PREFACE BY THE GENERAL EDITOR.

JEREMIAH was the most prominent personage in a period of deepest distress and humiliation of the Jewish theocracy. He witnessed one by one the departure of all prospects of a reformation and deliverance from impending national ruin. Profoundly sympathizing with the calamities of his people and country, he is emphatically the prophet of sorrow and affliction. The first quotation from him in the New Testament is "a voice of lamentation and weeping and great mourning" (Matt. ii. 17, 18). In his holy grief over Jerusalem and his bitter persecutions he resembles the life of Christ. Should he, instead of David, be the author of the xxii. Psalm, as HIRZIG plausibly conjectures, the resemblance would even be more striking; but the superscription is against it. Standing alone in a hostile world, fearless and immovable, he delivered for forty years his mournful warnings and searching rebukes, dashed the false hopes of his deluded people to the ground, counselled submission instead of resistance, denounced the unfaithful priests and false prophets, and thus brought upon himself the charge of treachery and desertion; yet in the midst of gloom and darkness he held fast to trust in Jehovah, and in the stormy sunset of prophecy he beheld the dawn of a brighter day of a new covenant of the gospel written on the heart (xxxii. 31). He is therefore the prophet of the dispensation of the Spirit (Hebr. viii. 13; x. 16, 17). The character and temper of Jeremiah is reflected in his strongly subjective, tender, affecting, elegiac style, which combines the truth of history with the deepest pathos of poetry. It is the language of holy grief and sorrow. Even his prose is "more poetical than poetry, because of its own exceeding tragical simplicity." Jeremiah has proved a sympathizing companion and comforter in seasons of individual suffering and national calamity from the first destruction of Jerusalem down to the siege of Paris in our own day.

The elaborate Commentary on Jeremiah and the Lamentations, which appeared in 1868, as a part of Dr. LANGE'S Bibel-werk, was prepared by Dr. C. W. EDWARD NAEGELSBACH, pastor in Bayreuth, Bavaria, the author of a Hebrew Grammar, of several small monographs, and important articles in HERZOG'S Theol. Encyclopædia.

The Commentary on the Book of the Prophet Jeremiah was translated by the Rev. SAMUEL R. ASBURY, Rector of Trinity Church, Moorestown, N. J.

The Commentary on the Lamentations was translated by the Rev. Wm. H. HORNBLOWER, D.D., of Paterson, N. J.

Considerable additions, amounting to 147 pages, were made in both works, especially the latter.* Dr. HORNBLOWER justly dissents from Dr. NAEGELSBACH'S opinion concerning the authorship of the Lamentations, and defends the old tradition which assigns it to Jeremiah.

* The German Commentary on Jeremiah has 401 (xxii. and 379), that on Lamentations 94 (xvii. and 77), both 495 pages. The English edition has 446 pages on the Book of Jeremiah, 196 on Lamentations, in all 642 pages.

In justice to the German author, I extract from his Preface what he says concerning his views on Biblical criticism :

“ With reference to the critical principles I have adopted I ought perhaps to say something. There is inconsiderate criticism ; there is also inconsiderate hostility to criticism. Between these two I have endeavored to preserve the golden mean. The absolute integrity of the received text cannot be maintained, and indeed is now held by none. But once granting that the original has undergone corruptions, and the right of criticism is admitted in principle. Of this right, however, a very unrighteous use may be made, as is the case whenever criticism sets itself in opposition to the spirit in which a work was produced. Such criticism may possibly hit the truth, it may discover errors, which the eye of love and reverence has failed to observe. It has done undeniable service in this regard. But this effect is accidental and exceptional, not necessary and universal. Criticism proceeding from adverse opinions will do more to render the good and genuine suspicious than to purify it from spurious elements. We must correct it, not with a denial of its right per se, but on the one hand with a rejection of the principles which govern the application of this right, and on the other with a rigid examination of the objective results. In the latter respect it is important, above all, not to confound the eternal truth with human traditional conceptions thereof. The eternal truth is not prejudiced, even though an interpolation or a lacuna may be discovered here and there in a canonical book. Did such discoveries inflict a vital injury, care would have been taken that not a single variation should creep into the sacred archives. But such variations do exist in number ; there are, as we have said, unquestionable distortions of the original text of greater or less extent. It is thus seen that the Almighty was not concerned at a little dust, a slight rent, or a small piece of patchwork, affixed by an unhallowed hand, on the hem of the majestic garment of His holy oracles. There is always enough of the unassailable sacred text remaining intact, which to some may be a ‘ fountain of living water,’ to others the ‘ sword of the Spirit.’ Now would it be of any advantage to the good cause if we admitted no critical suspicion, but warded off every such attack at any price ? Would it be well—would it be right—to ward off such attacks by artificial expedients ? We should thus be in danger of defending the truth, consciously or unconsciously, with lies, so that the good cause would be rather injured than subserved. For thus we should undermine the citadel we were defending ; we should induce in our readers the conviction that we were acting on the principle that ‘ the end justifies the means,’ and were anxious not so much for truth as for victory. I have from the first guarded, for God’s and my conscience’ sake, against such unspiritual knight-errantry.

“ And yet I consider that there is great advantage in criticism exercised with conscientious care. In the first place, the good cause is thus spared the miserable testimonium paupertatis to which a paltry fear of criticism exposes it, and it receives a testimonium opulentie, that is, we thus testify that we know the cause we espouse to stand on an impregnable basis and to be able to withstand every trial of critical fire. In the second place, we afford to ourselves a testimonium honestatis, that is, we cause it to be understood that we have to do with the truth, and will contend for it only with honorable means. In the third place, if the unquestionable, but relatively insignificant, corruptions do no harm, still a knowledge of the correct text is, directly for exegesis and indirectly for doctrinal theology, always of some importance. In the fourth and last place, a right exercise of criticism is an exemplification of the ἡλικία τοῦ πληρώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ (Eph. iv. 13) and the αἰσθητήρια γεγυμνασμένα πρὸς διάκρισιν καλοῦ τε καὶ κακοῦ (Heb. v. 14).”

PROPHET JEREMIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. THE HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF JEREMIAH'S PROPHETIC LABORS.

The Old Testament theocracy in its external relations suffered two disastrous shocks; the destruction by Nebuchadnezzar and that by Titus. Both culminated in the demolition of the temple and the holy city, and the carrying away of the people. Each of the two catastrophes had its prophet: the latter, as definitive, forming the first act of the judgment—Christ, the Judge, Himself (Matth. xxiv.): the former, the prophet Jeremiah.

