colored members. From its earliest history New England Conference has enjoyed the services of devoted and active leaders, who have been instrumental in extending its influence and power. Zion's Herald, published in Boston, preceded the establishment of The Christian Advocate of New York, and has been of great service to the church in New England. Wilbraham Academy, Mass., is the oldest institution established by the church, which still exists, and has sent forth from its halls many active ministers and honored professional men. Boston University, with its theological school, is now a centre of great power. The statistics of the Conference in 1876 are 256 traveling and 184 local preachers, 30,940 members, 32,722 Sunday-school scholars, 193 churches, valued at $3,387,800, and 96 parsonages, valued at $360,700.

New Foundland is one of the Conferences of the Methodist Church in Canada. Services were introduced from Nova Scotia and from New Brunswick, and it was for a number of years under the general superintendence of William Black. In 1815 the circuits in New Foundland were formed into a separate district. In 1855, with New Brunswick and part of Nova Scotia, it was placed in the Eastern British American Conference, the understanding being that New Foundland and Bermuda were to have special claims upon the financial aid of the missionary committee, who for several years sent their only missionaries to those places. The report of 1877 shows 49 ministers, 7075 members, and 5829 Sunday-school scholars.

In the first General Conference, after the union was effected, which formed the Methodist Church of Canada, New Foundland was represented by 2 ministers and 2 laymen. Its boundaries were defined so as to "embrace New Foundland, Labrador, and the Islands contiguous." In Labrador a mission is maintained during the summer for the fishermen on the coast.

New Guinea—Language.—The Papuan language is diversified with many dialects, some of which are rich in synonyms, or different terms for the same thing, but all are poor in abstract terms. But little is known of them. The first attempt to compile a grammar of the language has been made in Dr. A. B. Meyer's (German) treatise, Ueber die Mafoor'sche und einige andere Papua-Sprachen auf Neu Guinea. A few short vocabularies exist of some of the dialects.

New Guinea, New Britain, New Ireland, and the Duke of York Islands, Missions in.—The island of Papua, or New Guinea, is, after Australia (and perhaps Borneo), the largest island in the world. It lies in the South Pacific Ocean, north of Australia, between latitude 0° 6' and 10° 45' south, and longitude 130° 45' and 151° E., is 1500 miles long and about 400 miles wide at its greatest breadth, and has an area estimated at from 260,000 to 300,000 square miles. Less is known of it than of any other region of equal extent on the earth. The inhabitants are of a distinct race, known as the Papuan, have a facial expression like that of Europeans, and are remarkable for their crisp hair, which is allowed to grow very long, is carefully dressed, and gives their heads a striking appearance. Travelers express a high opinion of their capabilities, and consider them superior to the Malays. They are at present, however, low in civilization. New Ireland, New Britain, and the Duke of York Islands are the names given to several smaller islands and groups of islands lying northeast of New Guinea, and near to it. The inhabitants of New Britain are of a negro race and very dark: those of New Ireland are of the Australian race, and their villages are said to be very neat.

In 1874 the Rev. George Brown, who had labored for several years as a Wesleyan missionary in Samoa, laid before the Mission Board at Sydney, in Australia, a plan for opening missions in these islands. He proposed to secure volunteers from among the catechists in Fiji, and take them to suitable openings in New Ireland and New Britain, whence he hoped, as the way should be opened, to secure a footing on the island of New Guinea. This extensive mission was to be worked by native agency, under the direction of an experienced European missionary. The plan was adopted by the Mission Board, and was accepted by the Fijian converts with enthusiasm. No difficulty was found in getting all the volunteers that were needed, and Mr. Brown sailed from Sydney in April, 1875, and calling on his way, took eight catechists with their wives from Fiji and two from Samoa. The party reached Port Hunter, in the Duke of York Islands, August 14, and were well received by the natives wherever they went. Visits were paid to several places in the Duke of York cluster, to New Britain and New Ireland. Two teachers were stationed at Nodup, N. B.; one at Matupi, or Henderson's Island, two in New Ireland, and the remaining five for the present at different places among the Duke of York Islands. Seven more missionaries and their wives went out as volunteers from the Fiji district in 1876, under the charge of a judicious native minister. The first new church was opened in one of the islands in January, 1876, and two other churches were at the same time nearly completed. The mission has suffered from sickness and death, so that its working force is not as great as it would appear to be from the number of missionaries that have been sent out, and its success has been impeded. Beginnings of mission work have been made in New Guinea and the adjacent islands by the London, Church, and some other English missionary societies.

New Hampshire (pop. 318,300) received its first settlement near Portsmouth in 1623. In 1741 it became a separate Province, and so remained until the Revolution. Its State constitution was approved in 1783. Methodism was introduced in 1790 by Jesse Lee. On his first visit to Boston he went north as far as Portsmouth. The following year he visited the State again, and says, "We had a meeting in a private house. At Mr. Lindsay's request I preached on Psalms i. 6. I found it to be a time of much life and love, and some of the people appeared to be much affected. When service was ended some of the people blessed God for our meeting; all seemed friendly." In 1794, Lee was made presiding elder, and one of his appointments was New Hampshire, to which John Hill was sent as missionary. In 1796 one circuit was reported, Chesterfield, having 68 members; of it Lee says, "It lay in the southwest corner of the State, near the Connecticut River. . . . The first society formed in the State was in Chesterfield, some time in 1795, at which time there were but a few that felt the freedom to unite with us. After some time a few more cast in their lots, and other societies were soon formed in other places. The circuit was entered upon the annual minutes in the year 1796. Some time after this there was a circuit formed higher up in the State called Landaff, and in that place religion prospered very much." In 1798 a new circuit was formed called Exeter, but in 1799 there is no report, excepting from Chesterfield circuit, which then had 131 members. In 1804, the work having increased, a New Hampshire district was organized, and John Broadhead was appointed presiding elder. In 1809, Martin Ruter was appointed presiding elder, and the report from the entire State shows 1673 members. A New Hampshire Conference was organized in 1832, which contained, in 1840, 10,519 members. The Conference lines do not conform exactly to the State lines. In 1876 there were 14,644 members and 14,400 Sunday-school scholars. The denominational statistics as reported in the United States census are as follows:

New Hampshire Conference, M. E. Church, was organized in 1832, and included "all the State of New Hampshire not included in the Maine Conference, and that part of the State of Vermont east of the Green Mountains, and that part of the State of Massachusetts northeast of the Merrimack River." In 1844 Vermont Conference was organized, separating Vermont from the New Hampshire Conference. Its present boundaries include "New Hampshire, except that part within the Maine Conference; also that part of Massachusetts northeast of the Merrimack River." Its first session was held in 1832, when it reported 14,560 white and 11 colored members, with 126 traveling preachers. After the Vermont Conference was separated, in 1845, it reported 10,562 members, with 100 traveling and 59 local preachers. The statistics for 1876 are: 136 traveling and 78 local preachers, 14,644 members, 14,140 Sunday-school scholars, 117 churches, valued at $796,900, and 70 parsonages, valued at $109,700.

New Haven, Conn. (pop. 50,840), was settled in 1638, and is the seat of Yale College. It was visited by Jesse Lee in 1789, who preached in the court-house on Sabbath, June 21, the first Methodist sermon. Among his hearers were the president of Yale College and many of the students. His next appointment was on the 5th of July, when the Congregational church was tendered to him. He had a large congregation, with two ministers present. He adds, "Some told me they were much pleased with the discourse, but no man asked me home with him." He retired to a hotel, and prayed earnestly that God would give him access to the hearts of the people. In a short time a gentleman came and invited him to the hospitalities of his house. On Sabbath evening, he says, "After dark a young woman got her work and sat down to knit. I was much astonished at this, and spoke to her about it. They told me it was customary for the Congregationalists throughout the State to commence the Sabbath on Saturday evening, and continue it till sunset on Sunday." In 1790 New Haven circuit was formed, and extended from Milford to Hartford. John Lee was the first pastor, and organized a class of nine persons. The city was connected with surrounding appointments until 1814, when it became a station. In 1800 a house was purchased, which was used until 1807, when an edifice was erected on Temple Street, and used until 1820, when a larger building was erected on the public green. In 1848 this house was sold, and the present one was built on the corner of Elm and College Streets. This building was greatly improved in 1876. In 1841 a second charge was organized by 50 members, which has now a strong and massive church on John Street. In 1852 a third society was organized from the second church, and since that time West Chapel Street, Wesley Chapel, Newhallville, City Point, and Edward Streets have erected houses, some of which are but temporary, and look to larger accommodations as the city and the wealth of the membership may increase. It is in the New York Conference, and has the following statistics:

New Jersey (pop. 906,096).—The first settlement of this State was probably at Bergen, between 1617 and 1620, by the Dutch of New Amsterdam. They claimed the whole territory as a part of New Netherlands. In 1682 the territory was purchased by William Penn and eleven other Friends or Quakers, but in 1702 they surrendered the right of government to the crown. The State constitution was adopted in 1776. Methodism was introduced in 1768 by Captain Webb, who passed through New Jersey and preached in Trenton, New Mills, Burlington, and other places. In Burlington he preached both in the market-place and in the court-house. Bishop Asbury preached in Burlington, in 1771, on his way from Philadelphia to New York. The first society was organized at Pemberton, then called New Mills. Dr. Coke, on his visit in 1785, says, "The place had been favored with a faithful ministry for sixteen years." The first M. E. church was built in Ancaster County, in 1772; the second at Trenton, in 1773; and the third at New Mills, in 1775. The first society mentioned by Bishop Asbury is the Trenton society, in 1772. He says, "In meeting the small society of about nineteen persons, I gave them tickets, and found it a comfortable time. They are a serious people, and there is some prospect of much good being done in this place." At the first Conference held, in 1773, in Philadelphia, 200 members were reported from New Jersey. In 1774 two circuits were formed,—the Trenton, with William Waters as pastor, and Greenwich, with Philip Everts as pastor, who reported, in 1775, 300 members. The societies were greatly interrupted and scattered during the Revolutionary War, so that, in 1779, but 140 members were reported. In 1781 the State was divided into two large circuits, and reported 512 members, and the church began to spread with greater rapidity. In 1783, when the war closed, 1028 members were returned. From that time forward the progress has been regular and constant, although in some parts of the State, for many years, there was considerable opposition, school-houses and public buildings were closed against them, and in one or two instances their churches were destroyed. There are now within the State two Annual Conferences,—the New Jersey and the Newark,—which report, in 1876, 368 preachers, 68,601 members, 62,857 Sunday-school scholars, 509 churches, valued at $4,599,875, and 205 parsonages, valued at $838,350. There are in the State two flourishing seminaries,—at Pennington and Hackettstown,—under the patronage and control of the Conferences, and the Drew Theological Seminary, a flourishing institution, is located at Madison, N. J. There is also the Bordentown Female College, which is private property, though under the patronage of the church. There are a few churches organized by the Germans, which are embraced in the East German Conference. There are also a few colored congregations, belonging to the Delaware Conference. The African and the African Zion Churches have a number of members, and there are a few churches belonging to the Methodist Protestants. The denominational statistics, as reported in the United States census of 1876, are as follows:

New Jersey Conference, African M. E. Church, was organized in 1872, and includes the State of New Jersey.

New Jersey Conference, M. E. Church, includes "that part of New Jersey south of the following line, viz., commencing at Raritan Bay; thence up said bay and river to New Brunswick; thence along the turnpike road to Lambertville on the Delaware, including the city of New Brunswick and Lambertville station." It was originally comprised within the Philadelphia Conference. In 1836 it was organized, embracing the State of New Jersey, Staten Island, and a portion of New York. In 1856 the Newark Conference was separated from it, and its present boundaries were received. It held its first session in 1837, and reported 17,258 white and 502 colored members. After the Newark Conference was separated from it, in 1856, there remained 19 traveling and 151 local preachers, 26,711 members, and church property valued at $567,065. The records for 1876 report 179 traveling and 212 local preachers, 38,196 members, 34,242 Sunday-school scholars, 259 churches, valued at $1,803,150, and 96 parsonages, valued at $291,250.

New Jersey Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces the State of New Jersey, except that Newark shall be transferred to the Maryland district until it shall otherwise elect." The reports for 1877 are: 21 itinerant preachers, 2121 members, and church property valued at $93,850.

Newman, John P., D.D., was born in New York City, Sept. 1, 1826. He was converted and united with the M. E. Church at the age of sixteen. He pursued his studies in the seminary at Cazenovia, N. Y., and entered the ministry in the Oneida Conference in 1848. After filling a number of appointments he was transferred, in 1855, to the Troy Conference, and shortly afterwards to the New York Conference, and was stationed in New York City. In 1860 he sailed for Europe, and made an extensive tour on the Continent and in the East; and on his return published a book, entitled "From Dan to Beersheba." In 1864 he was sent to New Orleans to organize the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Southwest. He succeeded in building a fine church in the city, and opening a seminary and orphan asylum, and also in establishing for a time a religious paper. In 1869 he was appointed as pastor of the Metropolitan church in Washington City. He was three times elected chaplain of the United States Senate, and in December of 1873 was appointed by President Grant Inspector of United States Consulates. He crossed the Pacific, traveled extensively in China, Japan, and other Oriental countries, and on his return published a work, entitled "Thrones and Palaces of Babylon and Nineveh." He was a member of the General Conference of 1868 and 1876, and is now (1877) for a second term pastor of the Metropolitan church.

New Mexico (pop. 91,874) has an area of about 121,201 square miles, being nearly as large as the States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio. It was visited by the Spaniards as early as 1537. The viceroy of Mexico, about 1595, sent an officer to take formal possession of the territory in the name of Spain, and to establish colonies, missions, and forts. The missionaries met with great success in establishing the Roman Catholic religion. Numerous forts were established, but the Indians were so oppressed that they revolted, in 1680, and drove out the Spaniards, recovering the whole country as far south as the Paso Del Norte. The Spaniards regained possession in 1698. In 1846, Santa Fé was taken by a United States force, under General Kearney, who soon after conquered the whole territory from Mexico, which was ceded by treaty in 1848.

In December, 1872, the Methodist mission to New Mexico was inaugurated, when Revs. Thomas Harwood and J. Steele were sent as missionaries to that Territory. Much opposition was experienced from the Romanists, who had control of the school funds, and were simply conducting denominational schools supported by public funds. The dangers they experienced were great. One missionary, F. J. Tolby, was killed, in 1875, while returning from one of his appointments. The work is under the control of the Missionary Society. Successful mission stations have been established at Cimmaron.

La Junta, Ciruelita, Peralta, Socorro, and Las Cruces. The following are the statistics: 129 members, 194 Sunday-school scholars, and $29,500 church property. The M. E. Church South has eight mission stations, with about 150 members, and about five missionaries, mostly along the Rio Grande.

The general religious statistics as reported in the United States census for 1870 were as follows:

New Orleans, La. (pop. 191,418), was settled in 1718 by a French colony. The Jesuits, who settled in 1727, were expelled in 1763. In 1745 the population was about 800, exclusive of women and children. In 1785 it amounted to 4980. The memorable battle between the British and Americans occurred in 1815. It is the greatest cotton market in the world. Methodism was introduced in 1805 by Rev. E. W. Bowman. At that time the Sabbath was either disregarded or was the day of especial parade and festival. After making various unsuccessful efforts, he writes: "On the 7th day of December I shook off the dust of my feet against this ungodly city of New Orleans." And he turned to the country parishes. The city is first mentioned in the minutes for 1811, when Miles Harper was sent as pastor. In 1812, Lewis Hobbs was appointed to the city, but owing to the occurrence of the war no other appointment was made until 1818, when, after two years, it disappears from the minutes until 1823. The first report of membership occurs in 1825, when 23 white and 60 colored members were returned under the ministrations of Rev. B. M. Drake. The progress of the church was exceedingly slow, for in 1831 it had only 64 white and 162 colored members. Shortly after that period, however, it began to increase more rapidly, the Poydras Street church was built, and substantial permanent advance was made. At the division of the church, in 1845, the city with the Louisiana Conference adhered to the Church South, and it so remained until near the close of the Civil War. At that time the M. E. Church re-organized, chiefly under the superintendency of Rev. J. P. Newman. In 1866 the Mississippi Mission Conference was organized by Bishop Thomson, and the New Orleans district was formed. Other branches of the Methodist Church have also been established among the colored population. The M. E. Church has a literary institution which was founded in 1868. This city is in the Louisiana Conference. The M. E. Church South has for many years had literary institutions, a book depository, and a weekly paper, which circulates throughout the South. In 1866 The New Orleans Advocate was established by Dr. Newman, and published until 1869. The South-western Christian Advocate began in 1873, and was established by the General Conference of 1876, with Rev. J. H. Hartzell as editor. The following are the statistics as reported: (From the M. E. Church South no statistics are received except the statement of members.)

New Orleans University was organized in 1868, for the benefit of the colored youth, and is maintained by the Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The property, located on the corner of Camp and Race Streets, is valued at $25,000. The number of students now in attendance is over one hundred. Prof. J. S. Bean is president. He was preceded in that office by Rev. W. D. Godman, D.D., who was president from October, 1875, until October, 1877. From October, 1873, to October, 1875, Rev. I. S. Leavitt, A.M., had charge of the institution.

New Philadelphia, O. (pop. 3143), is the capital of Tuscarawas County. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1840, as a circuit, with C. E. Weirick and William Knox as pastors. In 1841 this circuit reported 765 members, and Pardon Cook and D. Neil were appointed to that charge. It did not become a station for a number of years. It is in the East Ohio Conference, and has 439 members, 250 Sunday-school scholars, and $16,000 church property.

Newport, Ky. (pop. 15,087), the capital of Campbell County, on the Ohio River, nearly opposite Cincinnati. This territory was included in the Licking circuit, which was formed in 1804, when Benjamin Edge was sent as pastor, who reported to the next Conference 178 members. The Newport, R. I. (pop. 12,521), was settled in 1638 by 17 colonists from Roger Williams's party. It has many curiosities and antiquities, and has become one of the most popular summer resorts on the Atlantic coast. The first Methodist sermon was delivered by Jesse Lee, June 30, 1790. In 1791 Bishop Asbury visited it, and wrote that "he expected before many years the Methodists would have a house of worship here." In 1798 he and Mr. Lee visited it, and the Methodists had a small church, in which Asbury preached. In 1792 Providence, afterwards Warren, circuit was organized, of which Newport formed a part for many years. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1825, with Enoch Mudge as pastor, who reported 82 members. In 1857 the city contained two stations. The African M. E. Church have a strong church here. It is in the Providence Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Newspaper Literature (English Wesleyan).—

This has only partial recognition by Conference, but two old established weekly papers, The Watchman and The Methodist Recorder, are semi-officially acknowledged, and are deservedly popular publications. They are published by a "limited liability" company, and annually give a portion of their profits to connectional funds. The Methodist newspaper is one of broad and liberal tendencies, and is obtaining a wide and increasing circulation. None of these are published at the Conference office. (For American papers, see CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.)

Newstead, Robert, an English Wesleyan minister, labored in Ceylon for nine years, preaching, translating, compiling, etc. His life was eminently holy. In 1837 he returned to the English work and was very useful, ready for every call, proving himself a genuine follower of Christ. His courtesy, general intelligence, and unaffected piety commanded the respect of all. He died in 1865, aged seventy-seven.

Newton, Robert, D.D., was one of the foremost men in English Methodism, a popular preacher and the eloquent advocate of foreign missions, whose very name was synonymous with success. He was born in Yorkshire in 1780, was received as a probationer before he was nineteen, and rose to the highest position with graceful ease. In 1840 he was representative to the M. E. Church; on his return he was elected president of the Conference for the third time, and again in 1848 he filled the chair. He became supernumerary in 1852, and died in 1854, aged seventy-four. He had the respect of universal Methodism, and never was popularity so well-founded or so unfading.

Newton, Thomas, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1842, and was elected president of the Annual Assembly in 1866. During his presidential year Mr. Newton met with a railway accident, which necessitated his temporary retirement from the active duties of the ministry. Recovering his health, he resumed circuit work in 1869. In 1875 he was appointed head of the publishing department, with the title of book steward, which office he still holds.

New York (pop. 4,382,759) is the most populous State in the Union. Its beautiful bay was discovered in 1609 by Hudson, whose name remains upon its river, and it was claimed by Holland. The little settlement, now grown into the city of New York, was at first called New Amsterdam. The Dutch retained possession until 1674, when it passed into the hands of the English, and so remained until the close of the Revolutionary War. Methodism was introduced in 1766 by Philip Embury and others, in the city of New York (see NEW YORK CITY), and by Captain Thomas Webb, who was barrack-master at Albany, where he preached a few sermons in that place, though no organization seems to have been made. The first Methodist church in America was built in 1768 in New York City; and to it the first missionaries, Boardman and Pilmoor, were sent by Mr. Wesley. In 1770, Embury left New York and settled in Camden, Washington County, and organized the Ash Grove church. In 1771 services were held in New Rochelle by Pilmoor, and in 1773 Asbury organized a society of 13 members. As early as 1767 Captain Webb preached on Long Island, and it is supposed that a society was organized in the vicinity of Jamaica. Staten Island was visited in 1771 by Mr. Asbury, and in a few years half a dozen preaching-places had been opened in its bounds. At the first Annual Conference, held in Philadelphia in 1773, there were reported from the State of New York 180 members. The second church built in the State is supposed to have been at Harpers, on Long Island, and the third at Ash Grove, in 1788. In 1774 the number of members reported from New York amounted to 222. The Revolutionary War soon breaking out and the city being occupied by the British troops, the progress of Methodism was for several years suspended. No appointments were made by the Conference from 1777 to 1783. In 1784 the city reported 60 members, and Long Island 24; being the only report made from the State. In 1788 a Conference was held in the city of New York, and Freeborn Garrettson was appointed presiding elder. He was sent up the Hudson River to explore and organize societies, and Samuel Wigton was appointed to Lake Champlain. From this time the work began to spread in the northern part of the State, and in 1800 there were reported 6363 members, with two presiding elder districts. With the growth of the population the increase of the church has kept regular pace, except in the city of New York, and in a few other points where the foreign population is exceedingly large. There are now in this State 7 Conferences, to wit: New York, New York East, Troy, Northern New York, Wyoming, Central New York, and Genesee; though the Genesee and Wyoming embrace parts of Pennsylvania, and New York East, New York, and Troy embrace portions of Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Vermont. The African M. E. Church has also a Conference in the State. There are a few Methodist Protestants, and a Conference of the Free Methodists. The chief literary institution is the Syracuse University, which was founded in 1870. Several seminaries existed long previously: Cazenovia in 1824, Genesee Wesleyan in 1830, Amenia in 1835, Chamberlain Institute in 1850, Claverack and Fort Edward in 1854, and Drew Ladies' Seminary in 1866. New York City (pop. 942,292).—The first Methodist society in the city of New York was founded in 1776. It was also the first Methodist society in the United States, and its establishment marks the beginning from which the numerous American branches of Methodism have grown. Philip Embury, the first Methodist class-leader and preacher in the United States, came to New York in 1760, reaching the city on the 10th of August. No account is given of his having done any ministerial work till 1766, when he was roused to activity by a singular incident. Mrs. Barbara Heek, a cousin of Embury's, visiting some of their friends, found them engaged in playing cards. She took the cards away, threw them into the fire, and rebuked the players for their trivial conduct and neglect of duty. She then went to Embury, related the circumstance to him, and entreated him to begin preaching. He consented. Mrs. Heek brought four persons with herself into Embury's house, services were held, with a discourse by Embury, and the party were enrolled into a class. Meetings were afterwards held weekly at Embury's house, until the congregation became so large that it could not accommodate them, when a more commodious room was hired. In a few months two classes, one of men and one of women, had been organized. The society was strengthened early in 1767 by the accession of Captain Thomas Webb, of the British army, a preacher of great energy in work and power in exhortation. Later in the same year a rigging-loft, 60 feet by 18 feet in dimensions, was hired in William Street, where Embury and Webb preached three times a week to crowded audiences. A site on John Street for a chapel was leased in 1768, and a building was erected. (See JOHN STREET CHURCH.) A parsonage was built in 1770. A request was made to Mr. Wesley as early as 1768 that he would send a regular preacher to the new congregation. Pending the appointment of such a preacher, Robert Williams came to America and labored for some time at the John Street church. Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor, who were appointed to take charge of the church at New York and the other churches which were organizing in America, arrived at New York in 1769, and served the church in John Street alternately as a part of their itinerant work for the next four years. In 1773, Thomas Rankin was appointed general assistant or superintendent of the American society, and his name appears in the first minutes of the Conference of 1773 as appointed to New York, "to change in four months." The church reported to the Conference in that year 180 members. In the next year it reported 222 members, and Francis Asbury was the appointed preacher, with directions "to change in four months." The number of members fell off in the next year to 200; after which it became small, and the society made no report during several years of the Revolutionary War. In 1784 it reported 60 members, and in 1786, 178 white and 25 colored members.

In 1790, when the second church was formed, the church of New York had on its books the names of 522 white and 102 colored members. The Forsyth Street church was organized about 1790, with 30 members. This church became a very large, flourishing, and active society, and is the parent of several younger churches in various parts of the city. Many of its former members, who have removed from New York, are represented on the rolls of the best churches of Brooklyn and other neighboring towns.

The third church, the Duane Street church, was formed in 1797, when the New York circuit reported 831 members. It had at the time of its organization but five members. The society became large and prosperous, but having suffered great losses of members by the changes of population, sold its church several years ago, and removed farther up town, to Hudson Street. In 1874 a part of the congregation joined with the Greene Street church in buying a building on University Place, and organizing the present Asbury Methodist Episcopal church.

The fourth church in the order of organization was the Seventh Street church. It originated in a weekly prayer-meeting, which was established in 1788, near the "two-mile stone," on what was then the road to Harlem, by two members of the John Street church. In 1800 a church was organized, which was called the "Two-mile Stone church." The site on which the present building stands was given to the society by its former owners in 1836. Allen Street and Bedford Street churches were founded in 1810. These two churches, with the Forsyth Street church, were, about 1840, the largest Methodist churches in the city, and reached a growth which no Methodist church in New York has surpassed. In 1840, Forsyth Street church had 850, and Allen Street church 1005 members, and in 1845 Bedford Street church reported 1056 members. The removal of the American population from the east side of the city to quarters farther up town, or to Brooklyn, has deprived Allen and Forsyth Street, as well as other east-side churches, of numbers of their best members, who are giving strength to newer organizations, while the foreigners who take the place of the removals are not attracted to Methodist churches. Allen and Bedford Street churches remain, however, vital and useful organizations, and the latter, though not so large as it once was, is still one of the largest churches in the city. In 1810 the New York churches reported 2200 members. The Willett Street church was begun in 1817, and grew by 1845 to be a society of 664 members. The Eighteenth Street church was formed in 1829, and recorded, in 1845, 819 members. In 1830 the number of members in the churches of New York was 3955. The Harlem mission circuit was established about this period, and embraced six principal stations, at Harlem, Yorkville, Manhattanville, Fort Washington, Forty-first Street, North River, and Twenty-seventh Street, towards the East River. The churches at Yorkville (1832), Twenty-seventh Street (1834), Harlem (1836), and Forty-first Street (1840) owe their origin to this effort. To this period belong also the formation of the Greene Street (1831) and the Second Street (1832) churches.

New York appeared on the minutes as a single circuit till 1832, when it was divided into the New York East and New York West circuits. The churches were first separately named in the minutes in 1836. Vestry Street church was organized in 1833, and was the first pewed church in the city. It was removed several years ago, and is now represented by the Central church, in Seventh Avenue. Mulberry Street church, also a pewed church, was organized in 1834. It is now represented by St. Paul's church. In 1840 the twelve New York churches reported 5776 members. A meeting for Germans was begun in 1841, in Second Street, which resulted in the organization, in the next year, of the First German church. The Asbury society, which was organized in 1842, to increase the number of Methodist Episcopal churches in the city, formed a church, for which a building was bought in Norfolk Street. In 1845 the same society established the Floating Bethel, of which the Rev. O. G. Hedstrom was pastor for thirty years continuously, having bought a hull at the foot of Rector Street, North River, of the American Wesleyan Connection for that purpose. This church was intimately connected with the origin and growth of the Scandinavian Methodist Episcopal churches. It is now attached to the South Long Island district. It returned, in 1877, 55 members and 5 probationers. The statistical tables for 1850 showed that there were then in the city of New York 25 churches, with a total of 8667 members, probationers, and local preachers.

In 1850 a mission was begun by the Ladies' Home Missionary Society at the Five Points, a quarter of the city which was notorious as being the abode and resort of the most vicious and depraved classes. The undertaking was considered arduous and attended with danger. The mission was opened in a hired room, with the Rev. L. M. Pease as missionary, and the Rev. J. Luckey as assistant. In a short time the Old Brewery, the worst house of resort in the quarter, was bought as the site of a building to be put up especially for the mission. The new mission house, containing chapel, school, reading, and library-rooms, work-rooms, a parsonage, and twenty tenements, was dedicated on the 18th of June, 1853. The mission furnishes the only Protestant Sunday service in the Sixth Ward, a district containing a population of 20,000 inhabitants, conducts English and Italian schools, furnishes situations to adults and homes to children, and serves as a medium for the distribution of supplies to the poor, and has been of vast benefit to the neighborhood and the city. Among the indirect results of its operations has been an entire transformation of the Five Points, and the complete removal of its bad features.

The New York City Church Extension and Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was incorporated in 1866. Its object is to purchase or hire suitable places for the establishment of mission chapels and Sunday-schools, and to assist in the formation of the same. The privilege of membership is extended to all laborers in the Sunday-schools connected with the Methodist Episcopal Church in the city of New York; and provision is made for the representation of all the Methodist Episcopal churches in the city in its board of managers. It has been concerned in every mission Sunday-school, and every new church enterprise looking to the addition of another congregation, that has been undertaken in behalf of the Methodist Episcopal churches of the city during the past twelve years. The following statistics are given for the year ending December 31, 1876:

Number of churches and chapels, 16; of pastors and assistants, 16; of full members, 1530; of probationers, 225; total membership, 1755; number of Sunday-schools, 16; of officers and teachers in the same, 357; of Sunday-school scholars, 3698; total value of church property, $394,600, upon which the indebtedness is $116,500.

The Book Concern was removed from Philadelphia to New York in 1804, and it has since remained the great publishing centre. The Methodist Magazine was started in 1817, and The Christian Advocate in 1826. The Northern Advocate was commenced in Auburn, but is now published in Syracuse. The Buffalo Advocate, and The Methodist, are independent papers, issued in the interest of the church. New York is also the seat of the missionary and Sunday-school societies, and of the educational board of the church.

In 1820 a number of members separated from the Methodist Episcopal churches on account of dissatisfaction with the episcopacy, and formed several societies, which eventually became consolidated in the Sullivan Street and Attorney Street Methodist Protestant churches. The Sullivan Street church, which was opened in 1824, was sold in 1842 to the Methodist Episcopal church. The Attorney Street church, which was built in 1831, was occupied till 1872, when it was sold, and the society having removed to Brooklyn, became the Fourth Street Methodist, now Methodist Protestant, church in that city. The Methodist Protestants are now represented in the city of New York only by a small church of the colored branch.

A congregation of American Wesleyans was formed in 1840 or 1841. It underwent several changes till 1844, when a Wesleyan church was regularly organized. A second church was formed in 1845, and a third about 1846. These prospered for several years, but none of them now exist.

A church of Primitive Methodists was formed about 1830, and worshiped for several years in hired halls, but was finally discontinued.

The first colored Methodist congregation was formed in 1796, and remained under the care and jurisdiction of the Conference until 1820, when it organized as the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. A second of this denomination, "Little Zion," was built in Harlem in 1843.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in the city of New York in 1820. It is now represented by the strong society of the Sullivan Street church. A congregation of the African Union Methodist Church was formed in 1826. It was re-incorporated in 1874, and is now represented by the flourishing society of the Union American Methodist Episcopal church, in Fifteenth Street, and the smaller society at Yorkville.

The first society of the Free Methodist Church was established in 1865, at Thirty-seventh Street. Two other churches have been formed since, so that this organization is now represented in the city by three churches, which occupy fields separated at a considerable distance from each other.

The following table shows the condition of the Methodist churches in the city of New York according to the latest reports made to the Annual Conferences. The value of property includes the value of the parsonage, where there is one, as well as of the church building:

New York Conference, African M. E. Church, includes the State of New York. At its session in 1876 it stationed 23 preachers, and reported 20 local preachers, 2469 members, 1292 Sunday-school scholars, and 27 churches, valued at $333,100.

New York Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1800. Its boundaries included that part of the State of New York east of the Hudson River, all of Connecticut, and those parts of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Vermont which were included in the New York and New London districts. There were two districts and 15 circuits. It held its first session in the city of New York, June 16, 1801. In 1804 its boundaries were so changed as to embrace New York, Pittsfield, Albany, and Upper Canada districts. In 1808 Cayuga district was organized. In 1812 the boundaries included all the State of New York not included in the Genesee and Philadelphia Conferences, that part of Connecticut and Massachusetts west of the Connecticut River, and that part of Vermont lying west of the Green Mountains. In 1816 Lower Canada, between Lake Champlain and Magog, was added. In 1824 Canada was separated from it. The territory originally included within its bounds has been organized into four other Conferences, viz.: New York East, Northern New York, Central New York, Troy, and also about one-half of the Wyoming Conference. The boundaries as fixed by the General Conference of 1876 include "the New York, Poughkeepsie, Newburg, Plattsville, and Elenville districts, and Gaylordsville circuit." In 1833 this Conference reported 11,458 white and 391 colored members; in 1810, 17,572 white and 942 colored members; in 1820, 22,065 white and 1391 colored members; in 1830, 34,523 white and 281 colored members; in 1840, 35,724 white and 423 colored members, and 217 local preachers. It was within the bounds of the Baltimore Conference when the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized, and within the Philadelphia Conference when the first three Annual Conferences in America were held. It enjoys the honor of being the first place where Methodism was permanently planted in America, where the first society was gathered, and where the first church was built. The latest statistics (1876) are: 244 traveling, 161 local preachers, 49,060 members, 39,286 Sunday-school scholars, 370 churches, valued at $3,961,450, and 173 parsonages, valued at $663,600.

New York Conference, M. P. Church, embraces "Western Vermont, Connecticut, and that part of New York lying east of a line forming the boundary between the States of New York and New Jersey, terminating at the Delaware River; thence up said river to the northwest corner of Sullivan County; thence north to the northeast corner of Hamilton County; thence east to Lake Champlain; thence down the lake to the Canada line. The charges now occupied in Pennsylvania shall remain in New York district until they shall otherwise elect." The reports for 1877 are: 28 itinerant preachers, 2860 members, and church property valued at $169,000.

New York East Conference, M. E. Church, was set off from the New York Conference in 1848, embracing the eastern part of New York City, Long Island, and a part of Connecticut. Its present boundaries are "the New York, Bridgeport, New Haven, and the two Long Island districts, including those charges in the city of New York east of a line through Third Avenue, Bowery, Chatham Street, Park Row, and Broadway." Its first separate session was held at Middletown, Conn., May 30, 1849, and reported 25,769 members, with 158 traveling and 123 local preachers. In 1876 it reported 261 traveling and 237 local preachers, 43,632 members, 43,942 Sunday-school scholars, 276 churches, valued at $4,221,750, and 146 parsonages, valued at $789,500.

New Zealand Language and Missionary Literature.—The Maori language is one of the Malayo-Polynesian group of languages, which is regarded by philologists as independent, and unconnected with any other group. It has been reduced to writing since the Wesleyan mission was established: but it had before that time an extensive traditional literature, consisting of lyrical poetry, and prose stories of the style of children's stories, of striking original conception, and creditable to the genius of the people. Several collections of these stories have been made. The Wesleyan mission press was established about 1837. In 1842 it had sent out 5000 copies of Scripture lessons, 3000 copies of an elementary school book, and 6700 catechisms and prayers and hymns. 15,000 copies of the Maori New Testament had also been published and sent out by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

New Zealand, Methodist Missions in.—The colony of New Zealand consists of three islands lying in the South Pacific Ocean southeast from Australia, between 35° and 48° south latitude, and 166° and 178° east longitude. The total area of the islands is 166,000 square miles, and the population in 1874 consisted of 299,514 whites and about 40,000 Maories, or natives. The earliest authentic account of knowledge of the islands is in connection with the visit paid to them by Tasman, in 1642, although the French and Spanish claim to have discovered them in the previous century. Captain Cook visited them several times, and left pigs and other animals upon them. The English appointed a lieutenant-governor for New Zealand in 1838, when about 1000 Europeans had settled upon the islands. The New Zealand Company was chartered in the following year. A settlement of Presbyterians was made at Otago in 1848, and one of the Church of England at Muhlenburg in 1850. The growth of the colony has been rapid, although it has been interrupted several times by wars with the natives. The settlers have been generally of a superior character to those of the other Australian colonies. The natives of New Zealand are called Maoris. They are a tribe of the Polynesian branch of the Malayo-Polynesian family, and are regarded as constituting the finest of all the tribes inhabiting the South Sea Islands. They have a good appearance, and have been proved capable of a high degree of civilization and intellectual development. Their numbers, which were formerly estimated at 100,000 persons, have diminished very fast in recent years. In 1872 they were made voters and eligible to office, and several of them have since held seats in the Colonial legislature.

The mission of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in New Zealand was founded in 1821. The Rev. Samuel Leigh, a Wesleyan missionary in New South Wales, had visited the islands in 1819 for his health, and having become acquainted with the missionaries and work of the Church Missionary Society, conceived a desire to engage in labors there himself under the direction of his own society. The executive committee of the Wesleyan Missionary Society having approved his purpose, he returned to New Zealand as a missionary, with his wife, in 1821. He was defeated in his purpose of settling at Mercury Bay by the outbreak of a war, and was compelled to reside for a time at the church missionary settlement. After a few months he was joined by two other missionaries, Messrs. Turner and White, and the party removed to Waugaroa, on the northeast coast, where they were at first received with kindness by the chief, George, but in a short time were threatened with violent demonstrations of hostility. The history of the first ten years of the mission is a story of difficulties arising from the opposition and outbreaks of the natives, and of little progress or encouragement. At first, for want of a house, the missionaries were accustomed to teach the people and children in open-air meetings, and it is stated that many of the New Zealanders dated their first religious impressions from these exercises. Comfortable missionary premises, with a house, garden, and two places of worship, were completed in 1824. A good beginning had been made in the meetings, in the schools, and in industrial teaching, when the natives arose and attacked the missionary premises. This attack was averted, and the natives had been conciliated, when, early in 1827, the district was invaded by a neighboring chieftain, the missionaries were obliged to flee, and the mission was temporarily broken up. The missionaries received protection in their flight from a friendly chief named Patuone, who escorted them until they met English friends, under whose care they reached an English settlement, and embarked for Sydney. At the solicitation of Patuone, they returned in the beginning of 1828, and established themselves at Mangungu, on the river Hokianga, on premises selected after consultation with the church missionaries, and regularly bought of the natives. By 1830 the natives became satisfied that the missionaries were their friends, and began to trust them; and from this time the mission made good progress. In 1834 one of the missionaries was able to write a favorable account of the attentiveness of the people to the services of the church, and of the fidelity of the converts to their religious duties. Several chiefs declared in favor of Christianity, the mission was strengthened by sending out additional laborers; and a printing-press was established about 1837. Six additional missionaries were sent out in 1840. A Wesleyan Institution for training a native ministry was founded in 1844, and at about the same time a college and seminary for the education of the children of the missionaries in Australia, New Zealand, and the islands of the South Seas was established at Auckland. In 1854 the mission returned 16 principal stations or circuits, 105 chapels, 125 other preaching-places, 20 missionaries and assistants, 9 catechists, 15 day-school teachers, 521 Sunday-school teachers, 293 local preachers, 4316 full church members, 203 persons on trial, 202 Sunday-schools with 6737 scholars, 71 day-schools with 2212 scholars, and 10,769 attendants on worship.

In 1869 the report of the Missionary Society recorded New Zealand as "nominally Christian." The report for 1876 stated of the Maori mission, that "about 3341 natives in New Zealand attend the services, conducted by 5 native ministers and 2 native catechists. The number of members of society is 392 (being an increase of 17), with 58 on trial. 21 Sunday-schools and 3 day-schools return 810 pupils." The New Zealand Annual Conference was constituted in 1873, in connection with the Australasian General Conference. At the session of this Conference in 1877 a total of 3413 church members was reported, of whom 379 were attached to the Maori mission.

The United Free Methodist Churches of England in 1864 appointed Rev. John Tyerman missionary to New Zealand, who labored acceptably for two years. He was followed by M. Baxter, who had served many years in Jamaica, but who was compelled by increasing infirmities to retire in a few years from active work, and was made supernumerary in 1873. His place was taken by Samuel Macfarlan, who has since been assisted by Joseph White, J. J. Pendray, and four others.

The mission is looked upon as a very hopeful one. In 1876 there were 9 circuits or stations, with 13 ministers, 3 of whom were called out by the New Zealand district. There were 38 chapels and preaching-rooms, with 23 local preachers, 29 leaders, 564 members, and 72 on trial, 18 Sunday-schools, with 203 teachers, and 1726 scholars. £1357.5.2 was raised by the colonists for ministers and missions, besides £67.5.5 contributed to the General Mission Fund. The amount spent by the home authorities was £880.0.3, which included £150 specially contributed by Mr. W. Hicks.

Nicholson, David B., a minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in Iredell Co., N. C., Feb. 1, 1809, and died April 15, 1866. He entered the Virginia Conference in 1831, and after having filled important charges was appointed presiding elder in 1842, and, with the exception of two years, continued in that position for twenty-five years. He was twice called to preside over his own Conference, in the absence of the bishop, and was several times elected to the General Conference. He was also a trustee of several institutions of the church, for which he was eminently fitted by his exact business habits.

Nickerson, Hiram, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Orrington, Me., Sept. 3, 1797, and died Dec. 26, 1869. He was received into the New England Conference in 1821, and was one of the original members of the Maine Conference in 1821 at its organization. Besides filling other important appointments he was presiding elder for twenty-one years. Four times he was a delegate to the General Conference. He was highly esteemed as a safe counselor and a judicious friend.

Niles, Mich. (pop. 4630), is situated in Berrien County, on the Michigan Central Railroad. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1836, as a circuit in the La Porte district, in the Indiana Conference, with Thomas P. McCool as preacher, who reported next year 311 members. It did not become a station until about 1845, when it had 99 members. It has been in the Michigan Conference since 1840, and has 350 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property.

Ninde, William Ward, of the Black River Conference, was born in Lyons, N. Y., in 1810, and died in Delta, Feb. 27, 1845. When a student in the Oneida Conference Seminary, at Cazenovia, he was converted in his sixteenth year, and shortly after was licensed as a local preacher. In 1828, when he was only eighteen years of age, he was admitted on trial by the Genesee Conference, and was soon placed in responsible appointments. He was the first secretary of the Black River Conference on its organization. In 1843 he was appointed presiding elder of the Herkimer district, and was also elected as reserve delegate to the General Conference of 1844. His health, however, began rapidly to decline, and for several months he was the subject of considerable suffering. His perceptions were clear and accurate, his imagination vivid, his fancy brilliant, and his taste exact, and yet he was extremely timid, shrinking from special responsibilities.

Ninde, William X., D.D., was born in Cortlandville, N. Y., in 1832, and graduated from Wesleyan University in 1855. In the following year he joined the Black River Conference, M. E. Church, and after filling important appointments he was, in 1861, transferred to the Cincinnati Conference. In 1870 he was transferred to the Detroit Conference, and stationed at Central church, Detroit, which he served until 1873, when he was elected to the chair of Practical Theology in Garrett Biblical Institute. In 1876 he was again appointed to Central church, Detroit. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Ningpo, China.—The mission of the United Methodist Free Churches of England to China originated in 1863. A letter from Rev. J. H. Taylor, who has labored earnestly among the Chinese, gave the first impulse towards the establishment of the China mission. It was determined to open a mission at Ningpo. W. R. Fuller was designated to the work. He had the advantage of Mr. Taylor's kind instructions in the language ere he sailed, in 1864, and he also received some medical training. Rev. John Mara was also chosen, and was put for a time under Mr. Taylor's care when he joined his colleague. At a later period Mr. Fuller labored at Chefoo, but he gave up the work and retired from the ministry. Mr. Mara believed that missionaries should, in things innocent, conform to the customs of the people among whom they labored. "I am convinced that the day of glorious things will not arrive," he wrote, "till Protestant missionaries learn the lesson the Romanists have taught us, . . . that it is only by multiplying points of contact we shall be able to reach them. We must give up our foreign houses, our foreign food, our foreign dress, and live with them and among them." He resigned at the Annual Assembly of 1870. Rev. F. W. Galpin, on whom the burden of the mission has chiefly lain, reached China in 1868. There he labored till the year 1877, when he reached London on furlough. At present there are seven salaried catechists employed, all of whom are Chinese. There are eight preaching stations, and the missionaries go on evangelistic tours. There are 116 members in society, with 12 on trial. £17,19.6 was raised by the converts in 1876. The entire cost of the mission was £961.19.3.

Nitschmann, David, though not a Methodist, was intimately associated with Methodist history. He was the first bishop of the renewed Moravian Church, and was born Dec. 27, 1696. At Copenhagen he became acquainted with a slave from the West Indies, and was so moved with sympathy for the sufferings of that race that he volunteered for missionary work, and sailed with Leonhardt Dober for St. Thomas, determined to sell themselves as slaves if there was no other way to reach the negroes. On his return to Europe he was elected bishop, and sailed to Georgia with a colony of Moravian emigrants. Among his fellow-passengers were John and Charles Wesley. His deep piety and his calmness in the midst of a terrible storm so impressed John Wesley that he formed his acquaintance, and it became the means of that fellowship which arose between Peter Boehler and Mr. Wesley. He died on the 5th of October, 1772, at Bethlehem, Pa.

Nolley, Richmond, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Virginia in 1790; was converted in Georgia in 1806, and entered the Conference in 1807. He was stationed in Wilmington, N. C., and Charleston, S. C. In 1812 he went on a mission to the Tombigbee country, enduring almost incredible hardships. "For two years he ranged over a vast extent of country, preaching continually, stopping for no obstructions of flood or weather. When his horse could not go on, he shouldered his saddle-bags and pressed forward on foot." In 1814 he was appointed to Atakapas circuit, in Louisiana, and the following year lost his life from exposure in fording a stream.

Norfolk, Va. (pop. 9229), in Norfolk County, is situated on the Norfolk and Petersburg Railroad. It was the first place where Methodism was established in Virginia. Robert Williams preached his first sermon in 1772, from the door-step of the court-house. Unaccustomed to hearing such preaching, so earnest and so plain, the people thought him mad. He was succeeded in the spring by Pilmoor. The second visit of Williams to Norfolk was in company with William Watters, the first native American itinerant Methodist preacher. They crossed the Potomac at Alexandria, and passed through the lower counties, preaching as occasion furnished opportunity. At the first Conference, held in 1773, Norfolk is mentioned as one of the six appointments, and Richard Wright was appointed to that circuit. In 1774 it reported 73 members, and John King was appointed to Norfolk circuit. In 1775 it contained 125 members, and Francis Asbury was appointed pastor. He found about 30 members of the church. The services were held then in an old play-house. He says, "I entertain a hope that we shall have a house and a people in this town." He remained as pastor most of this year, preaching at Portsmouth and surrounding towns. On the 14th of May $170 was received towards building a church. Asbury was the last pastor until after the close of the war. In 1783 Joseph Morris was pastor. In 1792 Asbury was again there, and says, "The seed which has been sowing for twenty years begins to spring up; Norfolk flourishes, Portsmouth declines and is already low." In 1794 the first M. E. church was built. In 1800 he was again here, and a plan of a new church, 50 by 70 feet, was presented him for his approval. In 1803, Asbury preached in the new house, which he said was the best Methodist church at that time in Virginia. In 1804 he records, "At a meeting of the women we laid the foundation of a female charitable society of Norfolk, similar in plan to those of New York and Baltimore, but more liberal; may this live, grow, and flourish when I am cold and forgotten!" Bishops Asbury and Whatecoat held a Conference in February, 1806. This city is in the Virginia Conference, and since the war the M. E. Church has re-organized a small but enterprising congregation. The Methodist statistics are as follows:

Normal Class is a quarterly Sunday-school magazine published by the book agents at New York and Cincinnati for the M. E. Church. It was begun in 1875, at the suggestion of Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., corresponding secretary of the Sunday-School Union of the M. E. Church. It is designed especially to promote the work of teacher-training for the Sunday-school, and to publish elaborate papers on all the aspects of the Sunday-school work, which could not be published in the Sunday-School Journal for want of space.

Norristown, Pa. (pop. 10,753), the capital of Montgomery County, first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1835, connected with Bethel, with W. Gentner as pastor, who reported for the circuit 175 members. It was subsequently connected with various points, until it became a station. There are now two charges and a mission. There is also an African M. E. church. It is in the Philadelphia Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

North Alabama Conference, M. E. Church South.—Previous to 1870 there were two Conferences in this State, known by the names of Montgomery and Mobile. In that year the State was divided between the Alabama and North Alabama Conferences. The latter held its first session at Gadsden, November, 1870, Bishop Paine presiding. It embraced ten districts, and reported 107 traveling and 259 local preachers, 22,460 white and 188 colored members, and 9952 Sunday-school scholars.

North Arkansas Conference, M. P. Church. "begins at the northwest corner of Pope County, running east to the little river called 'Fush,' down this stream to the Arkansas River, and with said Arkansas River to its confluence with the Mississippi, including all that part of the State of Kansas lying north of said line." It reported for 1877, 31 traveling ministers, 1800 members, and church property valued at $5000.

North Carolina (pop. 1,071,361).—The first attempt at settlement in this State was made by a party sent out by Sir Walter Raleigh in 1585. It proved, however, to be a failure. In 1663, Charles II. formed out of this territory the Province of Carolina: settlements were made at various points until, in 1674, the population was about 4000. In 1765 a colony of Presbyterians from the north of Ireland settled in the northern part of the State, and a few Moravians settled between the Yadkin and Dan Rivers. In 1776 the State constitution was adopted, and the Constitution of the United States was ratified in 1789. Methodism was introduced from Virginia. Carolina first appears by name in 1776, when Edward Dromgoole, Francis Poythres, and Isham Tatum were appointed missionaries. In 1780 Asbury first visited the State, and found four circuits, and traveled through three of them. At that time a few of the humbler places of worship were built, and the region was traversed by Pilmoor, Jesse Lee, and others. The first Conference held in this State was in 1785, at the residence of Mr. Green Hill,—who had been a member of the first provincial Congress,—at which time Beverly Allen was ordained deacon and elder. He introduced Methodism into Salisbury in 1783, forming a class in that town. In 1786, Bishop Asbury held a Conference, and twenty-four preachers attended. From an early period Methodism had a respectable position in the State. In 1845 the churches identified themselves with the M. E. Church South, and so remained until the close of the Civil War. Since that period other branches of Methodism have been established in the State. The North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church South embraces a large portion of the State; but that portion lying west of the Blue Ridge, and a small portion on the east, are in the Holston Conference. The Methodist Episcopal Church has a Conference in the State, so also have the Methodist Protestant and the African M. E. Churches. The African M. E. Zion Church and the Colored Church of America have also a number of congregations. The M. E. Church South has founded a number of institutions of learning, among which are Trinity College, in Randolph County, founded in 1852, Wesleyan Female College, in Murfreesborough, and the Greensboro' Female College, founded in 1841. There are in the State about 500 Methodist preachers and about 120,000 members. The denominational statistics, as given in the United States census of 1870, are as follows:

North Carolina Conference, African M. E. Church. includes the State of North Carolina. At its session in 1876 it stationed 47 preachers, and reported 65 local preachers, 6291 members, 3840 Sunday-school scholars, 77 churches, valued at $38,817, 4 parsonages, valued at $4000.

North Carolina Conference, M. E. Church. was organized by the General Conference of 1836, and was bounded on the east by the Atlantic Ocean, on the north by Albemarle Sound, Roanoke and Staunton Rivers, on the west by the top of the Blue Ridge, including the counties of Wilks and Iredell, on the south by the south lines of Iredell, Rowan, Davidson, Randolph, and Chatham, thence by Cape Fear River, except those appointments then included in the Wilmington and Lincoln ton districts. It adhered to the M. E. Church South at the separation in 1845. Its history from this point forward is to be found in that church. In 1867, Bishop Scott held the Virginia and North Carolina Mission Conference at Portsmouth, Va. At the General Conference of 1868 it was organized into a separate Conference, which included the State of North Carolina, except towns or counties west of Watauga County and the Blue Ridge. In 1876 it included the State of North Carolina, except the counties west of Watauga County and the Blue Ridge, which are included in the Holston Conference. Before the division of the church the territory of North Carolina was included in the Virginia Conference until, in 1837, it was set apart. In 1838 it held its first separate session, and reported 15,312 white and 3896 colored members, with 76 traveling and 175 local preachers. In 1846 it reported 86 traveling and 133 local preachers, 19,943 white members, and 6705 colored. The General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries as follows: "On the east by the Atlantic Ocean, on the north by Albemarle Sound and Roanoke River to its intersection with the Virginia State line, and by said State line (including Union Church, in Mecklenburg Co., Va.) to the Blue Ridge, on the west by the western boundary of Surry, Wilkes, Caldwell, Burke, McDowell, Rutherford, and Polk Counties to the South Carolina line, and on the south by the State line of South Carolina to the ocean." North India Conference was organized by that name in 1876, and includes "the province of Oudh and the districts of Rohilund, Cawnpore, Kumaon, and Gurhwal, in the northwest province." It had been organized as early as 1868 as the India Conference, including the northwest provinces of India, and embracing about the same territory; but in 1876 it was named North India, to distinguish it from the South India Conference then established. The first session of the India Mission Conference was held in Bareilly, in January, 1869, C. W. Judd presiding: at that time it embraced 23 ministers and 25 local preachers, 665 members, 16 churches, valued at $18,400, and 21 parsonages, valued at $36,450. In 1852 the Northwestern Indiana Conference was organized, embracing the northwestern part of the State. Since 1868 its boundaries have been as follows: "On the north by Michigan, on the east by Ohio, including Union City, on the south by the National Road from the State line west to Marion County; thence north to the northeast corner of Augusta County; thence west to the Michigan Road, on the west of said Michigan Road to South Bend and by the Sandusky River; thence to the Michigan State line, including Logansport, and two towns on the National Road east of Indianapolis." This Conference held its first session Oct. 16, 1844, and reported 27,296 white and 47 colored members, with 105 traveling and 220 local preachers. The entire State was then divided between two Conferences. After the organization of the Southeastern and Northwestern Indiana Conferences, in 1852, there still remained in the North Indiana Conference 16,590 members, with 86 traveling and 157 local preachers. The latest report from this Conference (1876) is 184 traveling and 272 local preachers, 32,117 members, 31,165 Sunday-school scholars, 390 churches, valued at $968,175, and 104 parsonages, valued at $198,956.

North Mississippi Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized in 1870, and includes "all of the State of Mississippi not included in the Mississippi Conference, and so much of Sumter Co., Ala., as lies north of Noxubee and west of Tombigbee Rivers." Its first session was held at Waterville, Miss., Nov. 30, 1870, Bishop Dorgett presiding; and it reported 110 traveling and 190 local preachers, 22,125 members, and 8072 Sunday-school scholars. Its reports for 1875 show 124 traveling and 204 local preachers, 28,165 members, and 9340 Sunday-school scholars.

North Ohio Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1840, and included all that part of the State of Ohio not included in the Ohio, Pittsburgh, and Erie Conferences. In 1856 the Delaware or Central Ohio Conference was organized, embracing its western part. Since 1868 its boundaries have been: "On the north by the Ohio State line, on the east by Erie Conference and Tuscarawas and Muskingum Rivers to Dresden, on the south by Ohio Conference, including Utica, Homer, and Galena circuits, and excluding Stratsford, on the west by the main road passing from Delaware and Marion to Upper Sandusky and the Sandusky River, excluding so much of the town of Delaware as lay west of Olentangy River, and also excluding the towns of Marion, Vermont, and Upper Sandusky, and including Tiffin." In 1876 East Ohio is substituted for Erie as a part of its eastern boundary. It held its first session Sept. 9, 1840, and reported 23,594 white, 91 colored, and 213 Indian members, with 98 traveling and 150 local preachers. North Texas Female College is located at Sherman, Texas; was chartered in 1877, and is owned by the North Texas Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South. The building is situated on a campus of rolling ground containing four acres, and the property is worth about $70,000. It is under the presidency of Colonel James R. Cole, a graduate of Trinity College, N. C., who rose from the ranks in the Southern army to the command of a regiment, and who had been Professor of Languages in Mackenzie College, Texas, and principal of Benham Female Seminary, and is an ex-member of the Texas legislature. He is assisted by a faculty of six teachers.

North Wales District Chapel Fund.—A scheme for the relief of Chapel Trusts in North Wales, by means of loans, was commenced in 1857 with satisfactory success. In 1861 a similar scheme for South Wales was introduced with excellent results. Many thousand pounds' worth of debts have been discharged; and in 1867 it was resolved, "That all matters relating to this fund, and the proceedings of the district committees with regard to trust property, shall be annually reported to the Conference; and a statement of the accounts shall be printed in the annual report of the chapel committee."

Northern Christian Advocate, a weekly periodical, under the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is published at Syracuse, N. Y. It was founded in 1841. The first editor, however, elected by the General Conference was in 1844. It was afterwards placed under the control of a local publishing committee, since which time it has passed into the hands of the New York Book Concern, and is published by the book agents. It reported in 1876 a circulation of 12,960, and Rev. O. H. Warren, D.D., was elected editor. It circulates chiefly in Western, Central, and Northern New York.

Northern New York Conference, M. E. Church, was organized in 1872, and includes "so much of the county of Franklin as is not within the Troy Conference, and all of the counties of St. Lawrence, Jefferson, Lewis, Oneida, and Herkimer, and all of Oswego County except Phoenix, and so much of the county of Madison as lies on the east of the New York and Midland Railroad, together with Cherry Valley, Springfield, and Richfield Springs, in Otsego County, Sharon Springs, in Schoharie County, and Frey's Bush, Ames, and St. Johnsville, in Montgomery County." Prior to 1872 the chief part of its territory had been embraced in the Black River Conference, which was organized in 1836. Northwest German Conference was organized in 1864, and comprised the German work within the territorial bounds of the Rock River and Minnesota Conferences, and in the Galena district of the Upper Iowa. In 1872 the Chicago German Conference was separated from it, and it now includes "the State of Minnesota and that part of the State of Iowa north of an east and west line passing along the south line of the city of Clinton, and that part of the State of Illinois lying west of the bounds of the Chicago German Conference." It reported, in 1876, 67 traveling and 50 local preachers, 5795 members, 4275 Sunday-school scholars, 82 churches, valued at $150,900, and 45 parsonages, valued at $40,375.

Northwestern German-English Normal School at Galena, Ill., was opened Nov. 23, 1868, and was transferred to the Northwestern German Conference in 1869. The objects of the school are to educate young gentlemen and ladies to become teachers in German-English or English-German schools, and to prepare those who wish a higher education for college. Eleven acres of ground surround the building as school property. The faculty consists of 5 teachers, and the catalogue shows 100 students.

Northwestern University is an institution of learning, situated in Evanston, Cook Co., Ill. The grounds of the university comprise thirty acres of an oak-grove on the shore of Lake Michigan, 11 miles north of Chicago. On these grounds are University Hall, a beautiful stone building, used exclusively for purposes of instruction, erected in 1869, at a cost of $110,000; the Garrett Biblical Institute (Heck Hall), the Preparatory School, the Gymnasium, and the Government Life-Saving Station. A short distance to the west, on an area of about five acres, is the Woman's College, a large brick building of fine proportions. The Medical College is situated in Chicago. The College of Law occupies a hall in Chicago leased for its use. The university embraces the following faculties: 1, College of Literature and Science; 2, College of Literature and Art (Woman's College); 3, Conservatory of Music; 4, College of Law; 5, College of Medicine; 6, Preparatory School. The Garrett Biblical Institute is a distinct corporation, but is located on the university grounds, and practically supplies the place of a college of theology. The library of the university contains 30,000 volumes, 20,000 of which formerly constituted the private library of Dr. John Schultze, of the Prussian ministry of public instruction. This library was purchased and presented to the university by Luther L. Greenleaf, of Evanston. A library fund is provided for in the donation of real estate by Mr. Orrington Lunt, valued at $60,000. The university has a valuable and well-arranged Museum of Natural History, good chemical laboratories in the College of Literature and Science and in the Medical College, a department of physics, with excellent apparatus from the best makers, and a Hall of Art at the Woman's College, but used for the instruction of both sexes.

The history of the institution commences with "a meeting of persons favorable to the establishment of a university at Chicago, under the patronage and government of the Methodist Episcopal Church," convened at the law-office of Grant Goodrich, Esq., in Chicago, May 31, 1850. At this meeting a committee was appointed to secure a charter from the legislature of the State, and another committee to invite the Rock River, the Wisconsin, and the Northwest Indiana Conferences to "take part in the government and patronage of the proposed university." The charter was obtained and approved by the governor of Illinois Jan. 28, 1851. In 1853, Rev. Clark T. Hinman, D.D., was elected president, and the same year were purchased 380 acres of land, now the site of the university and of the village of Evanston. In 1854 a faculty was elected. Nov. 1, 1855, a temporary college building having been erected, the school was formally opened. Dr. Hinman having died in 1854, Rev. R. S. Foster, D.D., was elected president in 1856, and resigned in 1860. Henry S. Noyes, A.M., was acting president from 1860 to 1869. In 1869 University Hall having been erected,—the first permanent building,—Rev. E. O. Haven, D.D., LL.D., was elected president. This year the Chicago Medical College became a department of the University. In 1870 the present Preparatory School building was erected. Dr. Haven resigned in 1872, and Rev. C. H. Fowler, D.D., was elected president. In 1873

the Ladies' College was purchased and became a department of the university, under the name of the "Woman's College of the Northwestern University." The same year the university united with the University of Chicago in organizing and maintaining the "Union College of Law" in Chicago. Dr. Fowler resigned the presidency in 1876. The last year, 1876-77, there were in all departments 49 professors and instructors and 734 students. The endowment of the university is almost entirely in real estate,—some of it productive and much of it unproductive. The report of the treasurer, T. C. Hoag, Esq., for 1876-77, estimates the net value of its property over liabilities to be $1,069,000. The inception, the guidance, and the success of the institution are largely due to Hon. John Evans, M.D., Hon. Grant Goodrich, Orring-

Norway Conference was established by the General Conference in 1876, embracing "Norway in Europe." Its first session was held by Bishop Andrews, in Christiania, Norway, Aug. 17, 1876. It reported 25 traveling and 7 local preachers, 2798 members, 1859 Sunday-school scholars, and 17 churches, valued at $72,707. Annual meetings of the mission had been held prior to that time. (See NORWAY.)

Norway, Methodist Missions in.—The kingdom of Norway occupies the western part of the northern Scandinavian peninsula, and has an area of 122,280 square miles, and a population of 1,802,882. It has the same king with Sweden, but is in other respects a separate, independent state, with its own constitution and Parliament. The people are highly civilized and intelligent, and enjoy good educational facilities. The Lutheran is the established church, but the public profession of all other creeds is allowed. Attachment to the Lutheran Church is, however, requisite to the enjoyment of many political and civil privileges. The establishment of the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Norway was the direct result of the ministrations of the Rev. O. G. Hedstrom at the Bethel ship in the city of New York. Two young Norwegians who had been converted at the Bethel ship returning to their homes, perceived an opening for missionary work in their own country, and asked that a missionary be sent over. The Rev. O. P. Petersen, also a convert at the Bethel ship, who had been sent to preach to the Scandinavians in the West, was appointed missionary to Norway. He was ordained at the Wyoming Conference, and reached his field of labor in December, 1853. He began his work with two assistants, and at the end of the first year reported that fifty persons were "with us," and that a class of twenty serious persons had been formed. In 1856 the mission was prosecuted at the two stations of Sarpsburg and Fredrickshald. Its progress was slow for the first few years on account of the necessity of complying with the conditions and going through the legal process required to get the church formally recognized by the state as regular. The first church was built at Sarpsburg, in 1858, by the poor people of the society, without any help from abroad. The missions in Norway, Sweden (established in 1854), and Denmark (established in 1856) were all regarded as one, and so reported upon as the "Scandinavian mission" till 1868, when they were divided into three superintendencies, one for each country. The Norwegian mission was assigned to the charge of the Rev. O. P. Petersen. The mission was first visited, in 1857, by Bishop Simpson. It was again visited, in 1866, by the corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society, who, in his report, gave account of the churches at Sarpsburg, Fredrickstadt, Fredrickshald, Porsgrund, Odalen, Hólund, and Christiania (the capital), which together had 660 members and probationers, with 124 Sunday-school scholars. The following is a summary of the statistics of the mission, as they were reported in 1869, at the time of the division of the Scandinavian churches: stations at Fredrickshald, Fredrickstadt, Sarpsburg, Christiania, Horten, Porsgrund, Arendal, Odalen, Hólund, Hammer, 10; number of missionaries, 8; of members, 656; of probationers, 85; of churches, 7; of Sunday-schools, 9; of teachers in the same, 32; of Sunday-school scholars, 241; of children baptized during the year, 35; probable value of the churches, $15,428; amount of debt upon the same, $4345.69. The reports of this year mention the difficulties which the mission experienced from the troublesome formalities which persons intending to join the Methodist Church were obliged to fulfill in order to get released from the state church, and from the fact that the children were educated in the Lutheran schools, and thereby made disposed to leave the mission and be confirmed in the Lutheran Church. On the other hand, it was claimed that the mission had served as a stimulus to the Lutherans to inspire them to greater activity in instructing their people. Mr. Petersen, superintendent of the mission, returned to the United States in 1871, and was succeeded by the Rev. M. Hansen as acting superintendent, who was appointed regular superintendent in 1873. A weekly paper for Sunday-schools was started in 1871, which had gained 2400 subscribers in 1873, and a church periodical was started in 1872, which had at the close of the next year a subscription list of nearly 1300 names. A school for the training of young men was begun in 1874, with seven students. The church at Christiania, the capital of the kingdom, which was built at a cost of $16,800, was dedicated in the same year by Bishop Harris. In 1875 the superintendent, making a comparison of the condition of the mission at that time with its condition in 1870, said of its financial progress: "The collections for all purposes in the year 1870 were $3066.96, but this year we have raised $13,124.97. In 1870 we had no missionary collections, and nothing received for self-support. This year it was allotted to the missions in Norway to collect $725 in currency for the Missionary Society, but we have been able to raise $843.65 in gold, and besides that, we have collected $823.11 for self-support." The General Conference of 1876 ordered the Norwegian mission to be organized into an Annual Conference. The organization was effected, under the superintendency of Bishop Andrews, on the 17th of August of the same year.

The following is a summary of the statistical reports of the missions in Norway, as given in the report of the Missionary Society for 1876:

Norwich, Conn. (pop. 16,653), one of the capitals of New London County, was settled as early as 1659. While Jesse Lee was traveling through the eastern part of the State he preached at Tolland to a large congregation. Mrs. Thankful Pierce, of Norwich, was present, and was so much interested in the doctrines and spirit of this "new sect" that she invited Mr. Lee to her town, where he preached the first Methodist sermon in her house, June 25, 1790. She was the first Methodist convert. The next day he preached in the old academy. In 1796 a small class was formed, which was the germ of the North M. E. church, the parent of all the M. E. churches of the city. The society at first worshiped in the academy, and in 1831 succeeded in building a house of worship. Prominent in this movement was Erastus Wentworth, Esq., father of Rev. Dr. Wentworth, formerly editor of The Ladies' Repository. Lee had preached his first sermon at the landing, but no class was formed in that part of the city until 1798, when services were commenced first in the house of Mr. Beatty, then in the old Masonic Hall, and were conducted by local preachers. By various causes the society was diminished, until there was preaching only once in four weeks, until 1811, when a separate society was formed at the landing. In 1816, Mr. Bently on his own responsibility contracted for the erection of a church, and to build it mortgaged his property. It was known as the Wharf Bridge church, and was swept away by a great flood in 1824. In 1825 the Sachem Street church was dedicated. In 1835 the Main Street church, an offshoot from the Sachem Street church, was dedicated, and it became a separate station the following year. About 1834 a class of six persons was formed at Greenville, and a church was built and dedicated in 1840. This church was subsequently sold, but another church, erected by some of the remaining members, was dedicated in 1864. Some of the members from the East Main Street church established the Bethel or Central Wharf, which was fitted up and opened for worship in 1854. A new church was subsequently built, which was much embarrassed until 1866. This city is in the Providence Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are reported as follows:

Norwich, N. Y. (pop. 4279), the capital of Chenango County, is a flourishing town. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1827, with Josiah Keys as pastor, who reported on the circuit 236 members. It was then in the Genesee Conference. In 1829 it was in the Oneida Conference, and had 134 members. Methodism has prospered in this city. The Free Methodists and the African M. E. Church have small congregations. It is in the Wyoming Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Nova Scotia is one of the six Conferences into which the Methodist Church of Canada is divided. The first Methodists emigrated from Yorkshire, England, in 1771, and were followed for several years by others from the same section. These generally settled in the county of Cumberland, though a few passed over into New Brunswick, near Nova Scotia. Others settled in Halifax, and became the centres of early Methodist societies. During a revival which took place in Cumberland, in 1779, William Black was converted, and in 1781 became the first provincial itinerant. In 1784 he attended the Christmas Conference at Baltimore, was afterwards ordained by Bishop Coke, and was the superintendent of the work in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and New Foundland. He was familiarly called Bishop Black. In 1783 a few of the Methodists from New York found their way to Nova Scotia with the Royalists of that period. These principally settled in Shelbourne, on the south coast of the province. Among them were Robert Berry, a correspondent of Mr. Wesley, and a faithful member of the church; John Mann, a local preacher and trustee of the John Street church, who became one of the early provincial itinerants, and his brother, James Mann, who became a successful preacher, both of whom were ordained by Dr. Coke, at Philadelphia, in May, 1789. As early as 1783 W. Black corresponded with Mr. Wesley, earnestly asking him to send out preachers; but Mr. Wesley seemed to think that these could be more easily obtained from the United States. Attending the Conference of 1784, through his earnest appeals, Freeborn Garrettson and James O. Cromwell were sent to Nova Scotia. They remained about two years, and were succeeded by others. All the ministers arriving in the province between 1785 and 1800 were from the United States, with the exception of two, Messrs. Ray and Bishop, who were subsequently sent to the West Indies. It seems to have been the purpose of both Mr. Wesley and Dr. Coke to place the work in the British provinces under the superintendence of the American Conference. In the published list of appointments, Black's name appears as presiding elder, and the distinction of elders and deacons was observed as in the American minutes. After 1800 the ministers were generally supplied from England; especially was this the case after 1817, when the Wesleyan Missionary Society was formed. In 1815 districts were formed, and in 1855 the eastern part of Nova Scotia was associated with the Conference of Eastern British America. The value of the connectional property in the city of Halifax in 1876 was estimated at $110,000; in the town of Yarmouth, about $41,000.

Noyes, Henry Sanborn, was born Dec. 24, 1822, in Landaff, N. H., and was a teacher in Newbury Seminary, and in Springfield, Vt. In 1848 he graduated from the Wesleyan University, and subsequently became teacher of Mathematics and Greek, and then principal in the Newbury Seminary, Vt. In 1855 he was elected Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy in the Northwestern University, Evanston, Ill., and in 1860 to 1867 was acting president. In 1870 he traveled in Europe for his health. He died on May 24, 1872. He united with the M. E. Church in his youth, and was not only eminent in scholarship, but was a devoted Christian. In addition to the duties of his professorship, he acted as agent for the university for a number of years.

Nutt, Cyrus, D.D., formerly president of Indiana State University, entered as a student in Alleghany College, and graduated in 1837. He was elected principal of the preparatory department of the Indiana Asbury University in 1838. Subsequently he became Professor of Mathematics, and was for a time acting president. He united with the Indiana Conference in 1838, and filled successfully several stations. He was, in 1861, elected president of the State University, where he remained until shortly before his death, which took place in 1875. He was a man of fine culture, exceedingly studious, careful, and systematic in all his movements, and was a superior teacher.

Nyack, N. Y. (pop. 3438), is situated in Rockland County, on the west bank of the Hudson River. Methodism was introduced about 1800. The first church was built in 1803. The second edifice was erected in 1842. A new church was begun in 1873, but in litigation both it and all the church property were lost. This town first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1840, with Richard Lanning and George Winson as pastors. It remained a circuit for some years. In 1857 there were two appointments in the charge, and the two remained until 1864. In 1865 it reported 217 members, 215 Sunday-school scholars, and $7500 church property. It is now in the Newark Conference, and has 319 members and 370 Sunday-school scholars. There is also an African M. E. Zion church.

Nynee Tal is a village in the mountainous region of India, which is visited in the hot season as a sanitarium. It lies on the edge of a lake which is a mile long, and is 6409 feet above the level of the sea. The mountains rise in the vicinity 2323 feet higher than the lake, or 8732 feet above the sea-level. From the top of these lower mountains there is a view of the snowy range towering up more than 20,000 feet, and there is also from the same summits a view of the great plains of India, stretching onward towards the ocean, which is said to be one of the grandest views in the world. The native population is about 2500, and there are probably as many transient residents; a part of whom are English soldiers, in a military sanitarium. The mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church has a sanitarium for its enfeebled or disabled missionaries, which has been of great service to those in impaired health. There is also a chapel and school building, where services or school are regularly held. It was to this place that Dr. Butler and his family escaped when the Sepoy Rebellion broke out in India.

O

Oakland, Cal. (pop. 10,500), is situated on the eastern shore of the San Francisco Bay. Methodist services were introduced in 1856. The first M. E. church was erected in 1862. This congregation built another edifice in 1863, and another in 1875-76. In East Oakland services were begun in 1870, and a church was built the same year. The Centennial church was built in 1874, and rebuilt in 1877. The German Methodists have a small membership and a church edifice. The African M. E. Zion church purchased the First M. E. church building in 1862, which they still occupy. It is in the California Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Obituary Notices of itinerant ministers are contained in the Annual Minutes. The first references to the death of ministers was made by Mr. Wesley, in 1777, and are remarkable for their brevity. They are as follows: "John Slocumb, at Clones, an old laborer, worn out in the service. John Harrison, near Lisburn, a promising youth, serious, modest, and much devoted to God. William Lumley, in Huxham, a blessed young man, a happy witness of the full liberty of the children of God. William Minethorp, near Dunbar, an Israelite indeed, 'in whom there is no guile.'" In succeeding years these notices were somewhat longer. But when the sainted Fletcher deceased, who was so remarkable for his personal piety, his intellectual power, and his force as a writer, the only notice is, "John Fletcher, a pattern of all holiness, scarce to be paralleled in the century." So fully had the example of Mr. Wesley influenced the preachers, that at the time of his death, in 1791, the only minute was the following: "It may be expected that the Conference make some observation on the death of Mr. Wesley, but they find themselves utterly inadequate to express their ideas on this awful and affecting event. Our souls do truly mourn for their great loss, and they trust they shall give the most substantial proofs of their veneration for the memory of their most esteemed father and friend by endeavoring with great humility and diffidence to follow and imitate him in doctrine, discipline, and life." After that time these notes were considerably enlarged, but there is no reference to the date of either the birth, admission into Conference, or death of the ministers until 1798, when a few dates were given. After 1800 a marked change as to the length and character of the notices appears. In England, the manuscript is generally prepared by a colleague or personal friend of the deceased: the account is submitted to the district meeting, and is forwarded to be read in the Conference, being finally revised and passed before it appears in the minutes. The reading of these obituaries is always preceded by singing and prayer. In the American minutes, the first obituary notices appear in 1785, and are patterned after the earlier notices of Mr. Wesley. The date of decease is first given in 1790, but only in a few cases, and after 1794 the notices increase in minuteness and length. More recently obituary notices of the wives of Methodist preachers are given in the Annual, but not in the General Minutes.

Ocean Grove, a Christian seaside summer resort and camp-meeting ground, is located on the Atlantic coast, six miles south of Long Branch, in Monmouth Co., N. J. The association, which consists of thirteen ministers and thirteen laymen, all of whom are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was organized Dec. 22, 1869. The ground comprises 350 acres, three-fourths of which are covered by a thrifty grove of oak and pine. It is laid out in broad avenues, some of which, as they approach the sea, widen to 300 feet. These avenues are graded and graveled, so that many of them are solid walks or drives. An inexhaustible supply of pure water is obtained by means of tube pumps, driven through the clay and gravel to an average depth of 25 feet. There are over 600 cottages, some of which are small and have cost but a few hundred dollars, while others are large and imposing structures, involving an expenditure of several thousands. In addition to these there are numerous hotels or boarding-houses, besides the annual occupancy of more than 600 temporary tents. The auditorium and tabernacle for religious worship are located in the edge of the grove, 500 yards from the sea, and persons seated in either place may behold vessels of different kinds passing up and down the coast. Services, varying in character, including an annual camp-meeting of high order, are held through the summer months. These, while entirely under the direction of the Methodist Episcopal Church, through the association, are, nevertheless, of the broadest catholicity; and all the evangelical denominations enter into their spirit, and cheerfully take part. The development of the higher forms of religious experience is the constant aim of these meetings, while the social element has the largest opportunity for its purest exercise. The gates are always closed on the holy Sabbath, and as neither horses nor vehicles of any kind appear, a stillness prevails, which is broken only by the voice of prayer and praise.

The bathing is superior, and boating on the lake is a source of unmingled enjoyment to all. There are no swamps or marshes in the vicinity, and the neighborhood is remarkably free from miasma and mosquitoes. Neither ardent spirits nor tobacco are allowed to be sold upon the grounds, and, by a special law of the State, the liquor traffic is prohibited for a distance of one mile in all directions from the turnpike bridge over Wesley Lake. The railroad, postal, telegraph, and boarding facilities are abundant, and persons desiring to spend a short time at the seaside can do so at moderate cost. This enterprise is in no sense a speculation. All the income, from whatever source, is applied to the improvement of the place, or if at any time there should be a surplus, it is to be applied to benevolent objects. The members of the association, while they devote both time and labor to promote its interests, have prohibited themselves by charter regulations from making it a source of personal gain.

Ogden, Benjamin, an early pioneer preacher of the M. E. Church, was born in 1764, in New Jersey. Though young, he served in the Revolutionary War, and afterwards removed to Kentucky. He engaged in missionary labors, and endured great hardship in preaching the gospel throughout the Mississippi valley, and to some of the Indian tribes.

Ocuppaugh, Edmund, a lay delegate from the Western New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Greene Co., N. Y., about 1830; removed to Rochester in early life, and there joined the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is engaged in mercantile business, and is an active worker in

He was greatly encouraged by assistance given by Thomas Stevenson and his wife, of the Southern Methodist field, who organized the first Methodist church in Kentucky. He located in 1788, and died in 1834.

Ogden, Utah (pop. 3127), is situated on the Union and Central Pacific Railroad. The inhabitants are chiefly Mormons. The first Methodist services were held June 28, 1870. In 1872 the Rocky Mountain Conference was organized, and D. G. Strong was appointed to Ogden circuit. The following year it was united with Morgan City. In 1874 the church edifice was erected. The parsonage was built in 1876, and a church of 19 members was organized. A day-school was commenced with some 60 pupils. The church property is estimated at $8000.

Ogdensburg, N. Y. (pop. 10,076), is in St. Lawrence County, on the St. Lawrence River. Methodism was introduced after the War of 1812, and the first church was erected in 1825. It was rebuilt in 1850, and again rebuilt in 1867. The place is first mentioned in the minutes in 1826, in connection with the Black River district of the Genesee Conference. It was the head of a circuit which reported, in 1827, 225 members. In 1829 it fell within the bounds of the Oneida Conference, then recently organized, and subsequently it became a station. It is in the Northern New York Conference, and has 312 members, 275 Sunday-school scholars, and $15,000 of church property.

Oglesby, Joseph, a Western Methodist minister, was appointed missionary to Illinois in 1804; was the first preacher who ever visited that part of the country. He traveled extensively through Illinois, Missouri, and Indiana, and was very popular among the early inhabitants.

Ohio (pop. 2,665,260) now ranks as the third State in the Union. It was the first State formed ceeded in building a small log house large enough for the neighborhood; the first Methodist meeting-house on the circuit, and was perhaps the first in the Northwestern Territory." There has been some discussion whether the first Methodist meeting-house in Ohio was in the Scioto Valley or near Short Creek, in the eastern part of the State. There are the ruins of an old church about 14 miles from Portsmouth, which was in the original Scioto circuit. "The building was 24 feet square, with a very small door or window on each side, and was built of 'scored' logs. It was surrounded by a burying-ground, where a number of the early settlers sleep." out of the territory northwest of the Ohio River, and was admitted into the Union in 1803. Methodism was introduced between 1788 and 1792, in the vicinity of Cincinnati, in Jefferson County, opposite Wellsburg, Va., and in the eastern side of the State near the Chenango region of Pennsylvania. Francis McCormick crossed the river from Kentucky, and located at Millville, Clairmont Co., O., between 1792 and 1796, and probably organized the first Methodist society in the Northwest Territory. In 1789, John Cobler was sent by Bishop Asbury as a missionary to the Northwest Territory to plant "the first principles of the gospel." Henry Smith, a Western pioneer, writes: "On the 6th of August, 1800, we proposed building a meeting-house (at Scioto, Brush Creek), for no private house would hold our week-day congregations. But we met with some who opposed it. We, however, suc-

Conference, informs us in his reminiscences that he crossed from Kentucky to Ohio in September, 1799, and formed the Scioto circuit. An effort was made to build a house in 1800, but it was not commenced until the following year. The first services were those of a quarterly meeting, Aug. 29, 1801. It was used for worship for about twenty years, and many of the fathers of the church had preached to its congregations. Its ruins are given in the accompanying cut. In 1798, Robert R. Roberts, since bishop, settled in Chenango, Pa., and the work was extended into the adjacent part of Ohio. The name Ohio is found in the minutes as early as 1787, but refers to the district of Pennsylvania and Virginia bordering on the Ohio River, from which, however, the ministers crossed over shortly after and organized societies on Short Creek. The Miami circuit was the first formed, in 1799, and Henry

Smith was pastor. In 1800 it was recorded in the minutes as the Northwestern Territory; Miami, and Scioto circuits, with 257 members. As the population increased the church was rapidly built up. Its eastern part was included within the Baltimore Conference, while the western part was included in the Western Conference, from which the Ohio Conference was subsequently formed. In 1824 the part of Ohio east of the Muskingum River, and of a line extending to the Cuyahoga River, at Cleveland, was embraced in the Pittsburgh Conference, then formed. The Ohio Conference has since been divided into the Cincinnati, Ohio, Northern Ohio, and Central Ohio, and the part formerly embraced in the Pittsburgh Conference, a part of which was subsequently included in the Erie Conference, is now known as the East Ohio. The State also embraces a large part of the Central German Conference. The Methodist Protestant Church has the Ohio and Muskingum Conferences, and a portion of the Pittsburgh. The African M. E. Church has also an Ohio Conference. The first Indian mission work was commenced by the Methodist Episcopal Church within the bounds of this State, at Upper Sandusky, among the Wyandot Indians, about 1815, though the mission was not supplied from the Conference until 1819. The Western Book Concern was established in Cincinnati about 1820, and The Western Advocate was issued in 1834. The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate also circulates as the chief church paper through East Ohio Conference. The movement which gave rise to the German work in the United States commenced in Ohio, where Dr. Nast was converted, and Cincinnati has been the great centre of German Methodist publications. The first seminary in the State under the patronage of the church was at Norwalk, O., which was abandoned when the Ohio Wesleyan University was erected at Delaware. Baldwin College or University was founded at Berea, in 1846, as also Mount Union College; the Ohio Wesleyan University and the Cincinnati Wesleyan Female College in 1842. There are also institutions at Xenia, Hillsborough, Scioto, and Springfield. The denominational statistics, as given in the U. S. census for 1870, are as follows:

Ohio Conference, African M. E. Church, includes all the State of Ohio, except Salem, Youngstown, and Warren, which are attached to the Pittsburgh Conference. At its session in 1876 it stationed 48 preachers and reported 108 local preachers, 6607 members, 4201 Sunday-school scholars, 74 churches, valued at $307,000, and 10 parsonages, valued at $15,400.

Ohio Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference in 1812, chiefly out of the former Western Conference. It then included the Ohio, Muskingum, Miami, Kentucky, and Salt River districts. The Ohio district was taken from the Baltimore Conference, and Kentucky and Salt River districts were in the State of Kentucky. In 1816 the Salt River district was transferred to the Tennessee Conference. In 1820 the bounds were changed so as to embrace that part of Pennsylvania lying west of the Alleghany River and a line extending from Franklin to the city of Erie, with Ohio, Indiana, and Michigan. In 1824 the Pittsburgh Conference was organized, and that part of Ohio now embraced in the East Ohio Conference was attached to it. The Ohio Conference included the Kanawha region, or what is now Western Virginia. Subsequently the Michigan Conference was organized, and in 1840 the North Ohio Conference. The territory originally included in it has developed into the five Conferences of Ohio, a portion of Pittsburgh and Erie, the Detroit and Michigan Conferences, the four Indiana Conferences, and Western Virginia. Its boundaries, as defined by the General Conference of 1876, are: "Commencing on the Muskingum River south of Dresden; thence down said river to the Ohio River, including Zanesville and Marietta; thence down the Ohio River to the mouth of Bush Creek; thence north to the southwest corner of Fayette County; thence north-west to the west line of Fayette County; thence north on the west line of the Fayette and Madison Counties to the Springfield branch of the Cleveland, Columbus and Cincinnati Railroad, leaving Vienna, Dunbarton, and Sinking Springs circuit west of said line; thence east on the southern boundaries of Central Ohio and North Ohio Conferences to the place of beginning, including Milford, Stratford, and St. Paul's church, in Delaware." The first session of the Ohio Conference was held at Chillicothe, Oct. 12, 1812. Bishops Asbury and McKendree presiding. Jacob Young says Chillicothe had become much larger, but he believed the Methodist church was rather declining. The record which Asbury makes is: "The Ohio Conference sat from Thursday, October 1, to Wednesday, the 7th. We had great order. The writer of this journal labored diligently, and was much assisted by the eldership in the business of the session; he preached three times, was called upon to ordain twelve deacons, and also to ordain elders. Upon the last day his strength failed. I want sleep, sleep, sleep: for three hours I lay undisturbed in bed, to which I had stolen on Wednesday, but they called me up to read off the stations. I have a terrible fever, but we must move." There were reported at this session 22,723 white and 561 colored members. Notwithstanding the continued diminution of its territory it has regularly increased in numbers. The statistics for 1876 are: 183 traveling and 213 local preachers, 41,515 members, 40,900 Sunday-school scholars, 496 churches, valued at $1,200,325, and 105 parsonages, valued at $193,520.

Ohio Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces that part of the State of Ohio lying west of the Scioto and Sandusky Rivers, except the counties of Crawford, Seneca, Sandusky, and Wyandot, which counties are embraced in Muskingum Conference." It reported, in 1877, 47 itinerant preachers, 5859 members, and church property valued at $166,275.

Ohio Wesleyan Female College, Delaware, O.—The date of the incorporation of this institution is 1853. The articles of association provide that "it shall be conducted on the most liberal principles, accessible to all religious denominations, and open for the education of young women in general, but shall ever be under the supervision of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Ohio."

Its affairs are controlled by a board of trustees representing the North Ohio Conference, the Central Ohio Conference, and the Ohio Conference.

The curriculum embraces three courses of study, the scientific, including the English branches usually pursued in such a course: the classical, including the scientific, with Latin and either German or French; and the baccalaureate, including the classical, with both the modern languages and Greek.

The course in music, both vocal and instrumental, is complete. It aims at the highest standard of classical culture, and pursues the methods sanctioned by the best musical authorities of Europe and America.

The course in painting and drawing is superior. The studio is furnished with skylight, casts and models, and other proper appliances, and is under the charge of an accomplished artist.

Two flourishing literary societies are connected with the institution, the Athenæum and the Clonian, the halls of which have been elegantly furnished by the ladies connected with them.

The philosophical apparatus is extensive, a cabinet of choice minerals has been collected, a reading-room supplied with newspapers and periodicals, both secular and religious, and a well-selected library is accessible to all.

William Richardson, A.M., is president, and Professor of Philosophy and Ancient Languages, and is assisted by an able staff of eight professors.

Ohio Wesleyan University is located at Delaware, O. In 1842 the citizens of Delaware purchased the property known as the "White Sulphur Springs," a watering-place of considerable note, and offered it, together with $10,000 in money, to the Ohio and North Ohio Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church, as a site for a college. An organization was at once effected, and a charter with full university powers secured during the following year. On November 13, 1844, the doors were opened to students. Rev. Edward Thomson, D.D., LL.D., afterwards bishop, was the first president. He served the institution with remarkable success for sixteen years, and until called to other labors by the church. He was succeeded, in 1860, by Rev. F. Merriek, D.D., LL.D., who had been connected with the university from its organization, first as agent, then as Professor of Natural Science. Dr. Merriek resigned the presidency in 1873, and has since held the relation of Lecturer on Natural and Revealed Religion. To him more than to any other one person is the Ohio Wesleyan indebted for its present financial prosperity. During the years 1873-76, Rev. L. D. McCabe, D.D., LL.D., who had also been connected with the university from the first, was acting president. In 1876 the trustees elected Rev. C. H. Payne, D.D., LL.D. Besides the president the faculty consists of 8 resident professors, 3 tutors, and assistants.

The curriculum embraces the following courses of study: classical, scientific, biblical, normal, and preparatory. The laboratories furnish special instruction in chemistry, physics, zoology and physiology. A special course in comparative anatomy, physiology, botany, and chemistry has been arranged for those students who expect to enter the profession of medicine or prepare themselves as druggists. It is expected that a full course in pharmacy will be added during the coming year. The facilities offered the students are ample. The library now contains over 10,000 volumes, in addition to the society libraries of 3000 volumes. The museum occupies the second and third floors of Merriek Hall, and is one of the largest and most complete in the West. It is estimated to contain 100,000 specimens. The total number of graduates (1877) is 683, of whom nearly 200 have become ministers; 10 are missionaries in other lands. The average number of students is about 350. Value of grounds, buildings, library, and museum, $200,000. Endowment bearing interest, $225,000. Endowment subject to annuity or otherwise unproductive, $150,000. Total value of property and endowments, $575,000. The campus of the university embraces 20 acres of rolling ground, upon which are now growing more than 800 varieties of trees and shrubs. Conferences, and the Association of Alumni, each body having equal representation on the board of trustees. College year opens on the 3d Thursday of September. Commencement occurs on the last Thursday of June.

O'Kelley, James, was born about 1757. He commenced his ministerial work in the middle of the Revolutionary War, and in 1778 was admitted into the traveling connection. He was one of those ordained elders at the organization of the M. E. Church in 1784. He was for several years presiding elder of the South Virginia district, and was a member of the first council that met in 1789. Becoming offended with Bishop Asbury, he labored to change the general economy of the church. In the General Conference of 1792 he offered a resolution, "that if any preacher felt himself aggrieved or oppressed by the appointment made by the bishop, he should have the privilege of appealing to the Conference, which should consider and finally determine the matter." After full and thorough debate the resolution was lost, whereupon he withdrew from the Conference, and was joined by a few of the brethren. Bishop Asbury endeavored to treat him kindly; proposed that he and his asso-

he was joined by three traveling and a number of local preachers. The name was suggested by the prevalence of Republican principles in Virginia at that time, and they endeavored to give the church a political east. All of the preachers according to their order were to stand on an equal footing; no degrees were allowed in the ministry, and a greater liberty was promised to the people than they enjoyed in the old church. The result was, "a few of the preaching-houses were seized by them and the rightful owners turned out-of-doors; from others the Methodists retired in order to avoid strife. . . . Asbury was the object of their peculiar displeasure; they took special pains to impeach his character in every possible way before the public; the name of bishop they professed to regard with holy horror." Bennet in his history says, speaking of the border counties of Virginia and North Carolina, "In all this region the influence of O'Kelley was very great, and he scrupled not to use it to the utmost of his ability to build up his own cause; . . . families were rent asunder, brother was opposed to brother, parents and children were moved against each other, warm friends became open enemies, and the claims of Christian love were forgotten in the disputes about church government." Jesse Lee says, "It was enough to make the saints of God weep, between the porch and the altar, and that both day and night, to see how the Lord's people was carried away captive by the division." The minutes show from 1792 to 1798 a declension of about 8000. Mr.

Mrs. C. R. Duel (now Mrs. J. A. Wright), Second Directress; Mrs. Dr. Palmer, Third Directress; Mrs. R. A. Redding, Treasurer; Mrs. William B. Skidmore, Recording Secretary. The ladies issued a monthly periodical in behalf of their society, with the title of "Voice from the Old Brewery." To the enterprise of Mrs. Wright, Mrs. Skidmore, Mrs.

OLD BREWERY.

O'Kelley issued a pamphlet giving his reasons for protesting against the Methodist Episcopal Church. This was replied to by Nicholas Snethen, and it was followed by an additional pamphlet on each side. Mr. O'Kelley ordained such preachers as came to him, but was disappointed in the number of proselytes, being far below his expectations. In 1801 he changed the name of the church to the Christian Church, and divisions and subdivisions followed, until in twenty years from its commencement there remained but little of the organization. He died Oct. 16, 1826.

Old Brewery, The, was a large building, formerly used as a brewery, which stood in the Five Points, New York. It was purchased by the Ladies' Home Missionary Society for a mission house in that depraved locality. The building was torn down and a mission house was erected in its place in 1853. The first officers of the Missionary Society were Mrs. Bishop E. L. Janes, First Directress;

Olin, and other ladies the success of this enterprise has been largely due. (See FIVE POINTS MISSION.)

Olin, Mrs. Julia M., is the daughter of Judge James Lynch, a man of noble character, descended from an ancient Galway family, whose ancestor, Sir Hugo de Lynch, was general under William the Conqueror. She married the Rev. Dr. Olin, president of the Wesleyan University, in 1843, and accompanied him to Europe in 1846, where he went as delegate to the Evangelical Alliance. After his death, in 1851, she returned with her only surviving son, Henry, to Glenburn, her summer home in Rhinebeck; spending the winters in New York, and part of the years 1867 and 1868 in Europe with her son. Aided by some literary friends, she edited Dr. Olin's Works, 1852, his "Life and Letters," 1853, "Greece and the Golden Horn," 1854; the proceeds of which latter work were given to establish a prize in the Wesleyan University. In 1855 she compiled a volume of poems, entitled "Hillside Flowers," in aid of a pretty stone chapel which had grown out of a Sunday-school in the woods of Glenburn. Compiled "Words of the Wise" and "String of Pearls," with a daily text and illustrative passage from eminent authors. Contributed to The Ladies' Repository, Western Christian Advocate, and Methodist Quarterly Review. Wrote the following Sunday-school books: "Four Days in July," "Winter in Woodlawn," "What Norman saw in the West," "Hawk-Hollow Stories," "Curious and Useful Questions on the Bible," four series, "Questions on the Natural History of the Bible," "Questions on Lessons for Every Sunday in the Year," four volumes; also, "The Perfect Sight, or Seven Hues of Christian Character." A Sunday-school teacher all her life, from the age of seventeen, she has been connected with the Five Points mission as treasurer, directress, or corresponding secretary twenty-six years, corresponding secretary of the New York Female Auxiliary Bible Society twenty-five years: she was corresponding secretary of the Ladies' Centenary Association of New York; has been for six years president of the New York branch of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and one of the editorial corps of The Heathen Woman's Friend.

Olin, Stephen, D.D., LL.D., formerly president of Wesleyan University, was born in Leicester, Vt.,

REV. STEPHEN OLIN, D.D., LL.D.

March 2, 1797. He graduated at Middlebury College, taking the honors of his class, and was pronounced by one of the professors "the ripest scholar who had ever come before him to be examined for a degree." His health being impaired, he accepted the position of principal of Tabernacle Academy, in South Carolina, where he was converted; and in 1824 entered the South Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church. In 1826 he was appointed Professor of English Literature in the University of Georgia, and filled the chair for seven years. In 1834 he accepted the presidency of Randolph Macon College, Va., to which he had been elected two years previously, but had declined. From 1837 to 1841 he traveled in Europe and the East, and the result of his visit appeared in two volumes, entitled "Travels in Egypt, Petra, and the Holy Land." He made some interesting discoveries in Petra. In 1842 he was elected president of the Wesleyan University, which office he continued to fill until his death. He was a delegate to the first meeting of the Evangelical Alliance in London, in 1846; and was also a delegate to the General Conferences of 1844 and 1852. Several volumes have been published since his death, edited by Mrs. Olin. Dr. Olin was a man of rare intellectual powers, of wonderful vigor and richness of thought, and his moral character was yet grander; in the pulpit he was instructive and oftentimes overwhelming. Dr. McClintock said of him, "In beautiful blending of logical argument with fiery feeling, he was more like what we know Demosthenes to have been than any speaker we have ever listened to; and his power (as was the case with the great Athenian orator) did not consist in any single quality, in force of reasoning, or fire of imagination, or heat of declamation, but in all combined." For many years of his life his health was exceedingly feeble; his soul seemed too large for the body which encased it. His nervous power gradually gave way, and he died in Middletown, Conn., Aug. 15, 1851.

Olin, William H., D.D., a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1860, 1864, 1868, 1872, and 1876, was born in Lawrence, Otsego Co., N. Y., about 1822, and was admitted to practice in the Supreme Court of the State of New York in 1844. He joined the church in 1849; was admitted to the Oneida Conference in 1851, and was transferred to the Wyoming Conference in 1869. He represented the Oneida Conference in the General Conference in 1860, 1864, and 1868, and the Wyoming Conference in 1872.

Olivers, Thomas, an English Wesleyan, commenced his ministry in 1753; was associated with the Conference printing-office; was an eminently useful minister; also a poet and musician of no common order. The well-known hymn, "The God of Abraham praise," in three parts, is a proof of the former, while some of the tunes he composed are still sung. He died in 1799.

Olmstead, De Witt C., a delegate from the Wyoming Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Tioga Co., N. Y.: was under Universalist influences in his youth, but became a Methodist when sixteen years old, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1850.

Omaha, Neb. (pop. 16,083), the capital of Douglas County, is the most populous and important city in the State. Methodism was introduced into this region about 1851, when William Simpson was sent to Council Bluffs mission from Iowa Conference. Omaha first appears on the records of the M. E. Church for 1854. It reported, in 1855, in connection with the Missouri Conference, 26 members. In 1856 the General Conference organized the Kansas and Nebraska Conference, and Omaha fell into its bounds. In 1860 the Nebraska Conference was organized, and in 1861 Omaha reported 81 members, 117 Sunday-school scholars, and $6000 church property. It is in the Nebraska Conference, and the statistics are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
First Church.....	232	400
Eighteenth Street.....	95	325	$10,000

Oneida, N. Y. (pop. 3262), situated in Madison County, on the New York Central Railroad, was originally connected with one of the first circuits in this part of the State. Cayuga and Oneida are mentioned as one charge, though embracing other appointments, as early as 1799, when Ephraim Chambers and Barzillai Willy were in charge. Oneida reported separately 92 members in 1802. In 1857 it had become a well-established station, having 145 members, 112 Sunday-school scholars, and $3000 church property. This town is now in the Central New York Conference, and has 208 members, 137 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property.

Onondaga Conference, M. P. Church, is bounded as follows: "Beginning where the west line of Wayne County intersects Lake Ontario, running south to its intersection with the State line dividing the States of Pennsylvania and New York: thence east on said line to the east line of Delaware County; thence north, following the line dividing the New York and Onondaga districts, to the northeast corner of Hamilton County; thence east to Lake Champlain; thence down said lake to the Canada line; thence west to the St. Lawrence River; thence up said river and Lake Ontario to the place of beginning." It reported, in 1877, 54 itinerant ministers, 1516 members, and church property valued at $71,150.

Ontario Ladies' College, Canada, was founded in 1874, and is located in Whitby, a pleasant and healthful town, 30 miles east of Toronto. The buildings are of Gothic architecture, and cost about $70,000. The grounds embrace 10 acres. The college is controlled by a board of 21 directors, and is under the patronage of the Toronto Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada. Its officers are Rev. J. E. Sanderson, M.A., governor, appointed by the Conference, and Rev. J. J. Hare, B.A., principal, appointed by the directors, with an able corps of teachers. The course of instruction is thorough. The expenses of pupils vary from $150 to $250 per annum. About 150 pupils are in attendance.

Orange, N. J. (pop. 9348), is situated in Essex County, northwest from Newark. It was for some time included in the Essex circuit, one of the first organized in this region. It appears by name on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1832, when Edmund S. Janes, afterwards bishop, was pastor. In 1857 it had become a well-established station, having 175 members, 205 Sunday-school scholars, and $9000 church property. It is in the New York Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Ordination is the form or ceremony of setting apart persons properly chosen for the various offices of the ministry. The Methodist Churches, in common with Protestants, wholly reject the Romish idea of ordination being a sacrament. They regard it as simply a solemn and appropriate form of indicating the selection of the church, and its authorization of the persons selected to perform the various functions of the ministry. Mr. Wesley, who had been regularly ordained a deacon and a presbyter in the Church of England, was raised up in a peculiar manner to be the head of a great religious movement. He sought in various ways to obtain ordination for his preachers. Becoming satisfied by careful study that presbyters and bishops were of the same order, and that according to the order of the ancient church presbyters might ordain to the office of bishop when circumstances required it, he finally resolved to exercise the authority which he believed that God had vested in him. The members of the Methodist societies in America had earnestly requested their preachers to administer the sacraments, but out of regard for church order they declined. A few of them, in 1779, resolved to ordain some of their number for this work, but were finally prevailed upon by Mr. Asbury to desist until the advice of Mr. Wesley could be obtained. As the ministers of the Church of England had fled from the colonies, abandoning their churches, and as societies could not obtain the sacraments, he ordained Dr. Thomas Coke, a presbyter of the Church of England, as superintendent or bishop, and also ordained Richard Whatcoat and Thomas Vasey as elders, to administer the sacraments to the American Methodist societies. A Conference or Convention of ministers was called at Baltimore, who, according to Mr. Wesley's judgment, formed the Methodist Episcopal Church. Dr. Coke and Francis Asbury were elected as bishops, and Dr. Coke ordained Mr. Asbury on three separate days, first as deacon, then as elder, and then as superintendent or bishop. At the same Conference about twenty preachers were elected deacons, and seventeen of them were elected elders, four of whom were absent. According to the order of the Methodist Episcopal Church, its ministers, after having traveled two years are eligible to the office of deacon, and in two years more to the office of elder. Its superintendents or bishops are elected by the General Conference. The deacons are ordained by the laying on of the hands of a bishop; the elders by the laying on of the hands of a bishop and of elders who are present, and a bishop is ordained by the laying on of the hands of a bishop or bishops and of elders who may be present. In England and in the churches derived from them, as in India and Australia, local preachers are not ordained, and there is only the ordination of elders. In the Methodist Episcopal Churches local preachers are eligible to ordination after proper authorization and examination. This step was taken because in the large circuits and sparse populations many of the congregations were gathered by local preachers, and their services were deemed necessary in the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper.

Ordination of Ministers (English Wesleyan).—The question of the administration of the Lord's Supper in Wesleyan chapels and by Wesleyan ministers occupied a very large share of attention in the connection after Mr. Wesley's death. That he expected this is evident from the agitation that ever and anon arose in the latter days of his life, but which his own venerable presence and counsel seldom failed to quell. The events which led to the administration are easily traced and understood. In 1743, Mr. Wesley was refused the sacrament by the curate at Epworth. In Bristol many were driven from the communion simply because they were followers of Mr. Wesley; and such persecutions arose as made it necessary for the sufferers to seek the ordinance elsewhere, and from other hands. Deep sympathy for his people, and an anxiety for them to receive the sacrament, prompted Mr. Wesley to invite a Greek bishop to ordain Dr. Jones; this was done in 1763. By journal of Sept. 1, 1784, we find that Mr. Wesley ordained two ministers for America, as presbyters, to baptize and administer the Lord's Supper: and about the same time he ordained Dr. Coke as a bishop or superintendent, also for America. The needs of his people in Scotland led him, in 1785, to ordain three ministers for them: and two years later, three for England were ordained. Thus much prior to his death. After this event, Dr. Coke, being anxious to avoid the alienation of members, took steps for the ordination of preachers as chosen by the Conference. The plan of the doctor was not carried out. In 1792 it was ruled that no ordinations should take place without the consent of the Conference, and any minister acting thus would exclude himself. Ordination by imposition of hands was mooted at the Conference of 1791, but was overruled as being merely circumstantial. This was confirmed by a decision in 1794. At the Conference of 1822 the plan was again brought forward and withdrawn; but in 1836 the proposition, that all candidates for ordination should, if approved, be admitted into full connection by the laying on of hands, was passed with only two dissentients. This service, though held in the midst of the proceedings of Conference, is a separate service, publicly advertised, and held in the midst of the congregation. The service opens with singing and prayer, after which the president reads the Collect, Epistle, and Gospel, with the address found (with a few verbal alterations) in the Book of Common Prayer, under the title of the "Form and Manner of Ordaining Elders." The usual questions are asked,—these must be answered by every candidate in a distinct and audible voice. The president reads a short collect, calls on the congregation to unite in silent prayer, then three appropriate prayers are offered, after which, the candidates kneeling, the president and other ministers put their hands, severally, on each candidate, using the accustomed formula. Each receives a Bible inscribed by the president and secretary. The Lord's Supper is then administered to the newly ordained, and the ex-president delivers to them a solemn charge respecting the important office to which they have been set apart. The service is closed by extemporary prayer from one or two senior ministers. It is a standing rule that the ministers taking part in the ordination should be the president, secretary, ex-president, and a few others chosen by the president.

Oregon (pop. 90,923).—The western coast of North America was explored by Sir Francis Drake from 1578 to 1583, and was called New Albion by the British. Vancouver afterwards named the coast, from 45° to 50°, New Georgia. In 1792, Captain Gray, from Boston, discovered and entered the Columbia River. In 1804, Captains Lewis and Clark explored the territory across the continent from the mouth of the Missouri River to the mouth of the Columbia; and in 1808–11 trading-posts were formed by the American Fur Company in that territory. In 1846, by treaty, the United States abandoned all claims north of 49°, and in 1853 Washington Territory was erected, embracing the country north of 46°. Emigration commenced overland in 1839. Oregon was formally organized as a Territory in 1848, and admitted as a State into the Union in 1859. In 1832 four Indians, belonging to the Flathead tribe, living west of the Rocky Mountains, came to St. Louis, inquiring for a knowledge of the Bible. Notice of this being published in 1833, Christian sympathy was excited, and, under the auspices of the Missionary Board, Jason Lee and Daniel Lee became missionaries, and with several others, in 1834, crossed the continent, arriving, in September, at Wallawalla. A school was soon opened and preaching was established. In 1836 the mission was largely reinforced, and again in 1839. The work among the Indians accomplished but little. The station formed at the Dalles was broken up by the vicissitudes of war. As population, however, increased by emigration from the Eastern States, mission stations were built up, churches were erected, and the General Conference of 1848 authorized the formation of the Oregon and California Mission Conference. This met in Salem, Oregon, William Roberts being superintendent of the mission. There were in the Territory, in 1851, 486 members, including 17 local preachers, and 15 ministers were appointed to different charges. There are now two Conferences, the Oregon, and the Columbia River, which embrace also Washington Territory. The M. E. Church South has a Conference called Columbia. A school was established at Salem, which has now become the Willamette University, under the care of the M. E. Church. The M. E. Church South has also a literary institution at Corvallis. The Pacific Christian Advocate is published at Portland, Oregon, where there is also an academy, under the patronage of the M. E. Church. The denominational statistics, as given in the United States census of 1870, are as follows:

Oregon Conference was organized by the General Conference of 1852, and then "included the Territory of Oregon." Prior to that time it had been embraced in the Oregon and California Conference, which had been established by the General Conference of 1848. Its boundaries as defined in 1876 are: "That part of the State of Oregon and Washington Territory lying west of the Cascade Mountains, and so much of what is known as Goose Lake Valley as lies within the State of Oregon." It was visited by Bishop Ames in 1853, and then reported 27 traveling and 35 local preachers, and 921 members. The reports for 1876 are as follows: 62 traveling and 66 local preachers, 4364 members, 4718 Sunday-school scholars, 576 churches, valued at $143,600, and 33 parsonages, valued at $25,200.

Oregon Conference, M. P. Church, embraces the State of Oregon and Washington Territory. It reported, in 1877, 7 itinerant preachers, 100 members, and church property valued at $166,275.

Original Sin.—The seventh Article of Religion as held by the Methodist Churches reads: "Original sin standeth not in the following of Adam (as the Pelagians do vainly talk), but it is the corruption of the nature of every man that naturally is engendered of the offspring of Adam, whereby man is far gone from original righteousness, and of his own nature inclined to evil, and that continually." This doctrine stands directly opposed to that of the Socinians, who deny that man is naturally corrupt. It also differs from the doctrine of the Pelagians, that, notwithstanding the results of the fall, man still retains the power independently of divine grace to inaugurate and prosecute good works. Methodists believe and teach that man was created originally pure and upright; that by the disobedience of Adam he became sinful; and that all of Adam's posterity is involved in the consequences of his fall, both as to suffering and as to corruption. They do not believe that Adam's sin is imputed to any man in the sense of making that man a partaker of Adam's transgression; but they do believe that Adam's sin so affects his offspring that they are impure and need the cleansing blood of Christ; and that the nature tends so to evil, that with the early workings of intellect and volition, that evil tendency develops into actual sin, and hence needs the atoning merits of Christ's death. They believe that all men are involved in this condition, and of themselves are unable to do anything which will tend to their salvation. But they believe that a measure of grace is given to every man to profit withal; that Christ is the light of the world, and that his light shines upon every heart to such an extent that the individual is led to see his impure and helpless condition; and that such strength is imparted by the Holy Spirit to every individual as will enable him, believing and trusting in Christ, to become a child of God. While their doctrine is in great measure identical with that of the Calvinistic Churches, as to the extent and degradation of the fall, it totally differs in the belief that the remedy is as universal as the fall; that no one is left, under the dispensation of grace, without power to turn to God; and they believe that no man will ever be condemned for Adam's transgression, or for the contamination and impurity attaching to him through that transgression, but the condemnation will be for the rejection of the remedy which would have removed all that impurity and sin. The doctrine of original sin is taught in the Scripture in all those passages that speak of the corruption of the race, such as, "Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me." "The imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth;" and, "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." It is also taught in all those passages which require regeneration, such as, "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of heaven;" and, "The son of man is come to seek and to save that which is lost." If there is no practical corruption there is no need of a new birth. If there is no impurity there is no need of the washing of regeneration. If mankind is not lost there is no need for a Saviour. It is taught in all those passages that speak of Christ having died for all. Children dying in infancy are the objects of Christ's death, as well as sinners dying in mature age, but if no corruption attaches to childhood, then it has no need of a Saviour. Romanists believe that original sin is washed away by baptism; such also is the faith of that portion of the Church of England which believes in baptismal regeneration. This doctrine is wholly rejected by Methodists of every branch. They believe that in the case of infants, as they have inherited impurity without their personal volition, so they are saved by the merits of Christ without a personal faith; but that just so soon as capable of exercising faith, having committed actual transgression, as all have, there is no salvation but through faith in the atonement of Jesus Christ. (See DEPRAVITY.)

Orman, Samuel L., of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Williamson Co., Tenn., March 22, 1838, and died in Springfield, Dec. 25, 1871. He was converted in 1858, but did not enter the Conference until October, 1866. He was an earnest, amiable, intelligent, and successful preacher.

Orphan House, Newcastle.—In 1742, Mr. Wesley purchased land outside of Pilgrim St. Gate, Newcastle, England, and commenced the erection of an orphan house and chapel. It was the second chapel which he built, and the third place especially prepared for Methodist worship. The lower part of the house was the chapel. Galleries were subsequently erected. Above the chapel was the band-room and several class-rooms, and also apartments for the residence of preachers and their families; while on the top was a room about 11 feet square, known as "Mr. Wesley's Study." In this room was written the correspondence with Dr. Secker, then bishop of Oxford, and afterwards archbishop of Canterbury. Here Mr. Wesley formed the plan for publishing his "Christian Library." A remarkable incident touching the erection of this house has been recorded. As it would cost £700, and as the people were poor and Mr. Wesley had little means, it was feared it would never be completed; but after having collected £50 by a charity sermon at the Foundry, a pious Quaker sent him the following note:

"Friend Wesley, I have had a dream concerning thee: I thought I saw thee surrounded by a large flock of sheep, which thou didst not know what to do with. The first thought after I awoke was that it was thy flock at Newcastle, and that thou hadst no house for them. I have enclosed a note for £100, which may help thee to build thee a house." This gift was very opportune, and secured the erection of the building, an engraving of which is given on the next page. Rev. Mr. Turner, then vicar of Newcastle, had also a singular dream touching the place. A writer says, "Passing by the site soon after the commencement of the building, and learning that a preaching-house for Mr. Wesley was there in course of erection, the vicar expressed his pleasure and surprise, stating that 'a few nights before, when deep sleep was on him, he had seen in a vision angels ascending and descending on a ladder on that very spot.'"

In the deed which Mr. Wesley made for the property to the trustees, direction was given that a school was to be kept up, to "consist of one master and one mistress, and such forty poor children as the Wesleys, and after their death, the trustees, might appoint." When the building was opened, Mrs. Grace Murray, so well known in Methodist history, was appointed matron. Her neatness and tact made it a welcome resting-place for the weary and sick itinerants, and it was a favorite home for Mr. Wesley himself. A severe persecution, however, arose, and the house was frequently besieged by violent mobs. Mr. Wesley says, "March 4, 1744, the people of Newcastle were in an uproar through the expectation of victory. They got their candles ready and gave thanks, that is, got drunk beforehand, and then came down to make a riot amongst us. Some of the brethren they struck, and threatened to pull down the desk. We were sensible that the powers of darkness were abroad, and prayed in faith against them. God heard, and scattered the armies of the alien." Several who officiated as ministers were seized and sent by magistrates into the army, and for a time every possible indignity was offered to the humble Christians who assembled. Notwithstanding this persecution, the work continued to prosper. After the capture of Edinburgh by the Pretender, in 1745, and the advance of the army on Newcastle, the Orphan House was in great danger, and Mr. Wesley was advised to leave, but he preferred to remain, and escaped without injury. This building remained until 1856, when arrangements were made for the erection of a new building for schools, which was opened Jan. 11, 1858, and is of handsome architecture, as shown in the annexed cut. In 1862 the number of children in attendance was 400. Connected with the old Orphan House worshipers were Charles Hutton, LL.D., an eminent mathematician, who for thirty-four years filled the professor's chair at Woolwich College, near London; William A. Hails, a profound mathematician, and so able a linguist that Bishop Barrington pronounced him to be the best Hebrew scholar in the north of England; and Mr. Potter, whose step-daughter became the mother of Sir William G. Armstrong, of world-wide celebrity. The first two of these were local preachers.

Osborn, George, D.D., commenced his ministry in 1829; having traveled in some of the most important circuits, he was, in 1851, appointed one of the secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, and he held this office seventeen years. In 1868 he was transferred to Richmond College, England, as theological tutor, where he still remains. No living minister has such an extensive knowledge of all the laws of Methodism; nor has any a larger acquaintance with theological writings. He is a profound theologian and a sound divine. On the platform of the Conference his utterances always command respect. He was president of the Conference in 1863.

Oshkosh, Wis. (pop. 12,663), is the capital of Winnebago County, and is situated on Lake Winnebago. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1849, as a mission under the care of Cornelius Smith. In 1857 it had become a station, with 154 members, 131 Sunday-school scholars, and $4000 church property. The German Methodists have also established a flourishing congregation. It is in the Wisconsin Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are:

Oskaloosa, Iowa (pop. 3204), is situated on the Iowa Central Railroad, 63 miles southeast of Iowa City. The first Methodist class was organized in 1844, by Rev. A. W. Johnson. A log cabin was built the same season for a parsonage, and religious services were held at the residence of Mrs. Phillips, who is still an active member of the First M. E. church. In the autumn of 1845 services were removed to the court-house, which had been built the preceding summer. At this time Oskaloosa was a part of the Eddyville circuit, but became a separate circuit in the fall of 1845. In 1851 it was made a station, and had 144 members, with J. W. Hardy as pastor. The brick edifice was commenced in 1851, and completed in 1853. It was enlarged in 1858, and again in 1865, and the parsonage was much improved in 1867. In 1868 the Simpson M. E. church was organized, with a membership of 159, transferred from the First church. The corner-stone of the edifice was laid July 4, 1869, and the building was dedicated Oct. 6, 1872, by Bishop Andrews. Wesley church, colored, was organized in 1864, and the edifice was built in 1865. The African M. E. church was organized in 1872. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Oswego, N. Y. (pop. 20,910), is the capital of Oswego County, situated on Lake Ontario. Methodist services were held occasionally as early as 1812, but the city does not appear on the minutes of the church earlier than 1815, when John Griffin was appointed in charge. In 1816 services were regularly established, and 130 members were reported. The first church edifice was erected in 1829. As early as 1857 there were two well-established stations. It is in the Northern New York Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Otis, Henry H., a lay delegate from the Western New York Conference in the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Rome, N. Y., in 1834. He removed to Buffalo, N. Y., when a young man, and was employed as a clerk in a book-store. In 1858 he was appointed by the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church in New York to be superintendent of the Book Depository in Buffalo, which position he still holds.

Ottawa, Ill. (pop. 7736), the capital of La Salle County, is situated at the junction of the Illinois and Fox Rivers. Jesse Walker was perhaps the first to introduce Methodist services. The first class was formed in 1836. The church was formally organized by the presiding elder, John Sinclair, in 1839, and Wesley Bachelor was its first pastor. The first church was dedicated in 1848, costing $1800. A parsonage was built in 1852, costing $923. In 1865 the church and parsonage were sold for $4500, and a new brick church erected, costing about $17,000. This city is in the Rock River Conference, and has 221 members, 240 Sunday-school scholars, and $22,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has 53 members, 80 Sunday-school scholars, and $1000 church property.

Ottumwa, Iowa (pop. 5214), the capital of Wapello County, is situated on the Des Moines River, and also on the Des Moines Valley Railroad. It is first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church in 1845, when B. H. Russell and A. G. Pierce were appointed to the circuit. In 1857 it had become a well-established station, having 194 members, 188 Sunday-school scholars, and $5000 church property. The African M. E. Church has a prosperous congregation. It is in the Iowa Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876 :

Ouseley, Gideon, an eminent and very successful Irish missionary, was born in Dunmore, in the county of Galway, in the year 1762. From his early childhood he had deep religious impressions, and thought much on spiritual and eternal subjects. Being without friends to guide him, his reasonings led him towards skepticism and despair. In 1789 he first heard the Methodist preachers, and in May, 1791, after a period of most intense spiritual agony, he received a clear consciousness of divine favor through faith in the atonement, and was made indescribably happy. He immediately felt it his duty to enlighten and save his perishing countrymen; though, to use his own words, he had only two things: "the knowledge of the disease and the knowledge of the remedy." He visited funerals, fairs, and markets in his native county and those adjacent, everywhere preaching Jesus. In 1799, after the Irish Rebellion, he was called out by the Conference as an Irish missionary. His knowledge of the character of the native population, his instinctive acuteness, and his great power of argument in refuting the errors of Popery, made him exceedingly successful; while his full acquaintance with the Irish language gave him ready access to the sympathies of the Irish people. He wrote several works on the Popish controversy, of which his book entitled "Old Christianity" evinces great research, and shows the touches of a master-hand. His sermons were marked by originality and strength. It is said of him, "He generally went from his knees to the pulpit or streets, and, after strong cries and tears before the throne of grace, invited his fellow-men to the feet of Jesus for mercy and salvation." "For forty years he exercised his public ministry through evil report and good report, in honor and dishonor, through every part of the kingdom, with quenchless ardor, with an unwearied zeal; as frequently preaching three times and sometimes four times a day in English and Irish. He would fearlessly enter into the midst of a crowd in the Irish fairs, and commencing a song, or on horseback, reading a prayer, would address the audience with such power and unction as to deeply affect the vast assemblies." He traveled and preached until within a few days of his death, which occurred in Dublin on the 14th of May, 1839. His life has recently been beautifully written by Rev. William Arthur.

Owego, N. Y. (pop. 4756), the capital of Tioga County, is the centre of several important railroads. Methodist services were introduced in 1813 by Rev. Mr. Fidler. Soon after this Hiram G. Warner, then a local, but afterwards an itinerant, preacher, conducted religious services. In 1815, J. Griffing preached occasionally. In 1816, as the result of a revival, a class of seven was organized by Mr. Griffing, and D. Thurston was appointed leader and steward. Meetings were held in private houses, and finally in a school-house, where they were much annoyed and ridiculed. Methodism continued to grow, and in 1857 had become a well-established station, having 204 members, 100 Sunday-school scholars, and $5500 church property. There is a flourishing African M. E. church, and the Free Methodists have a small congregation. This city is in the Wyoming Conference, and the following are the latest statistics :

Owen, Anning, was born in the State of New York in 1751. He was in the Wyoming Indian battle in 1788, and "when the retreat commenced on the battle-field he expected to be killed, and determined that should he be shot his last breath should be spent in calling upon God for mercy. Having secreted himself under a grape-vine in the margin of the river, he there gave his heart to God and found peace to his soul." He was soon after licensed to preach, and was received in the traveling connection in 1795. He traveled in the northwestern part of New York: was three years presiding elder on the Susquehanna district, and after having labored until 1813, he took a superannuated relation. He died at Ulysses, N. Y., in April, 1814. "He was zealous, earnest, eccentric, and sometimes eloquent. He had great religious sympathy, mighty faith, and tremendous power, and his labors were eminently successful."

Owen, Isaac, D.D., was born in Vermont in 1809, but his parents removed to Indiana in 1811. He was converted at seventeen, and admitted into the Indiana Conference in 1835. Not having received the advantages of a thorough education, he applied himself faithfully to his studies, and received private instruction when stationed in Greencastle and at Bloomington from the professors in those institutions, until he acquired a critical knowledge of the Greek Testament. He served four years as financial agent of the Indiana Asbury University, rendering most valuable service in securing its endowment. In 1849 he was appointed the first missionary to California, and crossing overland, devoted himself with tireless energy to his work. He traveled extensively, aided in building houses of worship, and in 1851 assisted in laying the foundations of a university. He served as presiding elder and college agent, filling both offices at the same time. He was elected delegate to the General Conference of 1856, but felt that he could not spare the time from his work. He was again elected in 1864, and attended the General Conference in Philadelphia. When on the San Francisco district as presiding elder, he received what appeared to be a trifling wound in the hand, but erysipelas set in and medical skill proved unavailing. He died Feb. 9, 1866. No man did more for laying the foundations of the church on the Pacific coast than did Isaac Owen; and the Indiana Asbury University expressed its sense of his worth by conferring the degree of D.D. and by passing the following resolution: "To the efforts of no one man is the Indiana Asbury University so much indebted for the measure of success attained in its past financial history as, under God, to the zealous, self-denying, and untiring labors of our departed brother, Isaac Owen." He was a plain, earnest, indefatigable minister, devoted to all the interests of Methodism.

Owen, Hon. John, has been from his childhood a resident of Detroit. In 1872 he was the only person living of those who composed the Methodist Episcopal Church in Michigan at the time he became a member. He has long been identified with commercial and banking interests. He was treasurer of the State four years, and declined the office any longer. Was nominated for governor of the State, but declined. He represented the Detroit Conference as lay delegate to the General Conference of 1872, and did effective service in examining the affairs of the Book Room.

Owens, Thomas, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in South Carolina, Jan. 8, 1787, and died July 1, 1868. His parents in his early life settled in Mississippi. He united with the church in 1810, and was admitted into the Tennessee Conference in 1813. He traveled four years in Alabama, four in Louisiana, and nine in various parts of Mississippi. He had great tact in reaching the human heart, and was an earnest and effective speaker.

Owensboro', Ky. (pop. 3437), the capital of Daviess County, is situated on the Ohio River. This town does not appear in the records of the M. E. Church until 1841, when A. C. De Witt was appointed in charge of the circuit. In 1842, it reported 323 white and 37 colored members. Since the close of the Civil War the M. E. Church has re-organized a small society. The M. E. Church South and the African M. E. Church are both well represented. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	100	700	$1400
M. E. Church South.....	240	220	9500

Owings, Richard, was the first native American Methodist preacher. He was converted under the preaching of Richard Strawbridge, and served several years as a local preacher. In 1772 he was stationed with Strawbridge in Frederick County, but was not formally received into the traveling connection until 1785. In 1781 he preached a funeral sermon over the remains of Mr. Strawbridge. He was a plain, earnest, industrious Methodist preacher, and his labors were frequently successful. He died at Leesburg in 1787.

Oxford, England, is an old and famous city, situated 55 miles northwest of London, on the Isis. It is chiefly renowned for its ancient university, which is attended by about 6000 students, and which has an annual revenue of between $2,000,000 and $2,500,000. In 1720, John Wesley, at the age of seventeen, entered Christ Church College, which is the largest of its nineteen colleges, and remained until 1725, when he was ordained a deacon. In 1726 he was elected a Fellow of Lincoln College, where a room is still shown designated "Wesley's room," and a vine creeping round its windows is called "Wesley's vine." In 1726, Charles Wesley entered Christ Church College. In November, 1729, Mr. Wesley was employed in teaching in Oxford, presiding in the hall as moderator of the disputations, and having eleven pupils put under his special care. In that position he remained until 1735. The first society was formed in these colleges; but after Methodism became known there was no association in Oxford until 1768, when Mr. Wesley writes: "I was desired to preach at Oxford. The room was thoroughly filled, and not with curious, but deeply serious hearers. Many of these desired that our traveling preachers would take them in their turn, with which I willingly complied." The chapel occupied was a small room, and the Oxford home of the "two unmarried preachers, Joseph Entwistle and Richard Reece, was a garret in the house of a German shoemaker, for which the society paid sixpence a week, and which had to serve them as dining-room, sitting-room, bedroom, and study, all in one." That year six students were expelled from the university for their pious deportment. One of the charges was, "that they were attached to the sect called Methodists," although none of them were members of Mr. Wesley's societies. They were more especially under the patronage of Mr. Whitefield and the Countess of Huntingdon, and their expulsion led that eminent lady to establish Trevecca College. For many years no student could graduate at the university without signing the Thirty-nine Articles and becoming a member of the Church of England. That regulation, however, has been removed. There is now in Oxford a handsome Methodist church. It is the head of a circuit, which contains 524 members, with 8 chapels.

Pacific Christian Advocate (The), a weekly paper of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Portland, Oregon, was founded in 1855. The General Conference of 1856 authorized the New York book agents to purchase the paper, before published as a private enterprise, at a cost not exceeding $3500, and to continue its publication. The Oregon Conference was directed to appoint a publishing committee of five to fix the salary of the editor and have the general oversight. Rev. T. H. Pearne was elected editor. The paper was removed from Salem to Portland in 1857. Mr. Pearne was re-elected in 1860. Stephen D. Brown was elected in 1864, but resigned, and H. C. Benson was elected in his stead. In 1868 Isaac Dillon was elected, and re-elected in 1872, and J. H. Aeton was elected in 1876. The present circulation is about 1750.

Pacific Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference of 1854, and reported, in 1858, 49 traveling and 38 local preachers, 2667 white and 9 colored members. The General Conference of 1874 fixed its boundaries so as to "embrace all the State of California not included in Columbia and Los Angeles Conferences." It includes Central California, from Scott Mountains on the north to the south boundary of Monterey County on the south. The latest report (1875) is 62 traveling and 52 local preachers, 3728 white members, and 2574 Sunday-school scholars.

Pacific Methodist College.—In 1859 the Pacific Annual Conference of the M. E. Church South took incipient measures for organizing a college. The citizens of Vacaville proposed to furnish buildings and grounds free of debt. The offer was accepted and a preparatory school was opened in March, 1861, and the collegiate department in July following. The institution was prosperous, but in April, 1865, the main college building was destroyed by fire,—the work of an incendiary. But in a year and a half a new building was erected at a cost of $16,000.

In May, 1870, by a vote of the trustees, the institution was removed to Santa Rosa; the citizens of that place having donated ten acres of land and erected a college building at a cost of $25,000. The grounds are beautifully situated, and the building can accommodate 300 students. The first session in Santa Rosa was opened in August, 1871, under the presidency of Rev. A. L. Fitzgerald, A.M. He was succeeded, in 1876, by Rev. W. A. Finley, D.D., who has associated with him as professors C. S. Smyth, A.M., Mathematics; O. H. Roberts, A.M.,

Latin Language and Literature; E. J. Griffith, A.M., Natural Science; W. A. Finley, A.M., Greek Language and Literature, with several tutors and assistants. The graduates of the institution number 58.

Paddock, Benjamin Green, one of the early pioneer preachers of the M. E. Church in the Wyoming Conference, was born in Bennington, Vt., Jan. 24, 1789, and was converted at the age of sixteen. He entered the itineracy in 1810. He traveled in the Wyoming Valley, and filled important stations in Utica, Canandaigua, and Auburn, and was presiding elder for a number of years. He died at Metuchen, N. J., Oct. 7, 1872. His last words were, "Farewell. Hallelujah! all is well." He enjoyed but moderate educational advantages in his youth, but was a diligent student and a successful preacher.

Paddock, Zechariah, D.D., was born in Northampton, Montgomery Co., N. Y., Dec. 20, 1798. In his eighteenth year he was awakened under a sermon by Bishop McKendree, and being converted a few days after, felt himself called to the work of the ministry. He was licensed to preach in 1818, and admitted on trial in the Genesee Conference. In a long and successful ministry, he has spent five years on circuits, twenty-five on stations, and twenty-two as presiding elder on various districts, having served the church fifty-two years in effective relation without loss of time. For many years he has written for newspapers, magazines, and quarterlies, and has published a number of sermons. One year he was editor of the Auburn Banner, which was the predecessor of The Northern Advocate. He is now on the superannuated list, but is deeply devoted to every interest of the church.

Paducah, Ky. (pop. 6866), the capital of McCracken County, is situated on the Ohio River. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1835, and was then the head of a circuit. It became a station in 1841, with James Young as pastor, who reported the following year 160 members. It adhered to the Church South in 1845. The M. E. Church has since that time been organized, and the African M. E. Church has also a large congregation. The following are the statistics reported for 1876:

Churches.	Members	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property
M. E. Church.....	117	90	$4000
M. E. Church South.....	230
African M. E. Church.....	266	150	5000

Paine, Robert, D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Person Co., N. C., Nov. 12, 1799. He removed to Tennessee early in life, and in 1818 was admitted into the Tennessee Conference of the M. E. Church, in which he did effective work, filling a number of the most prominent appointments, until, in 1830, supervising the general interests of the church, and is now the senior bishop. He wrote the "Life and Times of Bishop McKendree," a work which is highly valued.

Painesville, O. (pop. 3728), the capital of Lake County, is situated near Lake Erie, on the Lake Shore Railroad. Methodism was introduced in he was elected president of La Grange College, Ala. He remained at the head of this institution, exercising extensive influence, until 1846, when he was elected bishop. He had been a member of every General Conference of the M. E. Church from 1824 to 1844, at which time he took an active part in matters pertaining to the separation of the church. He was a member of the committee on education, and was also the chairman of the committee of nine which reported the paper referring to the separation of the church. He was also a prominent member of the Louisville Convention in 1845. Since his election as bishop he has traveled extensively, 1819. Rev. Ira Eddy, then on the Grand River circuit, preached the first sermon, in a school-house. In 1822 a frame church was built, and was used as a church and town-house for about twenty years. In 1823, William Swayze held a quarterly meeting, and many were added to the church. He also held a camp-meeting near Concord, and the converts from this meeting increased the society at Painesville to over 100 members. In 1857 the charge had become a station, having 118 members, and $5000 church property. It is in the East Ohio Conference, and reports for 1876, 234 members, 230 Sunday-school scholars, and $60,000 church property.

Palatinate.—The Lower Palatinate was a district of country occupying both sides of the Rhine, the chief cities of which were Heidelberg and Mannheim. Its governor was one of the electors of the empire, and it thus occupied a prominent place in German history. Being the border land between France and Germany, it was frequently overrun by hostile armies, and during the wars of Louis XIV. was subject to terrible devastation. In 1689 a large part of its territory was laid waste, villages, churches, and convents being indiscriminately burned; and in the depth of winter, amidst untold suffering, many of the people were obliged to flee into adjacent countries for shelter. Its inhabitants were chiefly Protestant, the elector until 1685 having been a Protestant prince. The contest between Louis XIV. and the emperor of Germany, however, was not waged on account of religion, and yet the French soldiery, being chiefly Roman Catholics, were more severe against the Protestant towns and inhabitants. In the various wars which occurred from 1689 to 1709, many of the inhabitants fled into Prussia, and during the latter part of the period, to the army of the emperor, who from 1702 was commanding in the Netherlands. The chief part of the territory now belongs to Baden and Bavaria. It was from this territory that the emigrants settled in Ireland, who afterwards furnished the first Methodists for America.

Palatines, The, frequently alluded to in early Methodist history, were inhabitants of the Lower Palatinate, who, on account of sufferings in the wars between France and Germany, which were embittered by religious animosities, fled from their country. Through the kindness of Queen Anne about 7000 of these were taken to England in 1709. Of them, about 3000 were sent to America, a few remained in England, and the rest were settled chiefly on the estate of Lord Southwell, in the neighborhood of Ballingran, west of Limerick. Each man was supplied with a musket, called a "Queen Anne," for the protection of himself and family, and for each person eight acres of ground were leased at five shillings per acre annually. The government engaged to pay the rental for the first twenty years. As they had no minister in their own language, and as they formed a separate community, religious services were wholly neglected, and they became "eminent for drunkenness, carousing, swearing, and an utter neglect of religion." Among them, however, a school-teacher, Philip Guier, remained faithful to his Christian principles, and was the teacher of Philip Embury, and also of the devoted Thomas Walsh. At the introduction of Methodism into Limerick, Philip Guier was made the leader of the infant society, and in 1752 was appointed to act as local preacher among the Palatines. He still kept his school, and devoted his spare hours to preaching. "The people loved the man, and sent him, if not money, yet flour, oatmeal, bacon, and potatoes, so that Philip, if not rich, was not in want. It is a remarkable fact that the name of Philip Guier is as fresh in Ballingran as it ever was, for there even Papists, as well as Protestants, are accustomed to salute the Methodist minister as he jogs along on his circuit horse, and to say, 'There goes Philip Guier, who drove the devil out of Ballingran.'" In 1756, Mr. Wesley visited Ballingran, and says, "I found much life among this plain, artless, zealous people. The words of the plain, honest people came with so much weight as frequently to stop me for a while and raise a general cry among the hearers." Severe times afterwards followed, and under financial difficulties many were obliged to emigrate. In 1760, Philip Embury, with other Christian emigrants, embarked at Limerick for New York, and either at that time or a few years later Barbara Heck, whose name is connected with the first Methodist service in New York, also sailed. Thus the Methodism of America was connected with the Protestantism of Germany and the Reformation under Luther. It is somewhat remarkable that Alsace and Lorraine, a part of the territory from which the emigrants fled, has recently passed into the hands of a Protestant country.

Palmer, Henderson D., of the M. E. Church South, was born Jan. 12, 1812. Having been converted in 1829, he was for some time a student in La Grange College, and then emigrated to Texas. After teaching in Nacagdoches, where Romanism was the only form of religion, he appointed meetings for exhortation and prayer. In 1839 he entered the Mississippi Conference, and continued traveling until Feb. 18, 1869, when he died, in Upshur Co., Texas. He was an earnest, faithful, and successful preacher.

Palmer, Phebe, Mrs., was born in New York, Dec. 18, 1807. At an early age she was converted, and became an active Sunday-school teacher in the Allen Street church, and afterwards Bible-class teacher and superintendent. She was married Sept. 28, 1827, to Dr. W. C. Palmer, a skillful physician, who survives her. In all church and benevolent movements she felt a deep interest, and was one of the earliest female class-leaders in the city. She was also a tract distributor, and was manager and secretary in female benevolent societies. Her Tuesday afternoon meetings for the promotion of holiness were largely attended by members and ministers of various denominations. Urgent invitations to attend revival meetings became so numerous, that for the last twelve or fifteen years of her life she visited many parts of Canada and Great Britain, as well as of her own country, and was instrumental in accomplishing great good. She was a clear, fluent, forcible speaker, and persuaded many to bow at the foot of the cross.

She was also a ready writer, and had considerable poetic talent, as evinced in various hymns. Her published books are, "The Way of Holiness," "Faith and its Effects," "Incidental Illustrations," and is connected with the publication of religious books.

Paris, France (pop. 1,851,792), is one of the oldest and most beautiful cities in Europe. Its population is chiefly Roman Catholic, though there are two Protestant denominations recognized as national, the Reformed and the Lutheran Churches,

MRS. PHEBE PALMER.

"Four Years in the Old World," "Tongue of Fire," and some smaller works.

She closed a devoted and useful life in 1874, and will long be remembered for her Christian excellence.

Palmer, W. C., M.D., a physician of New York. He united with the Methodist Church early in life, and was long an active member in Allen Street and in Norfolk Street churches. For many years he has given himself chiefly to evangelical labors, and in company with his wife, so well known by her writings, traveled in Great Britain, holding services at many points. He still continues to hold services, which are supposed to number about 40,000 inhabitants in Paris. Methodist services were first held in 1790, when De Quetteville accompanied Dr. Coke to the city of Paris. They hired a place for public worship, and De Quetteville had the honor of preaching the first Methodist sermon in the French metropolis. The excitements of the Revolution, however, suspended the services, and they were not resumed until in 1819, when a society was established by Dr. Cook and Henry De Jersey. The English Wesleyan mission was commenced by Rev. Robert Newstead in 1833. French Methodism was organized into a separate Conference in 1852. Its chief strength is in the south. It has two ministers stationed in Paris, with three preaching-places. There is also a small publishing-house, and a French paper is issued, entitled L'Evangelist. A neat church building has been erected for the services of the English Wesleyans. The membership both in the French and English branches is but small.

Paris, Ill. (pop. 3057), the capital of Edgar County, is situated on the Paris and Decatur Railroad. It is noticed in the annals of the M. E. Church as early as 1829, when Robert Delap and John Decker were pastors of that circuit. It is now a station in the Illinois Conference, and has 346 members, 190 Sunday-school scholars, and $20,500 church property.

Parker, Linus, D.D., editor of the New Orleans Christian Advocate of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Oneida Co., N. Y., in 1829. He went to New Orleans in 1845, was converted in 1847, and entered the traveling connection in 1849 in the Louisiana Conference. He has since then been in ministerial work as pastor and presiding elder. He became editor of the above paper in 1870, and was a member of the General Conferences of his church in 1866, 1870, and 1874.

Parker, Robert, was born in Luzerne Co., Pa., March 30, 1792. He joined the General Conference in 1820, and for forty-seven years was a faithful, active minister. At that time the Conference embraced part of Pennsylvania and of Michigan, and the whole of Upper Canada. His journeys were both extensive and difficult, "riding from morning until evening twilight, through long forests marked only by Indian trails; swimming rivers, climbing hills and mountains, and preaching nightly in log house, or school-house, or barns, or out-of-doors, summer and winter; this veteran did an amount of labor for his Master that few modern preachers conceive of."

Parkersburg, W. Va. (pop. 5546), is the capital of Wood County, situated on the Ohio River. It was very early visited by Methodist itinerants, but does not appear by name on the annals of the M. E. Church till 1830, when Ignatius B. Tackett and Jonathan Holt were pastors. In 1831 the circuit reported 400 members. It subsequently became a station. This city was divided in its adherence to the M. E. Church after the separation of the Church South, in 1845. In 1857 the M. E. Church had 67 members, 85 Sunday-school scholars, and $1000 church property. It is in the West Virginia Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Parkison, Christopher, of the Baltimore Conference, was born Oct. 18, 1797, in Cecil Co., Md. He entered the Baltimore Conference in 1829, and filled various appointments effectively and usefully until his death, which occurred April 30, 1867. "Intellectually he deserves to be ranked with the strong men of the church. His mind, naturally clear and vigorous, was cultivated by habitual reading and much thought."

Parks, Isaac, D.D., was born in Granville, N. Y., Sept. 6, 1803. He was licensed to preach in 1829, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1834. He filled various important appointments, and was presiding elder of the Otsego and Oneida districts; and by a change of boundaries in 1860 was transferred to the Troy Conference. He died April 15, 1869. He was not only an able and laborious minister, but he took a deep interest in the cause of education, and was elected regent of the University of New York in 1857. "He was a cheerful, earnest Christian; all who knew him loved him."

Parks, William J., a minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in Franklin Co., Ga., Nov. 30, 1799, and died in the same State, Oct. 16, 1873. He was converted when eight years of age. He was received on trial in the North Carolina Conference in February, 1822, and was truly a pioneer preacher. He was missionary two years, presiding elder fourteen, on stations four, agent for the American Bible Society one, agent for Georgia Conference one, on circuits ten, and agent for Emory College eight, in all a period of effective service of forty-three years, in which he was local two years, and superannuated one. He was a member of all the General Conferences from 1832 to 1844. He was also elected a delegate to the Louisville Convention in 1845, but owing to domestic affliction was unable to attend. He was elected to every General Conference from 1846 to 1870, but was unable to attend in 1846 and 1870. "Possessing a strong mind and a clear judgment, with a large stock of common sense and the advantages of extensive observation and experience, his opinions were generally accurate and reliable. He was wise, prudent, cautious, strongly conservative, but always ready for true progress and real reform."

Parrish, Joseph, M.D., was born in Philadelphia, Nov. 11, 1818. He graduated in medicine in 1844, and located in Burlington, N. J., where he now resides. He inaugurated the New Jersey Medical Reporter, subsequently removed to Philadelphia. In 1854 he moved to that city to become professor in the Philadelphia College of Medicine. Subsequently, his health failing, he spent some time in Europe, and was especially interested in the hospitals at Rome and elsewhere. Returning, he devoted a number of years to the training-school for imbecile children, first at Germantown, and then at Media. Resigning this position in 1863, he devoted several years chiefly to the duties of the Sanitary Commission, visiting camps and hospitals, and editing a paper devoted to sanitary interests. After the close of the war he visited the South, to inspect the schools and other operations of the Freedman's Commission. Since that time he has devoted himself chiefly to establishing institutions for the cure of inebriates, and was sent by the American Association to appear before a committee of the English House of Commons to give testimony as to the result of experience in treating such cases. Dr. Dalrymple, who was the chairman of the committee, and who had visited Media, said of Dr. Parrish, that he placed him "at the head of all those with whom I have had connection." In addition to official reports, he has written several papers on the "Criminal and Dependent Population of Pennsylvania," "Philosophy of Intemperance," "Intemperance as a Disease," "Opium Intoxication," and the "Pathology of Inebriety." He was educated in the Society of Friends, but united with the Methodist Church while resident in Burlington, and has been for a number of years a local preacher in the church.

Parrish, Nathan Cowrey, M.D., was born in West Chester, O., Aug. 17, 1834. In 1855, while a teacher in the preparatory department of Brookville College, he was converted. In 1856 he received his degree of medicine. Believing it his duty to preach, he joined the Cincinnati Conference in 1865, and, after filling appointments in Piqua, Cincinnati, and other charges, he died Feb. 15, 1875. "During his entire ministry he was in the habit of spending from six to ten hours per day in study. As a preacher, he was earnest, practical, and eloquent; as a pastor, he was faithful."

Parsonages.—In the Methodist Episcopal Church as early as the General Conference of 1800, the question of renting or building houses for the preachers was under discussion. That Conference recommended the friends of the church to purchase a lot of ground in each circuit, and to build a house thereon, and to furnish it with, at least, heavy furniture. The provision relating to the duty of the presiding elders concerning parsonages was added to the above provision in 1816. That part of the law referring to the duty of the stewards or trustees was added by the General Conference of 1828. At each Annual Conference a committee on parsonages is appointed, which reports concerning their importance and condition. Among the committees appointed by the Quarterly Conference is one on parsonages and furniture, whose duty is to supervise all matters relating to the fitting up and furnishing of houses for the pastors. Every parsonage is under the control of a board of trustees. The provisions of the Discipline relating to parsonages are as follows: "It is recommended by the General Conference to the traveling preachers to advise the people to purchase a lot of ground in each circuit or station, and to build a preacher's house thereon, and to furnish it with, at least, heavy furniture. The General Conference recommends to all the circuits and stations, in cases where they are not able to comply with the above request, to rent a house for the married preacher and his family (when such are stationed upon their circuits or stations respectively), and that the Annual Conferences assist to make up the rents of such houses, as far as they can, when the circuit or station cannot do so. The stewards in each circuit and station shall be a standing committee (where no trustees are constituted for that purpose) to provide houses for the families of our married preachers, or to assist the preachers to obtain houses for themselves, when they are appointed to labor among them. It shall be the duty of the presiding elders and preachers to use their influence to carry the above rules, respecting building and renting houses for the accommodation of preachers and their families, into effect. In order to do this, each Quarterly Conference shall appoint a committee (unless other measures have been adopted), which, with the advice and aid of the preachers and presiding elders, shall devise such means as may seem fit to raise moneys for that purpose. And it is recommended to the Annual Conferences to make a special inquiry of their members respecting this part of their duty."

In 1857, when statistics of this character were first reported, there were 2174 parsonages, valued at $2,126,874. In 1876 the statistics show 5180 parsonages, valued at $9,419,510.

Parsons, Charles Booth, D.D., an eminent minister in Kentucky, was born in 1799, near Louisville. In early life he was an actor, but was converted in 1837, and became a preacher in the Kentucky Conference in 1840. He was one of the commissioners of the Southern branch of the church, appointed in 1846, to settle the claims of the Book Concern. He filled prominent appointments in that church until at the outbreak of the war, being a strong friend of the Union, he returned to the M. E. Church. He was an able minister and an attractive orator, with a tincture of his early dramatic training. "We shall never forget," wrote one, "his immortal picture of that hardened wretch who stood at Calvary, clanking the spikes that were so soon to be driven through the hands and feet of the blessed Redeemer." In the later years of his life his health became quite impaired, and he occupied a superannuated relation. He died near Portland, Ky., in 1866. He was the author of a volume entitled "The Stage and the Pulpit."

Pastoral Address (English Wesleyan).—The idea of an annual address from the Conference to the members of the society originated with the founder of Methodism. Only one was sent out during his lifetime, this was in 1788, and its design was principally financial, being an appeal for a better provision for the preachers, especially for their wives. The second was issued about seventeen months after his death, by the Conference of 1792. At that time there was great excitement concerning the administration of the Lord's Supper, and the design of the address was to calm the agitation. That of 1793 was to the same purpose. In 1797 it was a statement of rules relative to members, leaders, and finance. The one in 1799 had special reference to the existing debt. From that period a "Pastoral Address" has annually been presented by the British Wesleyan Conference to the membership, distinguished by a high tone of spirituality, exhorting the societies to diligence in the pursuit of personal holiness, to the importance of family religion, to regular attendance on the means and ordinances; in a word, to all that may be comprised in the beautiful circle of a Christian life. In 1821 it was determined that every local preacher, class-leader, and steward should annually be presented with a copy of the Pastoral Address gratuitously. The preparation of it is generally intrusted to one or two ministers selected by the president. It is read, discussed, and passed in the Conference. It is ordered to be read in every congregation, with suitable exhortations.

