Preface

THE WRITING of this volume has required more time than was anticipated. It is, however, in content the size of two ordinary volumes of this series. The author is reminded of the historian William Lovett's apologetic statement upon issuance—four years late—of his centennial history of the London Missionary Society. "Had he realized . . .," he said, "that the work would have demanded half the patient research, the weary plodding through letters, reports, books, and material of many kinds, and the prodigal expenditure of time it has required, he would never have dared to undertake it." His statement throws light on the time schedule of the present volume but it should also be said that the geographical spread of the missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, embracing as they did the American continent, much of Europe and of Latin America, a considerable expanse of Africa, and a great part of China, India, Malaya, Japan, and Korea, was much wider than that of the London Missionary Society.

During the years covered by this volume tremendous changes took place in the life of society. Spurred by the industrial revolution, the nation overhauled earlier patterns and forged ahead in an enlarged world of opportunities. During the four decades 1850-90 the national population increased from approximately twenty-three million to more than sixty-three million, almost a threefold increase. Owing to the immense immigration of peoples of widely diverse racial and cultural backgrounds the ethnic composition of the population was notably changed. The agricultural economy which had prevailed from the founding of the nation gave way to a dominant industrialism. Unprecedented developments in the physical sciences wrought far-reaching changes in cultural life. The application of the principles of historical criticism to the study of the Bible altered traditional patterns of religious thought and belief. In its membership the Methodist Episcopal Church more than kept pace with the growth of population registering almost a fourfold increase. These developments all profoundly affected the Church.

"Are our preachers as ready to pioneer the Western wilderness as were the men of other years? Is there as much of the spirit of self-sacrifice among them now as formerly?" With such questions as these the Missionary Society challenged the Church as it faced the task imposed by the rapidly changing conditions. Stephen Olin, one of the truly prophetic preachers of the time, saw “something fearfully ominous” in the prevailing situation and again and again lifted his voice in summons to the Church to face heroically its total missionary task.

Decade by decade as the period passed the home missions program was expanded until it gained immense proportions. Not less than six different types of missions were developed.

The Church's world outreach during the period of 1845-95 was amazing. In 1845 Liberia was the one overseas mission of the Church, the South America Mission having been practically abandoned in 1841-42. In 1895 the number of overseas Annual Conferences and Mission Conferences numbered twenty-four: in China, three; in India, five; in Europe, seven; in Africa, one; in South America, one; in Japan, one; in Korea, one; in Malaysia, one; in Mexico, one. The author has endeavored to portray the impressive stature of many of the missionaries, working against almost insuperable obstacles, with no precedents to guide them, no foundations laid by others on which to build and, particularly in the Orient, compelled to use languages which it took years to master. He has sought to describe graphically the complexity of the missionaries' task, involving not only preaching the Gospel but also building houses, chapels, and churches; founding and maintaining schools in which it was necessary that they and their wives in the beginning should do the teaching; healing the physical ills of the people, establishing dispensaries and eventually hospitals; planning the strategy of advance with the aim of finally occupying as large an area of the entire field as humanly possible; and, finally, placing the distinctive stamp of Methodism upon every phase of the program.

The author has not been content to accept uncritically the factual statements and evaluations of secondary sources. Every fact has been documented, in the large majority of cases from an original source. Every critical judgment has been based upon careful weighing of evidence. Limitation of space has made it impossible to include biographical sketches of all those who played a notable part in the great drama of mission history. Biographies of a few of the representative men and women of each mission were included, with the author's frank acknowledgment that data on others equally worthy of mention had to be omitted. As in the preceding volumes of the series, in many instances the author has let the missionaries speak for themselves. This has been done with the conviction that the words of their own mouths, and the description of events as they themselves saw them, add a degree of human interest to the narrative that could not be imparted in any other way.

What can the Church learn from its early missions? Do we know enough about the history of Methodist missions of yesterday to discern where possible mistakes may have been made? Was the foundation which was laid wholly of Christ and His teaching? Or was the message of the Gospel too narrowly conceived? Did missionaries purpose a too exact re-creation of the Church of the Western world? Was there any portion of truth in the old charge that the Church in the nineteenth century unthinkingly followed the flag in the era of a rapidly developing, socially blind industrialism; of a growing, increasingly dominant economic power; of a new imperialism, unconsciously contributing to the development throughout the world of a narrow nationalism? On the other hand, did some missionaries subscribe to and propagate "the conviction that in . . . extending the range of Western liberal culture and developing its assumptions they were in effect establishing on earth that which would grow into the Kingdom of God"? To what extent did they hold a too easy belief in man's ability to create by himself an ever better society, even to the extent of assuming that human society is keyed to a process of inevitable progress? All of these are questions which the history of missions should help us to answer and which, if answered, should aid the Church in avoiding mistakes of the past. The author ventures the hope that this volume will serve—besides use as a reference work—as a means of bringing to the ministry and laity of the Church a measure of clearer realization of the tremendous scope and difficulty of the Christian missionary task, and a challenge to deeper consecration and greater effort toward its fulfillment.

Acknowledgments

DURING THE YEARS this Volume has been under way the author has from time to time called upon the services of so many friends, interested persons, authorities, that all cannot be named, although each in some way contributed to his aim for complete accuracy in statement, an interesting narrative, and evaluation and interpretation of the sources. To all the missionaries, active and retired, who furnished him with materials of their own or of their parents—personal correspondence, diaries, and other records; clippings, newspapers, and out-of-print publications—he is forever indebted. But for these, it would have been impossible to picture the work in progress as accurately as has been done. Very often these invaluable records were preserved only because these individuals recognized the tremendous importance of primary documents, and in danger to life rescued their files through earthquake, fire, and alarm of war. To those especially who were in a position to visit at our office and came in expressly to read the manuscript and advise, he particularly wishes to say thanks. Among these are Dr. E. M. Moffatt, retired missionary of India, and August Klebsattel, retired missionary of Africa. On the China field we have had particular interest shown and cooperation from Mrs. Egerton H. Hart, Miss Grace Hart, Mrs. Stanley B. Reynolds, Dr. Harry L. Canright, Mrs. F. T. Brewster, Mrs. H. Olin Cady, Jacob F. Peat, and Frederick M. Pyke. Mrs. Elizabeth Bruere and Mrs. Ivan Prowattain supplied personal items for the India account. On the American scene J. H. Wenberg gave materials on the Oneida Indians. Mrs. Ernest Lyons proffered a tremendous collection of Oldham papers. L. R. Kipp offered help on Africa. The list is too long to mention the names of all those missionaries who supplied—following a general request for materials—their collections of pertinent data.

To those who gave unstintingly of their time in reading the manuscripts on various sections the author offers his grateful thanks. He cannot fail to mention the patient help of Miss Elizabeth M. Lee, Miss Henrietta Gibson, James K. Mathews, T. T. Brumbaugh, Earl R. Brown, and Frank T. Cartwright among others.

For special assistance in drafting the chapters on the foreign fields he must acknowledge the labors of many others. Charles W. Iglehart brought his intimate acquaintance with Japan into service in constructing the chapter on the Japan Mission. Arlow W. Anderson applied his wide knowledge of Norway and Denmark to the account of Methodist missions in those countries; and Henry C. Whyman gave like assistance on Sweden. Earl L. King rendered aid on the chapter on Africa; and Miss Florence Hooper helped substantially in the preparation of the section on Bulgaria. Mary E. Moxcey and Alfred D. Moore both contributed to the assembling and ordering of material for the account of Italy; and E. Leigh Mudge aided on the Germany and Switzerland section. Bishop Juan Pascoe from his close connection with the Mexico mission was able to supply primary sources for use in the history of that mission; and Franklin D. Cogswell worked indefatigably in aiding to draft the account of its development. Don Yoder assisted in organizing the South America source materials.

As always, one owes much to librarians and custodians everywhere. My gratitude can never be fully stated for the patient, untiring efforts of Miss Dorothy Woodruff, Librarian of the Board of Missions, in locating and obtaining source materials, in arranging loans of books, in checking data, and in many other ways. To her capable assistant, Mrs. Elsie Lund, a word of thanks must also be expressed. The cooperation of the librarians of Missionary Research Library, Union Theological Library, and Drew University Library must also be mentioned, as speeding our research and easing the burden of work.

Research for the present volume in the field of Woman's Work was begun by Mrs. Bonnie Schlosser Michaud and continued until the end of her tenure in November, 1951. Mrs. Otis Moore became a member of the staff in December, 1951, with special reference to Woman's Work. Her previous connection with the W. F. M. S., her intimate acquaintance with India missions, and her indefatigable energy made her service invaluable. In addition to extensive research she wrote the section in Chapter VII, as revised by the Author, on the Korea Mission.

Sincere and grateful appreciation is expressed to members of the office staff for their unvarying cooperation and diligent labors. Mrs. Elizabeth Schiffman as Editorial Assistant gave much valuable aid, especially through her close attention to the checking of data and annotation of references. Mrs. Noreen Barron Church, Researcher, in addition to research on most of the subjects treated in this volume, wrote the section on Germany and Switzerland missions as it appears in Chapter X, revised by the Author. Mrs. Ursula Colbourne Brecknell, Associate Historian and Editor, wrote the chapter on Africa missions in collaboration with the Author, and gave immeasurable aid in the preparation of the entire volume. She also bore the final responsibility for the assembling of the References and Notes and for the Index. Much help has also been received from a number of office assistants who have served on the staff from time to time.

The Changing Structure of American Society 1845-95

WITHIN THE HALF CENTURY 1845-95 changes of profound significance occurred in the life of State and Church in the United States, affecting every phase of the nation's existence. Immigration on an unprecedented scale phenomenally increased the population, notably modifying its ethnic composition. The prevailing agricultural economy of the country gave way to a dominant industrialism. Great cities arose, to become a principal factor in social, political, and commercial life. The national wealth vastly increased, great fortunes were accumulated by a few, and the general income level of the American people was substantially raised. Unprecedented developments in the physical sciences wrought far-reaching changes in the cultural life of society, and the application of the principles of historical criticism to the study of the Bible altered traditional patterns of religious thought and belief. In the name of Manifest Destiny a definite, ambitious expansionism emerged; and as the nineteenth century drew to its close the nation came to be recognized as a foremost world power.

The seventh federal census (1850) indicated a population of 23,191,876; the eleventh (1890), 62,622,250, almost a threefold increase.¹ In 1900, of the European nations only Russia exceeded the United States in number of people.

INCREASE OF CHURCH MEMBERSHIP

The period was characterized by rapid growth of the Churches. The proportion of church members in the total population increased from 22 to 34 per cent. Dorchester in his Christianity in the United States estimates the number of communicants of the Protestant Churches in 1850 at 3,529,988,* while Shaughnessy in Has the Immigrant Kept the Faith? calculates the Ro-

* Since statistics are not available for either 1845 or 1895 it is necessary to take for comparison 1850 and 1890. The seventh census (1850) did not make an enumeration of church communicants. This is Dorchester's estimate of the strength of the evangelical denominations. It is an incomplete calculation since in it he did not include the "non-evangelical bodies." Shaughnessy's estimate is of the "Catholic population." He says, "The Church . . . has never made any attempt to enumerate its followers other than by estimates of pastors and bishops. . . . Accordingly, in determining the actual Catholic population . . . recourse must be had to estimates, . . ."—Has the Immigrant Kept the Faith? . . . , p. 33.

man Catholic population for that year at 1,606,000, a total estimated church membership of 5,135,988, or one church member to 4.5 of the population.² In 1890 H. K. Carroll, who was director of the Division of Churches of the eleventh census, estimated Protestant communicants as 14,180,000, and the Roman Catholic population as 7,362,000, a total for both groups of 21,542,000.³

In the Conference year 1845-46, according to the Minutes of Annual Conferences, members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, not including probationers, numbered 644,299 *; Traveling Preachers, 3,280; Local Preachers, 4,935. In 1895 the membership in the United States and overseas totaled 2,454,645 full members, 312,011 probationers, 12,024 Traveling Preachers, and 14,896 Local Preachers, almost a fourfold increase. In 1845 the Church had one overseas Mission Conference, that in Liberia, with 837 church members. Fifty years later it had in foreign fields twenty-four Annual Conferences, Mission Conferences, and organized missions with 77,460 members, 59,208 probationary members, 726 Traveling Preachers (including missionaries who held their Conference membership in the Annual Conferences which they served), and 1,132 Local Preachers.†

As the period closed the Methodist Episcopal Church stood first in size among the Protestant denominations.‡ Adding the membership of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and Negro Methodists in Churches other than the Methodist Episcopal, the total Methodist membership was more than four and a half million. In number of local church Societies and houses of worship the Methodist Episcopal Church was also first. It was represented in every state and territory with the single exception of Alaska. Of the 2,790 counties in the United States and its territories it had organized Societies in all except 585—chiefly counties in the South where the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was represented. In seventeen states of the North it had Societies in every county.⁴ In 1886 the Secretaries of the Missionary Society declared that the growth of “missions and Conferences upon the frontier . . . has been without parallel.”⁵

THE GREAT IMMIGRATION

Of all the causes affecting growth of population and change in American society during the half century under consideration none was so spectacular, none so immediate in its effect upon the national character, and none so responsible for the complexity and difficulty of the Churches' missionary task as the tremendous influx of alien peoples. Although the migration of individuals and groups from one geographical area to another is as old as history no previous migration from one nation or continent to another equaled the immense flow of population from the countries of Europe to the United States during the second half of the nineteenth and the first two decades of the present century. In contrast with this, which came to be known as the Great Immigration, other migrations of ancient and modern times, measured numerically, pale into insignificance. Even the total emigration from Europe in the whole of the seventeenth century did not equal the number of European immigrants entering the United States in any one of several years between 1880 and 1910.⁶

* The Minutes for 1845-46 did not give the number of probationers.

† These statistics do not include the West China Mission.

‡ In 1850 also the Methodists were first in numbers. The three next largest Protestant groups, according to Dorchester's estimate, were the Baptists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists. In 1894 the first four denominations, numerically, were the Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, and Lutherans.—Daniel Dorchester, Christianity in the United States . . . , pp. 734 f., 744 ff.

By 1845 immigration had attained considerable proportions. In this year 114,371 persons entered the country. In 1846 the number increased to 154,416. In 1847 the total reached 234,968. In 1854 the maximum number for the ten years 1845-55 was recorded, 427,833. The oncoming of the Civil War acted as a brake on the movement, the incoming tide declining to less than 100,000 in 1861 and again in 1862. With the following year a gradual increase set in, rising to 318,568 in 1866, 352,768 in 1869, and the astonishing total of 459,803 in 1873. In a single week, that ending June 19, 1865, immigrant arrivals at the port of New York numbered 8,000. The depression of 1873-78 greatly retarded the flow but with improvement of business, immigration immediately increased, reaching in 1882 the unprecedented figure* of 788,992.⁷

In the decade 1845-55 the largest contribution to America's new population was made by Ireland. During these years Irish immigration not only surpassed that of any other country but almost equaled that of all others combined—more than a million and a quarter. By 1866 New York City, with a total population of 800,000, was estimated to have more than 200,000 inhabitants of Irish birth. Over a period of eight decades (1820-1900) the Irish immigration, second only to that of Germany, totaled more than four million. The forced emigration of Irish during the potato famine (1845-50) marked the beginning of large-scale transfer of paupers to America at the expense of foreign governments, a policy against which the United States finally found it necessary to pass restrictive legislation.⁸

Immigration from Germany, which had been in progress for many years,† was accentuated by the Revolution of 1848. From 1855 to 1900 it was greater than that of any other nationality. In the decade of the eighties, 1,452,970 Germans entered the United States, distributing themselves widely over the entire country. After 1852 the actuating influence was predominantly economic. Germans migrated principally in family groups, although as time went on a considerable portion of single persons made the venture on their individual initiative. Among the immigrants farmers, tradesmen, mechanics, and common laborers were chiefly represented.

* The all-time high in immigration was reached in 1907 when 1,285,349 immigrants arrived.—George M. Stephenson, A History of American Immigration, 1820-1924, p. 156.

† For the German population in the United States before 1800 see Vol. I of this series, pp. 273 f.

In the late forties, because of disturbed political conditions, Bohemian immigration became sizable.⁹

Immigration from the Scandinavian countries—Norway, Denmark, and Sweden—had scarcely begun previous to 1843, in which year a few more than one thousand immigrants arrived. By 1869 it had increased to 43,941 and in 1882 reached its highest point, 105,326. The twelfth census (1900) registered a Scandinavian population of 1,064,309 of foreign birth, and an additional 880,024 of foreign parentage. During the early decades the Scandinavians settled principally in Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa, later in Minnesota and the Dakotas.¹⁰

Previous to 1880 by far the largest proportion of the incoming host was composed of people closely related ethnically, and kindred in traditions, institutions, and customs to the original American colonists. The current of immigration from England, for example, continued to flow through the entire period, at varying rate from year to year, during the two decades 1870-90 more Englishmen crossing the Atlantic than Scandinavians. But beginning about 1880 the composition of the tide changed and a steadily increasing proportion of immigrants came from Austria-Hungary, Italy, Poland, and Russia.*

By 1894 the percentage from eastern Europe approximately equaled that from the western countries.¹¹

Immigration from Italy did not attain significant numbers until about 1880 and did not reach its height until after the turn of the century. In 1900 100,-135 Italians, including Sicilians and Sardinians, entered the United States. Increasingly, southern Italians, less enterprising and thrifty than the northern Italian stock, constituted the larger proportion of the immigrants. Of the former probably not less than 50 per cent were illiterate.¹²

About 1880 a mass invasion of New England by French Canadians got under way. For some years, beginning as early as 1860, only a few of these immigrants arrived annually. But as they were found adaptable to work in the mills and the need increased for more employees, the movement was stimulated by immigration agents sent to the provinces. The new element constituted approximately one-sixth of the foreign-born population of the New England states.

These which we have named were the chief components of the Great Immigration. But there were many more besides: Belgium, Holland, Portugal, Switzerland, France, Spain, Greece, Armenia, Persia, Syria, the Cape Verde, Azores, Canary, and Balearic Islands, British Honduras, Tasmania and New

* Of the foreign-born in the United States in 1900 11.33 per cent were from Slav nations (Russia, Hungary, Bohemia, Poland, and Finland); 4.67 per cent from Italy; and 1.17 per cent from Asiatic countries.—Prescott F. Hall, Immigration and Its Effects Upon the United States, pp. 38, 40.

Zealand, the East and West Indies, Puerto Rico and Cuba, Mexico, Central and South America; each and all supplied a quota.¹³

In the early decades of the half century many of the new peoples lived to themselves in large unassimilative blocs, steadfastly maintaining their customs and habits of thought and speech. Probably as many as one-third were illiterate. Few of any newspapers or books found their way into the homes of those who were able to read. These conditions contributed to a stratification which greatly complicated the processes of education and inculcation of democratic thought and action. On all these counts the incoming of these alien peoples in such vast numbers created new problems for American democracy. The ideals, principles, and procedures of American government were unfamiliar to them with the result that many lent themselves readily to the machinations of agents of political corruption and misrule.

A process of assimilation gradually got under way. However, even with the second and third generation, when superficial American ways of life had been acquired, multitudes still lacked sympathy with the earlier national spirit and the traditions with which the founding fathers and successive generations had been so deeply imbued.

PHENOMENAL GROWTH OF THE WEST

Of all regions of the country, the West was most affected by immigration. Since a large number of immigrants arrived at the ports of entry virtually penniless it was inevitable that they should congregate in the cities of the eastern seaboard, but for hundreds of thousands the height of ambition was to reach the fertile prairies of the newer sections of the country.

This western immigration was supplemented by extensive migration of farmers, agricultural workers, and small-town tradespeople from New England and other eastern states. America had long been considered to be economically a land of promise and this indeed for multitudes it had proven to be. But by 1845 the northeastern states had ceased to offer extensive opportunity for economic aggrandizement. The census of 1850 would report more than 50,000 paupers in the United States, almost all in the East and Northeast.¹⁴ In many sections continuous intensive cultivation of the land over a long period of time had seriously depleted the soil, much of which originally had been shallow and not well suited to agriculture. By the middle forties migration to the West of farmers and non-land-owning agricultural workers seeking more productive and cheaper farms was threatening the depopulation of hundreds of local communities.

Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri attracted tens of thousands of emigrants. Census reports indicate that not less than 150,000 people moved into Iowa during the decade ending in 1850. During the early fifties the rate of settlement increased, by 1854 becoming unprecedented. A contemporary writer reported:

For miles and miles, day after day, the prairies of Illinois are lined with cattle and wagons At a point beyond Peoria, during a single month, seventeen hundred and forty-three wagons had passed, and all for Iowa. Allowing five persons to a wagon, which is a fair average, would give 8,715 souls to the population.¹⁵

During the decade of the fifties the population of Illinois increased from 851,470 to 1,711,951, and Missouri from 682,044 to 1,182,012.¹⁶ Wisconsin also grew rapidly within these years. In 1848 a German settler wrote, "In New York every hotelkeeper and railroad agent, every one who was approached for advice, directed men to Wisconsin."¹⁷ The German immigration into the state reached high tide by 1854 but continued with considerable strength throughout the period. Second in number to the Germans were the Scandinavians—chiefly Norwegians. These were followed by other nationalities, including English, Irish, Scotch, Canadians, Bohemians, Poles, Dutch, Belgians, Finns, and Swiss. "By 1890 Wisconsin was surpassed only by Pennsylvania in the variety and solidarity of its groups of foreign-born folk."¹⁸

The population of Minnesota at the first federal census following its admission as a state in 1857 was 172,023. By 1870 it had increased to 439,706, of whom 161,000 were of foreign birth, in round numbers 59,000 Scandinavians, 41,000 Germans, 47,000 British and Irish.¹⁹

A new and different stimulus for migration to the region farther west was provided in 1854 in the passage by Congress of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill * which opened up Kansas for settlement, at the same time repealing the Missouri Compromise. In the intense political struggle, involving bitter conflict, passage of the measure was facilitated by a tacit understanding that Kansas would be settled by pro-slavery partisans and Nebraska left for settlement by Free Soil advocates.²⁰ The spreading abroad throughout the North and East of news of this compromise stirred abolitionists to aggressive action. A vigorous protest was signed by three thousand clergymen of various denominations, among them many Methodists. Active emigrant aid associations, formed to give financial assistance to anti-slavery emigrants, were organized in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and other states. Pro-slavery advocates were no less active in the South, although not as successful in enlisting recruits for emigration.²¹

By far the larger proportion of Kansas settlers, however, were people who came on their own initiative. Roads were thronged by incoming multitudes, approximately one-third from the South, two-thirds from New England and New York, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and other free states.²²

Both westward migration and foreign immigration received immense

* By the provisions of this bill, sponsored by Stephen A. Douglas of Illinois, the two new territories included the whole of the Indian country with the exception of that part which is now Oklahoma. In order that a way might be opened for the building of a transcontinental railway from Chicago to the far West Douglas was willing to dispossess the Indian tribes located in the area by government treaty and pay the South's price of vastly increasing slave territory in the North.—James Truslow Adams, The Epic of America, pp. 245 f.

stimulus from a series of legislative acts beginning with the homestead exemption laws of the early fifties. Before the close of 1852 twelve states had placed such laws upon their statute books. In the same year Congress passed a homestead bill considered to be generous in its provisions for acquiring land ownership.²³

Despite this legislation, in 1860 1,048,000,000 acres—more than half of the total national domain* (1,920,000,000 acres)—remained in the hands of government. Influenced by the land hunger of non-homeowners and expression of public opinion against large-scale purchase and holding of public lands by speculators the government in 1862 † abandoned the long-standing policy of attempting to obtain revenue through sale of the public domain and substituted that of granting free farms to settlers.²⁴ Throughout Europe, reaching millions of landless people, the word spread that in the new world a farm could be had for the asking. So great became the demand for farms that in the immediate post-Civil War years from five to seven million acres of public land were sold and granted away annually.²⁵ The outposts of homesteads at this time were bordered by a line through eastern Minnesota, Nebraska, and Kansas to the Indian Territory, then from its southern boundary running southwest into Texas. Beyond this line, exclusive of the Pacific coast, was a vast region of unoccupied land, the grazing ground of immense herds of buffalo, its possession claimed by powerful tribes of hostile Indians. Within its entire extent only isolated homesteads and widely scattered settlements had been established. But now, again, an immense migration got under way.‡

By 1870 Missouri, with a population of 1,721,295, had become the fourth state of the Union in size; St. Louis the fourth city. Nebraska, admitted as a state in 1867, had 122,993 people; Kansas, 364,399; the Territory of Colorado, 39,864.²⁶ By 1880 the total population of the four great grain states and territories—Kansas, Nebraska, Minnesota, and Dakota—had increased to nearly two and a half million people.§

* The national domain is the total area, land and water, embraced within the boundaries of the United States.

† The Homestead Law of 1862 made it possible for any person 21 years of age or older, a citizen of the United States, or one who had declared his purpose of acquiring citizenship, to occupy and cultivate surveyed land to the extent of 160 acres and, completing 5 years' occupancy, to become its owner by paying an entry fee of $10. Later the Homestead Act was further liberalized and extended. "In 1870 veterans of the Civil War were permitted to count their term of service against the five years' residence . . . The Pre-emption Act, which was not repealed until 1891, permitted a homesteader to purchase an additional 160 acres at the minimum price of $1.25 an acre. . . . [Later acts] . . . liberalized residence or purchase requirements and enlarged the size of the tract that might be acquired."—Ernest L. Bogart and Donald L. Kemmerer, Economic History of the American People, p. 439; see also Ellis Paxson Oberholtzer, A History of the United States Since the Civil War, I, 277 f.

‡ In 1865, it was estimated, not less than five thousand teams a month crossed the plains into the Rocky Mountains and beyond. In five months, from March 1 to Aug. 10, 1865, 9,386 teams and 11,885 persons following the Platte route passed Fort Kearney, Neb.—Reports of Maj. Gen. Grenville M. Dodge in The War of the Rebellion: A Compilation of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Armies, Series I, Vol. XLVIII, Part 1, 342.

§ This population growth resulted in a phenomenal crop increase. While in Kansas the corn crop in 1860 had been 6,000,000 bushels, in 1880 it was over 100,000,000, Minnesota, which in 1860 had grown 2,000,000 bushels of wheat, in 1880 grew 34,000,000. Dakota's wheat production in 1860 was a paltry 1,000 bushels; in 1880 it was almost 3,000,000 and ten years later (now represented by two states) 42,944,503.—U. S. Eighth Census, Agriculture, pp. xlvi, xxix; U. S. Tenth Census, Agriculture, p. 177; U. S. Eleventh Census, Agriculture, p. 355.

The first American immigration into California had begun in 1826. Great impetus was given by the discovery of gold in 1848. The mining industry predominated until 1860 when agriculture and fruit growing began to compete with it, stimulating increase of population and filling up the vast vacant spaces.* A large number of the settlers came from the older agricultural states. In 1850 California was received into the Union. Before the decade of the seventies had closed it had become one of the leading states in wheat growing and in production of wool. Gradually large-scale agriculture gave way to fruit growing as a dominant interest.²⁷

Oregon in 1859 entered the Union with a population of 52,465, increasing in the next ten years to 90,923, of which a large portion were native-born, a condition that continued throughout the period.²⁸ Immigration was chiefly from the states of the Midwest and Ohio, New York, and Pennsylvania.

Not until 1889 was Washington admitted as a state. The population of the territory in 1860 was only 11,594 and rapid growth did not come until the decades of the eighties and nineties with an increase from 75,116, including Indians, in 1880, to 349,390 in 1890, to 518,103 in 1900.† Montana likewise was admitted to statehood in 1889, followed in 1890 by Idaho and Wyoming. In each of the three a large majority of the population, as in Washington, were native-born Americans. Of emigrants from other states a large portion came from Iowa, Nebraska, Illinois, and Missouri.²⁹

Immigration to the frontier states was stimulated by official state agencies. Everywhere the need for more post offices and schools, improved roads, nearby markets, and branch-line railroads was keenly felt but without more people none of these could be had. Men of rugged physique and physical endurance, inured to hard labor, were required to break up the prairie sod, clear off the underbrush, drain the marshes, work the mines, and furnish a common labor supply for the many hard jobs incident to pioneer life. While migration from the states of the East, and the central West such as Ohio and Indiana, continued and the stream of foreign immigration also was continuous, there was still much unoccupied land. Yet more settlers and more laborers were needed. Immigration was the quickest and the only sure method of increasing the adult population. In this situation Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, and other states established agencies which sent representatives to European countries to recruit immigrants.³⁰ As one result of these efforts, so many Norwegians, Swedes, and Danes were drawn to the northwestern states as almost to make of them a new Scandinavia.

* Phenomenal growth occurred in California between 1880 and 1890, the population increasing from 864,694 to 1,208,130. Of European nations Great Britain and Ireland, Germany, Italy, France, Sweden, Portugal, and Switzerland, in the order named, contributed the largest number of immigrants.—U. S. Eleventh Census, Population, Part I, pp. 2, 606 ff.

† Of Washington's population in 1900 by far the largest segment (406,739) was native-born. These were contributed by many states, more than 16,000 each by Illinois, Iowa, New York, Oregon, Minnesota, Ohio, Missouri, and Wisconsin. Of the 111,364 foreign-born the largest totals were in order, English-Canadians, Germans, Swedes, English, Norwegians, and Irish.—U. S. Twelfth Census, Population, Part I, cxxxi, cxlv, clxxiii f.

The influx of new peoples during these years could not do other than challenge the attention of the missionary organizations of the Churches. The Methodist Missionary Society in its report for 1880 said:

The immigrant arrivals at the port of New York for 1880 were nearly treble the number for 1879, being over three hundred thousand . . . Seventy-five per cent of these immigrants now make their way at once to the West for agricultural pursuits. It has been said that out of all the arrivals from Germany at the port of New York, scarcely more than twenty families were uncertain as to their destination. . . . In the heart of every intelligent Christian an intense interest will be awakened to see that the Church does its duty toward these stalwart and self-helpful strangers who come in such numbers to join themselves to our body politic.³¹

So great was the inflowing tide during the closing decade and a half of the period that before its end not less than one in five persons "in the Great West was foreign-born." During the decade 1880-90 Nebraska doubled its population; Kansas increased from a million to a million and a half; Idaho multiplied its people two and a half and Wyoming almost three times. A great new inland empire had come into being within a generation. By 1895 the frontier had at last disappeared. The census of 1890 stated that the unsettled area "has been so broken into by isolated bodies of settlement that there can hardly be said to be a frontier line."³²

ORIENTAL IMMIGRATION

A distinctive phase of the Great Immigration was the incoming to the United States—principally to the Pacific coast—of Oriental peoples. The first to come in any considerable number were the Chinese. The news of discovery of gold in California in January, 1848, reached Hong Kong in the spring of that year, creating no little excitement. Ready facilities for emigration were at hand and almost immediately emigrants were upon their way, most of them young, thrifty, and industrious peasants from villages and country districts adjacent to Hong Kong. Landing at San Francisco, they at first mingled with the multitudes of incoming prospectors from the central and eastern states, Mexico, South America, and France. The gold rush created a need for more laborers, carpenters, gardeners, and cooks, and because of this acute shortage the unobtrusive, reticent, diligent, and adaptable Chinese were welcomed. When word of chance for ready employment and of opportunity for establishing laundries and restaurants reached China, emigration rapidly increased. An estimate of the California population made sometime about 1853 included 17,000 Chinese.³³

Fierce competition in the mining camps soon developed, resulting in strong anti-foreign hostility which was given expression in expulsion from them of all aliens, Mexicans, South Americans, and French, as well as Chinese. In 1852 a San Francisco correspondent of the Christian Advocate wrote:

Chinese immigration seems to be the great exciting topic in our State at present. The miners manifest a determination not to permit them to work in the mines, and as thousands of them are still flocking here, no one knows what will be the result. They are perfectly peaceable . . . The people complain of them not because they are disorderly, but because they expend almost nothing, and design to take all the gold they get out of the country. It is also contended, if there is not a stop put to this immigration, this country will be overrun with them.³⁴

Within a few years discrimination took numerous forms—for example, imposition of special taxes, and exclusion from the ballot, the witness stand, and finally from hospitals and the public schools. Nor was this all.

In addition to these discriminations there . . . [was] a tally of physical persecution and intimidation, which however incomplete, discloses even more the lawless and inhuman spirit of the times. It would be impossible to estimate the number of victims unrecorded, who were driven from their claims, robbed, maltreated and murdered.³⁵

Internal forces were in conflict. Although on economic grounds every effort was being made to discourage Chinese immigration, yet when laborers were required for the building of the Central Pacific Railway its promoters imported Chinese, by the close of 1866 a total of ten thousand.³⁶ Furthermore, the insistence of the United States on the right of admission of its citizens into China for purposes of trade motivated the enactment of the Burlingame Treaty of 1868 which recognized the right of free migration.* While this treaty operated to the commercial advantage of the United States it had little effect on local attitudes and acts in California. Intensified, systematic persecution continued, much of it in connection with political campaigns and with agitation by white workingmen's organizations.³⁷ The "California Senate Address and Memorial (1876)" † was largely influential in the enactment in 1882 of a federal Restriction Act imposing a ten-year suspension of Chinese immigration.³⁸ Subsequent legislation added to the restrictions of the original law. Martin C. Briggs, veteran Methodist missionary, pronounced the Act "a crowning infamy." Although both political parties claimed the dishonor of its passage many "far-seeing citizens," Briggs stated, "never approved it, and many who hastily endorsed the measure . . . [later were] convinced of their error."³⁹ The census of 1890 recorded a Chinese population of 107,475 in the United States. Thereafter the number gradually lessened.

* Article V of the treaty read: "The United States of America and the Emperor of China cordially recognize the inherent and inalienable right of man to change his home and allegiance, and also the mutual advantage of free migration and emigration of their citizens and subjects respectively, from the one country to the other, for the purposes of curiosity, of trade or as permanent residents."—As quoted by Richmond Mayo-Smith, Emigration and Immigration . . . , p. 229.

† Although this document purported to be the report of an official state Senate investigation it "might as well have been written," says Mary Roberts Coolidge, "without taking any testimony at all; for in order to produce an anti-Chinese report the committee ignored, emasculated or falsified most of the competent testimony, preferring in matters of religion the opinion of police officers to those of missionaries; on the subject of manufacture, the opinions of police officers to those of a large manufacturer; and again on the subject of coolie slavery, the opinions of city officials and policemen to those of persons who had lived many years in China."—Chinese Immigration, pp. 93 f.

Very few Japanese came to America previous to 1880. In the decade 1880-90 there were 2,270 arrivals and in the succeeding decade 20,826. Not all who came remained permanently, according to the census reports the number living in the United States being 2,039 in 1890.⁴⁰ As in the case of the Chinese, during the early years the Japanese were welcomed as immigrants since, with the cessation of Chinese immigration, demand for laborers increased, particularly for persons willing to work for low wages. Most of the arrivals were young men, students, merchants, farmers, artisans and laborers. At first the majority were employed as farm laborers or house servants. Some very soon leased land for small-scale farming or truck gardening. Within a short time much the same type of objection began to be raised against the Japanese as earlier toward the Chinese. By 1895 labor unions and others in California were voicing vehement antagonism and clamoring for exclusion.⁴¹

Immigration of other Oriental groups was very small. In 1890 there were only 2,143 immigrants from India, and 2,260 from other Asiatic countries, most of whom settled in the north Atlantic and north central states.⁴²

EFFECT OF IMMIGRATION ON CHURCH GROWTH

Immigration contributed in greater or less measure to the growth of all the Protestant Churches during the period 1845-95. Undoubtedly Methodism received reinforcement from incoming emigrants from the British Isles, particularly from England and Ireland—members of the Wesleyan Societies—although no dependable statistical estimate can be made.

Among immigrants there were many converts of the Methodist missions in Germany, Sweden, Norway, and Denmark. As early as 1852 reports began to appear in the Christian Advocate of pastors in various parts of the country receiving into membership persons who presented certificates of transfer from missions in Germany. A Presiding Elder reported fourteen persons having been received "into society from Saxony." The pastor of Morris Chapel, Cincinnati, wrote of receiving seventeen members by letters given in Germany. Similar reports continued to be made.⁴³ Conversely year-by-year accounts from the missions in Germany lamented the extent to which their Societies were weakened by emigration. L. S. Jacoby, reporting in 1854, stated:

At least two hundred members have emigrated to America since the commencement of the mission. . . . One whole class left, with the exception of one member, from the Frankfort mission, so that we had to give up that appointment entirely However, this emigration of our members hinders the extension of our work very much.⁴⁴

In the Conference year 1879, for the first year in the history of their mission, the Methodists of Germany sustained a net decrease of thirty in their membership, one of the principal factors being the emigration of their members to the United States. Similar reports of loss came from Sweden, Norway, and Denmark.⁴⁵

Of all religious groups in America the Roman Catholic Church received from immigration by far the largest reinforcement.* The immense number of immigrants from Ireland, Germany, and Italy, with a lesser number from France, Belgium, Austria, and other predominantly Catholic countries, vastly increased the Roman Catholic constituency, giving that Church in most of the large cities of the nation a numerical predominance over Protestantism, a religious situation which had never before prevailed. Roman Catholic churches in fifty principal cities of the United States, according to Dorchester, increased from 170 in 1850 to 959 in 1890; the number of priests from 336 to 2,196.⁴⁶ By 1890 the Roman Catholic population of four of the largest centers was: New York, 386,200; Brooklyn, 201,063; Philadelphia, 163,658; Chicago, 262,047.⁴⁷

For one year only, 1899, the federal immigration authorities compiled a record of the religious affiliation of immigrants. They were divided: Roman Catholic, 52.1 per cent; Protestants, 18.5 per cent; Jewish, 10.4 per cent; Greek Catholic, 4. per cent; Brahmins and Buddhists, 0.9 per cent; miscellaneous, 13.9 per cent. In this great disproportion of Catholic immigrants is to be seen the explanation of the more rapid growth of the Roman Catholic Church.⁴⁸

While the Great Immigration made large additions to the Protestant and Roman Catholic membership it also introduced into the United States numerous forms of religion and organized religious groups practically unknown before, including Buddhism, Mohammedanism, Hinduism, and Greek Catholicism. Since the Jews for the first time in American history became a sizable element Judaism took its place as one of the prominent religions of the nation. In every large city and in many of the small cities and towns Jewish religious societies were formed and synagogues built. According to a report made in 1854 there were in the United States ninety-seven organized Jewish congregations, of which thirty were in the state of New York. The 1890 census reported 533 Orthodox and Reformed Jewish congregations with 130,496 members.⁴⁹

THE NEW INDUSTRIALISM

Every phase of the national life during the latter half of the nineteenth century was affected by the new industrialism. The industrial revolution in America did not come in one year or in ten. It began early in the century, † made phenomenal progress in the first half of the third decade, encountered a temporary setback in the depression of 1837-41, gradually regained momentum, and received immense stimulus from the Civil War. Military operations required huge supplies of shoes, clothing, and munitions, while the necessity for prompt and efficient transportation of troops, war equipment, and supplies demanded the expansion, reconstruction, and re-equipment of the railways. Government contracts called for the building of new mills and factories and reconstruction of old plants, the installation of new and improved machinery, and the founding of great new industries. By the end of the war industry in the North had reached the highest point ever known and progress was to continue without interruption for eight years.

More cotton spindles were set revolving, more iron furnaces were lighted, more steel was made, more coal and copper were mined, more lumber was sawed and hewed, more houses and shops were constructed and more manufactories of different kinds were established than during any equal term in . . . [the nation's] history.⁵⁰

Between 1850 and 1900, while the nation's population increased threefold and the products of agriculture almost trebled in value, the number of wage earners was multiplied five times and the value of their product twelve times.

Postwar international expansion opened new domestic and foreign markets. The application of science and invention to many lines of manufacture reduced the costs of production, increased its volume, and expanded the use of numerous products. To these developments the seventies brought a rude interruption, a financial panic and industrial depression exceeding in its severity and sweep anything the country had ever known. Over a period of five years (1873-78) business failures totaled 47,000, causing a loss of more than a billion dollars, and throwing some three million workmen out of employment.⁵¹ The beginnings of revival appeared in 1876, when the nation's exports exceeded its imports, which had previously occurred only three times. From that year to the close of the century only in 1888, 1889, and 1894 did the nation purchase abroad more than was sold. Recovery was slow but the final effects were impressive.*

Again in 1893 industrial progress was halted by a disastrous depression, characterized by the same incidence of large-scale unemployment, paralysis of business and manufacturing, and acute human misery that had marked the panic of twenty years before. Coming after so brief an interval it was widely recognized as presenting serious challenge to American economic and political institutions, yet neither industry nor government was able to offer even elementary palliative or curative measures.

Despite economic crises, greater advance in making possible means of subsistence, adequate shelter, and abundance of clothing for all the people was made during the period 1865-95 than had taken place ever before within a single generation. The economist Edward Atkinson declared:

* By 1890 capital investments in mechanical and manufacturing industries had increased 546 per cent over 1860; the value of their products, 397 per cent; number of employees, 347.88 per cent; and total wages paid, 707.22 per cent over 1850.—Carroll D. Wright, The Industrial Evolution of the United States, pp. 160, 191.

There has never been in the history of civilization a period, or a place, or a section of the earth in which science and invention have worked such progress or have created such opportunity for material welfare as in these United States in the period which has elapsed since the end of the civil war.⁵²

THE NEW INDUSTRIALISM AND LABOR

By 1845, having partially recovered morale after the disastrous collapse of 1837-41,* labor had begun an attempt to rally its disorganized forces. Numerous workingmen's associations were formed in the East and North-east between 1845 and 1860. In 1866 the National Labor Union was organized and by 1870 there were some thirty national unions with a membership approaching three hundred thousand.† But advance in labor organization was seriously hindered by continuous incoming of immigrants, many of whom were skilled workmen, eager for employment under conditions against which American labor was rebelling.⁵³

Labor's struggle from 1845 to 1860 largely centered in an effort to secure reduction of the working day from twelve to ten hours. Mass meetings were held under the auspices of workingmen's associations in the larger industrial centers, re-established labor organs were active in agitation, Horace Greeley lent influential editorial support through the New York Tribune, and pressure was brought to bear upon state legislatures.‡ In 1853 eleven hours was authorized by many corporations as a compromise but by 1860 the ten-hour day prevailed in many factories. It was not until 1874, after twenty-nine years of agitation, that Massachusetts passed a law making ten hours the normal working day for women and children.⁵⁴

A second objective of organized labor—this throughout the half century—was a living wage. For common labor in railroad building until 1851—much of it done by Irish immigrants—the prevalent day rate was from 75 to 87.5 cents from sunrise to sunset. In 1851 the workers revolted and by rioting, strikes, and destruction of railroad property managed by the following year to increase their pay to one dollar. Unskilled laborers in the eastern cities were paid even less than men on the railroad construction gangs, many newly arrived immigrants as low as 65 cents a day.⁵⁵ Many factory operatives received somewhat higher pay. The average for employees of different types of mills* for the decade 1850-60 ranged from 87.3 cents per day for woolen-mill operatives and $1.03 for cotton-mill operatives to $2.96 for glassmakers. After forty years of protest, agitation, and continuous struggle the wage in 1880 for woolen-mill operatives was $1.24 and cotton-mill employees $1.40 per day while that of glassmakers actually suffered a reduction to $1.79.⁵⁶

‡ The response of the joint standing committee on manufactures of the Massachusetts Legislature of 1846 was typical. The committee maintained that if men had the strength and constitution to labor fourteen hours per day the state should not interfere; that the right of freedom of contract was sacrosanct; and that the less interference with business relations by law the better.—George E. McNeill, Ed., The Labor Movement . . ., pp. 107 f.

Such limited increase as labor had been able to gain was apparent rather than real. Carroll D. Wright, the United States Commissioner of Labor, 1885-1901, estimated that from 1860 to 1881 the average increase of all wages was about 31 per cent while prices rose about 41 per cent showing that as regards living costs the workingman was actually worse off in 1881 than in 1860.⁵⁷ Wage earners, Washington Gladden emphasized, were the one group to whom the new industrialism, in terms of material gains, was a disadvantage.

Other people, who do not labor with their hands, . . . the traders as a class, the professional people, the people on salaries, most of them, are able to live in a great deal better style now than they could afford a quarter of a century ago; while as for the capitalists and employers, they certainly show us many evidences of greatly increased wealth.⁵⁸

The most severe labor crisis the nation had ever known was precipitated by the depression of 1873-78. Inventions resulting in new types of machinery during and following the war displaced many thousands of workers. Reduced sales' demand closed hundreds of factories. Wage cuts were followed by lay-offs until between two and a quarter and three million people were unemployed. Strikes were without result other than to provoke blacklists and legal prosecutions. Hunger, destitution, and stark misery became widespread.⁵⁹ During the depression of 1883 William Godwin Moody reported:

To-day there is heard the wailing of great multitudes for work—for work that they may live. It comes from the strong and from the weak; from the skilled and from the unskilled; from the old and the young; from the cultured and from the un-cultured; from mothers and from daughters; from fathers and from sons; even from babes and infants of six and eight years. . . . The same want fills our streets with prostitution and crime; our insane asylums to overflowing, and our reformatories and penal institutions beyond their capacity.⁶⁰

Of approximately thirty strong national trade unions existing at the beginning of the depression only eight or nine remained at its close. However, an opposite effect was the growth to greater power and effectiveness of the unions which remained, notably the Noble Order of Knights of Labor, founded in 1869, which attained a maximum membership of 500,000 in 1886,

* The situation affecting other than factory labor during the same period was comparable. The pay of agricultural laborers advanced from an average of $1.01 for the ten-year period ending in 1860 to $1.31 per day in 1880, that of masons from $1.53 to $2.79, carpenters from $2.03 to $2.42.—C. D. Wright, op. cit., p. 218.

and the American Federation of Labor, organized in 1886 and still in existence.⁶¹

The professional vagabond or tramp first appeared in the United States as a result of the unemployment of 1873-78. Within these years tramps became an army in number—an evil that did not abate during the lifetime of their generation.*

WOMEN AND CHILDREN IN INDUSTRY AND TRADE

The industrial revolution greatly increased the number of women and children employed in manufacturing. Women from time immemorial had engaged in spinning and weaving and when machines began to be used in these operations it was a natural transition from the homes to the mills to spin and weave by power-driven machinery. Since women were readily employable at a lower wage than men, which made possible increased factory profits, their labor was in demand.† Soon other types of manufacturing establishments began to reach out for them. By 1820 women were employed in seventy-five different kinds of factories. By 1850 industries employing women had increased to approximately one hundred and seventy-five.‡ This same year “female employees” of all ages§ constituted 23.3 per cent of the total number of persons employed in manufacturing.⁶²

Throughout the half century the wage scale for women was absurdly, piteously low. In the decade 1845-55 women worked twelve hours for an incredible wage ranging from ten to twenty-five cents. # Forty years later the income of many women workers, according to the report of the New York Bureau of Labor for 1885, was below $2. per week, “from which sum food, clothing, light, fuel, and rent” had to be paid.⁶³ The median wage per week for women in the New England cotton mills, where wages were somewhat higher than in other parts of the country, for the decade 1890-1900 ranged from $5.50 to $6.; in the clothing industry from $4. to $4.50.⁶⁴ It is possible that these wages, though the best yet paid, might have been higher, had these (1893-96) not been depression years.

The employment of large numbers of women in factories led mercantile

* As late as 1898 their number was estimated at 60,000.—Josiah Flynt (Willard), Tramping with Tramps . . . , p. 304.

† See Vol. II, 44.

‡ The five industries employing the largest number of women were textiles, clothing, cigarmaking, boots and shoes, and printing and publishing. The total number of persons employed in these five groups in 1905 was 1,364,039. Of this total 685,532 were men; 590,832 were women; and 87,675 were children. Employees in 1900 in all industries—of whom 19 per cent were women—were in excess of five million.—U. S. Census of Manufactures, 1905, as quoted in Edith Abbott, Women in Industry; A Study in American Economic History, pp. 84 t., 82.

§ Not until the census of 1870 were boys and girls under 16 separately classified.

John Bach McMaster: “In New York City . . . in 1845 several hundred women, constituting the Female Industry Association, tailoresses, shirt-makers, book-folders, cap-makers, representatives of all trades then open to women, met in the Superior Court room to assert their rights against unjust and mercenary employers. . . . the president said that in the trade she pursued wages were from ten to eighteen cents a day. Only the most proficient received twenty-five cents.”—A History of the People of the United States . . . , VIII, 98.

establishments in turn to hire an increasing number of women and girls at low wages. Saleswomen in prominent stores of eastern cities who were on their feet from seven-thirty or eight o'clock in the morning until nine or ten at night, often with not more than thirty minutes for lunch, were customarily paid $5. or $6. a week. There were thousands of working women and girls employed in smaller shops and stores whose weekly pay was not more than $3.50 or $4.

Dependable data on the extent of child labor in industry prior to 1880 are practically nonexistent. The tenth census reported the number of wage-earning children as 1,118,356, the directors explaining that this was an underestimate.⁶⁵ Ten years later the number had increased to a million and three-quarters.

In the report of the Bureau of Statistics of Labor of Massachusetts for 1881 Carroll D. Wright said:

In our cotton mills especially the women and children largely exceed the men, being often from two-thirds to five-sixths of the whole; and the proportion of them is steadily increasing.⁶⁶

But child labor was not confined to New England mills. It was to be found wherever the type of machinery in use could be operated by children. Factories, planing mills, potteries, and other Ohio industries in 1880 employed 48,593 children under fifteen years of age. The 1,583 persons employed by thirteen Wisconsin knitting mills were, according to Florence Kelley, mostly boys and girls.⁶⁷ In 1887 the Chief Factory Inspector of the state of New York reported:

Year after year we have seen the demand increase for smaller and still smaller children, until it became a veritable robbery of the cradle to supply them.⁶⁸

Though a few humanitarians whose concern had been awakened by the multiple evils associated with child labor in factories and sweatshops labored zealously to do away with it their efforts up to 1895 had met with little success.

MORAL AND SOCIAL EFFECTS OF INDUSTRIALIZATION

Quite apart from its material achievements the industrial revolution resulted in far-reaching social changes in the nation's human economy. In their ways of thinking and acting, their manners and customs, their motives and attitudes, the lives of millions of Americans were profoundly altered. As a result the Churches were confronted with new and difficult problems.

Change from handcraft processes to machine manufacture had long been under way, a shift which was now greatly accentuated.

[The industrial revolution] . . . took the tool from . . . [the workman's] hand and harnessed it to a shaft. It robbed him of his personal skill and joined his arm of flesh to an arm of iron. It reduced him from a craftsman to a specialist, from a maker of shoes to a mere stitcher of soles.⁶⁹

The labor of the workman is his chief means of self-expression. Machine industry deprived him of his individual opportunity for creative expression. The ideality, the inherited traditions of craftsmanship, the cultivation of skill of hand, the opportunity for imagination in the creation of a beautiful object, the incentive to individual attainment, all these, together with their cumulative effects on character and personality, were to a great extent taken away from the craftsman.* Machines were primarily designed to increase production, not to improve the quality of the product, and much of what they produced was inferior to the handmade goods which they displaced.

The controlling motive of the new industrialism was the making of profit. The individual employer, or corporation, who owned the factory and the tools of production provided work only when and so long as he had a market. To gain a market and maintain it he considered it necessary to depress wages and lengthen hours. He was able to do this by bargaining individually with employees, pitting one against another. The more the factories increased and the more severe the competition became, the more he exploited his workers to gain competitive advantage. Increasingly labor came to be regarded as a commodity, almost as much so as steel, cotton, or coal, and the employer's concern was simply how and where it could be bought most cheaply. The worker was without status. Though his labor was necessary he was not integrated into the new national economy. His dependence upon the owners of industry was absolute. He was subject at the will of the employer† to layoff when his services were not needed or discharge when his continuance was no longer profitable.⁷⁰

One consequence of these developments was a serious impairment of workers' morale. The worker no longer felt that he was his own master, that the making of a living for himself and his family was in his own hands. He was continually haunted by a sense of insecurity, a fear that the calamity of unemployment was hanging over his head. Under these conditions the motives of many were undermined: they tended to lose ambition and pride in their work, to become indolent and careless, resentful and rebellious.

The close contact between employer and employee, which was often

* R. Whately Cooke Taylor: "The aesthetic result . . . is wholly unsatisfactory. From this point of view there is scarcely a word to be said in favour of the modern factory system. It vulgarizes the product, it stultifies the workman, it deteriorates public taste; the very buildings in which its operations are performed, the emanations they emit, give an added gloom to life. . . . There are many beautiful fabrics made in factories, and the perfection to which some machinery is brought—the separate parts of which are factory-made—often strikes one with admiration. But there is no ideality in the work, it is all painfully, obtrusively, utilitarian."—The Modern Factory System, pp. 442 f.

friendly and interested under the economy of small industry, was replaced by the impersonal relation of corporate capitalism and labor. Strikes, particularly in depression years, increased in frequency and in intensity,* and strife often flared into violence involving destruction of property and loss of life.⁷¹ These conditions drew from Washington Gladden the observation:

Everybody admits that the relations between the working classes and their employers are extremely uncomfortable; the strikes, the lockouts, the boycotting, the rioting here and there, make up a large share of the telegraphic news in our daily papers. The state of industrial society is a state of war, and the engagement is general all along the line.⁷²

THE ALTERED CHARACTER OF RURAL LIFE

Certain conditions affecting agriculture during the period 1845-95—some tied in more or less closely with the new industrialism, others entirely independent—created social and religious problems of the first magnitude, and greatly complicated and increased the difficulty of the Churches' task of evangelization.

Invention had provided machinery previously unavailable; machine methods were rapidly displacing hand labor and reducing the drudgery of earlier times. The purchase of new farm equipment, machine-made clothing and shoes, and other factory products required cash outlay. These conditions necessitated commercial farming, that is, the production of marketable commodities whose sale would return a cash income. During the flush years of the late forties and fifties and the inflationary war years when market demand was abundant all went well. Between 1854 and 1868 the volume of wheat receipts at Chicago increased fivefold; of flour tenfold. But when postwar deflation set in markets were glutted, prices fell, and farmers found themselves in difficulty. Before the close of 1868 rapid decline in prices of breadstuffs had begun. Corn fell in some western markets to ten cents a bushel—so low that it was cheaper than wood or coal for fuel.† Wheat, cotton, and other marketable farm products suffered similar decline. There was no comparable decrease in prices of consumers' goods. Duties on all imports that the farmer had to buy were iniquitously high, The Morrill Tariff Act of 1864, placed upon the statute books at the demand of manufacturers, had the effect of greatly increasing the price level and despite consumers' protests was continued in force without revision until 1872 and then only slightly modified.⁷³

* Josiah Strong: "In this country, from 1881 to 1886 inclusive, 1,323,203 employes were involved in strikes, directly affecting 22,304 establishments. [Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1887, p. 12.] In the summer of 1892, within a few days of each other, the states of New York, Pennsylvania, and Tennessee ordered out their militia, while Idaho called on the United States government for troops to suppress labor riots."—The New Era or the Coming Kingdom, p. 135.

† V. L. Parrington: "The prices of . . . [the farmer's] staples were sinking below the cost of production. With four-cent eggs, five-cent butter, ten-cent corn, and fifty-cent wheat, with more hogs and cattle than the stockyards would take, and with debts contracted at interest-rates fixed by a higher scale of values, the economic position of the Middle Border was becoming desperate, and in the later eighties a sullen bitterness took possession of the land."—Main Currents in American Thought, 111. The Beginnings of Critical Realism in America, 261.

A farm of 160 acres, for which the Homestead Act made provision, was adequate for the fertile areas of central and northern Illinois, Iowa, southern Minnesota, and eastern Nebraska, where rainfall was ample, and settlers in these sections of the Middle Border fared reasonably well. Their frame houses were for the most part small and the furniture usually cheap and limited in quantity. In many cases families were large, contagious diseases—especially children's contagions—prevalent, and skilled medical service limited, in some communities not available at all. For both the farmer and his wife the working day was long and involved much hard toil, the women obliged to carry water from the well, oftentimes distant from the house, wood from the woodpile and, at planting and harvest, in many cases to work side by side with their husbands or fathers in the fields. But life was free and healthful, and as the years passed those who were good managers and industrious succeeded in clothing themselves better, in improving their farms with more commodious houses and barns, and in providing the newly invented conveniences for their homes, sewing machines, washing machines, and hardcoal heaters or furnaces. Many also accumulated ample competence for old age.⁷⁴

In the newer belts of settlement in the semiarid and arid regions farther west the story was different. Thousands upon thousands swarmed over the plains' country, living in dugouts walled with sod, logs, or stone, and roofed with boards and sod. Many of the immigrants were without capital, possessed of few tools and little or no household furniture. Within a few years after the breaking of the sod the surface soil was depleted and crop yields declined. From the beginning much of the land was unsuitable for grain and should have been used only for grazing. Despite the decline in yield it was evident that land had been taken up more extensively than was justified by market demands for grains and overproduction served further to decrease prices. Under the circumstances a quarter-section homestead proved to be too small an area on which to make a living for a farm family. Even though later acts increased the size of the land grant the odds were against the homesteaders. The hazards of nature were oppressive. Winter blizzards brought snows so deep and temperatures so low that livestock—often with no protection save the lee side of a strawstack—were frozen on the hoof. Dry springs brought prairie fires whose waves of flame, swept onward by gales of high wind, destroyed everything combustible in their path. At all too frequent intervals summer brought swarms of grasshoppers or locusts, chinch bugs, and potato bugs that devoured or otherwise destroyed the crops. Added to all these were recurrent droughts—some so serious that grain at harvesttime did not reproduce the seed that had been sown in the spring—when pastures became brown and bare, and garden vegetables failed to mature.

In 1850 the farm wealth of the nation was more than half of the national total; by 1890 it was less than one-fourth. Under the circumstances described a large portion of farmers found it necessary to mortgage their land to purchase farming equipment, construct necessary farm buildings, and meet living costs. Money was readily available from local bankers and from agents of eastern loan companies but interest rates were unconscionable, often as high as 12, 15, even in some instances 20 per cent. By 1890 farm mortgage indebtedness had reached more than one billion dollars and in some counties of the West as many as 90 per cent of the farms carried heavy mortgages. Foreclosures were numerous in the western states; by 1895 title to almost 90 per cent of the land in fifteen Kansas counties had been taken over by banks and loan companies.⁷⁵ In the fall of 1890 many appeals for emergency aid were received by the Missionary Society. One, from the Ellsworth District, Northwest Kansas Conference, read:

The emergency grows out of the utter destruction of crops by the hot winds in 17 counties . . . [The Presiding Elder] . . . traveled 500 miles through these counties and found an entire failure of oats, potatoes, vegetables, and feed of all kinds. Farmers have sold their stock at 1/3 its value and often less. Cattle and horses that cannot live on buffalo grass during the winter will perish. He says, 'Our case is a desperate one, and some of our preachers are so hard-pressed with want and destitution that starvation stares them in the face. . . .'⁷⁶

In the case of many settlers Parrington did not exaggerate in characterizing the history of the western frontier as a long drab story of hardship and privation and thwarted hopes, of men and women broken by the endless toil, the windows of their dreams shuttered by poverty and the doors to an abundant life closed and barred by narrow opportunity.⁷⁷

Not in all but in far too many cases what Hamlin Garland records of the Midwest was a statement of fact which applied to a much wider area:

Every house I visited had its individual message of sordid struggle and half-hidden despair. . . .

I perceived beautiful youth becoming bowed and bent. I saw lovely girlhood wasting away into thin and hopeless age. Some of the women I had known had withered into querulous and complaining spinsterhood, and I heard ambitious youth cursing the bondage of the farm.⁷⁸

ACUTE AGRARIAN DISCONTENT

Little wonder under these circumstances that the years from 1867 to 1900 were for many farmers of the West a period of discontent, social and political ferment, and vehement protest. The agrarianism of the first three-quarters of a century of national independence had been a decentralized order, individualistic in its attitudes, lacking in media of common expression or organized action, and thoroughly democratic in its sympathies. The new industrialism was a centralized order, highly organized, with limitless capitalistic ambition, selfish in its attitudes, possessing a large measure of political power. That conflict between two orders of such contrasting philosophies and such antagonistic interest would develop was inevitable.

In the earlier period agriculture had been for the many not so much a financial enterprise as a way of life. With the opening up of the national domain, which made available at low cost many millions of acres of fertile soil, capitalists saw the possibility of an agricultural industrialism. Some contended that investments made in large tracts of land converted into industrial plants equipped with machinery for the production of flax, wheat, oats, barley, and corn, operated by gangs of seasonal laborers, would pay 20 per cent the first year and subsequently as much as 55 per cent annually. With the stimulus of such profit possibilities⁷⁹ many capitalists invested in "bonanza farms." * In this development small farmers, and students of social trends as well, saw a threat of destruction of the family-size farm, with land concentrated in the hands of corporations and wealthy individuals, cultivated by tenants and hirelings. The danger of the trend was real since the cost of operation on the large mechanized farms was lower, the greatly increased production tended to depress the market, and grain had to be sold by small farmers at less than cost. This threat, however, was short-lived.⁸⁰ By 1890 the "bonanza farm" movement had spent its force and a strong trend toward medium-size farm operation—except in areas adapted only to grazing—had set in.†

Farmers in the newer sections of the country were located at long distances from commodity markets, which made them dependent on railway transportation. One of their chief complaints was made against the railroads, on three counts. The government made excessive free grants of land for railway building to corporations which in turn sold their holdings in blocks of tens and hundreds of thousands of acres to speculators at a minimum price. Small lots were sold to settlers at prices ranging from $3. to $10. per acre. When these were no longer available farmers desiring to purchase were at the mercy of the speculators, often being compelled to pay fifteen or more dollars per acre. Naturally they felt that they had been victimized. Again, they suffered from freight discrimination. The large producers were granted special rates, often as much as 50 per cent below the regular schedule. Aside from discriminatory practice the farmers felt that rates were unreasonably high,

* George I. Seney, a Methodist layman, president of the Metropolitan Bank of New York City, established an industrialized farm of 2,000 acres near Sheldon, Iowa; the firm of Thompson and Warner, the Rock County Farm of 50,000 acres near Luverne, Minn.; and Goldsmidt, the German banker of Frankfort-on-the-Main, several large farms. Not only in Iowa and Minnesota but also in Nebraska, Kansas, the Dakotas, and elsewhere agricultural industrial plants were established. In 1860 farms of 1,000 acres and over in the free states numbered 791; in 1870, 1,507. By 1880 in the country as a whole there were 28,578 farms of more than 1,000 acres.—William Godwin Moody, Land and Labor in the United States, pp. 32, 75; cf. [W. G. Moody,] "The Bonanza Farms of the West," Atlantic Monthly . . . , XLV (1880), 267 (January), 33-44.

† Maximum profit in "bonanza farm" operation was gained on new land. When the cream had been skimmed from the soil by one-crop farming, and land values had risen, the large holders found it advisable to sell their holdings in small units for intensive cultivation.

established on a basis that would enable the railroads to pay dividends on heavily watered stock.⁸¹ Few of the towns in the newer sections had flour mills. As a result wheat was shipped at high rates to the distant terminal market, converted into flour, and returned at a second freight toll to the local store.* For his flour made from wheat which he sold at seventy cents a bushel the farmer was often compelled to pay seven dollars a barrel. To him this seemed to be extortion. He charged, not unjustly, that his products had to pass through too many toll-taking hands on their way to the consumer.⁸²

Other agrarian grievances had to do with currency fluctuation which in its operation between 1865 and 1879 made it necessary for him to pay debts contracted in depreciated currency, with money worth as much as 20 per cent more than the value of that which he had borrowed.⁸³

Farmers' grievances were loudly voiced but for lack of effective social action their protests bore little fruit. Rural life, lived close to nature, is not of a character to stimulate radicalism.† The possession of even a meager holding, if the owner can manage by hard work to retain it, gives him a sense of security that the wage earner does not possess. Nevertheless, by the seventies agrarian discontent in the free states gave rise to several trends which were destined to have far-reaching effect upon the social economy of the nation and to pose serious problems not only for Methodism but for all of the Protestant Churches whose strength lay to any considerable extent in rural communities.

FLIGHT FROM THE LAND

One of these trends was the tendency of the rural population, particularly its younger generation, to desert the farm for the city. The opportunity for increased income, combined with the glamour of city life, offered an irresistible appeal. The extent of the rural exodus first became strikingly evident when the 1890 census was made. Of 1,502 New England townships, 932 had fewer people than in 1880. More than 3,300 farms in Maine, over 1,300 in New Hampshire, nearly 1,500 in Massachusetts, and more than 1,000 in Vermont had been abandoned. Nor was this all. Of other northeastern states nearly five-sixths of the geographical area of New York, one-fourth of New Jersey,

* V. L. Parrington: "The gap between producer and consumer was widening to a chasm. The railways charged twenty cents a bushel cartage for wheat from the Mississippi to Chicago, and fifty-two and a half cents to the Atlantic seaboard. The elevator companies fixed monopoly tolls, swindled the farmer in their grain-gradings and combined to force down the market price at harvest time and raise it after the crop came under their control."—Op. cit., III, 261.

† Notice, however, should be taken of a number of agricultural orders which, though they enlisted only a minority of the farm population, stimulated significant social and political action. The first and one of the most influential of these was the Patrons of Husbandry, or the Grange, which at the date of maximum growth (1874) had 21,697 local organizations. Another was the Farmers' Alliance which by 1890 had elected three members of the Senate and fifty members of the House of Representatives. The constitutional conventions of Wyoming, Washington, Idaho, Montana, and North and South Dakota reflected agrarian antipathy to railroads and other corporations. In 1892 the People's Party (the Populists) demanded broad social reforms, including a graduated income tax, government ownership of railroads, telephones, and telegraphs, the free coinage of silver, direct election of United States senators, postal savings banks, and the initiative and referendum—Solon Justus Buck, The Granger Movement . . . , pp. 66 f., 309; John D. Hicks, The Constitution of the Northwest States, University of Nebraska Studies, XXIII (1923), 1-2 (January-April), 31 f., 90 ff., 134 f.; J. T. Adams, op. cit., p. 323.

and two-fifths of Pennsylvania had lessened in population.⁸⁴ Within the decade 1880-90 immigration saved the midwest states from a net loss in population, but during these years the proportion of their people living in the open country, in villages, and in towns of less than 4,000 declined from four-fifths to two-thirds of the total. In the entire central region from Ohio on the east to Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota on the west, and including these four states, the migration from the open country to the larger towns and cities was reducing the rural communities to a markedly inferior position in the social organism. Many entire counties of these states, and of southern Michigan, central and southeastern Indiana, and of northern and western Illinois, as well, actually suffered a net loss of population. Of 25,746 townships in thirty-nine states and territories 10,063 (39 per cent) decreased in population in the decade.⁸⁵

This depletion of farm population had a serious effect upon the rural churches. In the summers of 1889 and 1890 the Evangelical Alliance found, in a study of church conditions in the rural areas of New York, that many Protestant church buildings had been abandoned and were falling into decay. One village, which had fourteen saloons within one-fourth of a mile, had two disused Protestant churches.

There were a few years ago in one town a large Presbyterian church, two Methodist churches, a Baptist church, and a flourishing Baptist seminary. To-day the Presbyterian church is used as a barn, the Baptist church is abandoned, the two Methodist churches are almost extinct, and the Baptist seminary is utilized as a Roman Catholic church.⁸⁶

Similar conditions prevailed in many other states.

INCREASE OF TENANTRY

A second trend equally serious in its social implications and effects was a steady increase in farm tenantry. This was an outgrowth of the basic economic disorders previously discussed. It was also concomitant with the flight from the land since many farmers who migrated to the urban centers did not dispose of their farms but rented them to tenants. Numerous eastern capitalists and English, French, and German men of wealth bought immense tracts of railroad lands and, instead of operating them through employed agents, rented their acreage out in small units. The more widespread cause of tenantry, however, was mortgage foreclosure. Under conditions prevailing in the late sixties and the seventies thousands of farmers in the Midwest and in the newer sections found themselves unable to meet principal and interest payments on debts contracted for building, buying machinery, and increasing acreage, and in losing their land were reduced to the status of tenant or of farm laborer.⁸⁷ Statistics on farm ownership were not included in the federal census until 1880. When published the returns were startling, revealing that

1,024,701 farms—one-fourth (25.5 per cent) of the nation's total—were operated by tenants. Every state and territory had its quota. New York reported 39,872 tenant farms; Ohio, 47,627; Illinois, 80,244; California, 7,124; Iowa, 44,174; Missouri, 58,872; Nebraska, 11,424. Later census reports showed steady increase in the disastrous trend: 1890, 28.4 per cent; 1900, 35.3.* Even these figures failed to reflect the actual situation.⁸⁸ Farms of operating proprietors were so heavily mortgaged that the owners' equity was less than 50 per cent, in some cases as low as 20 per cent.⁸⁹

Increasing tenantry inevitably resulted in a continual weakening of rural morale. Tenantry caused a lessening of the sense of community, esprit de corps, and community welfare spirit through the loss of resident owners. Leases were commonly made for a term of one year and in a considerable portion of cases because of dissatisfaction of owner or of tenant were not renewed. There was a corresponding loss of personal morale, not only of the tenant farmer but also of his wife and children. The accompanying sense of insecurity was detrimental to physical and mental health and well-being. Tenant families had little or no social life. With few exceptions they did not identify themselves with any of the institutions of the local community, the school, farmers' organizations such as the Grange or Farmers' Alliance, or the Church. Tenants' children were likely to be irregular in school attendance, and to leave school at an early age with the result that their experience was unsatisfying and of little educational value. The adults had none of the intellectual and civic stimulus which owner farmers received from their local organization. They became indifferent to religion and commonly were neglected by the churches. In areas where tenants became a majority or a near majority it was increasingly difficult to maintain efficient local institutions, with the inevitable result of decline in moral, intellectual, and political standards.⁹⁰

The social erosion involved in increasing tenantry was accompanied and its long-range effects made more serious by the steadily increasing erosion and exhaustion of the soil. The tenant who had no assurance of continued occupancy had no interest in improving or even in maintaining the fertility of the soil.† His primary interest was in immediate return for his labor in cash crops. He was a rare tenant who could be induced to engage in diversified farming or to plant soil-building crops. Many owners, also, were shortsighted and for their part showed little concern for soil improvement or for maintenance of the tenant house and other farm structures, resulting in steady deterioration of both land and improvements.

* The trend has continued in the twentieth century, in 1930 reaching the unprecedented proportion of 42 per cent. The decade 1930-40 was the first to show a decline in tenantry.—U. S. Sixteenth Census, Agriculture, III, 138.

† The English tenant system, although unsatisfactory in certain important respects, was superior to the American pattern. In England leases often were for a lifetime, and in numerous instances were held in families through successive generations. Many leaseholds were practically homesteads.—Cf. W. G. Moody, Land and Labor in the United States, p. 72.

PROCESS OF URBANIZATION

During the early decades of the nation rural life had been predominant.* To Jefferson and many others who valued the older American tradition cities were "ulcers on the body politic." But gradually during the period under review the city replaced the country as the ruling factor in the national economy.⁹¹ The polity of early American Methodism had been geared to rural life. The vast majority of its churches were in small towns, villages, and the open country. Would the Church be able to adapt itself to the changed situation? Urbanization confronted the Church with many of its most difficult missionary problems.

The seventh census revealed that in 1850 2,897,586 persons, 12.5 per cent of the population, lived in cities of 8,000 or over. Forty years later 18,272,503, or 29 per cent, were city dwellers. Between 1880 and 1890 the rate of increase was much greater than in any preceding decade.⁹² While the nation in this decade was rapidly increasing in numbers the rural populace increased only 14 per cent in contrast to the 61 per cent urban rise. New York City grew from 1,206,299 people to 1,515,301; Boston from 362,895 to 448,477; Baltimore from 332,313 to 434,439.⁹³

The growth of the newer cities of the West was rapid from the beginning of the period. During the ten years 1840-50 Chicago increased from less than 5,000 to almost 30,000 while Pittsburgh, Cleveland, Cincinnati, and St. Louis each more than doubled in size. During later decades the growth of the mid-west cities was phenomenal. Showing the most rapid increase, Chicago leaped from a population of a half million in 1880 to more than a million in 1890, thus becoming the second in size of the great cities of the nation. St. Paul and Minneapolis increased threefold, while Cleveland, Columbus, Detroit, and Milwaukee grew from 60 to 80 per cent.⁹⁴ At the close of the period approximately four-fifths of the urban population of the entire nation lived north of the Mason and Dixon line, of which more than one half were concentrated in the five states of New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois.⁹⁵

Three factors were chiefly responsible for the disproportionate growth of American cities during the period 1845-95, immigration, industrialization, and the accompanying flight from the land. A large portion of immigrants came from congested European urban centers. Accustomed to city life, in America they naturally sought homes in the cities. Others who were without funds to pay transportation to distant rural areas, as pointed out earlier, also naturally gravitated to settlements in industrial centers.

Community of language, kinship or friendship combine with poverty to produce constant accretion in any settlement once started; so that even those accustomed at home to country life and the cultivation of the soil, instead of following similar occupations here, become occupants of the sweat shop and the factory.⁹⁶

* See Vol. I, 78.

In the case of two large urban centers, Chicago and St. Louis, the foreign-born as early as 1850 numbered more than those of native birth.⁹⁷ Decade after decade this trend continued. Great colonies of aliens—in the aggregate, millions of people—were established in the hearts of urban communities.* In Boston in 1885 only 31 per cent of the people were native-born. In a small area surrounding Hull House on South Halsted Street, Chicago, eighteen nationalities were represented. Greater New York City had become the world's largest immigrant center.† The New York Sun reported in 1903 sixty-six different languages spoken in the city, forty-nine foreign language newspapers in circulation, and one school with pupils of twenty-nine nationalities enrolled.⁹⁸

According to the tenth census forty-four of the chief cities of the nation contained 38.73 per cent of all the Germans, 38.71 per cent of the Bohemians, 45.26 per cent of the Irish, 52.43 per cent of the Poles, and 60.80 per cent of the Italians.⁹⁹ By 1894, Prescott F. Hall estimated from government figures, immigration from southeastern Europe was furnishing three times as many people to the slums of Baltimore as was northwestern Europe, nineteen times as many to the slums of New York, twenty times as many to the slums of Chicago, and seventy-one times as many to the slums of Philadelphia.¹⁰⁰ At the close of the period the proportion of foreign-born in the great urban centers was four times as great, and the proportion of children of immigrants "three and one-third times as great as that of the colonial and older native stock."¹⁰¹

For labor the consequences of the high degree of immigrant concentration were deplorable. It tended to create an oversupply of common laborers, a high percentage of unemployment, and a depressed wage level, resulting in extreme poverty.¹⁰²

Since the great majority of factories were located in cities industrialization became a principal stimulus to urbanization. As industries multiplied and expanded they drew ever more laborers into the great city centers. When the labor supply was inadequate, particularly during the Civil War, agents of American industrialists brought aliens into the country under wage contracts. This procedure was made illegal by Congress in 1885 but enforcement of the law was attended with much difficulty and the practice continued to a greater or less extent for many years.¹⁰³

* By the close of the period only two cities of Germany—Berlin and Hamburg—had a larger German population than Chicago; in Sweden only Stockholm and Göteborg had more Swedes; and in Norway only Christiania and Bergen more Norwegians.—Unnamed source, as cited by Frederick J. Turner, "Dominant Forces in Western Life," Atlantic Monthly . . . , LXXIX (1897), cccclxxiv (April), 438.

† New York City's Irish population was double that of Dublin, while it also had about as many Germans as Hamburg, two and a half times as many Jews as Warsaw, and half as many Italians as Naples.

GAINS AND LOSSES OF URBANIZATION

Flight from the land to the cities was motivated by expectation of larger cash income, a shorter working day with less drudgery, better furnished homes, more social pleasures, better schools for the children, and opportunity for business and professional advancement. For many rural people who left their farms, these hopes were in part, though seldom wholly, realized. Concentration of population in cities exercised a beneficial influence in stimulating the initiative, enterprise, and versatility of people. Paved streets, electric railways, street lighting by arc lamps, facilities for sanitary disposal of sewage and wastes, and other discoveries and inventions which had become the commonplace necessities of contemporary living were to some extent an outgrowth of the massing together of people in urban centers.

For the small minority of immigrants who were skilled workmen, shop foremen, and persons able to qualify for managerial positions or for the upper ranks of salesmanship there were good homes, better clothing, and more recreational and cultural opportunities in the city than in the country. For those in the lower ranks of factory operatives and for common laborers, whether European immigrants or émigrés from American farms, conditions were much less favorable. The combination of over-rapid urbanization and the avarice and venality of real estate owners and builders produced slums that rivaled the worst to be found in the old world. Boston, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, Hartford, Fall River, and some other cities had shameful areas but, of all, those of New York were the most deplorable. As early as 1856 the metropolis had 100,000 slum dwellers and year after year conditions worsened. In 1879 and for twenty years thereafter virtually the only type of tenement built was the "dumb-bell":

Five or six stories high, the bleak narrow structure ran ninety feet back from the street, . . . pierced through the center by a stygian hallway less than three feet wide. Each floor was honeycombed with rooms, many without direct light or air and most of them sheltering one or more families. Almost at once such barracks became foul and grimy, infested with vermin and lacking privacy and proper sanitary conveniences. . . . [One such district] . . . was known as "lung block" because of the many deaths from tuberculosis.¹⁰⁴

Significant correlation was evident between growth in size of cities and increase in the crime rate. The larger the city and the greater the overcrowding in slum areas the higher the rate of crime per thousand of the population.* All types of immorality, vice, and crime flourished in the big cities, gambling, political corruption, gangsterism, prostitution, robbery, and murder. That vice and crime were fostered by economic insecurity, low wages, unemployment,

* Arthur Meier Schlesinger: "A census inquiry disclosed a fifty-per-cent rise in the number of prison inmates from 1880 to 1890. . . . In most large centers a crook could secure police 'protection' provided he agreed . . . if operating locally, to share his profits with the authorities."—The Rise of the City, 1878-1898, pp. 114, 115.

overcrowding, and other unwholesome conditions in living quarters, the prevalence of saloons and lack of restrictions on the sale of liquor to minors and to habitual drunkards, poor law enforcement, and lack of recreational facilities for youth were matters of common knowledge.

For children of elementary school age the shift from the free and open life of the country to that in tenement districts and on crowded city streets involved serious deprivations. Schools in the cities were larger, with better trained teaching personnel and superior physical equipment, but they lacked playgrounds and other recreational facilities. The values inherent in living close to nature—acquaintance with nature's processes, possession of many pets, and abundant opportunities for healthful, stimulating outdoor exercise—were for the most part lost.¹⁰⁵

For thousands of adolescents the advantage of high schools was offset by lack of normal outlets for youthful energy. For many of the children of the tenements the city's streets became a school of crime. Forming gangs the youth preyed upon neighborhood shopkeepers, unwary vendors, and innocent passersby unable to protect themselves. Sometimes gangs of adjacent city districts engaged in internecine violence involving loss of life of some of the participants. Individual members graduated into the ranks of pickpockets, thieves, and murderers. More often than not gangs were composed of American-born children of immigrant parents whose fathers, and not infrequently mothers also, were employed long hours in factories, which left the children without parental oversight. These conditions imposed problems with which religious and social agencies, most of all the churches, were ill prepared to cope.¹⁰⁶

Furthermore, poverty, illiteracy, and low moral standards provided ideal situations for the growth of political corruption and the reign of unprincipled machine politicians—the “boss” and his henchmen—who through their control of elections made democracy a byword and a hissing in so many American cities.¹⁰⁷ These same conditions fostered the increase of commercialized prostitution in the large cities to an extent which became a national civic disgrace. One hundred and eighty-five cities reported houses of ill-fame to the tenth census (1880). Philadelphia, with 517, had the largest number. Everywhere in the nation lax enforcement of law against the evil was condoned.¹⁰⁸ Little concern was awakened among the rank and file of citizens, the lawmakers, or law enforcement officials against political corruption or any of the other prevalent forms of crime, and slight attention was given to the seriousness of the problems or to possible ways and means of their solution.

For middle- and upper-class people cities provided worth-while advantages. They had well-stocked bookstores, art galleries and museums, lecture centers and concert halls, high schools, colleges, and universities. They made possible the development of specialized journals and great newspapers. In these and other ways they became centers of social, intellectual, and cultural progress, stimulating the development of the arts, sciences, philanthropy, and education.

INCREASE OF NATIONAL WEALTH

The decade beginning in 1845 marked a period of rapidly increasing wealth. The growth of population occasioned by immigration stimulated real estate prices. The Crimean War in Europe created heavy export demand for farm products. Enormous amounts of gold from California contributed to the general prosperity. Customs revenue for the year ending June 30, 1857, was the largest sum derived in any twelve months. The building of great fortunes had begun. According to one estimate there were fourteen millionaires in New York City in 1846 and twenty* in 1855.¹⁰⁹

Between 1860 and 1890, according to the U. S. census, the nation's wealth increased three times as rapidly as its population.¹¹⁰ The years following the Civil War saw the beginning of large-scale looting of the natural resources of the continent—the coal and oil of Pennsylvania and Ohio, the copper and iron ore of upper Michigan, the silver and gold of the Rocky Mountains and California, the forests of Wisconsin and the Pacific Northwest—a ruthless, shameless, wasteful process which continued throughout the period and long beyond. In industry, also, unconscionable profits were made. Wanton procedures were the means of the building of many great fortunes. By the close of the period there were not less than 3,800 American millionaires, an increase unparalleled in world economic history. A government census estimate stated the increase in assessed valuation in a single decade, between 1880 and 1890, as $8,333,269,923., a rise of 48.62 per cent; the increase in estimated true valuation as $21,395,091,197., or 49.02 per cent.¹¹¹

Of equal import in its bearing upon American life was the rapidly increasing concentration of wealth. The Massachusetts Labor Bureau estimated in 1873 that 48 per cent of the wealth was owned by 2 per cent of the population. By 1890, according to one calculation, nearly one-fourth of the national income was received by 1 per cent of the families; one-eighth of the families received "more than half of the aggregate income." Although labor insistently claimed a proportionate share in the increased wealth it made very little wage gain during the period. Writing a few years after 1895 Robert Hunter stated, as a result of his study of economic conditions in the United States, that more than ten million people were living in poverty; a large segment of the working classes was propertyless; in all industrial communities masses of the people were living under extremely unsanitary conditions; and a large part of the unskilled workers were receiving wages insufficient for the maintenance of physical efficiency.¹¹² Seeking to call the attention of the Churches to the moral peril of the situation John R. Commons wrote in 1894:

* A pamphlet published in 1855 by Moses Yale Beach, Wealthy Men of New York, listed nineteen men estimated to possess more than a million dollars each. William B. Astor headed the list with $6,000,000.; next was Stephen Whitney, $5,000,000. James Lenox was third, credited with possession of $3,000,000.— Cf. Burton J. Hendrick, The Age of Big Business: A Chronicle of the Captains of Industry, pp. 10 f.

On the one hand is great wealth, bringing great luxury and extravagance, great haughtiness and little thought for the trials and privations of the unpropertied. On the other is insecurity of employment and a servile dependence enforced by the whip of hunger, more inexorable than all tyrants. The moral effects of this condition are just what we should expect. . . . Crime has increased. Intemperance has become frightful, because life is a dreary burden of work, with no future of relief, and food is poor in quantity and quality. The home is being disrupted, because the working people are crowded into open tenements and the family cannot meet its daily wants without the help of wife and children.¹¹³

For the large portion of the population between the extremes of wealth and poverty the half century had brought a marked rise in the average economic level. Wholesale and retail merchants, jobbers, managers, shopkeepers, salesmen, professional people, and many others were better off financially and enjoyed more leisure than earlier generations. Abundant production of food-stuffs, the construction of more ample and comfortable homes, the invention and use of new types of household equipment, the application of factory methods of manufacture which greatly increased the available supply of a wide range of products, all contributed to material well-being. New refinements of living were widely introduced. High schools and colleges were multiplied and education became more generally diffused. Facilities for transportation and convenience in traveling were increased and cultural contacts were broadened.

The same years that witnessed such phenomenal increase in national wealth and accompanying rise in the level of living of the middle class saw also as a concomitant a deeply disturbing increase of corruption in private and public life. In the New York Tribune of June 5, 1860, a correspondent wrote:

There can be no doubt in any reasonable mind that we are entered in this country upon what may be fairly termed the Era of Corruption in the administration of public affairs. . . . Not that all the corruption of mankind has at once centered upon our time, but circumstances have conspired to give it a remarkable development at this period.¹¹⁴

If the beginnings of the "Gilded Age," Mark Twain's apt characterization, were in the late fifties and the early sixties, its heyday was in the decades immediately following the Civil War, a period which witnessed an unparalleled orgy of political chicanery and fraud, speculation, bank defalcations, stock manipulation,* and ostentatious, vulgar display of ill-gotten gains.¹¹⁵

* The era was typified in the career in his later life of "Commodore" Cornelius Vanderbilt. In 1865 he possessed about $10,000,000. By operating a fleet of steamboats, acquiring control of the Hudson River, the New York Central, and Lake Shore Railroads, bribing legislatures, corrupting courts, engineering high stock-watering operations, and speculating on the Stock Exchange, he amassed by the time of his death in 1877 a fortune of $104,000,000.—the first American to accumulate a hundred million dollars.—Cf. B. J. Hendrick, op. cit., p. 19; E. L. Bogart and D. L. Kemmerer, op. cit., pp. 763 f.

State 2

Political corruption was rife on all levels from municipal primaries to federal administrative circles.

In some cities a large part of the primary meetings are held in low saloons, . . . [and] the administration of city affairs is determined by the lowest and most corrupt elements of the population.¹¹⁶

Frequently registration lists were falsified. In Baltimore, according to Daniel Dorchester, eight of the "judges" of a municipal election were men who had been indicted for crime, of whom four had been convicted. Similar facts could be cited concerning Albany, Cincinnati, Boston, Chicago, and other cities. For years the "Tweed Ring" virtually governed New York City, prostituting every agency of government and infecting even the state judiciary and legislature.* After serving a penal sentence of seven months for embezzlement of public funds in Philadelphia Charles T. Yerkes transferred his activities to Chicago where for years he exercised dominating control over successive mayors, governors, city councils, and the Legislature.¹¹⁷ Few state legislatures were free of scandal. The 1867-68 legislative session of Illinois "was a veritable orgy of boodle legislation." Wisconsin, Iowa, Kansas, Missouri, Minnesota, and other midwestern states shared the shame of New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland.¹¹⁸ The record of Congress and of federal administration was scarcely, if any, better.¹¹⁹ The eight years of U. S. Grant in the White House were little better than a national disgrace. All the festering evils of post-war times came to a head and pock-marked the body politic from head to foot. Scandal and corruption whispered all about him, the hands of his closest advisers were dirty; yet he stubbornly refused to hear the whispers or see the dirt.¹²⁰

A favorite field of financial buccaneering was railroad spoliation.† Probably the most unscrupulous and ruthless group was the small New York coterie composed of Cornelius Vanderbilt, Daniel Drew, Jim Fisk, Jay Gould, and Russell Sage, whose "Erie War" ‡ "smirched executive, judiciary, banks, corporate systems, professions, and people . . . in one dirty cesspool of vulgar corruption."¹²¹

* The two political parties were equally involved. The "Tweed Ring," whose peculations were variously estimated from $50,000,000. to $200,000,000., were in league with the Democratic Tammany Hall organization, while in Philadelphia the "Gas Ring," which embezzled millions, was under Republican domination.

† Another area no less profitable was that of municipal franchises and public utilities in which such notorious figures as William Elkins, Peter A. B. Widener, William C. Whitney, Thomas Fortune Ryan, Mark Hanna, Patrick Calhoun, and others built enormous fortunes by buying public officials and fleeing investors. Their operations constituted an incredibly sordid tale of deceit, treachery, and wholesale robbery of which the full details never have been and never can be told.—Cf. B. J. Hendrick, op. cit., pp. 121 ff.

‡ The "Erie War" was a fight between Vanderbilt and Drew, Gould, and Fisk for control of the Erie Railway and stock market profits. The latter group, without authority of the Board of Directors, issued bogus stock certificates in the amount of $10,000,000.; had the issues legalized by buying the Legislature, paying from $15,000 to $100,000 to senators for their votes; offered them on the Stock Exchange, and when the market broke bought them back at a fraction of the original selling price.—J. T. Adams, op. cit., p. 280; the full details are narrated by Gustavus Myers, History of the Great American Fortunes, Part III, ch. x; see also Charles Francis Adams, Jr., and Henry Adams, Chapters of Eric, and Other Essays.

The attitude of these men and others of their kind toward the law and public welfare can be pithily summed up in Vanderbilt's alleged retort when reminded that certain of his transactions were "absolutely forbidden" by the law. "Law!" he is said to have roared, "What do I care about law? Hain't I got the power?"

Though the urge of industrial magnates and lords of finance to make money was intense, moneymaking was not their sole purpose. They were dominated by an inordinate ambition for success—influenced by the prevailing cult of success which was fostered by new and greater opportunities arising from the rapid increase in national wealth, the immense variety and extent of newly discovered natural resources, and the great expansion of industrial and commercial enterprise. They were animated not less by a desire to gain power, to do big things, to achieve the impossible. This preoccupation with power was so absorbing that it crowded out every other concern, blinded men to moral principles, obscured the worthier goals of life. Their methods were ruthless, tainted with fraud, regardless of public opinion, heedless of social consequences.

This prevailing corruption was not a new aspect of American life. What was new, as Henry Steele Commager has asserted, "was the magnitude, . . . [the] pervasiveness, and . . . [the] ostentation" of the operations.¹²²

A deplorable aspect of the situation was the complacency and apathy of the general public. The citizenry at large seemed to be blinded to the illicit means used in the accumulation of wealth. Its possession was commonly accepted as evidence of ability and skill.

Yet grounds for blanket indictment of all engaged in industry, business, and politics did not exist. Innumerable exceptions existed of men who scorned to engage in the current corrupt practices, while here and there solitary voices were raised in protest and rebuke. William Jewett Tucker, who during the years 1875-80 was pastor of the Madison Square Presbyterian Church, New York City, testifies to the presence in his congregation of numerous men "in public life and in the more exacting forms of business," including two mayors of the city, who impressed him by their "spiritual accessibility" and "spirit of worship."¹²³ And many other ministers in widely scattered sections of the country could bear a like testimony.

DEVELOPING AMERICAN IMPERIALISM

In his fourth annual message to Congress on December 9, 1868, President Andrew Johnson gave expression to a long-pentup national aspiration to spread freedom and democracy throughout the world:

the conviction is rapidly gaining ground in the American mind that with the increased facilities for intercommunication between all portions of the earth the principles of free government, as embraced in our Constitution, if faithfully maintained and carried out, would prove of sufficient strength and breadth to comprehend within their sphere and influence the civilized nations of the world.¹²⁴

This conviction of America's mission, perhaps best expressed in the phrase "Manifest Destiny," had been invoked variously in spirit and in word by presidents and statesmen from the time of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson.* In 1813 Adams wrote to Jefferson, "Our pure, virtuous, public-spirited, federative republic will last forever, govern the globe, and introduce the perfection of man . . ." ¹²⁵ The concept did not involve intent or purpose of militaristic conquest. These early American leaders expected America to influence the world "in the manner of the stars with their kindly light—by the passive radiation of . . . 'brilliant example.'" ¹²⁶ But in time this pacific, idealistic objective was interfused with economic and political aims, a process facilitated by growing commerce between the United States and foreign nations.

Within the year following the close of the War of Independence Robert Morris, merchant prince and founder of the Bank of North America—oldest financial institution in the United States—together with several other merchants, fitted out the Empress of China which carried the Stars and Stripes into the port of Canton. Before the end of Washington's second administration the American flag was familiar not only in Canton but also in the ports of India, Java, and the Philippines.

In the decade 1830-40 American business with China totaled almost $75,000,000. The British government, as a result of the Opium War which it waged against China, extorted certain commercial privileges from the Chinese. With a financial stake amounting to millions of dollars annually it was but natural for the American merchants of Canton to desire government protection against possible discrimination in favor of the British. In their behalf Abbott Lawrence, cotton-mill owner of Massachusetts, in 1840 laid before the House of Representatives their memorial "asking for the appointment of a commercial agent . . . to negotiate a commercial treaty . . . and for the dispatch to Chinese waters of a suitable naval force for the protection of American trade and property."¹²⁷

President Tyler in 1842 proposed to Congress authorization of a special mission to seek a treaty from the Emperor of China. The mission, duly authorized, encountered no special difficulty in negotiating the Wanghia Treaty, signed on July 3, 1844, which secured for American citizens the coveted commercial privileges in Chinese ports and right of trial in their own consular courts if and when violation of Chinese law should be charged against them.¹²⁸

* In 1785 Jefferson had proposed "that the seal of the United States should represent the Children of Israel led by a pillar of light." His biographer asserts that Jefferson was convinced "the American people was a chosen people, . . . gifted with superior wisdom and strength."—Gilbert Chinard, Thomas Jefferson, the Apostle of Americanism, p. 428. See also Samuel Flagg Bemis, A Diplomatic History of the United States, p. 313.

The Mexican War (1846-48), brought on by tensions arising out of the annexation of the Republic of Texas and subsequent dispute over its boundary, and the desire of the United States to acquire upper California, ended with a treaty which not only abrogated Mexico's claim to Texas but ceded also New Mexico and California.* Andrew Jackson in his Farewell Message had declared that the Americans had been chosen by Providence as "the guardians of freedom, to preserve it for the benefit of the human race," a concept which, transmuted into the popular slogan "extension of the area of freedom," had served effectively in promotion of the war spirit. A popular interpretation of this expansionist ideology held that it was America's moral responsibility, even religious duty, to regenerate the oppressed, unfortunate people of the enemy nation "by bringing them into the life-giving shrine of American democracy."¹²⁹

The decade of the fifties marked the emergence of a definite, deliberate, and ambitious expansionism. Its first expression was the opening up of Japan. Early in 1852 President Millard Fillmore commissioned Commodore Matthew C. Perry to command a naval expedition to Japan. On November 24 Perry sailed from Norfolk, Virginia, with a small naval force. His somewhat apologetic phrasing of national ambition was in accord with naval tradition: "we cannot expect to be free from the ambitious longings of increased power, which are the natural concomitants of national success."¹³⁰ After laying before the Japanese commissioners the American demands, in disregard of Japan's national rights, in violation of her territorial waters, he seized some of the Bonin Islands.† The treaty which he negotiated was duly signed in 1854.

Franklin Pierce, when inaugurated as President (March 4, 1853), for the first time in American history enunciated territorial aggrandizement as a national aim. James Buchanan reiterated the sentiment of his predecessor in terms of a permanent national purpose: "Expansion is in the future the policy of our country, and only cowards fear and oppose it."¹³¹

A former American medical missionary, evidently disposed to take Buchanan at his word, moved to put the newly declared expansionist policy into effect. Dr. Peter Parker, now in the service of the government, learned that an American company seeking to exploit the trade of Formosa had raised the Stars and Stripes at Takow. To him this seemed an opportunity too good to ignore. An obliging naval officer close at hand offering to collaborate by keeping the flag aloft until the approval of Washington could be secured, Parker communicated to the State Department his hope that "the Government of the United States may not shrink from the action which the interests of hu-

* War against Mexico was declared despite strong opposition in Congress. Abraham Lincoln "lifted his voice against the war" and Joshua R. Giddings condemned it as "a war against an unoffending people, without adequate or just cause, for the purpose of conquest; with the design of extending slavery: in violation of the Constitution, against the dictates of justice, humanity, . . . and the precepts of the religion which we profess."—Charles A. and Mary R. Beard, The Rise of American Civilization, I, 606.

† Perry's superiors at Washington repudiated his action, whereupon the U. S. flag was lowered in the Bonin Islands and the sovereignty of Japan reasserted.

manity, civilization, navigation, and commerce impose upon it in relation to Tai-wan" Much to his chagrin the word came back that the United States military and naval forces could be used only "by the authority of Congress." ¹³²

William H. Seward as Secretary of State (1860-69) rephrased the expansionist doctrine in much more specific and grandiose terms than ever had been used before, predicting that eventually American outposts would be extended on the northwest coast to the Arctic, that Canada would be brought into the Union, that the Latin-American republics would be joined with the United States into a great confederation of which Mexico City would be the capital, and that the Far East—"in regions where civilization first began"—would be the scene of conflict between America and Russia.¹³³ Seward implemented his declaration by the purchase of Alaska in 1867, and proposed to expand the idea further by the purchase of the Virgin Islands from Denmark and the acquisition of the Bay of Samana, Santo Domingo, but was thwarted by the opposition of Congress.¹³⁴ In these immediate postwar years Congress was too deeply engrossed in the difficult problems of internal reconstruction to concern itself seriously with expansion abroad.

However, despite the bitter sectional antagonisms engendered by the war, powerful forces were working effectually in the forging of a new and stronger national unity. These influences are succinctly described by Merle Curti:

New social and economic ties did much to soften antagonisms The expansion of industrial and finance capitalism from the East into both South and West forged a new and tightly knit web of interests. Both business and labor tended to assume the pattern of national organization. . . . The problems arising from the expansion and integration of business inevitably became issues for discussion on a nation-wide scale. . . . By the sixties the transcontinental railroad was a visible band of steel across the country, and railways uniting South and North provided a material basis for reconciliation. . . . the railroads facilitated the dissolution of prejudices and the growth of common ideas by enabling people to go to and fro on a scale that never before had been possible. The multiplication of telegraph lines . . . the consolidation of news services in the Associated Press, and the appearance of the telephone . . . promised to break down isolation and sectionalism by reducing both time and space within the national domain.¹³⁵

The United States was at the same time awakening to a new realization of its place in an interdependent family of nations; a consciousness that independently of its own choice, by virtue of its industrial strength, its growth in commerce, its expanding geographical area and population, and its phenomenal increase in wealth, it was rapidly becoming a world power with a heavy stake in the political stability, order, and economic progress of other nations.

Within the first year of his administration (1869) Ulysses S. Grant maneuvered for the annexation of Santo Domingo by the United States and negotiated a treaty to this end but failed to obtain the necessary two-thirds Senate vote of approval.* Undiscouraged, he continued to advocate expansion in the Caribbean. The President next directed his expansionist intentions toward Samoa but in this also his efforts came to naught.

In the first year of the Hayes administration an offer of annexation from Samoa was rejected by Secretary of State Frelinghuysen with the assertion that "The policy of this Government . . . has tended toward avoidance of possessions disconnected from the main continent."¹³⁶ However, this tendency—if tendency in a real sense it was—soon began to give way before the resurgence of imperialistic ambitions. In 1889 the United States, in collaboration with England and Germany, arranged for a tripartite protectorate over the Samoan group.†

Unmistakable signs of the weakening of resistance to Manifest Destiny were seen when in 1893 in the administration of Benjamin Harrison a treaty of annexation of the Hawaiian Islands,‡ two thousand miles from America's west coast, was presented to Congress. Action was halted by Grover Cleveland's reaccession to power but the resolution of annexation was finally signed by William McKinley in 1898.¹³⁷ In this development the United States shared a tendency common to most of the great nations. An era of world imperialism had begun.

Some of the roots of [this] imperialism were economic, for growing populations and expanding industrial systems demanded new markets. Some were political, for rival nations sought strength in overseas dependencies. Some were naval . . . Some were religious and ethical, for evangelical churchmen felt it a Christian duty to spread light in dark places, while reformers talked of the white man's mission of uplifting backward peoples.¹³⁸

At this juncture political and religious motives often became mutually complementary. Political leaders used the citizens' sense of moral and religious responsibility as a means of promoting expansion for the sake of commercial gain and some church leaders in turn argued that missions would result in the spread of commerce and increase in national prosperity, repaying many times over for all the money invested in them. A. T. Mahan, a chief exponent of national expansion through sea power, in his numerous books and articles in popular magazines variously phrased his defense of force as a Christian

* In his last annual message to Congress (Dec. 5, 1876) Grant naively stated that had his early policy been approved "the soil [of Santo Domingo] would soon have fallen into the hands of the United States capitalists."—James D. Richardson, Comp., A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents, VI, 4366.

† This arrangement prevailed for only a few years. It was superseded in 1900 by a treaty which allocated Tutuila and some small islets to the United States, and the remaining islands to Germany. Thus American suzerainty was established in the southern Pacific.

‡ This action was deeply disturbing to many isolationists. In an article in Harper's New Monthly Magazine Carl Schurz stated that it represented a new interpretation of Manifest Destiny as national policy: "the acquisition of such territory, far and near, as may be useful in enlarging our commercial advantages, and in securing to our navy facilities desirable for the operations of a great naval power."—"Manifest Destiny," LXXXVII (June to November, 1893), 738.

means of the conversion of the nations. "To right what is amiss, to convert, to improve, to develop, is of the very essence of the Christian ideal," he declared.

Without man's responsive effort, God Himself is—not powerless—but deprived of the instrument through which alone He wills to work. Hence the recognition that, if force is necessary, force must be used for the benefit . . . of the commonwealth of the world.¹³⁹

In demanding the retention of the Philippines Senator Albert J. Beveridge proclaimed that God had "marked the American people as His chosen nation to finally lead in the regeneration of the world."¹⁴⁰ W. F. Taylor in an address at the Methodist Centenary Congress (1885) declared, "It is the civilization originating in . . . [missions] which has created a demand for our commerce, the products of our lands, the labors of our artisans, the trade of our merchants, and the employment of our ships."¹⁴¹ The Missionary Society in a promotional tract included an article entitled "The Reflex Influence of Foreign Missions," which stated:

We do not work for the conversion of the heathen without realizing reflex benefit to our land, our Churches, and ourselves. Our commerce has been increased. . . . Christian missions have produced and provided safe Christian ports; have increased permanent wealth in heathen and desolated lands, thus increasing their buying capacity, and the demand for plows, cutlery, and other of our manufactures.¹⁴²

In no publication were the nationalistic ambition and the missionary appeal more skillfully interfused than in Josiah Strong's widely circulated volume, Our Country. Strong contended that "God, with infinite wisdom and skill," had long been training the nation and its people for the hour sure to come when the United States would dominate the whole world. Not only was God "preparing in our civilization the die with which to stamp the nations, but, . . . [also] preparing mankind to receive our impress." He continued:

Then this race of unequaled energy, with all the majesty of numbers and the might of wealth behind it—the representative, let us hope, of the largest liberty, the purest Christianity, the highest civilization—having developed peculiarly aggressive traits calculated to impress its institutions upon mankind, will spread itself over the earth. If I read not amiss, this powerful race will move down upon Mexico, down upon Central and South America, out upon the islands of the sea, over upon Africa and beyond.¹⁴³

A Changing Church in a Changed Society

EVEN AS THE structure of American Society was profoundly altered during the fifty years 1845-95 so also was the Methodist Episcopal Church changed in all phases of its life and work. It was inevitable that a Church which, as perhaps no other denomination, was a people's movement* would be affected by the social, economic, and cultural forces which were transforming American life. Methodism as an integral part of the nation was subject to the influences that were reconstituting society as a whole.

The Church itself was but slightly aware of the transformation it was undergoing. Many of the members, particularly of the older generation, were conscious of certain changes that were taking place and some were dismayed by them, but few realized their inner significance. Certain of the quadrennial Episcopal Addresses expressed concern lest the Church depart from the standards which had caused Methodists of earlier days to be regarded as "a peculiar people." In their address to the General Conference of 1852 the Bishops said:

If we have correctly estimated this 'age of progress' and change, there never was a period fraught with more danger to the soundness and stability of first principles, and their legitimate application in domestic, civil, and religious governments, than the present. . . . In the state of the times, as General Superintendents, we have regarded it to be our duty to awaken in you a more than ordinary vigilance to preserve from radical change the excellent system which began with our fathers, and from them has come under our guardianship.¹

In his address to the British Wesleyan Conference of 1865 Bishop Edmund S. Janes said:

It is, perhaps, a most important question for us to answer whether the American Methodism of 1865 is the Methodism introduced in 1766. Notwithstanding all that croakers and grumblers have said or can say on this subject, a careful examination will show that if it does not strictly retain the resemblance of the impression to the signet, it does bear the identity of manhood to childhood, of the harvest to the seed.²

The Bishop went on to mention certain changes, chiefly in the polity and practice of the Church, but failed to press on to the close, analytic scrutiny that characterized Wesley's examination of the religious life and institutions of his time.

* See Vol. II, 367-72.

Much the same note was sounded in the Pastoral Address of 1872:

From the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Alaska to Texas, an open door is set before us, as a denomination, to proclaim a present, free, and full salvation all over our land, and to lay strong foundations for Christian civilization. . . .

. . . You may avail yourselves of all that is valuable in the present age of progress without departing from the old landmarks, for Methodism is not only 'Christianity in earnest,' but it is Christianity availing itself of modern appliances—Christianity conquering the world for Christ. . . . Let 'Holiness to the Lord' still be our motto. May it be inscribed not only on our Churches, but on our business and on our pleasures³

Reluctant as the Bishops were to admit the extent and depth of the process under way—if indeed they were fully cognizant of it—Methodism was changing significantly in respect to the itinerancy, the relation of the Church to society, methods of evangelism, and in other important ways.

A CHANGING ITINERANCY

The trend toward comparative increase of Stations which had become marked in the thirties was accelerated in the forties and fifties. For example, of nineteen appointments in 1846 on the Newark District, New Jersey Conference, eight were Stations.* Not until 1857 did the Philadelphia Conference Minutes contain detailed statistics indicating the number of churches on a charge. In that year twelve of the thirty appointments of the Reading District were Stations. In contrast, on the Easton District all of the eighteen appointments were still Circuits. A decade later, of the forty-one appointments of the Reading District twenty-seven reported but one Church. The Cazenovia District, Oneida Conference, had in 1858 twenty-six appointments of which thirteen were Stations.

The trend toward an increasing number of Stations was less marked in the West than in the East and in the Mission Conferences of the far West practically nonexistent. The ten English-speaking Districts of the Illinois Conference, within the state of Illinois, had in 1859 only twenty-nine Stations as compared with eighty-eight Circuits.⁴

As early as 1846 Stephen Olin was convinced that the trend toward changing from Circuits to Stations had gone too far. In that year he stated in an address on "Missions and Methodism":

* This statement and those following on the comparative number of Stations and Circuits are based on presumptive evidence. The Conference Minutes do not in most cases specifically designate appointments as Stations or Circuits, nor do they indicate the number of organized Societies. If an appointment is reported as having only one church and one Sunday school it is presumably a Station and is so reckoned in the above statements; if two or more churches and Sunday schools are reported it is obviously a Circuit. However, in a few instances an appointment reported as having one church and one Sunday school may have had in addition one or more preaching places without a church or Sunday school in which case the Minutes are misleading.

[The number of] petty stations ought to be greatly, though gradually diminished; not by their abandonment but by a return, wherever it is practicable, to the circuit system. Two or three of these small societies, united in a circuit, would afford an inspiring and remunerating field of ministerial labor, when the preacher would get a better support, and the people, we verily believe, would get better preaching.⁵

The explanation of the change was obvious. Urbanization was causing a comparative increase in number of larger towns and cities and city churches demanded more of a minister's time and more frequent services than the rural Societies; increase of money in circulation and rise in the income level of church members made it possible for a larger number of the Societies to assume the entire support of a minister; the supply of preachers, while still unequal to the need, was more nearly adequate; and, finally, many of the preachers—a larger proportion of whom were married men—were less willing than those of an earlier generation to undergo the discomforts and disadvantages imposed by large Circuits which required excessive travel, together with frequent and prolonged absences from home.

A second significant development affecting the itinerancy was the change from a uniform allowance for all Traveling Preachers, including Bishops, to a salary determined by the Quarterly Conference of each Circuit or Station. The Disciplinary "annual allowance of married travelling preachers" up to 1860 was "two hundred dollars and their travelling expenses"; of unmarried preachers, "one hundred dollars, and their travelling expenses." The General Conference of that year changed the rule.* In the older Conferences for several years the regulation had been a dead letter. The New Jersey Conference Minutes for 1854-55 printed for the first time the "allowance" and the amount received by each preacher. In the Newark District appointments had been made to twenty-three Circuits and Stations. In the case of three of these the "allowances" were not stated. The remaining twenty ranged from $100. to $1,000.†

In the Philadelphia Conference "salaries" were first reported in the 1862 Minutes. On the North Philadelphia District the highest salary, $1,250., was paid by Trinity Church, Philadelphia; the lowest by Calvary, $118.07.⁶

The Minutes of the Illinois Conference for 1859 list the "claims" of all Traveling Preachers, the term "claim" being used in place of "allowance." The claim of James Leaton, pastor of the Springfield Station, the highest in the Conference, was $1,017. On six of the fourteen charges of the Spring-

* The regulation enacted in 1860 read: "It shall be the duty of the Quarterly Conference of each Circuit and Station" to appoint an Estimating Committee to "make an estimate of the amount necessary to furnish a comfortable support to the preacher or preachers stationed among them, taking into consideration the number and condition of the family . . . which estimate shall be subject to the action of the Quarterly Conference, and the Stewards shall provide by such methods as they may judge best to meet such amount."—G. C. Journal, 1860, p. 288.

† The respective allowances paid by the twenty Circuits and Stations were: one, $100.; one, $300.; two, $400.; one, $432.; two, $425.; two, $500.; one, $510.; five, $600.; one, $716.; two, $800.; one, $900.; one, $1,000. Each of two churches in the Conference paid its pastor $1,000.: Broad Street, Newark; and Trinity, Jersey City. All but two of the twenty churches paid the allowance in full; two paid slightly more than the allowance.—Minutes, New Jersey Conference, 1855, pp. 6 ff.

field District the claim was in excess of $600. The lowest, $163., was that of the junior preacher on the Chatham Circuit. On seven charges deficits on the claim were reported. The deficits ranged from $75. to $374., the latter at Taylorville where slightly more than one-half of the claim was paid. The claims of the Presiding Elders ranged from $570.—that of Peter Cartwright, Jacksonville District, on which a deficit of $242. was reported—to $964. on the Springfield District.

These statistics supply conclusive evidence that by 1855 all Methodist preachers were no longer on the same economic level. Gone were the days when every preacher, whether a humble Circuit Rider, pastor of a city church, Presiding Elder, or Bishop, received the same allowance. The Station preacher received more than the Circuit Rider; the Presiding Elder more than the Station pastor; the editor and the Corresponding Secretary of a board more than a Presiding Elder; and the Bishop more than either editor or Secretary. Already the differential was considerable. As the years passed it became much greater.

The inflation that accompanied the Civil War brought a sharp increase in the salary level. In the Indiana Conference, for example, the salary paid to the pastor of Wesley Chapel, Indianapolis, increased from $1,000. to $1,700.; Greencastle increased from $745. to $1,000.; Vincennes from $750. to $820.; Bloomington from $700. to $1,000.; Paoli from $246.50 to $825.⁷ Similar increases occurred in other Conferences.* Increases on Circuits in the newer Conferences were less.

Through the greater part of the period salaries of domestic missionaries in the far West continued to be on a poverty level. At its meeting on November 16, 1880, the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society appropriated $519. to be allocated to twenty-two mission charges of the West Nebraska Mission to supplement amounts contributed by the churches. Examples of respective amounts paid to five of the twenty-two missions were: Sidney, $25., and to be raised by the people, $150.; North Platte, $50., locally, $50.; Cozad, $20., locally, $40.; Kearney, $40., locally, $100.; Grand Island, $32., locally, $60. The average amount paid locally toward support was $71.36. The highest salary paid, counting local support and missionary allocation, was $175.; the lowest, $60. Chauncey Hobart records that one of the preachers on the Minnesota frontier had given up a salary of $40. a month "for the privilege of preaching the Gospel . . . for less than $40. a year" and that another traveled the Mankato Circuit for an entire year during which he received as cash salary only $9.⁸

A third modification of the itinerant system had to do with the method of fixing the appointments of preachers. Even before the division of the

* In the New Jersey Conference, for example, 1861 to 1866, Green Street, Trenton, increased from $800. to $1,200.; Broad Street, Burlington, from $700. to $900.; Third Street, Camden, $1,000. to $1,500.; Trinity, Bridgeton, $600. to $800.—Ibid., 1861, pp. 31 ff.; ibid., 1866, pp. 36 ff.

Church a changed attitude on the part of both churches and preachers toward the appointing power had become more or less common—an attitude which within a few decades would greatly modify the system which prevailed during the days of Asbury and McKendree. On March 24, 1842, John McClintock, then a professor in Dickinson College, wrote to his friend Dallas D. Lore, pastor at Lancaster, Pennsylvania, asking: "Have you selected your next station yet? Or have you chosen your successor in Lancaster?"⁹

The disposition of churches practically to dictate to the Bishops as to who should be appointed pastor had by 1845 become a serious embarrassment to them in their responsibility of determining the appointments. In a discourse on the "Administration of Discipline" delivered before several of the eastern Conferences Bishop Hedding said:

The difficulties attending this duty [of appointment of pastors] are increasing every year; and unless there be an abatement of the claims of some, both of the preachers and people, for certain places and certain men, it is impossible to see how the itinerant system can be long maintained in some parts of the country.¹⁰

The Disciplinary rule limiting pastoral tenure to two years, which had been fixed by the 1804 General Conference, was still in force in 1844-45. In 1864 the possible pastoral term was extended to three years, and in 1888 to five years. The General Conference of the latter year changed the limitation on appointment of a Presiding Elder to the same District successively from four to six years.

The Methodist ministry was changing also in its general character. The establishment of the Concord Biblical Institute (later the Boston Theological Seminary) in 1847; the Garrett Biblical Institute of Evanston, Illinois, in 1854; and Drew Theological Seminary in 1867; and the eagerness with which their graduates were welcomed into the pastorates of leading churches signaled the emergence of a new and higher type of ministerial leadership in Methodism.

As the number of churches which expected full-time ministerial service steadily increased, demand also grew for a larger proportion of academically trained preachers. Elsewhere attention has been directed to the wide range of temperament, personality, and intellectual gifts represented in the early American Methodist ministry.* Along with numerous men of superior preaching ability, including some who attained recognition far beyond the limits of their denomination, there were many Circuit Riders whose sermons were little more than fervent exhortations. These men could not acceptably serve in Station appointments, either in the cities or the larger towns. By the middle of the century the churches, particularly of the East and the Midwest, had among their lay members a goodly number of graduates of

Methodist and other denominational colleges who, while they valued unction and spiritual power, also desired from their ministers sermons which supplied ethical and religious instruction and challenged thought and action.¹¹

A negative factor in the life and work of the Church during the period was the decline in recognition and prestige of Local Preachers in the Church's program. In proportion to Traveling Preachers their number did not decrease greatly between 1845 and 1895,* but the increase in number of Stations and possibly other unrealized influences contributed to less use of them in the denomination at large and in the local churches. It seemed to Abel Stevens an amazing fact that Methodism would allow the local ministry to lapse practically into inefficiency just at the time when other evangelical denominations, and the newly organized Y.M.C.A., were eagerly making a larger place for laymen in evangelistic work and other forms of Christian service. He declared:

The Church is full of advanced laymen—teachers, legislators, lawyers, doctors, and others equally able—whom she should set to work in her service, as she did in her old victorious days. But the very thought of the availability of these forces seems to have almost died out of the denomination in our older fields. Who can deny that there is as wide and urgent a field as ever there has been in our history, for such laborers, in the vast neglected suburbs of our great cities, and in our rural districts as well?¹²

GROWING INFLUENCE OF THE LAITY

It was not to be expected that the victory of clericalism in the General Conference of 1824 which resulted in the organization of the Methodist Protestant Church had permanently settled the question of the right of lay representation in the governing body of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The surprising fact was that agitation of the subject was postponed for more than two decades. But, although not strongly vocal, conviction of democratic right persisted, and finally in 1852 found expression in a petition formulated by a convention of laymen held in Philadelphia. The General Conference of that year was not in a mood to consider the question seriously, voting 171 to 3 that it was "inexpedient so to alter the economy of the Church as to introduce Lay Delegation into the General and Annual Conferences." Like action was taken by the 1856 General Conference. But the climate of opinion in the Church was beginning to change.† In 1860 the Bishops, in their Epis-

* In 1846 the Church had 3,280 Traveling Preachers and 4,935 Local Preachers; in 1895 the respective numbers were 12,024 and 14,896.—General Minutes, 1846, p. 91; ibid., Fall, 1895 pp. 602 f.

† A noteworthy fact is that the strongest opponent of lay representation was a layman, Thomas E. Bond, "easily the first controversialist" in the Church. In 1828 he had written for the committee on Petitions and Memorials of the General Conference the report which was decisive in determining the issue in the long controversy. His argument chiefly rested on "the assumption that the divine call to the ministry carries with it the equally divine right of the ministers to the exclusive government of the Church. . . . virtually [putting the Church] on Roman Catholic ground." So apprehensive were the opponents of lay representation that the General Conference of 1852 recalled Bond to the editorship of the Christian Advocate. George R. Crooks: "He still, however, . . . relied upon the old arguments, republished his famous 'Appeal,' and claimed the authorship of the 'Report on Petitions and Memorials' of 1828—a point which, up to this time, had been in doubt."—The Life of Bishop Matthew Simpson of the Methodist Episcopal Church, pp. 408 ff.

copal Address, stated: "We are of opinion that Lay Delegation might be introduced in one form into the General Conference with safety, and perhaps advantage, that form being a separate house . . ." ¹³ Sentiment among the laity had become so strong that the Conference felt under compulsion to act. Accordingly, a resolution was passed expressing willingness to approve lay representation in the General Conference "when it shall be ascertained that the Church desires it." The question was therefore referred to a vote by orders—the preachers required "to lay the subject . . . before the male members over twenty-one years of age, and in full connection in their several charges" at meetings specially called for the purpose; and the Bishops instructed to present the question before all the Annual Conferences of 1862—the first time such an action had been taken in the history of American Methodism. Strange as it may seem, both the ministry and the laity voted adversely: the ministers voting 1,338 for, 3,069 against; the laymen 28,884 for, 47,855 against. A laymen's convention, held concurrently with the General Conference, maintained that the result was in no way decisive. The vote had been "very imperfectly and in some churches irregularly taken," the laymen charged, and besides preoccupation with the war had interfered with proper consideration of the question. They made vigorous demand for action by General Conference irrespective of the vote:

To resist the claim of the laity to participate in the general administration of the Church is, . . . a resistance of the whole tendency of the Christian life in this our age. In all the Protestant Churches of the world—unless our own be the sole exception—a more perfect association of the ministry with the laity in the administration of the interests of the kingdom of Christ is forming. This fact is one of the salient features of the Church history of our times.

They supplemented their declaration with other strong, pertinent arguments.¹⁴ But the Conference was unmoved, reaffirming its previous willingness to approve lay representation when assured "that the Church desires it," but discerning "no such declaration of the popular will as to justify . . . taking advanced action."¹⁵

By the time of meeting of the 1868 General Conference the demand of laymen for representation had become so strong as to be irresistible. The Conference not only voted to refer the question again but submitted a definite plan to be presented during the ensuing quadrennium with a recommendation for "the godly consideration of . . . ministers and people."¹⁶

The plan was approved by decisive vote: the people voting two to one for representation, and the ministers in the Annual Conferences by more than a three-fourths majority (4,915 to 1,597) to change the Restrictive Rule. The General Conference completed the action by voting 283 to 6 to concur in changing the rule.¹⁷

As a result, in the 1872 General Conference, eighty-eight years after the organization of the Church, laymen appeared for the first time as members of its supreme lawmaking body.* The legislation, however, provided for only two lay delegates from each Annual Conference, which did not satisfy the laity. Also, having obtained representation in the General Conference, they desired admission into Annual Conference membership. The General Conference of 1876 would go no farther than to authorize a commission of five ministers and five laymen to consider the "propriety" of the proposal. The commission made favorable report but the plan was tabled in 1880 and no action taken. The proposal was brought up again in 1884 and a commission, larger than before, was authorized "to take into consideration the whole subject of representation, ministerial and lay, and report." This commission in 1888 recommended equal lay and ministerial representation in General Conference, but expressed the judgment that it was not deemed "expedient to now recommend any plan" for lay membership in the Annual Conference. The vote in the Conferences of 1889-90 was adverse and the proposal again in 1893-94¹⁸ failed of approval.†

THE INNER LIFE OF THE CHURCH

In their address to the General Conference of 1852 the Bishops deplored an evident weakening of the traditional discipline of early American Methodism:

There appears to be more worldly-mindedness now than formerly. This is exhibited in conformity to the world, in costly dwellings, splendidly furnished—in gay and fashionable dress in which we can see little or no difference between professing Christians and those who make no profession of religion—fashionable parties, in some instances associated with vain and sinful amusements. . . . Another unfavourable omen, which awakens apprehension, is found in the neglect of many of our ministers to execute, with wholesome strictness, our excellent Discipline, each thinking that he finds extenuation, if not justification, in the neglect of his predecessor¹⁹

DECLINE IN DISCIPLINE

The changes which the Bishops deplored reflected a weakening of the inner life of the Church, a kind of creeping paralysis which had been under way for years. When John Scripps was appointed in 1819 to the Cape Girardeau and St. Francis Circuits, with John M'Farland as his colleague, he found even then that "the exercise of Discipline had been entirely neglected the preceding

* Andrew J. Endsley, of the Pittsburgh Conference, a prominent ministerial member of the General Conference, characterized the lay delegation: "The one hundred and twenty-nine laymen here are in the main men of note in their respective localities. Many are well known as successful merchants and manufacturers; some have filled positions of responsibility and honor in our State and National affairs. Several have been Governors, some are Congressmen, and some are occupying seats on benches of Circuit and Supreme Courts; and not a few are distinguished at the bar. On the whole, the laymen may be said to be very happy in the selection of their delegates."—Daily Christian Advocate, May 27, 1872, p. 1.

† The 1896 General Conference again recommended equal lay representation. This time the proposal was approved and in 1900 laymen were admitted to the General Conference in equal numbers with ministers.—G. C. Journal, 1896, pp. 428f., 298.

year.”²⁰ In a sermon preached in the early sixties George Peck* asserted that church discipline had all but fallen into contempt.

The old strictness of living is now scarcely attempted to be enforced. . . . Outward and inward pressure have borne upon ecclesiastical authority until it is fast becoming nerveless; and its restoration to its original vigor and efficiency is all but hopeless.²¹

By 1845 the Band had become practically nonexistent,† and the General Conference of 1856, on recommendation of its Committee on Revisals, struck from the Discipline all allusions to it. Signs were not lacking that a similar fate would in time overtake the Class meeting, which for more than three-quarters of a century had been a principal means of stimulating and conserving Christian fellowship among American Methodists.‡ “We grieve to hear,” said the Bishops in 1848, “that in many parts of our work there is a great, and, we fear, an increasing neglect of . . . class meetings.” “. . . more than any [other] prudential institution among us,” they declared, the Class meeting has “served to keep alive in our body the life and power of godliness.”²² By the eighties in many of the churches the Class had ceased to exist and in others the Class meeting was attended by only a fraction of the older members.

The 1864 General Conference made an attempt to reinforce discipline by authorizing a revised statement on “Neglect of the Means of Grace.” Members of the Church found guilty of habitual “neglect [of] . . . the public worship of God, the supper of the Lord, family and private prayer, searching the Scriptures, class-meetings, and prayer meetings” were to be excluded from membership.²³ This regulation was retained in the Discipline, in substantially the above form, until 1936, but was omitted in the first Discipline of the reunited Church. From the time of its enactment, however, little attention had been paid to its enforcement, and few if any members were ever brought to trial in accordance with its stipulated procedure.

INCREASING COMPLACENCY AND CONVENTIONALISM

The form and outward aspects of congregational worship also were gradually modified during the period as an outgrowth of a rising society dominated by material standards. Particularly in the larger towns and cities

* George Peck (1797-1876), one of five brothers who were ministers, was born in Middlefield, N. Y. He was received on trial in the Genesee Conference in 1816 (Gen'l Minutes, I, 269). At twenty-six he was elected to General Conference and successively re-elected twelve times. He was principal of Oneida Conference Seminary (1835-39); editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review (1840-48); and of the Christian Advocate (1848-52). Later he served as pastor and Presiding Elder in Wyoming Conference. He was the author of numerous books, including Work of Faith and Christian Perfection.—Christian Advocate, 101 (1926), 36 (Sept. 9), 1099 f.

† See Vol. II, 340-42.

‡ For example, the Committee on Class Meetings of the Illinois Conference at the session of 1859 expressed deep and painful conviction “that the Methodist Episcopal Church, within the bounds of the Illinois Conference, has suffered materially, both in her spiritual and financial interests, by the very general and culpable neglect of class meetings on the part of the membership, and the reprehensible inattention of the larger portion of the preachers . . . to those parts of the Discipline of the church regulating class meetings among us.”—Minutes, Illinois Conference, 1859, p. 34.

more attention than formerly was given by both ministers and lay people to order and convention. Worship became more subdued and less demonstrative. The loud "Amen" from numerous members of the congregation, earlier so generally expressed, was much less frequently heard. The charge of excessive emotionalism so frequently urged against Methodist revivalism during the early decades of the century was seldom made after 1850.

"I have wished a hundred times that I might have weathered the trials of the fathers, that I might have shared their triumph," wrote Gilbert Haven in 1853.

I have an old, wise, intelligent, orderly church, which makes me feel more than ever the difference between them and their fathers. The most earnest and elaborate discourses preached by bishops or doctors couldn't more than momentarily excite them. They would depart, say a few words about the sermon, and relapse into the ordinary tenor of their lives.²⁴

These changes were partly cause and partly effect of the change in the manner and content of Methodist preaching. Less effort was made by preachers to stir the emotions; and more generally than before appeal was directed to the intellect. In 1866 the Christian Advocate noted this shift in current preaching:

It became less declamatory, hortatory, denunciatory, in proportion as the preacher saw his congregations becoming less and less a collection of impenitent sinners. . . . he, unconsciously perhaps, assumed toward them a style of address adapted to their characters, and thus the preaching became largely didactic, consolatory, and edifying. The increased intelligence and thoughtfulness of . . . [the] people rendered necessary a larger mental furniture, and more elaborate preparations and discussions by the ministers; and this increase of brain-work in both hearers and preachers caused fewer sermons to suffice than were before thought necessary.²⁵

Less and less as the century progressed were the Methodists spoken of as "a peculiar people." The marks of differentiation from other evangelical Churches one by one were disappearing. Not only in the particulars mentioned but also in other ways members of Methodist churches conformed to the manners and customs which prevailed among other religious groups. Distinctiveness in dress was no longer prevalent; strictness in the observance of Sunday as the Christian Sabbath lessened; the reading of Sunday newspapers and the playing of games and sports on Sunday afternoon noticeably increased.

Among both ministers and laymen increased attention was given to organization, system, and efficiency in church administration. Church trustees, some of whom were not members of the Church—appointed because of their business standing—came to occupy a more prominent place in church affairs. Business meetings became increasingly important while prayer meetings declined in attendance and interest. More attention was given to architecture in church building. Pipe organs and paid choirs were for the first time introduced into many of the larger churches. Not that all of these were bad in themselves, but important as illustrating a prevailing trend.²⁶

A marked change from the days of Asbury and McKendree in the spirit and attitude of many preachers toward place, rank, and office in the ministry was noticeable. On his first furlough from India James M. Thoburn, a man concerning whom—as of few men—it might truly be said that for him “to live was Christ,” visited the General Conference of 1864. He was troubled in spirit by the political manipulations in connection with the election of Church officials which “absorbed more attention than all other interests combined.” The shuffling of offices “to suit the candidates,” and the open and officious trading of votes between friends of candidates for the various offices, were to him obnoxious practices. “This kind of thing may be all right among the politicians of this world, but . . . it seemed wholly out of place, to put it very mildly, in an assembly of Christian ministers.”²⁷

METHODISM A MIDDLE-CLASS MOVEMENT

By 1850, according to the U. S. census, the Methodists as a denominational family had become the wealthiest Church in the nation.* The number of churches had increased to 13,302; the total valuation to $14,825,070.²⁸ The trend toward increasingly expensive buildings led the Bishops to protest in their Pastoral Address of 1852:

Very costly edifices lay heavy taxes on our pecuniary resources, and we think do not tend to edification or godliness, but rather gender pride. When durable material, decency, sufficient space, due proportions, convenience, air, light &c., are secured, all beyond these seem to be superfluous or of doubtful character. The extra expenses appropriated in erecting churches for the destitute, would be a better outlay than mere ornament.²⁹

There were others, also, who felt that this trend was not in accordance with the Methodist tradition. In 1868 a correspondent of the Christian Advocate reported that in the cities of the western states—Michigan, Wisconsin, Indiana, Ohio, northern Illinois, and portions of Iowa—the tendency was “toward one-hundred-thousand-dollar churches” where “wealth, and style, and fashion gather, and the poor have not the Gospel preached to them.”

Contributions made in 1866 in connection with the Centenary celebration, for churchwide and local objects, amounted to $8,709,498.39.³⁰ In the eighties and nineties additional evidence of financial prosperity was to be seen, particularly in larger towns and cities, in still more costly church edifices, stained-glass windows, and better clothed worshipers.

The inner life of the Christian Church has always been affected in subtle ways by material prosperity.* Wesley was keenly conscious of this historic fact. He foresaw the certain effect that honesty, industry, and thrift would have upon material prosperity and the accumulation of wealth and warned the members of the Methodist Societies against the moral and spiritual dangers inherent in the process. His clear insight was validated in the changes which we have noted as taking place during these decades in the life of the Church. Its rapidly increasing wealth, says William Warren Sweet, was the "most serious problem faced by Methodism as a whole at this time."

It was this, together with the growing luxury of urban life, which was responsible for the many disturbing changes taking place in the church, which to an increasing number of earnest people seemed to be sapping Methodist vitality.³¹

The changes taking place were by no means all in the realm of the inner life of the Church. The entire program of the churches was affected. In concession to the mood of the times Methodism, like other evangelical Churches, in all of the large cities tended to forsake the crowded commercial and industrial sections and move to the prosperous residential districts, leaving behind a large constituency of wage earners.† The afternoon services attended by the working people were early eliminated.‡ Bishop John F. Hurst, in an address at an Evangelical Alliance meeting in 1887, commented on this tendency:

It was said that 'the church follows the people.' The churches in European cities did not 'follow the people.' Why should churches here do so? Why was there not as much need for a church in its old site as in the new?³²

The need was indisputable but in too many cases the will to maintain churches for ministry to the poor was lacking. By the close of the period it could no longer be said that Methodism was the Church of the common people. It was still a people's movement but its membership in the United States now was predominantly of the middle class.

THE CHURCH AND MORAL ISSUES

Never before in American history had Christian ethics been so flagrantly challenged as they were by the assumptions and practices of corporate business, the rape of natural resources, stock manipulation, and municipal and

* Walter Rauschenbusch: ". . . the financial welfare of the churches is bound up with the economic health of society, and . . . its perils increase as wealth accumulates in few hands and the social extremes draw farther apart. Moreover, the finances of the Church have always affected its constitution and inner life in the subtlest ways."—Christianity and the Social Crisis, pp. 297 f.

† The Roman Catholic Church did not remove from the crowded industrial areas of the big cities. A. I. Abell: "Though anxious to convert the privileged groups, Catholics always stressed their ministry to the poor. For example, the Paulist Fathers, under the direction of their founder, Isaac T. Hecker, established their central parish in the midst of Irish shanties in New York City."—The Urban Impact on American Protestantism, 1865-1900, p. 7.

‡ A. I. Abell: "For while Protestant theory disparaged material things, most Protestants loved comfort and worldly goods, the possession of which they regarded as the sure sign of Divine favor. . . . Even the Baptist and Methodist faiths, once religions of the poor, now displayed almost frantic solicitude for the spiritual welfare of the rich."—Ibid., p. 4.

national political corruption. But little light radiated from the pulpits of the Methodist ministry on the complexities, problems, and abuses of the new capitalism and new industrialism.* Many of the preachers were frank and fearless in denunciations of personal sins but strangely blind to social sins.† Few were the Methodist ministers who had anything to offer by way of criticism or counsel either for the entrepreneurs interested only in exploitation or for conscientious corporation managers who were seeking for Christian solutions of problems of human relations. Very few ministers of any denomination, for example, were forthright in condemnation of the national scandal involved in the building, and in the manipulation of the stocks, of the railroads, and few if any of the general councils of the Churches placed themselves on record regarding it. How lacking in moral insight even some outstanding leaders of the Church were in the areas of these issues which came to the fore in the decades following the Civil War is illustrated by the statement of J. W. Mendenhall, editor of the Methodist Review: "The criticism of the Church for its alleged inattention to social and industrial questions is not wholly justified, for such questions are new, and it is a problem to know what more to do than discuss them."‡ It was a humiliating confession for a leader of the Church. For in essence the evils were not new. Many were basically of the same character as those against which the eighth century prophets in God's name brought unsparring condemnation.

THE CHURCH AND SLAVERY

Although the anti-slavery action of the 1844 General Conference, which resulted in the division of Methodism, had been taken by a decisive majority the Disciplinary statements on slavery, long unsatisfactory to its opponents, remained unchanged.‡ This left the Methodist Episcopal Church in an anomalous position. Slaveholding by church members was not contrary to the law of the Church. Opposition to slavery steadily increased yet in 1856 there were six Annual Conferences—Baltimore, East Baltimore, Philadelphia, Western Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri—partly or wholly within slave states, in which slaveholding by church members still existed. In many of the local churches of these border Conferences slaveholders continued to be received into church membership with no questions raised. Gilbert Haven charged that this was "not only a sin in the administrators of the discipline of the Godkin: "The complexity of modern commercial operations is so great, the line between what is fair and what is foul so faint . . . that it is often very difficult for a man to say himself whether he is acting honestly or not, and much more so for a bystander."—"The Church as a Reformatory Agent," The Nation, June 16, 1870, p. 379.

† For statement on this characteristic of the earlier generation of Methodist preachers, see Vol. II, 8.

‡ The General Rules condemned the slave trade, declaring that all members of Methodist Societies "should continue to evidence their desire of salvation" by avoiding such evils as "the buying and selling of men, women, and children, with an intention to enslave them." The Disciplinary chapter on slavery stated that "no slaveholder shall be eligible to any official station" in the Church "where the laws of the State in which he lives will admit of emancipation, and permit the liberated slave to enjoy freedom."—Discipline, 1844, pp. 83, 202.

Church, but as likely before long to issue in breaking down all sense of the moral evil of the system.”³⁴

While sentiment was widespread in the Church for incorporating in the Discipline stronger anti-slavery legislation, the minority opposing any change was influential and vocal.* Alfred Brunson declared:

The brethren from the border conferences . . . or from the great commercial emporiums whose merchants dealt with the South, and whose interests were as much with the South as if they actually owned slaves themselves, strongly opposed any change of our rules . . . not because they really favored the system themselves, but because it was for the interest of the people they served, to let the system alone, however much wrong it might do the subjects of it, professing to view the evil as incurable.³⁵

The Church periodicals were divided on the issue of legislation. A pronounced anti-slavery position was maintained by Zion's Herald, the Northern and the Northwestern Christian Advocates. A moderate stand was held by the Christian Advocate, and the Pittsburgh, the Western, and the Central Advocates. One of the most vocal of the editors was Thomas E. Bond,† of the Christian Advocate.³⁶ His position by some was considered equivocal, and by others pro-slavery, accusations which he vehemently denied. He did, however, definitely assert that slaveholding was not a sin under all circumstances and that the “General Conference would do a . . . wrong which would exceed the right of any Church council to inflict . . . by passing any rule of discipline which would exclude all slaveholders from the Church, without regard to their character or circumstances.” He maintained also that the superior “state of civilization” of Negroes in America, as compared with natives of Africa, “has been a result of slavery—the providential good out of the bitter evil”—and that “it is evidently . . . [God’s] design to use the abominable wickedness of the slave-trade for the regeneration of Africa.”³⁷

Bond’s editorials engendered bitter controversy. A number of the most prominent ministers were in substantial accord with his position, including John McClintock, John P. Durbin, Abel Stevens, and George R. Crooks. In 1848 he was defeated for re-election by the anti-slavery group but in the General Conference of 1852, as the leader of the opposition to lay representation, was again made editor. Following his death in 1856 Abel Stevens became editor.

Meanwhile, sentiment against any compromise with the slavery system was steadily increasing in the Church; and although Stevens’ opposition to withdrawal from slave territory and denial of church membership to slaveholders was couched in much more conciliatory terms than Bond’s editorial utter-

* The issue, according to George R. Crooks, was not one of slavery or anti-slavery. “Rather it was a question of the best measures to be applied to members of the Church who had been faithful to us; faithful, too, in the presence of a pressure which, if it could have had its way, would have forced them into union with the pro-slavery South.”—Op. cit., p. 362.

ances, he failed of re-election in the General Conference of 1860.* In his place Edward Thomson, president of Ohio Wesleyan University, of pronounced anti-slavery convictions, was selected editor—having received 142 votes as against 73 votes for Stevens.

At this General Conference the slavery issue was paramount in the thought of all delegates. The Bishops reported that three proposals had been submitted to the Annual Conferences for changing the General Rule but that none had received the required constitutional three-fourths majority. Eight hundred and eleven memorials were received from thirty-three Conferences, signed by 45,857 persons, and from forty-nine Quarterly Meeting Conferences, asking for "the extirpation of slavery from the Church"; and 137 memorials from thirty-two Annual Conferences signed by 3,999 persons, and from forty-seven Quarterly Meeting Conferences, urging that no change be made.³⁸

The Committee on Slavery made two reports. The minority report, adverse to change, was defeated. The first resolution of the majority report, recommending to the Annual Conferences a change in the General Rule, lacked four votes of the two-thirds majority required for passage. A further recommendation condemning slaveholding as well as the buying and selling of human beings "as chattels," and admonishing "preachers and people to keep themselves pure from this great evil, and to seek its extirpation by all lawful and Christian means," was carried by majority vote. The Conference then took an action which in effect declared the chapter to be advisory only, not statutory. It also struck from the Discipline the proviso which declared that no slaveholder should be eligible as a Local Preacher "to the office of an Elder or Deacon, where the laws will admit of emancipation."³⁹

Although the new statement fell short of the demands made by the majority of the memorials, its adoption caused excited agitation in Delaware, Maryland, and West Virginia, with many threats of withdrawal from the Church. In the 1861 Baltimore Annual Conference a majority of the members, almost all of whom were pastors of churches in Virginia, declared themselves separate and independent, but still an integral part of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Bishop Levi Scott ruled the action null and void, and in 1862 the names of sixty-six were recorded as withdrawn. Several of the local congregations in the city of Baltimore were organized as independent Methodist churches.⁴⁰

* At the 1860 New York East Conference, preceding the election of delegates to General Conference, a document signed by many prominent laymen was circulated imploring the preachers "by your love for us to vote for no one, whatever may be your personal regard for him, who you are not morally certain will, if elected, stand in the General Conference as a rock against any change of the General Rule on Slavery." Threats were made that if Stevens should not be re-elected editor of the Advocate an opposition journal would be started. The Methodist was established with George R. Crooks and John McClintock as editors. Its purpose was declared editorially in the first issue: "There are hundreds of thousands of conservative Methodists in these Middle States; they have an indisputable right to have a paper which shall be agreeable to their convictions. The Methodist is such a paper." (The Methodist, I [1860], 1 [July 14], 4.) With the oncoming of war popular sentiment quickly changed to support of the administration and the Methodist "dropped the slavery question and became the great advocate of lay delegation." (Edward Thomson [Junior], Life of Edward Thomson . . . , pp. 145 ff.) The Methodist was merged with the Christian Advocate, and suspended publication on Oct. 7, 1882.—The Methodist, XXIII (1882), 40 (Oct. 7), 1.

The outbreak of war brought quick and decisive reaction throughout the North. What appeal to moral principle had been unable to accomplish the call to patriotism quickly achieved. Everywhere the cry, "the union must be preserved," resounded from pulpits and civic platforms. An attitude of indifference toward slavery was transformed into absolute denunciation.* Every Methodist Episcopal Annual Conference authorized a committee on "The State of the Country," and resolutions pledging support of the government† were passed, often unanimously.⁴¹

TEMPERANCE REFORM

The influence of the national temperance crusade under the leadership of the American Society for the Promotion of Temperance‡ reached a high point in the late forties and early fifties. Daniel Dorchester estimated that not more than one-third as much liquor was consumed per capita in 1850 as in 1823.⁴² The memorial for the restoration of Wesley's original rule, proposed in 1848, which in the two preceding quadrenniums had failed of securing a two-thirds vote of the Annual Conferences, received the necessary majority on its third round. As adopted by the 1848 General Conference the rule forbade "Drunkenness, buying or selling spirituous liquors, or drinking them, unless in cases of extreme necessity."⁴³

In their Pastoral Address for 1848 the Bishops stated: "To the restoration of this rule we felt driven, as well by the propriety of the thing as by the force of public sentiment." However, they felt under compulsion to urge moderation in the measure of its enforcement:

But while we recommend a strict observance of this rule, and ask your faithful and strenuous coöperation to render it practically efficient, still, as its restoration is recent, and must have somewhat the nature of a retrospective or ex post facto law, we also recommend a reasonable forbearance with delinquents, and also kindness and gentleness in the mode of its enforcement. These remarks have a special reference to those who were engaged in the liquor business prior to the restoration of the rule. It will be well to allow them a reasonable time to withdraw their capital, and invest it in some other occupation. . . . It is better to save a soul, if practicable, than to cut him off without hope of remedy; and, on the other hand, we must not let the whole Church suffer for the secular interest, or the perverseness of a few incorrigible delinquents.⁴⁴

The first state prohibition law was enacted by Maine. Although the liquor industry was strongly entrenched in Portland, the chief city, with many distilleries and breweries, and the state as a whole was notorious for hard drinking, the 1851 Legislature enacted a statute prohibiting all manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors except for medicinal or mechanical purposes and the arts. There followed what McMaster characterized as "a craze for temperance legislation" which "swept the country from Maine to Minnesota." Within four years twelve other states had followed Maine's example.⁴⁵

* What the 1860 General Conference could not do was done in 1864, a resolution was sent down to the Annual Conferences and by their action the General Rule was changed to read: "Slaveholding, buying or selling slaves."—G. C. Journal, 1864, p. 167, Appendix, 376 i.

Among church people strong social disapproval attached to both the selling and the drinking of liquor, but two major influences abruptly halted what might well have become a national temperance reformation. The Civil War brought a rapid increase in the use of intoxicating liquors among both soldiers and the civilian population. Attention was diverted from temperance agitation to ministering to the needs of the sick and wounded and care for soldiers' families.

The second strong adverse influence was European immigration, which brought into the country many hundreds of thousands of persons accustomed to habitual use of spirituous liquors. To them legal restriction upon drinking constituted unwarranted infringement upon personal liberty, to be resisted and in every possible way evaded. Enforcement of the prohibition laws first became lax, and laxness in enforcement, accompanied by widespread illegal distilling and bootlegging of whisky, was followed by demands for the laws' repeal.

The General Conference of 1868 sanctioned the appointment within each of the Conferences of a minister to devote his entire time to temperance agitation and promotion. But reaction reigned and the adverse tide could not be quickly stemmed. One by one the "Maine laws," as they were called, were repealed until by 1875 only Maine, Vermont, and New Hampshire retained their prohibitory enactments. The elation of the brewers and distillers, and their political henchmen, was great. The future, they declared, was assured: "The enormous influx of immigration will in a few years overreach the Puritanical element in every state in the Union."⁴⁶

But they reckoned without their host. The religious forces were cast down but not in despair, and they soon began to re-form their lines. In 1869 a national Prohibition Party was organized. This was followed, in 1873, by the Woman's Temperance Crusade, and later in the same year, by the formation of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, with a Methodist woman, Frances E. Willard, at its head. The story of her life is an epic of woman's courage, heroism, and resolute purpose. She had remarkable administrative ability; and under the stimulus of her dynamic, skillful leadership, within two decades the W.C.T.U. had local organizations in every state and territory of the Union.⁴⁷ Apart from her organizational skill Frances Willard possessed more insight into the causes of intemperance than many temperance reformers. She recognized that the use of alcoholic stimulants often was a concomitant of poverty, low wages, unemployment, and poor housing, and based her appeals for reform on broad grounds.

The General Conferences of 1872, 1876, and 1880 reaffirmed the actions of 1868 and on each occasion took a more advanced position. Recommendations included the commendation of laws to restrict the liquor traffic, and their endorsement by all Methodists; the organization of temperance societies in all congregations and Sunday schools; the use of "unfermented wine," wherever practicable, in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper; the appointment in each pastoral charge, at the fourth Quarterly Conference, of a "Committee on Temperance," to meet at least once in three months; and the promotion of the circulation of temperance literature.⁴⁸

In 1880 Disciplinary changes were authorized, to make previous recommendations effective, and a section on "Temperance"—a broad statement of principles—was included for the first time.

The following General Conference reiterated the strong positions taken earlier. At the same time it expressed opposition to the enactment of laws which, by licensing and taxing agencies of the liquor traffic, "provide for its continuance," since the Church stood for "complete legal prohibition." The federal and state governments were declared by the 1892 Conference to be "guilty of wicked complicity with a business whose awful work of destruction brands it as alike an enemy to God and man."⁴⁹

The part that Methodists might have in bringing about the prohibition of one phase and then another of the liquor traffic had been increasingly emphasized and by 1888 could be said to have had significant results, as illustrated by accomplishments recorded in the General Conference Committee report of that year. While there was unanimity in the Church in opposition to the liquor traffic, differences existed as to ways and means of doing away with the evil. Many believed in the efficacy of political action and were committed to the support of the Prohibition Party. Others felt that the idea of achieving prohibition through the organization of a party based on a single, simple idea was a chimerical scheme, "impracticable" and undesirable:

The attempt . . . would only result in impotent endeavors and abortive attempts, assuring their own defeat, while the party itself would be made the retreat of cranks and visionaries, and of hopelessly unsuccessful aspirants for place—the rejected material of the other parties.⁵⁰

The 1892 General Conference declared that its anti-liquor statement should not "be construed as an indorsement of any political party."

In 1884 the General Conference Committee on Temperance and Constitutional Prohibition had before it a memorial, presented by G. B. Wight of New Jersey, calling for a temperance board and secretary. This was the first proposal for such a board. No action was then taken but in 1892 the General Conference authorized "a permanent committee of fifteen, to be called the Committee on Temperance and Prohibition, . . . with power to act within the authorized declarations" of the Church for certain specified ends, a definite step toward an organized Board of Temperance.⁵¹

The declaration of the 1880 General Conference for "complete legal prohibition," which was incorporated in the Discipline, and that of the 1884 Episcopal Address for "unyielding devotion to the principles of Constitutional Prohibition," the General Conference declared, constitute the platform on which we stand as a denomination, and upon which we will battle until Constitutional Prohibition is secured in every State and Territory in the Union, and finally embodied in the Constitution of the United States.⁵²

THE CHURCH AND DIVORCE

Divorce, by the mid-century, was fast growing to the proportion of an acute social problem. Writing in 1884, Samuel Dike estimated that within thirty years divorces had doubled in proportion to marriages in most of the northern states. In 1849, he stated, Connecticut granted ninety-one divorces, which "was probably one for each thirty-five marriages of the year"; in 1878 "the annual average for fifteen years had become 445, or one to every 10.4 marriages." Similar conditions prevailed in other New England states. The ratio of divorces to marriages in Ohio, according to Dike, "was one to 26 in 1865," while in 1882 it had increased to "one to 16.8 marriages." A special "Report on the Statistics of Marriage and Divorce" presented to Congress in 1889 by the Commissioner of Labor showed an increase in divorces every year, with one exception, from 1867 to 1886, and a total increase in nineteen years of 156 per cent.⁵³

This phenomenal increase, sociologists held, was largely accounted for by rapidly increasing urbanization; more particularly by such conditions accompanying the growth of city population as anonymity, with "its distractions and temptations," life in boardinghouses and flats, intensified economic struggle, and woman's increased opportunity for self-support. These conclusions were borne out by the fact that the divorce rate was higher in large cities than in towns and rural districts, and also that the rate of increase in cities was more rapid.⁵⁴

The Woman's Rights Movement focused attention upon the injustice of divorce laws,* and by its agitation became one of the chief influences in directing popular thought to the evils consequent upon broken marriages. But not until 1856 did the Church take cognizance of the problem, and then with little effect. A resolution in General Conference which proposed that any person guilty of violating "the law contained in Matthew V, 31, 32" should be denied membership in the Church was laid on the table. Similar proposals made in 1860, 1868, 1872, and 1876 met the same fate.⁵⁵ Finally, in 1884 the Bishops asked "the attention of the General Conference to the expediency of more stringent regulations in regard to the solemnization of the marriages of divorced persons." In accordance with the request the Committee on the State of the Church recommended inclusion of this directive in the Discipline:

That no divorce shall be recognized as lawful by the Church except for adultery. And no minister shall solemnize marriage in any case where there is a divorced wife or husband living; but this rule shall not apply to the innocent party in a divorce for the cause of adultery, nor to divorced parties seeking to be reunited in marriage.⁵⁶

The report of the committee was adopted and for the first time in the history of the Church the Discipline contained a law on the subject of divorce.

In 1888 the Episcopal Address decried the facility with which the marriage covenant was dissolved in many of the states and declared that there would be no recession from "the advanced ground" taken by the preceding General Conference.

Addresses, sermons, and writings based on the New Testament were chiefly instrumental in bringing about the new law. But there were also other influences. Popularization of sociological principles was causing a reaction against extreme individualism and a reawakening to the ancient Hebrew realization that the family, rather than the individual, is the primary socializing agency in human society. Whatever tends to destroy the unity, the integrity, and the mutuality of the family undermines the foundation of Christian civilization. The initiation of the individual into a wholesome constructive religious and social life normally comes through the home and the family.⁵⁷

BAN ON AMUSEMENTS

Among Wesley's counsels to the members of the Methodist Societies which carried over into American Methodism was that concerning participation in "fashionable diversions." Peter Cartwright, describing Methodists as he knew them in the early years of his ministry, said that they "dressed plain," "wore no jewelry, no ruffles," and for the most part "abstained from dram-drinking." He added that parents "did not allow their children to go to balls or plays," and "did not send them to dancing-schools." James Mudge, in listing some disquieting signs in the Methodism of a later day, mentioned a "greater laxity as to frequenting worldly amusements, [and] larger conformity to fashionable follies of various sorts." Expressing their concern about the increasing "worldly-mindedness" in the Church, the Bishops in 1852 cited as one illustration the prevalence of "vain and sinful amusements."⁵⁸

The category "amusements" covered a wide range of diversions. "To call men and women Methodists," wrote Bishop Morris, "who dance, pitch quoits, play ball, or the like, is a contradiction of terms, as much as to speak of humble fops, sober drunkards, or honest thieves."⁵⁹ He might also have included attending the theater, card-playing, and such games as chess, checkers, and dominoes, for these too came under the ban. In this blanket condemnation of the entire category of amusements, the Methodists by no means stood alone. A similar viewpoint prevailed in greater or less degree in most of the Protestant Churches. "The Y.M.C.A.'s program of games and amusements," says C. Howard Hopkins in his History of the Young Men's Christian Association, "was limited by the prevailing Protestant folkways." The General Convention of the Association in 1867 adopted this resolution:

Resolved, That this Convention regards the introduction of games into the rooms of Young Men's Christian Associations, for the entertainment or amusement of young men, as fraught with evil, dangerous to the best interests of Associations, compromising the Christian integrity, and dishonoring to the blessed Master and Teacher, the Lord Jesus Christ.⁶⁰

American Methodism during its early period made no attempt to legislate authoritatively in prohibiting specific "fashionable diversions." It was content, in accordance with the broad principle enunciated by Wesley, to ask its members to indulge only in such "diversions as can be used in the name of the Lord Jesus." However, in the early seventies the Church became thoroughly aroused by the changing attitude of many of its members toward amusements and, breaking with precedent, turned to prohibitory legislation as a means of stemming the worldly tide. The "increasing laxity" of which Cartwright spoke was merely a symptom of a much greater change in process in American society as a whole, as we have seen. Apparently blind to the wholesale moral corruption increasingly manifested in all phases of commercial, political, and social life, many preachers and earnest laymen centered their attention on what was a comparatively minor concern. The Committee on the State of the Church of the 1872 General Conference reported having received a large number of memorials and petitions from members of the Church in different sections of the land, deploring the sinful amusements too often indulged in by members of the Church; also many resolutions and pastoral addresses emanating from Annual Conferences and other official bodies belonging to our own and sister denominations.

The committee recommended that the Disciplinary chapter on "Imprudent Conduct" be amended by the inclusion of "dancing, playing at games of chance, attending theaters, horse races, circuses, dancing parties, or patronizing dancing schools, or taking such other amusements as are obviously of misleading or questionable moral tendency."⁶¹

Dr. Henry Slicer of the Baltimore Conference spoke in opposition to the proposed legislation. He said he hoped to live and die as a Methodist of the Wesleyan type; that Wesley's original rules "were comprised in a few short advices," and that the General Conference was on the way to make itself ridiculous "in this matter of changes" of the Discipline. William R. Clark of the New England Conference agreed with Slicer that the tendency of professed Christians to affiliate with the world in its spirit should be checked but that specific legislation is not the way to proceed. It will not be enforced and cannot be. Charles A. Holmes of the Pittsburgh Conference also was opposed. The Discipline, he said, "was sufficiently explicit now":

he who at proper times and proper places engages in plays was not transgressing but fulfilling a law of his nature; . . . there were children of our ministers and members who were driven to Satan because their parents would be wiser than their Maker, and repress innocent amusements in proper places

William H. Goode of North Indiana was surprised and grieved at some of the remarks by Clark; that "such a provision was necessary he thought every pastor present would affirm." G. W. Hughey of Southern Illinois was also in favor. He "had no confidence in long-faced religion," but Annual Conferences and churches had petitioned "for the authority of the Church to speak out on these sins of dancing, and theaters, etc., and he hoped to see the report adopted." The vote was then taken and the report adopted by a vote of 179 to 75.⁶²

Not many persons were brought to trial under the specified charges but the paragraph furnished a platform for preachers, and innumerable sermons were preached on the sins of dancing and theater-going. From the time of its adoption the Church was by no means of one mind on the wisdom of the ban, and before many years had passed proposals began to be heard for its repeal. One of the strongest articles in the controversy was written by George P. Mains in the Methodist Review in 1892 which pronounced the "authoritative index expurgatorius of amusements . . . a most grave blunder of ecclesiastical legislation." Dr. Mains listed eight principal objections to the legislation. He declared that it was "un-Protestant in its character"; unworthy of "the rank and mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church"; objectionable because "no General Conference is wise enough to legislate specifically for the government of individual Christian conduct"; the basis of a "'damaging popular aversion' to the Church"; the means of debarring from membership "many most intelligent and conscientious Christians"; practically a dead letter "incapable of enforcement"; and even if considered to be wise and in the right direction "incomplete and insufficient in its terms."⁶³ Although some, at least, of these arguments were unanswerable, opposition was not sufficiently strong to lead to repeal. While with the passing of the years other churches became more lenient in their views, and some even sponsored what were considered harmless or pure amusements in order to raise money or attract new members, particularly youth, to the church buildings, the controversy in Methodism was kept well under control and the rigid legislation held for a long time after the close of the period, although in some quarters the emphasis in explaining the wrongness of amusements shifted somewhat from the notion of vicious temptation leading to the downward path of immorality and corruption of body and spirit, to the more practical consideration that while not all forms of entertainment were "hurtful," yet all were wasteful of time, and a Christian had none to spare for mere frivolity.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIETY

Increasingly middle class in their membership, Methodist churches—particularly in the cities—nevertheless continued to bring together more diverse, varied, and cosmopolitan groups of people than were to be found under any other than religious auspices. But conditions were gradually changing.

RAPID GROWTH OF CLASS DISTINCTIONS

Conflicting forces were at work within American society. From early colonial times the eastern cities had their aristocracy of descent, wealth, and culture. In the nineteenth century the leveling tendencies of the frontier more and more permeated the country as a whole, reaching even to the Atlantic seaboard. But strong influences were at work in the opposite direction, creating class and race distinctions of a different character. Race antagonism, an outgrowth of the slave system, which branded the Negro as inferior to the white man, spread insidiously throughout the nation. When horse cars were introduced in New York City the right to use them was denied to colored people, despite a decision handed down in a test case in 1855 which affirmed their right to ride in all public conveyances. Discrimination took many forms, even to the extent of barring the attendance of colored people in some white churches. The colored race, declared Editor Thomas E. Bond in the Christian Advocate, will always remain a servile class because even the abolitionists themselves, in their social relations with Negroes, are unwilling to concede the equality they preach.⁶⁴

Race discrimination rapidly spread and broadened during the late forties and the fifties to include the immigrants who thronged the large cities, and also became intensified in some instances, taking on the form of violence and mob rule. As nativism it sponsored a political movement, the Native American Party, dubbed the "Know Nothing" Party,* which contributed largely to the development of class consciousness.

The rapid accumulation of wealth, aided by the new industrialism, also fostered the class spirit. We boast of our democracy, said A. T. Pierson, prominent Presbyterian church leader, and at the same time are "getting to have the most contemptible of all aristocracy, a plutocracy, or I may call it a caste-ocracy.”⁶⁵ The gulf separating the newly rich and the poor had become so deep and wide, declared George P. Mains, of the New York East Conference, in 1894, that in the great cities it constituted two separate worlds.

* The party first organized in 1850 under the name of the "Supreme Order of the Star-Spangled Banner" or "Sons of the Sires of '76," with a national council and subsidiary state and local councils. It was a secret oathbound society and members when interrogated invariably answered, "I don't know" or "I know nothing." It was strongly anti-foreign and anti-Catholic and supported only native Americans for public office. In 1854 "Know Nothing" candidates won municipal elections in several of the largest cities, the governorship of Massachusetts, and forty seats in Congress. In 1855 seventy-five members of the U. S. House of Representatives, and the governors of New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Rhode Island were party members. In this year the Christian Advocate strongly endorsed the party as a Christian organization.—George M. Stephenson, A History of American Immigration, 1820-1924, pp. 111 ff.; Christian Advocate and Journal, XXX (1855), 17 (April 26), 66.

Between the two worlds . . . there is altogether too little interchange of heart to insure any generally vitalizing or uplifting result upon the less favored community. However close the proximity of these two worlds, they are separated from each other by the widest social distances⁶⁶

Another among the few religious writers who emphasized the rapid growth of class divisions in American society was Samuel L. Loomis:

A great and growing gulf lies between the working-class and those above them,—a gulf that is already as broad and deep—nay, in some respects, broader, deeper, and more difficult of passage in the cities of the United States than in those of Europe. Our own working-people are even more widely separated from the rest of society than those in England, France, and Germany, because the differences in occupation and wealth, which are becoming nearly as great here as there, are emphasized here as they are not there, by still greater differences in race, language, and religion.⁶⁷

The Churches on the whole seemed indifferent to these developments. Laymen for the most part seemed wholly blind to their sinful character, and ministers took little account of them in their sermons. Gilbert Haven, however, condemned this “sin of caste,” as he characterized it, in the strongest terms, declaring it to be “the most unnatural, and destructive of all the sins of the nation.”⁶⁸ He was listened to respectfully, but few church people, either ministers or laymen, took his words to heart. They had too long been accustomed to think of sin in different terms, and they were scarcely able to comprehend the idea that anti-social attitudes were essentially as sinful and as hateful in the sight of God as overt acts in violation of the moral code.

In part because of increasing class feeling comparatively few of the vast numbers of immigrant laborers—by no means all of whom were Catholics—attended religious services in the Methodist and other evangelical churches. Because they were attended and sustained by the well-to-do—the merchants, the mill and factory operators, the salesmen, lawyers, and other professional people—workingmen looked upon them as capitalist-class institutions and would have nothing to do with them. Belatedly leaders of the Church awakened to the situation. The Episcopal Address of 1888 asked:

Are [the masses] . . . drifting away from us? Have we lost our love for them, or the aggressive spirit which carries the Gospel to their homes and hearts? Have we forgotten our mission as we have increased in wealth? Nothing is more alarming to the philanthropist and the patriot than the alienation of the laboring people from the evangelical churches. Is this alienation of fact? If so, what is its cause? If we have given too much attention to the rich, or cherished too much regard for social position, or have in any wise neglected the poor, we have departed from the spirit of our calling.⁶⁹

THE CHURCH AND ORGANIZED LABOR

In no sphere of thought and action did the increasing middle-class-consciousness and sympathy of the Church become more plainly evident than in its attitude toward organized labor. It might have been expected that the increase of Stations as compared with Circuits would contribute to a closer relationship between the Church and labor but this did not prove to be the case. Also it would seem that the principal aims of the Labor Movement would strongly appeal to the sense of justice of ministers and awaken sympathy for and understanding of the struggle of workingmen for a living wage and reduction of hours of the working day. But a few only were disposed to come to the aid of the workers. In a particular instance in New York City and Brooklyn when five hundred ministers of the several denominations were petitioned by the bakers' union to preach sermons against compulsory Sunday labor all but a half dozen, according to Richard T. Ely, ignored the request.⁷⁰

Few also among spokesmen for the Churches recognized a need for labor organization; rather, they were for the most part fearful of results which might spring from it. "What," asked John R. Commons, "can the Church expect the spiritual possibilities to be of men who are doomed to long and exhausting hours of labor; who work seven days in the week, and have no holidays or vacations except those granted by pitiful accidents and sickness?" "Yet," he asked, "do we hear the Church or the ministers crying out against this worse than chattel slavery?" Some churchmen were more than indifferent, even outspoken in opposition, arguing that unionism would tend to contribute to shiftlessness and to development of rigid class lines such as existed in Europe, at the same time blinding themselves to the developing class lines within the Church itself.⁷¹ One of the statements of this point of view appeared in an editorial in the Methodist Review:

Instead of thinking and acting as 'citizens of the republic,' they [the leaders of labor] think and act as members of the laboring class, whose interests they regard as supreme. . . . It is undemocratic, anti-American, anti-Christian, and shows how deeply the movement is rooted, not in intelligent desire to promote the general good, but in the selfishness of human nature.⁷²

In the 1888 Episcopal Address the Bishops dwelt upon what seemed to them possible dangers of labor organization:

That millions of laborers compactly organized under leaderships liable to become unscrupulous, chafing under real or fancied grievances, are an element of great power and no little danger is a fact too palpable to be concealed or overlooked. The entrance of this element into the political party strifes of this country adds to the perplexity and the peril of the situation.⁷³

Among the minority of Methodist Church leaders willing to endorse labor's plea for a living wage and a reduction in hours of work was Frances E. Willard. The 1874 W.C.T.U. Declaration of Principles, which she drafted, favored the demand and in 1887 she was initiated into the Knights of Labor. Most conspicuous among Methodist laymen who stood for the right of labor to organize in defense of its rights was E. H. Rogers of Chelsea, Massachusetts, who took an active part in the organization of the Christian Labor Union of Boston and who became prominent as a champion of labor before the courts.⁷⁴ In 1884, in the General Conference in which he was elected Bishop, Willard F. Mallalieu introduced a memorial on justice to labor but it got no further than the Committee on the State of the Church.

The Christian Advocate in an editorial published in 1880, which presented a point of view that was gaining support in the Church, declared that the laborer is worthy "of a just compensation, graduated upon the relations of his labor to the final result and the necessities of life and society." The editorial, which disavowed any sympathy with "communistic, socialistic, or agrarian ideas,"* was written to controvert Henry Ward Beecher's notorious contention that a laboring man should be able to live and support a family decently on a wage of a dollar a day.† It is "not surprising," the editor continued, "that many working-men draw back from the Church when sentiments like these are taught by ministers."⁷⁵ While occasional statements to this general effect were made by Methodist press and pulpit, no organized effort developed within the Church during these years in defense of the rights of labor or by way of interpretation of the objectives of labor organization. In what was wholly a local movement, Herbert N. Casson, a Methodist minister, in 1894 founded a labor church in Lynn, Massachusetts. The membership card of the church stated its purpose to be "to educate, to harmonize, to cooperate, and to experiment as the pioneers of that glad day when there shall be no business but friendship, and no religion but love." At a Labor Day mass meeting that same year, held on the Lynn Common, seven thousand persons were reported to have been present. Ill health made it necessary for Casson to leave Lynn in 1900 and without his leadership the church soon declined.⁷⁶

There were several factors responsible for the attitude of Methodism toward labor organization in this period. First and most basic was the strong individualistic element in Methodist tradition. Methodist preachers clung tena-

* Chiefly as an outgrowth of the acute depression of 1873-78, when unemployment reached giant proportions, Marxian socialism first won a considerable number of converts, these almost entirely within the ranks of unemployed labor.

† Beecher wrote: "I have been reproached for saying that $1 a day was enough for a laborer to live upon. It is my belief that with an economical wife, who by her industry contributes to the family store, and helpful children who also add to the income a prudent man could not only support his family, but gradually amass a property on $1 a day. . . . What labor wants in this country is moral quality—not opportunity."—As quoted in the Christian Advocate, LV (1880), 51 (Dec. 16), 801.

ciously to the doctrine that individual regeneration was all sufficient. Conflict between labor and capital, they maintained, sprang from the natural depravity of the human heart; if the laborer and the employer were both soundly converted strife between them would not exist: all would be peace and harmony. They continued to maintain their confidence in the face of abundant evidence that equally earnest Christian men were on both sides of the labor issue. Their failure to understand the complexity of the problems led them to fall back upon an easy but inadequate solution.

A second determinative influence in the Church's attitude grew out of its traditional opposition to violence. As tension increased between corporation managers and executives and the labor unions, and unresolved conflicts multiplied, labor came more and more to rely on the strike as the most effective means of gaining its ends. The most destructive labor battle in America's history took place in July and August, 1877, in the course of which angry mobs of the unemployed forcibly halted and derailed trains. Troops were called out and blood flowed freely in Baltimore, Pittsburgh, and other railway centers. This and numerous other strikes in the course of which violence occurred intensified the opposition of the Churches to labor unions. When workingmen under the domination of their unions resort to violence, churchmen declared, their revolt becomes unjustifiable; it substitutes the tyranny of mob law for reason and persuasion and is without defense.

The third chief factor in determining the attitude of the Church toward labor organization was the prevalent adoption of the economic doctrine that labor is a commodity and, as with other commodities, its price, i.e., its wage, must perforce be governed by the law of supply and demand. The principle was stated editorially by the Christian Advocate:

Labor is a commodity, having the prices varying from time to time, and in various places, according to the relative demand and supply, and it is great folly to attempt to regulate prices by law. The attempts of governments to control these things have uniformly been productive of dissatisfaction among all parties.⁷⁷

The doctrine was sharply challenged by Washington Gladden who asserted that it could only be true "if men are not moral beings; if the doctrines of materialism or of high Calvinism are true, and if the actions of men are determined by forces outside of themselves."⁷⁸ Gladden, however, was all but alone in his position.* The churches had become too closely identified with and committed to the laissez faire economy. Uncritical admiration for self-made in-

* Another who took decided exception was Bishop Henry C. Potter of the Protestant Episcopal Church who in 1886 in a Pastoral Letter said: "When capitalists and employers of labor have forever dismissed the fallacy, which may be true enough in the domain of political economy, but is essentially false in the domain of religion, that labor and the laborer are alike a commodity, to be bought and sold, employed or dismissed, paid or underpaid, as the market shall decree; . . . when the principle of a joint interest in what is produced of all brains and hands that go to produce it is wisely and generously recognized; . . . then, but not till then may we hope to heal those grave social divisions, concerning which there need to be among us all, as with Israel of old, 'great searchings of heart.'"—Quoted in H. A. Keyser, Bishop Potter, the People's Friend, pp. 21-26.

dustrialists, manufacturers, and corporation executives as benefactors of society had become too ingrown for churchmen to realize the inhuman aspects of the labor-as-a-commodity principle.

Gradually, however, beginning about 1880, a change of viewpoint and of attitude toward organized labor began to be evident in Methodism as in other Churches. For one thing, Church leaders were coming to realize that organized Protestantism had been gradually losing touch with a rapidly increasing segment of the population; many working people had become embittered against organized religion. A strong vocal anti-clericalism had developed among labor leaders. The declaration of Terence V. Powderly, Knights of Labor leader, was typical. The financial and industrial "masters," he charged, utilize "the powers of press and pulpit to convince the laborer that he should not aspire to the good things of earth, but should be content to live in that sphere to which it had pleased his God to call him."⁷⁹ Other official spokesmen of labor denounced the Churches for lack of understanding of labor's aims. They did not distinguish between the Churches, denouncing all in common. These denunciations, some of which were indiscriminating and unjust, were alienating increasing numbers of laborers. Josiah Strong quoted a minister as stating that he had found "in one shop sixty men (none of them Roman Catholics), only six of whom ever went to church at all." In a second shop he found about 110 Protestants of whom "only seven attended any church."⁸⁰ Washington Gladden declared in 1886 that the proportion of wage earners in the Churches was diminishing. Stating the census showed that wage earners employed in manual labor—mechanics, shop hands, and common laborers—constituted at least one-fourth of the population, he said that in the church of which he was pastor, located "in a neighborhood easily accessible to the working classes, and . . . known always as an extremely democratic congregation," only about one-tenth were of workingmen's families. The reasons, he felt, were, first, their inability to dress well enough to feel at home in a congregation as stylish as the average church; and, secondly, their sense of injustice that workingmen, as a class, were receiving at the hands of capitalist employers, as a class.⁸¹

The change of viewpoint and attitude found expression in a broadened conception of the Christian Gospel, of which we treat later, and in a distinctly new type of local church organization and program.

THE INSTITUTIONAL CHURCH *

Even though awakened to the existing situation, not many ministers possessed a knowledge of the principles and methods required in order to adapt the Church's program to the needs of workingmen and their families. Recognizing that the proletarian masses who thronged the crowded, tenement-house, industrial sections of the large cities shunned the conventional type of Protestant religious services urban Church leaders were gradually coming to see that something more and different from the conventional program of direct evangelism was required.⁸²

One of the pioneers in initiating local church programs was J. W. Magruder, pastor of Wesley Chapel, the oldest Methodist house of worship in Cincinnati, Ohio, who in 1891 declared that a "down-town church like Wesley Chapel can only succeed by being an institution of all-round salvation." In elaborating his idea he declared that the church ought to be honeycombed with educational, musical, and industrial work and appliances, doing their part in the work along with the sermon, the Sunday school, and the prayer meeting. It must work as Christ did, healing and helping the temporal condition of man along with its ordinary spiritual work.⁸³

By 1895 Wesley Chapel maintained a kindergarten, a day nursery, a young ladies' benevolent society, a bureau of justice in which four lawyers gave their services free to the poor, a building association in which people were taught to save toward a home, and a visitation society. Still more extensive was the program developed at the Metropolitan Temple, formerly the Central Methodist Church, New York City, under the leadership of S. Parkes Cadman and his ministerial and lay associates. The various societies and agencies included a reading room, a literary club, choral societies and music bureau, a sewing school, young people's societies, and an employment bureau. In this instance, however, the aim was not so much to reach workingmen as to minister to "the self-supporting and self-respecting middle class."⁸⁴

Institutional features were introduced into the programs of several other New York City Methodist churches, notably Calvary and Washington Square. The former maintained an employment bureau, a kindergarten and day nursery, a free dispensary, a reading club, and a stenographic class. Washington Square activities included a kindergarten, boys' clubs, women's classes in gymnastics, a free library, and a reading room.

In 1895 the Presiding Elder of the Chicago District, Rock River Conference, reported that in connection with the Halsted Street Mission "a flourishing kindergarten, an industrial school, and . . . a printing school" had been carried on. This was the first mention of institutional church activities in the Journal of the Conference.⁸⁵

In 1859 Henry Morgan, an independent, somewhat eccentric layman, established a mission in Music Hall, Boston. A later outgrowth was the Boston Union Mission Society, and still later, the Morgan Memorial which became one of the most noteworthy of all Methodist institutional churches.

The institutional church movement was promoted by the City Evangelization Union, an organization authorized by the General Conference of 1892. The authorization urged that local organizations be formed in all cities which had five or more charges, "for the purpose of affording financial aid to needy churches, organizing new church enterprises, and conducting mission work among the religiously destitute."⁸⁶ The early yearly conventions of the Union were largely attended and did much to stimulate social interest and activity among the churches. City evangelization unions were organized in many of the larger cities of the country. In 1893 in a paper adopted by the Union to be broadcast to the general Church George P. Mains said:

There is no large city in which Methodism ought not at once—in its united capacity, and in that broad, large spirit which characterizes the founding of the great business enterprises of the age—to establish, in some center of massed and needy populations, the 'Institutional Church'—a Church that shall combine the most perfect appliances for helping men, so far as possible, clear around the circle of their needs; a Church, the material support of which shall be adequately assured, irrespective of the financial ability of the community in which it ministers; a Church that shall employ sufficient working forces for the needs of its position . . .⁸⁷

The purpose was practical, the need was great and apparent, and funds might have been procured, but Methodism—like Protestantism at large—was unprepared to meet the challenge. With few exceptions, attempts made to establish institutional churches were discontinued after a brief period and secular agencies were developed to render the varied social services, without the aid of religion, that the Churches had failed to provide.

RELIGIOUS THOUGHT AND BELIEF

The genius of Methodism subordinated dogma to life. This was eminently true of the teaching and practice of Wesley and characterized both early American Methodism and the Methodist Episcopal Church during the present period.* Not that doctrine was ignored or disparaged for even as Wesley strongly emphasized the importance of doctrinal preaching, so Methodist preachers during these decades continued to exhibit strong concern for right doctrine. But they subordinated emphasis on dogma to sermons on practical concerns of faith and life. Alfred Brunson in 1872 declared that doctrinal sermons "are not now the order of the day."⁸⁸ William F. McDowell characterized Bishop Simpson's preaching as "carrying multitudes in rapture to the conviction that faith is the victory that overcomes the world"; that of Fowler as "making men unshakably certain that the towers and bulwarks of Zion would stand against the gates of destruction and all the forces of evil to the end of time"; of Warren convincing men "beyond all doubt that Paul's prayer for the Ephesians might be answered in us all"; and of Foster "answering the question, What is man that thou art mindful of him?"⁸⁹

BROADENING THEOLOGICAL CONCEPTIONS

The period was one of gradually broadening theological thought in the Christian world in general and, in common with other Churches, the Methodist Church shared in this development. Progress was by way of gradual change rather than the adoption of new or radical doctrines.

From about 1870 a marked change was in process in the theological thought of British Wesleyanism and the thinking of American Methodism reflected this movement of thought. Percy Bunting, editor of the Contemporary Review, dated the change from the time of Frederick Denison Maurice and associated it with the greatly enlarged place given to the doctrine of the Fatherhood of God. The whole Christian world, he insisted, had been "profoundly affected by the method of interpreting all Christian theology by reference to this one master principle."⁹⁰

The doctrinal emphases which had characterized the preaching of the early Circuit Riders* continued to be stressed during the half century. In the later decades the stern, rigid authoritarianism of orthodox Calvinism was rapidly passing and Methodist preachers found less reason for anti-Calvinistic controversial preaching.

Abel Stevens characterized the period as a time of transition. It is difficult to assemble from the extant literature of the time conclusive historical evidence of concrete changes in particular doctrines, or to determine either the precise time or extent of change.† Defenders of traditional points of view were vocal and aggressive while advocates of new emphases were inclined to be cautious and less assertive.⁹¹

The earlier Methodist revivalism attempted to induce an overwhelming sense of conviction of sin, not only—and often not primarily—of specific sins committed but also of inherited sin. The effort to convince the unconverted of his corrupt nature, his inherent depravity, was the burden of much revivalistic preaching. During the earlier part of the period, and even preceding its beginning, there was a noticeable lessening of this emphasis. During the later decades it found occasional expression but was no longer a predominant element in Methodist evangelism.⁹² Miner Raymond, John Miley,‡ and Randolph S. Foster, leading theologians of the half century, definitely repudiated the doctrine of hereditary guilt. The associated conception of burning in literal hellfire as eternal punishment for guilt was likewise generally rejected. Partly as a result of the weakening of these emphases there was in Methodist revivals a marked decrease of acute conviction of sin. No longer, other than in exceptional instances, were terror-stricken sinners convulsed by agony of soul which rendered them unconscious and physically helpless. No longer was fear of the terrors of hell given precedence in preaching over the providential care and concern of the Heavenly Father for the salvation of all His earthly children.

† Henry C. Sheldon: "When he [the judicial investigator] sees that for an appreciable period changes in doctrinal conception within the ranks of men at once studious and practical in their mental habits are almost uniformly in a given direction, and appear to proceed with cumulative force, he will feel authorized to infer that he has discovered reliable tokens of a doctrinal transition."—"Changes in Theology Among Methodists," American Journal of Theology, X (January, 1906), 31 f.

‡ John Miley (1813-95), born on a farm near Hamilton, Ohio, was graduated from Augusta College in 1838 and soon after received on trial in the Ohio Conference, where he served in the pastorate until 1852, when he transferred to the New York East Conference (1852-66), thence to the New York Conference. In 1873 he was appointed to the chair of systematic theology in Drew Theological Seminary, continuing until his death. His magnum opus, published in his eightieth year, was his two-volume Systematic Theology. Of him Robert W. Rogers wrote, "to us who knew him personally," the man "always seemed greater than his books, and the tenderness of his heart well mated with the ruggedness and strength of his mind."—Gen'l Minutes, Spring, 1896, p. 116; Ezra S. Tipple, Ed., Drew Theological Seminary, 1867-1917, pp. 153 ff.

A legalistic interpretation of the atonement—the pure governmental theory formulated by Miley*—was given official status by incorporation in the Conference course of study. This may be said to have been a retrograde development since in the earlier part of the century the generally accepted theory was only in a limited sense governmental and in larger degree ethical in its nature. Miley's theory did not satisfy the Church. The older view was re-emphasized by many and, as stated by Sheldon, effort was made to get rid of obnoxious attachments—such as the assignment of a penal character to Christ's sufferings; such as the representation of an antithesis between the Father and the Son in respect to their attitude toward the sinning race; such also as the idea that atoning virtue was embraced in any merely physical transaction taken by itself, and not rather in the love, obedience, and self-devotement of a holy personality⁹³

The direction of influential thinking in the Church tended to be away from the conception of God as monarch, insistent upon the satisfaction of justice and monarchical dignity by propitiatory sacrifices, toward the more humane view of God as Father revealing His boundless love in His Son who gave His life in vicarious suffering upon the Cross, that He might reconcile man to God.

One of the most marked changes in the thought and practice of the Church was that in relation to sanctification. Since the third decade of the century, if not earlier, a declining emphasis upon Christian perfection had been evident.⁹⁴ In their Episcopal Addresses the Bishops repeatedly avowed the loyalty of the Church to its traditional teaching upon the subject and the General Conference in the 1852 Pastoral Address advised ministers and members in speaking or writing of holiness, to follow the well-sustained views, and even the phraseology employed in the writings of Wesley and Fletcher, which are not superseded by the more recent writers on this subject. Avoid both new theories, new expressions, and new measures on this subject, and adhere closely to the ancient landmarks.⁹⁵

But despite the avowals and exhortations from official circles a changing attitude continued to be evident.† Early in the period Elias Bowen charged that

* The substance of Miley's theory, developed at length in his Systematic Theology, is indicated in the following brief quotations: "God being God, and the Creator of men, and men being what they are, a moral government is the profoundest moral necessity." (II, 90.) "The sufferings of Christ are an atonement for sin by substitution, in the sense that they were intentionally endured for sinners under judicial condemnation, and for the sake of their forgiveness. They render forgiveness consistent with the divine justice, in that justice none the less fulfills its rectoral office in the interest of moral government." —II, 155.

† Years later H. C. Sheldon wrote: ". . . evidently when nine out of ten Methodist pastors esteem it a benign providence which relieves them of the occasion to deal with a group of sanctificationists of the ordinary type in their respective flocks, the prospect for the traditional doctrine is far from being bright." —Op. cit., p. 49.

while Wesley and the early American Methodists recognized a clear distinction between regeneration and sanctification, holding that the latter was a separate and distinct experience which included in its scope the elimination of "inbred sin," the "heresy of the identity of the two states is pretty generally embraced among us."⁹⁶ Somewhat later two widely circulated books, Growth in Holiness Toward Perfection by James Mudge and Sin and Holiness by D. W. C. Huntington, advanced the concept of sanctification as a progressive development to which no limit can be set.

The so-called "doctrinal defection" as regards sanctification was one of the principal influences leading to the organization of the Free Methodist Church* in 1860 at Pekin, New York. It also led to the adoption of specialized agencies and methods for the promotion of the doctrine. In 1867 a call for "a general camp-meeting of the friends of holiness," to be held at Vineland, New Jersey, stated:

While we shall not cease to labor for the conviction and conversion of sinners, the special objects of this meeting will be to offer united and continued prayer for the revival of the work of holiness in the churches; . . .

The attendance included persons from several states and various denominations—Presbyterians, Baptists, Congregationalists, Episcopalians, and Friends, as well as Methodists. At this meeting the National Association for the Promotion of Holiness was organized. A chief activity took the form of promotion of holiness Camp Meetings. Between 1867 and 1872 fourteen were held in the East, the Midwest, and the South.⁹⁷ The principal leaders in the movement were Methodist ministers from various Annual Conferences,† among the more prominent being John S. Inskip of the New York East Conference and George Hughes of the New Jersey Conference. Mrs. Phoebe Palmer was active for many years as an evangelist. Support was drawn chiefly from Methodist churches. Periodicals published as organs of the movement included Guide to Holiness and Beauty of Holiness in Heart and Life.⁹⁸ Both were widely circulated. Local groups were formed in many churches composed of those who

* The movement, principally within the Genesee Conference, which led to the organization of the Church, concerned not only doctrinal change but also questions of discipline, opposition to secret societies, and protest against the action of the Conference in expulsion of certain of its members. The Free Methodists took over the Articles of Religion and the general discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with certain modifications. As originally organized there were no Bishops but instead general superintendents elected quadrennially. Membership in secret societies was forbidden; attendance at Class meeting was made compulsory; church choirs and the pew system were forbidden as was also the use of tobacco and intoxicating liquors, the wearing of gold, costly garments, and adornment of hair or person. An addition to the Articles of Religion defined sanctification as taking place instantaneously, subsequent to justification, and salvation "from all inward sin, from evil thoughts and evil tempers."—H. K. Carroll, The Religious Forces of the United States . . ., p. 267; Wilson T. Hogue, History of the Free Methodist Church of North America, I, 11-18.

† George Hughes: "The brethren composing the . . . 'National Association for the Promotion of Holiness' make up a peculiar brotherhood. Never were a like number of men more diverse in temperament and endowments; . . . The intercourse of six years, amid a succession of as exciting battles at the same period of church history has ever embraced, has revealed no discordant note, no jealousies, no minorities. . . . The entire record is one of perfect unanimity, fraternity, and love, . . . and yet there has been little of organization, a formal constitution never having been adopted. The simple purpose has been to be used for God's glory in the specific work of reviving the doctrine and experience of Entire Holiness."—*Days of Power in the Forest Temple. professed sanctification, or, as was more commonly stated, who had received "the second blessing."

Unfortunately, the partisan spirit tended toward expression in some individual instances of a censorious, hyper-critical spirit which fomented division. In many churches and some Annual Conferences partisan, separatist groups were formed. On the other hand, many men and women exemplified the beauty of holiness in character and life, setting an example to their fellow church members of abiding loyalty to the Church and of sacrificial service. Beginning in the early nineties separate holiness sects began to be formed and numerous holiness advocates withdrew from Methodist churches.⁹⁹

During this period there was a distinct forward movement in the thought and practice of Methodism toward a larger recognition of the central place of the living Christ in Christian experience—Christ, man's Savior and Exemplar, with whom life-giving fellowship may be realized day by day. More than in earlier Methodism Christ Jesus became the nucleus around which evangelical theology has formed; the center from which the gracious light of divine truth is thrown upon God's relation to man, and man's relation to God. Christ is the ground and corner-stone to which the theological structure is inseparably joined—not, however, a Christ, the fanciful product of human imagination, but the Christ, as revealed in the gospels.¹⁰⁰

There was an evident trend toward a larger use of the New Testament in preaching, as compared with the Old; toward holding up the living, saving Christ before the minds of men; and toward presenting God more in ethical terms, as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, and thus bringing Him nearer and making Him seem more real. In all of this Methodism was "spreading the leaven of a more scriptural form of faith" among the evangelical Churches.¹⁰¹

In 1879 a writer in the Methodist Review, stating that there were then two or three preachers under suspension for heresy, questioned on what grounds a Methodist minister should be tried for heretical teaching. Has the Church, he asked, "any real standards?"

It is nowhere asked of a candidate whether he believes the teachings of certain standard authors, or whether he agrees with the consensus of Methodist doctrine,* or whether he will conform to the traditions of the so-called 'unwritten law' of Methodism, or whether he will consent to take his theology from whatever committee of triers may happen to be appointed on his case.¹⁰²

The writer argued that the Articles of Religion alone should be maintained as

* The General Conference of 1880 added to the requirements for admission into Conference in full connection affirmative answers to the questions:

"Have you studied the doctrines of the Methodist Episcopal Church?"

"After full examination, do you believe that our doctrines are in harmony with the Holy Scriptures, and will you preach and maintain them?"—G. C. Journal, 1880, pp. 365 f.

the standards.* Many of the preachers felt that the Articles did not constitute a satisfactory enough statement of the distinctive Methodist beliefs. A proposal made in the 1868 General Conference for consideration by the Committee on Revisals whether "a concise statement of doctrines" should not be inserted in the Discipline failed of action for lack of support.¹⁰³

Four years later Alfred Brunson proposed certain specific additions to the Articles. His formulation was received with favor by many and was referred to the Bishops for consideration. In 1876 the Bishops, commending Brunson's statements as "useful," but not "so happily worded" as to justify adoption, stated that in their opinion the "work of formulating theological truth into an authoritative declaration of faith" could only be successfully achieved through "the concurrence of many minds, after patient study and laborious research." They also questioned whether the adoption of additional Articles would not be in violation of the First Restrictive Rule.¹⁰⁴

While this ended the attempt to effect change in the Articles of Religion, sensitivity with regard to theological formulations continued to be expressed in various quarters. In the 1880 Episcopal Address the Bishops strongly condemned those ministers of prominence who disseminated doctrines contrary to "the faith of the Church."¹⁰⁵ Three resolutions on theological subjects were introduced at the 1880 General Conference, one of which instructed the Committee on Episcopacy to report whether any of the Bishops during the preceding quadrennium had in "sermons, lectures, or published works, propounded or upheld statements not in harmony with the Apostles' Creed, our Articles of Religion, or the acknowledged standards" of the Church. Another directed the Committee on the Book Concern to inquire whether the Publishing House had issued any such publications. The committees to which these resolutions were referred made no recommendations for action. However, the General Conference (1880) strengthened the Disciplinary law for conservation of doctrine by making provision for procedure to be followed in cases where a minister or Bishop "disseminates . . . doctrines which are contrary to our . . . established standards of doctrines."¹⁰⁶

The Theological Institutes, by Richard Watson, Missionary Secretary of the British Wesleyan Society and Methodism's first systematic theologian, which was published during 1823-29, was considered for more than a generation the standard textbook in theology of both British and American Methodism. In succession to Watson in British Wesleyanism, W. B. Pope was most outstanding. He was also widely influential in Methodist theological thought in America. His intellectual sympathies were more with the past than with the developing points of view of the half century. A number of ponderous the-

* If one claims as standards Wesley's Notes and Sermons, "The Doctrinal Tracts," and the liturgies of the 1808 Discipline one has to admit, the writer says, that "no Methodist preacher of to-day believes, or ever did believe all that is taught in those writings. Nor was there ever a time in the history of our Church when every thing contained in them was believed."—J. Pullman, "Methodism and Heresy," Methodist Quarterly Review, LXI (April, 1879), 355.

ological treatises were produced by American Methodist writers within the period, most of them more noteworthy for their bulk than for the originality, vitality, or creative quality of their thinking. Miner Raymond's* three-volume Systematic Theology was published in 1877, a few years earlier than Miley's work of the same title. Most voluminous of the writers was Randolph S. Foster.† His six-volume series, Studies in Theology, bore witness to his deep concern with theological issues but was abstruse and verbose and failed to influence strongly the thinking of the Church. Methodism's outstanding systematic theologian of the period was Henry C. Sheldon,‡ whose History of Christian Doctrine, in two volumes, was published in 1886. His System of Christian Doctrine did not appear until 1903, after the close of this period.

There was no lack of examples of intemperate dogmatism in the sermons and writings of Methodist preachers. The ultra-conservative position was represented, for example, in the preaching and writings of L. W. Munhall, Local Preacher and long-time evangelist, who had a considerable following among laymen and ministers. There was also evidence of an inherent conservatism of a milder sort which found expression in some of the Episcopal Addresses, and in articles by writers who contended that Methodism needed "no revision of her creed." New doctrines, these writers said, may seem tempting but they offer a poor substitute for the well-tested truths which the Church has traditionally proclaimed. "The old wine is better."¹⁰⁷ Others, such as Daniel Curry, stedfastly contended for progress in the Church's thinking.

The present age is confessedly a time of change in the form of Christian thought, and of modifications of doctrinal conceptions. The formularies of doctrine which have come down to us from the past, although they were so precious to those by whom they were once cherished, no longer satisfactorily express the theological conceptions of the best minds of Christendom.¹⁰⁸

The Methodist Review also stated editorially in 1885 that modifications "of very wide extent and far-reaching influence" were taking place in "the forms

* Miner Raymond (1811-97) was born in New York City and educated at the Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass., where, following his graduation, he became a teacher. In 1838 he was admitted on trial in the New England Conference. For sixteen years (1848-64) he was principal of the academy and in 1864 became professor of systematic theology at Garrett Biblical Institute, where he continued to teach until his eighty-fourth year.—Gen'l Minutes, Fall, 1898, pp. 449 f.

† Randolph S. Foster (1820-1903) was born in Williamsburg, Ohio. He graduated from Augusta College and at the age of seventeen was admitted on trial in the Ohio Conference. (1837). In 1850 he transferred to the New York Conference. For a brief period, 1857-60, he was president of Northwestern University. Again in the pastorate for several years, in 1869 he became professor of systematic theology in Drew Theological Seminary, and later president (1870-72). The 1872 General Conference elected him Bishop. After twenty-four years in the episcopacy he was retired in 1896. He was regarded as one of the most effective preachers of Methodism. Of his various books, Christian Purity and Beyond the Grave were most widely popular.—Ibid., Spring, 1903, p. 108.

‡ Henry C. Sheldon (1845-1928), born in Martinsburg, N. Y., received his collegiate education at Yale University. A.B., 1867; A.M., 1870. He was received into the Maine Conference on trial in 1873 and appointed to Brunswick. In 1875 he became professor of historical theology in Boston University School of Theology, and in 1895 professor of systematic theology. "It was he," wrote Albert G. Knudson, "who made the transition from the older to the newer type of Methodist theology, and by virtue of that fact he marks an epoch in the history of theological thought in our Church." He was a prolific writer, his thirteen works including—in addition to the two mentioned above—History of the Christian Church (5 vols., 1894); History of Unbelief in the Nineteenth Century (1907); New Testament Theology (1911); Theosophy and New Thought (1916); and The Essentials of Christianity (1922).—Albert C. and externals of Christian doctrines” and expressed the opinion that although they were perilous they would “probably prove beneficial in the final outcome.”¹⁰⁹

Methodism maintained during this period on the whole a fair balance between the ultra-conservative and the radical positions in theology. Advocates of new and changed points of view were regarded in general with tolerance. Many of them were welcomed in the pulpits of large and prominent churches. There were few heresy trials and fewer adverse verdicts. One widely publicized trial was that of Hiram W. Thomas of the Rock River Conference. At the Conference session of 1878 he was charged with teachings “at variance with the doctrines of Methodism” and was asked by formal resolution either to give assurance that such teachings would not be repeated or to retire from the ministry. At the 1880 session a similar resolution was presented and adopted by a vote of 110 to 65. By request of the Conference Thomas—who for twenty-five years, according to his statement, had “been trying to persuade . . . [men] to turn from sin to righteousness”—presented a written defense of his views. He said, in part :

I have affirmed my belief in the doctrines of the Atonement, and in the inspiration of the scriptures. I have given you the form in which I hold these doctrines, and the explanations that to me seem most rational and scriptural. I have said I could not accept the ‘verbal theory’ of inspiration, I have said that I held to the ‘moral’ and not to the ‘penal’ theory of the Atonement I have said that I could not accept the doctrine of a hell of material fire; I have said that I believe in the eternal stability and righteousness of God’s moral government, and that all sin will be properly punished; I have said also that if souls sinned forever, they must suffer forever. . . . but that I must believe in the ‘eternal goodness’—that the mercy of God will last forever; that punishment will not be in wrath but in love; that God will in no world cast away the penitent,

* * * *

We are in a transitional period, and the world cannot, as I think, be held to faith by trying to tie it down to all the thinking of the past. There must be room for honest thought; and with it a proper tolerance in differences of opinion.

. . . I want to see Methodism the most prudently tolerant in matters of personal liberty in thought, and I want to see it a great singing, praying power, filled with the love of God and man, and moving on the life of the world.