It is however noteworthy that Jeremiah began his dirge at a time when the sick nation appeared to have been healed. The abomination of apostasy reached its acme in the act of Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah (2 Kings xxi. 1-17), who placed idols and idol-altars in the temple, dedicated to the exclusive worship of Jehovah. After the short reign of his like-minded son Amon (2 Kings xxi. 18-25) Josiah ascended the throne of Judea, a prince of whom the book of Kings declares (xxiii. 25) that neither before him nor after him was there a king like him, who turned to the Lord with his whole heart, according to all the law of Moses. This pious king cleansed the land from all the abominations of idolatry, and restored the worship of Jehovah with a completeness which had not before existed (vers. 22-24, etc.). Unfortunately, notwithstanding his earnestness and good-will, Josiah's reform was only partial. The good soil was wanting for the seed, and hence his reformation was but a sowing among thorns. He had cleansed the land but not the hearts of the people (Jer. iv. 1-4. HERZOG, Real-Enc. XII. S. 227) and after his death the weeds shot forth again in fell luxuriance. From its geographical position the theocracy was placed between two great powers, that of Egypt on the South, that of Assyria on the North. Assyria was about to succumb beneath the heavy blows of the Babylonians and Medes, and Pharaoh Necho, King of Egypt, regarded this as a favorable opportunity to conquer Syria. If he succeeded in this, Judea would be surrounded and in constant danger of being overpowered by him. - Josiah attempted to repel P. Necho, and made the independence of Syria the final object of his policy (see NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Bab. S. 364). But he was defeated and slain at Megiddo, and Necho conquered Syria as far as the Euphrates. (2 Kings xxiv. 7). In the meantime Nineveh had fallen, B. C. 606. Nabopolassar, king of Babylon, sent the army thus set at liberty, under the command of his son Nebuchadnezzar, against the Egyptians, with whom a decisive and victorious battle was fought at Carchemish B. C. 605-4. In the same year his father died, and the youthful conqueror mounted the Babylonian throne. In Judea, after Josiah's death, the people had elected king not the eldest but second [surviving] son, Jehoahaz, probably fearing the despotic character of Jehoiakim. But Jehoahaz did not prove to be a good sovereign. He did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his fathers had done (2 Kings xxiii. 32). In Riblah, where he had probably gone to treat with Necho, he was taken prisoner, and was afterwards carried away as captive to Egypt, since Necho did not desire a ruler in Jerusalem, who would pursue a national policy (2 Kings xxiii. 32, 34; Jer. xxii. 10-12). Jehoiakim was appointed by the Egyptian king in his place, and thus, as the creature of the latter, laid under obligation to serve him. The fears entertained as to his character were realized. He ruled despotically; his love of splendid architecture leading him to oppress the people severely (Jer. xxii. 13 sq.); he shed much innocent blood, (ver. 17) and served idols like the ungodly kings before him. The overthrow of the Egyptian power in consequence of the battle of Carchemish involved his fall also. Although Nebuchadnezzar did not immediately take possession of Judea, his father's death necessitating his hasty return to Babylon, his supremacy over Syria and Egypt was secured. It was four years after the battle, in the eighth year of Jehoiakim, that he took Judea and Jerusalem (2 Kings xxiv. 1). The circumstance that the book of Kings makes no mention of the battle of Carchemish indicates that this made no perceptible difference in the condition of the kingdom of Judea. If Nebuchadnezzar had then invaded Judea, besieged and taken Jerusalem, and carried off prisoners and booty, it would certainly have been mentioned. The book of Jeremiah also contains no trace of Judea having then come into the actual possession of the Chaldeans. Jeremiah is always exhorting to submission. Jehoiakim reigns undisturbed in his fourth and fifth year at Jerusalem (comp. Jer. xxv. and xxxvi.) The fasting mentioned in xxxvi. 9, may as well have been occasioned by a danger threatening from a distance as any other,—least probably by the burden of a foreign rule then weighing on the people, since there is not a syllable intimating such an occasion. I therefore agree with those, who assume with Josephus (Antiq. X. 6, 1) that Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem for the first time in the eighth year of Jehoiakim. Comp. DÜCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth., I. S. 825, on the other side FR. R. HASSE, De Prima Neb. adv. Hierosol. expeditione, Bonn., 1856. NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Bab., S. 370, 373 sq. NIEBUHR seems to me to make too much of the passage, Dan. i. 1, 2, as well as of a notice in the Seder Olam Rabba, c. 24, and on the other hand too little of the testimony of the book of Kings and of Jeremiah. But however this may be, Jehoiakim, as well as the large majority of the people, took no heed to Jeremiah's exhortation to submit willingly to Nebuchadnezzar, and the consequence was that they were compelled to do so (2 Kings xxiv. 1). Three years afterwards Jehoiakim again revolted. A Chaldean army, with auxiliaries from Syria, Moab, and Ammon, reduced the rebellious people again to submission. At this juncture Jehoiakim lost his life, but whether in consequence of the capture of the city (JOSEPHUS Antiq. X: 6, 3, speaks of a voluntary admission of the Chaldeans into the city) or being taken prisoner outside the walls (so VAHINGER in HERZOG, Real-Enc. VI. S. 790, as it appears, on the basis of Ezek. xix. 8 sq.) is uncertain. According to the book of Kings the Chaldeans do not appear to have taken the city immediately after the death of Jehoiakim, for his son Jehoiachin succeeded by right of inheritance, not by the will of the Babylonian monarch. As heir to his father's obligations he is indeed made war upon and punished, but not so severely as Zedekiah (comp. 2 Kings xxiv. 15; and xxv. 27 sq., with xxv. 6 sq.; Jer. lli. 9-11). Whether the siege of Jerusalem began before Jehoiakim's death or after cannot be ascertained; certainly not long after, for Jehoiachin (who had also reigned in a manner displeasing to Jehovah) only three months after his accession to the throne, had to yield to the besieging forces of Nebuchadnezzar. The latter carried him, his family, the princes, the soldiers, and the smiths, all who could make or bear arms, captives to Babylon. (2 Kings xxiv. 14 sq.). This was the first deportation, and did not attain its object of rendering the people incapable of resistance. Nebuchadnezzar seems not to have been aware of the amazing tenacity of the Jewish character, or he would have done then what he was obliged to do afterwards. He allowed the kingdom of Judah to remain, but appointed a king of his own choice, Mattaniah, the youngest son of Josiah. He, like Eliakim, had to change his name, and perhaps with reference to the promise given in xxiii. 5, יְהוֹה צְדָקָה assumed that of צְדָקָהי. This sounds like mockery when we read the actual history of this king. He was not indeed inaccessible to better feelings, and seems to have been by no means so barbarous and cruel as Jehoiakim, but he was weak, and from dread of his too powerful nobles permitted every kind of transgression of the laws of Jehovah and injustice towards His prophet. The whole fanatical national party of the Jews, supported by a number of false prophets, united to induce him to break his oath of allegiance to the king of Babylon (Jer. xxiii. 9), and an impulse to this from without also was not wanting. In Zedekiah's fourth year ambassadors came from Tyre, Sidon, Ammon, Moab, and Edom (Jer. xxvii.) to consult together concerning a united revolt against the Babylonian rule. Then indeed Jeremiah appears to have stayed the revolt. The same year Zedekiah made a journey to Babylon to do homage (Jer. li. 59 sqq.), on which occasion by a strange turn Jeremiah gave to the king's marshal his great prophecy against Babylon, that he might read it to his master on the banks of the Euphrates, and then sink it in the stream. But scarcely had the Jews received intelligence that Pharaoh Hophra, grandson of Necho, who ascended the throne B. C. 589, was preparing to make war on Babylon than they thought themselves strong enough to venture on a revolt. But Nebuchadnezzar was not to be trifled with. Quickly, before the Egyptians could come up, he appeared with his army before Jerusalem, in the ninth year of Zedekiah (B. C. 588). He was indeed compelled by the approach of the Egyptian army to raise the siege, but he succeeded in repulsing the Egyptians, and Jerusalem was at once invested and sorely pressed. After being devastated by famine and pestilence, the city was taken in the 11th year of Zedekiah. The king fled with a part of his army, but was overtaken in the plain of Jericho, brought before Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah, in the land of Hamath, and after his children and the captive princes of Judah had been slain in his presence, his eyes were put out. He was then laden with chains, and carried to Babylon, where he remained in prison till his death (Jer. lii. 11; 2 Kings xxv. 7). Yet it appears that towards the end his imprisonment was less rigorous, and that he was honorably interred (Jer. xxxiv. 1-5). A month after the capture of the city, in the 4th month of the 9th year of Zedekiah, came Nebuzaradan, the captain of Nebuchadnezzar's guard, to Jerusalem, and caused the city and temple to be completely destroyed, and the people carried away. A few of the common people only remained in the country, over whom Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, was appointed governor. Concerning him see the article by OEHLER in HERZOG'S Real-Enc., IV. S. 699. To his care Jeremiah, who was given his option, and preferred to remain in the country, was committed. Gedaliah was however soon afterward murdered by a certain Ishmael, a descendant of the royal family, at the instigation of Baalis, King of Ammon. The remaining Jews feared the vengeance of the Chaldeans, and although Jeremiah promised them safety and exemption from punishment if they stayed in the country, they removed with their wives and children and whole possessions to Egypt, whither the prophet was compelled to follow them. In Egypt they appear to have settled in different places (xliv. 1) and to have continued the worship of the queen of heaven (the Moabitish goddess, Astarte, see on vii. 18). At a festival of this deity, for which all the Jews in Egypt assembled in Pathros (upper Egypt) Jeremiah for the last time raised his prophetic voice in warning and rebuke. From an intimation of the approaching death of Pharaoh Hophra, which he gave to his countrymen, as a prophetic sign, and which we can only regard as shortly preceding the death of that monarch, we may infer that he continued his prophetic labors till towards the year B. C. 570.