In America, such an address is made by each General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Churches, and of the branches of Methodism. Attention is specially invited to religious duties, and to such measures as the necessities of the church or the peculiarities of the times may demand. Such addresses are sometimes issued also by the Annual Conferences.

Pastoral Visiting.—That the minister may become properly acquainted with the members and families of his church, and that he may know how to properly instruct them, he must visit and converse with them in their various homes. Methodism has, from its earliest period, strongly urged its ministers and its official members to this duty. The class-leader, who is a sub-pastor, is required to see each member of his class once a week, to inquire in reference to his spiritual condition; and every minister, before he is received into the traveling connection, is explicitly required to answer the questions, "Will you diligently instruct the children in every place? and, Will you visit from house to house?" In the ordination of a deacon, he is required to take a vow that he will visit "the sick, poor, and impotent." Mr. Wesley copied into the Large Minutes a part of Mr. Baxter's forcible tract on this subject, and closed by saying, "The sum is, go into every house in course and teach every one therein, young and old, to be Christians inwardly and outwardly: make everything plain to their understandings: fix it in their minds; write it on their hearts. In order to do this there must be precept upon precept, line upon line. What patience, what knowledge is required for this! We must needs do this, were it only to avoid idleness. Do we not loiter away many hours in every day? Each try himself; no idleness is consistent with a growth in grace." Important as is preaching, and necessary as is careful study, the pastor's duty cannot be discharged without a system of pastoral visiting, which shall reach every member of his charge, the poor as well as the rich, and by which he will become acquainted with the peculiarities of every member placed, by the providence of God, under his supervision. Pastoral visiting to be profitable must combine true kindness of spirit and a genial manner with careful and diligent religious inquiry, and such instruction or admonition as circumstances may require. Wherever properly performed the growth of the church will invariably follow.

Paterson, N. J. (pop. 33,579), the capital of Passaic County, is situated on the Passaic River near its celebrated falls. It is first mentioned in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1825, when J. Creamer was pastor, who reported the following year 126 members. In 1857 the city had two stations, Cross Street and Prospect Street, with an aggregate of 1647 members, 838 Sunday-school scholars, and $18,000 church property. With the increase of population the church has steadily advanced. It is in the Newark Conference, and reported for 1876 the following statistics:

Patrick, William, Esq., was born near the city of Toronto, Ont. He is of the Scotch branch of the ancient Patrick family. His age is sixty-seven. He spent some of his early years in the ministry of the Methodist Church, but failing voice and other circumstances led him to enter into the business of a merchant, which he prosecuted in Prescott about thirty years. Finding himself in secular life, he declined ministerial functions, but has stood by the church he joined fifty-two years ago as a most liberal supporter, often supplying the pulpit, in the absence of the minister, as a lay-reader. He is both leader and steward at present. He was and is a good speaker. Four times he was returned to Parliament. Four years ago, upon the accession of the Reform party to power, he received the appointment of sheriff of the two counties of Leeds and Grenville. He was a member of the General Conference of the Canada Methodist Church in 1874.

Patten, David, D.D., professor in the School of Theology of Boston University, was born in Boston, Mass., Oct. 15, 1810. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1834, entered the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was appointed principal of the Wesleyan Academy at Wilbraham, Mass., but soon had to give up the position on account of the failure of his health. In 1841 he was transferred to the Providence Conference, and labored in pastoral work till 1864, when he was elected Professor of Theology in the Biblical Seminary at Concord, and in 1867, Professor of Homiletics and Pastoral Theology in the Boston Theological Seminary. He was continued in the same position when that institution was incorporated with the Boston University, in 1871.

Patterson, James, a pioneer minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in South Carolina in 1773, and entered the Conference in 1795. He labored very efficiently throughout the southern Atlantic States, and did much to check the divisions occasioned by James O'Kelley. He died in North Carolina, July 1, 1858.

Patterson, Stearns, a member of the Philadelphia Conference, M. E. Church, was born in Nashua, Jan. 2, 1813. He was converted in 1826; pursued his studies in an academy at Hopkintown, and subsequently in Yale College. In 1842 he united with the M. E. Church, and in 1844 entered the Philadelphia Conference. After filling various appointments, he was six years professor in the Wesleyan Female College at Wilmington, Del. In 1866 he received a superannuated relation, and died May 19, 1871. "He was devoted to God and the church, scholarly in his habits of study, and systematic in the performance of his duties."

Pattison, Robert H., D.D., of the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church, was born near Cambridge, Md., Jan. 22, 1824. He was converted at ten years of age, and at fourteen entered the preparatory department of Dickinson College. He graduated in 1843; taught for two years at Baltimore, and entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1846. He filled a number of the most prominent appointments in Philadelphia and elsewhere, and was also presiding elder of the Harrisburg district. In 1858 he was chosen as secretary of the Conference, and continued to hold that office until his death. In 1868 he was a delegate to the General Conference, and was one of its assistant secretaries. He was for several years a member of the Foreign Missionary Board, and was connected with the various benevolent organizations of the Philadelphia Conference. "Dr. Pattison was a good man, a true Methodist, a faithful pastor, an acceptable and earnest preacher, and a Christian gentleman, whom to know was to esteem and love."

Patton, Hon. John, was born in Tioga Co., Pa., Jan. 26, 1823. Having removed to Curwensville in 1828, at the age of eleven he entered a store, where he continued until, in 1844, he commenced business for himself, and built up an extensive trade in merchandise and lumber. In 1864 he organized and became president of the First National Bank of Curwensville, which relation he sustains to the present time. He joined the M. E. Church in September, 1839, and has filled the various positions of class-leader, Sunday-school superintendent, steward, and trustee. He has been a director of Dickinson Seminary, and a trustee of Dickinson College and of Drew Theological Seminary, and was a delegate to the General Conference in 1872. In 1860 he was elected a member of the Thirty-seventh Congress, and, at the end of the term, he received the unanimous nomination for re-election, but declined. In 1864 he was one of the presidential electors of Pennsylvania who cast his vote for Mr. Lincoln; and, on his motion, the per diem mileage of all the electors of the State was voted to the Christian Commission. He was active in sanitary matters during the war, and was one of the commissioners named in the act of Congress to organize the Centennial Exhibition. His grandfather, Colonel John Patton, was a patriotic merchant of Philadelphia, who contributed funds during the Revolutionary War, and also served as colonel of the 16th Pennsylvania Regiment, under Washington. His grandfather on his mother's side, Philip Antes, Esq., organized the first society and aided in building the first M. E. church in Centre County, Old Bald Eagle chapel, in 1806, and gave the ground for building the first M. E. church in Clearfield County, in 1829.

Patton, Samuel, D.D., a distinguished minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in Lancaster District, S. C., Jan. 27, 1797. He was converted in 1816, and, having emigrated to Tennessee, he entered the Conference, and filled various important charges in the Tennessee and Holston Conferences. In 1838 he became agent for Holston College, and in 1847 was elected editor of the Holston Christian Advocate. He died in August, 1854. He was a studious and earnest preacher, and "stood in the first ranks of the ministry of his church."

Paxson, William J., a member of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Philadelphia, December 15, 1826. He received an academical education, purposing to engage in legal practice, his father being an attorney, but abandoning the idea, he engaged in mercantile pursuits. His early religious influences were received among the Orthodox Friends, but hearing, in 1843, a sermon by John N. Maffit, he was deeply moved, and in the following December united with Dr. Chambers's independent church. After attending for some time, through the influence of relatives, the Evangelical Lutheran church, he became, in 1852, an attendant on the services of the M. E. Church, and finding his spiritual wants more fully met, and having studied its doctrines and discipline, under conviction of duty, he united with the M. E. Church in 1853. Early thereafter he commenced evangelical work, visiting prisons, exhorting, etc., and was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference in 1856, having previously acted as a supply on Newtown circuit. Since that time he has filled a number of the most prominent appointments, and in 1877 was appointed presiding elder of the South Philadelphia district, which position he still occupies. He was elected assistant secretary of the Philadelphia Conference from 1869 to 1874, and principal secretary in 1875. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1876, and has been an active member of the Board of Church Extension since 1867. REV. CHARLES H. PAYNE, D.D., LL.D.

Payne, Charles H., D.D., LL.D., president of

Ohio Wesleyan University, was born in Taunton, Mass., Oct. 24, 1830. At the age of fifteen he was converted, and became a member of the M. E. Church. After engaging in business for several years he prepared for college, graduated at the Wesleyan University in 1854, and prosecuted his ministerial studies in the Biblical Institute, at Concord, N. H. In 1857 he was admitted into the Providence Conference, when, after filling various appointments for eight years, he was transferred to the New York East Conference, and was stationed at St. John's church, Brooklyn. From thence he was transferred to Philadelphia, where he was pastor of the Arch Street and Spring Garden Street churches; and thence was transferred to St. Paul's church, Cincinnati. In 1875 he was elected to the presidency of the Ohio Wesleyan University, which position he still retains. Dr. Payne has traveled in Europe and the East, and has written and published several sermons and lectures.

Payne, Daniel A., D.D., one of the bishops of the African M. E. Church, was a native of South Carolina, and was teacher of a small school in Charleston. Feeling himself oppressed, in 1834 he removed to the North, and after having pursued a regular course of theological study at Gettysburg Seminary, he took up his residence in Baltimore, where he became extensively known as a preacher in the African M. E. Church. He was subsequently elected bishop, and resides at Wilberforce College, near Xenia, O. Bishop Payne has poetical talent, having published, in 1850, a volume of his productions. He has taken a deep interest in the education of his race, and has especially labored to build up Wilberforce College. He visited England in its behalf, and succeeded in raising considerable means.

Pearne, William N., a minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Rochester, England, from whence he emigrated in 1822. In 1833 he entered the New York Conference, and filled acceptably some of the most important appointments. He died in Kingston, N. Y., April 30, 1868, exclaiming in his last hours, "Happy, happy!" "As a minister, he was clear, chaste, practical, and fearless, and a passionate admirer of the beautiful. His practical productions found admirers, and as an amateur painter in his latter years he manifested a measure of genius."

Pearse, Mark Guy, an eminent Wesleyan minister of England, came into the work in 1863, and early gave proof of a very superior order of talent. Intensely earnest in preaching, and very effective in addresses of a peculiarly interesting character to the young, he was, in 1875, compelled to seek rest for an overwrought brain as a supernumerary. His writings are racy, his style peculiar and pleasing. He has enriched our literature with some most charming stories. With restored health he hopes to return to his beloved work at the Conference of 1877. His father, Mark Guy Pearse, Esq., is another of the liberal Wesleyan friends.

Peck, George, D.D., a distinguished minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Middlefield, Otsego Co., N. Y., Aug. 8, 1797. His mother was an amiable woman, eminently pious and devotional, and gave five sons to the Methodist ministry. He united with the church in 1812, and in 1816, at the age of nineteen, entered the ministry. Studious, diligent, and successful, he was, in 1824, appointed presiding elder of the Susquehanna district, then containing all the territory of the Wyoming Conference as constituted in 1868, and as much more in the New York and Genesee Conferences. He was a member of every General Conference from 1824 to 1872. In 1835 he was elected principal of the Oneida Conference Seminary. Though peculiarly adapted to the education of the young, after four years he returned to the active duties of the ministry, and was again appointed presiding elder of the Susquehanna district. In 1840 he was elected editor of The Methodist Quarterly Review, which position he filled for eight years; and in 1848 he was elected editor of The Christian Advocate, where he remained for four years. He was also delegate to the first Evangelical Alliance in London, and took a leading part in its deliberations. Returning to the pastorate in 1852, he filled some of the most important appointments in his Conference, and was also presiding elder of the Lackawanna and Wyoming districts. He was superannuated in 1873, and died May 20, 1876.

One of his contemporaries wrote concerning him, "I view him as one of the most remarkable men of our times,—one whose genius and piety are indelibly stamped on the ecclesiastical polity and wonderful growth of the church,—whose wise counsels and herculean labors are interwoven in its development. For the past fifty years of his whole life he has been distinguished by a devoted love to the church and unwavering loyalty to honest convictions of truth." He was plain in his manners, humble in his deportment, genial in his intercourse with both ministers and members, a diligent student, and a successful minister. He published a number of works, among which may be mentioned "Universalism Examined," "History of the Apostles and Evangelists," "Scripture Doctrine of Christian Perfection," "Rule of Faith," "History of Wyoming," and "History of Methodism within the Bounds of the Old Genesee Conference."

Peck, J. Oramel, D.D., was born in Groton, Vt., Sept. 4, 1836. At the age of twenty he was converted, and after finishing a preparatory education at Newbury Seminary, he entered Amherst College, and graduated in 1862. In 1860, while at college, he joined the New England Conference, and filled an appointment in North Amherst, and after filling appointments in Chelsea, Lowell, Worcester, and Springfield, he was transferred to the Rock River Conference, occupying Centenary church in Chicago. He was then transferred to Baltimore Conference, and stationed at Mount Vernon church. In addition to his regular ministrations he has delivered a number of popular lectures.

Peck, Jesse Truesdell, D.D., one of the bishops of the M. E. Church, was born in Middlefield, Otsego Co., N. Y., April 4, 1811. His parents were of Puritan stock, and both his grandfathers were Revolutionary soldiers. Before he was sixteen years of age he professed faith in Christ and united with the church. He was educated under the direction of his brother, the late Dr. George Peck, and was a student in Cazenovia Seminary, teaching during the winters. He was licensed to preach in 1829, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1832. He continued in the pastoral work until, in 1837, he was elected principal of a high school, which became Gouverneur Wesleyan Seminary. In 1841 he accepted the office of principal of Troy Conference Academy, Poultney, Vt. In 1844 he was elected delegate to the General Conference, and took part in the memorable debate in the case of Bishop Andrew. From 1848 to 1852 he was president of Dickinson College, after which he entered the pastoral work, and was two years at the Foundry church, Washington City. In 1854 he was appointed secretary and editor of the Tract Society, to fill out the unexpired term of Dr. Abel Stevens. In 1856 he became pastor of Greene Street church, in New York, and at the expiration of his term he was transferred by the bishops to California, where he remained eight years in Powell Street and Howard Street, San Francisco, and Santa Clara and Sacramento, and on San Francisco district. He served

"I do to be Saved?" and "The History of the Great Republic."

Peekskill, N. Y. (pop. 6560), is situated on the Hudson River, 46 miles north of New York. It is first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1833, when V. Buck was appointed pastor. In 1834 the circuit contained 361 members. It subsequently several years as president of the board of trustees of the University of the Pacific, and was also president of the California State Bible Society. Returning East on account of his wife's health, he was pastor of churches in Peekskill, Albany, and Syracuse, where he labored actively in the interests of Syracuse University, being president of the board of trustees and chairman of the building committee until, in 1872, he was elected bishop. Since that time he has traveled extensively throughout the bounds of the church, laboring diligently and earnestly. He is the author of "The Central Idea of Christianity," "The True Woman," "What must

He was born in London, England, Oct. 11, 1799, and became a sailor in the British service early in youth, following a seafaring life for many years. When nineteen years old he was converted in Canada, and in 1834 joined the New York Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, of which he was twice elected president, but withdrew from that body and united with the "Wesleyans," and was at their convention of organization in 1843. He has labored faithfully and successfully with them over thirty years, and was recently a resident of Minnesota.

the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1843. In 1847 he became editor of the Sunday-School Messenger and the Sunday-School Teacher, published at Boston. He was employed as agent of the American Sunday-School Union in 1850, and served as a member of the Massachusetts Senate in 1855 and 1856. In the latter year he was appointed trustee of the State Industrial School for Girls, and was afterwards elected superintendent and chaplain of the same. From 1863 to 1872 he was chaplain of the House of Refuge at Randall's Island, N. Y. In the latter year he was appointed editor of Zion's Herald, Boston. Between 1848 and 1872 he prepared a number of "Questions" for the Sunday-School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and wrote a variety of Sunday-school books and miscellaneous works. He is also author of the following works: "Notes on the Acts," "Bible Scholar's Manual," "One Talent Improved," "The Eminent Dead," "Trials of an Inventor," "The Word of God Opened," "A Half Century with Juvenile Delin-

Pekin, Ill. (pop. 5696), the capital of Tazewell County, on the Peoria, Pekin and Jacksonville Railroad. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1842, when Warner Oliver was pastor, who reported, in 1843, 232 members in the circuit. In 1857 it had become a station, having 64 members, 130 Sunday-school scholars, and $2500 church property. Methodism has increased as the town has grown in population. It is in the Central Illinois Conference, and has 154 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and $9000 church property. The German Methodists have a strong and flourishing congregation of 187 members, 380 Sunday-school scholars, and $36,500 church property.

Penn, Abram, of the Virginia Conference, was born in Patrick Co., Va., March 16, 1803. After pursuing his studies in the Academy, he entered the University of North Carolina, and in connection with his college course commenced the study of medicine. In 1826 he was converted, and felt it his duty to enter the ministry; and in 1828 was received on trial by the North Carolina Conference. He filled such appointments as Raleigh, Richmond, Petersburg, and was presiding elder of Salisbury district. In 1844 he had hemorrhage of the lungs, with a severe attack of bilious fever; this was followed by an enlargement of the heart, of which disease he died. He passed gently to rest Dec. 15, 1848. His piety was intelligent, scriptural, and uniform, his sermons were a plain exposition of divine truth, delivered in a solemn and impressive manner; he was prompt, diligent, and faithful as a pastor, and was remarkably successful in his ministry.

Pennington Seminary and Female Collegiate Institute is located at Pennington, N. J., and is under the immediate control and patronage of the New Jersey Conference. It is on the borders of the hill country of New Jersey, within nine miles of Trenton. The buildings are commodious, airy, and well arranged for the comfort of students, and for all the purposes of a first-class male and female seminary. The two departments are entirely separate, and the students meet only in the chapel, the dining-hall, or in the recitation-rooms. The whole building is warmed by furnaces, and the rooms are neatly carpeted and furnished. About 25 acres of land, a part of which has a fine grove, are connected with the building. Recently a handsome wing has been added, being 100 feet long by 40 feet wide, and four stories high. The course of instruction is extensive and thorough, and good teachers are secured for the ornamental branches. The institution was opened in 1839, and became a school for both sexes in May, 1863. It is empowered by the legislature of New Jersey to confer the degrees of Mistress of English Literature, and Mistress of Liberal Arts, upon young ladies who have finished the studies in the respective departments. Students are also prepared for the best colleges. It is under the supervision of Rev. Thomas Hanton, D.D., who is a graduate of Princeton College, and who is president, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science. He is assisted by an able corps of teachers, both in the literary and ornamental departments. The number of students in attendance for 1877 was 169.

Pennsylvania (pop. 3,521,951).—A settlement was commenced in 1638 in this State by the Swedes, who purchased lands from the Indians opposite the present city of Trenton. In 1642 the Swedish governor erected a house below the mouth of the Schuylkill River, and caused a church to be built, which was dedicated in 1646, and was the first church erected in the State. The Dutch conquered the Swedes in 1655, and in turn were overpowered by the English in 1664. In 1681 Pennsylvania was granted by Charles II. to William Penn, who died in 1718, leaving his interest to his children, who possessed large property until the Revolutionary War. Their claim was then purchased by the Commonwealth for $580,000. A portion of the territory was purchased from the Indians in 1784. A colonial constitution was adopted in 1776. The United States Constitution was ratified in 1787. A new constitution was adopted in 1838, and again in 1875. Philadelphia was the seat of the United States government until 1800, when it was removed to Washington.

Methodism was introduced into this State by Captain Thomas Webb, who first visited Philadelphia in 1767 and formed a class, which consisted of seven persons. The first place of service was on Front Street, near the Delaware River, in a sail-loft. Captain Webb continued to visit the city occasionally and to preach, until the arrival, in October, 1769, of Messrs. Boardman and Pilmoor, who were sent by Mr. Wesley as missionaries. Mr. Pilmoor commenced his services by preaching from the steps of the old State-house. Mr. Boardman proceeded to New York, but they interchanged regularly every three months. Shortly after their arrival Philadelphia was visited by Robert Williams, a local preacher, who had preceded the missionaries to New York. In a few weeks after the arrival of Mr. Pilmoor the building now known as St. George's church was purchased, and was the second house of worship belonging to the Methodists in the United States. The following year these missionaries were joined by John King, an earnest local preacher from England, who commenced his services by preaching in the Potter's Field, now Washington Square. In 1771, Francis Asbury and Richard Wright arrived, and Asbury was placed in charge of the general work until the arrival of Mr. Rankin, in 1773.

After the arrival of Mr. Asbury the missionaries extended their labors more regularly into the country. Mr. Pilmoor had previously preached at several points outside of Philadelphia, but no regular societies had been formed. The first Conference was convened by Mr. Rankin in Philadelphia in 1773, and 180 members were reported from Pennsylvania, of whom probably more than half were in the city. Conferences were also held in 1774 and 1775 in the same city, at the latter of which dates the membership of the State was reported at 264. A circuit between Philadelphia and Baltimore was formed in 1774, called Chester, which, in 1775, reported 74 members. The occurrence of the Revolutionary War greatly retarded the progress of the societies in and around Philadelphia. In 1777 Philadelphia reported 96 members and Chester 136. In 1781 the name of Chester disappears, and Pennsylvania reports 271. Little York appears as a circuit with 90 members, and the following year Lancaster is named with 70 members. These were the heads of large circuits. In 1784, at the close of the war, the returns in Pennsylvania were: Philadelphia, 470; Little York, 50; Juniata, 40. These, in 1785, composed one district, with Thomas Vasey as elder. The following year the work extended westward to Alleghany and Redstone. In 1788 a Conference was held west of the mountains, in Uniontown, on the 22d of July, and appointments were made for Redstone, Ohio, Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Chester, and Bristol. The following year a Conference was held in Philadelphia. In 1776 the members were, for the first time, reported by States, and Pennsylvania, with 13 appointments, reported 2631 white and 380 colored members. In 1789 the Book Concern was established in Philadelphia, under the care of Rev. John Dickins, who had previously superintended the publication of books in New York, and in 1797 the first volume of The Methodist Magazine was issued. It continued, however, but two years, as in 1798 Mr. Dickins died of yellow fever. He was succeeded in the book agency by Ezekiel Cooper; but in 1804 the Book Concern was transferred to New York, probably on account of the ravages of the yellow fever for several years prior to 1800. In 1801, the last report which was made by States, there were in Pennsylvania 3321 white and 507 colored members. From that time forward the reports were made by Conferences, which did not conform to State lines. The Philadelphia Conference embraced that part of Pennsylvania lying east of the Susquehanna River and the Eastern Shore of Maryland, with the State of New Jersey. Western Pennsylvania was included in the Baltimore Conference. Baltimore Conference embraced, until 1824, all of Pennsylvania west of the Susquehanna River, except the northern part, which belonged to the Genesee Conference. In 1824 the Pittsburgh Conference was organized, embracing Pennsylvania west of the Alleghany Mountains, with the eastern part of Ohio. Various changes in the boundaries of Conferences have taken place. At present there are in the State the Philadelphia Conference, the southern part of Wyoming, the Central Pennsylvania, the Pittsburgh and Erie, and a small portion of the Genesee.

In 1833 a paper was started by Charles Elliot and others in Pittsburgh, called the Pittsburgh Conference Journal, which subsequently became the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, and is the only paper which has been published under the authority of the church within the State. In 1825 a literary institution, called Madison College, was opened in Uniontown, Pa., which was succeeded, in 1833, by Alleghany College; and in the same year Dickinson College, at Carlisle, was taken under the patronage of the Philadelphia and Baltimore Conferences. In addition to these, seminaries have been established at Williamsport, under the Central Pennsylvania Conference; at Kingston, under the Wyoming Conference; the Pittsburgh Female College, and Beaver Female College, under the patronage of the Pittsburgh Conference; and the Clarion Seminary, and Lake Shore Seminary, at Northeast, under the patronage of the Erie Conference. Within a few years a Book Depository has been established in Philadelphia, under the control of the Philadelphia Conference Tract Society. An independent Methodist paper, the Philadelphia Home Journal, was published by Rev. Adam Wallace for several years; but it has been merged in The Christian Standard and Home Journal, which is published by the National Publishing Association for the Promotion of Holiness. The association has also a publishing house in Philadelphia, and issues a monthly paper, The Advocate of Holiness. In 1816 nearly all of the colored membership of Philadelphia, which at that time amounted to more than 1000, seceded, under the leadership of Rev. Richard Allen, subsequently Bishop Allen, and established the African Methodist Episcopal Church, which was joined by the greater part of the colored population within the State. A few of the preachers, however, remained in connection with the old church. In 1821 The Westeyan Repository was commenced in Trenton, N. J., under the proprietorship of W. S. Stockton, advocating changes in the government of the church. The following year it was removed to Philadelphia, was in 1824 merged in The Mutual Rights, and was thereafter published in Baltimore. Its publication, however, led to discussion and controversy, which, in 1828, were followed by secession, and the organization of several Methodist Protestant churches in Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and other parts of the State. The Methodist Protestant Church now has within the State the Pennsylvania and Pittsburgh Conferences, and a part of the Maryland. These Conferences, however, embrace some territory beyond the bounds of the State. The M. E. Church South has also a few societies belonging to the Baltimore Conference. The African M. E. Church has within the State the Philadelphia and the Pittsburgh Conferences. The colored membership belonging to the M. E. Church in Pennsylvania are included within the Delaware Conference. There are also German congregations of the M. E. Church in Philadelphia and Scranton belonging to the East German Conference, and in Pittsburgh and vicinity belonging to the Central German Conference. It is difficult to give with accuracy the number of Methodists in the State, as in several Conferences the precise relation of some of the charges is not known. An approximate statement, however, is as follows:

There are also reported upwards of 900 local preachers, 168,000 Sunday-school scholars, and 424 parsonages, valued at $1,115,136. There are also in the State about 8000 members of the Methodist Protestant Church, probably near 2000 of Primitive Free Methodists and Wesleyans, and about 12,000 belonging to the African churches; making a total membership of the Methodist bodies in the State of 191,668. Penn Yan, N. Y. (pop. 3488), the capital of Yates County, situated on the Northern Central Railroad, was formerly connected with what was known as Crooked Lake circuit. It was served in 1825 by Ogden Lanning, Henry J. Kent, and J. B. Alverson. In 1826 it is first mentioned as a separate appointment, and John B. Alverson was the pastor. It reported the following year 100 members. In 1857 it had become a well-established station, having 225 members, 140 Sunday-school scholars, and $5500 church property. It is now in the Genesee Conference, and has 407 members, 250 Sunday-school scholars, and $16,000 church property.

Pensacola, Fla. (pop. 3347), the principal city of Western Florida, and the capital of Escambia County, is situated on the west shore of Pensacola Bay. It is an important United States naval station. This region was for some time included in the Escambia mission. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1840, connected with the Alabama Conference, with J. L. Finley as pastor, who reported 5 white and 18 colored members. Since the division in 1845 it has been under the control of the M. E. Church South. It is in the Alabama Conference. The M. E. Church South has 113 members, 76 Sunday-school scholars, and $5000 church property. The African M. E. Church has 126 members, 72 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property.

Peoria, Ill. (pop. 22,849), the capital of Peoria County, is situated on the west bank of the Illinois River. Peoria mission was organized in 1832, with Zadok Hall as missionary. In 1833 it had 72 members. In 1857 it had two organized stations, with an aggregate of 296 members, 387 Sunday-school scholars, and $18,500 church property. The German and African M. E. Churches are both well represented. This city is in the Central Illinois Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Perfection, Christian, is a term used by Methodists to denote a state of grace implying purity of heart, or a heart cleansed from sin by the blood of Christ. Mr. Wesley calls it "the loving God with all our heart, mind, soul, and strength. This implies that no wrong temper, none contrary to love remains in the soul; and that all the thoughts, words, and actions are governed by pure love." This state is also expressed in Scripture by the words holiness, sanctification, purity, perfect love, fulness of God, and of Christ, and of the Holy Ghost, and full assurance of faith. In addition to these, the words entire sanctification, higher life, rest of faith, and full salvation are used by Christians to express the same idea. Bishop Foster describes it as "a state in which the Christian is entirely free from sin, properly so called, both inward and outward: a state in which he will do no act involving guilt, in which he will possess no unholy temper, in which the entire outward man of the life, and the entire inward man of the heart, will be pure in the sight of God." "But, additionally, we include in our idea of entire holiness more than mere freedom from sin in the forgiving sense. That is merely a negative view: it has a positive character. We believe it to include besides this the spiritual graces, as love, meekness, humility, and such like in perfection, perfection not of measure, but of kind, and that these graces exist in the entirely sanctified soul without alloy, without mixture, in simplicity." Dr. Steele defines it to be "that participation of the divine nature which excludes all original depravity or inbred sin from the heart, and fills it with perfect love to God and man,—perfect love,—the union of the Holy One, and the baptism of the Holy Ghost."

This state does not imply a perfection of knowledge. Man is finite, his intellectual faculties are fallible, his judgment is erring, he is ever learning. Nor does it imply freedom from infirmities. "Man's bodily organs have suffered equally with the rest of his frame, hence he cannot help thinking wrong sometimes, till this corruptible shall put on incorruption." Nor does it imply freedom from temptations and solicitations to sin. Holiness insures no man freedom from trial; as long as he is in the world he will have tribulation. Holiness, the end of creation in humanity, can only be attained by character, which can only be developed by discipline. Christ himself perfect, was tempted. His human nature was subject to temptation, and man cannot stand above his Master. Solicitation to sin will always occur in a sinful world, but compliance may be denied the tempter, by the soul filled with the love of Christ. Nor does this state imply sinless perfection. Mr. Wesley says that "I do not approve the term sinless perfection."—Plain Account, p. 346. There is, he further affirms, a sense in which it may be true. Men do not need reconciliation afresh, they do not need restoration to the favor of God, but ability to keep in it. Christ does not procure pardon for them anew, but "ever liveth to make intercession for them." "By one offering he hath perfected forever them that are sanctified."—Heb. x. 14. Nor does it imply absolute perfection. There is none such among men. There is none that is not conditional and relative: none that does not admit of a continual increase. A man comparatively holy may become in degree more holy. God has fixed no limit to the capacities of the soul restored to his image. It can increase in love eternally.

Christian perfection is not merely "sincerity" "nor the utmost of human endeavor;" it implies both of these. It is more than our complete separation from the world: more than human attainment: it is the perfection of love, the loving God with all the heart, mind, and soul, the image of God stamped upon the heart, and the conscious indwelling of the Holy Ghost. As a grace, it is the especial gift of the Holy Ghost; as a work, it is the entire consecration of the soul unto God. It is conditional, like conversion and justification. The same Spirit that justifies also sanctifies; the same faith that procures the one also procures the other. But justification is distinguished from sanctification in the fact that the former is done for us, the latter is done in us; one, a forensic act, implies what God has done for us, as the result of the atonement, the fruit of the atonement; the other is the fruit of the Holy Spirit. Justification is what God does for us through faith in the word of Christ; the act of pardon by which we are made free from the law, changing us from a state of guilt and condemnation to a state of pardon and acceptance. Sanctification is that act of the Holy Ghost whereby the justified man is made holy. One is a change of condition wrought without for man; the other a change of nature wrought within, making the man free from the law, also free from sin and perfectly whole. Sanctification is not regeneration. It is identical with it in the sense that the principle of purity is found in both states. Regeneration is purity, holiness is maturity. The work of the Holy Spirit is the same in both states. The initial work of holiness begins at regeneration. There can be no increase of purity but there will be a continual increase in love and in all the fruits of the Spirit. Regeneration is a perfect work, but it is initial. Mr. Fletcher affirms "that the same spirit of faith which initially purifies, when we cordially believe the pardoning love of God, completely cleanses when we believe this sanctifying love." Mr. Alfred Cookman, one of the most beautiful examples of holiness produced by the American church, has said, "Is this grace different from that received at conversion? We answer, no: it is only more of that precious grace. As we sometimes hear, it is a deeper work of grace. Christ comes in his spiritual presence to abide in our soul; and while we trust in him, he assumes the entire responsibility of our complete salvation." Regeneration is incipient sanctification in this sense. It is of the same nature. It is included in entire sanctification, but is not so extensive. It is a degree, but not the whole of that work. The distinction is found in the following: "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ."—I. Thess. v. 23. "Having therefore these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."—II. Cor. vii. 1.

Methodism differs from Moravianism in that it does not hold regeneration and entire sanctification to be identical. Every man whose sins are really pardoned, and who is begotten of God, is pure in heart and free from sin and sanctified. It is repelling to human thought that God would create a new soul impure: it is also against his economy to hold that men can be born as men,—born a new creature: the believer does not come into the kingdom of God a full-grown man. The new creation is not in the stature of the fullness of Christ, it is immaturity but not incompleteness. Scripture refers to this difference in the terms babe and children, implying a unity of nature but a difference of development: a perfection of nature, but not of stature. The failure to discern the distinction between childhood and adulthood has led some writers, in their desire to give the full value to the grace of sanctification, to depreciate regeneration and justification and their fruits. This depreciation of justification and regeneration, holding the heart regenerated, as possessed "of pride, unbelief, envy, jealousy, anger, ambition, and other forms of sin," has led to the reproduction in the church of the doctrine of Zinzendorf, that entire sanctification is one with regeneration. Scriptures clearly refer to a state of grace in fullness and completeness of blessing in the words to be "filled with all the fullness of God," and to enjoy this state is above the experience of ordinary Christians, even of many who have the witness of the Spirit that they are the children of God and heirs of eternal life.

The agent in producing this state is found in Scripture to be the Holy Spirit. He is the sanctifier. He regenerates and also sanctifies. The whole work of sanctification is the work of the Holy Spirit upon the heart. The Spirit beareth "witness with our spirits that we are the children of God." Man's faith leads him to the possession of this grace; by no works can he procure it. Sanctification is the gift of the Holy Ghost. "But we are bound to give thanks always to God for you, brethren, beloved of the Lord, because God hath from the beginning chosen you to salvation through sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth."—II. Thess. xi. 13. "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."—I. John i. 9.

The work of complete sanctification is, according to Mr. Wesley, both gradual and instantaneous. It is gradual as to the acquisition of knowledge and of ability to know, but instantaneous as to the appropriation of the blessing comprehended. "The Spirit may take time to prepare the heart for a dwelling-place for God, but he enters it and fills it with his presence in a moment. The work may progress in doing, but there is an instant when it is done, completed, finished." A man may be dying for some time, yet he does not, properly speaking, die until the instant the soul is separated from the body, and in that instant he lives the life of eternity. In like manner, he may be dying to sin for some time, yet he is not dead to sin until sin is separated from his soul, and in that instant he lives the full life of love. The entrance of the soul into this state varies in time. Some grow more rapidly than others in grace; some receive the fullness of the light gradually,—although these are exceptional. The experience has generally come out in some crisis hour of the soul, sudden and instantaneous. This is but the natural result of the working of the laws of the Spirit. They are not in their development and execution as the laws of the physical world, conditioned by time. Spiritual processes may be hastened by faith. The law of the Spirit under which believers live, and through which they are to receive the fullness of the blessing of God, is faith,—faith founded upon the word of God,—and if the believer accepts this condition and fulfills it, the response will come back in a heart cleansed from all sin and filled with the love of God. This state of grace is not only presented in Scripture, but is demanded of all believers in Christ. It is declared as his will. "For this is the will of God, even your sanctification." "Be ye filled with the Spirit."—Eph. v. 18. "I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service."—Romans xii. 1. Not only is this God's will, but it is his command. "Be ye holy, for I am holy." "Be ye perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect."—Matt. v. 48. "Without holiness shall no man see God." "Having these promises, dearly beloved, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God."—II. Cor. vii. 1. Not only is it a command, but Scripture declares it a promise. "Wherefore he is able to save them to the utmost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."—Heb. vii. 25. It is declared in the prayers of Scripture. "And the very God of peace sanctify you wholly; and I pray God your whole spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it."—I. Thess. v. 23, 24. Scripture also witnesses to its attainment. "Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God."—Gen. vi. 9. "I beseech thee, O Lord, remember now how I have walked before thee in truth and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight."—II. Kings xx. 3. "And they were both righteous before God, walking in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord blameless."—Luke i. 6. "Let us therefore, as many as be perfect, be thus minded; and if in anything ye be otherwise minded, God shall reveal even this unto you."—Philippians iii.

15. The word of God is ultimate. This state of grace is distinctly revealed as a doctrine and experience in the Scriptures. Commanded of God, it is of universal obligation, and it is our duty as believers to enter into it. He is not arbitrary in his demands. It is dishonoring to him to conceive that he would command what his children could not perform. His promises are not illusory: they are given for life and conduct. He does not mock his children by promising that which he will not bestow. "His promises are yea and amen to them that believe."

The provisions of the gospel are adequate for the complete sanctification of the believer. There is sufficient power in God's word, in Christ's work, in the Holy Spirit's agency, to accomplish it. Scripture holds it up as attainable and also attained, revealing unto us characters that have been perfect in the love of God.

This state of grace must follow the revelation of Jesus Christ. A lower standard we could not conceive as coming from God. No less provision could proceed from a holy God, and no less attainment could be demanded of his children. "God is love; the end of the commandment is love." He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him." There is no fear in love, for perfect love casteth out fear. This state of grace is attainable in this life. "As it is true that without holiness no man shall see the Lord; unless we admit the doctrine of purgatory, the entire sanctification of the soul and its complete renewal in holiness must take place in this world." God's commands are to the living: they imply present obedience, and present as well as future reward. The promises of God are objects of present trust and fulfillment: they are conditional upon faith. When the conditions are fulfilled the blessing is bestowed. It must be antecedent to death. "Death of itself has no sanctifying or saving efficacy. Salvation is by the Holy Spirit through the blood of Christ, and no reason is apparent why the work of complete purification may not be wrought a moment before as well as a moment after the soul leaves the body; if one moment, many; and, for aught that is apparent, many years as well." "For every one that hath this hope purifieth himself, even as he is pure."—I. John iii. 3. "Whosoever abideth in him, sinneth not; whosoever sinneth, hath not seen him, nor known him."—I. John iii. 6. The Holy Spirit certifies to its own work. The work is supernatural, and also the evidence. The Spirit witnesses to the fact of holiness. It is a matter of consciousness: the word of God verified in human experience. All that the Holy Spirit accomplishes in the soul is revealed with more or less clearness to the consciousness. The Spirit that bore witness to the fact of pardon now manifests itself in the work of entire sanctification.

This constant communion of the Father and Son and Holy Ghost is frequently alluded to in Scripture. "Hereby know we that we dwell in him, and he in us, because he hath given us of his Spirit."—1. John iv. 13.

Perkins, John W., was born in Vermont in 1814, and died in Boston, Feb. 8, 1858. He entered the traveling connection in 1842, in Vermont Conference, M. E. Church, and in 1849 was transferred to the New England Conference, where he filled a number of prominent appointments. He was an able, faithful, and successful laborer. He was a good biblical student, and revivals were witnessed under his ministry in nearly all his fields of labor. Among his last words were, "I rest on the atonement, and my way is clear to heaven."

Perkins, William, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Goochland Co., Va., Aug. 2, 1800, and died in Missouri, Jan. 31, 1871. He was a local preacher for twenty-five years, but did not enter the itinerant connection until 1853. He filled various appointments on stations, circuits, and districts until 1870. He was a man of culture, but was simple and earnest in his manner. He was an able and useful minister.

Perkins, William, a lay delegate from the Delaware Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Charlestown, Md., November 3, 1820. Not having been permitted to attend a day-school, he gained his education in a Sunday-school, and much of it while acting as a teacher. Since the emancipation of the people of his race, he has been active in all measures for the advancement of education among them. He exerted himself influentially with the legislature of Maryland to secure an annual appropriation for colored schools. He is a member of the board of trustees of James Methodist Episcopal church, Charlestown, Md.

Perks, George F., M.A., an eminent English Wesleyan, was born at Madeley, Aug. 19, 1819, and was grandson to old Mr. Perks, the intimate and beloved friend of the saintly John Fletcher, of Madeley. Early left an orphan, Mr. Perks was happy in having a godly aunt (Mrs. R. Perks, of Wolverhampton), who responded with true womanly instinct to the mental and spiritual needs of her nephew, who, with humility and native modesty, sought her counsel, and acted upon her advice in the all-important matter of entering the ministry. His early life was devoted to close and systematic study, hence, when called to preach, he was logical and mathematically correct, his language was choice, his figures were rich, practical, and invariably drawn from Scripture. His discourses were eloquent and elegant, and redolent of scholarly attainments. None felt jealous of Mr. Perks, for he never put himself forward; but he was put into prominent positions by the love of his brethren. In 1865 one of the oldest American colleges conferred on him the diploma of M.A. In 1867 he was appointed one of the foreign missionary secretaries. Five years later he became secretary of the Conference, and the following year president. In every position held by him Mr. Perks rose gradually and surely in the estimation of his brethren and of the whole connection. In the mission house, as elsewhere, he pursued his duties to the last with the most intense earnestness and complete success. He literally died of overwork. He went to Rotherham Yorks to preach missionary sermons; during the evening sermon he was taken ill, and died the following night, May 26, 1877.

Permanent Fund.—The General Conference of 1864 appointed a board of trustees to hold the donations or bequests for the Methodist Episcopal Church. This board was organized under a charter from the State of Ohio, and has its office in Cincinnati. In 1872 the General Conference directed that any sums donated or bequeathed, but not specially designated for any benevolent object, should be appropriated to what it denominated the "Permanent Fund." The following are the provisions as contained in the Discipline:

"There shall be a fund known as 'The Permanent Fund,' to be held by the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the principal of which shall be intact forever, and which shall be invested by said trustees on first-class securities, and at as favorable rates as can be legally secured. It shall be the duty of all our ministers to obtain, as far as practicable, contributions to said fund, by donations, bequests, and otherwise. The interest accumulating from said fund shall be subject to the order of the General Conference for the following purposes: 1. To pay the expenses of the General Conference. 2. To pay the expenses of delegations appointed by the General Conference to corresponding bodies. 3. To make up any deficiencies in the salaries of the bishops. 4. To relieve the necessities of the superannuated and worn-out preachers, and of the widows and orphans of those who have died in the work."

Perrine, William Henry, D.D., was born at Lyons, N. Y., in 1827, and was converted at Sandstone, Mich., in 1840. He entered the ministry of the M. E. Church in 1851, and was stationed successively at Spring Arbor, Jackson, Hastings, Detroit, Adrian, Ann Arbor, and other important points in Michigan. He also served several years as Professor of Natural Science, Astronomy, and Belles-Letters in Albion College. He made a tour of the East in 1857-59, and being an artist, he produced a chromo of the Holy Land, which has been pronounced excellent and accurate. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876, from the Michigan Conference, in which his ministerial life has been spent.

Perronet, Charles, was one of the early Methodist ministers who had been educated at Oxford University, and became associated with the Wesleys. He accompanied Charles Wesley in his visit to Ireland, in 1747, and subsequently became an active and zealous minister. While he assisted Mr. Wesley, he does not appear to have been regularly identified with the Conference; though at his death, in 1776, he is spoken of as an itinerant Methodist preacher of more than twenty years faithful service. Shortly before his death he said, "God has purged me from all my dross; all is done away. I am all love."

Perronet, Edward, the son of Vincent Perronet, was a student in Oxford, and was included in the "Poetic Trio" with John and Charles Wesley. He was a man of great energy and personal courage. He passed with Mr. Wesley through many persecutions and severe trials. In 1748 his name is entered as an itinerant minister, but he became dissatisfied with Mr. Wesley's adhering so closely to the English church. For a time he was employed by Lady Huntingdon, but subsequently became pastor of a dissenting church. He died in 1792, his last words being, "Glory to God in the height of his divinity! Glory to God in the depth of his humanity! Glory to God in his all-sufficiency! Into his hands I commit my spirit." He is author of the hymn, "All hail the power of Jesus' name."

Perronet, Vincent, was an English clergyman, who took a deep interest in the work performed by Mr. Wesley. He was descended from Swiss-French parents, and was born about 1700. He received a university education, and became vicar of Shoreham. He was towards Mr. Wesley a warm friend and confidential counselor. The itinerants were ever welcomed into his church, though his parishioners persecuted and sometimes mobbed them. When he admitted Charles Wesley into his pulpit it is said they "roared, stamped, blasphemed, rang the bells, and turned the church into a bear-garden." The Wesleys were, however, subsequently successful, and preached without interruption. He was a man of deep piety, and was one of the brightest ornaments of the century.

Perry, Benjamin Franklin, was born in Talbot Co., Ga., Feb. 13, 1836. He studied at Emory College, where, in 1855, he took the first honors of his class. The following year he was received into the Texas Conference, where he continued until the breaking out of the Civil War. He became chaplain in the Southern army, sharing all the hardships of the siege of Vicksburg. In 1864 he was appointed a missionary to Johnson's army. After the close of the war he returned to the pastoral work, and was for two years in charge of a female college. He died Sept. 23, 1868.

Perry, James H., D.D., an able minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Ulster Co., N. Y., in 1811. He received the appointment of a cadet in the military academy at West Point, but sympathizing with Texan independence, he resigned his place in the third year of his connection, and accepted the appointment of colonel in the Texan army. Having raised a regiment in New York, he reached Texas in time to take part in the battle of San Jacinto. On his return home, attending a love-feast, he became deeply influenced by religious truth, and shortly after united with the church. In 1838 he entered the New York Conference, and filled many of the best appointments in both New York and New York East Conferences. He was also a delegate to the General Conference in 1856. When the Civil War broke out he accepted the command of the 48th Regiment of New York Volunteers, and died after the fall of Pulaski, of apoplexy, June 18, 1863. He was an able minister, a skillful debater, and a warm and devoted friend.

Perry, Solomon C., a minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Massachusetts, May 27, 1807. He was educated among the Congregationalists, but attending a Methodist church some seven miles distant, became converted, and entered the Willbraham Academy. After completing his preparatory course, he attended and graduated at Brown University. He taught for a time in an academy, and was licensed as a local preacher. He entered the New York Conference in 1838, and after filling a number of excellent appointments, he was made supernumerary in 1860, in which relation he continued until his death, March 6, 1872.

Perseverance, Final, is in theological writing used to designate the doctrine that those who are truly converted shall never finally fall from grace, but shall hold out to the end and be saved. The doctrine is logically derived from that of election and reprobation. If persons are elected from eternity without foresight of either faith or good works, but chosen to salvation, it follows necessarily that having received the Spirit, which the elect alone receive, they are assured of eternal life. Hence all Calvinistic churches adopt, as an article of faith, the doctrine of the final perseverance of the saints. Arminian churches, on the contrary, believing that salvation depends upon the proper exercise of free will in yielding to the influence of the Divine Spirit, and that persons who have yielded may again reject the influences of the Spirit and fall into sin, do not believe that those who are converted will necessarily be saved. They ground their belief further on the warnings which are given by our Saviour and his apostles, in teaching the necessity of watchfulness and prayer, in the warnings against falling away contained in many passages of Scripture, and the express declaration that some had been made "shipwreck of faith" and had fallen away. And even the Apostle Paul, who had such exceeding visions of glory, felt it necessary to keep his body under lest he himself should become "a cast-away." Besides, this doctrine places the Christian higher than Adam stood in his primeval state, for though created in the image of God he was liable to fall. It is also believed to encourage indifference and disobedience by removing the thought of all danger of falling from the mind of the regenerate. The Methodist Churches, being Arminian in theology, totally reject the doctrine of the necessary perseverance of the saints, while at the same time they teach that the prayerful and obedient, while they remain in that condition, can never be separated from the love of God which is in Christ Jesus. They believe it, however, to be necessary to use all diligence to make their "calling and election sure."

Pershing, Israel C., D.D., president of the Pittsburgh Female College, was born in Westmoreland Co., Pa., in 1827. By close application and by his own efforts he succeeded in preparing himself for college. Early in life he was converted, and united with the M. E. Church. In 1844 he entered college, and by personal sacrifice and effort graduated from Jefferson College, at Canonsburg, Pa., in 1850, bearing away the highest honors in a class of fifty-five. He entered the Pittsburgh Conference the same year, and after filling various prominent appointments, he was, in 1859, elected president of the Pittsburgh Female College, where he has since remained. Dr. Pershing is well known as an educator, and has also aided the church largely in dedicatory services and special efforts in freeing churches from debt. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1864, 1868, 1872, and 1876, and was one of the assistant secretaries in the last two Conferences; and has been secretary of the Pittsburgh Conference for twenty-three years.

Peru, Ill. (pop. 3650), is situated in La Salle County, on the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific Railroad. This region was embraced in one of the oldest Methodist circuits in the State. But this being a comparatively small town did not appear by name on the records of the M. E. Church until more recently. It is in the Rock River Conference, and reports about 30 members, 92 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property. The German M. E. Church have an organization, and report about 60 members, 60 Sunday-school scholars, and $1500 church property.

Peru, Ind. (pop. 3617), the capital of Miami County, is situated on the Wabash River, and on the Indianapolis, Peru and Chicago Railroad. Methodism was introduced in 1832, when it was called Cumberland, by Rev. W. M. Rayburn, a local preacher, who formed a class of eight persons. The first church edifice was erected in 1836, and shortly after a Sunday-school was organized. The first church erected was replaced, in 1849, by the present brick edifice. It was for many years the head of a large circuit, but became a station prior to 1857. It has several times been the seat of the Annual Conference. It is in the North Indiana Conference, and reports for 1876, 290 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and $21,000 church property. The German M. E. Church has about 60 members, 50 Sunday-school scholars, and $1000 church property. The African M. E. Church has also erected a brick edifice.

Peters, John, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, was born in Ireland, Dec. 10, 1795. He pursued an academical education, with a view of entering the Presbyterian ministry. Subsequently he was converted, and became a member of the Wesleyan Methodist Society, and was employed as a teacher in the county of Antrim for twelve years, being leader and local preacher. In 1835 he sympathized with the movement of the Methodist Reformers, and went to Manchester, and was admitted into the itinerant ministry of the Wesleyan Association. In 1837 he was elected a member of the connectional committee, which position he retained for twenty-seven years successively. He was corresponding secretary three terms; he was also connectional secretary. In 1845 and in 1851 he filled the presidential chair. He traveled twenty-nine years, and was highly esteemed on all his charges. His health then gave way, and he died May 7, 1865. Mr. Peters was no ordinary man: impulsive, quick, and witty, he was, nevertheless, "punctual and methodical in his arrangements. He was studious in his habits, a good tactician, a fervent speaker, an able preacher, and a holy man."

Petersburg, Va. (pop. 18,950), is situated on the Appomattox River, 22 miles south of Richmond. Methodism was introduced in this place by Robert Williams, in February, 1773. Two men, Gresset Davis and Nathaniel Young, merchants of this place, being in Norfolk, invited Mr. Williams to come and preach for them. He accepted the invitation, and preached in an old theatre fitted up for the use of all denominations. The infant church was severely persecuted. At one time, when Hope Hull and John Easter were holding a meeting, a mob, "with yells and curses, burst in among the worshippers, throwing lighted squibs and fire-crackers. Meanwhile another band brought up a fire-engine and played a stream of water into the house till every light was put out. Soon the place was involved in darkness, save where a bursting fire-cracker gave a momentary gleam, and the whole congregation was routed and driven from the place." In the midst of these persecutions, however, they continued to preach as occasion furnished opportunity. Petersburg was at first included in the Brunswick circuit. The old theatre was abandoned and a church was built on Harrison Street; but during the Revolutionary War it was occupied by the soldiers, first as barracks, then as a hospital, and was finally destroyed by fire. After the loss of the church several persons opened their private dwellings for preaching. Soon after the close of the war a second Methodist church was built. It was started by Mr. Davis, who headed the subscription-list with £50. This house, which stood in Market Street, is described as "very small and unique of its kind, and showing any amount of props, beams, and girders." In 1792 Petersburg first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church, John Lindsay being appointed pastor, and an Annual Conference was held Nov. 15, 1793. Here is located the Southern Female College, founded in 1861, and under the control of the M. E. Church South. Methodism in this city, at the division of the M. E. Church in 1845, adhered to the M. E. Church South, since which time the African M. E. Church has organized a society. The city is within the bounds of the Virginia Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Petrie, John, is a layman of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, who in the earlier days of the body held a distinguished place in its counsels. He is now in extreme old age. He held the office of connectional treasurer from 1838 till 1854, and was chapel treasurer from 1860 till 1869. Mr. Petrie resides in Rockdale, the town of the Right Honorable John Bright, with whom he was associated in the agitation for the repeal of the corn laws. Mr. Petrie was a member of the council of the Anti-Corn League, and his portrait appears in the historical painting which gives the likenesses of the leaders of that famous association.

Petty, Asbury L., was born in Guernsey Co., O., Sept. 18, 1831, and was educated at Muskingum College. He was converted in his early youth, and after his education he spent some time in teaching school. He joined the Pittsburgh Conference in 1853, and has given twenty-five years of uninterrupted service in the itinerancy, having never been supernumerary or superannuated. Among his chief appointments are Ashbury chapel, near Fifth Avenue, Pittsburgh, Wellsville, Steubenville, Uniontown, Cambridge, Sewickly, and Arch Street, Alleghany. He was presiding elder of West Pittsburgh and Cambridge districts. He was appointed by the General Conference of 1876 a member of the publishing committee of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate for a term of four years.

Pewed Churches.—In the early history of Methodism all the churches were built with free seats. Mr. Wesley required this, and yet before his death he permitted pews to be set apart in the gallery in a few churches. The General Conference of 1784 directed that all the churches "be built plain and decent, but not more expensive than is absolutely unavoidable." Subsequently, in 1820, they added, "and with free seats." In 1852, however, this rule was modified by adding, "wherever practicable." The reason which was early assigned for this rule was, "the necessity of raising money will make rich men necessary to us; but if so, we must be dependent on them, yea, and governed by them, and then farewell to Methodist discipline, if not doctrine too." This remained in the Discipline until 1872. Pewed churches were early introduced in New England, where free churches are almost unknown. In the Middle States the churches were free until about 1830, when a pewed church was erected in New York, and shortly afterwards in Baltimore and Philadelphia. At present the churches throughout the Middle States, and throughout the East and South generally, have free seats, except a few in the larger cities. In New England, New York, Northern Ohio, and Michigan a large proportion of the churches are pewed.

Phayre, Rev. John, was born in Dublin, Ireland, May 12, 1790. He united with the Wesleyan society in Dublin when quite young. In the year 1817 he emigrated to America, and became connected with old Forsyth Street church, New York, in 1819. He was licensed to preach in 1840, and was subsequently ordained deacon and elder. He was an untiring worker, and during his forty-two years as an exhorter and local preacher he devoted himself especially to work at the Almshouse, House of Refuge, Home for Old People, asylums, hospitals, and Penitentiary of New York. He was devotedly attached to Methodism, and his house was the home of the itinerants. He was a fine preacher, gifted in prayer, cheerful and happy in his ways, very circumspect and gentlemanly in his bearing. His illness was brief and severe, but his death was triumphant, in the early part of 1867.

Phelps, Arza J., a delegate from the Central New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Elizabethtown, N. J., in 1811; was licensed to preach when twenty-one years old, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1834. He was for twelve years a member of the publishing committee of The Northern Christian Advocate. He represented the Black River Conference in the General Conference in 1852, 1856, and 1868.

Philadelphia.—As early as 1767, Captain Webb held the first Methodist service in Philadelphia. Dr. Wrangle, a Swedish missionary, who had preached in Philadelphia, and who was acquainted with Mr. Wesley's writings, on leaving that city had recommended his members to hear any of Mr. Wesley's preachers who might visit the city. Hence the way was prepared for Captain Webb's reception. In 1768 he organized a class of seven members, who met in a sail-loft, which was near a drawbridge then existing on Dock Creek, at Front Street. The house has long since given place to others. He visited the city occasionally during 1769, and additions were made to the society. In October of that year Messrs. Boardman and Pilmoor, missionaries sent by Mr. Wesley, arrived in the city. Boardman, after having preached a few sermons, went to New York. Pilmoor, remaining in the city, went to the commons and preached in the stage of the race-course at Franklin Square. Subsequently he preached on the State-house steps on Chestnut Street. He wrote Mr. Wesley that he found "about a hundred members."

About a month after his arrival, in November, 1769, St. George's church, on Fourth Street, was offered for sale, as the members of the German Reformed Church, who had built it, had become embarrassed. Captain Webb fortunately arrived in the city, made a contribution himself, and assisted Mr. Pilmoor in raising a sufficient sum of money to secure the purchase. It was then in a wholly unfinished state: the walls were unplastered, there were neither windows nor doors, and the floor was not laid. But in that unfinished condition it was occupied by the society, with some slight improvement, until the British occupied the city during the Revolutionary War. For a time it was used by them as a cavalry school. Notwithstanding its plain and unfinished condition, it was frequented by many able men. Among others, John Adams notices, in his diary in 1774, his listening to Captain Webb and his high appreciation of his services. That church still remains, and is the oldest Methodist church in America.

In 1770, John King came to Philadelphia from England, but Mr. Pilmoor, doubting his proper qualifications for the ministry, refused to encourage him, and he commenced services in the "Potter's Field," now Washington Square, where he accomplished such a work that Mr. Pilmoor cordially received him.

In 1771, Asbury and Wright arrived in Philadelphia, and, by interchange with Pilmoor and Boardman, occasionally occupied the pulpit. Here Mr. Asbury formed the acquaintance of Mr. Roberdeau, who afterwards, as General Roberdeau, introduced Bishops Coke and Asbury to General Washington.

In 1773, Mr. Rankin arrived from Europe, having been appointed a general superintendent of the work in America. He called together the ministers, and held the first Annual Conference on the continent, in St. George's church, July 14, 1773. Eight preachers were present besides Boardman and Pilmoor, who were about returning to England. All of them but two were from Europe. Two whose names appear in the minutes were not present. At that Conference 180 members were reported in the society in Philadelphia. This embraced not only the city, but a few appointments in the vicinity. At the Conference held in the same place in the following May, the number was reported at 204; and in 1775 at 190.

The Revolutionary struggle was already commencing, and was beginning seriously to affect the work. The following year the Conference was held in Baltimore, and the number of members reported was 137; and in 1777 the number was reduced to 96. In 1778 no report was made. In 1779 there were only 89 members; in 1780, 90 members; while in 1781 and 1782 the name of Philadelphia disappears from the minutes, and the numbers are given for the State of Pennsylvania. In 1783 Philadelphia reappears with 119 members. The war having closed, we find, in 1784, 470 reported.

In 1789, Rev. John Dickins was appointed book steward, and also in charge of the Philadelphia station. From that time Methodist books were published in Philadelphia until 1804, when the Concern was removed to New York. In 1790, Richard Whatecoat was stationed in Philadelphia, while Mr. Dickins is announced as "superintendent of the printing and book business." In that year a small brick building called "Ebenezer," in Second Street below Catharine, was opened for divine service. It was the first house of worship erected by the Methodists in Philadelphia, and was not built until twenty years after the purchase of St. George's; though class- and prayer-meetings had been established in that neighborhood for some years previously. It was superseded by another edifice on Christian Street, between Third and Fourth, in 1813, which was rebuilt in 1851. A cemetery was attached to this church, in which several itinerant ministers in Philadelphia were interred. In 1794 a place of worship was erected for the colored people. It acquired a large membership, and was under the discipline of the "Methodist Episcopal Church" until 1816. It then became independent, and was organized with other colored churches into the "African Methodist Episcopal Church," with Richard Allen, one of their principal local preachers, as bishop. In 1796 a second place of worship was opened for the colored people in Brown Street, and was called "Zoar." This society still remains in connection with the church. In 1793, and also in 1797 and 1798, the city was visited with the terrible scourge of the "yellow fever," and in the latter year Mr. Dickins—who was one of the few ministers who remained at his post in the city—was swept away. He was succeeded in the book business by Ezekiel Cooper.

At the time of the introduction of Methodism into Philadelphia, other denominations were comparatively strong. The Episcopalians had four churches; the Presbyterians three; the Friends two; and other leading denominations had at least one church each. The wealth of the city—like that of the State—was chiefly in the hands of the Friends and of the Episcopalians. William Penn, the proprietor, though a "Friend," was of a family connected with the English Church, and the officers of the government appointed by the British Crown were chiefly of that denomination. The son of William Penn, who succeeded as proprietor of Pennsylvania, was disciplined by the Friends for his light irreligious habits; and leaving their communion, he attended the Episcopal services. From time to time those who were dissatisfied with their strictness of discipline left the Friends' society and united with the same body. The landed property of Pennsylvania, being chiefly in the hands of the Penn family, thus passed into the hands of these two churches. The Presbyterians having settled in New Jersey, many of them formed business relations in the city and rapidly acquired considerable property. The real estate at that time being very low, it formed, by its subsequent rise, the foundations of the fortunes of all the older families. Methodism had no such help. Its friends were generally poor, and it encountered strong opposition from most of the established bodies. Notwithstanding this opposition, however, it continued to increase, and in 1800, a number of families leaving St. George's church, purchased a part of Whitefield's Academy, and in 1802 founded the "Union church." The old building was removed in 1833, and the present church, adjoining the Merchants' Hotel, was erected. From its commencement the Union church was a distinct body, but for many years the other churches remained in the same pastoral charge with St. George's. In the lapse of years, however, the charge was separated into distinct churches. The growth of the Methodist churches has been steady though not rapid. The original buildings were plain, unpretending structures, of which only St. George's remains. "Trinity church," built in 1842, was the first church erected of more modern architecture, and was for many years the chief centre of the Methodistic wealth and influence. It was the first pewed church, and the first to introduce an organ. Other commodious and beautiful structures have since been erected, the most beautiful of which is the Arch Street church, at the corner of Broad.

In 1866 a building at 1018 Arch Street was purchased by the Philadelphia Conference Tract Society, subscriptions and donations having been made by a number of gentlemen for that purpose. The lower story was occupied as a book-store, while the upper rooms were set apart for the bishop's office and for the Church Extension Society, and for a Historical Society and other purposes. Subsequently the adjoining building, 1020, was purchased, and the entire edifice was remodeled. The Church Extension office was removed to the new building, and a large hall was opened for preachers' meetings and other services. The book-store is one of the largest and most beautiful now occupied by the church in any city. By the effort of the ladies, assisted by a number of the gentlemen of the church, a square of ground was purchased on Lehigh Avenue, on which a Home has been erected for the aged and destitute members of the church. The property is large and commodious, and is valued at nearly $200,000.

In 1829 a number of members seceded, and established a "Methodist Protestant Church." For a time it appeared to have success, and several additional churches were erected. All these, however, have either disappeared or have reunited with the parent body. In 1846 services were commenced in the German language, and after several years of toil a German church was erected on Girard Avenue. The growth has been slow. At present there are in the corporation, which embraces the entire county of Philadelphia, of M. E. Church buildings, 86 English, 2 German, and 5 belonging to the colored population. The English white churches are united with the Philadelphia Conference; the Germans are under the care of the East German Conference; and the colored under the care of the Delaware Conference. There are now reported 25,606 members and probationers, 26,471 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $2,538,035. The African Methodist Episcopal Church has 6 churches, besides several missions, and reports 2860 members, 1380 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $127,100. The Free Methodists have 1 church, with 48 members, 50 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $7000. There is also a small organization of Primitive Methodists. The African Zion Church has 1 building, but no statistics have been furnished; and there are a few small congregations of Union and other colored branches. The following table presents the names, date of erection, and the number of members, embracing probationers, together with the value of church property and the number of Sunday-school scholars, as shown in the minutes of 1876:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars	Ch. Property.

Philadelphia Conference, M. E. Church, is one of the original six Conferences organized by the General Conference of 1796. "It embraced part of New York, New Jersey, all that part of Pennsylvania which lies on the east side of the Susquehanna River, the State of Delaware, and all the rest of the peninsula." In 1812 its boundaries included "the whole of the peninsula between the Chesapeake and Delaware Bays, and all that part of Pennsylvania lying between the Delaware and Susquehanna Rivers, except what was included in the Genesee Conference, and all the State of New Jersey, with Staten Island." This sentence was added in 1816: "and so much of the State of New York as now is, or at any time may be, attached to the Bergen and Hamburg districts." The territory originally included in this Conference was very extensive, and out of it have been organized New Jersey, Newark, Central Pennsylvania, Wilmington, and portions of Wyoming and Genesee Conferences. The General Conference of 1876 defined its boundaries as follows: "On the east by the Delaware River, on the south by the Pennsylvania State line, on the west by the Susquehanna River, excluding Harrisburg, on the north by the north lines of Dauphin, Schuylkill, Carbon, and Monroe Counties, excepting Ashland and Beaver Meadows circuit." In Philadelphia the first three Methodist Conferences in America were held, in the years 1773, 1774, and 1775. Owing to the Revolutionary War, Conference was not again held in the city until May 18, 1788. Since that time a Philadelphia Conference has been annually held. The Philadelphia Conference has always been a central and influential body in Methodism. Prior to the delegated Conference of 1812, the ministers belonging to the Philadelphia and Baltimore Conferences composed more than one-half the members of the General Conference, which during that period met in Baltimore. It has been a patronizing body to Dickinson College and to several seminaries; but with the present arrangement of boundaries it has no literary institution under its patronage within its limits. It has led all the Conferences in the amount of its missionary collections. Its statistics for 1876 are: 259 traveling and 326 local preachers, 49,579 members, 368 Sunday-schools, and 58,075 Sunday-school scholars, 315 churches, valued at $3,813,755, 95 parsonages, valued at $406,350, $43,221 for missions.

Phillips, John Milton, one of the book agents in charge of the Methodist Book Concern at New York, was born in Montgomery Co., Ky., March 26, 1820. He was a son of one of the old Methodist families, his father being Rev. William Phillips, who was elected assistant editor of the Western Christian Advocate in May, 1836, and died in August following. Mr. John M. Phillips became a resident of Cincinnati in 1834, and five years later, at the age of nineteen, he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and entered the Western Methodist Book Concern in that city, and remained in the business department of that publishing house until 1872, when he was elected book agent at New York. During his residence in Cincinnati he was for four years president of a fire insurance company, and for an equal number of years president of a life insurance company. In 1872, on the introduction of lay delegates into the General Conference, he was elected a lay delegate to that body by the Cincinnati Lay Electoral Conference. He was subsequently elected one of the General Conference secretaries, being the first layman ever appointed to that office, and later in the same session was elected book agent. Both he and his colleague, Dr. Nelson, were unanimously re-elected to the same office in 1876, at the quadrennial session in Baltimore. Mr. Phillips is also a manager of the Missionary Society, Sunday-School Union, and Tract Society of the M. E. Church, and is the general treasurer of the last-named organization.

Phillips, N. H., a member of the North Indiana Conference, was a member of the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876. He has filled a number of the most prominent appointments in his Conference.

Phillips, Philip, a distinguished singer, was born in Chautauqua Co., N. Y., Aug. 13, 1834. He early developed musical talent, and at the age of nineteen devoted his whole time to musical science and practice. His first published work was "Early Blossoms," of which 20,000 copies were sold. It was followed by "Musical Leaves," of which over a million have been distributed. Mr. Phillips, during the Civil War, entered earnestly into the work of the Christian Commission, and published "Hymn Songs" for the Soldiers' Orphan Home at Iowa, the proceeds being devoted to that object. This was followed by "The Singing Pilgrim," of which 800,000 copies have been sold. In 1866 he became musical editor in the Methodist Book Concern, at New York, and issued the "New Hymn and Tune Book" and the "Standard Singer." In 1868 he visited England, and prepared for issue by the Sunday-School Union his "American Sacred Songster" and other works. In 1872 he visited England a second time, and on his return he proceeded by San Francisco on a tour round the world, visiting the Sandwich Islands, Australia, New Zealand, Palestine, Egypt, and India, holding evenings of song sometimes in churches of large cities: at other times beneath the shade of wide-spread banyan-trees, or amidst cinnamon-groves. Returning, he visited Naples, Rome, Florence, Genoa, and the leading cities of Europe, and, reaching England, gave two hundred nights of song for the Sunday-School Union and other Christian objects, and returned to New York without having made a single disappointment. Mr. Phillips has the honor of leading in introducing these evenings of song, and is the first who has thus belted the globe.

Phillips, William, a minister of the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church, was born in Jessamine Co., Ky., May 7, 1797. He very early manifested talents of a superior order, especially for writing, and some of his earliest effusions in poetry were humorous and ingenious. In 1828 he united with the church, and shortly afterwards was licensed as a local preacher, and three years afterwards he joined the Kentucky Conference. In 1835 he was appointed by the book committee assistant editor of the Western Christian Advocate, and was re-elected to that post by the General Conference of 1836. In a few weeks, however, he was seized with a violent attack of fever, and died on the 26th of June, 1836. He was an able minister, possessing a mind of more than ordinary strength, which was well stored with useful knowledge.

Phillips, William Henry Harrison, Ph.D.,

late professor in Genesee College, was born in Langhoro', Ontario, July 25, 1841, was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1865, and afterwards studied in the universities of Berlin, Paris, and Heidelberg. He was appointed teacher of Mathematics in the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass., in 1868, Professor of Natural Sciences in Genesee College in 1869, and teacher in the Providence Conference Seminary in 1870. He was also acting principal in the latter institution. He was engaged in establishing graded schools in Vermont, in 1871, and became, in the same year, again teacher of Mathematics in the Wesleyan Academy.

Phillips, Zebulon, a member of the Troy Conference, was elected assistant book agent in New York in 1852, and served until 1856, when he declined a re-election. He entered the Troy Conference in 1834, and filled a number of the most important appointments, and was a delegate to the General Conference in 1852 and 1856.

Phœbus, William, one of the early Methodist ministers, was born in Somerset Co., Md., in August, 1754. He was admitted on trial in 1783, and was present at the Christmas Conference, when the church was organized under the superintendence of Coke and Asbury. After traveling for some ten years he located, but again entered the ministry. In 1798 he located again, and engaged in the practice of medicine in New York, and retained his position as local preacher and medical practitioner until 1806, when he re-entered the traveling ministry. In 1824 he was placed on the superannuated list, where he remained until his death, in New York, Nov. 9, 1831. Dr. Phœbus had a mind of great vigor, and had acquired a large stock of information. He delighted in the study of old authors, in examining the early records of the church, and in comparing the different systems of church order and government. His preaching was profound and solid, and very acceptable to the thoughtful class of readers.

Phoenixville, Pa. (pop. 5292), is in Chester County, on the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad. Methodist preaching was introduced by Rev. Samuel Lewis, a local preacher, in 1826, in a school-house which is now used as a paint-shop in connection with the Phoenix Iron Works. About the same time a class of twelve members was formed, and the place became a regular appointment on Wayne or Waynesburg circuit, in which David Best and David Fidler were preachers. The first M. E. church was erected in 1828, and occupied the site of the present parsonage. The present house was built in 1854. The town became a station in 1859, and in 1860 reported 229 members, 190 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property. The African M. E. Church have a building donated to them by the Phoenix Iron Company in 1870. The following are the statistics reported for 1876:

Pickard, Humphrey, D.D., of the Methodist Church of Canada, was born at Frederickton, N. B., June 10, 1813. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1839, joined the English Wesleyan

Conference in the same year, and entered the pastoral work in the province of New Brunswick. In 1842 he was chosen principal of the Mount Allison Wesleyan Academy, at Sackville, N. B., and in 1866 president of the same institution. In 1869 he was appointed editor of The Provincial Wesleyan, and book steward of the Wesleyan Conference Office, Halifax, N. S. He was president of the Wesleyan Conference of Eastern British America in 1862 and 1870.

Pickard, Thomas, a professor in Mount Allison Wesleyan College, Sackville, N. B., was born at Frederickton, N. B., in October, 1819. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1840. In 1848 he was appointed teacher of Mathematics and Natural Sciences in the Wesleyan Academy, Sackville, N. B., and in 1866, Professor of Mathematics in Mount Albion Wesleyan College, in the same place.

Pickering, George, one of the oldest and ablest ministers in New England, was born in Talbot Co., Md., in 1769. At the age of eighteen he experienced religion in Philadelphia, and in the face of great opposition joined the M. E. Church, and received his first appointment, in the Baltimore Conference, in 1790. In 1792 he was sent to New England, where he remained during a long ministerial life. He was stationed in Boston, Lynn, Lowell, Cambridge, Salem, Marblehead, etc., and was at four different periods presiding elder of Boston district. Besides the regular work, he was frequently engaged as financial agent for literary institutions and for embarrassed churches, and was distinguished for his tact, enterprise, and success. On one occasion he went on a tour through Delaware and Maryland, collecting for a chapel in Boston. He was a man of marked character. "His distinguishing traits of mind were penetration, clearness, decision, a tenacious memory, an inventive genius, a firm yet cautious judgment, prudence, a peculiar quaintness of humor, and an elevated taste. A spirit of prayer, in a strong and bright flame, burned upon the altar of his heart, and his sense of heavenly things often glowed with rapture. He was a popular preacher, a sound divine, a cheerful and self-sacrificing itinerant, an able and patient ruler, and was successful in bringing many souls to Christ. He lived to see the church, which was but commencing its career in New England, grow to be one among the strongly-established churches of the land. At the age of seventy-seven he died, at Waltham, Dec. 8, 1846, having been a traveling preacher for upward of half a century, and being at the time of his death the oldest effective traveling preacher on the globe. The last word which was caught from his failing lips was, 'Glory.' "

Pickett, John R., a distinguished member of the M. E. Church South, was born April 2, 1814, in Fairfield District, S. C., and was brought up under the influence of pious friends. He was converted in 1831, and entered the South Carolina Conference in 1835. He had not the advantages of an early education, but was remarkable for his power in the acquisition of languages. He had also a strong passion for metaphysical topics, and read very extensively under the German masters. He was a student in almost all branches of literature. Many of his friends remember the immense polyglot Bible which he carried with him in a huge tin case for years, and which was his daily companion. He was genial, self-possessed, and cheerful, and had the simplicity of a child both in and out of the pulpit. He was thoroughly attached to all the doctrines and economy of Methodism, and prosecuted the work of his ministry with intense earnestness. He died March 15, 1870.

Picture Lesson Paper, a small illustrated paper published by the M. E. Church especially for the infant department of the Sunday-schools. In 1872 it had a circulation of 39,000. In 1876 it attained the maximum circulation of 125,000, and during that year there were issued 1,312,500 copies. It is edited by J. H. Vincent, D.D., and is published by Nelson & Phillips, book agents, at New York.

Pierce, George Foster, D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Greene Co., Ga., Feb. 3, 1811. He is the son extensively known over the United States for his power in the pulpit. He has published a number of sermons, and also a book entitled "Incidents of Western Travel." His residence is near Sparta, Ga.

of Lovick Pierce, one of the most distinguished ministers in Methodism. He studied law, designing to enter the profession, but in 1831 was received into the Georgia Conference of the M. E. Church. After filling various important appointments in South Carolina and Georgia, he accepted the presidency of Emory College in 1848, in which he remained until he was elected bishop, in 1854. He took a prominent part in the debate in the General Conference in 1844 in the case of Bishop Andrew. He was a member of the Louisville Convention, and also of the General Conferences of the Church South of 1846, 1850, and 1854. He is the father of Bishop Pierce, and was born in Halifax Co., N. C., March 24, 1785. With but comparatively little education, he was received into the Methodist ministry in 1804. During the war with Great Britain, he was a chaplain in the army. Subsequently he studied medicine in Philadelphia, and for several years practiced, but has long devoted himself chiefly to the ministry. He was selected by the Church South as the fraternal messenger to the General Conference in 1848. While he was received personally very cordially by that body, yet as the proposition to establish fraternal relations was not favorably received, he declined to attend the sessions. In 1876 he was again selected as a fraternal messenger in return for a deputation which had been sent from the M. E. Church, but his impaired health prevented him from being present. He is said to be the oldest minister now living in the Church South.

Pierce, Reddick, a minister of the M. E. Church South, was born in North Carolina, Sept. 26, 1782, and died in South Carolina, July 24, 1860. He was for many years a member of the South Carolina Conference, having entered it in 1805. He was esteemed as a powerful and successful preacher.

Pierpont, Hon. Francis H., was born in Monongahela Co., Va. (now West Virginia). He joined the Methodist Protestant Church in his eighteenth year. When twenty-two years old he entered Alle-ghany College, Pa., with Bishop Kingsley, Rev. Gordon Batelle, Rev. James Robison, and others, as companions. Dr. Ruter, Dr. H. J. Clark, and Bishop Simpson were among his instructors. After his graduation he taught school and read law for three years, and began to practice in Fairmont, West Va., in 1842. He took an active part in the political discussions of the times. He was intensely opposed to slavery and secession. At a convention assembled at Wheeling, West Va., June 11, 1861, for the purpose of organizing a State government after the secession, Mr. Pierpont was almost unanimously elected governor of the State by the forty counties represented. He held office under this election for about twelve months, and in the mean time was elected by the people to fill an unexpired term of two years. He was re-elected by the loyal people of the State for four years, and received recognition by the President as governor of Virginia. He called the legislature together, and it elected United States Senators to fill the places made vacant by the secession of the late incumbents. Removing to Alexandria after the division of the State, in 1862, he remained two years, and convened the legislature. At his request a convention met which by vote abolished slavery from the State, in 1864. On the fall of Richmond, he removed the seat of government from Alexandria to Richmond, and in a few months had the State re-organized. He made it a matter of conscience to appoint no man to office without moral and intellectual qualifications for the place. A part of his record is that during the seven years of official position, amid the degeneracy of the war, there never was a suspicion of the misappropriation of one dollar of the public money. After Governor Pierpont returned to his old home in Fairmont, he served one term in the West Virginia legislature. In the church of his choice he has usually been a member of the important Conventions, and several times representative to the General Conferences.

Pike, James, D.D., one of the most distinguished members of the New Hampshire Conference, was received on trial in 1841. He has filled many of the most important appointments in the Conference, and served for several terms as presiding elder on different districts. He was a member of all the General Conferences from 1860 to 1872, and was a member of the book committee from 1868 to 1872. He has exercised an extensive influence in his State, and was elected and served as a member of Congress.

Pillsbury, C. D., was born in Maine, Dec. 13, 1817, and entered the Maine Conference in 1842. In its division in 1844, he became a member of the East Maine Conference, and after filling various prominent appointments was transferred, in 1857, to Wisconsin. He was a member of the General Conference in 1856 from East Maine, and from Wisconsin in 1864, 1868, and 1872. He spent nearly a year as chaplain in the army, and was for some time a prisoner in the hands of General Forrest. When released, General Grant was the first man who took him by the hand.

Pilmoor, Joseph, was educated in Kingswood School, and had traveled four years in the ministry, when, in 1769, he volunteered to accompany Richard Boardman to America. He labored earnestly and successfully in Philadelphia and New York, and in 1772 and 1773 he made an excursion through the South as far as Charleston, S. C. In 1774 he returned to England, but is represented as desisting from traveling. In 1776 he was stationed in London, and continued to fill appointments until 1785, when his name disappears from the minutes.

Mr. Wesley, in forming his legal hundred, had not included him among the number, and in the organization of the Methodist Church for America his services had not been called upon. "He was offended and retired." Returning to America, he was ordained in the Protestant Episcopal Church and labored in Philadelphia. A number of the members of Trinity church, New York, desired him for their assistant pastor, but their petition being refused a new church was organized on Union Street, which he served for several years. Returning to Philadelphia he was appointed rector of St. Paul's church. He died in 1821.

Pilter, Robert, an English Wesleyan minister, entered the work in 1803, and died in 1847. He was associated with Dr. Bunting and others in the formation of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, in 1814. As a pastor he was faithful and affectionate: as a minister, impressive, acceptable, and useful.

Pima Indians are a tribe which, with the Maracopas, are settled in Arizona, on both sides of the Gila River. They live in villages, and raise a large amount of agricultural products. A school is now established among them by Rev. Mr. Cook, of the M. E. Church, who is translating portions of the Scripture into their language.

Piqua, O. (pop. 5967), is situated on the Dayton and Michigan Railroad. The name first appears as the head of a circuit in 1816, with David Sharp as pastor. Methodist services were not regularly established in the town until 1820, by Moses Crum, Henry B. Bascom, and J. B. Finley. The first church was built in 1823, at a cost of $400. In 1837 a new and much larger church was erected on a more eligible site, and this was remodeled and modernized in 1868, at a cost of about $30,000. A second church was organized in 1853, at first as a mission, but in a few years larger accommodations were required, and it became the present Grace church. The African M. E. Church has also a small congregation. It is in the Cincinnati Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
Green Street.....	428	500	$31,000
Grace Church.....	205	175	12,000

Pitman, Charles, D.D., an eminent minister of the M. E. Church, was born near Cookstown, N. J., in 1796. He was converted in early life, and was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference in 1818. He subsequently filled a number of the most important appointments in New Brunswick, Trenton, and Philadelphia, and was also presiding elder of the East Jersey, West Jersey, and Trenton districts. In 1841 he was elected corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society, and removed to New York, where he resided until 1850. He was elected first by the New York Conference to fill a vacancy, it being so empowered at that time by the Discipline. He was re-elected by the General Conferences of 1844 and of 1848. His health failing, in 1850 he resigned his office and retired to Trenton, and died Jan. 14, 1854. He was a close and diligent student, and had accumulated a large library. He was also a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost. "Few, if any, better and more powerful preachers of the gospel have ever stood upon the walls of our Zion than was Charles Pitman. . . . Multitudes hung upon his lips with delight and were moved by his powerful appeals." He was an able secretary, and a successful defender of both the doctrinal and disciplinary system of the church, and the extension of Methodism through the State of New Jersey is owing in no small degree to his labors.

Pitman, Charles A., a delegate from the Liberia Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, is a native of Western Africa, of the Vey tribe. He came under the care of the missionaries at an early age. He was afterwards sent to the United States, where he enjoyed the advantage of the grammar-schools and Sunday-schools of New York City. About 1853 he returned to Liberia, where he became a teacher in the mission-schools: afterwards a local, then an itinerant preacher.

Pitts, Epaminondas Dunn, D.D., president of Chapel Hill Female College, was born in Jones Co., Ga., June 17, 1826. He received his preparatory education in Valley Creek Academy, Ala.,

and graduated with honor from Emory College in 1844. After spending a year in the study of law he felt himself called to act specially as a teacher, to which profession he has consecrated his life labor. Early in life he was converted, became a member of the M. E. Church, and joined the Alabama Conference of the M. E. Church South, preaching on Sabbaths, but devoting his time to educational work. After having been at the head of popular schools in Alabama and in Louisiana, he accepted the presidency of Chapel Hill Female College, where he still remains, and is now a member of the Texas Conference. He has taken great interest in the education of teachers; has strongly advocated the establishment of normal schools by the State, and has always had a class in his own institution to which he has devoted especial attention. In the care of the college he has been ably assisted by Mrs. Pitts, who has been his co-worker in the cause of Christian education.

Pitts, Fountain E., a minister in the M. E. Church South, was born in Georgetown, Ky., July 4, 1808, and died at Louisville, Ky., May 12, 1874. He was converted in his twelfth year, and when about sixteen was admitted on trial in the Kentucky Conference in 1824. In 1835 he went as a missionary to South America. Whether as a missionary, circuit or station preacher he was eminently successful. He was a member of the General Conference at several times. He was attending the Convention at Louisville, Ky., at the time of his death. "He understood the doctrines of the church and faithfully defended them, and although his mind was of a poetical cast, with a rich fancy and brilliant imagination, yet he was not carried off into extreme views or doubtful theories, but was always sound in doctrine. He was at one period of his life one of the most powerful field-preachers, and a camp-meeting especially inspired him, and it was there he showed the full measure of his strength. He preached generally for immediate effect, and was wonderfully successful."

Pittsburgh, Pa. (pop. 86,076), is the second city in the State as to capital, commerce, and churches. It was laid out in 1786. Its proximity to bituminous coal and iron ore led to the establishment of large manufactories, and a more recent discovery of petroleum on the waters of the Alleghany has largely increased its business. The city is first mentioned in the minutes of the Methodist Church for 1788, when Rev. Charles Conway was appointed the first preacher to the circuit, embracing the region for many miles around the city. In 1790 there were returned from the circuit 97 members. These, however, were chiefly in other parts of the circuit; few, if any, were in Pittsburgh. Bishop Asbury first visited the city in 1789, and makes the following record: "I preached in the evening to a serious audience. This is a day of very small things; what can we hope? Yet, what can we fear? I feel great love to the people, and hope God will arise to help and bless them." Fourteen years after this, in 1803, the bishop was again in the city, and preached in the court-house. He writes, "I would have preached again but the Episcopalians occupied the house. I come once in twelve years, but they could not consent to give way for me. It is time we had a house of our own. I think I have seen a lot which will answer to build upon." Just a little prior to this time John Wrenshall, a local preacher from England, had removed to Pittsburgh, and was engaged in mercantile business. He was a man of more than ordinary intelligence and energy, and was the grandfather of Mrs. President Grant. In 1803, Thomas Cooper, also from England, and an earnest, active Methodist, settled in the city. Rev. Mr. Page, who was in charge of the circuit, appointed Mr. Cooper the leader of the first class which was formed, and it met for some time in the house of Mr. Wrenshall. He resided on Market Street, and owned an orchard immediately in the rear of his house, where, in summer-time, preaching services were held. Occasionally services were conducted in the court-house, but dancing and other assemblies were oftentimes appointed for the purpose of preventing the religious meetings. In 1806, Mr. Cooper removed to Front Street, where he rented a house for a dwelling in which was a large room used as a chapel, and this continued to be the only preaching-place until 1810. In that year, under Rev. William Knox, a lot was purchased and a small stone edifice erected on Second Street. Aug. 28, 1810, Bishop Asbury stood upon the corner-stone of this church and preached, and makes this entry: "The society here is lively and increasing in numbers, and the prospect still is good in this borough." This was the only house of worship owned by the Methodists until 1817, when a church was erected at the corner of Smithfield and Seventh Streets. A great revival followed under the labors of Rev. Mr. Davis, of the Baltimore Conference, and from that time Methodism took a firm hold of the popular mind. The growth of the church was quite rapid until, between 1824 and 1829, considerable controversy arose in reference to the economy and government of the church. What was then termed the "Radical Movement," which was designed to overthrow the episcopacy and the presiding eldership and to make the offices of the church generally elective, culminated in 1829, when about one-half of the members seceded, embracing nearly all of the wealth and social influence of the church. They took possession of the Smithfield Street church, and those who adhered to the old church were obliged to worship either in the small church on Second Street or in the court-house. After a time they succeeded in selling the small church and in erecting a church on Liberty Street. Ultimately a compromise was made, by which the Smithfield Street church was restored to the old members, they yielding their claim to a cemetery which occupied the ground near where the present Pennsylvania Railroad depot stands, which afterwards became very valuable, and by paying $2000 to the seceding members, who erected a large church on Fifth Avenue, above Smithfield Street. The controversy was for many years a very bitter one, and the two branches of Methodism were completely estranged. The lapse of time, however, has softened the asperities, and there is now a general feeling of friendship. The M. E. Church shortly after this period erected a small house in Birmingham, another in Temperanceville, a third, called Wesley chapel, in the northeastern part of the city, and one called Asbury, situated on the hill. In 1853 steps were taken for the erection of Christ church, a beautiful edifice, and the first church of more modern architecture built by the Methodists in America. It was finished and dedicated in 1855. About the same time the Pittsburgh Female College was erected on the adjoining lot. (See PITTSBURGH FEMALE COLLEGE.) The erection of several other churches followed speedily. The Pittsburgh Conference Journal, started in 1833, by Rev. Dr. Elliott and others, was adopted by the General Conference, and is now known as the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, having a wide circulation in Western Pennsylvania and Eastern Ohio. A stone building on Smithfield Street, between Fifth and Sixth, was erected for a book depository and for the Advocate office.

The Methodist Protestant Church received handsome donations from Rev. Mr. Avery, one of their leading members, who, while living, aided in the erection of several churches, and who, at his death, left bequests for the same purpose. They have erected a church on Fourth Avenue, and another in Birmingham, besides churches in Alleghany City. They have also established a book depository adjacent to the church on Fifth Avenue, and are erecting a memorial building commemorating the union of their churches, which had been divided on slavery. The Methodist Recorder, the western organ of the church, is also published in this city, under the editorship of Dr. Alexander Clark. The colored Methodist membership belongs to the African M. E. Church and to the African Zion M. E. Church, which have several congregations. Mr. Avery founded, in Alleghany City, the Avery College, which, though not a church institution, is largely under the patronage of the ministers and members of the colored churches. The statistics, as given in the minutes of 1876, are as follows:

Pittsburgh Book Depository.—When the system of sending out books on commission was practiced, on motion of Peter Cartwright, in 1816, the book agents were authorized to employ a proper person in Pittsburgh to receive and forward the books to their respective presiding elders in the West at such offices as they might direct. When the commission system was abandoned no books were kept in Pittsburgh on sale, except by individual ministers, until 1835. At that time a small depository was commenced by Rev. M. Simpson, since bishop, in which Dr. Elliot, then editor of The Advocate, shortly after united, and the books were kept at his office. When Dr. Elliot became editor of The Western Advocate, Dr. Hunter, who succeeded him, took charge of the infant book depository, and from that period Methodist books were kept in larger or smaller quantities at some book-store in Pittsburgh until a depository was established by the agents, in 1840. It was first under the care of Rev. Z. H. Coston, but was subsequently for many years managed by Rev. J. L. Read. A few years since a large and commodious building was secured, in which the depository is now kept, under the care of Rev. J. Horner, D.D. The building and ground, as reported to the General Conference of 1876, were valued at $35,000, the stock on hand at $22,337, and notes and accounts due at $30,655. The sales during the previous four years amounted to $174,340.

Pittsburgh Conference was organized by the General Conference in 1824, out of parts of the Baltimore, Ohio, and Genesee Conferences. It embraced Western Pennsylvania and the eastern part of Ohio. Its first session was held in Pittsburgh, Sept. 13, 1825, Bishop George presiding, and Asa Shinn and Henry Furlong were elected secretaries: 35 members answered to their names. The minutes reported the number in the territory taken from the Baltimore and Ohio Conferences at 17,779 white and 183 colored. The membership in the territory taken from the Genesee Conference is not separately reported. At this Conference 13 were received on trial, and 72 preachers were stationed. Measures were adopted to found a seminary, which was opened the next year at Uniontown, Pa., and was known as Madison College. In 1826 a resolution was introduced by Revs. George Brown and Alfred Brunson for the establishment of a religious newspaper. This was before the Advocate had been commenced at New York. Action was postponed until 1827, when it was resolved to support The Christian Advocate and Journal, which had then been issued. In 1833 a committee was appointed to issue a prospectus, which resulted in the establishment of the Pittsburgh Conference Journal, now the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate. The first number was issued Nov. 15, 1833, Charles Elliott being editor. The Conference of 1827 petitioned the General Conference of 1828 for the establishment of a Book Depository at Pittsburgh, but a depository proper was not authorized until at the General Conference of 1840. Previous to this, however, books had been kept on sale. The membership of the church within this Conference had rapidly increased until 1836, with the exception of the year 1829, when a number of members withdrew and formed congregations which united with the Methodist Protestant Church. In 1836 the Erie Conference was organized, including the northern portion of the Conference, leaving a membership of 25,615, with 93 preachers. In 1848 the West Virginia Conference was organized, separating the territory lying in Virginia, excepting only the northern part. There were left in the Pittsburgh Conference 35,203 members, with 178 traveling and 196 local preachers. In 1876 the statistics were: 66,474 members, 56,825 Sunday-school scholars, 616 churches, valued at $2,712,865, and 81 parsonages, valued at $181,257. By request of the Conference, the part in Eastern Ohio was separated from it by the General Conference; and at its session in September, 1876, the statistics were: 34,089 members, 30,499 Sunday-school scholars, 288 churches, valued at $1,754,500, and 38 parsonages, valued at $91,186. There are now in the bounds of the Conference the Pittsburgh Female College, and the Beaver Seminary and Female College. The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate is extensively circulated within its bounds.

Pittsburgh Female College, located in Pittsburgh, Pa., was chartered Feb. 10, 1854, and is under the patronage of the Pittsburgh Conference of the M. E. Church. The charter requires that two-thirds of the members of the board of trustees must be members of the M. E. Church. They are elected by the various stockholders. The institution was inaugurated under the advice of Bishop Simpson, and by the earnest action and liberal contributions of Allen Kramer, Dr. H. D. Sellers, Alexander Bradley, Esq., Samuel Kier, J. B. Canfield, F. D. Sellers, W. M. Wright, N. Holmes, and others, who were subscribers to its funds. A large and commodious building was erected on Hancock, now Eighth, Street, between Christ church and the Alleghany River; and the college was opened for pupils in the basement of Christ church Oct. 1, 1855, under the direction of Rev. S. L. Yourtee. In 1857 he was succeeded by Rev. L. D. Barrows. He was succeeded, in 1860, by Rev. I. C. Pershing, D.D., who still retains the office of president. The number of students increased until the year 1865-66, when they amounted to 426. Owing to the subsequent contraction of business and the establishment of public schools of a high order, and other institutions of similar grade, the number somewhat diminished, though it is still largely attended. In addition to the building originally erected, two brick dwellings fronting on Eighth Street, adjoining the college edifice, were purchased, and alterations were made to adapt them to college purposes; and a fourth story was added, and furnished for the reception of a cabinet, which is one of the most beautifully arranged in the country. An additional building on the rear end of the lot was purchased, and united to the main edifice by the erection of a small addition. The chapel also was enlarged by the erection of a building 42 feet in length and three stories in height, giving chapel room of 85 feet in length under the hall for the literary societies. There is also a small but well-selected philosophical and chemical apparatus, and a large pipe-organ, which is said to be the largest used for educational purposes in America. Subscriptions were also made to the Endowment Fund, but owing to reverses in business and to death, little more than $20,000 remain. Several prizes for advanced scholarship and excellence have been established.—the Thomas McKee prize for instrumental music, Mrs. Margaret Davidson prize for excellence in reading, Mrs. Bishop Simpson prize for mathematics, the Ames prize for the member of the senior class who excels in Latin, and the Mary Kidd prize for superiority in drawing and painting. The president also gives a prize for the best reader in the senior class. There are also a number of scholarships, which have been founded for the benefit of promising young ladies who are preparing for usefulness. The course of study is thorough and extensive, and is so arranged as to permit students to take a partial as well as the entire course. The degree of Mistress of Liberal Arts, or the degree of Mistress of English Literature, is conferred on such as complete the respective courses. Of those who have left the institution a large number have engaged in teaching, and others have become prominent members in society. Eight departments are arranged, in which the students are classified. The department of music has been organized as a conservatory, furnishing superior advantages. The teachers in the different departments, literary and ornamental, number about 20.

Pittston, Pa. (pop. 6760), on the Susquehanna River and Lehigh Valley Railroad, is an important town in the anthracite coal regions. Methodist services were held in it as early as 1806, when a class of ten persons was formed. The first M. E. church was built in 1850, and rebuilt in 1872. The two churches at West Pittston and Gatesville are offshoots of the Pittston society. It is in the Wyoming Conference, and there are in Pittston 359 members, 353 Sunday-school scholars, and $17,000 church property; in West Pittston, 305 members, 390 Sunday-school scholars, and $45,000 church property.

Plainfield, N. J. (pop. 5095), is situated in Union County, on the New Jersey Central Railroad. Methodist services were introduced in 1820, but no church edifice was built until 1832. It first appears in the minutes as a separate work in 1833, when J. H. McFarland was pastor, who reported the following year 45 members. It is in the Newark Conference, and reports for 1876, 480 members, 365 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $55,000.

Plaisted, Francis A., a lay delegate from the Maine Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in Gardiner, Me., and is engaged there in a manufacturing business.

Plan of Pacification (English Wesleyan).—It is difficult now, with the lapse of years and altered circumstances, to realize the need that existed for some action of Conference to allay the uneasiness that was rife in the orphaned church after Mr. Wesley's death. The great point was the administration of the Sacrament by his successors in their respective circuit chapels. For three years the agitation increased, and sometimes threatened to culminate in the destruction of the whole body of Methodists. "The bearers of the ark trembled, and mighty men bowed themselves through fear." With deep anxiety the Conference met in Manchester, in 1795, and resolved (with reference to this momentous matter) to set apart the first day wholly for fasting and prayer. On the next day after this solemn preparation a committee was appointed (by ballot) to prepare a "Plan of General Pacification." The committee was to consist of nine, and every preacher in full connection was requested to give nine papers, with a name on each. The names first on the list were Joseph Bradford, President; with John Pawson, Alexander Mather, Thomas Coke, William Thompson, Samuel Bradburn, Joseph Benson, Henry Moore, and Adam Clarke. All were astonished and satisfied with the choice. After meeting for six successive evenings the plan was completed, and, with one single alteration, the Conference passed it unanimously. Thus the controversy happily ended. This important document took in the whole question of the Sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's Supper; with orders relating to the burial of the dead, service in church hours, etc. It pointed out the position of leaders, trustees, and stewards in deciding certain points, reserving the rights of the Conference in every case. It entered into disciplinary matters, as to the sole appointment of preachers by Conference, with no power on the part of trustees to exclude from the chapels any preacher so appointed; it defined the powers of the chairman, and provided those rules which are embodied in the constitution of district meetings. It decided that the hundred preachers mentioned in the "Deed of Declaration," and their successors, were the only legal persons that constituted the Conference; these, with many minor rules, all having reference to the preservation of peace in the societies, with provision for necessary disciplinary action on the side of both preachers and people, constituted the "Plan of Pacification," which, if the "Deed of Declaration" be regarded as the magna charta of the preachers, may justly be considered as the magna charta of the people.

Plattsburg, N. Y. (pop. 5139), the capital of Clinton County, is situated on Lake Champlain. It was incorporated in 1815, and is chiefly noted as the scene of a great naval battle between the English and Americans, fought on Sunday, Sept. 11, 1814. The first Methodist minister known to have visited Clinton County was Richard Jacobs, in 1776, and the first circuit formed was the Plattsburg, in 1799, traveled by Alexander McLane. In 1801 Elijah Hedding, afterwards bishop, was appointed to the circuit. Mr. Hedding preached his first sermon in a cabin on the east side of Plattsburg Bay. The first Methodist church was built in 1831. It was burned in 1846, and was rebuilt in 1847. The city is in the Troy Conference, and has 225 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $30,000 church property.

Poe, Adam, was born in Columbia Co., O., July 21, 1804. In early life he became a member of the Presbyterian Church; but finding he could not believe the doctrines of election and reprobation as taught in the Confession, he united with the M. E. Church, and in 1827 he was admitted into the Ohio Annual Conference. His early ministry was employed in traveling large circuits, in which he suffered from privation and sacrifice. At a later period he filled some of the most important positions in the church. Of his ministerial life, seven years were spent on circuits, six in stations, ten as presiding elder, eight years as assistant book agent in Cincinnati, and eight as principal agent. He was well versed in the doctrines and polity of the church, and ever ready to explain or defend them. His genial nature, his extensive travel, and his facility of narration rendered him a most agreeable companion. He enjoyed the confidence of his brethren, and was seven times elected consecutively to the General Conference. He took a deep interest in the cause of education, and Bishop Clark at his funeral remarked, "He may almost be said to have been the founder of the Ohio Wesleyan University. His faith in the enterprise, and his devotion to it, were truly heroic. He was a member of the board of trustees from the beginning, and now that he has fallen the board will feel its patriarch and hero has departed." He was intimately connected with the commencement of German work in our country, by having been made instrumental in the conversion of Dr. William Nast. Dr. Poe received an injury in one of his limbs, which resulted in an affection of the bone, which left him scarcely free from pain for the last fifteen or twenty years of his life; but to the last he was loving, patient, and devoted. He died June 26, 1868.

Polk, Hon. Trusten, was born in Sussex Co., Del., May 29, 1811, and graduated at Yale College, in 1831. He studied law at New Haven, Conn., and in 1835 was admitted to the bar in St. Louis. He was a member of the constitutional convention of 1845, and a Presidential elector for 1848. He was elected governor of the State of Missouri in 1857, and was a member of the United States Senate from 1857 to 1862. He early united with the M. E. Church, adhering to the Southern branch at its separation, and was a regular attendant upon its various means of grace. He was one of the most prominent citizens of St. Louis, and was highly esteemed for his many virtues.

Pomeroy, Charles Rhodes, late principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, was born in Waybridge, Vt., June 15, 1830, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1853. He afterwards studied at the Union Theological Seminary, and was appointed, in 1854, teacher of Greek in Fort Edward Institute, N. Y.; in 1855, principal of Union Village Academy, N. Y.; in 1856, principal of Cooperstown Seminary, N. Y.; in 1857, principal of Rochester High School, N. Y.; and in 1859, principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. He resigned from the latter position on account of ill health in 1860, and in 1868 joined the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He removed to Iowa in 1869, where he engaged in pastoral work in the Upper Iowa Conference. He was transferred to the South Kansas Conference in 1874, and was elected as president of the State Normal School at Emporia.

Pomeroy, O. (pop. 5824), the capital of Meigs County, is situated on the Ohio River. German Methodism in this county is first noticed in the annals of the M. E. Church. Meigs County German mission was established in 1841. In 1842 it had 114 members, and Henry Koenecke was in charge. Pomeroy first appears by name in 1843, when David Smith and Charles H. Warren were pastors, who reported, in 1844, 637 members. It became a station in 1858, and Samuel M. Bright was pastor. The German and the African M. E. Churches are both represented. It is in the Ohio Conference, and the statistics are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	150	130	$7000
German M. E. Church.....	100	187	5500
African M. E. Church.....	83	36	1600

Pontiac, Mich. (pop. 4867), the capital of Oakland County, is situated on the Clinton River, 25 miles northwest of Detroit. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1838, with Josiah Brakeman as pastor. In 1857 it had 142 members, 160 Sunday-school scholars, and $5000 church property. It is in the Detroit Conference, and has 290 members, 262 Sunday-school scholars, and $27,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has 78 members, 49 Sunday-school scholars, and $3000 church property.

Pope, William Burt, D.D., an English Wesleyan minister, entered the Theological Institution in 1841, was early distinguished by devout, earnest study and exposition of the word of God, and became an eminently useful minister. In 1867 he was appointed theological tutor at Didsbury College; he has distinguished himself by writings of more than usual power of thought and acumen. He is now (1877) president of the Conference. His work on Theology, recently published, meets with great favor.

Portage City, Wis. (pop. 3945), the capital of Columbia County, is situated on Wisconsin River, and on the La Crosse division of the Milwaukee Railroad. Portage City mission was established in 1852, when John Bean was sent to organize the work. In 1853 he had gathered 48 members. In 1857 the M. E. Church had 61 members, 70 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property. It is (1876) in the West Wisconsin Conference, and has 94 members, 120 Sunday-school scholars, and $3400 church property. The Free Methodists have 33 members, 35 Sunday-school scholars, and $1000 church property.

Port Chester, N. Y. (pop. 3797), is situated 15 miles northeast of New York, on the New York and New Haven Railroad. It first appears on the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1852, connected with King Street, with Justus O. Worth pastor. In 1858 it became a station, with Gad S. Gilbert as pastor. It is in the New York East Conference, and has 150 members, 165 Sunday-school scholars, and $25,000 church property.

Porter, Archibald J., a delegate from the Virginia Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Baltimore, Md., Dec. 23, 1827, and was admitted to the Baltimore Conference in 1860. He has labored in pastoral work and as presiding elder in the Baltimore and Virginia Conferences.

Porter, James, D.D., formerly one of the book agents, is a member of the New England Conference. He was received into that body in 1830, and filled a number of the most important stations, and also served as presiding elder on different districts. He was elected to the General Conference of 1844, and each succeeding session until 1872. In 1856 he was elected one of the book agents; was re-elected in 1860 and 1864. He has written a number of works, among which are "Compendium of Methodism," "History of Methodism," "Winning Worker," "Chart of Life," "Helps to Officers of the Church," etc.

Port Huron, Mich. (pop. 5973), in St. Clair County, is situated at the foot of Lake Huron. Methodist services were introduced in 1833, by Rev. Mr. Evans, a missionary among the Indians in Canada. He crossed the river and formed a class, which has steadily grown since that time. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1838, as a mission, under the care of Miles Sanford, who reported the following year 20 members. The first church was built in 1841, and was a very plain, unpretending building. It was occupied until 1851, when a second church was so far built that worship was held in its basement. This church was occupied until 1874, when the walls of the present church were erected, and the congregation entered into its basement in June, 1875, the audience-room not being yet completed. Besides the ground, the church building has thus far cost $33,000. There is also a small Methodist Protestant society, with 15 to 20 members. It is in the Detroit Conference, and in 1876 reports 277 members, 250 Sunday-school scholars, and $46,550 church property.

Port Jervis, N. Y. (pop. 6377), is situated in Orange County, on the Erie Railroad, and near the State lines of New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. It first appears on the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1842, with William M. Burrows as pastor. In 1857 it had become a station, having 143 members, 90 Sunday-school scholars, and $3100 church property. It is in the Newark Conference, and has recently been visited by an extensive revival. Its statistics for 1876 are: 911 members, 380 Sunday-school scholars, and $36,500 church property.

Portland Academy.—This literary institution was established in Portland, Oregon, in 1851, when the city was incorporated. It occupies a beautiful site on rising ground, overlooking a large part of the city. When founded it was almost surrounded by a dense forest. A respectable edifice was erected, and classes have been taught with varying success until the present time.

Portland, Me. (pop. 31,413), the capital of Cumberland County, is situated on Casco Bay. Its first settlement was commenced in 1632, and the place was purchased by Gorges, the proprietor, in 1637. It was twice destroyed by the Indians, and was bombarded by the British fleet in 1775. It has one of the best harbors in the United States. Methodism was introduced by Jesse Lee in 1793. He preached the first sermon on the 12th of September of that year. The first class, of six persons, was formed about the 1st of October, 1795. The first quarterly meeting for Portland circuit was held in Poland, Dec. 4, 1795, when Jesse Lee administered the Lord's Supper for the first time on that circuit. The first Methodist meeting-house built on that circuit was at Falmouth, and was dedicated June 19, 1797. Portland circuit, the second formed in the State, was organized in 1795, and Philip Wager was appointed pastor. About 1805 the first church was erected. The society then consisted of 51 members, and Joshua Taylor was pastor. This church was succeeded by another in 1811. In 1826 a chapel was built on Cumberland Street, and it was subsequently enlarged. In 1828 a church on Pleasant Street was erected, but becoming involved it was sold. The old church was again enlarged. In 1846 the Pine Street church was organized from the Chestnut Street church, and a frame building erected, which was replaced in 1876 by the present brick edifice. In 1851 a church was built on Congress Street, and rebuilt in 1868. In 1857 the present Chestnut Street church was built. (See cut on following page.) From the first church have been organized Chestnut, Pine, and Congress Street churches. In 1857 there were three stations, having an aggregate of 925 members, 781 Sunday-school scholars, and $49,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has a small congregation. This city is in the Maine Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Portland, Oregon (pop. 8293), is the capital of Multnomah County, on the Willamette River. Methodism was introduced into this region about 1834-35, by Jason Lee and other missionaries sent out by the Missionary Board at New York. The Oregon Conference held its first session in connection with the California Conference in 1851. At that time Portland was connected with Oregon City, and together they had 58 members, with James H. Wilbur and C. S. Kingsley as pastors. In 1857 Portland had 70 members, 100 Sunday-school scholars, and Portsmouth, N. H. (pop. 9211), is one of the oldest cities in New England. It was settled in 1623, and incorporated in 1633. As early as 1767 George Whitefield visited it and delivered a sermon, but Methodism proper was not introduced until 1790, by Jesse Lee. He subsequently writes, "We used to preach occasionally in that town from that time, but we never made any particular stand until last year (1808), which was eighteen years from the time of our first beginning there. In the course of the last year one of our preachers took his station in the town, and purchased an old meeting-house that was formerly occupied by another denomination, and he had a good congregation to hear him." The place is mentioned in the minutes of the M. E. Church in 1806, when it was embraced in a large circuit. Levi Walker was sent to Rhode Island and Portsmouth, which was then in the Boston district, with George Pickering as presiding elder. It was connected with various other charges until, in 1820, it appears at the head of New Hampshire district, with Josiah A. Searritt as pastor. The first Methodist church was built in 1828, and was remodeled in 1868. In 1859 a second society was formed, called the Broadhead church, but after a few years it disbanded. It is in the New Hampshire Conference, and has 235 members, 176 Sunday-school scholars, and $11,500 church property.

Portsmouth, O. (pop. 10,592), the capital of Scioto County, is situated at the mouth of the Scioto River. This region was included in Scioto circuit, one of the oldest circuits in the State. This town first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1829, as a station, with Absalom D. Fox as pastor. In 1857 it had increased to two stations, having an aggregate of 330 members, 360 Sunday-school scholars, and $11,000 church property. The German and African M. E. Churches are both well established. This city is in the Ohio Conference, and the following are the Methodist statistics:

Portsmouth, Va. (pop. 10,492), the capital of Norfolk County, opposite the city of Norfolk. It has an excellent harbor, in which vessels of war are usually lying at anchor. Methodism was introduced into this locality by Robert Williams. While preaching at Norfolk, a citizen of Portsmouth, Isaac Luke by name, heard him preach, and earnestly requested him to come over and preach to his people. The next day Williams went over the river and preached the first Methodist sermon, "under a couple of persimmon-trees, where seats had been provided for the congregation." He continued to preach in the open air, and in private houses, until Mr. Luke and a few others fitted up a warehouse as a preaching-place, and Isaac Luke became one of the first converts. In 1775, Francis Asbury landed at Norfolk. This was his first appearance in Virginia. He made Norfolk and Portsmouth his headquarters, and extended his labors far into the country around. Portsmouth gave him more hope and comfort than any other place. He found 27 persons in the society at Portsmouth, and by the exercise of discipline he reduced the number to 14. It was near this city that Robert Williams located and died. Portsmouth first appears by name on the annals of Methodism in 1784, and reported 191 members, with James Martin in charge.

In 1805 the church was enlarged to 30 by 60 feet, and Asbury advised the addition of galleries. That year also it became a station, with Thomas L. Douglass as pastor. It adhered to the Church South in 1845. Since the close of the Civil War, the M. E. Church has re-organized a small society. This city is in the Virginia Conference, and the following are the Methodist statistics:

Portugal, Methodist Missions in.—The kingdom of Portugal occupies a part of the western part of the Iberian Peninsula, and adjoins Spain. It has an area of 34,500 square miles and a population of 3,990,570, and possesses colonies in Asia and Africa. The Roman Catholic religion is the established religion of the state, and the kingdom remains one of the few countries in Europe where religious liberty has not been proclaimed. Practically, however, under the present policy of the government, freedom of worship exists under certain legislative restrictions. Protestant churches have been established at Lisbon and Oporto, but the number of Protestants in the kingdom is still very small. The report of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for 1871 recorded that a congregation had been raised in Oporto by the zeal of a pious friend, and that a missionary had been appointed to take charge of it. In 1876 the mission reported 1 chapel, 3 other preaching-places, 1 missionary, 2 local preachers, 85 full members, 4 on trial, 2 Sunday-schools, with 12 teachers and 95 scholars, 2 day-schools, with 4 teachers and 88 scholars, and 250 attendants on worship. This mission appears in the reports of the Wesleyan Society as a station connected with the missions in Spain.

Portuguese Language and Missionary Literature.—The Portuguese language is derived from the Romance language, a tongue which succeeded the Latin in Southern France and the Iberian Peninsula. It is allied to the Spanish language, and like it contains Celtic and Arabic, as well as Latin elements, but is softer and more melodious than the Spanish. It has received considerable literary culture, and has contributed the epic poem of the "Lusiad," by Camoens, to the number of works which the world recognizes as classics. It is spoken in Portugal and all the Portuguese colonies and settlements, and in the empire of Brazil, and is extensively used as a language of communication on the eastern and western coasts, and in the interior of Africa. The Portuguese editions of the Bible, published by the British and Foreign and American Bible Societies, have been extensively circulated by missionaries and colporteurs, and many tracts have been distributed through the same channels. The Wesleyan missionaries in Ceylon have had occasion to use the Portuguese language; and primary school text-books, hymn-books, and tracts, in this as well as in the Singhalese and Tamil languages, are mentioned as among the earlier publications of their mission press there. The distribution of tracts is pursued systematically in connection with the Wesleyan mission at Oporto, Portugal, and the Rev. Mr. Moreton, of the mission at that place, describes the opportunities for this kind of work as ample. In Brazil, Miss Annie Newman, of the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, is engaged in translating the "Catechism" of Bishop McTyeire.

A religious journal, the Imprensa Evangelica, is published in connection with the mission of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America in Brazil.

Potts, John, D.D., of the Methodist Church, Canada, is a native of Ireland, but was converted in Hamilton, Ontario, under the ministry of Rev. Charles Lavell, about the year 1857, and entered the itineracy after a few months. After traveling three good circuits he was called to city work, in which he has been engaged for the last seventeen years, on such stations as St. Catharine's, London, Yorkville, Hamilton, Montreal, and Toronto. He was the Financial Secretary of the Hamilton and Montreal districts, and is placed upon most prominent connectional committees.

Pottstown, Pa. (pop. 4125), is situated in Montgomery County, on the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1838, as a mission connected with Reading, with J. A. Roach and M. D. Kurtz as pastors. It was for some time called Pottsgrove. Afterwards a Pottstown circuit was organized, and, as late as 1857, it was a circuit of seven appointments. It is in the Philadelphia Conference, and has 374 members, 475 Sunday-school scholars, and $25,000 church property.

Pottsville, Pa. (pop. 12,384), is the capital of Schuylkill County, on the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad. Methodist services were introduced in 1828; the first church was built in 1830, and rebuilt in 1864. In 1857 there were two M. E. churches, having an aggregate of 277 members, 390 Sunday-school scholars, and $15,000 church property, but the two charges were consolidated. The city is in the Philadelphia Conference, and the M. E. Church has 530 members, 405 Sunday-school scholars, and $25,000 church property. A Primitive Methodist society was organized here in 1874, and has about 50 members.

Poughkeepsie, N. Y. (pop. 20,680), the capital of Dutchess County, situated on the Hudson River, is the most important city between Albany and New York. It was one of the first places in the State visited by the Methodist itinerants. Dutchess circuit, which included this region, was formed in 1788, with Cornelius Cook and Andrew Harpending in charge. Poughkeepsie was alternately occupied and abandoned until 1803, when Freeborn Garrettson, on his third attempt, succeeded in establishing a society. The first class consisted of five persons, but was soon increased to eight, as the result of a revival under the labors of Billy Hibbard. In 1805 a church was built on Jefferson Street, and in 1815 the town became a station. In 1826 this church was removed, and a new one was erected on Washington and Mill Streets. The present church was built in 1858-59. Cannon Street church was built in 1840, and made a separate appointment in 1841. Hedding church, on South Clover Street, was organized in 1853. The first African M. E. Zion church was built in 1841, and the new one, on Chatham Street, in 1859. There is also a German M. E. society. This city is in the New York Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Powell, Howell, a Methodist layman in the south of Ireland, a relative of Sir Timothy Shelley, father of the poet, was born in Derbyshire, England, in 1730. He was brought up in the Church of England, and educated for the learned professions, but became unsettled in his habits, leading a roving life in England and Ireland, until conscience-stricken while at a gambling-table in Cork, with some army associates, he suddenly renounced his evil courses, and led until his death, at ninety years of age, a life of almost austere piety. He became tutor to the family of the Earl of Bandon, in the Protestant town of that name, where Mr. Wesley had his largest congregations in Ireland. Mr. Powell relates in his diary: "Tuesday, July 11, 1758. This day the Rev. Mr. John Wesley came to Bandon; this was the first time I saw him; in the evening he preached on Psalm xxxiv. 8. . . . Thursday, July 13. I resolved, by the grace and permission of God, to join the society in Bandon. . . . Friday, I joined the society, and in the evening was nominated as leader. . . . Saturday, was appointed leader." He was engaged in educational and literary pursuits, opened the first high school in the county, and was a frequent contributor to the journals of the day. His diary, extending over a period of fifty years, contains many interesting reminiscences of Mr. Wesley, with whom, after his conversion, he maintained a life-long friendship. The following letter was written to him, concerning "some turbulent spirits:" "Cork, June 28. 1762. My dear brother, this is nothing strange: but have patience and all will be well. I do not inquire after men's opinions, but their spirit. It lies upon you, not only not to begin, but not to be led into a dispute. If a man say, 'A believer may fall from grace and may be saved from all sin,' it would be your wisdom either to be quite silent, as I generally am in such cases, or to say mildly, 'You and I may love alike, if we do not think alike.'

"So skillful fencers suffer heat to tire."

"I desired the leaders might take their turn in reading: only that you would read on Sunday. Steadiness and gentleness will carry you through. Bear all and conquer all. S—B—will think better. Give him time. He has many trials. But I dare not therefore put him in an office which he is not qualified for. I am your affectionate brother, John Wesley." His daughter, Mrs. Richard Gaggin, baptized by Mr. Wesley, was for many years a member of Eighteenth Street church, New York; his great-grandson, R. F. Gaggin, was a member of Simpson church and collector of customs at Erie, Pa., a Methodist family through four generations.

Powell, Thomas, a distinguished English Wesleyan minister, whose name will be indissolubly joined with an able treatise on "Apostolical Succession," entered the ministry in 1822, and died in 1850.

Prayer-Meetings.—In giving an account of the origin of Methodism, the historian traces it to a prayer-meeting, in which there were earnest inquirers after a fuller Christian life. "In the latter end of the year 1739 eight or ten persons came to Mr. Wesley, in London, who appeared to be deeply convinced of sin, and earnestly groaning for redemption. They desired, as did two or three more the next day, that he would spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come which they saw continually hanging over their heads. That he might have more time for this great work, he appointed a day when they might all come together, which from thenceforward they did every week, namely, on Thursday, in the evening. To these, and as many more as desired to join with them (for their number increased daily), he gave those advices from time to time which he judged most needful for them, and they always concluded their meeting with prayer suited to their several necessities." This is said to be the rise of Methodism in Europe. Thursday evening continued to be until recently the time for holding the weekly prayer-meeting by the Methodist Churches. These prayer-meetings, like other social means of grace, have been of great religious service to the church. It is in them that not only the elder members are expected to take part, but the younger ones commence publicly the exercise of their gifts. It has often been observed that wherever a genuine revival has prevailed the social means of grace have also more or less revived, and prayer-meetings especially are at once established. This was true of the great revival under Jonathan Edwards, in New England; under Rev. Mr. Robe, in Scotland; under Howell Harris, in Wales; and John Wesley, in England. The influence Methodism has exercised upon other denominations in this respect is worthy of note. Many religious bodies which formerly did not encourage their members to officiate publicly have now adopted these meetings, and have found them to be of great service in promoting the religious interests of the churches.

Praying Bands.—These are organizations of laymen for the promotion of revivals of religion. They are usually constituted of from ten to fifteen men, from as many various churches, who have a thorough Christian experience, and are specially gifted in its narration, and who have good natural abilities for singing and prayer. They are organized under the leadership of one of their number in whom they have confidence, and whose directions in meetings they promptly obey. They go only where requested, and never without the invitation of the pastor, with whom they counsel and co-operate, recognizing him as the responsible head. Preference is given to the hardest places, and where meetings have been in progress for a week or more, and where the pastor is on his first or second year, as they believe that the pastor under whose labors the revival occurs is the most successful in caring for the converts. They aim also to co-operate with the members of the churches, urging them to labor, and placing on them responsibilities, that the church may be in good working order when the band has left. They usually commence on Saturday evening, continuing over Sabbath and Monday, and sometimes remaining over two Sabbaths. Some of the meetings have been remarkably successful, as many as two hundred penitents kneeling for prayers at once. In their method of work they rely mostly on the relation of personal experience and earnest, stirring singing. On Sabbath afternoon they usually hold a special meeting for children, in which the singing is chiefly by the children. In all their meetings, while the invitation for penitents is being given, several members of the band disperse in the congregation to converse personally with and to encourage seekers in coming forward. They also visit from house to house during the forenoon of each week-day. They aim also to induce the converts to begin at once to work earnestly for the salvation of others, and to speak and pray in public. They also seek to avoid all formalities and fixed methods, changing the form of the meeting as occasion and circumstances may demand. They especially avoid all eccentricities and extravagances, and always close the exercises with a season of praise for the work done. These are the general principles and plan of operations. Several of these organizations are now doing a good work in the church. The oldest and most widely known, as well as successful, are the New York and Troy bands, organized in 1858,—the first by Samuel and Schureman Halstead, and the latter by Joseph Hillman.

A member of the Troy band gives the following summary of the results achieved by them during fifteen years: they have held more than 200 meetings of from one to ten days each; over 10,000 have been brought to Christ, and over 20,000 in all converted, reclaimed, or led to a higher life. Nine members of this band, and many others who were converted at their meetings, are now in the regular ministry.

Preachers' Children's Fund of the United Methodist Free Churches in England.—The itinerant ministers receive £6.6 per year for each child born to them after they are received into full connection. The payment commences when a child is two years old, and ceases when the sixteenth year is completed. No collections or subscriptions are solicited on behalf of this fund. The needful amount is raised by a levy pro rata on the circuits, the amount per member varying according to the connectional requirements. At the present time it is seven pence per annum. The income, as reported to the Assembly of 1876, was £1819.11.1, and the expenditure £1707.15.8. Rev. E. Boaden is secretary and treasurer of the fund.

Prentice, George, A.M., professor in Wesleyan University, was born in Grafton, Mass., Dec. 15, 1834. He studied in the Methodist General Biblical Institute at Concord, N. H., in 1855, and joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1857. In 1867 and 1868 he studied at the University of Halle and traveled in Europe, and in 1871 he was elected Professor of Rhetoric and English Literature and instructor in Hebrew in Wesleyan University. He has written a number of able articles for the church periodicals.

Presidents of Conference (English Wesleyan).

—No minister can be elected to the presidency unless he is a member of the legal hundred. The election takes place in the Conference immediately after filling up the vacancies in "the hundred." Previous to 1814 the election was solely by their votes, but that year it was decided that every minister who had traveled fourteen years was entitled to vote. Since 1867 this limit has been enlarged to admit all who have traveled ten years and upwards. The election is by ballot, the appointment is by the majority of votes,—this is only legal when confirmed by "the hundred." No president can be elected two years in succession, but he may be so chosen after a period of eight years. The election of the secretary follows immediately, and when both are legally recognized, the ex-president calls the newly-elected president to the chair, after which, the ministers all standing, he congratulates his successor, and hands to him the seal of the Conference, with official documents, also the Bible used by Mr. Wesley when field-preaching; after this the newly-elected president makes his inaugural address. This is followed by a prayer-meeting, to which the public are admitted, and it is called "The Conference Prayer-Meeting." The president has authority to fill any vacancy in a circuit from the "List of Reserve;" to sanction any decision of a district committee made between each Conference; to attend any district meeting if requested by the chairman, or a majority of the superintendents; to visit any circuit when requested, and make inquiries concerning any difficulty, and, in unison with the district committee, to settle it. He is empowered to affix his signature to all sales of trust property, and to all applications to the charity commissioners for the exercise of their powers, with the proviso that they are recommended by the chapel committee. In conjunction with the superintendent of the circuit where the next Conference is to be held, he may make arrangements for the same, appointing such brethren as he may see fit to preach in the principal chapels during the first fortnight of the Conference. By his official position he is the chairman of the district where he is stationed, and is a member of the stationing committee. In his year of office he is entitled to an assistant; he has two votes during the session, and he may request the secretary of the Conference to attend special district meetings as his "official adviser." In case of illness or death, the ex-president assumes the powers of the office as if he were the president.

Presiding Elders are officers in the Methodist Episcopal Churches selected among the elders, and placed for purposes of supervision over certain districts of country. The districts are not composed of any definite number of circuits or stations, but vary according to circumstances from a very few to fifty or sixty. For many years the number of charges in a district was about twelve, that the presiding elder might visit each one every three months, and hold quarterly meeting services embracing Saturday, Sunday, and sometimes Monday or Tuesday. As the circuits were divided, and stations multiplied, and as the difficulty of passing from one charge to another diminished, the number of charges was increased, and several quarterly visitations were held in the same week. The elder, however, was required to hold all the quarterly meetings, and to call together the Quarterly Conferences. In 1876 the Discipline was modified so as to require the elder to be present as far as practicable, and to hold all the quarterly meetings, especially the first and fourth. The provisions of the Discipline are, Section 1, 161-165: "Presiding elders are to be chosen by the bishops, by whom they are also to be stationed and changed. A bishop may allow an elder to preside in the same district for any term not exceeding four years; after which he shall not be appointed to the same district for six years; but presiding elders in missions and Mission Conferences in heathen lands may be appointed to the same district for more than four successive years. The duties of the presiding elder are: 1. To travel through his appointed district. 2. In the absence of the bishop, to take charge of all the elders and deacons, traveling and local preachers, and exhorters in his district. 3. To change, receive, and suspend preachers in his district during the intervals of Conferences, and in the absence of the bishop, as the Discipline directs." He is further required to hold the Quarterly Conference; to oversee the spiritual and temporal business of the church, and promote the benevolent and educational interests; to see that the rules for the instruction of children have been observed, and to decide all questions of law in the Quarterly Conference, subject to an appeal to the president of the next Annual Conference. The law of limitation in appointments binds the presiding elder as well as the bishop, and he may not employ any preacher who has been rejected by an Annual Conference unless liberty has been given. In cities, and in densely-populated sections of country where the church is strong, the number of circuits or stations in a district are the greatest. In sparse populations in the South and West the districts have usually but few appointments. As a rule, the presiding elder has no separate station or circuit over which he has charge, but where the district is small, especially in new territories, and in mission-fields, he has charge of a station as well as of the district. At the Annual Conferences, presiding elders report in reference to the character and standing of the preachers, and counsel with and advise the bishops as to the appointments. In non-Episcopal Methodist Churches, such as the Wesleyans, in England and in Canada, and the Methodist Protestant Church of the United States, there are no presiding elders. In British Methodism, there are chairmen of districts, who perform many of the same functions, but have also charges of stations. In the Methodist Protestant Church, the Conferences are usually small, and the president of the Conference performs these duties.

Presiding Eldership is a part of the plan of itinerant general superintendency in the Methodist Episcopal Churches. It is, in the nature of its functions, a sub-episcopate. Unlike the Church of England, the Protestant Episcopal Church, and other episcopal bodies, the episcopacy in the Methodist Churches is not diocesan, or limited to a comparatively small district. It is general and itinerant. In the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, with a membership of about 300,000, there are about sixty dioceses. There is at least one for every State, and in some States, as New York and Pennsylvania, there are three or four. In the Methodist Episcopal Church, with a membership of about 1,600,000, there are but eleven bishops; and in the Methodist Episcopal Church South, with a membership of 730,000, there are but seven bishops. Consequently a direct and minute supervision over all the congregations by the bishops is impossible. To secure this supervision, however, each Conference is divided into districts, over which an elder is placed for four years, who receives the name of presiding elder, and who supervises all the interests of the church within those bounds. These presiding elders act under the direction of the bishops, report to them officially, and advise and counsel with them touching the ministerial appointments and arrangements; and thus a minute supervision of the church, more thorough than that by dioceses in the Protestant Episcopal Church, is secured, while at the same time the number of bishops is comparatively small.

History.—The presiding eldership arose, not from any theoretical plan, but was developed in the practical growth of the church. From the commencement of Methodism in America in 1766 to the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1784, no preacher was authorized to administer the sacraments. A few had, without full authority, undertaken this service, but the movement did not meet with the approbation of the Conference.

During the Revolutionary War the older preachers, who were from England, with the exception of Bishop Asbury, left America; and all the preachers were of comparatively limited experience and training. When the church was organized, Mr. Wesley requested that no more should be elected to the office of elder than were absolutely necessary for the administration of the sacraments. Out of the 83 preachers then in the field only about 30 had been traveling four years. Of these 30 a number were of very limited education and qualifications. Twelve were selected and ordained elders, but that the church might have the advantages of their services, these elders were authorized to travel, not only over their own circuits, but over certain contiguous circuits, where the preachers were not ordained, that the people might receive the sacraments of baptism and the Lord's Supper. After a year's trial these elders were authorized to exercise all the functions of a superintendent within their respective districts, provided they were not to do anything contrary to the orders of the superintendent. As the ministers increased in numbers and experience, there were more elders ordained than were needed for this purpose of supervision, and hence those who were directed to travel over different charges received the name of "presiding elders," and were known as such in 1787, and were probably recognized as such in the Discipline of that year, though no copy of that Discipline is known to be extant. In the Discipline of 1789 the term presiding elder occurs, and his office in the supervision and control of preachers is fully recognized. The General Conference of 1792 imposed a limit to the duration in office, allowing a presiding elder to be appointed to the same district for only four years. The districts were formed by the bishop, and the presiding elders were appointed by him, and were subject to change, in order to secure an accurate and thorough administration: and this has remained the practice of the church to the present time. It is well known that the economy of the Methodist Episcopal Churches gives to the bishop the power of appointing the preachers annually under certain limitations. This power of appointment has given rise to discussion at different periods. In 1792 the effort was made by O'Kelley and his associates to give the right of appeal to the Annual Conference, and to compel changes to be made according to their judgment. This motion being rejected by the General Conference, led to O'Kelley's withdrawal and the formation of the Republican Methodists. Finding this effort unavailing, others suggested that the presiding elders should be elected by the Conferences, and that they should be a joint board, acting with the bishop in making the appointments. This proposition, brought forward in 1804, was also rejected. In 1808, when it was proposed to form a delegated General Conference, and to restrict that body from certain modifications without the consent of the Annual Conferences, the proposition was laid on the table in order to discuss the question whether the election of the presiding elders should not be given to the Annual Conferences. After three days spent in debate the project was rejected by the Conference, and the plan of the delegated General Conference was adopted, which prevented any destruction of the plan of the general superintendency without the consent of the Annual Conferences. In 1820 a proposition was brought forward that the bishop should nominate three presiding elders for each vacant district, one of whom should be chosen by the Conference by ballot without debate. It was claimed that while the restrictions prevented an election by the Conference, they did not prevent the Annual Conferences from choosing out of any number nominated by the bishops, and that such a plan gave to the bishops the right of appointment. In that shape the measure carried for the time, but its action was suspended for four years, and the plan was at the end of that time rejected. As now constituted, the presiding elder selected by the bishop is amenable to the Annual Conference for his moral conduct and for the discharge of his official duties; and that body alone has power to affix any penalties for any act of maladministration. But he is also under the control of the bishop, and if his administration should not be in accordance with the direction of the General Conference, the bishop may at any moment remove him from the district and appoint him to some other position, thus securing a unity of administration and a direct amenability to the order of the General Conference. If owing to any sectional question or any sudden excitement the majority of an Annual Conference, even were it but one, should set itself against the authority of the General Conference, as has sometimes occurred, and as took place in the Baltimore Conference after the action of the General Conference in 1860, if the presiding elders were elected by the Annual Conference, the bishops would be wholly powerless to secure an administration in accordance with the direction of the General Conference. The General Conference itself has no power to try or sit in judgment either on the preacher or presiding elder. It acts administratively through the bishops, whom it directs to see that its commands are carried out throughout the charges. Another reason for the appointment to the presiding eldership by the bishops is, that the presiding elders are in their office of advisers to the bishop umpires between the preachers and the people. On the one hand, they care for the interests of the preachers and the securing for them proper appointments; on the other hand, they care for the churches to secure for them proper pastors. If they are to be elected,—being umpires between the people and the preachers,—each party should have equal vote in their election; but the Annual Conferences being composed wholly of ministers, the charges would have neither voice nor influence in the securing of their pastors. Hence their selection is given to a disinterested body. If a change should be made, the people should have in some form equal voice with the preachers; as the people now have, through their delegates in the General Conference, a voice in the election of the bishops, they will expect and require that they shall also have a voice in the election of presiding elders.

Presnell, Prof. H., a well-known and useful teacher in our Southern work, whose devotion to the M. E. Church in the South led to his election as a lay delegate from the Holston Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Prest, Charles, an eminent Wesleyan minister in England, was born in 1806, and appointed to a circuit in 1829. His name will be long remembered as the indefatigable secretary of the army and navy work, and also in connection with the work of the Home Mission and Contingent Fund. He loved Methodist doctrines, which is proved by his earnest preaching and by his writings. He was secretary to the committee of privileges for several years, a treasurer of the Schools Fund, and he actively promoted the building of New Kingswood School. For eighteen of the ripest and best years of his life he was mainly occupied in Home Mission work. He was president in 1862, and died in 1875.

Preston, Hon. David, a leading banker in Detroit, was converted early in life, and has been an active member of the M. E. Church, occupying its various official positions. He has been active in aiding to build churches and to free them from debt, making addresses upon the occasion, and assisting in taking up collections. He has also devoted time and means to the endowment of Albion College, Michigan. He was a delegate from the Detroit Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Price, Henry, an able member of the Irish Conference, was born in 1802, and died in 1869. For forty years he held a foremost place in the councils of the church, and occupied during his long ministerial life all the offices of trust his brethren could confer upon him. In 1869 he was honored by being the first "delegate," the then newly-created office and link between the British and Irish Conferences. He held this office when he died, and left behind him the rare fragrance of a holy life and a fruitful ministry.

Price, Hon. Hiram, member of Congress from Iowa, was born in Washington Co., Pa., Jan. 10,

1814. After having engaged in mercantile business he removed to Davenport, Iowa, in 1844, where he has since resided. In 1847 he was elected as the first school-fund commissioner of the county, which office he held for nine years. In 1848 he was elected recorder and treasurer, which positions he filled for eight years, and declined a re-election. In 1859 he became president of the State Bank of Iowa, and filled the office until 1866, closing up the business without the loss of a dollar. At the breaking out of the Civil War, the State having no available funds, he quartered and subsisted about 5000 infantry and cavalry for several months, at the request of the Governor, from his individual means. He was appointed paymaster-general, and was elected by large majorities to the 38th, 39th, and 40th sessions of Congress, and declined to be a candidate for the 41st. He became president of the Davenport and Northwestern Railroad; resigned after two years' service, spent some time in Europe, and was nominated against his express wish for the 45th Congress, where he is now (1877) serving. He united with the M. E. Church in September, 1831, and has been a consistent and devoted member, filling the various offices in the church, and also acting as treasurer and president of the Scott County Bible Society. He was an early friend of lay delegation, and was lay delegate from the Iowa Conference to the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876. He has also been an earnest and consistent advocate of temperance.

Price, Thomas W., Esq., a manufacturer of Philadelphia, was born in England in 1819. Removing to America when quite young, he settled in Philadelphia, and learned the manufacturing of blank books, and has been for many years at the head of one of the largest houses in that business in the city of Philadelphia. He united with St. George's church in 1835, and was subsequently a member of Green Street, holding the various positions of leader, trustee, and Sunday-school superintendent. He is now a member of Spring Garden Street church, towards the erection of which he was a liberal contributor; and he has also assisted a number of the smaller congregations in the suburbs of the city. He was a lay delegate to the General Conference of 1876, and was appointed by that body a member of the Missionary Board. He has taken a deep interest in the missionary cause, and was for several years treasurer of the Philadelphia Conference Missionary Society. He is also an active member of various benevolent organizations.

Prince, John Calvin, was born in Maine in 1825, and died in Bloomington, Ill., March 9, 1859. In his eighteenth year he became a member of the church, and in 1847 was received on trial in the Maine Conference. In 1848, by a division of the Conference, he became member of East Maine, and occupied prominent positions as a pastor. Suffering from hemorrhage he went West, hoping to regain his health, and served for a time as official agent of the Northwestern University. Subsequently he was appointed to Bloomington station, where he died. He had suffered severely for several years from asthma. He was possessed of great energy and perseverance, and the beautiful churches at Rockport, Damariscotta, and on Union Street, Bangor, are monuments of his indefatigable exertion.

FIRST M. P. CHURCH, PRINCETON, ILL.

Princeton, Ill. (pop. 3264), a beautiful town in Bureau County, on the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy Railroad, is the seat of a Methodist Protestant institution of learning. This region was originally included in the Bureau mission. Princeton circuit was organized in 1837, with Zadok Hall as pastor, who reported, in 1838, 220 members. In 1857 it had become a station, having 84 members, 112 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property. It is in the Rock River Conference, and has 149 members, 180 Sunday-school scholars, and $14,500 church property. There is also a Methodist Protestant church, but the statistics have not been reported.

Prindle, Cyrus, D.D., a native of Vermont, born in 1800; united with the M. E. Church in his early youth; was licensed to preach, and recommended to the New York Annual Conference, in March, 1821. For fifty-six years he continued in the active ministry of the word. Twenty-one years were spent in the city and State of New York, nineteen years in Vermont, six years in Massachusetts, and ten years in Ohio, where he retired in 1877 from public life, in full vigor of body and mind. He was an early, earnest, fearless, and faithful friend of the slave, when to be an abolitionist caused his removal from first-class appointments to those so feeble that $250 only was the salary he received per year. He became one of the pioneer and leading minds of the Wesleyan anti-slavery connection in 1843, and continued with that body until he deemed its work accomplished, and then, with nearly one hundred of his ministerial brethren, returned to the old church in 1867, after a quarter of a century's successful struggle with slavery. In his "last sermon," so called, March 25, 1877, he sums up his work thus: fifty-six years of ministerial service; preached more than twelve thousand sermons, besides delivering thousands of addresses; salaries varied from less than $1000, at the most, to $100 per annum, averaging $300; had given away one-seventh of his income to God and his cause.

Private Prayer is specifically enjoined in the Holy Scriptures. Every Christian is directed to enter into his closet to offer his petitions to the Father "who seeth in secret." This duty was earnestly enforced by Mr. Wesley in his General Rules, and in his public and social ministrations. He enjoined it upon his preachers in their pastoral visitations to carefully inquire of their members if they observed this service, and the preachers were directed to so arrange their duties wherever they were as to secure the morning and evening hour for spiritual meditation and private devotion.

Probationers.—In the formation of Methodist societies, it was deemed proper by Mr. Wesley that prior to recognition as full members there should be a period of probation, for the purpose of the society becoming acquainted with the candidate, and the candidate becoming acquainted with the rules of the society. At first, this period was fixed at two months; subsequently at six months. The latter period was adopted at the formation of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1784, and has since remained the settled rule. Probationers are those who have made application for membership; their names are enrolled on the class-books and on the records of the church as probationers; they have all the privileges of the various means of grace, and at the end of six months, having acquainted themselves with the Discipline of the church and with its doctrines, and the church having become acquainted with the life and habits of the candidates, if approved they are recommended by the leader's meetings to be received into full connection. If they desire admission they come before the church, answer before the congregation questions touching their faith, and their approval of the economy of the church, and are then received by a simple, yet solemn ceremony, into the membership of the church. The probationary period answers to that of a catechumenate of the old church, and the probationers to the catechumens. Since the separation of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, the probationary period has been abolished in that church, and all approved candidates are at once received into full membership. The probationary system is retained by the Methodist Protestant Church, but its period is not strictly defined.

Probationers and Candidates.—See MINISTERS.

Protracted Meetings were originally one of the peculiarities of Methodism. As the name indicated, they were protracted religious services held from evening to evening, sometimes from day to day, the especial object being to promote a religious revival. Frequently the interest awakened was such that large crowds attended the service, and many were led to embrace a religious life. Such meetings are now held in other denominations, and are oftentimes productive of very gracious results.

Providence, R. I. (pop. 68,904). was first settled in 1636, by Roger Williams, a Baptist, who was banished from the Puritan colony of Massachusetts because he would not conform to their established religious customs. An Indian chief gave him all the land known as Rhode Island "to sit down in peace and enjoy it forever." The first Baptist church, the first in America, was here founded, in 1638. The first Methodist sermon was preached by Mr. Garrettson, in April, 1787: the second, by Jesse Lee, July 4, 1790. He preached here again on Monday, Nov. 7, 1791. Bishop Asbury visited it as early as 1791. In 1792 Providence circuit was organized, the first in the State, and it included Bristol, Newport, Cranston, Warren, and some towns in Massachusetts. In 1793 it was called Warren circuit, and Philip Wage, was in charge, and reported from that vast region 58 members. The first Methodist church in Providence was dedicated June 1, 1816. A gracious revival occurred in it in 1820, the result of which was such an accession to the society as made a larger church necessary: accordingly the corner-stone of the Chestnut Street church was laid August 6, 1821, and on Jan. 1, 1822, the new church was dedicated. In 1833 the Power Street church, organized from Chestnut Street, was erected. In 1848 the Mathewson Street society was organized from Power Street church, and they worshiped in Hopkin Hall until 1851, when their church was built. In 1855 the Wesleyan Methodist church, on the corner of Fountain and Franklin Streets, was purchased, and another station organized. The South Providence society was organized in 1854. On the 6th of February, 1859, a mission Sunday-school was begun in Lester Hall, Cranston Street, and a church was finished May 31, 1865, known as Trinity church. The progress of the M. E. Church in this city is indicated in the following table:

The Wesleyan Methodists built a church in 1842, which was sold to Broadway church in 1855. The African M. E. Church and the African Zion Church have each two congregations. This city is in the Providence Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Providence Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference in 1840. Its boundaries were defined by the General Conference of 1876 as follows: "Including that part of Connecticut east of Connecticut River: the State of Rhode Island, with Millville and Blackstone, in Massachusetts; and also that part of Massachusetts southeast of a line drawn from the northeast corner of Rhode Island to the mouth of Neponset River, leaving Walpole station, Foxborough, and Quincy Point in the New England Conference." This Conference held its first session June 9, 1841, and reported 10,560 white and 104 colored members, 85 traveling and 63 local preachers. At this session David Leslie was appointed missionary to Oregon. In 1876 the Conference reported 180 traveling and 160 local preachers, 22,400 members, 24,231 Sunday-school scholars, 170 churches, valued at $1,677,100, and 116 parsonages, valued at $219,950.

Public Worship.—When the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1784, a ritual and liturgy which had been prepared by Mr. Wesley were adopted for the Sunday service; and in some places they were used on Wednesdays and Fridays. But as the preachers, with the exception of Asbury, Whatcoat, and Vasey, had been brought up in America, and had not been accustomed to read the service, but had practiced extemporaneous prayer, the ritual was but little used. As the preachers were obliged to travel long distances on horseback, carrying with them what clothing was necessary and what books they expected to read or to furnish to their people, and as few congregations were furnished with books for the service, both the gown and the service fell into disuse, and without any act of the church gradually passed away. In 1792 an order of public worship was adopted, similar to that which is now in the Discipline, and which required that the morning service should consist of singing, prayer, the reading of a chapter from the Old and one from the New Testament, and preaching; the afternoon service was to consist of the same, omitting one chapter in reading; the evening service omitted the reading of the Scriptures. When the sacrament of the Lord's Supper was administered, the two chapters might be omitted in the morning service. In 1824, it was directed that in administering the ordinances, and in the burial of the dead, the form of the Discipline should be invariably used, and the Lord's Prayer should be used on all occasions of public worship in concluding the first prayer, and the apostolic benediction in dismissing the congregation. In 1864, it was directed that the congregations should be exhorted to join in the audible repetition of the Lord's Prayer, and that the doxology should be sung at the conclusion of each service. It was further specified that the people should be exhorted to engage in these acts of worship, and to respond to the prayers of the ritual. Notwithstanding these directions, there is no exact uniformity in the order of the service. It is somewhat influenced in various localities by the usages which have been practiced among other denominations.

Publishing Committee.—The general book committee of the M. E. Church is considered the publishing committee for all the books and periodicals authorized to be published at the Book Concern. But the papers at Pittsburgh, San Francisco, and Portland are under the control of publishing committees. The first two committees are appointed by the General Conference; the last is selected by the Oregon Annual Conference. These committees are directed to make a full report of their proceedings to the ensuing General Conference.

Pugh, Josiah M., A.M., president of Andrew Female College, was born in Gates Co., N. C., Oct. 21, 1821, and graduated at Washington College, Pa., in September, 1842. Subsequently he studied law in Mississippi. He was converted in September, 1843, and feeling it his duty to preach, he accepted a tutorship in Centenary College, Miss., in 1844. He was elected Professor of Mathematics, Natural Philosophy, and Astronomy, in Johnson College, Miss., in 1845. He joined the Mississippi Conference in 1854, and had charge of pastoral works while professor and president of colleges. He accepted the same chair in Centenary College, La., in 1860, but the college suspending on account of the Civil War, he served as presiding elder from 1862 to 1869. He was transferred to the Northwest Texas Conference in 1872, and appointed president of Marvin College, and in 1876 he was elected president of Andrew Female College, the position which he now holds.

Punshon, Wm. Morley, M.A., LL.D., an English Wesleyan minister, entered the ministry in 1845, and gave early promise of a brilliant future, his ministrations being attended by divine influence. Mr. Punshon added to his circuit labors those of a platform orator and lecturer: John Bunyan, Wilberforce, Daniel in Babylon, and other subjects being treated by him with an eloquence and power which gained for him a world-wide popularity. In 1862, Mr. Punshon made the most noble offer to raise by his own exertions the sum of £10,000 in five years, to assist in building chapels in watering-places. Of course the offer was gratefully accepted, and the result is seen in many pretty seaside chapels. In 1868, Mr. Punshon left England for Canada, where he was president of the Conference. He returned in 1873. In 1875 he became one of the secretaries of the Missionary Society, and the following year was elevated to the presidential chair of the Conference.

Quarterage is a term originally applied among Methodists to the contributions paid to the support of the ministry. In circuits these collections were taken every three months, at a time immediately preceding the quarterly meetings, and from these periodical payments they received the name of quarterage. On stations and in cities this term is not so generally employed as formerly; but it is still in use on the circuits.

Quarterly Conferences.—Quarterly Conferences are among the oldest and most efficient organized bodies within the church. They were originally composed of the traveling and local preachers, stewards, and class-leaders. To these have subsequently been added exhorters, trustees, and superintendents of Sunday-schools, where said trustees and superintendents are members of the church, and have been approved by the Quarterly Conference. The presiding elder of the district is the presiding officer of each Quarterly Conference, but in his absence the preacher in charge acts in his stead. A regular record is kept under the care of the recording steward. The duties of the Quarterly Conference are: to receive and try appeals from the members of the church; to recommend to the District Conference, or, where there is no District Conference, to the Annual Conference, local preachers who are eligible for deacon's or elder's orders, or for admission on trial in the traveling connection; to receive the annual report of the trustees, and to elect stewards for the circuit or station, of whom one shall be a district and another a recording steward. The Quarterly Conference has supervision of all the Sunday-schools within its bounds, and has power either to approve superintendents or to remove any one who may prove unworthy or inefficient. The collections for the support of the minister, presiding elder, bishop, and for Conference claimants are reported and recorded, as well as the collections which have been taken for benevolent purposes. Attention is also called to the instruction of children, to the reading of the General Rules, and to the keeping of church records. Distinct committees are ordered to be appointed by each Quarterly Conference on missions, Sunday-schools, tracts, education, church extension, church records, parsonages, and furniture, church music, preachers' salaries, and Conference claimants. The whole temporal and spiritual matters of the charge properly come under the supervision of the Quarterly Conference.