* * * *

You must, therefore, excuse me, brethren, for declining to accede to your request to leave the church.¹¹⁰

The paper was referred to a committee which reported its opinion that “Dr. Thomas is essentially out of harmony with the doctrines of the . . . Church.” Charges were formulated against him of (1) disseminating doctrines contrary to the “Articles of Religion and established standards of doctrine,” in that he denied the “inspiration and authority of portions of the canonical Scriptures . . . ,” and (2) in denying the doctrine of atonement; also (3) in teaching a probation after death for those who die in sin, thereby “antagonizing the standards” of Methodism “in relation to the endless punishment of the wicked.”¹¹¹ In 1881 the case was referred to a Select Number who acquitted the accused by a vote of ten to five on the first specification, and convicted nine to six on the second and third specifications. The Judicial Conference, to which Thomas appealed, declined to entertain his appeal.* The Christian Advocate upheld the decision of expulsion in a lengthy editorial by J. M. Buckley.¹¹²

SCIENCE AND RELIGION

The publication of Darwin's Origin of Species in 1859 and his Descent of Man in 1871 constituted a landmark in the division between an old order of thought and a new. A. J. Balfour's characterization of the nineteenth century is not an overstatement:

No century has seen so great a change in our intellectual apprehension of the world in which we live. . . . Our whole point of view has altered. The mental framework in which we arrange the separate facts in the world of men and of things is quite a new framework. The spectacle of the universe presents itself now in a wholly changed perspective. We do not see more but we see differently.¹¹³

The full significance of the evolutionary theory, with its implications for the traditional belief in the Genesis account as a literal description of Creation, was not at first realized by churchmen. The more alert intellectuals were immediately challenged by it but the preoccupation of most people with the war and its interference with the normal activities of everyday life were such that the new hypothesis attracted little attention. But with the close of the war conditions quickly changed. As books by Huxley, Spencer, Fiske, and other scientific writers were widely circulated and as it became known that many of the colleges had taken over the new ideas and were propagating them among their students the evangelical Churches were thoroughly aroused. Evolution was rabidly denounced from hundreds of pulpits as “an attack upon Christianity,” as making “the Bible an unbearable fiction,” and as contributing to the spread of “the rankest kind of atheism.” Even its more mild-spoken opponents maintained that Darwin's thesis could never be reconciled with the Christian religion.

Widespread popular alarm of religious people was tempered by the fact that in some of the colleges evolution was not immediately accepted as scientifically demonstrated, even in the departments of natural science. America had no scientist of higher standing than Jean L. R. Agassiz, professor of zoology and geology in Harvard University, who throughout his life steadfastly rejected the theory of evolution and maintained his belief in independent creation. On the whole, however, scientists—among them some who interpreted scientific findings as effectively negating the teachings of religion—increased both in their certitude and in popular influence during the late sixties and throughout the seventies, thereby contributing to the spread of agnosticism.

While the first reaction of the Churches was principally that of denunciation and denial this attitude was soon followed by attempts to reconcile the Genesis account of creation with the postulates of evolution. The earliest attempt at reconciliation, made almost immediately after the publication of the Origin of Species, was that of Asa Gray of Harvard, eminent botanist, who in a series of essays in the Atlantic Monthly in 1860 argued that Darwinism did not exclude the doctrine of design in creation, and that the religious doctrine of Omnipotent fiat was not in conflict with the theory of development. His ideas were popularized and widely circulated by George Frederick Wright, minister and geologist of Oberlin.

Most widely influential in effecting reconciliation between religion and science was John Fiske, who over a period of twenty-five years, in numerous tracts and books, developed the idea that, far from undermining Christian faith, evolution validated and illumined it, making clear that the perfecting of man was the chief object of Divine Power in the multifarious creative activities of the universe.

To the process of reconciliation of what were first assumed to be irreconcilable points of view Methodist ministers and laymen made no slight contribution. In 1876 John H. Vincent scheduled at Chautauqua an extended "Scientific Conference." During the discussion on one of the three days of the Conference the position was maintained that "harmony between geology and revelation may be found in geological deductions of the first chapter of Genesis," and that while "revelation . . . is the true guide, . . . in some instances science greatly enlarges our views of the Scripture record."¹¹⁴ In the July, 1876, Methodist Quarterly Review Alexander Winchell, Methodist layman, reviewed The Theistic Conception of the World, by B. F. Cocker, which he asserted presents "a conception of the world, as framed and sustained by profoundest scientific investigation, and shows us that it implies God." He referred to "the wide paralysis of faith and hope caused by the pernicious influence of . . . [an] uneducated crusade against science, and . . . sullen contempt for religion."¹¹⁵

The appearance on the Chautauqua platform of Henry Drummond, Scotch professor and ardent Christian evangelist, as an exponent of evolution, brought reassurance to the minds of many lay people of the Churches. At first Dwight L. Moody, who introduced Drummond to American audiences, was severely criticized by conservative church members for enlisting the cooperation of an avowed evolutionist in revival tours but the latter's success as an evangelist disarmed the critics and many came to see in him a convincing demonstration of the compatibility of evolution with fervent evangelical faith.

At no time during the period was the Methodist Episcopal Church seriously disturbed by the conflict between science and religion. The Descent of Man was reviewed in the Methodist Quarterly Review shortly after its publication. The review characterized the author's spirit as reverent and found in it no necessary contradiction to Hebraic history.¹¹⁶ At the close of the half century William North Rice, a member of the New York East Conference who for fifty-one years (1867-1918) was professor of geology in Wesleyan University, wrote:

multitudes of men and women find that the acceptance of scientific teachings in no wise disturbs their personal religious life. . . . men are practically ceasing . . . to feel their Christian faith disturbed by the scientific discoveries which marked the middle of the nineteenth century.¹¹⁷

Andrew C. Armstrong, professor of philosophy in Ohio Wesleyan University, also felt that the closing decades of the century, as compared with the middle years, were characterized by a "recoil from doubt," and that to this development the sciences had made a positive contribution, "the most remarkable phenomenon of recent years."¹¹⁸

It is probable that Dr. Rice's statement accurately expressed the attitude of the majority of the better-educated ministers and lay people of the Church. Many found no special difficulty in reinterpreting Genesis in general accord with evolutionary views and others took the position that the Bible was not intended to present scientific truth. For neither group was the reconciliation of science and religion difficult. But for many uneducated members of the Church, unaccustomed to thinking in scientific terms, in the habit of interpreting the Bible literally, the earlier difficulty still remained.

HIGHER CRITICISM

The disquiet in the Churches caused by the promulgation of the theory of evolution was coincident in time with the popularization of results of historical criticism of the Bible, a development destined to create more concern and more intense feeling than the hypothesis regarding the origin of man. In Europe scholars trained in the historical study of documents had for long been engaged in exact critical examination of the Biblical texts but the results of their study had not been widely brought to public attention. The publication in England in 1860 of a volume entitled Essays and Reviews by seven Anglican scholars created a violent storm of indignation and angry protest,* repercus-

* In 1864 Essays and Reviews was condemned by the Convocation of Canterbury. Rowland Williams was brought to trial before an ecclesiastical court and found guilty of heretical beliefs but the verdict was later set aside by the highest court of appeal. Because of his views the convocation of Oxford voted against the endowment of Jowett's chair of Greek. William Robertson Smith because of similar views was removed from his professorship in Aberdeen, but later was given a chair at Cambridge.—James T. Addison, The Episcopal Church in the United States, 1789-1931, pp. 243 ff.; B. Harvie Branscomb, "The Study and Interpretation of the Bible," in Samuel McCrea Cavert and Henry Pitney Van Dusen, Eds., The Church Through Half a Century, Essays in Honor of William Adams Brown, pp. 166 f.

sions of which were immediately heard on the American side of the Atlantic. The essays were temperate and reverent in tone but the conclusions which they advanced were of a nature to confound utterly the minds of those whose faith depended upon a literalistic interpretation of Scripture. Within a year the book was in its fifth edition and many of its statements were being publicized not only in religious journals but in newspapers in both Great Britain and the United States. The kind of statements which caused general consternation and alarm may be readily identified. Rowland Williams, for example, wrote:

It is not the importance severally, but the continual recurrence of . . . difficulties, which bears with ever-growing induction upon the question, whether the Pentateuch is of one age and hand, . . . or whether the whole literature grew like a tree rooted in the varying thoughts of successive generations, and whether traces of editorship, if not of composition, between the ages of Solomon and Hezekiah, are manifest to whoever will recognise them.¹¹⁹

C. W. Goodwin, writing on the "Mosaic Cosmogony," said of the narrative of the Creation:

No one contends that it can be used as a basis of astronomical or geological teaching, and those who profess to see in it an accordance with facts, only do this sub modo, and by processes which despoil it of its consistency and grandeur, both which may be preserved if we recognise in it, not an authentic utterance of Divine knowledge, but a human utterance, which it has pleased Providence to use in a special way for the education of mankind.¹²⁰

More than any other the essay of Benjamin Jowett, professor of Greek at Oxford University, "On the Interpretation of Scripture," drew hostile criticism in religious circles. In essence the article said:

The Book itself, which links together the beginning and the end of the human race, will not have a less inestimable value because the Spirit has taken the place of the letter. Its discrepancies of fact, when we become familiar with them, will seem of little consequence in comparison with the truths which it unfolds. That these truths, . . . have been preserved for ever in a book, is one of the many blessings which the Jewish and Christian revelations have conferred on the world—a blessing not the less real, because it is not necessary to attribute it to miraculous causes.¹²¹

Essays and Reviews received almost immediate attention in Methodist periodicals. In January, 1861, the Methodist Quarterly Review in an unsigned article declared that "after these successive assaults are completed there are left but a tattered fragment of our old Bible, and but a shadowy phantasm of our old religion." Paley's Evidences of Christianity, the writer confidently asserted, "will survive whole aeons of literary bubbles like these essays."¹²² A few weeks later the Christian Advocate, of which Edward Thomson was then editor, carried on its editorial page a brief article equally condemnatory.

"While . . . [the] unanimous judgment of condemnation . . . [signed by all the Bishops of the Church of England]," it said, "is encouraging, it is a discouraging reflection that it is but a censure, and that the traitors cannot be displaced from the positions which they dishonor."¹²³

Attack against the higher critics was accompanied by magazine articles and elaborate volumes intended to buttress the traditional belief in the verbal inspiration of the Scriptures. Numerous preachers—many of whom did not take the trouble to inform themselves concerning the methods and findings of Biblical scholars—pronounced unsparing judgment against all those who had set themselves, so they declared, to undermine the foundations of Christianity. Some of the leaders of the Church joined in the general outcry, among others Bishop McCabe. "Do these men," he asked, "wish to destroy the Bible? to break its hold upon the hearts and consciences of men?"

Then let them be looking round for some other sacred book to take its place; some book whose ethical teachings will lift nations into power and grandeur, for no nation ever became great and enduring without the help of the Holy Bible.¹²⁴

Others expressed themselves with no less certitude but with less of emotional overtone. Gilbert Haven wrote: The "verbal inspiration" of the Bible "is of the same family with every other received and essential doctrine of Christianity." It is "as sovereign in its sphere of thought, as the atonement is in its, or the incarnation." He would admit of no exception. If the Scripture is "The Book of God," he insisted, it must be "his in its minutest word, his in its perfect totality."¹²⁵

From the beginning of the controversy a wide range of opinion existed within the Church. Two years before the publication of Essays and Reviews, Daniel Curry,* widely recognized as one of the foremost leaders of the Church, writing on the "Inspiration of the Scriptures," characterized the doctrine of verbal inspiration as "mechanical and non-rational," and concluded:

The necessity of reviewing the whole subject is conceded, and men whose orthodoxy is beyond suspicion, and whose piety and learning give much authority to their opinions, are ready to declare, that while their confidence in the Bible as a record of the Divine counsels is undiminished, they find it impossible to defend their opinions by the arguments most relied on, or to adopt the theories of inspiration hitherto chiefly in vogue.¹²⁶

* Daniel Curry (1809-87) was born near Peekskill, N. Y. He was graduated from Wesleyan University and in January, 1841, received on trial in the Georgia Conference. For twenty-one years, exclusive of an interim of two years (1855-57) as president of Indiana Asbury University, he was in the pastorate—four years in Georgia and seventeen years in New York and Connecticut. In May, 1864, he was elected editor of the Christian Advocate and Journal; in 1876 editor of the Ladies' Repository (later the National Repository). During 1881-83 he was once more in the pastorate. In May, 1884, General Conference again elected him as editor, this time of the Methodist Quarterly Review and Book Editor, an office which he still held when the final summons came. His was "that Scotch-Irish ancestry," says Daniel A. Goodsell, "which lives long, works hard, fights well, reasons closely, loves intensely, dislikes strongly, and has underneath the firm rock of religious conviction. Methodism owes much, in both continents, to this strain, and owes nothing stronger or braver than Daniel Curry."—D. A. Goodsell, "In Memoriam . . ." Methodist Review, LXIX (November, 1887), 809-24; editorial, Christian Advocate, LXII (1887), 34 (Aug. 25), p. [545.]

While wide divergence in point of view continued within the Church throughout the period and beyond, as the decades passed it was evident that an increasing number of representative churchmen recognized the validity of the process of scholarly critical examination of the Biblical text and also that religion had more to gain than to lose in such study. In 1895 a writer in the Methodist Review said: "This is an era of 'biblical criticism,' the justification of which is, that divine truth in the written form, as we have it, is a proper subject for investigation." The results of such criticism, he said, need not be feared, "since a belief founded on rational inquiry will be more permanent than that superstitious reverence for truth which has too much characterized the past, and even the religious world itself."¹²⁷ In 1896 Henry A. Buttz, president of Drew Theological Seminary, generally considered to be conservative, recognized positive values that had accrued to the Church and to religion from Biblical criticism. While carefully guarding his statement by saying that "the most advanced biblical criticism . . . has not reached a state in which the Church can wisely or safely, in her organized capacity, consider its conclusions with a view to modify her traditional beliefs," he asserted:

That some advances have been made in our knowledge of the Bible; that lexicographical, archaeological, and literary investigations have removed obscurities and given a fresh impulse to those who seek to understand the "sacred deposit" God has committed to the care of his Church, will be readily admitted by those who have kept themselves abreast of the critical investigations of our times.¹²⁸

Adherence on the part of many ministers and missionaries to a literalistic interpretation of the Bible and the assumption that one level of inspiration pervades the whole from Genesis to Revelation not only retarded the growth of the Church during the latter part of the period among people of college education but also was an obstacle to missionary success. In the Orient not a few students of keen, discriminating mind were not slow to detect unchristian elements in Old Testament narratives.

The Methodist Church suffered less from inner conflict over higher criticism than some of the other evangelical denominations. In a few Annual Conferences strong feeling was aroused but the Church at large was saved the rancor that seriously disturbed the peace of other communions.* The principle of the right of individual judgment in the interpretation of the Scriptures was too strong in the Church to permit condemnation of the exercise of the same right in questions of historical criticism.†

* When in 1891 Charles A. Briggs was appointed to the chair of Biblical theology in Union Theological Seminary more than seventy presbyteries protested the appointment and in 1893 the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church suspended him from the Presbyterian ministry. As a result the seminary severed its relationship to the Church. Henry Preserved Smith, who had defended Briggs' views, was removed from his professorship in Lane Seminary, Cincinnati, and also suspended from the ministry.—B. H. Branscomb, p. 174, and S. M. Cavert, "William Adams Brown: Servant of the Church of Christ," pp. 12 f. in S. M. Cavert and H. P. Van Dusen, Eds., op. cit.

† The test of the right of private judgment in critical study of the Bible in the Methodist Episcopal Church came later in the case of Hinckley G. Mitchell. For account of this see Vol. IV.

INCREASING EMPHASIS ON SOCIAL CHRISTIANITY

In American Methodism there had always been those who felt that the Gospel of Christ was more truly manifested in a ministry to the poor, in sharing the burdens of the underprivileged and the unfortunate, and in caring for the sick than in the formal exercises of religion.* Personal social ministries such as had characterized the work of the Circuit Riders earlier in the century were continued during this period, supplemented by various forms of service which accompanied the growth of institutional philanthropy in American society. The 1864 General Conference authorized the appointment by the Bishops of chaplains of hospitals, and missionaries "to neglected portions of our cities." By action of the General Conference of 1868 authority was given the Bishops to appoint for not more than three years Temperance Agents and chaplains to reformatory, sanitary, and charitable institutions.¹²⁹ Provision was gradually made under the auspices of the Church for care of the aged in Old People's Homes, by 1884 five having been established; one each in New York (1850), Philadelphia (1865), and Baltimore (1868); the fourth also at Baltimore, a home for aged Negroes, established in 1870; and the fifth, for Negroes, at New Orleans in 1881. The first orphans' home was the German Methodist Orphan Asylum, opened in 1864 at Berea, Ohio. Later in the same year the Central Wesleyan Orphan Home was established at Warrenton, Missouri. In 1868 the Woman's Home Missionary Society founded a home for orphaned Chinese children in San Francisco. In 1871 the Minard Home for female orphans was established at Morristown, New Jersey; in 1879 the Methodist Episcopal Orphanage at Philadelphia, and in 1881 Saint Christopher's Home at Dobbs Ferry, New York.¹³⁰ Altogether, by 1895 the Church had ten homes for orphaned children.

In the Christian Advocate for January 27, 1881, an editorial appeared which began: "The time has come when the Methodist Episcopal Church should turn her attention to providing charitable foundations," and asked: "is it not time that somewhere we built a hospital or an asylum?"¹³¹ The editorial brought an immediate response from George I. Seney in an offer of sixteen lots in Brooklyn as a site and $200,000. in cash toward the "erection of a hospital, . . . open to Jew and Gentile, Protestant and Catholic, heathen and infidel on the same terms." The Methodist Episcopal Hospital in Brooklyn was opened on December 15, 1887. The Methodist Episcopal Hospital in Philadelphia and the Sibley Memorial Hospital in Washington, D.C., were established in 1882, the latter by the Woman's Home Missionary Society; and the Wesley Hospital in Chicago in 1888.¹³² By 1895 a total of thirteen hospitals had been established under Church auspices.

The limited social perspective of the Circuit Riders of earlier decades also characterized the Methodist preachers of the middle years of the century.

* Cf. Vol. II, 2-9.

Accounted for in part by preoccupation with the problem of slavery the social concern of the Church appreciably diminished. Under the influence of increasing wealth, the glamour of business success, and growing middle-class-consciousness, Methodism, in common with other evangelical Churches, presented an almost unbroken front in defense of the status quo. Traditions of religious, political, and economic individualism had become so inwrought in the thinking of churchmen, as with the entrepreneurs of business and commerce and the tycoons of the rapidly growing industrialism and corporatism, that to challenge them was almost universally denounced as heresy. Both ministers and laymen determinedly held that all was well and no reform was needed.

The times called for just such warnings as were sounded in England by Robertson of Brighton: "Rarely have we [the clergy] dared to demand of the powers that be, justice; of the wealthy man and the titled, duties." "Shame on us!" he continued, we have not denounced the wrongs done to weakness: and yet for one text in the Bible which requires submission and patience from the poor, you will find a hundred which denounce the vices of the rich . . . and woe to us in the great day of God, if we have been the sycophants of the rich, instead of the Redressers of the poor man's wrongs . . .¹³³

But no such voice as that of Robertson was raised in a Methodist pulpit in America. In the small-town and rural congregations which constituted the large majority of Methodist churches the injustices and exploitative oppressions of industrialism were for the most part unrealized. The preachers in the churches in industrial centers seemed to be blinded or disposed to ignore the methods by which the few were amassing wealth and to urge the poor to endure their ills with patience in hope of heavenly reward.

With the late seventies and the early eighties a marked change was observable. The violations of Christian ethics in commercial and industrial practices had become so numerous and so glaring that they could no longer be ignored; the alarming increase in the slum population of the rapidly growing cities created consternation in the minds of public-spirited citizens; the disaffection of the laboring class with religion and increasing bitterness against the Churches and ministers caused an increasing number of thoughtful churchmen to question the content of the Churches' message and the effectiveness of their methods.

More than by any other causes organized religion was driven by the impact of labor conflict and by the recurrent depressions, affecting both labor and the middle class, to concern itself with economic and social conditions. The concept of social justice was formulated as a Christian ideal, and began to be insistently urged from Protestant pulpits. Preachers began to be more frank and outspoken in condemnation of social sins. Social settlements began to be established in overcrowded industrial sections along with city missions.¹³⁴

In 1877 at the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church a special committee of the House of Bishops reported a resolution stating that "the work given to the Church in America, in guiding and directing the social movements of the age, is a work of permanent importance."¹³⁵ From this time on, until the close of the century, foremost among the advocates of social Christianity were representatives of the Episcopal Church.* The first organization formed to promote the study and discussion of social problems from a Christian point of view was the (Episcopal) Christian Social Union organized in 1891, inspired by the organization of the same name within the Church of England.† Four years earlier a number of clergy in New York founded "The Church Association for the Advancement of the Interests of Labor," a social action group. For seventeen years Bishop Frederic D. Huntington of Central New York was its president. It enrolled forty-seven Bishops as honorary vice presidents. The organization concerned itself with promoting remedial labor legislation, arbitrating strikes, and agitating against sweatshops and slum settlements.¹³⁶

Next in order of interest and activity were representatives of the Congregational Church, of whom the most influential were Josiah Strong, and Washington Gladden, who became pastor of the First Congregational Church of Columbus, Ohio, in 1882. A half million copies of Strong's Our Country were circulated within twenty years. Typical of the courageous pulpit declarations of Washington Gladden was his statement :

The doctrine which bases all the relations of employer and employed upon self-interest is a doctrine of the pit; it has been bringing hell to earth in large installments for a good many years.¹³⁷

The Brotherhood of the Kingdom, of which the early members were all Baptists, formed in 1892, developed on a broad interdenominational basis. A development of far-reaching significance was the introduction of social studies into the curricula of theological schools. The first instance was that of Andover Seminary when in 1879 William Jewett Tucker began a thorough-going course in social ethics. Starting in 1886 Francis G. Peabody held the chair of Christian morals at the Harvard Divinity School. At the Chicago Theological Seminary in 1893 Graham Taylor was appointed to the first professorship of Christian sociology in the country, a chair which was "wholly devoted to the social interpretation of religion."¹³⁸

† The leadership of the Episcopal Church in the social Christianity movement in the United States was undoubtedly influenced in large measure by the activity of the Christian Socialists in Great Britain led by Frederick Denison Maurice, Charles Kingsley, William Morris, John R. Seeley, and others.

It might have been expected, considering the prominence of social teaching and practice in the Wesleyan heritage, that Methodism would have produced leading exponents of the renewed social emphasis. But such was not the case. The predominant note among Methodist preachers and writers was one of defense of existing institutions and practices and protest against social change. Among the really outstanding interpreters of social Christianity preceding 1895 not a single Methodist minister was to be found. No organization for social agitation or action was formed by Methodists during the period. Borden P. Bowne, who on questions touching science and religion and the higher criticism strongly reinforced liberal points of view, was "in essential agreement with the most conservative, defensive wing of the new social movement." Social ills, he held, frequently were the fault of individuals, not of society, and the hope of effective reform rested in inculcation of the traditional virtues of prudence, thrift, honesty, and justice—virtues needed by the poor quite as much as the rich.¹³⁹

But social ferment was at work within Methodism. The social problems which were challenging some of the best minds in American Protestantism were beginning to trouble the Methodists, both leaders of the Church and men in the rank and file of the ministry. One of the first statements on the principles of social Christianity from the pen of a Methodist writer was an article entitled "Relations of Politics and Christianity" by Bostwick Hawley of the Troy Conference which appeared in the Methodist Quarterly Review in 1879. Again, in 1886, the same periodical printed two unprecedented articles under the title, "Christianity's Next Problem." The author said:

The accumulations of gigantic fortunes by craft and cunning, by fraud and theft . . . the ruthless seizure and control of the highways of continental traffic, the rape of the world's mineral wealth, the fruits of invention and discovery made instruments of oppression and ministers of greed—these are indeed terrible illustrations of the power, the tyranny, and the cruelty of avarice, as well as of its antagonism to Christianity.¹⁴⁰

The way must be opened, the author contended, for legislation "for the benefit of humanity rather than for the feeding of avarice."

Another article of noteworthy social significance was written by C. M. Morse in 1891. He developed at considerable length the thesis that regeneration, or conversion, would never in itself bring about the reform of society. "'Wicked men'" and "'regenerated' men," he declared, in about equal numbers "monopolize the land, . . . own the money, . . . engage in speculation, . . . [and] profit by corporate power, trusts, and monopoly of every kind." It never enters the mind of the regenerated that the change from "a sinful to a religious life carries with it any obligation to investigate social questions" and work for reform.¹⁴¹

In 1892 for the first time the Bishops in their Episcopal Address called attention to such social evils as "the rapid accumulation of enormous wealth in the hands of a few successful speculators" and "the grinding and soulless arrogance of monopolies, working impoverishment to the masses." What they deplored, however, was not so much the social injustice involved as the tendency to excite hatred and to arouse animosities "which will be more and more difficult to repress, and which, if not arrested, will breed riot and revolution." As remedies no suggestions were offered other than reminding the rich of their perils and responsibilities, exhorting the poor to endure their sufferings with patience, and educating in principles which will inspire a right spirit in the reciprocal relations of the rich and the poor.¹⁴²

By 1895 a beginning had been made in the interpretation of the social meanings of the Christian Gospel. A few ministers of the Methodist Church had been awakened and were preaching religion in social terms. The response of a small minority of laymen was encouraging but to the vast majority of the members of the churches the term social Christianity still had a strange sound and little meaning. If Methodism in this period had adhered to the social teaching and practice of its Wesleyan heritage its message under the new conditions which prevailed would have been revitalized and it could have gathered into its fold by persistent, earnest effort a very much larger number of English, Welsh, and German immigrant working people who had a background of Christian social conviction who would have strengthened the Church at one of its weakest points.

CHANGING FORMS OF EVANGELISM

Many of the leaders of Methodism who recognized the need for revitalization of the spirit and life of the Church continued to hope and pray for a nationwide religious revival. What is needed "above all things," the Bishops said in their Episcopal Address of 1856, "is such humble, active prayer and faith, as will secure a general outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon all the preachers and their congregations."¹⁴³

In 1857-58 the hoped-for revival came in an unexpected way, sweeping across the nation in a remarkable manner, different from anything known before. It seemed to have come without advance notice or preparation, beginning in the midday prayer meetings of a small group of businessmen held under the auspices of the New York City Y.M.C.A. The meetings, begun in September, 1856, in the Dutch Reformed church had been in progress for almost a year when the panic of 1857 struck, paralyzing business and driving thousands of firms into bankruptcy. Soon the handful of attendants increased to forty, then to a hundred, and finally overflowed the facilities of the building. Other meetings were begun, soon numbering twenty; finally one hundred and fifty. From New York the spiritual impulse spread to Philadelphia, Albany, and Boston, and from these centers to cities, towns, and villages throughout the country. Prominent citizens of their own accord volunteered as leaders, telling of their religious experience, and encouraging others to do the same.

The revival was not carried forward by flaming evangelists. No sermons were preached except at the regular Sunday services. Prayer-meetings and lay efforts were the chief agencies, and the exercises were of the most simple and direct character.¹⁴⁴

Here was a distinctly new form of revivalism, or more properly, of evangelism. Meetings were informal, centering more in prayer than in preaching, and—as spontaneity was emphasized—all but conducted themselves. The assistance of ministers was enlisted but leadership was principally in the hands of laymen. The dogmatic emphasis of earlier revivals was lacking and exhortations and prayers were related more definitely to the expressed fears, doubts, and frustrations of persons. Names of those asking to be prayed for were announced, and prayers specifically offered up for them.

The movement went forward for a year as an irrepressible spiritual tide, without regard to dividing lines of the denominations. In twelve months, it was estimated, a million communicants were added to the membership of the Churches and countless laymen awakened from spiritual lethargy and stirred to activity in various forms of Christian service. The membership increase of the Methodist Episcopal Church was 136,036.¹⁴⁵

LAY EVANGELISTIC MOVEMENTS

This new form of evangelism brought the layman into his own as he had not been since the beginnings of Christianity. The Y.M.C.A.* was wholly an organization of laymen. Its officers, leaders, and members were all of the laity. In it young men of the evangelical Churches found opportunity for expression of their religious convictions and purposes in forms of evangelism not offered them in the local churches with which they were affiliated.

The program of the Association centered in evangelistic activities. Its members went forth to preach on street corners, on docks, and in firehouses; to aid in conducting rescue missions and in the distribution of tracts and Bibles. The only object of the Y.M.C.A., said The Watchman in 1883, is to lead "young men to know Christ," while in 1895 the Y's Springfield Convention declared that "winning men to personal faith in Jesus" must always remain the chief concern.¹⁴⁶

The Association interpreted evangelism in broad terms. It became increasingly conscious of the evils of urbanization and of the worst by-products of industrialization, and sought to alleviate them. A chief concern was for the young men from small towns and rural areas who were sucked into the vortex of the great cities—homeless, lonely, and tempted by the cities' glamour with its accompaniments of alcoholism, vice, delinquency, and crime. During the later decades of the period activity in direct personal evangelism tended to lessen, and attention to center increasingly in providing attractively furnished buildings, with dormitories, offering social activities, game rooms, swimming pools, lecture courses, and libraries, thus ministering to the moral and spiritual welfare of the increasing multitudes of young men congregated in the cities.¹⁴⁷

* The first two Young Men's Christian Associations in America were formed in Boston and Montreal in 1851. Between 1851 and 1855 Associations were organized in New York, Washington, Baltimore, Buffalo, Detroit, Chicago, St. Louis, New Orleans, Cleveland, Pittsburgh, and numerous other cities—by the end of 1854 forty-nine associations. The mortality rate following the first wave of organization was high, but the 1857-58 revival stimulated reorganization and renewed growth.—C. Howard Hopkins, History of the Y. M. C. A. in North America, pp. 16 f., 22 f.

Despite the interest of Association leaders in social welfare the Y's activities embraced chiefly middle-class men. In its leadership and to a large extent in its membership it was a middle-class organization. In the seventies a movement different in form developed which aimed specifically at reaching the laboring class, more particularly the unemployed and the "down and out." In 1865 William Booth (1829-1912) founded in East London the mission later called the Christian Mission, and in 1878 the Salvation Army. His passion for open-air preaching, according to his account, led to his separation from the Methodist New Connexion. In 1880 he extended his operations to the United States. As no other religious organization the Army by its spectacular methods, its direct personal appeals, and its combination of spiritual and material relief, succeeded in reaching and saving large numbers of the poverty-stricken, the drunken, and the criminal, whom the Churches could not reach.

Following the Civil War a lay evangelistic movement closely allied to the Y.M.C.A. developed under the leadership of Dwight L. Moody.* His city campaigns in Chicago, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia, and other large cities were immensely successful in attracting and converting men who were unreached by the Churches. His simple, direct, literalistic Biblical sermons, together with his dynamic personality, attracted multitudes to whom the scholarly messages of college-trained ministers had little appeal. He placed slight emphasis on sectarian dogmas, emphasizing rather the love of God for men and man's dire need for divine grace and constant help. He was greatly aided by the collaboration of Ira D. Sankey, a Methodist layman of Newcastle, Pennsylvania, whose singing of hymns† and leadership in congregational song was unusually effective.¹⁴⁸

Following the 1857-58 revival students in widely separated institutions

* Dwight L. Moody (1837-99) was born in East Northfield, Mass. On account of the death of his father he early became dependent on his own resources and had slight opportunity for schooling. At eighteen he was converted and immediately entered upon an exceptionally earnest Christian life. He became a shoe salesman in Chicago in 1856 and in 1858 rented a large public hall over a city market in which he soon had a mission night school and a Sunday school attended by some five hundred boys and girls from the streets. In 1863 this was organized as the Illinois Street (later Chicago Avenue) Church. Soon after the close of the Civil War he entered upon an immensely widened evangelistic career. His realization of need for trained Christian workers led him to establish the Northfield Seminary for girls in 1879, and in 1881 the nearby Mt. Hermon School for boys. In 1889 he founded the Bible Institute in Chicago. His sermons were widely circulated in English, and in German, Swedish, and Danish translations.—William R. Moody, The Life of Dwight L. Moody, pp. 19 ff., passim.

† The Moody and Sankey Gospel Hymns were a mixed good. Their emotional appeal, their contribution of a sense of security to men and women baffled and frustrated by the hardships of life, and became conscious of religious needs which they felt might be met more effectively through organizations of their own than through formal services sponsored and conducted by the authorities. Two of the earliest organized student groups were formed at the University of Michigan and the University of Virginia. Their organizations were patterned after that of the Y.M.C.A. Other societies arose spontaneously, some of which sought affiliation with the national Y.M.C.A., though the leaders of the Association had not planned to project the movement into the colleges. Between 1856 and 1877 campus groups in Methodist and other colleges—in all, nearly seventy—organized Y.M.C.A.'s. Most of these early student associations held weekly, in a few cases daily, devotional meetings. In addition to the all-student general meetings, at some colleges small circles were formed in boardinghouses and dormitories for Bible study and prayer.¹⁴⁹ These student-initiated Associations within a few years came to play so large a part in student life that they could no longer be ignored by the general Association and in September, 1877, the International Committee of the Y.M.C.A. created a college secretaryship for the promotion of an intercollegiate Y.M.C.A. movement. College campaigns of evangelism were conducted on many campuses under the leadership of Moody, Henry Drummond, S. M. Sayford, and others, which resulted within ten years in leading thousands of students into a vital religious experience. Bible study courses prepared especially for college students were published and widely circulated.¹⁵⁰

STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT

A missionary evangelism movement, closely interrelated with college Y.M. and Y.W. evangelism and with the Moody influence, had its rise in the summer of 1886. At Moody's invitation 251 college men, representing eighty-seven colleges of the United States and Canada, all of whom were members of the Intercollegiate Y.M.C.A., assembled at Mount Hermon, Massachusetts, for a period of intensive Bible study. Foreign missions was not one of Moody's chief concerns but among the 251 students present were twenty-one who were "seriously thinking of becoming foreign missionaries."* Through the influence of this missionary nucleus the Mount Hermon Conference became a missionary Pentecost. By its close on August 1 the number of volunteers for foreign missions had reached one hundred and the Student Volunteer Movement had come alive.

their assurance of God's love and care made them an all but indispensable aid in the evangelist's city campaigns. Nevertheless, together with the long list of revival songbooks which followed in their train, they cheapened religion and lowered the quality of the music used in churches for more than two generations.

* The "Society of the Brethren," organized at Williams College in 1808 (Vol. I, 165, 165n) had kindled a flame that was still alive, although at times it had burned low. The Society had maintained a continuous existence at Andover Theological Seminary, and had influenced the organization of the Inter-Seminary Missionary Alliance and the formation of the Princeton Foreign Missionary Society in 1883. The Princeton delegates were among the most active in missionary recruiting at Mount Hermon.—Robert P. Wilder, The Great Commission, ch. I, passim.

During 1886-87 Robert P. Wilder and John N. Forman, as representatives of the movement, visited 176 colleges and theological seminaries to make missionary addresses and present the student volunteer pledge. By the close of their year's labor volunteers had increased from 100 to 2,200. In 1888-89 the movement was formally organized as the Student Volunteer Movement for Foreign Missions. By the close of 1892 the organization had enlisted in its service, in various capacities, Robert P. Wilder, John R. Mott, Robert E. Speer, D. Willard Lyon, and J. Campbell White, each of whom was to have a large part in shaping and carrying forward the world Christian missionary enterprise of the first third of the twentieth century. It had popularized throughout the Christian world the slogan "the evangelization of the world in this generation"*; had enlisted in its membership a total of 7,500 volunteers of whom 510 had sailed for foreign fields, 100 or more had been accepted by missionary societies for service, and 2,900 were in institutions of learning in various stages of preparation. The seriousness of the problem which for three-quarters of a century had troubled the missionary societies of the evangelical Churches—how to secure an adequate supply of qualified missionary volunteers—had been greatly lessened.¹⁵¹

DECLINE OF TRADITIONAL REVIVALISM

In certain quarters a critical attitude toward revivals developed in the Church, explained in part by the influence of Horace Bushnell, liberal Congregational leader, who recognized in the revival movement both significant merit and serious defect:

The merit is that it displaced an era of great formality, and brought in the demand of a truly supernatural experience. The defect is, that it has cast a type of religious individualism, intense beyond any former example. It makes nothing of the family, and the church, and the organic powers God has constituted as vehicles of grace. It takes every man as if he had existed alone; presumes that he is unreconciled to God until he has undergone some sudden and explosive experience in adult years, or after the age of reason; demands that experience, and only when it is reached, allows the subject to be an heir of life.¹⁵²

Many ministers who did not fully share Bushnell's critical judgment nevertheless found the revival technique less effective than it had been in earlier years. It was more difficult to secure the attendance of the unconverted and those who came were not so readily persuaded as formerly to yield to evangelistic appeals. Some preachers felt that they did not possess the combination of gifts necessary to make them successful revivalistic

* Some Methodist leaders were critical of the movement's statement of aim. "Of what value," James Mudge asked, ". . . is the urgent appeal, . . . that we aim constantly and solely at the evangelization of the world in the present generation? . . . If it is understood . . . from the emphasis which is put upon the word evangelize as set over against convert, to mean that our chief business is to hurry from place to place— . . . not stopping 'even to repeat the rejected message,' . . .—then it is a bad motto, and can only result in harm to the cause it essays to help."—"Shall Evangelization or Conversion be Our Aim?" Gospel in All Lands, March, 1892, pp. 119 f.

preachers and when their churches considered it desirable to "hold a revival" secured the aid of professional evangelists. Several memorials were presented to the 1884 General Conference asking for the recognition of evangelists as a special order of the ministry and the official designation of certain preachers as Conference or churchwide evangelists. Some pastors, however, decried the use of "traveling revivalists," declaring that with few exceptions their work was not abiding, nor the final results of much value. They criticised the religious songbooks which they used, filled with "jingle and a certain kind of melody" but lacking the spirit and power of the standard hymns of the Church. They felt, as one said, that the pastor who called "upon the Lord instead of upon a revivalist" would probably gather a harvest "with more abiding results."¹⁵³

Daniel Curry in 1886 discovered a growing recognition that revivals, in the sense of "special efforts and incitements toward religious quickening," were necessary to the maintenance of the Church's spiritual interest and power.

A living church is perennially a revival church, and yet special seasons of revival are needful alike for bringing the unsaved to Christ and for maintaining the required religious tone of the members of the church, and of the associate body as a whole.

Curry called attention to the fact that it was by "the earnest proclamation of the doctrine of justification by faith alone" that Luther and his co-workers "broke the death-spell" in the Church of the Middle Ages, and urged the plain preaching of "the great vital truths of Christianity" as the most effective means of promoting revivals.¹⁵⁴

The character of Camp Meetings gradually changed during this period. The conditions which had originally given rise to them no longer existed. With most sections of the country much more densely settled, and with larger church buildings available, the need for and effectiveness of Camp Meetings had lessened. The metamorphosis of the well-known Berger Camp Meeting about twenty miles southeast of Chicago, as described by Paul F. Douglass, was typical of the changes in scores of Camp Meetings in the East and the Midwest. He says:

The tents gradually disappeared. The organization bought more woodland. Individual families began to build substantial cottages. A tabernacle seating twelve to fifteen hundred was erected and dignified with a wooden floor, comfortable benches, a large platform, electric lights, and even screens which protected the worshipers from mosquitoes and flies. The camp meeting gradually died away and with it the appeal for conversions. With the growth of the Epworth League Institute, the old-fashioned meeting nearly vanished. Its memory has been kept alive by well-attended meetings on Saturdays and Sundays with preaching and rousing song services on Sunday afternoon.¹⁵⁵

ciation. The Manheim (Pennsylvania) Camp Meeting in 1868 was said to have had 25,000 people in attendance, including 300 ministers.¹⁵⁶ A much larger number combined evangelistic services with addresses on missions, Christian education, temperance, and Sunday-school work by representatives of these interests.* Special meetings for young people and for children were held, and various other features popular in character were introduced which drew large weekend crowds.

Objections began to be made by ministers to programs which tended to draw people away from the regular Sunday services of the churches. A resolution introduced at the 1880 General Conference and referred to the Committee on the State of the Church declared that the holding of Camp Meetings on Sunday was regarded by many "as a great and growing evil, tending to Sabbath desecration," and asked that the committee "give special attention to the subject," and voice the sentiment of the Conference regarding it. A second similar resolution was referred to the same committee.¹⁵⁷

As the proportion of college and seminary graduates increased in the Methodist ministry and the number of college-educated lay men and women likewise grew, manifestations of extreme emotional stress were more and more seldom witnessed in revivals, whether at Camp Meetings or in revivalistic meetings in the churches. To some this seemed to offer indubitable evidence of loss of spiritual power. To the extent that the better-educated preachers made the mistake of thinking of religious experience as pre-eminently a matter of learning and ignored the element of feeling, a loss of moral and spiritual power undoubtedly occurred. Religion without an element of emotion is something less than Christian. But by no means all college and seminary graduates fell into this error.

To a larger number of churchmen the loss thus incurred was more than counterbalanced by increased interest in the study of the Bible, especially among students and young people in the churches; an increased emphasis upon the example and application of the teachings of Christ in daily life; and a more ardent missionary enthusiasm as evidenced by a largely increased number of volunteers for life service in foreign fields, all of which were outgrowths of the newer types of evangelism and the new Christian movement in the colleges.

A DEVELOPING SUNDAY-SCHOOL MOVEMENT

In December, 1848, John McClintock, then editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, wrote to Stephen Olin:

Who can write me such an article as ought to be made on the duty of the Church toward her baptized children? Do help me out with this—it makes the blood run quick in my veins to write the sentence, I feel so strongly on the subject. And so I have felt for long—a sense of almost personal guilt . . . we Methodists are leaving [them] almost untouched.

* George Hughes, Methodist minister and a leader in the National Camp Meeting Movement, charged that "the ordinary camp-meetings" were very barren "in spiritual results"; that they had become commercialized; and that often "the scene bore close analogy to Bunyan's picture of Vanity Fair."—Op. cit., p. 26.

In a letter written in October of the same year he had said that he deemed pernicious the practice of baptizing infants and then treating them as if they were heathen, until the breath of a revival comes over to convert them, instead of holding them as initiated into the Church, as our standards do, and training them up for her service and God's.¹⁶⁸

CHILD NURTURE

At this time Horace Bushnell's epoch-making Christian Nurture had been in print for a year. In his October, 1848, letter McClintock had said, "I have just received Bushnell's 'Christian Nurture,'* and really I must go great part of the way with him." His letters to Olin, however, make it evident that his theological position was based not upon Bushnell's work but on the teaching of the Methodist Church. Unfortunately, while the standards of Methodism implied much that Bushnell so effectively taught they did not make explicit the child's relation to the Kingdom of God. The Discipline, also, although it stated that the "baptism of young children is to be retained in the Church," contained, previous to 1856, no statement which theologically justified infant baptism. As in the Congregational and Presbyterian Churches many Methodists regarded children, even though baptized in infancy, as living in bondage to sin, and requiring conversion in order to be saved.† In revival meetings it was a common custom to urge little children, even as hardened adult sinners, to repent, seek forgiveness, and trust in Christ for salvation.

The thought of the Church at large concerning the spiritual status of the child was confused, a confusion which was in part rooted in differences, even contradictions, among Wesleyan authorities on systematic theology.‡ The

* Horace Bushnell (1802-76) was born in Litchfield, Conn. Graduated at Yale in 1827, he first took up the study of law, but in 1831 decided to become a minister and entered the theological department of Yale College. In 1833 he was ordained pastor of North Congregational Church, Hartford, Conn., continuing until 1859 when ill health compelled his resignation. Thereafter he was almost continuously occupied in writing. His theological works represented a revolt against Calvinistic orthodoxy. Unsuccessful attempts were made to bring him to trial. Of his works Christian Nurture was one of the most widely influential, effectively turning "the current of Christian thought toward the young," and laying a substantial foundation for the religious education of children and youth of the latter half of the nineteenth century in the evangelical churches.—Theodore T. Munger, Horace Bushnell, Preacher and Theologian, passim.

† In May, 1867, J. M. Gregory in the Sunday School Teacher, declaring the first aim of the Sunday school to be the conversion of the pupils, states that the steps to this are: "1st. To bring the pupil to a knowledge and sense of his need as a fallen being with a sinful soul—a guilty transgressor of a divine law and of a Father's commandment; and 2nd, to develop in his understanding and impress upon his heart the character and work of Christ—the suffering, saving love of Jesus; the complete ability and willingness of this Saviour to redeem, purify, and bless him—in short, to lay the foundations of an intelligent faith, and to awaken the emotions of an all-controlling love and trust."—Sunday School Teacher, II (1867), 5 (May), 129 f., as quoted in Addie Grace Wardle, History of the Sunday School Movement in the Methodist Episcopal Church, p. 109.

‡ Daniel D. Whedon: "Between Wesley and Clarke there were some differences. There are some differences between Wesley and Watson; and between Wesley and Pope; and between Pope and Watson. And, if we mistake not, some different shades and phases exist between British and American Methodism . . ."—Statements: Theological and Critical, p. 302. The entire statement ("Infant Salvation," pp. 298-330) should be read.

practice of infant baptism was general among Methodists. The Church's ritual of baptism presupposed regeneration: only the regenerate are entitled to receive baptism. Is it then to be understood that infants are born regenerate? John Miley, who began teaching theology in Drew Seminary in 1873, thought not: "Our own writers are divided on this question. While some maintain the affirmative, we cannot think it in accord with the Scriptures or the doctrines of our Church." Yet he sanctioned the baptism of young children, reasoning in this way:

Infants are born into the covenant of redemption, and are all in some measure recipients of its grace. If they live to an accountable age this grace meets them at its threshold and, unless rejected, becomes their salvation; if they die in the infant state it unconditionally regenerates and saves them. On the ground of such facts they may properly be reckoned members of the kingdom of God and entitled to Christian baptism.¹⁵⁹

This view differed from that of Daniel D. Whedon, who—interpreting Fletcher of Madeley—wrote: The infant not only inherits "justification from Christ, but he also inherits the regenerative baptism of the Spirit, entitling him not only to baptism and a place in the Church below, but also, dying in infancy, to a place in the Church above."¹⁶⁰

F. G. Hibbard, whose book, The Religion of Childhood, was published in 1864, held, in substance, that all children are in a state of favor with God, who graciously imparts to them a genuine spiritual quickening. The real question with regard to the child is not therefore whether he will be converted to God but rather, will he through sinning depart from God. He cannot become a child of wrath except by his own evil choice by which he surrenders his original heavenly citizenship.¹⁶¹

The inextricable intermixture in the minds of many ministers and missionaries of the traditional doctrines of depravity and necessity of child conversion, and the concept of child nurture is illustrated by the statement of William Taylor, made in 1890:

The little children of Africa are no more heathens than our own children. In common with ours they inherit from our common fallen father and mother a deeply depraved nature . . . ; but every child of the human family inherits from the second Adam the free gift of eternal life under an acquitted relation to God. . . . The ounce of prevention applied during the happy period of a child's initial justified relation to God is better in ultimate probabilities than a hundred pounds of cure. . . .

We get the children saved before they are seven years old, and they . . . become the most convincing witnesses we can get to enlighten and lead the adult heathen.¹⁶²

Previous to 1856 the Discipline had no statement on the relation of baptized children to the Church. Pastors were advised to pay "special attention to the children, speak to them personally, and kindly, on experimental and practical godliness" and, if baptized, to instruct them in the nature and obligations of their baptism. Children might be admitted to Class meetings and Love Feasts and those who were "truly serious" and who manifested "a desire to flee the wrath to come" should be "advised to join society as probationers."¹⁶³ The 1856 General Conference made a significant contribution to clarity of thought and consistency of practice in the Church when it supplied an entirely new section on the relation of baptized children to the Church. The section as adopted contained explicit answers to these questions: "Are all young children entitled to Baptism?" "What is the relation of baptized children to the Church?" "What shall be done for the baptized children of our Church?" To the first and second questions the section answered:

We hold that all children, by virtue of the unconditional benefits of the atonement, are members of the kingdom of God, and, therefore, graciously entitled to baptism;

We regard all children who have been baptized, as placed in visible covenant relation to God, and under the special care and supervision of the Church.¹⁶⁴

In answer to the third question directions were given for religious nurture and instruction of children preparatory to reception into full membership.

In the discussion which preceded the adoption of the section a delegate expressed a fear that "the declaration that the child was in a state of grace would be construed, by those who had not been trained in Methodist theology, as denying the doctrine of hereditary depravity," but his amendment, aimed to prevent this impression, was promptly voted down. George Peck inquired "if it was proposed to make the ritual harmonize" with the new section. In stating that "all men are conceived and born in sin, and that our Saviour Christ saith, None can enter into the kingdom of God, except he be regenerate and born anew of water and of the Holy Ghost," the ritual, he said, assumed that "the infant was in a state of wrath, and needed the forgiveness of sins." He contended that the proposed new section and the statement in the ritual represented two separate theories, but also on this no action was taken.

A. M. Osbon of the New York Conference was opposed to all of the plans under consideration as contrary to "the whole former practice of the Church." It had not been the custom to receive persons into full connection "without a profession of personal faith, followed by pardon, witnessed by the Holy Spirit, and renewed" and he feared the plans were "dangerous innovations." But no one rose to support Osbon's position and after John P. Durbin and one or two others had spoken in favor of the proposed section affirmative action was taken.¹⁶⁵

The directions for the religious nurture and instruction of children neither stated nor implied that it was necessary for the child to undergo the traditional experience of conversion before he could be accounted a Christian and admitted into full membership in the Church. From about this time there was a gradually lessening insistence on the revivalistic type of child conversion and freer acknowledgment that the child of a Christian home and community may naturally develop Christian character and experience or, in Bushnell's words, "grow up as a Christian and never know himself as being otherwise." The attitude of the majority of ministers and lay parents is well expressed in a letter by Edward Thomson to his son on January 24, 1863, in which he states his gratitude to God at the news that the boy had united with the Church:

With your mother I agree that your case is all the more hopeful because you have taken this step not under the influence of any excitement, but calmly and deliberately. We should enter upon the service of God from principle.

You have long been in the habit of praying, and I have no doubt God has heard your prayers and regenerated your heart. The proofs of regeneration which are most satisfactory are to be found in the life and spirit. . . . we know when the grace of God is in the heart by the graces or virtues of the Spirit; and these are love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, etc.¹⁶⁸

The need on the child's part for individual commitment was not lessened under the newer view. It was still recognized that becoming a Christian in the full sense of the word involves a spiritual awakening, gradual or sudden; a deliberate and rational choice; and a quickened consciousness of God's indwelling presence and aid.

The gradual clarification of thought in the Church concerning the spiritual status of children and the increasing realization of the importance of Christian nurture synchronized with a steadily developing interest in improved methods of teaching religion and the growth of the Sunday-school movement.

IMPROVEMENT IN METHODS AND CURRICULA

The ability and aggressive spirit of Daniel P. Kidder,* who in 1844 became "Editor of Sunday School Books and Tracts" and, by election of the Sunday School Union, its Corresponding Secretary, soon registered in an increasing interest in Sunday-school work throughout the Church. The Sunday School Advocate, the one official Sunday-school periodical of the denomination, increased in circulation from 10,000 to 50,000 copies within eight months. In one year the number of Sunday schools, as reported to the Union, increased from 5,005 to 6,111; the number of officers and teachers from 47,252 to 61,090; and the enrollment from 268,775 to 320,630. While the income of the Sunday School Union from 1840 to 1845 had been only $685.22, receipts from May, 1845, to December, 1847, were $6,797.45.¹⁶⁷

Kidder foresaw the probability of largely increased emigration from Europe and believed that the Sunday school could be made an effective agency for the evangelization of both the native and the immigrant population. He was as much interested in improvement of methods of teaching as in increase of the number of Sunday schools.¹⁶⁸ He noted that normal schools were being established for the express purpose of training teachers for the common schools and declared that he considered it time "to ask whether a system of Normal Sabbath-school instruction . . . [might] not be established." He also asked:

Why should it be thought a thing extravagant if we were to urge that a great Church like ours ought to have at least one well-located, well-established school for the particular object of specially and thoroughly training persons for the great work of Sunday school teaching?¹⁶⁹

Kidder shared Wesley's enthusiasm for the circulation of books and tracts. He set himself to extend and enlarge the libraries of the Sunday schools and in a single year increased sales from seventeen and a half million pages to more than seventy-nine million pages. He also conceived the idea of "a five-dollar library, containing fifty volumes at an average price of ten cents each" which contributed greatly to literature circulation. As Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday School Union he attended sessions of Annual Conferences, held institutes and conventions, and visited many local churches at which he preached, gave special addresses, and aided pastors in taking offerings for the Union.¹⁷⁰

The General Conference of 1852 decreed that the editorship of Sunday-school publications and the secretaryship of the Sunday School Union* should both be "by appointment of the General Conference."¹⁷¹ The Bishops in their Episcopal Address of 1852 commented on the "encouragingly progressive" increase in Sunday-school enrollment, number of officers and teachers, and books added to the libraries during the preceding five years. They reported 47,327 conversions during the five years in the Sunday schools.¹⁷²

After twelve years as editor and Corresponding Secretary, Kidder accepted the chair of practical theology in Garrett Biblical Institute.† In 1856 Daniel Wise‡ was elected as his successor. As editor of Zion's Herald Wise had gained a reputation as an interesting and forceful writer, particularly for children and young people. He was a skillful editor and a voluminous writer but he lacked the administrative initiative of his predecessor. He advocated

* By act of the New York Legislature, Feb. 4, 1852, the Sunday School Union was incorporated. The charter was amended by the Legislature on April 11, 1874. For constitution as amended see Year-Book of the Sunday-School Union, and of the Tract Society . . ., 1874, pp. 20 f.

† Thirteen years after Kidder's retirement from the Sunday School Union John H. Vincent, then its Corresponding Secretary, wrote to him: "No Sunday school worker on the continent has such a record as yourself. I am brought face to face with your work every day in the Union. Its foundations, broad and deep were laid by yourself, and to you is due the preeminence which our Union enjoys to-day. I think and speak of this fact often."—As quoted in G. E. Strobridge, Biography of the Rev. Daniel Parish Kidder, D.D., LL.D., p. 216.

‡ Daniel Wise (1813-98), born in England, emigrated to the United States in 1833. After serving for several years as a Local Preacher, in 1840 he was received on trial in the New England Conference. Until 1844, in addition to his pastoral duties, he edited and published the Sunday School Messenger. In 1852 he became editor of Zion's Herald, leaving the editorship four years later when elected editor and Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday School Union.—Year-book, New England Southern Conference, 1899, pp. 92-94.

improvement and extension of Sunday schools, better organization and more thorough religious instruction and training of teachers. The war years, however, were not favorable to progress in any line of church work and the rate of advance of preceding years was not fully maintained.

On the retirement of Wise in 1868 John H. Vincent,* who had been made General Agent of the Sunday School Union in 1866, was elected editor of Sunday-school publications and Corresponding Secretary.¹⁷³ As a pastor of the Rock River Conference he had made a reputation as a religious educator by his advocacy of the application to Sunday schools of advanced methods used in public school organization and teaching. He had assimilated much of the religious education teaching of Horace Bushnell and many of the views of Robertson of Brighton. Within Methodism he became the leading advocate of infusing religion with intellectual and spiritual culture; of educational evangelism; and of bringing the whole of life under the dominance of Christian ideals.

Vincent desired to lift the Sunday school to the level of the Church, to supplement the Church by making its compass broader, deeper, and all-embracing. He intended to accomplish this by making the Sunday school the Church school for all of its members, with graded instruction for all age levels.¹⁷⁴ The response to Vincent's challenge was immediate. The second issue of the Sunday School Journal, following his election as editor, carried "four versions of a lesson," each adapted to a different age group of a fully organized Sunday school. Within a year subscribers increased from 18,000 to 37,000.¹⁷⁵

In 1868 the Sunday School Union established a Normal Department of which Vincent was superintendent. Its stated purpose was: "To elevate the standard of Sunday-school management and teaching in the church, to furnish facilities for training teachers, and to unite all local normal classes and institutes in a central organization." Normal classes which adopted the prescribed course of study, elected a committee of instruction, and reported officers to the Normal Department of the Union were enrolled as auxiliaries.¹⁷⁶

In October, 1873, the Sunday School Union approved the project of a Sunday-school Teachers' Assembly to be held in August, 1874, on the Chautauqua Lake (New York) Camp Ground. The plan, as stated by Vincent, was:

To hold a prolonged institute, or normal class, occupying from ten to fifteen

* John Heyl Vincent (1832-1920) was born in Tuscaloosa, Ala. He studied for a time at Wesleyan Institute, Newark, N. J., but did not complete a college course. He was received on trial in the New Jersey Conference in 1853, and in full connection in 1855. (Minutes, New Jersey Conference, 1853, p. 2; ibid., 1855, p. 2.) In 1856 he transferred to the Rock River Conference, and soon thereafter became active as a leader in Sunday-school work. In 1864 he led in establishing a Union Sunday School Institute for the Northwest. Its organ, the Northwestern Sunday School Teachers' Quarterly, he later declared, "met a want and kindled a fire." In 1865 the title was changed to the Sunday School Teacher. The General Conference of 1888 elected Vincent to the episcopacy. His episcopal residence, 1888-92, was Buffalo; 1892-1900, Topeka; 1900-1904, Zurich, Switzerland. In 1904 he was retired. Of his several books the best known was The Modern Sunday School, 1887.—Dictionary of American Biography, XIX, 277 ff.

days, for the completion of the 'Course of Normal Study' prescribed by the [Normal] Department; to secure the presence of as many pastors, superintendents, other officers and teachers as possible, that a new and general interest may be awakened throughout the Church and the country on the subject of Normal training for Sunday-school work; . . .¹⁷⁷

The original suggestion for the improvement of the Camp Meeting by the inclusion of scientific and cultural subjects in the program came from a layman, Lewis Miller of Akron, Ohio. He became the president of the Sunday-school Teachers' Assembly and for many years continued to be a patron and generous supporter of the rapidly developing enterprise. Concerning the first Assembly Vincent wrote:

The lecturers and teachers were widely known as men and women of superior ability and large experience. Every thing centred in the Sunday school. Never were so many representative Sunday-school people so long together . . . Never had Sunday-school work been more carefully canvassed, or its methods more fully or admirably illustrated.¹⁷⁸

Chautauqua developed and expanded rapidly. Within twelve years not less than twenty-one different Chautauqua organizations had been formed, reaching many thousands of people, such as the Chautauqua Teachers' Reading Union, the Chautauqua Book-a-Month Reading Circle, the Chautauqua Society of Fine Arts, and the Chautauqua Literary and Scientific Circle. Some thirty-nine Summer Assemblies also were held annually, a number of them on former Camp Meeting grounds, on locations reaching from Maine to Oregon and California. Local C.L.S.C. circles were formed in some fourteen foreign nations, mostly under mission auspices, those in Japan enrolling a thousand members.¹⁷⁹

From 1845 to 1865, as earlier, various types of teaching materials were issued for use in the Sunday schools. The Sunday School Union made little attempt to standardize lesson courses or to determine what should be used by the schools. Most commonly used were question books based on the Bible. However, in 1842, the Union had recommended that schools not already using them "introduce the Wesleyan Catechisms, or the Scripture Catechisms, into their regular course of instruction."¹⁸⁰ In 1848 the Wesleyan Catechisms were revised by order of the General Conference and issued as a general catechism, and an elementary catechism "in shorter and plainer words, adapted to the capacities of young children."¹⁸¹ As a part of the opening or closing exercises of some schools the pupils were catechised each Sunday, and in a few schools the Catechism was also used by the teachers in their classes. The Discipline also made it the duty of the pastor to publicly catechise the children in the Sunday school, and at special meetings appointed for that purpose. It shall also be the duty of each preacher . . . [in his report to] each Quarterly Conference, to state to what extent he has publicly or privately catechised the children of his charge.¹⁸²

That the chief responsibility for catechetical instruction rested upon the pastor is indicated by Vincent's statement in his 1877 report that the pastor "should be aided by the Sunday school in teaching the Catechism of the church to the young people."¹⁸³

In 1865, at an interdenominational Sunday School Institute in Chicago, Vincent proposed the question, "Is it practicable to introduce a uniform system of lessons into all our schools?" The following year he prepared and published in the Sunday-School Teacher, which he edited, a course of uniform lessons for Chicago Sunday schools entitled "Two Years with Jesus: A New System of Sunday-school Study."¹⁸⁴ Others, both in the United States and in England, were considering the same idea, but Vincent's series may fairly be said to have been the forerunner of the International Uniform Lesson System. He saw decided advantages in a system of uniform lessons for the whole school and all schools but he did not perceive the educational fallacy of using identical subject matter with little children and adults. He wrote: "The benefits of the uniform system cannot be secured, unless we adapt the lessons to the varied capacities of the pupils."¹⁸⁵ What Vincent seems not to have realized was that varying the teaching aids and methods for use with the four age groups into which he suggested the Sunday schools be divided was not in reality providing graded lessons, since the teaching core (the Scripture text) was the same for all.

Sentiment for a uniform system developed rapidly. The first year's outline of a seven-year series was released for publication in 1873* by the International Lesson Committee, of which Vincent had been elected chairman, an office which he held through 1872-96. The International Uniform Lesson Series was widely announced and all Methodist pastors were urged to use special efforts to make the new plan a success.¹⁸⁶

While the adoption of the International Uniform Lesson Series marked an advance over the methods of Bible teaching in vogue during preceding decades, the prestige which it gained through its advocacy by Vincent and other Sunday-school leaders, and its interdenominational sponsorship, delayed for many years the development of fully graded lessons adapted to the capacities and needs of the several age groups of children and adolescents.

During Vincent's administration the Sunday School Union became a missionary agency of considerable importance. The General Conference of 1868 made it the duty of the pastor to see that every Methodist Sunday school was organized into a missionary society.¹⁸⁷ In 1870 the Corresponding Secretary visited the Annual Conferences recently organized in the southern states, and churches in several cities to give addresses at preachers' meetings and in gatherings of Sunday-school officers and teachers. Institutes were held also at universities, colleges, and secondary schools. The Sunday School Union and the Tract Society united in the publication of Good Tidings, a modest weekly periodical, which was distributed free to Sunday schools in the South. In 1892 the average weekly circulation was 39,253 copies.¹⁸⁸ Very early in its history contributions for the publication of teaching materials had been made to foreign missions, as also for the establishment and support of Sunday schools in Mission Conferences in the United States. In the 1868-72 quadrennium grants for these purposes were largely increased in number and in amount. Altogether more than 5,000 grants-in-aid were made to seventy-five Annual Conferences in Europe, Liberia, and U.S.A., amounting to $55,784.51. Donations to the amount of $1,309.56 were also made to Sunday-school work in "prisons, soldiers' homes, asylums, alms-houses, and among the freedmen of the South."¹⁸⁹

* Adoption of plans for a Uniform Lesson series was delayed by publishers' interest in maintaining their own lesson publications. A uniform system was finally agreed to and issued for 1872. The National Sunday School Convention, held in Indianapolis, April 16-19, 1872, established a committee to outline a seven-year series of "Bible Lessons," to "embrace a general study of the whole Bible," alternating between the Old and New Testaments; elected the committee; and recommended adoption of the series "by the Sunday-schools of the whole country."—Simeon Gilbert, The Lesson System, p. 38, et passim.

The first German language Methodist Sunday school in the United States was organized in Cincinnati in 1837.* By 1872 German Sunday schools numbered several hundred and the General Conference of that year authorized the appointment of an editor for German Sunday-school publications. Henry Liebhart† was elected to the position and rendered highly efficient service.

As successor to Vincent the 1888 General Conference elected Jesse L. Hurlbut, who for ten years had been associated with him as assistant editor. He was destined by nature and choice, by culture and spirit to be a teacher, and his dominant concern was the preparation of study courses in the Bible and materials and plans for the normal training of Sunday-school teachers. He was the author of many books, all of them related to some phase of religious education. He continued in office until 1900.

During the half century, Sunday schools of the Methodist Episcopal Church increased in number from 5,005 to 30,259; officers and teachers from 47,252 to 352,627; and pupils from 268,775 to 2,585,178. In foreign fields schools had increased from 14 to 3,536 and enrollment from 523 to 160,737.¹⁹⁰ At no time during the period was the income of the Sunday School Union sufficient to make possible a vigorous churchwide extension program.

* See Vol. I, 276.

† Henry Liebhart (1832-95), born in Karlsruhe, Germany, and educated in German schools, emigrated to America in 1854. In 1855 he was converted and united with the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1859 he was received on trial in the New York Conference. (Minutes, New York Conference, 1859, p. 7.) In 1865 he became assistant editor of Der Christliche Apologete, where he demonstrated unusual editorial ability. In 1884 he was elected German Assistant Secretary of the Sunday School Union, and in 1888 Assistant Secretary also of the Tract Society. He edited not only Sunday-school literature but also the family magazine Haus und Herd and a family library, and books on missions, Biblical history, and music. He was an able editor. "a brilliant conversationalist, a powerful pulpiteer, and prolific author."—Paul F. Douglass, The Story of German Methodism, Biography of an Immigrant Soul, pp. 225 ff.

Receipts increased from $685.22 for the five years 1840-45 to only $23,888.72 in 1895.¹⁹¹

Throughout the period the Sunday school was the most important organized agency of Methodism in promoting the extension and membership growth of the Church. In hundreds of local communities a beginning was made by forming a Sunday school which within a short time led to the organization of a local Methodist Society. The Sunday School Union reported to the 1892 General Conference:

Through its benevolent work at home and abroad the Sunday School Union is greatly promoting the growth of the Church. In the large cities it is aiding mission schools, through which the immigrant population is reached; and in the 'new West' and the 'new South' where towns are springing up as by magic, it is founding Sunday schools which open the way for the founding of churches.¹⁹²

As the Camp Meeting and local revivals became less effective in reaching non-Christian adults an increasing proportion of accessions to church membership came from the Sunday school. In 1846, 2,603 conversions were reported by Sunday schools; in 1870, 48,276; and in 1895, 132,607.¹⁹³

In cities many mission Sunday schools engaged in varied types of social service. Under the leadership of Bishop Vincent as president the Kindergarten of the Church Association, formed in 1893, promoted the establishment of kindergartens in city churches, which served the double purpose of providing wholesome activities for children from the crowded streets and tenements, and of helping to relieve pressure on the first grade of congested public schools. Some mission Sunday schools not only maintained kindergartens but also boys' and girls' clubs, sewing classes, and fresh-air outings.

RISE OF THE YOUTH MOVEMENT

The new interest in the Christian nurture of children which found expression in the movement for better Sunday schools was also manifested in increased concern for more systematic and effective religious instruction and training of youth. Francis E. Clark, the New England Congregational pastor generally agreed to have been the founder of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, said concerning its genesis in 1881:

It may be fair to say that it originated with no one in particular, but with many in general. Ten thousand pastors in ten thousand churches . . . felt the need of some systematic and efficient method of Christian nurture. Hundreds were experimenting along different lines, but all these lines converged at one center, a heartfelt desire to train the children and youth for God.¹⁹⁴

John H. Twombly of the New England Conference was one of the pioneers in agitation for youth organization within the Methodist Episcopal Church. He formed a local young people's society in his church and memorialized the 1864 General Conference to approve the organization of young people's societies in the churches "for their social, intellectual, and moral improvement."¹⁹⁵ Years later he again urged the matter before a Methodist convention held in Boston on March 3, 1887. At a second convention, convened on October 26, 1887, in First Church, Boston, the Young People's Christian League was organized. A principal object was to bring together in a single organization the various local societies, guilds, bands, and lyceums that had been formed in different localities throughout the Church. About a hundred churches were represented by some three hundred and fifty young people. At the first annual meeting of the League at Tremont Street Church, Boston, October 17, 1888, 175 local societies were reported with 8,000 members.¹⁹⁶

Of other Methodist youth organizations formed during the twenty-five years following 1864 four attained more than local prominence. In the Fifty-first Street Church, Philadelphia, Thomas B. Neely organized a Church Lyceum, the chief activity of which was "the systematic reading of approved books." Soon Lyceums were formed in other Philadelphia churches and at the 1872 General Conference a memorial was presented asking for official recognition. Although favorably received, no action was taken. The memorial again came to General Conference in 1876 and recognition was granted. The Lyceum won considerable support in the Church at large and was influential in increasing the reading of Christian literature by Methodist young people.¹⁹⁷

John H. Vincent was not satisfied with the Lyceum as a young people's organization. He felt that it did not meet the needs of youth and proposed a society with broader aims that would provide for a "symmetrical spiritual and intellectual culture." A society was organized to be known as the Oxford League, the aim of which was the "reproduction of the Oxford Club of 1729-37." As restated, the purpose included the study of the Bible, deepening of the religious life, reading of the Christian classics, and promotion of practical Christian service. The League received wide endorsement and several hundred local chapters were formed. Gradually many of the Lyceum groups were absorbed by the League.¹⁹⁸

At the Des Plaines Camp Meeting, near Chicago, in August, 1883, under the influence of the preaching of Dr. and Mrs. Asbury Lowrey on entire sanctification the Young People's Methodist Alliance was organized for the promotion of holiness among young people. By July, 1889, there were 410 local societies and nearly 17,000 members.¹⁹⁹ In Michigan in November, 1887, a group of ministers organized the Young People's Society of Detroit Conference, the name of which in December, 1888, was changed to the Methodist Young People's Union. Objectives were the social and religious culture of the youth of the Conference. At the North Ohio Conference session in September, 1888, a resolution was passed calling for "a great connectional young people's organization" to be formed by the consolidation of all existing societies. Later in the year the North Ohio Conference Methodist Episcopal Alliance was organized and local groups formed in all Districts of the Conference.²⁰⁰

At this stage it had become evident that such multiplicity of young people's societies in the Church tended to confusion and disunity and that effort should be made to harmonize and unify the youth program of the Church. A conference on unification was proposed by the Young People's Methodist Alliance. On the invitation of B. F. Dimmick, pastor of Central Church, Cleveland, the conference was held on May 14-15, 1889, participated in by thirty-one representatives of all groups except the Lyceum. At the end of two days' prayer, earnest discussion, and conference, a basis of union was agreed upon and unanimous decision reached to organize the Epworth League, to be governed by a Board of Control which, it was later determined by General Conference, should consist of fifteen members appointed by the Bishops, one of whom should be a Bishop who should be president of the Epworth League and of the Board of Control, and of one member from each General Conference District.²⁰¹

At the first meeting of the Board of Control, held in Chicago on February 6-7, 1890, organization was completed. The local constitution as finally approved by the General Conference declared the object of the Epworth League to be:

to promote intelligent and loyal piety in the young members and friends of the Church; to aid them in the attainment of purity of heart and in constant growth in grace, and to train them in works of mercy and help.

Active members were constituted by election of the local chapter and subscription to the pledge:

I will earnestly seek for myself, and do what I can to help others attain, the highest New Testament standard of experience and life. I will abstain from all those forms of worldly amusement forbidden by the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and I will attend, so far as possible, the religious meetings of the Chapter and the Church, and take some active part in them.

The program provided that the work of the League should be carried on through four departments: (1) Department of Spiritual Work; (2) Department of World Evangelism; (3) Department of Mercy and Help; (4) Department of Literary and Social Work. Under each department specific areas of activity were suggested. The program of activities as a whole was much more comprehensive than that of any of the earlier organizations,* and was well adapted to the interests and needs of young people.²⁰²

* Frank O. Erb: "The formation of the [Epworth] League was a criticism of the inadequacy of the Christian Endeavor ideal of religion and of the methods to be employed in developing the religious life. . . . There is an utter absence of all explicit reference to brotherly helpfulness, which Jesus declared to be a full half of true religion. The Epworth League was organized on an all-round conception of life, including not alone the devotional, but the literary, recreational, and philanthropic elements as well."—The Development of the Young People's Movement, p. 76.

The 1892 General Conference recognized the Epworth League as the official young people's society of the Church, and approved its general constitution with revisions. The constitution provided that the Executive Secretary should be elected by the Board of Control. For this office the board selected Edwin A. Schell of the New York Conference.²⁰³

The growth of the new organization was phenomenal. Within five years 13,500 Epworth League chapters were organized, in which more than 900,000 members were enrolled.²⁰⁴ The organ of the League, The Epworth Herald,* whose first issue appeared in June, 1890, closed its third year with more than 75,000 subscribers, said at that time to have been "the largest circulation of any denominational weekly in the world."

It cannot be said that the founding of these several youth organizations and their merging into the Epworth League in itself constituted in any real sense a youth movement. In each case the initiative was taken entirely by adults. It was a movement of and by adults for young people and as such provided a means by which a youth movement might be developed. Some of the officers of the constituent societies were young ministers; many of them were men of middle age or beyond. The time when the elders in the Church were ready to share responsibility for leadership with youth had not yet come. But the Epworth League did give young people a place in the life and activities of the Church such as had never before been accorded them and it provided a channel through which their religious enthusiasm, energy, and zeal found expression.

THE BOARD OF EDUCATION

However interested in education early American Methodism may have been,† its earlier efforts cannot be compared with the wholehearted commitment of the Methodist Episcopal Church to a churchwide educational program from 1845 on. In their 1860 address the Bishops suggested that the General Conference constitute a "General Educational Board" for the Church and the Committee on Education recommended that this be done, but no action was taken by the Conference.²⁰⁵ In 1868, as an outgrowth of the Centenary Celebration the General Conference created "The Board of Education of the Methodist Episcopal Church." The Centenary offerings amounted to some eight million dollars, of which by far the larger part was devoted to local objects. However, two permanent funds were set up—the

* In the years preceding the organization of the Epworth League several papers for the youth of the Church were in circulation. One especially, Our Youth, served as the Church's paper for young people, and was, naturally enough, adopted as the temporary official organ of the Epworth League upon its organization. Also in existence were the Young People's Herald, a monthly periodical issued since November, 1885, under the auspices of the Young People's Methodist Alliance. In 1889 a monthly periodical was initiated by the Methodist Young People's Union. When the League received from the Book Committee in February, 1890, authority to issue its own official publication it chose to merge these three independent magazines into one, which became the Epworth Herald.—John Helmers, "History of the Epworth League," unpublished thesis, M.A., pp. 8, 21, 60.

“General Education Fund” in amount of $9,155., and the “Sunday School Children’s Fund,” $56,674. Primarily for the purpose of administering and augmenting these funds a board of twelve “trustees” was constituted*: two Bishops, four ministers, and six laymen to be elected by General Conference. Headquarters were in New York. The Conference made no provision for executive leadership but in December, 1869, the board elected, as Corresponding Secretary, C. C. North, a prominent layman of New York City, who continued to serve in that capacity until 1872.²⁰⁶

The Board of Education was chartered by the Legislature of New York in 1869. In 1872 General Conference authorized a full-time executive and elected as Corresponding Secretary Erastus O. Haven.† In 1874, because of the prevailing depression he accepted election as chancellor of Syracuse University, but continued to give attention “to the more pressing duties of the educational secretaryship without compensation.”²⁰⁷ At the suggestion of the board the General Conference of 1876 did not elect a Corresponding Secretary.

The interests centering in the establishment, maintenance, and endowment of an educational institution were chiefly local and sectional. The task of creating a sense of churchwide responsibility and of incorporating the many individual colleges and universities into a connectional system encountered many practical difficulties. Not until the eighties, under the administration of Daniel P. Kidder, did the board begin to operate effectively on a denominational scale.

In March, 1881, Kidder began his service as Corresponding Secretary. His interest in education had been lifelong. In 1858, as a member of the faculty of Garrett Biblical Institute, he had taken a leading part in the organization of the Ministerial Education Society of the Northwest. He became a director, accepted the corresponding secretaryship, prepared printed promotional materials, and in its behalf addressed several Annual Conferences.²⁰⁸

The 1872 General Conference “recommended that the second Sunday in June be every-where observed as ‘Children’s Day’; and . . . a collection be taken in the Sunday school” for the Sunday-school Children’s Fund. During the first decade general indifference to the observance of Children’s Day prevailed throughout the Church, attributed by the board to “the inertia and

[to certain designated purposes]. Future contributions were to be held in trust to aid needy young people in securing an education or for other purposes designated by the donors. It was also made the duty of the board to receive, invest, and augment the “Sunday-School Children’s Fund,” appropriating the interest to assist “Sunday-School scholars in obtaining a more advanced education.”—G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 321.

† Erastus O. Haven (1820-81) was born in Boston, Mass., of old New England stock. At the age of eleven he became imbued with the idea of becoming a minister. At twenty-two he graduated from Wesleyan University and at twenty-six became president and professor of natural sciences in Amenia Seminary. In 1848 he was received on trial in the New York Conference and for five years (1848-53) served in the pastorate in New York City. He was professor of Latin in the University of Michigan in 1853 and the next year was made professor of English language, literature, and history. For seven years (1856-63) he was editor of Zion’s Herald. In the latter year he was elected president of the University of Michigan, which he resigned in 1869 to become president of Northwestern University. The 1880 General Conference elected him to the episcopacy. From 1858 to 1863 he was a member of the Massachusetts State Board of Education.—Theodore L. Flood and John W. Hamilton, Eds., Lives of Methodist Bishops, pp. 501-08.

lethargy of editors, preachers, superintendents, and people." Following his election to the secretaryship Kidder prepared the first official program for the observance of the day. For lack of such a program there had been no general understanding of the purpose of the day's observance. Year by year the programs, widely circulated, emphasized the objects of Children's Day, explained the mission of the board, and greatly helped to create interest throughout the Church. By 1885 receipts for the Children's Day Fund had largely increased, and the day had become generally observed by the churches in the United States, and to some extent also in Germany, Switzerland, Mexico, India, Japan, and Liberia.²⁰⁹

The original plan of organization, approved by the 1868 General Conference, provided for Annual Conference Educational Societies, auxiliary to the Board of Education, but during the early years few societies were organized. Societies, if incorporated, were permitted to appropriate or lend funds received by them. The board's report for 1883 included an incomplete list of auxiliary societies, with dates of their organization, funds distributed, and students assisted.²¹⁰ The board and its auxiliaries furnished aid in 1882 to 374 students in amount exceeding $20,000. From the beginning of their activities, they had distributed more than $261,000. to 1,824 students.

Beginning with 1884 the importance of "a greater sense of unity and integral power" in the Church's educational system was stressed, and after this year little mention was made in the board's reports of Conference auxiliaries.²¹¹

In 1887 the board chose as Secretary Daniel A. Goodsell of the New York East Conference. In the following year he was elected to the episcopacy. The General Conference again made the Corresponding Secretary a General Conference officer and elected Charles H. Payne.

During the period 1873-95 the board made 6,593 loans to students to aid in their education, amounting to $603,579. Of this amount in 1895 $62,760. had been repaid.²¹²

The Board of Education was an important ally of the Missionary Society, especially in rendering assistance in the education of missionaries. In its report for 1889 the board stated:

Besides this work, the Board is sending funds direct to nearly all the schools of our foreign missions, to aid in raising up an educated native ministry. The last year it has thus aided a goodly number of young men in Japan, China, India, Italy, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Finland, and Mexico. It will thus be seen that no work of the Church and no contributions to any of all its worthy causes help more directly or more efficiently to carry forward the Church's missionary enterprise, than do the work and funds of the Board of Education.²¹³

The 1892 General Conference considerably enlarged the scope of the board's work, and more clearly defined its relation to the educational institutions and interests of the Church. The colleges and universities of the Church were federated and brought under the supervisory care of the board. A University Senate was created, whose members were appointed by the Bishops, charged with the responsibility of determining "the minimum equivalent of academic work in our Church institutions for graduation to the Baccalaureate degree." Only those institutions which met the requirements were to be "designated as colleges in the official lists of the educational institutions of the Church." The report of the board to the 1896 General Conference stated:

Since . . . [1893] the Board has been diligently engaged in applying the standard formulated by the University Senate to all the colleges of Methodism, and gratefully informs the Church at large that the colleges have, with entire unanimity, cheerfully and thankfully accepted the prescribed requirements, and nearly all of them have already shaped their courses in accordance with the new standard.²¹⁴

THE TRACT SOCIETY

Reminders of Wesley's zeal for publication and circulation of tracts again and again pricked the conscience of the Church. In 1845 Bishops Soule, Hedding, Waugh, and Janes addressed an appeal to the Annual Conferences in behalf of wider and more efficient distribution of tracts:

Some seem to have supposed, because we have not had since the year 1836 a formal organization of a Tract Society, with its collecting agents, its treasury, etc., that . . . they are excused from making any special efforts to sustain the cause among us.²¹⁵

The appeal proposed that an auxiliary society for the distribution of tracts be formed in each church. Three hundred and fifty-two "excellent tracts" were said to be available. The General Conference at successive sessions gave emphatic instructions to the Book Agents to reduce the prices of religious books so that "specially cheap books, adapted for wide popular circulation and effect," might be made available.²¹⁶ While these measures were not without influence the advance was not satisfactory to Daniel P. Kidder, as "Editor of Sunday-school Books and Tracts," and others, and a vigorous appeal was made to the 1852 General Conference to establish a tract society for the Church. The Conference responded favorably and on November 10, 1852, the Tract Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized with a board of managers and an executive.* Abel Stevens was elected Corresponding Secretary. During the first year he gave a large part of his time to Annual Conference visitation. Auxiliaries were formed in all but two Conferences in the United States and thirteen Conference agents were appointed.²¹⁷

was elected as his successor, continuing in office until 1856. During the quadrennium 1852-56 tract distribution was prosecuted more aggressively than for many years. The 1856 General Conference determined not to elect a Corresponding Secretary of the Tract Society, assigning the duties of the office to James Floy, editor of the National Magazine. In 1860 Tract Society publications by General Conference action were placed "under the supervision of the editor of Sunday-school books," Daniel Wise. He continued in the office for three quadrenniums. During these years responsibility for tract distribution increasingly devolved upon the pastors of the Church, with less use made of hired colporteurs.²¹⁸

The 1872 General Conference combined the Tract Society with the Sunday School Union, thus returning it to the same status as in 1844. John H. Vincent was elected editor for the two organizations. At the same time the Conference recommended more special and thorough supervision of "the preparation, publication, and systematic distribution of our tract literature."²¹⁹ Vincent soon discovered, as Kidder had found twenty-five years earlier, that the combination of jobs imposed more responsibilities than he could efficiently care for and asked for aid. In June, 1872, James M. Freeman* of the Newark Conference was employed by the Book Agents as assistant editor. At the close of his first quadrennium, Vincent reported that he had rendered invaluable service in revising the tract list and in editing new tracts. From quadrennium to quadrennium a large number of new tracts were issued: 1868-72, 235; 1880-84, 272; 1884-88, 477.²²⁰

It seemed impossible for the General Conference to follow a consistent policy as regards responsibility for publication and distribution of tracts and in 1880 the Tract Society was again separately organized. But in 1888, when Jesse L. Hurlbut succeeded Vincent as Corresponding Secretary of the Sunday School Union the General Conference also elected him to the secretaryship of the Tract Society. He was re-elected in 1892.

Tract Society income reached its highest point for the period in the quadrennium 1892-96, $83,230. During these four years the Society printed 5,485,000 copies of tracts, and made cash grants to overseas missions amounting to $31,489.²²¹ This was a comparatively small contribution at a time when the annual budget of the Missionary Society was approximately a million dollars, but when it is considered that no part of the missionary appropriation was then available for literature production and that the Tract Society grant made possible the printing of millions of pages in more than a score of vernaculars it assumes great importance. In the area of domestic missions also the Society rendered significant service. Through pastors and

* James M. Freeman (1827-1900), as assistant editor, had various duties other than his tract work. During his first quadrennium in the office, as reported by Vincent, he "visited 30 Annual Conferences, 30 conventions, institutes, and normal classes, and traveled 32,500 miles," as well as carrying important responsibility for foreign correspondence and for editorial work. He also served for several years as Recording Secretary of the Tract Society.—G. C. Journal, 1876, p. 596; Minutes, Newark Conference, 1900, pp. 83 f.

missionaries tracts were distributed to immigrants in a dozen languages—German, Swedish, Danish, Finnish, French, Italian, Spanish, Bohemian, Polish, Hebrew, Chinese, Japanese. Grants were also made to foreign language publication agencies, such as the Swedish Book Concern, the Norwegian Publishing Society, and the Pacific Japanese Mission.²²²

THE METHODIST BOOK CONCERN*

Among the institutions of the Methodist Episcopal Church there are few, if any, whose educational influence has been more far-reaching than that of the Book Concern. The primary object of the founders was not to establish a money-making commercial institution but to create and distribute a Christian literature to meet the needs of the Church and the nation. Its founders conceived its first and most important objective as "the promotion of Christian education; . . . the spread of Christianity by the publication, sale, and distribution of moral and religious literature."²²³

The first book published was John Wesley's Christian's Pattern, abridged from Thomas à Kempis's Imitation of Christ. It was followed by the Hymn Book, The Methodist Discipline, Saints' Everlasting Rest, Wesley's Primitive Physic, and the Arminian Magazine. Gradually the scope of the publication list was broadened until it came to include volumes of sermons, books on the Bible, theology, general and church history, preaching, moral philosophy and, eventually, a still wider range of religious subjects. To a limited extent books in the field of general literature also were included.

From the beginning a preponderant element in the publication program were tracts, pamphlets, and books for the Christian teaching of children and youth. Every Sunday school was expected to have a library well stocked with books for children, young people, and adults. In its first annual report (1828) the Sunday School Union stated:

Already they (that is, the Methodist Book Concern) have published for the use of our schools 111 editions of 33 different and appropriate books, besides Sunday-school hymn books, Bibles, Testaments, and Scripture Questions. It is estimated that 773,000 books have been printed for the use of our Sabbath schools since our organization, besides 154,000 numbers of the Child's Magazine, and several hundred thousand tickets for rewards and other purposes.²²⁴

The teaching literature of the Methodist Episcopal Church, following the division of 1845, included the Youth's Magazine, in which a systematic course of Bible lessons and supplemental materials for religious instruction was printed; the Sunday School Advocate which supplied both teaching material and story paper features; the Sunday School Journal, established in 1860; and the Senior Quarterly, begun in 1862.

* The Methodist Book Concern was founded in 1789, two years after the establishment of the United States government. John Dickins was appointed as the first Book Steward with headquarters in Philadelphia. After nine years' zealous, self-sacrificing labor Dickins was carried off by yellow fever. Ezekiel Cooper, much against his will, was commandeered (1799) to succeed him. In 1804 the business was transferred to New York and in the course of twenty-one years occupied rented quarters in five different locations. Not until 1820, when Nathan Bangs was made Publishing Agent, did the Book Concern begin to prosper in a large way. In this same year a branch was established in Cincinnati and in 1839 was separately chartered as the Western Methodist Book Concern. The two corporations remained separate until 1912.

The financial strength of the Book Concern made it possible to establish Church papers when postal services were so inadequate that regional journals were a necessity if the people were to be supplied with weekly periodicals. In 1845 the Christian Advocate, Methodism's first official weekly, was in its nineteenth year. Already four other weeklies had been established: the Western Christian Advocate in 1834 at Cincinnati; the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate (semi-official) in 1833; the Christliche Apologete in 1839 at Cincinnati; and the Northern Christian Advocate in 1844 at Auburn, New York. In 1852, within three years of the discovery of gold in California, the California Christian Advocate was authorized by General Conference. This same year the Northwestern Christian Advocate was begun in Chicago. Others were founded in rapid succession: the Central Christian Advocate in 1856 at St. Louis; the Pacific Christian Advocate, at Portland, first issued independently but made official in 1856; the Methodist Advocate Journal, Atlanta (later Athens, Tenn.), taken over by General Conference in 1868; and the Southwestern Christian Advocate, New Orleans, organ of the work among Negroes.²²⁵

The religious and educational influence of this remarkable family of weekly periodicals was far-reaching and pervasive, extending beyond the circle of church members into the life of many thousands of communities. The aggregate circulation of the periodicals as early as 1866 was in excess of one million copies and increased with the growth of population. Subscribers were scattered not only over the East but throughout the Ohio and Mississippi valleys, the new states and territories of the far West, and the entire length of the Pacific coast. The subject matter of the Advocates was by no means limited to religion, the Christian Advocate, particularly, covering a wide range of general subjects. From the first its running head read: "Devoted to Religion, Morality, Science, Domestic Economy and General Intelligence."

The Methodist Quarterly Review, the lineal descendant of the Methodist Magazine—American Methodism's first periodical—was a scholarly, critical journal of high rank. While its appeal was to a more limited group of readers it rendered a valuable service to the better-educated ministers and laymen of the Church. The Ladies' Repository, published at Cincinnati, beginning in 1840, regarded for many years as the leading women's magazine of the nation, exerted a significant cultural influence both within and without Methodism. It reached at one time a circulation of 40,000 copies. A mistake was made by the General Conference of 1876 in attempting to adapt it to a still wider public under the title of the National Repository. Its circulation quickly declined and in 1880 it was discontinued. The German language monthly Haus und Herd, which began publication in January, 1873, circulated widely among German Methodists and rendered a valuable service in interpreting American social and cultural ideals.* The influence of the Methodist Book Concern, declared Abel Stevens in 1886, in the diffusion of popular literature and the creation of a taste for reading among the great masses of the denomination, has been incalculable. . . . If Methodism had made no other contribution to the progress of knowledge and civilization in the New World than that of this powerful institution, this alone would suffice to vindicate its claim to the respect of the enlightened world.²²⁸

The colleges and theological seminaries would have been straitened in their interpretation of the Bible and of Methodism had it not been for the comprehensive list of journals, biographies, Bible commentaries, theological works, and histories of Methodism made available to them by the Methodist Book Concern. In this particular, as in the other ways that have been mentioned, its educational service to the Church was inestimable.

* Other monthlies which had only an ephemeral existence were the National Magazine, for general popular circulation, begun in January, 1853, and discontinued in June, 1859; and Golden Hours, an illustrated young people's magazine, begun in 1869 and discontinued in 1880.

The Church Faces Its Missionary Task

"ARE OUR PREACHERS as ready to pioneer the Western wilderness as were the men of other years? Is there as much of the spirit of self-sacrifice among them now as formerly?" With such questions as these the Missionary Society challenged the Church as it faced the task imposed by the Great Immigration. "Formerly," said the Corresponding Secretary in the Thirtieth Annual Report (1848-49), the home missions program included destitute places in the older States and settlements, and extended to the borders of a few of the Western and South-western States; now it reaches from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Only a few years ago, the Rocky Mountains formed a barrier that might not be passed, except by trappers and explorers; now, thousands of families pass over them with little or no apprehension. . . . Our foreign emigration, too, is almost incredible. It has been calculated that not less than a thousand a day will enter our ports the current year. By far the greater number of these will, probably, seek their adopted homes in the Valley of the Mississippi, or beyond the Rocky Mountains. . . .

This development of facts will show, that the field for missionary enterprise in the West is almost without limits. Its population is increasing with unexampled rapidity, and in the course of a very few years will contain a hundred millions of inhabitants. How these multitudes of immortal spirits are to be supplied with the Word of God, . . . is a question over which the Church cannot slumber without criminality. It is a question, the solution of which admits of no delay.¹

To this challenge the Bishops in their address of 1852 added their exhortation:

Let the Church see in these crowds of immortal souls the measure of its duty. Not only does Christianity loudly call to continued and increased action in behalf of their religious interests, but patriotism admonishes the thoughtful to lose no time in bringing to bear on them the most effectual element to make them good citizens, by making them good Christians.²

Insistent calls came as well from isolated missionaries and from settlers anxious for churches and schools in new communities. From the Wabasha

Mission, Wisconsin Conference, including a region on both sides of the Mississippi, 150 miles from south to north on the west side and from La Crosse thirty miles north on the east side, a lone missionary wrote to the Christian Advocate in the spring of 1854:

The country is filling up with people very fast. Some two or three hundred pass up the river on steamboats every day, and probably as many more by land. These emigrants scatter over Minnesota and Northwest Wisconsin, and from present appearances at least 10,000 emigrants will have gone into these districts by the close of the season; and I judge that several hundred of these are members, or have been, of our church, and should be cared for by our Missionary Society. But a population of from 10,000 to 20,000, scattered over a district of country three hundred by one hundred and fifty miles, requires more than double the missionary force we are now able to put into it. . . . New settlements are now being formed from one hundred to one hundred and fifty miles west of the Mississippi, and at all points between that and the river. These call for more men to harvest the field now ripe before us.³

While the need for domestic missions rested more heavily upon the mind of the Church the cause of the foreign field was not without strong advocates. Its challenge was voiced more effectively by Stephen Olin than by any other. Again and again he lifted his voice to criticize the little that was being done by Methodism as compared with other denominations, and to plead for consideration of the religious needs of the non-Christian world. In 1843 he declared:

There is something fearfully ominous in the recent history of our Church: distancing all others in progress, and nearly doubling any other in numbers . . . and yet, in this most missionary age, contributing scarcely ten cents a member for all missionary purposes, foreign and domestic, . . . doing almost nothing in the great work of converting the heathen, and, after having abandoned a part of that work already, faltering and taking counsel if it be not advisable to give up the rest . . .⁴

Responsibility for the conditions he described, Olin felt, rested upon the ministry of the Church among whom there had been "a great decline in the true missionary spirit." The redemption "of the heathen world," he asserted, had "never been brought home to the heart and conscience of the Church," nor was this now being done.

One seldom hears, either in the pulpit or the prayer-meeting, a full, fervent supplication for the salvation of perishing nations Once in a year, perhaps, on a set occasion, a sermon is preached on the subject of missions, and the preacher, a little conscience-smitten, or ashamed to go to conference without something to show, gathers up the slender offerings of the people, who make them in a yet colder spirit.⁵

For eight years a few missionary-minded leaders had been insistently urging the establishment of a China mission.* In 1835 the Missionary Lyceum of

* See Vol. I, 301.

Wesleyan University, through a committee consisting of B. F. Tefft, Daniel P. Kidder, and Erastus Wentworth, issued an appeal to the Church to "begin and continue to do something for China," which as a field for missions offered opportunity in "probably more particulars, and to a greater extent, than any other nation upon the globe."⁶

But during the thirties and early forties the Church did little more than mark time in its missionary program. The economic depression of 1837-41 * had severely reduced the income of the Missionary Society, necessitating reduction of appropriations. Preoccupation of the denomination with the issues of slavery and abolition lessened concern for other important interests, including the missionary cause. Division of the Church brought complications and caused temporary reduction of income. In the later years of the decade the failing health of the Corresponding Secretary was reflected in less aggressive missionary leadership.

In a review of the Twenty-seventh Annual Report Stephen Olin called attention to the fact that the Church's mission in South America had been "abandoned"; that the Oregon Mission had "been reduced to three or four missionaries"; and that of the fifteen missionaries in Liberia nearly all were "inhabitants of the country, and engaged within the colony," only two or three making attempt "to reach the native population." If one of the foreign missionaries of the Church was preaching "the Gospel in any other than the English language," or if one had translated the Bible "to aid in the diffusion of Gospel light," he declared, he was "not aware of it." Furthermore,

Every evangelical Church in the land has gratefully recognized its obligations to co-operate with its Savior in asserting his empire over the heathen, still perishing, though purchased with his blood. . . . We are already near the close of the first fifty years of this missionary century, of this age of missionary sacrifices and successes; and yet the Methodist Episcopal Church, second to none in numbers and resources, has yet to send its first missionary to the heathen world across the sea, has still to form its plans and settle preliminaries, . . . Thousands, we believe, there are among us fully alive to the reproach and the guilt of this interminable delay. . . . We protest . . . the time has come when the Church must act.⁷

THE CHURCH ORGANIZES FOR ACTION

One difficulty was that the Church as a whole was not effectively related to the missionary program—particularly to the initiation and maintenance of missions in foreign fields. Each Annual Conference was essentially a missionary society in relation to its own area but its sense of responsibility did not extend beyond its boundaries. The Annual Conferences, other than the New York Conference, had no bond of connection with the Missionary Society. Its original constitution as approved by the General Conference of 1820 provided that each Annual Conference should have "the privilege of appointing one vice president from its own body," but this limited provision was not taken advantage of. While the Society repeatedly emphasized that responsibility for establishing and maintaining missions inhered in the Annual Conferences no steps were taken during the early decades toward making the Society's organization organically representative of the Conferences.

* Ibid., pp. 298 f.

ANNUAL CONFERENCES RELATED TO MISSIONARY PROGRAM

The General Conference of 1844 enacted legislation intended to remedy this defect by making provision for a new group designated as the General Missionary Committee, an interlocking organization with the Missionary Society. The authorization read:

The Annual Conferences shall be divided into as many mission districts as there are effective Superintendents*; and there shall be a committee, consisting of one from each mission district, to be appointed by the Bishops, and to be called the General Missionary Committee.⁸

The committee was empowered, acting "jointly with the Board of Managers, the Corresponding Secretary, and the Treasurer," to fix the amount of the annual appropriations, and "the division of said amount between foreign and domestic missions"; in conjunction with the Bishop presiding in the New York Conference and the Board of Managers to "determine what fields shall be occupied or continued as foreign missions, and the number of persons to be employed on said missions" and also to "estimate the sums necessary for the support of each mission, subject to the approval of the presiding Bishop." In addition it was authorized to "determine the amount for which each bishop shall draw for the domestic missions of those Conferences over which he shall preside, and he shall not draw on the Treasurer for more than said amount."⁹

This legislation accomplished two things, both important. First, it placed responsibility for determining the mission fields of the Church and the amounts apportioned to the missions—both domestic and foreign—in a group directly representative of the whole Church, along with the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society, thus relating all of the Annual Conferences to policy making and program planning.† It gave missions, Abel Stevens said, "a more comprehensive . . . national, character." Even more significant, it gave missions a churchwide character, making the total missionary program a concern of the entire Church. In creating the General Committee the legislation lessened the powers previously exercised independently by the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society, and Bishops, and the Annual Conferences. No longer could the Board of Managers alone determine the total missionary appropriation and its division between foreign and domestic missions. No longer could a Bishop with approval of an Annual Conference establish a new mission, appoint to it as many missionaries as he chose, and draw on the Board for the support which the missionary committee of the Conference judged necessary. No longer could an Annual Conference, without consultation with the Society, establish as many missions within its borders as were thought to be desirable and fix the amount to be appropriated to them.*

* The number of Mission Districts changed from quadrennium to quadrennium up to 1872 as the number of Bishops changed. Thereafter quadrennially the number was set in the constitution: twelve, 1872-84; thirteen, 1884-88; fourteen, 1888-96.

† Minor changes affecting the General Committee were made by the General Conferences of 1848, 1852, 1856, and 1864. In 1868 the General Conference stipulated that the Board of Managers might designate as members a number from the Board equal to the number of Mission Districts, and required that the Bishops be notified to attend the meetings of the General Committee to advise in all matters before it. The revised constitution of 1872 provided that all Bishops should be members of the General Committee; and that representatives of the Mission Districts should be elected by General Conference on nomination by the delegates of the Annual Conferences within each District.

During the first few years the General Committee seemed not to take its responsibility seriously. Meetings were brief and no detailed consideration was given to the needs of the respective missions. At the 1850 meeting the committee was in session for only two days, in the afternoon of the second day adjourning "to report . . . appropriations to the Board of Managers for their concurrence." ¹⁰

The procedure followed in 1852 in determining the appropriations, as described by Durbin in the Thirty-fourth Annual Report of the Missionary Society, was first to take up the foreign missions in order, ascertain the requirements of each, and set down the necessary total. Then to consider the missions to the Germans in the United States and the amount necessary for each Conference. Next to take up the missions to the foreign populations other than German and ascertain the amount for each. Then the Indian missions were similarly reviewed. Finally, the domestic English language missions were studied and the amount required by each Annual Conference in order to maintain its own missions was decided upon. The appropriations for the maintenance of existing work having been thus determined the question was raised, "Shall we extend our missionary work abroad?" In the discussion which followed, the committee, the Bishops, and Board of Managers agreed that the general sentiment of the Church favored the extension of the foreign missions and the opening of new missions could and would be financially sustained.¹¹

Within a few years decided advance was shown. At the 1860 annual meeting of the General Missionary Committee,† for example, six Bishops, six representatives of Mission Districts, and six members of the Board were in session for four days. Dr. John P. Durbin, as Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society, presented in detail the needs and prospects of each of the foreign missions, laying before the committee the schedules of appropriations

* See Vol. I, 286 f.

† An original provision that the committee should meet annually in New York City was later changed to provide for meetings in different cities, and in the same city not more than once in four years. It became the custom for the committee to convene each year for most of a week in some one of the larger cities of the nation, with deliberative sessions during forenoons, sub-committee meetings in the afternoons, and public meetings in the evenings addressed by prominent leaders of the Church.—Abel Stevens, Supplementary History of American Methodism . . . , pp. 61 f.

which had been prepared by the respective subcommittees of the Board on the several fields. Next, the representatives of Mission Districts set forth in detail their missionary needs. Appropriations to each foreign mission field, to the German language missions in the United States and foreign language missions other than German, Indian missions, and to each Annual Conference for missions within its bounds were then taken up, given consideration, and voted.¹²

As the years passed the committee gradually assumed increased responsibility in determining not only appropriations but also matters of policy and of administration. A review of the Minutes for the later years shows an increasing number of matters referred by the Board of Managers to the committee for decision.

GENERAL CONFERENCE ASSUMES CONTROL

While the creation of the General Missionary Committee was a long step in the direction of tying in the Church as a whole to the missionary program, the General Conference was not yet satisfied. Although it elected the Corresponding Secretary quadrennially, it was not otherwise related to missionary program administration. The Society was required by its constitution to make a quadrennial report "of its transactions . . . and the state of its funds" but was not in any other way amenable to the General Conference. The constitution as revised in 1868 provided that the Society should carry on its work "under such rules and regulations as the General Conference . . . may from time to time prescribe."¹³ But this action, the 1872 General Conference felt, did not go far enough. Its Committee on Benevolent Societies* pointed out that so long as the whole management of the Society was vested in a Board elected by the members, "scattered widely in all parts of the country," the majority of whom could not participate in the election of Board members, possibility existed of change of management and control of the Society's resources by local combinations. Besides, the committee felt that the General Conference, as the supreme legislative authority of the Church, and having in charge all its great interests for the diffusion of Christian civilization, should have a controlling power in all the missionary operations carried on in the name and behalf of the Church.¹⁴

It therefore recommended that the charter be so amended as to provide for the election of the Board of Managers by the General Conference. On June 1, the recommendation having been approved, the members of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society, and of the other benevolent societies of

* This committee was appointed to consider the relations of all the benevolent societies to the General Conference, and to report "whether any action is necessary, and if so what, to place them under the full control of the General Conference." The General Conference directed the Bishops to take "such measures as they may deem proper to secure by law such form of organization of the various benevolent corporations of the Methodist Episcopal Church as will place all under the full control of the General Conference."—G. C. Journal, 1872, pp. 295 f., 298.

the Church, and Mission District members of the General Missionary Committee, were elected by the Conference—the first time in the history of the Church that this had been done. Finally, in 1876 the Committee on Missions prepared and General Conference adopted a revised and extended Disciplinary statement on missions.¹⁵

THE MISSIONARY CAUSE IS ONE

The Missionary Society, in the words of its constitution, originally had been “established for the express purpose of enabling the several annual Conferences more effectually to extend their missionary labours throughout the United States and elsewhere.” * This statement placed emphasis upon domestic missions as the first obligation of the Church. Stephen Olin characterized it as exhibiting an “inherent partiality for home missions.”¹⁶

At the time of organization it was not so much an expression of partiality as it was the recognition of opportunities and needs immediately at hand so compelling as to exhaust “available resources of means and men.” † By 1845 the situation was different. Methodism had vastly increased in resources of personnel and money. Yet in the eastern Conferences local Societies abundantly able to assume complete self-control continued to look to the missionary treasury for assistance and, as Olin declared, an application for aid . . . by any rising or waning society of five-and-twenty members, is likely to be urged upon the Board with an advocacy earnest enough to drown the Macedonian cry of the five hundred millions of heathen . . . ‡

Olin was convinced that the only way to avoid overemphasis on domestic missions was to establish a separate board for foreign missions, “responsible to God and the Church for the zealous, faithful prosecution of that one work, leaving to the present society the field which it has cultivated so long and so well.”¹⁷ Some of the partisans of domestic missions also preferred a separate board. When the Conference of 1848 met, James Porter offered a resolution calling for a distinct home missionary society. The Committee on

* This statement of purpose remained unchanged, except for minor alterations, until 1868, when it was changed to read: “The name of this association shall be ‘The Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.’ Its objects are charitable and religious; designed to diffuse more generally the blessings of education and Christianity, and to promote and support missionary schools and Christian missions throughout the United States and Territories, and also in foreign countries, under such rules and regulations as the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church may from time to time prescribe.”—Fiftieth Ann. Rcp., M. S. (1868), p. 14.

† See Vol. I, 304.

‡ The condition was somewhat similar to that prevailing in England as described by G. G. Findlay: “Being one department amongst many in a crowded agenda, [the claims of foreign missions] . . . suffer in Church assemblies from a competition, half-unconscious, perhaps; but unceasing and sometimes jealous. It must endure the delays and cautions imposed by domestic necessities, which are visible, clamorous, and close at hand. It has an inveterate and powerful enemy in the corporate selfishness characteristic of every public body that is not filled with the spirit of Jesus Christ. The balance of duty and the right perspective and proportion in the Church’s vision of the world’s need are hard to attain; their maintenance requires a largeness of heart and mind, a power to ‘see afar off,’ scarcely to be looked for in the average Church member and at the ordinary level of Christian public opinion, which in the main determines the resolutions of conferences and assemblies.”—G. G. Findlay and W. W. Holdsworth, The History of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, I, 62.

Missions, to whom the resolution was referred, reported that a few only of the Annual Conferences had expressed a desire for the change and that several had "manifested a strong opposition." They therefore deemed "the establishment of two distinct missionary organizations . . . inexpedient * at present."¹⁸

Six times during the half century 1845-95 memorials praying for the organization of separate boards of domestic and foreign missions were considered by committees and reported upon adversely. Each time the General Conference approved the action of the committee. Nevertheless, agitation continued, participated in by zealous advocates of both interests. In their report for 1880 the Secretaries assured the partisans of domestic work that "Home missions, as from the beginning, are still esteemed . . . as unsurpassed in importance by the claims of the foreign field" and called attention to the fact that, estimating upon the basis of the 1879 disbursements of the Church Extension Society, the Freedmen's Aid Society, and the Sunday School and Tract Societies, the Church would contribute in 1880 for domestic missions an aggregate of approximately $412,170. as over against the expenditure of $279,622. for foreign missions.¹⁹

As the General Conference of 1892 drew near discussion of the subject of division again became intensified. M'Kendree Shaw of the Central New York Conference, feeling sure that "petitions will be sent in from almost all of the fields of our world-wide missions asking for this change," in an article in the Gospel in All Lands, in the name of the pastors of the Church entered a strong demurrer, arguing against increased overhead expense, an additional collection, and more labor for the pastors, "without any great advantage . . . to the cause of Christianity."²⁰ Bishop Thoburn, on the other hand, pleaded for reorganization :

For twenty-five years past the conviction has been steadily though slowly growing among those of our people who are interested in missionary matters that the amalgamation of home and foreign missions under one Board was a mistake at the outset, and that it must become, in the very nature of the case, a still more serious mistake with every passing year.²¹

In the interest of both domestic and foreign missions he urged two Societies. The General Committee held that the missionary cause was essentially one and refused by a vote of 24 to 18 to recommend division to the General Conference. They also declined by a vote of 24 to 16 to recommend that the Society be divided into two departments with separate collections for home and foreign missions.

* The Committee on Missions did, however, recommend that any Annual Conference be given liberty, by two-thirds vote of its members, to organize a Conference missionary society for support of domestic missions "already established, or to be established within its own limits," provided that "such organizations shall not interfere with the collections for the Missionary Society . . . as required by the Discipline." The recommendation was adopted by General Conference but under the restrictions imposed the permissive action did not commend itself to the Annual Conferences.—"Journal of the General Conference, 1848," p. 92, in G. C. Journals, III.

ORGANIZATION FOR ADMINISTRATION

The legislation of 1844, which created the General Missionary Committee and defined its powers, left the administration of all missions—other than those domestic missions under the immediate jurisdiction of Annual Conferences—entirely in the hands of the Missionary Society.* Administrative supervision was exercised, however, not by the Society as a whole but by the Board of Managers,† a smaller group elected annually by the Society. As revised by the 1856 General Conference the constitution vested in the Board the entire “management and disposition of the affairs and property” of the Society, as broad and indefinite a statement of powers and functions as could have been phrased.²²

The constitution of the Missionary Society provided that the Corresponding Secretary, the chief executive officer, should be elected by the General Conference. The Bishops, in case of vacancy in the interim between General Conferences, were empowered to appoint a Secretary. Officers of the Society, other than the Corresponding Secretary, were elected annually by the Board of Managers. They consisted of the President, who tradition decreed should be the senior Bishop; an unstipulated number of Vice Presidents, including all remaining Bishops, in order of seniority; Recording Secretary; and Treasurer. The President ‡ was the presiding officer, both of the Society and of the Board. In his absence the senior Vice President presided. Other than this, the Vice Presidents§ had no stated functions, the office being solely honorary. From the organization of the Society the invariable custom was to elect the Senior Book Agent at New York as Treasurer and the Book Agent at Cincinnati as Assistant Treasurer ¶ in order to afford the Society the accounting facilities of the Book Concern.

An increasingly important function in the Missionary Society's activities was exercised by the standing committees of the Board. Standing committees for foreign missions in 1845 were: South America, Oregon, and Africa. Other

† Up to 1856 the Board of Managers was a loosely constituted group. Between 1844 and 1856 thirty-two managers, all laymen, were elected annually. But in addition the constitution specified that all ordained ministers of the Church, “whether traveling or local, being members of . . . [the] Society,” were “ex officio members of the Board of Managers.” For the great majority this was a merely nominal relationship, only a few ministers living in or near the city of New York exercising the right of attendance on and participation in the meetings of the Board. In 1856 this provision was deleted. Election of the Board of Managers by members of the Society was discontinued in 1872, when their election became a function of General Conference. The constitution of 1856 provided that the Board should consist of thirty-two laymen and as many ministers, not exceeding thirty-two, as should be “determined at each annual meeting.” In 1872, to conform to a new charter granted in 1869 by the Legislature of New York, the constitution fixed the number of ministerial members definitely at thirty-two.—“Journal of the General Conference, 1856,” p. 302, in G. C. Journals, III; G. C. Journal, 1872, pp. 343 f.; Thirty-eighth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1856-57), p. 11; ibid., 54th (1872), p. 20.

‡ Presidents of the Board were: 1845-52, Elijah Hedding; 1852-59, Beverly Waugh; 1859-75, Thomas A. Morris; 1875-77, Edmund S. Janes; 1877-83, Levi Scott; 1883-85, Matthew Simpson; 1885-96, Thomas Bowman.

§ Beginning with 1853 the list of Vice Presidents included a number of ministers and laymen.

¶ From 1845 to 1854, George Lane, who had already served in the office for five terms, was Treasurer; 1854-73, Thomas Carlton; 1873-80, Reuben Nelson; 1880-89, John M. Phillips; 1889-96, Sandford Hunt. The Assistant Treasurers were: 1845-61, Lerov Swormstedt; 1861-68, Adam Poe; 1868-81, Luke Hitchcock; 1881-85, John M. Walden; 1885-96, Earl Cranston.

standing committees of that year were: Domestic Missions, Finance, Estimating, Legacies, Publishing, and Auditing.²³ As new foreign missions were established other regional committees were added: China, India, Europe, Japan and Korea. A primary responsibility of each regional committee was the estimating of funds required annually for the maintenance of the mission and reporting the estimate to the Board, which in turn recommended an appropriation to the General Missionary Committee. Some of the committees gave much more detailed consideration to the problems and needs of the respective mission fields for which they were responsible than did others.*

THE MISSIONARY SECRETARIAT

Responsibility for administration of the Church's program of missions centered in the Corresponding Secretary, as the chief executive of the Missionary Society. What the Church needed at this crucial juncture was not alone a strong and skillful administrator but also an effective missionary advocate—one able to recall the Church to the missionary passion of its early decades—and a leader of broad vision and intrepid courage and faith. All of these leadership qualities were possessed in generous measure by John Price Durbin,† elected Corresponding Secretary in 1850.

On March 20 of that year, Charles Pitman,‡ who for nine years had served as Corresponding Secretary, announced to the Board of Managers his resignation, owing to illness. The Board recommended to the Bishops the appointment of Dr. Durbin. Nine years before, on the resignation of Nathan Bangs, the Board had nominated him as Secretary but the New York Conference§ had chosen instead to elect Dr. Pitman. Now again the managers turned to Dr. Durbin. The Bishops acted promptly and on April 15 he was introduced at a regular meeting of the Board as the new Corresponding Secretary. His salary was fixed at $1,550. "in addition to the use of the dwelling house."²⁴ It is to be doubted whether in the entire Church another could have been found so peculiarly fitted to meet the needs of the situation.

* In 1850, for example, the South America Committee held but one meeting and gave consideration only to one question: reply to be made to certain specific inquiries raised by D. D. Lore, missionary in Buenos Aires. ("Minutes of the Committee on South America, M. S.," 1850-67, unpagued ms.) The China Committee in the same year held seven meetings in which numerous administrative matters were given consideration.—"Minutes of the China Committee, M. S.," 1846-68, unpagued ms.

† John Price Durbin (1800-76), of Methodist ancestry, was born in Bourbon County, Ky. Following a conversion experience in his eighteenth year he united with the Church and within a week was licensed to preach. Soon thereafter he was appointed to supply a Circuit. He was received on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1820. Appointed to Hamilton Station in 1821, he entered Miami University, at Oxford, twelve miles distant. In 1824, appointed as assistant pastor at Cincinnati, he continued his studies in Cincinnati College, receiving the degree of M.A. In 1826 he was elected professor of languages in Augusta College, and in 1831 chaplain of the United States Senate. By the General Conference of 1832 he was made editor of the Christian Advocate. From 1834 to 1845 he was president of Dickinson College. In the latter year he returned to the pastorate, serving Union and Trinity Churches in Philadelphia. When elected Corresponding Secretary he was Presiding Elder of the North Philadelphia District.—Matthew Simpson, Ed., Cyclopaedia of Methodism, pp. 318 f.; see also John A. Roche, The Life of John Price Durbin, D.D., LL.D., with an Analysis of his Homiletical Skill and Sacred Oratory.

‡ For biographical data concerning Charles Pitman, see Vol. I, 313n.

§ Up to 1844 the power to fill a vacancy in the office of Corresponding Secretary resided in the New York Conference. In that year, by amendment of the constitution of the Society, the power was transferred to the Bishops.

He was generally recognized as one of the great preachers of Methodism. The announcement that he was to preach at a given time would, anywhere in the United States, crowd the largest available place of assembly. Concerning him Bishop Thomas Bowman wrote:

During a period of nearly forty years I heard him speak in public under greatly varying conditions. I heard him in the country village, in the large towns and cities, at the camp-meeting, at the Conference, and at great public anniversaries; and I never heard him when he did not give me valuable instruction, move my emotional nature, and leave a lasting impress on my heart.

* * * *

I never heard a speaker who thrilled me as did Dr. Durbin, or left upon my mind . . . so many clear, solid, and abiding impressions.²⁵

George R. Crooks likens Durbin to Matthew Simpson, saying that both would choose as sermon subjects "the great themes of Christianity." This custom Durbin followed as long as he continued to preach, but from the time of his election as Corresponding Secretary he stood before the Church as its chief advocate of Christian missions, pleading, persuading, inspiring Methodism to measure up to its supreme obligation, that of carrying the Gospel to the ends of the earth.

Durbin's strength as an administrator had been thoroughly tested in his eleven years as president of Dickinson College. The administrative experience and skill acquired during these years he brought to the secretaryship of the Missionary Society. Almost immediately after his induction the Society became imbued with new life and entered upon a greatly broadened and strengthened program.

Durbin, no less than Thomas Coke, envisioned the world as the subject of redemption. His zeal for the expansion of domestic missions equaled that of the most ambitious leaders of Methodism. But he could not conceive of the Church's Mission as limited to America. As soon as he was installed in office he began to insist on the obligation of the Church to extend its foreign missionary program. He rewrote the Disciplinary statement on missions and largely through his influence the new, comprehensive chapter on "Support of Missions" was adopted by General Conference. His emphasis was upon the Church's living up to its Christian obligation and every member's contributing to missions in proportion as the Lord had prospered him. From the beginning of his administration nothing more was heard of the "cent-a-week-plan" which the Board in 1846 and Secretary Pitman as recently as 1847 had declared "the very best that can be devised." In October, 1853, he was able to report "a greatly increased interest" in missions in the Annual Conferences which he had attended and an average increase in collections of "about 50 per cent."²⁶

At the 1852 General Conference resolutions were approved "in relation to the enlargement or increase of our foreign fields of labor, especially naming India, Turkey, Italy, and France." At the next meeting of the managers Durbin sought and secured the Board's compliance. On August 17, 1853, a missionary was appointed to Norway, where work had been initiated by two Norwegian sailors, and in 1854 the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society made an appropriation for a missionary to Sweden. Work in Denmark was begun in 1857. In 1866 Durbin visited these missions—counseling the missionaries concerning their programs—the first visit of a Missionary Secretary to a foreign mission field.²⁷

To the monthly meetings of the Board of Managers and to the committees on the several mission fields he brought a remarkable grasp of details and accurate knowledge of cases to be considered. John A. Roche, his biographer, states:

His reports to the Board were so clear and just as to allow little discussion, as they carried with them the force of a logical statement and of an inevitable conclusion. In the Board were business men and ministers accustomed to independent thought and expression, but it was difficult to make an issue with the secretary.²⁸

Of a like tenor is Abel Stevens' testimony: "A capacity for details, practical skill, promptness, energy that never tires, . . . these . . . [are] the elements of his strength . . ." ²⁹ A successor in office, John M. Reid, declared that in the business affairs of the office he was "thorough, systematic, painstaking, and conscientious It was as if the great Head of the Church had made him for this very post . . ." ³⁰

Four times the General Conference re-elected John P. Durbin as Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society until, finally, in 1872, because of increasing physical infirmities, he felt compelled to decline re-election. The Conference, "in behalf of the whole Church," recorded its "deep sense of the very eminent service" he had rendered "to the cause of Christ," and the Board at its meeting on June 18 adopted by unanimous vote a resolution of appreciation of his long and distinguished service, stating in part:

While to other great and good men is due the credit of the origin and early support of our Society, . . . [we] know that his advent to the Secretaryship marked an epoch in its career. . . . Through his singleness of devotion, his judicious counsels, his comprehensive ideas and eloquent advocacy—his faith in God, in the Church, and in humanity; it has risen in great measure to its present grand proportions, and stands side by side with the foremost evangelizing agencies of Europe and America.³¹

Since the division of 1844 the entire administrative responsibility of the Missionary Society had been borne by the Corresponding Secretary.* Durbin conditioned his acceptance of the secretaryship on the election of an assistant, and David Terry* was elected as "assistant to the Corresponding Secretary." † In 1860 provision was also made for an Assistant Corresponding Secretary to "reside in the West, and labor to promote the general interests of the Society under the direction of the Board at New York."³² For this position William L. Harris‡ was chosen. As Secretary of the General Conference of 1856 and of 1860 he was well known to the delegates. Nominated by members of the Ohio Conference delegation as a man of exceptional administrative ability, he was elected on the first ballot. He possessed, in fact, a wide range of qualifications for the position. He had an acquisitive mind, retentive memory, sound judgment, and immense capacity for work. As Assistant Secretary he was methodical, thorough, and accurate in handling the administrative details of the office. His service in presenting the missionary cause to the Annual Conferences was invaluable.

* During the quadrennium 1840-44 there had been three co-ordinate Corresponding Secretaries. (See Vol. I, 312.) The 1844 General Conference in revising the constitution made provision for only one Corresponding Secretary (Twenty-fifth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1843-44], Appendix, p. 59; "Journal of the General Conference, 1844," p. 129, in G. C. Journals, III). No change was made by the General Conferences of 1848, 1852, and 1856.

During the quadrennium 1860-64 it was necessary for Harris to devote so much of his time to work in the office at New York that little opportunity remained for field service in the West and the western Conferences renewed their demand for secretarial service. The 1864 General Conference thereupon decided that two Assistant Secretaries were needed, the first Assistant to reside in New York, the second "in the West, at such place as the Board of Managers shall direct." Again the Ohio Conference brought forward one of its favorite sons as candidate, and Joseph M. Trimble§ was elected. But his

* David Terry (1808-83), born on Long Island, N. Y., was converted at sixteen years of age, imbued with the conviction "that he should have to preach." After several years as a Local Preacher, in 1831 he was received on trial in the New York Conference and appointed to the Durham Circuit. He was the means of inspiring Francis Burns to volunteer for the Liberia Mission. Finding it necessary for financial reasons to locate in 1835, he entered the employ of the House of Refuge in New York City and later, at less than half the salary, became a city missionary. By his initiative the Bethel Ship was purchased as a center for the seamen's mission. He served as Assistant to the Corresponding Secretary from 1850 to 1857. In the latter year he was made Recording Secretary, serving in that capacity for twenty-four years, 1857-80. Again in 1881-82 he was Assistant to the Corresponding Secretary, and in the latter year he was made Recording Secretary Emeritus.—Christian Advocate, LVIII (1883), 16 (April 19), 251.

† David Terry was succeeded as Recording Secretary by James N. FitzGerald (1881-89) and he in turn by Stephen L. Baldwin (1889-1902).

‡ William Logan Harris (1817-87) was born in Troy, Ohio. He studied in Norwalk Academy and in 1837 was admitted on trial in the Michigan Conference. His early appointments included: 1837-38, Dover (Ohio) Circuit; 1838-39, Wooster Circuit; 1839-40, Mansfield Charge; 1844-45, Delaware; 1845-46, Preparatory Department, Ohio Wesleyan University; 1846-47, Toledo; 1847-48, Norwalk; 1848-51, principal, Baldwin Institute (Berea); 1852-60, professor of chemistry and natural history, Ohio Wesleyan. He was Secretary of the General Conference for five quadrenniums. Of him J. M. Buckley said: He "possessed many of the characteristics of a statesman," and he "left the stamp of his personality inefaceably upon the jurisprudence and the administrative and legislative departments of the church."—J. M. Buckley, A History of Methodism in the United States, II, 260; see also Theodore L. Flood and John W. Hamilton, Eds., Lives of Methodist Bishops, pp. 769 f.; Dictionary of American Biography, VIII, 327 f.; J. M. Buckley, "Bishop William Logan Harris," Methodist Review, LXX (January, 1888), 9 ff.

§ Joseph M. Trimble (1807-91), son of Allen Trimble, governor of Ohio (1821-30), was born in Woodford County, Ky. Graduated from Ohio University (Athens), he was received on trial in the Ohio Conference in 1828 contrary to the wishes of his father, and appointed in 1829 to Muskingum Circuit, later serving as Presiding Elder of several Ohio Conference Districts. Twelve times he was elected to General Conference. For thirty-one years (1834-65) he was secretary of the Ohio Conference; for sixteen years a trustee of Ohio University at Athens; one of the founders of Ohio Wesleyan University, and for twenty years president of its board of trustees; for thirty-two years a member of the General Missionary Committee. At the time of his death he was regarded as the most widely known Methodist minister in the state of Ohio.—Minutes, Ohio Conference, 1891, pp. 75 f.; M. Simpson, Ed., op. cit., pp. 870 f.; E. T. Nelson, Ed., Fifty Years of History of the Ohio Wesleyan University, Delaware, Ohio, pp. 10, 14, 28, 256; Christian Advocate, LXVI (1891), 20 (May 14), 320; ibid., 31 (July 30), 504.

tenure was brief. In 1868 when the question of election of a second Assistant Secretary came before the General Conference, discussion revealed wide divergence of opinion on the need of maintaining two Assistant Secretaries and on where the second should reside. Some favored Ohio, others a location "as far west as the Mississippi River," and still others the Pacific coast. After two futile ballots for second Assistant, the election was indefinitely postponed.³³ The decision was an unfortunate one. Durbin was in his sixty-eighth year and in declining health. During the preceding quadrennium the program of both domestic and foreign missions had been vastly extended but, before the 1868-72 quadrennium was well under way, receipts had begun to decrease and a serious debt to accumulate. Attempt to stem the tide and at the same time to maintain the morale of the greatly increased missionary personnel at home and abroad fell upon one man—the Assistant Secretary. As a result, the Church was not fully awakened to the peril of the situation, the decline in income continued, and vacancies in personnel in both home and foreign fields remained unfilled.³⁴

In 1872 the General Conference, on recommendation of the Committee on Missions, made provision for three co-ordinate Corresponding Secretaries and described their duties more explicitly. They were made responsible not only for "conducting the correspondence of the Society" and promoting the interests of the missionary cause but also for "furnishing the Church with missionary intelligence" and "supervising the missionary work of the Church." On the second ballot three Secretaries were elected: Robert L. Dashiell, Thomas M. Eddy, and John M. Reid.³⁵

Robert L. Dashiell * had attained prominence in the East as a popular preacher and his years as a college president had given him valuable administrative experience. He entered upon his work as Corresponding Secretary with enthusiasm and for eight years labored arduously for the promotion of missions. His colleague John M. Reid testified to his "almost irresistible power to enlist others" in service to the missionary cause and to his ability to command the time, the influence, and the money of men of means.

Thomas M. Eddy † had become widely known as editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate and later as pastor of prominent churches in the East. His ability as a preacher and writer made him an effective advocate of missions. His election to the missionary secretaryship was received with approbation by the entire Church. With indomitable energy he undertook the secretarial task, traveling throughout the bounds of the Church, delivering addresses before Annual Conferences, preachers' meetings, popular assemblies, Camp Meetings, and local congregations; and spending the interim between speaking engagements in intensive office work. His sudden death at fifty-two years of age was deeply lamented throughout the Church.

* Robert L. Dashiell (1826-80) was born in Salisbury, Md. In 1846 he graduated from Dickinson College, and in 1848 was received on trial in the Baltimore Conference. His first appointment was to the West River Circuit. In 1868 he was elected president of Dickinson College, continuing until 1872, the year of his election as Corresponding Secretary.—M. Simpson, Ed., op. cit., p. 276; Christian Advocate, LV (1880), 22 (May 27), 345; Sixty-second Ann. Rep., M. S. (1880), p. 31.

† Thomas M. Eddy (1823-74) was born near Cincinnati, Ohio. In 1842 he was received on trial in the Indiana Conference, continuing in the pastorate in that Conference until 1853. Subsequent appointments were: 1854-55, agent of the American Bible Society; 1855-56, Presiding Elder of the Indianapolis District; 1856-68, editor, Northwestern Christian Advocate; 1869-72, Charles Street (later, Mount Vernon Place) Church, Baltimore; 1872, Metropolitan Church, Washington, D. C.—Minutes, Baltimore Conference, 1875, pp. 32 ff.; Christian Advocate, XLIX (1874), 42 (Oct. 15), 332 f.; ibid., 43 (Oct. 22), 338 f.

At the time of his election as Corresponding Secretary John M. Reid * was editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate, having succeeded Eddy in the editorship in 1868. Like Dashiell, he had also been a college administrator—president of Genesee College (Lima, New York), 1858-64. A man of diverse gifts, a persuasive though not a brilliant preacher, a scholarly writer, a capable executive, although somewhat overly inclined to conservatism, Reid proved to be a tower of strength during a trying period in the life of the Missionary Society. Not least among his noteworthy services to the Church was the writing—during years of heavy administrative responsibility—of Missions and Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church,³⁶ which for many years was the standard history of missions of American Methodism.†

Following the death of T. M. Eddy, for the remainder of the quadrennium the administrative responsibility of the Missionary Society was carried by two Secretaries. Whether from motives of economy—the Society being heavily in debt—or for other reasons not apparent from the record, the General Conference of 1876 altered the constitution, specifying two Secretaries only, and Dashiell and Reid were re-elected.³⁷ In 1880, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Secretary Dashiell, Charles H. Fowler‡ was chosen. His

* John M. Reid (1820-96) was born in New York City of Irish immigrant parentage. At nineteen he graduated from the University of the City of New York (N. Y. U.). He then studied (1839-41) in Union Theological Seminary, thereafter teaching for three years in the Mechanics Institute School, at the same time engaging in religious work in prisons and asylums and among sailors and dock workers. In 1844 he was admitted on trial in the New York Conference and appointed to Wolcottville. For fourteen years he continued in the pastorate, his appointments including Middletown, Conn. (1851-52); Seventh Street Church, New York City (1853-54); and Bridgeport, Conn. (1857). At the General Conference of 1864 he was elected editor of the Western Christian Advocate. For thirty-two years (1856-88) he was a member of all quadrennial sessions of the General Conference. In 1874 he declined election as Bishop of the Methodist Church in Canada.—Minutes, Michigan Conference, 1896, pp. 87 ff.; Christian Advocate, LXXI (1896), 21 (May 21), 336; ibid., 30 (July 23), 492; Dictionary of American Biography, XV, 478 f.

† The resolution authorizing "the preparation . . . of a Complete History of our Missions, by, or under the direction of the Corresponding Secretaries, or either of them," was passed by the Board of Managers on Dec. 18, 1877. The resolution included a directive specifying that the work "should be issued by the Book Agents at the lowest net price." The history had been in process previous to this action. On Sept. 18, 1877, the Board had requested the appointment of J. T. Gracey to assist in its preparation "under the title of Assistant Recording Secretary of the Missionary Society . . ."—Minutes, B.M., VII, 532, 551 f.

‡ Charles Henry Fowler (1837-1908) was born in Burford, Ontario, Canada. In his childhood his parents moved to a farm near Newark, Ill. He graduated in 1859 from Genesee College, Lima, N. Y., where "he majored in mathematics, oratory, and mischief, ranking high in each." He was valedictorian of the class of 1861 of Garrett Biblical Institute and the same year was received on trial in the Rock River Conference and appointed to Jefferson Street Church, Chicago. He continued in the pastorate for twelve years. In 1873 he was elected president of Northwestern University and in 1876 editor of the Christian Advocate. His highest ambition was attained in 1884 when the General Conference made him Bishop. His collected addresses were published in four volumes: Missions and World Movements (1903); Missionary Addresses (1906); Addresses on Notable Occasions (1908); and Patriotic Orations (1910).—Annual Report, Board of Foreign Missions, 1908, pp. 7 f.; Charles J. Little, "Charles Henry Fowler, 1837-1908." Methodist Review, XCIII (March-April, 1911), 175 ff., 183 f.; Dictionary of American Biography, VI, 562; Gen'l Minutes, 1861, pp. 205, 211.

election came to him, it has been said, as a welcome relief from the work of an editor, for which he was not highly qualified. His gifts were not primarily journalistic, his greater powers being those of the orator, the planner, and the executive. Early in his ministry he had revealed his interest and faith in Christian missions in a sermon on "The Divinity of the Missionary Idea"—an interest which never flagged during his years as Secretary and later as Vice President (1884-1904) and President (1904-08) of the Missionary Society. During his brief term of four years as Corresponding Secretary his addresses did much to revitalize the interest and missionary outlook of the Church. His addresses at mission meetings and conferences with missionaries and native workers on plans, policies, and methods, in the course of his episcopal visits to the foreign fields, were inspiring and valuable.

The election of Fowler as Bishop in 1884 again created a vacancy in the secretaryship and, in addition to Reid, the General Conference elected Charles C. McCabe* ("Chaplain McCabe"), the most picturesque of all Methodist Missionary Secretaries. He was on terms of understanding fellowship with all sorts of men; in fact he was, in a good sense, what Mark Twain remarks of one of his characters, "all sorts of a man himself." His sympathy with the unfortunate and afflicted knew no bounds; his capture and incarceration in Libby Prison resulted from his disregard for personal safety in ministering to the wounded and the dying on the Winchester battlefield (June 16, 1863). He had little regard for ecclesiastical legalisms which he deemed unreasonable, such as the requirement of the Ohio Conference that a preacher must not marry until he had been a Conference member for two years. He often remarked that he "married first and read the rule afterwards, for he was afraid some one would carry Beccie off if he waited." He was more a voracious reader than a scholar, although in his younger years he had scholarly ambitions.† He was a ready speaker and a good singer. He had personal magnetism, overflowing optimism, abounding good humor, the courage of initiative, and ability in leadership. He was an activist, much more in his element out in the field journeying from one Conference to another and from church to church, giving missionary addresses, lecturing, and plead-

* Charles Cardwell McCabe (1836-1906) was born in Athens, Ohio, of English-Irish parents who were devout Methodists. From childhood he appeared destined for the ministry and at eighteen entered the preparatory department of Ohio Wesleyan University. At Ironton, Ohio, where for two years he was principal of the high school, he married Rebecca Peters. In 1860 he was received on trial in the Ohio Conference. He was chiefly instrumental in recruiting the 122nd Regiment of the Ohio Volunteer Infantry, of which he was appointed chaplain on Oct. 8, 1862. After recovering from the effects of four months' incarceration in Libby Prison, he entered the service of the Christian Commission (1864-65). During a brief period as financial agent of Ohio Wesleyan he raised $87,000. for the university. His ability in money-raising led to his appointment as Assistant Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Church Extension (1872-84). In December, 1902, he was elected chancellor of American University.—Frank Milton Bristol, The Life of Chaplain McCabe, Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church, passim; see also Christian Advocate, LXXXI (1906), 52 (Dec. 27), 2027 ff.; Dictionary of American Biography, XI, 557 f.

† In Libby Prison he organized a "college" with classes in numerous subjects, including Latin, Greek, geometry, and natural philosophy. His letters to his wife, written in prison, contain such passages as these: "I am making a careful and critical study of the Bible"; "I am studying French and Butler's Analogy"; "I commit to memory and make a commentary upon a Psalm each day"; "I . . . have procured a German grammar and will enter upon its study to-day."—F. M. Bristol, op. cit., p. 55.

ing for money, than in the Board office engaged with committee meetings, correspondence, and desk work. Soon after his election as Corresponding Secretary he sounded the slogan, "A million for missions" from collections only, and successfully led the Church in reaching the goal. Methodism possessed no more widely popular leader and it was no surprise when in 1896 he was elected a Bishop.³⁸

In 1888 John M. Reid, after sixteen years as Corresponding Secretary—next to that of John P. Durbin the longest tenure up to that time in the secretaryship—declined re-election and was given the title of Secretary Emeritus. For the second time since 1845 the General Conference decided that three co-ordinate Secretaries were needed. In addition to McCabe, Jonas O. Peck * and Adna B. Leonard were elected. Dr. Peck, during his tenure of six years—terminated by his death in 1894—served with noteworthy effectiveness, particularly in representing the Missionary Society at the Annual Conferences.³⁹

Adna B. Leonard, † elected Corresponding Secretary "in his fifty-first year without other special qualification than might be assumed in any capable pastor and able 'platform man' . . . lived to confound all the prophets of failure." For one thing, unlike many of the men elected to official position in the Church he had no other ambition than to serve faithfully in the office for which the General Conference had chosen him. For twenty-four years, two years longer than the tenure of John P. Durbin, his guiding motto was "this one thing I do." Always "his boundless activity was released . . . for the cause and never for himself." His principal characteristics as an administrator were indefatigable industry, thorough investigation, and persistency in advocating the plans and policies in which he believed.⁴⁰

During the early decades of the Missionary Society a personal acquaintance with the overseas mission fields was not considered an essential qualification of Corresponding Secretaries. But Durbin's visit to Europe in 1866 and Dashiell's "visit of inspection" to Mexico in 1877-78 were of such value to the Society and to the missions that they established a precedent regularly followed thereafter. In 1881 Secretary Reid visited the missions in Europe.

* Jonas O. Peck (1836-94) was born at Groton, Vt. At twenty-four he was admitted on trial in the New England Conference and appointed to North Amherst. His intellectual vigor, religious earnestness, and oratorical power soon brought him into prominence as a preacher and during twenty-eight years in the pastorate he served some of the largest churches in Methodism. He was notably successful as an evangelist, during his three years as pastor of Hanson Place Church, Brooklyn, receiving 925 persons into membership.—Seventy-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1894), p. 20; editorial, Christian Advocate, LXIX (1894), 21 (May 24), 325; Minutes, New England Conference, 1860, pp. 3, 9; Minutes, New York East Conference, 1895, pp. 107 ff.

† Adna Bradway Leonard (1837-1916) was born in Berlin Township, Mahoning County, Ohio, in a pioneer Methodist home which he graphically pictured years afterwards as "knots on the logs, mother at the spinning wheel, father on the cobbler's bench, and the whole family at the family altar." As he was about to enter Mount Union College, Ohio, he was persuaded by an impatient Presiding Elder to take a preaching appointment. He was received on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference in 1860 and appointed to Marlboro Circuit. By perseverance in non-resident study he later won his undergraduate degree from Mount Union. Twenty-eight years were spent in the pastorate, his appointments including several prominent churches in Pittsburgh and in Ohio. For one term he was Presiding Elder of the East Cincinnati District, Cincinnati Conference. In 1885 he was the nominee of the Prohibition Party for governor of Ohio.—Christian Advocate, XCI (1916), 17 (April 27), 552 f.; Annual Report, Board of Foreign Missions, 1916, pp. 444 ff.; Minutes, Pittsburgh Conference, 1860, p. 7.

In his annual report for that year, Leroy M. Vernon, Superintendent of the Italy Mission, said:

[Dr. J. M. Reid visited] all our principal stations, looking into and familiarizing himself . . . with the interests of the work. His services and intercourse with our people gave great satisfaction every-where, and all were gratified with the thought that henceforth at the center of missionary operations there will be one, who, from personal observation, knows something at least of our circumstances, our position, and ourselves.⁴¹

The following year the North India Conference formally invited a visit from "the corresponding secretary . . . who has special charge of India" and the Board authorized Secretary Reid "in the discharge of official duties" to accompany Bishop Foster to India. The Missionary Society Report for 1883 stated that the visit "was remarkable, as being the first made by a Methodist Missionary Secretary to any Oriental land, and the information gained . . . has proved most helpful in the administration of India affairs . . ." ⁴²

The first secretarial visit to Japan was made by Dr. Leonard, accompanied by Mrs. S. L. Keen, representing the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, in 1893. The China missions also were visited on the same trip. During his long term of service Leonard traveled more extensively throughout the mission fields than any of his predecessors, accumulating an immense fund of firsthand information invaluable in administration of his office as Missionary Secretary.

MISSIONARY INCOME INCREASES

A gradual trend in the direction of increased missionary receipts* became evident in the middle forties and continued year by year, in part accounted for by membership growth. By the closing year of the quadrennium 1848-52 receipts reached $152,482. The rate of increase was further accelerated in the sixties. Extraordinary government expenditures on account of war called for large issues of new currency and the abundance of money in circulation was reflected in larger contributions to all benevolent causes, including missions. Total missionary receipts for 1863 were $429,768.; for 1866, $686,380. For several years following the close of the war missionary income was lower but by 1872 again had climbed to $661,056. By the close of the period, the fiscal year 1894-95, it was $1,174,554.⁴³

While the general trend of income was gradually upward throughout the half century, marked fluctuations occurred, chiefly caused by periodic economic depressions. The most serious were those of 1873-78, 1883-85, and 1893-96. During the first, and most extended, of these, wages declined approximately 15 per cent; doctors, dentists, and lawyers reduced their fees about one-half

* As an inevitable effect of division of the Church, involving separation of the southern Conferences, income of the Missionary Society for 1845-46 was lessened. The decrease, however, was not as much as might have been expected. In fact, income from the Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church increased.

and many churches lowered their ministers' salaries. Within these years the income of the Missionary Society fell from $661,056. in 1872 to $553,159. in 1879. The depression of 1883-85 was much shorter in duration and less acute and affected missionary giving for one year only, receipts declining from $753,669. in the fiscal year 1882-83 to $735,225. in 1883-84. The serious effect of the financially trying period of 1893-96 was not felt until 1896-97 when the Society's income was $88,098.81 less* than the preceding year.⁴⁴

Increasing receipts made possible an expanding program and larger appropriations to both domestic and foreign missions. For 1845-46 total appropriations were $49,700.; for 1855, $260,000.; 1865, $625,903.; 1875, $821,853.; 1886,† $909,115. (exclusive of appropriation toward liquidation of debt); 1895, $1,071,145.

Division of appropriations between domestic and foreign missions varied from decade to decade.‡ Proportionate division between domestic and foreign missions was affected by the realization that a mission within a home Conference could be more or less readily discontinued while the establishment of an overseas mission in effect involved a committal for a term of years. Caution had been learned through experience with the South America and Oregon Missions, both of which had to be curtailed because of decrease in income during the depression of 1837-41. In the instance of the China Mission the precaution was taken of soliciting subscriptions covering a term of years. At the 1845 anniversary meeting a "good and responsible brother" offered "to be one of a requisite number" to contribute $100. annually for ten years toward support of the China Mission, and several others made similar commitments. As a result of this plan the General Missionary Committee at its annual meeting on May 3, 1847, included China in the list of foreign missions for "the ensuing year." Six thousand dollars was appropriated, increased in 1849 to $7,000.⁴⁵

Under the inspiration of the immensely augmented income§ of the war years the General Missionary Committee appropriated for the year 1865 $625,903.; and for 1866, $1,000,000. In making the latter appropriation the committee failed to take into account a decrease which might follow wartime inflation. The million dollar program of 1866 emptied the swollen treasury.

* It is of interest to contrast the experience of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society in this particular: "The curve of national income and that of missionary revenue, during the century, exhibit no general correspondence; they are governed by wholly different forces. . . . The Society was born at an epoch of unparalleled economic distress; its income mounted up unchecked through 'the hungry thirties' and forties; and Lancashire, suffering then severely from the cotton famine, took the lead in the Missionary Jubilee givings of 1863. On the other hand, the fund has shown the least elasticity during the last generation, in a stretch of years during which the wealth of England swelled beyond all precedent, and the rate of expenditure and style of living, in almost every class of the community, was constantly rising."—G. G. Findlay and W. W. Holdsworth, op. cit., I, 186.

† The year 1886 is used instead of 1885 because receipts for the year 1884 were abnormally low on account of the 1883-85 depression.

‡ In 1845-46 the division was slightly less than 57% to domestic missions, 43% to foreign missions, 1855, 71%, 29%; 1865, 45%, 55%; 1875, 53%, 47%; 1885, 50%, 50%; 1895, 45%, 55%.

§ In the early years of the war rapid expansion, either at home or abroad, was impossible because of disturbed conditions, and funds flowed into the treasury more rapidly than they could be expended. By the close of 1864, there was on hand an accumulated surplus of $267,292. and at the close of 1865, $385,694.

Receipts for 1867 were $613,021., or $386,979. less than the appropriation for the preceding year. Many of the new enterprises were of such a nature that appropriations to them could not be reduced without serious consequences. As a result, by the close of 1867 the Missionary Society found itself $32,584. in arrears; by the end of 1868, $84,195. in debt. The deficit, accentuated by the depression beginning in 1873, had mounted by the end of a decade (1876) to $209,388., a sum which seriously endangered the Society's credit.⁴⁶

Up to the close of the period (1895), and beyond, the Society was embarrassed by debt. Again and again the most serious problem confronting the managers was the finding of ways and means of reducing indebtedness sufficiently to protect the Society's credit. The successive peaks reached in depression years were: in 1883, $250,088.; 1888, $304,298.; 1893, $404,701.; and 1895, $498,060.⁴⁷ Twice only during the long stretch of twenty-nine years the Board enjoyed a breathing spell of a few months under impression that the burden of indebtedness had been permanently lifted. In 1891 the experience of 1866 was repeated. The Treasurer having reported at the close of the fiscal year income of $1,251,057., an excess over disbursements of $100,198., an amount sufficient to leave a balance in the treasury of $31,277., the General Missionary Committee appropriated $1,225,367. for the next fiscal year (1892), an increase in appropriations of $25,367., which the committee "regarded as sufficiently conservative," but at the close of 1893 the Society was again seriously in arrears and by 1895, as shown above, the debt stood at the highest point of the entire period.⁴⁸

Burdensome as the debt was to the officers of the Society, its full impact was felt not so much by them as by the missionaries. Year after year appeals from the far fields of China, India, and Africa for replacement of furloughed or retired workers or for modest increases to take advantage of opportunities for advance were denied because debt claims had first to be met. The General Missionary Committee, reporting to the 1880 General Conference, stated:

The Foreign Missions were . . . allowed, for most of the quadrennium, barely enough to sustain the work in hand, but nothing to make advances, a sore trial to our self-denying and energetic brethren in far-off fields.⁴⁹

The mistake made was in not setting aside a substantial portion of income in the abnormally flush years of the war, and later, as an emergency reserve to be drawn upon as needed in periods of depression. If this had been done many thousands of dollars paid out as interest on debt would have been saved, anxieties and problems caused by recurring years of shrinking income obviated, and much more even advance through the decades made possible.

Sources of missionary income, other than collections in the churches, included several that produced substantial amounts. A principal source during early years was payments made by "life members," and by "donors," the former contributing $20. at one time, the latter, $100. Later, other special designations of individual givers were instituted.*

For many years payments by the government for schools conducted by the Church among the Indians were made annually. In the fiscal year 1845-46 the total received by the Missionary Society was $1,825. The amount fluctuated from year to year and from decade to decade on account of changes of policy of the Indian office.⁵⁰

Two other important sources of income were legacies† and annuities. In 1870 the Treasurers reported receipts from legacies (over a ten-month period) to the amount of $12,194.; twenty-five years later (1895), $86,262. Beginning as early as 1845 annuity contributions "subject to interest during the life of contributors" gradually increased until in 1881 they amounted to $52,264. In 1895 outstanding annuity bonds totaled $324,635. For many years lapsed annuities were treated as current income and applied on annual appropriations. Later they were paid into a permanent fund account.⁵¹

In contrast to innumerable small contributions, ranging from a few cents to several dollars, from time to time some munificent gifts came to the treasury. For years Harold Dollner,‡ a member of the Board of Managers, annually contributed $1,000. to the Society, which he eventually made his residuary legatee. From his estate the treasury received about $100,000. F. L. Ingram, stated to possess "considerable estates" in the Meerut District, Northwest India Conference, for a time made a contribution of $1,000. a year to the work of the Rubbapura Circuit. At a time of special emergency in the missionary program in India Secretary John M. Reid came to its rescue with a gift of $15,000. from his personal funds. A general missionary conference held in Shanghai in 1890 appealed for a thousand missionaries to be sent to China. In response to the appeal Mr. F. H. Rindge and Mrs. M. K. Rindge each contributed $1,000. to be used only for China Methodist missions. Over a series of years substantial contributions were made at intervals by Dr.

* Names of life members were regularly listed in the Annual Reports of the Missionary Society. The 1845-46 Annual Report carried the names of some thirty-eight hundred life members and approximately 125 donors. By 1875 the number of life members constituted in that year was 219; the number of "honorary life managers," constituted by the payment of $150. or more at one time, was 1,521; and "patrons," constituted by payment of $500. or more at one time, numbered 356.—Fifty-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. (1875), pp. 172 ff.

† A legacy received in 1845 was recorded as follows:

"Mrs. Catherine Garretson, the bequest of her late husband, the Rev. Freeborn Garretson, the annual support of a single Meth. missionary within the bounds of the New-York Conf., until the millennium [$]2000."—Treasurers' Account, Twenty-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. (1845-46), p. 49.

‡ Harold Dollner was a native of Denmark. In his youth he became a sailor. Landing on one of his voyages in Boston he wandered into the Mariners' Bethel and was converted under the preaching of Father Taylor. He later went into business in New York, where he accumulated a fortune. He served for years as consul-general of Denmark to the United States. He became a member of the Board of Managers in 1876, continuing through 1886. In addition to his contributions to the Missionary Society he made substantial gifts to the Methodist church in Copenhagen, eventually freeing it entirely from debt.—J. M. Reid and J. T. Gracey, Missions and Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, II, 223 f., 230 f.; J. M. Buckley, A History of Methodists in the United States, pp. 656 f.; Fifty-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. (1875), p. 2; ibid., 67th (1885), p. 3.

and Mrs. John F. Goucher, including $5,000. toward the erection of the "Isabella Fisher Hospital" for women in Tientsin; $10,000. for the library and for scholarships in the Methodist Missionary Seminary in Yokohama; $5,000. toward the establishment of the West China Mission and a second contribution of $5,000. toward its maintenance; and $7,000. for the theological department of the Anglo-Chinese College in Foochow.* Mrs. Adeline M. Smith, from the accumulated proceeds of an estate originally valued at $125,000., made donations to the amount of more than $135,000., including a gift of $9,900. toward the founding and support of a Bible Institute in Tokyo, Japan, later named the Philander Smith Biblical Institute; $11,221. to a Memorial Hospital, Nanking, China; and $16,033. to found the Philander Smith Institute, Mussooree, India.⁵²

Throughout the period, as earlier, the propriety of designated gifts and of solicitation of funds for particular projects remained a moot question.† From time to time changes were made in the regulations of the Society, and no consistent policy was followed by the Board.⁵³ The difficulty arose in part from the insistent demand of contributors to designate the specific purpose to which their individual contributions should be applied.‡

Reflecting considerable questioning that had arisen in the Church at large concerning administrative expenses of the several boards and the General Missionary Committee, the 1880 General Conference called for a detailed statement of cost of administration. Missionary Secretary Reid reported almost immediately that the "expenses of the General Missionary Committee" for the preceding year had been only $3,618. Administrative expenditures of the Missionary Society were maintained throughout the period at a remarkably low level.§

A FORWARD MOVEMENT IN CHURCH BUILDING

Missionary Society grants included provision of funds for the sustenance of preachers and their families but not for aid in building churches. There could be no question that urgent need existed for such aid over a wide area. Everywhere within the region to which the Homestead Act of 1862 applied

* Other contributions were: $5,000. in 1879 to the Book Concern in Germany for liquidation of its debt; $5,000. for the benefit of the Martin Mission Institute (Germany); endowment for "a system of fifty primary schools," to be connected with the Central High School in Moradabad, India; $5,000. toward the purchase of a site for an "Anglo-Japanese University" at Tokyo; "$800. a year for five years toward the salary of an American professor, and $400. a year for five years to the salary of a Japanese professor"; and $2,000. to aid in opening a mission in Korea.—See Annual Reports: 61st (1879), p. 71; 64th (1882), p. 142; 66th (1884), p. 204; Minutes, B. M., VIII, 9, 35.

† See Vol. I, 309 f.

‡ So strong was the desire of contributors to choose the projects to which their gifts were applied that in numerous local churches "voluntary missionary societies" were organized which disposed of their funds without reporting to the Missionary Society. In their address to the 1856 General Conference the Bishops called attention "with regret and serious apprehension" to the increase in number of such societies.—"Journal of the General Conference, 1856," pp. 287 f., G. C. Journals, III.

§ Secretary McCabe reported in 1887 that of every dollar contributed for missions .927 went into direct missionary appropriations; .023 to the contingent fund for missionary emergencies; .0274 to incidental missionary expenses; .0135 to Board salaries and office expense; .0091 to publication and distribution of missionary literature.—C. C. McCabe, "What Does It Cost?" Gospel in All Lands, September, 1887, p. 429.

small Methodist Societies had been formed by the Circuit Riders. The cash income of the immigrants for years was extremely limited. In the older Conferences of the East and the Middle West where heavy timber made suitable lumber readily available building costs were within the means of small Societies but in the plains country of the Dakotas, western Kansas and Nebraska, Montana, and Wyoming, the expense of building even a modest frame church was prohibitive. For dwellings the settlers could build comfortable sod houses reasonably ample in size but sod buildings did not meet the need for churches.

On the fifth day of its 1864 session the General Conference adopted a resolution instructing the Committee on Missions* to "inquire into the expediency of forming a 'General Church Extension Society,' † with a view of securing more ample Church accommodations," particularly in the Conferences and missions of the new West. The resolution was keyed to a note of urgency, the committee being also instructed to "report at an early day."

On the afternoon of the final day of the General Conference session the report ‡ was adopted.⁵⁴ On January 3, 1865, the officers and managers were appointed and on March 13 the Society was incorporated by act of the Pennsylvania Legislature.§ In July the Bishops appointed as Corresponding Secretary Samuel Y. Monroe # of the Newark Conference.⁵⁵

The Corresponding Secretary, Board, and General Committee projected a program on an ambitious scale, beginning operations without sufficiently taking into account possible complications and liabilities, with the result that

* On the eighth day of the session a similar resolution was adopted, addressed to the Committee on Temporal Economy.—G. C. Journal, 1864, p. 130.

† A Chapel Fund Committee had been organized by the Wesleyan Societies of England in 1818 to assist distressed churches and later on to help provide chapels where needed. Within the United States the Presbyterian, Congregational, and Baptist Churches had organized special agencies and raised funds for the latter purpose.—A. J. Kynett, "Church Extension," Methodist Quarterly Review, LIV (April, 1872), 271 ff.

‡ In the procedure following the Committee on Missions prepared "A Plan for Church Extension Society," suggesting reference to the Committee on Temporal Economy, which was done. When the report came up for final action two adverse motions were laid on the table and the report was adopted. A committee was designated, Bishop Simpson, chairman, with authority to name a board of officers and managers, and the Bishops were directed, on incorporation of the Board, to appoint a Corresponding Secretary.

§ The constitution, as approved by the General Conference of 1864, vested "the management and disposition of the affairs and property" of the Society in a Board of Managers of twenty-five laymen and not more than that number of ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, all of whom were to be elected at the annual meeting of the Society. It also provided for a General Committee consisting of one member from each of "as many districts as there are effective superintendents," to be appointed by the Bishops "to act jointly with the Board of Managers, the Corresponding Secretary, and the Treasurer, in fixing the amounts which may be donated and loaned . . . [annually], and the division of said amounts among the several Annual Conferences and societies applying for aid." The constitution required that the Corresponding Secretary should be elected by the General Conference and that he should reside in Philadelphia. It also recommended that the Annual Conferences should establish auxiliary Conference Church Extension Societies. (G. C. Journal, 1864, Appendix, pp. 492-94.) The constitution, in several particulars, was amended by the General Conference of 1868.—Ibid., 1868, Appendix, pp. 555-59.

Samuel York Monroe (1816-67), born at Mt. Holly, N. J., was received on trial in the New Jersey Conference in 1843, and served with distinction in the pastorate for twenty-two years preceding appointment as Corresponding Secretary. In his brief period as Secretary he "visited and addressed some fifty conferences" upon the subject of church extension, besides preaching "once or twice nearly every Sabbath" and conducting an extensive correspondence.—Gen'l Minutes, 1867, pp. 38 f.

within two years the Society found itself in a financial crisis* which threatened its continuation.† Difficulties were increased by the sudden death of the Secretary, who “fell or was thrown from the rear platform of a [railway] car, . . . dashed against the rocks, and instantly killed” on February 9, 1867. Three months later the Bishops appointed as his successor Alpha J. Kynett ‡ of the Upper Iowa Conference whose appeals to General Conference had been chiefly responsible for bringing the Society into existence. Kynett’s vigorous, judicious administrative measures soon lifted the Society out of its chaotic condition so that the Bishops in their address to the 1868 General Conference were able to say that the Church Extension Society “is now upon a safe foundation.” The Conference elected Kynett Corresponding Secretary on the first ballot.⁵⁶ This same year Charles C. McCabe was appointed by the Bishops and the Board financial agent and in 1872 Assistant Corresponding Secretary.

In the beginning the extension program was planned on the assumption that the older and well-established Annual Conferences would, out of their abundance, contribute the principal part of the funds needed for church building in the West. Within a few months it became evident that urgent demands for new or improved church edifices would be made by every Conference, in the East as well as in the West. At the first annual meeting of the Society the Corresponding Secretary stated in his report:

One fact which could not escape notice is, that in order to secure cordial and efficient co-operation of the whole Church, provision must be made to meet necessitous cases existing in all parts of the work, the older as well as the newer.⁵⁷

The ending of the war shortly after the organization of the Society, and the action of the Methodist Episcopal Church soon thereafter in largely extending its operations in the South, deeply impressed the Society with the need for larger church extension work also in the South. The statement of disbursements in its Second Annual Report showed appropriations made to the

* By July, 1867, more than $50,000. of drafts were outstanding against the Society, of which many had been protested; the treasury was without bank credit; and less than $3,500. a month was coming in from the churches. Rigorous measures were resorted to; members of the Board lent their personal credit to redeem drafts that had been hypothecated; unused outstanding drafts were required to be returned; and churches in whose behalf they had been prematurely issued were promised aid only as subsequent receipts would justify. “In this way, by the time the General Conference of 1868 assembled the Society had been relieved of its most serious embarrassments, and the confidence of the Church in good measure restored.”—A. J. Kynett, op. cit., LIV (April, 1872), 286 f.

† One proposal made in the 1868 General Conference was the consolidation of church extension with the work of the Missionary Society. The proposition was considered in at least five different committees including the Missionary and Church Extension Committees, Freedmen’s Aid, a Committee to Inquire into the Practicability of Reducing the Number of Collections, and a Committee of Conference from the several committees. All five voted against consolidation.

‡ Alpha Jefferson Kynett (1829-99), born in Pennsylvania, migrated with his father’s family successively to Trumbull County, Ohio, to Rush County, Ind., and in 1842 to Des Moines County, Iowa. Although he had few educational advantages he early became a public school teacher, was licensed to preach, and in 1851 was appointed to the Dubuque Circuit. The next year he was received on trial in the Iowa Conference and in 1856 became one of the charter members of the Upper Iowa Conference. It has been justly stated that he was “both the originator and builder” of the Church Extension Society. He was also a strong advocate of lay representation for both men and women. He represented the Upper Iowa Conference in nine successive General Conferences. “Nothing of great moment to the church or society escaped him. He was an ecclesiastical statesman.”—Minutes, Upper Iowa Conference, 1899, pp. 356-59.

Baltimore, East Baltimore, Erie, Newark, New York, New Jersey, New York East, and Philadelphia Conferences in the East, and the Central Ohio, Detroit, Northwest Indiana, and Southeastern Indiana in the Midwest; also that large appropriations had been made to the Kentucky ($9,445.27), Tennessee ($11,760), and Holston ($4,666.14) Conferences.⁵⁸

In fact, so numerous and urgent were the demands made upon the Society by the older Annual Conferences and the new work in the South that its General Committee felt impelled at its second annual session (November 13-18, 1867) to take action permitting any Conference which should decide that it needed within its own bounds a portion of the funds raised for church extension "to use any amount not exceeding fifty per cent of the whole," forwarding only the balance to the Board.⁵⁹

The reports of the Society for the early years furnish striking examples of the beneficence of its work. At Beaufort, South Carolina, a church of two hundred Negroes was organized to which $75. toward cost of a building was granted.

With the . . . donation they have procured one acre of ground, worth $50., a plain log church with shingled roof, 28x42, sufficient to seat 250 persons, and worth $500. They now have 241 members, 29 probationers, and a Sunday School of 5 officers and teachers, and 95 scholars. . . . They have contributed their grounds and buildings, $475

At Corinne, Utah, a grant of $1,000. made possible the building of the first church, other than Mormon, in the territory.

Encouraged and stimulated by the promise of $1,000., the congregation . . . pledged $1,100. . . . The next day the amount was carried up to $1,500. With this amount a lot worth $500. was purchased, an architect employed, [and] the contract for building let, The church is a plain substantial brick, 26x50 feet, . . . and is worth besides the grounds, $5,000, . . . and they have organized with 20 members, 50 Sunday School children, and have a congregation of 150, regularly increasing. The population . . . is 1,500, and it is estimated will double within a year. . . . The Pastor and his wife organized a seminary with over 60 students of both sexes

[The Utah Reporter said of it:] 'The school . . . is quite a faithful daguerreotype of our mixed population—Hebrew, Yankee, English, Mormon and Gentile, native born Californian and Utah children mingled in a pleasing variety,' ⁶⁰

By January 1, 1872, the Society had received in contributions from churches and individuals $489,303.64 with which 733 local churches had been aided.⁶¹

In 1872, by General Conference action, the Church Extension Society was superseded by the Board of Church Extension.⁶² The legislation provided that the Board should consist of thirty-two ministers and thirty-two laymen, to be elected, together with the Corresponding Secretary, by the General Conference, and should be subject to the control of the General Conference.*

In the summer of 1879 Assistant Secretary McCabe made "an extensive tour through the North-west" which convinced him that "the proportion of . . . [the] regular collections that could properly be applied" to the region "was utterly inadequate to existing want and opportunity." He was inspired by what he saw to establish a Frontier Fund to meet the special need. His conviction was that in many cases a donation of $250., in some instances supplemented by a loan, would make possible the erection of a church costing from $1,200. upward. He accordingly appealed "for special gifts of $250. each to the aggregate amount of $100,000. with which to procure the erection of four hundred new churches on the frontier." With great earnestness he gave himself to the promotion of the fund. Within three years 141 churches, mostly in the West and Northwest, had been aided. By 1895 not only 400 but a total of 559 churches had been given assistance to the amount of $140,000.⁶³ On a particular occasion, in his introduction to his Libby Prison lecture, McCabe said:

Many a time when the pastor of a church would have announced that I would speak on church extension or the missionary cause when we needed money I have said to him, 'Announce that I will lecture on "The Bright Side of Life in Libby Prison."' And then how the people would turn out! I talked to them of Libby Prison and then of church extension. I let them in free and charged them for going out. Many and many a time they paid a thousand dollars to go out, and I have found out from careful investigation that fully one hundred and fifty thousand dollars have gone into churches and parsonages and into the pockets of poor preachers in this way during these forty years and more.⁶⁴

With the election of McCabe as Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society (1884), William A. Spencer† was appointed in 1885 to succeed him as Assistant Corresponding Secretary of Church Extension.

The policy of the Board as to the amount of aid to be extended to a particular church stipulated that no application from a church costing more than ten thousand dollars would be considered unless such church had consulted the Board before commencing to build, and that no church costing over $20,000. should "in any case, receive aid, either by donation or loan from the

* The legislation also provided that each Annual Conference should "on the nomination of the Presiding Bishop and Presiding Elders, appoint a Conference Board of Church Extension." Another important provision concerned the membership and powers of the General Committee of Church Extension. It was to be composed of the Bishops, the Corresponding Secretary and Assistants, Recording Secretary, and the Treasurer, one member from each of twelve Church Extension Districts elected by General Conference and an equal number appointed by the Board, and empowered to determine: (1) What amount each Conference should be asked "to raise by collections for the uses of the Board during the ensuing year"; (2) "What amount may be donated and loaned within each Conference during the same period"; and (3) "What amount may be applied to general and special purposes."—G. C. Journal, 1872, p. 339.

† William Anson Spencer (1840-1901), born in Rock Island, Ill., a graduate of Northwestern University (1861) and of Garrett Biblical Institute (1867), was received on trial in the Central Illinois Conference in 1867. With Bishop Harris he visited many of the missions of the Far East in 1873. Transferring to the Rock River Conference in 1875, he was soon recognized as one of its most able ministers. After seven years as Assistant Secretary, he was elected by the General Conference of 1892 Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Church Extension in association with A. J. Kynett. "In his wide travel, he not only formed a large acquaintance, but became rich in friendships . . ." It was said of him that "in a marked degree he possessed elementary qualities of friendship—sincerity, cheerfulness, geniality, generosity, constancy." His death at sixty-one was felt as a loss to the entire Church.—Minutes, Rock River Conference, 1901, pp. 103 ff.

funds of the Board." This latter rule was not, however, rigidly adhered to, exception being made in several instances.⁶⁵ Within a short time after organization the Board changed its policy and extended aid to churches needing assistance independently of their location. A study made in 1879 showed that 501 donations and 110 loans had been made to churches in the Northeast; 664 donations and 253 loans in the Northwest; 967 and 178 respectively in the Southeast; and 266 and 71 respectively in the Southwest. By the close of the period (1895) $5,498,803.25 had been received on the General Fund and the Loan Fund and 9,785 churches had been aided.⁶⁶

THE WORK OF WOMEN FOR WOMEN ABROAD

A great forward movement in the missionary program of the Methodist Episcopal Church was inaugurated when in 1869 the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society was organized and in 1884 made by the General Conference an official organization of the Church.

The initial impulse for organization came from the mission field. Mrs. Edwin W. Parker* and her husband, who had arrived in India in 1859, had become widely known as effective and influential missionaries. When Mrs. Parker was leaving on her first furlough several missionary wives appealed to her in behalf of the women of India. Tell the people about the conditions under which they live, they said, that women can be reached only by women, that funds are needed to enlist and train native helpers and to publish literature especially for women, and that no financial assistance can be secured from the Missionary Society. Some years later she wrote to William A. Mansell:

When we reached Boston we were entertained at the Butlers and through them the way was opened to speak to the ladies in Boston. At Lowell and other places I had an opportunity to give the message. The ladies everywhere responded and I gathered quite a sum which I sent to India. After a little I felt that this was not the way to give permanent help, and it was hardly right for me to collect and send out money in this irresponsible way. I knew of the 'Ladies [Woman's] Union Missionary Society,' † and the Congregationalist ladies had just organized a So-

* Lois Stiles (Lee) Parker (1834-1925), of Congregational parentage, was born at St. Johnsbury, Vt. On March 2, 1856, she was married to Edwin W. Parker and with her husband entered Concord Biblical Institute. On Feb. 22, 1859, the husband was commissioned as missionary to India and on Oct. 14 they began their missionary career. Within two years Mrs. Parker had established at their first station a girls' day school, one of the earliest in North India. At a later period "she lived and served at . . . Wesleyport, Moradabad, Lucknow, Shahjahanpur, and Hardoi—a service . . . of sixty-six eventful years. The longest period was in Moradabad with her husband, and the second longest at Hardoi, alone." From 1892 to 1898 she was editor of Kaukab-i-Hind, an important vernacular periodical. Her most far-reaching work was the founding of three girls' schools in North India: Bijnor (now Lois Lee Parker Girls' School), the Moradabad Girls' School, and the Hardoi Girls' School (in later years discontinued). Though a duly elected delegate she knocked in vain at the door of the 1896 General Conference but later was accorded the honor of serving in the 1904 and 1908 Conferences.—J. H. Messmore, The Life of Edwin Wallace Parker, D.D., Missionary Bishop of Southern Asia . . ., pp. 33, 38 f., 42, 62; Francis Wesley Warne, A Tribute to the Triumphant, pp. 18, 23, 37, 46, 47, 50 f.

† The Woman's Union Missionary Society was organized in New York City in 1860 under the leadership of Mrs. Sarah R. Doremus. It was interdenominational in membership and in missionary personnel, patterned after the Society for the Promotion of Female Education in the East which was active for many years in England. Within the period 1860-83 the Society sent from America forty-three missionaries, supported fifty-eight others on the field; "sustained or aided 84 schools"; and "supported 174 Bible readers and 278 children." Receipts, 1861-82, were $741,939.19.—Mrs. L. H. Daggett, Ed., Historical Sketches of Woman's Missionary Societies in America and England, pp. 194-202.

ciety for woman's work * so I thought it was time for Methodist ladies to organize a Society to meet the needs of the work in India. So I began to agitate the subject wherever I went—and found a ready response to the idea—but who would dare to initiate the movement. We went West to visit my sister and on the way out and back we stopped at several places and I did all I could to interest influential ladies in the movement. Among them was Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing with whom I spent an afternoon. . . . We returned to Boston early in March 1869 with several women pledged to unite in the movement as soon as the ladies in the East would organize.⁶⁷

Dr. William Butler, who with Mrs. Butler† had returned in 1865 from nine years of missionary pioneering in India, was at this time (1869) pastor of Dorchester Street Church, South Boston. On Sunday afternoon, March 14, he preached a missionary sermon. Among his hearers were Mr. and Mrs. Lewis Flanders of the Tremont Street Church. Following the service Mrs. Butler, Mrs. Parker, and Mrs. Flanders talked of the conditions under which women in India lived, the Christian obligation of the women of America to them, and the necessity of women missionaries for their evangelization. Since they desired to proceed in cooperation with the Missionary Society the proposal for a woman's society was at this juncture communicated in a letter‡ to John P. Durbin, the Corresponding Secretary, asking counsel on organization. Under date of March 20, 1869, Dr. Durbin returned the cautious reply that it would be well to "aim at two points: 1. To raise funds for a particular portion of our mission work in India, perhaps also in China. 2. Leave [the selection of missionaries and] the administration of the work to the Board [of Managers] at home, and the Mission, in India."⁶⁸

The women had a more ambitious plan in mind. They invited the ladies of the Boston churches to hear Mrs. Parker and Mrs. Butler at Tremont Street Church on March 23. The day brought a drenching storm and only six, besides the speakers, came.§ But the intrepid eight resolved to form a separate society

* In January, 1868, the New England Women's Foreign Missionary Society was organized. In March, 1869, it was incorporated by the Massachusetts Legislature as the Woman's Board of Missions, to act in cooperation with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.

† Clementina Rowe Butler (1820-1913) was born in Wexford, Ireland, of a Wesleyan family. On Nov. 23, 1854, at Portland, Maine, she married William Butler whom she had known in Ireland. With her husband, she arrived in Calcutta on Sept. 25, 1856, the first Methodist missionary wife from America to go to India. At Bareilly, their first mission station, she immediately made plans for a girls' school, but her efforts were rebuffed. She collaborated with her husband in establishing a girls' orphanage in which she taught. She was active also in the work of the Mission Press. The Butlers returned to the United States in 1865 and in 1872 were sent to Mexico as the first missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the country. Here also she cooperated in founding an orphanage, aided in establishing Methodist schools, and participated in the literature program of the Mission Press. Leaving Mexico in 1879, after a few years the family settled in Newton Center, Mass. (1888), where, until her death, Mrs. Butler was active in the program of the W.F.M.S., particularly the New England Branch. At eighty-six she participated in the Golden Jubilee of the India Mission.—Christian Advocate, LXXXVIII (1913), 38 (Sept. 18), 1284; Woman's Missionary Friend, XLV (1913), 11 (November), 387 f.; *Fifty-fourth Ann. § Those present, in addition to Mrs. Parker and Mrs. Butler, were Mrs. Lewis Flanders, Mrs. Thomas A. Rich, Mrs. William B. Merrill, Mrs. Thomas Kingsbury, Mrs. O. T. Taylor, and Mrs. H. J. with executive officers vested with administrative powers. After appointment of a committee on nomination of officers the meeting was adjourned to the following Tuesday. At the organizational meeting on March 30, with an increased attendance from several of the churches of Boston, the constitution was presented, considered article by article, and adopted. The purpose of the Society was stated to be :

engaging and uniting the efforts of the women of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in sending out and supporting female missionaries, native Christian teachers, and Bible readers, in foreign lands.⁶⁹

Mrs. Osmon C. Baker was elected President; forty-four Vice Presidents—including wives of the Bishops, and of the Corresponding Secretaries of the Missionary Society—were chosen; and Lois S. Parker, Jennie Fowler Willing, and Mrs. William F. Warren were made Corresponding Secretaries.⁷⁰

From this point events moved rapidly and decisively. Decision was made to publish a periodical in the interest of the Society, and the first issue of the Heathen Woman's Friend appeared in May. On May 7 John P. Durbin and William L. Harris met members of the new Society in the Bromfield Street Church, Boston, "for the purpose of coming to a more definite understanding with regard to . . . object and aim" of the new Society. The brethren were apprehensive. The "secretary of the new society recorded that 'Dr. Harris inquired solicitously how the ladies proposed to raise money, stating his fear that their success would interfere with the receipts of the Parent Board.'" Dr. Durbin again proposed that the women raise the money and let the Board administer it.* Both of the Secretaries were ready to grant the "missionary spirit manifested" by the women "worthy of all commendation, but [they] were apprehensive of collisions at home and abroad." Dr. Durbin emphasized the importance of "unity of administration" both at home and on the mission field. Speaking for all the women present Mrs. John H. Twombly asserted: "We women feel that we have organized an independent society. We will be as dutiful children to the church authorities, but through our own organization we may do a work which no other can accomplish." The women felt that ample justification for their position was to be found in the experience of the Woman's Union Missionary Society which was beholden to no men's organization but wholly independent. The Secretaries argued that independence was incompatible with Methodist connectionalism.⁷¹

Despite the differing points of view the conference resulted in some mutual

* Dr. Durbin posed a hypothetical case which he evidently thought would answer all arguments: "Could you ladies make the necessary arrangements for Miss A. to go to India, to obtain bills of exchange, take care of her on the voyage, provide a home when she arrives? No. Your work is to forward the money for Miss A. to New York. We will credit it to your Society, keep you informed of her needs, take care of her in sickness and in health. I think this to be the purpose of your constitution."—As quoted by Mary Isham, Valorous Ventures. A Record of Sixty and Six Years of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, Methodist Episcopal Church, p. 16.

concessions and a considerable degree of meeting of minds. The Missionary Society Secretaries agreed that an organization which would unite the women of the Methodist Episcopal Church in "increased efforts, to meet the demand for laborers among women in heathen lands" was very much needed and expressed confidence that even though the new organization was not an auxiliary it would "work in harmony with . . . [the general Society], seeking its counsel and approval in all its work."⁷²

When it was noised abroad that there were to be two separate missionary organizations in the Church many misgivings were expressed in letters by pastors and long-time lay patrons of the Missionary Society. In an effort to satisfy inquirers and complainants Durbin and Harris wrote a reassuring article for the Christian Advocate explanatory of the spirit and purpose of the new organization. They said, in summary:

2. This Society will not send out any missionaries who are not approved by the proper authorities of our General Missionary Society.

3. The missionaries sent out by the Woman's Missionary Society are to labor under the direction of the Missions or Conferences to which they are sent.

4. No public collections are to be taken in aid of the funds of this Society, nor are contributions to be gathered in any way tending to diminish the regular annual contributions of the members of the Church to our General Missionary Treasury.

5. The missionary spirit manifested in this movement is worthy of commendation, and if carried out according to the true intent and purpose will be fruitful of much good.

They also stated that "the ladies . . . seemed intent on maintaining and enlarging our general missionary work, and increasing the contributions to our general treasury while giving attention to the special work which they have undertaken."⁷³

On June 9, at the call of Mrs. William Butler who with her husband in the meantime had moved from Massachusetts to New Jersey, a small company of New York women formed an auxiliary to the Boston society. Mrs. Butler, who had been elected President, made the first address in its behalf before a large group of women at the Sing Sing (New York) Camp Meeting where those in charge were persuaded to permit the holding of a meeting "for women only." * At this juncture a bit of regional jealousy developed. Some who had been members of the Woman's Union Missionary Society, and others, were unwilling that the new organization should be "secondary to the new Society in Boston." Still others were insistent that it should ally itself with the general Society, a conviction doubtless influenced by the fact that the Female Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, a New York City organization, throughout its history was an auxiliary of the general

* At this meeting contributions were solicited and received. Whereupon John L. Durbin voiced objection, asserting that a public collection had been taken, contrary to the Boston agreement. Mrs. Butler, bringing her Irish wit into play, argued that a meeting from which men were excluded could not rightly be held to be "public."—C. Butler, op. cit., p. 112.

Society.* Eliza M. F. Taylor (Mrs. George Lansing Taylor), Corresponding Secretary of the New York group, wrote to the Christian Advocate:

Early in the history of this movement . . . it became evident that the sentiment of the greater number of our pastors and the patrons of missionary work was adverse to the existence of two independent missionary societies in our Church. In consequence of this disfavor we found it impossible to obtain the co-operation and contributions necessary to our object. Led by these strong indications from without, and by more careful deliberation within, the New York branch resolved to ally itself as an auxiliary with the Missionary Society . . . which, by unanimous vote, was accordingly done.⁷⁴

The action was taken on October 14. Naturally this turn in affairs caused consternation in Boston threatening, as it did, serious division in the ranks of Methodist women. After fruitless correspondence Mr. and Mrs. Parker proceeded to New York to meet in conference the leaders of the women's group and the Secretaries of the general Society. Mrs. Parker's letter is the most revealing of several accounts:

We had a long hard day, but all of no use. Not one iota would the New York ladies yield. We started for Boston on the Steamer for Providence—tired, sad, and discouraged. I think Mr. Parker did not sleep at all that night. But the Lord gave him a vision of what was evidently His will and in the morning Mr. Parker had a constitution arranged on the . . . plan for Branches with each Branch to have its own head quarters. It took a little time and tact to get the Boston ladies to accept this plan then they submitted it to New York Philadelphia and Chicago.† [Soon] . . . these four Branches were in working order.⁷⁵

The new plan of Branch Societies “proved acceptable to all concerned” and was embodied in a revised constitution approved in Boston on December 27, 1869.‡

The Heathen Woman's Friend in announcing the change said:

A General Executive Committee will . . . be raised, composed of certain officers or delegates from each . . . [Branch Society]. The General Executive Committee will meet annually to arrange a general plan of work, while the Branch Societies will have power, through their Executive Committees, to work out this plan. This arrangement will give the Branch Societies equal right in the administration of the affairs of the Society, and will also give to each Branch a special work, and special missionaries. Thus we hope more fully to interest all Methodist women in our cause.⁷⁶

The “great feature” of the 1870 annual meeting of the Missionary Society, the Christian Advocate said editorially, was “the very full discussion” of the proposed constitution which was approved “with great unanimity” and declared

* See Vol. I, 317.

† The Chicago group had been formed in the meantime. The Philadelphia Branch was organized in March, 1870.

‡ This constitution was approved by the Missionary Society on Feb. 15, 1870, and formally adopted by the several Branch Societies, March-April, 1870. to be entitled to the cordial support and cooperation "of our Pastors and people." 77

It did not take the Society long to make an acknowledged place for itself in the economy of the Church. It was formally recognized by the 1872 General Conference. Pastors in their churches and Bishops presiding at the Conferences were generally helpful and cooperative. Bishop Matthew Simpson stated the case aptly in saying, "A house is sad without either half and it is perfect only when both are present; and this Missionary Society is but another illustration of the old declaration that it is not good for man to be alone." Occasionally a sour note intruded, as in Bishop E. R. Ames' objection that it "generally took three-fourths of the income to pay the expenses of a ladies' society," a statement that as applied to this particular case, at least, was soon disproved by the annual financial reports of the W.F.M.S.⁷⁸ An equally baseless assertion that "every dollar raised by the Woman's Missionary Society would be a dollar diverted" from the general Society also was quickly discredited. In 1873 the Heathen Woman's Friend reported $54,920. raised the preceding year by the W.F.M.S. and for the same period an increase in the receipts of the Missionary Society of $52,690. On this the editor commented: "it appears that for every dollar raised by women for this cause last year the General Society received a new dollar over and above its previous income." 79 A similar statement was made at the 1872 anniversary of the Cincinnati Conference Missionary Society by the Treasurer who, according to Stephen L. Baldwin, announced increased receipts of $2,000. "while very large contributions had been made to the Woman's Society," giving evidence that the interest awakened "by the ladies had operated to the benefit of the general missionary cause, and increased the collections in its behalf." At the end of fifteen years of arduous labor the officers of the Society were able proudly to affirm that from the beginning to the present date, with the collection and disbursement of more than a million of dollars, and the administration of the development of work abroad, the Society has been able to accomplish all on the basis of unpaid, voluntary labor.⁸⁰

Although from the beginning earnest effort was made by both Societies to maintain fraternal cooperative relations, frequently during the early years tension and some friction developed, as to a certain extent is inevitable wherever two organized groups, each jealous of its own prerogatives, operate within a common area of action and administration, even though the area is that of organized religion. Although the Secretaries soon gave up their original contention that the W.F.M.S. should turn over all their funds to be administered by the Missionary Society they continued to urge that all "surplus" remaining after the appropriations of the fiscal year had been met, should revert to the “parent Society.” To this the W.F.M.S. Executive Committee pleasantly but firmly demurred:

We think . . . [the demand concerning] Surplus Funds unfortunate. Much of our success depends upon our being able to say that all our funds are for the work among women. All the money we raise is missionary money and can be employed for no other work. The ladies however desire to designate the special work for which their money shall be expended. . . . surely the Miss. Soc. of the M. E. C. will always have, or desire to have as much work among heathen women as Christian women can maintain.⁸¹

Differences also developed between the Societies on such matters as salaries to be paid women missionaries and procedure to be followed in remitting funds. The first missionaries sent out by the W.F.M.S. were Dr. Clara Swain and Isabella Thoburn. At the meeting of the Board of Managers on April 19, 1870, it was reported that the estimates for salaries had been fixed by the New England Branch, on the recommendation of “the Ladies of the Mission,” at $750. each, an amount “50 per cent greater than the allowances made by our own or any other Society for similar service in any foreign Mission field.” The Board adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Board cannot approve of the Estimates submitted . . . for the Salaries of Misses Swain and Thoburn respectively viz: $750. each; and that we earnestly recommend the said Society to revise their Estimates and keep them within $600.* per annum . . .⁸²

Again, on July 13, 1871, Assistant Corresponding Secretary William L. Harris wrote to Mrs. Warren of the New England Branch:

Your scheme of appropriations surprises us. Some of the matters were never submitted to our Board for approval. Some of the appropriations are extravagantly large; being out of all proportions to payments which are made by us, & by other societies. You certainly ought, by the requirements of your own Constitution, to have submitted your estimates to our Board for approval before making your appropriations. We do not, and cannot consent to this method of proceeding.⁸³

On their part the W.F.M.S. Finance Committee complained that money remitted through the Missionary Society did not always reach “the destination for which it was intended.” Because of this some of the Branch Treasurers, in contravention of agreement with the Board of Foreign Missions, were inclined to send funds direct to the W.F.M.S. treasurers on the field. This practice, however, was frowned upon by the W.F.M.S.’s Executive Committee. In successive years resolutions were passed requiring all Branch Treasurers “to send their remittances through the Missionary Secretaries of the Parent Board.”⁸⁴ The 1876 General Conference adopted a resolution favoring “a closer connection” between “the Treasuries of the two Societies.”

* The Society kept the estimate at $750., making it read, salary, $600.; incidentals, $150.

In response the W.F.M.S. expressed concern for harmonious relations but declared their "conviction that a change in . . . relations to the General Missionary Society in this respect would be most disastrous."⁸⁵

In 1881 and in 1882 friction developed to such an extent on the field between certain W.F.M.S. missionaries and some of those of the general Missionary Society as to cause serious concern on the part of the Board, the W.F.M.S., and the Bishops.⁸⁶ These conditions, as the General Conference of 1884 drew near, undoubtedly contributed to a renewed demand for unified administration through consolidation of the two Societies, which created much anxiety on the part of officers of the W.F.M.S. The Heathen Woman's Friend described the situation in an editorial:

It was well known that our organization and its relation to the church at home and abroad would be thoroughly investigated by the General Conference, and however confident all might feel that the work and its methods would bear the fullest inspection, none could tell what changes . . . might . . . [be considered] necessary and expedient. It was also known that individual members elect of the conference—a few of them men of great influence*—were strongly in favor of depriving us of the liberty of action sanctioned by former General Conferences, and even of consolidating our treasury with that of the parent Society. Papers advocating these things had been printed and circulated in a quiet way for the purpose of influencing the action of the conference.⁸⁷

None of these fears was realized. The Society had influential friends in the Committee on Missions and the report as presented to General Conference on May 28 was taken up for consideration, amended at one point, and promptly adopted. The opening paragraph which made the W.F.M.S. for the first time an official organization of the Church † read:

For the more successful prosecution of the Missionary work of the Church among women in foreign lands, there shall be an organization known as the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, to be governed and regulated by their Constitution, which may be altered or amended by the General Conference as the necessities of the work may require.⁸⁸

General Conference action required that the Society should "work in harmony with, and under supervision of, the authorities of the Missionary Society"; that the "appointment, recall, and remuneration of missionaries, and the designation of their fields of labor, . . . [should] be subject to the approval

* One of the "men of great influence" was Charles H. Fowler, during the 1880-84 quadrennium one of the Corresponding Secretaries of the Missionary Society. In her letter of Oct. 5, 1907, to William A. Mansell, Lois S. Parker wrote: "When we reached home in May 1883 we found that Dr. Fowler . . . was working to have the W.F.M.S. done way with at the Gen. Conf. of 1884. We heard of it all over the country wherever we went. We found that he was getting delegates . . . where he went as Miss. Secy. to see things as he did. The ladies were troubled in every Branch, and so were we but we went to work to try to save the Society . . ."—Lois S. Parker to William A. Mansell, in the files of the Division of World Missions of the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church.

† The sections of the constitution contained in Report No. XV were printed (with some changes in punctuation and phrasing) in the Discipline, 1884, pp. 160 ff. This edition of the Discipline is the first in which mention of the Society occurs.

of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society"; and that "annual appropriations to Mission fields . . . [should] be submitted for revision and approval to the General Missionary Committee." Since 1870 these requirements had been the practice of the Society. Now they became the law of the Church. No longer could it be said that the W.F.M.S. was "an independent Society."⁸⁹

Also included in the General Conference action were the provisions of Article VIII of the constitution which required that all missionaries sent out by the Society should "labor under the direction of the particular Conferences or missions of the Church in which they may be severally employed"; that they should be "annually appointed by the President of the Conference or Mission" and "subject to the same rules of removal" governing other missionaries. Likewise included was the stipulation that all the work of the Society should be "under the direction of the Conferences or Missions . . . in exactly the same manner as the work of the Missionary Society, . . . the Superintendent or Presiding Elder having the same relation to the work and the person in charge that he would have were it in the charge of any other member of the Conference or Mission."

The hampering restrictions under which the Society had been for years compelled to raise their funds were retained as Section 4 of the Disciplinary statement:

The funds of the Society shall not be raised by collections or subscriptions taken during any of our Church services, nor in any promiscuous public meeting, nor in any Sunday-school,* but shall be raised by such methods as the Constitution of the Society shall provide, none of which shall interfere with the contributions of our people and Sunday-Schools for the treasury of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and the amount so collected shall be reported by the Preacher in Charge to the Annual Conference, and be entered in a column among the Benevolent Collections in the Annual and General Minutes.⁹⁰

While the legislation made legally binding regulations which severely limited freedom of action it gave the Society an ecclesiastical status which it had not previously enjoyed, strengthened its appeal for support from all the churches, made it easier to enlist the cooperation of pastors, and increased opportunities for extending its work.

The Society as planned was a stroke of organizational and administrative genius. The Society Branches, each with executive and administrative func-

* This article of the constitution, originally imposed by influence of officers of the Missionary Society and others who feared that general solicitation of contributions in public meetings of congregations would diminish receipts of the missionary treasury, was unreasonably strict. Literally interpreted it might prevent taking collections in any public assembly, even of members of the W.F.M.S. It was modified by an amendment introduced by a prominent lay delegate, G. Wiley Wells of the Southern California Conference: "The provisions of § 4 of this paragraph (§ 294) shall not be so interpreted as to prevent the women from taking collections in women's meetings convened in the interests of their societies; nor from securing memberships and life memberships in audiences where their work is represented; nor from holding festivals or arranging lectures in the interests of their work." A motion to lay on the table was defeated and the resolution was adopted. (G. C. Journal, 1884, p. 286; Discipline, 1884, p. 162.) In 1892 the word "regular" was inserted immediately preceding "Church services."—Discipline, 1892, p. 182.

tions, related the organization intimately to the women of the several regions and much more closely to the local church groups than would have been possible through a single central organization. It gave to every member a sense of belonging that proved to be a powerful stimulus to interest and activity. Within a brief time thousands of women, out of their limited resources, were giving sacrificially to the support of their missionaries, with whom they had a consciousness of personal relatedness, on a scale that put to shame the contributions of their husbands to the cause of missions.

The codifying of the constitutional regulations in the Discipline improved inter-Society relations and cooperation on the foreign field to such an extent that in their Seventieth Annual Report (1888) the Missionary Society Secretaries stated:

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has been, in even greater degree than ever before, a powerful adjunct to our work in every foreign field. The high character, the consecrated spirit, and the self-denying labors of its representatives have elicited the highest admiration and commanded the profoundest respect of all who have been witnesses of their work. We rejoice that it was able to report the receipt of over $206,000., and to appropriate over $230,000. for the new year.⁹¹

The income and field program of the Society steadily expanded until in the Twenty-sixth Annual Report (1894-95) the officers were able to announce:

The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society supports 151 Missionaries, 14 of whom are medical, 750 Bible Readers, assistants and teachers, also 390 Day Schools with about 10,000 pupils, 50 Boarding Schools with about 4,000 pupils, 11 Orphanages with 450 orphans, 10 Training Schools with 200 pupils. It has also 13 Hospitals and Dispensaries and administers to about 60,000 women annually.⁹²

Total receipts of the Society, 1869-95, were $3,740,910.27. It had sent to the foreign field 272 missionaries, of whom thirty-nine were medical missionaries.⁹³

WOMEN'S WORK FOR WOMEN AT HOME

For years following the abolition of slavery the plight of freedwomen rested heavily on the hearts and consciences of Christian people, both North and South. Much was being done for Negro welfare—especially for the freedmen—but comparatively little for women.

In 1869 Joseph C. Hartzell, a member of Central Illinois Conference, was appointed pastor of Ames Chapel in New Orleans. In 1873 he became Presiding Elder of the New Orleans District. His wife, Jennie Culver Hartzell,* who had previously been prominently identified with Methodist women's church work in Chicago, immediately became interested in the plight of Negro women in the city. "Strangely," she said later in a letter, "has the Lord led me to work among the needy of our colored sisters in Louisiana." As to the manner of the leading a friend relates:

* Mrs. Joseph C. Hartzell (1844-1916), née Jennie Culver, as a girl became interested in religious work, taking charge of a Sunday school and eventually developing it into one of the largest in Chicago. After graduating from high school she became a public school teacher, at the same time conducting a large night school for Swedish immigrants. Her social service interest led her to enlist in a movement for providing Chicago firemen with individual accident policies. Following her marriage in 1869 to Joseph C. Hartzell she accompanied him to New Orleans and greatly aided him in his work as pastor and Presiding Elder. Years later when Dr. Hartzell became Missionary Bishop of Africa, she accompanied him on four of his episcopal tours and by her insight into human needs and administrative problems gave invaluable aid. She took an active part in the founding of the mission to Mohamedans in Algiers.—Anon., Mrs. Jennie Culver Hartzell, In Memoriam, passim.

Her first work was in response to a call to visit a dying girl in a disreputable house. A minister had been asked for, but none dared go. Dr. Hartzell was out of town, and she went alone; went again and again for two weeks, and saw the girl happily converted, and willing to die. Once, on coming out of this place, the proprietress of another such house waited on her and asked her to come, the following Sabbath, and speak to her young women as she had talked to this dying girl. She went, and had twenty of those poor women, whom no one seemed to care to save, intently listening to her words, so hungry were they for help and comfort.⁹⁴

Soon Mrs. Hartzell's interest led to her developing women's activities in the fifteen Negro churches in New Orleans and its suburbs. The conditions in the homes of the Negro women of the city, wrote Dr. Hartzell, were distressing:

She longed to send women missionaries into . . . [their] homes . . . ; hold meetings for mothers and young women, train teachers for Sunday School work, give religious instruction; teach simple home industries, urge attendance upon Church and seek to lead all to Christ as their Saviour.⁹⁵

Meanwhile missionary organizations of the Church were considering these same needs. Mrs. T. L. Tomkinson, in Twenty Years' History of the Woman's Home Missionary Society, states that at the W.F.M.S. General Executive Committee meeting in Chicago in 1872 a proposal for work among freedwomen in the United States was discussed. At the next annual meeting, in Cincinnati, 1873, Richard S. Rust, Corresponding Secretary of the Freedmen's Aid Society, urged the women to delete the word "Foreign" from their organization's name, thereby broadening its scope to include all Methodist missionary work for women. Bishop Wiley, in New England, made the same appeal. The proposal received some support within the Society and in 1875 at the General Executive Committee meeting notice was given of a constitutional amendment which would free the W.F.M.S. to engage in missionary work in the home field. By the next year the plan was declared inadvisable.⁹⁶

However, the circle of stouthearted women who were resolved that an aggressive Methodist movement for work among the freedwomen should be undertaken was gradually widening. In this same year, 1875, on May 12, under the leadership of Mrs. Davis W. Clark, Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing, Mrs. Mary T. Lathrop, and others, a mass meeting of women was held in Baltimore which petitioned the Freedmen's Aid Society to plan for the election of women to its Board of Managers. This petition having been refused as legally untenable, the appeal was later broadened to a recommendation for a "woman's department auxiliary to the Freedmen's Aid Society, under the direction of a lady as Assistant Corresponding Secretary." By the close of 1876 agitation of the subject by women had assumed the form of an organized campaign. The ninth annual meeting of the Freedmen's Aid Society was scheduled to be held in Pittsburgh on December 10-11. On the preceding Sunday women presented their plea in several Methodist pulpits of the city and on Monday afternoon held a women's meeting in South Common Church at which Mrs. Elizabeth L. Rust, wife of the Society's Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Mary Sparkes Wheeler, and Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing were the speakers. The subject received consideration in the Freedmen's Aid Society meeting and a special committee was appointed to prepare a report on the feasibility of the proposal of the women. The committee reported on January 20, 1877, that the legal obstructions to this project were insurmountable.