If now we survey at a glance the whole character of the historical position in which Jeremiah was placed, we see in him the herald of the first precursory catastrophe of the external theocracy. At the same time he had also a mission to Babylon, the power which was appointed, after Egypt and Assyria, to engulf the theocracy, and thus in a certain sense to be the first universal monarchy. He was first to prepare the way for the divine mission of this power as the instrument of judgment on the theocracy, and then to announce its appointed judgment, after a brief respite of seventy years, and the redemption of the theocracy. This he could do only in the form of that perspective fore-shortening, which is peculiar to prophetic pictures of the future, and which has to be rectified by the fulfilment. Thus we may say that Jeremiah stands at that epoch in universal history, at which the first precursory judgment is inflicted by worldly power on the kingdom of God, and here he has to announce to both judgment and redemption; to the kingdom of God first judgment and afterwards redemption, to the world first victory and glory, but afterwards judgment (chaps. i. li.).

§ 2. THE PERSON AND MINISTRY OF JEREMIAH.

The name יְרֵמְיָהוּ (abbreviated and later form יְרֵמְיָהוּ xxvii. 1; xxviii. 5, 10, 11, 15; xxix. 1; Dan. ix. 2) is not, with Jerome and many since (comp. NEUMANN, Jer. v. Anat. I., S. 8), to be derived from יְהוָה יְרֵמְיָהוּ a rad. יְרֵמְיָהוּ=יְרֵמְיָהוּ with the meaning of elatio, elatus, Domini, but (according to many analogies יִבְּיָהּ, יִפְּיָהּ, יִרְחִי, etc.) from יִרְכָה, and the only possible meaning is Jova jacit, projicit, dejicit or ejicit (see HENGSTENBERG, Christology, Edinb. Transl. II. p. 362). It is probable, as HENGSTENBERG supposes, that the name is based on the passage Exod. xv. 1 (אֲשִׁירָה לַיהוָה כִּי־סִים וְיִרְכְּבוּ רֶקֶה בְּיָם).

As to his origin, Jeremiah is called (i. 1) "a son of Hilkiyah, of the priests who were at Anathoth, in the land of Benjamin." From this it is seen that he was of the sacerdotal race. It is possible, but cannot be proved, that his father was the same with that high-priest Hilkiyah, who, in the 15th year of Josiah, found the book of the law in the temple (2 Kings xxii. 3 sq.), as maintained by CLEM. ALEX., JEROME, THEODORET, KIMCHI, ABARBANEL, EICHHORN, VON BOHLEN, and UMBREIT. Comp. NEUMANN, Commentar. S. 16 sqq. [HENDERSON: "The opinion that his father, Hilkiyah, was the high priest of that name who discovered the book of the law, can only have originated in the identity of name; for if that exalted official had been his father, he could not have failed to be designated by the appellative הַכֹּהֵן הַגָּדוֹל, the high priest, or at least הַכֹּהֵן, the priest, by way of eminence; whereas, he is merely spoken of as belonging to the priests who resided at Anathoth."—S. R. A.]

Anathoth, the birth-place of our prophet, is mentioned Josh. xxi. 28; 1 Kings ii. 26; Isa. x. 30; 1 Chron. vii. 60; Neh. ii. 32. In the Talmud the place is called אֲנָתוֹת in which we may perceive the transition to the present Anâta, which, according to ROBINSON (Bibl. Res. II. 109, comp. Zeitschr. f. d. K. d. Morgenl. II. S. 354 f.; TOBLER, Topog. II. S. 395; RITTER [Palestine, GAGE's Transl. IV. 217; STANLEY, Sinai and Pal., p. 212. THOMSON, The Land and the Book, II. 548.—S. R. A.]), is situated about three miles to the north-east of Jerusalem. This agrees pretty accurately with the statement of EUSEBIUS (Onomast. s. v.) and of JEROME (on i. 1; xi. 21; xxxii. 7), according to which Anathoth was three Roman miles, and of JOSEPHUS (Antiquities, X. 7, 3), according to which it was twenty Roman stadia distant from Jerusalem.