Quarterly Meeting, The (English Wesleyan). is the chief local or circuit court, and, although not invested with judicial or disciplinary powers, dates from an early period. At the Conference of 1749 the assistants or superintendents were directed "to hold quarterly meetings, and there diligently inquire into both the spiritual and temporal state of each society." The design of this institution was thus twofold: first, to give an opportunity for the more satisfactory transaction of the financial affairs of the respective circuits, and also to secure a more efficient supervision of the spiritual interests of the societies at large. 1. The quarterly meeting consists of—(1) All the ministers and preachers on trial in the circuit, and supernumeraries whose names appear in the printed minutes of the Conference. (2) The circuit stewards, all the society stewards, and the poor stewards. (3) All the class-leaders in the circuit. (4) All the local preachers of three years' continuous standing, after being twelve months on trial, they being resident members in the circuit. (5) All the trustees of chapels situate in places named on the circuit plan, such trustees being members of society in the circuit. 2. The quarterly meeting has the direction and control of all moneys raised in the classes, and, by collections or otherwise, for the sustentation of the ministry in the circuit; and is responsible for providing, according to rule and usage, the necessary supplies. 3. All claims for deficiencies, for which the circuit is unable to provide, must first meet with the approbation of the quarterly meeting, and be signed by the stewards of the circuit, before they can be brought under the consideration of the district committee. 4. The stewards of the circuit are appointed at the December quarterly meeting, the nomination resting with the superintendent, the approval or otherwise with the meeting. 5. The consent of the quarterly meeting is necessary in order to the erection, enlargement, or purchase of any school or chapel in the circuit. 6. No circuit can be divided in reference to the formation of a new circuit till such division has been approved by the quarterly meeting. 7. Before any superintendent proposes any preacher to the Conference as a candidate for the ministry such preacher must be approved of by the March quarterly meeting. 8. The right of petitioning the Conference as to the appointment of ministers is vested in and restricted to the quarterly meeting. 9. The right of memorializing the Conference on any connectional subject is vested in the June quarterly meeting. Notice of such memorial must be presented in writing to the superintendent of the circuit ten days previous to the holding of such meeting, when, if adopted by the meeting, the memorial must be signed by the parties moving its adoption, and be then placed in the hands of the superintendent, who is held responsible for its presentation to the ensuing Conference. No memorial can be received except in manuscript. 10. Each superintendent is required to place before the September quarterly meeting any new rule which the preceding Conference has made for the government of the societies at large, when, if in the judgment of the meeting the operation of such rule will prove injurious, its enforcement in the circuit for that year may be set aside; but, if confirmed by the ensuing Conference, it will be binding on the whole connection. 11. The special circuit meeting, instituted for the rehearing or retrying an accused member or local officer, is composed of twelve lay members of the quarterly meeting, chosen for the occasion by the meeting in such manner as it may deem proper. At all such meetings the chairman of the district must preside. 12. If in any circuit no local preacher's meeting can be held, each candidate for the office of local preacher must be approved of by the quarterly meeting. 13. At the March quarterly meeting the return of members in each society or circuit is recorded as the official return, to be inserted in the district minutes, and the statistics of the day- and Sunday-schools of the circuit must be read. If sufficient time be not then available for the discussion of such statistics and for inquiry into the state of the schools, this shall be postponed until the June quarterly meeting. 14. The circuit treasurer of the Worn-out Ministers' Fund must be appointed at the September quarterly meeting. 15. At the quarterly meeting in December, a day must be fixed for the holding of the annual united meeting of the treasurers of the several chapels in the circuit, with as many of the trustees as can conveniently attend. The circuit chapel secretary must also be then appointed.

Quarterly Review, Methodist, is a critical and scholarly publication under the control of the M. E. Church. It originated as the Methodist Magazine, and was published monthly until 1828. (See METHODIST MAGAZINE.) It was then changed to a quarterly publication, and has for many years held high rank both in the church and among publications of its class. It is edited by Rev. D. D. Whedon, D.D., LL.D., who has occupied this chair since 1856. His vigorous and racy editorial notices have given to it much of its high character. It is published by the book agents at New York, and has a circulation of about 5000.

Queal, Luke C., D.D., of the Central New York Conference, was born in 1827, and joined the Oneida Conference in 1854. In addition to filling important stations, he has been several times presiding elder on districts. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1868, 1872, and 1876, and is among the strongest men of his Conference.

Queal, Robert F., Esq., is an active layman of Chicago, who is deeply interested in all the plans of church extension and improvement in that city and vicinity. He was an earnest supporter of lay delegation, and contributed largely to its success. He was a member of the General Conference of 1876.

Quebec (pop. 59,699), the capital of Quebec Province, in Canada, is an old city, founded in 1608. It was for more than a century the Gibraltar of French power in America, but was taken by the English in 1759. The Roman Catholics have about six-sevenths of the population. The Wesleyan Methodists have one church in the city.

Queenstown, Ireland (pop. 10,039), is on the harbor of Cork, and the point at which the Liverpool steamers always touch. A neat Methodist church has been built in the place, for which contributions were made by a number of Americans.

Quereau, George Worthy, D.D., was born in Stamford, Dutchess Co., N. Y., June 9, 1827, and graduated from Wesleyan University in 1849. He taught Latin and Greek for a year in Providence Conference Seminary, and in 1850 studied in Auburn Theological Seminary. In 1852-53 he was teacher of Ancient Languages in Providence Conference Seminary and associate principal, and in 1854-58 became principal and financial manager therein. He was admitted into the Providence Conference in 1857, and the following year accepted the position of principal of Jennings Seminary, Aurora, Ill., and entered the Rock River Conference in 1859. In 1867 he traveled in Europe and the East. In 1873 he resigned the principalship of Jennings Seminary, and remains a supernumerary member of the Rock River Conference.

Question Book, Berean, is a publication by the M. E. Church for the use of teachers in Sunday-schools. It contains the lessons for the entire year, and full and appropriate questions upon them; pictorial symbols and lesson verse, home reading, and adaptations of the lesson to the younger pupils. In 1876 it had attained a circulation of 75,000. It is published by Nelson & Phillips, New York, and is edited by J. H. Vincent, D.D.

Quigg, J. B., is an active minister of the Wilmington Conference. In addition to filling various important appointments, he has served as agent for the erection of the Newark Conference Seminary, and was successful in raising considerable means. He is (1877) presiding elder of the Wilmington district.

Quincy, Ill. (pop. 24,052), the capital of Adams County, is situated on the Mississippi River.

former college building to the city for a public school. In December, 1876, the donation of $30,000 was made to the college by Mr. Charles Chaddock, of Astoria, Ill., and in consequence of this donation the name was changed to Chaddock College. The college is under the care of Rev. E. W. Hall, A.M., assisted by a corps of teachers, and has a regular and thorough course of study. The following are the statistics of Methodism in Quincy for 1876:

Quinn, James, was born in Washington Co., Pa., in 1775. He was converted and joined the

CHADDOCK COLLEGE, QUINCY, ILL.

Quincy circuit was organized in 1832. At the same time the Quincy district was formed, of which Peter Cartwright was presiding elder, and the whole district was missionary work. In 1857 Quincy had become a station, having 184 members, 145 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property. The German Methodist Church has also a good congregation, and the African M. E. Church has an organization. In 1856 a literary institution, known as Quincy English and German Seminary, was founded, and a few years afterwards was raised to the grade of a college. A fine building was erected, but it was for years embarrassed with a heavy debt. In 1874 Johnson College, of Macon City, Mo., was consolidated with Quincy College, and in December, 1875, the trustees purchased a splendid property belonging to ex-Governor Woods, which originally cost some $200,000, disposing of their Methodists in 1792, and commenced an active religious life. In 1799 he was received on probation in the Baltimore Conference, and, after traveling for five years, was, in 1804, transferred to the Western Conference. He labored extensively and successfully throughout the West. He presided on districts twelve years, was without any position four, on circuits twenty-two, was agent for the Preachers' Relief Society one, supernumerary one, and superannuated four. He was also a member of eight sessions of the General Conference. His talents as a preacher were universally admired. He was an able minister, and a theologian of a high order. He died Dec. 1. 1847, his last words being, "All is peace." His life was written by Dr. John F. Wright.

Quinn, William P., one of the bishops of the African M. E. Church, was born in 1788, and united in his youth with the M. E. Church. At its formation he became identified with the African M. E. Church. After laboring faithfully in New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, in 1838 he removed West for the purpose of engaging in missionary labor, and traveled through Ohio, Indiana, and Missouri. He was an earnest and eloquent speaker, and possessed the confidence of the people among whom he was called to labor. In 1844 he was elected to the office of bishop, from which time he traveled extensively throughout the church. He died in February, 1873.

Racine, Wis. (pop. 9880), the capital of Racine County, is situated on Lake Michigan. It is in the region where John Clark, in 1832, established the first Methodist mission in this State. Fox River mission was established in 1835, when W. Royal was sent as missionary, and in 1836 it reported 119 members. In 1837, Otis F. Curtiss was appointed a missionary to Racine, which, in 1838, had 103 members. Methodism continued to grow until, in 1857, it had become a station, with 172 members, 120 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property. It is in the Wisconsin Conference. The statistics for 1876 show 215 members, 160 Sunday-school scholars, and $43,000 church property in the American M. E. Church; and the Norwegian M. E. society has 184 members, 110 Sunday-school scholars, and $3500 church property.

Radical Methodists was a term applied to those who, from 1820 to 1830, were seeking to make radical changes in the economy of the Methodist Episcopal Church, by abolishing the episcopacy and presiding eldership. The movement resulted in the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church. Its members were designated for a number of years by the term "Radicals." (See M. P. CHURCH.)

Rahway, N. J. (pop. 6258), is situated in Union County, on the New Jersey Railroad. The first society in this place was organized about 1798, and the first church edifice was built in 1808, and rebuilt in 1857. It first appears on the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1827, with Thomas B. Sargent as pastor, who reported 182 members. The second church was organized in 1849, by Rev. James Dandy, and the church building was erected in 1851. The Free Methodist church was organized in 1871. There are also two colored Methodist churches, the African M. E. church, and the Zion M. E. church. They are both small. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Raleigh Christian Advocate was established at Raleigh, N. C., under the patronage of the North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church South, and the first number was issued in January, 1856, Dr. Hefflin being the editor until 1861. In 1860 Rev. W. E. Fell was elected assistant editor, and in 1861 editor in chief. In the embarrassments connected with the Civil War the publishing was suspended. At the close of 1862 the paper was revived; W. E. Fell was chosen as editor, and continued until 1865, when it again suspended. In 1867, Rev. W. H. Cuninggim was appointed by the Conference publishing agent, and the paper was issued for the third time, with Rev. H. T. Hudson as editor, and its name was changed to Episcopal Methodist. The following year it was purchased as a private enterprise by Mr. Hudson. At the earnest request of the Conference, Rev. J. B. Bobbitt was appointed editor, and under his care the paper was issued in January, 1869, resuming its former name of Christian Advocate. It is now published by Rev. Mr. Bobbitt and R. P. Gray, Esq., under the patronage of the North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church South, and it is circulated extensively throughout the State.

Raleigh, N. C. (pop. 7790), is the capital of the State, and is situated on the North Carolina Railroad. The first Methodist services in or near this place were conducted by Jesse Lee, then a local preacher, in 1780. Near this place he was drafted into the army, but from conscientious scruples he declined to engage in the active service. When released, he preached to the soldiers. The older itinerants visited it about 1794. Bishop Asbury preached in the court-house in 1800. The first Methodist church built in the town was erected by the followers of O'Kelley, and was erected chiefly by the liberality of William Glendenning, who for some time held religious service. Raleigh circuit was organized out of the Haw River circuit, in 1807, with Christopher S. Mooring and Gray Williams as pastors, and the Raleigh district was organized in 1810. In 1811 Bishop Asbury held a Conference, from the services of which a revival spread throughout all that section of country. As one of the results the first M. E. church was built that year, when the charge was made a station, and C. H. Hinds was pastor, who reported the next year 32 white and 44 colored members. It alternated between being part of a circuit and a station until 1820, when it became permanently established as an independent work. It was from this charge, in 1832, that Melville B. Cox was sent to Africa as the first African missionary. The church, which was built in 1811, was burned in 1839. The present building, called the Edenton Street church, was erected in 1841. In 1845 the church in Raleigh, as well as throughout the entire State, adhered to the M. E. Church South, and has remained connected with it. In 1846 a second charge, called Person Street church, was built, and which was greatly improved in 1875. The third church, the Will's Hill, was built by the young men of Edenton Street, in 1875, as a mission chapel. In 1876 a centennial celebration was held in the city of Raleigh, and arrangements were adopted to raise funds for liquidating the debts upon the colleges belonging to the Conference, and for erecting a metropolitan church in place of the Edenton Street church in the city of Raleigh. An interesting volume containing the addresses was prepared by Rev. L. S. Burkhead, D.D., which gives a full account of Methodism in North Carolina. The Raleigh Christian Advocate is published in the interest of the M. E. Church South in this city. Up to 1853 the colored members were attached to the Edenton Street charge, but during that year the white members of Edenton Street, assisted by the colored members, purchased the old Episcopal church and moved it to the corner of Edenton and Harrington Streets, and fitted it up for the use of the colored people. From that time until the close of the war the colored people were a separate pastoral charge, served by some of the prominent ministers of the Conference, and were always assisted by the Missionary Society. In 1865 the colored membership united with the African M. E. Church, and the trustees transferred to them the church property. There is also in the eastern part of the city a small congregation belonging to the African M. E. Church. In a suburban village one and a half miles from the city, called Oberlin, the M. E. Church has organized a small congregation of colored people. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Ramsey, John W., Esq., a native of McMinn Co., Tenn., was born in 1825. He united with the M. E. Church in 1841, and by the separation, in 1845, was placed in the M. E. Church South, and remained until 1866, having resided in Georgia and Alabama most of that time. He taught school from 1847 to 1851, in Tennessee and Georgia, and then studied and practiced law in Alabama from 1853 to 1866, when he settled at Cleveland, Tenn., where he has since resided and practiced law. He re-united with the M. E. Church. While devoted to his law practice, he is greatly attached to the church, and makes Sunday-schools a specialty. He was lay delegate for the Holston Conference to the General Conference of 1872, and at the General Conference of 1876, as reserve lay delegate, he filled the place of W. Rule.

Randolph Macon College is an institution of learning, which was founded by the Virginia Conference of the M. E. Church in 1832. It was located originally in Mecklenburg Co., Va., near the North Carolina border, but was removed in 1866 to a more suitable location in Ashland, on the railroad between Washington and Richmond. The college has a number of buildings, and consists of several separate schools. There is a special school of biblical literature and Oriental languages for the theological students. In 1876 there were 10 professors and upwards of 200 students. It was under the superintendence for several years of the late talented and lamented Dr. Duncan, who died since the first pages of this work have been in press.

Rankin, Thomas, was appointed by Mr. Wesley in 1772 as missionary to America, and as general assistant or superintendent of the American societies. He was by birth a Scotchman, and had been educated under strictly religious influences. He early united with the Methodist society, which had been formed by some settlers who had been converted under John Haime, and he at once commenced laboring as a local preacher. He was called by Mr. Wesley into the itinerancy in 1761, and he came to America in company with George Shadford and Captain Webb, in the spring of 1773. Immediately on his arrival, he called together the preachers to meet him in the first Annual Conference in Philadelphia, on the 14th of July, which was the first Annual Conference ever held in America. He had fine executive ability, but was rather stern in manner. His action as a disciplinarian gave form and stability to the Methodist societies. He traveled extensively till after the breaking out of the Revolutionary War, when, being intensely English in all his sympathies, he saw that his way was hedged up. He remained, however, till the spring of 1778, when, after having held the oversight of the Methodist society for five years, he returned to England. He continued his active labor under Mr. Wesley's direction, and was present at his death in City Road parsonage. He continued to labor as his health permitted, until he ended his course with joy on the 17th of May, 1810. By some means Mr. Rankin, when in America, had failed to estimate Mr. Asbury properly, and had induced Mr. Wesley to write for his recall in 1775. But as Mr. Asbury was hundreds of miles distant when the letter arrived, and as, owing to revolutionary movements, the letter could not be forwarded to him at an early date, he did not receive the information in time for action, and it was agreed that Mr. Asbury should then remain. The unfavorable impression which Mr. Wesley received was through letters of Mr. Rankin, and personal representations after he returned to England. Mr. Wesley, however, lived to see his fears as to Mr. Asbury wholly dispelled, and to rejoice in the great work which God had raised him up to accomplish.

Raper, William H., of the Cincinnati Conference, was born in Western Pennsylvania in 1793. His parents removing to the vicinity of Cincinnati, he was brought up in Ohio. In the War of 1812 he volunteered, and became captain of a company, and was considered one of the bravest men in the army. He united with the M. E. Church in 1816, and the following year was employed by the presiding elder on Miami circuit. In 1819 he joined the Cincinnati Conference, and labored successfully and efficiently until 1852. He filled a number of the most important stations, and was several times presiding elder. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1832, 1836, 1840, and 1844, and was for one term a member of the general mission committee. He died in February, 1852. He was remarkable for his amiability, his conversational power, and his ability and fidelity as a preacher of the gospel.

Rattenbury, John, an English Wesleyan preacher, commenced his ministerial career in 1828. Holy consecrated service has been crowned with most abundant success. In every circuit he has stayed the full term of three years,—this is unprecedented. He was president of the Conference in 1861. When Mr. Rattenbury became supernumerary in 1873, he was appointed agent and secretary of the Auxiliary Fund, when he stated that he had an ambition to raise by donations £100,000 for the Auxiliary Fund,—the claimants on that fund have already felt the benefit; and at the district meeting, in May, 1877, he stated that he had raised towards his cherished object £85,000.

Ray, Edwin, an active minister in the Indiana Conference, was born in Kentucky, July 26, 1803, and died in Indiana in 1832. His father, Rev. John Ray, had entered the traveling ministry in 1790, and, after having traveled a number of years, located. Having re-entered the itinerancy, he was at the time of his death a superannuated member of the Indiana Conference. Like many of the older ministers he was strongly anti-slavery, and had requested to be transferred to Indiana from Kentucky, giving as a reason that he was unwilling to die and be buried in a slave State. Daniel embraced religion at a camp-meeting at the age of sixteen, and was admitted on trial in the Kentucky Conference at nineteen. In 1824 he was transferred to the Illinois Conference, but his labors were chiefly confined to the State of Indiana. He preached in Indianapolis, Madison, Terre Haute, and though during his pastorate in Madison there was a large secession in the church, growing out of what was termed the radical controversy, he sustained himself well. In 1830, his health having failed, he became superannuated, but labored during a large part of the year. He then resumed the station work for another year, at the close of which he started for Conference. He was taken sick on the way, and after eleven days of extreme suffering, died in peace. He was a young minister of superior ability and of commanding influence. He said to his wife during his last illness, "The religion which I have professed and preached has comforted me in life, supported me in affliction, and now enables me to triumph in death." His son, John W. Ray, Esq., of Indianapolis, has inherited many of his traits.

Ray, Hon. John W., is a native of Madison, Ind., born in August, 1828. He graduated in his twentieth year, with much distinction, at Indiana Asbury University, and afterwards studied law, and commenced to practice in 1858. For years he has been Register in Bankruptcy, and also treasurer of the Indianapolis Savings Bank. He has long been treasurer of Indiana Asbury University, and has promoted its financial interests. He is active in church duties, and is pre-eminent as a Sunday-school worker. At the session of the General Conference of 1876, he represented the Southeastern Indiana Conference, in place of Alex. C. Downey, as reserve delegate.

Raymond, Miner, D.D., professor in Garrett Biblical Institute, was born in New York City, Aug. 29, 1811. For a number of years he was a teacher in Wilbraham Academy, Mass., and was a member of the New England Conference. From 1848 to 1864 he was principal of Wilbraham Academy, and then accepted the chair of Systematic Divinity in the Theological Seminary at Evanston, the position which he now holds. He has recently issued a work on "Systematic Theology," in two volumes, which has been very favorably received.

Rayne, R. W., of New Orleans, La., was born in Sunderland, England, in 1808. His parents were members of the Methodist society, and he embraced religion and united with the church in 1824. He immediately became an active worker in visiting the poor in work-houses; and was a visitor for the Benevolent Strangers' Friend Society, dispensing alms, and holding prayer-meetings on Sunday evenings among the poor in their dwellings. He was shortly afterwards licensed to exhort and preach. In 1832 he emigrated to the United States, and, after a short residence in New York and Philadelphia, settled in Cincinnati, where, at the invitation of the Methodist Protestant Church, he accepted an appointment in the ministry. In 1835 failing health compelled him to locate, and business arrangements led him for a short time to Massachusetts. In 1842 he removed to New Orleans, and united with the M. E. Church. At the separation he adhered to the M. E. Church South. He continued in mercantile business till the breaking out of the war. At its close he returned to the city, and has been an active and consistent member of the M. E. Church South, living in harmony and fellowship with all denominations.

Read, James L., M.D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., March 28, 1808. Fairly educated in youth, he afterwards acquired a knowledge of ancient languages. He entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1833, and filled the work on three charges, but ill health induced him to enter another department of church labor. In the winter of 1840 he was called by the Pittsburgh Conference to assist Rev. Z. H. Coston as agent of the Methodist Book Depository. In 1842 he was appointed agent of the Depository, and occupied the position until 1848. Was re-elected in 1851, and served until December, 1868, when he resigned, and shortly afterwards opened a large paper and book house. He was prominent at the inception and building of the Methodist building, occupied jointly by the Book Depository and Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, and had a general supervision of the building until he resigned his agency. In 1843, owing to an affection of the throat, which disabled him for pulpit labors, he commenced the study of medicine, and since that time has practiced as far as other duties would allow.

Reading, Pa. (pop. 33,930), the capital of Berks County, is on the Schuylkill River, 57 miles northwest from Philadelphia. It was laid out in 1748, by Thomas and Richard Penn, proprietors and governors of the Province of Pennsylvania. The first Methodist sermon was delivered by Joseph Pilmoor, who records in his diary, under date of May 27, 1772, that he "preached in the court-house at Reading to most of the genteel people of the place," but the beginning of regular Methodist worship was in the summer of 1823. At that time a class of fifteen was formed. It met for some time in private houses, and then in school-houses. Among the early preachers were James Bateman, Wesley Wallace, Henry Boehm, Thomas Miller, Jacob Gruber, Joseph Lybrand, and others. On the 15th of June, 1824, $570 were paid for a small house on Third Street, near Franklin, and it was turned into a church. In 1825 Reading was included in a six weeks' circuit, with preaching every two weeks, and in 1830 it became a station, with Thomas Sovereign as pastor. In 1839 the society built a church on Fourth Street below Penn. On June 16, 1848, 55 members of the original society were organized into a separate church, and worshiped in a hall until their church was built. It was finished in 1848. The corner-stone of Covenant M. E. church was laid Oct. 18, 1868, Henry Boehm officiating, and the house was dedicated April 11, 1869. This church, on the corner of Elm and Ninth Streets, was the gift of Mr. Henry Crouse. The society was formed April 18, 1869. In 1836 an African M. E. society was founded by Jacob Ross, a local preacher, and a fugitive from slavery in Virginia, and in the year after, the society built a church. In 1846 about 25 members of Ebenezer M. E. church left and organized a Methodist Protestant society. In 1848 they built a house of worship on Chestnut Street, but the society did not prosper, and in 1862 the house was sold to another denomination. It is in the Philadelphia Conference, and has the following statistics:

Date.	Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
1839	Ebenezer	339	301	$32,500
1848	St. Peter's	410	300	27,500

Red Wing, Minn. (pop. 4266), is the capital of Goodhue County, on the Mississippi River, 55 miles below St. Paul. The first Methodist sermon preached in this place was by Chauncy Hobart, D.D., in 1853. In 1857 it had become a station, having 106 members, and the first church was built, which was enlarged and improved in 1875. A parsonage was built in 1858, which was sold in 1876, and a new edifice is being erected. Adjoining the church a mission chapel was built in the west end of the city, in 1867. A German, a Swedish, and a Norwegian Methodist Episcopal church have also been built in the city. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Reed, H. W., D.D., was born in Hillsdale, N. Y., May 7, 1813; was converted in 1824, and admitted into the New York Conference in 1833. In 1835 he was transferred to Illinois Conference, and labored for several years in the extreme northwest part of the Conference, and also at the Oneida Indian mission, near Green Bay. He was subsequently appointed presiding elder on the Plattville, Dubuque, and other districts, and was a member of the General Conference from 1844 to 1860. In 1862 he was appointed the agent of the Blackfeet Indians, and also a special agent and commissioner to trade with the Indians. He was also subsequently appointed, in 1873, as agent at Fort Hall, among the Idaho Indians, and had supervision over several Indian appointments in Montana and Idaho. He is now a member of the South Kansas Conference.

Reed, Miles L., was born in Mount Morris, N. Y., in 1821. He was educated in the Rock River Seminary, and after having been employed by the presiding elder two years, was admitted, in 1845, into Rock River Conference. He filled important stations, but became a victim of pulmonary disease, and died July 4, 1857.

Reed, Nelson, one of the early American ministers, was born in Anne Arundel Co., Md., Nov. 27, 1751. His name first appears in the minutes in 1779, though it is supposed he commenced preaching in 1775. He was a member of the General Conference of 1784, and was among those ordained elders, and for ten subsequent years had charge of districts in Maryland and Virginia, and filled the most prominent appointments in the cities, or presided over districts. In 1820 he became superannuated, and so remained until his death, Oct. 20, 1840. He was in the ministry sixty-five years, and was at the time of his death the oldest Methodist preacher in Europe or America.

Reed, William, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the ministry in 1838, and continued on circuit work till 1860, when he was appointed connectional editor. He held this office for eleven years, until failing health induced him to resign it, in 1871. He became supernumerary in that year, and fixed his residence in Sunderland. He is still an occasional contributor to the literature of the body. He was elected president of the Annual Assembly in 1862.

Mr. Reed has always taken a lively interest in the public proceedings of the denomination, and for many years was one of the chief debaters in its Annual Assemblies. His powers as a debater are universally acknowledged.

Reese, Ely Yeates, D.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Baltimore, Jan. 18, 1816. In his childhood he showed poetical tendencies, and at twelve years of age completed a poem of some three hundred lines. At fourteen he was a contributor to the Monthly Repository, in New York, and also wrote for literary journals in Baltimore. He united with the M. P. Church, and was trained for the Christian ministry. In his twenty-third year he was elected editor of the Methodist Protestant, the official organ of the church, and was re-elected by the General Conference at its various sessions from 1842 to 1856. Dr. Reese was widely known throughout the city as a popular preacher and pastor, and as a clear and forcible writer. He was for some time public school commissioner, and in 1857 was a member of the first branch of the city council. Notwithstanding he had but little time for poetical culture, he devoted much time to poetical reading, and was also a popular lecturer. As a religious journalist he had many excellences. Of his poems, which are chiefly miscellaneous, many are devotional in character, and exhibit true inspiration. He died in 1861.

Reese, John Smith, M.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Harford Co., Md., April 7, 1790. In his early manhood he became a teacher and prosecuted medical studies, taking his collegiate course at the Washington Medical College, in Baltimore, and graduating at the Washington Medical College of Pennsylvania in 1829. He was converted and joined the M. E. Church about twenty-one years of age, and was licensed to preach in 1819. About the time of his graduation as a physician, the Reform question which resulted in the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church had reached its height of agitation. From conscientious convictions of duty, Dr. Reese turned aside from the life of a physician and gave himself fully to the itinerancy of the new church. As a preacher he had gifts of a high order. "He reasoned like Paul; he persuaded like Apollos, and was oftentimes overwhelming in the pulpit." Itinerating for twenty-seven years, he filled many of the most prominent appointments in his Conference, including that of being president for three separate terms. No minister in Maryland was more widely known and more highly respected. He died at his home in Baltimore County, Feb. 14, 1855. He repeatedly quoted in his later moments with his old fire and enthusiasm Pope's "Dying Christian." Among his last utterances was, "My body is miserably broken by disease, but my soul is free; disease cannot touch that."

Reese, Levi R., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Harford Co., Md., Feb. 8, 1806. At the age of seventeen he was employed as an assistant teacher in an academy, where he increased his literary attainments. He designed to enter the naval service, but the death of a young friend made a deep impression on his mind, and under a pointed exhortation of a preacher he was fully awakened, and shortly after was converted and united with the M. E. Church, being about twenty years of age. He espoused the cause of Reform, then agitated in Baltimore, joined the Union society, and became secretary to that body; and in the controversies which arose he was among the number excommunicated on the charge of

"sowing dissension in the church and speaking evil of ministers." He immediately entered into the active ministry of the new church, and spent two or three years in New York and Philadelphia. He subsequently served in every important station and in every official position in the gift of the body with which he was connected. For two successive years he was chosen president; was repeatedly a representative in the General Conference; and at Devonshire, England, in 1800. Her maiden name was Pearce. She was converted under the influence of Mr. O'Bryan, the founder of the Bible Christians. At the age of nineteen she felt it her duty to preach, and the way being opened for her, she commenced traveling a circuit in England. Subsequently she came to America, and was married to Mr. Reeves, who was a minister in the Methodist Protestant Church. In 1831 the Confer-one time presided over its deliberations. He was elected chaplain to the House of Representatives in Congress in 1837-38. During his chaplaincy the lamentable "Graves and Cilley" duel occurred. The delicacy, fidelity, and pathos which characterized his address on that sad occasion drew forth the highest admiration. He delivered in the Capitol a series of discourses on the obligation of the Sabbath, which were afterwards published. He was the author of "Thoughts of an Itinerant." He died in Philadelphia, Sept. 21, 1851.

Reeves, Mrs. Hannah Pearce, a preacher of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in once offered her an appointment, but she declined, preferring always to accompany her husband in his work, uniting with and sustaining him in his labor. She was an earnest and successful speaker, and was active in works of benevolence and philanthropy. In her sixtieth year her health became so impaired she was obliged to desist from regular public ministrations, though for nine years she was active in assisting the churches, the Sunday-schools, and benevolent societies. She died Nov. 13, 1868, calmly, reclining in an arm-chair. Previous to this time she had been exceedingly joyful and had said, "He is with me: he told me he would abide with me to the end; he has kept his word. Open the doors wide, let it be seen how happily a Christian can die."

Regeneration signifies a new birth. It is the work of the Holy Spirit, by which a change is wrought in the heart of the believer. It consists in the recovery of the moral image of God upon the heart, so that we may love him supremely, serve him according to his command, and delight in him as our chief good. It is said, "the end of the commandment is charity out of a pure heart and of a good conscience, and of faith unfeigned." The sum of the moral law is, to "love God with all the heart and soul and strength and mind." Regeneration consists in this principle being implanted in the soul by the operation of the Holy Spirit; and in its perfect condition, in obtaining the ascendancy and habitual prevailing over its opposite. It is synonymous with the phrases "conversion" and "new creation," or the becoming a "new creature." The efficient cause of regeneration is the Divine Spirit, for no man can turn himself unto God. It proceeds by enlightening the judgment through the word of truth, or the gospel of salvation, and impressing that truth upon the understanding so as to subdue the will and reign in the affections. Regeneration is to be distinguished from justification, though closely connected with it. Every one who is justified is also regenerated; but justification places us in a new relation; regeneration places us in a new moral state. The one is a work done for us, the other a work done in us. This regeneration which takes place at the time of justification is under a law of growth: the believer is a babe in Christ; he grows to be a child, and then a young man, and ultimately into the full stature of a perfect man in Christ Jesus. Regeneration, as the initial and incipient state, is of the same character with sanctification, which is a state of maturity or completeness in character, though even that in its developments may be perpetually enlarging. The period between regeneration and sanctification may be more or less extended. The growth may be gradual, and the changes from state to state scarcely perceptible; or the work may be cut short in righteousness. Regeneration is preceded by true penitence, which involves the turning from all sin with sincere abhorrence, and also by faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, which claims the promise that to them who receive him he gives power to become the sons of God. In this respect Methodism differs from the Calvinistic theory, which makes regeneration precede the exercise of either true repentance or true faith. Methodists teach in common with Calvinists that no man can turn to God by his own power or by any natural ability; but they believe, in distinction from Calvinists, that the power to repent and believe is imparted by the Holy Spirit unto all men, and not to the elect only; that God gave his Son to die for all men; that he desires the salvation of all; and that a measure of the Spirit is given to every man to profit withal; that the distinction between men is not that greater light or grace is given to one rather than to another, but that one accepts the gracious provisions, and that the other rejects; that God has given to man the power, on the one hand, of yielding to the influences of the Spirit, and on the other, of rejecting them and pursuing a course unto perdition. God has in his gracious economy placed this fearful responsibility upon the exercise of the human will. Methodism further teaches that this regeneration becomes a matter of human consciousness, not only by the results of the change in the human soul, in its states of love and hope and joy, but by the direct witness of the Holy Spirit accompanying that change, according to the Scripture, "He that is born of God hath the witness in himself." This witness, they believe, is usually given in the moment of regeneration, but it is sometimes delayed for the exercise of more direct faith. They do not believe that in regeneration any new faculties are imparted to the human soul, or that any already existing are destroyed; but that all the powers with which God has invested humanity are directed to their proper end, and that all are governed by supreme love to God.

Rehoboth Beach is the name of a camp-meeting ground near Lewes, Del. It contains about 400 acres of land, 35 of which are an oak-grove of large growth, and 50 acres are in pine and cedar of good size. Part of it is a hard clay and loam soil, and part sandy, with the exception of about 25 acres. The whole is laid out in wide avenues varying in width from 60 to 100 feet. The average size of lots is 50 by 100, giving ample room for a house, with front and side yards. There are 2 good hotels and about 30 cottages, varying in cost from $600 to $3000. Besides these there are a number of wooden tents, which are comfortable one- and two-story buildings. During the camp-meeting season a large number of canvas tents are pitched upon the ground. It is also supplied with a tabernacle during the unpleasant weather, and a preacher's lodge, plainly furnished. Good water can be obtained anywhere at a depth of from 12 to 20 feet. The beach is hard, affording a good drive for 10 miles. From Henlopen Light to Indian River Inlet the opportunities and facilities for bathing are very fine. An extensive board walk has been laid, 1000 yards in length and 6 feet wide, on Surf Avenue, on the ocean-side, making a fine promenade. Sunday-school conventions are held as well as camp-meetings, and the place is occupied as a seaside resort, and is free from many of the vices found at fashionable watering-places.

Reid, John M., D.D., was born in New York City in 1820; was converted in 1835, and graduated from the University of New York in 1839. He joined the New York Conference in June, 1844, and was sent to Wolcottville as his first appointment. He served Bakerville charge in 1846, and Jamaica in 1847-48. In 1849, when New York East Conference was set off, he became a member of it, and was sent to Birmingham, where he remained two years: was appointed to Middletown, Conn., during 1851-52; of Seventh Street, New York City, in 1853-54; and in 1855 was sent to Summerfield chapel, Brooklyn, which he served two years, and in 1857 was appointed to Bridgeport and Fairfield, Conn. In 1858 he was elected president of Genesee College; in 1864, editor of Western Christian Advocate; in 1868, editor of Northwestern Christian Advocate; in 1872, corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, which position he still holds. He has been a member of each General Conference since 1856.

REV. JOHN M. REID, D.D.

Reilly, William, was a venerated and useful member of the Irish Conference. He was the faithful colleague of Rev. Gideon Onsey on the "Irish mission to Roman Catholics," and subsequently held some of the most important offices in the Conference. In 1856 he was appointed, with Dr. Robinson Scott, a deputation to the United States on behalf of the fund for the increase of Wesleyan agency in Ireland. He was then seventy-five years old, yet was able to do good service in America, where he found very many friends that had been converted under his ministry. Gifted with rare natural endowments and wholly consecrated to his work, he was honored with signal success in his ministry, and died triumphantly.

Religious Messenger, The, was a weekly paper published in Philadelphia, under the patronage of the Conference, in the latter part of the year 1825. It continued about two years, when it was merged in the Advocate and Journal, of New York. It was commenced almost a year prior to the Advocate, at New York. Dr. Haldich, now secretary of the American Bible Society, was on its publishing committee, and was one of its chief editors. It was published by John Clark, on Arch Street, very near, if not on, the same spot now occupied by the Methodist book-store.

Remington, Eliphalet, is a large manufacturer, resident at Hion, N. Y. He was the first lay delegate from the Central New York Conference to the General Conference of 1872, and was appointed a member of the general committee of church extension from 1872 to 1876, and is a member also of the missionary and church extension committee for the present quadrennial term. He and his brother, Mr. Philo Remington, are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and have distinguished themselves not only for their liberality in erecting a church in their own vicinity, but for large and liberal gifts to the Syracuse University, and to the Missionary and Church Extension Boards.

Repentance in its generic sense signifies a change of mind, a wishing something were undone that has been done. In a strictly religious sense it signifies conviction of sin, and sorrow for it. This differs from a repentance caused merely by the knowledge of injuries sustained or likely to be incurred. Evangelical repentance embraces not only sorrow for the act performed, but a recognition of the sin as offensive to God, accompanied with grief and hatred of all sins and a turning of heart from them to the Saviour. This is called repentance towards God. In Calvinistic theology regeneration precedes faith and repentance: as, according to that system, only the regenerated can perform these religious acts. With them the process is: first, regeneration; second, faith; and, third, repentance. Methodists believe that in the salvation of the sinner, the Holy Spirit enlightens his understanding and causes him to see his need of a Saviour; that under this spiritual influence and power the first step is repentance, or turning from sin, the second, believing in the Lord Jesus Christ. These are followed by justification or regeneration.

While repentance is, strictly speaking, the act of man, it is nevertheless also in another sense the gift of God. Without the grace of God first given, no man will repent or turn to God. The Holy Spirit supplies light to the understanding, quickens the emotions, and so seals divine truth upon the conscience that the sinner not only sees, but feels his spiritual danger. The motives to repentance are furnished in the word of God; opportunity to repent is afforded through the mercy and forbearance of God; and hope is found in the promises so graciously given to the penitent and contrite heart.

Representation in the General Conference, Ratio of.—At the formation of the M. E. Church in 1784 no provision was made for the assembling of a General Conference. The body which formed the church was composed of all the traveling preachers, irrespective of age or standing, who could be convened at the time when notice was given. Having settled the general plan of the church, it appears to have been the purpose to have whatever changes were necessary adopted from time to time by the vote of the different Annual Conferences, taking as their pattern the English Wesleyan Conference. The Baltimore Conference was at that time the central and largest body, and holding its sessions after the Conferences which were more southern, was regarded as deciding on the various questions proposed and which had been submitted to the other Conferences. This mode becoming difficult and uncertain, the Conferences agreed that a council should be held in 1789, to be composed of the bishop and presiding elders, who should recommend such measures as they unanimously agreed upon to the Annual Conferences, but these measures were to have no effect unless sanctioned by the Annual Conferences. A second council was called in 1790, composed of the bishops and a delegate elected from each Annual Conference, which, in addition to recommending measures, had the right to supervise the college and the publishing of books. Dissatisfaction, however, with such a limited body sprung up, and the Annual Conferences directed that a General Conference should be called in 1792, to be composed of all the preachers in full connection. This Conference assembled in November of that year, and adopted a plan for quadrennial Conferences, which has remained the order of the church to this time. In 1800 the attendance on the General Conference was limited to ministers who had traveled four years. The body becoming large, and the central Conferences from convenience of attendance being able to outvote the other Conferences, an effort was made in 1804 to establish a plan of delegation. It was not then adopted, it being deemed wisest to let the Annual Conferences speak upon the subject. In 1808, the majority of the Conferences having requested a plan of delegation to be formed, the Restrictive Rules were adopted, which fixed the ratio at not more than one for every five, nor less than one for every seven. The ratio in the General Conferences of 1812 and 1816 was five; from 1820 to 1832 the ratio was one for every seven. The Conference becoming unwieldy in number, an effort was made at several General Conferences to change the Restrictive Rule, but it was not successful until 1832, and in 1836 the rule was adopted allowing not more than one for every fourteen, nor less than one for every thirty. In 1860 the ratio was changed to not less than one for every forty-five, which is at present the ratio of the representatives to the members of the Annual Conferences. In addition to these, each Annual Conference is entitled to a representative for a fraction of two-thirds of the number requisite for the ratio, and every Annual Conference, no matter how small, is entitled to one ministerial delegate. In the plan of lay delegation which was adopted in 1872, every Conference which has two ministerial delegates is also entitled to two lay delegates, those which have but one ministerial delegate having but one lay delegate.

Reprobation is the counterpart of election, and is equivalent to rejection. Calvinistic theology teaches that God from eternity elected certain men to salvation and eternal life, passing by others: that only the elect receive such spiritual influence and impulses as will lead to their salvation. Consequently the reprobates are left without spiritual power or hope. Methodists utterly reject this doctrine of unconditional election and reprobation. They believe that no man is lost because he is passed by in the sovereign counsels of God, or because spiritual power to repent and believe is not furnished. They believe that the Holy Spirit is sent to enlighten every individual and incline his heart to turn to God; that if lost, his ruin will come from his voluntary rejection of the light and power offered by the Holy Spirit. They believe that eternal reprobation is derogatory to the character of God, contrary to his justice, to his sincerity in offering salvation, and that it makes God a respecter of persons. They also believe that the eternal punishment of reprobates who had no spiritual power given them to repent and believe would be in opposition to every idea of righteousness or justice, and that the preaching of such a doctrine leads unavoidably by its reaction to Universalism, or the rejection of the idea of future punishment.

Restrictive Rules.—Prior to the General Conference of 1808 there was nothing in the law of the church which limited the legislative authority. The whole body of the eldership had a right to attend every session of the General Conference, and they were present as far as practicable. But the church having spread so extensively through the West and South that it involved great loss of time and means for the preachers generally to attend, it was resolved to constitute a delegated General Conference. The church was then unwilling that supreme power to change every part of the church economy, and of even its doctrines, should be vested in so small a body. Hence they adopted certain limitations, which are known as "Restrictive Rules," prohibiting the General Conference from altering or modifying certain features without the consent of the members of the various Annual Conferences. These restrictions, when adopted, in 1808, were so stringent that on all matters embraced within their sphere nothing could be altered except by a majority vote of every Annual Conference in the church, and this continued to be the case until 1832. One of the restrictions, however, prohibited a less representation than one for every seven members. With the growth of the church the body became unwieldy, and the Annual Conferences agreed not only to alter that restriction, but to further change the mode of altering the Restrictive Rules, so that a change might be made in any of them by a vote of two-thirds of the General Conference, and of three-fourths of the members of all the Annual Conferences who should vote thereon. This change of limitation prevented the majority of any one Conference from defeating the will of all the others. Since that period no change has been made in the general economy of the church without a submission according to the Restrictive Rules. By this process the ratio of representation has been altered on several occasions, until now its limit is one for every forty-five members. By the same process the rule on temperance was altered in 1848, and the rule on slavery in 1864. In the same way the plan of lay delegation was voted upon, and introduced into the economy of the church; though in that instance, in addition to the vote of the General Conference, and of the Annual Conferences, the question was also submitted to the vote of the laity. The Restrictive Rules, as now constituted, are as follows:

"1. The General Conference shall not revoke, alter, or change our Articles of Religion, nor establish any new standards or rules of doctrine contrary to our present existing and established standards of doctrine. 2. They shall not allow of more than one ministerial representative for every fourteen members of the Annual Conference, nor allow of a less number than one for every forty-five, nor more than two lay delegates for any Annual Conference: provided, nevertheless, that when there shall be in any Annual Conference a fraction of two-thirds the number which shall be fixed for the ratio of representation, such Annual Conference shall be entitled to an additional delegate for such fraction; and provided, also, that no Conference shall be denied the privilege of one delegate. 3. They shall not change or alter any part or rule of our government, so as to do away episcopacy, or destroy the plan of our itinerant general superintendency; but may appoint a missionary bishop or superintendent for any of our foreign missions, limiting his jurisdiction to the same respectively. 4. They shall not revoke or change the General Rules of the united societies. 5. They shall not do away the privileges of our ministers or preachers, of trial by a committee, and of an appeal: neither shall they do away the privileges of our members, of trial before the society, or by a committee, and of an appeal. 6. They shall not appropriate the produce of the Book Concern, nor of the Charter Fund, to any purpose other than for the benefit of the traveling, supernumerary, superannuated, and worn-out preachers, their wives, widows, and children. Provided, nevertheless, that upon the concurrent recommendation of three-fourths of all the members of the several Annual Conferences, who shall be present and vote on such recommendation, then a majority of two-thirds of the General Conference succeeding shall suffice to alter any of the above restrictions, excepting the first article; and also, whenever such alteration or alterations shall have been first recommended by two-thirds of the General Conference, so soon as three-fourths of the members of all the Annual Conferences shall have concurred as aforesaid, such alteration or alterations shall take effect."

Resurrection.—The Methodist Churches, in common with orthodox Christians, believe in the doctrine of a general resurrection of the dead, which will come to pass at the end of the world, and will be followed by an immortality either of happiness or misery. The third article of religion thus speaks of the resurrection of Christ: "Christ did truly rise again from the dead, and took again his body with all things appertaining to the perfection of man's nature, wherewith he ascended into heaven, and there sitteth until he return to judge all men at the last day." The resurrection of Christ is believed to be a pledge of a general resurrection, as the apostle says, "He is the first fruits of them that slept." In the Apostles' Creed, embraced in the form of baptism, every communicant professes to believe in "the resurrection of the body and everlasting life after death." How a resurrection of the body can take place, or what specific changes shall be made on that body, we are not informed. It is a subject beyond the province of human reason, and depends wholly on revelation. That the dead shall rise is explicitly taught in Holy Scripture, for Jesus says, "The hour is coming in which all that are in their graves shall hear his voice and come forth: they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." That there shall be a great change in the human body is also taught, when it is said that "when he shall appear, we shall be like him," and he "shall change our vile body that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."

Revels, Hiram R., D.D., was born in Fayetteville, N. C., Sept. 1, 1822. Having a thirst for an education, and the laws of North Carolina forbidding colored schools, he went to Northern Indiana, where for some time he attended a Quaker school, and ultimately entered at Knox College, Illinois. At the age of twenty-five he entered the ministry of the African Methodist Episcopal Church. He filled a number of appointments in Missouri, Kentucky, Kansas, and Maryland. Being in the latter State at the breaking out of the war, he assisted in forming a colored regiment. He settled in 1864 in Vicksburg, where he had charge of a congregation, and assisted in organizing churches and in forming schools in various parts of the State. His health becoming impaired he went North, where he remained eighteen months. Returning to the South, he located at Natchez, and in 1869 was elected as a member of the United States Senate. After the close of his services in the Senate he returned to the ministry, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He is now (1877) president of Alcorn University.

Revivals.—In various periods of the church and in almost every country there have been seasons of remarkable religious interest, in which the public mind has been turned to spiritual subjects. Under such influences many who have been openly vicious have been reformed, and others who have been thoughtless and careless have become exemplary and active Christians. Methodism itself was eminently a revival in its origin. It was simply the earnestness of a few who were endeavoring to lead holier lives and to be more active Christians which directed first the attention of their friends and then excited their mockery and reproach. The year 1739 is generally regarded as the commencement of Methodism, yet ten years earlier Mr. Wesley and a few others were deeply exercised. He writes: "In 1729 two young men in England (meaning himself and his brother Charles), reading the Bible, saw they could not be saved without holiness, followed after it, and incited others so to do." After this followed the organization of what was called "The Holy Club" in Oxford University. It is a remarkable coincidence that in the same year when the Oxford Methodists were formed into a society the Rev. Jonathan Edwards, in New England, began to preach with great earnestness the doctrine of "Justification by Faith alone." The result of his preaching was a great revival of religion, which commenced at Northampton and spread over the greater part of New England. This revival was accompanied with intense awakenings, and the conversions were also marked with physical demonstrations. Numbers fell prostrate on the ground and cried aloud for mercy; many were convulsed and benumbed, and the physical manifestations were similar to those in England. The conversation of the people everywhere was on the subject of salvation; they met for prayer, singing, and reading the Holy Scriptures; the groans and sighs of the penitent and the joy and shout of the convert were quite frequent. During this revival their meetings also were oftentimes protracted for many hours. The ministers who engaged in this work in New England were censured and persecuted for their earnestness, and for their appeals to the emotions and passions of their hearers, rather than to their reason. They were censured also for preaching the terrors of the law, and for speaking of future judgment and perdition. They were also condemned for allowing their children to meet together to read and pray, and to seek the Lord in the days of their youth. About this period also a revival commenced in Wales, under the labors of Howell Harris, who afterwards became a friend of Mr. Wesley's, and a more intimate associate of Mr. Whitfield. At the time, however, of the commencement of the Methodist movement neither of the Wesleys had any acquaintance either with him or with Edwards.

In 1740 a revival commenced in Scotland, under the labors of the Rev. Mr. Robe, who preached earnestly the doctrine of regeneration. At one place, in 1741, sixteen children began to hold prayer-meetings, and the religious excitement became general. Cries, tears, and groans were heard, and in a short period, under the ministry of Mr. Robe, hundreds were converted in the vicinity of Kilsyth. Drunkenness, swearing, and other flagrant forms of curse were abandoned; meetings for praise and prayer were established, and the people flocked to the house of God. Young converts held prayer-meetings in fields, barns, school-houses, and elsewhere. In many towns of Scotland there were also the same physical demonstrations of crying, fainting, and even of convulsions, which were manifested in New England. Some were depressed, while others would break forth into rapturous shoutings, and their countenances were lighted up with serenity and brightness. Rev. Mr. Robe, in his narrative of this wonderful work, cites a number of precedents of similar character in revivals in Germany, and in the Moravian Church, and still farther back in the history of the Christian church. This religious movement or revival affected churches of all denominations, and while out of that movement Methodism, as an organization, remains the chief witness, yet its influence raised up in all churches a more earnest evangelical clergy. In America, about the year 1800, a remarkable revival occurred in Kentucky and Tennessee, which led to the formation of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. The people gathered in large congregations, services were continued through many days, and there were the same strange physical demonstrations which had previously occurred in Scotland, England, and New England. Since that period revivals of greater or less extent have marked the history of the church in many denominations, and have been very frequent in the history of Methodism. Oftentimes these revivals are simply local in their character, and individual churches are largely strengthened, without any general influence prevailing the public mind. There have, however, been some remarkable seasons, such as that between 1840 and 1844, which is alluded to by the bishops in their address to the General Conference when they say, "No period of our denominational existence has been more signally distinguished by more extensive revivals of the work of God and the increase of the church." There was also a remarkable work in 1858, spreading over Ireland, part of Scotland, England, and through the United States. In the last few years, under the labors of Mr. Moody, Mr. Sankey, and other evangelists, large protracted meetings have been held in the leading cities of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the United States. In later times there have been fewer physical demonstrations accompanying these revivals, but the public mind has, nevertheless, been very deeply moved.

Reynolds, George G., LL.D., was born at Amenia, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Feb. 7, 1821. He prepared for college at Amenia Seminary; was graduated at Wesleyan University, Middletown, Ct., in 1841; studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1844; and received the degree of LL.D. from Wesleyan University in 1871. He has practiced law since his admission to the bar, mostly in Poughkeepsie and Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1860 he was elected judge of the City Court of Brooklyn (a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with the Supreme Court in said city), and served a term of six years. Under a re-organization of the court he was re-elected to the same office, in 1872, for a term of fourteen years. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1843, and has held various official positions therein. Has for several years been one of the board of managers of the Missionary Society, and a trustee of the Wesleyan University. Was one of the lay delegates from the New York East Conference to the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876.

Reynolds, Rev. John, first bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada after the separate organization of 1828, was born near Hudson, N. Y., in 1786. In 1796 he removed to Canada, and in 1803 experienced religion under the labors of Nathan Bangs. In 1807 he began traveling under the elder. In 1808 was admitted on trial in the New York Conference, and sent with Daniel Pickett, who afterwards assisted in his consecration as bishop, to Augusta circuit. In 1810 he was admitted into full connection and ordained deacon. The War of 1812 intervening, he assisted Elder Ryan in keeping the societies together, but was not ordained elder, as there was no intercourse of preachers between the countries. In 1815, on account of failing health, he located. At the Hallowell Conference, in 1824, he was ordained elder by Bishop George. Resisting from the beginning the union with the British Wesleyans and the abandonment of episcopacy, he was re-admitted in 1833, by the rallying Conference of the M. E. Church in Canada, and was constituted bishop by the election of the General Conference and imposition of the hands of elders in 1835. In this capacity he served the church, though not always able to travel at large, till his death, in 1857. He has been succeeded by Alley, Smith, and Richardson.

Rhode Island (pop. 217,353) is the smallest State in the Union, and was the last of the thirteen original States to adopt the Federal Constitution. Its first permanent settlement was made at Providence, in 1636, by Roger Williams, who had been banished from Massachusetts for his religious and political opinions. The first Methodist sermon in this State was preached by Freeborn Garrettson, in April, 1787. He preached twice in Providence, and also twice in Newport. Services were regularly introduced by Jesse Lee, who visited the State in 1789, and writes under date of September 7, "To-day I have preached four times, and felt better at the conclusion of my labor than I did when I first arose in the morning. I have found a great many Baptists in this part of the country who are lively in religion. They are mostly different from those I have been heretofore acquainted with, for these will let men of all persuasions commune with them. I think a way is now opened for our preachers to visit this State. It is the wish of many that I should stay, and they begged that I would return again as soon as possible, although they never saw a Methodist preacher before." On this visit he preached in Windham, Norwalk, New London, Stonington, Newport, Bristol, and Providence. In 1791, Bishop Asbury visited the State and preached in Providence. It was also visited by Dr. Coke in 1804. In 1792 a circuit was organized, called Providence, and Lumsley Smith was appointed pastor. In 1793 Providence circuit was changed to Warren, and reported 58 members, with Philip Wager in charge. Among others who assisted in planting Methodism were Joseph Lovell, John Chalmers, W. Lee, D. Abbott, Z. Priest, and E. Mudge. In 1796 there were two circuits, with 220 members, and in 1800 three circuits, with 227 members. The first Methodist church edifice was built in Warren, and was dedicated Sept. 24, 1794. The growth of Methodism in this State has not been so rapid as in some other sections of the country, but it has had a gradual and constant increase. The principal part of the State is within the bounds of the Providence Conference, which also includes a portion of Connecticut and of Massachusetts. The only educational institution under the control of the church is the Conference Seminary, in East Greenwich. The denominational statistics, as reported in the United States census for 1870, are as follows :

Rhodes, P. T., a member of the Kansas Conference, was born in Ohio, May 29, 1820; united with the M. E. Church in 1840, and joined the Rock River Conference in 1849. In addition to filling various charges and districts, he superintended, in 1857, the erection of Hedding College, and planned and superintended, in 1863-64, the erection of Grand Prairie Seminary. He was a member of the General Conference in 1868, and transferred to Kansas in 1870. After filling both stations and districts, he was, in 1877, appointed financial agent of Baker University, the position which he still holds.

Rice, William, D.D., a member of the New England Conference, was admitted into that body in 1841, and, after filling a number of important appointments, owing to impaired health, he became, in 1857, supernumerary. He received the appointment of librarian in the city of Springfield, where he has since remained, occasionally filling contiguous appointments. He was a member of the General Conference of 1876, and was appointed a member of the committee to revise the hymn-book. To the duty thus devolved upon him he has devoted much attention.

Rice, William North, Ph.D., professor in Wesleyan University, was born in Marblehead, Mass., Nov. 21, 1845; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1865, and studied in the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale College. He was elected Professor of Geology and Natural History in Wesleyan University in 1867. He joined the New York East Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1869. He studied in the University of Berlin in 1867 and 1868, while on leave of absence from his professorship. He is editor of the Wes- leyan University Alumni Record, and is a member of the Connecticut Academy of Arts and Sciences, and of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

Rich, Hon. Hampton, a merchant of thirty years' standing, was twice elected to the Senate of Michigan. He has been long connected with the railroad interests of that State, and was the projector of the Lansing and Iowa Railroad, and president of the company. Having large experience as a legislator, and being thoroughly devoted to Methodism, he was elected to the General Conference of 1876, as lay delegate for the Michigan Conference.

Rich, Isaac, prime mover in the establishment of Boston University, and otherwise a munificent patron of education, was born in Welleet, Mass., Oct. 24, 1801, and died in Boston, Jan. 13, 1872. At an early age he went to Boston and engaged in business as a fish merchant, commencing, as his poverty compelled him to do, in the humblest manner. Religiously trained from his youth, he united with the church when about twenty years of age. His remarkable business talent, his winning personal presence, his honesty and application, gradually placed his house at the very head of the trade in which he was engaged. Meantime, death having deprived him of his well-loved children, he was not disobedient to the providential call to use his wealth and influence for the good of his fellow-men. Like many whose own educational advantages were limited, he felt a profound interest in providing better opportunities for those beginning life after him. To this form of beneficence his heart and judgment inclined more and more as his years went on. The successive disasters which overtook the Wesleyan Academy, at Wilbraham, in 1856-57, called out his first larger benefactions—at least $40,000—in this direction. A little later, upon the removal of the School of Theology from Concord to Boston, and in the efforts to equip and endow more adequately the Wesleyan University, at Middletown, Conn., his gifts to these were of munificent proportions. To each he gave more than $100,000, and at Middletown erected a beautiful library hall at an expense of nearly $75,000. His chief monument, however, must ever be the broadly planned university, which he created in the city of his residence, and to which he bequeathed the bulk of his estate, valued at the time of his death at more than $1,500,000. With characteristic modesty he declined to have the institution named for himself, and it was in entire accord with his feeling that it should be what it is,—the first university in the world organized from the beginning and throughout without discriminations of any sort on the ground of sex. Mr. Rich was a man of remarkable physical symmetry and beauty, ever unassuming, yet of unembarrassed manner, obliging, an humble Christian, a manly man. A good bust of him, by Milmore, is preserved at Middletown, and portraits were procured for each of the three institutes of which he was so notable a patron.

Richardson, Chauncy, of the Texas Conference, was born in Vermont in 1802, and died April 11, 1852. At the age of nineteen he was converted, and in 1823 was licensed to preach. In 1826 he was received on trial by the New England Conference, and after filling a few prominent appointments, was, on account of impaired health, obliged to locate. Visiting the South, his first residence was at Tusculum, Ala., where he aided in building up a literary institution. In 1839 he was called to the presidency of Rutgersville College, in Texas, and did much for that institution in creating for it a permanent basis. He was a member of the first Annual Conference in Texas, in 1840, and was also a member of the convention held in Louisville in 1845 to organize the M. E. Church South, and of its General Conference in 1850. He was successively president of the college, presiding elder of the district, and editor of the church paper called the Texas Wesleyan Banner. For several years he was secretary of his Conference. He was laborious, prompt, systematic, and exact.

Richardson, James, D.D., fourth bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, after the separate organization of 1828, was born at Kingston, Upper Canada, Jan. 29, 1791. He was trained as a sailor, and passed his early years with his father on the vessels on the lakes. In the War of 1812-15 he was made a lieutenant in the Provincial marine, and subsequently principal pilot of the Royal fleet; shared in the unsuccessful attempt on Sackett's Harbor, and in the capture of the fort of Oswego. In the last engagement he lost his left arm. At the close of the war he settled at Presque Isle, and was appointed a magistrate and collector of customs. Under the ministry of Wyatt Chamberlain, of the Genesee Conference, he was converted in 1817, and in 1818 he united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He became a steward, and was subsequently licensed as a local preacher. In 1825 he was admitted on trial, along with Egerton Ryerson, into the Conference, under the presidency of Bishop Hedding. In 1827, at the Hamilton Conference, under the same presidency, these two were ordained deacons. Of the Conference of 1828, that which determined upon the separate organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, Richardson was secretary, as also of subsequent Conferences. He was not ordained elder till 1830. Since the Canada Conference had not obtained the bishop of their election, and were careful to adhere to episcopal ordinations, in that year Bishop Hedding visited the country, and on the request of the Conferences performed the ordina-tions. In 1831 Richardson was appointed presiding elder of Niagara district, and in 1832 editor of The Christian Guardian. Having opposed the union with the British Wesleyans in 1833, he finally acceded to it, and accepted appointments under it. But subsequently, being dissatisfied, he removed to the United States, and was preacher in charge at Auburn. In 1837 he returned to Toronto and joined those who continued to adhere to Episcopal Methodism. In 1840 he was permitted by his Conference to serve as agent of the Upper Canada Bible Society, which office he held eleven years. In 1852 he was again appointed presiding elder, and in 1858, at the General Conference at St. Davids, he was elected and consecrated bishop, which office he held till his death, in March, 1875, at the advanced age of eighty-four years. James Richardson is remembered among his people as a patriot and a sage, and in his church as a faithful preacher, a prudent counselor, and a kind and good bishop.

Richmond, Ind. (pop. 9445), is situated in Wayne County, on the Columbus, Chicago and Indiana Railroad. The first Methodist itinerants who visited the eastern part of the State formed the Whitewater circuit, which embraced this region. The city first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1838, when John W. Sullivan was pastor, who reported for the circuit 182 members. In 1857 it had become a station, having 262 members, 246 Sunday-school scholars, and $7000 church property. The African M. E. Church has also a flourishing congregation. It is in the North Indiana Conference, and reports for 1876:

Richmond, Va. (pop. 51,038), the capital of Virginia, was founded in 1742, and in 1780 became the seat of the State government. Methodism was very early introduced into this city. It is first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1788, when Matthew Harris was preacher in charge, and Richard Ivy was presiding elder. Two families by the name of Parrott and Allen are supposed to have been the first Methodists that settled in Richmond. They were formerly Methodists in England, and came to America at the close of the Revolutionary War. The first place of worship was the court-house, which they continued to occupy until a charge was made against them of disturbing the public peace by their loud singing and shouting, and they were excluded from the house by the civil authorities. After this their preaching-place was in an open field in the suburbs of the city. Subsequently a barn or store-house was fitted up as a place of worship. The first efforts towards the erection of a church were made by Dr. Coke while on a visit to that city in 1796, but they were not successful. In 1799, Thomas Lyell began to raise subscriptions to erect a church, and succeeded in erecting a church on the corner of Franklin and Nineteenth Streets. At the Conference of 1800, Richmond reported 50 members. It was frequently visited by Jesse Lee, Francis Asbury, and other distinguished pioneers of Methodism. The Methodists of this city adhered to the M. E. Church South after the division of the M. E. Church, in 1845. Since the close of the Civil War, however, the M. E. Church has re-organized two small societies. It is in the Virginia Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Riddle, Findley B., a native of Centre Co., Pa., was born in 1830. He was educated at Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa., and at the Biblical Institute, Concord, N. H. He entered the Baltimore Conference, M. E. Church, in 1857, and at the division of that Conference fell within the East Baltimore Conference. In 1869, the Central Pennsylvania Conference being organized, he became a member by being on a charge within its bounds. In these several Conferences he has filled good appointments. In 1876 he was a delegate to the General Conference.

Riddle, James, was born in Parkmount, Antrim Co., Ireland, in April, 1803, and was brought up among the Covenanters, and was educated to oppose Methodism. He was led by a spirit of curiosity to attend Methodist service at a school-house at Ballycor, where a local preacher officiated, and was awakened and converted. He was finely educated, and afterwards became quite scholarly. He removed to America in 1827, and became identified with the cotton manufacturing interests in New Jersey and Pennsylvania. In 1844 he commenced business on the Brandywine, near Wilmington, Del., and in 1857 he became the sole owner of this immense establishment, now conducted by his son and son-in-law, where he accumulated considerable wealth. He was early licensed as a local preacher, and was instrumental in doing much good to the hundreds of operatives under his charge. He was one of the founders of the National Local Preachers' Association, and was its president in 1864. He exerted a wide influence in Methodism in Delaware, and during the late Civil War was a decided friend of the government. He was nominated, in 1866, as the Republican candidate for governor, and, although unsuccessful, he was far ahead of the ticket. For years previous to his death he was an invalid, and died of heart-disease, Aug. 21, 1873. He left a number of legacies, exceeding $20,000, to the M. E. Church interests.

Ridgeway, Henry B., D.D., a delegate from the New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, and an author, was born in Talbot Co., Md., in 1830. He was graduated from Dickinson College in 1849. He joined the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1851; was transferred to the Maine Conference in 1860, and stationed at Portland; was transferred to the New York Conference in 1862, where he filled some of the most important appointments, and was transferred to the Cincinnati Conference in 1876. He has contributed frequently to periodicals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and is the author of two works which have been received with great favor. "The Life of Alfred Cookman" and "The Lord's Land: a Narrative of Travels in Sinai, Arabia Petrea, and Palestine, from the Red Sea to the entering in of Hamath."

Riemenschneider, E., was born in 1815, in Kurhessen, Germany, and was educated in the Reformed Church. He came to the United States in 1835, was converted in Pittsburgh, and was the first who gave his name to start a German M. E. mission. He became a successful missionary among the Germans in the United States, and afterwards labored many years in Germany and Switzerland. He lives now as a retired minister at Berea, O., and is a member of the Central German Conference. E. Riemenschneider, Jr., Ph.D., of the Central German Conference, son of the above, is a very successful professor of Greek and Latin at the German Wallace College, at Berea, O.

Rigg, Hosea, a Western pioneer local preacher, was born in western Virginia, April 4, 1760. He was a soldier in the Revolutionary War, and when twenty-two years of age united with the M. E. Church and became an active exhorter. In 1796 he removed to Illinois, and settled in the American Bottom, in St. Clair County. It was then a portion of the Northwest Territory. A class had been formed some time before, but it had ceased its meetings. Mr. Rigg gathered together the old members, with others, into a class, and also organized another class in what is now Madison County. In 1798 he removed to within two miles of where Belleville, St. Clair County, now stands, and was the second or third settler in the entire region. Desiring the services of a minister, he went to Kentucky in 1803; was subsequently ordained a local preacher, and for a long series of years maintained a respectable standing as a local preacher and a useful man. He died at his residence near Belleville, Oct. 29, 1841, in the eighty-second year of his age, being at that time the oldest man in the county. He is represented as a man of deep and active piety, and though without much education, was exceedingly useful.

Rigg, James H., D.D., principal of the Westminster Normal School, England, was born Jan. 16, 1821. He was educated at Kingswood, where he excelled all his associates in mathematics, and had only one equal in the classics. He entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1845. In 1846 he became a contributor to the British Review. The controversies of 1849 engaged his attention, and he wrote successfully in defense of original Wesleyan Methodism. In 1850 he published his "Principles of Wesleyan Methodism," and the following year, "Wesleyan Connection and Congregational Independency Contrasted."

In 1854 Dr. Rigg removed to London, and became connected with the London Quarterly Review. His papers have contributed to the strength and celebrity of that periodical. His subjects are chiefly ecclesiastical and social,—as "Vocation and Training of the Clergy," "Defects and Remedies of the Established Church," "Kingsley and Newman," "Pauperism and Popular Education," etc. In 1866 Dr. Rigg, when elected into the legal hundred, stated that one of his principles as a Methodist had always been to maintain the friendly independence of Methodism as one of the churches of the land, "a church friendly to all, but owing allegiance to none." On the education question Dr. Rigg has always occupied an intermediate position, maintaining, on the one hand, that denominational exclusiveness would not be able to cope with the educational necessities of England; and in a published volume of essays he even indicated the general outline of the present mixed system of national education; while he has maintained, on the other hand, a position hostile to the principles and practice of pure secularism. His work on National Education is the most elaborate that has ever been published on this subject. Dr. Rigg has held the office of principal of one of the largest training colleges in the kingdom ever since 1868; and was a member of the first London school board.

Rinehart, William, was born in Alleghany Co., Pa. From early manhood he has been an active merchant in Pittsburgh, achieving good success, and establishing a permanent business. He united with the Methodist Protestant Church in Pittsburgh, Aug. 6, 1831, and has continued to be a member of the same congregation. He was fond of music from his youth, and was a member of the hymn-book committee which compiled the "Voice of Praise," now a standard in the church. Mr. Rinehart has attended several Annual Conferences and two General Conferences of his church as official representative, and is a member of the Board of Publication, in Pittsburgh. He is a director in the Morganza Reform School, and is trustee of many important interests.

Ripley, Allen P., D.D., editor of the Buffalo Christian Advocate, was born at Livonia, N. Y., June 1, 1818, and was educated at Genesee Academy and Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. He was received into the Methodist Episcopal Conference in 1839, and has done effective work for over thirty years; serving as presiding elder more than eight years. He has been a trustee of Genesee Wesleyan Seminary for more than twenty years. In 1869 he became editor of the Buffalo Christian Advocate, which position he now holds.

Rittenhouse, Aaron, was born in Northampton Co., Pa., March 14, 1837. He was converted and received into the M. E. Church Nov. 20, 1852, and licensed to preach Feb. 28, 1855. He was employed as a teacher in the Charlottesville Seminary, N. Y., and at the same time prepared for college, and graduated in the Wesleyan University in 1861. He was received into the Philadelphia Conference in 1862, having served under the elder the greater part of the previous year. Having served various appointments, at the organization of the Wilmington Conference he fell within its bounds, and in 1871 was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference. In 1876 he was appointed presiding elder of the North Philadelphia district, in which position he still remains.

Ritual, The, is a term employed to denote the prescribed order of exercises in any association, and as applied to the church, the order of religious worship and ceremonies. The ritual of the Methodist Churches embraces directions for public worship; for the administration of baptism, and of the Lord's Supper; for solemnizing matrimony; for the burial of the dead; for the reception of members; for laying the corner-stones, and for the dedication of churches; for the ordination of deacons and elders, and for the consecration of bishops. The chief part of this ritual was prepared by Mr. Wesley, and was adopted by the General Conference of 1784. A few alterations as to certain expressions have been made since that time; and that part referring to the reception of members, and the erection and dedication of churches, has been added. Methodists do not believe that any precise form of ritual is essential, but that it is necessary for the sake of propriety and order that some general and, as far as practicable, uniform system should be adopted.

Roberts, George, M.D., a distinguished minister, was born near Easton, Md., May 3, 1766. He became a minister in 1789, and his name first appears in 1790. Subsequently he labored six years in New England, both on circuits and districts. From that time he was stationed in New York.

Baltimore, and Philadelphia. In 1806 he located in Baltimore, where he remained during his life. When in Philadelphia he became intimate with Dr. Rush, and under his advice studied medicine, and after his location engaged in its practice. He died in Baltimore, Nov. 27, 1827. His death-bed was a scene of remarkable triumph. One night near his end he exclaimed, "If I had the voice of an angel, I would rouse the inhabitants of Baltimore for the purpose of telling them of the joys of redeeming love. Victory! victory! victory! through the blood of the Lamb!"

Roberts, George C. M., D.D., a distinguished physician and local minister of the city of Baltimore, was the son of George Roberts, one of the early ministers. He was early converted, and gave himself with great fidelity to the service of the church in its varied interests. He was always the friend of the traveling ministry, and took a deep interest in the improvement and elevation of his local brethren. He aided in establishing the association of local preachers and founded also the Historical Society of Baltimore. He devoted both time and means in making historical collections to illustrate the early history of the church. For a number of years he was chaplain in the military station at Baltimore.

Roberts, John Wright, late missionary bishop of the M. E. Church for Africa, was born in Petersburg, Va. He was converted while in the United States, and united with the M. E. Church. At an early age he emigrated to the colony of Liberia, and in 1838 was admitted among the missionaries in that country. He was elected by the Liberia Conference to elder's orders in 1841, and came to America and was ordained the same year. In 1866, pursuant to the special provision in the Discipline, he was elected to the office of missionary bishop. He was consecrated in St. Paul's M. E. church, New York, on June 20, 1866, and left for Liberia June 25. From that period he labored faithfully for the edification and enlargement of the church in the republic of Liberia and the adjacent territory. For some months he had been in feeble health; had arrived in Monrovia to find a vessel to attend the Conference, which that year was to be held in Greenville. It was found impossible to procure a vessel, and the place of meeting was changed to Monrovia. When the time arrived the bishop was very ill, and another filled the chair. He died Saturday, Jan. 30, 1875. "Bishop Roberts was endowed with excellent mental gifts, which, under the circumstances of his early condition, were exceedingly well trained. His grace of manner and his spirit were superior; a gentleman by nature and culture; a Christian in faith and life; he impressed most favorably all with whom he associated; and diligently and judiciously administered within the bounds of that portion of the church committed to his charge."

REV. JOHN WRIGHT ROBERTS.
LATE MISSIONARY BISHOP FOR AFRICA.

Roberts, Joseph J., ex-president of the republic of Liberia, was born in Petersburg, Va., in the year 1809. He was never a slave, his parents being free. He was fortunate in receiving the elements of a plain English education, and being thoughtful and very industrious, he engaged in navigating a small vessel upon the Appomattox and James Rivers. His mind becoming religiously impressed, he united with the M. E. Church under the pastoral care of white ministers. In 1825 his mother and the family sailed for Liberia, taking along with them the frame and materials of a house for their newly-adopted home. As soon as he reached Liberia he engaged in mercantile pursuits and was very successful, several times visiting the United States for supplies. Sometimes he chartered an entire vessel for his trading purposes, and his credit was of the highest character. For a number of years white men presided over the Liberian colony, but when the choice devolved upon the people, Mr. Roberts was elected, and for six years successively presided over the young commonwealth as its governor. In 1844 a gentleman of Canandaigua sent a silver cup to the church in which Governor Roberts worshiped, and inquired if he was a member of any Christian denomination. The governor replied, "I am happy to be able to inform you that I have long been a member of the M. E. Church,—upwards of sixteen years,—and have not failed to find support and consolation in the religion of Christ and the promises of the gospel." In his visits to the United States, he frequently addressed large public meetings, and his communications were received with attention at Washington. In 1846 the Colonization Society dissolved all political connec-

he received a pledge of $10,000 to purchase a tract of sea-coast from St. Mount to Sierra Leone; and the British government presented to the republic a small sloop-of-war. President Roberts, after having served creditably in the office for a second term, was elected president of the college which had been established under the aid and patronage of an American association. In every department he discharged the duties of his trusts with integrity tion with the people of Liberia, and in the following year, in convention, they declared themselves a sovereign state by the name and title of the "Republic of Liberia." The birthday of the republic was celebrated on the 24th day of August, 1847. On the 5th of the following October the first election took place under the constitution, and J. J. Roberts was proclaimed president for four years. President Roberts visited the United States and England to settle various questions of importance to the young and growing country; in each and fidelity, and has sustained an unblemished reputation both at home and abroad.

Roberts, Robert Richford, one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Frederick Co., Md., Aug. 2, 1778. About the age of fifteen he was converted, and became a member of the M. E. Church. After much hesitation, owing to great timidity, he preached his first sermon in 1801, and in the spring of 1802 was received on trial in the Baltimore Conference. After filling appointments in Western Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Ohio, he was sent by Bishop Asbury to Baltimore, where he reluctantly went, as he doubted his being suited to city congregations. From that time he filled appointments in Baltimore, Alexandria, Georgetown, and Philadelphia. In 1815 he was appointed presiding elder of Schuylkill district, Philadelphia, and, owing to the death of Bishop Asbury, he was elected to preside over the Philadelphia Conference in the spring of 1816. At the following session of the General Conference he was elected to the office of bishop, being the first married man in America who filled that office. The support being exceedingly small, he settled in the western part of Pennsylvania, upon a farm which he had owned, and traveled extensively from Maine to Mississippi. Subsequently he removed to Indiana and settled upon a farm near White River, and continued to preach, visit the churches, and attend the Conferences in all parts of the Union. Only a year or two before his death he visited the Indian mission work west of Arkansas. In the spring of 1843 he was seized with bilious fever, and died on the 26th of March. 'He was eminently a good man, full of faith and of the 'Holy Ghost.' He was a man of more than ordinary intellectual power, had been a careful reader, was a clear and forcible speaker, and often quite eloquent. As bishop he was kind and conciliating, yet firm and decided. His simplicity of manner, his great plainness, and his abundant labors greatly endeared him to the church."

Roberts, William, was born in Burlington, N. J., in 1812, and admitted into the Philadelphia Conference in 1834. He filled various important appointments until 1846, when he was selected by the Board of Bishops as superintendent of the Oregon mission. He sailed from New York in 1846, with instructions from the Missionary Board to explore California. He stopped six weeks in that country, and organized the first church in San Francisco, visiting San José, Monterey, and other places, and reached Oregon in June, 1847, taking the place of Rev. George Gary as superintendent of the mission work on the Pacific coast. In 1849, by direction of Bishop Waugh, he organized the Oregon and California Mission Conference, which was under his superintendency four years, when the Oregon Conference was organized by Bishop Ames. In 1856 he was delegate to the General Conference at Indianapolis. For the next three years he was agent of the American Bible Society for Oregon and Washington Territory, after which he was stationed in Portland, and served as presiding elder of Portland district. He is now (1877) in a superannuated relation on account of feeble health, thus closing forty-two and a half years of effective labor in the itinerant work. His present residence is Portland, Oregon.

Robie, John E., late editor of the Buffalo Christian Advocate, was born about 1817, and joined the Oneida Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1834. He began at Auburn, N. Y., in 1841, the publication of The Northern Christian Advocate, a paper which has since come under the charge of the General Conference as one of the official papers of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1843 he began the publication of the Genesee Evangelist, at Rochester, N. Y., but afterwards sold it to Presbyterians, and in 1850 started the Buffalo Christian Advocate, at Buffalo, N. Y. All of these papers were begun as dollar religious weeklies. In 1861, Mr. Robie transferred his paper to other hands and entered the army of the United States as chaplain of the 21st Regiment of New York Volunteers. At the close of the Civil War he bought back the Buffalo Christian Advocate, and continued its conductor till the time of his death. From 1866 to 1870 he was presiding elder of the Buffalo district.

Robinson, John Bunyan, A.M., president of Grand Prairie Seminary and Commercial College,

JOHN BUNYAN ROBINSON, A.M.

III., was born April 11, 1834, in Warren Co., O. He prepared for college at New Carlisle Academy, entered the Ohio Wesleyan University in January, 1858, and graduated in 1860. He was converted, and joined the M. E. Church in 1851: was licensed to preach in 1860, and became principal of Mount Washington Seminary, near Cincinnati. In 1865 he was elected president of Willoughby College, then in the bounds of the Erie Conference. In 1869 he became president of Fort Wayne College, Ind.

In 1871 he was called to the presidency of the New Hampshire Conference Seminary and Female College, Tilton, N. H., and in 1877 became president of Grand Prairie Seminary and Commercial College, at Onarga, Ill. In 1875 he published "Infidelity Answered."

Robison, James, was born of Scotch-Irish parentage June 27, 1812. At the age of twenty-one he became a subject of converting grace. In the fall of 1832 he connected himself with the Methodist Protestant Church, in Fairmont, W. Va. On entering upon his new life the conviction forced itself upon him that he was called to preach the gospel. Soon after joining the church he was licensed to exhort, and in 1837 was received by the Pittsburgh Annual Conference into the traveling connection. He has continued a member of this Conference unto the present time, serving several of its most important pastoral charges in Pittsburgh and vicinity, as president, and as active manager of the Preachers' Aid Society business. In 1872, upon the resignation of Ansel H. Bassett as publishing agent at Pittsburgh, Mr. Robison was elected to fill the place, and has been since that time twice re-elected by the highest authority of the church.

Rochester, Minn. (pop. 39,533), the capital of Olmstead County, is situated on the Winona and St. Paul Railroad. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1857, with S. M. Forest as pastor. It was that year made a station. In 1859 it had 63 members, 120 Sunday-school scholars, and $800 church property. The German Methodists have a prosperous congregation. This town is in the Minnesota Conference, and the M. E. Church has 295 members, 300 Sunday-school scholars, and $18,000 church property. The German M. E. Church has 103 members, 86 Sunday-school scholars, and $4500 church property.

Rochester, N. Y. (pop. 62,386), the capital of Monroe County, is situated on the New York Central Railroad, at the Falls of the Genesee River. The first Methodist class was formed in 1816, and the first M. E. church was organized in 1820, though the edifice was not erected until 1826. This was enlarged in 1827, and rebuilt in 1831. It was then 104 by 80 feet, and was built of stone. This church was burned in 1835, a debt remaining on it of $21,000, and no insurance had been effected. The church, though greatly crippled, rebuilt in 1838, and again in 1861. In 1836 a second society was organized on the east side of the river, and was called Asbury; the church edifice was dedicated in 1843. In 1852 an offer was made by a liberal gentleman, Mr. Champion, of $10,000 to any denomination that would erect four churches in growing parts of the city. The Methodists accepted the proposition, and that year Frank Street and North Street churches were organized, and the following year Cornhill and Alexander. These churches, having but few members, became very considerably embarrassed, and for several years the policy of thus enlarging was considered a very questionable one. They are all, however, now firmly established, though some are still struggling with debt. The first direct Methodist movement in the city was made in 1825, under the pastorate of Dr. John Dempster. Under his ministrations about 200 were added to the church, and from that time it advanced in strength. A church was commenced in 1848 by Rev. J. N. Sauter, for the German population of Rochester, which amounts to about 20,000. It was rebuilt as a beautiful church in 1876. There is also a parsonage for the presiding elder of their district. The Free Methodists have also a congregation. It is said that no less than twenty-five ministers have, from these societies, entered the different Conferences, some of them in the home and others in the foreign field. The city is in the Genesee Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Rockford, Ill. (pop. 11,049), the capital of Winnebago County, is a very beautiful city. It first appears, as a circuit, on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1838, with Leander S. Walker and Nathan Jewett as preachers. In 1840 it had become a station, with 186 members. In 1857 there were two stations, East and West Rockford, having an aggregate of 485 members, 464 Sunday-school scholars, and $20,500 church property. From that time the church has made rapid progress. It is in the Rock River Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Rock Island, Ill. (pop. 7890), on the Mississippi River, three miles above the mouth of Rock River, derives its name from an island in the river, owned by the national government. Methodist services were held for the first time by Asa McMurtrie, in 1834. In 1843 the first church was built, which was occupied until 1850, when a larger one was erected. In 1875 a chapel was built on Ninth Street to accommodate a mission Sunday-school, and in 1875-6 special services were held in the chapel, which resulted in the conversion of 40 persons, who, with others, comprising a society of 60 members, were organized into a church, taking the name of Ninth Street charge. In May, 1877, a third society was projected, and a Sunday-school of 100 members organized in the eastern part of the city, called Green Bush M. E. Sunday-school mission. The Swedish M. E. church was erected in 1824. The German and African M. E. Churches have each a society. This city is in the Central Illinois Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Rockland, Me. (pop. 7074), is the capital of Knox County, on the west side of Penobscot Bay. It has an excellent harbor and is well fitted for commerce. In its earlier history it was called the Shore Village of Thomaston, or East Thomaston. This section of country was embraced in the fourth circuit organized in the State, in 1796, which was called Bath, and the first preaching in Thomaston was June 11, 1795. Jesse Lee says, "The prospect of religion in that part of the country was very small when we first went among them, and the people who enjoyed religion were pretty generally opposed to us." A church was organized in 1831 by 31 members, only part of whom are now living. Shortly after this a house of worship was erected, and the church passed through a series of reverses and dangers until 1869, when, under the labors of Rev. George Pratt, one of the senior ministers of the Conference, the building of a new church edifice was commenced and carried to completion. The building is said to be now the best in Eastern Maine. The statistics for 1876 are: 209 members, 165 Sunday-school scholars, and $22,000 church property.

Rock River Conference, M. E. Church, was organized out of the Illinois Conference by the General Conference of 1840, and included "that part of the State of Illinois not embraced in the Illinois Conference," or the northern part of the State. It also included "the Wisconsin and Iowa Territories." In 1844 the Iowa Conference was separated from it. Upon the organization of the Peoria Conference, now the Central Illinois Conference, in 1856, Rock River Conference embraced all that part of the State "north of the Peoria Conference, so as to include the city of Peru, excepting that portion of Spring Grove circuit lying within the State of Illinois." The General Conference of 1876 fixed its boundaries so as to include that part of the State north of the Central Illinois Conference. This Conference held its first session Aug. 26, 1840, and reported 78 traveling and 108 local preachers, 6519 white, 21 colored, and 45 Indian members. In 1856, after the organization of the Peoria Conference, it reported 165 traveling and 228 local preachers, and 15,956 members. The statistics for 1876 were: 231 traveling and 248 local preachers, 24,916 members, 29,921 Sunday-school scholars, 251 churches, valued at $1,654,550, and 119 parsonages, valued at $187,800.

The Rock River Conference is in advance of its sister Conferences in the West in educational and literary interests. The Mount Morris Seminary was early established within its bounds, and educated a number of promising young men, who helped to give tone to the ministry of the church. With the settlement of Chicago, a number of its leading citizens resolved on the establishment of a university, and purchased property in the city, and subsequently on the lake-shore, some 12 miles from the city, where Evanston is now located, and erected the Northwestern University, which, in the amount of its property, is in advance of all the church institutions of the West. About the time of its being founded the Garrett Biblical Institute was planned and endowed, and annually sends forth from its halls a large number of educated young ministers. A seminary was also established, now called the Jennings Seminary, in Aurora, which has been instrumental in accomplishing great good. In 1852 the General Conference established The Northwestern Christian Advocate in the city of Chicago, and subsequently the large book depository was built, which has suffered reverses through fire and otherwise, but has been a centre of great usefulness to the church. There is published by it also a paper for those who read the Swedish and Norwegian languages. A somewhat novel feature was added to the Methodism of Chicago, in changing the old Clark Street church, which was located in the centre of the city, into a business block, reserving church room in an upper story. It was placed in the hands of a board of trustees, who, after meeting expenses of its own church, are to devote all its surplus proceeds to the extension of Methodism throughout the city.

Rock River Seminary is located at Mount Morris, Ill. It was founded in 1839: has a fine campus, and the buildings are estimated at $60,000. It is supposed that from its halls about 100 young men have entered the ministry, and more than 3000 students have been in attendance since its commencement. It now sustains a relation as a preparatory department to the Northwestern University. It has been for many years under the presidency of N. C. Dougherty, A.M., assisted by a corps of able teachers.

Rocky Mountain Conference, The, was organized in 1872, and included the Territories of Utah, Idaho, and Montana, with part of the Wyoming Territory. The distance between Utah and Montana being very great, and traveling being both difficult and expensive, the General Conference authorized the ministers to divide, with the approbation of the bishop, and in the session of 1876 the preachers unanimously requested the division. The Conferences are now called Utah and Montana.

Rodemeyer, A., is a member of the Germany and Switzerland Conference; he is editor of the Bremen Evangelist, and is author of a book on holiness.

Roebuck, I. H., a minister of the Wesleyan Methodist Association, England, was born in Leeds, Feb. 14, 1816. He received a liberal education, which he improved by laborious and well-directed study. He read the Holy Scriptures in their original languages, and made himself well acquainted with the most esteemed ancient writers. When about fifteen years of age he was awakened by a sermon preached in Park chapel, Leeds. After his conversion his thoughts were turned to the Christian ministry, and for two years he labored with great acceptance as a local preacher. When only nineteen years of age he was appointed to the Sheffield circuit, where he labored one year. In 1836 the Protestant Methodists, with whom he was identified, became merged in the Wesleyan Association, and Mr. Roebuck was appointed to Manchester, where he continued two years. While here he had a public debate with the veteran antagonist of Christianity, Robert Owen, the founder of Socialism. This system of the grossest infidelity was then rampant and making havoc of the unstable and young. The discussion excited intense interest, and the stripling warrior showed amazing skill. On his removal to Glasgow, in 1838, Mr. Roebuck continued his useful services against Owenism, and also conducted for a time The Temperance Journal, and in other ways helped the infant cause of Total Abstinence. In his ministerial labors he was much blessed. A gracious revival followed his entrance on the Glasgow pastorate. The youthful pastor attracted much attention. When rising into eminence and with the prospect of great usefulness before him, he was seized with inflammation of the throat, ending in quinsy. After a month's illness he appeared to recover, and resumed his labors, but his disease returned with violence, and on Dec. 20, 1840, he suddenly expired.

Mr. Roebuck was one of the most remarkable men that any of the offshoots of Methodism has produced. His intellectual gifts, his mental culture, his extensive reading, his marvelous self-possession, his ready elocution, his moral courage, all qualified him for eminent usefulness.

Rogers, Hon. Eliphas H., a native of New York, was the son of a member of the Genesee Conference, who at the time of his death, in 1872, was a presiding elder. He early settled in Nebraska, and has been prominently identified with its rapid growth. He is an attorney by profession, and resides at Fremont, where he has also been identified with banking. His influence has been given towards the strengthening of Methodism in that State. He represented the Nebraska Conference at the General Conferences of 1872 and 1876.

Rogers, Hester Ann, an eminently pious lady, born in 1756, who was converted on Mr. Wesley's visit to Macclesfield in 1774. She became deeply devoted, and assisted greatly in leading classes in exhortation, and in visiting the sick and poor. Her maiden name was Roe, and she was subsequently married to James Rogers, one of Mr. Wesley's ministers. She was a correspondent of Mr. Wesley, a number of whose letters were directed to her. Her husband and herself were present at his death-bed in London. Her journal and letters were early published, and have been read with religious profit by many thousands.

Rogers, William A., A.M., president of Dalton Female College, was born at Athens, Ga., in 1826, and was converted and united with the M. E. Church at the age of twelve years. He was educated principally at the University of Georgia, and choosing teaching as a profession, commenced in Monroe, Ga., in 1846-47. From 1849 to 1853 he was in charge of McDonough High School, and was president of Cassville College in 1854, in which position he continued until 1858, when he was elected president of Griffin Female College. In 1860 he was admitted into the Georgia Conference of the M. E. Church South. He continued in charge of Griffin College for eleven years. From 1869 to 1873 he was in Marietta Female College, and in the latter year was appointed to Dalton, where he is now president.

Rome, Italy (pop. 220,532), the capital of the old Roman Empire, and for ages the city of central power in Europe, has been termed "the Eternal City." It owed its preservation and its importance during the ages passed to the gradual development and supremacy of Christianity. Under the Roman Catholic system, the Bishop of Rome claimed supreme spiritual authority as successor to St. Peter. While this supremacy was denied by the Eastern churches, it was recognized throughout all Western Europe, and hence Rome was regarded as the centre of the Western Christian world. Being the residence of the Pope, all other forms of religion were strictly prohibited, and no Protestant worship, and not even the sale or circulation of the Holy Scriptures as published among the Protestant churches of Europe, was permitted in the city. During the war between France and Germany, King Victor Emanuel occupied Rome as the capital of Italy, after a brief resistance by the Papal troops. On the question of its annexation to the kingdom of Italy, the vote in the city of Rome was 4785 in the affirmative to 46 in the negative. Since that period Rome has remained the capital of Italy, though Pope Pius IX. issued a letter excommunicating all who had taken part in the establishment of the kingdom of Italy. With its new life Protestantism was permitted to enter within its walls, and various Protestant denomi-

Church service was established among the soldiers, and a military church composed of nearly 400 members was formed. For various causes this has since been transferred to the care of the Wesleyans of England.

The Wesleyans reported, in 1875, 62 members in Rome, which number has been largely increased since that time. The last report of mem-nations have established schools and religious services. Among the first to enter were the Wesleyan Methodists of England, who purchased a valuable property, formerly the residence of the secretary of the Inquisition, in a central part of the city, on the Via della Scrofa, where a handsome church has been fitted up and a book-room and publishing centre have been established. The Methodist Episcopal Church has also established a mission under the superintendence of Rev. L. M. Vernon, D.D., and a neat though small church building has been erected, called St. Paul's chapel, on the Via Poli, which has also a central location, and is the first Protestant church which was erected in the city. Under this mission of the Methodist Episcopal

Rome, N. Y. (pop. 11,000), the capital of Oneida County, is situated on the New York Central Railroad. This region was for some time included in the Oneida circuit, which was organized in 1799, and the circuit then had only 28 members. Rome, as a circuit, first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1829, with Andrew Peck as pastor, and D. Barnes as presiding elder of Oneida district. In 1830 it reported 146 members. In 1857 it had become two stations, having an aggregate of 312 members, 410 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property. This city is now in the Northern

New York Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876 :

Prior to 1838 worship was held in a school-house, and after that, until 1841, in the basement of the Presbyterian church. In the latter year the society built its first church, rebuilt it in 1852, and in 1868 built the present church and parsonage. It was commenced in September, 1840, and is for the benefit of the Indians of the Swamp Cree tribe, many of whom are fishermen and laborers in the service of the company. The settlement was made and the mission building erected under the care of Rev. Mr. Evans, who preached from the beginning of the mission to about 100 Indians. He also invented syllabic characters to facilitate the reading of the Cree language, and succeeded in casting type and printing with his own hand lesson books, hymns, and a portion of the Holy Scriptures. A school was also established by the assistance of the company in connection with the chapel, and the general progress was satisfactory. The accompanying out shows its appearance in 1850. In 1874 there were about 90 scholars in the day-school, and about 100 children in the Sabbath-school. It is an outpost, nearly 400 miles from the city of Winnipeg, and when visited by the chairman in the depth of winter, required a journey of 1200 miles going and returning, a large part of which was by dog-trains.

In 1844 he was elected editor of The Northern Christian Advocate, which position he filled four years. From 1848 to 1852 he was a member of the book committee, at New York. In 1867 he asked for a superannuated relation. The following year he was made effective, renewed his labors, and was soon transferred to the Oregon Conference and elected president of the Willamette University, at Salem, which position he held for two years. In 1871 he was elected by the legislature of Washington Territory as Superintendent of Public Instruction, which office he held until within two months of his death.

Rountree, John H., Esq., a distinguished lawyer in Wisconsin, who represented the West Wisconsin Conference at the General Conference of 1872.

Rowland, Charles W., an extensive manufacturer in Cincinnati, is largely identified with the interests of Methodism. He was lay delegate from the Cincinnati Conference to the General Conference of 1876.

Rowland, Thomas, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born in Manchester in 1792. He was converted at the age of thirteen, through the ministry of Rev. Dr. Bunting, and entered the Wesleyan ministry in 1813. He continued to labor earnestly and diligently in his ministry, occupying a number of important circuits, until 1850, when he became involved in the questions connected with the Reform movement. Refusing to apologize to the Conference for some of his writings which had appeared in print, he was first made supernumerary, and eventually expelled. He joined the Wesleyan Reformers, and for several years preached with acceptance among them. He attended the first Annual Assembly of the United Methodist Free Churches, which was held at Rochdale in 1857, and died in 1858. Mr. Rowland was not a man of eminent intellectual gifts, but the spirituality and unction of his discourses made him acceptable, if not popular, as a preacher.

Rowley, Erastus, D.D., president of De Pauw Female College, was born in Richmond, Mass. Having prepared for college in Wilbraham Academy, he entered Union College, N. Y., and graduated in 1834. Shortly afterwards he became principal of the Lansingburg Academy, and for two years after became professor in the Episcopal Institute of Troy. In 1839 he removed South, and took charge of an institute in South Carolina, and subsequently of Ashville Female Seminary, North Carolina. In 1858 he was elected president of Athens Female College in Tennessee, under the control of the M. E. Church South. In 1865 he was elected president of what is now De Pauw College in New Albany, Ind., which position he still holds.

Rule, William H., D.D., an English Wesleyan minister, has for more than half a century been the unflinching, unswerving advocate of Protestant and Scripture truth. He was first a missionary in the West Indies, then for ten years was stationed at Gibraltar, where he added to his store of learning much of practical observation, and has given the world the advantage in a long succession of unsurpassed contributions to Protestant literature. Since Dr. Rule returned to the English work he has traveled in many circuits, to the advantage of the people; was editor for six years; then for several years in the army and navy work. He retired from active service in 1868, and employs the evening of his life in literary work.

Rules of Society (English Wesleyan) are the same as the General Rules of the M. E. Church, except the clause on slavery. (See GENERAL RULES.)

Rusling, General James F., was born at Washington, Warren Co., N. J., April 14, 1834, and graduated at Pennington Seminary with first honors in 1852, and at Dickinson College with second honors in 1854. He was Professor of Natural Science and Belles-Lettres at Dickinson Seminary, 1854-57; at the same time he pursued the study of law, and was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1857. He became a local preacher in the M. E. Church in 1858, and was admitted to the New Jersey bar in 1859. At the breaking out of the Civil War he entered the army, in August, 1861, as first lieutenant, and retired in September, 1867, as brevet brigadier-general. He was in the army of the Potomac up to the fall of 1863, in the department of the Cumberland in 1865, and in the War Department to 1867. He was appointed United States pension agent for New Jersey in 1869, and was re-appointed until 1877, when, the agency being abolished, he resumed the practice of law, in which he still continues. He has written considerably for various periodicals: for the Quarterly Review in 1859-63; for United States Service in 1863-64; for Harper's Magazine, 1865-66. In 1875 he published a volume, entitled "Across America, or the Great West and the Pacific Coast," being an account of his travels when inspector-general in the United States army. He was president of Mercer County Sunday-School Association, 1875-76; has been a trustee of Dickinson College since 1862, and of Pennington Seminary since 1868, and is a member of the State Street M. E. church, in Trenton, N. J.

Rusling, Joseph, of the Philadelphia Conference, was born near Epworth, England, May 12, 1788. His parents early removed to the United States, and in 1808 he became a member of the M. E. Church. In 1814 he was received into the Philadelphia Conference, of which he remained an active member until his death, July 6, 1839. He was a faithful and successful preacher, and was remarkable for his executive ability, and his knowledge of and devotion to the economy of the church. He occupied the most prominent appointments of the Conference in Burlington, Trenton, Philadelphia, and Wilmington. For nearly twenty years he labored under symptoms of pulmonary consumption. In 1829 he established the first Methodist book-store in Philadelphia, and in which he placed the youthful Abel Stevens, who was then under his supervision and training. He published a few sermons and hymns for Sunday-schools.

Russel, James, a distinguished minister of the South Carolina Conference, was born in Mecklenburg Co., N. C., about 1786. He had limited advantages for education, and was admitted when about nineteen years of age into the South Carolina Conference, of which he continued a member until his death, in 1825. He was remarkable for his originality, for his powers of imagination, and for his studious habits. He exercised a commanding influence over the highest classes in society, and perhaps no man did more for the establishment of Methodism in Georgia than he. Dr. Olin said of his preaching: "The effect upon the congregation was often like that of successive shocks of electricity. I once heard him preach upon the opening of the books at the final judgment, when he represented the record of human iniquity in a light so clear and overwhelming, that the thousands who were listening to him started back and turned pale, as if the appalling vision had burst actually upon their view."

Russell, John, a minister of the Detroit Conference, was born Sept. 20, 1822, in Livingston Co., N. Y. He entered the ministry of the M. E. Church in 1843. He has filled several important appointments, was presiding elder six years, and was a member of the General Conference in 1860. For a number of years he has devoted his time chiefly to the temperance cause, delivering addresses and writing papers, and aiding in holding conventions. He edited The Peninsula Herald, and was nominated by the Prohibitionists for Vice-President.

Rust, Richard Sutton, D.D., LL.D., was born at Ipswich, Mass., Sept. 12, 1815. Left an orphan at an early age, he had but few literary advantages, and worked first on a farm, and then learned the trade of cabinet-making. Feeling a deep thirst for education, he succeeded in purchasing a portion of the time of his apprenticeship, and entered Phillips Academy, Andover, where he prepared for college. Under the influence of a lecture from George Thompson he united with an anti-slavery society, and being required by the faculty either to leave the society or the academy, he chose the latter, and finished his preparatory course at the Wilbraham Academy, and entering the Wesleyan University, graduated in 1841. While at college he paid his expenses by teaching and lecturing, and was one of the first anti-slavery lecturers in Connecticut, being on several occasions mobbed. In 1842 he became principal of Ellington School; in 1843, of Middletown High School; and in 1844 he joined the New England Conference. While filling prominent appointments he originated and published The American Pulpit, and subsequently he became principal of the New Hampshire Conference Seminary and Female College, and also State commissioner of common schools. He delivered lectures through the State, and did much to improve the character of the schools and of the buildings. In 1859, Dr. Rust was elected president of Wilberforce University, at Xenia, and was transferred to the Cincinnati Conference. Subsequently he was pastor of Morris chapel, Cincinnati, and was then elected president of the Wesleyan Female College, which place he held until the old college building was sold. He became corresponding secretary of the Western Freedman's Aid Society, and aided in the organization of the Freedman's Aid Society of the M. E. Church. For the last nine years he has been its corresponding secretary, in the duties of which he has traveled extensively over the country, and has organized and sustained a number of schools and seminaries.

Ruter, Martin, D.D., formerly president of Alleghany College, was born in Charlton, Mass., April 3, 1785. In his early youth he manifested an unusual thirst for knowledge, and in 1799 he was converted, and united with the M. E. Church. He was admitted, in 1801, into the New York Conference, having traveled a portion of the previous year in New England, under John Brodhead. In 1804 he was stationed in Montreal, Canada, but the following year returned to New England. In 1809 he was appointed to the New Hampshire district, and filled a number of the most prominent appointments in New England. In 1818 he was appointed in charge of the New Market Wesleyan Academy, subsequently removed to Wilbraham. In 1820 he was elected book agent, to found and conduct the book business at Cincinnati, and was re-elected in 1824. Before his term of service expired he was appointed president of Augusta College, which position he accepted in 1828, and remained until August, 1832. Desiring to devote himself to the ministry, he was transferred, and stationed in the city of Pittsburgh. When Alleghany College was accepted by the Conference, in 1833, Dr. Ruter was unanimously selected as president, and reluctantly accepted the position in 1834, where he remained until 1837, when he was appointed superintendent of the mission to Texas, with Lytleton Fowler and Robert Alexander as assistants. In July of that year he left Meadville, and in the autumn entered on his work in Texas. "He rode more than two thousand miles on horseback; swam or forded rivers; preached almost daily, and not unfrequently three times a day; shrank from no fatigue; avoided no hardships and no danger (for he visited some parts of border Texas where he had to be protected by an armed guard to secure him against probable attacks by the Indians); lived upon the rough fare, and slept in the still rougher lodgings of that wild and sparsely-populated region. He formed societies, secured the building of churches, made arrangements for the founding of a college, and laid out the greater part of the State into circuits." The following spring he started homeward for his family, and after riding about fifty miles he was taken seriously ill, and died in Washington, Texas, May 16, 1838. He was a very diligent student, a popular, instructive, and successful preacher, and was faithful in all the departments in which he was placed. He published a number of smaller works composed of miscellaneous articles, a "Hebrew Grammar," a "History of Martyrs," and an "Ecclesiastical History," and sermons and letters on various subjects.

Ryckman, Edward Bradshaw, M.A., of the Canada Methodist Church, is of German lineage. He was converted in 1854, while a student at Victoria College, and graduated in 1855 with the highest honors. He has filled a number of the most prominent appointments, having been for a term superintendent of the city of Kingston, and successively chairman of the Stanstead and Chatham districts. For two years before the division of the old Wesleyan Conference of Canada, he officially discharged the duties of secretary. In 1873 he was appointed principal of the Dundas Wesleyan Institute, and is now (1877) superintendent of Guelph circuit and chairman of Guelph district.

Ryerson, Egerton, D.D., LL.D., president of the General Conference of the Methodist Church in Canada, was born in Vittoria, Ontario, in 1803. He was converted about 1820; was classically educated, and was intended for the legal profession. Feeling it to be his duty to preach, and being needed in the ministry, he delivered his first sermon on Easter Sunday in 1825, since which time he has been identified with the ministry of the Methodist Church in Canada throughout its successive changes, and has been a leading minister in all the Wesleyan Methodistic movements. At the organization of the Methodist Church of Canada, formed from the Wesleyan Methodists, the New Connection, and the Eastern British Conference, he was elected to the presidency of that body, the position which he now holds. Early in his ministry he became a public writer, entering on the defense of the Methodist Church when assailed and deprived of its rights; a controversy which lasted for twenty years. He was the first editor of The Christian Guardian, which was the organ of the Canada Conference, and which was issued in 1829. In 1832 he was sent to England to negotiate for a connection with the parent body; and on his return he was re-appointed editor, in which office he continued for two years. After serving the pastorate for a term, he went to England and obtained a royal charter for the Upper Canada Academy, and again accepted the editorial chair in 1838. After two years' service he returned to the pastorate in Toronto, and was in 1842 appointed the first president of Victoria College. From that position he was called in 1845, by permission of the Conference, to be superintendent of education for the Province of Upper Canada, which office he filled without interruption for thirty years, and has been retired on full pay. He has been four times secretary of the Canada Conference, and has published

"A Manual on Agricultural Chemistry," "The Clergy Reserve Question," "Compulsory Education," etc. He has several times visited Europe, and has twice been a representative to the American and British Conferences.

REV. EGERTON RYERSON, D.D., LL.D.

Ryland, William, of the Baltimore Conference, was born in Ireland in 1770. At eighteen years of age he removed to America, and in 1802 was admitted into the Baltimore Conference, of which he remained a member until his death, Jan. 10, 1846. He filled a number of the prominent appointments in the Conference, and was elected chaplain of the United States Senate; was subsequently elected to the same office four times, serving once also in the same capacity in the House of Representatives. He was a warm and intimate friend of General Jackson, who, when he was President, appointed him as chaplain to the navy-yard in Washington, in which position he served for seventeen years.

Sacramento, Cal. (pop. 16,283). is the capital of the State, and is situated on the Sacramento River. Methodist services were commenced in this place by Dr. W. G. Deal, a local preacher from Maryland, who held services, but did not form any society. Rev. Isaac Owen having crossed the Sierra Nevada Mountains, arrived at Sacramento about the middle of October, 1849. A church building, which had been shipped from Baltimore, had been sent to Sacramento, and a lot had been secured. The week after the arrival of Mr. Owen the timbers were erected, and they occupied the church, though unfinished, and it became the centre of a work inaugurated by that indefatigable minister. The church has continued to grow from that date. The first California Conference was held in Sacramento, in 1853, by Bishop Ames. Services were also introduced by the M. E. Church South, and a building erected. The statistics for 1876 are:

Sacraments (Lat. sacramentum, an oath) are services of peculiar solemnity in the Christian church. In its earliest ages the word was used in a rather indefinite sense, to signify sacred doctrines and ceremonies, and then became applied to various rites. St. Augustine defined a sacrament to be, "the visible sign of an invisible grace." To this Protestants added that it must be instituted by

Christ, and enjoined upon his followers. The Roman Catholic and the Greek Churches include among the sacraments seven ordinances, to wit: baptism, the Lord's Supper, confirmation, penance, extreme unction, ordination, and matrimony. The Council of Trent pronounces accursed those who deny that there are "more or less than seven sacraments." Methodists in common with Protestants reject all but the first two, viz., baptism and the Lord's Supper. Nor do they believe that in these sacraments of themselves there is any inherent power or virtue, but that they are signs and seals of covenant blessings to be received by faith by those who truly participate. (See BAPTISM and THE LORD'S SUPPER.)

Sacraments (English Wesleyan Churches).—Those observed in Methodism are the sacraments peculiar to the Protestant Church, viz., baptism and the Lord's Supper. They are administered by those only who are in full connection; in cases of necessity, if appointed by the superintendents, the former ordinance can be administered in private by probationers. The liturgy of the Church of England, abridged by Mr. Wesley, is used, with hymns, prayers, and suitable exhortation, when deemed expedient. In public, the rite is generally performed before the sermon; and, as a rule, for the children of members of the society or congregation only. Both parents are expected to be present; and the minister is enjoined carefully to register the names. With respect to the Lord's Supper the same liturgy is used. It is only given to members of the society, or to those who have received a note from the officiating minister. In many places the recipients are required, according to rule, to show their tickets.

Saginaw City, Mich. (pop. 7460), situated on Saginaw River, is the capital of Saginaw County. A large part of its population is German. Methodist services were held here for the first time in 1834, as that year the mission was established, and occasionally after until 1851, when the first class was formed by C. C. Olds, which consisted of 4 members. The first M. E. church was built in 1854, and replaced by a new one in 1863, which was enlarged in 1867, and a lecture-room and class-room were added to it in 1872. It is in the Detroit Conference, and has 173 members, 175 Sunday-school scholars, and $12,000 church property.

Saint Alban's, Vt. (pop. 7014), the capital of Franklin County, borders on Lake Champlain.

Methodism was introduced into this region early in the present century, the circuits extending from the southern part of Vermont into Canada. Its progress, however, in St. Alban's has not been as great as at various other points in the State. The statistics for 1876 show 240 members, 204 Sunday-school scholars, and $19,000 church property.

Saint Charles, Mo. (pop. 5570), the capital of St. Charles County, is situated on the Missouri

Saint Clair, Pa. (pop. 5726), is in Schuylkill County, on a branch of the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1855, with Samuel W. Kurtz as pastor. In 1856 it had 93 members. It is in the Philadelphia Conference, and connected with Wadesville, and together they have 150 members, 396 Sunday-school scholars, and $15,000 church property.

River, and on the St. Louis and Kansas Railroad. This region was included in the early circuits of Methodism. St. Charles circuit was organized in 1832, and Jerome C. Berryman and Jacob Lanus were pastors, who reported, in 1833, from this large circuit 589 members. At the division of the M. E. Church, in 1845, the Methodists chiefly adhered to the Church South. The M. E. Church, however, has re-organized a small society. The German Methodists of this region continued to adhere to the M. E. Church. The African M. E. Church has a strong congregation. It is in the Missouri Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Saint George's Church.—This edifice, on Fourth Street, near Vine, is the oldest Methodist Episcopal church now standing. It was erected in 1763, by some members of the German Reformed congregation, who had worshiped at the corner of Fourth and Race Streets. They took up a lot on ground-rent and built the walls of the church, 55 by 85. Becoming embarrassed, they were for a time imprisoned for debt, and the church was sold under the order of the "Provincial Assembly." It was purchased by a weak-minded young man for £700. His father, chagrined at the purchase, and not willing to make a public exposure, sold it, November, 1769, to one of the Methodists for £650, Pennsylvania currency. When purchased, it had only the bare walls, without any seating, or even a floor. It was immediately occupied by the Methodist society; a small part of it being furnished with temporary seats to accommodate the congregation. In 1777, when the British army occupied Philadelphia, after the battle of Brandywine, it was made a "riding-school" for their cavalry. At the close of the war, a rough ground-floor was made in the east end; the other half of it being simply the common earth.

Bishop Asbury labored earnestly for its completion. In 1772 he raised £150 on its debt; in 1782 he took a subscription of £270 for its ground-rent; and in 1786 he was trying to raise £500 to liquidate the entire debt which was incurred for its improvement. About 1791 the galleries were finished; and in 1795, Bishop Asbury remarks, "to my surprise I saw the galleries filled." In 1798 he met with the trustees to raise a subscription to complete the church. Since that time the walls have been raised so as to make room for a basement and for other improvements in the church. It has been the scene of many excellent revivals, and from it have sprung, directly or indirectly, all the Methodist churches in Philadelphia. Interesting centennial services were held within it in 1870. It is the only Methodist church edifice in America which has a history of a hundred years.

Saint John (pop. 45,000) is the capital of the province of New Brunswick, Canada, and is situated at the mouth of St. John River. Methodism was introduced into this vicinity by some loyalists, who left the United States at the close of the Revolutionary War; they were in a few years supplied with ministers from England. The growth of the church has been more rapid in St. John than in other parts of the province. There are now six ministers and charges in the city, besides a city mission; and the church property is estimated at $124,000.

Saint John's (pop. 30,000) is the capital of New Foundland, about 65 miles north of Cape Race. Methodism was introduced in the close of the last century, but has made comparatively slow progress. It was for many years embraced in the Eastern British American Conference, but has been merged into the Methodist Church of Canada: New Foundland being one of the Conferences. There are now two Wesleyan churches, with three ministers stationed in the city. There is also a Wesleyan Academy.

Saint Johnsbury, Vt. (pop. 4665), the capital of Caledonia County, is situated on the Connecticut and Passumpsic Railroad, and has the largest scale manufactory in the world. Methodism was introduced in the early part of the century. It has had many difficulties to contend with, and its growth has been but moderate. The statistics for 1876 show 241 members, 219 Sabbath-school scholars, and $14,700 church property.

Saint Joseph, Mo. (pop. 19,565), the capital of Buchanan County, on the Missouri River, is the third city in population and importance in the State. A Methodist class was formed in 1843, under the pastoral care of Edwin Robinson. When the denomination was divided, in 1845, the Methodists of St. Joseph continued to worship together until 1849, when a Methodist Episcopal society was organized, and placed in charge of C. H. Kelley. The society then worshiped in a log church owned by the New School Presbyterians, and did so until 1851-2, when it erected a church of its own, and occupied it until 1863, when it was sold. The society met after that in the Cumberland Presbyterian church and in a hall, until 1866, when the present church was built. In 1874 a second M. E. society was formed, in South St. Joseph, which built a church in 1875. In 1846-47 the M. E. Church South built a church, and sold it in 1857, and built again. In 1870 a second society of the M. E. Church South was formed, and a church was built. In 1849 a German M. E. society was organized, and placed in care of William Eliers. In 1852 the society built a church, which was in use until 1858, when a new one replaced it. An African M. E. society was organized in 1864. The year after the society bought a lot, and in 1868 erected a church. This city is in the Missouri Conference, and the statistics are as follows:

Saint Louis, Mo. (pop. 310,864), the chief commercial city of the State, is situated on the west bank of the Mississippi River. The first settlement was made in 1664, by a company of merchants, to whom the exclusive grant for commerce with the Indian tribes on the Missouri had been given by the director-general of Louisiana. The first brick house was erected in 1816, and the first steamboat arrived in 1817.

In 1818, Jesse Walker, one of the earliest pioneers of Methodism in Missouri, resolved on planting the standard of the church in St. Louis, the Romish metropolis of that State. He engaged two young preachers of undoubted courage to meet him at a certain time and place to aid him in this difficult enterprise. "Punctual to their engagement they all met, and proceeded to the city together. When they reached it the Territorial legislature was in session there, and every public place appeared to be full. The missionaries preferred private lodgings, but could obtain none. Some people laughed at them, and others cursed them to their faces. Thus embarrassed at every point, they rode into the public square and held a consultation while sitting on their horses. The prospect was gloomy enough, and every avenue seemed closed against them. The young preachers expressed strong doubts as to their being in the path of duty. Their leader tried to encourage them, but in vain; and, taking their leave of Walker, they rode off and left him behind still sitting on his horse. Walker somewhat despondent and discouraged, said, 'I will go to the State of Mississippi and hunt up the lost sheep of the house of Israel.' And he immediately turned his horse in that direction and rode off with a sorrowful heart. Having gone about eighteen miles, he stopped and soliloquized thus: 'Was I ever defeated before in this blessed work? Never. Did any one ever trust in the Lord Jesus Christ and get confounded? No. And by the grace of God I will go back and take St. Louis.' Reversing his course, without rest or refreshment he entered the city, and with some difficulty obtained lodging for the night. The next morning he commenced a survey of the city and its inhabitants. Meeting with some of the members of the legislature who knew him, they said, "Why, Father Walker, what has brought you here?" He replied, "I have come to take St. Louis." They believed it a hopeless task, and tried to convince him that it was so, and remarked that the inhabitants were either Catholics or infidels, and very desperate and wicked, and that there was no probability that a Methodist preacher would have success with them, and they advised him to return to his family in Illinois; but Walker replied, "I have come in the name of Christ to take St. Louis, and by the grace of God I will do it."

He first preached in a temporary place occupied by a small number of Baptists. There were but few present on the first occasion. Nothing special occurring, he obtained liberty to preach again. At the next meeting there were indications of a religious revival, and the Baptists closed their doors against him. He next found a large but unfinished dwelling-house, and succeeded in renting it for $10 a month. With his own hands and by his own labor he soon fitted up a room for public worship. After completing his arrangements he commenced preaching regularly, twice on the Sabbath and occasionally on the week-evenings. He also gave notice that he would instruct all the children of the poor in reading and spelling during the week without remuneration. His plain, cheerful room was soon filled with hearers, and the school with children. But, unfortunately, soon his hired house changed hands, and he was notified to vacate it. He resolved immediately upon a plan for building a small frame chapel. A citizen owning land across the Mississippi gave him leave to take the lumber from his forest. Soon the chapel was raised and covered. The vestrymen of a small Episcopal church then without a minister presented him with their old Bible and cushion. "They also gave him their pews, which he accepted on condition of their being free." His chapel was finished and opened for public worship, and was soon filled. As the result of his first year's labor he reported to Conference a chapel erected and paid for, a flourishing school, and 60 church members in St. Louis.

In 1820, Isaac N. Piggott was appointed to St. Louis. In 1821 there were 127 members, and Jesse Walker was appointed missionary. This year a St. Louis circuit was organized. In 1822 St. Louis station reported 87 members, and William Beauchamp was pastor. This year the church did not make much progress, as there were only 97 members. Notwithstanding the difficulties, Methodism continued to increase in this city until, in 1844, there were 7 stations, having 1496 members. The division of the M. E. Church, in 1845, also divided the Methodism of this city, part adhering to the M. E. Church and part to the M. E. Church South. It remains divided, yet a more fraternal feeling is existing. Here the M. E. Church publishes The Central Christian Advocate, and there is also established a book depository. The Church South here publishes the St. Louis Christian Advocate, and also they have located here the Southwestern Publishing Company in the interests of that church. The German Methodists remained in 1845 with the M. E. Church, and now have four congregations. This city is in the St. Louis Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Saint Louis Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1868, and its boundaries included the State of Missouri lying south of the Missouri River, and the State of Arkansas. Previous to this time it had formed a part of Missouri and Arkansas Conference. In 1872 the Arkansas Conference was organized, and all that part of St. Louis Conference was excluded. No change was made in the boundaries of this Conference in 1876. It held its first session at Sedalia, Mo., March 10, 1869, Bishop James presiding. It reported 110 traveling and 269 local preachers, 17,088 members, 11,100 Sunday-school scholars, 67 churches, valued at $302,936, and 14 parsonages, valued at $26,875. After the loss sustained by the organization of the Arkansas Conference, there remained in the St. Louis Conference, in 1873, 127 traveling and 214 local preachers, 16,010 members, 9017 Sunday-school scholars, 109 churches, valued at $473,850, 36 parsonages, valued at $38,535, $2211 for missions. In 1876 this Conference reported 118 traveling and 198 local preachers, 15,914 members, 10,082 Sunday-school scholars, 136 churches, valued at $382,190, and 42 parsonages, valued at $37,953.

Saint Louis Conference, M. E. Church South.

—This was a new Conference organized by the Church South after the division of the M. E. Church, in 1845. Its first session was held at St. Louis, October, 1846. The report was: 63 traveling and 138 local preachers, 12,587 white and 1303 colored members. Since the first organization of this Conference the Southwest Missouri Conference has been organized, and has taken a part of the territory which had belonged to it. The General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries of the St. Louis Conference so as to "embrace all that part of the State of Missouri which lies south of the Missouri River, and east of a line commencing at the mouth of the tiasconade River, and following its course to the mouth of Big Piney; thence along the course of that stream to its head-waters, at or near Cedar Bluffs; and thence in a straight line to and southward along the east line of Range Eleven to the southern boundary line of the State of Missouri." In 1875 it reported 56 traveling and 87 local preachers, 10,421 white and 9 colored members, and 5610 Sunday-school scholars.

Saint Louis Depository of the M. E. Church is under the control of the Western Book Concern. From the time of establishing The Central Christian Advocate, in 1856, a number of books, chiefly for Sunday-schools, were kept on deposit in that place, but the General Conference of 1864 instructed the agents at Cincinnati to furnish books for the depository at St. Louis as they furnished them to other depositories in the church. In 1868 the agents reported that they had purchased property in St. Louis, and kept at that place a general assortment of books. They purchased, however, a lease, which was to continue in force about twenty-five years from the time of purchase. At the General Conference of 1876, the agents reported that they had purchased property on Sixth Street, 75 by 125 feet. After making some repairs, it was estimated to have cost the Book Concern $46,350, against which, however, there was a mortgage of $30,000. The sales of books and periodicals at St. Louis during 1875 amounted to $330,852, an increase over the preceding four years of $38,391. The sale of books alone amounted to $33,799. The agent is appointed by the book agents at Cincinnati.

Saint Paul, Minn. (pop. 20,030), is a large and growing city, and is the capital of the State. It appears on the minutes of the church in 1849, when Chauncey Hobart was appointed missionary, who reported for the following year 49 members. The church has increased with the growth of population. In 1858 it had three stations, having an aggregate of 227 members. A large proportion of the population is of foreign birth. Two churches have been built for the Germans, one for the Swedes, and one for the Norwegians. It is in the Minnesota Conference, and reports for 1876 the following statistics:

Salem, Mass. (pop. 24,117), is the oldest town in New England except Plymouth, having been settled in 1626. In 1692 the famous "witchcraft delusion" made its appearance, and nineteen persons from this and the adjacent towns were condemned and executed on an eminence known as "Gallows Hill." It was first visited by Jesse Lee in 1790. At his first visit he was permitted to use the pulpit of another denomination, but the following year was excluded. Bishop Asbury visited this place June 29, 1791, and says, "Here are five meeting-houses, two of them on the new divinity plan; that is, regeneration the first work; no prayer, repentance, or faith till this is accomplished. The other three belong, one to the Establishment, one Presbyterian, and one Friends' meeting-house. I found no access to any, and lectured in the court-house. I have done with Salem until we can get a better stand." The name first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1805, and was connected at first with Hawke, and subsequently with Saulsbury. It did not become a separate appointment until 1822, and reported the next year 33 members, after which it was connected with Marblehead. In 1857 it had become a station, having 152 members. It is in the New England Conference, and has, in 1876, two stations, Lafayette Street, with 291 members, 321 Sunday-school scholars, and $20,000 church property, and Wesley chapel, with 95 members, 105 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property.

Salem, N. J. (pop. 4555), is the capital of Salem County. In this place Methodism had very early an organization. Near it, in 1772, Benjamin Abbot was converted under the preaching of Abraham Whitworth. In 1773 a society was organized near Pittsgrove, of which Mr. Abbot was made leader. In 1774, Daniel Ruff having exchanged with William Watters, who was on the Trenton circuit, visited the town of Salem, and preached in the court-house. Among his hearers was Thomas Ware, then a youth, but who subsequently became a distinguished minister. The first church, now called Walnut Street, was built in 1784, and was the fourth that was erected in the State. In this church Benjamin Abbot was baptized. Although he had been converted twelve years previously and had commenced preaching, he had not been baptized, in consequence of the Methodist ministry having been unordained until that date. This church is now the parsonage. In 1838 a new brick church was erected, which took the place of the first. In 1859 Broadway church edifice was built, and the church was organized by 114 members from the Walnut Street church. A society of colored members was organized as early as 1799, which purchased a frame house, formerly used as a Baptist church, at Mill Hollow. It is now used as a school-house. The present church was dedicated in 1867. In 1820 a division took place among the colored members, which resulted in the organization of the African M. E. Church, whose house of worship was repaired in 1842. It is in the New Jersey Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Salem, O. (pop. 3700), in Columbiana County, is situated on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad. It was originally included in the Beaver, and afterwards in the New Lisbon circuit. Salem circuit was organized in 1840, with Martin L. Weekly and Thomas Thompson as pastors. It embraced a large extent of territory, and contained, in 1841, 505 members. In 1857 it had become a station, having 185 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and $2000 church property. Some years since the church had erected a large and commodious edifice. There are also two African M. E. churches. It is in the East Ohio Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Salt Lake City (pop. 12,854) is the capital of Utah Territory, and is the great centre of Mormonism. Methodism was introduced into the city by G. M. Pierce in 1870. He commenced the erection of a church, for which funds were collected in different parts of the United States, and which has been, through the special efforts of Rev. C. C. McCabe, of the Church Extension Society, recently finished. The edifice is centrally located; is built of brick in a good style of architecture, and is an ornament to the city. It will seat comfortably 1000 persons. When commenced the cost was estimated at less than $30,000, but the actual expense amounted to near $50,000. The church reports, in 1876, a membership of 117, with 267 Sunday-school scholars.

There is a second organization on Sixth Street, which reports 157 Sunday-school scholars.

Samoa, Wesleyan Missions in.—Samoa, or the Navigator's Islands, a group of eight islands in the South Pacific Ocean, lying between 10° and 20° of south latitude, and 169° and 174° of west longitude. They are about forty degrees southwest of the Sandwich Islands, and are in the neighborhood of the Fiji and Friendly Islands. They contain an area of about 1125 square miles, and a population of about 35,000. The inhabitants are of the Polynesian race, and were lately savages, but are now all converted to nominal Christianity through the efforts of the missionaries. They speak a language which is softer than that of the New Zealanders, but rougher than that of the Tahitians. Persons professing to represent the government and people of these islands have within a few years past endeavored to induce the government of the United States to annex them or take them under its protection. Their efforts were renewed towards the end of 1877. The islands were visited by a French vessel in 1787. Some of the men attached to the vessel were murdered by the inhabitants, who consequently gained a bad reputation. The devoted missionary, John Williams, visited Samoa in 1830, and left there a number of native Tahitian teachers. The London Missionary Society took up the work he had begun, in 1835, and having prosecuted it since with unremitting activity, has found Samoa one of its most fruitful fields of labor, and has witnessed the conversion of the entire population to Christianity. The Wesleyan missionaries had left some native Tongan Christians as teachers on the islands about the time of the occupation by the London Missionary Society, through whose labors several of the natives were converted. Afterwards a division of the South Sea fields of labor was made between the different societies, under which the London society were given the care of Samoa. The Wesleyan missionaries were withdrawn, but many of their converts refused to join the churches of the London society. The Wesleyan stations were accordingly re-occupied in 1857, with the consent of the London Missionary Society, and were placed under the care of the Australasian Conference. In 1876 the mission returned 48 chapels and other preaching-places, 3 missionaries and assistants, 11 catechists, 85 local preachers, 1297 full members, 620 on trial, 43 Sunday-schools, with 51 teachers and 1268 scholars, 41 day-schools, with 102 teachers and 1248 scholars, and 5197 attendants on public worship.

San Antonio, Texas (pop. 12,256), the capital of Bexar County, is situated on the San Antonio and San Pedro Rivers, on the Southern Railroad route to California. It partakes of the character of the old Mexican towns, and has largely a Roman Catholic population. Methodism has been but comparatively recently introduced. The M. E. Church South report for San Antonio station, 70 members and 3 local preachers. They have also a city mission and a Mexican mission. The M. E. Church reports 165 members, 175 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $7000.

Sanctification, as used in the Scriptures, conveys varied ideas. In the lowest sense it means to purify or cleanse, fitting the worshiper to come before God. "Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, and ye shall eat flesh."—Num. xi. 18. It is also used in the Old Testament to denote objects and persons devoted to holy service. In the New Testament it refers to both human and divine work in the restoration of character. Affirmed of God, it is the act of his grace renewing the fallen nature and purifying the heart; of man, it is the act of consecrating and setting apart for holy use. It is one with regeneration, in the sense that both are the work of God. It is one with holiness, for the same word translated holiness is also translated sanctification. When affirmed of the believer, it is the voluntary act of consecration that precedes the baptism of the Holy Spirit. When affirmed of the Holy Spirit, it refers to its work in the heart of the believer, or testimony given to the regenerate soul of its purity in the sight of God. The term is used interchangeably in the Methodist Church for holiness and Christian perfection. (See HOLINESS and PERFECTION.)

Sanderson, Daniel, an English Wesleyan minister, went to continental India in 1842. He made himself intimately acquainted with the language of the people, and wrote a grammar, which is now the grammar of the public schools; also a dictionary, which he is now enriching by a large addition. He returned to England in 1868, and was appointed governor of Richmond College,—which position he still (1877) holds.

San Domingo, or the Dominican Republic, comprises the eastern and larger part of the island of Hayti. The population is chiefly Roman Catholic, but other denominations are tolerated. There are a few Methodist societies, chiefly supported by negroes who emigrated, in 1824, from the United States. The Wesleyan Methodists for many years had a mission established in San Domingo, and reported from Samana 209 members. The African M. E. Church has also recently sent out missionaries to the island.

Sandusky, O. (pop. 13,000), the capital of Erie County, is situated on Sandusky Bay, 5 miles from Lake Erie. Methodism was introduced into this place in 1823, by Revs. Petty and McIntire, of Huron County. In 1828 the first church was built, being a plain wooden structure. In 1847 a second edifice was erected, which was burned in 1848, and rebuilt in 1850. This property was subsequently sold, and in 1874 the present house of worship was erected, of which the basement only has been finished. In 1830 a secession took place, which formed an independent Methodist society, but subsequently sold its property to the Baptists. A church has also been erected for the German population; and the African M. E. Church has a congregation. It is in the North Ohio Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	151	140	$22,000

Sanford, Peter P., D.D., was born in New Jersey in 1781. Early in youth he was the subject of deep religious convictions, and was converted at eighteen. He entered the ministry in the Philadelphia Conference in 1807, and was subsequently transferred to New York. He was a man of clear intellect, general reading, and was an able and successful preacher. He filled many important stations, and from 1816 to 1852 he was elected delegate to every General Conference. He died Jan. 14, 1857.

San Francisco, Cal. (pop. 149,473), is the largest city on the Pacific coast of North America, and is situated on a beautiful bay, which affords extensive facilities for commerce. It has grown rapidly, and the population has largely increased since 1870, so that it now numbers probably 250,000. Methodism was introduced in 1847, into the village then called Yerba Buena, which was a collection of small adobe buildings, but the name was shortly after changed to San Francisco. Rev. William Roberts, of the New Jersey Conference, and Rev. J. H. Wilbur, of the Black River Conference, who were on their way to engage in the mission in Oregon, were detained in California for some weeks, and spent two Sabbaths preaching in San Francisco. They organized a class of six persons, who had been Methodists in other countries. A Sunday-school was also commenced. This was the first Protestant organization on the Pacific coast south of the Oregon mission. In the fall of that year John Truebody and family arrived in the city, and united with the class. In 1859, Rev. William Taylor, of the Baltimore Conference, sailed for San Francisco, by way of Cape Horn, taking with him a small church which had been purchased. In the mean time, Mr. Roberts had timbers split, hewed, and prepared for the erection of a church, which he shipped from Oregon to San Francisco. A lot was purchased on Powell Street, and services were held in a tent until the church was erected. From that time other ministers arrived in the Territory, and in August, 1851, the first annual meeting convened in San Francisco, William Roberts presiding; and on the 10th day of October of that year, the first number of the California Christian Advocate was issued in that city. The General Conference in 1852 having constituted the California Conference, its first Conference was held by Bishop Ames, in the church on Powell Street, when thirty-five preachers were present. In 1860 provision was made for establishing a book depository, and a lot was secured, and the business was opened by Rev. E. Thomas, then editor of the California Christian Advocate. The Chinese mission was opened by Rev. Otis Gibson in 1868. (See CHINESE MISSION.) The M. E. Church South also organized a congregation, and established a religious journal. There is also an African Methodist society. It is in the California Conference, and reported, in 1876, as follows:

San Francisco Book Depository was established by the book agents of New York, in accordance with the direction of the General Conference of 1860. A lot was purchased and a substantial brick edifice was erected, which was valued at $21,000. From 1864 to 1872 the business was done on the gold basis, and the sales amounted to $74,462.28. A few years since the property of the depository on Mission Street was sold, and a more eligible location was selected, having a front of 25 feet on Market Street, between Sixth and Seventh, and the depth of 165 feet, extending through to Stevenson Street, and a building was erected in which the California Christian Advocate is published. The depository had been previously removed to a rented store on Market Street, but will ultimately be removed to a building which is to be erected on the above lot before the present lease expires. The sales for four years prior to 1876 amounted to $71,596.77. With the limited population in California, and the comparatively small membership of the church, the business of the depository is scarcely sufficient to meet all the expenses.

San Jose, Cal. (pop. 9089), is the capital of Santa Clara County, on the Central Pacific Railroad, and is 7 miles from San Francisco Bay. It was one of the first appointments organized by the missionaries, who visited California in 1849, and in 1851, at the organization of the Oregon and California Conference, reported 117 members. In 1857 it had become a station, with 75 members and $4500 church property. The Germans have also organized an M. E. Church. The M. E. Church South introduced services at an early period and have a strong society. It is in the California Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Sankey, Ira David, a distinguished singer, was born at Edinburgh, Lawrence Co., Pa., Aug. 28, IRA DAVID SANKEY.

1840. He was trained in business at New Castle, Pa., where he attended Sabbath-school, and where he was converted and united with the M. E. Church. He took an active interest in the Young Men's Christian Association, and joined Mr. Moody in evangelical work in Chicago, Ill. They labored together in Great Britain in 1873-75, when they returned to the United States and commenced preaching and conducting religious services to vast audiences. Mr. Sankey has written a number of popular tunes, and, with Mr. Bliss and others, has published several tune-books. He sings with remarkable effect to large masses, and has been an efficient agent in those wonderful revivals which have attended the meetings conducted by Mr. Moody and himself.

Saratoga, N. Y. (pop. 7516), is famous for its springs of mineral water, and is situated in Saratoga County, north of Albany. A cirenit called Saratoga was organized in 1791, but took its name from the county. Methodist services were not introduced into the town until 1829, when Rev. Mr. Stebbins occasionally preached in the place, there being then but two resident Methodists. In 1830, under the ministry of Dr. Samuel Luckey, the first M. E. church edifice was erected. The oldest newspaper known bears date June 26, 1831, and contains the names of five men and twelve women, among whom was Rev. J. B. Moriarty, to whom the early success of the church was greatly owing. In the summer of 1838 he called together in his parlor a number of Methodists, who were his guests, and proposed the erection of a new church. Among these guests were Nathan Bangs, H. B. Bascom, Abel Stevens, and others. The result of the conference was the erection of a second edifice, which was dedicated July 23, 1841. With the growth of the place a new church building became a necessity, and the present new and spacious edifice was dedicated by Bishop Janes in 1871. Owing to financial depression and failures this church, which cost $125,000, has been heavily embarrassed. The first Sunday-school was organized in 1831. There are now two flourishing schools. The Free Methodists organized a small society in 1865, and erected an edifice in 1869. The African Zion church was organized in 1862, and an old building was purchased and converted into a meeting-house. This was burned in the fall of 1867, and was rebuilt in 1868. It is in the Troy Conference, and the statistics for 1876 were as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Sargent, Edward, was for many years engaged extensively in the book trade in Cincinnati. He was the son of Dr. Sargent, an eminent minister in the East. He early united with the M. E. Church, and has filled many official positions. Within a few years, owing to impaired health, he retired from business, and has a beautiful residence on Walnut Hills; of which church he is an official and active member. He has been a liberal contributor to the Cincinnati Female College and other educational and benevolent objects.

Sargent, Thomas B., D.D., was the son of Dr. Thomas F. Sargent, of the Philadelphia Conference, and was received into that Conference in 1825. Having graduated as elder in 1829, he was transferred to Baltimore Conference, of which he long remained a member, filling many of the most prominent appointments. In 1842 he was selected by Bishop Soule as his traveling companion on his official visit to the English and Irish Conferences. He remained a member of the Baltimore Conference until, at the breaking out of the war, he identified himself with the Southern branch, and is now (1877) a minister of the M. E. Church South.

Saugerties, N. Y. (pop. 3731), is situated in Ulster County, on the west bank of the Hudson River. It was formerly connected with the Kingston circuit. In 1831 Catskill and Syracuse were united in one charge, and in 1832 reported 435 members. In 1858 it had become a station, with 298 members, and church property valued at $5500. It is in the New York Conference, and the M. E. Church, in 1876, reports 470 members, 210 Sunday-school scholars, and $13,000 church property.

Sauter, John Nepomuck, was born in Tettengang, Württemberg, May 18, 1812, and died at Poughkeepsie, March 24, 1874. He was a papist, and came to Baltimore in 1834, where he was converted. He was licensed to preach in Wheeling, Va., and in 1844 was sent to Rahway, N. J., where the Graw family was converted, whose two sons, John Graw and Jacob Graw, D.D., are now members of New Jersey Conference. He was the successful founder of the German churches of Newark, Buffalo, and Rochester, and from 1854 to 1858 he was presiding elder in the Eastern German work. He was a loving disciple of Christ, a very faithful missionary, whose memory is very blessed in the German churches.

Savannah, Ga. (pop. 28,235).—In 1733 a colony from England, under the lead of Governor Oglethorpe, landed on the high bluff now known as Savannah. With this colony came a clergyman of the English Episcopal Church. A second body of emigrants came from Germany who had been Catholics, but in a revival of religion had been converted, and as the result suffered severe persecution from the Romish priests. The Society for the Promotion of the Gospel in Foreign Parts heard of it and offered them a settlement in Georgia. A third colony followed, of Scotch Highlanders, and a fourth, of Moravians, with whom John Wesley sailed in 1735. Mr. Wesley remained but two years. It was then visited by Whitefield, who founded the Savannah Orphan House. In 1790, Hope Hull was appointed as preacher to Savannah, but meeting with mob violence, left without success. In 1796, Washington Jackson and Josiah Randall visited the place, but were driven away. In 1800 another attempt was made to collect a society, but failed. In 1806, Samuel Dunwoody, of the South Carolina Conference, volunteered to engage in this work. "He hired a small room; taught a school for his living, and began to preach almost exclusively to the family where he resided, and to the Alms-House and the Hospital." Jesse Lee visited the city in 1807, and writes under date of 19th of April, "At night, at Mr. Myer's, I preached. I had a crowded house, and more attended than could get in; many were forced to remain out-of-doors. . . . After I dismissed the congregation, I requested all that had been Methodists in other places and wished again to be in society with us to remain. I took four of them into a class. This was the first class formed in Savannah." In 1812, after a severe struggle, by obtaining pecuniary aid from abroad, a church was erected called Wesley chapel, which was dedicated by Bishop Asbury. In 1845 the society adhered to the Church South, and then numbered 347 members. This remained the only Methodist denomination until the close of the Civil War. Since that period the M. E. Church has been partially organized, and the African churches have formed large congregations. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Savannah Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1876 out of the Georgia Conference, and consisted of Fremont, Macon, Augusta, and Savannah districts. It held its first session in Augusta, Ga., Nov. 1, 1876, Bishop Scott presiding. There were stationed at this Conference, including presiding elders, 60 preachers. There were reported 149 local preachers, 12,881 members, 6931 Sunday-school scholars, 146 churches, valued at $94,345, and 14 parsonages, valued at $4790.

Saxe, Alfred, late professor in Wesleyan University, was born at Sheldon, Vt., Sept. 5, 1813, and died in Sheldon, Vt., Oct. 8, 1846. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1838, and engaged in teaching as the principal of the Middletown, Conn., Preparatory School. In 1841 he was appointed Professor of Normal Instruction in Wesleyan University. He joined the Troy Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1843, and engaged in preaching, but was obliged by ill health to give it up, and returned to his home a short time before his death.

Scandinavian Domestic Missions in the United States.—In 1845 the Asbury society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the city of New York, bought from the Wesleyans the Bethel ship John Wesley, which, lying at one of the docks of the North River, had been used by them as a mission station. In the same year the North River mission was established by the mission committee of the New York Conference, and the Rev. O. G. Hedstrom was appointed as its missionary. The station was at the Bethel ship. Mr. Hedstrom began his labors on the 5th of May, 1845. The order of the Sunday services provided for preaching in the Swedish language at the morning hour, in German in the afternoon, and in English in the evening. The mission in a short time became a centre of attraction to the Scandinavian sailors and immigrants who arrived at the port of New York, and Pastor Hedstrom was instrumental in settling several families in the Mississippi valley. Thus, as Methodism was, on one side, carried by returning sailors from the Bethel ship to the Scandinavian countries, so, on the other side, it was carried from the same spot by these families, and these converts of the mission who went as evangelists to their countrymen, to the growing Scandinavian settlements in the Northwest. In 1849 a Scandinavian mission was organized in the Rock River Conference. In the next year four such missions were represented in the reports: the first in the New York Conference, the second in the Rock River Conference, the third in Iowa, and the fourth—a Norwegian mission—in Wisconsin. Together, they returned 6 missionaries, 338 members, and 1 Sunday-school, with 42 scholars. In 1853 there were returned 2 Swedish missions, with 5 missionaries, 316 members, and 70 probationers, and 2 Norwegian missions, with 4 missionaries, 139 members, and 30 probationers. In the same year, Pastor Hedstrom, under instructions from Bishop Waugh, visited the Scandinavians settled along the shore of Lake Erie, westward from Buffalo, after which arrangements were made for the enlargement of the work and its more systematic prosecution. It was divided into three fields, of which the centre of one was in Chicago, another was in the Rock River district, and the third embraced the shore of Lake Erie. The report for 1855 gave returns from missions in the Rock River district, at Chicago, in the Erie and Iowa Conferences, at Milwaukee (Norwegian) and Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, in Minnesota, and from a Norwegian mission in the Iowa Conference, with a total of 18 missionaries, 690 members, 288 probationers, and 8 local preachers. In 1860 two presiding elder's districts, one Swedish and one Norwegian, had been established in the Northwest, and missions were in operation in the New York, Erie, Peoria, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Upper Iowa, and West Wisconsin Conferences, with a total of 33 missionaries, 1052 members, 378 probationers, 9 local preachers, 14 churches, valued at $34,400, 4 parsonages, valued at $1600, and the missionary collections of the missions amounted to $469.43. In 1866-67, the year of the centenary of American Methodism, the members of the churches connected with the missions made an extraordinary effort to make a centenary offering of $25,000 towards founding a school in which to educate their young ministers. A chair was afterwards established in the Northwestern University, at Evanston, Ill., for the benefit of Scandinavian youth, and this was followed by the foundation of a biblical school at Galesburg, Ill. The report of 1867 gave returns representing missions in the Central Illinois, Erie, Minnesota, New York, and West Wisconsin Conferences, with a total of 37 preachers, 2077 members, 413 probationers, 32 local preachers, 35 churches, valued at $61,650, 13 parsonages, valued at $6300, 24 Sunday-schools, with 949 scholars, and a total of $1419.33 of missionary collections. In 1871 six of the appointments, four in the Central Illinois Conference and two in the Wisconsin Conference, were returned as self-supporting. In 1872 returns were given classified according to nationalities, of which the summary is as follows: Swedish, 33 missionaries, 2838 members, 586 probationers, 35 local preachers, 30 churches, valued at $118,800, 17 parsonages, valued at $15,000, and missionary collections of $1145.20; Norwegian and Danish, 22 missionaries, 1237 members, 174 probationers, 16 local preachers, 16 churches, valued at $55,050, 10 parsonages, valued at $12,900, and missionary collections of $714.60. The following is a summary of the statistics of the Scandinavian domestic missions as presented in the report for 1876:

Scandinavian Languages and Missionary Literature.—The Scandinavian languages form a branch of the Aryan or Indo-Germanic family of languages. They are derived from the ancient Norse tongue, with which they have incorporated some Germanic elements. A similarity of composition and structure pervades them, so that persons accustomed to use either of them find but little difficulty in understanding those who speak another. The principal Scandinavian tongues are the Swedish and Danish. The Swedish is spoken in Sweden, the Danish is used in Denmark, Iceland, and the Danish colonies, and is the language of society, the press, and the public schools in Norway. Both languages have received high literary development, and are represented by many well-known works in all departments of literature and science.

The publication of Methodist works in the Scandinavian language appears to have begun with the translations of Wesley's Sermons and several small tracts, which were made in connection with the Methodist Episcopal mission at New York in 1854. The corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society, in his report of the visit which he paid to the European Scandinavian missions in 1866, mentioned the want of a Methodist literature in the languages of the countries as the chief obstacle in the way of their success. The preachers suffered much on account of this deficiency, having only the Danish translation of Ralston's "Divinity," by Mr. Willerup, as their guide in theological studies. There were also available for the general use of the mission at that time nine small tracts on experimental and practical religion. The Tract Society and Sunday-School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church had made grants of money to enable the missions to enlarge the list of books. A period of literary activity dates from this time. In September, 1868, the preachers' meeting at Stockholm, Sweden, resolved to publish a monthly religious paper, and to begin the translation and publication of several standard and other works suitable for the use of the ministers and members. The paper, the Lilla Sandebudet, or Little Messenger, was begun in 1869, with a list of 408 subscribers, which had increased by 1875 to 3943. In 1869 the missionaries in Sweden, by the aid of the Tract Society, published editions of from 1000 to 3000 copies each of Fletcher's "Christian Perfection," Wesley's sermon on "The Lord our Righteousness," the works "Reasons for being a Methodist" and "What is Methodism?" and a "Hymn-Book for the Sunday-School." The publication of these and other works was continued until in the fall of 1873, with the help of gifts and loans from the members of the mission churches, types and presses were purchased, and a publishing-house, the Wesleyana, was established at Gothenburg. This establishment was valued, in October, 1874, at $12,000, gold, of which $4000 were still owing. During the first year of its operation, besides two periodicals, the Lilla Sandebudet and a Sunday-school paper (the Sondags Skol Klockan, or Sunday-School Bell, published in co-operation with the Sunday-School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church), there were published from the press twenty books and pamphlets and twenty-six different tracts. The total amount of publications during 1874 was 1,500,000 pages of books and tracts. In 1875 thirty general tracts were published, besides special tracts on the "Holy Supper and Redemption," and an edition of Mr. Wesley's sermon on "Evil Speaking," with a total of 107,000 copies and 795,000 pages. A report made by the trustees of the publishing-house to the General Conference of 1876 mentioned as among the larger works which had been published down to February of that year, "Wesley's Sermons," first volume, "The Discipline" of 1872, Fletcher's "Christian Perfection" (two editions), the "Hymn-Book" (three editions), "Reasons for becoming a Methodist" (two editions), Nast's "Catechisms," smaller and larger, the "Sunday-School Hymn-Book" (four editions), and some twenty smaller books, mostly for Sunday-schools. The total number of publications, excluding more than 200,000 copies of periodicals and tracts, was 105,000 copies. An edition of Young's abridged edition of Clarke's "Commentary" on the New Testament was in preparation, to be published by subscription. Real estate had been bought at Gothenburg for the use of the Wesleyana and of the church at that place. The assets of the concern were valued at $22,784.87, and its liabilities were estimated at $13,772.50.

The missions in Denmark and Norway have also been aided by small appropriations from the Sunday-School Union and the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The missionaries using the language of those countries still report a deficiency of works suitable for their Sunday-schools. The Rev. Karl Schon, of the mission in Denmark, in 1873, began to translate a new Sunday-school song for every Sunday, intending to continue until he got a good collection, when he would publish the whole in book-form. A weekly Sunday-school paper, Der Lilla Børnereen, or The Children's Little Friend, was begun at Christiania, Norway, in 1873. A similar paper was published in connection with the Sunday-schools in Denmark in 1874.

A journal called the Sandebudet, or the Messenger, has been published for several years at Chicago, Ill., in connection with the Scandinavian domestic missions in the United States, and has attained a considerable circulation. A monthly paper called the Missionaren was begun in connection with the Norwegian mission of the Wisconsin Conference in 1870, and a Hymn-Book and a book for the children were published in connection with the same mission in 1872. A Sunday-school paper in Danish, the Hyrde Stemmen, or Shepherd's Voice, was begun in 1874, with the help of the Sunday-School Union, at Racine, Wis. A larger paper for general circulation, the Christelige Talmand, the Christian Advocate, was begun at Chicago, Ill., in 1876.