In view of the fact that the introduction of females into the Board of Managers by the laws of the State of Ohio under which the Society holds its charter would endanger its title to property, it is not practicable to elect a lady as Assistant Corresponding Secretary

As a compromise the committee tendered an appointment as Agent of the Freedmen's Aid Society to Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing, "to be employed by and under the direction of the Corresponding Secretary," defining her duties as "publicly presenting the cause, collecting funds, and organizing Auxiliary Societies." Since representation of women upon the Board of Managers, giving them a part in planning the program, was denied, Mrs. Willing declined the appointment. Her refusal was approved by a considerable number of the interested women who in their thinking were not committed to a joint organization, believing that the cause would be better served by a society controlled entirely by the women of the Church.⁹⁷

During intervening years while Missionary Society leaders were debating questions of organizational responsibilities and procedure there were others who were engaged actively in practical forms of mercy and help. At La Teche, near New Orleans, John P. Newman and his wife purchased a plantation of seventeen hundred acres as a site for an orphans' home for Negro children. Under the supervision of Mrs. J. S. Roberts, as matron, the home cared for more than one hundred boys and girls.

On her own responsibility Mrs. Hartzell established a mission school. She says:

[This was] taught by white missionaries in my employ, . . . at Wesley Chapel in the winter of 1877 and 1878. It was taught by Mrs. [M. A.] Ryder, Mrs. [M. L.] Hathaway, and another lady. I became personally responsible for the regular salaries of the missionaries and for the rent and furnishings of their home.⁹⁸

The following winter, having collected funds from friends in the North, Mrs. Hartzell employed a fourth missionary. The house which had been rented as a home for them served as headquarters for the varied activities.

The results of the first year's work were: eight sewing schools for girls and women who were taught to cut, to fit and make ordinary garments and instruction in matters of home life were given. Often these schools were turned into prayer meetings. Mother's meetings were largely attended and full of interest. About 150 homes were visited weekly where there was religious instruction and prayer. The poor were helped as means would permit, the sick comforted and the aged cared for. Over 500 girls and women were brought under the care of these missionaries and many were converted.⁹⁹

In the winter of 1879-80 there were thirteen small mission schools in which students of New Orleans University assisted as teachers. There were three common schools for girls and women, and five industrial schools.

Mrs. Hartzell and friends of her work looked forward hopefully to the 1880 General Conference which met in Cincinnati, but much to her disappointment the session closed without action concerning work among Negro freedwomen. After adjournment of the Conference, at the suggestion of Adna B. Leonard, Presiding Elder of the Cincinnati District, a meeting of Cincinnati Methodist women was planned to consider what might be done. On Tuesday, June 8, some fifty women came together in Trinity Methodist Church. Mrs. R. S. Rust, who had a firsthand acquaintance with the work in New Orleans, presided and the principal address—a plea for a woman's home missionary society—was made by Mrs. Hartzell. The importance of including work among white women as well as Negro women in the program of the proposed organization was urged by Mrs. J. L. Whetstone. Other meetings followed at intervals until finally on July 10, 1880, a constitution having been adopted, officers were elected. The purpose of the Society as stated by the constitution read:

The aim of this Society shall be to enlist and organize the efforts of Christian women in behalf of the needy and destitute women and children of all sections of our country without distinction of race, and to co-operate with the other societies and agencies of the Church in educational and missionary work.

Under the leadership of Mrs. Rutherford B. Hayes* as President, and other able officers† associated with her, the Society was soon launched

* Mrs. Rutherford B. (Lucy Webb) Hayes (1831-89) was born in Chillicothe, Ohio. She attended Ohio Wesleyan University and later completed her collegiate education in the Cincinnati Wesleyan College. During the Civil War she shared with her husband the vicissitudes of camp life, ministering to the needs of sick and wounded soldiers and winning their lasting respect and affection. She was a devoted Christian woman, thoroughly in sympathy with the purposes and program of the W.H.M.S., and her national prestige and active interest were a great asset to the Society.—Mrs. John Davis, Lucy Webb Hayes, passim.

† The officers, other than President, were: Vice Presidents, Mrs. Isaac W. Wiley, Mrs. F. S. Hoyt, Mrs. D. W. Clark, Mrs. Amos Shinkle, Mrs. J. M. Walden; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. R. S. Rust; Recording Secretary, Mrs. James Dale; Treasurer, Mrs. A. R. Clark. Mrs. Hayes asked that Mrs. John Davis should be elected as her first assistant. Her name was accordingly substituted for that of Mrs. Wiley as Vice President and the latter was made a resident manager.—Mrs. T. L. Tomkinson, Twenty Years' History of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1880-1900, p. 32.

upon its course. The field of service for the Society in the South was summarized by Mrs. Hartzell in this brief statement:

We have a thousand colored Churches in the Southern States. There ought to be a Christian woman laboring in each one of them. . . .

If there is a more important missionary field in the world, or one more ripe for the harvest, I know not where it is.¹⁰¹

The first three projects undertaken by the Society were the maintenance of the Negro welfare and school work begun by Mrs. Hartzell; a like program—including also Sunday schools, juvenile temperance bands, W.C.T.U. groups, and house-to-house visitation—previously initiated by Mrs. I. M. Dunton in South Carolina; and the taking over of similar work carried on earlier by Miss Sibyl Abbott and Mrs. C. G. Mitchell, matron of Clark University, in Atlanta, Georgia.¹⁰²

As in the case of the W.F.M.S., efforts to establish cooperative relations between the W.H.M.S. and the Missionary Society were attended with considerable difficulty. The Board of Managers, following submission of a report by the W.H.M.S., returned a proposition which read in part:

[That the W.H.M.S.] shall work in harmony with and under the supervision of the authorities of the Missionary Society of the M. E. Church.¹⁰³

The Society desired a more specific statement and returned the document with the addition of certain particulars. The Board thereupon referred the whole matter to Judge E. L. Fancher, one of the managers, who reported:

There is nothing in . . . [the constitution of the Society] to authorize the Missionary Society . . . to enter into any alliance with another society. . . .

I do not think it has constitutional power to resign any portion of its work in the home field, to another Society; nor to form any alliance with another society by which the latter shall have control of the fields or plans of missionary labor, or consent so to interfere therewith, or with the sources of missionary contributions, as to create a sort of partnership in the work.¹⁰⁴

At this juncture the Board was wise enough not to attempt to enforce the legal opinion—it had no means of enforcement, had it so desired—and decided to refer the whole matter to the General Conference. Fortunately the W.H.M.S. had influential friends among the Bishops and other prominent lay and ministerial officials of the Church. In their address to the ensuing Conference the Bishops announced that the officers of the W.H.M.S. would make application “to be incorporated into the general system of benevolence” of the Church, and added:

The working of these societies has . . . rapidly developed a power hitherto largely latent in the Church, and the benefit resulting from the increased activity of so many Christian women is scarcely to be estimated.

When the Committee on Missions made its report it included the following authorization, which was adopted by General Conference:

There shall be an organization known as the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which Society shall have authority to collect and disburse money, employ missionaries, and do work among the neglected populations in the home field under the same disciplinary rules and regulations as those which apply to the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, except section 3 [which refers to the appointment and supervision of missionaries in foreign fields].¹⁰⁵

The W.H.M.S. soon enlisted a large membership among the women of Methodism. At the third annual meeting (October, 1884)—the first meeting after official recognition by General Conference—delegations were present representing fourteen states and twenty-four Annual Conferences. Receipts for the fiscal year (1883-84), including the general and special funds, were $14,949.70.¹⁰⁶ At the fourteenth annual meeting (October, 1895), the Corresponding Secretary reported:

[The Woman's Home Missionary Society] has organized 2,500 Auxiliary Societies, secured 65,000 members, collected and disbursed . . . $974,233.46 in the advancement of its work, and distributed $637,057.11 worth of supplies for the assistance of ministers and their families in the frontiers. The Society has received gifts of property . . . worth $105,000. It has 16 model Homes and Industrial Schools in the South, missions for the Indians in Oklahoma, California, New Mexico, Washington, and Alaska. It has 10 missions in Utah, . . . It has 3 Industrial Schools for Spanish Americans in New Mexico, missions in behalf of immigrants, and 25 important city missions, including Deaconess Homes. For the accommodation of these various missions, the Society owns property worth $425,000.¹⁰⁷

RELATED ORGANIZATIONS COOPERATE

The election of Daniel P. Kidder as Corresponding Secretary of the re-organized Sunday School Union was a guarantee that the organization would be brought into a closer and more effective relation to the Church's missionary program. Kidder's term of service in Brazil (1837-40) had broadened his missionary vision and made him acutely aware of the Christian literature needs of the churches in mission lands. His annual report for 1846 emphasized the needs of Africa, China "with her swarming millions," Oregon and California with their new settlers, and the wide and growing West.¹⁰⁸ In 1850 he stressed the obligation "of the Union to furnish Sunday School books to all . . . [the] missions, domestic and foreign, especially to . . . [the] vast and rapidly-increasing emigrant population . . ." He reported that a beginning had been made in supplying Christian teaching materials for German, Swedish, and Norwegian and Danish missions in the United States. By 1854 he was able to report that books to the amount of $42,000. had been distributed.

These donations of books have been scattered from the border of Nova Scotia, on the east, to the Pacific coast, on the west, as well as in all our mission stations, especially China, Africa, and Germany.¹⁰⁹

Stated in specific terms, one of the missionary aims of the organization was:

To aid new and needy Sunday-schools in all parts of the work by grants of books, lesson-helps, and other requisites; and especially by grants of money to aid our foreign missions in the publication of Sunday school helps in foreign tongues.¹¹⁰

Need for materials for reading, study, and teaching was evidenced by requests from many parts of the world and expressions of gratitude for the aid rendered. A Presiding Elder in Texas, asking help for thirty-two Sunday schools in his District, wrote:

Most of these schools are on the plantations At one . . . we have a membership of fifty, but not one can read a word. . . . We need help; we must have it from some source. In many places on the district our colored children have no other school save the Sunday-school.¹¹¹

The Presiding Elder of the Bergen District, Norway Conference, wrote:

I would express the thankfulness of our people, . . . for the aid we have received from the Sunday-School Union, helping us to carry on the extensive Sunday-school work of the mission. No department of our mission-work has been blessed with larger results than that of the Sunday-school.¹¹²

Closely allied with the Sunday School Union in organization, purpose, and service to domestic and foreign missions was the Tract Society.* Its reports frequently stressed its missionary character and activities. The Annual Report for 1854 stated:

We have a work truly missionary in its character. . . . Wherever the missions of our Church extend, our books and tracts must go, in the vernacular of the people we seek to save.

The Report for 1859 said:

In foreign mission stations, long before the devoted missionaries can be expected to acquire sufficient acquaintance with the language to preach to the natives, opportunities are afforded to awaken interest and to do good by the circulation of tracts. In this respect our society is a most important and efficient auxiliary to the missionary.¹¹³

Reviewing in 1875 the Society's work the Recording Secretary reported:

In the first year of its existence this Society began its mission work by sending money to Germany for the establishment of a press, and by translating tracts for the Scandinavian missions. Since then, year by year, the various foreign missions of the Church* have been supplied with religious literature. . . .

[In the U.S.] . . . great numbers of tracts are gratuitously distributed among the [foreign language missions and the] domestic missions We are also making special effort for the freedmen at the South.¹¹⁴

Henry Liebhart, editor of German Sunday-school publications, reported in 1880 that tracts in such number and variety had been published "that no other religious publishing house either in this country or in Germany can compete with [the output]." Ten years later he stated that in the U. S. "from 250,000 to 300,000 German tracts" were distributed annually.¹¹⁵

From widely separated parts of the world word came of extensive circulation. From Mexico, John W. Butler wrote: "[Tracts] have been scattered by thousands wherever our missionaries and native helpers have gone." From India, Charles G. Conklin, agent of the Methodist Publishing House, Calcutta, reported, "because of . . . [the appropriations of the Tract Society and Sunday School Union] we are sending out hundreds of thousands of pages in English and Bengali." From Finland, in 1893 Johannes Roth, Superintendent of the Finland and St. Petersburg Mission, expressed appreciation for a grant that enabled them to meet their "most urgent requirements," stating that previously they had not had in the Finnish language a hymnbook, Discipline, or religious paper. In 1894 literature grants were made to China, Japan, Korea, India, Malaysia, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Finland, Germany, Italy, Bulgaria, Switzerland, Mexico, Argentina, Chile, and Peru.¹¹⁶

The Bible Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, authorized by the General Conference of 1828, was dissolved on the recommendation of the 1836 Conference in order that the Church might cooperate more fully with the American Bible Society, an interdenominational organization, formed in 1816. Within a few years the Society was distributing Bibles in large quantity through both the Missionary Society and the Sunday School Union. In 1846 the Union reported:

We take pleasure in acknowledging the continued liberality of the American Bible Society, which . . . in April last generously granted five hundred Bibles, and three thousand Testaments, for the supply of poor Sunday schools in sections where no auxiliary Bible societies are organized.¹¹⁷

At the request of the Missionary Society a bilingual edition of the New Testament was issued with Swedish and English translations in parallel columns. Bibles were also supplied to the missions in California and New Mexico and "extremely liberal grants" to those in Germany and China. The 1860 General Conference reported "reciprocally more close and interesting" relations between the Church and the Bible Society:

While on the one hand the contributions of the Methodist Church to the Society are increasing, her draught upon the Society increases in at least an equal ratio. The enlargement of our work, both at home and abroad, creates new demands for means to supply the Holy Scriptures to our people . . . ¹¹⁸

In addition to Bibles supplied to agencies of the Church for distribution the Society made substantial cash grants* "for printing and circulating the Bible in the foreign missions." On their part Methodist churches supported the Society generously.†

Within the period 1845-95 two Corresponding Secretaries of this Society were Methodist ministers. Joseph Holdich, a member of the New York Conference and of the faculty of Wesleyan University, was elected to the secretaryship in 1849 and served until 1878. In the latter year Albert S. Hunt, pastor of St. James' Methodist Episcopal Church, Brooklyn, was made Corresponding Secretary and continued in office until his death in 1898.

By 1891 the American Bible Society had branch societies, or agencies, in ten foreign countries including Japan, China, Brazil, Mexico, Persia, and Venezuela.¹¹⁹

PRINCIPLES AND POLICIES GOVERNING FOREIGN MISSIONS

When once fairly launched on its overseas missionary enterprise the Church entered upon a program of almost unlimited expansion. The spirit of the movement was well expressed by Bishop Francis Burns in a letter written from Liberia on November 24, 1859:

This staying within hearing of the ocean's waves will be the death of us! Christianity, in order to preserve its vitality among any people, requires expansion, and we must spread or die.¹²⁰

In his History of Missions in India Julius Richter comments on this characteristic of the Methodist missionary program:

This Church . . . began . . . to branch out in mission work on a scale and to an extent scarcely dreamed of in India before. With almost overwhelming rapidity it established two great groups of stations, But it did not rest satisfied . . . ; with feverish haste one mission field after another was added . . . [until it had] stations in almost every part of India.

. . . But what a difference between it and the Basle Missionary Society, which followed closely in its wake In the German Society there was systematic limitation to given districts with a uniform and straightforward method of work; whereas the Methodists launched enterprises in every part and corner of the country, sometimes recklessly intruding upon the spheres of labor of older societies, yet still

* For 1860-64 the grants of the American Bible Society to the Missionary Society totaled $35,200. and for 1876-80 nearly $28,000. for missions in Norway, Sweden, Germany, Italy, India, and Mexico.—G. C. Journal, 1864, p. 438; ibid., 1880, p. 274.

† Contributions to the Society for the quadrennium 1860-64 were $171,951.29; for 1864-68, $387,832.23. (Ibid., 1864, p. 439; ibid., 1868, p. 575.) In the quadrennium 1892-96 there was a sharp decrease annually, the total in 1895 being only $29,937.—Ibid., 1896, p. 429.

with consuming zeal, with great financial resources, and at times under very capable leaders . . . ¹²¹

Years later Stephen L. Baldwin, after twenty years of service as missionary in China, commended this expansionist policy in that country:

I mention only one more feature of Methodism, and that is its constitutional habit of pushing on. No sooner is one place fairly occupied, than it reaches out for another. With an ambition like Alexander's, only that it is holy and unselfish, it is ever longing for 'more worlds to conquer.' Its history in China is no exception in this respect.

In 1870, the Foochow Mission urged the Church to enter the opening field in Japan, and in 1872 gave up its honored superintendent, Dr. Maclay, that he might enter upon the work in that empire. And now the Church has pushed on from Japan into Korea—the last great nation of the world to open its doors to Protestant Christianity.¹²²

But at the fifty-third anniversary of the Missionary Society (1871) Dallas D. Lore who had had experience on the mission field in South America posed an alternative in missionary policy which for many decades remained a live issue. With elaborate argument he urged the policy of concentration in missionary operations in contrast to the rapid establishment of new and small stations, holding the strengthening of hopeful situations to be of greater importance than the entering of new fields.¹²³ Lore's point of view was urged in the editorial columns of the Christian Advocate. The paper contended in the issue of August 29, 1872, that missionary lines were already sufficiently extended and that new missions should not be established but rather existing missions should be reinforced. Three months later the editor returned to the subject, using more vigorous language:

The pretense that we must go everywhere that we possibly can . . . is simply preposterous, and unworthy of serious attention. We would therefore regret any attempt on the part of our missionary authorities to occupy any new fields, except only Japan, . . . so manifestly providentially opened to us.

The Christian Advocate also declared that the "inchoate mission in Italy should not be prosecuted further."¹²⁴

Argument based on theory was reinforced by reports which were the fruit of experience. Again and again complaints came from the fields of declining morale resulting from the inability of the Missionary Society to send reinforcements for which missions had asked and in many cases which the Society had promised. Typical is the statement of Hiram H. Lowry, Superintendent of the North China Mission, accompanying his report for 1878:

We have been very grievously disappointed in not receiving the long-promised reinforcement. For three and a half years we have been anxiously expecting some one to fill the vacancy in our mission ranks, and although the work has been extending, and consequently increasing the demand for assistance, we are still compelled to wait.¹²⁵

Letters of much the same tenor came to the Board in 1880 from Thomas B. Wood, Superintendent of the South America Mission, and in 1881 from Virgil C. Hart of Central China. In 1894 J. E. Robinson, then Presiding Elder of the Bombay District, India, reported facing unlimited opportunity for advance with a "depleted missionary force and utterly inadequate resources." C. F. Kupfer, Presiding Elder of the Chinkiang District, Central China Conference, was clear in his conviction that excessive zeal for expansion, want of personnel continuity, and inability—because of insufficient personnel—to develop a complete school program from the primary grades to the theological institute were responsible for failure to show permanent results—failure which is "not only detrimental to the work, but also disheartening to the workers and to the Church at home."¹²⁶ With this judgment Bishop Willard F. Mallalieu, after his episcopal visit to China in 1892, was ready to agree. ". . . we have less than a dozen men," he wrote, for 120,000,000 people within the bounds of the Central China Mission; one missionary to 10,000,000 Chinese. "It is a serious question," he said, ". . . whether it would not be wiser never to enter such a field than to enter it with such a meager force . . ." ¹²⁷

Yet, as the history of later years will show, the policy of expansion was continued unabated. The urge to enter new fields was too strong to be successfully resisted. In 1897, Bishop McCabe having taken the initiative in appointing a missionary, the General Missionary Committee "authorized the establishment of a mission in Alaska" as a domestic mission; Bishop Thoburn opened work in Manila, the Philippine Islands, in 1899; and in February, 1903, a missionary was appointed to Sibiu, Sarawak, Borneo. Other missions were established in new fields at intervals.¹²⁸

WESTERN INSTITUTIONS TRANSPLANTED

There is no record of the Missionary Society having given instructions to its missionaries to transfer to their respective fields the exact pattern of church organization existing at home. It was assumed by all, without question, that this would be done. Four years after reaching India William Butler wrote to the Board:

As fast as circumstances have allowed all the institutions and usages of our Church have been introduced into every mission—regular Sabbath services, class and prayer-meetings, love-feasts and quarterly conferences, day and Sabbath-schools¹²⁹

Within a few years District and Annual Conferences were added, as soon in fact as a sufficient number of native preachers had been ordained to make organization possible. In China in the early years of the mission, anticipating the time when the organization of an Annual Conference would be possible, yearly meetings of the missionaries and native preachers were held "in order that the preachers might be trained in our [Western] methods." When, in 1877, the Foochow Conference was formally organized by Bishop Wiley, he wrote home:

If it had not been for the strange language and dress, I could hardly have noticed any difference, so well prepared were these native preachers for all the business of a conference. You would have been surprised to see with what accuracy and good order everything went forward.¹³⁰

Shortly after the organization of the Epworth League and the Junior League in the United States these also began to be organized in India, China, and other mission lands. Missionaries in their reports told of the forming of children's and young people's societies and stated that very successful meetings were being held. In some missions the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Loyal Legion, and still other organizations were formed. A typical missionary report stated that the "splendid machinery of the Church" was working well, training members "to work unitedly and systematically," and inspiring the local churches "with confidence in their own strength."¹³¹

Bishop Thomson, in his address at the organization of the India Mission Conference, confidently declared: "We have a system of itinerancy just fitted to set fire to these plains." One of the preachers in China was so enthusiastic over the itinerant plan that he said he did not doubt the Chinese government would in time "model its civil service after the Methodist Discipline, so exactly was it adapted to the Chinese character." Stephen L. Baldwin was so certain this feature of Methodism could be used successfully, despite the attachment of the Chinese to their local communities, that he said to his fellow missionaries, "If Methodism can't work the itinerancy here, it has no call to be here."¹³² Among the few missionaries who raised any question concerning the superior value of the system was C. F. Kupfer, who wrote to the Board:

Let the true friend of missions ever remember that every change in China means a great loss to the work and a loss to the man who was changed. The real flourishing congregations in China are those where the same men have labored for twenty and thirty years at the same place. If the personal character of the missionary is such as compels respect, then his life will speak louder than his words as soon as he is acquainted with the people and the people with him. But not until then will his words be to them a 'savor of life unto life.'¹³³

At the end of the half century as at the beginning the sense of obligation to reproduce the polity of American Methodism without adaptation of any kind determined missionary activity. "One of the most important things to which we have this year given our attention," wrote T. M. Hudson, in charge of the Bombay Gujarati Mission in 1894, "has been the thorough Methodistic organization of the Church."¹³⁴

The custom of Methodist missionaries of imposing upon Methodist Societies in the Orient rigid forms of ecclesiastical organization, type of architecture, and distinctive ritual—all developed within Western culture—was followed by all the denominations. The practice was responsible for creating in the Far East and elsewhere in the non-Christian world all the variant types of Christian ecclesiasticism,* with the accompanying confusion and conflict which existed in Europe and America.†

Ideally might it not have been better in India, for example, for all missionaries to have presented the Gospel of Christ, with emphasis upon the eternal verities which the evangelical Churches held in common, and to have left the people free to develop their own peculiar forms of organization and worship expressive of Indian genius and customs? Thus might not a truly Indian Christian Church have come into existence? What occurred was doubtless inevitable since denominational mission boards expected their missionaries to establish denominational churches. In obedience to the terms of their unwritten commission the missionaries could scarcely have done otherwise than they did, but would it not have been a wiser policy for missionary societies to have encouraged the development of indigenous Churches in the several mission fields?

SELF-SUPPORT URGED

From the beginning of Methodist overseas missions in all fields the ideal of a self-supporting church was held before converts. The distinction between a mission, in which all financial support came from abroad, and a self-sustaining church, was explained and converts were constantly urged to assume support of evangelists, pastors, and teachers raised up from among their own people. The Missionary Society felt that support in major part from abroad would foster an attitude of dependence and discourage initiative and development of strength of character in converts.

In Liberia progress in self-support was particularly slow. Forty-three years after the founding of the mission but one Society—that in Monrovia, the capital—was wholly self-supporting.¹³⁵ In China much speedier progress was made. In 1875, twenty-eight years after the founding of the China Mission, two of the Presiding Elders, those of the Foochow and Hinghwa Districts, were entirely supported by the native Church, while the Presiding Elder of the Hokchiang District received three-fifths of his support. At the self-support

* William Newton Clarke: "The Church of England in India has its dioceses and bishops, as at home. . . . Presbyterians . . . introduce into their missions their own polity and their doctrines and traditional practices. . . . In Burma there exist essentially the same Baptist institutions as in America, . . . adopted with the new faith. . . . The question is, Ought the existing Christian denominations to impart their respective peculiarities permanently to the Christian communities that they have helped to found? Will the peculiarities imparted from the west remain in the thought and practice of the eastern peoples? . . . Will the existing denominations stay permanently where in the founding of missions they have been placed?"—A Study of Christian Missions, pp. 161 f.

† Another consequence, wholly unforeseen, of this custom was its use later, in combination with another practice of missionaries—the invoking of the protection of their governments—as the basis for the charge that the missionary movement is simply a means for imposing Western political and economic imperialism upon the Eastern world.

anniversary held at the 1875 annual mission meeting Sia Sek-ong, Presiding Elder, said:

Last year I was sent to the Hing-hwa District. . . . When I reached there, I found a picul of rice and a load of wood awaiting me. The stewards estimated my support at 100,000 cash, and my traveling expenses at 24,000, and they have paid it in full. I have not said a word about my own support during the year, but have had a peaceful heart to go about my work as a preacher of the Gospel.

Ting Mi-ai was supported by the Kiasioh Circuit. He said:

I used to be paid in round foreign dollars, which were very nice to have; but they were an obstacle to the contributions of the people, who thought we had plenty of money. This year I have been paid in potato money [slices of dried sweet potato used as currency by the peasants, so poor that many cannot afford rice] But I have found potato money as good as any other kind. I can get rice, or wood, or anything else I need with it, and I have better heart to preach the Gospel than ever before.¹³⁶

Gradual but steady advance in self-support was registered throughout the China Mission, though so slow that some missionaries despaired of entire self-maintenance ever being attained. Yet there were inspiring instances of really sacrificial giving. In 1890 in his annual report William H. Lacy told of one church member who feared that his cow, which was kept in the one room of the house, "would eat his bed-covering, 'for,' said he, 'we felt we ought to pay our subscription, and to do so we were compelled to sell our bedding, and have filled a cotton cover with straw as our only covering.'" ¹³⁷

It was this spirit manifested by members of the Church, together with the quality of the work of the missionaries, which led Tiong Ahok, not then a professed Christian, to purchase and donate to the mission "the most valuable property in the city of Foochow" as the principal building of the Anglo-Chinese College.¹³⁸

In the early period of the India Mission generous support was given by British and other European residents. In his annual reports to the Board William Butler praised their "munificent liberality," their contributions aiding materially in the erection of schools and mission houses. The extreme poverty of the masses among whom the missionaries toiled raised grave doubts as to the possibility of the development of a self-supporting Church in India. Some questioned whether it would be just to accept even the smallest contribution from people who never had enough food to satisfy their hunger or to provide sustenance for their children. One missionary wrote that an examination of the circumstances in which the people of his Circuit lived "would prove to any fair-minded person the impossibility of a self-supporting mission among them."

Yet from that same District the Presiding Elder reported that several of the native preachers were "wholly or partially supported by the native Churches," ¹³⁹ and another Presiding Elder wrote that despite the fact most of the Christians on his District were so poor they had no money to buy warm clothing in the winter and oftentimes could not sleep at night because of the cold, they had arranged to pay the salaries of certain pastors wholly from funds contributed by the people of the District.

I selected five ordained men to be so paid, and I am thankful to say that these five men, whose aggregate salary amounts to some nine hundred rupees, have been paid in full from the contributions of their brethren. Among other things these poor people have given pigeons, fowls, eggs, pigs, wheat, corn, flour, bread, wood, cloth, sugar cane, potatoes, mangoes, cotton, chaff, straw, and many other kinds of things besides some cash . . .¹⁴⁰

These, however, were exceptional cases. With few exceptions converts tended to assume the status of dependents of the missions. This was not wholly the fault of the native Christians. While in their preaching and teaching the missionaries held before the people the ideal of self-support they did not enforce it as a policy. Impressed by the opportunities for evangelization of multitudes and impatient for rapid progress they called urgently for funds for support of evangelists and pastors for whom the few new converts were unable to supply maintenance. Once dependence of the native workers upon the mission for support was established, transition to self-support was extremely difficult. D. W. Chandler of the Foochow Conference wrote in 1880:

The hearts of even our best preachers are not yet fully converted to our view . . . [of self-support]. The wisdom and devices of man are of no avail to solve the problem of how to make men willing to wholly abandon the aid of the Missionary Society and cast themselves entirely on the people for their support. Therefore we betake ourselves to prayer and supplication.¹⁴¹

Nevertheless, in most of the fields by the close of the period a nucleus of self-supporting churches had been established. Bishop Henry W. Warren, after his episcopal visit to the Orient in 1887, felt strongly that the development of self-supporting, self-propagating churches was the hope of christianizing the world. Writing particularly of North China, he said:

The native preachers are men of real culture, are able workers, and have rich personal experience. If they could feel the needs of these dying and desolate millions, renounce all foreign aid, and throw themselves on native support, and raise up an indigenous Church, they would inaugurate the grandest movement of modern times.¹⁴²

POLICIES GOVERNING MISSIONARY SERVICE

The wide expansion of the foreign missions program, beginning with the establishment of the China and the India Missions, called for decision on matters of principle and policy concerning which no legislation or rules had been established. There were no parallels in the experience of the Church on the home field and no precedents to which the Missionary Society could look for guidance.

The Disciplinary allowance, as has been stated, for married Traveling Preachers in the United States, including Bishops, for the quadrennium 1844-48 was $200. and "traveling expense." No change was made until 1860. During these years no attempt was made to determine a salary scale applicable to all missionaries in a given field. Missionaries' salaries were fixed individually at the time of their appointment. On October 4, 1846, in accordance with recommendations forwarded by George Gary, then Superintendent of the Oregon Mission, the salaries—including table allowance—of James H. Wilbur, David Leslie, and A. F. Waller, the three remaining members of the mission, all three married men, were fixed at $600. each. The salary of William Roberts, as the new Superintendent, was fixed at $800.¹⁴³ Following his appointment to China in 1847 the salary of Moses C. White "including Table expenses [for himself and wife, but exclusive of house rent] and fuel" was fixed at $800.; that of J. D. Collins, an unmarried man, at $500. "including board, light, fuel, and washing."¹⁴⁴ In 1856 the India Committee recommended as salary for William Butler, appointed as the first missionary to India, $810. plus children's allowance of $360.

On April 7, 1858, Durbin brought to the India Committee a detailed statement of support provided by the several missionary societies for missionaries in India. The basic salary recommended for man and wife was $90. per month, plus $5. a month for children under ten years, and $9. for children between ten and seventeen years. This was the first action looking toward a basic salary for a foreign mission field.¹⁴⁵

After Mission Annual Conferences were organized in foreign fields they were expected to prepare estimates of amounts needed for salaries and other necessary expenses, including "table expenses," and house rent. These askings were considered by the Board's field committees and referred to the General Missionary Committee for final action.

Salaries were not materially increased until 1866. In that year the salary for man and wife in China was increased to $950.; allowance for each child, $100. additional; for single man, $575.; for single woman, $475. In 1868 a salary scale for India was fixed at: man and wife, $1,200., children under ten years, $72., over ten years, $144.; single man, $1,000.¹⁴⁶

The matter of furloughs was one on which there was no clearly determined policy. Durbin's idea was that a missionary should dedicate himself to a foreign mission as a lifework—to live and die on the field with no thought of return either for health or family reasons. A memorial came to the 1872 General Conference from seven missionaries to whom "the imposition of life work" seemed particularly obnoxious, asking that certain restrictions and stipulations might be corrected or removed.* The memorial was referred to the Committee on Missions which recommended that changes be made. The General Conference Journal has no report of action taken on the recommendation.¹⁴⁷

The Board was disposed to grant a furlough only if the Annual Conference on the field certified that it was required for reasons of health. This general policy continued in effect throughout the period. The 1885 Missionaries' Manual included this noncommittal statement concerning furloughs:

At appropriate times, and for sufficient reasons, consent will be given to the return of a missionary and his family to this country, at the cost of the Society. . . . No periods have been fixed for such returns.

In 1895 Bishop Thoburn wrote that A. H. Baker, who had been "in India with hardly a day off for more than fifteen years," and had never before asked for a furlough, now being "strongly urged to do so for medical reasons" requested furlough leave. The Board granted the request and made provision in the 1896 appropriations for the expense. At this meeting (October 15, 1895) a committee was appointed "to draw up a set of rules to govern the Conferences in the matter of furloughs."¹⁴⁸

At the second annual meeting of the General Executive Committee, W.F.M.S. (1871), the following statement was adopted for inclusion in the letter of instructions to missionaries: "She must assert her intention to give at least five years of continuous service as a single woman, to the mission work assigned, unless prevented by ill health." No specific provision was made with respect to furloughs until 1875. In that year the General Executive took this action:

In conformity with the requirements of the case and out of regard to the lives, health, and effective labors of our missionaries, we recommend that provision be made by which they may return to this country at the expiration of five years' service, should they desire, and that they be allowed half their regular salary for the first year after return, it being understood that if they continue in the work of the Society in America, their travelling expenses will be paid by the Branch for which they labor.¹⁴⁹

Another problem which confronted the Missionary Society concerned the superannuate allowance of a missionary. Where did the responsibility lie for providing the allowance: in the Annual Conference of which he was a member or in the Missionary Society, which paid his salary? The Society early took the position that since the missionary was an Annual Conference member the Conference had the same responsibility for his superannuate allowance as for the member whose appointments were within its geographical boundaries.

* The protest was signed by Stephen L. Baldwin, J. D. Brown, William Butler, Otis Gibson, J. W. Horne, Henry Mansell, and J. W. Waugh, all returned missionaries.

The fact that while he was on the mission field his salary was paid by the Society instead of by a local church, or churches, did not invalidate his claim upon the superannuate fund of his Conference. However, since this position was disputed by some, the managers in 1840 had placed in the revised constitution of the Society an article stating that the Board "shall have authority to . . . provide for the support of superannuated missionaries, widows and orphans of missionaries who may not be provided for by the annual conferences."¹⁵⁰ As this action was merely permissive, not mandatory, it settled nothing. How complicated the situation became is shown by the case of Moses C. White, one of the first two Methodist missionaries in China. Having resigned from the mission in impaired health he arrived in New York in August, 1853, and applied for superannuate relief. After some preliminary discussions of his case at Board meetings, at a meeting of the China Committee on January 23, 1854, Bishop Janes maintained that as a returned missionary White was entitled to support from the Board pending an appointment. The New York East Conference in 1854 listed him as superannuated but declined to grant any Conference claimant allowance. The Board then suggested to Bishop Waugh to restore White to the China Mission so that as a superannuated missionary he might be entitled to Board support. This the Bishop declined to do, declaring that since White's connection with the China Mission had ceased in August, 1853, he was not entitled to missionary support after that date. The Conference in 1856 maintained that he had no claim on Conference funds and that he should look for relief to the Missionary Society. White at intervals continued until November, 1856, to apply for help, without result. In the meantime he settled in New Haven, Connecticut, where, engaged in the practice of medicine, he became self-supporting.¹⁵¹

In 1882 the superannuated status of a returned missionary was still a moot question.* On September 19 the Board placed on record the statement:

This Board does not favor the supernumerary or superannuated relation for an American Missionary, but a transfer to a home Conference of all who purpose a stay of more than one season in the United States.¹⁵²

The Bishops almost invariably appointed as missionaries ministers who were married men. For lack of a wife Thoburn all but failed being sent to India. When he was approved for appointment by the Board Durbin was under the misapprehension that he was married and when he appeared alone at the Board's office in New York only the fact that the steamship agency refused to redeem the ticket that had been purchased for his passage saved him from being turned back at the last hour.¹⁵³

* As early as 1870, however, it had become the custom of the Missionary Society to pay the salary of a returned missionary for one year.

A very few single women,* in proportion to the number of men appointed, were sent out by the Society for work among women and children. Not until 1888 did the Board employ a layman as an overseas missionary† and then not by its own choice. John O. Spencer, a professor in the Anglo-Japanese College, feeling that he ought not to continue his ministerial relationship in the Church, asked and received a location from his Conference. Since as a layman he could no longer be appointed by the Bishop, it was necessary for the Board to appoint him as a lay missionary.¹⁵⁴

FOREIGN MISSIONS BECOME ANNUAL CONFERENCES

Precedent was established in 1836 for the organization of Annual Conferences on the mission fields of Methodism. The General Conference of that year constituted the first overseas Mission Annual Conference‡:

Resolved, . . . 'There shall be an annual conference on the western coast of Africa, to be denominated the Liberia Mission Annual Conference, possessing all the rights, powers, and privileges of other annual conferences, except that of sending delegates to the General Conference, and of drawing its annual dividends from the avails of the Book Concern, and of the Chartered Fund.'¹⁵⁵

In May, 1848, three months before Oregon was made, by Congressional action, a territory of the United States, General Conference replaced the Oregon and California Missions by the Oregon and California Mission Annual Conference. The Conference met in its first annual session at Salem on September 5, 1849. Without the presence of a Bishop—up to this time no Bishop of the Church had ever visited Oregon—William Roberts, Superintendent, presided. In 1856, in response to an appeal from Germany, the Committee on Missions recommended that the missions in Germany and in the parts of France and Switzerland where the German language prevails should be organized as a Mission Annual Conference. The General Conference adopted the recommendation and in accordance with this action the Germany Mission Annual Conference met for organization in Bremen on September 10, 1856. In the absence of a Bishop, L. S. Jacoby presided.¹⁵⁶

* The first woman missionary commissioned for an overseas field by the Missionary Society was Mrs. Ann Wilkins, a widow. (See Vol. I, 338.) R. S. Maclay, China missionary, in 1850 asked that Henrietta C. Sperry be sent to China to marry him. The Board agreed to send her out as a missionary voting her a salary of $300, and outfit ($150.); also passage (China Committee, "Minutes," Jan. 16; March 1, 1850). In 1858, following repeated action by the China Committee, the Board commissioned Beulah and Sarah Woolston and Phebe E. Potter as missionary teachers for China, each to receive an annual salary of $300, and $150. for outfit. (Ibid., Dec. 18, 1848; Oct. 16, 1850; Jan. 16, 1856; Sept. 14, 1858; Minutes B. M., VI, 214.) In 1860, Libbie A. Husk was sent as a missionary to India. (Forty-second Ann. Rep., M. S. [1860-61], p. 33; "India Correspondence, M. S.," 1856-66, Oct. 19, 1860, p. 71.) In 1862 Sarah E. White and Emma C. Porter were sent to India, and in 1863 Martha Terry and Mary Whitcomb.—Forty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1864), p. 60; "Minutes of the India and Turkey Committee, M. S.," 1855-68, Aug. 18, 1863, p. 71; Minutes, B. M., VI, 453.

† In 1835 and 1838 the Society sent several laymen—farmers and mechanics—as missionaries to Oregon.—See Vol. I, 307 f.

‡ The first session of the newly constituted Liberia Mission Annual Conference was held in Monrovia, Jan. 5-9, 1837, John Seys, Superintendent, presiding.

The General Conference of 1860 gave the Bishops authorization to constitute the missions in India a Mission Annual Conference if in their judgment it would promote their interests, but the authorization was not acted upon during the quadrennium.¹⁵⁷ In 1864, convinced that the organization of overseas missions would tend to bring them under a more direct supervision of the Board and of the episcopacy, the Board of Managers recommended to the General Conference that all foreign missions should be organized as Mission Annual Conferences whenever their condition would "justify such action." In the light of this action, and on recommendation of its Committee on Missions, the Conference adopted this resolution:

Resolved, That, in the judgment of the General Conference, our foreign missions should be organized into Mission Annual Conferences so soon as their condition severally shall render such organization proper, and that such Mission Conferences should possess all the rights, powers, and privileges of other Annual Conferences, with the concurrence of the presiding bishop, excepting that of sending delegates to the General Conference and of drawing its annual dividends from the avails of the Book Concern and the Chartered Fund, and of voting on constitutional changes proposed in the Discipline.¹⁵⁸

To give effect to the resolution, as applied to India, the Conference instructed the Bishops as soon as practicable to organize the India missions into a Mission Annual Conference, and authorized them to organize any other of the missions into Mission Conferences "when in their judgment it is desirable and practicable."¹⁵⁹ In accordance with this action, the India Mission Conference was organized on December 8, 1864, under the presidency of Bishop Edward Thomson—the first Mission Annual Conference in the Orient. Bishop Thomson, in his account of the action, makes this comment:

Natives were admitted and ordained upon an equality with their brethren from America. There was some misgiving in regard to this policy, but I feel certain that it is right. The preachers admitted are well qualified, and could pass a satisfactory examination in any of our Conferences. To exclude them, or to put them under any disability on account of color, would be at once a blunder and a sin.¹⁶⁰

The disabilities imposed on the Mission Annual Conferences caused no little restiveness and some openly expressed dissatisfaction. Why, it was asked, should not Annual Conferences in foreign fields have all the rights and privileges of other Annual Conferences? The proviso that they "should only exercise their limited prerogatives 'with the concurrence of the presiding bishop' was particularly objectionable." It gave to the Bishop a virtual right of veto which was without basis in the fundamental law of the Church, an extent of power which the Conferences in America would have considered intolerable. In the Methodist Quarterly Review James M. Thoburn of India wrote:

A provision so new to the law of our Church, and so extraordinary in its character, very naturally excited the apprehensions of our missionaries, nor have they had their solicitude entirely quieted by the explanations of its supporters on the General Conference floor and elsewhere. The reasons assigned for the measure seem so utterly irrelevant, that those most directly interested can hardly be censured for doubting what its ultimate design was really intended to be.¹⁶¹

The denial to the Mission Annual Conferences of right of representation in General Conference also awakened strong protest. At the next Conference (1868) "all acts of former General Conferences restricting the powers of Mission Conferences" were repealed, and the Liberia, Germany and Switzerland, and India Mission Conferences* were "declared to be Annual Conferences, endowed with all the rights, privileges, and immunities" enjoyed by Conferences in the United States.¹⁶²

This legislation on the Mission Annual Conferences was a far-reaching action—in all probability more far-reaching in its implications than many of the delegates realized. The Church had obeyed the command to carry the message of the Gospel to all the world. Societies, composed of converts who had responded to the call, were being organized in Africa, India, China, and other far-off fields. Was the Methodist Episcopal Church, having preached a universal Gospel, prepared to assume the responsibilities of an ecumenical Church? The General Conference action precipitated widespread discussion. Most pronounced in his opposition was Daniel Wise. "What shall be done with these Churches and conferences in foreign lands?" he asked in two lengthy articles in the Christian Advocate. "Shall they remain ecclesiastically united to the parent Church, be governed by one discipline, superintended by our Bishops, and represented in our General Conference?" His answer was an emphatic No.

Does not all history confirm this view? The apostles did not seek to establish a universal Church, but having given a people the Gospel, left them to their own resources. . . .

. . . let us give the Gospel, with our form of Church government, to as many nations as possible. Let us establish one Methodist Episcopal Church in Africa, another in Germany, a third in India, a fourth in China, and so on until we have reached all the nations; but let us not attempt the suicidal folly of governing those Churches by one discipline, one Board of Bishops, and one General Conference.

In the view of the apostles, Dr. Wise contended, "Church unity consisted not in general ecclesiastical relations, but in oneness of faith and in that devotion to Jesus which has ever been and still is the common bond of fellowship between all Christians.”¹⁶³ Among others, Daniel Curry, editor of the Christian Advocate, 1864-76, also expressed himself strongly in opposition. “An ecumenical Methodism is, happily, an impossibility,” he declared, and efforts toward its realization can “only work harm.” As an alternative he argued for “a national Methodism for each nationality,” in which “our form of Christianity shall be naturalized.”¹⁶⁴

* John T. Gracey, a missionary from India, present at the seat of Conference as a "representative" of the India Mission Conference, was admitted to membership in the General Conference as "Delegate from the India Annual Conference" (G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 282), the first representative of a foreign mission seated in a General Conference. Precedent for this action existed in the seating of "representatives" of Mission Conferences in the South which had been recognized as Annual Conferences (ibid., pp. 24, 127 ff., 140). T. B. Neely contends (The Methodist Episcopal Church and its Foreign Missions, pp. 200, 207, 210 f.) that in both cases representatives (which the General Conference decided to consider "provisional delegates") were not legal delegates and that the action recognizing them as such was unconstitutional.

Despite opposition the organization abroad of regularly constituted Annual Conferences steadily continued. In 1876 the North India, South India, Norway, and Sweden Conferences were organized and in 1878 Foochow. For several years no new foreign Conferences were formed. In 1881 the Italy Conference was organized; in 1884, Japan Conference; in 1886, Mexico Conference, Bengal Conference and Switzerland Conference; in 1892, Bombay Conference; and in 1893 the North China, North Germany, South Germany (created out of former Germany Conference), and South America Conferences.

In 1880 the Bishops, in their Episcopal Address, stated with some feeling of exultation that the Church had brought to the General Conference “for the first time in its history, as members . . . its native converts from the four quarters of the globe.”¹⁶⁵ The picture was not overdrawn. Delegates were present from Europe (three Conferences), and Foochow, North India, South India, and Liberia Annual Conferences—in all, ten delegates.

There were those who continued to hold that the organization of national Churches would be a preferable course. A precedent existed in the setting off of the Methodist Church of Canada in 1828. A resolution instructing the Committee on Missions “to inquire into the expediency of so organizing the foreign missions . . . in Europe and Asia as that the Conference and missions . . . shall become independent bodies” was adopted by the 1880 General Conference. The committee reported that “it is premature to consider at this time the question of establishing independent Methodist Episcopal Churches in Europe and Asia,” and this report also was adopted. At the meeting of the Board of Managers on April 24, 1884, the Committee on Ways and Means laid before the Board a statement, without recommendation, of which Paragraph 2 read:

It seems to us that those of our foreign Missions which have grown to such magnitude as to justify their being constituted Annual Conferences, should be still further recognized as self governing ecclesiastical bodies, with the authority to adjust their polity and administration to the demands of their condition severally, so as to constitute them—instead of foreign Missions, as they now are in their several countries—domestic denominations, or churches, belonging only to their own members, and subject to no foreign ecclesiastical authority.¹⁶⁶

The statement was evidently motivated in part by a desire to lessen the obligation of the Board for financial support and to increase self-support since it called attention to "considerable amounts of church property, and of revenues derived from among themselves" in possession of certain missions, and suggested that they should look "to the Parent Society or Church only for supplementary gifts, which should be used chiefly in aggressive missionary work." A second consideration urged was the presence in most countries of Methodist bodies other than the missions under American Methodist auspices and the desirability of bringing all such organizations "into an organic unity" which could "be effected only by the unrestrained action of the Missions, . . . with the consent of their parent bodies."

The Board, however, was not disposed to turn back from the line of procedure that had been followed for sixteen years and after discussion "the whole subject was postponed indefinitely."¹⁶⁷ When the General Conference (1884) met, the scope of the legislation of 1868 governing Mission and Annual Conferences then existing in foreign fields was broadened by the passage of the following resolution:

Resolved, That all Conferences heretofore organized outside of the United States are now, and all those which may be organized hereafter under the authority of this General Conference shall be, entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities which belong to Conferences within the United States.¹⁶⁸

PROVISION FOR CENTRAL CONFERENCES

The General Conference of 1884 enacted other legislation of great significance to the Church abroad when in response to a petition from India,* and on recommendation of its Committee on Missions, it made provision for a Central Conference.† The action‡ read in part:

When in any of our Foreign Mission fields there is more than one Annual Conference or Mission, or more than one form of Methodism, it shall be lawful, either by order of the General Conference, or by a majority vote of all the Conferences or Missions wishing to unite, . . . to organize a Central Conference.

The Central Conference was given power to "take under its supervision the educational, publishing, and such other connectional interests and work as may be committed to it by the Annual Conferences or Missions; but never in con-

* This was the second appeal from India for authorization of a Central Mission Conference. In 1880 a memorial had been presented to General Conference from India "asking for the authorization of a central body, empowered to deal with such questions as might be common to our churches and missions in India." (J. M. Thoburn, India and Malaysia, p. 299.) But this memorial was not reported out by the Standing Committee on Missions to which it had been referred. Nevertheless, the India missionaries convened a "Delegated Conference" in Allahabad in July, 1881, made up of ministerial and lay representatives of the North India and the South India Annual Conferences.—Minutes of the Delegated Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, p. 1. See also Harry Wescott Worley, The Central Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church . . ., pp. 120 f.; J. M. Reid and J. T. Gracey, op. cit., III, 23 f., 120 f.

† This legislation was also influenced by a proposal for uniting the Methodist missions in Japan of the Methodist Episcopal Church and of the Methodist Church of Canada, as is indicated by the inclusion in the action of the clause "or more than one form of Methodism." This clause was deleted by the 1892 General Conference.—G. C. Journal, 1884, Appendix I, p. 349; ibid., 1892, p. 470.

‡ This action was followed by an enabling act: "Resolved, That a Central Conference be hereby constituted in India, and one authorized for Japan, under the rules just adopted by this General Conference."—Daily Christian Advocate, May 29, 1884, p. 194.

travention of the Book of Discipline, or Rules of the General Conference" 169

The first Central Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church was convened in Bareilly on January 13, 1885, under the presidency of Bishop John F. Hurst, and a second India session was held in 1887, with Bishop William X. Ninde as president. In 1889 the third session, which now included Malaysia, was held.

The 1892 General Conference deleted the proviso, "by a majority vote of all the Conferences or Missions wishing to unite," thus limiting to General Conference the power to institute a Central Conference, but it included a grant of power, under certain limitations, to "fix the boundaries of the Annual Conferences within its bounds." The Central Conference of India and Malaysia held its fourth session in Calcutta in 1892 and its fifth at Allahabad in 1894.¹⁷⁰

EPISCOPAL SUPERVISION OF FOREIGN MISSIONS

That Methodist missions in foreign lands were entitled by right to episcopal supervision was determined by the character of the Church. As an episcopal Church, the denomination had no alternative. As soon as the first overseas mission was established the question of how supervision should be provided became insistent. A first step was the assignment of supervisory responsibility of all foreign missions to one Bishop. A limited measure of supervision was represented by the Bishop's appointment of missionaries and his correspondence with the missions. The increase in number of overseas missions within a few years entailed an undue burden of labor for one Bishop and in 1854 the General Superintendents in council decided to divide the responsibility by committing "each mission or class of missions to one bishop,* that he might give his whole attention, in this respect, to the particular missionary interest committed to him."¹⁷¹

However, this type of supervision did not meet Liberia's need. Describing the situation Dr. Durbin stated that there were no ordained ministers in the Liberia Conference; some men had been eligible for deacon's orders for years but had not been ordained; and some had died, after years of service, without ordination.

It was not to be disguised that this state of things had created uneasiness in the Conference. There was a want of authority and of administration in the mission by a proper officer. There was no way, . . . for the proper authority to be attained, except by a Bishop in the Mission Conference.¹⁷²

The problem of episcopal supervision in Liberia occupied much of the time and thought of the 1852 General Conference. The matter was brought before the Conference by the Committee on Missions in an extended report. The

* Durbin felt that this action marked an advance in the effectiveness of episcopal supervision. Throughout the period 1854-95, in the Annual Reports of the Missionary Society, the name of the Bishop to whom each mission had been assigned was appended to the report of that mission.

petition of the Liberia Mission Annual Conference asked that some measure be taken "to furnish the Church in the Republic of Liberia with Episcopal powers." The committee prefaced its lengthy report by stating, as its unanimous opinion, that Liberia's request ought to be granted. Only three possibilities in their opinion existed: (1) regular annual visitation by a Bishop from the United States (this method the committee rejected as impracticable because of "the unhealthiness of the climate, in reference to white men"); (2) the ordination of a Missionary Bishop* "whose jurisdiction should be confined to Africa, or to the African race"; or (3) the organization, by the Liberia Annual Conference, of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Africa with provision for the election and ordination of a Bishop by the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in America. The committee recommended the third alternative.

The presentation of the report led to long and involved discussion. Finally the Conference resolved

That measures be taken to insure the due exercise of episcopal functions in the Liberia Annual Mission Conference.

Later a second resolution was also passed:

That the General Conference recommend to the Bishops that they make such arrangements as that one of their number shall visit Liberia once or oftener during the ensuing years, as they shall judge necessary.¹⁷³

Pursuant to the recommendation Bishop Levi Scott sailed for Africa late in 1852 and arrived in Monrovia on January 6, 1853. He visited the principal mission stations, convened the Liberia Conference, held many interviews with pastors, officials of the colony, and other persons, and on March 18 sailed for home.¹⁷⁴

This was the first time that a Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church had exercised episcopal authority outside of the geographical bounds of the United States. Scott's visit to Liberia effectively disposed of the objection to episcopal visitation of a foreign mission on the ground that the sphere of authority of a Methodist Bishop was confined to the United States.¹⁷⁵ Many felt that the genius of the general superintendency related every Bishop to the whole Church, and required each "to travel through the connexion at large." To do this obviously necessitated episcopal visitation of the missions in foreign fields. Bishop Scott's visit to Liberia† was followed in 1857 by that of Bishop Simpson to Europe, where he presided over the Germany and

* The Committee on Missions apparently preferred a Missionary Bishop but "deemed it scarcely expedient to introduce into the General Conference the discussion of a measure which looked to the alteration of one of the restrictive rules, and it was judged very doubtful whether such a measure could be perfected."—"Journal of the General Conference, 1852," Appendix, p. 194, G. C. Journals, III.

† Following Scott's visit to Liberia in 1853 there was no further visitation of that mission until 1876. During this interim episcopal supervision was provided by Missionary Bishops. See pp. 176 ff.

Switzerland Conference, and visited the missions in Scandinavia. In 1861 Bishop Janes also visited the European missions. In each case General Conference recorded its approval of the visit.¹⁷⁶

Precedent having been established by the three Bishops, more frequent and extensive missionary tours by the General Superintendents were taken for granted by the Church. In 1864 the Bishops decided, with the concurrence of General Conference, that during the quadrennium one of their number should visit the missions in the Orient. Bishop Edward Thomson made the journey. In 1868 the General Conference went even further, resolving that one of the Bishops should visit India, China, and Bulgaria during the quadrennium; one the missions in Europe; and if possible "also visit South American missions." The Orient assignment fell to Bishop Kingsley, who planned the first round-the-world tour attempted by a Methodist Bishop.* The brevity of his stay made his visit less than satisfactory to missionaries.†

The election of eight Bishops by the General Conference of 1872 made possible still more extensive episcopal visitation, and again the Bishops designated one of their number to go round the world. Bishop Harris, upon whom their choice fell, left New York on May 1, 1873, and returned seventeen months later, having successfully visited all the Methodist missions in Asia and Europe.¹⁷⁸ Several other episcopal tours abroad were made.‡

Bishop Gilbert Haven, accompanied by Dr. J. T. Gracey, went to Liberia in 1876 and in December convened the Liberia Annual Conference. "He visited every place it was safe to visit, (and, alas! some that it was not;)" § but himself attempted no exploratory tours into the hinterland. He found serious abuses being practiced in some of the stations, with which he dealt firmly, and was able to initiate some needed reforms.¹⁷⁹

Other episcopal tours during the quadrennium 1876-80 were made by

* Bishop Kingsley sailed from San Francisco on Sept. 8, 1869. After calling at Japan, he made brief visits at Shanghai, Peking, and other northern China cities, presided over the annual meeting of the China Mission at Foochow, briefly inspected the India mission work, and held the India Mission Conference. He arrived at Beirut on April 4, where, two days later, he died from a sudden heart attack. Burial was in the Prussian Cemetery of Beirut.—J. M. Reid and J. T. Gracey, op. cit., I, 61 ff.; see also Calvin Kingsley, Round the World: a Series of Letters.

† Bishop Kingsley's visit was typical of many. His itinerary allowed approximately one month only for India; three days only for the Moradabad District, with its area of about 2,280 square miles and population of 1,155,173. J. M. Thoburn's comment on his visit was: ". . . a journey for the purpose of practical work should be devised in the interest of practical work. . . . For the mere duty of presiding at an Annual Conference, a Bishop need hardly be sent to the antipodes at all; and if he goes to inspect the missionary operations carried on in a great country like India, the inspection must be more than a mere episode in a great journey to be of any real advantage to any party."—My Missionary Apprenticeship, pp. 198, 243, 244 f.; J. M. Reid and J. T. Gracey, op. cit., I, 62.

‡ Bishop Gilbert Haven visited Mexico in 1873, and Bishop Simpson in 1874. Bishop Foster presided over Mission Conferences in Europe in the summer of 1873, and then "sailed from Liverpool for South America, giving to . . . [the] missions . . . [there] the first episcopal visit they . . . [had] received." In 1874 Harris sailed to Europe. Bishop Simpson presided over the annual meeting of the Italy Mission in July, 1875, and later over those of Germany and Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway.—Episcopal Address, G. C. Journal, 1876, Appendix, pp. 394 f.

§ Despite the extreme precautions taken to safeguard health Bishop Haven contracted malaria and his death on Jan. 3, 1880, was traceable to that infection.—George Pentice, The Life of Gilbert Haven . . . , pp. 486 ff.

Bishops Andrews, Wiley, Bowman, Merrill, and Harris.* Concerning Andrews' extensive trip, covering almost fourteen months, Secretary J. M. Reid says:

This length of time gave opportunity for inspection and intercourse such as no Bishop had hitherto enjoyed, and the satisfaction to the missionaries and the profit to the missions were correspondingly greater.¹⁸⁰

While the more intensive program of episcopal visitation of the quadrennium was gratifying both to the missions and the Church at large fully satisfactory episcopal supervision had not yet been provided. The General Conference of 1880 recommended that if practicable, . . . all the Foreign Missions be visited twice during the ensuing quadrennium; and could these visitations be more protracted, we believe the results would be highly satisfactory.¹⁸¹

This action presented a challenge to the episcopal board, as well as pointing in the direction of some more adequate plan of episcopal supervision than was provided by casual visits to the foreign fields. The Bishops acted promptly and during the four years carried through the most ambitious program of foreign missions' visitation that had ever been attempted.†

Again, in 1884, an undertone of dissatisfaction prevailed in General Conference concerning episcopal supervision of the foreign missions by short-duration visits, even though the visits were more frequent. By formal resolution the Bishops were asked "to advise the General Conference whether, in their opinion, the emergencies of . . . [the] Mission work require that an Episcopal residence be established in Europe, India, and Africa, or in either country." The Bishops returned the answer that "in the light of much experience and observation" (obviously experience and observation only in Liberia, since in that mission alone resident supervision had been tried) their unanimous judgment was that "it would not be wise at the present time to fix Episcopal residences in India, Europe, and Africa, nor in any one of them."

* Soon after the adjournment of General Conference (1876) Bishop Andrews sailed for Europe. He presided over the Germany and Switzerland Conference in July, and organized the Sweden Annual Conference and later the Norway Annual Conference. He attended the meetings of the Denmark Mission and of the Bulgaria Mission. In November he organized the South India Conference and in January, 1877, presided over the North India Conference. In Italy later he convened the annual meeting of the mission there. In early summer he again made a visitation of the work in Germany, Switzerland, and Scandinavia. In 1877 Bishop Wiley made an episcopal visit to Japan and China, and in 1879 visited the missions in Europe. In 1878-79 Bishop Bowman traveled the same circuit as had Andrews two years before. "The missions in Mexico were visited by Bishop Merrill in 1878, and by Bishop Harris in 1880."—Episcopal Address, G. C. Journal, 1880, Appendix, p. 403.

† The annual Conferences of Germany and Switzerland, Sweden, and Norway, and the Denmark Mission, were attended in 1880, 1881, 1882, and 1883 by Bishops Merrill, Peck, Harris, and Foster respectively. The Bulgaria Mission was convened in 1880 by Bishop Merrill. In 1881 he also organized the Italy Annual Conference. The North and South India Conferences were held in 1880 by Bishop Merrill and in 1882-83 by Bishop Foster. The Japan, North China, and Central China Missions and the Foochow Conference were presided over by Bishop Bowman in 1881 and by Bishop Merrill in 1883. Mexico was visited by Bishop Andrews in 1882 and by Bishop Warren in 1884. In 1881 "Bishop Harris visited . . . [William Taylor's missionaries] laboring at different points on the Western Coast of South America, most of whom, though they had been received on trial in the Conferences at home, and had been elected to orders under the missionary rule, had not been ordained, and, during his visit he ordained such preachers . . . , nine in all." From Valparaiso he traveled via the Straits of Magellan to the east coast, holding the annual meeting of the South America Mission in Montevideo in February, 1882.—Ibid., 1884, pp. 35 ff.

Despite this attitude on the part of the episcopacy the General Conference decided in the case of Africa again to elect a Missionary Bishop, but for the Orient recommended that "the Bishops visit each of our Missions and Conferences in Asia twice during the quadrennium, and remain as long at each visit as their other duties will allow."¹⁸²

The recommendation on visiting the missions was followed* and the Bishops in 1888 reported that they had "given adequate time to this work, so that no important interest of the church has suffered by any lack of service." Further, for their part they had "no changes to recommend." However, they seemed to sense a probability of impending change in the prevailing plan of supervision since they suggested that there were "advantages in the visits by the Bishops from this country to the foreign fields which should not be thrown away without positive assurance of sufficient gain" to justify a change. Their visits, they felt, assured a unified administration in different countries, kept "alive the spirit of Methodism," and made possible the gathering of information which, "diffused through the churches at home . . . [was] of untold value" to the people, and to the General Missionary Committee. In addition, it is of untold value to have present for consultation [in the General Missionary Committee meetings] not one merely, but from two to five Bishops who have been upon the ground and have studied the situation in the several missions, and can speak intelligently upon the representations made by the missionaries . . .¹⁸³

The 1888 General Conference made no pronouncement on episcopal visitation but, with a memorial before it from the Central Conference of India asking for a missionary episcopacy, proceeded to elect a "Missionary Bishop for India and Malaysia." This action served as a stimulus to increased episcopal visitation during the ensuing quadrennium.†

Even the more intensive program did not fully satisfy either the missions or the Church as is attested by the action in 1892, taken on recommendation of the Committee on Episcopacy :

Having considered the petition of the members of the South American Mission with reference to increased episcopal supervision, we recommend that the General Superintendents be requested to provide for at least a biennial visitation to this important field, and that the Bishop assigned to this duty take ample time to accomplish thoroughly the work committed to him.¹⁸⁴

* Following the General Conference of 1884 Japan and China were visited by Bishop Wiley on a trip which terminated in his death at Foochow. In the same year Bishop Hurst presided over the North and South India Conferences. In 1886 India was visited by Bishop Ninde. Bishop H. W. Warren in 1887 "made the tour of Eastern Asia," including Japan, Korea, and China. The missions in Europe were visited in 1884, 1886, and 1887, by Bishops Hurst, Foss, and Ninde, and South America in 1885-86 by Bishop Fowler.—Ibid., 1888, pp. 36 f.

† Eight of the Bishops—Andrews, Fowler, Goodsell, Mallalieu, Newman, Ninde, Walden, and Warren—each visited one or more of the foreign mission fields during the quadrennium 1888-92. One of the most extensive visitations was that of Bishop Walden who in 1889 spent nearly three months in Mexico; in 1890 made a tour of South America; and in 1891 attended the Conferences in Europe and visited the missions in Denmark, Bulgaria, and Finland. Bishop Fowler also traveled extensively, making the circuit of the globe, "giving about a year and a half of careful inquiry into the state, condition, and wants of the work in every field." In the course of the quadrennium other Bishops—Andrews, Goodsell, Mallalieu, Newman, and Warren—also visited some part of the mission work in Eastern Asia.—Ibid., 1892, pp. 38 f.; Seventy-third Ann. Rep., M. S. (1891), p. 60.

A MISSIONARY EPISCOPACY FOR OVERSEAS MISSIONS

The action of the 1852 General Conference providing that one of the Bishops visit Liberia "once or oftener during the ensuing four years" did not satisfy those members of the Conference who were committed to the proposal for a Missionary Bishop. Discussion continued at intervals throughout the session, with expression of divergent points of view* involving various motions, amendments, and substitutes. Finally, on the next to the last day, the subject was indefinitely postponed. Nor was the Liberia Mission Annual Conference satisfied with episcopal supervision by occasional visits of a Bishop from America. The Conference wanted a Bishop of its own who would reside in Liberia.

One of the principal stumbling blocks in the way of the creation of a missionary episcopacy was the Third Restrictive Rule, which made the "itinerant General Superintendency" obligatory. But the General Conference of 1856 believed that this provision could be modified and, as a means of effecting a constitutional change, it adopted a form of amendment to be sent down to the Annual Conferences with its recommendation. Assuming that the amendment would be approved it adopted at the same time a resolution authorizing the Liberia Annual Conference "to elect, by a vote of two-thirds of all the members . . . an elder in good standing" for ordination as Bishop, "certifying in the parchment of ordination that his episcopal jurisdiction is expressly limited to Africa." It also adopted, for the "coming four years," regulations stipulating that a Missionary Bishop "shall reside (with his family, if he have one) in the particular mission field assigned him" and that his support "shall be furnished in the same manner as in the case of other missionaries."¹⁸⁵

The recommendation of General Conference, while not mandatory, assured that the Missionary Bishop for Africa would be elected by the Liberia Conference. This was what the Conference desired, although it had been assumed that the practice of election by General Conference would be followed. In January, 1858, Francis Burns,[†] who had come to Liberia in 1834

* Some of the opinions of outstanding leaders of the Church are of historical interest. Charles Elliott favored visits of regular Bishops to Liberia. He did not think that "the Liberia mission was yet prepared for an African Bishop. Men who had the serenity of slavery about them generally made bad rulers." Nathan Bangs thought he saw "the finger of God pointing out the right course to pursue, in raising up a man there [Francis Burns] who had proved his competency to superintend the work." and he favored his election. George Peck did not believe "that the ministers in that mission had reached a position which would warrant an independent jurisdiction." Moreover, it would "not answer to make a Bishop, and send him to Africa, to Italy, to Germany or China, and tell him he is a Bishop there and nowhere else. This would be diocesan Episcopacy." John McClintock declared that the General Conference was "fully competent" to select a Missionary Bishop for Africa without change in the Discipline and favored its doing so at once.—Daily Zion's Herald, May 20, 1852, p. 62; May 28, p. 94.

[†] Francis Burns (1809-63) was born in Albany, N. Y., and in his ninth year was indentured to a farmer. At fifteen he was converted and two years later felt that "God required him to preach" but, being "bound to his master until he was twenty-one," was temporarily hindered. When free he attended high school and was licensed as a Local Preacher on the Windham Circuit. After ten years in Liberia he returned temporarily to New York where he received ordination as deacon and elder. In 1849 he was appointed Presiding Elder, serving in that capacity for ten years. For some years he was editor of Africa's Luminary. He was consecrated as Bishop at the Genesee Conference on Oct. 14, 1858. He had "an intelligent and cultivated mind," was a fluent preacher, and a sincere Christian.—Gen'l Minutes, IV, 409; M. Simpson, Ed., op. cit., pp. 147 f.

as a Local Preacher and teacher,* was elected as Methodism's first Missionary Bishop.

Although the requisite majority of Annual Conferences concurred in the action of its 1856 General Conference in the proposal so to alter the Discipline as to allow the election of a Missionary Bishop or Superintendent for any of the foreign missions the missionary episcopacy failed at first to meet with general favor in the Church.† The tradition of episcopal itinerancy was still strong and while the amendment to the Third Restrictive Rule was not officially declared to be unconstitutional it certainly was a modification of the plan of itinerant general superintendency.¹⁸⁶ The legislation also was opposed on the ground that it created two classes of Bishops, an objection that carried much weight. As later history showed, few capable men relished the idea of being "a second-class Bishop" and, if elected, became restive under the imposed restrictions. When in the 1864 General Conference a proposal was made to enlarge the episcopacy by "the election of two bishops for the superintendency of the work in the United States and territories, and of two missionary bishops, one for the missions in Europe and Asia, and the other for our missions in Africa"—Francis Burns having died in 1863—the Committee on Episcopacy declined to recommend "the election of two missionary bishops" and proposed instead that the Conference elect "three additional bishops." The report of the committee was adopted. The Conference did, however, renew its recommendation that the Liberia Annual Conference elect a Bishop.¹⁸⁷ At its 1866 session Liberia chose John Wright Roberts‡ as the second Missionary Bishop of the Church. As in the case of Bishop Burns his tenure was, within a few years, terminated by death, for two quadrenniums again leaving Liberia without episcopal supervision.

In the Episcopal Address to the General Conference of 1876 the Bishops were frankly critical of the missionary episcopacy in the case of Liberia :

The superintendency of the missionary Bishops, though quite satisfactory to that Conference, failed to inspire the zeal and awaken and direct the enterprises of the Church in that country as largely as it was hoped would be the case when they were elected. Their reports to the Missionary Board and home Churches did not

† The Third Restrictive Rule as amended by vote of the Annual Conferences read: "The General Conference shall not change nor alter any part or rule of our government so as to do away Episcopacy, nor destroy the plan of our itinerant General Superintendency; but may appoint a Missionary Bishop or Superintendent for any of our Foreign Missions, limiting his jurisdiction to the same respectively."—Discipline, 1884, p. 48.

‡ John Wright Roberts (1812-75) was born in Petersburg, Va., and at an early age emigrated with his mother and two brothers to Liberia. In 1841 he was elected to elder's orders by the Liberia Conference and came to New York for ordination. In 1866 he was chosen by the Conference as Missionary Bishop and on June 20 was consecrated in New York. "His grace of manner and his spirit were superior; a gentleman by nature and culture; a Christian in faith and life, he impressed most favorably all with whom he associated . . ."—Christian Advocate, L (1875), 11 (March 18), 85; M. Simpson, Ed., op. cit., p. 759.

keep alive the interest* which for many years was felt in that, our oldest, foreign mission.

The address continued, expressing a judgment that a "personal visit of one of their number" to Liberia was advisable and concluded with the suggestion that the future supervision of the Liberia Conference was a question to which the General Conference should give attention. Also, from Liberia report came to the Missionary Society that some "felt the need of episcopal visits from America to afford them fresh inspiration, and to secure a full and influential presentation of their case among the Churches of the United States."¹⁸⁸

The Committee on Episcopacy gave consideration to certain petitions asking that "a man of African descent" be elected to the bishopric, and other memorials that such a Bishop be assigned to Liberia, but "in view of the statement . . . from the Board of Bishops as to their ability to discharge the duties of the superintendency" recommended that "this [1876] General Conference elect no Bishops."¹⁸⁹

Again in 1880 the missionary episcopacy was a live issue. Liberia sent a petition asking for the election of one of their own number "to the office of Bishop." On the other hand, the Foochow Conference urged that no Missionary Bishop be elected. Some of the German Annual Conferences in the United States sent memorials asking for a German-speaking Bishop.¹⁹⁰ The memorial from the East German Conference wanted a German-speaking Bishop provided a man could be elected "who would be welcome to preside in any of our American Conferences" and who would preside over the German Conferences "only in rotation with the other Bishops, and who, though a German, would in no sense be a Bishop exclusively for the Germans."¹⁹¹ Confronted with such a conflict of opinion, the General Conference took no action.

Once again, in 1884, renewal of demand was voiced for resident episcopal supervision in Liberia. A precedent had been established in the election of two Negro Bishops in succession and many delegates were disposed to adhere to the precedent but certain colored ministers whose names were suggested "declined to accept the responsibility of taking up the duties of a missionary bishop in Liberia."¹⁹² But the General Conference was in no mood to ignore the missionary call of Africa. With the apostolic labors of David Livingstone familiar to every missionary-minded Christian and Henry M. Stanley's dramatic story a topic of conversation everywhere, interest in Africa as one of the great mission fields of the world was greatly intensified.

* An important factor affecting the interest of the Church in the Liberia Mission, of which the Bishops failed to take account, was the radically changed status of Liberia in relation to the problem of the American Negro. Between the election of Francis Burns and the death of John W. Roberts slavery in the United States had been done away and the Church had turned from colonization as a possible solution of the problem to evangelization and education within the United States. Emigration to Liberia ended with the close of the Civil War.

Before the Committee on Missions was prepared to act the Committee on Episcopacy brought forward a resolution:

That, by a unanimous vote, the Committee recommend the election of a Missionary Bishop for Africa.¹⁹³

William Taylor, whose success in establishing self-supporting missions had attracted worldwide attention, was a member of the Conference as a lay delegate.* As though instinctively, the common mind of the delegates turned to him. He was promptly nominated and elected by a large majority. Taylor's comment on his election was:

The nomination, election, and ordination all passed within less than twenty-four hours, so that there was no time to entertain intermediate pros or cons, and nearly the whole Conference seemed to perceive and admit that it was the Lord's doing and marvelous in the eyes of all concerned.¹⁹⁴

Taylor was a controversial figure. His plan of "self-supporting missions" while strongly advocated by some was opposed with equal vigor by others. He was a man of independent spirit, not inclined to submit himself to the rules and regulations of the Missionary Society. He interpreted his election as an official endorsement by General Conference of his "God-given commission of extending Methodism abroad on her most effective and primary method."¹⁹⁵ Instead of looking to the Missionary Society for his personal support he applied to the Book Committee for salary from the Episcopal Fund.†

In the General Conference of 1888 the various matters of issue were referred to the Committee on Episcopacy. The report of the committee as adopted by General Conference declared, in principal substance, that a Missionary Bishop is co-ordinate with the General Superintendents, and amenable to General Conference; that he cannot be made a General Superintendent except by separate election; that he should receive his support from the Episcopal Fund; and that he should "co-operate with the Missionary Society . . . in the same way that a General Superintendent co-operates in the foreign mission field over which he has Episcopal charge."¹⁹⁶ Having cleared the air by approval of the report, the Conference proceeded, as previously stated, to elect James M. Thoburn as Missionary Bishop for India and Malaysia.

The 1892 General Conference considered a proposal from India to make the Missionary Bishops General Superintendents but declined to do so. It

(The Christian Witness and Advocate of Bible Holiness, April, 1886.) He was elected by the South India Conference a lay delegate to the 1884 General Conference.

† Under date of Dec. 20, 1884, Bishop Taylor wrote: "The regular Bishop, and the Missionary Bishop are alike the Episcopal Servants of the Church . . . hence both are alike entitled to a support, directly from the Church, through the 'Episcopal Fund.'" The Book Committee decided that, as in the cases of Bishops Burns and Roberts, support should be supplied by the Missionary Society. The Board of Managers agreed and fixed the salary and house rent at $2,500. per year.—Minutes, B. M., X, 6, 9 ff.

made them ex-officio members of the General Missionary Committee and decreed that their salaries should be fixed by the Book Committee but paid by the Missionary Society. The work of Taylor in Africa and Thoburn in India was heartily endorsed.¹⁹⁷

Writing in 1899 Abel Stevens declared that the missionary episcopacy had fully justified itself as a fixed order of the Church.

It has come to be looked upon by many as a normal development in the progress of Methodism, a necessary accommodation to the universal outspread over the planet which is now its avowed aim and destiny. . . . [The fields of the Missionary Bishops] are . . . so immense as hardly to suggest to the staunchest Methodist any objectionable idea of limitation or localization of their office, or to impair in any way the 'itinerancy' which the Discipline has always enjoined.¹⁹⁸

MOTIVES IN FOREIGN MISSIONS

"One afternoon, during a series of meetings in Marlborough, Ohio," wrote James M. Thoburn,*

I went out into the woods near the village, and kneeling alone among the branches of a fallen maple tree, I talked the matter all over with my Saviour, and there alone with him I received my clear and distinct commission to go and preach his Gospel to dying men. I heard no words, but the commission could not have been more specific and clear had the visible Son of God said to me, 'Go preach my Gospel.'¹⁹⁹

Although he had never before felt any particular interest in missionary work or contemplated missionary service, in his eighteenth year while reading a sermon by Stephen Olin there flashed upon his mind and heart a clear impression that his lifework should be in the foreign field. At that time, according to his testimony, though a communicant in the church he "had not been converted, in the proper sense of that word." Eighteen months later he "found Christ, and began to live the life of Christian discipleship." After two more years he began to preach. Having conscientiously come to the conclusion that God wanted him to preach the Gospel he felt the need "of a clear and definite call," which finally came to him as described above. When an appeal was made in the Christian Advocate and Journal for six young men for India, though formerly he had felt "a singular aversion to India," he

* James M. Thoburn (1836-1922), born of Irish immigrant parents at St. Clairsville, Ohio, entered Allegheny College in 1851. His course was interrupted by two years of schoolteaching to earn money for tuition and other student expenses. In 1857 he graduated, and in response to a strong inner conviction that he should preach, in 1858 was admitted on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference. On April 12, 1859, he sailed for India, where very soon he began to show exceptional qualities of leadership. His appointments in India were: Naini Tal ("Nynee Tal"), 1859-63; on furlough, 1863-66; Garhwal, 1866-68; Moradabad, 1868; Presiding Elder, Moradabad District, 1869; Presiding Elder, Oudh District; evangelistic work in Lucknow, joint editor of The Witness (later the Indian Witness), 1870-73; Calcutta, 1873-88; Missionary Bishop, 1888. From 1900 he was in failing health and in 1908 was retired at his own request. At his death in 1922 the Christian Advocate said of him: ". . . by sheer force of spiritual endowment, breadth of sympathy and administrative skill he won recognition in India, America, and the world, as perhaps the greatest missionary of his generation, perhaps the most effective missionary leader that Methodism has produced."—Christian Advocate, XCVII (1922), 49 (Dec. 7), 1532; J. M. Thoburn, My Missionary Apprenticeship, pp. 9 et seq.; G. C. Journal, 1924, pp. 854 f.

promised that he would respond if only God made clear to him that he was commissioned "from above." He had not long to wait. While on his knees in prayer he received "an acceptance for India" which continued with him as one "long inspiration, an unfailing source of strength and courage."²⁰⁰

A second member of the band of six young men, representing the Methodist Episcopal Church, who went out from America to India in 1859 was Edwin W. Parker.* A few months before his twenty-first birthday in "a protracted meeting" at St. Johnsbury Center, Vermont, he experienced conversion.

"As soon, or nearly as soon, as I was converted," he testifies in his "Journal,"

I felt that I must leave the farm and preach the Gospel of the Son of God and try to call men to repentance. This was impressed upon my mind and I could not drive the impression away. I felt like one of old, and like many of my brethren, 'Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel.' . . . At last I yielded to the convictions of duty, which I could not and dared not resist, and promised 'for God to live and die.'²⁰¹

In 1857 he was received on trial in the Vermont Conference. From this time on he had no other motive or purpose in life than faithfully to fulfill the ministry which he had received in the Lord. And for him to fulfill his ministry meant missionary service in India. For this we have the word of Lois S. Parker, his wife:

Mr. Parker had a conviction very soon after his call to the ministry that he must also be a missionary. His mother had this conviction almost from his birth, but he did not know this until after he began to preach. When he asked me to be his wife he said it was no more than right that I should know of this conviction. I told him that I had felt from a child that sometime I would be a missionary, so that whenever the way opened for him I should not object. . . . in December, 1858, the appointment came, and early in March we left our Vermont home; . . . all our family interests having been satisfactorily arranged for.²⁰²

The prompting that led to dedication to the mission field came to young people in various forms. The Christian motive was inherent in the Great Commission, "Go ye . . ."; it needed only to be acutely personalized, to be translated into terms of definite individual obligation, in order to awaken response in the hearts of young men and women who had consecrated themselves to the Master's service. The inspiration of a message of a returned

* Edwin Wallace Parker (1833-1901) was born at St. Johnsbury, Vt., and was received into membership in the Methodist Church in 1853. Following graduation from Concord Biblical Institute in 1857 he served for two years as pastor in the Vermont Conference. In April, 1859, before sailing for India he was ordained deacon and elder under the missionary rule at the New England Conference (Gen'l Minutes, 1859, p. 59). At the organization of the India Mission Conference in 1864 he was appointed Presiding Elder of the Moradabad District and served continuously in that office, with the exception of three years, until 1900, when he was elected Missionary Bishop. His associate in the India Mission for more than forty years, J. M. Thoburn, said of him: "In the various stages of our organization as a mission, as a Conference, and finally in the creation of our . . . [Central] Conference . . . [he] bore a leading part." He "possessed a marvelous combination of those elements . . . needed in the character of a practical missionary."—J. H. Messmore, op. cit., passim.

missionary, the reading of the life or the letters of William Carey or Henry Martyn, the personal appeal of a pastor or college teacher, the facing of the problem of choice of vocation at high school or seminary graduation—any one of these or some other—interpreted in terms of the call of the Spirit, became the dynamic influence leading to decision.

The first alumnus of Ohio Wesleyan University to go to the foreign field—the first of a long line—was Nathan Sites.* The year after his graduation, "just finishing his first year as junior preacher on a country 'circuit,'" he attended the annual session of the North Ohio Conference. On the evening of the missionary address, while listening to R. S. Maclay, on furlough from China, a letter from Bishop Osmon C. Baker was thrust into his hand. Would he be willing to go as a missionary to China?

It struck him as a summons to duty. He was thrilled through and through. He had never told any one how, ever since his conversion, he had felt a yearning to carry the gospel to those in darkest heathenism.

With keen interest he listened to every word, sought a brief interview with the speaker, then hastened to his room and fell upon his knees in thanksgiving and prayer to God for guidance. Then, without waiting to confer with flesh and blood, he replied to the Bishop that he was willing to go.²⁰³

On September 19, 1861, Sites and his bride arrived at the Methodist Compound on the Hill of Heavenly Rest, overlooking the Bridge of Ten Thousand Ages, in Foochow. Two years later, preaching the "Conference sermon" at the annual meeting of the mission, from the text, "Ye shall receive power after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you, and ye shall be witnesses unto me," he proclaimed in Chinese the invincible Gospel. Within a few months his language teacher, a young Confucian scholar, Sia Sek-ong, arose in the little chapel at Oxvale, twelve miles from Foochow, Sites' first appointment, and confessed his faith in Christ.

It was a great day when, a little later, Bishop Thomson—the former Ohio Wesleyan president—came to Oxvale for a brief visit with his former pupil.

The 'first recruit' reported beginnings made, and his plan of campaign. The Bishop met the Confucian scholar . . . Perhaps he saw in vision a day when the former devotee of Confucius was to represent China in a great General Conference in America and lay his hands in consecration on the head of an American Bishop in the Church of the Living God. He mused, and then his eye flashed . . . :

'I think, my boy,' said Thomson, 'we have begun to take the world.'²⁰⁴

* Nathan Sites (1830-95) was born on a farm near Belleville, Ohio. As a youth he learned the carpenter trade and by carpentering worked his way through Ohio Wesleyan University, graduating in 1859. The same year he was admitted on trial in the North Ohio Conference and appointed as junior preacher on the East Union Circuit (Gen'l Minutes, 1859, pp. 255, 256). Early in his missionary career, as soon as he had mastered the dialect, he showed his pioneer spirit by venturing into outlying villages and more distant places. In 1864 he reported that he "visited in preaching excursions seventy-nine places, usually accompanied by one or two native helpers." He began Christian work in Mintsing (Mingchiang) and in Liutu (Lekdu). He was also the pioneer in Hinghwa. Of him Bishop McCabe wrote: "He was a noble, patient, loving, generous, humble man, who counted not his life dear unto himself, so that he might finish his course with joy in the ministry which he received from the Lord Jesus Christ."—Gospel in All Lands, May, 1895, p. 262; Memoir, Minutes, Foochow Conference, 1895, pp. 93 ff.; Forty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1864), pp. 34 ff.; ibid., 47th (1865), pp. 70 f.

"Until twenty-four hours before my appointment to Lucknow," wrote William Rockwell Clancy* in an autobiographical sketch, "it had never occurred to me that God might call me to be a missionary." He was in attendance at the annual session of the Michigan Conference in September, 1883, when John M. Reid, Missionary Secretary, asked him if he was willing to go to India. Following this conversation Bishop Harris spoke to him.

I explained to him fully why I thought I was not called to be a missionary, but it did not seem to change his mind

. . . I spent most of the [next] forenoon in one of the [Albion] College Class-rooms earnestly seeking to know God's will. Bishop Harris had asked for my definite reply by twelve o'clock on [the next day] Saturday. I wrote to the Bishop . . . 'With reference to our appointment to India, I leave the matter to God and to you.' . . . I . . . had my note passed up to the Bishop. He arose at once and announced my transfer to North India Conference and to Lucknow, India.²⁰⁵

The first medical missionary sent to a mission field by the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, who was also the first woman medical missionary sent to Asia by any denomination, was Dr. Clara A. Swain.† She had been asked to go to India by the Woman's Union Missionary Society of Philadelphia and had come to feel that she would be "without excuse" if the Society should consider her "capable of assuming so great a responsibility." She wrote in a personal letter:

I am so deeply impressed that it is the will of my Heavenly Father that I cannot refuse. I accept the field of labor cheerfully, although it has caused me many tears and much prayer to make the decision.²⁰⁰

On the organization of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, preferring to go out under the auspices of the New England Branch, she obtained release from the W.U.M.S. and sailed for India on November 3, 1869.

In 1869 Fannie J. Sparkes‡ offered herself for India. C. W. Judd, India

* William Rockwell Clancy (1858-1929) was born on a farm near Newburgh, Ontario, Canada. He attended a country school and, later, Newburgh Academy. Leaving school at sixteen he became the teacher of a backwoods rural school eighty miles from a railroad, continuing teaching for four years. In 1880 he was received into the Montreal Conference of the Methodist Church in Canada. In 1882 he became a member of the Michigan Conference (Gen'l Minutes, 1882, p. 221) and in 1883 was transferred to the North India Conference and appointed to Lucknow English Church. For forty-five years he continued in missionary service, for much of the time as Presiding Elder. He was a devout minister, and especially successful in money raising, receiving in direct gifts many thousands of dollars from acquaintances and friends in America.—"Autobiography," typewritten sketch in the Library of the Board of Missions of The Methodist Church, pp. 1 et seq.

† Clara A. Swain (1834-1910) was born at Elmira, N. Y., of English parentage. The family having moved to Castile, N. Y., she attended the Castile public school and Canandaigua Seminary. For seven years she taught in a public school in Canandaigua. In her early twenties she decided to become a physician and finally attained her ambition, in 1869 graduating from the Woman's Medical College, Philadelphia. For sixteen years she served as a medical missionary of the W.F.M.S. In 1885 she accepted a position as physician to the family of the Rajah of Khetri, at the same time continuing to do missionary work under the patronage of the rajah. She retired in 1896.—Mary Sparkes Wheeler, First Decade of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with Sketches of its Missionaries, pp. 59 ff.; Louise Manning Hodgkins, The Roll Call. An Introduction to Our Missionaries, 1869-1896, p. 2.

‡ Fannie J. Sparkes (1844-1919), born in Binghamton, N. Y., the first missionary of the New York Branch and the third sent to the field by the W.F.M.S., was for several years a teacher in the Binghamton public schools. She sailed for India on Sept. 21, 1870, and was appointed to Bareilly as a missionary teacher. For eight years she was superintendent of the Bareilly Girls' Orphanage. In 1877 she left the field on health leave, returning to India in 1879. For two years (1889-91) her work was in Muttra. missionary, told her that he had been praying to God to direct him to some young woman willing to volunteer for missionary service. Her pastor and her Presiding Elder asked her prayerfully to consider becoming a missionary. The Corresponding Secretary of the New York Branch wrote, asking her if she was willing to go to India. In these communications she saw evidences that God was opening the way before her.

The real call I can never tell to any one; it was the voice of God speaking tenderly, yet commandingly, oft times and in oft-repeated tones to my inmost soul, and with such conviction and assurance as left no room for doubt or hesitation. I knew with all the certainty that I then knew I was his child, that God was leading me, and I dared not refuse to follow.²⁰⁷

Not always were friends and trusted leaders the means of making plain the purpose and plan of God. To some the revelation came as a direct message from on high. Louise M. Hodgkins tells of the experience of Kate B. Blackburn* who for years was the head of a Methodist girls' school in Bulgaria:

when quite alone the call to mission work came to her, and quite alone, but not without a long inward conflict, she gave herself to God for his service. . . . Her lonely and eventful journey [to Bulgaria] deepened her faith in divine guidance, and when she was made principal of the Loftcha Boarding School . . . she undertook this unexpected responsibility with the conviction that her life was a plan of God and this unsought care a part of his plan.²⁰⁸

In all of these accounts is to be seen evidence of the resoluteness of faith which is an indispensable element in the purpose of the true missionary, even as the one of old declared, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." At the farewell meeting in Fifth Street Church in Philadelphia, of which she was a member, Emma Michener, † about to embark for Liberia, said:

I have been asked, if I knew I would die from the effects of the climate, would I still persevere in going? I can only answer, "Yes!" If I can be the humble means of the conversion of one soul in that land . . . , I would go²⁰⁹

As the fifty years of our period drew toward their close the Bishops declared that † Emma Michener resigned her position as a public school teacher to become a missionary to Africa. When urged to choose a less hazardous field she replied, "I believe the Lord calls me to go to Africa. . . . If my death in Africa is worth more to him than my work, I am his to do his will." When, after a severe illness, she was urged to return to America she said, "I came to Africa to work for God; I would rather die here than return before my work is done."—Mrs. S. L. Keen, "In Memoriam . . ." Heathen Woman's Friend, XIII (1882), 9 (March), 200-201.

more and more the Church must take on the obligation to extend and multiply its missionary agencies. The direct command of our Lord, still unfulfilled, urges this as the great duty of the hour. We must go with the message of salvation, or prove recreant to our communion. There are a thousand doors open to us and millions of voices calling for us. To fail is treason to our trust. While feeling the onus of the great work committed to us, and while lamenting past failures, there is reason for a measure of rejoicing that the Church is more and more awake to its duty, and disposed to discharge it, as seen in the great growth of its benefactions.²¹⁰

MISSIONARY METHOD

At the beginning of the period, and for years following, the Church offered no special preparation for missionary service. The early Methodist missionaries to China, India, and Africa knew very little about the manners, customs, conditions of living, and religious rites and beliefs of the people, or about "the practical working of missions among non-Christian peoples." They had no acquaintance with the languages, spoken or written, of those among whom they were to work. The first missionaries to China, Collins and White, were typical of missionary recruits in general. Concerning them Daniel Curry, a member of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society, wrote:

They were furnished in their own persons with fair natural parts, a college education, . . . personal piety, and zeal for souls. They lacked maturity of mind and heart; [and] they knew very little of public life and the ways of the world²¹¹

Under these conditions it was to be expected that the same agencies and methods used in evangelization in America would be used on the foreign field. In 1873 Edwin W. Parker, at the time Presiding Elder in North India, wrote:

[The means used for] reaching the heathen are, preaching in the market-places, at religious fairs, and in the open squares of a city, ward, or a village, teaching the Bible in our schools, holding Sunday-schools, visiting in shops or houses wherein the way may be open, and distributing religious books. . . . The means used for building up and educating the native Church are the same as Methodists use every-where.²¹²

Much the same descriptive statement concerning methods in use might have been made by any one of the early Methodist missionaries in any foreign field.

PREACHING: A UNIVERSAL METHOD

Of these several means the one universally recognized was that of preaching, by no Church more depended upon than by Methodism. "The one business which Jesus Christ intrusted to his Church . . . was that of preaching the Gospel to every creature," declared Bishop Edmund S. Janes. "This is our one great mission . . . [which arises] from the commission from our Lord and Master."²¹³ Methodist itinerants always had been above all else preachers of the Gospel and it was not to be expected that when American Methodism crossed the seas their primary method would be anything different.

The most intense desire of the missionary newly arrived upon the field was to be able to preach to the people in their own tongue. From the day of his arrival at Naini Tal—his first appointment in India—Thoburn wrote, he had such a longing to speak to the people that he felt willing to “make any sacrifice if only . . . [his] stammering tongue could be loosed.”

On the 27th of March, which chanced to be the anniversary of my farewell meeting in St. Clairsville, I . . . took my stand in the bazar, and attempted to preach. An audience quickly gathered, and God opened my lips so that I was able to speak with great freedom. From this time forward I preached twice a week in the bazar, but it was not till five months later that I was able to conduct an entire service in the chapel. When that point was reached and passed I felt happy indeed.²¹⁴

When the native language was mastered the missionary literally went everywhere preaching the Gospel. In the Orient usually as a first step a “street chapel”—a single room on a busy city street—was rented or constructed in which preaching services were held on both weekdays and Sundays. “For more than five years,” wrote George R. Davis from Peking in 1877, “has our street chapel been open for almost daily preaching on one of the busiest and most important streets in the business portion of this great city.” In India the missionaries, accompanied by their Indian associates, also frequented the market places or “bazaars,” gathered a group by singing, and preached to as many as had ears to hear. Describing the work in Pilibhit, Bareilly District, in 1865, Joel T. Janvier—the first native preacher of the mission—wrote to his Presiding Elder:

The truth of the Gospel is preached in the bazaars and streets, yes, even to passionate and malicious people; and yet they often hear it with meekness and reverence. In every preaching hearers are gathered together from fifty to one hundred. . . . This is done three days in each week. One day is set apart for visiting and conversing in their houses and shops, to convince and offer the Almighty Redeemer.²¹⁵

Sometimes a stated preaching place was established, such as the “spacious open court in front of the treasury building” in Foochow where in 1862 R. S. Maclay testified he had had the privilege of preaching for a year “under the overarching boughs of immense banyans.”²¹⁶ In contrast to efforts made to reach crowds of people, smaller groups were addressed in the mohallas of city and village. Circuits were formed somewhat after the fashion of pioneer preaching in America. In 1880 Henry Mansell was in charge of the Moradabad Circuit, North India Conference, with “seven Mohallas in Moradabad city and two in Chandausi” with weekly services in each, the program including "singing and prayer, then preaching, exhortation or conversation" as circumstances suggested.²¹⁷

In both India and China long preaching tours were frequently made by missionaries who usually traveled "on foot from village to village, sleeping at night in . . . tent[s]." Jefferson E. Scott reported in 1877 having spent five months itinerating in the Oudh District, North India, during which he preached "in three hundred villages."²¹⁸ Journeys for the purpose of preaching were also frequently made to the melas, or religious fairs, where uncounted thousands assembled in celebration of their religious rites. Samuel Knowles tells of one of many such journeys, this more encouraging in results than many others, made in 1887 by the "Gonda Band":

[We] itinerated to the Ajudhya mela, where, at the full-moon (purn-mashi), 300,000 people were assembled . . . Vast crowds of these devotees, who had come near and afar . . . listened earnestly to our preaching, and every morning and evening witnessed many conquests for the true and living Saviour Jesus Christ.²¹⁹

An unusually long tour was made in 1892 in West China, recorded by Spencer Lewis, Superintendent of the West China Conference:

Brother S. A. Smith took a journey to the capital of the Yunnan Province; thence two weeks westward to Tali; thence . . . northward to the capital of this [Szechwan] province, and home. . . over four months of nearly constant travel were consumed in making the journey of about two thousand miles.²²⁰

Despite the handicaps under which missionaries labored in constant preaching, often to crowds of seemingly utterly indifferent people, the missionary was usually happier in this than in any other kind of activity.²²¹ He had been taught to have implicit faith that the sowing of the good seed of the Word would in God's good time bring forth abundant fruit and in this confidence he found reassurance and joy. As the years passed with only meager results to show for their labor some could not but lament. For "over twenty years," Maclay wrote from China in 1870, "successive missionaries have preached the Gospel within the walls of this great city . . ." Yet, he added, "it is our painful duty to state that we have less than twenty converts resident within these city walls."²²²

Yet many continued to place their chief reliance in the traditional method of preaching to the multitudes. "We still have the utmost faith in this kind of work," wrote Henry Mansell in 1880, "thinking it the most efficient mission work that can be done."²²³ Others increasingly questioned it.* In 1883 James W.

* Julius Richter: "Only gradually . . . have missionaries come to realize the extent to which the Hindus live in a wholly different world of thoughts and ideas. The first proclamation of the gospel rushes past the spiritual ear . . . unmarked and uncomprehended, and long preparation and tillage of the field of the heart is necessary before Christian ideas can find soil in which to grow. This is the reason why the almost universally adopted method of the middle of last century has been abandoned of journeying through entire provinces and travelling many hundreds of miles preaching the gospel . . ."—A History of Missions in India, pp. 282 f.

Vaugh wrote from Lucknow :

An hour's talk with half a dozen or half a hundred persons quietly seated of an evening, when there is little danger of interruption, the talk being interspersed and enlivened by the singing of bhajans, accompanied by a few musical instruments, as is our custom, is far more effective in leading the minds of the people to think and to right views, than two hours spent in declamation or wrangling in the heated bazaar, with its painful interruptions. I hope to see bazaar preaching more and more take this simpler, safer, and more effective form of work. The classes more readily influenced are thus reached and affected.²²⁴

Preaching was invariably accompanied by the distribution of tracts and Scripture portions and the selling of low-priced Christian books. Always following preaching in street chapels and market places leaflets in the vernacular were handed to all sufficiently interested to accept them. Virgil C. Hart of the Central China Mission reported in 1876 thousands of books sold on trips on the Yangtze River made by members of the mission sailing 200 miles below and 150 miles above Nanking. On the Bombay District in India within a single year 50 copies of the New Testament, 7,000 gospels, and 20,000 vernacular tracts were sold, and over 10,000 leaflets given away.²²⁵

SCHOOLS AND TEACHING

Within a short time most of the missionaries became convinced that preaching, in itself, was not enough. A lack of constancy was in evidence in the cases of many of those who in response to preaching professed conversion and received Christian baptism. It became clear that the minds and hearts of a considerable part of the converts were stony places with little soil in which the good seed could find permanent rootage. The activity of the Bible societies in translating the Scriptures into the principal vernaculars also served to remind the missionaries that no amount of preaching could prepare their converts to profit by the reading and study of the Word, increasingly made available. Again, it was soon evident that while preaching made converts among young men there was no way by which it could be successfully used in reaching women. "We want Christian wives for our Christian young men," wrote Erastus Wentworth within a few years of the founding of the China Mission.

We have already baptized and brought into the Church a number of single young men, but no single young women. All these youths will have to betake themselves to the Hittites for wives, or remain unmarried . . .

Girls converted in Christian schools, and returning into the bosoms of heathen families, will carry with them the results of Christian instruction, and sow the seeds of Gospel truth . . . in quarters where no other influence could possibly be brought to bear. Christian school girls make Christian wives and Christian mothers.²²⁶

A need for trained Christian helpers was keenly felt from the beginning and it was realized that to provide for meeting this requirement elementary schools were a necessity. "We cannot begin at the top to educate," said Edwin W. Parker, a statement obvious to all.

These several influences were all contributing factors in leading the early missionaries to establish elementary schools, supplementary to their preaching ministry.* On February 28, 1848, less than six months after his arrival in China, Judson D. Collins opened a school for boys in Foochow and twenty-two months later—December 30, 1850—the first school for girls was begun by Mrs. Robert S. Maclay. Soon schools of other types were established and within two decades teaching the Christian religion had come to be recognized as equally important with preaching as a method of evangelization.

In India and in other fields much the same course of development occurred. In 1859, three years after the India Mission was established, report was made of two boys' schools, with twenty-five pupils, and one girls' school with sixteen enrolled. The next year there were eight schools with a combined enrollment of 171. In his report William Butler said: "In reference to schools, it may be remarked that at least one male and one female school at each of our stations . . . may be regarded as a necessity . . ." Isabella Thoburn, the first missionary to India of the W.F.M.S., began her work in 1870 by opening a school for girls. Beginning with a nucleus of six pupils, by the close of the first year the enrollment had increased to twenty-five.²²⁷ By 1878 in almost every Methodist missionary station in India the Society had established a school for girls, with an aggregate enrollment of more than a thousand students. By 1893 it had become the established policy in India not to baptize converts won by preaching more rapidly than they could be taught and trained.²²⁸

In Japan, as in India, the first missionary of the W.F.M.S.—Dora Schoonmaker—began by establishing a school. She used a furnished room in Tokyo, tendered rent free by a Japanese who had become interested in Christianity through the efforts of Julius Soper. A brief paragraph from a letter written soon after her arrival in Japan is a revelation of her spirit, purpose, and method:

I begin work . . . next Monday, November 16 [1874]; I expect to teach two hours each afternoon, Saturdays and Sundays excepted. By . . . teaching English I hope to gain an acquaintance with the character and customs, habits of thinking and manner of life among this strange and interesting people. While thus studying the avenue to their hearts, I shall, by diligent study, be gaining their own language and be better fitted to begin the work properly. My school will at first consist of both boys and girls; but it is the distinct understanding that my real business here is to seek to build up a girls' school. Of course, my design is to unite other work with this as fast as possible.²²⁹

Also in Uruguay, South America, the W.F.M.S. began its work by opening

* It should be noted that when the China Mission was authorized by the Missionary Society the China Committee urged the establishment, as soon as possible, of schools for boys and girls because, they said, "Little can be done toward a permanent establishment of Christianity anywhere, without training up the young in the fear of God . . ."—China Committee, "Minutes," March 26, 1847.

a school for girls which soon made an established place for itself in the life of Montevideo, the national capital, and opened many doors for evangelical missionary activities. In Chile by 1894 the work of the schools had won such wide recognition and had resulted in so many conversions that by far the larger part of the missionary personnel were engaged in the school program and it had come to be regarded as the basis and a chief means of support of the Methodist evangelistic movement.²³⁰

In stating that the Christian school was the most effective method of the promulgation of the Gospel Abel Stevens expressed the common mind of American Methodism at the close of the period under review. He wrote:

Its promulgation, in any way, is what in the apostolic age was meant by 'preaching' it, and I am convinced that in India, China, and Japan Christian instruction is the best preaching and the school is the best chapel. . . . Besides this instrumentality we should have, and do have, the homiletic or pulpit mode of preaching. The two should be combined, and are, in all our Missions there. It should not be a question among us which is the most desirable; both should be considered indispensable and inseparable.²³¹

In all mission fields the Sunday school was considered an important auxiliary of the mission school. Wherever there was a day school the missionaries assumed that a Sunday school also should be maintained. On March 5, 1848, the Sunday following the opening of the school for boys in Foochow, Collins held the first Sunday-school session.

Brenton H. Badley of the North India Conference reported in 1877 that of eight hundred pupils in the mission day schools seven hundred were enrolled in the Sunday schools. From Moradabad, Lois S. Parker wrote in 1878 that a Sunday school was maintained in connection with each of the twelve day schools.²³²

T. S. Johnson in reporting on the Shahjahanpur Circuit, North India, in 1880 said:

[Sunday schools] have been inaugurated through the agency of the day-schools, in each of which, twenty-two in number—including girls' schools—there is a Sunday-school, composed generally of the scholars of the day-schools, with a few others who are induced from time to time to attend.²³³

While as a rule the best organized and most effective Sunday schools were those connected with the day and boarding schools, missionaries showed considerable ingenuity in adaptation of form and method in teaching. In some fields, particularly India and Africa, many outdoor Sunday schools were established. Even though "they are of a very elementary character," wrote Archibald Gilruth of the Bengal Conference, "we believe there is promise of much good in them." Children were assembled wherever they could be brought together—"under a tree or by the side of a wall." By pictures and stories they were made familiar with simple truths which they had previously heard in street preaching or elsewhere. Texts were memorized and Scripture picture cards distributed to be taken home. In some cases Sunday schools were held in the homes of native workers. What was probably "the first heathen Sunday-school of any kind in Lucknow" was begun by a Bible woman who gathered "the women who could come, and the children, into her home on Sunday afternoons."²³⁴

Wherever conditions made it possible a Sunday school was organized in connection with every Methodist Society. In some instances the Sunday school was first established, followed later by the church; in other cases both types of work were carried on simultaneously. In Nagasaki, considered to be one of the most difficult fields for missionary work in Japan, over a period of years fourteen Sunday schools were opened in various crowded city neighborhoods. They proved to be a vital influence in breaking down prejudice and "in winning friends for Christ."²³⁵

Albert H. Baker, appointed in 1888 to the Bangalore, India, Tanil Circuit, shared the conviction of the Nagasaki missionaries that the best way of establishing "effective personal contact with the people" was through the children. A score of villages were located within a four-mile radius of the St. John's Hill Church of which he was pastor. He formed "two Sunday-school circuits, each of the eighteen schools meeting for one hour, [the first two] beginning at 6.30 in the morning. . . . Altogether, two thousand homes were reached."²³⁶

The most famous Methodist Sunday school in China was that associated with Asbury Church, of which Leander W. Pilcher, president of Peking University, was for many years the superintendent. By 1890 the attendance, often exceeding four hundred, had outgrown the capacity of the chapel, necessitating two separate sessions—one attended by pupils of the mission schools, and the other by women and children of the neighborhood.²³⁷

The Sunday school dissociated from the day school cannot be said to have been a highly effective educational agency. The attendance of pupils was irregular and the teaching superficial. In some cases seed was sown which took root, matured, and in time produced abundant fruit in Christian experience and character. But for the most part the proportion of pupils who became Christians and united with the Church was discouragingly small. Nor did the schools exert appreciable influence upon the non-Christian communities in which they were located other than to increase somewhat the friendliness of the people and lessen the difficulties of approach to them in their homes.²³⁸

HEALING THE SICK

From the beginning of Methodist foreign missions the healing of the sick was associated with preaching the Gospel. When the establishment in the near future of a mission to China was contemplated, Edmund S. Janes, Bishop in charge of foreign missions, advised Moses C. White—in addition to his theological studies at the Yale Theological Seminary—to attend “Medical lectures as a special preparation” for his work in China. His Presiding Elder, Laban Clark, called on the dean of the Yale Medical College and requested that White have “all the assistance possible” in his medical studies, as preparation for missionary work. He arrived at Foochow on September 6, 1847, and in the following February opened a dispensary of which he remained in charge until the arrival on July 9, 1851, of Isaac W. Wiley, M.D.,* appointed to China as medical missionary.²³⁹

The attitudes which inclined men and women to devote their lives to missionary service—sympathy, compassion, love, desire to help the unfortunate and weak who cannot help themselves—influenced them, when they arrived on the mission field, to do what they could to relieve suffering. Lois S. Parker possessed a natural gift in caring for the sick. For twenty years, before the arrival of a medical missionary in the city of Moradabad, she “distributed medicines in the city, in the villages, on the roadsides.” Wherever she went she made it her business to visit the sick and administer first aid. She associated with herself two native medical Bible women. When fever and cholera epidemics struck, she spent days in personally attending the victims. Like many another missionary, not professionally trained, she maintained a successful lay medical practice.²⁴⁰

Mrs. D. W. Thomas, whose husband was superintendent of the Bareilly orphanage, often devoted her mornings to dispensing medicines, meanwhile praying that a woman medical missionary might be sent to India from America. Believing that her prayers would be answered, she formed—in association with her husband—a select class of orphanage girls to whom she gave instruction preparatory to medical training. When Dr. Clara A. Swain arrived in Bareilly she found a class of seventeen girls awaiting her. At the end of a three-year course a medical examining board certified thirteen of the seventeen for practice “in all ordinary diseases.” Their training had included class teaching, work in the dispensary, nursing the sick in the orphanage, and accompanying Dr. Swain on visits to patients.²⁴¹

Among missionaries in general, medical work was regarded primarily as a means of gaining access to the people, of opening doors that otherwise would remain closed. Only a few regarded healing of disease as a ministry of grace, a means of spiritual as well as bodily help. The prevailing view was expressed by Charles W. Judd, Presiding Elder of the Kumaon District, North India Conference:

* Isaac William Wiley (1825-84), born at Lewistown, Pa., was converted at the age of thirteen and became a Local Preacher when nineteen. Upon graduation in 1846 from the medical school of New York University he combined a medical practice with preaching. In 1850 he joined the East Genesee Conference. Following his service in Foochow as a medical missionary (1851-55) he filled pastorates in Newark and Jersey City, N.J. He was principal of Pennington Collegiate Institute, N.J., for five years (1859-64), and editor of the Ladies' Repository for the next eight years. In 1872 he was ordained Bishop. In addition to his medical degree, he also had an M.A. from Dickinson College and a D.D. from Wesleyan University. He was married twice, to Frances J. Martin in 1846, and to A. Elizabeth Segar in 1867.—T. L. Flood and J. W. Hamilton, Eds., op. cit., 771; Biographical File, Board of Missions Library.

The medical work has not produced very much fruit in directly saving the heathen, but it gives our preachers (particularly those who are doctors) more ready access to the people, and creates a bond of sympathy between the heathen and Christians generally.²⁴²

In no other field was medical work so effective in making the people of a whole nation receptive to Christian missions as in Korea. The "history of missionary work in this country," wrote Dr. W. B. Scranton in 1899, "begins with medicine."

Medicine opened the country and is still sowing its seeds far and wide. It has done . . . more [than any other agent] to further missionary work. In this short time it has gone from one end of the land to the other, and is a vital force at work in disarming the prejudices of the natives against foreigners. . . . It is undermining their own inferior practice of the art, and, best of all, gaining a strong hold on the hearts of the people.²⁴³

IV

Nature and Scope of Domestic Missions

DURING THE PERIOD 1845-95, as in early American Methodism* (1789-1844), domestic missions† were a principal factor in the geographical extension and development of the Church. Decade by decade as the half century passed the domestic missions' program was expanded until before the end of the period it had reached immense proportions.

CONFERENCE MISSIONS

As had been the case from the time of the organization of the Missionary Society, Conference missions continued to be described as "missions in the destitute portions of the regular work." In the first report after the division of the Church the necessity for Missionary Society aid was clearly realized:

There are many portions of our itinerant work where the ground is new, the population sparse, or the societies small and feeble, which, but for the assistance we have rendered them, must have greatly suffered for want of spiritual instruction.

A "vast region along the western and northwestern borders" where the laborers were comparatively few, the Secretary pointed out, presented a most inviting prospect for missionary effort. It was especially necessary, he felt, that the missions of the Rock River, Michigan, and Iowa Conferences should "receive additional aid."¹

The Report issued by the Missionary Society at the close of the first year following the division of the Church (1845-46) listed about one hundred and forty missions in twenty Annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church. In 1850, at the beginning of John P. Durbin's administration as Corresponding Secretary, 360 missions were listed in twenty-nine Annual Conferences, with 380 missionaries. Five years later (1856) missionaries had increased to 644 in thirty-eight Conferences and when a decade had passed (1866) the missions numbered approximately 1,418. By 1874

* See Vol. I, 257-58.

† Throughout the period 1845-95 the descriptive term "Domestic Missions" was exclusively used by the Missionary Society to designate all missions within the boundaries of the United States. Early in the period "Home Missions" came increasingly into use in public addresses and in missionary literature but was not used in official documents.

the Missionary Society was supporting, in whole or in part, more than three thousand missionaries in the domestic field. From about this time the number of Conference missions gradually decreased.²

The method of appropriation called for the General Missionary Committee—to which an estimate of the needs of each Conference had been presented by the Missionary District representatives respectively—in collaboration with the Missionary Society, to make a lump-sum appropriation to the Annual Conference.* The Conference in turn distributed the fund to the missionary Districts, Circuits, and Stations on approval of the Conference Committee on Missions,† and the sanction of the presiding Bishop.³

For several years, beginning in 1851, the English-speaking missions in the Conferences were considered to be of three types: (a) missions in "new States, and in the Territories where the populations . . . [were] sparse" and church members so few as not to be able without assistance to meet the expense of maintaining a local Society; (b) missions in rural districts, villages, and towns—many in the older Conferences—where the Church had not been able "to establish herself fully"; (c) city missions "in dense and vicious districts, and among the poorer or more destitute portions of the population."⁴

MISSIONS IN THE NEW STATES

The Missionary Society had a well-defined philosophy in relation to its program of domestic missions in the new states. The members and friends of the Church in frontier communities, limited in number, could not be expected to meet unaided the expense of maintaining a Society and paying a missionary's salary.

By sending them a pastor, and affording them an appropriation from the missionary funds, they lay the foundation of a Church, which, as it grows requires less missionary support, until in a few years, it becomes a self-supporting Church, and begins to contribute to the missionary cause. . . . The value of such a movement may be seen in Ohio and Indiana. Our ministers were first upon the ground in these States, and our Church now stands foremost there in the sacramental host of God's elect. So we must endeavor to do in Illinois, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and on westward to the Rocky Mountains.⁵

While the population growth of the West was phenomenal not less remarkable was the rate at which the social institutions of the older regions of the country were established in the new states and territories. Settlers were

* The Missionary Society was not able to meet all the demands made for domestic mission aid. As a means of providing additional support the General Conference of 1848 provided that any Annual Conference was at liberty to organize a Conference "domestic missionary society with branches" and assume the support of missions already established within its borders, or to be established, "provided such organizations shall not interfere with the collections for the [general] Missionary Society . . . as required by the Discipline" and that, if more funds than were needed should be raised, the surplus should be sent to the Missionary Society. This action was reaffirmed by the 1852 General Conference.—"Journal of the General Conference," 1848, p. 92; ibid., 1852, pp. 140 f., in G. C. Journals, III.

† The Missionary Society each year notified the presiding Bishops of the sums for which they were authorized to draw on the Society Treasurer for the respective Conferences over which they presided.

interested in securing for themselves the advantages of post offices and railway stations but many of them were even more concerned for schools and churches, and displayed initiative and resourcefulness in meeting community religious needs.* In some cases appeal was made to Methodist Presiding Elders for missionaries or pastors. In 1854 David Burns, while Presiding Elder of the Grand Rapids District, Michigan Conference, reported an appeal from the people of a village of three to four hundred inhabitants at the mouth of the White River:

We do not profess to be Christians; we are wicked, and know it, and for this reason we want a minister. As it is, we have no Sabbath, no minister, no gospel, no schools of any kind. Our children are growing up almost heathens. Most of us were brought up in a land where we had Sabbaths, ministers, churches and schools. We feel that we can live no longer without them. And this is not all. When one of our children, or friends, or neighbors die[s], there is no one to make a prayer, preach a sermon, or make any religious remarks by way of comfort to the bereaved. At the time appointed we assemble at the house of mourning, and after conversing awhile about lumber and other kindred topics, we take up the dead, carry him out, and bury him as you would a sheep. This is our condition—cannot something be done for us? Is there not some minister that is willing to come and live among us, and preach the word of life? We will do all we can for his support.⁶

In a larger number of instances the initiative in forming Classes and Societies was taken by a settler who in his earlier home had been active as a Methodist Class Leader or Local Preacher. Still more often a Circuit preacher of missionary spirit would push out beyond the bounds of his appointed Circuit, establish a preaching place in the home of a friendly family, and as soon as conditions were propitious form a Society which at the next Conference session would be made a mission. Some missions were outposts far removed from the Districts to which they belonged, established optimistically by one or another of the Bishops. William Simpson, appointed in 1850 to establish the Council Bluffs (Iowa) Mission, wrote to the Christian Advocate:

The settlement here is disconnected almost entirely, as yet, with the other parts of the State. At our last conference, I was appointed to this unexplored country by Bishop Hamline, though my appointment stands connected with the Iowa City District. The presiding elder was not expected to visit me during the year. The nearest preacher to me in the conference is more than a hundred miles from me.⁷

The Mission Districts organized in some of the newer western Annual Conferences were so named because most, if not all, of the appointments were missions. In the Wisconsin Conference in 1848 seven (excluding an Indian mission) of the fourteen appointments of the Fond du Lac Mission

* Hermann Nelson Morse: "The multiplication of religious types and the wide diffusion, in a spirit of free competition, of individual churches were more the result of the large scale social forces operating on the frontier than of any conscious ecclesiastical polity."—"The Church's Mission at Home," in Samuel M. Cavert and Henry P. Van Dusen, Eds., The Church Through Half a Century . . . , p. 270.

District were missions. In 1849 all five of the Districts of the Missouri Conference were listed as Mission Districts and missions accounted for thirty-one (exclusive of an Indian mission) of the forty-one appointments. In 1850 two of the five Districts of the Wisconsin Conference were Mission Districts and in one—the Minnesota Mission District—all but two appointments were missions.

In addition to appropriations made for individual missions within Districts it was the common practice of the Missionary Society to make an appropriation also to the District as such. In the 1860 Minnesota Annual Conference $200. was allocated to the Minneapolis District, $125. to the St. Paul District, $240. to the St. Peter District, $200. to the Red Wing District, and $150. to the Winona District. These sums were remitted to the Presiding Elders for emergency missionary needs.⁸

The steady expansion of the Church from the Middle Border westward to the Pacific can only be understood by tracing the development of Conference missions from state to state as the years passed.

In 1845, although Illinois had been admitted to the Union as a state in 1818, pioneer conditions generally prevailed. The room in which the first session of the Rock River Conference* met in August, 1840, was a log enclosure, twenty feet square, with poorly chinked cracks between the logs and an earthen floor covered with straw.⁹ The Missionary Society in its Report for 1847-48 stated that the Conference had twenty-seven missions and thirty-five missionaries, with a serious shortage of candidates for the ministry.

Hence, many neighborhoods, and, in some instances, almost whole counties, are either entirely destitute of the preached word, or only visited by the messenger of truth occasionally, and at long intervals.¹⁰

Corresponding Secretary Pitman on a visit to the Rock River Conference in 1847 was much impressed with the missionary spirit of many of the preachers who from year to year did not receive as much as one half of their Disciplinary allowance and yet went on their way "with uncomplaining submission" and cheerfulness. "Is not this the true missionary spirit?" he asked. "From my heart I honor these western pioneers; and I verily believe that there are few better specimens of missionary consecration anywhere to be found."¹¹

Of the two Annual Conferences in Illinois in 1850 the Illinois Conference† with ninety-one charges (other than those of the German Mission Districts) had three missions; the Rock River‡ with eighty-five charges reported fourteen (exclusive of the Swedish work) as missions. In the next sixteen years Illinois Annual Conferences were increased to four by the organization of the Southern Illinois* and the Peoria Conferences† and in 1866, all told, they had sixty-nine missions supported in whole or in part by missionary funds. Annual appropriations to the Illinois Conference were continued until 1876. In that year the Conference decided to refund to the Missionary Society the appropriation of $500. made to it. The other three Conferences accepted their appropriations: Central Illinois, $500. for six missions; Rock River, $1,800. for seventeen missions; and Southern Illinois, $600. for eight missions. The next year missionary appropriations were discontinued to all four Conferences of the state.¹²

The whole of Wisconsin Territory was included in the Rock River Conference at its organization in 1840, and in 1844 three of its nine Districts—Platteville, Milwaukee, and Green Bay—were still within the territory. These three Districts had twenty-seven charges, of which eleven were designated as missions including those to Indians. Four years later, on July 12, 1848, the Wisconsin Conference was organized ‡ and Presiding Elders were appointed to four Districts: Platteville, Racine, Milwaukee, and Fond du Lac.¹³

The country was being rapidly settled, the population increasing from 30,945 in 1840 to 305,391 in 1850, and to 775,881 in 1860. Demand came from many of these people for religious services but as in numerous other regions missionaries were not to be had. Alfred Brunson, writing in 1847 from Prairie du Chien, deplored the lack:

I have said and done all I could, to induce the constituted authorities of our Church to send missionaries into the country north of this; but the want of men, and the want of means to support them, have hitherto prevented the desired supply.

Brunson told of a settlement of about three hundred people on the Black River which became so aroused that a public meeting was called, a subscription raised of about $300., and a petition for a minister sent to the authorities of the Methodist Church. Brunson commented:

I am aware that brother Summers [the Presiding Elder of the Platteville District] cannot obtain the men necessary to supply this country, or he would have done so before now. . . . And is it so, that China, Africa, the Indies, Oregon, &c., are more attractive than this important frontier of our own country?¹⁴

* The first session of the Southern Illinois Conference, authorized by the General Conference of 1852 (G. C. Journal, 1852, p. 152), met in its first session at Belleville, Ill., Oct. 27-30, 1852. Its five Districts had fifty-seven appointments of which fifteen were missions. In 1895 the six Districts of the Conference had 162 appointments; members, not including probationers, had increased from 12,151 to 35,574, and churches from 117 to 446.—Minutes, Southern Illinois Conference, 1852, pp. 9-11; ibid., 1895, pp. 14-16.

† Peoria Conference (later, the Central Illinois), set off from the Rock River in 1856, met in its first session at Peoria, Sept. 10-16. Its six Districts listed seventy-eight appointments of which eight were left to be supplied. (Gen'l Minutes, 1856, pp. 142 f.) In 1895, its five Districts, with 189 appointments, reported 34,035 members in 380 local churches. It had also 363 Sunday schools with 34,817 pupils.—Minutes, Central Illinois Conference, 1895, pp. 30-33, 37.

‡ The Wisconsin Conference, authorized by the 1848 General Conference, met in its first session at Southport, Wisconsin Territory, with sixty-seven members, and 147 Local Preachers. Fifty-seven Circuits and Stations were listed, of which twenty-four were designated as missions. Church members, including probationers, numbered 6,796, of whom eleven were Negroes and 172 were Indians.—Gen'l Minutes, 1848, pp. 243 f., 300.

Under the frontier conditions still prevailing in Wisconsin only men of adventurous spirit, inured to hardship, were willing to volunteer for missionary service. A. B. Randall, appointed to the Green Lake Mission in 1847, after telling of the picturesque landscape, dotted with beautiful little lakes, said:

When I reached the Mission I rode more than 150 miles to procure a domicile; but owing to the rush of immigrants to this part of the country, every cabin was literally filled to overflowing. In some, not more than sixteen feet by eighteen, I found three or four families, amounting frequently to twenty-five or thirty individuals. After drifting about for three or four weeks, I came across a brother, who said he would furnish logs and lumber, and help me build a cabin 14 feet square, and I might have the use of the building while I stayed on the Mission for the labor I should bestow in its erection. . . . In about six weeks we got the roof on and the rough floor down. I was then taken down with the ague and fever, and we moved into our new cabin without doors or windows, while the cracks between the logs were wide enough to throw cats through with safety and convenience: and as we were but slightly acquainted on the Mission, and nearly out of provisions, medicine, and money, and we ran for a while very close to the wind

In about eight weeks I was able to fill my regular appointments, fifteen in number, requiring over 160 miles of travel. . . .

When I came into the work we numbered in society about 70; we now number 115. I cannot say that we have had any conversions, properly speaking, on the Mission, but we have had some re-conversions.¹⁵

Again in 1854 we find Alfred Brunson bewailing the lack of preachers. The Wabasha Mission, he felt, should be divided into at least four missions to do justice to the need, and on the other parts of the Prairie du Chien District at least five more missions should be formed. The adjoining Minnesota Mission District should also be increased as much, since the growth of population for the year on the two Districts could be estimated at not less than 10,000. At the preceding Conference, to supply the work fully, thirty additional preachers were needed and for the next year thirty more would be required, or a total of sixty new recruits.

On the most recent round of his District, Brunson reported, at none of the four weekday Quarterly Meetings were enough official members present to hold a Quarterly Conference. At only one of the four were enough people present for the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

The preachers not being elders, cannot administer the sacrament of the Lord's supper, and many of them not being deacons, cannot baptize, and the people can have their sacraments only when visited by the presiding elder.

For these reasons Brunson felt that it was utterly useless to attempt to hold Quarterly Meetings on weekdays, and that the Districts should be made smaller.¹⁶

For years the Wisconsin Conference continued to be to a large extent missionary territory. At the 1863 session its Committee on Domestic Missions reported that one of its members had explored the region north of the city of Green Bay for seventy miles—an area which no minister had ever before penetrated—and stated that there were unexplored regions yet beyond.

Here we find settlements of from fifteen to fifty families, where some have not heard a Gospel sermon for seven years. Here are children old enough to appreciate Gospel truth, who never saw a minister of Christ.

At this session eleven charges were left to be supplied; and four Circuits, each scheduled to receive two preachers, received but one.¹⁷

In 1856 the West Wisconsin Conference* was set off from the Wisconsin Conference, to include the southwest and the northern central parts of the state, with six Districts containing sixty-five charges of which twenty-two (excluding two Norwegian) were listed as missions. Point Bluff and La Crosse were Mission Districts. The northwestern part of Wisconsin was included in the newly formed Minnesota Conference. The comparatively small area of the West Wisconsin Conference as thus constituted offered limited opportunity for missionary expansion.¹⁸

The General Conference of 1860 formed the Northwest Wisconsin Conference† out of that part of the Minnesota Conference within the state of Wisconsin and the La Crosse District of the West Wisconsin Conference, an extremely ill-advised measure. After eight years the Conference was dissolved, in its last year four fewer preachers being appointed to charges than at its organization. Pioneer conditions, the very small ministerial leadership, and limited aid from the Missionary Society created an exceptionally difficult situation. The average yearly salary of the preachers was only $220. When in 1868 the Conference was discontinued all but Douglas, Bayfield, and Ashland Counties of northwest Wisconsin were transferred to West Wisconsin, an arrangement which added a large area for cultivation. Unfortunately, however, the General Missionary Committee—under the necessity of reducing its appropriations—made a drastic cut in the missionary grant to the Conference for 1868 and followed this by further reductions: $700. in 1869; $1,000. in 1875; and $1,500. in 1877. Under these conditions the missionary program was seriously curtailed.¹⁹

Methodist missionary work among the white settlers of the Minnesota country, according to the account of Chauncey Hobart in his History of Methodism in Minnesota, was begun by Joseph Hurlburt in 1844. Hobart states that at the 1844 session of the Rock River Conference Hurlburt was appointed to the St. Croix Mission* which embraced "all the settlements of the Mississippi and its tributaries above the head of Lake Pepin" and included as preaching places Fort Snelling, Red Rock, Stillwater, Marine, Osceola, and St. Croix Falls. Jonathan W. Putnam, in 1846 pastor of the St. Croix Mission, added as additional appointments Point Douglas and St. Anthony Falls.²⁰

* The first session of the West Wisconsin Conference was held in Madison, Aug. 20-26, 1856.

† The organizational session of the Northwest Wisconsin Conference was held at Sparta, Wisc., Sept. 5-10, 1860. Nine were admitted on trial, and eight of the thirty-seven charges of the three Districts were left to be supplied.—Gen'l Minutes, 1860, pp. 237 f.

One year after St. Paul had been "laid off and platted" Benjamin Close, appointed in 1848 to the St. Croix Mission, preached in the village—then a community of about a hundred and fifty people—and in the same year Benjamin F. Hoyt, a Local Preacher, organized the first Methodist Class. In June, 1849, Chauncey Hobart was appointed at the Wisconsin Conference Presiding Elder of the newly formed Minnesota District and pastor at St. Paul. In his first year a brick church was built—the first Protestant house of worship in Minnesota Territory—and the membership of the Society was increased to forty-two. In 1851 Thomas M. Fullerton, an enterprising and energetic man, and an able administrator, was stationed at St. Paul but unsettled conditions prevailed among the people and he could do little more than maintain the church's existence.

At this time the immediate area on the west side of the Mississippi River was still a part of the Fort Snelling military reservation and settlers' cabins could only be built by permission of the officers at the fort. Despite this limitation a settlement was gradually established and in the summer of 1852 a Methodist Class was organized by A. C. Godfrey in what later became the city of Minneapolis. In Godfrey's home, in November, 1852, Hobart held the first Quarterly Meeting of the mission.²¹

The 1856 General Conference authorized the organization of the Minnesota Conference† to include the northwestern part of Wisconsin and the Territory of Minnesota. When the territory was organized in 1849, its boundaries extended to the Missouri River, including the greater part of the present states of North and South Dakota. The territory according to the census of 1850 had a population of 6,077.

The organization of the Conference plotted an immense area for missionary exploration and Methodist Circuit Riders scouted many localities in advance of settlers. When the Benton County Mission was established, to include a region 130 miles in length, J. H. White, the missionary, could locate in it only two Methodists. When the first Quarterly Conference was called and the question asked, "Have the general rules been read in the societies?" the answer recorded was, "There are no societies."

* St. Croix Mission does not appear in the General Minutes until 1846 when J. W. Putnam was assigned to it as missionary (p. 57). In 1844, according to the Minutes, Joseph Hurlburt was appointed to the Winnebago Lake Mission, Green Bay (Wisc.) Mission District (p. 501). It is possible that the St. Croix Mission appointment may have been a post-Conference arrangement made by the Presiding Elders.

† The first session of the Minnesota Conference was held in Red Wing in August, 1856.

In February, 1856, James Peet was sent by his Presiding Elder from St. Paul 180 miles north to take charge of the Superior Mission. One hundred and thirty miles "were through wilderness, and not a white family living in the whole distance."

On our journey we slept out of doors at night on the snow-covered ground—wife, children and myself wrapped in blankets, by our campfire. We thawed our frozen provisions, from time to time, by a little fire kindled for that purpose, as we needed to refresh ourselves. Our road was the ice of the St. Croix River and an old Indian trail, the underbrush of which had been cut just wide enough for a team to get through with a sled. After nine days we arrived at the head of Lake Superior, and at Superior City found two Methodists; my wife made a third, and with these a class of three was organized . . .²²

In the summer of 1857 Edward Eggleston, widely known in later years both in America and in Europe as the author of the Hoosier Schoolmaster, was received on trial in the Minnesota Conference. William McKinley in his Story of Minnesota Methodism has given an apt characterization of him at the time :

He was a youth of about twenty years, with the raw appearance of immaturity; but one soon saw that he was more mature in mind than in body. He had walked all the way from Indiana for his health, and was much benefited thereby. Had been licensed to preach, and employed as supply on an Indiana circuit, but his health failed, and this brought him to Minnesota.

There was something about him that attracted people at once. His powers of observation, description, and conversation were phenomenal. He could talk more and talk better than any man I ever knew. His geniality, natural eloquence, and magnetic personality made him a favorite everywhere.²³

For nine years Eggleston continued in the pastorate, serving some of the stronger churches, then because of his broken health retired from the ministry.

Preceding the organization of the Annual Conference growth in church membership was slow—only 747 full members reported at the first session—but from 1856-57 on Methodism expanded in keeping with the rapid growth of population.* In pursuance of an enabling act passed by the General Conference of 1892 the Minnesota Conference at its 1894 session voted 123 to 41 to divide and adopted Minnesota Northern† as the name of the new Conference.²⁴

* By 1860 there were five Districts (exclusive of the Scandinavian Mission Districts) with 79 Circuits and Stations, 4,365 full members; 25 churches; and 156 Sunday schools. Thirty-two of the charges were listed as missions. The missionary appropriation to the Conference was $3,030. By 1875 the membership had increased to 11,068 (exclusive of the Swedish and Norwegian churches), the mission charges to sixty, and the missionary appropriation to $9,000. In 1893 the church membership was 22,719; the number of charges, 248; missions, 126; and missionary appropriations, $11,100. This same year the Conference collections for missions were $11,382.—Minutes, Minnesota Conference, 1860, pp. 18 ff., 23 f.; ibid., 1875, pp. 62, 36 f.; ibid., 1893, pp. 114, 84-94, 75-77, 117.

† At the first session of the Conference, held in Minneapolis, Oct. 2-6, 1895, the name was changed to the Northern Minnesota Conference. One hundred and fifteen charter members were registered—

When in 1844 the Iowa Conference was set off from Rock River the entire territory had only 75,152 inhabitants—whites and Indians—thinly scattered over the twenty-one organized counties of the eastern and south-eastern section.

Five-sixths of the Territory in the north and west was a boundless expanse of grove and prairie, still uninhabited by the white man. During the twelve years that followed, immigrants came in large numbers; they came from every state in the east and south and from across the sea. They came singly and in companies, many in wagons drawn by horses or oxen, camping by the roadside at night and journeying by day. Many came in boats down the Ohio and up the Mississippi River, landing at the towns along the river and spreading out over the state along its streams and near its groves, and in 1856 the population of the state had become 517,875.²⁵

Three years later, one year after Iowa had achieved statehood, the Conference, with twenty-eight missions and thirty-five missionaries, had 4,629 members. Bear Creek Mission, a typical missionary appointment, was organized in 1846. Its appointments increased until in 1862 they numbered twelve, "extending from near Iowa City to a point ten miles northwest of Brooklyn, and south to Williamsburg."²⁶ Growth was so rapid that after twelve years the Conference was divided, the northern area taking the name Upper Iowa Conference.* Before the close of the quadrennium demand was voiced for still another Conference for the western half of the state, chiefly because of the travel and expense involved in reaching the seats of the two Conferences in the eastern area. The 1860 General Conference authorized division again of the Iowa Conference, the new body to be called the Western Iowa Conference,† to include the southwestern quarter of the state. In 1864 the name was changed to Des Moines Conference.²⁷

Writing to the Christian Advocate in 1873 from Boonesborough, Iowa, Samuel Jones mentioned the need for more churches, parsonages, and parsonage furniture. He had just returned, as Presiding Elder, from a trip of eleven days during which he had preached fourteen times, and held five Quarterly Meetings, all in schoolhouses since "there was not a church building of any kind in the four counties" which he traversed—a journey of 470 miles, eighty miles of the distance on foot.²⁸

Twelve years after the organization of the Western Iowa Conference a among them such outstanding ministers as Robert Forbes, J. B. Hingley, Frank Doran, R. N. McKaig, J. F. Chaffee—and twenty-one probationers. The four Districts had 131 charges with 10,912 full members, of which seventy-two received missionary appropriations ranging from $35. to $445., aggregating $5,475.—Minutes, Northern Minnesota Conference, 1895, pp. 94, 68 f.

* The Upper Iowa Conference at its first session, Aug. 27-Sept. 1, 1856, enrolled fifty-eight Traveling Preachers, of whom twenty-two were probationers. At the third session, exclusive of the German work and the Scandinavian Mission, Circuits and Stations had increased to a hundred, of which seventeen were designated as missions.—Stephen Norris Fellows, History of the Upper Iowa Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1856-1906, p. 40; Gen'l Minutes, 1856, pp. 138-41, ibid., 1858, pp. 234 f.

† The Western Iowa Conference (Des Moines Conference) held its first session in Indianola, Aug. 22-27, 1860. Its four Districts had 5,536 full members; 92 Local Preachers; 26 churches; and 126 Sunday schools with 5,290 pupils. (Minutes, Western Iowa Conference, 1860, pp. 5, 24.) By 1895 Districts had increased to six; full members to 46,883; Local Preachers to 189; churches to 423; and Sunday schools to 458, with 43,702 pupils.—Minutes, Des Moines Conference, 1895, pp. 290-93.

further division was made, the Northwest Iowa Conference,* to include the northwest quarter of the state and all of Dakota Territory, with twenty-three charter members. Sioux City District, of which Bennett Mitchell was appointed Presiding Elder, embraced about ten counties of Iowa and the whole of Dakota, "an area larger by more than 20,000 square miles than that of England, Wales, Scotland and Ireland taken together." Many of the people lived in sod houses and in dugouts; and some schoolhouses, and even churches, were built of sod. All types of transportation were used by the preachers on their rounds: horseback, buggies, two-wheeled carts. "Some drove fine, sleek, spanking teams, some fidgety bronchos, . . . while a few rode behind braying miles."²⁹

The Missouri Annual Conference, meeting at Columbia on October 1, 1845, by a vote of 86 to 14 cast its lot with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.† The resolution, adopted after protracted discussion, read:

Resolved, That as a conference . . . we adhere to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and that all our proceedings, journals, and records of every kind, hereafter, be in name and style of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.³⁰

The vote as reported does not account for all members of the Conference. Ten who were German missionaries asked to be transferred to the Illinois Conference and to be permitted to continue their work in Missouri. This was allowed. Seven anti-slavery men, discouraged concerning the outlook, sought membership in other Conferences. Eight decided to remain with those members of their Societies who were anti-slavery and carry on as best they could. While Missouri was a slave state the non-slaveholding proportion of the population was stronger than in any slave state except Delaware. Approximately one in eight of the farms was cultivated by slave labor. Although nearly six thousand slaves were owned in St. Louis and occasional slave auctions were held in the city the predominant sentiment was anti-slavery. While the pro-slavery interests, both economic and political, were powerful it was asserted by some that should the question of slavery be submitted to popular vote three-fourths of the state would oppose the institution.³¹

The pro-slavery advocates were vocal and aggressively defensive, while the anti-slavery majority were largely passive. The constituency of the Methodist Church, as in the case of the ministry, was made up principally of southern people whose families, and forebears for generations, had been closely associated with slavery. Under these conditions it was a foregone con-

* The Northwest Iowa Conference convened in its first session at Ft. Dodge on Sept. 18, 1872. At this session the Bishop increased the Districts from two to three, and the charges from forty-five to fifty-two of which twelve were left to be supplied. The second meeting of the Conference was held at Yankton, Dakota Territory, in the Congregational church. Within five years the membership increased from 3,392 to 4,956; charges from 52 to 77; churches from 9 to 29. In 1895 the Conference had five Districts—all within Iowa—with 159 charges; 19,595 members; churches, 225; Sunday schools, 289.—Minutes, Northwest Iowa Conference, 1872, pp. 11 ff.; ibid., 1877, pp. 125 f., 308; ibid., 1895, pp. 21 f., 60; Bennett Mitchell, History of the Northwest Iowa Conference, 1872-1903, pp. 76 f.

clusion that the anti-slavery Methodist minority were destined to encounter intense hostility. Nevertheless, the 1848 General Conference decided to reconstitute the Missouri Conference* of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The organizational session was held on September 13, 1848, at Belleville, Illinois, in connection with the annual session of the Illinois Conference. Church members, it was reported, numbered 1,538. The second session was held at St. Louis on August 29, 1849. Full members had increased to 3,097 of whom 224 were Negroes and 172 Indians. Thirty ministers were appointed to charges, and thirteen points were left to be supplied.³²

Year by year bitterness against the Methodist Episcopal Church became more intense. The 1855 session was planned to be held in Independence beginning on October 11. On August 13 a remonstrance meeting of citizens was held which passed a resolution of protest, reading:

Resolved, That, if the ministers and others constituting said Conference should, after this respectable remonstrance, persist in holding the same here, we shall hold ourselves fully acquitted from any consequences that may result therefrom.

The Conference met, by invitation, in the Ebenezer Methodist Church, St. Louis, "without molestation."³³

In its issue of May 15, 1861, the Central Christian Advocate editorially advised the suspension of all regular public church services in Missouri in Methodist churches. Persecution in both Missouri and Arkansas was not limited to ministers but extended also to lay people and their families who acknowledged that they were Unionists. The Rev. J. H. Hawley wrote from Kansas on May 13, 1861:

For the last four weeks the roads leading into Kansas, by the way of Fort Scott, from Arkansas and Texas, have been literally lined with emigrants, with their families and large herds of cattle. . . . Liberty of conscience is entirely out of the question. To be a Free-State man is crime enough for the halter or gibbet.³⁴

Not less than twenty thousand northern Methodists, according to the estimate of Charles Elliott, were driven from Missouri after 1859 so that "by Conference time, 1862, our people in Missouri and Arkansas were nearly extirpated." By the spring of 1863 conditions began to assume a more favorable aspect. To aid the Conference in its effort to cope with the situation the Missionary Society "appropriated $7,000. for the neediest portions" of Missouri and Arkansas "besides $3,000 as a contingent fund." The Church began with the county seats and the principal cities and towns and as impediments lessened extended operations to villages and rural communities. The 1864 session of the Conference met in the State House in Jefferson City. Reports showed a membership of 6,662, a gain for the year of 2,990. Forty-three pastors, sixteen more than the preceding year, received appointments. The Missionary Society this year contributed for domestic missions within the Conference $7,572. Appropriations continued to be made annually.* Steady growth, though not phenomenally rapid, was made. In 1875 membership in Missouri, exclusive of the Arkansas District, had grown to 28,801; and in 1895 to 49,434, exclusive of the Negro members formerly in the St. Louis Conference, now in the Central Missouri Conference.³⁵

* At the first session of the reorganized Missouri Conference eighteen Traveling Preachers were appointed to charges, with four charges left to be supplied. There were twenty-four Local Preachers. Three Districts were formed: St. Louis, Platte, and Arkansas. In 1852 the name was changed to Missouri and Arkansas Conference.—Gen'l Minutes, 1848, pp. 286 f.; Charles Elliott, South-Western Methodism, A History of the M. E. Church in the South-West . . ., pp. 24 f.

When the Missouri (and Arkansas) Conference was organized in 1848 the Arkansas Mission District † had seven charges with 499 members. In 1852 Arkansas was separated from Missouri, although the Arkansas Conference ‡ met jointly with the Missouri Conference in St. Louis on October 7. Two Mission Districts were formed, each with ten missions. At the end of the first year the twenty missions reported 1,289 white members in full connection and twenty-three Negro members. During the late fifties Methodists with anti-slavery sympathies, and other free-soil advocates, were subjected to severe persecution, thousands being driven from the state. Under these troubled conditions, in 1860 the former plan of including Missouri and Arkansas in a single Conference was resumed under the name of Missouri and Arkansas Conference.³⁶

In 1868 Arkansas was made a part of the newly formed St. Louis Conference.§ At its first session, March, 1869, with two Districts, the Little Rock and Fort Smith, fourteen preachers received appointments. Church members numbered 2,538. Conditions changed in the next four years, so much so that in 1872 ministers and members of the Church in Arkansas were ready to take advantage of the provision made by the 1868 General Conference giving them authority again to form a Conference of their own. At the first session of the reorganized Arkansas Conference, January 29-February 4, 1873, with forty-six appointments, thirty preachers were appointed to as

* Sixteen years later (1880) forty-three charges of the Missouri Conference received missionary appropriations to the amount of $3,090, and forty-six missions of the St. Louis Conference, $4,250. In 1895 forty-one charges of the Missouri Conference were still receiving missionary support, in that year $3,890, and forty-one charges of the St. Louis Conference $4,585.—Minutes, Missouri Conference, 1880, p. 141; ibid., 1895, pp. 122 f.; Journal, St. Louis Conference, 1880, pp. 213 f.; ibid., 1895, pp. 177 f.

† In 1844 the Arkansas Conference, like Missouri, adhered to the South. (James A. Anderson, Centennial History of Arkansas Methodism . . . , pp. 68, 70 f.) The action, however, did not meet with unanimous approval, either of the ministry or the laity, and some of these joined with northern Methodists of Missouri in petitioning the 1848 General Conference for preachers to be sent to them.—C. Elliott, op. cit., pp. 62 f.

‡ "The Arkansas Conference shall include the States of Arkansas, Texas, and so much of New Mexico as lies east of the Rocky Mountains, and that part of the Indian Territory west of Arkansas, and so much of the State of Missouri as is not included in the Missouri Conference." ("Journal of the General Conference, 1852," Appendix, p. 152, G. C. Journals, III.) Texas appointments appeared first in 1853 and consecutively thereafter until 1860, when on account of intensely embittered conflict over slavery they were discontinued.

§ The 1868 General Conference authorized formation of the St. Louis Conference to "include the State of Missouri lying south of Missouri River; and the State of Arkansas" (G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 317). Its first session was held in Sedalia, March 10-15, 1869. It was organized with five Districts in Missouri and two in Arkansas, with a total membership of 13,401; 67 churches; and 191 Sunday schools.—Gen'l Minutes, 1869, pp. 21-23.

many Circuits and Stations, leaving sixteen appointments to be supplied.* Church members numbered 3,805.³⁷

During the forties and fifties the population of Michigan increased rapidly, stimulated by discovery of the rich agricultural possibilities of the Lower Peninsula and the mineral wealth of the Upper Peninsula. In the late summer of 1851, John H. Pitzel wrote to the Missionary Society from the copper mine region of the Upper Peninsula, "The work here is greatly enlarging, and [the Eagle River Mission] will need next year two missionaries. Thus the people who were not a people, have become the people of God." The Missionary Society appropriated to the mission $100. and the forty-two members on the Circuit returned as their missionary offering $60. The pioneer conditions still prevailing in the region are pictured in the report of Salmon Steele who tells of visiting "ten different mines and places once in three weeks, on foot, making over seventy miles travel." An even more graphic picture is given by E. H. Day, appointed to the Ontonagon Mission in the same general region in 1851:

There are only five hundred souls all through my beat, and I visit them all once in four weeks, to accomplish which I have to travel through the woods one hundred and seventy-five miles, frequently eighteen miles between houses, and in the winter, on snow shoes, by marked trees.³⁸

So marked was the growth made between 1850 and 1855 † that the 1856 General Conference authorized a division of the Conference, and the creation of the Detroit Conference‡ to include "all that part of the State of Michigan lying east of the principal meridian line, and the upper peninsula shall be connected with the Detroit Conference."³⁹

Even before the organization of Nebraska Territory the General Conference of 1852 had taken action attaching to the Iowa Conference "the Territory of Nebraska, except so much as is occupied by the Indian Missions now in connexion with the Missouri Conference," but no cognizance of the action was taken by the Conference either in 1852 or 1853. The passage by Congress of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill in 1854 opening the territory for settlement and the organization of a territorial government stimulated action. The Board of

* The 1876 General Conference anticipated what it termed the necessity of organizing "a Conference in the bounds of the Arkansas Conference especially adapted to the Colored work," and enacted an enabling act which provided that as soon as there were twenty Negro Traveling Preachers in the Conference it would be legal, by majority vote, "to organize a Colored Conference." (G. C. Journal, 1876, p. 135.) At the Conference session of 1878 division was voted, although there were then only four Negro ministers in full connection. Seventeen men having been received on trial, the Little Rock (Negro) Conference at its first session, Feb. 21-24, 1879, was able to fill all appointments. In 1895 the Conference, with four Districts and sixty-eight appointments, reported 4,638 members in full connection; eighty-nine churches; and 122 Sunday schools with 4,072 pupils.—Gen'l Minutes, Spring, 1895, pp. 96, 125.

† The Michigan Conference during these five years increased from eight to eleven Districts; from ninety-four to 168 charges; from 15,015 members to 18,497; and from 128 to 178 Traveling Preachers.—Ibid., 1850, pp. 512 f., 540; ibid., 1855, pp. 604 ff., 667.

‡ The Detroit Conference at its first session on Sept. 17-23, 1856, was organized with six Districts and one hundred charges, including two Indian missions. It had 9,508 full members. (Ibid., 1856, pp. 125 ff.) In 1895 its seven Districts with 313 charges, inclusive of five Indian missions, reported 45,987 members in full connection.—Ibid., Fall, 1895, pp. 282 ff., 484.

Bishops decided that "the interests of our Church required an early occupancy" of the territory by missionaries "that should accompany the settler, or meet him and his family on their arrival," provide them with the ordinances of religion, and thus incorporate "moral and religious influences with the first elements of society" in the new West. Accordingly Bishop E. R. Ames wrote the veteran missionary William H. Goode "to visit and explore the country as thoroughly as practicable, for the purpose of collecting information" on such points as would "enable the Church authorities to act understandingly."⁴⁰

Goode made the trip, explored the area immediately west of the Missouri River in both Kansas and Nebraska, organized four mission Circuits, two in each territory, and appointed temporary missionary supplies. At the session of the Missouri Conference, held in October, 1854, presided over by Bishop Ames, a Kansas and Nebraska District was formed and the number of missions increased to seven (exclusive of Indian missions).^{*} Goode—transferred from the Indiana Conference—was appointed Presiding Elder. His District embraced the whole of the Kansas and Nebraska Territories, a region extending from the Missouri River on the east to the Rocky Mountains on the west and from the "waters of the Arkansas" on the south to the British possessions on the north. Nine appointments were listed, four of which were in Nebraska. At the 1855 sessions of the Iowa and the Missouri Conferences the Kansas and Nebraska District was divided, a Nebraska District formed, with eight missions, attached to the Iowa Conference, and two Districts—the North Kansas and the South Kansas—formed in Kansas, connected with the Missouri Conference, each with six missions.⁴¹ This allocation of territory, however, lasted but one year. The General Conference of 1856 authorized organization of the Kansas and Nebraska Conference, to "embrace the Kansas and Nebraska Territories, and also that part of the territories of New Mexico and Utah lying east of the Rocky Mountains."[†] The organizing session was held in a large cloth tent in Lawrence, Kansas, beginning on October 23, 1856. Twenty-five missions constituted the Conference. Twenty-three preachers received appointments. Church members, including probationers, numbered 1,138, of whom 144 were Indians. At the third session of the Conference, held in Topeka, which opened on April 15, 1858, forty-seven preachers received appointments. Church members, as reported, had increased to 2,669. The widely extended area, involving long

^{*} At the Iowa Conference of the same year (1854), at which Bishop Morris presided, possibly through misunderstanding an undefined area west of the Missouri River was designated the "Nebraska and Kansas Mission District" with four missions listed, "Omaha, Old Fort Kearney, Waukaressa, and Fort Leavenworth." Inasmuch as there were no missionaries available for appointment, both the District and the missions were listed "to be supplied."—Ibid., 1854, p. 462; Edmund H. Waring, History of the Iowa Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church . . ., p. 151.

[†] This is an illustration, of which there are many in the proceedings of General Conference in the early decades of the period 1845-95, of creating Conferences with incredible boundaries. The policy seems to have been a species of ecclesiastical "squatter sovereignty," a means of asserting claim to a much larger area than could possibly be immediately occupied, with a purpose of later occupancy.

and difficult journeys for many of the preachers to reach the seat of Annual Conference, and the rapid growth of population, led to demands for separate Conferences for the two territories.⁴²

In Nebraska the desire for a separate Conference was intensified by the incoming tide of immigration which was filling up the river counties with settlers, and pushing the line of settlement farther and farther into the interior. By 1860 the population had grown to 28,841 and was destined to increase to 452,402 in 1880; and 1,062,656 in 1890. The majority of the new settlers came from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa—each of which had a relatively large proportion of Methodists, ranging from 25 to 40 per cent of the Protestant populace—which created the possibility of a rapid increase of Methodist church membership. The 1860 General Conference authorized the organization of the Nebraska Conference* to “embrace the Territory of Nebraska.”

The expansion of the Church was retarded by hard economic conditions. The people suffered from the inflation of the war years and had only partly recovered from its effects when they were visited by a prolonged grasshopper scourge which year after year almost totally destroyed their crops. The ensuing poverty was such that in most cases the meager salaries of the preachers were less than half paid. Nevertheless, by 1880 the two Districts of 1861 had increased to six; the membership of 948 had increased to 9,511; the members of the Conference from twenty-three to 109; and pastoral charges from nineteen to 114.⁴³

The 1880 General Conference gave the Nebraska Conference permission, if it should so desire, to divide into two Conferences. The division was made at the session of 1881 and the North Nebraska Conference† held its first meeting at Fremont, Nebraska, September 14-19, 1881. Also in 1880 the General Conference, on recommendation of the Committee on Missions, and in response to a memorial of the Kearney District Ministerial Association and the several Presiding Elders of the Nebraska Conference asking for the formation of a Mission District, authorized the organization of the West Nebraska Mission.‡ It included a vast area which up to that time had been

* The first session of the Nebraska Conference was held on April 4-8, 1861, at Nebraska City. Nineteen preachers were appointed, seven to charges in the Omaha District, with one charge (Omaha) left to be supplied; and twelve to charges in the Nebraska City District. The membership, as reported, was: full members, 948; probationers, 376. Sunday schools numbered twenty-eight, with 908 pupils. The new Conference had only four churches, at Omaha, Bellevue, Platte Valley, and Brownville; and one parsonage, at Peru.—Gen'l Minutes, 1861, pp. 70 f.

† The North Nebraska Conference when organized had in its two Districts, Omaha and Norfolk, thirty-six Circuits and Stations. It lacked by nine a sufficient number of Conference members to supply its charges. (Ibid., 1881, pp. 284 f.) At the close of its first year it listed thirty-eight appointments with 2,320 full members; thirty-three churches; fifty-seven Sunday schools with 3,308 pupils; and twenty-nine Local Preachers. The missionary appropriation for 1882 was $2,200. Growth was continuous and rapid. In 1895, with four Districts, the Conference reported 109 charges, almost a threefold increase, with 12,695 full members; 137 churches; 191 Sunday schools with 14,629 pupils; and forty-seven Local Preachers.—Ibid., 1882, pp. 238 f., 374 f.; ibid., Fall, 1895, pp. 314, 575 ff.

‡ The 1881 General Minutes carry the name of T. B. Lemon, Superintendent, and sixteen preachers as “missionaries to West Nebraska Mission,” but no additional information. The Minutes for 1882 record that the first meeting of the mission was held on Aug. 31, 1882, presided over by Bishop Merrill. Twenty-two missionaries received appointments and eleven points were left “to be supplied.” The mission reported 1,609 full members, 17 churches, 60 Sunday schools (of which twenty-eight had been organized during the year), with 2,535 pupils.—Ibid., 1881, p. 284; ibid., 1882, pp. 298, 454 f.

very thinly settled but in which during the late seventies immigration was rapidly increasing. What was probably the first Class within its bounds had been formed at Gibbon by David Marquette in 1870. In his report for 1883 to the Missionary Society T. B. Lemon graphically portrayed the current situation :

The immigration of the last spring and into the summer months has been very large, filling up many sparsely-settled portions of our territory, and extending over new territory, requiring the division of some charges and the forming of new ones. . . .

Some are weak in numbers and financial ability; but the country embraced within them is filling up and good promising centers are forming⁴⁴

In 1885, by authorization of the 1884 General Conference, the West Nebraska Mission was organized as the West Nebraska Annual Conference.* Growth between 1885 and 1892 was rapid and the outlook for future development was bright. Distances necessary to be traveled by pastors in the northwest section of the state in attending Conference sessions led to a desire for a separate Conference. The 1892 General Conference passed an enabling act and at the ensuing session of the West Nebraska Conference the Northwest Nebraska Conference† was formed with eighteen charter members, one District and twenty-six Circuits and Stations, of which nine were left to be supplied.⁴⁵ David Marquette tells of the difficult situation that prevailed during its early years :

About the time the Northwest Nebraska Conference was born, . . . the conditions began to change for the worse, making progress more difficult, if not impossible, in many parts of that territory. The preceding 'seven years of plenty' were to be followed by 'seven years of leanness.' A succession of dry seasons brought partial and sometimes complete failure of crops.⁴⁶

During the first year of the Conference (1893) a missionary appropriation of $3,500. was made to twenty-seven missions, ranging from $30. to $600. each. In 1894 the appropriation was $3,200. and in 1895 the same amount. Despite difficult conditions membership of the churches increased from 1,673 to 2,093, three new Sunday schools were added and pupils increased to 2,488.⁴⁷

Before its creation as a territory in 1854 Kansas had been an Indian land save for some eight hundred whites—missionaries, blacksmiths, government land agents and farmers charged with teaching the Indians agriculture, and land "squatters." The early territorial years were a tumultuous period.

* The organizing session was held in Kearney, Sept. 10-15. Sixty-one charges were listed (of which nineteen were left to be supplied) on three Districts. Full members numbered 3,366; churches, 37; parsonages, 12; Sunday schools, 102, with 4,433 pupils.—Ibid., 1885, pp. 251, 371.

† The Northwest Nebraska Conference at its first session, held at Alliance, Sept. 27-Oct. 1, 1893, reported 1,673 full members, 5 Local Preachers, 24 churches, and 49 Sunday schools with 2,256 pupils. At this session five preachers were received on trial.—Ibid., Fall, 1893, pp. 341, 470.

Conflict between pro-slavery and free-state factions at times was little less than civil war and gave license to highway robbery, pillage and arson, marauding expeditions, and outrages of many different kinds.⁴⁸ A Kansas preacher wrote to the Central Christian Advocate in July, 1855, "Our work increases daily; no Church is prospering like our own in this soil, and the call for preaching is in almost every direction." Demand for preachers was so much greater than the supply that in some cases men were literally drafted into the itinerancy. Marcus D. Tenney came to Lawrence, Kansas, where he engaged in business. When the Presiding Elder returned from the 1859 Conference he confronted Tenney with the journal "showing that M. D. Tenney had been appointed to the Osage Circuit in Bourbon County." Feeling that the appointment was a call to which he must respond, at the end of the week he was on his way.⁴⁹

The organization of the Kansas Annual Conference* (March 21-26, 1861) and the admission of Kansas into the Union (January 29, 1861) were almost coincident. The outbreak of the Civil War at about the same time (April, 1861) caused the smouldering embers of intra-state conflict to burst into flames, and in the conflagration the Methodist Episcopal Church was immediately involved. In response to the call for volunteers several of the preachers of the Conference enlisted and became recruiting officers, "raised companies or regiments, and led them into the field." Others became chaplains. Eleven of the seventy members of the Conference in 1863 were chaplains in the army. Still others became involved in other ways in war activities.⁵⁰

The situation within both State and Church was further complicated by drought and consequent near-famine during the summer and fall of 1860 and the winter of 1861. An investigation by a Conference committee in 1861 revealed that in the preceding October "there were not provisions enough in the State, nor the means to procure them with to preserve more than half the people from starvation," and that most of the population were being compelled to live on cornbread and a little meat.⁵¹

The decennial increase of the Kansas population 1860-70 was 239.9 per cent. A large proportion of the immigrants were church members—Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Methodists, and others—with strong anti-slavery convictions, interested in Kansas because of the intense anti-slavery struggle.† By 1870 the Methodist membership of approximately four thousand in 1860

* The Kansas Conference, authorized by the 1860 General Conference, included "the . . . Territory of Kansas, and the state of Texas, and that portion of New Mexico east of the Rocky Mountains." (G. C. Journal, 1860, p. 271.) Also the German work in Missouri (which long had been attached to the Illinois Conference). At its first session sixty-five preachers were appointed to eighty-two charges of which seventeen were left to be supplied. The Conference was divided into eight Districts, all Mission Districts, of which one was in Colorado, and one—the St. Joseph German Mission District—had charges in Missouri and Nebraska. Full members numbered 3,932; churches, 43; Sunday schools, 87, with 2,825 pupils.—Gen'l Minutes, 1861, pp. 39 ff.

† Harold C. Evans, Chief Editor: "Many of the early settlers, who turned to agriculture as the only means of livelihood . . . had no natural aptitude or training for it. They were brought into the Territory by the New England Aid Company and other organizations solely for the purpose of setting up communities of anti-slavery voters. Consequently, it is not strange that Kansas agriculture, hampered from the outset by climatic conditions that were frequently adverse, . . . did not prosper."—Kansas, A Guide to the Sunflower State, p. 65.

had grown to 10,290. In the light of this growth the 1872 General Conference empowered the Kansas Conference, if it thought best, to divide its territory. The South Kansas Conference was organized March 11, 1874.* Missionary appropriations to the amount of $4,500. were made to four Districts at the first session.⁵²

Between 1870 and 1880 the population of Kansas increased 173.4 per cent. Following the close of the Civil War the government offered Union army veterans homesteads in Kansas and approximately a hundred thousand took advantage of the opportunity to procure a practically free farm.

These sturdy young veterans were Kansas' first real pioneer farmers. The majority had been reared on farms in the older semi-prairie States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, and understood the difficulties confronting the farmer who breaks virgin soil in prairie country.⁵³

Stating that the population increase on homestead lands in northwestern Kansas had been so great as to demand a much larger number of ministers, a delegate to the 1880 General Conference proposed that the region be organized into a Mission District. In justification of the proposal he said:

The financial condition of the people who are occupying a country for farming purposes . . . which, from the peculiar condition of the soil and climate, requires several years' occupancy before adequate returns can be had, is such that they are almost wholly unable to contribute any thing for the support of the Gospel, producing a condition . . . in which a large proportion of the support of the ministry must be borne by the Missionary Society, or thousands of our people be left without the means of grace . . .

Instead of creating a Mission District the General Conference passed enabling acts authorizing both the Kansas and the South Kansas Conferences to divide and "create a new Conference, and also, if found desirable, to unite . . . in forming a new Conference in the western part of the State."⁵⁴ Each Conference decided to divide and two new Conferences were formed, the Southwest and the Northwest.† Both leaned heavily upon missionary support. The appropriation of the Missionary Society to the Southwest Kansas Conference for 1884 was $3,500.; for 1887, $5,000.; for 1895, $5,500. Appropriations to Northwest Kansas were still larger: in 1884, $3,700.; in 1887, $6,000.; in 1895, $6,500.⁵⁵ Crop failures in the western counties of the state during the early years were frequent. In 1881 a disastrous drought and heavy

* The South Kansas Conference was organized with four Districts and eighty-four appointments. Full members numbered 9,226.—Minutes, South Kansas Conference, 1874, pp. 17 f., [38].

† The Southwest Kansas Conference convened in its first session in Winfield on March 8, 1883. The three Districts had sixty-eight Circuits and Stations, to which fifty preachers were appointed, leaving eighteen charges to be supplied. Full members numbered 7,129; Sunday schools 102, with 7,286 pupils; churches, 46, and parsonages 37. (Minutes, Southwest Kansas Conference, 1883, pp. [3], 20 ff., 33 ff.) The first session of the Northwest Kansas Conference was held in Beloit, March 15-19, 1883. Charter members numbered 41; probationers, 15. Appointments were made to seventy-two Circuits and Stations, of which 20 appointees were supplies. Full members numbered 5,991; Sunday schools, 127; pupils, 6,172; churches, 48; parsonages, 33.—Minutes, Northwest Kansas Conference, 1883, pp. [8], 18, 32-40.

infestation of insect pests throughout the state caused widespread suffering, and flooded the Missionary Society with urgent requests for emergency relief. On December 20, 1881, for example, W. H. Cline, Presiding Elder of the Newton District, South Kansas Conference, asked "relief for four circuits where the failure of crops . . . [had] cut off almost entirely the resources of the preachers." In many instances special requests were made for specific cases such as that of the Ellis charge, Kirwin District, Kansas Conference: "The pastor has a wife and four children—wife and one of the children sick. Crops failed and railroad at present a failure. People cannot pay and he is suffering."⁵⁶

The drought of 1881 was followed a few years later by a real estate boom. An influx of immigrants crowded the towns and cities, "and put a claimant on nearly every [unoccupied] quarter section of arable land in Western Kansas." Land prices rose rapidly and created a frenzy of speculation.

Eastern capital poured into the country and money was easily borrowed, though at a high rate of interest. Homes, farms, live stock, and everything on which money could be borrowed, were mortgaged, and the proceeds were drawn into this maelstrom of speculation. . . .

. . . Reaction was inevitable, and when it came it brought widespread and disastrous consequences. . . . Real estate prices dropped as rapidly as they had previously risen, and reached such a low level that property would hardly bring a price equal to the mortgage . . .⁵⁷

With the collapse of the boom a general exodus began. Western Kansas lost a large part of its population. In one year fourteen pastors in the Garden City District, Southwest Kansas Conference, each received from his charge less than $100., several less than $50., and in the Conference as a whole many members less than $200.

Despite these various handicaps Kansas Methodism registered substantial growth in the two decades between 1875 and 1895,* in the latter year registering a total membership, not including probationers, of 80,193.⁵⁸

The discovery of gold in Colorado in 1858-59 immediately stimulated immigration to the Rocky Mountains and immigration in turn centered the attention of the Bishops and the Missionary Society on the religious needs of the immigrants. Before 1858 Colorado had been an almost unknown region. It had no legal territorial government previous to 1861, when the United States organized the Territory of Colorado, and it did not become a state until 1876.

At the 1859 sessions of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference and of the Missouri Conference the sending of preachers to the Rocky Mountains was discussed at length, and William H. Goode finally yielded to the urging of

* In 1895 the four Kansas Conferences with nineteen Districts had 771 churches, 423 Local Preachers, and 970 Sunday schools with an enrollment of 80,845.—Gen'l Minutes, Spring, 1895, pp. 157, 176, 185, 207.

Bishop Scott to make a thorough exploration of the conditions and needs of the Rocky Mountain region and report to the Bishops and the General Missionary Committee.⁵⁹

Goode acted with his accustomed promptness. He selected as his associate Jacob Adriance, a young member of the Kansas and Nebraska Conference who it was understood should remain in the region as missionary, and on August 3 reported in a letter to the Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society that he had found in the mining district a population estimated at from fifteen to twenty-five thousand "mainly embraced within an area of fifty miles square, two-thirds of whom are in the mountains." He had organized the "Denver City and Auraria Mission" with a Quarterly Conference and a membership in Society of twenty-two, with Adriance in charge; and the Rocky Mountain Mission with a Quarterly Conference and a Society of fifty-seven members. He placed George W. Fisher, who was already on the ground, in charge of the latter mission. Here at the "great mining center" he found many church members, not alone Methodists but also Baptists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists.

The people were clamorous for organization, but no one felt authorized to go forward, at least as far as Methodism was concerned. . . . All welcomed us cordially. No question was raised as to the character of the organization. All assented, There are probably one hundred members of our Church at this point. Of this number nearly one half united at once, with some probationers.⁶⁰

Goode attended the 1860 session of the Kansas-Nebraska Conference with "a favorable report of the Rocky Mountain exploration." A Rocky Mountain District was formed of which John M. Chivington was appointed Presiding Elder. The Minutes list six appointments, of which five were left to be supplied.⁶¹

After Goode's departure, Adriance soon began to see the darker hues of the scene.

I felt like a stranger in a strange land; more strange among a still stranger people, surrounded with circumstances and conditions still more strange; for none of them cared for religious things. Trading, trafficking, drinking and gambling were the order of the day, seven days in the week, interspersed with the occasional shooting of a man.

Congregations were processions. Every time, Adriance wrote, his congregation was "nearly all newcomers." Men did not come to the mines to establish a home but to make a "stake" and return to their former homes. "Most of the work in the mines," J. L. Dyer says, "was done in the summer, and in the fall most of the miners would scatter."⁶² Some of those appointed to the missionary ranks in Colorado and other regions of the West found the hardships involved too much for them. Even Jacob Adriance decided that the difficulties were too great to be endured.

Not feeling myself adapted to that rough-and-tumble work, I determined to locate. We came down out of the mountains in February, 1862, by wagon, and were eighteen days getting to Fremont, Nebraska. In the Nebraska Conference I worked hard for sixteen years.⁶³

J. M. Chivington declares him to have been "the founder of Methodism in Colorado."

It is true Dr. Goode came on the ground at the same time he did; but the Doctor returned to Iowa in six weeks, and never saw this work again. . . . while Mr. Adriance remained, formed a mission circuit, organized societies, appointed class-leaders, held Quarterly Conferences, and started the first Sunday-school ever organized in Colorado. He is indeed, the father of Methodism in Colorado.⁶⁴

Other men of ability and stamina who shared in the foundation laying in Colorado included Oliver A. Willard, brother of Frances Willard, B. T. Vincent, and W. H. Fisher; all men of renown. The most picturesque of the pioneers was John L. Dyer, who deserves to be known as the Peter Cartwright of the Rocky Mountain region. In 1861 Dyer made his way from the Mindora Circuit, Northwest Wisconsin Conference, to Pike's Peak, crossing Nebraska on foot. In Wisconsin he had been "taken with sore eyes" and despite radical treatments—the lids turned over and burnt with caustic, and "Sloan's Instant Relief" applied every day—they were but little better when he reached the mountains.

I thought that, as I was on my own hook, it would be well to dig a little, as necessity seemed to demand it. [In mining for gold, however, he met with no success and he resumed preaching.] . . .

From . . . [Fairplay] I went to Buckskin Joe, and, with Brother Antis, held meeting for two weeks, in the face of every kind of opposition—at least two balls a week, a dancing-school, a one-horse theater, two men shot—and yet, notwithstanding all these things, we had a good meeting. The Church was much revived, and several backsliders were reclaimed. In about four months I traveled near five hundred miles on foot, by Indian trails, crossing logs, carrying my pack, and preaching about three times a week. . . . My clothes were worn out; my hat-rim patched with dressed antelope-skin; my boots half-soled with raw-hide. This is a sample of my work and experiences the first year in the mountains of Colorado.⁶⁵

The report for 1862, the third year of the mission, showed seven charges, 159 full members, six Sunday schools with 233 pupils, and only one church building. Appointments at the Conference session were only to four points out of eight: Denver, Golden and Boulder, South Park, and Canon and Colorado.⁶⁶

The oncoming of war was keenly felt in Colorado. More than twelve hundred men enlisted in 1861 in the Union army and hundreds went south to join the forces of the Confederacy. This depletion of population seriously retarded the Church program.

The 1860 General Conference authorized the Bishops, "should circumstances in their judgment require it,"⁶⁷ to organize the Rocky Mountain Annual Conference.* This enabling act, however, was not put into effect until 1863 when Bishop E. R. Ames organized the Conference at a meeting of the preachers in Denver on July 10-13. Although only fourteen appointments were listed the Bishop considered it necessary to create two Districts—the Denver, of which Oliver A. Willard was made Presiding Elder, and the Colorado, with W. B. Slaughter, Presiding Elder. Slaughter continued in active service only one year and John L. Dyer was appointed to succeed him on the South Park District. He traveled the District as a Circuit with appointments at South Park, Ore City (Leadville), Colorado City, Canon City, Pueblo, and all points south to Trinidad. The 1864 General Conference changed the name from Rocky Mountain to Colorado Conference.⁶⁸

For years Circuits continued to be long, with many of the preaching places widely separated. In 1873, John Stocks, who had come from England the year before, experienced a rough initiation into the American itinerancy on the Arkansas River Circuit:

This was a new field, without a society, Sunday-school, or church of any kind. The settlers were widely scattered. He preached as opportunity offered from the Kramer Settlement, below Pueblo, eastward for seventy-five miles, then southward on the Purgatory, and up that stream for forty-five miles. His horseback rides were long and lonely. . . .

His preaching-places were small log schoolhouses, or the dwellings of the people. His congregations were small, often not more than half a dozen.⁶⁹

In 1879 John L. Dyer was appointed to Breckenridge Circuit, an entirely new work named after the county within which it was located. The county's eastern boundary was forty-five miles west of Denver, and from there the area extended west to Utah and north to Wyoming. In later years seven counties were made out of it.⁷⁰ At the 1878 session of the Conference Bishop Simpson presided for the second time. In his report as Presiding Elder B. F. Crary directly addressed the Bishop:

You, bishop, presided at this Conference ten years ago Then you sent out ten men to work. This past year forty-five men have been in the field. Of the ten you appointed then, only three remain on the ground to-day. We are in the regular accession and succession and procession. There is only one appointment in the Conference that is really able to be self-sustaining, and hence only one comfortable spot, and none of us expect to revel in that!⁷¹

Until 1870 the growth of Colorado was slow—only 39,864 in that year reported by the census. But from 1870 to 1880 the population increased to

* The boundaries of the Rocky Mountain Conference were fixed as "embracing such portions of the Territories of Kansas, Nebraska, Utah, and New Mexico as are now comprised under the provisional government of the territory of Jefferson [Colorado], with such other contiguous parts of the mining region as it may be necessary to attach thereto."—G. C. Journal, 1860, pp. 276 f.

194,327; and from 1880 to 1890 growth was still more rapid, increasing to 413,240. The Methodist Church grew apace. At the close of the period (1895) the Colorado Conference* reported a total membership of 10,517. In the Conference year 1894-95 the churches and Sunday schools contributed $5,175. to missions and $82,551. to total ministerial support.⁷²

MISSIONS IN THE OLDER CONFERENCES

Of the 360 missions reported in 1850-51 almost one half were in the older Conferences in the East. Fourteen missions were within the bounds of the Philadelphia Conference. Providence, one of the smaller Conferences, had twelve missions. Vermont, also a small Conference, had seventeen. Of other eastern Conferences New Jersey reported eight; New England, eight; Troy, sixteen; and Black River, sixteen.

Even in long-settled sections of the eastern states there were neglected communities where religious services were lacking. J. N. Spangler, appointed in 1848 to the Berlin Mission in Maryland, wrote to the Christian Advocate:

I was struck with astonishment to think that in Frederick county, Md., there were places so destitute of the Gospel! Brethren, if this be the case here, have we not reason to conclude that there are many more of like sort in our country? And who will go out into the highways and hedges to save such, if Methodists refuse to do it?⁷³

Spangler reported having increased the mission Circuit from six appointments, with fifty-six members, to ten appointments, with two hundred members.

In his History of the Methodist Episcopal Church Nathan Bangs cites Worcester, Massachusetts, as an example of a fruitful mission in a long-established community. Methodism, he says, had no standing "in the old and populous town . . . until it was occupied as mission ground in the year 1834." Seven years later the Methodist Society there had more than four hundred members and in 1841 the New England Conference held its annual session in the city.⁷⁴

Many of the missions were little Societies of twenty, thirty, or forty members in the open country, villages, and towns in the East or in the older sections of Ohio and Indiana. Some represented cases of arrested growth. Many were in old communities whose earlier population had been depleted by wholesale migration to the far West.

In 1873 appropriations were made by the General Missionary Committee to forty-two missions in the Baltimore Conference in amount of $8,000.; forty-five in the New Hampshire Conference, $2,600.; thirty-two in the

* Colorado Conference in 1895 had four Districts and 108 charges to which seventy-three preachers were appointed. There were 101 churches and forty-nine parsonages. The 143 Sunday schools enrolled 14,347 pupils.—Minutes, Colorado Conference, Fall, 1895, pp. 269, 432 ff.

New Jersey Conference, $2,210.; thirty-two in the New York Conference, $5,000.; thirty-three in the New York East Conference, $5,000.; thirty-nine in the Philadelphia Conference, $5,000.; forty-eight in the Troy Conference, $3,000.; and to many other Conferences in greater or less amounts. Between 1853 and 1873, inclusive, the Missionary Society appropriated to five of the larger eastern Conferences* a total of $436,175.⁷⁵

In 1857 Elnathan C. Gavitt, Presiding Elder, reported three missions within the bounds of the Lima District, Delaware Conference. One was in Delphos, a town of about twelve hundred inhabitants, of whom about one half were German Roman Catholics. Earlier the Presbyterians and Baptists had maintained religious services, but being without church buildings had become discouraged. The Methodists would have met the same fate had it not been for an energetic Local Preacher, who with a few others succeeded in building a comfortable house of worship. The missionary appointed to the charge succeeded in building up "a good congregation; a membership of 45; [and] a Sabbath school . . . of about 70 children." On the Paulding Mission were two missionaries, between them serving twenty-three appointments, with 162 church members. In reaching these appointments they traveled every four weeks about two hundred and fifty miles. They each preached three times every Sunday and frequently on weekdays, always in schoolhouses and log cabins, as there were no meeting houses. Kalida, the third mission, with five appointments, reported 130 members and twelve probationers.⁷⁶

The West Point Mission in the Poughkeepsie District, New York Conference, in 1847 included small Societies at West Point, Fallsville, and Fort Montgomery. The membership at West Point consisted chiefly of persons—twenty in number—connected with the U. S. army. At Fallsville, two miles south of West Point, the membership within a year had increased from eleven to thirty-eight. At Fort Montgomery, five and a half miles south of West Point, a Society of some years' standing had been reduced in number by deaths and removals to thirty-two persons.⁷⁷

The Pine Grove Mission was established in 1846 at Tremont, Pennsylvania, a "new and highly promising town." The community had no house of worship and the place first made available for preaching was the barroom of a log tavern. A Class was formed of three men and three women. Within the first year of the mission a substantial stone building was erected and the membership increased to fifty-three, the majority of the converts being men "from twenty to sixty-seven years of age," many of whom were influential citizens of the community.⁷⁸

The Saratoga District, Troy Conference, in 1859 had two missions, Stancey Creek and Wells. The former, located in Warren County, New York, was in a "hilly and sterile, thinly settled" region, where the people were poor. A plain dwelling was erected for the missionary, and plans made for a church. It was believed that the mission within a few years would be a self-supporting Circuit. Wells, the second mission, was located in Hamilton County, New York, and included three appointments—Wells, Hope, and Lake Pleasant. At a Camp Meeting held at Lake Pleasant between twenty and thirty persons were converted.⁷⁹

* These five Conferences and the amount appropriated to each were: Baltimore Conference, $132,755.; Philadelphia Conference, $98,625.; New York East Conference, $78,025.; New York Conference, $72,425.; New England Conference, $54,345.—Fifty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1874), pp. 184 f.

Writing in 1851 to the Christian Advocate from the Paoli District, Indiana Conference, William C. Smith stated that only a few years earlier nearly the whole of the District was embraced in one mission. In the meantime Circuit after Circuit had been "struck off," always leaving one mission until in 1850 what remained was formed into two missions, Jasper and Anderson. Jasper Mission, embracing parts of three counties, had eleven preaching places, five meeting houses, and a comfortable parsonage. Anderson Mission, including a part of four counties, had within its bounds fourteen preaching places, one meeting house and two in process of erection. Both missions were prospering.⁸⁰

In June, 1894, J. H. Hargis, Presiding Elder of the West District, Philadelphia Conference, announced the organization of the Lehman Street Mission, Lebanon—a Pennsylvania Dutch Society.

The prayer meeting on Wednesday evening and the preaching services on Sunday evening are well sustained and constantly growing in interest and attendance. Efforts are being made to purchase a site for the erection of a chapel, which is an absolute necessity for the permanent establishment of this work.

In connection with the mission, preaching services were held at two outlying points, Fontana and Richland, with a congregation at each place of about one hundred. The Missionary Society appropriation for the mission was $800.⁸¹

A few of the missions in the older Conferences were in cities. At the 1860 session of the Cincinnati Conference M. P. Gaddis was made "effective" and appointed to the Dayton City Mission. About three years before, he had obtained permission of the Society of Friends to open a Sunday school in their new church building. So successful was his effort that a preaching service was added and a Methodist Society organized. Soon he announced that 120 persons had united with the Church and it was expected that soon the church building would be purchased. All of this was accomplished without any missionary appropriation for salary.⁸²

These of which brief accounts have been given were only a few of hundreds of missions in the older Conferences. Stephen Olin suggested what seemed to him a reasonable basis for continued missionary support of missions of this class:

It would not be easy to fix a standard either of numbers or circumstances by which to determine the propriety of extending aid to feeble societies; but it seems to us a sound rule not to attempt, in this way, to establish new stations, or to sustain old ones, when there is not a reasonable prospect of such an expansion as will enable them, in due time, to support themselves. . . . When a village or neighborhood is already preoccupied by active, spiritual denominations, and the people are well supplied with the means of grace, it is plainly a waste of means to attempt, in this way, to raise a new congregation for the gratification of half a dozen families who may prefer our creed or polity. Whatever else may be said in favor of such an aggressive movement, it is no proper missionary work; and resources obtained for the evangelization of the heathen, or to help the destitute, can not, without a manifest perversion, be expended on such enterprises.⁸³

Olin felt that the principles which he enunciated were not in all cases being observed and declared that he could "enumerate scores of stations ~~struggling~~ ~~on~~ from year to year, and doomed to struggle on, without room for expansion or the prospect of better days," and that the perpetuation of such situations by missionary assistance weakened rather than strengthened Methodism.⁸⁴ Nor was he alone in holding these views. A writer in the Christian Advocate asserted that "impositions [were] practiced on the . . . [Missionary] Society in the older conferences by the Committee on Missions," and that the abuses must be remedied.⁸⁵ Increase in the Society's debt in the middle seventies forced the withholding of appropriations from a number of the older Conferences for the missions under their auspices. In their Fifty-eighth Annual Report the Secretaries said:

As time has elapsed it has become more and more apparent that . . . [this action] may not prove an entirely unmingled evil. The whole system of grants in the older parts of our work seem[s] destined to undergo a most careful scrutiny and revision. Of this the General Conference appears to have been aware when they directed that the Committee on Missions should report to the conference, not only the appropriations to be made to the several missions, but also the number of years each had been a mission, consecutive or otherwise.⁸⁶

The disposition to continue to depend upon missionary aid was not wholly limited to missions in the older Conferences. Newer Societies, established by missionary grants, in some instances were slow to relinquish assistance even after ability for self-support had been developed. The final decision on whether to continue to ask or to forego missionary aid largely rested with the Presiding Elders. Too often, in the older Conferences, they tended to encourage dependence. In the newer sections of the country many of the Districts were so large that little opportunity was available for close supervision of the missions. The Presiding Elder of the Grand Traverse District, Michigan Conference, Salmon Steele, pictures his District as it was in 1861:

The district embraces an extent of territory one hundred and seventy miles in length, lying directly upon the coast of Lake Michigan. This distance has to be traveled by trail in winter. The settlements are remote from each other, frequently thirty or forty miles apart. With my carpet sack strapped to my shoulders, I started about the 1st of November for my appointments, and returned about the 1st of January, having made nearly the whole distance of three hundred and forty miles on foot.⁸⁷

The fact that the Missionary Society was unable to procure information concerning many of these missions was a continuing cause of complaint. In many cases not even the name or location of the missions was known to the Board. Finally, in 1864, the General Conference voted:

That each Annual Conference be and is hereby required to furnish annually to the Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society at New York a report of its doings on the subject of missions, which report shall specify the name of each district, circuit, or station within its bounds sustained in whole or in part by said Conference as a mission, together with the amount of missionary money appropriated to each respectively for that conference year.⁸⁸

However, this General Conference action did not bring to the Society the information required in order to establish closer relation with the missions. Of the sixty-one Annual Conferences listed in the Missionary Society's Report for 1867, only thirty-nine had made such returns as the General Conference directed. The Society could only estimate the number of missions in the remaining twenty-two Conferences.⁸⁹

CITY MISSIONS AND MISSIONARY SOCIETIES

City missionary work, as previously stated, was classified in the Annual Reports of the Missionary Society as a distinctive phase of Conference missions. To most of the city missions the relationship of the Annual Conference was closer than that of the Missionary Society. They were of several different types: (1) Mariners' Bethels established in the large seaport cities; (2) missions to the destitute, the unemployed and those who had become the victims of vice and drunkenness; (3) missions to foreign language groups not reached by the stated ministries of the churches; (4) missions to the unchurched in newly settled and suburban areas of the cities.

The Mariners' Bethels,* as the name indicated, were organized to provide a haven for seamen during their days in port, providing both material comforts and also a religious ministry adapted to their needs. By 1855, it was estimated, there were not less than 239,000 American seamen in the foreign and coasting trade and fisheries, besides approximately 10,000 in the federal naval service.⁹⁰ For many of these, exposed whenever their ships came into port to the degrading temptations of saloons and haunts of vice, the Mariners' Bethels were veritable lighthouses of salvation. The Methodist Mariners' Bethel (Cherry Street), New York City, built in 1844, was maintained for many years, supported in part by the Missionary Society. In addition to this and others previously mentioned, and the Scandinavian Bethel Ship missionary activities, a few local churches maintained mariners' missions.*

Immigration, industrialization, and migration from rural areas, as we have seen,† accentuated the cities' problems of poverty, unemployment, immorality, and crime. Since the churches were not prepared to offer a ministry that met the needs of the victims of these evils missions were established particularly for them. Of the multitudes of immigrants that thronged the cities a large proportion were not able to speak or understand English and missions for them, with services in their own tongues, were established.‡

As early as 1866 the Christian Advocate declared that in New York City alone there were "three quarters of a million of souls not embraced in any system of adequate evangelical action." "Surely," the editorial continued, "New York has all the necessities that might entitle it to the name of a mission field, only it is not made such by missionary labors." Thirty years later Zion's Herald sounded much the same note. "Does it not seem," it asked, "as if the leaders of our Israel had failed to interpret the heart and purpose of our people with respect to the city problem?"⁹¹

The General Conference of 1864 amended the Discipline to include among the specified duties of a Bishop the fixing of appointments of "missionaries to neglected portions of our cities," the first recognition by General Conference of special need for city missionary work.⁹² About the same time ministers and lay people of churches in some of the cities became awakened to special religious needs in their midst and made attempts to meet them by the organization of city societies. One searches the Missionary Society's Annual Reports in vain for account of these city missionary organizations, either of their beginnings or their ongoing activities. They were composed largely of laymen, whose contributions made possible their founding and to a great extent their continuing existence. They were independent of the general Society, were not auxiliary to it, had their own constitutions, and their distinctive methods of operations.

The general purpose of the several Methodist city missionary societies was much the same. The Boston society stated its purpose to be "to carry the Means of Grace to the neglected and destitute of our population, by establishing Sunday Schools and Religious Meetings . . . and in all other ways laboring to promote the cause of Christ in this City and vicinity." The purpose of the New York society during its early years was stated by an anonymous author who wrote in 1870 to the Christian Advocate:

* One such was the mission established by the Methodist Church at Holmes' Hole Station (Martha's Vineyard), Mass. In 1870 it was estimated that in the preceding year between two and three thousand vessels, carrying at least 15,000 men, anchored in that harbor. The Church employed Julius Esping, formerly a sailor, as their missionary.—Christian Advocate, XLV (1870), 47 (Nov. 24), 371.

Its theory is, that the Methodism of New York should move together as a unit in the work of city evangelization; that outside of the local Churches, but strictly within our disciplinary Church order, there is need of an agency to carry the Gospel to the destitute. It further accepts the position that almsgiving is no part of the work of an evangelist⁹³

The object of the Chicago society as stated in its charter in 1885 was:

The founding of Missions and maintaining mission Churches and Sunday schools and other Christian work of the Methodist Episcopal Church, within the City of Chicago and suburbs⁹⁴

In the early years the city missionary movement was distinctively evangelistic and stress was placed on the holding of evangelistic meetings. In 1850 the New York Ladies' Home Missionary Society established in one of the worst centers "of vice, poverty, and degradation" in New York City what came to be known as the Five Points Mission, where weeknight evangelistic meetings were regularly held. Despite "discouragements such as have seldom attended a humane and evangelical enterprise" its operation was placed on a permanent basis.⁹⁵

As the years passed a tendency developed to place less emphasis upon evangelistic meetings and to make the city societies a means of organizing and developing churches in unchurched city and suburban communities. As early as 1869 the New York society described its purpose as twofold:

First, 'It is the design of the Society to provide as far as possible for the neglected missions in localities left by the churches in their "uptown migrations" and second, to make an advance movement in selecting and occupying important localities soon to become thickly settled, and thus provide for the future wants of the church. . . .'⁹⁶

The anonymous writer mentioned above also stressed this purpose. The direct aim, he said, was "to gather congregations to whom to preach the Gospel, and from among them to organize Societies and Churches."

This made houses of worship necessary, and accordingly the society became incorporated, that it might hold real estate; for experience had shown that it was not wise to have the landed property required for a mission church owned and managed by the local society.⁹⁷

In the larger centers the city missionary societies were incorporated by acts of the respective state legislatures and were self-governing under boards of managers elected by the societies themselves to whom annual reports were made. However, in most cases they also made reports to the Annual Conferences within which they were located. Their executive secretaries as a rule were Annual Conference members and were listed under the Conference appointments, even though elected by the managers. The boards of managers were responsible for raising the funds for the societies' operations, and exercising general oversight of the organizations' temporal affairs, and determining sites for new churches. Locations for new Sunday schools and churches, however, were usually chosen in collaboration with the Presiding Elders and District committees. The budget of the New York Society for 1869-70 was about $20,000. and for extending the program, as much more. The two Conferences with appointments in New York City appointed for the Conference year five missionary pastors, and in addition three assistants—two men and one woman—were employed by the society. Toward the support of the missionaries the Missionary Society contributed* about four or five thousand dollars.⁹⁸

The origin and development of city societies may be illustrated by citing, as examples, a few of the principal organizations. The first city society under Methodist leadership† was the New York Sunday School and Missionary Society, whose constitution was dated 1838. It was incorporated by act of the New York State Legislature in April, 1866, under the changed name of the New York City Sunday School and Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.‡ In Chicago, as in several other cities, a group of Methodist women, zealous for the spiritual needs of their home communities, about 1853 formed an organization which they named the City Missionary Society. They began by employing Stewart Hamilton, a Class Leader of Clark Street Church—better known as "Father Hamilton"—as "city missionary." He was, in himself, a one-man missionary society, indefatigable in personal work, "visiting from house to house, distributing bibles and tracts . . . , exhorting the people, and praying with them."⁹⁹ Referring to his service the Northwestern Christian Advocate said:

The cause of city missions is yet in its beginnings. It is destined to actuate the heart of the Church with a power little dreamed of by many. We hope the day when it will do so is very near.¹⁰⁰

Years later the Chicago Home Missionary and Church Extension Society was organized. From 1870 to 1885 it had a merely nominal existence, although during this period sixteen missions were organized and churches erected. In 1885 "a number of leading laymen . . . determined that the Society should assume a more permanent form, and proceeded to incorporate" under a charter recorded on December 21 of that year. With William Deering as

* About 1882 the General Missionary Committee began to make appropriations to city missionary societies. That year the total approximated $55,000. In 1892 it made appropriations to about fifty-six societies.

† The first city society for evangelization to be organized anywhere in the world was the Boston Society for the Moral and Religious Instruction of the Poor, the name of which was later changed to the City Missionary Society. It was formed in Boston in 1816.—17th Ann. Rep. of the Board of Directors of the Boston Society for the Moral and Religious Instruction of the Poor, as cited by Wilbur C. Hallenbeck, Urban Organization of Protestantism, pp. 13, 15 f.

‡ There were various later changes of name until, in 1912, it was designated the New York City Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

president and the Rev. Luke Hitchcock as secretary the society entered upon a greatly expanded program. From 1885 to 1890 twenty-five Societies were organized and nine church buildings erected. In 1890, A.D. Traveller succeeded to the secretaryship. During the period 1890-96 forty-one missions were organized and fifty churches erected.¹⁰¹

On June 4, 1866, a constitution was adopted for an organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church for missionary work in Boston and vicinity. On October 8 the first meeting of the new organization, the Boston Methodist Home Missionary Association,* was held and officers elected. Its early activities included maintaining a missionary, opening a mission on North Street, hiring a hall for a mission by the Roxbury Church, and promoting "the erection of a Chapel in the vicinity of Tremont and Ruggles sts." On August 5, 1869, the organization was incorporated by the Legislature of Massachusetts as "The Boston Sunday School and Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church." Difficulty was encountered in raising the budget and the society resorted to musical entertainments, lectures, and annual festivals to carry on its program. In 1873 the name again was changed, this time to the Boston Missionary and Church Extension Society. Its program from 1873 to 1895 suffered from lack of adequate support and at times from near cessation of its efforts.¹⁰²

The Cleveland Methodist Episcopal Church and Sunday School Alliance was organized April 21, 1886. J. B. Cory of the East Ohio Conference was appointed as city missionary. A beginning was made immediately in aiding societies in purchasing lots, erecting churches, and establishing missions. In April, 1891, the Alliance was reincorporated under the name of the Cleveland City Church Extension and Missionary Society† of the Methodist Episcopal Church, with broadened objectives and powers.¹⁰³ Preceding the adoption of the new constitution the society had resolved that its policy should be to purchase each year an eligible lot in such location as seems to be most urgently needed, and to pay for the same out of the general fund raised by the Methodist Episcopal Churches of Cleveland for that purpose during the year in which said purchase is made. It was also decided to undertake each year the erection of a church edifice upon the lot purchased and paid for the previous year, . . .¹⁰⁴

However, the society lacked funds to realize this ambitious objective. About 1892 the financial secretary expressed satisfaction in the fact that in "locating thirteen new churches, no serious mistake . . . [had] been made."¹⁰⁵

With local city missionary societies functioning in many cities a need was

* This organization was an outgrowth, but separate from, a previously existing organization known as the Boston Methodist Sunday School Union. On Dec. 7, 1868, the Methodist Sunday School Union was reported to be "virtually extinct."—Boston Methodist Home Missionary Society Association, "Records, 1866-73," unpagcd ms.

† Both in its Minutes and its promotional activities the society frequently used the name City Evangelization Union.

felt for a national organization to bring them together in closer fraternal relation and to afford opportunity for consideration of means of making them more effective. A conference was called by the Cleveland City Church Extension Society for November 12, 1891, at which ten city unions were represented. At this meeting a City Evangelization Convention was planned to be held in Pittsburgh, March 15-16, 1892. At this convention a memorial to the 1892 General Conference was drafted proposing a "general representative union." The General Conference approved the proposal * and authorized a national City Evangelization Union.¹⁰⁶

Despite the activities of the Methodist city missionary societies, and those of several other denominations—notably the Congregational, Presbyterian, and Baptist Churches—Protestantism failed to maintain its strength of earlier years in the larger cities of the nation. The prevailing Protestant older American stock tended to remove from the congested, downtown sections, leaving them to the Roman Catholic Church. In 1893 Josiah Strong cited, as examples of what was happening, Boston and Cleveland. The thirteenth ward of Boston, with a population of more than twenty-two thousand, was without a single Protestant church, while in the eleventh, the Back Bay, with fewer people, there were thirty. One half of the Protestant church members of Cleveland resided in ten of the wealthiest wards, having a population of fifty-three thousand, while the other half were "scattered through thirty wards" of two hundred and fifteen thousand population.¹⁰⁷ The "one great and grave fact which stands ever before us," wrote George P. Mains in 1894.

is that the evangelical Church of the land, taken as a whole, is numerically far weaker in the great city—the very place where by all the needs of the case it ought to be strongest—than it is elsewhere; and the larger the city, the more momentous the concentration of interests, social, political, moral, the more pronounced is the diminishment of evangelical forces.¹⁰⁸

DOMESTIC "FOREIGN MISSIONS"

The constitution of the Missionary Society as revised by the General Conference of 1864—in addition to Foreign Missions, and Domestic Missions—provided for a third class, viz., "Missions in the United States and Territories not included in the bounds of any of the Annual Conferences." These missions were classified in Missionary Society Reports as "Domestic Foreign Missions." They were also referred to as "missions of the third class," or simply "third class missions." Administratively, they were distinguished from other types of domestic missions by direct financial control and administration by the Missionary Society, † and by special episcopal supervision. Missionaries sent to the domestic foreign missions retained their relation to the Annual Conferences to which they belonged when appointed.¹⁰⁹ The designation "third class missions" was not long retained.*

* See pp. 67 f.

† The constitution (1864) conferred upon the General Missionary Committee, with the concurrence of the Board and the Bishops, the power to determine the total amount allocated to missions of the third class and the responsibility of dividing "the amount appropriated to the missions in the United States and territories not included in the Annual Conferences to such sections of the country as in their judgment the interests of the work require."—Forty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1864)), p. 11.