According to i. 6, Jeremiah was called to the prophetic office while still young, and according to i. 2; xxv. 3, in the thirteenth year of Josiah, therefore B. C. 627. This was the time in which Josiah had commenced his work of reformation (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3), and also that in which the overthrow of Syria by the united forces of the Medes and Babylonians was impending. Jeremiah thus appeared at a moment when the chief internal and external enemies of the theocracy, idolatry and Assyria, had been sensibly checked. Apparently excellent auspices for the success of his ministry! But it is noteworthy that in his book we do not find the trace of an allusion to these two circumstances. From xi. 21 it is probable that Jeremiah prophesied for a while in his native place, but afterwards we find him fixed in Jerusalem, where, in the temple (e. g., vii. 2; xxvi. 1 sq.), in the gates of the city (xvii. 19), in prison (xxxii. 2), in the king's house (xxii. 1; xxxvii. 17), and in other places (xviii. 1; xix. 1), by word, by writing (xxix. 1; xxxvi. 2), and by signs (xviii. 1; xix. 1; xxvii. 2), he proclaims the word of the Lord. The first twenty-two years of his ministry flow by without any special personal experiences, and the quaintness only of his life at that time is preserved in the earlier prophetic sections. The year 605-4 however forms a turning point in the prophet's career. This was the year of the battle of Carchemish and the succession of Nebuchadnezzar to the throne, two facts which involve a new epoch in history, the founding of the Babylonian universal monarchy, and its subjugation of the Jewish theocracy. Jeremiah had long before, even in the commencement of his labors (i. 13), prophesied evil to the theocracy from a people coming from the north, but he had not said that these people were the Chaldeans. It has been much debated what nation Jeremiah understood by these enemies to be expected from the north, and in recent times the view has been almost universal that they were the Scythians (see Comm. on i. 14), but it is plain that the prophet did not himself know the name of the enemies announced by him. If he knew, why should he not have named them? He names them first in that most important prophetic discourse (ch. xxv.), which may properly be regarded as central to, and presenting in outline, the whole of his prophecies. The highly important events of that year had manifestly given the external historical occasion to this extension of the prophet's vision. Although Nebuchadnezzar did not invade Judea till four years later, yet the facts of his victory over the Egyptians and his accession to the throne furnished to the prophet sufficient support for a prophetic programme, which he proposed for the next seventy years, and which ran thus: "Since ye, inhabitants of Jerusalem and Judea, to whom I have proclaimed the word of the Lord for twenty-three years from the thirteenth year of Josiah, would not hear, ye shall be given into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, and not ye only, but Egypt, Úz, the Philistines, the Phœnicians, Edom, Moab, Ammon, the Arabians, Elamites and Medes (xxv. 19-25). Resistance to this instrument of God will not avail, but lead to greater misery (xxvii. 8). Hence the only remedy for entire overthrow will be voluntary submission. Those who yield will at least be allowed to inhabit the land and cultivate it (xxvii. 11). For seventy years all these nations will serve the king of Babylon, but at the expiration of this period the king and the land of the Chaldeans will themselves be visited (xxv. 11 sq. with xxvii. 7; xxix. 11), and Israel will be freed from their dominion."

This is the great prophetic programme which Jeremiah proposed in the fourth year of Jehoiakim for the next seventy years; for it is evident that he reckons the seventy years from this epoch. Though he does not expressly say so, it is plain from this circumstance that from this moment he regards the supremacy of Nebuchadnezzar, with remarkable distinctness, as a fait accompli. Though it was not so outwardly, it was so according to the inner reality known only to the prophet. To him the victory at Carchemish seemed the principle, which, as the manifestation of a divine purpose, infallibly involved all the subsequent successes of that prince. Hence it was settled in his mind that from the moment of victory at Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar, if not de facto, yet de jure, and moreover de jure divino, was lord and ruler of all the nations mentioned in xxv. 11 sqq. (See the Comm. on xxv. 1-11).

In the same year Jeremiah received the command of the Lord to write out his prophecies, which is evidence that his prophetic labors were about to close. The twenty-fifth chapter and the chapters pertaining to it are the kernel and centre of his prophecies. Having reached this point, they were ripe and ready to be committed to writing, and at the same time a final assault was to be made on the hard hearts of the people by the powerful impression of all the discourses combined into a single whole (xxxvi. 3, 7). This object was attained with respect neither to the people nor their leaders. At this time indeed Jeremiah had many patrons among the princes, and the majority seem to have been well disposed toward him. For when, after hearing the great discourse (ch. vii.—x.), priests, prophets and people threatened Jeremiah with death, the princes brought the people over to their side, and took the prophet into their protection from the priests and prophets (xxvi. 8, 16). And when the existence of Jeremiah's writing was communicated to Jehoiakim, who, according to xxvi. 22, had, before this, caused the prophet Urijah to be brought from Egypt and executed, the princes instructed Jeremiah and Baruch to hide themselves, without doubt, on the correct presumption that the king would cause them to be apprehended. After reading the book, the king did indeed give the order for their apprehension, "but the Lord hid them" (xxxvi. 26). The writing and reading of the collected discourses passed over without the desired effect, though the destruction of the book produced a slight feeling of respectful awe in some of the princes. The catastrophe took place. Jehoiakim and Jehoiachin came to the miserable end predicted. Jeremiah's period of suffering began in the reign of the feeble Zedekiah. The princes who had taken him under their protection from the priests and prophets, now appear to be his bitterest enemies. They seem to have regarded his constant exhortation to submit to the Chaldeans as in the highest degree dangerous and treasonable (xxxviii. 4). DUNCKER (Gesch. d. Alterth. I. S. 831) is disposed to think that they were right. But he forgets that the Jews persevered in their opposition with impenitent, criminal and superstitious obstinacy (vii. 4), and that Jeremiah rebuked not their patriotism, but their ungodliness. Once indeed it seemed as though they would enter on the path of obedience to the commands of their God, when, in accordance with the law, they proclaimed the emancipation of the Hebrew slaves (xxxiv. 8). But their conscientiousness was only apparent: it was to subserve the interest of defence, and when, in consequence of the temporary withdrawal of the Chaldeans, this interest seemed less important, the emancipation was revoked. About this time Jeremiah was apprehended on a false pretext (xxxvii. 11), beaten and kept in close confinement until the city was taken. The king indeed was compelled repeatedly to seek counsel from the despised and hated prophet (xxxvii. 17; xxxviii. 11 sq.), but the weak monarch could accomplish nothing against the will of his nobles, who cherished the fiercest resentment toward the prophet who had humbled so severely their carnal disposition of pride and stubbornness. Since Jeremiah, even in prison, persisted in proclaiming the decree of the Lord that Jerusalem must be given up to its enemies, and that he only would escape with his life, who should surrender himself to the Chaldeans, they caused him to be thrown into a pit full of slime, from which he was rescued only through the intercession of a royal eunuch, Ebed-melech, the Cushite (xxxviii. 1-13). This was the lowest point in the personal sufferings of Jeremiah. How fearful they were, is evident from the representation of ch. xxxviii., which, though uncomplaining, is all the more eloquent from its silence. It is highly significant that it is just in this most terrible period of the prophet's life, and in the midst of the immediate preparation for the entire destruction of the theocracy, that we find the glorious prophecy of THE LORD OUR RIGHTEOUSNESS (ch. xxxiii.). In the deepest affliction the Lord here also bestows the highest consolation.