The following works in the Scandinavian languages are published by the Book Concern of the Methodist Episcopal Church in New York: Swedish: "Life of Carvasso," Wesley's "Christian Perfection," "Compendium of Methodism," "Journal of John Nelson," "Life of Hester Ann Rogers," "Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church," "Catechism of the Methodist Episcopal Church," "Sermons" by the Rev. John Wesley, Illustrated Primers and Hymn-Books. Danish: "Catechism No. 2," Fletcher's "Christian Perfection," Wesley's "Christian Perfection," Ralston's "Elements of Divinity," "Reasons for becoming a Methodist," "Tom and Jack."

Schenectady, N. Y. (pop. 11,026), is situated on the banks of the Mohawk River, and is the seat of Union College. Methodist worship was held in this place as early as 1767, by Captain Webb, who had charge of the barracks in Albany. Under his ministrations a number were converted, and frequently met for worship after he had gone. In 1802, William Colbert was appointed presiding elder for Albany district: and on October 25 of that year he writes: "We rode from Van Vooreess to Schenectady. I preached at night in the academy to fifty or sixty people, who were very attentive." It does not appear by name in the minutes of the church until 1807. During that year Bishop Asbury passed through the city, and says, "We have traveled 100 miles up the Mohawk. My feet are much swelled, and I am on crutches; but I have been supported amongst strangers. Oh that we had two low Dutch missionaries for the parts of Jersey and York, west of the Hudson!" In 1809 the first Methodist church was erected, which was succeeded by a larger and much better one in 1834. The present larger and more beautiful edifice was commenced in 1871, and finished in 1872. A strong German society has also been organized. It is in the Troy Conference, and the statistics are:

Schmidt, D. C., is a highly-respected banker, who was elected lay delegate from the Southwest German Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Schofield, Benjamin, is a native of England, but has for many years been a resident of the city of Philadelphia, where he has been largely engaged in manufacturing. He early united with the M. E. Church, and has for many years been an active local preacher. He is a member of the Local Preachers' Association, and has been president of the Historical Society of Philadelphia Conference, in which he takes a deep interest.

Schools for the Daughters of Ministers (English Wesleyan).—As early as the Conference of 1774, the necessity of making some educational provision for the daughters of preachers was felt and urged; but for some time nothing was at-

result had been brought about, particularly to Mrs. Thornton (widow of the late Rev. W. L. Thornton, M.A.) and Miss Gibson, who have borne so large a share in the establishment of this valuable institution."

The school at "Five Elms," Lower Clapton, was opened Sept. 30, 1869. In 1870 it was transferred to the connection, and brought under the direction of the general schools committee. Early in 1871 another house was taken (also in Clapton), called "Beechholme." The two schools offer accommodation for upwards of 70 pupils; the former under the charge of Miss Henley, daughter of the late Rev. John Henley, the latter under the care of Miss Rabett. The proceedings of both schools are under the direction of the local committee appointed an-tempted beyond apportioning a small number of girls to the school conducted at Publow, near Bristol, by Miss Owen; of which establishment Mr. Wesley thought most highly. In 1781 a small educational allowance was made to the daughters of preachers, which, till the year 1796, amounted only to £6 yearly. It was then augmented to 8 guineas, and subsequently to £12, the same allowance as for boys. From the year 1858 to 1869 various committees were formed, who examined the subject carefully and reported upon it from time to time; meantime an unexpected and providential opening presented itself. In 1870 the committee was informed that the promoters of an institution for the education of preachers' daughters, lately established, and for some time carried on at Clapton, would gladly transfer it to the connection furnished and in working order. A resolution offering it to the acceptance of the Conference was carried unanimously, and hearty thanks were presented "to those by whose efforts and liberality this nually by the Conference. Subsequently to this it was announced that John Fernley, Esq., of Southport, Lancashire, intended to erect and furnish a similar establishment for the same purpose. This intention has been fulfilled; the deed bears date July 5, 1871, and Trinity Hall, Southport, a handsome structure, and admirably adapted for the purpose in all its sections, was opened as a "school for the education, instruction, and improvement of the daughters of Wesleyan ministers," presented to the connection as a free gift from the generous donor, and is now in successful operation. It is under the care of Miss Burgess, daughter of the late Rev. Joseph Burgess; and under the oversight and direction of a committee of ministers and laymen annually appointed; last year it had 58 pupils in residence. A view of the building is given above.

Schools, Wesleyan Day.—The first attempt of the British Wesleyan Conference placed on record, in reference to the establishment of day-schools in connection with the societies and congregations of Methodism, is found in the minutes of 1833. The Conference then expressed its sanction and approval of them, and recommended their establishment "as calculated, when constructed on strictly Wesleyan principles and placed under efficient control, to promote those high and holy ends for which as a community we exist." Three years subsequently three eminent missionaries, Messrs. Treffry, Atherton, and S. Jackson, were authorized to take steps in order "to ascertain the actual state of education in immediate connection with Methodism throughout Great Britain," and to report to the ensuing Conference. This was the germ of the Wesleyan education committee; and to their zealous and persistent efforts the whole scheme is deeply indebted for its origination and extension. The result of their inquiries was, that in 1837 there were not more than 9 daily infant schools and 22 day-schools for older children known to exist. This report was accompanied with suggestions which were deemed so far important, that a committee of eleven ministers and seven laymen was appointed to carry them out as far as possible. To promote the objects in view training-schools were established (see TRAINING INSTITUTIONS) for the education of teachers. Having previously declared itself decidedly opposed to the system of simple secular education, and having cautioned the Methodist people against the popular error that the education of youth may be disservice from the inculcation of divine truth, the Conference, in 1844, under the presidency of the Rev. John Scott, stated it to be desirable that 700 Methodist schools or more should be established in seven years. For this purpose a special fund was raised. Through the efforts of educators, teachers, and the persistent influence of the Conference, Wesleyan day-schools have been largely extended throughout Great Britain. At the Conference of 1876 the following report was made: total number of day-schools, 884; scholars, 177,457; average attendance, 114,458; total income from school-pence, government grants, subscriptions, etc., £17,871; total expenditures, £181,358; number of pupil teachers examined, 774,—marked excellent, 256; good, 255; fair, 168; moderate, 87; failures, 8. Under the system established by the British government a certain proportion of these expenses are borne by it.

Schou, Karl, superintendent of the mission in Denmark, was born in that country and emigrated to the United States, and was some time engaged as an engineer. He was converted and joined the Wisconsin Conference in 1872. He was sent in 1873 to take charge of the mission in Denmark, and has been diligent and successful in his work.

Schuler, Frederick, of the South German Conference, was born May 29, 1826, at Baden, in Germany. He removed to the United States in 1846, and was converted at St. Louis under the pastorate of C. Jost. He was licensed to preach at Galena, Ill. His fields of labor have been mostly in the Northwest. For a number of years he was the financial agent of the German Wallace College. In the fall of 1873 he went as the pioneer to Texas, where he has entered upon his second term as presiding elder. He was a delegate from Texas to the General Conference of 1876.

Schwarz, Wm., a native of Baden, Germany, preparing for the priesthood at Rastadt and Freiburg, was converted from Romanism in 1846, in New York City. In 1848 he joined the New York Conference, and became a very popular pulpit orator and missionary among the Germans. In 1858 he was transferred to the Germany and Switzerland Conference, where he entered at once with the same zeal upon his work, and was stationed in Basel, Bremen, Berlin, and Carlsruhe. His most eminent success was in the mission among the Germans in Paris. When the Franco-German war broke out he was enabled, as an American citizen, to assist the Germans in leaving Paris. His flock being scattered and the siege of Paris being evident, he took his family to Switzerland. When he returned he found many of his household effects stolen. He closed his labors as presiding elder of the South German district in May, 1874, and returned to the United States to labor among his old friends of the East German Conference. He was stationed at Melrose, but just before the Conference met, in March, 1875, in the midst of great usefulness, the great Head of the church called him from labor to reward. He was a true friend, a very diligent sermonizer, and very skillful in doing good and bringing souls to Christ.

Scio College is located at Scio, Harrison Co., O. It has pleasant grounds, consisting of six acres, in view of the Pittsburgh and Columbia Railroad, and occupies a three-story frame building. It was originally arranged on the plan of each student pursuing only one study at a time. It has had a fair attendance, and has educated many who would not probably have attended the older colleges. It is under the care of Rev. Edward Ellison, and is under the control of the East Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church. Its value is estimated at $14,000.

Scotch Chapels, Fund For (Wesleyan Methodists).—As early as the year 1829 special means were adopted for the relief of distressed chapels in Scotland. The Rev. Valentine Ward was authorized, for three years only, to make applications to persons in different circuits, not being subscribers to the Chapel Fund, to endeavor to effect such a reduction of the debts on the chapels in Scotland as may place them in easy circumstances. From year to year officers were appointed, but it was not until 1866 that a great impetus was given by the bequest to the "Board of Trustees for Chapel Purposes" of the late Mrs. Joshua Burton, of Roundhay, Leeds, Yorkshire, of £15,000, to be appropriated towards the erection of chapels and schools in Cumberland and Scotland.

Scotland (pop. 3,360,018), is the northern part of the island of Great Britain, having a total area of 31,324 square miles, of which the islands comprise about 5000. The natives were converted to Christianity in the sixth century, by St. Columba and other missionaries from Ireland. Through the successful preaching of John Knox, Scotland became pre-eminently Calvinistic and Presbyterian. In 1851 the religious statistics were as follows:

Churches.	Places of Worship.	Sittings.

John Wesley first visited Scotland in 1751. He was cordially received, and preached to large and attentive congregations. He preached first at Musselburgh, and next at Edinburgh. He left Christopher Hopper, who had accompanied him thither from England, in charge of the work. He preached about two weeks and formed a Methodist society, the first in Scotland. Other preachers were sent, but the results were comparatively small. Whitefield was very much opposed to Wesley entering Scotland, and wrote him plainly that he "had no business in Scotland." If he never had the popularity there that Whitefield had, his work has proved more abiding.

The Wesleyan Methodists now have in Scotland 23 circuits, 5406 members, 62 chapels, and 32 other preaching-places, 20,836 sittings, 51 Sunday-schools, and 5047 Sunday-school scholars. The Methodist Free Connection has about 8 circuits and 11 itinerant preachers, 1904 members, 42 chapels, and 13 other preaching-places, 45 Sunday-schools, and 4420 Sunday-school scholars. The present provost of Edinburgh (1877), Sir James Falshaw, is a Methodist.

Scott, Charles, a merchant of Philadelphia, is extensively engaged in saddlery goods and materials. He early united with the M. E. Church, and was for many years one of the official members of the Fifth Street church, in which he manifested deep interest. He has since been a member of the Fletcher church, Hestonville. He is a member of the Board of Church Extension, in which he has been actively engaged, and also a member of the Conference Tract Board, and took an active part in remodeling the book-store and offices on Arch Street. He has been a member of the lay Electoral Conferences, and has taken much interest in the extension of Methodism in the city.

Scott, George, D.D., an English Wesleyan minister, was appointed missionary to Sweden in 1830, where he laid the foundation of a work of evangelical enterprise which still thrives. He revisited Stockholm in 1859, and saw fields which he had sown in tears twenty years before now white unto the harvest. In 1866 he was appointed president of the Conferences of Canada and Eastern British America. He lived but to love and serve Christ. He died in 1874, in the seventieth year of his age.

Scott, John, an English Wesleyan minister, spent a period of fifty-six years in the Wesleyan ministry. He was a man of devout piety and of solid judgment. He was twice elected president of the Conference; for thirty years he served the interests of the Missionary Society most ably. But it was in the educational department that he was enabled to render the most efficient service. As chairman of the Wesleyan education committee, and principal of the Normal Training Institution at Westminster, he has left behind him a monument of faithful and efficient service.

Scott, John, D.D., was born in Washington Co., Pa., Oct. 27, 1820. In his twelfth year he became a Christian, and united with the Methodist Protestant Church. His educational advantages were limited, but being a lover of books he acquired a liberal education, prosecuting his studies vigorously after entering the ministry, which occurred in 1842. Sixteen years of his active ministry were spent in Pittsburgh and vicinity, five years in Cincinnati, and the remainder in four other appointments. For three years, in addition to pastoral labor, he edited the Missionary and Sunday-School Journal. One year he was corresponding secretary of the Board of Missions, six years editor of the Methodist Recorder, and the denominational Sunday-school paper, and a member of every General Conference of the church save one for twenty years past. He has been president of his Conference and of the General Conference. He is the author of a volume of occupations. In 1822 he was converted and united with the church, and after great hesitation, and under a thorough conviction of duty, he was licensed to preach in 1825, and the following year was received into the Philadelphia Conference. His appointments were successively to Talbot, Dover, St. George's charge, Philadelphia, and West Chester. In 1832, on account of impaired health, he received a supernumerary relation, but the following year sermons, which are principally expository. In his editorial functions he gained the commendation of the entire denomination for his judicious handling of the church organs.

Scott, Levi, D.D., one of the bishops of the M. E. Church, was born near Cantwell's Bridge, now Odessa, Del., Oct. 11, 1802. His parents were members of the church, his father being a class-leader and a local preacher, who became in 1803 a member of the Philadelphia Conference; but died during the following year. He labored on a farm until his sixteenth year, when he engaged in mechanical he was able to resume his work. In 1834 he was unexpectedly appointed presiding elder of Delaware district. He continued to fill pastoral charges until, in 1840, at the earnest solicitation of Dr. Durbin, he accepted the position of principal of Dickinson Grammar School at Carlisle. He held that position for three years, when he returned again to the pastoral work, which was more congenial to his taste. He was elected a member of every General Conference from 1836 to 1852. At the General Conference in 1848, he was elected assistant book agent at New York. After having served four years, he was, in 1852, elected bishop. He has now (1877) served twenty-five years in that responsible office, and has traveled extensively through all the States and Territories. The winter after his election he sailed for Africa, and visited the missions on that coast, holding the session of the Liberia Conference, and he has three times visited the Conferences on the Pacific. He is now the senior bishop of the church.

Scott, Orange, was born Feb. 13, 1800, in Brookfield, Vt. When twenty-one years old he had enjoyed the privilege of only thirteen months' schooling. He was converted at a camp-meeting early in September, 1820, and at once united with the M. E. Church. He was made a class-leader, and licensed to exhort within twelve months. While working at $10 a month, during six days in each week, he would walk six or eight miles on foot, hold meetings three times a day, and walk home again to the farm-house. In 1821 he commenced the itinerant work on Bernard circuit, "with no books but the Bible and Hymn-Book, saddle-bags on his arm, without carriage, or horse, or companion, or earthly friend, almost a stranger, and in debt $30. This circuit was 200 miles around, with 30 regular appointments." A borrowed horse completed his equipage. He was received on trial by the New England Conference in 1822. Every year of his pastoral work was blessed with extensive revivals. In 1829, at Springfield, 130 were converted.

In 1830 he was appointed presiding elder of Springfield district. A writer in his district says, "He had scarcely made his first round ere the district was on fire. The quarterly meetings and camp-meetings were overwhelming pentecostal seasons, times in which the people sallied in deep battalions, flushed with hopes of victory, indulging the highest expectations, and realizing all they expected." In 1832 the largest and wealthiest Congregational church in Rhode Island offered him its pastorate, but he preferred, he said, "to hold on the even tenor of his way as a Methodist preacher." That year he was elected a delegate to the General Conference, which met in Philadelphia. In 1834-35, while he was presiding elder of Providence district, his public advocacy of the modern anti-slavery movement awakened dissatisfaction with and opposition to him. He subscribed for and circulated 100 copies of Garrison's Liberator, antagonized Professor Whedon and Dr. Fisk in Zion's Herald, wrote and spoke frequently against slavery, and for immediate and stringent church action to condemn and destroy it.

At the General Conference of 1836, at Cincinnati, O., Orange Scott was chairman of the New England Conference delegation. The anti-slavery question was introduced by the opponents of aboli-tionism. Its defense devolved on Orange Scott, who was sustained by 14 members of the body only, 120 voting against.

He was removed from Providence district in 1836, and was stationed at Lowell, Mass., where a powerful revival resulted in the awakening of hundreds. Impaired health required release from his pastoral charge the ensuing year, but he traveled and lectured extensively as an agent of the American Anti-Slavery Society to large audiences and with great effect. Returning to the pastorate in 1839, another wonderful revival ensued. Mr. Scott was a delegate to the General Conference, at Baltimore, in 1840, and took a leading part in the proceedings, and made an elaborate speech in favor of action against slavery. But the contrary action on "colored testimony" and on the "Westmoreland petition" destroyed all his hopes for the church as an anti-slavery power. In June, 1841, he said, in Zion's Herald, "There is, therefore, no alternative but to submit to things as they are or secede." The year 1842 witnessed his withdrawal from the M. E. Church with others, who organized the Wesleyan Methodist connection, of which he was the first president. He continued in the position of book agent until his death, which occurred at Newark, N. J., July 31, 1847. On his dying bed his words were, "My only hope is in the infinite merit of my adorable Master and Redeemer." "When I am gone my old friends in the M. E. Church will remember me with kindness, sympathy, and love." "Yes, all is peace, all is peace," were his last words.

Scott, Robinson, D.D., a distinguished minister of the Methodist Church in Ireland, was born in Banbridge in 1814, to the Presbyterian congregation of which town his family belonged for several generations. During the controversy between Orthodoxy and Arianism, which issued in the withdrawal of several ministers and congregations from the synod of Ulster and the formation of the remonstrant synod, his mind was much exercised by the questions in debate. The doctrines of Methodism engaged his attention, and he embraced them, and became a member of the society. In 1835 he was accepted as a candidate for the Methodist ministry. He continued in circuit work, suffering from bronchial difficulties, until the Wesleyan Connectional School was opened in Dublin, when, in 1845, he was appointed governor and chaplain of that institution. While there he directed special attention to the educational interests of the Irish Methodist Church. A proposal introduced by him for enlarging the basis of the institution was embraced in a wider scheme, adopted by the Conference; and he was appointed in 1855, and subsequently, to visit the United States of America and Canada. He represented Irish Methodism in the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1856, 1860, and 1864. His mission, notwithstanding commercial and other difficulties, was successful, and aided, among other important results, in the establishment of the Methodist College in Belfast. On the opening of that institution, with the Rev. Wm. Arthur as president, Dr. Scott was appointed theological tutor, which office he held until 1873, when he was appointed president. He is also treasurer of the college, and is a member of the senate of the Queen's University in Ireland under appointment of her Majesty in 1874.

Scott, Thomas F., was born April 9, 1822, in Pembroke, Me. At the age of sixteen he removed West, and, under the ministry of Rev. George Brown, was converted, and joined the Methodist Protestant Church. In 1841 he removed to Pittsburgh, Pa., where he was licensed to preach. He has filled all the offices of the church at various times, and has been particularly useful as a Sunday-school worker. In the fall of 1852 he organized the Sunday-school out of which grew the Second Methodist church, and in 1868 the one which was the germ of the Third Methodist church. At the Second church, Pittsburgh, he still holds his membership.

Scranton, Pa. (pop. 35,092), is situated in Luzerne County, in the midst of the anthracite coal-fields. The first Methodist society was organized in 1840, in connection with Pittston circuit, and a church edifice was erected in 1842. In 1854 it was organized as a station, and in the same year the brick church now in use on Adams Avenue was erected. It has also a parsonage, valued at $10,000. The society has passed through many severe struggles, but has finally reached a prosperous condition. The society in Hyde Park, formerly an independent village, but now a part of the city, was organized in 1852 in connection with the Lackawanna circuit. It became a separate charge in 1860, and a church edifice was erected at a cost of $16,000. This, with a good parsonage near it, was destroyed by fire in 1869. The present brick structure was dedicated in 1871, and a parsonage has also been built. In 1882 the Providence church was organized as a society in connection with Pittston circuit. It became a separate charge in 1881, and a church was erected the same year, which was enlarged and repaired in 1872. A parsonage has also been built in connection with it. The Park Place church was organized in 1875, and a chapel was purchased in 1876. A Methodist Protestant church was organized on Park Hill in 1868, and a church was erected in 1872. The African M. E. church was organized about 1865, with a small Sunday-school, but without a church edifice. Scranton is in the Wyoming Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Scudder, Moses L., D.D., a member of the New York East Conference, entered the New England Conference in 1837. He has filled many of the most prominent stations in New England and New York, and has also served as presiding elder for two terms. He was a member of the General Conference of 1876, and is the author of a "History of Methodism."

Seager, Schuyler, for several years principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, was born in Sinsbury, Conn., July 8, 1807, and died at Lockport, N. Y., Oct. 22, 1875. He joined the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1833; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1836; was appointed in the same year teacher of Moral Science and Belles-Lettres in the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, and was chosen president of the same institution in 1837. He entered the itinerant pastoral work in 1844, and was again appointed principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary in 1854. He was principal of the Genesee Model School, Lima, N. V., in 1856 and 1857; then pastor for one year; then principal of the Dansville Seminary, N. Y., for two years, after which he engaged again in pastoral work.

Sears, Mrs. Angeline B., née Brooks, wife of Rev. C. W. Sears, was born in Cincinnati, O., Sept. 20, 1817. Trained by religious parents, she early became a subject of religious impressions, and united with the M. E. Church in 1830. After receiving an education in Philadelphia, and her return home, she became devoutly pious; was married to Rev. Clinton W. Sears in 1842, and devoted herself to all the duties devolving upon her in the varied charges to which her husband was appointed. In a few years she experienced a deep work of grace, was the intimate friend of Mrs. Bishop Hamline, and her letters abound in sentiments and expressions of a pure and rich experience. After a lingering illness, she died Dec. 16, 1848. Her sickness and death were a remarkable scene. Much of the time she was in almost a ecstasy of happiness, and several of her friends were converted under the influence of her conversation in her last moments. Her life was written by Mrs. Bishop Hamline.

Sears, Clinton William, president of Illinois Wesleyan University in 1855, was born April 27, 1820, in Carroll, Chautauqua Co., N. Y. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1841, and afterwards studied in the Lane Theological Seminary, at Cincinnati, O. He joined the Genesee Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1842, and performed pastoral work in that and the Ohio Conference till 1852, when he was elected Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature in Illinois Wesleyan University. In 1854 he was elected professor of the same branches in Ohio University, and in 1856 was elected president of Illinois Wesleyan University. He returned to pastoral work in the next year, at Springfield, Ill.; preached at Morris chapel, Cincinnati, from 1858 to 1860, and entered the Union army in 1861 as chaplain of Ohio volunteers. The disease from which he died was contracted while in this service.

Secretary of Conference (English Wesleyan).—The election of the secretary takes place immediately after that of the president,—those by whom he is elected, and from whom, being the same. In point of membership, he is on an equality with the president in the stationing committee. He may be elected as many successive years as the Conference may think proper. As "official adviser" of the president, he may attend any special district meeting. Dr. Coke was the first secretary, in 1791.

Sedalia, Mo. (pop. 4360), the capital of Pettis County, is situated on the Missouri and Pacific Railroad. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1864, with Cyrus E. Carpenter as pastor, who reported, in 1865, 110 members. The church has passed through many trials. It is in the St. Louis Conference, and the M. E. Church is now well established, having 258 members, 241 Sunday-school scholars, and $16,000 church property. The M. E. Church South has also 50 members.

Sellers, Henry D., M.D., was born in Hillsborough, Md., July 28, 1790, and early entered the church. While living on a farm, in connection with some school facilities, he acquired a good education, and subsequently attended medical lectures, in 1820, at Baltimore, and entered upon the practice of medicine. In 1825 he removed to Pittsburgh, and at once became active in the church. He rose to eminence in the medical profession, and for forty years he stood among the highest. In general church interests he was a leader and mold of men, and from the organization of Liberty Street church until he assisted in building Christ church, he led all of its aggressive steps. He occupied every position possible in the church, and as a class-leader he was pre-eminent, and his instructions were like ripened and rich fruit. For many years he held the office of a local preacher, exercising with great favor his functions chiefly at Liberty Street church, then the most important city charge. He was an active member of the Centenary Board, and aided in consummating its mission of securing the fund, which is now yielding a fruitful income, and for many years he was its president. He was a trustee of Western University of Pennsylvania. He was also deeply interested in the Pittsburgh Female College, having been one of its earliest trustees and most devoted friends.

HENRY D. SELLERS, M.D.

Selma, Ala. (pop. 6484), the county seat of Dallas County, first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1838, as connected with Valley Creek, William A. Smith being pastor. In 1839 the charge reported 179 members. Since the division of the M. E. Church, in 1845, this region has been under the control of the M. E. Church South. It has 273 members, 155 Sunday-school scholars, and $25,000 church property. The African M. E. Church has 432 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $11,000 church property.

Seneca Falls, N. Y. (pop. 5890), is situated in Seneca County, on a branch of the New York Central Railroad. Seneca circuit was organized in 1830, with W. D. Jewett and Augustine Anderson as pastors. Seneca Falls first appears in 1832, with William J. Kent as pastor, who reported the following year 190 members. In 1857 it had become a station, having 172 members. It is in the Central New York Conference, and reports for 1876, 272 members, 190 Sunday-school scholars, and $38,000 church property.

Seney, Robert, of the New York East Conference, was born in the town of Queen Anne, Md., Oct. 12, 1799. His father dying early in youth, his mother removed to New York, where he entered Columbia College, and graduated honorably in 1815. He commenced the study of law, but, before completing it, became converted, and joined the M. E. Church. Having traveled for a short time under Dr. Bangs, then presiding elder, he was admitted on trial in the New York Conference in 1820. He subsequently filled a number of the most important appointments in the Conference until, in 1852, he became a supernumerary. He resided in Brooklyn, where he died July 1, 1854. He was an elegant scholar, a well-read theologian, and was an earnest, instructive, and successful preacher.

Sewall, Thomas, D.D., was born in Essex, Mass., April 28, 1818; was educated at the Wilbraham Academy, Phillips Academy, and the Wesleyan Seminary, Readfield, Me. In 1838 he entered on his ministerial work, and was soon selected for the most prominent appointments. His health failing, President Taylor appointed him consul to Santiago de Cuba, where he remained some ten months; but, being a Protestant, the Papal influence caused his exequatur to be withheld, and thus prevented him from entering on the duties of his office. On returning, he was given a desk in the Department of the Interior, and was afterwards transferred to the Department of State, under Daniel Webster. In 1853 he resumed pastoral work, and filled appointments in Winchester, Va., and in several of the Baltimore City stations. In 1860 he was elected to the General Conference. In 1866 he was transferred to New York East Conference, and was stationed in Brooklyn. His health again failing, he accepted an office in the custom-house, Baltimore, until he was no longer able to work, and died Aug. 11, 1870. "He was a man of refined tastes and scholarly culture. He was a born orator; his voice was melody, his diction regal, his action faultless. Gracious revivals crowned his labors, and many yet remain the seals of his apostleship."

Shadford, George, one of Mr. Wesley's early missionaries to America, was sent in company with Thomas Rankin in 1773. He was a man of warm impulses, great energy, and remarkable usefulness. While a youth he had entered the British army, but after his release, coming in contact with the Methodists, he entered upon a religious life. In 1768 he became connected with the Conference, and in 1772 volunteered for missionary service in America. When about to embark, Mr. Wesley wrote him as follows: "Dear George, the time has arrived for you to embark for America; you must go down to Bristol, where you will meet with Thomas Rankin, Captain Webb, and his wife. I let you loose, George, on the great continent of America: publish your message in the open face of the sun and do all the good you can." He was one of the most successful of the revivalists among the early preachers, and under his labors in Maryland and Virginia thousands were brought to a knowledge of the truth. During the Revolutionary excitement he was threatened with imprisonment in Virginia, and left for the North in the depth of winter, and came near perishing in a severe snow-storm. He found, however, the same difficulties in Maryland, where he was in danger of imprisonment, if not of death. He met and consulted with Mr. Asbury, who was firm in his purpose to remain in America. Mr. Shadford believed it to be his duty, in 1778, to return to England. There he continued in the ministry until 1791, when he received a supernumerary relation. He devoted his whole strength, however, to religious work. He visited the sick, and took charge of several classes, till the end of his life. He had more than a hundred persons in classes under his care, and Dr. Bunting says that on inspection he found that more than ninety of them "were clear in their Christian experience; many of them were living in the enjoyment of the perfect love of God." In his advanced age he lost his sight, but by a surgical operation he was restored. "You will have the pleasure," said his surgeon, "of seeing to use your knife and fork again." "Doctor," replied the veteran, "I shall have a greater pleasure,—that of seeing to read my Bible." And the first use of his restored sight was to read for three hours the sacred pages. In his last illness, when informed by his physician that he must die, "he broke out in rapture, exclaiming, 'Glory to God!' When asked if all was clear before him, he replied, 'I bless God it is,' and added, 'Victory, victory through the blood of the Lamb!'" His last words were, "I'll praise, I'll praise, I'll praise." He died March 11, 1816.

Shamokin, Pa. (pop. 4320), is in Northumberland County, at the intersection of several important railroads. Methodist services were introduced into this place in 1837, by Charles Brown, junior preacher in the Sunbury circuit, and in the same year a class of eight members was formed. A church was built in 1859, and enlarged and improved in 1866. Some time in June, 1877, a society of 50 members was organized under the auspices of the African M. E. Church. This town is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and the M. E. Church has 430 members, 436 Sunday-school scholars, and $12,200 church property.

Shannon, Hon. Samuel Leonard, is a native of Halifax, N. S. He was educated at the grammar-school of his native city, and after graduating at King's College, Windsor, in 1825, he was admitted to the bar of Nova Scotia in 1829, and was made Queen's counselor in 1835. He was commissioner of provincial railroads from 1855 to 1860; represented the western division of the county of Halifax in the House of Assembly from 1859 to 1867; was a member of the government of Nova Scotia in 1863, and continued until 1867; was principal for the Canal Commission, under the Dominion government, in 1871, and became law agent for the Dominion government, and minister of justice in Nova Scotia in 1871, and held office until the change of government, in 1873. He was early brought up a Methodist, and joined the church in 1844; was a teacher in Sunday-school nearly twenty years, and became a class-leader in 1858. For the last four years he has been superintendent of the Sabbath-schools in Halifax. He was a member of the first General Conference in the Methodist Church of Canada.

Sharon, Pa. (pop. 4221), is situated in Mercer County, on the Erie and Pittsburgh Railroad. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1852, connected with Brookfield, with Dean C. Wright as pastor. In 1858 it had become a station, having 72 members, 60 Sunday-school scholars, and $1900 church property. It is in the Erie Conference, and the M. E. Church has 408 members, 292 Sunday-school scholars, $14,000 church property.

Sharp, Solomon, of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Caroline Co., Md., April 6, 1771. At the age of twenty he commenced traveling under the presiding elder. He filled various important appointments for more than forty years. In 1835 he took a superannuated relation, and died suddenly, March 13, 1836, in Smyrna, Del., of an asthmatic affection. In preaching his last sermon he said, "Now I feel as if my work was done." "As a Christian, his character was irreproachable; and as a preacher, his talents were of an extraordinary character."

Sharpley, John B., a leading layman of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born at South Lincolnshire on March 12, 1800. He was a man of remarkable mental power, indomitable resolution, and great strength of will. Though a merchant, his wonderful acumen led many to suppose he was a trained lawyer. He was thrice elected mayor of his native town, and enjoyed other civic honors. Mr. Sharpley was converted when about twenty years of age, and for many years sustained the offices of class-leader and local preacher. He came into collision with the administrators of Wesleyan Methodism about 1850. A Free Methodist circuit was formed, which remained isolated for several years, but which joined the connection known as the United Methodist Free Churches in 1859. Mr. Sharpley died on June 24, 1872. His last words were, "I am looking for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life."

Shaw, Barnabas, an English Wesleyan preacher, entered the ministry in 1810, and died in 1857. He was a pioneer in missionary work in Africa, and the fragrance of his memory remains to this day.

Shaw, Hiram, Jr., is a native of Lexington, Ky., and was born about 1836. He was brought up in the M. E. Church, and his father and family were faithful adherents to the mother church as long as it was possible, and at the first opportunity thereafter reunited with the same. He was lay delegate from the Kentucky Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Shaw, John Knox, was born in Ireland in 1800, and died in Newark, Oct. 4, 1858. In his infancy his parents emigrated to the United States, and when about nineteen years of age he connected himself with the church. He entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1825, when it embraced the State of New Jersey as well as Eastern Pennsylvania, and became a member of the Newark Conference on the division of that body. He occupied prominent positions as a pastor, and took an active part in founding the Pennington Seminary, in which he was a trustee at the time of his death. He was a sound experimental preacher, and was greatly devoted to his work. His last words were, "Most home! most home!"

Shaw University.—This institution, located at Holly Springs, Miss., is under the auspices of the Freedman's Aid Society of the M. E. Church, and was chartered in 1870. By the terms of its charter it was granted all the privileges usually allowed to universities. Its doors are open to all, without regard to race or sex. The average attendance of students has been about 200. The first graduated class will leave its halls May 30, 1878. Rev. Albert C. McDonald, D.D., was the first president of the university, continuing in that office until 1876, at which time he resigned, and Rev. Wesley W. Hooper, A.M., was elected to fill the place. (See cut on following page.)

Shaw, William, an English Wesleyan missionary, went out under government authority to South Africa in 1820. He held for twenty years the office of general superintendent of missions, for which his steady, practical piety, his calmly-fervent zeal, most eminently fitted him. On his return to England he spent ten years in important circuits. In 1865 he was chosen president of the Conference. He died in 1872.

Shea, Hon. John, was born in Dillsburg, York Co., Pa., Feb. 7, 1800, but subsequently entered on a business career in the Ligonier Valley. In 1829 he removed to Pittsburgh, and spent most of his remaining years in mercantile life, during which period he occupied a high plane in commercial circles and in social positions in that city. He was led to Christ in 1834, and at the separate organization of Liberty Street church at the close of that year, he became identified with that charge. During most of his life he was prominent in its councils as steward, trustee, and class-leader. As a tribute to his superior experience in business, inflexible integrity, and as a representative man of the community, when the United States Internal Revenue department was organized by Congress, President Lincoln tendered him the responsible office of United States revenue collector for that district. He organized its machinery, and held the position two years, until he was suddenly seized with some form of paralysis at his office, and died on being taken to his residence, on April 29, 1864, in great peace, leaving a name unsullied and like "ointment poured forth."

Sheafer, Peter Renwick, of Pottsville, Pa., was born in Dauphin Co., Pa., March 31, 1819. He was educated at Oxford Academy, N. Y., and became a surveyor, geologist, and mining engineer.

Sheboygan, Wis. (pop. 5310), the capital of Sheboygan County, situated on Lake Michigan. A mission of the M. E. Church was established in 1845, and Joseph Lewis was appointed in charge, who reported 34 members. In 1857 it had become a station. The population has been largely of foreign descent, and the M. E. Church has both a German and a Norwegian congregation. It is in the Wisconsin Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

M. E. Church.....	58	84	$1000
M. E. Church, German.....	80	90	2700
M. E. Church, Norwegian.....	60	80	1500

SHAW UNIVERSITY, HOLLY SPRINGS, MISS.

He early assisted his father, who was president of the Lykens Valley Railroad, in introducing the Lykens Valley coal, as early as 1834. He was engaged in the first geological survey of Pennsylvania, with Prof. Rogers, in 1838, and was active in tracing the geological features of the "second mountain" range, extending from near Pottsville to beyond Shamokin and Tamaqua. He has been a resident at Pottsville since 1840, and is engaged in engineering and directing coal and iron interests. He has also extended professional engagements as far on the north as the British provinces, and on the south to the Deep River coal range in North Carolina. He has delivered lectures on coal at Lafayette College and elsewhere. He is an active member of the M. E. Church, holding various official positions, and is prominent in many scientific, charitable, and religious organizations. In addition to scientific papers and reports, he prepared a map of Pennsylvania as it was in 1775, which was issued by the Pennsylvania Historical Society in 1875.

Sheets, Colonel Benjamin F., a native of Illinois, and a resident at Oregon (Ill.), is of an old Methodist family. During the war he served with great fidelity the Union cause. Though devoted to general church interests, he makes Sunday-schools a specialty. He enjoys a fine local reputation as a speaker as well as for his liberality. He was lay delegate from the Rock River Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Sheffield (pop. 261,029), a city in the West Riding of Yorkshire, England. It is noted for its extensive manufactories, and especially for its articles of fine cutlery. Methodism was early introduced into this city, and has been greatly prospered. In 1872 the public report showed that out of 123 churches, 62 belonged to various Methodist denominations; while only 28 belonged to the Church of England, and 13 to the Congregationalists. The Wesleyan Methodists have five circuits in the city, with 15 ministers, besides several supernumeraries; and have 4442 members, beside probationers. They have also Wesley College, a prosperous institution of learning. The United Methodist Free Churches have four circuits, with 6 ministers, and report 2082 members, beside probationers. The New Connection Methodists have 5 ministers, and report 1128 members. The Primitive Methodists have also societies, but the statistics are not at hand.

Sheffield Wesley College.—This institution stands on a rising ground in one of the most beautiful suburbs of Sheffield. About the year 1836 several ministers and gentlemen of Sheffield suggested the establishment of a high school under of Isaac Holden, Esq., M.P. Grants of £20 and £10 per annum are also made to meritorious students. Three gold medals, one given by Angus Holden, Esq., M.P., and several silver ones are annually distributed. The present number of students is 225.

Sherman, David, D.D., a descendant of Hon. Philip Sherman, one of the original settlers of Boston, was born in New Lebanon, N. Y., June 17, 1822. Until his conversion, in 1839, he remained with his father on the farm. Studies preparatory to the ministry were begun at Wilbraham the next year,

SHEFFIELD WESLEY COLLEGE.

Wesleyan training. A plot of ground of about 6 acres was purchased, and one of the finest buildings in Sheffield was erected, at a cost of about £30,000. It was built in 1838, under the designation of the Wesleyan Proprietary Grammar-School. By the exertions chiefly of Rev. Dr. Waddy, in 1844, the school became an affiliated college of the University of London; in the examination of which its students have maintained highly honorable positions. According to the deed, the governor and chaplain must be a Wesleyan minister. The board of directors have the right of nomination, and the Conference the power of final appointment. At present that position is held by Rev. William Jessop. Rev. John Manners, M.A., was headmaster for the first fifteen years, and was succeeded, in 1841, by H. M. Shera, Esq., LL.D., who still occupies the position. Successful students are encouraged by various rewards. The college has several scholarships. Sir Francis Lycett gave an amount sufficient to yield £80 per annum for the perpetuation of two scholarships, one of £50 and another of £30. The directors give a scholarship of £40 a year to Woodhouse Grove School, and another of £30 a year is furnished by the liberality and in 1841 he received a license to preach. After supplying for a few months under the presiding elder, he, in 1843, joined the New England Conference. After filling various responsible appointments he was, in 1860, made presiding elder of Worcester district, and has since that period occupied the Springfield, Lynn, and Boston districts. In 1860 he published "Sketches of New England Divines," and in 1872 a "History of the Discipline." He was also delegate to the General Conferences of 1864, 1868, and 1872.

Shinkle, Amos, Esq., is a native of Ohio, born about 1820. He started in boyhood to make the battle of life, and shortly increased his means by trading on the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. Subsequently he commenced business at Covington, Ky., where he has resided for over thirty years. Long a worshiper and supporter of the M. E. Church, he finally consecrated himself fully to God and Methodism, and has been active in every department of work, and is specially devoted to the Sunday-school cause. He gives largely to the benevolent and educational interests of the church. He was largely identified with the building of the magnificent suspension bridge between Covington and Cincinnati; is president of the First National Bank, and also president of the Gas Company. He was lay delegate from the Kentucky Conference to the General Conference of 1872, and was appointed a member of the local committee to supervise the Western Book Concern. He was elected the second time lay delegate to the General Conference of 1876, and re-elected a member of the local committee for the Cincinnati Book Concern.

Shinn, Asa, was born in New Jersey, May 3, 1781. His parents removing West, he was converted at the age of seventeen, and united with the M. E. Church. In his twentieth year he entered the itinerancy, in the Baltimore Conference. His logical power, afterwards so wonderful in his writings and discourses, was apparent in his youthful ministry. In 1813 he published his "Essay on the Plan of Salvation," and in 1840 his work on "The Benevolence and Rectitude of the Supreme Being." In 1824 Mr. Shinn took a prominent part in the discussion of the lay representation in the M. E. Church. He was the author of a voluminous series of articles in the Mutual Rights. When the discussion culminated in an act of discipline involving the membership of a number of advocates of the measure, Mr. Shinn, sympathizing with the new party, withdrew his name from the M. E. Church, and identified himself with the lay-representation movement. He was a member of the convention, and took an active part in the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church. He shared the hearty confidence of his brethren, and occupied the most important offices in the gift of his constituents. He was frequently elected president of the Annual Conference, and twice, in 1838 and in 1842, president of the General Conference. In 1834 he was elected, in connection with the Rev. Nicholas Snethen, editor of The Methodist Protestant, of Baltimore. Owing to the lingering effects of an accident which occurred in his youth, and the overstrain of work and care, he became at four different times the subject of insanity, viz., in 1813, 1819, 1828, and 1843. From each attack, except the last, he fully recovered. At last he was sent to an asylum in Philadelphia, and from there to another in Brattleboro', Vt., where he lingered in mental darkness until his death, on Feb. 11, 1853. He was a strong and effective speaker, and a ready and forcible writer.

Shreck, William, a German minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Lower Prussia about 1816, and died at Herman, Mo., March 22, 1874. Removing to America, he was converted at a camp-meeting near Pittsburgh, Pa. Finally removing to Indiana, he was received on trial in the Indiana Conference in 1842, and was appointed to assist L. S. Jacoby at St. Louis. In the following year he traveled extensively, establishing and encouraging German congregations, particularly in Illinois and Missouri, a part of which time he acted as presiding elder. "He labored as an itinerant minister for thirty-two years, with true self-denial and holy consecration, and God blessed his efforts with remarkable success."

Shreveport, La. (pop. 4607), the county seat of Caddo County, is situated on the Red River. This region was for many years included in the Caddo circuit, one of the first organized in the State. Shreveport first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church South for 1848, with Robert J. Harp as pastor, who reported 59 members. Since the close of the Civil War the M. E. Church has re-organized two charges. The African M. E. Church has also a congregation. It is in the Louisiana Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
St. Paul's.....	140	75	$3400
St. James'.....	90	39	3000

Shrewsbury, W. J., an English Wesleyan minister, died in 1866; an old and valued missionary, who entered the work in 1815.

Shumate, Nathan, D.D., of the Missouri Conference, was born in Kentucky, Dec. 23, 1820; received an academic education, was converted and joined the M. E. Church in 1841. He was admitted on trial in the Indiana Conference in 1845, and was transferred to the Missouri Conference in 1853. In 1857 he was appointed presiding elder of the St. Louis district, and served at different periods as presiding elder for sixteen years. He was elected delegate to the General Conference in 1860, 1864, 1868, and 1872. He also held, by General Conference appointment, the position of representative in the general committee on church extension, from the Tenth district.

Sierra Leone (pop. 55,374) is a British colonial settlement on the western coast of Africa, about latitude 9°. Its capital is Freetown. The settlement was formed in 1787, with the philanthropic purpose of affording a place of refuge for free negroes; and, though its climate is unhealthy, the colony has been steadily growing. A Wesleyan mission was first established as early as 1814, under the ministry of Rev. William Davies, and which has been constantly kept up. Thirty nations of interior Africa, it is said, have contributed to the population of Sierra Leone. Many of these liberated slaves have been converted from the worship of idols, and are prepared to carry the gospel into the interior. Freetown contains a population of from 15,000 to 18,000. The accompanying engraving presents a view of the Wesleyan institution at King Tom's Point, near Freetown. A school was commenced in 1842, and the missionary committee were looking for suitable buildings. Various persons contributed liberally, and as the committee were about to build, a large edifice, which for situation, convenience, and magnitude was very desirable, and which had been used as a naval depot, was offered for sale, which cost £7000, but was bought by the mission for 300 guineas, and is one of the most substantial buildings on the coast. The work has enlarged so that there is now a Sierra Leone dis-

Sept. 21, 1830; was converted in 1840, and united with the M. E. Church about the same time. In 1856 he removed to Osceola, Iowa, where he still resides, and is largely engaged in business. He is the president of the First National Bank of Osceola. He is a liberal supporter of the church and active in the various departments, especially the Sunday-school. He represented the Des Moines Conference as lay delegate at the General Conference of 1872.

trict, embracing some five circuits, with a total membership of 5186, the membership in Freetown being 2611.

In 1858 the United Free Methodists were invited by a minister of the Countess of Huntingdon connection in Sierra Leone to take charge of a body of West African Methodists, who were not in connection with the Wesleyan body. They numbered 14 preaching-places and about 2300 members. Joseph New arrived at the colony in 1859, and in the following year he was joined by Charles Worboys, and in 1862 by James Brown, who was also sent for the purpose of training native youth in the ministry. All of these brethren suffered severe attacks of fever. Mr. New died Aug. 6, 1862, and in 1863 Mr. Worboys returned to England, and was followed by Mr. Brown. Before he left, however, Rev. W. H. Massie arrived, but was compelled by sickness to leave. He was followed, in 1866, by Rev. I. S. Potts, who died shortly after his arrival. The church then secured the services of Mr. Micklethwaite, whose name stands for seven years on the appointments for Sierra Leone, though for three years he was in England. The statistics presented to the Assembly of 1876 are as follows: itinerants, 4; local preachers, 79; leaders, 114; members, 2739, with 330 on trial; and Sunday-schools, with 50 teachers and 620 scholars. For support of the missions there was raised in the colony £537.8.17½, and for the general missionary fund £306.14.10¾.

Sigler, Henry C., was born in Licking Co., O.,

Sigston, James, the biographer and friend of the devoted William Bramwell, was a member of the United Methodist Free Churches, England. In early life he was connected with the Wesleyan body, but became dissociated from it in connection with the dissension as to the introduction of an organ into Brunswick chapel, Leeds. The Protestant Methodists, with whom he was identified, made common cause with the Wesleyan association, and Mr. Sigston was elected president of the association in 1838. Mr. Sigston kept a school in Leeds, which was somewhat famous in its day, and he lived to extreme old age.

Silber, William Beinbauer, M.D., Ph.D., editor of Latin and Greek text-books, was born in New York City, Nov. 22, 1826. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1850, and afterwards studied in the Union Theological Seminary, New York City. He was appointed a professor in the College of the City of New York in 1851, and held that position till 1870, when he was elected president of Albion College, Mich. He was employed by the board of education of Detroit, Mich., from 1871 to 1873; was ordained a local elder of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872; was lecturer on Medical Jurisprudence in Detroit Homœopathic College in 1873. He edited a course of "Progressive Lessons in Greek" in 1864, a "Latin Course" in 1867, and an "Elementary Latin Grammar" in 1868.

Simmons, William, a pioneer Methodist Episcopal minister, was born in Mason Co., Ky., June 24, 1798, but in his childhood his parents removed to Ohio. He was converted in 1816, and received on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1820. His first appointment was Piqua circuit, which embraced 28 appointments. He was sent to Detroit in 1825 as presiding elder of that district, which included the whole of Michigan and a part of Northern Ohio. He was also at the same time pastor of the church in Detroit. He filled many of the leading appointments in the Ohio and Cincinnati Conferences, and served several terms as presiding elder. He was for many years president of the board of trustees of Xenia College, and labored efficiently for the success of that institution. In his semi-centennial sermon, in 1870, he said, "I have traveled more than 100,000 miles, preached more than 5000 times, and seen more than 10,000 conversions and additions to the church." He was a man of clear understanding and capable of great labor. His habit of reasoning was logical and convincing and his sermons doctrinal and practical.

Simmons, Hon. William A., collector of the port of Boston, was born in that city Jan. 20, 1840. He was educated in the public schools of the city, but owing to the death of his father when he was about thirteen years of age, he was compelled to labor to aid in the support of the family. From fourteen to eighteen he was employed in a restaurant, working sixteen hours per day. From eighteen to twenty-two he was salesman in a dry-goods store, during which period he devoted the morning hours, from four to seven, to study. At the age of twenty-two he enlisted as a private in the 44th Massachusetts Regiment, and at the expiration of the service re-entered the dry-goods business. In 1864 he took an active part in the political canvass, and in 1865 was appointed Internal Revenue inspector, and subsequently General Revenue agent, which office he held until 1868. In that year he was admitted to the bar, and after practicing two years was, in 1870, appointed supervisor of Internal Revenue for Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Connecticut, and subsequently for the whole of New England. In 1874 he was appointed collector of the port of Boston, which office he still holds. From his boyhood he has been identified with the M. E. Church; was one of the official members in the old church on Hanover Street from 1861 to 1874, and is now one of the trustees in Winthrop M. E. church, in Boston Highlands.

Simonds, Samuel D., of the California Conference of the M. E. Church, is a native of Vermont, and commenced to preach at twenty years of age. He was admitted into the Troy Conference in 1835, and went to Michigan, from which Conference he was transferred to the Pacific work in 1850. He held at Sonoma, in 1851, the first camp-meeting in California. He served five years as editor of the Cal- ifornia Christian Advocate. He traveled districts and filled stations till 1868, when he retired from the active ministry, and commenced the publication of a magazine entitled The Living Way. He fills pulpits when requested, and is a local preacher of the church. Mr. Simonds was a member of the General Conference in 1856.

Simpson Centenary College is located at Indianola, Iowa, and was organized by the action of the Conference which met at Des Moines in 1867. The Rev. S. M. Vernon was the moving spirit in its organization and in securing its present location. Its first course of study was prepared and its first catalogue published in 1868. It began with the regular classical course of Eastern colleges, and a scientific course in which modern languages are substituted for the ancient classical, and has continued these courses to the present. Both sexes are admitted on equal terms, and pursue the same studies. Its faculty has been composed of men from the best institutions of the country, and some of them have had the additional advantage of European travel and culture. It has in active operation all the departments usually found in colleges, viz., preparatory, classical, scientific, musical, commercial, and telegraphic. In 1875 a law department was established at Des Moines, the capital, and it is now in its third year, and in successful operation. In its faculty are found three eminent lawyers, late of the supreme bench of the State. The college has a good brick building of three stories, in a beautiful campus of about twelve acres, just on the northern border of the city. The endowment fund is about $70,000, and steadily increasing. Over 200 students are enrolled annually: the largest number yet reached is 297. The alumni of the institution now number 110. The president of the board of trustees is the Hon. George G. Wright, LL.D., late United States Senator. The president of the college is Alexander Burns, D.D. Both have filled those positions since 1868. The college has now a good attendance of students, and will graduate a large class in June next (1878).

Simpson, Mrs. Ellen H. (née Verner), wife of Bishop Simpson, is a native of Pittsburgh, Pa. She was educated by parents deeply devoted to the M. E. Church, and at an early age united with it. After her marriage she shared without complaint the privations of an itinerant life, aiding her husband in his work. In later years she has accompanied him on many of his journeys, and has visited Mexico and the chief points in Europe, where she remained about a year. She has been active in benevolent work, in visiting the sick and poor, and in securing help for their relief. In the erection of the Home for the Aged of Philadelphia she was specially interested, and was from its commencement president of the Ladies' United Aid Society, which seeured a property now valued at $200,000, and in behalf of which she superintended the management of several large fairs, which yielded an average of $20,000 each. She also helped to organize, and was first president of, the Philadelphia Bible-Readers Society. In the Centennial Exhibition, she was a member of the ladies' executive committee, and devised the plan for obtaining sketches and engravings of all the public charities originated and sup-

ing his duties he has visited and held Conferences in all the States and in most of the Territories: was sent by the General Conference as delegate to the Irish and British Conference in 1857, and was also a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance in Berlin the same year, from whence he extended his travels through Turkey, the Holy Land, Egypt, and Greece, returning in 1858. In 1859 he changed his residence from Pittsburgh to Evanston, where he acported by women. Some 800 of these plans were furnished from various countries in Europe, as well as from the different States. This department is still preserved in the Permanent Exhibition.

Simpson, Matthew, D.D., LL.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Cadiz, O., June 20, 1811. He received an academic education in his native town, and attended Madison College, Pa. (subsequently merged into Alleghany College), where he was elected to the office of tutor in his eighteenth year. He engaged in teaching, and having studied medicine in 1833, he commenced its practice. About the same time, feeling it his duty to enter the ministry, he was licensed to preach, and was received on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference. In 1837 he was elected vice-president, and Professor of Natural Science in Alleghany College, and in 1839 was elected president of Indiana Asbury University, where he remained until, in 1848, he was elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate. In 1852 he was chosen to the office of bishop. In discharging his duties he has visited and held Conferences in all the States and in most of the Territories: was sent by the General Conference as delegate to the Irish and British Conference in 1857, and was also a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance in Berlin the same year, from whence he extended his travels through Turkey, the Holy Land, Egypt, and Greece, returning in 1858. In 1859 he changed his residence from Pittsburgh to Evanston, where he accepted the position of president of the Garrett Biblical Institute, to which, however, he devoted but little active work. During the Civil War he delivered a number of addresses in behalf of the Union, and was urged by the Secretary of War to undertake the organization of the freedmen at the establishment of the bureau, and was afterwards invited by President Grant to go as a commissioner to San Domingo. Both of these offers he respectfully declined. In 1870, at the death of Bishop Kingsley, he visited Europe to complete the work which had been assigned to him on the Continent, and also as a delegate to the English Conference. In 1874 he visited Mexico, and in 1875 again visited Europe, to hold the Conference of Germany and Switzerland, and also to meet the missionaries in different parts of the Continent. He has written "A Hundred Years of Methodism," and is editor of the Cyclopædia of Methodism.

Simpson, Matthew, Esq., was born in Ireland in June, 1776, and emigrated to America in 1793. He was for many years engaged in teaching, and was a thorough scholar and extensive reader. He represented Harrison Co., O., in the State senate for ten years, and was for seven years judge of the county court. He was, from his early youth, a member of the M. E. Church, and occupied every official position. He was a close biblical student, reading the Scriptures in the original Greek and Hebrew, which practice he continued till a late period of his life. For many years he resided chiefly with his nephew, Bishop Simpson, who was indebted to him for a great part of his intellectual and moral training. He died in Alleghany City in 1874, at the advanced age of ninety-eight.

Sinex, Thomas H., D.D., is a native of Indiana. He entered the Indiana Asbury University in 1839, and received the degree of A.B. in 1842. In 1843 he was admitted on trial in the Indiana Conference of the M. E. Church. He traveled a few years, filling good appointments, and then engaged in teaching. He served a number of years as president of Albion College, in Michigan. He was a member of the General Conference in 1864. The same year he was transferred to California, and served three years as pastor in Santa Clara. He was then elected president of the University of the Pacific, with which institution he is still connected. He is now Professor of Mathematics.

Singing was regarded as an important part of temple worship in the time of David, and in the subsequent ages. Christ and his apostles sang a hymn as they went out to the Mount of Olives. Nearly every branch of the Christian church has made it an important part of public and social worship. Revivals of religion have generally been accompanied by a true revival of sacred song. Luther wrote and published a number of hymns, and also gave great attention to sacred music. In the early days of Methodism, singing was one of the chief elements of power; and Mr. Wesley very early in his ministry prepared both hymns and tunes for the benefit of his people. His first collection of psalms and hymns was edited in 1738; those designed specially for his societies were published by himself and brother in 1739, and from that time they wrote and published hymns, almost every year, on special and important occasions. In 1742 he published "A Collection of Tunes set to Music, as they are Sung at the Foundry," and subsequently he published a volume of hymns with tunes annexed. He also published a work on "Sacred Harmony; or, a Choice Collection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, in Two or Three Numbers, for the Voice, Harpsichord, and Organ." He preferred, however, simple melody, and published also a volume entitled "Sacred Melody; or, a Choice Collection of Psalm and Hymn Tunes, with a Short Introduction." When he published his select hymns with tunes, he says, "I have endeavored for more than twenty years to procure such a book as this in vain. Masters of music were above following any direction but their own, and I was determined whoever compiled this should follow my direction, not mending our tunes, but setting them down neither better nor worse than they were. At length I prepared the following collection, which contains the tunes in common use among us." He exceedingly disliked the monopoly of singing by choirs, and also disliked in public worship fugue tunes, or those in which different words were sung by the performers of different parts. In 1788, in attending a church service, he writes, "I was greatly disgusted at the manner of singing; twelve or fourteen persons kept it to themselves, and quite shut out the congregation. These repeated the same words contrary to all sense and reason, six or eight times, according to the shocking custom of modern music. Different persons sung different words at one and the same moment, an indubitable insult on common sense and utterly incompatible with proper devotion." On one occasion he wrote, "Beware of formality in singing, or it will creep in upon us unawares. Is it not creeping in already by those complex tunes which it is scarce possible to sing with devotion; such as 'Praise the Lord Ye Blessed Ones;' such the long quavering hallelujah annexed to the morning song, which I defy any man living to sing devotionally? The repeating the same words so often, especially while another repeats different words, shocks all common sense, brings in dead formality, and has no more of religion in it than a Lancashire hornpipe. Do not suffer the people to sing too slow; this naturally tends to formality, and is brought in by those who have very strong or very weak voices. Why should not the assistant see that they be taught to sing in every large society?" His attachment to congregational singing was so strong that, in 1781, when he preached at Warrington, he writes, "I put a stop to a bad custom which was creeping in here. A few men who had fine voices sung a psalm which no one knew, in a tone fit for an opera, wherein three or four persons sing different words at the same time. What an insult upon common sense! what a burlesque upon public worship! No custom can excuse such a mixture of profaneness and absurdity." He not only urged that the people in the congregation should sing, but he was especially delighted with the singing of children. Visiting at Bolton in 1787, he says, "About a hundred of them, part boys and part girls, are taught to sing, and they sang so true that, all singing together, there seemed to be but one voice. In the evening many of the children still hovered around the house. I desired forty or fifty to come in and sing 'Vital Spark of Heavenly Flame.' Although some of them were silent, not being able to sing for tears, yet the harmony was such as I believe could not be equaled in the finest chapel." And on another visit, he said, "There is no such another set of singers in any of the Methodist congregations in the three kingdoms as there is at Bolton; there cannot be, for we have near a hundred trebles, boys and girls, selected out of all our Sunday-school scholars, accurately taught, as are not to be found together in any chapel, cathedral, or music-room within all four seas. The spirit with which they all sing, and the beauty of many of them so suits the melody, that I defy any to exceed it except the singing of angels in our Father's house." In his chapel at the Foundry, in London, in his five o'clock services, he frequently gave special directions as to singing; and when he found the congregation erring he would stop them and sing the tune over himself, and then ask them to join with him, until they sung correctly. In the Larger Minutes also, he directed all the preachers to be careful in singing, to prevent formality, and to require every large society to learn to sing. The men were requested to sing their parts alone, and no new tunes were to be introduced until the people understood the old ones. The preachers were also directed to exhort every one in the congregation to sing, and to sing lustily. The present directions in the Discipline of the M. E. Churches are, "To guard against formality in singing: 1. Choose such hymns as are proper for the occasion, and do not sing too much at once; seldom more than four or five verses. 2. Let the tunes be suited to the sentiment, and do not suffer the people to speak too slowly. 3. In every society let due attention be given to the cultivation of sacred music. 4. If the preacher in charge desires it, let the Quarterly Conference appoint annually a committee of three or more to co-operate with him, who shall regulate all matters relating to this part of divine worship. 5. As singing is a part of divine worship in which all ought to enter, therefore exhort every person in the congregation to sing: not one in ten only." At present, in the congregations, and especially in the Sunday-schools, greater attention is paid to congregational singing in Methodist Churches than was the custom twenty or thirty years since.

Sing Sing, N. Y. (pop. 4696), is situated on the Hudson River, 33 miles north of New York. From 1840, for several years John Luckey was appointed chaplain at Sing Sing prison. Besides his services to the convicts he preached to the citizens, and in 1843 a Sing Sing circuit was organized, with James Youngs as pastor. In 1857 it had become a regular station, having 535 members, 240 Sunday-school scholars, and $13,000 church property. It is now in the New York Conference, and has two stations: Sing Sing, 674 members, 260 Sunday-school scholars, and $21,000 church property; and North Sing Sing, having 140 members, 130 Sunday-school scholars, and $15,000 church property.

Sioux City, Iowa (pop. 3401), the capital of Woodbury County, is situated on the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad. It is first mentioned in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1855, as a mission. In 1856 it was united with Sergeant's Bluffs, and Landon Taylor was appointed pastor. It is in the Northwest Iowa Conference, and the M. E. Church has 92 members, 135 Sunday-school scholars, and $4000 church property. The German M. E. Church has 83 members and 64 Sunday-school scholars.

Slavens, James W. L., was born in Indiana in 1839, and removed to Kansas City, Mo., in the year 1865, and entered into mercantile life. He has been very active in promoting church interests, and has given generously towards the erection of the fine Grand Avenue M. E. church. His qualifications and devotion to the church led to his being elected as lay delegate from the St. Louis Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Slavery.—The relation of Methodism to the slave-trade was from its beginning one of antagonism. The only exception to this was in the case of Mr. Whitefield. Having been proffered the assistance of slaves for building and altering his Orphan House in Georgia, he appears to have been persuaded that not only was slave-holding right, but that the slave-trade itself might be looked upon favorably. In 1751, when about to sail for America, he penned a letter to Mr. Wesley, which is dated Bristol, March 22, in which occur the following passages: "As for the lawfulness of keeping slaves I have no doubt, since I hear of some that were bought with Abraham's money, and some that were born in his house. I also cannot help thinking that some of those servants mentioned by the apostles in their epistles were, or had been, slaves. It is plain that the Gibeonites were doomed to perpetual slavery; and though liberty is a sweet thing to such as are born free, yet to those who never knew the sweets of it, slavery, perhaps, may not be irksome; however this be, it is plain to a demonstration that hot countries cannot be cultivated without negroes. What a flourishing country might Georgia be had the use of them been permitted years ago! How many white people have been destroyed for want of them! and how many thousand pounds spent for no purpose at all! Though it is true they are brought in a wrong way from their own country, and it is a trade not to be approved of, yet as it will be carried on, whether we will or not, I should think myself highly favored if I could purchase a good number of them, in order to make these slaves comfortable, and lay a foundation for bringing up their posterity in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. I had no hand in bringing them into Georgia, though my judgment was for it, and I was strongly importuned thereto; yet I would not have a negro upon my plantation till the use of them was publicly allowed by the colony. Now, this is done, let us diligently improve the present opportunity for their instruction." In accordance with this declaration, and with a purpose to do good, he procured a number of slaves, and at his death twenty years afterwards, he was the owner of seventy-five in connection with his Orphan House plantation in Georgia. In his will he bequeathed this estate, with all its "buildings, lands, and negroes," "to that elect lady, that mother in Israel, that mirror of true and undefiled religion, the Rt. Hon. Selina, Countess Dowager of Huntingdon."

Mr. Wesley's sentiments were entirely opposed to the whole system. In his journal, Feb. 12, 1772, is the following entry: "I read a very different book published by an honest Quaker on that execrable sum of all villainies commonly called the slave-trade. I read of nothing like it in the heathen world, whether ancient or modern; and it infinitely exceeds in every instance of barbarity what Christian slaves suffer in Mohammedan countries." The book to which he alludes was, probably, one written by Anthony Benezet, a French Protestant, who became a Quaker in Philadelphia, and who, in 1762, published a work which attracted much attention. Mr. Wesley's utterance will be considered a remarkable one, when we remember that it was in 1772 that the first English anti-slavery advocate, Granville Sharp, began to agitate this subject, and not until fifteen years afterwards was the society for the suppression of the slave-trade founded. Thus Mr. Wesley was among the first in England to denounce the slave-trade "in the strongest terms it was possible to employ." In 1774 he published "Thoughts on Slavery," in advance not only of the formation of the society, but before the active efforts of Wilberforce and others. His tract brought upon him much censure and opposition, and he was ridiculed in the publications of the day. The tract was, however, republished in Philadelphia by Mr. Benezet, who sent him a friendly letter by William Dillwyn, whom he styles "a valuable religiously-minded person who is going a voyage to your country." When Mr. Wilberforce introduced the subject in the British Parliament, Mr. Wesley wrote to him the last letter which he ever penned, only six days before his death, to cheer him in his work, in which he says, "Unless the divine power has raised you up to be as Athanasius, contra mundum, I see not how you can go through your glorious enterprise in opposing that execrable villany, which is the scandal of religion, of England, and of human nature. Unless God has raised you up for this very thing you will be worn out by the opposition of men and devils; but if God be for you who can be against you? Are all of men together stronger than God? Oh, be not weary in well-doing! Go on in the name of God, and in the power of his might, till even American slavery, the vilest that ever saw the sun, shall vanish away before it." "Reading this morning a tract wrote by a poor African, I was particularly struck by that circumstance, . . . that a man who has a black skin, being wronged or outraged by a white man, can have no redress; it being a law in our colonies that the oath of a black against a white goes for nothing. What villany is this!" Animated by the same sentiment, the early Methodist preachers in America commenced their labors, but soon found themselves surrounded by many practical difficulties. In the Conference held at Baltimore, April, 1780, when there were but forty-two ministers, and the country was in the midst of its Revolutionary struggle, we find the following questions and answers:

"Q. 16. Ought not this Conference to require those traveling preachers who hold slaves to give promises to set them free? A. Yes. Q. 17. Does this Conference acknowledge that slavery is contrary to the laws of God, man, and of nature, and hurtful to society; contrary to the dictates of conscience and pure religion, and doing that we would not that others should do to us and ours? And do we pass our disapprobation upon all our friends who keep slaves, and advise their freedom? A. Yes. Q. 25. Ought not the assistant to meet the colored people himself and appoint helpers in his absence, proper white persons, and not suffer them to stay late or to meet by themselves? A. Yee."

These declarations created much excitement in several localities, but no further action appears in the minutes until 1783, when we find the following entry:

"Q. 10. What shall be done with our local preachers who hold slaves contrary to the laws, which authorize their freedom in any of the United States? A. We will try them another year. In the mean time let every assistant deal faithfully and plainly with every one and report to the next Conference, it may then be necessary to suspend them."

Again in 1784:

"Q. 12. What shall we do with our friends that will buy and sell slaves? A. If they buy with no other design than to hold them as slaves, and have been previously warned, they shall be expelled, and permitted to sell on no consideration. Q. 13. What shall we do with our local preachers who will not emancipate their slaves in the States where the laws admit it? A. Try those in Virginia another year, and suspend the preachers in Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey."

Jesse Lee, in his History, says, "However good the intention of the preachers might be in framing these rules, we are well assured that they never were of any particular service to our societies; some slaves, however, obtained their freedom in consequence of these rules." It will be observed that even in these stringent regulations they did not propose to enforce them where the laws of the State did not admit emancipation. At the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church at the close of the year 1784, the following paragraph touching the colored population on the subject of slavery was inserted :

" Q. 41. Are there any directions to be given concerning the negroes? A. Let every preacher as often as possible meet them in class. Let the assistant always appoint a proper white person as their leader. Let the assistant also make a regular return to the Conference of the number of negroes in society in their respective circuits. Q. 42. What methods can we take to extirpate slavery? A. We are deeply conscious of the impropriety of making new terms of communion for a religious society already established, except on the most pressing occasion; and such we esteem the practice of holding our fellow-creatures in slavery. We view it as contrary to the golden law of God, on which hang all the law and the prophets, and the inalienable rights of mankind, as well as every principle of the Revolution, to hold in the deepest debasement, in a more abject slavery than is perhaps to be found in any part of the world except America, so many souls all capable of the image of God. We, therefore, think it our most bounden duty to take immediately some effectual methods to extirpate this abomination from among us, and for that purpose we add the following to the rules of our society, to wit:

" 1. Every member of our society who has slaves in his possession shall, within twelve months after notice given to him by the assistant (which notice the assistants are required immediately, and without delay to give in their respective circuits), legally execute and record an instrument whereby he emancipates and sets free every slave in his possession who is between the ages of forty and forty-five immediately, or at furthest, when they arrive at the age of forty-five. And every slave who is between the ages of twenty-five and forty immediately, or at furthest, at the expiration of five years from the date of the said instrument; and every slave who is between the ages of twenty and twenty-five immediately, or at furthest, when they arrive at the age of thirty; and every slave under the age of twenty as soon as they arrive at the age of twenty-five at furthest; and every infant born in slavery after the above-mentioned rules are complied with, immediately on its birth.

" 2. Every assistant shall keep a journal, in which he shall regularly minute down the names and ages of all the slaves belonging to all the masters in his respective circuit, and also the date of every instrument executed and recorded for the manumission of the slaves, with the name of the court, book, and folio in which said instruments respectively shall have been recorded, which journal shall be handed down in each circuit to the succeeding assistants.

" 3. In consideration that these rules form a new term of communion, every person concerned who will not comply with them shall have liberty quietly to withdraw himself from our society within the twelve months succeeding the notice given as aforesaid; otherwise the assistant shall exclude him in the society.

" 4. No person so voluntarily withdrawn, or so excluded, shall ever partake of the Supper of the Lord with the Methodists till he complies with the above requisitions.

" 5. No person holding slaves shall in future be admitted into society, or to the Lord's Supper, till he previously complies with these rules concerning slavery.

" N. B.—These rules are to affect the members of our society no further than as they are consistent with the laws of the States in which they reside. And respecting our brethren in Virginia that are concerned, and after due consideration of their peculiar circumstances, we allow them two years from the notice given to consider the expediency of compliance or non-compliance with these rules.

" Q. 43. What shall be done with those who buy or sell slaves or give them away? A. They are immediately to be expelled, unless they buy them on purpose to free them."

Great excitement followed the attempts of the ministers to execute the Discipline, and in 1785 we find the following minute:

" It is recommended to all our brethren to suspend the execution of the minute on slavery till the deliberations of a future Conference; and that an equal space of time be allowed all our members for consideration when the minutes shall be put in force.

" N. B.—We hold in the deepest abhorrence the practice of slavery; and shall not cease to seek its destruction by all wise and prudent means."

Two years afterwards, in 1787, the interests of the colored people were again considered:

" Q. 17. What direction shall we give for the promotion of the spiritual welfare of the colored people? A. We conjure all our ministers and preachers by the love of God and the salvation of souls, and do require them by all the authority that is invested in us, to leave nothing undone for the spiritual benefit and salvation of them within their respective circuits or districts; and for this purpose, to embrace every opportunity of inquiring into the state of their souls, and to unite in society those who appear to have a real desire of fleeing from the wrath to come; to meet such in class, and to exercise the whole Methodist discipline amongst them."

This is the last entry which we find in the minutes of the Annual Conferences, as after 1792 all legislation belonged to the General Conference. In 1789 the following clause was inserted in the General Rules among things forbidden:

" The buying or selling of the bodies and souls of men, women, or children, with the intention to enslave them."

In 1792 the words "of the bodies and souls" was omitted. In 1796 the following paragraphs were introduced in the Discipline:

" Q. What regulation shall be made for the extirpation of the crying evil of African slavery? A. 1. We declare we are more than ever convinced of the great evil of the African slavery which still exists in these United States, and do most earnestly recommend the Quarterly Conferences, quarterly meetings, and those who have the oversight of districts and circuits, to be exceedingly cautious what persons they admit to official stations in our church; and in the case of future admission to official stations, to require such security of those who hold slaves for the emancipation of them, immediately or gradually, as the laws of the States respectively or the circumstances of the case admit. And we do fully authorize all Quarterly Conferences to make whatever regulations they judge proper in the present case respecting the admission of persons to official stations in our church.

" 2. No slave-holder shall be received into society till the preacher who has the oversight of the circuit has spoken to him freely and faithfully on the subject of slavery.

" 3. Every member of the society who sells a slave, shall immediately, after full proof, be excluded the society; and if any member of our society purchase a slave, the ensuing quarterly meeting shall determine on the number of years in which the slave so purchased would work out the price of his purchase, and the person so purchasing shall immediately after such date execute a legal instrument for the manumission of such slave at the expiration of the term determined by the quarterly meeting. And in default of his executing such instrument of manumission, or on his refusal to submit his case to the judgment of the quarterly meeting, such a member shall be excluded the society; provided always, that in the case of a female slave, it shall be inserted in the aforesaid instrument of manumission that all her children who shall be born in the years of her servitude shall be free at the following time, viz., every female child at the age of twenty-one, and every male child at the age of twenty-five. Nevertheless, if the member of our society executing the said instrument of manumission judge it proper, he may fix the times of manumission, of the children of the female slaves before mentioned at an earlier age than that prescribed above.

" 4. The preachers and other members of our society are required to consider the subject of negro slavery with deep attention until the ensuing General Conference, and that they impart to the General Conference, through the medium of the Quarterly Conference or otherwise, any important thoughts upon the subject, that the Conference may have full light in order to take further steps to eradicate this enormous evil from that part of the church of God to which they are united."

In 1800 the following paragraphs were added :

"2. When any traveling preacher becomes an owner of a slave or slaves by any means, he shall forfeit his ministerial character in our church unless he execute, if it be practicable, a legal emancipation of such slaves, conformable to the laws of the State in which he lives.

"6. The Annual Conferences are directed to draw up addresses for the gradual emancipation of the slaves to the legislatures of those States in which no general laws have been passed for that purpose. These addresses shall urge in the most respectful but pointed manner the necessity of a law for the gradual emancipation of the slave. Proper committees shall be appointed by the Annual Conferences out of the most respectable of our friends for the conducting of the business; and the presiding elders, elders, deacons, and traveling preachers shall procure as many proper signatures as possible to the addresses, and give all the assistance in their power in every respect to aid the committees and to further their blessed undertaking. Let this be continued from year to year until the desired end be accomplished."

In 1804 these paragraphs were slightly changed by striking out the words, "More than ever convinced of the great evil of the African slavery, which still exists in these United States," and inserting, "As much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery." The chief change, however, was the insertion of the following paragraph: "Members of our societies in the States of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee shall be exempted from the operation of the above rules." And everything in reference to petitions to the legislature was stricken out, and this clause was added: "Let our preachers, from time to time, as occasion serves, admonish and exhort all slaves to render due respect and obedience to the commands and interests of their respective masters." In 1808 that clause and all that related to slave-holding among private members was struck out, and the following was substituted: "The General Conference authorizes each Annual Conference to form its own regulations relative to buying and selling slaves."

Slight changes were made in 1812, in 1816, and 1820. All these changes indicate the difficulties which were encountered in the slave-holding States in attempting to execute the Discipline among the membership of the church, and showing the conflict which existed between Northern and Southern minds. In 1824 the chapter was amended so as to read:

"1. We declare that we are as much as ever convinced of the great evil of slavery: therefore no slave-holder shall be eligible to any official station in our church hereafter where the laws of the State in which he lives will admit of emancipation, and permit the liberated slave to enjoy freedom.

"2. When any traveling preacher becomes an owner of a slave or slaves, by any means, he shall forfeit his ministerial character in our church unless he execute, if it be practicable, a legal emancipation of such slaves, conformably to the laws of the State in which he lives.

"3. All our preachers shall prudently enforce upon our members the necessity of teaching their slaves to read the word of God; and to allow them time to attend upon the public worship of God on our regular days of divine service.

"4. Our colored preachers and official members shall have all the privileges which are usual to others in the District and Quarterly Conferences, where the usages of the country do not forbid it. And the presiding elder may hold for them a separate District Conference, where the number of colored local preachers will justify it.

"5. The Annual Conferences may employ colored preachers to travel and preach where their services are judged necessary; provided, that no one shall be so employed without having been recommended according to the form of Discipline."

In this form the Discipline remained until after the separation of the Southern Conferences in 1845. When Dr. Coke visited America to organize the church, his opposition to slavery was intense, and very probably the specific regulations in the Discipline of 1784 were suggested by him. Shortly after the close of Conference he visited the Southern States, and found the people considerably excited. In visiting a friend in Virginia, he says, "We now talked largely on the minutes concerning slavery; but he would not be persuaded. The secret is, he has twenty-four slaves of his own; but I am afraid he will do infinite hurt by his opposition to our rules." On the 5th of April, 1788, we find this entry in his journal: "Here have I dared, for the first time, to bear a public testimony against slavery, but I do not find that more than one was offended." On the 7th of the same month he says, "I went some miles to a dying friend, and spent about half a day with him in drawing up his will, in which he emancipates, at times there specified, his eight slaves. This is a good beginning." Two days afterwards he says, "The testimony I bore in this place against slave-holding provoked many of the unawakened to retire out of the barn, and to combine together to flog me (so they expressed it) as soon as I came out; and a high-headed lady also went out and told the rioters (as I was afterwards informed) that she would give fifty pounds if they would give that little doctor one hundred lashes. When I came out they surrounded me, but had only power to talk. Brother Martin is a justice of the peace, and seized one of them; and Colonel Taylor, a fine, strong man, who has lately joined us, but is only half-awakened, was putting himself in a posture of fighting, but God restrained the rage of the multitude. Our Brother Martin has done gloriously, for he has fully and immediately emancipated fifteen slaves, and that sermon which made so much noise, has so affected one of the brethren that he came to Brother Martin and desired him to draw up a proper instrument for the emancipation of his eight slaves. Another has also emancipated one." As he went farther southward he felt himself prohibited from speaking in public. April 14, he says, "I have now done with my testimony against slavery for a time, being got into North Carolina again, the laws of this State forbidding any to emancipate their negroes." At the Conference which was held in that State a few days afterwards he says, "We have also drawn up a petition to the general assembly of North Carolina, signed by the Conference, entreating them to pass an act to authorize those who are so disposed to emancipate their slaves. Mr. Asbury has visited the governor and has gained him over." Returning to Virginia to hold that Conference early in May, we find the following entry: "Since my visit to the islands I have found a peculiar gift for speaking to the blacks; it seems to be almost irresistible. Who knows but the Lord is preparing me for a visit in some future time to the coast of Africa?" On another occasion he says, "In the course of my journey through this State I visited the county of Halifax, where I met with a little persecution on my former visit to this continent, on account of the public testimony I bore against negro slavery. I am now informed that soon after I left the county on my former tour a bill was entered against me as a seditious person, and was found by the grand jury: and ninety persons had engaged to pursue me and bring me back again; but their hearts failed them. Another bill was also presented in one of the neighboring counties, but was thrown out. Many of the people, I find, imagined I would not venture among them again. However, when I came, they received me with perfect peace and quietness, and my visit, I have reason to believe, was made a blessing to many. Indeed, I now acknowledge that however just my sentiments may be concerning slavery, it was ill-judged of me to deliver them from the pulpit. A man who pursued me with a gun, in order to shoot me, when I was in this neighborhood before (but this circumstance was then secreted from me), is now converted to God and become a member of our society."

The latter part of May, 1785, we find the following entry relating to a visit to General Washington: "After dinner we desired a private interview, and opened to him the grand business on which we came, presenting to him our petition for the emancipation of the negroes, and entreating his signature, if the eminence of his station did not render it inexpedient for him to sign any petition. He informed us he was of our sentiments, and had signified his thoughts upon the subject to most of the great men of the State; that he did not see it proper to sign the petition, but if the assembly took it into consideration, would signify his sentiments to the assembly by a letter." Thus we find that Methodism from its earliest organization in the United States, both publicly and privately, used its influence to limit and destroy the system of slavery. But as the churches grew strong through the Southern States, and as the laws did not admit of emancipation, slavery became interwoven so thoroughly into all departments of society, and either directly or indirectly influenced the members of the church, that it was looked upon more favorably, and in process of time defenders of the system arose among the Southern membership and ministry. The declaration, however, remained, that slavery was a great evil, and that certain steps should be taken towards its removal. It may seem strange, but it is, nevertheless, true, that with all this record and with all these efforts there arose a party in the church in the Northern States who bitterly accused the church of being pro-slavery in sentiment, and on this ground the Wesleyan Methodists, as they termed themselves, seceded from the church in 1842. In 1844, however, a great struggle arose in the General Conference. A member of the Baltimore Conference had become by marriage a slave-holder and refused to manumit his slaves. As emancipation was possible in Maryland, the Baltimore Conference considered his case, and suspended him from the ministry. He appealed from the decision of the Baltimore Conference, but their decision was confirmed by a large majority. At the same session, Bishop Andrews having married a wife who owned slaves, and it being possible for the bishop to remove from Georgia, where manumission was impracticable, to a State where emancipation might be made, his case was considered by the General Conference. After a long and exciting debate the General Conference determined that it was their sense "he should desist from the exercise of his office until the impediments should be removed." Bishop Andrews would willingly, it is understood, have yielded to the opinions of the General Conference, but his brethren in the South thought that it was his duty to stand by them on a question which they considered to be one involving their rights: and accordingly meetings were held by them and steps taken looking to the organization of a church in the South. This organization was accomplished the following year, and the chief part of the membership in the entire slave-holding territory, with the exception of the States of Maryland and Delaware, separated, and formed the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Thus by adhering to her anti-slavery principles the church lost nearly 500,000 members and the control of much church property and many literary institutions. After their separation the expression of the church on the subject of slavery was more free. In 1856 the chapter on slavery was altered so as to give a clear and decided expression against slave-holding in every form, and efforts were nearly successful to change the General Rule. This was not fully accomplished, however, until the General Conference of 1864, although the Annual Conferences had taken action on the subject, and the sentiments of the nected himself with the Bromfield Street church, of which he is still a member. He has been, with the exception of a short interval, a class-leader in that church, and since 1830 he has been superintendent of the Sunday-school, and a trustee and steward of the church. He was also one of the original incorporators of the Boston Wesleyan Association, which was organized in 1831 for the church had been clearly expressed shortly after the General Conference of 1860. While not entering the political arena, or taking part as a church in the excited elections, no other agency was so potent in affecting the public mind, and in preparing for the triumph of anti-slavery principles.

Sleeper, Hon. Jacob, ex-mayor of Boston, was born in New Castle, Me., Nov. 21, 1802, and removed to Belfast, Me., in 1816. He united with the M. E. Church in 1821, under Rev. G. F. Cox, and contributed the first $50 he ever had to spare towards the building of an M. E. church in that place. In 1825 he removed to Boston, and con-publication and management of Zion's Herald, and which, at a later day, erected the Wesleyan building, at a cost of about $300,000. He has also been a trustee of the Wesleyan University, and from its commencement of the Boston University, in the founding and success of which he has taken a deep interest. In addition to his church positions, he has been connected with many reformatory and philanthropic interests of the city; was president of the first and tenth State Sabbath-school Conventions, president of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association in 1855-56, trustee of the Massachusetts Bible Society, and vice-president of the American Bible Society. Among the offices with which he has been intrusted by his fellow-citizens were: two years alderman of the city of Boston; two years a member of the legislature of the State; three years a member of the executive council; twelve years overseer of Harvard University, having been twice elected to that position by the legislature of Massachusetts. He has also been connected with the management of banking, insurance, and mercantile corporations.

Slicer, Henry, D.D., a prominent minister in the M. E. Church, was born in Annapolis, Md., March 27, 1801. He was converted in the seventeenth year of his age, and was received on trial in the Baltimore Conference in 1822. He was superannuated in 1874. His ministry extended over a most interesting period, not only of the church, but of the nation. In the early part of his ministry he was in the midst of the Methodist Protestant controversy, and afterwards in the excitement occasioned by the division of the church in 1845. In all of these agitations he adhered to the M. E. Church with a sterling integrity. Her polity and doctrines were greatly loved by him. In a pastorate of fifty-two years, his appointments ranged over a great portion of Maryland and Virginia. He was a member of eight General Conferences, viz., 1832, 1840, 1844, 1852, 1856, 1860, 1868, and 1872; in nearly all of these he was a prominent actor. His knowledge of the doctrines and polity of the church was accurate; his administration, whether as pastor or presiding elder, was judicious. "In preaching and in debate he was incisive and controversial. In his prime, the power of his discourses was extraordinary." He was a man of vigorous intellect, but of moderate education. He was self-possessed, self-reliant, and persistent in duty. "By his earnest piety, considerable study in his early ministry, abundant use of social helps, and unflinching devotion to his work as a Methodist preacher, he arose to a high rank among his brothers, and held during his life a prominent position in the church and community." He died April 26, 1874.

Slifer, Hon. Eli, ex-secretary of Pennsylvania, was born in 1818. He was apprenticed in 1834 to the hatting trade in Lewisburg. In 1841 he removed to Northumberland and engaged in the boat-building business, and, returning to Lewisburg, established the business on a larger scale. Subsequently he became interested in a foundry and machine-shop for agricultural implements. In 1848 he first entered political circles, and in the following year was elected to the legislature, and was re-elected. In 1851 he was elected to the Senate. In 1855 he accepted the office of State treasurer, but retired in 1856. In 1859 he was again elected State treasurer, and was re-elected in 1860. In 1861 he accepted the office of secretary of state under Governor Curtin, which position he held during the war, and until 1867, when he retired with impaired health. He has since passed nearly a year in Europe. He has been for many years a member of the M. E. Church; has filled many of its official positions, and is devoted to all its interests. He was elected as reserve lay delegate to the General Conference of 1876 from the Central Pennsylvania Conference.

Small, Samuel M., a colored minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Maryland, a slave, about 1803. He was taken to New Orleans in 1836. In 1850 he began to preach the gospel by a license given him by Rev. H. N. McTyeire, now one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. During the war he was taken over into Alabama. "in order to keep him from the delight of freedom." Here he zealously preached to his fellow-servants. The war being over, he returned to New Orleans, one year before the re-organization of the Louisiana Conference, in company with Rev. Hardy Ryan. They traveled extensively, preaching the gospel, under the direction of Dr. Newman, preaching especially as missionaries to the freedmen. They proceeded up the coast as far as Baton Rouge, and many were converted. He was admitted on trial in the Louisiana Conference in 1865, and was subsequently stationed at Alexandria, New Orleans, and Baton Rouge. His health failing he removed to Feliciana Parish. Here his labors were successful in organizing one of the largest Sunday-schools in the Conference. He died Oct. 12, 1873. His bearing was gentlemanly and dignified. He had great determination of purpose, and was a true Christian.

Smart, James S., was born in Searsport, Me., in 1825, and was converted when sixteen years of age, under the ministry of Parker Jaques. Attaining his majority, he went to Michigan, and when twenty-three years of age joined the Michigan Conference, and was appointed to Ingham circuit. In 1855 he was at Grass Lake, Mich., and when that Conference was divided he fell within the bounds of the Detroit Conference, and was stationed at Ypsilanti during the years 1856-57. The years of 1858-61 he was presiding elder of Flint district. In 1862 he raised a company of 110 men for the war, and was elected captain, but was soon elected chaplain of the 23d Michigan Infantry. In 1863 he was stationed at Congress Street, Detroit, and in 1864-65 he was financial agent of the Garrett Biblical Institute, at Evanston, Ill. He suggested the name Heek Hall for the prominent building connected with the institute, and was mainly instrumental in raising the funds for its erection. Mr. Smart has been a member of four General Conferences of the Church, 1860, 1864, 1872, and 1876.

Smith, Augustus William, LL.D., formerly president of Wesleyan University, was born at Newport, Herkimer Co., N. Y., May 12, 1802, and graduated at Hamilton College in 1825. Subsequently he became a teacher in the Oneida Conference Seminary, at Cazenovia, N. Y.; was Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy in Wesleyan University from its commencement to 1857, when he was chosen president. After resigning his position as president, he became Professor of Natural Philosophy in the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Md., which position he held until his death, March 26, 1866. He was the author of several mathematical text-books.

Smith, Charles W., A.M., was born in Fayette Co., Pa., Jan. 30, 1840, and was converted in his eighteenth year. Having received a good education he entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1859, and has filled a number of the most prominent appointments. He was a delegate from the Pittsburgh Conference to the General Conference of 1876, and was appointed a member of the publishing committee of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate. He is the son of the veteran minister, Rev. Wesley Smith.

Smith, Hon. Daniel, a lay delegate from the Liberia Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, removed to Liberia in early life, and was educated at the Monrovia Academy. He afterwards became a teacher in the higher schools, then a preacher in the Mission church. Subsequently he engaged in mercantile business; was elected to the Senate of the republic; and was, at the time of his appointment as a delegate to the General Conference, an assistant judge of the Supreme Court of Liberia.

Smith, Edward, was born in Rockbridge Co., Va., in 1797. His father was a nephew of Thomas Walsh, one of John Wesley's early helpers. He was converted in 1821, and admitted into the Missouri Conference in 1824. In 1826 he was transferred to the Baltimore Conference, and in 1835 to the Pittsburgh Conference. After filling an appointment at Steubenville and St. Clairsville, he was presiding elder for four years on the Barnesville district. After one year's labor on Cadiz circuit, he was suspended by the Pittsburgh Conference for controversial statements growing out of the subject of anti-slavery, a cause which he had very warmly espoused. He was a member of the convention that organized the Wesleyan connection, which recognized his ministerial standing without reference to the suspension. He became editor of The Spirit of Liberty, and was pastor of the Wesleyan church in Pittsburgh from 1841 to 1846. In 1850 he was agent of the Western branch of the Wesleyan Book Concern, and editor of The Wesleyan Expositor in 1851. In 1853 he edited The Christian Statesman. In 1850 he was nominated by the Free-Soil party in Ohio as their candidate for governor. He died in Morrow Co., O., June 6, 1856. He was a man of great energy of character, a preacher of more than ordinary ability and usefulness; uncompromising in his convictions of duty, and dedicating his strength and talents to the cause of Christ.

Smith, George, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy in 1837, and continued in active service till 1869, when he became a permanent supernumerary. He fixed his home at Birmingham, where he still resides. He was elected to the presidency in 1849.

Smith, Gervase, M.A., an eminent English Wesleyan minister, has, from the year 1844, successively labored in some of the most important circuits in England with great acceptance and success. In 1870 he was set apart as the secretary of the metropolitan chapel building committee. In 1873 he was secretary of the Conference, and president in 1876.

Smith, Isaac, of the South Carolina Conference, was born in New Kent Co., Va., Aug. 17, 1758. He enlisted as a soldier in the Revolutionary War, served four years, and received a wound in his forehead, the traces of which were visible until the close of his life. He was at the battles of Princeton, Brandywine, Germantown, Monmouth, and Stony Point. In 1783 he was converted and united with the church. His first efforts at public speaking were so unsatisfactory that he doubted whether it was his duty to engage in the ministry; but he was encouraged by Bishop Asbury, and in 1784 was admitted on trial in the Conference. He filled a number of prominent appointments, and was presiding elder upon several southern districts. In 1822 he was appointed a missionary to the Creek Indians, where he remained for five successive years, his ministry among them being signally successful. He was a man of a sweet and loving disposition. As a preacher, he was very earnest in manner, and concise and energetic in language.

Smith, James, was born in 1791, and died in Sidney, O., in 1856. He was a native of Pennsylvania, and in 1818 was admitted on trial in the Ohio Conference. His health gave way under the severe labor of extensive traveling, and he settled in the town of Sidney. Assisting in holding a protracted meeting, he took cold and sunk quite rapidly. Near his death he looked upwards, and, raising both hands, exclaimed, "Do you see them?" "See whom?" was the inquiry. "That glorified throng," he replied. He was modest and unpretending, and was a plain, practical preacher.

Smith, John L., D.D., was born in Brunswick Co., Va., May 24, 1811; removed to Ohio in 1826, and joined the Indiana Conference in 1840. He labored successively in Muncie, Winchester, Cambridge, and Indianapolis, where he completed the former Roberts chapel. He was for three years an efficient agent of the Indiana Asbury University, and was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1852, 1860, 1864, 1868, and 1876. He also served four years on the general missionary committee; four years on the book committee; and was re-elected in 1876, and is now chairman. He has been since 1848 a member of the board of trustees of the Indiana Asbury University. He was actively engaged in founding the Thorntown Academy in 1855, and the Stockwell College Institute in 1859. He has served at different times as presiding elder, and is now (1877) in charge of the Thorntown district.

Smith, J. H. V., a native of Jefferson Co., Ind., born in 1830, was educated and graduated at Indiana Asbury University. Subsequently he spent nearly a score of years in conducting the City Book-Store and Methodist Book Depository, at Indianapolis. He is widely known in that State, and made the Sunday-school work a specialty. He occupied the seat of E. K. Hosford part of the session of the General Conference of 1872, as reserve delegate for the Southeastern Indiana Conference.

Smith, Joseph E., a member of the Wyoming Conference, was born in Queen Anne Co., Md., Sept. 1, 1830, and entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1857. After filling various prominent appointments he was transferred to the Wilmington Conference in 1874, and stationed in Grace church. In 1877 he was transferred to the Wyoming Conference, and stationed in Wilkesbarre. He published several sermons during the Civil War on the duty of the citizen to his country, and also several missionary and other addresses.

Smith, Joseph, Esq.—This well-known lawyer from the Pacific coast represented the Oregon Conference (lay electoral body) at the General Conference of 1872.

Smith, Joseph Jackson, was born in New Jersey, Feb. 3, 1817. At the age of fifteen he united with the M. P. Church. In 1836 he entered the itinerant ministry. Finding there the inconvenience of his lack of education, he resolved to apply himself to study, which he accordingly did with success. So large was his desire for culture, that he included Latin and afterwards Greek among his studies, and pursued them with the same resoluteness that he did the rest. He has served the church as Conference president and member of its general bodies. Some years ago he visited the Holy Land. As a writer he has contributed chiefly to the periodicals of the church. He is the author of two works, "The Impending Conflict" and "Wonders of the East."

study of law, and was admitted to practice in 1851. At the same time he was elected professor in Emory College, of which Dr. G. F. Pierce, now bishop, was then president. He served first as Professor of Latin, and subsequently of Greek. After serving in these positions for sixteen years, he was, in 1867, elected president of Emory College, where he remained until 1871, during which time the institution was visited with a remarkable religious influence. In 1875 he was elected chancellor of the Southern University, located at Greensborough, Ala., the position which he still holds. He has devoted the best years of his life to the cause of religious education, and has won the highest positions.

Smith, Peyton Pierce, of the Florida Conference of the M. E. Church South, was born in Franklin Co., Ga., Jan. 12, 1812; was admitted into the Georgia Annual Conference in 1832, and continued effective and useful in his labors until his death, in 1863. According to his journal, "he was a traveling preacher for thirty years and four months, during which time he preached 4414 sermons, baptized 1529 persons, made 5979 visits, wrote 4941 letters, and traveled, chiefly by private conveyance, 123,623 miles."

Smith, Philander, D.D., third bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada after the separate organization of 1828. His predecessors were Reynolds and Alley. He was born in Delaware Co., N. Y., in 1796; and was reared a Calvinist in all the exclusiveness of the Articles, prejudiced especially against the Methodists as "wild-fire" preachers. At an early age he removed to Canada and settled in Elizabethtown, near Brockville. At the session of the Genesee Conference held in Elizabethtown in 1817, under the preaching of Bishop George, he was converted to God. His prejudices disappeared, and he became a preacher among the Methodists. He traveled under the elder in 1819; in 1820 he joined the Genesee Conference, held again in Canada, by Bishop George, near Niagara. He was duly ordained deacon and elder by the American bishops; in 1826 was appointed a presiding elder of the Upper Canada work along with Madden and Case, and labored regularly in his appointments till the union of the Canada Conference with the British Wesleyans in 1833. One of a minority that opposed this action, dissatisfied with the abandonment of the episcopacy and the change of polity, and with the terms and causes of the union generally, he ceased from traveling for a little; and then, in 1836, he deposited his letter with the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which had again rallied and endeavored to hold on its way. In 1826, on the disabling of Bishop Alley by disease, he was elected to the episcopate, which office he held till his death, in 1870. As a preacher, he was earnest and effective,—instrumental in the conversion of many; as an administrator, he was calm and judicious; as an overseer in the church of Christ, he was watchful, self-sacrificing, and laborious. At the time of his death he had been fifty-one years an effective minister in the church of Christ.

Smith, Samuel W., was born in England, and commenced preaching at the age of nineteen. In 1834 he was admitted into the Conference. As a preacher, he was instructive and edifying. A few moments before his death he said, "This is a wonderful day; heaven and earth have come very near together." He died March 16, 1858, in the twenty-fourth year of his ministry.

Smith, Wesley, born in the county of Armagh, Ireland, in 1805, was the son of a class-leader and local preacher in the first Methodist society organized by Mr. Wesley in that county. He removed to America in 1816; was an exhorter and class-leader from 1823 to 1832, and entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1833. He was effective thirty-five years, twenty-seven in Pittsburgh and eight in West Virginia Conference. He finally superannuated in 1874. He has been a frequent contributor to the church periodicals and secular papers, and is the author of "A Defense of the M. E. Church against the Misrepresentations of Certain Wesleyan Preachers," "A Defense of the M. E. Church against the Attacks of Rev. S. Kelly and others of the M. E. Church South," "The Glory and Shame of the Great Republic," "Sprinkling or Pouring the only Scriptural Mode of Baptism," which has run through ten editions, and "A Guide to a Happy Home, or Courtship, Love, and Marriage." He now resides at Sharpsburg, Pa.

Smith, Wm., Esq., of Gledhow, Leeds, England,—Many years ago, in troublous times, when some feared that the contributions to the missionary cause would fall short, Joseph Thackray, Esq. (now living), suggested that it would be well for a few friends to meet at breakfast and devise means to prevent so sad an occurrence. Mr. Smith caught the idea; the breakfast was held at his house, liberal things were devised, and rich spiritual blessing was experienced. During Mr. Smith's lifetime the "Gledhow breakfast" was an important part of the anniversary. Too large for a private mansion, it is now held at Headingley College.

Snethen, Nicholas, was born Nov. 15, 1769, on Long Island, N. Y. Removing to Belleville, N. J., he was converted, and at once began praying and speaking in public. He was admitted into the Conference in 1794. When he entered the ministry he was quite feeble, but exercise on hard circuits in Connecticut, Vermont, and Maine for four years, restored him to perfect health. In 1798–99 he was sent to South Carolina, and stationed in Charleston, and in 1800 was chosen to travel with Bishop Asbury. He was elected secretary of the General Conference of 1800, and was also a member of the Conferences of 1804 and 1812. He was early in favor of a delegated General Conference, and brought forward a plan before the Conference of 1800, which was defeated. He was also an early advocate of anti-slavery principles. In 1800 he wrote a reply to O'Kelley's "Apology." Suffering from yellow fever in 1800, the following year Bishop Asbury selected him again as his traveling companion, and sent him to the valley of Virginia, where his health was recruited. He was a diligent student, and acquired an elementary knowledge of the Greek, Latin, and French, and of history, natural science, philosophy, and the exact sciences. In 1801 he wrote a reply to O'Kelley's rejoinder. In 1806 he located, but re-entered the itinerancy in 1809. Subsequently he was stationed in Baltimore, Georgetown, and Alexandria. While a resident of Georgetown he was elected chaplain of the House of Representatives, and became intimate with the leading men of the day. He took an active part in the debate, in 1812, on the subject of electing presiding elders, and in a debate made the declaration that he would never appear on the floor of any General Conference unless sent there by the vote of the laity as well as of the preachers. From that time he was never a delegate until the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church. In 1814 he located, and was a candidate for Representative in Congress, but was defeated, and the following year was also defeated for the House of Delegates, in Maryland. In 1821 he became a contributor to The Wesleyan Repository, which advocated the abolition of the episcopacy and presiding eldership; and continued to contribute to The Mutual Rights, which was the successor of The Repository. He united with the Methodist Protestant Church, though he was not satisfied with its organization. He desired to have Annual Conferences bounded by State lines, each independent of the other, except so far as they should confer on the General Conferences powers necessary for federal administration. From 1824 to 1829 he resided on his farm, but in the latter year he set his slaves free and moved to the State of Indiana, settling on the banks of the Wabash. The death of his wife and one of his daughters led him again into the itinerancy, in which he continued, occupying, however, a supernumerary relation for his last years. He wrote, as correspondent, for The Methodist Protestant and other periodicals. In 1834 he became one of the editors of The Methodist Protestant, in Baltimore. In 1836, the Methodist Protestants of New York endeavoring to start a college, Mr. Snethen took charge of it, and delivered a course of lectures, but the enterprise did not succeed. In 1837 he returned to the West, and took charge of a Manual Labor Ministerial College at Lawrenceburg, Ind., but that institution also failed. Much of his subsequent labor was performed in Cincinnati. In 1838 he published a volume of sermons, prepared a course of theological lectures for young ministers, and on his way to deliver them was seized with his last illness, and died May 30, 1845. He was a clear and forcible writer, and an eloquent minister.

Sorin, Matthew, D.D., of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Philadelphia, Sept. 7, 1801, of Roman Catholic parents. He joined the M. E. Church in his sixteenth year, and was admitted on trial in the Philadelphia Conference in 1823. After filling a number of appointments he became discouraged, and located in 1831, but satisfied of his error was re-admitted in 1833, and was placed in charge of the Chesapeake district, embracing nearly half of what is now the Wilmington Conference. After filling several appointments in Wilmington and Philadelphia, his health declining, he asked a superannuated relation, and went into business. In 1849 he removed to the Northwest. In 1851 he resumed work, first in Illinois, and then in Minnesota. In 1854 he traveled the Red Wing mission, and was the only Methodist minister on the west bank of the Mississippi from the State line of Iowa to Hastings, Minn. In 1861 he had charge of the Chippewa district, Northwest Wisconsin Conference, but was influenced by Dr. Elliott's appeal, and after two years went to Missouri to preach in that State. Subsequently he had charge of the Cumberland Hospital, at Nashville, as chaplain. The ensuing year, at the request of the Missouri Conference, he was transferred to it, and placed in charge of the St. Louis district, and after four years was placed on Kansas City district. In 1876 he was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference, where he now labors.

Soule, Joshua, D.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born at Bristol, Me., Aug. 1, 1781, and was licensed to preach at seventeen years of age. He was adtimore. In 1824 he was again elected bishop, and after that time devoted himself solely to the duties of his office. He resided for many years at Lebanon, O., and was a delegate to the British and Irish Conferences in 1842. At the separation of the church, in 1845, he adhered to the M. E. Church South, and shortly afterwards settled at Nashville, mitted on trial in 1799, and was appointed presiding elder of the Maine district in 1804. He was subsequently stationed in the city of New York; was a member of the General Conference of 1808, and was author of the plan for a delegated General Conference. He was elected book agent in 1816, where he served for four years, during which time he commenced the Methodist Magazine, and was its editor. In 1820 he was elected to the office of bishop; but, believing the plan which the Conference had adopted for electing presiding elders was unconstitutional, he declined. During the next four years he was stationed in New York and Bal-

Tenn. Though advanced in years, he continued active in his episcopal duties, visiting California in 1854. For several years before his death he was greatly enfeebled. He died at Nashville, March 6, 1867, having been from the time of its organization the senior bishop of the M. E. Church South. Bishop Soule was a man of superior intellect, a strong will, possessed of great energy, and was a useful, popular, and sometimes an overwhelming preacher, and an able administrator.

South Africa Languages and Missionary Literature.—The principal languages used in the Wesleyan missions in South Africa are the English, Dutch, Kaffre, and Zulu Kaffre. The English language is spoken by the English settlers, the Dutch by the Boers, or the mass of the farming population, and the Kaffre is the principal native tongue. It is rich and much superior to the languages of the Bushmen and Hottentots. The Zulu Kaffre is a branch of the Kaffre. The native languages were first reduced to writing by the missionaries.

The printing establishment of the Wesleyan mission, at Mount Coke, has been very active, and has published numerous editions of religious and educational works in the leading languages of the country. Among its earlier issues were Bibles and hymn-books and a periodical in the Kaffre language. Nine hundred and eighty-nine thousand and twenty pages of Scriptures and Prayer-Books, including an edition of the Kaffre New Testament, were published in 1855; an abridgment of the "Life of Carvosso," in Zulu, was given in 1862; spelling-books, catechisms, and hymn-books in Kaffre, and "thousands of tracts" were reported in 1863. Large editions of the Kaffre spelling-books and "Catechism" were mentioned in 1866, and Dutch and Kaffre hymn-books were in press. The work of publication was as busily kept up in the intervening years. In 1868 the press was represented as becoming year by year of increased importance in furnishing elementary and other books for the native population. A large edition of the Scriptures in the Kaffre language was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1865. Among the valuable standard works of the country published by the Wesleyan Missionary Society are the "Grammar" of the Kaffre language, by the Rev. W. B. Boyce, with additions by the Rev. W. J. Davis; the "Kaffre Language and Grammar" of the Rev. J. W. Appleyard; the "Kaffre Vocabulary" of the Rev. John Ayliff, and the "Dictionary" of the Rev. W. J. Davis; the "Grammar" of the Sichuana language of the Rev. James Archbell, and the "Grammar," etc., of the Namaqua-Hottentot language of the Rev. H. Tindale. The publications of the mission press for 1876 embraced an elementary English grammar, Ayliff's "Vocabulary" and Davis's "Dictionary and Grammar," in English; spelling- and reading-books, catechisms, prayer-books, and hymn-books, in Dutch; Bibles, Testaments, parts of Scripture, prayer- and hymn-books, spelling- and reading-books, multiplication tables, catechisms, and several miscellaneous reading and Sunday-school books and tracts, in Kaffre. The most important issue was an edition of 5000 copies of the Kaffre New Testament, complete. Among the more important books relating to South Africa and the mission published by the Society are: "Notes on South African Affairs," by the Rev. W. B. Boyce; "Memorials of South Africa," by the late Barnabas Shaw; "South Africa De-lineated," by the Rev. Thornley Smith; "History of Natal," by the Rev. William C. Holden; "Travels and Researches in Kaffraria," by the Rev. S. Kay; "Missionary Narrative from South Africa," by the Rev. Samuel Young; "The Story of my Mission," by the Rev. William Shaw; "History of the Kaffre Races," by the Rev. W. C. Holden. A full account of the history of the mission till 1854 is given by the Rev. Dr. William Butler in Newcombe's "Cyclopedia of Missions," and further accounts of its operations are scattered through the "reports" and "notices" of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, the volumes of the Wesleyan Methodist Magazine from 1875 to 1877, and the journals of the Wesleyan Conference.

South Africa, Wesleyan Missions in.—South Africa embraces that part of the African continent which lies south of Cape Negro on the west, and the Zambesi River on the east, and includes Great and Little Namaqua Land, the Cape Colony, Albany, and British Kaffraria, Natal, Zulu Land, the Orange Free State, the late Transvaal Republic, and the countries of Bechuanas, Hottentots, and Bushmen. The Cape Colony is the principal state, and has an area of 200,610 square miles, and a total population of 566,158, of whom 187,439 are whites (Dutch and English), 132,655 Kaffres, 81,598 Hottentots, and 132,655 negroes and Malays. A settlement was established at the Cape of Good Hope by the Dutch East India Company in 1650, which was taken possession of by the British in 1795, was restored to the Dutch in 1802, and was finally given up to the British in 1815. Natal is likewise a British colony, having an area of 16,145 square miles, and a population of 250,352, consisting of 17,821 whites, 5227 Indian coolies, and the rest Zulus. The Orange Free State lies in the interior, north of the Cape Colony, and northwest of Natal, and has a population of about 50,000. It was founded by the Boers, or Dutch colonists; has a republican constitution, and was recognized as an independent state in 1854. The Transvaal Republic, north of the Orange Free State, and also in the interior, with an area of 77,964 square miles, and a population of 140,000, was also founded by the Boers. It has been involved in disastrous wars with the native tribes, by which it finally became so weakened as to be unable to maintain an independent existence, and was annexed to the British colonies in the beginning of 1877. The European inhabitants of these colonies are English and Dutch, the Dutch being known as Boers, or farmers, from their almost universal occupation in agriculture. The native races are principally Kaffres, Hottentots, Bushmen, Zulus, Namaquas, and Bechuanas. The Kaffres are a numerous and widely-extended race. Their name was given to them by the Mohammedans, and signifies unbelievers. They are powerfully and symmetrically built, and live a pastoral life, under a kind of patriarchal form of government. The Hottentots are inferior to them in intellectual grade, simple and stolid in look. The Bushmen inhabit the desert regions north of the Cape Colony. They are smaller and more spare than the Hottentots, are much at war, and are a degraded race. The Zulus are a branch of the Kaffres, and are of a superior grade to most of the other South African races. Dr. Livingstone speaks well of their character, describing them as possessed of good intellectual gifts, honest, hospitable, cheerful, and not addicted to social vices. The country of the Namaquas is divided by the Orange River into Great Namaqua Land on the north, and Little Namaqua Land on the south. The Namaquas are a small tribe, who live in the old Hottentot style, and speak the Nama language, the oldest of the Hottentot dialects. The Bechuanas have been made known by the writings of Dr. Livingstone, and are of a gentle disposition. Most of these tribes are polygamists, and few of them have definite religious ideas. The colonies have suffered from frequent wars with the Kaffres and other native tribes, but a considerable accession of white population has taken place within a few years, attracted by the discovery of the diamond-fields.

The Rev. John McKenney was sent to the Cape of Good Hope in 1814 by the Wesleyan Missionary Society, at the request of some soldiers of a British regiment stationed there for a minister, but was refused permission to preach by the governor. The actual foundation of the Wesleyan mission in South Africa dates from 1815, when the Rev. Barnabas Shaw was sent as a missionary. He also was refused permission to preach, but preached, nevertheless, on the Sunday following his arrival, to a congregation of soldiers. With the work thus begun Mr. Shaw was identified for about fifty years; his brother, William Shaw, who followed him a few years afterwards and co-operated with him, was identified with it for about the same period; and his son was connected with it as long as the condition of his health enabled him to work. Mr. Shaw sought an opportunity to preach to the heathen. While his mind was engaged upon this subject, the Rev. H. Schemlen, of the London Missionary Society, came to Capetown with a number of Namaquas, and suggested to him that he attempt a mission in Great Namaqua Land. The missionary committee had not given its sanction to such an effort, and was not pledged to support it; but Mrs. Shaw offered to sustain it with her personal means, and Mr. Shaw decided to undertake it. He set out with his wife in company with Mr. Schemlen for the country beyond the Orange River. On their way the party were met by a company of Hottentots from Little Namaqua Land, who professed to be going to the Cape in search of a missionary and teacher. Mr. Shaw, accepting their invitation, accompanied this band of natives to their home, where a warm reception and a hearty welcome awaited him. The first missionary station was established at Lily Fountain. In a few months a chapel had been erected, a school had been begun, and a deep religious interest was awakened. The baptism and admission to the church of seventeen adults in June, was followed by the administration of the first communion in July, and the holding of the first love-feast in December. The mission was reinforced in 1818 by the arrival of the Rev. E. Edwards, who brought with him a blacksmith's forge and iron, and the teaching of agriculture and the industrial arts was begun. The Rev. J. Archbell and his wife were added to the missionary force in 1819, and a new station was opened among the Bushmen at Reed Fountain, about two days' journey to the east of Lily Fountain. In the mean time the original station had grown into the prosperous mission of Khamies Berg (or Mountain), which is now the only circuit of native work in the Cape Town district, and is also a central station to the miners of the neighborhood. Permission was obtained in 1820 from the colonial governor to open missions among the tribes north of the Orange River. Three additional missionaries arrived in 1821. New missions were begun in the Albany district, among the Kaffres, in the Bechuana country, at Delagoa Bay, with a tribe on the Orange River, and among the slave population of the Cape. The important station at Mount Coke was occupied in 1824. The first attempt to establish a mission in Great Namaqua Land, in 1825, was signalized by the treacherous murder by their native guide of the missionaries, the Rev. W. Threlfall, English, and Jacob Links, native. The murderer was arrested, and suffered the penalties of the law. The mission was established, with other laborers, and has had a prosperous growth. The Wesleyan missions in South Africa were represented in 1854 by the Cape of Good Hope district, with nine stations; the Bechuana district, with seven stations; the Port Natal and Amazulu district, with five stations; and the Albany and Kaffraria district, with twenty-one stations, and reported a total of 215 chapels and preaching-places, 39 missionaries and assistant missionaries, 29 catechists, 154 local preachers, 4300 members and 670 on trial, 81 Sunday-schools, with 565 teachers and 6904 scholars, 47 day-schools, with 49 teachers and 3176 scholars, and 41,790 attendants on worship. An institution for training native teachers was in operation in Kaffraria, and printing-presses were in operation in Kaffraria, Graham's Town, and among the Bechuanas. The missions were gradually extended through Natal and the

Zulu country, and into the Orange Free State and the Transvaal. In 1862 the government of the Orange Free State was reported to have manifested a kindly and liberal spirit, and to have made three grants in favor of the missions; but it withdrew its countenance for a time in 1867. In 1868 the report spoke of the vast extent of the country occupied by the missions from the Cape to Port Natal, and described the missions under three heads: 1, the colonial work among the English and Dutch of the Cape and Natal colonies, and among the native Hottentots, Kaffres, Bechuanas, and Fingoes; 2, the missions in Kaffre Land and among the Zulus; and, 3, the missions beyond the Orange River, among the English and Dutch settlers, and the native population of the Orange Free State and the Transvaal Republic. These missions had, "after years of toil, been attended by great success." Mr. Heald, an English gentleman of the Wesleyan connection, had in the previous year made a gift of £500, or $2500, for the establishment of a training institution for native ministers, and the school had been already begun, at a place which was named Heald Town. The mission reported in this year, 67 English and 4 native missionaries, with 35 assistants, 11,367 members, 12,232 Sunday-school scholars, and 60,000 attendants on public worship. In 1876 the work was divided into six districts: the Cape of Good Hope district, with 9 principal stations, 30 chapels and preaching-places, 11 missionaries and assistants, 26 local preachers, 1300 full members, and 202 on trial, 3236 scholars in Sunday- and day-schools, and 8845 attendants on worship; the Graham's Town district, with 17 principal stations, 309 chapels and preaching-places, 32 missionaries and assistants, 328 local preachers, 5607 full members, 1763 on trial, 5447 scholars in Sunday- and day-schools, and 21,780 attendants; the Queenstown district, with 12 principal stations, 280 chapels and preaching-places, 17 missionaries and assistants, 300 local preachers, 3947 full members, 2056 on trial, 4383 scholars in Sunday- and day-schools, and 23,550 attendants; the Bechuana district (to be known hereafter as Bloemfontein district), with 12 principal stations, 118 chapels and preaching-places, 13 missionaries and assistants, 126 local preachers, 3118 full members, 903 on trial, 2725 scholars in Sunday- and day-schools, and 10,800 attendants; the Natal district, with 14 principal stations, 270 chapels and preaching-places, 17 missionaries and assistants, 167 local preachers, 1831 full members, 332 on trial, 2325 scholars in Sunday- and day-schools, and 20,500 attendants; and the Vaal River district, with 4 principal stations, 20 chapels and preaching-places, 4 missionaries and assistants, 7 local preachers, 83 full members, 41 on trial, 147 scholars in Sunday- and day-schools, and 1080 attendants. The last district has been annexed to the Bechuana, or Bloemfontein district. The footings of the whole give 94 missionaries, 15,886 members, and 18,290 scholars. The footings of other items given in the report show 209 Sunday-schools, with 1226 teachers, 167 day-schools, with 192 teachers, and 70 catechists. The work in the Cape Town district is chiefly among the English, Dutch, and other mixed populations of the colony; that of the Queenstown district is nearly all missionary work; while that of the other districts is addressed both to native and mixed populations. The training institution at Heald Town had 7 students preparing for the native ministry in the theological department, and 52 students and 11 pupil teachers in the educational department. A school for girls had been erected at Shawbury, and efforts were making to establish a high-class native training-school at Clarkebury, in the Queenstown district, and a training-school was proposed at Bensonvale, in the Bechuana, or Bloemfontein district. The colonial mission-fields of South Africa have been well occupied by the missions of the leading English societies, and of a number of German, Dutch, and other societies. The Moravian society was the first to enter the field, it having first begun its work there in 1737. The London Missionary Society followed it in 1795. Its work has been distinguished by the long and laborious career of Dr. Moffatt, and the still more famous labors in teaching and exploration of his son-in-law, Dr. Livingstone. Other British societies represented in South African missions are the Church, Propagation, and Scotch Presbyterian Societies; among the Continental boards are the Rhenish, Berlin, French, and Norwegian societies; and the American Board has a prosperous mission among the Zulus.

South America, Methodist Missions in.—The Methodist missions in South America are that of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Buenos Ayres and Montevideo, with stations in the Argentine Republic and Uruguay, and that of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in Brazil. The Argentine Republic and the republic of Uruguay are situated in the southern part of South America, with their capitals on either side of the Rio de la Plata. The Argentine Republic has an area of between 800,000 and 1,000,000 square miles, and a population of 1,526,738, of various European nationalities and Indians. It was formerly attached to Spain, but the states of which it is composed became independent in 1810. The predominant religion is Roman Catholic, but all other churches are tolerated, and the ministers of some other denominations are paid by the government. The republic of Uruguay has an area of 63,300 square miles, and a population of 454,478 persons, of a number of European nationalities, chiefly Spanish.

The aboriginal population have disappeared. Uruguay became independent of Spain in 1825, and, like all the South American republics, has suffered greatly by revolutions. The empire of Brazil is one of the largest countries in the world, but is very thinly settled. It has an area of 3,200,000 square miles, and a population of about 10,000,000, of mixed native races, negroes, and Portuguese. It was formerly attached to the crown of Portugal, but became independent in 1821. The government is a constitutional empire, the emperor being of the lineage of the house of Portugal. The Roman Catholic religion is the religion of the state, but all other religions are tolerated, with the restriction that their houses of worship shall be "without the exterior form of a temple." The first Protestant missionary effort in South America was made in 1818, when Mr. James Thompson arrived at Buenos Ayres as an agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society. The first Protestant worship was held at the house of Mr. Dickson, in Buenos Ayres, on the 19th of November, 1820. The attendants were all English, some of them Wesleyans, and among them were some persons who afterwards became members of the congregation associated with the American Methodist Episcopal mission. The first effort by American missionaries was made in 1823, when preaching was established at a private house in Buenos Ayres by two ministers of the Presbyterian Church. A third Presbyterian minister arrived in 1827. This work was discontinued in 1836. The attention of the Methodist Episcopal Church was directed to South America in 1832, when the General Conference advised that the field be explored. The Rev. Fountain E. Pitts was appointed a missionary, and sailed for Buenos Ayres in 1835. He found a class of eight or ten members, which had been formed by resident Methodists, and obtained a license from the government to preach. The Rev. John Dempster followed him at the close of the same year. An effort was made to establish a school, which did not succeed, but a congregation was formed. A lot was bought, and a church was begun, which was finished in 1842, and dedicated on the 8th of January, 1843. A Sunday-school was opened in 1836, but was closed in 1842. The operations of the mission were suspended in 1841, whereupon the foreign residents of Buenos Ayres formed a society for the promotion of Christian worship, and petitioned the Missionary Board to supply them with a missionary. This society afterwards contributed largely to the support of the mission. The Rev. W. H. Norris, who had already labored at Montevideo, was appointed missionary to Buenos Ayres. He officiated at the dedication of the church, in January, 1843, reported in September of the same year that 30 professing Christians were attached to the congregation, and in the following

December opened a Sunday-school with 50 children, representing four nationalities, attending as scholars. Mr. Norris returned to the United States in 1847, and the Rev. D. D. Lore was appointed in his place. In 1848, Mr. Lore reported 24 members and 6 probationers connected with the mission church, 50 families in the congregation, and 175 scholars in the Sunday-school. Bibles, Testaments, and tracts were circulated in the English, Spanish, French, and German languages, about one-half of them being in Spanish. Mr. Lore retired from the mission in 1853, and the Rev. G. D. Carrow was appointed in his place. He opened a school for boys, which in 1857 contained 89 pupils. He was succeeded, in 1857, by the Rev. W. Goodfellow. The school had not accomplished what had been expected of it, and was given up, so far as it was made directly dependent on the mission for support, but an effort was made to retain it in nominal connection with the mission. As yet no access had been obtained to the Spanish population, and the church was composed entirely of foreigners, English-speaking and Protestants, who supported the preacher and kept the church building in repair. In 1860 it returned 56 members and 11 probationers. The day-school was reopened in 1863, and in 1864 consisted of five departments, each of which was supplied with a teacher, and returned 104 pupils, of whom 63 paid tuition and 41 were free. Preparations were made, in 1864, for an expansion of the work of the mission into the campo, or country surrounding Buenos Ayres. A settlement of French and German emigrants had been made at Santa Fé, two days' sail on the Parana River from Buenos Ayres, among whom were a considerable number of Protestants, including a few evangelical ministers. The Protestants had begun to build churches, school-houses, and parsonages, which they proposed to convey to the Missionary Society. Stations were opened at Belgrano and Azul, in the province of Buenos Ayres, Rosario, Esperanza, Santa Fé, and San Carlos, in the province of Santa Fé, Villa de Urquiza, in the province of Entre Rios, Cordoba and Fraile Muerto, in the province of Cordoba, Tryn and Laguna de los Padre, and at Salto, in Uruguay. A church was built at Rosario and completed by the gifts of friends at Buenos Ayres, among whom was General Urquiza, ex-president of the republic, and was dedicated under the ministry of the Rev. Thomas Carter in November, 1865.

In 1867 the mission employed eight men, extended into four provinces, reported 4 churches and 3 parsonages, 6 day-schools, and 4 Sunday-schools; its ministers preached in four languages; and it was represented by a semi-monthly illustrated religious newspaper, the Estrella Matutina, or Morning Star, the first periodical of the "kind ever issued in South America," which was published by Mr. John Beveridge, at Cordoba. The missions were afterwards withdrawn from the outlying stations and concentrated at the three important points, Buenos Ayres, Montevideo, and Rosario. The work among the Spanish population began to make progress in 1868, the first Spanish sermon having been preached in 1867. In 1869 the Sunday-school at Buenos Ayres had "constantly increased in members," and the Spanish congregation in the same city had for the last five or six months "been very large." This church returned, in 1870, 40 members, 25 probationers, an average congregation of 250, and 3 Sunday-schools, with an average attendance of 125. A Spanish church was also reported at Montevideo, with 35 probationers, 300 in the congregation, and Sunday-school with an average attendance of 70 pupils, and church property valued at $12,000. The Spanish work was opened at Rosario in 1871, with regular public services and a Sunday-school, which at the time of making the report for the year numbered from 15 to 25 native and Italian men and youth. Preaching was begun at Montevideo as early as 1839, and services had been held in that city at intervals since. Mr. Goodfellow visited the place in 1861, found four members there, and made arrangements to have a class organized and prayer-meetings held regularly. In 1870, besides the Spanish church, the English church in Montevideo had 18 members, a Sunday-school, with 40 scholars, and an average congregation of 40 persons. Preaching services were held regularly after 1869. Mr. Goodfellow was succeeded, in 1869, as superintendent of the mission by the Rev. Henry G. Jackson. A young men's Christian and literary association was formed at Montevideo in 1871. In 1873 the superintendent of the mission had been called upon to draft a complete school system for the municipality of Buenos Ayres, with a detailed programme, to be recommended for private schools as well as public uses. The university and the University Club at Montevideo had been opened to religious discussion, and the missionary at the station had been elected president of the club: a humane society, composed principally of influential native citizens, which resisted the practice of bull-baiting, had been organized at Rosario; and a call had been made to the missionaries to extend their work into Paraguay, the government of that country offering them a building free of rent for ten years. In 1874 the work was reinforced by the arrival of the young women sent out as missionaries by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society. In 1876 all the departments of the work were represented as being prosecuted with vigor at all the stations. Evangelization in the interior was quietly going on, colporteurs were selling and distributing the Bible, which found such circulation that Bibles sold in Rosario are said to have reached the most remote provinces, and even Paraguay and Bolivia; the publications of the tract societies were extensively distributed; a Spanish Hymn-Book had been prepared by the superintendent of the mission; the missionary at Rosario, the Rev. Thomas B. Wood, had for the third time been appointed examiner of the public schools of the municipality; and in those schools the little gospel hymns of the mission were among the favorite "pieces sung." Five American missionaries were employed in 1876. The following table exhibits the condition of the mission in 1877:

The Rev. Justin Spaulding was sent as a missionary to Brazil in 1836 by the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was joined in 1838 by the Rev. Daniel P. Kidder. The mission was conducted with considerable success for a few years, when it was discontinued on account of financial pressure. Missions have since been opened in the empire by other societies, the most important of which are that of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and those of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian Churches in the United States.

The mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South is under the superintendence of the Rev. J. E. Newman, and has stations in the district of Limeria, province of San Paolo, and Santa Barbara, where a church of 38 members has been organized among the American emigrants. Miss Annie Newman is engaged in translating Bishop McTyeire's Catechism into the Portuguese language for the use of the mission.

The Northern Presbyterian Church of the United States has a mission in Brazil, with 8 stations and several out-stations, 7 American and 4 native missionaries, 9 American and 12 native teachers, 776 communicants, and 220 scholars in day- and boarding-schools. The Southern Presbyterian Church has stations at Campinas and Pernambuco, in Brazil, with 9 American missionaries and 4 native helpers, 5 churches, 52 native and 25 English-speaking members, a college at Campinas, and a school for girls. An independent mission has been opened by the Rev. Emanuel Vanosden at Rio Grande do Sul, in connection with which a monthly magazine in English and Portuguese is published, and an extensive circulation of Bibles and tracts is reported.

South Bend, Ind. (pop. 7206), the capital of St. Joseph County, on the Michigan Southern Railroad. In 1831, the year the town was laid out, Methodist services were introduced, the charge at that time embracing a large part of St. Joseph County. In 1833 the South Bend circuit was formed, and in 1836 the first church edifice was erected. It was a small frame building, which gave way in 1849 to a brick edifice; it was rebuilt and enlarged in 1869, and is known as the First M. E. church. In 1869-70 Michigan Street church was built, and in 1876-77 a German church was erected. The African M. E. church was organized in 1872. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

South Carolina (pop. 705,606).—The first attempt at colonization of South Carolina was made in 1562, by French Huguenots under John Ribault, but the enterprise failed. The first permanent settlement was made in 1670, by English colonists at Port Royal, and subsequently at Charleston. The Wesleys preached in Charleston about 1736, and it was visited by Pilmoor in 1773. No society, however, was formed until 1785. Bishop Asbury says, "We also sent an elder and a preacher to South Carolina. We have now 110 members in that State by the assiduity of a local preacher who lately settled there." In that year John Tunnel was sent to Charleston, and reported to the following Conference 58 members. In the same year Woolman Hickman was appointed to Georgetown, and in 1786 two districts were formed, one embracing three appointments, viz., Georgia, Broad River, and Charleston, with James Foster as elder, the other embracing Santee and Peedee, with Beverly Allen as elder. At that time there were in the different charges 595 whites and 43 colored members. The first Annual Conference was held at Charleston, March 22, 1787. The introduction of Methodism was strongly resisted. "The Episcopal Church at Charleston seized Whitefield, tried and virtually excommunicated this man of God simply for offering extemporaneous prayer; the gentry of the city dragged the devout Dougherty from the church-door and drenched him at the street pump." Notwithstanding this opposition, Asbury, with the pioneer preachers, successfully planted Methodism at various points. In Charleston, the church had scarcely been securely founded before Mr. Hammett, a Wesleyan missionary from the West Indies, sowed discord. The church was sold to the Episcopalians, and only repossessed through the forms of law. In 1802 the work assumed permanent shape, and the South Carolina Conference was formed, embracing 22 appointments, with a membership of 6979 whites and 2303 colored. In 1810 the church had enlarged to 74 preachers, and 17,788 white and 8208 colored members. The Conference then, however, embraced four States. In South Carolina proper there were 9059 whites and 4947 colored members. The early Conferences were generally held at Charleston, and the church gradually acquired strength. In 1830 Georgia and Florida Conferences were set off as independent bodies. As early as 1831 the Conference recommended missions, Sabbath-school, Bible, and tract societies; and in 1834 Cokesbury Seminary was inaugurated. In 1829 a remarkable work broke out through the influence of colored evangelists, who penetrated the plantations north of Charleston and preached to the colored people. Dr. William Capers, subsequently bishop, being applied to, consented to go as a missionary, and accompanied by an old colored minister entered on this grand work, by the influence of which multiplied thousands of colored people were gathered into the church. Many of these missions were sustained until the close of the war, in 1865. In 1840 the membership in the State amounted to 27,338 white and 28,031 colored. The Southern Christian Advocate and a book-room at Charleston were established, and became auxiliaries in the great work. Wofford College, Columbia, Spartansburg, the Carolina, and the Davenport Female College were also commenced. In 1845 the Methodists of South Carolina adhered to the Church South, and it remained the only organization until after the close of the Civil War. Notwithstanding the disasters of the war, the Methodist Church South steadily advanced, and was never so prosperous as during the time immediately subsequent to the war. The statistics show the largest increase at that time, and this was the most flourishing period of the church during almost a century. The statistics in 1875 show 40,432 white members, 17,945 children under catechetical instruction, and 564 churches, with 21 domestic missions, the value of church property being $701,453. Annual Conferences have been held for ninety years, Bishop Asbury having presided for twenty-eight sessions. In addition to these statistics which show the growth of the M. E. Church South, congregations were organized at the close of the war by the M. E. Church, and subsequently an Annual Conference was formed. It has also originated the Claflin University, at Orangeburg, S. C. Its statistics for 1876 show 92 traveling and 293 local preachers, 30,541 members, chiefly colored, 11,532 Sunday-school scholars, 241 churches, valued at $188,432, and 11 parsonages, valued at $11,300. The Methodist Protestant Church reports a Conference of 9 itinerant and 11 unstationed preachers, 1075 members, and 8 churches, valued at $9775. The African M. E. Church reports 152 traveling and 571 local preachers, 52,971 members, 18,781 Sabbath-school scholars, 325 churches, valued at $138,045, and 33 parsonages, valued at $15,830. There are also a number of churches of the African Zion denomination. The church statistics, as reported in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

South Carolina Conference, African M. E. Church, was organized May 15, 1865. Its boundaries now include "all the State of South Carolina and the adjacent islands." At its last session, February, 1876, it stationed 152 preachers, including 10 presiding elders. It reported 52,971 members, 571 local preachers, 18,781 Sunday-school scholars, 325 churches, valued at $138,046, and 33 parsonages, valued at $15,830.

South Carolina Conference, M. E. Church, was one of the original six Conferences into which the whole territory occupied by the church was divided by the General Conference of 1796. It then included the States of South Carolina, Georgia, and the part of North Carolina south of Cape Fear River, excepting a few appointments on the branches of the Yadkin River. No special change was made in its boundaries until in 1824, when the church having extended into Florida, it was made to include East Florida and that part of North Carolina not included in the Virginia and Holston Conferences. In 1836, the North Carolina Conference being organized, that part of North Carolina then included in the Wilmington and Lincolnnton districts was excepted. On the division of the M. E. Church, in 1845, this Conference adhered to the Church South. Its further history with the old boundaries is to be found in that church. By the authority of the General Conference of 1864, Bishop Baker organized a South Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church at Charleston, April 2, 1866. It was then composed of two districts, Charleston and Florida. The General Conference of 1868 fixed its boundaries so as to include the State of South Carolina and all of Florida east of Apalachicola River. By the action of the General Conference of 1872 it includes only the State of South Carolina. The statistics of the old and the new Conference may be briefly given. The first distinct report of this Conference was made in 1803, when it reported 9256 white and 2815 colored members. In December, 1844, it reported 32,306 white and 39,495 colored members, with 121 traveling and 265 local preachers. At the organization in 1866 it reported 11 traveling and 16 local preachers, 3173 members, and 1674 Sunday-school scholars. The report for 1876 is: 92 traveling and 293 local preachers, 30,541 members, 11,532 Sunday-school scholars, 241 churches, valued at $188,432, and 11 parsonages, valued at $11,300.

South Carolina Conference, M. E. Church South, was one of the original Conferences that adhered to the Church South in 1845. It was one of the largest Conferences in the church, and had at that time the largest colored membership. In 1846 it reported to the Church South 123 traveling and 278 local preachers, with 32,649 white and 40,475 colored members. The General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries of this Conference so as to "include all the State of South Carolina." The latest report from this Conference (1875) is: 160 traveling and 136 local preachers, 40,382 white members and 431 colored, and 17,945 Sunday-school scholars.

South Carolina Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces the State of South Carolina, except Charleston." This appointment at present is included in the Maryland Conference. In 1877 the Conference reported 9 itinerant and 11 unstationed ministers, 1075 members, and 8 churches, valued at $9775.

Southeastern Indiana Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1852. Its territory was taken chiefly from the Indiana Conference. Its boundaries were definitely determined in 1856, so as to include all of Southeastern Indiana bounded north by the National Road, east by Ohio, south by the Ohio River, and west by the Indiana Conference and so much of the city of Indianapolis as was within the donation, south of Market Street and east of Meridian Street; and all the towns and societies on the line between Indiana and Southeastern Indiana Conferences. No change was made in this Conference until in 1868, when the boundary line commenced at the north end of Meridian Street, in the city of Indianapolis; thence west to the Michigan Road; thence on said road to the north line of Marion County; thence east on said county line to the northeast corner of said county; thence south on the east line of said county and the National Road; thence east on the said road to the State line; and on the east by Ohio, on the south by the Ohio River, and on the west by the Indiana Conference. In 1872 a change was made in the boundary so that it should commence at the crossing of Meridian and Third Streets, in the city of Indianapolis: thence west by said Third Street to the Indianapolis and Lafayette Railroad. The rest of the boundary remained the same, with the exception of excluding Elizabeth, in Hamilton Co., O. This Conference held its first session in Rushville, Ind., Oct. 6, 1852, Bishop Baker presiding. It reported 19,367 members, with 100 traveling and 149 local preachers. In 1876 it reported 102 traveling and 137 local preachers, 36,890 members, 22,081 Sunday-school scholars, 297 churches, valued at $901,150, and 50 parsonages, valued at $57,450.

South Easton, Pa. (pop. 3167), is in Northampton County, on the south side of the Lehigh River. Methodism was introduced from Easton. It was first reported as a separate charge in 1853, when Edward Townsend was appointed to South Easton, who reported, in 1855, 86 members. Methodism has continued to prosper, and this station, in the Philadelphia Conference, reports 175 members, 564 Sunday-school scholars, and $19,500 church property.

Southerland, Silas Bruce, D.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Prince George Co., Md., May 21, 1817. His parents were Methodists of prominence in their neighborhood. The death of his parents occurring while he was yet a boy, he removed to Harper's Ferry, Va., and engaged in the apothecary business. Finding much leisure, he read and studied unintermittingly, making encouraging progress in general literature. To this was superadded law studies for several years. Being converted in February, 1839, his purposes were changed from the law to the ministry. Immediately upon the expiration of his probation, he was licensed to preach by the Methodist Protestant Church, and in 1841 was received into the Maryland Annual Conference. Of this Conference he is still an active member, having filled the most of its prominent appointments, including a full term in the presidency, and being repeatedly honored by it with a seat in the General Conference. He was a member of the General Convention of 1867, and of the Convention of May 11, 1877.

Southern California Conference held its first session in Los Angeles, Cal., Sept. 6, 1876. The General Conference of the May preceding fixed its boundaries so as to embrace that portion of the State of California lying south of the California Conference; also that portion of the State east of the summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains and south of Inyo County. The statistics reported at the Conference were: 27 preachers, 1457 members, 1318 Sunday-school scholars, 13 churches, valued at $40,500, and 9 parsonages, valued at $6950.

Southern German Conference was defined by the General Conference of 1876 as including the State of Texas. It reported, in 1877, 25 traveling and 12 local preachers, 1093 members, 1011 Sunday-school scholars, 23 churches, valued at $32,625, and 13 parsonages, valued at $6200.

Southern Illinois Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1852, having the following boundary lines: "Beginning at Gilead, on the Mississippi River, in Calhoun County; thence to the northwest corner of Jersey County; thence to the northeast corner of said county; thence to Honey Point; thence to Hillsborough, leaving this station in the Illinois Conference; thence east through Fayette and Effingham Counties to the northwest corner of Jasper County; thence with the north line of Jasper and Crawford Counties to the Wabash River." No changes have since been made in its boundaries. This Conference held its first session at Belleville, St. Clair Co., Oct. 27, 1852, Bishop Ames presiding. It reported 64 traveling and 239 local preachers, and 14,709 members. In 1876 this Conference reported 149 traveling and 300 local preachers, 26,297 members, 23,036 Sunday-school scholars, 320 churches, valued at $600,750, 86 parsonages, valued at $94,260. It contains within its boundaries McKendree College, which is under its patronage.

Southern University is located at Greensborough, Ala.; was chartered in 1856, and went into operation in 1859, under the control of the Alabama Conference of the M. E. Church South. It is located in a beautiful town of about 2000 inhabitants, and is situated on the Selma, Marion and Memphis Railroad. There is an excellent society and a healthful climate, and special attention is paid to the religious instruction of the students. The first chancellor was Dr. William M. Wightman, who served until his election to the episcopacy, in 1866. Prior to the late war the university possessed a capital in buildings, lands, apparatus, and libraries amounting to $100,000, and a productive capital of over $200,000. In the financial disasters of the war the endowment fund was chiefly lost, but the building, with its valuable outfit, has been preserved. The College of Liberal Arts embraces nine schools: Ancient Languages; Modern Languages; English Language and Literature; Moral Philosophy; Natural Philosophy and Astronomy; Mathematics; Chemistry, Mineralogy, and Geology; Civil Engineering; and Biblical Literature. The course of study extends through five years, and is comprehensive and thorough. There are also colleges of Medicine and Law, which each have an able faculty. In the College of Liberal Arts, Rev. L. M. Smith, A.M., D.D., is chancellor, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science and Biblical Literature; Rev. John S. Moore, A.M., Mathematics; Rev. I. S. Hopkins, A.M., M.D., Natural Science; Rev. J. Lewis, Jr., A.M., English Language and Literature; C. M. Verdel, A.M., Ancient Languages and Literature; C. A. Grote, A.M., Modern Languages and Literature; A. W. Smith, A.M., Preparatory Department.

South Georgia Conference, M. E. Church South.—Until 1866 the State of Georgia was embraced in the Georgia Conference; and for a history of the old Georgia Conference, see NORTH GEORGIA CONFERENCE. At the General Conference in 1866 the State was divided into the North and South Georgia Conferences. It held its first session in 1867, and reported 110 traveling and 216 local preachers, 19,626 white members and 6917 colored, 206 white Sunday-schools and 15 colored, 9003 white Sunday-school scholars and 1046 colored. The General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries of this Conference so as to "include all that part of the State of Georgia lying south of the southern line of the North Georgia Conference, and the town of Girard, in Alabama." The latest report (1875) is: 127 traveling and 221 local preachers, 29,304 white members, and 12,332 Sunday-school scholars.

South Illinois Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces all that portion of the State of Illinois lying south of the Great Western Railroad." It reported, in 1877, 24 preachers, 2048 members, and $25,000 church property.

South Kansas Conference.—The territory now embraced in this Conference was included, until 1872, in the Kansas Conference. The territory was so large that the Conference requested a division, and the General Conference of 1872 gave it power to divide should it judge best, and should the presiding bishop concur. By a vote of the Kansas Conference in 1873, and by the concurrence of the bishop, the division was ordered. The South Kansas Conference held its first session at Fort Scott, March 11, 1874. Bishop Andrews presiding. The statistics reported were: 90 traveling preachers, 12,721 members, 8206 Sunday-school scholars, 43 churches, valued at $97,800, and 41 parsonages, valued at $27,945. The General Conference of 1876 defined its boundaries so as to "embrace that portion of the State of Kansas not included in the Kansas Conference, and so much of the Indian Territory as lies north of the 30th parallel of north latitude." The reports in 1876 show 101 traveling preachers, 14,392 members, 9202 Sunday-school scholars, 47 churches, valued at $114,500, and 47 parsonages, valued at $28,200. The Baker University, located at Baldwin City, is now included within the bounds of this Conference, though it lies near the border, and is under the joint patronage of the Kansas and South Kansas Conferences.

Southwestern Christian Advocate is an official journal of the Methodist Episcopal Church, published in New Orleans. It was established as a private enterprise in 1873, with Rev. J. C. Hartzell, B.D., as editor and proprietor. It was made an official journal by the General Conference of 1876, and is published by Nelson & Phillips, New York. Rev. H. R. Revels, D.D., was elected editor in 1876, but did not accept, and Rev. J. C. Hartzell, B.D., was elected to the vacancy, and is now (1877) the editor.

Southwest German Conference was organized in 1864, and was composed of the German work which had formerly been connected with the Illinois, Southern Illinois, and Kansas Conferences and the German district of Upper Iowa Conference. Its first session was held at St. Louis, Bishop Janes presiding, and presented the following statistics: 77 itinerant and 87 local preachers, 6084 members, 4245 Sunday-school scholars, 109 churches, valued at $171,050, and 40 parsonages, valued at $23,860. Its boundaries remain the same as when organized. Its statistics for 1877 are: 133 traveling and 150 local preachers, 10,864 members, 10,026 Sunday-school scholars, 177 churches, valued at $428,194, and 77 parsonages, valued at $73,125.

Southwest Missouri Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference of 1874, and it took the place and part of the territory of the West St. Louis Conference, which then disappears from the minutes as a Conference. It held its first session at Lexington, Sept. 30, 1874. Bishop Keener presiding. The General Conference fixed its boundaries so as to "include all that part of Missouri lying south of the Missouri River not included in the St. Louis Conference." The Conference of 1875 reported 73 traveling and 112 local preachers, 13,931 white members and 20 colored, and 4063 Sunday-school scholars.

Spain, Methodist Missions in.—The kingdom of Spain has an area of 195,774 square miles, and had a population in 1870 of 16,835,500. It has always been among the states most devoted to the maintenance of the Papal power and prerogatives, and its sovereign has, since the title was given to Isabella of Castile, in the fifteenth century, recorded as among the chief of his titles that of "the Catholic." Previous to the revolution of 1868, the exercise, even the profession by a Spaniard of any other religion than the Roman Catholic was regarded and punished as a crime. The revolution swept away the old intolerant laws, and the constitution of the Spanish republic established freedom of religion. The law of religious freedom was continued, with some modifications, under the reign of King Amadeus, 1870 to 1873. The restoration of the Bourbon dynasty under Alfonso XII., in 1874, brought back into power the party of intolerance, and the course of the government has been since marked by a disposition and by efforts to restrict the liberty which had been gained after the revolution. Laws have been passed confining Protestant worship to the interior of the buildings used as churches or school-rooms, and prohibiting all out-of-door or public demonstrations. Under the head of public demonstrations, the posting at the doors of churches of signs conspicuously announcing the hours of worship and loud singing have been declared by some officers to be prohibited. The Protestant schools, especially those of the Wesleyans at Port Mahon, in the Balearic Islands, have been interfered with and interrupted. Nevertheless, Protestantism appears to have gained a firm footing in Spain, and to be spreading, and is probably destined to become a permanent feature of the life of the nation.

The town and fortress of Gibraltar belong to Great Britain. Gibraltar appears on the list of Wesleyan stations as early as 1799; and a mission was regularly established there in 1808, and was made the basis from which efforts were made from time to time to preach in the surrounding Spanish towns and districts. It was impossible for these efforts to have any definite importance or to contribute to the building up of churches, for whenever they became prominent enough to attract attention they were repressed. The mission at Gibraltar was conducted steadily and actively, with preaching generally in the Spanish and English languages, and schools for both nationalities. In 1841 the mission reported 2 principal stations, 2 missionaries,—one for the Spanish and one for the English population,—and 2 other salaried teachers, 93 members, and 214 pupils in the English and Spanish schools. In 1854 the gospel was preached at Gibraltar in both English and Spanish, and of the 250 children in the schools, 224 were Spanish. In 1862 an agent of the Wesleyan Missionary Society visited Lisbon (Portugal), Madrid, and Gibraltar, and paid two visits to Cadiz. At the latter place he discovered some remaining fruits of former labors of Wesleyan missionaries, and was encouraged to make additional efforts. He was, however, compelled in the following year, by official intolerance, to give up the work among Spaniards and confine himself to his own countrymen. The report for 1865 mentioned a persecution of the Wesleyan adherents at Cadiz. The work in the Spanish department was continued at Gibraltar, and favorable progress was reported of it in the following years. In 1871, the revolution having intervened, an agent was reported as engaged at Barcelona, in educational, literary, and evangelistic efforts, with some success. In 1872 a new school was opened at Port Mahon, on the island of Minorca, under favorable auspices. In 1876 the mission reported three stations in Spain, at Gibraltar, Barcelona, and Port Mahon, and one at Oporto, in Portugal, with statistics of which the following is a summary for the stations in Spain; number of chapels, 1; of other preaching-places, 9; of missionaries and assistants, 2; of local preachers, 12; of members, 161; of persons on trial, 28; of Sunday-schools, 4, with 24 teachers and 165 scholars; of day-schools, 9, with 28 teachers and 829 scholars; of attendants on worship, 940. The work at Gibraltar is partly English and partly Spanish; that at Port Mahon is Spanish.

Spanish Language and Missionary Literature.—The Spanish language is derived from the Roman language, a tongue which grew up in Spain out of an intermixture of Latin, Celtic, Gothic, and other elements after Roman rule ceased in the country. It is rich in expressive terms, and is among the most euphonious of modern languages. It possesses a literature of considerable merit and diversity, the growth of several centuries. It is spoken in the kingdom of Spain and its colonies, including the island of Cuba, in all of South America except the empire of Brazil, in Central America and Mexico, and is still the vernacular of a part of the inhabitants of the Southwestern United States, California, and the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona. The importance of the Spanish language to American missionary enterprises in particular, may be judged from the fact that it is estimated that there are thirty-two millions of Spanish-speaking people in the Western hemisphere.

Methodist missionary work among Spanish people did not really begin till 1867. The Wesleyans were not permitted to carry on their operations at any point under the jurisdiction of the Spanish government until after the Revolution of 1868. The first Methodist sermon in Spanish at Buenos Ayres, South America, was preached in 1867; and the Methodist Episcopal missions in Mexico were not started till several years afterwards. The first Spanish evangelical periodical ever issued in South America was the Estrella Matutina, or Morning Star, which was started in connection with the Methodist Episcopal mission at Cordoba, in the Argentine Republic, by Mr. John Beveridge, in 1867. For several years afterwards, the missionaries depended chiefly upon the publications of the London religious and the American Tract Societies for their Spanish books. In 1874, Dr. Butler, of the Methodist Episcopal mission in Mexico, mentioned the need of Spanish books as among the principal wants of the mission. In October of the same year a printing-press, with all the needful appurtenances, was sent to Mexico by the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was immediately set to work to supply the want. In November, 1875, Dr. Butler reported that the issues of the mission press since January of the same year had been 62,000 tracts, books, hand-bills, etc., including about 900,000 pages, and that several important standard Methodist works were in the course of publication. The books had passed into the hands of all classes of the people, including the president of the republic, but had been circulated principally among the masses. The stock of the printing establishment was enlarged during the year to triple its former value, without taking into account the value of the premises containing it. Seventy-two thousand copies, equal to 750,000 pages, of publications were issued in 1876. Among the publications were the "Berean Lesson Leaves," of which 1000 pages a month were issued in Spanish, and for which orders were received from the superintendent of the Wesleyan missions in Honduras, and from the persons in charge of the mission in Barcelona, Spain. The Abogado Cristiano Ilustrado, an illustrated evangelical monthly periodical of eight pages, in the style of the illustrated papers of England and the United States, was begun in April, 1877. Among the works published by the establishment are such tracts as "Robert the Cabin Boy," "The Dairyman's Daughter," "Bravery and Happy Death of James," "Doing Nothing," "The Neglected Letter," "Reply to a Catholic Priest," "What do Protestants Believe?" evangelical hymns, baptismal and marriage certificates, the First and Second Catechisms, the Doctrines, Rules, and Ritual of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Wesley's sermons on "The Fall of Man," "Salvation by Faith," and "Awake, thou that sleepest," Binney's "Theological Compend," Alden's "Outlines of Christian Evidences," Hurst's "Outlines of Church History," "Lavaleye's "Protestantism and Catholicism," and the "Berean Lessons." The "Life of Carvosso," "What Must I do to be Saved?" by Bishop Peck, the Discipline, and the "Life of Earnest Richmond," were in press in July, 1877; and at the same time the "Life of Wesley," by Watson, Wesley's "Plain Account of Christian Perfection," Fletcher's "Appeal and Address," "Wesley's Sermons," "The Mission of the Spirit," by the Rev. L. R. Dunn, D.D., the "Life of Hester Ann Rodgers," "The Life of Bramwell," "Spiritual Struggles of a Roman Catholic," by Beaudry, Dr. Nast's "Introduction to our Gospel Records," a Methodist Hymn-Book, containing about 180 hymns, and other works were in preparation. A weekly religious journal, called El Evangelista, was begun by the Rev. Thomas B. Wood, at Montevideo, on the 1st day of September, 1877.