Long before the Disciplinary provision of 1864 was made several missions were established which properly belonged in the category of domestic foreign missions: the Oregon Mission, established as an Indian mission in 1833; the California Mission, 1848; the New Mexico Mission, 1850; and the Arizona Mission, 1859. In 1864, when the classification was adopted, in addition to these earlier missions third class missions included the missionary work projected in Utah, Eastern Idaho, Montana, and also the missions which had been established in the South.¹¹⁰

The immigration which during the decade 1870-80 rapidly increased the population throughout the new western territories radically changed the situation. The General Conference of 1880 created six more missions: (1) Black Hills Mission; (2) Dakota Mission ("all that part of Dakota Territory . . . east of the Black Hills Mission"); (3) Indian Mission (to include the Indian Territory); (4) Montana Mission; (5) West Nebraska Mission; (6) Utah Mission.† By 1888 the list had increased to twelve in number, the following new missions having been added ‡: California German; Lower California; New Mexico Spanish; Nevada; North Pacific German; North-west Norwegian and Danish; and Wyoming.¹¹¹

The administrative relationship of the Missionary Society to the territorial pioneer missions was not altogether satisfactory. Distance from New York and the preoccupation of the Secretaries with office duties and Annual Conference visitation prevented frequent supervisory visits. Hence the repeated demand in General Conference for an Assistant Secretary "to reside in the West." For the most part consultation with the Corresponding Secretary was by correspondence only.

OREGON MISSION

On November 27, 1846, William Roberts, of the New Jersey Conference, with his family sailed from New York in the bark Whiton for Oregon and arrived at his destination in June, 1847, under appointment from the Board as Superintendent of the Oregon Mission.§ He was accompanied by James H.

* "The most important of these [third class] missions since their organization have hitherto been in the southern portion of the United States. That field has, however, all been organized into annual conferences, and they are reported among the . . . Domestic Missions . . ." (Forty-ninth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1867], p. 128.) The third class of missions ceased by 1869.—Minutes, B. M., VII, 124.

† Utah and Montana had earlier achieved Conference status, but this year reverted to the status of missions.

‡ The organization of Annual Conferences in one after another of the domestic foreign mission areas so altered the situation that in 1880 the Missionary Society changed the scheme for classification, these missions appearing thereafter in the appropriations and in the Annual Report under the head of "Domestic Missions."—Sixty-second Ann. Rep., M. S. (1880), pp. 190, 192.

§ The story of the Oregon Indian Mission, including the particulars of its liquidation under the superintendency of George Gary, is given in Vol. II, 200-262. Gary arrived in New York, returning from Oregon, on Jan. 18, 1848.

Wilbur of the Black River Conference, sent as an additional missionary. On the departure of George Gary from Oregon in July, 1847, Roberts* took charge as Superintendent.¹¹²

The transfer of the premises of the Indian Mission at Wascopam not having been made Roberts and Marcus Whitman met in August and concluded arrangements. The Methodist missionaries in charge, A. F. Waller and H. B. Brewer, were still opposed to the transfer and Roberts was sympathetic with their view but unwilling to veto Gary's proposal which had presumably been made with approval of the Missionary Board. Accordingly, in September, 1847, Perrin Whitman, Dr. Whitman's nephew, and Alanson Hinman took charge of the property in the name of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions.† Waller was transferred to the Oregon Institute and Brewer severed his connection with the mission. "Thus," wrote H. K. Hines, "the last Indian mission established by Jason Lee in Oregon was discontinued, and in their place was instituted a work connected with the white race that was now fast supplanting them on the fields of their former possessions."¹¹³

Within three months of the transfer of the mission a disaster of major proportions befell the American Board at their inland station at Waiilatpu in the massacre by the Cayuse Indians of Dr. and Mrs. Whitman and twelve other persons, and imprisonment of all the remaining white women. This caused the closing of every Indian mission in the Pacific Northwest east of the Cascade Mountains.¹¹⁴

William Roberts made his first report to the Missionary Society under date of April 24, 1848. "Including those sent out by the Board," he said, "and four others employed by the Superintendent," there were eight persons engaged in pastoral service. In addition there were sixteen Local Preachers and six Exhorters. Members of the Church at the six preaching places numbered 317, and Sunday-school pupils 108. The Oregon Institute—schoolhouse and land—which Gary had been in such haste to dispose of,‡ Roberts took immediate steps to repurchase. He had the wisdom to foresee that the sixty acres of ground would rapidly increase in value, particularly if the town of Salem surrounding the plot should become a city. The Board was hesitant about approving the Superintendent's recommendation, at first, on September 21, 1848, giving conditional sanction, and then on November 15 deciding that repurchase was "inexpedient at present." Finally, on August 15, 1849, purchase

* Before leaving New York Roberts, together with Charles Pitman, Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society, interviewed President James K. Polk in Washington in the interest of the Oregon Mission. The President assured them of his concern for the welfare of missions in the Oregon country, and that the contemplated territorial organization would not affect the validity of the Missionary Society's title to its property, but that the U. S. government could not make a grant of land to any particular denomination for educational or other purposes and that "except it be in the case of the Indians, such donations must be made by the state or territorial government."—Minutes, B. M., V, 10 f.

† On Oct. 20, 1847, the Oregon Committee reported to the Board of Managers, on the basis of communications from the field, the divergent views of A. F. Waller and George Gary on the transfer of the mission at Wascopam. The Board after hearing the report voted approval of Gary's action "in abandoning the appointment at the Dalles, & transferring it to the American Board."—Ibid., p. 46.

was authorized "on the most favourable terms" obtainable. Further, the Board stated that it would transfer its interest in the Institute to the Oregon and California Conference, if organized, whenever it was prepared to take the school over, "on Condition that they secure it to the cause of Education & Religion under the patronage and control of the Conference." At the same meeting the Board approved the appointment and immediate outgoing of a teacher for the school.¹¹⁵

The California gold rush in 1848 had a disrupting effect on church work in Oregon. Writing on October 9 William Roberts said that the country was almost depopulated:

Societies are broken up. Some of our circuits are almost deserted; just at the moment when our plans, somewhat matured, were giving promise of rich success in the salvation of souls, the blight and mildew of a 'haste to be rich' comes sweeping over all our prospects with all the haste and desolation of the simoon of the desert.¹¹⁶

In 1848 the Oregon Mission memorialized General Conference for the creation of an Annual Conference, a request endorsed by the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society. The General Conference, however, decided to include Oregon, California, and New Mexico in a single Mission Annual Conference. The organizing session was held in Salem, Oregon, on September 5, 1849.* The impracticability of a Conference including areas so widely separated was soon demonstrated. No members from California or New Mexico were present at the first, second, or third sessions; and the 1852 General Conference authorized division into two Conferences.¹¹⁷ The Oregon Conference was organized on March 17, 1853.† In the two years preceding, the missionary personnel had been measurably strengthened by reinforcement from eastern Conferences. In a letter to William Roberts, dated February 17, 1851, Bishop Morris stated that of three men recently transferred to Oregon one, C. S. Kingsley, was a graduate of Michigan University, and a second, L. T. Woodward, a graduate of Wabash College. In 1853, Gustavus Hines, an able, long-time missionary in Oregon in the early period of the mission, and two younger brothers, J. W. and H. K. Hines, were transferred from the Genesee Conference. There were also other transfers.¹¹⁸ The loss of people sustained by Oregon in the gold rush to California in 1848-50 was quickly offset by

* As no Bishop was present at the organizing session of the Oregon and California Conference, William Roberts, Superintendent, presided. There were but six charter members, of whom only four were present: William Roberts, David Leslie, Alvin F. Waller, and James H. Wilbur. Isaac Owen had been transferred from the Indiana Conference and William Taylor from Baltimore but neither had yet arrived on the field (C. V. Anthony, Fifty Years of Methodism . . . , p. 41). At the second session, for the Oregon District thirteen appointments were listed, with four left to be supplied; for California fifteen appointments, seven to be supplied. Church members in Oregon numbered 469, including probationers; in California, 738. Oregon had seventeen Local Preachers; California, twenty-one.—Gen'l Minutes, 1851, pp. 680 f.

† The area of the Oregon Conference as defined by the General Conference was "the Territory of Oregon," which in 1852 embraced the entire region of which the title of the United States had been confirmed by the Treaty of 1846 with Great Britain, including the present states of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho and parts of Wyoming and Montana.—"Journal of the General Conference, 1852," p. 153, in G. C. Journals, 111.

immigration induced by the "land donation law" which Congress enacted in 1850. Under this law settlers in Oregon between 1850 and 1853 procured large tracts of land free of cost. In 1848 Congress enacted a bill providing a territorial government. The territory's population increased from 13,294 in 1850 to 52,465 in 1860. Oregon became a state in 1859 and by 1890 had a population of 317,704.

One of the appointments at the first Conference was that of "superintendent of missions in Northern Oregon" (later, Washington Territory), described as a "wide, open field." Gustavus Hines characterized his mission as including "the wildest, the most mountainous, and the most romantic parts of the Oregon and Washington Territories," a "very difficult, and a very laborious field of labour." J. H. Wilbur, appointed to the Umpqua Mission District, rejoiced that where the preceding year there had been "not a single man to lift up his voice in warning the people, and teaching them the way of salvation," there were now five. William Roberts, appointed Presiding Elder of the Puget Sound Mission District, reported in November, 1854, six Circuits, including among other points, Olympia, Seattle, and Chehalis. There were a few members—at Seattle and Dwamish River but ten and at Port Townsend and Gamble not one—nevertheless, Roberts was confident that the harvest would be plenteous.¹¹⁹

Through the remainder of the period the Oregon Conference was a needy missionary field. In 1891 the Conference Committee on Missions made an impassioned appeal for an increase in the missionary appropriation.* Numerous areas invited missionary service, including some whole counties without either pastor or church building. Within a new District in southern Oregon in 1891 a strip of country over two hundred miles long and one hundred miles wide was without even one Methodist preacher.¹²⁰

The Oregon Conference was given permission by the 1872 General Conference "to divide their territory into two Conferences." Action on division was taken by the Conference and on July 30, 1874, the first session of the Columbia River Conference† (first called the East Oregon and Washington Conference) was convened at Walla Walla, Washington Territory. Its four Districts—Walla Walla, Dalles, Grande Ronde, and Indian Mission—had twenty-eight appointments scattered over a vast expanse of territory, to fourteen of which pastors were appointed, fourteen remaining to be supplied. Full members numbered 1,100, four hundred of whom were Indians affiliated with the

* The committee stated that the Presbyterian Board had recently "appropriated nineteen thousand dollars within the bounds of the Oregon Conference. This appropriation, when distributed, gives from $300 to $900 to each man. Thus they are able to put men of ability and experience where we are compelled to use local preachers as supplies. This puts us at a great disadvantage and retards our work."—Minutes, Oregon Conference, 1891, p. 42.

† The Columbia River Conference as organized included "all of the State of Oregon lying east of Cascade Mountains, except Lake County; all of Washington Territory lying east of the Cascade Mountains, and all of Idaho Territory lying directly north of the State of Nevada." (G. C. Journal, 1876, p. 371.) By 1895 the number of Traveling Preachers in effective relationship had increased to 54; full members to 6,228; churches to 75; and Sunday schools to 124.—Minutes, Columbia River Conference, 1895, pp. 8 f., 41 f.

Society at Simcoe. Other than this church, the largest Society was at The Dalles, with eighty-seven members.¹²¹

Deficiency in pastoral supply was keenly felt by Presiding Elders and others. The Spokane District in 1884 had twelve charges. Circuits were long and to maintain existing appointments was all that any pastor could do and in most cases more than he could do well. As one reported:

But new towns and settlements are springing up within the bounds of every circuit. . . . They want the Gospel. The interests of Methodism demand that it be provided for them. But to serve them the pastor must discontinue as many other places and the fruit of past labor be lost.

* * * *

Out beyond this occupied field in Spokane Dist. we have five large Counties some with a population of probably 400, others with 800 or more and not a preacher nor a dollar in this part of our work. This year there should be no less than five active men in this new section of country and each man should have $200 to $250 appropriation and barely live with this amount.¹²²

The Missionary Society appropriation to Spokane District that year was $1,575. Even with such missionary aid as was given, pastoral support was on a bare subsistence level. On Spokane District twelve pastors were paid in 1886, excluding house rent, $3,630., or to each $302., a fraction less than 83 cents a day, or seventeen cents per person for a family of five for food, clothing, medical attention, and all other expenses. The Conference asked for an increase of $3,000. in the appropriation for the next year but the Missionary Society was able to grant only $1,000. additional, making the total for 1887 $5,500.¹²³

In 1884 Oregon Conference again petitioned for division and the General Conference established the Puget Sound Conference* to include "all that part of Washington Territory lying west of the Cascade Mountains and north of the Columbia River," an area of more than thirty thousand square miles. Already, by 1884, it was estimated that not less than thirteen thousand people had settled in the several fertile valleys of the area and the opening up of the country by four new lines of railroad greatly stimulated the growth of population. In six of the counties the Methodist Church had no organized work and many of the Circuits were too large and needed to be divided. The new Conference responded with vigor to the challenge of the situation and growth was rapid. In 1887 the Presiding Elder of the Seattle District stated:

Four years ago within the bounds of what is now the Seattle District, we had eight charges with a membership of 666. Now we have twenty-five charges and a membership of not less than 1500. Then we had ten churches; now we count twenty-seven During these four years we have taken in new territory till the area covered by our work is twice as large as it was at the beginning. Yet there are regions beyond that are calling loudly for help.¹²⁴

* Puget Sound Conference was organized at Seattle on Aug. 21, 1884, with two Districts—Seattle with twenty-one appointments, and Olympia with thirteen. At the first session transfers were received from the California, Oregon, Upper Iowa, Nebraska, Genesee, and Idaho Conferences, eleven in all, but with this reinforcement nine appointments remained to be supplied. (Gen'l Minutes, Fall, 1884, p. 224.) At the close of its first year the Conference reported 1,638 full members, 37 churches, and 58 Sunday schools with 2,506 pupils. Ten years later (1895) with five Districts, church membership had increased to 7,842; number of churches to 118; and Sunday schools to 147, with 10,127 pupils.—Ibid., Fall, 1885, p. 349; ibid., Fall, 1895, pp. 567 f.

The depression that reached its peak in 1893 attained serious proportions on the West Coast early in 1892. The population of many new towns was depleted. Church Societies which had incurred heavy indebtedness in erecting houses of worship found many subscriptions worthless and pastors' salaries remained in whole or in part unpaid. Despite these difficulties the Church was able to hold its own and in some places continued to make substantial gains.¹²⁵

CALIFORNIA MISSION

While en route to the Oregon Mission William Roberts landed at San Francisco on Saturday, April 24, 1847, 148 days out of New York. On Sunday morning a religious service was held on board the Whiton and later Roberts preached in an adobe hotel facing the plaza, the first Methodist sermon in San Francisco. Before resuming his voyage Roberts organized a Methodist Class and a Sunday school, and with James H. Wilbur gained as much information as possible concerning California—its climate, population, and the prospects offered for missionary work.¹²⁶ In a letter to the Missionary Advocate Roberts reported:

It is computed that there are three thousand emigrants in this country from the United States; fifteen hundred of whom came in during the last season. It now remains to be seen what the piety of the church will say as to sending the gospel to those thousands of human beings for whom Christ has shed his precious blood.¹²⁷

On September 29, on request of Bishop L. L. Hamline, a special meeting of the Board of Managers of the Missionary Society considered the establishment of a California mission. A resolution was adopted favoring occupation of "that field of Labor as soon as practicable."¹²⁸

In February, 1848, gold was discovered in the valley of the Sacramento River. For three months little excitement was manifested, then a wild rush began. Settlements in other parts of the territory were deserted; stores, farms, and homes abandoned; sailors left their ships; soldiers deserted their garrisons; farmers, merchants, lawyers, doctors, judges, and criminals crowded the mining camps. Within a few months emigrants began to arrive from Oregon, Hawaii, Mexico, and South America; later from the eastern states, Europe, the South Seas, Australia, and China. During 1850-53 not less than eighty thousand men arrived in California. There was no home life, since in the mining counties only about 2 per cent of the population were women. Without the restraints of civilized life gambling, robbery, and murder threatened to become almost universal.¹²⁹

Meeting on June 13, 1848, the Board of Managers appropriated $2,000. for the California Mission and at the same time decided to send two missionaries to the field "as soon as practicable." In October the Corresponding Secretary reported that Bishop Waugh had appointed Isaac Owen* of the Indiana Conference as missionary, and at a later meeting announced the appointment of William Taylor of the Baltimore Conference.¹³⁰

The Class formed by William Roberts in April, 1847, was disrupted by the excitement of gold discovery but toward the end of 1848 a new Class was organized. Chauncey O. Hosford, a Local Preacher, instituted preaching at Hangtown (Placerville) in the summer of 1848, and at San Francisco preached regularly during the winter "in a boarding-house kept by a Mr. West," where he is supposed to have organized a Class.¹³¹ Roberts became very impatient at the slowness of the Church authorities in meeting the need for California missionaries. "Does a missionary Church," he asked, once defined to be 'Christianity in earnest,' need more than eighteen months to select from her crowded ranks three or four men, and send them across the continent to accomplish a work which relates not to the gain of gold, or extension of territory, but to the salvation of precious souls from the deep damnation of hell!¹³²

In the early summer of 1849 Roberts, as Superintendent of the Oregon and California Mission, visited California. At San Francisco the Rev. T. Dwight Hunt, recently arrived from Hawaii, was busily engaged in gathering "the odds and ends of all the Churches into a society." Since his labors were acceptable to all and there was no Methodist pastor at hand Roberts did nothing toward forming a separate Methodist Society. Asa White,† a Local Preacher, had reached San Francisco May 10, 1849, with a blue tent which he pitched on the ground later chosen as a site for the Powell Street Church, and engaged in evangelistic preaching.¹³³

Leaving San Francisco on June 26 Roberts went on to Sacramento, Stockton, San Jose, and other principal places, and also visited the mines, preaching wherever opportunity offered. At several points he secured lots on which to erect churches. Before leaving Oregon he had assembled lumber for a church building, and had it framed and shipped. It arrived before he left California.‡

* Isaac Owen (1809-66) attended his first religious service at fifteen—a Camp Meeting at which he heard God's call, united at once with the Church and was licensed as an Exhorter. He was received on trial in the Indiana Conference in 1835 and appointed to Otter Creek Mission (Gen'l Minutes, 1835, p. 298). For four years he was financial agent of Indiana Asbury University, leaving the position to accept appointment to the California Mission. He had a major part in the plans for the founding of a Methodist university on the Pacific coast. Ceaseless in missionary labors, he felt that he could not spare time from the work to attend the General Conference of 1856 to which he had been elected a delegate. He did, however, serve as a member of the 1864 Conference. "He was a plain, earnest, indefatigable minister, devoted to all the interests of Methodism" and no man did more than he to establish the Methodist Church on the Pacific coast.—Matthew Simpson, Ed., Cyclopaedia of Methodism, pp. 687 f.; C. V. Anthony, op. cit., pp. 28-31.

† Asa White brought with him his family, consisting of his wife, two sons, eight daughters, six sons-in-law, and thirty grandchildren. The blue tent became a legend in California Methodist history. After San Francisco it was set up in front of the plaza in Uniontown (later Arcata), Humboldt County, where it housed the pioneer religious group in the north coast counties, and finally "stood in Napa County near the present St. Helena."—Leon L. Loofbourov, In Search of God's Gold . . ., pp. 35 f

‡ On his return to Oregon, Roberts called together "the preachers in the employ of the mission . . .

On July 29 he wrote :

We need six men at least to do the work here, and, I think, in almost every case the people will support them. . . . There is a great work to be done. The agencies of hell are at work; let us haste, with the institutions of piety, to hold them in check¹³⁴

Representatives of several other denominations including the Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian, and Protestant Episcopal Churches were by this time on the ground, busily engaged in forming church organizations and making preparations for building.¹³⁵

Traveling by sea William Taylor arrived at San Francisco on September 21, 1849, and Isaac Owen, "after a long and tedious journey of about eight months, by the overland route," reached Sacramento on October 21. Taylor soon completed the organization of the Powell Street Church in San Francisco. Its first Quarterly Conference, held on November 30, passed a resolution which relieved the Missionary Society of responsibility for the pastor's support. The congregation was housed in the chapel shipped from Oregon and on January 1, 1850, sixty-nine members were reported. In December, 1849, having selected a station on the Plaza, near a saloon, Taylor began regular street preaching.¹³⁶

The way had been prepared in advance for the beginning of Owen's ministry in Sacramento. William Grove Deal, M.D., a Methodist layman, active in all good works, had gathered together a considerable group of fellow Methodists to whom he preached regularly. When Roberts visited the city on July 15, 1849, he organized them into a Society. Shortly after Owen's arrival a chapel which Taylor had brought from Baltimore was shipped to Sacramento, erected, and dedicated. In November, 1851, Owen was appointed Presiding Elder.¹³⁷

Increasingly impressed by developments in California the Board of Managers sought to increase the missionary force, on January 5, 1850, recommending "to the Bishop having Charge of Foreign Missions" the appointment of two additional missionaries; on September 11, 1850, "three additional missionaries"; and on September 17, 1851, as many more missionaries for California and Oregon, not to exceed ten, "as he [the Bishop] may deem necessary." Bishop Morris, who at this time was in charge of foreign missions, had difficulty in finding candidates with the required qualifications. In June, 1850, the Christian Advocate stated that several had offered themselves but some were too young, others too old, and still others willing to go for a limited period only, leaving their families behind. Men of mature minds were wanted, in good health, from twenty-three to thirty-five years of age, married, and accom-on the 5th of September, 1849," and organized the Oregon and California Mission Conference. No member of the California Mission was present. Isaac Owen was appointed to Sacramento City, Stockton, and Columa Mill; William Taylor to San Francisco; and Chauncey O. Hosford to Yamhill, Ore. —William Roberts, report, Thirty-first Ann. Rep., M. S. (1849-50), pp. 16, 19.

panied by their families. To this call scores of ministers responded and on July 25 announcement was made that six had been transferred to the Oregon and California Mission.¹³⁸ Additional transfers were made later, in all not less than twenty-four within the three years 1850-52, a noteworthy company—among them men who for many years were to have a fruitful ministry and exercise a creative influence not only on the development of Methodism but also on the shaping of the commonwealth of California.* Even with this large reinforcement Taylor and Owen were not satisfied and felt that the Missionary Society was not sufficiently considerate of California's interests. On February 18, 1852, John P. Durbin wrote to S. D. Simonds and Owen expressing sorrow that they "pertinaciously" adhered to this attitude.

It is without any good cause. On the contrary the opinion here is, that we give to the Pacific too much in money & men; and I can attest, that concern for you has well nigh broken down Bishop Janes and has much wearied me: we are still endeavoring to supply you with men, and are robbing the work at home to do this.¹³⁹

On June 8, 1852, the Bishop wrote informing Owen that "the Conferences on the Pacific Coast are no longer Mission Conferences, but regular Conferences." Thus within five years of founding, this mission developed into the California Annual Conference. The first session was convened † at San Francisco on February 3, 1853. Reports were received from thirty-one charges with 1,274 members in full connection. The charges were divided into three Districts, Isaac Owen to continue as Presiding Elder of the San Francisco District, J. D. Blain to take the Sacramento District, and John Daniel the Marysville District.¹⁴⁰

One of the first missions to be established following the organization of the Conference was at Los Angeles. The missionary, Adam Bland, arrived on February 16 and the following day rented "a one story-house with two rooms," one for himself and his wife, and the other for a place of worship and school-room. He found in the city one Baptist, one Episcopalian, and one Presbyterian, but "not one Methodist." By April 8 his congregation had increased "to about fifty persons," the Sunday school had enrolled "over twenty-five scholars," and Mrs. Bland's school—opened February 29—had more than tripled in size. With "a good deal of opposition" he succeeded in raising $1,000. on subscription for a church building.¹⁴¹

Immigrants continued to pour into California. Henry C. Benson wrote in

* Especially outstanding were such men as Edward Bannister, pastor, Presiding Elder, and college president; Martin C. Briggs, editor, moral crusader, political leader, and university president; Henry C. Benson, in earlier days missionary to the Choctaw Indians, graduate in medicine, Presiding Elder, and editor; and Charles Maclay, pastor, member of the California Legislature, and advocate of theological education.

† Pastors were appointed to thirty-two charges, leaving seven to be supplied. Sunday schools numbered twenty-eight with 662 pupils. Twenty-six of the charges had churches, and ten also had parsonages. Five years later (1858) full members had increased to 2,739; the number of charges to eighty; and Sunday schools to seventy-three. Missionary appropriations to the Conference this year were as follows: to the American work, $8,075.; German missions, $2,548.; Southern California and Arizona, $950.; total, $11,573.—Gen'l Minutes, 1853, pp. 155 f.; Minutes, California Conference, 1858, pp. 12, 14, 29 f.; C. V. Anthony, op. cit., pp. 115, 199.

1852 that thousands were coming every week, that a multitude were crossing the plains and that on one day of the preceding week "no less than seventeen ships arrived in San Francisco, with over 2,000 immigrants." The demand was unceasing for recruits to the preaching ranks. Almost half the appointments of the Marysville District were without preachers in 1854 and many more were wanted in other Districts.¹⁴²

On his return from a temporary stay in the Sandwich Islands in 1855 the Rev. W. S. Turner reported that a Methodist Class of English and Americans had been formed there, the members of which pleaded that a preacher be sent to them, promising to support him. At the 1855 California Conference Honolulu was made a regular appointment and Turner was assigned to the charge.¹⁴³

Following the close of the Civil War the Church expanded rapidly, the membership increasing from 3,879 in 1865 to 8,029 in 1875, the number of charges from ninety-nine to 154, and members of Conference approximately doubled.* The Missionary Society continued mission appropriations throughout the period, in 1870 contributing $4,000. to twenty missions, in 1880 $3,000. to twenty-three missions, and in 1895 $7,112. to sixty-seven missions. In 1872 the General Conference authorized division and in 1876 the Southern California Conference was organized with two Districts,† the Los Angeles with A. M. Hough as Presiding Elder, and the Santa Barbara, with P. Y. Cool in charge. The missionary appropriation to the Southern California Conference in 1876 was $2,500., distributed to sixteen missions. In 1895 mission appropriations were made to sixty-four missions totaling $5,778.¹⁴⁴

NEW MEXICO MISSION

The 1848 General Conference in authorizing the creation of an Annual Conference in the Oregon country, apparently wholly unmindful of the geographical sweep of the action, included within its boundaries—as elsewhere stated—Oregon, California, and New Mexico. At the second session of the Oregon and California Conference, in September, 1850, a New Mexico District was authorized, concerning which the Minutes record, "E. G. Nicholson has charge of the work in this district, and resides at Santa Fe."¹⁴⁵

John P. Durbin, in a letter to Enoch G. Nicholson, a member of the Pittsburgh Conference, dated July 22, 1850, said:

Your mission is at present to the population in Santa Fe & its vicinity, which speaks the English Language. The progress of the Mission must determine whether its attention will be turned at all to the Spanish population.¹⁴⁶

* In 1895 the California Conference had 171 Circuits and Stations with 16,316 members, exclusive of the Chinese and Japanese Districts.—Gen'l Minutes, 1895, pp. 484 ff.

† When organized the Southern California Conference had twenty-seven Stations and Circuits, 1,257 full members, thirteen churches, and twenty-two Local Preachers. (Ibid., 1876, pp. 110 f., 276.) In 1895 its three Districts with 113 charges reported 13,299 members in full connection, 117 churches, and 85 Local Preachers.—Ibid., Fall, 1895, pp. 531 f.

By November, 1850, Nicholson had established his household in Santa Fe, had organized a small Methodist Society, and had fitted up a chapel for public worship. Shortly afterward the removal of the nearby army post "curtailed the business of the city, and . . . reduced the American population." This, together with the failing health of the missionary's wife, caused Nicholson to return to the East and the mission was temporarily suspended.¹⁴⁷ On June 3, 1853, the Board was influenced by two new factors to reopen the mission. A young man, Walter Hansen, a native of Mexico thoroughly conversant with the Spanish language, was found in New York. Also, an ex-priest of the Roman Catholic Church, Benigno Cardenas, a convert to Protestantism, was brought into contact with the Missionary Society. Both were willing to do evangelistic work in New Mexico. Thereupon the Board reinstated Nicholson as Superintendent. Accompanied by Hansen and Cardenas, Nicholson departed for New Mexico early in the autumn. Cardenas was employed as a colporteur and encouraged also to engage in evangelistic activities. He soon formed congregations in Peralta and Socorro and made converts in Polvadero, Manzano, Torrior, Algodones, and other places. After a few months Hansen's connection with the mission was terminated at his own suggestion. Nicholson explored the possibilities of extension of the mission among both the Spanish population and the English-speaking people and returned to New York to report to the Board. In June, 1854, his connection with the work in New Mexico ceased "at his own request on account of the state of his health." During the year divergent reports concerning Cardenas reached the Board, whereupon Dallas D. Lore was designated as Superintendent and sent out to examine into his work. He arrived in Santa Fe on July 24, 1855. His letters to the Secretary were not encouraging, and in some respects disquieting. He was able, however, to organize a Class of nine persons at Socorro and one of fourteen members at Peralta, and a Circuit of four appointments, and returned to the East. On the basis of his reports the Board decided that "there was not sufficient ground for the continuance of the mission," and in November, 1855, the General Missionary Committee appropriated $1,250. for its closing during the next year.¹⁴⁸

A resolution passed by the 1864 General Conference called attention to the fact that there was "not one Protestant minister" engaged in preaching the Gospel among the 90,000 Mexicans and Americans in New Mexico and requested the Committee on Missions to consider "the necessity and propriety of establishing a Mission and Mission School" in both New Mexico and Arizona but no immediate action resulted. In 1865 John L. Dyer, then a Presiding Elder in Colorado, proposed to extend the boundaries of his District to include the territory and appealed to Bishop Kingsley to secure a suitable man for work among the Mexicans, but the Bishops were unable to find anyone able to preach in Spanish whom they considered competent and trustworthy.

Whereupon Dyer took it upon himself to make his headquarters in Elizabethtown, New Mexico, and in the course of a year to preach at Cimarron, Taos, Mora, Tipton, Walters, Cherry Valley, Santa Fe, Las Vegas, and elsewhere. At the Colorado Conference of 1868, much to his surprise, Dyer heard his name "read out for New Mexico [Rio Grande] District." Three appointments were listed, all "to be supplied." During 1869-70 he traveled "almost all over New Mexico," making his home in Santa Fe, and preaching in Albuquerque, Socorro, and Fort Craig. In 1869 he importuned Thomas Harwood, whom he had known in the West Wisconsin Conference, to comply with Bishop Ames' request that he come to New Mexico and was immensely gratified when he responded favorably. "He took my place," wrote Dyer in his autobiography, "and I have reason to thank God that the result has been so good."¹⁴⁹

In 1872 the New Mexico Mission was created and from 1872 to 1884 Thomas Harwood was its Superintendent. At the end of three years in the superintendency he wrote:

Our progress is slow, for we are not laboring among a people where 'a nation is born in a day.' But when we call to mind that during the year our membership has increased nearly fifty per cent; and our Church property about the same—that our Sunday-school scholars and Church members, during the past four years, have more than twice quadrupled—that our ministerial strength has come up from one to eleven, including six native helpers, (all our preachers save one preach in Spanish.)—when we thus contrast our present status with our past we rejoice and take courage¹⁵⁰

In 1884 the General Conference divided the New Mexico work into two separate missions: the New Mexico English and the New Mexico Spanish. S. W. Thornton of the Colorado Conference was appointed Superintendent of the English language mission. After four years of faithful service he resigned on account of illness in his family and was succeeded by T. L. Wiltsee of the Central Ohio Conference. He reported at the close of his first year (1889) having "preached 170 times . . . and traveled about 20,000 miles." In 1890 he was released that he might take charge of the newly formed Navajo Mission and Thomas Harwood was reinstated as Superintendent until the Bishop could find "some one to superintend the work." At the 1891 annual meeting of the mission Charles L. Bovard of the California Conference was appointed.¹⁵¹ During his first year he made a careful survey of the territory, by personal inquiry and visitation, seeking to discover unoccupied communities. He found a number of places large enough for several Protestant churches where Methodism was already represented by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He questioned the policy of attempting to organize a second Methodist Society in these communities. In such populous centers as Albuquerque, Eddy, and El Paso [Texas] he proposed an aggressive program. He was sensitive to the feeling of the General Missionary Committee relative to the "seemingly slow advances toward self-support," and sought to clarify the situation.

Owing to the long distances here, between population centers, it is impossible to arrange large circuits. Unlike the . . . missionaries who . . . labor in the agricultural Northwest, when one of our men leaves a town he must be prepared to feed his own horse, [and] furnish his own bed and board until he gets back. No friendly larch strings are hanging out along his journey at convenient distances. Many of our trips—like the eighty-five-mile trip from Eddy to Roswell, and the fifty-five-mile trip from Springer to Catskill—do not even afford enough vegetation to build a decent camp fire. So it happens, just the reverse of pioneering in most sections, the circuits are the most expensive kinds of evangelizing.

The Superintendent acknowledged that only twelve or thirteen charges* in "an area of about one hundred and twenty-three thousand square miles" would appear to "indicate a lack of push and conquest" but he reminded the Missionary Society that the American population of between "fifty and sixty thousand" was divided into lines of settlements which followed "tortuous railway lines and valleys, separated by mountain chains . . . from ten to thirteen thousand feet" in height, which made the method of "forming circuits pursued elsewhere . . . impracticable," and agreed with Bishop Walden in counseling "the concentration of effort and money in the populous centers." The missionary policy, he felt, should be one of centralization, using a high grade of ministerial supply which would appeal to the type of "social and intellectual life represented in . . . [the] cities and towns."¹⁵²

NEW MEXICO SPANISH MISSION

The earliest attempt to establish a Methodist mission among the Spanish-speaking population in the Southwest was made, as we have seen, in the early fifties and terminated in 1856. Twelve years later the Bishops recommended "the establishment of a mission for the benefit of the Spanish-speaking population in . . . [the] south-western territories and in Mexico." The General Missionary Committee made an appropriation for the purpose and a missionary was selected but because of declining receipts the Board of Managers indefinitely postponed the undertaking.¹⁵³

From the time of his arrival in New Mexico in 1869 Thomas Harwood undertook to preach in Spanish as well as in English. In 1871 he reorganized the Society at Peralta which had been first organized by D. D. Lore in 1855. As Superintendent of the New Mexico Mission created by the 1872 General Conference Harwood organized Societies among both Americans and Mexicans. Progress in the Spanish work at first was slow but by 1884 he had succeeded so well that a separate Spanish mission was organized. At its first session the mission had twenty-three charges with 408 full members, ten churches, and fifteen Sunday schools.¹⁵⁴

* The New Mexico English Mission in 1895 reported 721 full members, 2 Local Preachers, 14 churches, and 17 Sunday schools with 1,206 pupils.—Gen'l Minutes, Fall, 1895, p. 598.

Harwood early decided that nothing would contribute more to missionary progress than mission schools. In 1886 six elementary schools had been established, with 225 pupils, and two academies, the "Kit Carson Seminary" at Taos and the "Socorro Academy" at Socorro, each with a Biblical department.¹⁵⁵ He illustrated the necessity of the schools for the education of the native preachers:

A mistake once made by one of our native preachers, which cost the superintendent of the mission some $20, . . . [concerned the problem of how many adobe blocks] can be made for $50 at $7 per thousand. And still another gave up in despair the solution of the problem, What will be the cost of five oranges at five cents each? . . . This last question was not important, as we can get along with our work without oranges, but we have to make adobes, or sun-dried brick, to build our churches, and it is important the preacher should be able to make his own calculations. The American reader will wonder at such ignorance, but marvel not at this when twenty, or even ten, years ago sixty per cent. of all our people, ten years of age and over, could not read, and eighty per cent. of the women were unable to read.¹⁵⁶

The geographical extent of the mission was extended until in 1891 the Superintendent reported that it embraced "all of New Mexico, Southern Colorado, West Texas, and the State of Chihuahua, in Mexico." By far the larger part of the work, however, was in New Mexico. The principal towns occupied in Chihuahua were Dona Ana, Las Cruces, Silver City, Hillsborough, and El Paso. Realizing a necessity for reading and study materials in Spanish, beginning in 1879 Harwood published a paper—El Abogado Cristiano—Sunday-school lessons, and many thousands of pages of tracts in the Spanish language.

In 1892, by authority of the General Conference, the mission was made a Spanish Mission Conference, the first to be organized in the United States. In that year two Districts were established, increased in 1893 to three, the Albuquerque, the Las Vegas, and the Santa Fe, with Harwood as Presiding Elder of the Albuquerque District and Superintendent of the Mission Conference as a whole. Schools continued to be maintained but only when there were "no public schools, or in places where the teachers of the public schools . . . [were inferior and unable to teach the] more advanced Protestant children."¹⁵⁷ In 1889 the Territorial Legislature passed a law "making the [public] schools nonsectarian," after which they improved very rapidly.

By 1895 the twenty-three charges of 1884 had increased to thirty-two, with almost a threefold growth in membership.* Even more notable was the increase in number of Spanish-speaking pastors from twelve to twenty-six, concerning whom Harwood said, "all . . . have been dug up out of this New Mexico soil, and the most of them out of the hard soil of Romanism."¹⁵⁸

ARIZONA MISSION

In February, 1859, Horace S. Bishop of the Newark Conference and David Tuthill of the New York East Conference were transferred to the California Conference and sent as missionaries to Arizona,* referred to by the Missionary Advocate as "a mining district in the Southern part of New Mexico." Under date of April 6 Bishop reported having preached "in three or four different towns to attentive, intelligent congregations, about one-third composed of Mexicans, some of whom can understand a little English, and others perfectly ignorant of what I was saying." On April 13, Tuthill wrote that he had selected Tubac as his headquarters as "a central point, nearer the mines than any other," and therefore a convenient location. To reach all the people within a distance of 150 miles he thought it would be necessary to preach in at least six different places. At the Conference session of September, 1859, Tuthill and Bishop were given appointments within the California Conference and in 1860 Bishop was recorded as having "withdrawn from the connection." Evidently there were those in the 1860 General Conference who felt that California was not overly concerned for Arizona's interests since it authorized the Bishops, if they should consider it advisable, to constitute the Arizona and New Mexico missions "a Mission Annual Conference at any time" during the quadrennium, and further—until such a Conference should be organized—the Arizona mission should be "treated as a foreign mission," and that the Board's appropriation should go directly to the mission, and not to the California Conference.¹⁵⁹

The 1864 General Conference, with a resolution before it which directed attention to the lack of Protestant ministry in Arizona and New Mexico, requested its Committee on Missions to report on "the necessity and propriety of establishing a Mission and Mission School" in each territory. The committee, however, did not act and several years passed before any further official action was taken. In 1869 Charles P. Cooke, a Local Preacher and city missionary in Chicago, of his own accord went to the Pima Reservation, was employed as a government teacher, and at the same time labored diligently as a missionary.¹⁶⁰ Finally, in 1872, G. A. Reeder of the North Ohio Conference was appointed by Bishop Simpson Superintendent of a reconstituted Arizona Mission. Shortly after his arrival in the territory he wrote to the Missionary Society:

I may state that there is not a Church finished in Arizona by any Protestant denomination, and only one commenced, as far as I have yet been able to learn. . . . I have not yet met with one living member of the Methodist Episcopal Church.¹⁶¹

* The Arizona territory, the greater part of which was earlier a part of New Mexico, was not organized as a territory of the United States until February, 1863.

The "utter disregard of the majority to all the claims of religion, and their non-attendance upon the means of grace when they have the opportunity," tempted Reeder to discouragement. At Yuma, town of twelve hundred inhabitants, he preached three evenings in the schoolhouse to a maximum of about twenty hearers. On Sunday morning, following a Saturday night dance, his congregation consisted of eight persons. He then resolved to make "a new departure."

I next took my position on the chief corner of the town, having the wholesale liquor establishment for my 'backing,' all the leading saloons near by, and a score of liquor dealers and drinkers within hearing. Here I preached seven times More than one came saying, 'I have not heard a sermon before for twenty years.' The street seemed to be the place.¹⁶²

In 1874 Reeder resigned and returned to his Conference, leaving "the names of forty-six members and probationers."

having held five protracted meetings and one camp-meeting; having preached four hundred and twenty-two sermons and traveled fourteen thousand miles, and spent the nights of two years traveling, or laying in my blankets, on boards, or the bosom of the earth.¹⁶³

With Reeder's departure from the field only one missionary remained, D. B. Wright, a supernumerary member of the Troy Conference, stationed at Prescott and, beginning in 1877, J. M. Winnega, at Florence. The Missionary Society reported that it was without report or statistics of the mission for 1876-77 and that little was done during the years 1876-78 but "to hold the ground."¹⁶⁴

G. H. Adams of the Colorado Conference was appointed Superintendent of the mission and pastor at Prescott in 1879. He arrived at his appointment on September 5. Soon afterward the Missionary Society reported that the Sunday school, previously a union school, had been organized "as a school of the Methodist Episcopal Church," the church building improved, and the erection of a parsonage begun. Two years later Adams was able to announce that the mission had made more advancement in the way of accumulating church property during the . . . year than in all the former years of her history combined. Two years ago we had but one church—namely, at Prescott. Last year we erected two . . . at Globe City and at Tombstone. . . . Since last March we have built three, . . . at Phoenix, Pinal, and Tucson. . . . We now own in Arizona about $35,000 worth of church property All the leading towns are now supplied by Methodist houses of worship.¹⁶⁵

Numerous difficulties were encountered, not least of which were depredations from hostile Indians, including the killing of at least a thousand defenseless people, which retarded immigration and business progress. Cost of living was very high, averaging more than twice that of living in the East. Finally, constant change in missionary personnel crippled the mission. In 1883 Adams reported that of all missionaries appointed at the annual meeting of 1881 not one remained except the Superintendent.¹⁶⁶ Deficiency in missionary supply was a continuing difficulty year after year.

In the summer of 1890 serious illness compelled Adams to resign the superintendency. He was succeeded by George F. Bovard of the Southern California Conference. In his first annual report he announced the organization of a Class of twelve members, followed by the erection of a church at Williams. Two years later (1893) he reported a net increase for the year of 175 in Church members,* eight new Sunday schools organized, and noteworthy increases in benevolences, in pastoral support, and in value of church property.¹⁶⁷

UTAH MISSION

The settlement of Utah began with the entrance of Brigham Young and his band of Mormon disciples into the Great Salt Lake Valley in July, 1847. Before the end of 1848 the Mormon settlement had increased to some five thousand people. The population in 1850 was 11,380; in 1860, 40,273; in 1870, 86,786. By 1890 the total was more than two hundred thousand. The bulk of the population during the early period was made up of native-born Americans, supplemented by a growing stream of European immigrants, the fruit of Mormon missionary efforts. There were also a few Indians, and a still smaller number of Chinese who came over the mountains from California. The completion of the Central Pacific Railroad in May, 1869, which made possible transcontinental travel by rail, was immediately followed by increasing emigration of "Gentiles" into the Utah Territory.

The Board of Managers in 1855 referred to its Committee on Domestic Missions the question of establishing "a mission among the Mormons in Utah." After consideration the committee stated that it regarded the establishment of a mission in the territory of Utah desirable and of binding force upon the Church, provided the Bishop upon whom devolves its institution and appointments, can command the services of not more than three men, nor less than two, of such piety, zeal and energy as shall give good promise of success.

Resolved, That the sum of Two Thousand Dollars be placed at the disposal of the Bishop for Commencing Said Mission.¹⁶⁸

Evidently the Bishop was unable to find men of the required qualifications as there is no record of the founding of a Utah mission during the years immediately following. Also in 1855 the California Conference listed two charges in Utah—Salt Lake City and Carson Valley—but left them to be supplied. California's action may have provided the stimulus which led the 1856 General Conference to include Utah within the bounds of that Conference. Despite the General Conference action no appointment in Utah appeared in the 1856 California Conference Minutes.¹⁶⁹

* The Arizona Mission reported in 1895 eighteen Circuits and Stations with 571 full members, 13 churches, and 21 Sunday schools with 1,204 pupils.—Ibid., Fall, 1895, pp. 400, 597.

All efforts to get missionary work under way in the territory were ineffectual* until 1869 when Lewis Hartsough, a supernumerary member of the Central New York Conference who was serving as Presiding Elder of the Wyoming District of the Colorado Conference, made a Utah tour, preaching in Wasatch, Corinne, Ogden, and Salt Lake City. At the November meeting of the Board Utah was placed under supervision of Bishop Ames, and Hartsough was made Superintendent of the Utah Mission. In December he returned to Salt Lake City and during the winter "opened up" such places as he could reach. He was encouraged in his effort to gain a foothold for Methodism by Judge Hawley of Salt Lake City, the Rev. N. Reasoner (agent of the American Bible Society), C. C. Nichols, a Local Preacher "who was railroad agent at Uintah," and a number of others. In the summer of 1870 Hartsough felt obliged "to return to the East," and Gustavus M. Pierce, whom he had enlisted for missionary service in Utah, succeeded him as Superintendent of the mission.¹⁷⁰

On May 8, 1870, Pierce arrived in Salt Lake City. In his first annual report he listed a Class formed at Salt Lake City on May 20; Sunday schools organized in that city on June 12, with 140 members, at Corinne, September 25, with sixty members, and at Ogden, October 2, with sixty members. Three ministerial appointments had been made: W. C. Damon, pastor at Corinne and principal of Corinne Seminary; A. M. Donnelly, pastor at Ogden; and C. C. Nichols, pastor at Salt Lake City. Salt Lake City Seminary was opened on September 12 with the Rev. Erastus Smith as principal, three teachers, and ninety pupils. In another year, Pierce said, "I believe . . . the whole of Utah, from Bear Lake Valley, one hundred and fifty miles north, to St. George, three hundred and fifty miles south, will be open to missionary labor. There are at least forty villages of respectable size in the Territory."¹⁷¹

The Superintendent's report for 1871 was somewhat less optimistic in tone. Three ministers had been added to the missionary force and fourteen more were asked for the year ahead. Classes had been organized at Corinne, Ogden,

* The General Missionary Committee in 1858 endeavored to give impetus to the inauguration of a Utah mission by making a contingent appropriation of $1,500. for Salt Lake City. In 1859 it made a further attempt by appropriating $2,000. "contingent for Arizona and Carson Valley in Utah." Both actions were without result. The war years were without significant development although in 1864 Utah was made an appendage to the bounds of the Nevada Conference. (G. C. Journal, 1864, p. 220.) In 1867, at the Nevada Conference, Bishop Thomson attached Salt Lake City to the Austin District and asked S. L. Trefren, whom he had appointed Presiding Elder, to visit the city and report on the advisability of establishing a mission there. Trefren advised against the attempt. The General Missionary Committee, however, for 1867 appropriated $6,000. for Idaho and Utah, and in 1869 made an appropriation of $2,000. exclusively for Utah. The increased population of non-Mormon settlers finally brought an end to the long delay.

Evanston, and Tooele, with an aggregate membership of 120. But the mission was stated to be "peculiar and difficult." Yet, the report concluded, "with faith in God, we move on, and expect the victory."¹⁷²

A decade passed with little or no progress made.* Beginning with 1882 the tide changed. In October Thomas C. Iliff entered upon the superintendency of the mission together with the pastorate of the First Church, Salt Lake City. In response to the appeal of Bishop Wiley and the Missionary Secretaries the General Missionary Committee adopted the policy of a largely increased appropriation—from $7,500. to $12,500.—making possible a corresponding increase in personnel.† By 1885 fourteen day schools were in operation in Salt Lake City, Ogden, Grantville, Provo, and ten other towns. In his report for this year the Mission Superintendent said:

This school work will be a necessity till the Territory or general government makes such provision as ought to have been made years ago. When we have a proper public-school system in Utah the Church will be mostly relieved from this primary work of education. But even then there will be a demand for higher education which the Church must supply.¹⁷³

The most ambitious of the schools was the Salt Lake Seminary located in the central part of the city. It included five departments, with special instruction in music and art. Associated with the school was the Methodist Home, built by the Woman's Home Missionary Society, with rooms for boarding twenty-five pupils.¹⁷⁴

In the later eighties evidence began to appear of increasing "restlessness and dissatisfaction among the Mormon people" and more readiness to receive the Gospel message. Congregations increased in size and "the people, generally, [were] more ready to talk" with missionaries and teachers about religion. Growth between 1884 and 1890 was notable. Missionaries increased from ten to twenty-eight; teachers from sixteen to thirty-seven; number of churches from eight to thirty-five; Sunday schools from eight to thirty-six; day schools

* In 1872 General Conference authorized the organization of the Rocky Mountain Conference, the second Conference of this name, to include Utah, Montana, and Idaho Territories "and that portion of Wyoming Territory not included in the Colorado Conference" (G. C. Journal, 1872, pp. 303, 425). The Conference met in its first session at Salt Lake City on Aug. 8, 1872. Three Districts were formed: Salt Lake District, with eight appointments; Corinne District, with seven appointments; and Helena District, also with seven appointments (Minutes, Rocky Mountain Conference, 1872, p. 8). The 1876 General Conference empowered the Rocky Mountain Conference to divide into two Conferences if it should so decide (G. C. Journal, 1876, p. 380). The ensuing Conference (July 27-30, 1876) voted to divide into the Utah Conference, to include the Territory of Utah and parts of Wyoming and Idaho, and the Montana Conference—also to include parts of Wyoming and Idaho (Minutes, Rocky Mountain Conference, 1876, p. [13]). Utah continued as an Annual Conference until 1880 when by its own request its status was changed to that of a mission, to include all the territory of the former Conference "except the portion extending into the Territory of Wyoming" (G. C. Journal, 1880, p. 369). In 1892 the mission was further delimited when the English-speaking charges in Idaho became a part of the Idaho Conference and the Western Norwegian-Danish Mission Conference absorbed "eight preachers, fourteen churches and Sunday schools."—Seventy-fourth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1892), p. 323.

† T. C. Iliff: "The Missionary Society, the Board of Church Extension, the Woman's Home Missionary Society and hundreds of individual friends made it possible for us to support thirty preachers, thirty to forty Mission teachers and to build twenty-five churches. The Missionary Society appropriation for general and school work, English and Scandinavian, from 1888 to 1890 reached $24,000 annually. The Board of Church Extension from $5,000 to $10,000; The Woman's Home Missionary Society, $6,000 to $10,000; a grand total annually of from $35,000 to $45,000."—In Minutes of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Utah Mission . . ., 1895, p. 16.

from seven to twenty-eight; members and probationers from 210 to 1,310.¹⁷⁵

At the 1891 annual meeting announcement was made that the officials of the Mormon Church had "officially declared against the practice of polygamy," but belief was expressed that discontinuance of the practice was "for political advantage only" and that the rightness of polygamy as a principle continued to be widely held.¹⁷⁶ By 1892 the public school system had been developed to a point where it became possible to close a number of Church primary schools, but others were opened where need still existed. The mission intended to maintain at least one school of high grade and in 1893 recommendation was made that Salt Lake Seminary be developed, under the management of a board appointed by the mission. However, the financial crisis of that year made the realization of the plan impossible and in January, 1894, the seminary was closed.¹⁷⁷

Various factors contributed to the slow growth in Utah. A principal cause was the predominance of the Mormon Church and the actively hostile attitude of its leaders toward all evangelical denominations.* From the beginning of Methodist missionary work worship services and day schools were maintained against bitter antagonism.† Mormonism was compactly and thoroughly organized and possessed the power and adroitness to resist successfully all missionary efforts. Utah, declared Bishop Fowler, "is the hardest mission ground into which the Methodist plow has ever been thrust."¹⁷⁸

In the opinion of J. D. Gillilan, who for years served as secretary of the mission and for a time was Presiding Elder, another factor was the unadaptability of the Circuit system to a mountain region when during the long winter season deep snows in the high mountain valleys made maintenance of Circuit schedules impossible. ". . . wherever success of any consequence has been attained," he said, "it has been where we have the resident pastor," making possible frequent visitation and regular weekly Class meetings.¹⁷⁹ Perhaps the most important factor of all was the continually changing personnel. Some of the missionaries remained at their posts for only a few months, others

* The Congregational Church was the first evangelical denomination to establish a church in Utah. Its work was begun in 1864. In the twenty-three years 1872-95 "the Congregationalists . . . expended in Church and school work $500,000, and this year (1895) $19,000. They have seven churches . . ." "In 1869, Dr. Sheldon Jackson opened the Presbyterian work at Corinne . . . The Presbyterian [Church] leads all others in the expenditure of money; . . . $881,000 . . . from first to last. . . . They have 29 churches . . ." "We are told that . . . [the Protestant Episcopal Church, under the leadership of Bishop Daniel S. Tuttle] has spent between $250,000 and $300,000 on school and Church work in Utah." The Baptist, Lutheran, and Disciples of Christ Churches "came later, having expended to date a total of $200,000 and making a creditable showing in church buildings, membership, [and] Sunday school[s]. . . ."—Ibid., pp. 14 f.

† In the presence of G. M. Pierce in 1870, in a tabernacle sermon, Brigham Young declared: "If any of these so called officers try to arrest me and bring me before the d---d cussed hounds of the law the government has sent out here to lord it over us, I'll send them to hell cross lots, so help me God." (Gospel in All Lands, May, 1888, p. 196.) A few years later Joseph F. Smith, another prominent Mormon leader, said in an evening service: "I would rather my children were allowed to play in a yard where there is an open well; [or] . . . to play about where the rattlesnake was known to be; . . . than hear of them growing up and sent to the schools of these outsiders." (L. A. Rudisill, report, Sixty-third Ann. Rep., M. S. [1881], p. 287.) At certain times there were, however, examples of a spirit of lessened antagonism and some willingness to cooperate. H. D. Fisher relates that when he was in the employ of the American Bible Society as superintendent for Utah, Idaho, and Montana he held meetings in a number of Mormon tabernacles with full approval of Bishops and other officers of the Mormon Church.—The Gun and the Gospel, Early Kansas and Chaplain Fisher, ch. XXXI.

for only two or three years, in either case not long enough to acquaint themselves thoroughly with prevailing conditions, determine the methods of evangelism likely to be most successful, and to institute an ongoing program. Only one missionary remained in Utah for as long as ten years in the period 1870-80; and a second for nine of the ten years. Of the other thirteen two were in the mission for four years, six for three years, three for two years and two for one year. The situation was made more serious by the seeming impossibility, caused by lack of funds and of recruits for missionary service, of filling the vacancies caused by transfers out of the mission. In 1876 twelve of the twenty charges listed in the two Districts were left to be supplied; the next year the number of appointments was reduced to thirteen; and in 1878 to six. These conditions improved somewhat in later years but in 1890, with charges in Utah, other than the Scandinavian work, again increased to sixteen, four were left to be supplied.

At the close of the period (1895) the Utah Mission had two Districts, the Salt Lake District with sixteen Circuits and Stations, and the Ogden District with three charges. There were twenty churches, 1,048 full members, and twenty-four Sunday schools with 2,076 pupils.¹⁸⁰

IDAHO MISSION

At the 1864 session of the Oregon Conference C. S. Kingsley, a supernumerary member, was assigned to Idaho City where he held religious services and built a church, thus providing a center from which missionary operations might be carried on. At the 1865 Conference Kingsley was superannuated. On October 23 William Roberts* arrived on the field and established headquarters at Idaho City. The difficulties which he encountered in the territory seemed to him greater than he had previously experienced in his "twenty years . . . on the Pacific Coast," including "exorbitantly high rates of living and travel," the instability of the population in what was then predominantly a mining region—people remaining only long enough "to make their pile" and then leaving—and, finally, the "large proportion of Irish Romanists," hostile to Protestantism. At the 1866 Oregon Conference Roberts was appointed Superintendent of Idaho Missions. He visited in the course of the year Boise City, Centerville, Placerville, Pioneer, and Owyhee—finding in the last place "a very neat church [which had been recently erected] . . . on the union principle." His general conclusion was that the population and "prospective importance of Idaho" justified the current missionary expenditure but not any considerable immediate increase. During the year the church erected by Kingsley was sold to the county for a courthouse, with the reservation that it might continue to be used as a church. Roberts' superintendency terminated in 1869. At the 1869 Oregon Conference he was appointed to Portland and the Idaho Mission disappeared from the Minutes.¹⁸¹

* At the 1865 Oregon Conference (Aug. 10-15) William Roberts was appointed for the third year Presiding Elder of the Willamette District. This year Idaho was constituted a Third Class Mission of the Interior Department under supervision of Bishop Kingsley who on Sept. 20 changed Robert's appointment to "Missionary to Idaho."—Gen'l Minutes, 1865, p. 154; Forty-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. (1865), p. 161; William Roberts, report, ibid., 49th (1867), pp. 128, 129 ff.

With the organization of the Rocky Mountain Conference in 1872 three Idaho Circuits—Silver City, Salmon River, and Boise City Circuit—were included in the Corinne District with J. M. Jamison* as Presiding Elder. Of these, the first two were "without money or preachers." The following year the name was changed to Idaho District, with five appointments: Boise City, Idaho City, Payette, Rocky Bar, and Silver City—all Circuits. In 1874 Jamison reported to his Conference that congregations in all the charges had been large.¹⁸²

Many new societies have been organized in different sections of the country, which promise to grow and exert a moral and religious influence on the surrounding country. . . . the church is being permanently established throughout the Territory.¹⁸³

In 1875 eight appointments, three of them new (Boise Circuit, Lewiston, and Fort Hall Indian agency), were listed in the District, of which two were left to be supplied.¹⁸⁴

In 1876 five of the Idaho missions (Idaho City, Boise Circuit, Boise City, Payette, and Lewiston) were by change of boundaries transferred from the Rocky Mountain Conference to the Columbia River Conference.† Two or three charges were included in the Montana Conference.‡ Silver City and Rocky Bar disappeared from the Minutes. This same year the southern part of Idaho became a part of the Utah Conference.§

The 1877 Columbia River Conference included as one of three Districts Grande Ronde and Boise with nine Circuits and Stations. By 1881 appointments had increased to seventeen. In 1883, with the District divided into two—the Grande Ronde and the Boise, containing a total of twenty-three Circuits and Stations—the Conference adopted a memorial to the 1884 General Conference asking for division into two Conferences, the eastern to be called the Idaho Conference.¹⁸⁵

In 1884, in accordance with General Conference action, the Idaho Confer-

* J. M. Jamison states: "I preached in the Court-House [Idaho City], morning and evening . . ." Also, "As there had never been a regularly organized Methodist Church in the city [Boise City]—nor in the Territory—we announced that . . . we would organize the first Methodist Church in Idaho Territory, which I did (November 17, 1872) and on the following Saturday, the 23rd of November, I held the first Quarterly Conference ever held in Idaho . . ." (In Fifty-fourth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1872], pp. 150-52.) In making these statements Jamison ignores, or is unaware of, Kingsley's work in Idaho City in 1864-65; that the courthouse in which he (Jamison) preached was formerly a Methodist church; and that Roberts had established a Sunday school there (1866-67), held Methodist services, and in all probability organized a Methodist Society.

ence* was formed with two Districts, Boise City with twelve Circuits and Stations, and La Grande with twelve.† The Conference embraced a vast area, the Boise City District alone including in 1889 a region approximately as large as the state of New York.

It is a region of vast valleys and great mountains. It includes nine counties in Southern Idaho, and a part of Malheur County in Oregon. Much of its territory is yet unsettled, and consequently the distances to be traveled to reach the various appointments are very great. . . . [The Presiding Elder] has traveled in several cases, in his own conveyance from 150 to 200 miles to hold a single quarterly meeting.¹⁸⁶

In a statement on "Our Missionary Needs," made in 1891, H. K. Hines and S. M. Driver said:

Our work in the Idaho Conference is almost purely missionary work. The field is so vast in area, and its towns and cities so small and so widely separated, and the country so sparsely occupied by farmers and ranchmen, that it is likely that there is no field in American Methodism where our ministers do their work under more disadvantages than in this Conference. . . . The number of church members scattered over this wide field is so small, that, even if they were wealthy, it would be impossible for them to give anything like 'a comfortable support' to the families of the pastors appointed to labor with and for them. These pastors must receive a considerable part of their support from the missionary appropriations, or the people must be left without the gospel a large proportion of the people within our bounds are immigrants struggling with the difficulties of a country hard to reclaim to the purposes of productive industry¹⁸⁷

In 1891, eleven years after its organization, the Idaho Conference, with twelve of its twenty-three appointments in Oregon, had only 1,162 full members, twenty-seven churches, and thirty-eight Sunday schools with an enrollment of 2,059.¹⁸⁸

DAKOTA MISSION

At the 1860 session of the Upper Iowa Conference S. W. Ingham, a recent graduate of Cornell College, was appointed "to that portion of the country lying between the Big Sioux and Missouri Rivers in the proposed territory of Dakota." The Dakota Mission was attached to the Sioux City District. On Sunday, October 14, Ingham conducted at Vermillion the first Methodist services held in the Dakota country, five months before the Territory of Dakota was created. On January 13, 1861, a Methodist Society was formed in Vermillion, "the first religious organization of any kind in the territory." During his two years' pastorate Ingham visited and preached in Richland, Fort Randall, Canton, Sioux Falls, and other points, but the only Classes

* At its first session the Idaho Conference reported fifteen charter members of Conference, and three probationers; ten Local Preachers; thirteen churches with 632 full members; and twenty Sunday schools, with 761 pupils.—Minutes, Idaho Conference, 1884, p. 15.

formed were at Vermillion and Richland.* From 1868 to 1872 Dakota Territory was included within the boundaries of the Des Moines Conference, and during 1872-80 in the Northwest Iowa Conference.† During the late sixties missionary work in the region was sporadic because of the lack of preachers. However, Societies were organized before 1870 in Yankton, Elk Point,‡ and Canton. In 1873, at the second session of the Northwest Iowa Conference, the Dakota District was formed with eleven charges in addition to those already named, with five unsupplied. In 1876, the grasshopper scourge struck Dakota so severely in many sections as to cause a general exodus from the region. In consequence, at the 1876 Annual Conference the Dakota District was discontinued by the Presiding Bishop, several appointments canceled, and the remaining charges attached to the Sioux City District. Bennett Mitchell felt that this was an unnecessary retreat. Bishop Foster, he said, certainly "was not an expansionist. He seemed not to have a clear vision of the coming growth and glory of the Dakota land." In 1879 the Dakota District was reconstituted with nineteen charges (two additional in Iowa).¹⁸⁹

Beginning in 1879-80 Dakota again enjoyed a period of marked advance. Some estimates of increase of population during 1880-81 were as high as forty thousand. This rapid population growth greatly stimulated Church extension. The General Conference of 1880 authorized the organization of the Dakota Mission, "to include all that part of Dakota Territory south of the Minnesota Conference, and east of the Black Hills Mission." Organization was consummated at Yankton on September 23, 1880. Wilmot Whitfield, who during the preceding year had been Presiding Elder of the Dakota District, was appointed Superintendent. Charges were listed to the number of twenty-eight but men were available for only ten. Members in full connection numbered 1,299.¹⁹⁰ During 1880 new Societies were organized in places where no churches had previously existed. A typical example was the Ashton charge where the pastor reported having organized a Circuit "where a few months before there had been only unbroken prairie, the joint inheritance of the rabbit, the wolf and the wild Indian." Of the the thirty-three Circuits and Stations, ten had "only just been formed." In twenty-four towns specifically mentioned by the Superintendent of the mission, twelve had churches already built and in eight others there were definite plans for building.¹⁹¹

At the third session of the mission an additional District was created and

* The General Minutes (Upper Iowa Conference) for six years (1862-67) list "Dacotah" to be supplied. Doane Robinson in his History of South Dakota states that for one year Jason L. Paine served the mission. Beginning in 1865 Yankton is also included in the Minutes; in the first year "to be supplied"; in 1866 and 1867 with C. W. Batchellor as pastor. ‡ The Methodist church at Elk Point was dedicated in 1871. There were at that time only four other Protestant church buildings in Dakota Territory, two Episcopal, one Congregational, and one Baptist.—B. Mitchell, op. cit., p. 2.

at the fourth session (1883) the mission was divided into four Districts. Increase of population was stimulated by the building of two branches of the C. & N. W. R. R. and also of the C. M. & St. P. Lewis Hartsough, in appealing for increased appropriations from the Missionary Society, wrote:

They [the railroads] bring 5 crowded trains daily. These trains are often broken into 2 or 3 divisions of 8 or 10 cars each, all crowded. In the Huron Land District . . . during 5 months preceding April 1st . . . 1,507,000 [acres were surveyed] and settlers . . . precede the surveyors. Nearly as much more is doing in the Aberdeen Land District, . . .¹⁹²

The 1884 General Conference authorized the formation of the Dakota Annual Conference,* which was organized on October 8, 1885. "During the years immediately following Methodism kept pace with the rapid increase in population." Later a reaction set in, caused by the depression of 1893-95, in conjunction with a succession of crop failures on account of drought. However, in 1895—the Conference having changed its name in 1892 to the South Dakota Conference when the new state was created—reported 8,847 members, 129 churches, and 193 Sunday schools with an enrollment of 10,598.¹⁹³

In the meantime the North Dakota Mission had been organized. The 1884 General Conference detached that portion of the Minnesota Conference within the Dakota Territory and from it constituted a mission. The first session of the North Dakota Mission† was held in Fargo, October 2-5, 1884. Superintendent G. R. Hair wrote to the Missionary Society in his report:

The majority of these charges are circuits, with from 3 to 6 preaching appointments, so that we number from 70 to 75 separate congregations. Our Sunday school work is developing rapidly. A gratifying increase of our denominational schools can be reported. We have 18 or 19 in successful operation; while our people are a working majority, in several places, in Union schools. These Union schools are a necessity in new communities, until suitable places can be secured for separate denominational work.¹⁹⁴

At the same session of General Conference (1884) permission was given for organization as an Annual Conference. On October 16, 1886, the Conference‡ was organized with twenty-one charter members. It began under the handicap of lacking by twenty-three a sufficient number of preachers to supply its forty-seven charges. Salaries were on a meager level and continued

* Minutes of the first session, held at Blunt, S. D., Oct. 8-12, 1885, show that in five years the number of charges increased almost fourfold: from twenty-eight to ninety-four, and full members three and a half times; from 1,299 to 4,497. However, the acute shortage of preachers still continued with forty-one charges remaining without pastors at the close of the Conference session.—Gen'l Minutes, Fall, 1880, pp. 305, 433; ibid., Fall, 1885, pp. 304, 455.

† The North Dakota Mission was organized with two Districts, Fargo and Grand Forks; in all, twenty-four pastoral charges, twelve with a resident pastor. At the first session charges were increased to thirty-one but of these it was necessary to leave twenty to be supplied.—Ibid., Fall, 1883, p. 274; ibid., 1884, p. 314.

‡ The North Dakota Conference had at its organization in 1886 thirty Local Preachers, 2,341 full members, thirty-one churches, and seventy-one Sunday schools with 2,876 pupils.—Ibid., 1886, p. 480.

so to the end of the period. In 1895 the missionary appropriation to the Conference was $4,073. Including this aid, cash salaries received by the pastors ranged from a maximum of $1,500. (Fargo, First Church) to a minimum of $80. Of seventy-three pastors thirty-three received less than $400. and eleven received less than $200. for the year. Salary claims of all pastors amounted to $42,715. but on this total deficiencies at the close of the year were $6,785. Under these conditions tenure of Conference membership tended to be brief, in 1895 seven ministers transferring to other Conferences and only one coming into the Conference by transfer. While conditions were not conducive to rapid growth church membership gradually increased, reaching a maximum of 4,229 in 1895.¹⁹⁵

BLACK HILLS MISSION

Public attention was first prominently directed to the Black Hills when in 1874 General George A. Custer led an exploring expedition into the region which resulted in the discovery of gold. Settlers immediately flocked into the country in large numbers. In 1876 the Sioux Indians were induced to cede title to the Black Hills lands. In the General Conference of that year E. H. Rogers of Nebraska offered a resolution calling upon the Committee on Boundaries "to inquire into and report such action as may be necessary to supply the region known as the Black Hills with Methodist preachers," but the Conference failed to act.¹⁹⁶ However, at least one preacher was already busy about the Master's business in the Black Hills country. H. W. Smith, an ordained Methodist minister, attempting to make his way on August 20, 1876, from Deadwood to Crook City to preach, was ambushed and killed by Indians. In 1878 James Williams, at the seventh session of the Northwest Iowa Conference, was appointed to Black Hills and the following year a Black Hills District was organized with Williams as Presiding Elder. At the 1880 General Conference the Black Hills Mission was formed, Williams continuing his supervision as its Superintendent. At its formation the mission had five missionaries; 110 church members, including probationers; one church; and three Sunday schools with 160 pupils.¹⁹⁷ Methodist Societies were formed at Central City in 1878, at Crook City (Whitewood) in 1879; at Lead and at Custer in 1880; and in 1881 at Rapid City.¹⁹⁸

Concerning the natural wealth and attractiveness of the region the mission Superintendent wrote in 1882:

A large portion of . . . [the region] is first-grade agricultural land, capable of producing all the cereals in a degree unsurpassed both in quantity and quality. The southwestern portion is hilly; these hills contain a great variety of minerals. Gold, silver, and mica are found in abundance. Large coalfields are here. Salt, gypsum, and petroleum abound. These hills are covered with fine forests, and inclose fertile and well-watered valleys, which are being rapidly occupied by an enterprising and industrious population. . . . This mountain air and our famous hot springs make the Black Hills a favorite resort for health and pleasure seekers. Though . . . the nearest railroad is two hundred miles distant, yet thirty thousand people have found their way here, and our prospective railroads will bring to us many thousands more in the near future.¹⁹⁹

By 1886 charges had increased in number to eleven, and although missionaries' salaries were "very small," every charge was supplied. An extensive church- and parsonage-building program was also under way with both a church and parsonage at each of five centers and churches at four additional places.²⁰⁰ Need for a school under church auspices led in 1890 to the founding of Black Hills College* at Hot Springs but the institution had only an ephemeral existence.

Under the authorization given by the 1888 General Conference for any mission, by a majority vote of its members present and voting, to organize itself into a Mission Conference, the Black Hills Mission on September 1 of that year became a Mission Conference. Although the population of the region failed to increase between then and 1895 the advance of the Church continued,† registering growth during the seven years of 126 per cent.²⁰¹

WYOMING MISSION

On Sunday morning, September 20, 1867, W. W. Baldwin of the Colorado Conference held services in the City Hall, Cheyenne, preaching what is believed to have been the first Methodist sermon in Wyoming. Following the services Dr. D. W. Scott, a practicing physician and a Local Preacher, organized a Methodist Society. On October 6 a Sunday school was begun with the doctor as superintendent. Later Scott was also appointed pastor of the Society, services being held in the schoolhouse. In August, 1868, A. Cather of the Philadelphia Conference was appointed Presiding Elder of the Dakota District (Colorado Conference) and pastor at Cheyenne and Laramie. In 1869 the District was renamed Wyoming, two Circuits were added, and Lewis Hartsough was appointed Presiding Elder and pastor at Cheyenne. He immediately established preaching appointments at Laramie, Carbon, Point of Rocks, Rock Springs, Green River, and Bryan.²⁰² From 1872 to 1876 a part of Wyoming was included in the Rocky Mountain Conference, and from 1877 to 1879 in the Utah Conference with appointments at Evanston, Green River (1874-75; 1878), and Rock Springs (1879). From 1880 to

* Black Hills College, housed in "a fine stone structure," was opened on Sept. 11, 1890, with six members of faculty, John W. Hancher, president, and forty-five students. In addition to campus and buildings an endowment of $50,000. was secured. This promising beginning, however, soon ended in failure.—Seventieth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1888), p. 352; ibid., 72nd (1890), p. 280; ibid., 73rd (1891), p. 287.

† After eight years as a mission and seven years as a Mission Conference the Black Hills had twenty Circuits and Stations with 1,097 full members; eleven Local Preachers; forty-one Sunday schools with 1,957 pupils; twenty churches and nine parsonages. Salaries ranged from $1,200. (Deadwood) as a maximum to a minimum of $225. However, on fourteen of the twenty charges the salary for 1895 was not paid in full, deficiencies ranging from $18. to $247.—Minutes, Black Hills Mission Conference, 1895, pp. 15 f., 35, 37.

1887 all Wyoming appointments, with one exception, were in the Colorado Conference. Sun Dance was in the Black Hills Mission (1884-87). Methodist Societies were organized: at Laramie in 1869, in Evanston in 1870 (or 1871), and in Rawlins in 1876.²⁰³

Not until 1888 was the Wyoming Mission established. In that year the Colorado Conference met at Cheyenne when the mission was set up with D. L. Rader as Superintendent, and eleven appointments listed, four of which were left to be supplied. It had five churches, five parsonages, 329 members, exclusive of probationers, and ten Sunday schools. A year later the Superintendent reported thirteen Circuits and Stations.²⁰⁴

When he retired from the superintendency four years later (1892), Rader reported:

I have traveled on the railroad about 57,300 miles, on stage about 4,750 miles, in private conveyance about 4,725 miles, and on foot about 1,100 miles. I have slept on the ground and have done my own cooking 87 nights, have preached 713 times, delivered 63 free lectures, . . . baptized 117 children and 142 adults, preached at 27 funerals, solemnized 15 marriages, dedicated 5 churches, and raised over $5,000 on preachers' salaries, . . .²⁰⁵

Growth in the seven years 1888-95 was comparatively slow. Full members increased only to 726 and the number of churches from five to sixteen. Three of the appointments of 1888 no longer appeared on the list but seven that were new had been added. All but two charges had regular pastors. Some of the difficulties in the administration of such a pioneer mission, Superintendent N. A. Chamberlain felt, were not generally known or appreciated by the Church:

We have lack of practical Methodist leadership and in the number of men and women needed for successful stewardship. Many come to us who are not trained with us. Our members are so few that the greater part of our salaries have been raised by 'suppers' and the kind gifts of others. Charges with twenty members, all poor and struggling with high prices, raise four hundred dollars which would in the East raise but forty dollars. . . . It should be said that our 'laymen' are nearly all women.²⁰⁶

MONTANA MISSION

The first regularly appointed Methodist missionary to Montana was the Rev. A. M. Hough, a member of the New York Conference, pastor of the Lexington Avenue Church, New York City. Remarking to Bishop Janes in the early summer of 1864 that his health had failed, Hough was advised by the Bishop to go to Montana as Superintendent of the mission to be established there, adding, "It may save your health and your life." On July 3, 1864, he received his appointment from Bishop Clark. At Atchison, Kansas, the end of his railroad trip, he was joined by E. T. McLaughlin, a probationer of the Nebraska Conference, appointed to be his collaborator. Delayed for two months by an Indian outbreak on the western plains they left Atchison on October 5 on their stagecoach journey of 1,700 miles.

By advice of the agent of the stage company and other friends, we armed ourselves with some weapons not mentioned in the gospel panoply which Paul recommended Christians to put on. We must have looked like a traveling arsenal as we moved out of Atchison, with guns bristling from the doors and windows of the coach, and a revolver strapped to each man, besides two fully-equipped United States soldiers on the top. But by the good providence of God we were not attacked,

Traveling via Salt Lake City the party reached Virginia City (Alder Gulch), Montana, on October 23, 1864.²⁰⁷

Local Preachers and other God-fearing laymen had been busy declaring the Gospel tidings in the Montana country for some months in advance of the missionaries' arrival. Several Methodists had organized themselves into a Class in Virginia City in the winter of 1863-64 under the leadership of William Florkey. "About the first of June, 1864," William James, an ordained Local Preacher, and three other Methodist laymen "came to Alder Gulch from Boise City, Idaho," at once "built a small church in Junction City," and maintained "regular preaching and Sabbath school." Hugh Duncan, engaged in mining operations near Junction, the first Methodist preacher to sink permanent roots into Montana soil, preached for the first time in Junction in July, 1864. There were also Methodist services held in Bannack in January, 1864.²⁰⁸

On January 1, 1865, Hough wrote to the Missionary Society:

Our religious prospects are far better than I dared hope before I left the East We dedicated . . . [a] church in Montana Territory on November 6 [1864]. In a few weeks we found it too small to furnish even standing room for all who sought entrance, so we have taken out one end of the building, and are putting on twenty-five feet addition. . . . We now number about ninety members.²⁰⁹

By the spring of 1865 Hough saw his field of labor in a different perspective. In the beginning of the year "at least two-thirds of the people" of Montana Territory resided in and about Virginia City. By April 15 not one-third remained. "The report of new and rich [gold] discoveries came, and a stampede commenced and has not stopped yet." Two years before, Bannack had "from five thousand to eight thousand inhabitants; now it does not number two hundred persons." Just as in California and Nevada, swift changes in the mining communities interfered with permanent Church growth.²¹⁰

The Superintendent also had difficulty in finding men who were content to stay with the missionary task in Montana. McLaughlin, who had been at Diamond City, returned to the East and on January 1, 1867, Hough reported that the missionary who succeeded McLaughlin had "left the work," leaving him entirely alone. Not even Virginia City or Helena, the two most promising charges, had a pastor. He had organized a Society of eleven members at Bozeman in Gallatin Valley, "the garden of Montana," where a church had been built by W. W. Alderson, a Local Preacher, but as yet no Conference member was available for the charge. George Comfort arrived in Virginia City in April, 1868, but about the same time A. M. Hough himself, because of his wife's ill health, "felt obliged to resign and remove to Southern California," leaving Comfort as the only Traveling Preacher. During 1868 and part of 1869 he labored alone save for limited aid from Local Preachers, and was successful in completing churches at Helena and at Bozeman. In July, 1869, S. G. Lathrop of the Rock River Conference having been appointed Superintendent of the mission, Comfort was designated "missionary-at-large." He held services at intervals for five months in Beaverhead Valley, Bannack, and Sheridan, and then returned to New York. Lathrop's tenure also was brief. In the fall of 1871 he went back to Illinois. Meanwhile J. A. Van Anda of the Nebraska Conference and T. C. Iliff * of the Ohio Conference had arrived in Montana as missionaries, the former in the spring of 1870, the latter one year later. In the summer of 1872 Iliff built a church in Missoula, hauling the lumber for it himself.²¹¹

With such a migratory population and a sporadic ministry it is easily understood why the Methodist Societies had a precarious existence and registered an extremely slow growth. At the first session of the Rocky Mountain Conference † in August, 1872, the Montana Mission reported three ministerial members and one Local Preacher; ninety-five full members; one church completed and three in process of construction; and five Sunday schools, with 275 pupils. The one District (Helena) listed seven appointments, all Circuits, of which three were left to be supplied.²¹²

Despite the tragic lack of personnel the 1876 General Conference passed an enabling act permitting the Rocky Mountain Conference to divide into two bodies. Action was promptly taken and on August 2-5, 1877, the Montana Conference ‡ met in its first session at Bozeman. For four years the little band of six or seven men struggled to maintain their Conference organization but the attempt was hopeless. When the 1880 General Conference met the Committee on Missions recommended that the Conference be reduced to the status of a mission. The recommendation was adopted, the Montana Mission to include so much of Montana as was included in the Montana Conference, excepting "a small portion of the south-east corner, more easily reached from the Black Hills Mission."²¹³

In company with the best girl Ohio ever gave to a Methodist preacher, I . . . [arrived] at Corinne [Utah], April, 1871. After five days' and four nights' travel by overland stage, we arrived at Helena, Montana, . . . April 15, 1871."—In Minutes of the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Utah Mission . . . 1895, p. 16.

‡ The Montana Conference at its organizing session consisted of four men, of whom two were Presiding Elders. On the Helena District ten appointments were listed, of which seven were left "to be supplied"; of the eight appointments on the Butte District, all except one, to which the Presiding Elder was assigned, were left unfilled.—Gen'l Minutes, 1877, p. 80.

The turn of the decade was a decisive period in Montana history. During the seventies the placer mining excitement of earlier years had died down; the gold miners and adventurers had moved on to other fields; and the warring Indian tribes had been reduced to submission. Farming settlements were few and small, ranching on a large scale had not been developed, and there was little immigration into the country. At the 1879 Conference only four preachers and one layman were present. But in the early eighties the scene rapidly changed. In his report for 1883 Superintendent F. A. Riggin could scarcely restrain his enthusiasm:

The growth of Montana during the past year has been marvelous. The Northern Pacific Railroad . . . has just completed its road, It has also constructed two branch lines in Montana, and contemplates the construction of others next season. The Union Pacific Railroad has run its branch into the southern border of Butte, and down the Deer Lodge, and intends to traverse other rich valleys of our mountain land. . . . Towns from 500 to 2,500 inhabitants have sprung up and demanded immediate attention.

Three years later Riggin was still more enthusiastic:

I am traveling incessantly . . . and yet such changes are taking place in the out-growth of various localities that the grandest conceptions I have been able to form of their development have been transcended time and again. During my short experience in this region the population has sextupled. Cities that were small collections of unimportant log-cabins and temporary structures, with a few score or hundred of inhabitants, have grown to 10,000 and 20,000²¹⁴

So great was the change that the 1884 General Conference enacted legislation permitting the Montana Mission again to organize as an Annual Conference. Advantage was not taken of this legislation until 1887 when on August 17-22 the Montana Annual Conference was reorganized with twenty-nine men on the Conference roll. Twenty-seven preachers were appointed to the thirty-seven Circuits and Stations of the three Districts, with eleven left to be supplied. An influential factor in the growth of Methodism during this period was the strengthening of the missionary personnel. From the seven men of 1880 the mission increased to twenty-five in 1886. The missionary tenure also increased in length. In this latter year F. A. Riggin was able to say that he had a record of fourteen years' missionary service in Montana. By 1895 church members,* not including probationers, numbered 1,891.²¹⁵

By authorization of the 1892 General Conference the North Montana

* In 1895 the Montana Conference had forty-three churches but many of the Societies were small, some with fewer than forty members. Sunday schools numbered 67, with 4,077 pupils.—Minutes Montana Conference, 1895, pp. 59 f.

Mission was organized on October 8, 1892, W. W. Van Orsdel,* Superintendent. On July 1, 1872, he had arrived at Fort Benton on the Missouri River steamboat, The Far West, impressed with the conviction that "God had work for him to do in . . . Montana." He soon began to make his influence felt. With no other commission than his sense of a divine call he began to preach wherever he could find an open door, whether it was a miner's cabin, a town bar, or a city church. He attended the Annual Conference of 1876 as a Local Preacher; and in the same year was elected to General Conference as a lay delegate. Largely as a result of his aggressive evangelistic effort, by 1892 thirteen appointments had been established in northern Montana. In 1894 Van Orsdel wrote to the Missionary Society:

Two churches have been built, one at Glasgow, the other at Chinook. The church at Havre has been completed, and an addition built to the church at Great Falls; a new parsonage has been built at Havre Over six thousand dollars have been raised and expended on churches and parsonages this year.²¹⁶

In 1895 the mission reported 560 members in full connection, fifteen churches, and thirty-two Sunday schools. Van Orsdel's program is described in his report for the year:

The work has made it necessary to travel fifteen thousand miles in the bounds of the Mission, with an average of one service for each day in the year. Three new churches have been built Two new parsonages have been built Ten thousand dollars has been raised and paid on new churches and parsonages, old indebtedness, and improvements. . . . Special revival meetings have been held in nearly all the charges, and some bright converts won for the Master. . . . We believe in, and have class meetings. 'A real, earnest Christianity along Methodist lines' is our watchword.²¹⁷

NEVADA MISSION

During its first year as United States territory Nevada was a part of California, called "the Washoe Country." In September, 1850, most of the area was incorporated in the newly organized Utah Territory. In March, 1861, the mineral wealth of the Washoe country having become known, Congress created the Nevada Territory and three years later (March, 1864) passed an enabling act authorizing the establishment of a state government. On October 31, 1864, Nevada was declared a state. The first settlement in the Washoe country was made in the Carson River Valley in 1849 but immigration in the area was slow and the census of 1860 registered a population of only 6,857.

* William W. Van Orsdel (1841-1919) was born at Hunterstown, Pa. He was admitted on trial in the Nebraska Conference in 1883 and appointed missionary to Montana. In 1887 he was transferred to the Montana Conference and appointed to Benton and Great Falls. In 1890 he was made Presiding Elder of the Great Falls District. Six times he represented his Conference in the General Conference. "He was one of the most loved of men, and he was a minister, in whom not only those of his own faith, but of all church beliefs had the most implicit confidence."—Christian Advocate, XCIV (1919), 49 (Dec. 25), 1540 f., 1554; Minutes, North Montana Conference, 1920, pp. 60 f.

Jesse L. Bennett, a Local Preacher, known as the Father of Nevada Methodism, "held religious services in the Carson Valley at Genoa and Eagle Ranch," in 1859. He "preached the first sermon heard in Virginia City," at a street service, in 1860. Also in 1859 A. L. S. Bateman "was sent to Carson Valley" by the California Conference. Abortive attempts had been made earlier, in 1855 Carson Valley having been listed in the Minutes but "left to be supplied," and in 1857 Ira P. Hale, assigned to the appointment, had apparently failed to reach the field. In 1861, however, he was preaching at Esmeralda and Mono. No Nevada appointment was recorded for 1858. Again in 1860 the Carson Valley Circuit and Walker's River were designated "to be supplied." But finally in 1861 the Nevada Territory District was formed with N. R. Peck as Presiding Elder and from then on the work was continuous. In that year ten appointments were listed but preachers were available for only five. In 1863 Nevada was recorded in the Minutes of the California Conference as the Washoe District, with Adam Bland as Presiding Elder. Of the fifteen appointments only seven received pastors. This was a fruitful year with churches begun, "others completed, and the general work extended."²¹⁸

The 1864 General Conference in response to a memorial from the California Conference passed an enabling act authorizing the organization of the Nevada Annual Conference.* The Conference was organized at the 1864 session of the California Conference in San Francisco, September 21-October 2.

For twenty years Nevada maintained its status as an Annual Conference and then in 1884, by General Conference authorization, resolved "itself into a Mission." At no time during the two decades did it have more than twenty-eight charges.²¹⁹

During the entire period the state had a floating population, which reached its maximum of 62,266 in 1880. Ten years later it had 16,465 fewer people than at the beginning of the decade. It had only three towns of considerable size: Reno, Virginia City, and Carson City. About one in four of the population was foreign born, mostly English, Irish, German, Italian, and Chinese in approximately equal proportion; and about one in eight, Indian.

Of the several denominations the Methodist Episcopal Church was much the strongest, having more churches than all the others (including the Roman Catholic). In the six years 1889-95 the Methodists "built six new churches,"

* The Nevada Conference, when organized, included within its area "all of Nevada and Utah Territories and that part of New Mexico west of the Rocky Mountains." (G. C. Journal, 1864, p. 220.) It had two Districts, the Washoe and the Humboldt. At its first session, held at Virginia City, Sept. 7, 1865, the Conference reported 267 full members on thirteen charges; 17 Sunday schools with 803 pupils; 11 Local Preachers; and 4 churches. With seventeen charges listed, nine preachers in addition to the two Presiding Elders were appointed; eight charges left to be supplied. (Gen'l Minutes, 1865, pp. 246 f.) In 1872 the Nevada Conference boundaries were changed to include only Nevada and the portion of California "east of the west summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains." (G. C. Journal, 1872, p. 422.) However, for a brief period in 1872, the "Palisades Circuit Missions" in Nevada were included in the Utah Mission but in August, 1872, were transferred to the Nevada Conference. (Minutes, Rocky Mountain Conference, 1872, p. 15.) No further change was made in boundaries of the Conference or of the Nevada Mission up to 1896.

and had "the seventh under headway."²²⁰ The long distances between stations made the task of the Superintendents difficult, and intensive supervision impossible. In his annual report for 1890 E. W. Van Deventer stated:

I have traveled by railway 5,410 miles; with my own conveyance and by stage, 2,400; in all, 7,810 miles. This traveling has been done in a variety of ways—in the buggy, on the cars, on foot with my knapsack on my back, on snow-plows, snow-shoes, flangers, tram-ways, bob-sleds—the bobbing of which passes description—on the stage—sometimes the stage on me; in either case the fare paid was all the same. Journeys were made through rain-storms and snow-storms. I spent one night, with my wife in the buggy, by the side of a lake, while the rain poured down in torrents all night long, going thirty-six hours without anything warm either to eat or drink. From all these things the Lord delivered me without so much as a scratch upon my person.²²¹

The work in Nevada was begun as a pioneer enterprise and it was still such at the close of the period. Many of the preaching appointments in 1895 were in mining camps "and wayside inns, in private dwellings as well as in schoolhouses, halls and churches." The Societies were few in number,* with small membership, and deficient in local leadership. In his report for 1892 the Superintendent paid high tribute to his colaborers, declaring that no "more efficient, heroic, and self-sacrificing band . . . ever toiled in a mission field, either home or foreign, . . . [standing fast] at their posts of duty with an unswerving fidelity for Christianity . . ."²²²

INDIAN MISSION

By action of the 1880 General Conference the organization of the Indian Mission, "to include the Indian Territory," was authorized. Its area was indefinite since the so-called "Indian Territory" was never an organized United States territory nor until 1889 were its geographical limits definitely defined. The Missionary Secretaries stated that it did not differ from other Indian missions except that it would be "administered as a foreign mission," and not by an Annual Conference. It began in a small way on an appropriation of $500. The Superintendent, J. M. Iliff, reported in 1882 to the Board:

The Indian Mission, while being reported as a separate work, is not so in fact. The appropriation for its support has been insufficient to sustain it independent of other work; and, while a missionary was kept in the field for a part of the year 1881 . . . I have failed to find a supply for the ground occupied last year, . . . and have supplied only the Wyandotte Mission, by connecting it with Baxter Springs, Kansas charge. There have been in this mission during the year thus far 8 conversions, an increase of 3 members and 6 probationers, and a good degree of spirituality.²²³

The next year the Superintendent further stated that parts of two Circuits

* In 1895 the Nevada Mission had one District, with 23 Circuits and Stations, 17 missionaries, 979 full members, 30 churches, and 40 Sunday schools with 2,336 pupils.—Gen'l Minutes, Fall, 1895, pp. 401, 597.

of the South Kansas Conference in the northwestern corner of the Cherokee Nation, inhabited almost exclusively by freedmen,* had been cut off from Kansas and left to be supplied by the Indian mission. Iliff found supplies and organized three charges—"Snow Creek Charge, in the Verdigris country, with four appointments," the "Island Ford Charge, in the Grand River country," with three appointments, and Pryor's Creek charge in the southwest part of the Cherokee Nation,† with two preaching places.²²⁴

Two years later (1885) the mission was said to be "fairly successful." Six charges were listed with nineteen appointments, of which one was the Osage Agency. The work was sorely hindered by the bitter jealousy and antagonism existing between former northern and southern soldiers. The population of the territory, however, was rapidly increasing both in the unoccupied central region designated by the Indians Oklahoma ("the beautiful land") and in the eastern region occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes. Three railways by 1887 had built lines through the territory and numerous new railroad towns had been established. The mission Superintendent declared that it was his policy to secure property and at once organize a Methodist Society in each town.²²⁵

On March 21, 1889, the mission was organized as the Indian Mission Conference,‡ with five "full members and two probationers." At the first session nineteen appointments were listed, of which fourteen were "to be supplied." Its area embraced the entire Indian Territory.²²⁶

By virtue of authority of the 1892 General Conference the Indian Mission Conference was reorganized as the Oklahoma§ Annual Conference on December 14-19, 1892. At the close of its first year, with four Districts, the Conference reported eighty-eight appointments, 4,462 full members, and fifty-eight churches. This remarkable growth is accounted for by the great influx of settlers which followed the opening of the Oklahoma district to settlement in April, 1889.²²⁷

FOREIGN LANGUAGE MISSIONS

No existing situation in America or abroad presented a greater challenge to Methodism during this half century than the immense flood of foreign

* According to Iliff an area of three hundred square miles in the northwestern part of the Cherokee Nation was inhabited "almost exclusively by freedmen." Near the center of the nation there was also a large colony, and scattered smaller settlements, with an estimated population of 2,400. "These freedmen have the right of occupancy, but have not been recognized as citizens by the nation . . . They are industrious and are making good farms and raising stock, and are more prosperous than their Indian neighbors; with a few years more of prosperity they will be able to sustain their own institutions—the church and school."—J. M. Iliff, in Sixty-fifth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1883), p. 222.

† In addition to the Methodist Episcopal mission, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the Southern Baptists, and the Friends were "working with some success with the Cherokees."—Sixty-third Ann. Rep., M. S. (1881), p. 269.

‡ When organized the Indian Mission Conference reported 504 full members, seven churches, and nineteen Sunday schools.—Gen'l Minutes, 1889, p. 227.

§ Laurence F. Schmeckeber: "In 1890 the western part of the old Indian Territory became the organized Territory of Oklahoma, the eastern part of the country of the Five Civilized Tribes and the Quapaw Agency remaining an unorganized area, although still retaining the name Indian Territory.

immigrants. In 1852 in their Pastoral Address the Bishops said: "The largest expenditures for home missions . . . [are among the immigrants] who with a tide that has never yet ebbed, are flowing by thousands to our shores."²²⁸

In 1835 William Nast had been appointed "German missionary" to inaugurate a program of German language missions in the Ohio Conference. Three years later at the New York Conference Charles H. Williamson received appointment as "missionary to the French population in the city of New York." These appointments marked the beginning of a comprehensive program of foreign language missions in American Methodism.* These also were Conference missions, maintained as a religious ministry to immigrants and children of immigrants who continued to use their native languages and those who, even after they had learned to speak English, much preferred religious services in their native tongues. They were an expression on the part of the Protestant Churches of a friendly, neighborly spirit toward foreigners in contrast to the latent deeply rooted prejudice against immigrants, particularly those who continued to use their native language.† This intense and unreasonable antagonism greatly increased the difficulty of maintenance of foreign language missions. Nevertheless, the Missionary Society steadily expanded its program, so that in 1883 it was able to say that Methodism was exercising a religious ministry among immigrants of almost every nationality—Welsh, Swedish, Norwegian, Danish, German, French, Portuguese, Chinese, and others. "At no portion of the Church's history," the Report declared, "has there been more heroic work done than is now being done."²²⁹

MISSIONS TO THE FRENCH

Despite the futility of earlier attempts to maintain effective missions among the French, in July, 1851, John B. Cocagne of the Black River Conference, French by descent, was transferred to New York City to revive the earlier work begun by C. H. Williamson. He won a few adherents but not a sufficient number to insure the establishment of a permanent Society. Some members of the French Class affiliated with the Duane Street Church; the remainder with other English-speaking churches, and the mission was suspended.²³⁰

In Detroit in 1851 several French people became interested in Protestantism and desired to hear the Gospel preached in their own language. In May a mission was established, with Thomas Carter of New York City in charge. Sunday afternoon services were held in the Second Methodist Episcopal

In 1907 Indian Territory and the Territory of Oklahoma were combined to form the State of Oklahoma."—The Office of Indian Affairs; Its History, Activities and Organization, p.91.

* See Vol. I, 271 ff.

† Beginning in 1852 the General Missionary Committee and the Missionary Society made separate appropriations to the several foreign language groups. (Thirty-fourth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1852-53], p. 16.) Of some appropriations, such as that made to the New England Conference in 1881 for French work in Springfield, Mass., no account is given in the published reports of the Missionary Society.

Church. A Society was organized and within a brief time twenty-four persons were enrolled. In May, 1852, the Christian Advocate announced that the French were "to build this fall [in Detroit] the first French Methodist Church in the United States." In April, 1853, the basement auditorium and adjoining Sunday-school classrooms were occupied. Attendance at the week night and Sunday services at times crowded the room. Within five years of Carter's ministry a church edifice and parsonage were erected and a large Sunday school maintained, but he did not succeed in building up a stable Society. When in 1856 he left for Buenos Aires the church had in its membership only thirty-four persons, of whom more than half were probationers. John B. Cocagne followed him as pastor. Unfortunately, soon after, he lost his life at sea en route to France and the mission came to an untimely end.²³¹

Other French missions were established in various parts of the country. Much of the work, however, was sporadic and failed to produce tangible or permanent results. The immense immigration of French Canadians into New England in the eighties* presented a unique opportunity but at no time was the missionary effort commensurate with the need. Missions were begun in the New England Southern Conference in Fall River, New Bedford District; in the Norwich District, and the Providence District; and at various points in the New England and the New Hampshire Conferences. The uncertain development of the work is seen in such typical statements as that of E. Tirrell, Presiding Elder of the Norwich District: the French work has not been a success; "the lack of means, and, chiefly, the lack of efficient leadership have operated against the work"; and that of S. O. Benton of the Providence District: the "migratory habits of our French population, coupled with the fact that converts from Romanism are forced to change residence in some instances because of persecution, prevents the building up of societies, and renders it difficult to estimate how much of success really is achieved." The French mission at Woonsocket, Rhode Island, the membership of which was composed exclusively of converts from French Canadian Roman Catholicism, was the largest of any French Canadian Methodist Society. Work among the French in the Troy Conference was begun in 1856, but no permanent Society was organized. By 1887 it was estimated that the French-speaking population within the bounds of the Conference numbered almost 50,000 yet only desultory missionary work was carried on.²³²

For several years a French mission was maintained in the Central Illinois Conference with only meager success.† In 1885 the mission in New Orleans,

* See p. 4.

† The mission had four preaching places, Kankakee, Papineau, and Frenchtown, Ill., and Brazil, Ind. In 1887 fifty members in full connection and sixteen probationers were reported. The missionary appropriation in 1888 was $1,400. By 1890 most of the congregation having removed "to Chicago and elsewhere," the Missionary Society recommended that the mission "be operated from Chicago and by the Rock River Conference." (Seventy-second Ann. Rep., M. S. [1890], p. 341.) In 1894 the Society in Brazil, Ind., had thirty-four members. In the same year the mission in Chicago reported twenty-eight members.—Ibid., 76th (1894), pp. 355, 356.

the earliest foreign language undertaking of the Missionary Society (1820-21),* was revived by an appropriation of $500. In February, 1886, work commenced. Pacifique J. Robidoux was transferred in 1887 from the Central Illinois Conference, and was assisted in 1889 by Bruno Boetzingler, French-speaking pastor of First German Methodist Church, and several others. During 1889 they held ten services each week, with an average attendance of thirty at the indoor services and seventy-five at those held outdoors.

They raised some $200. and purchased a 'voiture bible' or gospel wagon for outdoor preaching. Attached to it is a beautiful little sorrel horse, a genuine 'gospel horse,' who ought also to be classed as a Methodist, since he belongs to the traveling connection.²³³

In 1888-89 "a beautiful little chapel in the St. Bernard district of New Orleans" was purchased and furnished. In 1890 services were held in two chapels—the Congo Square and the Nashua Chapel—and well-attended Sunday schools conducted in both. At the close of the period the Missionary Society was still convinced that southwest Louisiana and southeast Texas† with more calls from both French- and English-speaking people than could be responded to, comprised an inviting field for missionary labor.²³⁴

Very few of the numerous efforts met with enduring success as French language missions, although in 1895 appropriations were still made to Central Illinois, Louisiana, New Hampshire, and Troy Conferences to a total of $3,200. The policy of the Missionary Society was to encourage the French converts to ally themselves with English-speaking churches as rapidly as they acquired facility in the use of the language. This policy, together with the desire of the converts to gain for their children and themselves the social and economic advantage of fellowship with a large body of American people, was a constant drain upon the missions. Those who could speak only French found great difficulty in finding satisfactory employment and consequently did not remain long in any one location. Finally, as J. M. Reid states, a serious dearth existed of "devoted, earnest, cultivated" men, able to speak both French and English, to serve as missionaries. To say, as Reid does, that the missions "gradually faded out of existence" might easily be misconstrued.²³⁵ The seed sown by evangelical missionaries in many instances fell upon good ground and brought forth fruit. Converts of the missions—precisely how many it is impossible to say—united with English-speaking churches. Others who did not do so encouraged their children to attend evangelical Sunday schools and many of these became earnest Christians. Still others who continued a nominal relationship with the Roman Catholic Church had a clearer understanding of the Christian faith and a stronger grasp on the verities of the Gospel of Christ.

GERMAN MISSIONS

A larger number of missions were organized among the Germans than among any other foreign language group. Within a few years after their beginning under Nast's leadership*—by 1845—missions had been established in the East in the New York, New Jersey, Philadelphia, and Baltimore Annual Conferences, and in the West and Southwest in the Pittsburgh Conference (in Pennsylvania and West Virginia), and in the states of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, Alabama, and Mississippi. Five years later (1850) the number of missions had increased to ninety, missionaries to 108. By 1870 the German Methodist Societies numbered 457 with 26,185 members. So rapid was the development that all scepticism regarding their value was dissipated and those who had opposed their beginning became ardent advocates.²³⁶ In 1847 the editor of the Christian Advocate wrote:

for our own part, we cannot help thinking the German mission is now . . . the most important interest of the Church. . . . Verily we know of no foreign field which can compare with the domestic German mission, as it regards the prospects of good.²³⁷

The action of the General Conference of 1844 grouping the German Societies into three German language Districts foreshadowed the organization of German Annual Conferences.† The fact that the German missions were very widely scattered and the further consideration that the measure was not unanimously favored by the German preachers themselves—at the 1852 General Conference one whole German District in Ohio being opposed—delayed the necessary enabling legislation. When the General Conference of 1864 met action could not longer be delayed.²³⁸ On recommendation of its Committee on German Work the Conference authorized the organization of three Annual Conferences—the Central, the Southwest, and the Northwest—and gave authority to the New York Conference under its presiding Bishop to form its German work into an Annual Conference. The three were soon organized but the fourth, the East German Conference, was not formed until April 11, 1866.‡ The 1872 General Conference authorized the division of the

* See Vol. I, 274 ff.

† Conviction steadily grew in the Church that the masses of German immigrants could be effectually reached religiously only through the medium of the German language. The Committee on the State of the Church reported to the 1868 General Conference: "For, aside from the exertions which Roman Catholicism and the Protestant bodies springing from the State Church of the Fatherland are making to maintain the German language . . . , and aside from the same exertions put forth by the vast number of German organizations, . . . the German press exerts an influence that the American public have no proper conception of. . . . So great is the influence of this German element, that the German language is taught in the public schools of several States of the Union, and the public documents are constantly published in German by State authority, . . ."—G. C. Journal, 1868, Appendix, pp. 568 f.

‡ The Central German Conference, the first to be formed, was organized in Cincinnati, Ohio, on Aug. 24, 1864, with seventy-seven preachers as charter members. On Sept. 7, 1864, the Northwest German Conference was organized in Galena, Ill., with sixty-three members. The organizing session of the Southwest German Conference met in the Washington Street Church, St. Louis, on Sept. 29, 1864. It incorporated in its membership five German Districts, with seventy ministers, from nine English-speaking Conferences. The East German Conference was the smallest of the four, having

Northwest Conference and on September 19 the Chicago German Conference was organized.²³⁹

The Southern German Conference was organized in Industry, Texas, on January 15, 1874. A Methodist Class in New Orleans in the winter of 1840-41 marked the beginning of German Methodist missionary activity in Louisiana and Texas. Need for a vigorous program was created by increased German immigration between 1845 and 1850 but association of missionaries from the North with Negroes created general hostility toward these leaders of the German settlers. Numerous complications developed, as vividly narrated by Paul F. Douglass in The Story of German Methodism, but despite difficulties and dangers that would have daunted any but men of strong hearts and rugged faith thirteen preachers proceeded to form an Annual Conference.²⁴⁰

An enabling act was passed by the General Conference of 1876 authorizing the division of the Southwest German Conference. This was accomplished by the organization of the St. Louis German Conference on September 3, 1879, with eighty-one members, and the formation of the West German Conference a few days later by thirty-seven preachers. Of all the German Conferences the latter was one of the slowest to increase in membership. It had an almost boundless area, including the states of Kansas, Nebraska, and Colorado, and parts of Missouri and Iowa, in which the German population was in widely separated settlements. Under these conditions growth of the churches was understandably slow, but by 1895 churches had increased to 117 in number, and members to 6,104.²⁴¹

In the early eighties there was an immense influx of German immigrants into the Northwest, most of whom settled in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and North Dakota—probably a larger proportion in Wisconsin than in any other region. By 1884 the area within which German churches had been planted had become so vast that the establishment of another Conference was clearly necessary. The Northern German Conference authorized by the General Conference of 1884* held its first session in Minneapolis on October 12, 1887. Eight years after organization it had ninety-two churches and 4,976 members.²⁴²

As early as 1855, a Methodist missionary, Augustus Kellner, appointed by Bishop Osmon C. Baker, had begun to preach to the Germans in San Francisco. The following year missions were begun in Stockton and Sacramento. Progress was slow, but in 1874 a German District was formed, G. H. Bollinger, Presiding Elder, with seven appointments in California and one—Portland—in Oregon. Full members numbered only 214. Not until 1880 only twenty-eight charter members. (Paul F. Douglass, The Story of German Methodism . . . , pp. 80 f.) The Chicago German Conference, set off from the Northwest Conference, with fifty members, comprised the Societies in Wisconsin, northeastern Illinois, and parts of Indiana.—G. C. Journal, 1872, pp. 345, 419; Discipline, 1872, pp. 217 f.; Gen'l Minutes, 1864, pp. 158 f., 228 f., 141 f., ibid., 1866, p. 116, ibid., 1872, p. 55.

* Creation of the Northern German Conference was made possible by the division of the Northwest German Conference, the latter retaining its former name.—Gen'l Minutes, Fall, 1887, pp. 319 f., 301 f.; G. C. Journal, 1884, p. 415.

were the California missions accorded recognition by General Conference and then merely by the obvious statement that the "German work on the Pacific coast shall be connected with the Conferences within whose bounds the respective charges . . . [are] situated." In 1891, in accordance with the authorization of the 1888 General Conference, the California German Conference was organized. The Conference was never large, reaching its maximum number of Societies, nineteen, in 1898.

In 1879 Frederick Bonn was appointed to the Portland Mission. Beginning about this time emigration to the north Pacific coast rapidly increased, and a number of Methodist Societies were formed, which were linked together in 1883 in a German District of the Oregon Conference. In 1888 the North Pacific German Mission was organized, George Hartung, Superintendent, with fourteen appointments. In 1893 he reported five missions in Oregon, ten in Washington and one in Montana, including in all seventeen mission-aries, thirty-five preaching places, twenty churches, and 728 members.²⁴³

With the organization of the California German Conference (1891) the Methodist Episcopal Church had in the United States nine German language Conferences.* Many years before (1868) the General Conference had declared that the separate German language work had already fully justified itself:

By it the German Preachers were not, as was feared by some, estranged from the Church, but more fully engrafted into it Formed into Conferences our German Preachers have come nearer not only to their German countrymen, but also to their English speaking brethren and fellow-citizens,²⁴⁴

The saga of early American Methodism was repeated in the experience and labors of the German missionaries. For them conversion involved struggle and deep searching of heart and the resulting experience was profound. Many of them came to the United States as Roman Catholics and transition to the evangelical faith and life was not easy. They entered the ministry with a burning zeal for the conversion of their fellow countrymen which put "in motion all the machinery of the mission." The editor of the Christian Advocate on a trip to the Central West in 1847 had opportunity to meet and converse with many of the German preachers, particularly at the Ohio Conference. He found most of them to be recent converts, truly evangelical in doctrine and experience. He wrote:

The general characteristics of the preachers of whom we speak, are distinctly of the primitive Methodist cast. There is an apparent self-conviction of the truth, both in regard to doctrines and experience, which they preach Hence there is a general singleness and earnestness of purpose to save souls by the preaching of the Gospel—the whole counsel of God. And this oneness of purpose, and earnestness of heart, is the great secret of their success.²⁴⁵

* With the reorganization of the North Pacific German Mission Conference, in September, 1905, as the Pacific Annual Conference, German language Methodism in the United States completed its organizational growth.

“We have now,” Adam Miller stated, “in connection with the Ohio Conference forty-three German missionaries, who indeed appear to be men of one heart and one mind; whose whole aim appears to be a constant effort to bring their countrymen to a knowledge of the truth.”

Many of the German Districts and Circuits embraced large areas requiring extensive travel. The Pittsburgh German Mission District in 1845-46, for example, extended from Cleveland, Ohio, south to Maysville, Kentucky, and the Presiding Elder, C. H. Doering, traveled about twelve hundred miles on each quarterly round of the missions.²⁴⁶ As the English-speaking Circuit Riders of an earlier generation had done, the German missionaries preached wherever they found an open door. At Monroe, Michigan, Peter Schmucker, Presiding Elder, located “an old Presbyterian Church” and succeeded in renting it for the Conference year for $30. The preacher at Detroit procured at “a reasonable rent” a “good school-house to preach in.”²⁴⁷ Appointed to the Second German Mission in New York City in the spring of 1847, John J. Grau began his work by holding “prayer meetings and class meetings in private houses, after the old Methodist style.” In the beginning, for want of a better preaching place, he convened his hearers “under a miserable shed in the burying ground in Forty-fourth street.” Within the first year a board of trustees was elected and a house on Thirty-sixth Street purchased “at a reasonable price.”²⁴⁸

This last instance illustrates the enterprise of the German converts in providing places of worship. Many of them were poor but they were thrifty and industrious and contributed with exceptional generosity for the purchase or building of houses of worship. With or without Missionary Society aid no German Society was long without a church edifice. The Captina Mission Circuit, Pittsburgh District, in 1844-45 reported a membership of 150, many of whom were from Switzerland. Although “generally poor, and unable to give much money” they managed to build three neat log-house churches, one of which, named Bethel, they “located on the highest hill they could find.”²⁴⁹ A correspondent of the Christian Advocate writing in 1855 from the Quincy District, Illinois Conference, after stating that more than three hundred persons had been received on probation, continued:

While we have a large increase of membership we are building four new churches; have finished two that had been commenced last year, and bought one, of our American brethren, at West Point, Iowa. Three of these churches are good frame buildings, three brick, and one stone, and, with the exception of two, they are nearly all paid for.²⁵⁰

Within thirty-five years from the beginning of Methodist German missions more than five hundred churches had been built and almost two hundred and fifty parsonages. By 1895 the German Annual and Mission Conferences reported 65,459 full members, of whom 9,340 were in Europe.

What had been done in the building of churches was matched by the founding and development of other religious, educational, and philanthropic institutions. Noteworthy also was the support of missions by German churches and Conferences. In 1868 the General Conference Committee on the State of the Church commented on the fact that missionary contributions per member of the German Societies were fifteen per cent higher than the average for the Church as a whole.²⁵¹

German Methodists were a reading people. When the German Methodist church membership numbered seven thousand the circulation of Der Christliche Apologete was four thousand, which indicated that the paper was in practically every German Methodist home. "A religious paper taken at the rate of one to every two members of the Church," declared the Missionary Society, "is a fact nowhere to be found" outside the German missions.²⁵² The circulation of the Sunday-school periodicals, the Sonntägschule Glocke and the Bibelforscher, was also phenomenally large.

The pioneers of German Methodism in America, wrote Bishop John L. Nuelsen, "were men of broad German culture, who had enjoyed careful religious training." What they had received from this "training, from German intellectual discipline, from German theology," they built into the churches they founded.

The historic mission of German Methodism in America was to represent in American . . . Protestantism the best parts of German religious life, the power of intense spirituality, the cultivation of the inner life, in the forms of a sane mysticism, the value of systematic, thoroughgoing religious instruction of the children, [and] the steady influence of loyalty to the revealed Word of God, . . .²⁵³

SCANDINAVIAN MISSIONS

Scandinavian immigration was distinguished from that of all other European peoples by its overwhelmingly Protestant character. While other immigrant groups were rapidly increasing the Roman Catholic population, those from Scandinavia—Sweden, Norway, and Denmark—were materially strengthening American Protestantism.

Scandinavians were highly desirable as citizens since they had a high degree of literacy, came from countries whose civic traditions, laws, and political institutions are similar to those of America; and invariably migrated with the purpose of becoming American citizens and founding permanent homes.²⁵⁴ For these reasons immigration from Scandinavian countries was deliberately stimulated by state agencies for regions where increased population was desired. In the decade 1850-60 Illinois and Wisconsin received the largest number of Scandinavian immigrants, with a considerable contingent settling in Iowa. By 1870 Minnesota had moved into first place. Twenty years later (1890) the state "had within her borders 236,670 foreign-born Northmen, and enough of the second generation to make her Scandinavian population 466,365, or about one-fifth that of Denmark or Norway." Immigration into the Dakotas was not considerable until the seventies, the census of 1880 showing 17,869 Scandinavian settlers, and that of 1890 more than 65,000. Beginning about 1880 a larger number of the immigrants were city dwellers. Many of these located in the industrial centers of the East. Some, however, pushed on to the large manufacturing and business cities of the Middle West, particularly Chicago.²⁵⁵

Wherever they settled, Scandinavians furnished fertile ground for Methodist missionary tillage. In the beginning of missionary activities among the Swedes, Norwegians, and Danes in various sections of the country a common practice was to establish a Scandinavian mission with the idea of grouping the three nationalities together. The mission in New York City was an exception in that while the purpose was to serve all Scandinavians the enterprise was called the "Swedish Mission." In Minnesota the Scandinavian missions at first included Norwegians, Swedes, and Danes but, after a few years, a spirit of jealousy and antagonism developed which seemed to make separate Societies necessary. Chauncey Hobart, who was for many years a pastor and Presiding Elder, describes the situation:

This divergence and tendency to differ with each other[']s] management were especially noticeable among the Swedes and Norwegians. The conference did what seemed wisest and best at the time in endeavoring to consider these often recurring differences as of secondary importance, which could, with abundant brotherly kindness, be kept in subjection if not entirely eradicated. But after a fair and earnest trial, the church was obliged to yield to what appeared to be the inevitable.²⁵⁶

Swedish Missions.—Religion played an important role in the emigration from Sweden. As George M. Stephenson writes in his Religious Aspects of Swedish Immigration:

It is by no means purely accidental that the confluence of various forms of dissatisfaction with the state church coincided with the beginnings of emigration from Sweden. The rationalism of Voltaire and the pietism of Puritanism and Methodism joined forces in jarring loose the moorings that hitherto had held the individual fast. Dissenters brought persecution, persecution brought indignation, indignation brought agitation, and agitation brought reforms—and also emigration.²⁵⁷

Many of the Swedish immigrants arriving in America had a natural affinity for Methodism because of their pietistic background and particularly their association with an evangelical movement which had its beginning in the preaching of George Scott,* an English Methodist preacher and missionary.

* George Scott was sent to Sweden in 1830 by the Wesleyan Missionary Society primarily to minister to a little colony of English foundry workers in Stockholm. He was not the kind of man who hid his light under a bushel. Within a short time he learned to speak Swedish and began to preach in both English and Swedish. Crowds of people flocked to his services. He was instrumental in founding

Instead of waiting for the Annual Conferences or the Missionary Society to act in establishing missions they proceeded to act on their own initiative. In this particular the Scandinavian missions were unique.

Peter Magnus Johnson arrived in Boston from Sweden on July 2, 1857, and went on to Wisconsin where in March, 1858, he experienced a Methodist conversion. The next year he moved to Kandiyohi, Minnesota. Read in his own words what happened:

Some people from Sweden lived here and there, but they were as sheep without a shepherd. What was there to do in both the spiritual and temporal poverty? Well, I decided in the name of the Lord to seek them out and worked up three or four preaching places. To the closest I had 13 miles to walk; to the next . . . 6 miles; and to Lake Ripley an additional 8 miles.²⁵⁸

John Linn's case was somewhat similar. On October 9, 1849, he arrived at Swede Point, Iowa, and later moved to Swede Bend. As he listened to a Swedish Methodist preacher a new light dawned in his soul and hardly had the preacher sat down than Linn was on his feet with a ringing testimony. The same day he was appointed Class Leader, and later was given oral license as an Exhorter. In 1857 he received license to preach and in 1868 was received on trial in the Central Illinois Conference and soon became Presiding Elder. When he was ordained an elder Linn suggested to the Bishop that he ought first receive him into full membership in the Church. To this the Bishop replied that "it was not exactly the thing to do, to receive a man into full membership in the church, who had already been a presiding elder in a territory that was as big as a kingdom."²⁵⁹

One of the few Swedes who had come to America in the eighteen twenties was a youth who, under God, was destined to have a major part in the founding and growth of Methodist Swedish missions. Olof Gustaf Hedström* at twenty-two shipped as a sailor on a vessel bound for South America. It was diverted from its course and in 1825 entered the port of New York where it was sold. In 1829 he experienced conversion and in 1835 he was received on trial in the New York Conference and appointed to the Charlotte Circuit. Peter Bergner, also a Swede and a zealous layman, became concerned for the spiritual welfare of Scandinavian sailors, thousands of whom the Swedish Temperance Society, the Swedish Missionary Society, and a widely circulated religious periodical. Following a visit to America he ran into a storm of opposition provoked in large part by printed reports of his American speeches. "He was lampooned in the public Press, spat upon in the streets, driven from his pulpit, and mobbed in his house." In 1842 he was compelled by a Swedish conventional placard, and by instructions from the Wesleyan Society, to return to England, but during the brief period of his stay he had lighted an evangelical fire that continued for decades to burn in the souls of many thousands of Swedish people.—G. G. Findlay and W. W. Holdsworth, History of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, IV, 424-26; Henry C. Whyman, "The Conflict and Adjustment of Two Religious Cultures—The Swedish and the American . . .," typewritten ms., pp. 46 f

* Olof Gustaf Hedström (1803-77) was born in the province of Kronberg, Sweden. Finding himself stranded in New York he had no choice but to remain in the United States. He at first found work in a tailor shop and later conducted a shop of his own in Pittsville, Pa. On June 11, 1829, he married Caroline Pinckney and in the same year, under his wife's influence, he was converted and immediately became active in Christian work. He continued in charge of the Bethel Ship Mission until 1875, when illness compelled him to retire.

visited the New York harbor every year. The services on shipboard which he began soon revealed possibilities and he turned to the Missionary Society for aid. David Terry, then a city missionary, advised Bergner to correspond with Hedström, then pastor of Plattsville Circuit, urging him to establish a Bethel Ship Mission.

Meanwhile the Missionary Society cooperated by enlisting the financial assistance of George T. Cobb, William G. Boggs, and others—most of whom were members of Asbury Church. With their aid the Society purchased an old condemned brig—the Henry Leeds, lying at Pier No. 11, North River—remodeled it as a meeting place, created a board of trustees to hold the property, and rechristened the ship “John Wesley.” J. M. Reid tells the remainder of the story:

The New York Conference convened in the Forsyth street Church, in the city of New York, on the 11th of May, 1845. Pastor Hedström, still uncommitted to this work, came to attend the conference. He was ascending the steps of the church when Rev. David Terry, who had been the chief promoter of the enterprise, lying in wait for him, seized him and guided him to the house of Peter Bergner The Pastor and Bergner exchanged a few words in their native tongue, and wept together. Then all knelt down, and prayed. . . . When they arose the doubts of Mr. Hedström were gone, and he at once said, ‘I think it is of the Lord, and if the conference appoint me I will come.’

. . . at the close of the conference, among the first appointments read was, ‘North River Mission, O. G. Hedström,’ the Missionary Board having, in the meantime, made provision for the support of the missionary.²⁶⁰

The first sermon in the Bethel Ship was preached on May 25, 1845, to a congregation of more than fifty persons. A Methodist Society was organized which within a few months had a membership of forty-five of whom twenty-three were seamen and six others were either wives or mothers of seamen. The Sunday school at the same time had an enrollment of seventy-eight pupils. Hedström’s custom was to meet all incoming ships from Scandinavian countries, distribute Bibles, sermons, and tracts, and invite the immigrants to visit the Bethel Ship. At the close of his first year Hedström wrote that the ship had been “a temporary asylum to several . . . families, who . . . [had] arrived . . . in destitute circumstances. Your missionary has frequently had the happiness of feeding the hungry, clothing the naked, visiting the widow and the fatherless, taking in the stranger, and in some instances it has been his privilege to ‘entertain angels.’”²⁶¹

Peter Bergner was an effective helper and for the last twelve years of his life worked among the immigrants as a Bible colporteur. When it was found that there were many Germans living in the vicinity of the Bethel, arrangements were made for a German preaching service on Sunday afternoons.

Hedström stressed the importance of temperance and frugality and it was estimated that within a few years Scandinavian seamen had deposited not less than one million dollars in the Seamen's Savings Bank alone. He so continuously counseled immigrants on where to settle that he has been credited with having no small part in determining the course of Swedish immigration. It was largely through his influence and that of his brother Jonas* that the settlement of Swedes in and about Victoria, Illinois, was built up in the later forties. He made extensive missionary journeys to Swedish settlements in different parts of the country and was instrumental in 1852 in organizing Methodist Societies in Jamestown, New York, Chandler's Valley, Pennsylvania, and Chicago.²⁶²

Of the immense immigration during the late forties a large part of all nationalities entered through the port of New York. In 1848 the average was more than five hundred immigrants daily. Of these the majority landed in the vicinity of the Bethel Ship with the result that not only Swedes but people of almost all nations attended religious services at the mission. Many of them were poor and unable without assistance to get to their ultimate destination. "The correspondence of this mission," he wrote in 1849, "increases every year."

The labors of the missionary, in his study alone, when he must receive officers and crew, strangers from far and near, answer their inquiries, resolve their doubts, instruct their ignorance, and lead them to the Lamb of God, are sufficient to engross the time, and exhaust the strength of one man. The results of these labors have extended to some of the extreme parts of the earth.²⁶³

Associated with Hedström from time to time as coworkers were several Swedish preachers, some of whom were converts of the mission. One of his effective helpers was Sven B. Newman who transferred from the Alabama Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in 1851 and for several years during 1851-58 intermittently rendered efficient service. In 1860, because of Hedström's failing health, A. M. Osbon was appointed Superintendent of the mission. Another efficient coworker was Ole P. Petersen, who gave himself particularly to work among Norwegian and Danish seamen. In 1873 Daniel S. Sörlin was admitted into full connection in the Central Illinois Conference and in 1874 came to New York and was made pastor of the Bethel, Hedström that year having been given the superannuated relation. Two years later Sörlin was appointed pastor of May Street Swedish Church in Chicago.²⁶⁴

In the meantime important changes had been made in plans and methods of the mission. In 1857 the old ship was sold. A new vessel was purchased which in 1876 was moved from the foot of Carlisle Street on the North River to the foot of Harrison Street, Brooklyn, and still later to Jersey City.

* Jonas J. Hedström was converted in the course of a visit of his brother Olof to Sweden in 1833. The two brothers returned together to America where Jonas found employment as a blacksmith, first in New York and later in Pennsylvania. In 1837 or 1838 he removed to Knox County, Ill., possibly in company with Peter Sornborger. In the latter year he is known to have worked at his trade in Farmington, Ill. He became an Exhorter and later a Local Preacher on the Canton Circuit.

Gradually the mission operations were transferred from ship to shore and at last the floating chapel was sold.* Olof Hedström, against his earlier judgment, finally recognized the importance of a permanent church center for the members living in Brooklyn. He was instrumental in raising funds for the Swedish Immanuel Church, dedicated in May, 1872, which became the corporate successor of the Bethel Ship.²⁶⁵

Another group of Bethel Ship members became the nucleus of the Lexington Avenue Swedish Methodist Church in New York City. Worship services were begun in 1874 but the congregation was without a stationed pastor until 1881 when A. G. Johnson was appointed, and later it was regularly organized as a Methodist Society. After Castle Garden was established in 1855 as a reception place for immigrants, many came ashore at Battery Park, far removed from the Bethel Ship. As a means of making contact with newcomers immediately upon their arrival the Battery Park Mission was established in 1888 with Charles Samuelson in charge. The City Missionary Society provided quarters for the newly organized church, which, under Samuelson's leadership, enjoyed a healthy growth.²⁶⁶

In the early years of the Scandinavian immigration a Swedish settlement of some size was established in Chautauqua County, New York. A mission Circuit centering in Jamestown, Erie Conference, was formed about 1853 by Olaf Hamren. His death in 1854 caused the work to suffer but it was revived under the ministries of J. Bredberg, appointed in 1855, and Sven B. Newman who came to it in 1859. In 1860 the Circuit had outlying appointments in Salem, Wrightsville, Columbus, and Sugar Grove, Pennsylvania. The membership of these Societies was small, consisting mostly of day laborers, industrious and frugal. A small church was erected in Jamestown, but Swedish immigration to that section of the country declined and as the young people preferred English language churches growth gradually decreased.²⁶⁷

Little missionary work seems to have been undertaken among the early Swedish immigrants in New England. One of the first Societies was in the manufacturing district of Quinsigamond, in Worcester, Massachusetts, which was maintained for some years without a resident pastor. It first appeared in the New England Conference Minutes in 1879 with Otto Anderson as pastor. It was left to be supplied in 1880 when Anderson was appointed to the Boston Swedish Mission. As an outgrowth of this latter Society, small churches were organized in Lynn, Malden, Lowell, Campello, and Brockton. By 1895 ten Swedish churches were reported with 1,541 members.²⁶⁸

The first outreach of the Bethel Ship Mission to the West was to Victoria, Knox County, Illinois. The connecting link was established when on December 15, 1846, Jonas J. Hedström organized a Methodist church in Victoria, of which he himself became pastor. The Society was the only Swedish church in the community and within a few years most of the Swedish families in the village and surrounding countryside became members. In 1854 a church building was erected.

Jonas J. Hedström possessed a genuine missionary spirit. He visited all communities settled by his countrymen and urged them to organize Methodist Societies. He "laid the groundwork" for the churches in Andover, Galesburg, Knoxville, La Fayette, Rock Island, and Moline, in Illinois, and New Sweden, Iowa. At the 1848 Rock River Conference he was received on trial and appointed to the "Swede Mission." He enlisted several other Swedish immigrants as itinerants and formed for them a schedule of visitation and preaching.

The preachers were as a rule young and inexperienced men and needed the help of an older experienced man, one who in the beginning carried the whole responsibility for the various churches and helped to solve rising problems. . . . Coming from the rank and file of the people, simple in language and habits, serious in all his work, with a good insight in the doctrines and calm head for business, he was a born leader to whom the younger ones could look up with respect and confidence. . . . He instructed them in accordance with the discipline to visit from house to house and considered it almost a sin to go by a door that was open for them. But they should not stay long in any one place, and they were warned against long prayers.²⁶⁹

John Chandler, acting temporarily as Presiding Elder of the Rock Island District, Rock River Conference, 1853, reported four missionaries laboring "in connection with the Swedish and Norwegian missions," and three others ready to enlist in the work. Although converts were numerous, he stated, church membership did not rapidly increase because of the removal of many to new locations and transfer of others to English-speaking churches. Lack of church buildings also hindered growth as the Swedes were accustomed to churches for worship and did not relish meeting in schoolhouses. At the same time, accustomed to a tax-supported Church, they were inclined to feel that the economic resources of a small congregation were not equal to the obligation imposed by an organized church. In 1854 the Society at Andover erected a church from sawed lumber cut in a nearby forest. Two churches in other places were almost completed.²⁷⁰

The Hedström brothers held meetings in Chicago in 1852 which resulted in a religious revival and the beginning of Scandinavian Methodism in the city. In 1853 Sven B. Newman was placed in charge of the Chicago mission. He not only preached in Chicago but also established preaching places in Beaver, St. Charles, and Rockford. Three lots were bought on Illinois Street on which a church was erected in 1854—known as Scandinavian because a large proportion of the members were Norwegians.²⁷¹

The Peoria Conference* at its first session, in 1856, included all of the Swedish Societies under the head of the "Swede Mission," with J. J. Hedström, Peter Challman, Victor Witting, and Peter Newborg as missionaries. At the 1857 session of the Conference Hedström was granted the superannuated relation and Peter Challman* was designated Presiding Elder of the Swedish Mission District, which included eight missions. Challman was reappointed for eight successive years (1858-65). In 1866 the District included missions in the three states, Illinois, Iowa, and Indiana. One of the most widely extended of the mission Circuits was Andover, with nine preaching places, of which some were as much as forty miles apart.²⁷² In 1850 Hedström had twice crossed the Mississippi into Jefferson County, Iowa, held revival meetings, and at New Sweden organized a Society of sixty members—the beginning of Swedish Methodism in Iowa. Two additional Societies were organized in 1851. The next year (1852) Hedström reported the work in the Iowa Conference "in a prosperous condition," but without specifically identifying them spoke only of two Societies and three preaching places. In 1853 the Iowa Conference received on trial J. G. Schmidt, a Baptist preacher, and recognized his orders. His appointment read: "Mission to the Swedes," Burlington District. In 1854 Andrew Ericson was given charge of the Swedish congregation at New Sweden and was asked to exercise supervision of missionary activities over an area extending from Burlington, on the Mississippi River, two hundred miles to the west. In this same year a Society was organized in Swede Bend, Webster County, 175 miles west of New Sweden.²⁷³

While pastor in Chicago S. B. Newman established preaching places in Attica, La Fayette, La Porte, and other Indiana cities. These early Swedish missions owed much to John Wigren, a convert of the Bethel Ship, who in 1853 removed to Attica, Indiana, became a Class Leader and in 1858 a Local Preacher. In 1863 he gave himself wholly to the ministry and was appointed to the Indiana Swedish Mission with Beaver, Illinois, as a center. He preached also in Yorktown, Tippecanoe Battle Ground, Buena Vista, and Oxford. In 1866 he was received on trial in the Central Illinois Conference and continued in the active ministry until 1893. His energies "were especially directed toward the building of churches and parsonages and soliciting funds for various purposes."²⁷⁴

One of the first, if not the first, of the Swedish Methodist churches in

* Peter Challman (1823-1900) was a man of exceptional energy and impressive personality. He came to America in 1846 as an apostle of the Erik Janssonist sect and became a member of the sect's communistic colony at Bishop Hill. Within a year he became disillusioned concerning the extravagant religious claims of Jansson and the dominant practices of the colony. In 1847 he went to Galesburg and soon, at the urging of Jonas Hedström, began preaching, at the same time working as a carpenter. In January, 1850, he formed a group of twelve Swedes—some of them Methodist lay preachers—to seek for gold in California. The expedition had little success and in 1851 Challman, with several others, returned to Illinois. In 1853 he was received on trial in the Rock River Conference. In 1865, after his long term as Presiding Elder, he served for one year as pastor at Bishop Hill and then—after a trip to Sweden—settled on his farm in Knox County, affiliated with the Free Methodist Church and engaged in local missionary work for the denomination. In 1884 he removed to Iowa where he renewed his affiliation with the Methodist Episcopal Church.—Ernst Wilhelm Olson, Ed., History of the Swedes of Illinois, Part I, 363-66.

Minnesota was formed in 1853 in St. Paul by Christian B. Willerup—a Danish missionary—who, after holding evangelistic meetings in the city in 1852, returned the next year and organized a number of the Swedish converts into a Society. In 1854 Carl P. Agrelius, formerly a minister in the Church of Sweden, was transferred to the Minnesota Conference to undertake work chiefly among the Swedes.²⁷⁵

David Brooks, Presiding Elder of the Minnesota Mission District, stated in the Christian Advocate of August 24, 1854, that a church for the Swedes at St. Paul was nearing completion, the Society to be under the care of Agrelius, "our missionary to the Swedes in that district." His most effective work, according to Hobart, was done "in 1855, in Chisago County"—some distance northeast of St. Paul—where "were large settlements of Swedes." He built himself "a log house on the shore of Chisago Lake, and subsisted mostly on the fish which he caught in the lake." In the summer of 1858 the first Swedish Methodist Camp Meeting was held in a grove on the shore of the lake.²⁷⁶

In 1859 in the Minnesota Conference a Scandinavian Mission District was formed, to include the Swedish missions in Minnesota, the Norwegian and Danish work in Upper Iowa, and the Rush River and Willow River Circuit in Wisconsin, with Eric Shogren as Presiding Elder. He was succeeded, after three years, by Carl G. Forsberg who gave only indifferent leadership. Progress was so slow that it caused a divided attitude within the Minnesota Conference toward Scandinavian missions, an influential factor being the failure of any of the charges to attain full self-support. A Conference committee reported in 1869:

We find very general dissatisfaction prevails among them (the Scandinavians), and the work is in a very critical condition. We find that there . . . [have] been no additions to the ministry, growing out of their work, for several years. Young men are not encouraged to enter the ministry . . . We do not deem it advisable that the present incumbent be returned to the superintendency of the work.²⁷⁷

While the report failed of adoption, when the appointments were made Bishop Levi Scott replaced the Presiding Elder.

In 1872 separate Swedish and Norwegian Districts were established. The Swedish District had only six charges: St. Paul and Minneapolis; Red Wing, Vasa, and Goodhue; Stillwater and Mound Prairie; Grantsburg; Duluth and Brainerd; Kandiyohi. All were in Minnesota with the exception of Grantsburg, Wisconsin.²⁷⁸ In 1873 the District reported only 283 full members and 140 probationers, and three years later, the last year of its connection with the Minnesota Conference, eleven charges, of which all were Circuits, with 487 full members and 100 probationers.²⁷⁹

Missionary work among the Swedish settlers in Texas was begun about 1873 by the Texas Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and in 1881 three Swedish appointments were listed within the Austin Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, two in Austin and one at Round Rock. The 1883 Minutes listed an appointment also in Fort Worth and Dallas but only two in the Austin District were recorded.²⁸⁰

Methodist Societies were formed among Swedes in California in the early seventies, and in 1892 were brought together in a Swedish District. The Minutes for 1895 show nine charges, with 351 members. In 1881 missionary work was begun among Swedish immigrants in Oregon and Washington. This resulted in 1890 in the organization of a Swedish District in the Puget Sound Conference with eleven appointments in these two states. The membership in 1895 was one hundred and ninety.²⁸¹

A convention of Scandinavian preachers held in the interest of missions and education in Chicago in October, 1866, called for the inclusion of all Scandinavian missions in a single Annual Conference. This was the first expression within Methodism of desire for Scandinavian ecclesiastical solidarity. No representatives from Minnesota were present. The General Conference of 1868 voted against granting the request.²⁸²

The Chicago fire of 1871 caused severe loss to Swedish Methodists, perhaps proportionately greater than to any other nationality because of their concentration within a small north side area. However, they soon rallied and within a few years four churches had been established: Market Street, May Street, Shurtleff Avenue, and South Chicago.²⁸³

By 1876 the demand of the Swedish preachers for separate Conference organization had become so strong that the General Conference of that year was constrained to yield. The organizational meeting of the Northwest Swedish Conference* was held in Galesburg, Illinois, September 6-10, 1877—the Conference to embrace the Swedish work in the Central Illinois and Minnesota Conferences. By 1893 the thirty-two preachers of 1877 had increased to eighty-five; pastoral charges from thirty-five to a hundred; church buildings from forty-four to 131; and church members from 3,643 to 8,857.

The enabling act of the 1876 General Conference provided that the “Swedish and Norwegian work in the cities of New York and Brooklyn, and in the vicinity of those cities” should belong to the New York East Conference. In 1895 seven Swedish missions—one in New Jersey, two in Connecticut, and four in New York—reported 1,080 full members, five church buildings, and one parsonage. Of these, six received missionary appropriations, ranging from $240. to $760. each, a total of $3,000.²⁸⁴

Norwegian-Danish Missions.—The federal census of 1850 reported 18,074 Scandinavian-born immigrants in the United States of whom 12,678 were Norwegians. According to the 1870 census there were 114,243 people of Norwegian birth, a ninefold increase in twenty years. In the sixties there were several times more Norwegian ships than Swedish arriving in the New York harbor. Not until 1869 did as many as two thousand Danes enter the United States within a single year.

Among the many Norwegian converts in Hedström's Bethel Ship ministry was Ole Peter Petersen who soon after his conversion enlisted in Norwegian-Danish missionary activities in the West and also in Norway. Later he became associated with Hedström as assistant pastor of the Bethel Ship Mission. A Norwegian-Danish mission was organized and afterward a Methodist Society was formed under the name "Bethelskib Norske Methodismenighet," the Bethelship Norwegian Methodist Church.*

Many of the Norwegians were self-sufficient in the conduct of religious exercises. One wrote:

We conducted our religious meetings in our own democratic way. We appointed our leader and requested some one to read from a book of sermons. . . . We prayed, exhorted, and sang among ourselves, and even baptized our babies ourselves.²⁸⁵

The stubborn belief of the Norwegian pietists in the rightness of lay preaching constituted a common bond between them and the Methodists and within the Wisconsin area a general desire very early arose for a Christian missionary which led the Missionary Society to send to them Christian B. Willerup, one of their own people who had been converted in Savannah, Georgia. He arrived in Cambridge, Wisconsin, in November, 1850, and soon thereafter in a letter to the Society told of the beginning of his work:

I left Milwaukie for the country, and travelled West. I went out on the prairie to visit the families, and it was just like being in Norway. I heard no other language than the Norwegian—their dress, manners, customs, . . . were the same as in Norway.

I commenced to preach, sometimes in the school-house in the village, (there being no church,) and at other times in private houses (Norwegian houses) on the prairie. The news soon spread that a Norwegian preacher had arrived; and wherever I preached, from that time forth, the house was always crowded.²⁸⁶

Within a year a Methodist Society with about a hundred members had been organized and nearly $1,500. was subscribed toward the cost of a church building with construction under way. This amount fell short by about $800. Urgent appeals were made to Methodist friends in the East for assistance as the missionary had pledged most of his salary and had also given judgment notes to cover deficiency. Also in 1850 Carl P. Agrelius was

* Meetings of the Society at first were held both on the Bethel Ship and "in rented quarters on the corner of Van Brunt and President Streets," Brooklyn. sent to Spring Prairie, Wisconsin, for work among the Norwegians. In July, 1851, he was received on trial in the Wisconsin Conference.²⁸⁷

Meantime Norwegian immigration continued in increasing volume. A news item in the Christian Advocate of July 7, 1853, reported the arrival at Buffalo on June 25, 1853, of more than two hundred, bound for Milwaukee, possessed of "means to make a fair start on the virgin lands of the west."²⁸⁸ In 1856 the Wisconsin Conference formed a Norwegian Mission District, on which twelve missionaries were employed on nine mission Circuits in the three states, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Iowa. The six Wisconsin points were Racine, Primrose, Hart Prairie, Viroqua, Richland, and Cambridge. The three others were St. Paul and Chisago Lake in Minnesota, and Washington Prairie, Winneshiek County, Iowa, where in 1852 a Methodist Society had been formed by O. P. Petersen in the very center of Norwegian Lutheranism in the state.²⁸⁹

Obviously a District whose appointments were scattered over three states could not be other than administratively unsatisfactory. After an experimental period of four years the Scandinavian missions in Wisconsin were taken into the English language Districts within which they were situated—the Racine Mission and the Whitewater and Hart Prairie Mission into the Racine District, and the Cambridge Mission into the Janesville District of the Wisconsin Conference, and the Highland, Primrose, and Viroqua Norwegian missions into the West Wisconsin Conference. The Minnesota and Iowa missions—nine in number—were incorporated into the Scandinavian Mission District of the Minnesota Conference.²⁹⁰

But neither was this arrangement satisfactory and demand soon arose for separate Norwegian Mission Districts. Not until 1863, however, did report of a "Scandinavian" District appear in the Minutes. The next year it was renamed "Norwegian" and had six charges. This was in the West Wisconsin Conference. In 1869 this District was transferred to the Wisconsin Conference. In 1870 the District reported 618 full members.²⁹¹

The inclusion of both Norwegian and Swedish missions within a single District was displeasing to the Norwegians. The rising tide of nationalism in Norway was reflected in the attitude of many of the immigrants and the demand for a separate Norwegian District rapidly increased in intensity. Aside from nationalistic feeling Norwegian irritation rooted in the Swedish predominance.* The paper Sändebudet, intended for the entire Scandinavian constituency but printed entirely in Swedish, was an irritant. "Everything which is designated Scandinavian," wrote Andrew Haagenen of Wisconsin, "it seems, must be under Swedish leadership." He pressed the issue, citing

* C. G. Nelson, while recognizing that other causes contributed to the prevailing dissatisfaction, asserts that the difference in language was chiefly responsible. "Often the churches were composed of both peoples, each desiring to have bibles and song-books of their own language, which was impossible. The written language differed even more than the spoken, which in such cases was too often a conglomeration of both these languages."—"Swedish Methodism in Minnesota." in A History of the Swedish-Americans of Minnesota, Algot E. Strand, Compiler and Ed., I, 208.

the success of the Norwegian District in Wisconsin, and declaring that similar results would follow in Minnesota "if only the Norwegians come into their own right." In 1872 the division into separate Swedish and Norwegian Districts was made in that Conference.²⁹² However, the shortage of Norwegian preachers was such that of the nine appointments of the Norwegian District, four were left to be supplied. In 1874 the District with nine missionaries, eleven appointments, nine churches, and four parsonages, had 507 members in full connection, and 103 probationers.²⁹³ Hobart was critical of the 1872 division. It left, he said, many societies feeble and tended to cultivate a spirit of divergence which, to say the least, was contrary to that spirit which suffereth long and is kind. It also in many instances necessitated the sending of two preachers to small towns, where the two nationalities united could have sustained themselves.²⁹⁴

The great extent of the Norwegian District, including all of Minnesota and a large area of Iowa, led in 1876 to division into two Districts, the Iowa and the Minnesota.²⁹⁵ In 1880 the first Norwegian Annual Conference in the United States was established by General Conference. Changes in Conference designations and boundaries were made from quadrennium to quadrennium.*

Influenced by Mormon propagandizing efforts in Scandinavia many Norwegian, Danish,† and Swedish immigrants settled in Utah Territory. In 1884 the Missionary Society estimated the Scandinavian population at 40,000—probably an overestimate. At the 1882 meeting of the Utah Mission Peter A. H. Franklin, a native of Norway and a Mormon who had forsaken Mormonism and had united with the Methodist Church, was appointed to begin evangelistic work among his fellow Scandinavians. To reinforce the effort the General Missionary Committee appropriated sufficient funds to pay the salary of an additional missionary and to establish a Scandinavian school in Salt Lake City. The Rev. Martinus Nelson, pastor of the Second Norwegian Methodist Church of Chicago, was appointed in 1883 to superintend the program. In July, 1883, the First Norwegian Methodist Church of Salt

* The Conference established in 1880 was designated the Northwest Norwegian Conference to include "the Norwegian Work in the West and North-west." In 1884 the designation was changed to the Norwegian and Danish Conference to "include the Norwegian work in the West and North-west, and all the Danish work in the United States." In 1888 the boundary was again changed to "include all the work among the Norwegians and Danes between the Allegheny and the Rocky Mountains." In addition the General Conference established the Northwest Norwegian and Danish Mission to "include the Norwegian and Danish work in the State of Oregon and Washington Territory and in Northern Idaho." Finally, in 1892 the General Conference added the Scandinavian work in Montana, California, and Utah to the Northwest Norwegian and Danish Mission Conference and changed the name to the Western Norwegian-Danish Mission Conference. (G. C. Journals: 1880, p. 389; 1884, p. 410; 1888, pp. 413, 417; 1892, p. 416.) In 1881 the Northwest Norwegian Conference with two Districts and thirty-two charges reported 2,321 full members, forty-one Sunday schools, and forty-three churches. In 1892 the Norwegian and Danish Conference, with four Districts, had fifty-eight charges with 4,085 full members, seventy-one Sunday schools, and seventy-five churches; and the Western Norwegian-Danish Mission Conference with four Districts (California and Montana; Eastern Washington and Idaho; Oregon and Puget Sound; and Utah) had twenty-seven charges with 567 full members, twenty-five Sunday schools, and twenty-seven churches.—Gen'l Minutes, Fall, 1881, p. 414; ibid., 1892, pp. 476-78, 582 f.

† Proselytes to Mormonism among the Danes were numerous because of the strong Mormon Mission in Copenhagen. Of the 30,000 Danes in the United States in 1870, some 7,000 were Mormons in Utah.

Lake City was organized.²⁹⁶ Five years later Nelson reported organization of the Norwegian and Danish District of Utah Mission, with ten missionaries—eight men and two women—and fifteen teachers. The day schools had an enrollment of 555 pupils, of whom more than half were from Mormon families. During the five years nineteen churches, chapels, parsonages, and school-houses had been erected. The following year the first Scandinavian Camp Meeting in Utah was held, continuing for ten days. Sunday evening services were attended by more than a thousand people.²⁹⁷

The Norwegian and Danish missionary work on the West Coast was begun in Oakland, California, in 1879, by C. J. Larsen. He had come to California as a layman from the Norwegian-Danish Methodist Church in Chicago, but later was licensed to preach by the Swedish Methodist Church of San Francisco. A Methodist Class was organized and a church erected in Oakland and dedicated on June 13, 1880. This same year Larsen was received on trial in the California Conference.²⁹⁸

In 1883 Larsen transferred from the California to the Oregon Conference as a missionary to the Norwegians and Danes of Portland. He rented a hall and soon organized a Methodist Society of twelve members. Two years later he visited the Columbia River Conference and enlisted the cooperation of its members for missionary work within its bounds. The rapid unfolding of the program is told in his own words:

In 1886 I visited Idaho, where I found a great many of our people in Blain, Moscow, and other places. On my way home I visited Spokane Falls, Wash., where also a goodly number of our people lived. Thus society after society was organized, and churches and parsonages were built and dedicated to the service of the Lord in many of the most important places. In 1888 the work was organized as a separate Mission . . . , and called the North-west Norwegian and Danish Methodist Episcopal Mission. It included Oregon, Washington, and North Idaho, and the writer was appointed as the superintendent.²⁹⁹

In his report for 1891 the Superintendent stressed the hindrances to growth in the Northwest, particularly those resulting from unemployment and the consequent trend away from the cities, where most of the churches had been established.³⁰⁰

Scandinavian Education.—Scandinavian immigrants were education-minded, desirous not only for public schools but also for the religious education of their children and for the training of the ministry. A prime interest of the first general convention of Scandinavian preachers, held in Chicago in October, 1866, was in the establishment of a Scandinavian educational institution. Reports by delegates and preachers revealed that more than $20,000. had been contributed by their churches and in individual gifts to the Centenary Celebration. The convention then voted to approve a previously proposed plan to establish a school for candidates for the ministry and “as soon as time and conditions warrant, . . . to widen our plans to include a general seminary." The 1868 General Conference approved the plan for a ministerial training school and recommended to the Church at large an additional contribution of $25,000.³⁰¹

Unfortunately dissension led to rescinding of the action providing for a Scandinavian institution and the fund, all too limited in amount for achievement of the objective in view, was divided between the Swedes and the Norwegians and Danes. In 1870 the Swedish theological seminary began operations in Galesburg, Illinois, two students and a teacher meeting in the upper story of a private residence. In 1872 it was moved to Galva, Illinois, and in 1875, with encouragement from Northwestern University, to Evanston.*

The Norwegian-Danish Conference in 1883 authorized the beginning of class instruction in theology for ministerial students. Courses were first offered in 1885, and in 1888 a school building was completed in Evanston. For thirty-five years the seminary was in the charge of Nels E. Simonsen.

Publications in the Swedish and Norwegian languages exercised wide educational influence among the Scandinavian immigrants. The 1860 General Conference referred to the Publishing Agents a proposal for a Scandinavian paper. The Agents approved but were unwilling to subsidize publication. The preachers themselves assumed financial responsibility, Victor Witting serving until 1864 as editor without compensation. The periodical, the Sändebudet,† began publication in 1862 and soon became self-supporting. In New York Sven B. Newman translated and wrote some excellent tracts, and also translated some of Wesley's sermons and the Methodist ritual. A collection of hymns was compiled by Witting and in 1860 a hymnal by Jacob Bredberg. A monthly periodical, the Missionaren, in Norwegian, began publication in 1869 and was succeeded by Den Kristelig Talsmand in 1887. In 1888, Vidnesbyrdet, a semi-monthly Norwegian-Danish paper, was founded in Portland, Oregon, as the official organ of the Northwest Norwegian and Danish Mission.³⁰²

At the close of the half century the Missionary Society reported 206 Scandinavian missionaries—Swedish, Norwegian, and Danish. The total number of full members of the Church was 11,023; probationers, 1,509. Local Preachers numbered 139, churches and chapels, 193.³⁰³ Considering

* The university, under the difficult financial conditions prevailing at the time, found itself unable to provide even partial support of a teacher, whereupon the seminary found refuge in the home of the president, William Henschen, in Chicago. Until 1881, location was determined from year to year. Northwestern then offered the seminary a ninety-nine-year lease on land, and friends provided funds for a building. Henschen continued as teacher and for a number of years served as president of the institution which had taken the name of Wesley Academy and Seminary. In 1883 Albert F. Ericson, after a period of study in Sweden, became dean and a teacher in the institution. In 1889 Henschen was succeeded by Carl C. Wallenius who continued in office until 1931. In 1934 the Swedish and Norwegian-Danish schools were merged and a junior college, the Evanston Collegiate Institute, was organized with T. Otmann Firing as president. It continued under that name for sixteen years when, in 1950, it became Kendall College.—George M. Stephenson, A History of American Immigration, 1820-1924, pp. 259 ff.; Kendall College Bulletin, XIII (March-April, 1952), 5.

the immense Scandinavian immigration in the course of the half century, the wide scope of missionary endeavor, and the extent of missionary funds contributed, growth had been decidedly slow. In part this was accounted for by serious lack in ministerial supply. Some of the lay preachers failed to continue preaching for more than a few years; others were not competent and had only limited success in their ministry; and a considerable proportion of the more effective men were sent as missionaries to the fatherland. Few young men entered the ministry and the development of agencies of ministerial training lagged. Not until the later years of the period were well-equipped theological schools made available to candidates for the ministry. The Lutheran tradition was strong among both Swedes and Norwegians and the large majority of the settlers desired Lutheran services. In eleven years, 1874-85, congregations of the Augustana Synod increased from 75 to 145 and the number of communicants more than doubled. The Lutheran attitude toward the Methodist, Baptist, and Congregational missionary activities was less than generous, sometimes sharply antagonistic, and undoubtedly prejudiced many of the immigrants.

The Methodist Movement nevertheless exercised a much wider influence among the Scandinavians than its numerical strength would indicate. Together with the other evangelical bodies it helped to meet the religious, social, and cultural needs of large groups of people, it promoted education, and it developed fraternal relations between Scandinavians and peoples of other nationalities. In many isolated rural communities it provided social centers for the neighborhood as a whole and elevated the moral tone of the entire community.³⁰⁴

WELSH MISSIONS

Near the close of the eighteenth century a considerable Welsh migration to the United States began, which gradually increased during the second quarter of the nineteenth century. In the beginning most of the immigrants settled in central New York, particularly Oneida County; the remainder in New York City, in Pennsylvania, and elsewhere. Later newcomers pushed westward to Ohio, Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, Missouri, and some even to Colorado and California. A large proportion were Calvinistic Methodists and at an early date local Societies of the Calvinistic Methodist Church began to be formed on the initiative of the immigrants themselves.* Congregational churches also were organized.

* The Calvinistic Methodist Church of Wales, the fruit of George Whitefield's preaching, was early introduced to America by immigrants. Local churches, here and there, adhering to Presbyterian polity, in 1842 organized themselves into an independent branch of the parent Church, under an Organized Assembly, which continued until 1853. After a period of autonomous rule, the state bodies, or gymanvas, decided in 1869 once again to establish an over-all organization, the General Assembly. Though continuing "Methodist" in the official title, the Church was decidedly more Calvinistic in theology and polity and frequently called itself the "Welsh Presbyterian Church." In 1920, when the English language had supplanted Welsh, the denomination united with the Presbyterian Church, U.S.A.—Daniel Jenkins Williams, One Hundred Years of Welsh Calvinistic Methodism in America, pp. 258 f., 263, 268-75, 411 f.

Not all of the Welsh Methodists were inclined to affiliate with the Calvinistic Societies. A Methodist mission was organized in Utica, the county seat of Oneida County, in 1828. This later became the center of Methodist Welsh missionary work in America. A mission was also formed in the same year in Trenton, New Jersey. Other Welsh missions were organized a little later, one in Black River Conference in 1841, and another in Pittsburgh Conference in 1843. Rees Davies, who came to America in 1844, wrote shortly after to the Christian Advocate that "the Gospel preached in Steuben, New York, and the neighboring districts . . . savored too much of Predestinarianism." * He found Methodism among the Welsh almost extinct, and the members in danger of being scattered.

In this emergency I was earnestly requested to take upon me the responsible charge of the mission. After consulting with the brethren, both at Utica and Steuben, and after much prayer to God, with fear and trembling I consented to undertake the . . . responsibility. . . . The Church . . . numbers now eighty-six members.³⁰⁵

The need for extension of missionary work among the Welsh was presented to the 1848 General Conference and the Committee on Missions was instructed by the Conference to inquire into "the expediency" of increasing the number of missionaries.³⁰⁶ The Missionary Society reported in 1851 missions in four Annual Conferences: one each in Pittsburgh, Oneida, Black River, and five in Wisconsin. The Pittsburgh Mission had, in 1852, three Classes with a total membership of sixty-one persons. In 1853 seven missions were listed—three in Ohio—with seven missionaries, 245 members, and ten Local Preachers.

At a conference held in Utica, New York, on June 28, 1854, twelve Welsh missionaries were present representing nine Annual Conferences: Oneida, Black River, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, New York, Wyoming, Baltimore, Ohio, and Wisconsin. Detailed reports were given on the progress of the work and a fund established for church extension.³⁰⁷

One of the fruitful missions was the Ironton Welsh Mission Circuit on the Portsmouth District, Ohio Conference, with a Society in Ironton and "three or four other societies in Lawrence and Gallia Counties." The Circuit published a hymnbook in the Welsh language. While English language Sunday-school materials were used, urgent need was felt for books, including the Discipline, in the native tongue.³⁰⁸

By 1868, of the missions in nine Annual Conferences in 1854, all but three had been absorbed into English-speaking churches. Again, in 1870, the Missionary Society reported that the Welsh missions had "almost entirely ceased," immigrants from Wales having been almost wholly incorporated into English language churches of various denominations. In this latter year the Missionary Society made appropriations to but one mission, that in the Central New York Conference.³⁰⁹ Immigration during these years was at ebb tide, the average number entering annually through the port of New York from 1867 to 1874 being only 1,057. In the year 1876 the total was but 451.³¹⁰ Welsh missions were not so much as mentioned in the Missionary Society Reports for 1878, 1879, 1880.

* In response to repeated appeals to the Wesleyan Methodists in Wales, supplemented by petitions to "their English brethren in America," missionary work was begun in central New York in 1828 by Thomas Roberts, who came over from Wales, and by D. Cydwalader who had earlier settled in Ohio. Several other preachers came in following years but little information is extant concerning the results of their work.—Rees Davies, letter, Christian Advocate and Journal, XXII (1847), 6 (Feb. 10), 21.

In 1881 the Presiding Elder of the Utica District reported the arrival from Wales of W. R. Griffith, a member of the Wesleyan Conference, who had accepted appointment to the Utica Welsh church. "I think," he said, "we have found the right man for the place. He is young, cultured, truly pious, and full of zeal . . . This mission has not been in so prosperous a condition . . . in many years."³¹¹ In 1886 a "beautiful church edifice," costing $15,000., named the Coke Memorial Church, was erected by the Society, aided by churches in several Conferences. Griffith, now a member of the Northern New York Conference, proved to be a zealous, successful missionary among the Welsh immigrants. This same year he organized a Methodist Society at Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, which soon increased to a membership of fifty-five. About two years after its organization the Society of forty-two members built a small church at a cost of $6,000. Also in 1887 Griffith organized in Chicago* a church of fifteen members, and three churches in the Wyoming Valley in Pennsylvania.³¹²

Owing to the fact that members of Welsh churches readily acquired familiarity with the English language, and that the young people, particularly, preferred to attend English-speaking churches, "many of those gathered . . . among the foreign population" transferred their membership to English language Societies. None of the Welsh Societies developed a sufficiently large membership to become self-supporting and all required continuous missionary aid. The 1893 Missionary Society Report listed five missions receiving appropriations: Utica, $397.; Bangor, Philadelphia Conference, $595.; Chicago, $595.; Milwaukee, $198.; Wilkes-Barre, $298.³¹³

MISSIONS TO THE CHINESE

Almost two decades passed after Chinese immigration to California had begun before the Methodist Church made its first appropriation for the beginning of mission work among the immigrants. In 1860 the General Missionary Committee recommended that the Board consider "establishing a mission among the Chinese in California," but no action resulted.³¹⁴ At its

* W. R. Griffith: "We found that Jackson Street Methodist Episcopal Church was for sale. . . . Mrs. Mary Williams [a pious Welsh lady, one of the oldest members of old Clark Street Church] bought it, paid cash for it, and gave it to the Methodist Episcopal Church forever. It will cost her, when complete, about $8,000."—In Sixty-ninth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1887), pp. 352 f.

1864 session the California Conference appointed a committee to survey the situation and the next year after hearing the report of its committee asked for the appointment of a missionary to the Chinese in California. The General Missionary Committee appropriated $4,000. to inaugurate the work. Delay was encountered in finding a suitable candidate and it was not until 1868 that Otis Gibson, formerly a missionary in Foochow, began work as Methodist missionary to Pacific-coast Chinese. On his initiative four Sunday schools were organized within a year, three in San Francisco,* and one in San Jose. Preceding Gibson's arrival a school had been begun on October 25, 1865, in the Powell Street Methodist Church, San Francisco.³¹⁵

Gibson was an experienced China missionary and, despite the fact that he was not conversant with the Cantonese dialect, soon had a vigorous program under way. Advance was recorded when on Christmas Day, 1870, the Chinese Mission House,† costing $30,000.,‡ deeded to the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was dedicated.³¹⁶ This at once became the chief center for Methodist Chinese Mission activities in the San Francisco area.

This year (1870) the Woman's Missionary Society of the Pacific Coast was organized with the purpose to "elevate and save heathen women on these shores." Its intention was to operate as a branch of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society but as the W.F.M.S. made appropriations only for mission work abroad the Pacific coast women sought and obtained support from the General Missionary Society. Beginning in 1871 with a contribution of $500., the Society aided them with an annual appropriation until 1893 when the W.M.S.P.C. was merged with the Woman's Home Missionary Society.³¹⁷

At the second anniversary of the opening of the school in the Mission House the schoolrooms were crowded. The total number of pupils enrolled during the second year was 125, with an average attendance of forty. In 1872 a second center, Foke Yam Tong Chapel, previously a storeroom in a tenement building on Jackson Street, was opened for preaching on every day of the week except Saturday. Soon the chapel was crowded at the Sunday services, and often on weekdays.³¹⁸

From the beginning of the mission urgent need was felt for native Chinese assistance and great expectations were aroused when on January 16, 1871, Hu Sing-mi, a Chinese preacher transferred from Foochow, arrived in San Francisco. He possessed a fair knowledge of English and had the advantage of having a Cantonese wife, familiar with that dialect. Unfortunately he soon became dissatisfied and in June, 1873, returned to China. A second Chinese was employed who labored faithfully for two years and then also returned to his native country.³¹⁹

† This was not the first Chinese mission building in San Francisco. A Chinese chapel costing $25,000. was dedicated on June 4, 1854, under Presbyterian leadership.—Christian Advocate and Journal, XXIX (1854) 30 (July 27), 118.

From San Francisco, as the chief mission center, interest in Chinese missions spread through the entire West. In 1878 Superintendent Gibson reported:

The work is expanding and opening up on every side. Applications from all parts of the coast, and from Boston to Texas, are coming in, asking for directions how to labor among the Chinese, for books and tracts for distribution, for Chinese preachers, and for a visit from the missionary.³²⁰

This year A. J. Hanson, a member of the California Conference, was appointed as assistant missionary.

Missions were established in several other cities in California. What was probably the earliest Chinese Sunday school in the state was begun in Sacramento in 1865 by Mrs. E. M. Carley, and maintained until 1879. As one result of its work a number of Chinese were baptized and united with the Sixth Street Methodist Church. A setback occurred in 1891-92, caused by the loss by fire of the schoolhouse, the mission headquarters, and later by a "Highbinder war" which created disastrous excitement and fear, and even exodus from the city of many Chinese. Although serious the turmoil did not cause cessation of the mission work.³²¹

A mission school and a Sunday school were opened in Chico in 1882 in which during the first year some fifty-six pupils were enrolled. In the eighties and early nineties missions were also reported established in San Diego, Los Angeles, and Stockton; and in Pasadena a mission chapel built. There were small schools also at other places, including Monterey, Alameda, and Napa City. At San Jose, in 1895, a Chinese preacher conducted a daily night school for the teaching of English, a Bible class, and Sunday worship services.³²²

In Oregon, as early as 1866, a Methodist school for Chinese was established in Portland. In 1879 the veteran missionary William Roberts also organized a Chinese school in that city. At the 1879 session of the Oregon Conference he was appointed "missionary to the Chinese." In 1880 fifty pupils were enrolled in the school, ten of whom had assumed the chief financial responsibility for its maintenance. They had supplied furnishings, paid for books, light, fuel, $150. for an organ, most of the rent, besides one dollar each per month for tuition, and had done "a good deal of missionary work."³²³

In 1881-82 the Portland Chinese Mission was left to be supplied. In 1883 in response to the invitation of the Oregon Conference, A. J. Hanson, who since 1878 had been assistant Chinese missionary of the California Conference, took charge of the Chinese work in Oregon and Washington. On December 13, 1884, a Chinese Methodist church was organized in Portland with Chan Hon-fan as pastor and with regularly appointed stewards, Class Leader, and other officers. Besides serving as interpreter each weeknight in the school the pastor "conducted a Bible class, preached twice or three times on the Sabbath, assisted in the Sunday-school, and attended all meetings of the class and of the Chinese Gospel Society."³²⁴

A Chinese mission was begun about 1872 in Seattle on the initiative of a few earnest Christians. So marked was its success that in 1880 the Missionary Society appropriated $500. for more vigorous prosecution of the program under the supervision of two Christian women. The school, with five weeknight sessions each week, enrolled in 1882 about a hundred and ten pupils. In addition a Bible-training school was conducted on one evening of the week, also a Sunday school and a "social religious meeting" on Sunday afternoons. In Tacoma an evening school and Sunday school were begun in January, 1885.³²⁵

During the early period of Chinese immigration to the Pacific coast the immigrants consisted almost entirely of men. Within a few years the practice began of forcibly importing females, many of whom were mere children, as servants and for purposes of prostitution. Some were kidnapped and smuggled into the country, others were purchased from their parents to become unwilling slaves. Conditions were such as to awaken the utmost sympathy of Christian people but the missions as conducted had no means of meeting the situation. Finally, the Woman's Missionary Society of the Pacific Coast furnished the third floor of the Mission House as a dormitory and Rescue Home* and made arrangements also to establish a day school for women and girls. Laura S. Templeton was engaged as missionary, and house-to-house visitation was begun. The police also were informed of the asylum of refuge. Response was not immediate but slowly "one by one they came, claiming care and protection." The first, a young woman of eighteen who had attempted suicide by drowning, was brought in by the police. Writing some years later Mrs. Otis Gibson, who had been closely associated with the Society from the beginning, reported:

The school steadily increased, until for some years we have had all that our rooms could accommodate, the number varying from twenty-four to thirty. . . . none are received for less than a year, during which time we try to teach them something of the religion of Christ, which is our first and chief aim. Then, unless they wish to return to China, we keep them until they are married.³²⁶

Otis Gibson was compelled, on account of ill health, to give up the superintendency of the California Chinese Mission in 1884. His death occurred on January 25, 1889. He was succeeded in 1885 by the Rev. F. J. Masters of the British Wesleyan Missionary Society, who for many years had been stationed in Canton, China.³²⁷ Under his leadership continued moderate progress was registered.*

* This was the only place of refuge of its kind in San Francisco for Chinese women and girls until September, 1874, when the Woman's Occidental Board of the Presbyterian Church opened a similar home.

Few Chinese entered the port of New York during these years. The Missionary Society in 1870 estimated the number for the twenty-three preceding years as approximately 414. As they were scattered over the entire area of the city little attempt was made to reach them with the Christian message until in 1878 a young Cantonese ministerial student, aided by C. S. Brown of the Five Points Mission, opened an evening school and instituted religious services. The Rev. James Jackson, formerly of the Wesleyan China Mission, arrived in New York and was appointed missionary in charge. Later he added a Sunday school, held first in Mott Street but soon transferred to the Seventh Street Methodist Episcopal Church. His report for 1881 to the Missionary Society stated:

Since our work began in this city many schools have been opened in connection with other Churches. There are now not less than ten Chinese schools in this city and two or three others in Brooklyn. . . . it is common for the Chinese to go about from school to school, being registered at different schools as scholars, and permanently attending nowhere.³²⁸

The mission work in New York City was hindered by lack of permanent headquarters and adequate facilities. During 1883-94, Mary A. Lathbury was continuously associated with the mission, first as secretary of the Chinese Sunday school and later as Superintendent of the mission.† The work suffered also from the effects of a systematic and vicious attack by some of the New York City newspapers. Miss Lathbury, writing in 1893, expressed surprise at the growth in number of teachers and pupils "in spite of discouragements."

In all of the Chinese missions the chief methods of evangelization employed were the teaching of English and preaching in the Chinese vernacular. The Sunday and weekday program of the San Francisco Mission in 1873 was reported by Bishop Harris:

The Sunday services at the Mission House consist of a Bible class, in the English language, at 10½ o'clock, A.M.; preaching in Chinese at 12½, P.M.; and a Chinese Sunday-school at 6½ P.M. We have also a chapel, or Bazaar preaching-place, in the heart of the Chinese quarter of the city, where we have preaching in Chinese every day at 2 P.M., except Saturday. . . .

The schools are all of them night schools, as neither boys nor men have time to attend . . . in the daytime.

* In 1895 six California missions (San Francisco, Oakland, Sacramento, San Jose, Stockton, and Modesto) reported a total of 138 members and 385 Sunday-school pupils enrolled with an average attendance of 120.—Seventy-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. (1895), p. 313.

† The mission, school, and Sunday school were located successively in the Eighteenth Street Methodist Church (1883); at the corner of Seventh Avenue and Twenty-third Street (1888); and in a house at 30 East Seventh Street (1894).

The maximum number of hearers for the Christian message was secured by street preaching.

When our Sabbath services in the mission-house have been fairly attended our largest congregation gathers on the public street every Sabbath afternoon. Hundreds of Chinese gather every Sunday to hear the Gospel in their own language.³²⁹

Superintendent Masters became greatly disappointed in the fact that the majority of the pupils in the evening schools took little interest in the religious services. "It is evident," he said, "that they come to our schools to learn as much English and as little Bible as they can." He became persuaded that in the program of the missions the teaching of English had been overstressed; that it was not necessary "to offer English as a bait to draw people to our preaching services"; and that the Christian religion would never become a power among the Chinese until the Churches gave less attention "to A B C schools" and undertook more thorough evangelistic work. He urged that the basis of the Methodist program be shifted from primary instruction in English to direct evangelism and that the missions "push out into more aggressive work among the masses" not reached by the schools.³³⁰

Mission work among Chinese was complicated by certain special difficulties against which missions to other peoples did not have to contend. Conditions of employment among them were unstable. Because of race prejudice Chinese laborers were among the last to be employed, and in slack times the first to be discharged. A. J. Hanson reported in 1884 that he had visited the mission school and had organized a class of eleven young people for religious instruction preparatory to baptism. Six months later he returned and not one member of the group could be found; all had left the city in search of employment elsewhere. In 1892 the committee on Chinese missions of the California Conference reported that of 413 Chinese received into church membership in the preceding twenty years the greater part had returned to China.³³¹

Even more serious was the anti-American feeling created by the disabilities imposed upon Chinese by state and federal government legislation, and the persecution visited upon them by large numbers of American citizens dominated by prejudice and ill feeling. At the height of the anti-foreign excitement Chinese scarcely dared to venture on the American street where the Mission House was located.* The mission found it necessary to provide hospital treatment in the Mission House for church members and school pupils excluded from the public hospitals. What reply could the missionary give to those who asked why the government had broken a solemn treaty

* F. J. Masters: "Every week Chinese were beaten, kicked, and stoned when found alone on the streets Some were cowardly attacked and wounded while on their way to our school. Women on their way to our services had their ear-rings torn out in broad daylight. Our school windows were broken, and filthy refuse was cast through the open windows upon the heads of the Chinese while sitting at their desks. One of the senior scholars in our school, a clerk in a pawnshop, had his eye cut out one night while quietly walking to school . . ." (In Sixty-eighth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1886], p. 299.) Similar fiendish cruelties were perpetrated upon Chinese at Tacoma and various other places.

made with China, or why missionaries exhorted Chinese to prepare to go to Heaven with Americans forever when so many church members were unwilling to live in association with them a few years upon earth? Harmful also to mission work were the strife and mutual antagonisms engendered by interclass feuds among the Chinese.³³²

Native Chinese preachers were urgently needed by the missions, a need felt both by the missionaries and by Chinese converts. The great embarrassment of the California Mission, reported Otis Gibson in 1884, "is the failure, up to this date, to develop native Chinese preachers who feel called of God to devote their lives to the ministry of the Gospel among their countrymen in America." This situation continued to the close of the period. The first convert of the mission, Chow Loke-chee, became a licensed preacher, but soon thereafter returned to China. From time to time preachers were raised up within the mission but not in sufficient number to supply the need. Again in 1892 Superintendent Hanson of the Oregon Chinese Mission reported that "the crying need" was for an experienced native preacher to preach the Gospel on the streets, assist in the school, instruct probationers, and aid in other phases of the work.³³³

Despite all difficulties and unmet needs the Chinese missions of this period were fruitful in results. In 1892 a committee of the Chinese Sabbath-School Association of New York City, of which Mary A. Lathbury was a member, published a statement declaring that pastors of churches of several denominations in New York and Brooklyn had testified that "in faithfulness to their Christian duty, in devotion to the interests of the Church, and in generous contributions to the benevolent work of the Church," Chinese converts were "fully up to the level of the best American membership." Similar testimony was offered by Superintendent F. J. Masters of the California Mission:

I have never known but one case in seventeen years when a Chinaman after professing conversion fell into open apostasy and idolatry. . . . He may take a long time to convert, but when once his mind is made up he holds firm to the end. He may not be the equal of our American members in point of knowledge, culture, and spiritual insight . . . ; but by every test of character, by . . . liberality, courage, and steadfastness, they are brethren of whom we need not be ashamed.³³⁴

MISSIONS TO THE JAPANESE

Methodist missionary work among Japanese began almost as early as the beginning of Japanese immigration. In 1877, when only fifty or sixty Japanese had arrived in San Francisco, Kanichi Miyama and K. Nonaka began to receive Christian instruction from Otis Gibson of the Chinese Mission, and later united with the Church. Two years later Gibson reported that six young Japanese had been baptized, of whom one had become a steward and Exhorter. An interdenominational Japanese "Gospel Society" of some thirty-three members had been formed and was holding regular weekly meetings in a rented room of the Mission House. In 1880 Gibson reported that the Gospel Society numbered thirty-six, that seven or eight Japanese had become full members of the Methodist Church and a Class of eight probationers had been formed. The next year Miyama had begun preparation for the ministry. He had been instrumental within the year in leading seven of his countrymen to be baptized and to unite with the Church. In 1884 he was admitted on trial to the California Annual Conference.³³⁵

By 1886 the Japanese in San Francisco numbered somewhat more than eight hundred. Of these more than one hundred were members of the Gospel Society; seventy were members of the Methodist Church, and fifty-seven were attending schools and colleges. The Christian Japanese desired a mission of their own, separate from the Chinese mission, and pledged over $2,000. toward expenses. The chapel and parsonage of the Central Methodist Church were procured as temporary headquarters at a rental of $100. per month. In June, 1886, Merriman C. Harris, transferred from the Japan Conference, took over the work and in September was made Superintendent. In 1889 the church membership had increased to 150.³³⁶

In 1890 Harris estimated the Japanese population at approximately three thousand.

The population is composed of merchants, students, mechanics, laborers, skilled and unskilled. Until recently the arrivals were largely students, but more laborers have of late been coming, who find employment without much difficulty. . . . Their reputation in the city is good. Complaints against them as a people are rarely heard. On account of their engaging manners and adopting the American customs they are popular.

This year, the Superintendent stated, students associated with the mission were in attendance not only at local California colleges and universities but also at many eastern institutions. Members of the mission also were active in evangelistic work.

The Japanese brethren have gone everywhere preaching the Gospel—in the public assemblies, the highways, byways, the hospitals, prisons, clubs, lodging houses, ranches, and gambling houses. . . . Our little church is composed of converted merchants, professional men, students, artisans, laborers, gamblers, drunkards³³⁷

In 1892 a site was selected for the Japanese Mission House and church. A house of fourteen rooms was moved to the rear of the lot, and on December 2, 1894, the first Japanese Methodist church in America was dedicated.³³⁸

During the first eighteen years of development of the San Francisco Japanese Mission (1877-95) its influence extended in many different directions. About 1883 a branch of the Japanese Gospel Society was organized in Oakland under the leadership of T. Sunamoto.* In 1889 the mission was organized into a church, which at once became self-supporting. In 1892 the church established branches at Berkeley and Alameda. An evening school also was maintained.³³⁹

In May, 1889, two Japanese students "went to Los Angeles and gathered the Japanese together, and through the aid of Dr. R. S. Cantine and a committee of the Sunday-school of Fort Street Church" secured a house and established a mission. From October, 1889, to April 1, 1890, the San Francisco Mission supplied financial aid. The Fort Street Church then "assumed the entire responsibility for its continuance."³⁴⁰

A branch mission opened in Sacramento in February, 1892, was organized as a church, with preaching places also in Vacaville and in Winters. Surrounding camps and ranches were visited and the Gospel preached in many places. In 1894 Superintendent Harris reported that a branch had been established in Fresno. The Japanese missionary began his work on an allowance of $12.50 per month for salary and house rent.

In the fall of 1892 the San Francisco church sent T. Kawabe on an evangelistic tour through Oregon, Washington, and Idaho, from which he "returned with great joy, having preached to his countrymen and gathered . . . many converts." In February, 1893, he opened a mission in Portland and within a few months organized a Society of fifty members. Several young men were called into the ministry and evangelists were sent out to preach to the hundreds of laborers engaged in construction work on the Union Pacific Railroad in Idaho and Wyoming. Also in 1893 a Japanese Local Preacher, M. Okamoto—then in Seattle—learned of a colony of some hundreds of laborers at Port Simpson, British Columbia. He went to them, labored faithfully among them, and succeeded in organizing over a hundred into Classes under leaders whom he had appointed.³⁴¹

The first company of Japanese immigrants arrived in Hawaii in 1885. Hearing of the religious destitution of their countrymen, in 1887 the Japanese Methodists of San Francisco raised among themselves $200. and sent Kanichi Miyama to investigate conditions among them. He preached his first sermon in Queen Somna's Hall on October 2 and on October 10 organized a Japanese Mutual Aid Society. On May 6, 1888, he baptized three persons; and on July 15 ten others. On July 27 he organized in Honolulu a Methodist Society of twenty-eight men, eight women, and two children, and received fourteen into membership on probation. Preceding the 1888 session of the California Conference Miyama was appointed to the Hawaiian Mission, where he "labored with great zeal and effectiveness" during the Conference year 1888-89. He was assisted by Takeshi Ukai, M. Mitami, and others. A Temperance Society which enlisted three thousand members was organized; also a National Benevolent Society. In August, 1889, Miyama and Ukai returned to San Francisco.³⁴²

Following the removal of the chief leaders the Society suffered serious decline. Learning of the condition of the mission A. N. Fisher, of the Genesee Conference, and his wife, who were in California for health reasons, volunteered to assume temporary supervision of the work. They took charge of the mission in January, 1890, visited all of the principal islands, inspected the mission stations, acquainted themselves with the workers, and prepared a report.

There are employed on the sugar plantations of these islands about 13,000 Japanese peasants. . . . We have only 5 Japanese ministers under appointment, and are in need of 8 to 10 more. We have 15 preaching-places, 41 full members, 60 probationers, 7 evening schools, 8 Sunday-schools, with 184 scholars. There have been 219 baptisms since the beginning of our work, but we have suffered from removals and by defection through lack of ministerial oversight.

The mission suffered also from too frequent changes in personnel. In three years, "with an average of not more than five workers at any one time," there had been sixteen different persons on the mission staff. Of the current force of seven persons, five had been members less than four months.

Fisher continued supervision of the mission as a self-supporting missionary for eighteen months and then, on advice of a physician, resigned the position. During his tenure he organized five new congregations, erected two chapels, baptized seventy-four adults, received 126 probationers, brought a woman Bible reader from Japan, and gave much attention to the distribution of Christian literature.³⁴³

In 1891 the California Conference offered to transfer the mission to the Hawaiian Board (an organization of native churches in cooperation with the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions). The Board agreed to take over the mission and to be responsible for its continuance. Accordingly the transfer was made, only to be regretted a year later. In 1893, the Japanese population of the Islands had increased 7,000. Two Japanese missionaries, K. Matsuno and T. Takahashi, were sent to Hawaii by the Conference to make a new beginning. The Conference asked the General Missionary Committee to make "an appropriation for Japanese work in Honolulu, and . . . to aid in the evangelization of the . . . Japanese now residing there."³⁴⁴

In 1895 the Japanese District* of the California Conference, formed in 1893 with M. C. Harris as Presiding Elder, listed nine churches, of which seven were within the state of California. The two others were Honolulu and Portland, Oregon.³⁴⁵

MINOR FOREIGN LANGUAGE MISSIONS

The several other foreign language missions maintained during the period were much less extensive than those which have been described.

Italian Missions.—In Philadelphia in April, 1890, a mission was established among the thirty thousand Italians of the city. After two years, the missionary, T. D. Malan, reported that sixty-two Italian Catholics "had been received on probation and twenty-six in full connection." An Italian Young Men's Association had enlisted fifteen members; a day school had been established with fifty children enrolled; a kindergarten, with about the same number; and a night school of about thirty-five pupils. According to Malan, a sewing class had been attended by over eighty women and girls and an open-air meeting had gathered almost every Sunday from fifty to five hundred hearers. In the work of the school the Woman's Home Missionary Society cooperated. An Epworth League of nearly fifty members had for its president a young journalist of a distinguished old Roman family. The fifth year (1894) of the mission was stated to be "the most fruitful in . . . [its] history . . . in spite of great hindrances."³⁴⁶

A. J. Palmer, Presiding Elder of the New York District, New York Conference, in 1889 pronounced the inauguration of a mission among the Italians of that city probably more remarkable "than any other one work of . . . [the] year, in its immediate results and its possible influence." The missionary, Vito L. Calabrese, a local preacher of the Italy Methodist Conference, in June, 1889, began preaching in the Italian language in the chapel of the Five Points Mission every day afternoon to a congregation of fifty to ninety people. During the few months the entire support of the minister was paid by a layman, Wm. K. Peyton. At the beginning of the Conference year 1890-91 the Woman's Home Missionary Society took over the mission, renting and furnishing rooms at No. 127 Marick Place. Preaching services, prayer meetings, and Class meetings were held each week. The pastor also visited Italians in prison and the people at their homes and distributed Bibles and tracts. By 1894 the Society had a hundred members.³⁴⁷

In 1894 the Presiding Elder of the Boston District reported that the Epworth Settlement in the north end of Boston was rendering "most efficient and valuable services to the 'foreign populations which swarm in that section—chiefly Italians and Jews.'" ³⁴⁸

In 1889 a mission to the 15,000 Italian people of New Orleans was established under the leadership of Giovanni B. Giambruno. The Presiding Elder reported in 1

We have three mission stations Six services each week have been held with an aggregate attendance of 120 per week. The deaconesses labor with success among the Italian homes and children, holding an industrial school two afternoons every week for the latter and a school of 40 children Sunday afternoons.³⁴⁹

The first Methodist Italian Church, New Orleans, with a modest building, in 1894 had enrolled twenty-five full members and thirty-six probationers. An Italian mission in Chicago was first listed in the 1894 Minutes of the Rock River Conference to be supplied. In 1895 the mission was reported in operation, conducted by Miss A. M. Johnson, and "wonderfully successful," with conversions "almost constantly occurring."

In 1894 the total appropriation* of the Missionary Society to all domestic Italian missions was $5,271.³⁵⁰

Bohemian Mission.—Although, as stated, immigration from Bohemia attained significant proportions as early as the forties it was not until the decade of the eighties that the Methodist Church undertook missionary work among the immigrants and then on a very limited scale. In 1885 S. A. Kean, a Methodist layman of Chicago, estimated the Bohemian population of that city at approximately 40,000.

. . . more than 20,000 of them are in the neighborhood of our Halsted Street Church We have had Bohemian children in our Sunday-school for many years, but not until a little over a year ago were we able to find any one whom we could trust to preach to them in their own language.

Francis J. Hrejsa, appointed to the Bohemian mission (Halsted Street) in 1885, was diligent both in preaching and in the translating of hymns, the Catechism, and the Discipline into the Bohemian language. Within a short time he received about a hundred converts into church membership. In 1887 two Bohemian Societies, Bohemian First Church and Bohemian Second Church, were organized, the former reporting at the end of the next year 122 full members and the latter twenty-five. In 1892 the third Society, and in 1895 the fourth were formed.³⁵¹

A Bohemian mission was also located in a heavily populated center of Cleveland, Ohio. A. H. Norcross, the Presiding Elder, wrote to the Missionary Society in 1885 that, while work had been started several years earlier, "the opening of 'great and effective doors' and the whitening of the field toward the harvest" had come within the last year. An important feature of the program was "a Sunday-school composed almost entirely of Bohemian children, numbering nearly 600 scholars." In 1887 the Broadway Church transferred the mission, together with property of an estimated worth of $10,000., to the trustees of the Cleveland Methodist Episcopal Church and

* The 1894 appropriation was distributed among five missions in the following Conferences: Philadelphia, $1,335.; New York, $890.; New England, $890.; Rock River, $1,000.; Louisiana, $1,156.—Seventy-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1894), p. 358.

Sunday-school Alliance. The mission was continued as an appointment of the East Ohio Conference. In 1893 the Conference by resolution commended "the excellent work being done at Broadway Mission" and recommended an advance of $500. in the appropriation. In that year the mission reported 277 full members and 825 pupils in the Sunday schools.³⁵²

A third center of missionary activity was the Coke Mission, organized in 1883, in the McKeesport District, Pittsburgh Conference. The missionary, J. C. High, in charge from its beginning, in 1886 gave this account :

I have preached in 27 different places; have maintained preaching regularly every two weeks at 10 places; have organized and sustained 15 Sunday-schools; have given the presiding elder 5 appointments to strengthen other work. I still have 10 Sunday-schools, and five places where I preach regularly and many others at which I preach as frequently as I can. I have built churches, organized societies and Sunday-schools, circulated the Scriptures, many hundreds in the English language and as many as I can of the Hungarian, Slavic, Italian, Bohemian, and German³⁵³

In addition to the missionary in charge, at different times women were employed to visit the homes, instruct children, and distribute the Scriptures and religious literature. In 1891 one woman was thus engaged; in the summer of 1892, three.

In 1891 missionary work with Bohemians was begun in a small way in the East Baltimore Conference. In 1893 appropriations of the Missionary Society to all Bohemian missions* amounted to $9,550.³⁵⁴

Other Minor Missions.—An attempt was made in 1884 by C. V. Anthony to establish a mission to the Portuguese in and about San Leandro, California. He secured a missionary appropriation of $700. to inaugurate the work but could find no one who knew the language or who was willing to acquire it, and the enterprise was finally abandoned.³⁵⁵ In 1891 a mission was established in the Portuguese section of New Bedford, Massachusetts, the Methodist churches of the city assuming the financial responsibility. In 1892 Walter Ela, Presiding Elder of the New Bedford District, reported a measure of success :

In June last I organized in New Bedford the first Portuguese Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, with eleven in full membership and eight on probation. . . . Though the services are not largely attended they are awakening a deep and widespread interest among the Portuguese people.

Meetings held in Truro and later in Provincetown resulted in a few converts. The missionary first appointed to the work retired after a brief period of service but soon afterward George B. Nind, formerly a missionary in Brazil, was secured to take his place. In 1895 the mission reported fifteen full members, eleven probationers, and twenty Sunday-school pupils.³⁵⁶

In 1892 Clemente A. Moya came from Mexico to Brooklyn under a strong impression that he had been "called by God, to preach the Gospel to the Spanish-speaking people" of that city and of New York. After four months' labor he had succeeded in establishing preaching services in the Sands Street Church and the Washington Square Church in the New York area, and a Sunday school in the Nostrand Avenue Church, in Brooklyn. The first Spanish Methodist church of Brooklyn* was organized on January 10, 1893, with nine full members and some thirty-five probationers. Within the first year Spanish language Sunday schools were also established in the three churches.³⁵⁷

An appropriation of $1,000. was made by the Missionary Society in 1893 to the Philadelphia Conference for work among the Pennsylvania Dutch in Lebanon County, Pennsylvania. The next year the missionary, William H. Zweizig, announced that he had established in June the County Mission (Lehman Street), Lebanon, with a "church class" of twenty persons, and a Sunday school of one hundred, with twenty officers and teachers. Preaching services were regularly held also at Fontana and Richland but no "denominational organization . . . [had been] effected."³⁵⁸

In 1893 an appropriation of $600. was made by the Missionary Society "for Hebrew work in New York City." This was increased in 1894 to $1,200. Arno C. Gaebelein was appointed as missionary.† In 1894 he reported "larger congregations of regular attendants than ever before, mostly elderly and intelligent men." By the end of 1894 five Hebrew men and one woman had been baptized.³⁵⁹

THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH IN THE SOUTH

The Plan of Separation adopted by the General Conference of 1844 by the decisive vote of 144 to 22, which resulted in the division of the Church, left in its train numerous unsettled problems. No sooner had the northern delegates returned to their homes than heated and long-drawn-out controversy arose. Was the plan constitutional? Had not the General Conference exceeded its powers in providing for the division of the Church in case the Annual Conferences in the slaveholding states should so elect? Was not the plan a contravention of the Fifth Restrictive Rule which prohibited the Gen-

* In 1880 at the Southern California Conference a Spanish language appointment was scheduled in Los Angeles, and in 1881, a second one in the Santa Barbara District. Both were left to be supplied. In 1883 one of the Presiding Elders reported that neither money nor men were available for the work and that it must be surrendered to other Churches. (Minutes, Southern California Conference, 1880, pp. 17-18, 20; ibid., 1881, p. 30; ibid., 1883, p. 31.) At the 1889 Arizona Mission Meeting a missionary was appointed to "Tucson, Spanish work," and next year an appropriation of $650. was made for maintenance. In 1891 attention was directed to the fact that "for a large Spanish population" the Church had not a single school or missionary, nevertheless the appointment was discontinued.—Minutes, Tucson Mission, 1899, p. [11]; 1890, p. 9; 1891, p. 17.

† Gaebelein held services every Saturday in the Allen Street Memorial Church. Later, services were held at 91 Rivington Street on Saturday mornings and afternoons and on Sunday afternoons. Services were conducted also on Sunday afternoons at 209 Madison Street, the headquarters of the Hope of Israel Mission.

eral Conference "from abridging the rights of trial and appeal"? Did the plan not violate the Third Restrictive Rule in preventing Bishops from serving all sections of the Connection? Before the quadrennium had passed general sentiment in the Church concerning the validity of the Plan of Separation had crystallized and the 1848 General Conference, by a vote of 133 to 9, declared the plan null and void. But the separation was a fait accompli and no action of the General Conference could restore the unity of the Church.³⁶⁰ The matter of division of the assets of the Book Concern also was out of the hands of General Conference.*

Before adjournment of the 1848 General Conference a wide door was opened for the organization of local churches and of Annual Conferences in the South. The Committee on the State of the Church reported having received memorials signed by 2,735 persons in the slaveholding states, praying "for ministers to be sent to them" for the organization of Conferences and Districts, and for recognition as members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The petitions came from western Virginia, Kentucky, Missouri, and Arkansas.³⁶¹ In response, the Conference

Resolved, that we recognize all persons in these United States, who were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1844, who have not been separated from said Church by withdrawal or expulsion, according to Discipline, and who express a desire to be recognized as still under our care and jurisdiction, as members of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and that we regard it as our duty, as far as practicable, to supply all such with the preaching and ordinances of the Gospel.³⁶²

A first result of the repudiation of the Plan of Separation and of the response of General Conference to the memorials asking for ministers and churches was an immediate intensification of the effort of both denominations for the retention of the border Conferences and local churches. Particulars of the bitter struggle in Missouri and Arkansas have already been given.† An enabling act was passed by the 1848 General Conference for the Western Virginia Conference‡—the first to be organized in the border territory.³⁶³

* The 1844 General Conference recommended to the Annual Conferences a change in the Sixth Restrictive Rule permitting a division of Book Concern assets. The southern Conferences voted unanimously in the affirmative. In the northern Conferences the recommendation was defeated. Resort was had by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the civil courts—to the U. S. Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York, and to the U. S. Circuit Court of the District of Ohio. The decision of the New York Court was in favor of the plaintiffs (the South), that of the Ohio Court against them. When it appeared that appeal from the New York decision would be taken to the Supreme Court the representatives of the two Churches agreed to arbitration, but the western branch of the Book Concern refused. The South then appealed to the Supreme Court in which a unanimous decision was handed down in favor of the southern Church. In the final settlement the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, received approximately $375,000, from the Methodist Book Concern, and $17,000, from the Chartered Fund.—J. N. Norwood, The Schism in the Methodist Episcopal Church, 1884 . . ., ch. VII, "The Settlement of the Property Case."

‡ The organizing session of the Western Virginia Conference was held at Wheeling during July 5-12, 1848. No Minutes of this meeting are to be found. The second session was convened at Clarksburg on Oct. 10, 1849, with thirty-four members in full connection and eighteen probationers. Appointments were made to forty-three Circuits and Stations in four Districts. There were 12,635 members in full connection, of whom 378 were Negroes; and 143 Sunday schools with 5,064 pupils. The number of church buildings was not reported. (Minutes, Western Virginia Conference, 1849, as compiled and printed in Minutes, West Virginia Conference, 1938, pp. 42, 44, 45, 63, 64.) At its

When the Civil War began, "the great body of the Methodist Episcopal Church" stood for the Union cause "as firm as a rock." "The people refused to be dragged into secession by the eastern part of the State, and out of the throes of the Civil War came the new and loyal State of West Virginia."³⁶⁴

The second border group to be formed was the Kentucky Conference. When, in accordance with the Plan of Separation, vote was taken in 1845 on resolutions of adherence to the South only five voted against adoption.* Among the laity, however, particularly in the interior of the state, there were many who were strongly opposed to division and who were anti-slavery. The 1852 General Conference decided, by a vote of 77 to 66, to establish the Kentucky Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church.† Considering the divided sentiment among both the ministry and laity the growth of the Church was remarkable. Beginning with only fourteen charges and 1,865 full members, of whom 197 were Negroes, less than a decade after the close of the Civil War the Kentucky Conference had eight Districts with eighty-four Circuits and Stations and 15,636 full members.³⁶⁵

After 1851 the General Missionary Committee gradually increased the missionary appropriation to the border Conferences. During the quadrennium 1852-56 missionary appropriations to the Missouri, Arkansas, Western Virginia, Kentucky, Baltimore, and Philadelphia Conferences totaled $64,300. The largest amount, $17,800., was appropriated for the Missouri Conference.³⁶⁶

The Bishops' Address at the 1856 General Conference included a statement on what had been done by way of implementing the declaration of 1848: the General Conference "having retained its jurisdiction over conferences previously existing" in the slaveholding states and "having directed the organization of additional conferences," it became our duty to arrange the districts, circuits, and stations, and to superintend them as an integral part of the Church. As the result we have six annual conferences which are wholly or in part in slave territory.³⁶⁷ forty-ninth session, 1895, with nine Districts, 189 Circuits and Stations, 45,423 members in full connection, 251 Local Preachers, 693 Sunday schools and 41,313 pupils, West Virginia had become one of the strong Conferences of the Church.—Minutes, West Virginia Conference, 1895, pp. 40 ff., II-XXXV.

* The five negative votes were cast by James Ward, A. Kelly, R. G. Gardiner, J. G. Bruce, and Allen Sears. J. G. Bruce later "changed his decision." The others transferred to Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Joseph S. Tomlinson, president of Augusta College, did not wait for the formal Conference action but transferred in 1844 to the Ohio Conference. Two probationary members, opposed to the Conference decision, "were simply dropped from the roll." (W. E. Arnold, A History of Methodism in Kentucky, II, 302 f.) At the 1865 session of the Kentucky Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, "eighteen ministers, among whom were some of marked ability, withdrew and were received as local preachers in a Quarterly Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and at the ensuing session of the Kentucky Conference were received into full connection and duly appointed."—J. M. Buckley, A History of Methodists in the United States, p. 518.

† In 1849 the Ohio Conference included two appointments in Kentucky—Covington and Asbury—and in 1851 Bishop Morris created a Kentucky District with eight appointments. (Gen'l Minutes, 1849, p. 382; ibid., 1851, p. 663.) The Indiana Conference also had two Circuits and two missions in Kentucky. (Daily Zion's Herald, May 28, 1852, pp. 90 f.) The Minutes of the 1852 session of the Cincinnati Conference state that the "Kentucky Conference is to be supplied with preachers from this conference." The Minutes also include Kentucky Conference appointments but no record of proceedings of an organizational session. (Minutes, Cincinnati Conference, 1852, pp. 8, 68.) Curiously the General Minutes for 1852 designate the Conference as the "Cincinnati and Kentucky Conference." The first separate session was held in Covington, Ky., Oct. 14-17, 1853. In 1895 it had 22,549 full members, 276 churches, 159 Local Preachers, and 224 Sunday schools with 14,017 pupils.—Gen'l Minutes, 1852, pp. 119, 123; ibid., 1853, pp. 301 f.; ibid., Fall, 1895, p. 510.