Finally, in the 11th year of Zedekiah Jerusalem was taken. There seems to be a double account of the fate of the prophet at this juncture. According to xxxix. 11-14, Jeremiah appears to have been liberated at Jerusalem, while according to xl. 1 sqq., he was first dragged in chains to Rama and then set at liberty. Yet the contradiction is only apparent, for if after he had been declared free by the commander he remained among the people (יִשְׁבַּח פְּרוֹךְ הַיָּם) xxxix. 14) he might in the confusion have been treated like the rest by the common soldiers. After his liberation Jeremiah betook himself to Mizpah, to Gedaliah, the governor appointed by Nebuchadnezzar (xl. 1-6), but the latter being soon after murdered, the people compelled the prophet to accompany them to Egypt, although he had most emphatically advised against their course, as displeasing to Jehovah (xli. 17; xliii. 7). The Jews settled first in Tahpanhes [a strong boundary-city on the Tanitic or Pelusian branch of the Nile. HEND.] Here and again in Pathros, ten years later, Egypt heard the voice of the prophet admonishing and rebuking his people (xliii. 8-13; xlv.). This is the last that we learn of Jeremiah from biblical sources. Further we have only traditions concerning him. Neither the time, place nor manner of his death is known. It may be inferred that he lived to a great age, from the fact that he was still alive about the year B. C. 570 (see § 1). It is a common assumption that at the time of his call in the thirteenth year of Josiah, he was twenty years old (i. 6, יַעַר), so that in 586, the year of the fall of Jerusalem, he was 61, and 16 years after was 77. But this calculation, resting on a mere assumption, is only problematic. With respect to the place and manner of his death, the tradition of the fathers, which has been adopted by the Romish church and fixed in the Martyrologium Romanum 1 May, is that he was stoned by the people at Tahpanhes (a populo lapidibus obrutus apud Taphnas occubuit, ibique sepultus est). Comp. TERTULLIAN Scorp. 8, coll. c. Marcion, 6, in which latter passage he says: "nulla morte virum constat neque exde percitum." Hieron. adv. Jovin 2, 37; EPIPHAN. περὶ τῶν προφητῶν, etc. Opp. II, pag. 239. According to another Jewish tradition, Nebuchadnezzar having subdued Egypt in the 27th year of his reign, took Jeremiah and Baruch with him to Babylon (Seder Olam Rabba, c. 26).

Greatly persecuted during his life-time, Jeremiah was as greatly honored by his fellow-countrymen after his death. It was natural that the prophecies relating to the captivity should become in an eminent degree the objects of reverence and study to the captive Jews. Comp. Dan. ix. 2; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21; Ezra i. 1. The destruction of the holy city and the captivity were themselves the most brilliant justification of the formerly despised and hated prophet. As it not rarely happens in such cases, a complete revolution gradually took place in the estimate of the prophet. His person was transfigured into a purely ideal character; multitudes of marvelous legends contributed to his glorification (2 Macc. ii. 1; xv. 12-16. Comp. HERZOG, Real-Enc. VII. S. 245) and to his countrymen he appeared so much the greatest of all the prophets that they called him ὁ προφήτης (in which sense also Deut. xviii. 15 was interpreted) and believed that he would return at the end of days. Allusions to this belief are found even in the New Testament, Matt. xvi. 14; John i. 21; coll. vi. 14; vii. 40. Comp. Wisd. xlix. 6-8.—CARPZOV, Introd. P. III. From this historical sketch it may be perceived under what difficult external conditions Jeremiah had to exercise his prophetic office. If we compare with these his mental constitution, the task appears still more arduous. By nature of a mild and timid disposition, more of a John than a Peter, a Baptist or an Elijah, he had yet to conduct a life and death struggle against powerful and embittered foes. The deep degradation of his people in the carnal lust of idolatry and their almost inconceivable presuming on the privileges of the chosen race, and the seemingly indestructible safeguard of the יהיה הַיְיָ! (vii. 4), and in consequence their stiff-necked refusal to obey the Lord's command to submit to the Chaldeans as the only means of escape—all this Jeremiah had to combat. And as though he did not suffer enough from the enmity of his own people he was also obliged to denounce, with threatening words and signs, the judgments of the Lord on foreign nations (chapters xxv., xxvii.; xlv. -li.). Thus on all sides arose fearful hatred and likewise fearful scorn of the prophet, who on his part was impelled by no other motive than a most hearty love for his people, which in the hour of his deepest affliction he never renounced (comp. viii. 21 sq.), on which account he is called in the second book of Maccabees, οὐλόδελως and πολλὰ προσευχόμενος περὶ τοῦ λαοῦ καὶ τῆς ἀγίας πόλεως (xv. 14), and by GREGORY NAZIANZ. (Orat. X.) συμπάθειστος τῶν προφητῶν. Comp. GHISSLER, Præf. Cap. 1. His life was exposed to constant danger, his honor to constant insult (xi. 21; xx. 7-10; xxxviii. 4; Lam. iii. 14). Like a second Job he curses the day of his birth (xx. 15), and longs to be free from the office, which he accepted only with fear and trembling (xx. 9*). But the consciousness of his vocation leaves him no rest. "But it was in my heart as a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing and I could not." Comp. HERZOG, (Real-Enc. XVII. S. 628, 634). But the Lord's strength was mighty in his weakness. "For behold I have made thee this day a fenced city and an iron pillar and brazen walls against the whole land" (i. 18). He needed this the more since he was deprived of all human aid. He had not even a fellow-prophet to stand by him, at least not in the time of his greatest distress. For of the prophets contemporary with him, Zephaniah and the prophetess Huldah (2 Kings xxii. 14; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22) lived in the reign of Josiah, Habakkuk and Urijah (xxvi. 20) in the reign of Jehoiakim, that is, in the first and calmer period of his ministry. Ezekiel and Daniel indeed survived with him the great catastrophe, but they lived at a distance, themselves already in exile. Jeremiah could derive no support from them.