Señor Francisco Vallayes, a convert of the mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church South and a student at Vanderbilt University, was engaged in 1876 upon a translation of Wesley's Sermons into Spanish.

The following works in Spanish are published by the Wesleyan Missionary Society: "Los cuatro Evangelios traducidos del Griego al Español, é ilustrados, con Notas," por Don G. H. Rule (The Four Gospels, translated from the Greek into Spanish. Illustrated, with Notes, by the Rev. W. H. Rule), Gibraltar, 1841; "Ensayo sobre la divina Autoridad del Nuevo Testamento," por David Bogue (Essay on the Divine Authority of the New Testament, by David Bogue), Gibraltar, 1838; "Pensamientos sobre el Papismo," por el Rev. G. Nevins, D.D., y por el Rev. G. H. Rule (Thoughts on Papism, by the Rev. G. Nevins, D.D., and the Rev. W. H. Rule); "Breves Observaciones acerca la Institucion, Obligaciones, y Beneficios del Domingo," por Don José Juan Gumez y el Rev. G. H. Rule (Brief Observations concerning the Institution, Obligations, and Benefits of the Sabbath, by J. J. Gumez and the Rev. W. H. Rule); "El Romanismo, Enemigo de la Santa Biblia," obrita escrita en Inglés por el Rev. T. H. Horne, M.A., y traducida al Español por el Rev. G. H. Rule (Romanism an Enemy of the Holy Bible, originally written in English by the Rev. T. H. Horne, M.A., and translated into Spanish by the Rev. W. H. Rule). An account of the "Mission to Gibraltar," in English, by the Rev. W. H. Rule, is also published by the society.

Spanish Missions in the United States.—Under the head of Spanish missions in the United States may be classed the early attempts of the Methodist Episcopal Church to establish missions in New Mexico, the Spanish department of the present missions in New Mexico and Arizona, and the Cuban mission at Key West, Fla., of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. An account of the latter mission is given in connection with the account of the work of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in Mexico. The Rev. E. G. Nicholson went to Santa Fé, New Mexico, about 1850, and collected there a congregation composed wholly of Americans residing in the place or connected with the army. The headquarters of the army having afterwards been removed from Santa Fé, the congregation was reduced, and Mr. Nicholson returned home. He was sent back under the direction of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1853, with Mr. W. Hansen, of the Swedish mission in New York, as his assistant. Benigno Cardenas, a converted Roman Catholic priest, was engaged as a second assistant. The party reached Santa Fé on the 10th of November, 1853, and Señor Cardenas preached his first sermon as a Protestant on the 20th of the same month, when also the first baptisms took place. At the end of about a year Messrs. Nicholson and Hansen returned to the States, and reported unfavorably of the prospects of the work, while Señor Cardenas remained at Santa Fé laboring with some success. The Rev. D. D. Lore was sent out to survey the field in 1854. His first reports were discouraging, the later ones were more favorable, but not yet assuring. No progress was made in the New Mexican work for several years afterwards. In 1865 the constitution of the Methodist Episcopal Missionary Society was changed so as to create a third class of missions, to be designated as Missions in the United States and Territories not included within the bounds of any Annual Conference. The new class was intended to embrace the missions in the Territories, including those in the Territories of New Mexico and Idaho, and also the missions in the States whose citizens had been engaged in the War of the Rebellion. Under the head of missions of the new class the names of Arizona and New Mexico appeared in the schedule of annual appropriations, but no reports were made from those fields until 1872, when the Rev. Thomas Harwood and the Rev. J. Steele returned three stations as organized at La Junta, Ciruelita, and Peralta, in New Mexico, with 1 native helper, 68 members, 1 Sunday-school, with 70 scholars, and church and school property valued at $12,500. In 1873 nine stations were reported in New Mexico, with 6 missionaries and helpers, a prosperous school at La Junta, 15 American and 100 Mexican members and probationers, and 7 Sunday-schools, with 160 scholars. The work has since grown steadily. The report for 1876 stated that the school at La Junta had "from the beginning been a success," and had fair to become a power for good in the land, and that, with the other schools which had been opened or were to be opened, the mission would soon have 5 schools, with about 125 scholars. The following is a summary of the statistics of the mission for 1876. The work is partly English:

Total.....	173	28	5	$10,500

Total number of parsonages, 5; probable value of the same, $20,600; number of day-schools, 5, with 156 scholars; number of Sunday-schools, 11, one at each of the stations, two at Cimarron, with 26 teachers and 244 scholars; total amount of contributions for missions, $53.50; for church extension, $34; for Sunday-schools, $3; for the Bible Society, $4; for church improvement, $2515.45. Of the ten preachers at work in the Territory, five are Americans and five natives.

The Rev. G. A. Reeder reported from Prescott, Arizona, in 1872, that there was not a church finished in the Territory by any Protestant denomination, and only one had been begun, so far as he could learn, and that he had not met there with one living member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The work which has grown up in the Territory has been carried on among a mixed population of whites and Indians, of which only a part are Spanish. In 1873, Mr. Reeder made a report concerning the tours of observation which he had made during the year, and which had resulted in preparations being made to start churches at Tucson, Prescott, Wickenburg, and Ehrenburg, Phenix, Florence, and Yuma. In 1874 a church had been begun at Prescott, three traveling preachers and one local preacher were employed, and 13 members, 8 probationers, 4 Sunday-schools, with 100 scholars, including whites and Pima Indians, and an average attendance of 60 scholars were reported. The first Quarterly Meeting Conference in the Territory was organized in November of the same year, at the Tampee settlement, on Salt River. Mr. Reeder resigned the superintendency of the mission in 1875, leaving on its books the names of 46 members and probationers. During his two years of service he had, according to his statement, held 5 protracted meetings and 1 camp-meeting, preached 422 sermons, and traveled 14,000 miles. The mission reported, in 1875, 3 missionaries, 46 members, and 4 Sunday-schools, with 100 scholars.

Sparks, George W., Esq., of Wilmington, Del., was an active merchant, and has been for many years engaged in banking. He early became a member of the M. E. Church; occupied official positions in the St. Paul's church for a number of years, and was among the number who took an active part in the erection of Grace church, Wilmington, to the interests of which, as well as to those of the general church, he is ardently attached. He takes a deep interest in the missionary cause.

Spaulding, W. J., Ph. D., president of Iowa Wesleyan University, was born in Newark, N. Y., April 18, 1827. At the age of twenty he embraced religion and united with the M. E. Church. Feeling that he was called to preach, he pursued a preparatory course at the Albion Seminary, and entered the Indiana Asbury University in 1850, graduating in 1854. The same year he was admitted on trial in the Indiana Conference, and in 1856 was elected to the chair of Greek in the Iowa Wesleyan University. In 1861 he was transferred to the chair of Mental and Moral Science, and served as vice-president and acting president of the institution. In 1864 he resigned his membership to engage in the regular work of the ministry, and was transferred to the Indiana Conference; but in 1870 he returned to the Iowa Conference, and in 1875 was appointed to the chair of Philosophy and Moral Science, and the following year was elected president of the university, which position (1877) he still holds.

REV. JOHN F. SPENCE, D.D.

Spence, John F., D.D., president of the East Tennessee Wesleyan University, was admitted into the Cincinnati Conference in 1853. After filling various appointments in the Conference he became, in 1862, chaplain in the army, in which position he remained until the close of the war. In 1865 he was transferred to the Holston Conference, and succeeded in raising money in the North to purchase the grounds and buildings for the institution at Athens. He was then stationed in Knoxville. Subsequently he became presiding elder of the district, and in 1875 was elected president of the institution, where he still (1877) remains.

Spencer, Robert O., a distinguished minister of the Ohio Conference, was born in 1806. At the age of eighteen he joined the Ohio Conference and continued to travel for fifty years, filling many of the most important appointments in the Conference. He was instrumental in a great revival among the students of the Ohio University, which resulted in the conversion of such men as Bishop Ames, Drs. J. M. Trimble, and H. J. Clark. He was a man of great modesty, unflinching integrity, and unwearied diligence. He was deeply pious, and devoted much of his time to private prayer and to diligent study, and was unswerving in his attachment to the doctrines and economy of the church.

Sprague, Seth, Sr., an early abolitionist of Duxbury, Mass., was an associate of Wm. Lloyd Garrison when he was most unpopular in Boston. He was an intimate friend of Orange Scott, whom he followed out of the M. E. Church, and became a life-long supporter of the "Wesleyan" Church, to which, as in former church relations, he devoted freely time, talent, and treasure. No gathering of the friends of the slave in Boston was unattended by this venerable patriarch, whose thin locks, bent form, flashing eye, and ringing words were always welcome. He was a Democrat in politics in 1840, and the rival candidate to his son Seth, who was a Whig, whom he defeated by a handsome majority when running for the legislature. The pleasure of the father was scarcely equal to the pride of the son at the result.

Springer, Cornelius, a distinguished minister of the M. P. Church, was born near Wilmington, Del., Dec. 29, 1790. In 1808 he was converted and joined the M. E. Church, and at the age of twenty-one engaged in school-teaching. In the War of 1812 he served as lieutenant of a company, and acquitted himself with distinction. In 1816 he left a position in the academy at Putnam, O., to enter the itinerant ministry in the M. E. Church, in which he continued about thirteen years. He was one among the earliest of those who sought a change in the government of the church, and in 1822-23 wrote a series of articles, which were published in the Wesleyan Repository. When his associates in the controversy were expelled from the church he felt himself bound to go with them, and became one of the founders of the Methodist Protestant Church. After filling various prominent appointments he was elected editor of The Methodist Protestant, a semi-monthly paper devoted to the interests of the church. In July, 1839, he commenced on his farm, near Zanesville, the publication of the Western Recorder, a weekly paper, authorized by the Pittsburgh Conference. After six years in this position he found his eye-sight injured, and he was compelled to withdraw to private life. After his retirement until his death he was chiefly engaged in the management of his beautiful farm. His name will be held in reverential remembrance by the church, in which he was both a pillar and an ornament.

Springfield, Ill. (pop. 17,364), is the capital of the State, and is situated on the border of a beautiful prairie, near the Sangamon River. As early as 1824 Methodist services had been introduced and a small society was organized. In 1825-26 the first M. E. church, a plain structure, was erected under the superintendence of Peter Cartwright, and was for many years the only house of worship. A second church was built, but being involved in debt was sold. A camp-meeting held in 1829-30 greatly strengthened Methodism throughout this region of country, and led a few years after to the erection of a more commodious edifice. In 1857 there were reported 256 members, 250 Sunday-school scholars, and $20,500 church property. Since that period a second church has been erected; and the German population have also built a house of worship. The African M. E. Church has a strong organization. This city is in the Illinois Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
First Church.....	345	380	$30,000
Second Church.....	181	150	10,000

African M. E. Church.....	218	100	7,000

Springfield, Mass. (pop. 26,703), is one of the old cities of New England, having been settled in 1635. Bishop Asbury visited it July 15, 1791, and makes the following entry in his journal: "At six o'clock I delivered a discourse in Mr. C——'s house on the text, 'Tis time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain righteousness upon you.' The people were a little moved, and one person was under deep conviction. This place is a haunt of soldiery, the armory being moved here. There appears to be very little religion among the inhabitants." It does not appear in the minutes of the M. E. Church until 1819, when Daniel Dorchester was pastor, who reported 77 members. The church continued to grow, and in 1857 there were two stations, having an aggregate of 386 members, 386 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $195,000. Since that period Methodism has increased with the growth of the city. It is in the

New England Conference, and reports for 1876 the following statistics

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Springfield, Mo. (pop. 5555), is the capital of Greene County, and is situated on a branch of the Missouri and Pacific Railroad. Methodist services were introduced in 1831, by J. H. Slavens; and the first church was erected in 1843. In 1845 it adhered to the Church South, and so remained. The present M. E. Church South was erected in 1858. After the close of the Civil War the M. E. Church built an edifice in 1868. A Colored Church South was organized in 1865, and a building erected in 1873. The African M. E. Church was organized in 1872, and erected a church in 1876. The city is in the St. Louis Conference, and has the following statistics for 1876:

1868	M. E. Church.....	220	138	$8,000
1858	M. E. Church South.....	160	125	10,000

Springfield, O. (pop. 12,652), the capital of Clark County, is situated on a fork of Mad River, on the Dayton and Michigan Railroad. The M. E. Church has sustained in this place for many years a seminary of learning, and The Methodist Recorder, the organ of the Methodist Protestant Church, was published in this city prior to its removal to Pittsburgh. The town was visited by Bishop Asbury as early as 1809, when he preached to a congregation of about 400. He preached again in 1811, in a private house, as no Methodist church had yet been erected. Springfield circuit was organized in 1832, but not until several years afterwards was the station formed as a separate work. The Methodist Protestants have a church in this place, and the African M. E. Church has a strong society. It is in the Cincinnati Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Squance, Thomas Hall, an English Wesleyan minister, sailed with Dr. Coke in 1813, and labored with zeal and success in Ceylon until 1822, when the state of his health compelled him to return to England. For forty years he continued to exercise a faithful and laborious ministry. He slept in Jesus in 1868,—in the seventy-ninth year of his age and the fifty-sixth of his ministry.

Stamford, Conn. (pop. 9714), is a beautiful city 32 miles from New York, on the New York and New Haven Railroad. Methodism was early introduced into this section of Connecticut, but in the village of Stamford it had not made much progress until within the last twenty-five years. In addition to the principal church there is now a mission station at Waterside. The statistics for 1876 are: 533 members, 275 Sunday-school scholars, and $65,500 church property.

Stamp, Wm. W., D.D., an eminent English Wesleyan minister, was engaged in the active duties of the ministry for the long period of forty-nine years. He was highly valued as a Christian minister and as a firm friend: wise in counsel, his brethren elected him as the president of the Conference in 1860. In 1873 he retired from public duty, and died suddenly on New Year's Day, in 1877.

Stanley, T. W., of the Cincinnati Conference, was born in Lancaster, O., in 1833, and was converted at nine years of age. In 1852 he graduated from the Ohio Wesleyan University, and joined the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church in 1857. He has filled a number of prominent appointments of the Conference, and was elected secretary of his Conference in 1868, which place he has filled at each succeeding session. In 1876 he was a delegate to the General Conference.

Stark, Anthony Butler, A.M., LL.D., president of Logan Female College, Ky., was born July

the publication of a monthly by the church, when he returned to his profession of teacher, and became president of Corana Female College, at Lebanon, Tenn., and subsequently accepted his present position. He has given great prominence to the study of the English language, and has written and read before various associations able papers on that subject. He delivered at Vanderbilt University a lecture on surnames, which was requested for publication, and also a lecture on the story of the English Bible, which is being published in The Sunday-School Magazine, at Nashville. He is earnestly devoted to the Sunday-school cause, and to other interests of the church, which he serves as an intelligent layman, and has been elected as a member of the ensuing General Conference of the M. E. Church South. He was also elected, in 1877, a member of the American Philological Association.

Staten Island lies adjacent to the coast of New Jersey, from which it is separated by only a narrow inlet, but it is a part of the State of New York. It was early visited by the Methodist pioneers. The first church was built at Woodrow, in 1787, which was replaced by the present church, on the same site, in 1843. There are tombs in the yard dated as far back as 1767, belonging to some of the old families of French Protestant refugees. They early became interested in the pioneer preachers, and many of their descendants have become prominent in the church. Two local preachers, Cole and Price, helped to fill the pulpit on the two weeks' circuit established some forty-six years ago. The progress of the church has far excelled the progress of population. Within a circle of four miles, having Woodrow for its centre, there are Woodrow, Bethel, St. Paul's, St. Mark's, St. John's, and a colored congregation.

Station.—This term is used in Methodism, and signifies a single church supplied by a pastor. It is used in distinction from circuits, where a number of appointments are united in one pastoral charge. In British Methodism the pastoral work is generally arranged in circuits, which embrace several important churches; but in the United States the larger churches are generally separated from each other, and are known in the appointments as stations.

Stationing Committee (English Wesleyan).—In Mr. Wesley's time all power over the societies rested with himself. After his death it was resolved that each district committee should elect one of its number to be its representative in the stationing committee, whose duty was to make a rough draft of stations to be presented to the Conference for revision. This has been prepared during the week preceding the opening of Conference. The committee meets again, after receiving reports from the different circuits, and presents a second draft.

ANTHONY BUTLER STARK, A.M., LL.D.

13, 1832, in Robertson Co., Tenn. He graduated with distinction at Cumberland College, Princeton, Ky., and entered upon the profession of teaching. He has contributed many articles to the quarterlies and monthlies of the country. At one time he edited at Nashville The Home Monthly, until the General Conference of the M. E. Church South ordered

After this the chairmen of the several districts are appointed. Still, numerous changes are often made, the discussion respecting them being in the open Conference. When the final draft is made out and passed, there can be no further change. The whole is confirmed by the vote of the legal hundred.

Statistics.—No provision was made among the early Methodists in England for reporting the number of members in the societies. Mr. Wesley had a thorough knowledge of the work by visiting almost every society. As their members increased, however, it became necessary to have more definite reports, and in 1766 we find the first return of the number of members in the English minutes, and those were quite imperfect. From that time forward the number of members was annually returned, distinguishing between those in full connection and those on probation, and were the only statistics reported for many years. At the establishment of Methodism in America, the same plan of report was adopted, and the only addition made was returning the number of white members and the number of colored members separately. This practice was continued in the M. E. Church until 1856, since which period no distinction has been made in the reports. In the M. E. Church South the practice is still continued. In 1856 the General Conference of the M. E. Church required a more full report, and since that time the numbers of preachers and probationers, baptisms, deaths, local preachers, churches and their estimated value, parsonages and their estimated value, the amounts collected for missions, Sunday-schools, church extension, Freedman's Aid Society, and the number of Sunday-schools, teachers, scholars, volumes in library, and collections for the Sunday-School Union, are annually reported from each station, and are published in the minutes of the Conference. In addition to this, there are fuller statistics, for Sunday-schools, reported for the benefit of the Sunday-School Union; and each Conference also reports the claims and receipts of preachers, embracing what has been paid to pastors, presiding elders, and to the episcopal fund. These are published in detail in the Conference minutes, but the most of these items are not inserted in the general minutes. The minutes also contain the preachers on trial, their classification in the course of studies, ordinations, those who are supernumerary and superannuated, the locations, withdrawals, deaths, transfers, etc. There is no branch of the Christian church which makes more full and accurate reports than do the Methodist Episcopal Churches. The superintendent of the United States census in his report bears this testimony in reference to the accuracy of the reports: "Foremost among these is the Methodist Church, which, by reason of its episcopal form of government, and its scheme of changing periodically the pastors of the churches, is always in possession of, as nearly as it would be possible to effect, the true condition of its organization in all parts of the country to a late date." What is said of the Methodist Episcopal Church is also true of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. It has not adopted, however, so full a report for its general minutes, but many of its Annual Conferences make very detailed reports. The reports in the non-episcopal Methodist Churches in the United States are not so perfect, from the fact that there are no general officers charged with this work, and it is oftentimes neglected by the local authorities. It is secured only in the episcopal churches by the presence and supervision of the bishops, who report for publication these various items. The reports, however, of the Wesleyans in England, and of the Methodist Church in Canada, are very full.

Staunton, Va. (pop. 5120), the capital of Augusta County, is situated on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad. Bishop Asbury visited it in 1793, and speaks of it as being to him a very unpleasant place. In 1808 he made another visit and ordained two deacons. Staunton circuit was organized in 1806, with Noah Fidler in charge, and reported the next year 297 members. Being in the Baltimore Conference, it remained in connection with the M. E. Church at the division of 1845; but an M. E. Church South was also organized. In 1861 the chief part of the society became independent of the M. E. Church, and ultimately united with the M. E. Church South. It is in the Virginia Conference, and the colored M. E. Church has 118 members, 140 Sunday-school scholars, and $12,000 church property. The Church South has 349 members, 488 Sunday-school scholars, and $12,000 church property.

Steele, Daniel, D.D., late vice-president of Syracuse University, was born in Windham, N. Y., Oct. 5, 1824. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1848, and served for two years afterwards as tutor in that institution. He joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1849, and served in pastoral work till 1862, when he was elected Professor of Ancient Languages in Genesee College. From 1869 to 1871 he served as acting president of the college, and in the latter year, upon the incorporation of Genesee College with Syracuse University, became vice-president of the university. He retired from the university in 1872, and engaged in pastoral work in the New England Conference of the M. E. Church.

Steele, George McKendree, D.D., president of Lawrence University, was born in Strafford, Vt., April 13, 1823. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1850, and in the same year taught mathematics and the Latin language at the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass. He joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1853, and was engaged in pastoral work till 1865, when he was chosen president of

Lawrence University. He was a member of the Board of Visitors to the United States Naval Academy at Annapolis, Md., in 1871, and was a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1868 and 1872. He has contributed articles to the Methodist Quarterly Review, the Christian Examiner, the North American Review, and other periodicals.

Stephens, John, an English Wesleyan preacher, was engaged in the ministry from 1792 until 1841, when he died. In 1827 he was president of the Conference.

Stephenson, T. B., B.A., an English Wesleyan preacher, commenced his ministry in 1860. After some successful years in circuit work his heart yearned after the outcast and destitute children of London. Commencing on a small scale, he gradually developed the institution now known as "The Children's Home," which has been described among the "educational institutions." Mr. Stephenson is set apart by the Conference for this work, to which he evidently has a divine call. He also engages largely in revival services, in which he is made very useful.

Sterling, Ill. (pop. 3998), is in Whitesides County, on the Chicago and Iowa Railroad. It appears in the minutes of the church in 1854 as a circuit, and reported 163 members in the following year. In 1857 it had become a station, having 123 members. There are now two stations, Broadway, having 120 members, 125 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,000 church property, and Fourth Street, having 162 members, 125 Sunday-school scholars, and $23,200 church property.

Steubenville, O. (pop. 8107), the capital of Jefferson County, is situated on the Ohio River. It was visited by Bishop Ashbury in 1803, and he makes this record: "As the court-house could not contain the people we went to the Presbyterian tent, for which, as the Jews and Samaritans have no dealings in this country, we must ask pardon." The bishop always stopped with Mr. B. Wells, of whom he spoke in high terms. When again visiting the place, in 1811, he found "an elegant brick chapel, 50 by 35 feet, on a grand eminence." This was the first M. E. church in the city. Steubenville circuit was organized in 1816, with James P. Finley and Joseph Pownell as preachers. It embraced a large extent of country, and in 1816 reported 1011 members. It became a station in 1818, with Cornelius Springer as pastor, who reported the subsequent year 137 members. During the Radical controversy, which issued in the formation of the Methodist Protestant Church, the church was divided, and a large number organized a new church. Subsequently, however, the church was blessed with prosperity, and has very largely increased. The Primitive Methodists and the African M. E. Church are represented also in the city. It is in the East Ohio Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Stevens, Abel, D.D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 19, 1815; entered the New England Conference in 1834; served one year as agent of the Wesleyan University, and the following year was stationed in Boston. In 1837 he made a European tour. In 1848 he became editor of Zion's Herald, where he remained for twelve years. In 1848 he was elected editor of The Christian Advocate, but declined to accept. In 1852 when The National Magazine was commenced he was appointed editor. He made a second visit to Europe in 1855, and in 1856 was elected editor of The Christian Advocate, in which position he served for four years. In 1860 he became corresponding editor of The Methodist, and retained this position till 1874. His writings have been very widely circulated, and embrace "The Memorials of the Introduction of Methodism into New England," "Memorials of the Progress of Methodism in the Eastern States," "Church Polity," "The Preaching Required by the Times," "Sketches and Incidents: a Budget from the Saddle-Bags of an Itinerant," "Tales from the Parsonage," "The Great Reform," "Systematic Benevolence," "History of Methodism," "Life and Times of Nathan Bangs," "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church," "Centenary of American Methodism," "The Women of Methodism," etc.

Stevens, William, was born in Massachusetts in 1778, and died in Bridgewater, Pa., March 1, 1858. In 1804 he entered the New England Conference, and after traveling for nine years he located, and removed to the West. In 1821 he was readmitted by the Ohio Annual Conference, and became a member of the Pittsburgh Conference on its organization, where he labored until he became superannuated, in 1846. He was a man of great energy of character, was deeply devoted, and was instrumental in bringing many to Christ.

Stevenson, Edward, D.D., of the Kentucky Conference, M. E. Church South, was born in Kentucky in 1797, and united with the Conference in that State in 1820. He became an active and useful minister, occupying the most prominent stations in the church. At the separation of the church, in 1845, he took an active part in its organization, and was elected missionary secretary, and subsequently served as book agent. He died July 6, 1864.

Stevenson, William J., D.D., of the Wilmington Conference, is a native of Philadelphia, Pa., and, after receiving a fine education, was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference of the M. E. Church in 1859. He has filled a number of important appointments in Wilmington, Philadelphia, Harrisburg, and Baltimore, and was connected with the erection of the elegant Grace church in Wilmington, and of the new and commodious church in Harrisburg, Pa. He is now stationed at Grace church, Wilmington, Del.

Stewards were early appointed by Mr. Wesley, to receive, account for, and disburse the collections. At present the number in each charge varies from three to nine. One of these is called the recording steward, who makes and preserves the records of the church; another is called the district steward, who represents in the district stewards' meetings the interests of his particular church. Stewards are nominated by the preacher having charge of the circuit, or station, but the Quarterly Conference has the right of affirmation or rejection. They hold office for one year, subject to re-appointment. The duties of stewards are, to take an exact account of the funds collected for the support of the preachers, and to apply them as the Discipline directs; to take collections for the sick and poor, and to relieve and comfort them as far as possible; "to inform the preachers of any sick or disorderly persons; to tell the preachers what they think wrong in them; to attend the quarterly meetings, and the leaders' and stewards' meetings; to give advice, if asked, in planning the circuit; to attend committees for the application of money to churches; to give counsel in matters of arbitration; to provide the elements for the Lord's Supper; to write circular-letters to the societies in the circuit to be more liberal if need be; as also to let them know, when occasion requires, the state of the temporal concerns at the last quarterly meeting." They are accountable to the Quarterly Conference of the circuit or station, which has power to dismiss or change them. In the division of labor between stewards and trustees, the former attend to all the current expenses of the church for ministerial and benevolent purposes; the latter to all the financial interests connected with the church property. The stewards have no right to incur any debt which is binding on the property of the church; and hence it is their duty to complete their collections and to meet their obligations annually. Mr. Wesley, in thus separating the current expenses from the property, showed a wise foresight; for although there may be deficiencies in the current expenses which may bear heavily on the preacher for the time being, yet the societies are constantly stimulated to meet their engagements, and to close up this department of their finances every year. Where stewards are dispensed with, as in some of the larger churches in cities, the current expenses are in danger of becoming a lien upon the church property, which may be embarrassed, if not jeopardized thereby. The Discipline requires that the stewards "be men of solid piety, who both know and love the Methodist doctrine and discipline, and of good natural and acquired abilities to transact the temporal business."

Stewards, Duties of (English Wesleyan).—"The office of steward in the Methodist connection embraces four departments, viz., circuit, society, poor, and chapel stewards. They are usually appointed at the December quarterly meeting; the society and poor stewards at the first leaders' meeting in the month of January. Their term of office ceases at the end of the year; but they are eligible for re-election for three years successively.

The Duties devolving upon Circuit Stewards are, in the majority of instances, determined by usage, and may be classed as follows: 1. To examine at each quarterly meeting the books of the respective society stewards, and to receive the moneys which each society has raised during the quarter towards the support of the ministry. 2. To pay to each circuit minister the allowances then due to him; all such allowances being regarded as prospective. 3. To meet all demands for house-rent and taxes, and all other legitimate claims on the funds of the circuit. 4. To provide suitable, comfortably-furnished homes for the ministers of the circuit, and to welcome them on their arrival. 5. To keep the accounts of the circuit; such accounts to be audited quarterly by two persons appointed for that purpose. 6. To transmit each quarter to the district treasurer of the Children's Fund whatever moneys may be due from the circuit to that fund, or to receive from him what the circuit is entitled to claim. 7. To attend, during the transaction of monetary business, the sittings of both the annual and financial district meetings. 8. To act as the official channel through which communications from the circuit are transmitted to the Conference. 9. To audit, in conjunction with the superintendent minister, the accounts of all trust-estates in the circuit that are settled on the provisions of the Model Deed. 10. To take the initiative in the invitation of ministers for the ensuing year; the nomination resting exclusively with them. On their ceasing to nominate, the matter is altogether in the hands of the quarterly meeting.

The Duties of the Society Stewards may be thus defined: 1. To unite with the ministers and leaders in everything connected with the promotion of the spiritual and temporal interests of the society to which he belongs. 2. To attend regularly the leaders' meeting; to receive the moneys which the members have contributed, and to pay from such moneys the "board" (or sustentation allowance) of the minister, or transmit the whole to the stewards of the circuit. To attend also the quarterly meeting, and present his accounts to be examined and certified by the circuit stewards. 3. To be in attendance before the commencement of the public service to receive the minister in the vestry; and, in cases of pulpit-disappointment, to make such arrangements for the due performance of the service as circumstance will permit. 4. To take care that all the collections, as stated in the Circuit Plan, are duly announced the Sabbath preceding, and made at the appointed time; to receive the moneys so collected, and forward them without delay to the treasurers, or parties appointed to receive the same. 5. To prepare or sign all notices intended for announcement from the pulpit. 6. To prepare for the due celebration of the sacrament of baptism; and in case there is no poor steward, to provide also for the administration of the Lord's Supper, and for love-feasts, when appointed to be held. 7. To provide, when necessary, a suitable home for the preacher who officiates.

The Duties devolving upon the Poor Stewards are: 1. To attend regularly the leaders' meetings; and, as sanctioned by them, to meet all demands from time to time made upon the Poor's Fund. 2. To furnish the minister with the names and addresses of any sick or poor members, in order that due pastoral attention may be given. 3. To provide for the administration of the Lord's Supper, and for love-feasts, when appointed to be held; making previously the necessary announcement, and making on each occasion the collection for the poor. 4. To keep an accurate account of all receipts and disbursements in reference to the fund; and once a year, or oftener, if required, to present the same for the scrutiny and approval of the leaders' meeting.

The Appointment of Chapel Stewards rests with the trustees, in conjunction with the superintendent of the circuit. During the interim of the meetings of the trustees they must be regarded as acting in their name and stead; attending to "the orderly conducting of the secular affairs of the chapel." On them it devolves: 1. To take the general oversight of the building and its furniture: keeping the premises in good repair. 2. To see that the chapel, vestries, and other rooms connected with it, are properly cleaned, warmed, lighted, and ventilated. 3. To make suitable arrangements for the purpose of letting and re-letting the pews and sittings of the chapel; attending personally to receive or collect (in advance) the seat-rents then due; and, after deducting whatever is necessary to meet the current expenses of the chapel, to remit the balance to the trustees' treasurer without delay. 4. To direct the movements of the chapel-keeper and other attendants of the chapel, and to pay their salaries when due; seeing that the duties of their office are satisfactorily discharged. 5. To attend the meetings of the trustees, duly reporting their proceedings as stewards, and presenting their accounts when required.

Stillman, Hon. John E., was born in the province of New Brunswick in 1833, removed to the United States in 1854, and settled in Madison, Wis. He studied law, and commenced to practice in 1859. In 1861 he was elected judge in Eau Claire County, which place he occupied for five years. He united with the M. E. Church the first year of his residence at Madison, and has been a devoted worker ever since. He was lay delegate from the West Wisconsin Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Stillwater, Minn. (pop. 4124), the capital of Washington County, is situated at the head of Lake St. Croix. In 1849 James Harrington was appointed missionary to this region, from the Wisconsin Conference. In 1850 it reported 20 members. In 1857 it had become a station, reporting 47 members, 35 Sunday-school scholars, and $1500 church property. Since that period a German church has been erected, with a growing membership. It is in the Minnesota Conference, and reports for 1876:

Stilwellites was a name given to the followers of Mr. Stilwell, who seceded from the churches in New York City, and established congregations which were for a time termed Independent Methodists. For several years Mr. Stilwell had been dissatisfied in reference to the church economy, inclining to a congregational system, and had evidently been preparing for a change, and expected to take with him the property of the church. In 1820 the New York Conference, apprehending possible difficulty, passed resolutions looking to the better se-years a number of those who had seceded discovering their error returned to the church, and Mr. Stilwell's congregation became a strictly Congregational church. A few of those who had seceded joined the Reform movement when it arose, and subsequently identified themselves with the Methodist Protestant Church. A careful examination of the minutes shows that notwithstanding this secession the general onward movement of the curity of church property, and asking for such legislation as might protect their interests. He used this measure to excite a prejudice in the minds of the members of the church, and under the plea that the ministers were endeavoring to control the property, succeeded in inducing about 300 members to secede. Among these were several local preachers, and persons of long standing in the church. Active efforts were also made to induce secessions in other sections of the country, and a few small congregations were organized which were for a time associated together. In a few church was not affected. So zealous was Mr. Stilwell, that on the evening of the day in which he seceded, he visited the church in which the colored people worshiped, with a congregation of about 1000 members, and so influenced them as to induce them also to secede. This colored congregation subsequently formed the African Zion M. E. Church, and following the advice of Mr. Stilwell, their early ministers were ordained by him. His churches gradually declined, however, and long since any trace of such an associated movement has passed away.

Stocking, Davis, was born in Connecticut in 1810, and died in Sing Sing, Dec. 11, 1858. He was early the subject of divine impressions, and united with the church at the age of seventeen. In his twentieth year he was licensed to preach, and the following spring entered the New York Conference, in which for twenty-seven years he was diligent and useful. He was a man of "practical wisdom, sound judgment, and quick decision, of unusual self-possession, and untiring energy. He was mild and amiable in his manners, and commanded in all circles respect and confidence."

Stockton, Cal. (pop. 10,066), is the capital of San Joaquin County, on the Central Pacific Railroad. Methodism was introduced in the early settlement of the State, and Stockton appears as one of the appointments at the first session of the Oregon and California Conference, held Sept. 3, 1851, with 30 members reported. In 1857 it reported 62 members, 375 Sunday-school scholars, and $4500 church property. The M. E. Church South has also a church. The German Methodists have a congregation, and the African M. E. Church has also organized a congregation. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	356	295	$24,000
German M. E. Church.....	50	75	8,000

Stockton, Thomas Hewlings, D.D., an eminent minister of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Mount Holly, N. J., June 4, 1808. About eighteen years of age he was converted, and joined St. George's M. E. church, in Philadelphia. Shortly afterwards the Methodist Protestant Church was formed, of which his father was an active member, and had been the editor and publisher of The Wesleyan Repository. He united with the new organization, and was placed on a circuit in 1829, by Rev. Nicholas Snethen. The following year he was stationed in Baltimore, and was elected editor of the church organ, but declined. In 1833 he was stationed in Georgetown, D. C., and was elected chaplain to Congress, and held that position for three successive sessions. In 1837 he compiled a hymn-book under the direction of the General Conference. From 1838 to 1847 he resided in Philadelphia, where he erected the church edifice at the corner of Eleventh and Wood Streets. From 1847 until 1850 he resided in Cincinnati. During his stay in that city he was elected president of Miami University, but declined the office. From 1850 until 1856, he resided in Baltimore, and was pastor of St. John's Methodist Protestant church. From 1856 until 1868 he made his home in Philadelphia, and was pastor of the Independent church, which worshiped first in a hall, and subsequently in a church at Eleventh and Wood Streets, though he remained connected personally with the Methodist Protestant Church. In 1862 he was again chaplain in Congress. He died Oct. 9, 1868, after having suffered for years with a pulmonary affection. He was a man of great purity of life, of intellectual power, and was remarkable for his wonderful eloquence. His principal publications were The Christian World, The Book and Journal, The Bible Times, which were periodicals; "The Pastor's Tribute," "Floating Flowers," "Something New," which were in verse; "The Bible Alliance," "Sermons for the People," "Stand up for Jesus," and "The Blessing," which were small volumes.

Stoker, William, is an attorney by profession, and an active lay worker in the M. E. Church, in promoting its educational interests, and all its benevolent enterprises. He represented the Central Illinois Conference at the General Conference of 1872.

Stokes, Ellwood Haines, D.D., of the New Jersey Conference, was born of Quaker parents in

REV. ELLWOOD HAINES STOKES, D.D.

Medford, Burlington Co., N. J. At the age of eleven he removed to Philadelphia; joined the Union M. E. church in that city, March, 1834; entered the New Jersey Conference, April, 1844; served the church as pastor in Newark, Morristown, New Brunswick, Trenton, Bordentown, Camden, and other places. He was presiding elder from 1867 to 1875, and was elected to the General Conference in 1868. He was chosen president of Ocean Grove Camp-Meeting Association at its organization, Dec. 22, 1869, and re-elected, for the ninth time, in October, 1877.

Stonington, Conn. (pop. 6313), is situated in New London County, near the line between Connecticut and Rhode Island. Methodist services were introduced about 1816, by E. B. Blake and J. W. Mackey. In 1824 a class was formed, consisting of 7 members. In 1835 Mystic and Mystic Bridge, now included in Stonington, were made a charge, with Benjamin C. Phelps as pastor. In 1849 the first church at Mystic was built; being burned in 1851, it was rebuilt the same year. The first class at Mystic Bridge was formed in 1835, and a church was built in 1841, and rebuilt in 1867. These charges are in the Providence Conference. The Mystic Bridge has 136 members, 75 Sunday-school scholars, and $35,000 church property; and Mystic has 127 members, 105 Sunday-school scholars, and $8500 church property.

Storm, Hon. John D., ex-member of Congress, was born in Monroe Co., Pa., Sept. 19, 1838. He was educated at the Delaware Water Gap Classical School, and entered the Junior class of Dickinson College, Pa., graduating with honor in 1861. He studied law with Hon. S. S. Dreher, and was admitted to practice at Stroudsburg in 1863. Having taken a deep interest in education, he was, in 1862, appointed county superintendent of public schools, and was twice honored with the election. In 1870 he was elected as a member of Congress, and re-elected in 1872. He has been for a number of years an active member of the M. E. Church, filling a number of its official positions.

Stout, Andrew V., president of the National Shoe and Leather Bank, New York, was born in the city of New York, Oct. 12, 1812, and was converted and united with the church in 1828. He served as a teacher in one of the public schools in 1831, where he remained for ten years. In 1841 he resigned the position of teacher, and engaged as a wholesale merchant in leather, and manufacturer of boots and shoes. In this business he remained until 1853, when he organized and became president of the Shoe and Leather Bank of New York, the position he still holds. In 1859 he was appointed city chamberlain, and as such officer received and disbursed $35,000,000 annually for six years. He has been an active and devoted member of the M. E. Church, filling its various official positions, and contributing liberally to its funds. Among his donations are $40,000 to endow a professorship in the Drew Theological Seminary, and a like amount to endow a professorship in the Wesleyan University.

Stowers, Charles Nelson, late president of Upper Iowa University, was born in Prospect (now Stockton), Me., Sept. 24, 1835, was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1860; was appointed teacher of Mathematics in the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass., in 1860, and principal of the academy at Cincinnati, N. Y., in 1862. He was elected Professor of Languages in Upper Iowa University in 1866, Professor of Mathematics in Lawrence University in 1867, and president of Upper Iowa University in 1869. He joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1861, and was transferred to the Oneida Conference in 1864, where he did pastoral work for two years. In 1871 he engaged in pastoral work again, in the Wisconsin Conference.

Strange, John, a minister in the Indiana Conference, was born in 1789; was received on trial in the Western Conference in 1810, when not quite twenty-one years of age. He had great command of language, and was exceedingly imaginative. The tones of his voice were so clear and musical that he seemed to be able to sing, pray, or preach for any length of time without becoming hoarse. As a pioneer preacher, he frequently traveled through sparsely-settled sections, where he was obliged to go from one block-house to another with a gun on his shoulder to be prepared for attacks. His visits were hailed by the early settlers with great delight and enthusiasm. He had remarkable power in the pulpit, and his eloquence was forcible and oftentimes overwhelming in its character. His memory still lingers throughout the West as one of the most popular and successful ministers that ever labored in that country.

Strawbridge, Robert, one of the earliest local preachers in America, emigrated from Ireland about 1765 or 1766, and settled in Carroll Co. (then included in Frederick Co.), Md. He had preached in Ireland, though it is uncertain whether he had ever been regularly licensed. He was an earnest Christian, and finding no religious services in the section where he settled, he commenced preaching in his own house, and subsequently a small log chapel was erected about a mile from his dwelling. This building, however, though sometimes spoken of as the first Methodist church in Maryland, was never deeded to the church, and was never finished. He preached in several places in Maryland, especially in Harford and Frederick Counties. In 1769 he was joined in his labors by Robert Williams, and in the following year by John King, and under their joint labors several societies were organized. Under his preaching Richard Owings, the first native American preacher, was converted. In 1773 his name appears on the minutes as one of the preachers assisting Mr. Asbury on the Baltimore circuit, but it does not appear that he continued in the work. He was a man of warm impulses, but of very limited education. There is no specimen of his handwriting now extant. In the deed of property to his son, and in the letters of administration, the name is written "Strobridge," though it appears in the minutes as

"Strawbridge." He had but little regard for church order, and claimed the right, as an independent preacher, to administer the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper. The Conference, however, under the presidency of Mr. Rankin, resolved that "every preacher who comes into connection with Mr. Wesley and the brethren who labor in America is strictly to avoid administering the ordinances of baptism and the Lord's Supper." Mr. Asbury, in his journal, says that Mr. Strawbridge was made an exception, but it was resolved that he could administer only under the direction of an assistant. He, however, declined to recognize the authority of the assistant, and refused to accept the decision of the Conference, and ceased his connection with the circuit work. In 1775 his name again appears as second preacher on Frederick circuit, but from a notice in Mr. Asbury's journal, which is rather obscure, we infer he declined to act in harmony with the preacher in charge. In 1776 he removed his family to a farm not far from Baltimore, the use of which was presented to him during his life by Captain Ridgely, its generous owner. The Revolution breaking out, and the ministers from England generally retiring from their work, there was a feeling of uncertainty with regard to the future of the societies, some of which made independent arrangements. He took charge of the society at Sam's Creek, where he had resided, and of Bush Forest, in Harford County, and continued to be their preacher for about five years without recognizing any responsibility to the Conference. He died in the summer of 1781, and was buried on the farm of Mr. Wheeler, near Baltimore.

Stringfield, Thomas, of the Holston Conference, M. E. Church South, was born in Kentucky, in 1796. He served in the war of 1812, under General Jackson, and received a severe wound in the forehead from an Indian. He was received on trial in the Tennessee Conference in 1816. He was subsequently a member of the Holston Conference; was a good writer and a strong debater. He was for five years editor of the Southwest Christian Advocate; and died in Tennessee, June 12, 1858.

Strong, James, S.T.D., professor in Drew Theological Seminary, was born in New York, Aug. 14, 1822, and graduated from Wesleyan University in 1844. He taught in Troy Conference Academy in 1844-46. He removed to Flushing, L. I., in 1847, and projected and built the Flushing Railroad, of which he was president. In 1858 he was elected Professor of Theological Literature in Troy University, and was also acting president until 1861. In 1868 he became Professor of Exegetical Theology in Drew Theological Seminary, the office which he still holds. He is a member of the Anglo-American mission to revise the English version of the Bible. In 1874 he traveled extensively through Palestine, and was chosen chairman of the archaeological council of the Oriental Topographical Society; is one of the writers on Lange's Commentary, and has published "Harmony and Exposition of the Gospels," "Harmony of the Gospels," in Greek, and brief manuals of Greek and Hebrew Grammar. He was also joint editor with Rev. Dr. McClintock of the "Cyclopædia of Biblical, Theological, and Ecclesiastical Literature," and since the death of Dr. McClintock, in 1870, has the general supervision of the entire work, seven volumes of which have already appeared.

Strong, Peter Jackson, was born in Greene Co., O., in 1812. He embraced religion in his twenty-second year. In 1836 he removed to Illinois, and two years later joined the Illinois Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. He has been in the regular work of the ministry ever since. When the North Illinois district was set off, in 1843, he was elected its first president, and has served eight times in that capacity during his life. He was a member of the Conventions which met at Springfield and Cincinnati, and delegate to the General Conferences meeting in Alleghany and Princeton. He was one of the pioneers of the church in Illinois, and has served it in every department.

Strong, Sylvester Emory, M.D., was born Dec. 2, 1837, in Palmyra, N. Y., and graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1860. Having studied medicine with his father in Saratoga Springs, N. Y., he graduated in 1861 in the New York University. In 1862 he was acting medical director in the United States army. Since 1863 he has been associated with his father in the proprietorship of the Remedial Institute at Saratoga Springs. He united with the M. E. Church in early life, and is an active member, filling various official positions.

Strong, Sylvester S., M.D., of Saratoga, N. Y., united with the M. E. Church early in life, and was admitted into the New York Conference in 1833. His health becoming impaired in 1845, he took a superannuated relation, but again resumed the ministry, and on the division of the Conference became a member of New York East. His health again suffering in 1851, he received a superannuated relation, and shortly afterwards he removed to Saratoga and established a remedial institute, in which position he still remains. It has been enlarged from time to time, and is an institution well known and patronized.

Sturgeon, Hon. Daniel, M.D., ex-United States Senator from Pennsylvania, was born in Adams Co., Pa., Oct. 27, 1789. He was educated a Presbyterian, but nearly all his life he has attended the M. E. Church, and for many years has been a member of her communion. He was educated at Jef-

erson College, and afterwards studied medicine, and practiced for several years in Uniontown, Pa., where he still resides, until he entered public life. He was a member of the Pennsylvania legislature (House) from 1818 to 1821, and of the Senate from 1825 to 1829, and was Speaker of that body the last two years of his term. From 1830 to 1836 he was auditor-general of Pennsylvania, under Governor Wolf, and treasurer of the State in 1838-39, during which he was instrumental in breaking up the "Buckshot War," by refusing to honor the draft of Governor Ritner for $20,000 to pay the troops. He was elected United States Senator in 1840, and was re-elected in 1845 for a full term, ending 1851. In 1853 he was appointed by President Pierce treasurer of the United States Mint, Philadelphia, which he held until 1858, when he retired from public life to his residence at Uniontown.

Sulzberger, A., Ph.D., is a graduate of the University at Heidelberg, now professor at the German Mission Institute at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany. He is author of the first German Methodist "Dogmatik," a book which, by the bishops, has been adopted in the course of study for German traveling preachers.

Summerfield, John, an eminent orator, was born at Preston, England, Jan. 31, 1798. From childhood he evinced such mental qualities as attracted attention, and he learned with great rapidity. He attended a Moravian school near Manchester, studying the classics and other branches for five years. In his fourteenth year, his father becoming embarrassed, he opened a night-school and assisted the family. Before he was fifteen he was engaged as clerk in a mercantile establishment, managing the French correspondence. For several years following he became irregular in his habits, but was always passionately fond of listening to eloquent speakers. In 1817, in great distress, and almost in despair, he was led by a plain Methodist mechanic to religious services, and being converted, he became the principal of a "praying association," commenced exercising in public, and in 1818 took his place among local preachers. His services attracted universal attention, and were attended by immense congregations. He was proposed as a member of the Methodist Conference in Ireland, but, from his feeble health, it was thought best to let him serve a year under a superintendent. The following year, in England, he met at the British Conference at Liverpool Rev. John Emory, subsequently bishop, and, having suffered from a severe attack of disease, he sailed for America, arriving March, 1821. In the May following he delivered an address at the American Bible Society's anniversary, which produced a wonderful effect, and was regarded as one of the very highest efforts of platform eloquence. The following June he was admitted into the Troy Conference. He entered on his labors in New York City, where the churches could not contain the audiences that desired to hear him preach. In 1822 he visited Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and was everywhere greeted with immense congregations. The following year he was seized with hemorrhage of the lungs, and, seeking a milder climate, he was appointed delegate from the American Bible Society to the Protestant Bible Society in France. He then went to England, and officiated on a few occasions among his friends. On his return to America, he was unable to perform regular service, but occasionally delivered addresses at missionary societies and dedications. He was appointed by the Missionary Board of the Philadelphia Conference to travel in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and to take up collections. He united with ministers of other denominations in forming the American Tract Society, and his last public act was an eloquent address at its organization. He sank under a complication of diseases, and died June 13, 1825. A volume of his sermons, though not prepared by himself, was published after his death; and also a memoir of his life and ministry, by John Holland. He was one of the most eloquent ministers that has ever appeared in America, if not the most eloquent.

Summers, Thomas Osmond, D.D., LL.D., general editor of the books and of the Christian Advocate of the M. E. Church South, was born in Corfe Castle, Isle of Purbeck, Dorsetshire, England, Oct. 11, 1812. Removing to America, he joined the Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church in 1835. He became a missionary to Texas in 1840, and was one of the nine preachers who constituted the Texas Conference at its organization, and was its secretary for four sessions. In 1843 he was transferred to the Alabama Conference, and was stationed in Tuscaloosa, Livingston, and Mobile. At the General Conference in 1846, he was elected assistant editor of the Southern Christian Advocate, in Charleston, S. C., with Doctor, now Bishop, Wightman. He was secretary of the Louisville Convention in 1845, at which the M. E. Church South was organized; and has been secretary of all the General Conferences held since that time. He has devoted much attention to hymnology, and was chairman of the committee that compiled the hymn-book for the M. E. Church South. He has been the general book editor from the organization of the church; started the Sunday-School Visitor, in Charleston, where he edited it for four years. In 1855 he removed to Nashville, where the publishing-house had been located, and was editor of The Quarterly Review for several years preceding and during the war. As editor, he has revised many of the books for the church; has written introductions, notes, indexes, etc., for Wesley's Sermons, Watson's Sermons, Theological Institutes, and the Biblical and Theological Dictionary, which he enlarged by a number of original articles. During the war he returned to Alabama, in 1862, and performed pastoral labor in Tuscaloosa and Greensborough, but in 1866 he was re-elected general editor and editor of the Sunday-School Visitor, and is also editor of the Christian Advocate, the organ of the church. He is also Professor of Systematic Theology in the Vanderbilt University, where he is dean of the theological faculty and ex-officio pastor of the institution. Dr. Summers is the author of "Commentaries on the Gospels," the "Acts," and the "Ritual of the M. E. Church South" (six volumes), a "Treatise on Baptism," one on "Holiness," "Sunday-School Teacher," on the "Catechetical Condition of the Church," "Talks of the Months and Days," "Talks Pleasant and Profitable," "Refutation of the Theological Works of Paine," "The Golden Censer," an "Essay on Prayer," and various pamphlets, tracts, and sermons.

Summit Grove Camp-meeting is located near New Freedom, Pa., on the Northern Central Railway, 37 miles from Baltimore. The camp-ground is about 200 yards distant from the railroad; is well inclosed; has good shade; and an abundance of excellent water is supplied by wells near the circle of tents. There are 42 blocks of tents, 18 by 18 feet, two stories high, weather-boarded, shingled, and with roof. The blocks are divided into four tents, 9 by 18 feet each, two on the first story and two on the second story; the latter is reached by a covered stairway, rendering them quite convenient. There are two circles of tents: the first, a large audience circle, is well seated, on a rising slope; the second is around the tabernacle, which is a building 50 by 90 feet, with shingled roof, and comfortable seats for 1000 or 1200 people.

Sunbury, Pa. (pop. 3131), the capital of Northumberland County, is situated on the Susquehanna River. This section of country was early occupied by Methodist ministers, who served it from the Baltimore Conference; but the Sunbury circuit by name was not organized until 1839, when John Rhodes and William Hurst were in charge, and who reported the next year 400 members. In 1868 it became a station, and in 1869 reported 175 members. Since that time a fine church has been erected. It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and has 282 members, 330 Sunday-school scholars, and $33,000 church property.

Sunday, John, alias Shah-Wun-Dais, was a native Indian, born of pagan parents in Canada, who became a member of the Canada Conference. He belonged to the Missisanga section of the Ojibway nation, which occupied a large portion of Upper Canada. He was converted in 1826, and said to the missionary secretary, "Thirty years I lived in darkness." He was a man of medium size, but of uncommon muscular strength and of great determination. When a young man he served with the British troops in the war against the United States. Shortly after his conversion he was appointed a leader among the converted Belleville Indians, began to exhort, and was afterwards employed to go into the forest and address the pagan Indians. He was the earliest evangelical pioneer to the tribes on the north waters of Lakes Huron and Superior. He was received into the Conference in 1832, and in 1836 was ordained. The same year he accompanied Rev. William Lord to England, to plead the cause of missions, and remained a year in that work. A large part of his ministerial labor was performed under the direction of the Rev. William Case. He had charge of Alderville, Rice and Mud Lake, and Muncytown circuits. He died in 1876.

Sunday-School Advocate, a publication of the M. E. Church, was authorized by the General Conference of 1840. The General Conference of 1872 instructed the book agents to publish a weekly edition as well as a semi-monthly edition. It has been one of the most successful Sunday-school publications of the church. The General Conference of 1876 abandoned the weekly edition of this paper. It is largely illustrated, and is very attractive to Sunday-school scholars. In 1876 it reached the maximum circulation of 365,329. The agents issued 7,320,000 copies. It is published at New York, by Nelson & Phillips, the book agents: Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., being editor.

Sunday-School Classmate, a Sunday-school publication by the M. E. Church, was first issued in April, 1873. It was designed especially for the older pupils. It continued for two years, and reached a maximum monthly circulation of 62,000. By a change in the postal laws, which seemed to adversely affect the circulation of this paper, it was decided by the book agents to suspend its publication. It was re-issued, however, in the first of the year 1877. It is published semi-monthly by Nelson & Phillips, New York; Rev. J. H. Vincent, D.D., being editor.

Sunday-School Journal is a monthly publication under the control of the M. E. Church, published by the book agents, Nelson & Phillips, New York. The General Conference of 1860 directed the agents to publish a teachers' journal, especially for the use of teachers. By order of the same body, in 1868, it was so changed as to contain sixteen large octavo pages instead of eight quarto. Rev. J. H. Vincent was elected editor of the magazine and books of instruction. Its subscription-list during the next four years ran up from 23,000 to 58,000. Its monthly issue was 100,000; May 1, 1872, its regular issue was 60,000, an increase in four years of 41,500. In 1876 it reported a maximum circulation for 1875 of 120,000, an increase in four years of 60,000. It is extensively circulated among the various religious denominations.

Sunday-School Union (English Wesleyan).—For many years an earnest desire had been entertained by many of the best friends of Methodist Sunday-schools in Great Britain to see them all associated in a Union to be worked for the common good. Suggestions to the Conference from district meetings had been forwarded from time to time. Committees were appointed, and a scheme devised, which was laid before the Conference of 1874 and cordially accepted. It has the following objects in view: to promote the development of the Sunday-school system, with the special design of securing greater spiritual results; and the gathering of scholars into the Wesleyan Methodist Society; to promote a closer relationship between the school, the society, and the ministers; to promote union and co-operation among the Sunday-schools in the several circuits, and to encourage the connectional element in the character and working of the schools; to promote the establishment of such schools, and the formation of circuit unions wherever practicable; to supply teachers with aid and information as shall tend to the more efficient instruction of their classes; to collect and give information respecting the best methods for the organization and management of our schools; to obtain, record, and supply statistical details respecting their condition; to render aid in the supply of suitable school books and appliances; and to provide books for libraries and rewards, also to promote such other purposes as experience and observation may in the future suggest for the benefit of the Sunday-schools of the connection.

A central agency has been established at No. 2 Ludgate Circus Buildings, London, E. C., providing sale- and show-rooms, library-, reading-, and committee-rooms. Here are found all the publications of the Union, which is, in fact, the branch of the connectional book-room for Sunday-school publications; with classified specimens of all approved works issued by societies and ordinary publishers; with all the various necessities for Sunday-school outfit and work,—a central depot at which all the best books and equipments of the day can be inspected and selected from. Provincial centres are being organized in the large towns, and depots have been established in London, Sheffield, Leeds, Hull, Liverpool, Manchester, and Bradford; and the whole agency, though in its infancy, is now in vigorous and successful operation. The Union, in 1877, shows 5990 schools, 113,503 teachers and officers, 723,312 scholars, and 2460 libraries, having 657,240 volumes. The total cost for 1876 was £52,592.

The report presented by the committee of the Sunday-School Union is highly encouraging. Upwards of 1900 schools have availed themselves of its advantages, one of which was the awarding of 674 library grants, comprising 51,287 books. Volumes valued at £3515.13.11 have been placed in libraries at a cost to the schools of £1463.

Sunday-School Union, of the M. E. Church, was organized in 1827. It was re-organized and recognized by the General Conference in 1840. In 1844 the General Conference appointed "an editor especially and solely for the Sunday-school department." The first complete report of the Union was made in the spring of 1845, when the following figures were made by Rev. Dr. Kidder, the first editor and early founder of the present Sunday-school department of the church: number of Sunday-schools, 5005; number of officers and teachers, 47,252; number of scholars, 268,775. At that time the membership in the church amounted to 656,642, showing nearly two and one-half times as many communicants as children in the Sunday-schools. In 1876, an interval of thirty-one years, there were reported 19,346 schools, 204,964 teachers, and 1,426,946 scholars. The membership of the church amounted to 1,652,291, showing the number of scholars almost equal to the number of members in the church. In its reports the Union states that for the four years closing December, 1875, there were reported 280,865 conversions.

The chief objects of the Sunday-School Union were to encourage the formation of schools in poorer places and amidst sparse population, by furnishing to them small donations of books suitable for libraries, and to awaken in the entire church a feeling of unity in this work. A large number of Sunday-school books of various sizes have been published by the editors, Dr. Kidder, Dr. Wise, and Dr. Vincent, who have successively had charge of this department. Owing to these efforts the collection of books now published under the care of the Sunday-School Union is equal if not superior to any collection in the world. The annual collections received from the churches by the Union are about from $16,000 to $17,000.

Sunday-Schools.—From a very early period in the history of the church devoted Christians, following the example of the blessed Master, endeavored to instruct and educate the children. Sometimes they were gathered together for catechetical instruction, and for reading the Bible on the Lord's day; but until about one hundred years ago no systematic effort was made to bring all the children under the influences of religious training on the holy Sabbath. In England, as early as 1769, Miss Hannah Ball gathered a number of the children of the poor and neglected, and taught them on Saturday and Sunday, and reported to Mr. Wesley the progress which she made in her work. In 1781, Robert Raikes, a man of benevolence and wealth, asked the question, "What shall be done for the neglected street children of Gloucester?" And Miss Cook, a young Wesleyan woman, afterwards Mrs. Bradburn, replied, "Let us teach them to read and take them to church." The suggestion was adopted and schools were established, the teachers being employed and paid by Mr. Raikes. Hearing of the success of the schools, Mr. Wesley highly recommended them, and suggested the plan of securing volunteer teachers to establish schools in all the congregations. At the organization of the M. E. Church, in 1784, the question was asked, "What shall be done for the rising generation?" and it was answered, "Where there are ten children whose parents are in society meet them at least one hour every week." And influenced by an anxious desire to benefit the youth of the country, Bishop Asbury organized one of the earliest, if not the earliest, Sunday-school in America, at the house of Thomas Crenshaw, in Hanover Co., Va. Gradually the twofold idea of the Sunday-schools as a department of the church, and for the development of the children of the church, and as a mission institution for the training of the neglected children of the community, continued to advance, and got a firm hold upon the church in this country. From this beginning the M. E. Church has been a Sunday-school church. The present magnificent Sunday-school system is the legitimate outgrowth of this early appreciation of the movement, and of the careful attention devoted to its interests. In the different branches which have separated from the M. E. Church in America, devotion to the interests of Sunday-schools has everywhere been manifested; and the same spirit seems to pervade the entire family of churches. In England, for many years the Sunday-schools were regarded rather as a place of instruction for poor children, and many of the ministers and leading members of the church considered that it was not necessary that their children, trained at home and educated in biblical knowledge, should attend the sessions of these schools. The American idea, however, is at present pervading the schools of that country, and the attendance is becoming much more general. The number of children in attendance in the schools in America is not quite equal to that of the number of communicants in the churches. In the cities and in localities where the population is dense, the number of children generally exceeds that of the membership of the churches; but in country places, where the population is sparse and widely scattered, and among the colored people of the South, the numbers in the Sabbath-schools are much less than the membership in the churches. It may be safely said that increased interest is being taken year by year in the Sunday-school cause. More papers are circulated, a great number of volumes are collected in the libraries, and more systematic and careful attention is paid to the study of God's word. The introduction of the uniform lesson system, under the inspiration and supervision of Rev. Dr. Vincent, which began in Chicago in the year 1866, has increased to a wonderful degree. The Berean series of lessons was commenced in 1870, and in 1873 the international lesson system was inaugurated. The number of conversions reported in these schools is very encouraging, showing that while efforts are made for the instruction of the children in knowledge, prayer is offered also for their conversion, and thus the Sunday-school teacher becomes an efficient home missionary. The following table shows the number of Sunday-school children as reported by the different branches of the Methodist family in 1875 or 1876, as statistics have been obtained:

Sunday Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church was an abridgment of the Prayer-Book of the Church of England, prepared by Mr. Wesley for the use of the Methodists in America. This work was arranged when he recommended the organization of the societies into a Methodist Episcopal Church; and to guide them in their service he modified the liturgy of the Church of England, and, printing an edition, sent it by Dr. Coke to America. It was entitled "The Sunday Service of the Methodists of North America, with Other Occasional Services." This form was adopted by the General Conference of 1784, as may be seen by the following minute: "2. Will it be expedient to appoint some of our helpers to read the morning and evening services out of our liturgy on the Lord's day? A. It will. And every helper, who receives a written direction under the hand of a superintendent, may regularly read the morning and evening services on the Lord's day." This was published in connection with the Discipline, in Philadelphia, in 1785, and a second edition was published in London in 1786. This appears to have been the last time that the Sunday Service was published in connection with the Discipline. In 1789 the question was asked, "Are the preachers to read our liturgy?" And the answer was given, "All that have received a written direction for that purpose under the hand of a bishop or elder, may read the liturgy as often as they think it expedient." At the General Conference in 1792, all reference to the use of a Sunday Service was stricken out. This edition of the Prayer-Book was used for some time by the American Methodists, but it gradually dropped out of use, without any prohibition being made by the church. No edition of it has since been published by the Methodist Episcopal Church. The M. E. Church South, however, in 1866, ordered that the Prayer-Book as printed by Mr. Wesley in 1786 should be reprinted for the use of their church; and the edition was issued with some slight alterations. The same service was also prepared for the Methodists in England, and it is still used in many Wesleyan churches, though generally the churches which use a service prefer the regular English Prayer-Book. The general feeling of the American people was averse to these forms and ceremonies which were being used in the English Church, and especially to the wearing of gowns and bands, and the liturgical services. In addition to this, many of the congregations were gathered in sparsely-settled sections of country, where the people had no books, and where the long travels of the minister prevented his being able to supply them.

Superannuated Preachers are ministers in the Methodist Churches who, through age, infirmity, or afflictions, become permanently disabled for ministerial labor, but who remain members of the Annual Conferences. In the American churches they have all the rights and privileges of the Annual Conferences, except being eligible to appointments. In the English Wesleyan Church, if members of the legal hundred or constitutional Conference, they cease to be members of that body. Should the health of the superannuated minister become sufficiently restored, he may by vote of the Conference be placed in an effective relation. When a superannuated minister lives out of the bounds of the Conference of which he is a member, he is entitled to a seat in the Quarterly Conference, and to privileges of membership in the church where he resides; and he is also accountable to the Conference in the bounds of which he lives, if charges are presented against him. It is his duty to forward annually to the Conference of which he is a member a certificate of his Christian and ministerial standing, to be signed by the presiding elder of the district, or the preacher in charge of the work within whose bounds he resides. Without such certificate he has no claims on the Conference for support, and may be located without his consent. At an early period, in England, a collection was taken in the various societies for the support of the superannuated preachers. The General Conference of 1784 adopted the same provision, which has continued to the present time. At one period a mutual benefit society was organized, in which every traveling preacher when admitted contributed £1, or $2.67, Pennsylvania currency, and $2 annually, as a fund out of which superannuated preachers, their widows and children, were to be provided for. This plan, however, did not long continue; and no general provision is made for superannuated ministers, except a collection taken in the churches for Conference claimants, which is divided among the cases deemed to be the most necessitous. There is also a Chartered Fund, the annual revenue of which amounts to only about $30 for each Annual Conference. The various Annual Conferences adopt further provisions as they see fit, and in many of them permanent funds have been commenced, the interest of which is devoted to superannuated or necessitous cases according to the number of years of travel, or the peculiar demands of each case. Each Quarterly Conference is directed to estimate what amount is needed for the support of superannuated preachers or their widows, and a certificate is to be forwarded to the Annual Conference. The case is then considered by the stewards of the Conference, and on their report the amount to be distributed is decided by the vote of the Conference. Those who are able to support themselves, either by income from property or by business which they are able to follow, are not considered claimants on the Conference funds. According to the statistics of 1876, there were in the Methodist Episcopal Church 1103 superannuated preachers, and the annual collections reported during the year for their support amounted to $133,816. The M. E. Church South, in 1875, report 259 superannuated ministers.

Superintendents (English Wesleyan).—In Mr. Wesley's time those in charge of circuits were called assistants; they are now termed superintendents. All probationers are under the special care of their superintendent: "he is to see that they want for nothing." He is responsible to the Conference for the maintenance of discipline and order in all the societies of the circuit; he presides as chief pastor in all circuit courts. If unavoidably absent, he can depute a colleague to preside. He, or one of his colleagues, must make the circuit plan, must arrange for the quarterly visitation of the classes, change or re-elect the stewards, the nomination being with himself—the vote with the leaders' or quarterly meetings. All the minor details connected with the management of the circuit are in his hands.

Supernumeraries (English Wesleyan).—Each minister desiring this relation must obtain the consent of the May district meeting. The assent of the Conference is essential. They receive a maintenance according to the number of years that they have been in the active work. This is derived first from the Annuitant Society, which is, in reality, their own Life Assurance Fund; this is supplemented from the Auxiliary Fund. (See ANNUITANT and AUXILIARY FUNDS.) This also provides, to a certain extent, for the support and education of their children. Should they enter into business, they are only reckoned as accredited local preachers. After four years they are looked upon as superannuated, and if members of the legal hundred, they are superseded. They are under the supervision of the district meeting, and if their names are on the minutes, they are members of the quarterly, local preachers', and district meetings.

Supernumerary Preachers, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, are such as are by reason of impaired health temporarily unable to perform effective work. They may receive an appointment, or be left without one, according to the judgment of the Annual Conference to which they belong. They have no claim, however, on the Conference funds, except by the vote of the Conference. Whenever supplying a charge, they are subject to the same limitations and discipline as effective ministers. If without charge, they are members of the Quarterly Conference, and have all the privileges of membership where they reside. The English minutes originally defined supernumerary preachers to be "those who can preach four or five times a week." This definition was adopted when ministers were expected to preach not only three times on the Sabbath, but almost as often on every day of the week. In the United States, the first definition of who are supernumeraries was made by the M. E. Church in 1792, when it declared a supernumerary preacher "to be one so worn out in the itinerant service as to be rendered incapable of preaching constantly, but at the same time willing to do any work in the ministry which the Conference may direct and his strength enable him to perform." In 1800, on motion of Dr. Coke, supernumerary preachers, their widows and orphans, were to have the same support which was then accorded to effective preachers. This relation in early days gave the church but little trouble, as there was no tendency to remain in the Conference without the ability to labor effectively: indeed, the great embarrassment of the church was the constant tendency in the ministry to location. As the funds of the Conferences increased, and as a connection with the Conference became more desirable, some who desired to seek rest for a few years, for travel, or to engage in various agencies, or even in business, desired to maintain their connection with the Conference, and were placed on the supernumerary list. The difficulties became so great that, in 1860, the General Conference abolished the relation so far as the Annual Conferences were concerned, but the phrase still remained in the Restrictive Rules. In 1864 the relation was restored with the definition at present given, and with the provision that supernumerary preachers have no claim upon the beneficiary funds of the church, unless by a vote of the Annual Conference. No little difficulty, however, is still experienced in regard to this list of ministers. It is becoming a serious question whether any should be continued members of the Annual Conferences other than such as receive effective appointments, or as are truly unable to perform labor. The number of supernumerary preachers reported in the minutes of 1876 was 701.

Sustentation Fund (English Wesleyan).—A fund has been formed in the several districts, the object of which is, to raise such an amount in each district as shall enable them in themselves, to furnish a sum to claimant circuits, which shall raise the stipends of ministers in the poorer circuits to a sum much greater than they could afford without such supplementary aid. The whole is under the supervision of Conference, and it is hoped that in future years financial difficulties may be removed, and all placed upon a creditable and advantageous footing.

Sutcliffe, Joseph, M.A., an English Wesleyan minister, was appointed to a circuit by Mr. Wesley in 1786. As a preacher he was original, never wearied his audience, was deeply spiritual, and gave lucid expositions of Holy Scripture. He was a diligent student and excelled in biblical scholarship, which he sanctified to the service of God in various writings. The chief of these is his strikingly beautiful Commentary. He died at the ripe age of ninety-four, in 1856.

Swahlen, John, of the East German Conference, was born Dec. 25, 1808, in the canton of Berne, Switzerland. In 1832 he removed to New Orleans, and as an awakened sinner he went to Cincinnati in 1833. He was converted at a church called "Brimstone corner," and was the first male member who gave his name to young Nast. Brother Swahlen built the first German Methodist meeting-house in the world; and ever since he has been a sort of church-extension society, building churches and parsonages and paying for them, as well as freeing those built by others from debt. Since 1838 he has been transferred to and fro into eight Conferences; but most of his time since 1847 has been spent in the bounds of the now East German Conference. He was for four years presiding elder of the Philadelphia German district, and was a delegate to the General Conference of 1868. He is an honest, hard-working laborer in the vineyard of the Lord.

Sweden, Methodist Missions In.—The kingdom of Sweden is the northeastern and largest of the three Scandinavian states, and forms the eastern part of the Northern Scandinavian peninsula. Its area is 171,761 square miles, and its population in 1876 was 4,383,291. Its government is a constitutional monarchy. The people are highly advanced in civilization and popular education. The established religion of the state is the Lutheran, but the exercise of other creeds is now allowed under certain regulations. Although it is an enlightened state, and enjoys an excellent and liberal government, Sweden was, until within a few years, one of the most intolerant states in Europe in religious affairs, and has been one of the last to adopt principles of toleration. Formerly public worship in any other than the Lutheran confession was placed under the most severe restrictions. Previous to 1873, no one who was not confirmed in the Lutheran Church could be legally married, and other disabilities were placed upon dissenters, which made their condition very uncomfortable. The "Law of Dissenters," passed in 1873, removed the most obnoxious restrictions upon freedom of worship, and permitted the organization of churches separate from the establishment, with liberty to worship and administer the sacraments upon compliance with certain general conditions and legal formalities; under the present law, however, every Swede who does not claim to belong to some one of the dissenting sects must be confirmed when fourteen or fifteen years of age, and partake of the sacrament; otherwise, he will be subjected to disabilities. The principal Protestant missions in Sweden, outside of the established church, are those of the Methodist Episcopal Church and of the Baptists. When, in 1854, the Rev. O. P. Petersen was commissioned by the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church to open missions in the Scandinavian countries, Peter Larssen was appointed an assistant missionary. While Mr. Petersen was laying the foundations of the mission in Norway, Mr. Larssen went to Sweden, and visited several families at Calmar. In November, 1855, he reported from this place that he had held thirty-two meetings and sold fifty Bibles. It was still against the law to hold regular public religious services, and consequently nothing could be done towards organizing a permanent work till the restrictions upon dissenting worship were removed. An agitation soon sprung up on the subject of religious freedom. The king made an effort, in 1857-58, to obtain from the chambers an enlargement in the privileges of worship, but was defeated. A mission was begun in 1864, at Wisby, in the island of Gottland, by the Rev. Mr. Cedérholm, with one assistant. Two years afterwards, the Rev. Mr. Larssen, with an assistant, was appointed to open a mission in the important commercial town of Gottenburg. In the latter year, 1866, fifty people of the poorer classes of Gottland had been awakened, and most of them converted, and a similar number of the farmers and people of the small villages around Gottenburg were converted under the preaching of the Rev. Mr. Olsen, Mr. Larssen's assistant. The mission was still bound by the laws which forbade religious services by dissenters during the hours of service in the churches, and which also prohibited the administration of the sacraments, except by pastors duly authorized to administer them. The Rev. Victor Witting, whose name is closely associated with the building up of the mission, was appointed to Sweden in 1867. The report for that year states that several classes had been formed in Gottland: that a Sunday-school of more than 100 children had been organized at Wisby; that preaching had been begun at several other places on the island of Gottland; and that a station had been begun at Stockholm, and the work had been attended with success both there and at Gottenburg. In 1868 the mission had found friends in influential quarters, the archdeacon of the diocese of Gottenburg having given it his sympathy, with a contribution in aid of a Sunday-school festival, and one of the ladies of the same city having offered gifts to the Sunday-school. Revivals were reported at many of the preaching appointments, new stations had been organized at Carlskrona and Calmar, a lot had been bought for a church at Gottenburg, a building fund had been begun at Carlskrona, and a paper, the Lilla Sandebudet, was begun. In the same year the mission was separated from the other Scandinavian missions, and organized as the Swedish mission, with the Rev. Victor Witting as superintendent. In the next year the number of stations was increased to fifteen, as follows: Gottenburg, Stockholm, Gottland, Calmar, Moensterose, Carlskrona, Wenersborg, Walda, Winaker, Orebro, Arboga, and Philipstad, and the strength of the mission was more than doubled in almost every particular, as is shown by the following comparative table:

The two chapels reported in 1869 were those at Carlskrona and Calmar, the former being the first Methodist Episcopal church built in the kingdom. In 1870 the number of members was 2027. In the report for the next year the members and probationers are reported separately,—1317 being returned of the former and 1293 of the latter, or 2610 in all. The report of 1871 also gave 25 missionaries, 19 local preachers, 5 chapels, valued at $10,320, 33 Sunday-schools, with 173 teachers and 1772 scholars, $440.12 of missionary collections, $220.56 of Sunday-school collections, $162.36 of contributions for brethren who had suffered by the great fire in Chicago, $2386.76 of collections for lots, chapels, etc., besides the ordinary collections for the poor and for current expenses. The year 1874 was marked by revivals adding nearly a thousand members to the church. Nearly one thousand pupils were also added to the Sunday-schools. The mission was assessed for $1000 in currency as its contribution to the treasury of the Missionary Society, and answered by giving $1216 in gold. A training-school or seminary had been organized at Stockholm, for which, according to a report made to the General Conference of 1876, it was intended to furnish three regular professors who should give all their time to the school, besides employing other teachers in different branches by the hour. The most important event of 1874 was the adoption by the mission, at the annual meeting of the missionaries, of a resolution to withdraw from the state church, and petition the government for recognition as an independent church, under the “Law for Dissenters” of 1873. The proper steps were taken immediately; a special audience was obtained from the king with reference to the matter in February, 1875, when a petition with about fourteen hundred signatures was presented. His Majesty promised to give the movement all the assistance in his power. The petition was then sent to the consistories in all the dioceses within whose boundaries the mission had societies. In 1875 the church at Upsala was dedicated, and the professors in the great university of that city took the occasion to call upon Bishop Simpson, who had preached, to pay him their respects. The bishop had left the city, but the fact attests the extent to which the mission had then grown in public esteem. The General Conference of 1876 ordered the Swedish mission to be organized into an Annual Conference. The organization was effected under the presidency of Bishop Andrews, at Upsala, August 7 of the same year, with three presiding elders’ districts,—the Stockholm, Carlskrona, and Gottenburg districts. The number of societies in 1875 was 86. The following is a summary of the statistics of the mission in other items for 1876: number of ministers, 53; of local preachers, 59; of Sunday-schools, 125; of officers and teachers in the same, 435; of Sunday-school scholars, 4931; of members and probationers, 5663; of churches (no parsonages), 31; probable value of the churches, $97,262; amount of missionary collections, $1710.79; of other benevolent contributions, $1819.21.

The Wesleyan Missionary Society began a mission in Stockholm, under the care of Rev. Mr. Scott, in 1826, of which the report of the society in 1841 returned 1 station, with 1 missionary preaching in Swedish and English, and having native Swedes under his care. The mission was continued through several years under great difficulties from legal repression, but finally yielded to the intolerant laws which then prevailed, and was given up.

The Baptists have maintained missions for several years in Sweden, which have grown into considerable churches, reporting, in 1876, 11,518 members. Many still complain that their ministers have not yet secured full liberty to preach.

Sweden Conference embraces Sweden in Europe, and was organized by Bishop Andrews in 1877. It reports 47 traveling and 59 local preachers, 6261 members, 4971 Sunday-schools, and 33 churches, valued at $94,962.

Swormstedt, Leroy, D.D., formerly book agent at Cincinnati, was born in Maryland, Oct. 4, 1798. At the age of eighteen he was converted, and in 1818, after having been preaching under the presiding elder, was admitted into the Ohio Conference. He filled a number of the prominent stations, and was presiding elder on the Lancaster, Zanesville, and Cincinnati districts. In 1836 he was elected assistant agent of the Western Book Concern, and from 1844 to 1860 he was principal agent. From that period he became superannuated. His record shows, twelve years on circuits and stations, six years presiding elder, twenty-four years assistant or principal in the Book Concern. He had systematic habits, fine business qualifications, and labored earnestly for the success of the church in every department which he filled. He died Aug. 27, 1863.

Syracuse, N. Y. (pop. 43,051), the capital of Onondaga County, is centrally situated in the State of New York, and is the site of Syracuse University. The first church organized in the county was in the town of Salina, now the first ward of Syracuse, where an edifice was built in 1826. Prior to that time the society had worshiped in a school-house. The first class formed in the town of Syracuse was in 1827, and it held its meetings in the village school-house. Rev. Mr. Willits was probably the first Methodist preacher who visited the place. Shortly after this time a building was purchased for church purposes. In 1835 the present location was procured, and a substantial building erected. The foundation and side-walls still remain as part of the edifice, at the corner of Mulberry and Onondaga Streets. It was rebuilt in 1870, and was formerly known as the "Old First church" of Syracuse. In 1867 a colony of about forty members from this church organized the Centenary M. E. church. The building was erected and dedicated in 1869. The University Avenue church was organized in 1869 as Dempster charge, and the church building was erected and dedicated in 1871. In 1869 the present Delaware Street church was organized as Magnolia mission, in what was known as the village of Geddes. In 1873 the location was changed and the chapel removed to the present site within the city, and in 1876 the present brick church was erected. The Fairman Street church in Danforth was organized in 1874. The Rose Hill society was organized in 1875, and a convenient chapel was purchased in 1877. The founding of the university, in 1870, gave additional strength and impetus to Methodism in the city. The African M. E. Zion church was organized in 1837. Their first place of worship was the First M. E. church, but their present building was erected on Chestnut Street. The Wesleyan Methodists organized a society in 1843, and their church was erected in 1845. They also established a publishing-house in the city, and from its office are issued The American Wesleyan, The Bible Standard and Monthly Magazine, and The Children's Banner. The M. E. church was very considerably agitated with the slavery question about the time of the formation of the Wesleyan Methodist organization, and for some years but little progress was made. It has, however, fully recovered from the effects of the division, and has grown with the increase of population. The German population of the city having increased, Methodist services have been established among them, and a society has been organized; the Free Methodists have also a congregation. The city is in the Central New York Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Syracuse University is a successor of one of the oldest colleges of the M. E. Church, though in its present name and place it was not chartered till 1870. The Genesee College, in Lima, N. Y., was founded in 1849, and from the beginning was open alike to both sexes, in which respect it was the first college in New York. But it was only carrying out the practice which was adopted as early as 1820 in the first Methodist Conference seminaries, in which the students were from the first as old as the average students of colleges. Little did these Conference seminaries imagine that they were setting an example that within a half-century would be followed by some of the largest universities in the world, and in less than a century by a majority of them.

The Genesee College was too far west to accommodate the whole State, and therefore its trustees and friends soon began to devise means for its removal to a more favorable locality. Syracuse is the "central city" of New York. At a large Methodist State Convention, held there in February, 1870, the following resolution was adopted, receiving the united approval of ministers and laymen from every county in the State: "Resolved, That this State Convention of the Methodist Episcopal Church of New York approves of the plan to establish without delay, in the city of Syracuse or its immediate vicinity, a first-class university, and recommends that immediate measures be taken to raise at least $300,000 for its endowment." Dr. Jesse T. Peck, now bishop, was president of the Convention, and contributed to the enthusiasm by subscribing $25,000. He was afterwards elected first president of the board of trustees, and did much in the further progress of securing and shaping the enterprise. Other subscriptions were made on the spot by Hon. George F. Constock, of Syracuse; F. H. Root, Esq., of Buffalo; Ezra Jones, Esq., of Rochester; David Decker, Esq., of Elmira; A. Terwilliger, Esq., of Preble, and others. Soon after valuable subscriptions were obtained from Hon. Willard Ives, of Watertown; A. C. Lindsley, Esq., of Rushville, and others. Eliphalet Remington, of Ilion, subscribed and has paid $100,000, invested in a business block in the city, and Philo Remington subsequently $100,000, to secure the payment of all the debts of the institution; receiving a pledge that no further debt shall be incurred. Mrs. Sophronia Morehouse, of Liverpool, near Syracuse, has paid to the university $5000 for the aid of students, and has subscribed $25,000 for a professorship, payable at her decease. Others have made subscriptions on similar terms. The city of Syracuse generously bestowed on the university $100,000. The financial success of the university has been largely indebted from the beginning to Rev. E. C. Curtis, its financial agent. The university has real estate used for college purposes worth about $325,000; consisting of 50 acres of land in the city, a stone building 170 by 80 feet, one of the very best educational buildings in America, and two buildings near the centre of the city, used for a medical college. The financial storm following so early after its foundation has caused shrinkage in its assets, and subjected it to severe trial; but it is constantly advancing in all respects, and has a situation sure to secure for it great patronage and strength. This university has already three colleges: of Liberal Arts, of Fine Arts, of Medicine. It will probably not attempt a college of theology. The first is a genuine American college, like the Wesleyan University or Dickinson College. The second is the oldest of the kind in America, giving special attention to the theory and practice of art. The third is a medical college of the regular science and practice of medicine. The university has large and able faculties. In 1873, Alexander Winchell, LL.D., an eminent scientist, and then Professor of Geology, etc., in the University of Michigan, was elected chancellor, and gave himself diligently to the work for more than a year. But finding that the labor was uncongenial and interfered with his scientific pursuits, he resigned the chancellorship in June, 1874, but retains his professorship in the university. Rev. E. O. Haven, D.D., LL.D., accepted the chancellorship. The position had been tendered to him at the first, but was declined, as he could not conveniently then leave the Northwestern University. Since that the debt of Syracuse University has been canceled by subscription, the medical college has procured its building, and progress has been made in investing the endowment. The faculty of the College of Liberal Arts consisted, in 1877, of the chancellor, who was also Professor of the English Language and Literature; John R. French, LL.D., Professor of Mathematics; Rev. W. P. Coddington, A.M., Professor of Greek and Ethics; Rev. John J. Brown, A.M., Professor of Chemistry and Physics; Rev. Charles W. Bennett, D.D., Professor of History and Logic; Heman H. Sanford, A.M., Ph.D., Professor of the Latin Language and Literature; George F. Comfort, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Esthetics; Alexander Winchell, LL.D., Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany; John H. Durston, A.M., Ph.D., Adjunct Professor of Modern Languages; W. Locke Richardson, A.M., Professor of Elocution, and Frank Smalley, A.M., Adjunct Professor of Natural History.

The College of Fine Arts is presided over by Professor George F. Comfort, dean, assisted by from ten to twelve practical artists and teachers resident in Syracuse and vicinity. It has three courses of study, each of four years, painting, architecture, and music; its students have the privileges of the College of Liberal Arts in the study of language, history, and science, so that its courses of study are extensive and liberal. The College of Medicine in like manner has a large and able faculty of fifteen physicians and surgeons of Syracuse and vicinity. The university has two good libraries, one of a general character and one in the College of Medicine, and also fair selections of apparatus, and can avail itself of abundant accommodations of this kind in the city. The number of students in all the colleges is large, giving it rank with the best universities in the State.

Talley, Nicholas, a minister in the M. E. Church South, was born near Richmond, Va., May 2, 1791, and died May 10, 1873. He was converted in Greene Co., Ga., in 1810, under the preaching of Rev. Hope Hull; was received on trial in 1812, and sent to Little Peedee circuit, having more than 100 miles in extent, and containing 28 appointments. Of the sixty-two years of his ministry, he was twenty-two on districts, twelve on stations, nine on circuits, and fourteen on missions. The last five years of his life he sustained a superannuated relation. For many successive sessions he was elected delegate to the General Conference. "Firm as flint, his face was turned from all that might jeopardize his usefulness. As an itinerant preacher, the journeyings, hardships, and inconveniences of the itinerancy were as nothing so that he might preach Jesus and the resurrection." His last entry in his diary was May 2, 1873, as follows: "My birthday. Eighty-two years I have lived on the bounty and goodness of God. I feel grateful, and hope to believe he doeth all things well."

Tamaqua, Pa. (pop. 5960), is in Schuylkill County, on the Little Schuylkill River, in the midst of a rich anthracite coal region. Methodist services were introduced in 1837; the first church was erected in 1839, and was rebuilt in 1852. The Primitive Methodists also founded a church in 1839, which was rebuilt in 1876. This appointment is in the Philadelphia Conference, and reports for 1876 the following statistics:

Tanner, Benj. T., D.D., was born in Pittsburgh, Dec. 25, 1835; was converted (1856) while in attendance upon Avery College, Alleghany City, and joined the African M. E. Church, and was licensed to preach the same year. He received appointment as missionary to California in 1860, but want of funds prevented his departure, and was called ad interim to the Fifteenth Street Presbyterian church, Washington City, in August, 1860. He returned to the A. M. E. Church, and joined the Baltimore Conference in May, 1862; was secretary of the General Conference of 1868; and was then elected editor of The Christian Recorder; was re-elected in 1872, and again in 1876. He was one of the delegates to the M. E. General Conference of 1876. Has written "Apology for African Methodism," "Origin of the Negro," "Is the Negro Cursed?" etc.

Tasker, Thomas T., Sr., a local preacher in Philadelphia, and formerly a large manufacturer, was born at Knottingly, Yorkshire, England, May 19, 1799. He was early converted, and his name appeared as a local preacher on the plan of appointments of Burlington circuit in 1818. The following year he removed to Philadelphia. His inventive and mechanical talents led him to engage in the iron business, and fifty-seven years since he assisted in establishing the Pascal Iron Works, which became an immense establishment, and which is now conducted by his sons. He invented a self-regulating hot-water furnace, heating pipes by steam, and so using a cast-iron hydrant that it could be removed or repaired without disturbing the pavement. He also made various improvements in the manufacture of wrought tubes for gas, steam, etc. He retired from the manufacturing business nearly twenty years since, and has devoted himself to church and benevolent work, and in superintending his varied interests. He was one of the most active in building Wharton Street, Scott, Tasker, and Kedron churches. He was also one of the earliest to co-operate in the publishing and tract interests in Philadelphia. He has been president of the board of trustees of the Home for the Aged and Infirm Methodists, and was a liberal contributor to the elegant building which was erected under his personal supervision. At the breaking out of the Civil War he took an active part in the erection of the Citizens' Volunteer Hospital, of which he was president, and where thousands of Union and Confederate soldiers received food and medical attendance. He was also chosen the first president of the Church Extension Society in 1864, and at its re-organization he became first vice-president and chairman of the executive and finance committees, which positions he has continued to hold. In 1869 he founded "The Tasker Loan Fund" by the gift of $10,000; and was, in 1872, the first lay delegate to represent the Philadelphia Conference in the General Conference. Though nearly fourscore, he is still abundant in labors.

Tasmania, Wesleyan Missions in.—Tasmania, formerly known as Van Diemen's Land, is an island, having an area of 26,215 square miles, and a population of 105,000, situated about 120 miles southeast of Australia, and is included among the Australasian colonies. It was made a British penal settlement in 1803, but the transportation of convicts thither was discontinued several years ago, and it has become a prosperous colony. The native population has become extinct. It numbered between 3000 and 5000 persons when the island was first colonized, but was reduced to 210 in 1835, when the people were removed to Flinders' Island, in Bass's Strait, and to 54 in 1842; and in 1870 was represented only by a single woman.

The efforts of the Wesleyan missionaries have been directed mainly to the English population.

The mission was begun in 1820, when there were but one Anglican minister and one Roman Catholic priest in the island. The Rev. Mr. Horton, who was on his way to New South Wales under appointment of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, was directed to remain in Tasmania and open a mission there. Society in the island was in a most deplorable condition, the population consisting largely of convicts and savages, and being destitute of religious privileges. Nevertheless, a Wesleyan Methodist Society of twenty regular attendants at class-meeting had been already formed, and a chapel was in building. The mission was approved by the governor of the colony. Another missionary was soon sent out, and was followed by two more in 1827, and by a fifth in 1832. At the last date, the mission returned 163 members and 283 children in the schools, and the missionaries had gained the respect and affection of the convicts, as well as of the settlers. In 1839, 9 missionaries, 570 members, and 922 scholars were returned; in 1854, 6 missionaries, 39 principal stations, 3 teachers and catechists, 24 local preachers, 114 Sunday-school teachers, 750 members, 1159 scholars, and 4000 attendants on worship.

The following is a summary of the statistics of the Tasmanian missions as given in the report of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for 1876: number of chapels and other preaching-places, 95; of missionaries and assistants, 16; of local preachers, 70; of full members, 1286; of persons on trial, 202; of Sunday-schools, 47, with 401 teachers and 3076 scholars; of attendants on worship, 9176.

The Primitive Methodist missions in Tasmania had, in 1873, four principal stations, with 4 ministers and 223 members. The missions of the United Methodist Free Churches had, in the same year, 3 lay agents and 38 members.

Taunton, England (pop. 15,466), is an old but well-built town in the county of Somerset. It has 3 Wesleyan ministers, beside 2 supernumeraries, and reports 473 members. It is also the seat of a literary institution of high character.

Taunton, Mass. (pop. 18,629), the capital of Bristol County, is at the head of navigation on the Taunton River. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1833, and was then connected with Dighton, with F. Dane as pastor. The first M. E. church was built in 1835, and was rebuilt in 1869. In 1838 it reported 115 members. In 1852 the Central church was organized, and the edifice was erected in 1853. Grace church was organized in 1874, and the edifice was purchased from the Free-Will Baptists. It is in the Providence Conference, and reports:

Taunton Wesleyan College, England, was established in 1843, for the purpose of securing at a moderate expense a sound literary and commercial education, with religious instruction in harmony with the doctrines of Wesleyan Methodism. The interests of the college are watched over by a board of directors, chosen from among the proprietors and by the superintendent of the Exeter district. The president of the Conference is, by the deed, president of the college, and the resident governor and chaplain is a minister in full connection, appointed annually by the Conference. In the vated position remarkable for its salubrity and rural beauty.

Taylor, Charles, D.D., M.D., of the M. E. Church South, was born in Boston, Mass., Sept. 15, 1819, and graduated in the University of New York, with the highest honors of his class, in 1840. In 1842 he taught the ancient languages in the Conference Seminary at Cokesbury, and was admitted into the South Carolina Conference in 1844. He graduated in medicine in Philadelphia in 1848, and went as missionary to Shanghai, China. He returned in 1854, and accepted a professorship in scholastic department are a head-master and fourteen resident and non-resident masters and professors. It is now under the care of Rev. William P. Slater. Thomas Sibly, Esq., B.A., has been head-master from the commencement, and James Barnicott, Esq., secretary. This college was connected, by royal charter, with the University of London in 1847, and students are prepared in it for the matriculation degree of the examinations of the university. Constant care has been taken to promote the religious interests of the pupils. There have been some conversions, and in many instances concern about salvation has been excited, and nearly 50 have met in class as members on trial. The school is divided into three departments: the collegiate, the commercial, and the junior. About 150 are resident at the college and 40 at the junior school, which is conducted on eligible premises between the college and the town. The entire number of pupils during the year is about 220. The college is situated about a mile from the town, in an ele-

Spartanburg Female College, of which he became president in 1857. By the General Conference of the M. E. Church South he was elected general Sunday-school secretary in 1858. He also served as presiding elder of the Wadesborough district, and as president of the university at Millersburg, Ky. While in China, he published a work on the "Harmony of the Gospels," and several tracts, in Chinese. He is the author of "Five Years in China" and "Baptism in a Nutshell." He is now a member of the Kentucky Conference.

Taylor, Joseph, an English Wesleyan minister, was an eminent example of zeal and fidelity, the faithful servant of Christ and his church. In the commencement of his ministry he spent eight years in the West Indies. In 1818 he became resident secretary of the Missionary Society. In 1834 he was president of the Conference. He died in 1845, aged sixty-six.

Taylor, Michael Coulson, an English Wesleyan minister, entered the Theological School in 1843, and for five years was engaged on circuits. In 1851 he became secretary of the education committee. The beloved associate of the Rev. John Scott in the Normal Training Institution at Westminster, he took an important part in the biblical instruction and pastoral care of the students. His character was symmetrical; his fitness for his office unique; his piety fervent and influential. He died in 1867, aged forty-seven.

Taylor, Nathaniel G., lay delegate from the Holston Conference to the General Conference of 1872, is a respected citizen, a man widely and favorably known; has filled various civil offices, and is a local preacher of more than ordinary service to the church.

menced his career as a teacher in 1847. Having spent a year in Cazenovia Seminary, he was elected principal of the Brookfield Academy. He resigned this position in 1850 and entered the Wesleyan University, where he graduated in 1854. For a year he was assistant in the Rittenhouse Academy, Washington, D. C.; one year principal of the Newark Wesleyan Institute; and was subsequently professor in the Pittsburgh Female College. In 1858 he entered the Pittsburgh Conference, and was appointed principal of the Marlboro' High School. In 1859 he was elected as principal of Beaver Female Seminary, which position he still holds, the institution having been, through his labors, enlarged, and its title changed to that of Beaver College and Musical Institute.

Tefft, Benjamin Franklin, D.D., LL.D., a teacher and author in the M. E. Church, was born in Floyd, N. Y., Aug. 20, 1813. He attended school at the Cazenovia Seminary, and graduated from the Wesleyan University in 1835. He was employed as a teacher in the Maine Wesleyan Seminary till 1839, when he was appointed pastor of the First M. E. church, Bangor, Me. In 1841 he became principal of the Providence Conference Seminary. In 1842 he was pastor of the Odeon church, Boston. In 1843 he was elected Professor of the Greek and Hebrew Languages in the Indiana Asbury University, and from this place he was called, in 1846, to become editor of the Ladies' Repository, and of the publications of the Western Book Concern. He continued in this office till 1851, when he was chosen president of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary and Genesee College, at Lima, N. Y. He represented the East Genesee Conference as a delegate in the General Conference of 1852. In 1854 he resigned the presidency of the Genesee Seminary and College and retired for a time from public life, making his home at Clifton Springs, N. Y. He removed to Maine, and re-entered the itinerant work of the church in 1859, receiving appointments between that year and 1866 to churches in Bangor and Portland, Me. In 1861 he was appointed chaplain to the 1st Regiment of Maine Cavalry, Army of the Potomac; in 1862, consul of the United States at Stockholm, and acting minister to Sweden; in 1864, commissioner of immigration from the north of Europe for the State of Maine. In 1874 he sat as a member of the House of Representatives from Penobscot County in the legislature of Maine. He is at present (1877) editor of The Northern Border, a weekly newspaper published at Bangor, Me., and devoted largely to the development of the interests and material resources of the State.

Dr. Tefft's published works are, "The Shoulder-knot; or, Sketches of the Threefold Life of Man," "Hungary and Kossuth," "Webster and his Master-pieces," "Methodism Successful, and the Internal Causes of its Success." He also edited an edition of Butler's "Analogy," with Life and Analysis, and an edition of Whately's "Evidences of Christianity." Dr. Tefft is a member of the Geographical and Statistical Society of New York and of the Society of Arts of England.

Temperance.—On this great question, as on various other moral questions, Mr. Wesley was in advance of his age. He saw with pain the prevalence of intoxication and the evils which necessarily resulted from it. He saw, further, that the occasional use of intoxicating drinks was one of the steps towards drunkenness. Hence, in preparing his General Rules for the guidance of his societies, as early as 1743, he inserted one prohibiting "buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity." So far as is known, this was the first rule of the kind ever published by any church organization. It was a number of years before the origin of a temperance society in Scotland, and more than ninety years before the rise of the Father Mathew societies in Ireland. He not only prepared this rule, but he enforced it in his societies, for in one year he excluded from one of his societies seventeen members for drinking and two for retailing spirituous liquors. Personally, he believed water to be "the wholesomest of all drinks,—quickens the body and strengthens the digestion; most strong, and more especially spirituous, liquors are certain but slow poisons." In 1760 he published a sermon on the use of money, in which he took occasion to refer to the traffic in ardent spirits. He used in that sermon the expression so common in the present day, comparing drams of spirituous liquors to "liquid fire." He speaks of all those who are engaged in the manufacture and sale of these drinks as a beverage as "poisoners general;" that "they murder his Majesty's subjects by wholesale." In 1773 he published a pamphlet on the scarcity of provisions in Great Britain, in which he says, "Why is food so dear? The grand cause is because such immense quantities of corn are continually consumed by distilling. Add all the distilleries throughout England, and have we not reason to believe that little less than half the wheat produced in the kingdom is every year consumed, not by so harmless a way as throwing it into the sea, but by converting it into deadly poison, that naturally destroys not only the strength and life, but also the morals, of our countrymen?" In America, the Conference of 1780 disowned "all persons who should engage in the practice of distilling grain into liquor." The Conference of 1783 forbade the members of the church to "manufacture, sell, or drink any intoxicating liquors," and the preachers were instructed to teach the people, both by precept and example, to put away this evil from them. When the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized, in 1784, it adopted Mr. Wesley's rule on temperance. This was twenty years before the publication of Dr. Rusli's tract on "The Evil Effects of Ardent Spirits on Body and Mind," and about twenty years before any other religious body published a total-abstinence provision among the rules of their church. In the minutes of 1790 the words, "buying or selling," were omitted from this rule. In 1796 Dr. Coke and Bishop Ashbury, in their Notes on the Discipline, say, "Far be it from us to wish or endeavor to intrude upon the proper religious or civil liberty of any of our people; but the retailing of spirituous liquors and giving them in drams to customers when they call at the stores are such prevalent customs at present, and are productive of so many evils, that we judge it our indispensable duty to form a declaration against them. The cause of God, which we prefer to every other consideration under heaven, requires us to speak forth with ample boldness in this respect."

Though the position of the Methodist Episcopal Church was strongly in favor of temperance and opposed to that of drunkenness, yet as the stringency of Mr. Wesley's rule was relaxed in 1790, an effort was made as early as from 1830 to 1835 to restore it; and the Annual Conferences having passed a resolution on the subject, the General Conference of 1844 passed a resolution to restore the original rule of Mr. Wesley, but it failed to receive quite a two-thirds vote of the whole number of delegates, and it was decided that the constitutional majority had not been obtained. In 1848, the Annual Conferences having spoken with great unanimity, Mr. Wesley's rule as originally written was restored. Since that time the General Conferences have spoken with great clearness and force upon the subject. In 1872 they said, "From the very first our church has been bold and emphatic in her utterances and measures against the evils of intemperance. She has waged an uncompromising and vigorous war against this tyrant foe of humanity and civilization; she has as clearly defined her position, unqualifiedly condemning both the sale and use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage. Let not the church falter in view of the approaching crisis, but let her gird on her armor anew for the battle. Now is the time for action, action earnest, persistent, well-directed." The General Conference of 1876 declared, that "we are unalterably opposed to the importation, manufacture, and sale of all kinds of distilled, fermented, and vinous liquors designed to be used as a beverage, and that it is the duty of every member of the Christian church to discountenance and oppose the evil at all times by voice and vote; that we earnestly protest against the members of our church giving any countenance to the liquor traffic by voting to give license, or signing the petition of those who desire license to sell either distilled or fermented or vinous liquors; or by becoming bondsmen for persons asking such license; or by renting property to be used as the place in or on which to manufacture or sell such intoxicating liquors; that we are fully convinced of the wisdom of total legal prohibition." The same Conference also recommended the use of the unfermented juice of the grape on sacramental occasions. It also gratefully recognized and commended the good work accomplished by the gifted and Christian women in the temperance cause throughout the land. The Wesleyan Methodists in America are also exceedingly outspoken and decided in their utterances on this question. The other branches of Methodism are also strongly opposed to intemperance, but not so definite and bold in their utterances.

Temperance (English Wesleyan).—This important subject has not received the attention which the followers of John Wesley in England ought to have given to it. It is, however, gratifying to find that the number of abstaining ministers yearly increases. A large and influential committee, composed of eminent temperance workers, both ministers and laymen, has been appointed to take into consideration what measures can be adopted for arresting the progress of intemperance. Bands of Hope are established in many circuits, and temperance societies are being multiplied.

Tennessee (pop. 1,258,520) embraces about 44,000 square miles, and is generally spoken of in three divisions: East, Middle, and West Tennessee. It is probable that De Soto visited the spot where Memphis now stands as early as 1549; but the first permanent settlement was not made until in 1756, when Fort Loudon was built, 30 miles from Knoxville. The earlier settlements were chiefly along the Holston River. The eastern part of Tennessee originally belonged to North Carolina, but was ceded, in 1789, to the general government, and in 1794 Tennessee was organized as a Territory. In 1796 it was admitted into the Union. The early population was of a mixed character, being Scotch-Irish, as well as native Americans. The introduction of Methodism was as early as 1783, when Jeremiah Lambert was appointed to Holston country, and in the following year 60 members were reported. Some have supposed that as early as 1777, King, Dickins, and Curry extended their travels from North Carolina into East Tennessee. Lambert circuit then comprised the settlements on the Wautauga, Nolachucky, and Holston Rivers. In 1785 there were two preachers, and Henry Willis was elder in supervision. They reported the following year 258 members. In 1787 there were three circuits, with six preachers, John Tunnell being the presiding elder. The first Annual Conference in Tennessee was held May 13, 1787, and was the first west of the Alleghany Mountains. A writer says, "From 1787 we were blessed with regular preaching in this country. Messrs. Ogden, Haw, Massie, Williamson, and McHenry were the first preachers to bring the gospel to us, and I do not hesitate to say the Methodists were first to sow the gospel seed in Middle Tennessee." Other settlers occupied the region around Nashville in 1780, and became active members of the M. E. Church. The first church, built on the north side of the Cumberland River, was in Joseph County, 4 miles north of Nashville, and was called Hooper's chapel. During Asbury's first visit a number of persons were converted, among whom were John Russell and his wife, who was the sister of Patrick Henry. The country was very sparsely settled, and the progress was slow, for, in 1796, there were reported from Tennessee only two circuits, Cumberland and Greene, having a membership of 546; and in 1800 there were three circuits, having a membership of 1743. Jacob Young, so well known in Ohio, was one of the early pioneers in Kentucky and Tennessee. He was appointed to Nashville circuit in 1806, and makes the following statement: "I found the Presbyterian and Methodist Churches closely united. They had taken many of our efficient class-leaders and made them elders in their church, and their elders had been made class-leaders in the Methodist Church. I could not tell who were Methodists and who were Presbyterians. When I would close my sermon and dismiss the congregation, very few would leave. It generally took me three hours to preach and lead my class. Jealousies began to appear in the Presbyterian synod of Kentucky. They began to think and say that the Presbyterians were all turning Methodists, and indeed it looked a good deal like it. They preached and prayed like Methodists, and shouted and sung like Methodists; they had licensed several young men to preach who had no college education; they had formed circuits like the Methodists, and had their saddle-bags and great-coats nailed on behind, sweeping through the country like itinerant evangelists. The Tennessee presbytery was a part and parcel of the Kentucky synod, and when the Kentuckians heard these things they sent a deputation of learned men to make a thorough examination, authorizing them, if they found that the people had departed from the doctrine and discipline of the Presbyterian Church and refused to return, to dissolve the presbytery. The committee came on and acted according to their instructions. They ordered these licensed young men to desist from preaching. They refused. Several of the old theologians, as Hodges, McGrady, and others, submitted to the authority of the church and returned to their old paths; but the young men, with Magee at their head, held on their way." Ultimately these parties withdrew from the Presbyterian Church and constituted the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. This union movement had been the outgrowth of the camp-meetings which had been held in the Cumberland region of Kentucky and Tennessee, from which the new church took its name. These meetings were, in their origin, attended by Presbyterians and Methodists, but ultimately fell into the hands chiefly of the Cumberland Presbyterian party and Methodists. The Methodist churches continued to progress with the population until the separation, in 1845, when they adhered to the Methodist Episcopal Church South. Prior to that time the Nashville Christian Advocate had been established in the city of Nashville, and a paper had also been published in Memphis. The Church South continued to be the only branch of Methodism in the State, with the exception of a few Methodist Protestants, until during the Civil War. With the progress of the Union troops, many of the leading men and of the pastors passed within the southern lines; and, especially in the Holston region, the people desired the preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church to re-organize them. A Holston Conference was established as early as 1864, and since that period a Tennessee Conference has been organized, and also a Central Tennessee. In the eastern part of the State the re-organized membership in the M. E. Church is principally of the white population; but in Middle and Eastern Tennessee the great majority is colored. The Central Tennessee College was commenced in Nashville for the education especially of the colored people, and was chartered in 1866. The East Tennessee Wesleyan University was established in 1866, and is attended by a goodly number of young men and young women who are preparing for teaching and for usefulness in other departments. There are also one or two small seminaries in the western part of the State. The M. E. Church South is very strong in this State. After its organization, in 1845, as a separate body, its Book Concern was established in Nashville, which has continued to be its headquarters. The Advocate, the chief organ of the church, is edited by Dr. T. O. Summers, and is also published in that city. It has a noble educational institution, founded by the munificence of the late Cornelius Vanderbilt, of New York, who contributed for its buildings and endowment the sum of $1,000,000, and who gave specific directions that it must be under the authority and control of Bishop McTyeire. The Southern Methodists have three Conferences: the Memphis, the Tennessee, and the Holston. The boundaries, however, do not correspond with the State lines, as Memphis Conference embraces a small portion of Kentucky and the Holston Conference embraces parts of Virginia and North Carolina. The Methodist Protestants have two Conferences in the State: the Tennessee and West Tennessee. The African M. E. Church, the African Zion Church, and the Colored M. E. Church of America have also organized Conferences. The denominational statistics, as given in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

Tennessee Conference, African M. E. Church, includes the State of Tennessee. At its session of 1876 it stationed 37 preachers, and reported 123 local preachers, 7555 members, 67 churches and 7 parsonages, valued at $68,800.

Tennessee Conference, M. E. Church.—The territory of Tennessee was originally embraced chiefly in the old Western Conference. The Tennessee portion was organized as a separate Conference in 1812, and included not only Tennessee, but Kentucky, Illinois, and a large portion of the Western and Southern territory. In 1816, Missouri and Mississippi Conferences were organized, and Illinois became a part of the Missouri Conference. Various changes were made in the boundaries from time to time, owing to the organization of the Kentucky and Holston Conferences. In 1840 the Memphis Conference was organized, and the Tennessee Conference included Middle Tennessee and North Alabama. In 1844 its boundaries were defined as embracing "Middle Tennessee, and that part of North Alabama watered by those streams flowing into the Tennessee River." It adhered to the M. E. Church South in 1845, and the membership in the State remained connected with that church until 1864, after which time various M. E. churches were organized within its territory. Under authority given by the General Conference, Bishop Clark organized the Tennessee Conference, at Murfreesborough, Oct. 11, 1866. Its boundaries were determined in 1868 as including "that portion of Tennessee not included in the Holston Conference." At its organization, in 1866, it reported 40 traveling and 49 local preachers, 3173 members, 2548 Sunday-school scholars, and 13 churches, valued at $59,100. The statistics as given in 1876 were: 93 traveling and 206 local preachers, 12,268 members, 8359 Sunday-school scholars, 142 churches, valued at $206,940, and 7 parsonages, valued at $2500. Under authority given by the General Conference of 1876 the Tennessee Conference was divided (not by changing its boundaries, but by allowing the separation of the white and colored work), by the concurrent vote of the members of both divisions. The minutes for 1877 report the following statistics: 41 traveling and 193 local preachers, 11,638 members, 8329 Sunday-school scholars, 197 churches, valued at $137,028, and 15 parsonages, valued at $4000.

Tennessee Conference, M. E. Church South.—This Conference, originally belonging to the M. E. Church, adhered to the M. E. Church South in 1845. It reported, in 1846, 153 traveling ministers, 33,219 white and 8036 colored members. It has within its bounds the publishing-house of the M. E. Church South, the Nashville Christian Advocate, and the Vanderbilt University. Its boundaries were determined by the General Conference of 1874 so as to "include Middle Tennessee, except that portion of the Pikeville district in the Holston Conference." It reported, in 1876, 198 traveling and 331 local preachers, and 41,297 members.

Tennessee Conference, M. P. Church, "begins at the southeast corner of Allen Co., Ky., running to Glasgow; thence with the Louisville and Nashville Railroad to Louisville, Ky.; and thence with the Ohio River to the mouth of Green River; thence with the Tennessee district line to the mouth of Sandy River; thence with the Tennessee River to the Alabama line; and thence to the beginning; including all the State of Tennessee not included in the Virginia and West Tennessee districts." In 1877 it reported 18 itinerant and 4 unstationed ministers, 1209 members, 1996 Sunday-school scholars, and 19 churches, valued at $9200.

Terre Haute, Ind. (pop. 16,103), the capital of Vigo County, is situated on the Wabash River, and on the Terre Haute and Indianapolis Railroad. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1830, with Edwin Ray as pastor. In 1831 it was reported in connection with Carlisle circuit. In 1835 it became a station, and the following year reported 70 members. In 1849 a second station was formed, and since that period there have been established a city mission and a German church. There is also an African M. E. church. This city is in the Northwest Indiana Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Tevis, Benjamin P., M.D., was born in Shelbyville, Ky., in 1825, and was converted in his youth, and became a member of the M. E. Church. He was separated from the church in 1845, by the organization of the M. E. Church South, and in 1865, when the opportunity presented itself, he returned to the church again. Dr. Tevis was the son of Rev. John Tevis, of precious memory throughout Kentucky. He has long been associated with his honored mother, Mrs. Julia Tevis, in conducting "Science Hill Academy," an institution established fifty-three years ago, at Shelbyville, Ky. He is devoted to all the interests of the M. E. Church in the South, and represented the Kentucky Conference as lay delegate in the General Conference of 1876.

Tevis, Mrs. Julia A., daughter of Pendleton and Mary Hieronymus, was born in Clark Co., Ky., Dec. 5, 1799. She was chiefly educated in Washington City and Georgetown, D. C. In 1820 she accepted the situation of governess in the family of General Smythe, of Wytheville, and afterwards in the family of Captain Frank Smith, of Abingdon, Va. In 1824 she was married to Rev. John Tevis, of the M. E. Church, presiding elder of Holston district. In 1824, Mr. and Mrs. Tevis removed to Shelbyville, Ky., where, on March 25, 1825, they founded Science Hill Female Academy. In connection with this institution the name of Mrs. Tevis has become extensively known through the South and West. She still presides over this institution, which she established fifty-three years ago, and from which have gone out more than three thousand young ladies.

Texas (pop. 818,579) is the largest State in the Union, and has an area of 237,504 square miles, or nearly six times as great as that of Pennsylvania. Its first European settlers were French-Americans, who landed at Matagorda Bay in the latter part of the seventeenth century; but they were superseded in a few years by the Spanish, who founded a colony in 1689, which in turn was abandoned. In 1715 a governor-general was appointed by Spain, which then had the entire control. Subsequently, during the contest between France and Spain, the population did not exceed 1500. In 1763 it was ceded to Spain, peace having been restored. Spain having, in 1803, receded Louisiana to France, by whom it was sold to the United States, a disagreement arose as to the boundary; and the territory was the scene of frequent disturbances. The noted pirate, Lafitte, made his headquarters at Galveston. After the adoption of the constitution of 1824 more prosperity was enjoyed, and American settlers entered the country. In 1833 the revolution occurred which resulted finally in Texas becoming an independent republic, with a population of about 20,000. Subsequently, by its request, it was admitted as a State into the Union, Dec. 27, 1845. The first Methodist class was organized by Henry Stephenson, in 1833. In 1837 three missionaries were sent to the republic; the lamented Dr. Ruter, who died the following year, being superintendent, and who was accompanied by Littleton Fowler and Robert Alexander. Fowler died in 1846. In 1838 a mission district was formed, which reported 7 preachers and 450 members. The first Annual Conference was formed in 1840, and embraced three districts, with 1800 members. In 1844 a second Conference was organized, and both adhered to the M. E. Church South in 1845. Since the close of the Civil War other Methodist organizations have also been established. The M. E. Church South has five Conferences in the State, to wit: Texas, Central Texas, East Texas, Northwest Texas, and West Texas, which, in 1875, numbered 62,542 members. The M. E. Church has four Conferences: the Texas, West Texas, Southern German, and Austin, which together number about 16,395 members. The Colored M. E. Church of America has about 8000 members, and the African and Zion

Churches together number 10,000 members. The Methodist Protestants have also a Conference, which embraces about 2500 members, making a total number in the Methodist Churches of about 102,528. The M. E. Church South has established several institutions of learning, the first of which was the college at Chapel Hill. There are now the South-western University, Chapel Hill Female College, Andrew Female College, Waco Female College, Marvin College, and several smaller seminaries. They have also established a Mexican border mission district, which by working among the Spanish population will hereafter furnish agencies for work in Mexico. The M. E. Church has also commenced institutions of learning at Marshall and Spring Creek, chiefly for the education of colored youth.

Texas Conference, African M. E. Church, "includes the State of Texas." At its session of 1876 it stationed 31 preachers, and reported 9 local preachers, 511 members, 24 churches, and 5 parsonages, valued at $31,100, and for missions, $157.50.

Texas Conference, M. E. Church.—The Texas Conference which originally belonged to the M. E. Church adhered to the Church South. The General Conference, in 1864, gave to the bishops authority to organize several Conferences in the South. Among these the Texas Mission Conference was constituted, in 1866, by Bishop Thomson. Its first session was held in Houston, Jan. 18, 1867, by Bishop Simpson. It reported 18 ministers, 15 of whom were admitted on trial at that session, 1584 members, and 5 churches, valued at $4850. In 1868 it was constituted a Conference, its boundaries being those of the State. In 1872 the General Conference authorized its division into two or more Conferences, provided it should be so desired by two-thirds of the members, and that the presiding bishop should concur. Accordingly the western portion was set off into a separate Conference, and the German work was also constituted into a separate body, called the Southern German Conference. These arrangements were approved by the General Conference of 1876, which defined the boundaries of the Texas Conference as "including so much of the State of Texas as lies east of a line beginning at the Gulf of Mexico, on the east line of Matagorda County, and running along said line to the east line of Wharton and Colorado Counties to the north point of Colorado County; thence north until it strikes the Central Railroad at Calvert; thence along the line of said railroad to the northern boundary of Texas, excluding Calvert and all towns on said road." The statistics as reported in 1876 are: 95 traveling and 178 local preachers, 10,706 members, 3678 Sunday-school scholars, 60 churches, valued at $35,651, and 5 parsonages, valued at $2350.

Texas Conference, M. E. Church South, is one of the original Conferences that adhered to the Church South at the division of the M. E. Church, in 1845. In 1847 it reported to the Church South 32 traveling and 39 local preachers, and 2045 white and 500 colored members. The General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries as follows: "On the east by Trinity River from the southeast corner of Leon County to the coast, on the south by the Gulf of Mexico to Trespacios Bay, on the west by the Trespacios River and the east line of Jackson, Lavaca, Gonzales, Caldwell, and Hayes Counties, and on the north by the Pedernales River and a direct line from its mouth to the northwest corner of Travis County, and the south lines of Williamson, Milam, Robertson, and Leon Counties to Trinity River." The latest report (1875) is: 58 traveling and 59 local preachers, 6734 white members, 45 Sunday-schools, and 2741 Sunday-school scholars.

Texas Conference, M. P. Church, embraces "all of the State of Texas east of the Trinity River." It reported, in 1877, 35 itinerant and 55 unstationed ministers, 1700 members, and 15 churches, valued at $2500.

Thacher, William, a member of the New York Conference, was born in Kentucky in 1769, but early moved East. He enjoyed good educational facilities, and became a fine scholar, especially in Greek and Hebrew. When twenty years of age he was converted in the city of Baltimore, and on his return to New Haven a few months after, his religious change excited both the astonishment and ridicule of his friends. "He was severely persecuted, and even warned by the civil authority to leave the town, which threat was subsequently revoked, and he was allowed to prosecute his business. He was the only Methodist in the place, and in order to enjoy the society of his brethren he went from ten to twenty miles." In 1797 he was admitted into the New York Conference, and for forty-eight years was in the active ministry. He was especially successful in erecting churches. Among these were Allen Street, Old Bedford, Second John Street, and churches at Poughkeepsie, Newburgh, and Hudson. "His pulpit efforts were characterized by great earnestness, by clear exposition of the Scriptures, by terseness, brevity, and point." It had been his custom to read the Bible through annually, which he had done critically and prayerfully each year since 1800. He read it several times in Greek, and the Old Testament both in the Hebrew and Chaldaic. He died in the eighty-seventh year of his age. Among his last expressions were, "Glory to God! I am happy in Jesus."

Theological Institute, The, of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, is situated in Manchester, and stands in a pleasant locality, known as Victoria Park. It was purchased for £2400, and was adapted to the purposes of the institute by an outlay of over £600 more. The institute had been conducted for five years in a rented building, and has but recently been removed to its present locality. At the formation of the church, in 1857, no measures were taken for the establishment of a theological school. Gradually its necessity began to be felt: but the scarcity of ministers and the urgent claims of other projects for precedence, postponed any action until 1869. At that time incipient measures were adopted for raising the funds and making preparatory arrangements. In 1871, Rev. Thomas Hacking was appointed theological tutor, and the institute was opened in September, 1872, with only six students. This number has gradually increased, and the new building furnishes accommodation for twenty-four students, with the tutor's family. While the institute was conducted in a private house its internal affairs were managed by a committee annually appointed. Since its removal to the premises purchased, it is managed by nine trustees, who are life governors, and nine triers, elected annually, with the four connectional officers, and the officers of the institute. Candidates for the institute must be members of the body, and must have a circuit recommendation. These recommendations are considered by the connectional committee, and the accepted candidates are examined by the committee on the institute. Two years is the term of residence. A charge is ordinarily made for admission, payable by the student or his friends: the minimum fee being £10 for the first year, and £5 for the second. The committee send such students as they judge best to Owen's College, which is in the vicinity, and is an undenominational institution, to receive instruction in comparative grammar, English language, and literature, logic, and the Greek Testament, and such other subjects as they may deem expedient. On Sabbaths the tutors and many of the students are employed in preaching in neighboring circuits, and they meet in class and take part in district visitation or mission work. The library of the late Rev. James Everett was purchased by twelve gentlemen for £300 and presented to the institution.

Theological Schools.—At the first Methodist Conference, which was held in 1744, one of the questions asked by Mr. Wesley was, "Can we have a seminary for laborers? A. If God spare us till another Conference we will consider the subject." Myles, one of the earliest historians of Methodism, says, "It does not appear that any decisive measure was come to on this subject. Mr. Wesley intended Kingswood School to be used for that purpose. He was forced to lay his design aside. It is evident from this that he thought of its necessity and utility at the very first Conference, but why nothing there was done in the business I cannot say. If I should hazard a conjecture it is this,—the poverty of the people, the great thirst for the word of God, and the consequent increase of lay preachers and their families, prevented him from setting such an institution on foot. I am sure he always esteemed a pious and learned ministry, and those of his preachers who were learned, as well as pious, were by him counted worthy of double honor." The fact that in the Church of England many were admitted to the ministry after having pursued their studies without any proper qualification in piety, inclined many of the early preachers and people to doubt the propriety of a theological school: and for many years this was the prevailing thought in many of the churches. When the Wesleyans of England resolved, in 1834, to found a theological school, it led to great opposition and to a secession, which resulted in the formation of the Wesleyan Reform Association; nevertheless, since that time the association has founded such an institution. The first theological school established by the Wesleyans was at Hoxton, subsequently changed to Richmond, in the suburbs of London. This was followed by a branch at Didsbury, near Manchester. There is a third institution at Headingley. In the United States, the first movement was made by Dr. Dempster and a few others, at Concord, N. H., and it was termed a Biblical Seminary. The institution has since been removed to Boston, and is a department of the Boston University. (See BOSTON UNIVERSITY.) In 1855 measures were taken for the establishment of the Garrett Biblical Institution, in the vicinity of Chicago, of which Dr. Dempster was the first preceptor. It is now a department of the Garrett Biblical Institute. (See GARRETT BIBLICAL INSTITUTE.) In 1866, the centenary year, Mr. Drew, of New York, made a large contribution for the establishment of a theological school, which is located at Madison, N. J., and is largely attended. (See DREW THEOLOGICAL SEMINARY.) The Methodists of Canada have a theological department in the Victoria University, and theological instruction, more or less extensive, is given also in a number of the colleges in the United States. From these seminaries have gone forth a number of the most earnest and successful workers to various missionary fields. As a result, efforts have been made to establish similar institutions in many mission fields. The Wesleyans have them in Australia, and in the Friendly and Fiji Islands. By the liberality of John T. Martin, Esq., of Brooklyn, an institute was established in Frankfort, Germany (see MARTIN INSTITUTE), and by the generosity and earnest labor of Rev. D. W. Thomas, a theological school has been started in India. In Mexico also a few young men are receiving theological training at Puebla.

Thoburn, James M., missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, was born in Ohio, March 7, 1836; joined the Pittsburgh Conference in 1858, and was appointed a missionary to India in 1859. He was stationed at Nynce Tal till October, 1863; went to America on furlough, and returned in January, 1866. He was afterwards stationed at Gurlwal, 1866-67; Moradabad, 1868-69; Lucknow, 1870-73; Calcutta, 1874-75. He came to the United States in 1876 as a delegate to the General Conference. Returning to India, he was appointed presiding elder of the Calcutta district, South India Conference. He has been engaged in both English and vernacular work.

Thomas, David Wesley, missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, was born in Sherbrooke, Lower Canada, where his parents, citizens of Malone, N. Y., were temporarily residing, Jan. 1, 1833. He was educated at the Franklin and Ogdensburg Academies, and the New York State Normal School, where he was graduated in 1855. After teaching several years, he joined the Black River Conference in 1858, and was appointed missionary to India in 1861, arriving at his field of labor Jan. 17, 1862. He had charge of the girls' orphanage at Bareilly from 1862 to 1871, and has been since the latter year agent and principal of the theological seminary at Bareilly. This institution owes its existence largely to his energy and liberality, he having made it a gift at its foundation of $20,000. He is also treasurer of the mission. His literary labors include a commentary on Genesis, and a pamphlet on Miracles, both in Roman Urdu.

Thomas, Eleazer, D.D., was born in the State of New York; received an academic education at Cazenovia; was converted when seventeen years of age, and was admitted on probation in the Genesee Conference in 1839. He was a member of the General Conference in Boston in 1852, and was transferred to California in 1855, and was the pastor one year in the church on Powell Street, San Francisco. In 1856 he was elected editor of the California Christian Advocate; was re-elected in 1860, and again in 1864. He was elected book agent in 1868, and served four years in charge of the depository in San Francisco. In 1872 he was appointed presiding elder of the Petaluma district. In the spring of 1873 he was appointed a member of the Peace Commission, and sent to treat with the Modoc Indians. On the 11th day of April, the commissioners having been decoyed into the Lava Beds, in Southern Oregon, Dr. Thomas and General Canby were slaughtered.

Dr. Thomas was a man of good presence, fine address, and great zeal and energy as a minister of Christ. He labored faithfully in planting the church in California.

Thomas, John, an English Wesleyan preacher, commenced his ministry in 1824, and was sent the following year to Tongatabu, where his work was eminently successful, being accompanied by the power of the Holy Ghost. After twenty-five years he revisited his native land, and then returned again to spend six more years in the Friendly Islands. He became supernumerary in 1860, and has lived to hear of the celebration of the jubilee of the establishment of the mission, and to receive from King George and his chiefs a substantial token of their love and respect. He is now an aged man, quietly awaiting the Master's call.

Thomas, John, Esq., was born in Exeter, England, in 1798; became a Wesleyan Methodist preacher in 1822. He was a fine linguist, a good painter, and the author of several volumes of poems and theological essays. He also executed a poetical version of Danté, the "Inferno" having appeared in 1859, the "Purgatoré" in 1862, and the "Paradiso" in 1866. He died at Dumfries, Scotland, Feb. 7, 1872.

Thomas, Samuel W., was born Jan. 22, 1830, and is of the fifth generation of a Methodist family. He joined the church in 1838, and entered the Philadelphia Conference in March, 1851. He traveled circuits on the Peninsula seven years; was stationed in Philadelphia, at St. Stephen's, Twelfth Street, and St. Paul's, seven years; was agent of the Tract Society and Book Room seven years; and was presiding elder of South Philadelphia district four years. He was a member of the General Conference of 1868, taking the place as alternate of a delegate who had left; and he was at the head of his delegation at the General Conference in 1872. During his management of the Tract Society and Book Room the new edifice was purchased on Arch Street, Philadelphia, and the business was greatly enlarged. He also compiled and published new forms for church requisites, which have had a large sale. He is now stationed at Scott church, Philadelphia.

Thompson, James B., M.D., was born Sept. 14, 1825, in Georgia; graduated at the medical college in Macon in 1855, and engaged actively in the practice of medicine. Being a strong friend of the Union, his house and place of business were burned during the Civil War, and he was driven from home. In 1868 he united with the M. E. Church, and assisted in building the house of worship at East Point, where he resided. In 1872 he was a delegate to the General Conference in Brooklyn. He died triumphantly Dec. 15, 1877.

Thompson, Hon. Richard W., Secretary of the United States Navy, was born in Culpepper Co., Va., Jan. 9, 1809, but when quite young removed to Indiana. He resided for some years at Bedford, and more recently in and near Terre Haute. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar; entered into political life, and for several years was a member of Congress, and in many prominent positions has been before the public. Having been a teacher in early life, he has taken great interest in the educational enterprises of his State, and has been a trustee of the State University, and also of the Indiana Asbury University. Some years since he retired from political life, and devoted himself wholly to his profession and to literary pursuits. Among the productions of his pen is a work on the "Political Aspects and Bearing of Romanism," which has been most favorably received. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has held various official positions. He was lay delegate for the Indiana Conference to the General Conference of 1872. When President Hayes entered upon the duties of his office Mr. Thompson was invited to a place in his cabinet.

Thompson, Thomas J., D.D., minister in the Wilmington Conference, M. E. Church, was born in Dorchester Co., Md., March 13, 1803, and died in Wilmington, Del., Nov. 29, 1874. He was converted when thirteen years of age, and admitted on trial in the Philadelphia Conference in April, 1826. He filled a number of the best appointments in New Jersey, Eastern Pennsylvania, and Delaware. He served the church on circuits and stations twenty-two years and a half, two years as agent for Wesleyan Female College, and as presiding elder twenty-five years. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1844, 1852, 1856, 1860, 1868, and 1872. As a presiding elder he was eminent. In the pulpit he was never sensational: he labored to implant in the minds and hearts of the people solid truth which might abide and work the happiest results, "and, although qualified in many particulars for the positions he held, yet it is, perhaps, true that nothing contributed so much to his influence and usefulness as his promptitude and the certainty with which he met his engagements." During his last sickness he frequently said, "I wait the pleasure of the Lord. I have prayed for health and strength again, but I find myself more disposed to say daily, 'Thy will be done.'"

Thompson, William, an English Wesleyan minister, was elected the first president of the Conference after the death of Mr. Wesley,—a sufficient token of the estimation in which he was held by his brethren. He died in 1799, aged sixty-two.

Thomson, Edward, D.D., LL.D., one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born at Portsea, England, Oct. 12, 1810, and was a remote relative of James Thomson, the author of "The Seasons." In 1818 the family removed to America, and settled in 1820 in Wooster, O. He early inclined to the study of medicine, and attended the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania. He received his diploma when nineteen years of age, and commenced the practice in Jeromenville and Wooster. He was converted in December, 1831, and though his parents were Baptists, he united with the M. E. Church, and was admitted into the Annual Conference in 1832. After filling appointments in Norwalk, Sandusky City, Cincinnati, and Wooster, he entered the Michigan Conference, and was stationed in Detroit. In 1838 he had charge of Norwalk Seminary, in which he continued to 1843, it then being under the charge of the North Ohio Conference. In 1844 he was elected editor of the Ladies' Repository, and in 1846 president of Ohio Wesleyan University, where he remained until 1860, when he was elected editor of The Christian Advocate and Journal, of New York. In 1864 he was elected to the office of bishop. In all of these positions he was "in labors abundant, in success distinguished." At his first sermon at a grove-meeting, it is said 65 penitents came to the altar, of whom 46 united with the church. His pulpit efforts everywhere combined rare eloquence with great spiritual power. He was especially eminent in the department of education, and both the Ohio and North Ohio Conferences passed resolutions expressing their gratification if he should see fit to resign the editorship of the Repository to take charge of the university. Bishop Thomson traveled extensively as bishop, and everywhere elicited the respect and confidence of his brethren. He made the first episcopal visit to India, of which his two volumes published after his return give account. While on his route attending Conferences he died of pneumonia, in the city of Wheeling, W. Va., March 22, 1870. While as a preacher, an editor, an educator, and a bishop, he attained a high position, he was remarkable for his facility and power with the pen. His style was clear, classical, and beautiful. He published several volumes of essays, addresses, and travels.

Thorn, Mary, was one of the first Methodists in Philadelphia. She united with the society under Mr. Pilmoor. So deep and ardent was her piety that she was appointed by him the leader of a class of women: she being the first female class-leader in Philadelphia. Before the close of the Revolutionary War she married Captain Parker, and returned to England, where she died. Her son was for some time teacher at Woodhouse Grove, among the Wesleys.

Thornley, Joseph H., a merchant of Philadelphia, was born near Enniskillen, Ireland, Aug. 3, 1828, and was converted in 1842. He became a clerk in the dry-goods business in 1844. He removed to Philadelphia in 1850, and commenced business on his own account in March, 1853. He was licensed as a local preacher in 1864, and was one of the original incorporators of Ocean Grove Camp-Meeting Association, with which he has maintained a close connection ever since. He is also a member of the Board of Church Extension, and has been a member of the Spring Garden M. E. church, Philadelphia, for thirteen years.

Thornton, Thomas C., D.D., of the M. E. Church South, was born in Dumfries, Va., Oct. 12, 1790. He graduated in Dumfries, and began to preach when only sixteen years of age. In 1813 he entered the Baltimore Conference, M. E. Church, of intonation and cadence, and a ready fluency which never failed; he was richly evangelical, and never wearied of setting forth Christ's redeeming work and atoning death. In addition to preaching the "word," he was assiduous in pastoral visitation and in conducting Bible classes for the young. In 1841, Mr. Thornton became classical tutor at the Theological Institution at Didsbury, where he remained eight years, happy in his work and much and was transferred to Mississippi to take charge of Centenary College. In 1845 he joined the Protestant Episcopal Church, but returned in 1850, and was re-admitted into the Mississippi Conference in 1853. He died March 23, 1860. He wrote "Theological Colloquies," and "Slavery as it is in the United States," in reply to Dr. Channing.

Thornton, William L., M.A., an eminent English Wesleyan minister, was one whose labors were highly appreciated, and they were owned of God. He had a voice of ample power, with great variety beloved. In 1849 he was appointed editor of the Wesleyan periodicals, and for fifteen years he discharged his duties so as to command the confidence of his brethren and sustain the reputation of the connection. In 1864, Mr. Thornton represented the British Conference at the General Conference of the M. E. Church; he then proceeded to Canada, and presided over that Conference; thence to Eastern British America, where he again filled the chair. On his return home he was elected president of the Conference, and was in labors more "abundant." The message had gone forth to call him home, and he died very unexpectedly, March, 1865, in his presidential year.

Thousand Island Camp-Meeting Association is a company which was incorporated in 1874, under a general law of New York, for the purpose of encouraging the building up of a summer village, or watering-place, on one of the Thousand Islands, in the St. Lawrence River, at which camp-meetings for the promotion of religion and education could be held. E. O. Haven, chancellor of Syracuse University, was chosen president of the company, Rev. J. F. Dayan, secretary, and J. P. Moffett, Esq., treasurer. Hon. Willard Ives, of Watertown, N. Y., has taken great interest in the enterprise.

The Thousand Islands (literally there are nearly two thousand) are in the St. Lawrence, partly belonging to the United States and partly to Canada. The water is abundant and cool the summer through, the scenery indescribable, the boating and fishing all that could be desired, and large numbers of people visit them every summer. The Thousand Island Association have purchased one thousand acres of land at the head of a large island, called Wellesley Island, and laid off about three hundred acres in ample lots with broad avenues. Great provision has been made to secure cleanliness and salubrity. A camp-meeting, a scientific and aesthetic congress, a temperance convention, and a Sunday-school parliament are held there annually. The speakers and people are usually about equally divided between Canadians and those from the United States. It thus promotes fraternity between the Christians and peoples of these two countries.

Thrap, Joel Smith, was born April 9, 1820, in Muskingum Co., O., and was converted and received into the Methodist Protestant Church Sept. 1, 1839. He was licensed to preach in May, 1842, and was received into the traveling connection in September, 1842. He was elected a representative to the General Conference of 1858, and was a member of the Free State Conferences held at Cincinnati in November, 1857; he was also a member of the Convention held in Springfield, O., in 1858, of the Convention held in Pittsburgh in 1860, and of the Non-Episcopal Convention held in Cleveland in June, 1865. Mr. Thrap was a member of the sub-committee of the joint Methodist Protestant and Wesleyan Convention held in Union Chapel, Cincinnati, in May, 1866, and the only member from the Methodist Protestant branch there represented in that committee now living (1877). He was a member of the General Conference of 1867, held in Cleveland. He served as book agent and publisher of the Western Methodist Protestant (now Methodist Recorder) from December, 1864, until December, 1866. He was a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Church in 1871, in Pittsburgh. From 1866 until the present he has been, much of the time, a general agent for Adrian College, and has traveled extensively among the Annual Conferences in that interest. He was a member of the Union Convention in Baltimore, May, 1877.

Tickets of Membership (English Wesleyan).—The possession of a "ticket" is one of the evidences of membership in the Methodist society. The tickets are not given to the leaders to be presented to the members as tokens of admission to the love-feasts or other ordinances. Mr. Wesley himself decided, in 1743, to meet and talk with every member once in three months. If judged to be fit and proper, every member received a ticket. This quarterly ticket, with the member's name written upon it, and signed by the minister, enables such an one to obtain everywhere the privilege of membership. When a member of society removes from one circuit to another a "note of removal," signed by the minister, introduces him or her to the minister of the circuit to which they go. The superintendent arranges for the quarterly visitation of the classes by himself and his colleagues, allowing proper time for inquiring into the spiritual state of each member, and for giving suitable counsel, admonition, and encouragement. Ministers must not give tickets to those who have ceased to meet in class. All the financial questions are explained to those who are seeking to join the society, and notes of admission on trial, with a copy of the "rules," are given. If any member has walked disorderly, the minister has power to withhold his ticket until he has conversed privately with the offender; if not satisfied, he must inform the party that he may appeal to the leaders' meeting. But he must report the case first to the next weekly meeting of ministers in the circuit, and then to the leaders' meeting.

Tiffin, Edward, formerly governor of Ohio, was born in Carlisle, England, June 19, 1776. At an early age he commenced the study of medicine, and, after emigrating to the United States, became a medical practitioner. In 1790 he and his wife, a sister of Governor Worthington, were led to Christ under the preaching of Rev. Thomas Scott, and after uniting with the church he commenced serving as a local preacher, and was ordained a deacon by Bishop Asbury. In 1796 he removed to Chillicothe, where he practiced medicine, and had regular Sabbath appointments for preaching. In 1799 he was elected a member of the Territorial legislature, and was remarkable for his skill in debate. In 1802 he was chosen a delegate to the convention which adopted the first constitution for Ohio, and he was elected president of that convention. In 1803 he was elected the first governor, and two years after was re-elected to the same office. In 1807 he was chosen as Senator in Congress, but deeply afflicted by the death of his excellent wife, who was a devoted Christian, he resigned his seat and retired to private life. Urged by the people, he accepted an election to the legislature, and was chosen Speaker of the House. In 1812 he was appointed by President Madison commissioner of the General Land Office; and in 1814, when the British army was approaching Washington, by his energy and activity he succeeded in removing all his valuable papers to a place of security, while those of many other officers were destroyed. Wearying of Washington life, he accepted the position of surveyor-general, and returned to his former home in Chillicothe. This office he held for nearly fifteen years. He died on the 9th of August, 1829. Three of his sermons have been published in the "Ohio Conference Offering."

Tiffin, O. (pop. 5648), the capital of Seneca County, is situated on both sides of the Sandusky River, and on the Cincinnati, Sandusky and Cleveland Railroad. It first appears as a circuit on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1832, with E. Yocum and J. Martin as pastors. In 1857 it had become a station, having 132 members, 150 Sunday-school scholars, and $8000 church property. It is in the North Ohio Conference, and the M. E. Church has 286 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $35,000 church property.

Titusville, Pa. (pop. 8639), is situated in Crawford County, on the Oil Creek and Alleghany Valley Railroad. It is one of the numerous towns which has grown up rapidly by reason of the oil. It first appears on the annals of the M. E. Church for 1857, with N. W. Jones as pastor. In 1858 it had 127 members, 80 Sunday-school scholars, and $600 church property. It is in the Erie Conference, and the M. E. Church has 296 members, 200 Sunday-school scholars, and $28,000 church property.

Toase, William, an English Wesleyan preacher, entered the ministry in 1804; early devoted himself to the study of the French language, and became missionary to the French prisoners of war in the Medway. He afterwards labored in France and the Channel Islands. He died in 1863, aged eighty.

Tobias, James, is a member of the Irish Conference, and son of the well-known Rev. Matthew Tobias. He has been in charge of many of the important circuits in the Conference. He was for several years the secretary, and has held many other posts of honor and of service. For the last fifteen years he has acted as chaplain to Methodist soldiers stationed in Dublin, and has been influential in much good to them. Although he entered the Conference in 1829, he retains his elasticity, wit, and power as a preacher.

Todd, Gabriel, Jr., a lay delegate from the Texas Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in slavery, in Georgia, July 21, 1844, and moved to Texas in 1860. His father was a Methodist preacher, and free-born. Mr. Todd joined the Methodist Episcopal Church about 1860. He has been steward and trustee of his church, superintendent of the Sunday-school, and has also been active in the Church Extension Society of his Conference. He has learned to read and write since gaining his freedom.

Todd, Jacob, D.D., of the Philadelphia Conference, was born at Cokesbury, Huntingdon Co., N. J., Oct. 22, 1838. He united with the M. E. Church in 1858, and was received on trial in the Philadelphia Conference in 1862, having traveled the previous year under the presiding elder. He entered Dickinson College in 1863, and graduated in 1866. He was elected first reserve delegate to the General Conference of 1876, and was appointed a fraternal delegate to the M. E. Church of Canada.

Toledo, O. (pop. 31,584), is the capital of Lucas County, and is situated on the Maumee River, within twelve miles of Lake Erie, and is a rapidly-growing city. It was visited as early as 1825, by Rev. John A. Baughman, of the Michigan Conference. The first religious service was held on La Grange Street, near Summit. In 1834 a Methodist class was formed, consisting of about 12 persons, of whom 2 are still living. In 1837 the membership had increased to 30, and preaching was maintained as part of a circuit in the Michigan Conference. In 1836 a lot was purchased, and a neat frame church was built on Hudson Street, between La Grange and Locust. In 1851 a more desirable site was purchased, where St. Paul's church now stands, and a plain brick church was erected, at a cost of $2000. In 1865 this building was taken down, and the present church was commenced. The lot cost $800, the building $60,000, and was in one of the best locations in the city. Its dimensions are about 80 by 60 feet; its style Gothic, with a spire of 150 feet. The Monroe Street society was organized in 1842, and was formerly a part of a class organized by Rev. J. A. Bateman in 1826, known as the Ten-Mile Creek class. The present house of worship was built in 1861, and is a neat, plain brick edifice, with tower, and is 30 by 55 feet. A society was organized in 1853, called the Second charge, which has developed into the St. John's church. It worshiped at first in the German church, but in 1856 built an edifice, and called it Ames chapel, a neat frame building, seating about 350 persons. In 1872 the present edifice was erected on McGonigal Street, and is about 45 by 65 feet, but the auditorium is yet unfinished. The Broadway church was built in 1867, and is a plain frame house, 40 by 60 feet. The Third Street church is located on the east side of the Maumee River, in what is known as East Toledo. The society was organized in 1867, and worshiped for some time in a hall. The new church was built in 1871, and is a neat one-story frame building, 30 by 50 feet. Colling Wood Avenue church is in the western part of the city, and was formerly called Tremaineville. The first church was built in 1836; the present edifice was erected in 1873, and is a handsome brick edifice, about 80 by 40 feet. The Detroit Avenue church was organized in 1875, and it built in the same year a neat frame church, 30 by 50 feet. The Albany Street society is in Manhattan, or North Toledo, near the mouth of the bay of Lake Erie. The society was organized in 1874. The edifice was built in 1875, of brick, and is about 30 by 45 feet. In addition to these, there is a charge in South Toledo, about eight miles up the river, organized in 1834, and the church edifice erected in 1836; and a society also called the Oregon chapel, two and one-half miles east of the Maumee River, on what is known as the Plank Road. There being a large German population in Toledo, German services were held by Peter F. Schneider, in 1849, and a society was organized in 1851. The members purchased the first church, formerly owned by what is known as St. Paul's society, and worshiped therein until 1869, when they secured a lot on Ontario Street and erected a plain frame structure, 40 by 60 feet. A second charge, called the Zion German church, was organized in 1862. It erected a good church edifice in 1875, about 30 by 50 feet in size, and is in the midst of a large German population. There is also an African M. E. society, which was organized in 1851. In 1864 a lot was purchased on Erie Street, and a plain brick church erected, 44 by 65 feet. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Tomkins, Calvin, Esq., was born in Orange, Essex Co., N. J., Jan. 31, 1793. In 1812 he served as a soldier, and subsequently studied navigation, with the design of following a seafaring life. At the close of the war he engaged on a vessel, and made trips along the coast until disabled by disease; after which he took an interest in packets plying between Newark and New York, and was master of a sailing vessel between these points. He was the first to establish an anthracite coal yard in Newark. By an accident he discovered that the coal-dust, which accumulated in the yard and was considered worthless, could be utilized in burning lime; which led him to enter on a new and successful business on the Hudson, chiefly at Tomkins's Cove. In 1820 he was converted at a camp-meeting, near Haverstraw, and united with the Halsey Street M. E. church, Newark, and took an active part in local missionary work. In 1830, Mr. Tomkins became an advocate of changes in the government of the church, and was instrumental in the organization of Methodist Protestantism in Newark and New York; and when he removed to Tomkins's Cove he established a Methodist Protestant church at that place. He has been frequently a member of the General Conference, and was elected to the Union Convention in 1877. He is a class-leader, though now (1877) in his eighty-fifth year. He built a church edifice at Tomkins's Cove, and another at a point not far distant, and recently erected at his own expense a public school, at a cost of $22,000, which he presented to the people of the district.

Tomlinson, Joseph Smith, D.D., of the Cincinnati Conference, was born in Georgetown, Ky., March 15, 1802. Having a thirst for knowledge, he became a student in the Transylvania University, and graduated in 1825. He became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church in his early youth, and before his graduation was licensed to preach. Immediately on leaving Transylvania University he was elected Professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy in Augusta College, and was engaged in educational work, with a few brief intervals, for nearly a quarter of a century. In 1825 he was admitted to the traveling connection, and, having served as professor in Augusta College, was chosen its president, holding the office until 1839, when the institution was destroyed by the withdrawal of the patronage of the Kentucky Conference and the repeal of its charter by the legislature of the State. He was elected to a professorship in the Ohio Wesleyan University, but did not accept, yet served as agent for two years. Subsequently he accepted a professorship in the Ohio University, at Athens, and was elected as president, but declined. Afterwards he was elected as president of the State University of Indiana, but the death of a son had given such a shock to his mental powers that he felt himself disqualified. He suffered from despondency until, as the result of complete mental alienation, he finished his course at Neville, O., June 4, 1853. He was a scholar of superior accomplishments, fine classical taste, and well versed in mental philosophy. As a pulpit orator he had a high reputation, and few men surpassed him in colloquial powers.

Tonga is the name sometimes given to the entire group of Friendly Islands. (See FRIENDLY ISLANDS.) It is applied more particularly, however, to the southern group, the centre one being called Hapai and the north Vavao. A mission was established by the Wesleyans as early as 1822, but little was done until 1827. Since that time the mission has made rapid progress, and from Tonga the gospel has been carried to the Fiji Islands, resulting in the conversion of that population to Christianity. Native missionaries have been sent out thence into various islands in the South Seas, and to some islands of similar dialects in Australasia. The accompanying cut is a view of the mission-house as it existed some years since.