The Bishops' work of organization and arrangement of Conferences, Circuits, and Stations was advanced, albeit with some injustices and unfortunate results, by an order of Secretary of War Stanton, November, 1862, at the suggestion of Bishop E. R. Ames, to the Union commanders in the Departments of Missouri, Tennessee, and the Gulf. They were instructed to place at the Bishop's disposal "all houses of worship belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South," in which a loyal preacher "appointed by a loyal Bishop . . . does not officiate."³⁶⁸ Later a similar order was issued covering three other military departments.* In 1863, also, the General Missionary Committee appropriated $35,000., "in view of the magnitude and importance of the work opening in the South," and the Bishops "proceeded . . . to make a personal survey of the accessible portions," and began to appoint ministers to local communities, and to wider areas, to work among both whites and blacks.³⁶⁹ Before the close of the year several missionaries had been appointed, including T. W. Lewis to Beaufort, South Carolina, and J. E. Round to New Bern, North Carolina.†

In 1864 all of the newly established missions, by concurrent action of the General Conference and the Missionary Board, were included in the recently designated "third class of Missions," and in the following year were distributed to five District Departments.‡ They became the nuclei of the Mission Conferences established later.

Memorials from Negroes praying for Annual Conferences of their own had been received and considered as early as 1848 when John P. Durbin "presented two memorials from colored members in Pennsylvania, N[ew] Jersey and Delaware, asking the General Conference to organize an annual Conference for colored members, to be presided over by one of our Bishops and by white Presiding Elders."§ In 1852 the General Conference advised

* When the orders of the military departments were brought to the attention of President Lincoln he wrote to Stanton expressing embarrassment at what had been done, particularly in view of earlier statements that he (the President) had made. "I have never interfered," he had written, "nor thought of interfering as to who shall or who shall not preach in any Church, nor have I knowingly or believingly tolerated anyone else to so interfere by my authority."—Edward McPherson, The Political History of the United States of America, During the Great Rebellion . . ., p. 527.

† During 1863-65 not less than twenty-three ministers received appointments: T. W. Lewis of the New England Conference to Beaufort, S. C.; J. E. Round, New England Conference, to New Bern, N. C.; John P. Newman, New York Conference, to New Orleans; W. C. Daily, R. H. Guthrie, and George A. Gowan, Kentucky Conference, to East Tennessee; N. L. Brakeman, Northwest Indiana, to Baton Rouge, La.; H. G. Jackson, Northwest Indiana, to New Orleans; A. S. Lakin, Cincinnati Conference, "missionary to the South"; W. Z. Ross, Ohio Conference, to Shelbyville, Tenn.; Wesley Prettyman, Ohio Conference, to Murfreesboro, Tenn.; J. P. Davis, Southern Illinois Conference, "missionary to the South"; Lucius Hawkins, Rock River Conference, to Memphis; D. J. Holmes, Rock River Conference, to Nashville; W. M. Henry, East Genesee Conference, "missionary to the South"; Joseph R. Wheeler and G. W. Hobbs, Baltimore Conference, to Portsmouth, Va.; J. S. Swain, Newark Conference, to Florida; W. H. Tiffany, Troy Conference, "missionary to the Freedmen"; W. H. Norris, New York East Conference, to Nashville; J. C. Emerson and James A. DeForrest, New Hampshire Conference, "missionaries to the South"; William H. Pearne, Wyoming Conference, to New Orleans.

‡ The five District Departments were: (1) "Mississippi Department," including Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas; (2) "Middle Department," so much of Tennessee as was not in the Holston Conference, Alabama, and western Georgia; (3) "Southern Department," Florida, eastern Georgia, and South Carolina; (4) "Northern Department," eastern North Carolina, and so much of Virginia as was not in the Baltimore Conference; and (5) "Interior Department," all interior territories not included in any Annual Conference.—Forty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1864), pp. 102 f.; ibid., 49th (1867), p. 128.

§ This memorial, after "some little discussion," was referred to a special committee. The committee reported that "it was inexpedient at present to organize an annual conference for the colored that the Negro Local Preachers within the Philadelphia and New Jersey Conferences be assembled annually by the presiding Bishop for the purpose of conferring on means for promoting their work and for assignment to their work. The Conference also proposed that the "Presiding Elders within whose bounds . . . the coloured churches and congregations" were located should be present for counsel. In 1860 memorials were received asking for extension³⁷⁰ of the powers granted in 1852 and 1856 to the "Conference of Colored Local Preachers" which would make it in effect a regular Annual Conference. The General Conference decided that "the prayer of the Memorialists could not be granted without doing violence to . . . [the Church's] usages and disciplinary regulations." A final item in the memorials, asking that Negro preachers be admitted to membership in the Annual Conferences, was withdrawn (doubtless for expediency's sake) before the memorials came before the Conference for decision.³⁷¹ Progress by the Church toward granting Negroes full recognition and ministerial rights was slow but each quadrennium registered some advance. The Bishops' Address in 1864 said:

The provision adopted by the General Conference in 1856, though an advance on former legislation, is not, we believe, sufficient to meet the necessities of the colored people. The time has now come, in our judgment, when the General Conference should carefully consider what measures can be adopted to give increased efficiency to our Church among them.³⁷²

A special "Committee on the State of the Work among people of Color" * was created by the 1864 General Conference. The committee recommended and the Conference authorized the organization of one or more Negro Mission † Conferences ‡ "where the exigencies of the work may demand it" with the provision that white ministers might be transferred to them "when it may be practicable and deemed necessary." To make Conference organization possible the General Conference so far suspended the Disciplinary rule requiring a probation of two years people," and the report was adopted. A similar memorial from New Jersey met a like fate.—Dai'y Christian Advocate, May 10, 1848, p. 2; "Journal of the General Conference, 1848," p. 130, in G. C. Journals, III.

* In its report the committee declared that "colored pastorates for colored people" were necessary to secure "a ministry adapted to their wants, encouraging their young men to enter the ministerial field, and offering motive and opportunity for general ministerial advancement." The committee further expressed opposition to separation "either with a view to union with another, or to independent organization." The General Conference cannot, it said, "consistently with its own responsibility, with their constitutional rights, or with any decent recognition of their loyalty to our Church . . . adopt any measure which shall, even indirectly look to such a result." The committee also stated that incorporation with an existing Annual Conference would be "attended with difficulties too formidable every way to be readily disposed of" and the resulting delay "incompatible with the urgent requirements of the times."—G. C. Journal, 1864, pp. 486 f.

† The status of these Conferences was not clearly determined. In practice later some were considered as regular Annual Conferences.

‡ This action of General Conference—the sanctioning of separate Negro Conferences—was deplored by the New England Conference of 1865. "We must avoid the danger," the Conference declared, "of recognizing the distinction of color among a common church and ministry." ("Report on Reconstruction of the Church," Christian Advocate and Journal, XL [1865], 17 [April 27], 130.) Strong protest against separate Conferences was made by Gilbert Haven, later a Bishop. Separate organization, he contended, placed upon preachers and people an ignominious badge of inferiority which was both un-Christian and contrary to the policy of the government. "The only right and successful way is to entirely ignore the idea of color in the organization of our Churches and conferences throughout the whole land."—Gilbert Haven, letter, ibid., 21 (May 25), 164.

as to allow the bishops to organize into one or more Annual Conferences such colored local elders as have traveled two or more years under a presiding elder, and shall be recommended by a Quarterly Conference, and by at least ten elders who are members of an Annual Conference.³⁷³

Under this provision the Delaware Conference*—the first Negro Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church—was organized on July 28, 1864, in Wesley Chapel, Philadelphia, with a membership of ten elders, one of whom had been employed by a Presiding Elder for sixteen years, a second for fifteen, and a third for twelve. Ten preachers were received on trial.

The Washington Conference† met in its first session in Baltimore on October 27, 1864, with five charter members; twelve were admitted on trial.³⁷⁴

Impressed by the need of the 3,500,000 freedmen for aid beyond the power of the Churches to render, the General Conference in 1864 urged Congress to establish a government bureau of freedmen's affairs.³⁷⁵ On March 3, 1865, the Freedmen's Bureau was established as a war measure to protect and aid the freed slaves. Its administration was placed in the capable hands of General Oliver O. Howard. The Bureau was actively supported by the Methodist Church, a number of ministers and laymen associating themselves with it. Of the latter, one of the best known was General Clinton B. Fisk, Assistant Commissioner for Kentucky. His influence materially aided the missionaries working among the freedmen.³⁷⁶

In 1864 the General Conference also authorized the Bishops, "when in their judgment they deem it expedient, within the next four years to organize a Conference or Conferences in the Southern States and in the Territories."³⁷⁷ This action was quickly followed by Annual Conference organization. On July 7, 1864, a convention of Methodists who had been loyal to the Union met in the Protestant Episcopal church in Knoxville to consider "the wants, prospects, and interests" of Methodism in east Tennessee. Sixty ordained ministers and sixty who were unordained were reported ready to enter a Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church. One minister, William Milburn, said, "I was never connected with slavery; was not raised up to believe it was right; was taught from my boyhood, to believe it was wrong." J. L. Mann said, "It was my fortune or misfortune to be born in Tennessee. I was reared among all the influences of negro slavery, and efforts were made to make me believe it was right; but I have been an original, unmitigated, Simon-pure abolitionist. . . . I went to the Federal Army, and for sixteen

* The Delaware Conference was organized with three Districts—Delaware River, Odessa, and Choptank—and nineteen appointments; 4,871 members in full connection; thirty-four churches; and twenty-one Sunday schools with 811 pupils. In 1895 it had five Districts, 127 appointments, 16,854 full members, 254 churches; and 257 Sunday schools, with 13,845 pupils. Fifty-three Societies each had less than fifty members.—Gen'l Minutes, 1864, pp. 129 f.; ibid., Spring, 1895, pp. 68 f., 187; Christian Advocate and Journal, XXXIX (1864), 32 (Aug. 11), 253.

† As fixed by the Committee on Boundaries the Washington Conference embraced "Western Maryland, the District of Columbia, Virginia, and the territory south." (G. C. Journal, 1864, p. 224.) It was organized with two Districts, nineteen churches, and eleven Sunday schools, with 1,234 pupils. One Society, at Anne Arundel, Md., had 1,550 members, and another, Sharp St. Church, Baltimore, 1,400 members.—Gen'l Minutes, 1864, pp. 235 f.

months I served God and my country in the army." On June 1, 1865, Bishop Davis W. Clark* organized the Holston Conference with a nucleus of six preachers† transferred from the North.³⁷⁸

The Mississippi Mission Conference‡ was organized by Bishop Edward Thomson at New Orleans on December 25, 1865, with four Districts—one in Mississippi, two in Louisiana, and one in Texas. Of the thirty-four appointments listed, eighteen were left to be supplied. In the three states there were but five Methodist Episcopal church buildings, all for Negro congregations. Of these, Wesley Chapel in New Orleans, a commodious house of worship seating approximately one thousand persons, was built by the members while they were yet slaves. At the first session of the Conference plans were made for ministerial training by establishing the Thomson Biblical Institute. Three Negroes and one white minister were ordained as elders. At the sight of the four standing side by side, the same hands placed upon the heads of all, the congregation were deeply moved, some to tears, some to shouts. Was not this, the secretary of the Conference asked, "the commencement of a new era in the south?"³⁷⁹

Racial antagonism, in some communities amounting to persecution, made progress extremely difficult. In 1868 the tobacco warehouse occupied by the newly organized Greatman Street Church, New Orleans, was demolished by ruffians and the tables, chairs, and seats were "literally broken into splinters," yet within that year the Conference registered a net increase of 5,002 members and probationers. There were this year only eight comfortable meeting houses and most of these had been built by the Missionary Society. Twenty-two places of worship were rudely constructed shacks built of logs or rough boards. Many Societies worshipped in brush arbors, with no roof other than branches of shrubs or trees.³⁸⁰

Bishop Osmon C. Baker convened the organizational session of the South

* Davis Wasgatt Clark (1812-71) was born on Mount Desert Island, Hancock County, Maine, on Feb. 25, 1812. At sixteen he joined a Methodist Class, at nineteen entered the Maine Wesleyan Seminary, and at twenty-two enrolled in Wesleyan University, from which he graduated in 1836. He was admitted on trial to the New York Conference in 1843. (Ibid., III, 337.) After ten years in the itinerancy, he was elected in 1852, by the Book Committee, editor of the Ladies' Repository. The General Conference of 1864, on the first ballot, elected him to the episcopacy. He was a man of clear and strong moral and religious convictions, a forceful writer, and a successful administrator.—Daniel Curry, Life-Story of Rev. Davis Wasgatt Clark, D.D., . . . , p. 15, et passim.

† The six transferred ministers were: T. H. Pearne, Oregon Conference; T. S. Stivers, Ohio Conference; J. F. Spence, Cincinnati Conference; and W. C. Daily, G. A. Gowan, and R. H. Guthrie, Kentucky Conference. Forty-three preachers were received into the Conference and seven admitted on trial. Appointments were made to four Districts. Membership, white and colored, including probationers and Local Preachers, numbered 6,162; number of churches, 100; Sunday schools, 49, with 2,425 pupils. (Gen'l Minutes, 1865, pp. 125 f.; R. N. Price, Holston Methodism, From its Origin to the Present Time, IV, 392.) Six years later the Conference, with nine Districts and eighty-six Circuits and Stations, reported 20,798 full members, 2,751 probationers, 206 Local Preachers, and 208 churches.—Gen'l Minutes, 1871, pp. 254 f.

‡ When organized the Mississippi Mission Conference had five ministerial members in full connection, all of whom were white missionaries. Eleven Negroes were received on trial. Full members numbered 2,216; Sunday schools, nine; pupils, 1,386. (Minutes, Mississippi Mission Conference, 1865, pp. 2, 3, 4; Forty-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. [1865], pp. 141 f.; ibid., 48th [1866], p. 115.) The 1868 General Conference revised the boundaries, limiting the Conference to the state of Mississippi. (Discipline, 1868, p. 270.) By the blanket resolution covering all Mission Conferences in the United States and Territories, the 1868 General Conference made the Mississippi Mission Conference a regular Annual Conference. (G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 130.) At the fifth session the Conference reported 25,708 members in full connection, a phenomenal increase.—Minutes, Mississippi Conference, 1873, p. 27.

Carolina Mission Conference* on April 2, 1866. The groundwork had been done principally by T. Willard Lewis at Charleston, to whom the post commander had given "the sole charge of the Methodist Episcopal Churches and parsonages" of the city, and by J. A. De Forrest who had been appointed by the Freedmen's Bureau "superintendent of all the schools in Beaufort District" and had established three preaching places. On December 31, 1866, Lewis informed the Missionary Society that, as Presiding Elder, he had organized fourteen Circuits "with from two to nine regular preaching places in each, mostly supplied by devoted colored local preachers, who are well qualified save in the 'letter.'" 381

At a meeting of the Bishops in July, 1866, Bishop Davis W. Clark was directed to organize a Mission Conference embracing "the work in Tennessee not included in the Holston Conference, and that in Western Georgia and Northern Alabama." Accordingly, on October 11, 1866, at Murfreesboro, the Tennessee Conference was brought into existence,† with eighteen Traveling Preachers as charter members, including both white and colored.³⁸²

More than one-fourth of the population of Texas in 1860 was composed of Negro slaves, in all, 136,853.‡ Missionary work among them, as we have seen, had been undertaken at various times and from different directions. Finally, the Texas Mission Conference§ was organized, at the instance of the Bishops, by Bishop Simpson at Houston, on January 3, 1867. The nucleus of the Conference consisted of five Traveling Preachers. In addition, two on trial and ten applying for admission on trial were received.³⁸³

On June 25, 1865, what was probably the first Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church organized in Georgia after the division of the Church was

* The South Carolina Mission Conference as first organized included South Carolina, Florida, and eastern Georgia. In 1868 its boundaries were changed to include only South Carolina and "all of Florida east of the Apalachicola River." (Discipline, 1868, p. 273.) By the 1872 General Conference it was restricted to the state of South Carolina. (G. C. Journal, 1872, p. 425.) When a quarter century had passed (1895) the Conference, with six Districts and 131 Circuits and Stations, had 38,188 full members, 359 churches, and 425 Local Preachers.—Gen'l Minutes, Spring, 1895, p. 135.

† The Tennessee Mission Conference, when organized, had four Districts: Nashville, McMinnville, Memphis, and Nashville Mission District, within which twenty-five ministers were appointed to charges and nine Circuits and Stations were left to be supplied. In addition, ten missionaries were assigned to the Mission District of Alabama and Western Georgia. At the end of its first year the Conference reported 4,865 full members, thirty churches, forty-nine Sunday schools, with 3,250 pupils, and ninety-four Local Preachers. At the 1876 session, preceding division of the Conference, total membership was 10,589 in full connection; number of churches, 192; Sunday schools, 195; pupils, 8,359; Local Preachers, 206.—Ibid., 1866, p. 359; ibid., 1867, pp. 264 f.; Minutes, Tennessee Conference, 1876, pp. 28-35.

‡ Negro slaves, according to Macum Phelan, had been "rendered for taxation" in 1859 at a valuation of $85,630,748., an average value of $625.54. "The slave wealth of the state overtopped that from any other source, even exceeding the value of land . . . and being two and one-half times the value of all the horses and cattle put together."—History of Early Methodism in Texas, 1817-1866, I, 459 f.

§ The Texas Mission Conference, as organized, embraced the state of Texas. (G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 317.) At its first session nineteen Circuits and Stations were listed, in three Districts—the Texas Mission District, the Houston District, and the German Mission District—in which five appointments were left to be supplied. (Gen'l Minutes, 1867, p. 9.) In 1868 the total membership reported was 2,488; churches, 16; Local Preachers, 45; Sunday schools, 10, with 1,036 pupils. In 1878, following division, the membership was 7,600; churches, 92; Sunday schools, 115, with 4,440 pupils. (Ibid., Fall, 1868, p. 9; ibid., Fall, 1878, p. 198.) Growth continued to be rapid, in 1895—with six Districts—the Conference reported 12,990 members; 207 Local Preachers; 194 churches; and 214 Sunday schools with a pupil enrollment of 9,818.—Ibid., Fall, 1895, pp. 594 f.

formed at Flint Hill, Fannin County, by the Rev. Alexander Haren, a native of North Carolina who had formerly been a Traveling Preacher. He organized a second Society at Hothouse, also in Fannin County, on the first Sunday in July. In various other places groups of anti-slavery Methodists held meetings, and in January, 1866, at Atlanta Bishop Clark organized a "Georgia-Alabama Mission District." It was at first connected with the Kentucky Conference and later with the Tennessee Conference.³⁸⁴ On October 10, 1867, Bishop Clark organized in Atlanta the Georgia Mission Conference.* Nine preachers were recognized as charter members, two others as probationers, seven were received on credentials from the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and twenty-three were received on trial. Of the total of forty-one, ten were colored and thirty-one were white. Of these, twenty-six were southern men. The movement in Georgia, it may be seen, was largely indigenous to the soil. "In the main, outside of the schools," says Edmund J. Hammond, this early work . . . was done by southern white men—men who had not believed in slavery, but who did believe in teaching the negro how to use his liberty wisely and in teaching his white neighbors how to respect that freedom. And these men did this work at the cost of social ostracism, financial penury, and even at the risk of life itself.³⁸⁵

The Virginia Mission Conference (at first called the Virginia and North Carolina Mission Conference) was organized in Portsmouth, Virginia, on January 3, 1867, with four Traveling Preachers recorded as members on the first day, one from the New York East and three from the Baltimore Conference. Subsequently five others were recognized as members, including two from the Methodist Protestant Church and one from the Methodist New Connexion Church of Canada. The 1868 General Conference changed the boundaries and authorized reorganization as the Virginia Conference.† Although the Conference was exclusively white in ministry and membership, since the Washington Conference included Virginia within its area intense enmity against the Church prevailed in some sections. One church in the Virginia District was burned by incendiaries in 1869. The Presiding Elder of the Abingdon District wrote to the Christian Advocate:

The people sympathizing with us are poor; the wealthy are very hostile; owning as some of them do, from ten to twenty thousand acres of land, they have it in

* The Georgia Conference included "the state of Georgia." (G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 311.) It was organized with four Districts and thirty-nine appointments. Members in full connection numbered 7,768; churches, 28; Local Preachers, 66; Sunday schools, 63, with 4,778 pupils. In 1876 Georgia became exclusively a white Conference. Growth following division was slow. In 1895, with three Districts, appointments numbered only 26; members, 2,791; churches, 77; Sunday schools, 52, with 1,925 pupils. Only four churches had more than 200 members, while nine had fewer than 100.—Gen'l Minutes, 1867, pp. 269 f.; ibid., Spring, 1895, pp. 131 f.

† Virginia Conference "shall include all the state of Virginia not embraced in the Baltimore and Wilmington Conferences, and also the counties of Pocohontas, Green Briar, and Monroe of the state of West Virginia." (G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 317.) The Conference was organized at Alexandria, Va., March 3-7, 1869, with three Districts and forty-three appointments, including fifteen to be supplied. Members in full connection numbered 3,515; churches, 38; Sunday schools, 25, with 1,309 pupils. In 1895 the Conference had 47 appointments; 7,391 members; 141 churches; 140 Sunday schools, with 7,586 pupils.—Gen'l Minutes, 1869, pp. 18-20; Minutes, Virginia Conference, 1895, pp. 14-16, 31.

their power to oppress very much. They have ordered our people off the land, and from one circuit nineteen members, some of them the oldest Methodist families in the Union have been driven into Tennessee. One brother at New Garden, on Elk River, had his barn and its entire contents . . . burned because he was a member of our Church.³⁸⁶

The 1868 General Conference set apart the North Carolina section of the Virginia and North Carolina Conference as a separate Conference. Five preachers met with Bishop Ames at Union Chapel, Alexander County, on January 14, 1869, and organized the North Carolina Conference.* At the time of organization a church building program was in progress, with twelve churches built or in the process of building. At the seventh session its Committee on the State of the Church reviewed progress since separate organization. A beginning was made, the committee stated, under circumstances of great difficulty when "the fires of bitterness and prejudice" still burned fiercely; stated places of worship were closed to the preachers, and resort could be had only to schoolhouses here and there and to a few homes. Yet within eight years ninety-seven churches had been built, more than eight thousand people had been gathered into the Church and at least forty thousand more had become attendants upon its services. God had been raising up young men for the ministry and the churches had increased in self-support. The influence of the Church was beginning to be felt throughout the Commonwealth and its power acknowledged.³⁸⁷

In 1867 Bishop Clark, in accordance with the commission given him by the Bishops in 1866, proceeded to organize a Conference in Alabama.† The way had been prepared by J. J. Brasher‡ and the four associates appointed at the Tennessee Conference the preceding year. The organizing session at Talladega, October 17-20, opened "with 4 members and closed with 46." From the beginning a large proportion of the work was missionary in character. In 1877, the year after the Central Alabama Conference had been set off, twenty appointments of the Alabama Conference were missions, receiving from the Missionary Society a total appropriation of two thousand dollars. Thirty-two charges in 1887 were missions with a missionary grant of $3,400.;

* The North Carolina Conference embraced the state of North Carolina "excepting the ten counties west of Watauga County and the Blue Ridge," which were a part of the Holston Conference. (G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 314.) The Conference began with one District of twelve Circuits and Stations which included about two hundred Societies. The membership numbered 2,859 in full connection; churches, 14; Sunday schools, 48, with 2,360 pupils. (Minutes, North Carolina Conference, 1869, p. 11.) In 1895 with 136 churches the Conference had 8,674 members in full connection, and 160 Sunday schools with 8,166 pupils.—Ibid., 1895, pp. 26 ff., 49 ff.

† The Alabama Conference was organized with seven Districts, fifty-seven appointments, 7,382 members in full connection, seventy-three churches, 132 Local Preachers, and sixty-nine Sunday schools enrolling 3,491 pupils. (Gen'l Minutes, 1867, pp. 270 f.) In 1895, having become in 1876 an all-white Conference, it reported four Districts, fifty-three appointments, 8,187 members, 155 churches, and 134 Sunday schools with 6,586 pupils.—Minutes, Alabama Conference, 1895, pp. 28, 30

‡ When in 1845 the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was organized J. J. Brasher was one of those not in favor of the movement but acceded to the will of the majority. When slavery was abolished and the war had closed he protested that "there should be only one Methodist Church." When his protest failed to gain favor he proceeded, with four associates, to organize the "United Methodist Church." With the organization of the Alabama Conference he and his collaborators united with it, bringing with them thirty-three other preachers.—Edmund Jordan Hammond, The Methodist Episcopal Church in Georgia . . . , pp. 110 f.

and in 1895 thirty-seven of the fifty-three appointments received three thousand dollars in missionary support.³⁸⁸

The Louisiana Conference,* "set off from the Mississippi Conference," met for organization in Wesley Chapel, New Orleans, on January 13, 1869, with twenty Conference members present. Thirteen others were received on trial. Five Districts were formed, to four of which Negroes were appointed Presiding Elders. Several of the pastors in making their reports spoke of the bitterness and opposition manifested against them by white people. Levi Johnson said he often traveled by night "to avoid meeting insult or injury." S. M. Small said that his members had endured serious persecution.

His church and school house had been searched by persons who pretended to think that firearms were secreted there. One of his local preachers had been shot in cold blood at one of his meetings. Those perpetrating the deed then proceeded to a cabin and hung two women and one man up to the rafter till dead.

At this first session of the Conference three Societies each reported more than a thousand members; nine had less than one hundred. Ten years later 1,838 fewer members were reported than at the first session, although the number of churches had increased to 111. Among them were many small Societies, some with less than fifty members. Only Wesley Chapel in New Orleans had as many as five hundred members.³⁸⁹

Was the smaller total Conference membership the result of persecution? It would not seem so, otherwise how can one account for the much larger number of Societies? A probability is that greater attention was given to conditions of admission to membership and to more accurate reporting.

In their address at the 1868 General Conference the Bishops reported that "under the specific authority" given them four years before, nine Conferences had been organized in that part "of our southern territory" not previously included in Annual Conferences. The nucleus of white ministers in most cases consisted of preachers from northern Conferences, in all approximately fifty, who came from all sections of the North. These were supplemented by a few chaplains of the Union army who remained in the South when the troops were withdrawn. In two or three Conferences as, for example, Holston, former ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, sought admission and were received. The majority of the preachers were freedmen, many of whom as slaves had been licensed Local Preachers. The total number of Traveling Preachers in 1871, according to a computation made by L. C. Matlack, was 630, of whom 260 were white and 370 were Negroes. Lay members in the same year numbered approximately 135,000, of whom 47,000 were white and 88,000 were of African descent.³⁹⁰

* Louisiana Conference when organized embraced "the State of Louisiana." (G. C. Journal, 1868, p. 313.) Twenty-nine Circuits and Stations were listed. Members in full connection were 10,572; churches, 27; Local Preachers, 128; Sunday schools, 48, with 3,604 pupils. (Minutes, Louisiana Conference, 1869, pp. 22 f.) In 1895, with eight Districts, members numbered 12,594; churches, 200; Local Preachers, 520; and Sunday schools, 222.—Gen'l Minutes, Spring, 1895, p. 234.

The Church was beset by many problems during these years. It at first interpreted its mission chiefly in terms of ministry to the freedmen. Of these, many welcomed the efforts of the Church in behalf of their religious and social welfare, as the rapid growth in church membership clearly indicates. But there were many thousands who could not be reached effectively by any existing religious agency. Freed from the outward compulsions of slavery, and possessing only limited inner moral and religious restraints many drifted from place to place with no other purpose than to be on the move. Families were broken up and children and youth often left without care.

The lack of education of the Negro ministers was a great handicap. A chief difficulty in recruiting Negroes for the ministry was finding men who possessed even a modicum of education. The Committee on Education of the 1874 session of the Texas Conference declared that the "education of our preachers and people is the one pressing need," second only "to the possession of the grace of God." The Conferences recognized that too many of both preachers and people were "fervent, but ignorant; religious, yet enthusiastic; devotional, but . . . visionary." The president of Wiley University stated in 1878 that many of the preachers were "grossly ignorant, and much of their teaching . . . worthless if not debasing." So few of the freedmen were literate that it was not until the seventh session of the Texas Conference that a rule was adopted requiring applicants for admission to be able to read and write. Presiding Elders were obligated by this action to see that their preachers were "supplied with copybooks, and all necessary instructions." The situation in other Conferences differed only in degree. In 1873 Erastus O. Haven, later a Bishop of the Church, wrote:

The preachers seem to desire to improve; but practically, it must be acknowledged, our course of study has not been, and, indeed, could not have been, insisted upon. If the determination had been to require education first our work would have been comparatively insignificant. If now . . . education shall be neglected, we shall gradually lose what we have obtained, others will take the ground, or, as some have feared, the people will degenerate toward barbarism, and religion toward superstition and heathenism.

We need seminaries, by whatever name called, where particularly teachers and preachers may be educated. We have some started under the direction of the Freedman's Aid Society, and they should be endowed and adequately supported. This is absolutely essential to make our missionary appropriations thus truly and permanently useful. We should no longer take men directly from the plantation, and license and ordain them as ministers. We must insist upon their being as well educated as the teachers whom the School Boards employ to educate the children. This rule insisted upon will create schools. Where there is a will there is a way.³⁹¹

The complications of missionary work in the South were intensified, and its difficulty increased, by the strained relations between the ministers and lay people of the two Churches,* the Methodist Episcopal Church and the Meth-

* Hunter D. Farish: "Apart from the fact that Southern Methodists regarded the Northern occupation of the section as schismatic, they deemed the actions and affiliations of the representatives of the odist Episcopal Church, South. One of the causes of offense was the attitude of northern preachers and laymen toward the Negro. While the motives of the missionaries were undeniably Christian they at the same time reflected more or less a sentimentality and lack of realization of existing social conditions. Many tended to ignore—if they really possessed a knowledge of—the effects of generations of servitude on Negro character. They were largely blind to the illiteracy, ignorance, and superstition resulting from an almost total lack of schooling. The New York East Conference in 1865 passed a resolution demanding for the freedmen, as “native born citizens,” all of the “privileges, immunities, and responsibilities of citizenship . . . including . . . the protection of law and the right of suffrage,” and declaring that they “would not slacken their efforts until these rights” were obtained for the Negroes. For their part southern churchmen shared the deeply rooted resentment which was the inevitable result of defeat in war, a feeling accentuated by the occupancy of numerous southern churches by northern ministers. They also bitterly resented the assumption on the part of some northern ministers that only they were the friends of the ex-slaves.

Antagonism to the influence and efforts of the northern missionaries was intensified by their advocacy of certain social attitudes offensive to the South and by their sympathy with—in some instances participation in—political reconstruction policies. Some missionaries, for example, favored miscegenation and advocated legalizing intermarriage. Bishop Gilbert Haven * wrote in 1873:

“I can pardon a little the devil of slavery when I see what fine specimens of humanity it produced. If you want to see the coming race in all its virile perfections, come to this city [Charleston, South Carolina]. Here is amalgamation made perfect . . . It is an improved breed—the best the country has today.”

Missionaries also favored enforced association of races in the public schools.

The government policy of stern repression met with general favor in the North. The Christian Advocate declared it to be “stringent and decisive,” but as “clement as it should be”; Congress had not gone “one step too far.” To the South the stringency of the political rule seemed obnoxious and unjust and greatly intensified the bitterness of the long existent sectionalism. To the large majority of the white citizens the Republican party was anathema, regarded as the incarnation of all the attitudes which they despised Methodist Episcopal Church there sufficient grounds for excluding them from all fellowship with themselves. As a result the missionaries were socially ostracized by their co-religionists in a fashion that caused much sectional bitterness. Aggrieved at his presence and seeing in him only the politician and the incendiary, the Southerner sought to avoid contact with the missionary whenever possible.”—The Circuit Rider Dismounts, A Social History of Southern Methodism, 1865-1900, p. 158.

* Gilbert Haven (1821-80), born in Malden, Mass., attended Wesleyan Academy, Wilbraham, Mass., where he was converted at eighteen and united with the Methodists. In 1846 he graduated from Wesleyan University and became teacher and preacher in Amenia, N.Y. In 1851 he married Mary Ingraham. The same year he was received on trial in the New England Conference. During part of the Civil War he served as an army chaplain. He edited Zion's Herald from 1867 to 1872 when he was ordained Bishop. His scholarly mind and his talent as a writer, with an unusually fine flow of language and wit, combined with his zeal as a reformer to make him one of Methodism's most colorful and effective leaders, and possibly its most radical Bishop.—T. and hated. The northern missionaries, convinced that the achievements of the war could be conserved and their permanence guaranteed only through Republican political control, were not only committed to membership in the party but also active in forwarding its interests. Many of them used their pulpits to campaign for Republican candidates, and some became office holders. This practice, however, was in general frowned upon by the Church. The 1869 Tennessee Conference took cognizance of the acceptance by William H. Pearne of the office of Chief of Police of Memphis and formally requested his resignation "so soon as can be, without material injury to himself," and at the same time declared by resolution that it was "incompatible with the best interests" of the work "for members of this Conference to be actively engaged in partisan politics, or to hold political office." Some important state offices also were held by colored preachers during the period of Negro authority. One of the outstanding examples was that of James Lynch,* appointed in 1867 a Presiding Elder of the Mississippi Mission Conference, who in 1868 became Secretary of State in the "carpetbag" administration of the state.† Within a few years it became evident to the leaders of the Church that political partisanship and active participation in political affairs constituted a hindrance to church progress. In 1875 the Louisiana Conference recorded this resolution:

That whatever may have been the necessities in the past requiring or justifying the holding of any political office by the members of this Annual Conference, we are satisfied the time has now passed, and from this time forth we affectionately urge our brethren to abstain from political combinations and that in case any brother persists in refusing to do this, it is in our judgment, sufficient ground for his location by the Conference.

In 1885 the Georgia Conference disavowed any alliance of the Methodist Episcopal Church with "any political party," and declared that the Church would not "allow its policy to be dictated by the views and interests of political parties or leaders."³⁹²

During the 1868 session of the Kentucky Conference the Negro preachers, meeting separately, petitioned for an Annual Conference of their own, believing . . . that the organization of an Annual Conference in the State of Kentucky, composed of colored members, would tend to a more rapid and permanent

He began his ministerial work in the African Methodist Episcopal Church in Illinois and afterward held pastorates in the District of Columbia and Baltimore, Md. For two years he was editor of the Christian Recorder. upbuilding of the cause of God among the colored people, while it could not impede, but would probably facilitate the progress of that cause among the whites

The Conference thereupon passed a resolution favoring separate Conference organization.³⁹³ The General Conference of 1868, meeting three months later, passed the necessary enabling act and on March 2, 1869, at Harrodsburg, Kentucky, the Lexington Conference,* with an all-Negro membership, was organized. The members were reported to be "delighted with the plan of a separate Conference organization," and began the year with "an earnest determination to render the work successful."³⁹⁴ As in the case of other Negro Conferences pastoral support from the beginning to the close of the period was on a poverty level. In 1882 the average annual salary of the pastors, including house rent, was only $201. Thirty-three of the 102 Circuits and Stations reported no cash salary paid. In 1895 the average salary reported was $243.; the total amount paid, including house rent, was $29,317., which was $14,968. less than the total claim.³⁹⁵

The 1868 General Conference repealed the action of 1864 which, in determining that the Conferences formed in the southern states should be "Mission Conferences," restricted their rights and privileges, and declared the Alabama, Delaware, Georgia, Holston, Mississippi, South Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, Virginia and North Carolina, and Washington Conferences to be Annual Conferences "vested with all the rights, privileges, and immunities usual to Annual Conferences." In anticipation of this action these Conferences had elected provisional delegates—twenty-five in number—who on presentation of their credentials were admitted to membership in General Conference. Thus for the first time in the history of the Church Negroes were seated as General Conference delegates.³⁹⁶

The 1868 General Conference also authorized the Bishops to organize new Conferences in the South, in territories not included in Annual Conferences, and on approval of two-thirds of the members, to divide southern Conferences already formed.³⁹⁷

In 1874 the West Texas Conference (biracial) was set off from the Texas Conference, authorization having been given by the 1872 General Conference.³⁹⁸ At its first session in Austin, January 22-26, 1874, preachers were appointed to fifty-four charges in four Districts, seven additional appointments being left to be supplied.† The various difficulties against which many of the pastors contended in their ministry are illustrated by quotations from some of the Presiding Elders' reports:

* Lexington Conference, as organized, had two Districts, twenty-six charges, and eighteen preachers. (Gen'l Minutes, 1869, p. 44.) The 1872 General Conference enlarged the boundaries to include "the States of Kentucky, Ohio and Indiana." (G. C. Journal, 1872, p. 422.) In 1873, with eleven charges in Ohio added the Conference reported 8,142 full members; 42 churches; and 41 Sunday schools (Gen'l Minutes, 1873, pp. 234 f.). Over a period of twenty-two years only a slight gain in membership was registered, 884, although the number of churches increased more than threefold (to 142).—Ibid., Spring, 1895, p. 228.

† West Texas Conference reported in 1875, 5,338 full members; 21 churches; and 63 Sunday schools with 3,386 pupils. (Minutes, West Texas Conference, 1875, p. 16.) In 1877, after division, the Conference had 4,524 members; 42 churches; and 80 Sunday schools with 3,121 pupils. (Gen'l Minutes, 1877, p. 351.) In the next eighteen years the Church in West Texas more than doubled in membership, reporting in 1895, 9,604 members, 131 churches, and 168 Sunday schools with an enrollment of 9,037 pupils.—Ibid., Fall, 1895, p. 596.

Boerne and Fredericksburg. This brother [James Hutcherson] has found it hard to live and succeed on this work. He had to walk this large circuit for quite awhile before he could get a horse. The points are about twenty-five miles apart. He had to go home some two or three times and work to get bread for his family and has had to walk part of the way home. This is this brother's first year in the ministry and he can tell by this time whether or not he was called to preach the Gospel.

Smithville. Bro. Hart has done as well at Smithville as was expected considering the fact that he had only 15 members to begin with and not a dollar's worth of church property.

Hillsboro. The members formerly of our church felt they had been neglected in the past and became discouraged and united with the African Methodist Church, so Bro. Buell could not get a support and was obliged to give up the work. He has no report.

Davilla Circuit. The work . . . has dragged heavily on account of financial embarrassment. The pastor . . . has been obliged to earn his own living, and for that reason could not give so much attention to his work as he desired.³⁹⁹

By 1869 the Church had in its ministry in the South fourteen Negro Presiding Elders: the Washington Conference, six; Delaware, three; Mississippi, one; and Louisiana, four, most of whom had been slaves. Their administration was characterized as "prudent, active, and successful."⁴⁰⁰

As early as 1869 in Georgia the division of a Conference on race lines began to be agitated. At the session of that year a resolution was introduced, signed by nine Negro preachers, asking that the colored churches be formed into separate Districts under Negro Presiding Elders and, "as soon as possible, that the colored work in Georgia be organized into a separate Conference." A step in that direction was taken by the formation of one exclusively Negro District. A memorial to the 1872 General Conference was also approved asking for "the setting off of a colored Annual Conference in Georgia." The memorial was accompanied by a petition from a convention of Negro ministers and lay members stating reasons why the memorial should be approved. The principal grounds were: (1) separate Conferences would enable them to demonstrate their capacity for self-government; (2) would relieve the Church of "even a suspicion of the spirit of caste"; and (3) would make possible holding the Conference session at locations other than Atlanta to the great advantage of the Negro work. The Negro delegates to General Conferences were not, however, unanimously in favor of division, and the General Conference took no action.⁴⁰¹

Agitation on racial separation continued during the quadrennium 1872-76. Twenty white, Negro, or mixed Conferences had been organized on the border and in the South. Of these, Delaware, Washington, and Lexington were exclusively Negro in membership; Kentucky was exclusively white. Six were predominantly white—Holston, St. Louis, Arkansas, Virginia, West Virginia, and Missouri—but each had one or two small Negro Districts. Six were predominantly Negro—South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas and North Carolina. Three—Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee—were about equally divided between white and Negro members, and each of these had suffered a membership loss during the quadrennium. And finally, West Texas was biracial.⁴⁰² As the General Conference of 1876 drew near the Methodist press received many communications and articles on the pros and cons of “separation on the color line,” some largely sentimental and highly emotional, others factual and closely reasoned. An example of the latter was a letter from Tennessee written to the Christian Advocate by I. L. Chandler:

Every effort here to unite the races in congregations or schools has proved a failure, and as we come together in our conference assemblies there is a mutual tendency to occupy opposite sides of the room. If there was a moral principle involved there is not wanting the moral heroism to suffer. But the absence of suitable representation, the difficulty in securing a place to hold our conference sessions, combined with this mutual preference each for associating with his own race, renders it greatly desirable that the Tennessee and other mixed conferences should be rearranged so as to unfetter the Church, and advance her influence among all classes.⁴⁰³

Dr. Robert L. Dashiell, in an address to the Baltimore Preachers Meeting, gave his observations on the situation in New Orleans and Texas made during a trip through the Southwest. When asked whether the colored people desired separate Conferences he stated that they held varying opinions. His own judgment was that “the colored work would be the gainer by the change.”⁴⁰⁴

When the General Conference convened numerous memorials, petitions, and resolutions were presented from Annual Conferences, conventions, and individuals. The “matter of division,” the Committee on the State of the Church had reported, had caused much excitement, discussion, and personal feeling, and “the difficulties of securing a wise and satisfactory solution of the question have been greatly increased.” In the committee and on the floor of the Conference the issue provoked long discussion. Those who argued for biracial Conferences contended that “any movement toward separation would only foster . . . the spirit of caste, and increase and intensify a prejudice and hostility already too strong toward the colored people; that it would be the confession of an invidious distinction . . . wrong for the Christian Church to make; . . .” Also, by association in mixed Conferences, the white preachers would contribute to the education and elevation of the Negro members in social and religious character. One of the strongest speeches against separation was made by Joseph C. Hartzell. He said, in part:

It is not a question of social equality among the races. That is a question no legislation can touch, either in State or Church. It is not a question of compelling the races to sit in the same Church. That is a matter which must largely, if not altogether, be left to the people themselves. . . . It is not a question of the organization of districts in the annual conferences. . . . What, then, is the question? It is this: Shall all our ministers in the same territory in the South meet together once a year in conference, colored and white, just as we meet on this floor, and together transact the business of the Church, and receive their appointments from its Bishop. But, it is said, if we allow the people to organize Churches, and sometimes even districts, separately, why not so organize conferences? Why, sir, the difference is distinct and broad. In the one case you submit for the time being to the wishes of the localities, even though prejudice may rule, but in the other you commit the Church by legislation to a separation based upon race distinction. . . . To my mind we stand at a pivotal point, in the history of the Church. Let us do right, and our children will commend us. Separate on the color line, and we stab our friends in the South, and bring upon us the contempt of our enemies.⁴⁰⁵

In favor of separation it was argued that division would not be "any greater evidence of the spirit of caste than already prevails in nearly every Church and district" in the South; that the preference of Negroes for pastors and Presiding Elders of their own color was so strong that in Conferences where white and colored were about equal the churches and Conferences were steadily losing members to the Negro denominations.

General Conference decided that when the prevailing opinion was against separation that division should not be made, but in any Conference where a majority of both white and Negro members request division it should be made, "and . . . the Bishop presiding is hereby authorized to organize the new Conference or Conferences."⁴⁰⁶ This action cleared the way for segregation, and the General Conference proceeded to authorize division of the Georgia Conference* and the Alabama Conference. In 1871 Alabama had unanimously requested the 1872 General Conference to authorize the organization of a Negro Conference but the petition was not granted. In 1876 the request was repeated with the statement that because the 1872 Conference had not authorized separation, approximately one-fourth of the Negro members had withdrawn in a body and joined the Methodist Episcopal Zion Church. The petition was granted, the Conference (1876) instructing its

* "Georgia Conference shall consist of the Atlanta, Dalton, and Ogeechee Districts." Savannah Conference "shall consist of the Rome, Macon, Augusta, and Savannah Districts." (G. C. Journal, 1876, pp. 331 f., 372, 377.) "This arrangement was not entirely satisfactory to either race, . . . as neither grouping covered the entire state. Accordingly a commission from the two groups rearranged the boundaries so that the Georgia Conference should include all white work in that state and the Savannah Conference all the colored work." (E. J. Hammond, op. cit., p. 139.) The Savannah Conference was organized on Nov. 1, 1876, in Augusta with five Districts, seventy-nine appointments, and 9,728 members in full connection. It was a Conference of small churches. Twenty-seven charges, of which ten were Circuits, had fewer than 100 members. (Gen'l Minutes, 1876, pp. 159, 349.) By 1895 the membership had more than doubled, the Conference reporting that year 19,697 members. The six Districts listed 117 appointments and 224 churches.—Minutes, Savannah Conference, 1895, pp. 29, 31.

Committee on Boundaries "to divide the Alabama . . . [Conference]* as requested."⁴⁰⁷

At the Holston Conference of 1875 resolutions were passed favoring separate Conferences for Negroes on the ground that they would be "for the benefit of this portion of our people." In the 1876 General Conference session a Holston Conference lay delegate proposed division, "provided a majority of the colored ministers" desired it, but no specific authorization was given.⁴⁰⁸ A similar memorial, this time from the Negro members of the Conference, was presented to the 1880 General Conference, which authorized division on condition that a majority of both groups favored separation. At the Holston Conference session, October 20-24, 1880, "both classes, by a unanimous vote," requested division. Immediately afterward the East Tennessee Conference (Negro)† was organized.⁴⁰⁹

At the session of the West Texas Conference in January, 1876, a resolution proposing a white Annual Conference was tabled but at the next session, December, 1876, the Conference voted to divide, the white English-speaking group to be known as the Austin Conference.‡ The secretary, L. H. Carhart, wrote to the Christian Advocate, "West Texas is mostly filling up with a progressive white population, and separation seemed best. We can still do as much for the colored work as before, and be in a degree free from embarrassment otherwise inevitable."⁴¹⁰

Under the blanket authorization of 1876 a movement was inaugurated in the North Carolina Conference for the separate organization of the white contingent of the membership. A small group of ministers met in Concord, North Carolina, on January 28, 1880, and organized as the Southern Central Conference.§ "It is a small body," wrote E. Q. Fuller, but it "has elements of growth." The 1880 General Conference gave it formal authorization, changing the name to Blue Ridge Conference, and enlarging its boundaries to include the portion of the state formerly in the Holston Conference.⁴¹¹ In

* "Central Alabama Conference [Negro] shall include the Dadesville, Marion, and Huntsville Districts." (G. C. Journal, 1876, p. 370.) It was organized on Oct. 18, 1876, at Huntsville, with four Districts and forty-eight appointments. Members in full connection numbered 5,209; churches, 41; Sunday schools, 60, with 3,037 pupils. (Gen'l Minutes, 1876, pp. 154 f., 344 f.) The churches sustained a healthy growth, increasing by 1895 to 9,779 members; 132 churches; 149 Sunday schools, with 6,568 pupils.—Ibid., Spring, 1895, pp. 128 f.

† East Tennessee Conference (Negro), organized on Oct. 23, 1880, with twenty-four charter members, began with a membership of 2,491 in full connection, 53 Local Preachers, 36 churches, and 50 Sunday schools with 2,247 pupils. (Ibid., Fall, 1880, p. 416.) Fifteen years later (1895) it had four Districts, fifty-three appointments, seventy-five churches, 4,501 full members, and 100 Sunday schools with a pupil enrollment of 4,633.—Minutes, East Tennessee Conference, 1895, pp. 1, 8, 36.

‡ Austin Conference was organized on Nov. 15, 1877, at Dallas. Like most of the white Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the South it began with a small group, nine ministers in two Districts, with ten additional appointments to be supplied. Members in full connection numbered only 400; churches, six; Sunday schools, seven, with 715 pupils. (Gen'l Minutes, 1877, pp. 155, 352.) Growth was slow, the Conference in 1895 still reporting but two Districts; 36 appointments; 1,955 members; 18 churches; and 47 Sunday schools with 2,330 pupils.—Minutes, Austin Conference, 1895, pp. 2, 4.

§ In its first session the three Districts of the Conference had twenty appointments with 2,563 members in full connection. For eight appointments it was necessary to find supplies. In 1895, Districts had increased to five, with sixty-five appointments, 7,266 full members, and 146 churches.—Minutes, Southern Central Conference, 1895, pp. 14, 16; Minutes, Blue Ridge Conference, 1895, pp. 10 f.

1882 the white Circuits in South Carolina were added. In 1889 the Conference requested that many of the stronger Circuits "be left without any missionary appropriation," and that as much as possible of the amount be "applied to new places, and especially to the cities and towns of the state."⁴¹²

At the 1876 session of the Tennessee Conference the white members presented to the Negroes an appeal for division, basing their request on the "effect of the present condition of the Conference on the white work." Although the feeling of the majority of the Negro preachers was against separation the Conference voted for it 55 to 7. At the 1877 session division was completed, and the white contingent adopted the name Central Tennessee Conference.* It met in its first session at Dickson, Tennessee, November 28-December 2, 1878. Within its three Districts forty-nine appointments were listed, of which eight were left to be supplied. Material progress in the state for a considerable time following the close of the Civil War was slow, but beginning about 1880 conditions improved, emigration from other states increased the population, and the growth of the Church was accelerated. In 1895 the Conference Committee on the State of the Church reported a need for "as many more pastors as are now in the field," but stated that increased missionary aid would be required for their support.⁴¹³

South Carolina was one of the Conferences that challenged public opinion by persisting in biracial Conference organization. In 1880, a proposal was under consideration to extend the boundaries of the Southern Central (Blue Ridge, white) Conference into the state. The South Carolina Conference, which then had only five white members—three ministers and two teachers in Claflin University—voted to instruct its delegates to General Conference that "separate work, on the ground of color" was not wanted in connection with the Church in South Carolina. To this policy Bishop Simpson, writing in 1880, attributed the "utter failure to secure a hearing among the white people of the country," a condition he had not found elsewhere. South Carolina, he said, had only two white Societies of the Methodist Episcopal Church, both small.⁴¹⁴

In 1880 a resolution presented to General Conference stated that a "majority of the whites, as well as a very large majority of the colored members of the Mississippi Conference are utterly opposed to any separation on the color line . . ." The General Conference, however, passed an enabling act directing that a new Conference should be organized "when a majority of both classes" should ask for such division. No action was taken under this authorization but in 1888 the Conference in "the interest of that part of our Conference commonly known as the white work" asked that the General Conference

* The Central Tennessee Conference, as organized, reported 4,408 members in full connection; 96 churches; and 97 Sunday schools with 3,944 pupils. In 1895 the membership was 6,221; number of churches, 134; Sunday schools, 94, with 4,187 pupils.—Gen'l Minutes, Fall, 1878, p. 195; ibid., 1895, p. 587.

grant authority to divide. Authority was given for division "by the vote of two thirds of the members present and voting." In 1890 the Conference was divided, not however on racial but on geographical lines.⁴¹⁵ The Upper Mississippi Annual Conference* met in its first session on February 2, 1891. The division did not satisfy the minority who had sponsored the memorial of 1888 and they petitioned the 1892 General Conference for transfer to some other Annual Conference. An enabling act was passed authorizing transfer to the Alabama Conference if approved by "two-thirds of the members present and voting." Assent was given by a vote of 54 to 4.⁴¹⁶

After presiding over the 1880 session of the Florida Conference† Bishop Simpson wrote:

The Florida Conference . . . is composed of between thirty and forty members—all colored, except five. The year had been a pleasant one, but there had been no marked increase; one or two small churches had been erected, and a few new congregations formed. A large immigration of Northern people is causing a demand for our ministry.⁴¹⁷

An enabling act permitting the Florida Conference to divide "when a majority of both colored and white members" ask for division was passed by the 1884 General Conference. A proposal for separation was made at the 1886 session but of thirty-eight members voting, twelve white and six colored ministers voted in the affirmative while two white and eighteen colored members were opposed. Later in the session, five ministers from other Conferences delivered addresses by invitation on "Mixed Conferences, and the Result of Dividing them." A second vote was then taken with the result that a majority of the Negro members (fifteen of twenty-five) voted in favor of division.⁴¹⁸ The continuing Florida Conference (Negro) met in its first session January 13-17, 1887, at Ocala.‡ The first session of the St. John's River, the resulting white Conference, at which eleven preachers received appointments, was held on January 6-11, 1887.

Agitation for the organization of a separate Conference for the Negroes of Missouri and Kansas began as early as 1872.§ The General Conference of that

* At its first meeting the Upper Mississippi Conference, with five Districts and eighty-eight charges, reported 15,131 members. (Ibid., Spring, 1891, pp. 20, 124.) In 1895 the Conference had six Districts, the largest with twenty, the smallest with fourteen charges. Its 214 churches were valued at $99,575.—Minutes, Upper Mississippi Conference, 1895, pp. 30 ff.

† Florida Conference was organized on Jan. 29, 1873, with two Districts and twenty-seven appointments, of which five were to be supplied. The members in full connection numbered 1,670; churches, thirty-three; Sunday schools, twenty-seven. Bishop Ames, who presided, gave each of the two Presiding Elders "permission to draw on him for $300, provided that for every fifty dollars a church should be built."—Minutes, Florida Conference, 1873, pp. 1, 5-6, 9, 3.

‡ After separation the Conference had three Districts with thirty-five appointments and 2,983 full members. Twenty of the charges each had less than a hundred members. (Minutes, Florida Conference, 1887, pp. 3, 19, 25.) In eight years the number of appointments almost doubled (63), and membership increased to 4,195. (Gen'l Minutes, Spring, 1895, pp. 15, 126 f.) Growth of the St. John's River Conference was slower. Beginning with twenty-five Circuits and Stations and 698 full members, nine years later it reported twenty-nine charges with 1,074 members. With one exception all the Societies had less than a hundred members; twenty-one less than fifty.—Ibid., 1887, pp. 9-10, 111; ibid., 1895, pp. 13-14, 130.

§ Thought of a separate Negro Conference in Arkansas was beginning at this same time, resulting in the organization of the Little Rock Conference in 1878. See p. 207, first note.

year instructed its Committee on Boundaries "to consider the propriety" of forming a Negro Annual Conference and, on recommendation of the committee, authorized the Missouri and St. Louis Conferences to form a Conference, provided "a majority of the colored ministers desire it." The authorization not having been acted upon, the 1880 General Conference approached the subject from a slightly different angle by passing an enabling act authorizing the Negro members of the St. Louis, Missouri, and Kansas Conferences "to organize themselves into a separate Annual Conference, when a majority of each class [whites and Negroes] at any session of these several Conferences" ask for it and the presiding Bishops concur.⁴¹⁹ As before, this action had no result. Four years later in the Missouri Conference a Committee on Separate Conference was constituted which recommended division as "highly expedient." A majority voted for the recommendation (40 for, 25 against), but the Negro members, given permission for a separate vote, stood 9 against to 3 in favor. The recommendation was sent to the St. Louis Conference which also favored it by a vote of 42 to 28. The 1884 General Conference re-enacted the enabling act of 1880. When the Missouri Conference of 1886 met, a change of sentiment was evident. Certain Negro members this time requested separate organization and, voting separately, approved the request 13 to 3. With this action the white members, seventy in number, unanimously concurred. In the St. Louis Conference the action was approved by the colored members, 18 for and 1 against, and concurred in unanimously by the white members.⁴²⁰ The Central Missouri (Negro) Conference* met in Sedalia, Missouri, in its first session, March 24-28, 1887. In March, 1888, the Negro Methodists of Kansas† petitioned the Northwest Kansas Conference to endorse their request to General Conference either to be formed into a Mission Conference or to be attached to the Central Missouri Conference. Both Northwest Kansas and the Kansas Conference expressed approval, and when the 1888 General Conference met no less than four memorials asking for separation were presented. The Conference through its Committee on Boundaries included the Negro work in Kansas in the Central Missouri Conference. The 1889 membership of this Conference included eight elders, one probationer, and three persons listed as "miscellaneous," from Kansas.⁴²¹

* The Central Missouri Conference was organized with three Districts and sixty appointments; a membership in full connection of 5,453; eighty-six churches; and eighty-four Sunday schools. In 1895 its five Districts reported 98 appointments; 6,790 members; 134 churches; and 132 Sunday schools.—Minutes, Central Missouri Conference, 1887, pp. 7, 15 f., 38; Gen'l Minutes, Spring, 1895, pp. 64 f., 231.

† The Negro population of Kansas in 1870 was 17,108; by 1880 it had increased to 43,107. Most of those who migrated to Kansas in the later seventies settled in Dunlap County, in the Neosho Valley, in Cherokee County, or in Graham County. W. O. Lynch, Presiding Elder of the Colored Work on the Kansas District, which covered the entire state, reported in 1880 twelve charges with two to eight appointments each; thirteen ministers employed in the work; and "many calls from different portions of the State for more men."—H. C. Evans, Chief Editor, op. cit., pp. 57 f.; W. O. Lynch, letter, Christian Advocate, LV (1880), 27 (July 1), 425.

Creoles by J. W. Mougey, P. J. Robidoux, and F. L. Abernathy in 1891. The Gulf Mission* was organized at Jennings, Louisiana, January 19, 1893, in accordance with authorization of the 1892 General Conference. It embraced an area 300 miles east and west and 200 miles north and south. The nine charter members of the mission included five from Louisiana Conference, and one each from Central Ohio, Southeast Indiana, Kansas, and Southwest Kansas.⁴²²

By 1895 the developing process of segregation, first given official sanction by the General Conference of 1864, was complete. Annual Conferences with both white and Negro ministers no longer existed in the Methodist Episcopal Church. There were still some white churches in the North and in the South with Negro members but these were few. The early practice of separately enumerating the white and Negro membership in Annual Conference reports ceased in 1850. In that year the total number of Negro members in full connection was 26,309. The seventeen Negro Conferences organized between 1864 and 1895 reported in the latter year a total membership of 226,718 full members. Traveling Preachers in full connection and on trial numbered 1,704; Local Preachers, 3,745. The largest Conference was South Carolina with 156 ministers and 38,188 church members. These Conferences were located in fourteen southern states.⁴²³

While in numerous instances separation of Annual Conferences was favored, as our survey has shown, by both whites and Negroes it cannot be said that in general the demand for separate Conferences was spontaneous on the part of the Negroes. In some instances strong opposition was expressed and the 1876 General Conference, as we have seen, had many memorials both for and against division.

A serious defect in the policy of the Church was its failure to recognize that segregation involved a moral principle. By some, as we have seen, this was explicitly denied. By others separation on the basis of race or color was declared to be a violation of Christian principle. "Shall the Church disregard . . . color, despise it, oppose it, remove it from her pale, and as fast as she can from society?" asked Gilbert Haven. "What else is her mission?" The fact that there were Negroes who preferred churches and Conferences of their own did not prove that they ought to be separated, he declared, since this was true only because whites all but universally refused to recognize and treat them as equals. Only a few, of whom Haven was outstanding, had the prescience to recognize that the Church's failure to recognize segregation for what it is would make her task of world evangelization immeasurably more difficult.⁴²⁴

in which the Churches were active. Very early a tendency developed for the Churches to withdraw from the Commissions and set up denominational organizations. By midyear of 1866 there was only one leading denomination other than the Methodist Episcopal Church which retained affiliation with the Commissions. This development led a group of Methodist ministers and laymen who held official positions in the Commissions to call a Methodist convention to determine the Church's course:

If deemed best to continue our co-operation with the existing Commissions, the cause demands that the whole strength of our Church be secured to it. If a society to cooperate with our Missionary and Church Extension Societies seems to be required, it should be organized without delay. A decision should be reached at once⁴²⁵

The convention was held in Trinity Methodist Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, August 7-8, 1866. It resulted in the organization of the Freedmen's Aid Society,* with Bishop Davis W. Clark as President; John M. Walden, Corresponding Secretary; and Richard S. Rust, General Field Superintendent. A constitution was adopted which provided for a board of managers† and an executive committee. The object of the Society, as stated, was "to labor for the relief and education of the Freedmen, especially in co-operation with the Missionary and Church Extension Societies of the Methodist Episcopal Church." The 1868 General Conference, on recommendation of the Society, decided that the Corresponding Secretary should be a Traveling Preacher appointed by the Bishops.‡ Rust was appointed and Walden was made Recording Secretary.⁴²⁶

The Society began its operations in the South on November 1, 1866. At the end of its first year it had schools in Georgia, Tennessee, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, Louisiana, West Virginia, Virginia, and Florida, with forty employed teachers, and three thousand pupils enrolled.⁴²⁷ The 1868 General Conference gave the Society its sanction, and commended it to the Church for support, but, considering that the need for its work might be only temporary, refrained from giving it recognition as a General Conference organization. Annual Conferences were recommended to place it on their list for annual collections and ministers were urged "to secure to its treasury all the contributions of our people designed to promote the specific work in which it is engaged."⁴²⁸

* The original name, the Freedmen's Aid Society, was changed by the 1888 General Conference to Freedmen's Aid and Southern Education Society to "more fully express the scope of the educational work of the Methodist Episcopal Church among both races in the South."—J. C. Hartzell, report, Gospel in All Lands, July, 1888, p. 333; G. C. Journal, 1888, p. 348.

The Publishing Agent of the Western Book Concern was Treasurer.—Report of Organizing Convention of Freedmen's Aid Society . . ., 1866, p. 12.

‡ In 1872 General Conference decided that the Corresponding Secretary should be elected for a four-year term. Rust was elected, and re-elected quadrennially until 1888, when he was made Honorary Secretary. In that year J. C. Hartzell was elected Corresponding Secretary. The 1892 Conference provided for two Secretaries and elected Hartzell and John W. Hamilton.—G. C. Journal, 1872, pp. 301, 334; ibid., 1888, pp. 340 f.; ibid., 1892, p. 315.

Successive General Conferences made significant changes in the official status of the Society; that of 1872 authorizing annual apportionments to the Annual Conferences, Circuits, and Stations; and that of 1876 "a very large increase" of annual budget.⁴²⁹

Early in its history the Society decided that its schools should be open to all regardless of color. In 1878 it declared specifically, "Our schools are free to all, none are excluded on account of color, . . . and no school is exclusively colored."⁴³⁰ The 1880 General Conference directed the Society to aid schools for whites in the South as much as was possible without financial embarrassment to the schools for freedmen. In 1880-81 it entered upon this new educational policy. For the quadrennium 1880-84 it appropriated for white schools $48,901. as compared with $389,085. for Negro schools.⁴³¹

About 1884 segregation, which for years had been a vexatious problem in the Annual Conferences, became an acute issue in the F. A. S. schools. The 1884 General Conference, on recommendation of its Committee on the State of the Church, made this pronouncement:

Resolved, That this General Conference declares the policy of the Methodist Episcopal Church to be, that no member of any society within the Church shall be excluded from public worship in any and every edifice of the denomination, and no student shall be excluded from instruction in any and every school under the supervision of the Church because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.⁴³²

The problem was sharply focalized in an action of Chattanooga University, an institution sponsored by the Freedmen's Aid Society, which denied admission to certain students "for the sole reason that they were persons of African descent." The F. A. S. board of managers, on February 24, 1887, directed its executive committee "to use all proper means . . . to induce the trustees of the Chattanooga University to rescind the order" by which the students had been refused admission, and approved its efforts to secure the resignation of Professor Wilford Caulkins,* a member of the faculty. The board also threatened that if the exclusion of the students was not rescinded and the professor's resignation was not secured, the contract between the F. A. S. and the university would be terminated. The university "finally agreed to maintain the school according to the views" of the board but appealed the case to the General Conference. The Conference voted approval of the policy of the Society. The result was a large reduction in the student body of the following year, but this proved to be only temporary.⁴³³

* Professor Caulkins was charged with refusal to shake hands with a Negro minister of a Methodist church in Chattanooga. The trustees of the university continued to defend the exclusion of the students. They held (1) that the Church had authorized a school for whites, exclusively; (2) that an exclusively white school would reach many more southern people; (3) that if Negro students were admitted white students would not attend; (4) that the Church had built many more schools for Negroes, neglecting its white constituency.—J. D. Walsh, "The Methodist Episcopal Church in the South," Methodist Review, LXX (March, 1888), 257; Gilbert E. Govan and James W. Livingood, The University of Chattanooga: Sixty Years, ch. 5.

The Freedmen's Aid Society followed the policy of using the students of its institutions as assistants, believing that the practice supplied stimulus "to accurate scholarship and elevated character." In its report for 1886-87 it stated that in nearly every institution "colored teachers are now employed and by their enthusiastic and faithful toil are achieving success." It also stressed industrial training, not as a means of support but as an essential part of the education most needed among the Negro people. It likewise emphasized the importance of the freedmen's contributing to the construction and maintenance of the institutions established in their behalf. "They have aided liberally," the Society said in 1870, "in building churches, erecting school-houses, sustaining teachers, [and] supporting the aged and infirm . . ." In 1895 the students of the schools paid $57,653.15 in tuition and room rent.⁴³⁴

By 1895 educational institutions under the patronage of the Society numbered forty-four, including, for Negroes, a theological school, ten colleges and universities, and eleven academies, and for whites three collegiate institutions, and nineteen academies.⁴³⁵

INDIAN MISSIONS

Methodist Indian missions in 1844-45, preceding the division of the Church, numbered twenty; Methodist missionaries, including Presiding Elders of Indian Districts, forty. Of an Indian church membership totaling 4,339, by far the largest number, 3,557, were in the Indian Mission Conference.* When this Conference, following the division, decided to adhere to the South the Methodist Episcopal Church was left with only nine missions, fourteen missionaries, and an Indian membership of 778. Nine mission schools enrolled some two hundred pupils.⁴³⁶

To Stephen Olin the situation in 1846 lacked much of being satisfactory:

There is a lamentable deficiency of statistics and other precise reliable information; and how the proper authorities are able to proceed intelligently in the work of satisfying wants so inadequately set forth and so imperfectly known, we are really at a loss to conjecture. It is equally difficult to divine how, with the unsatisfied wants which are disclosed, the Christianizing process is sustained without serious and irretrievable embarrassments. There are missionaries ignorant of any language known to their flocks, who are yet wholly unprovided with interpreters, or left to struggle on with such casual helps as the Indians happen to be able and willing to supply. Schools, which must have been established at considerable expense, lack books and teachers, without which the name of such an agency might as well be left out of the account. . . . Almost every missionary who gives any account of the state of his charge, complains bitterly of the utter inefficiency, or of the utter want of this right arm of an Indian mission. We know not by whose direction or oversight such a state of things is allowed to exist at a time when the missionary

See Vol. II, 171 f.

treasury is not absolutely exhausted, and when we venture to say an appeal to the Church would afford ample means for removing an obstacle fatal to all reasonable hopes of success, and, we will add, for wiping away a reproach.⁴³⁷

In his report for 1846-47 Missionary Secretary Charles Pitman called attention to the lack of suitable schools for Indian children and stated that the need had been presented to the General Missionary Committee at its 1846 meeting. This had resulted in an increased appropriation "which, though far from being equal to the demand, afforded considerable relief," and efforts had been made during the year to erect schoolhouses in some of the missions. Funds, also, were contributed by the War Department for Indian Work. Three years later the Secretary reported greater activity in evangelization. Also, individual contributions, in addition to the Board's appropriation, had enabled several missions "to purchase lands, erect necessary buildings, and avail themselves of educational privileges." There was no evidence, however, that serious attempts had been made to correct the more basic deficiencies of the Indian missions program.⁴³⁸

The passing of another year, and the advent of a new administration in the Missionary Society, saw efforts made toward the formulation of a comprehensive policy for Methodist Indian missions. The Missionary Society's Report for 1850-51 set forth certain governing principles: (1) government and Christian missions should be committed to a common program; (2) missionary effort should be directed "chiefly, if not exclusively, to the bands," or tribes, which are settled upon the soil; (3) the missionary should have his own house in which to dwell with his family thus affording an example of Christian domestic life, with "a neat plain church" adjoining, and a conveniently located schoolhouse; (4) in the schools instruction of the children should be in the English language: we "doubt whether the Indians will ever be raised to a good state of civilization and religion, without the use of the English language"; (5) the Church from her own and from government funds, aided by private benevolence, should purchase lands in various locations and grant the Indians occupation and use of them, thus fixing them on the soil with the missionaries and teachers.⁴³⁹ The 1852 General Conference directed its Committee on Missions "to consider and report specially on the necessity and manner of extending . . . missions among the Indian tribes." * In its 1854 Report the Society stated that its new policy had become "more and more approved by experience, and by the concurrence of the Indian Department at Washington." It planned to give each family at Iroquois Point "from five to ten acres in a perpetual lease" on condition that it would never be sold, leased, or rented to a white man. It offered to sell any family additional land at the price paid the government for it.⁴⁴⁰

* The policy of gradual expansion of Indian missions was interrupted in 1856 when the General Missionary Committee proposed a reduction of the number of missions and their concentration at fewer places in order to lessen the expense.—Report of the General Missionary Committee in Thirty-eighth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1856), p. 22.

GOVERNMENT AND THE CHURCHES

The allocation plan in time was tied in with what was known as the "reservation system" by which areas of land were set apart by the government for the sole occupancy of particular tribes,* with the provision that each tribe must remain within the reservation set apart for its exclusive occupancy. At first tribal lands were held in common. Decades later, individual allocations of land were made to members of the tribe.† In both cases dependence and pauperization were fostered by the payment of outright grants or annuities for cattle, farming implements, seeds and—in many cases—for food. By the sixties sharp criticism of government policies and administration had been heard. William H. Goode, a veteran Indian missionary, criticized government appointments to the Indian agencies.‡ He charged that instead of placing good and tried men in the position, "there have been constant changes, . . . filling the places of one set of novices and bloodsuckers with another of the same character." Charles Elliott voiced numerous objections to the "reservation system," particularly to the removal of Kansas tribes to reservations in the Indian Territory. Writing a little later S. G. Arnold declared in the Methodist Quarterly Review that the Indian Service "for a century [had] been a nest of corruption, speculation and fraud."⁴¹

Such criticisms were a factor in influencing President Johnson to appoint in 1867 a Peace Commission, headed by General W. T. Sherman, "to suggest or inaugurate some plan for the civilization of the Indian." The report of the commission "was a terrible indictment of the government's treatment of the Indians." The report led President-elect Grant to inaugurate what came to be known as the "Peace Policy": "to maintain peace among the various tribes of Indians, promote civilization, . . . relieve their necessities, and encourage efforts at self-support." Grant proposed to separate the Indian Service completely from politics and to convert it into a missionary enterprise by ap-

* The beginning of the "reservation system" cannot be definitely dated. From time immemorial various Indian Nations and tribes east of the Mississippi had occupied lands claimed as their own whose title was recognized by the federal government. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the famous decision of Chief Justice John Marshall, declared that Indian Nations and tribes "had always been considered distinct, independent political communities," retaining original, natural rights to their lands "with boundaries accurately described" (see Vol. II, 129 f., 134). In the case of the several settled eastern tribes removed west of the Mississippi by government, tracts of land were assigned, in exchange for their original holdings, which became known as reservations. Of the western Indians many were wandering tribes without localized habitations. One by one these tribes were forcibly removed to reservations agreed upon by treaty.

† In 1837 the Dawes Land Severalty Law was passed by Congress, obligatory upon all tribes except eleven which were specifically exempted from its operation. It provided for the survey of reservations and the allotment of tracts of 40 to 160 acres to each person; the undivided land made subject to purchase by the government for sale to settlers, the proceeds to be held by government as a trust fund for education and civilization of members of the tribes.

‡ Originally each Indian reservation was in charge of a bonded agent and the administrative organization was termed an agency. Reservations were grouped geographically into superintendencies, each with a district superintendent directly responsible to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. "About the middle of the 19th century, . . . the office of superintendent was abolished and agents became directly responsible to the Commissioner." (F. W. Hodge, Ed., Handbook of American Indians North of Mexico, I, 21 f.) In 1865 there were under the Department of the Interior some thirteen superintendencies and fifty-eight agencies and sub-agencies for administration of Indian affairs. In 1871, by Act of Congress, the government ceased to acknowledge or recognize any Indian Nation or tribe as an independent Nation or power with whom a treaty could be entered into, and declared the Indians to be wards of the government, subject to its control.—16 U. S. Statutes, p. 566, as quoted by Thomas Donaldson, The Public Domain . . . , pp. 240, 244.

pointing all the Indian agents and sub-agents from lists of persons nominated by the Churches.⁴⁴² The President asked the Missionary Society to supply fourteen agents to assume administrative charge of reservations within which the Methodist Church had previously undertaken some religious work.* At this point the Society immediately confronted a practical difficulty. Where were men with the necessary qualifications to be found who would be willing to undertake the onerous task? Could the Society command the additional funds to support missionaries in addition to the government agents at the agencies? For obviously the intent of the program could not be realized without missionaries as well as administrators. In view of this the Society was reluctant to accede to the President's request. Finally, however, it agreed to cooperate. Nominations for agents were submitted as rapidly as competent men† could be found, and by 1874 ‡ the full quota was reached.⁴⁴³

For one reason or another, however, many of those appointed failed to continue. So frequently were changes made that in 1877 only three of the agents of 1874 remained. Relations of agents with the Indians were much improved. No longer were complaints made of dishonesty in the handling of the Indians' funds or of the victimization of them in other ways which had formerly prevailed. But from a missionary standpoint the changed order left much to be desired. The Missionary Society could not, or at least did not, supply funds to the agents for religious or educational activities. Few well-trained, full-time missionaries were appointed. Year after year missions were included as charges within various Conferences and year after year were left "to be supplied." Missionaries were not readily available. Schools also were an urgent necessity but were not maintained on all reservations. In 1874 the General Missionary Committee appropriated $3,500. to be divided among seven Conferences to make it possible for Circuit preachers to act as supplies and "preach through interpreters, in some instances aided by native helpers"—precisely the condition deplored by Stephen Olin twenty-eight years earlier.

* The Society of Friends had taken the initiative in urging Grant to inaugurate a peaceful, Christian policy toward the Indians. He was undoubtedly strongly influenced by their appeal and first asked the Friends to nominate members of their Society as Indian agents. The success of the policy was almost immediately evident and the next year a similar request was made to other Churches. (Malcolm McDowell, Christian Missions Among the American Indians, Bulletin 280, Board of Indian Commissioners.) In 1877 agents were supplied by the several religious groups as follows: Methodist, 14; Protestant Episcopal, 9; Presbyterian, 7; Friends (Orthodox), 7; Friends (Hicksite), 6; Congregational, 6; Roman Catholic, 5; Reformed, 3; Baptist, 2; United Presbyterian, 1; Free Will Baptist, 1; Christian Union, 1; Unitarian, 1.—S. G. Arnold, "President Grant's Indian Policy," Methodist Quarterly Review, LIX (July, 1877), 413.

† The agents in most cases were preachers, responsible to their Annual Conferences, to which they were obligated to report. The missions within the agencies were likewise sponsored by Annual Conferences and the missionaries—where there were missionaries—also made reports to the Conferences. Neither the agents' reports, nor those of the missionaries, with a few exceptions, were transmitted to the Society.

‡ Agents in office in 1877 were: California, Richard C. Parker at Hoopa Valley, J. L. Birchard at Round Valley, C. G. Belknap at Tule River—all members of California Conference; Oregon, J. H. Rook at Klamath, William Bagley at Siletz—both members of Oregon Conference; Idaho, W. H. Davidson of Rocky Mountain Conference at Ft. Hall, and C. N. Stowers of Montana Conference at Lemhi; Washington Territory, C. A. Huntington at Neah Bay, G. A. Henry at Quinalt, both belonging to Oregon Conference, and J. H. Wilbur of Columbia River Conference at Yakima; Montana, George W. Frost at Crow, Wellington Bird at Ft. Peck, both from Rocky Mountain Conference, and John Young of Oregon Conference at Blackfeet; Michigan, G. W. Lee of Detroit Conference at Mackinaw.—Fifty-ninth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1877), p. 173.

In behalf of the Society it should be said that it could not get from the agents the kind of reports—or, in fact, any reports—that might have stimulated contributions.⁴⁴⁴

In time the "Peace Policy" proved unsatisfactory both to the Society and to the government. Supervision of the missions was left almost entirely to the Conferences within which they were located. In 1880 the Missionary Society stated that from "the fourteen agencies under our care we have in general received but little information." "The Conferences have not succeeded very well in their supervision of this department of work." None of the Conferences in the West and Northwest had sufficient men to supply all of the white Circuits and Stations. As a consequence missions were listed as appointments but more often than not were left without missionaries, or in some cases men appointed to the missions were after a year or two drawn into the regular work. In 1881, following the accession of Arthur to the presidency, under the influence of Secretary of the Interior Henry M. Teller, the "Peace Policy" was abrogated, and all official relation of the denominations to the government agency program was entirely sundered.⁴⁴⁵

From early days appropriations were made by the government for support of mission schools under sectarian auspices.* In many instances the government by agreement provided the schoolhouses and paid the teachers, making salary remittances in some cases to the Missionary Society and in others direct to the teachers. In a few instances the entire support of Indian missions was furnished by the government. The Sault Ste Marie Mission, for example, in the forties was maintained by an annual government appropriation of $1,400., the Missionary Society making no appropriation. The W. H. M. S. Indian School at Pawhuska, Oklahoma, established in 1887, in four years (1887-91) received $12,453.52 of federal funds. In 1892 the amount set apart by government for Indian education under Methodist auspices was $13,980., all of which was paid to the W. H. M. S. direct or to schools under its control.⁴⁴⁶

Beginning about 1888 sentiment against national and state government appropriations for sectarian education of the Indians rapidly increased in some quarters.† In 1892 the General Conference declared such appropriations to be wrong in principle and contrary to the letter and spirit of the federal constitution. By formal resolution it requested the "Missionary So-

* L. F. Schmeckebier: "The missionary schools, known as 'contract' schools, reached their greatest extent in the fiscal year 1892, when over $600,000, or more than one-fourth of the total appropriation for education, was expended in this way."—Op. cit., pp. 197 f. See also Vol. II of this series, pp. 113-17.

† Agitation against sectarian appropriations on Constitutional grounds was a principal purpose of the National League for the Protection of American Institutions, of which James M. King of the New York Conference was general secretary (1894-98). The National League publicized the fact that much the largest appropriation was given to the Roman Catholic Church for its program among the Indians. During the eight years 1886-93, inclusive, "of $3,767,951 awarded to contract schools, $2,366,416 was given to the Roman Catholics." For the year 1892, of the total of $525,881. set apart for all contract schools the Catholics received $369,535; "the Presbyterians get less than $30,000; the Congregationalists a little more than $25,000; and the Episcopalians only $4,860."—James M. King, "Indian Contract Schools and the Churches," Gospel in All Lands, November, 1892, pp. 508 f.

cieties . . . to decline to either make application to, or receive from, the national government any moneys for educational purposes among the Indians." 447

INDIAN MISSIONS EAST OF THE MISSISSIPPI

Indian missions east of the Mississippi were unaffected by the division of the Church. At that time work was carried on in the Michigan, Wisconsin, Oneida, and Black River Conferences, and a few years later missions were established in the Genesee Conference.⁴⁴⁸

Indian Missions in Michigan.—In a statement made to the Missionary Society in 1847 Bishop E. S. Janes estimated the Indians in Michigan at not less than five thousand. They were scattered over the state, principally in the Upper Peninsula, in small settlements, in many cases of not more than fifty or sixty, the remnants of what earlier had been large tribes. The Chippewa were the most numerous, but there were also scattered bands of Ottawa, and at least one small group of Potawatomi.

In the course of the first few years after division there were a number of missions under Church auspices. In the Conference year 1848-49 Bishop Janes visited most of those then in existence and commented on the paucity of facilities and equipment. "All the buildings occupied by the Missionaries," he stated, "are small log school houses, inconvenient for school purposes, and wholly unfit for Church purposes; consequently in the Winter they can hold no quarterly or other large meetings." The Bishop's interest was such that he undertook personally to raise funds for the purchase of lands on which the Indians might themselves build homes, schools, and churches.

Being convinced . . . [that this was the proper policy], our missions in Michigan began to shape their course accordingly; and with the advice and active assistance and cooperation of Bishop Janes, lands were purchased in the vicinity of Flint River, by private contributions, in the name of the Missionary Society, and given to Indian families in small quantities for cultivation, or sold to them at government price; and still other lands were purchased by the Indians themselves. Thus, little Indian communities were created around each mission . . . They built themselves small, comfortable houses . . . But it was soon found that they could not get any more lands, and thus the growth of these young and promising Indian communities was repressed.⁴⁴⁹

As early as 1839 the missions in northern Michigan had been formed into an Indian Mission District. This included Sault Ste Marie* and Kewawenon. From 1844 on for a brief few years Fond du Lac and Sandy Lake in Minnesota† were also included. During these years other appointments were added to the District, though they were not among Indians.

John H. Pitzel, one of the ablest of all the missionaries of this period, who gave nine years of devoted service to Michigan Indian work, was appointed to the Sault Mission in 1843. In 1850 he described it as forming "quite a little circuit,"⁴⁵⁰ including several groups of Indians:

About six miles above [the Sault] are a few families; then again at Carp River, about 28 miles from here; next Naomikong; and the farthest, on Lake Superior, is Tequamenon River, about eight miles beyond N[aoimikong].⁴⁵¹

A year later Pitezel reported that the Naomikong band had made greater progress than during any previous year.

Living on their own land they have greater encouragement to try to advance in civilization . . . They have built some eight or ten comfortable log houses . . . They are gradually laying aside the chase, and turning their attention to agriculture and other industrial pursuits.⁴⁵²

In March, 1854, James Shaw wrote to the Christian Advocate that about October 1 he had "removed to Iroquois [the new location for the Sault Ste Marie Mission] . . . as no one was appointed to it at the conference."

There are now ten Indian families settled here, and several others are coming, after sugar-making. Several have been here to work during the winter. . . . There are now about seventy-three members connected with the mission. . . . Our meetings have been well attended, and very interesting.⁴⁵³

When twelve months had passed, Shaw, now Superintendent, stated that the mission was "in a healthy state," and he considered Iroquois Point to be "the best location that could be found in all the Lake Superior country." By 1858 the settlement had increased to thirty-three Indian families, all except three or four in possession of five-acre lots; and eighteen houses owned by the Indians with a number of others under construction. Church membership stood at seventy-five; the Sunday-school enrollment at about forty-five; and the day school above sixty. The high point in membership was reached in 1860 when ninety-five members were reported. In 1861 membership had decreased to fifty-three, remaining at approximately that level for many years. In 1887, with no expression of regret for the failure of what had begun as one of the most promising of Michigan's Indian missions, the Presiding Elder wrote to the Missionary Society:

As white settlements are forming . . . I trust the day is not far distant when . . . [these Indian missions] can become appointments in connection with white charges and the expense to the Missionary Society lessened, if not entirely abolished.

The next year he stated that the mission at Iroquois "reports 6 members and 18 probationers." Despite its decline and the necessity often of combining the work with other appointments, the mission continued in operation through 1895.⁴⁵⁴

The Kewawenon Mission on the east side of Keweenaw (Kewena) Bay, established in 1833 by John Sunday, Indian missionary, and John Clark,* was likewise one of the earliest of Chippewa Methodist missions. In 1846 J. H. Pitezel, missionary-in-charge, reported sixty-four members in Society, of whom five were white settlers. The mission was maintained by an annual appropriation of $250. from the government and $450. "appropriated by the Missionary Committee of the Michigan Conference." While the Society made little or no net increase in membership from year to year, partly because of gradual diminution of the Indian population, there was among the members increasing interest in agriculture and in development of mechanical skills. Nelson Barnum, missionary-in-charge in 1848, saw a prospect of increased stability:

* See Vol. II, 155 f.

the Indians have bought some land on which they intend to live, and it seems probable that they will continue to improve, to pay more attention to farming, and to be, in no mean sense, a light to other bands of their degraded and deeply injured brethren.⁴⁵⁵

Kewawenon was fortunate in its Indian leadership. In 1865, George Blaker, trained by William Case in missionary work under the Wesleyan Missionary Society in Canada, was appointed as supply. In 1866 he was admitted to the Detroit Conference on trial and appointed to Kewawenon, continuing through 1869. After that, the fate of Kewawenon became uncertain. From year to year it was made part of a Circuit with one center of work or another: Iroquois Point, L'Anse, Pequaming. By 1890, it was connected with "two white congregations" but the Indians had "preaching once every Sabbath." The membership stood at eighty-five, and the property included a chapel and parsonage.⁴⁵⁶

Flint River Mission—originally called Lakeville—was established in the Lower Peninsula in 1841, under Indian leadership.* In less than five calendar years about three hundred Indians had been converted, most of whom remained faithful. In 1847 the mission included eight preaching places.† The Pehesing (Lakeville) band owned 520 acres of land in Lapeer County. The missionary built a log-house parsonage and the Indians built "ten or twelve comfortable houses," having lived previously in wigwams. At Bradley's Chapel the Missionary Society owned 240 acres; the Indians, 729 acres, and in addition 520 acres held in trust for them—the largest landholding of any band. Within two years they had constructed about twenty log houses. At Kazier Station the Indians owned "one hundred fifteen and three fourths acres of land, of which five acres . . . [were] under improvement." They also had "several horses and hogs, and two cows," and had "built eight or ten log houses." For the 1849-50 appointments the missionary personnel of the

Flint River Mission were divided between two Circuits, the Kazier and Janesville, and this arrangement prevailed until the removal of the Indians in 1856.⁴⁵⁷

The Nottaway Mission, also in southern Michigan, ministered in 1846 to a band of some sixty Potawatomi, the remnant of a settlement established many decades earlier. In 1846 they had "six log dwelling houses, one log school house, and a frame barn." They owned 120 acres of farm land at the settlement and "eighty acres of sugar land in Kalamazoo county, about four miles distant." The mission maintained without government aid a weekday school and a Sunday school. One half of the band were church members. In February, 1848, the missionary and his Indian interpreter visited for the first time an Indian band at Meshimnekonig in the Grand River country, about eighty miles north of the mission. White peddlers had plied Chief Muh-nut-quott and his men with whisky until they were in a drunken stupor; but after many visits the missionary succeeded in winning the chief and others. At the same time missionaries from Nottaway were reaching a number of other bands, and reporting success on a small scale. The work grew so rapidly at Meshimnekonig that M'Clure Chapel was built in 1851, and in 1852 the "Grand River Mission" was set off as a separate Circuit, with two appointments. The following year missionary O. D. White reported eighty-six members in full connection.⁴⁵⁸ In 1856, with fifty members on the Society roll, Peter Marksman—experienced Indian missionary—was appointed to Grand River. This was the last year of work at this location.

From 1852 on the Indians of Michigan had been concerned over the possibilities of their removal west of the Mississippi. M'Clure wrote to Washington to inquire, but was assured that it was not proposed. However, the government looked with favor on what the Missionary Society had already proposed and practiced in the Lake Superior area: the settling of the "Indians in large bodies on the soil, so that they shall become farmers and citizens." In 1855 the federal Indian Department met with delegates from the Ottawa, Chippewa, and Potawatomi tribes, assembled in council by the Indian Commissioner, to agree upon a treaty to accomplish this purpose. The result was a treaty providing for the allocation of specific tracts of land in accordance with the Indians' own choice, and division of the land "in severalty so that each Indian family, or proper member of the tribe, will have his own farm in his own right." The Indians were to be settled at two principal places: the one at Iroquois Point, on Lake Superior; and the other in Isabella County, in the lower Peninsula. By this policy there is required fewer missionaries; and the government, by treaty, provides schoolhouses, and pays the teachers.⁴⁵⁹

The scheduled removal did not greatly upset the established mission work in Michigan, and in fact, as indicated above, was in harmony with the Church's plan in the Upper Peninsula. Kewawenon and Iroquois Point remained in the Lake Superior District, which in 1856 became a part of the new Detroit Conference. In order to strengthen and unify the Indian program on the Lower Peninsula by preparing the Indians for removal, the Michigan Conference, under Bishop Ames' leadership, constituted in 1855 an Indian Mission District, under W. H. Brockway. This included the four missions then in existence: Kazier, Janesville, Grand River, and Nottaway.* In midsummer, 1856, Brockway fixed a time for the migration to Isabella County, "a laborious and expensive . . . [expedition]," involving a journey about "fifty miles beyond any considerable white settlement, through "a vast unbroken wilderness," most of the way heavily timbered, with no roads "better than deer paths."⁴⁶⁰ The party, when assembled, consisted of about one hundred persons, including most of the people of the Kazier Mission.

In July, 1857, Brockway visited the newly located Isabella Mission.

The brethren had enlarged their bark church to about twenty-five by fifty feet, which was filled to its utmost capacity with attentive and devout worshippers. Twenty children were baptized, and one hundred persons came to the communion.⁴⁶¹

The Minutes of that year listed appointments for three missions—two of which were at the new site—Isabella, Oceana, and Saginaw (Pe-sa-iag-a-ning). The government supplied a sawmill for the Isabella County Reservation and many of the Indians built good log houses, cleared some of the land, and began to raise food crops. In addition to the land grants the government supplied annual annuities for ten years, farming implements, seeds, and cattle; and set apart an educational fund of $30,000., at the same time assuming supervision of the schools. In 1887 Isabella Mission was under the care of the preacher in charge of the adjoining white Circuit. It remained on the Conference lists through 1892, when it disappeared from the Minutes. In all likelihood, as was a usual enough policy, the work was combined with that of a Circuit and surrendered its name.

While the Saginaw Indians were mostly settled at the new location in Isabella County some remained on their reservation on Saginaw Bay. The latter continued to live in their old homes, worshiped in an old log school-house, and maintained a day school. In 1857 Peter Marksman was appointed to the mission (Pe-sa-iag-a-ning) and continued in charge until September, 1859. It continued to be listed up to 1863 in the Michigan Conference. When it was heard of again, in 1867, the old name of "Pesahganing" was resumed and Detroit Conference was responsible for the work. In 1895 the mission was still in existence, having survived with Missionary Society and Conference aid, though from 1878 on it was combined with Pinconning, which itself had been an appointment of the Flint River Mission in the 1850's.

* In their last full report (1854) the Kazier Mission reported work at two stations, Bradley Chapel and Kazier; Janesville Mission at five, Janesville, Pinconning, "Pe-see-gun-ning" (Pesahganing or Pe-sa-iag-a-ning), Ke-che-as-sin-ning, and Hamline; Nottaway listed work among five bands; and Grand River showed two Stations, Me-shim-ne-koning and "Oo-wish-ta-yahs," in Montcalm County.—Thirty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1854), pp. 72-78.

For a time the Oceana Mission, with a constituency of about eight hundred Indians, seemed to make considerable progress. The two principal appointments were at Pere Marquette and Pent Water on the eastern shore of Lake Michigan. In 1865, with Isaac Greensky, the Indian missionary in charge, it reported 142 full members. As the mission had no church building religious services were held in the government schoolhouses. It continued to be listed in the Conference Minutes until 1873.

The Pine River Mission in Oceana County first appears in the Minutes for 1859 "to be supplied." More than a thousand Indians were embraced within its area. At two of the four preaching places meeting houses were built by "the means and toils of the Indians, unaided by anyone else." In 1866 the mission reported 150 members in full connection, and the Presiding Elder declared them to be "steadily advancing in civilization, intelligence, and piety." This mission, he said, "will soon swallow up all the Protestant missions in the Grand and Little Traverse countries." By 1873 the membership had increased to two hundred. This year Pine River was combined with Charlevoix Indian Mission as one pastoral charge. A sharp decline in the number of members ensued, only fifty-six being reported at the close of the year. Pine River did not again appear in the Conference record but Charlevoix continued through 1879.⁴⁶³

The consolidation objective of the government was not fully achieved. Various scattered bands were not affected by the treaty of 1856 and after ten years, with the treaty no longer in effect, conditions as a whole worsened. The missionary personnel was not maintained and most of the schools were closed. Settlers moved in and public schools were established but Indian children were not welcomed. In many cases the only religious services were such as could be provided by the pastors of adjoining white Circuits. At the Isabella Mission Secretary Leonard found in 1890 only four remaining congregations, no Sunday schools and "the work as a whole . . . very feebly sustained." "In Oceana County," he said, "we have no work, and the Indians have no attention except from the Roman Catholics."⁴⁶⁴

During this period in both Conferences of Michigan a number of other Indian missions were inaugurated with varied success. The records yield no data on them and since in these Conferences Indian work was not considered of sufficient importance to warrant a Conference committee for its consideration and supervision there is no record other than the mere appearance of their names in the Minutes, or an occasional reference to them in the Annual Reports of the Missionary Society. Apparently the Crystal Lake Indian Mission in the Michigan Conference could not be sustained after three years (1874-76). Riverton, also in the Michigan Conference, was one of the more successful missions, being initiated in 1873 and surviving up to 1893. Petoskey likewise did well, running from 1877 on with only a slight break; also Northport, begun in 1873. Elk Rapids, founded 1874, was listed under the appropriations for Indian missions steadily from 1886 through 1893, although not appearing in the appointments after 1879. However, in 1887 the Annual Report refers to work being carried on under A. J. Eldred and George Nada.⁴⁶⁵ It is even possible that this work, since it first appears in 1874, was a continuation of the Oceana Mission.* Calkinsville for a number of years was part of the Isabella appointment (1882-88). It dropped out of the Minutes in 1889 until 1893 when it returned alone, and in 1895 was slated for an Indian work appropriation. Among the later Indian projects of the Michigan Conference was Vandecar, begun in 1889 and continued at least through 1892 when it disappears from the record—perhaps to emerge under another name, for instance, Free Soil or Kewadin, both of which appear in 1894 as Indian work. From 1889 to 1893 Torch Lake briefly served as an Indian mission; perhaps after that it too changed its name. That latter year "Leaton and Indian Mission" made its appearance in the Minutes. In Mason County, Scottville for a time was combined with the Riverton Indian Mission appointment, and after Riverton in 1892 fades out of the record, Scottville is listed alone. The 1890 Missionary Society Report stated: "We have one [Indian] congregation in Mason County attached to Scottville charge, served by Rev. J. W. Perkins. . . . There being no church building the services are held in a schoolhouse."⁴⁶⁶

When in 1856 the Indians in southern Michigan allowed themselves to be relocated at centers in Isabella, Oceana, and Mason Counties, they abandoned the missions which had been established for them at Bradley's Chapel and Nottaway, and as we have shown formed new missions at their new location. It is possible, though, that not all the Indians participated in the removal and that some who remained behind were Methodists. To give credence to this conjecture is the presence some years later in the Michigan Conference appointments of both a "Bradley" and a "Nottawa" Indian mission. Bradley first appears again in 1882 on a Circuit with Wayland and Moline; Nottawa shows up in 1884 combined with Waukeshma. By 1886 Bradley and Nottawa are found together on a Circuit and remain so through 1890. It is possible when the 1890 Society's Report referred to a work among the "Pottawattamie and Ottawa tribes" in Calhoun, Allegan, and Ottawa Counties, where a church of sixty-two members and ten probationers had been organized, it had this mission in mind.⁴⁶⁷ The Ottawa colony had earlier been a part of the Nottaway Mission.

In Detroit Conference, likewise, missions optimistically begun were of short duration. Grand Island, for instance, seemingly was abandoned after eight years (1873-81), during which time it was always part of a Circuit; also Cedar River (1874-76) which was served with Grand Island. However, in the line of speculation, one might wonder whether Grand Island Mission simply changed its name in 1882, for in that year the Munising Indian Mission appears for the first time. Munising, in combination with other work, continued in the records through 1895. The fate of Cedar River also is not clear; at later dates it was scheduled for appropriations (1878 and 1883) but never again found its way into the appointments. Hannahville seemed a little more sturdy, and once begun in 1879 managed to keep going through the remainder of the period with missionary appropriations, although it evidently was not always supplied.

* One is tempted to speculate upon the relations of one mission to another as an old appointment drops out and a new one appears, but in the absence of evidence no conclusions can be safely drawn.

Among the successful attempts with the Indians was the work at Taymouth, first listed in 1878, which after a couple of years of sharing a missionary with Bridgeport, thereafter was entitled to a full-time minister. It continued down through 1895. Pequaming (apparently an Indian mission) shared its lot with Kewawenon or with L'Anse from its inauguration in 1881 to 1895 when at last it appeared as a separate appointment. The Oscoda Mission first came into being in 1879 and continued for years thereafter. It is possible, too, that some work on a small scale was carried on at L'Anse, for intermittently in the 1880's the Missionary Society made appropriations for it.

Wisconsin Indian Missions.—The Oneida Mission in Wisconsin, established by John Clark in 1832,* was located in Brown County in a reservation approximately eight by twelve miles in extent a few miles north of Appleton. A census taken by the Oneida in 1847 registered 808 persons. Most of them were farmers, living on well-stocked and carefully tilled farms. A few followed other occupations, some becoming mechanics. They dwelt in frame houses, neatly painted and comfortably furnished. The mission† had two Societies, two preaching places about four miles apart, and a weekday school taught in 1847 by the missionary. Church members numbered "ninety-three Indians, three whites, and one colored," an increase of forty-nine over the 1844 statistics. Mission property included "one church worth about $1,000," an almost useless parsonage, and a library of some seventy volumes. The Missionary Society appropriation in 1847 was $285.; the government appropriation for the school, $166. In 1854 the missionary reported encouraging progress: forty received on probation in the preceding three months; two day schools—one at the mission and one in a schoolhouse built by the Indians—with ninety pupils enrolled; and a "Sunday school, doing well." His successor, writing four years later, was less sanguine regarding permanent results. The Indian character, with numerous exceptions, he found to be as "unstable as water." The proximity of Appleton and Green Bay subjected the tribe to the machinations of "vile persons in the shape of rumsellers," as "unscrupulous as they . . . [were] mean and avaricious," and many of the Indians became their victims. "We have more to contend with from this source," he said, "in trying to keep the members steadfast, than all others together."⁴⁶⁸

Through the years despite hindrances and difficulties the mission developed a dependable and efficient group of Christian workers, including in 1887 seven Local Preachers, one of whom was ordained, two Exhorters, and several Class Leaders. Secretary Leonard in 1890 declared the Oneida to be "altogether superior in every way" to any other of the tribes he had visited.

Our church has a membership of 265, with 55 probationers. A Sunday-school and prayer and class meetings are well sustained. The domestic and social relations of these Indians compare favorably with those of their white neighbors.⁴⁶⁹

The Brothertown Mission,* established in 1837, had in 1847 two preaching places—one among the Brothertown Indians at Manchester,† the second among the Stockbridge in the town of the same name. From 1839, when the Brothertown had been given full citizenship by Congress, they had lived under the laws of the nation and the state and had their own elective officers. Before 1855 they had sent three of their men to the State Legislature. They had long since ceased to use the Indian vernacular and had their own well-organized English language schools in which their children were given a fair common-school education. In 1858 Thomas Commuck, one of their number, wrote that intermarriage with the whites had so changed the Brothertown that "three-quarters of them would be readily considered as white, where they were not known."⁴⁷⁰

The status of the Brothertown Mission in 1855 was succinctly expressed by the Presiding Elder :

They have a church of convenient size, a parsonage unfinished, and a total membership, including probationers, of about sixty. Steps are taken to repair the church and finish the parsonage. There are in the Sunday School four officers and teachers, forty scholars, . . . on the whole, a good degree of prosperity is enjoyed.⁴⁷¹

No further mention is made of the mission in the Annual Reports of the Missionary Society. From 1858 to 1860 Brothertown was listed in the Conference Minutes as associated with Chilton; in 1861 it appeared as a separate charge, and thereafter was not named as an appointment, although the 1862 Minutes report eighty-one full members and eight probationers. It is possible that for some years afterward the Indians received the services of a Local Preacher since one remained resident up to 1871.

Significant changes were in process during these and later years.

When the parents died, the younger generation sought brighter prospects in other employments. Some . . . [became] engaged on railroads and some on the lakes.

* For story of the earlier history of the Brothertown Mission see Vol. II, 162-65.

† The tribe at first named their town Deansborough. Somewhat later it came to be known as Manchester. Still later it was renamed Brothertown "in remembrance of their old home."—W. DeLoss Love, Samson Occom, and The Christian Indians of New England, p. 328.

Others turned to trade. The foreign elements began to come in, mostly Germans, and buy out the Indians. Some emigrated farther west, to Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, and even to California. At the present time [1890] there are probably not more than one hundred and fifty within the town, which has a population of fifteen hundred. Their village, located about half a mile from the lake [Winnebago], comprises about twenty houses, a schoolhouse and their town hall. . . . The tribe still maintains a unity in an organization, . . . and they have duly chosen 'Headmen'.⁴⁷²

Stockbridge was discontinued as a preaching appointment when, in 1856, the tribe moved to Shawano County. In 1863 the Superintendent of the Appleton Mission District referred in a report to the Missionary Society to the Shawano Mission which included a promising Society among the Stockbridge. They were poor, he said, and could do "but little to support a minister."⁴⁷³

A number of domestic missions in eastern Wisconsin during the early years included missionary work among both Indians and white settlers. In the case of some missions with mixed membership the official reports do not indicate the number of Indian converts.*

Indian Missions in New York.—Three Annual Conferences in New York—the Oneida, Black River, and Genesee—had Indian missions within their bounds. A mission on the Oneida Reservation was begun in 1829.† In 1845, after extensive migration to the new Wisconsin reservation, the remaining Society of Oneida and Onondaga Indians reported eighty-five members. Daniel Fancher, in charge of the mission for four years (1846-50), reported the Indian population in 1850 as 150 and the white constituency somewhat larger. Facilities included a small church, "worth probably $500., and a new school house, built . . . at the expense of the natives." A Sunday school of small enrollment was maintained. In 1856 the Society had two Local Preachers and forty-five members in full connection, two day schools in "successful operation," one with thirty-eight pupils, the other with twenty-five. The attitudes of successive missionaries toward the possibilities of missionary work varied greatly. J. D. Torrey (1856) felt that no people did as well "in sustaining religious meetings and schools" as the Oneida. A successor a few years later saw but little fruit of missionary labor and declared that there was "no prospect of an increase of Indian population, or of Indian thrift, and the Indian mission is rather a matter of benevolence than a true Gospel mission." Over a period of thirty years (1856-86) the membership decreased from forty-five to twenty-eight. In the latter year, the mission had ceased to be maintained as an independent religious enterprise and was attached to the Bennett's Corners charge.

* In his report for 1845 on Indian missions William H. Sampson, Presiding Elder, Green Bay District, Rock River Conference, includes the Watertown, Manitowoc, Winnebago Lake, and Pewaukee Missions, although in the statistics of membership only one figure is reported, the white membership. At the same time, however, the General Minutes report white and Indian membership for Oneida and Brothertown Missions, which were predominantly Indian. (Twenty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1844-45], p. 83.) This leads one to conclude that where the membership was predominantly white no differentiation was made between white and Indian members.

The year 1892 marked a change for the better. The District Superintendent reported "about forty . . . reclaimed and converted, among whom were some of the worst characters of the tribe." Two Sunday schools were maintained and also an Epworth League. The mission church was rebuilt and rededicated. The report for 1895, however, had in it a note of despair: "The Oneida Indian Mission is doing its best to save the few members of the once powerful tribe of Oneidas residing in this State."⁴⁷⁴

The combined mission of Onondaga and Oneida continued until 1850 when a separate Onondaga mission was established. In 1848 a "neat and commodious" church had been built on the reservation and at the close of the first year fifty-five members were reported.

A divided opinion developed in the Conference concerning the mission. There were those who felt that no appreciable improvement was taking place either civilly or religiously, but instead only gradual disintegration and decay. Others were confident that advance in moral and religious interest was discernible. In 1872 they pointed to the fact that there were three Onondaga Local Preachers, ordained men, who preached regularly and conducted social weeknight meetings, and held that larger use of Indian preachers and leaders would be productive of larger results. But by 1886 continuance of missionary effort was questioned as worthwhile, considering that the expenditure of the fund in India or Japan would certainly be more productive. The fact that the Onondaga had no written language, and hence no literature in their own tongue, was a handicap. As they were either indifferent or opposed to the education of their children the school supported by the state had only small and irregular attendance. In 1895 the mission reported thirty church members, twenty-five less than in 1845.⁴⁷⁵

The St. Regis Mission of the Black River Conference was founded in 1847 on the reservation* of the St. Regis Indians. In July of that year William Woodman, an Oneida Indian who had served as an interpreter among his people in Wisconsin, moved to St. Regis and began at once through hymns, exhortations, and prayers to bear witness to his faith. Interest was immediately awakened and Woodman appealed to Ebenezer Arnold, pastor of the Brasher Circuit, to come to his assistance. Although St. Regis had long been known as a strong Roman Catholic center, with a church and a resident priest, Arnold decided to add it to his weekday appointments and on August 20, 1847, preached the first Protestant sermon in St. Regis. Later he wrote:

As serious threats had been made by the Roman Catholic priest, several brethren

* The St. Regis Reservation extended several miles along the St. Lawrence River on both sides of the boundary between the United States and Canada. from Brasher thought it prudent to accompany me. We arrived in time at the dwelling-house where our meeting was appointed. But for fear of the threatened mob, none had ventured out but a few squaws, who, encouraged by the arrival of so many whites, scud away to rally their more timid lords, and after a long delay our audience was assembled. Four or five men, a dozen women, and a few frightened children⁴⁷⁶

About the middle of September nine of the Indians were taken by the kindness of members of the Brasher Circuit to a Camp Meeting at Canton, New York, where several of them were "brought from darkness to light." A Class was formed, Woodman was appointed Class Leader, and St. Regis was made a regular appointment on Brasher Circuit. Fierce persecution ensued, interfering with the growth of the Society. The Indian agent refused the use of the public schoolhouse for religious meetings. Protestants "were denied burial on the reservation and their right in the Government schools and annuities. . . . their crops were seized by the chiefs under the claim that they 'had not paid tithes to the priest.'" The appointment of a new agent resulted in alleviation of overt persecution but enmity continued and land for a church building on the reservation was refused. Finally, a location was found at Hogansburgh, on a plot which had been ceded to the whites. Here, by 1857, on a tract of two and a half acres of land, a substantial church had been built and also a parsonage. A day school was taught in the vestry of the church, with an attendance which varied from twelve to thirty pupils. The Society had eighteen members in full connection.⁴⁷⁷

The Missionary Society in 1866 took a pessimistic view of the condition and future prospect of the mission. Of a population of 1,100 only about forty were Protestants and of these not more than twenty were church members. There was no separate Indian Class although a few occasionally attended the white Class meeting. Perhaps three men and their wives gave evidence of genuine piety. The population of the tribe was decreasing and "rapidly becoming French from intermarriages." About this time an Onondaga Indian, Thomas LaFort, was appointed to the mission, now in the Northern New York Conference. In 1873 the Presiding Elder of the Potsdam District, stated that LaFort was much beloved by his people and that he had won "the confidence of the Catholic portion of the tribe," numbers of them having been converted within the preceding year. A different point of view was expressed by Ebenezer Arnold who in 1886 was reappointed to the mission. He felt that Indian leadership was morally and religiously ineffective. Under it, he said, Principle gradually gave place to fitful emotion; Bible knowledge rapidly went down; Methodist rules were totally disregarded except in connection with Quarterly Meetings; large numbers were alternately recognized as members on slight evidence and 'turned out' without evidence or trial.

Arnold had little good to say of the state and the provincial (Canadian) day schools. In 1888 there were four state schools with a fifth under construction and four provincial schools in a total population of three thousand. "Though well located, and fully supported, they . . . [were] all very small"—an average of perhaps a half dozen pupils to a school—with irregular attendance. The school session in each case was about six months. All were under Roman Catholic management. The mission was still in operation in 1893, at which time Arnold was appealing for translations of the New Testament and the catechism.⁴⁷⁸

At the 1854 Genesee Conference a Seneca Indian mission was formally organized at the request of a Methodist Society which had been formed at Cattaraugus. John Timmerman was appointed as missionary. Five months later he reported eighteen members and fifty-two probationers. Within eighteen months a substantial church edifice was under construction, a Sunday school organized, a Local Preacher licensed, and the membership at twenty-eight.⁴⁷⁹ No further particulars seem to have reached the Missionary Society for a number of years. In 1865 the Society reported 190 members in the mission church.

The mission is joined with the Gowanda Station, and the preacher serves the mission and the station also, the lack of service to the Indians being made up by an excellent Indian local preacher, Brother White.⁴⁸⁰

By 1871 the mission had been enlarged to include appointments on three reservations: the Cattaraugus, Alleghany, and Tonawanda. A change of Conference boundaries in 1872 brought the Alleghany Reservation within the Erie Conference. Evidence is lacking that the Erie Conference provided for carrying on the missionary work. The Tonawanda Reservation had a population of some six hundred.* There were fifteen members in the Methodist Class in 1873 and a much larger number in the congregation. More often than not the Sunday services were in the charge of the Indian Local Preacher, who also conducted Class and prayer meetings on Thursday evenings. The Cattaraugus Society was strengthened by an increase in Indian leadership, including two Local Preachers and two Exhorters. Several Classes were well attended.⁴⁸¹

For a number of years the Society on the Tonawanda Reservation had wanted a separate mission of its own. The 1885 Genesee Conference granted their request, authorizing a mission to which S. S. Ballou was appointed. He described the moral and religious conditions as deplorable:

There is no sense of virtue among the masses of these Indians. They neither marry nor are given in marriage. The majority of them live together hap-hazard, or marry by the moon, one or six or a dozen as the case may be. They retain to a large extent the pagan customs of their fathers⁴⁸²

* In addition to the Methodist mission the Baptists and the Presbyterians each had a small church on the Tonawanda Reservation.

Ballou's tenure was for one year only and this ended the plan for a full-time missionary. The membership in 1890 consisted of fourteen in full connection and four probationers. A preaching service on Friday, and sometimes a Class meeting as well, were the only religious services. Attendance was small, "never reaching more than 40, and frequently a much smaller number."⁴⁸³

In 1890 the mission at Cattaraugus had resumed its early status as an out-appointment of Gowanda Station. Membership had declined to thirty full members and twenty probationers.* There was no Sunday school, and Class and prayer meetings were held irregularly. The church building was "in a dilapidated condition." Secretary Leonard concluded that the Missionary Society should "support a missionary who should live on the reservation and give his whole time to this work." In 1892 J. E. Williams, Presiding Elder of the Buffalo District, reported among the expenditures $322. for the salary of a preacher.⁴⁸⁴

INDIAN MISSIONS WEST OF THE MISSISSIPPI

In its tabulation of Indian missions following the division of the Church, the Missionary Society listed no missions west of the Mississippi River. Within a few years, however, extensive missionary operations over a wide expanse of territory were under way.

Indian Missions in Minnesota.—A forerunner of Methodist missionary labors among the Indians of northern Minnesota was Jacob Falstrom, a converted Swedish fur trader, who on all his travels carried with him a thumb-worn Swedish Testament.† For many years he served as interpreter and unofficial missionary among the Chippewa (whose language he spoke with ease) and other Minnesota tribes. The Sandy Lake and Fond du Lac Missions, in northeastern Minnesota, were founded in 1840, and 1841, respectively.‡ Although there were some seven hundred Chippewa round about Sandy Lake beginnings were difficult and growth was slow. In 1847 Samuel Spates, the Indian missionary chiefly responsible for the mission's founding, reported that some of the Indian children in the day school had learned "to read the New Testament both in English and Indian."

When I came among the Chippewa Indians, in 1839, many of them were not in the habit of making any provision for themselves and families by cultivating the soil. Now they raise enough potatoes for eating and planting. In this respect there has been a decided improvement; and . . . the most industrious among them are the most inclined to listen to the Gospel.

* The Presbyterian Mission, with a church, a parsonage, and a full-time missionary, had at this time a membership of eighty-six active and seventy-three nominal members.

† Accounts vary concerning the means of the spiritual awakening and missionary enlistment of Jacob Falstrom. Alfred Brunson says: "Here [at Fort Snelling] I found him in the Spring of 1838. He at once received us and the word of life, and embraced the Savior." (A Western Pioneer . . ., II, 120.) Chauncey Hobart relates that Falstrom heard David King, Methodist Indian missionary, preach, went to him at the close of the sermon, and exclaimed, "My name Jacobs! I like you! I want to join you!" (History of Methodism in Minnesota, pp. 20 f.) Falstrom's wife was a Chippewa, the mother of nine children. The family home in later years, on a farm in the St. Croix Valley, was a house of refuge for Methodist Circuit Riders and missionaries. He died in 1859.

‡ See Vol. II, 161, 161n, 162. These two missions were included in the Michigan Conference until 1852, when they were made part of the Wisconsin Conference.

Three years later the Presiding Elder commented on the thriving appearance of the mission premises. "It appears," he said, "like a rich and fertile spot in the midst of a cheerless desert."⁴⁸⁵

In 1850 Mille Lacs was attached to Sandy Lake. Chauncey Hobart speaks in high terms of Spates' sixteen years of faithful missionary labor at Sandy Lake Mission. He organized a church, "taught the children, visited the sick, buried the dead, and had the pleasure of seeing many happily converted." Few of the Indians at any time united with the Church. At the close of the 1855-56 Conference year the mission reported but five members and did not again appear in the Conference records.⁴⁸⁶ Mille Lacs was not heard from either, after 1856.

At the Fond du Lac Mission in 1846 with E. H. Day and Peter Marksman as missionaries a day school had been established, with some thirty pupils enrolled; a parsonage had been built, and efforts made to construct a church. The Indian community numbered approximately four hundred. J. H. Pitezel, after visiting the mission in June, 1849, as Presiding Elder of the Michigan Conference Indian Mission District, was doubtful of the wisdom of trying to continue it. The chiefs were indolent and expected to be fed as recompense for permitting children of the tribe to attend the mission school. The ensuing winter the Indians killed and ate two of their own cattle and the mission's only cow. "So abominably lazy are most of these people," Pitezel commented, "that they had rather kill and eat cattle, than to work for food."

In 1851 Fond du Lac was reoccupied and Peter Marksman was appointed missionary. It is not certain that he filled his appointment. The machinations of a designing and desperate Indian, according to Chauncey Hobart's report, caused such dissension and loss of confidence among the tribesmen of the region that Fond du Lac was abandoned.⁴⁸⁷

No further mention is made of Indian missions in the state until 1893 when it is reported that a log church "has been erected at the Vermilion Indian Mission." John Clark, an educated Chippewa Indian, had been appointed as supply. In 1894 the District Superintendent assured the Conference that the "good work . . . [had] continued throughout the year, and the moral effect . . . [had been] noticed by all."⁴⁸⁸

Indian Missions in Kansas.—The Wyandot Mission, West, was established in 1844.* Division of the Church brought new trials to the already sorely troubled and oppressed tribe. The allocation of territory agreed upon in the Plan of Separation placed the Missouri Conference, which included all of Kansas, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. This arrangement was by no means congenial to some of the Wyandot and bitter dissension developed within the tribe. Those who desired to adhere to the Methodist Episcopal Church petitioned the 1848 General Conference to be restored to their former connection. The Conference, recognizing no way by which the petition could be granted, recommended that the Missionary Society provide a measure of amelioration. The Board of Managers authorized, "in case the members of the Wyandott Indian mission shall become members of the M. E. church," that an appropriation of a sum not exceeding $800. should be made for the support of the mission.⁴⁸⁹ Since this action did not accomplish the desired end the dissenting group* in July, 1849, petitioned the Ohio Conference to send them a missionary. James Greeley volunteered and arrived in Kansas in November. His arrival was the signal for an outbreak of violence and persecution. While Greeley was preaching a mob stoned the church and disrupted the service. Whereupon he transferred the worship services to a vacant dwelling. In January, 1850, he was expelled from Kansas Territory by the Indian agent. Church services, however, were continued in the dwelling house and, when spring arrived, among the trees in the out-of-doors. During the year the Society built a hewn-log church, "near the Quindaro Cemetary," the second on the reservation. Meanwhile, at the first session of the reorganized Missouri Conference, September 13, 1848, the Wyandot Mission had been placed on the list of appointments, left "to be supplied." At the 1849 session, in response to the appeal of Squire Gray Eyes and J. M. Armstrong, representing the Wyandot, Thomas B. Markham, a former Indian mission teacher, and Pascal Fish, "a native assistant," were appointed as missionaries to the "Indian mission."⁴⁹⁰ Writing in February, 1851, Markham reported ninety-three church members and twenty-five probationers, and a small Sunday school in his own house, but no day school "in all the country." This year (1851) the Indian Mission Circuit included the Wyandot, Delaware, and Kickapoo Indians. The next year (1852) saw the Wyandot Mission again included in an Indian Mission Circuit: Wyandot, Delaware, and Shawnee. William H. Goode, writing in 1854 to the Western Christian Advocate, viewed the situation hopefully:

* See Vol. II, 186. For account of the Wyandot Mission in Ohio see Vol. I, 203 ff.; II, 117-26.

Our Wyandotte Mission is prospering under the fearless and faithful labours of Rev. J. M. Chivington. I should think it would take several United States agents to drive him from the field. They are a faithful and devoted people. The majority are members of our Church, and worship in their new log meeting-house, while the minority, attached to the Church, South, keep possession of the excellent brick church.⁴⁹¹

In 1855, by government treaty, the tribal organization of the Wyandot was dissolved and they became United States citizens, exercising their franchise

* When E. T. Peery, appointed at the Missouri Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the Wyandot Mission, undertook to organize a Society 110 members of the total membership of 160 attended the organizational meeting. Of these, forty-one agreed to unite with the new Society. Sixty-nine, because of their devotion to their former connection and their opposition to slavery, were determined to maintain their earlier allegiance.—Historical Record and Directory of the Washington Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, Kansas City, Kansas (1890), p. 6.

for the first time in the March, 1855, election of the Territorial Legislature. The division of land previously held in common gave to each man, woman, and child about forty acres. The land was valuable, coveted by the whites, and many sold their holdings. This was the beginning of the end of the Wyandot Mission. Some, fearful of the corrupting influence of the whites upon their children, emigrated to the old Wyandot settlement in Canada; others, in accordance with an old intertribal agreement, joined the Seneca; and still others remained among the white settlers. "The tribe," William H. Goode* wrote to the Missionary Society, ". . . has dwindled to a handful, and there is but little room for increase.† . . . The present membership numbers about one hundred."⁴⁹²

These were days of partisan warfare when marauding expeditions, pillage and arson, and outrages of every sort were common events in "bloody Kansas." On April 8, 1856, in the evening, the log meeting house was burned to the ground.‡ While the present terror reigns, Presiding Elder Levin B. Dennis said, "it is foolishness to rebuild." Worship services, however, were continued, at first in a schoolhouse near Quindaro, and later in a private residence. In 1857 two churches were built, a frame structure in the village of Wyandotte and a brick edifice in Quindaro. The mission was maintained from 1857 until 1870, by which time most of the members had removed to the Indian Territory. There a faithful remnant of the Society held the organization together until in 1880 the General Missionary Committee reinstated the mission.

The Wyandots are a small tribe on a small Reservation in the Quapaw Agency, well advanced in civilization We have a very good church centrally located upon their Reservation

J. M. Iliff, in charge, reported twenty-one members and probationers. In 1882 the Wyandot donated a tract of three acres on which the church was located. The next year a parsonage of five rooms was built. The Quapaw mission school was placed under the superintendency of M. Finity, a Methodist minister, and regular services were held at the school.⁴⁹³

The Shawnee Mission§ in Kansas was begun by Thomas Johnson in September, 1830. As in the case of the Wyandot, when the Missouri Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church was reorganized in 1848 an attempt was made to re-establish a mission among these Indians under the leadership of Abraham Still, veteran pioneer. A site# on the Wakarusa River was selected,

* William H. Goode, Presiding Elder of the Kansas and Nebraska Mission District, was living at this time in "a little brick house," rented from an Indian, on the Wyandot Reservation (Nov. 4, 1854—Nov. 18, 1855). (Thirty-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. [1855], p. 51; W. H. Goode, Outposts of Zion . . ., pp. 287, 290.) He was a discerning observer and an accurate recorder of current events.

† Racial intermixture had reached the point where there was scarcely a full-blood Wyandot among them.—"Wyandot and Shawnee Indian Lands in Wyandott County, Kansas," in Kansas Historical Collection, XV, 93.

‡ On the same evening the brick church used by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was also burned.

farm buildings were constructed, and a school opened. At this time the Shawnee numbered approximately eight hundred. In 1849 Still was made Presiding Elder of the Platte Mission District and the Shawnee, with the Wyandot, were included in the Indian Mission. In 1851 Shawnee was again a separate mission with three preaching places and some fifty members and probationers. The missionary, Henry Reeder, was assisted by a Shawnee, Pascal Fish, a probationer in the Conference. A mission house of hewn logs was under construction.⁴⁹⁴ This arrangement lasted for only one year. In 1852 and 1853 the Shawnee again became a Circuit appointment, this time in combination with the Wyandot and Delaware. When in 1854 William H. Goode was appointed Presiding Elder of the Kansas and Nebraska Mission District he was nominally assigned to the Shawnee Mission in order to provide him with living quarters and farm land on which to raise provisions for his large family—a wife and eight children. Associated with him was a young man who was expected to “perform the principal labors of the mission.” But unfortunately the plan went awry. Before reaching his destination he was informed that the premises had been included in a tract of land sold to an Indian. At the close of this year the mission reported sixteen members. The laconic report of the Missionary Society read: “Accomplishing little for several years past.” The following year (1855) the Shawnee were “supplied from the Lawrence [English-speaking] Mission” through an interpreter. With 1856 missionary work in behalf of the tribe apparently ceased since no report was subsequently printed by the Missionary Society.⁴⁹⁵

A meager program was projected among two or three other Kansas tribes, notably the Delaware and the Kansas. A mission to the Delaware was one of the nine established by the Missouri Conference in 1832.* With a reservation which included a large tract of the most fertile land in Kansas† they had improved in methods of agriculture while steadily decreasing in population and making little or no progress in education or in religion. Although not a single member of the tribe was known to possess a slave, most of them—following the separation—adhered to the southern branch of the Church. Much of the credit for keeping together the little remnant who dissented belongs to Charles Ketcham, long a preacher and one of the leading men of the Nation. He was a respected member of the Missouri Conference, of much influence among his own people. With no church or parsonage, the Society of ninety-two members and probationers in 1851 had no choice other than to worship in private houses or in the woods. Membership rapidly declined until in 1855 the missionary reported that only nine remained, and that the mission was “feeble and accomplishing little.”

The work among the Kansas (Kaw) Indians also was extremely limited in scope and even less effective. In 1850 a school was established at Council Grove with T. S. Huffaker in charge, in an attempt to revive the mission abandoned in 1842.* Huffaker is reported to have stated that "all his efforts and arguments failed to have any effect in removing the deep-seated prejudice of the Indians against receiving an education."⁴⁹⁶ Missionary work among them ceased in 1854.

Richard P. Duvall, a member of the Kansas and Nebraska Conference, was appointed missionary to the Sauk and Fox in 1860. At the close of his first year he reported twenty church members including white members of the agency, and two Sunday schools. He responded to the call for volunteers and for a little more than a year served in the Union army. On his return he resumed his work as an Indian missionary, but soon became discouraged for lack of support and resigned. Such interest had been created, however, that the Indian agent, Sauk Chief Keokuk, and other Indians, attended the 1866 session of the Conference with an urgent request for a missionary, an appeal which the Conference considered itself unable to grant.

"In 1867 the Sauk ceded their land in Kansas and in exchange were given a tract in Indian Territory." By 1870 only 387 of their number had relocated. More were persuaded to move as the years passed but the tribe was greatly decimated by disease and unhappiness. "In their strange surroundings the Indians displayed a somewhat rebellious spirit; they rejected the innovations of civilization and even refused the construction of a church desired by the more enlightened members of the tribe." As late as 1890 they were still rejecting civilized ways, though some small advance had been made.⁴⁹⁷

Nothing seemingly could be done among the Kickapoo; Ke-en-e-kuk † continued to have a strong hold on his followers. In 1854 the tribe arranged to cede almost all of its Kansas property to the government, and a later treaty opened up the remaining land to railroad building. After many vicissitudes and much traveling about, some of the tribe agreed to settle on a new reservation in Indian Territory, and some—the followers of Ke-en-e-kuk—remained on a small strip in Kansas. Among the latter were a large band of Potawatomi.⁴⁹⁸

Oklahoma Indian Missions.—The Ponca Indians were a small tribe, of less than four hundred, whose reservation was in Oklahoma on the Salt Fork of the Arkansas River. A mission among them was begun in 1884 by the Woman's National Indian Association, wholly supported by the Plymouth Congregational Church of Brooklyn, of which Henry Ward Beecher was then pastor.

* The Kansas Mission was sharply criticized by C. B. Boynton, a member of a commission sent to Kansas in September, 1854, by the American Reform Tract and Book Society to explore and report upon Kansas conditions and resources: "The 'Mission' is merely a school, the Kaws not consenting to have the Gospel preached among them. They send a few of their children irregularly to a school, in which little or nothing is, or can be done. The name of 'Mission' does not very well describe the thing; and this, we think, is not the only 'Mission,' in Kansas to which the same remark would apply. It would do no harm, if this whole subject of Indian missions were somewhat more closely investigated by the churches. . . . the matter would be stripped of much of the heroic, and the romantic, with which it has been so largely invested."—Copy of letter, Aug. 9, 1854, in "Webb Scrap Books," I, 89, in Library of Kansas State Historical Society.

† See Vol. II, 183 f.

In 1887 the mission was taken over by the W. H. M. S. and assigned for support to the Troy Conference Society. As the government maintained a school, attended by some two hundred pupils, the Society supplied the services of an evangelistic missionary. In 1890 the missionary was the Rev. S. G. Bundy of the Indian Mission Conference who in addition to his work with the Ponca also held religious services among the Tonkawa and the Otoe, neighboring tribes. He was later succeeded by J. E. Irvine and his wife, formerly associated with William Booth in the London Christian Mission. He found families, white settlers as well as Indians, whose children of ten or twelve years had never before seen a preacher or heard a prayer. The dead were buried without any kind of religious service, not even a prayer because, as one man said, "there is no one to pray." At the close of his first year Irvine was unwilling to estimate results. "We are . . . sowing seed for future harvests," he wrote, whose final outcome could not be predicted. The missionary preached regularly on Sundays at Ponca and Otoe and, besides, held services on Sunday and Wednesday evenings at his home. He also purchased a tent for use in evangelistic meetings. The mission premises of twenty-four acres were improved by a wire fence around the entire tract, a high board fence to protect the house, a cistern and well, and an orchard of peach, apple, plum, cherry, and apricot trees.

In the Fifteenth Annual Report of the W. H. M. S. (1895-96) Mrs. H. C. McCabe, secretary of the Bureau of Indian and Frontier Work, stated that the Ponca Circuit embraced "a wide range of country wholly destitute of the gospel" including many whites as well as Ponca, Otoe, and "remote Osages." The missionary service of Mr. and Mrs. Irvine was "tireless and abundant, and the harvest . . . [would] yet appear."⁴⁹⁹

The Osage Reservation was located in northern Oklahoma, adjoining Kansas on the north and the Arkansas River on the west. A visitor to the agency in 1885 found 1,580 Indians, among whom were 340 children between seven and fourteen years. Of the total number about seven hundred were able to speak English. Of the sixty government employees, six were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The agent asked for a missionary toward whose support he promised $150. and a residence. A "fine chapel" also was available for religious services. He reported that there had not been a missionary on the reservation for years.⁵⁰⁰ In 1886 the Woman's Home Missionary Society appropriated $1,000. for opening missionary work among them, an action which was later reconsidered. In 1888 a missionary was sent to the tribe by the Society, a mission house purchased at Pawhuska, the capital of the Osage Nation, for $650., and fifteen boarding pupils enrolled. The government agreed to pay $125. per capita for support of twenty-five boarding pupils, and seven dollars per term for day pupils. A year later the number was increased. A school building was erected, two cottages purchased, and the Adelaide Springer Osage Mission established, "so named by the Upper Iowa Conference, which gave $1,100. in one year for . . . [the cottages]." In 1890 a church was erected and the mission constituted an appointment of the Indian Mission Conference. The Society in 1891 entered into a contract with the federal government "to equip, maintain and manage an industrial boarding School and a day School," with an enrollment of sixty pupils in each. In February, 1892, the girls' industrial school was transferred to the federal authorities, the government accepting the missionaries as teachers. The need for a school for white children was so evident that the W. H. M. S. in 1895 established one for both whites and Indians in place of the Indian girls' school. It enrolled girls, and boys under fourteen years of age, and began with twenty-four pupils.⁵⁰¹

In an earlier period the Pawnee Indians were a large and strong tribe in the Nebraska region. The government transferred them to a reservation in northern Oklahoma, about seventy-five miles from the Kansas border. A mission established by the Woman's National Indian Association was transferred in 1885 to the W. H. M. S. Mrs. Frances L. Gaddis, a missionary sent by the Society, arrived on the field in July of that year and was soon busily engaged in visiting the Indians in their homes, ministering to the sick, conducting Bible readings, and teaching the women to sew. Her support was assumed by the W. H. M. S. of the Philadelphia Conference. After two years' work, despite the Indians' latent opposition to women missionaries, a Methodist Society was organized in September, 1887, with twenty-nine members. In 1888 the Indian mission sent J. E. Edgar to the tribe as missionary. On the organization of the Indian Mission Conference (1889) the Pawnee and Ponca Circuit was listed as one of the regular appointments and was continued under this designation in the reorganization of the mission as the Oklahoma Conference in 1892. In that year the Pawnee Society reported sixty-four members, a Sunday school with an enrollment of forty pupils, a parsonage, and a church building valued at $500. Religious services and the Sunday school in 1894-95 were in the charge of "an Indian minister of the Pawnee tribe, and a member of the Oklahoma Conference."⁵⁰²

The W. H. M. S. began a mission in August, 1891, among the Arapahoe and Cheyenne, with Mrs. J. E. Roberts as missionary. Her headquarters were at El Reno, in two small rooms. She reported having made "several hundred visits." In 1893 she was appointed "field matron," and paid by the government.⁵⁰³

Montana Indian Missions—Three Indian reservations on which Methodist missions were established, the Crow, the Blackfeet, and the Fort Peck, were in Montana. The Crow Reservation was located in the southern part of the Territory; the Blackfeet Reservation, about sixty miles square, in the northwestern part; and the Fort Peck Reservation in the southeastern part of Valley County. The missions on these reservations first appeared among the appointments of the 1874 Rocky Mountain Conference* with the notation "to be supplied." The Conference Committee on Indian Affairs stated this year in its report that during the four years that agencies on these reservations "have been committed to our denominational care, there has been but little organized labor looking to direct religious results among the Indians." The Crow asked for teachers able to speak their language: they were "suspicious of . . . interpreters."

Although there was an organized Society on the Crow Reservation it was still without a missionary in 1875 and 1876. Seemingly the best that could be done was to engage E. A. Bridger "in teaching and holding religious services among the Crows for six months." In 1877 and 1878 the mission was left "to be supplied" and in 1879 disappeared from the list of appointments, not to reappear for three years. In 1881 the agent advised the Missionary Society that the reservation was a very promising field "for either missionary or educational work." The following year Thomas D. Lewis,† a supernumerary member of the St. Louis Conference, with his wife, was appointed to take charge of the school and "do mission work" at the Crow Mission. That year, too, Peter O. Matthews was given a renewal of license as an Indian Local Preacher. The next year it was again left "to be supplied," after which it disappeared permanently from the record.⁵⁰⁴

The Blackfeet Mission among the Piegan, one of the three branches of the Blackfeet tribe, was first listed, as stated above, in the Rocky Mountain Conference Minutes for 1874, without a missionary, although they had received incidental preaching before that from various members of the Conference. John Young, appointed as agent in 1876, was from the first strongly impressed by their character. "As a rule," he stated in 1880, "these Indians are kind with each other, obedient to control, and commit few breaches of law and order." Again in 1881 he wrote, the "day-school is well attended and the scholars make fair progress. . . . when the alphabet is mastered and they begin to spell and read, their delight is manifest. There is, perhaps, no heathen field so likely to repay the labor of a Christian missionary." Year after year he repeated his plea but no missionary was found. In 1882 the Commissioner of Indian Affairs wrote to the Indian Bureau of the Woman's Home Missionary Society:‡ "The denomination from which these Indians have a right to expect Missionary help has, until the present time, failed to meet its responsibilities, and repeated appeals to it have been disregarded."⁵⁰⁵

Not until 1893, long after the discontinuance of the "Peace Policy," was the

* While these missions were first listed within the Rocky Mountain Conference, they were included within the Montana Conference when it was organized in 1877.

† Thomas D. Lewis in 1882 was listed as a member of the Montana Mission, but his name does not again appear.—"Journal of Proceedings . . .," 1882, in Minutes, Montana Mission, 1886, pp. 21, 24.

‡ One of the first standing committees of the W.H.M.S., organized in 1880, was the Committee on Indian Work: Mrs. L. D. McCabe, Mrs. C. V. Culver, and Mrs. W. A. Ingham. Authorization of the committee was followed by the appropriation of $500. for "work among the Indian tribes." (First Ann. Rep., W.H.M.S. [1881-82], pp. 4, 29.) mission established on a substantial basis, and then not by the Missionary Society but by the Brooklyn and Bay Ridge branches of the Woman's National Indian Association. On April 3, 1893, Eugene S. Dutcher, of the West Nebraska Conference, and Mrs. Dutcher, under contract with the association, arrived at Blackfoot as missionaries to the Piegan who at that time numbered about two thousand. Dutcher was transferred from West Nebraska to the North Montana Mission. The Indian Bureau required occupancy of 160 acres by the mission to which the Indians in council readily assented. The missionary soon had a three-room cottage built, and within two years a "beautiful chapel, 26x40 feet, at a cost of one thousand dollars, . . . free of debt." In July, 1894, the mission was transferred to the Methodist Episcopal Church on condition that the Church would support and carry forward the work already begun.⁵⁰⁶

While a mission was listed in the Fort Peck Reservation (Sioux Indians) in 1874 no appointment was made. In its report for 1880 the Missionary Society noted the fact that the government was giving increased attention to schools for the Indians. It was encouraged by this development to negotiate directly with the Indian Bureau for the establishment of a school at Fort Peck, with scholastic and industrial departments. In 1881 the Society sent Samuel E. Snider of the Upper Iowa Conference to the post but the erection and equipment of school buildings by the government was delayed. Snider organized a school of fifty pupils at Poplar Creek with such facilities as were available. He wrote to the Board:

We shall keep the school running all winter, doing the best we can. By the help of the Lord we are going to make a success of it. I have organized a Methodist Class, seven by letter, one on probation . . . We have a good little Sunday-school, keep up a semi-weekly prayer-meeting, and all are growing in grace.

In 1883, with I. T. Miller in charge, sixty-eight pupils were in attendance. The school day was divided into three hours of classroom work and four hours of hand work, the boys doing gardening and farming, the girls housework and sewing. The agent reported to the commissioner that the school was "a model of discipline, order, and industry," and the religious training and the example of the pupils exerted "a wholesome influence for good" over the adult Indians.⁵⁰⁷

Indian Missions in Oregon.—From the year of its founding the Oregon Conference carried on work among the Indians. G. L. Parrish was regularly appointed "Missionary to the Indians" until 1856 when his assignment was changed to "Grand Ronde Indian Reserve and Tillamook." The next two years this post was left to be supplied. Later it was put in Roman Catholic hands.

Three Indian reservations in Methodist hands were in Oregon: Klamath, Siletz, and Warm Springs. The Klamath Reservation, with about a thousand Indians, was located on the eastern slope of the southern extremity of the Cascade Range in southwestern Oregon. On this and the Siletz Reservation up to 1872 there was little organization and labor. This year it was superintended by L. S. Dyer, with the cooperation of Thomas Pearne, who organized a Class of sixty members.

From 1876 to 1878 J. H. Rook of the Oregon Conference was agent at Klamath, employing two other members as his assistants. During this time religious services had been "faithfully kept up, [and] a weekday school established." At the 1878 Conference Linus M. Nickerson was appointed agent, continuing in office until 1885 when ill health compelled his resignation. In 1879 the Oregon Conference Committee on Indian Affairs reported that the Indians were making "considerable progress in Christian civilization." An industrial boarding school of some forty pupils was maintained; also weekly preaching services and a Sunday school. In 1881 Nickerson was filling the place of both Indian agent and missionary but could do little "compared with what is possible and ought to be done." In 1884 T. F. Royal was appointed missionary and his wife employed as matron of the government schools. This year a Society was organized with twenty-eight members in full connection and four probationers. After one year Royal was succeeded by N. M. Skipworth whose tenure—like that of so many others—was very brief.⁵⁰⁸

J. B. Harrison, who had been sent out in 1887 by the Indian Reserve Association of Philadelphia to make a study of conditions among the Indians of Oregon, estimated the Klamath highly.

In moral qualities and worth many of them are the peers of white men, brave, frank, manly, public spirited and honorable. . . .

Many . . . live in fairly comfortable houses . . . [']I was entertained in their homes with a dignified, intelligent, and joyous hospitality.['] . . .⁵⁰⁹

In 1888 the Conference Committee on Indian Work stated that nothing had been done among the Indians within the Conference for two years, though funds were available since the Conference had been urged to send ministers "to teach the Indians at the government's expense, . . . besides the Indians themselves would gladly contribute liberally for the support of the gospel." Apart from the paucity of ministers the situation was partly explained by the fact that during this period the agency had been in the hands of a man so unfriendly to the Church that it seemed impracticable to try to maintain a mission.⁵¹⁰

In 1890 the Conference committee, while stating that the Conference was "greatly embarrassed by the hostile attitude of the agent," had at last heard "the Macedonian cry of the Klamath Indians" and had sent them a missionary, J. A. Tenant, "a man eminently qualified for such work, having had large experience in laboring among other tribes." For some reason not revealed by the Conference Journal he, like others before him, was not reappointed at the end of one year. However, beginning in 1891, the mission was faithfully served for two years by D. L. Spaulding. He was succeeded by Thomas Starns, a supply, who continued as pastor for three years (1893-96). Two Societies were maintained, the Williamson River church and one at Spring Creek in the Yainax sub-agency. Two Sunday schools were conducted by the government Superintendent of Public Instruction. In 1895, 160 full members and 217 probationers were reported. "Family prayer was observed in nearly all Christian homes; class and prayer meetings, preaching, and all religious services were regularly attended." This same year, however, the Committee on Indian Work of the Conference stated that under the influence of two disreputable agents drunkenness and "all manner of vice and immorality" abounded on the reservation. "Horse racing, profanity, dancing, drunkenness, and Sabbath breaking are all commonly practiced with the consent and co-operation of the agent."⁵¹¹

The Siletz Reservation, with less than five hundred persons—"remnants of ten or twelve different tribes"—was located on the western coast of Oregon. In earlier years these tribes had shown extreme hostility to the white settlers and had been declared by a Superintendent of Indian Affairs for Oregon "the most turbulent and insubordinate Indians on the coast." During 1871-73 the Siletz agency was in the charge of Gen. Joel Palmer, as agent, and the Rev. John Howard of the Oregon Conference as missionary. Little in the way of religious results was accomplished by them. On April 1, 1873, J. H. Fairchild succeeded Palmer and soon after W. C. Chattin of the Oregon Conference was appointed as missionary. Within two months some fifteen or twenty of the Indians asked to become Christians and unite with the Church. The good that had been accomplished, Fairchild later reported to the Missionary Society, could not be "measured by the number admitted to Church membership."

A radical change has taken place, so great . . . I can hardly realize that they are the same people. . . . Then, one or more were almost constantly in the guard-house, as punishment for some offense—now, with one trifling exception, no one has been confined for months. . . .

. . . Many . . . have built good houses; they are learning to be neater in their housekeeping, and more cleanly in person. Many own and milk cows, some manufacture butter for sale. A year ago this would have been thought impossible.

Those who became Christians and united with the Church underwent sore trials:

a storm of persecution quickly broke out against them. While protecting them from actual violence, I was unable to prevent social ostracism. Parents drove their children from their homes, wives refused longer to live with their Christian husbands, and tribes disowned and refused to associate with those who renounced the superstitions of their ancestors.⁵¹²

For six years, 1876-82, Oregon Conference ministers served as missionaries: during 1876-79, T. F. Royal; and during 1879-82, three others in turn. Although there was practically no growth in church membership, many of the Indians showed real interest and the Conference was inclined to consider the Siletz mission the most promising of its missions. For several years the agent was William Bagley, a Methodist layman, and when in 1879 he resigned, because of ill health, another layman was appointed in his place who held office for one year only. The Conference of 1882 made no appointment to the mission, and in 1885 the Conference Committee on Indian Missions reported that for three years the Church had not had a mission there. This year, however, an Indian Local Preacher, John Adams—"a true and faithful man"—reorganized the Society. This led the Conference to reinstate the appointment, though leaving it to be supplied. In 1887 the Conference committee again commended the work of Adams, and reported that the agent who was friendly to the Church had asked for a missionary.⁵¹³ For another period, this time for five years, 1886-91, the appointment disappeared from the Minutes. In 1888 the Conference committee asserted that the work had been "abandoned," and in 1889 that "for want of laborers nothing has been done." The 1890 Conference was told that the Siletz Indians were "calling loudly for help, beseeching . . . [the Church] to provide for their spiritual welfare, . . . by sending them a missionary." The agent in addition offered five acres of land for a mission home.

In November, 1890, the Rev. C. R. Ellsworth was appointed to the mission and results of his aggressive leadership were soon apparent. During the year church membership was increased from forty-one to eighty-five, and in 1892 a parsonage was built. The Sunday school had "an average attendance of seventy-five" nearly all of whom were members of the Church. The missionary was supported in part by the W. H. M. S. ($200. in 1892) and in part by the Missionary Society. Ellsworth's pastorate ended in 1894 when S. W. Potter was appointed as supply. At the close of the period there were four hundred Indians on the reservation, most of whom were living in their own homes.⁵¹⁴

For several years in the early seventies the Warm Springs (Oregon) agency had as superintendent John Smith who, though not a member of the Church, was a man of excellent reputation and character. Successful religious meetings were held on the reservation by groups of Christian Indians from Yakima.⁵¹⁵

Under the government program, two other agencies were assigned to the Oregon Conference: the Neah Bay or Makah Reservation in Washington Territory, and the Yainax. While the Church bore the responsibility for them, non-Methodists filled the posts as agents and no real church program was carried on. Later it was given over to the United Presbyterians.

Idaho Indian Missions.—Two of Idaho's agencies were assigned to the Methodist Church, the Fort Hall and the Lemhi, both in the southeastern part of the state. These reservations were occupied by the Shoshone, Bannock, and Sheef-eater tribes. Of the Bannock about five hundred were at Fort Hall and less than one hundred in the Lemhi agency. Of the Shoshone about one thousand were in Idaho.

The Fort Hall Indian agency was first mentioned in the Missionary Society's Report for 1874, with no information on religious work. In 1875 it appeared in the records of the Rocky Mountain Conference, Idaho District, J. M. Jamison, missionary. Like so many other Indian agency missions it had a checkered history.* In 1877 the Society reported that some twenty-five had "commenced farming and stock raising," and that the Indians on the reservation seemed "almost destitute of religious notions of any sort." In 1881 the agency was visited by L. A. Rudisill of the Utah Mission who reported that the Indians were "anxious to have a school, a Sunday school, and religious instruction." He attributed want of success in educational and Christian work to frequent changes of agents and lack of regular religious services. A. S. Cook, the Indian agent, wrote to the Missionary Society in the early summer of 1882 that he was transferring the agency school "by authority of the Indian Department" to the Society. The Board of Managers employed George B. Mead of the New York Conference as missionary teacher. He departed for Idaho at the end of August and by the middle of October was back † in New York City.⁵¹⁶

Concerning the Lemhi agency, likewise, very little information is available. In 1877 and 1878 it was listed "to be supplied" in the Montana Conference Minutes. In 1879 it was not included in the list of appointments. In 1881 John Harris, a Local Preacher, reported as agent that the tribe "wanted their children to learn like the white children." In 1882 he began a day school. He continued as agent during 1883. After this year no further mention is made of the Lemhi agency.⁵¹⁷

Indian Missions in Washington.—The Yakima and Quinalt Reservations, besides Neah Bay—already mentioned—were in Washington under Oregon Conference control. The Quinalt agency had supervision of a small group of Indians in northwest Washington. The agent in 1872-77 was G. A. Henry, a Methodist Exhorter, who arranged worship services and Class and prayer meetings. Other than these no missionary work—so far as the Missionary Society Reports show—was maintained.

Most successful of all the agencies sponsored by the Methodist Church was what was commonly known as the Yakima,‡ some sixty miles north of The Dalles in southeastern Washington. Located on a tract of land forty by sixty miles in extent were some 3,500 Indians. James H. Wilbur, veteran pioneer who first came to the Northwest as a missionary in 1847,§ was appointed in 1860 by the Conference to the newly established government school. In 1864

* In 1877 and 1878 the Fort Hall agency was included in the Butte District, Montana Conference, "to be supplied." In 1879 it disappeared from the Minutes permanently, although in 1884 and 1888 the Fort Hall Reservation was specifically included within the Montana Mission by General Conference. In 1892 it was not mentioned as within the boundaries of any Conference.—Gen'l Minutes, 1877, p. 80; ibid., Fall, 1878, p. 9; G. C. Journal, 1884, p. 415; ibid., 1888, p. 411.

† The Board's record reads: "After reaching the agency . . . [Mead] found the condition such that he had no hope of accomplishing anything in the work, and being home-sick and sick from malaria, he returned immediately home." The Board authorized the Secretary "to settle with Bro. Mead and pay his traveling expenses."—Minutes, B.M., IX, 39 f.

he was made agent, and eighteen years later (1882) he retired.* The success of Christian work there was chiefly accounted for by the long tenure of this intelligent, devoted Christian, while on other reservations agents came, stayed for a few months, and then—before they had had time to acquaint themselves with their Indian charges and become their trusted friends—went their way. In 1874 he wrote to the Missionary Society:

[This] will give you some idea of the contributions made at the Yakima Indian Agency during my administration the past ten years

* * * *

We have raised . . . more than one hundred thousand bushels of grain, built two hundred comfortable houses, fenced ten thousand acres of land, sawed about two and a half million feet of lumber, and taught more than three hundred to read, write, and work. Helped them in getting cattle, so that they now have about two thousand head, besides thirteen thousand horses; made two hundred and fifty sets of harness. . . . About five hundred are members of the Church. Have two comfortable church edifices. Have mechanics from the Indian boys instructed in schools, and as blacksmiths, plow and wagon makers, carpenters, harness-makers, shoe makers, and millers, . . . with thrifty farmers dotting the agency through the valleys.⁵¹⁸

There were other noteworthy results of "Father Wilbur's" labors. Through his influence intoxicating liquors were nearly banished from the reservation. In one year more than $8,000. of the federal appropriation for the agency was returned to the treasury. The Indian church members in ten years contributed $1,200. to missions, and to other benevolences $1,045. Five of the Yakima became preachers, of whom two were ordained. Indian church membership had reached 520 by 1881. Both the religious and the educational work felt the effects of Wilbur's retirement. Church membership declined to such an extent that Stephen Gascoigne, appointed as missionary in 1887 by the Columbia River Conference, reported in 1890 only 152 members, although he stated that the congregation numbered seven hundred who "consider[ed] themselves Methodists."⁵¹⁹

In 1891 J. Wilbur Helm was appointed pastor and was reappointed annually for twenty-four years, an exceptional record. The land allocation plan was put into effect in 1893 and, in addition to previous grants for church sites, a tract of 160 acres was allocated for a church building and an industrial school.

Answering an appeal for a woman physician made by the Christian Indians, Emily C. Miller, M.D., of Boston, arrived at Ft. Simcoe on April 8, 1891, and

* Wilbur was a powerful man physically, as well as spiritually, described by General O. O. Howard as a "broad-shouldered, thick chested, large-headed, full-voiced manly man." By popular opinion he was credited with weighing three hundred pounds. His courage in dealing with the Indians equaled his weight. On one occasion when two young braves who had imbibed firewater freely became unruly he sent two of the Indian police to bring them to the guardhouse. They "returnea much the worse for wear, without having made the arrest." Wilbur himself is said to have gone to the scene of disturbance, seized one of the recalcitrants in each hand, and "bumped their heads together until their noses bled." Later the two reported, "Father Wilbur is no man He is part bear (an-e-hoo-e)." —A. J. Splawn, Kamiakin, the Last Hero of the Yakimas, as cited by Flora Warren Seymour, Indian Agents of the Old Frontier, pp. 132 f.

took up her abode on the reservation.* She soon won the Indians' confidence and became to many of the women, physician, friend, industrial teacher, and spiritual adviser. During the first few years she was supported entirely by voluntary contributions but in 1895 was made a missionary of the W. H. M. S.⁵²⁰

The Nooksack (variously spelled Nootsach and Noosachk) Indians were a small tribe of about two hundred families whose reservation was in the northern part of Washington in Whatcom County, close to the Canadian border. Nooksack was first listed in 1880 in the Minutes "to be supplied." At the 1882 session of the Oregon Conference a proposal was made "to establish a Mission among the Nootsach" and the Committee on Missions was instructed to make an appropriation of $300. annually for its support. In the division of the Oregon Conference in 1884 the Nooksack Reservation came within the Puget Sound Conference. In 1886 a school was in operation and pastoral oversight given by the minister of the Nooksack Circuit. In 1887 a woman medical missionary, Dr. L. A. Morehouse, was sent to them by the W. H. M. S. A contribution of $1,000. was received by the Society in 1888 for the founding of the Stickney Home and Industrial School, and "Lynden Jim," an Indian chief, gave twenty-five acres of excellent farming land for the raising of produce. A temporary home and school was opened in October, 1899, in a borrowed building. In 1891 the Society entered into a one-year contract with the government for the maintenance and management of an industrial boarding school and a day school, the government to pay $27. per quarter for each of sixty pupils. The building was finally completed this year and the school opened with an enrollment of thirty pupils. The farm and school were operated by a man, wife, and daughter on a missionary salary of $30. a month and board—$10. for each. The Conference Committee on Indian Missions reported that the Indian population on the reservation was rapidly diminishing, only 130 remaining—"a mere remnant left of a great tribe"—of whom eighty-six were members of the Church. After the expiration of the government contract the school could receive pupils only as pledges for their support were given. Pledges were received for fifteen pupils in 1894 although many more awaited scholarships. During 1895 from fifteen to twenty-one children were in the home and the school, ages ranging from five to eighteen years.⁵²¹

Services were begun as well among the Nez Percé and the Chehalis in the 1870's, but the work never got a foothold. After the first optimistic reports, nothing more was heard of them. In 1890 the Columbia River Conference resolved to attempt establishing work on the Nez Percé Reservation, but evidently found it impossible to finance since nothing was undertaken.⁵²²

* In 1898, at the solicitation of Dr. Miller, the Columbia River Conference assigned to the Woman's Home Missionary Society forty acres of Church lands at Toppenish, Ore., twenty-five miles from Ft. Simcoe. It "was fenced, cleared, irrigated, and put under cultivation, and a four-room cottage built, the returns from the ground paying for all improvements."—Mrs. T. L. Tomkinson, Twenty Years' History of the Woman's Home Missionary Society . . ., p. 166.

Indian Missions in California.—The Round Valley, Hoopa (Hupa) Valley, and Tule River Reservations were in California. At the 1870 session of the California Conference agents were nominated for the three agencies. In 1873 the Conference requested the Missionary Society to make an appropriation to aid in establishing Indian missions. For three years, the Conference committee said, three California reservations “have been under our care . . . yet no missions have been commenced on any of them.” The appeal continued:

The agents are members of the M.E. Church, but have no funds to aid in the missionary work. Politicians and military officers have no sympathy for the President’s Indian policy. . . . It is our conviction that, without any further delay, we ought to have at least one missionary on each reservation. This would enable us to do something. . . . In our judgment an appropriation of $5,000 should be made; then, with rigid economy and the blessing of the Lord, we will do the best we can.

In its Annual Report the Society referred to the appeal but stated that its financial condition “permitted no response.” During 1872 the Presiding Elders of the Districts within which the “reservations . . . [were] located . . . [were] instructed to visit the reservations [the following year] . . . for the purpose of examining into the expediency of more extended and thorough missionary work among the Indians.”⁵²³

The Round Valley Reservation of the Konkau (Concow) Indians of Pujunan stock was located at Round Valley in northeastern California. The Konkau were a small group, not a true tribe but made up of smaller local divisions or villages. J. L. Burchard, a member of the Conference, was appointed agent in 1873. Despite the refusal of funds from the Missionary Society, the Conference went ahead and appointed a missionary in 1874. That year the Conference Committee on Indian Missions reported the reservation to be “in a flourishing condition.” The farm produced an ample food supply. Religious services were maintained and more than nine hundred persons were stated to have offered themselves as candidates for church membership. Two schools, conducted by “competent Christian women,” were said to be fairly successful. In 1877, much to the regret of both Conference and Indians, Burchard resigned. He was succeeded by H. B. Sheldon, also a Conference member, who continued as agent until 1883. His tenure was ended by notification from the Indian bureau at Washington that future appointments of agents were to be made without reference to the Church, “on the basis of business qualifications only.” From 1874 to 1882, inclusive, a succession of preachers was appointed as missionaries, four within six years. In 1883 the mission was left to be supplied.⁵²⁴

No mention of the Round Valley agency or mission is to be found in the Minutes of the California Conference during the years 1884-92. In 1893 Colin Anderson, a supply, was appointed missionary at Round Valley. The Conference committee reported in 1894 that he had done efficient work.

By 1894 the population on the reservation was approximately four hundred. The government this year was in the process of allocating the land—ten acres to each man, woman, and child—and proposed to require the Indians “to live on and cultivate their own land.” The day schools were now conducted by Roman Catholic teachers, supported by government subsidy. Religious services continued to be held, and a Sunday school with an enrollment of 125 was still maintained.⁵²⁵

In 1871 the Hoopa Valley Indian Mission had been included in the list of appointments, “to be supplied by W. Bush.” A supply was again named for the mission in 1872. In 1873 the appointment was omitted, but for the two following years a supply was again sent. In 1874 the agent reported that controversy with stock raisers and miners who apparently wanted “to get control of the reservation for selfish purposes,” and dispute as to the boundaries of the reservation, had interfered with his administration. In 1876 the mission was again dropped from the list of appointments. The agent, it was reported, had “met insurmountable difficulties, and [had] tendered his resignation to the Washington authorities.” In 1877 the livestock and other property of the agency were transferred to the Round Valley Reservation. In 1892 the Conference Committee on Indian Missions lamented that in Hoopa Valley the Methodist Church “had more right than anybody else, but . . . indifferently allowed the opportunity to slip,” and in 1894 stated that the “Hoopa Valley Indians, among whom we once had a mission, have been lost to us through our own neglect.”⁵²⁶

The Tule River agency in 1874 was located on a rented area, the reservation selected by the government having been rejected by the Indians as entirely unsuitable. Agent J. B. Vosburg and the Indian Affairs Committee of the Conference agreed that the Indians’ objection was for just cause. The agent conducted religious services twice on Sundays and on Thursday evenings. A school was also taught by a competent teacher. The committee was convinced that if a satisfactory reservation could be secured “great good might be accomplished.” Unsuccessful in his attempt to bring about an adjustment with the government, Vosburg resigned. In 1877 “a good degree of prosperity” on the part of the Indians was reported. Many attended religious services and some lived exemplary Christian lives. In 1878, the agent, a Local Preacher, estimated the Indian population there at 280. Then, for several years, C. G. Belknap of the Southern California Conference was agent. After 1887 no further mention of the Tule River mission is to be found in the Conference Minutes.⁵²⁷

The California Conference in 1891 asked the General Missionary Committee “to appropriate for the Indian work at Ukiah the sum of eight hundred dollars.” At the same session J. L. Burchard, formerly agent on the Round Valley Reservation, was appointed to this new work.* In response to the request the Missionary Society appropriated $400. for 1891 and a like sum for 1892. The Board of Managers of the W. H. M. S. also made an appropriation of $400. for the first year. Within a year fifty Indians united with the Church on probation, of whom nine were received into full membership. Altogether within twelve months Burchard baptized seventy-one children and thirteen adults. At Upper Lake a meeting house was erected to serve as a place of worship and as a schoolhouse. In all, the Indians contributed more than $90. and also did the carpentry work on the building.

It was a touching sight to see those Indian women bring their money tied up in their handkerchiefs, in some cases putting down the last nickel they had in the world so that they might have a building where their children could be educated, and where all might hear the Gospel.

The W. H. M. S. continued its support from year to year, aided by the Missionary Society and the California Conference. For 1894-95 the Conference contributed $400.

As the Indian population of about four hundred, the remnants of seven tribes, was scattered over a wide area three additional chapels were erected. There were three government schools with competent Christian teachers. In 1895 Burchard preached regularly at three points, Ukiah, Upper Lake, and Potter Valley, and maintained three Sunday schools.⁵²⁸

In the 1870's the California Conference tried vainly to initiate an agency program and mission work for the Mission Indians in the southern part of the state.⁵²⁹

New Mexico Indian Missions.—The Jicarilla Indians, a branch of the Apache tribe, about eight hundred in number, were located on a reservation in Rio Arriba County, northern New Mexico, near the Colorado border. The reservation was visited in 1887 by Mrs. Jennie Fowler Willing, secretary of the W. H. M. S. Bureau for New Mexico and Arizona, who was much impressed with the religious opportunity and need of the tribe. Upon her recommendation the General Executive of the Society resolved to open a school at Dulce, New Mexico, for Jicarilla, Apache, Southern Ute, and Navajo girls as soon as teachers could be procured and a building erected. Since there was no government school on the reservation the Indian Commissioner agreed to give the Society "a grant of eighty acres, upon which to build . . . [a] school, one hundred and eight dollars a year for each boarding pupil, and thirty dollars for each day scholar." Sarah E. Moore and Maria Clegg, experienced teachers at Ramona Indian School at Santa Fe, were engaged. In 1890 Miss Moore reported:

* The Indians at Ukiah, Upper Lake, and Potter Valley were commonly known as "Digger" Indians. The term, applied to all who used roots extensively for food, "included very many of the tribes of California, Oregon, Idaho, Utah, Nevada, and Arizona . . . As the root eaters were supposed to represent a low type of Indian, the term speedily became one of opprobrium."—Fourteenth Ann. Rep., W.H.M.S. (1894-95), p. 107; F. W. Hodge, Ed., op. cit., I, 390.

The women and girls have cut and made at our house one hundred and fifty garments, during the year. After the sewing lesson we spend some time in prayer and Bible teaching. A Mexican family has opened the house for Protestant service . . . We have had sixty-five or seventy women under instruction. They pay for the cloth they use, in baskets, pinion nuts, berries and moccasins, which we sell and buy more cloth; and thus we keep the wheel turning. Miss Clegg has had considerable experience in caring for the sick, which is now invaluable. Forty or fifty cases have received treatment or medicines. We have visited not less than two hundred camps. We usually read the Bible and pray with them. . . Will not Christians pray for such an outpouring of the Holy Spirit upon the Apaches that the whole tribe may be won to Christ.⁵³⁰

From 1887 to 1892 the two missionaries lived in a miserable little log hut of two rooms, with doors and windows so low that they could neither enter nor look out without stooping. In the latter year three additional rooms were added, offering space for holding worship services. Improved accommodations also were provided for the school. W. R. Weaver, pastor at Chama, thirty miles distant, preached occasionally at the mission. In May, 1892, Thomas Harwood, Superintendent of the New Mexico Spanish Mission, organized a Class. Later several pupils of the school and a number of adults were converted. In 1894 the Methodist Society had a membership of fifty Indians and fifty whites and Mexicans. In 1895 a special gift of $600. made possible the building of a chapel and schoolroom, with five rooms over the chapel to be rented to non-resident pupils.⁵³¹

Arizona Indian Mission.—The Navajo occupied one of the largest Indian reservations in the United States, excluding the Indian Territory, an immense area of more than 114,000 square miles in northeast Arizona and northwest New Mexico, and also a strip of southern Utah. Twenty thousand or more in number, they were industrious and, except during periods of prolonged drought, generally prosperous. Their chief economic dependences were their large flocks of sheep and goats and herds of cattle and horses. Spinning and weaving their sheep's wool the women made by primitive methods artistic blankets and other smaller articles. Some were farmers, living in small village communities, and cultivating adjacent plots of ground. Others were skillful workers in silver and iron. They practiced polygamy, some of the men having three or more wives, and were also slaveholders, holding in bondage the captives of intertribal wars. They had no written language. They were extremely superstitious and adhered tenaciously to the grossest forms of paganism. In the late eighties the sole school on the reservation was maintained by the government. It had only limited accommodations and a very small enrollment.⁵³²

In 1889 the Missionary Society reported so "earnest a call" for work among the Navajo that the General Committee had "provided for commencing a mission among them." At the session of the Arizona Mission Conference in October of that year H. R. Antes was appointed to the Navajo Indian Reservation. In November an appropriation of $5,000. was made by the General Committee "with which to open the work, contingent upon that sum being contributed for that special purpose." By September, 1890, about $4,000. having been made available, Bishop Bowman appointed the Superintendent of the New Mexico English Mission, T. L. Wiltsee, to the new mission to give his entire time to the Navajo. When in June, 1891, his wife became seriously ill, Wiltsee had to resign and the veteran missionary F. A. Riggins of the Montana Conference was then appointed. Riggins established his residence at Fort Defiance, Arizona, the agency headquarters, where the government set apart an acre and a half of land. Here a parsonage was built and other improvements made. The Missionary Society petitioned the Interior Department for a 640-acre tract of land on which to establish, together with religious and industrial facilities, a model farm where the Indians might receive agricultural training. The government set apart on April 29, 1893, a section of land at Red Lake, in the interior of the reservation, but failed to vest title in the Missionary Society. Within a year a turbulent spirit developed among the Navajo, who contended that they had never agreed that the land should be used for missionary purposes. Negotiations for a title were initiated with the government but progress was slow.

In 1894 S. E. Snider succeeded Riggins, and on October 3 reported to the Missionary Society:

We hold services in the government school building. There is no one room large enough to accommodate all who would attend. Many of the pupils are turned away for lack of room.

* * * *

. . . I have made a great many calls on the sick, and have had many calls to go and see the sick, but owing to the great distance in some cases I could not go.⁵³³

Snider was at a disadvantage in not having either a chapel or an interpreter. Few of those who attended the services were able to understand the English language. The next year (1895) brought a drought so severe that many of the Indians "ate their sheep and goats, and finally were obliged to eat their ponies to keep from starving." Congress came to their aid with an appropriation of over $60,000. for digging "irrigating ditches and for boring artesian wells."⁵³⁴

The Woman's Home Missionary Society also decided to attempt missionary work among the Navajo. They secured a grant of land in the San Juan Valley, New Mexico, 150 miles east of Fort Defiance and seventy miles from a railroad. Here, in October, 1891, Mrs. Mary L. Eldridge and Mary E. Raymond, both experienced Indian teachers, set up their tent. Soon, with the aid of friendly Indians, they had a little house built and were ready to enter upon their mission.

They began by visiting the sick . . . giving them medicine, which so won their confidence that the mission soon became a dispensary. Then the missionaries brought the women to their own house, teaching them to cook and spin upon wheels brought from the East, and assisting them in weaving and in selling their rugs, the inimitable Navajo blankets which have made the tribe famous.

They also taught the men as well as they could the use of tools, and furnished guidance in irrigating the land. In 1893 the government appointed Mrs. Eldridge field matron for the Navajo. Miss Raymond died in August, 1894. She was succeeded by Mary R. Tripp. There were some white settlers in the vicinity among whom the missionaries held prayer meetings and other religious services. Several having professed conversion, a Class of about fifteen members was organized. By 1895 evident progress also had been made in aiding the Navajo to realize the value of education, against which they had previously held much prejudice, so that they were becoming willing to send their children to the government schools.⁵³⁵

GENERAL SUMMARY: INDIAN MISSIONS, 1845-95

During the half century covered by this volume the Methodist Episcopal Church sponsored missions for longer or shorter periods among Indian tribes in twelve states and territories. Most of what was said in Volume Two concerning difficulties and weaknesses in Indian mission work during 1769-1844 applies equally to the later period and need not be repeated.*

It cannot be fairly claimed that the Church had an Indian mission program. Although the Missionary Society nominally sponsored the missions it exercised no real supervision over them. With few exceptions they were established by the Annual Conferences and such supervision as they received was provided by Presiding Elders whose primary concern was for the English-speaking domestic missions. The Indian reservations were too widely separated, except in Kansas, for Mission Districts to be organized as was done in the case of other non-English-speaking missions such as the German and Scandinavian. Indian missionary work was highly specialized, which to be carried on efficiently required missionaries trained for the task, but the Church had neither plans nor facilities for such training. All of the Conferences in the West and Northwest lacked an adequate supply of men for their missions. As the English-speaking work was considered to be more important and more urgent, full-time missionaries for the Indian missions were seldom available. These missions were often simply attached as preaching places to regular Circuits. Unacquainted with the languages of the tribes, preachers were compelled to speak through interpreters, which at the best was an unsatisfactory method of preaching. In accordance with the itinerant system appointments were made annually and were seldom renewed for a second or a third year, affording little opportunity for a missionary to become acquainted with his congregation. In some cases missionaries appointed on full time to Indian missions were drawn off, after a year or two, into the regular work.

Few, if any, were the missionaries who were motivated by a compelling sense of a life calling, or apostleship, to the Indians such as had possessed William Case, John Clark, Jason Lee, Thomas Johnson, and others in the earlier period. Even before that period closed a pervasive sense of despondency concerning the possibility of Indian evangelization and civilization had developed. This spirit of pessimism became more widely prevalent as the years passed, accounting in part for the lack of men ready to dedicate their lives to Indian missionary service.

This lack was partly compensated for by the number of Christian Indian missionaries, some of whom became Annual Conference members. Outstanding among these were Peter Marksman, George Copway, Samuel Spates, and Peter Greensky * in Michigan; David Johnson, Thomas Cornelius, and William Woodman in New York; Thomas Pearne in the Northwest; Squire Gray Eyes, J. M. Armstrong, Charles Ketchum, George Washington Clark, and Pascal Fish in Kansas. Greensky, a powerful man in argument, and in council among his people usually a ruling spirit, was a thorough student who possessed a library which included "the complete works of Clarke, Wesley, Fletcher, and Watson." Squire Gray Eyes, prominent in leadership among the Wyandot before their emigrations from Ohio, was said to possess in speech "almost irresistible persuasive powers," a man whose "veracity was never questioned, his integrity never suspected."⁵³⁶ George Washington Clark, a "head chief" of the Wyandot, was fully committed to Methodist discipline and rigid in enforcing it among his people. Conspicuous as a Christian and a preacher, he was also skillful in negotiation and was often sent to Washington on the business of the Wyandot Nation. He negotiated the final treaty which granted the Wyandot full citizenship and opened their lands to settlement. To these men and others of equal ability and consecration was due much of such success as was had by Methodist Indian missions.

Indian missions, despite obvious failures, made no inconsiderable contribution to the moral and religious progress of the race. Churches were founded, Christian leaders developed, hundreds of men and women brought into the Church as members, and the whole tone of Indian community life elevated. In addition to scores of Indian churches, many tribesmen who had achieved citizenship and learned the English language were welcomed without discrimination into membership in English language churches.

* Available sources do not indicate whether or not Isaac and Peter Greensky were related.

Expanding Program of Foreign Missions— China

IN MID-CENTURY, while domestic missions were persistently pushing toward the Pacific, a sense of missionary obligation for lands beyond the seas was gaining increased expression in the Church. Stephen Olin, president of Wesleyan University, who never lost an opportunity to plead for missions, voiced the growing concern. Multitudes of members of the Church, he cried, burn with a desire to have some part in overturning the idol temples of India and China; but not one of the six hundred and fifty thousand can consecrate himself or his property to the enterprise through any channel provided by his own denomination. . . . [The Church] . . . is bound to provide some medium through which its members can give expression to their irrepressible convictions of duty toward the perishing heathen, or else frankly to announce to them that it does not propose to deviate from its present policy, and so leave their consciences free to contribute their personal and pecuniary aid through other denominations more alive to this class of Christian obligations.¹

The responsibility for inaction, Olin felt, lay with the Missionary Society whose constitution expressed an "inherent partiality for home missions." But the time had come, he declared, when "the Church must act" in developing a program of foreign missions worthy of her heritage.

There were evidences in the forties of a rising tide of missionary concern in the churches, such as missionary prayer meetings and the beginning of young people's organizations in colleges, whose primary concern was foreign missions. The Young Men's Missionary Society* of Boston projected a missionary periodical which was taken over by the Missionary Society and published as the Missionary Advocate, the first issue appearing April 1, 1845. It was sent free to every Traveling Preacher in the United States.

The example of other Churches provided a strong stimulus to action. "The

* The Y. M. M. S. was doubtless influenced by the fact that the American Board published a missionary periodical with a circulation of 60,000 copies, and the Baptists a missionary organ of 30,000. The Missionary Society aimed at a subscription goal of 100,000. By July, 1845, subscribers numbered 12,500, and at the close of the second year nearly 19,000.—Missionary Advocate, I (1845), 1 (April), 1; ibid., II (1846-47), 12 (March), 92.

Missionary Societies of sister denominations," wrote Secretary Pitman in 1846, "are availing themselves of . . . providential openings for the enlargement of their respective [foreign] fields, and are entering upon their cultivation with a zeal worthy of the cause in which they are engaged." For Methodism to fail to do the same, he declared, would be to "proclaim herself unworthy of her parentage, and false to her own pretensions." It was a cause of "deep humiliation," he said, that the Church had not in recent years occupied a position of leadership among the denominations in foreign missions and that only by a wide extension of her program in the foreign field would Methodism be "consistent with her claim to the character of a missionary Church." ²

Who in 1846 could envisage the incredible scale on which Christian missions would be maintained in the closing decade of the century? Thinking then was in terms of an isolated mission in China or India or Africa, staffed by a few men. Even such an undertaking was regarded as an all but impossible venture, involving great financial risk, and to be planned with caution. Under these conditions it is understandable that China was under contemplation as a field for a long time before the launching of the mission took place.

At the same time other great movements which ushered in changes in thinking were under way. Rapid increase of national wealth which began in the forties and reached unprecedented proportions in later decades; the expansion of American industry and accompanying foreign trade; the rise in the United States of the spirit of economic imperialism coincident with the opening of the nations of the Orient to the penetration of Western commerce, ideas, and customs represented a combination of factors which eventually would make the century one of outstanding foreign missionary activity and project the Churches into a new age and new conceptions of world evangelization.

A quarter of a century later, the average American was beginning to be world-conscious. Robert S. Maclay, China missionary, addressing the 1872 anniversary of the Missionary Society, observed:

The time is at hand . . . when our intelligent interest and efforts in the missionary cause will be the measure at once of our loyalty to Christ and of our denominational success. The wonderful changes now transpiring among the nations of the earth precipitate upon us responsibilities from which we cannot escape. All the Christian Churches of Europe and America recognize the claims of this new era, and are calling loudly and persistently for laborers and contributions to improve the golden opportunity now offered. The officers of our own Missionary Society . . . cannot be indifferent to the present aspects of the world

The Christian Church recognizes that the field is the world, and that, notwithstanding the diversities of climate, language, and geographical position, Christian work every-where is a unit. Each branch of the Church, by her allegiance to Christ, stands related to the entire field³

Even as Maclay concluded with an appeal for opening work in Japan—based on the argument that the United States had closely associated herself with that nation otherwise—the General Missionary Committee had the project under consideration, and shortly thereafter Maclay himself was appointed to open such a mission. The indecision, hesitancy, and caution of an earlier period had been overcome. The larger role of foreign missions had been recognized and accepted. By 1895 the Church was in the midst of a new missionary era.

CHINA MISSIONS

Foochow, China, September 30, 1847: “. . . arrived at this place on the 6th inst., and landed the next day, taking up our quarters in a comfortable house, which we can occupy five or six months, if we choose.” Signed, “Moses C. White.” The first missionaries of the Methodist Episcopal Church to China had reached their destination.

How did it come about—the fulfillment of this dream of years? Since that anniversary meeting of the Board in May, 1835, at which President Willbur Fisk of Wesleyan University had proposed the immediate founding of a mission to China little had happened. A year later the Corresponding Secretary stated that although efforts had been made both by the managers of the Society and by the Bishops, the men had not yet been found to embark in this undertaking.* Not until 1844 was the proposal renewed when the Rev. John Dempster, pastor of Mulberry Street Church, New York, offered to visit China at his own expense to survey the field. A committee was formed to study the matter and at its next meeting the Board decided to authorize a mission should Dempster's report be favorable. But for some unexplained reason Dempster's trip was not made. Another year passed with no decisive action. At the 1846 anniversary meeting, on May 18, the China Mission project was again brought forward. The Rev. W. C. Palmer offered to subscribe $1,000., payable in ten annual installments, and to procure if possible twenty-nine other like subscriptions. Finally the Board was moved to action by the determination of a young Local Preacher, a graduate of the University of Michigan, to give his life to missionary work in China. When Bishop Janes, to whom he had written, replied that the Church had no mission in China and had not authorized the establishment of one, Judson D. Collins answered, “Bishop, engage me a place before the mast, and my own strong arm will pull me to China, and support me while there.”

Authorization quickly followed. At a joint meeting of the Board and General Missionary Committee two days later it was resolved to send two missionaries to China to found a mission. Money was appropriated: $1,500. for salaries, and $1,500. for outfits, passage, and traveling expenses. At the October meeting of the Board, Collins, though an unmarried man—a handicap in the eyes of the Board—was named as one, and in December Moses C.

White was considered as the second.* By March of the next year (1846) both had been finally approved. Possible location of the mission was limited to the five free ports, and Hong Kong. Foochow was chosen, largely on the recommendation of George Smith (later Bishop of Victoria) of the Church Missionary Society of England. It was, wrote John M. Reid, a field of no ordinary claims. Half a million of souls . . . thronged its lanes, its hillsides, and its waters. It was the political and literary center, and has since become the commercial center, of a province containing twenty-five millions of inhabitants.

The missionaries sailed on April 15, aboard the Heber, from Boston. White was accompanied by Jane Isabel Atwater, whom he married on the eve of his departure. Four months and twenty days later—September 4—they arrived at the mouth of the Min River. It had been a long wearisome journey of 12,000 miles, southeastward across the Equator into the South Atlantic Ocean, around Cape Horn, northwestward again across the Equator to Canton, and finally along the China coast in a lorchia to the Min. Thence they proceeded up the river to Foochow, landing with their effects on September 7. They took up residence in a house which had just been engaged by the missionaries of the American Board.† Within a week they had hired a Chinese teacher and had begun to study the language.⁴

At home, the response to this news created wide interest throughout the Church. The interest shown stimulated the Board into sending immediate reinforcements. Thirty-seven days after the landing of the initial party Robert S. Maclay of the Baltimore Conference and Henry Hickok and wife of the Genesee Conference sailed from New York for Foochow. On April 15, 1848, they arrived at their destination. Before leaving New York Hickok was appointed by Bishop L. L. Hamline as Superintendent of the China Mission and entrusted with broad powers of administration.⁵

* Moses C. White (1819-1900) was born at Paris, Oneida County, N. Y. In his sixteenth year he was converted at a protracted meeting in Paris and joined the Methodist Church. At twenty-one he entered the Oneida Conference Seminary to prepare for college and later enrolled at Wesleyan University. In his senior year he was an Exhorter, a Class Leader, and a Local Preacher. He graduated from Wesleyan with high honors in 1845 and was asked by President Stephen Olin if he would go to China as a missionary if the Church desired. When he assented Olin urged him to enter Yale Theological Seminary for further preparation. In 1846 he was received on trial in the New York Conference and assigned to the St. John's Street Church in New Haven as junior preacher. In August the Presiding Elder transferred him to the pastorate of the church at Milford, Conn., but he continued to carry a full course at Yale. On Jan. 28, 1847, he was appointed missionary to China and on March 13 was married to Jane Isabel Atwater, who while a student at Oneida Seminary had dedicated her life to missionary service. In China he immediately found himself called upon to give his major attention to the relief of suffering. When he returned to America he settled as a physician in New Haven and in 1857 became a teacher in the Yale Medical School. During his later years he made important contributions to the knowledge and practice of medicine.—Minutes, New York East Conference, Spring, 1901, p. 116; "Founding and Early History of Our Chinese Mission, at Foochow, 1847-1853," and biographical sketches in "Manuscripts Relating to the Founding of the Methodist Missions in Foochow, China," hereafter called White MSS. Collection. Bound Collection in the Library of the Board of Missions; S. H. Gage, "Moses C. White," Journal of Applied Microscopy and Laboratory Methods, IV (1901), 1 (January), 1110-1111.

† The American Board Mission in Foochow had been established on June 2, 1846, by Stephen Johnson, fourteen months before the arrival of the Methodist missionaries. Johnson was reinforced soon after his arrival by L. B. Peat and wife, "These brethren of the American Board," wrote White, "gave a most cordial welcome and a helping hand to our mission, and Brother Johnson aided us often as interpreter."—I. W. Wiley, China and Japan . . . , pp. 196 f.; Moses C. White, "Early History of the China Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church," in White MSS. Collection.

In 1849 Maclay wrote to Secretary Pitman that he had "made arrangements with Miss Henrietta C. Sperry,* a Young Lady recommended as well prepared for the Missionary work," to come to China with the intention of becoming his wife and asked, if the Board approved, that arrangements be made at the earliest opportunity for her passage to China. The Board agreed, and approved an estimate of $150. for outfit; $300. for one year's salary; and the cost of transit on the best terms that could be arranged. Maclay met her at Hong Kong on July 9, and they were married the next day.⁶

FOOCHOW MISSION

Getting the Foochow Mission under way was a staggering task. There were no precedents to follow, no foundations laid by others on which missionaries could build.† The instructions given by the Missionary Society and the Bishops who appointed them were few and simple.⁷ The one definitive paragraph on their work read:

It is expected that each member of the mission will strive to master the language at the earliest period, and will neither omit opportunity nor efforts for securing that important end. Preaching the Gospel of Christ, to few or many, as God may give you occasion, you will consider your one great task. As subordinate to this other things may require your attention, for example, healing the sick and the establishment of schools.⁸

This brief paragraph, with the addition of a single item—distribution of literature—constituted the outline of the missionaries' program for the first decade. Language study alone consumed a good part of their time.

With diligent work and with manuals of the written language, classical style, we soon managed to master a few words for communicating our most common wants. We spent from six to eight hours a day studying the Chinese characters and imitating our teachers in enunciating the curious sounds of a wonderful language.⁹

Although White had taken but a few courses in medicine preliminary to his departure rumor soon spread through the streets and byways of Foochow that a foreign doctor had arrived and he found himself importuned to save the lives of men, women, and children whom native doctors had given up

* Henrietta Sperry had studied at Mt. Holyoke Seminary under the influence of Mary Lyon. "For nearly thirty years she lived the life of a devoted missionary wife, caring for her seven children, preparing them for college, conducting a little day-school for girls before the Misses Woolston came to China, developing a foundling asylum, 'to rescue female infants from destruction,' placing at the service of the mission her skill in music, and translating some simple books for the use of the school."—Frank Mason North, "The Missionary-Minded Women of Methodism," ms., in the Library of the Board of Missions, pp. 44 f.

† This is not to suggest that missionary work in China was first inaugurated by the Methodists. On the contrary China Christian missions had a long history preceding 1847. The Nestorians founded a Christian church on Chinese soil about 636 A.D. Growth continued for several centuries, then decline set in. By the opening of the fifteenth century no trace remained of the movement. A Franciscan monk was admitted to China and established himself in Peking in 1294. Several thousands of Roman missionaries followed his lead. Francis Xavier, renowned Jesuit missionary, died at Macao in 1552 while trying to re-establish Roman Catholicism among the Chinese and his followers inaugurated a missionary movement which has continued up to the present. Robert Morrison, of the London Missionary Society, reached Canton on an American ship in 1807. The first missionaries of the American Board began work in China in 1820. By 1845 thirty-five Protestant missionaries, representing three American and two British societies, were at work in five Chinese cities.—Richard Terrill Baker, Ten Thousand Years, The Story of Methodism's First Century in China, pp. 44 ff.

to die. Within a few weeks scarcely a day passed without one or more applying to him for medical aid. "One man was cured of dysentery by a single prescription." The wife of his Chinese teacher, after twelve days' illness, was given into his care by her husband and father. Under his treatment she was soon convalescent. He was called upon "to attend the son of the Lieutenant-Governor of one of the provinces" who resided in Foochow. A mandarin of another province called him to the house of his son to see his wife who was near death from consumption. Opium poisoning was prevalent; one night alone White had three calls to treat such cases, and in a month's time he had saved the lives of seven out of eight patients who had attempted suicide by taking the narcotic.¹⁰

In February, 1848, White opened a dispensary adjoining his house, where he received patients and gave out drugs. As specific authority had not been given for medical practice on so extensive a scale he sought Board approval for the new departure. On September 27, 1848, the Board decided

That we approve of Bro. White's course in opening a dispensary for medical purposes in connection with the missions and that we would approve of his renting an additional room for similar purposes, if . . . it becomes desirable, nevertheless we recommend that all expenditures be made with great caution & economy.

At the same time an appropriation of $300. was made "for the purchase of medicines for the present year," and a committee authorized "to purchase and forward medicines by the next vessel to the amt. of $200.00." The Board recommended that in no case should a fee be charged "for medical treatment," but added that it could see no objection to the acceptance of such presents as might be offered, those of monetary value to be credited to the Missionary Society.¹¹

White and Collins also had instructions "to establish schools at the earliest feasible period, and on the most approved plan." Superintending "such school or schools as . . . [either might] be able to organize" was made Collins' special responsibility. He initiated the work by employing a Chinese teacher and on February 28, 1848, opened a school for boys in a room adjoining the mission home. The teacher was to be paid six dollars a month "provided he could bring pupils to form the school." On the first day eight boys came. The exercises began with the reading of the Lord's Prayer in Chinese, and its explanation in the colloquial, after which all knelt and Collins offered prayer in English. The pupils then studied Chinese classics until noon, and, in the afternoon, Christian books.

Throughout the day the method of study is, for each pupil to repeat, again and again, the words set for his lesson, at the top of his voice, and at the same time that other boys are exercising their voices in the same way. The teacher sits by, correcting such mistakes as he hears made. The scene appears to a stranger to be one of great confusion.

Interest had increased and by May enrollment had grown to twelve. On the first Sunday (March 5, 1848) the same day-school group met as a Sunday school. Collins and White both participated in the exercises. The doxology to the tune of "Old Hundred" was sung in Chinese; and the second chapter of Matthew read, also in Chinese, explained by Collins to the teacher who then commented on it to the children.¹²

By May, 1849, three day schools for boys were in operation, each with an enrollment of twenty pupils. Since many of the boys were too poor to purchase school supplies the mission furnished each with "twenty-five cash on each seventh day" for books, pens, and paper. The amount required to operate a school for a year, including rent, teacher's salary, and supplies for pupils was estimated at $110., or five and a half dollars per student.¹³

The first mission school for girls was opened on December 30, 1850, under the direction of Mrs. Robert S. Maclay, with ten pupils.

The school-house was built in a corner of the lot occupied in part by . . . [the Maclays]. It was a plain frame building, measuring 18 by 22 feet, and one story high. Its entire cost to the mission was $55. After considerable exertion, Mrs. Maclay succeeded in collecting a school of twenty-five pupils, with an average daily attendance of fifteen. . . . A Chinese teacher was employed The girls were taught in reading, writing, singing, elementary geography, arithmetic, etc., etc. The text-books in reading comprised simple tracts in short sentences, illustrating Christian doctrines, Bible stories, the catechism, hymns, and portions of the Bible. The school was continued, with brief interruptions, for about seven years

This school . . . brought the mission into friendly communication with the parents of the children, disarmed prejudice, removed doubts, elicited praise from the intelligent portion of the community, assisted materially in gaining for us the goodwill and confidence of the people; and, best of all, . . . taught . . . [the girls] how to live and worship God.¹⁴

The third principal missionary activity was the distribution of literature. When the first missionaries had stopped at Hong Kong and Canton on the way to Foochow they had obtained a supply of tracts and pamphlets, including Scripture portions. Again, some months later, when the Hickoks passed through Hong Kong, the London Missionary Society and the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions furnished them gratuitously "a large supply of Chinese Scriptures and tracts for distribution." On their arrival at Foochow, before they were able to speak an intelligible sentence in Chinese, they were delighted to discover that people on the streets would gladly receive at their hands all the printed material that they were disposed to distribute.

When we offer tracts for distribution the people receive them with the greatest eagerness. Frequently, one man who has got a tract will read it aloud to others. Occasionally, when we return through a street, we see persons to whom we have given tracts busy reading them.

Day after day in intervals between periods of language study, singly or in pairs, the missionaries would saunter forth, pockets filled with pamphlets and tracts which they would hand out to eager recipients.¹⁵

In a little more than two years the missionaries' stock of Scriptures and other literature was practically exhausted and they felt impelled to begin the preparation and publication of literature for their own use. As early as April, 1848, Collins reported having published certain items which were "among the most approved and popular of Chinese tracts." The first requisition made upon the Missionary Society was for a printing press.¹⁶

Even earlier White had undertaken original composition, in 1847 compiling with the aid of his Chinese teacher a "Syllabic Dictionary," and beginning an "English and Chinese Vocabulary" in the Foochow colloquial. In 1848 he compiled a Chinese "Calendar." Three years later he was busily engaged in the preparation and publication of a colloquial version of the Gospel of Matthew. At Shanghai, Amoy, and Ningpo, missionaries of other societies had engaged experimentally in the translation and publication of portions of Scripture in the colloquial dialects with the purpose of making the Bible available to the large proportion of the population who lacked sufficient education to read and understand books printed in classical Chinese. Within a short time thousands of copies of portions of the Scripture in the Foochow colloquial * were in circulation.¹⁷

The fourth major activity of the mission—ranked first in importance—the preaching of the Gospel in the language of the Chinese people, was necessarily much slower in beginning. When White and Collins had been in China almost two years and Maclay fifteen months, Maclay wrote: We "hope that some of us will be able soon to preach the gospel to this people." Preaching through interpreters was promptly begun but direct address was a different matter.¹⁸ A few months later he added:

Our work continues to be, in the main, one of preparation. We have no election in the matter: if we hope ever to preach Christ in the dialect of this people, we must prepare ourselves by patient, persevering study. Without this we cannot do the work of a missionary to the Chinese.¹⁹

In their first attempts in the vernacular the missionaries tried informal conversation with their household servants and people on the streets. Next they rented vacant rooms, in some cases open to the street, commonly called chapels, where they displayed tracts and books. As people came in to examine the literature the missionaries endeavored to talk with them by asking and

* The publication of Scripture and tracts in the Foochow colloquial was the cause of the first serious disagreement between White and Collins, who was at the time Superintendent of the mission. Collins declared that "no such version should be published at the expense of the Mission, as that was a low form of literature not approved by Chinese scholars." White was permitted to publish at his own expense 300 copies of Matthew but "forbidden to publish any more even at his own expense." So eagerly sought, however, by the general public were these copies of the first gospel that within a few weeks all the Foochow missionaries, English and American, were convinced of their value and gave approval to their publication.—M. C. White, "Founding and Early History . . ." in White MSS. Collection, pp. 52 f.

answering questions. As they gained fluency they tried brief exhortations, and finally undertook to preach short sermons—seldom more than five minutes in length, as that was about as long as a passerby would stop and listen. By 1850 three “chapels” had been opened “for conversation with the people” and two more were expected to be in use soon.²⁰

The next year Collins wrote that “a service more formal and regular” than had been held before had been established. It was attended principally by the pupils of the Methodist schools, their teachers, and the servants in the employ of the mission. In November, 1852, in his annual report Maclay wrote: “We are not yet able to speak in the vernacular of this people with the precision and fluency we could desire, and yet our feeble efforts are not unattended with encouragement.”²¹

Collins phrased their ideal thus:

It has been our endeavour, first of all to acquire a knowledge of the language of every-day life—that which is heard and spoken here In that dialect we are now able to converse on all ordinary subjects, and I believe express intelligibly the saving truths of our holy religion. . . . in reference to a complete acquaintance with the written language, we are but at the threshold. We may be, and should be engaged in active labours, especially preaching the word; but it is now become apparent that we are only to lay down study with our lives. In the colloquial we have a great deal yet to do; intonation to correct, a fine enunciation to acquire, countless words to learn, and to trace out those set phrases and forms of expression stereotyped by custom, which lead to the minds and hearts of the people; all this may be done and the written language remain untouched. We have been studying the character, and have made some proficiency; but years of daily application yet will leave its complete acquisition unfinished.²²

On October 27, 1852, the Iongtau street chapel—“never more than a wretched hovel,” inferior to an ordinary American barn—was reopened after having been refurbished. At the service of re-opening, wrote White, some of the old men said the place was very neat and comfortable, but far too small. They said that the people who wished to hear us were very numerous, and that we ought to rent two or three shops, side by side, and put them all together, and make one large room, where as many could be accommodated as may desire to hear.²³

At an early date the missionaries had pushed out beyond the city’s boundaries and established two or three rural preaching places. Writing on March 3, 1851, Maclay describes one in the country, without windows, with a dirt floor, which was used by the owner as a general utility storeroom for farming tools and vegetables. Cracks let in large quantities of light and air. As there were no seats hearers were expected to bring their own stools.²⁴

To these pioneers all this may have appeared as a feeble beginning but back home the Board and Bishops were pleased. They were ready to send reinforcements as they were needed. But the number of serious health problems which had developed within the little staff of the China Mission during the early years impressed them with the imperative need of sending to China a missionary doctor.* As early as December, 1848, on recommendation of the China Committee, the Board had asked that "a suitable Missionary Physician who shall be a married man . . . be sent as early as practicable to Fuh Chau." An acceptable candidate could not immediately be found. On June 19, 1850, in a further action it was recommended that the physician should be a member of an Annual Conference; that his chief medical work should be "the care of the health of the Mission"; and that medical attention "to the Chinese be limited in mode and extent to the great object of promoting the work of God in China." About this time Isaac W. Wiley, a young man of twenty-five, who was practicing medicine in Pennsylvania under a license of the county medical societies of the state, volunteered for the Foochow Mission. On August 21 the Board recommended his appointment on condition that he pursue further medical study "during the ensuing fall & winter," which he did, receiving the degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1851, from New York University. At the Board session of September 11, 1850, he was appointed missionary physician. His salary was fixed at $850., including table expense and fuel; with an additional outfit allowance of $350. On Friday evening, December 22, in Union Methodist Episcopal Church, Philadelphia, he was ordained a deacon.²⁵

Wiley with his wife Frances Jane and daughter joined a group bound for China. They sailed on March 13, and arrived at Foochow on July 9, 1851. The party included James Colder and his wife of the Philadelphia Conference; and Mary Seely of Cardiff, Onondaga County, New York. Miss Seely was a graduate of the Oneida Conference Seminary, Cazenovia, New York, where she had been a classmate of the late Jane Isabel White. Nine days after her arrival, "according to previous engagement," she was married to her late friend's husband.

The effects of overwork and bad living conditions were beginning to show by 1849. Hickok, completely broken down, had to withdraw in July of that year, and earlier, in February, Collins† suffered a prolonged attack of

* The first fatality occurred on May, 1848, when Mrs. Moses C. White, in her twenty-sixth year, eight months after her arrival in China, died of consumption. A jasmine field—which later became the nucleus of the American Cemetery in Foochow—was procured and there, under the branches of a venerable Chinese olive tree, her body was laid to rest.—Christian Advocate and Journal, XXIII (1848), 39 (Sept. 27), 154; M. C. White, "Founding and Early History . . .," White MSS. Collection, p. 4.

† Judson Dwight Collins (1822-52) was born in Wayne County, N. Y., and at an early age emigrated with his father's family to Michigan. He was named Judson by his mother "as a pledge of her own interest in the missionary work." When a small boy he was wont to say, "If I live to be a man I shall go to China." In July, 1845, he graduated from the University of Michigan, a member of the first class of the university. Following his graduation he was appointed professor of "Natural and Moral Science" in Wesleyan Seminary, Albion, Mich. In 1846 he was received on trial in the Michigan Conference (Gen'l Minutes, IV, 84) and in January, 1847, was appointed by Bishop Janes as missionary to China. He returned to his father's home in Lyndon, Mich., in September, 1851, and for a time it was hoped that recovery was possible. But it was not to be. On May 13, 1852, he died, in his thirtieth year. "He was a diligent and successful student; an intelligent, growing, fervent Christian; a minister and missionary whose labour had no limit but his abilities, and no termination but death." His hold "upon China, his loved mission, to which he had given himself all he had since he was a mere child, was yielded up only with life itself."—Missionary Advocate, VIII (1852), 4 (July), 26 f.

typhoid * fever followed by effects so serious that he was all but incapacitated. During the early months of 1851 Collins became "so feeble that there was no prospect of his living to labor much longer" if he remained in China, and so on April 22 he left Foochow, bound for home. Upon Hickock's departure, Collins had succeeded him as Superintendent and upon Collins' withdrawal in 1851 Robert S. Maclay † was named to the superintendency by Bishop Janes.