It has been correctly inferred from xvi. 2 that our prophet was unmarried, and his virginitas has therefore been extolled, especially by JEROME, in his Præfatio and Comm. on chap. xxiii. We read that here and there among the people, and in earlier times among the princes (xxvi. 16, 24; xxxvi. 19), a favorable disposition towards him was manifested; even King Zedekiah was secretly inclined to favor him, and besides these he may have had many friends, as Baruch (chap. xlv.) and his brother, Seraiah (li. 59), the royal eunuch, Ebedmelech (xxxviii. 7 sq.), and Ahikam, the son of Shaphan, with his son Gedaliah (xxvi. 24; xxxix. 14; xl. 5), but what were these to the hostility with which he was persecuted by the great mass of the proud princes, prophets, priests, and the people led by them! We see Jeremiah standing alone in the midst of that great catastrophe which forms the lowest point in the history of the Old Testament theocracy and resisting the attacks of ungodly power, not in the strength of natural ability, but wholly in the strength of Him who had chosen him, against his will, to the prophetic office. We behold here "the servant of God," as represented in the sphere of a prophet's personality, on the highest stage of his Old Testament history. He was the type, not of John the Baptist (as HENGSTENBERG, Christol. Eng. Tr. II., p. 362), but of Christ, the Lord, Himself. I do not mean this in the sense of the older theologians (comp. NEUM. S. 28, etc., and GHISSLER, cap. 1. etc., "Jerem. Christum præfiguravit vitæ puritate, innocentia, sanctitate, wrunnarum perpeissione.

consignatione doctrinæ suæ per proprii sanguinis effusionem") for the points of resemblance which they trace are not specific, but in the sense that Jeremiah and Christ stand at two corresponding epochs in history, as their divine witnesses and heralds, their inner resemblance being also manifested outwardly, as when (xi. 19) Jeremiah calls himself a sheep brought to the slaughter, when he weeps over Jerusalem (xi. 1; xiii. 17; xiv. 17), and when again our Lord, at the crowning point of His life, utters the opening words of Psalm xxii., the composition of which by Jeremiah is opposed by nothing but the superscription. § 3. THE LITERARY CHARACTER OF JEREMIAH.

The peculiarities of his person and official work are fully reflected in the literary character of our prophet. Jeremiah as an author is like a brazen wall, and at the same time like soft wax. Brazen, since no power on earth could induce him to alter the tenor of his proclamation; but soft, in that we feel that a man of gentle disposition and broken heart has given utterance to these powerful words. His style is wanting in the noble, bold conciseness and concentration which we so much admire in the older prophets, Isaiah and Hosea. His periods are long, the development verbose. Even when he quotes the language of others, he does it in such a way that it is robbed of all that is harsh or incisive, and moulded over, as it were, into a milder form. "Sæpius complura epitheta adduntur et difficiliora vel audaciora aut fusiùs explicantur aut formis ætate Jeremiæ usitatioribus receptis in speciem levioerem abeunt," says KUEPER (Jer. libr. ss. interpr., p. xiv.). The same peculiarity is displayed in the prophet's logic. While he maintains his fundamental thoughts with such undeviating monotony that the contents of his discourses seem almost meagre, yet on the other hand there is such luxuriance in the development that the unity and the consecutiveness of the thoughts seem to suffer. For one is not deduced logically from another, but we see, as it were, a series of tableaux pass before us, of which each presents the same stage and the same persons, but in the most various groupings (see my work Der Proph. Jer. u. Bab. S. 32, etc.). This peculiarity of his logic refutes the objection which has been made and constantly repeated, that Jeremiah springs analogically from one thing to another ("non ad certum quendam ordinem res dispositæ sunt et descriptæ, sed libere ab una sententia transitur ad alteram," MAUBER). The transitions are frequently abrupt, but there is still a logical progression, and the repetitions are a necessary feature of the tableauxque style. There is, however, another kind of repetition very frequent in Jeremiah:—he not only quotes himself very often (there is a table of these self-quotations in my work, S. 128, etc.), but he likes also to introduce the sayings of others. Jeremiah is especially at home in the Pentateuch, and most of all in Deuteronomy. (Comp. KUEPER, ut supra, and KÖNIG, Alltest. Studien 2 Theil: das Deuteronomium u. d. Prophet Jeremia). It is on account of this reproduction of the thoughts of others that he has been reproached with a want of originality (see KNOBEL, Prophetismus der Hebræer II., S. 367). But this is as true as that he was deficient in poetry. In power he is certainly not equal to Isaiah. But he is not wanting in originality, for who could say that he has himself produced nothing or only an insignificant amount? To lose himself in his predecessors is necessary even for the most original author. As to a deficiency in poetry I point to UMBREIT, who says (Prakt. Comm. S. XV.): "The most spiritual and therefore the greatest poet of the desert and of suffering is certainly Jeremiah. But we have maintained yet more than this, having boldly asserted that of all the prophets his genius is the most poetical." I fully subscribe to this judgment. For assuredly universal sympathy and deep and pure emotion are the qualities of a poet, and we undoubtedly find these elements of poetic inspiration, in the highest degree, in the finely-strung nature of Jeremiah. The circumstances of his life caused his emotions to be predominantly sad, hence in the whole range of human composition there is scarcely a poetical expression of sorrow so thrilling as that of this prophet (viii. 23, Eng. Bib. ix. 1): "O that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people." UMBREIT remarks (S. XIV., etc.) that these words form the portrait of the prophet, and BENDEMANN, in painting his celebrated picture, seems really to have had this passage especially in view.

It cannot be denied that, in form, Jeremiah, though not discarding art altogether, has far less polish than ISAIAH. JEROME refers to this in his Præfatio: "Jeremias propheta sermone quidem apud Hebræos Isaia et Hosia et quibusdam aliis prophetis videtur esse rusticior. Sed sensibus par est, quippe qui eodem spiritu prophetaverit. Porro simplicitas eloqui a loco ei, in quo natus est, accidit. Fuit enim Anatotites." This charge of rusticity has, however, been exaggerated. Let us also regard the counter-testimony in the word "sensibus par est," and which is given still more strongly in expressions like that of SIXTUS SENENSIS (in GUISLER. Cap. III., etc.), "sermone quidem inculto et pæne subrustico, sed sensuum majestati sublimo"—and of CUNÆUS (De rep. Hebr. III. 7), "Jeremias omnis majestas posita in verborum neglectu est, adeo illum decet rustica dictio." Finally, in respect to language, it may be remarked that the influence of the Aramaic idiom on Jeremiah may be detected, but not in the degree usually supposed. § 4. THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET.