Topeka, Kan. (pop. 5790), situated on the Kansas River, and on the Kansas Pacific Railroad. It is first named in the annals of the M. E. Church for 1855 as a mission, then connected with the Missouri Conference, with J. S. Griffing as pastor. In 1856 it reported 60 members. In 1861 there were 82 members, 53 Sunday-school scholars, and $4000 church property. This city is in the Kansas Conference, and the following are the statistics:

Toronto, Canada (pop. 56,092), is the capital of the province of Ontario, and is situated on the northern shore of Lake Ontario. Methodism was early introduced into this place, and has grown with the increase of population. There are now, including the suburbs of Don Mount, Yorkville, Seaton, and Davenport, thirteen churches belonging to the Methodist Church of Canada. The most expensive of these is the Metropolitan, which, though recently erected, is the lineal successor of the first Methodist meeting-house, and which was the second church of any kind erected in the town of York, now the city of Toronto. It was built of wood, in 1818, and was only 40 feet square, and is known in Methodist history as the "Old Frame Meeting-house." Its successor was the Newgate Street church, afterwards called the Adelaide Street church. It was erected in 1832, before the M. E. Church of Canada formed a union with the Wesleyans of England. The edifice was 70 feet in length, with a basement and galleries. This building gave way, in 1870, to the present magnificent Metropolitan church, which stands in the centre of McGill Square. It contains an area of two acres, inclosed by a neat iron fence, and planted with flowers, ornamental shrubs, and trees. The church is built of white brick, with cut-stone dressings, and is in the French Gothic style of the fourteenth century. Its extreme dimensions are 214 by 104 feet. In its rear is a chancel-shaped chapel, 63 by 63 feet, with an upper floor in the south end, in which are commodious infant class-rooms. In the front is a tower about 30 feet square and 190 feet in height; and at the junction of the main building and the chapel are two small towers, 16 feet square and 122 feet in height. The church is beautifully finished, adorned with stained glass, and finely lighted, with a commodious gallery. It will seat over 2400 persons, and its services are generally crowded. (See cut on following page.) The total cost of the building and site was $150,000. The edifice was erected chiefly through the exertions of Rev. Dr. W. Morley Punshon. The organ is said to be the largest in Canada, and one of the largest in America. The Richmond Street church was established in 1844, and prior to the erection of the Metropolitan church was regarded as the principal church of Canada Methodism. It is 85 by 65 feet, and its congregation contributes most liberally to the various church funds. The Sherburn Street church is a plain brick building, 54 by 75 feet, with heavy buttresses. A transept has recently been built, which widens the church at the pulpit to 66 feet. The Elm Street church was erected in 1862, on the site of a former church, which was destroyed by fire, Oct. 29, 1861, and is a neat church, 85 by 52 feet, having a seating capacity from 800 to 1000. The other churches are quite convenient: Berkley Street, simple in style, is yet a model church; so also is Queen Street, which is somewhat larger: Bloor's Street is an excellent church, with a tower. Dundas Street, Spadina Avenue, Davenport, Seaton, and the North Yorkville churches, though less in size, are yet beautiful and convenient. University Street and Woodgreen, named from Drs. Wood and Green, are smaller, but answer the present wants of the vicinity.

Toronto is the headquarters of Primitive Methodism. This organization has five church edifices, all of which are good; and the recent one, on Carlton Street, is superior in size, artistic effect, and convenience. But the membership of all the churches is only about equal to that of one of the largest Methodist churches in the same city. The Bible Christians have a church of white brick, of moderate size, which is a neat place of worship.

Torsey, Henry P., LL.D., D.D., president of Maine Wesleyan Seminary and Female College, was born in Monmouth, Me., Aug. 7, 1819. He was educated in the Monmouth Academy and Maine Wesleyan Seminary, at that time under the superintendence of W. C. Larabee, LL.D. In 1841

REV. HENRY P. TORSEY, LL.D., D.D.

he took charge of the normal department in the East Greenwich Academy, Rev. Dr. Tofft being principal, and under whom his college studies were pursued. In 1842 he returned to the Maine Wesleyan Seminary as an assistant to President Allen. Dr. Allen resigning in 1843, he was elected to fill the vacancy, and has continued as principal from that time to the present, though occasionally absent in government service. In 1855-56 he was chairman of the committee on education on the part of the State Senate, and had much to do with the draughting and the passage of bills which essentially changed the common school laws. He spent a portion of 1865 in South Carolina, overseeing freedmen's interests, and in treasury agencies for the States of Georgia, Florida, and North Carolina. He was appointed by President Lincoln as secretary of Montana Territory, but declined on account of his health. He was a member of the General Conferences of 1860, 1868, and 1876. He has had under his care about 17,000 students. He united with the M. E. Church in his youth, received license as a local preacher in 1838, and was admitted into full connection in the Maine Conference in 1850.

Townley, James, D.D., an English Wesleyan minister, was appointed in 1827 one of the secretaries of the Wesleyan Missionary Society. He was elected president of the Conference in 1829. He died in 1833,—his ministry began in 1796.

Townsend, Joseph, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerant ministry in 1836, and labored in a succession of home circuits till 1851. He identified himself with the temperance reformation in 1832. The movement in England was then in its infancy. He became a candidate for the Wesleyan ministry, and passed the district meeting, but being opposed to the establishment of a theological institute he retired from the Wesleyan body, and was soon admitted into the ministry of the Wesleyan Methodist Association. In 1851 he went to Australia to superintend the mission, and remained in that distant sphere of labor for fifteen years. Returning to England, he resumed the work of home circuits in 1866, and continued in active service till 1875, when he became a supernumerary. He resides in Rochdale, Lancashire.

Tracts were circulated at a very early period by Mr. Wesley. Long before the origin of tract societies we find Mr. Wesley engaged in their publication and circulation. In his journal, June 21, 1747, he says, "I set out for Brentford with Robert Swindels. The next day we reached Marlborough, when one in the room beneath us was swearing desperately. Mr. Swindels stepped down and put into his hand the paper entitled 'Swear not at all.' He thanked him, and promised to swear no more. And he did not while he was in the house."

Prior to this, Mr. Wesley wrote "A Word to a Smuggler," "To a Sabbath-Breaker," "To a Swearer," "To a Drunkard," "To a Street-Walker," "To a Malefactor," "To an Englishman," "To a Soldier," "To a Protestant," and "To a Freeholder." He published these for general circulation by his preachers and his people to reach those who might not attend public service. He was the first that set this great movement on foot. In the modern revival of religion, and during his long life, he zealously promoted it. In the year 1794 Dr. Coke organized a religious tract society. With the approbation of the Conference he enlarged the number of tracts to be distributed, and solicited subscriptions from wealthy persons to defray their expense. Since that period the great national and denominational societies have been established, and have accomplished an immense work in diffusing religious literature.

Tract Society.—In 1780 Mr. Wesley wrote a sermon, in which he says, "Two-and-forty years ago, having a desire to furnish poor people with cheaper, shorter, and plainer books than any I had seen, I wrote many small tracts, generally a penny apiece, and afterwards several larger. Some of these had such a sale as I never thought." This marks 1738 as the beginning of his tract distribution. In 1782

he organized a tract society for the distribution of cheap publications among the poor. This was several years before the organization of the Religious Tract Society in England. In 1794, Dr. Coke, with the sanction of the British Wesleyan Conference, commenced a religious tract society. In 1808 the book-room committee was requested to prepare a plan for more extensive operations. This has been systematically carried into effect. The committee consists of ministers appointed by the London book committee, with a ministerial secretary. These are annually appointed. Every new tract presented is read and reported on by two members of the committee before it can be accepted: they must be authentic in narrative and evangelical in doctrine. Each subordinate society has its own organization. The Methodist Episcopal Tract

The tract-pages published during 1875 were as follows: in China, 5,000,000; in India, 6,000,000; in Germany and Switzerland, 17,000,000; in Mexico, where the tract work commenced within the two years previous, 900,000 pages. It has recently been largely engaged in reprinting the choice selection of both the London and Dublin tracts. Many new tracts are also issued by the diligent editor, Dr. Vincent.

Training Colleges (English Wesleyan).—At the British Conference of 1838 a committee was appointed called the Wesleyan education committee. Its duties were defined to embrace the preparation of a general plan for the establishment of a religious education in connection with the Wesleyan body. The following year the sum of £5000 was granted for educational purposes from the Centenary Fund. This sum was invested, and the proceeds appropriated towards the training of teachers at the Glasgow Free Church Normal College. Four hundred and forty-eight Wesleyan teachers were thus enabled in a few years to pass through the customary training course, at a cost to the committee of £10,435. Still, it was thought essential that a normal institution should be raised in London, and, if possible, to have a training school under the special care of the church. In 1847 a committee, having been authorized to do so, purchased a site at Westminster, and the building commenced at once. In 1849 deputations were appointed to bring this important enterprise before the public.

WESTMINSTER NORMAL SCHOOL.

Society was organized in 1817. At times it has had agents employed to collect funds for its support; at other times it has been consolidated with the Bible Society and Sunday-School Union, and part of the time it has been partially abandoned. It is now in successful operation and doing a good work, especially on the frontier work at home and in foreign fields. It reported to the General Conference in 1876 a circulation during the previous year of 35,675,472 pages of tracts at home, an increase of 4,446,972; and the circulation abroad was 35,944,657 pages in foreign countries, an increase of 11,566,765. A total increase in both fields was 16,013,737 pages. During those four years the society received into its treasury, by the benevolent offering of the church, $65,877, an increase during four years of $2100. The expenditures of the society were $910 less than during the preceding four years. It has also made many grants of tracts to the missions in various countries, viz., Germany, Sweden, Norway, Italy, Bulgaria, Japan, and Mexico, amounting to $11,574.

The ground purchased, with the necessary buildings for college and school purposes, have cost, with subsequent enlargements, upwards of £50,000, towards which sum the government granted £7500. A view of the institution is herewith given. The college was opened, Oct. 6, 1851, with 10 students. In the course of sixteen months the number had increased to 47 male and 21 female students. The entire debt was liquidated in 1857. In 1866 there were 128 students in training, of whom 123 passed the government examination. The appointment by Conference of a ministerial principal and secretary gave further solidity to the work. The names of the Revs. John Scott and M. C. Taylor (both since dead) are embalmed in the memory of the connection, for the untiring efforts which brought the whole of their superior intellects and loving hearts to bear on the welfare of the institution. Among the conditions to be observed on entrance, it is required as follows: "Every candidate must be truly converted to God and be a member of the Methodist Society, possess a competent knowledge of elementary theology, and especially of that system of religious doctrine and discipline as set forth in the writings of Mr. Wesley and the Conference catechisms." A correct acquaintance with the leading facts of Scripture narrative; familiarity with the outlines of English history and geography; an accurate knowledge of the principles of English grammar and common arithmetic; freedom from bodily defect, predisposition to disease, and pecuniary embarrassment; with some knowledge of the theory of music, and an ability to lead the children in singing, are essential to admission. Pupil teachers and others who gain first-class Queen's scholarships are entitled to two years' residence without charge. In 1871 the number of candidates for admission had so far increased that yet further college accommodation became absolutely necessary. To effect this, Conference gave its sanction to the appropriation of the college at Westminster for male students only, and authorized the purchase of an estate at Battersea of more than three acres in extent. This is termed the Southlands Training College (for female students only). The erection and furnishing of this institution, with a house for the principal, and two practicing schools, etc., cost £14,783. The present principal at Westminster is the Rev. Dr. Rigg, and at Southlands the Rev. G. W. Olver, B.A. At Westminster College 130 students are now in residence; at Southlands, 105. The entrance fee to the former is £8; to the latter it is £5.5. The government bears a large share of the expenses of both colleges. The recipients are required to give a term of service in elementary education. They are not, however, necessarily employed in Wesleyan schools. Two-thirds are contributed to supply board schools, and one-third for Wesleyan schools.

Transubstantiation is a doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church, and as defined by one of its early advocates is, "that after the consecration of the bread and wine in the Lord's Supper nothing remained of these symbols but the outward form or figure, under which the body and blood of Christ were really and locally present, and that this body present was the identical body that had been born of the Virgin Mary: had suffered on the cross, and had been raised from the dead." This doctrine, which was gradually brought into the ancient church, was opposed by a number of distinguished theologians, among whom was Bérenger. But he incurred such opposition from a synod held at Rome under the immediate eye of the Pope, that he subscribed the following declaration, composed by one of the cardinals: "The bread and wine which are placed on the altar are, after consecration, not merely a sacrament, symbol, or figure, it being the true body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ, which is handled by the hands of the priest, and broken and chewed by the teeth of the faithful." Luther opposed this doctrine of transubstantiation, but adopted a view which has been called consubstantiation, asserting that the body and blood of Christ are actually present with the bread and wine. Zwingle, Bucer, and other reformers denied that there was anything in the sacrament except the symbols, and that there was "no advantage derived from the partaking of them, other than a moral effect, resulting from the commemoration of an event so awful and so deeply interesting as the crucifixion of our Redeemer." Calvin adopted a view in which he was followed by Knox and other reformers, and which is set forth in the original Scottish confessions thus: "We assuredly believe that in the supper rightly used, Christ Jesus is so joined with us that he becometh the very nourishment and food of our souls. Not that we imagine any transubstantiation; but this union and communion which we have with the body and blood of Christ Jesus, in the right use of the sacrament, is wrought of the bodily portion of the Holy Ghost, who by true faith carrieth us above all things that are visible, carnal, and earthly, and maketh us to feed upon the body and blood of Christ Jesus." The Westminster Confession says, "Wherefore receivers outwardly partaking of the visible elements in this sacrament, do then also inwardly by faith, really and indeed, yet not carnally and corporally, but spiritually, receive and feed upon Christ crucified, and all benefits of his death; the body and blood of Christ being then, not corporally or carnally in, with, or under the bread and wine, yet as really and spiritually present to the faithful believers in that ordinance as the elements themselves are to their outward senses." The Methodist Churches, following the Church of England, have in their eighteenth article of religion this declaration: "Transubstantiation, or the change of the substance of bread and wine in the supper of our Lord, cannot be proved by Holy Writ, but is repugnant to the plain words of Scripture. While, therefore, the nature of the sacrament hath given occasion to many superstitions, the body of Christ is given, taken, and eaten in the supper only after a heavenly and spiritual manner. And the means whereby the body of Christ is received and eaten in the supper is faith." The doctrine of transubstantiation is confined to the Roman Catholic Church, and to a portion of the high or ritualistic party in the Church of England. The Lutheran Churches embrace the doctrine of consubstantiation. The view as set forth in the Westminster Confession, and in the article in the Methodist Churches, is generally embraced by Protestants.

Tranter, William, is the oldest living Wesleyan minister in Great Britain. He entered the ministry in 1803, and became a supernumerary in 1846. He is now (1877) in his ninety-fourth year.

Travis, Joseph, A.M., was born in Maryland, Sept. 13, 1786, and was received into the traveling connection in 1806. He filled a number of important stations, both as preacher and teacher, in the South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, and Memphis Conferences. He died in Mississippi, Sept. 16, 1858.

Treffry, Richard, Jr., an English Wesleyan minister, was the son of the Rev. R. Treffry, Sr., who was president of the Conference in 1833. Richard was a youth of great promise; he commenced his itinerant labors in his twentieth year, and died at the age of thirty-three. The theological work by which he will be remembered the longest is an exhaustive and standard "Treatise on the Doctrine of the Eternal Sonship of Christ."

Trenton, N. J. (pop. 22,874), the capital of the State, is situated on the Delaware River. It was founded about 1720, by Colonel William Trent, formerly a citizen of Philadelphia. It is supposed that Captain Webb preached in this city as early as 1769. Mr. Conrad Cotts was appointed the first class-leader. Bishop Asbury visited the place in 1772, and says, "In meeting the small society of about 19 persons, I gave them tickets, and found it a comfortable time. They are a serious people, and there is some prospect of much good being done in this place." After holding meetings for several months in the court-house, school-houses, and private dwellings, the Methodists erected, in 1773, an humble place of worship, which was the second Methodist church built in the State. When Benjamin Abbot first preached in Trenton, in 1778, he says, "I went to Trenton, and our meeting-house being turned into a stable by the army, they gave me leave to preach in the Presbyterian meeting-house." Trenton is first mentioned in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1784, when John Haggerty and Matthew Greentree were appointed to that circuit. Methodism has grown with the increase of population, and has never been very greatly affected by the divisions and agitations which have sometimes occurred in the general church. The Wesleyan Repository, which was the precursor of the great radical controversy, was first published in this city, but it was shortly afterwards removed to Philadelphia, and ultimately to Baltimore. Trenton is in the New Jersey Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Trimble, Hon. Allen, formerly governor of Ohio, was born in Augusta Co., Va., Nov. 24, 1783; removed to Kentucky, and afterwards settled in Ohio, in 1804. He was clerk of the courts and recorder from 1809 to 1816. In the war with Great Britain he commanded a mounted regiment under General Harrison in 1812-13. He was elected to the legislature in 1816; was a member of the State Senate in 1817-26, and was honored with an election as Speaker of that body in 1819, and held the chair until 1826. He became acting governor in 1821, was elected in 1826, and served until 1830. After retiring from active political life he became the president of the first State board of agriculture, in 1846. He was a member of the M. E. Church, and deeply devoted to all its interests. In his official positions he promoted education and measures of moral reform. He died at Hillsboro', O., Feb. 2, 1870.

Trimble, Mrs. Jane, one of the distinguished Methodist women of the West, was born in Augusta Co., Va., March 15, 1755. Early in life she united with the Presbyterian Church. Subsequently removing to Kentucky, and being better pleased with the doctrines of Methodism, she united with the Methodist society. Mr. Trimble and herself becoming conscientious on the subject of slavery, manumitted their slaves and removed to Ohio, where she was instrumental in the organizing of a Methodist church. She had preaching in her own house, visited the poor and prisoners, organized Sabbath-schools, took an active part in meetings for prayer and for Christian experience, and was instrumental in some glorious revivals. She was the mother of Governor Trimble, and the grandmother of Rev. J. M. Trimble, D.D., of the Ohio Conference.

Trimble, Joseph M., D.D., is a native of Ohio, and was educated and graduated at the Ohio University, at Athens. In 1829 he was received into the Ohio Conference, in which he still remains. After filling appointments in Zanesville and Cincinnati he was, in 1836, elected Professor of Mathematics in Augusta College, in which position he remained until 1840, when he returned to the pastorate, and was stationed in Columbus, O. In 1842-44 he was presiding elder of Columbus and Chillicothe districts, and after filling a charge in Cincinnati, was presiding elder of East Cincinnati district. He has since been stationed in Zanesville and Columbus, and has been presiding elder of the Zanesville and Chillicothe districts. In 1864 he was elected assistant corresponding secretary of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church, and traveled extensively in the duties of his office until 1868, when he became presiding elder of Lancaster district. In 1869 he was appointed financial agent of the Ohio Wesleyan University, which position he still holds. He was chosen secretary of the Ohio Conference in 1834, and continued in that office until 1865. He has been a member of every General Conference since 1844, at which session he united with J. B. Finley in presenting the resolution which was adopted by the General Conference in the case of Bishop Andrew.

Trinity, The.—The doctrine of the Trinity is that there is a union of three persons in one Godhead,—the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. This doctrine is set forth in its simplest form in the Apostles' and the Nicene Creeds; it is clearly formulated in the Articles of Religion of the Methodist Episcopal Church. (See ARTICLES OF RELIGION, Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4.) This doctrine is a pure revelation, distinguishing Christianity from all other systems of religion. The shadow of the truth is found in many pagan religions of antiquity, and analogies are not wanting in nature to corroborate and strengthen a doctrine found in and proven by the revealed word of God. Man's nature is a trinity—being a unity in plurality—of body, soul, and spirit. The doctrine is a mystery, in that it is not comprehended by human reason; but it is not, therefore, untrue, or to be rejected as an object of faith. If the fact is clearly made known in God's word, then must we accept it, even though we may not understand its full import or comprehend its mystery. And on this authority the church teaches the doctrine of the Holy Trinity.

The word "trinity" is not found in Scriptures, any more than the words omnipresence and ubiquity and others that we apply unto God. No phrase, as a "Triune God," or a "threefold personality," is found immediately derived from the Scriptures; but the truth is indicated in the Old Testament and clearly revealed in the New. "God is one being, but he is more than one being in three relations; for personal acts, such as we ascribe to distinct persons, and which distinctively reveal personality, are ascribed to each person of the Trinity. The Scripture doctrine, therefore, is that the persons are not separate, but distinct, and that they are so united as to be but one God: in other words, that the divine nature exists under the personal distinction of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and that these three have equally, and in common with one another, the nature and perfections of supreme divinity." "The truth of the Trinity is indicated by the word 'Elohim,' the Hebrew form of the divine name, that God in unity and plurality exist as correlatives which mutually require one another. It is the essential characteristic of the true doctrine of the divine nature, in contradiction to polytheism on the one hand and abstract monotheism on the other hand, that both elements of true being—unicity and multiplicity—do in God meet, and interpenetrate one another in a perfectly unique and transcendental way." Thus, in the beginning of Genesis, the first name, "Elohim," or the Gods, in which the Creator is made known unto us, is in the plural form, indicating the existence of a plurality of persons within the one essence of God. But not only is the divine nature hinted by the plural appellation united to a singular verb in the first verse of the first chapter of Genesis, but other plural forms of speech occur when the one true God only is spoken of. Thus, "And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness."—Gen. i. 26. The divine nature, as a trinity, is indicated in the fact that the word of God speaks of three persons, and three persons only, under divine titles. Thus, in the form of benediction used by the Jewish high-priests in blessing the people,—Num. vi. 24–27: "Jehovah bless thee, and keep thee: Jehovah make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: Jehovah lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace,"—we discover a distinct limit to the number of persons who are suggested in Genesis as being internal to the unity of God. In Isa. xlviii. 16, we have the same threefold distinction, with the limitation, "And now the Lord God, and his Spirit, hath sent me." The person sent evidently referring to the Messiah, and those sending being the Father and the Holy Ghost. The distinct personality of God as the Father is affirmed in Scriptures as being the ultimate cause of creation.—1. Cor. viii. 6: "But to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him;" as the author of redemption.—Rom. xi. 36: "For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things: to whom be glory forever. Amen." The distinct personality of Christ is affirmed in Scriptures, in the title applied to himself as the Son of God consubstantial with his Father,—John iii. 16: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." In the terms, "my Father," "my God," he expresses a filial relation with God.—John viii. 58: "Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Before Abraham was, I am." Christ assumed divine authority, subordinated human law to himself, proclaimed omniscience and pre-existence and omnipresence with the Father,—Matt. ix. 6: "But that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy,) Arise, take up thy bed, and go unto thine house." Matt. xxv. 31: "When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats." The distinct personality of the Holy Ghost is affirmed in Scripture by the titles that are given him, and the attributes associated with his name,

—Acts v. 3, 4: "Ananias, why hath Satan filled thine heart to lie to the Holy Ghost? Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God." II. Cor. iii. 17: "Now the Lord is that Spirit: and where the Spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." Personal attributes and divine operations are ascribed unto the Holy Ghost, as self-consciousness, will, knowledge, self-determination, and wisdom. All that is predicated of God the Father, and of Christ the Son, is affirmed of the Holy Ghost. Scriptures not only declare the distinct personality of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, but this distinction is preserved in the declaration of the three as one. The manifestation of the whole is personal,—Matt. xxviii. 19: "Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." II. Cor. xiii. 14: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all." In the baptismal formula, and in the apostolic benediction, there is a personal manifestation: the communion is personal, and could not be otherwise while equal honor is paid to each name in both places, indicating clearly a real internal distinction in the divine nature that the church calls the Trinity. Holding to this interpretation of God's word, Methodism condemns as error the doctrine taught by Sabellius, and current in a portion of the Society of Friends and among modern Unitarians, "that there is but one person manifesting himself in three offices or influences:" holding that this doctrine, that the Son and Holy Ghost are but powers or manifestations of God, preserves the divinity of Christ, and the Holy Ghost, but sacrifices their personality. Methodism holding, on the one hand, to the personal distinctness of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: on the other hand, holds to the unity of their substance and consubstantiality, and denies, as taught by Swedenborg, "that there are three essences in one Person, Jesus Christ," thus exalting the position of the Son, and sacrificing the personality of the Father and the Holy Ghost. It condemns, also, as error the doctrine of Arius, "that the Son and the Spirit are exalted creatures of God, accepting their personality but denying their divinity," teaching that "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God:" that "the Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us, (and we beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth."—John i. 1. 14. (See DIVINITY OF CHRIST.)

Troth, William J., was born at Vienna, Md., Oct. 3, 1813. In his nineteenth year, at Alexandria, Va., he was converted and joined the Methodist Protestant Church. In 1835 he came to the city of Pittsburgh, and has ever since been identified with the First Methodist church. During this period he has filled all the official relations of the church, and now occupies the position of secretary of the Board of Publication. He has been acquainted with the principles of government and history of the church from the beginning.

Troy, N. Y. (pop. 46,465), the capital of Rensselaer County, is situated on the west bank of the Hudson River. It was organized as a town in 1791, and received a charter in 1816. About 1788 Methodism was introduced into this region, then being a part of Cambridge circuit, Freeborn Garrettson being presiding elder and Samuel Smith the circuit preacher. When, in 1800, Michael Coates was stationed on the Pittsfield circuit, Troy belonged to that charge; and there was then a class of 30 members in the town. In 1809 and 1810 Troy was a regular appointment, Lansingburg being included in the charge. The first house, a wooden structure, was erected for public worship on State Street, at the corner of Fifth Street. This was succeeded by an edifice of brick, which was dedicated in 1827, and this in turn by the massive stone church of Gothic style erected in 1871. In 1828 a church was built at Albion, in the fifth ward of Troy. In 1831 the first M. E. church was built in West Troy. In 1834 North Second Street church was built, the property of the State Street society being equitably divided and church interests amicably adjusted. In 1847 Congress Street church was set off from State Street, and its first church building was dedicated in 1849. Lansingburg was separated from this charge probably in 1827. The African Zion M. E. Church has a society and owns a brick chapel, which was erected in 1866. The Troy University was established at this place, and built on Mount Ida, under the patronage of the M. E. Church; but owing to financial difficulties, and the location not meeting the views of other sections of the church interested in a university, it was suffered to be sold, and is now owned by the Roman Catholics. This city is in the Troy Conference, and its statistics are as follows:

Troy Conference Academy.—Troy Conference was organized in the year 1833. At its first session it was decided to establish a Conference Academy. Poultney, Vt., a quiet and rural village, then, as ever since, noted for its beauty, healthfulness, temperance, good order, and freedom from influences baneful to a school, was selected as the seat of the institution. The buildings were completed and opened for students in September, 1837. The school, however, was opened a year earlier, in a house that stood on the academy grounds, with Rev. Sabin S. Stocking as principal. From the first the number of students was large, and the school took a high stand. The academy has been very fortunate in its principals. They have been without exception men eminent in the church. Stocking was succeeded by Rev. Daniel Curry, D.D. The third principal was Rev. James Covell. The fourth, Jesse T. Peck, D.D., since bishop, who served from 1840 to 1848. His successor was Rev. J. Newman, D.D., who held the position till 1851, when he was called to a professorship in Union College. The next principals were Rev. Oran Faville and Rev. Jason O. Walker. Some of the subordinate teachers during this time were James Strong, S.T.D., Rev. E. Wentworth, D.D., Professor W. P. Codrington, Rev. R. H. Howard, Rev. George G. Saxe, and Rev. W. H. Poor. In 1855 the academy passed out of the hands of the Conference. A considerable portion of the cost of the buildings had never been paid, and though the debt had been somewhat reduced, enough remained to prove a great embarrassment to the trustees. To rid themselves of this burden they gave a perpetual lease of the property to Rev. Joshua Poor. From 1855 to 1873 the school was conducted as a private enterprise. In 1863, Mr. Poor sold his interest to Rev. J. Newman, D.D., who changed the school to one for ladies only, under the name of Ripley Female College. Convinced that the interests of education within its bounds demanded a school that should be conducted on broader principles than the private institutions they were compelled to patronize, the Conference, in 1874, bought back the property. The institution was re-chartered under the old name, Troy Conference Academy. The old buildings were refitted and furnished, and a large building erected for a gymnasium and art-rooms. It is the design of the trustees to make it a first-class college preparatory school, but four other complete courses are provided. Rev. M. E. Cady, A.M., was the first principal after the restoration. He held the position till 1877, when Rev. C. H. Duntun, A.M., succeeded him. Miss Mary E. Wetherwax is lady principal. The board of instruction numbers ten regular teachers, besides special lecturers. The number of students in attendance at present is 160. Starting free from debt and with the hearty support of the Conference, the prospects for the school's success could hardly be more flattering. An endowment fund of $50,000 is being raised. Rev. C. F. Burdick, the efficient agent, reports favorably on the prospect. (See cut on following page.)

Troy Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1832, and was taken chiefly from the New York Conference. It then embraced "the Saratoga, Middlebury, and Plattsburg districts, and that part of the Troy district not included in the New York Conference." As the population increased and the church grew additional districts were formed, and the Troy Conference embraced the northeastern part of the State of New York, with the western part of Vermont. In 1860 Burlington and St. Albans districts were taken from the Conference; but in 1868 Burlington district was restored. The General Conference of 1876 defined its boundaries to "include Troy, Albany, Saratoga, Plattsburg, and Cambridge districts, and Burlington district, in Vermont." It held its first session in connection with the New York Conference in 1832, and at the following Conference reported 66 traveling preachers and 18,492 members. In 1876 it reported 289 traveling and 152 local preachers, 37,363 members, 20,587 Sunday-school scholars, 306 churches, valued at $2,376,385, and 158 parsonages, valued at $349,600.

True, Charles K., D.D., Professor in the Wesleyan University from 1849 to 1860, was born in Portland, Me., Aug. 14, 1809. He was graduated from Harvard University in 1832. He began to preach in 1831, and joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1833. In 1834 he was agent of the New England Conference Missionary Education Society. He was the first principal of Amenia Seminary, in 1835, but shortly afterwards returned to the itinerant work of the church, in which he continued until 1849. In this year he was elected Professor of Moral and Intellectual Philosophy and the Belles-Lettres in Wesleyan University. He returned to the itinerant work of the church in 1860, preaching in the New York and New England Conferences, was appointed financial agent of Wesleyan University, and returned to pastoral work in 1874.

Protestant Church, was converted in his twenty-second year, and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. He passed through all the official relations of the church, from that of class-leader to traveling elder in the Pittsburgh Conference. During the late Civil War in this country, he served as chaplain in the Union army with the 1st Regiment West Virginia Cavalry. In 1869 he connected himself with the Methodist, now M. P. Church, and became a member of the Muskingum Annual Conference. He was elected as representative to the General Conference at Princeton, Ill., in 1875, a messenger to the United Brethren General Conference in 1877, and a delegate to the Union Convention at Baltimore, in May, 1877. He has been for years a contributor to periodical literature: has published a volume of poems, and various sermons, essays, addresses, etc., in pamphlet.

Trust Deeds are forms of conveyances of real estate specifying some trust for which the property is held. In Wesleyan Methodism in England all church property is held in trust according to the deed in chancery, which was prepared by Mr. Wesley, and which secures to that connection the vine worship for the use of the ministry and membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America: subject to the discipline, usage, and ministerial appointments of said church, as from time to time authorized and declared by the General Conference of said church and the Annual Conference of said church, and the Annual Conference within whose bounds the said premises are situate." And in all deeds for parsonage property the following trust is ordered: "In trust, that said premises shall be held, kept, and maintained as a place of residence for the use and occupancy of the preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America who may, from time to time, be stationed in said place; subject to the usage and discipline of said church, as from time to time authorized and declared by the General Conference of said church, and by the Annual Conference within whose bounds said premises are situate." These trusts are designed to prevent the alienation of the property by any change which may occur in the process of time from the purposes to which the contributors designed that their funds should be applied.

Trustees are church officers appointed for the purposes of holding the legal title to church property, and of taking care thereof. In the different branches of Methodism there are some differences of provision, but in general principles they are the same. In the Methodist Episcopal Church the Discipline says: "Each board of trustees of our church property shall consist of not less than three nor more than nine persons, each of whom shall be not less than twenty-one years of age, two-thirds of whom shall be members of the Methodist Episcopal Church." Where the church has not received a legal act of incorporation or charter, and where the law of the State does not specify any particular mode of election, "the trustees are elected annually by the fourth Quarterly Conference of the circuit or station upon the nomination of the preacher in charge, or the presiding elder of the district. In case of failure to elect at the proper time, a subsequent Quarterly Conference may elect; and all the trustees shall hold their office until their successors are elected. In all cases where the law of the State or Territory directs the mode of election, that mode must be strictly observed; and where charters of incorporation are obtained, they specify the particular qualifications and time of election of these officers." The trustees are directed by the Discipline "to make an annual report at the fourth Quarterly Conference of the amount and value of the property, the title by which it is held, the expenditures and liabilities, and the amounts of moneys which have been raised during the year for building or improvement." And they are held amenable to the Quarterly Conference for the manner in which they perform their official duty. The trustees have the charge of all repairs to be made on church property, and of all financial matters pertaining to its preservation. And in case it becomes necessary to sell the church property for the payment of debt, "after paying the debt and other expenses which are due from the money arising from such sale, shall pay the balance, if not needed and applied for the purchase or improvement of other property for the use of the church, to the Annual Conference within whose bounds such property is located; and in case of the re-organization of the said society, and the erection of a new church building within five years after such transfer of funds, then the said Annual Conference shall repay to said new corporation the moneys which it had received from the church or society as above mentioned." Before the trustees make any sale, either to pay debts or for reinvestment, they must obtain an order from the Quarterly Conference, a majority of all the members concurring, and the preacher in charge and presiding elder of the district consenting, with such limitations and restrictions as may be necessary.

Owing to a change of population or other causes, especially in country places, church property is sometimes abandoned, or can be no longer used for the purpose originally designed. It is then "the duty of the trustees, if any remain, to sell such property, and pay over the proceeds to the Annual Conference within whose bounds it is located." Trustees who are members of the church, and who are approved by the Quarterly Conference, are recognized as members of that body. Trustees of parsonage property are appointed in the same way, and perform the same general duties as those of churches. By the action of the General Conference of 1876 trustees are forbidden to "mortgage or encumber the real estate for the current expenses of the church."

Trustees, General Board of.—As many bequests which had been made to the M. E. Church were lost for want of clear designation, or because a special corporation was not in existence, or special trustees, the General Conference, in 1864, appointed a committee of seven to report a plan of trusteeship. The report of the committee was adopted, and is substantially the same as the section of the Discipline on that subject. Under that action the General Conference appointed a board, consisting of Bishop D. W. Clark, and Rev. Drs. J. M. Trimble, William Nast, Adam Poe, and William Young, with A. N. Randall, Esq., M. B. Hagens, T. H. Whitestone, and John Fudge as laymen, whose headquarters should be at Cincinnati, and who were instructed to secure corporate powers under the laws of the State of Ohio, with the title of "the Board of Trustees of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States." In 1868 the board reported that the charter had been obtained, and was recorded July 11, 1865. Since that period it has received a number of important bequests, some of which it holds under its own name, and others have been transferred to the various societies for the use of which the trusts were designated. The provisions of the Discipline are as follows:

"There shall be located at Cincinnati an incorporated board of trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church, composed of twelve members, six ministers and six laymen, appointed by the General Conference, of whom three of each class shall hold office four years, and three of each class eight years; all vacancies to be filled quadrennially by the General Conference. The duty of the board shall be to hold in trust, for the benefit of the Methodist Episcopal Church, any and all donations, bequests, grants, and funds in trust, etc., that may be given or conveyed to said board, or to the Methodist Episcopal Church, as such, for any benevolent object, and to administer the said funds, and the proceeds of the same, in accordance with the direction of the donors and of the interests of the church contemplated by said donors, under the direction of the General Conference; provided, that any sums thus donated or bequeathed, but not especially designated for any benevolent object, shall be appropriated to the Permanent Fund. When any such donation, bequest, grant, or trust, etc., is made to this board or to the church, it shall be the duty of the preacher in the bounds of whose charge it occurs to give an early notice thereof to the board, which shall proceed without delay to take possession of the same, according to the provisions of its charter. The board shall make a faithful report of its doings, and of the funds and property on hand, at each quadrennial session of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church."

Trustees' Meetings (English Wesleyan).—The office of trustee is one of great responsibility, and in Methodism dates from the settlement of the "preaching-houses" in Bristol, Kingswood, and Newcastle-upon-Tyne, in the year 1746. The several trust estates are held for the use and enjoyment of the Conference, subject to the rules and regulations of the connection. The trustees are required to meet at least once a year, when the stewards' accounts are examined and audited, and all matters relating to the trust premises brought under review. The treasurer and stewards for the year ensuing are then appointed. In reference to chapels settled on the "Model Deed," the superintendent and circuit stewards are, by an express provision of the "Deed," appointed auditors. At all meetings of the trustees, the superintendent of the circuit is ex officio the chairman. A united meeting of the treasurers and trustees of the several trust estates is to be held annually in every circuit, on some day fixed at the December quarterly meeting, when an abstract of the several treasurers' accounts must be examined and entered in a circuit book, to be kept by the circuit chapel secretary. All trustees of chapels situate in places named on the circuit plan, such trustees being members of society in the circuit, are members of the quarterly meeting. No trustee can be removed from the society unless his crime, or breach of rule, be proved to the satisfaction of a united meeting of trustees and leaders: namely, the leaders' meeting of the particular society of which he is a member, with the trustees of the chapel with which that society is connected; such trustees being members of the Methodist society.

Twombly, John Hanson, D.D., late president of the University of Wisconsin, was born in Rochester, N. H.; was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1843, and was in the same year engaged as a teacher in the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass., where he remained till 1840. He joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1844, and performed pastoral work in that Conference till 1866. During this period he served as chaplain of the Massachusetts House of Representatives, and as chairman of the school committee of Chelsea, Mass. In 1866 he was chosen superintendent of the public schools in Charlestown, Mass.: in 1868 he was made one of the directors of the American Institute of Instruction, and in 1871 was elected president of the University of Wisconsin. He retired from this position in 1873, and returned to pastoral work. He was a delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1860 and in 1864, and was twice elected one of the overseers of Harvard College.

U.

Uncles, Joseph, was born in Maryland, February, 1812, and died in Meadville, Pa., Nov. 12, 1858. Early in life he was apprenticed to a trade; but after his conversion purchased his time in order to procure an education. In 1834 he entered Alleghany College, and, working his own way, graduated with honor in 1838. For two years he acted as Professor of Moral Science in Madison College, at Uniontown, and subsequently as principal in an academy at Woodsfield, O., and at Meadville. He entered the Erie Conference in 1843, and for eleven years labored successfully. In 1854 he was prostrated by disease and placed on the superannuated list, in which he remained until his death. He was a man of fine education, of pure heart, of deep devotion, of more than ordinary eloquence, and of great usefulness.

Union American Methodist Episcopal Church is an organization founded by Rev. Peter Spencer, in Wilmington, Del., in June, 1813. It was composed of colored members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who seceded from it and established an independent congregation. Its original chartered title was "The African Union Church," which continued to be its title until after the Civil War, when the present name was adopted. Originally each church was served by ministers without compensation and without any limit as to the period of their ministry. Hence the societies were distinct from each other, though adopting common articles of religion, usages, and discipline. A convention was called in 1871, which modified the system so as to adopt an itinerant ministry, limiting the pastoral term to two years and permitting compensation. Each member of the church is expected to pay towards the support of the pastor $2.50 annually, and the compensation of the pastor depends upon the number of members in the church. A general superintendent is elected by the General Conference. He holds his term for four years, and is eligible to re-election. Each member of the church in the Conference he serves is expected to pay 50 cents for his support. At present there is one general superintendent, Rev. Edward Williams, and two sub-superintendents, Rev. John C. Ramsey and Rev. A. S. Stanford, D.D. Their doctrines are precisely those of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the general features of the government are also the same, having a General Conference meeting once in four years, Annual Conferences, of which there are now five, Quarterly Conferences, love-feasts, and class-meetings. They claim to be the first independent Methodist organization established among the colored people, as they were organized nearly three years prior to the African M. E. Church. Their statistics for 1876 are given as follows:

United Methodist Free Churches is the name adopted by an English branch of Methodism, which agrees with the parent body in doctrine and religious usages, but differs widely from it in church polity and government. The name was adopted in 1857, when the Wesleyan Methodist Association and the larger portion of Wesleyan Reformers amalgamated. A considerable section of Wesleyan Reformers declined to unite, and still exists under the name of the Wesleyan Reform Union.

The origin of the Methodist Free Church may be traced back to 1827, when great dissensions took place in Leeds in reference to the introduction of an organ into Brunswick chapel. John Wesley did not permit the use of organs in his chapels. "A bass viol, when required by the singer," was the extent of indulgence accorded by him to instruments of music. After his death a law was made permitting organs under certain circumstances. As it was thought that organs might be wanted in large chapels, the Conference determined that on the recommendation of district meetings consent might be given. On the erection of Brunswick chapel, in 1825, some of the trustees and seat-holders wished for the introduction of an organ. On the matter being mentioned in the leaders' meeting, the superintendent informed the leaders that this could not be done without their consent. By a majority of 60 to 1 the leaders gave it as their judgment that it was not desirable that an organ should be put in the chapel. The trustees by a majority determined to appeal to the district meeting. By a great majority the district meeting determined that no organ should be erected.

Here the opponents of the organ thought the matter would rest; as they read the law it could not go any further. The appeal, however, was carried to Conference, which reversed the decision of the district meeting, and determined to grant the application of the trustees. The opponents of the organ maintained that the Conference had violated its own law. They refused to recognize the validity of a district meeting which had been held during the sittings of the Conference, and which had recommended the erection of the organ. Violent heart-burnings and strife ensued. The secretary of the local preachers was suspended for calling a meeting without the consent of the superintendent. Sixty local preachers at once refused to preach during his suspension. One thousand members in Leeds alone became dissociated from Wesleyan Methodism. In other circuits the Leeds dissentients found sympathizers, and a connection was formed which adopted the name of Protestant Methodists. The circuits of this body were chiefly if not exclusively in Yorkshire. The principles maintained and adopted by it were substantially those now maintained by the United Methodist Free Churches. The Protestant Methodists had a separate existence until 1836, when they became merged in the new denomination formed in that year, known subsequently as the Wesleyan Methodist Association.

The immediate occasion of the formation of the Wesleyan Association was the determination of the Conference to establish a theological institution for the training of junior ministers. To such an establishment a number of the ministers and many of the people had a strong antipathy. With the present knowledge and experience of the benefits to Methodism of systematic ministerial training, we may marvel at the fears that good men entertained when the Conference proposal was broached. Such fears, however, were cherished. To many it seemed that the evils which must attend the opening of a Wesleyan theological institution would far outweigh any possible advantages, and they set themselves conscientiously against the proposal. "All is dark," wrote one of the objectors: "Methodism is ruined. I see in vision the fine, natural orator lost, and instead of a bold, hale, original, and powerful ministry, there is the refined sentimentality of some other denominations. . . . This leaves me miserable, . . . for the sake of the body which is to be cursed with a formal, systematized ministry."

There were other grounds of objection. The Conference of 1797, which agreed to what are known as the Leeds concessions, issued a circular, in which it was stated that no regulations would be finally confirmed till after a year's consideration, and the knowledge of the sentiments of the connection at large, through the medium of all their public officers. The Conference of 1834 resolved to establish the institution without asking the sentiments of the connection at large, and the dissentients regarded this as a breach of compact. The breach soon widened. In November, 1834, a "Grand Central Association" was formed, which demanded some moderate reforms. Revs. Dr. Warren, J. Averill, and R. Emmett were suspended, and at next Conference expelled. Many dissentients withdrew from the body, others were severed from it by disciplinary acts. The Wesleyan Conference met in Sheffield in 1835. A gathering of Reform delegates also assembled there. The Conference would not meet them. Secession was inevitable. The association which had been established for effecting certain changes in Wesleyanism assumed another form. The Reformers had to put themselves in position for church action. The Wesleyan Association was organized as a religious connection in 1836. The Protestant Methodists had acted with them from the first, now they became organically one. A small body which had been formed in the midland counties, called the Arminian Methodists, united in 1837. On some minute point of doctrine the leaders of this body were supposed to be in divergence from the living exponents of Methodist theology at the time. Practically they were Methodists of an active and vigorous type, and their severance from the original body was the result of some alleged insubordination.

The Wesleyan Methodist Association retained its separate identity till 1857, when, by uniting with the Wesleyan Reformers, it became merged in the United Methodist Free Churches. In 1849 the expulsion, by the Wesleyan Conference, of Revs. James Everett, Samuel Dunn, and William Griffith led to violent and unprecedented convulsions in the Wesleyan body. The policy of the leading men had been impugned in a series of anonymous pamphlets, entitled "Fly Sheets." These missives, which had no printer's name, were circulated among the ministers. A declaration was signed by the vast majority of the members setting forth their abhorrence of the "Fly Sheets," and characterizing their charges as false and slanderous. A small minority declined to sign this declaration, and resisted all solicitations addressed to them for this end. The three ministers named were among the non-signers. Each of them was asked, "Are you the author of the 'Fly Sheets'?" and declined to answer the question. They were expelled for contumacy. They found many sympathizers. A Reform committee was formed, which continued its labors for a number of years. Lecturers were engaged, meetings were held in almost every town. The three expelled ministers were in journeyings oft. Rev. James Bromley and Rev. Thomas Rowland, who were subsequently expelled on a similar ground, joined the movement. For years the Wesleyan body was in agitation. The object of the Reformers was to popularize the constitution of Methodism. At first their proposals were very moderate, but they gradually assumed a wider range. It was not the intention of the Reformers to secede. One of their mottoes was, "No secession." As years proceeded and no agreement was reached, secession became inevitable. It became necessary to engage ministers, erect chapels, appoint class-leaders, publish a hymn-book, and perform all acts essential to church-life and characteristic of it. There was, however, a strong desire to avoid establishing a new Methodist denomination. Attention was directed to the Wesleyan Methodist Association, and on inquiry it was found that the principles of the Reformers and of the Association were identical. After much consultation a formal union was determined on, and in due time it became an accomplished fact. The first joint Assembly of the two bodies was held in 1857, in the town of Rochdale, and there the name was chosen by which the body is now known, United Methodist Free Churches.

This body is the third in numerical importance of English Methodist denominations, the two which take precedence of it being the Wesleyan Methodists and the Primitive Methodists. It has its seat chiefly in England. Only three of its circuits are found in Scotland, and it has no footing in Ireland. It has missions in other lands. Its stations are Jamaica, Victoria, and Queensland, New Zealand, Eastern Africa, Western Africa, and China.

The constitution of the body is democratic. Neither minister nor layman sits ex officio in its supreme court. The members of its Annual Assembly are freely chosen representatives. There are only four persons admitted on another principle. The principal officers of the preceding Assembly form a connecting link between the Assemblies of two consecutive years. The Annual Assembly does not regulate the internal affairs of circuits. Except on matters of connectional import, each circuit is independent. (See ANNUAL ASSEMBLY.)

The home circuits are divided into districts. The district meetings do not in this connection wield any important functions. The connectional machinery is arranged to go without them. They are of service nevertheless. (See DISTRICT MEETINGS.)

The various schemes, funds, and institutions of the body are committed during the year to various committees. For the most part these committees are elected annually. It is so with the connectional committee (which may be regarded as the executive of the body), with the foreign missionary committee, the Chapel Fund committee, the Superannuation Fund committee, and the Book Room committee. Ashville College is governed by a body of trustees elected for life, and a committee of six elected for three years, but so arranged that two retire each year. (See ASHVILLE COLLEGE.) The Theological Institute is governed by a body of trustees elected for life, and nine others chosen annually. On all these committees, with the exception of the Book Room committee, which is chosen from the London district, the four connectional officers for the time being have a seat. These officers are the president, the connectional secretary, the connectional treasurer, and the corresponding secretary.

The United Methodist Free Churches have made considerable progress since the formation of the body in 1857. In that year the numerical report stood as follows: itinerant preachers, 110; local preachers, 1538; leaders, 1866; members, 39,986; members on trial, 2152. The returns made to the Annual Assembly of 1877 were as follows: itinerant ministers, 405; local preachers, 3501; leaders, 4439; members, 72,997; members on trial, 6984. In 1857 there were in connection with the body 493 Sunday-schools, having 10,025 teachers and 67,025 scholars. In 1877 there were 1305 Sunday-schools, with 26,205 teachers and 183,364 scholars. In 1857 the connection owned or occupied 769 places of worship. In 1877 the number of chapels and preaching-rooms amounted to 1539. As the Wesleyan Reformers had no foreign missions nothing comparatively was done by them in raising missionary moneys till after the amalgamation, in 1857. The amount raised by the United Methodist Free Churches for home and foreign missions for 1858, including foreign local contributions, was £7192.8.6. The income from the same sources, in 1877, was £17,787.11.8½.

The Superannuation and Beneficent Fund has been established. Its capital is now £23,427.5.10. Ashville College has been opened. A theological institute has been established. A Home Mission Chapel Extension Fund has been raised, and about £10,000 raised as a Chapel Loan Fund.

United States of America. The, were originally colonies belonging to Great Britain, and were settled at different periods as separate provinces.

The population being of different nationalities and of various religious preferences and political institutions, an early union of these colonies was very difficult. But in 1765 the general opposition to the Stamp Act led to a Congress of Delegates from nine of the colonies for the purpose of resisting taxation by Parliament; and owing to their vigorous remonstrance the obnoxious law was repealed in 1766. Oppressive duties, however, were assessed on various articles, and the excitement arising from the throwing overboard the cargo of tea in the Boston harbor in 1773 united the colonies for self-defense. Their first object was not independence, but the resisting of taxation without representation. As the conflict, however, proceeded, independence was declared July 4, 1776, and the war continued vigorously until 1781, when the defeat of the British at Cowpens, S. C., and the surrender of Lord Cornwallis virtually ended the war. In 1782 a preliminary treaty of peace was signed, but the definitive treaty was not concluded until Sept. 3, 1783. Methodism was introduced into America in the midst of these conflicts. Its first society was organized in New York, the year of the repeal of the obnoxious stamp law; and it grew amidst the excitements preceeding the Declaration of Independence. Its ministers were chiefly from England, and sympathizing with the mother-country, all of them excepting Bishop Asbury returned to England; he was compelled to remain in comparative retirement in Delaware for nearly two years. Yet in the midst of these excitements, and without a ministry from abroad, young men were raised up who went forth preaching the gospel and organizing societies, so that in 1784 there were 83 preachers and upwards of 14,000 members. The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized as an independent body at the close of 1784, and in 1789 was the first to send an address of congratulation to General Washington after his introduction into the office of first President of the United States. From a small beginning, amidst other churches more ancient and more strongly established, it has spread through every State, and into every Territory, except Alaska. At different periods secessions and separations have taken place which have led to the establishment of various forms of Methodism. In 1816, the African M. E. Church was organized; in 1820, the African Zion M. E. Church; in 1828, the Methodist Associate Churches, subsequently the Methodist Protestant Church; in 1842, the Wesleyan Methodist; in 1845, the Methodist Episcopal Church South; and in 1859, the Free Methodist Church. The governmental census of 1870, as well as the ecclesiastical reports of the different churches, show that the membership in these various forms of Methodism is more numerous than those of any other denomination, and that the Methodist Episepiscopal Church, as an organized body, ranks first in the number of its communicants. The various branches of Methodism in the United States reported in 1876 are as follows:

Universities.—See COLLEGES and EDUCATION.

University of the Pacific is located in Santa Clara Co., Cal., midway between Santa Clara and San José, and a mile and a half from either city. It was chartered in the year 1851 as the California Wesleyan College, and re-incorporated in 1855 as the University of the Pacific. The preparatory department was opened in May, 1852, by the Rev. E. Bannister, D.D., as principal. Near the close of the same year the Female Institute was organized as a department of the university. In the year 1869 the College and Female Institute were consolidated, and ladies were admitted to the same courses of study as gentlemen, and allowed to compete for the same honors and degrees. In 1870 the institution was removed from the town of Santa Clara to the new, pleasant, and commodious buildings which it now occupies. Besides the principal building, a large and elegant hall has been erected for the accommodation of lady students, and a similar one has been projected for gentlemen. The college campus contains about 16 acres, neatly improved with walks and drives, and abounding in shrubbery and trees. The first regular college classes were formed in 1854, and in 1858 two young men received the degree of A.B., and were the first to receive that honor from any college in the State. The assets of the institution in buildings, grounds, libraries, apparatus, cabinet, etc., are, above all liabilities, about $60,000. The University Endowment Fund, in the possession of the California Annual Conference, in cash and notes, amounts to about $40,000. The number of students is steadily increasing from year to year, and the institution was never more prosperous than at the present time. The presidents have been Rev. E. Bannister, D.D. (1851-54), Rev. M. C. Briggs, D.D. (1854-56), Rev. J. W. Mackay, A.M. (1856-57), Rev. A. S. Gibbons, A.M., M.D. (1857-60), Rev. E. Bannister, D.D. (1860-67), Rev. T. H. Sinex, D.D. (1867-72), and Rev. A. S. Gibbons, A.M., M.D., the present incumbent.

Upham, Frederick, a delegate to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1832, 1840, 1844, and 1872, joined the New England Conference in 1821, and has served continuously in itinerant work as pastor or presiding elder. He preached a semi-centennial sermon before the Providence Conference at its session in 1871, in commemoration of the completion of his fiftieth year of service in the ministry.

Upper Canada Academy was the first Methodist literary institution established in the British North American provinces. The Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canada, in 1829, appointed a committee to collect information and to report on the subject of a seminary of learning. In the following year proposals were made for furnishing a site for the projected institution from Brockville, Kingston, Belleville, Cobourg, York, and other places. A committee, consisting of three ministers, was chosen by ballot from each of the three presiding elders' districts then constituting the church, viz., John and William Ryerson, and Messrs. Whitehead, Belton, Beattie, Madden, Brown, and Richardson. After full examination, Cobourg was selected, where four acres of land were presented by Mr. George B. Spencer; and it was selected because it was central, was a large town, and was accessible by land and water. Rev. John Beattie was appointed an agent to solicit subscriptions, and in 1832 Cyrus R. Allison was appointed as an additional agent. Nearly $30,000 were pledged, and the erection of the building was commenced, but the edifice was not completed or the seminary opened until after the organic union between the Methodists in Canada and the British connection had taken place. The institution was opened in 1836, under the principalship of Rev. Matthew Ritchie, M.A. The buildings were of brick, but afterwards stuccoed, and consisted of a main building 130 feet long and 40 feet wide, with a wing at each end 24 feet wide and extending nearly beyond the main building, forming three sides of a quadrangle looking northward, and surmounted by a gallery facing in the same direction. The building was three stories high, besides the basement, and cost originally about $40,000. It was a purely literary institution, under a religious supervision, for the education of both sexes, lady pupils being taught in classes by themselves under teachers and a preceptress of their own sex. Miss Rogers was the first who ever filled that office, and Miss Poulter, who had been a teacher in the institution, succeeded Miss Rogers. The charter of the institution was a royal one, obtained in England by Egerton Ryerson in 1836, as the party then in power in Canada were not favorable to the Wesleyan Conference. Though not a theological institute, it was the theatre of several gracious revivals, and gave a liberal training to several pious young men who afterwards became eminent in the church. This embraced in the Iowa Conference. By reason of the subsequent formation of the Des Moines and Northwest Iowa Conferences the boundaries of this Conference have frequently been changed. As determined by the General Conference of 1876, they are as follows: "Beginning at the northeast corner of the State of Iowa; thence down the Mississippi River to Davenport; thence west on the north line of the Iowa Conference to the southeast corner of Story County; thence north to the State line, so as to include Iowa Falls; thence east on said line to the place of beginning." It held its first session at Maquoketa, Iowa, Aug. 27, 1856, Bishop Jones presiding. It reported 85 traveling and 129 local preachers, and 10,105 members. The report in 1876 was: 183 traveling and 190 local preachers, 20,384 members, 286 Sunday-schools and 2087 scholars, 212 churches, valued at $447,050, 100 parsonages, valued at $110,350. It has in its bounds Cornell College, at Mt. Vernon, Upper Iowa University, at Fayette, and a seminary at Epworth.

Upper Iowa University is located at Fayette, Iowa, and is under the patronage of the Upper Iowa Conference. As early as 1854 some of the citizens of Fayette took incipient measures for the erection of an institution, and in 1855, through the liberality of S. H. Roberts and Robert Alexander, the enterprise was commenced, and the first story of the present college building was erected. In the latter part of the same year the building and

Since that period the position has been filled successively by Rev. C. N. Stowers, M.A., B. W. McLain, Ph.D., Rev. R. Norton, M.A., and Rev. J. W. Bissel, M.A., the present incumbent. Mr. Bissel, during his first year in the institution, was Professor of Natural Science, and the following year was elected unanimously to the presidency. A commercial department was organized in 1867 for giving a business education, and among other grounds, under the title of Fayette Seminary, were tendered to the Iowa Conference of the M. E. Church, which accepted the proffer and appointed a board of trustees. The first term of instruction commenced Jan. 1, 1857, with Rev. William Poor, A.M., of New York, as principal. Towards the close of the same year Rev. L. H. Bugbee, D.D., now president of the Alleghany College, was elected principal, and the collegiate organization was effected. In 1860 a charter was granted by the legislature of Iowa conferring collegiate rights and powers. In 1860 Dr. Bugbee retired from the presidency, and was succeeded by Rev. William Brush, D.D., who remained in the office until 1869.

departments telegraphy has been added. For many years the university labored under financial embarrassment, and, though its endowment is not large, it is now prosperous.

Upton, Thomas J., was born in the city of Columbus, Ga., on the 18th of May, 1830; was converted in 1848, and in 1857 was admitted into the Louisiana Annual Conference, M. E. Church South. After filling a number of appointments he acted as agent and financial secretary of Homer College from 1871 to 1874. He has been successful as a pastor and agent, and is a member of the Louisiana Conference.

Urbana, O. (pop. 4276), is the capital of Cham-paig County, and is a pleasant and prosperous place. Methodism was introduced in 1807, by the pioneer ministers who traveled through Ohio. The first church edifice was erected in 1809. It was rebuilt in 1818, and again in 1836. The Second M. E. church was organized in 1854, and the building was erected in 1855. The African M. E. church was built about 1824. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Utah Conference, M. E. Church.—The General Conference of 1876 authorized the Rocky Mountain Conference to divide its territory during the next four years whenever two-thirds of the members present should ask for such division. At its session in July, 1876, it requested such a division almost unanimously, on account of the difficulty and expense of traveling to Conference. Bishop Wiley held the first session of the Utah Conference at Salt Lake City, Aug. 10, 1877. Erastus Smith was elected secretary, T. C. Biff was made presiding elder of the only district formed. The statistics show 9 traveling and 2 local preachers, 155 members, 725 Sunday-school scholars, 9 churches, valued at $70,000, and 3 parsonages, valued at $3500. J. McEldowney was appointed principal of Rocky Mountain Seminary.

Utah Territory (pop. 86,786) derives its name from a tribe of Indians called Uta or Utes. Its area is about 84,476 square miles. It was created out of the territory acquired from Mexico by the treaty of 1848, though its original limits have been reduced by the organization of the State of Nevada, and of the Wyoming Territory. The first American settlers were Brigham Young and his friends, who arrived July 24, 1847, from Nauvoo, Ill., whence they had been expelled. In May, 1848, the main body of the Mormons started for Utah, and arrived at Great Salt Lake in the autumn. Salt Lake City was founded shortly afterwards, an emigration union was established, and large numbers of persons were induced to emigrate from Great Britain and Wales. Others came from Sweden and Norway, and a few from Germany, Switzerland, and France. In 1849 a convention at Salt Lake City organized the Territory under the name of Deseret, a word which is said to mean the Land of the Honey Bee. A legislature was elected, a constitution framed, and application was made to Congress for admission as a State, but the application was refused. The Territory of Utah was organized, and President Fillmore appointed Brigham Young as governor. In 1850 the federal officers were threatened with violence and left the State. Brigham Young was removed from the governorship, and Colonel Steptoe was appointed in his place. Finding the excitement great, though he arrived in 1854 with a battalion of soldiers, he declined to assume the office, and resigning the position removed with his troops to California. In a sermon preached on the Sabbath after his departure Brigham Young said, "I am and will be governor, and no power can hinder it, until the Lord Almighty says, 'Brigham! you need not be governor any longer.'" In 1856 an armed mob of Mormons broke into the United States court-room, and with threats and weapons compelled Judge Drummond to adjourn his court sine die; and the United States officers, except the Indian-agent, fled from the Territory. A military force was sent to the Territory, a governor appointed, and a chief justice. The approach of this army was resisted; they took the supply-train, and drove off a large supply of cattle. The governor declared the Territory in rebellion, but in the following year the Mormons submitted to federal authority. Frequent troubles, however, ensued, among which the most terrible was that of the Mountain Meadow massacre, in 1857, the authorship of which was only recently brought fully to light, and which led to the execution of Bishop Lee in 1877. Polygamy exists under the sanction of the Mormon religion, and, though forbidden by the laws of the United States, the Mormons have thus far refused to obey. Methodist services were introduced into Salt Lake City by Rev. G. M. Pierce, in 1865. Churches have been built at a few of the prominent places, and Sunday-schools have been established. The Utah Conference is embraced chiefly within its limits, and reports 9 traveling and 2 local preachers, 155 members, 725 Sunday-school scholars, 9 churches, valued at $70,100, and 3 parsonages, valued at $3500. The difficulties interposed by the Mormons against the spread of evangelical churches are almost insurmountable. The denominational statistics, as given in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

Utica, N. Y. (pop. 28,804), the capital of Oneida County, is situated near the Mohawk River, on the New York Central Railroad. It is said that Freeborn Garrettson, when presiding elder of the Albany district, near the close of the last century, preached the first Methodist sermon in this vicinity. The services were held in a private dwelling, which was two miles from the present site of Utica, but which has long since passed away. In 1803, Rev. Mr. Colbert, presiding elder of Albany district, passed through Utica, and speaks of it as "a small village on the south side of the Mohawk." He dined with Robert Stewart. In July, 1809, Bishop Asbury passed through the city, and records, "This is a flourishing place, and we shall soon have a meeting-house here." It was formerly embraced in the Oneida circuit, and was afterwards connected with various appointments. It first appears as a circuit by name in 1812, with Seth Mattison as pastor, who reported the following year 423 members. The circuit was divided in 1815,—Benjamin G. Paddock had charge, and reported 120 members. In 1819 it became a station, reporting 82 members, with Elias Bowen in charge. With the growth of the population the church continued to increase.

About 1840 it became greatly agitated on the subject of slavery, and a convention was held in Utica, which, among other agencies, led to the formation of the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and for a number of years the growth of the M. E. Church was retarded. Since that period its increase has been more rapid. It is in the Northern New York Conference, and reports for 1876 as follows:

Vail, Stephen Montfort, D.D., was born in Union Vale, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Jan. 15, 1818, and entered the Oneida Conference Seminary in June, 1832. After remaining two years in that institution, he went to Bowdoin College, whence he was graduated in 1838. He was afterwards teacher of Languages for one year in Amenia Seminary, then attended the Union Theological Seminary, New York City, and he was graduated thence in 1842. He joined the New York Conference in 1842, and performed pastoral work till 1847, when he became principal of the New Jersey Conference Seminary. In July, 1849, he was elected Professor of Hebrew and Biblical Literature in the theological school at Concord, N. H., which has since been removed to Boston and incorporated with Boston University. He continued in this position for nineteen years, till his health failed. After a year of rest, he was appointed consul for the United States in Rhenish Bavaria. He made an extensive tour in the East, and returned to the United States, after more than four years of absence. Since his return he has lived in retirement on his farm on Staten Island, N. Y., writing frequently for the press. He is the author of works on "Ministerial Education" and "The Bible against Slavery," and of many sermons and addresses published between 1842 and 1870, and has contributed numerous articles to the Methodist Quarterly Review, Zion's Herald, and other periodicals of the church.

Van Arsdale, Melville, a minister of the M. E. Church, was born in Montgomery Co., Ind., March 21, 1845, and died at Thorntown, Dec. 25, 1875. He was converted in the fourteenth year of his age, when he was a student in Thorntown Academy. He entered the service of his country as a soldier during the Civil War; was honorably discharged when it closed. He was admitted on trial in the Upper Iowa Conference in 1867, and traveled successively Buffalo Grove, Winthrop, and Strawberry Point circuits. He was transferred to the Northwest Indiana Conference, where, his health failing, he returned to Thorntown, and died in peace, saying, "All is well."

Van Benschoten, James C., A.M., professor in Wesleyan University, was born at La Grange, N. Y., December 15, 1827. He entered Geneva College, Lima, N. Y., in 1850. In 1855 he was teacher of Ancient Languages in Oxford College Institute, N. Y.; in 1856, teacher in the same department in the Susquehanna Seminary, Binghamton, N. Y.; in 1857, principal of the Oxford College Institute, N. Y.; in 1862, principal of the High School at Lyons, N. Y.; in 1863, teacher of Ancient Languages in the Oneida Conference Seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y.; and in 1864 he was chosen Professor of the Greek Language and Literature, and Instructor in Modern Languages, in Wesleyan University.

Vance, George, is an influential member of the Irish Conference, which he entered in 1835. He has been stationed in the principal circuits for many years, and as "chairman of district" and "delegate" has served Irish Methodism well. He is a profound student, and in the department of "ecclesiastical history" has made many valuable contributions. He became a supernumerary at the last Conference, and it is hoped that the leisure now afforded may result in his giving still more permanent form to his researches and views.

Vance, James M., a member of the Louisiana Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Nashville in 1826, in slavery. Converted in 1838, he entered the ministry of the African Methodist Episcopal Conference in 1853. He was received into the Louisiana Conference of the M. E. Church in 1866, and was for several years presiding elder in that Conference.

Van Cleve, J., was born in Shrewsbury, N. J., May 28, 1804, and died in 1876. He was converted in Cincinnati while an apprentice, in 1822, and soon after united with the "Stone Church" in Cincinnati. In 1825 he was licensed to preach. He was admitted on trial in the Illinois Conference, Oct. 9, 1828, and was appointed to Bloomington circuit. He spent on circuits and stations thirty-four years, and on districts fifteen years. He was elected delegate to the General Conference four times, and at the time of his death was a member of the general missionary committee. In all these relations he was faithful and efficient. By his own persistent effort he attained to very respectable scholarship. He was a methodical and earnest preacher. At the Conference preceding his death he was appointed to preach a centennial sermon, it being the semi-centennial of his itinerant ministry, but he was called to his reward before the time came for its delivery. He died in New York while attending the meeting of the missionary committee.

Van Cott, Mrs. Margaret, was born in the city of New York, March 25, 1830. Her father was William K. Newton, an Englishman and an Episcopalian, and she was, at the age of eleven years, confirmed at the church of the Epiphany. During her girlhood her home was for four years so near the M. E. church, at the corner of McEwen and Grand Streets, Williamsburg, that she could hear the singing and prayers. She longed to attend these services, but was not permitted to do so by her mother. She was married, in 1847, to Peter Van Cott, and her first affliction came in the death of her only daughter. A second child was born to them; but her husband's health failing she felt obliged, in various ways, to sustain and continue the business by which he had supported his family. She was enabled to do this by great industry, and it was in the midst of her heaviest burdens of care and sorrow that she made that surrender of herself to God that made his will ever after her guiding purpose. She began to attend the prayer-meetings of the Duane Street M. E. church, and was persuaded to attend a class-meeting to aid in the singing, but consented to go only on the promise of the leader that she should not be asked to speak. She did speak, however, and began there her public utterance of testimony to God's grace. After becoming a member of this church she became interested in meetings at one of the city mission stations at the Five Points. She held meetings here assisting the missionary, and also at intervals for twenty months, at the corner of Leonard and Baxter Streets, where her audiences were mostly colored people. Then in 1866, while on a visit to Durham, Greene Co., N. Y., she was invited to speak in the schoolhouse. This meeting was the beginning of a series, resulting in many conversions, and it was the beginning also of a public work, which since then has extended to almost every State in the Union. In 1868 she gave up all other business and devoted herself entirely to the work of winning souls. As a result of her first year as an itinerant evangelist, she numbered 500 persons received into various churches. Her method is to respond to the invitation of churches to aid in revival meetings, and during her visits she often preaches every night in the week and twice on the Sabbath. In the afternoons she conducts promise and praise meetings, silent meetings, prayer and fasting meetings, mothers' meetings, young converts' meetings, etc.

Vanderbilt University is located at Nashville, Tenn. It was founded in 1872, and was called the Central University of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. The following year it received a donation from Cornelius Vanderbilt, Esq., of New York, of half a million, which he subsequently increased to one million of dollars. He directed that of this sum $600,000 should be permanently invested for an endowment fund, and that Bishop McTycire should be president of the board of trustees, and its organization should be directed by him. The corner-stone of the edifice was laid April 24, 1874, in a campus of 75 acres of land, which had been purchased for the university, and the institution was opened Oct. 4, 1875. L. C. Garland, LL.D., was elected chancellor, and Rev. Dr. T. O. Summers, who is editor of The Christian Advocate, at Nashville, was chosen as dean of the theological faculty, and is ex-officio vice-chancellor. The institution has four departments,—theology, law, medicine, and philosophy, embracing science and literature. The faculties of medicine and philosophy have each eleven professors. There are several courses of study which are elective, and the collections for library apparatus and cabinets are quite valuable. Tuition is given free to theological students. The institution has already taken high rank. During the first academic year there were in attendance about 300 students. (See cut on following page.)

Vanhorne, Richard, of the New Jersey Conference of the M. E. Church, was born in Bergen Co., N. J., Oct. 20, 1819. He was converted in 1837, and joined the New Jersey Conference in 1842, having traveled the previous year under the presiding elder. In 1856 he became, by division of the territory, a member of the Newark Conference. He has filled a number of important appointments in Trenton, Elizabeth, Orange, Paterson, Hackettstown, Jersey City, and Newark. Since 1872 he has been presiding elder in the Jersey City and Newark districts.

Vannote, Jonathan, was born in Monmouth

Co., N. J., Sept. 3, 1838. He was converted at the early age of fifteen; was educated at Pennington Seminary, N. J., and entered the New Jersey Conference in 1857. He served at Pennington, Marlton, New Egypt, Front Street, Trenton, and organized the Central church of that city. He was appointed superintendent of the M. E. mission press in China, but sickness prevented him from going. Afterwards he assumed the editorial charge of the Trenton State

Md., Jan. 6, 1863. Blessed with good educational advantages, he consecrated himself to God in his youth. In 1830 he joined the Maryland Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, and soon advanced to great usefulness and popularity as a preacher; filling all the prominent appointments of the Conference. In 1848-49 he was president of the Conference, and in 1850-52 he served Sixth Street station in Cincinnati. He was a represen-

Gazette, and continued four years, when he removed to Pittsburgh, and is now editor of the Pittsburgh Commercial Gazette. He holds a supernumerary relation in the New Jersey Conference.

Van Vleck, John Monroe, professor in Wesleyan University, was born at Stone Ridge, Ulster Co., N. Y., March 4, 1823, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1850. In the same year he was appointed teacher of Mathematics in the Providence Conference Seminary, and also an assistant in the office of the Nautical Almanac, at Cambridge, Mass. In 1853 he was elected Adjunct Professor of Mathematics in Wesleyan University, and in 1858 Professor of Mathematics and Astronomy in the same institution, which last position he still retains.

Varden, Josiah, of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Washington, D. C., July 25, 1806, and died a peaceful death in Leonardtown, tative in the General Conferences of 1846, 1850, 1854, and 1858. As a preacher, he selected peculiar and striking topics and texts; dwelt much on the scenery of the Bible; had gorgeous rhetoric and a flowing elocution, and audiences were charmed under his ministrations. He was a useful minister, deeply devoted to the cause of Christ.

Vasey, Thomas, was endowed with superior mental powers, and spent thirty-two years in the active work of the ministry. As a preacher he was noted for great earnestness; he did not preach "about Christianity," but "Christ," and the freeness and fullness of the salvation of the gospel. Mr. Vasey was a great sufferer,—just when the suffrages of his brethren would have placed him in the chair of the Conference he was compelled to retire, and he shortly after died, aged fifty-seven.

Vermont (pop. 330,551) was first discovered in 1609, by Champlain and other French officers. The first white settlement was made in 1724, at the present city of Brattleboro'. For many years there was a contest with the State of New York as to part of its territory. It was admitted into the Union in 1790. Methodism was introduced in the western part of the State from the adjoining portion of New York. In 1788 there were but two preachers on extensive circuits in the vicinity. Cambridge and Lake Champlain, in charge of Lemuel Smith and Samuel Wigton. In 1788, Mr. Garrettson was presiding elder of a district extending from Rochelle, N. Y., to Lake Champlain, and visited some portion of this territory. A local authority says that Wigton and Smith came to Hampton, Washington Co., N. Y., and called at the house of Mr. Samuel Bibbins and opened to him their mission. They were made welcome to the hospitalities of his house, and permitted to preach. Bibbins declared that he had in a dream seen these two men, and he knew them as soon as he saw them. His family was awakened and converted; a class was formed, and his house became the preachers' home. From this point the work spread into Vermont. In 1793, Thomas Ware succeeded Garrettson on the district, and his work embraced a portion of Vermont. In 1794 Methodism was introduced into Vermont from New Hampshire, and also from Massachusetts. Joshua Hall was sent as missionary under George Roberts, who was then presiding elder in Massachusetts. In 1795, Thomas Cooper was appointed to Orange circuit, known the following year as Vershire. In that year Vermont appears in the statistical report with Vershire as its only appointment. Jesse Lee says, "This circuit was the first formed in the State of Vermont. We had been preaching in that town and in many of the bordering towns some time before that, but had no society formed. We had some societies in the State which belonged to circuits of other States, but Vershire was the first circuit formed within the State. It extended from the towns near Connecticut River to Montpelier, and to the mouth of Onion River, which runs into Lake Champlain. Many places where we preached on that circuit were quite new settlements. The houses were very small, and but scattering through the country. The preachers had to encounter many difficulties and to endure many hardships; but one thing which made up for all the difficulties was this: the people were fond of attending meetings by day or night, and were very kind to the preachers; and the best of all was, sinners were soon awakened, and in a little time some of them became the happy subjects of the favor of God, and were zealously engaged in trying to help forward the word of the Lord as far as they could. Since then we have prospered considerably in this new part of the country." In 1798 Vergennes circuit was reported with 186 members.

In 1800 the State reported 1096 members, with the following circuits: Essex, Landaff, Vergennes, Vershire, Weathersfield, and Whitingham. In 1810 there was a Vermont district in the New England Conference, which reported 1877 members. The State now embraces the Vermont Conference, numbering 129 traveling and 81 local preachers, 13,239 members, 13,794 Sunday-school scholars, 120 churches, valued at $439,725, and 86 parsonages, valued at $132,950. In addition to this the Burlington district lies chiefly within the State of Vermont, and has 3514 members, 3527 Sabbath-school scholars, 36 churches, valued at $307,200, and 28 parsonages, valued at $49,400. The Newbury Seminary was for many years a flourishing institution under the patronage of the Vermont Conference, and a large number of ministers were educated there, who have added strength and influence to the church. Within a few years, however, it has ceased to be held as a seminary by the church, and the interests of the Conference are concentrated on a new seminary at Montpelier, which is doing effective service in the cause of education. A local Methodist paper, The Vermont Messenger, was also for many years published within its bounds. Methodism in point of numbers stands only second to Congregationalism in this State. The denominational statistics, as given in the United States census for 1870, are as follows:

Vermont Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1844. Its boundaries were defined to include the State of Vermont, except that part lying west of the top of the Green Mountains, which was then embraced in the Troy Conference. Previous to this time the territory organized into the Vermont Conference had belonged to the New Hampshire Conference. The members of the Vermont Conference finding the territory too small for effective work, in 1856 the General Conference gave permission to reunite it to the New Hampshire Conference, but the measure did not receive a majority of the votes of the Conferences, and they have remained separate. In 1860 the boundaries were changed so as to include the entire State, except some of the appointments embraced in the Troy and Poulney districts of the Troy Conference; but the members in the Burlington district being dissatisfied, the lines were so changed as to permit the Burlington district to be in the Troy Conference, while St. Alban's remained in the Vermont Conference. The Conference now embraces the entire State except the Burlington district. Its first session was held June 18, 1845, when it reported 9010 members. In 1876 its statistics were as follows: 129 traveling and 81 local preachers, 13,239 members, 13,794 Sunday-school scholars, 120 churches, valued at $439,725, and 86 parsonages, valued at $132,950.

Vermont Seminary and Female College is situated at Montpelier, the capital of the State of Vermont, and is located on a beautiful plateau overlooking the village, within easy walking distance of the depot, post-office, and churches. The location is unsurpassed for healthfulness, beauty of surroundings, and general convenience of access. It is under the control of a board of trustees, and under the patronage of the Vermont Annual Conference of the M. E. Church, but its character is broad and liberal. The faculty consists of Rev. Lorenzo White, A.M., principal, and Professor of English Language and Metaphysics, assisted by a corps of able teachers, both gentlemen and ladies. The new seminary edifice is one of the finest academic buildings in the State. The boarding-house is 140 feet front, with two wings of 80 feet each, the whole being two and one-half stories high. It will accommodate, in addition to the steward's family and teachers, 140 students, who are thus under the immediate care of the teachers.

Verner, James, of Pittsburgh, Pa., was born in Ireland in 1778, and died in Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1849. He had been for many years a member of the M. E. Church, and occupied the positions of steward and trustee. In the controversy which issued in the formation of the M. P. Church, he was one of the few leading members who remained attached to the old organization. He took a deep interest in the erection of the Liberty Street church, both personally and by his contributions. A few years before his death he retired from active business, and resided part of the time on a farm about 10 miles from the city. He was esteemed in business circles, and was devoted to all the interests of the church.

Vernon, Leroy M., D.D., was born in Montgomery Co., Ind., April 23, 1838, and was converted in his eighteenth year. He was educated at the Iowa Wesleyan University, where he graduated in 1860. He entered the ministry the same year, and among his chief appointments were Simpson chapel, St. Louis, the presiding eldership of Springfield district, and Sedalia. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1868, and was appointed a member of the general book committee for four years. He assisted his father-in-law, the distinguished Rev. Dr. Charles Elliott, in the preparation of his later works. In 1871 he was sent to Italy as superintendent, to organize the mission work of the Methodist Episcopal Church in that country, where he has since remained (1878), and has been instrumental in erecting a church in Rome, and in establishing stations in various parts of Italy.

Versailles, Ky. (pop. 3268), is the capital of Woodford County, 10 miles from Frankfort. It is in the Kentucky Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Veto Power is given in many forms of government to the crown, president, governor, or mayor to prevent what may be considered hasty or injurious legislation in kingdoms, states, or municipalities. Generally, after such veto, it requires a vote of two-thirds of the legislative body to enact the proposed measure. In some bodies, however, only a majority vote is required. No veto power is given in any form of Methodism to either bishop, presiding elder, or preacher, except in the M. E. Church South. In that church, if the General Conference adopts a measure which the bishops believe to be unconstitutional, and against which they present their objections in writing, the passage of the measure requires a two-thirds vote of the General Conference, to be followed by a three-fourths vote of the Annual Conferences, as in the case of the alteration of a Restrictive Rule. This measure was adopted in 1874. Presiding officers, however, in Quarterly and Annual Conferences have the right to decide questions of law, and thus to prevent legislation which is by them considered to be contrary to the order and discipline of the church. Yet the application of the law rests with the Conferences; and in such cases the decisions are entered on the journals, and the final revision of them belongs to the General Conference.

Vickers, Hon. George, of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Chestertown, Kent Co., Md. He united with the M. P. Church in 1848. He has been secretary and a member of the Quarterly Conference, steward, etc., and once a member of the Maryland Annual Conference. He was elected and served in three General Conferences. He studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1832; was elected to the Senate of Maryland in 1836, and was commissioned a major-general of militia by Governor Hicks in 1865. He was elected to the Senate of Maryland in 1865, and was an electoral candidate for General McClellan in 1864. He was a visitor and governor of Washington College, Chestertown, Md., for a number of years, and was elected to the Senate of the United States in March, 1868, and served five years.

Vicksburg, Miss. (pop. 12,443), the capital of Warren County, is situated on the Mississippi River. It is the largest city in the State, about 408 miles above New Orleans, and is the chief commercial city between Memphis and New Orleans. It first appears in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1830, and reported in the following year 40 members, with J. O. T. Hawkins as pastor. The Mississippi Conference held in this city its session in 1832. In 1833 it became the head of a district of the same name, and had Rev. C. K. Marshall as pastor. In 1845 it adhered to the M. E. Church South. Since the close of the war a colored church was organized by the M. E. Church. There is also a society of the African M. E. Church. It is in the Mississippi Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are:

Victoria University is located at Cobourg, Ontario, Canada, and is the successor of the Upper Canada Academy, subsequently Victoria College. It embraces a faculty of arts, a faculty of medicine, a faculty of law, and a faculty of theology. Rev. S. S. Nelles, D.D., LL.D., is president, and Professor of Mental Philosophy, and is assisted by eight professors in the collegiate department. The cabinets contain some five thousand specimens in mineralogy and paleontology, and an excellent modern apparatus is employed for the illustration of chemistry and physics. Two medals are given through the bounty of the Prince of Wales, called the Prince of Wales Gold Medal and the Prince of Wales Silver Medal, to the graduating class of each year. There are also five scholarships awarded each year to under-graduates in arts: the Brethour scholarship of $100 to the matriculant who obtains the highest standard in classics with honors, one of $75 to the matriculant who obtains the highest standard in mathematics with honors, and three others of smaller amounts. There are also ten prizes awarded to excellence in various departments of study. It has an affiliated relation with the medical colleges in Montreal and Toronto. Its faculty of law embraces four professors, and its faculty of theology four professors, besides the president. In 1876 there were 207 students registered in the different departments.

Vincennes, Ind. (pop. 5440), the capital of Knox County, is situated on the Wabash River, and is the oldest town in the State, having been settled as early as 1735. It is first reported in the minutes of the M. E. Church for 1809, with 43 members, William Winans being in charge. The first M. E. church was built in 1812, during the pastorate of Jacob Truman, which was rebuilt in 1829, and again in 1857. It is in the Indiana Conference, and in 1876 reports 320 members, 180 Sunday-school scholars, and $10,500 church property.

Vincent, John H., D.D., editor of the Sunday-school publications of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Alabama in 1832, and joined the New Jersey Conference in 1853. He was transferred to the Rock River Conference in 1856. He became especially interested in the work and literature of the Sunday-school, and visited the Holy Land, in order to prepare himself the better to be of service in that department. In 1865 he was appointed general Sunday-school agent of the Methodist Episcopal Sunday-School Union. In 1868 he was elected the General Conference editor of The Sunday-School Journal, and of the books of instruction. He was elected in 1872, by acclamation, editor of the Sunday-school books, papers, and tracts, as well as corresponding secretary of the Tract Society and of the Sunday-School Union, and was re-elected in 1876. He has labored successfully for the advancement of the department with which he has been identified for twelve years, and has contributed materially to the development of the Sunday-school literature of the church. He has acquired a national reputation in all the churches as an indefatigable Sunday-school worker.

Virginia (pop. 1,225,163).—The first permanent settlement in this State was made at Jamestown, May 13, 1607. The colonists brought with them the forms and ceremonies of the Church of England, and regarded their enterprise as a religious one. Its civil and ecclesiastical history are closely interwoven. In 1664 the territorial assembly passed very stringent enactments in reference to religious duties. Whoever absented himself from divine services without a lawful excuse was to be fined one pound of tobacco, and if he offended the second time he was to be fined five pounds. No person was allowed to sell any of his tobacco until the minister had first received his portion. The minister was also required to preach at least one sermon upon the Sabbath. One of the provisions reads: "Ministers shall not give themselves to excess in drinking or riot, spending their time idly by day or by night, in playing at dice, cards, and other unlawful games; but at all times convenient they shall hear or read the Holy Scriptures, or take up themselves with other honest studies." In 1642 the Act of Uniformity was made very stringent, and all persons who could not conform were compelled to leave the colony. A Mr. Bennett, from Virginia, in 1641, visited Boston, and invited ministers to visit his State, but under the Act of Uniformity the Puritans were driven away. Notwithstanding this the Congregationalists increased, and in 1648 had several congregations, the most flourishing of which was one in Nansemond County, numbering 118 persons, under the care of Rev. Mr. Harrison, who was subsequently driven out, and became useful in England and Ireland. In 1671, Governor Berkeley said, "We have 48 preachers, and our ministers are well paid, and by my consent should be better if they would pray oftener and preach less; but of all other commodities the worst are sent to us, and we had few that we could boast of since persecution in Cromwell's tyranny drove divers worthy men hither." The Friends, or Quakers, also suffered in this persecution. They were described in the legislative enactments as an "unreasonable and turbulent sort of people, who, contrary to the laws, daily gathered assemblies and congregations of people, teaching lies, miracles, false divinations, prophecies, and utterances tending to destroy religious laws, communities, and all the bonds of civil society." Officers of trading-vessels were forbidden to bring a Friend into their colony under the penalty of £100 sterling. Notwithstanding this, many arrived, and were arrested and imprisoned, and ultimately sent out of the country. If one sent out of the country should return he was liable to be put to death. Notwithstanding these severe laws, in 1681 there were three or four Quaker congregations, and one Presbyterian church. In 1692 the charter for William and Mary College was secured, and its first commencement was held in 1700. In 1699 a Presbyterian church was organized. In 1699 a Presbyterian minister, Francis McKendree, was licensed under the Act of Toleration, and two places of worship were allowed him. In 1710 the presbytery of Philadelphia writes, "In all Virginia we have one small congregation, on Elizabeth River, and some few families favor our way in Rappahannock." As early as 1714 the Baptists had a congregation in the Isle of Wight. The church grew rapidly, and in 1770 there were Baptist churches in several portions of the northern neck. They were persecuted by the Church of England, and sometimes arrested. The prosecuting attorney on one occasion said, "These men are great disturbers of the peace. They can't meet a man on the road but they must ram a text of Scripture down his throat." Many of them lay in jail for weeks, but they preached to the people from the jail windows. Patrick Henry became their defender, and through his eloquence they were liberated and more reasonable terms were offered. The religious question became a matter of controversy. The Church of England was defended in its ecclesiastical course by such men as Pendleton, Carter, etc., and the liberty party by such men as Jefferson, Madison, and Mason. The writings of Madison were chiefly instrumental in the liberal triumph.

In 1740, Whitefield preached a few sermons in the bounds of this State, but Methodism proper was planted by Robert Williams, who was a local preacher in England, and had arrived in New York in 1769. His first appearance in Virginia was in 1772. He preached his first sermon in Norfolk, at the door of the court-house. He also visited Portsmouth, where a prominent business man, Isaac Luke, became converted. His labors were succeeded by those of Boardman and Pilmoor, and subsequently by Ashbury and other pioneers. Pilmoor, in company with William Watters, the first native itinerant Methodist preacher, crossed the Potomac at Alexandria, and preached where opportunity offered on their way to Norfolk. These pioneer preachers were assisted in their labors by Rev. Mr. Jarret, a devout and earnest minister in the English Church, and who early invited the Methodist preachers to hold services in his parish, and he administered the sacrament to their people. In 1773, at the first Methodist Conference, 100 members were reported from Virginia, and the appointments read: Norfolk, Richard Wright; Petersburg, Robert Williams. Under the ministration of Williams the family to which Jesse Lee belonged was received into the Methodist Church, and became one of the most influential families in Methodism. During the Revolutionary War the societies increased rapidly, and a controversy sprung up in reference to the administration of the sacraments. Many of the preachers of the English Church had left the country, and the people being dissatisfied, a portion of the ministers in Virginia resolved to ordain a few of their number for the purpose of having these ordinances administered to the people; but through the influence of Bishop Ashbury they were induced to suspend the administration and to take counsel of Mr. Wesley. This led at the close of the war to the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church. A freer scope was given to the progress of the church after the close of the Revolutionary War by the enactment of the bill for religious freedom in 1786, through the influence of Mr. Jefferson. The disestablishment of the English Church speedily followed, and after that period all churches had equal opportunities. The first secession of any moment from the Methodist Church occurred in the bounds of this State, under the leadership of James O'Kelley. He had long been a presiding elder, and was strong in certain convictions. When defeated at the General Conference of 1792, he withdrew from the church and organized what was called the Republican Methodist Church. Having been very popular, and having traveled very extensively, especially in the southern part of Virginia, he took large numbers of people with him, and the statistics show that a larger percentage was lost to the church than in any other separation which has occurred, except the one in 1845. The State of Virginia was the locality of remarkable revivals, and in various parts of it the church grew with great rapidity. Prior to 1845, the Baltimore Conference embraced the valley of Virginia and the territory north of the Rappahannock, including Fredericksburg. The Holston Conference embraced the southwestern part of the territory. Western Virginia had been included in the Pittsburgh and Ohio Conferences, but was subsequently organized into the Western Virginia Conference. In 1845 all of Virginia, except the part included in the Baltimore Conference and West Virginia, adhered to the Church South; and in the bounds of the Baltimore Conference, and in West Virginia, the churches in many places were divided, and bitter controversy arose. After the General Conference of 1860, almost the entire part of Eastern Virginia declared its independence of the General Conference of the M. E. Church, and at the close of the war identified itself with the M. E. Church South; though societies and churches still remained within the bounds of the former Baltimore Conference. The State now embraces the Virginia Conference of the M. E. Church South, and a portion of the Baltimore and Holston Conferences. The Methodist Episcopal Church has a Virginia Conference, and a part of its Baltimore Conference and of its Washington Conference are included within the State. The Methodist Protestant Church has a Virginia Conference, and also a portion of the Maryland Conference. In the African M. E. Church the Virginia Conference includes the entire State, with a portion of West Virginia. There are also churches of the African Zion Church and of the Colored Church of America. Randolph Macon College is a flourishing institution under the control of the Virginia Conference, M. E. Church South, which has also Farmville College and the Wesleyan Female College under its patronage.

Emory and Henry College, at Abingdon, is also a prosperous institution under the patronage of the Holston Conference, M. E. Church South. Prior to the separation, in 1845, an official paper was published at Richmond, and which has been continued from that time. The denominational statistics, as given in the United States census of 1870, are as follows.

Virginia City, Nev. (pop. 7048), the capital of Storey County, is the largest city in the State, and occupies a very elevated position in the slope of Mount Davidson, in the immediate vicinity of immense silver mines. The first Methodist sermon was preached in 1859. A daily paper of that locality says: "The officiating clergyman, whose name we do not now recall, was a small, lank, lean-looking individual, on the verge of consumption. The miners turned out to hear him, and listened attentively to the discourse: when the hat was passed around, more with characteristic impulse than religious appreciation, they showered twenties in such profusion that the worthy expounder of the faith found himself the happy possessor of more coin than it had been his good fortune to own before: some $600 being realized from the collection." It adds: "At that time nearly all the business places were also gambling-houses, the principal games being monte and vingt-et-un. Twenties were plentiful; small gold was scarce, and little silver in circulation." The first Methodist church was organized in 1860, by the Rev. Mr. Rand, and the first services were held in a canvas tent. Afterwards the present property was purchased, and a small frame church erected. In 1862 a large brick church was erected, under the efforts of Rev. C. V. Antony, which was dedicated in 1863, and which cost $60,000. In 1871 this church fell to the ground in consequence of a defect in the roof, and about six weeks later the ruins were consumed by fire. In 1872 a frame building was erected at a cost of about $10,000. Two years afterwards it was so injured by a storm of wind that it required about $4000 for repairs, and in 1875 the church and parsonage, with all the furniture, were destroyed by fire. A new church was erected in 1876, 40 by 60 feet, with an additional orchestra of 10 feet, and with a basement for Sunday-school uses the full size of the building. The African Methodists had a small church, which was destroyed by fire also in 1875, and has not yet (1878) been rebuilt. The present statistics for 1877 are: members, 65; Sunday-school scholars, 250; church property, $25,000.

Virginia Conference, African M. E. Church, includes "all the State of Virginia east of the Alleghany Mountains." The statistics are not at hand.

Virginia Conference, M. E. Church, was one of the six original Conferences formed by the General Conference of 1796. It embraced all that part of Virginia which lies south of the Rappahannock River, and all that part of North Carolina on the north of Cape Fear River, including the circuits on the side branches of the Yadkin River. Little change was made until 1804, when the western boundary was defined by the Blue Ridge, and Wilmington was excepted from the Conference. In 1836 its boundaries were defined to be "on the east by Chesapeake Bay and the Atlantic Ocean, on the south by Albemarle Sound, Roanoke and Staunton Rivers, on the west by the Blue Ridge, on the north by the Rappahannock River, except Fredericksburg and Port Royal." In 1803 there were reported 13,099 white and 3794 colored members, and in 1844, prior to its separation, it reported 26,268 white and 4949 colored members, with 101 traveling and 158 local preachers. In 1845 it adhered to the M. E. Church South, and its further history is in connection with that church. By the authority of the General Conference in 1864, Bishop Scott organized a Virginia and North Carolina Mission Conference, holding its first session at Portsmouth, Va., Jan. 3, 1867. There were then reported 14 preachers, 671 members, 8 Sunday-schools, and 463 scholars, and the territory included the two States of Virginia and North Carolina. In 1868 North Carolina was separated from it, and it embraced the State of Virginia, except what was included in the Baltimore and Washington Conferences, and it included also the counties of Pocahontas, Greenbrier, and Monroe, of West Virginia. These boundaries still remain. The first Conference thus limited was held by Bishop Ames, in Alexandria, March 30, 1869, and there were reported 36 preachers, 4382 members, 1309 Sunday-school scholars, 38 churches, valued at $56,400, and 5 parsonages, valued at $12,800. The statistics for 1876 are: 59 traveling and 78 local preachers, 7093 members, 4801 Sunday-school scholars, 104 churches, valued at $125,200, and 11 parsonages, valued at $12,450. It was within the bounds of this Conference that the discussion concerning the administration of the sacrament originated in the early days of Methodism, and that an attempt was made to introduce ordination by a few of the ministers, and which was delayed through the intervention of Asbury and others until the advice of Mr. Wesley could be obtained.

Virginia Conference, M. E. Church South, is one of the largest and most influential Conferences that adhered to the Church South at the division in 1845. The following year it reported 104 traveling and 166 local preachers, 25,592 white and 4781 colored members. Its boundaries were enlarged so as to embrace a part of what had formerly been included in the Philadelphia Conference, and as defined by the General Conference of 1874 are as follows: "On the east by the Atlantic Ocean, embracing the eastern shore of Virginia and all the portions of the States of Delaware and Maryland not included in the Baltimore Conference, on the north by the Potomac River, from its mouth to the line of Stafford and King George Counties, by said line from that point to the Rappahannock River (excluding Fredericksburg station) to the Blue Ridge, on the west by the Blue Ridge to the North Carolina State line, and on the south by the said State line to its intersection by the Roanoke River (excluding Union church, in Mecklenburg Co., Va.), and by the Roanoke River and Albemarle Sound to the Atlantic Ocean." The reports in 1875 show 181 traveling and 189 local preachers, 48,182 white and 213 colored members, and 33,687 Sunday-school scholars. Within the bounds of this Conference the Richmond Christian Advocate is published, which is extensively circulated, and its chief literary institution is Randolph Macon College; Farnville College and Wesleyan Female College are also under its patronage.

Virginia Conference, M. P. Church.—On the re-organization of the Conferences under the union of the Methodist Protestant and Methodist Churches, in 1877, the boundaries were so far changed as to transfer to the Maryland district that part of her territory lying east of the Alleghany Mountains and north of the Virginia and Tennessee Railroad not heretofore included in the Maryland district; and also to transfer Greenville circuit to the North Carolina district, thus leaving the larger portion of the State embraced in the Conference. It reported, in 1877, 28 itinerant and 18 unstationed ministers, 3300 members, 600 Sunday-school scholars, and 33 churches, valued at $27,000.

W.

Waco Female College, Waco, Texas, was chartered in 1854. It is under the supervision and patronage of the Northwest Texas Conference, M. E. Church South. Its present president is Samuel P. Wright, A.M., who is elected for a term of ten years from June, 1875. The faculty is full. The buildings and grounds are worth $35,000. Connected with the college, and under the supervision of the president and his wife, is an extensive boarding establishment. One hundred and fourteen matriculants were registered in 1876-77. Music and the fine arts are taught.

Waddy, Samuel D., D.D., an eminent English Wesleyan minister, was distinguished by his fine intellect, genial disposition, stern integrity, and earnest godliness, which won for him the confidence and veneration of all who knew him. Those who remember him as a preacher in his palmy days can never forget the lucidity of thought, the beauty of language, and the powerful eloquence which marked his pulpit orations. On the platform he was a master, both in speech-making and in debate. Some of his most splendid and effective addresses were in exposing popery, defending Protestantism and the claims of Christian missions. He was one of the founders of Sheffield College, which was immensely indebted to him as its governor. He served Methodism in almost every office, filled the chair of the Conference with an ability, urbanity, and impartiality never surpassed. He died Nov. 7, 1876, aged seventy-two.

Waddy, Samuel Danks, Esq., Q.C., M.P. for Barnstaple, England, the eldest son of the above, was born in 1830. He was educated at the London University; was called to the bar at the Inner Temple in 1858, became Queen's counsel and a member of the House of Commons. He is also a local preacher of the Wesleyan connection.

Wakefield, Rebecca, wife of the Rev. Thomas Wakefield, of the mission of the United Methodist Free Churches in East Africa, was born at Mount Sorrel, Leicestershire, England, Aug. 19, 1844, and died at Ribe, East Africa, July 16, 1873. Her father, Mr. Simon Brewin, was a Wesleyan local preacher. She became engaged to the Rev. John Mitchel, of the Wesleyan mission in Ceylon, shortly after she was twenty years old, and was, two and a half years afterwards, on the point of starting for Ceylon to be married to him, when she was met at the railway station with the news of his death. She afterwards met Mr. Wakefield, who had returned to England from Africa on a visit, and was married to him in 1869. She was the first English woman who had ever visited Ribe, the seat of the missions. She engaged in aid of the work of the mission, in teaching the children to sing and sew, but died soon after the birth of her second child, when only twenty-eight years of age. Her life has been written by her brother, the Rev. Robert Brewin.

Wakefield, Samuel, D.D., was admitted into the Pittsburgh Conference in 1834, and has filled many of its most prominent appointments on circuits, stations, and districts. He has written a number of articles for the press, and is also the author of a work on "Theology," which has been introduced into the course of study for young ministers, and has been extensively circulated.

Wakefield, Thomas, a missionary of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerant ministry in 1858. After three years at home, he engaged in that work with which his name will ever be honorably identified. The work of Dr. Louis Krapf, a veteran missionary and traveler, having called attention to Eastern Africa as a sphere for missions, the Methodist Free Churches resolved on establishing a mission there. Mr. Wakefield was one of the original band of laborers who founded the mission at Ribe, near Mombassa, in the dominions of the Sultan of Zanzibar. Amidst deaths and desertions he has continued at his post. The mission was founded in 1861. At the instance of the foreign missionary committee, Mr. Wakefield returned to England on furlough in the autumn of 1868. During his stay in England he was married to Miss Rebecca Brewin, with whom he returned to Africa, sailing from Gravesend on Feb. 24, 1870. They arrived at Zanzibar on June 2, 1870. Mr. Wakefield had the comfort and help of his wife's society for a brief period only. Mr. Wakefield still remains (1877) in his chosen sphere of labor, and is blessed by seeing much fruit of his toil. He is intent on the work of Scripture translation. The printing-press has been introduced, and already portions of the Bible have been published in the native tongue. Mr. Wakefield was a printer in his youth, and in these publications he has to act both as translator and printer.

Wakeley, J. B., D.D., was born in Danbury, Conn., in 1809, and died in New York, April 27, 1875. He became a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church when about sixteen years old. In 1833 he was admitted into the New York Conference on trial. In 1844 he was transferred to the New Jersey Conference, and in 1852 to the New York East Conference. Two years later he returned to the New York Conference. He served several years as presiding elder. His cast of mind was practical rather than logical. He was a model pastor, almost universally beloved, especially by the younger members of the church. He was conscientious in the discharge of all his duties, and faithfully devoted to the interests of Methodism. As an ecclesiastical antiquary, he perhaps had few equals in the church, his writings being devoted mostly to historical and biographical matters. He was especially devoted to the temperance cause, and was an effective speaker and writer. His last illness was brief. He retained full possession of his faculties to the last. He told a friend to tell his brethren "to preach the old gospel. We want no new one. The old gospel is to save the world; it cannot be improved. One might as well attempt to improve a ray of sunshine while revivifying a flower. The grand old gospel forever!" He is author of "Lost Chapters in the History of American Methodism," the "Heroes of Methodism," "The Prince of Pulpit Orators," a portraiture of the Rev. George Whitefield, M.A.; "The Patriarch of One Hundred Years," or reminiscences of the Rev. Henry Boehm, and the "Bold Frontier Preacher," a portraiture of the Rev. William Craven.

Walden, John M., D.D., was born at Lebanon, O., Feb. 11, 1831. He was brought up on a farm, but finally engaged in a clerkship, and devoted his leisure time to reading. At eighteen he entered Farmer's College, O., and graduated with honor in 1852. He was immediately appointed to a tutorship, where he remained for two years. Subsequently he acted as a correspondent for the Cincinnati Commercial, and entered heartily into the campaign of 1856 in favor of Mr. Fremont. In 1857 he went to Kansas, and established a paper at Quindaro to aid in the promotion of free-State principles; became a member of the Topeka legislature, and was elected State superintendent of public instruction. He was converted in 1850, and joined the M. E. Church; was licensed as a local preacher in 1854, and was admitted in 1858 into the Cincinnati Conference. Since that time he has occupied prominent positions as pastor, as city missionary, as presiding elder, as secretary of the Freedman's Aid Society, and as one of the book agents at Cincinnati, to which post he was elected in 1868, and in which he still remains. He has been an active Sunday-school worker, strongly devoted to temperance principles and measures, and has taken a deep interest in the freedmen. In Cincinnati, he has been a member of the board of education, chairman of the library committee, and active in establishing the public library. He is also president of the board of trustees of Cincinnati Wesleyan College. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1868, 1872, and 1876.

REV. JOHN M. WALDEN, D.D.
ONE OF THE WESTERN BOOK AGENTS.

Wales (pop. 1,217,135) is a principality of Great Britain, occupying the southwest portion of the island. Its inhabitants were a Celtic tribe who emigrated from the Continent before the historical period. The Romans and Anglo-Saxons failed to subdue them fully, and not until the tenth century did they become tributary to England. Christianity was introduced into Wales from the East, and flourished until about the sixth century, independent of the papacy, but the Church of Rome succeeded in securing the submission of Wales, with all of Great Britain, until the revolt of Henry VIII. As in England, so in Wales, the Church of England is the established body, but all denominations are tolerated. The commencement of Methodist labors in Wales is to be traced to Howell Harris, who was born at Trevecca in 1714, and was converted in 1735, a few months before the Wesleys went to Georgia. He entered Oxford the same year, but, annoyed and distressed with the immoralities of the institution, he left at the end of a term, and commenced without orders to preach the gospel. At that time there were but six dissenting chapels in all North Wales, and the morals of the people were very low. He was an itinerant preacher nearly a year and a half before Wesley and Whitefield commenced their itinerant career. Though rudely persecuted, he preached often six times a day, and was subsequently joined by Grif-

fifth Jones. Whitefield first met him at Cardiff, in 1739, and speaks of him as "a burning and shining light; a barrier against profanity and immorality; and an indefatigable promoter of the gospel of Christ." At this time he had visited seven of the twelve counties of Wales. In 1743, Whitefield, Harris, and others organized these societies into the Welsh Calvinistic Church (see CALVINISTIC METHODIST CHURCH), and Harris was to be general superintendent. In 1739, Wesley first visited Wales on a pressing invitation, and preached his first sermon at the foot of a high hill two or three miles from Chepstow, to "three or four hundred plain people." He preached elsewhere to large congregations, and said on his return, "Most of the inhabitants are ripe for the gospel." Again, in 1740, at the pressing instance of Howell Harris, he visited Wales, and preached in many places with great power. In 1748, Lady Huntingdon, accompanied by other distinguished persons, paid her first visit to Wales, and the company held many religious services. In 1746 the Wesleyan Methodists had but seven circuits in Great Britain, and all Wales was embraced in one circuit; and as late as 1767 there was but one circuit, with 232 members, and three preachers were sent to that field. In 1800, Owen Davis and John Hughes were missionaries to North Wales, and for twelve years Mr. Davis was superintendent. The Wesleyan Conference now divides Wales into two districts, North and South, and embraces 50 circuits, with 276 local preachers, 18,268 members, 20,937 Sunday-school scholars, and 476 chapels and other preaching-places. The Calvinistic Methodists were very successful in organizing large and strong societies. They number (1876) 207 ministers, 58,577 members, 80,000 Sunday-school scholars, and have church buildings with 99,772 sittings. The United Free Methodists have one district, 3 itinerant and 7 local preachers, 261 members, 5 chapels, and 3 other preaching-places, 5 Sunday-schools, and 343 Sunday-school scholars. The Primitive Methodists are also represented, but the statistics have not been furnished.

Walker, George W., was born in Frederick Co., Md., Nov. 26, 1804, and died at Delaware, O., July 31, 1856. His parents were members of the Roman Catholic Church, in which he received his religious training. In 1810 the family removed to Ohio, and his father, chiefly out of curiosity, purchased a Bible. In a short time his mother united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, which held services in the neighborhood. The father was indignant, but a compromise was made, in which it was agreed that the matter should rest for one month, during which he was to read the Bible and pray for direction, and if at the end of the month his opposition remained, the mother should leave the Methodists forever. In a few days the father was converted, and also united with the church. The son was licensed to preach in 1825, and in 1826 entered the Ohio Conference. He had a vigorous constitution, and did effective service until near the close of life. Two years of his ministry were spent in Michigan, at a time when it was a field of great privation; "but no swollen river, no dismal swamp or dangerous fen, could daunt the lion heart that beat in the bosom of George Walker." He filled important appointments in Cincinnati and Dayton; was presiding elder of several districts, and was engaged in agencies connected with the Wesleyan Female College. When on the Hillsborough district he was stricken with his fatal illness. For his wife's sake he had a desire to live, but when he saw the physicians hesitating, he said, "Speak candidly, gentlemen: I am not afraid to die!" As a preacher he was both argumentative and declamatory. He had a sound understanding and a clear judgment. His brethren showed their confidence in him by electing him several times in succession to the General Conference, and giving him other tokens of their regard.

Walker, James B., was born Oct. 16, 1826, in Greene Co., Tenn. He was converted in his sixteenth year, and joined the Methodist Protestant Church on Port William circuit, Ohio Conference. Impressed with the duty of preaching, after four years of private study, stolen from his farm employments, he entered Wittenburg College in his twentieth year, remaining about three years. He worked his own way through college, possessing little funds at the time but those gained by his own labor. In 1849 he joined the Ohio Conference. He has given fifteen years to direct pastoral work, all in the Ohio Conference. For four years he was corresponding secretary of the Board of Missions, and for eight years he has held the same position on the Board of Ministerial Education. He has given much time and hard work to the agency of Adrian College, of which he has been a trustee from the beginning, to raising money for the Book Concern, etc. He was one of the seven men to obtain the charter of Adrian College, and since has done much to make it popular. He is a zealous advocate of ministerial education.

Walker, Jesse L., was the nephew of the honored pioneer Jesse Walker, who organized the first Methodist class in the city of St. Louis. He was born in Monroe Co., Ind., in 1831. He entered Indiana Asbury University to prepare for the ministry; but his collegiate course was cut short at the end of the second year by the death of his father. In 1856 he joined the Indiana Conference, and remained in it until the beginning of the war, when he became chaplain of the 25th Indiana Volunteers. In 1866 he was appointed to the Springfield district of the Missouri Conference, and did much towards the organization of the M. E. Church in the southwestern part of the State. His next field of labor was the St. Louis district, leaving which, he spent three years as pastor of Trinity church, St. Louis, and was then appointed to the Kansas City district, which he was serving when elected to the General Conference of 1876.

Walker, Joseph Burch, was born of Methodist parents on Jan. 2, 1817, in Washington, D. C. His family frequently changing their residence, he was educated at various institutions of learning in Maryland, Virginia, Alabama, and Tennessee. In his seventeenth year he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, into which he had been baptized in infancy. In his nineteenth year he was licensed to preach, and recommended for admission on trial in the Tennessee Conference. He remained in this Conference ten years, filling a number of its principal stations. In 1846 he was transferred to the Mississippi Conference, and in 1852 was transferred to Louisiana Conference and stationed at the Carondelet Street church. With the exception of four years, 1871 to 1874, spent in Galveston as a member of the Texas Conference, he has been, since 1852, a pastor in New Orleans, or presiding elder of the New Orleans district. While in Texas he was part of the time associate editor of the Texas Christian Advocate. He has for more than thirty years been a frequent contributor to the columns of the church papers of the South.

Wallace, Adam, of the Philadelphia Conference, was born near Manor Hamilton, Ireland, in January, 1825. He was brought up to business in Enniskillen; emigrated to America in 1843, and was converted in Philadelphia in 1845. He united with the Philadelphia Conference in 1848, having previously traveled under the presiding elder. He has filled a number of important appointments in Delaware and Pennsylvania, and was presiding elder of the Snow Hill district. He founded the Methodist Home Journal in 1867, and served as its editor for eight years. He has written several volumes, chiefly biographical, and is now (1878) editor and publisher of the Ocean Grove Record.

Wallace, Robert, was an eminent member of the Irish Conference. When stationed in Kingstown, he was brought into notice through his controversy with certain Dominican fathers concerning the burning in the public streets of a copy of the Holy Scriptures. He was sent by his Conference on the deputation to the M. E. Church centennial celebration in 1866, and had been only ten days in this country when he was attacked by cholera, and died in Cincinnati, O., aged fifty-four years. A monument, erected by the Methodists of that city, indicates at once their respect for his mission and his memory, and their regard for Irish Methodism. Beside him lie the remains of his gifted son-in-law, the Rev. Ebenezer E. Henry, who came to the United States, in 1871, in search of health, and found instead a grave.

Waller, Alvin F., was born in Abingdon, Pa., May 8, 1808; was converted in 1829, in Elba, New York, and was licensed to preach in 1832. He entered the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary in 1833, but shortly afterwards he joined the Genesee Conference, and remained connected with the same until 1839, when he offered himself for missionary work in Oregon. He sailed from New York in October, 1839, and reached Oregon June 1, 1840. For thirty-two years he was thoroughly identified with all that the church did and purposed in that country. He helped to lay the foundation of the "Oregon Institute," out of which has grown the Willamette University. For many years he was its indefatigable agent. He was a principal agent in founding the Pacific Christian Advocate, in 1855. He was a man of great perseverance, energy, and fidelity, a clear, logical, powerful preacher. He was once delegate to the General Conference, served gratuitously for many years as chaplain to the State penitentiary, and occupied many positions of trust in the church. He died at his home in Salem, Oregon, Dec. 26, 1872.

Walton, James, of the Mississippi Conference, M. E. Church South, was born in Chester District, S. C., Aug. 17, 1799. He was converted in his sixteenth year, and subsequently removed West, and in 1832 settled in the Choctaw purchase, Miss. He was chosen to represent his county for two successive terms in the State Senate. In 1842 he joined the Mississippi Conference, where he served a number of prominent appointments, and was presiding elder of the Yazoo and Sharon districts. He was a man of unbending integrity, had a strong and well-balanced mind, was impressive and effective as a preacher, and diligent and faithful as a pastor. He died Jan. 18, 1861.

Ward, James, was born Sept. 17, 1771, in Somerset Co., Md., and died April 13, 1855, near Plattsburg, Ky., in his eighty-fourth year. He was licensed to preach in 1789, and was admitted into the traveling connection in 1792, and for fifteen years labored as preacher and presiding elder in the valleys and mountains of Virginia. In 1807 he was transferred to the Western Conference, and traveled successively the Cumberland, Kentucky, and Salt River districts, when impaired health required him to rest. In the church controversy of 1844 he took a position with the South, but afterwards applied for admission in the Baltimore Conference in a superannuated relation, and was kindly and unanimously received.

Ward, J. T., president of Western Maryland College, was born in Georgetown, D. C., Aug. 21, 1830. His father, the Rev. Ulysses Ward, was a local preacher and an enterprising and useful citizen. He was educated in Washington and Berkeley, Md. In his twentieth year he entered the itinerant ministry in connection with the Maryland Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, and filled appointments successively in Frederick Co., Md., and in Berkeley Co., Va., and was stationed at Cumberland, Md. He edited the Columbian Fountain, a temperance journal, at Washington, from 1846 to 1848, and succeeded the Rev. T. H. Stockton in the M. P. Church, in Philadelphia, in 1848. Returning to Maryland in 1856, he occupied stations in Alexandria and Washington City, and taught in a seminary. In 1867 he was elected president of the Western Maryland College at its organization, and has occupied the same position until the present time (1877). He has contributed to the religious periodicals, and has published a small volume.

Wardlow, Charles, a layman of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, was born in Sheffield, March 19, 1819. His parents gave him a thorough religious training. The special work which he did was to originate, with Mr. T. B. Shuttleworth, a Young Men's Institute, which developed into a very successful and highly popular educational establishment. The idea was to unite biblical instruction on the Sabbath with different branches of education in week-night classes. In 1843 the Bible classes were commenced with four young men, and in 1876 the Bible classes numbered 168 of both sexes, and the week-night classes 576.

Mr. Wardlow was highly successful in business. He died on July 19, 1876.

Ware, Thomas, of the Philadelphia Conference, was born at Greenwich, N. J., Dec. 19, 1758, and died at Salem, N. J., March 11, 1842. He united with the Methodist society, and at Mr. Asbury's solicitation commenced his public ministry. He was present at the famous Christmas Conference in Baltimore when the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized, and was a deeply-interested observer of all that took place. In 1785 he received a regular appointment, and in 1787 volunteered to go to East Tennessee, where he traveled extensively through both Tennessee and North Carolina, and was instrumental in the conversion of a large number of persons, among whom were General Russell and his wife, the latter being a sister of Patrick Henry. He returned to the East in 1791, and, after other appointments, was placed in charge of a district on the Peninsula, where his labors were unusually blessed. At the General Conference in 1812 he was elected book agent, and after holding this office four years he returned to the regular pastorate, and continued in the itineracy until 1825. He had a well-balanced mind, was a solid and instructive preacher, and published a brief autobiography, which is valuable on account of its early reminiscences.

Warren College, Bowling Green, Ky., was chartered in 1870, and was presented by a number of generous citizens to the Louisville Conference, M. E. Church South. The college was opened in September, 1872, under the charge of the Rev. J. G. Wilson, D.D., as president. He having tendered his resignation in October, 1875, B. F. Cabell was elected his successor. The number of students is 175. The building is valued at $45,000, with an endowment of $15,000.

Warren, Henry White, D.D., of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Massachusetts; graduated at Wesleyan University in 1853, and taught ancient languages two years at Wilbraham Seminary. He joined the New England Conference in 1855, and was stationed at Westfield, Lynn, Charlestown, Cambridge, and twice in Boston. In 1864 he was elected by the Senate to preach the election sermon before the government of Massachusetts. In 1871 he was transferred to Philadelphia Conference, and in 1874 to New York East. In 1877 he was re-transferred to Philadelphia, and stationed the second time at Arch Street church. He has contributed several papers to the Methodist Quarterly Review; has been editorial correspondent of the Christian Advocate since 1862; and having traveled in Europe and the East, on his return he published, in 1874, a volume entitled "Sights and Insights."

Warren, O. (pop. 3457), the capital of Trumbull County, is situated on the Atlantic and Great Western Railroad. The first Methodist sermon was preached in this place by Rev. William Swayze, then presiding elder on Ohio district, Nov. 19, 1819. On the following day a class of 7 persons was formed by James McMahan, who had charge of Mahoning circuit. For eight years class-meetings were held in private houses, and preaching in the court-house every two weeks, and the membership had gradually increased to 18. In February, 1827, Dr. C. Elliott, then presiding elder of the district, with R. Hatton and Robert Hopkins, who were circuit preachers, held a quarterly meeting, which resulted in many additions, and gave Methodism a firm place in Warren. Preaching, however, was continued in the court-house until 1837, when a lot was purchased for $400 and a building was erected costing $3000. Warren became a station in 1840, and worship was held in this church until 1874. In 1870 a church edifice was commenced near the public square, which was dedicated in 1874, costing for a lot and house $50,000. The African M. E. church was organized in 1871, and built a neat frame church on the west side of the river in 1875. An African M. E. Zion church was formed by a division in the former church in 1875, and worshipped in the old M. E. Church building. It is in the East Ohio Conference. The following are the statistics for 1876:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	320	233	$50,000
African M. E. Church.....	16	12,000
African Zion Church.....	27	24

Warren, Orris H., D.D., editor of the Northern Christian Advocate, was born at Stockbridge, N. Y., Jan. 3, 1855; attended the Oneida Conference Seminary for two terms, beginning in 1851; completed his preparatory studies at Oberlin, O., and was afterwards a student for two years in the collegiate department of Oberlin College, spending his vacations in teaching. His health was undermined by incessant studies and labors, and he was obliged to withdraw from the college and engage in such occupations as his health permitted. He joined the Oneida Conference in 1862, and filled appointments at Waterville, Utica, Cazenovia, Ithaca, and Baldwinsville, at the latter of which places he took a supernumerary relation in consequence of the illness of his wife, and engaged in literary work. He afterwards became assistant editor of the Northern Christian Advocate. After the death of Dr. Lore, in June, 1875, he conducted this paper as acting editor till the General Conference of 1876, when he was unanimously elected editor for the succeeding four years. He is the author of a work entitled "The American Episcopal Church."

Warren, William Fairfield, D.D., president of Boston University, was born in Williamsburg, Mass., March 13, 1833, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1853. In the same year he was engaged as a teacher in a private classical school in Mobile, Ala. Returning to Massachusetts, he joined the New England Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1855. He studied at Berlin and Halle from 1856 to 1858, and acted as a delegate to the World's Convention of the Evangelical Alliance at Berlin in 1857. In 1857-58 he made a tour through Turkey, Asia Minor, Palestine, Egypt, Greece, and Italy. In 1861 he was appointed Professor of Systematic Theology in the Mission Institute at Bremen, Germany, and occupied that position till 1860. During this period he was appointed, in 1862, by the Missionary Society, a joint commissioner with the Rev. Dr. L. S. Jacoby to visit and report upon the missions in Bulgaria. He was elected Professor of Systematic Theology in the Boston Theological Seminary in 1866, and became, in 1867, acting president of the same institution. In 1871 he was elected dean of the School of Theology of Boston University, and in 1873 president of the university. He was a member of the General Conference in 1876. While connected with the Mission Institute at Bremen he published text-books, in German, on logic and systematic theology ("Anfangsgründe der Logik," 1863, and "Allgemeine Einleitung in die systematische Theologie," 1865). In 1872 he was appointed a member of the Bible revision committee, American branch.

Warsaw, Ill. (pop. 3585), in Hancock County, on the east side of the Mississippi, is at the foot of Des Moines Rapids. The first class organized in Warsaw was in 1840. Having no house to meet in, the society rented an old frame building which stood on the point overlooking the Mississippi, and used it until 1851, when, under the pastorate of the Rev. Lewis Anderson, a commodious brick church was erected. The cost of the church embarrassed the society. Peter Cartwright was presiding elder of the district, and had been elected to the General Conference. When it met, a delegation was chosen to bear its greetings to President Fillmore. Mr. Cartwright headed the delegation. He thought as he went with the rest of the delegates to call on the President, that the occasion would be a favorable one to solicit a subscription for the burdened society on the Mississippi. He solicited one, and received in reply from the President the inquiry, "How much do you think I ought to give?" The prompt answer to the inquiry was: "Any man who thinks he has sense enough to be President of the United States, ought to have sense enough to know how much he ought to give to a church in Warsaw." He gave $25. This church served all requirements until the winter of 1875-76, when a revival increased the society largely, and then the building was unroofed and remodeled at a cost of $4000. In 1874 the society bought a parsonage. An African M. E. society was formed in 1873, and a church was built, but the society was too weak to support a pastor, and the church is now unoccupied. A society of the M. E. Church South was formed in 1871, but did not continue. Warsaw is in the Illinois Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are: members, 150; Sunday-school scholars, 150; church property, $7500.

Washington, D. C. (pop. 109,199), the capital of the United States, is situated on the Potomac River, and was named after General Washington. It has been the seat of government since 1800, has grown rapidly, and has been greatly improved since the breaking out of the Civil War. This section of country was within the bounds of the old Frederick circuit, and was visited by Mr. Asbury as early as 1772. In 1797 he speaks of visiting a famous bridge above Georgetown, and of finding William Watters in charge of Georgetown circuit. In 1802 Washington is mentioned in connection with Georgetown, William Watters being pastor. In 1805 it appears as a separate appointment, and reported in the following year 61 white and 25 colored members. The church grew but slowly, reporting, in 1810, 113 white and 46 colored members, and in 1812 only 91 white and 54 colored members. This was about the commencement of the war with Great Britain. In 1817 it reported 172 white and 118 colored members, Beverly Waugh, subsequently bishop, being in charge. At this Conference, stimulated by the gift of Mr. Foxall of ground and building, a second appointment was added, called Foundry church, to which Thomas Burch was appointed pastor, from which time the church grew more rapidly, as in the following year the two charges reported 293 white and 137 colored members. With the increase of the population other charges were added, and a separate colored church was formed. The African Methodist Episcopal and the African Zion Churches also established congregations. In 1853 a lot was secured, and steps were taken towards commencing the building of the Metropolitan church, but the agitations that shortly followed on the subject of slavery, and the excitement of the public mind, prevented any great success, and the foundation of the church was the only indication of progress. Many despaired of ultimate success. With the close of the war, however, another effort was made to erect the church, and under the labors of Dr. F. S. De Hass the present beautiful building was erected, except the tower, which was subsequently added through the efforts of Mrs. Dr. Newman and the liberality of Mr. Kelso, of Baltimore. (See cut on following page.) Washington is in the Baltimore Conference, and the following are the statistics for 1876:

Washington Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1864. The reasons for the organization of this Conference are given under the head of COLORED CONFERENCES OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH. The boundaries of this Conference were made to include "Western Maryland, the District of Columbia, Virginia, and the territory South." In 1868 the Conference included Western Maryland, the District of Columbia, and Virginia. In 1876 it embraced "Western Maryland, the District of Columbia, Virginia, West Virginia, and so much of the State of Pennsylvania as lies west of the Susquehanna River, including the towns on said river." It held its first session in Sharp Street, Baltimore, Oct. 27, 1864, Bishop Scott presiding, and reported 21 traveling and 43 local preachers, 8194 members, 1234 Sunday-school scholars, and 19 churches, valued at $81,000. In 1876 it reported 119 traveling and 224 local preachers, 28,366 members, 15,014 Sunday-school scholars, 220 churches, valued at $505,500, and 22 parsonages, valued at $17,700.

Washington, Pa. (pop. 3571), the capital of Washington County, on the Hempfield Railway. The first M. E. church was erected in 1801; a second, in 1816; a third, in 1847; the present one, in 1876. An African M. E. society was organized in 1818, and an African M. E. Zion at a date not named. It is in the Pittsburgh Conference. The statistics for 1876 are: M. E. Church; members, 350; Sunday-school scholars, 230; church property, $52,500. African M. E. Church; members, 90; Sunday-school scholars, 75; church property, $8000. African M. E. Zion; members, 20.

Watch-Night Services.—The first notice that we have of this service is found in Mr. Wesley's journal of 1742. In 1789 it was enjoined "that every watch-night should be held till midnight." On the last night of every year this solemn service is held in all the chapels, generally beginning at 10.30. The minister commences with singing and prayer,—reading an appropriate chapter and singing,—he then preaches a sermon or gives an address. Sometimes local preachers are requested to give short addresses as well as the minister. Thus, in singing, exhortation, and prayer, the congregation is engaged until a few minutes before twelve, when they are called upon to unite in silent prayer. Shortly after the clock has struck, announcing the advent of the new year, the well-known hymn commencing, "Come let us anew our journey pursue," is sung, and prayer closes the service. Myles, in his "History of Methodism," gives the following account of their origin: "The custom was begun at Kingswood by the colliers there, who, before their conversion, used to spend every Saturday night at the ale-house. After they were taught better, they spent that night in prayer. Mr. Wesley hearing of it, ordered it first to be once a month at the full of the moon, then once a quarter, and recommended it to all his societies. His account of it is: 'I was informed that several persons in Kingswood frequently met together at the school, and (when they could spare the time) spent the greater part of the night in prayer and praise and thanksgiving. Some advised me to put an end to this; but upon weighing the thing thoroughly, and comparing it with the practice of the ancient Christians, I could see no cause to forbid it. Rather, I believed it might be made of more general use. So I sent them word I designed to watch with them on the Friday nearest the full moon, that we might have light thither and back again. I gave public notice of this the Sunday before, and withal that I intended to preach, desiring they, and they only, would meet me there who could do it without prejudice to their business or families. On Friday abundance of people came. I began preaching between eight and nine, and we continued till a little beyond the noon of night, singing, praying, and praising God.'" In America the services are frequently varied with the relation of experience, and the covenant hymn is sung while kneeling in the first moments of the new year. These meetings were originally held almost exclusively by the Methodists, but more recently they have been introduced into many of the churches of other denominations.

Waterbury, Conn. (pop. 10,826), is situated in New Haven County, and is abundantly supplied with railroad facilities. It is in the New York East Conference. The statistics for 1876 are: members, 642; Sunday-school scholars, 494; church property, $35,000; parsonages, $7000.

Waterford, N. Y. (pop. 3071), is situated in Saratoga County, on the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad. This town was originally included in the old Saratoga circuit, and does not appear as a separate appointment until recently, the larger town, with which it was connected, having given name to the circuit. It is in the Troy Conference. The statistics for 1876 are: members, 184; Sunday-school scholars, 145; church property, $4000; parsonages, $2500.

Waterhouse, John, a missionary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, was received as a probationer in 1809. He labored in England for twenty-nine years in some of the most important circuits, but from his early life had a strong desire for missionary work. In 1838 he was appointed general superintendent of Australian and Polynesian missions. He was extensively useful, but closed his career at a comparatively early age. He died at Hobart Town, Tasmania, in 1842, aged fifty-two.

Waterloo, Iowa (pop. 4337), the capital of Black Hawk County, is situated on the Burlington, Cedar Rapids and Minnesota Railroad. It is first recorded in the minutes of the church for 1855. In 1856, J. G. Witted was appointed to the circuit. In 1857, C. M. Sessions was appointed to West Waterloo, and in the same year Waterloo station reported 81 members. It is in the Upper Iowa Conference. The statistics for 1876 are:

Waterloo, N. Y. (pop. 4086), is the capital of Seneca County, on the Syracuse and Rochester branch of the New York Central Railway. A meeting was held in Waterloo, Feb. 27, 1832, for the purpose of organizing an M. E. society, which was called the "Fletcher Society of the M. E. Church." It was at once recognized by the Genesee Conference, and preaching was established. Three years later a house of worship was built, when the society re-organized, and took the name of "First M. E. Church of Waterloo." It then numbered 301 members. The house was burned, but was immediately rebuilt on the old site, and has since been repaired. In 1838 Waterloo was made a station. A Methodist Protestant society was organized in 1872, which purchased the old Presbyterian church. It is in the Central New York Conference. The statistics for 1876 are: M. E. Church: members, 225; Sunday-school scholars, 229; church property, $10,000. Methodist Protestant Church: members, 70; church property, $3000.

Waterman, John A., D.D., was born in New Hampshire, June 29, 1790, and died in Oxford, O., Aug. 6, 1837. He was converted in his eighteenth year, and united with the M. E. Church. He was admitted into the Ohio Conference in 1814, and labored usefully until the formation of the Pittsburgh Conference, when he fell within its bounds. He successively filled Pittsburgh, Wheeling, Washington, Steubenville, and other prominent appointments. Affected with dyspepsia and liver complaint, he had much mental depression, and finally was compelled to take a superannuated relation. In 1832 he was transferred, by the request of the Ohio Conference, to that field, and was stationed in Oxford, where he died. He had but few early advantages, but by close application became a thorough scholar. His mind was metaphysical and logical; his sermons were full of interest and instruction, and oftentimes he was singularly and overwhelmingly eloquent.

Waters, Francis, D.D., of the M. P. Church, was born Jan. 16, 1792, near Quantico, now Wicomico, Somerset Co., Md., and died in Baltimore, Md., April 23, 1868. He was the second son of Hon. F. H. Waters, and a descendant of a long line of ancient and prominent families of Maryland and Virginia. He entered the University of Pennsylvania in 1808. After graduation, he read law under Judge Whittington, of Worcester Co., Md., but abandoned the law for the ministry, and afterwards took charge of Washington Academy, Somerset County, where he continued until 1818, when he became principal of Washington College, Md. This position he resigned in 1823, and returned to Somerset. In 1849 he was elected principal of the Baltimore High School, and in 1853 he became president of Madison College, Uniontown, Pa. Himself and family becoming dissatisfied with the severance of old associations, he soon retired from this institution and accepted a second election to the presidency of Washington College, Md., where he remained till 1860. No man in Maryland stood higher as an educator than did Dr. Waters, and he had the gratification of seeing a large number of his pupils fill the most prominent places in both church and state.

He became pious at the early age of from fourteen to sixteen years, and was licensed to preach while yet a youth. In the great controversy on "lay-rights" Dr. Waters took a decided stand with the "Reformers." He was president of the convention that gave the new church its constitution and Discipline in 1830, and it was at his instance that the name Methodist Protestant Church was adopted. He was president of the General Conferences of 1846 and 1862. The address on the ordinances and institutions of the church, in the Discipline, was written by him.

Watertown, N. Y. (pop. 9336), the capital of Jefferson County, is situated on the Rome, Watertown and Ogdensburg Railroad. This place was originally included in the Black River circuit. The circuit being divided, it appears as an appointment in 1818, with John Dempster as pastor. In 1819 it reported 247 members. A second charge was organized in 1849. It is in the Northern New York Conference. The statistics for 1876 are:

Watertown, Wis. (pop. 7550), is situated in Jefferson County, on the La Crosse division of the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad. The first Methodist sermon was preached, according to Dr. W. G. Miller (Thirty Years in the Itinerancy), by H. W. Frink, in 1839. Citizens of the place state, however, that it was preached by Samuel Pillsbury, in December, 1837, or January, 1838. The first class was organized about 1842, and the first church built in 1846. The present church was built in 1873. It is of brick, and has a parsonage attached. The society is becoming smaller every year through changes of population, the English element giving way to the German. The first service of the German M. E. Church was held in 1850. The German church was built in 1857, and was rebuilt in 1869. It is of brick, and has a frame parsonage attached. The German society is large and growing. It is in the Wisconsin and Chicago German Conference. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Watkins, William Brown, D.D., of the Pittsburgh Conference, was born in Bridgeport, O., May 2, 1834. In his youth he commenced the study of law, but feeling it his duty to enter the ministry, he was received, in 1856, into the Pittsburgh Conference. He has filled prominent appointments in Ohio and Pennsylvania, and was for four years presiding elder of the Steubenville district, now embraced in the East Ohio Conference. In addition to his ministry he has lectured extensively; has written a number of articles for the press, and is preparing an "Etymological Dictionary of Ancient and Modern Geographical Names."

Watson, James V., D.D., was born in London, England, in 1814. When quite young his parents removed to Indiana. He was admitted into the Missouri Conference in 1832. Subsequently he was a member of the Indiana Conference. At the division of the Conference, in 1840, his work fell in Michigan, where, upon the division of the Conference, he became a member of the Detroit Conference. He filled with usefulness some of its most important stations, but his health becoming impaired he took a superannuated relation, and established The Michigan Advocate, which he edited until the General Conference, in 1852, established The Northwestern Christian Advocate in Chicago, and elected him to be its editor. He was re-elected in 1856, but died Oct. 17, in the same year. He was an indefatigable worker, and though he suffered greatly from asthma and was frequently confined to his bed in the later years of his life, he preached and wrote with vigor and energy, and insisted upon continuing his labors even after it was obvious that his death was near. On the day before his death he dictated an article to his amanuensis, and when his last leader was published, he had passed away. His discussions of church policy were marked by liberal views of the wants and capacities of the Northwest.

Watson, Richard, a distinguished divine and author, was born at Barton-upon-Humber, Lincolnshire, England, Feb. 22, 1781, and died in London, Jan. 8, 1833. He acquired a good knowledge of Latin and Greek in his childhood; was apprenticed to learn the carpenter's trade when fourteen years old, but afterwards having joined the Methodists and been licensed by them to preach, he was released from his indentures, and was ordained in 1800. He afterwards withdrew from the Wesleyan body and joined the New Connection Methodists, but returned to his former relations, in 1812, with a "mind greatly enlarged," "his spirit much improved in Christian piety," and with new vigor. General attention was first drawn to his great abilities by the part which he took in promoting the missionary cause, in the aid of which his services were most eminent. He was very active in promoting the formation of the societies, which it was found necessary to organize, after the death of Dr. Coke, for the purpose of raising and supplying moneys for the support of the missions; and his missionary sermons and addresses, delivered in almost all the large towns in the kingdom, more than those of any other man, say his biographers, gave that impulse to the zeal of the Methodist societies and congregations which, in a few years, placed the income of the Wesleyan Missionary Society above that of every similar institution in England. He rendered valuable practical service for many years, following 1817, as secretary of this society, and was the author of those excellent reports which recorded the prosperous career of the society during his term, and which, being read with general interest, contributed materially to the cultivation of opinion in favor of missions, and to the advancement of the interests of the Wesleyan Missionary Society in particular. He took especial interest in the missions to the slaves in the West Indies. One of his last acts, before he was confined to his bed, was to write a letter to a British statesman on the subject of emancipation and the best means of bringing it about; and when he lay at the point of death, he expressed his thanks that he had "lived to see the day of civil and religious freedom dawn upon the poor slaves in the West Indies." Dr. Watson was still more distinguished as an author. When nineteen years old he published an "Apology for the People called Methodists;" his "Conversations for the Young" displays an accurate and extensive acquaintance with biblical literature, and is excellently adapted to its purpose: his "Life of Wesley," published in 1831, gives a fine outline of the personal history of the subject of the biography, as well as a vindication of the attitude of Methodism with reference to the national church. He was considerably advanced, at the time of his death, upon a "Commentary on the New Testament," of which the Gospels of Matthew and Mark were substantially complete, and were published in 1833. His principal works, and those by which he was best known, were the "Biblical and Theological Dictionary," published in 1831, which was among the best works of the kind in its day, and is still a treasure of theological information; and his "Theological Institutes," 1823 to 1828, which is still a standard text-book in all the Methodist Churches. A collection of his writings, with his memoirs, was published by the Rev. Thomas Jackson, in thirteen volumes, 1833 to 1837. His preaching was of a very high character, "scriptural, evangelical, and spiritual, and was generally attended by a large measure of pathos and heavenly unction. Of the Scriptures, and of Christian theology, his knowledge was so deep and comprehensive, that when he dwelt even upon the first principles of religion, an air of novelty appeared to be thrown over his discourses." He was a scholar of extensive reading, acquainted with several ancient and modern languages, and with most branches of science; "but it was as a theologian that he chiefly excelled." His belief in the inspiration of the Scriptures was firm; and he was opposed to all mere speculations in religion, and to all attempts "to bring down the mysteries of God to the reason and prejudices of men, to explain away the plain and obvious import of the sacred writings, and to introduce novelties into the church of Christ." His health was feeble, and his work, through most of his later years, was performed in pain, from which he was seldom exempt. He was president of the British Conference in 1826.

Watters, William, the only native American who was in the first Annual Conference in 1773, was born Oct. 16, 1751, in Baltimore Co., Md. He heard the early Methodists preach when about nineteen years of age, and was converted in his twentieth year. He commenced his ministerial work by assisting the Rev. Robert Williams, at Norfolk, and was received into the Conference on trial in 1773. In 1782, on account of pressing pecuniary matters, he obtained a location. He returned to the Conference in 1786; was afterwards located again, but re-entered the Conference in 1801, and continued to labor until 1805, when his health became too feeble for the ministerial work. He died in 1833, and was buried at Falls Church, Va. He was diligent, deeply pious, and very useful.

Waugh, Beverly, D.D., a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Fairfax Co., Va., Oct. 25, 1789, and died in the city of Baltimore.

Feb. 9, 1858. In his fifteenth year he attached himself to the church, and was for a time actively engaged in business. In 1809, in his twentieth year, he entered the Baltimore Conference, and for eighteen years filled a number of the most prominent appointments. In 1828 he was elected assistant book agent, being associated with John Emory, who was afterwards bishop, and in 1832 he was elected principal book agent. During these eight and during the twenty-two years of his episcopal services he was never absent from one of his Conferences. He shared with his colleagues the responsibility of presiding over five sessions of the General Conference, some of which were the most laborious and difficult known in the history of the church. It is supposed that the average number of preachers appointed by him per annum was probably 550, or about 12,000 altogether. His travels were exten-

years his name appears in the New York Conference, his election, as the rule then was, constituting him a member of that body. He was honored by his brethren with a seat in the General Conferences of 1816, 1820, 1828, and 1836. By the latter of these he was elected to the office of bishop. He filled that responsible position nearly twenty-two years, and after the death of Bishop Hedding, in 1852, was senior bishop of the church. The whole term of his ministry was nearly forty-nine years, during which he never was disqualified from labor; as long before the time of railroads his routes ranged from Michigan to Georgia, and from Maine to Texas. Of him Bishop James remarked, "During his whole term of episcopal service it is believed he traveled about 100,000 miles by all sorts of conveyances, preached 2000 sermons, presided over 150 Conferences, and ordained from 2500 to 3000 deacons and elders, besides services rendered on various special occasions." About two weeks before his death he visited Carlisle to assist in an interesting revival of religion. On his return home he was seized with erysipelas, but recovering was able to sit up in the evening before he died, and to converse a little with his friends. That night he passed away. The immediate cause of his death is supposed to have been an affection of the heart, as he expired in a moment and without a struggle. He was a pure specimen of a Christian gentleman, combining ministerial dignity with the simplicity and sweetness of a child. He was a good theologian, and as an administrator adhered most scrupulously to every part of the economy of the church. As a presiding officer he was dignified and courteous, always respectful and respected, evincing nothing of the prelate but much of the father in Christ, and always had the confidence and respect of his brethren. His remains rest in Mount Olivet Cemetery, Baltimore, near those of Bishops Asbury, George, and Emory.

Waugh, James W., D.D., a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, was born at Mereer, Pa., Feb. 27, 1832; was graduated from Alleghany College and the Garrett Biblical Institute; joined the Southern Illinois Conference in 1858, and was appointed a missionary to India in 1859. Here he served for more than ten years as superintendent of the mission press in Lucknow, in connection with which a large enterprise in publishing books and periodicals in the English and native languages was built up. He has been presiding elder of the Bareilly and Lucknow districts, was president of the India Conference in 1871, and was, in 1877, principal of the memorial school at Cawnpore. He was editor of the Kaukab i Iswe, or Christian Star, for four years; has published a volume of "Scripture Lessons" in Roman and lithograph Urdu, has published a volume of "Hymns" in Urdu, and the "Indian Temperance Singer," and has translated the three catechisms of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and some smaller books.

Waugh, Thomas, the patriarch for many years of the Irish Conference, was born in Bandon, 1785. While yet a babe in his mother's arms, Mr. Wesley put his hands upon his head and prayed that God might bless the child and make him an able minister of the New Testament. For sixty-five years the prayer was answered. Sagacious and intrepid, he largely influenced the public movements of his church, and was frequently commissioned to represent or defend her interests. He was a notable advocate of the Bible Society, a thrifty financier, and an unswerving administrator and disciplinarian. As a citizen he was trusted and influential; as a minister he was esteemed and venerated, and as a legislator in Conference he was potent, prudent, and far-seeing. He died in the eighty-eighth year of his age.

Waukegan, Ill. (pop. 4507), the capital of Lake

County, is situated on Lake Michigan, and on the Milwaukee division of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad. Methodist services were introduced in 1846. The first church was built in 1850, and refitted in 1867. A new church was built in Benton, Lake County, Ill., in August, 1877. It is in the Rock River Conference. The statistics for 1876 are: 195 members, 175 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $10,000.

Wayman, Alexander W., bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Caroline County, Md., Sept. 21, 1821. He early showed a fondness for books, and devoted much of his time to study. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1839, and with the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1840. He was licensed to exhort in 1840, and joined the Philadelphia Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in 1843. He was secretary of the General Conference of the African Methodist Episcopal Church for four successive terms. In 1864 he was elected a bishop, receiving the votes of eighty-four out of the ninety delegates in the General Conference, and was ordained on May 22 of the same year. In 1866 he organized the Florida, Georgia, and North Carolina Conferences of the African M. E. Church. At the General Conference of 1876 he was assigned to the episcopal district embracing the Ohio, Pittsburgh, Kentucky, Tennessee, and West Tennessee Conferences. He represented the General Conference of his church as a fraternal delegate to the Methodist Episcopal General Conferences of 1864 and 1876.

Weaver, Colonel James Riley, was born in Westmoreland Co., Pa., in 1839. Brought up on a farm, he began teaching at the age of seventeen, and subsequently entered Alleghany College. Just before his graduation, in 1862, at a call of the government, he volunteered in the Civil War and joined a company of cavalry, and was made sergeant-major. He was soon placed in command of a company, and in Meade's retreat from Culpepper Court-House their division was surrounded and he was taken prisoner. He was confined in Libby prison, in 1863-64, about nine months; thence was sent to Macon, Ga.; thence to Charleston, to be put under fire; and thence to Columbia, S. C., where he passed the winter of 1864-65. After a confinement of seventeen months he was exchanged. At the close of the war, having been breveted lieutenant-colonel for bravery, he pursued his studies in the General Biblical Institute, at Concord, and at the Garrett Biblical Institute, at Evanston. After teaching one year at Dixon Seminary, he was elected Professor of Mathematics and Military Tactics of Western Virginia University, which position he occupied for two years. In 1869 he was appointed by President Grant consul at Brindisi, Italy, and in the following spring consul at Antwerp, Belgium, in which post he (1878) remains. He united with the M. E. Church early in youth, and was for a short time connected with the ministry, but preferred the department of teaching.

taking of Quebec, in 1759. In that conflict he lost his right eye, and ever after wore a green shade. Having returned to England in 1764, he was awakened under the preaching of Mr. Wesley, and after a severe mental conflict of nearly a year, he obtained the consciousness of the forgiveness of sin. Being present where a minister was expected, who failed to attend, the captain was requested to speak to the people, and his effort was made a blessing to many. Subsequently he was licensed as a local preacher. He was sent to Albany, New York, about 1766, in charge of the Barracks, and hearing of a Methodist society being organized in New York, paid it an early visit. The few friends assembled in Mr. Embury's house were astonished and alarmed to see a British officer in uniform enter their room, but they were agreeably surprised when he made known to them that he was partner of a like precious faith. He became their most active preacher: was the leading spirit in obtaining the site for the John Street church, and headed the subscription with £30, being the largest amount then contributed by any individual. During the building of the church he visited Philadelphia, and not only organized a Methodist society but collected £32 to aid the church in New York. In 1769 he actively aided Mr. Pilmoor and the society in Philadelphia in the purchase of St. George's church, contributing also to it. He extended his efforts to Long Island, to many places in New Jersey and Delaware, and also visited Baltimore. In 1772 he returned to Europe, one object of his visit being to urge Mr. Wesley to send additional preachers. He visited many places in England, and endeavored to secure the services of Mr. Benson as missionary to America. Failing in this, he returned in 1773 with Thomas Rankin and Mr. Yearly.

He was an earnest and eloquent minister. Mr. Wesley, in writing to a friend in Limerick, said, "Captain Webb is now in Dublin—invite him to Limerick; he is a man of fire, and the power of God constantly attends his word." Mr. Wesley heard him, and says, "I admire the wisdom of God in still raising up preachers according to the various tastes of men. The captain is all life and fire: therefore, although he is not deep or regular, yet many who would not hear a better preacher flock together to hear him, and many are convinced under his preaching, some justified, a few built up in love." Charles Wesley did not regard him so favorably, and says, "He is an inexperienced, honest, zealous, loving enthusiast." In 1774, John Adams, of Massachusetts, heard him preach in St. George's, and says, "In the evening I went to the Methodist meeting, and heard Mr. Webb, the old soldier, who first came to America in the character of a quartermaster under General Braddock. He is one of the most fluent, eloquent men I have ever heard. He reaches the imagination and touches the passions very well, and expresses himself with great propriety." At the breaking out of the Revolutionary War he returned to England, and resided near Bristol, where he built a Methodist chapel at his own expense. He died suddenly, December 20, 1796, at the age of about seventy-two.

Though not a thorough scholar, he was in the habit of using the Greek Testament, and before leaving America he gave his copy to a brother minister. It subsequently came into the possession of Bishop Scott. He well deserved the title of the first Apostle of Methodism in America.

Webster, Alonzo, a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1856, 1860, and 1876, was born in Vermont, and joined the New Hampshire Conference in 1837. When the Conference was divided, he was assigned to the Vermont Conference, where, besides performing regularly his duties as pastor and presiding elder, he conducted the Vermont Christian Messenger for nine years. In 1865 he was assigned to the Southern work of the church, in connection with the South Carolina Conference. He was appointed a professor in Baker Theological Institute,

S. C. in 1869, and president of Claflin University in 1870. In 1874 he was appointed presiding elder of the Charleston district.

Webster, John M., a delegate from the Troy Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Whitehall, N. Y., in 1828; was educated at the Troy Conference Academy, engaged in teaching, and became superintendent of public instruction of the township in which he resided. He began to preach in 1852, and joined the Troy Conference in 1854. He was appointed a presiding elder in 1873.

Webster, Norman, a delegate from the Florida Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Weston, Vt., in 1824, and joined the Vermont Conference in 1847. He located in 1857, on account of an affection of the throat, studied medicine, and received the degree of M.D. He entered the Southern work of the church about 1870, where he has served for several years as a presiding elder in the Florida Conference.

Webster, Thomas, was born in Lake Park County, Wicklow, Ireland, Oct. 24, 1809, and removed to Canada, where he was educated in the common schools. He joined the Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada in 1838, and served it for several years as its secretary. In connection with the Rev. Joseph H. Leonard he originated the Canada Christian Advocate, and was its editor during the first six years of its existence. He was a delegate to the General Conference of the M. E. Church, which was held in Buffalo, N. Y., in 1860. He served as presiding elder for several years, and has filled the stations of a member of the board of Belleville Academy and a member of the senate of Albert University. He is the author of a "History of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada," of the "Life of Bishop Richardson," of a work entitled "Woman Man's Equal," and of several pamphlets, most of which are on subjects relating to connectional affairs. Since he took a superannuated relation he has devoted much of his time to writing for the religious papers.

Weed, Alonzo S., publisher of Zion's Herald, was born in Sandwich, N. H., March 13, 1827. In 1844 he went to Bangor, Me., and entered into mercantile business, in which he remained until 1871. He united with the M. E. Church in 1852; held official positions, and for twelve years was superintendent of the Sunday-school. He was one of the founders and trustees of the Conference Seminary, at Bucksport, Me., and was, for many years, its treasurer. He was also a member of the municipal government of Bangor. In 1871 he was, by a unanimous vote of the Wesleyan Association, elected to his present position. His residence is Newton, Mass., where he is a member of the common council.