White also had been afflicted. On August 1, 1848, he wrote in his diary: "My health continues poor and I can do but little at anything." Two days later he added: "The pain in my chest increases." On August 22: ". . . as my health is poor, I have concluded to spend a short time on . . . [Drum] mountain. . . ." In February, 1850, he was attacked by typhoid fever and, in his own words, "was brought to the very gates of death" but with the aid of an English army surgeon from India his strength was partially restored after seven months of invalidism. In the fall of 1852 he decided that his health had been permanently impaired and, as Mrs. White had been told by Dr. Wiley that "she could not possibly live if she remained at Foochow," he concluded that the only alternative was to give up his missionary career. At the end of December, with Mrs. White he started for America, reaching New York in August, 1853.²⁶

Almost immediately following his arrival Dr. Wiley entered upon the active duties of a missionary physician. So urgent and numerous were the demands for the relief of suffering that he had no thought of confining himself to the treatment of the members of the mission. Within a short time he had gained sufficient proficiency in the language to take over the dispensary which White had established. Such marginal time and strength as could be spared from his medical duties he spent in supervising the boys' school begun by Collins. Hardly was his work under way when fate intervened. On November 3, 1853, Mrs. Wiley died, leaving to her husband the care of two infant daughters. His own health failing also, so much so that it became impossible for him to carry on his medical work, on January 16, 1854, he embarked for the United States. Missionary activities during the greater part of 1853-54 were seriously interrupted by the Taiping revolutionaries, although Foochow fortunately escaped attack by the insurgents.²⁷

* White is source for claiming Collins' illness as "typhoid"; Reid and an article in Missionary Advocate both state he suffered from "typhus."

† Robert Samuel Maclay (1824-1907) was born in Concord, Pa. He graduated from Dickinson College, was received on trial in the Baltimore Conference in 1846, and on Sept. 10, 1847, was appointed missionary to China. He arrived in Foochow on April 14, 1848, and almost immediately revealed unusual qualities of leadership. He was appointed Superintendent and Treasurer of the China Mission on March 31, 1852, which office he continued to hold until Nov. 16, 1872. During this period he wrote Life Among the Chinese (1861) and collaborated in translating the Bible, the Methodist Discipline, and Catechism into Chinese. He resigned as China missionary to accept appointment to establish the Methodist mission in Japan. He arrived on June 11, 1873, and continued service in Japan until April, 1885. In 1884 he was sent to open the way for the founding of the Korea Mission, and was asked to become Superintendent but for health reasons declined. In 1888 he became dean of the Maclay College of Theology at Fernando, Calif. Of his ability as an administrator, Bishop Edward Thomson wrote: "He has a quick, well-educated, and well-disciplined mind, and to habits of business and a heart for his work, he joins correct judgment and a strong will. Yet, with his great firmness he has great kindness, and he avoids all parade of authority."—Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions; Gen'l Minutes, 1846, p. 4; Gospel in All Lands, October, 1897, pp. 449-54; ibid., April, 1898, pp. 190-91; Edward Thomson, Our Oriental Missions, I, 236.

Wiley's departure left the Maclays as the only Methodist missionaries in Foochow, since Colder too had left, for personal reasons.* In four years (1847-51) twelve had been sent to the field and now, February, 1854, but two remained. Nevertheless, neither the Board nor the Bishops were disheartened.

On August 4, 1854, Dr. Durbin reported the appointment to China, by Bishop Waugh, of Dr. Erastus Wentworth, professor of natural sciences at Dickinson College, and one of the original sponsors of the China Mission, forty-one years of age; and of Otis Gibson, a graduate of Dickinson, twenty-seven.† Before sailing, Wentworth, a widower, married Anna M. Lewis of West Chester, Pennsylvania. They arrived in Foochow on June 18, 1855.‡ The Gibsons reached Foochow on August 13, 1855.²⁸

The building of the first church edifice was a milestone in the history of the Foochow Mission. The Board on April 16, 1851, had recommended that measures be taken for the erection of a church and asked the editors of Methodist periodicals to present the need to the public. Generous contributions were made from time to time, especially by Methodist churches in New York, Brooklyn, and Williamsburgh, which contributed $5,000. Finally, on August 3, 1856, "Ching-Sing-Tong"—the "Church of the True God"—was dedicated, located three-quarters of a mile outside the city wall "on the great and only thoroughfare," Iongtau, leading to the southern entrance. The structure was in the style of Western architecture with walls of brick, plastered within and without, resting on a solid stone foundation. A second edifice, the Tiengang or "Heavenly Rest" Church—"the first Christian church ever erected in . . . [greater Foochow] for the worship of God in the English language"—was under construction.§ This was built with "two audience-rooms, one for Chinese, the other for English service." The Chinese portion was dedicated on October 18, 1856; the English language portion on December 28, 1856. The Foochow foreign community contributed to the cost of the building.²⁹

The "first building fitted up by the mission" as a missionary residence was on Tongchiu Island in the middle of the Min River, where foreigners preceding the Methodists had already settled. It did not prove to be entirely satisfactory

* Twenty-eight months after his arrival in China (Nov. 5, 1853) James Colder addressed a letter to Bishop Waugh saying, "A protracted and prayerful examination of the word of God, to which I trust I was providentially directed, having led me to entertain views of Church polity and practice different from those entertained by the Methodist Episcopal Church, I feel it to be my duty and privilege to dissolve my connexion with said Church." At the next session of the Philadelphia Conference his name was entered upon the Minutes as withdrawn. (Thirty-fifth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1853], p. 99; Minutes, B. M., V., 393.) This, however, was not Colder's sole reason for resigning. He was very restive under Maclay's superintendency and on Feb. 12, 1853, had written to Moses C. White that he and Dr. Wiley would not remain in China if Maclay was continued as Superintendent. "But I earnestly desire to stay here, and daily pray that this troublesome question will be so settled as to let me always live & labor for China."—Biographical File of the Library of the Board of Missions.

† A third volunteer, Joseph R. Perrie, was also appointed but for some reason did not go to the field.

‡ Less than four months after reaching China Mrs. Wentworth died of a debilitating ailment, aged twenty-five, leaving an infant daughter. In 1859 Dr. Wentworth married Miss Phebe E. Potter, by whom he had eight children. Her ill health necessitated the return of the family to the United States in December, 1861. She died in Cincinnati in 1874.—Thirty-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. (1855-56), p. 23; Gen'l Minutes, Spring, 1877, p. 98.

and as opportunity came new holdings were acquired on Mirror Hill, on the south side of the river. By 1861, the mission was able to rid itself entirely of the island property. The new site eventually was developed into an extensive mission compound. Five residences, a three-story building which housed the Girls' Boarding School and a second three-story building devoted to school-work and to literature production were constructed as time went on.³⁰

Eleven months after the dedication of the first Methodist church in China, ten years lacking ten months after the arrival of the first missionaries at the port of Foochow—Sunday, July 14, 1857—the first convert, Ting Ang, was baptized. He was a tradesman, forty-seven years of age, with a wife and five children. For two years he had attended preaching services more or less regularly at the Iongtau church. He procured Christian literature and familiarized himself with the Commandments, the Apostles' Creed, and the principal Christian doctrines. For some time preceding his baptism he had attended a weekly inquiry meeting and the Sunday morning worship service at the Tiengang Tong. He had instituted family prayer at his home, bringing his household gods to the mission with the declaration that he had renounced idol worship. Finally Gibson and Maclay visited him in his home and examined him on his grasp of Christian principles and his purpose to live as a Christian. After thorough examination he was accepted as a candidate for membership and the ordinance of baptism was administered by Maclay in the presence of the congregation at an afternoon worship service in Tiengang Tong.³¹

After suitable introductory remarks, explanatory of the nature both of Baptism and the Lord's Supper, the candidate was requested to stand up and repeat, in an audible voice, the Commandments and Baptismal Covenant. I then explained them, sentence by sentence, the candidate audibly expressing his cordial belief in them, and his determination faithfully to keep and obey them. I then proceed[ed] to baptize him, sprinkling the water on his head while he kneeled at the altar.³²

The first breach having been made in the stone wall of Chinese conservatism and opposition other successes quickly followed. On October 18, 1857, Ting Ang's wife and two younger children were baptized. Within a few months Maclay was able to report the baptism of thirteen adults and three infants. On August 7, 1858, the first Class was formed at the Iongtau church and soon a fully organized Methodist Society was in operation with three stewards, Class meetings, Quarterly Meetings, monthly collections for the poor, and quarterly collections for the support of the Gospel. A Sunday school also was organized. The six adult male converts ranged in age from twenty to fifty-seven years, representing an interesting cross section of Chinese society: a soldier, a scribe, a day-laborer, a basket-maker, a government employee, and a member of the literati. The youngest, Ting Seng-mi, was subjected to severe persecution but remained firm, declaring that "he would die rather than renounce Christianity."³³

To Maclay, Gibson, and other members of the Foochow Mission the first Quarterly Meeting and first Quarterly Conference were occasions of very special significance. Who knows, wrote Maclay, but they may in the future "be classed with those meetings in the old 'rigging loft' in New York, or even with the gatherings of the disciples in that 'upper room'?" The Quarterly Meeting was held on Saturday and Sunday, October 9-10, 1858, in the Iongtau church. Services were held on Saturday forenoon at which Otis Gibson and "three native helpers" preached to a large and attentive congregation. On Sunday morning a Love Feast was held, attended by the "Church members, and a few others friendly to the cause."

Our members well improved the time for speaking, by appropriate remarks, and a profoundly religious feeling seemed to prevail in the meeting. . . . The furnishings of the feast were somewhat peculiar. Wishing to train our converts to self-reliance in such matters, we instructed the brethren to provide the symbols of brotherly love for the feast. They were unanimously of the opinion that tea should take the place of cold water, and as bread, such as foreigners use, is not used here by the Chinese, they proposed a small kind of [sesame seed] cake as a substitute for it. We approved of the arrangement, and accordingly the stewards served the meeting with cakes and tea instead of bread and water.³⁴

At eleven o'clock there was a preaching service, with "three discourses." At two o'clock the Sunday school met, after which the Lord's Supper was celebrated, preceded by "the first public collection . . . for the support of the Gospel," amounting to 7,500 Chinese cash, or sixty-four cents. On October 11, the Quarterly Conference for the Iongtau appointment was held, attended by the members of the mission, the stewards, and the first Chinese Exhorter of the Foochow Mission. The business of the meeting was transacted "in harmony" and the members "separated with faith greatly strengthened." This year (1858), also, a foundling asylum was established in Foochow for the rescue and care of girl babies discarded by their parents.* Well-disposed Foochow residents contributed $670. toward its establishment.³⁵

While these encouraging events were happening the mission was doing its best to sustain its schools. The original day schools for boys had been short-lived. By the end of 1850 only one was open. Toward the close of the next year White decided to experiment with a mixed school but that too was soon discontinued, as was Mrs. Maclay's girls' school. By the fall of 1853 one school each for boys and girls was again open. The Missionary Society decided in 1856 that a boarding school should be established for the boys besides the day school already in existence and Otis Gibson undertook the task. Children

* The foundling asylum was continued until 1871 when about twenty of the inmates were transferred to the Girls' Boarding School and the institution was closed. About 1888 it was reopened and in 1893, with a new building, it became the Mary E. Crook Memorial Orphanage. During the year it cared for twenty-three waifs, four of whom were new-born babes picked up from streets and fields. —Frances J. Baker, The Story of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society . . . , pp. 295 f.; Seventy-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1894), pp. 45 f.; Twenty-sixth Ann. Rep., W. F. M. S. (1895), p. 37.

between the years of twelve and eighteen were accepted on the written agreement of parent or guardian, for a period of four to six years. The school furnished, in addition to instruction, clothes, and books, both room and board, for the purpose of providing a Christian home for the students.³⁶

With the aid of Mrs. Gibson, Mrs. Maclay resumed the schoolwork among girls, but the desirability of a boarding school soon became apparent. The mission appealed to the Board for its help and Erastus Wentworth wrote to the Ladies' China Missionary Society of Baltimore soliciting its aid:

Our churches are full of men; our preaching is to men; only now and then a woman dares venture within sound of the Gospel, and these are the large-footed women; small-footed, or ladies of China, never. . . . Nothing in . . . the East calls more loudly for reformation than the condition of women. In no department is missionary labor more needed than in this, and woman only can be reached by woman.

The amount considered necessary for founding a boarding school was $5,000. The Ladies' China Missionary Society granted the amount asked for the erection of school buildings; and the Missionary Society began to look around for teachers. The school was first called the Baltimore Female Academy, the name later changed, as a memorial to Bishop Waugh, to the Waugh Female Seminary. When, in 1858, another reinforcement was sent to Foochow, three teachers were in the party, Beulah and Sarah H. Woolston and Phebe E. Potter. The school now became the Girls' Boarding School, opened November 28, 1859.³⁷

The 1858 recruitment, the largest thus far, also included Stephen L. Baldwin of the Newark Conference, just graduated from the Concord Biblical Institute, and his young wife.*

In 1859 Carlos R. Martin, who had just graduated from the Concord Biblical Institute, volunteered for missionary work and was accepted. He married and in October departed for China, arriving on April 1, 1860. He soon gave "full proof of his indomitable energy of character, and his ardent love for the souls of men," but had scarcely made more than a beginning in study of the Chinese language when in 1864 he fell, together with his four-year-old son, a victim of cholera.³⁸

The casualties of the Foochow Mission during these early years were terrifying. In twelve years and six months twenty-three adults and one child had sailed from America for China. By 1861 three missionaries and two children had died and six others had left China as invalids, of whom one had died at sea and one had passed away at home within a year after his return—

* Little more than a year after the arrival of the Baldwins in China Mrs. Baldwin developed a serious chronic disorder. After several months of acute suffering for which no alleviative could be found the couple embarked for America with the hope of saving her life. But they had delayed too long. On March 16, 1861, Mrs. Baldwin died at sea at the age of twenty-one. Baldwin promptly returned to the mission. On April 15, 1862, he married Esther E. Jerman.

a casualty list of eleven.* Within the following few years the number increased.

In 1859 the American Board transferred two of its preaching places located near the Methodist compound—Ato and Kuaninchang—to the mission. That same year two appointments were opened in the country, Tocheng (Peach Farm) on the Min River fifteen miles northwest of Foochow, and Ngukang (Oxvale) two miles farther removed. Country appointments were now possible since the restrictions imposed on foreigners limiting the settlement to specified places had been removed by the treaties of 1858. Methodism could now begin its trek to the West. Two years later (1861) Kanchia was “reached,” and “chapels [were] dedicated at Koi Hung and Ngu Kang.” Maclay was inspired by these advances: “Our way is gradually opening to the western portions of this province, and thence to the central and western provinces of China.”³⁹

On September 19, 1861, Nathan Sites—the first alumnus of the Ohio Wesleyan University to go as a missionary to a foreign field—accompanied by his wife, Sarah Moore Sites, landed at Foochow. After a year’s intensive language study he was appointed to Ngukang. It was a providential appointment. Imbued with a passion for pioneer work lest he build on another man’s foundation, of all the missionaries he was the one best fitted to lead the van of the expansion movement westward. By “October 1, 1863 the ‘Plan of the Work’ for the year embraced six Circuits with appointments filled by native pastors, extending from Foochow to such distant points as Longuon [Loyuan] on the northeast, Hok-chiang [Futsing] at the southeast, Iong-bing [Yenping] in the far northwest, and Ing-hok [or Ingtai] to be opened in the Southwest.”⁴⁰ Thirty-two years later (March 31, 1895) at a memorial service held in Washington, D. C., Stephen L. Baldwin, for twenty-two years a colaborer of Sites in China, said of him:

when some acquaintance with the field had been gained . . . [his] burning desire . . . was to go into the interior, to get away from Foo-Chow and his foreign surroundings, to get out among the natives . . .

What characterized him in those early days was characteristic of his whole subsequent career. He delighted in pioneer work. In Hok-Chiang and Hing-Hua . . . he delighted to go into new places to preach the Gospel where it had never before been preached. . . . Afterward, in the distant cities of Yeng-Bing [Yenping] and Sa-Kaing [Shahsien], far up the river to the westward, he was found laboring for the Master, undeterred by persecution, refusing to turn back, though he knew it was a time of particular peril, but calmly going on with his work . . .⁴¹

On September 29, 1862, the first annual meeting of the Foochow Mission was held. There had been no authorization for the organization of a Mission Conference so the meeting was informal, but sixteen appointments were agreed upon, including eight new ones with twenty-five appointees, eleven of them Chinese. At the annual meeting of the next year (October 1, 1863), five Circuits were listed, in addition to which there were several stations not organized into Circuits, with a total of twenty-two preaching places.

* By 1858 thirty-six male and female missionaries had been sent to Foochow by three missionary Societies—Methodist, American Board, and Anglican—of whom ten had died and thirteen had been compelled to return, leaving only thirteen still on the field.—Erastus Wentworth, in Isaac W. Wiley, Late Bishop of the M. E. Church: A Monograph, Richard S. Rust, Ed., p. 39.

From the beginning the missionaries' idea had been to develop a native ministry as quickly as possible, but without an Annual Conference or a Bishop on the field to ordain preachers what could be done? The problem was solved by the transfer of Chinese candidates—properly recommended by their Quarterly Conferences—to Annual Conferences in America for admission on trial, thereby preparing the way for their ordination at some future date.

The first official visit of a Bishop to the China Mission was in 1865 when Bishop Edward Thomson made a brief stop of sixteen days (January 22-February 8) in connection with his trip to India. During his stay he presided at the annual meeting of the mission, visited some mission stations, and gave valuable personal counsel to the workers.⁴² Why the Bishops had not authorized Thomson to organize a China Mission Annual Conference at this time is not clear. That such action would have given added stimulus to China missions there can be no doubt.

The Bishop found the small corps of missionaries sadly depleted. At the time of his visit only four married couples—the Maclays, the Gibsons, the Baldwins, and the Sites—and two teachers, Sarah and Beulah Woolston, were on the field. Another couple, the Samuel L. Binkleys, had come in March, 1862, but had withdrawn by November, 1864. Before the year 1865 closed the Gibsons also, because of Mrs. Gibson's ill health, were forced to withdraw, but the following year reinforcement came in the persons of Virgil C. and Adeline G. Hart from the Black River Conference and Lucius N. and Mary D. Wheeler and three children from the Wisconsin Conference. The next year (1867) Hiram H. and Parthenia N. Lowry were added to the list. Even with these additions further increase of preachers was necessary if all the stations which had been established were to be maintained.

Besides the Bishop's visit, 1865 was marked by the dedication of East Street Church, the first church within the city walls of Foochow—a victory won against antagonism and resistance on the part of the Chinese gentry and officials. Persistence had gained the day. In 1862 the mission had asked that a $2,000. appropriation be included in the next year's estimates for such a church; and in 1863 the missionaries reported that they now owned a house and lot on East Street and had already fitted up the front for a chapel, the back for a day school and residence. However, a riot in January, 1864, destroyed all their work and the building had to be reconstructed.⁴³

With 1866, a period of rapid growth of the Foochow Mission began. Within the year there was an increase of five Chinese assistants; of nineteen baptisms; of fifty-five full members and forty-seven pupils. Superintendent Maclay's report for 1867 had in it a note of triumph:

During the year we have baptized one hundred and fifty-one adults and thirty-five children, a total of one hundred and eighty-six baptisms, being considerably more than twice the number of baptisms reported last year. . . . Our present total of members, probationers, and baptized children is five hundred and fifty, showing an increase over last year of two hundred and three. . . . We have organized three societies during the year, have completed our plans for carrying the Gospel into two more prefectures of this province, and we wait only for the Board's approval before occupying at once a new station in the Kiang-si province. . . .⁴⁴

Within a few months (December, 1867) the mission had not only established the new station in the Kiangsi Province, but "had resolved upon a mission to Peking" (June 30, 1868). These advance actions soon after were given approval and made decisive by Bishop Kingsley on his visit to Foochow in 1869. Writing to Missionary Secretary Harris on November 24, 1869, the Bishop said, "I have divided the work into three missions. One at Foochow, with Rev. Dr. Maclay as Superintendent; one at Kiukiang, with Rev. V. C. Hart as Superintendent; and one at Peking, with Rev. L. N. Wheeler as Superintendent."

Kingsley's optimistic vision was almost unlimited. Peking, Kiukiang, and Foochow, he said, are three great centers, one in the north, one in the middle, and the other in the south of the Empire. These points, if properly worked, will soon be the centers of three Annual Conferences, and *I here predict that within less than a hundred years from this time there will be more than a hundred Annual Conferences of the 'Methodist Episcopal Church in China.'*⁴⁵

The visit of the Bishop to China at this time culminated in the ordination of seven Chinese assistants to deacon's orders, of whom four were immediately raised to elders. Thus, after a brief twenty-three years of work in China, a native Church was on its way. Bishop Kingsley described the men as being "as fine a looking class . . . as I have ever ordained, and, I believe, as deeply pious."⁴⁶

The preachers and lay workers were not all cast in the same mold but differed widely in personality and spiritual gifts. Hu Po-mi, a soldier by profession, was a fluent preacher and specially characterized by "his humility, zeal, courage, and desire for a thorough knowledge of the Bible." Li Yu-mi, known as "the learned blacksmith," became versed in the Scriptures by placing his Bible alongside his anvil and studiously reading it between his strokes. His sermons were specially noted for their "original and beautiful metaphors." Ling Ching-ting was a victim of opium and, as he confessed, a participant in every kind of sin when he first heard the proclamation of the Gospel. He accepted Christ as his Savior, turned his back upon his past, and became a bold, eloquent, and zealous preacher. Because of his hasty, impulsive, and determined temperament he came to be known as the Peter of the Methodist band. He suffered greatly for his faith, at one time receiving

“one thousand stripes on his bare back.” Wong Tai-hung, a member of the literati, came into contact with the missionaries first as J. D. Collins’ teacher and later as instructor of J. Doolittle of the American Board Mission. For many years he persisted in the worship of idols but finally opened his mind to the cardinal truths of Christianity and became a convinced and faithful Christian.⁴⁷

With the opening of the two additional areas authorized by Bishop Kingsley, it was evident that the need for more missionaries was imperative. The response of the Board and Bishops was prompt. Early in 1870 five unmarried young men and one missionary couple crossed the Pacific, arriving in China in October. Of these Franklin Ohlinger of the Central German Conference and Nathan J. Plumb of the North Ohio Conference were designated for the Foochow Mission.⁴⁸

Superintendent Maclay reported that year 402 adults and eighty-two children baptized, making a total of 931 members, 969 probationers, and 239 baptized children. Within the city walls of Foochow there were less than twenty converts, although many thousands annually listened to the preaching of the Gospel in the commodious church building, East Street Church. Outside the city the story was different. In the immediate suburbs, with four appointments and two churches there were fifty-one members. Directly southeast in an area extending “some forty miles along the sea-coast from north to south and some fifty miles east and west,” there were thirty-nine “classes or preaching places” with an adult membership of 395. In the Hinghwa prefecture, sixty miles south of Foochow, where two years previously there were but eleven full members, there were now 221, divided among twenty-six preaching places. One hundred miles south, in an area thirty-five to fifty miles from east to west, new appointments were being established. Directly west of Foochow, in a district known as Aukwan, there were seven appointments which reported in toto six adults and five baptized children. In two other districts, one west and the other northwest of Aukwan, in which seven preachers were laboring, there were fifty-two members, eight probationers, and twenty-one baptized children. In the Yenping (Nanping) prefectural division of Fukien Province, some hundred and forty miles northwest of Foochow, four appointments had been established with forty-four members, eighteen probationers, and twelve baptized children.⁴⁹

Much of the credit for the expansion and development of the Church to this point is due to Maclay. “No missionary had given so many years to the cause, none had traveled so many miles of Chinese roads, none had been more indefatigable in preaching.” But his vision was not limited to China. On December 16, 1870, he wrote to the Missionary Society inquiring whether the establishment of a mission to Japan was in prospect. “That country now seems to be open to the Gospel,” he said, “and it is high time Protestant Christianity were entering the field in earnest.” At the close of his annual report for 1871 he announced that, after twenty-three years of field service with but one furlough, on the urgent advice of his physician he had decided to seek physical recuperation through a leave. While he was home on furlough the Bishops by unanimous action decided to transfer him to Japan to found the mission that he had zealously advocated. To succeed him as Superintendent of the Foochow Mission Bishop Wiley appointed S. L. Baldwin, who assumed the office in 1873.⁵⁰

The year 1873 brought to the Foochow Mission* a realization that in the recent period of rapid expansion the Church in some places had not been building upon a sound foundation. Increased attention was given to the exercise of discipline and the weeding out of some who had apparently joined the Church from unworthy and sinister motives. As a result, at the annual meeting in October a decrease of fifty-six members and 226 probationers was reported. Notwithstanding this decrease the missionaries felt that the Church was "stronger than ever before," and the Chinese preachers "were very hopeful and confident."⁵¹

The missionary staff was strengthened at this time by Julia F. Walling, who became Plumb's wife; Benjamin E. Edgell and wife of the Pittsburgh Conference; and in 1874 by D. W. Chandler and wife of the Erie Conference.

Sigourney Trask, M.D., of Youngville, Pennsylvania, was also sent to the field in 1874 by the New York Branch of the W. F. M. S. She was the first medical missionary of the Foochow Mission since the departure of Dr. Wiley in 1854. Dr. Trask opened a dispensary in February, 1875, and soon won renown as a skilled physician. Demand for a hospital and doctor's residence immediately arose and the General Executive of the W. F. M. S. appropriated $5,000. for the purpose. The hospital, located on Tongchiu Island, was dedicated on April 18, 1877, and admitted its first patient the next day. The second year 1,208 patients were admitted.

At first, religious services in the hospital wards were in the charge of a hospital Bible woman. Later they were taken over by specially trained students under the tutorage of the Woolston sisters and Mrs. Gibson. Morning and evening services were held in the wards, consisting of Bible reading, questions and answers, hymns, and prayers. On dispensary days women from the Woman's Bible-training School—the first in China, founded 1879—came to the hospital to talk with women in the waiting room.

Almost from the outset Dr. Trask determined to give medical training to promising young women. Her most outstanding student was Hu King-eng, daughter of Hu Yong-mi, and the doctor resolved that if possible she would see that Miss Hu received full training. On her urgent insistence, three generous women of the Philadelphia Branch personally assumed financial responsibility for such college and medical school education. In 1884 Hu King-eng was enrolled in the Ohio Wesleyan University, believed to be the first Chinese young woman to come to the United States for such study.

The first organized class of medical students in China—originally taught by Dr. Corey—was graduated in 1890, having completed a full five years' medical course, composed of a wide range of textbook studies and "four years' practice in the wards, drug-room, dispensary, and in practical obstetrical and gynecological work." Dr. Trask continued in charge of the hospital until 1885 when she was married to Vice-Consul John Phelps Cowles.

A second medical missionary, Julia Sparr, was sent to Foochow in 1878. In 1883 she also married. Dr. Catherine Corey was added to the hospital staff in 1884 but soon retired in ill health and later married. Her successor, Dr. Susan M. Pray, arrived in 1886, but after one year had to withdraw for health reasons. In 1887 Dr. Mary E. Carleton, of Brownsville, New York, an alumna of the Syracuse Medical College, with graduate courses at the New York Eye and Ear Infirmary, enlisted for service in China under the W. F. M. S. and for forty years rendered distinguished service in the Foochow Conference.⁵²

At the time of Dr. Carleton's arrival, the hospital had been enlarged with wards for seventy patients; and medical work was being carried on besides in two dispensaries in Foochow, and at the hospital in Liangau on Nantai. That same year Ella Johnson, a trained nurse, was sent out by the Philadelphia Branch. In the next few years others came to the Foochow medical work: Dr. Ella Lyon, a graduate of Chicago Woman's College, in 1891, who became ill and had to leave; Dr. Luella Masters, Syracuse University graduate, the following year; and, in 1895, Dr. Hu King-eng returned to her own people upon completing her medical training in the States. By that time the medical work encompassed the two hospitals and seven dispensaries; weekly clinics at three schools and the orphanage; out-visits and country trips; and two classes of medical students. The W. F. M. S. also intended to open medical work in Hinghwa by the appointment of Dr. Julia M. Donahue of the Cincinnati Branch, but conditions were unfavorable and the breakdown of the doctor's own health prevented the laying of any real groundwork.

On September 30, 1873, Bishop William L. Harris arrived in Foochow. His years of service as a Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society had given him an intimate acquaintance with the problems faced by China missionaries and his visit had been eagerly anticipated. Meetings for the consideration of questions involving missionary policies had been arranged in advance, to which all Foochow missionaries had been invited. Among the more important topics discussed were "Treaty Rights of Missionaries and Converts"; "Extent to Which Consular Aid Can Be Afforded toward Occupying Places in the Interior, and for the Protection of Native Converts"; "The Buying and Selling of Daughters as Wives"; "Betrothed Girls Living in the same Family with the Boys to whom they are Betrothed"; "Polygamy"; and "Foot Binding." "The custom of attaching a money consideration to the betrothal of wives, and of speaking of the betrothal as 'buying' a wife and 'selling' a daughter was strongly reprehended." Whether a converted polygamist should be required as a condition of church membership to give up all but one wife was a moot question in China. Some very able missionaries were opposed to the requirement on the ground that it involved injustice to the wives. The Methodist Mission had held that all wives but the first in a polygamous marriage must be put away before baptism of the husband and it was generally agreed that this rule should be continued. No defense of foot-binding was offered although it was agreed that enforcement of the rule against it involved difficulties. The custom, it was held, must be abolished altogether among Christians.

Following the conference on missionary policies the annual meeting was convened by Bishop Harris. Authority having been given by the Philadelphia and the East Maine Conferences the Bishop ordained two Chinese elders and five deacons. Eight preachers were admitted on trial and fourteen into full connection. With the unanimous approval of the mission Bishop Harris appointed four of the Chinese preachers as Presiding Elders. For three years they had already functioned as such although the missionaries had nominally held the appointments. Now the designation was changed to "Missionary in Charge." We have "the general guidance and direction of the work," wrote Baldwin, "while we seek to put upon the native brethren all the work and all the honor that they can bear . . ." ⁵³

The 1868 General Conference had authorized the Bishops to organize Conferences in China, "if in their judgment the interest of the work requires it." This authorization was not acted upon. At the 1876 General Conference the Committee on Missions recommended the organization of an Annual Conference in China "to be called the Foochow Conference" to include Fukien Province. The recommendation was adopted and on December 20, 1877, the Foochow Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church,* the first Methodist Annual Conference in China, was organized by Bishop I. W. Wiley, who twenty-six years before had gone to China as a medical missionary. In his volume China and Japan we have in Wiley's words an account of the proceedings:

After appropriate devotional services we transferred five missionaries and fifteen native preachers from the conferences in which they had held their membership in the United States, and declared the Foochow Annual Conference duly organized. Hu Sing Mi and N. J. Plumb were elected secretaries. Committees were appointed on Self-Support, Opium, Sunday-schools, and on the Observance of the Sabbath.

* The Chinese name of the Methodist Episcopal Church was Mi-I-Mi Huei.

There was an affecting scene when we began the examination of character. S. L. Baldwin, who had been superintendent of the mission, stood first on the list, and Hu Po Mi was called upon, as presiding Elder, to represent him. The venerable brother arose, and said: 'I can not do it, I can not do it,' and the tears began to roll down his cheeks, and he said again, 'I can not do it.' 'The like was never seen in China; these foreign teachers have come here to teach us of Jesus, and now we are in an annual conference, and I am called upon to represent the teacher. I can think of nothing like it but when the Savior insisted on washing the disciples feet.' The whole conference was much affected

On Friday morning we determined to admit on trial in the Conference an equal number from the ranks of the local preachers, as we had transferred of the native preachers from the home conferences, and consequently fifteen of the most promising young men were admitted on trial. . . .

. . . . Saturday morning was taken up by the election of native preachers to deacons['] and elders['] orders. . . . On Saturday evening a service of consecration was held, Mr. Ohlinger presiding and preaching, followed by an earnest and profitable prayer-meeting.

The Sabbath of the conference was a day of full work and blessed enjoyment. The love-feast commenced at half-past eight in the morning, in which a large number of the brethren gave excellent and interesting testimonies to the reality, the value, and the blessedness of the religion which they enjoyed. Some of them had endured serious trials and persecutions during the year for the cause they had espoused. . . .

At half past ten Hu Yong Mi, presiding Elder of the Kucheng [Kutien] District preached an excellent, expository sermon, encouraging and inspiring to the ministers After the sermon the deacons were ordained. This was an impressive ceremony, the entire service being read in the Chinese language, except the pronouncing of the words of ordination by the bishop, which was immediately repeated by Mr. Baldwin in Chinese. . . . At night, Sia Sek Ong preached a very practical sermon to the preachers and five elders were ordained.

On Monday morning we went through the usual routine of business of an annual conference, the various committees bringing in stirring reports on all the important subjects that had been submitted to them. In the afternoon quite a regular cabinet meeting was held, in which the native elders entered and took their place and post like old, experienced presiding elders. The entire work was divided into five districts, and a native elder appointed to each, with a foreign missionary assigned to each district as general counselor with the elder.

On Tuesday we held the final session of the conference. Among other reports a very satisfactory statistical statement was presented, showing two thousand six hundred and eighty as the number of members, probationers, and baptized children. . . .

After the general business of the Conference had been finished we had a Christmas sermon by Mr. Baldwin; . . . then the administration of the Sacrament of the Lord's supper Then we sang the parting hymn, and a most feeling prayer was offered by Hu Yong Mi, and we then called upon Sia Sek Ong to read out the appointments. And so closed the first session of the Foochow Annual Conference.⁵⁴

The District appointments were: Foochow District, Li Yu-mi, Presiding Elder; S. L. Baldwin, missionary; Hokchiang (Futsing) District, Hu Po-mi, P. E.; N. J. Plumb, missionary; Hinghwa District, Sia Sek-ong, P. E.; Nathan Sites, missionary; Yenping District, Yek Ing-kwang, P. E.;

F. Ohlinger, missionary; Kucheng (Kutien) District, Hu Yong-mi, P. E.; D. W. Chandler, missionary. In all, seventy-two Chinese preachers were appointed to the work. Of these sixty were Local Preachers, not members of the Conference but assigned as supplies to regular appointments. Churches and chapels numbered sixty; parsonages for Chinese preachers, fifteen.

Following adjournment of Conference the Bishop held a consultation with the missionaries and Presiding Elders on the distribution of missionary funds to the Chinese preachers. "The rate was fixed at three dollars a month for each of the preachers, a dollar and a half for his wife, and seventy-five cents for each child." It "really looks strange to an American," wrote the Bishop, to see such men as Hu Yong Mi, Hu Po Mi, and Sia Sek Ong, men who, in character and ability, if they had the same experience and acquaintance with American life as they have with that of China, would be qualified to fill the highest places in the Church in the United States, receiving as the compensation for their labor three dollars for themselves, one dollar and a half for their wives, and seventy-five cents for each child . . . Surely these men can not be suspected of secular or mercenary motives in engaging in this Christian service.⁵⁵

In the beginning of December, preceding the Conference session, Bishop Wiley in company with Baldwin and Chandler visited the mission at Kutien, ninety miles from Foochow—up the Min River sixty miles and thirty miles into the mountains. Sunday, December 16, was given over to a District meeting attended by preachers and lay members. In the morning before the preaching service, a Love Feast was held, in which some twenty persons testified of their Christian experience. Testimonies, as recorded by the Bishop, afford some insight into the inner spiritual life of Chinese converts:

Ling Oi Hing said: 'My peace is very great, very wonderful. I suddenly obtained peace. My grief is little; my peace is much. . . I constantly pray for the Kucheng Church, and feel thankful for the Savior's answers.'

Chiang Ki La said: 'My constant prayer is that Christ will take my life into his own hands, and do with me as he will.'

Ting Kieng Sing said: 'I have received very great grace from God. Within these few days I have received something very precious. What is it? God has assured me that I am his child, and that I am brother to these foreign and native Christians. I am very happy.'

Another said: 'I am praying God to help me. All that I am afraid of is that I will fall again into sin. I want you to pray for me, that I may be faithful to the end.'

San Kwang Hung said: 'I have used many measures to destroy the carnal mind within me, and have prayed earnestly, and have partly succeeded. . . .'

Yong Hung Sing said: 'My soul and body have been entirely at peace. . . . In these few days I have obtained great happiness. It seems as though I had come to the last days and begun to taste the joys of paradise.'

Another said: 'I am very happy in God's grace. What I meet in the world I am able to bear through Christ.'⁵⁶

The Bishop asked Lau Yong-ming, an enthusiastic Christian and an Exhorter in the Kutien church, to give him a sketch of his experience. It is as follows :

I am a native of Kucheng city. All my ancestors have lived here for many generations past. My family being poor my work, as a child, was to watch cows in the field. When I was grown up, I opened a tobacco store. Thirty-three years ago . . . I became a Buddhist vegetarian, zealously worshiping the gods, and refraining from eating meat. Seven years ago, . . . being avaricious, I began gambling, hoping to get great profits in it, but instead of realizing my hopes, I lost all my money, even including the capital which I had invested in my shop. I was in very great distress, having no rest because of my loss.

I continued thus until . . . when, thanks be to God's grace, his true word was first preached in Kucheng City. In the seventh month of that year a chapel was opened here, and I first heard the commandments of God. Hearing these commands and listening to the voice of prayer and singing, I was deeply moved and convinced of my sinfulness. Four months later I gave my name as a probationer in the Church. Thenceforward I listened to and obeyed the Word of God, receiving the unseen aid of his Holy Spirit. . . . thirteen years ago, I was baptized and received into the Church . . . and now, by the grace of God, I have come out of death, and have entered into life, and by the constant help of the Holy Spirit have been enabled to leave darkness behind me and enter into the life of God.

. . . . Trusting in Jesus, I desire always to offer from a sanctified heart ceaseless praises to God for the great grace vouchsafed to me. This is my heart's real longing. Amen.⁵⁷

The disciplined lives of many ministers and lay people gave testimonies as meaningful as spoken words. Franklin Ohlinger tells of overhearing his burden-bearer, who was a neighbor of the Kutien chapel, say :

These Christians are remarkable people. You could not get them to quarrel. Any thing that is a little bad you could not persuade them to do. Their Sunday they keep very strictly. Every Saturday evening I see them go to the shops to buy provisions for Sunday, and you could not induce them to buy a cash worth on this day. But most remarkable of all is that, as soon as they become Christians, they can all read.⁵⁸

Increasingly the Christian witness, expressed in such testimonies as these, together with the character and life of many of the Chinese converts, became one of the most influential means by which the Gospel was spread and the Church expanded. A case in point was the Wangteyong Circuit, situated in a wild mountainous region some thirty miles beyond Kutien. The story is told by S. L. Baldwin in his annual report for 1876 :

The Gospel was first carried to that region by a man who went from home to work at a town on the Min where we had a chapel. He heard the Gospel there, was converted, and returning home carried the glad tidings with him. Through his teaching his whole family, including his aged parents, his wife and children, and two or three brothers, and their wives and children, were brought to Christ. Having a married sister living in the village of Siong Te, this man's influence was, through her, extended to that place, and we now have a fine class of Christians there.⁵⁹

The testimony of changed lives could not be gainsaid. A Chinese pastor was sent to a new appointment in a village ten miles from Yuki. His first convert was a notorious gambler and prize fighter. His life was so completely changed that a profound impression was made on all his acquaintances, on no one more than "on his widowed mother, who had abandoned all hopes for his reformation, and was on the point of publicly disowning him."

In various lesser respects the lives of people were changed, none of which were without influence. "Here you can discover greater diligence in business, there a bit of cleanliness, one gives up tobacco, a woman unbinds her feet, and in many other ways, especially by the growing interest in education, is the blessed Gospel manifesting its leavening power."⁶⁰

By 1880, three years after its organization, the Foochow Conference had six Districts* and fifty-seven ministerial members, of whom fifty-two were Chinese. In number, appointments were far in excess of the Conference membership and twenty-eight additional men were employed as supplies. The sense of need for increasing the supply of preachers and for the better training of the ministry led to repeated consideration of enlarging the educational work of the Conference. Maclay, former Superintendent of the mission, urged the importance of a college. Tiong Ahok, a wealthy Chinese merchant, contributed $10,000. toward its establishment. On January 19, 1881, plans for the Anglo-Chinese College were launched, and Franklin Ohlinger† was named as president. Also in this year J. F. Goucher contributed $7,000. for a theological department. Within twelve months over forty college preparatory students were enrolled, of whom two-thirds were from Christian families. In addition to the college there were on the Foochow District two boys' and two girls' day schools, and a Bible-training school for women, which in 1883 became a school for women, girls, and children.⁶¹

During the later years of the Woolston administration of the Foochow Girls' Boarding School enrollment decreased and work lagged. In 1881 only twenty-five pupils were in attendance, of whom eight were foundlings. The

* The Districts were: Foochow, Hinghwa, Futsing, Ingchung, Kucheng, and Yenping.

† Franklin Ohlinger (1845-1919) was born near Fremont, Ohio, the youngest of seven children. During the Civil War he managed the farm while his father and his elder brothers served in the Union army. He attended German-Wallace College, Berea, briefly (1865-66), and a little later (1868) was admitted on trial in the Central German Conference and appointed to Pittsburgh. In 1870 he went as a missionary to Foochow, China, where he took an active part in both the evangelistic and educational work of the mission. While on furlough in 1876 he married Miss Bertha Schweinfurth. Returned to China, he with his wife's help prepared a system of musical notation to facilitate the teaching of congregational singing, and had a leading part in the founding and development of the Anglo-Chinese College. In the fall of 1887 he was appointed to the Korea Mission. In 1890 he founded the first printing plant in Korea, known as the Trilingual Press, with facilities for printing in Korean, Chinese, and English. He and his wife returned to the United States in 1893, and in 1895 he went to China as an independent missionary. Later he was received into the Hinghwa Conference where at Antau he founded the Rebecca McCabe Orphanage for the blind. In 1901 he transferred to the Foochow Conference and was made dean of the theological schools. During 1905-1908 he was engaged in translating and writing in Shanghai. In 1909 he entered the service of the Chinese government as teacher of languages in the newly founded provincial university. A break in his health compelled his return to America in 1911. Ohlinger was a voluminous translator and writer in the Chinese and Korean languages. He initiated two field publications and published articles, sermons, pamphlets, and books numbering into the hundreds.—Official Obituary, typed ms., Board of Missions Library; Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions.

Conference took the situation in hand, agreed that the curriculum was too narrow, and persuaded the W. F. M. S. to sanction the teaching of English. The Woolstons, whose purpose had been to keep the school Chinese, resigned in 1883 and returned to America. The Society then sent out Carrie I. Jewell* and Elizabeth M. Fisher, the latter destined to have a distinguished missionary career of more than fifty years in China. Immediate change was evidenced in the school. Enrollment increased within a year to forty-six, morale improved, and higher educational standards were introduced. New property was purchased on Nantai Island at a cost of $12,000. By 1893 enrollment had grown to 105, and the course of study was lengthened eight years beyond the two required in day schools.

Ruth Sites who, like her father, was not content to adhere to traditional patterns of missionary method was impressed with the need of educational facilities for bound-footed daughters of the literati, government officers, and mandarins, who were not eligible for admission to the Girls' Boarding School. Rather than yield the badge of their gentility these girls would forego the privilege of education. Miss Sites was determined that opportunity for Christian education should be made available to them. She appealed to Tiong Ahok's wife† for cooperation in establishing a seminary especially for them. It was opened in March, 1893, in the mission house and subsequently moved to the woman's building. While it did not have a large enrollment—ten pupils the second year—it was self-supporting and brought a strong Christian influence into homes that otherwise would not have had contact with the Gospel.⁶²

About this time the Hinghwa District and more particularly the city of Hinghwa came into increased prominence as missionary centers. In 1881 the District missionary-in-charge made this encouraging report of advance:

Several classes . . . [have] succeeded in greatly improving their Church property. We have five boys' day-schools on the district, all of which are in good condition. The W. F. M. S. has seven flourishing day-schools, mostly of long standing, on this district. A school for women was opened at Hinghwa City, with twelve students, in February, also under auspices of the W. F. M. S. The opportunities for work of this kind in the Hinghwa District have always been in marked contrast to the same kind of work in the Foochow District.⁶³

In 1889 the W. F. M. S. reported three women's schools in the District. The plan at that time was to make each of these a training school for

* Miss Carrie I. Jewell of the Cincinnati Branch and Elizabeth M. Fisher of the Baltimore Branch arrived in China on Nov. 17, 1884. Mabel C. Hartford of the New England Branch came in 1887 and for one year assisted Miss Jewell. Julia Bonafield, Cincinnati Branch, arrived in 1888 and from November, 1889, to March 18, 1891, was in charge of the school. Upon Miss Fisher's marriage to William N. Brewster, Ruth M. Sites of the Baltimore Branch was appointed. In 1895 Miss Bonafield returned to the school to work in association with Lydia A. Wilkinson of the Des Moines Branch who had arrived in Foochow on Feb. 1, 1893.

† Mrs. Tiong Ahok "was a woman of strong character, of fine personal appearance, . . . and . . . perfect in her observance of the elaborate code of Chinese etiquette." In her home she conducted a weekly prayer meeting. She accompanied Miss Bradshaw of the Church of England Mission to Ireland and England "speaking through an interpreter to most interested audiences in London, and pleading with power for the gift of the gospel to her people."—Mrs. S. L. Baldwin, in Heathen Woman's Friend, XXXIII (1891), 5 (November), 98-101.

deaconesses. In 1891 six schools for women were reported in the Conference as a whole under the general supervision of Mabel Hartford.* In the Hinghwa and Kutien Districts Miss Hartford had the efficient assistance of Mrs. Brewster and Mrs. Wilcox, missionaries' wives. The Juliet Turner Memorial School at Hinghwa City was in the charge of Mrs. Brewster. In 1895 twenty-five students, most of whom were young women, were enrolled. The school program was correlated with evangelistic work in villages and with that of Bible women in local churches under the leadership of Minnie E. Wilson.†

The Hamilton Girls' Boarding School, the second boarding school for girls in the Foochow Conference, was opened in Hinghwa in 1892. While an entrance examination was required, except for a few received in the primary department from places where there were no day schools, the end of the second year saw fifty pupils enrolled. At the close of the period an enrollment of eighty-five pupils was reported.⁶⁴

The location of Foochow at the largest paper-producing port in China made it a natural center for printing and publishing. The mission press was well equipped with hand presses and a variety of type, which, with experienced workmen and the efficient management of N. J. Plumb over a long period, made it possible to serve not only Methodist missions in other parts of China, but also those of other denominations. The Hinghwa dialect had never been put into character. That this might be done and the advancing Church of the Hinghwa region supplied with a literature that corresponded to the spoken language,⁶⁵ William N. Brewster was encouraged to transfer in 1890 from the Singapore Mission to the Foochow Conference.

In 1882 the largest missionary reinforcement thus far to be sent to China, thirteen in all, arrived on the field. Of these, two were sent to Foochow, John L. Taylor‡ and wife and the Rev. George B. Smyth, designated for educational work in the Anglo-Chinese College. Within the next three years, two more were received by transfer from Central China, Myron Wilcox and James H. Worley.⁶⁶

The baptism of Tiong Ahok, his wife, and other members of his family in 1882, and their reception into church membership in 1883, were occasions of special rejoicing in the Foochow Mission. In his 1882 report, Franklin Ohlinger declared the baptism to be "the chief event of the year's work" on the District. Ahok's conversion was not sudden. For years he had been a thoughtful observer of Christian missions, gradually showing more interest

* Other schools opened were at "Ingchung" (Yungchun), Kutien, "Sieng-iu" (Sienyu), Futsing (1893), and "Mingchang" (Mintsing) (1894). Wilma Rouse (1894, Minneapolis Branch) was sent to the Kutien school; Lydia A. Trimble, appointed 1889, by Des Moines Branch, opened the Futsing school; Ruth Sites opened the Mintsing school; Althea M. Todd reopened the Kutien school in 1896 following the 1895 riot.

† Minnie E. Wilson, Northwestern Branch, arrived in China on Feb. 1, 1893. She began her work in Foochow and later transferred to Hinghwa.

‡ Taylor's stay on the field was very short; before the following year had ended he had tendered his resignation.

and taking a more active part until in 1881 he had made his notable contribution to the founding of the Anglo-Chinese College, but still had refrained from uniting with the Church. His full identification with the Christian cause evidenced to the missionaries that Christianity was gaining adherents and advocates among all classes of the Chinese people. Nevertheless, hindrances continued to abound.

Progress during 1884 was seriously interfered with by the entrance of the French fleet into the mouth of the Min River, destruction of part of the arsenal at the Pagoda Anchorage, and threat of bombardment of Foochow. The mission was depleted by evacuation of the women to Shanghai and all missionary work was made more difficult by increased hostility toward foreigners.⁶⁷

In the course of his extensive trip of episcopal supervision in the Orient in 1884 Bishop Wiley arrived at Foochow in November, in a state of extreme physical weakness. As he was carried into the mission house built on the site of his former residence, he exclaimed, "Home, home!"

Thirty-three years ago I came here, and now I may as well remain and finish my work. It might be well for me to die here, who for some reason have been called 'the Missionary Bishop of China.'

Go "right on with your work," he said to the missionaries. At four o'clock in the afternoon of November 22 he died, with the words "God bless you, God bless you all forever—ever,—forever—evermore, Amen." The funeral services in Chinese and English were conducted in the Tiengang Tong on Sunday afternoon, November 23. His body was laid to rest beside that of the wife of his youth who had died thirty-one years before. His death made a profound impression on the Chinese Christian community of Foochow.⁶⁸

The policy of gradually giving the Chinese more responsibility in determining methods and program, begun in 1873 when native preachers were first appointed as Presiding Elders, increasingly demonstrated its value. Hu Po-mi, Presiding Elder of the Hinghwa District, in 1885 took it upon himself to initiate the plan of dividing the District into three large Circuits to each of which four men were appointed. In this way he felt that the preachers would gain a wider acquaintance with the membership of the Church and would be incited to greater activity. The plan had the additional advantage of bringing to the churches the ministry of more preachers.⁶⁹

In 1885 a Methodist chapel was built on Haitang Island, a desolate region of sand and rocks lying some distance off the Fukien shore, the first Christian church ever erected on the island. When Plumb, about ten years earlier, made his first visit to the island his was the first white face—so far as was known—ever to have been seen by the people. There were then on the island but two families of Christians, converted under the influence of Captain Ting, who had become a convert while on a journey to Formosa years before. Three years after (1888) the dedication of the chapel there were more than twenty families who had become Christians, most of them, directly or indirectly, through the captain's instrumentality. When the construction of a chapel was first proposed much antagonism arose, "for fear it would destroy the luck of the surrounding country" but opposition was finally overcome through the good offices of the United States consul and some of the native officials. By 1888 the chapel had become too small to accommodate the congregation and the people subscribed $250., one half the amount required to enlarge it. At the 1889 Annual Conference Haitang Island was set off from Futsing and formed into a separate District.⁷⁰

In conjunction with the Foochow Annual Conference in 1885, an event transpired which one Chinese gentleman described as more wonderful and strange than the electric telegraph. This was the inauguration of a Woman's Conference,* affiliated with the Annual Conference, which aimed to gather together all women workers for discussion of methods and deepening of Christian experience and for examination and instruction of those under training. While this body had no administrative function, it gave women a new standing in the Church.† By 1891 it had reached the state of a delegated body.⁷¹

The Foochow Annual Conference began 1887 with thirty-five hundred members and probationers. At the Conference session Bishop H. W. Warren—on an episcopal visit—ordained nineteen deacons and twenty-one elders—the largest number of ordinations, he stated, that he had ever witnessed at any Annual Conference. For the first time the Conference elected a Chinese as its ministerial delegate to General Conference, the venerable Sia Sek-ong, chosen on the first ballot by thirty out of forty-four votes. The lay delegate was also a Chinese, Tiong Ahok. At this Conference session, William H. Lacy, who was to have a distinguished career as a China missionary, was present for the first time, having just arrived at Foochow, with Mrs. Lacy, and his name was recorded on the Minutes as a transfer from the Wisconsin Conference. Timothy Donohue and his wife of the Dakota Conference further augmented the staff the following year, but decided to return home after but two years' labor.⁷² During the remaining years of the period (1888-95) the Board continued to send both men and women to the field.‡

* As early as 1873 the women had been invited to attend the annual meeting of the mission. Reporting on the first occasion Mrs. S. L. Baldwin wrote: "Over sixty native ministers were present, and some thirty native Christian women, mostly Bible women, here termed deaconesses, and wives of our helpers. There were also a large number of native members in attendance. The presence of the women added not a little to the interest of the occasion. We invited them to come as an experiment; and we feel that it has been a success. They put up together in a house near by; and, every day that there were not anniversary meetings, we had prayer or other services with them alone, we trust to our mutual profit. They came from different and distant parts of our work."—Heathen Woman's Friend, V (1874), 8 (February), 598-99.

† Cf. the organization, fourteen years earlier, of the Woman's Missionary Society (Woman's Conference) of the India Mission Annual Conference. See pp. 502 f.

‡ Others sent were: 1888, Dr. James J. Gregory, M.D. (layman), and wife; 1892, Robert McNabb and wife, Kansas Conference; Sarah Bosworth; 1893, Martha Chesterton Boyd; 1895, Edgerton H. Hart, M.D. (layman), and wife; Thomas B. Owen, Upper Iowa Conference.

In 1890 the Conference received additional valuable reinforcement in the appointment of Samuel L. Gracey* as United States consul at Foochow. In the following year in addition to his consular duties he accepted appointment as lecturer in the Theological School of the Anglo-Chinese College.⁷³

The increasingly urgent need for native preachers, prepared to preach in the vernacular of the region, demanded the establishment of a ministerial training school in Hinghwa. On February 16, 1892, the Hinghwa Theological School was opened in "an old native building, . . . the best . . . we could get." Eighteen young men, six more than could be accepted, applied for admission. At the close of the school year the missionary-in-charge reported:

The students have been faithful to their school duties and have shown themselves to be superior Christian workers. During the summer vacation of two months they were appointed to work in neglected neighborhoods or to assist the pastors of large circuits. . . . an aggregate of not less than 100 souls were added to the Church, through [their efforts]. . . .

A Boys' Boarding School also was established which enrolled twenty-nine pupils. The following year the Theological School, with enlarged facilities, enrolled twenty-seven students; the Boarding School, forty.⁷⁴

On the Kutien District at last, after many requests, a hospital was erected, Wiley Hospital, in 1893, bringing the total to three medical centers. G. S. Miner, who arrived in China in January, 1892, to teach in the Anglo-Chinese College, inaugurated a "special gift" day school enterprise. In 1894 he had under his supervision sixteen day schools. The next year he had almost a hundred schools "with nearly three thousand pupils."

About two hundred persons are assisting me in this work. Seventy-four schools are in and near Foochow City. Where three years ago we had eight places in which to hold preaching services, we now have eighty-two. Through the instrumentality of these schools, we believe many are being saved. At one place where we opened a school two and one-half years ago, we have 35 members and 37 probationers. At another place, where we opened nine months ago, we have baptized 24.⁷⁵

The half century closed in the Foochow Conference with a remarkable evangelistic† and popular education movement. "The gracious outpouring of the Holy Spirit, which began last winter," wrote J. H. Worley in 1894, has continued to the present,

* Samuel L. Gracey (1835-1911) was admitted on trial in the Philadelphia Conference in 1858. He enlisted in the Union army in 1863 and served as chaplain until the war's end when he returned to his Conference. From 1871 to 1890 he held pastorates in New England in the Providence and New England Conferences, during this period serving two terms in the Massachusetts Legislature. He was then appointed U. S. consul at Foochow by Benjamin Harrison, recalled by Grover Cleveland, and reappointed by William McKinley, continuing until the year preceding his death. His services to the missions of the several churches "were of untold value."—Gen'l Minutes, 1858, p. 23; ibid., 1871, p. 75; ibid., 1877, p. 6; Minutes, New England Conference, 1912, pp. 132 f.

† Contributing to the evangelistic program was the visitation carried on among the Chinese women by the W. F. M. S. missionaries. Others not already mentioned who gave their efforts to this work were Mary Peters, Northwestern Branch, and Mabel Allen, Des Moines Branch, sent in 1894, and Phoebe Wells, New York Branch, 1895.

removing barriers, breaking down opposition, opening the hearts of the people to receive the truth and welcome God's messengers, and giving unction to the preached word. Every circuit and station has been blessed with a revival, and fifteen new preaching places have been opened. A good many have already been received into the Church and during the last round of quarterly meetings, which has just begun, between one hundred and fifty and two hundred will be baptized.⁷⁶

CENTRAL CHINA MISSION

With the removal of restrictions on foreign residence through the four Treaties of Tientsin in 1858 and a fifth in 1861, and the granting of permission to practice Christianity with full government protection, the whole central and northern regions of the Chinese Empire were opened up to missionary effort. As we have already seen, strategy dictated that missionaries should be sent in at once, and the China Mission acted accordingly without waiting for either Board or episcopal sanction.*

By 1867 the Board was finally able to supply the central area with men so that a new mission could be officially established. Virgil C. Hart † and Elbert S. Todd were given the commission. Kiukiang in Kiangsi Province was selected for the center of operations, being well located on the Yangtze River, about eight hundred miles from Foochow and five hundred from Shanghai, and having a large population, some twenty thousand people. It was, besides, the gateway to Kiangsi Province and also to Hupeh Province eastward, and Anhwei Province westward.

On their arrival in Kiukiang, December 1, 1867, the missionaries "found three or four Christian Chinese." These Hart assembled in his room the following Sunday, and before the meeting adjourned they were formed into the first Methodist Class in Central China. Within a year and a half Todd resigned, leaving Hart, who had been designated as Superintendent, and his wife, alone at the new station. A church that had been built by the foreign community was offered to the new mission which Hart gratefully accepted and used for regular weekly services in English. He and Mrs. Hart opened a day school for boys which promised soon to become self-supporting; and finally employed a Chinese assistant, Sin Tru-tsai, who "stood up daily with great boldness to preach Christ" in the face of much opposition. The mission continued thus until 1870 when the Board strengthened it by sending out John Ing and wife of the St. Louis Conference and Henry H. Hall of the Michigan Conference.⁷⁷

With their arrival Hart saw reason for encouragement:

We opened a chapel on the main street within the city walls about six weeks ago. It is crowded every day, and sometimes twice a day, with eager listeners. A large body of soldiers are stationed here now, and frequently a score of them will be in the chapel at one sitting; they pay good attention. Occasionally an officer graces our services. . . . Brothers Hall and Ing have made excellent progress in the language, and are actively engaged in distributing books.⁷⁸

† A personal account of Mr. Hart will be given in Volume IV.

During 1871 Hart had to leave the mission temporarily to take his wife home for medical treatment but himself returned to China in November, 1872. During his absence "the seed sown" had taken root. Hall had opened a chapel in the thriving city of Wu Shih (Wusueh), thirty miles above Kiukiang, on the Yangtze, and a number of Chinese had become established in the truth—some of whom were of the litterati—who were "waiting anxiously for baptism and admission into the Church." He had also established a flourishing school. Ing had located himself in the city of Wuchen on the southern end of Poyang Lake. The General Committee was so well impressed with the opportunity which this appointment offered that they "felt authorized to appropriate a sufficient sum to put the work on a permanent foundation."⁷⁹

Conditions seemed to be steadily improving. The Northwestern Branch of the W. F. M. S., in answer to an appeal Hart had made for women workers back in 1869, had sent out Miss Gertrude Howe* of Lansing and Miss Lucy H. Hoag† of Milan, Michigan. They arrived in Kiukiang on November 13, 1872; and on January 1, 1873, opened the Kiukiang Girls' Boarding School "with two little girls, one of whom ran away before night."

Within a year the work of the women missionaries received high commendation from Superintendent Hart:

Some said the new force would be no addition to our general work, but rather a hindrance. I am happy in stating to our Society that no more valuable reinforcement has reached this Mission. Our congregations have greatly increased by the gathering in of females; several through their instrumentality have been gathered into the Church. Meetings for the women in proximity to our chapel have been held regularly by them.⁸⁰

In 1873 the Central China Mission again received reinforcement by the addition of Andrew Stritmatter from the East Maine Conference, and John R. Hykes and Albert J. Cook from the Central New York Conference. Hart's wife also returned to the field with restored health. Hall, however, had to withdraw at this time for a year to recover his health in America. At the close of the year Superintendent Hart felt justified in saying, with guarded optimism, that "the past year has been in some respects the most prosperous in the history

* Gertrude Howe (1846-1929) was for forty-five years a missionary in China. After eleven years in Kiukiang she resigned and went to Chungking where she remained until the riots of 1886 necessitated the closing of the mission. After a brief stay in Chinkiang, she reopened her school in Kiukiang, continuing in charge until 1899. In addition to teaching she did evangelistic work. She adopted and educated several Chinese girls of whom one was the illustrious Dr. Kahn. Miss Howe was instrumental in founding seventy day schools, four boarding schools, a high school, three Bible-training schools, a home for cripples, and two hospitals. She was officially retired in 1917, but continued her mission and work until her death.—M. S. Wheeler, First Decade of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society . . ., pp. 128 ff.; M. † Lucy H. Hoag (1844-1909), after seven years in China in evangelistic work for children and women, returned to the United States for medical training. In 1879 she entered the University of Michigan and in 1883 received the degree of M.D. Sponsored by the New York Branch she went to Chinkiang and founded the hospital of which she was in charge until her death.—"Minutes of the Reference Committee, W. of this Mission.”⁸¹ The greater portion of time and effort had been given to Kiukiang. Daily preaching had been maintained; there were two classes—one within the city walls and one in the foreign concession; two Thursday evening prayer meetings had been held for several months; and eight adults baptized and received into church membership. Full members numbered twenty-three; probationers, thirteen; “total connected with the Church including 3 children, 39.” The girls’ school was operating well, although the numbers were few because of the policy of accepting only those who would pledge to attend over a period of years.

At Wuchen John Ing—assisted by a Chinese convert—had developed a Circuit of four appointments, and in Wuchen itself a chapel had been opened, where effort was made to maintain preaching and sell Christian literature daily. Three adults had been baptized and received into the Church during the year, and two probationers enrolled. The total number of full members now came to four, probationers, three. Difficulty of securing pupils had prevented keeping up a day school. The Wuchen work, however, was discontinued after Ing left the mission in 1874 * since no one was available to take his place.⁸²

For Kiukiang the next few years were even better. The year 1874 saw a chapel built on the main thoroughfare near the center of the city where “semi-daily preaching . . . [was] maintained by missionaries and native helpers”; also a day school, with twenty pupils; and two dwelling houses under construction. The next year a second chapel was opened in the suburbs. Medical work was provided for by the sending of Dr. Letitia Mason† in 1874 and of Dr. and Mrs. William E. Tarbell in 1875. A dispensary was opened on July 6 of the latter year. Tarbell, however, resigned in 1876 and the work temporarily lapsed. In 1877, W. G. Benton arrived on the field as a replacement for Hall, who with his wife had left the field permanently. That year Stritmatter married Dr. Lucinda Coombs of the North China Mission who henceforth contributed her services to the medical work of Central China. Her ministrations were supplemented by those of A. J. Cook, who “in connection with his other labors . . . treated hundreds of the afflicted.”⁸³

By this time the general outlines of the program as it would develop could be seen. Some of the earliest preaching places which held no large promise were either placed on a Circuit or dropped. At Kunglung, a large trading center, about fourteen miles from Kiukiang, a chapel was opened in 1873 and put in the charge of a member of the Church and his wife who occupied their time in day preaching and selling books. It was the head of the Hwangmei

* Ing went to Japan to teach English at the Hirosaki-To-O College, and at the same time laid the groundwork for Methodism in Hirosaki.

† Letitia Mason, M.D., sailed from New York in October, 1874, and arrived in Kiukiang in November. In the following July she contracted a fever which threatened her life. In July, 1876, she arrived in the United States still seriously ill. However, she finally recovered and ultimately married. Later the hospital in Chinkiang was named for her.—Heathen Woman's Friend, VIII (1876), 4 (October), 83 f.

Circuit which was intended to cover the suburban area. Neither Kunglung nor the Circuit grew to greater size or importance, but on the other hand the foothold was never given up, and someone was appointed each year to look after the work. In 1876, entry was gained into Shuichang, and another Circuit was set up with this as its chief point; and Takutang was also opened and put on a third Circuit, Nankang.

The mission's first official visitation came in 1877 when Bishop Wiley was on an episcopal tour. On November 23, a Friday, he arrived in Kiukiang, and the annual meeting was opened the next afternoon, with a Chinese prayer meeting. Sunday morning the Bishop preached to the mission staff and foreign residents of the city, and in the afternoon one of the missionaries preached to a Chinese congregation, including some twenty pupils of the Girls' Boarding School.

The working force of the mission this year totaled seventeen: nine missionaries, five schoolteachers, two native helpers, and one Bible woman.

As to membership, the Bishop later reported:

We have thirty-five native members and thirty-two probationers, and eleven baptized children—total seventy-four. In the girls' school there are forty-four, and in the boys' school thirty-five children, and attending Sunday-school eighty. Our property consists of three good parsonages, valued at twelve thousand dollars; two without and one within the city walls, and all very pleasantly and healthfully located. Adjoining these houses, we have other lots for building purposes, valued at one thousand dollars, and four chapels valued at fifty-five hundred dollars. The Woman's Foreign Missionary Society has a pleasant parsonage within the city, worth thirty-six hundred dollars, and an excellent school building which cost about twenty-five hundred dollars.

Besides the work going on in the three chapels and schools at Kiukiang, the outside work is divided into three circuits or districts, extending up and down the river, and along the beautiful Po-yang lake. . . . The missionaries make frequent journeys by water to distant points on the rivers and lakes, preaching and selling books at first cost in the cities and towns. These visits, in former years, were fraught with danger, and our missionaries have often met with violence. They are now able to make these excursions without any fear of boisterous opposition or violence, the people wherever they go giving them a quiet and attentive hearing. . . . There have been twelve baptized during the year, to which should be added the four that we had the pleasure of baptizing.⁸⁴

The next three years showed both gains and losses. "A few souls . . . [were] gathered in, and a majority of the old members retained." The lines were stretched out a little year by year until by 1880 work was in progress 120 miles from Kiukiang. Benton withdrew after one year. A loss more keenly felt, however, was the forced retirement, by reason of ill health, of Andrew Stritmatter, who for seven years had rendered yeoman pioneer service, "for the last three years . . . in pain and great weariness of body." When no longer able to preach he labored zealously in translating, completing "the day before he left China his translation of the 'History of the Jews.'" Hart was also disturbed by the fact that mission day schools failed to increase in numbers and that many of the members of the churches did not "exhibit as much zeal and Christian life" as he longed to see. "They do not in all cases," he said, "cut themselves off from old heathen habits, as they ought."

By 1880 the Missionary Board was prepared again to send out recruits. Early in the summer the Rev. Thomas C. Carter* and family of the Central Tennessee Conference came, and he was placed in charge of all of the schools. Another valued recruit was Marcus L. Taft. Prior to their coming, Hart engaged Benjamin Bagnall, "a Wesleyan of long standing," who was already on the field.⁸⁵

At various times between 1872 and 1880 Hart had agitated for the opening of work in Chinkiang, Nanking, and Wuhu and had hoped that "ten or more missionaries would have been located by this time at these great centers." The three Circuits named above had become four by 1880, embracing "sufficient territory to make a large district in our future Conference." The fourth was Nanchang. Still, at the beginning of 1881, he declared that "the whole field [was] as destitute of laborers . . . as when we first formally asked to take up these cities." Baffled but determined not to be thwarted in plans for extending the lines of the mission Hart proceeded to map out five Circuits or Districts, including in addition to Kiukiang and Nanchang, the three large centers of his hopes.⁸⁶

Bagnall was appointed to establish permanent work in the Nanchang District. Since this territory included Wuchen, sixty miles distant, where Ing had laid a foundation some years earlier, he decided upon making the former mission his headquarters. To the chapel still standing he now added a second day school which soon had an enrollment of eighteen pupils. Some of the parents objected to the teaching of "foreign books," meaning the Scriptures, and withdrew their children, thereby reducing the attendance to about twelve. By the end of the year he was able to report five members and five probationers. Since Nanchang, capital of Kiangsi Province, was the most important city of his District Bagnall soon attempted to enter it, and by the middle of the year had succeeded in renting quarters in a suburb as a missionary center. Immediately the city officials raised a clamor, and the missionary's Chinese assistant was driven away. Unable to reach an agreement with the local authorities, Bagnall appealed for intervention to the United States consul at Hankow who in turn forwarded the appeal to Peking but no government action resulted. Meanwhile two converts were baptized.⁸⁷

M. L. Taft was appointed to Chinkiang "to occupy the place." The China Inland Mission owned buildings in the city but no use was being made of them, so Taft rented their unused chapel temporarily with the expectation of later erecting buildings suited for chapel and school. A student assistant aided him in chapel services and on Sunday preached in a room of Taft's residence. At Yangchow on the Grand Canal about twelve miles distant from Chinkiang, preaching services were begun in a new chapel, also rented from the China Inland Mission.⁸⁸

In Kiukiang a high school was opened, ambitiously named "Fowler University of China." It started "with fifteen young men from the best families in Kiukiang in the English department, and an equal number in the Chinese."⁸⁹

For the time being Hart had to be satisfied with this expansion, and leave unfilled the Nanking and Wuhu Districts. Toward autumn, he decided that a furlough was necessary; his health was breaking and he needed a rest. With his departure missionary operations were temporarily slowed down. Only one missionary, John R. Hykes, remained in Kiukiang and was obliged to assume responsibility for both the Kiukiang and Nanchang Districts. Bagnall was called upon to take part in an exploratory journey into Szechwan. Under these circumstances it became necessary for outside help to be temporarily employed. W. J. Hunnex was engaged to take charge of the mission schools and teach English in Fowler University and Dr. E. P. M'Farlane to continue at Yangchow the medical work which had been turned over to the Methodist mission by the China Inland Society.

During these later years the W. F. M. S. made generous contributions to the missionary personnel, though with continuing misfortune. Miss Delia Howe, sister of Gertrude Howe, was appointed by the Philadelphia Branch in 1879, and assigned to supervise the Bible women's work. At the end of 1881 it was apparent that her health was failing so rapidly that she must leave China or die. On reaching the United States (1882) she retired. Dr. Kate C. Bushnell (Chicago Women's Medical College, M.D.), sponsored by the Northwestern Branch, began medical work early in 1880 in Kiukiang. In October she reported that she had about ten patients daily.⁹⁰

I am just having a place fitted up down in the heart of the city near our chapel, and in this place I hope next week to open a dispensary. . . . I am sadly in need of a place in which to keep four or five patients, but I find it impossible to get such accommodations at present. I am expecting a woman this afternoon who is to bring her quilt and sleep on our veranda while she is recovering from an operation I am intending to perform. . . . I am obliged to call on Delia [Howe] to administer the anaesthetic in these cases and to assist me in all my operations.⁹¹

Dr. Bushnell's hopes for a dispensary were never realized. In April, 1881, she was reported to be seriously ill; soon afterward she came home, and in 1882 was retired. Before Dr. Bushnell left Kiukiang Dr. Ella Gilchrist, sent out by the Northwestern Branch "to replace or relieve" her, was on the field. In a little more than a year she was taken suddenly ill with consumption, and obliged to hasten home. On April 23, 1884, she died in Denver, Colorado.⁹²

During the six years 1881-86 twelve married missionaries* were added to the Central China Mission, a very substantial reinforcement. This did not, however, represent a net gain of twenty-four persons. In 1883 Mrs. M. C. Wilcox died and her husband transferred to the Foochow Conference. J. H. Worley also went to Foochow, and Taft transferred to North China. In 1882 Benjamin Bagnall resigned to engage in colporteur work for the American Bible Society. In 1885 Mrs. Joel A. Smith died, leaving children, and in August of that year Smith withdrew from the field. Nevertheless, the increase in the missionary working force made possible an expansion of the program. In 1883 Hart returned from furlough.⁹³

The foreign community of Kiukiang in 1882 had transferred to the mission for the use of the Chinese Methodist Society its beautiful English church, St. Paul's, and all its furnishings. The church, exclusive of the lot, had cost $13,500. The one condition of transfer called for minor repairs to be made on the buildings and English language services to be held on alternate Sundays. Another significant event was completion of the new building for Fowler University, with a dormitory nearby to house from eighty to ninety pupils. The girls' school started years earlier by the Misses Hoag and Howe and now occupying its own quarters within the city walls met a setback in 1883 in the resignation of Miss Howe on account of a difference of opinion with the missionaries of the parent Board "about taking the girls through the streets to chapel every day." With her departure another school was opened by the Board. Four years later Miss Howe returned at the urgent request of the mission and reopened her school. At the same time Miss Frances Wheeler, with whom she had worked earlier in West China, came back from a year's furlough at home and joined her in the schoolwork.

In Chinkiang the China Inland Mission hospital was removed, the chapel torn down, and other commodious buildings sold, which required the Methodist Mission—if its program was to be continued—to provide facilities of its own. Pending the possibility of building, activities were "greatly hampered for the want of a suitable chapel." In 1883 a building site was purchased in Chinkiang in a location well adapted for missionaries' homes and a street chapel opened which immediately attracted a sizable audience. A boys' day school was started which soon taxed the capacity of its building. A second day school for boys was started in the suburbs.

Mary C. Robinson, sent out by the W. F. M. S., arrived in February, 1884, and took over a small girls' school which had been organized some time earlier. As it was without suitable accommodations Miss Robinson took the pupils into her home. The work at Yangchow was suspended since the China

* These missionaries were: 1881-82, Carl F. Kupfer of the Central German Conference; Myron C. Wilcox, Rock River Conference; George W. Woodall, Newark Conference; James H. Worley and Thomas H. Worley, Nebraska Conference; 1883-84, Wilbur C. Longden, Wisconsin Conference; Joel A. Smith, North Nebraska Conference; John Walley from England; Robert C. Beebe, M.D., New York Conference; Edward S. Little, Southern California Conference; James Jackson from England; 1886, George Arthur Stuart, Des Moines Conference.

Inland Mission was unwilling to renew the lease on their property. Early in 1885, using the Yangchow appropriation, the mission purchased a location in Chinkiang near the premises formerly occupied, with a Chinese hong on it which was reconstructed into a chapel, a book room, and a lecture room for women's meetings and Class and prayer meetings. Medical work was begun in 1884 by Dr. Lucy H. Hoag on her return after a period of study in the United States. At first it was carried on in inconvenient rented buildings; and the only available place for a dispensary was a hall in her home. In 1886 a site of three acres was procured in a desirable location and the next year a new home which served as an all-purpose building was dedicated.⁹⁴

During Hart's absence on furlough, one of the remaining two new Districts which he had projected had been inaugurated. This was Wuhu, a city which seems to have been generally considered to offer special opportunity for missionary work. Bishop Moule of the English Church Mission is said to have regarded it as presenting "the most favorable center for missionary operations on the Yangtse River." J. R. Hykes, Acting Superintendent, reported the work undertaken in 1883, by James Jackson, with parsonages under construction, and a chapel opened with provision for daily preaching services. In 1884 two mission houses were completed and occupied, schoolwork successfully begun, and three persons received on probation.

A girls' boarding school in Wuhu organized in 1885 by the missionary wives was opened at the New Year, a commodious structure, favorably located. The plan of enrollment was to accept only unbetrothed girls who could be kept under Christian instruction and training for a period of years. Experience had shown that betrothed girls married within a short time, usually into heathen families, with the result that much of the missionaries' labor was thrown away. In his report (1885) Jackson explained:

We may not be able at once to get a large school on this plan, but it is our belief that a small school, yielding us good and certain results, is to be preferred to a large school, which adds nothing to the strength of our Church and does but little toward building up a Christian community.

The second year of the Wuhu mission Woodall was added to the staff. While engaged in language study he became so impressed with the value of medical practice as a means of making clear to the Chinese the spirit of Christianity that in connection with study of Chinese he also took up "a course of medical reading, with clinical study and practice" under the direction of two physicians at the Chinkiang dispensary and in the summer at the Kiukiang hospital. He then opened a dispensary at Wuhu in a room next to the chapel where he treated from ten to forty persons daily, preaching to them before dispensing medicines. Awaiting completion of the Nanking hospital Dr. Robert C. Beebe* removed to Wuhu in 1885 and took over Woodall's dispensary where he had all the patients he could attend to, "many coming from long distances, as far as twenty and thirty miles away." ⁹⁵

* Dr. Robert C. Beebe, M.D., had been admitted on trial in the New York Conference in 1884 and arrived in China that year.

The opportunity and need for medical service in Wuhu were such that Dr. G. A. Stuart was persuaded to turn aside from language study in Nanking and open semi-weekly clinics. In the spring of 1887 Hart made him responsible for developing the medical work but that was easier said than done. In desperation Stuart wrote on May 3 to Missionary Secretary Reid:

I am without medicines or anything to work with, and have no money to buy. I hope some good friend will give us a start here immediately.

Again, on August 20, he wrote that he was compelled to turn away all patients since his stock of medicines was sufficient only for the treatment of mission members.

However, the patients continued to come, at all hours of the day and every day . . . I could not study, or do any writing without having them coming to my door and imploring me for medicine, in many cases knocking their heads on the ground as attestation of their earnestness. Finally, on August 1st., twelve persons came at once, and I resolved that, as a matter of self defense, I would make arrangements to see patients regularly. So I gave these persons medicine, and hung out notice at the gate that I would see patients on Mondays and Fridays from nine to eleven o'clock A.M. To the present I have seen . . . [112] persons. . . .

Now I hope that the General Committee will see their way clear to give me the start I have asked for in my work at Wuhu.⁹⁶

In 1887 Stuart put in an estimate of $5,000., gold, for the building of a small hospital. The appropriation was made and about October 1, 1889, Stuart opened the hospital happy in the prospect of medical facilities that would gain the respect of the people. His ambition was to minister with equal skill to the bodies and the souls of his patients:

The plan for evangelistic work which I aim to pursue is the personal one. Private conversations with individuals I think to be the better way in this work.⁹⁷

The third District which Hart contemplated before leaving China in 1881—Nanking—was a major concern with him during his entire furlough. In an article written for the Missionary Advocate he said:

It is strange that so important a city should have been neglected by the great missionary bodies of China. Chinese officials employ several foreigners in Nanking to manufacture arms and ammunition, but missionary societies have erected no arsenal of truth to send pure doctrines to the homes and hearts of the people.⁹⁸

Shortly before leaving America he received word of a special contribution of $10,000. for establishing a medical mission in Nanking. This assured the founding of a hospital but he encountered difficulty in procuring a site. Every kind of hindrance was placed in his way. Officials broadcast notification that any person selling or renting land to foreigners would be punished but, using secret means, before the end of 1884 Hart had in his possession deeds to a very desirable location, and reported that he had hopes of commencing building early in 1885. By June a wall enclosed the large and attractive plot of ground. In May a day school had been opened and in June the Philander Smith Hospital had been begun. Robert C. Beebe, M.D., was assigned to the hospital. In May, 1886, the completed building was opened; and at the same time, in another section of the city, a second compound was occupied. A small building was within the year fitted up for school purposes on the new compound, and seventeen pupils enrolled. In addition to supervising the school W. C. Longden, missionary in charge, was busying himself in weekday and Sunday preaching. Two persons united with the church.⁹⁹

Acting under instructions of Bishop Fowler to re-establish the West China Mission,* Hart was absent from Central China from the early spring to the late fall of 1887. On December 17 he sailed from Shanghai for San Francisco with the hope that an extended period of rest would restore his health and permit his return to China. Since the usual furlough period of one year did not result in complete recuperation, nor in the recovery of health for his wife, after some months of indecision he regretfully relinquished† in July, 1889, the superintendency of the Central China Mission.¹⁰⁰

This period of approximately two years' absence of the Superintendent from the mission was characterized by friction, serious decline of morale, and hindrance to the progress of the mission program. Correspondence in the files of the Missionary Society, although incomplete, clearly indicates some of the principal causes of the unfortunate situation. One of the chief factors was division of administrative responsibility among too many people: the Missionary Secretaries; the Bishop in charge of the field; Superintendent Hart, who while on furlough in America continued to make administrative decisions; and Acting Superintendent John R. Hykes whose unhappy lot it was, as Treasurer, to be called upon in the absence of the Superintendent to make important decisions without the recognition which accompanies formal investiture of authority. Also when he became Treasurer he discovered that the financial affairs of the mission had been conducted "in a very loose way" for years.

Balances of Appropriations were freely transferred from one item to another,

* See p. 425.

† No record exists of a formal resignation on Hart's part. On June 4, 1889, he wrote the missionary office that he would not request reappointment and would not "further burden the Missionary Society." (Correspondence Files, Division of World Missions.) This letter was regarded as tantamount to resignation, and on July 16, 1889, the Board adopted a recommendation of its China Committee that the Bishop "appoint a successor to V. C. Hart in the Superintendency of the Central China Mission." (Minutes, B. M., XII, 312.) On Feb. 17, 1891, he was invited by the Committee of Consultation and Finance, Methodist Church of Canada, "to open work in Chengtu, . . . Szechwan. . . he accepted the invitation, subject to the approval of the Missionary authorities of the Methodist Episcopal Church. . . . This approval was given with the expectation that within a short time he would return to his old field on the lower Yangtse, but though he was twice importuned by the missionaries in Central China to come back and lead them, the work in West China was too important and too critical to admit of his return."—E. I. Hart, Virgil C. Hart: Missionary Statesman. Founder of the American and Canadian Missions in Central and West China, pp. 221 f.; Virgil C. Hart, letter to C. C. McCabe, Feb. 18, 1891, in files of Division of World Missions, Board of Missions of The Methodist Church.

whether of the same kind or of an entirely different sort, and it was the rule to exceed the Appropriations every year. It was a recognized custom to spend money for any purpose, . . . whether it was appropriated for that object or not, and sometimes even when there was no appropriation at all for the purpose. . . . In short, the business of the Mission was conducted like a town-meeting.

Hykes listed eight specific changes which he had made, designed to bring order out of confusion.¹⁰¹

The introduction of the changes and possibly to some extent the manner in which they were made brought him into collision with other members of the mission, some of whom wrote letters of complaint to Hart and to Missionary Secretary McCabe. Hykes had acted in consultation with Secretary Reid, and when other missionaries' complaints were reported to him vigorously defended his procedure to Reid. When McCabe rebuked Hykes for having sought to injure his brethren, Hykes replied that he had "attacked principles and errors" not persons. Meanwhile Hart had written to the Missionary Secretaries, and to members of the mission agreeing with certain of their complaints and making decisions on matters of policy and on actions, although earlier Hykes in a letter to Reid had challenged his authority, asking "if a Superintendent of a Mission at home on leave of absence still retains control and supervision of the Mission." Reid's reply to this letter has not been found in the records.¹⁰²

This confused situation was further complicated by an arbitrary action by Bishop Fowler concerning location of the Wuhu hospital for which the Missionary Society had made an appropriation in 1888. Plans were in the hands of Dr. Stuart and a plot of ground was purchased outside the city on a hill arising abruptly from the Yangtze, adjacent to three missionary residences. The transaction had been completed when Bishop Fowler appeared on the scene. On a trip up the river, when the location was pointed out to him, the Bishop "ordered Dr. Stuart to purchase land" within the city or its suburbs. This hasty episcopal decision satisfied no one. Both Stuart and Beebe protested to the Society and Hart wrote to McCabe that if Fowler "had gone into the city . . . and seen with his own eyes he would have decided differently." For a time it seemed likely that Stuart would be lost to the mission but the Board finally brought about an adjustment and the hospital was placed in the location originally proposed. There were various other complications which accentuated the unfortunate situation.¹⁰³

The final years of this period (1887-95) saw the Central China staff strengthened by the addition of nine married men and four single women, of whom three were deaconesses, sent out by the Missionary Society, and seven women sent by the W. F. M. S.*

* This latest group of Central China missionaries with year of arrival: Board missionaries, 1887, John C. Ferguson, of the New England Southern Conference; James J. Banbury, North Nebraska Conference and Don W. Nichols, Missouri Conference; 1889, A. C. Wright, St. Louis Conference, Dr. Ernest Jellison, a layman; 1890, Leslie Stevens, West Nebraska Conference, Eva McBurnie

In 1890, as successor to Hart in the superintendency, Bishop Fowler appointed the Rev. Leslie Stevens, Presiding Elder of the Kearney District, West Nebraska Conference. Stevens was a young, vigorous man of unusual gifts of leadership and soon won the esteem and affection of the missionary group but before he had had time fully to acquaint himself with the problems of the field and to master the language, he was suddenly snatched away by death (July 26, 1894). He was succeeded as Superintendent by John C. Ferguson who had come to China from the New England Southern Conference in 1887 and had already proven to be an able and progressive administrator.¹⁰⁴

In the Kiukiang District 1889 was marked, in the words of J. R. Hykes, now the Presiding Elder, by "steady, systematic, and energetic advance." New work was opened at ten stations, two chapels were built at country stations, and the church in the city of Kiukiang extensively remodeled. Seventeen young men were given Exhorter's licenses and were receiving special instruction in theology and homiletics. Kiukiang (Fowler) Institute under the efficient leadership and supervision of James Jackson "exerted a powerful influence for good throughout all the District."¹⁰⁵ In 1892 "a gracious old-fashioned revival" occurred with over thirty conversions. This year E. S. Little was appointed pastor of the newly organized Shuichang Circuit, which included "the old Shui-chang and Wu-chen Circuits and all the country work of the old Kiukiang Circuit." Little had under his care on the Circuit, now the largest in the Conference, ten schools, eight chapels, and a dispensary. At Hankialin to which the missionary and his wife gave major attention, ten adults were baptized during the year. It was their practice to spend two hours a day in conversation about Christ with the scores of people who came to their guest room. At first Little hoped that within a few years he might be able to report a thousand members but two years later he had quite given up this vision.

The results, as far as the human eye knows, are meager, and I often feel discouraged that the result . . . should be apparently so little. . . . The character of our members so far is apparently a very poor one, and their worship of God not the joy and blessing to them it might be. . . . These and other results, or lack of results, have been and are to me a very heavy burden.

On the Hwangmei Circuit, Kiukiang District, a promising work was under way in 1887. "Forty-eight confessed faith . . . and were baptized and received into church fellowship," with a number remaining on probation. The majority were heads of families. This was followed the next year by construction of a building containing a chapel, schoolroom, and two small rooms for the use of the missionary. Gertrude Howe and Frances Wheeler assisted in the evangelistic and educational work of the Circuit. James J. Banbury's first year of missionary work was on this Circuit. When he took charge there were one hundred members and ninety-two probationers on the register. He cut off forty of the members and eighty of the probationers but during the year received twenty-three persons into fellowship. He also opened new work in three market towns, where he rented chapels and established day schools, and in two other towns began preaching.

(who remained only nine months on the field); 1891, Laura Hanzlik, Clara Collier; 1893, Mary Gouchenor, Ralph Irish, Wisconsin Conference; 1895, Edgerton H. Hart, layman; Jesse F. Newman, Wisconsin Conference. W. F. M. S. missionaries were: 1887, Ella C. Shaw, Northwestern Branch; 1888, Emma E. Mitchell, New York Branch; Sarah Peters, Northwestern Branch; 1891, Kate L. Ogburn, Des Moines Branch, Laura M. White, Philadelphia Branch; 1892, Alice M. Stanton, New York Branch; 1893, Mrs. Anna L. Davis, Northwestern Branch. Dr. Mary Carleton, who arrived in 1887, had also been intended for the Central China Mission, scheduled to open women's medical work in Nanking, but because of a shortage in Foochow the Bishop transferred her.

Little, in 1891, now pastor of St. Paul's Church in Kiukiang City, reported "uniformly large and attentive congregations" but was pained to state that no increase in membership was registered. The Heokai Street Chapel, situated on the main street of the city, included in addition to the chapel itself, a dispensary, and a day school. The attendance of non-Christian people at this center was not encouraged, the purpose being rather to build up the faith of church members. The second chapel, Hwashantang, confined its activity "to preaching to the heathen." Here also a day school of some seventy pupils was maintained.¹⁰⁶

The importance of women's work in connection with evangelism and with the schools came to be more and more generally recognized as the years passed and Kiukiang, as well as the other centers, pleaded for more women missionaries to be sent out by the Board and the W.F.M.S. As additional women arrived they were assigned principally to medical, educational, and evangelistic work among Chinese women and children. In Kiukiang classes of women were formed, meeting both on Sunday and weekdays. In 1890 Gertrude Howe began a course of introductory medical study, for boys and girls; and in 1894 a woman's training school was organized. As a means of reaching women Clara Collier undertook systematic visitation. In 1893 she wrote:

It is a sad fact that while our Board is constantly providing evangelists to go out and gather in the men yet in all this Kiukiang District there is only one woman evangelist to carry the Gospel to the thousands of women.¹⁰⁷

In Chinkiang frequent changes in leadership personnel occurred, as in other missions. Between 1888 and 1893 three different missionaries, W. C. Longden, A. C. Wright, and C. F. Kupfer, were successively in charge. Despite changes progress was recorded. In 1889 "a large and beautiful chapel" was in process of building, dedicated in March, 1890, and the erection of a schoolhouse begun. For some ten years day schools had been maintained in different parts of Chinkiang but no school of secondary level existed in which their graduates might continue their education. The women of the W. F. M. S. prodded the mission, declaring that without a school in the vicinity for higher education of boys "much of their work in educating the girls . . . [was] eventually lost." In 1891 Kupfer arranged for the inclusion of provision in the 1892 estimates for a boys' secondary school. The next year a plot of land adjoining the mission compound was purchased and a building large enough to provide school facilities for one hundred pupils erected. The Chinkiang Institute opened in March, 1894. Kupfer's purpose was to make the training of Christian mechanics a chief objective of the school.¹⁰⁸

As Presiding Elder of the Chinkiang District Kupfer declared that the women of the W. F. M. S. had more to show for seven years' work than the men for a decade. By 1892 Dr. Hoag had both a hospital and a dispensary and, besides their boarding school, women were teaching in two day schools. Sarah Peters carried on evangelistic work in dispensaries and in the hospital through home visitation and classes in her home.

In 1893 A. C. Wright found it possible to re-establish the work in Yangchow, suspended in 1884. A missionary residence was built and a building was rented which served as a street chapel. Soon a class of eight probationers was formed. Three day schools were begun. Riots in the spring of 1894 caused two to be suspended but in the following year one of these was reopened. C. F. Kupfer pronounced the two schools of this year the best that he had seen in the Central China Mission.¹⁰⁹

On the Wuhu District in 1887 Jackson felt that the mission was gradually gathering strength although he sorely regretted that membership growth was not more rapid. It "seems hard to expend a year's labor for so little apparent result." In 1888, with John Walley in charge, a new chapel was opened on the Circuit. In the city, despite strong opposition of the literati, a place was rented for schoolwork. The next year a Boys' Boarding School was opened which soon enrolled fifteen students. In 1890 "four chapels, five day-schools, and one boys' boarding school" were in operation but for lack of workers it became necessary to close two of the chapels and three of the day schools, and to move the boys' school to Nanking. In part the shortage was caused by the necessity of disposing of some native workers "on account of inefficiency and unworthiness." "We have not surrendered the field," wrote Stuart, "but are trying to hold it at the most important strategic points." In the meantime the medical work continued to increase in number of patients and in area served. In the interest of preparing local leaders a training school was opened in 1893 at the central station of the District where it was proposed to gather some of "the more promising believers from the rural places . . . [for] four to six weeks training annually." By 1895 the Wuhu mission had a self-supporting school for children of the members of the Church and of the community and a hospital for whose operation all funds were raised in Wuhu.¹¹⁰

Following the difficulties of 1881 Nanchang was closed to missionary penetration, except for visiting. In 1885 it was put in the care of a Chinese preacher and two adults were reported baptized. When in 1889 this worker died, Nanchang was left unsupplied for the remainder of the period, its fifteen members pastorless. Wuchen, however, where from the beginning the mission had tried to get a foothold, appears in 1892 as an appointment on the newly organized Shuichang Circuit. That year its chapel was destroyed by fire and work was delayed once again, while efforts were made in the following years to raise funds for its replacement.¹¹¹

In Nanking in 1889 "without a site, without buildings, without teachers or scholars, without apparatus or library," the operation of a school which in the future was to become Nanking University was begun by the opening of a small day school. Special attention was also given to religious activities in connection with the hospital, as many as thirteen regular services held weekly, seven "exclusively for the in-patients, three exclusively for the out-patients, and three regular church services," besides personal ministry maintained for patients in the wards. In 1890 land was purchased and a building erected for a Bible School to be affiliated with the university, and in 1893 pupils were registered in the first year of the university's college course.

The work in Nanking by 1888 had been established in three centers: the hospital with the evangelistic program associated with it; the university, and street preaching in the North Nanking vicinity, for the most part unsuccessful, and evangelistic work in the center of the city (South Nanking). There was also a country Circuit of several preaching places. The most encouraging event of the year was the opening of the work of the W. F. M. S. The Adeline Smith Home was completed, and a Girls' Boarding School started. Successful work was initiated both in the school and among women, and increased interest developed in the prayer meetings and the Sunday school. The missionaries reported that progress in the work in general was disappointingly slow but by 1895 six Quarterly Conferences had been organized, eleven preaching points established with resident preachers, and many additional cities and towns supplied with occasional services. In some of these, small bands of believers and inquirers met regularly in homes of members of the Church. In 1895, probably for the first time in China, tents were used in an out-of-doors evangelistic program. Longden believed the plan to be particularly well-suited for use in China.

All classes will come . . . [to the meetings], and raising a tent on the common naturally creates a ripple of excitement which helps to secure an audience. As many as four hundred have gathered in our tent at one time, and remained orderly and quiet during a service lasting more than an hour and a half.¹¹²

NORTH CHINA MISSION

As in Central China, so also in Peking,* decision to open work was made

* When the Methodist Mission was begun in North China other principal missionary societies of the Christian world were well established there. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society (Protestant Episcopal), the London Missionary Society, and the Church Missionary Society (Church of England) all had strong missions. I. W. Wiley: "Many of the missionaries are old, experienced men, having come from other parts of the work—some of whom, in scholarship and ability, will take rank with the ablest ministers of the world."—China and Japan . . . , p. 70.

by the Foochow Mission preceding authorization by the Board or the Bishops. "It was on the 30th of June, 1868, that the Foochow mission, after full and prayerful consideration, resolved upon a mission to Peking, not doubting it would have the approval of the Board."¹¹³

On January 30, 1869, Lucius N. Wheeler—with his family—sailed from Foochow on their long journey to the capital. Reaching Tientsin in early March they then had to proceed by mule cart for some days before reaching Peking on the twelfth. On April 10 they were joined by Hiram H. Lowry and his wife.*

The field open to the mission comprised all of northeast China. It contained a population of some two hundred million people, most of whom understood the Mandarin, or court, dialect. Peking alone with its population of more than a million people presented a challenging missionary opportunity, so challenging, in fact, that almost before Wheeler and Lowry had had time to establish themselves in the city the Board added to the mission staff two more missionaries, George R. Davis and Leander W. Pilcher of the Detroit Conference. They arrived in Peking on October 22, 1870.¹¹⁴

That year Superintendent Wheeler reported that he had succeeded in purchasing an eligible site for a mission compound "in the Northern, or Tartar City," † two comfortable dwelling houses had been erected, and other necessary improvements made. A small chapel had also been procured and, in spite of unfavorable conditions, religious services had been regularly maintained in it for several months. In the southern city, which contained about one-third of the population of Peking, including the active business element with large stores, markets, theaters, and clubhouses, Lowry had been successful in organizing a "City Circuit" which embraced a considerable part of the city and an outside area as well. Much difficulty and delay, however, were encountered in procuring chapels here. Owners of property were restrained from selling by fear of the wrath of officials and the missionaries were hindered by deception of agents involved in property transfers. Finally, in 1871, a preaching place was purchased on one of the principal streets and after months of trouble with officials occupancy was granted.

In public preaching Wheeler was assisted by a well-educated Chinese preacher who was lent to the mission by the New Connexion Methodist

* Hiram H. Lowry (1843-1924) was born in Zanesville, Ohio, and died in Peking. He graduated from Ohio Wesleyan University in 1867 and in the same year sailed for China, "the first Methodist missionary to cross the Pacific in a steamship." For twenty years, 1873-93, he was Superintendent of the North China Mission. In 1894 he was made president of Peking University and continued as such until the organization of a union university of which he became president emeritus. In 1896, 1900, and 1908 he was a member of General Conference. At eighty years of age he conducted at Foochow the Communion service at the seventy-fifth anniversary of China Methodism. "His intimate knowledge of the Chinese people, his standing and influence in government circles, and his wide acquaintance in China with nationals and foreigners gradually won for him a unique place as an 'elder statesman' whose judgment was sought by leaders in church and state."—Christian Advocate, IC (1924), 4 (Jan. 24), 92.

† Peking at this time consisted of two parts, the northern (or inner) city (the Tartar or Manchu city) about fifteen miles square, containing the palace, government buildings, and barracks; and the southern (or outer) city, occupied by Chinese.—S. Wells Williams, The Middle Kingdom . . . The Chinese Empire and Its Inhabitants, I, 63.

Mission of Tientsin. The first convert—a man fifty-nine years old, able to read and write—was received on probation. Wheeler and Lowry jointly prepared a hymnal in Mandarin and Wheeler on his own completed a translation of Nast's Smaller Catechism.

In October, 1871, Pilcher made his first report to the Board. Hwailon Circuit, about five hundred miles in length through thickly populated country, had been laid out but its boundaries not clearly defined. He had been chiefly occupied in language study but had also toured principal cities and villages distributing Scripture portions. Davis likewise had busied himself studying but also had made a few country trips in the area of the West Chihli Circuit, the second of the two immense Circuits mapped out to embrace the mission area. In the northern city the next year a small day school was organized which seven years later became the Peking Boys' Boarding School and in 1886 the Wiley Institute, an institution of college level. Also, in 1872, G. R. Davis commenced work in Tientsin, eighty miles southeast of Peking.¹¹⁵

This same year (1872) was made notable by the opening of its China work by the W. F. M. S. Their first two North China missionaries, Maria Kane Brown,* sent out by the New England Branch, and Mary Q. Porter,† sent by the Western Branch, arrived in Peking on April 6, 1872. During the preceding winter interim, while navigation to the north was closed, they had had an opportunity to see something of the work in Foochow and to learn that the attitude of some of the male missionaries toward the coming to China of unmarried women was not that of unqualified approbation. Three veterans, wrote Miss Brown, declared that the mission board had "made a grave mistake in appointing us to Peking as there was absolutely no work that a young woman could do there." They were soon to furnish proof to the contrary. Within six months they had together launched a school for girls which later was named for one of them, the Mary Porter Gamewell School. The nucleus of the school had previously been formed by Mrs. Wheeler and Mrs. Lowry but to the new missionaries belongs the credit for giving it organizational status and starting it on its long course of educational development. To take Miss Brown's place in the school after her marriage in 1874, Miss Letitia A. Campbell‡ of Cambridge, Massachusetts, went out in 1875 under the New England Branch, W. F. M. S. At her death in 1878 she was succeeded by † Mary Q. Porter (1848-1906) was born in Allegheny City, Pa., and moved with her parents to Davenport, Iowa, in 1860. She graduated from the Davenport High School and later became a teacher. In China she was superintendent of the school for girls in Peking until 1882. In 1881 she opened in Tientsin the first Bible-training school for women in North China. In 1882 she was married to Frank D. Gamewell and with him went to West China.—M. Isham, op. cit., pp. 175 ff.; F. J. Baker, op. cit., pp. 274 ff.; W. F. M. S., Year Book, 1939, p. 177.

Clara M. Cushman,* who had a long and eventful career as teacher, administrator, and leader in Chinese Christian education.¹¹⁶

On September 1, 1872, the first regular annual meeting of the North China Mission closed.

The sacrament of the Lord's Supper was, on this occasion, administered for the first time among us in Chinese; six native Christians, and more than that number of foreigners, were participants, kneeling together around our common altar.

An important result of the meeting was the division of the field in Chihli (Hopeh) Province into eight Circuits or Districts for which, Wheeler felt, as many missionaries would be needed within the next year or two. Wheeler was not in good health when he left Foochow, and in 1873 with his family he returned to the United States. Lowry succeeded him as Superintendent, continuing in that position until 1893 when the mission was made an Annual Conference.¹¹⁷

Lowry considered 1874 to be the most successful year since the mission was founded. Three new missionaries, Wilbur Fisk Walker, with his wife, and James H. Pyke and wife, both of the North Indiana Conference; and Sylvanus D. Harris of the Newark Conference had arrived on the field. Medical work was beginning and church membership had more than doubled within the year. The year before, land had been purchased in Tientsin for a missionary compound and two Circuits begun, yet Lowry was dispirited.

But how can we avoid a feeling of depression when we contrast what we have done or may do with the vast amount undone. Our Church record contains twenty-three names out of the countless millions who indifferently go on . . .¹¹⁸

Of three persons received into the Church on probation in 1874 two were "literary graduates." One of the three, Wang Jui-wu, had come from Shantung to Peking for the purpose of attending the examinations for a Master's degree. He chanced one day to pass a street chapel, was attracted by the speaker, and stopped to listen. When the missionary had finished his sermon Wang followed him into the street, asked many questions concerning the new doctrine, and expressed interest in knowing more about the teaching. Later he visited the missionary compound and became a diligent student of the Scriptures. His faith appeared so intelligent and sincere that before he returned to his home he was baptized and admitted into the Church.

After a lapse of a few months he sent his son [Wang Cheng-pei] to us with a letter giving an account of himself and his work. Through his instrumentality eighteen had been led to renounce idolatry and to desire to know Jesus. . . . [After a few days he returned] laden with Christian books.¹¹⁹

* Clara M. Cushman (1851-1928) of Walden, Vt., was appointed to the Peking girls' school in 1878 and in 1883 became its principal. Through her initiative music study, "quiet study" hours, and a literary society, were introduced into the school's program. Within a few years "Jesus songs" were being heard on the crowded streets of Peking and in many heathen villages. During an interim of nineteen years in America, she originated the Standard Bearers, a children's missionary society. On her return to China in 1909 she became principal of Keen School, a department of the Anglo-Chinese College in Tientsin, where she remained until retirement in 1924.—M. Isham, op. cit., pp. 176, 179, 207; W. F. M. S. Year Book, 1939, p. 166; Mrs. Marcus L. Taft, in Forty-ninth Ann. Rep., W. F. M. S. (1918), p. 100.

Father Wang carried on the work of preaching and colportage with such abandon that in less than two years he had burned out his life, dying on May 5, 1875, his wife and son promising him that they would carry on his unfinished task. They visited Peking for further instruction. On the return trip of four hundred miles the son wheeled his mother in a wheelbarrow the entire distance in twenty-five days. Wang Cheng-peï* became an ordained minister and a faithful preacher of the Gospel.¹²⁰

While attending the 1877 annual meeting Bishop Wiley made an exact inventory of the physical properties of the mission:

In . . . [the Tartar part of Peking] is our 'mission compound,' consisting of two pieces of property, on the oldest of which is built, first, two moderately fair, one-story brick residences Secondly, the girls' boarding-school, and the residence, belonging to the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society Thirdly, our domestic chapel, a very pleasant, good-sized building, used for the more private and orderly services of the Church members. . . . On the second piece of property, unfortunately separated from the first by two or three intervening Chinese properties, we have, first, a very comfortable and well built brick residence Secondly, a neat and pleasant home and comfortable hospital and dispensary This last property belongs to the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society.

Tientsin impressed the Bishop as "a very important" point. The compound here, about 300 by 200 feet in size, had one good home on it, with another house needed. The reinforcement of Tientsin the Bishop believed to be the most pressing need in North China. The rural work he also considered to be "very promising," some of the Circuits reaching out as far as four hundred miles from Peking, north to the Great Wall and south into Shantung Province.¹²¹

There was no more outstanding feature of the China Christian missionary program during the early decades than that of the W. F. M. S. in its medical work for women. Lucinda L. Coombs, the first woman medical missionary to China of any denomination, arrived in Peking in 1873 and in 1875 opened China's first hospital for women and children. Following her marriage two years later to Andrew Stritmatter she was succeeded by Leonora Howard, M.D., a graduate of the University of Michigan, who took charge of the hospital. Dr. Howard soon became widely known as an unusually skilled physician and in March, 1879, was called to Tientsin to attend Lady Li

* Wang Cheng-peï was killed in 1900 in the Boxer Uprising as he led the Chinese Christian forces in the defense of the legation quarter of Peking. The Wang Christian dynasty were virtually the founders of Shantung Methodism. Wang Cheng-peï left two sons who graduated from American colleges, one later becoming the head of the department of education in Shantung Christian University and the other a successful pastor in the Shantung Conference. A son of the latter in turn entered Christian service.—Perry O. Hanson, "The Methodist Mission in Shantung, 1873-1933," China Christian Advocate, XX (1933), 4 (April), 14; R. T. Baker, op. cit., p. 80.

Hung-chang, wife of Viceroy Li. Dr. Howard and Lady Li soon became intimate personal friends. Of the result Superintendent Lowry wrote:

The importance of the present opening at Tientsin can scarcely be overestimated. Dr. Howard's attendance on the Viceroy's wife has made an opening such as has never occurred before in China, and if lost, may never occur again. The homes of many of the best and most influential families of the city are open to the visits [of Dr. Howard]

Within a short time the doctor was treating "from thirty to fifty patients a day, besides performing surgical operations. Women [came] . . . from far and near for treatment."¹²² In 1881 the Isabella Fisher Hospital was opened in Tientsin and managed by Dr. Howard for three years.* In the meantime the medical work in Peking was left to be supplied.

In his 1879 report to the Missionary Society Superintendent Lowry reviewed the progress of the first decade in North China. Beginning with two families, the mission now has, he said, five mission families, and three ladies of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society; two ordained deacons, six local preachers, seven students in the Training-school, six pupils in the boys['] and thirty in the girls' boarding schools; three Sunday-schools; two stations for street preaching in Peking, and one in Tientsin, and four organized circuits . . . and a total membership of two hundred and fifty-seven under our charge The past strengthens our hope for the future. All the usual agencies of evangelization have been put into operation. The country is open; the people friendly and accessible.¹²³

Other than Peking and Tientsin the mission included at this time four Circuits: (1) Tsunhuachow, a hundred miles east of Peking and approximately the same distance north of Tientsin, with its center "in the sub-prefectural city of Tsun-hua," the only Christian agency "in all the vast eastern region stretching away to the [Chihli] gulf," where a beginning had been made in 1874. (2) Tsangchow, a Circuit in a region a hundred miles south of Tientsin. (3) Nankung, two hundred miles southwest of Tientsin "in the midst of a populous, fertile country." (4) Taian, still farther south, in an area some three hundred and fifty miles from Tientsin, and the only Methodist work in Shantung Province. In 1877 the first Quarterly Conferences were held in Peking and Tientsin, and in 1879 two more were organized. A boys' day school was in operation in Tientsin, and a training school for men in Peking.¹²⁴

The eighties brought to the North China Mission an increased personnel which included some outstanding missionaries. Among them were Frank D. Gamewell, who arrived in 1881 to begin his long and distinguished career in education and in relation with the government; Marcus L. Taft, transferred from Central China in 1885, able educator and publicist; and Nehemiah S. Hopkins, M.D. (arrived, 1886), who won wide fame as a specialist in eye diseases and surgery.* The caliber of these men did much to strengthen the esprit de corps of the mission.

* In 1884 Dr. Howard was married to the Rev. A. M. King of the London Mission. Her marriage terminated her connection with the North China Methodist Mission.

District organization was begun in 1882-83, with three Districts placed in the charge of missionaries. During 1886 Dr. Walter R. Lambuth of the Shanghai Mission, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was resident in Peking and by his zeal and skill also lent aid and encouragement to the mission.¹²⁵

In its early years the girls' boarding school had found it impossible to realize its ambition of drawing pupils from the rural districts but in 1882 Superintendent Lowry wrote that people everywhere were speaking well of it.

In the matter of unbinding small feet, and saving young flesh this torture, it has done good work. In many places mothers have . . . told, either of the children in their arms or of girls of older years, that these children should not have their feet bound, for they were going to Peking to school.¹²⁶

Anna B. Sears, who in 1887 was made principal of the school, was convinced that the rule established in the beginning requiring the unbinding of feet as an inflexible condition of admission had been fully justified. It commends itself, she said, "as the strongest Christian protest we can make against this barbarity. It almost invariably makes each girl thus rescued an earnest advocate of it for others."

At the end of 1881 a women's training school was opened in Tientsin, with six women enrolled. The next year it was moved to Peking. In 1884 a new Bible school was organized in Tientsin.¹²⁷

Stress was placed during this second decade on evangelism by chapel preaching. Peking in 1887 had eight street chapels—seven in the Tartar city and one in the Chinese city. George R. Davis urged further expansion. With the Methodists now operating the only chapel in the great Chinese city, we "should open another immediately and a third at no distant date." At four different places the sick were treated and medicines dispensed daily except Sunday. At Tientsin in 1888 two preaching places were maintained, Wesley Chapel and East Gate Street Chapel—the latter in rented quarters. A "new and commodious [East Gate Chapel was under construction] just within the east gate of the native city." For this, funds were procured by solicitation from "Russian . . . English . . . and American friends: . . . consuls, business men, and missionaries." A third chapel was secured in 1889, located on a back

* Other North China recruits were the Rev. and Mrs. Oscar Willits of the Detroit Conference (1880); Anna B. Sears of the Cincinnati Branch (1880); Elizabeth Yates, New England Branch (1880); the Rev. William T. Hobart and wife, Minnesota Conference (1882); L. Stella Akers, M.D., New England Branch (1882); Mrs. Charlotte M. Jewell, New York Branch (1883); Anna D. Gloss, M.D., Northwestern Branch (1885); the Rev. George B. Crews, M.D., and wife, Rock River Conference, temporarily transferred in 1886 from West China; Nellie R. Green, New England Branch (1886); Frederick Brown and wife from the English Methodist Free Church (1886); Edna G. Terry, M.D., New England Branch (1887); William Curtiss, M.D., and wife (1887); Vesta Greer, Board missionary (1887); Lillian G. Hale, New England Branch (1888); Mary Ketting, Cincinnati Branch (1888); D. E. Osborne, M.D., and wife (1889); Frances O. Wilson, Des Moines Branch (1889); Anna E. Steere, Northwestern Branch (1889); Hattie E. Davis, Board missionary (1889).

street, difficult of access, in the "West City," a northwestern suburb. Dispensaries were maintained in connection with most of the chapels.¹²⁸

In 1885, by reorganization of Circuits, the Taian District was eliminated and in its place Tsunhua was made a District. In 1886 a long-contemplated missionary residence was established in Tsunhua. A parsonage and a second house were erected. Dr. Hopkins was assigned to the city for medical work and maintained regular dispensary days. In 1887 a small temporary hospital was set up and in 1888 the W. F. M. S. completed a missionary home and dispensary. In 1889 a girls' boarding school was started. At the 1891 annual meeting Te Jui was appointed Presiding Elder of the District, the first Chinese to be appointed to such an office in North China.

By 1889 the three Districts, by the addition of Shantung and Lwanchow, had become five. Lwanchow reflected the extension of work to the far north-eastern corner of China, with a new Circuit, Shanhaikuan, opened at the eastern terminus of the Great Wall in Inner Mongolia, two hundred miles from Peking. In an area of about seven thousand square miles Lwanchow District possessed a population of some two and a half million people living in eight walled cities, about fifty or more populous market towns, and innumerable villages. Progress in the District was hindered by determined opposition of the literati, lack of efficient native leadership, and want of funds for expansion.

The Shantung District was created by reorganization of the Tientsin District, and its boundary extended to the southernmost point of the Conference, four hundred and fifty miles from Peking.

The principal missionary activities other than chapel preaching during 1880-89 were in accordance with the usual methods: "preaching to . . . Sabbath congregations in organized churches; . . . at markets and fairs, and in the streets of small towns and villages; in the distribution of Christian books and tracts, by work in hospital and dispensary, by work among women and girls, and in day-schools for boys and girls." Few innovations were introduced. However, at the Wiley Institute in 1887 a Y. M. C. A. was organized among the older students. Every Sunday, Hobart took some of the members with him to the street chapel and enlisted them in talking with those who gathered. Those who manifested an interest were invited to go to the Sunday school. At Asbury Church in Peking, after the 1885 annual meeting, for the first time in the history of the mission responsibility for collecting the Chinese pastor's salary was placed upon the stewards and paid by their hands to the minister. In one station the Chinese members, in addition to contributing to local expenses, paid about a third of the preacher's salary. On one of the Circuits members from their own slender resources rented land, contributed seed and labor for its cultivation, and applied the harvest toward payment of the pastor's salary.

On occasion Superintendent Lowry accompanied a missionary on the round of a rural Circuit, a description of which he wrote home to the Board as illustrative of missionary life :

To rise at three or four o'clock in the morning and be pounded in a cart over rough or muddy roads till long after dark, with only an hour for rest and lunch at noon, and then find only a dirty, cold, mud-built room, without floors, and sometimes without doors or windows, for your accommodation at night, is not the kind of life that is fairly open to the charge of too great ease.

At the end of twenty years the five Districts* had a Chinese staff of sixteen preachers, seven licensed Exhorters, and several colporteurs who combined selling books with preaching. There were on the field one single woman and fourteen married missionaries with their families, sent by the parent Society, and nine W. F. M. S. missionaries.¹²⁹

The most far-reaching movement in the life of the North China Mission as its third decade opened was the development of a comprehensive plan for the incorporation of the Wiley Institute as Peking University with a college of liberal arts and departments of theology and medicine.† The two latter departments were already in operation in 1890 with eight theological students, and five medical students, two of whom were later dropped. Three years later intermediate schools, established as feeders to the university high school, were in operation in Peking, Tientsin, Tsunhua, Taian, and Lwanchow; and by 1895 the college of medicine was fully organized. It charged a $50. tuition fee. Nine students made up the first class.¹³⁰

After several years of destructive floods and serious famine, general conditions in the North China area improved and church membership which had lagged began to increase again. "Its numbers," Lowry stated, might have been largely augmented had we received all applicants, but we are still convinced that it is wise in China to insist on a long trial, not only as condition for membership, but before entering names as probationers. Serious persecutions have prevailed in some districts, not only testing the faithfulness of our members, but diminishing the numbers of inquirers.

Many of the chapels were crowded with attentive hearers, including all kinds and conditions of men. Frederick Brown noted that about the only place "where the official and beggar can meet on equal terms is in 'Jesus Hall.'" He and others, however, had become convinced that if the Church was to attract as serious inquirers any others than "the coolie class" it was necessary to have better and cleaner chapels. As it became possible to increase the number—more new chapels were opened in 1892 than in any previous year

* Of the five Districts Peking now had the largest membership—308 full members and 137 probationers—with nine day schools (including high schools), enrolling 244 pupils. The four other Districts were: Tientsin, 151 full members, 51 probationers, 5 schools, 87 pupils; Tsunhua, 190 members, 63 probationers, 5 schools, 78 pupils; Lwanchow, 62 members, 90 probationers, 7 schools, 32 pupils; and Shantung, 71 members, 136 probationers, 1 school, 8 pupils.—*Seventy-first Ann. of the mission—an effort was made to construct an improved type of building. In 1893 a new East Gate Chapel—built on another site—in Tientsin was dedicated. Davis regarded it as “a very acceptable chapel, the most substantial structure in the Mission . . . commodious . . . and . . . the largest audience room in Tientsin for union services.”¹³¹

By 1891 in two of the largest cities of the Lwanchow District property had been procured and the Church rooted through the organization of Societies, and in a third, land had been rented and a school begun. In 1892 a boys' boarding school was opened in Lwanchow. At the end of this year Pyke reported that the Church owned two chapels, has the lease of a third, and rents five. Regular Sunday services are held in twelve different places. Including probationers and baptized children, there is a membership of three hundred and eleven. Seventy-eight adults and eighteen children have been baptized during the year.¹³²

The Districts were reorganized again in 1894 by the newly formed Annual Conference. Shantung District was now incorporated with the Tientsin, and South Peking District established since the work in that area had steadily increased.

In pursuance of an enabling act of the 1892 General Conference, the North China Annual Conference was organized on September 29, 1893, by Bishop Randolph S. Foster, with twenty-five charter members, of whom thirteen were missionaries* and twelve were Chinese. Of the Chinese members six were elders, two were deacons, and four were probationers. Forty Stations and Circuits were listed in five Districts. Institutional appointments were thirteen in number: nine to schools and colleges, four to hospitals. Appointments of the Woman's Conference numbered seventeen, of which thirteen were to schools and four to medical work. Full members of the Church were reported to the number of 1,835; probationers, 1,003. Dr. Lowry had been Superintendent of the North China Mission for twenty consecutive years, a longer continuous term of service than that of any other mission Superintendent in the Church. Dr. A. B. Leonard who was present at the Conference session—the first Corresponding Secretary of the Missionary Society who had visited North China—wrote home that “the only objection made to the organization of the Mission into an Annual Conference was that it would do away with the superintendency, and thereby remove Dr. Lowry from office.”¹³³

North China Conference began its corporate existence under a triple handicap. In 1894 the missionary personnel suffered crippling loss. One of the two most influential leaders, Dr. Pilcher, at that time president of Peking University, died on November 24, 1893. The gain of two missionaries who had arrived on the field at the time was offset by the loss of two others. Wilbur F. Walker after twenty years of faithful service decided not to return from furlough and Charles O. Kepler, M.D., after one year in China for some unexplained reason returned to the United States. The death of Mrs. William Curtiss also temporarily removed Dr. Curtiss from the field. On July 24, 1894, LaCledé Barrow, less than two years on the field, suddenly died from smallpox.* Disheartened by this drastic decrease in personnel Lowry wrote to the Missionary Secretaries that the only prospect seemed the suspension of some part of the work that it had taken twenty-five years to build up.

In all our afflictions we are sure of your sympathy, but can nothing be done to replenish our ranks? Greater, or rather other losses will certainly follow unless the overburdened workers can be relieved. . . .

. . . I do not expect to break down, but I can see more work ahead of me than any two men can do. The result must be that the work will be neglected. It will take years now to repair our losses to say nothing of advance.¹⁸⁴

The financial difficulties of the Missionary Society in 1893 brought a cut in appropriations which to North China threatened additional hardship. "To be frank," wrote Lowry to Secretary Leonard, on May 14, 1894,

I believe a reduction in salaries for this field must compel some of the best men to retire from the Mission. It is next to impossible for an average family to lay by anything for the education of children or emergencies. . . . Perhaps a wiser economy might be sought than shaving the missionary's allowance to the lowest possible limit.

Supplementing Lowry's letter the mission as a group sent a formal protest to the Board against reduction of salaries. Nineteen months later Lowry wrote another protest against an equal salary schedule for all of Eastern and Southeastern Asia on the ground that the rigorous climate of North China required larger expenditures for heating and clothing than that of Malaya; also against a graded salary scale based upon length of service. Since the Board undertakes to provide only a living support, years of service, he contended, should not enter into the calculation. Let the previous salary scale be restored, he pleaded, for unless this is done the work will lose more by broken health, discontent, and compulsory anxiety than will be saved by the reduction. In 1896 $1,300. was granted by the Board "as special relief from the Incidental Fund to married missionaries in North China."¹⁸⁵

During the early and middle nineties the entire missionary program was also hampered by the associated evils of war, famine, floods, and pestilence which in some areas became so serious as to threaten the existence of the churches. Many members died or removed from the affected regions. In the Tsunhua District in 1895 several of the day schools were closed and in those which remained open the principals found it necessary, in order to save the lives of the pupils, to provide one meal a day. In the Lwanchow District, also, in the same year thousands of the people were enabled to survive only by the relief provided by the mission.¹³⁶

Despite all handicaps, the Church continued to grow. On the Lwanchow District the largest increase in membership in the history of the District was registered. As the period closed (1895) full members of the Church numbered 2,300; probationers, 1,726; native ordained preachers, 9; unordained preachers, 22; foreign missionaries, parent Society, 16; assistant missionaries, 12; W. F. M. S. missionaries, 7; native workers, W. F. M. S., 18.¹³⁷

WEST CHINA MISSION

Restless after eight years in the Foochow Mission, Franklin Ohlinger in November, 1878, urged the founding of a Methodist mission in West China and offered, with his wife, to go to Ichang, Hupeh Province, or possibly to Chungking, Szechwan. If Board funds were not available he proposed to contribute $100. of his personal savings toward the necessary expense. While his proposal led to no immediate action it evidently made a lasting impression on the minds of Bishop Wiley and other missionary leaders of the Church. On October 1, 1880, Nathan Sites—indefatigable pioneer that he was—approached the subject from a different angle. Writing to Missionary Secretary Fowler he emphasized the importance of the fact that foreign commerce, not content with eastern and central China trade, was advancing into the nation's westernmost provinces. The British government had stationed a consular agent at a principal mart of trade in Szechwan. Roman Catholic missionaries already "for scores of years" had been laboring there "with a good degree of success." Protestant Bible colporteurs also had distributed Bibles in numerous far-western cities.

Shall not our American Methodist Episcopal church, be among the first to enter this promising field of over twenty million souls . . . ?

The opening of this new and vast field, and its occupancy by our church, will give new stimulus at home and abroad, to the benevolent activities of the whole church.¹³⁸

At the meeting of the General Missionary Committee on November 4, 1880, Bishop Wiley presented a proposal to establish a mission in West China. Because of the size of the existing Missionary Society debt, considerable hesitancy was expressed. As the meeting was about to adjourn without action a note from John F. Goucher was delivered offering in effect $5,000. a year for two years, and longer, if necessary, for founding a West China mission. This led to immediate decision. After some general inquiry the Board decided to draft an experienced China missionary, Lucius N. Wheeler, who since his return from North China in 1875 had been serving in the pastorate in the Wisconsin Conference.

In his letter appointing Wheeler, Bishop Wiley said :

I am willing that Ichang, in the Hupeh Province, shall be duly considered. It may be possible that is as far west as it would now be wise to go. Still our desire is to reach Se-chuen, and, if possible, Ching-tu-fu [Chengtu], its capital. Our ultimate outlook from this movement is into Thibet, and for that . . . [Chengtu] is the proper center.¹³⁹

As Wheeler's associate Bishop Wiley appointed the Rev. Spencer Lewis of the Rock River Conference, a recent graduate of Garrett Biblical Institute. On September 6, 1881, Wheeler with his family and Lewis and his wife sailed from San Francisco. At Shanghai the party was met by Bishop Bowman, who was then visiting the China missions, and Lewis was ordained. Bagnall, of the Central China Mission, was designated to accompany Wheeler on a preliminary tour of exploration while Lewis stayed at Chinkiang for language study. Wheeler and Bagnall left Kiukiang in November for their long trip up the Yangtze, a ten weeks' journey. Wheeler made "a full survey" of the province, chose a location in Chungking for his residence and mission headquarters and returned, reaching Kiukiang on March 16, 1882. In October, 1882, Wheeler accompanied by his family, and the Lewises, again headed westward and reached Chungking safely on December 3.¹⁴⁰

The headquarters which Wheeler had rented consisted of Chinese-style buildings with small mud-wall rooms possible for use as a residence, chapel, and school. The place was not large enough for the accommodation of both families and for the reception of men and women guests but after three months of house hunting Lewis succeeded in locating and in purchasing a suitable residence "by the city wall overlooking the Gialing [Chialing] river."

In October, 1883, Miss Frances I. Wheeler who had accompanied her parents to West China under appointment as a W. F. M. S. missionary established a girls' school. In December of the following year Gertrude Howe came from Kiukiang to aid her with the school and "to take charge of an orphanage which, almost before they knew it, the missionaries had on their hands, though they had no buildings." A large number of unwanted girl babies had been left at their doors, only fifteen of whom they were able to receive.

Much of Lewis' time was occupied by itinerating in the rural areas and villages surrounding Chungking, preaching and selling books and tracts.

On market days I could not stop on the street to offer books without danger of obstructing traffic, since everybody stopped to see me. I was accustomed to resort to a large temple court, much used in marketing, taking my stand with my back against a wall I would hold a variety of books, calling out something like this, 'The holy books of the Jesus religion. A gospel of Matthew for ten cash.

The way of salvation six cash. A short digest of the Christian religion three cash. An illustrated sheet tract, showing the evils of opium smoking, for one cash. Take a book and look at it. See, you could not buy the paper for that money. We half give it to you, because we wish you to know about the one true God, who made all things and sent his son Jesus to redeem the world from Sin.' . . .

If the sales are slow, one spends more time in explanations and running comments. Connected preaching generally gets scant attention. Even when the crowd was inclined to mischief, one was usually all right while facing them. Getting away often had its difficulties. Young fellows would often try to push me down, especially when going down steps, but being strong and wary, I never have fallen. . . . Missiles were often thrown, but cumbrous sleeves hindered the aim. . . . It was well to be ever alert and watchful, ready by a joking remark or apt answer to keep the crowd friendly.¹⁴¹

A boys' school was opened in February, 1884, with an enrollment of twenty-four pupils. The attendance was drawn chiefly from the homes of poor families, mostly renters who moved frequently, resulting in irregular attendance and shifting enrollment. Books and instruction were free.

A recurrence of the ill health which he had suffered some years before while in North China made it advisable for Wheeler to leave Chungking for America in March, 1884. He was succeeded by Frank D. Gamewell of North China.¹⁴²

In the early autumn of 1883 Lewis made a quick trip to Shanghai and returned, bringing with him Dr. G. B. Crews of the Rock River Conference, who had been appointed medical missionary to West China. Following his return Lewis occupied himself "in fitting up a chapel for Sabbath services" and in February, 1884, the first public preaching services were held.

The news of the opening of the chapel was soon noised abroad, and on the second Sabbath several hundred people, led by curiosity, tried to crowd into the little chapel, which would seat only about two hundred persons. Thereafter the crowd was less, but for several months we were seldom able to seat all the women who came. At length we removed a partition, allowing the women to spread out into an adjoining court; yet on the following Sabbath not less than three hundred hearers occupied every available seating and standing space.¹⁴³

In his first report to the Missionary Society Wheeler said he had already received an application for baptism from a literary gentleman, possessed of an unusual talent for public speaking, who if consistent in his Christian profession might be found "very useful as an evangelist." A small number had been admitted as probationers and others were willing to be received but he considered it better to give each case deliberate consideration. In less than twenty-four hours after his arrival, Dr. Crews reported, patients presented themselves for treatment and within the first year came in considerable numbers from long distances.¹⁴⁴

The nucleus of a Sunday school had been in existence for some time in several classes which met separately. When at the beginning of 1885 they were brought together in a regular organization "with 8 officers and teachers," one hundred persons attended the first meeting. In February a street chapel was opened for daily preaching not far from the mission headquarters. While the attendance was small, averaging not more than twenty, several probationers came into the Church during the first year through its influence. Gamewell gave attention soon after his arrival to a search for permanent mission headquarters and in about a year succeeded in purchasing "a finely situated property" some three miles from the rented quarters in the city.

It was planned to erect two or three residences, a hospital, a chapel, and later perhaps a building for a boys' advanced school. There was no reason to anticipate difficulty. The fact of purchase was well known and the district magistrate had put his official stamp on the deed. On April [should be March] 10, 1886 ground was broken for the residences, and when the erection of buildings began no opposition was manifested.¹⁴⁵

Suddenly, however, a storm broke, resulting in the destruction of all property occupied by foreigners in and near the city. The fury of the attack, which began on July 1, 1886, was not directed primarily against Americans, since the property of English, French, and Russians was also indiscriminately plundered. Gamewell's report to the Missionary Society read:

Our place in the city was attacked last, and when we saw the mob at their work of destruction on the Catholic cathedral near by, and knew that our turn would come next and that the destruction of our property was inevitable, we sent a man to secure a boat for us, hoping to escape to the river for safety. While the rioters were gathering at our front gate a local constable rushed up to our back gate and urged us to escape for our lives. We left immediately, saving nothing but the clothing we wore, and after various experiences and hours of separation from each other reached the magistrate's yamen. . . .

In the vile atmosphere of a Chinese yamen, in close quarters at a trying season, the health of over a score of foreigners was preserved through fourteen days; down hundreds of miles of a river dangerous at all times, but doubly so when swollen by summer floods, our lives were preserved, and in our every experience God was wonderfully with us¹⁴⁶

This riot, which temporarily put an end to the West China Mission, was attributed to various causes. Spencer Lewis stated that it was incited chiefly by the presence in Chungking of many lawless and turbulent military students who had come up to the city for their triennial examinations and who systematically spread false rumors as to why the mission was doing extensive building: the residences were alleged to be forts; the workmen were soldiers who were being drilled; the stone structures were built on the neck of a great dragon and to crush him would bring sore calamities upon the people. Placards were posted "calling upon the people to rise, burn and destroy." A minor disturbance took place on June 6, when Mrs. Gamewell happened to be alone at the new residence. As the gate was being battered by a crowd she opened it, with a gun in her hands, to expostulate with the leaders and was attacked with stones but when the blood began to flow they fled. At this juncture building construction was discontinued but this did not put an end to the turbulence.

Indignities against Chinese immigrants in America had created strong resentment and United States action about this time on Oriental immigration accentuated anti-American feeling. While these were undoubtedly factors, local causes—as Reid contends—such as the suffering among the poor owing to the high price of rice, . . . [were] made the occasion by the large number of candidates for military position, who were in attendance on the examinations by the Government, to stir up the people to deeds of violence that they themselves might share in the plunder.¹⁴⁷

The missionary personnel were widely scattered. Lewis and his wife, and Mrs. Gamewell, went to the United States for rest and recuperation; Dr. and Mrs. Crews to Peking; and the missionaries of the W. F. M. S. to Central China.

Without loss of time Superintendent Gamewell went to Peking and made representations concerning the mission's losses to the imperial government, seeking full redress and restoration to Chungking. In a surprisingly short time agreement for settlement was effected,* the government agreeing to pay damages in amount of 22,000 taels—about $28,000.† This lacked some eighteen per cent of full compensation. Rights in the real estate were acknowledged, with the understanding that insistence upon reoccupancy of the original property would not be made and that if the local authorities so desired it would be exchanged “for other eligible and suitable property in a different locality.”¹⁴⁸

Virgil C. Hart, Superintendent of the Central China Mission, was embarking at Shanghai in the early spring of 1887, bound for San Francisco on furlough, when a message was delivered from Bishop Fowler informing him of his appointment to make a tour of inspection of the West China Mission, and bidding him to go to Chungking at once for the purpose of re-establishing the mission.‡ Within a few weeks, Hart, accompanied by H. Olin Cady, who had been appointed to West China, embarked at Hankow on the Kiangtung for the long trip on the Upper Yangtze. In May (1887) the party reached Chungking. This new and unexpected commission required Hart “to visit,

* Acknowledgment for aid in effecting the favorable settlement was made by the Missionary Society, in addition to Gamewell, “to United States Minister Denby, to Hon. Chester Holcombe, American Chargé d’Affaires, late himself a missionary of the A.B.C.F.M.; . . . [and especially] to F. S. A. Bourne, H. B. M. consular agent at Chung-king, who could not have done more had he been an American.”—Sixty-eighth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1886), p. 100.

† This action was in striking contrast to that of the United States in relation to the unredressed wrongs suffered by Chinese immigrants in California, Oregon, and in eastern coastal cities.—See pp. 9 f.

‡ Why F. D. Gamewell was superseded as Superintendent of the West China Mission is not clear. Neither the Annual Reports of the Missionary Society nor Reid's history offers an explanation. In a letter to Secretary Reid, dated Shanghai, March 5, 1887, V. C. Hart makes the puzzling statement: “I accept the difficult task because the general work of Missions in China is somewhat involved in the ultimate settlement of that affair. From all I learn it would be both hazardous personally for Mr. Gamewell to return and highly detrimental to the interests of our own and other Societies, to say nothing of individual foreigners.”—Correspondence Files, Division of World Missions.

inspect, and take steps toward the restoration of . . . [the] West China Mission." First, it was necessary to rent a missionary house. After scouring the city for several days an ancient mansion was located—"not a single bright room in it—every room . . . dark, badly ventilated, damp and sepulchral," which he finally secured at a rental of three hundred dollars a year. On June 27, in company with a young English physician, Hart left Chungking for Chengtu, the capital of the province, 350 miles northwest, on a journey the purpose of which was to mingle among the people throughout the populous districts and test their present temper and attitude towards foreigners; to obtain as much knowledge as possible of the country and of those centres, particularly, that might likely be occupied by Methodist and other denominations as mission stations; to disseminate religious literature; and to satisfy a longing to see the provincial capital and the far-famed 'Glory of Buddha' on the top of Omei.

After his extended tour of observation Hart "returned to Chungking in August, and soon after left for Central China." In his report to the Missionary Secretaries he expressed the opinion that great caution would be necessary, not only at Chungking but at all other points in the province. He considered the city to be a good center for mission work, but not to be compared "for compactness and natural facilities . . . with Chen-tu." He advised that a second center should be opened, either "at Chen-tu or Kiating-foo."¹⁴⁹

Near the close of 1887 Spencer Lewis arrived at Ichang on the Upper Yangtze on his way back to Chungking. In the meantime Cady had been busy in Chungking re-establishing former contacts, building a mission residence, and getting school and church work again under way. Lewis sent word to Cady to meet him at Wanhsien, a halfway point, and from there, he writes, they "started on a land trip of twelve days," taking with them several coolie loads of books for distribution.

From dawn till dark we tramped and sold, stopping only a few minutes for lunch. . . . For me it meant only a healthy tired[ness], but not so with my new missionary. . . . On arrival at an inn. . . , he would . . . throw himself down on a dirty Chinese inn bed and go sound asleep so that he had to be called up for supper. . . . I did not realize until afterwards that he was making the whole trip on blistered feet

The two "made the journey overland to Chungking in fifteen days, preaching and selling a large number of gospels and tracts." They arrived at their destination on January 30, 1888. Within the next twelve days Lewis "succeeded in renting suitable places for Sabbath chapel, street chapel and boys' school." A few days later he started on a seventeen days' journey, taking Cady with him "to preach and sell tracts and to learn the prices of building materials." Returning to Chungking on March 1 he opened the boys' school on March 2, the Sunday-school chapel on March 4, and the street chapel on March 6. After an interim of twenty months the mission schedule was re-established.¹⁵⁰

Spencer Lewis very soon demonstrated that he was a man of action, possessing administrative ability, and it is not surprising that he was appointed Superintendent of the mission. Nineteen months after resumption of the program he reported that the double mission house, built of brick, had been completed and one half of it occupied, the other "standing empty, awaiting the fortunate man who shall some time be appointed to West China." He lamented the fact that the mission continued to be only a single station, without even an outstation. He pleaded passionately for reinforcement:

The West China Mission is intended to embrace a territory greater than that covered by any other of our missions in Asia, and yet for all these years we have been confined to one station. We have now members or probationers from four different places in the country and all these might be openings for country work if we could attend to them. . . .

Two men in a region with a population larger than that of the United States, and with a territory half as large as the United States east of the Mississippi can hardly be considered an adequate force.

There is such a thing as wasting money by doling it out, and wasting forces by having too few.

He reported having purchased property for a hospital but to be waiting for a doctor to come before building; also having bought a ground site for a "good chapel."¹⁵¹

Lewis' urgent appeals for additional missionaries were evidently heeded for between 1889 and 1895 six married men, and one single man, were added to the West China staff.* The Superintendent was greatly encouraged as the longed-for reinforcements began to come. In 1890 he wrote:

We seem at last to have fully recovered from the losses due to the interruption to our work and the scattering of the workers, and to have entered on a period of steady and healthful growth. More preaching has been done in the past year than in any year in the history of the Mission, and the results are most encouraging. . . . We are becoming better and more favorably known, and are gaining an influence in and about two other cities. That some who come to us do so with impure motives is no secret. . . . But we do not value the wheat less because of the chaff mixed with it.

The one boys' school also increased in enrollment from eleven pupils to fifty. Although no W. F. M. S. women had as yet returned Lewis felt that

S.* [1892], p. 120.) 1890, James H. McCartney, M.D. (m. Kasiah Thomas, July 25, 1890. She died on Jan. 4, 1895. On Jan. 8, 1896, he married Sadie Kissack). McCartney was ordained under the missionary rule in 1908 and continued in missionary service until 1916, when he withdrew but continued to reside in China engaged in private practice. 1892, Harry L. Canright, M.D., and wife. 1893, Wilson E. Manly, Upper Iowa (m. Florence M. Brown, Oct. 15, 1893); Jacob F. Peat and wife, Illinois. 1894, Quincy A. Myers and wife, Northwest Indiana. 1895, James O. Curnow, a British citizen who had been in the service of the China Inland Mission (1887-94), joined the West China Mission in November, 1894, was received into the Foochow Conference in 1895, and in 1903 was transferred to the Philadelphia Conference.

schoolwork with girls could not be longer delayed and Mrs. Lewis made a beginning. By the end of the year she had "about twenty girls in charge and about sixteen women in weekly classes."¹⁵²

In November, 1890, Dr. James H. McCartney arrived at Chungking and soon afterward began to receive patients. When his supply of drugs came, three months later, a temporary dispensary and a hospital were fitted up and the foundation of a permanent hospital laid. On October 2, 1891, it was dedicated, including in all seven buildings.

The first annual meeting of the mission, held in June, 1890, gave a strong spiritual impetus to the work. In June, 1891, Cady removed to Chengtu to establish the long-contemplated second station. He at first occupied rented property but in 1892 a plot was purchased, described by Lewis as "well situated . . . on a good street and near one of the principal thoroughfares of the city," with grounds sufficiently spacious to provide room without crowding for two mission houses, hospital, dispensary, chapel, and day school. Medical work was begun in 1893 by Dr. Harry L. Canright.

Cady's account of the first year's work tells of the gathering in of seven probationers and nine inquirers, with thirty persons regular in attendance at Sunday services. Hope for the organization of a Sunday school centered in a class of more than twenty which met on Sunday afternoon for the study of the Old Testament. An inquirers' class met weekly for the study of the catechism and daily for a lesson in the New Testament. A small day school had been established and a street chapel was open daily with an Exhorter present to sell books and converse with questioners. Chungking was drawn upon for a nucleus of native workers, among others a preacher, a colporteur, and a woman to serve as a Bible reader. The first baptisms, three in number, occurred in June, 1893. In August, after seven years in China, Cady left on furlough and after acquiring a wife in America, Hattie Yates Cady, returned in 1895.¹⁵³

Pressing need for a hospital in Chengtu was felt by Dr. Canright. He found himself hampered by petty annoyances which he was confident would be banished if facilities were available for the healing of the physical ills of the people. "We have already done enough in a medical way," he said, "to prove that as soon as we are ready to receive all who come we shall be besieged by crowds of sick people." An appropriation for the needed hospital was not forthcoming from the Board, but Dr. Canright at his own expense managed early in 1895 to open a new brick dispensary, the first foreign building in the city, and as a hospital makeshift to fit up "a few beds . . . in some inferior Chinese buildings."

In 1892 schools were three in number, a girls' school and two boys' schools—a primary school and a high school. The arrival of Wilson E. Manly on March 15, 1893, and of Florence Brown (later Mrs. Manly), an experienced teacher, seven months later, gave a new impetus to the schoolwork in Chungking. In February, 1894, the high school was moved from its crowded quarters in the city to spacious country grounds a mile and a half distant. "Scarcely a week passes," wrote Manly, "but some one desires admission." The 1895 enrollment totaled forty-eight, with an average attendance of thirty-eight.¹⁵⁴

The need for W. F. M. S. missionaries, year after year, was emphasized in the Superintendent's annual reports. Finally on March 25, 1895, four deaconesses* arrived in Chungking, "the first representatives of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society in the field for nearly nine years." A gift of $4,000. to the Society by Mrs. Adeline Smith of Oak Park, Illinois, presumed to be "sufficient to provide a home for the missionaries," was conditional on their being deaconesses. Thus the Deaconess Movement became a factor in the projected evangelization of West China.¹⁵⁵

Nine years after the destructive Chungking riots the tragedy was repeated in Chengtu, following much the same pattern. Unexpectedly, a serious riot broke out on May 25 (1895) and continued for several days. The surprise was the greater because of all Chinese cities Chengtu had been considered by all the missionaries of the various denominations "the most peaceable and well-disposed." The Roman Catholic Mission which at this time included, in addition to several churches, a hospital, a pharmacy, and residence, had been in existence for a century and a half. When the fury finally subsided the missionaries' homes and practically all of their possessions had been destroyed or carried away.† Not "a missionary, Protestant or Catholic, in all that great city but was homeless." From Chengtu the rioting spread to many cities and villages in the province, including among others Yachow, Suifu, Kiating, Paoning Fu, Pingshan, and Singking.¹⁵⁶

A committee was appointed at a meeting of American missionaries held at Shanghai on July 1, 1895, "to ascertain all the facts" pertaining to the riots. The report submitted to a meeting of American citizens on July 15, including proclamations of various Szechwan officials, led to the conclusion that the riots "were officially inspired and encouraged." As in the case of the Chungking riots the government paid promptly "the indemnity required for . . . [the] property destroyed at Chentu" and guaranteed future protection. The Board on January 21, 1896, granted authority to the West China Mission to rebuild provided that the entire cost, including all other extra expenses incurred in re-surveying work in that city, shall not exceed the indemnity received from the Chinese Government.

† Spencer Lewis: "Of the three Chen[g]tu families Mr. and Mrs. Cady remained at Chungking, and Dr. and Mrs. Canright and Mr. and Mrs. Peat went on to Shanghai, Dr. and Mrs. Canright finally going on to Nagasaki."—In Seventy-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. (1895), pp. 88 f.

In about a year the Cadys and the Canrights were back in Chengtu with "a larger attendance on the church services, class and prayer meetings, and the Sunday School," than before the riot.¹⁵⁷

At the close of 1895, thirteen years after its founding, the West China Mission had seventy-three full members and sixty-seven probationers. Foreign missionaries of the Board on the field in 1895 were eight in number, of whom seven were married men; W. F. M. S. missionaries, four. As yet there were no ordained Chinese preachers. Unordained preachers numbered seven; native teachers, eight. Average attendance on Sunday worship was 285. Twenty-two conversions were recorded during the year. The mission had seven day schools, of which one was a high school. Scarcely a beginning had been made in the building of churches. Of five places of worship, only one was a church; the others, rented halls.¹⁵⁸

Lewis' experience in the mission—which from its beginning had a very small missionary force, compelling the Superintendent to rely to a great extent on native preachers—had convinced him that if China was to be Christianized it must be through the labors of "a trained and devoted native ministry." His helpers were not literary men in the Chinese sense but they were earnest and zealous and knew their Bibles. "Every missionary," Lewis declared, "should regard it his highest privilege to train such a band of workers."¹⁵⁹

FIRST FIFTY YEARS OF CHINA METHODIST MISSIONS

Between September 30, 1847, when the first Methodist missionaries to China arrived at Shanghai, and the close of this period, the Methodist Episcopal Church had sent to the Celestial Empire—counting the wives of married men—a total of 257 missionaries. Of these, 196 were missionaries of the parent Board; and sixty-one were representatives of the W. F. M. S.* Of the total, ninety-eight were in China at the close of 1895.

In 1895 in the two Annual Conferences and the Central China and West China missions, there were 7,280 members of the Methodist Episcopal Church and 9,456 probationers. Regular attendants upon the church services, many of whom were inquirers under instruction but not yet accepted for baptism, probably numbered as many more. These members and inquirers were tangible results of the half century's missionary effort, comparatively small in terms of the many millions of Chinese unreached by the Gospel, but reassuring in that at least a beginning had been made. What other evidence can be cited of significant outcome? What phases of Chinese life were influenced, and to what extent? What results were observable in the personal life and character of converts? What impression was made upon communities and community institutions where local missions were maintained? These are a few of many

* Of the wives included in the total of 196 missionaries, some had formerly been W. F. M. S. representatives. The sixty-one reckoned as W. F. M. S. missionaries did not include those who married Board appointees and thereby became Missionary Society personnel.

CHINA MISSIONS

questions to be asked and answered if a fair estimate is to be made of the fruits of the China Mission.

Factors Retarding Progress.—It should be recognized that Christian missionaries were uninvited visitors. China was self-sufficient and intensely isolationist. She desired neither commerce nor cultural contacts with other civilizations. For many centuries she had regarded “all foreigners as barbarians,” who had no right to come within her borders, “save for the purpose of paying her tribute.” When merchant vessels of other nations approached her shores they were repulsed. Only by force of arms were her ports opened to trade with the West.*

This anti-foreign attitude was intensified by the treatment which China received at the hands of Western nations. Her first foreign war, commonly known as the Opium War, 1840-43, waged by England, was avowedly for the purpose of breaking down China’s wall of arrogance and seclusion and as a means of exacting compensation for debts owed British merchants. China, for her part, was determined to stamp out the odious opium trade which England was chiefly guilty of forcing upon her. The penalties so unjustly exacted from China were deeply resented by the Chinese people. The several treaties signed between 1842 and 1866, all obtained by duress, strengthened the already existing anti-foreignism. While the official governmental relations between the United States and China were on a high level and feeling for the most part was good, the United States’ position on restricted immigration of Chinese in the 1880’s was bound to cause some chafing, and reports of injustices and indignities suffered by Chinese laborers on the American west coast contributed to the unpopularity of foreigners.¹⁶⁰

After missionaries succeeded in gaining entrance to China every slightest advance made by them during the fifty years was against persistent, intense opposition. All foreigners were suspect. All kinds of anti-foreign ideas and attitudes were prevalent among the people, although there were many incidental cases of hospitality and kindness. Wherever a missionary encountered any considerable number of people congregated on city streets or in rural villages he was almost certain to hear such cries as “Drive out the foreigner,” or “Kill the foreign devil.”

Secret societies of large membership among the common people organized conspiracies against foreigners; and the literati, who constituted the ruling class, were generally uncompromising opponents of all foreigners and foreign influences. A contributor to the Missionary Herald in 1892, referring to the slanderous pamphlets and handbills circulated in great quantity among students and the common people, stated they were “prepared evidently by the

* The Treaty of Nanking (Aug. 29, 1842) specified as one of its eight provisions that the ports of Amoy, Foochow, Ningpo, Shanghai, and Canton should be open to foreign trade and residence. With the exception of Canton, the five ports thereafter were open as agreed; foreign “concessions” or settlements were established; and trade flourished.—Li Ung Bing, Outlines of Chinese History, pp. 503 f., 517.

literati." The most vituperous of the slanders appeared in books and pamphlets along with official and semi-official documents whose authors were known to be men in official life. "If the scholars and the magistrates would only let us alone," wrote Dr. Griffith John, longtime China missionary, "we should have no difficulty whatever with the people."¹⁶¹

More often than otherwise the anti-foreign attitude was manifested by the spreading of malicious rumors, false charges, and libelous and inflammatory statements. An oft-repeated rumor accused foreigners of employing unscrupulous persons to distribute poisonous medicines among the people and to poison wells and springs. The variations of this one theme alone were numerous. For instance, it was reported that a foreigner had been caught in the act of poisoning wells, for which he was beaten by enraged citizens; at Hinghwa the prefect circulated the statement that he was afraid to use the water from his well for fear that it had been poisoned; at Changchow, the mandarins issued proclamations that foreigners planned to destroy the Chinese people by poisoning their drinking water. Another time it was reported that a large quantity of poisonous medicine had been seized by customs officers. Rumors of this kind were specially prevalent about 1870-71. Over a long period missionaries were accused of seizing young children to use their eyes and vital organs in manufacturing medicines.¹⁶²

The years 1890-91, also, witnessed a spate of abusive posters, cartoons, and pamphlets attacking Christianity, circulated wholesale in the valley of the Yangtze which "resulted in riots that destroyed several mission stations and caused the death of some . . . missionaries." The Missionary Herald said:

These publications . . . are sent by the boat-load in all directions from Changsha, the capital of Hunan, as well as from other cities, not for sale, but for free distribution among the people. They appear on the billboards, posted side by side with the imperial proclamations denouncing them. . . . the common people believe the infamous lies that they tell.¹⁶³

In many cases the anti-foreign attitude took the form of outright persecution. It is not too much to say that some one or more of the missions were constantly doing their work in the fear of imminent persecution or undergoing some form of overt attack.*

In 1864, an outbreak occurred in Foochow in which the East Street Church and the missionary residence were destroyed. About 1865, a building was rented in Pingnan, north of Kutien, to be used as a chapel, but it was soon razed to the ground by a mob and a stone erected on the site bearing the inscription, "This building shall never be rebuilt." At Shuichang, in the Central China Mission, in 1875, the Chinese helper was driven from the city and shortly afterward Stritmatter and Hykes escaped, severely beaten and bruised, from the rage of a violent mob. Six months later the mission schools and chapels were sacked. In December, 1879, Sites was severely wounded, his eyes almost blinded by a Nanping mob. Antagonism at Nankang in 1888 culminated the next year in a riot in which the property at that station was destroyed. This same year J. H. Pyke, Presiding Elder of the Lwanchow District, North China, reported to the Missionary Society: "Persecution has been general and malignant. Indeed, it has met us at every point and has been more than usually . . . vindictive." On the Wuhu District in 1891 riots "very nearly put a stop . . . [to all missionary work] for over a month." The hospital was closed for a short time, but the regular services of worship were continued. In the country stations of the Kiukiang District, according to James Jackson, the work was "all but paralyzed."¹⁶⁴

* Many of the persecutions suffered by them and their successors have not been included in the missionary records of the Church and even scant mention of those referred to would overtax the space limitations of this history.

The growth of the Christian movement was greatly hindered by the extension of persecution from the missionaries themselves to their converts. Fear prevented many non-Christians from expressing interest in the Gospel or from allying themselves in any way with the Christian cause. In 1870 near Sienyu City, Ting Kie-hwi, a Christian helper, "was arrested . . . taken to the city jail . . . severely beaten, without judge or jury, and cast into prison." * In numerous cases over a period of years the crops of Christians were destroyed and carried away. At Sungchang City the Chinese elder and the preacher were beaten and dragged around by ruffians "in the very presence of the magistrate." This abuse was repeated three or four times. In Hinghwa in 1888 Christians were beaten and imprisoned by the authority of the officials, the persecutions "provoked chiefly by the refusal of the Christians to contribute money to defray the expenses of idol processions." In 1889 William H. Lacy reported that in the Hokchiang (Futsing) District Christians were driven from their homes, their fields pillaged, fruit trees destroyed, and houses razed.¹⁶⁵

How much of the continuous persecution was due alone to the chronic outbursts of anti-foreignism which could be whipped up by leaders in any peaceable crowd or among the rabble? And how much might be blamed on larger movements, dimly understood by those contemporary with them, of a nation seething with restiveness, in the birth pangs of a new day? As Latourette points up:

The Protestant missionary . . . was a disturber of existing customs and institutions; the permission to travel and the protection promised him had been wrested from China by force; he journeyed farther from the treaty ports than did most of his fellow-countrymen, and so was often the only alien on whom anti-foreign spleen could be vented; he often sought to rent or purchase property in places where all foreigners were unwelcome; and his actions and his purposes seemed . . . mysterious and gave rise to ugly rumors which . . . were believed by the credulous.

* When the case was reported to the magistrate, he checked on its veracity and then ordered the evildoers punished. This was true, also, in many other instances.

. . . To all [the educated, the officials, people of local importance, students] . . . the missionary was peculiarly obnoxious, for he appeared to be threatening the established order to which their training and interests committed them—to be, in other words, little better than an anarchist.¹⁶⁶

The reliance also of missionaries on their consuls, under whose protection they automatically came, must often have been irritating.* It is easy enough to understand the natural impulse of fleeing to a foreign compound when danger arose or of going aboard a French or British or American gunboat nearby, which was at that moment firing on Chinese citizens among whom possibly were some of their own innocent converts, but it must be faced that the end result would not be to establish trust in the missionary as a completely free agent who endured all wrongs for the sake of the Gospel.†

Nor can it be claimed that missionaries were at all times tactful. In zeal to stamp out superstition and suppress idolatry, some failed to consider the effects of their actions and to remember how much they must have appeared to be the intruders. The choice of building sites, for instance, was often unfortunate as it came into conflict with local beliefs. As one instance, when the mission constructed a building on a hill in Nanking the townspeople felt it necessary to erect a pagoda to restore the feng shui (good luck) of the area. When the riots broke out in Chungking it was claimed that the mission was being built on a dragon's neck. At another place, when a convert boldly rid herself of the town idol she had been housing by dumping it in the public square the entire village was distraught, begged her to take it back, and when she would not, covered the idol's head until a new home could be found.¹⁶⁷

It must be said to the credit of the Chinese people that for the most part their government honored its treaty agreements, although entered into unwillingly. Individuals and groups deprived of rights or property received restitution and evildoers were punished, more so than in the reversed circumstances in California in the same period. From time to time imperial edicts were issued and publicly displayed ordering the protection of missionaries and the suppression of false rumor about them.

Methodism in China was handicapped also by deficiencies within itself.

* A less than creditable instance of this took place at Chinkiang about 1885. A Chinese who contracted with Methodist missionaries to build some houses defaulted on the contract. The missionaries tried to hold him to the contract by withholding pay for work already done. The contractor retaliated by trying to carry away the blinds of a veranda. When one of the missionaries, assisted by a second, interfered the contractor bound them and took them to the tipao. The American consul intervened and the taotai and tipao freed the missionaries. The consul then demanded that the contractor be punished but the taotai refused until the accounts of both parties could be examined and he had determined who was originally in the wrong. The consul refused to agree, and reported the matter to the consul-general, following which a British and an American gunboat were sent. The taotai became cowed and ordered the Chinese offenders put in the cangue and beaten.—Denby to Bayard, Feb. 9, 1886, in Foreign Relations, 1887, pp. 74 et seq. as cited by Kenneth S. Latonrette, A History of Christian Missions in China, p. 475 n.

† It is to be questioned whether the net result of government protection during this period was beneficial to the Christian missionary cause. Tyler Dennett is definitely of the opinion that it was not: "From the history of Christian missions in China . . . one conclusion stands out sharply: much harm and little good has come from governmental patronage and protection of missionary work; and the missionary renders the most enduring service to the people among whom he labors when he separates himself farthest from political concerns."—Americans in Eastern Asia . . . , p. 576.

From the outset, the Movement was retarded by sadly inadequate missionary forces. Bishop Mallalieu lamented the paucity of missionaries in the Foochow Mission in 1893:

The appalling fact in connection with our Foo-Chow Mission is that we have not a quarter part of the force that we ought to have. We have [there] only four or five missionaries . . . who can stand up in the presence of the people and talk to them in their own language. This is a sad showing after forty-five years of effort. We have three others who have not been long in the country, and have been so burdened with work of various kinds that they have had no chance to learn the language . . . Here we have a force of eight men, the ninth one absent in America on leave, and there are fifteen million of people in this one province . . .¹⁶⁸

The lines were too thin and too widely extended for intensive work. The concentrated continuous instruction and training necessary for permanent results in faith, character, and life were impossible in a large proportion of cases. This wide expansion was the policy of the Church * and was by no means confined to China.

Another weakness of the program was the lack of continuity in the service of individual missionaries. This was recognized and deplored by some of the more discerning. As Superintendent Lowry reported in 1891:†

If in any place in the world there is special value in continuity of labor, it is in missionary work. No matter what the ability and qualifications of a missionary, if for any cause he is compelled, after a brief period of service, to leave the field, his work cannot be regarded as a success.¹⁶⁹

Of the 196 missionaries sent out by the Missionary Society during the five decades, forty-four had a tenure of less than two and a half years; twenty-six additional of less than six years; thirty-one more of ten years or less. Which is to say that 101 missionaries, more than one-half of the total personnel, were in service less than eleven years. Only two missionaries—Lowry and his wife—fulfilled Durbin's hope of an entire lifetime given to the service, although the careers of a number who might have rounded out a full lifetime of service on the field were cut short by death. In the matter of tenure the record of the sixty-one missionaries of the W. F. M. S. was somewhat better. Eight were on the field for less than two and one-half years; ten less than six years; and six less than eleven years. That is, twenty-four, a few more than one-third of the total number, had a tenure of about a decade. Six spent between thirty-six and forty years in the service; seven between forty-one and forty-five years; and two between forty-six and fifty years.

Two principal factors contributed to this lack of continuity. Contagious diseases, malaria, and disorders of the intestinal tract were widely prevalent and facilities for treating them were inadequate. Strong constitutions and rugged physiques were required, qualifications which many missionary volunteers did not possess. The missionary office paid far too little attention to medical examinations preceding acceptance of candidates, with the consequence that many physical weaklings were sent to the field who within one, two, or three years returned home. Strange to say, the Missionary Society neglected to take into account the health risk to missionaries to arrive in China at the worst seasons, although it was evident that more than one missionary had failed to become acclimated because of the debilitating conditions met up with immediately upon debarking.

* See p. 156.

† See p. 159.

The second factor was the failure of the Missionary Society to look into the qualifications of volunteers with sufficient care and to provide special training for missionary service. As a consequence of his long experience as Superintendent of the Central China Mission, V. C. Hart wrote in 1887:

I sincerely hope some steps may be taken to give missionary candidates a searching examination at New York. It would pay to have men stay three months in New York and do City Mission work, that they may be seen and something of their qualifications for this most important work tested.¹⁷⁰

Early in the period the Bishops asserted in a quadrennial address that "the chief obstacle encountered in prosecuting . . . [the] foreign work . . . [arose] from the difficulty of obtaining a sufficient number of missionaries of suitable qualifications." Too frequently men lacking the aptitudes, staying quality, and training for the work were sent to the field, the Bishops said, who became discouraged on account of the climate, or the small prospect of immediate success, and quit the field. Thus double expense . . . [was] incurred in going and returning; much time . . . lost, and the enterprise embarrassed, if not defeated, and the natives still left in the darkness and misery of sin, and on the way to perdition.¹⁷¹

Within the period little was done to remedy this situation.

The Methodist tradition of an itinerant ministry, since it involved frequent changes in appointments, was likewise a contributing factor. In his initial report as Presiding Elder of the Chinkiang District, C. F. Kupfer called attention to the fact that in the ten years in which the District had been in existence three different men had been in charge, and asserted that "every change in China means a great loss to the work." Greater or less dissatisfaction with short pastorates was expressed by the churches. A particular case was reported in 1883 by G. R. Davis, missionary-in-charge of the Peking District:

The members [at Liangtzu Ho] have been dissatisfied because we would not return to them a preacher who had served three years. This feeling has greatly hindered the present pastor in his work during the year. At one time a large number seemed ready to leave the Church, but the danger, except in the case of a few, has passed away.¹⁷²

Character deficiencies and personality maladjustments in the leadership also contributed to the slowness of growth. In My Missionary Apprenticeship Bishop Thoburn says that he went to the foreign field under the misapprehension that "a missionary is not like other men, that his devotion is more pure, his life more saintly, and his labors more apostolic than if he lived in a Christian land . . ." His illusion was soon dispelled. "A missionary," he continued, "is no better after reaching his field than before leaving his native land."¹⁷³ In China the morale of the missionary group as a whole and ultimately that of the Chinese Church was lowered by the partisan spirit and party divisions growing out of different opinions and temperamental conflicts between leaders of the mission. Mention has already been made of the dissension within the missionary group concerning the superintendency. There were also serious disagreements between individual members of the mission. Perhaps the most serious was that between Ohlinger and Plumb—two men who differed in temperament, in theological opinions, and on questions of mission policy. Differences bred distrust, and distrust grew into open antagonism. As newcomers arrived they were drawn into the existing controversies. The effect of such contention on the life and work of the Church was a matter of much concern to several of the Bishops who visited China.*

Members of the Methodist mission were inclined to disagree on other matters, too, and from the very beginning were drawn into a long-existing controversy† over what was basically a philological problem but which also had profound theological implications. In August, 1865, a majority of the Methodist mission, after months of consideration finding themselves "divided in opinion as to the best terms to be used in China for God and Spirit, and, also with reference to the best version of the Scriptures in Chinese," agreed that missionaries and native helpers should have liberty to use the Chinese terms and Scripture versions which they preferred. However, "the minority, as they studied the question, found it magnifying in importance, ceasing to be a philological question, and becoming a moral one. Not content with the liberty to use the terms they preferred, they felt bound to contend with those who used others." Two refused to circulate the Bible version preferred by the majority and refused to allow hymns in which the objectionable terms were used to be sung in their churches. The controversy marred the spirit of harmony, prevented full cooperation, and created discord and ill feeling among missionaries and native leaders. Bishop Thomson, after listening to discussion of the whole question, concluded that the difference in terms was of slight consequence but the controversial spirit and unwillingness to compromise were serious matters.¹⁷⁴

* Ohlinger and Plumb particularly disagreed on the policy concerning the teaching of English in the Anglo-Chinese College in Foochow, a policy supported by Ohlinger but opposed by Plumb. Contention between them became acute. Both wrote letters reciting their complaints to the Missionary Secretaries and to Bishop Wiley. The Woolston sisters and Sia Sek-ong were drawn into the controversy. (Ohlinger to C. H. Fowler, Dec. 5, 1882; April 6, 1883; to Bishop Wiley, June 27, July 3, 1883; Plumb to Fowler, Feb. 24, 1883. All letters are in Correspondence Files, Division of World Missions, Board of Missions.) The conflict was brought to a head at the 1883 session of the Foochow Conference when Ohlinger felt "compelled to draw up formal charges against [Plumb] in order that he might . . . defend himself." The Conference committee was prepared to act but was deterred by the ruling of Bishop Merrill that the Conference was competent to try a member "only on matters having to do with his character as a minister, that difficulties between missionaries should be referred to the Board." The Bishop supplemented his ruling by a written statement which he ordered printed in the Conference Minutes, but the Publishing Committee suppressed it, whereupon the mission printed it separately. In view of objections made by some Foochow Conference members to the ruling, Bishop Merrill brought the whole matter to the attention of the 1884 General Conference. It was referred to the Committee on Episcopacy which reported that no action was required.—G. C. Journal, 1884, pp. 243, 313; Supplement, Foochow Conference Minutes, 1883.

† Edward Thomson: "Two hundred years ago a controversy arose in the Roman Catholic Church in China concerning the proper name for God; the Jesuits using the term Shangti, the Dominicans Shin. . . . The first Protestant missionaries used Shin for God and Hung for Spirit. . . . In 1847 the missions in Foochow adopted Shin and Hung, often using Shangti as an appellation; subsequently they adopted Shin and Ling. This continued until 1860. About this time the Church of England used Shangti and Shin, and in the following year all the missionaries of the American Board here adopted the same terms."—Op. cit., I, 256 f.

Problems of membership common to all missions from the first Christian century to the present inevitably were encountered in the effort to build the Church in China. There were some who united with the Church from mercenary motives, moved by expectation of material gain, and when their hopes failed generally lost interest and ceased attendance. The number of these were such as to pose a major problem. There were also times when for a year or more spurts in church attendance occurred without apparent explanation until it became clear that the idea had been circulated of temporal advantage to be gained by embracing church membership. These merely temporary increases in interest were sources of no little discouragement to the missionaries.¹⁷⁵ Not all who were admitted to the Church, even after all precautions had been taken, proved to be genuine converts. This was true of some for whom great hopes were held. Edward S. Little tells of one such, a Taoist priest who after months of training renounced his Taoist practices, delivered his prayer books to the missionary, and asked for baptism. Two years later Little wrote:

Some of our members have backslidden and become, if anything, worse than they were before—not all. The Taoist priest, about whom we had such high expectations . . . has fallen away and utterly belied the promises concerning him. This is a sore disappointment to me.¹⁷⁶

These same problems were met in recruiting and training men for the ministry. The Missionary Society provided an allowance of about $2.20 per month for board and clothes for ministerial students. This was a meager contribution but it was sufficient to tempt some to represent themselves as candidates for the ministry who had no real purpose of becoming preachers.

During the early decades difficulty in recruiting pupils for the day schools led to the practice of paying students a small amount for attendance. Especially in the case of the girls' schools it was difficult to make headway until the expedient of paying a few "cash" a day was hit upon. Many parents were so poor that they would accept any means offered to relieve themselves of feeding and clothing their daughters. While the custom helped in getting schools established it had the unfortunate result of causing many non-Christians to misinterpret the nature and purpose of the Church, leading them, as one missionary said, to look upon it merely "as a grand indiscriminating charity establishment."¹⁷⁷

In some of the local churches religious devotion after a few years fell to a low ebb, and in others contending factions among the lay members dissipated Christian fellowship. When one of the most saintly of the Christian pastors was appointed to Tiengang Tong—one of the largest of the Foochow churches—he found a "sad condition of bickering and lack of spirituality" prevailing among its members. His efforts to overcome dissension and to exclude unworthy members met with strong opposition.¹⁷⁸

While a goodly proportion of the pastors in the later decades of the period possessed a high order of native ability and were well qualified by training for effective ministry there were a considerable number who were lacking in basic education and without any special preparation and training. Concerning the employment of the latter there were divergent views among the missionaries. Virgil C. Hart was persuaded that "the almost universal crowding . . . [of] uncalled, untrained native agents" into the ministry was a serious mistake. With slight knowledge of Christianity, he said, "they can impart very little instruction, and lacking Gospel power [they] produce unhealthy results." Spencer Lewis viewed the matter somewhat differently. He was convinced that native preachers who were not literary men were capable of rendering good service. Those whom he had used in West China, he stated, were earnest and zealous, were becoming acquainted with the Scriptures, and were "constantly increasing in efficiency."¹⁷⁹

There were a few defections from the ranks of the ministry. At the 1875 annual meeting of the Central China Mission a committee reported that a certain pastor "had induced persons to connect themselves with the Church as inquirers by promising them help in litigation at the civil courts," and on this charge he was excluded from the ministry. At another time one of the ordained men of the Foochow District, who had been giving much of his time to the practice of medicine in which he consulted the spirits of divination, became offended because his Presiding Elder presented his case to the Conference, and refused to go to his appointment.¹⁸⁰

Results of the Missions.—While growth of membership of the Church in China was very slow it is significant that some converts were made from all classes of the Chinese people. Year after year inquirers from among the litterati presented themselves at the chapels and churches and a few became believers, although it was not until after 1890 that any considerable number of students or literary graduates entered into membership. In his annual report for 1893 Huong Pau-seng, Presiding Elder of the Hokchiang (Futsing) District, Foochow Conference, stated:

Twenty-one persons, fifteen of whom are men between nineteen and forty, belonging to three of the oldest and most distinguished literary families in the city, have been baptized and openly professed faith in Christ. Three of them are first-degree men, and the others are studying for it. Several are exceedingly zealous in proclaiming the good news, and it is hoped God will call them to the ministry.¹⁸¹

There were many cases of opium smokers who, having tested the power of the Gospel to free them from their addiction, embraced the faith and united with the Church. Shopkeepers, merchants, farmers, rickshaw pullers, and students—all were numbered among Christian believers.

Men and women who rose in the churches to confess faith in Christ were often charged with becoming Christians "for the sake of the foreigners' rice." The measure of truth in the charge was sufficient to make the missionaries cautious in accepting applicants for baptism. Rigorous tests were applied. Had the candidate destroyed his idols? What evidences of spiritual concern did he give? Did these evidences clearly surpass all possible hopes of material gain? Was he steadfast and firm in his stand against the opposition of family and friends? Was he definitely interested in the reading and study of the Bible? Did he possess clear witness of the presence and power of the Spirit in his daily life? Only when such tests were met was the candidate baptized and admitted to membership.¹⁸²

An evaluation of the China Christian missions must take into account their effect upon the individual and the community. Did the lives of the men and women who professed to be Christian give evidence that they had been with Christ and learned of Him? Did they show in their lives the fruit of the Spirit—love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, and temperance? Did they influence community life, lift its moral tone? Judged by such questions the sincerity and depth of conversion of many was beyond dispute. "The moral quality of the results," said Bishop Fowler, "does not suffer by comparison with the converts and disciples of any age, or any land . . ."

J. Campbell Gibson, missionary of the Free Church of Scotland, bears witness to the changes wrought in individuals and the community:

We have seen unclean lives made pure, the brokenhearted made glad, the false and crooked made upright and true, the harsh and cruel made kindly and gentle. . . . We have seen the abandoned gambler become a faithful and zealous preacher of the Gospel. . . . We see many Chinese Christians who were once narrow and avaricious, giving out of their hard-earned means a month's wages, or more, yearly, to help the church's work. . . . And the men and women and children who are passing through these experiences are gathering in others, and building up one by one a Christian community . . .¹⁸³

The vitality of the Christian movement was in no wise more strikingly demonstrated than in its creation of a new and influential unit in Chinese society, the Christian family. The Chinese family was sui generis, deeply rooted in age-old custom and tradition. Powerful as these ties were, within a generation they were displaced in Christian households by an institution distinctively different and vigorous enough to perpetuate itself in successive generations. Wherever Christian churches were planted, within a few years Christian families were established to become centers of light and life throughout the community. To print a catalogue of Methodist family dynasties whose members made significant contribution to the civic, political, and religious life of China would overtax the limits of these pages. One of the most remarkable and widely known was that of the Hu family whose founder, Hu Ngieng-su, was one of the early converts of the Foochow Mission. He was the father of six sons who attained positions of leadership in the Church.

After about 1865 noteworthy results were achieved in the training of leaders. When Wiley returned to China as Bishop in 1877 he was much encouraged by what had been accomplished. Writing from Foochow, the Bishop said that nothing so impressed him with "the reality, strength, and permanence" of the work as the men who had been raised up by God as ministers of the Church.

There are now thirty of them in the conference. At the head stand the five presiding elders, staid, thoughtful, pious, experienced men. Behind these are the five newly-made elders, younger men, yet fine looking, educated in the Chinese sense; pious, earnest, devoted to their work. Behind these again are the five deacons, another class, which will be fully qualified by a few years of experience to come forward to leadership. Then, behind these, are fifteen probationers, all having had experience in preaching, and all promising men; and then behind these, I see stand a class of bright, pious, hopeful young men, students in our theological school, who are hastening to take their places in this young conference; and then, outside of all these, about thirty or forty local preachers of very fair ability, whom we are using as supplies.¹⁸⁴

No effort was made in China during this period by any denominational group for a central coordinating missionary agency. The area and the population of the Empire were so large and the total missionary personnel was proportionately so small that division of territory among the denominations was not imperative. It is doubtful whether in these early decades a central agency could have allocated territory more strategically than was decided upon by the several missions acting separately. However, early in the period the need for cooperative effort in literature production and in education became so urgent that joint efforts were readily agreed upon. Cooperative action received encouragement through the actions of two Conferences in Shanghai.*

* The first of these was the General Conference of the Protestant Missionaries of China, May 10-24, 1877, with 142 in attendance. Almost all problems confronting the China missions were discussed, including education, literature, medical work, and attitudes toward the native religions. Resolutions on some subjects were adopted and several continuation committees appointed. The second conference was held on May 7-20, 1890, with 445 delegates present, all missionaries. The basic work of the conference was done mostly by committees, with general discussion of papers and reports. Resolutions were adopted; an appeal drafted for 1,000 missionaries to be sent to China in the

In estimating the achievements of Christian missions in China, their contribution to social reform must be recognized. Methodist participation in organizations for reform was less than it otherwise would have been by reason of the brief tenure of a majority of the missionaries. They were not in China long enough to become acquainted and to affiliate themselves with the interdenominational organizations for reform.

Opium smoking was the most widely indulged vice in China. The devastation wrought by the drug to body, mind, and soul was beyond estimate. In the city of Foochow alone there were hundreds of registered "opium dens." The Foochow Mission from an early date had a standing committee on opium smoking, and the Foochow Conference at its first session (December, 1877) approved the organization of an Anti-Opium Society. The twelve hundred Church members in the Conference were "all of one mind that no opium-smoker should be admitted" to membership. The next year the organizing committee reported:

The Committee . . . obtained the appointment of Committees from the American Board [of Commissioners for Foreign Missions] and English Church Missions, and in conjunction with said Committees called a public meeting of members of the three churches . . . at which the Foochow Anti-Opium Society was organized. . . . Several public meetings have been held during the year. The Society has supported three men . . . while they were learning . . . the methods of treatment to be pursued in the cure of opium smokers; and has about completed arrangements for . . . establishing an Anti-Opium Hospital . . . where two of these men will receive patients for treatment. . . .¹⁸⁵

The anti-opium interest and activity of the Foochow Conference continued throughout the period (1877-95). The 1883 Minutes of the North China Mission contain a report of its Committee on Temperance and Opium which declares the evil effects of opium to be "greater than those of alcohol." "Our church," it says, "must exert all its influence against its use," and "endeavor to put an end to the traffic." In Kutien, of the first seventeen Christians fourteen had been opium smokers "but every one had abandoned the habit, and . . . they would not think of receiving any one" who had not done so.¹⁸⁶

The acute suffering and crippling physical effects of footbinding were matters of early concern to Christian missionaries, yet not all were ready to oppose the cruel practice. There were those who warned against interfering with the customs of a country when "no moral question is involved," as though crippling the body does not involve a moral question. It was asserted that the custom had nothing whatever "to do with the Gospel" and that missionaries had enough opposition to contend with without creating a new source of antagonism among the literati and the commercial class. While the next five years; and a permanent committee on conference authorized, thus laying the basis for a continuing organization. The conference strengthened the morale of the missionary group as a whole and developed a sense of unity which had not previously existed.—Records of the General Conference of the Protestant Missionaries of China, 1877; ibid., 1890.

more Christian view steadily gained ground action against the custom in some cases was fainthearted. In Foochow when the Girls' Boarding School was established the mission resolved that there should be no cramped feet among the pupils. Within a few days three of the six girls were withdrawn. Of the three who remained, "one was of the large-footed class; the second a preacher's daughter whose feet were so hopelessly crushed it was utterly useless to think of unbinding them; and the third, a sister of the same preacher, remained, on condition we would furnish her with white stockings and foreign slippers." "We at once concluded," said Sarah H. Woolston, "the feet were not of the first importance, and if they were, it was a matter beyond our control." As for the day schools, she continued, we "have found it much easier in the suburbs of Foochow to keep . . . [them up] with the small, rather than the large-footed children. The latter are ready on the slightest opening to go off to work, while the former on account of their general helplessness have time to read."¹⁸⁷ The Misses Porter and Brown were much more forthright when in 1872 they founded the Methodist girls' school in Peking and made unbound feet a qualification for admission. Older missionaries had told them that if they undertook to do so they would never be able to establish a school for girls in China. But they were women of independent minds and strong moral convictions and they decided—to use their own words—"to unbind the feet, and in so doing emphasize our teaching that the body is the temple of the true God and must not be profaned." In time the Peking girls' school (later the Mary Porter Gamewell Girls' School) "grew to be the largest girls' school in China."¹⁸⁸

At the 1876 meeting of the Foochow Mission, attended by five missionaries, eleven ordained and forty-seven unordained native preachers, a resolution was adopted forbidding the practice of binding the feet in families connected with the Church.¹⁸⁹

By 1895 footbinding, although still widely practiced, had come into disrepute among a very large number of Chinese people. Within a few years the government gave official sanction to the reform, although few wives of officials unbound their feet. The movement against footbinding became nationwide, led largely by Chinese, many of whom had been inspired by missionary influence.¹⁹⁰

No Chinese custom moved the hearts of missionaries more than the common practice of infanticide. Erastus Wentworth commented:

A family in good circumstances will tolerate two or three daughters; but the poorer classes destroy them without compunction and without ceremony. Fathers and midwives believe themselves to be doing a meritorious act in quietly suppressing existence at the threshold by immersion in the nearest vessel of water, or exposure by night to the chance mercies of the public highways, with the surer hazards of cold and starvation . . . [It is said] that in the rural villages there was 'scarcely a house in which one or more had not been destroyed;’ that . . . [one woman] out of a family of seven daughters, had destroyed five¹⁹¹

In Fukien Province, where it was especially practiced, Mrs. S. L. Baldwin observed after eight years’ residence in the area that “the rule . . . [was] to destroy the female children, the exception to save them.”

One or two girls in a family may be saved; more are regarded as a nuisance. . . . I have been in the habit for some years of asking the women . . . about their children, and almost all of them that have had girls will tell me that they have drowned one, two, or three. Worse still, I have to say that in all these eight years I have met but one mother that showed the slightest sorrow for the loss of her girls.¹⁹²

Estimates of the proportion of infant girls sacrificed in the several provinces varied widely, ranging from one in twenty to one in ten. The motive was economic. Parents too poor to rear and later support daughters had no alternative than to sell them into a life of slavery or dispose of them at birth.¹⁹³

Needless to say, infanticide was odious to Christian missionaries. However, no concerted effort was made to combat the practice and so far as evidence is available it was not condemned in public meetings of the missions. Seemingly they found that indirect methods and personal influence were more effective in dealing with this evil which the Chinese were loath to admit really existed. Once taught the Christian emphasis on the value of individual life, the convert, too, recognized the evil of the practice. The establishment of orphanages for foundlings was not too general a practice of Protestant missionaries. Even so, within this period at least two asylums were opened by the Methodists and orphans were otherwise looked after as free boarders in the girls’ schools, or by placement in homes. The non-Christian community soon recognized the Christian mission as a refuge for daughters, and there are many accounts in the annual reports of unwanted babies being left on their doorsteps.

The sacrifice of infant females was symbolic of the status of womanhood in China. Confucius taught that women are human beings but “of a lower state than men. They never can attain a full equality with men.” He held that the “aim of female education, therefore, is perfect submission—not cultivation and the development of the mind.” Under the influence of Confucian teaching, and age-long custom antedating the times of the sage, Chinese women were held in abject subjection and subordination in a score of ways.*

Women were allowed no part in the determination of their marriage, decisions being made by their grandparents, or, if the grandparents were not living, by their parents. After marriage wives were under the complete domination of their husbands and their parents-in-law, in many cases subjected to the humiliation of concubinage. When widowed they could be sold into concubinage by their in-laws. Mrs. Gee, the oldest daughter of an official family, who had married a Christian and later, after the death of her husband, attended the Hitt Bible Training School and become a capable Bible woman, barely escaped this fate. ". . . the arrangements had been made," she told the missionary who rescued her, "for me to be sold to an official as a concubine for $300 and my little daughter was to be sold as a daughter-in-law in a family for $80. They were coming after us the next day . . ." There were many such cases.¹⁹⁴

* A fair appraisal of woman’s lot in China would have to state that despite the operating principle of inferiority and all the customs that sprang from it, the Chinese woman was not necessarily unhappy. To a degree, at least, she ruled her household, and as mother-in-law she gained status and certain rights.

Education was denied girls and women on the ground that they were incapable of learning. Reading and book learning, it was contended, would unfit them for their duties as wives and for manual work. To read and write was considered useful for boys but not worth-while for girls. Very few Chinese women in this period were able to read. Mrs. John (Lucy H.) Ing, Methodist missionary, wrote in 1874: "When we came to Kiukiang three years since we could not, by diligent inquiry, find a woman who could read . . ." The opposition to the establishment of schools for girls by the missionaries was almost unbelievable.¹⁹⁵

By patient, persistent effort Christian missions did much to change the conditions affecting women. The principle of unequal rights for men and women, they insisted, was unjust. They opposed the subjection of women to parents, in-laws, and husbands. They prohibited polygamy and concubinage among church members. They demanded Christian marriage of their converts. They opened doors to freedom by employing women workers. They practiced equality of the sexes by doing away with the custom of placing women behind partition walls in the churches and seated men and women together in services of worship. Most of all, Christian missions everywhere established schools for girls. The missionaries were as much interested in girls' schools as in those for boys; facilities for girls' education were equal to those for boys; and in general the curricula of the two types of schools were much the same. By 1895 girls' schools were widely scattered over China and large numbers of parents—both mothers and fathers—cherished the hope that their daughters as well as their sons might have the advantages of an education. Waiting lists for vacancies had to be drawn up in the larger city schools. That this great advance in the national life must be credited to Christian missions is evidenced by the fact that the first government school for women was not opened until 1887.

Various other customs indicative of women's inferiority to men were likewise eliminated by Christian missions. At an early date it became common practice at baptism to change the given names of men and boys. When the first women were baptized question was raised whether they, too, should have Christian names. Some of the Chinese pastors said they did not think this necessary. At this point Mother Hu arose in the assembly and said quietly, "Of course the women would have Christian names! Woman in Christ has a name." And then, with emphasis, "If you brethren cannot find names for these sisters I can!" And she did. After this incident no more question was raised about Christian names for Christian women.¹⁹⁶

The life and the thought of the common people of China were plagued with a superstitious belief in demons, of which one of the most feared was the fox demon. At the 1874 meeting of the Foochow Mission a spirited session was given to a consideration of current superstitions. Li Yu-mi in a discussion of the fox demon declared that the real demons in China were dirt and bad air, and concluded:

Use the broom! Clean the dirt out of your houses! Keep the cats and dogs and chickens and pigs outside, where they belong! Wash your whole bodies frequently with warm water! Poke some holes in your close houses; put in windows, and let in the fresh air of heaven! Do this, and you will not only be forever rid of the fox demon, but you will get rid of the itch at the same time!¹⁹⁷

The missionaries insisted on the strict observance of the Sabbath of which one feature was the wearing of fresh, clean clothes. Providing a change of clothing once a week meant also cleaner houses, and along with cleaner houses went cleaner door yards and streets in front of the houses, all of which contributed to better health and fewer cutaneous, ulcerous, and leprous diseases. They taught the people to whitewash the walls of their houses, within and without; to scour the floors of the schoolrooms and the churches; and to do away with the rubbish of the yards, alleys, and byways. Just such practical counsels as these of social hygiene constituted a not unimportant contribution of Christian missions to Chinese life.¹⁹⁸

Not least of the achievements of the missionaries was succeeding in what they set out to do—founding the Methodist Church in China. Where there was not one Methodist Society on their arrival in 1847, by the end of the century Methodism had approximately 160 local churches, many of the buildings erected and maintained—at least in part—by the Chinese believers themselves; and some hundred fifty halls and rented places which were the nuclei of future churches. In many cases, the Methodist Societies were as well organized as in America; they had their Quarterly Conferences, Classes, Sunday schools, Epworth Leagues, and temperance organizations. Native ministers were administering to the congregations; and delegates were being chosen and sent to the Foochow and North China Conferences and mission annual meetings. The women had their comparable organizations and met yearly at Conference time to discuss unofficially the problems and program of the Chinese Methodist Church.

There is slight evidence that the two and a half hundred Methodist missionaries sent to China in the second half of the nineteenth century concerned themselves with or were influenced in any marked way by the imperialistic ideology which as we have seen so definitely characterized the commercial and political thinking of the period.* That they were witnessing the beginnings and contributing to a new phase of a historical and religious movement of vast and unending significance they scarcely seemed aware. They saw their work in far more limited terms—the conversion of individual men and women and the planting in China of a Church patterned after that of which they were ministers and missionaries.

In 1895 the total Protestant Christian community constituted only a negligible fraction of the population. Communicant members of all denominations were estimated to number approximately 60,000 or about one in 7,500 of the inhabitants of the Empire. Of these approximately one in eight, counting full members only, were Methodists.

Measured in the terms thus stated, the results of the first fifty years were not highly impressive. It is only as the immensity of the task is considered, the obstacles recalled, and the paucity of the material and human resources set over against the superhuman undertaking, that the achievements of the period begin to be seen in perspective. Moreover, they cannot be statistically measured. Within the half century we have seen the beginnings of Annual Conferences, the founding of schools destined to grow into great colleges and universities, the publishing to the nation by the spoken word and the printed page the glad tidings of Christ's Gospel, and the inculcation in the minds of many thousands of Chinese not affiliated with the Church of Christian ideals to contradict conflicting principles of Buddhism and Confucianism. The Methodist Church had been rooted in the soil of China.

Expanding Program of Foreign Missions— India and Malaysia

ON SEPTEMBER 25, 1856, the Rev. William Butler* of the New England Conference, with his wife, Clementina Rowe Butler, and two of his children, arrived at Calcutta, India, commissioned by the Missionary Society to establish an India mission and appointed by Bishop Simpson as its Superintendent. After consulting with other missionaries and British officials concerning the opportunities for missionary openings in Banaras, Ghazipur, Lucknow, Kanpur (Cawnpore), Moradabad, and several other centers, Butler finally settled upon Bareilly, capital of Rohilkhand, in northwest India, as his headquarters. His field of mission operations was to include the provinces of Rohilkhand and Oudh,† which together had a population of more than 18,000,000 people. In a letter to Commissioner Tucker, in charge of the Banaras Division, who had strongly urged him to locate the mission in his Division, Butler gave as two principal reasons for choosing Bareilly that there was not enough unoccupied space in the Banaras Division while in Rohilkhand there was and that in Rohilkhand he could be sure that he would not “build on another man’s foundation.” He arrived in Bareilly on December 7, 1856, and on March 4, 1857, having settled in his headquarters, wrote to Dr. Durbin:

I have set up a place for preaching, and have two little congregations—one of about 8 to 10 persons attending the Hindoostanee—Sunday forenoon and Tuesday evening—and about 15 attending the English service on Sunday evening and Thursday evening. . . . We have a class meeting of six regular members, two natives, one East Indian (half blood) and three English or Americans.¹

* William Butler (1818-99) was born in Dublin, Ireland. Early orphaned, he was brought up by his great-grandmother. In his nineteenth year, while a member of the Church of Ireland, he experienced a Methodist conversion and immediately began to preach. He joined the Irish Conference in 1844 and was ordained elder in 1848. In 1850 he came to America and united with the New York Conference but was transferred immediately to the New England Conference and stationed at Williamsburg, Mass. He became much interested in missions and in 1852 published a Compendium of Missions. Widowed with three small children in 1854, he married Clementina Rowe, whom he had previously known in Ireland. After eight years and four months in India, he returned to the New England Conference. In 1869, after becoming secretary of the American and Foreign Christian Union, he removed to Passaic, N. J. In 1872 he was appointed Superintendent of the Mexico Mission. In 1879 he returned to the United States. He retired in 1892.—William Butler, The Founder of Two Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, by his daughter [Clementina Butler], passim.

† The area later was enlarged to include Kumaon and the mountain district of Garhwal.—J. M. Thoburn, My Missionary Apprenticeship, p. 50.

An American Methodist mission* had been planted in India.

What course of events led up to the establishment of this, the second mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the Orient? The General Missionary Committee meeting on May 3, 1847, gave some consideration to India as a possible new mission. The discussion resulted in the following action:

Resolved, that we look upon India as a most inviting & promising field for missionary enterprise and that we deem our Church called upon to establish missions there as soon as a sufficient amount of funds shall be provided for the purpose.²

As in the case of China years elapsed before anything further was done. The Corresponding Secretary reported in 1848 that Hindu shrines were doomed, and the next year that Christianity was "paving the way for the ultimate extinction of paganism" in India but still no specific action was taken toward establishing the mission. Though a substantial balance in the missionary treasury was announced in 1850, leading to the appropriation of $150,000. for extension of missionary work none of this 33 1/3 per cent increase was allocated for India. The joint meeting of the General Missionary Committee and Board, however, did request the Corresponding Secretary "to make inquiries concerning the best point for a mission in India" and to report the next year. In April, 1852, the Board voted that—with concurrence of the General Committee and the Bishop in charge of foreign missions—$5,000. be appropriated "to commence a mission in India," but the General Committee did not concur. Seven months later (November, 1852) by action of the General Committee, the Board, and the Bishops, an India mission was authorized, to be begun "as soon as the Bishop can command the services of the proper men," and for it $7,500. was appropriated.³

This was only the first hurdle. More difficult still was that of finding "the proper men." The appropriation was renewed in 1853, in 1854, and in 1855. Not until 1855 was the search for a leader successful. James M. Thoburn wrote, "I have heard of so many men who were asked, and who for various reasons were unable to accept the post, that I incline to the opinion that no other prominent post in all the history of our Church was ever declined by so many nominees." Finally on October 10, 1855, five months after an appeal by Dr. Durbin appeared in the Christian Advocate and Journal William Butler offered himself as a candidate and was accepted. A farewell meeting was held on the evening of April 8, 1856, in Lynn Common Church, Lynn, Massachusetts, where Butler had been pastor for two years. In the presence of a large congregation Durbin delivered to him his commission, his letter of instruction, and his passport, and on April 9 he sailed with his family on the steamer Canada for Calcutta.

* The Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society (English) established a mission in Madras in March, 1817. Between 1817 and 1901 the Wesleyans organized seven Districts: (1) Madras; (2) Negapatam and Trichinopoly; (3) Mysore; (4) Hyderabad; (5) Bengal; (6) Lucknow and "Benares"; and (7) Bombay and "Panjab." A personal link between the Wesleyan and the American Methodist India missions may be noted in the fact that James Lynch, the first Wesleyan missionary to India, had in Ireland "laid his hands on . . . [the] youthful head" of William Butler and kindled in his heart a desire to become a missionary.—G. G. Findlay and W. W. Holdsworth, The History of the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society, V, 178 f., also Part II, chs. 3, 4.

The instructions given were brief and principally two: (1) the mission was to be solely to the native population "to preach the Gospel to those who have not heard" and all plans "must be devised with this end in view"; (2) to "regard the preaching of the word to the people as the principal efficient means of their awakening and conversion, and all other means as only auxiliary."⁴

THE BUTLER ERA, 1856-64

The Butlers were hospitably received in India. In marked contrast to the hostility shown toward the early missionaries to China by officials and people, the Indian people, in general, as well as British officialdom, were cordial and cooperative. Typical of the attitude of British officers was that of the judge at Bareilly who took the Butler family into his home and entertained them until they could obtain a house and furnish it. He expressed delight at their coming since he was a "strong believer in Christian missions" and "in the power of the Gospel to reach the hearts of the heathen."⁵

On March 10, 1857, Butler sent to Bishop Simpson and the Board a formal report of the region he had chosen, the number of missionaries required "to occupy the field," the distribution which should be made of them, and the order in which the several centers should be taken up. The proposed stations and the number of missionaries required for each on a "very moderate calculation" were: Lucknow, eight missionaries; Bareilly, four; Fyzabad, three; Shahjahanpur, two; Moradabad, four; Budaun, two; Pilibhit, two; in all, twenty-five missionaries.

I know that you cannot at once give me all the men I need. I only ask you to adopt my plan, and give me, promptly, as many men as I can retain the occupation of the field with—and then as soon as convenient fill up the outline. I want, then, eight men at once. . . . Give me these, and I will hold the ground until you can send the rest.⁶

This masterful plan,* thought out in great detail, formed the basis of organization of the India Mission and later of the North India Annual Conference. Of the stations named by Butler all but two—Fyzabad and Pilibhit—were promptly occupied and have remained as prominent centers of Methodist activity to this day.

Butler had scarcely become settled in Bareilly when India's first war for independence, the Sepoy Rebellion, broke out and the provinces of Oudh and Rohilkhand became the main theater of its operations. The first serious

* Butler insistently pressed this plan upon the Board. Durbin replied on May 22, 1857, following receipt of the plan, indicating that the Board considered Rohilkhand a favorite missionary field but that a purpose ought not be announced to occupy the province of Oudh or the city of Lucknow as it probably could not be done "in force for several years, if indeed . . . at all."—Butler-Durbin Correspondence of the Clementina Butler MS. Collection, in the Correspondence Files of the Division of World Missions.

uprising took place in Meerut beginning on May 10, 1857, with the slaughter of numerous Europeans. On May 11 arson, plunder, and murder caused the fall of Delhi. Rebellion spread rapidly and British officers urged Butler to leave Bareilly with his family lest disaster overtake them. For a time he refused but he yielded to persuasion and on May 18 fled to Naini Tal in the mountains seventy miles distant, leaving Joel T. Janvier* and his wife to care for the little flock of adherents and to guard the mission property. The flight was none too soon. On Sunday evening, May 31, the outbreak came.

During the closing prayer [of the evening service] the guns opened fire, and the awful slaughter began. The rebels went to the mission premises, set fire to the house, and expressed their regret at not finding the missionary. Miss Maria Bolst, the first woman member of our Mission in India, was beheaded by a Sepoy just as she fled to the mission house Fully one half of those who had attended the services were murdered, in some cases with great cruelty.⁷

The nawab of Rohilkhand erected a gallows and published a standing offer of five hundred rupees for the arrest of Butler or the delivery of his head. The mission house was burned to the ground, the Superintendent's library destroyed, and the little group of servants and Christians either slain or dispersed. Fortunately Janvier and his wife succeeded in reaching Allahabad in safety. For months Butler was so cut off from the outside world that Alexander Duff, eminent Scotch Presbyterian pioneer missionary, published an obituary of him. When danger at Naini Tal became imminent, on August 4, they moved on to Almora. Delhi was retaken from the insurrectionists on September 20 and soon after Butler, with his wife, ventured to come down to the city from the mountain and thence proceeded to Meerut, where they remained for two months. In the meantime Ralph Pierce and James L. Humphrey of the Black River Conference with their wives had arrived at Calcutta on September 22. There they learned of the Sepoy Rebellion and the impossibility of continuing their journey. In March, 1858, at Agra, they met Butler who came down from Meerut for the meeting. Leaving there, soon all returned to Meerut. Since peace had not yet been restored in Rohilkhand and Oudh, they returned to Naini Tal.⁸ Here temporary headquarters were established.