1. Concerning its origin, the book itself gives us some, but not complete, information. According to xxxvi. 2, Jeremiah, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, dictated to Baruch the discourses which had then been delivered. In the fifth year of Jehoiakim (xxxvi. 9) the writing was finished and publicly read. Jehoiakim burned it, upon which the prophet was commanded to re-write it, and this time it was severer than before. This writing consisted of prophecies which had been spoken in denunciation and threatening against Israel. Historical and consolatory passages, with prophecies against foreign nations, were excluded. This is clear both from the object of the writing (comp. Comm. on xxxvi. 7) and the fate to which Jehoiakim consigned it (xxxvi. 23). When the second transcription was finished, we are not informed, but it is evident from i. 3, "It came [the word of the Lord to Jeremiah] unto the end of the eleventh year of Zedekiah, unto the carrying away of Jerusalem captive in the fifth month," that it was after the destruction of the city and the deportation of the people. For the superscription, i. 1-3, is suitable only for a writing which contains nothing of later date than the period mentioned. But the book does contain prophecies relating to the time subsequent to this epoch, which even pertain to the residence of the prophet in Egypt toward the close of his life. If now it is possible that Jeremiah, during the two months that he spent with Gedaliah in Mizpah (comp. on i. 2 sq.), or perhaps still better (on account of the allusions to the journey to Egypt in ii. 16, 36), on the way to Egypt, or in Egypt itself, continued the writing begun in the fourth year of Jehoiakim to the time mentioned in i. 3, and concluded it, it follows that this writing forms the main body of the book, written and edited by the prophet himself, to which the superscription, i. 1-3, refers. The subsequent portions of the book, though the genuine production of Jeremiah, were added by a later editor, who did not venture to alter the original title, though it was no longer suitable.

Thus it is evident, as it seems to me, that the present form and arrangement are not those of Jeremiah, for he would certainly have given the whole a title corresponding to its contents. Some other circumstances, to be mentioned hereafter, also favor this view.

2. As to the arrangement or plan of the book, as we have it, it has been accused of endless confusion,* and the most various theories have been broached to account for this confusion. Compare, to name only the most eminent, EICHHORN, in the Repert. für biblische u. morgenl. Lit. Th. 1, S. 141; Einkl. III. S. 157, etc.; BERTHOLDT, Einkl. IV. S. 1457; MOYERS, De utriusque recensionis vatic. Jer. indole et origine. Hamb., 1837; HITZIG, Comm., S. XII. ff.; then the attempts of EWALD, UMBREIT (in their commentaries), HÆVERNICK (Einkl. II. 2, S. 206 ff.), KEIL (who follows HÆVERNICK almost entirely, Einkl., S. 252 ff.), SCHMIEDER (in GERLACH'S Bibelwerk), STAHELIN (on the principle at the basis of the arrangement of Jeremiah's prophecies, in the Zeitschr. der deutsch morgenl. Gesellsch., 1849; Heft 2 and 3, S. 216 ff.; and in his Spez. Einl. in die kan. Bücher des A. T., 1862, S. 260 ff.); NEUMANN (Comm. S. 81 ff. and S. III. ff.). In my opinion, the case is not so bad as represented, but a reasonable arrangement will at once present itself, if we only take the following points into consideration. 1. In general, the principle of chronological order is followed, but admitting, in some cases, a certain order of subjects, which is sometimes suggested by external occasions (comp. ch. xxi. 1-7). 2. With respect to the chronological order in particular, we have a safe guide in the fact that before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, viz., before the battle of Carchemish and Nebuchadnezzar's accession to the throne, Jeremiah never mentions the latter or the Chaldeans, while after this time he presents them constantly in all his discourses as appointed by God to be the instrument of His judgments on Israel and the nations. Until shortly before the battle of Carchemish, Assyria was at war with the Medes and Babylonians, and it was undecided which of the three would obtain the supremacy. After the fall of Nineveh and the defeat of Pharaoh Necho, the star of Nebuchadnezzar rose above the horizon like an all-prevailing sun. Jeremiah now knew definitely that the people coming from the North (i. 13, etc.) were the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar, and he could no longer speak to the people without counselling submission as the only means of safety. I think, then, that I may lay down this canon distinctly, that all parts of the book in which the threatening enemies are spoken of generally, without mention of Nebuchadnezzar or the Chaldeans, belong to the period before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, viz., before the time represented in ch. xxv. as that of Jeremiah's first acquaintance with them; while all the portions in which Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans are named belong to the subsequent period; so that a passage which mentions the Chaldeans and is yet dated in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim (ch. xxvii.), may be safely regarded as bearing a false superscription, as likewise one that is dated in the reign of Zedekiah, and does not mention the Chaldeans (xlix. 34 sqq.). In the first place, it is quite clear that our Hebrew recension, omitting chapters i. and lii. as introduction and conclusion, falls into two principal divisions: 1. The portions relating to the theocracy (ch. ii.—xlv.). 2. The prophecies against the nations (ch. xlvi.—li.). Chapter xlv., the promise given to the writer of the book, the faithful Baruch, is to be regarded (as it is by KEIL) as an appendix to the first division. To attach this chapter to the second division, as HAEVERNICK does, is entirely unsuitable. The first division may evidently be divided again into two subdivisions, the collection of discourses, with appendices, ch. ii.—xxxv., and the historical portions, ch. xxxvi.—xliv. In speaking of a collection of discourses, it should be remarked that, according to the intention of the arranger of the book, we must not always understand by a discourse one which forms a rhetorical unit, but also a complexus of rhetorical and historical passages, if in its fundamental thought, its form or its chronology, it presents a connected whole. In this sense our collection contains eleven (or ten) discourses, the beginning of each of which is designated by a superscription (comp. iii. 6; vii. 1; xi. 1, etc.). The first two pertain to the reign of Josiah (ch. ii. and iii.—vi.). It is natural that in the earliest period the proportionally smallest amount of matter should be committed to writing, so that in the passages mentioned, especially in ch. ii., only the quintessence of the discourses of the earliest period is given. The third discourse pertains to the reign of Jehoiakim (ch. vii.—x.). These two, ch. iii.—vi. and ch. vii.—x., are distinguished from the rest by their length, and may therefore, with ch. xxv., which is inferior in length, but far superior in importance, be designated as the principal discourses. Ch. xi.—xiii., which also pertain to the reign of Jehoiakim, have a common title, but only ch. xi. and xii. form a rhetorical whole. For ch. xiii. is entirely independent, though of the same date with the preceding, and on account of its brevity, added as an appendix. The fifth discourse, though somewhat inferior to the second and third, is still one of the most important. It belongs to the period before the fourth year of Jehoiakim. The passage xvii. 19-27 is related to the fifth discourse as ch. xiii. to the fourth. I regret that by an oversight I have not designated them in the same way in the text. The seventh discourse is an account of two symbolical occurrences, to which is appended that of a personal experience and the outburst of feeling thus occasioned. Although these occurrences belong to different periods, before and after the fourth year of Jehoiakim, they are brought together because both symbols are derived from pottery and on account of the unity of the subjects. All is here brought into connection which the prophet spoke at different times against the false shepherds of the people (kings and prophets). The opening passage (xxi. 1-7) though in general, as oratio contra regem, not altogether unsuitable for this place, is doubtless placed here chiefly on account of the name Pashur, which it has in common with the preceding. The transitional words (xxi. 11-14) seem also to be a fragment which is subjoined here not altogether appropriately. But in what follows we have a well-ordered series of denunciations against the evil kings of Judah. The first, in which no name is mentioned, seems to stand first as a collective admonition, though the king addressed in ver. 2 can be no other than Jehoiakim (xxii. 1-9). The second is a prophecy relating to the person of Jehoahaz. It is of earlier date than that which precedes it, and is evidently an interpolation (xxii. 10-12). The third is directed against Jehoiakim by name (xxii. 13-23). The fourth relates to Jehoiachin (xxii. 24-30). As a foil to these dark pictures of the kings of the present, the prophet, by an antithesis reminding us of ch. iii., gives us a bright picture of the King of the Messianic future (xxiii. 1-8). The second part of the main discourse (xxiii. 9-10) is an earnest rebuke of the false prophets. The conclusion is formed by ch. xxiv., a vision which the prophet had in the reign of Zedekiah, and which is added here evidently in order that the fourth bad king Jeremiah had lived to see might not fail to receive his appropriate denunciation. The ninth discourse is that highly important one which Jeremiah pronounced in the fourth year of Jehoiakim after the great catastrophe which made an epoch in the prophet's ministry, the battle of Carchemish and the succession of Nebuchadnezzar. To this are attached a series of three historical appendices, of which the first falls before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the second in the fourth year of Zedekiah, the third somewhat earlier than the preceding. All three appendices, however, relate to the conflict of the true prophet (it should be noted, however, that Jeremiah is called נִבְיָא for the first time in xxv. 2) with the false prophets. Here also is a pre-arranged antithesis. Ch. xxvi. standing before ch. xxvii. and xxviii. has a clear chronological basis, while ch. xxix., which in time is somewhat earlier than ch. xxvii. and xxviii. coming after them, has a topical basis, since thus the prophet's conflict with the false prophets at home is first shown, and then his conflict with those at a distance. The tenth passage occupies an independent כְּסֵפֶר, viz., the book of consolation, which consists of two discourses, with a double appendix. Ch. xxx. and xxxi., originally written specially, and not as a part of the first writing, ch. xxxvi. 2-10, form a rhetorical unit, certainly contemporary with ch. iii.—vi., and therefore pertaining to the reign of Josiah. The second consolatory discourse consists of two separate passages, which, however, are most closely connected. The first relates to the purchase of a field which, at the command of the Lord, Jeremiah made while confined in the court of the prison, at the time of his greatest affliction. The second is connected with the demolition of many houses in Jerusalem for defensive purposes. On this double, gloomy background the prophet presents the most glorious Messianic salvation. It is not, as I have already said, a connected discourse; in ch. xxxii. we have first the account of the purchase of land, then the prayer expressing the prophet's astonishment, then the Lord's consolatory promises. Ch. xxxiii. is, however, from beginning to end, a connected prophetic discourse.