Wells, Joseph, was born March 21, 1798. In 1828 a Methodist Protestant church was organized in his own dwelling-house, at Wellsville, O., of which he became an enthusiastic member. He has been so closely identified with the Wellsville Methodist church that it has been called familiarly "Uncle Josey's Church." For seven years before the church of his choice was formed in his place he carried on his Christian duties in the home and community, but declined a union with the Methodist Episcopal body, of which his relatives were members. He has served his church as trustee, class-leader, steward, delegate to the Annual Conference, and three times has been elected a representative to the General Conference. He has been liberal in his gifts to the church and general interests, and may be classed with the worthy pioneer laymen of the M. P. Church.

Wells, William, Ph.D., LL.D., professor in Union College, and a lay delegate from the Troy Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872 and 1876, was born in New York City about 1820, received an academic education in Philadelphia, and a university education in Europe, at the College of France, Paris, at Vienna, and at Berlin. He returned to the United States in 1850, and engaged in teaching the modern languages at Cincinnati, O. He was for several years a contributor to the Ladies' Repository. In 1852 he was elected Professor of Modern Languages in Genesee College. He remained here twelve years, performing a part of the time the additional duties of principal of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, till 1865, when he was elected Professor of Modern Languages in Union College. He has been a frequent contributor to the periodicals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to the Independent, and to Scribner's Monthly; was associated with Dr. Taylor Lewis in the preparation of the book of Genesis for Lange's Commentary, and translated the book of Ecclesiastes for the same work.

Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church.—See CALVINISTIC METHODISTS.

Welsh Domestic Missions in the United States.—The first Welsh domestic missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States were established within the territory of the Black River Conference, in 1828. These missions have never made a prominent figure in the work of the church, for several reasons, among the chief of which are, the limited extent of the Welsh emigration to the United States; the fact that the newcomers are readily found out by the people of the same nationality, who are already attached to the churches and drawn along with them; and the pursuit by the Missionary Society of the policy of transferring the members of the mission churches at the earliest practicable date to the regularly-organized churches in their neighborhood, thus causing them to be absorbed into the general mass of members. The Welsh Calvinistic Methodist Church, a national church, is well established at nearly all the principal centres of Welsh immigration, and receives a large proportion of the immigrants. In 1850 five Methodist Episcopal missions were reported, one each in the Black River (organized 1828), Pittsburgh (1841), and Oneida (1849), and two in the Wisconsin Conference (1847 and 1850), with 5 missionaries and 110 members. In 1855 missions had been added in the Cincinnati (1851), Ohio (1851), Wyoming (1853), Baltimore (1853), and New York (1853) Conferences, with a third mission in the Wisconsin Conference (1854), and a second in the Ohio Conference (1853), which returned in all 19 preaching-places, 430 members, 27 probationers, 8 local preachers, 12 Sunday-schools, with 68 teachers and 388 Sunday-school scholars. In 1860 the number of missions was 11, with 528 members, 89 probationers, 9 churches, the total value of which was $10,250, and 1 parsonage, valued at $100. The report for 1862 stated that the policy of incorporation of the missions with American churches was receiving increased attention. In the following year (1863), several of the missions having been transferred to the American churches contiguous to them, the report gave but 3 missionaries, in the Oneida and Wisconsin Conferences, with 2 churches, 3 local preachers, and 116 members. In 1866 but one mission was reported, in the Oneida Conference, with 42 members, 4 probationers, and 2 local preachers. In 1868 there were 3 missions, in the Central New York, Erie, and Wisconsin Conferences. In 1870 the number of missions was again reduced to one, which was in the Central New York Conference, but a mission at Nekimi, Wis., continued to be supported by the Wisconsin Conference. The latter mission had, in 1874, 1 missionary, 1 church, 1 local preacher, and 40 members. In 1876 the mission in Central New York, now returned as attached to the Northern New York Conference, had 1 missionary, 3 local preachers, 60 members, 6 probationers, and 1 church, valued at $4000. It received an appropriation of $150 from the Missionary Society, and contributed $52 to the treasury of the society. An American edition of the "Wesleyan Welsh Hymn-Book" was published in 1854, by order of the Missionary Society, for the use of the Welsh missions in the United States.

Wentworth, Erastus, D.D., was born in Stonington, Conn., Aug. 5, 1813. His parents shortly afterwards removed to Norwich, where he spent his boyhood and early youth under the instruction of the Congregational Church. The Methodists had worshiped for many years in an old school-house. They built a new church in 1831, the dedication of which was followed by a revival, of which young Wentworth was one of the first converts. In 1832 he became a student at the Oneida Conference Seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y., whence he entered Wesleyan University, in 1834. He was graduated in 1837, and in the following year was made teacher of Natural Science in the Black River Conference Academy, Gouverneur, N. Y. He joined the Black River Conference in 1841, and was called in the same year to a position in the Troy Conference Academy, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., similar to the one he occupied at Gouverneur. In 1846 he was elected president of McKendree College, Ill., where he spent four years, till 1850, when he was chosen Professor of Natural Science in Dickinson College. In 1854 he was appointed missionary to Foo Chow, China, where he spent some years, and saw the openings of what has since proved one of the most fruitful and profitable of Methodist missions in heathen lands. Since his return to the United States, in 1862, he has been successively stationed, six years in Troy, N. Y., three in Pittsfield, Mass., and one in Amsterdam, N. Y. He was elected by the Troy Conference to represent the church in the General Conferences of 1868, 1872, and 1876. The General Conference of 1872 elected him editor of The Ladies' Repository, and editor of the books of the Western Book Concern, Cincinnati, O. Though his professional life has been largely spent in writing, he has confined his labors to fugitive pieces in papers, magazines, and quarterlies, and a few published sermons. In 1876 he was appointed one of a committee of fifteen to revise the Methodist Hymn-Book.

Wesley, Charles, a brother and co-laborer of John Wesley, and the author of numerous exquisite Christian hymns, was the third son of the Rev. Samuel Wesley, and was born at Epworth, Dec. 18, 1708. He received the beginning of his education from his mother, and was afterwards sent, when eight years old, to Westminster School, where he was placed under the care of his eldest brother, Samuel Wesley. This brother was a strong High-Churchman, and taught Charles those principles of devotion to the Establishment and the ministerial succession which formed a distinguishing feature of his religious life. While at this school, young Wesley received a proposal from Mr. Garrett Wesley, of Ireland, to live with him and become his heir. He declined, and the Irish gentleman adopted another person, who was destined to become the ancestor of the Marquis of Wellesley and the Duke of Wellington. Charles Wesley was admitted a scholar of St. Peter's College, Westminster, in 1721, and was elected to Christ Church College, Oxford, in 1726, his brother John having about that time removed from Christ Church to Lincoln College. He did not at first share his brother's religious convictions, but in the course of three years he became very much concerned regarding his soul, and attentive to the services of the church. Associating with himself two or three other students, a band was formed who were marked above their fellow-students for diligence and fidelity in attention to religious exercises, and for the methodical manner in which they pursued their studies and improved their time. From these traits they received the name of Methodists. After John Wesley returned to Oxford, in November, 1729, this band, under his influence, became a regular society for the mutual quickening of the diligence and zeal of its members, and their encouragement in seeking to lead a life of piety. Charles Wesley continued in the college as a tutor after having received his degree, and was for a time intending to devote his life to that profession. When, however, John Wesley determined to go to Georgia, in 1735, he decided to be ordained a minister and accompany him. He was ordained deacon by the Bishop of Oxford, and priest by the Bishop of London. It was arranged that in addition to his functions as a missionary Charles Wesley should perform the duties of a secretary to Governor Oglethorpe. He was accordingly stationed at Fredonia, where the governor had fixed his residence. He began to labor zealously as a minister of the gospel, but was met with a violent opposition from the people, and received very obvious marks of displeasure and even contumely from the governor himself. This painful situation was ended by the arrival of John Wesley from Savannah, who expostulated with the governor upon the treatment which his brother had received, and effected a reconciliation between the two. In 1736, Mr. Wesley was sent to England as a bearer of dispatches. The vessel on which he had embarked proved to be a poor one and badly officered, and, as the weather was stormy, it was forced to put into Boston for repairs. Here, during an attack of sickness, he was treated with the greatest kindness by the people and the ministers. He proceeded to England in the fall, and arrived at Deal on the 31 of December, 1736. He was still anxious about his religious condition, feeling that he had not received the new life. He visited Mr. William Law, whose writings he and his brother had highly valued, but could receive no satisfaction from him. He afterwards became acquainted with Count Zinzendorf, of the Moravian Church, and subsequently with Peter Bohler, under whose teaching he became acquainted with the doctrine of regeneration and a living faith. Other men came to instruct him, "Mr. Bray, a poor, ignorant mechanic, who knows nothing but Christ; yet by knowing him, knows and discerns all things," and Mr. Ainsworth, the author of the "Latin Dictionary;" he received instruction from Luther's work on the Epistle to the Galatians, in which the doctrine of justification by faith was clearly set forth; finally, on the 21st of May, 1738, all was made clear to him, and he received peace. He had been in feeble health ever since his return from America, and was not able to preach publicly till the following fall. During the interim he occupied much of his time in visiting the Newgate prison, instructing and comforting the convicts. He accepted a curacy at Islington, near London, but soon offended the members by the earnestness of his views, and was excluded from the church by violence. He continued his voluntary labors in London, preaching wherever he had opportunity, in churches and in the fields, with great popularity among the multitude, but receiving opposition and violence from the clergy, and at length went to Bristol, to take the place of his brother John. After the death of Samuel Wesley, in November, 1739, he assisted John Wesley in opening the Foundry in Moorfields, the first separate place of Methodist worship, and in the organization of the United Societies. The following years were spent in traveling, a part of the time around London and Bristol, a part in longer journeys, which extended to almost every corner of the kingdom, and to Wales. He seldom stayed long in one place, and "in fatigues, in dangers, and in ministerial labors he was, for many years, not inferior to his brother." The stories of the hardships, the persecutions, and the abuse which he suffered, and of the enthusiasm which he awakened among the masses, forms a record hardly less thrilling than that of John Wesley. In the course of his ministrations in Wales he became the guest of Marma-duke Gwynne, a gentleman and officer of the peace, who had become converted under the preaching of Howell Harris. The ultimate result of this connection was his marriage to Sarah Gwynne, in whom he found a loving wife, and a companion in many of his journeys. After 1756 he ceased to itinerate on a large scale, but confined his labors chiefly to the neighborhood of London and Bristol. He continued in union with the Methodists to the end of his life, and he rendered, says Mr. Thomas Jackson, in his "Life," "the most important service to the cause of true religion, though in a more limited sphere than he had been accustomed to occupy." His cessation from active energy appears to have been attended with depressing influences upon his mind, and his later years were troubled by anxieties lest the Methodists should leave the church. His High-Churchmanship was one of his most prominent characteristics, and controlled his expressions and acts in a degree which sharply distinguished him from his brother and their co-laborers, High-Churchmen though they also were. When in 1758 John Wesley published his "Reasons against a Separation from the Church of England," he affixed a postscript to the pamphlet approving it in emphatic terms, and signifying that his views were much stronger than those therein expressed. Charles Wesley is best known as a writer of hymns, and in this capacity he has rendered a distinguished service to the whole Christian church. He was one of the most voluminous of hymn-writers, and his works were as various in quality as they were numerous; but it is safe to say that his best hymns are not excelled by those of any other author. A large proportion of them were in effect improvisations, others were suggested by particular occasions, as afflictions, sufferings, funerals, and the like. Hundreds of the best of them have passed into literature and into the hymn-books of the several Protestant denominations, where they are found to serve the wants and aspirations of others as well as they did those of their author. The first hymn-book was published by the Wesleys in 1738, and contained, along with selections from other authors, some original hymns. A second and third hymn-book, of more varied character, were published in the course of the next year, a fourth in 1740, a fifth in 1742, of which the greater part of the hymns were written by Charles Wesley. A tract of "Hymns for Times of Trouble," was published in the same year, appropriate to the disturbed condition of the country in connection with the wars with France and Spain. This was followed by frequent publications of small collections of hymns of a special character or for especial occasions, as on the festivals of the church, the Trinity, for funerals, for families, etc. "Hymns and Sacred Poems," in two volumes, published in 1749, was the first collection in which the name of Charles Wesley alone appeared as the author. A collection of the "Poems of John and Charles Wesley," reprinted from the originals, with the last corrections of the authors, collected and arranged by G. Osborn, D.D., and published at the Wesleyan Conference office, London (1868 to 1872), includes all the poems identified as original in the fifty-seven publications issued by the two brothers, with the poems of Charles Wesley not before published. Mr. Wesley died on the 29th of March, 1788, and was buried in Marylebone church-yard.

Wesley College.—The Conference which was held in Georgia in 1789, resolved to establish a literary institution, and a number of friends agreed to purchase at least 2000 acres of good land for its support. A subscription was taken in one congregation of 12,500 pounds of tobacco, which it was estimated would purchase, clear of expenses, about £100 sterling. The Conference proposed to erect the institution in five years, and Dr. Coke adds, we "do most humbly entreat Mr. Wesley to permit us to name it 'Wesley College,' as a memorial of his affection for poor Georgia, and of our great respect for him." How much was done for this institution is not now known; there are several allusions to it as "Wesley and Whitefield Seminary." After the destruction of Cokesbury College by fire, an impression prevailed that it was not the mission of the Methodists to spend their time and means in educational efforts for literary culture, but to devote all their attention to the work of evangelism. Barton W. Stone, in his Life, says, "The Methodists had just established an academy near Washington, under the superintendence of Mr. Hope Hull, a very distinguished brother of that denomination. From the influence of my brothers I was chosen 'Professor of Languages.' We commenced with about seventy students the beginning of 1795. . . . About this time a great many French who had fled from the terror in France landed in Georgia. Washington was full of them. The trustees of the academy employed one of them (François Aubir) to teach the French language. I continued to teach till the spring of 1796."

Wesley Family, The.—The records of the Wesley family were destroyed at the burning of the parsonage house at Epworth, in 1709, so that the genealogy of all the children born at Epworth previous to that event is lost. Of the nineteen children of Mr. Samuel Wesley, the names of only thirteen can be recovered; and of most even of these, little or nothing is known. As far as can be judged from references in the letters and journals of the members of the family, the order of the children is as follows:

1. Samuel Wesley, born in London, Feb. 10, 1690, died Nov. 6, 1739. (See sketch.)

2. Susannah Wesley, born at South Ormsby, 1691, died 1693.

3. Emelia Wesley, afterwards Mrs. Harper, born at South Ormsby, 1692, died about 1770.

4 and 5. Annesley and Jedediah Wesley, twins, born at South Ormsby, 1695, died in infancy.

6. Susannah Wesley, afterwards Mrs. Ellvine, born at South Ormsby, 1695. She had four children: John, who left two daughters and a son: Ann, married to Pierre le Lièvre, and afterwards to Mr. Gantt; Deborah, married Pierre Collet; and Richard Annesley, who left two daughters.

7. Mary Wesley, born probably at Epworth, 1696, married John Whitelamb, her father's curate.

8. Mehetabel Wesley, afterwards Mrs. Wright, born at Epworth, 1697, died 1751.

9. Anne Wesley, afterwards Mrs. Lambert, born at Epworth, 1702.

10. John Wesley. (See sketch.)

11. Martha Wesley, afterwards Mrs. Hall, born at Epworth, 1703, died 1791; had ten children: was a friend of Dr. Samuel Johnson and other learned men.

12. Charles Wesley. (See sketch.)

13. Kezziah Wesley, born at Epworth, 1710, died 1741.

Wesley, John, of Whitechurch, grandfather of the founder of Methodism, was a son of the Rev. Bartholomew Wesley, rector of Catherston and Charmouth, Dorsetshire, who was ejected from his living at Charmouth in 1662, under the Act of Uniformity. John Wesley was religiously inclined from his earliest childhood, having had, it is said, a serious concern for his salvation when a lad at school. After his conversion, he kept in his diary a regular record of his religious experiences, with little intermission, to the end of his life. He was educated at Oxford University, where he was noticed for his seriousness and diligence, and where he applied himself particularly to the Oriental languages. He next appears as a member of "a particular church at Melcombe," by which he was sent to preach among the seamen at Radipole, near Weymouth. In 1658 he was appointed minister of Winterborn Whitechurch, and was installed into his office after having been approved by the triers, or the committee of ministers, and others who were appointed under the Protectorate to test the qualifications of candidates for installation as parish ministers. He refused to use the book of Common Prayer in the services of his church, and was consequently involved in trouble soon after the Restoration. He was called before the bishop of Bristol, who questioned him regarding his title to the ministry, his proceedings and his doctrines, and he returned such straightforward answers that the bishop decided not to disturb him. He was arrested in 1661, and committed to jail, and afterwards released on bonds to appear for trial. He returned to his parish, and served it till August 17, 1662, when he preached a farewell sermon. The parish was declared vacant under the Act of Uniformity in the following October. He removed with his family to Melcombe, but the corporation prohibited his settlement there. He went thence to Ilminster, Bridgewater, and Taunton, was received kindly by the Dissenters in all of these places, and was employed almost every day in preaching. He afterwards accepted the offer of a house from a gentleman of Preston, near Weymouth, where he spent the most of the remainder of his life, preaching, when he had opportunity, in private, so as to avoid arrest under the act of 1665, which imposed a new oath upon Dissenting ministers, with severe penalties if they preached in violation of it, or without first taking the oath. He was, however, several times arrested, and four times imprisoned under this act. He neither professed to officiate as a pastor or to administer the rites of the church, but only to preach. In his interview with the bishop of Bristol, he said that he was "called to the work of the ministry, though not to the office." The date of his birth and death are not given. It is stated that he began to preach when twenty-two years of age, and the first mention of his preaching is in 1658. His wife was a niece of the distinguished divine, Thomas Fuller, prebend of Salisbury. She survived her husband several years, and was living in 1710.

Wesley, John.—Methodism recognizes as its chief founder, under God, and its active organizer,

John Wesley. He was born at Epworth, in England, June 17, 1703. On his father's side he was descended from a long line of active, intelligent, and pious ministers of the Church of England. His mother was the daughter of Dr. Annesley, an eminent Non-conformist minister, but herself strongly attached to the national church. His father was rector of the parish in Epworth, where he continued until his death. Though one of a numerous family, which possessed but scanty means, his education, as well as that of his brothers, was watched over early and carefully by his mother. He was remarkable for intellectual vigor and culture. He was taught the rudimentary branches of an English education, while at the same time she earnestly instilled into his youthful mind religious principles, having special personal conversation and prayer with him once a week. At about thirteen years of age he entered the "Charter-House" school in London, where he had eminent teachers and talented associates; from thence he entered Oxford University, having been elected to a scholarship therein. In his personal habits he was careful and exemplary. Though not decidedly religious in his earlier years, he was regular and moral in all his habits. He was remarkably proficient in his studies, and, passing through a regular course of the university, he was elected a Fellow in Lincoln College, and subsequently he acted as tutor in Greek and other branches. He was ordained a priest at the age of twenty-four, but continued to pursue his studies connected with the university, and was distinguished for his methodical and logical performances, and for his pure, classical taste. For a short time he acted as a curate for his father, and also as a curate for a church near Oxford, but he preferred the quiet retirement of the university. In 1729 he gathered around him a number of thoughtful and earnest young men, among whom was his brother Charles, and subsequently the eloquent and the untiring Whitefield. They read together the Greek Testament daily, engaged in prayer, formed plans for improvement, and were active in all benevolent works, and in visiting the poor and sick prisoners. His father and friends urged him to assume the regular duties of the ministry, but his heart longed for a wider field, and early he uttered that remarkable exclamation, which was the key-note of his life, "The world is my parish!"

In 1735, at the request of Governor Oglethorpe, who had founded a colony in Georgia, he agreed to become a missionary to the colonists and to the Indians. During his passage, and during his whole stay in the colony, he was ceaselessly active in doing good. He held services, not only in English, but also read prayers in German and French, for the benefit of the few foreigners who were then in the colony. His religious life was exceedingly strict, and by the severity of religious discipline he excited the opposition of several leading families. By these he was so embarrassed, that in about two years he returned to England. His visit to America, however, changed the whole course of his life. He formed the acquaintance of some Moravians, who questioned him closely touching his religious experience, and he became satisfied that he had not attained the true experience of a thorough Christian life. Hence he says in his journal, "I went to America to convert the Indians, but oh! who shall convert me? . . . I have a fair summer religion; I can talk well; nay, and believe myself, while no danger is near, but let death look me in the face, and my spirit is troubled, nor can I say, 'to die is gain.'" Returning to England, he cultivated the acquaintance of the Moravians, and became deeply anxious for a clear religious assurance. His brother Charles preceded him in that experience, but owing possibly to his logical cast of mind, and his determination not to rest without the fullest evidence, his doubts were not so soon removed. He became, however, more earnest in his ministry, and wherever he preached thousands attended.

One evening in May, 1738, while attending a Moravian prayer-meeting, where one was reading Luther's preface to the "Epistle to the Romans," where "justification by faith" was clearly set forth, he says, "I felt my heart strangely warmed. I felt I did trust in Christ, Christ alone, for salvation; and an assurance was given me that he had taken away my sins, even mine, and saved me from the law of sin and death. I began to pray with all my might for those who had in an especial manner despitely used me and persecuted me. I then testified to all there what I now felt in my heart." He was then nearly thirty-five years of age, an accomplished scholar, an acute theologian, and an able writer.

Desiring more fully to understand the discipline and order of the Moravians, he visited Herrnhut, which was the centre of their institutions and operations. On his visit he stopped at Halle to see the devoted Francke, and to inspect his "orphan house," his publications, and his plans. This visit probably did much to shape his future course and the plan of his religious activities. During his absence, Whitefield and Charles Wesley had been preaching with such earnestness, that the clergy, becoming offended, had closed their doors. On his return, Mr. Wesley immediately commenced his career of great activity. A few days after his arrival he makes the following record: "I began to declare in mine own country the glad tidings of salvation to a large company in the minorities. On Monday I rejoiced to meet our little society, which now consists of thirty-two persons. The next day I went to the condemned felons in Newgate, and offered them 'a free salvation.' In the evening I went to a society in Bear Yard, and preached 'repentance and remission of sins.' Though his doctrine was that of the church, though he was a minister in regular standing, had shown his devotion by his mission to America, and though his manner was calm and deeply serious, yet the churches were soon closed against him. He, however, visited prisons and hospitals, and preached daily in them, as well as to small societies in private places.

The year 1739 opened in a remarkable manner. With a few ministers and members he was holding a "watch-night" in Fetter Lane, and says, "About three in the morning we were continuing instant in prayer; the power of God came mightily upon us, insomuch that many cried out for exceeding joy, and many fell to the ground. As soon as we had recovered a little from the awe and the amazement which the presence of the divine Majesty had inspired, we 'broke out with one voice': 'We praise thee, O God! we acknowledge thee to be the Lord God.'" On the 5th of January several ministers met, and continued in fasting and prayer until three o'clock, when they separated, as Mr. Wesley says, "with the full conviction that God was about to do great things among us." Mr. Whitefield went to Bristol, and, finding the pulpits closed against him, began to preach to the colliers at Kingswood in the open air. The results were so astonishing that he sent for Mr. Wesley, who had hesitated as to the propriety of out-door preaching. Seeing its results, he commenced a similar career from that time forward, preaching in various public places to congregations estimated at from ten to fifty thousand.

This year was memorable for the proper commencement of organized Methodism. The societies to which allusion has been made were Moravian in their character, but, to use Mr. Wesley's language, "In the latter end of the year 1739 eight or ten persons came to me in London, and desired that I would spend some time with them in prayer, and advise them how to flee from the wrath to come." For this purpose he set apart Thursday evening in each week; the same evening his mother had set aside to converse with him during his boyhood. He informs us that twelve came the first evening, forty the next, and soon one hundred. The same year he laid the foundation of a church in Bristol, and he purchased in London a building called "the Foundry," which he fitted up for religious worship. While thus busied in preaching, visiting, organizing societies, and collecting money for places of worship, he, together with his brother Charles, published a volume of "Hymns and Sacred Poems." This passed through a number of editions, and some of the earliest contained not only the hymns, but the music also, on opposite pages, in copper-plate engraving; and on the title-page of one edition we find, "For the voice, harpsichord, and organ."

Unable to attend to the instruction of all his societies, he selected the most promising of his members to conduct the prayer-services in his absence. One of these, Mr. Thomas Maxfield, began to preach, and Mr. Wesley, hearing of it, hastened home to stop the disorder; but being cautioned earnestly by his mother, who assured him that the young man was as surely called of God to preach as he was, he listened and was convinced that God was in the work. Giving his sanction to this precedent, there was introduced into modern Christendom an element of power, the influence of which has been steadily increasing.

That the financial matters might be more carefully arranged, he appointed men to act as stewards, who should have charge of all the moneys raised in the societies, so that disbursements might be properly made. These societies were divided into classes of about twelve, one of whom was called the leader, and whose chief duty at first was to collect a penny a week from each member, visiting them at their houses and at their places of work. These leaders found some to be unworthy and disorderly, and made report to Mr. Wesley. He perceived at once both the moral and spiritual value which might be attached to this organization, and directed that the members of each class should meet their leader once a week: that the meeting should be opened and closed with prayer, and that religious conversation should be held and proper instruction given. These leaders in turn met Mr. Wesley an evening of each week, and made report both of their meetings and collections; and thus class-meetings and leaders' meetings arose.

From time to time he sent his lay preachers to visit different points, and under their labors others were raised up in various localities. For the proper distribution of these labors, and to prevent interference, he arranged the boundaries of circuits, and in 1744 called these helpers together to meet him annually in conference. These conferences proved to be a centre of unity for all the Methodist societies; to it they sent their reports, and from it they received their ministers. Thus, step by step, the whole organization of Wesleyan Methodism arose; not as a preconceived system, but to meet the growing wants of a religious community organized under the influences of a revival. From that day to this organized Methodism and revivals have gone hand in hand, and wherever the revival spirit has decayed, controversies and difficulties have arisen in reference to its organization. Mr. Wesley himself was the great central power which kept all parts of his machinery in motion. He was a man of tireless activity. He slept but seven hours in the twenty-four; redeemed his moments with more ceaseless watchfulness than a miser cares for his gold; he traveled extensively over the kingdom, reading on his journey the most valuable works which issued from the press; conducted an immense correspondence; engaged in writing and in abridging books which constituted a numerous library; founded a school for the children of ministers and others, for which he begged money from door to door; published tracts and distributed them freely; visited personally every member of his societies every three months in London, and ultimately established a Monthly Religious Magazine. His labors in any one of these departments would have seemed to be sufficient for any ordinary man; yet, with all this, he preached sometimes as often as five sermons in a day, and usually two or three in one place. We find this remarkable entry in his journal: "Here I rested for two weeks that I might write up my notes, preaching only every morning and evening." This spirit of energy and self-sacrifice inspired his early ministers, and imparted that efficiency to the system which has been one great agency in giving to it its remarkable success.

In 1769 he sent two missionaries to America, himself contributing freely and taking up a collection, which amounted to a donation of £50 to the church building in New York and £20 for the passage of his missionaries. In 1771 and 1773 he sent additional missionaries to America, among whom was Francis Asbury, the future apostle and bishop of American Methodism. In the earlier organization of his societies, Mr. Wesley appears to have had no thought in reference to the future. He simply designed to afford facilities to the members of the Established Church and to others who might choose to unite with them for the maintenance of a higher and holier life; but as the membership in these societies increased, as house after house was built, the question as to the future pressed constantly upon him. He consulted eminent legal counsel as to the best mode of securing the church property for the purposes to which it had been consecrated. Under that legal advice he selected one hundred ministers, whose names were enrolled in a deed in chancery under the name of the "Conference of the Methodist Societies," and all church property was to be held in trust under the direction and for the use of the ministers sent from time to time by that Conference. By that wise arrangement the property of Wesleyan Methodism has been fully secured; the validity of the proceedings and of the title having been recognized by the highest courts of the kingdom.

At the close of the Revolutionary War his mind was deeply exercised as to the future of the Methodist societies in America. The colonies had become an independent nation; the power of the English Church had ceased; and he saw no reason why, in the United States, an independent organization might not be formed. At first he applied to the Bishop of London for the ordination of some of his ministers, but this was refused. In his careful reading of church history he had become satisfied that bishops and presbyters were essentially but one order, and that the bishops had been elected, and in various instances had been ordained, by the elders of the church for their office of supervision. Feeling that in the emergency it was his duty to provide for the organization of the Methodist societies of America, and preferring an Episcopal form, he selected Dr. Thomas Coke, an accomplished scholar, a graduate of Oxford University, and an active and indefatigable minister, who had assisted him for some years; and, after full consultation and prayers, with the assistance of several presbyters of the Church of England, he ordained him to the office of superintendent.

In this service he used, with some alterations, the ritual for the ordination of bishops in the Church of England. He also ordained Mr. Whatcoat and Mr. Vasey as elders to accompany Dr. Coke. He also nominated Francis Asbury to be ordained as superintendent, with Dr. Coke, of the Methodist societies in the United States. For their use he abridged the Prayer-Book, omitting those articles which had a Calvinistic tendency, and those expressions which might be construed as teaching baptismal regeneration. He also substituted in the ritual the word "superintendent" for "bishop," and "elder" for "priest." Of this book he printed an edition and sent it with the general minutes, which embraced his ministerial directions for the guidance and government of the infant church. The ministers in America joyfully received Dr. Coke: organized in the closing days of 1784 the "Methodist Episcopal Church," adopting the "Prayer-Book" and "Ritual" sent by Mr. Wesley, and electing Dr. Coke and Francis Asbury as their superintendents, or bishops; and Mr. Asbury was ordained as deacon, elder, and superintendent.

Thus arose the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, the only form of Methodism which, in its economy, bears the impress of Mr. Wesley's mind; for, as he said in his letter of address to them, that, being independent of the English government, "they are now at full liberty simply to follow the Scriptures and the primitive church." The organization of Wesleyan Methodism in England was trammelled by the existence of the national church, which, under the law of the land, had peculiar privileges.

Having thus secured the interests of church property in England, and the establishment of an independent church in America, Mr. Wesley continued his labors, journeying and writing until, in his eighty-eighth year, in March, 1791, he gently and sweetly passed away. In his latter moments he loved to reiterate his simple reliance on the atonement of Christ, as a sinner saved by grace. He rejoiced in the work which had been accomplished, and one of his last exclamations was, "The best of all is, God is with us."

Thus rested from his labors one of the purest and most devoted of men who have graced our earth since the days of the apostles. He was a man who might have excelled in any department of literature or of active work. Though he had been reproached, derided, and abused by many of his contemporaries, yet before his death the great heart of the masses everywhere did him homage, and men in every circle of society were glad to meet him in the few moments to which he limited his social intercourse. He was the beloved and honored friend of Dr. Samuel Johnson, and his opinions and views were respected by the highest dignitaries in the British government. In the early agitations that preceded the Revolutionary conflict he abridged and printed an edition of Dr. Johnson's "Address to the Colonies," which took strong ground against the war and against independence; but when the conflict seemed inevitable he addressed, privately, a strong letter to the British Secretary, Lord North, protesting most earnestly against the course of the British government, and warning them of the consequences that would follow. This correspondence was not made public until after his death. His life, written by Southey, the poet laureate of England, was a favorite book with Mr. Coleridge, and on which he made free annotations. Mr. Southey considered him one of the greatest and purest of men. Macaulay said, "He was a man whose eloquence and logical acuteness might have rendered him eminent in literature; whose genius was not inferior to that of Richelieu." Buckle styles him "the first of theological statesmen." Dr. Dobbin wrote, "A greater poet may rise than Homer or Milton, a greater theologian than Calvin, a greater philosopher than Bacon, a greater dramatist than any of ancient or modern fame, but a more distinguished revivalist of the churches than John Wesley, never." To-day, men of all denominations honor his memory as one of the moral heroes and leaders of our race. Recently a memorial tablet, through the munificence and energy of Dr. Jobson, has been placed in Westminster Abbey, by permission of Dean Stanley, recognizing him as one of England's noblest sons.

On all great moral questions he was almost a century in advance of his age. Unaided and alone, he commenced the publication of tracts, and issued, in little sheets, "A Word to a Swearer," "A Word to a Drinker," and "A Word to a Sabbath-Breaker;" and so in reference to other forms of vice. He was a careful observer of the holy Sabbath; an enemy of every form of wickedness. He was among the first in England to raise his voice against the enormities of "slave-trading" and of "slavery." He cheered Wilberforce in the commencement of his great work of reform. He instituted the first "Sailor's Friends' Society," the first religious publishing-house established by any Christian denomination, and the first purely religious magazine. No sooner had Robert Raikes tried the experiment of establishing Sunday-schools by hiring teachers, than Mr. Wesley took up the idea, recommended it to all his societies, and was the first to urge the establishment of schools by the free instruction of the pious and benevolent. He was the friend of the toiling masses; he sympathized with the poor and suffering of every class; in the midst of a busy life he found time to visit jails, to comfort and help the prisoners; to relieve and release, as far as he was able by his own means, and by solicitations from friends, worthy persons who were thrown into confinement for debt; and not unfrequently did he accompany the poor condemned culprit to the gallows to offer him, in his last moments, the consolations of the gospel. He visited the collieries of Great Britain to carry glad tidings and salvation to the poor colliers, for whom no man seemed to care; and writers have told us how almost ludicrous were the scenes sometimes, when, surrounded by the colliers, covered with the soot and dirt connected with their occupation, they stood with open mouths, gazing intently upon him, while tears of contrition or of joy rolled down their cheeks, washing furrows, which made the blackness more discernible. He hired school-teachers for the children of the poor, and urged his benevolent friends who had means to manifest a personal interest in their behalf. He organized associations to help the suffering, and to aid them in business; and he urged the working masses to lives of strict economy and frugality. With every facility for accumulating means by his publications, he devoted every penny to benevolence. At his death his only possessions were his library and his publications, and which, save a few small legacies to friends, he left to Kingswood School or to the Conference.

The following sketch of his personal appearance was given by John Jackson, Esq., R.A., an eminent artist of London:

"The figure of Mr. Wesley was remarkable. His stature was low, his habit of body in every period of life the reverse of corpulent, and expressive of strict temperance and continual exercise. Notwithstanding his small size, his step was firm and his appearance, till within a few years of his death, vigorous and muscular. His face for an old man was one of the finest we have seen. A clear, smooth forehead, an aquiline nose, an eye the brightest and most piercing that can be conceived, and a freshness of complexion scarcely ever to be found at his years, and impressive of the most perfect health, conspired to render him a venerable and interesting figure. Few have seen him without being struck with his appearance, and many who had been greatly prejudiced against him have been known to change their opinion the moment they were introduced into his presence. In his countenance and demeanor there was a cheerfulness mingled with gravity; a sprightliness which was the natural result of an unusual flow of spirits, and yet was accompanied with every mark of the most serene tranquillity. His aspect, particularly on profile, had a strong character of acuteness and penetration. In dress, he was the pattern of neatness and simplicity. A narrow, plaited stock, a coat with a small, upright collar, no buckles at his knees, no silk or velvet in any part of his apparel, and a head as white as snow, gave an idea of something primitive and apostolic, while an air of neatness and cleanliness was diffused over his whole person."

A statue of Mr. Wesley was modeled in clay by Mr. Samuel Manning, and exhibited by him at the Royal Academy Exhibition of 1828. A commission to execute the work in marble was given the artist by Mr. Butterworth, M.P.; price, $5000. Mr. Butterworth's death, and then the sculptor's, suspended the work for many years. Finally, the statue was finished by the artist's grandson, Mr. Samuel Manning. A site for it was requested in Westminster Abbey, but was refused by the then Dean, the Rev. Dr. Ireland, on account of what he called the factious character of Mr. Wesley. The statue is of exquisitely pure marble, and is placed upon a pedestal of Peterhead granite. It stands in the entrance hall of Richmond College, London,—the alma mater of many choice spirits. The attitude is graceful, and the drapery tastefully arranged. Great pains were taken to secure a good likeness. Of the model Dr. Adam Clarke said, "The noble appearance of Mr. Wesley's face I see in the clay of Mr. Manning's statue. I see also in his work the whole length with its exact proportion and drapery, his commanding attitude, his attractive expression,—in a word, his mind and his manner, as his friends now remaining long beheld and rejoiced in him, and as those who have only seen him in his works may not be a little glad to know on the faith of those who have seen him and could judge. This statue is a perfect likeness of John Wesley, and was declared to be so by Mr. Wesley himself, in the original bust from which this was correctly taken."

Wesley, Samuel, the father of John Wesley, the founder of Methodism, was the second son of John Wesley, of Whitechurch, and was born at Winterborn Whitechurch, according to Dr. Adam

Clarke, in 1666. He was sent, first, to the free school at Dorchester, then to the dissenting academies of Mr. Veal, at Stepney, and of Mr. Charles Morton, at Newington Green, at the latter of which schools Daniel Defoe was also educated. He was carefully trained in Non-conformist principles, with the design of making him a Non-conformist minister, but when about sixteen years of age he resolved to renounce the Dissenters and join the Established Church. He entered as a servitor in Exeter College, Oxford, in 1683, and remained there till 1688, supporting himself by writing for the press and assisting his fellow-students in their studies and exercises, so that he left the university with much more money in his possession than he had when he entered it. He was ordained a deacon in 1688, and appointed to a curacy of £28 per annum, which he held for one year, then served as chaplain on the fleet for a year, after which he held another curacy for two years, in which he doubled his income by his industry and writings. While in this curacy he was married to Susannah Annesley, so well known as Susannah Wesley. About a year after his marriage, he was appointed to the living of South Ormsby, in the county of Lincoln, which brought him an income of £50 a year. He was also appointed chaplain to the Marquis of Normanby, but having given offense by his protests against the scandalous course of life of his patron, he was obliged to resign the living in 1696 or 1697. In 1693 he published his poetical "Life of Christ," and dedicated it to Queen Anne, in return for which her Majesty conferred upon him the living of Epworth, in Lincolnshire, with which his name is most closely associated. Here he remained thirty-nine years, till his death, performing faithfully the duties of a parish minister of the Church of England, writing and publishing. Mr. Wesley was a Tory in politics, and a staunch High-Churchman. His antagonism to the Dissenters was stronger from his having been one of their number. The Marquis of Normanby recommended him for an Irish bishopric, but the appointment was not made on account of political opposition. The publication in 1703, without his knowledge, of a letter written by him concerning the education of Dissenters in their private academies, occasioned an unpleasant controversy. His active participation in a contested election in his county, in 1705, provoked his enemies to have him arrested for a small debt, and he was imprisoned for about three months. During all of his troubles he found a valued friend in Archbishop Sharp, of York. He was interested, in 1698 and 1699, in a Society for the Reformation of Manners, which resembled in many respects the societies formed by his sons at Oxford, and published a letter in defense of such societies. He expressed the warmest sympathy with the efforts of John and Charles Wesley at Oxford, and wrote, in 1730, that if his son John was the father of a Holy Club, he must be the grandfather of it, and that he would rather any of his sons had such distinction than to be himself styled his Holiness. He was a prolific writer, having relied upon his pen as a source of income from the time he entered college. His first volume of poems, a volume of trifles and conceits, called "Maggots," was published when he was nineteen years of age. Among his other principal works, besides the "Life of Christ," already mentioned, were "Dissertations on the Book of Job," in Latin, "The History of the Old and New Testament," in verse, with illustrations, "Eupolis' Hymn to the Creator," and the poem of "Marlborough, or the Fate of Europe." He was intimately connected with the Athenian Gazette, published by John Dunton, and was its principal contributor. His best-known hymns are, "Behold the Saviour of Mankind" and "O, Thou who when I did Complain." He died at Epworth, April 22, 1735.

Wesley, Samuel, Jr., eldest son of the Rev. Samuel and Susannah Wesley, and brother of John and Charles Wesley, was born in London, Feb. 10, 1690, and died at Tiverton, Nov. 6, 1739. He was sent to Westminster School in 1704, and was admitted a king's scholar in 1707. Having acquired the reputation of being a good and accurate scholar, he was taken by Bishop Sprat, of Rochester, to read to him evenings at his seat at Bromley, in Kent, but was very much dissatisfied with this occupation. In 1711 he was elected to Christ Church, Oxford. After receiving his degree, he returned to the Westminster School as usher, and soon afterwards entered into holy orders, by the advice of his friend Bishop Atterbury. In 1732 he accepted an invitation, unsolicited, to the headmastership of the free school at Tiverton, in Devonshire, where he remained till his death. He was a zealous High-Churchman, and although he approved the earlier efforts of his brothers at Oxford to lead a holier life, was led to discountenance their later movements and the doctrines which they preached. He was a fine scholar, and shared the poetic gifts of his brothers. The first edition of his poems was published in 1736; a second edition, with additions, was published in 1743; and an edition of his works, with his life, by William Nichols, was published in 1862. A few of his hymns have been embodied in the Methodist collections.

Wesley, Mrs. Susannah, the mother of John Wesley, was the youngest and favorite daughter of Dr. Samuel Annesley, an eminent Non-conformist minister. She was born in London in 1669, and is said to have been one of twenty-four or twenty-five children. Her education was thorough. Her writings compare favorably in clearness and strength with the most classic English of her times. Her active and penetrative mind led her into theological controversy and speculation that well-nigh made shipwreck of her faith; but we learn of her at nineteen as steadfast to the faith of her childhood. An early portrait shows her to have been possessed of refined and even classical features, and graceful and intelligent countenance. She married Rev. Samuel Wesley, and seven of their children were born before he had secured a living worth above £50 sterling a year. The husband and father added to their income by his pen, and published during this time his "Life of Christ" and other valuable works. On removal to Epworth, where the rest of his life passed, the living was quadrupled and the rectory was far more comfortable. Here children came to them until the family numbered eighteen or nineteen, of whom ten survived the period of infancy. John Wesley speaks admiringly of her as writing or holding conversations with thirteen children about her. To the education of the ten who survived, Mrs. Wesley devoted herself with a care and solicitude only realized in the result upon their character and influence. Nearly all the management of this large household must have devolved upon the mother. Their poverty precluded the indulgence of many servants, yet no detail that affected the health or moral or intellectual training of her children was neglected. This was essentially, for many years, a home-training. She even prepared treatises herself for their use as text-books, making a complete manual of doctrine, which showed extensive reading and comprehensive acquaintance with the whole circle of religious truth. She felt it "no small honor" that she was intrusted with the care of so many souls. Nothing can be more remarkable than her efforts when we consider that they were made in the midst of extreme and harassing cares, of poverty, and debt, and sometimes imminent dread of prison for her husband. Twice disastrous fires desolated the parsonage at Epworth, at the last of which John, then a boy of six years, was saved as almost by miracle from the flames. She says, "Though I could not say I have wanted bread, yet I had so much care to get it, and to pay for it after, as to make it the next degree of wretchedness to having none at all."

Her husband was often absent from home months at a time, attending convocations in London. Mrs. Wesley felt bound to keep up family devotions, and on Sunday evenings read prayers and a sermon, and talked to her children on religious subjects. On one occasion when neighbors happened in, she continued her usual course. They were so greatly pleased that others asked permission to come, which was granted.

Finding, about this time, in her husband's study an account of the experience and labors of Danish missionaries, she was greatly excited by its perusal with a desire to be useful to her neighbors. She therefore improved her opportunity to exhort them with much earnestness and affection. Her husband soon heard of these Sunday-night labors, and felt called upon to protest against them on three grounds,—first, "it looked particular;" second, "she was a woman;" and, third, "his public station made it necessary for her to be careful to do nothing to deserve censure." To the first objection she replied that everything "looked particular that was religious, yet to be performed out of the pulpit." To the second she replied that, "though a woman, yet in his absence the spiritual interests of the family were intrusted to her care." His objections were overcome by these explanations, but the curate of the parish wrote Mr. Wesley that his wife had turned the parsonage into a conventicle, and that the church was in danger of scandal from such irregular proceedings. He was again alarmed, and ordered her to desist. She then at length laid before him the good done, and wrote him she should obey his positive commands, but he must then take upon himself the responsibility of the people's souls. After further consideration she was allowed to proceed with her efforts with the full sanction and sympathy of her husband, who recognized in her a co-laborer in the gospel.

Adam Clarke, in his memoir of the Wesley family, gives copious extracts from her writings, and speaks admiringly of her strong and vigorous mind and undaunted courage. She feared no difficulty. She was an able defender of the Bible and expounder of its truths. She was considered graceful and beautiful in person, and notwithstanding her attitude with reference to preaching, had great respect for authority, and was a most obedient wife. In the management of her household she is said to have been almost a perfect Christian,—modest, humble, pious, a tender mother, a wise and valuable friend. Several of her children were eminent, and John, who excelled all the others, owed much of his excellence to his mother's training.

Clarke says, "I have known many pious females, have read the lives of others, and composed memoirs of a few, but I have never seen, heard, or read of her equal. If the epithet were not so unusual. I should call her a very able divine." Her history is to a great extent the history of the origin of Methodism, and the mother of the Wesleys is called by various authors the mother of Methodism. At the death of her husband, which occurred in 1735, after a life of thirty-nine years at Epworth, she was left entirely dependent upon her children and obliged to leave the old rectory. In the neighboring town of Gainsborough her eldest daughter opened a little school, thus making a home for her mother. Four daughters were by this time married, but of her three sons, Charles could do nothing, John had only his income as a tutor, and she soon went to her eldest son, Samuel, where she passed nearly a year. From this home she passed to that of Mr. Hall, husband of her daughter Martha. Here she lingered for nearly two years, returning in 1739 to London, the place she had left nearly fifty years before. Here the death of her first-born son came upon her, and soon after, the death of her youngest daughter seemed to fill her cup of sorrow to the brim. Twelve of her children were now gone. Her health began to show indications of failure, but she lived fourteen months after this last bereavement, when her son John was summoned from Bristol to her dying bed. Her son and all the surviving daughters were with her, and she said, "Children, as soon as I am released, sing a psalm of praise to God." This they did, on the afternoon of July 23, 1742, and she passed away. A week later she was buried in Bunhill Fields' burial-ground. The funeral service was conducted by her son John, who stood by his mother's open grave and preached a sermon from, "And I saw the dead, small and great, stand before God; and the books were opened: and the dead were judged out of those things that were written in the books, according to their works."

Wesleyan College, Central German, Warrenton, Mo.—The first movements towards establishing in the Methodist Episcopal Church a German school for the higher education were made at the session of the Illinois Conference at Winchester, in 1852. The presiding elder of the Quincy German district made arrangements with citizens of Quincy to start a school with which a German department should be connected. The arrangement failed to meet the expectations that were entertained of it, since the German department could not sustain a vigorous existence by the side of the English. In March, 1874, the Germans resolved to remove their department from Quincy and re-establish it as a separate school. The result of this resolution was the opening of a college and of an orphan asylum, at Warrenton, Mo. Nine hundred and forty-five acres of land were bought, of which 305 tution. This condition has been met, so that the endowment fund is now $25,000.

Wesleyan Female College, Hamilton, Ontario, Canada.—This institution is owned by a company of stockholders, but is under the patronage and control of the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada. The Conference appoints one of its ministers as governor on the nomination of the board of directors. There must be a majority of Methodists on the board, five of whom must be clerical visitors appointed by the General Conference. It is located at Hamilton, and has a situa-acres were sold for a sum sufficient to repay the original purchase price. The school was opened in October, 1864, with Prof. H. Koch, of the Southwest German Conference, as president. Dr. Koch has continued at the head of the institution till the present time (1877), and has been assisted in instruction by four or five teachers. As many as 230 students have been registered in the catalogue of a single year. The present number of students is 290. The property is valued at $32,000, and the library contains 2000 volumes. The English branches receive liberal attention, and many Anglo-American youth attend the school. A gift of $10,000 was offered some time ago by Mr. Kessler on the condition that the Conference should add $15,000 towards the endowment of the instition remarkable for healthfulness and beauty. The building will accommodate about 250 boarders. The rooms are lofty, have glass ventilators, and are connected with spacious halls. Each room is handsomely furnished. There is a drawing-room, 25 by 60 feet, which looks out upon a beautiful fountain. The dining-hall, 36 by 70 feet, is airy, and the room is frescoed with emblematic designs. It has also a cabinet of natural history, and sufficient apparatus, instruments, and library. It is under the governorship of Rev. Samuel Dwight Rice, D.D., and the faculty of instruction embraces the college department, academic department, preparatory department, modern languages, fine arts, and music. The institution has been prosperous, and has for years paid a dividend to the stockholders. The

which was changed, in the year 1845, to its present more Methodist name. It is believed to be the oldest institution in the United States, perhaps in the world, established upon the plan of a regular college, with authority to confer degrees upon women. Its alumni number about 800, and are found in every Southern State. The buildings are large and commodious. The main building is 160 feet long and 80 feet deep; the centre building is four stories high; the wings three stories. It contains 50 rooms, the most of which are 18 by 20 feet, airy and well ventilated. This affords ample space for the accommodation of all the teachers and 120 boarding pupils. The chapel and recitation-rooms are in a separate building, erected and dedicated in 1860, furnishing ample accommodations for the large audiences of commencement week. The recitation-rooms are furnished with maps, charts, apparatus, minerals, etc., and every facility is provided for successful study and instruction. The library is well supplied with choice reading matter. The grounds are extensive and well shaded, and are undergoing constant improvement, inviting to frequent out-door walks and voluntary recreation. Enjoying the advantages of a city location, it has at the same time all the quiet of a rural retreat. It is the property, and under the control, of the Georgia Conferences of the M. E. Church South. It educates the daughters of all clergymen free of charge for tuition. It has no endowment. The property is valued at $100,000. Its presidents have been Geo. F. Pierce, D.D. (now bishop), W. H. Ellison, D.D., E. H. Myers, D.D. (deceased), J. M. Bonnell, D.D., (deceased), O. L. Smith, D.D. (deceased), and W. C. Bass, D.D., the present incumbent. Its average patronage has been about 150 pupils annually. Number now in attendance, 190.

Wesleyan Female College, Murfreesborough, N. C., is under the patronage of the Virginia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and is the largest boarding-school for young ladies within its limits. It was opened in 1855, and the first class was graduated in 1857. Instruction is conducted upon a system of "schools," each of which is devoted to some special branch, and of which there are ten in the regular college course. The schools of English, Latin, and mathematics have each four classes; the several schools of the modern languages, Greek, and the natural sciences, have three classes each, and mental and moral philosophy has two classes. Three grades of diplomas are given, besides which certificates of proficiency are awarded for the satisfactory completion of the studies of any one of the ten schools, and cards of distinction are given to other deserving pupils. The presidents of the institution have been Joseph H. Davis, D. P. Wills, C. B. Riddick, J. D. Coulling, Paul Whitehead, and the present president, W. G. Starr. The total number of matriculants in the institution since its foundation exceeds 2000, and the total number of graduates is 130. Present attendance, 192.

Wesleyan Institute, at Dundas, is located in a beautiful village about five miles from Hamilton, and has a campus of ten and one-half acres beautifully undulating, and handsomely covered with trees and shrubbery. The building is of white brick, three stories high, and of fine appearance. The students' rooms are commodious, well ventilated, and comfortably furnished. It was incorporated in 1873, and commenced operations in January, 1874. It is a proprietary institution, held by stockholders, and managed by a board of twenty-one directors, seven of whom are to be ministers appointed by the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada; of the remaining fourteen directors, eleven are to be members of that church. The directory nominates the governor, who is to be a member of the Methodist Church. It also appoints professors, teachers, etc., and has the general control of financial matters. One-half of the lay directors retire annually, but are eligible for re-election by the stockholders at the annual meeting. Constant moral supervision is exercised, but the students are permitted to attend such churches as their parents or guardians prefer. It is designed exclusively for boys and young men. The property cost about $52,000. Its governor is Rev. James W. Gray. Charles Clarkson, B.A., is principal, and is assisted by able teachers.

Wesleyan Methodist Connection.—The Wesleyan Methodist Connection was developed out of the Conferences which were held between Mr. Wesley and his ministers for consultation upon the progress of their work, and the best means of maintaining and extending it. The first of these Conferences was held in 1744, upon the invitation of Mr. Wesley to several clergymen and to his lay assistants, to meet him in London, and to give him "their advice respecting the best method of carrying on the work of God." It met at the Foundry, London, on the 25th of June, 1744, and was attended by John Wesley, Charles Wesley, John Hodges, rector of Wewo; Henry Piers, vicar of Bexley; Samuel Taylor, vicar of Quinton; and John Meriton, of the Isle of Man; all regular clergymen of the Established Church, with Thomas Maxfield, Thomas Richards, John Bennett, and John Downes, among the lay preachers. The business of the Conference consisted in the adoption of regulations for its own government, and the discussion of questions, doctrine, discipline, methods of preaching, and practice, and of the relations of the Methodist societies to the Church of England. Mr. Wesley and his associates began already to be concerned as to the means by which the societies which he had formed should be kept together after his death; and at the Conference of 1749, Mr. Wesley was asked, "If God should call you away, what would be the most likely means of preventing the people from being scattered?" He replied at the time, "Let all the assistants for the time being immediately go up to London, and consult what steps are fittest to be taken, and God will make the way plain before them." In 1769 he laid before the Conference the outline of a scheme which he had prepared in reference to this subject. In 1784 a deed was enrolled in chancery, called the "Deed Poll," or "Deed of Declaration," the validity of which has been confirmed by the highest judicial authorities, under severe tests, and against strong attempts to set it aside. It gave a legal definition to the term Conference, which had before been used informally, and secured for the body a corporate standing. Under this deed the chapels and property of the connection, which could previously be secured only during the lifetime of Mr. Wesley, were vested after his death in trustees, who should "from time to time, and at all times forever, permit such persons as shall be appointed at the yearly Conference of the people called Methodists, . . . and no others," to have and enjoy the premises conveyed, for purposes of worship, in conformity to Mr. Wesley's doctrines. The "Deed" defined the Conference as consisting of "one hundred preachers," specifically named therein, and made exact provision for the appointment of their successors in perpetuity. Four members, who were not satisfied with the deed, withdrew from the Conference; but a formal document, approving the substance and design of the deed, was drawn up and signed by all the members of the Conference of 1785. In the same year Mr. Wesley wrote a letter, to be presented to the first Conference meeting after his death, explaining the most important points in connection with the Deed of Declaration. It was read in the Conference of 1791, and a resolution of adherence to the views expressed in it was unanimously adopted. At the time of Mr. Wesley's death, according to Dr. Stevens, in his "History of Methodism," the whole number of circuits in Great Britain and America was 233, with 540 traveling preachers, and 134,599 members. The first Conference after the death of Mr. Wesley was held in Manchester, in 1791, when Mr. William Thompson was elected president, and Dr. Coke secretary. The presiding officer has ever since been chosen each year from among his brethren of the Conference. Only a few of the presidents have, after the lapse of a legally defined number of years, filled the office a second and third time, and only two have been elected a fourth time. The subject of separation from the Church of England was occasionally brought up in the earlier Conferences, but was discouraged by Mr. Wesley, and not favorably considered by the Conference. In 1785, Mr. Wesley having found it necessary to consent to the organization of separate churches in America and Scotland, published a letter explaining that this act could have no bearing on the relation of the English societies to the church, because the relations of the Church of England in those countries were in no way similar to those which existed in England. He admitted the possibility of a separation after he was dead, but said in reference to it, "I dare not omit doing what good I can while I live, for fear of evils that may follow when I am dead." At the Conference of 1788, it was found that none of the members had a thought of leaving the church. The Conference in 1793 decided that the sacrament of the Lord's Supper should not be administered by the preachers in any part of the connection, except where the whole society was unanimous for it, and would not be contented without it; and that in those cases it should be administered as far as practicable in the evening only, and according to the form of the Church of England, "for they could not bear that the sacrament, which was instituted by our Lord as a bond of peace and union, should become a bone of contention." The same Conference expressed a wish still to be united to the church as a body at large. "Articles of Agreement for General Pacification" were adopted by the Conference of 1795, in which were embodied a set of regulations concerning the administration of the Lord's Supper and baptism. The separation from the Church of England thus took place by gradual steps, and was never formally declared.

The expulsion of Alexander Kilham, in 1796, for opposition to the Articles of Pacification, and for the publication of a pamphlet advocating the distribution of the power of government between the ministers and laity, led to the formation in the next year of the Methodist New Connection, and the withdrawal of about 5000 members from the parent body. A controversy arose in 1807 respecting camp-meetings, which had been introduced by Lorenzo Dow from the United States, and the Conference denounced them, and disclaimed all connection with them. Hugh Bourne, a layman, was expelled from the connection in 1808, and William Clows, a local preacher, in 1810, for holding camp-meetings, and, continuing to hold out-of-door meetings and forming classes, they established the Primitive Methodist Connection. A small secession of Band-room Methodists, who admitted persons not members of the society to their class-meetings, and who afterwards took the name of the United Free Gospel Churches, took place in 1806. A secession took place in 1828 on account of opposition to the introduction of organs into the chapels, which resulted in the organization of the Protestant Methodists. In 1835, Dr. Samuel Warren was excluded from the Conference for irregular proceedings and insubordination in connection with a controversy respecting theological seminaries, he opposing the introduction of such schools; and he proceeded with his adherents to organize the Wesleyan Methodist Association. In 1849 three members of the Conference were expelled, and three reprov'd, for the circulation of documents commonly known as "fly-sheets," criticising several of the ministers and the administration of the Conference, the result of which was the organization of the Reformed Methodists. The last three bodies have since been consolidated into the United Methodist Free Churches.

The Conference was moved in 1875 by the refusal of the ecclesiastical authorities in the diocese of Lincoln to permit a tombstone to be erected in one of the church-yards, in which the title "Rev." was applied to a Wesleyan minister. A committee was appointed to defend the rights of the connection. A suit was instituted in the courts, the result of which was that a decision was obtained sustaining the right of Wesleyan ministers to be called by the title "Rev.," and authorizing the erection of the stone.

The most important event in the recent history of the Conference is the modification of its constitution, which was completed in 1877, so as to admit the representatives of the laymen to a participation in certain parts of its proceedings. For several years there had been mixed committees of ministers and laymen meeting before the Conference, which had the deliberative power for adjusting the various funds under their direction, and the recommendation of measures concerning them to the Conference. Under the new arrangement the Conference, when composed of ministers only, will deal with ministerial and pastoral questions, and the Conference composed of ministers and laymen, meeting at the same general session, will have the management of general and financial matters.

The appointments of the Conference at the time of Mr. Wesley's death included stations in Great Britain, Ireland, the West Indies, "America," Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland. The names of other colonial and foreign stations appeared in succeeding years. The establishment of the mission to Ceylon in 1813 was the beginning of an extension of the missionary work, which has resulted in the formation of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, in 1816, and the spread of Wesleyan Methodism into Continental Europe, India, China, West and South Africa, the South Sea Islands, Australasia, and all of British America. The outlying and colonial stations have been formed, as soon as their development would justify the step, into affiliated Conferences. The first meeting of the Irish Conference was held in 1752. This Conference suffered the loss in 1816 of 10,000 of its members, who withdrew as Primitive Wesleyan Methodists, and continued to look to the English Established Church for their sacraments. Arrangements were perfected in 1877 for the reunion of the two bodies. The first session of the Canada Conference was held in 1834; the Conference of Eastern British America was constituted in 1855. These bodies, with the Conference of the Methodist New Connection in Canada, have now become the Methodist Church of Canada, with six Annual Conferences and a General Conference. The French Conference was organized at Nîmes in 1852, and has had a prosperous though not rapid growth. The Australian Conference held its first session at Sydney in 1855, and has since grown into the Australasian General Conference, with four Annual Conferences, one of which has the charge of the Polynesian missions.

The following is a general view of the membership of the British and affiliated Conferences for 1877. The Conferences in Canada are now excluded from the table, as they have a separate organization:

grew up during the early period of the anti-slavery struggle. It was begun, in 1839, by the formation of separate societies in Ohio and Michigan, and in the city of Utica, N. Y. In Michigan, at Thayer's Corners, Wayne Co., May 13, 1841, an organization was effected, taking the name "Wesleyan Methodists," a Discipline was published, an Annual Conference formed, and regular sessions were held for four years. The body had 23 stationed preachers and 1116 members in 1843. Among the ministers were W. W. Crane, formerly of the old Genesee Conference, W. M. Sullivan, of the old Michigan Conference, and Marcus Swift. The last two, with two laymen, represented the body at the organization of the Wesleyan Connection at the Utica Convention, held May 31, 1843. Similar church organizations were formed in New England during 1842 and the succeeding years. The first were at Providence, R. I., and at Boston, Mass. The greater strength of the Eastern membership at the time of the general organization gave Eastern men prominence, but the connection originated at the West.

1. Origin.—The existence of slavery in the nation, the practice of slave-holding by some members and ministers in the southern portion of the church, and its toleration of such practice, were so adverse to the sentiments of many of the members that it only needed the organization of the American Anti-Slavery Society, in 1833, to arouse in the church a vigorous effort to promote the anti-slavery movement. Wise and good men differed on this question, and on the competency of the official bodies of the church to act upon it. The efforts of the anti-slavery Methodists to secure action in the Conferences led to controversies and measures of discipline, the ultimate result of which was the withdrawal of several ministers from the church. Among those who thus withdrew were Orange Scott, Jotham Horton, La Roy Sunderland, Luther Lee, Cyrus Prindle, Edward Smith, and others, who invited a preliminary meeting at Andover, Mass., in February, 1843, which provided for a convention of organization, to be held at Utica, N. Y., commencing May 31, 1843. This convention continued two weeks in session. It was composed of 30 traveling preachers, more than 20 of whom were from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and included besides a few from the Methodist Protestants, and the Reformed Methodists, a body which has ceased to exist. About 40 local preachers and 80 laymen were also present. The roll contained in all 150 names of delegates, who represented, for the most part, small churches, whose aggregate membership, as reported, was 6000 communicants. Orange Scott was president of the convention.

2. Government.—The Quadrennial General Conference elects its own president. It is composed of one minister, traveling or local, and one layman for every 500 members within the limits of each Annual Conference. These delegates are chosen by the Annual Conference, the local ministers being present, one for each charge. The Annual Conference is composed of all ordained traveling ministers, and an equal number of laymen. The lay delegates are chosen by vote of the members of each charge. A committee on pastoral relations is chosen at the Annual Conference by ballot, and consists of three ministers and three laymen. The president of the Annual Conference, who is elected annually, is chairman of this committee, whose disciplinary duty is: "To station the preachers, confirming, as far as practicable, all arrangements made between preachers and people, provided no appointment be made contrary to the expressed wishes of the preacher or of the representative of the charge." The Conference has power to adopt the report of the committee or amend it. The local churches are essentially congregational in their policy.

3. Conditions of Membership.—These include the Methodist General Rules, with two of them amended, so as to forbid, the one, "the manufacturing, buying, selling, or using intoxicating liquors, unless for mechanical, chemical, or medicinal purposes, or in any way intentionally and knowingly aiding others so to do;" and the other, "slave-holding, buying or selling slaves, or claiming that it is right so to do." The rules also declare that, "All men are bound so to order all their individual and social and political acts as to render to God entire and absolute obedience, and to secure to all men the enjoyment of every natural right, as well as to promote the greatest happiness of each, in the possession and exercise of such rights. They, moreover, declare that, "as in the judgment of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection, it is inconsistent with our duties to God and Christianity to join secret oath-bound societies, or hold fellowship with them, we will on no account tolerate our ministers and members in holding such connection."

4. Doctrines.—The Articles of Religion of the Methodist Episcopal Church are adopted, except those entitled "Of Works of Supererogation," "Of the Church," "Of Purgatory," "Of Speaking in an Unknown Tongue," "Of Both Kinds," "Of the Marriage of Ministers," "Of the Rulers of the United States of America," "Of Christian Men's Goods," "Of a Christian Man's Oath," the XI., XIII., XIV., XV., XIX., XXI., XXIII., XXIV., XXV., respectively. To those articles are added others, entitled "Of Relative Duties," "Of Sanctification," "Of the Resurrection of the Dead," "Of the General Judgment." None of the articles omitted are disbelieved, but they are deemed unnecessary. In doctrine, touching dogmatic theology and religious experience, the Wesleyans are purely Arminian.

5. History.—From the year of organization, 1843, to the fall of 1844, the membership increased from 6000 to 15,000. The first General Conference was held at Cleveland, O., Oct. 3, 1844. Orange Scott was chosen president, but declined to serve, and Luther Lee was elected. Robert McMurdy was made secretary, and L. C. Matlack official reporter. The whole number of delegates was fifty-six, half of them laymen. Orange Scott was chosen book agent, and Luther Lee editor. The True Wesleyan, hitherto a personal enterprise, became the weekly organ of the connection, and is continued at the present time, under the name of The American Wesleyan. In 1848 the second General Conference met in New York City, in King Street chapel. Daniel Worth, of Indiana, presided. L. C. Matlack was secretary. Orange Scott had died the previous year. Cyrus Prindle was now agent of the Book Concern, but declined re-election. L. C. Matlack was elected agent, and Luther Lee was re-elected editor. The Book Concern then reported $21,700.33 of assets, $14,898.73 of liabilities, and a net value of $5000 in cash. The subsequent officers of the General Conference were, in 1852, C. Prindle, president; John McEldowney, secretary; L. C. Matlack, agent and editor. In 1856, Luther Lee, president; John McEldowney, secretary; C. Prindle, editor; H. B. Knight, agent. In 1860, L. C. Matlack, president; W. W. Lyle, secretary; C. Prindle, editor and agent. In 1854, C. Prindle, book agent; Adam Crooks, editor. In 1868, A. Crooks, editor and agent. In 1871, A. Crooks, agent and editor, with L. N. Stratton assistant editor. In 1874, and until this date (1877), L. N. Stratton, editor; D. S. Kinney, agent. The last General Conference of this connection was held Oct. 20, 1875, in Sycamore, Ill. Sixteen Annual Conferences were represented by sixty-three delegates; half of these were laymen. One lady, Mrs. H. Bessie, represented the laity of Kansas Conference. Her husband, H. T. Bessie, was the ministerial delegate from that body, and secretary of the General Conference. The Rev. N. Stardner presided. Mr. Richard Green and the Rev. G. Richey were vice-presidents. The statistical tables represented 458 churches, 185 houses of worship, valued at $302,309, also 61 parsonages, valued at $32,685, and 15,807 members. The number of members is now estimated at 18,000, with 11,291 scholars in Sunday-school. The number of traveling preachers was not reported.

The book agent's report gave the total assets of the Concern as $27,383, and the liabilities at $9500. The periodicals are, The American Wesleyan, issuing 3500 copies weekly, and The Children's Banner, a monthly, with 12,000 copies issued. Since that report a new publishing-house has been erected, 118 feet front by 80 feet deep on one side, four stories high. The sum of $17,000 has been expended on it. The cost will be $30,000. Two-thirds of this sum are provided. The completion of the building is to be without debt.

6. Institutions.—Commencing with the year of their organization, the Wesleyans established the Draeut Seminary, near Lowell, Mass. L. C. Matlack, as agent, secured several thousand dollars in donations. The seminary was continued for only two years, and closed while the assets were sufficient to pay all liabilities. A second institution was established at Leoni, Mich., soon after the Draeut Seminary closed, and was continued in successful operation for many years, until, under the presidency of Rev. John McEldowney, it was removed to Adrian, Mich. At a later period a college was established at Wheaton, Ill., of which L. C. Matlack was president from 1856 to 1860. The Congregationalists were afterwards invited to a joint control of this institution, and Dr. Jonathan Blanchard was chosen president. He is at this time (1877) in charge of it, and a majority of the trustees are Congregationalists. Adrian College was supported jointly by the Wesleyans and Methodist Protestants, until, becoming embarrassed by accumulating debts, and conflicting views regarding a proposed union of all non-Episcopal Methodists, the Wesleyan interest in and control of Adrian College was withdrawn, although thousands of dollars of their capital remained in it. Recently a seminary has been opened at Wasioga, Minn., of which Prof. E. G. Paine is principal, and Miss M. J. Stephenson is preceptress. It includes an academic and college preparatory course of study.

The numerical strength of the connection was as great in 1844, only eighteen months after its organization, as in 1875. Two causes may be assigned for this: first, the rule against secret oath-bound societies, which excludes it from access to large masses of the people; and, second, the return of a large number of Wesleyans,—nearly a hundred ministers and thousands of communicants,—after slavery was destroyed, to the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Wesleyan Missionary Society.—The subject of providing for mission stations outside of Great Britain was first considered in the Conference of 1769, when the question was asked, "We have a pressing call from our brethren in New York to come over and help them. Who is willing to go?" Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor answered, and were sent, and "America" appeared for the first time in the list of appointments. In 1785, the United States having become independent, Dr. Coke and Francis Asbury were appointed by Mr.

Wesley superintendents over the brethren in North America. The planting of missions in the West Indies, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland followed, the funds for the support of the work being supplied chiefly through the efforts and the private munificence of Dr. Coke. The Irish mission was established at the beginning of the present century, with Charles Graham and Gideon Ouseley as missionaries.

The first missionary committee was appointed in 1804, and comprised all the ministers stationed in London. Dr. Coke, general superintendent of missions, was its president, Mr. Entwistle, secretary, and Mr. Lomas, treasurer; a rule was then made that a collection for foreign missions should be made in all the congregations in every circuit in Great Britain. No alteration beyond the gradual development of existing missions took place until 1813, when Dr. Coke, who had crossed the Atlantic eighteen times, was anxious to commence a mission in the East, and having contributed and collected money towards the accomplishment of his object, prevailed on the Conference to designate six brethren to accompany him to Ceylon. In the same year Samuel Leigh was appointed to New South Wales. In the year that Dr. Coke sailed Dr. Raffles went to Leeds to plead the cause of the London Missionary Society. After preaching, he sent collecting cards to some well-known Wesleyans in that town, urging them to make private collections for the missions. One of these came under the notice of the Rev. George Morley, then stationed in Leeds, who showed it to Rev. Jabez Bunting. The two conferred with the Revs. J. Pilster and Wm. Naylor; they perceived what a mighty agency was capable of being called into operation, and decided to call a public meeting in aid of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, just then being formed. The Rev. William Naylor preached the first sermon, and lived to preach a jubilee sermon in the same chapel. A public meeting was held, which lasted all day. Eighteen resolutions were moved, seconded, and supported, but no collection was made. This was the beginning of an organization which is as widely extended as Methodism itself. Every circuit, at home and abroad, has its festival at its annual meetings, and the result is seen in the vast sums which are collected and expended from year to year. In 1814 the friends of missions were saddened by receiving news of the unexpected death of Dr. Coke, in mid-ocean, but instead of being discouraged, the society prepared for greater efforts, and six additional brethren were appointed to "Ceylon and the East." In 1816 "France" appears for the first time; in the same year a commencement was made in Continental India, by the appointment of Mr. Harvard to Madras. In the following year mission work was opened by Barnabas Shaw among the Namaquas, a heathen tribe of South Africa. New Zealand, with the name of Samuel Leigh attached, and the Friendly Islands, with the name of Walter Lawry, appear for the first time in 1820. Three years later Spain comes on the list, and the next year Malta, whilst the development of the work in South Africa led to the formation of a new district on the eastern side of the continent, of which William Shaw was chairman. Sweden was added to the list of stations in 1826, and in the same year New Zealand and the Friendly Islands were constituted a separate district. Two years later Kaffraria comes into view, with a band of five enterprising missionaries, laboring among as many different tribes of Kaffres, to which, in the year following, the Bechuana country was added,—and various other stations in rapid succession. In 1835 was re-opened the mission at Cape Coast, Western Africa, which has since developed into large proportions. The Friendly Islands having been blessed in a most remarkable manner by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit, had now nearly 5000 members in society, at least 1000 of whom were teachers, leaders, or local preachers. Thence the work was carried to the Fiji Islands. In 1837 the Rev. William Shaw was appointed general superintendent of all the society's missions in South Africa. In the following year the Rev. Jonathan Crowther was appointed general superintendent of the missions in Continental India and the north of Ceylon. These appointments were followed, in 1839, by the designation of the Rev. John Waterhouse as general superintendent of the missions in Australasia and Polynesia. These servants of the society all had successful administrations, and gave their energies with unremitting diligence and distinguished ability to the work of evangelization, with which the history of the society is inseparably associated. Germany is named among the missions in 1831. The mission in Sweden was abandoned about 1842. A mission in the Ionian Islands was given up after a short effort. A mission was begun in China in 1851, which has had a gradual and separate growth; and a mission was begun in Italy in 1861, which has recently had a very prosperous development. Several of the more important colonial missions of the society received separate Conference organizations between 1847 and 1855, while they still remained affiliated with the parent Conference, and were partly dependent on the Missionary Society for support. Among the more recent undertakings of the society are the opening of mission stations at Oporto, in Portugal, and Brussels, in Belgium, the renewal of efforts in Spain, and the opening of new missions in New Britain, New Ireland, and the Duke of York Islands.

The celebration of the jubilee of the society was discussed in the missionary committee of review on the Wednesday preceding the Conference held in Sheffield, in 1863. A resolution was then passed setting forth that as the first missionary meeting was held in Leeds, in the month of October, 1813, it would now be a fitting occasion on which to celebrate the jubilee. The Conference heartily indorsed the proposal, and issued a circular setting forth the several objects to be benefited by the funds which were sure to be raised, and making an appeal to the body for their hearty co-operation that the event might be commemorated with becoming thank-offerings to the Lord. The principal meeting was held in Leeds, Oct. 6, 1863. The jubilee was celebrated throughout the connection with great enthusiasm, munificent liberality, and holy joy. The amount raised exceeded £180,000, and was appropriated as follows: Richmond Institution, £37,500; funds (to be invested) for training candidates, £20,000; Southern and Western Africa, £5000; France and Switzerland, £7000; West Indies, £30,000; Italy, £5000; India, £10,000; China, £5000; for supernumeraries' widows and orphans connected with foreign missions, £30,000; missionary balance, £6500; working capital, £34,000.

The condition of membership in the Wesleyan Missionary Society is the subscription of certain specified amounts to the auxiliary societies, or the branch associations in connection with the institution, or the regular collection of certain amounts for them. The annual public meetings of the society are held in London, on the first Monday in May, or on one of the last two days of April, if either of them falls on Monday. The affairs of the society in the intervals between the sessions of the Conference are managed by a committee appointed by the Conference, consisting of the president and secretary of the Conference for the time being, and of forty-eight other members (twenty-four ministers and twenty-four laymen), of whom one-third shall be selected from the country districts, and the others from at or near London. The general treasurers are entitled to sit and vote with the committee. Four ministers stationed in or near London are deputed to serve as secretaries to the society. Candidates for appointment as missionaries are recommended by the superintendent of the circuit in which they reside, approved by the quarterly meeting, examined and approved by the district meeting or by a committee of circuit superintendents, recommended to the general secretary of the society, and examined by a special committee appointed by the Conference, in reference to their missionary views and qualifications. Having passed all these tests, they are entered on the list of approved candidates, and are subject to the call of the general committee.

In 1814 the income of the Conference for missions was less than £7000; 70 missionaries were employed (56 on foreign stations), and the number of members under their care was 18,747. The total income of the society for the year ending April 30, 1877, was £146,234.12.1, and its expenditures were £164,285.16.4. The ladies' general committee for female education in foreign countries had raised and expended during the preceding year £2209.5.9, besides furnishing school materials, clothing, etc., to many parts of the mission field. The missions are classified into those under the immediate direction of the Conference and into affiliated Conferences, and the missions connected with them. Under the former head are embraced the European missions, including four English stations in France; Germany, Italy, and Spain and Portugal; missions in Asia, including Continental India, Ceylon, and China; the missions in Africa (Southern and Western Africa), the West India missions, and the missions in Ireland. These missions returned, in 1877, 318 principal stations, 389 ministers and assistant missionaries, and 81,658 full and accredited members. Under the second class are included the Conferences in France, Switzerland, and Corsica, and in Australasia and Polynesia, returning 299 principal stations, 464 ministers and assistant missionaries, and 59,628 full members.

The general summary of the total of the missionary returns of both classes is as follows: central or principal stations, called circuits, 617; chapels and other preaching-places, 6260; ministers and assistant missionaries, including supernumeraries, 853; other paid agents, as catechists, interpreters, day-school teachers, etc., 5870; unpaid agents, as Sunday-school teachers, etc., 24,612; full and accredited church members, 141,286; on trial for church membership, 19,707; scholars, deducting for those who attend both day- and Sunday-schools, 209,998; printing establishments, 5.

In consequence of the advance of civilization, and as the result of the influence of the missions, printing establishments have been formed in almost every colony, rendering it unnecessary to multiply those under the care and direction of the society. Upwards of twenty languages are used by the missionaries, and into several of them the translation of the Scriptures and of other useful and instructive books has been accomplished, or is in progress.

Wesleyan Reform Union is the name of a Methodist body in England which grew out of a secession from the Wesleyan Connection in 1849. The quiet of the Wesleyan Connection had been disturbed for several years, dating as far back as 1844, by the appearance of a number of publications, commonly called "fly-sheets," hostile in tone to the administration and discipline of the Conference, and adjudged slanderous of some of its members. The Conference of 1847 took notice of these publications, and passed a resolution condemning them and expressing confidence in the character of the members of the body who were attacked in them. The publication was, however, continued; articles of a similar character were contributed to the Wesleyan Times, a paper advocating the principles of other bodies of Methodists as opposed to those of the Wesleyan Connection, and a new paper, the Wesley Banner, was started by Samuel Dunn and William Griffith, Jr., to agitate for reform. A number of members of the Conference were tried and censured by the district meeting for complicity in these proceedings. Their cases were carried up to the Conference, which confirmed the finding of the district meeting. The inculpated ministers refusing to answer the questions asked them by the Conference, sentence was passed upon them according to the manner in which their refusal was made and the reasons they assigned for it; of censure and suspension upon Daniel Walton, John Burdsall, and John C. George, and of expulsion against James Everett, Samuel Dunn, and William Griffith, Jr. The action of the Conference created great excitement throughout the connection. The friends of the accused ministers asserted that they had been tried without having received any regular notice of the charges to be preferred against them, as required by the laws and usages of the church, and had been condemned without a proper trial or the presentation of sufficient evidence. About one hundred thousand members seceded from the connection. Many of them returned after a time to the parent body, on account of the want of ministers and suitable places of worship, while others formed a new connection, called the Reformed Methodists. The mass of the Reformed Methodists afterwards united with the Wesleyan Methodist Association and the Protestant Methodists into the United Methodist Free Churches. A part of them declined to enter this connection, and organized the Wesleyan Reform Union. The union is congregational in organization, and recognizes the equality of laymen and ministers to the fullest extent. It had, in 1870, 266 chapels and preaching-places, 603 preachers, with 96 on trial, and 8221 members, with 294 on trial. The statistics for 1877 are: ordained ministers, 18; preachers, 503; preachers on trial, 96; leaders, 443; members, 7246; members on trial, 409; Sunday-schools, 177, with 2946 teachers and 18,153 scholars; chapels and preaching-places, 222.

The growth of the union is retarded by the tendency of its churches to unite themselves with some of the Free Methodist bodies which have a firmer bond of connection, one or more churches being lost nearly every year in this manner.

Wesleyan Repository, was the title of a monthly periodical in octavo form, published by

W. S. Stockton, from 1821 to 1824. It was commenced in Trenton, N. J., but was subsequently transferred to Philadelphia. Its object was to promote changes in the economy of the Methodist Episcopal Church, embracing lay representation and the abolition of the episcopacy and presiding eldership. In 1824 it was merged in The Mutual Rights, which was published in Baltimore, and it became the special organ of the Reformers.

Wesleyan University is located in Middletown, Conn. It is the oldest of the collegiate institutions under the care of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It had been preceded by Augusta College, Kentucky, and by Madison College, in Western Pennsylvania, but these institutions were subsequently merged in those of other localities. The older buildings occupied by the university were erected for a military academy in 1825, and were transferred to the university in 1830, at which time a preparatory school was opened. The university proper was chartered in 1831, and was opened in the fall of that year, under the presidency of the talented and eloquent Dr. Fisk. The property had been transferred on the condition that the church should furnish as an endowment $40,000. The New York and New England Conferences accepted the proposition, and the amount was soon raised. Dr. Fisk continued his presidency until his death in 1839. Dr. Olin, who at that time was traveling in Europe, was elected as his successor. But his health being feeble, he declined, and Dr. Bangs accepted the position. In 1842, Dr. Olin's health having improved, Dr. Bangs resigned the presidency in his favor. His pulpit power and intellectual ability enabled him greatly to extend the reputation of the institution. After his death, which occurred in 1851, Dr. Smith, who had been Professor of Mathematics, and had filled the office of vice-president, became president. He resigned in 1857, and was succeeded by Dr. Cummings. In 1875 he was succeeded by Dr. Foss, who is now the active and accomplished president of the university.

In addition to the original buildings a gymnasium was added in 1863. In 1868 the library building was erected by the liberality of Isaac Rich, of Boston. In 1871 a memorial chapel was built to perpetuate the memory of the alumni and students who fell in the Civil War. In the same year the hall of Natural Sciences was added, a most graceful and noble building, the gift of Orange Judd, Esq., the well-known agricultural publisher. The library contains about 27,000 volumes, and a fund has been provided for its regular increase. The chemical department is well furnished with lecture-room and laboratories, and there is a fine museum of natural history and ethnology. The mineralogical department is especially rich. The alumni record, published in 1873, contains the names of 1028 alumni, of whom 868 were living. Since that time 110 have graduated. Among the graduates are many who have performed noble and faithful work. A large number have entered the ministry, and 120 have acted as presidents or professors of colleges and professional schools, while in different forms of teaching 566 have been employed. In the Federal army 133 served during the late war, and rapidly rose in his profession, and was elected judge of the eleventh common pleas district of Indiana. He has been a devoted Methodist since his boyhood. He was lay delegate from the North Indiana Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

West Chester, Pa. (pop. 5630), the capital of Chester County, is situated on the Philadelphia and West Chester Railway. The first sermon preached by a Methodist minister was in the court-a memorial window in the chapel contains the names of 18 students who fell defending the honor of their country. The records of the Confederate army also show the names of 13 alumni who had been residents in the South. In 1872 young women were permitted to enter the university, and in 1876 four of these graduated with high honor. The institution has received some noble gifts towards the erection of buildings and its endowments, and its friends are now engaged in an effort to increase its funds. It has an able body of instructors, consisting of a president, nine professors, one instructor, one curator, two tutors, and two assistants. Its students have practiced gymnastics, and their conspicuous part in collegiate boat-races is well known.

West, Francis A., was the son of a Wesleyan minister, and was born in 1801. He entered the ministry in 1822. He was president of the Conference in 1857; became governor of New Kingswood School in 1860, and died in 1869, aged sixty-eight.

West, Hon. William R., is a resident of Anderson, Ind., and was born in 1824. He studied law, house, in February, 1810, by the Rev. William Hunter, presiding elder of the Schuylkill district; and the first class was organized in 1815, at the house of Thomas Ogden, who was made the leader of it. The society was attached to Chester circuit, then traveled by Asa Smith. The first church edifice was erected in 1816, and stood on Gay Street, east of Darlington; the second, in 1840, on the northeast corner of Market and Darlington Streets; and in 1866 this church was repaired and remodeled. It is in the Philadelphia Conference. The statistics are: members, 335; Sunday-school scholars, 297; church property, $20,000.

Western Arkansas Conference, M. P. Church, "begins at Little Rock, running thence with the Cairo and Fulton Railroad to Wichita River; thence down said river to the mouth of Little Missouri River; thence in a direct line to the mouth of Sulphur Fork of Red River; thence up Sulphur Fork to the State line of Arkansas; thence north with said line to the northwest corner of Polk County; thence with the south boundary of the North Arkansas Conference to the city of Little Rock, the place of beginning," embracing chiefly the southwestern portion of the State. Owing to the remodeling of the Conference lines in 1877, there is no definite report of statistics.

Western Christian Advocate.—As population increased in the West, the desire for a church periodical to be published by the Western Book Concern became so general that the General Conference of 1832 authorized its issue. Thomas A. Morris was appointed the first editor of the new paper. He being elected bishop, Charles Elliott, who had been editor of the Pittsburgh Conference Journal, was elected editor, and W. R. Phillips his assistant. In 1840, Dr. Elliott was continued, with L. L. Hamline as his assistant, but with the understanding that The Ladies' Repository should be established, and that Dr. Hamline should be its editor. Dr. Elliott was succeeded in 1848 by Matthew Simpson, who was chosen bishop in 1852, when Dr. Elliott was again elected to the editorship of the paper. The succeeding editors have been: Calvin Kingsley, 1856 to 1864, when he was elected bishop; John M. Reid, 1864 to 1868; Stephen M. Merrill, 1868 to 1872, when he was elected bishop; Francis S. Hoyt, 1872, re-elected in 1876. The circulation of the Advocate is about 20,000 copies.

Western Christian Monitor, a monthly paper of forty-eight pages octavo, was published in 1816 in Chillicothe, O. Its editor was the Rev. William Beauchamp. It was commenced to defend the doctrine of the Trinity and other evangelical tenets, which at that time were strongly assailed in the West. Its contents consisted chiefly of essays, and short papers on various religious topics, with selections of poetry, and obituary notices. It was intended, also, to defend the doctrine and discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The General Conference in 1816 having ordered the publication of a magazine at New York, the Monitor was discontinued.

Western Conference, M. E. Church.—This was one of the six Conferences organized by the General Conference in 1796, to embrace the whole territory of the church. It covered an extensive region, including the whole of Kentucky and Tennessee, and was for many years the only Conference in the Mississippi Valley. In 1797, the part of the Conference in Tennessee was under charge of Jonathan Bird as presiding elder, and was divided into four circuits, traveled by six preachers. The Kentucky district, with John Kobler as presiding elder, was divided into six circuits and supplied with ten preachers. In 1804 this Conference was defined to include "Ohio and that part of Virginia which lies west of the great river Kanawha, with the Illinois and Natchez circuits." The Ohio and Tennessee Conferences were organized out of the territory in 1812, and the name of the Western Conference disappeared from the minutes. The first Conference west of the Alleghany Mountains was held by Bishop Asbury, at "Half-Aeres and Keyswood," in May, 1788. One Conference was held for this region and Kentucky until 1802, when the Western Conference reported 7738 white and 464 colored members. In 1812, when it was divided, it reported 29,093 white and 1648 colored members. Barnabas MelHenry, who entered the itinerant ranks in 1789, was the first itinerant preacher who was a native of the country west of the mountains.

Western Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference of 1870, and held its first session at Leavenworth, Kansas, Sept. 8, 1870, Bishop McTyeire presiding. It reported 25 traveling and 11 local preachers, 1538 white, 133 colored, and 37 Indian members, with 19 Sunday-schools and 985 scholars. The General Conference of 1874 defined its boundaries so as to "include the States of Kansas, Nebraska, and the Territories of Wyoming and Idaho, and other territory east of the Rocky Mountains and west of the Missouri State line, not included in other Conferences." The statistical report of this Conference for 1875 gives 21 traveling and 9 local preachers, 2359 members, 35 Sunday-schools, and 1139 scholars.

Western Maryland College, Westminster, Md.—The Maryland Annual Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church, in March, 1866, took action in favor of the establishment of a college at Westminster, Carroll County. A prospectus of the proposed institution was issued in April following by F. R. Buell, J. T. Ward, and A. Reese Durbin. A loan of $10,000 was obtained in August from Messrs. John Smith and Isaac C. Bailey, with which to erect the main building for the institution. The corner-stone of the building was laid with addresses and Masonic ceremonies, Sept. 6, 1866. The Conference of 1867 appointed an advisory board of directors of the college, under whose auspices the first annual circular was issued, and the work of instruction was begun, with about thirty pupils, Sept. 4, 1867. The newly-erected buildings, with eight acres of ground, which were bought in 1868, were placed in the hands of a board of trustees, consisting of thirty members, of whom eleven represented the Conference and eleven the county of Carroll, which was incorporated by the legislature. In addition to the original building, a second building has been added, and the whole property of the institution, including furniture, apparatus, etc., is valued at about $33,000, against which is a debt of about $20,000. The current expenses of every year except the last (1876) have been paid from its receipts. The Maryland Conference has assumed to pay the debt of the college within six years, and some movements have been made towards securing an endowment. The average number of students between 1868 and 1876 was 120 each year. The whole number of graduates is 49, besides whom 12 students of the college have entered the Conference previous to graduation. Besides the ordinary literary societies, the young men who are studying for the ministry have associated themselves into a union called the "Theological Class."

should be paid. A committee was appointed to negotiate with the trustees for final terms, and Rev. James Greer was appointed principal. In 1854 the arrangement was consummated, and the name was changed to the Western Reserve Seminary. Since that period it has been in continuous operation, and has accomplished a good work for that portion of Ohio.

Western Virginia Conference, M. E. Church South, held its first session in 1850, and was com-

WESTERN MARYLAND COLLEGE, WESTMINSTER, MD.

A peculiar feature of the institution is that students of both sexes are educated under the same general course of instruction and by the same professors, yet in distinct departments. The course of study for the ladies embraces only three years, however, while that for the gentlemen is extended to four years. The situation of the institution is high, healthful, and sightly. The Rev. J. T. Ward, D.D., who was connected with the college at its beginning as agent, has been president of the faculty since its organization, and is Professor of Mental and Moral Science. He is assisted by a faculty of five teachers, among whom are a non-resident professor of theology, and lecturers on anatomy, physiology, and hygiene, and on civil law and political economy.

Western Reserve Seminary is located at Farmington, O.; was commenced in 1833, under the name of Farmington Academy. In 1847 its name was changed to the Farmington Normal School. Stock was subscribed and the buildings were commenced, but before they were completed the trustees became involved in debt, and offered the institution, in 1852, to the Erie Conference on condition that the debt posed of the Parkersburg, Greenbrier, and Guyandotte districts. It reported 5308 white and 149 colored members, and 46 local preachers. The General Conference of 1874 fixed the boundaries of this Conference so as to "include all that part of West Virginia not embraced in the Baltimore and Holston Conferences, and that part of Kentucky included in the Guyandotte district, and in the Prestonburg, Piketon, and Big Sandy circuits." The latest report (1875) gives the following members: preachers, 60; local preachers, 133; members, white, 12,991, colored, 24; Sunday-school scholars, 7925.

Westfield, N. Y. (pop. 3000), in Chautauqua County, is on the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railway. The first Methodist services held in this place were in 1809, by Stephen Richmond, and the first class formed was in 1811. In 1812 classes were formed at the red school-house, one mile and a half west of the village, and at the home of Mrs. Stevens, three miles west, and in 1815 class-meetings and worship were held at a place two miles south. In 1819-20, Benjamin P. Hill, formerly of the New England Conference, but at that time located near Forestville, doing service as a local preacher, was employed by the presiding elder to assist the pastor, Robert C. Hatton, and during this period a society was established at Westfield. The first church erected here was in 1828, in the western part of the village. It was sold after some time, and a church was built in the central part, which remained in use until 1873, when a new building was put up on Main Street. It is in the Erie Conference, and reports: members, 203; Sunday-school scholars, 200; church property, $37,500.

West Indies, Methodist Missions in.—Under the head of West Indian Missions, the Wesleyan Missionary Society includes its missions in the British West Indian Colonies and the island of San Domingo, British Guiana, on the mainland of South America, and British Honduras, in Central America. The population of the British West Indies, British Honduras, and British Guiana is chiefly of African descent, but includes, also, Hindoo and Chinese coolies, as well as the white settlers, and is computed to number about 1,250,000 persons. The island of San Domingo, including the republics of Hayti and San Domingo, has a population of about one million more. The beginning of missionary effort in the West Indies dates from 1760, when Mr. Nathaniel Gilbert began his work in Antigua. (For the history of this work, and its resumption by John Baxter, see ANTIGUA.) In 1786, Dr. Thomas Coke, having embarked from England with three missionaries, intending to go to Nova Scotia, was driven by storms to the island of Antigua, where he landed on the 25th of December, preached on the same day, and administered the sacrament to Mr. Baxter's congregation. He also visited the islands of St. Vincent, St. Christopher, and St. Eustatius, leaving his three missionaries at Antigua, St. Vincent, and St. Christopher, and himself beginning the instruction of small classes at St. Eustatius. He returned to St. Eustatius in December, 1788; but, having preached once, was forbidden to preach again by the Dutch authorities, who then governed the island. He nevertheless organized a society, which, before he left it, numbered 258 members. During the same voyage he visited Barbadoes, Tortola, in the Virgin group, and Jamaica, at all of which islands provision was made for the organization of missions. The missions were directed to the African slave population of the islands, and were in many places regarded with jealousy and opposed by the mass of the whites. The assembly of St. Vincent, in order to break them up, passed a law in 1792 prohibiting any persons but the rectors of parishes from preaching without a license, with fine or imprisonment, corporeal punishment, banishment, and death as the penalty for successive convictions of the offense, and imposing a residence of twelve months as a prerequisite to obtaining a license. This law was vetoed by the king. The mission at Barbadoes suffered much from mobs in its earlier days, and was for a time refused protection by the magistrates. Active opposition subsided at a later period, but was revived on the breaking out of an insurrection in Jamaica in 1823, when the Methodists were accused of teaching sedition under pretense of giving instruction. The chapel was torn down by a mob, and Mr. Shrewsbury, the missionary, was obliged to go to St. Vincent for safety. The British House of Commons passed a vote of censure upon the inhabitants of the island for these outrages, upon which ninety-four of the principal men among the colonists signed a declaration expressing regret for them. In Jamaica, the opposition to the mission was expressed in a law passed by the legislative assembly in 1802, prohibiting all persons, unless duly qualified under the laws of the island and of Great Britain, from preaching to the negroes, which the king refused to sanction; by a still more stringent law passed by the common council of Kingston; and by a second act passed by the legislative assembly, which stopped the work for a time. Laws with a similar purpose were passed in the Bermudas and the Bahamas, where missions had been begun at Somers Island, Bermuda, by John Stephenson, in 1799, and at New Providence, in the Bahamas, by William Tuston, in 1800. Mr. Stephenson was imprisoned for six months for teaching the slaves, and the mission was suspended for six years, till 1808, when Joshua Marsden obtained permission from the governor to resume the work. In 1816 a law was passed in New Providence prohibiting the holding of meetings before sunrise or after sunset, the only hours at which the slaves could attend, thus preventing their meetings altogether. Finally, the king of England sent orders to the governors of the West India Islands commanding them not to give their assent to any law relative to religion until it had been first submitted to the royal inspection and received the king's approval. Even after this, the legislative assembly of Jamaica, in 1824, passed another law directed especially against the Wesleyan missionaries, and after the insurrection of 1831 several of the missions in that island were temporarily broken up by mobs. The missions in some of the other islands were regarded with favor by the governments, and in all the islands persons were found among the more intelligent of the slave-owners who encouraged and assisted them. When, in 1795, the authorities of Antigua anticipated an attack from the French, the missionary was called upon to organize a military corps from among the members of his society to assist in the defense, and did so. A similar incident is mentioned in connection with the history of the mission in the island of Tortola. The prejudices and opposition gradually passed away after slavery was abolished, in 1834. It was not until 1810, when the island had passed into the hands of the English, that the missionaries were permitted to work effectively in St. Eustatius; yet, after the island was transferred back to Holland, the king ordered an annual grant to be made to the mission.

The missionaries engaged in British Guiana and Trinidad found a large field of labor among the native Africans and the Hindoo coolies who were introduced into that colony, as they have more recently found a similar field among the Chinese coolies who have been brought there and to Jamaica. Their work in British Guiana was denounced at first, and their expulsion was demanded in 1833 by a meeting of the principal citizens of the colony; but in 1845 the leading men and the governor were subscribers towards the erection of a new chapel. The mission in Hayti was begun in 1817, with the sanction of the government. A good congregation was formed at the capital, Port au Prince, and the missionaries were at first treated with general respect both by the people and the government. Yet they had to retire, after two years, in consequence of opposition, while at the same time the president of the republic made a liberal gift to the Missionary Society. For several years after the missionaries went away the societies were oppressed by popular bigotry, and had to hold their meetings in private. John Tindall was sent in 1834 to build up the mission again; other missionaries followed him, and the mission returned 429 members in 1853. In the same year there were returned in all the West Indian missions 52 principal stations, 397 preaching-places, 79 missionaries and assistants, 146 catechists and teachers, 48,589 members, 259 Sunday and day-schools, with 18,247 scholars, and 112,405 attendants on worship.

The West Indian missions have not recently given as large numerical returns as were exhibited in the reports of several years ago. The mission in Jamaica seems to have reached its greatest prosperity about 1844, when it included 26,585 members, against 19,478 in 1853 and 16,749 in 1876; and the entire field of the West Indies returned 43,589 members in 1853, against 43,920 in 1877. The failure to advance is attributed to circumstances connected with the political and social conditions of the islands and the fluctuations in material prosperity to which they have been exposed, by which the interests of the church have suffered in common with all other interests. Aside from members, it is stated "with confidence" in the report for 1876, that "the state of real religion in the West Indies was never more satisfactory than at this present period."

A mission to the native Indians who speak the Maya language, as well as to those who speak Spanish, is maintained at Corosal, in British Honduras. A theological institution and high school was opened at York Castle, near Beechamville, Jamaica, in 1876. The institution has found much favor. Nearly every minister in Jamaica is an active and responsible manager of several day-schools, which schools, it is claimed, will bear a favorable comparison with any others in the country. The report for 1876 stated that the mission in Hayti had been liberally treated by the government, and had received large grants monthly for day-schools, varying from £500 to £600 annually. The brethren were endeavoring to revive the distant country districts, and to establish regular Christian services among them.

The Wesleyan West Indian missions are divided into seven districts: the Antigua district, with 10 stations; the British Guiana district, with 9 stations; the Jamaica district, with 22 stations; the Honduras district, with 3 stations; the Bahama district, with 9 stations; and the Hayti district, with 5 stations. The following is a summary of the returns from these districts, as given in the reports of the Wesleyan Missionary Society for 1876:

Districts.	Chapels and other Preaching Places.	Missionaries and Assistant Missionaries.	Full Members.	On Trial.	Scholars.

The column of scholars is designed to include all the scholars who attend the Sunday- and day-schools, after deducting for those who attend both. This number is not given in the British Guiana and Hayti districts; but the British Guiana district returned 2237 Sunday and 3423 day scholars, and the Hayti district returned 52 Sunday scholars. The total number of local preachers in all the districts was 469; of Sunday-schools 251, with 2408 teachers and 23,047 scholars; of day-schools, 218, with 260 teachers and 18,708 scholars; of attendants on worship, 149,422. In 1877 the same districts returned 43,920 members and 26,980 scholars.

The connection of the African M. E. Church with a mission in Hayti dates from 1830, when two ministers from Samana and Santo Domingo applied to the Baltimore Conference for recognition, and received it. A number of laborers have since worked in the country in connection with this church, prominent among whom is the Rev. A. Jackson, whose efforts have continued over forty years. The Missionary Society has recently decided to establish a regular mission in Hayti, and has appointed the Rev. C. W. Mossell as its missionary. Under the administration of Mr. Mossell a church at Port au Prince was restored to the connection in November, 1877.

The British Methodist Episcopal Church has Conferences in Bermuda and British Guiana. At the fifth session of the Bermuda Conference, held in May, 1877, reports were made from 13 stations, of 299 members, 636 "followers," 45 schools, and 292 scholars. At the second session of the British Guiana Conference, held in March, 1877, 8 preachers received appointments, which included 18 preaching-places. A society of this church was organized at St. Thomas, under the direction of Bishop Disney, in May, 1877.

West Michigan Conference, M. P. Church, "embraces all that part of the State of Michigan lying west of the meridian line not embraced in the Michigan district, and the northern tier of counties of the State of Indiana." In 1877 it reported 53 preachers, 1923 members, and $29,150 church property.

West Tennessee Conference, M. P. Church, was bounded as follows by the Convention of 1877: "Beginning on the Ohio River at the mouth of Green River, in the State of Kentucky, and running with the said Ohio River to its confluence with the Mississippi; thence with the Mississippi River to the Tennessee State line, where said line strikes said Mississippi River south of the city of Memphis; thence with said Tennessee line to Tennessee River; thence with said Tennessee River to the mouth of Sandy River; thence in a northeastern direction to the Cumberland Rolling Mills on the Cumberland River; and from thence in a line to the beginning, so as to include Lafayette and Henderson, in the State of Kentucky"; thus including the western part of Kentucky and Tennessee. It reported for 1877, 17 traveling and 6 unstationed preachers, 1140 members, and 10 churches, valued at $3500.

West Texas Conference, M. E. Church, was constituted by the bishops, under the authority of the General Conference, in 1873. In 1876 its boundaries were defined by the General Conference as embracing "so much of the State of Texas as is not included in the Texas Conference." Prior to this time, however, the German appointments had been set off into the Southern German Conference. In 1876 the General Conference authorized a further division of the territory, under which a portion of this Conference, chiefly embracing the work among the white population, has been set off into the Austin Conference. The statistics of the West Texas Conference are as follows: members, 8438; Sunday-school scholars, 4326; churches, 38, valued at $59,200; parsonages, 3, valued at $2830.

West Texas Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference of 1866, and held its first session Nov. 7, 1866, at Seguin, Texas, when 41 traveling and 36 local preachers, 2113 white and 716 colored members, were reported. The General Conference of 1874 defined its boundaries so as to "include all that part of the State of Texas lying west of the Texas and Northwest Texas Conferences." The latest statistics (1875) show 52 traveling and 62 local preachers, 5018 white members, 49 Sunday-schools, and 1903 scholars.

West Virginia, State of (pop. 442,041).—The history of this State until 1861 is identical with that of Virginia. The people of the western and Ohio River counties of Virginia had long desired a separation from the eastern counties on account of a diversity of interests. The majority of them being opposed to secession, a convention was called after the passage of the ordinance of secession by the Virginia legislature, in 1861, to meet at Wheeling to consult upon the course which should be taken. This convention decided to maintain the State government and to elect a legislature, which, when organized, were recognized by the government of the United States as the legitimate government and legislature of Virginia. The convention also passed an ordinance providing for the formation of a new State, to be called the State of Kanawha, which name was afterwards changed to West Virginia, and pledging the new Commonwealth to assume its proportionate share of the public debt. The legislature gave its consent to the organization of the new State, the measure was approved by Congress, and the State was recognized and regularly admitted to the Union in the course of the same year. The capital was temporarily fixed at Wheeling, but was removed to Charleston in 1870.

The particular time at which Methodism was introduced within the exact limits of West Virginia cannot be definitely determined. At the Conference held in Leesburg, May 19, 1798, a new circuit was organized named Berkeley circuit, and Edward Bailey was appointed pastor. The circuit covered a rugged and mountainous district, stretching from the Blue Ridge along the east Potomac and its southern tributaries as far west as the Alleghanies. A local authority says, "It was the frontier of Methodism in Western Virginia." Henry Ogburn was admitted on trial at the Conference of 1779, and labored with zeal and success for several years in Western Virginia. The Berkeley circuit reported 191 members in 1779, 205 in 1780, and 306 in 1781. In 1782 the name of the circuit was changed to South Branch, and it reported 434 members. The circuit appears to have been divided in 1783, and at the time of the organization of the church, in 1784, Berkeley reported 116 members. In 1824 the principal part of West Virginia was embraced in the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1852 a West Virginia Conference was organized. The Methodist Episcopal Church continued to advance in West Virginia until the breaking out of the Civil War, when the country, being border territory, was greatly distracted by political controversies and military movements. It has, however, grown steadily since the close of the war. It has now within its borders an entire Conference, called the West Virginia Conference, the statistical returns of which give 33,900 members, 22,985 Sunday-school scholars, 377 churches, valued at $579,575, and 52 parsonages, valued at $64,550. The Washington Conference embraces the colored membership of the M. E. Church in this State. A portion of the Baltimore Conference also extends into the State. The M. E. Church South organized a West Virginia Conference in 1858, which reports 13,013 members, with 7925 Sunday-school scholars; and the M. P. Church has also a West Virginia Conference, which reports 9480 members, and 4220 Sunday-school scholars. The general religious statistics for this State, as given in the census for 1870, were as follows:

West Virginia Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1848 with boundaries which have remained essentially the same. Its first session was held at Clarksburg, Va., Oct. 10, 1849, when it reported 51 traveling and 105 local preachers, with 13,890 white and 3178 colored members. In 1876 its boundaries were defined as follows: "Beginning at the southwest corner of the State of Pennsylvania; thence along said line to the northeast corner of Ohio Co., W. Va., so as to include Wheeling Creek mission and Triadelphia circuit; thence by the most direct way to Short Creek, so as to include Short Creek and Liberty circuits; thence down said creek to the Ohio River; thence down said river to the mouth of Big Sandy River; on the west by the State line; on the south and east by the Virginia and Baltimore Conferences to the Pennsylvania State line; thence westward along said line to the place of beginning." It reported, in 1876, 15 traveling and 278 local preachers, 33,900 members, 22,985 Sunday-school scholars, 377 churches, valued at $579,575, and 52 parsonages, valued at $64,550.

West Virginia Conference, M. P. Church, is bounded as follows: "Beginning at Moundsville on the Ohio River; thence down said river to the Kentucky line, so as to include Grove and Olive circuits in Ohio, until they otherwise elect; thence east with the easternward line to the top of the Alleghany Mountains; thence northward with the top of said mountains to the Pennsylvania line; thence west with said line so as to include that part of Pennsylvania that is now embraced in the Morgantown and Monongahela circuits; thence to the Ohio River, including Wheeling; thence down the Ohio River to the place of beginning (Fairmount station to be included in Pittsburgh district until it otherwise elect)." It reported, in 1877, 43 itinerant and 16 unstationed preachers, 9480 members, 4220 Sunday-school scholars, 93 churches and 13 parsonages, valued at $69,550.

West Wisconsin Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1856 "to include the western part of the State." In 1860 a Northwest Conference was organized, making three Conferences in the State, but it was abolished by the General Conference of 1868, and the division of the State between two Conferences, the Wisconsin and West Wisconsin, was restored. It held its first session at Madison, Aug. 20, 1856, Bishop Simpson presiding. It then reported 5828 members, with 73 traveling and 134 local preachers. The boundaries, as defined in 1876, include "that part of the State of Wisconsin not embraced in the Wisconsin Conference." Its statistics for 1876 are: 142 traveling and 73 local preachers, 12,321 members, 15,362 Sunday-school scholars, 182 churches, valued at $457,876, and 81 parsonages, valued at $63,575.

Whatcoat, Richard, one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in the parish of Quinton, England, Feb. 23, 1736. In 1758 he became a regular attendant on the preaching of the English Methodists, and in March, 1761, he realized a personal consciousness of divine favor. He was immediately placed in official positions by the society at Wednesbury, where he resided, serving as a class-leader, a band-leader, and a steward; and in 1763 was admitted into the Wesleyan ministry. He preached at various appointments in England, Ireland, and Wales, and was selected by Mr. Wesley to aid in the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. Having consented to the appointment, he was ordained in September, 1784, by John Wesley, assisted by Dr. Coke and Mr. Creighton, as deacon and elder, and, accompanying Dr. Coke, landed in America the 3d of November following. On the adjournment of the Conference, Mr. Whatcoat traveled extensively through Delaware and Maryland, administering the ordinances to a people who had been long waiting for an ordained minister. In 1790 he traveled with Bishop Asbury throughout the South, and met the Conference in that part of the country, and then, crossing the mountains, they passed into Kentucky, returning through Tennessee and North Carolina into Virginia, and back to Baltimore. His labors were accompanied with unusual spiritual influence, and frequently remarkable manifestations of an extraordinary character accompanied his ministry. In 1787, Mr. Wesley desired his ordination as superintendent or bishop, but the Conference, fearful lest in that case Mr. Wesley might recall Bishop As-

In 1806 he met the Baltimore Conference in company with Bishop Asbury, and at the adjournment of Conference traveled through the Eastern Shore of Maryland towards Philadelphia. His last sermon was preached in Milford, Del., on the 8th of April. The next day, while traveling, he was taken severely ill, but succeeded in reaching Dover, where he found a home with the Hon. Richard Basset, and received every attention which hospitality and bury, declined to elect him. At the General Conference of 1800, Bishop Asbury's health was so poor that an additional superintendent was needed, and Bishop Whatcoat was elected, the votes being very nearly equally divided between him and Jesse Lee. A very great revival followed this session of the General Conference, and Bishop Whatcoat was one of the leading instruments connected with it. He traveled sometimes in company with Bishop Asbury, and sometimes separate, from New England to Georgia: but, suffering from debility, his labors were for a time confined to the Middle States.

kindness could render. He lingered for thirteen weeks, and died in peace and confidence on July 5, 1806. His remains were deposited under the altar of Wesley chapel in the outskirts of Dover. A marble slab, with an inscription, was placed on the left of the pulpit. As a preacher his discourses were plain, instructive, and highly spiritual. As a presiding officer he combined simplicity and dignity. In his private life he was remarkable for his entire devotion to the cause of God. Laban Clark said of him, "I think I may safely say if I ever knew one who came up to St. James' description of a perfect man,—one who bridled his tongue and kept in subjection his whole body,—that man was Bishop Whatcoat."

Wheat, Elias Avery, was born in Barre, Orleans Co., N. Y., Oct. 20, 1818. He enjoyed a common school education, and became quite studious. At the age of seventeen pernicious literature fell in his way, making him very skeptical: and it was by the study of the Bible to show its so-called "contradictions," that he was converted. He united with the Methodist Protestant Church, and was licensed to preach Sept. 19, 1840, commencing as an itinerant in the Genesee Conference.

He has served the Annual Conference as secretary a number of years, and ten terms as its president. He has always been a strong anti-slavery man, and an earnest advocate of union among non-Episcopal Methodists, since the abolition of slavery. He has been elected to the General Conference five times; was a member of the board of Methodist Protestant Union Commissioners, in October, 1875; fraternal messenger to the M. E. General Conference in 1872, and a member of the Baltimore Convention in May, 1877. In 1848, at the request of his Conference he wrote a reply to a work on Church Polity, by A. N. Fillmore, of the M. E. Church, and his work was widely circulated.

Wheatley, R., a delegate from the New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in York, England, in 1831; was educated and entered the ministry in England; came to the United States in 1853, and joined the New York Conference in 1854. In 1862 he became chaplain of the 28th Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers, and served in that capacity till the regiment was mustered out of the service. He afterwards returned to England, and was pastor of a Wesleyan church at Huddersfield for two years. He returned to the United States, and united himself again with the New York Conference in 1866. He has been actively associated for several years with the work of the New York City Mission and Church Extension Society, in connection with which he publishes a periodical, The City Evangelist. He is a frequent contributor to the periodical press of the church, of reviews of books and general articles, and edited the Life of Mrs. Palmer.

Whedon, Daniel Denison, D.D., editor of The Methodist Quarterly Review, was born March 20, 1808, in Onondaga, N. Y. He was graduated in 1828 from Hamilton College, studied law at Rochester, N. Y., and was afterwards engaged as a teacher in the Oneida Conference Seminary, at Cazenovia, N. Y., and in 1831 as a tutor in Hamilton College. In 1833 he was elected Professor of Ancient Languages and Literature in Wesleyan University. After ten years of service in this position, he engaged, in 1843, in the pastoral work of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1845 he was chosen Professor of Rhetoric, Logic, and History in the University of Michigan, where he remained till 1852. In 1855 he was again in the pastorate, at Jamaica, N. Y. In 1856 he was chosen by the General Conference editor of The Methodist Quarterly Review. He has been re-elected to that position for each succeeding term of four years since, having held it now for upwards of twenty years. He is author of a "Commentary on the Gospels, Acts, and Romans" (1860-1876), of a work on the "Freedom of the Will" (1864), and of numerous contributions to Bibliotheca Sacra and other periodicals.

Wheeler, Alfred, M.D., D.D., editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, was born in New Haven,

REV. ALFRED WHEELER, M.D., D.D.

Huron Co., O., Sept. 14, 1824. He was converted at sixteen, and entered the Ohio Wesleyan University, where he graduated with honor. Subsequently he studied medicine, graduating at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia. In 1853 he was received into the North Ohio Conference, was pastor of several important stations, and was presiding elder of the Cleveland district. He also acted as centenary agent, and as corresponding secretary of the Western Seaman's Friend Society. Subsequently he was transferred to Erie Conference, and stationed at Meadville, Erie, and Warren. He served several years as a trustee of Baldwin University, and is a member of the board of control of Alleghany College. During the Civil War he was chaplain in the army for one year, and was five months surgeon of a battery, without commission or pay, and was present at the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, and in the campaign of Fredericksburg. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1868 and 1876, at the latter of which he was elected editor of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate, the position he now holds.

Wheeler, David Hilton, D.D., was born at Ithaca, N. Y., Nov. 18, 1829. His grandfather was a local preacher, and his father was an efficient member of the church. Removing early to the West, he entered in 1848 the Rock River Seminary, where he completed a college course. From 1851 to 1853 he was tutor in the seminary, when he accepted a position as teacher in the Iowa Conference Seminary at Mount Vernon, which is now Cornell College. In 1855-56 he was editor of a paper in Carroll Co., Ill., and also served as county school commissioner. He returned to Cornell College in 1857, as Professor of Greek, and in 1861 was appointed United States consul for Genoa, Italy, by President Lincoln. After holding this position five years, he became a correspondent from Italy to the New York and Chicago Tribunes, and organized in that year, in London, the European commission-ship, or general correspondence of the New York Tribune. In 1867 he accepted the chair of English Literature and History in the Northwestern University, at Evanston, which position he held for eight years, and until he became editor of The Methodist, in May, 1875. Dr. Wheeler was licensed as a local preacher in 1851; admitted to Upper Iowa Conference in 1858, and located in 1861, when he accepted the foreign consulship. He was re-admitted into the Upper Iowa Conference in 1867, and located in 1870. In addition to various articles which he has written as editor and correspondent, he published in London "Brigandage in South Italy," in two volumes, under the name of David Hilton. He also published, in 1866, a translation of Prof. Ceesias' "Conspiracy of Giov. Luigi Fieschi." He was also the editor of The Lakeside Monthly, at Chicago, in 1872.

Wheeler, John, D.D., was born in Portsmouth, England, April 7, 1815; removed to Bellefontaine, O., 1820; was converted in childhood, and joined the M. E. Church in 1824. He was a student in Norwalk (O.) Seminary in 1835-36. Entered Alleghany College in 1837, and Indiana Asbury University in 1839, and was graduated from the latter institution in 1840, being a member of the first graduating class. He was elected Professor of Latin in Indiana Asbury University in 1842, and retired from that position in 1854. In 1855 he was placed in charge of Baldwin Institute, Berea, O., which became Baldwin University in March, 1856. He retired from this position in 1870, and in the same year was elected president of Iowa Wesleyan University. He served in this office till 1875. He joined the North Ohio Conference in 1855. He secured the location and organization of German Wallace College, Berea, O., in August, 1863, and of the German College at Mount Pleasant, Iowa, in September, 1873. He was pastor of First M. E. church,

REV. JOHN WHEELER, D.D.

Keokuk, Iowa, in 1875, and was appointed presiding elder of the Keokuk district Sept. 1, 1876. While connected with the Indiana Asbury University he published The Asbury Notes, a literary newspaper, from 1852 to 1854, and while at the Iowa Wesleyan University he conducted a similar journal, The Iowa Classic, from 1870 to 1875. He has also published numerous contributions in weekly and monthly periodicals, and a few addresses.

Wheeling, W. Va. (pop. 19,280), on the east bank of the Ohio River, about 100 miles below Pittsburgh. Methodism was introduced in 1785 by Rev. Wilson Lee, then traveling the old Redstone circuit. The first convert was Mrs. Elizabeth Zane, wife of Colonel Ebenezer Zane, the founder and principal proprietor of the place. Redstone circuit, with which the society was for many years connected, was the first circuit organized west of the Alleghany Mountains. This circuit first appears in the minutes of 1784, but, as in other places, local preachers were the first to commence the work. In 1781, Robert Wooster, a local preacher, began his labors near Uniontown, and subsequently extended his work into Virginia, and William Shaw, Thomas Lakin, and John J. Jacob were early known through the country as the "three bishops," because of their arduous and zealous labors. Hon. John J. Jacob, a son of the last-named preacher, was for two terms governor of the State. When Lee first visited Wheeling it was a fortified village, having a short time previously endured a siege of several days from a force of 400 Indians and Tories, and it was at the hazard of a minister's life to travel from place to place. In 1808, Bishop Asbury first visited Wheeling, accompanied by Henry Boehm, who writes, "At Wheeling, Bishop Asbury preached in the court-house from Hebrews ii. 2, 3, on the great salvation, and the danger of neglecting it. We had no house of worship there at that time. We were kindly entertained by Colonel Ebenezer Zane, one of the earliest settlers in the West. I was highly delighted, as well as the bishop, to hear Mr. Zane and his wife relate the thrilling scenes through which they had passed, and their hairbreadth escapes from wild beasts and from murderous savages. She told us about the siege of the fort, and how she was engaged in running bullets, which the men fired at the Indians who were thirsting for their blood. Mrs. Zane joined the Methodists in 1785, under Wilson Lee. She was a Christian heroine, an honor to her sex and to the church." The first church was built in 1818, on the site of the present Fourth Street church. The lot was a gift from Noah Zane, son of Daniel Zane. Prior to this, meetings had been held first in the cabins of the settlers, and afterwards in the court-house. This church became too small for the congregation, and a much larger and more commodious one was erected in its place, which was commenced in 1834, but not finished until 1836. It was a large building, with basement and galleries, and an audience-room capable of seating about two thousand persons. In 1866, the foundations becoming impaired, a new and more beautiful edifice in the modern style was erected, and dedicated, in 1870, by Bishop Janes. The German population of the place having become numerous, a society was formed, and a church, under John Swahlen, erected on Chapline Street, in the fifth ward, in 1839, and was rebuilt in 1860. In 1848 the Chapline Street church was erected on a lot tendered by Henry Echols and Thomas Hornbrook, its size being 42 by 63 feet. The North Street church was organized in 1848, but the church was not finished until 1849. Wesley chapel, formerly known as South Wheeling church, erected on Jacob Street, eighth ward, was built in 1850, and rebuilt in 1871. Thomson church, formerly the Island Mission, is located on Zane's Island, in the seventh ward, and was originally organized for a mission Sunday-school. In 1855, Daniel Zane tendered the lot, and helped in building a frame house 36 by 48 feet. This was replaced, in 1872, by a handsome brick edifice, named after Bishop Thomson, who had died in Wheeling a short time previous. Zane Street church, erected on Zane Street, in the fourth ward, was organized in 1866, and a substantial brick edifice was erected the same year. Simpson church, erected on Eoff Street, third ward, was organized in 1866, and was erected to accommodate the colored members who had formerly worshiped in the Fourth Street church. Benwood church was erected in a suburb of Wheeling in 1870. Steinrod, at Fulton, within the city limits, east, was built and dedicated in 1874. This city has enjoyed from time to time the labors of many eminent ministers of the Baltimore, Pittsburgh, and West Virginia Conferences, and has been favored with several extensive revivals, the most noted of which were in 1831-32, under the pastorate of T. M. Hudson, who was assisted by J. N. Maffit; in 1843, under S. E. Babcock; and in 1857, under J. E. Wilson, who was chiefly assisted by Rev. S. Brockunier. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Whelpton, William T., Esq., an English layman, was early converted to God, and became an earnest worker in Methodism; he gave himself to works of practical philanthropy, and employed his ample means in sustaining all the various funds of Methodism. Wherever a new chapel was to be built or an outlying mission encouraged, he was ever ready with hearty counsel and contribution. The Children's Home, the army and navy work, and the foreign missions, with every form of home evangelization, had always his prompt and generous support. He died of typhoid fever, at his home near London, in 1876, aged forty-six.

Whetstone, John, was born in Westmoreland Co., Pa., on Oct. 25, 1788. In the year 1809 he united with the M. E. Church at Cincinnati, O., where he spent most of his life. In 1828, during the great controversy on the subject of lay representation in the M. E. Church, he withdrew, and entered into the organization of the Sixth Street Methodist (Protestant) church in Cincinnati, of which he remained an honored member till his death. In 1837, when in the full vigor of manhood, with ample capital at his command, he retired from business in order to avoid, for his family, the temptation of great wealth. He died Aug. 10, 1874, on Mount Auburn, Cincinnati. He was a man of strong mind, clear judgment, firm purpose, and generous impulses. His liberality was largely shared by his church, for, without being a bigot, he was strongly attached to it. He was a member of the official board, and, as steward and trustee, watched over the financial interests of the church, besides contributing as a leader to its spiritual advancement.

Whitcomb, Hon. James, LL.D., ex-governor of Indiana, was born at Stockbridge, Vt., Dec. 1, 1791. Removing to the West in 1806, he graduated at Transylvania University, Ky. Having studied law, he was admitted to the bar, and practiced at Bloomington, Ind., where he resided in 1824. Entering political life, he was elected prosecuting attorney for the district, and became a State senator 1830-35. He was appointed by President Van Buren as commissioner-general of the Land Office in 1836, in which position he remained until 1841, when he returned to practice law in Indiana. In 1843 he was elected governor, and served until 1848, when he was elected United States Senator. He died in New York City, Oct. 4, 1852. He had been strongly attached to the M. E. Church, but did not unite with it until in his later years. He was vice-president of the American Bible Society, and also a warm friend of education. At his death he left his library to the Indiana Asbury University.

White, Hon. David N., was born in Wareham, Mass., Aug. 22, 1805, of Pilgrim ancestry. His parents removing West, he learned the printing business in Pittsburgh, and was one of the early publishers of the Pittsburgh Conference Journal. In 1840 he spent one year in editorial work in Illinois, when he returned to Pittsburgh, and became editor of the Pittsburgh Gazette, with brief intervals, until 1862. He was strongly anti-slavery, and took part in its early organizations, and was a member of the Republican conventions of 1856 and 1860. In 1862 he was appointed collector of internal revenue, which position he held until 1866. In 1869 he was elected to the legislature of the State, and was re-elected for several terms. In 1872 he was a delegate to the constitutional convention. He was converted at the age of nineteen, and has filled all the offices which a layman holds in the M. E. Church, and has been deeply devoted to its various interests.

White, Henry, a member of the Philadelphia Conference, M. E. Church, was born in Aecomac Co., Va., in 1777, and died in Delaware, Oct. 17, 1856. He joined the Philadelphia Conference in 1803, located in 1810, re-entered the Conference in 1823, and filled prominent appointments. In 1846 he became superannuated. He possessed a mind of clearness, penetration, and vigor, and was skilled and accurate as a theologian. He frequently displayed "an energy of thought, a force of diction, and depth of pathos and power of illustration that made him an almost incomparable preacher." He was presiding elder for seventeen years, and was elected as delegate to the General Conference in 1832, 1836, 1840, and 1844.

White, Hon. John W. F., LL.D., was born in Washington Co., Pa., Jan. 19, 1821. Converted in his youth, he has been a class-leader, steward, trustee, Sunday-school superintendent, and local preacher. He was educated at Alleghany College; studied law, and was admitted to the bar in 1844, and having practiced six years in Washington, two of which he served as editor of the Washington Reporter, he removed to Pittsburgh. From 1861 to 1865 he was city solicitor; in 1872 he was a member of the convention which formed the new constitution of the State, and was subsequently elected judge of the district court of Alleghany County, which position he still holds. Judge White takes a deep interest in the cause of education; has been a school director for fifteen years at Sewickley, where he resides; is a trustee of Alleghany and of Beaver Colleges, and was for a short time connected with the faculty of Mount Union College. He was a lay delegate for the Pittsburgh Conference to the General Conference of 1876, and is strongly attached to the interests and economy of the church.

White, Joseph J., A.M., a minister of the M. P. Church, was born at Cavendish, Windsor Co., Vt., June 4, 1817. He attended boarding-school at Wilmot, N. H., and afterwards at the old Chester Academy, in Vermont, and upon finishing his studies became a teacher. In 1836 he was converted, and entered upon the regular work of the ministry in 1840. He has labored in the Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, and New York Annual Conferences. For two terms he served as president of the Ohio Conference. In 1870 he was called to a church in New York City, which, in 1873, purchased a building in Brooklyn, where he continues the pastor.

White, Moses Clark, late a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and a scientific lecturer and writer, was born at Paris, Oneida Co., N. Y., July 24, 1819. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1845, and studied theology and medicine for two years in Yale College. He joined the New York Conference in 1846, and in 1847 went as a missionary and physician to Foo Chow, China. From 1848 to 1852 he conducted a public dispensary in that city. He returned to the United States in 1854, and engaged in the practice of medicine at New Haven, Conn. He was appointed, in 1857, lecturer on Microscopy in the medical department of Yale College; in 1862, teacher of Botany in the Sheffield Scientific School of Yale College; in 1864, secretary of the Connecticut Medical Society; in 1867, Professor of Pathology and Microscopy in the medical department of Yale College; and in 1868, lecturer on Histology and Microscopy in Wesleyan University. While in China, he published, in 1851, the gospel of Matthew in the colloquial dialect of Foo Chow. After his return home he published, in 1846, an "Introduction to the Study of the Colloquial Language of Foo Chow." In scientific literature, he has written a treatise on the microscope, and the chapter on optics in Silliman's "Physies," and has edited the second edition of Porter's "Chemistry."

White, Samuel Stockton, D.D.S., of Philadelphia, was born in Bucks Co., Pa., June 19, 1822. When very young he assisted his mother in business in Burlington, N. J., and at the age of fourteen was indentured to his uncle, in Philadelphia, to learn dentistry and the art of manufacturing artificial teeth. Subsequently he engaged extensively in the manufacture, and received the first premium gold medal for the best artificial teeth from the American Institute of New York. His principal office is on Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, but has branches in New York, Boston, and Chicago, and manufactures artificial teeth and dentists' instruments for a large part of the world. He has received gold medals from various world's fairs, institutes, etc., commencing with the London Exposition of 1851, and continuing to the present time. He has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for a number of years, and has been a liberal contributor to the beautiful Arch Street church, Philadelphia.

White, Thomas, formerly judge of the court in Kent Co., Del., was born in 1730. He was an intimate friend and defender of Bishop Asbury, especially during the Revolutionary War. It was at his home that Asbury resided for several months, in the height of political excitement. It was also at his house that the bishop met the preachers in consultation, and that on one occasion, when the distress of the country was great, these men of God read the Bible on their knees, and offered up fervent prayers for the triumph of the gospel. Judge White was suspected of disloyalty to the American cause, and was arrested during the time of Asbury's residence with him, but was soon released upon the authorities becoming satisfied of his loyalty to the colonial cause. The judge and all his family soon afterwards became converted and united with the Methodist society, and his house became a place of frequent preaching. Through his personal influence and liberality a chapel was erected in the neighborhood for public worship. A writer says: "As to moral worth, Judge White had no superior in his day. His house and hands were always open to relieve the needy. He was the friend of the poor and oppressed, and left no one in bondage whom he could make free. For many years he lived in the enjoyment of perfect love." He died in the spring of 1795. The news of his death reaching Asbury, he wrote, "I have met with nothing like it in the death of any friend on the continent."

Whitefield, George, was born in Gloucester, England, Dec. 16, 1714. His father was an inn-keeper, but died before he was two years old. His childhood and a part of his youth were spent in the inn, where, when he was fifteen years old, he began to engage in the work and service of the house. He was sent to school when twelve years old, and attracted so much attention by his oratorical and theatrical faculties that he was several times appointed orator before the corporation at the examinations, and had a play composed for him by the master of the school. His mind was filled with frivolous thoughts, and he acquired gay tastes and irreligious views. After he left the school and was employed in the inn, habits of serious thought grew upon him, he began to read the Bible; he received deep impressions from reading Thomas à Kempis, and even composed a sermon. A servitor-student of Pembroke College, Oxford, stopping at the inn, told how he managed to meet his expenses at the university, and Whitefield's mother saw at once an opening for her son. He entered Oxford as a servitor in his eighteenth year, carrying with him the religious thoughts which he had been recently cultivating. His impressions were strengthened by reading Law's "Serious Call," but he found the students by whom he was surrounded uncongenial associates, and sought the acquaintance of Charles Wesley, and the society of the Wesleys and their band, who were then the butts for the ridicule of the university. The association cost him ridicule, the loss of his servitor's fees, and the censure of the officers of the college. His support was provided for through friends of the Wesleys, and he afterwards, when the Wesleys had gone to Georgia, became the leader of the "Holy Club." His conversion occurred shortly afterwards, and before that of the

Wesleys. He was ordained upon the special invitation of the bishop of Gloucester at Gloucester, on the 20th of June, 1736, and preached his first sermon on the following Sunday, with powerful effect upon his hearers. He returned to Oxford to find the Methodist band growing, and went from there to preach in Hampshire, in Bristol, in London, day after day, to increasing crowds. He had received an invitation from John Wesley to join him in Georgia. It was just before Mr. Wesley had decided to return to England, and it so happened that the vessel on which he sailed, in response to the invitation, passed in sight of the one in which Mr. Wesley was returning, only a few hours from the English port. The officers and men of the ship at first treated him with contempt as an impostor, but he won them over. Arriving at Savannah, after a voyage of four months, his attention was attracted to the orphans of the colony and their destitute condition. He resolved to establish an asylum for them, and to return to England to collect funds for the purpose. He arrived in London in December, 1738. The trustees of the colony of Georgia approved his scheme for an orphan asylum, but the prejudice of the church against his preaching was so great that he found it difficult to get access to the pulpits. What few churches were at first opened to him were soon closed against him. The idea of preaching in the open air was suggested to him, and he began at Kingswood, among the rude colliers, February 17, 1739, the career of field-preaching with which his eventful life is inseparably associated. From Kingswood he went to Bristol, and on his return to Kingswood was received by the colliers with an entertainment, and laid the corner-stone of a charity-school which they had collected funds to build. He visited Wales with Howell Harris, and returning to London, preached at Moorfields and Kensington Common, and collected considerable sums from the multitudes in aid of his orphan asylum. He embarked on his second voyage to America in August, 1739, arrived at Philadelphia in November, preached there, through New Jersey, and at New York, to vast crowds in the open air, and traveled by land, preaching all along the way to Savannah, where he laid the corner-stone of his orphan house, and opened the institution with forty children. He returned to Philadelphia to collect funds for his asylum, when Benjamin Franklin emptied his pockets of gold, silver, and copper, in practical testimony of the power of his eloquence, and he again visited New York with unabated success. On his return to Savannah, he was met by invitations to visit New England, and, accepting them, arrived at Newport, R. I., in September, 1740. His journey extended to Boston and beyond, as far as the Merrimack River, thence westward to Northampton, Mass., and south to New Haven, where he preached before the governor and legislature of the colony. He returned to England in the following year, and was there separated from the Wesleys on account of disagreement in doctrines, he holding and promulgating Calvinistic views opposed to the Arminian views of the Wesleys. The courses of the great preachers were hereafter distinct, although cordial relations were soon restored between them. Whitefield's popularity was diminished for a time, but shortly rose again to its full height. A tabernacle was built for him by his Calvinistic friends, which was soon crowded; he made two visits to Scotland; ventured to preach at Moorfields during the Whitsun holidays, when the crowd was most numerous and most boisterous, but with his usual success in winning the rudest of them, and returned to America, after three years' sojourn in England, in 1744. He arrived at Wells, Me., after a long voyage, was taken sick at Portsmouth, N. H., but arose from his bed and preached; extended his labors as far as North Yarmouth, Me.; preached in the towns around Boston, passed through Connecticut, where he preached, notwithstanding the laws which had lately been passed prohibiting intrusions into parishes, attended to the affairs of his orphan house at Savannah, spent three months in Bermuda, and returned to England in 1748. He remained three years in Great Britain, traveling over England, Ireland, Scotland, and Wales. During this visit he became acquainted with the Countess of Huntingdon, through whose instrumentality a complete reconciliation was effected between him and Mr. Wesley, and who appointed him one of her chaplains. He made a fourth voyage to America in 1751, and spent the winter in Georgia and South Carolina; returned to England, where he made one of his most successful campaigns; and again came to America in 1754, bringing with him twenty-two orphans. Visiting the North, he found that the opposition to him in New England had died away, and he was received everywhere with respect, and in many places with enthusiasm. He returned to England in the next year, and remained eight years, traveling over all parts of the United Kingdom. One of the most noticeable features of his sixth journey in the United States, in 1763-65, was the receipt of a vote of thanks for a present of books from Harvard College, which had previously issued its "testimony" against him. He returned to England for the last time in 1765. He had formed a design of converting his orphan school at Savannah into a college, and sought a charter for the proposed institution. The Privy Council insisting that the institution should be conformed to the ritual of the Church of England, he refused to accept a charter on those terms. His visit was full of labors, and was marked by frequent intercourse with the Rev.

John Wesley, with whom, as with the Countess of Huntingdon, he cordially co-operated. He sailed for America for the last time in September, 1769, leaving behind him an affectionate farewell letter to John Wesley. He found his orphan asylum at Savannah prospering, with new buildings and little debt. He started north in May of the following year, was cordially received at Philadelphia by all denominations, including the Episcopalians, met "larger congregations than ever" at New York, passed up the Hudson and to the northern settlements of the colony, and proceeded through Boston to Portsmouth, N. H. Turning back, he preached in the open air at Exeter, N. H., for two hours, his last sermon, Sept. 29, 1770, and went the same day to Newburyport, Mass., where he was to preach on the next day. He was seized during the night with asthma, and died at sunrise on Sunday morning, Sept. 30. His death was noticed with funeral sermons throughout the country; and at Savannah, the magistrates of the colony attended the services officially. The centennial anniversary of his death was celebrated at Newburyport, Sept. 30, 1870, with a discourse by the Rev. Dr. Stearns and a public meeting. His works were published in six volumes in 1771. Biographies have been written of him by Dr. Gillies, in 1772; the Rev. Robert Philip, in 1837: a sketch, by I. R. Andrews, was published in 1866. The "Prince of Pulpit Orators," by the Rev. J. B. Wakeley (New York, 1871), is a collection of incidents in his life, and characteristic anecdotes.

Whitehall, N. Y. (pop. 4322), is situated in Washington County, on the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad. It is first mentioned as a pastoral charge in 1822, when Orrin Pier and Philo Ferris were appointed to Whitehall circuit. The circuit reported 114 members in 1823, 447 members in 1824, and 502 members in 1825. In 1829 the circuit, having been reduced in extent, reported only 281 members, but the number rose to 360 in the next year. Whitehall and Castleton returned 528 members in 1832, Whitehall and Whitehall mission 337 members in 1840, Whitehall and East Whitehall 210 members in 1850, and Whitehall alone returned 180 members in 1860. It is in the Troy Conference, and reported, in 1876, 230 members, a church valued at $10,000, a parsonage valued at $3000, and 150 scholars in the Sunday-schools.

Whiteman, John, Esq., a manufacturer of Philadelphia, was born in 1804, and united with the M. E. Church in 1821. In 1828 he established a Sunday-school near the arsenal, which grew into a Conference appointment, and was subsequently superseded by the Brickmakers', now Western, M. E. church. Through his influence he succeeded in inducing about fifty members, who had withdrawn from the Ebenezer church, to unite with the Reformers, to organize as the present St. Paul's M. E. church. He was also instrumental in securing ground for the M. E. church at Gloucester City. In 1840 he became a trustee of the Centenary Fund of the Philadelphia Conference, acting first as secretary, and then as treasurer, until 1864. In 1853 he was elected treasurer of the Chartered Fund, and still holds that position. In 1842 he was appointed a manager of the Philadelphia Conference Missionary Society, in 1843 was elected its vice-president, in 1844 its president, and in 1859 its treasurer, the position which he now holds. In 1859 he was instrumental in organizing a Sunday-school near Charleston, N. J., which has been the means of erecting a church free from debt. In 1862 he was one of the original projectors of Arch Street M. E. church, with which he still holds official relations. Since 1850 he has been a trustee of Dickinson College, and since 1852 has been connected with the Educational Fund of the Philadelphia Annual Conference; was its treasurer for many years, and is now president of the board.

White River Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized by the General Conference of 1870, and held its first session Sept. 28, 1870, Bishop Keener presiding. It reported 43 traveling and 90 local preachers, 8249 white and 163 colored members, 93 Sunday-schools, and 3040 scholars. The General Conference of 1874 bounded it "on the east by the Mississippi River, on the north by the Missouri State line, on the west by the Arkansas Conference, on the south by a line running from the head of Pularm Creek to the head of Cypress Bayou; thence down said bayou to Des Are Bayou; thence down that bayou to White River, and down said river to its mouth." In 1875 this Conference reported 70 traveling and 108 local preachers, 12,243 white and 4 colored members, and 5334 scholars.

Whitney, George Henry, D.D., principal of the Newark Conference Collegiate Institute, Hackettstown, N. J., was born in Georgetown, D. C., July 30, 1830, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1858. In the same year he became principal of the Macedon Centre Academy, N. Y., and in 1859 principal of Oneida Seminary, N. Y. He joined the Oneida Conference of the M. E. Church in 1860, and was in the next year transferred to the Newark Conference, where he performed pastoral work till 1870, when he was elected principal of the newly-established Newark Conference Collegiate Institute at Hackettstown, N. J., and financial agent of the same. He is author of a "Handbook of Bible Geography" and the "Lesson Compend," and has prepared many Sunday-school lessons.

Whitney, William, Esq., lay delegate from the Northern New York Conference to the General Conference of 1876, is at the head of one of the largest drug-houses in Northern New York. He united with the M. E. Church early in life, has been a devoted Sunday-school worker and a superintendent for several years, and has often been called to conduct Sunday-school institutes in his part of the State. He takes a deep interest in all church enterprises and institutions.

The erection of a large three-story building, to accommodate 300 boarders, is contemplated. In the arrangement of the course of study, especial importance is attached to the elementary branches, analysis, composition, algebra, geometry, and the natural sciences. The study of the languages is optional. Lectures are delivered on chemistry, natural philosophy, physiology, and natural his-

Whitworth, a planter and local preacher of the M. E. Church South, who was also the founder of the town of Brookhaven, and who built the first (frame) college building, at a cost of about $10,000. The course of the institution was begun prosperously, with J. J. Lee, formerly of Capers College, as president, till it was interrupted by the breaking out of the Civil War. The exercises were kept up under Professor Lee, and afterwards under G. L. Crosby till, Mr. Crosby having died in 1863, the building was occupied as a military hospital. The school was reopened, in 1865, by George F. Thompson, presiding elder of the Brookhaven district. He was succeeded, in 1867, by H. Johnson, of Madison College, Sharon, Miss., the property of the college having in the mean time been conveyed to the Mississippi Conference. The institution was at this time embarrassed by debt, the building was out of repair and scantily furnished, and only 57 pupils were in attendance. The number of scholars has since risen to 230, of whom 140 are from a distance; the college building has been thoroughly furnished, three new buildings have been added, at a cost of $10,000 or $12,000, and large additions

Wightman, William M., D.D., LL.D., bishop of the M. E. Church South, was born in Charleston, S. C., Jan. 29, 1808. His father was a native of that city; his mother, of Plymouth, England. They were both Methodists, and possessed of high and firm religious principle. The mother, when a child, had often been dandled on John Wesley's knee, and was led in class-meeting the last time before leaving her native land by Dr. Adam Clarke. The family worshiped at Trinity church, and the daily reading of the Scriptures was part of the family life and discipline. He was sent to school early, and in his seventeenth year entered the Sophomore class in the College of Charleston, whence he was graduated in October, 1827. Early in 1825 he was converted at a camp-meeting in the neighborhood of Charleston, and by the time his scholastic career was finished he had become firmly convinced that he was called to the ministry. In this view Dr. Capers, his preacher in charge, and J. O. Andrew, his presiding elder, both concurred; and he was licensed to preach in the summer of 1827, during his senior year at college. On the day he was twenty years old he left his father's house for Camden, S. C., where he joined the Conference, which was then in session there. In 1834, upon the suggestion of Dr. Olin, who had been appointed president of Randolph Macon College, Va., he was appointed agent for that institution to collect the $20,000 of endowment fund which the South Carolina Conference had pledged to it. After Greensboro', Ala., and in 1866 was chosen by the General Conference to be bishop. He has traveled extensively, and has been noted for his careful and successful administration.

Bishop Wightman has written considerably for the periodical press, and is the author of the "Life of Bishop Capers," as well as of various sermons and addresses. He resides in Charleston, S. C.

serving for five years in this capacity he was appointed Professor of English Literature in the college. He resigned this position in 1838 and returned to pastoral work, receiving the appointment of presiding elder of the Cokesbury district. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1840, and was elected by that body editor of the Southern Christian Advocate. He held this position for fourteen years, when he was elected president of Wofford College at its opening in 1854. In 1859 he was elected chancellor of the Southern University, Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church South, was born at Charleston, S. C., Sept. 9, 1825. He was graduated at the Charleston College in 1846, and in 1847 entered the South Carolina Conference. During an uninterrupted and arduous ministry of thirty years he has been appointed to the chief cities of South Carolina, and has manifested great interest in the cause of Sabbath-schools and the religious condition of the colored people. Earnest and impressive as a preacher, he has been uniformly successful in building up the church of Christ.

Wilber, Perley B., D.D., founder of the Wesleyan Female College, now Cincinnati Wesleyan College, at Cincinnati, O., was born in Dutchess Co., N. Y., Dec. 21, 1806, and died at Cincinnati, O., June 11, 1859. He received his preparatory training and was converted at the Oneida Conference Seminary, then entered Wesleyan University, and was graduated from that institution in 1834. In the next year he was appointed teacher of Ancient Languages in the Oneida Conference Seminary, Cazenovia, N. Y. In 1838 he became president of the Buckingham Female Seminary, Virginia. While at this place he was offered, and declined, the presidency of Washington College, Miss. He removed, in 1842, to Cincinnati, and assumed the charge of the Wesleyan Female College, where he remained till his death. He was greatly assisted in his labors as a teacher by Mrs. Wilber. He was a member first of the Ohio, then of the Cincinnati Conference, and was a thoughtful and instructive preacher, but his heart was enlisted in the cause of Christian education for women.

Wilberforce University is located three and one-half miles from Xenia, O., and is an institution under the patronage and control of the African M. E. Church. The original edifice was erected for a fashionable watering-place, and was a large and convenient building. It was purchased by a number of individuals, and under the patronage of the Cincinnati Conference, was devoted to the education of colored young men and women. Rev. J. F. Wright, D.D., was an active and efficient agent. After being thus held for a few years it passed, in 1863, into the hands of the African M. E. Church for a small sum, and has been under the general supervision of Bishop Payne, of that denomination. The original building was consumed by fire, but another has been erected in its place. Funds were collected by Bishop Payne not only in the United States, but in England, which he visited at the request of his church. It is an institution which has accomplished much good for colored youth. At the General Conference of 1872, the endowment agent reported that he had nearly $50,000 in notes, pledges, and money, and it then had an annual attendance of about 125 students.

Wilbor, Albert D., D.D., a delegate from the Genesee Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, joined the Genesee Conference in 1843, and has served in that body as pastor, presiding elder, and financial agent of the Genesee Wesleyan Seminary. For two years, in 1854-55, he was pastor of the Woodward Avenue M. E. church, Detroit, Mich.

Wilbraham Wesleyan Academy is located at Wilbraham, Mass., and is one of the oldest institutions connected with the M. E. Church. It was originally established by the Methodist ministers of New England, in 1818, at New Market, N. H., and was intended both for general students and for young men who designed to enter the ministry. In 1824 an act of incorporation was obtained from the legislature of Massachusetts, and the academy was removed to Wilbraham, its present site, where it was opened in September, 1825. Eight students were present the first day, and thirty-five during the term. Its first president after the removal was the talented and lamented Dr. Fisk, who presided over it until 1831, when he took charge of the Wesleyan University. The principals from that time have been: W. McK. Bangs, A.M., 1831-32; John Foster, A.M., 1832-34; David Patton, D.D., 1834-41; Charles Adams, D.D., 1841-45; Robert Allyn, D.D., 1845-48; Minor Raymond, D.D., 1848-64; Edward Cooke, D.D., 1864-74; and Nathaniel Fellows, A.M., 1874, who is the present principal, and Professor of Mental and Moral Science. The institution is in a healthful and beautiful location, and has extensive grounds, including farm-lands of 196 acres. There are six buildings devoted to academic purposes, the chief of which are large and most conveniently arranged. It has libraries containing 5300 volumes, with good philosophical, chemical, and mathematical apparatus, and a cabinet, museum, and apparatus valued at $14,000. Its principal is assisted by a corps of able professors in the different departments. Its students, embracing both young men and young women, average an attendance of from 200 to 300 annually. Since its organization about 15,000 students have been in attendance, 700 of whom have prepared for college, and as many others have engaged in teaching or professional studies. At least one-third of its students have been ladies. It has suffered some severe reverses by fire, but has received generous gifts from friends, and its property is now estimated at $150,000. Wiley, Allen, D.D., was born in Frederick Co., Va., Jan. 15, 1789, and died in Vevay, Ind., July 23, 1848. He removed to Indiana with his parents in 1804; joined the church in 1810, and was licensed to exhort in 1811, and to preach in 1813. He commenced his traveling ministry in 1816. Eleven years of his itinerant life were spent on laborious and extensive circuits; for fourteen years he was presiding elder, a part of the time his district extending from the Ohio River to Michigan. He was five years in the larger places as station-preacher. He was a delegate to all the General Conferences from 1832 to 1844. He was simple and plain in his manners, honest and upright in all his movements, a man of great energy and decision of character, and an able and successful minister. For a number of years he was in the habit of reading the Scriptures in the Hebrew, Latin, and Greek languages. He was one of the active founders and patrons of the Indiana Asbury University, and held for many years the position of trustee. He wrote for the Western Christian Advocate a number of articles on "Ministerial Character and Duties," which were subsequently leyan University in 1837, and in the same year became principal of the high school at Augusta, Me. In 1838 he was elected Professor of Ancient Languages in Emory and Henry College, and in 1852 was appointed president of that institution. He was a member of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church South in 1854, 1858, 1862, 1866, and during the whole of the Civil War was chaplain at the hospital at Emory and Henry College.

partment of the University of New York. He pursued also a course of classical study in the same institution. He commenced the practice of medicine in Western Pennsylvania, and subsequently removed to Pottsville in 1849. At the request of Dr. Durbin he went as medical missionary to Foo Chow, China, after having been received into the Genesee Conference. He attended an additional course of lectures in the University of New York, and in March, 1850, sailed for China, holding his membership at his own request in the Philadelphia Conference. He returned from China in May, 1854, and was immediately assigned to fill a vacancy on Staten Island. In 1855 he was transferred to the Newark Conference, where he was successively stationed in Newark and in Jersey City. In 1858 he took charge of Pennington Seminary, where he continued until 1863. In 1864 he was elected editor of the Ladies' Repository, and was re-elected to that position in 1868. In 1872

Wilkesbarre, Pa. (pop. 10,174), is the capital of Luzerne County, on the Susquehanna River. It was laid out in 1773, and was burned by the British and Indians during the Revolutionary War. Methodism was introduced as early as 1788, when Anning he was elected bishop. On his return from China he published "The Fallen Missionaries of Foo Chow." While acting as editor of the Repository he also edited the books, and published "The Religion of the Family." Bishop Wiley has visited the various States and Territories, and is now (1877) on an extensive tour to visit the missions in Japan and China.