The younger Missionaries devoted much time to the language. Services were kept up in both English and Hindustani, and open-air preaching in the vernacular was regularly done. Two schools for native boys and girls were opened. The first real Church of the Mission was improvised from a sheep house which was rented for $4.36 . . . a month, and renovated, and cleaned, and white-washed by

* Joel T. Janvier was born a Hindu at Banda, in Bundelkhand, about 1834. He was converted in his youth and was educated in the American Presbyterian Orphanage at Allahabad and became a teacher in their mission. On Butler's request his services were made available to the Methodist mission and he was licensed as a Local Preacher. (Thirty-ninth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1857], p. 59.) At the organization of the India Mission Annual Conference (1864) he was admitted on trial and elected to elder's orders. (Forty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. [1864], pp. 93, 94.) He was physically a strong man, had a good mastery of English, was an effective preacher, and in every way an efficient Christian worker. In his old age he became completely blind but even then, despite this limitation, continued to render excellent service.—Sixty-sixth Ann. Rep. M. S. (1884), p. 126; William Butler, The Land of the Veda . . . , pp. 214-20; J. E. Scott, History of Fifty Years . . . , p. 9.

the Missionaries themselves, . . . and dedicated . . . to the service of God by prayer. In October, the Commissioner, Major [Henry] Ramsay, laid the corner stone of a new chapel on land eligibly situated, which had been purchased for the Mission.⁹

Butler was impatient to return to Bareilly but the British commander was cautious, urging the necessity of clearing the region of all straggling mutineers. Finally permission was given and the Superintendent revisited the city on August 28. Before he had been there twenty-four hours a subscription had been started for the reopening of the mission. Butler promised, as soon as work in Lucknow was begun, to resume the Bareilly program.

From Naini Tal as temporary headquarters lines were almost at once extended in several directions.

In 1859 six missionaries, five of whom were married men, arrived at Calcutta. Of this group James Baume and wife of the Rock River Conference were the first arrivals, reaching India on June 27. The second contingent—Charles W. Judd and wife of the Wyoming Conference; Joseph R. Downey* and wife, North Indiana Conference; Edwin Wallace Parker and wife, Vermont Conference; James W. Waugh and wife, Southern Illinois Conference; and James M. Thoburn, Pittsburgh Conference—arrived on August 21.† All six men were ordained preachers of recognized ability, consecrated to their mission, and prepared to make contribution to the planning of the India program. Three—Waugh, Parker, and Thoburn—were destined to continue in missionary service throughout the period of forty years and to have a large part in the mission's founding and development.

The first annual meeting‡ was convened on September 4, 1859, in Lucknow. Concerning this session Parker wrote in his "Journal" "that it was a time never to be forgotten by anyone present, as it was from beginning to end one continued contention, into which all . . . were more or less drawn before the close." Butler's office as Superintendent, wrote James H. Messmore in his Life of Edwin Wallace Parker, "made him virtually bishop, presiding elder,

* Joseph R. Downey became ill a few days after his arrival, and died on Sept. 16. He preached but one sermon in India. By prior agreement, his wife, the future Mrs. James M. Thoburn, remained to carry on his work.

† In addition to these recruits four men of English birth, already in India, volunteered in 1858-59 for missionary service. Josiah Parsons, the son of English Methodist parents, who for several years had been working under the Church Missionary Society, on representations from India was admitted on trial at the 1857 session of the Northwestern Indiana Conference, transferred to the New York Conference, and appointed to the India Mission. Before the close of 1859 he resigned. (Thirty-ninth Ann. Rep. M. S. [1857], p. 59; J. M. Thoburn, India and Malaysia, p. 229.) Wesley Maxwell, who had been in the British army, remained with the mission for a few months only. J. A. Cawdell, a British Wesleyan, served until 1864 as a Local Preacher. In that year he was admitted on trial to the India Mission Conference and appointed to Sambhal, where he continued until the 1869 Conference when, because of ill health, he was located at his own request. (Minutes, India Mission Conference, 1864, pp. 28-32; ibid., 1869, p. 52; J. M. Thoburn, My Missionary Apprenticeship, pp. 233 f.) Samuel Knowles, when Butler came to India, was in a volunteer British cavalry company. He decided to resign and join up with the Methodist India Mission. For almost forty-five years he continued in effective service. He was a successful evangelist and a "superior scholar in the languages of India."—J. L. Humphrey, Twenty-One Years in India, pp. 65 f.

‡ A meeting of the three first missionaries in India took place in August, 1858, but this could not be considered on a par with the annual meetings held, beginning the following year, which brought together the missionaries from their distant stations for counsel and reappointment. At the 1858 meeting Butler drew up a request to the Missionary Society for twenty more missionaries and promised to issue a "Statement and Appeal" to India residents for provision of homes for the hoped-for recruits.

finance committee, treasurer, and corresponding secretary." He was energetic, "impetuous, strong-willed, and at times changeable." He was by birth and early training a European, with old-world ideas of prestige and authority, disposed to make the most of his official powers. The missionaries, with two or three exceptions, "were American Methodist preachers with New World ideas of freedom and independence."* In India "they found themselves disfranchised, without authoritative voice in the management of affairs, and with no law or guide but the will of the superintendent." The chief subjects of discussion were on the nature of the work to be undertaken, requirements governing reception of members, proportionate emphasis on evangelism and on schoolwork, the problem of vernacular or Anglo-vernacular schools, and like topics.¹⁰ Much earlier Durbin had detected a self-willed, autocratic attitude on the part of the Superintendent and had written, "I fear you do not or may not employ your brethren in the administration as much as they might be employed," and had gone on to make specific suggestions as to how this might be done. This counsel, however, had had little or no effect on the Superintendent, and his attitude in the annual meeting provoked acute controversy.

At the request of the mission Butler corresponded with Durbin asking for an official statement of the Board and the Bishops in answer to several questions including who in the missions was to be considered qualified "to give Counsel." Under date of December 21, 1859, Bishops Janes and Simpson wrote a joint letter:

We recommend the most free and full consultation, and the acquirement of all possible information, while the decisions[s] must rest with the legal members of conference. . . . permit us to recommend you to avail yourself to the utmost possible extent of the assistance of the various members of the mission as Secretaries, or Treasurers, and in whatever other way they may lighten your labours in these matters, and leave you more time for your preaching, and superintending the general interests of the Mission.

* * * *

We trust . . . that you may act in the spirit of harmony and brotherly love. . . . differences should never create any unkindness or alienation of feeling.

More correspondence† of much the same tenor passed back and forth between the missionary office and the Superintendent, continuing up to the time when Butler left the field.¹¹

* Scott's comment on this meeting is somewhat less critical than Messmore's. He says: "The majority of the men . . . were considerably annoyed and embarrassed by the new regime under which they found they had little or no authority in the administration of affairs, for the deliberations and discussions of the Conference could end in no conclusions not subject to the sanction and approval of the Authorities at Home, whose representative was present in the person of the Superintendent."—J. E. Scott, op. cit., p. 74.

† For example, as one of numerous letters in the voluminous correspondence, Durbin wrote on Aug. 25, 1862, in a communication marked "confidential" and "not of record": ". . . there has been in your mission, occasionally, and to a greater or less degree, a feeling of uneasiness owing to the power and privileges of the Superintendent, & sensitiveness in regard to the manner of exercising them. . . . The problem for you to solve therefore, is, so to execute the office of Superintendent, as not to be feeble or deficient, & yet to show deference & respect to the opinions & feelings of our younger American Brethren."—Butler-Durbin Correspondence.

At the first annual meeting eleven missionaries were appointed by Butler to six stations: Lucknow, Shahjahanpur, Bareilly, Moradabad, Bijnor, and Naini Tal. Working with the missionaries were four native Local Preachers, three native Exhorters, and eight native teachers. Between January 1, 1861, and the close of 1863 twenty-five additional missionaries arrived* which made possible considerable extension of operations. During this period appointments were made to three more stations:† Budaun, Sitapur, and Lakhimpur.

At the end of the first two years the Superintendent could report that Comfortable homes have now been provided, chapels built, schools organized, native teachers and preachers found and trained, orphans collected, the confidence and sympathy and princely aid of the English community secured, native congregations collected at all our seven stations, and small native Churches organized with each of our means of grace in operation.

In addition to setting up the city programs several of the missionaries pushed out into surrounding regions in Methodist itinerant spirit so that in 1860 the Gospel was preached in not less than 250 towns and villages. The occupied stations were widely separated, each missionary approximately fifty miles from his colleague, set down in the midst of a vast population of from 800,000 to 2,000,000 souls. In three of the centers the Methodist mission represented the only Christian ministry.¹²

THE NINE STATIONS

The nine stations that were first occupied were opened in the following order: 1858, Naini Tal and Lucknow; 1859, Bareilly, Moradabad, Bijnor, and Shahjahanpur; 1860, Budaun; 1861, Lakhimpur and Sitapur. It is quite impossible to get from the sources a clear picture of the stationing and terms of service of the missionaries during these early years. Appointments were presumably made at the annual meeting. But no annual meeting was held in 1860 or in 1862. It was considered to be within the province of the Superintendent to transfer a missionary at any time from one station to another for reasons that seemed to him desirable or necessary. For one or another cause—most frequently for reasons of health—numerous shifts were made without systematic record of time or place.

Bareilly, chosen by Butler as his place of residence and the mission headquarters, had a population of approximately 100,000. Here the Superintendent

* On March 11, 1861, a group of six arrived in Calcutta: Henry Jackson and wife, New York Conference; Jsaiah L. Hauser and wife, Wisconsin Conference; James H. Messmore, Michigan Conference; and Miss Libbie A. Husk. In October, 1861, Miss Husk married J. H. Messmore. Also in 1861 John T. Gracey and wife, Philadelphia Conference, arrived in India. In 1862 another group of six arrived: D. W. Thomas and wife, Black River Conference; and J. D. Brown and wife and W. W. Hicks and wife, East Baltimore Conference. They were followed on Jan. 21, 1863, by a party of nine: Thomas J. Scott and Henry Mansell with their wives, Pittsburgh Conference; Dr. and Mrs. Thomas S. Johnson, North Indiana Conference; Peachy T. Wilson, Southern Illinois Conference, and the Misses Sarah E. White (who married the widowed Ralph Pierce), and Emma C. Porter, teachers. (Miss Porter withdrew from the mission in 1864.) Later in 1863 Martha Terry and Mary Whitcomb arrived.

† In India the term station was used, not in contradistinction to Circuit to designate a single city appointment, but as the center of a large area of dense population with numerous preaching places. The station was the headquarters of the missionary from which he itinerated at intervals throughout the civil district to which he was assigned.—J. E. Scott, op. cit., p. 52.

had secured in 1857 the first property to be owned by the Methodist Episcopal Church in India. In February, 1859, Humphrey,* who had been appointed to reoccupy the station, reached Bareilly. The destruction of nearly all the European bungalows by the Sepoy mutineers, including the mission residence, had left few buildings in the city fit for occupancy. The free use of the Kashmir Palace (Kashmir Kothi) with its outbuildings was offered by the government and in these dilapidated quarters the missionary took up his residence. He was fortunate in having as his native helper Joseph Fieldbrave,† whose aid as a bazaar preacher and assistant in building the needed mission houses proved invaluable. Within a few weeks a school was organized in a spare room of the old palace with eight pupils—three orphan boys, Fieldbrave's girl and boy, and three others. From time to time inquirers appeared, none of whom at first manifested deep interest, but one evening while preaching in a crowded bazaar Humphrey noticed a young man who seemed intensely concerned. A meeting with him was arranged and a long conversation was held. This young Mohammedan teacher exhibited constantly deepening interest until finally he requested baptism. For a week the missionary demurred, urging him to be patient and to inquire more thoroughly, that he might be doubly sure that he knew what he was doing. His relatives did their best to dissuade him. His wife sent him word that she would not continue to live with him or allow him to have possession of his son. Nevertheless, he had made his decision and was determined to abide by it. Sometime previous to June 10, 1859, Zahur ul Haqq,‡ the first Methodist convert in Bareilly and probably the first in India, received Christian baptism.§

* James Lorenzo Humphrey (1829-1910) was born in northern New York on Aug. 11, 1829. In 1850 he was married to Emily Jane Trussel, a daughter of an influential family of St. Lawrence County, N. Y. In 1852 he was admitted on trial to the Black River Conference and appointed to Hopkinton, Potsdam District. After serving several other charges he was sent to India in 1857. He returned to America on his first furlough in 1864, studied medicine, and in 1867 was awarded the M.D. degree by Albany Medical College. Returning to India he was given charge of several medical centers in and near Naini Tal under government support and in 1868 established a medical class for Indian women. He was the pioneer Methodist medical missionary in India, supremely interested in evangelism, a competent administrator of schools, "always dignified and scholarly in the pulpit, indefatigable in the discharge of his pastoral duties . . . [a] gracious, kindly and cultured gentleman . . . [whose] name was revered wherever it was known."—"Memoir," Minutes, North India Conference, 1911, p. 75; Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions; Gospel in All Lands, October, 1900, p. 462.

† Joseph Fieldbrave was a Eurasian who had been baptized at Kanpur and had worked with other missions before he made connection with the Methodist missionaries and asked to be received into the mission. "He served the Mission faithfully for nine years at Bareilly, Muradabad and Lucknow, and died in peace on the 20th of July, 1868."—J. E. Scott, op. cit., p. 48.

‡ Maulvi Zahur ul Haqq (1834-96) was born near Shahjahanpur of Mohammedan parentage. He was brought up in the faith of Islam, married, and had a son. When he became a Christian his wife was divorced according to Mohammedan law. He remarried in 1862. In 1870 he was ordained elder by Bishop Kingsley and appointed to Amroha. He also served the missions at Bareilly, Moradabad, Naini Tal, and Bijoor, and in 1882 was appointed Presiding Elder of the Amroha District, the first Indian Presiding Elder. He continued in the presiding eldership until 1892; then became pastor at Chandausi, where he died. He was characterized by Scott as "a faithful man, a good preacher, an able administrator and wise in counsel." Of his nine children by his second marriage, "three of his sons became Christian ministers, two Christian doctors, and two of his daughters married Christian doctors."—Minutes, India Mission Conference, 1870, p. 50; J. E. Scott, op. cit., pp. 48-50; James L. Humphrey, art., Epworth Herald, XIX (1908), 15 (Sept. 5), 363 f.; Robert G. Tuttle, "Seedtime and Harvest," World Outlook, XV (1954), 10 (October), 19 f.; Autobiography of Rev. Zahur-Al-Haqq, First Convert in the Mission of the Methodist Episcopal Church in India, pamphlet, translated from Hindustani by Mrs. E. J. Humphrey, pp. 8-18. Zahur ul Haqq in his printed account says that he was baptized on Sunday, June 15, 1859, but June 15 did not fall on a Sunday.

§ The tradition is that Zahur ul Haqq was the first Methodist convert in India but this claim cannot be fully substantiated by the evidence of existing sources. Ralph Pierce in a report of the Lucknow Mission, published in the Missionary Advocate in November, 1859, stated: "Early in April,

Early in the next year (1860) Humphrey was transferred to Budaun, but in 1861 he was back again in Bareilly. During his first period in the city a young Hindu "baboo" (gentleman), Ambica Charn, had become interested in his preaching and on his return continued attendance at the preaching services and conversed with Humphrey about the way of salvation. He finally resolved, despite the bitter opposition of relatives, to become a Christian. Although his wife left him because of his decision, he remained steadfast. As Ambica Charn Paul he became a Conference member and served many years as an influential minister.¹³

In 1863 Bareilly reported two schools, the Sadar Bazaar, a boys' school of sixty pupils, and the orphanage school of 140 girls. In 1864 there were thirty-five church members, of whom twenty were probationers. The average Sunday congregation numbered 160; Sunday-school pupils, 140.¹⁴

At Naini Tal, when the Butlers left in the latter part of 1858 to begin work in Lucknow, Samuel Knowles was placed temporarily in charge. At the 1859 mission meeting James M. Thoburn was appointed missionary-in-charge with Knowles as his associate. Within a few weeks Knowles was removed to fill a vacancy at a station on the plains.

The entire Naini Tal population did not exceed three thousand natives, some three hundred convalescent soldiers housed in military barracks, and in the summer season about sixty families of Europeans whose white houses were located on the margin of the lake and perched here and there on the surrounding mountainsides. A short distance above the houses was the bazaar—the business streets with their shops and markets and native dwellings. Here Thoburn found a strenuous schedule awaiting him.

The missionary was expected to hold two English services weekly, one at the barracks on Sunday afternoon, and another in the school-room in the evening. He was also to hold a Hindustani service in the morning, and to preach in the bazar at least two or three times a week. He was also expected to teach at least two hours daily in the school, and meantime vigorously prosecute the study of at least one Indian language.

A stone chapel was in course of construction when he arrived and he was also expected to supervise its completion.¹⁵

During the summer of 1861 opportunity was afforded for study, for review of mission prospects among the native population, and for making plans for extending the work. The cooperation of the government inspector materially aided the extension of schoolwork and development of outstations. The program was also so liberally supported by the British residents that within at our Friday evening meeting, while Joel [Janvier] was preaching, Hoosin Beg, an inquirer, was smitten with conviction, and that night found peace. Having been instructed in the way of the Lord more perfectly, and having maintained a consistent walk, on Sunday, June 12, with his wife, who is of like mind, and his daughter, . . . was baptized." This was a Mohammedan family. In the same issue of the Missionary Advocate Josiah Parsons, writing on June 16, 1859, reported that two men, one an Afghan soldier—formerly "a most bigoted Mussulman"—and the other a Sikh guru, had come forward "and made a public profession of their faith in Christ," and both were baptized by William Butler on May 29.—Ralph Pierce and Josiah Parsons, reports in Missionary Advocate, XV (1859), 8 (November), 57, 59.

Thoburn's second year the station not only became self-supporting, except for the missionary's salary, but even paid a surplus into the treasury. In November the missionary's heart was overjoyed by winning his first convert, a young man of nineteen who had attended a mission school but had never before manifested any spiritual interest. In a meeting at Naini Tal the Holy Spirit, as he expressed it, "came into his heart like a breath." At once he asked for baptism and on November 3, 1861, was publicly baptized in the mission church and given the Christian name John Barker, after that of Thoburn's college president. He later became "a valuable laborer in the North India Conference." About this same time an outstation was established at Haldwani, at the foot of the mountains, about fourteen miles from Naini Tal. A boys' school there had been turned over to the mission, and as this opened the way among the Tharus, a people dwelling in the great Terai swamp whom Thoburn was eager to reach, he closed the mission house for the winter and began work among them. He found numerous opportunities of preaching among them but after becoming acquainted with their habits, customs, and beliefs decided that to make Christians of them was something more "than a ten days' task."¹⁶ Through a combination of unfortunate circumstances Thoburn gave up the work and it was included in the Pilibhit appointment.*

During 1862-63 the work of the mission, particularly among the natives, "developed very encouragingly." The Sunday-school attendance increased, religious services in the mission church took on more of the Christian spirit and form, three converts were baptized, and the future seemed bright with promise. The death of Mrs. Thoburn† made it necessary for him to return to America with his child. He was absent from India on furlough from October, 1863, to the close of 1864. Fortunately Parker's presence in Naini Tal for health reasons made it possible for him to carry on. The Naini Tal station at the close of 1864 reported two communicants (natives), four schools with 114 pupils, and eighty persons in the English congregation.¹⁷

Lucknow, capital of the province of Oudh, fifth in size of India's cities, had a population in the fifties of approximately 250,000. The population included in addition to the native people a large group of military and an increasing European and Eurasian community. Work was begun in Lucknow in September, 1858, by Pierce, in association with Butler, with the assistance of Joel T. Janvier. They were substantially aided in their undertaking by the † James M. Thoburn was married to Minerva Rockwell Downey, widow of Joseph R. Downey, in 1861. She died in Naini Tal in October, 1862, leaving an infant son, Crawford. As Mrs. Thoburn had requested that the child should be taken to her mother in America as soon as practicable and as the father felt that the child could not be cared for suitably in India he requested a furlough. The Superintendent opposed the request, whereupon Thoburn asked for approval of the missionaries, who almost unanimously advised him to go without waiting for action of the Board. Butler, in correspondence with Durbin, charged Thoburn with "bad spirit" and characterized his procedure as "self-willed and stubborn." The correspondence was referred to the Bishops, and Bishops Simpson and James in a letter to Thoburn stated they believed him to be candid and sincere in his "understanding of the authority of the Mission," but "not sufficiently respectful and courteous" in his correspondence with the Superintendent.—Butler-Durbin Correspondence, Sept. 17, 1863; Bishops Simpson and James to James M. Thoburn, 1864 [month indecipherable], ibid.; J. M. Thoburn, "Wayside Notes: An Autobiography," Western Christian Advocate, April 5, 1911, p. 9.

British commissioner, Sir Robert Montgomery, who made over to the mission a headquarters, together with other buildings, fitted up at the expense of government and by subscriptions, which he personally raised and to which he contributed half. The properties were in the western part of the city, Hussainabad. Preaching was begun in both English and the vernacular. Preaching places were established in the bazaars, schools were opened, and a girls' orphanage and school in the charge of Mrs. Pierce. By 1860 work was also under way among soldiers in the eastern part of the city, with services in a chapel built by themselves. Regular preaching was scheduled three times a week; also prayer meeting, Class meeting, and Sunday school.

At the close of 1864 the station had thirteen church members; two Class meetings with an average attendance of fifteen; and six schools with an enrollment of 225 males and 150 females.¹⁸

Moradabad, a city of some 60,000 population, located about fifty-five miles northwest of Bareilly, was headquarters of a civil district of approximately a million people. The district contained numerous large towns, such as Chandausi and Sambhal, and many villages at intervals of a few miles. Butler wished to occupy Moradabad as one of his first centers and in 1858 appointed Parsons to it and asked that Humphrey assist him while he "was waiting for the way to open to go to Bareilly." Soon after their arrival they were visited by a representative of the Mazhabi Sikhs "who had heard of Christ from the Presbyterians in Fatehgarh, [some] one hundred miles away," and all wanted to become Christians. Such an opening could not be disregarded and in January the Parsons and the Humphreys visited the Mazhabi Sikhs at the village of Joa, about twenty miles from Moradabad. A large number were assembled, "eager for instruction" as to what they must do to be saved. After preaching to them the preachers prayed and all the Mazhabi Sikhs prostrated themselves, many repeating the words of the prayers. This was the beginning of a long-continued and fruitful work among these poverty-stricken and ignorant people.

Once settled in a house rented as a mission residence, Parsons began bazaar preaching. From the beginning the missionaries were treated respectfully and kindly. By the second quarter of 1859 the sense of strangeness of many had broken down and inquirers were taking the initiative in visiting the missionary's house and asking questions about religion and the Bible. An outstation was soon started at Babukhera, a school established, a congregation assembled, and a chapel built.¹⁹

During 1859-64 Moradabad was served by C. W. Judd (three years) and Humphrey (two years), and also—for brief periods—by Brown, Jackson, Parker, and Cawdell. In 1863 Henry Mansell* was also appointed and in 1864

* Henry Mansell (1834-1911) was born in Trumbull County, Ohio. He had his first conversion experience Nov. 7, 1851, called to be a missionary at seven years of age by reading "Little Henry and his Bearer." At twenty-five he graduated from Allegheny College and from that time until 1862 he was an itinerant in the Pittsburgh Conference. He married three times, Ann E. Benschoff, reappointed to the station. During these years village work was begun, bazaar preaching in the city was maintained, a second school of sixty pupils was opened, and a third at Sambhal, twenty miles distant, with Ambica Charn as the teacher. Zahur ul Haqq was assigned to Babukhera and Andrias, an Indian helper, to the Chamars at Kundarki. The year 1864 brought marked advance to the station as a whole. At its close eleven persons were received into membership by Bishop Thomson at Moradabad and twenty-seven were baptized at Babukhera. Butler's final statistical report showed six missionaries, two Indian preachers, six Exhorters, and seven teachers in connection with the mission. Full members numbered thirty: sixteen men, fourteen women; and twenty probationers. Three Class meetings had an attendance of fifty. The Sunday school averaged seventy. Two hundred and twenty-two pupils—188 boys and thirty-four girls—were enrolled in seven day schools.²⁰

Shahjahanpur, one of the larger of Rohilkhand's cities, was located close to the border of Oudh, surrounded "by a very populous district." James W. Waugh was commissioned by Butler to establish a mission in the city, where he arrived on October 1, 1859. At the close of the first year, in addition to one missionary (Baume, his successor), the station had a Local Preacher, and an Exhorter. It reported three probationers, a day school with eleven pupils, and a Sunday school of ten. Two houses had been acquired, with seven acres of land, altogether valued at Rs. 9,000. On his transfer to Shahjahanpur in 1861 Humphrey was much impressed by the possibilities which it offered:

I found a great field and many open doors of usefulness. I found it necessary to make some changes in the boys' school which had been opened on the Mission premises, and to enlarge its scope. I succeeded in obtaining a commodious building in the Bazar, and secured some capable teachers, and soon our attendance rose from about twenty to over one hundred. We carried on Bazar preaching regularly, as we had done in other places. In the course of the year several persons were baptized, and the work grew rapidly upon our hands.²¹

Butler's report for 1863 stated that "preaching in the bazars and chapel, and occasionally in the villages," was maintained faithfully; also that the bazaar school, in Brown's charge, with five teachers, was "in a flourishing state." Fourteen girl pupils were also reported. This year the boys' orphanage was moved to Shahjahanpur.* In 1864 in addition to four missionaries—two men and two women—the station had one native preacher, one Exhorter, and eight teachers. Members of the Church numbered twenty-two, the majority men, and six probationers. The two Class meetings reported an average 1861; Lula Benshoff, 1875; and Nancy Monelle, 1876. He was in India at the organization of the India Mission Annual Conference, 1864, later the North India Conference, and remained in this Conference until 1893 when he was transferred to the Northwest India Conference. In North India he served as Presiding Elder of the Moradabad and Oudh Districts and principal of Bareilly Theological Seminary. While in the Northwest India Conference he was Presiding Elder of the Mussooree District and principal of the Philander Smith Institute. He was a delegate to the General Conference of 1872. In 1877 he opened the Centennial High School at Lucknow, which later became Reid Christian College. He retired in 1902 but remained active in Mussooree and Bareilly until 1910 when he removed to Bristol, Conn.—Biographical File, Board of Missions Library.

attendance of twenty persons; the Sunday services, eighty-five; and the Sunday school, seventy-eight.²²

Bijnor, a small city of 13,000, located in a civil district of the same name, in the province of Rohilkhand, was 250 miles from Lucknow. Edwin W. Parker and wife, sent at the 1859 annual meeting to open the Bijnor station, held the first formal service out-of-doors under a mango tree. Parker's native helper, William, preached to the congregation. On Christmas Day the missionary attempted his first brief sermon in the vernacular. In a letter to the Board he gives his impression of his field of service:

The city is small, but there are several large towns, fifteen or twenty miles away, and a number of places having over five thousand inhabitants. Besides our work in Bijnor city, we have been in nearly all the important places of the district. This is an excellent field for itinerating, as we can seldom go three miles in any direction without finding a village, so that on our way to the cities we can preach continually.²³

In about a year a congregation of some fifty persons was attending chapel services and two day schools were in successful operation—thirty in the boys' school and twenty in the girls' school, the girls being taught by Mrs. Parker and the native preacher's wife. The Sunday school had forty pupils, enrolled in five classes. A mission residence had been completed as well.

The 1860 famine struck the Bijnor area particularly hard. Parker was called upon to serve as a member of the government local famine relief committee which required his giving much of his time to food distribution.

That year and the next both Parker and his wife suffered from serious illnesses, which made it necessary for them to leave the plains and spend considerable time at Naini Tal recuperating. While there Parker was appointed to the Lakhimpur Circuit to organize and administer the agricultural colony (Wesleypur). They bade farewell to Bijnor, feeling that a good beginning had been made. In two years they had "collected a little church of ten members and as many more probationers" and had "acquired much of the language." Before they departed Isaiah L. Hauser and wife had been assigned to the station. They were reappointed annually until 1867. Hauser's report for 1863 complained of the great difficulties he was having "with insincere inquirers"—men who professed to be influenced by good motives whose subsequent conduct proved them to be false. Converts in many instances were persecuted to such an extent that they threw themselves upon the missionary's support even though he had no funds to sustain them. He tried for a time the experiment of cooperating with them in mulberry cultivation and raising silk worms as a means of livelihood.²⁴

Bishop Thomson visited the boys' school in 1864 and was not too favorably impressed. He particularly questioned the use of non-Christian teachers.

The average attendance is eighty-nine, all boys. There are five teachers; namely, two Hindoos, two Mohammedans, and one Christian. The head master is a Hindoo, but the school is opened with prayer and the reading of the Bible. Pagan and Mussulman teachers will teach the Holy Scriptures as ours do Homer. An examination of the classes in the ordinary branches and the Bible was quite satisfactory.

Bijnor station in 1864 had four schools with an enrollment of 200 boys and ten girls. In addition to Hauser and his wife there were fourteen native workers—one preacher, two Exhorters, and eleven teachers. Church members numbered ten—seven men and three women; probationers, seven. The average Sunday congregation was twenty-four.²⁵

Budaun was located twenty-eight miles southwest of Bareilly. The district had a population of almost a million people and included several cities of some size of which Budaun with 30,000 was the largest. Early in December, 1859, James L. Humphrey and wife and Joseph Fieldbrave started on a tour of the region. At Budaun they were warmly greeted by two native Christians who said they had been praying for a long time that missionaries might come to their city. They were members of a small group which had been formed in Bareilly before the Sepoy Rebellion by a Church of England chaplain. The English magistrate also extended a welcome to the missionaries and gave them five hundred rupees toward the expense of opening a mission. An opportunity also was offered to purchase a well-located compound and a house suitable for a missionary residence. The lieutenant-governor of the Northwest Provinces, with his suite, arrived at Budaun at about the same time and several of the party made "handsome donations" to the mission. Under these circumstances Humphrey decided that a mission should be established at once and wrote to the Superintendent asking his approval. Butler assented, took steps to purchase the house, and authorized Humphrey to remove to Budaun as soon as possible. Short shrift was made of moving. Soon (1860) the Humphreys were in their new location and the house remodeled. Schools were opened for both boys and girls; a Sunday service begun for the eight or ten European families living in the city; and preaching places established at suitable centers. A "neat, commodious chapel" was built to serve for both Hindustani and English Sunday services and for the boys' day school. Before the beginning of the hot season the missionary made a quick trip into the western part of the district, preaching in some of the larger towns. At one place a bright young lad of about fifteen by the name of Chinman Lal, after hearing Humphrey preach, asked for tracts and later followed him to Budaun where the missionary engaged him as a teacher for a low-caste school. He soon became a Christian and was received into the North India Conference. Later he became a charter member of the Northwest India Conference. He was a composer of hymns that were sung all over North India.²⁶

Humphrey relates that in the fall of 1860 Samuel Knowles accompanied him on a visit to a vast mela on the Ganges about twelve miles from Budaun.

For five days, November 23-28, Humphrey, Knowles, and two native helpers preached daily, usually both in the morning and the evening, to great crowds of people, many of whom listened intently to the messages which they delivered. At the 1861 annual meeting Knowles was appointed to Budaun. For the second quarter of the year Butler reported:

Three days in the week he preaches in the bazars, where he has from seventy to one hundred hearers, and he speaks hopefully of 'the hearing ear' which the people have. He has two services on the Sabbath in our nice little chapel, where an average of seventy persons regularly attend. Among these are some native soldiers . . . and several of our schoolboys there willingly and regularly come to worship.

This year Budaun added another boys' school. The "chapel school" enrolled fifty-nine boys; the "city school," thirty-eight; and the girls' school, twenty-five. There was also a Sunday school. A Class meeting was held on Tuesday evening and a prayer meeting on Thursday evening. One day in the week Knowles set apart for visiting surrounding villages.²⁷

Within a few months of the Conference year 1862-63 three different missionaries were appointed to Budaun. Immediately upon their arrival in India in January, 1863, Thomas J. Scott and wife assumed charge. The breaks in continuity in missionary service were not conducive to a sustained program but in 1864 with two missionaries, one native preacher, and nine schoolteachers the station reported thirteen full members—eight men and five women—and three probationers; a Sunday school of thirty pupils; a Class meeting with an average attendance of thirteen; and seven day schools with an enrollment of 126 boys and forty girls.²⁸

The Lakhimpur station in the province of Oudh was opened in May, 1861, by Henry Jackson. In July Butler reported the dedication of a chapel, "the nicest place of worship in our mission," for which the cost was supplied by "good friends in that station." A schoolhouse also was under way.²⁹ A year later the girls' school was the largest in the entire mission. In September, 1861, Parker—the son of a Vermont farmer—was appointed to Lakhimpur "in order that he might have charge of the Christian agricultural colony," Wesleypur, twenty miles distant in uncultivated track. Parker foresaw difficulties and very reluctantly accepted the appointment. "We would have preferred remaining at Bijnor," he wrote in his "Journal," "but we go as sent, hoping there may be a providence in all." Butler was optimistic. "Christianity," he said in his 1862 annual report, "may here . . . be rooting itself in the soil." The best brief description of the unique experiment is given by J. E. Scott in his History of Fifty Years:

The first Christian Settlement . . . was attempted in 1861, to provide a home for the scattered and persecuted converts, especially from among the Mazhabi Sikhs, and other agriculturists, in the Muradabad and Bijnor districts. Dr. Butler secured a Government grant of five-thousand acres of fertile waste land in North Western Oudh, . . . and on the 9th of October, Mr. and Mrs. Parker arrived at the new Settlement to superintend it. They were joined by about twenty families from Bijnor and work was commenced to lay out a village. But the enterprise was a failure from the beginning. The location proved to be an unhealthy one. The Parkers, and Mr. Hicks, who joined them later, had no house to live in. A disastrous fire destroyed the native huts. Nearly all the colonists came down with fever. The Parkers left the place, shattered in health, on the 20th of January, 1863, and at the Conference held in Bareilly on February 5th, the enterprise was abandoned.³⁰

Theoretically the project had much to commend it. When the Christian agriculturists came under the paternal authority of the mission they were delivered from the persecution of the landlords; they became members of a Christian community; and a settlement was established which promised to become a center of "Christian light and influence benefiting the whole region round about." But the difficulties, some of which certainly might have been foreseen, were insuperable and at the end of the Conference year Butler saw no other alternative than the discontinuance of the enterprise.³¹

At Lakhimpur in 1863, with Jackson and Wilson in charge, a mission house was erected. Butler's final report (1864), in which Lakhimpur and Sitapur were grouped together, with four missionaries, four Exhorters, and four teachers, stated that full members numbered fourteen and probationers two. The one Class meeting had an attendance of eight persons, the Sunday school, five. The two schools had eighty boys and three girls.³²

John T. Gracey* and wife on their arrival from America were assigned to Sitapur, in the province of Oudh. The city was six miles from Khairabad, an important Hindu and Mohammedan center, and about thirty miles from Lakhimpur. In a letter written soon after his arrival Gracey narrates important particulars of the mission beginnings:

On our arrival here we found some ten or twelve native Christians, who had been converted elsewhere, and were located here in business. These we organized into a society at a little prayermeeting at the house of one of . . . [them] on the evening of October 31.

We had no mission premises . . . but organized our first school under the trees, which rapidly swelled to an attendance of twenty-two young men from eighteen to twenty-five years of age, desirous to learn English. In January, still unable to procure property, we rented an old bungalow . . . [had it repaired and moved in. The school was held on the verandah.]

On the 18th of January we opened a school in Khairabad with an attendance

* John Talbot Gracey (1831-1912) was born near Philadelphia, Pa., on Sept. 16, 1831. For two years he studied medicine in Philadelphia but later decided to become a minister. In 1850 he was received on trial in the Virginia Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Two years later (March, 1852) he became a member of the Philadelphia Conference and was appointed to Springfield, Pa. In 1858 he married Annie Ryder, a minister's daughter. In 1861 he was appointed a missionary to India. He established the Sitapur station and served later in Bareilly and Naini Tal. After six years Mrs. Gracey's failing health compelled them to leave India. He was a delegate from India in the General Conference of 1868, the first delegate seated from an overseas Conference. After pastorates in Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Syracuse, and other cities, he gave himself exclusively to writing. He was missionary editor of the Northern Christian Advocate for eighteen years, of the Methodist Quarterly Review seven, and associate editor of the Missionary Review of the World for a long period. He revised and extended Reid's History of Methodist missions.—Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions; Missionary Review of the World, April, 1912, pp. 283-91.

of twelve, which rapidly grew to forty. It was originated and is taught by an elderly and scholarly man, who has become an inquirer . . . and . . . has sought baptism³³

Within two years Gracey and his helper had preached in more than seventy outlying villages. In 1863 Butler was able to procure a suitable location for the mission upon which Gracey erected a convenient and substantial missionary residence. In the meantime he had made good progress in learning the language, had sustained the customary Sunday services, and opened a syatt in the bazaar.³⁴

EARLY METHODS OF EVANGELIZATION

The Board's primary instruction to missionaries, no matter what field, was in all cases the same: to preach the Gospel to the native population and to allow nothing to supersede this injunction. In the beginning preaching methods used in India differed only slightly from those which prevailed in China during the same period. As soon as the first India missionaries gained an elementary grasp of the vernacular, they went to the bazaars and the melas to preach. But they faced insurmountable barriers. Following the Sepoy Rebellion people of all castes and classes were imbued with an unreasoning fear against everything foreign and a deep-seated prejudice against Christianity. This prejudice, Thoburn says, was universal.

[It] stood in the way of the missionary to an extent which . . . can hardly be realized. . . . The very lowest castes, and even the outcastes, dreaded the name of Christian.

In consequence, the missionaries were everywhere baffled in their attempts to influence the people by preaching and yet they persisted. Within a few years a number of native assistants were available to assume the leading role—Janvier, Fieldbrave, Ambica Charn, Zahur ul Haqq, and others. The missionaries were constantly on tour, particularly during the cold months from October to March, living in tents, itinerating from village to village, and from mela to mela. In these many experiences the missionaries gradually became more and more convinced of the practical impossibility of effecting a real meeting of minds by casual contacts with crowds of people in preaching. Thoburn was particularly impressed:

A great gulf separated us. Their habits of thought, their accepted traditions, their low plane of morals, their reliance upon erroneous maxims which had to them all the force of religious axioms, their dense prejudice, and the caste rules which hedged them about on every side—all these things kept us at a vast distance from the people who stood close around us and looked with kindly interest into our faces.³⁵

Pantheism also stood as an impenetrable wall of separation between the preacher and the minds of his hearers. There was between them no theological common denominator of understanding. The Christian's concept of God and that held by the Hindu were as far apart as the poles. Henry Haigh wrote in 1896:

at bottom the average Hindu is a Pantheist and by that I mean that he regards God as a being undistinguisglingly diffused throughout His creation, as closely related therefore to any one thing in that creation as to any other, independently of all moral consideration. . . . worship with him is inevitable idolatry, and to denounce idolatry seems to him like denying the existence of God Not only does he regard God as equally diffused through all forms of existence; he holds Him to be equally present in all forms of activity, and this again, independently of all moral considerations.³⁶

As one consequence of their developing conviction, instead of confining their efforts to the noisy bazaars and crowded melas the missionaries with their native helpers resorted to more quiet places where conversation with individuals or small groups would be possible. The zyatt, as used by Adoniram Judson in Burma, was tried in some places. In 1859 Butler wrote, "we have . . . tried [the] plan of zyatts, or open rooms in the native city, where the missionary sits daily for two or three hours and receives all who come to him, reading and conversing with them."³⁷ The zyatt was used with some success, particularly in Moradabad and Budaun. Cognizance was also taken of the fact that people lived in small groups, both in the cities and in country villages, according to caste, which simplified group approach.

A group, for instance, of two or three dozen houses will be found on the outskirts of the town, inhabited exclusively by Chumars [Chamars], or leather-dressers; another by Chuharas, a very low caste of laborers, and so on. Going into one of these quarters [a mohalla] . . . the workers began to hold meetings in a more formal way than was possible in the bazaars. They would sometimes sing for half an hour while the people came together, when one or more of the brethren would preach, and this would sometimes be followed by a prayer-meeting. This kind of preaching was in every way more satisfactory than the work in the bazaar had been, and much more fruit was gathered

This new method brought a valuable discovery:

Much greater progress could be made by following family and caste lines than by the more general effort to reach a whole community When one family is converted, it is always found that six, or perhaps a dozen, other families are related by marriage or otherwise to the new converts. These relatives invariably belong to the same caste as the converts, as intermarriage with other castes is not permitted; and when they, in turn, are brought under Christian influence and converted, each family opens the way to as many more, and thus the circle of Christian influence widens rapidly. In this way, following family lines, a steady advance from family to family has led our workers in some instances for fifty miles across the country, with the result of establishing a line of what might be called Christian settlements, or at least Christian families in a large number of Hindu villages.³⁸

Still another consideration entered into the missionaries' thinking. They were increasingly impressed with the fact that the great majority of their converts were low-caste and outcaste people. There were outstanding exceptions, as has been noted, but there were few. Decades earlier Alexander Duff had been convinced by his experience that it was impossible to reach high-caste Hindus by evangelizing methods and that much more attention must be given to education as a means of securing entrance for Christian ideas and principles into the minds of high-caste Hindus and Mohammedans. Duff's influence was widespread among both government officials and missionaries of all denominations, and his opinions reinforced the Missionary Society's injunctions concerning establishing schools.

The importance of schools was also heightened by the fact that the British patrons in many cases made their contributions conditional on the establishment of one or more schools. For their part the missionaries were quick to recognize that a school for children—particularly for boys—was the most effective way of gaining the favor of the Indian people and of interesting them in listening to preaching. The schools were open for all who chose to attend on the unvarying condition of accepting the religious as well as the secular instructions.

To maintain the schools after the missionaries had succeeded in getting them started was difficult. Pupils came and went and even in the case of those whose names were continued on the rolls attendance was very irregular. Thoburn, who was not easily discouraged, wrote:

the whole work seemed so utterly unpromising that at times the thought could not but present itself that it might as well be given up. No one, however, ever yielded to such a suggestion. The work went on, each little school slowly gaining in numbers and efficiency, . . . and the prospects very slowly, indeed, . . . yet certainly brightening.³⁹

Butler's proposal of a strict limitation on the extension of schools did not commend itself to a majority of the mission members. Five years after his 1859 letter he wrote again to Durbin:

I have been hard pressed by some, to alter my purpose, & consent to see your money locked up in fine buildings for Schools & Churches, or lavished on schools (for which we have not, & cannot have for years, proper Christian Teachers) or, for other purposes; all of which . . . could well stand over in favor of efforts which directly bring Christ's living Ministry with his Gospel to these perishing multitudes for whose souls no man cares!⁴⁰

The maintenance of schools for girls during these early years was difficult. Alexander Duff had written years earlier that one "might as well attempt to lift the loftiest peak of the Himalayas and throw it into the Bay of Bengal" as to establish female education in India and conditions remained unchanged during the intervening period. The first Methodist mission girls' school in India was begun at Naini Tal by Mrs. Pierce and Mrs. Humphrey while waiting for conditions to settle after the mutiny. In 1859 Mrs. Butler wrote from Bareilly:

We have commenced our little school in the bazaar, but I do think it is the hardest kind of missionary work! . . . We use every effort to try to coax the girls in, but they are so timid; they say we are going to kidnap them, to send them to foreign parts. They don't seem to want to learn to read; they don't want to learn to sew, or to get clean clothes, or to have their faces and hands washed.

Dr. Butler was equally unsuccessful in trying to persuade the fathers to place their daughters in school. "The only women who were supposed to need an education were . . . public characters," and men could not conceive of other women wanting to learn. Soon after Pierce's appointment to Lucknow in 1858 Mrs. Pierce opened a little school for wives of native preachers, servants' wives, and two or three orphans. Her attempt was almost as fruitless as that of Mrs. Butler. In no instance were results encouraging. Attendance was irregular. Pupils absented themselves for the most trivial and often for imaginary causes. A real desire to learn was seldom in evidence.*

In 1854 the British government had established an elaborate system of grants-in-aid to schools. It agreed to support, according to a definite scale, any school "no matter by whom established or how directed, providing it complied with certain conditions as to school premises and teaching staff, and as to a certain amount of instruction in prescribed subjects, religion alone excepted." At the 1859 annual meeting the Superintendent proposed the acceptance of a grant of Rs. 2,400 per year for the maintenance by the mission of a school at Shahjahanpur, with probable eventual transfer of property title to the schoolhouse. The mission was divided on the question, six for and five against. Butler then submitted the proposition, together with a statement of the attitude of the members of the mission, to the Board. The General Committee and the Board sanctioned acceptance under certain conditions, the chief stipulation being that the mission should be "entirely unfettered in the free teaching of the word of God." But when word of this action reached India the offer of government aid had been withdrawn.⁴²

Foreseeing a famine as inevitable in war's wake, Butler wrote home on the eve of 1858: "help us to save . . . [the orphaned] ones! If you take them, you will think about them, if you pay for them, you will surely pray for them." He estimated the cost of feeding, clothing, and educating a child at $25. a year. In November of 1858 he wrote, "Providence put into our hands the first native orphan girl." † Responses from Sunday schools and individuals in America were soon pouring in, and two homes were established, for boys at Lucknow and for girls at Bareilly. The famine struck in 1860. Thousands of homeless children were cast out to die of starvation on the roadsides and the

* These were by no means the earliest attempts by Protestant missions to establish girls' schools in India. One of the first successful efforts was made by Mrs. John Wilson, wife of the eminent Scotch missionary of Bombay. Beginning in 1829, within a few years she had opened six girls' schools. Ten years earlier (1819) the Calcutta Female Juvenile Society for the Education of Native Females had been organized, beginning its work with one school and eight children. In 1824 it had six schools with 160 girls. Other efforts also had been made.—Julius Richter, A History of Missions in India, translated by Sydney H. Moore, pp. 333 ff.

† This was Almira Blake. She fulfilled the hope of the mission by becoming an active Christian worker, later serving as matron, doctor, and friend to the children of the orphanage at Pauri.

city streets. Butler went to the British government and offered to care for some hundred and fifty orphans of each sex. His proposal was approved and from hither and yon, in native carts, "fifteen to the load," they were gathered in. From year to year the number increased until it reached five hundred. Response to the mission's call for funds was so generous that the Missionary Society relaxed the rule against direct solicitation and the institutions received support. Waifs admitted to the orphanages were brought under the control of the mission which meant that the India Church would have a body of young people reared in Christian schools and prepared for Christian marriage. At Shahjahanpur, where the boys' orphanage was moved in 1863, a training school was established, and both institutions were supervised full-time first by J. H. Messmore and then by T. S. Johnson.* In 1906 J. H. Messmore reported to the India Mission Jubilee:

during the forty-five years of . . . [the orphanages'] maintenance, those admitted are counted by thousands. We have tried to make good Christians of these orphans, and have measurably succeeded. There have been many black sheep among them, and many who have become honored and valuable members of the Christian community. We have . . . tried to develop manual labor departments in the orphanages, but have not been very successful. . . . the average mission orphan believes that he will be fed, whether he works or not; and he will seldom work hard enough at any handicraft to become a good workman. The prejudice against manual labor among literary folk in India . . . has very seriously hindered our persistent efforts to make of our boys good mechanics.⁴³

From the beginning the missionaries felt an urgent need for printed materials in the vernaculars of Rohilkhand and Oudh for general distribution. As nothing suitable was available the preparation and printing of literature became necessary. One hundred rupees each was pledged by a dozen of the missionaries for the purchase of a printing press. On January 25, 1860, Humphrey wrote to Durbin from Bareilly:

God having provided us, in the person of Brother Waugh,† with a man eminently suited to take the charge of a printing establishment, the incipient steps have . . . been taken toward the establishment of such an institution in connection with the orphanage.

The transfer of Humphrey to Budaun in early 1860 opened the way for the appointment of Waugh to Bareilly. In the cold season of 1860 the American Mission Press (later the Methodist Publishing House, Lucknow) was established, destined to become "one of the largest, if not indeed the largest [of] Christian publishing [agencies] in the empire." The first ambitious project was the printing of a Methodist hymnal, the Git Ki Kitab, in Hindustani. The press soon became one of the indispensable adjuncts of the mission in the work of evangelization.⁴⁴

He received a medical degree from the Ann Arbor Medical College but in 1858 yielded to promptings of the Holy Spirit to enter the ministry and was received on trial in the North Indiana Conference in 1859 (Gen'l Minutes, 1859, p. 70). After preaching four years in Indiana he was appointed to India by Bishop Simpson and sailed with his wife in April, 1862. They arrived in India on Jan. 20, 1863, and were appointed to the Boys' Orphanage, Shahjahanpur, where they remained ten years. In 1881 he inaugurated the "Industrial School" in Kanpur. In 1897 he founded a girls' school at Jabalpur, later named the Johnson Girls' School. He retired in 1909 and returned to America. T. J. Scott says of him: "As a medical man he did much in promoting this form of work, maintaining dispensaries and aiding hospitals."—Biographical File, Board of Missions Library.

BUTLER ERA ENDS

William Butler was characterized by boundless ambition for missionary extension, certainty in the rightness of his own judgments, and an impatience with the limitations and restrictions imposed by Missionary Society administration. Given these characteristics and John P. Durbin's determination to administer the foreign program as a whole impartially and in accordance with the principles and rules laid down by the Board it was inevitable that tension should develop. There was, in fact, an almost continuous succession of tense situations, in several of which not only the Missionary Secretary but the entire Board, the General Missionary Committee, and the Bishops became involved. Following a year (1862) in which the Board was straitened for funds, Butler on his own authority without consulting the Missionary Secretary, made a second direct appeal to churches in America for contributions to continue the support of and relocate the boys' orphanage. He had anticipated continued financial aid from the British government to provide a major part of the expense of operating the institutions and when this was not forthcoming it finally became necessary for him to draw on the Board to meet accumulated obligations. The Board then felt obliged to take over the institutions. The debt which this action imposed continued to be a source of embarrassment to the Board for several years. In another instance, ignoring Durbin's protest against direct appeal to the Church for field projects before getting Board approval, Butler addressed a letter to the students of the Concord Biblical Institute asking for volunteers for India. Twenty-two students offered themselves for missionary service. Whereupon Butler appealed to the Church through the Christian Advocate for at least twenty more men to be sent to India immediately and cited the correspondence with Concord as evidence that missionaries were available.⁴⁵ On December 28, 1858, going over Durbin's head, he wrote to David Terry, Recording Secretary of the Board:

Here we are waiting and wondering that you don't send on some men. May God forgive those, whoever they may be, whose apathy is the chief cause of that 'hope deferred' which makes our hearts break.

mission to attend Garrett Biblical Institute as a "missionary student." In the spring of 1859 he sailed for India, receiving his degree from Garrett in absentia. He was a practical printer and in 1860 or 1861, at the request of the mission, established the press, later moved it from Bareilly to Lucknow, and for much of his life was in charge of its operation. He served also as Presiding Elder of the Bareilly (1864-66), Lucknow (1866-69), and Kumaon (1885-88) Districts. For three years he was principal of the Cawnpore Memorial School (1877-79), and was the first principal of Oak Openings School, Naini Tal (1880), later Philander Smith Institute. In 1859 he married Lydia M. Hayes, who accompanied him to India. She died in 1872, while on furlough. In 1876 he married Jennie M. Tinsley. They retired in India in 1895. He died in 1910, Mrs. Waugh in 1928.—Biographical File, Board of Missions Library.

The letter was passed on to Durbin, who at the same time received another in which Butler complained bitterly that he had not been kept supplied with money. Durbin replied in good spirit, but with firmness.⁴⁶ Butler was insistent, however, that direct approach to churches for specific objects was necessary and finally proposed that the Board assent to his return to the United States "to make special appeals and collections for the Missions in India." The time would come when the Board would favor the principle but that time was not yet. On February 19, 1863, Durbin informed Butler that the General Missionary Committee, the Bishops, and the Board were unwilling to approve his return for the purpose.⁴⁷

When Butler went to India he was directed by Durbin "to secure good houses for our missionaries." His theory was: "We are sending these men and women to India for life. It is for our interest as a business transaction to care for them in a way that will enable them to perform the best possible service for us in that unnatural climate." However, Durbin had the foresight to advise against outward display lest the mission should put on "the aspect, in its appointments & bearings, of European Society and thus much increase the expense, & . . . weaken its efficiency, as it respects the natives." * Butler was British to the core and his contacts in India were closer to the British officers and other European residents than to the natives and consequently his natural tendency was to pattern the missionary bungalows after the British style and to favor the management of households in accordance with British custom, with many servants.† This was a common enough practice on the mission field in the nineteenth century, followed by all the major missionary societies, based in part on the erroneous assumption that the missionary in order to command the respect of the natives must appear equal in his manner of living with other European people. Nor was this peculiar to India. In the China Methodist mission the missionaries lived in the upper-class European fashion, pausing in their activities for rest, afternoon tea, and tennis games, and in midsummer retiring to their mountain homes, removed from the intense heat of the crowded cities. Necessary as much of this was in the interest of maintaining health it cannot be denied that conforming to foreign social customs became in part responsible for creating a gap between the masses and the foreign missions which it would take many decades to bridge.⁴⁸

As Superintendent, Butler gave his personal attention to the temporal affairs of the mission. To him equipping each station with an attractive chapel, well-

* Durbin's clear insight is revealed in his statement that "the Mission in addressing itself to the natives, should assimilate, as far as is reasonable, with their habits & manners, so as to lessen the distance between the missionary & the native, and prevent an unreasonable expense."—Butler-Durbin Correspondence, May 22, 1857.

† E. W. Parker: "Our homes are good but every private soldier from England living in India has a better home so far as a large airy, good looking building is concerned. . . .

"Our houses cost on an average a little more than $2,000 each. . . . Some cost much less. The house in which we live accommodates two families and is a large house. . . . It is . . . built of clay brick dried in the sun and cost the mission not over $1,500. . . . It is a very comfortable house."—Letter to Missionary Secretary McCabe, Nov. 11, 1889, in the Correspondence Files of the Division of World Missions.

built residences for the missionaries, and one or more suitable schoolhouses for the day schools was of primary importance. He was energetic and resourceful in his business relations and made a remarkable record in raising money on the field for these purposes. The exceptionally friendly and cooperative spirit of British residents, particularly government officers, encouraged him to issue and circulate widely in 1859 "a statement and appeal" for financial support. In addition to voluntary contributions received the preceding year, Rs. 12,456 were contributed. Support was continued year by year, in 1864 amounting to Rs. 29,435, a total for 1858-64 of Rs. 110,363, or $55,186.50.⁴⁹

Begun early in 1862 and continued at frequent intervals Butler's voluminous correspondence with the missionary office reflected a growing restiveness on his part. One factor that may have contributed to this was the tension between the missionaries and himself which at times was intense. Preceding the 1863 annual meeting "friction between the missionaries and the superintendent, owing to absence of method and fixed procedure in administration, particularly in regard to finance," became so tense that "a number of missionaries," including Parker, considered absenting themselves from the session. As the date drew near, however, they relented and decided to attend.⁵⁰ When the annual meeting convened (February 5-12) Butler signified his purpose of associating the missionaries more fully with the Superintendent "in the control and direction of the interests of . . . [the] Mission."

By the plan . . . their power at their annual meeting will be real and responsible over the entire charge of our work . . . and yet the office of the superintendent is not neutralized or necessarily weakened.

If this concession had been made earlier the morale of the mission would have been improved and the Superintendent's administration would have been less taxing upon his health.

A second factor in Butler's restiveness was increasing health difficulty. On August 14, 1863, he presented his resignation.

I have put off this duty to myself and our work as long as I reasonably could,—but now it is decisive. It is a matter of conscience with me respectfully, but decidedly, to urge the acceptance of my resignation by the Bps. and the Board.

. . . I have tried to do my work faithfully & willingly, but I can go no further, for I am not able.⁵¹

A month later he was suffering from ophthalmia to such an extent that he was unable to do full work or even to write. In the fall while on a visit to Calcutta he had a violent attack of cholera, from which he recovered strength very slowly.* Again, he wrote: "Excuse a brief letter. . . . one day I feel able to do something, and the next I may be quite unable to sit up or hold a pen." To his letter of August 14, 1863, the Bishops replied, stating willingness to accept the resignation, the exact date when official connection should cease to be fixed at the close of the 1864 General Conference. With his family he left Calcutta on January 18, 1865.⁵²

* To aid his recovery his physician ordered a sea voyage. He took passage to Burma where he was entertained by friends and given opportunity to visit some of the Baptist missions. Shortly after leaving he was invited by a prominent merchant to return and open a Methodist mission in that country.—William Butler, the Founder of Two Missions . . . , pp. 116-22.

The Superintendent's final report was accompanied by an exact, detailed inventory of all property held in trust for the Missionary Society at each of eleven mission stations. The total estimated value of the property listed, together with that of the two orphanages and the printing establishment, was $73,188.56, all stated to be "free and unencumbered."

Butler's paramount purpose was the building of the Church in India:

From the first, I have had but one desire, & that was to see in India a reproduction of the Methodist Episcopal Church in all its integrity as a field of action worthy of our name & energy. I have desired this from no mere sectarian feeling, but from a profound conviction, (to which I shall cling till life's last hour) that, if faithful to our own well-tried and divinely approved doctrines & discipline, there is no reason why 'the God of our Fathers' may not grant to the . . . Church on this Continent a position of influence & power for good similar to that which He has granted in 'the Western World.'⁵³

In his final report he stated that while his service as Superintendent covered a period of eight years, because of the interruption caused by the Sepoy Rebellion the mission had been "in full operation . . . [only] six and a half years." In all, forty-seven missionaries had been appointed—forty-three from America and four in India. The effective staff at the end of Butler's tenure was thirty-five persons. In his summary of the work accomplished, the Superintendent stated:

Nine of the most important cities have been occupied, land obtained and secured by requisite legal forms, nineteen mission houses built or purchased, ten chapels and sixteen school-houses erected, two large orphanages provided, and a well appointed printing establishment founded in the center of our field. Twelve congregations have been gathered and ten small Churches organized, while one thousand three hundred and twenty-two scholars, male and female, are being instructed daily in our Christian schools; one hundred and sixty-one persons are weekly speaking their experience, singing our hymns, and pouring out their hearts in prayer in our class-meetings in India's own language; and from among the converts whom God has already given us, at least four preachers and eleven exhorters are now commanding to others the salvation which they first learned from us.⁵⁴

This matter-of-fact statement registers an achievement rarely, if ever, equaled in so short a time in Methodist missionary history. Without Butler's clearness of vision, his driving purpose, and his determination not to be defeated by lack of realization on the part of the Church in America of the imperative needs of India as one of the greatest of the world's mission fields, such a record could not have been made. While his indifference to Methodist protocol was a thorn in the flesh to the missionary authorities, his direct appeals to pastors and people did much to awaken the Church to foreign missionary needs and his resounding calls for volunteers brought out an exceptional group of capable men who stayed by and laid broad and deep the foundations of Methodism in India.

INDIA MISSION CONFERENCE, 1864-68

"Perhaps the most remarkable result of modern Christian missions in Asia," said Missionary Secretary Durbin in the 1864 Missionary Society Report, "is the organization of the 'India Mission Annual Conference' . . . which took place in Lucknow, India, December 8, 1864 . . ." ⁵⁵

As early as 1859, pressure had been exerted for the organization of the mission into an Annual Conference. This was an outgrowth of dissatisfaction both with the Missionary Society's lack of counsel on specific administrative problems and with the Superintendent's attitude and methods of administration.

No systematic plan of utilizing the local workers—Exhorters, Local Preachers, and helpers—existed. No program of study and training was developed; and little supervisory work was exercised. They were merely what Thoburn characterized as "ecclesiastical nondescripts." Responsibility for administration and oversight rested wholly in the Superintendent whose time and energy were so absorbed by the business affairs of the mission that he could give little or no attention to other responsibilities. This situation an Annual Conference was expected to remedy. Preceding its organization the missionaries at Moradabad in 1863 or early in 1864 formulated a plan for training and educating native preachers. Parker says in his "Journal" that "this was the seed of the District Associations." At first they were station associations, whose members were the missionaries, the Local Preacher or Preachers, the Exhorters, and the helpers (the native Christian teachers). Writing in 1864 to the Missionary Advocate, Mansell gave a detailed account of the second meeting of the Moradabad Preachers' Association.⁵⁶

The 1860 General Conference authorized an Annual Conference provided that the Bishops agreed it would advance the interests of the mission, but the Bishops did not act.* Pressure from India increased. On February 18, 1863, the Board voted to ask the 1864 General Conference to authorize the formation of such a Conference and a visit by a Bishop to India to effect organization. Authorization was given in accordance with the limitations imposed in 1860 on all Mission Annual Conferences, with an added proviso†

* See p. 167.

† Thoburn, in the United States on furlough at this time, was present when the report on an India Mission Conference was under consideration, and was much disturbed by the proviso. "I knew beyond a doubt that it would give very great dissatisfaction in India, but could do nothing but listen in silence. . . . It was distinctly a move in the wrong direction.

". . . The chief, and indeed almost the only, reason alleged for the reservation of this Episcopal veto power was that the influx of native preachers would be so great, that in a very short time they would control the Conference, and it was assumed that they would almost certainly be found more or less unfit for the responsibilities of Conference membership. . . . hence it came to be understood in India that a too rapid increase in the native membership of the Conference would be regarded with disfavor, and at first the deliberate policy was adopted of admitting only a few representative men to the Conference, and retaining the remaining native preachers in the nominal relation of local preachers and exhorters. . . . The worst result of this most unfortunate measure was thus to initiate a wrong policy, and put back the normal development of an Indian ministry for twenty years or more."—My Missionary Apprenticeship, pp. 108-11.

to the effect that the exercise of Conference prerogatives should be "with the concurrence of the presiding bishop."⁵⁷

The Bishops commissioned Edward Thomson, newly elected to the episcopacy, to visit India and organize the Conference. He sailed in August, 1864. After visiting the stations in Butler's company he assembled the missionaries on December 8 and organized the Conference with seventeen missionaries as charter members.* Aware of the restiveness created by the restrictions, the Bishop took particular pains in his opening statement to reassure the missionaries of the good intentions, sympathy, and love of their brethren. It was "a classic production," wrote Messmore, "deserving preservation on account of its literary value as well as because of the themes it discussed . . ." The address also was disarming and the Bishop in presiding over the Conference allowed the body, as Thoburn later wrote, "to assume functions which are never conceded to Conferences at home." He "virtually gave the Conference the privilege of electing" the Presiding Elders. Perhaps the most important action of the session was the admission, as probationers, of four Indian preachers, Joel T. Janvier, Henry M. Daniel,† Joseph Fieldbrave, and Zahur ul Haqq. This was thought by some of the missionaries to be a radical step. Parker strongly advocated it, and largely through his influence the policy was adopted of making native ministers the ecclesiastical peers of the missionaries. All four were excellent men, whose effectiveness as ministers of the Gospel had been thoroughly tested, and the Conference never had cause for regret over their admission.⁵⁸

Early in the life of the new Conference financial difficulties of one kind and another developed. In 1865 the Board issued a printed circular containing rules for the governance of Mission Conferences, one of which prohibited Conference treasurers from advancing "any money in the interval of Conferences . . . unless it be an emergency seriously affecting . . . health or life." The India Conference considered this rule too stringent and voted to recommend that it be revised to permit treasurers to advance funds to meet five different types of unanticipated needs. Apparently assuming that the Board would grant the request the India treasurer contracted debts within a few months to an aggregate of Rs. 6,984 ($3,492.), on much of which it was paying 12 per cent interest. Included in the total was the cost of replacing a mission house roof that had been blown off by a hurricane; repairs on the Boys' Or-

* Those recognized as charter members were: William Butler, James Baume, C. W. Judd, E. W. Parker, J. W. Waugh, J. M. Thoburn, Henry Jackson, L. L. Hauser, James H. Messmore, John T. Gracey, D. W. Thomas, J. D. Brown, Samuel Knowles, T. S. Johnson, Thomas J. Scott, Henry Mansell, and T. Stanley Stivers. All of the seventeen were present with exception of Thoburn and Stivers. The latter withdrew before his announced sailing date.

† Henry Martyn Daniel at an early age entered the Church of England orphanage at Agra where he received a Christian education. He was eventually employed in the Punjab (Presbyterian) Mission but since "he could not accede to Calvinistic tenets, left their employ" and entered government service, first at Lucknow and later at Sitapur, where he united with the Methodist Church and entered the ministry. Few Indian preachers of any denomination were more qualified for their work. He was well versed in Greek, Hebrew, and English, and had read extensively Arabic, Sanskrit, Persian, and vernacular literature. He was a popular and effective preacher and his early death, which occurred in Lucknow in February, 1867, was widely lamented.—Forty-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1864), pp. 93 f.; Minutes, India Mission Conference, 1868, pp. 78 f.

phanage; completion of a sanitarium at Naini Tal; and several other items. Request was then made to the Board for payment. The Board at first refused, notifying the India treasurer that no funds were available and that the debt must be taken care of in India. Four months later, following repeated demand, the Board took further action, stating that neither the Mission nor any member thereof ought to contract debts which they expect the Missionary Society to pay, without having first obtained the Consent of the Board. Such a course cannot be allowed with any safety to or certainty of a successful administration of the affairs of the Society & it should cease at once and forever.

The Board then appropriated $3,492. from its Contingent Fund to liquidate the indebtedness.⁵⁹

At the organization of the India Mission Conference three Districts were created: Moradabad, E. W. Parker, Presiding Elder; Bareilly, J. W. Waugh, Presiding Elder; and Lucknow, C. W. Judd, Presiding Elder.

The Moradabad District as formed in 1864 included four stations—Moradabad, Sambhal, Bijnor, and Garhwal—and the Moradabad Circuit. A missionary was appointed to each, and in addition forty-six native workers were employed. In 1867 Parker reported that all the Indian workers had “done well when carefully supervised by a missionary,” and to them he credited most of the success achieved. Special attention was given to Sunday schools and prayer meetings. Most of the Christians had become accustomed to meet in small bands every evening for Bible reading and prayer, and also for instruction in reading. Besides his work as Presiding Elder—holding Quarterly Meetings, visiting outstations, and attending to official correspondence, Parker was in charge of the Moradabad station. He usually taught four hours daily in the mission school, preached once every day in the street or in the chapel, and held daily evening services for the native Christians. Two Bible women were employed in 1865 to visit homes in the city and nearby villages. Two girls’ schools were begun: one among high-caste Hindus, which enrolled twenty-five girls; and one among Mohammedans, numbering twenty pupils. In 1867 Mrs. Parker established the first girls’ boarding school in Moradabad, intended principally for daughters of inquirers and new Christians. Custom frowned upon girls leaving home before their marriage; consequently the enterprise was attended with difficulty. However, two girls entered the school when it opened; the next year eleven were enrolled; and three years after its founding, under the care of Mrs. Zahur ul Haqq in Amroha, enrollment had increased to twenty.⁶⁰

Sambhal, near Moradabad, was opened in 1864 by J. A. Cawdell. Within the area of the city there were thirty-six villages, located at intervals of a quarter of a mile to three miles apart, having altogether a population of forty to fifty thousand. Three schools were maintained in 1865, with an enrollment of 180 and an average attendance of 130. The people seemed eager to hear

Christian preaching, so much so that a large congregation could be assembled at any time in the bazaar or in any of the large villages. In 1866 a start was made among the tanners; Sunday services of worship were held, a Sunday school, and a day school. Many people gave up all idol worship, but only a few made an open profession of the Christian religion.⁶¹

On the Bijnor Circuit Hauser was successful in maintaining the four schools which had been reported in operation in 1864, although the girls' school had only an irregular attendance. In 1865 the three boys' schools had an enrollment of 292 students. At the close of his first year's pastorate, 1868, Robert Hoskins* made a report of "unusual . . . prosperity." Communicants had increased "a hundred per cent"; beginnings had been made in several villages; and the church seemingly had begun "to assume the character of permanency." Thirty-seven adults and sixteen children had been baptized.⁶²

The first Annual Mission Conference, December, 1864, approved the opening of missionary work at Pauri in the mountain province of Garhwal. The mission was founded at the request of Commissioner Henry Ramsay, who made an outright gift of $1,500. and promised $25. a month toward expenses. At his request Thoburn, with whom he had become acquainted at Naini Tal, was appointed missionary-in-charge. As Thoburn was on furlough the Parkers visited Pauri in February, 1865, and made preliminary arrangements. In April Hauser and the Mansells went up from Bijnor, Mansell staying on until Thoburn's return from America. During his stay he succeeded in getting a small school for boys under way. Thoburn reached Pauri "about the middle of April," 1866.⁶³

The province of Garhwal was a wild, mountainous area of some 5,500 square miles, with a population of about 345,000 people. The city of Pauri was "eight days' journey from Naini Tal on the east, seven days from Mussoorie on the west, and five days from Bijnour on the plains." Within the province were five great peaks of the Himalayas, the highest 22,661 feet. The roads were merely bridlepaths, some of them cut into the sides of almost perpendicular mountain walls. There was not in Thoburn's day "a wheeled conveyance of any kind in the province, not even a wheelbarrow." Traffic was borne on the heads or shoulders of men and the products of the little terraced fields on those of women and children. In his search for a suitable site Thoburn located "the old Chopra Tea Estate," consisting of fourteen

* Robert Hoskins (1843-1903) was born in Bennington, Vt., on May 7, 1843. Converted at sixteen, he graduated from Williams College in 1866, was admitted on trial to Troy Conference the following year and appointed missionary to India. Shortly before sailing he married Charlotte Roundey, a young woman who had been a parishioner of William Butler and had once offered herself as a teacher in the India mission. They arrived in India on Feb. 1, 1868. Their thirty-five years of service were given in four stations, Bijnor two years; Shahjahanpur four; Budaun fifteen; and Kanpur fourteen. They had three furloughs, during the second of which Mr. Hoskins received the degree of Ph.D. from Boston University. Dr. Hoskins spoke Hindustani fluently and wrote it well. He spent years and much money on an Urdu Concordance. He was one of the first to discern the possibilities in the people of the depressed classes and was especially successful in training their young men for the ministry. At the time of his death more than one hundred were in active service as a result of his labor. He died of apoplexy in Kanpur, Sept. 22, 1903.—Biographical File of the Board of Missions Library.

acres of land and many buildings, one mile from Pauri, which he purchased for the nominal price of Rs. 1,000. He described the old house as standing "in the midst of a little paradise of fruit trees," and affording from the front a landscape view "of everchanging . . . wonder and beauty."

The house . . . was an old stone building, built loosely, with mud for plaster, and covered with clapboards overlaid with rough flag-stones. The rats had perforated the walls in all directions, and the roof was infested with snakes which were attracted by the vast number of swallows which persisted in building their nests between the clapboards and the flag-stones. . . . Scorpions, which have a liking for old buildings, often appeared unbidden, but no one during my stay ever suffered from them in the mission house.⁶⁴

An Anglo-vernacular government boys' school at Srinagar, on the Ganges, eight miles below Pauri, was turned over to Thoburn. The school had a hostel with thirty boys in residence, and seventy day pupils. He also found an unexpected opportunity for girls' schools. Two small schools at Srinagar were given into his care by the government—one a school for low-caste girls and the other a high-caste school. At the close of his second year, although he spent only a fragment of each in Garhwal, he was able to report "five schools for boys, two for girls, and a Christian community of twenty-six souls." Pauri was the only station established in Garhwal, and the Christian community grew very slowly. In 1876, when nine people were baptized, it numbered "only seventy souls."⁶⁵

The Moradabad Circuit as formed in 1864 embraced Babukhera, to which Zahur ul Haqq had been assigned earlier, and a number of towns and villages which had been visited more or less regularly by missionaries for several years. The work prospered and at the 1866 Conference the Circuit was reported as having been divided into two—the Moradabad and Chandausi Circuit and the Amroha and Babukhera Circuit. The first-named Circuit was under Mansell and S. S. Weatherby, assisted by two Indian preachers. Daily street preaching was maintained at two places near Moradabad, at Kundarki, a large village, and at Chandausi, a town of some 40,000 inhabitants, and on bazaar days at all the villages within eight miles of Moradabad. In 1868 when Thoburn was appointed to the Moradabad station he held that in the city of Moradabad "very little visible impression had been made" and that "no permanent foothold has been gained among the people." The church membership was in flux, one of the members had died during the year, fifteen had removed to other stations, four had left "without proper letters of dismissal," and four probationers had been discontinued. However, twenty-three new adult members, and twenty-two children had been baptized. Report concerning Chandausi also was not encouraging. The people mostly had been hostile to Christian preaching, missionaries had frequently been insulted in the streets, and the native helpers had endured many annoyances. In one village where a Society had been organized two years before some success had been achieved, and within the year new work had been opened in one village.⁶⁶

The Bareilly District as formed in 1864 at the first Mission Conference, with J. W. Waugh as Presiding Elder, included five stations: Bareilly, Naini Tal, Budaun, Pilibhit, and Shahjahanpur. A missionary was appointed to each station except Pilibhit, to which Joel T. Janvier was assigned. Eight other native workers were employed on the District, of whom four were preachers. At the second Conference (February, 1866) C. W. Judd succeeded Waugh as Presiding Elder, continuing until 1869.

The program of the Girls' Orphanage, which had been moved to Bareilly in 1863, included both studies and handiwork. Thomas as principal reported in 1865 three and a half hours devoted to study and the remainder of the day, for all who were old enough to work, given to "plain sewing, making and mending their own clothes; and the various kinds of knitting and crochet." The manual work was steadily expanded, until in July, 1868, an "Industrial Establishment" was organized to afford employment for native Christians. Eighteen Christian men and ten Christian women were employed, together with about thirty non-Christian mechanics. By 1870 sixty-three Christian men and forty women had found employment in connection with the institution and a village of forty families—Christians who had lost their means of livelihood as a penalty for professing Christianity—had grown up around it. The products included various types of fabrics, carpets, rugs, and ornamental iron and brass articles. Sales of manufactures in 1869 amounted to $8,556.⁶⁷ In 1872, when Thomas was transferred to the Bareilly Theological Seminary, the establishment was closed.* The Girls' Orphanage, however, was not affected by these developments. It was continued in the charge of Thomas until 1872, when Judd was appointed superintendent and Miss Sparkes† preceptress. As early as 1865 it had begun to fulfill its original purpose. Already perhaps a dozen Christian families had resulted from the marriage of young men, some of them from the Boys' Orphanage, to young women graduates of the girls' school. A normal class also had been formed which in 1867 had six members who were employed part-time in teaching primary classes of the school and who later would help to meet the need for Christian teachers in the schools.

* All of the Methodist industrial experiments established to provide a means of livelihood for Christian converts ended in failure. Following the Wesleypur Christian Village (1861) and the "Industrial Establishment" (1863), a village near Moradabad was rented and Christian farmers located in it. The missionaries who started the enterprise lost heavily and the residents were not helped. Then an Industrial Association was formed with share capital of Rs. 750 which soon came to grief. In 1869 T. S. Johnson purchased the village of Panahpur and settled there a large number of Christian families. He sold the village in 1870 to D. W. Thomas for $5,000. Later it came into the possession of the mission. In 1895 Parker asked the Board for Power of Attorney to sell the property as the time had "passed for needing such a village as a refuge for the native Christians," and the mission cannot act as landlord. It had been a loss to the mission, he said, "of over 20,000 rupees," because as missionaries, "we have no time to attend to it." Authorization for sale was given by the Board. "Thus ended," wrote Scott, "all such efforts to relieve, in this manner, the temporal wants of the poor Christians in this Conference."—J. E. Scott, op. cit., pp. 93 f.; T. S. Johnson, rep., Fifty-first Ann. Rep., M. S. (1869), pp. 100 f., 101 f.; Minutes, B. M., XV, 374 f.

† For further information on Miss Sparkes see p. 503.

The number in the orphanage varied from year to year; in 1871 there were 147. During the year twenty-one were received, three died, and eleven were married. The Girls' Orphanage, as also the boys' institution, continued its good work through the half century and beyond.⁶⁸

J. T. Gracey, the missionary in charge of Bareilly station, 1865-66, made an extensive itinerary on which he was accompanied by the Presiding Elder, Janvier, and Mrs. Waugh and Mrs. Gracey. The party lived in a tent from the middle of January to the middle of March, remaining in one location long enough to visit all of the villages within a large radius, and then moving on to another place.

Mrs. Waugh and Mrs. Gracey were enabled to collect unusually large numbers of women about the tent from time to time for instruction in the truth, and in some cases had access to their houses by invitation. . . . Large crowds listened attentively to the preaching. Leading men invited us into their houses, where followed long conversations . . . with the religiously learned men of the community. . . . Many of the people visited and revisited our tent for conversation and for books and tracts.⁶⁹

In 1868 when C. W. Judd was Presiding Elder and pastor in charge of Bareilly station less emphasis was given to itineration and more to bazaar preaching. Judd reported that he and his assistant went together to "two or three prominent places in the city four days every week, thus preaching thirty, forty, and sometimes fifty times weekly in the bazar." Besides this some preaching was done in the villages.⁷⁰

At Shahjahanpur the Boys' Orphanage had ninety-five children. The one missionary during 1865 was T. S. Johnson, whose time was so fully occupied in superintending the orphanage and the "city school" that little time remained for preaching in the city bazaars and in the villages. The congregation of the Indian church consisted chiefly of the orphanage boys and the native teachers and preachers and their families—"all nominally Christian, and regular in attendance for religious services." In the course of the year the orphanage was removed from its site in the city to Lodhipur, about a mile from the city, a beautiful and healthy location, with sufficient acreage for small farming operations, group dwellings for the boys, and houses for the teachers and preachers. The day schedule had three divisions; five and a half hours in school; a period for manual work at trades or cultivating the ground; and a period for study and recreation.

While Johnson did not have much time for itinerating he did find an encouraging change in attitude under way:

The congregations or crowds of hearers are steadily becoming larger and much more attentive. But few objections are urged against the gospel, while many declare themselves fully convinced of the truth of the Bible and of Christianity. The change . . . is very great, and is not limited to a few individuals, nor to a single neighborhood, but is very extensive in the city and district.

On January 1, 1866, F. A. Spencer and wife, from America, joined Johnson as colaborers. After two years' service they withdrew. In 1867 the orphanage school had a theological class of thirteen, all of whom were reported to be making good progress. At the 1868 Conference the orphanage was set apart as a separate charge, the East Shahjahanpur and Boys' Orphanage.⁷¹

What Johnson described as "a peculiar religious movement" arose in several villages east of Shahjahanpur in 1867 under the leadership of a thakur (nobleman) landholder, Ujagar Lal, who from the study of books of his own Hindu religion became convinced of the folly and wickedness of idolatry. He was given a New Testament and soon began teaching it to the people. On visiting their villages he found that a large number were anxious to be baptized. After spending several days with them the missionary became convinced that their request should be granted and baptized eighty-seven adults and thirty-one children. With a few exceptions families—husband, wife, and children—were baptized together. Johnson felt that the development was so significant that "a little chapel and a house" for a native preacher should be provided for each of three villages in order that churches might be permanently planted. The movement proved to be short-lived, whether from lack of intensive missionary cultivation or otherwise the reports do not indicate. Johnson's comment in 1869 was that the great majority of those baptized two years before had apostasized.⁷²

For six years, 1863-68 inclusive, the Budaun station was in the charge of T. J. Scott.* In 1865 he reported seven schools, "five having been formed during the past year." Four of the seven were in the city of Budaun. Of the schools one was an Anglo-vernacular school of ninety-five boys. Another was a "low class school" of twenty-five boys. A third was a girls' school of about thirty pupils. The fourth school—housed in the mission residence—under the supervision of Mrs. Scott, chiefly enrolled Christian children for whose education the mission felt a special responsibility. The other three schools were established in villages, by request of villagers. In Scott's estimation well-managed Christian schools were one of the most important kinds of missionary work. As in no other way, he believed, by the establishment of a school in a village the missionary secured the favor of the people.

* Thomas Jefferson Scott (1835-1920), a son of Andrew Scott of the Pittsburgh Conference, was born in Jefferson County, Ohio. He was converted, Jan. 27, 1853, at seventeen; licensed to preach in 1854; and upon graduation from Ohio Wesleyan University in 1860, was received on trial in the Pittsburgh Conference, and appointed to Cadiz, Ohio. On graduation he had volunteered for the foreign field, and was accepted for India in 1862. With his newly acquired wife, Mary E. Worthington, a daughter of N. C. Worthington, also of the Pittsburgh Conference, he sailed on Sept. 2. For six years he was engaged in evangelistic and school work on the Budaun District in Rohilkhand and then was appointed Presiding Elder of Bareilly District, 1869. In 1872 he aided in the founding of Bareilly Theological Seminary and from that time until 1904 was connected with it, most of the time as principal. He was president or secretary of the India Sunday School Union, 1876-88, of which he was one of the founders. He was elected to the General Conferences of 1896, 1904, and 1908. He wrote numerous books in Hindustani—including a volume on homiletics, another on church polity and practical theology, and a third on Biblical theology—and translated other works, including Whedon's Commentary on the New Testament, in five volumes. He retired in 1906 after forty-two years of service in India. It was said of him: "His fine scholarship and almost perfect use of the [Hindustani] language . . . gave him great influence, not only with his students, but also with leading Indians . . ."—Biographical File, Board of Missions Library.

This year, also, Scott undertook to put a copy of the New Testament either in Hindi or Urdu in the hands of every teacher, not only in the mission schools but also in all other schools in the Budaun district. The New Testament was given to the teachers free, and other books and tracts were offered for sale. While the number of schools varied, depending upon the amount of funds available, the trend was upward and by 1871 eleven schools were in operation. A good school building had been erected in Budaun city and schoolhouses were being built in several other places.⁷³

Scott's conviction was that the evangelization of India could be accomplished only by the native Church, not by foreign missionary agencies. In addition to schools he supplied newspapers and books to church members to enlighten their minds, and was zealous in colportage work throughout the Conference. He found encouragement in the growth both in religion and in general knowledge which he witnessed among Budaun Christians as a result of his efforts. In 1867 one of his converts was a thakur zemindar (landlord) who "entered heartily into plans for the spread of the truth in his own and surrounding villages" even to building a little chapel near his home for prayer and preaching.⁷⁴

In the absence of Thoburn on furlough, James Baune was assigned to Naini Tal in 1864. He was regularly appointed to the station at the first India Mission Annual Conference in December of that year and remained for three years. At the 1867 Conference Gracey was assigned to the mission. Humphrey, who had returned from furlough, succeeded him in 1868 and continued until 1874.

Gracey was strongly impressed by the eagerness of the boys and young men of the Kumaon region to obtain reading material. "Whosoever shall supply a literature suited to the minds of this people on an extensive scale," he said, "must needs influence the character . . . in the next ten to twenty years." The colporteurs whom he sent into the valleys of the district with the Bible and other Christian books readily disposed of their supply and at the melas "whole cooly loads of books . . . [were] quickly sold."⁷⁵

Humphrey's interest in medical work as a means of missionary service led him, soon after his arrival at Naini Tal, to inquire into opportunities for associating medicine with other lines of mission activity. Three government dispensaries—at Haldwani, Kalidoongi, and Ramnagar—were soon placed under his charge. During the cold season, in addition to his supervision of the schools, it was possible for him "to visit one or other of them daily." This opening for medical work seemed to him to be providential and he entered upon it eagerly. Within a short time he had performed several major surgical operations and many minor ones. At one dispensary the outpatients averaged from two to three hundred monthly. All of the expenses of the dispensaries were met by the government. In December, 1868, the deputy collector of Kumaon, an Indian pundit, proposed that a class of young women be formed

“in midwifery and diseases of women and children.” Nine women were enrolled for the class, which was begun on May 1, 1869: three young women from the orphanage; three from the Sikh community near Moradabad; one the wife of the Indian preacher; one the Bible woman of the mission; and the ninth from the Almora Mission of the London Missionary Society. Later a tenth was added. They were all married women and their husbands attended the class sessions with them. Five members of the class passed government examination, received certificates as native doctors, and in 1870 were reported as having been called upon to treat hundreds of patients. Medical instruction was continued, the class of 1871 numbering seven women and one man.⁷⁶

Pilibhit was begun as a mission in 1861 among the Tharus, with the appointment of J. A. Cawdell, but this first attempt was a failure. At the first session of the India Mission Conference Joel T. Janvier was appointed, serving through 1865-66. He reported in 1866 a Sunday congregation of about twenty-five persons at the native church, chiefly families in the mission's employ. He had preached “from four to five times a week in the bazars of the city and in the nearest villages.” With “two brethren of . . . [the] Mission” he had attended the Sarda mela, “preached to great crowds of people,” and sold a great number of books. He also conducted a school of some thirty low-caste boys. Through the years 1867-73 the station was without missionary leadership and although supplied by native Local Preachers no account of the work for any of these years was given in the Conference reports.⁷⁷

The Lucknow District as formed in 1864 embraced the whole of the province of Oudh. Its compact territory of 24,245 square miles contained a population of more than 11,300,000. Four stations had been established: Lucknow (at the 1864 Conference divided into two appointments, Lucknow, North, and Lucknow, South, later Lucknow West, and Lucknow East), Rae Bareli, Sitapur and Lakhimpur, and Gonda. C. W. Judd was appointed Presiding Elder, succeeded in 1866 by J. W. Waugh.

Lucknow by 1866 had ten Indian schools within the city limits under the general supervision of Messmore, five for boys, five for girls; and a school for European children. The largest and best equipped was the Hussainabad Boys' School to which the Municipal Committee of Lucknow and the Society of Friends in England made in 1865 generous contributions in addition to the government grant. A second principal feature of the mission program was bazaar preaching in the most public places, attended at times by several hundred people. The large attendance aroused the opposition of the Mohammedans who countered by developing a rival program. Their speakers dwelt on inconsistencies and contradictions which they claimed to have found in the New Testament and admonished their hearers to believe only the Mohammedan sacred writings.⁷⁸

The mission headquarters had originally been established in the western end of the city, an unfortunate location, since in the meantime the population had steadily moved to the east. In 1868 Messmore, missionary-in-charge of the western station, reported that removals of members and constituency to East Lucknow and elsewhere had so weakened the Indian church that it was "almost impossible to keep up the regular services." Only four resident members remained. Thoburn—in 1870—took the initiative in buying new property and "transferring the whole missionary force to the eastern part of the city."⁷⁹ Also—in 1866—the mission press by authority of the Conference was moved from Bareilly to Lucknow and its literature publication program greatly expanded.*

Rae Bareli was opened as a station by P. T. Wilson in 1864. He was reappointed annually until 1870 when, although fifty miles distant, the station was attached to Lucknow as an outstation. While Thoburn was named as pastor in the Conference appointments it was not expected that he would be able to do more than make occasional prolonged visits to the place. Fortunately the headmaster of the mission boys' school, a dependable man of fair preaching ability, was able to make up in part for the lack of a resident missionary.⁸⁰

From 1864 on Sitapur and Lakhimpur were for years associated as a single station. J. D. Brown, in charge of the station, urged separation, asserting that "Lakimpore cannot be worked successfully from Seetapore, as it is thirty miles distant on a clay road," but because of lack of personnel the unsatisfactory arrangement was continued year after year. In 1870 Brown was succeeded by Knowles but the reports of "no apparent fruit," or "no marked impression," continued. In 1872 Lakhimpur was not even mentioned in the Presiding Elder's account of stations.

Gonda was opened as a missionary station in 1865 by Samuel Knowles, who continued there until 1870. From the beginning, in his bazaar preaching—regularly maintained throughout each year—he was given a respectful, attentive hearing. Not until 1868 was any antagonism expressed. This year "a fanatical Musalman . . . preacher" appeared at times, "an eloquent speaker," to declare that all Christians are "kafirs" (infidels); and that to spread religion by the sword is "the only true doctrine." Knowles felt that his proclamation of the Gospel was helped rather than hindered by this man's preaching. From 1866 on, Nawabganj appeared as an appointment under a native preacher. In 1869, it was included in Knowles' report as an outstation along with Colonelganj—also with a resident native preacher.⁸¹

* In April, 1871, feeling "the need of some medium of communication with the public," particularly as a means of defending the Methodist mission program from attacks, Messmore and Thoburn established The Witness, a small fortnightly periodical. It was soon enlarged, made a weekly, and its name changed to the Lucknow Witness. For a time it was under the editorial management of James Mudge. The circulation increased and in 1882 it became the Indian Witness. Almost from the first the periodical had "a larger circulation than any other religious paper in the empire."—J. M. Thoburn, My Missionary Apprenticeship, p. 291; Henry Mansell, rep., Fifty-seventh Ann. Rep., M. S. (1875), p. 112.

Bahraich, a city of about 15,000 inhabitants, appeared for the first time in the list of appointments in 1868. To the new station S. S. Weatherby was appointed, and he gave his chief attention to bazaar preaching. While a friendly interest was shown by his hearers he had no inquirers. In his second year he baptized one young man. In 1870 oversight was continued by Weatherby, and John Bernard, "a native preacher," was sent as a supply, who opened a vernacular school. In 1871 M. C. Elliott, a young man who had come to India in search of health, joined the Conference and was stationed at Bahraich but did not live to complete his first year in the ministry. Bahraich was then combined with Gonda.⁸²

INDIA CONFERENCE, 1869-76

The 1868 General Conference repealed the action of 1864 "restricting the powers of Mission Conferences," and declared the India Mission Conference—in common with other Mission Conferences—to be an Annual Conference, "endowed with all the rights, privileges, and immunities usual to Annual Conferences of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States of America." In a separate action the General Conference seated J. T. Gracey as delegate from the India Annual Conference.

Since the missionary interests of the Conference continued to be administered as before, "their relation to the Missionary Society being continued as foreign missions," the Conference retained for the time being its former title—the India Mission Conference.* There was no further legislation on the subject. In 1873 in the Minutes the title India Annual Conference was used.

The 1869 Conference (the first session following the General Conference action making it an Annual Conference) met in Bareilly, January 14-21. C. W. Judd was elected president. Sixteen full members and four probationary members answered the roll call.† Districts were three in number: Bareilly, Lucknow, and Moradabad. The Minutes of the session contain no mention of the changed status of the Conference.

Bishop Kingsley's presence was the outstanding feature of the 1870 Conference which met in Bareilly on January 20. Not since 1864 had a Conference session been presided over by a Bishop. "At this Con[ference] every body was present," wrote Mrs. T. S. Johnson in her "Diary," "every man[,] woman[,] & child in our whole Mission. It has never happened before . . ."

* The report of the Committee on Boundaries as adopted by the 1868 General Conference listed the Conference as the India Mission Conference. The Minutes of the Conference for 1869, 1870, 1871, and 1872 continued to use the same title, as did also the General Minutes. In 1872, however, the Committee on Boundaries of the General Conference used the title India Conference. At the next session of the Conference the Minutes read, "The India Conference . . . convened . . . on the 16th January 1873." These divergences in title are very confusing, particularly in view of the fact that historical sources differ in their statements as to when the Conference became a regular Annual Conference.

† During 1865-68 four missionaries arrived in India: 1865, Frank A. and Mary Spencer, Ohio Conference (remained for only two years); Samuel S. and Rachel C. Weatherby, New Jersey Conference; 1868, Robert and Charlotte R. Hoskins, Troy Conference; Francis M. and Esther S. Wheeler, New York Conference.

The session, she said, was "pleasant and peaceful." Kingsley's sympathetic attitude, characterized by fatherly kindness rather than episcopal dignity, pleased the missionaries. Several important measures were passed. The preceding year's recommendation that a medical class should be formed at Naini Tal had been complied with. The Conference indicated satisfaction with the results and recommended the establishment of a medical school, to be located in one of the large cities of the plains. A tentative budget of Rs. 4,490 for the first year was authorized, one half of the amount to be included in the 1871 estimates. The Committee on Education reported 4,524 pupils in the 115 schools of the mission with no uniformity in organization, courses of study, grading of pupils, or salaries of teachers. And more schools were being opened every year. A Board of Education, with three members, was formed with authority to establish a uniform course of study, determine a salary scale, act on schools' applications for grants, and exercise authority on setting up new schools. Bishop Kingsley felt that too many schools had been established, a number disproportionately large if they were "all to be managed by less than twenty missionary families." "I should say that there ought to be a contraction rather than enlargement . . . even if our missionary force were doubled." The Conference also voted that "the Board of Education, together with the Presiding Elders, be instructed . . . to establish a Theological Seminary for the training of young men for the ministry" during the same year. By a rising vote of the Conference the newly arrived female missionaries sent out by the W.F.M.S., Isabella Thoburn and Dr. Clara A. Swain, were welcomed to the mission work.⁸³

At the 1872 session of the Conference, at which J. L. Humphrey served as president (no Bishop being present), a strong appeal was made to "the home authorities" for funds for church building. The seventeen churches within the Conference far from met the need. Two cities—Budaun and Pauri—had no church buildings and several, such as Bareilly, Sitapur, Naini Tal, Rae Bareli, and Bijnor, had but one church and needed more. Missionaries were now persuaded that bazaar preaching was not accomplishing what had been hoped: "the better classes will not listen . . . [to street preaching], and the lower classes though benefitted are not converted." For young adults, graduates of the schools, friendly disposed toward the Church, buildings were required if their interest was to be maintained and further developed. Also, the missionaries said, the poorer classes have become interested through the bazar preaching, so that now we need places where we can assemble both these classes for more careful and continued instruction, with special reference to their conversion, by the use of such means as are usually employed in Christian lands, namely protracted efforts, prayer and social meetings.⁸⁴

At the Conference session of 1873, in the absence of a Bishop, Thomas S. Johnson was elected president. A resolution was presented and adopted—by whom offered the Minutes do not state—calling upon the president “to so rearrange the districts that the hill territory shall comprise one district, Rohilkhand a second, and Oudh and Cawnpore a third.” As rearranged the Kumaon and Garhwal District, T. S. Johnson, Presiding Elder, had two stations (Naini Tal and Pauri); the Rohilkhand District, E. W. Parker, Presiding Elder, ten stations; and the Oudh District, J. M. Thoburn, Presiding Elder, seven stations. Missionaries were assigned to thirteen of the nineteen stations; Indian preachers to four; and three were left “to be supplied.”

Reports on the work during 1873, the closing year of the first decade of the Conference, showed 876 full members, an increase of eighty-three; and 691 probationers, a gain of 134. Local Preachers numbered thirty-five, an addition of five during the year. There were thirteen church buildings, twenty-six parsonages, and 104 Sunday schools with 4,549 pupils and 242 officers and teachers. Of vernacular schools for boys there were sixty-four with 2,253 pupils; for girls, 78, with 1,560 pupils. Anglo-vernacular schools for boys were thirty-three in number with 2,650 pupils; for girls, four, with 444 pupils. In all, there were 190 schools with 6,836 pupils.⁸⁵

Bishop W. L. Harris convened the 1874 Conference in Lucknow on January 7. On the first day of the session Thoburn presented “the certificate of location of William Taylor, . . . and moved that he be admitted to the India Conference. The motion prevailed, and his name was placed on the Conference roll.” George Bowen, an ordained minister of the Presbyterian Church, submitted his credentials of ordination to the Conference and was formally recognized as an ordained elder of the Methodist Episcopal Church on condition that he take on him the ordination vows of the Church, and was admitted to membership in the Conference. Three of Taylor’s recruits, Christopher W. Christian (formerly employed in the Bombay Bank); George K. Gilder, also of Bombay; and Charles R. Jeffries of Calcutta, were received into the Conference on trial. At the close of the Conference session the Bishop announced the appointment of William Taylor as Superintendent of the Bombay and Bengal Mission and of eight men to four stations of the mission.⁸⁶

The 1876 Annual Conference (January 13-18) petitioned the General Conference for the organization of two Annual Conferences in India, and the General Conference of that year, on recommendation of its Committee on Missions, authorized the organization* of the North India Conference and the South India Conference.⁸⁷

The Conference relationship of Kanpur (Cawnpore) for several years was uncertain. From 1871 on it had been a station of the India Annual Conference. The 1876 General Conference authorized the inclusion of the Kanpur District in the South India Conference “provided that the consent of both

* The boundaries of the two Conferences were fixed as follows: “The North India Conference shall include the Province of Oudh, and the Districts of Rohilkund, Cawnpore, Kumaon, and Gurhwal in the North-west Province. The South India Conference shall include all those parts of India not embraced in the North India Conference.”—G. C. Journal, 1876, p. 300; also pp. 375, 377.

Annual Conferences in India to such change of boundaries be first obtained." In 1873, in response to urgent demands, the Conference sponsored the opening of an English boarding school in Kanpur. So impressed was the Conference with what seemed to be a providential opportunity that the school was projected without buildings or endowment. At first three bungalows were leased at a high rental but as they were not suitable for school purposes, three buildings were constructed—a boys' and a girls' dormitory and a central school building with recitation rooms and dining hall—at a cost of about $10,000. each. Teachers were paid from tuition fees and a government grant.

The South India Conference at its organization (1876) voted "the transfer of Cawnpore . . . provided that the Memorial School is free from all encumbrance." At the 1877 North India Conference the Cawnpore Memorial School was stated to be heavily in debt and it was decided that "for the present the Station of Cawnpore should remain connected with the North India Conference."⁸⁸

The India Annual Conference increased considerably in membership during the years 1869-75. Within these six years twelve ministers exclusive of those in William Taylor's work were transferred to India Conference membership.* Twelve W.F.M.S. missionaries were appointed to India during the same period.

Despite the additions to the missionary personnel, and the gradual increase in number of Indian preachers, net growth of the Conference membership was disappointingly slow. Some became dissatisfied and withdrew. A considerable proportion, even after several years, failed to become acclimated to India's heat and malarial air, and on account of ill health found it necessary to leave. Others died in the service.† Becoming acclimated seemed even more difficult for missionary wives than for the men.‡

The India Annual Conference, like its forerunner, the Mission Conference, was almost wholly an organization of missionaries. Ten years had passed—

* These twelve missionaries were: 1870, Thomas Craven and wife, Rock River Conference; Philo M. Buck, Kansas Conference; John T. McMahon and wife, East Genesee Conference; 1871, Edward Cunningham and wife, New York East Conference; Joseph H. Gill and wife, Rock River Conference; Wallace J. Gladwin, St. Louis Conference; 1872, Brenton H. Badley and wife, Des Moines Conference; Fletcher B. Cherrington and wife, Upper Iowa Conference; 1873, Richardson Gray, M.D., Delaware Conference; Albert D. McHenry and wife, Troy Conference; James Mudge and wife, New England Conference; Jefferson E. Scott and wife, East Ohio Conference.

† Joseph R. Downey, as has been noted, died soon after his arrival; Hauser left after six years (1861-67) because of ill health; Gracey withdrew at the end of six years on account of failure of Mrs. Gracey's health; Hicks, in ill health, remained but one year (1862-63); Spencer withdrew after two years (1865-67); Weatherby after eight years returned to America in ill health (1865-73); Wheeler, after four years, found a health furlough of three years necessary (1872-75), and left India permanently in 1878. John D. Brown in 1875 was stricken with paralysis and compelled to retire from the field (1862-76).

‡ The death rate for wives of missionaries was much higher than that for men. In a number of cases during the early years death, probably for lack of proper nursing care, was an accompaniment of childbirth. Marilla P. Pierce, first wife of Ralph Pierce, died after five years in India (1857-62). Minerva Thoburn, first wife of J. M. Thoburn, died in 1862, four weeks after the birth of her son. Mrs. Melissa Jackson died on Sept. 14 of the same year. Mrs. Marie Baume, after seven years (1859-66), returned home in ill health and died in 1867. Martha Terry Jackson, second wife of Henry Jackson, died in 1867, after three years in India. Ann Benschoff Mansell, first wife of Henry Mansell, passed away after ten years' missionary service (1863-73), at twenty-nine. His second wife, Lula Benschoff Mansell, lived only one year after her arrival in India and her marriage (1875-76). Lydia H. Waugh died in 1872, after thirteen years in India. Mrs. Mary Whitcomb Wilson, after nine years of missionary work (1864-73), suffered a loss of health and died in 1874.

following the delay occasioned by the Sepoy Rebellion—since William Butler and his corps of missionaries set out on their Christian conquest and as yet it seemed that little had been accomplished in the development of an Indian Church. All the officers of the Conference—president, secretary, and assistant secretary, treasurer, and corresponding and recording secretaries—were missionaries. All of the committees and boards—with the exception of those that conducted examinations which included books in the vernaculars, and one other (Admission on Trial) were likewise composed of missionaries. The three Presiding Elders were missionaries and of the twenty-one stations and one Circuit only five had Indian preachers in charge.

In 1867 at Pauri where Parker, Mansell, and Thoburn were together for two weeks, a constitution had been drawn up for a District Association. At a meeting at Amroha on January 2, 1868, the constitution and a course of study were adopted in a form which provided for a District Conference “for the direction of the work generally and for the general improvement of the members.”⁸⁹

In 1870 the District Association plan* was presented in expanded form by a Conference committee and approved. As adopted it made the organization of an association in each Presiding Elder’s District, with annual sessions, mandatory. All members of the Annual Conference were made ex officio members, and all Local Preachers and Exhorters in the employ of the mission at the time of organization were constituted members. Subsequently members were “to be received only by [two-thirds] vote of the Association.” All Christian teachers and other helpers were eligible for membership. At each annual meeting the appointments of the helpers for the ensuing year were to be made by the Presiding Elders, with “advice of the Preachers-in-charge of the district,” provided that “as a general rule, no helper except teachers . . . [should] remain more than three years in one place.”⁹⁰

It is clear that in these developments Parker was the moving spirit. In his “Journal” as early as January 2, 1868, he said, “If I do no other work in India, I think the maturing and starting of this native Conference is a good deal. . . . I believe God directed it.”

When the India missionaries reported so many people added to the Church in a given year they were not saying that the new members were all converted persons. They knew that few of those who asked for baptism were real Christians.

* This District organization was antecedent to, and prompted the organization of, the District Conference by the General Conference of 1872. Henry Mansell sent a copy of the India plan to the Pittsburgh Christian Advocate for publication. It attracted the attention of leaders of the Local Preachers’ Association who interested delegates to General Conference. In revised form it was approved by the Committee on the State of the Church and on June 3 was adopted. (G. C. Journal, 1872, pp. 410 f.) In the meantime the India Conference would have been involved in difficulties had it not been for the liberal course pursued by Bishop Kingsley in the India Conference session of 1870. When it was proposed by a committee that the constitution and course of study as adopted at Amroha should be approved for all three Districts of the Conference a point of law was raised as to the rights of a Presiding Elder to appoint lay workers, not members of an Annual Conference, to Stations or Circuits. The Bishop gave a “guarded yet distinct” approval to the procedure.—J. M. Thoburn, “Wayside Notes: An Autobiography,” Western Christian Advocate, May 10, 1911, p. 9.

In most cases their apprehension of Christian truth is too incomplete for them to receive Christ in anything approaching the fullness of spiritual life. The knowledge of sin is rudimentary, and consequently the sense of need is small; the desire for holiness is wanting, and the convert is satisfied with an intellectual acceptance of the theory of salvation by Christ. To lift a Christian community out of this merely preparatory state and lead its members into the possession of a spiritual life and the enjoyment of Christ's personal companionship is a problem which everywhere confronts the missionary⁹¹

In gathering the workers together for conference and study, and by providing for supervision and training, Parker and his associates were putting new and deeper meaning into their formal acceptance of the Gospel, clarifying their conceptions of what it means to live a Christian life, and strengthening their wills to follow Christ at whatever cost. As his biographer said, "In this way he exerted an abiding influence among and upon the missions of North India, for a living Christian convert means more for the conquest of India by Christ than a fine church building"

While adoption of the District Association, by the Annual Conference, which included a required course of study of four grades, marked a decided advance in the training of native workers, in itself it was not enough. More comprehensive and thorough instruction and training were required if a native ministry equal to the task of building the India Church was to be raised up. It is of interest that the necessity for an institution to meet this need was felt more keenly by the missionaries on the field than by the Missionary Society at home. In 1871 one of their own group, David W. Thomas, offered to provide out of his own funds $20,000. to establish a theological seminary for ministers. On April 15, 1872, the Bareilly Theological Seminary opened its doors and sixteen young men were enrolled as students.⁹²

A remarkable increase in Sunday-school enrollment began about 1871. The inclusion of non-Christian day and boarding-school pupils in the Sunday schools, a movement started by William Taylor, accounted for much of the growth. One day when some schoolboys were present in one of his meetings he noticed that they understood English. He immediately began to sing, asking them to join with him, which they did with glee. He continued until they had learned the hymn. Taylor's experience suggested to Thomas Craven to set up Sunday schools which were mostly singing schools. Later Scripture cards were added, and boys would walk down the streets memorizing their verses by chanting them aloud. Then came more formal lessons.⁹³

This increased interest was one of the most striking and encouraging features of the missionary program. In 1873, 104 Sunday schools were reported with 4,549 pupils as compared with seventy-six schools with 3,536 pupils in 1872. In 1875 the number had increased to 153 with an enrollment of 6,751. In 1874 Mansell pronounced the Sunday-school work which had been developed in Lucknow to be "perhaps the most powerful evangelizing agency in . . . [the] city or in the entire Mission." It is possible to go, he said, to almost any part of this great city and find boys in the streets who will come and sing, with great spirit, the Christian hymns and songs they have learned in our Sunday-schools, and thus attract a crowd of hearers to whom we preach the Gospel.⁹⁴

During these years the W.F.M.S. surged ahead in experimenting with new types of schools. A small boarding school which Mrs. Parker had started in Moradabad in 1867, turned over to Mrs. Zahur ul Haqq while on health furlough, and resumed again in 1873 represented a new venture in girls' education. Its instruction was chiefly in the vernacular and its purpose to train girls from the villages for service among their own people. While such a school for girls was "contrary to all the traditions of the people" it met with increasing favor and many more applied for entrance than could be accommodated. In 1875 the school had forty-three boarders. And at Lucknow Isabella Thoburn launched upon her amazing career of educating India's women in accordance with the standards of men's schools. There she opened her first boarding school in 1870.*

The Kanpur boarding and day school was unique in admitting both sexes, although instruction was given in separate departments. In its first year it enrolled fifty boys and twenty-five girls of whom fifty were boarders.⁹⁵

About this time tent meetings began to come into wider use in the Conference. The practice was to pitch an open tent at a convenient location near though apart from the bazaar, with an outstretched awning in front and carpets on the ground at the entrance. Usually a midday service of singing, reading, prayer, and preaching was held. The singing invariably attracted a crowd of people, many of whom remained to hear the reading and preaching. Separation from the bazaar made for quiet and was conducive to more attentive hearing and interest.⁹⁶

MORADABAD DISTRICT†

Parker's furlough in 1869 placed Thoburn in the presiding eldership of the Moradabad District. He made the round of his District in "a spring cart," traveling chiefly at night.

A horse would be sent out ten or twelve miles, another twenty or twenty-five miles, and a third thirty-five or forty miles. . . . I could make a journey of sixty miles in a night . . . I took with me a Christian boy who served as cook, a small roll of bedding, and a basket of provisions. Thus equipped I could live during the cold season in very enjoyable comfort for weeks together.⁹⁷

In 1869, as successor to Cawdell at Sambhal, James David, an Indian preacher, was appointed under the supervision of Thoburn and later of Mansell. He suffered persecution, under false charges, and in the effort to save himself apparently fell into the sins of falsehood and bribery. Preaching was neglected; the interest of church members declined, and the church dwindled to almost nothing. In 1871 the station was combined with Moradabad.⁹⁸

When in 1870 Jackson was appointed pastor at Bijnor he could find but six persons who were connected with the church. He gave himself diligently to bazaar preaching and itinerating and was confident that faithful work "must bring forth fruit sooner or later." A dispensary was opened in the city, and Mrs. Jackson—assisted by a native woman who had been trained by Dr. Humphrey—treated hundreds of suffering women in Bijnor and nearby villages. Statistical reports of the station showed ten church members in 1864; fourteen in 1868; and twenty-three in 1872. In the last year, there were seven girls' schools with 110 pupils, all of whom were Mohammedans; and four boys' schools with 357 pupils of whom seven were Christians, 260 were Hindus, and ninety were Mohammedans.⁹⁹

During the four years 1868-72 real progress was made on the Moradabad Circuit. In 1872 Parker was able to report that there were seventy-six persons connected with the Church in the city; four Classes; 421 boys and 250 girls in the schools; and three Sunday schools for boys of the day schools, and one for the girls, attended by about two hundred fifty pupils. In 1874 J. E. Scott* was appointed to Moradabad. The church at Chandausi remained small, having only fourteen communicants.

The Amroha and Babukhera Circuit had the continuous service of Zahur ul Haqq for more than nine years. In 1863 William Butler had written:

we feel that the time has fully come when we ought to provide for these people a little place of worship at Babukera, . . . and give to our services there a character and regularity, aided by the residence of a native local preacher . . . , which will enable us to carry on the good work so well begun among these poor ignorant, but teachable people.¹⁰⁰

In his report for 1872 Zahur ul Haqq wrote:

Babukhera is a village where we have had work for many years, but our permanent increase has been small. It now appears as though we had commenced wrong. A few years ago we built them a little chapel costing rupees four hundred. This chapel is now a hindrance to us as it belongs to the mission, and is not of the form that they can keep in repair. If it were not that it would seem to be going backward, it would be the very best thing for our work there to level that

* Jefferson Ellsworth Scott (1851-1924) was born in Steubenville, Ohio. He attended Mount Union College and by the age of twenty he was preaching on a Circuit in eastern Ohio. He was licensed to preach in 1869, and on Aug. 12, 1873, sailed for India and was appointed to Moradabad. He was assigned to Sitapur in 1876 where he remained until 1883. On leave in America, 1883-87, he obtained his Ph.D. (Boston University) and S.T.D. (B. U. Theological School). He married Emma Moore in 1884. His later appointments were: Bareilly, 1887; Muttra, 1888; Presiding Elder of Agra District, 1891-1900; and Muttra-Ajmere District, 1901-1906. He left India in 1907 after thirty-four years of service. During this time he was also a chaplain in the British army. He was elected to the General Conference of 1896 and of 1904. On his return to America he transferred to the Gulf Conference and did supply work for some time, later living in New Orleans, La., until his death. His labors were manifold as an educator, evangelist, and Presiding Elder. He wrote in Hindustani a Life of John Wesley and a Commentary on the Pentateuch.—Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions.

chapel with the ground, and then let the people provide such a house as they themselves can build and keep in repair as their own.¹⁰¹

While itinerating in the Moradabad District in October, 1868, Thoburn preached at Bashta and baptized two women and two children. At the close of the ceremony eleven men, members of a large group who had arrived while he was preaching, stepped forward and asked to be baptized. He welcomed them cordially but told them that it would be necessary first to give them preparatory instruction. Their disappointment was evident. Zahur ul Haqq started a hymn and during the singing told Thoburn that he was making a mistake. "If you put these men off . . . they will not believe you. . . . we shall see them no more. . . . If we do not accept them, and baptize them, we cast them off altogether." Thoburn hesitated for a moment and then, after lifting his heart to God in prayer, made his decision:

The men were called forward, and I told them that by the advice of Zahur-ul-Haqq I had determined to baptize them first and instruct them afterward. They brightened up at once, and were baptized in the midst of a rejoicing little company of Christians.

Thoburn left Bashta with misgivings. In two days he had baptized twenty-seven adults, organized them into a church, appointed a pastor, and arranged for their instruction. But would they hold together, live as Christians, and develop into a real church? "What," he wrote, "would other missionaries think of this wholesale baptizing of ignorant men whom I had never seen before, and whose antecedents and even names I knew little or nothing of whatever?" He was sincerely troubled. But a year later he visited Bashta and held a meeting at which 102 Christians received the communion, and "sat down under the mango-trees to a common meal." Years later he stated that the Church in the Bashta country held a notable place among the Christians of that region. This was one of many incidents that marked the beginning of the great Christian mass movement of later years.¹⁰²

ROHILKHAND DISTRICT

The ten stations included in 1873 in the reorganized District were: Bareilly, Shahjahanpur, Panahpur, Budaun, Pilibhit, Moradabad, Chandausi, Sambhal, Amroha, and Bijnor. An outstanding feature of the missionary work of the District during 1873 was the great increase in girls' schools in Budaun. By the close of the year fifteen schools, each with eleven to twenty-two girls, were in operation. In the more advanced schools Scripture history and the New Testament were taught. The teaching in the schools and Bible reading in the homes in the several mohallas were correlated so that mothers and daughters were simultaneously receiving Christian teaching.¹⁰³

The Amroha Circuit included an area some thirty miles long by twenty wide. In about a hundred and twenty of its villages there were groups of Christians and inquirers. From each village where no one could read one young man was taken to an Amroha school and kept there until he was thoroughly instructed in the truths of the Gospel and was able to read, write, and sing well. He then returned to his home with the missionary's expectation that he would be a personal center of Christian light and leading. The wives of the young men were also taught in the same way. "I know of nothing," wrote E. W. Parker, Presiding Elder, "so promising . . . as this plan . . ." ¹⁰⁴

In 1875 Robert Hoskins noted the progress in Christian faith and life of the Christians in the Budaun region as the result of better-trained Indian preachers:

Heretofore the chief difficulty has been that the helpers who have been stationed among the people to instruct them have been men of limited education and consequently have not been able to advance their congregations very much, but during a part of this year we have had the assistance of three trained men from the Bareilly Theological Seminary, who were sent from this District some three years since.

Budaun station this year had nine centers from which missionary work was carried on.¹⁰⁵

A resurgence of child marriages in 1875 caused much disturbance among village Christians at Amroha and Budaun. In trying to break up the practice missionaries had used all possible means, including the cutting off from the Christian community of persons who insisted on observing the custom, and it was thought that the practice had been overcome but this year "many Christian men . . . yielded to the pressure of public opinion . . . and have had their children married according to their old customs." At Amroha the entire community of Christians was involved in the controversy, one party insisting that child marriage must be retained. When it became evident that they could not have their way a few withdrew from the Church and the disturbance subsided.

By 1876 a broad missionary program was under way in Rohilkhand District. Church institutions—in addition to the theological school, orphanages, and high schools earlier established—included an increased number of elementary schools and two medical dispensaries for women and children. Intensive evangelistic work was carried on in more places. Besides the ministers in the ten stations there were more than thirty Indian preachers living in different places and preaching in hundreds of villages. E. W. Parker, Presiding Elder, saw everywhere signs of progress, proof that Christian truth was "surely working its way to the hearts of the millions."¹⁰⁶

BAREILLY DISTRICT*

In 1869 T. J. Scott was appointed Presiding Elder of the Bareilly District. He continued in office until 1873. For the first time since the Bareilly station was established (1859) the Indian church in 1869 reported a sizable membership. It numbered sixty-three adults. The increase by baptism during the year was twenty-three. A "native Christian community," said T. J. Scott, who was also pastor in charge in Bareilly, "is growing up . . ." Two years later saw the building of a commodious church for the Indian Christians. By 1872 the number of communicants had increased to 150 and thirty-four probationers. The pastor reported that "the moral tone of the native Church . . . [was] improving," and that almost all contributed something for support. The four outstations of Bareilly were in 1872 grouped together to form the Bareilly Circuit, with Scott himself as pastor, and an Indian preacher in residence at each place. Members totaled only seventeen.¹⁰⁷

* In the reorganization of Districts in 1873 some of the Bareilly District area was included in the new Kumaon and Garhwal District, which had this year only two stations, Naini Tal and Pauri. The remaining appointments were transferred to the new Rohilkhand District.

At Shahjahanpur, Johnson, who was a physician as well as a minister, by 1870 found his time so taken up with dispensing medicines—as many as five hundred patients monthly coming to him for treatment—that the employment of a native doctor as an assistant became necessary. The government was asked to supply medicines and a monthly grant of Rs. 25 toward current expenses.¹⁰⁸

In 1872 Robert Hoskins, missionary-in-charge of Budaun station, reported that "a vital indigenous work . . . [was] going on in the District, that . . . [was] fast producing a self-supporting Church." Some of the Indian preachers engaged in personal evangelism and held evangelistic meetings on their own account.¹⁰⁹

Hardoi, thirty miles from Shahjahanpur, was opened as a mission in 1872, with Sunder Lall, an Indian preacher, in charge. He reported a mission residence purchased, a colporteur employed, and several inquirers enrolled.¹¹⁰

Mission work was begun in Almora, the capital of Kumaon, by the London Missionary Society in 1850, and in nearby Ranikhet in 1869, in each case by one missionary. Reinforcements had been expected in order that remaining parts of the province might be occupied. As these were not forthcoming the British missionaries looked to the Methodists to take over the area and establish missions where needed. To the Presiding Elder, T. S. Johnson, the field seemed as full of promise as the plains, perhaps even more so, since "the hill people in general are more simple and less bigoted" than the people of the plains. J. H. Gill,* missionary at Pauri (later the Garhwal Circuit), felt that while the thousands scattered over the mountains of Garhwal were "hard to be reached" the mission would not be a failure: "the seed sown cannot be lost; it is God's . . ." ¹¹¹

* Joseph H. Gill (1844-1912) came of a devout Scotch-Irish family. He was born in County Tyrone, March 27, 1844. He migrated to New York as a young man. Feeling that he was called to the ministry, he went to Evanston for his training; received his A.B. from Northwestern University in 1870; and his B.D. from Garrett Biblical Institute in 1871. He and his wife, Mary Ensign, arrived in India on Dec. 14, 1871, and were stationed at Moradabad. After two years they were sent to Pauri, Garhwal, where they spent a total of nineteen years, and where the name Gill was long held in grateful remembrance. He also served ten years in Bijnor, and for shorter periods in Bareilly and Budaun. Mrs. Gill died in 1908, and in 1910 Gill married Mary Wilson, daughter of Peachy T. Wilson and a missionary of the W.F.M.S. Five years after her husband's death in 1912 she returned under the W.F.M.S. and served in Pauri until 1935.—Biographical File, Board of Missions Library.

This year (1873) at Naini Tal nearly six thousand patients received treatment in the mission dispensaries, and some 30,000 in the government institutions, all under Dr. Humphrey's supervision. At the close of the year the government dispensaries were transferred to the civil surgeon of the district. Seven mission schools were attended by 315 pupils.¹¹²

In 1874 two new stations were reported. Eastern Kumaon, including the eastern part of the province adjoining Nepal, was in the charge of Richardson Gray, M.D., with three Indian preachers and a colporteur as helpers. "The wives of the helpers," together with the mother of one, assisted as teachers, Bible women, and medical aides. Four schools were maintained and a dispensary established at which some five hundred patients, as an average, were treated monthly. The second new station, Palee (later Dwarahat), embraced western Kumaon and eastern Garhwal, an area with a population of more than 150,000. As no missionary was available Harkua Wilson, an Indian Local Preacher, was appointed in charge, with one helper. A dispensary was set up which was soon treating from two to three hundred patients a month; two schools organized; and evangelistic work begun in the villages. In May, 1875, a missionary residence was purchased in Pithoragarh, in eastern Kumaon, as mission headquarters and Lohoghat was made a substation. Three new schools were opened during the year, making seven in all and the total enrollment 395. This year schools within the District as a whole increased to thirty-eight; teachers to fifty-three; pupils to more than 1,300. Seven missionaries with fourteen helpers made up the District missionary personnel.¹¹³

The problem of polygamy beset the Church in many of the hill stations. The Conference was steadfast in maintaining its position that a polygamist applying for membership should put away all but one wife. In many instances the question of what to do under the specific circumstances seemed unanswerable. Gill, on the Garhwal Circuit in 1876, felt strongly that new regulations were needed. In one instance a family of nine presented themselves for baptism but there were two wives and two groups of children. "It would require the skill of a Paul to know which woman has the best right to stay, and it would take a heart much less tender than the blessed Saviour's to turn either away." Both desired to be Christians. Gill's plea was for permission to baptize "these families as they are, and to pledge them to give up polygamy in their future contracts." No agreement on general policy was reached among the missionaries as to the Christian course.¹¹⁴

LUCKNOW DISTRICT*

In 1870 Thoburn was made Presiding Elder of the Lucknow District. In his fascinating autobiographical story, My Missionary Apprenticeship, he presents a graphic and accurate picture of the situation which faced him:

* The Lucknow District in 1873 became the Oudh District. All of the Lucknow District stations were included in the Oudh District, and Hardoi—formerly in the Bareilly District—was added.

Four of the mission houses were standing empty, and only two foreign missionaries could be spared for the out-stations of the province. In addition to the American missionaries, two of the native members of Conference had been assigned to central points . . . but they had done very little except to take up their residence in rented houses, and do a little preaching in the bazaars. . . . the stations [of the District] were from fifty to seventy-five miles apart, the preachers few in number, and almost absolute strangers to one another, and every point on the district was very seriously undermanned.

. . . I very quickly discovered that while a magnificent brickfield had been placed at my disposal, no straw had been provided for making bricks. The empty mission houses stood, like so many doubting-castles, at the forlorn stations. The scattered native preachers had no leaders, and very few of them had any vestige of leadership of their own.¹¹⁵

After a hasty inspection of the field he called together the missionaries, native preachers, teachers, and minor assistants—thirty-one in all—for the organization of a District Conference. This was the first time these workers had ever been together as a group and one of the best outcomes was the acquaintanceship and group morale that resulted. At their second meeting “many seemed inspired with new hope, and the dawn of a better day seemed to be at hand.” The majority of the preachers “seemed to feel their responsibility as they had not done before.”¹¹⁶

At Rae Bareli in 1871, with J. T. McMahan in charge, the number of members and probationers was doubled, four new schools for boys and girls were opened, and two Sunday schools were organized.

At the close of his four years' tenure as Presiding Elder Thoburn was unable to see that much had been accomplished in the outstations of the District during his stay. The strength of the working force of earlier years had not been maintained with the result that energetic, efficient missionary leadership was lacking. In 1874 Mansell succeeded Thoburn as Presiding Elder. He found reasons for encouragement. The English church in Lucknow had become “one of the most vigorous evangelizing agencies in India,” while the Indian church was growing in membership and “daily increasing in spiritual life and power.” He considered the native church to have “the most intelligent” Indian congregation that he had seen in India. At Gonda and Bahraich B. H. Badley reported that the church membership had increased from fifteen to twenty and the Sunday-school enrollment from three hundred to four hundred. At Hardoi about eight persons were baptized during the year but the little church had suffered “some reproach by the scandalous lives of some Christians.”¹¹⁷

A note of discouragement occasionally appeared in the reports of some of the Indian workers. J. T. Janvier, one of the most faithful and effective of the Indian preachers, reporting from Bara Banki in 1876 lamented that for the second year there had not been a single conversion. “There are a few inquirers,” he said, “who would become Christians at once would the Mission support them," but, he added, "We do not want any such Christians."¹¹⁸

The interrelation between the day schools and the Sunday schools which existed throughout the Conference was well illustrated by J. T. McMahan's description of the situation at Rae Bareilly:

The day-schools are the foundation of our Sunday-schools. The parents have no particular objection to their children attending school on Sunday provided they are taught well during the week. Where there is no day-school the parents will hardly allow their children to be present at a Sunday-school. Where the Gospel has long been preached and the people well informed they have little fear of a Sunday-school. In such places Sabbath-schools could be opened at once, but even then a day-school in which Bible teaching is faithfully continued during the week is preferable to a Sunday-school, meeting but one in seven days. The evil associations of home, the oaths and vile conversation of the street will almost certainly neutralize the teaching of an hour on the Sabbath.

McMahan's conclusion was that until children have Christian homes in which the teaching of the Sunday school is reinforced "by precept and example a day school should be maintained in connection with every Sunday school."¹¹⁹

BEGINNINGS OF WOMEN'S WORK

One of the earliest and most difficult of the problems faced by missionaries in India was how India's women could be reached with the Gospel. By age-old custom women, except those of the lower castes, did not appear in public places, nor did they receive instruction from male teachers other than their nearest relatives. Because of this the method of bazaar preaching was wholly ineffectual. In North India the barriers which shut womanhood away from the outer world were stronger than elsewhere in the nation. There women, other than those of the lowest castes and children under ten or twelve years of age, were virtually prisoners behind the zenana walls, inaccessible alike to missionaries and native preachers and teachers. As if this enforced seclusion were not enough it was reinforced by the centuries-old tradition that women could not, and—if they could—ought not, learn. They were considered to be a lower order of creation, cursed by inferiority of intellect. So deep-rooted in Indian thought was this tradition that the women themselves made no effort to controvert it and had neither the desire nor the will to learn. Less than one per cent of the women of India, it was estimated, could read or write. They could not, therefore, be reached by Christian literature.

The situation was made worse by the long-standing custom of child betrothal. Girls were betrothed at as early an age as possible and in no case later than the twelfth year. Rigid regulations made the betrothal binding under all circumstances. If the betrothed boy died the girl thereby became a widow, forbidden to marry another. While betrothal and prohibition of remarriage were not equally prevalent in all provinces and all castes they were widespread and where they prevailed girls, even as women, were isolated in zenanas.

Women's seclusion, as may be readily realized, strengthened the hold upon them of the traditional rites, customs, and beliefs of heathenism. Not only did they more strongly resist Christian influences than did their husbands and sons, they were often instrumental in preventing them from becoming Christians. In hundreds of cases when young men had become inquirers and were on the point of accepting Christ they were prevented by counter influences brought to bear upon them by their wives, their mothers, and their grandmothers.

The first suggestion of zenana visiting as a practical method of reaching Indian women with the Gospel had been made by Thomas Smith, a Scotch missionary, in 1840. In an article in the Calcutta Christian Observer he "contended that the only way to reach the women of India was personally to seek them out in the zenanas and there to give them Christian instruction and every other possible kind of mental stimulus."¹²⁰ The article was received with marked skepticism by missionaries in general, but isolated examples of attempts to carry out the suggestions followed its publication. In 1854, however, it was actually put into practice by a Scotch missionary and zenana missions successfully begun.*

Missionary wives had also attempted zenana visiting in the early years of the Methodist India Mission. While missionary records contain far fewer facts on their activities than on those of men there is abundant evidence that almost without exception they were ceaselessly busy in aiding their husbands and in lines of service which they took upon themselves. They opened up new paths for themselves, particularly by establishing, managing, and teaching in girls' schools; in ministering to women through the dispensaries and hospitals, and later by gaining access to the zenanas for personal religious work with women and girls. Many of them were burdened with the care of their own children and the management of their households but because of the plentiful supply of servants on account of the very low wage popularly paid, they had more free time for out-of-the-home activities than American wives and mothers.

The missionaries in their annual reports to the Missionary Society made scant mention of their wives' activities. They almost never described in detail the work which the women carried on in their own right as assistant missionaries.† In reporting in 1869 on the Girls' Orphanage, D. W. Thomas, Superintendent, made no mention of his wife's contribution although she was practically the manager. Not until the *Heathen Woman's Friend began publication and opened its columns wide to articles written by the "assistant missionaries" did the Church at large begin to realize the vital nature and the scope of women's work for women actually in progress on the mission fields.

* The missionary, John Fordyce, who came to India in 1853, enlisted the help of Miss Toogood, a Eurasian. As she left the house in the company of a Bible woman to make their first visit Fordyce said to his wife, "This is the beginning of a new era for the daughters of India." "He was right; it was the beginning of Zenana Missions . . ."—J. Richter, op. cit., p. 338.

† J. H. Messmore, in his 1869 report of Hussainabad Station, Lucknow, said that "the children [of the Sunday school are] taught by Mrs. Messmore"; and again in the same report, "during a part of the time Mrs. Messmore met the teacher and many of the pupils [of the Zenana Mohammedan school] on Sabbath for reading the Testament." T. S. Johnson in reporting on the girls' schools in Shahjahanpur for the same year, says that "the missionary's wife visits them as often as she can."—Fifty-first Ann. Rep., M. S. (1869), pp. 112, 103.

When it was once realized that zenana missions were possible on a wide scale, missionaries' wives of various denominations gave themselves generously to the new work. They soon recognized that in every case not merely one but many visits would be required and that they were too few and their time was too limited to make the most of the opportunity opening before them. How to increase their number became, for every denomination, the new problem. Years later Mrs. J. T. Gracey told of a solution attempted by Methodist women:

It seemed at the beginning of our mission history in India as if never a door would open which would give us entrance to the women of the country. Once a beginning was made, the missionary women recognized that it was destined to develop beyond any resources they could command; and so a few of us met together, talked the matter over, and decided that we must make application to the missionary society at home for an appropriation specially for woman's work. The application was made, the facts were enumerated, but for some reason no appropriation was allowed.¹²¹

The number of unmarried women missionaries on the field at that time was very small and the preference of the Missionary Society was to send out married women. But the Board had not entirely closed the door to the employment of single women. One young woman in America had written directly to Butler, volunteering to come to India, and he forwarded her letter to New York. Missionary Secretary Durbin wrote in acknowledgment on February 10, 1859:

We understood you & the Brethren to incline to the opinion that unmarried females might be well employed in India. The more I think of it, & learn the development of the mission, the more I am inclined to the opinion that they will be desirable and useful. Let me hear from you further, after you have had more conversation and thought touching this matter.

Butler replied on May 4, saying that the women of the mission were "very decided" that "Miss H." ought to be sent out, and he himself was of the same opinion: "You had better let her come by all means." In his response Durbin stated that there was "no lack of well educated women" ready to go to the foreign missions "when they are wanted," and in a second letter said he would get authority "for the sending of unmarried women" at the November 9 (1859) meeting of the General Missionary Committee. When the meeting was held appropriation was made for the outgoing of six young men and one single woman. A short time later when it was learned that Joseph R. Downey had died in September and Mrs. Downey had agreed to remain in India and take charge of the Boys' Orphanage the Board decided that "she would be counted as the single woman" for whom appropriation had been made. The net result was that the mission found itself no better off than before so far as an unmarried woman for zenana evangelization was concerned.¹²²

* Some of the articles in the Heathen Woman's Friend were "Woman in India," a series by Mrs. T. J. Scott; "Scraps from a 20,000 Mile Journey" in several installments by Mrs. J. T. Gracey; and an article by Mrs. Robert Hoskins telling of her work with starving women and children in Budaun.

A precedent nevertheless had been set and in the following years, as we have seen, five single women were sent to India by the Board. In the meantime other organizations became interested in recruiting unmarried women for India Methodist missions, including the Woman's Union Missionary Society of New York City and the Female Missionary Society of New England. In 1867 the latter society wrote to Durbin offering to cooperate with the Methodist Society in recruiting unmarried women for India. Durbin replied that the plan might be made practicable, and in another connection said that "for two or three years [he had] been tending to the conclusion that . . . [the Church needed] in India in particular, and in China too, a corps of unmarried female missionaries, to serve in . . . Mission Schools, & in the Zenana schools." While he was ready to write and speak with restrained enthusiasm of what he characterized as a "remarkable and promising" form of missionary work he seemed unwilling to exert his great influence in behalf of sending single women abroad on a scale at all commensurate with the need and opportunity.¹²³

In the meantime, while the Missionary Society and the General Missionary Committee were following a policy of indecision as to the extent to which its personnel of single women should be increased, the missionary wives, and the few unmarried women who had come to their aid, were endeavoring to carry the program forward as best they could.* Gaining access to the zenanas was, after all, a slow process. Scarcely a beginning had been made by the Methodists up to 1869. Enough had been done to demonstrate that by patient, persistent effort an entrance could be gained to a house here, to a neighborhood there, even to a town or city. That the closed doors would open most readily to the medical missionary had become evident. How and where were the women missionaries to be found in sufficient number to meet the crucial need? The Heathen Woman's Friend said editorially:

The wives of our missionaries have done all that they could. Many of them, in addition to their own families, have the care of large Zenana schools, which they have organized and in which they are daily busied What wonder that, in so many instances, physical strength has failed under such constant and great exertions, and the oppressing consciousness of the magnitude of the work.¹²⁴

* See p. 139.

THE W.F.M.S. IN INDIA

At this point the women of the Church decided that the problem was theirs and it was for them to provide the solution. As we have seen, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society* was organized, within a year raised some $7,000., and sent to India two unmarried women, Isabella Thoburn† and Clara A. Swain, M.D. At the first annual meeting of the General Executive Committee appropriations were made to the amount of $2,656. for the support of schools and Bible women in India in addition to the salaries of the two missionaries and $3,000. for the support of the Girls' Orphanage at Bareilly.¹²⁵

The coming of the W.F.M.S. to India provided a new stimulus for work by and for women. Mrs. Humphrey spoke for the "assistant missionaries," saying that whereas previously they had been "hindered by entire lack of means," having "only $200. salary, and no allowance for travelling," now with the help of the W.F.M.S. they would have a real chance to work. "We married ladies," she continued, "propose to relieve our husbands of the superintendence of all the female work." The organization of the W.F.M.S. also encouraged the India Conference to extend its work for women in various ways. Previously the women had been silent onlookers at the Conference sessions but at the 1871 session the ladies of the mission were invited to participate in the deliberations of the Conference‡ connected with their work.¹²⁶

At this same session the women who were present organized "a Woman's Missionary Society, to be associated with the . . . [W.F.M.S.] in the United States." The plan envisioned the organization of auxiliaries in all the mission stations.

An annual meeting is to be held each year during the session of the Conference, at which time reports will be made and officers for the ensuing year elected. Meetings of the Executive Committee will also be held at this time, for the purpose of arranging estimates to be sent to the General Executive Committee at † Isabella Thoburn (1840-1901) was born at St. Clairsville, Ohio, ninth of the ten children of Matthew and Jane Lyle Thoburn, Scotch-Irish immigrants, and died in Lucknow, India, of Asiatic cholera. She attended the public schools, and the Female Seminary of Wheeling, W. Va. She studied also for a year in the Cincinnati Academy of Design. Then she turned to teaching, first in a little summer school in Ohio, later as preceptress at a private school of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New Castle, Pa., and a similar position at Western Reserve Seminary. As the first missionary of the W.F.M.S. she arrived in India on Jan. 7, 1870, and went immediately to Lucknow, her home for thirty-one years. Here she threw herself with wholehearted zeal and courage into inspired plans for the Christian education of the girls and young women of India. She saw her little day school of six pupils, started in one room in a crowded bazaar, develop into a boarding school, a high school, a college for women—later the Isabella Thoburn College. Her ideal was realized of a Christian college for Indian and Eurasian, Hindu, Mohammedan, and Christian, in which no religious or racial pride or prejudice would mar its peace and fellowship. Three furloughs, 1880-31, 1886-90, 1899-1900—the first two imperative for health reasons, the third for raising funds for the college—were spent in America. During the second furlough she was the first housemother of the Chicago Deaconess Training School, and during two years (1889-90) helped lay the foundations of the Elizabeth Gamble Deaconess Home and Training School in Cincinnati, and of Christ Hospital under deaconess management. In India she also founded the Girls' High School (Kanpur), 1874, and helped in establishing the Wellesley School for Girls in Nainital (1891). For years she edited the Rafiq-i-Niswan (The Woman's Friend) and was the author of the life of Phebe Rowe.—"Isabella Thoburn," biographical sketch in Board of Missions Library; J. M. Thoburn, Life of Isabella Thoburn; Florence Hooper, "Isabella Thoburn—Creator of Ideals," in Program, 1940, W.M.C., Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

home, and to take counsel with reference to the work among the women and girls within the bounds of the India Conference.¹²⁷

The W.F.M.S. in their annual report recognized the India organization as an "India Branch of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society." Perhaps more significantly it marked also the beginning of the Woman's Conference, affiliated with the India (later, North India) Annual Conference, which in its fully developed form was declared by Thoburn to take "full cognizance of all the varied interests of . . . women's work."¹²⁸

ZENANA EVANGELISM

Both Isabella Thoburn and Fannie J. Sparkes, the third missionary of the W.F.M.S. to arrive in India, found zenana visiting beset by many difficulties. The "higher classes of Hindoo women" in Lucknow, Miss Thoburn wrote, ". . . have been as inaccessible to us as if they had been living in another world," while in Bareilly Miss Sparkes found "the prejudices of the people very difficult to overcome." Nevertheless, both met with an encouraging measure of success. A promising work in the Bengali zenanas of East Lucknow had been previously begun but "the conversion of . . . [a Hindu widow in Calcutta] so excited the fears of the Baboos in Lucknow, that they refused to permit missionary visits and instruction in their families." This caused discouragement for a time but by the close of the year other ways had opened so that the missionaries could go where they wished with the aid of "proper and sufficient help." In Bareilly access was gradually gained to one home after another until twenty families had been visited. Five of the twenty after receiving one or two visits told the missionaries not to come again, but the other fifteen continued to receive them:

all whom we visit will now allow us to read the Scriptures to them, and a few will read them for themselves. One woman in the first family we visited has accepted a copy of the gospel of St. John, from which she reads a little every day. She reads aloud to the other members of the family, and when we visit them, they tell us of what they had read. . . . Four families only have as yet commenced learning to read, but others have learned knitting, wool work, etc.¹²⁹

Lucknow was the center for zenana schools. Four had been opened in 1864, five years before the W.F.M.S. was organized, and the next year the Presiding Elder reported to the Missionary Advocate that while previously it had been "almost impossible to get girls or women to come to school . . . of late they . . . [had seemed] to have waked up to the importance . . . of education," and there were many more openings for schools than could be supported. The next year Messmore also wrote that many of those attending the Lucknow schools were making good progress. Numbers had completed the reading course and several had learned "to read fluently within a few weeks." He felt they attended from mixed motives but that there was reason to hope their "unrestrained study of the word of God" would commend itself to the Church.¹³⁰ The largest zenana school in Lucknow in 1870 enrolled fifty women and girls with an average attendance of forty to forty-five. Thirty were girls of six to fifteen years, the others women ranging in age to thirty-five. Many of the older registrants had attended the school from its beginning in 1864 and were able to read well. They also had acquired an elementary knowledge of arithmetic, geography, and the history of India and had learned to knit, sew, crochet, and embroider in wools. A class of the more advanced had been formed into a Bible class. Progress in learning in all of the zenana schools was extremely slow, partly because of the comparative indifference and indolence of the girls and women and partly also on account of the lack of adequate training of the young Indian women employed as teachers.¹³¹

The needs of other women also appealed to the missionaries. Those who attended the zenana schools were mostly of the higher and the middle classes. By far the larger number of the female population, however, were the village women who lived outside the zenanas, the wives and daughters of lower-caste men. In a limited way they were reached by the village evangelistic work of the missionaries and the Indian preachers but they also needed the ministry of Christian women if large numbers of them were to be brought into the Church. Evangelism for the special purpose of bringing the Gospel to women was early undertaken by Mrs. Zahur ul Haqq, who enlisted the aid of two other women.

Early in the morning of the 24th. [November, 1869] I went into the village and spread some sheets on the ground under a peepul tree, where we sat down and began to sing. Thirty women and ten men at once collected, and I read to them and also preached to them. Leaving there we went to Tasarpur, and sat down under a peepul tree. Ten or twelve women came to hear us sing, and we had some talk with them. Leaving there we went to Lilakhera. About forty women came together, and I read the fifth chapter of Matthew to them, and also talked to them. They listened gladly, and I hoped that some of them would soon become Christians. We next went to Dehra . . . About fifty women collected to hear our prayers and singing.¹³²

In 1882 Isabella Thoburn made a plea for what she termed zenana preaching. Zenana teaching, she felt, had "added one subject to another, . . . until we have perhaps come to lay too much stress upon it and too little upon preaching."

I use that word because no other so clearly expresses my meaning, and it is the word always used by our Bible women in North India. They say, when giving a report . . . , 'we have taught in so many houses and preached in so many,' meaning that they have read a portion of Scripture or sung a hymn, and then explained and illustrated, and closed with their own testimony and a personal appeal. . . . for the sake of the old women who will never read, of the servants who stand by, of the neighbours who will not open their own houses, but who come shyly in by a side door to see and hear, and of the pupils who may never finish the books they are reading, the opportunities should not be neglected.¹³³

ISABELLA THOBURN AND WOMEN'S EDUCATION

Isabella Thoburn fully realized that the uppermost thought in the minds of those who sent her to India was that she would become a messenger of light and life to the host of Indian women virtually imprisoned behind zenana bars. She took up zenana visiting with zeal and continuing interest but almost from her first hour in India another purpose began to take form in her mind and heart. She had been a teacher in America and naturally she was immediately impressed by the dire lack of school facilities for Indian girls. It early became evident to her that "as soon as converts . . . [began] to multiply in considerable numbers, their claims, especially in the matter of education, must become so imperative that other forms of work . . . [would] have to take a secondary place." She fully recognized the value of the beginnings that had been made earlier. The Moradabad Girls' Boarding School, begun in 1867 especially for daughters of poor native Christians, designed to fit them for a useful life in their country villages, appealed strongly to her but she had a different object in view.¹³⁴ She hoped to set a standard of education for the women of India fully as high as that projected for men:

If we do any great or good work among the women of India, we must show them the superiority of Christian womanhood; we must have trained Christian women to work with us. . . . [There is a field in India for] boarding schools such as we depend on for the education of girls . . . [in America].¹³⁵

Her conviction now clear Miss Thoburn took immediate action. She searched for a room in which to open a school and made it known that she proposed to start at once. Not finding anything more suitable, she rented a small one-room building on one of the noisiest streets of Lucknow. The school was opened on April 18, 1870, with six girls. In two months it had enrolled seventeen. By November the number had increased to twenty-five, of whom four were from outstations and boarded in the families of native Christians. Miss Thoburn's plan was to enroll girls not only from Lucknow and vicinity but also from the villages "where Christian girls have no advantages," and to make the school as far as possible self-supporting. If the school was to be successful in a large way, a suitable location was necessary. By singular good fortune a very desirable property—Lal Bagh, or Ruby Garden, "the second best house in the station," with nine acres of ground—was offered for sale in the spring of 1871. The missionaries encouraged Miss Thoburn to buy the property and establish on it not only the school but also the headquarters of women's work in Lucknow.¹³⁶ Negotiations were soon concluded.*

* "The owner demanded payment in coin, and two missionaries drove to a bank and brought away in their buggy fourteen bags, each containing one thousand silver rupees, which were delivered late on Saturday evening to the owner of the property." (J. M. Thoburn, Life of Isabella Thoburn, p. 108.) The Cincinnati Branch supplied the seven thousand dollars required by the purchase. A portion of the land was sold to provide a site for the English church, and the proceeds of the sale were applied to the cost of the schoolhouse. (Isabella Thoburn, "The Lucknow 'Home,'" Heathen Woman's Friend, XII [1881], 7 [January], 145-47.) This was the first property purchased by the W.F.M.S. on a foreign field.

The first commencement of the Lucknow Christian Girls' Boarding School was held at the close of 1872. The program of essays, dialogue recitations in English and in Hindustani, solos, duets, and quartettes, amazed the invited guests, especially the English friends of the mission, who were delighted with the performance of the pert, intelligent Christian girls. The quarters in the kothi used for school purposes having proved to be too small plans were made for a new school. Application was made for a government grant-in-aid. When the civil commissioner saw the plans, with accommodations for one hundred girls, he said, "You will never need such a building. There will never be that number of Christian girls in the Province. Cut it down and bring me plans for a smaller building . . ." Negotiations were continued and finally a grant was made. By Christmas, 1874, the school had enrolled ninety-seven pupils, forty of whom were boarders. The boarding hall had been enlarged and before the close of the school year accommodations in an auditorium were provided for 150 pupils. Through the efforts of Phoebe Rowe, a young Eurasian woman who had entered the school at almost its beginning, nearly all of the boarders gave "their hearts to the Saviour" and bore "a clear testimony to a changed life, both in words and deeds."¹³⁷

Year by year the Girls' Boarding School grew in popular esteem, becoming known not only in Lucknow but in places far removed. It was recognized as marking a new departure in Christian missionary work. In the whole of the northern part of the empire, with one exception, there was no other such institution. It gave a stimulus not only to Methodist missions but to the whole Christian missionary enterprise. As was to be expected, it did not meet with universal approval. There were some missionaries who looked askance at all efforts to give girls anything other than an elementary education. The stock argument was that anything more would spoil them as wives and mothers. Facing all such arguments Miss Thoburn was unmoved; rather than causing discouragement they stimulated her to enlarge her plans and to declare that the time would come when there would be a girls' boarding school in every District. Before she and her associates were ready to make an advance move a pressing demand arose within the student body for a higher institution of learning for women. This had been in her mind for some time but she was keenly aware of the difficulties involved. She was advised that any such move was premature. No missionary society, it was argued, would guarantee to supply the large sums of money required. Students in sufficient number to justify a college would not apply for entrance. To all these objections Isabella Thoburn opposed her vision and her faith.

In the meantime encouragement came from an unexpected source. The government in an annual Educational Report included this statement:

The Lal Bagh school takes the highest place among the native girls' schools of Upper India. One candidate was sent up for matriculation in the Calcutta University, and passed. Two others were sent up for first arts, and passed. If the school continues to pass such candidates, it will have to be classed as a college.

A class was organized in the school on the junior college level. On her second furlough, necessitated for reasons of health, Miss Thoburn gave her most earnest efforts by addresses and printed appeals to inspire contributions for a women's college in India. She received in special gifts channeled through the W.F.M.S. treasury, $8,052.10. Finally in 1895 the Lucknow Christian Girls' Boarding School "was recognized as a college, and a college charter granted by the Government." *

To Isabella Thoburn education was much more than the formal teaching of subject matter. In her thinking education was related to the whole of life. It concerned attitudes and conduct and the development of personality. She felt that a part of her special call as a missionary was to do everything within her power to break down the bars of class and race separation which were so strong in India. The problem confronted her on the opening day of her school. The little group of six girls had two Indians, two Eurasians, and two Europeans. In all Miss Thoburn's work through the years her guiding principle was the conviction that only the love of Christ enthroned in the heart of the individual and the spirit of Christ ruling his conduct would prove sufficient to overcome prejudice, contempt, bitterness, and hatred. Above all else, by precept and example, to inculcate love was her supreme endeavor.¹³⁸

MEDICAL AND ORPHANAGE WORK

In 1867 Mrs. D. W. Thomas, wife of the superintendent of the Girls' Orphanage in Bareilly, laid before local government officials the need for medical training of students of the Bareilly Girls' Orphanage. When her appeal failed she wrote to Mrs. J. T. Gracey asking her assistance in having a woman medical missionary sent from America. In response to this plea the W.F.M.S. sent to India in 1869—the year in which the Society was organized—Dr. Clara A. Swain.† As soon as she arrived at Bareilly efforts were begun to get a site for a women's hospital. The nawab of Rampore owned an estate in the city, which adjoined the mission premises, of which little use was made. Finally the British commissioner advised the missionaries to ask the nawab for the grounds. They had little hope of a favorable response since the official was a zealous Mohammedan, "utterly opposed to Christianity." A group of missionaries called on him at his palace in Rampore,‡ forty miles from † See p. 183. Also Vol. VI. Dr. Swain's success was immediate. Within her first year she prescribed for 1,225 patients and visited 250 women in their homes. Women from all classes came to her eagerly for medical aid. In March, 1885, after attending the wife of the rajah of the native state of Khetri, she was invited to become official physician "to the Rani and the ladies of the Palace." After prayerful consideration she agreed to remain for two years on condition that she should be entirely free to carry on Christian work among the women and children.—Mrs. Robert Hoskins, Clara A. Swain, M.D., First Medical Missionary to the Women of the Orient, pp. 16, 21.

‡ The nawab, who had boasted that Christian missionaries had never dared to enter the city of Rampore, upon hearing of their proposed visit sent four changes of horses, a coachman, two

Bareilly, and after the preliminaries which courtesy required Thomas hesitatingly explained that the mission desired, upon some terms, to procure his estate in Bareilly for a women's hospital. At this point, much to the astonishment of the missionaries, the nawab exclaimed, "Take it, take it; I give it to you with much pleasure for that purpose." The estate was worth not less than $15,000. including "forty-two acres of land, an immense brick house, two fine old walls, and a garden."¹³⁹

On March 1, 1870, Dr. Swain began her first class in medicine—sixteen orphanage girls and three women. The Woman's Hospital and Medical School (later the Clara Swain Hospital), the first hospital for women built by the W.F.M.S. in India, and the first women's hospital in all Asia, was completed on January 1, 1874. An appeal for funds was made both to the W.F.M.S. and to friends in India. The entire expense, including construction costs and repairs on existing buildings, was $10,300. Of this amount all was supplied by the W.F.M.S., excepting $350. On April 20, 1872, the first graduating class, thirteen in number, received certificates for practice.¹⁴⁰

The work of the orphanages, begun in the early days of the India mission, appealed so strongly to Methodist women that at its second annual meeting (1871) the General Executive voted "through correspondence with the missionaries at Paori, [to make] an effort . . . to build a Girls' Orphanage there, in which each Branch may be interested." Within a few months the new institution was under way. On April 15, 1872, Mrs. P. T. Wilson wrote, "Our little orphanage is a very interesting part of our Gurhwal work. . . . we have . . . obtained six [girls] . . . during the past seven months . . ." The orphans ranged from a two months' old baby to girls of eight or more years. In 1874 Almira Blake, the first orphan received into the Bareilly Orphanage, was matron and teacher. In that year there were fourteen girls and in 1892, seventy-two.¹⁴¹

From 1867 to and including 1895 the W.F.M.S. sent to North India fifty-nine unmarried women, of whom ten were medical missionaries. After their arrival on the field twenty-one married, most of whom continued as "assistant missionaries" under the aegis of the Missionary Society. Most of the others were teachers, principally of the girls' schools maintained by the W.F.M.S. A few taught in coeducational schools and a few served in various capacities in other types of missionary work.

The Woman's Conference (during the early years, the India Branch of the W.F.M.S.) in 1895 had a membership of thirty missionaries, twenty-four wives of missionaries, and seven Indian women. Auxiliary Societies were organized in all the central stations and in some villages. The auxiliaries reported Rs. 793 contributed during the year. The Woman's Conference was closely linked with the North India Annual Conference, with five mis-grooms, and an outrider to bring them. The details of their reception and interview are a rare missionary classic worthy of reprinting in its entirety.

sionaries' wives and two W.F.M.S. missionaries on the Finance and Reference Committee.* In reporting to the 1892 General Conference Bishop Thoburn said:

we believe we are doing our uttermost for the future advancement of the women of India when we throw wide open to our Christian sisters every sphere of labor in which they can do their Master's work.¹⁴²

WILLIAM TAYLOR IN INDIA

The 1870 session of the India Mission was met with the news that William Taylor† proposed "to visit India on an evangelistic tour." The announcement was of great import not only to the Methodists but to the churches of India as a whole. William Taylor since his California days had an amazing record of successful evangelistic campaigns around the globe: thousands had experienced conversion during a four-year period in Australia; in seven months' time in South Africa twelve hundred English-speaking colonists had been converted, and in the West Indies in one year five thousand new members had been brought into the Wesleyan churches. Less spectacular but equally encouraging campaigns had been conducted in Canada and Europe.

As early as 1863, while in Australia, Taylor had been invited by a Baptist missionary to make an evangelistic tour of India. A year later in New South

† William Taylor (1821-1902) was born in Rockbridge County, Va. His father was of Scotch-Irish and his mother of English descent. They were members during their early married life of the Presbyterian Church but later united with the Methodists. On Aug. 28, 1841, at a Camp Meeting, after groping for six years in spiritual darkness, William was "restored to . . . [his] standing in the kingdom and family of God." In October, 1842, he was appointed by his Presiding Elder to the Franklin Circuit, Baltimore Conference. The next year (March, 1843) he was received on trial and appointed junior preacher on the Deerfield Circuit. In October, 1846, he was married to Annie Kimberlin in Botetourt County, Va., who—she later wrote—shared with him the storms and hardships of life "with the spirit and courage of a true heroine." In 1848 Taylor was appointed by Bishop Wagh as one of two missionaries to the California Mission (see pp. 233-34). Leaving California in 1856, for five years he did evangelistic work, first in the eastern states and later in the West and in Canada. In May, 1862, he sailed for England, beginning a worldwide ministry of thirteen years. In 1875 he returned to the United States. Of his later work in South America and elsewhere account is given in subsequent chapters of this volume. He wrote many books which, largely through his own efforts, had a remarkable circulation. While in attendance at the General Conference of 1884 with credentials as a lay delegate from the South India Conference, he was elected Missionary Bishop for Africa. He was retired by the 1896 General Conference. His last years were spent in feeble health.—William Taylor, Story of My Life . . . ; "Bishop William Taylor, World Evangelist," in Missionary Review of the World, August, 1902, pp. 609-13.

Wales an Anglican missionary repeated the invitation. While in the West Indies he received an entreaty from Thoburn to come to the aid of the Methodists. Now he was arriving, persuaded that he was providentially called. The Conference voted a resolution to invite him to spend as much of his time within the bounds of the mission as his general plan would permit.

Taylor arrived in Bombay on November 20, 1870, and on the twenty-fifth was met at the Lucknow station by Thoburn, Waugh, and Parker. On Sunday morning, the twenty-seventh, he preached at Lucknow his first sermon in India. This was the beginning of an intensive campaign which was continued with unremitting zeal for four years and two months. During the period he inaugurated and maintained a more or less extensive work in seven cities. These centers, in the order in which his ministry was begun in them, were: Lucknow, 1870; Kanpur (Cawnpore), 1870; Bombay, 1871; Poona, 1872; Calcutta, 1873; Madras, 1874; Bangalore, 1874. In numerous other centers he gave impetus to the established program of missions.¹⁴³

THE SCOPE AND CHARACTER OF TAYLOR'S EVANGELISTIC MINISTRY

The meetings begun on Sunday, November 27, in the East Lucknow Chapel continued until Friday, December 16, twenty days, with two services each day—at seven in the morning for the native people and at six in the evening for Europeans and Eurasians.* Taylor preached at both services, in the morning speaking through an interpreter.

On the first day a decision was reached which determined the main purpose of Taylor's ministry for his entire stay in India. The American missionaries had been accustomed to preach to the Indians in the vernacular and to conduct services only incidentally in English for the British, other Europeans, and Eurasians. In accordance with the original instructions of the Missionary Society, their labors had been concentrated on work with the Indian population. Whether in Lucknow, or elsewhere, there had been little effort to get English-speaking people converted and to use them in the work of the mission. With this procedure Taylor took issue immediately. He felt that there were unused human resources in the European population for the Christianization of the Indian masses and that his calling above all else was to awaken spiritually and enlist in the cause the vast number of non-interested English-speaking people.†

* The Lucknow meetings were not largely attended and the results were disappointing. On Sunday morning Taylor preached to a congregation "of about 130 natives, from Acts 1.8." At six o'clock he preached again, this time to "a congregation of over a hundred English-speaking people, Europeans, and Eurasians." The second evening meeting drew only a small congregation, "about sixty hearers." On Tuesday about eighty came and on the succeeding nights about the same number, except on the two Sundays when the house was filled. Not until the third meeting (Tuesday evening) was a call made for "seekers," when seven "came forward, and five of them professed to obtain peace with God." On Wednesday evening there was no response but the next night "seven seekers [came] forward, and three professed."—William Taylor, Four Years' Campaign in India, ch. II passim.

† Taylor elaborated his thesis at various times in different ways. For example, in a letter to Daniel Curry, editor of the Christian Advocate, he said: "Many missionaries, under instructions designed to prevent a diversion of their time and toil from the native work, make but little effort to get the Europeans and Eurasians converted to God. They are trying to dig around this stratum of society to get access to the native strata beneath—a most difficult task. Now I am sure that the best

I took strong ground from the start [Taylor wrote later] in favour of getting these Europeans and East Indians saved and incorporated into our Mission working force. In their present state the mass of them make a false showing of Christianity, and are terribly obstructive to our great work of leading the heathen and Mohammedans to Jesus.¹⁴⁴

Taylor's contention was agreed to by the missionaries with the result that, as Thoburn stated, the Taylor meetings became "an era in the history of . . . [the Methodist work] in India." They committed the mission "fully and irrevocably to work among the English-speaking people; . . . [they] put an end to the aimless kind of English services we had been holding, and . . . [were] an inauguration of a style of Gospel labor which has since spread all over India, and has resulted in incalculable good."¹⁴⁵ On Wednesday morning, December 7, Taylor called the workers into council and asked them to consider whether the doors of the Methodist Church should be opened to "gather of the fruits of our labour, or let them drift?" He was sure it was the right thing to do for, he said, they were not really members of any Church, although nominally Roman Catholic or Anglican. The workers decided to invite candidates for membership to present themselves.* On Thursday evening only one person, a woman, responded to the invitation but by Tuesday, the thirteenth, twenty-five had joined the Church.

Attendance at the morning services for Indians was about the same as at the evening meetings. Not until Wednesday morning, November 30, was an invitation extended, when twelve "seekers came forward, and ten of them professed to find the pardon of their sins, and gave a clear testimony." From day to day others came, on one morning as many as twelve, and on another twenty. Altogether, by December 13, in the morning and evening meetings, over one hundred persons had "been forward as seekers, most of whom . . . [professed] to have found remission of sins." The meetings were closed to enable Taylor to respond to an urgent invitation from Kanpur.¹⁴⁶ way to reach the masses below is to cut straight through the surface stratum, and utilize every block of it . . . as 'a living stone built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets,' on which to rear the superstructure of a powerful vital native Church of Christ."—William Taylor, letter, Christian Advocate, XLVIII (1873), 20 (May 15), 153.

As a result of the Taylor meetings the Lucknow church membership, †

* On April 1, 1860, Ralph Pierce had written to William Butler: "In my opinion, the relation of our mission to not only the soldiers but the other classes of the European population, has become a question demanding distinct and serious consideration." Butler, in turn, passed on the suggestion of establishing a church in Lucknow for Europeans to Durbin, since in his opinion the financial support of the Missionary Society would be required. In his letter he said that there were in the city "from two thousand to three thousand persons of mixed blood, being chiefly children of European fathers by native mothers, and who speak the English language, and are ready prepared for the Gospel." From these he believed it would be possible to "derive many and valuable helpers in our missions, as the Wesleyans have done in Ceylon." No action resulted from Butler's suggestion.—Letter, Missionary Advocate, XVI (1860), 7 (October), 49 f.

† English work in Lucknow was begun in September, 1858, by Pierce and continued by Cawdell and Baume. It was later taken over by the British Wesleyans. In 1867 Jackson, stationed at East Lucknow, again began services in English in the mission house. (R. Pierce, rep., Missionary Advocate, XV [1859], 8 [November], 57 f.; Minutes, India Mission Conference, 1867, p. 37.) No church members were reported in the Conference statistics for that year. Waugh, stationed at East Lucknow in 1868, stated that at "the beginning of the year no enrollment of Members, Probationers, etc., was found." He then formed a Society by "gathering in all the native Christians and inquirers," and at the end of the year reported twenty members and eleven probationers. (Minutes, India Mission Conference, 1868, pp. 8 f.; ibid., 1869, p. 75.) Whether this enumeration of members included both native Christians and English speaking (British and Eurasian) Christians is uncertain. However, in probably both Indian and English-speaking, increased from thirty-four (as reported at the January, 1870, Conference), to forty-six (reported the next year). On July 2, 1871, "twenty-one persons, eight Hindustani, and thirteen English," were received into full membership after six months' probation. The total increase in 1871 was twenty-three—from forty-six to sixty-nine—and for the year 1872 ninety-one members were reported. At the close of 1871 Thoburn reported as Presiding Elder:

A good work has gone steadily forward during the year, and God has put it into the hearts of not a few persons to work for the heathen around them. Some have preached successfully to the natives, some have been useful in holding prayer meetings, a score have become Sunday-school teachers, and in others the poor have found friends indeed. A work of reformation has been quietly going forward, and more than one home has grown brighter during the year. . . . no less than sixteen persons, formerly living in open adultery, have been married during the year, while several other parties involved in the same domestic shame, have voluntarily separated.¹⁴⁷

Among the first persons to unite with the English Lucknow church was Dennis Osborne,* formerly a member of the Church of Scotland at Allahabad, who amply demonstrated the validity of Taylor's thesis. Under the evangelist's preaching "he received a rich anointing of the Holy Spirit," united with the Methodist Church, and became the first Class Leader of the Lucknow English church. In the Wesleyan tradition he began to hold prayer meetings in his own house, gathered in his neighbors, and soon developed a surprising gift of exhortation. On an evening when the missionary who had been announced to preach at the public service became ill and no one volunteered to take his place Osborne was constrained, on a moment's notice, to enter the pulpit and take over the service. He preached with an unction which amazed his hearers and within a short time was recognized as one of the most successful preachers in India. Calls came to him from far and wide to hold evangelistic meetings. Almost everywhere he went he organized within a few days or weeks Methodist churches. He established missions in what later became some of the most important Methodist centers of India, including Allahabad, Agra, Meerut, Roorkee, Lahore, and Mussooree.¹⁴⁸

On December 9 Taylor received a letter from a physician in Kanpur—whom his next report Waugh said that the "English congregation has grown in numbers," and the "usual attendance at the close of the year was between 60 and 70 persons."—Minutes, India Mission Conference, 1869, p. 7.

* Dennis Osborne (1844-1902) was born in Banaras, attended a government school in Agra, and afterward entered government service in which he continued for sixteen years. For several years he was assistant secretary of Public Works, Northwest Province. In 1874, as one of the members of the Bombay and Bengal Mission, he was admitted on trial to the India Conference (Minutes, India Mission Conference, 1874, p. 39). He was appointed to Allahabad where he served as pastor for six years. He was a charter member of the South India Conference (1876), and in 1879 was made Presiding Elder of the Allahabad District, continuing in the presiding eldership until the close of his ministry in 1902, serving successively on the same District (although the name was changed twice) in the South India, Bengal, and Northwest India Conferences. In 1897 he was transferred to the Bombay Conference and appointed Presiding Elder of the Bombay District. He was a delegate to the 1884 and the 1896 General Conferences. While in America in 1884 he made numerous addresses and won many many friends for India. In 1898 he was formally recognized as a missionary of the Church.—Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions.

he had previously met in London—inviting him to hold meetings there. Kanpur, a city of some 100,000 people, was west of the Ganges. A door had been opened by Thoburn, who had preached there several times.* Taylor spent Sunday, the eleventh, in the city and reported that the doctor very much desired him to come. The missionaries were divided, some urging that since Kanpur was outside the India Conference boundaries Methodists had no right to go there, but it was finally agreed that Taylor “might go and see what the Lord had for . . . [him] to do there.” On Sunday, the eighteenth, he opened his campaign by preaching three times to small congregations of soldiers and civilians. During the week he visited “many soldiers’ families” and “preached every night; but with no decisive results in the way of conversions.” During the Christmas holidays the English preaching series was suspended but he established meeting places in two Eurasian homes where he held services every day. He also preached daily in the bazaars. After New Year’s the evangelistic services were renewed, continuing until January 10. Candidates for membership were organized into two Classes, one of fourteen and one of eight members.

A petition was drawn up, signed by many of the leading men of the city, asking the Conference to include Kanpur as a station and appoint to it a missionary. The petition was accompanied by a subscription list of eighty rupees a month toward a missionary’s support. The Kanpur request precipitated considerable discussion at the Conference session (January 12, 1871), in which Taylor participated. Some members of Conference favored sending a missionary but it seemed impossible to spare one. Consequently, a motion was adopted requesting the “president of the Conference . . . to place Cawnpore on the list of stations, provided a European missionary be not appointed.”¹⁴⁹ Piyarey M. Mukerji was admitted on trial and assigned to Kanpur. In December, 1871, Wallace J. Gladwin arrived in India and at the January, 1872, Conference was appointed to Kanpur despite the limitation imposed by the preceding Conference action.

Leaving Kanpur in January, 1871, Taylor made an extensive evangelistic tour in the course of which he conducted numerous brief preaching missions.†

* One week during Thoburn’s first year in Lucknow (1870) when he chanced to have no Sunday preaching appointment he responded to an appeal to preach in Kanpur. “I found,” he says, “. . . about fifty persons, worshipping in a hired store-room, and served two Sundays in the month by Presbyterian and Baptist missionaries from Allahabad. I was received most cordially, and was not only invited to return, but urged to plant a mission in the place, or, if not able to do this, at least to arrange for preachers to go over from Lucknow on the vacant Sundays. I was anxious to drive in our stakes at once, but . . . [the established boundary of our mission, the laws of comity, and the rule that no new station should be opened except by order of the Annual Conference all stood in the way]. . . . On my return to Lucknow I invited our Wesleyan missionary brother to take a part in these services, which he did for a time, but subsequently both he and the Baptist brethren withdrew in our favor. In this way we were led to begin work on the western bank of the Ganges . . .”—J. M. Thoburn, My Missionary Apprenticeship, pp. 274, 275 f.

† Meetings were held during this period at Sitapur (Jan. 25-27), Panahpur (Jan. 29-31), Shah-jahanpur (Feb. 1-6), Bareilly (Feb. 8-16), and Budaun. (From this point on he discontinued his day-by-day diary, merely listing places where he preached.) His itinerary included Chandausi, Babukhera, Joa, Sambhal, Bashta, Amroha, Moradabad, Meerut, Ambala, Bijnor, Alмора, and Pauri. September he set apart “for a pilgrimage with the natives, to study them, and learn what they did and suffered to get rest for their souls,” visiting the celebrated shrines Badrinath and Kidernath in the Himalaya Mountains.—W. Taylor, Four Years’ Campaign in India, chs. VII-VIII passim.

In October he spent "a few days preaching for . . . [the] American Presbyterian" Missions at Dhera Dun and Lahore. On October 22 he arrived at Bombay. He next attended (October 26-November 8) the annual meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions at Ahmednagar, where he preached daily, except Saturday, through an interpreter to small congregations of Indian hearers. From November 12 to December 1 he conducted a series of preaching services at the Marathi Mission of the American Board at Bombay.¹⁵⁰ His success in these various series of meetings was not phenomenal. They did not come up to the expectations of many, although some missionaries reported good results.* The Methodists, in general, commended them while representatives of more conservative and formal denominations were critical. Taylor was quick to speak in his own defense and was ready with an explanation:

A vast amount of valuable preparatory work has been done in India, especially in education, . . . but the spiritual development and adjustment of agency are entirely behind that of any other mission-field in which I have laboured—while the combination of the opposing forces here in India probably exceed those of any other part of the globe. My brethren here, having read of my labours and successes in Africa, got an idea that I would at once attack the masses in the streets, and mow them down like grass in a hay-field; but instead of that I began, where I always begin, with the members of the church. In other fields we found them in such an advanced state of preparation, that with but little loss of time we were ready with a powerful force of holy men and women to march at once to the front and rescue captive souls from the enemy; but here my limited time was nearly all taken up in barracks, hospitals, and parade-grounds—where, to be sure, much good was done of its kind.¹⁵¹

Taylor began his English work in Bombay on December 3, 1871, in connection with the Free Church of Scotland mission, also holding services on Monday "in the Scotch Orphanage for native girls." He preached in Institution Hall, in the House of Correction, at the Pensioners' Home, the American Chapel, the library of the Peninsular and Oriental Company's dockyard, and various other places including several private homes. The pulpits of the city were closed to him "with the exception of one night in the Free Church on the Esplanade . . . [and] two native mission chapels." His meetings continued until August 13, 1872. Seldom was a meeting held without at least one conversion, and frequently several professed coming into a new relationship to God. By December 22, 1871, over sixty persons in Bombay had been converted. Was this not evidence of a genuine revival? Taylor believed that it was. George Bowen, his associate, and editor of the Bombay Guardian, wrote:

* Frank M. Wheeler wrote concerning Taylor's visit to Moradabad: "Bro. Taylor's tour through my part of the field was a most important event. The helpers were both quickened in their experience and instructed for their work. Some 18 or 20 English speaking people were converted in Moradabad under his ministrations. None of these, however, saw fit to unite with our church . . ."—Minutes, India Mission Conference, 1871, p. 9.

The word of God is now taking effect in the midst of us in a way that we have never before witnessed; many are deeply convinced of sin, and are earnestly seeking the Saviour; many Christians are convinced that they have been living miserably below their privileges, and with a most defective sense of the claims of Christ upon them, and are seeking with their whole heart forgiveness for their past lukewarmness, an assurance of their acceptance with God, with entire consecration to the Redeemer, that they may be his witness before men; a number are rejoicing in a new life, in a personal, present, all-sufficient Saviour; are we not entitled to speak of this as a Revival? God is now, we believe, answering the prayers of many years, and we earnestly and affectionately beg our Christian brethren of different denominations not to allow themselves to be separated from this work of grace by pre-conceptions, prejudices, unworthy suspicions, and the like. The apostles were spoken of as men who had turned the world upside down. The world never needed turning upside down more than at present; and such an operation can hardly be accomplished with kid gloves, or without a good deal of crashing and dust.¹⁵²

In the first days of the Bombay meetings Taylor's mind was not clear as to the ultimate objective of the campaign. There was not a Methodist Society within eight hundred miles. The missionaries of other Protestant Churches were not overly sympathetic with his evangelistic methods. "But whether," he wrote in his day-by-day diary, in Central and Southern India, God intends a regular distinct Methodist organization alongside of existing churches, or whether He may not leaven all these with the true leaven of the Gospel, and amalgamate the whole, or draw out from the whole, . . .—an indigenous Church of Christ, without formal connexion with any foreign church, or support from any—I cannot tell. I have no plan, and don't intend to have any, except to discern and follow, at any hazard, the Lord's plan, as He may be pleased to reveal it.¹⁵³

In the meantime his English-speaking converts, some without Church connection and others with a merely tenuous one, were pressing him to tell them how and where they could find pastoral care and spiritual fellowship. He proceeded to form fellowship bands,* analogous to the Bands formed by Wesley in the early Methodist Societies. "I am convinced," he remarked on December 12, that the churches here ". . . have no strength to nurse and build up any more converts than we have already had; . . . we shall organize them into bands, and set them to helping each other." On December 30 he organized the first fellowship band in the house of a Mrs. Miles, a "Christian Jewess"; on New Year's the second; on January 13, the third; then the fourth, the fifth, and sixth, and others until on March 11 Band No. 10 was formed, offer-

* There were fellowship bands in Bombay, interdenominational in membership, before the Taylor meetings began. The Bombay Guardian of March 3, 1871, quotes a Bombay correspondent of the Bengal Christian Herald as saying that he had never been "more deeply impressed with the genuine love for their Lord which draws Christian people together than when . . . [he] first saw a few of the meetings held by these Christian brethren These meetings are held in different houses and in different parts of the town; not a single evening passes without there being one or two meetings held Here you will see the soldier and the civilian, the merchant and the mechanic, all join in speaking or hearing of the love of their common Saviour in whom they are one, Episcopalian and the Presbyterian, the Independent and the Baptist, the Wesleyan and the Plymouth Brother, all join as believers in the same Lord, and all return refreshed and rejoicing."—Bombay Guardian, XVII (1871), 3 (March 18), 22.

ing individuals the opportunity of "mutual confession of their 'faults one to another,' and sympathy and prayer for each other." He considered it necessary to retain oversight of all the bands himself, appointing and training leaders to help bear the responsibility "of caring for so many newborn souls." His experience also taught him "the utter weakness of a heterogeneous fellowship band, outside of proper church organization." Should he take the next step, taking upon himself the responsibility of organizing a Church? He had expected, when he had completed his mission in Bombay, to return to California. "It is over four years since I saw my dear wife and boys, and my plan was to return home this year . . ." ¹⁵⁴ But now a light came in which his duty seemed to him unmistakably clear :

To organize a witnessing, aggressive Church of Christ in India, in organic union with existing churches here, we have found to be entirely impracticable; to try to run on a purely independent line, outside of existing organizations, is to fail, or to found a new sect—and we have too many of them already. The Methodist Episcopal Church of America has as good a right, as God may indicate her line of advance in her world-wide mission, to organize in Bombay, or anywhere else, as any other branch of the Church of Christ.¹⁵⁵

On February 8 Taylor received a letter from a Bombay convert, George Miles,* asking "for the establishment of a Methodist Episcopal Church" in Bombay, and requesting that Taylor act as the "pastor and evangelist until such time as . . . [he could] make arrangements with the Home Board for sending out the necessary . . . [preacher] to this city." In addition to Miles, the letter was signed by thirty of Taylor's converts and within four days the number of petitioners had increased to eighty-three.¹⁵⁶ On February 14 Taylor wrote a letter formally accepting their call :

A number of you will bear me witness, that when at different times you spoke to me on the necessity of organizing a Methodist Church in Bombay, to conserve and extend the fruits of this work of God, I advised you not to think about that, but to go on in the soul-saving work in which the Holy Spirit was using you, and that God would in due time manifest clearly the course you ought to pursue. I could not anticipate what it might be, but was fully resigned to follow wherever He might lead.

Under later unmistakable indications, I now see with you the guiding hand of God by which you have been led to your present conclusion, and I am bound by my loyalty to Christ to concur with you in this movement. . . . Let it be distinctly understood that we do not wish to hinder, but to help the spiritual progress of all pre-existing Churches in this great country.

. . . persons who have a vital spiritual union with any Church, and a field of usefulness therein, we sincerely advise to remain in their own Church. We are not at liberty to refuse any persons who have a 'desire to flee from the wrath to come, and be saved from their sins,' but we do not wish any truly saved man to leave his Church to come to us. On the other hand, persons who are influenced

* George Miles had professed conversion on December 19 and within a few days had become one of the most zealous of Taylor's converts. The second fellowship band was organized in his home. Evidently the organization of a church had been a subject of conference between Taylor and Miles preceding the writing of the letter.—W. Taylor, Four Years' Campaign in India, pp. 119, 126.

by worldly motives would make a very great mistake in trying to ally themselves with us. All who join the Methodists should make up their minds to 'endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ,' and prove the truth of the Saviour's saying, 'Blessed are ye when men shall revile you, and shall persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake.'

* * * *

I will make application at once for missionary pastors to be sent to assist you in your great work. In the meantime (D.V.) serve you to the best of my ability till they shall arrive; but must be allowed, as heretofore, to decline to receive any fee or reward for my services.

Your brother in Jesus,

WILLIAM TAYLOR.¹⁵⁷

Bombay, 14th February 1872.

Taylor had no more than begun meetings in Bombay when George Bowen,* who had come to India from America twenty-three years before as a missionary of the American Board, joined with him in his evangelistic campaign. Thus was begun an intimate association that was of immense help to the evangelist. If Taylor had combed all India in a search for an associate he could not have found another man capable of aiding him so efficiently and in so many different ways. Bowen was widely known as editor of the Bombay Guardian, the most influential Christian periodical in India. Aside from his editorship he had a wide personal acquaintance not only among missionaries but also among Indians in all walks of life, and wherever he was known he was highly esteemed and, by many, Christians and non-Christians, deeply beloved. Thoburn characterized him as a "saintly and venerable . . . man whose praise was in all the churches of the East, . . . [who had] a commanding influence in the city of Bombay . . ." He was completely in sympathy with Taylor's purpose, his religious points of view, and his methods. He vigorously defended Taylor from the beginning of his work in Bombay against the animadversions of his critics, declaring "that often when hearing . . . [him]

* George Bowen (1816-88) was born in Middlebury, Vt. When twelve he moved with his parents to New York City and began at once to work in his father's counting house. This terminated his formal schooling, though he continued to study French, Italian, and Spanish under a tutor, indulged besides a passionate love for music, and remained an omnivorous reader. At seventeen he quieted his atheistic speculations by settling on Deism as a rational explanation for the universe, and maintained this position for eleven years. During this youthful period he had the advantage of traveling and living abroad for three years, and had a full life of activities. All was changed, however, upon his meeting when twenty-six years old a young woman who totally captured his heart. Her untimely death was the beginning of his transformation. Overwhelmed with sorrow, he turned to reading for consolation her Bible which she had bequeathed him, and proceeded from that to Paley's Evidences of Christianity. On Good Friday in April, 1844, he wrote in his diary, "The Christianity of the Bible is true." In the fall of 1844 he entered Union Theological Seminary. Before graduation he offered himself to the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for service in India and was accepted. On January 19, 1848, he landed in Bombay. A year later his conscience led him to renounce his salary and live in poverty that he might "exhibit to the heathen self-denial and indifference to the world." Bananas and bread sufficed for food; he wore old but clean clothing, and lived in one room devoid of furniture save for a table from which he ate and on which he slept. For five years he continued as a member of the American Board mission, though he received no salary. In May, 1855, he entirely severed his connections, but later for six years (1865-71) his relationship was re-established. In 1874, influenced by the evangelistic spirit and method of William Taylor, he became a member of the South India Conference. He continued until his death a self-supporting worker, honored and beloved alike by missionaries and Indian Christians. "To Brahmin and Parsi, to Jew and Moslem," wrote Dennis Osborne, "the life of George Bowen has been an open book, every line of which has portrayed godliness and truth." "Christ lived in that life and shone from it at every point."—Robert E. Speer, George Bowen of Bombay, Missionary, Scholar, Mystic, Saint, A Memoir.

preach . . . [he had thought that he] had never heard the Gospel preached by any other man so fully, so faithfully, so effectively." He "preached," Bowen declared, "the very Gospel I delight in, fulness of peace and fulness of consecration, making war upon all sin with the banner of good." Taylor, for his part, was equally impressed by Bowen. "All the people of this region, high and low, European and native," he wrote, "know George Bowen and set him down without debate as a saint. He is a learned man, an author, a clear thinker, a transparent preacher of great humility and usefulness, a good musician—a John the Baptist, to prepare the way for the Lord's coming to establish the self-supporting Indian Mission . . ." ¹⁵⁸

Bowen entered heartily into the activities of the evangelistic campaign. After Taylor's sermon, Bowen would offer his personal testimony that "the Lord Jesus was alive, and that . . . [he] knew Him as a personal Saviour"; when, in response to Taylor's invitation, penitents came forward Bowen talked with them; he often accompanied Taylor to his preaching places—whether a private home, the House of Correction, the hall at Falkland Road, or elsewhere; sometimes after the sermon Bowen exhorted. When Taylor organized the first fellowship band Bowen was appointed leader.

The India Annual Conference in its January, 1872, session took action recommending its Presiding Elders "to organize in connection with our Church, any persons who may desire our pastoral oversight, whether said persons live within the present limits of our mission field or not . . ." ¹⁵⁹ Taylor now had India Methodism solidly behind him in his evangelistic campaign. But this alone did not satisfy him. Would the Church through its highest body sanction his enterprise? He would find out. On May 1, 1872, he addressed a communication "To the General Conference." He enclosed a copy of his "Circuit Plan," and stated that since Moradabad, the seat of the most recent session of the India Mission Conference, was "about 1,400 miles distant" it was evident that his mission could not "in reason be appended to that Conference." He then added a few more particulars concerning his work and concluded by asking the General Conference at its forthcoming session to grant "a charter for the organization of a Bombay Conference—not a Mission Conference." "If we stand alone on our own legs, by the power of God, why call it a Mission Conference." ¹⁶⁰

Taylor's letter was treated as a memorial. It was presented to the General Conference by Henry Mansell and referred to the Committee on Boundaries. It was not reported out for consideration by the Conference. ¹⁶¹

Unperturbed by the failure of General Conference to grant his petition, Taylor went on with his work as before, though receiving less publicity through the press. Bowen gave the reason for this:

Mr. Taylor has been working in a more quiet way, conducting meetings in private houses, for some weeks in one part of Bombay, then for a while in another part. The public services on the Lord's Day are stated and regular, and generally known. Smaller meetings in houses often furnish better opportunities of dealing with awakened souls individually and of leading them to Christ, than meetings in public halls do. Another reason for not referring to the matter is that others are coming forward to engage in this work, and that for some time there have been three sets of services nightly, four days in the week, in different parts of Bombay, and one of these carried on now for three weeks, and favoured with tokens of the Lord's saving presence, has been entirely without Mr. Taylor's personal participation.¹⁶²

Earlier, in March, Taylor had addressed a letter to Bishop Janes stating that he had "nine classes, in which over 130 converts meet weekly; and newly-saved souls are being 'added daily.'"

We hereby ask you, and our Missionary Committee, to send us men as we may require them, but not money. If you wish to pay their passage to Bombay, and can, . . . without placing this Mission on the list of dependent Missions, all right. One appropriation of funds from any Missionary Society would set upon us the brand-mark of existing Indian Missions, and tend to bring us down to their dead level.

* * * *

. . . We now ask the Committee, through you, to send two young men—single men—if engaged, well; if not, better. We want men of good practical common sense: if liberally educated, well; but sound in body, wholly devoted to God, ready to do or die for Jesus in India, and who will trust God and His Indian Methodists for food and raiment. . . .

. . . I will (D. V.) be here to receive them, and initiate them into their work.¹⁶³

On November 22, 1872, William E. Robbins, a graduate of Indiana Asbury College and a member of the Indiana Conference, arrived in Bombay from America. He had read Taylor's call for men willing to enlist as missionaries unsupported by any missionary society and had concluded that it was God's will for him to volunteer. Without "conferring with flesh and blood" he started at once for India at his own expense, arriving before anyone had word of his intention. Concerning him Taylor wrote, "He learned to preach in the Maratti language before he was a year in India. If the Lord has any more just like him, I hope he will send them along." The Missionary Society had also acted. As it had no authority "to create a new Mission" and the case apparently "was one of great urgency," the Board voted an appropriation from the contingent fund for transportation and Bishop Harris appointed Albert Norton of the Delaware Conference and Daniel O. Fox of the North Ohio Conference. On December 1 they reached Bombay. There were now five ministers associated with Taylor in his evangelistic campaign, viz.: Bowen, Robbins, Norton, Fox, and James Shaw (formerly of the Army Scripture Readers Society in India).¹⁶⁴

The enlarged staff made more bazaar preaching in English possible. Four days in the week Norton, Robbins, and Shaw preached on the Esplanade in the late afternoon when the many clerks from the numerous business houses in the neighborhood were leaving their offices. A number of men and women converts assisted by joining in the singing and offering their personal testimony to the efficacy of the Gospel in their lives. Sometimes the meetings were attended by "a good deal of rudeness and noisy opposition," though the audiences generally conducted themselves "with great propriety." The antagonism bore witness to the scorn with which many of the so-called "better class" regarded Taylor, his methods, and his associates. Bowen wrote to his sisters:

I do not think you can have any idea of the way we Methodists are spoken of in India. Scarcely any of the upper class have joined us, nor do they even come near us. The few such who have joined need a great deal of grace not to get separated from us, they are brought so much into collision with people that detest us. . . . The papers lose no opportunity of running us down.¹⁶⁵

Bowen did not hesitate in the Guardian to reproach the leading English language newspapers for their inconsistency. They had been accustomed, he said editorially, to complain of the comparatively feeble results of the ministry of ministers and missionaries; they had condemned them for want of earnestness and self-sacrifice, "their disposition to make themselves comfortable and take things easy." Now, he said, there is a man among us who sometimes preaches eight hours on the Sunday, and morning and evening, daily from Monday to Friday, spending much time also in house to house visitation, . . . asking and taking nothing from any, except their love, supporting himself, . . . seeking by the consecration of all his powers to save the unsaved, and to show Christians the greatness of their vocation, and as soon as he sees a witnessing, rejoicing, consecrated body of Christians in a place, going off to pursue the same work elsewhere, and doing this year after year, . . . one would have thought that our monitors, so severe upon preachers for their inactivity, unadaptedness, and inefficiency, would hail with unmingled joy one so boldly and successfully aggressive.¹⁶⁶

Whether it was the effect of the Guardian's repeated protests and reproaches, or simply their own sober second thoughts, some of the newspapers—notably the Indian Statesman—took a different tack. This journal remarked:

The excitement which attended the Rev. Mr. Taylor's first services in Bombay, has now disappeared, and we are better able to appreciate the real character of the man and his work. . . . Mr. Taylor is neither a sour fanatic or a wild enthusiast, but a hearty, genial man, full of healthy Christian life, and strong convictions, which, whether we are able fully to share them or not, are marked by broad and loving sympathies for all mankind. . . . we heartily wish Mr. Taylor God speed, and strongly recommend his books to our readers.¹⁶⁷

Under Taylor's supervision the work in Bombay steadily continued to expand. On December 29 about fifty persons were received into full membership in the church at the Falkland Road Hall which was the predecessor of Grant Road Church.¹⁶⁸

During the summer of 1872, after two preliminary visits, Taylor had "commenced operations" in what he called "the siege of Poona." The pastor of the Free Church of Scotland cooperated heartily with him, early meetings being held "in the Free Church Institution" and in the "Free Church Mission Church." Taylor considered it necessary to divide his time between Poona and Bombay but during his absences Bowen took his place. Progress was much more rapid than in the beginning in Bombay. During August and September more than a hundred professed "to have found the Lord."¹⁶⁹

Taylor's understanding in advance with the pastor of the Scotch Free Church was that he would do what he "might be able, to help him build up his own church" but that converts "should be at liberty, without any after-claps or reflections, if they in their judgment and conscience should so elect, to organize themselves into a Methodist Church." Taylor's procedure was not to urge or ask converts to join the Methodist Church:

Those voluntarily unite with us, who are convinced that it is their duty by the force of our Bible teaching and the leading of the 'Spirit of truth.' In fact, we are a 'sect so much spoken against,' in India, that no one would think of joining us, except from a clear conviction of duty, and the martyr spirit of self-sacrifice—in the development of which they pass through a sifting, testing process, which deters all who do not imbibe fully our doctrines and spirit.

On September 28, in a private home, the first fellowship meeting was held. Over thirty converts offered testimony to "the saving power of God." Taylor had not decided in advance to bring up the question of church organization but in the course of the meeting "was convinced that it was the will of God that . . . [he] should wait no longer," so explained the requirements for membership and reminded the group of the persecutions they might expect. Without any personal prompting thirty-seven names were recorded. A place of worship was procured and on October 13 the first sacramental service was celebrated with sixty-four communicants.* A small society was established at Lonavla, forty miles northwest, in July, 1873, with fifteen members, which very soon increased to twenty-three. About the same time a Society of nine members was organized at Deksal, some sixty miles east, and preaching was begun in Sholapur and Shahahabad, still farther east.¹⁷⁰

As at Kanpur and Bombay so also at Poona Taylor's meetings were instrumental in bringing into the Church one who would become a great and widely influential leader. He was then a young surveyor, one of a group of three bachelors who lived together and spent their Sundays in indolence. On a Sunday afternoon a friend came with the news that he had discovered a hall where an American, "a fellow with a long beard like a preaching Arab," a good talker and singer, was speaking every night. The youth, whose only ideas of Americans had been derived from the comic papers and Dickens,

* Taylor expressed regret that the church in which the Poona meetings were held "did not share so largely in the fruits of the work of God" as he had hoped. The reason, he said, was "because several of their leading families declined to co-operate, or even to attend the meetings." This, he felt, "was a great pity"; for "they might have built up a powerful spiritual church" as many in connection with his work in other parts of the world had done.—W. Taylor, Four Years' Campaign in India, pp. 233 f.

assumed that all Americans "were long, lean, slab-sided; that they all chewed tobacco, spat incredible distances and told impossible stories." He was filled with curiosity and, anticipating an evening of fun, at once agreed to go with his friend. He soon found himself in a crowded hall with bare floors and rude uncomfortable seats, with a plain table in front and a small American organ beside it. Sitting at the table was a grave, bearded man who he learned was not William Taylor but an assistant, D. O. Fox of Michigan, Taylor having gone to Bombay for the weekend. A hymn was sung, the leader prayed a long prayer—kneeling on the bare floor—and then preached. He was in deep earnest; "in the most compelling way" he was saying that men "might know their sins forgiven and learn to know Jesus as personal Friend and Saviour." In some way he conveyed "the impression that the Jesus of whom he spoke was actually there by his side." Never before had the young man heard a message of such urgency and fervor. The speaker lowered his voice and in a quiet, conversational tone said there were others present who knew of the certainty of what had been spoken. Would they arise and bear witness? A British colonel, a handsome, well-dressed man, was immediately on his feet, telling in simple direct words how William Taylor had come to him with a letter of introduction from Bombay and how "in a very short time this big American had him on his knees crying to God for mercy." I fear some of you who are here "have known me for a wicked, Godless man. But I have asked God to forgive me, and . . . what the preacher says is true. God does forgive repentant sinners, . . . I know it. He is in [my heart]." What followed we allow the youth to tell in his own words:

My soul was swept with a very storm of desire to prove the truth of these words for myself. . . .

Soon afterwards the preacher arose and said very quietly, 'It is enough. . . . I invite you now to join . . . in finding for yourselves Jesus as pardoning Saviour and abiding Friend. . . .'

For the first time . . . I was distinctly invited to choose God as Saviour and friend. . . . It seemed the only thing to do was to accept it quickly.

The preacher was again speaking, 'Kneel down,' he said, 'and tell God you want to leave your sins and find in Him your Saviour.'

At once we were on our knees, but I could not pray. It seemed as though the surge of the sea was in my ears and unspeakable but voiceless longing was in my heart. How long we were thus I do not know. When I came to myself the minister was beside me. . . . Would I keep on 'seeking the Lord,' and would I come to the 'class meeting' next evening . . . ? All the next day I was in deep confusion of mind, and lived like a man in a dream. . . .

That night I found my way to the class meeting. It had already opened when I entered. They were talking of their personal religious experiences. At last my turn came, and the leader asked for my experience. I was embarrassed, but managed to stammer out that I did not know anything about such matters, that I had been told to come by the minister who preached the night before, that I had had a very unhappy day; would they please help me to find my way to the Saviour I was seeking, but had not found? The class leader called the company to prayer at once. They all knelt around me. . . .

While they prayed, I somehow learned to pray for myself. The sacred fire that burned in them leaped to my poor heart, and I found myself saying, 'Friends, I have found my Lord,' and I kept on using words that seemed given me, for they were strange to my ears when I spoke them. . . .

. . . there came to me . . . kneeling amongst those earnest-hearted people, a vivid realization of God's pardoning and comforting presence and a strange warming and uplifting of heart¹⁷¹

The name of the youth was William F. Oldham.* He went out of that meeting to become a Methodist Local Preacher, member of Conference, Secretary of the Missionary Society, Bishop, and a world leader of Methodism. Following his conversion he continued his work as a surveyor. On September 13, 1876, he married Marie Mulligan who was one of those whose testimony had influenced him to make a decision. Shortly after his marriage he was licensed to preach by the Poona Quarterly Conference. In 1876 his "survey party was transferred [from Poona] to South India" where "in the jungles of the Deccan" he decided to go to America for training† as an educational missionary.¹⁷²

As an aftermath of the Poona conversions work was opened in Karachi. When the 56th Regiment was transferred from Poona to Karachi, the capital of the province of Sind, beyond the Indus, late in 1873 or in the beginning of 1874, thirty-six soldiers who had been converted in the Poona meetings constituted the nuclei of an active religious group. Shortly afterward

* William Fitzjames Oldham (1854-1937) was born in Bangalore, India, of Roman Catholic parentage. His father was an officer in a Sepoy regiment. His mother died when he was very young and he was placed in the sole charge of an Indian nurse. During his elementary school years he attended Anglican parochial schools and at fifteen entered Madras Christian College. On completing his college course he was given charge of a small school of the London Missionary Society in Madras where he "daily taught the Scriptures and was every Sunday in attendance upon the church services, but," he wrote later, "there was no life of the Spirit anywhere manifest." Later for a time he was assistant master in Bishop Cotton's grammar school, Bangalore. He next "joined the 'great trigonometrical survey of India'" as a member of that "picked corps of engineers." Soon after his conversion in the Taylor meetings in Poona, during which he united with the Methodist Church, he was licensed to preach. Impressed with the great need for the education of Methodist children he, with his wife, went to America to prepare himself for educational mission work. He first attended Allegheny College, then Boston University, where he received his A.B. degree. He was received on trial in the Michigan Conference in 1883 and appointed to Edmore (Minutes, Michigan Conference, 1883, pp. 18, 28). Back in India at the beginning of 1885 he opened in February a mission in Singapore. After five years in that tropical city his health necessitated a change of climate. He was transferred in 1891 to the Pittsburgh Conference, and in 1895 to the Ohio Conference to become professor of comparative religions and modern missions in Ohio Wesleyan University. For two years in connection with his college work he was also pastor of St. Paul's Church, Delaware. From Delaware he went to Broad St. Church, Columbus, Ohio. In 1900 he was made Assistant Secretary of the Missionary Society, and in 1904 elected Missionary Bishop for Southern Asia and for eight years gave episcopal supervision to the work in South India, Malaysia, and the Philippines. In 1912 he was elected a Corresponding Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions and in 1916 was elected to the episcopacy and assigned to South America. He retired in 1928. Methodism has had few world figures comparable to William F. Oldham—a saintly character, a great preacher, and a missionary statesman of rare sagacity and wisdom.—Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions; Minutes, Pittsburgh Conference, 1891, p. 24; Minutes, Ohio Conference, 1895, p. 28; G. C. Journal, 1912, p. 471; ibid., 1916, p. 392; Northwestern Christian Advocate, April 22, 1909; W. F. Oldham, "God Keeps," Christian Advocate, XCII (1917), 43 (Oct. 25), 1103-1104.

† W. F. Oldham: "At Poona and Bhusaval we found that our Methodist people had the greatest difficulty in securing the schooling of the children without subjecting them to all manner of petty persecutions because they were 'Methodists.' . . . I was one of a small committee to consider the opening of a school for Methodist children. All our efforts to import a missionary teacher from America were unavailing. In the end the matter pressed upon me so, that the old question reawakened within me, 'If you cannot find a teacher go and get ready and open the school yourself.'"—"God Keeps," ibid., 45 (Nov. 8), 1167 f.

D. O. Fox visited them to arrange for regular services. A Local Preacher, known as " 'Brother Seale,' whose work . . . [had] been blessed of God in Lanowli, Poona and other stations," agreed to go to Karachi as their minister. Within six weeks some sixty persons—some of them soldiers, but the majority civilians—professed to have found salvation in his meetings. The remoteness of the city—Karachi was five hundred miles from Bombay by sea—made continuity in missionary activities difficult, but a Methodist Society was organized and a second center established in Quetta, a military station connected by railway with Karachi.¹⁷³

In January, 1873, Taylor left Poona to enter Calcutta, the first center in India to which he went on his own initiative with the avowed purpose of establishing a Methodist church. This populous city was the capital of the Indian empire with about 750,000 people of whom some 30,000 were European and Eurasian. It was already well supplied with churches, numbering in all not less than twenty-five. Of these nine were Church of England, six Roman Catholic, three Baptist, two Congregational, one Armenian, one Greek, one Church of Scotland, one Scotch Free Church, and one Wesleyan.*

Before going to the city in 1873 Taylor wrote to John Richards, the Wesleyan missionary, pastor of an English church of eighteen members and of a native church also of small membership. The mission had several Indian preachers and teachers, and several native schools. Taylor proposed giving Richards "a week of special services; . . . [after which he] should be free . . . if God should give . . . [him] a people in Calcutta, as He had in Bombay and Poona, to organize them into a Methodist Episcopal Church." Richards and his wife were somewhat reluctant to accede to this kind of proposal. They would have preferred to have Taylor limit his labors in Calcutta to the Wesleyan Society as in fact he should have done if he had been disposed to adhere strictly to the principles of comity which the North India Methodists had approved. The Congregational pastor of the Union Chapel also, while cordial, regretted that Taylor had become a denominational propagandist instead of "purely an Evangelist" as he had formerly been. Taylor himself had some misgivings concerning his course. He perceived that he was making the situation difficult for the ministers and missionaries of other Churches, especially for those who were "liberal and good," since he had come "with an avowed purpose (D. V.) to establish a church." He satisfied his own mind, however, by assuring himself that he was acting in accordance with the direct guidance of God: for many years he had labored solely as an evangelist in cooperation with various denominations but now, in Bombay, "God modified

* The Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society sent two missionaries to Calcutta in 1829 to establish a mission. In 1832 this first attempt was abandoned. In 1861 a second beginning was made and in 1866 a chapel was erected and occupied but in 1868-69 the two missionaries were transferred elsewhere. In 1869, for the third time, missionaries were sent to Calcutta of whom one was John Richards. By 1874 these men, too, had returned to England, before the mission work could "scarcely be said to have begun."—G. G. Findlay and W. W. Holdsworth, op. cit., V, 203, 348 ff.

... [his] commission, and, for India, laid upon ... [him] the additional responsibility of organizing churches."

... for me to defer to a human conventional principle of non-intervention, when God is guiding me, would be treason against my Sovereign. I am naturally very unobtrusive, and ... I would not on my own account cross the feelings of any man, ... but in a matter of duty to God, involving the salvation of souls, I have no alternative: I must obey God, and not man.

Richards did not urge his preference in the matter.

Of course I accept your offer of a week's services. ... Well: if you can come, and through God's blessing be the means of creating some healthy religious excitement among us in Calcutta, I shall greatly rejoice. Come and welcome; and I will work with you to the utmost of my ability.

Taylor began his services in Calcutta on Sunday, January 12, in the Wesleyan Chapel which had a seating capacity of about three hundred. Over one hundred were present and at the evening service about two hundred. The evening meetings continued for two weeks during which some twenty persons "publicly sought and professed to find the pardon of their sins, the most of them members of Richards' congregation. Taylor advised Richards "to gather in his new converts, organize his workers," and continue the meetings in his own way. This he did, with the assistance of the Wesleyan missionary from Lucknow. They organized "four praying bands, to hold prayer-meetings in four different places weekly."

For four nights Taylor preached in the large hall of the American Zenana Mission to a congregation of eight to 150 hearers. He then moved the meetings to the Union Chapel Hall, beginning Sunday, February 2, and continuing for fourteen nights with an attendance of eighty to a hundred with but little result. He succeeded, however, in organizing a few seekers into a fellowship band which met on Saturday evenings at the home of a Mr. and Mrs. Harris, nominal members of the Church of England who now desired to join the Methodist Church. He was puzzled to know what to do next but at this time he was offered by a Baptist missionary the use of a small native chapel on a narrow, out-of-the-way street not well suited for the use of an English-speaking congregation. Since no other was available services were widely advertised and begun there on Sunday, February 23. Attendance in the forenoon was scarcely forty; at night about eighty. The special meetings were continued for more than a month, the congregation gradually increasing. "About the ninth of April for the first time in Calcutta" an opportunity was given for converts to enroll for membership in the Methodist Church and thirteen responded. Soon afterward the use of a room "in Bow Bazar," owned by the Y. M. C. A., was secured. Meetings were held there on Sundays at seven in the morning and on two nights each week, and within two months about forty converts were recruited. "The hardest work of my life," Taylor recorded, "... was here in the streets of Calcutta" ¹⁷⁴

In the spring of 1873, Taylor sent to the Christian Advocate a direct call for volunteers for India:

Young men with good education, who can the more readily acquire native languages, would seem to be best suited; but God may call some who have not had superior advantages of education, and we will gladly, on the recommendation of our Secretaries and Bishop Harris, receive such. Any who feel called of God to this work may report to Bishop Harris. A majority of them will be required in Bengal, and will meet me in Calcutta. In this Presidency alone there are 66,000,000 of perishing sinners. Who, in the spirit of the Master, will also give his life to save these blood-bought souls[?]¹⁷⁶

He was much disappointed that there was no immediate response to his appeal either by "the Missionary secretaries" or by volunteers.

For months it seemed very doubtful, by all outward indications, whether we could raise a working force at all. I became more and more convinced . . . that a more convenient season would never come; so I determined, as the Lord should lead, to push the battle and win, or die at the guns.¹⁷⁶

From September 1, 1873, Taylor was absent for a month from Calcutta to hold meetings in Poona and Bombay. On his return he stopped off at Igatpuri (Egutpoora) on the main line of railway some seventy-five miles northeast of Bombay. There had been for years "a few good men [there] whose early associations . . . [bound] them strongly to Wesleyanism." They had succeeded in building a small chapel, well situated in the center of the city, in the hope that the Wesleyan Missionary Society might eventually send them a minister, but this hope had not been realized. While there Taylor held a number of services, assisted by several Indian converts who had accompanied him. Two years later he said that the Society which he organized there was established and growing. One of the Indian brothers continued on with Taylor to Bhusawal, 276 miles from Bombay, where two days of special services were held. Norton had attempted to make a beginning there somewhat earlier. Unlike the work at Igatpuri little fruitage resulted.¹⁷⁷

Since it had become necessary to give up the use of the Baptist hall in Calcutta nothing remained but to build. Before departing on his trip Taylor had leased a parcel of ground in Zigzag Lane and had contracted for "the building of a plain chapel thirty feet by fifty." He had also purchased a lot in Dharamtala Street "in the best centre of the city," for Rs. 4,600 and had let the contract for the building of a "brick hall forty feet by eighty." Friends in Bombay made Rs. 10,000 available and building was promptly begun. When the Zigzag Lane Chapel was opened, the place was scarcely large enough to hold the congregations which assembled. Taylor held a few outdoor services in English, Hindustani, and Bengali attended by "good audiences" but he felt that the time possible for him to spend in the city was too limited to carry forward the evangelistic work for natives as far as he had done in Bombay.¹⁷⁸

By 1873 Thoburn had become fully convinced of the value of Taylor's campaign. As "an evangelistic effort among nominal Christians," he wrote in an article on the campaign in the Christian Advocate, the "work has been eminently successful." Within less than two years 565 members and probationers had been received into the Church. The quality of the results, he maintained, was even more satisfactory than the quantity. "In no place in the world can a better type of Methodism, or a better type of Christianity, be found than among these recent converts in the Bombay Presidency." From among the converts four young men had entered the ministry. As for work among the natives, twenty-seven had been baptized, "a larger number than . . . [had] been reported by any of the missions working in the same field." Notable success had been achieved among the Parsees (Zoroastrians, adherents of an ancient Persian religion) who for many years had seemed wholly inaccessible. Only two or three had been converted—long ago—while under Taylor's efforts seven had been baptized and seven more were candidates. None of the evangelist's converts had been employed by the mission, nor had any "received any pecuniary advantage by embracing Christianity," yet they had remained steadfast.¹⁷⁹

Taylor's evangelistic methods and his attitude toward missionary support unquestionably had an influence upon Thoburn. For some time a conviction had been developing in his mind that he should give himself wholly to evangelistic work, "relinquish all claim upon the Missionary Society, and trust to God alone for . . . support." In January, 1873, during the Conference Love Feast he had made his decision. This did not involve a separation from the Missionary Society. His relation to it as a missionary remained unchanged except for the fact that he entirely relinquished his salary.¹⁸⁰

The matter uppermost in Bishop Harris' mind as he approached India on his round-the-world tour late in 1873 was that of determining the status of William Taylor; of the missionaries who had come to India to work in cooperation with him on a "self-support basis"; and of the Societies which Taylor and "Taylor's men"—as they were called—had organized. When the Bishop reached Ceylon he sent a telegram to Thoburn asking that he meet him in Calcutta. Obviously, because of Thoburn's close relationship to Taylor's work Harris felt the need of his counsel. The Bishop was said to have an apprehension, shared by some other Church leaders in America, that Taylor was intending "to set up a new sect."¹⁸¹

Both Thoburn and Taylor met Bishop Harris in Calcutta. As soon as opportunity offered Harris said to Taylor: ". . . we want to bring your Mission into a closer connexion with our Church; and we want you to become officially . . . its superintendent." Taylor, for his part, disavowed any intention to establish a new Church.

Every document we had, and the trustees and deeds of our property in Calcutta, were all proofs of our entire loyalty to the Church of our choice, though refusing first and last to yield a single principle or plank in our platform as a Mission.

Taylor added that he had already written Bishop Simpson, who had made the same proposal, that as God had opened and organized this Mission through my agency, and had thus made me its superintendent, I should not object to your official confirmation of His appointment, provided there should be no interference with the peculiar principles on which our Mission was founded.¹⁸²

The Bishop assured him that where the Missionary Society appropriated no money to a mission it could not expect to interfere with its internal management. It was accordingly agreed (1) that the "work should be designated the 'Bombay and Bengal Mission'"; (2) that until a separate Conference could be organized Taylor and his ministers "should join the India . . . Conference; but that the . . . [India] Conference should sustain no official relation to the Bombay and Bengal Mission, any more than the Baltimore Conference sustains to . . . [the Methodist] Mission in Japan because its superintendent . . . happens to remain a member of that Conference"; (3) that "all India, outside of the defined boundaries of the India . . . Conference, should be included in the bounds of the Bombay and Bengal Mission."*

Harris suggested to Thoburn that "he would be glad to transfer . . . [him] to Calcutta if the way would open." At about the same time Taylor intimated that "he was impressed that . . . [Thoburn] should take the work out of his hands."¹⁸³

At the ensuing session of the India Annual Conference (January 7-13, 1874) at which Bishop Harris appointed William Taylor Superintendent of the Bombay and Bengal Mission, nine ministers also were appointed to four stations of the mission.† Thoburn was appointed to Calcutta. Appointments to the mission in 1875 numbered thirteen.‡

The comment of Missionary Secretary J. M. Reid on the action of the Conference was:

The great achievement of Bishop Harris . . . was the happy adjustment of the work under Mr. Taylor, by which it was brought into organic relations with the Methodist Episcopal Church. But for this that great and important work in South India might have been scattered, as was formerly the work of George Whitefield in Great Britain and America.¹⁸⁴

* This is the agreement as stated by William Taylor in his Ten Years of Self-Supporting Missions in India. Strangely enough the printed Minutes of the Conference contain no reference to any of these items. Nor, so far as can be ascertained, did Bishop Harris issue any printed report of his agreement with Taylor or of actions of the India Annual Conference. The 1874 Annual Report of the Missionary Society contains the list of appointments to the Bombay and Bengal Mission but has no statement of its organization or other information concerning it.

† Appointments to the Bombay and Bengal Mission in 1874 were: William Taylor, Superintendent; Bombay, George Bowen, W. E. Robbins, James Shaw; The Deccan, D. O. Fox; Central India, Albert Norton, George K. Gilder; Bengal (Calcutta), J. M. Thoburn, C. W. Christian, C. R. Jeffries.—W. Taylor, Four Years' Campaign in India, p. 296.

‡ Appointments in 1875 were: William Taylor, Superintendent; Bombay, Baroda, and Central India, George Bowen, W. E. Robbins, George K. Gilder, William F. G. Curties; The Deccan, Poona Circuit, D. The spiritual tide rose rapidly in Calcutta when Thoburn became settled in the city. The chapel in Dharamtala Street was opened soon after adjournment of the Conference. With seats for six hundred people it was thought that the size was ample. But from the first, after packing the aisles, "hundreds had to go away for want of room." To accommodate the crowds the Corinthian Theatre was rented for Sunday evening services and Thoburn preached regularly to about 1,400 people. Thomas Oakes, a convert, began a special work among the seamen who thronged the port of Calcutta. P. M. Mukerji, formerly at Kanpur, also joined with Thoburn, thereby constituting a staff of four preachers engaged in evangelistic and pastoral work in the city. Thoburn's success encouraged him to launch a financial campaign for Rs. 65,000 to build a church large enough to seat two thousand people. By February, 1876, the site had been paid for and building begun. On his return from America in November he found construction almost finished and a debt of Rs. 50,000. In two meetings almost the whole amount was pledged, to be paid in installments over a period of five years. The church was dedicated on December 31, 1876. The first place of worship, superseded by the new church, was transferred to the Bengali converts. One of the nominal Christians, awakened in the 1874 meetings, became the first Bengali Class Leader, and later the first Bengali Local Preacher. He gathered about him a group which, within a few years, became an active church of a hundred members.

In this same year of 1874 Thoburn started a Saturday morning prayer meeting, held at seven o'clock, especially for intercession in behalf of the work of the church. This became a fixed institution, destined to continue uninterruptedly for many decades, a source of spiritual influence and power.¹⁸⁵

At Secunderabad, a suburb of Hyderabad in the Mohammedan state of Hyderabad, Christian work was begun by Walter Winckler, a government civil engineer who had been converted in Taylor's Bombay meetings. Sent to the city under government appointment in 1873, he refused to hide his light under a bushel and soon had awakened the interest of a number of soldiers and civilians. Within fifteen months his preaching and teaching had brought to the Lord almost fifty persons who were organized into a Methodist Society by George Bowen. At the end of February Bowen held ten days of special services in which about twelve others "sought salvation." Later in the year James Shaw spent several months there and greatly extended the work. Later Taylor spent a few days in the city "and found a healthy, growing, working church of God, of more than 100 members and probationers."¹⁸⁶

In Madras, as at Kanpur, Taylor's evangelistic campaign was begun on the initiative of a layman, Dr. E. H. Condon, a British civil surgeon. In his invitation Condon associated with himself three other laymen who assured him that they "would back . . . [him] to the utmost of their ability," but he hoped that he would not organize a church. The evangelist had originally planned to make Madras the starting point of his India campaign and the Wesleyan missions in South India his principal field of operation but for some reason those to whom he wrote in advance "did not respond, nor invite . . . [him] to help them," so he had begun in North India instead. Taylor arrived in Madras on February 4, 1874.¹⁸⁷

Madras in 1874 had a population of almost 400,000, made up of 330,000 Hindus, 50,000 Mohammedans, 12,000 Eurasians, and 3,500 Europeans. There were many Anglican churches in the city and practically all of the nonconformist denominations were represented there by missions and mission schools. Taylor credits the Wesleyan mission* with having done "a great educational work" in Madras, but as having had no "great success" among either the natives or the English-speaking population, since it had only eighty-six English members.

On Thursday, February 6, Dr. Condon introduced the evangelist to all of the nonconformist ministers of the city, and others, and on February 8 Taylor preached his first sermon in the Union Prayer-meeting Hall. On Monday evening, the tenth, he began a series of services in the Scotch Free Church Evangelistic Hall, preaching to an audience which packed the room. On the second night he saw signs of "a great awakening." About thirty responded to his invitation. After three weeks, with services for four days in the week, he moved to the more centrally located Memorial Hall which seated six hundred people. For four weeks it was well filled at every service. He next got the use of the London Mission native chapel in a very populous district of Madras and established regular Sunday services in it.

Later, on Condon's initiative, a "pandal" (a shed with pillars of wood, stone, or brick, roofed with thatch or tile, and walls to the height of about four feet) was built on the Esplanade. Attendance and interest steadily increased. Every night Taylor made a list of inquirers and on the following day called on each one. Those who were not "members of any church, or merely nominal members," he organized into fellowship bands. The first band was formed on January 22. Within a month of his arrival in Madras eight bands had been organized. Five or six Bible classes also were started. Within three and a half months about three hundred and fifty persons had professed conversion. "We are not aware," wrote George Bowen in the Bombay Guardian, "that there has even before been in India so powerful a work of grace" When the membership reached about three hundred Taylor called a meeting of the laymen who had invited him to the city and who, with a few of their friends, had borne all the expenses of the meetings, and laid before them the facts regarding results.

* The Madras Wesleyan Mission, founded by James Lynch, had a checkered history. Although it was served by some distinguished missionaries, the chairman of the District declared in 1865: "We have been fifty years in India, but have done no more than lay the foundations of a Native Church—if, indeed, so much as that can be said without exaggeration."—G. G. Findlay and W. W. Holdsworth, op. cit., V, 179, 224.

. . . they unanimously advised me by all means to organize a Methodist Episcopal church, to conserve the fruits of this blessed work of God

The revival movement spread beyond the confines of Madras. In May meetings were held in Perambur, a suburban center of railway workshops, where the converts soon "bought a lot and built a place of worship, and, with a little help from the city, paid for it." Also, on a few weekdays, meetings were held at Pallavaram, a military station eleven miles from the city, despite objections of the military chaplain. A Methodist Society was formed in the home of one of the converts. During the meetings at Perambur a former resident who lived at Salem, 207 miles southwest, on the railroad line, visited the town and while there "submitted himself to God, and received Jesus as his Saviour." When he returned to his home he began meetings in his own house and "within a few weeks . . . got ten of his neighbours converted." Very soon "a living, growing church of God" had been established.

One of the Madras converts was a Scotch lawyer, Philip B. Gordon, who for thirty years had been "a diligent student of the vernaculars of Southern India." He began at once to preach in English and to Indian audiences in Tamil, Telugu, Kanarese, and Hindustani. He was given charge of "the Tamil preachers and preaching in the [Madras] Circuit," and at his own expense translated from the English and published a number of tracts, in a single month printing 60,000 pages. The Taylor program was also broadened in Madras by what he termed a new system of education, the Sunday-school principle applied to weekday schools, voluntary unpaid workers contributing their services as teachers. Two schools were started, one with 125 Hindu and Eurasian children, and the other with sixty-five Hindu and thirteen Eurasian pupils.¹⁸⁸

In December, 1874, Clark P. Hard,* who had heard and answered Taylor's call, arrived in Madras to take charge of the Madras Circuit and entered upon his arduous task with enthusiasm. At the end of eight days he wrote to Taylor :

The Lord . . . [has] permitted me to preach eleven sermons, lead five fellowship bands, make pastoral calls four hours per day, . . . address three Sunday Schools and one day-school, revive the Tract Society, sell some dozens of books, hold one watch-meeting . . . , hold three love-feasts, administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper three times, receive twenty-one into full membership, and sixteen on probation out of the twenty who have been converted within these eight days—most of them being men.¹⁸⁹

* Clark P. Hard (1846-1925) began preaching at the age of seventeen. He attended Genesee College and in 1867 graduated from Garrett Biblical Institute. In Madras, where he served for four years, he married Lydia Van Someren, daughter of a surgeon-general of the British army. Later, after a furlough, he served in Allahabad, Bombay, Khandwa, and Nagpur. From 1887 to 1892 he was a Presiding Elder. Because of his wife's serious illness he left India in December, 1892, and in 1894 transferred to the Illinois Conference where for ten years he was in the pastorate. "Essentially an enthusiast, . . . restrained very little by reserve or considerations of what people might think of his actions . . . he never did . . . [anything] in the regular way." Despite idiosyncrasies, he was a faithful hard-working missionary, and remained to the end of his days a lover of India.—Indian Witness, LVI (1926), 4 (Jan. 27), 50; Minutes, Illinois Conference, 1926, p. 95; Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions.

On January 4, Local Preachers' licenses were granted to three men, "Brothers Gordon, Haudin, and Peters."

Taylor included a plan of the Madras Circuit for the second quarter of 1875 in his Four Years' Campaign in India. The plan listed twelve weekday and Sunday preaching services each week in five different places in the city of Madras, and two places outside the city. One of the ministers gave his entire time to preaching and pastoral work at five points along the Madras Railway Southwest Line, Arkonam, Jalarpet, Salem, Erode, and Pothamoor. The staff, in addition to Taylor, consisted of thirty-four ministers, Local Preachers, Class Leaders, and other lay assistants. There were seventeen fellowship bands in the city and seven in outlying places. Fifteen prayer meetings were held weekly. Tamil preaching services were held either on a weekday or on Sunday in seven centers. Two day schools and five Sunday schools were maintained. Other meetings included a weeknight Bible class, two weekly women's meetings, a weekday Sunday-school teachers' normal class, a monthly financial meeting of leaders, a monthly theological training class for the ministers and lay leaders, a quarterly Love Feast, and Quarterly Conference.¹⁹⁰

Bangalore, a military station and a large native city, was a strategic center by reason of being the capital of the neighboring province of Mysore. Philip Gordon, who owned property in the city, called Taylor's attention to it as a religious opportunity. He found on visiting the city in August, 1874, that in St. John's Hill and Richmond Town, two of its most populous sections, there were no Christian places of worship other than those of "high ritualists and Romanists." Without taking counsel with any local residents, he immediately authorized the purchase of church lots. In a campaign of less than seven weeks, beginning late in September, there were 140 converts, including over thirty soldiers and a large number of prominent civilians. While the meetings were in progress Taylor let the contract for the building of a chapel on St. John's Hill and appointed James Shaw pastor of a Society not yet formed. On March 2, 1875, Shaw wrote to the Bombay Guardian that the new chapel was dedicated on February 28.¹⁹¹

CLOSE OF TAYLOR'S INDIA CAMPAIGN

In the middle of February, 1875, while Taylor was intent on carrying forward his India campaign with no thought of leaving it in the near future, a letter came to him from London, written by request of Dwight L. Moody, inviting him to aid in a four-month evangelistic campaign planned "to move this mighty city as it never has been moved." The letter closed with an expression of fervent hope that it might be "our Father's good pleasure to appoint you as one of His ambassadors in this great work." The next day—Taylor wrote later, "I saw that it was God's will that I should combine . . .

[the London campaign] with my visit to my family . . .” It had been more than seven years since Taylor had seen his wife and children. He was in Lahore, where he had begun a series of meetings, but he “did not lose a day in closing up his engagements . . . and arranging for his departure.” He left, intending that his absence would be only for a limited time; that after the close of the London meetings and a brief visit with his family in California he would be back to continue his unfinished work in India. But this was not to be. He never saw India again.¹⁹²

At the 1876 meeting of the India Conference (January 13-18, 1876), eleven months after Taylor left India, five unmarried missionaries were received by transfer for work in the Bombay, Bengal, and Madras Mission, and one man was received on trial.* The mission was listed as divided † into Districts.¹⁹³

The Minutes of the India Conference contain no statistics of the Bombay and Bengal Mission and since the mission was not separately organized it published no minutes or reports. Detailed financial accounts were kept at the principal centers and forwarded to Taylor, some of which he published. In May, 1875, he wrote:

Our working force consists of twelve ordained and twelve other preachers, devoted wholly to evangelistic and pastoral work, and a membership of 1300 workers.

Having no Conference organization, our presiding elders have not been appointed in the regular way; but I have deputed them to superintend the work in my absence, and Bishop Harris has endorsed and approved my action.¹⁹⁴

He arrived in London about March 25, and embarked for America about July 14. For some time little communication passed between Taylor and “his men.” At first, domestic concerns doubtless fully occupied his time and attention; then he turned to the task of enlisting missionaries and securing funds for India. For eight or nine years he “continued to regard himself as superintendent of the mission which he had founded.” Meanwhile his thought had been turned in the direction of South America. In a letter to the South India Conference in 1877 he said that God had called him “to that land as distinctly” as he had called him to India. On the sixteenth of October, 1877, he bought “a through ticket from New York to Callao, Peru, and embarked.”¹⁹⁵

William Taylor made an ineffaceable impression on the Christian forces of India. Although early in his campaign he identified himself with the Methodist Church his influence extended far beyond the bounds of organized Methodism. As is usually the case with innovators he made enemies as well as friends. Some missionaries of other denominations openly condemned his efforts and even a few Methodist missionaries stood aloof. In America many prominent ministers and laymen were noncommittal, as when the 1872 General Conference refrained from taking action on his request for sanction of the organization of a Bombay Conference on a self-supporting basis.

In the Northern Christian Advocate in May, 1873, John T. Gracey, then editor of its missionary department, sharply criticized Taylor and his methods. Daniel Curry, editor of the Christian Advocate (New York), who not infrequently had a friendly word for unpopular causes, in reply to Gracey, chided him for his "severe and not especially Christian attack," which, he said, was "not without unkind reflections" upon the evangelist. Henry Mansell, India missionary at home on furlough, also took issue with Gracey, defending at length Taylor's work.¹⁹⁶

During these years Taylor was in his prime. "His erect form, unusual stature, patriarchal beard, kindly but piercing eye, gave him an appearance which would arrest attention anywhere." He was not, however, a pulpit orator, and his preaching did not attract crowds. Thoburn aptly described the secret of his power :

His sermons were often, and indeed for the most part, rambling, and much more didactic than hortatory. He soon learned to depend upon quiet work, with small audiences, or often but a single family, to labor with, rather than to move heaven and earth by trying all manner of expedients to get a large crowd. The result was, that he gained an extraordinary influence over his converts. He knew them intimately, he had labored with them personally, had seen them almost constantly in their homes, bowed with them at their family altars, and acquainted himself with all their domestic troubles and anxieties.¹⁹⁷

Taylor's discourses were extemporaneous, simple, direct, and intensely earnest. They were not highly emotional and they were attended by none of the phenomena that were frequent in American camp meeting revivals. "I never asked the Lord," he said, "to knock any poor sinner out of his senses under my preaching. I preferred that they should keep their senses all wide awake that I might reason with them intelligibly on 'righteousness and temperance and judgment,' and salvation in Jesus."

As an administrator he had serious weaknesses. His choice of missionaries for India—so far as the selection was in his hands—was sometimes unfortunate. Thoburn went so far as to say that "a large proportion of . . . [the] reinforcements, as they were called, consisted of men who could not do the work which was expected of them." Too often he acted upon sheer impulse. While in the United States, after leaving India, he one day heard that a man was needed to fill the pulpit of the Calcutta Methodist Church in Thoburn's absence on furlough. Taylor immediately "took a postcard and wrote on it an offer of the pulpit," and mailed it to a man whose name was recommended to him. The minister replied by postcard, accepting the appointment, and at once left for India. When Thoburn returned to Calcutta he found a badly confused situation which only with difficulty he was able to clear up. Yet, after all the ways in which Taylor's work might be discounted have been considered, the fact remains, as Thoburn declared, that one of India Christianity's greatest benefactors and "one of the truest men who ever tried to plan and labor for the Indian people" was William Taylor.

He accomplished in India in the short space of four and a half years much of what he had set out to achieve. He saw established self-supporting English-speaking churches not only in seven principal centers but also in a number of lesser places. He quickened, by God's help, the spiritual life of thousands of Europeans and Eurasians who went out from his meetings to strengthen the churches with which they were connected. He brought into the membership of the new English-speaking Methodist Societies other hundreds who made their influence felt for many years in the religious life and in the missionary activities of the communities in which they lived. There is no doubt, Bishop William F. Oldham said decades after Taylor had left India, that his work "forced upon us the imperial proportions of our India missions."¹⁹⁸

SOUTH INDIA CONFERENCE, 1876-95

The South India Conference was convened in its first session by Bishop Edward G. Andrews in Falkland Road Hall, Bombay, on November 9, 1876. In attendance were twelve full members and eight probationers of the Bombay, Bengal, and Madras Mission.* Three others were received by transfer and one was admitted on trial. As thus constituted the new Conference began with twenty-four charter members.

CONFERENCE ORGANIZATION, ADMINISTRATIVE POLICIES AND PROCEDURES

After a devotional service and election of Conference officers, the Bishop read an extensive Pastoral Address, in part a statement of policy:

Thus far, the majority of those enrolled as members of our various churches have been English-speaking persons, . . . but from the first our aim has been ultimately to reach the masses, of whatever race or religion, with whom our members might be brought in contact. . . . Hence, it is our earnest desire that every Church under our care should be . . . a Missionary Church, . . . in direct, aggressive, earnest work for the salvation of the people of India.

* * * *

* Those recognized as members of the South India Conference at its first session were: William Taylor, George Bowen, J. M. Thoburn, W. E. Robbins, C. P. Hard, D. O. Fox, P. M. Mukerji, Dennis Osborne, M. H. Nichols, J. Blackstock, G. K. Gilder, and C. W. Christian. Probationers: F. G. Davis, F. A. Goodwin, J. Shaw, D. H. Lee, J. E. Robinson, W. E. Newlon, W. F. G. Curties, and T. H. Oakes. The Bishop announced the transfer of W. J. Gladwin (an elder) from the North India Conference; I. F. Row (an elder) from the New England Conference; and L. R. Jamney (a probationer) from the Central Ohio Conference. Benjamin Peters, an Indian, was admitted on trial.

. . . It has been our aim . . . to go forth as Evangelists preaching the word, and organizing those converted into Churches, financially self-supporting, and spiritually aggressive and self-sacrificing. . . .

. . . such a plan as we have adopted must necessarily involve . . . self-denial, both on the part of the ministers of the Church and of those ministered to. . . . May it be our highest ambition . . . to hold our individual rights as nothing, our opportunities to do something for Christ as everything

The Conference implemented this by making it obligatory for every preacher admitted into the Conference to study at least one of the Indian languages.

Evangelistic services were held daily during the session, participated in by the Bishop and others. The reports showed a membership of 1,179 full members, 417 probationers. There were forty Local Preachers, thirty-six Sunday schools, with 1,683 pupils, and thirteen churches, valued at Rs. 115,391. William Taylor was no longer designated as Superintendent but as Conference Evangelist. The three former Districts were retained, but designated Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras. In its 1876 Annual Report the Missionary Society noted with gratification that the South India Conference had been organized and no appropriation had been made to it since it was self-sustaining—the first “Conference in heathen lands” to be placed in line with the older Conferences in America. Evidently, it continued, the “hand of the Lord has . . . been in all this great work.”¹⁹⁹

From the standpoint of administration the Conference was unwieldy, being spread over an immense area. Meerut, for example, in the Calcutta District was about eight hundred miles from Calcutta; Karachi in the Bombay District more than five hundred miles from Bombay, and Hyderabad in the Madras District some three hundred and fifty miles from Madras. This disadvantage was partly offset by the fact that most of these widely separated churches were self-supporting, and able to maintain a high level of spiritual life and activity. The Conference had, however, an element of weakness. While its distinctive purpose was to enlist the English-speaking converts in the evangelization of the native population no method had been devised for the extremely difficult task. The India Annual Conference, more compact geographically, had been able to meet this problem with the organization of District Conferences. In South India this was impracticable. As Thoburn, realistically viewing it, wrote pessimistically :

each man was left in his isolated station to adopt such plans as he pleased, or to adopt no plan at all; and the result was that some blundered, while others worked unsatisfactorily. . . . Hence some had recourse to the old-time policy of collecting money and hiring native Christians to preach or teach; others tried to enlist the English speaking people in voluntary work; while others did nothing, and in a short time became mere pastors of small English churches. . . . Scarcely any one among them had developed any aptitude for learning languages; some were young and raw, with no experience whatever as preachers, while others were above the age at which missionaries are usually sent abroad. For ordinary work among English or American people the whole band would have been effective enough, but for the very peculiar work which we had undertaken, a work which required special qualifications, these brave and true men did not seem, in all cases, to be the right men in the right place.²⁰⁰

The new Conference was faced with another problem which the members did not wholly foresee in 1876. The attempt to organize live, effective, evangelistic churches was in many instances thwarted by the fact that the majority of English and Eurasian men were in government employ in military or civil service, subject to sudden and frequent moves. Church Societies were built on shifting sands.

With some optimism, the South India Conference met in its second session in the Dharamtala Church, Calcutta, on November 15, 1877, with an increased membership. A Church Extension Fund was initiated, and a Loan Fund established, to be "lent upon approved security, with interest and discretion at . . . one per cent per annum." A plan was also adopted for relief of superannuated preachers, orphans, and widows; and each charge was instructed to take up an annual missionary collection. The Board of Education created by the Conference at its first session announced that it had authorized the establishment of schools at Calcutta and Madras and that both were in successful operation.

At the 1878 Conference enthusiasm for the Taylor method still was strong. There had been a net increase of three hundred members and probationers, about one-tenth of whom were natives. In a "Minute on Native Work" the Conference closely related native evangelization and the policy of self-support. Evangelization of India's masses was declared to be the chief objective:

We accept it as our settled policy that each preacher shall be supported by those to whom he ministers. . . . [The rule] should be adhered to among the Natives. Men should not be employed on stated salaries and sent out among the heathen, even though the money is all raised in India. . . . It is difficult for us to see how a Native Preacher is to be supported in his difficult work, but we firmly believe that God will solve this problem for us²⁰¹

At the January, 1880, session, nine transfers from America were announced, of whom eight were probationers—six in their first year on trial.* William Taylor's intention to augment the Conference membership by sending out young theological students as missionary trainees on the field was discussed at length. Word had been received that a party was already en route, which led to the appointment of a committee to "report on the action necessary to be taken . . . in view of the reinforcements."* The committee drew up a report questioning the advisability of his sending out so many missionaries "with an incomplete education, . . . to be prepared for their future work by a preliminary course of training in India." It concluded by announcing that the Conference would accept up to twenty-five men under this experiment. Actually, Taylor's statement was more a hope than a promise for he had now become interested in establishing a mission in South America and was devoting his attention to it before embarkation. In the following years through his Transit Fund he succeeded in sending a number of ordained men to India, as well as women workers and fiancées of men already on the field.†

* Those whose transfers were announced since Conference organization were: 1877, Charles B. Ward, Central Illinois; William B. Osborn, Georgia; James A. Northrup, Rock River, and the re-admission of P. T. Wilson, returned from furlough equipped with a medical degree; 1878, Hiram Torbet (died accidentally a few months later), North Ohio; John W. Gamble, Genesee; January, 1880, Robert E. Carter and wife, Wilmington; Marion B. Kirk, East Ohio; Ira A. Richards, North Ohio; Wellington Bowser and wife, Erie; Oramil Shreves, Central Ohio; James Lyon, Delaware; Henry F. Kastendieck, North Ohio; Melville Y. Bovard, South East Indiana (earlier a missionary to Africa); and S. P. Jacobs and wife, Kansas. George I. Stone and wife, lay people of Ohio, were sent out in January, 1880, to take up the seamen's work in Calcutta.

In January, 1880, the Conference Board of Education announced an important decision as regards English schools:

Most of the Schools in India for English speaking children, are strictly denominational, and many of them are so rigidly conducted within sectarian lines that it becomes a necessity for us to provide schools for the children of our members and adherents in most of the stations in which we are working. Most of these schools will be merely day schools of a moderate grade, but in addition to these Boarding schools of a high grade will be needed at Central points, such as Poona, Bangalore, Calcutta, and Cawnpore.

By 1880 sufficient time had passed for reappraisal of the evangelistic program to which the Conference had committed itself. Swept along by an ever-increasing number of English recruits, it did not at first realize that this development was not in accordance with the original purpose. Gladwin was among the first to comment on what was happening. He pointed to the fact that in the other missions in India where large numbers of converts were being gained the work was carried on in "interior and aboriginal regions," while the South India work had been limited to "the towns and cities in which . . . English-speaking Churches" had been organized—areas "where a demoralized type of Christianity" had made success in India evangelization almost impossible. "Our men," said Gladwin, "have been tied by the demands of the English work, and, without money, have not ventured out into . . . [the interior] regions yet, but cannot be held back much longer."²⁰²

The fifth session of Conference, December, 1880, over which Bishop S. M. Merrill presided, was a season of heart-searching. A loss in Conference membership was registered, the first since the Conference was organized.

* Those included were George H. Greenig, W. H. Stephens, W. W. Bruere, and John D. Webb of Pennington Seminary; and G. W. Woodall (and wife) of Drew. They were reported as received on trial at the next Conference. A. A. Kidder of East Greenwich Seminary also was scheduled to go, but seemingly he did not remain with the group.—Christian Advocate, LV (1880), 2 (Jan. 8), 18.

† The following women were sent by William Taylor to India: Miss Ellen M. Welch, who married C. B. Ward in 1878; Mrs. Lillie Birdsall, sent to Calcutta in 1879; Miss Sallie Winslow, sent to Madras to teach in the girls' school in 1880; Miss Mollie Miller, sent to Ward's Telugu Mission also in 1880; Miss M. J. Edna Taylor, sent to teach in the school at Vepery, Madras, in 1881. Taylor lists Miss Nena Smith as also sent out in 1881, although she does not appear in the records. Among the fiancées were Dena Stone who married D. O. Ernsberger; Anna Jones, M.D., the second Mrs. Thoburn.—C. B. Ward, Our Work, pp. 27, 51, 53; William Taylor, Ten Years of Self-Supporting Missions in India, p. 212; Sixty-Second Ann. Rep., M. S. (1880), p. 259.

Also for the first time a loss of church members was reported. Thoburn wrote to the Missionary Society in a tone of disappointment: "It ought . . . to be frankly confessed that the success thus far has not been equal to the hopes and expectations of not a few who have taken an active part . . . from the first. Possibly their hopes were unreasonably high . . ." But, counting on two hands the scattered converts of a year's work, he tried to sound still hopeful:

We have not, however, been left without fruit. . . . At Rangoon two Burmese have been baptized recently. At Calcutta seven Hindus have been baptized during the past quarter, and other baptisms have taken place at Bombay and different points in Southern and Western India.²⁰³

A Committee on "Native Work" was appointed at the next session (1881), which in a lengthy statement—in all likelihood prepared by George Bowen as chairman—urged a return to the fundamental principle which had governed their organization and was in danger of being lost.

We regard with uneasiness the sentiment, indulged in some quarters, that the English work is to be the sum and total of our aspiration and efforts; and we have been grieved to hear that this section of our work has in some instances, so completely absorbed time and attention as to leave no room for the other.²⁰⁴

The Conference for four more years adhered to the principle of self-support. It was hard to turn aside from a plan felt to be God-given, and every modicum of success was clung to as a mark of encouragement. In some of the churches, notably in Bombay, Calcutta, Allahabad, Madras, and Bangalore, native work had been maintained with some success. Four members of Conference had from time to time given themselves exclusively to vernacular ministry in the Hindustani, Marathi, Tamil, and Telugu languages. Some of the lay preachers, also, had devoted their efforts to native work. Moreover, more than once, proposals had been made "to thrust out specially selected men into the Native field, to be supported by a Conference Missionary Association." This had been decided against by George Bowen's committee in 1881 on the grounds that such a procedure might come to be regarded as the "general and normal Mission policy" and therefore would be in contradiction to the unique purpose of the Conference. While the Missionary Society offered help for the native work, and the North India missionaries encouraged them to "give up what to them seemed a hopeless attempt," South India wanted to continue in its own way a while longer. Taylor felt deeply offended by these suggestions, apparently taking them as a form of personal criticism. In his Ten Years of Self-Supporting Missions In India he later wrote: "And now my . . . missions are to be captured and put under . . . [Missionary Society] control in spite of God and of me his servant."²⁰⁵

In 1882 Bishop R. S. Foster visited India and presided at the seventh session of the South India Conference, held at Calcutta, December 21-27. Twenty-one full members and thirteen probationers answered the roll call.* William Taylor severed his official relation to the India missions by asking and receiving a location. Bishop Foster remonstrated against neglect of the millions of natives within the bounds of the Conference. He felt that the Conference had no right to leave the India masses without the Gospel, as he seemed to feel it was doing, particularly as experience must have taught the preachers that if they continued the policy which had been followed they must continue to fail in that which was their greatest duty. He was disturbed also by the economic level of Christians from the lower castes. He could not bear to see people who had embraced Christianity having to live on the wages paid them in Hinduism. His opinion tended to make native Christians feel that the Church should provide them with a better living. Some of the missionaries who had struggled with the problem for years regretted that he had not consulted them before speaking so freely.²⁰⁶

Missionary Secretary J. M. Reid, who was present at the Conference session, reported to the Board that his interest in South India had been greatly increased by his visit.

The almost sublime struggle of the Conference after a method by which the natives can be reached, depending on themselves alone for the support of their pastors, truly excited my admiration. I wish I could say I was equally hopeful of its success. It may, I fear, prove to be a struggle after the impossible. The principle on which they proceed will, however, be tested to its utmost, and fail only when failure is inevitable.

* * * *

. . . As the Conference has already covered about all the Eurasian and European field accessible to them, it was evident to me that their work, begun in such a spirit of earnest, holy evangelism, must degenerate into a mere holding of the points already occupied, if that greater work [of reaching out to the unevangelized masses] be not soon undertaken with vigor.²⁰⁷

A series of resolutions on "Foreign Appropriations" was received from the Bombay Quarterly Conference protesting against acceptance of appropriations from the Missionary Society for "purely Native work." They contended that separating English from native work was "utterly foreign" to the first principles of South India Methodism since "the whole work was from the first designed . . . to be a Native work in the broadest . . . sense . . . [inasmuch as] every anna contributed and every brick laid has had special reference to the ultimate end of reaching the peoples of India," and, further, that the presence of godly Christians "is the only possible means of correcting the prevailing idea in the minds of the Natives that European and Christian

* Apart from the missionaries sent out from America, others on the field were added to Conference membership. Those admitted on trial following the date of Conference formation were: 1877, W. Drake, William Isaacson (who died shortly after); December, 1878, Niven N. Kerr; December, 1880, Thomas E. F. Morton, W. A. Moore, W. D. Brown; 1881, C. W. Ross De Souza, P. Kumar Noth, J. P. Meik, H. Jacobsen, and W. A. Thomas; December, 1882, E. Jeffries, G. Khandaji, C. H. Plomer, and W. F. C. M. Smith. Smith died a few months later.

are synonymous." A salaried missionary, it was contended, "can scarcely exercise any influence both on account of the superabounding ungodliness of their so-called fellow-Christians" and is given "no credit for being actuated by the spirit of love, but . . . [is regarded as a paid servant] of a foreign body, and therefore in a measure a self-interested worker."²⁰⁸

Ways and means of prosecuting the native work was again a foremost topic at the eighth session of the Conference at Allahabad, November 22-28, 1883. Noteworthy advance "in the amount and kind of Native work being done" was reported by the Committee on Missions. One in four of the Conference members was employed in vernacular missions; every charge, with a single exception, had done something, and the cooperation of the laymen at most points had been encouraging, yet there had been a decrease of seventeen in the total number of full members. Need was felt for six or more additional able preachers at once so that men who had acquired facility in the use of a vernacular might be free to devote themselves fully to the native work.

Finally, however, the Conference judged it best in the face of results to yield. Reluctantly, at its 1884 session it assured Bishop Hurst, presiding, that it would accept financial aid under certain conditions. Following this announcement, the General Missionary Committee at its meeting on November 7, 1885, resolved:

That, in accordance with the well nigh unanimous request of members of the South India Conference the sum of $[10,000] be put at the disposal of the Conference, for purely native work; by which we mean work among natives of the country, and in their own language, and prosecuted by men not engaged in English speaking work. The above grant is on the condition suggested by themselves, that for every dollar given, another dollar shall be raised in South India Conference, and expended upon this work dollar for dollar. The money to be remitted quarterly, upon the return of the usual account to the Mission Rooms.

This action protected the principle of entire self-support of the English-speaking work and also required that the native work should contribute to its own support.²⁰⁹

At the 1886 session the Conference went a step further in accepting Missionary Society support. It had become evident to many that the English-speaking churches would not, or could not, supply sufficient funds to make possible all the aggressive work in native evangelization that should be carried on. Accordingly, the Conference agreed to accept funds for three classes of work: (1) For initial work in new and remote districts. (2) For the support of missionaries wholly engaged in evangelistic work, including support of Presiding Elders while supervising wholly native work. (3) The support of newly appointed missionaries during their first year. The General Committee in November, 1885, had made an appropriation of $10,000. to the Conference subject to these conditions. William Taylor, in his original plans, had made no provision for return to the United States of missionaries whose health had failed or who had become worn out in the service. This had occasioned serious hardship and suffering. The General Committee accordingly made an appropriation of $15,000. for outgoing missionaries and for the return of those who were ill or superannuated. The acute need for funds for other purposes, particularly for the building of churches and mission houses, was such that Hard, Presiding Elder of the Central India District, made a trip to Australia in the spring of 1886 to solicit contributions from the colonists.²¹⁰

By 1887 the native work had been extended until it embraced eight language areas; Tamil, Marathi, Bengali, Telugu, Kanarese, Hindustani, Burmese, and Malay. Grants were made by the Missionary Society in amount of $6,000. for "remote missions," and $10,000. on the grant-in-aid principle. At its eleventh session, convened by Bishop W. X. Ninde at Vepery, Madras, on February 3, 1887, the Conference expressed "grateful acknowledgments" to the Missionary Society for its generous support and requested "larger appropriations for 'remote missions' . . . [that it might enter some] of the numberless inviting doors that now open . . . on every hand." It also asked the Society "to assume the support of missionaries appointed to [English-speaking] charges when the local society is unable to defray one half of their support." This request virtually marked the end of the self-support basis on which the South India Conference had been established. Six missionaries were announced as transferred to the Conference, a total of nineteen* in the seven years 1880-87. The Conference directory this year contained the names of forty-five full members and eleven probationers.† The increase in membership had not kept pace with the expansion of the work. While the decision to accept Missionary Society support provided a solution of one of the major problems of the Conference it still left unresolved the equally important problem of how to serve effectively a vast network of missions which virtually encompassed the whole of southern and western India. Bishop Ninde after a brief visit left India with the impression that Methodism was spread too thin over too vast an area. At the General Committee session in New York on November 9, 1887, he pointed out that with such a huge geographical area, embracing a number of languages, it was difficult—if not impossible—for the

* Missionaries whose transfers were announced in the Conference Minutes, 1880-87, were: December, 1880, Thomas H. Oakes (returned from three years in the U.S.), James S. Stone, East Ohio; 1882, David O. Ernsberger, North Indiana, Clark P. Hard (transferred because of ill health to Genesee Conference, now returned); 1883, Barton T. Eddy and wife, East Ohio; 1884, Joseph H. Garden, Kentucky, Samuel P. Long and wife, Michigan, J. M. Thoburn, Jr., and wife, Erie, De Loss M. Tompkins and wife, Rock River, William F. Oldham and wife, Michigan, Abraham W. Rudisill and wife, Baltimore; 1886, William A. Carroll and wife, Baltimore, Alfred G. Creamer, Newark, Charles M. Miller and wife, Erie, C. R. Thoburn, Erie, Finley D. Newhouse and wife, North-West Indiana; 1887, Frank L. McCoy and wife, Michigan, Ralph W. Munson and wife, Central Ohio, Homer C. Stuntz and wife, Upper Iowa, G. A. In 1887 William P. Byers and Louis H. Koepsel were sent out as lay workers and A. W. Prutch was admitted on trial. Within eleven years death claimed the lives of seven missionaries.

† Those received on trial from the field after 1882 were: 1883, Frank J. Blewitt, G. O. Carroll, E. E. Catley, A. T. Leonard, Charles Luck; 1884, W. E. L. Clarke; 1886, E. S. Busby, Jacob Samuel; 1887, Matthew Tindale, S. N. Das.

Conference to have enough well-trained, experienced men to preach and teach in all of the regional vernaculars. He advised that the missionary work be concentrated in two regions of India, north and south, and in two language areas—the Hindustani in the North and the Kanarese in the South—and the missionary forces be withdrawn from all other areas. Fortunately, James M. Buckley was able to controvert the Bishop's suggestion so effectively that no more was heard of it.*

At this time (1887) the English churches numbered thirty, with 1,120 full members. Most of the Societies were small; the largest—in Calcutta—had a membership of 205 persons. Seventeen Societies had a membership of less than fifty, and several less than fifteen. Native charges were twenty-three in number, in four of which Societies had not been organized. The total number of full members was 234.† Ten of the charges had less than ten full members each. Appointments were made at the close of the Conference session to six Districts: Ajmer, Bombay, Calcutta, Madras, Mussooree, and Burma.²¹¹

In 1885 a publishing house was established in Calcutta as a joint enterprise of the South India and the North India Conferences. It was begun without capital and hence was largely dependent on job work. At the end of a year Thoburn felt that it had already "become a great power for good." The concern specialized in the publication of tracts in Bengali and in English but also printed some books. In 1888, not including job work, more than six million pages were printed. Serious financial difficulties were encountered in successive years but in 1895 the manager could report that the output of religious printing was largely increased and the financial conditions of the press much improved.

The Central Conference, held at Bombay, February 17-19, 1887, made provision with the concurrence of the Bishop for three Conferences in India: the North India, the South India, and the Bengal. This very considerably reduced the South India geographical area. However, as the 1887 Annual Report of the Missionary Society pointed out, South India Conference still embraced "the cities of Bombay, Madras, and Karachi, with nearly all the territory in the peninsula proper, together with part of Central India and the province of Sindh." Karachi was as far from Bombay "as Charleston is from New York, while Madras, in the opposite direction, is as far away as Chicago is from Boston." Districts at the 1888 session were only two, as compared with six the previous year.²¹²

On November 25, 1887, Thoburn had written to the Conference from America:

* Years later Thoburn related that he was present in the General Committee but without the privilege of speaking. Bishop Hurst, who was presiding, sent a card to Thoburn with the message, "Get Dr. Buckley to help you." He appealed to Buckley, with the result stated. Thoburn commented: the India missionaries had "long since passed the stage of local job work. Their ideas and ideals had become imperial. They could no more have thought of confining their work to two sections of the empire than Francis Asbury could have consented to limit his travels to New England and South Carolina."—"How Christ Came to India," North-western Christian Advocate, Feb. 14, 1912, p. 205.

† Of the total receipts for the native work the churches themselves contributed Rs. 1,092; the English churches, Rs. 8,631; other sources in India, Rs. 12,322; the Missionary Society, Rs. 25,092; and other sources in America and Europe, Rs. 2,876.

While tarrying in this country, I have been far from idle. Both in the Spring and Autumn, I visited as many of the Annual Conferences as possible. I have also visited twelve colleges, three theological seminaries, and a number of schools of lower grade. During the past summer I was present at eight camp-meetings, and I have also preached in nearly all the large cities, and many smaller towns. The results of my search for missionaries have not been wholly discouraging. Six men have recently sailed for India, and three more will follow in a few weeks, making nine in all. . . . Since coming to this country, God has helped me to secure the sending out of thirty-four adult workers, and I hope to secure enough to bring the number up to fifty before returning to India.²¹³

At the Conference session the transfer of five new missionaries to South India was announced. Two from India were admitted on trial. The Conference expressed a fear that because of increased openings in the native work and the unwillingness of men who had come to India for missionary pioneering to be diverted to pastoral service in English churches, opportunities for developing these churches would be neglected. It requested the General Committee and the Bishops to consider the advisability of sending out capable men for short-term service in the English self-supporting work on condition that traveling expenses to and from India should not be paid for less than a six-year term. The German Evangelical Basel Mission this year transferred to the Conference their promising Indian mission, including two schools, in the southern part of the Nizam's Dominions contiguous to the Kanarese-Telugu field, because the field had for several years been under Methodist cultivation.

The thirteenth Annual Conference, held in Bombay, January 31-February 5, 1889, welcomed with glad acclaim Bishop James M. Thoburn who had been elected to the episcopacy by the 1888 General Conference. At the January, 1891, Conference the Madras District was divided, seven of the twelve charges being included in a new Hyderabad District. An Epworth League Board was created, authorized to take measures for the development of the young people's movement in the Conference. At the December, 1891, session a fourth District, Sind, was formed with four appointments, three (the English church, the Seamen's Mission, and the Marathi Mission) in Karachi, and Quetta the fourth. At this session J. E. Robinson asked for a rearrangement of Conference and District boundaries, declaring that in all of Methodism's mission fields there was not another District "so unwieldly—so lacking in the homogeneity and compactness" necessary for aggressive work. Its vast expanse, its widely separated stations, its variety of races and languages, he insisted, made successful administration all but impossible. His declaration met with sufficient agreement to cause a separate organization of Bombay Conference in 1892. This left South India with only two Districts, Hyderabad and Madras, and twenty pastoral charges. When the 1892 Conference was convened only nine of the twenty-two members were present.* The transfer of sixteen missionaries to Bombay forced South India to consider admitting a larger number of Indian preachers to Conference membership.† After a special committee appointed to consider the question had reported favorably six Indians were received on trial. Three were given appointments in association with missionaries; and three were placed in sole charge of stations.²¹⁴ At the 1893 Conference the Indian membership was further increased by the reception on trial of three native preachers. During 1894 Dennis Osborne conducted an extensive series of evangelistic services in the English churches. So impressed was the Conference by the success of the meetings it requested that he "should be set apart" for exclusively evangelistic work.

Year by year the Indian work assumed proportionately greater importance as compared to the English. A decline in the latter had been noted in 1883 and had continued ever since. One reason was the seeming impossibility of continuously supplying the charges with capable men. J. E. Robinson said in his 1888 report to Conference:

The problems connected with our smaller English churches are becoming more difficult and perplexing with every passing year. The shifting character of the communities, the consequent possible and actual failure of support for the pastor, and the increasing rivalry of other denominations, add to the already existing burdens of anxiety which those responsible for the work have to carry. It may be that in many instances the solution lies in the reversal of the relation which the English work has hitherto sustained to the native work—making the former subordinate in thought and plan to the latter.²¹⁵

Whether or not deliberately planned, it was all too clear that this shift was taking place. Two factors which had been largely responsible for subdivision of the Conference in earlier years were still operative—the long distances between stations, involving too much expense to the native preachers in attending Conference sessions, and difficulties growing out of a multiplicity of vernaculars. Despite the small number of English churches in 1895 capable of any considerable financial support of the missionary work there was strong demand in the Madras District for further division of Districts.

A Conference Book Agency was established in Bombay at the 1876 session to increase the supply of available literature and to facilitate its distribution.

* Additional missionaries transferred to the Conference, 1888-95, had been: 1888, E. F. Frease and wife, East Ohio; William H. Hollister and wife, Wisconsin; George W. Isham and wife, Nebraska; Clayton E. Delamater, Upper Iowa; A. E. Winter, North Ohio; February, 1889, William L. King and wife, Minnesota; James B. Thomas and wife, Indiana (immediately transferred to Bengal Conference); John B. Buttrick, received by recognition of credentials from Nova Scotia Conference, Methodist Church of Canada; 1890, Ira A. Richards and wife, North Ohio (returned from furlough); J. H. and Carrie D. Schively, North India; January, 1891, Fawcett E. N. Shaw and wife, Maine; 1892, John N. West and wife, North Ohio; Albert E. Cook, Bombay. In 1892 Rudisill returned from his furlough, and C. B. Ward was readmitted. In the next three years only three new men came to South India: two laymen, H. S. Jefferson and James Rudisill, in 1893 for employment at the Madras Press (remaining only one year), and Ellis Roberts, Rock River Conference, January, 1895.

† Men admitted on trial from India during these years through 1895: 1888, Ben Mitchell, Gangadhar B. Kali; 1890, Charles G. Elsam, Richard Sorby; January, 1891, William H. Grenon; 1892, Joseph G. Turton, Satyaveda M. Job, John Narappa, Suhrudia Noah, Benjamin Luke, Mallappa Lewis, Kurumbayil R. Gopalab Aiyar; 1893, William D. Waller, Manappa Desai, Mutyallappa Narasiah, Thomas R. Toussaint, William B. Cumine, Govinduraju Gershom; January, 1895, W. H. L. Batstone (who had come to India in 1892 to aid Ward's work); S. Chinnappa, D. Marian, Raju Naidu.

At the end of the year it reported sales to the amount of Rs. 1,729, with a profit of 199 rupees.

The South India Conference when organized had three Districts: Bombay, Calcutta, and Madras. For eleven years its immense area remained unchanged but the action of the 1887 Central Conference in setting off the Bengal Conference greatly reduced its size. During the period 1876-87 frequent changes were made in organization of Districts.*

The Bombay District included the western and northwestern parts of the peninsula and reached out toward the Central Provinces. Madras District covered the eastern part of the peninsula and extended northward into the Mohammedan state of Hyderabad, the Nizam's Dominions. Calcutta District included central and eastern India as far as the border of Burma.

BOMBAY DISTRICT

The Bombay District as organized in 1876 with George Bowen as Presiding Elder had seven charges,† chiefly the outgrowth of the work of Taylor and his colleagues. Under Taylor's Circuit system, each city had but one Society, with one Quarterly Conference and several preaching places. This plan provided maximum opportunity for the use of lay preachers and Exhorters. But under Conference organization, changes were bound to come. One was a demand for separately organized charges, each with its own minister, which tended to displace the lay preachers by diminishing the need for their ministry. This development intensified the need for more ordained men. It also caused disappointment and some friction in the Church.

In 1877 William B. Osborn was appointed Presiding Elder. At the fourth Conference (January, 1880) Osborn was succeeded by D. O. Fox. In 1883 the Presiding Elder lamented a decline of spiritual interest in the English churches. Much of the "first love and zeal for souls," he said, had been lost. Attendance at the fellowship and prayer meetings had fallen off, although financially the churches were doing well. In 1884 Fox was succeeded by Bowen, who was followed in 1887 by J. E. Robinson. In 1891 he reported encouraging progress in the Indian work, but confessed that in comparison with what was being accomplished in other parts of India results were insignificant. One of the chief difficulties was, he felt, lack of personnel. With adequate reinforcement gains commensurate with those registered in other areas would be possible.²¹⁶

* In 1878 the Bombay and Madras Districts were combined into one. At the January, 1880, Conference Districts were increased to four by the separation of the Bombay and Madras Districts and the creation of an Allahabad District. In 1881 the Bombay and Madras Districts were again combined. In 1882 and 1883 the status remained the same but in 1884 Districts were increased to six: Bombay, Madras, Calcutta, Allahabad, Central, and Burma. In 1885 there was no change. At the 1887 Conference (February 3-8) the number was the same but the boundaries were changed somewhat, as also some names, making the list as follows: Ajmer, Bombay, Burma, Calcutta, Madras, and Mussooree.

† The seven charges of the Bombay District in 1876 were Bombay, Poona, Thana, Igatpuri, Nagpur, Mhow, and Karachi. Until the District was organized as a separate Conference no new centers were occupied except Baroda.

In 1876 Bombay was listed in the Conference Minutes as a single appointment, with Bowen and I. F. Row assigned as ministers, and one to be supplied. The next year Row was appointed to the English church, and Bowen to the Marathi Circuit—a Marathi Methodist Society having been organized in 1874. By 1880 there were three pastoral charges under one Quarterly Conference: Grant Road, the Fort, and Mazagon. At each place work had been carried on among both English and Indians. The congregation which previously had been worshipping in Falkland Road Hall built the Grant Road Church—the first Methodist church erected in Bombay—raising the necessary funds locally. The new building was used by both the English and the vernacular congregations. The Mazagon members and constituency, a numerous group of substantial people, mostly English, this same year likewise erected a church, located at Wari Bunder. An English school was opened by William H. Stephens, which after six years became a vernacular school. Missionary work among the European seamen was begun in 1884 by J. Sumner Stone, and was continued in rented buildings near the docks until 1887 when the Seamen's Rest was built.

In 1881 the native work was constituted a fourth pastoral charge, all four still under one Quarterly Conference. For the fifth year George Bowen was in charge of the native Circuit, principally among the immense Tamil population. With his assistants, he held five native services in the three Methodist churches, and on four evenings preached on the streets. In 1883 the work was enlarged. In addition to the services and Sunday schools at Grant Road, the Fort, and Mazagon, Bowen rented a hall on Picket Road * where, beginning in March, he with his assistants held services every evening. Laymen able to use the vernacular also came to assist.²¹⁷

Missionary work was also under way for Indian women. The Conference earlier sent out an appeal for workers to the W.F.M.S. and in 1884 Sarah M. DeLine arrived on the field. Wives of missionaries had organized some zenana visiting earlier, with the aid of Miss Sundarbai Powar, a converted native who later became the assistant of Pandita Ramabai.²¹⁸

Partly under the stimulus of Miss DeLine, who was conducting the native Sunday school at the Grant Road Society, the English congregation was aroused to take greater interest in the Maratha people of the city, and a "considerable body of workers" was assembled. The setting apart of the Grant Road native church—the Khetwadi Mission—in 1886, under William W. Bruere and his wife, was achieved this year. Along with the Brueres, Sundarbai Powar lent her assistance. In 1889 four Bible women were also employed under the women's program. Zenana visiting was led by Miss Powar, and Bible teaching held in a private boys' school and a government girls' school. Eight Sunday schools enrolled men and women as well as children. The Bible women also went regularly to the mills at the noon hour rest in order to reach hundreds of women eager to hear the Gospel.²¹⁹

In 1888 a church was built at the Fort (Dean Lane) on land leased from the Port Trust and named the Bowen Memorial Church in honor of George Bowen, who had died earlier in the year. Toward the building the Missionary Society contributed $5,000, the first grant made by the Society for an English church building in India. In Mazagon, also, the English Society was prosperous. The congregation not only met its own expenses but in addition made a substantial contribution to the general work in the city. Church, parsonage, and school buildings were erected on land given by the government.²²⁰

A second Marathi mission, located at Umerkhadi, a densely populated section of Bombay, was begun about 1887 against fierce opposition, personal violence, and persistent attempts to disrupt the schools. Street preaching was maintained and many Bible portions circulated. Two Bible women were employed in connection with the mission, much of whose time was given to visiting large buildings housing numerous families. They gathered women together in groups of twenty-five to sixty, and sang, read, and talked to them.²²¹

In 1889 a mission was founded among the 200,000 Gujarati-speaking people in the city. Two men, one of whom was the leader of the Hindu sect, the "Kabirpanth," became interested in Christianity through reading "tracts and a New Testament and being thereby convicted of sin in . . . [himself] and of righteousness in Christ alone." He, his associate, and some fifteen others were baptized and through their witness had soon led about fifty to confess faith in Christ and receive baptism. Clayton E. Delamater was placed in charge of the mission, and at the 1890 Conference was regularly appointed to it.²²² J. E. Robinson, the Presiding Elder, gave an optimistic account of the three Bombay English churches to the 1893 Bombay Conference:

The whole work is self-supporting. Five preaching services are held every Sunday, and three excellent prayer-meetings every Wednesday. . . . Three well-organized Sunday-schools, two Epworth Leagues and one Junior League, meeting every week, are doing well the particular work to which they are devoted. Although the membership of the several churches is not large, it is in the main steadfast, loyally Methodist, intelligent and generous. . . . During the year special revival services were held for one to two weeks in each of the churches with good results. . . . A school for neglected Eurasian children . . . has been maintained since July last, in which about 24 bright boys and girls from five to fifteen years of age are receiving the rudiments of an English education, besides being taught to love and serve God.²²³

In 1895 the Bowen Memorial Church reported a total membership, full members and probationers, of sixty-seven; the Grant Road Church, eighty-four; and Mazagon Church, ten.

The Bombay Marathi Circuit included three groups—Maratha, Tamil, and Hindustani. The people to whom it ministered were scattered all over the city and were a floating population. They came to Bombay from distant towns and villages, sought employment on the railroads, in the mills, and as domestic servants, and remained only long enough to save a little money before returning to their homes. The mission endeavored to keep track of converts but this was next to impossible. The city, Robinson felt, was not the most productive field for mission work, but he was convinced in 1893 that in Bombay every department was "more strongly entrenched" than ever before.²²⁴

The Poona Society, organized by Taylor in 1872, in 1876 reported 102 full members, then for several years steadily declined. In December, 1880, Poona and Lonavla were joined to form the Poona Circuit, an arrangement which continued until November, 1883, when Poona was again made a separate appointment. A church, much needed by the Society for years, was dedicated in June, 1886. An Epworth League, with its several departments well organized, was doing much in 1892 for the young people of the congregation. The Sunday school also was active and well equipped. In November, 1895, the church reported sixty-seven full members and twenty-six probationers.

By 1881 a native school was in operation under W. E. Robbins and the next year a Poona Marathi Circuit appeared in the Minutes with Robbins in charge. In 1889 the Circuit had twelve day schools, ten in the city, two in outpoints. Five of the city schools were for girls, two of which enrolled high-caste children. In all, 520 pupils were registered. In February, 1889, a church and a schoolhouse with a teacher's room were opened in a Sweepers' settlement of some four hundred people. The site as well as half of the cost of the schoolhouse was contributed by the government. The Marathi Circuit by 1893 had day and Sunday schools in operation at two points—Talegaon, twenty miles, and Chinchwad, thirteen miles, from Poona. In the valley extending from Poona to Lonavla there were several hundred villages, with only one mission, the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, other than the Methodist engaged in missionary work in the area.²²⁵

In 1886 Mrs. John Blackstock, the missionary's wife, opened four girls' schools in Poona—two in the native city, one in the cantonments, and one in the Sweepers' quarters—and supervised them until she left for America in 1887. At the close of 1886, $120. was received from the Cincinnati Branch for work among women and girls, a substantial contribution toward the total maintenance of $30. per month. A Sunday school was organized in connection with each school. This year the former Ellen H. Warner, who had accomplished much for girls' education in Rangoon, came to Poona as the wife of D. O. Fox and immediately lent her aid in developing the Poona schools. By 1890 there were five girls' schools, two for high-caste girls and three others for lower castes, with an average total attendance of 225. A serious drawback to growth was the early age at which girls were compelled to leave school—usually much against their will—to marry. Including outside villages between five hundred and six hundred pupils had been enrolled in twelve schools. The conditions which prevailed in these girls' schools were described by Mrs. Ellen H. Fox:

All our Girls' Schools are held in rented rooms, three being on the second floor with stairway leading to them not more than two feet wide. The floors are dry mud without matting of any kind and are kept hard and smooth by a preparation of cow dung spread on with the hands.

The children sit on the floor. The teacher has a chair and sometimes a stool for a visitor. The school furniture consists of a table, a box in which to lock books and slates at night, a blackboard, one or two maps, and a large piece of card board, showing the primary colors. Two of the schools have clocks, and if there is anyone who desires to present a clock to any of the others it will be kindly received, as it is almost impossible to secure punctuality without them.

In 1895 the women could command the services of four pastors' wives as well as the assistants who had been raised up. Besides the number of girls' schools Mrs. Fox looked after, she also bore the responsibility for a Woman's Training School. Two separate homes, one for English girls, one for Anglo-Indians, were being maintained besides a general program for women.²²⁶

By 1879 a beginning had been made toward an English boarding school at Poona. W. E. Robbins was made its head. The attendance in 1880 reached seventy-eight; thirty-four were boarders. Growth through the years was uneven and at times the financial situation was difficult but the student body continued to grow until in 1891 it numbered 130. In the meantime the school had been renamed the Taylor High School. In 1895 the W.F.M.S. agreed to take over the girls' department.²²⁷

The Anglo-Indian Girls' Orphanage and Home, founded on an independent basis by an American woman, came into the possession of the Bombay Conference soon after it had been established (1882). When it was transferred it was caring for thirty-three children and young women. In 1895 it had thirty-eight, "rescued from . . . influences of a most demoralizing character." For many years the Home was under the supervision of Mrs. Emily Hutchings, "recognised [in 1894] as a regular lay worker of the Conference," who came out from England at her own expense for the work. This same year the Home was first listed as one of the institutions of the Woman's Conference and of the W.F.M.S. In 1895 an Anglo-Indian Boys' Orphanage and Home was begun by the Poona pastor, independent of mission support.²²⁸

Lonavla (Lanowli in the old records), also an outgrowth of Taylor's work, was an important railway center forty miles north of Poona. Its first appearance in the Minutes was in the Bombay District appointments in January, 1880, with W. J. Gladwin as pastor. After three years' connection with Poona, the church was supplied intermittently from Bombay and from Poona. In 1893 Robinson thought that a solution to the problem of Lonavla might be in the assignment of a resident pastor but the requisite support was not to be had.

The town, however, was the site of a Camp Meeting whose influence reached far and wide. In 1878 W. B. Osborn, Presiding Elder, instituted a seven days' meeting at the Easter holidays in a grove near the railway station. From the first year it was largely attended. Crowds from near and far poured in by train, numbers coming from Bombay, some eighty miles away. Curiosity was not a factor. Military and civil officials attended as well as others of all classes. In 1885 the services were preceded by a daily march through the bazaars, with drum and cymbals, to attract a crowd, which once assembled was invited to follow along to the tent meeting. At the meeting, addresses were delivered in three different native tongues, Marathi, Hindustani, and Gujarati. Out of the annual Lonavla Camp Meetings came spiritual strength the Church had not anticipated. The Presiding Elder reported that the 1894 assembly was "a great inspiration to the missionaries" and others who attended. For the year 1895 W. E. L. Clarke was appointed, and his wife was assigned by the Woman's Conference to women's work, a usual arrangement for married couples.²²⁹

Nagpur, a city of about 100,000 population, capital of the Central Provinces, was 520 miles east of Bombay. Albert Norton was appointed to Nagpur as pastor in 1874 but within a few months he left to start an independent mission in the Berars. In July, 1876, Gilder held successful revival meetings in the city and its military headquarters, Kamptee, ten miles distant, and in November W. J. Gladwin was appointed pastor. By 1882 the little group at Nagpur had increased to thirty-two full members. While not large in number nor strong financially, the church sustained an active program, with preaching in Tamil, Marathi, and Hindustani, in addition to English. From funds provided from personal resources by C. P. Hard, and his wife's stipend for lectures given in Australia, and local contributions, a suitable site was procured and a church built, dedicated in December, 1887. Two years later a parsonage was erected. A native school and a well-managed Sunday school formed part of the mission. The church was distant from the homes of the railway employees and for their accommodation a chapel near the railway was leased in 1892 in which Sunday and weekday services were held. Two day schools for the different sexes were conducted and an Indian Local Preacher maintained regular Sunday services and preached outdoors on weekdays. In 1894 the Nagpur English Society reported twenty-seven full members and twelve probationers.²³⁰

In Kamptee, a city of some fifty thousand population, site of a military cantonment, Christian work was under way as early as 1880 among Indian people, conducted by a "Brother Samuel," a Local Preacher, while T. E. F. Morton was preaching weekly to the English. In 1886 A. S. E. Vardon was appointed to the station, followed the next year by William H. Stephens. This year (1887) a mission was begun among the Marathi-speaking people. A year later two schools were in operation, one with seventy-five boys and the other thirty-seven girls. At first the girls came at "any hour with unwashed hands and faces and unkenpt hair, sometimes with a little clothing on and sometimes with none at all." In time they were in their places in the schoolroom at seven o'clock in the morning, clean and neatly clothed. In 1888 two men were reported baptized. The region was thought by J. E. Robinson, the Presiding Elder, to be perhaps the most promising field for missionary work in the Bombay District. The people, he said, were "accessible and susceptible, eager for instruction and favorably disposed toward our missionaries." He pronounced the boys' school the best and largest on the District. In 1889 the Free Church of Scotland Mission turned over to the Methodist Mission "on very easy conditions, their fine school property . . . with . . . a well manned high school" for which the government supplied a generous grant. Stephens and his wife closed their fourth and final year at Kamptee at the end of 1890 with three boys' schools and two girls' schools "excellently organized, efficiently taught, economically managed."²³¹

By 1890 an English Society had been organized which was active and was contributing more than half the cost of maintaining the Indian mission. In 1893 the Kamptee English church had an attendance of fifty at the morning services on Sunday and one hundred in the evening. The Sunday school had fifty pupils and the Epworth League eighteen active members. Prayer meeting was held on Wednesday evening and a Bible class for soldiers on Friday evening. Three or four times a week a Local Preacher and two Exhorters conducted street meetings. Five vernacular schools were maintained—two for boys and one for girls—while two were attended by both boys and girls. In 1895 a boarding school for boys was opened. Year after year the missionaries confidently expected a break that would result in a large number of conversions but at the end of every year regretfully acknowledged that it had not come. In 1895 the Indian Society reported twenty full members and thirty-four probationers.²³²

Although "women's work" each year was assigned to but one woman, the pastor's wife, a successful and diverse program was early initiated with the assistance of a number of Bible women. Almost every year another day school was started, and the zenanas opened rapidly once the first suspicion of baptism as a "dreadful rite" was overcome, and the advantages of learning were made known.*

Ahmedabad, in northern Bombay 309 miles from the city of Bombay, first appeared in the January, 1880, Minutes, although missionary work had been under way there for several years. In 1881 the appointment was designated Ahmedabad Circuit, which in 1882 included Baroda, Bulsar, Broach, Sabarmati, and Palanpur. All of the congregations were small, made up principally of railway employees. In 1883 Ahmedabad Circuit disappeared from the Minutes not to appear again until 1895 when work was entirely confined to the Gujarati people.²³³

* According to Mrs. Stephens, "some of them thought that we intended to call several times and then present a bill." However, "when their neighbors saw that we taught sewing and fancy work and also taught [how] . . . to read and write, they began to request us to come to them also."—Minutes, South India Woman's Conference, 1889, p. 20.

Baroda, in the native state of the same name, with a population of approximately 100,000, was located 245 miles by rail north of Bombay. In January, 1880, it was linked with Ahmedabad. At the close of the year the English church listed seven members. At the November, 1881, Conference the Presiding Elder reported a church almost ready for dedication, free of debt; native work opened, the preacher employed by the Society; and six adults and five children recently baptized. The next year there were several conversions among the weavers of the Dher caste, all of whom contributed a tenth of their income to maintain the missionary work. In 1884 the English church was merely marking time but the Indian work gladdened the missionary's heart.

At the 1888 Conference C. E. Delamater was appointed to Baroda to establish a mission among the Gujarats. He conducted an English Sunday evening service during the year, made good progress in language study, organized a native coeducational school which soon numbered fourteen boys and five girls, and began street preaching. He was succeeded in 1889 by Edwin F. Frease who accomplished little among the Gujarats. In the meantime Gujarati converts in Bombay, whose family home was in Baroda, awakened interest among their kinfolk in the Christian message. This gave real impetus to the mission. A little native church was organized, and also a Christian Boys' Boarding School, which soon claimed a major share of the missionary's time and attention and rapidly developed into an effective training institution—the main resource for the preparation of Gujarati Methodist workers. In 1891 Frease was relieved of responsibility for the English church. Baptisms on the Baroda Gujarati Circuit in 1895 numbered 470—adults 327, children 143.²³⁴

An exceptional program for women was made possible because of the rare appointment of two W.F.M.S. missionaries, one a doctor, to this small new mission.*

At Igatpuri, where Taylor had organized a Society in 1873, the church in 1877 reported twenty-two full members, and in 1883 fifty-three. In 1876 a church edifice was erected through the efforts of Frank Pearcey of the G. I. P. Railway. In 1881 a mission to the Thakkurs was connected with the English work, under Gilder's charge, the local church also supporting the Indian preacher. An English day school was reported in 1882 as doing excellent work. In 1884 the pastor reported a year of trial. A suit had been brought by the Wesleyan members of the congregation for possession of the church building. The court decided they had no claim but the litigation split the congregation and only twenty-eight members were reported at the end of the year. A second Methodist church was built by the Wesleyan mission. In 1887, notwithstanding the fact that the membership had been reduced to seven persons, the pastor presented a hopeful report, assuring the Conference that the church had done "exceedingly well."²³⁵

Some progress in the Indian work was made year after year, including maintenance of both a day school and Sunday school. The wives of the pastors in turn did what they could for the native women, and the local W.F.M.S. supported a Bible woman. The English work was continued with inadequate support, few accessions to membership, and additions offset by removals. In 1892 the Presiding Elder acknowledged that it was "a sad waste of energy to have two Methodist preachers occupying such a small field while the need of workers . . . [was] so deeply felt in other places." Optimist as he was Robinson could not prevent the obtrusion of a doleful note in his 1895 report:

The day school at Igatpuri . . . has been closed. Its last days were days of painful struggle, its sun went down in clouds, its end was mournful, devout men gave it decent burial.²³⁶

One of the points visited by Taylor in his 1873 tour was Bhusawal where Norton had tried unsuccessfully at an earlier date to organize a Society. It appeared in the December, 1880, Minutes linked with Igatpuri but the next year was made a separate charge, credited with ten full members and twelve probationers. The church had not attempted native work. The Society had no suitable place of worship but in 1882 raised more than 4,000 rupees toward building. It was hindered in its plans by opposition of the municipal authorities. At the 1883 Conference W. W. Bruere was appointed pastor of a Circuit including all the railway stations from Manmad to Akola, with Bhusawal as the center. Before the end of the year Bruere was transferred and the Circuit placed under the care of the Igatpuri pastor. This arrangement—unsatisfactory at the best—was continued through 1885. In 1888 Bhusawal was linked with Baroda, but this also was a temporary arrangement. The fact was that the Conference lacked the facilities to carry on the work there. This was finally acknowledged in 1895 and the station was transferred to the Alliance Mission.²³⁷

Thana, directly north of Bombay, first listed in the 1876 Minutes, did not again appear until January, 1891, when Arthur W. Prautch was appointed to the Circuit. The first year, his wife, the assistant missionary, reported: "We have in the Thana District 807,367 souls, for which there is no other evangelistic agency except the Free Church Medical Mission. The people live in 1984 villages and towns, of from 200 to 15,000 inhabitants." Together the Pratches had gone from village to village "selling Gospels and Tracts, preaching the word, and teaching instant salvation." During 1892 he baptized fifty-nine adults and twenty-seven children which stimulated the hope that within the near future "a strong self-respecting and respected Christian community" would be built in the region. Six centers were established on the Circuit. At the end of three years 274 persons had been baptized. Converts were from the depressed class who lived in abject want except for the brief time each year when they were required by the landholders to work in the rice fields. The rest of the time they ran ever deeper into debt, compelled to borrow money at compound interest for food. Prautch had his misgivings concerning the permanency of the work with them. "I do not see," he said, "how a people can get free spiritually when their bodies are mortgaged to taskmasters. This question will need to be fairly met, not in the spirit of holding out charity, but in giving the people a chance to help themselves." He was reappointed for 1895 but at the end of that year Thana did not appear in the list of appointments.²³⁸

The early interest of D. O. Fox in Karachi,* seaport for the Punjab, continued and in November, 1876, he was appointed to the charge. This year it was credited with having a membership, including probationers, of fifty-one persons. Fox was succeeded at the Conference of January, 1880, by L. R. Janney, who also was pastor for two years. In 1881 a church trial occurred which left many lingering difficulties. Dennis Osborne, then Presiding Elder, stated in 1884 that Karachi had been "for some years a barren field" where much patient toil had been invested without result but that this year there had been a stir among the dry bones and not a few persons were quickened and converted. During 1886-87, Gilder by patience and conciliation helped to heal old sores and make a general advance. Three years later (1890) J. E. Robinson, as Presiding Elder, reported a slight increase in membership, a more united Society, and finances satisfactory. The English church contributed half the cost of a school for the Maratha people which was begun that year. In 1890 George I. Stone was appointed pastor and in December, 1891, was given the double appointment of pastor and of Presiding Elder of the newly constituted Sind District.† The Karachi English Society had a membership of thirty-three, including eight probationers, and Quetta a membership of seventeen, of whom ten were probationers. F. W. Wood and his wife in 1894 reported a successful year at the Seamen's Rest, including an enlarged congregation drawn from the residents of Keamari. At Quetta, a city of 20,000 people, a church seating 120 had been built. As a hill station it suffered more than most of the English churches from frequent transfers of its members. In 1894 Stone stated that only one person remained who had taken part in the organization of the church three years before. The Karachi Society at the beginning of 1895 was at a low ebb, the Sunday evening congregation not exceeding twenty persons, the Class meeting five; but at the close of the year the church "was scarcely able to seat the congregation," and the Class meeting had increased to thirty or more. The Marathi school had been maintained, while the religious services of the Seamen's Mission had been well attended and some sailors converted.²³⁹ Mrs. Stone in her capacity as women's missionary gave unstintedly of herself.

Mhow, in central India, was a small city but one of the chief military stations of India. It appears among the 1876 appointments, with M. H. Nichols as pastor. At the end of the year fifteen full members and eight probationers were reported. At the January, 1880, Conference, W. F. G. Curties was appointed pastor at Mhow, then included in the Allahabad District. Mhow and Khandwa were listed as a single charge though Khandwa was really separate. It had its own pastor, a Local Preacher, and resources available for support. Both points had small, well-furnished churches.

In 1884, with Mhow transferred to the Central India District, increased attention was given to the native work. The Mhow Circuit in 1886 was "thirteen hours long." The commander-in-chief of the Bombay army, Lieut.-Gen. Sir Robert Phayre, was a member of the Mhow congregation, frequently occupying the pulpit in the absence of the pastor and contributing generously to church support. He made, at one time, a contribution of Rs. 5,290 to the Khandwa Society.

In 1888 Mhow was retransferred to the Ajmer District, Bengal Conference. Under T. E. F. Morton marked advance was made:

A Day-school for boys, one for girls, preaching in bazar and villages, a great open-air Scripture school organization, several baptisms, brave collecting toward maintenance of all, have marked the year.

The connection of Mhow* with the Methodist Church ended in 1890 by transfer to the Wesleyan Mission.²⁴⁰

CALCUTTA DISTRICT

The Calcutta District when organized at the first meeting of the South India Conference (1876) included nine charges.† J. M. Thoburn was appointed Presiding Elder and reappointed annually until 1887. At the February, 1887, session, he was succeeded by J. M. Thoburn, Jr., who was reappointed in January, 1888 (Bengal Conference). During the year "nearly one-third of the Mission force in the district [including the Presiding Elder] left for America."

Several of the 1876 appointments were dropped within a few years for, as Thoburn explained, attempts to gain a foothold had been unsuccessful.

* Ministry to the Wesleyan troops was an acknowledged province of the Wesleyan mission. Of the ninety adherents of the Mhow English church eighty were Wesleyans. By common agreement the property was sold in 1890 to that mission, and the Indian Circuit also transferred. Enoch Jeffries, who had been appointed to Mhow at the 1889 Conference, withdrew from the Methodist Church and remained with the Mhow mission.—Minutes, Bengal Conference, 1890, p. 22; ibid., 1891, p. 30.

† The nine charges of the Calcutta District in 1876 were: Calcutta (the English church, Dharamtala), seamen's church (Calcutta), Darjeeling, Raj Mahal, Meerut, Allahabad, Jabalpur, Agra, and Roorkee. Raj Mahal was listed only in 1876, and Meerut did not again appear in the Calcutta District. Since the Allahabad, Jabalpur, Agra, and Roorkee missions were transferred in 1880 to the new Allahabad District, the account of them is given under that District. To Howrah, listed for the first time in 1877, P. M. Mukerji was appointed. It appeared as a separate station only for that year.

This is chiefly owing to the sparseness of the English-speaking population throughout Bengal, there being very few places where enough persons can be found to form a basis for such an organization as we try to effect.²⁴¹

The District, like the Conference, was administratively unwieldy. The Presiding Elder pointed out that the nearest appointment was three hundred miles distant from Calcutta, the District center, and others required a journey of some twelve hundred miles. It was obvious from the first that it could not be developed as a missionary unit.

From a region south of the city of Calcutta requests had come from time to time for native preachers. Since other Churches were at work in the area the Methodists delayed responding but finally organized Societies in several villages. The outcome was disappointing for the reasons reported to the Conference by Thoburn:

The local Missionary Society agreed to pay half the salary of the village preachers, but even this small subsidy proved a snare. The people gave nothing, and the preachers sat down quietly and enjoyed their half pay, and beyond holding a meeting on Sunday with a very few people present, they have done nothing.²⁴²

Following the setting off of the Allahabad District in 1880 the Calcutta District was practically confined to the cities of Calcutta and Rangoon. Attempts had been made, Thoburn stated in his report to the 1881 Conference, "to gain a foothold" at other places but without success. A partial explanation lay in the fact that Thoburn's time was so completely taken up by preaching and pastoral work in Calcutta, in editing the Indian Witness, and caring for various other enterprises that it was impossible for him to do anything outside of the city.

Thoburn was appointed pastor of the Calcutta English church (Dharamtala Street) at the first Conference. In 1876 it reported 150 full members and thirty-seven probationers but this bare statistical statement conveys no idea of the strength, vitality, and extent of the enterprise. The building had a seating capacity of 1,500 people. On Sunday evenings it was usually well filled and on some occasions overcrowded. As indicative of the spirit and power of the religious services Thoburn wrote:

Hundreds of souls have been converted within its walls. Many of these converts are strangers who chance to be in Calcutta for a time, while many others belong to the city. The membership, however, is not as large as might be expected. Society in India is a shifting quantity Some return to England, while others move to other parts of India, and it thus happens that a church which would maintain its strength must renew its membership every five years at least. We are constantly losing members, and hence we must be constantly winning converts We cannot afford to depend on intermittent revival seasons, but must live in an atmosphere of revival from January to December.²⁴³

Nowhere else in India, Bowen claimed, was such an audience steadily gathered. An extensive and varied program was maintained from year to year. Thoburn's pastorate extended over a period of nine years (1876-84) with an interim of three years when the church was served by J. Sumner Stone (1879); S. P. Jacobs (1880); and T. H. Oakes (1881). James M. Thoburn, Jr., a nephew of the senior Thoburn, arrived on the field in 1884. At the November, 1884, Conference he was appointed to the church. The change in pastors did not affect attendance. Congregations in 1885-86 were as large as ever, missionary interest was well sustained, and financial support was increased.

In March, 1888, Frank W. Warne began a fruitful ministry in the Dharamtala Church. Within the first ten months he won about one hundred converts. In 1889 he was given the double appointment of Presiding Elder and pastor, a relationship which continued until 1900. The morning congregation averaged five hundred persons, and at night the number was doubled. Eleven Class meetings met weekly and two hundred people attended the midweek prayer meeting. The church was well organized, with a large Sunday school and a number of other departments. In 1894 the pastor reported special work carried on by the young people, a Junior Epworth League for boys, workers' meetings held regularly, and publication of The Messenger, a monthly paper circulated among the members. For the year ending December, 1894, the church reported 350 full members and 140 probationers.²⁴⁴

By 1880 the Seamen's Mission Church of 1876 had expanded to two appointments, Hastings and Lal Bazaar. The mission had been opened in 1874 by a band of devoted women who visited the liquor shops near the docks "to talk, sing and pray with the sailors," many hundreds of whom made port at Calcutta every year. More intensive work was done the next year by T. H. Oakes. For a while he was entirely dependent for his livelihood on voluntary offerings. He bunked on one of the ships in port and when it was about to sail rolled up his duffel bag and transferred to another. The Presiding Elder reported that at Lal Bazaar in 1881 conversions had taken place almost daily. At Hastings a debt of over Rs. 3,000 had been paid and "the mission placed upon a healthy financial basis." A few years later a visitor remarked, "19 Lal Bazaar is a great place for good coffee and salvation." During 1887 five hundred persons sought pardoning mercy and eight hundred signed the "no liquor" pledge. The Hastings mission had a smaller attendance but had a good record for conversions.

The two seamen's missions continued an effective ministry, although as years passed conditions changed greatly. As sailing ships gave way to steamers the number of seamen rapidly decreased until by 1892 there were not more than one-tenth as many as in the early years. Special effort was made in behalf of Scandinavian sailors. In 1894 Monday night Gospel meetings were conducted in their language.²⁴⁵

The coeducational school founded in 1877 in Calcutta for the education of young people brought under Methodist influence was divided in 1878 by removing the girls to the Calcutta Girls' School, organized earlier under other auspices and this year turned over to the Conference on condition that it be maintained as a nonsectarian school. By this division the former school became known as the Calcutta Boys' School. The year 1881 closed with fifteen boarders and forty day pupils. Both schools continued to prosper, the Boys' School in 1883 enrolling 168 pupils and the Girls' School, 195. In 1890 Emma L. Knowles was appointed principal of the Girls' School, and with an efficient corps of assistants made of it an exceptionally successful educational institution. In 1891 in the government examinations it passed more pupils than any other school in Bengal. An orphanage was established in connection with the Girls' School which in 1894 was reported to have received forty-five girls. The Boys' School, without missionary support, was hard to keep going. To prevent its closing it was necessary in 1888 to collect three hundred rupees a month by solicitation in the city, and in 1891 four hundred. However, local interest grew and enrollment increased until by the close of that year it had an enrollment of almost two hundred and was considered to be the leading boys' school in Bengal. The school had never had suitable accommodations but in January, 1894, it moved into a new building of its own, asserted to be the finest for school purposes in Bengal, with rooms for a hundred and fifty boarders and three hundred day pupils. Boys came to the school not only from Bengal but also "from the North-West provinces, Burma, Assam, and the Straits Settlements." By the middle of February, 1894, enrollment had grown to 475 pupils, classified as thirty-five Christians, ninety Mohammedans, and 350 Hindus. Seven languages were taught: English, Urdu, Bengali, Persian, Sanskrit, French, and Latin. Bible lessons were taught twice a week in each standard.²⁴⁶

The Dharamtala Bengali Society grew "out of the roots" of the Calcutta English church. The church building or "preaching hall"—as Taylor called it—was given to this Society in 1876. The first Class Leader was a convert of Thoburn's 1874 meetings. In 1881 the Society had about a hundred members and probationers, divided into five classes. They were more faithful in their attendance upon the fellowship meetings than were their English-speaking brethren. The defection of the Bengali pastor appointed at the November, 1881, Conference almost caused the disruption of the Society but the situation was saved by the appointment of James P. Meik to the charge. In 1885 Pakur, 170 miles north of Calcutta, was added to the Bengali mission. Schools for Bengali boys and girls were established and in 1887 were said to be well attended. The mission program was for a time retarded by what the Presiding Elder characterized as "ecclesiastical mania." Some of the leading Bengali Christians withdrew from the Methodist Church and other Churches and organized an independent church. Whether dissatisfaction with mission administration was a factor was not stated. Expansion of the mission, despite the hindering influence, continued. In 1889 there were eight outstations in villages and the membership had more than doubled. In 1893, when the Indian pastor was expelled from the ministry the Methodist Brotherhood* came to the rescue, carried on the work, and opened several new schools. The mission this year reported 136 full members and 262 probationers.²⁴⁷

At the November, 1884, Conference Bishop Hurst added to the Calcutta appointments a Hindustani Mission, to which he appointed F. J. Blewitt. He was obliged to begin "without any visible resources" and encountered many difficulties, but at the end of the year reported having baptized ten adults and gathered together more than thirty "neglected Christians" in church fellowship. While Calcutta was a Bengali city there were also thousands of Hindustani natives, and hope was high that among them a strong church might be built up. But the mission was of slow growth, although all of the usual methods of missionary effort—bazaar and street preaching, meetings for servants, and Class meetings—were faithfully used. The few members were earnest—more than half attending Class regularly—and generous in their support, not only paying their own pastor but also a second Indian preacher. In 1890 Mrs. Warne was placed in charge of the women's work and with her assistants maintained three schools and an extensive program of home visitation which was said to be of great help to the Bengali church. In December, 1894, the Society reported thirty-five full members and fifty-seven probationers.²⁴⁸

Darjeeling—"the Place of the Thunderbolt"—first appeared in the Minutes of the 1876 Conference "to be supplied." It was the summer capital of the Bengal Province, located some two hundred miles due north of Calcutta, in the foothills of the Himalayas at an altitude of 7,500 to 8,000 feet, a place of great natural beauty which afforded a perfect view of the vast mountain range, perhaps the most amazing vista of snow-clad peaks in the world. In 1877 David H. Lee was assigned to the station, and in 1878 reappointed.† He apparently organized a Methodist Society for at the close of the first year he reported nine members.

In 1881 William A. Thomas was assigned to Jamalpur Circuit. He was "a gentleman of independent means" and a consecrated Christian who had taken it upon himself to go "from one Railway station to another, . . . [to conduct] services in the waiting rooms." This year he was received on trial in the Conference. At the close of the year his Presiding Elder reported that he had been working diligently "laying the foundation of what . . . [was] hoped . . . [would] soon prove a strong Circuit." He had preached at various stations "on both the Loop and Chord [Railway] Lines."

* See pp. 587 f.

† Darjeeling does not again appear in Conference Minutes until 1895 when in the Woman's Conference it is listed as the location of a Girls' School—a boarding school opened in March, 1895, as a branch of the Calcutta Girls' School.

In 1882 Thomas' appointment was listed as the Chord Line Circuit, and Asansol was made the central point of the Circuit. The year before a Wesleyan missionary stationed at Raniganj, about to return to England, had told Thoburn of an interested group of railway employees at Asansol for whom he had held religious meetings. In March, 1883, Thoburn and Thomas—assisted by several laymen—held a series of meetings in a tent resulting in a score of conversions and the organization of a little church. In 1884 a church edifice was built. At Mohesmonda on the Chord Line he maintained "a native helper and a school for boys." In 1887 W. P. Byers was appointed to the charge.²⁴⁹

At Asansol in 1889 a mission house was built under Byers' leadership, although the English constituency was small. Regular services were held in 1892, with the aid of native helpers, in Hindustani and Bengali. A girls' school building was erected—the first for native girls in the region, the school conducted by Mrs. Byers. Under Byers' energetic leadership the mission continued to prosper, with work carried on in three vernaculars. The Society reported in 1894 fifty-seven full members and seventy-nine probationers.²⁵⁰

At Pakur during 1886 some twenty Mohammedan converts were baptized. "This," said Thoburn, "is the first and only instance in the whole course of our missionary work in India in which the Mohammedan lines have been broken at any one point." In 1887 there were sixteen conversions from Mohammedanism, and a Methodist Society of forty-five persons was organized. In 1887 a Pakur Circuit was attached to the Calcutta Bengali Mission and J. P. Meik and S. N. Das took up the work. In 1888 Mrs. Meik reported to the Woman's Conference that a Bengali girls' school had enrolled a hundred pupils of all castes, only ten or fifteen of whom were children of Christian parents. She felt strongly the need for a training school in which the more promising Christian girls might be prepared as teachers or zenana workers. For lack of such a school, girls had been sent by the mission to various other schools for advanced training—two to a Presbyterian school, two to the Church of England Boarding School, and several to other institutions.

In 1888 Meik established himself at Pakur, leaving the Bengali Circuit to Das. The Pakur compound, purchased this year by the Conference, consisted of about twenty acres, a goodly number of mango trees, and three buildings clear of debt. The Bengali boys' and girls' orphanages were removed from Calcutta to the new compound. Four day schools and eight Sunday schools were established. A Christian community of more than one hundred was developed, all of whom were Mohammedan converts. Warne pronounced Pakur the best center and the most promising missionary opportunity in the Calcutta District. By 1894 the Christian community had increased to 234.²⁵¹

MADRAS DISTRICT

The Madras District as first organized included a reasonably compact area in the eastern part of the India peninsula. Its three charges other than Madras were Bangalore, in Mysore; Bellary, approximately 305 miles northwest of Madras; and Hyderabad in the Mohammedan state of the same name (the Nizam's Dominions). By 1887 charges had increased in number to ten, of which four were Indian missions. A. W. Rudisill,* appointed Presiding Elder in 1884, after four years on the District declared that while the English churches were increasing in stability and strength, no more promising field for native work was to be found in India than the Madras District. Phenomenal growth of the Indian Sunday schools occurred in 1888, an increase from 763 to 5,486. In August, 1889, Rudisill—following the death of his wife and because of his own failing health—left for America and was succeeded by Albert H. Baker who continued until 1897. He gave capable and aggressive leadership to the work of the District for more than seven years but constantly felt handicapped by the lack of missionary reinforcements and funds for additional Indian helpers.²⁵²

The Madras Society, including the several appointments within the city and its environs, reported in 1876 the largest membership of any church in the Conference: three hundred full members and one hundred probationers. Three preachers were assigned to the charge, Hard (in addition to his responsibilities as Presiding Elder), F. G. Davis, and Benjamin Peters.† Eighteen fellowship bands and seventeen prayer groups met weekly. Seven Sunday services and three weeknight meetings were held, as well as eight Sunday schools with 410 pupils. The charge had three appointments: Blacktown (later known as Georgetown); Vepery; and Perambur and the South West Railway Line.‡

Blacktown was the business section of the city into which crowds of Europeans, Eurasians, and Indians poured daily. In 1882 the Presiding Elder described the Methodist Society as "united, earnest, and faithful in the work of the Master." An Indian day school and Sunday school had been

* Abraham W. Rudisill (1846-1922) was the son of a United Brethren minister whose ancestors from Alsace-Lorraine had settled in York County, Pa., in 1734. He graduated from Dickinson College in 1870 with honors in Hebrew and that year was admitted to the Baltimore Conference and appointed to Bentley Springs. In 1884, when Presiding Elder of the West Baltimore District, William Taylor persuaded him to transfer to the South India Conference. He quickly gained recognition as an outstanding missionary. He took with him to India a small printing press and in a room in the Vepery church parsonage he began to print tracts in the Tamil language. This was the beginning of the Madras Mission Press. He served as pastor of Vepery and then of the Tamil mission; and also as Presiding Elder of the Madras District from 1887 to 1890. In 1890 he was officially appointed agent of the press. Ill health necessitated his withdrawal in 1908.—Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions; Minutes, Baltimore Conference, 1923, pp. 374-75; Seventy-sixth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1894), pp. 284 f.

† Benjamin Peters, an Indian, admitted on trial in the Conference in 1876, first appointed to Madras and in 1880 to the Bangalore Tamil Mission, became one of the most successful missionary evangelists in the Conference. He had formerly been a lay preacher in the Church of England but under Taylor's preaching sought and found a distinct and abiding witness of the Spirit and united with the Methodist Church. In 1888, A. W. Rudisill said of him that few "if any, of the missionaries in . . . South India . . . can point to so many converts from pure heathenism."—Seventieth Ann. Rep., M. S. (1888), p. 254.

‡ The South West Railway Line points included Salem (207 miles south), Jalarpet, Arkonam, St. Thomas Mount, and Pallavaram.—J. J. Kingham, in Brenton T. Badley, Ed., Visions and Victories in Hindustan . . ., pp. 263 f.

organized. The church had been moved from the site selected by William Taylor to what was believed to be a preferable location but after six years (1887) this was considered to be unsatisfactory and another site, near the original one, was chosen. In 1886 the Society evidenced its missionary spirit by offering its church building to the Missionary Society for Indian work provided that the English congregation might use it for worship when it was not needed for native services. Nearly all the English members by 1889 had been pensioned and had moved away and in 1891, for lack of missionary personnel, no appointment was made to the station. In 1893, with twenty-four full members, Blacktown appeared in the Minutes combined with Vepery. The Indian Tamil work, however, was promising. In 1889 under J. H. Garden's ministry the Tamil day school had thirty-seven pupils, the Sunday school an enrollment of 191. Two Telugu Sunday schools were reported.²⁵³

Vepery also had difficulties. Charges were brought in 1881 against the pastor, I. F. Row, and he was brought to trial. The committee found him "not guilty," but the distracted condition brought about by the trial was doubtless one cause of loss of members. In 1882 T. H. Oakes was appointed pastor as successor to Row who had located to become the minister of a union church at Coonoor. Under Oakes' ministry peace was restored in the Vepery church and the native work was revived. English services were held in 1883 at five points and vernacular services at two preaching places. Six Sunday schools were maintained, four English and two Indian. The program continued to expand in scope, in 1884 two Indian Sunday schools being added, but Fox as Presiding Elder felt that the spiritual interests of the churches were "not developing; and . . . [had] not been for some time past." A. W. Rudisill, Presiding Elder, had a more hopeful outlook. On July 25, 1887, eight adult Tamil converts were received into full membership, including two family groups. He felt the Spirit of God was moving in the hearts of the people.²⁵⁴

The Vepery Circuit by 1889 had developed to the point where it had seven English preaching services: three at Vepery, two at Otary, one at Pudupet, and one at Pursawalkum. Five Tamil Sunday schools enrolled 627 boys and girls. An active program was maintained for sailors who visited the port. In 1889 Garden also undertook Telugu projects in Pudupet and Royapuram which eventually developed into large churches. In 1890 Garden was appointed to "Madras, Press and Telugu Mission." In 1892 a "Tamil and Telugu" Circuit had fifty-four members. The Presiding Elder reported in 1895 that the English church had a fair attendance at its Sunday services, well-attended prayer meetings, a prosperous Sunday school, and an active Epworth League, and that all he said of it was true also of the Tamil Society.²⁵⁵ In the Blacktown and Vepery churches the missionaries' wives were doing for women the counterpart of their husbands' work.

In 1876 Bangalore reported a membership of ninety-eight persons, of whom thirty-two were probationers. The next year two appointments were made: W. E. Newlon to St. John's Hill and J. E. Robinson to Richmond Town where a church had also been erected. In 1879 St. John's Hill had become Memorial Church, and a Tamil Circuit had been formed. At the December, 1880, Conference, the Bangalore Tamil church reported three full members and nine probationers. In December, 1882, a Circuit for the Kanarese-speaking people in the Bangalore area was added with Simon P. Jacobs* in charge. He began work in the city, preaching to the people in their own tongue "almost daily on the streets." He also personally visited educated natives, published many thousands of pages of tracts in English and Kanarese, wrote a book on the Holy Spirit, and issued a monthly paper, the Herald, of which over 14,000 copies were distributed.

Memorial Church had come upon evil days. D. O. Fox, as Presiding Elder, reported that it had been "a barren field for three years past." G. H. Greenig was appointed pastor, but at the next conference (1883) he withdrew under charges. The Presiding Elder stated that St. John's Hill (Memorial Church) had had "a year of severe trial" and that Richmond Town had "suffered with it." While he was hopeful concerning the future, conditions continued to be difficult, particularly on account of a constantly fluctuating membership. Out of thirty-eight members in 1881 only four remained in residence in 1887. Yet the pastor refused to be discouraged. At the year's end membership had again increased, finances had improved, congregations had become larger and the Sunday school more prosperous than for several years past. When in 1889 A. H. Baker took up native work he prosecuted it with characteristic enthusiasm and soon a noteworthy Kanarese program was under way in the Bangalore area, participated in by Mrs. Baker and Mrs. Buttrick. Two Kanarese Circuits were listed in 1893.²⁵⁶ Among the villages included was Yellahunka, for which hope was long held out until in 1892 the Presiding Elder surmised that mistakes must have been made there. J. E. Robinson felt that schools for boys and girls were urgently needed in Bangalore. During his pastorate a school was begun (1878) in the home of the Oldhams with Mrs. Oldham as teacher. It soon became too large for the home and was moved to the Richmond Town church. In 1880 it had an enrollment of eighty-one, with six teachers. This year it was recognized as a "Conference school" and I. A. Richards was appointed principal, serving for three years. In 1883 a boys' and a girls' school were organized. They were named the Baldwin High Schools in recognition of the contribution of $3,000. made by John Baldwin of Berea, Ohio, for buildings. In 1888 William L. King, who had been chosen as principal, arrived in Bangalore and took over the administration of the schools.²⁵⁷

* Jacobs had come to India in 1880, a man in his forties, and had at once given himself to the study of the language. While at Dharamtala Church, Calcutta, in 1881 and the Kolar Mission in 1882, he had so mastered the Kanarese vernacular that he was able to preach in it with ease.

Reduction in the missionary appropriation during the early nineties was severely felt in South India. In Bangalore, for example, it became necessary to close all the day schools. The Sunday schools also suffered from loss of financial support. Baker, at St. John's Hill, in 1892 wrote to the Missionary Society: "Two years ago we had 18 Sunday schools and as many catechumenical schools, with an enrollment in the former of 2,500 and of about 1,500 in the latter. To-day we have in our Sunday schools about 950, and in the catechumenical about 700 pupils." This "seed ground," he continued, has been lost "not by heathen opposition . . . but by . . . lack of means with which to support laborers."²⁵⁸

Late in 1875 J. E. Robinson in company with Clark P. Hard visited Bellary, an important railway junction in the Madras presidency, 305 miles from Madras, on a preaching mission. In the course of three weeks between fifty and sixty persons professed conversion. A Society was formed and Jeffries was shifted from Bangalore to become pastor of the English congregation. At the 1876 Conference Bellary was left to be supplied. In December shortly after adjournment of the Conference, Charles B. Ward, a probationer of the Central Illinois Conference, sent out by Taylor, arrived in India and was given the appointment. In 1877 his charge included both Bellary and the North West Line which ran northwest to Sholapur, Hyderabad state, and southeast to Arkonam, Madras. Along the thousand miles of railway there were about five hundred English and Eurasian railway employees. Within a year Ward had held one hundred and fifty meetings and made a thousand pastoral calls, talking and praying with the families and single men. His preaching services, attended by four or five to twenty-five persons, he described as "rather plain Bible talks." The Bellary Circuit after 1880 when Ward turned from English work was regularly supplied with pastors, but as Fox, the Presiding Elder, reported in 1882, "yielded but little fruit." The congregations on the railway line were all small, the membership still smaller and constantly changing. No Indian work was attempted at any of the stations until 1886. Then a day school was established at Bellary and a schoolhouse was built in a nearby village. However, the next year it was decided not to extend the work since the surrounding region was fully occupied by the London Mission. In 1889 the Conference authorized the sale of the Telugu school property. In 1890 the Wesleyans appointed a man to Bellary and some question was raised whether the American Methodist mission was any longer needed. Late in the year Joshua Parker, a Local Preacher who had supplied the charge for a time, resigned a government appointment that he might give himself wholly to pastoral work. At the final Quarterly Conference of the year the vote against selling the property was unanimous. In 1895 Parker, who was still in charge, reported only seven full members, but the church had sufficient strength to be wholly self-supporting. No native evangelism was attempted at any time.²⁵⁹

Hyderabad, capital of the largest and most influential native state, was the fourth largest city of India. The city proper, on the south bank of the river Musi, was surrounded by a stone wall six miles in circumference, and for years was barred against Christianity. In a more general sense the name Hyderabad was used to designate the larger area which included Chadarghat, site of the civil offices, and the homes of most of the civil population. Secunderabad, including a garrison which was one of the principal military stations in India, might be said to have been a suburb of Hyderabad. It was six miles northeast of the city and had a population of approximately 60,000.

At Secunderabad in 1873, as has been noted earlier, one of Taylor's converts, Walter Winckler, had laid the foundation of a society and James Shaw in 1874 had built upon it. Late in this same year it had become the head of a Circuit of four appointments, including Trimulgherry, the artillery cantonment, Chadarghat, and Bolarum. Secunderabad was J. E. Robinson's first appointment. He arrived on December 24, 1874, and was much impressed by the results of the work of his predecessors:

scores of truly converted souls, representing a fine type of live, earnest . . . Methodists, more closely akin to what I had read about old-fashioned spiritual Methodism than I have ever met anywhere, either in America or India.²⁰⁰

At the 1876 Conference Secunderabad and Hyderabad (meaning Chadarghat) were listed together as the fourth charge of the Madras District and to it Robinson and W. F. G. Curties were appointed. But the next year they were both sent elsewhere and Gladwin was set down at Secunderabad. After two years he was succeeded by F. G. Davis who served for three years. The congregations now were small and the members few but in the third year of Davis' pastorate a church was built and paid for. Bolarum, a small community of army officers and government officials, offered little opportunity. In 1887, Secunderabad, although it reported only thirty-six full members, was pronounced one of the most promising English-speaking charges in the region. In 1891, in addition to the regular weekly services, evangelistic meetings were held in neglected neighborhoods. From 1880 on, for a number of years, Telugu work was cared for by C. B. Ward.* After his departure from the city, the mission once again took over the task when in 1889 Curties was approached by some Telugu people and asked to open a Sunday school. Being able to raise funds through a canvass of the station made by the English Sunday school, he inaugurated a new mission. It was slow-moving, however; only one helper could be hired. A. E. Cook in 1893 was appointed to the city but he was new to the language and had to devote his time to studying it. The best he could do was conduct a Sunday school and carry on bazaar preaching and visiting the next year. No surplus of funds was available for help. The Presiding Elder reported in 1895 that every department of church work had been continuously maintained—hardly an inspired report.

Chadarghat as early as 1876 had reported a church worth 8,000 rupees. Beginning in 1877, it was a separate station. From 1881 the work was prosecuted year after year with increasing vigor. That year R. E. Carter was appointed to the mission and in 1883 many were converted and the church was much strengthened. In the following years there were many removals but in 1887 despite decreased membership a hopeful outlook was reported. In 1890 the prayer meetings and the Class were well attended, and the membership reached the highest point in the church's life. At the 1895 Conference fifty-five full members and thirty-two probationers were on the English rolls.

It was found that although great numbers of the lower classes in and around Hyderabad could speak and understand Hindustani, in which the missionaries were trained, these people preferred to use the Telugu tongue. An Indian assistant, Brother Paul, initiated the program by establishing two day schools, one in the city, one in Tandur. Two years later three regular preaching places and several Sunday and day schools were reported, which received their support in part from the English congregation and Sunday school. So successful was the work under J. H. Garden that it reached Circuit status sweeping widely over the countryside as far as Tandur and Vikarabad, and soon had to be divided into two.²⁶¹

By 1885 the Chadarghat program had expanded to such an extent that it was thought advisable to appoint a missionary who would devote himself entirely to establishing a mission within the walls of Hyderabad. Because of his ability and experience S. P. Jacobs was chosen. The most dependable account of developments is to be found in the mission's report to the Missionary Society:

This [Hindustani] Mission was opened in March, 1886. . . . It soon became evident that the work of opening a mission here lay along the line of school-work among the Maratha Brahmins. Accordingly, an Anglo-Marathi School was opened in the British Residency bazar. . . .

Soon after opening the above school, from the large Maratha community in the distant part of the city of Hyderabad came an invitation to open a similar school there.

At this time Sir Salar Jung was prime minister to his highness, the Nizam. He made a donation from his own purse, and also subscribed a liberal sum on behalf of the Nizam's Government. . . . 'in aid of the Methodist Mission Anglo-Vernacular schools in the city of Hyderabad, started by the Rev. S. P. Jacobs, Superintendent.'
. . . Thus was solved at once the difficult problem how to get into the city of Hyderabad, hitherto barred against Christianity.

The school in the British Residency bazaar had in 1887 seventy-five pupils with five teachers: two teaching Marathi and English; one Marathi; one Gujarati; and one Urdu. The school in Hyderabad city opened in January,

1887, with twenty-two boys. Later in the year enrollment increased to ninety-three. Christian teachers were not permitted but Jacobs as founder of the school was allowed to give Bible lessons. At the 1888 Conference James Lyon who succeeded Jacobs hoped that the city school might eventually be made an effective means of evangelism since both Brahmins and Mohammedans were sufficiently appreciative of the institution to send their boys and to contribute liberally to its support. Results, however, were disappointing. Extreme difficulty was experienced in getting properly equipped teachers, and little worth while was accomplished.²⁶²

The wives, as at every appointment, devoted themselves to working with Indian women in a general way, and in 1890 W.F.M.S. work was opened.

Out of Ward's* work at Bellary came the inspiration to launch a Faith Mission directly among Telugu people, thus to reach an entirely untouched field, a considerable part of Hyderabad state. Ward had come to Bellary during the great famine of 1876-78 and while ministering to the English-speaking congregations began to pick up Telugu and Kanarese orphans whose parents had starved. With the help of A. C. Davis, a Eurasian government engineer, he established a temporary orphanage at Gulbarga, Hyderabad, three hundred miles north of his appointment, from which after a year he moved by stages to Pramoor, seventy-five miles north of Secunderabad, close to the Godavari River. At the January, 1880, Conference he asked the Presiding Elders "to release him from English work . . . and allow him to . . . found a Telugu Mission" among Telugu Hindus where "no missionary had ever appeared." The appointment was made as he requested. Ward and his orphans trekked two hundred miles to their destination in the wilderness.²⁶³ When the orphanage was well established a department was added for Eurasian children, called the "Christian Home." †

The Telugu Mission focused on conversion of the Indian population on a self-support basis. In 1882 it suffered severe privation from lack of funds but the year closed with all expenses paid. In order to meet his expenses and also to train his orphans Ward took a government contract to construct a road. William Arnold Moore, a probationer in the Conference who had served the Bellary and Railway Circuit for two years, was appointed in December, 1882, to the Telugu Circuit and was given supervision of the orphanage. This

* Charles B. Ward (1853-1908), born in Kendall County, Ill., was converted at sixteen, and after a brief period of schoolteaching entered the academy of Northwestern University at Evanston. Finding that he had had some experience in city mission work William Taylor persuaded him to give up his ambition for further education and go to India. On April 1, 1878, he married Ellen M. Welch, who had come from Chicago to join him in missionary service. He published a paper, the India Methodist Watchman. From 1884 he was located, resuming the effective relationship in 1892. He kept up a voluminous correspondence for many years by which he met in large part the cost of his numerous undertakings.—J. H. Garden in B. T. Badley, Ed., op. cit., pp. 609 ff.; Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions.

† In 1881 there were in the orphanage twenty-seven native orphan boys; thirty-three native orphan girls; in the Christian Home, six Eurasian boys and two Eurasian girls; total orphans, sixty-eight. Receipts from voluntary contributions for the year were: Christian Orphanage, Rs. 4,395; balance in hand, Oct. 31, 1881, Rs. 200.—Minutes, South India Conference, 1881, p. 19.

left Ward free to expand his mission program. With thirteen workers,* including seven orphan children, he began Telugu work, chiefly street preaching in Secunderabad. In August, 1883, with the cooperation of Robert E. Carter, he rented the Theatre Royale in Chadarghat for meetings on two days of the week, which awakened a deep interest among both the Indians and the English.

The mission staff was reinforced in 1882 by the addition of D. O. Ernsberger from America and F. J. Blewitt, a recruit from India. Although beset by numerous difficulties Ward succeeded in maintaining what he called his "Bazar force" in Secunderabad. By February, 1884, the "force" had grown to "twenty-three male and female workers." In October, 1884, D. O. Fox, the Presiding Elder, organized at Secunderabad a Telugu Methodist Society. The Blewitts this month decided to engage in work elsewhere. At the November, 1884, Conference both Ward and Moore were located † at their own request.

In April, 1886, Ward embarked on an ambitious project of railway construction a hundred and fifty miles east of Secunderabad on which he hoped to realize 40,000 rupees which he would be free to use for support of his Telugu mission program. It proved to be a project in which he suffered heavy financial loss.

In April, 1888, Ward transferred his working force of about "fifty souls, of all ages" to Yellandu, in the northeastern corner of Hyderabad state, south of the Godavari River. Here he purchased the lease of a village, with two thousand acres of forest and grazing land, at an annual rental of Rs. 800. In October, 1890, he "evacuated" Secunderabad and occupied Yellandu with all his "force."

* From time to time lay missionaries were added to Ward's group of workers. On June 14, 1880, Cecelia O'Leary of Hyderabad, a Eurasian, joined the mission. (M. March 15, 1883, W. A. Moore. She died on Dec. 8, 1883.) On June 6, 1882, Ruth C. Freer, a Eurasian, began work in the orphanage. (M. June 1, 1883, F. J. Blewitt.) In April, 1883, Hephya Freer, a sister of Ruth Freer, cast in her lot with Ward's mission. (D. Dec. 12, 1883.) Hester A. Hillis who earlier had been in the employ of the A.B.F.M. in Ceylon, sent out by William Taylor, arrived at the mission on Dec. 25, 1884. (D. on Aug. 15, 1887.) Jennie R. James, also sent out by Taylor, accompanied Miss Hillis. M. F. Smootz, an American layman, arrived on Jan. 27, 1885. Miss H. M. Bell, who reached India on Aug. 8, 1885, after taking a course in Hyderabad Medical College, became physician and missionary teacher at Yellandu. R. H. Madden, a carpenter and Local Preacher, was sent out by Richard Grant of Taylor's Transit Fund. He arrived in 1890.

† Ward's action in locating was taken as a protest against what seemed to him disproportionate emphasis on the English work, and also against the departure from Taylor's program of self-support. He proposed to continue as a Local Preacher, "in full and loyal connection with the Church; but not under its Annual Conference." about twenty in attendance and a Telugu school. Preaching services were regularly held both in English and Telugu in Ward's home, also in Telugu in the village.

On November 18, 1890, G. K. Gilder reorganized the Quarterly Conference with thirteen present. The Yellandu mission first appeared in the Minutes of the Conference in 1891, supplied by C. B. Ward. At the December, 1892, Conference Ward was readmitted and regularly appointed to Yellandu. In 1893 the Yellandu mission* reported a Christian village, an orphanage, an industrial workshop, and a church with a membership of a hundred native Christians, "out of whose tithes . . . [were] supported three evangelists."²⁶⁴

In November, 1883, D. O. Ernsberger† was assigned to the Kanarese field—a huge area generally meaning the Hyderabad, Bidar, and Raichur Provinces. He had come to India, following an appeal from Taylor, for this purpose, and had up to this time been studying the language, using as teachers some of the orphans at Pramoor. Lingsugur, in southwestern Hyderabad—"fifty miles from the Railway and from civilization"—was his first appointment. A month later, S. P. Jacobs was transferred from his Kanarese Circuit in Bangalore to join him. After one year in this isolated town both men were ready to remove to work elsewhere. Lingsugur was too remote for a young wife—Ernsberger earlier had married Dema Stone (sent out by Taylor)—and the following year they established themselves at Raichur, located at a major railway junction, and having a population of over 35,000. Although one of the hottest places in India it was a natural center for access to some two millions of people. Jacobs accepted an appointment to Gulbarga, the seat of government of these three great Kanarese provinces, where he initiated a mission and made excursions into the surrounding field. In 1886 he was called to Hyderabad, as noted elsewhere, and the entire area was left to Ernsberger. From this time on, Ernsberger gave himself with such concentration and devotion to the Kanarese-speaking people that the missionaries eventually came to feel he had gained for himself a proprietary interest in the mission. He made Gulbarga his headquarters, remaining there through this period except for a necessary furlough following the death of his wife in 1888.

Gulbarga alone embraced an immense area, a "circuit of 12,000 square miles." The Presiding Elder estimated that if Ernsberger were to preach in three villages a day, traveling every day in the year, it would take more than three years and seven months for him to complete the round of more than four thousand villages and towns. Raichur and Tandur, both nearby, were included on his schedule part of the time. Day schools and Sunday schools were established in the city of Gulbarga, street preaching maintained, and in 1892 a book depot and reading room opened. Also, this year the second Mrs. Ernsberger was in charge of women's work and opened a girls' school. The next year the W.F.M.S. reported a day school in Shorapur. In 1894 baptisms numbered sixteen; in 1895, fifty.²⁶⁵

† D. O. Ernsberger (1851-1926) was born in Perry County, Ohio. After one or two years in Ohio Wesleyan University, he became a schoolteacher. In 1882 he heard the call of William Taylor, was received on trial in the North Indiana Conference, and transferred at once to the South India Conference. (Minutes, South India Conference, 1882, p. 6.) His first wife died during the early Gulbarga days. In 1891 he married Mary A. Hughes, who died in 1899. Four years later he married Margaret Carver, who survived him. In the Gulbarga-Raichur region from 1885 to 1905 and later for twelve years in Belgaum he did work so outstanding that it won for him the high esteem of all who knew him. He retired an invalid in 1922 and four years afterwards died in California.—Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions.

Another mission to the Kanarese was begun about 1888 on the outskirts of the field. This was at Kopbal, to the west of Bellary, in the Jaghir territory. It was made an independent Circuit, embracing three hundred villages, but reported no success by way of conversions in the following year. The missionary's wife visited zenanas regularly and supervised a day school. In 1893 the Circuit included four stations. In addition to open-air services four Class meetings, four prayer meetings, and six day and seven Sunday schools were maintained. Only two baptisms were reported.

In September, 1890, J. E. Robinson and A. H. Baker took over for the Methodist Church the Kolar Mission, also a Kanarese project, about forty miles from Bangalore in the Mysore region, which had been founded in February, 1877, by a Scotchwoman, Miss L. H. Anstey. During the great famine, when people were dying by thousands from starvation, Miss Anstey withdrew from the London Mission, with which she had been associated, and established an independent mission of her own, with two large orphanages as a chief feature. Into this she gathered in the course of time some eleven hundred children of whom about three hundred survived. She enlisted the cooperation of Methodist missionaries in caring for the religious interests of the children, M. B. Kirk in 1881 and in 1882 S. P. Jacobs. When taken over by the South India Conference the mission included a Christian community of about five hundred people and property worth Rs. 30,000. In a day school in connection with the orphanage carpentry training was provided along with other instruction. In 1892 fifteen boys were in training as carpenters and large orders for furniture were received and filled. A Methodist Society was formed, which in 1893 reported ninety-four full members and twenty-nine probationers. Four young men of the mission were received on trial in the Conference. Twenty of the members were instrumental in forming churches at Rollingspur, Mulbagal, and Betmangala. Three Christian villages—Elim, Bethany, and Nazareth—were established, populated by men and women who formerly had been famine orphans rescued by the mission. Kolar Mission also carried on extensive visiting* in some seventeen non-Christian villages. Beginnings were made in Mulbagal, Srenavasapur, and Hosur for establishing Societies. Under W. H. Hollister, appointed in 1892, the industrial program

* Active in this work in 1893-95 were Mrs. Ira A. Richards, wife of the missionary in charge, and Florence W. Maskell, a Eurasian woman of great ability, who in 1893 became a deaconess and in 1898 a missionary of the W.F.M.S. In 1895 Miss Chatterton was an assistant in education. Following Hollister's appointment in 1892 Mrs. Hollister was appointed to the orphanage and woman's work.

—which provided some self-support—was expanded to include these Christian villages and Rollingspur. Farming operations were conducted in all centers, and in both Kolar and Bowringpet, industrial schools trained boys for a livelihood in tailoring, blacksmithery, masonry along with other skills.²⁶⁶

HYDERABAD DISTRICT, 1891-95

At the January, 1891, South India Conference the Madras District was divided and the Hyderabad District formed.* Gilder was made Presiding Elder of the new District. With the exception of Bellary all of its appointments (1891) were within Hyderabad state. At the 1892 session, as a result of Ward's opening up of Bastar, the District was "materially enlarged by the addition of the State of Bastar, and a small slip of the Central Provinces lying north of the Godavery [River] and immediately between the Nizam's Dominions and Bastar territory." With this addition the District included approximately 80,000 square miles, "with a population of 6,000,000 souls, untouched by any other Christian Mission." The wide expanse,† the pioneer character of the work, "the tangle of languages," the meager financial support, and the paucity of both foreign and indigenous workers, all taken together, made it one of the most difficult missionary fields in India.

Gangawaram (Vikarabad), where work had been begun in 1890, was made a Circuit in 1892. J. H. Garden wrote, "Nine months ago the Hyderabad Telugu work was divided, and I was sent to Gangawaram as the center of a new circuit . . ." Gangawaram was on the Nizam's State Railway, forty-five miles distant from Hyderabad. A mission site was procured and enclosed, a well sunk, and a temporary hut erected for shelter. Within a year a number of inquirers were baptized. Baptisms were few but Garden asserted that on one of the Circuit points "the work was spreading and touching the higher castes," and he had baptized "six potters, one shepherd, and a police patel." In 1893 Mrs. Garden was appointed to women's work. A mission house begun the same year was completed the next year. The unfortunate experience of some other Circuits in earlier years with weak and unfaithful workers "picked up from other missions" was repeated here in 1895. The year closed with only nine full members and forty-five probationers.²⁶⁷

Jagdapur, the capital of Bastar state, was visited by C. B. Ward in March, 1892, in the course of an exploratory trip. He had come into contact with the Koiwar (Muria and Maria) tribes in the Nizam's Dominions and wished to see them in their own country and explore the possibilities of missionary work among them. He spent four days in Jagdalpur, a town of some seven thousand people, and was so favorably impressed that he asked permission of the Gilder, Presiding Elder: "The district is one of big distances—Kopbal, for instance, at the extreme southwestern end is 345 miles by rail from Hyderabad; Jagdalpur, at the northeastern extremity is 478 miles; of this 162 miles only can be traveled by railway, the remaining distance must be done either on horseback or in a bullock cart."—In *Seventy-sixth Ann. British commissioner "to open five mission stations in Bastar and [lease land] . . . in each station." The commissioner immediately replied with assurance that sites for buildings and also "waste" villages would be made available. He also gave him a letter to an official in Sironcha who later helped him to acquire land there. At the December, 1892, Conference Jagdalpur was listed as an appointment supplied by W. H. L. Batstone, M.D., a Local Preacher. Not being acquainted with any of the local dialects Batstone's evangelistic efforts were confined principally to the few English-speaking people. He set up a "little mud and grass dispensary" where in five months he had eight inpatients, and 1,992 outpatients—some of whom came as far as sixty miles for medicine. In 1893 the erection of a hospital on a commanding site was begun.

Work was also begun in 1893 in Sironcha, on the north bank of the Godavari River, in British territory. There were two language groups, the Telugu westward from Sironcha as far as Nandar, the Pranhita valley, and all of south Bastar; and the Hindi in north Bastar. M. Narasiah, admitted this year to the Conference on trial, held meetings in thirty-two villages. Gilder believed that the area offered unusually attractive possibilities for fruitful Christian work if missionaries could be found to occupy the field, but not even one was available. In 1895 Gilder wrote: "The work here is distinctively pioneer, and far too feebly manned."²⁶⁸

Shorapur was first included in the appointments at the January, 1895, Conference with Ellis Roberts, newly arrived from the Rock River Conference, and Manappa Desai as his Indian associate. Shorapur was a small town of less than ten thousand population, located north of Raichur in the Kanarese language area. The inhabitants were of aboriginal descent, "formerly . . . a terror to the country as freebooters," who had settled down and become farmers. Several were baptized during the year.²⁶⁹

Bidar, previously an outpost among the Telugu people on the Vikarabad Circuit, was made a separate appointment at the same session, with David Marian as pastor. In December he was discontinued as a probationer in the Conference and Albert E. Cook, a missionary, was appointed in his place. At the end of 1895 Bidar reported two full members and twenty-one probationers.

ALLAHABAD DISTRICT, 1880-87

The Allahabad District was organized at the January, 1880, Conference with seven charges,* its nucleus made up of four charges from the Calcutta District and one from Bombay. At this time it embraced a roughly triangular area in the northern part of central India. At the February, 1887, Conference Allahabad District was replaced by Mussooree, and three charges were added. When the Bengal Conference was organized in January, 1888, the Mussooree District was included. In 1893 at the organization of the Northwest India Conference the Mussooree District, with some changes, was made a part of it and a new Allahabad District was constituted.

The Allahabad District may almost be said to have been created and sustained by Dennis Osborne. Appointed Presiding Elder in January, 1880, he remained as the administrative head under its various designations until 1897 when W. Rockwell Clancy was named in his place.

Allahabad, capital of the Northwest Provinces, was considered—as the seat of government with a rapidly growing European and Eurasian population—to be the most important city in North India. In 1871 Dennis Osborne and another layman, discovering there “two or three persons who had been converted in Lucknow, . . . joined with them in holding prayer meetings in private houses.” Within a few weeks “nearly thirty persons were organized into an informal band of praying Christians, with weekly meetings.” As there were already a Presbyterian and a Baptist church in the city it was thought best not to organize another, in the hope that the work might go forward with the help of the local churches. Within a few months, however, the band had scattered and all but a very few had lost their former zeal. The next year Osborne again visited Allahabad. Under his preaching about twenty persons professed conversion and these were organized into a Methodist Society. The prospect of growth was such that Osborne felt led to give up secular employment and devote his entire time to the work of the ministry. At the close of the year the Society reported thirty-three full members, forty-one probationers, and five Sunday schools.²⁷⁰

Allahabad—since 1876 in the South India Conference—continued under the pastoral care of Osborne until 1880. At the December, 1880, session W. F. G. Curties was appointed pastor of the English church and Osborne—in addition to the District—was given charge of the Hindustani Circuit, which first appeared this year. English work at Fatehpur had been begun in 1874 and was for a time included in the Allahabad Circuit. During the period 1882-87 the Allahabad English church* was served by three different missionaries. The church scarcely held its own. In a revival in 1888 sixty-five persons were converted and seventy-five new members were added. Although the church could report only forty-two full members at the 1895 Conference it was maintaining an extensive, diversified program of Christian service.

In 1878 local arrangements were made for opening a girls' school in Allahabad at the beginning of the next year. In 1880 Mattie B. Spence, sent to India by the Northwestern Branch, was assigned to the school. At her arrival it had an enrollment of eighty-one pupils. Beginning the next year

* The Allahabad English Circuit was transferred in 1888 to the Bengal Conference and in the same year the Hindustani Circuit was transferred to North India. In 1891 the English church was also transferred to North India and again combined with the Hindustani Circuit. When the new Allahabad District was formed in 1893 in the Northwest India Conference Allahabad was included in it.

it was known as the Cannington Girls' School. After a year's schoolwork Miss Spence was married. Great difficulty was had in finding capable teachers and after a long struggle the school was closed in 1885.

Osborne was aided in his Hindustani Circuit work in 1880 by two Local Preachers who regularly engaged in Hindustani preaching in bazaars, at fairs, and on the streets. The Circuit was not listed as a separate appointment for three years (1881-83) but it appeared again in 1884 with C. H. Plomer as pastor. In January, 1886, there were three principal centers of Hindustani work, each reporting encouraging interest and attendance. Gains in membership, however, were negligible. William Rockwell Clancy, appointed to the station in 1892, reported the next year missionary work under way in four villages and several mohallas, including six day schools and eight Sunday schools. The activity in 1893 was mostly among villages within fifteen miles of Allahabad. Preaching services were held in four centers. A boarding school for native Christian boys was opened in Allahabad with a dormitory in the church compound and within the first year as many boarders as could be accommodated were admitted. Four day schools for girls were maintained with two assistants from the Society of Friends, Miss Barber and Miss Thomas. By 1896 the program had increased until five Circuits, each with sub-Circuits, had been established in an area 125 miles long and about half that width. Mrs. Clancy, in charge of women's work, was the equal of her husband for accomplishing results. At the end of 1895 she could report eight paid Bible women at work, besides a preacher's wife and her own assistant. She also conducted a widows' and orphans' home, and was striving toward founding a girls' boarding school and a deaconess home as soon as all the funds were raised.²⁷¹

Jabalpur* in 1873 was a central point on Albert Norton's railway Circuit. For some time he preached there regularly on Wednesday and Thursday of each week. It first appeared in the records of the India Conference in 1874 when at the Conference in January G. K. Gilder was appointed. By April a small congregation had been assembled, classes formed, and a Sunday school organized, although this was Gilder's first assignment, and he had difficulty in getting living quarters and a preaching place. During the early years the Society experienced trying times. After twelve years the church received a gift of a desirable building site. In May, 1886, the cornerstone was laid and in October, 1887, a building was completed. The Society reported for 1887 thirty-four full members, fourteen less than in 1876. Some years later the Indian work, including extensive women's work, developed rapidly. In 1893 a girls' boarding school was established, and in response to the appeal of the missionary's wife the W.F.M.S. sent Miss Anna Elicker. She found fifty

* At the November, 1884, Conference Jabalpur, together with Harda and Khandwa, Mhow, and Ajmer, was transferred to the new Central India District, and Karachi to the Bombay District. When in 1888 the Bengal Conference was organized an Ajmer District was formed and Ajmer, Jabalpur, Khandwa, Burhanpur, and Mhow were included in it.

girls crowded together in a schoolroom where there was space for only thirty. Some were unclothed and terribly undernourished and the burden of teaching and caring for them was so heavy that very soon Miss Elicker was compelled to go to a sanitarium for recuperation. The school gradually grew, chiefly by addition from Christian families, until in 1897 in its new home two miles out of Jabalpur, it numbered sixty-five girls. Later it was named the Johnson Girls' School.²⁷²

The first stirring among the dry bones of Khandwa, a railway junction, occurred, it may be assumed, under Albert Norton's preaching in 1873-74. In 1875 Taylor, in a brief reference, said: "Khandwa . . . under Brother Metta, gives promise of success." Khandwa is found in the Conference Minutes for the first time in December, 1880, linked with Mhow. In 1881 it had its own church, its own pastor, J. D. Webb—a Local Preacher—and sufficient resources for support. The entire cost of the church was borne by W. H. Howe, a zealous layman, who was in the employ of the railway. Another Khandwa layman, Albert T. Leonard, in 1883 was admitted on trial to Conference. Harda, sixty miles from Khandwa, which since 1880 had been a separate Circuit but with little to report in results accomplished, in 1883 was linked with Khandwa, but the plan seemed impracticable and a supply pastor was sought for Khandwa. This arrangement failing, in 1884 the two charges were again united. In Harda vernacular preaching was attempted in the bazaars and villages. When at the 1884 Conference C. P. Hard became Presiding Elder of the newly formed Central India District he took upon himself the task of also serving as pastor of Khandwa and Harda. The Khandwa membership was increased during the year from two to seventeen. In February, 1886, Webb was placed in charge of what was designated the Khandwa Mission, with three men and four women as assistants, the result of a revival at Mhow. A small girls' orphanage had been established the preceding June and the W.F.M.S. was aiding in maintaining it. The mission program included daily preaching in the city, preaching tours in the District, distribution of tracts and Scripture portions, hospital visitations, zenana work, and day school and Sunday-school teaching. At the January, 1889, Bengal Conference T. E. F. Morton was appointed to the Khandwa and Harda Circuit which covered a distance of 120 miles in a region where, he said, "English, Urdu, Hindi, Marathi, Guzerati, and a little of Tamil and Telugu" were spoken.

In 1890 the two charges were again separated and two Circuits formed, Khandwa and Burhanpur, under the leadership of A. S. E. Vardon—beginning a Khandwa pastorate which continued until his death almost nine years later—and Harda and Gadarwara with Morton and Jacob Samuel in charge. Three hundred baptisms were performed at Khandwa in 1892. This year a girls' boarding school was opened under W.F.M.S. auspices. In 1894 Khandwa reported eighty-six full members and 324 probationers; Harda, seventeen full members and seven probationers. A program for girls and women was engaged in on a small scale in 1894 by Mrs. Morton with the small allowance made by the W.F.M.S. Among the English members she organized a W.C.T.U. and a Loyal Temperance Legion and Junior Epworth League.²⁷³

Agra* also was the outgrowth of Osborne's evangelistic efforts. He first visited the city in July, 1874, and held two weeks of special services in a private home. "Many, perhaps no less than fifty, were . . . brought to the Lord, and a Church was organized with a membership of about 40 . . ." Two years later C. W. Christian was appointed pastor. He continued in charge for two years. Changes in conditions resulted in such deterioration that in 1881 the Presiding Elder characterized the field as "narrow and scattered, sparse patches of verdure in a sea of sterility." One of the greatest needs was a church building, as the rent disbursed would have gone a long way toward paying for a suitable edifice. In 1886 building was begun, discontinued in 1887, and finally a new church built in 1888 under the leadership of W. Rockwell Clancy, appointed to the charge in March, 1887. Up to that time no aggressive Hindustani work had been done in Agra. Bazaar preaching and mohalla visiting were begun and met with encouragement, resulting in a number of baptisms. Communion services were interracial. The missionary program expanded rapidly and in 1889 work was maintained in sixteen villages besides eleven mohallas. Agra in 1891 was organized with three Quarterly Conferences, two in the city of Agra—one English and one Hindustani—and the third in the villages around Jalesar. A government medical school was attended by some thirty Methodist students, of whom nineteen were young women who lived in the W.F.M.S. Home for Medical Students, built in 1889.²⁷⁴

J. E. Scott, first Presiding Elder for the Agra District in the newly formed Northwest Conference, wrote enthusiastically:

There are two strong Epworth Leagues organized in connection with this church,—one in English, the other in Hindustani. Both these are doing a good work, and their exercises are exceedingly interesting and profitable. They teach our young people self-control and how to lead and take part in meetings and deliberative assemblies, and their direct evangelistic usefulness is invaluable.²⁷⁵

Matthew Tindale, an Anglo-Indian admitted on trial in the South India Conference in 1887 and appointed to Agra in January, 1892, had a special interest in missionary work among the lower-caste people. During the year, he reported, "we have had much success among these people [leather workers, roadmakers, agricultural laborers, and sweepers or scavengers] who are neglected and despised by their countrymen, and gladly welcome our sympathy and friendly efforts." In the lanes and back streets of the mohallas, where they lived, the Gospel was preached and women's work maintained. Schools for low-caste boys were well attended. In 1893, in addition to the missionary and his wife, the W.F.M.S. missionary, and the Indian pastor, there were five Local Preachers, ten Exhorters and teachers, and three Bible readers. The membership of the English church was reduced in 1894 by removals and the statistical report for 1895 indicated only sixteen full members and fifteen probationers. The Hindustani Society reported 118 full members and 120 probationers.²⁷⁶

At Roorkee, Osborne also held services in 1875. After five days of meetings a group of persons asked for a preacher and agreed to provide his support. William Eales, a former Wesleyan preacher who had associated himself with Osborne's work in Meerut, was licensed as a Local Preacher by the District Conference and stationed at Roorkee. As successor to Eales, David H. Lee—a probationer who had recently arrived in India—was appointed in 1876. In 1877 Roorkee reported twenty-two full members and five probationers. By 1881 a comfortable chapel had been erected and a Sunday school organized. The congregation was made up of English residents, soldiers—some of whom were Wesleyan Methodists—and teachers and students of the government Engineering College. There was little or no growth in membership and in 1887 a number of faithful laymen were lost to the church by removal of the infantry detachment that had been stationed there. Their replacement by artillery fresh from England challenged the pastor's spiritual resources. The difficulties experienced by the Society were increased by the stationing of a British Wesleyan missionary at Roorkee for several months, resulting in "unavoidable division of interest and support." Conditions took a turn for the better about 1889 and in 1890 the Society dedicated a church edifice on "the finest site in Rurki, kindly granted by the Government." The pastoral care of the nonconformist troops continued to be a responsibility of the Methodist missionary. In 1895 the Society reported a membership of thirty-eight persons.

By 1881 a Hindustani Sunday school had been organized and the next year a Class of about a dozen was formed by a Local Preacher. The membership grew gradually until in 1886, with some forty members, a separate Quarterly Conference was organized. This year a native girls' school had twenty-four pupils in attendance. The missionary's wife, Mrs. De Souza, was in charge of women's work. Two boys' schools, one with 105 pupils, and another with fifty-five, were opened in nearby places. In 1884 weekly services among the lepers outside the city began to be held. From 1888 on the work in the city, the adjacent villages, and the surrounding country developed rapidly. In 1888 the mission school at Manglaur, five miles from Roorkee, reported having reached a new high in enrollment, almost a hundred and fifty pupils. In 1889 five boys' schools and a girls' school were in operation. Three Bible women were employed, and in 1890 five. On the evening of December 26, 1889, under the ministry of C. W. Ross De Souza, seventy-two persons were baptized, constituting an entire mohalla, the name of which was changed to Isai Mohalla. One-third of the 325 baptisms in 1890 were women and girls. Other successes followed. In 1893, the Roorkee Circuit was formed under missionary leadership, with eight helpers.²⁷⁷

Lahore, in the Punjab, appeared first in the December, 1880, appointments, with James Shaw designated as pastor. In his report to the 1881 Conference Osborne said:

The last Annual Conference resolved upon the long cherished, yet long deferred step of planting a Methodist Church in the chief city of the Punjab On the 23rd February, Bro. [James] Shaw and myself reached Lahore, and, without delay began services both in the civil station [Anarkali] and among the railway community. These services were greatly blessed of God, and so rapid was the progress of the work that on Sunday 27th, we were enabled to organize a church membership of twenty, and a Sunday School of forty children. The services were continued with increasing interest until March 3rd on which date we organized the first Quarterly Conference of the M.E. Church in Lahore.

Later in the year a terrifying epidemic swept the city. Finding a suitable place for public worship presented another difficulty. At the 1882 Conference Shaw was replaced by Gilder who began his pastorate "with a glorious revival, which was the means of drawing many within the fold of Christ." Regular services were also held among the troops at Meean Meer. The Presbyterian Mission, U.S.A., this year gave the Methodists a building site in a good location near the railway quarters of Lahore. On May 29, 1884, the new edifice, substantial and commodious, was dedicated. The Indian work, auspiciously begun, suffered a setback because of the incompetency of the native helper who had been placed in charge. In 1885 a missionary society was organized which undertook the support of a missionary and Indian helper, to give their whole time to the native work. After a highly successful ministry of three years at Lahore Gilder was succeeded by Finley D. Newhouse, recently arrived from America. Claudius H. Plomer, a Eurasian, was placed in charge of the Hindustani Mission. The Woman's Conference listed in the 1889 appointments a girls' school directed by the missionary wife.²⁷⁸

The two first years in the Bengal Conference (1887-88) constituted a period of severe trial for the Lahore English church. Removal of members, estrangement of others, and depletion of finances combined to hinder the progress of the work. Before the close of 1889, under the pastoral leadership of E. S. Busby, general affairs had taken a turn for the better, but the English church was not successful in increasing its membership and the period closed (1895) with only twenty-one full members on the roll. The services, however, were well attended both by civilians and nonconformist soldiers. A Christian Endeavor Society, organized in 1893, exercised a strong Christian influence among young people. The Hindustani program expanded steadily. In 1895 there were nine day schools, including three girls' schools, eleven Sunday schools, and a Christian community numbering 772. The missionary's wife carried on an extensive program with the aid of five Bible women.²⁷⁹

Mussooree, located on the ridge of one of the lower ranges of the Himalaya Mountains at an elevation of 6,600 feet, rivaled Naini Tal as a summer resort of European residents. A "Hill Sanitarium" was maintained here, where missionaries from all parts of India came for rest and recuperation. What seemed to Osborne a providential opening led him to move the missionary at Jabalpur to Mussooree in August, 1881. But it was left to Osborne himself to lay the foundation of the church. He spent five months of 1882 in Mussooree.

A series of special services opened the work, resulting in the conversion of many and in solid accessions to the Church. The attendance in our public services, at first merely nominal, very soon filled our temporarily hired worshipping place. . . . Some attention was paid to Native work, and two Native Sunday Schools organized.²⁸⁰

In September Gilder was left in charge to carry on to the end of the Conference year, when Osborne—still Presiding Elder—assumed charge. Since people were constantly coming and going the large membership was not stable but the congregation was generous in support of the missionary program. Services were held in a hired hall in Landour, the convalescent station for British troops, practically a part of the city. During 1884-87 Osborne continued to carry responsibility for both the District and the charge. In 1886 a church building was completed. Services were also held at three outlying points, Happy Valley, Landour, and—once a month—at Dehra Dun. The native work at Mussooree included regular preaching services in a hired native chapel in the center of the bazaar, a Sunday school, and a mission day school. A school and chapel building at Rajpura was purchased in 1886 from the Presbyterian mission and with the aid of two Indian helpers preaching services, a Sunday school, and a boys' day school were established. A major interest of the Mussooree mission was the boarding school for boys from Christian homes, the Philander Smith Institute, founded in 1884. At the January, 1889, Conference, P. M. Buck was given the double appointment of principal of the institute, and the Mussooree, and Rajpura mission, with F. J. Blewitt as his associate. In 1893 girls' schools and zenana work were maintained at both places. During the year a Society of thirty members and probationers was organized; twenty-four persons were baptized; and the mission property and the mission school both improved.

In 1892 a revival in the Mussooree English church resulted in the conversion of scores of young people. The Society supported the missionary work generously both in Mussooree and Rajpura. The Hindustani Society in 1895 reported a membership, including probationers, of 110 and a Christian community of over three hundred. Bazaar preaching was maintained regularly at Rajpura and Mussooree and also an anglo-vernacular school at each place.²⁸¹

Meerut, in the United Provinces, thirty-seven miles northeast of Delhi, was the site of a great military station. It was here that the Sepoy Mutiny began. Osborne visited the city in July, 1875, and held a series of evangelistic services for ten days resulting in the organization of a small Society. Gilder was appointed to the station at the 1876 Conference but because of broken health was unable to fill the appointment. Since no one was available to take his place, interest quickly waned. In 1881 Osborne again visited the city and found what seemed to him "a providential opening." For more than a year De Souza labored faithfully as pastor and was meeting with much success when unexpectedly he was transferred to another station and no permanent adjustment seemed possible to provide for the vacancy. Left unsupplied, the appointment in 1883 was temporarily dropped from the list. It reappeared in 1887 and in 1891 the Meerut Circuit, with two Hindustani sub-Circuits, was included among the appointments of the Mussooree District, Bengal Conference. The next year Osborne stated in his report as Presiding Elder that an English church had been organized and regular services begun in a rented hall. Three sub-Circuits had been formed and there had been large gatherings among the accessible classes. A training school for girls was opened under W.F.M.S. auspices. When the District was placed in the Northwest India Conference P. M. Buck was appointed Presiding Elder and pastor at Meerut. When he was appointed, Bishop Thoburn said, "I'd like you to stay here . . . twenty years and see what you can make of it." He stayed, excepting furloughs, for twenty-one years. His work on the District was one of the outstanding achievements of India Methodism. For the first ten years, in addition to the native work, he was pastor of the English church. Then the church was transferred to a Wesleyan chaplain. In 1893 the church was visited by a revival in which more than 125 persons were converted, the majority soldiers of the local garrison. The next year an attractive church, with a seating capacity of three hundred, was dedicated. Five months later a combined church and girls' school building for native work, on the mission compound, was completed. A congregation of good size attended the religious services in the building.²⁸² In 1892 a girls' boarding school was begun which in 1895 enrolled fifty-seven pupils. The compound was enlarged and two comfortable dormitories built.

Ajmer, an ancient city in Rajasthan (formerly Rajputana) of some 70,000 population was a place of great historic interest. Osborne in his report to the December, 1882, Conference* told of the beginning of Methodist work in the city:

It was visited by Bro. [Ross] D'Souza and others last year, and Bro. Smith

* Ajmer in 1888 was included in the newly organized Bengal Conference. In 1891 it was taken over into the new Agra District of the North India Conference and in January, 1893, became the center of the Ajmer District of the Northwest India Conference.

working from Bandikui this year, opened religious services there. In July [1881], Bro. E. Jeffries, who had just terminated his connection with the Government service, was sent to Ajmere. He found a wide and needy field. Services have been held in the Railway Institute and in the houses of the people, resulting in the quickening of many, and in the organization of a promising church membership.

Jeffries held the first public service on Sunday, July 23. The Society was organized on August 1 with one Local Preacher, one full member and two probationers. At the year's end the church reported fourteen full members, five probationers, two Local Preachers, and Rs. 402 raised for ministerial support. At the December, 1882, Conference J. D. Webb was appointed to the Ajmer Circuit. Indian work with daily preaching in the streets and bazaars was begun with the assistance of laymen of the church. The Society was under the disadvantage of having to hold all its services in a hall which was "neither suitable nor commodious." In 1885 a much more suitable hall was found. It was opened with a lecture on "America" by W. F. Oldham and a week of revival services. At the February, 1886, Conference Webb was succeeded by T. E. F. Morton. Webb's report rejoiced in the fact that the Methodist Hall had been the happy centre of church life and rich spiritual blessing. Here the pastor and wife . . . gathered throngs . . . for the discussion of Bible themes. Eight thousand clerks and work men stream from the adjacent Railway offices and shops, and hundreds have paused at a time while we have preached from the front platform of our Hall.

Morton extended the Circuit widely, preaching and making pastoral visits at Nasirabad, Phalera, Bandikui, Rewari, and Sojat. Ajmer reported to the 1888 Conference twenty-seven full members and sixteen probationers. The Indian Society had six members. At the 1887 Conference C. P. Hard assumed charge of the Ajmer Circuit.²⁸³

A mission building, two stories high, with twenty rooms, including a preaching hall, a schoolroom, an orphanage, and quarters for Indian preachers on the first floor and missionaries above, was erected in 1888. In 1891 when the Ajmer Circuit was transferred to the North India Conference it had a Christian community of 646 people. When the next transfer was made (1892) J. E. Scott, the Presiding Elder, said of Ajmer :

Here we have a wonderful field. Where two years ago there was but a handful of Christians at one place, last year we had three circuits, and now there are eight There are now about two thousand Christians, more than one thousand of whom have been baptized this year. Most of these converts are . . . from among the leather workers (Reghers), and some Brahmans also have been baptized. Many of these converts are full of zeal. . . . I have been struck also with their earnest prayers, and with their quaint and fresh religious experiences.

The Ajmer Circuit the next year had a staff of five Indian preachers, eight Bible readers, and fifteen Exhorters and teachers. A boys' and a girls' boarding school were growing rapidly. Work was carried on in a number of outlying stations. The preaching hall built in 1885 was inadequate to meet the needs of the increased congregations. At the beginning of 1893 the Avery Girls' Boarding School was hopefully opened, although many problems presented themselves. Several sub-Circuits were reached by native assistants, especially wives of teachers and preachers, but the arrangement was regarded as unsatisfactory. Baptisms in 1895 were few in comparison with the 1892 record, but De Souza was confident that every phase of the program was "on the line of advance."²⁸⁴

BURMA DISTRICT, 1884-87

Rangoon (Burma) was first listed as an appointment in 1878, "left to be supplied." * The Burma Mission, Thoburn says, "was thrust upon us, rather than sought by us." Over a period of more than four years he had received invitations from Calcutta converts who had removed to Rangoon to organize a church there. Finally he decided "to go and see if God had anything for us to do" in that city. In the meantime William Taylor had sent out Robert E. Carter from Ohio. It was not until Thoburn received a telegram saying Carter and wife had actually arrived that he left Calcutta for Burma. On reaching Rangoon on May 11, 1879, he immediately began a two weeks' series of meetings for the English-speaking people in the Baptist Mission Chapel.

At the end of two weeks . . . we . . . were in possession of a valuable plot of land [donated by the city of Rangoon] at the corner of two main streets, on which to build a church and parsonage. We had an organized church of sixty or seventy members, a Sunday-school in operation, had held our first Quarterly Conferences, had licensed one local preacher and two or three exhorters, had held our first class-meeting and love-feast, and had commenced street-preaching in three different languages.

Services in Tamil and Telugu were begun by the Hindu converts. At the next Conference (January, 1880) Carter was assigned to Bangalore and J. E. Robinson was appointed to the mission. In March, 1880, a church was dedicated. In 1881 in response to an appeal from Robinson the W.F.M.S. sent Miss Ellen Warner of Berea, Ohio, to establish an English girls' school in Rangoon. The school opened in January, 1882, with twelve pupils. By 1882 the mission had made substantial advancement, particularly among the Tamils, and a Sunday school with fifty pupils and a Society of twenty-eight members, including probationers, had been organized.²⁸⁵

When Burma was set off as a separate District (1884) J. E. Robinson†

* The American Baptists had at this time a strong mission in Rangoon with a Sunday evening service in English, a printing establishment, and all departments of vernacular work. There was also an English Presbyterian church—attended principally by Scotch people, merchants and government officials—and an Anglican pro-cathedral.

† John E. Robinson (1849-1922) was born in Gort, County Galway, Ireland, on Feb. 12, 1849, and in 1865 emigrated to America to engage in business. When in 1870 he was converted he decided that he must enter the ministry and entered Drew Theological Seminary for training. When he heard was made Presiding Elder and Sam P. Long, recently arrived from America, was assigned to the church. This year Singapore, Straits Settlements, appeared among the appointments of the District. Requests had come for several years to Thoburn, as Presiding Elder of the Calcutta District, for preaching services at Singapore, far beyond the boundary of the Conference. At first he gave slight attention to the invitations but as they continued to be received he finally became convinced that "God was beckoning . . . onward to one more advanced post." Early in 1884 he sent a call to the Western Christian Advocate for two volunteers. About twenty young men offered themselves for the mission but none seemed to have quite the qualifications needed. Bishop John F. Hurst on his way to India met a resident of Singapore who impressed him with the missionary opportunity which the city offered. His first question on meeting Thoburn was, "What can we do for Singapore?" When the South India Conference was convened in Hyderabad for its ninth session, on November 20, 1884, a proposal was brought forward to establish a foreign mission in the Straits Settlements, to be directed by the Methodists of India, the first enterprise of the kind ever to be considered. The Conference had no financial resources to fall back upon for establishing a new mission but this seemed to occasion little concern. Oldham at the time was on the ocean approaching India. It was impossible to reach him for consultation but the Conference authorities had full confidence in his ability, courage, and loyalty, and when the appointments were read William F. Oldham was announced as missionary to Singapore. As soon as Conference had adjourned Thoburn hastened to Bombay to meet the Oldhams and convey the news to them. They were startled but not disturbed.

I had prayed for some days that God would make me willing to go to any post in all India to which I might be sent, and I at last had reached a point where I felt I was perfectly willing for any place selected for me in all this empire; but it never once dawned upon my thoughts that they would shoot me clear through the empire, and fifteen hundred miles out on the other side.²⁸⁹

Plans for beginning the mission were soon made. Accompanied by Thoburn, Oldham proceeded at once to Singapore and within two weeks of their arrival a Methodist Society was organized. Soon a Chinese day school was established, followed by a boarding school, and by February, 1887, the erection of a church and a school building.

At the February, 1887, South India Conference, Robinson was moved that William Taylor was asking for "unmarried men who could sing" he volunteered for India, was admitted on trial to the Central Illinois Conference, and reached the field on Dec. 18, 1874. He served the English language churches of Secunderabad, Bangalore, and Rangoon, and later was Presiding Elder of the Burma, Bombay, and Calcutta Districts. In 1876 he married Henrietta L. Terry of New York. He was a prolific writer, producing numerous books and pamphlets, historical and apologetic. In 1904 he was elected Missionary Bishop for India. His death occurred in Bangalore on Feb. 15, 1922. James R. Joy wrote of him: "Deeply religious, forever talking and living his religion, but saved from being sanctimonious . . . [by his Irish] sense of humor and warmth of sympathy. Everybody loved him, . . . [and] he continually made conquest of individual hearts, and working unceasingly with voice, pen and hand, . . . built up the church."—Official Biographical Files, Division of World Missions; Christian Advocate, XCVII (1922), 8 (Feb. 23), 220.

from Burma by Bishop Ninde and made Presiding Elder of the Bombay District. His report to the Conference carried the implication that Burma had been looked upon as the stepchild of the South India Conference:

For the last seven years appeals have been regularly brought to each Conference Session for reinforcements to allow of extension in many inviting directions; but so far as Burmah is concerned, in all these years only one additional preacher has been sent, and he, at the end of his first year, was left alone, his colleague having been withdrawn through necessity. So that in the matter of preachers, the Burmah field is practically where it was seven years ago, and all that could be done has been . . . to strengthen to the utmost possible extent the single station in which our work had been established.²⁸⁷

To succeed Robinson, Oldham was appointed in 1887 Presiding Elder of the Burma District and pastor at Singapore. In the vast area included within the District there were but three centers: Rangoon and Toungoo in Burma, and Singapore, Straits Settlements, Malay Peninsula. From Singapore to Rangoon by sea was a distance of approximately twelve hundred miles. In 1888 the Burma District became a part of the Bengal Conference.

CENTRAL INDIA DISTRICT, 1884-95

The Central India District * was formed at the 1884 Conference with five appointments.† Clark P. Hard was appointed Presiding Elder. His reports over the eight years that he continued in this office are almost wholly devoid of historical information concerning District developments.

The first new mission to be opened in the District was Burhanpur, begun in 1887 by A. S. E. Vardon. During his first year two boys' schools were established, a Hindustani and a Marathi, with a combined enrollment of sixty pupils. Vardon found that his small dispensary "kept the ears and hearts of the people open." Scripture portions were sold in 1889 in fifty villages, and ten thousand tracts were distributed. At the 1890 Bengal Conference Burhanpur, as previously stated, was joined with Khandwa, an arrangement which was continued for two years. In 1893 a defection of some of the baptized converts occurred but two of the apostates, with their families, were soon regained. At the 1895 Conference the Burhanpur Indian Society reported fourteen full members and one probationer.²⁸⁸

BENGAL CONFERENCE, 1888-95

The vast size of the South India Conference created almost insuperable administrative difficulties and finally led to its division. At the February, 1887,

* When the Bengal Conference was organized in January, 1888, the Central India District was included under the name Ajmer District. In 1889 the name was changed again to Nerbudda Valley District. In December, 1892, it was transferred to the Bombay Conference and renamed Central Provinces District.

† The five appointments of the Central India District in 1884 were: Ajmer; Harda and Khandwa; Jabalpur; Mhow; and Nagpur. Account of these Stations and Circuits has already been given in connection with the Districts with which they were associated in earlier years.

Central Conference, Bishop Ninde by authority of the General Conference* divided South India into two Annual Conferences—one to retain the original name and the other to be called Bengal.

Railroad lines were instrumental in determining boundaries. A railway which extended from Peshawar, the capital of the Northwest Frontier Province, to Calcutta—a distance of 1,588 miles—was made the base line. Singapore in the Malay Peninsula marked the eastern bound. The two extreme points of the new Conference were 4,300 miles apart. Geographically, it was the largest of the three India Conferences. Within its borders dwelt an aggregate population of about 150,000,000 people.

The Bengal Conference was organized with four Districts: Calcutta, Ajmer, Mussooree, and Burma. In 1891 the Tirhut District, in Bihar Province, was added. When the preachers within the boundaries which had been determined met in the Dharamtala Church, Calcutta, January 13, 1888, for organization—twenty-one members and thirteen probationers†—no Bishop was present. Dennis Osborne was elected president. The Conference this year had fourteen English charges with 555 full members and 153 probationers. It had fifteen Indian charges with 201 full members and 320 probationers.‡ At this first session, in consideration of the immense distance between stations, a resolution was adopted asking the General Conference to organize all “the unoccupied region East of India [Malaysia and Burma] . . . into a separate mission.”

On January 14, 1888, concurrent with the organization of the Conference, a Bengal “Woman’s Missionary Conference” was organized. The constitution of the North India Woman’s Missionary Conference was adopted, and Mrs. S. P. Long was elected president. Six missionaries were present.

Missionaries found life in Bengal and Burma difficult. For health and other reasons a number left the work. In 1889, after a little more than a year in India, Robert H. Craig returned to America because of the illness of his daughter. L. R. Janney left in the same year. Ray Allen, after two years, returned as a result of the serious illness of his wife and his own ill health. After three years’ stay William A. Carroll and Alfred G. Creamer returned home, and after four years J. M. Thoburn, Jr., and Charles M. Miller. Dr.

* G. C. Journal, 1884: “. . . the South India Conference shall have authority during the coming quadrennium to divide the same into two Annual Conferences, with such names and boundaries as they may appoint, the Bishop presiding . . . concurring therein [pp. 232, 345].” The General Conference also gave authority to the two Conferences (North India and South India) to change names and boundaries. The 1892 General Conference changed the name of the Bengal Conference to “Bengal-Burmah Conference,” and its area to “consist of Bengal, Bakar [Bihar], and Burmah.”—G. C. Journal, 1892, p. 408.

† The charter members of the Conference were: Ray Allen, F. J. Blewitt, Robert H. Craig, A. G. Creamer, C. W. R. DeSouza, A. Gilruth, C. P. Hard, Levan R. Janney, E. Jeffries, F. L. McCoy, J. P. Meik, C. M. Miller, T. E. F. Morton, Ralph W. Munson, D. Osborne, W. F. Oldham, James M. Thoburn, James M. Thoburn, Jr., A. S. E. Vardon, Frank W. Warne, J. D. Webb. Probationers: E. S. Busby, William P. Byers, W. A. Carroll, Charles G. Conklin, S. N. Das, Louis H. Koepsel, S. P. Long, Niels Madsen, Proshono C. Nath, F. D. Newhouse, C. H. Plomer, Paul Singh, Matuew Tindale. One layman, W. G. T. Mulligan, was appointed.

‡ There were also twenty-one English Local Preachers; twelve church buildings; and fifteen Sunday schools. In the Indian work there were fifteen Local Preachers; two churches; seventeen boys’ schools with 808 pupils; and six girls’ schools with 196 pupils.—Minutes, Bengal Conference, 1888, pp. 58, 61, 64.

Frank L. McCoy, Presiding Elder of the Calcutta District in 1889, felt that departures after a brief service were not in all cases justified:

I do not raise the question of right or duty in this matter, these brethren acted in harmony with the 'powers that be,' But I can only regret that the awful rent that has been made, and deplore the evil report that has gone out from Bengal Conference. The easy and rapid return of missionary workers is demoralizing and destructive.

The Conference also passed a resolution much to the same effect. It deprecated the sending out of missionaries "except in rare cases, to work specified before their coming, and for limited terms." The practice, it stated, tended "to destroy the Missionary spirit which should seal men to the foreign work for life," and also to limit the appointing power of the officers of the Conference.²⁸⁹

Despite all vicissitudes the years 1889-95 witnessed marked institutional expansion in the Bengal Conference. In 1888 the government offered valuable property at Pakur "for Mission premises and Native Orphanage" at Rs. 18,000 and the mission accepted. In 1891 the girls' orphanage had twenty children; the boys' orphanage a somewhat smaller number.

An asylum for lepers was completed and occupied in 1889 at Roorkee, and in 1892 two others at Asansol, one for men and one for women, were erected—funds for these latter supplied in part by a Scotch leper association and the remainder by local contributors.

The distressing amount of extreme poverty in Calcutta revealed by a government report—twenty-two per cent of the Eurasian population paupers—moved the mission to establish in 1893 an Industrial Home for unemployed men. Lodging and meals were provided in return for seven hours' work a day. In 1895, 120 men were cared for and employment was found for five hundred. So many orphan boys applied for shelter that a Boys' Orphanage was established in connection with the home.

In an article in the Gospel in All Lands in January, 1892, Bishop Thoburn proposed a Calcutta Methodist Brotherhood, somewhat after the order of the Oxford Club, whose members would dedicate themselves to missionary evangelism among the fifteen thousand or more students in the city, many of whom had come from distant parts of Bengal.

I should like these young men to come to India pledged to remain unmarried at least four years I should wish them to live on half pay while thus members of a common brotherhood, and to devote themselves exclusively to work among the Bengalis. . . .

Are there any four young men who have graduated, or are about to graduate, who will be willing to come out to India and undertake this kind of work early in the autumn of next year?

Two young men promptly responded to the Bishop's appeal—August Kullman and Benjamin J. Chew, and in 1893 the Brotherhood was formed.

Four young, unmarried missionaries—Edward S. Ekdahl and Franz E. Leiden the other two—lived together in a common home, engaged in a common work. Together they studied Bengali, conducted open-air services, did house-to-house visiting, and led some cottage prayer meetings. The band did not long hold together. In 1895 Kullman tired of celibate life, and married, and later Chew followed his example.

During the years 1889-95 twenty-three missionaries were received into the Bengal and Bengal-Burma Conferences.* In January, 1893, nine members and four probationers were transferred to the Northwest India Conference and eight to the Malaysia Mission Conference, which depleted the membership. However, numerous probationers through the years had been added † to the roll, and others continued to seek entry.²⁹⁰

CALCUTTA DISTRICT, 1888-95

The Calcutta District of Bengal Conference in 1888 had six charges.‡ Following the departure of J. M. Thoburn, Jr., from India in 1888, Frank L. McCoy§ was appointed Presiding Elder. A few weeks after the January, 1889, Conference—two years and one month after his arrival in India—death ended his career. Few, if any, Methodist missionaries made so strong an impression and won so many good friends as he. Frank W. Warne, pastor of the Dharamtala Church, was appointed to the District to succeed him. He, like Thoburn before him, found that his responsibilities in the city of Calcutta left him with little time or opportunity for District administration.

The District, however, could point to an active youth program. In 1894

* Missionaries received (and their Conferences) 1889-95 were: 1889, Henry and Helen Walker Jackson, New York; Philo M. and Carrie McMillan Buck, North India; William N. Brewster, Cincinnati; Charles A. Gray, Ohio (died in Singapore, 1889); 1890, Lewis A. Core, West Virginia (m. 1894, Mary Kennedy); William R. and Charlotte Force Clancy, North India; Antone Dutt, South India; Homer C. and Estelle Clark Stuntz, South India; 1891, Julius H. and Mary Price Smith, St. Louis; James and Lilius Rhenius Lyon, South India; Guru Diyal Spencer Singh, North India; John C. and Myrtle Haynes Floyd, Michigan; Ernest A. Bell, Pittsburgh; Albert T. and Minnie J. Leonard, North India. Daniel D. Moore was received on his credentials from the Canada Methodist Church. In 1892, Thomas S. Johnson, M.D., and Amanda R. Johnson, George F. and Kate Dixon Hopkins, John W. McGregor, and Edwin T. Farnon, all from North India; 1893, August Kullman, New Jersey (m. 1895, Adelina Weatherby); Benjamin J. Chew, West Virginia (m. 1899, Flora Widdifield); 1894, Gerhard J. and Elizabeth Bell Schilling, Malaysia Mission Conference; 1895, David H. Lee, East Ohio.

† Those received on trial 1889-95 were: 1889, Benjamin F. West, M.D., and Letty Graham West; 1890, F. E. Warner, Henry Gershom; 1891, Benjamin H. Balderston (layman), Y. Cornelius, W. T. Kensett, B. Luther, William G. Shellabear (army engineer); 1892, J. T. Robertson, Charles Dowring, J. S. Joseph, E. W. Gay, J. Sumer; 1893, John F. Deatker, William Peters, John Robert; 1894, Joseph Culshaw, Edward S. Ekdahl, George S. Henderson, Franz E. Leiden, James Martyn, Jawala Singh, Nain Sukh; 1895, B. Nath.

‡ The six charges of the Calcutta District in 1888 were: the English church, Dharamtala; Calcutta Bengali Mission and Pakur Circuit; Calcutta Hindustani Mission; Hastings Seamen's Mission; Lal Bazaar Seamen's Mission; and Asansol. Account of all these missions has already been given.

§ Frank L. McCoy was born in Ballinamore, County Leitrim, Ireland, on Jan. 28, 1856, and died on Feb. 13, 1889. At sixteen he emigrated to America and for three years worked in an Akron, Ohio, factory. During this time he was converted and in 1874 entered Mount Union College. Before graduation he went to Michigan and began to preach. In 1877 he was received on trial in the Michigan Conference and during 1879-81 served as pastor at Otsego. From Otsego he went to Albion College, and in 1884 received his B.A. He continued his studies and later received the M.A. and Ph.D. degrees. He arrived in India on Jan. 14, 1887, and was at once appointed editor of the Indian Witness. His sudden death was an irreparable loss to the Christian mission in India.—Obituary, Minutes, Bengal Conference, 1890, pp. 48 ff.

it had six Epworth Leagues with a combined membership of 230. "Time would fail me to tell," wrote Warne, of all the work of the Leagues on the District such as money raised, missionary offerings, cottage meetings held, hospital services, alms house services weekly, strangers hunted up and welcomed, and to have this in all the churches and united in a District League is in our opinion getting the foundations well laid.²⁹¹

On his arrival in Calcutta in 1889 Henry Jackson was designated to open a mission in Muzaffarpur, a city of some sixty thousand population, and one of the most important centers in the densely populated Tirhut district, that portion of Bihar which lies north of the Ganges. He held English services weekly in the city and in Samastipur. Bazaar preaching was also begun. Mrs. Jackson curtained off a corner of the mission house veranda and, though not a physician, established a dispensary which soon drew daily fifty women and children. The mission was short on native helpers. Through the W.F.M.S., three girls' schools were opened.

The opening of a mission at Bolpur, a hundred miles northeast of Calcutta, was assigned in 1892 to J. P. Meik. In 1894 he reported that he was "sowing beside all waters" and that reaping had begun. As before at Pakur, his wife worked closely with the women. The first school was forced to close but by 1893 antagonism had been overcome and the school was reopened. By 1894 two thousand Bibles and Scripture portions had been sold and in addition four thousand hymnbooks and tracts. The lack of a tent, a cart, and bullocks hindered progress but in 1895 these were procured. A break was made and some were baptized.

A mission among the Oriya people who had come to Calcutta from Bihar, the Central Provinces, Orissa, and elsewhere was established in 1891. In 1892 the Presiding Elder reported twenty-two men, sixteen women, and thirteen children in the congregation. H. N. Samuel, a Local Preacher, was assigned to the mission in 1893 as a supply, and recruited fifteen full members and forty-two probationers. A boys' school of twenty-seven pupils and a girls' school of twenty-five were established. By 1894 four congregations, using four different languages, had been established.²⁹²

AJMER (CENTRAL INDIA; CENTRAL PROVINCES) DISTRICT, 1888-95

When the Ajmer (formerly Central India) District in 1888 became a part of the Bengal Conference it had eight charges.* C. P. Hard was continued as Presiding Elder. In 1892 he was succeeded by T. S. Johnson, transferred this year from North India. The District was enlarged to include all of the Methodist work within the Central Provinces of India. While the Church had been firmly planted in a number of strategic centers a large part of the area

* The eight charges of the Ajmer District in 1888 were: Ajmer English Circuit; Ajmer native Circuit and Boys' Orphanage; Ajmer village work; Bharatpur Mission; Burhanpur Mission; Jabalpur and Railway Circuit; Khandwa; and Mhow English church and native mission. Account of these missions has already been given.

was still a virgin field. In his 1894 report Johnson recorded observations made on a journey of three hundred miles through regions where the Gospel had never been heard.

Large portions of the populations are descendants of the aboriginal tribes of the country, are very simple and accessible, and the whole region promises to be a most fruitful missionary field. The country is hot and very malarious but when we can find men and women willing to leave civilization and go into this kind of jungle, and money to support them, we may expect great results.

At the close of 1895 there were five boarding schools in the District—at Jabalpur, Narsinghpur, Kamptee, Khandwa, and Basim—and at Harda a beginning had been made which, it was thought, might later develop into a boarding school. "The number," Johnson said, "will soon have to be increased."²⁹³

To Gadarwara, eighty miles west of Jabalpur, Jacob Samuel was appointed in 1889. At the next Conference Gadarwara and Harda were listed as a single appointment and to the Circuit T. E. F. Morton and Samuel were assigned. In the 1891 Minutes Gadarwara appeared again as a separate station under Devjee, a graduate of Bareilly Theological Seminary, and eight assistants. In 1892 a new station, Bankheri, was added to the Gadarwara Circuit, but next year the field was left to another denomination which had also entered. Workers changed from year to year and little progress was recorded.

Chhindwara was separated from the Jabalpur Circuit at the 1891 Bengal Conference and set on its own feet. For one year it was served by a supply pastor. In 1892 John W. McGregor was appointed to the charge but could give to it only part-time. Under these circumstances little could be expected in results. In November, 1894, the Society reported fifteen full members and twelve probationers.

At Narsinghpur, fifty-three miles west of Jabalpur, previously a part of the Jabalpur Circuit, in November, 1891, the Methodists purchased from the Swedish Mission* a valuable property, consisting of a large hall, two bungalows, and "wide shaded fields." At the January, 1892, Conference Hard was appointed to the Narsinghpur Circuit. About thirty men selected from newly baptized people of many villages were organized into a training school in preparation for work as pastor teachers. H. W. Butterfield, a Local Preacher who had resigned a government position that he, with his wife, might devote their lives to missionary service, was placed in charge of the school. The wives of the married men were taught in the Female Training School by Ada Nash, W.F.M.S. assistant, and Mrs. Butterfield. In 1893 a boys' boarding school was opened in close proximity to the training school.²⁹⁴ The regular women's program found its opening among Bengali and Mohammedan women, primarily of the most influential class.

* The Swedish Evangelical Lutheran Mission had been at work at Narsinghpur since 1878. At the Third Decennial Missionary Conference at Bombay, 1892, the secretary of the Swedish Mission publicly indicated displeasure of the entrance of the Methodists to the area and expressed strong disapproval of their methods of evangelization.—Report of the Third Decennial Missionary Conference, Bombay, 1892-93, II, 625 f.

MUSSOOREE DISTRICT, 1888-92

The Mussooree District, following transfer to the Bengal Conference (1888), the first year had nine charges.* The District included part of the Northwest Provinces and the Punjab. Dennis Osborne remained Presiding Elder. The year 1891 registered a remarkable advance. Within fifteen months more than two thousand persons were baptized, an advance in which every Circuit shared. New areas were opened and improvements made in church organization.

Religious meetings for the nonconformist troops in Multan were begun in 1888 by C. G. Conklin. He was given the use of the troops' "Prayer Room," where he held services regularly on Sundays, Wednesdays, and Saturdays. He also held meetings for the railway employees and endeavored to establish an English Sunday school. Conklin felt that opportunity was favorable for beginning Indian work but obstructions developed and the station disappeared from the list of appointments in 1891. In 1894 it was reopened by J. F. Deatker. In addition to services for the troops, native work was begun and 156 persons baptized during the year. The Society reported this year (1894) forty-eight full members and sixty-one probationers. The wives of the missionary and of the native pastor visited among the women of Multan.

Deoband, in the Saharanpur region, a city of thirty thousand population, on the railway, where no missionaries were at work, appealed to Osborne as "an important and accessible mission field." Archibald Gilruth opened a preaching place and established a boys' school in the city in January, 1888. Opposition was so strong that it was considered wise to suspend the school temporarily. Later it was reopened in a less public location. A Local Preacher who was a qualified physician established a dispensary which met with immediate favor. Numbers of patients from the city and surrounding villages were treated successfully. At the 1889 Conference J. D. Webb was appointed to the mission. Deoband and Muzaffarnagar were combined in a Circuit and the work was extended to several other places. A girls' school and two Sunday schools were conducted at Muzaffarnagar. In 1894 five Exhorters and pastor-teachers were working in cooperation with Joshi Sumer, an influential Indian minister. During the year 198 women were baptized on the Circuit.²⁹⁵

At Patiala, in the state of the same name—the largest of the native states of the Punjab—a mission was opened in August, 1889. In 1890 Antone Dutt was appointed to the mission. Everywhere on his preaching tours he found attentive listeners but little response. For two years he toiled almost without result but finally on August 10, 1891, the break came, and there "were 107 baptisms on a single evening."

* The nine charges of the Mussooree District in 1888 were: Mussooree English church; Mussooree and Rajpura mission; Allahabad English church; Hardwar Mission; Lahore English church; Lahore Hindustani Mission; Multan; Roorkee; and Deoband. With exception of Multan and Deoband, account of all has been previously given. The Mussooree District was transferred to the Northwest India Conference in 1893.—Minutes, Northwest India Conference, 1893, p. 23.

Since then the flames have burst on the adjacent villages, and the missionary with reinforced staff has all he can do to keep pace with the rapidly growing openings.

In 1894 Patiala had four sub-Circuits. During the year there were 120 baptisms. Twenty-two workers were employed under the supervision of E. T. Farnon. Twelve day schools enrolled 105 pupils, and sixteen Sunday schools had an average attendance of 725. Progress was hindered by lack of a church and a house for the pastor. Three teachers, a Bible reader, and the pastor's wife were engaged in women's work.²⁹⁶

TIRHUT DISTRICT, 1891-95

Tirhut District was formed at the 1891 Conference, with Henry Jackson as Presiding Elder. Four appointments were listed for occupation: Muzaffarpur, Samastipur and Samastipur village work (where Jackson had made his start), and Darbhanga. At the close of the year he reported "five stations" occupied, Sitamarh and Chapra in addition to the others. All of the towns were on the railroad line. He was hampered by the lack of native helpers to draw upon in this new field. He had been compelled, he reported, to use "such men as . . . [he] could find, and they . . . [had] not given satisfaction." Among the hundreds who had heard the Word were "very many who . . . [had] heard it for the first time." Two orphanages had been established, a boys' school, and three girls' schools with an average attendance of seventeen pupils. The girls' schools were in the care of Mrs. Jackson, and the dispensary was operated by Mary Ward, formerly a Bareilly orphanage pupil. At Samastipur Sunday evening services in English were held, but as many of the railway employees were usually on duty at the time of the church service attendance was irregular.

By 1894-95 Jackson had assistants of whom he could give a better report and the District, he felt, had "begun a new era." There had been baptisms at each station, at Bettiah, a station added in 1894, ninety; at Muzaffarpur, eleven; at Darbhanga, 152; at Chapra, fifty-nine; in all, at six stations, 324.²⁹⁷ As for women's work, however, he was somewhat disturbed for the schools at all the appointments were closed one year for lack of appropriation and another year the dispensary met the same fate, a great loss to the work.

BURMA DISTRICT, 1888-95

When in January, 1888, the Burma District became part of the Bengal Conference it listed seven appointments.* For one year W. F. Oldham served as Presiding Elder. He was succeeded by Sam P. Long, who in turn was followed in 1891 by Julius H. Smith of the St. Louis Conference.

* The seven appointments were: Rangoon, English church; Rangoon, Burmese Mission; Rangoon, Seamen's Mission; Rangoon, Tamil and Telugu Mission; Singapore, English church and Chinese Mission; Singapore, Anglo-Chinese School; and Penang.

When Smith had been a year in the field he was convinced that the great opportunity of the Burma Mission was not with the English work, which had been given the priority for years, nor with the Tamil and Telugu immigrants who after a few years almost invariably returned to India, but with the Burmese, among whom a decided change in attitude toward Christian schools had taken place. While in earlier years they could only with difficulty be persuaded to patronize missionary schools, by 1892 they regarded them with favor. "We have now more than one hundred and twenty children in our Burmese schools," Smith reported, "two-thirds of whom have been gathered into schools this year." Nevertheless, since Burma had a mixed population, it was considered necessary to maintain preaching services in no less than five languages—Burmese, Tamil, Telugu, Chinese, and English.

The Burmese work was at first slow-moving. As early as 1887, the Rangoon English church undertook to support a missionary to these people on the grant-in-aid plan. The language itself, however, was a barrier, and with the shortage of workers time could not be spared for intensive study. Nonetheless, in Rangoon two day schools, separating the sexes, were in operation by the early nineties, as well as a Sunday school. When two new men—J. T. Robertson, formerly of the Salvation Army, and G. J. Schilling, supported by the Montclair, New Jersey, church—came into the Conference prepared to enter Burmese work, for the first time it was given a firm footing. Centers were started in Thongwa and Pegu, and the first property bought for a mission house.

When her husband was made Presiding Elder Mrs. Smith was given charge of the general work for women in Rangoon which—other than the girls' school—included an orphanage, a deaconess home, and a Burmese school. The orphanage grew slowly year by year until in 1894 thirty-nine children were being cared for, of whom thirty were dependent upon the W.F.M.S. for support. Only a small appropriation was available for the Burmese girls' school but under Mrs. Smith's frugal management excellent work was done.

The English language missions in Rangoon continued to grow, although at a slow pace. The English church in 1893 had attained a membership of 165, having climbed from ninety-two in 1887. Revival meetings in 1894, led by Dennis Osborne, increased the membership to two hundred. The Seamen's Mission required much of the time and effort of the pastor. During the busy season of rice shipments audiences of more than one hundred sailors attended the evening services. During 1893 "a score or more . . . including some officers, were converted."

At the time the Burma District was formed, there were in Rangoon twenty-eight Tamil and Telugu converts, for whom a Society had been organized and a school established. Oldham considered 1887 the best year that mission had thus far experienced. The Tamil work was in the charge of Ezra Peters, who preached on the streets and in the church and conducted a small school.

R. E. Cully, a Local Preacher, engaged in similar work among the Telugu people and taught a boys' school. The school was not permanently successful and in 1893 was discontinued. In 1895 the Tamil and Telugu church reported fifty-six full members and forty-nine probationers.

A small Chinese mission in Rangoon was begun in 1894 by a Chinese layman from Vancouver, whose work was supported by a British army major. "It moves slowly," the Presiding Elder reported at the close of the Conference year, "but there have been three baptisms."²⁹⁸

The other major appointment in Burma was Toungoo, which had first appeared in the Minutes in 1886. In 1887 the mission was under the care of C. G. Conklin, a Local Preacher of the Rangoon Quarterly Conference, and his wife Mary McKesson Conklin, who were at work among the Tamils. Together they also conducted a day school and a boarding school, and held English services for the garrison. Conklin's successor in 1888 was unable to hold the interest of the soldiers. Some converts had been made among the Tamils and a mission continued to be maintained with an Exhorter, Joseph, in charge until 1895.²⁹⁹

In 1895 Smith asked the Missionary Society whether it would support "the planting of missionary stations throughout Burma on an industrial basis." He cited the example of the Roman Catholic Church which, he said, had successful "coffee plantations in the Karen hills." The Board, doubtless with the failure of industrial experiments in India in mind, replied that it was "not expedient to grant this request."³⁰⁰

BOMBAY CONFERENCE, 1892-95

The 1892 General Conference for the second time divided the South India Conference to create the Bombay Conference.* The organizing Conference met in Bombay on December 22, 1892. Bishop Thoburn presided. Twenty-three ministers were recognized as members.† The Bishop announced the transfer of Horace A. Crane from the North Nebraska Conference and of William E. L. Clarke from the South India Conference.‡ When organized the Conference had three Districts: Bombay, Central Provinces, and Sind; and twenty-five charges with 814 full members and 1,112 probationers. Devotees of three great historic religions—Hinduism, Mohammedanism, and Zoroastrianism—were found in large numbers among the more than forty-five million

* The fourth Central Conference at its meeting in Calcutta in January, 1892, asked for five Annual Conferences in India, the fifth—the Bombay Conference—to "consist of the Bombay Presidency, the Central Provinces, Berars, that portion of the Nizam's Dominions north of the Godavery River and all of Central India south of the twenty-fifth parallel of latitude."—G. C. Journal, 1892, pp. 408, 412, 413.

† The charter members of the Conference were: Elders, Thomas S. Johnson, Daniel O. Fox, William E. Robbins, Clark P. Hard, John E. Robinson, George I. Stone, William W. Bruere, William H. Stephens, Gyanoba Khandaji, Algernon S. E. Vardon, Thomas E. F. Morton, Arthur W. Prantch, Clayton E. Delamater, Edwin F. Frease, George F. Hopkins, Fawcett E. N. Shaw, John O. Denning, John W. McGregor, Paul Singh, Archibald Gilruth. Deacons, Gangadhar B. Kali, Charles G. Elsam. Probationer, William H. Grenon. Also transferred were Horace A. Crane and W. E. L. Clarke.

‡ In the following three years those transferred were: 1893 none; 1894, William Feistkorn, North Indiana Conference; Frank R. Felt, Detroit Conference; William A. Moore, readmitted; 1895, Thomas P. Fisher, East Ohio Conference. Those received on trial, 1892-95, were: 1892, H. W. Butterfield; 1894, Thomas M. Hudson; Samuel Benjamin; Gottlob Engel; 1895, Sakharam Bhosle.

inhabitants of the area. Vernaculars deemed of such importance as to be included in the Conference course of study were Marathi, Gujarati, Hindustani (including both Urdu and Hindi), Sanskrit, and Arabic.

As elsewhere in India the Conference missionary program was soon crippled by health breakdown of missionaries. Within two years E. F. Frease was compelled to return to America for recuperation; H. A. Crane was smitten with disease; and W. E. Robbins, C. P. Hard, Archibald Gilruth, and C. E. Delamater became supernumerary.

An important change of policy as regards schools was made in 1892, because of the increasing number of converts for whom no systematic education was provided:

the time has come when the demands on us for educating Christian children and inquirers are so urgent that we deem it advisable to open no more Schools for purely Hindu and Mohammedan children. We are more than ever satisfied that whatever may have been necessary in times past, the present time requires that we confine ourselves to the teaching of those who are with us, or willing to receive us.³⁰¹

BOMBAY DISTRICT, 1892-95

The Bombay District of Bombay Conference in 1892 had fourteen charges.* John E. Robinson was appointed Presiding Elder. At the second session of the Conference he said that by comparing the District with the same territory as it existed a few years earlier there were abundant evidences of real progress.

There can be no question as to numerical and material advance—the increase in membership being over 50 per cent in the past five years; and the character and efficiency of our mission agents [workers] have undoubtedly improved. Our native Christian community, as a whole, though not numerically large, has become more intelligently spiritual; and a calm and careful survey of the membership cannot but satisfy us that notwithstanding some serious drawbacks and unsatisfactory elements, our people are really growing in grace and in the purifying and uplifting knowledge of God.³⁰²

The one great disadvantage was that, outside of the two cities, Bombay and Poona, the District had but one missionary who was giving himself wholly to village work—"the particular work which everywhere yields the largest and speediest results." In no other part of India were the energies of the missionaries so absorbed in purely English work.

Robinson was gratified by the condition of the Sunday schools on the District. "Well organised, efficiently superintended, carefully instructed," he believed them to be doing a grand work. He referred again in 1894 to "the development of intelligent piety" of the Indian members of the Church. "The workers generally," wrote Robinson, "are manifestly being established in the faith and are bringing forth the peaceable fruits of righteousness in their lives." As for the English churches he was certain that there were no congregations in the entire Methodist Connection that "in proportion to their ability, do better in . . . pastoral support and liberal contributions to the various benevolences of the Church."

* The fourteen charges of the Bombay District in 1892 were: Baroda, English church; Baroda Gujarati Mission; Bombay, English churches (Bowen Church, Grant Road Church); Bombay Gujarati Mission; Bombay Marathi Mission; Bombay Mazagon church; Bombay Seamen's Mission; Igatpuri; Kemptee, Nagpur, Poona, and Lonavla; Poona Marathi Mission; Thana. Account of these charges has been given.

A valuable sanitarium property at Pachmarhi was conveyed in 1894 to a Bombay District Board of Trustees by Mrs. Martha E. Lawrence.

In 1895 a most encouraging break came among the Gujarati. At the close of the year the Bombay District had a Christian community of six hundred where a year before it had "but a handful of converts all told."

A glorious opportunity, but a tremendous responsibility. . . . Thus far the missionaries responsible for the work in Gujarat have been favored in being able to make fairly good provision for the initial instruction of the flock; but they have to face the immediate establishment of training schools for men and women, boarding schools for boys and girls, and—most urgent of all—proper provision for the nurture of the women whose ignorance and backward state loudly plead for special effort in their behalf.³⁰³

At the December, 1895, Conference a Gujarat District was formed by cutting off the province of Gujarat and the Gujarati work in the city of Bombay from the Bombay District.

CENTRAL PROVINCES DISTRICT, 1892-95

Eleven charges* were included in the Central Provinces District in the first year of the Bombay Conference (1892). Thomas S. Johnson was Presiding Elder. The District was enlarged this year to include all of the work of the Church within the Central Provinces.

In 1895 Johnson announced that Basim in Berar had been "transferred with its Missionaries and Helpers and property worth Rs. 15,000 from Dr. Cullis' Faith Mission, to the Methodist Episcopal Church." A Methodist Society had been organized which this year reported eleven full members and seven probationers.

Bhusawal first appeared as a separate station in 1893. A church for the English congregation was begun this year. The English community was large and Johnson felt that not enough attention had been given to it in earlier years.³⁰⁴

SIND DISTRICT, 1892-95

The Sind District, included in Bombay Conference in 1892 with George I. Stone as Presiding Elder, had four charges.† The District extended from Karachi by the sea to Quetta on the northern frontier of Baluchistan. It comprised all of the provinces of Sind and Baluchistan. "It has cost constant toil," Stone reported at the close of the first year, "sore disappointments, much prayer and patience, and some tears to reach the [first] mile stone, but thank God we 'got there.'"

* The eleven charges of the Central Provinces District in 1892 were: Burhanpur; Bhusawal; Chhindwara; Gadawara; Harda; Jabalpur; Jabalpur English church; Kamptee; Khandwa; Nagpur; and Narsinghpur. For account of these see earlier pages.

There were many populous towns on the Indus River, along the North-western Railway, and in the interior, in which the Gospel had never been preached. To the Presiding Elder the District, with a small amount of missionary money appropriated for cultivation, and a very few missionaries allocated to it—only two in 1893, and one in 1894—constituted an immense problem. "To properly work the field," he estimated, "would employ one hundred missionaries and a lac [100,000] of rupees annually."³⁰⁵

WOMEN'S WORK IN SOUTH INDIA

Organized women's work under W.F.M.S. auspices in South India was slow in getting under way. Although the South India Conference was not organized until 1876, it was two years later before the Society sent a missionary to the South India field. The second W.F.M.S. missionary arrived in 1880 and the third in 1881.

Several years passed before a Woman's Conference organization was in operation. Eventually—on January 29, 1886—the South India Woman's Missionary Conference was formed under a constitution which stipulated that the wives of members and probationers of the South India Conference, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society appointees, deaconesses, and other workers formally elected by the body should be members. Women's appointments were listed in the Annual Conference Minutes under the designation "W.F.M.S." rather than "Woman's Missionary Conference," although many of the appointees were missionaries' wives not receiving salaries from the Society.

Not until 1889 did the South India Conference print in its Minutes a complete list of the women's appointments. This year, twenty-five women, six W.F.M.S. missionaries and nineteen wives of missionaries, were appointed to twenty-three missionary projects, predominantly girls' schools but including also combinations of girls' schools and zenana work, women's work in general, Bible women's work, medical work, and editor's desk. This gave formal recognition to the many different types of missionary service carried on in the Conference by women. Two years earlier, however, the W.F.M.S., in addition to the six missionaries in service in the Conference, had had six medical assistants, 188 Bible women, and 103 Christian teachers. There were seven hundred pupils in the two boarding schools, and three thousand in day schools. Workers were regularly visiting 2,970 zenanas. While this represented a remarkable development within a single decade the Society keenly felt a need for more schools in which to educate the children of church members; for a larger proportion of girls' schools; and for training schools for Christian workers. All six of the Indian and Eurasian assistant missionaries had been educated in other missions. "We cannot expect to carry on our work successfully," the Society declared, "without laying foundations broad and deep."³⁰⁶

In both of the Annual Conferences which split off from South India, women's Conferences were organized. At the first session of the Bengal Conference (January, 1888) six women united to set up a Woman's Missionary Conference. Of the six, four were wives of missionaries. The constitution of the North India Woman's Conference, with a few necessary changes, was adopted. Mrs. S. P. Long was elected president. Brief sessions were held on each of three days for the consideration of women's work in progress within the Bengal Conference. From the beginning the Conference published the W.F.M.S. appointment list. The second year, twenty-one W.F.M.S. missionaries, wives, and deaconesses were appointed to girls' schools, orphanages, zenana work, and a Deaconess Home.

At the first session of the Bombay Conference six W.F.M.S. missionaries and sixteen missionaries' wives received appointments to various types of work for women and girls. One of the wives, Mrs. Bruere, was appointed to the Marathi Boys' Boarding School in Poona. The six missionaries were assigned to the two mission centers Bombay and Baroda.³⁰⁷

At practically all of the centers where missionaries of the parent Board were at work the W.F.M.S. sent representatives, most of whom were in charge of schools.

In 1877 an appeal was made to the W.F.M.S. for a teacher for the Calcutta Girls' School. A year later the request was renewed and in 1878 Margaret E. Layton was sent out by the Baltimore Branch, the first W.F.M.S. missionary to South India. For ten years before leaving for India she had been a successful teacher—for eight of these years in the Wesleyan College at Wilmington, Delaware. She "found the school in great need of help, with thirty-five boarders and eighty day pupils." In one of her earliest reports to the Society Miss Layton said she had never seen "so much to do and so little to do it with," but she was not easily discouraged. By her efforts within four years the school was built up to a point where applicants for admission had to be refused. Under her direction the school became known as "one of the best in the city" and Christian girls began going out from it to engage in zenana missionary work. To assist Miss Layton and later to replace her Margaret Hedrick, a graduate of Ohio Wesleyan University, was sent to the field in 1884 by the New York Branch. Miss Layton's failing health required her to return to America in 1886.* For more than five years she served with distinction as teacher, manager, disciplinarian, and Christian worker. Under her administration the institution became "the largest school of the W.F.M.S.," with two hundred pupils, and thirteen teachers besides the Americans. English, Eurasian, * Margaret E. Layton (1841-92) was devoted to missionary service. She returned to India in 1891, "when after a few months at Cawnpore, she died from a twelve-hours' illness of cholera, April 28, 1892."—Louise Manning Hodgkins, The Roll Call . . . , pp. 16 f.

German, Italian, Portuguese, Burmese, and African girls composed the student body, a truly interracial and international group. Of the large proportion of students in 1889 who had become Christians, seventy-seven had united with the Church.³⁰⁸

Ellen H. Warner (Ph.D.), head of the department of mathematics in Baldwin University, Berea, Ohio, volunteered to go to Rangoon, Burma, in response to Isabella Thoburn's call to establish Christian educational work for girls. She arrived in 1881 and within six months had received from the government "nine building lots, a very eligible site, valued at eight thousand dollars, and five thousand dollars in cash as a building fund, and four hundred and fifty dollars for furniture." No other missionary in South India had such financial support from government sources. She closed her first year with a self-supporting English school of sixty-seven girls, real estate worth $15,000, and "an established reputation." In 1885 Julia E. Wisner arrived as an assistant, and upon Miss Warner's marriage in 1887 took charge of the school. The next year Estella M. Files, a graduate of the Brockport (New York) normal school, came to her assistance. The program was gradually expanded until in 1890 in addition to the Girls' School, which had an enrollment of 180, the women's program included management of an orphanage, a "Woman's Work-shop," and work among the Burmese.³⁰⁹

Evangelistic and educational work for women was inaugurated in Bombay in 1884 by Sarah M. DeLine, sent to the field by the Northwestern Branch. She was described as "a very earnest Christian, a successful teacher . . . [with] great power in evangelistic work." She soon had a comprehensive program of zenana, day school, and Sunday-school work under way, with two Indian teachers and two Bible women as assistants. Later her plans were broadened to include other workers.

She . . . associated with herself young women well fitted to witness for the Lord in the families of well-to-do Natives and . . . [had] a number of Bible Women . . . [to] visit the families of the Natives and public institutions such as hospitals.