Owen organized the first class in Wyoming at Ross Hill. This was not far from the present site of Wilkesbarre. Abel Pierce, Esq., settled in Kingston before the war, a little above Wilkesbarre. Mrs. Pierce early became a convert to Methodism, and the church owes much to that family for its progress. Azel Dana was the first class-leader in Wilkesbarre. He died in 1804. About 1795-96 Valentine Cook and Alward White were preachers on the circuit. Mr. Cook stopped with Mr. Mann in April of that year, and found a comfortable home. Methodism had few adherents, and Mr. Cook having delivered a very important sermon, an attempt was made to mob him. For this purpose a party prepared matches by winding a cloth or paper round sticks and rolling them in melted brimstone, to smoke him out of the house. A person was appointed to climb to the top of the house, light these matches, and throw them down the chimney. Just as he had ascended, and was about completing his task, he missed his aim and fell from the roof to the ground, and the mob, becoming excited and alarmed, immediately fled. The worshipers within knew nothing of this disturbance until after the meeting had closed. In 1800 the first church edifice was erected. Bishop Asbury preached in Wilkesbarre Aug. 4, 1811, and stopped with Judge Fell, who received him very kindly. In 1812 he was again in the city. The court was in session, but his arrival had been announced, and he was permitted to preach in the court-house. In 1826, the society having suffered great inconvenience for want of a suitable place of worship, obtained from the county commissioners the use of a hall in the upper part of the court-house on a lease for ten years, for which they paid the nominal sum of ten cents per year. In 1827 a session of the Annual Conference was held in this place, Bishop George presiding. During the session a sermon was preached on Calvinism that greatly offended the Presbyterians of the city. In 1830 Wilkesbarre became a station, and the church has since continued to prosper. The statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Wilkins, Mrs. Ann, was born in the State of New York in 1806, and was converted at a camp-meeting at Sing Sing, Sept. 8, 1836. Shortly afterwards she offered herself as a teacher for Africa, and sailed from Philadelphia June 15, 1837, with the Rev. J. J. Matthias, who went out as governor of Bassa Cove, and other missionaries. She remained in Africa until 1841, when she returned to recruit her impaired health. In January, 1842, she sailed again in company with other missionaries for Africa, where she remained until the fall of 1853, when her health was so broken that it was with difficulty she reached her native land. Again recuperating, she sailed in 1854 with three young women to initiate them into the duties and habits of missionaries, and returned in 1857, having thus endured the climate of Africa and the self-sacrifice of a missionary for more than eighteen years, and having crossed the Atlantic six times. After her return she accepted a position as an officer in a juvenile asylum, but had only just entered upon her duties when she was seized with congestion of the lungs, and in a few days died in great peace.

She was an earnest, devoted Christian teacher, and was eminent for piety and self-sacrifice.

Willamette University is located at Salem, Oregon. In 1834, Jason and Daniel Lee, the first Methodist missionaries to Oregon, opened the Oregon Mission Manual Labor School, about 10 miles north of Salem. In 1832 a meeting of the settlers was held at the old mission-house, and French Prairie was fixed upon as the site of an Oregon institute. Subsequently it was determined to locate it on Wallace Prairie, about two and one-half miles below Salem, and nearly $4000 were subscribed for this purpose. This institution was to be free for all, without distinction of sex or color, and was to be under the supervision of whatever church would first pledge itself to sustain it. The proposition was accepted by the Methodist mission, and the Oregon Institute thus came under their control. In 1842 the Oregon Mission Manual Labor School had been removed from its former site to Salem, and the "Old Wooden Institute" had been built, at a cost of $10,000. This building was sold by Mr. Gary, the missionary superintendent, to the trustees of the Oregon Institute for $4000; the school was transferred to this building, and it was thus occupied for a quarter of a century. Its first session opened Aug. 16, 1844, Mrs. C. A. Wilson being the first teacher, and 20 pupils being in attendance. In 1849 the Oregon and California Conference was formed, and held its first session in this building, and the Conference assumed the patronage of the school. In 1853 it was incorporated as Willamette University. Since that time it has been under the control of a superintendent and faculty. In 1850, Rev. F. S. Hoyt was chosen president, and held the position for ten years. In 1860, Rev. T. M. Gatch was elected as his successor, and served until 1865. He was followed by Rev. J. H. Wythe, who served two years. In 1867-68, Rev. L. T. Woodward was acting president. In 1868, Rev. Nelson Rounds was elected, and served two years. In 1870, Mr. Gatch was re-elected president, and has since served in that capacity. The present estimated value of the property is about $75,000. The building purchased from the mission was destroyed by fire in 1871. In 1864 the work of erecting a new building was commenced, and the cornerstone was laid, July 24 of that year. This building, first erected in 1867, is of brick, and is built in the form of a Greek cross. It is five stories high, including the capitol and basement, and is 84 feet long, 44 feet wide, and 100 feet from the basement to the top of the dome. The chapel would comfortably seat 600 persons. In 1807 steps were taken to organize departments of law and theology, a faculty secured, but nothing further was done. A medical department was organized in 1866, and has been in successful operation. This was opened with 20 students, and has since graduated 71. The institution has a library of several hundred volumes, a small philosophical apparatus, and a cabinet of natural history. Including the class of 1877, 144 literary graduates have received the honors of the institution, and the average attendance has been nearly 300. The location of the university is very beautiful; the campus consists of about 30 acres, and is adorned by shade-trees, and enlivened by two streams of running water, is near the State capitol building and

Willard, Miss Frances E., is a native of Rochester, N. Y., but her youth was spent principally in Wisconsin and Illinois. She was educated in what is now known as the Women's Department of the Northwestern University, at Evanston, Ill. After graduation she taught in Pittsburgh Female College, and was also preceptress of Genesee Wesleyan Seminary, and was subsequently called to a professorship in the Woman's College. Losing a beloved sister at the age of nineteen, she published a biography entitled "Nineteen Beautiful Years."

work, she resigned both positions and engaged in the crusade movement. She has been president of the Woman's Union in Chicago, and has lectured extensively, besides writing for various magazines. She has also labored in connection with Moody's great tabernacle meetings.

Willey, Hon. Waitman T., of Western Virginia, was educated in Madison College, Pennsylvania, and entered upon the practice of law in Western Virginia. He has resided for many years in Morgantown; has been a member of the legislature, and was elected United States Senator from West Virginia in 1863. He was an earnest friend of the Union, and did much to shape the public mind of his State. From early life he has been a member of the M. E. Church, and has filled various official positions, devoting himself to its interests. He was elected a lay delegate from the Western Virginia Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Williams, Charles Henry, was born Dec. 28, 1819, in Pulaski Co., Ky. He was converted and joined the M. P. Church at a camp-meeting in Indiana in 1839. He was licensed to preach in 1841, and in 1843 entered the regular work of the ministry. He served some of the most important circuits and stations in his Conference until 1847, when he took a transfer to the Ohio Conference. In 1853 he went into business in Springfield, where he was afterwards made a member and president of the school board. He was in business in Indianapolis, Springfield, and Cincinnati for about ten years. During this time he served as pastor to several circuits. He was earnestly engaged most of this time in the Bible cause and in supplying vacant charges. He was chaplain in the 138th Regiment Ohio National Guards from May to September, 1864, and served in the Army of the Potomac in Virginia. He went to Illinois in 1868, and after serving three years as pastor he was elected corresponding secretary of the Board of Missions, which position he still (1877) holds.

Williams, Emperor, a minister in the Louisiana Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1826, in Nashville, Tenn. He went to New Orleans in slavery in 1835, and remained in slavery until 1859. He was converted in 1845, and was a local preacher from 1855 until 1865, when he united with the Mississippi Mission Conference, which at that time included Louisiana. For seven years he has been a presiding elder in his Conference, and, although possessing only a common-school education, is a man of good administrative and preaching abilities. He was appointed fraternal delegate from the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church to the General Conference of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church of America to meet in 1878.

Williams, Geo. W., is a Methodist layman, head of the mercantile and banking house of Geo. W. Williams & Co., of Charleston, S. C. The history of the house is a record of spotless probity, indomitable energy, remarkable tact, and success as unvarying as it has been brilliant. Mr. Williams was born in 1820, of Methodist parents, was trained up in the fear of God, and from small beginnings has won distinction, wide influence, and large fortune.

Williams, H. W., D.D., of the British Wesleyan Conference, entered the ministry in 1832, and has traveled with great success in some of the best circuits in Methodism; he has written largely for the periodicals, and published valuable "Expositions" on the "Epistles to the Romans" and "the Hebrews." Dr. Williams became secretary to the Conference in 1875, and is a most important and influential member of the connectional committees. He is still actively engaged in circuit work.

GEORGE W. WILLIAMS, ESQ.

Williams, James R., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born Nov. 11, 1780, and received a liberal education. He was converted when about twenty years of age, and united with the M. E. Church. He was licensed to preach, and was one of those who were expelled in Baltimore for participating in the Reform movement in 1827. He was a member of the Reform conventions of 1827-28. He was prominent in framing the constitution of the Methodist Protestant Church, and was intimately associated with its publishing interests. In 1843 he published a "History of the Methodist Protestant Church." He was a clear and forcible preacher. He died peacefully in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

Williams, John A., of the Methodist Church of Canada, was born in Wales, Great Britain, but removed to Upper Canada when a youth, and was converted near Prescott in 1835. After spending some years in business he entered the itinerant ministry in 1846, having been for ten years previously a local preacher. He has occupied the best stations in the Conference, and has filled every office in the church excepting president of the General Conference. For a number of years he was chairman of the district; once secretary of the old Canada Conference, two years president of the London Annual Conference, and is now stationed at St. Thomas, Ontario.

Williams, Robert, was one of the earliest and most active preachers in America. Previous to his leaving England he had obtained permission from Mr. Wesley to preach under the direction of the business man, and on coming to America found the need of religious books, and at once began to publish some of Mr. Wesley's sermons, which he circulated extensively, and they were the means of accomplishing much good. In 1773, at the first Conference, a resolution was passed that "no one should publish Mr. Wesley's books without his approbation, but that Robert Williams should be permitted to sell what he had published." Jesse Lee tells us that "the public resolution was to secure to the ministers as a body an interest in religious publications, and not to encourage a matter of individual gain." It has been said of him, that "he was the first traveling preacher in America that married, located, and died."

Williams, Wm., of the Methodist Church of Canada, was born at Stonehouse, Devonshire, England, Jan. 23, 1836. His parents were members of the Methodist Church. Mr. Williams removed to Canada in 1842. He was converted in April, 1854. In October of the same year he was employed as a supply, and in the following year he was received by the Conference of the Methodist New Connection Church. In 1864 he was appointed chairman of a district, and has frequently filled that office since. In 1867 he was elected secretary of the Conference, and in 1872 was placed in the presidential chair. Upon the lamented death of his successor, S. B. Gundy, it became his duty to act as president of Conference during the rest of the connectional year. Mr. Williams was, with Robert Wilkes, M.P., appointed by the Conference of 1873, and was reappointed in 1874, on a deputation to attend the Conference of the Methodist New Connection in England to lay before that body the action of the Canadian Conference on the subject of Methodist union, and secure its acquiescence in the contemplated arrangement. The mission was successful.

Williamsport, Pa. (pop. 16,030), the capital of Lycoming County, is situated on the west branch of the Susquehanna River. The birthplace of Methodism in this city was the cabin of Amariah Sutton, the first society in Lycoming County having been organized there in the autumn of 1791. At a little later period a frame house of worship was erected for the use of the society at the upper end of Fourth Street. In 1826 a small one-story brick building on Pine Street succeeded the "Old Frame;" and, in 1844, this gave place to the present structure, known as the Pine Street M. E. church. In 1868 this church was enlarged to its present size. In 1861 the Mulberry Street congregation was organized, and the basement of a new edifice opened in the beginning of 1863. The church was dedicated by Bishop Simpson, Feb. 18, 1864. It has since been subject to severe disasters. In 1866 a mission-school was organ-regular ministers. Sailing after the appointment of Boardman and Pilmoor, he reached New York in advance of them, where he labored efficiently for more than a month, as the records of that society show. Under date of Nov. 1, 1769, Mr. Pilmoor, then in Philadelphia, writes: "Robert Williams called on his way from New York to Maryland. He came over about business, and being a local preacher in England, Mr. Wesley gave him a license to preach occasionally under the direction of the regular preachers." On the 6th of that month he notices his departure for Maryland, adding, "He is very sincere and zealous." The following June, when Mr. Pilmoor was in New York, he says, "Williams, lately come up from Maryland, gave us a useful sermon, and brought us good news from the country." He spent the greater part of his time in Maryland, where he was instrumental in commencing a great work. In 1772 he passed south into Virginia, where his labors were greatly blessed. Early in 1775 he married and located, and Sept. 26, 1775, he died. Bishop Asbury says of him: "He has been a very useful, laborious man, and the Lord gave him many souls to his ministry; perhaps no man in America has ministered to awakening so many souls as God has awakened by him." He had been an active

The trustees becoming embarrassed, the property was purchased by four friends of the seminary, and offered to the M. E. Church at the price paid for it at the public sale. The Baltimore Conference accepted the offer, and a stock company was formed, and the institution was continued under the control of the M. E. Church. apart for school purposes, and a brick edifice was erected, in 1812, called Williamsport Academy. In 1839 this property was sold, a lot was purchased and a building erected, which, enlarged in 1867, is the west wing of Williamsport Dickinson Seminary. The enterprise not being successful, in 1848 the town council conveyed the building with its grounds and appurtenances to a board of trustees of the "Dickinson Seminary at Williamsport, Pa." The Baltimore Conference extended its patronage to the institution, but declined to assume any financial responsibilities. In April, 1848, Rev. Thomas Bowman, since bishop, was elected president of the seminary. The building was then 40 by 60 feet in size, two stories high, sadly out of repair, with a considerable debt and no resources. The trustees, however, resolved to repair the building and to enlarge the seminary. Five acres of land adjoining the academy lot were purchased, and on July 3, 1850, the corner-stone of the east wing of the seminary building was laid with appropriate ceremonies, and it was finished the ensuing spring at a cost of $10,000. Four years later the wings were connected by a building six stories high, thus completing a fine edifice furnished with modern im-

William Lee Spotswood was elected in his place. He resigned in 1874, and was succeeded by the present president, Rev. Edward J. Grey. While under the control of the M. E. Church it is broad and liberal in its character, and has pupils on its rolls from many different churches. The course of study is arranged to afford thorough instruction to young men who are preparing for business life or professional pursuits, and for young ladies who aspire to superior intellectual culture. In 1866 the title was changed to "Williamsport Dickinson Seminary," and the board of trustees was authorized to confer degrees.

Willing, Mrs. Jennie Fowler, is the wife of Rev. W. C. Willing, of the Rock River Conference, and the sister of Dr. Fowler, editor of The Advocate. Having enjoyed superior advantages of education, she has written considerably for the press. She has also taken a very active part in the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, and is secretary of the Northwestern branch. She has visited at different times various Conferences, and delivered addresses in behalf of the Ladies' and Pastors' Christian Union, and in behalf of the missionary cause. She has also been active in the great temperance movement, and was president of the first women's convention, which was held in Chicago. She is also earnest and useful in conducting religious meetings.

Wills, Will H., D.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Tarboro', Edgecombe Co., N. C., Aug. 4, 1809; was converted in 1830; was licensed to preach in 1831, and began his itinerant career in the same year on Roanoke circuit.

Wilmer, Mrs., the wife of Lambert Wilmer, and one of the earliest and most active Methodists. She was the second female class-leader in Philadelphia, having been appointed about 1775. Mr. Asbury made Mr. Wilmer's house his home, and, in 1772, writes, "I was heavily afflicted, and dear sister Wilmer took great charge of me." She died in holy triumph in 1796.

He remained in the active work four years, then retired; re-entered the Conference in 1844, and has continued a member to the present. He has been chosen a member of seven General Conferences and of three General Conventions, and was present at all save one. He has been several times secretary and vice-president of the General Conference. He has been secretary of the North Carolina Annual Conference for a series of years, and president of the same at different times. He was a delegate to the General Conference, May 11, 1877.

Wilmer, Lambert, a native of Maryland, but a resident in Philadelphia, was an officer in the militia during the Revolutionary War, and was in the battles of Germantown, Trenton, and Princeton. He was among the earliest members in Philadelphia, was an intimate friend of Mr. Hood, and was associated with him in the purchase of "Whitefield's Academy," to form the Union church: as also in originating the "Charter Fund." So deeply attached were Messrs. Hood and Wilmer that they towards the erection of this institution grew out of an essay by Rev. C. W. Buoy, at the Peninsula Convention, held in Smyrna, Del., in 1870. The following Conference appointed a commission to consider the suggestion, and, if it was deemed advisable, to secure a location. This commission selected Dover, and so reported to the Conference held in 1872. A board of trustees was elected, and at the subsequent legislature a charter was granted for the institution, and in August, 1873, the erection of the building commenced. It was a brick structure in the form of a cross, four stories high, the entire front 89 feet, and the depth 94 feet, which was surmounted by a cupola 36 feet high. Shortly after its opening, on March 10, 1876, the building caught fire from some unknown cause and was destroyed. It had cost a little more than $50,000, and was at the time of the fire about $32,000 in debt, with an uncollected subscription supposed to be worth about $10,000. It was also insured for $30,000. With these resources the Conference resolved to rebuild on the same ground and nearly in the same manner. On the furnishing of the building, it is estimated the debt will be about $23,050. In July, 1873, the trustees elected James M. Williams, A.M., a member of the Wilmington Conference, as the first principal, and he is still (1877) in charge. Before the building was completed the school was conducted in a rented building, and since the destruction by fire it has been carried on in another place. During the time occupied in the building the students averaged about 90 per year, and just after the fire a class of 18 was graduated. Its charter is liberal. It educates both young men and young women, but owing to the limited accommodations receives only boys and young men as boarders.

Wilmington Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1868, and includes "the State of Delaware and the Eastern Shore of Maryland and Virginia." Previous to its organization the territory was included in the Philadelphia Conference. It held its first session at Wilmington, March 17, 1869, Bishop Simpson presiding, and reported 107 traveling and 132 local preachers, 23,042 members, 21,620 Sunday-school scholars, 299 churches, valued at $910,150, and 42 parsonages, valued at $116,000. These boundaries still remain unchanged. In 1876 it reported 132 traveling and 147 local preachers, 28,731 members, 24,558 Sunday-school scholars, 310 churches, valued at $1,206,350, and 52 parsonages, valued at $130,700.

Wilmington, Del. (pop. 30,841), is the largest city of the State, and noted for its manufactures. In 1767, Captain Webb preached in Wilmington, under some trees, on the corner of what were King and Kent Streets, and the singing was led by John Threwel, who offered his school-house as a preaching-place. Services were subsequently held in this building, which stood on the site of the printing-office of the Delaware Republican, and also occasionally in the workshop of Mr. George Wetsell, a building on Water Street, below Main, afterwards used as a custom-house. Meetings were also held occasionally in the market-houses. A society was soon formed consisting of some 14 members, and connected with Chester circuit. At an early date Bishop Asbury, Dr. Coke, Whatecoat, and other distinguished ministers occasionally visited the place. In 1789 a lot was purchased near the southeast corner of Walnut and Third Streets, and a house of worship was erected fronting Walnut: its dimensions being about 35 feet square, with a gallery. It was dedicated Oct. 16, 1789, by Bishop Asbury, who wrote, "Thus far have we come after twenty years' labor." At this time the society consisted of 43 white and 19 colored members. This house was enlarged in 1811 by an addition of 20 feet, and in 1828 there was another addition, so that the building became 50 feet by 70, and is known as Asbury church. The plot of ground on Walnut and Third Streets, besides furnishing situations for the church, school-house, and sexton, also furnished a place for a small cemetery, and in it the remains of many of the original members of the church rest. Wilmington became a station in 1789, with J. Jessop as pastor, but in 1795, for some cause it reverted again to the circuit, and was occasionally a station and in the circuit until 1806, when under Joshua Wells it became a permanent station. The growth of the church at first was slow, as it did not number 100 members until thirty-four years from the origin of the society. In the year 1818 it numbered 200. In 1805 the colored people secured a lot and built a house for separate worship about 35 feet square. In 1844 steps were taken under John Kenneday to establish another charge. A lot was secured on Market Street, above Seventh, and a building erected, which was dedicated Feb. 23, 1845, and is known as St. Paul's church. In 1847, Edward Kennard, a supernumerary minister, began preaching in a former M. P. church; organized a small society, and in 1849 a charge was formed called Union mission: a lot was procured, and in 1850 a church was dedicated, which remained until 1866, when a more eligible site was purchased and the present Union church was erected under J. D. Curtis. In 1852 a few members from Asbury and Union organized a Sabbath-school, and held services in a public school-house until a building was erected, 45 by 40 feet, and dedicated Dec. 28, 1852. This building was enlarged in 1855, and again in 1868. In 1872 it was raised and remodeled, and is now called Scott church. In 1853 a class was organized in Brandywine Village, now within the city, and until 1857 was under the pastoral care of the Union church. In 1858 the building was dedicated, and is 40 by 60 feet. In 1865 some of the members of St. Paul's church, convinced of the necessity of a better church, selected a lot on the northwest corner of Ninth and West Streets, upon which a beautiful chapel was erected, and under W. J. Stevenson the edifice called Grace church was erected, at a cost of over $200,000, and is one of the most beautiful churches in the country. In the fall of 1868 the Sunday-School Union of Grace church erected Epworth chapel, on the corner of Tenth and Church Streets, which was dedicated in February, 1869. In 1872 a few members of the same church erected a chapel for mission work in South Wilmington, on the south side of Third Street, known as Madeley chapel. Their statistics are reported with Grace church. In 1875 the members of St. Paul's church started Kingswood mission, on the east of Eleventh Street bridge, in East Wilmington. There is also a church belonging to the Wilmington Female College is located in Wilmington, Del. It was founded as the Wesleyan Female Seminary, by the enterprise of Rev. S. Prettyman, in 1837; and in 1838 it received the indorsement of the Philadelphia Annual Conference. In 1841 it was incorporated as a collegiate institute, and has been approved by the Philadelphia, Wilmington, New Jersey, and Baltimore Conferences. In 1850, Rev. George Loomis was elected president, and an additional building was erected on Sixth Street. It has a college hall 64 feet in length, 45 feet in breadth, and 15 feet in height, with recitation-rooms and dormitories for nearly 100 young ladies. In 1855 a new charter was granted, changing its name to Wesleyan Female College. In 1857, L. C. Loomis was chosen president, and served for two years. In 1858, Rev. John Wilson, A.M., was elected president, and has continued to fill that position. Bishop Scott has been president of the board of trustees since 1855. Among its graduates have been a number of distinguished ladies, several of whom have done successful work in the missionary field. Its number of graduates from 1855 to 1873 was 157.

Wilmington, N. C. (pop. 13,446), the capital of Hanover County, is situated on the Cape Fear River, and on the Wilmington and Weldon and other railroads. It is the largest city in the State. Methodism was introduced into the place at an early period. The name of Wilmington first appears on the minutes in 1784, when Beverly Allen and James Hinton were appointed to the circuit, and a return was made of 80 members. The name does not occur after 1785 till 1800, when 48 white and 231 colored members are returned from Wilmington, N. C. It is registered in the Newbern district in 1801, and in the Virginia Conference in 1802, and in 1804 it appears transferred to the South Carolina Conference. It reported 670 members in 1810, 914 in 1820, 958 in 1830, 794 in 1840. It is in the North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church South, and is the seat of a mission and a small church of the North Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church. It reports, according to the latest statistics:

Wilmot, Lemuel Allan, D.C.L., ex-lieutenant-governor of the province of New Brunswick, was born at Sunbury, N. B., in January, 1809, and was called to the bar in 1832. During an eventful life he has discharged a multitude of civil, political, and military functions, among which were those of a commander of troops in 1838-39, 1842, and 1860 (escort to the Prince of Wales); member of the Executive Council, 1843 to 1845; attorney-general and leader of the government, 1848 to 1861; judge of the supreme court. He was appointed lieutenant-governor of New Brunswick in July, 1848. He was a delegate to England on the subject of crown revenues and civil list in 1836 and 1837; was a delegate to Washington on the subject of reciprocal trade in 1850, and to the railway convention at Portland, Me., in the same year, when the European and North American railway was agreed upon. He participated in meetings of the Canada and other colonial governments on colonial questions. He prepared the several acts of the legislature of New Brunswick on collegiate reform, consolidated the criminal laws in 1849, and the laws relating to counties, townships, and parishes in 1850. He was a member of the council of the college of New Brunswick, and of the senate of the university, is ex officio a visitor of the institution, and is judge-advocate-general. He was converted at an early age, under the ministry of the Rev. Enoch Wood, and identified himself with the Wesleyan cause in Fredericton, where he has been leader, steward, trustee, and Sunday-school superintendent. He was a lay member of the first General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada.

Wilson, David, M.D., of the Methodist Protestant Church, was born in Martinsburg, Bedford (now Blair) County, Pa., in March, 1825. He lived with an uncle in Logansport and Salem, Ind., and attended the academies at those places. He was converted in August, 1842, and joined the Maryland Conference in 1845. He served important appointments in Maryland, Virginia, Philadelphia, Washington City, and New Jersey, and was president of the Maryland Annual Conference from 1874 to 1877. He was elected alternate representative to the General Conference of 1870, a representative in 1874, and a representative to the General Convention of 1877. He was graduated in medicine from Washington University, Baltimore, March, 1868. He published "Sacred Fountains," 1853. He served on the editorial committee of the Methodist Protestant from September, 1860, to March, 1862.

Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872; was born in Winsted, Conn., Dec. 19, 1812, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1838. He established the first missionary-school in Buenos Ayres, and labored there till 1841, when he returned to the United States, and became principal of the Jonesville Academy, Saratoga Co., N. Y. After continuing at this place twenty years, he removed to Brattleborough, Vt., where he held for three years the office of superintendent of public instruction. He removed, in 1863, to Saratoga Springs, N. Y., and engaged in mercantile business. He has served as president of the board of education of Saratoga, and has actively interested himself in the formation of the school system of the town. He also helped liberally and with effect in the building of the present Methodist church edifice in this important village.

Wilson, John, A.M., was born in the neighborhood of Carlisle, Pa., in 1823. He graduated at Dickinson College in the class of '48. His whole active life has been devoted to the cause of education. Immediately after graduation he became a tutor in Dickinson College, and remained such for three years, when he was made principal of the Wesleyan Female Institute, at Staunton, Va. In 1858 he was elected to his present position as president of the Wesleyan Female College, Wilmington, Del. Early in life he united with the M. E. Church, and was for several years a member of the Philadelphia Conference, and now sustains a located relation.

Winans, William, D.D., of the Mississippi Conference, M. E. Church South, was born in Pennsylvania, Nov. 3, 1788. He was received into the Western Conference in 1808, and volunteered to go to the southwest section of country and perform pioneer work in the distant and sparsely-settled sections of Mississippi and Louisiana. He was a man of unusual mental power, united with great energy of character; and he became eminent both in the pulpit and in public movements. He was a member of the several General Conferences of the M. E. Church from 1824 to 1844, in the latter of which he took part in the debates which led to the organization of the M. E. Church South. He was also a member of the Louisville Convention, which organized that church, and continued to be a leading minister in its public bodies. He was singularly plain in his attire, a diligent student, and a good writer. He published a volume of sermons, and died in Mississippi, Aug. 31, 1857.

Winchell, Alexander, LL.D., a teacher and author of scientific works, was born at North-East, Dutchess Co., N. Y., Dec. 31, 1824. He was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1847, and became, in the same year, teacher of Natural Sciences in Pennington Seminary, N. J., and in the following year teacher of the same department in Amenia Seminary. He was appointed, in 1851, principal of Mesopotamia Female Seminary, Eutaw, Ala., and in 1853 president of Masonic University, Selma, Ala. In 1853 he was elected Professor of Physics and Civil Engineering in the University of Michigan, and in 1855 was assigned the chair of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in the same institution. In 1866 he was elected Professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany in Kentucky University, and performed the duties of that position while he still retained the same chair in the University of Michigan. In 1873 he was elected chancellor of the Syracuse University. He resigned this office in 1874, in order to devote himself more exclusively to scientific investigation. He visited Europe on a scientific mission, and on his return entered upon the position of Professor of Geology and Zoology in Syracuse University. He was upon the organization of Vanderbilt University elected non-resident lecturer in the same branches for that institution.

Professor Winchell has performed extensive scientific labors outside of his regular professional duties, and is the author of numerous scientific works, which have gained a high repute. In 1849 he published in the "Report" of the Regents of the University of New York a "Catalogue of the Plants growing in the Vicinity of Amenia Seminary." In 1855 he was engineer of the route of the railroad from Ann Arbor to Jonesville, Mich. In 1859 he was president of the Michigan State Teachers' Association, and editor of the Michigan Journal of Education. From 1859 to 1862 he served as State geologist and naturalist for Michigan, while he still retained his professorship in the university, and in this capacity submitted his first "Biennial Report of the Progress of the Survey" in 1860. The survey was interrupted by the Civil War in 1862, but Professor Winchell published the "Geological Map of Michigan" in 1865, and made a survey and report on the Grand Traverse region of Michigan in 1866. He was appointed director of the geological survey of the State in 1869, and given three assistants, in which capacity he published another "Report of the Progress of the Survey" in 1870. He made an official geological survey of certain salt lands in Minnesota in 1872, and was chosen president of the American Association for the Advancement of Science in the same year.

The greater part of Dr. Winchell's later literary works have been relative to his scientific labors, or have grown out of them. He published "Sketches of Creation," a book presenting in a shape to attract popular readers the geological view of the formation of the earth; "Winchell's Geological Chart," and a "Key" to the same, in 1870; the "Geology of the Stars" and "Topographical Data for Michigan," in 1872; the "Doctrine of Evolution," in 1874; "Lay Theology," in 1876; and the "Reconciliation of Science and Religion," in 1877. He also prepared and published the "Genealogy of the Winchell Family," in 1869, and served as poet at the twenty-fifth anniversary of the graduation of his college class, in 1872. He has lectured extensively, and has contributed to numerous periodicals, chiefly on geological subjects. He has established by his investigations the "Marshall Group" in American geology; has described seven new genera, and three hundred and four new species, mostly fossil, and has had his name assigned to eight new species by as many naturalists. He is a corresponding member of the Geological Society of France, of the Geological Society of Glasgow, Scotland, of the American Philosophical Society, Philadelphia, of the Boston Society of Natural History, of the Congrès Internationale d'Anthropologie et d'Archéologie Préhistorique, Paris, of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, of the Naturwissenschaftliche Gesellschaft Isis, Dresden, of the Edinburgh Geological Society, of the Essex Institute, Salem, Mass., and of many other learned societies.

Winchester, Va. (pop. 4477), is the capital of Frederick County, on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. It was founded in 1752, and is a place of considerable historical interest in connection with the French and Indian wars. It was one of the early points in which Methodism was established in Virginia. In 1778 the lower valley of Virginia first appears upon the minutes under the name of Berkeley, to which Edward Bailey was appointed. The first M. E. church in Winchester was erected about 1794. In 1818 the trustees sold the church and lot and bought the lot on which Fairfax Hall now stands, and erected upon it the second church, which was occupied, though in an unfinished condition, as early as 1820. In 1852 the property was sold, and on Sept. 12, 1853, the corner-stone of the present M. E. church was laid. The Colored M. E. Church has a house of worship erected more than twenty years ago, with money said to have been bequeathed for that purpose by a colored man of Winchester, named George Smith. The M. E. Church South has a commodious brick house, which was erected in 1858. It is in the Baltimore Conference. The statistics are:

Winona, Minn. (pop. 7192), is the capital of Winona County. Methodist services were introduced into this place in 1855. The first church edifice was built in 1856. The building was sold, and a new church was built in its place in 1872. The German M. E. church was built in 1860.

Olive Branch chapel was bought in 1874, and is now used by the second church. Winona is in the Minnesota Conference. The statistics for 1877 are:

Wisconsin, State of (pop. 1,054,670).—The Territory of Wisconsin was formed from a part of the Michigan Territory in 1836, and was admitted as a State in 1848, it being the fifth and last State formed out of the Northwest Territory, whose organization was provided for by the famous ordinance of 1787. A public-school system is in general operation, and many institutions for the higher education have been established. The earliest notice of the introduction of Methodism into the Territory is in connection with an emigration of civilized Indians from New York, who located at Green Bay. In 1832 the Rev. John Clark was appointed by the Missionary Board missionary to Green Bay. He reached his destination in the same year, and entered upon his work. In a letter to the board he described the white settlement as situated on the left bank of the Fox River for about five miles from the head of the bay, and the population as consisting of 1000 persons, most of whom were French Canadians, but mixed with Menominee Indians, over whom they had great influence. The Indian settlement, for which the mission was chiefly established, was about twenty-five miles from this place, and also on the left bank of Fox River. A native preacher, Daniel Adams, was employed to address the tribe in their own language, and was followed by several of the band, who expressed their joy at the arrival of missionaries. A school was resolved upon, and an Indian woman—the tribe (Oneidas) having already enjoyed the advantages of Christian instruction in New York—was engaged to take charge of it. Daniel Adams continued to labor as missionary, while Mr. Clark preached at this place and Green Bay on alternate Sundays. On the 15th of September, 1832, a house for a school and for worship was completed, and a class was formed of 25 Indian members. The house was dedicated on the next day, being Sunday, and the first two baptisms were administered. The church was an humble structure of only 24 by 30 feet, built of logs. On the day after the dedication a school was organized for men, women, and children, and was opened with 30 Indian children. A Sunday-school was also regularly taught. Mr. Clark visited the East to secure additional help, and returned in the spring of 1833 with his family and four converted Indians to assist him in the missionary work. A missionary station was established at Green Bay in 1833, under the supervision of Miss Quinney, who became the wife of Daniel Adams. It was not long until another mission was established at Fort Breed, or Sault Ste. Marie. In 1834, D. M. Chandler and Hamilton Bourne, from the Troy Conference, came as assistant missionaries to this field. In 1835 the Milwaukee and Fox River missions appear among the appointments of the Illinois Conference. In 1836 Milwaukee mission reported 53, Fox River mission 119, and Green Bay mission 34 members. Other points were occupied. At the Illinois Conference of 1839 Milwaukee district was organized, and reported 344 white members, 1 colored, and 50 Indians. In 1840 Milwaukee district was connected with the Rock River Conference. The Wisconsin Conference was organized as a separate Conference by the General Conference of 1848. The State now embraces two Conferences, and has within its territory the Lawrence University.

Wisconsin Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1848, and included nearly the entire State of Wisconsin. In 1856 the State was divided into two Conferences, the Wisconsin and the West Wisconsin. The Wisconsin Conference included the eastern part of the State. The boundaries, as defined by the General Conference of 1876, are as follows: "Including all that part of the State of Wisconsin lying east and north of a line beginning at the southeast corner of Green County, on the south line of the State; thence north on the range line, between ranges nine and ten east, to the north line of town twenty; thence west on the said line to the east line of range one east; thence north on said line to the north line of town forty; thence west on said line to the State line on the west."

The Conference held its first session July 12, 1848, and reported 6613 white, 11 colored, and 172 Indian members, with 67 traveling and 147 local preachers. The division, in 1856, left within the bounds of the Wisconsin Conference 128 traveling and 155 local preachers, and 7879 members. The report from this Conference in 1876 gives 204 traveling and 120 local preachers, 15,089 members, 15,712

Sunday-school scholars, 204 churches, valued at $886,700, 105 parsonages, valued at $123,870.

Wise, Daniel, D.D., author and editor of Sunday-school publications, was born at Portsmouth, England, Jan. 10, 1813; removed to the United States in 1833; joined the New England Conference of the M. E. Church in 1840, and was transferred to the Providence Conference in 1843. He was appointed secretary of the Sunday-School Union of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and editor of the Sunday-school publications in 1856. This position, with that of corresponding secretary of the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, he held till 1872, since which time he has devoted himself to authorship. His connection with the Sunday-School Union made him editor of The Sunday-School Advocate. He was at one time editor of Zion's Herald, and was for five years editor of The Sunday-School Messenger, and subsequently of The Ladies' Pearl, and The Rhode Island Temperance Pledge. His literary works include a large number of moral stories and didactic books for youth, which have found their place in Sunday-school libraries, and some of which have been widely circulated.

Wiseman, Luke H., M.A., of the British Wesleyan Connection. From the time of his entrance into the ministry in 1840, his course was a brilliant one, all too soon terminated. He was appointed secretary of the foreign missions in 1868, and was an ever-ready and eloquent advocate of its claims. He was elected president of the Conference in 1872, and discharged the duties of his office with singular ability. In committee he was an able counselor, in departmental labor a generous and affectionate colleague. A long life of active usefulness was hoped for, but the great Head of the church saw otherwise; scarcely a moment was given him to lay down his responsibilities and work. He was snatched away in a moment, and "entered into the joy of his Lord" in 1875, aged fifty-three.

Withington, John Swann, a minister of the United Methodist Free Churches, England, entered the itinerancy of that body in 1852, and has traveled in eight circuits. He was elected president of the Conference in 1872, and is now editor of The Large Magazine. Mr. Withington is known as an earnest advocate of temperance principles.

Withrow, William Henry, A.M., editor of the Canadian Methodist Magazine, Toronto, Ont., was born in Toronto in 1839. He was educated in the Toronto Academy, Victoria College, and Toronto University, and was graduated in arts from both of the last two institutions. He spent three years in an architect's office. He was converted in his seventeenth year. His first ministry was with the Methodist New Connection, which he entered in his twenty-third year. He joined the Wesleyan Conference in 1866. He served as a professor in the Wesleyan Female College, Hamilton, and was afterwards appointed editor of Sunday-school publications and assistant editor of the Christian Guardian. The former of these departments he manages still. Since 1874 he has been the editor of the magazine published by the Methodist Church of Canada. He has been a contributor, for many years, to several periodicals in the United States. His elaborate work on the "Catacombs of Rome," published in 1874, has had a large sale,—two English editions were issued in six months. He published a "School History of Canada" in 1876, and a large general one in 1877.

Witness of the Spirit, The, is an inward impression on the human soul whereby the Spirit of God directly witnesses to the spirit of man that he is a child of God. It is accompanied by a clear perception that Jesus hath loved him and given himself for him, and that his sins are forgiven. This testimony is, in different individuals, more or less distinct. In some cases it is scarcely distinguishable from the personal knowledge of justification arising from the fruits of the Spirit, which are peace and love and joy; in other cases it is as the bright shining of the Spirit itself, attesting divine sonship without a consideration of the fruits which inevitably follow. It is preceded by repentance for sin and the exercise of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and is usually received in the moment of justification. In some cases this direct witness of the Spirit is not given for some time after the peace is received which indicates the justification of the soul. The nature of this testimony is not as to the final salvation of the person receiving it, but to his present sonship or adoption into the family of God. "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God."—Romans viii. 15, 16. This assuring testimony is the privilege and right of every regenerated soul, being vouchsafed unto him by virtue of the atonement that was made for him. It is usually antecedent to the testimony of our own spirit which recognizes the fruits of the Spirit; but it is subsequent to the fact of justification, and is a divine testimony of our reconciliation with God and our acceptance by him. This testimony is sometimes called the direct witness of the Spirit, as distinguished from the indirect, which is sometimes called the fruit of the Spirit. These two kinds of testimony are closely associated in scriptural exposition and in Christian experience. The Divine Spirit and the human spirit both testify to the salvation of the individual.—the one is addressed wholly to our consciousness, the other arises from the consideration of the facts in life. "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."—Romans viii. 14. "For the fruit of the Spirit is in all goodness and righteousness."—Ephesians v. 9. The object of this testimony is to impart to the individual more perfect peace and consciousness of security; to give to him more joyful assurance, which will preserve him from doubt and despair on the one hand, and from deception and presumption on the other; and which will enable him more successfully to discharge Christian duty, and to exercise a commanding influence over others. A doubting Christian is neither happy nor extensively useful. This testimony, in whatever measure given, is no evidence of final salvation. It is merely the assurance of present acceptance or sonship. The individual may, yielding to temptation or failing to exercise faith in Christ, grieve the Holy Spirit and fall into sin. To guard against this the warning is given, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, whereby ye are sealed unto the day of redemption."—Ephesians iv. 30. (See ADOPTION and ASSURANCE.)

Wittenmeyer, Mrs. Annie (née Turner), was born in Ohio, but her early home was Kentucky. In her youth she attended a seminary, and pursued advanced studies. She settled in Iowa, and was a prominent and active member of the church, engaged in its charitable enterprises. In the beginning of the Civil War she was appointed sanitary agent by the legislature of Iowa. After active service in this department, she resigned her position to enter the service of the Christian Commission, where she had the oversight of 200 ladies, and where she developed her plan of special diet kitchens, opening the first at Nashville, Tenn., where food was prepared for 1800 sick and wounded soldiers. In this work she had the assistance of the surgeon-general, and, as in her other work, the approbation of both General Grant and the Secretary of War. At the close of the war she established a home for soldiers' orphans in Iowa, and obtained for its use, by application to Secretary Stanton, the beautiful barracks at Davenport, with hospital supplies, and the gift was approved by Congress. The institution has accommodated 500 children, and is still in a flourishing condition. Desiring to work more actively in church enterprises, she removed to Philadelphia, where she labored as secretary of an organization for visiting the poor and giving religious instruction. Out of this was developed the Ladies' and Pastors' Union, which was sanctioned by the General Conference of 1872, and Mrs. Wittenmeyer was elected its corresponding secretary. In 1876 the report showed that 50,000 families had been visited under its auspices. Mrs. Wittenmeyer has established in Philadelphia The Christian Woman, which has had an extensive circulation, and subsequently The Chris- tian Child. Of both these papers she is proprietor and editor. She has more recently devoted her time chiefly to the temperance cause, and is president of the Women's National Association. In her church work she has visited many of the Annual Conferences and delivered addresses, and in her temperance work has extensively labored in the lecture field. She was one of a committee to bear to Congress a large petition in behalf of prohibition in 1875 and in 1878. She has written "Woman's Work in the Church" and "History of the Woman's Crusade."

Witting, Victor, superintendent of the Methodist Episcopal missions in Sweden, was born at Mahmö, Sweden, in 1825. He was the son of a captain of artillery in the Swedish army. He came to the United States in 1847, was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1854, and joined the Central Illinois Conference in 1855. In 1861 he started The Sandebudet as a Methodist religious journal for the Scandinavian population of the Northwest. In 1867 he made a visit to Sweden, and was appointed by Bishop Kingsley, who had charge of the missions in that country, missionary to Gottenburg. The next year he was made superintendent of the missions in Sweden.

Wofford College is located at Spartanburg, S. C. The Rev. Benjamin Wofford was born in Spartanburg Co., S. C. At several periods of his life, for a short time, he served as an itinerant or War, when it was conducted as a high school. A goodly proportion of its graduates may be found in the ministry. In addition to the main college building it has five commodious professors' houses. In common with other denominational colleges in the South, it has suffered the loss of its endowment. Its friends are now making earnest efforts to raise an amount sufficient to meet the annual expenses. The course of study includes a classical course and a scientific course. The presidents have been Rev. (now Bishop) W. M. Wightman, D.D., 1854-59; Rev. A. M. Shipp, D.D. (now of Vanderbilt Theological School), 1859-75; Jas. H. Carlisle, LL.D., 1875, who is the present president, and Professor of Mathematics. He is assisted by a faculty of seven professors, filling chairs in the usual branches of collegiate study. But one change occurred in the faculty of this institution during the first twenty-one years of its history.

Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church is entirely under the management of women, and announces its purpose to be, "to engage and unite the efforts of Christian women in sending female missionaries to women in the foreign mission fields of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and in supporting them and native Christian teachers and Bible-readers in those fields." The society owes its origin to the exertions of Mrs. Dr. Butler and Mrs. E. N. Parker, who, during their labors in India as wives of resident missionaries, grew familiar with the needs of the women of the East, and realized that no spiritual help could reach them through the instrumentality of male missionaries. The strict habits of seclusion practiced by the wives, mothers, and daughters of Asia precluded the entrance of any influence from the Christian men whom the church had sent to do its work.

Because of the intense earnestness of the above-named ladies in the salvation of Asiatic women, a meeting was held in Boston, Mass., March, 1869, to acquaint the women of the Methodist Episcopal Church with the work that was waiting for their action, afar off in Eastern lands. There were but twenty ladies present upon this occasion, but their power for good seems not to have been limited by their feeble number. An organization was perfected bearing the name of the "Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church." It consisted of a general executive committee, with branch and auxiliary societies. Eight associated branches of this society have been formed, including in their interests the entire area of the United States, with the exception of Arkansas, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and the Pacific coast; for these districts the constitution provides that eventually two additional branches of the society shall be formed, to hold their centres of direcmissionary, but the greater portion of his life was spent in his native State, in the relation of a local preacher. He died Dec. 9, 1850, leaving "one hundred thousand dollars for the purpose of establishing and endowing a college for literary, classical, and scientific education," to be located in his native county, under the control and management of the South Carolina Conference of the M. E. Church South. The institution went into operation in August, 1854, and has been successfully conducted ever since as a college for young men, with the exception of a short time during the Civil

tion at New Orleans and San Francisco. The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has made its work supplemental to that of the parent board of the church, under whose supervision and with whose approval, and that of the church authorities, its work has been done. This society was the first to introduce woman's medical practice into Asia, and it has proved an effectual power in breaking up pagan prejudices. The society in the sixth year of its existence reports that "it has sent missionaries to all the foreign countries occupied by the missions of the parent board, except Europe and Africa, and at one station in each of these lands is employing native Bible women. In six years twenty-seven young ladies have been sent as missionaries. Twenty-one of them are still working under the auspices of the society with efficiency. Under the direction of this society one dispensary and three hospitals have been built. The first of these hospitals owes its establishment to Miss Swaine, the first medical lady sent out by the society in the first year of its organization. Miss Swaine immediately upon her arrival in Bareilly, India, opened a dispensary, and in two years' time was able to see arrangements perfected for the building of a hospital. In company with one of the resident missionaries and his wife, Miss Swaine called upon the Mohammedan king and explained to him the need of his suffering subjects for medical treatment; he was glad to aid the enterprise, and presented the ground needed for the institution,—that which money had not been able to buy. So admirably planned and directed was Miss Swaine's hospital, that the government authorities, at a later date, used the building as a model for the erection of a government hospital. "Besides these institutions the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has under its management the orphanage in Bareilly, India, girls' boarding-school in Foo Chow, China, both received from the parent board; two orphanages, one in Paori, one in the city of Mexico; and five buildings for homes and 'boarding-schools' have been erected in the different stations occupied." The sixth annual report of the society states, "We have supported the work among women in foreign lands, carried on by the wives of missionaries, besides employing 126 native Bible women and teachers, and sustaining about 120 day-schools. In these six years $336,862.79 have been collected, through the efforts of the women of the Methodist Episcopal Church, without the aid of church or Sunday-school collections." The society issues a twenty-four-page monthly newspaper, The Heathen Woman's Friend, filled with intelligence from all quarters of the globe, which has been successful in creating interest in the society and in its work. It is published in Boston, edited by Mrs. Wm. F. Warren. The eight branches of the Woman's Women's Crusade, The.—This remarkable movement is not directly connected with Methodism nor confined to it, yet in it Methodist women have been very conspicuous. It commenced in Hillsborough, O., Christmas morning, 1873. After a lecture by Dr. Dio Lewis on the "Potency of Women's Prayers in the Grog-Shop," the response in favor of such work was very general. A meeting for prayer and organization was held. After prayer had been offered by Mrs. General McDowell, Mrs. Cowden, the wife of the Methodist minister, sang "Give to the Winds thy Fears," and during the singing the women, led by Mrs. Thompson, a distinguished Methodist lady, the sister of Dr. Trimble, marched forth on their first visit to drug-stores, hotels, and saloons. The movement spread into adjacent towns, the women visiting saloons, singing, praying, and pleading with those engaged in the traffic to desist. In many places the ladies suffered severe privations, were oftentimes kept standing in the cold and rain, and were sometimes the subjects of severe remarks and direct persecution. In Hillsborough an injunction was served upon them, and they were sued for $10,000 damages. Buckets of water were thrown on them, and in some places dancing was kept up in the saloons to interrupt their services. In almost every case, however, they were triumphant. In Cleveland the mob attempted to prevent their work, and the men organized into bands and went forth to protect them. The churches were crowded day and night, and touching incidents of recovery from ruin interested immense audiences. In a few cases the women were arrested and imprisoned. In Cincinnati, under the orders of the mayor, forty-three were arrested for obstructing the sidewalks and lodged in jail, where they began at once to tell the prisoners of the love of Christ. In Pittsburgh several were arrested and imprisoned for praying in the streets. Their work, however, was triumphantly successful. In many towns a large proportion of the saloons were closed, and many of those engaged in the sale abandoned the traffic, while thousands of inebriates were rescued from apparent ruin. Ladies of all Christian denominations joined in this work heartily, but owing to their greater experience in class-meetings and love-feasts the ladies of Methodism were especially conspicuous.

about twelve years of age he embraced religion, and devoted himself to study. At the age of eighteen he was licensed to exhort, and was received on trial by the Ohio Conference in 1822. He has been in the regular ministry fifty-five years, having filled many prominent stations: acted as presiding elder eleven years; was six years agent for Indiana Asbury University, in whose welfare he took a deep interest; was six years agent of the American Bible Society; was three years moral instructor in the Northern Indiana State prison, and was a member of the General Conferences in 1840, 1844, 1864, 1868, and 1876. Two of his sons are missionaries in South America.

Mount Union College, Ohio, in 1863. In March just preceding his graduation he was received into the Pittsburgh Conference. Among his appointments have been Freeport, Sharpsburg, New Brighton, and Oakland church, Pittsburgh. He has served on responsible committees of the Conference, and for a number of years consecutively was on the committee to examine candidates as to their qualifications to enter the itinerant ministry. He is the author of "Methodism and the Centennial of American Independence."

Wood, Enoch, D.D., of the Methodist Church of Canada, was born in Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, England, in January, 1804. Having labored for a time as a local preacher, he was accepted as a candidate for missionary work in 1826. He served three years in the West Indies, at Montserrat and St. Kitts, and was then transferred to New Brunswick, where he remained nineteen years, seventeen of them at Fredericton and St. John, and a part of the time as chairman of the New Brunswick district. In 1847 he was appointed by the British Conference to represent it as superintendent of the missions in Canada, and removed to Toronto, where he has lived ever since. He was appointed president of the Canada Conference in 1851, and for seven consecutive years afterwards. He was again chosen president of the Conference, upon the death of Dr. Stinson, for one year. Upon the consolidation of the Methodist Church of Canada, in 1874, and its division into Annual Conferences, he was made president of the Toronto Annual Conference, and held the position for two years. He has been connected with the mission work during the whole period of his residence in Canada as superintendent and treasurer or senior secretary, and now (1877) occupies the latter position.

Wood, Enoch George, D.D., a member of the Southeast Indiana Conference of the M. E. Church, was born in Ross Co., O., Jan. 26, 1806. He was brought up on a farm until his seventeenth year, and had but few educational advantages. In 1823 he united with the church, and in his twentieth year was appointed a class-leader, and shortly afterwards an exhorter. In 1827 he removed to Indiana, was licensed to preach, and joined the Illinois Conference. In the division of the Illinois Conference he became identified with Indiana, where his entire ministry has been spent. He has been favored through a long life with excellent health. He has filled the most prominent stations in Indiana, and has traveled a number of its districts. He was a delegate to the General Conferences of 1848, 1856, 1860, 1868, and 1872. He has been president of the board of trustees of Moore's Hill College, and has also been a trustee of the Indiana Asbury University. He is at present the senior minister in active labor in the Southeast Indiana Conference.

Wood, Horatio C., M.D., was born in Philadelphia, Pa., Jan. 13, 1841. After pursuing general studies, he graduated in medicine at the University of Pennsylvania in 1862. He shortly after became Professor of Medical Botany and Clinical Professor of Diseases of the Nervous System in that institution. He has written a number of papers on various branches of natural history, which have appeared in the Transactions of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia; also the "Fresh-Water Algae of North America," in the Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge, 1873. He gained the Boylston Prize by his essay on "Thermic Fever, or Sun-Stroke," Philadelphia, 1872, and has published a treatise on "Physiological Therapeutics," 1874, and "A Study of Fever," 1875. He is at present (1878) Professor of Materia Medica and Pharmacy and Clinical Professor of Nervous Diseases in the University of Pennsylvania. He united with the M. E. Church a number of years since, and has taken a deep interest in its various enterprises.

Wood, Joseph Rand, son of Dr. A. Wood, was born March 2, 1848, in Greencastle, Ind. He received an academic education in Wilbraham Seminary, and was graduated from Wesleyan University in 1871, and from the Boston Theological School in 1875. He had been licensed to preach in 1870, and was appointed to churches in Lafayette, Ind., and Brockton, Mass. Having been destined for the missionary work, he sailed for South America, and arrived at Rosario, Argentine Republic, in April, 1876, where he is now (1877) actively engaged in missionary labor.

Wood, Thomas Bond, missionary in South America, was born March 17, 1844, in Lafayette, Ind. He is the son of Dr. Aaron Wood, of Northwest Indiana Conference. He was graduated from Indiana Asbury University in 1863, pursued his studies in Wesleyan University another year, and received a degree from that institution also. He was licensed to preach in 1864, and was admitted into the New England Conference. He was at the same time employed as teacher in the seminary at Wilbraham; subsequently he was engaged as a teacher at Valparaiso, Ind. Having long contemplated entering the missionary work, he sailed for South America in January, 1870, under appointment from the Missionary Board. Landing at Buenos Ayres, he ascended the river to Rosario, a town about 300 miles in the interior, and there commenced his labors. He has been successful in gathering a small congregation and in starting an orphanage, which is under the care of Mrs. Wood; and has been so identified with the cause of education that his counsel and assistance have been of great service to the country in which he is laboring. In 1873 he was appointed acting United States consul at Rosario de Santa Fé.

Wood, William B., of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 27, 1827; was educated in the public school; read medicine and attended two courses of lectures in the University of Pennsylvania, and subsequently a course of lectures at the Philadelphia College of Medicine. He embraced religion and united with the M. E. Church in 1847; became superintendent of a Sabbath-school in 1850; was admitted into the Philadelphia Conference in 1853, and has filled a number of important appointments in Philadelphia and vicinity. From 1873 he was presiding elder of Lehigh district, and was, in 1877, returned for the third time to Cohocksink church. He was elected to the General Conference of 1876.

Woodhouse Grove Academy is an institution near Leeds, England, opened in 1812, for the education of the sons of ministers. The buildings were enlarged in 1847 by the addition of two wings. It is directly under the control of the English Wesleyan Conference, and is managed by a local committee appointed annually. (See KINGSWOOD SCHOOL.)

Woodruff, George W., D.D., secretary of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872 and 1876, was born in New York City in 1824. He was converted in his youth, and was educated at Oberlin College. He joined the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1845, and has spent the most of his ministerial life in the New York East Conference, which was formed from the division of the New York Conference. He was chosen secretary of the New York East Conference at fourteen sessions. He several literary institutions and of the American Antiquarian Society, and has a large library. Bishop Asbury passed through the place in July, 1791, and has left a record of his hospitable reception and courteous treatment at the hands of Mr. Chandler. He found it "a place where the people are united and do not wish to divide the parish." Worcester first appears on the minutes of the Conference in 1834, when G. Pickering was appointed to Worcester mission. In the next year the mission returned 109 members. It is named as an independent charge in 1837, and in the following year reported 278 members. The second charge served from 1868 to 1872 as a member of the book committee of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was assistant secretary of the General Conference in 1868 and in 1872, and in the latter year, on the election of secretary William L. Harris to be bishop was chosen to succeed him as secretary.

Wooster, O. (pop. 5419), is the capital of Wayne County, on the Pittsburgh, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railway. Methodism was introduced into Wooster in 1820; the first church was built in 1823, and rebuilt in 1840. In 1830 the membership numbered 60, and during this year Bishop Thomson and the Revs. Messrs. Thomas Barkdale and Hiram Shafer were converted under the labors of the Rev. H. O. Sheldon. In 1872 a second society was organized, and in 1875 it built a neat brick church. Wooster is in the North Ohio Conference. The statistics are:

Worth, Daniel, a native of Indiana, was for some years a local preacher of the M. E. Church, and at one time a member of the Indiana legislature. He early became a ministerial member of the Wesleyan Connection, and was president of its second General Conference, held at New York City in 1848. Subsequently he labored as a missionary in North Carolina, but was convicted of circulating an anti-slavery work called Helper's "Crisis" ("The Impending Crisis," by H. R. Helper), and was imprisoned for a year, with fifty or more indictments awaiting prosecution, each claiming a year of imprisonment. A kindly-disposed judge construed some technical defect in the commitment so as to grant him a hearing under writ of habeas corpus, and allowed him to give bail of a few thousand dollars, offered by a benevolent slave-holder, who aided him in leaving the State immediately. In less than the six months specified in the bail-bond, Mr. Worth, by public appeals and private aid, secured the amount, remitted it to his slave-holding friend, who forfeited and paid the bond. Mr. Worth died before slavery, which he ardently opposed during his whole life, was destroyed.

Wright, Benjamin S., a delegate from the Central New York Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, was born in St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., about 1813, and joined the Black River Conference in 1844. Upon the division of the Conference, in 1868, he fell into the Central New York Conference. He was a delegate to the General Conference in 1868, and a reserve delegate in 1864.

Wright, Hon. George C., formerly United States Senator from Iowa, was born at Bloomington, Ind., March 24, 1820, and graduated at the Indiana State University in 1839. He pursued the study of law at Rockville, under the direction of his brother, and was one among the early settlers in Iowa, in 1840. Entering political life, he was elected prosecuting attorney in 1847, and was chosen State senator in 1849. In 1854 he was elected chief justice of the supreme court of the State, and was re-elected in 1860 and 1865. He was also one of the professors in the law school connected with the State University from 1865 to 1871, when he was elected United States Senator. In 1877 he declined a re-election. He united in early life with the M. E. Church, and has remained a devoted member, occupying many of its official positions.

Wright, John A., Esq., was born in Philadelphia, Oct. 7, 1820; entered Wilbraham Academy, Mass., in 1833, and Dickinson College in 1834, where he graduated in 1838. He engaged in the profession of a civil engineer, and was connected with railroads in Pennsylvania and Georgia in 1844. He also served as an engineer in Massachusetts in 1846. After that period he engaged in the manufacture of iron on the Juniata until 1848, and still holds a connection with the railroad interests of the State. He was active in the organization of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and was a member of its first board of directors. He united with the M. E. Church in early childhood, and has been deeply interested in all movements and enterprises of the church, having held a number of its official positions, and has been a liberal contributor to the Arch Street M. E. church of Philadelphia.

Wright, John Flavel, D.D., was born in North

Carolina, July 30, 1795. He was converted, and united with the church in 1813, and was admitted on trial in the Virginia Conference in 1815, having traveled the previous year on Yadkin circuit, which was 300 miles around. In 1821 he was transferred to Ohio, and was stationed in Lebanon, and the following year in Cincinnati. After filling a number of the most prominent charges, he was appointed presiding elder on the Lebanon district, and in 1832 was elected one of the book agents at Cincinnati. After keeping that office for twelve years, he has filled various appointments, as presiding elder, pastor, and agent of Wilberforce University. In the Civil War he was appointed chaplain of the 1st Kentucky Regiment, and accompanied the army through Western Virginia, ministering to the sick, wounded, and dying, and thence into Kentucky and Tennessee. After that he was appointed chaplain to the military hospitals in Cincinnati. He was a member of the General Conference from 1832 to 1852. In 1844 he received a very large and complimentary vote for the office of bishop.

Wright, John Reynolds, Esq., son of the above, was born in Cincinnati, O., July 31, 1828. He united with the church when quite young, and was educated partly at Woodward College, Cincinnati, and afterwards at the Wesleyan Ohio University, in Delaware, and graduated in 1848. Commencing business in Cincinnati, he was for some ten years agent for the Wheeler & Wilson sewing-machine. He subsequently became, and is now, a member of the banking-house of Hughes, Wright & Co. He has shown his devotion to the cause of Christian education by contributing $30,000 to endow a chair in the Ohio Wesleyan University, and by also contributing liberally to the Wesleyan Female Seminary in Cincinnati. He has also assisted in the erection of churches on Mount Auburn, Walnut Hills, etc.

Wright, Jonathan J., a leading physician at Emporia, Kansas, was born about 1837. He is a devoted friend of the church, and an active worker. He was lay delegate from the Kansas Conference to the General Conference of 1872.

Wright, Hon. Joseph A., LL.D., ex-governor of Indiana, was born in Pennsylvania, April 17, 1810. Removing West early in life, he graduated at the Indiana University. After studying law he was admitted to the bar in 1829, and practiced for a number of years at Rockville, Ind., where he resided. Entering political life, he was elected a member of the House of Representatives, and subsequently of the Senate of the State of Indiana. He was a member of Congress in 1843-45, and was elected governor of Indiana in 1849, and served for two terms of four years each. He was appointed to represent the United States government as a minister at Berlin, where he served during 1857-61.

On his return he was elected United States Senator from Indiana for 1861-62; and was a second time sent as minister to Prussia in 1865, where he remained until his death at Berlin, May 11, 1867. He united with the M. E. Church in early life, and from time to time held various official positions. He was an early and warm friend of lay delegation, and rendered great service to the missions in Germany by his counsel and aid. His death was not only peaceful, but triumphant.

Wright, Richard, was a Wesleyan minister, who accompanied Bishop Asbury to America. His first winter was spent in Eastern Maryland, where he was exceedingly popular. Afterwards he passed into Western Maryland and Virginia, where, he says, "In the spring of 1774 one Methodist chapel was built, and two or three preachers had commenced their labors." Shortly afterwards Mr. Wright returned to England, and he was recorded in the minutes of 1777 as "desisting from traveling."

Wright, William M., M.D., a lay delegate from the Virginia Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1876, was born in Chambersburg Pa., about 1826; was graduated from the Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, and settled in Pittsburgh. During the Civil War he served as a surgeon in the Department of the Cumberland, and established several of the large United States hospitals on the line of march from Chattanooga to Atlanta. He was afterwards appointed post surgeon at the Soldiers' Home, Hampton Roads, Va.

Written Examinations in the course of study for graduates to the ministry are used in various departments of Methodism. In the United Methodist Free Churches prizes of £5, £3, and £2, respectively, are given to the three who are most successful. In the four years' examinations in the Methodist Episcopal Church the examination of the fourth year's class has been for a number of years by written exercises.

Wunderlich, Ehrhardt, was born in Saxeweimar in 1830; emigrated to the United States in 1849, and was converted the same year at Dayton, O. He returned to Germany in 1850. He testified what God had done for him, and a revival in Saxony was the result. He suffered much persecution, and was thrust into prison for holding prayer-meetings. Three infidels who had circulated revolutionary literature were also confined there, and they said to each other, when Wunderlich came to the prison, "What will become of Saxony yet? We are put to prison because we do not pray, and this fellow is imprisoned because he does pray."

The pressure against him became so strong that he returned to America in 1853. The work in Saxony was carried on by his brother. Mr. Wunderlich is a member of the Central German Conference, and has served as presiding elder on two districts.

Wyandot Mission was the first systematized missionary work undertaken in the Methodist Episcopal Church. Its origin was very singular. A free colored man, named John Steward, who was born in Virginia, was converted and became a member of the M. E. Church. Though having but little education, he felt it his duty to call sinners to repentance, and felt that he should go somewhere towards the Northwest. He resided in Marietta for a time, and then started on his journey. He stopped at Piketown, on the Sandusky River, among a tribe of the Delaware Indians. That evening the Indians engaged in a dance, and Steward thought they were preparing to kill him. When they desisted, however, from their amusement, he took his hymn-book and commenced singing. When he had ceased, one said in English, "Sing more." Finding an interpreter, a Delaware Indian, named Lyons, he delivered to them a discourse. They desired him to remain the next day, but he proceeded still farther northwest, until he reached the house of Mr. Walker, sub-agent of Indian affairs at Upper Sandusky. Walker suspected him to be a runaway slave, but, questioning him very closely, he related his experience and his impressions, and Walker encouraged him in his work. Finding an interpreter, he commenced to address the Indians. He made the appointment for a meeting the following day, when only one old woman attended. The next day he had in addition one old man, and these soon became converts. On Sabbath eight or ten assembled, and soon several were converted. This work commenced in November, 1816. The pagan Indians were induced by traders to treat Steward severely. Many of the Indians had been under the instruction of Roman Catholic missionaries, and were offended by the manner in which Steward denounced the peculiarities of the Romish Church. After laboring among them for some time he went to Marietta, promising to return the next spring. After preaching for more than two years, he obtained a license as a local preacher, and was appointed a missionary to Sandusky in March, 1819. The year before this John P. Finley had been appointed as teacher. In the fall of 1819, Rev. James B. Finley, presiding elder of the district, held a quarterly meeting about 42 miles from Upper Sandusky, at which 60 of the natives, with 4 of their chiefs, attended. A revival broke out, a mission school was established, and the work spread to other tribes. The four Indian chiefs who were remarkable for their conversion and for their usefulness were called Between-the-Logs, Mononeue, Hicks, and Scuteash. Of these, Between-the-Logs and Mononcue were especially eloquent. The tidings of this work thrilled many hearts, and it became one of the strong reasons for the organization of the Missionary Society, which was formed in New York in 1819. A church was built among the Wyandots, the great majority of them came under its influence, and so remained until the tribe was removed from Ohio to Kansas. Since that period the remnant of the tribe has removed still farther south.

Wyoming Conference, M. E. Church, was organized by the General Conference of 1852, but did not at that time include as much territory in the State of New York as is at present embraced in its boundaries. It held its first session at Carbondale, Pa., July 7, 1852, Bishop Scott presiding. It then reported 12,869 members, and 75 traveling and 116 local preachers. In 1872 the boundaries of the Conference were enlarged by an addition from Central New York, and were defined to "include the southern part of the State of New York not included in the New York, New York East, Newark, Central New York, and Western New York Conferences; and that part of Pennsylvania bounded on the west by Central New York Conference, including the territory east of the Susquehanna, and on the south by the Central Pennsylvania and New York Conferences, including Norrisburg, and on the east by the Newark and New York Conferences." It reported, in 1876, 221 traveling and 204 local preachers, 30,746 members, 32,361 Sunday-school scholars, 293 churches, valued at $1,422,525, and 128 parsonages, valued at $258,425.

Wyoming Seminary, The, was established in 1844, at Kingston, Pa., by the Wyoming Conference. It has a beautiful location in the historic Wyoming Valley, just across the Susquehanna River from the city of Wilkesbarre. The first building was a brick structure 3 stories high, 37 by 70 feet, and cost about $5000. The school opened in the fall of 1844 with 2 teachers and 50 students. From time to time, as demands required, new buildings have been erected, till now the institution has a property valued at $200,000, and accommodations for 175 boarders and 200 day-scholars. The first principal of the seminary was the Rev. Reuben Nelson, D.D., now one of the agents of the M. E. Book Concern in New York, who held the position with distinguished success for twenty-eight years. Twice the buildings were partially destroyed by fire, and had to be restored by the friends of the institution. The valuable library is the gift of the Hon. Ziba Bennett, of Wilkesbarre, through whose liberality it has recently received large additions. Since the resignation of Dr. Nelson, in 1872, the seminary has been under the management of the Rev. David Copeland, Ph.D., D.D. He has associated with him a lady principal and nine teachers of the various branches of the several courses of study. The system of instruction adopted is designed to prepare students for the active duties of life or for a course of professional or collegiate study. Eight courses of study are provided in order to meet the various wants of students, viz., the common English course, course in literature and science, classical course, college preparatory course, scientific preparatory course, musical course, course in art, and commercial course. Both ladies and gentlemen receive diplomas on the completion of any one of the above courses of study, except the common English and the scientific preparatory course. Students completing these two courses receive certificates setting forth their attainments.

Wyoming Territory (pop. 9118) contains an area larger than New York and Pennsylvania, having 97,833 square miles. It is bounded on the north by Montana, on the east by Dakota and Nebraska, west by Montana, Idaho, and Utah, and south by Colorado. It was formerly a part of Colorado Territory, and subsequently of Idaho and Dakota. It was organized as a Territory in 1868. Its capital is Cheyenne. Methodism was introduced from Colorado in 1866-67. In 1868 Cheyenne and Dakota reported 19 members. The Dakota district was organized with two appointments before other points in the Territory were settled; and the report for 1876 shows only two appointments,—Cheyenne and Laramie,—having 135 members, 204 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $7600. According to the government census of 1870 there were but five organized counties in the Territory, and the religious statistics were reported at that time as follows:

Wythe, Joseph H., M.D., a delegate from the California Conference to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1872, and an author, was born in 1822, received a good education, and joined the Philadelphia Conference in 1842. He retired from active ministerial work on account of impaired health, and engaged in the practice of medicine, having received the degree of M.D., at Philadelphia, in 1850. He served during the Civil War as surgeon of staff by appointment of President Lincoln. He was ordered to California, where he entered the pastoral work again. He spent four years in Oregon, as president of Willamette University and pastor, and returned to California in 1869. He is the author of "The Spirit World," a book of poetry, published in 1849, "The Microscopist," a scientific handbook for the microscope (1853), the first work of the kind published in the United States, "Curiosities of the Microscope,"

"The Physician's Pocket Dose Book" (which has passed through many editions), "The Pastoral Office in the Methodist Episcopal Church," and "The Agreement of Science and Revelation."

Xenia Female College is an institution located at Xenia, O. It has been in operation for some twenty-five years, and has educated a number of active and useful young ladies. It is under the presidency of William Smith, A.M., and the number of pupils has varied from 150 to 200 annually. The building is neat and commodious, and the instruction is thorough.

Xenia, O. (pop. 6377), is the capital of Greene County, and is an important railroad centre. It was early included in the circuits then in the Ohio Conference, but is not mentioned in the minutes by name until 1811, when it was connected with Mad River circuit. The previous year it was included in Union circuit, and had the labors of Rev. John Collins, who was instrumental in accomplishing much good. The following year he had as a colleague Moses Crume. In 1853 a second church was organized, and there is also an African M. E. church. A female college has been in existence for a number of years. It is in the Cincinnati Conference, and the statistics for 1876 were reported as follows:

Yadkin College, located in Davidson Co., N. C., is under the control of the North Carolina Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. It was incorporated, with full collegiate privileges and powers, in the year 1861, with G. W. Hege president, and Hon. Henry Walser chairman of the board of trustees. In 1862 there were 95 students in attendance. In 1864 it suspended operations on account of the Civil War, a school of lower grade being conducted in the building, with some intermissions, until 1873. Regular collegiate operations were then resumed, under the presidency of Rev. S. Simpson, A.M. In 1875 some important improvements of a chapel and campus were added. The college has also conferred various degrees under its charter. There are about 80 matriculates. The college is self-sustaining, and its prospects favorable. Rev. S. Simpson, A.M., is president, and A. Baker, Professor of Mathematics. Gaither Walsh, Esq., is chairman of the board of trustees.

Yonkers, N. Y. (pop. 12,733), is situated on the Hudson River, 17 miles above New York, and is a beautiful suburban village. This region was early visited by the pioneer preachers, but the population being almost exclusively under the influence of the Dutch Reformed Church, the progress of Methodism was comparatively slow. It has since, however, become more active. It is in the New York Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
First Church.....	495	357	$35,000
Central Church.....	140	151	40,000

York, Pa. (pop. 11,033), the capital of York County, is situated on the Northern Central Railroad. During the Revolutionary War Congress, when driven from Philadelphia, removed to this place. Methodism was early introduced into this region of country. In July, 1781, Freeborn Garrettson preached in the public-house near York. Several teamsters were present. James Worley was awakened by the sermon, and was thought by his family and friends to be deranged. A physician was sent for, who placed him in bed and blistered him: but all his efforts failed to help the patient. The family then sent for Garrettson, who was sixteen miles distant, and who explained to him more fully the plan of salvation, and in a little while he was converted. This was the introduction of Methodism into the town of York. In 1782, Jacob Settler bought a lot west of the Codorus, erected a small frame church, and presented it to the society. York was made a station in 1818. The Mission chapel, now Duke Street, was built in 1861, and in 1870-72 the present Duke Street church was erected. The First church has just finished a beautiful edifice. It is in the Central Pennsylvania Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.

Young, Daniel, was born Dec. 25, 1812, in Licking Co., Ohio. At an early age he was thrown upon his own resources. He was converted at the age of nineteen. At Princeton, Ill., he united with the Methodist Protestant Church, in 1837, and in 1839 was licensed to preach. He joined the North Illinois Conference in 1840. When that Conference divided he fell in the North Illinois division. In 1866 he emigrated to Kansas, where he has been instrumental in raising up a Conference of the Methodist Protestant Church. He was a member of the General Conference of 1854, and of the Baltimore Convention in 1877. He is still laboring in Kansas, and is a strong advocate of temperance.

Young, David, one of the most distinguished ministers in the West, was born in Bedford Co., Va., in 1779. His parents were pious Presbyterians, and trained him carefully in the creed and catechism. In early childhood he was serious and studious, and at the age of twenty-one he was at the head of a grammar-school in Tennessee. In 1803 he experienced a change of heart, and with it a conviction that he was called to the ministry. He commenced holding meetings for prayer and exhortation, and his talents and usefulness were at once recognized. In 1805 he entered the Western Conference, and from that time until 1839, with the exception of a rest for six years, he filled important appointments either as pastor or presiding elder. He was a man of fine personal appearance, and of great mental vigor. "He was a constant reader, possessed a tenacious memory, and had fine conversational powers. As an orator, in his palmiest days he had few equals. In style, he was clear, logical, and chaste; when roused, grand and overwhelming. He was fifty-three years a member of an Annual, and six times a member of the General Conference. In youth, he thoroughly studied and heartily embraced the peculiar doctrines and usages of Methodism. His attachment to them grew with his growth and strengthened with his strength, and only reached its maturity in his green old age." He bequeathed to the church the most of his fortune. He died in great peace Nov. 15, 1858.

Young, Harrison Jared, was born in Centre Co., Pa., April 14, 1810, and died at Berwick, Pa., April 29, 1855. When about twenty, he was attracted by the singing, and was led to enter a Methodist prayer-meeting, and before its close was converted. He was received into the Baltimore Conference in 1834, and filled appointments until 1844, when his health became impaired, and he was placed on the superannuated list. He had prepared for publication a compendium of Methodism. He gave liberally to the missionary cause, and at his death bequeathed to it $500. His last sickness was a time of great triumph. For hours he whispered, "Glory hallelujah."

Young, Jacob, D.D., was born in Western Pennsylvania, March 19, 1776. His parents emigrated to the State of Kentucky, where he was exposed to the toils and dangers incident to a pioneer life. Though educated in the doctrines of the Westminster Confession, he united when a young man with the Methodist Church, and in 1801 was licensed as a local preacher. In 1862 he was urged into the itinerant ministry, under the care of William McKendree, afterwards bishop. For more than fifty-five years he was connected with an Annual Conference. He traveled extensively, and few men have been instrumental in the conversion of greater numbers. As a pastor, and as a presiding elder, he was prompt, diligent, laborious, and unswerving in his devotion to the discipline and economy of the church. He was a man of great intellectual power, and was honored by his brethren from time to time with a seat in the General Conference. He died Sept. 15, 1859, audibly pronouncing the words, "Sweet heaven, sweet heaven," just as he was passing away.

Young, Robert, D.D., an eminent Wesleyan minister, went to the West Indies in 1820, where he labored with success. Subsequently he resided for some time in Nova Scotia, and returned to England in 1830. He was a man of much prayer, a devout student of Holy Scripture, and simple and earnest in his pulpit ministrations, and was the happy instrument used in the conversion of multitudes of souls. He assisted by his counsel and presence in the formation of the Australian Conference, visited the Fiji and Friendly Islands: after his return publishing an interesting narrative of his "Mission Round the World." Two years after his return (in 1856) he was made president of the Conference. In 1860 he was seized with paralysis, for several years suffering much and patiently. He died in 1865, aged seventy years. His gifted son, the Rev. R. N. Young, born in Nova Scotia, is one of the most indefatigable workers in the Conference and its committees. He is one of the assistant secretaries of the Conference, secretary to the committee of privileges and exigency, and other posts of arduous, though unseen, labor and effort.

Young, Robert Anderson, D.D., of the Tennessee Conference, M. E. Church South, was born in Knox Co., Tenn., Jan. 23, 1824. He pursued his studies and graduated in Washington College, and united with the Tennessee Conference in 1846. He has filled a number of important stations in Tennessee and in Missouri, and was for three years president of Florence University, Ala. He has been secretary of the Tennessee Conference for many years, and has several times been a delegate to the General Conference. In May, 1873, he was elected secretary of the board of trust of Vanderbilt University, in which he still continues.

Youngstown, O. (pop. 8035), is the capital of Mahoning County, and is an important manufacturing place. Methodism was introduced by Dr. Shadrach Bostwick, in 1803. Visiting the town, he found a small log house built by the citizens, and occupied by the Presbyterians for a church. He asked permission to preach, but was positively refused. Judge Rayen, though not a professor of religion, invited the doctor to preach in his barn, which he did until a better place was provided. Shortly after he formed a class of a few members. It was at first in the Deerfield, then in the Mahoning, and subsequently in the Youngstown circuit. It became a station in 1842, and a new church was built in 1843. The church since that time has continued to prosper. The statistics for 1876 are: 539 members, 498 Sunday-school scholars, a church valued at $20,000, and a parsonage at $5000.

Ypsilanti, Mich. (pop. 5471), is situated on the west side of Huron River, and on the Michigan Central Railroad. Methodism was introduced into this place by Rev. Elias Pratt, in 1824. The first quarterly meeting was held by Rev. J. A. Baughman, in 1825, and a class of 7 members was organized. A brick church was erected in 1832-33. In 1843 a commodious frame church was erected, which was enlarged in 1859. A parsonage was purchased in 1854, and was subsequently sold, and a fine brick parsonage erected in 1871. The African M. E. church was organized in 1857, and a church was erected two years later. It is in the Detroit Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Churches.	Members.	S. S. Scholars.	Ch. Property.
M. E. Church.....	474	476	$17,000
African M. E. Church.....	120	70	2,200

Zanesville, O. (pop. 10,011), the capital of Muskingum County, is situated on the Muskingum River, and is on a tract of land which was granted by Congress to Ebenezer Zane, in 1796, on condition that he should open a bridle-track from Wheeling to Maysville, Ky. This part of Ohio was early traversed by the pioneer Methodist preachers, and Zanesville was included in their large circuits. The church had acquired considerable strength before the agitation connected with the reform movement of 1828.

In 1829 Nathan Emery was sent to the station at a time when many of the most prominent, wealthy, and influential members had seceded from the church. Under his labors the foundations of a new brick church were laid, a large congregation was gathered, and a great revival swept over the town. The subsequent labors of Dr. Trimble, whose family were so prominent in the State, and the conversion of Bishop Hamline, attracted great public attention. Since that period the church has grown with the increase of population. It is in the Ohio Conference, and the statistics for 1876 are as follows:

Zaring, William M., a native of Indiana, was born in 1829, and was converted in 1847. In September, 1854, he joined the Indiana Conference, and was sent to Point Commeree. Previous to 1867 he spent his ministerial life on circuit and station work, and afterwards on district work, traveling Rockport and Vincennes districts until 1875-76, when he was stationed at Bloomington. He was chosen a delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Zion's Hill Collegiate Institute is situated at West Middletown, Washington Co., Pa. It was formerly known as Pleasant Hill Seminary. The buildings are five in number, including two large halls. The institution is incorporated, and is under the fostering care of the African M. E. Zion connection. It is under the supervision of Prof. W. T. Ackison. The buildings contain rooms sufficient for 150 students.

Zurich, Switzerland (pop. 21,199), is the capital of a canton of the same name, and is beautifully situated on Lake Zurich. In addition to the population of the city, it has suburbs embracing some 30,000 inhabitants. Methodism was introduced in 1856, under the labors of Dr. Jacoby and those associated with him. It encountered in its earliest period severe opposition, but continued to grow. A large congregation was early gathered, and a good edifice was built. It has additional appointments now connected with it. H. Z. Jacobmuhlen was its first pastor, who, in 1857, reported 40 probationers. The statistics for 1876 are: 637 members, 1200 Sunday-school scholars, and 2 churches with a parsonage, valued at $100,200.

ADDENDUM.

A.

Achard, C., was born at Friedrichsdorf, near Frankfort-on-the-Main, of Huguenot ancestry. He entered the Germany and Switzerland Conference in 1859, and is now stationed at Basle.

Allen, John, a Methodist Episcopal minister, well known throughout the church as "Camp-Meeting John Allen," joined the Maine Conference in 1835. He located in 1852, returned to the traveling connection in 1857, located again in 1860, and was re-admitted to the Conference as a supernumerary in 1868. In 1876 he took a superannuated relation. A large part of his services has been given at camp-meetings, at which he has been a regular attendant and in which he has been an efficient laborer for a long series of years, whence the sobriquet by which he is most familiarly designated.

Allen, Young J., missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church South to China, joined the Georgia Conference in 1858, and was appointed to China in the same year. During the twenty years in which he has been connected with this mission, he has made himself widely useful not only to his own mission, but to the missionary cause generally and to the Chinese government. He is a professor of History in one of the government institutions, and is also employed as a translator. He is one of the most active of the missionary laborers in Chinese literature, to which he has given several instructive works, and has projected and conducted a Chinese magazine.

Amenia Seminary is located at Amenia, N. Y., on the Harlem River, 85 miles north of New York City. It was founded in 1835, under Methodist influence and direction, and all its principals have been ministers and members of the church. Its support, however, has been received from all denominations, especially from the citizens in the vicinity. The office of principal has been filled successively by Rev. Charles K. True, Frederick Merrick, Davis W. Clark, Joseph Cummings, E. O. Haven, Gilbert Haven, John W. Beach, Andrew Hunt, Cyrus Foss. Prominent among its teachers have been Professors Winchell, Marcey, Kidder, Armstrong, Van Benschoten, Coddington, Comfort, A. C. Foss, and H. Powers. For the last nine years it has been under the principalship of Rev. S. T. Frost. In its earlier days a more thorough education was given than is usually found in an academic school, and many students for the ministry found in it a preparation for this work. It has a large library, with a number of rare and valuable works, and a herbarium of 800 specimens, collected, arranged, and presented by Prof. Winchell. The seminary consists of three buildings, whole length 200 feet, and a gymnasium and servants' building. Its site is beautiful and healthful.

B.

Baker, John Wesley, was born in Pennsylvania about 1820; early converted, and received a fair education; entered the Pittsburgh Conference in 1844, and has been effective thirty-four years, eight of which were in the office of presiding elder. He has filled some of the chief appointments in the Conference at Pittsburgh, Alleghany, and Steubenville. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1872, and was elected by that body one of the publishing committee of the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

Baldwin, Summerfield, Esq., was born in Anne Arundel Co., Md., Sept. 16, 1832; was converted at eleven years of age, and removing to Baltimore, engaged in mercantile pursuits. As a merchant, he is a member of the house of Woodward, Baldwin & Norris; as a manufacturer, he is one of the proprietors of the Warren Mills, in Baltimore County. Uniting with the Eutaw Street church, he has been for many years class-leader, steward, and Sunday-school superintendent. At present (1877) he is a steward of Madison Avenue church. He is treasurer and vice-president of Emory Grove Camp-Meeting Association, secretary of the Preachers' Aid Society, and a director and one of the projectors of the Methodist Book Depository. He was elected, in 1872, as a lay delegate to represent the Baltimore Conference to the General Conference.

Balligrane is a rural district, which lies almost directly west of Limerick, and some 10 or 12 miles distant. It is a beautiful section of country, and is the abode of the Palatines who emigrated from Germany on account of religious persecution, and who, under Queen Anne, were permitted to settle in Ireland. It was to this settlement that Mr. Wesley preached between 1740 and 1750. Philip Embury, the first Methodist of whom there is knowledge in the United States, was born in this vicinity, and having become a local preacher in Mr. Wesley's societies, emigrated to New York. From the same locality came Barbara Heck, that earnest and decided Methodist lady, who urged Embury to commence religious services in his own small room, in the city of New York, in 1766, and whose name has been justly preserved as one of marked honor in Methodism. Families of the same name continue to reside in that section of the country, and the stable is still shown, in the upper part of which Mr. Wesley held his first services. That from so humble a commencement such a work should have spread seems passing strange; and when Mr. Wesley left the cities and went out of his way to preach to a few foreign immigrants and their descendants who were destitute of gospel privileges, and cared for by no man, he little thought of what momentous results should follow that visit. That rural district was the connecting link between Germany, Ireland, and the United States; between Luther, Wesley, and the Methodist Episcopal Churches.

Baltimore Conference, African M. E. Church, "includes all the State of Maryland and the District of Columbia." It reported for 1876, 7304 members, 96 local preachers, 4781 Sunday-school scholars, and 68 churches valued at $252,590.

Belfast Methodist College was founded to meet the educational wants of the Methodist body in Ireland. In 1845 a connectional school was founded in Dublin as an experiment, which proved quite successful, and led to the desire for a Methodist college. Queen's College, Belfast, where Methodism has an influential position in the community, presented special advantages for the founding of an institution in its vicinity. A beautiful site was selected, and the foundation-stone was laid by Alderman William McArthur, M.P., of London, Aug. 24, 1865, and the institution was opened Aug. 19, 1868. With about £2000 from a general fund, raised partly in Ireland and partly in America, the college was commenced. The whole enterprise has cost more than £37,000, and nearly all of this sum has been raised in Ireland. About £20,000 have been raised as an endowment, about one-half having been contributed by Methodists in the United States and Canada, the other half by the Methodists of England. Its first president was Rev. William Arthur, M.A., with Rev. Robert Crook, LL.D., as head-master, and Rev. Robert Scott, D.D., theological tutor. In 1871, Dr. Crook succeeded Mr. Arthur as president, and W. R. Parker, LL.D., T.C.D., was appointed head-master. In 1873, Dr. Crook resigned, and he was succeeded by Dr. Scott, the Rev. W. P. Appleby, LL.D., being appointed theological tutor. The officers are assisted by a competent staff of masters and professors. The number of students in attendance has averaged in the different departments nearly 300. A large majority of the young men now entering the Wesleyan ministry have enjoyed its advantages. In the competitive examinations in the Queen's College, its students have distinguished themselves by the number of valuable scholarships and honors which they have obtained.

Berne, Switzerland (pop. 32,000), has been since 1848 the seat of government of the Confederation. Methodist services were commenced in 1865. Rev. W. Swartz conducted services, which called out quite a discussion in the newspapers between himself and Dr. Güder, Professor of Theology at the High School of Berne. E. Diem was the first missionary appointed, in 1866. Great difficulties have been encountered, as property is high, and the law will not permit the erection of any buildings except of sandstone. The statistics for 1876 are: 101 members and 180 Sunday-school scholars.

Berry, Nathaniel S., was elected governor of New Hampshire in 1861, and was re-elected in 1862. He is a prominent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was a lay delegate from the New Hampshire Conference to the General Conference in 1872.

Bird, John F., M.D., of Philadelphia, was born at West River, Md., March 7, 1816. He united with the M. E. Church in 1828, and has served as class-leader, trustee, and Sunday-school superintendent. He entered Dickinson College as a student in 1836, and graduated in 1840. The same year he entered the University of Pennsylvania as a medical student, and graduated in 1843. He commenced the practice of medicine at West River, Md., and in 1868 removed to Philadelphia, where he has since remained in the practice of his profession. He has been representative for ten years in the board of managers of the American Sunday-School Union, and has been for many years a trustee of Dickinson College.

Bissel, J. W., President of the Upper Iowa University, was born near Prescott, Canada, in 1843. When yet a child his family removed to Illinois. In 1870 he accepted the position of principal of the Kansas State Normal School, at Emporia, Kansas, but in a few months returned to Indiana and resumed the professorship in the State University. He has been ever since he attained his manhood an active and useful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and busily interested in Sunday-schools. He was chosen a reserve delegate to the General Conference in 1876. He is zealous in the promotion of temperance, and is a prominent member of the temperance organizations of his State. He has written much for the press on educational matters and in behalf of temperance.

Hoyt, Benjamin Ray, of New Hampshire Conference, was born in New Braintree, Mass., Jan. 6, 1789, and died in Windham, N. H., Oct. 3, 1872.

He began his ministry in the old New England Conference in 1807, and traveled extensively throughout the New England States, filling a number of the most important appointments. He was in charge of the societies in Boston, Charlestown, and Cambridge as early as 1819. From 1855 to his death he lived upon his farm in Windham or in the adjacent village of Salem. During his ministry in the New England Conference, and in the Vermont and New Hampshire Conferences, which were formed out of it, he held the office of presiding elder for about twenty years, and was several times a delegate to the General Conference. He was one of the founders and trustees of the Wesleyan University, and also of the Newbury Seminary. Though not favored with great early opportunities, he was so studious that he not only was an accurate theologian, but he had a respectable knowledge of Hebrew, Greek, and French. He was an acceptable preacher, and was extensively beloved.

Hoyt, Prof. Benjamin Thomas, was born in Boston, Oct. 18, 1820, and died in Greencastle, Ind., May 24, 1867. He was graduated at the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., and pursued the vocation of teaching. He was president of the Indiana Female College, at Indianapolis, from 1856 to 1858, and held the chair of Latin Language and Literature in the Indiana Asbury University from 1858 to 1863, in which he was transferred to the chair of Belles-Lettres and English Literature in the same institution. He was a successful teacher, and inspired his pupils with intense enthusiasm.

Illinois Conference, African M. E. Church, was organized in 1876, and includes "the States of Illinois, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and Iowa." It reports for 1875, 34 traveling and 56 local preachers, 3675 members, 58 churches, and 5 parsonages, valued at $194,000.

Independent Methodists.—At different periods and in different locations a few Methodist congregations have seceded from the parent body and have assumed an independent attitude. Without conuectional union these churches have generally sooner or later sought an affiliation with some of the older organizations, and have merged into the different Methodist bodies, or into Congregationalism. The Independent Methodist churches now organized are chiefly in the city of Baltimore and its vicinity. About the time of the breaking out of the Civil War the Baltimore Conference was greatly agitated, and at its session in 1861 the majority resolved not to "submit to the jurisdiction of the General Conference," and declared themselves "independent of it." The Baltimore Conference of the M. E. Church met in 1862, but those in Baltimore who sympathized with the position which had been taken by the Southern element of the Conference declined to recognize its authority. Among these, the Chatsworth church, located on the southwest corner of Pine and Franklin, organized itself independently, and in the same year the Central and the Biddle Street churches were associated with them in one Quarterly Conference. In 1864 Chatsworth church assumed an independent position, and Rev.

John A. Williams was elected pastor. Its cornerstone was laid in 1863, and the building was finished and dedicated in 1864, when rules for its government were adopted. In 1867 a lot was purchased on Lexington and Calhoun Streets, where a church was erected and dedicated in 1868, called the Bethany church, which adopted the rules of

A few other churches have affiliated with these. There is also in Baltimore St. John's church, which was originally associated with the Methodist Protestants, but is independent in its organization.

J.

Jennings Seminary is located in the city of Aurora, Ill., and is under the patronage of the Rock River Conference. The building is situated on a beautiful bluff, fronting on Fox River, and is constructed of stone, with a fire-proof roof, and fire-proof partitions, containing iron doors, separating the building into different compartments. The main building is 125 feet long by 40 feet wide, and five stories high; the rear building is 70 feet long by 45 feet wide, and contains a chapel, seven recitation-rooms, room for painting, and a large commercial hall. There is also a side building, 40 by 30 feet, two stories high, for kitchen and domestic purposes. Its origin was largely due to Rev. John Clark, who died in 1854, before the charter was obtained, and its first title was "Clark Seminary." The charter having been obtained in 1855, the building was commenced in 1856, and completed in 1858. A heavy debt greatly embarrassed the institution, and in 1864 it was purchased by the Rock River Conference for $25,000, but not until 1869 was this full amount paid. About one-half of it was contributed by Mrs. Eliza Jennings, whose name it now bears, and the seminary has since remained free from debt. A school was commenced before the building was fully completed, and shortly afterwards the Rev. G. W. Quereau, D.D., who had been principal of Greenwich Seminary, accepted the position of principal in 1859, and remained at its head until 1873, when, on account of failing health, he resigned. He was succeeded by Rev. C. E. Mandeville, A.M., who resigned in 1876. During these seventeen years there was an average yearly attendance of about 325 students,—both gentlemen and ladies,—who came from different States. In 1876 the institution was closed for the purpose of modernizing the building: but, owing to the financial stringency, the school was re-opened with but partial repairs. Rev. Martin E. Cady, A.M., who was principal of the Troy Conference Academy, was elected principal. He is assisted by a corps of able teachers.

Keen, Mrs. Sarah L., wife of John F. Keen, of Philadelphia, is the daughter of the late James B. Longacre. In her girlhood she became a member of the Union church, but for years past has been connected with Arch Street. Her mother dying in 1850, left to her the charge of a meeting for the promotion of holiness, begun in her house years before. This meeting, held on Tuesday afternoons, has continued ever since with undiminished interest. Mrs. Keen is also a class-leader and teacher of an adult Bible-class. Of late years she has been deeply interested in the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, having been identified with it from the commencement. She is corresponding secretary of the Philadelphia branch, and as such one of the permanent executive committee of the society.

Keller, John J., of the German Conference, was born Oct. 30, 1833, in Malterdingen, Baden. He emigrated to America in 1853. In 1854, in Toledo, O., he was converted, and in 1858 was admitted into the Rock River German Conference. After having filled a number of appointments, he was appointed presiding elder on the Milwaukee district, and in 1872 on the Chicago district, and is now (1877) stationed in Milwaukee. In 1872 he was elected as delegate to the General Conference.

Kingsbury, C. A., D.D.S., was born in East Windsor, Conn. He commenced teaching, in his sixteenth year, in the public schools of New England, and pursued his studies occasionally at Wilbraham and Newbury Seminaries. Visiting Trenton, he formed the acquaintance of Dr. Bunn, and was led to dental studies. In the first years of his dental practice he conceived the idea of applying electricity as a therapeutic agent, and constructed an apparatus which more than realized his expectations in mitigation of pain. In 1839 he went to Philadelphia and studied mechanical dentistry, and returned to New Jersey, where he continued his practice, pursuing, also, the study of languages and natural science. In 1841 he practiced dentistry in Bordentown, and in 1842 removed for a short time to Philadelphia. In his youth he joined the M. E. Church, and pursued his earlier studies at Newbury Seminary, in reference to the Christian ministry. He was licensed as a local preacher, and entered the New Jersey Conference, but suffered from malarial fever, and was compelled to relinquish his pastoral labors. He subsequently graduated with distinction at the Philadelphia College of Medicine, and settled in Philadelphia in 1857. He aided in the organization of the American Dental Association, the Odontographic Society of Pennsylvania, and the Dental Society of Pennsylvania. He is a member of the Pennsylvania Association of Dental Surgeons, and of the Academy of Natural Sciences, and is professor in the Philadelphia Dental College.

Klippel, Adam, was born in Wackernheim, near Bingen-on-the-Rhine, Germany, Nov. 1, 1828. Having emigrated to America in 1838, he settled in Cincinnati. He was converted in his thirteenth year, and was educated in part at Woodward College, Cincinnati, and spent several years at the Western Book Concern as a compositor. He joined the Illinois Conference in 1851, and traveled for ten years. In 1861 he became agent of the Post-Office Department, and held the position for eight years. He was editor of the Holt Co., Mo., Sentinel until 1876. He resides in Holt Co., Mo., and is regent of the Normal College of that State. He was a lay delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

Koch, Hermann A., was born Sept. 4, 1828, at Sommerfeld, Prussia, and emigrated to America in the spring of 1849. He was converted in June, 1850, and entered on the ministry at Highland, Ill., in 1851. In 1856 he was elected professor of the German department in Quincy College, Illinois, and since 1860 he has been professor and president of Central Wesleyan College, Warrenton, Mo. He was a member of the General Conference in 1876.

Liberia, a republic on the western coast of Africa, was founded, in 1820, by the American Colonization Society. It became an independent state in 1847. It extends along the Atlantic coast about 600 miles, and into the interior from 10 to 40 miles. Its area has been steadily increased by purchases from the native tribes. The population numbered, according to the latest estimates, about 720,000, of whom nearly 20,000 were Americo-Liberians. A number of native tribes exist within the territory, of whom the chief are the Veys, Pessehs, Bassas, Kroos, and Mandingos. Among some of these tribes mission-schools have been established by Methodist Episcopalians, Baptists, and Presbyterians. As a number of the early settlers who were sent by the Colonization Society had been members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, a desire was expressed to have missionaries sent out to them, and Oct. 6, 1832, Rev. Melville B. Cox sailed as the first missionary, from Norfolk, Va., arriving in Liberia on March 8, 1833. He was cordially received by the then acting governor, Mr. Williams, who was a member of the Methodist Church, and a local preacher. Mr. Cox had scarcely commenced his work with great earnestness before he was seized with the fever incident to that climate, and died July 21, 1833. Before leaving for that country he had been asked what he would have written on his tombstone should he die, and he replied,

"Let a thousand fall before Africa be given up." Before his death he had purchased missionary premises at Monrovia, and had organized a Methodist Episcopal church. He was followed by the Rev. Rufus Spaulding and Samuel O. Wright, with their wives, and Miss Sophronia Farrington, a teacher, who set sail in September, 1833, and landed in Monrovia Jan. 1, 1834. Mr. Spaulding was, in about five weeks, seized with the fever, and when able to write reported that Mrs. Wright was dead. She was soon followed by her husband. Mr. Spaulding, his wife, and Miss Farrington returned to the United States. In 1835, Rev. John Seys, of the Oneida Conference, was appointed by Bishop Hedding superintendent of the mission. Under his wise management societies were formed in several of the settlements in Liberia, and the next year he was joined by Rev. J. G. Barton, from Georgia. In 1836 they reported 375 members in the church, and 128 children in the schools. A number of local preachers had from time to time emigrated among the colonists. Among these, Mr. Williams, who had been lieutenant-governor of the colony, penetrated into the Congo country, for the purpose of establishing a mission and a school, but the occurrence of a war prevented the success of the enterprise. Some time afterwards Mr. Seys received a message from Boatswain requesting a teacher, and a young man by the name of Jacobs was sent to that station. The society increasing in strength, a manual-labor school was commenced at Millsburg. In 1836, Mr. Seys returned to the United States, held missionary meetings, and delivered a number of addresses in behalf of Africa. He returned in 1837, taking with him the Rev. Squire Chase, of the Oneida Conference, and Rev. George Brown, a colored local preacher. In 1836 the General Conference had constituted the Liberia mission into a Mission Annual Conference, and on Mr. Seys' return he called the preachers together and organized them, thus adding to the efficiency of the work. In 1837, Dr. S. M. E. Goheen, a talented young physician, embarked with teachers for Liberia. The health of Mr. Chase having been prostrated, he was compelled to return to the United States. At the earnest request of Mr. Seys, the Missionary Board resolved to establish a classical school, and Rev. Jabez Burton, a graduate of Alleghany College, and a local preacher, was elected. A printer was also appointed, and a press and materials were sent out to issue a semi-monthly paper, to be called Africa's Luminary. In 1839 the academy went into operation, and the first number of the paper was issued March 15, 1839. An additional missionary, Rev. W. Stocker, was also sent out. Subsequently John J. Matthias went out as governor of Bassa Cove, and in his company Mrs. Wilkins went as a teacher, but was subsequently compelled to return. With varying success the mission was continued, and in 1852 was visited by Bishop Scott. In 1856 the General Conference authorized the election of a missionary bishop, and Francis Burns was chosen. After his death J. W. Roberts was elected in his place. He having died in 1875, the mission was visited by Bishop Gilbert Haven in 1876-77, who carefully examined all the interests of the work. An effort has been made to explore the interior, and for that purpose a missionary has recently been sent out. (For statistics, see LIBERIA CONFERENCE.)

Liberia Conference was organized in 1836 as a Mission Conference, "possessing all the rights, powers, and privileges of other Conferences, except that of sending delegates to the General Conference and of drawing its annual dividend from the avails of the Book Concern and of the Chartered Fund." Bishop Scott visited Africa and held its session March 7, 1853, in Monroeville. It then reported 28 traveling and 19 local preachers, and 1309 members. It was constituted a Conference, with full powers, in 1868, and was visited by Bishop Haven in 1877. It then reported 20 traveling and 44 local preachers, 2244 members, 1831 Sunday-school scholars, 33 churches, valued at $17,350, and 6 parsonages, valued at $17,000.

Liebhart, Henry, D.D., editor of the Haus und Herd, was born in 1832, at Carlsruhe, in Baden, and emigrated to America in 1854. He was converted in 1855, and became a missionary among the Germans in the cities of Boston, Brooklyn, and Baltimore. In 1865 he was employed by Dr. Nast as assistant to the Christliche Apologete. At the General Conference of 1872 a specific German Sunday-school department was created, and Dr. Liebhart was elected editor. He founded and edits the illustrated monthly called Haus und Herd, besides attending to the different German Sunday-school publications, periodicals, tracts, and books.

Lippincott, B. C., A.M., of the New Jersey Conference, was born in Haddonfield, N. J., July 22,

REV. B. C. LIPPINCOTT, A.M.

1828, and was converted in his fourteenth year. He received an academic education at Pennington Seminary, acting as teacher in the English department at the same time, and graduated from Dickinson College in 1858. After serving as principal of the Cumberland Valley Institute for one year, he was received into the East Baltimore Conference, and transferred to the Oregon Conference, where he was principal of the Puget Sound Institute. In 1862 he was elected by the legislature of Washington Territory as the first superintendent of public instruction. While on the Pacific coast he served as pastor of the charges at Olympia, Dallas City, and Portland. In 1866 he was transferred to the New Jersey Conference, and in 1876 was elected president of the New Jersey State Sunday-School Association. In 1877 he was also elected president of the Prohibition State Convention.

Logan Female College is located in Russellville, Ky., and is the property of the Louisville

Annual Conference, M. E. Church South. It was chartered in 1867, taking the place of the Russellville Female Academy, of which Rev. R. H. Bibbers was then president. The corner-stone of the new college edifice was laid in 1869; Rev. N. H. Lee was elected president. In 1873 the old building was sold and the college was suspended prior to the opening of the new building. In 1874 the institution was opened under the presidency of A. B. Stark, LL.D., and is steadily growing in prosperity and reputation. In its standard of scholarship it seeks to place itself among the foremost institutions of the country.

Logan, Thomas H., M.D., was born in Washington Co., Pa., Feb. 14, 1828. He was graduated at Washington College in 1846, and studied medicine and graduated at the University of Pennsylvania in 1851. He located that year in Wheeling, W. Va., and practiced medicine, and subsequently entered the wholesale drug business, in which he is now engaged. He joined the M. E. Church in 1845, and has been a trustee and Sunday-school superintendent for twenty years, and was a lay delegate to the General Conference of 1872. In 1861 he was prominent in supporting the United States government against secession, and was a member of the convention of loyal citizens in organizing the "restored government of West Virginia." He was also a member of the first legislature of the "restored government," and served until the State of West Virginia was formally organized in 1863. He was for several years a member and president of the board of regents of the West Virginia University, and is at present a member of the board of regents of the State Normal School and branches, and of the board of visitors to Alleghany College.

London, England, is the largest city in the world. Its area is variously estimated according to the suburban districts embraced by law for various purposes. The lowest estimate is 122 square miles, for the metropolis local government; the largest is 687 square miles, for the police district. This area embraced, in 1871, a population of 3,883,092, which at the present writing (1878) has increased to over 4,000,000. In history it appears as a Roman station under Claudius, and was fortified under Constantine the Great.

Methodism assumed its first organic form in this great city, for the early society at Oxford, in 1729, was but a band of students, who were thoroughly devoted to the Church of England. It was in Fetter Lane, in London, at a society meeting among the Moravians, that Mr. Wesley experienced that "burning love for Christ," and that joyous sense of pardon and acceptance which gave a wonderful impetus to his whole Christian life. He and his friends met with societies organized by the Moravians, until, in 1739, several persons came to his rooms for spiritual instruction, and he formed of those the first society under his care. This was the germ of future Methodism. Field preaching, though commenced near Bristol, by Mr. Whitefield, was soon transferred to London; and Mr. Wesley addressed immense audiences in Smithfield, Moorfields, Kensington Commons, and other parts of the city. The first edifice opened for preaching by Methodists was the Old Foundry, which was leased from the government and fitted for preaching and other uses. Here Mr. Wesley had his rooms,—a school-house, a book depository, and a medical dispensary for the poor,—and where he first brought electricity as a remedial agent within the reach of the masses. It was recognized as the centre of Methodist work until, in 1778, the City Road chapel supplied its place. This has ever since been regarded as the head, not only of London Methodism, but of British Methodism. Close by its walls repose the remains of Mr. Wesley, Adam Clarke, and a host of Methodist worthies. The president of the Conference is always stationed at this centre.

The publication of religious books was commenced by Mr. Wesley early in his career. At his death the Conference became his successor, and has conducted the publication of standard Wesleyan books to the present time. The publishing-house is situated at No. 2 Castle Street, City Road, and is under the control of F. J. Jobson, D.D., who has displayed unusual business and executive ability. The Methodist Magazine is the chief official organ of the British Methodists. It was commenced by Mr. Wesley as the Arminian Magazine, in 1778, and is still continued. The weekly papers, as The Watchman, The Recorder, The Methodist, and recently a Quarterly Review, are conducted by individuals or associations in the interest of Methodism, but not under the direct control of the Conference. London is also the great missionary centre of the world-wide movements of the Wesleys. In 1839 the missionary house, or Centenary Hall, was purchased, which is on Bishopgate Street, and is the centre not only of missionary movements, but where nearly all the benevolent Wesleyan operations of the kingdom are planned and arranged. A branch theological institution, chiefly devoted to the education of missionaries, is located at Richmond, in the suburbs of the city, and is under the supervision of Dr. George Osborn as theological tutor. The Normal Institution, under the care of Dr. James H. Rigg, located at Westminster, is doing a great work for the cause of Christian education in the training of young men and young women as teachers both for the denominational and public schools. The munificent offer of Sir Francis Lycett of £50,000 conditioned on a like amount being raised to aid in the erection of Methodist churches in the city of London having been responded to, a large number of churches have been within a few years erected in different parts of the city, and a new impulse has been given to aggressive efforts. There are now in London 30 circuits, with 128 ministers stationed by the Conference, including several officers of the Conference, and supernumeraries. There are under their care 104 connectional chapels, and 60 other preaching-places. The different branches of Methodists which have seceded from the parent body have also established churches in the city. The United Free Methodists issue their connectional publications from this centre, where their missionary operations are also conducted. The statistics of the different branches of Methodism, as given in the minutes of 1875, in the city are as follows :

Long, Albert L., D.D., professor in Robert College, Constantinople, joined the Pittsburgh Conference in 1857, and was appointed in the same year to open the new Methodist Episcopal mission in Bulgaria. He continued in close connection with the mission till 1863, when he removed to Constantinople, but still continued to act as superintendent of the mission, while he gave his immediate attention to the duties of a professor in Robert College, and to the translation of books, in which he found a more extended field of usefulness than in local missionary work. He resigned the superintendency of the mission in 1873, and devoted himself exclusively to his duties at Constantinople. Although the institution with which he is connected is under the immediate care of the American board, his relations to the Methodist Church and its missions are not actually disturbed. The work he does at Constantinople is for the benefit of all the Protestant missions in Turkey. The students of the Methodist, as well of other missions, are admitted to it to complete their course of studies; and the books of which he is the author and translator are as yet almost the only evangelical publications which are accessible to the Bulgarian people. Dr. Long is connected with the Pittsburgh Conference.

Longacre, Andrew, of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Philadelphia, June 12, 1831. He was converted in his twelfth year, and became a member of the Union church. He was educated in his native city, but prevented by successive failures in health from completing his studies. In 1852 he was received in the Philadelphia Conference, having traveled the previous year under the presiding elder. After filling various appointments, he was compelled to desist on account of impaired health, and in 1860 he went as the assistant of Dr. McClintock to the American chapel in Paris. Returning to Philadelphia in 1862, he resumed the active ministry, and has filled prominent appointments in Philadelphia, Baltimore, New York, and Newburg. During his impaired health he gave considerable attention to the arts of engraving and painting, and also visited various countries in Europe.

Longacre, James Barton, historical and portrait engraver, and for twenty-five years engraver to the United States Mint, was born in 1794, in Delaware Co., Pa., near where his Swedish ancestors settled in 1634. He attained considerable distinction in his profession, his works having been numerous and widely circulated from 1820 to 1835. In conjunction with Mr. Herring, of New York, he planned and published the "National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans." Brought to God when young, he became a member of St. George's church, Philadelphia, filling the offices of class-leader, steward, and trustee for many years. Leaving St. George's with others to form the Central church, he served it also in the same positions till his death, in 1869. He was one of the first board of Methodist trustees of Dickinson College, one of the first board of managers of the Philadelphia Conference Tract Society and Publishing House, and for thirty years was a vice-president of the American Sunday-School Union, serving in all with a rare wisdom in counsel and punctuality until his death.

Louisville Trinity Church, an engraving of which may be seen on the following page, is the principal edifice owned by the M. E. Church in that city. (For its statistics, see LOUISVILLE.)

Martha's Vineyard Camp-Meeting is the oldest of the permanent camp-meetings, which have now become numerous in the United States, its original foundation having preceded that of all other similar meetings by nearly twenty-five years. It is held at Wesleyan Grove, in the island of Martha's Vineyard, Mass., and within the bounds of the Providence Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Previous to the selection of this grove, meetings were held for the section of country in which it is situated at Falmouth and Sandwich, Mass., and at another point in the Vineyard, but none of the places seemed suitable for a permanent situation. When the Wesleyan Grove itself was first chosen, no design of a definite continuance was entertained, and it has been only by repeated re-appointment from year to year, then by obtaining a lease of the grounds, and finally by purchase, that the situation has become permanent. The site of the Wesleyan Grove was first selected and marked by the late Jeremiah Pease, Esq., of Edgartown, Mass. The first camp-meeting was held in August, 1835, under the superintendency of the Rev. Thomas C. Pierce, the encampment consisting of nine tents. Meetings have been held at the same place every year since except in 1845, when it was decided to discontinue them, and the services were transferred to Westport Point, Mass. The new policy proved unacceptable, and was not continued. A lease of the grounds for ten years, at $30 a year, was obtained in 1850, when the number of tents had increased to eighty-seven. The lease was renewed several years before its expiration for ten years longer, with the privilege of another renewal or of a purchase of the lands at their market value. It was arranged, in 1854, that the presiding elders of the Providence and Sandwich districts should preside alternately over the meetings. The New Bedford district, being formed afterwards, also received a representation in the management. The purchase of the grove, with the rights of way, etc., was effected in 1865, for $1300, which sum was raised from among the attendants upon the meeting, with more than $200 in excess, to be applied to making improvements on the ground. Articles of incorporation were obtained in 1868 for the "Martha's Vineyard Camp-Meeting Association,"—the same body which had previously managed the affairs of the meeting as a voluntary organization,—“for the purpose of maintaining annual religious meetings on the island of Martha's Vineyard.” The association was empowered to hold real and personal estate to an amount not exceeding $25,000; and it was provided, that 20 acres of the land, with the buildings and personal property of the association used exclusively for religious purposes, or for the protection of the property of the association, should be exempted from taxation. The growth of the grove as a place of summer residence, and the attendance upon the meetings, have been progressive, and have increased very rapidly within the last ten years. When it became probable that the location would be a permanent one, wooden cottages began to be erected in place of the tents of canvas. The first was put up by the Rev. Frederick Upham about 1856, and was only about 10 by 12 feet in superficial dimensions. The number of cottages increased slowly at first, but an improvement in the style and size of the buildings was shown in each year. Such houses have now become the rule, and Wesleyan Grove presents the appearance of a regularly laid out and permanently built summer city of elegant cottages, some of which are quite expensive. A gradual change has also come over the character of the place as a resort. At the beginning, the only recognized object of the grove was the holding of special annual camp-meeting services, of the usual duration, and the people did not come to the grounds till at or near the beginning of the meeting. After a few years, family tents having been introduced, a few persons would come a few days before the meeting to enjoy a short season of quiet in the grove, with a clam-bake; a few years afterwards they began to arrive several weeks beforehand; and now the grove has become a regular place of residence for families during the whole summer. It has also become a favorite place of resort for excursions, and is visited every year by numerous strangers who have no particular sympathy with the religious objects of the gathering. Yet these objects have never been lost sight of, nor has their prominence been effaced. One of the enactments of the association declares that the design of holding an annual camp-meeting here is strictly religious, and should be paramount to all others; and that the security, simplicity, and moral integrity of the social and domestic life that have attended it have arisen from the distinctive religious influence that has characterized it. Stated religious meetings are held regularly during the whole season of the occupancy of the grove. The meeting has illustrated, most pointedly, by the success which has attended it in all of its aspects, during thirty-two years, how religious growth may be blended with the cultivation of physical vigor, wholesome recreation, and rational, innocent amusement, in such a way as to make each object contribute to the attainment of the other, and secure the higher enjoyment of the double blessing of a sound mind in a sound body. A number of persons were induced by the success of the camp-ground as a summer home to purchase, in 1867, a tract of ground adjoining the grove on the southeast, and lay it out in lots for cottages and tents. This has become the summer village of Oak Bluffs, which is managed with more prominent reference to summer residence and recreation, yet so as not to be inharmonious with the religious purposes of the camp-ground. Another tract, on the northwest, was bought and laid out in 1867, as the Vineyard Highlands, which is also managed so as not to interfere with the religious purposes of Wesleyan Grove. The three settlements comprehend a territory of about 300 acres.

Merritt, Timothy, of the New England Conference, M. E. Church, was born at Barkhamstead, Conn., in October, 1775, and died at Lynn, Mass., in 1845. He was converted in 1792, entered the traveling connection in 1796, and was stationed on the New London circuit, which at that time was about 300 miles in extent. His next circuit was in the new Penobscot country, Maine, which was hardly yet opened out of the forest. He located in 1803, in order to relieve the churches from the burden of supporting himself and his growing family, and continued located for fourteen years, but labored actively as a preacher, while earning his own living during the whole time. He returned to the traveling work in 1817, and filled important appointments till 1832, when he became for four years assistant editor of The Christian Advocate and Journal, at New York. In 1831, while stationed at Malden, Mass., he devoted a part of his time to the editorship of Zion's Herald. He was appointed to the South Street church, Lynn, Mass., in 1836, where he served for two years, after which, in 1838, he took a superannuated relation. He was a strong polemic writer in defense of the doctrines and polity of the church, and was a faithful preacher.

McCullough, J. B., of the Philadelphia Conference, was born near Oxford, Chester Co., Pa., Feb. 13, 1823. He was converted in 1838, and in 1839 united with the M. E. Church. In 1846 he was received into the Philadelphia Conference, having previously been a local preacher. He has filled a number of important appointments in Delaware and Pennsylvania, embracing several charges in the city of Philadelphia. He was active in securing Chester Heights camp-ground, to which he has devoted much attention and care. In 1872 he was elected secretary of the Philadelphia Conference Tract Society, and was placed in charge of its building on Arch Street. During his official terms these buildings have been greatly enlarged and remodeled. He was active in the organization of the Preachers' Aid Society, which grew out of some fifteen years' experience in the board of Conference stewards. He has also been on the board of Church Extension, and was a member of the General Conference in 1872.

McGee, James, was for many years an active Methodist in New York and Brooklyn, and is now a resident of Plainfield, N. J. He is a local preacher, and is especially devoted to Sunday-school work. He has written much on the latter subject, particularly of the higher departments of normal class teaching. He is devoted to the church, and has been liberal in promoting its interests.

McKown, J. La Grange, D.D., was born Aug. 13, 1826. His immediate ancestors were members of the Dutch Reformed Church. He was converted and united with the M. E. Church in Albany, N. Y., at the age of fourteen, and graduated at Wesleyan University in 1849. He was at one time principal of Cooperstown Seminary, and of the Pittsburgh High School, and has filled appointments in Cincinnati, New York, Chicago, and Jersey City.

McLane, Charles, M.D., was born Sept. 14, 1790, in Tyrone Co., Ireland. He became a member of the church in 1803. Dr. McLane was intimately acquainted with Bishops Asbury, McKendree, and George. He was licensed to preach in 1811. He commenced the study of medicine at Lancaster, Pa., and graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1841. He practiced medicine in Pennsylvania and Virginia, and now resides at Morgantown, W. Va., in retired life. He held the position of recorder of the town of Morgantown for several years, but never was a politician. He was a trustee of Madison College. Has always been devoted and firm to the M. E. Church, and opposed all divisions and secessions from the mother church. Dr. McLane's medical skill is identified with curative medicines of standard value.

Miley, John, D.D., professor in Drew Theological Seminary, joined the Ohio Conference in 1838. He fell into the Cincinnati Conference upon the division of that body, and was transferred to the New York East Conference in 1852. He was transferred to the New York Conference in 1866. He filled the most important appointments in the Conferences with which he was connected for upwards of thirty years, and was elected, in 1872, Professor of Systematic Theology in Drew Theological Seminary.

Mississippi Conference, African M. E. Church, "includes all the State of Mississippi."

Missouri Conference, African M. E. Church, includes "all the States of Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska, Colorado, and all the States West not included in the California Conference." It reported for 1876, 45 traveling and 63 local preachers, 4603 members, 2515 Sunday-school scholars, and 45 churches and 6 parsonages, valued at $161,000.

Nadal, Bernard Harrison, D.D., an eminent preacher, writer, and teacher of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in Talbot Co., Md., March 2, 1813, and died at Madison, N. J., June 20, 1870. He was sent when a well-grown youth to learn a trade at Hanover, Pa., where he was converted. He joined the Baltimore Conference in 1835, and, without neglecting any of his ministerial duties, prepared himself to enter an advanced class. He entered Dickinson College while stationed at Carlisle, Pa., and was graduated from that institution in 1848. In 1855 he was elected Professor of Ethics and English Literature in Indiana Asbury University, and was transferred to the North Indiana Conference. He returned to the Baltimore Conference in 1857, and was made presiding elder of the Roanoke district. He afterwards filled appointments at the Foundry church, Washington, Sands Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., the First church, New Haven, Conn., Wesley chapel, Washington, and Trinity church, Philadelphia, till 1867, when he was elected Professor of Historical Theology in Drew Theological Seminary, a position which he held at the time of his death. As a preacher, he was "clear, convincing, and scriptural." He wrote on a wide range of subjects, successfully in each department. His style was pure, vigorous, and polished, and many of his essays were masterpieces. He was a regular contributor to the Methodist from its establishment till his death. He was preparing a theological essay, and was gathering materials for a life of Dr. McClintock, at the time he was seized with his last illness.

Nast, William, D.D., was born at Stuttgart, in Würtemberg, in 1807, and entered when fourteen years of age the Theological Seminary at Blaubeuren, and later was a fellow-student with David Strauss. He changed the study of theology for that of philosophy, and emigrated in 1828 to the United States. Here he became a private teacher on Dunoon's Island. In 1831-32 he taught German at the Military Academy of West Point.

Through Law's "Call to the Unconverted" and Taylor's "Holy Living," Nast became interested in Methodism. He heard Romer preach; became a teacher of modern languages at the Gettysburg (Lutheran) Seminary, and then Professor of Greek and Hebrew at Kenyon College, O. In 1835 he became a local preacher, and joined the Ohio Conference of the M. E. Church. Since January, 1839, he has been the editor of the Christliche Apologete, of which, as well as of the Sunday-School Bell, he was the founder. Dr. Nast was not only the first German M. E. missionary, but also the founder of German Methodist literature and compilations. Besides many translations of books, he has given the church a commentary on Matthew, Mark, and Luke, and his Introduction to the New Testament has been adopted into the course of study for the ministry of the M. E. Church. In 1857 he was a delegate to the Evangelical Alliance held at Berlin, and in 1873 in New York; and read in 1857 a paper on Methodism, and in 1873, on the doctrine of Christian perfection. He was a member of every General Conference from 1848 to 1876, to the latter of which he was elected a reserve delegate.

Nichols, Hon. John, was a native of Caroline Co., Md., but removed to Pittsburgh in 1848, and remained until 1855, when he became a resident of St. Paul, Minn. During his residence in Pittsburgh he was a merchant, and at St. Paul he had the largest wholesale hardware business in the State. He devoted much time and means to building up the educational interests of Minnesota, and was regent of the State University, and a trustee of Hamline University. Though not a politician, he was a member of the legislature both in Maryland and Minnesota. He was twice elected a member of the Senate of the latter. He was a lay delegate for the Minnesota Conference to the General Conference of 1872. A man of genial manners, strict integrity, gentlemanly bearing, and was deeply devoted to the interests of the M. E. Church, of which he had been a member from his youth.

Primitive Methodist Connection, The, in Great Britain, is the most numerous Methodist body in the kingdom after the Wesleyan Connection. Its history has been one of very rapid growth and prosperity, and of constant activity and extension. Although it originated in a secession from the Wesleyan Connection, it owes its impulse and progress in only a comparatively small degree to the withdrawals which it induced from that body; but its organizers went immediately into neglected districts and among churchless people, and there built up their societies. The eccentric Lorenzo Dow, in the course of his itinerant career, visited England and introduced the American camp-meetings about the year 1807. The meetings found favor with some of the Wesleyan ministers, who allowed them to be held upon their circuits. The subject was brought before the Conference of 1807, which in answer to the question, what is its judgment "concerning what are called camp-meetings?" replied, "It is our judgment that, even supposing such meetings to be allowable in America, they are highly improper in England, and likely to be productive of considerable mischief. And we disclaim all connection with them." This prevented the co-operation of the regular preachers with the camp-meetings; but William Clows, a local preacher, continued to labor in them, and Hugh Bourne, an influential layman, and a church trustee, defended them through the press as an important means of reaching the masses, who could not otherwise be brought under religious influence. Replies were made to Mr. Bourne's pamphlets, and a controversy ensued which was terminated by his expulsion from the society in 1808. William Clows was expelled two years afterwards, and in all about 200 members of the societies shared the fate of these leaders. The out-door meetings were continued, the converts were formed into classes, and the Primitive Methodist Connection was organized in 1810. The point concerning camp-meetings, although it was the most prominent, was not the only subject of controversy, and was only an incident in the divergence between the supposed tendencies of the Wesleyan Connection and the objects which the founders of the Primitive Methodist Church sought to attain, or confirm. The latter believed that the Wesleyan body was becoming more formal and stiff, and less adapted to reach and hold the masses like those to whom Whitefield and the Wesleys had preached at Moorfields and Kingswood, and they sought to restore the primitive simplicity in dress, manners, and living, and directness in the manner of appealing to the populace. While the subsequent expansion of Wesleyan Methodism in all parts of the world has shown that it was actually in no danger of losing its hold upon the people in its capacity for usefulness, the development of Primitive Methodism has equally shown that it had a mission to fulfill, the magnitude of which its founders probably little comprehended at the time. The Primitive Methodists have preserved all the doctrines of Wesleyan Methodism, and most of its characteristic features in discipline, and differ from it chiefly in the greater scope which they give to the zeal and earnestness of their ministers, and in the recognition of the full parity of the laymen. They prosecute out-door preaching with great success, and even as late as 1875 two of their missionaries were arraigned before the magistrates at Chichester for preaching in the open air, but were discharged, because it was proved that they had done no wrong. Women are freely licensed to preach, and have given to the body some of its most effective preachers. Their British Conference includes a larger proportion of laymen than almost any other ecclesiastical body, being composed of two-thirds laymen and one-third ministers.

The church was introduced into Canada by emigrants from England, and afterwards into the United States. Hugh Bourne, its founder, visited America about 1844, and spent several years organizing and superintending the churches in Canada and the United States. He formed a church in the city of New York, of which he was for some time the pastor. Large congregations were attracted to his preaching.

In 1853 the parent church in Great Britain returned 1789 chapels, 3565 rooms rented as preaching-places, 568 traveling and 9564 local preachers, and 6767 class-leaders; in 1859 the number of traveling preachers had increased to 610, and 122,863 members were reported. The number of members in 1870 was 162,000. The Primitive Methodist Missionary Society was organized in 1843, when measures were taken for the care of the churches in the colonies and the United States, and returned for that year an income of about $4425. The receipts of the society have steadily increased, as follows: in 1849, $19,010; in 1856, $52,070; in 1863, $81,275; in 1869, $101,990; and in 1875, £45,234, or $226,170. The missionary committee claimed in the report for 1875, that the society had reached a position which entitled it to be regarded as one of the great missionary societies of the day, there being "but five missionary societies in Great Britain that raise as much as we for mission work, and only four societies in the world that employ as many agents." The missions are, however, rather domestic and colonial than actual foreign missions, being confined for the most part to the United Kingdom and the colonies, or to places which are in the neighborhood of British stations. In 1875 the society had 67 home missions in England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, on which 137 missionaries were employed; 42 stations, 21 of which were missions, with 22 missionaries, in South Australia, Victoria, and Tasmania; 20 stations, with 22 missionaries, in New South Wales and Queensland; 9 stations, 10 missionaries, and 642 members in New Zealand; 64 stations, with 79 preachers, in Canada; 4 stations, with 7 missionaries, in Africa; in all, 176 stations and 277 missionaries. The principal African stations are at Alinal, North, South Africa, and in the island of Fernando Po, West Africa. A mission was opened among the aborigines of Queensland in 1871, and the Canadian missions were pushed to Manitoba in 1875.

The statistics of the British Church for 1877 are as follows: number of ministers, 1120; of lay members, 180,634; of local preachers, 15,402; of class-leaders, 10,309; of connectional chapels, 4153; of Sunday-schools, 3855; with 55,646 teachers and 347,961 scholars. The colonial returns are included in these reports. The church has a college at Elmfield and a theological institution; and measures were begun in 1875 to establish a school for young women.

The Canadian Conference was formed in 1843. It is dependent upon the British Conference, and generally has for its president a member of the latter body designated by it. The question of organic union with the other Methodist bodies of the Dominion was discussed in the Conference from 1872 to 1875. In the former year a committee was appointed to draw up for the consideration of a succeeding Conference such a basis of union as it was judged would be acceptable to the church, but it was expressly stipulated that no negotiations should be entered into with other bodies without the consent of the church in England. In 1875 the Conference decided that a basis of union to be acceptable to it should admit an equal number of laymen with ministers in all church courts, and give them equal rights with ministers to take part in the business of such courts; and should also provide that all business meetings should be allowed to elect their own chairmen, and elect quarterly meetings to nominate their own officers. Up to this time the discussion of the subject of union had caused some agitation in the church, which was given especial notice in the proceedings of the parent body. The negotiations were shortly afterwards dropped, and are no longer mentioned. The following are the statistics of the Conference for 1877: number of itinerant ministers, 91; of local preachers, 284; of members, 8008; of churches, 216, valued at $349,225; of parsonages, 36; of Sunday-schools, 140, with 1211 teachers and 8725 scholars.

The Primitive Methodist Church has not found as favorable a field for growth in the United States as in Great Britain and the colonies. Its progress has been slow, and its churches are spread over a limited territory. The first Conference was formed in 1844, and reported, in 1865, 20 traveling preachers, more than 2000 members, 42 Sunday-schools, with 3018 teachers and scholars, 14 parsonages, and 36 churches, valued at $42,200. The Conference of 1866 voted favorably to the union of non-Episcopal Methodists, which was proposed at the time. It being found advisable to discontinue the magazine which had been published till that time, the American Wesleyan was recommended as a suitable paper to be taken in its stead. The Eastern Conference was formed in 1872, when the old Conference took the name of the Western Primitive Methodist Conference. The text of church-membership adopted by the Conference requires the profession of religion, attendance at class-meetings, or regular attendance upon the means of grace, and the support of the cause of God. The equality of ministers and laymen is fully recognized, both in the constitution of the Conference and in eligibility to offices. The two Conferences have no direct connection with each other, or with any other body, although the churches are accustomed to receive visitations from the delegates appointed to the British Conference.

The churches of the Western Conference are situated mainly in Southwestern Wisconsin and Northwestern Illinois, Mineral Point, Wis., being the principal point. The churches of the Eastern Conference are chiefly in Pennsylvania. The largest churches in this Conference, in order, are at Brooklyn, N. Y., St. Clair and Plymouth, Pa., Steubenville, O., Mahanoy City and Girardville, Pa. The Eastern Conference reported, in 1877, 18 itinerant preachers, 82 local preachers, 77 class-leaders, 1754 members, 33 churches, 38 Sunday-schools, with 581 officers and teachers, and 3361 scholars, showing an increase within the year of 249 members. The Western Conference reported 15 itinerant ministers and 1578 members. The whole connection includes 33 itinerant ministers, 3332 members, and between 6000 and 7000 Sunday-school scholars.

The church in Great Britain is represented by two monthly magazines published in London and one in Dublin, the weekly Primitive Methodist newspaper and the Teachers' Assistant, and in Canada by the Christian Journal, a weekly paper published at Toronto. A newspaper, the Christian Patriot, was, until recently, published at Mineral Point, Wis.

Round Lake Camp-Ground is located on the Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad, 12 miles north of Saratoga Springs, and 18 miles north of Troy, N. Y. It has about 200 acres, and is tastefully laid out in lots, streets, avenues, parks, and lawns. It has a splendid well of mineral water, distinguished for its remedial qualities; has a commodious hotel, barns, freight and passenger depots, and is supplied with spring-water in all parts by hydrants. It is named from a beautiful lake near the ground, about one mile in diameter, bountifully stocked with a good variety of fish, and which furnishes boating and bathing. It was originated in 1868, by Joseph Hillman, Esq., of Troy, N. Y., associated with several laymen and clergymen of the Troy Conference, and was duly incorporated by the legislature of New York. It is said by tourists and others to be one of the best-arranged and shaded grounds in the world. It has forty-six varieties of trees,—pine, maple, hemlock, beech, etc. The first meeting began Sept. 1, 1868, and the ground was dedicated at the time by Dr. (now Bishop) Peck. Two hundred conversions were reported. Two national camp-meetings for the promotion of holiness have been held; two State meetings; three fraternal, one union evangelistic, and ten Conference camp-meetings. An important movement for the unity of American Methodism was inaugurated by Mr. Hillman, its president, and the first fraternal meeting was held in 1875; the second in 1876. These were attended by large representations from the various branches of Methodism in the United States and Canada, and several were present from England, Ireland, Australia, and India.

Saco, Me. (pop. 5575), is a manufacturing town on the Saco River. It does not appear by name until 1828, after which it was merged in Scarborough. In 1833 it re-appears, and it included Biddeford until 1842. Its growth since that period has been slow. In 1876 it reported 267 members, 167 Sunday-school scholars, and church property valued at $2000. Orchard Beach camp-ground is in its vicinity.

Sansom, James Green, was born in Bedford, Pa., May 13, 1794. When about seventeen, he entered a school of high grade and applied himself diligently to study. Though educated a Presbyterian, he was awakened and converted during Methodist services, and united with the M. E. Church. In 1819 he was received into the Baltimore Conference, and at the formation of the Pittsburgh Conference in 1824 was within its bounds. For a period of forty-two years he was an earnest and successful minister. He filled many of the leading stations, and was presiding elder at different periods for eighteen years. He was so laborious that he preached on an average 200 sermons and traveled 2000 miles annually. Always interesting, he was sometimes exceedingly eloquent and powerful. He had a voice of great sweetness and compass, and was instrumental in the conversion of many. He died in Brownsville, Pa., May 4, 1861.

Sargent, Thomas Fraser, M.D., an eminent minister, was born in Frederick Co., Md., April 10, 1776. In 1793 he was converted, and united with the M. E. Church. When he located in 1813, he entered on the practice of medicine, and for nineteen years, in Philadelphia, followed his profession. He also took an active part in ministerial labor. He was a manager of the Philadelphia

Sasnett, William Jeremiah, D.D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, was born in Hancock Co., Ga., April 29, 1820, and graduated at Oglethorpe University in 1839. He studied law, but abandoned it for the work of the ministry, and entered the itinerant work. Severely affected with rheumatism, he found it impracticable to travel as a preacher, and in 1849 he accepted the chair of English Literature in Emory College. In 1858 he was called to the presidency of La Grange Female College, but the following year accepted the presidency of East Alabama College. The occurrence of the war injuring the institution, he retired to his farm in Georgia, where he spent his time in superintending his temporal interests and preaching the gospel to the needy in his neighborhood, until his death, Nov. 3, 1865. His scholarship was varied and extensive. In 1853 he published a work on "Progress," in 1860 a work on "Discussions in Literature," and has been a prolific writer for the press. "He was a powerful preacher, a great debater, and a devout Christian."

At the first session of the general assembly of Ohio he was elected secretary of the Senate, which office he held until 1809, when he was elected one of the judges of the supreme court, and the following year was re-elected and commissioned chief judge, which office he held until 1815, when he resumed the practice of law. The same year he was elected a representative to the legislature, and in 1822 was one of the board to review the laws of the State. In 1829 he was appointed register of the land office at Chillicothe, which office he held until 1845. He was a man of superior qualifications, and was a firm adherent and friend of the M. E. Church.

He became superintendent of the Sunday-school, class-leader, licensed exhorter, and local preacher in 1825, and was ordained in 1829, being the first white West Indian who became a Methodist preacher. He then removed to the United States, and shortly afterwards joined the Oneida Conference of the M. E. Church. He was appointed missionary to the Oneida Indians in 1833, and missionary to Liberia in 1834. Having fully established the mission in Liberia, he returned to the United States in 1841. He has been for a number of years one of the presiding elders in the China mission, and has depended wholly on his charges for support, not receiving any missionary funds. Taylor, Edward T., generally known as "Father Taylor," or "the Sailor Preacher," of Boston, was born in Virginia about 1793, and died in Boston, Mass., April 5, 1871. He was a sailor, and being in Boston in 1811, was attracted, while passing along the street, to an evening service held in the Bromfield Street church, under the Rev. Elijah Hedding, afterwards bishop. He crawled in through the window to the meeting, was brought under conviction and converted. He having afterwards sailed on a privateer, the vessel was captured, and he was taken a prisoner to Halifax, Nova Scotia, where he received the care of a lady visiting the prison, a member of the Bromfield Street church, Boston. After his liberation he went to Saugus, Mass., and began to preach. He was licensed to preach in 1815, and joined the New England Conference of the M. E. Church in 1819. He filled various appointments in this Conference till 1849, when he was stationed as a mariner's preacher at Boston. He was re-appointed to this station for forty-three years in succession till his death. His fame as an eloquent preacher and an earnest laborer among the masses became as wide as the English-speaking world. The "Bethel" was visited by travelers from all lands sojourning in Boston, and one of the most interesting chapters in Dickens's "American Notes" is devoted to the description of his eloquence and work. His usefulness was recognized by the general public, when, in 1833, the merchants of Boston built for him the Bethel in Brattle Square, which was the scene of the most of his career.

Taylor, William, of the South India Conference, was born May 2, 1821, in Rockbridge, Va.; was converted and united with the M. E. Church in 1841, and was received into the Baltimore Conference in 1843, having traveled a circuit the previous year under the presiding elder. In 1849 he went as a missionary to California, and organized the first Methodist church in San Francisco. In 1856 he engaged in evangelistic work, and spent five years in the Eastern States and Canada. In 1862 he left America for Australia, spending several months in England and Ireland, and visiting Palestine. He commenced his work in Australia in June, 1863, and labored there for two years and eight months, performing a remarkable work in Australia, Tasmania, and Ceylon, and the official reports show a very large increase in membership. During a second visit large numbers were added to the church; thence he went to Africa, and preached in Cape Colony, Kaffraria, and Natal, where large additions were reported both among the colonists and natives; thence he visited England, spending eleven months in sixteen different chapels in London. In 1870 he visited India, and labored a year and a half in Ceylon and India with the missionaries of different denominations, and in 1871 commenced a separate work, which has been remarkable in its character as being self-supporting, and has laid the foundation for the South India Conference, the members of which rely wholly on the contributions which are made in their respective fields. Returning to the United States, he preached extensively in behalf of the work in India, securing means to send out additional missionaries, and is now (1878) visiting Chili and Peru.

Tingley, Jeremiah, Ph.D., of Alleghany College, was born in Cadiz, O., in 1826. He was educated in Indiana Asbury University, and graduated in 1850. After teaching some time in a female seminary, he was elected Professor of Chemistry and Natural Science in Alleghany College, Pa., where he still remains. He arranged chiefly the large collection in natural history belonging to the college. He visited Europe in 1877.

Tingley, Joseph, Ph.D., Professor of Natural Science in the Indiana Asbury University, was born in Cadiz, O., in 1822. At an early age he united with the M. E. Church, and pursued his studies in Alleghany College, and in the Indiana Asbury University, where he graduated in 1846. After serving as tutor, he was elected, in 1849, Professor of Natural Science, which position he still holds, having also served occasionally as acting president of the institution. He has delivered a number of scientific and experimental lectures.

Torrence, Irvin H., D.D., secretary of the Pennsylvania Bible Society, was born Feb. 24, 1821, in Lancaster City, Pa., of Scotch-Irish parents. He united with the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1838, and was received into the Baltimore Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1843. At the division of the Conference he became a member of the East Baltimore Conference, and on its re-arrangement, a member of the Central Pennsylvania Conference. After filling a number of important charges, he was appointed secretary of the Pennsylvania Bible Society in 1851, in which position he still (1878) remains. He has served as a representative to both the Canada and British Bible Societies.

Townsend, Luther Tracy, D.D., was born at Orino, Penobscot Co., Me., Sept. 27, 1838. Having graduated at Dartmouth College in 1859, he studied theology at Andover, graduating in 1862. In the same year he was admitted into the New England Conference, and the following year was transferred to New Hampshire. He served as adjutant in the army in 1863-64, and was elected, in 1869, Professor of Practical Theology in the Boston University, the position which he still holds. He has published a number of works, among which are "Credo," "Sword and Garment," "Lost Forever," and "Outlines of Theology."

Turner, Curtis F., of the Philadelphia Conference, was born in Sussex Co., Del., in October, 1838, and joined the M. E. Church in his fifteenth year. He was licensed to preach in 1846, and read medicine, intending to pursue that profession, but, feeling called to the ministry, entered the Philadelphia Conference in 1848. He has filled a number of the leading appointments, and was presiding elder on the Susquehanna district from 1873 to 1877. He served as delegate to the General Conference of 1876.

V.

Van Cortland, Pierre, formerly lieutenant-governor of New York, was born in New York City, Jan. 10, 1721, and was the possessor of a large manor, which originally consisted of 83,000 acres. He was an ardent friend of the republic during the Revolutionary War, and such men as George Washington, Benjamin Franklin, and George Clinton were frequent visitors at his house. His daughter, Catharine, afterwards Mrs. Van Wyck, was converted under a sermon by Woolman Hickson, and, uniting with the church, introduced Methodism into the family. Governor Van Cortland early identified himself with its interests. His house was a preaching-place until he gave the land and erected a house of worship upon it. It is one of the most splendid sites for a church in America. From the piazza of his house Whitefield preached to listening hundreds, and Bishop Asbury, Freeborn Gar-rettson, and other early preachers found a hearty welcome in his hospitable abode. In 1804 the first camp-meeting east of the Hudson River was held in Carmel, Putnam Co., N. Y. Governor Van Cortland and his family attended it, and the presiding elder having applied for a grove on his land, he readily offered it, saying, "I have seen all this grove grow up, and have been solicited to cut down the trees because of the goodness of the soil, yet I have never consented to it; nor could I tell why till your application for it solved the mystery. It seems as if it is from the Lord." In this grove camp-meetings were held annually until 1831. While the governor lived, he and his family were constant attendants, and remarkable spiritual influences accompanied many of the meetings. He died calmly and triumphantly May 1, 1814.

W.

Walton, Hon. Joseph, is a native of Pennsylvania, and resident chiefly of Pittsburgh, where he has been engaged in mining and merchandising in coal, chiefly for Southern markets. He is largely identified with banking and other corporate institutions, and has acquired considerable wealth. For some years he was representative in the Pennsylvania legislature. He has held many trusts of honor in the community, as well as in the M. E. Church, of which he is a devoted member, and whose interests he generously sustains.

Wentworth, Anna (née Lewis), was born in West Chester, Pa., June, 1829, and united with the church in her fourteenth year. She was educated in the Wilmington Female Seminary, and delivered the valedictory address in 1846. She was married in 1854 to Dr. Wentworth, and sailed with him as a missionary to China, Jan. 8, 1855, but had scarcely commenced her labors in that distant land when she died in October of that year. She was a woman of superior mental power, fine culture, and deep devotion, and gave her life to the cause of missions.

Western Virginia Conference, M. E. Church South, was organized in 1850, and includes "all that part of Western Virginia not embraced in the Baltimore and Holston Conferences, and that part of Kentucky included in Guyandotte district, and in the Prestonburg, Piketon, and Big Sandy circuits." Its statistics, as reported in 1875, were: 60 traveling and 133 local preachers, 13,208 members, and 7925 Sunday-school scholars.

Wilbur, James H., missionary to Indians in Oregon and Washington Territory, widely known as "Father Wilbur," joined the Black River Conference in 1842. He was appointed missionary to Oregon in 1847, and on his way to his new field of labor traveled in company with the Rev. William Roberts, superintendent of the Oregon district, visiting several times in California, and assisted Mr. Roberts in organizing the first Sunday-school and class in San Francisco. He was appointed to the Portland and Columbia River district, then, in 1852, to Yam Hill. In 1853 he was designated as superintendent of the work in Southern Oregon, after which he served as a presiding elder till 1861, when he was appointed to the Indian Reserve in the Yakima district, where his subsequent labors have been performed. He has identified himself with the true interests of the Indians, and has so sought to promote their welfare and advancement as to have gained their confidence and acquired great influence among them. The reports speak frequently of the prosperity of this mission, which, in 1873, had an organized church of 450 members, with native preachers, and was a "wonderful success."

Wiley, Philander, professor in Indiana Asbury University, is a son of the late Allen Wiley, D.D. He was graduated from Indiana Asbury University in 1843, joined the Northwest Indiana Conference in 1852, and was elected Professor of Greek in Indiana Asbury University, a position he still holds.

Williams, John, D.D., born in England, Aug. 10, 1820, was converted near Newcastle-upon-Tyne in 1843, and soon after became a local preacher. He emigrated to America in 1853, and joined the Pittsburgh Conference in 1854. He has filled appointments in Uniontown, Johnstown, Steubenville, Alleghany, and Pittsburgh, and has been twelve years presiding elder. He is a trustee in Scio College, and was a delegate to the General Conference of 1872. He served for one term on the general book committee; and was one of the editors of The Methodist Preacher, a monthly magazine.

Williams, Samuel, Esq., was born in Carlisle,

Pa., Oct. 16, 1786, and died in Cincinnati, Feb. 3, 1859. Most of his life was passed in Ohio. During the War of 1812 he served in two campaigns. He then became connected with the General Land-Office in Washington City, and largely assisted in saving the archives of the office when the public buildings were burned by the British in 1814. After that date, until 1844, he was chief clerk in the office of the surveyor-general of the Northwest, first in Chillicothe, and afterwards in Cincinnati, where he lived more than thirty years. It was under his oversight for this long period that the government surveys were planned and conducted in Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Iowa.

Mr. Williams was a man of much reading and general information. His library was large, and his acquaintance with Methodist history and theology was extensive and accurate, and he wielded a vigorous pen. He wrote much, on scientific subjects, for Niles' Register and Sittiman's Journal, and on religious and literary subjects for The Methodist Magazine, Ladies' Repository, and the church papers. A Methodist for sixty years, he was ever loyal to the church and earnest in the promotion of its interests. From him came the original suggestion for the publication of the Methodist Almanac (1832), and of the Ladies' Repository (1840). He was the father of the Ohio Methodist Historical Society, the first of the kind in the church; and was one of the founders and a life-long trustee of the Wesleyan Female College in Cincinnati, and of the Ohio Wesleyan University, at Delaware, O.

Williams, William G., LL.D., was born in Chillicothe, O., Feb. 22, 1822. He graduated at Woodward College, Cincinnati, in 1844; and, the same year, upon the organization of the Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, O., he was appointed to a position in the faculty. With this institution he has remained connected for thirty-four years; and is now the only one left of the original faculty. In 1847 he became Adjunct Professor of Ancient Languages, and in 1850 Professor of Greek and Latin Languages and Literature. In 1864 the chair was divided. He now holds the position of Wright-Professor of Greek Language and Literature, and Chrisman-Professor of Hebrew Language and Literature. In 1856, Professor Williams became a member of the Central Ohio Conference, of which body he has been secretary for eighteen years. He served as chaplain of the 145th Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry during its period of service in the summer of 1864.

A BRIEF OUTLINE OF METHODIST BIBLIOGRAPHY.

THE following list of Methodist authors and books is not intended to be full; the space at my disposal would not permit the insertion of a complete list. Dr. Osborn's "Outlines of Wesleyan Bibliography" (London, 1869), although it is confined to the works of ministers, occupies more than two hundred pages. An exhaustive Bibliography of American Methodist Literature would fill as large or a larger work. It would be almost a hopeless task to collect the names of all the Methodist laymen who have been authors; their works are inscribed in the lists of all the larger publishing-houses, and have been issued from numerous local houses, book-stores, and printing-offices, without any marks to distinguish them from other authors, and their identity can be ascertained only by personal acquaintance. The number of sermons, addresses, and pamphlets published by clergymen as well as laymen, most of which have only a local currency, can hardly be estimated. The attempt is made in the following article to group the more important works of Methodist publication, so as to form a nucleus around which a more copious Bibliography may hereafter be arranged. The list of English books is a selection from the extensive list given by Dr. Osborn, with a few additions of works by laymen and later writers. Sermons and pamphlets are generally omitted.

They have also been published in a series of volumes of the 12mo size. They can be obtained either in the form in which the minutes for several years are collected into single volumes, or, at least for the later years, in separate volumes for each year.
A collection of the minutes of the Irish Conference from the first session, in 1752, was published by order of the Conference of 1863. It comprises, for the present, three volumes, bringing the record down to the year 1860.
The minutes of the affiliated Conferences are also published at the Colonial Conference offices, either in bound volumes or pamphlets. These works are all rich in materials for history, and contain satisfactory biographies of all ministers who have died members of the Conference.
The minutes of other Methodist bodies are published at their respective book-rooms, on a plan similar to that of the Wesleyan minutes.

Ministers.* Biographical Sketches of Eminent Itinerant.

Minutes of Conferences. The first collection of Minutes of Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church was published by John Dickins, in 1794. A second collection was published in 1813, by D. Hatt and T. Ware, book agents. Another edition was begun in 1840, and has been continued at intervals since, keeping in print a full account of the proceedings of all the Conferences to date. The Later Minutes form a convenient volume for each year, of about four hundred pages; or two of them bound together, as large a volume as it is convenient to use in the library.

The Minutes of the Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church South are likewise preserved in volumes of convenient size; and all of the Methodist Churches of the United States and Canada have provisions for publishing and preserving the proceedings of their Conferences, modeled upon the plan originally adopted by Mr. Wesley. These works are indispensable to the student of church history.

Missionary Reports. The earlier reports of the missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church are out of print. The later reports, forming pamphlets or bound volumes of from one hundred and fifty to two hundred pages, give current accounts of the condition and progress of the mission work of the church.