* Even LUTHER (Preface to the prophet Jeremiah) says: "We often find some of the first part in the following chapter, which happened before that in the previous chapter, which looks as though Jeremiah did not arrange these books himself, but that they were composed piecemeal from his discourses, and compiled in a book. We must not trouble ourselves about the order, or allow the want of order to hinder us."

This book of consolation is followed in chaps. xxxiv. and xxxv. by a double appendix, the second half of which (xxxiv. 8—xxxv. 19) itself consists of two independent parts. The short passage xxxiv. 1-7 is only a more exact account of the occurrence narrated in xxxii. 1-5, in consequence of which Jeremiah was confined in the court of the prison, and therefore refers only to the contents of chaps. xxxii. and xxxiii. The two facts however which are related in xxxiv. 8-22, and xxxv. 1-19, are to be regarded as an appendix to the whole collection. For they show by a striking example, the accomplished but immediately revoked emancipation of the Hebrew slaves, how entirely indisposed the people of Israel were to obey the commands of their God, while a contrast to this shameful disobedience is given in the example of affecting obedience afforded by the Rechabites to the command of their earthly progenitor. We thus see that the arrangement is by no means without plan, and may in general have been made by the prophet himself. Only the mere juxtaposition of xxi. 1-7 for the sake of the name Pashur, and the insertion of the heterogeneous passage xxi. 11-14 in this place, seem to betray a different hand.

With chap. xxxvi. begins the second subdivision of the first main division. Historical passages follow each other in chronological order, which have for their subject partly personal experiences of the prophet, and partly the history of the fatal catastrophe of the theocracy in general. There is no difficulty here. Chap. xlv., as already remarked, is an appendix to the first main division. The second part contains the prophecies against foreign nations in an order to which there is nothing to object (xlvi.—li.). Chap. lii. finally forms the conclusion, which is not from the prophet himself.

IV. CONCLUSION, CHAP. LII.

3. The relation of the Masoretic text to the Alexandrian translation. It may here be premised that Jeremiah, closing his labors and probably his life in Egypt, was on this account especially honored by the Jews residing there. They regarded him as peculiarly their own, the Egyptian prophet. (Comp. Chron. Pasch. p. 156; FABRICIUS, in the Cod. pseudepigr. V. T. p.

1108; Apoc. N. T. p. 1111; HÆVERNICK, Einl. I. 1, S. 45, II. 2, S. 259; HERZOG, Real-Enc. VII. S. 255.) He was therefore diligently studied, and it is not improbable, as FABRICIUS says: "Codices græcæ versionis jam privata quorundam Apocryphis se delectantium studio interpolati, jam librorum oscitantia manci fraudi beato Martyri fuerunt." The difference between our Masoretic text and the Alexandrian version is twofold—in matter and in form. The former extends through the whole book, and consists of innumerable discrepancies, which sometimes affect single letters, syllables and words, sometimes whole verses. The difference in form consists in a different arrangement from xxv. 15 onwards, the LXX. introducing here (but in a different sequence) the prophecies against the nations, so that all in the Hebrew text from xxv. 15 to ch. xlv. is deferred to make room for these prophecies, and since in the LXX. these extend from xxv. 15 to ch. xxxi. it follows that what in the Hebrew is from xxv. 15 to ch. xlv. is in the Greek ch. xxxi.—li. It should be remarked that the LXX. does not treat ch. xlv. of the Hebrew as an independent chapter, but as part of ch. li.—vers. 31-35. The following little table will exhibit the discrepancies more clearly:

LXX.		Masor.

xxvi.	" " Egypt,	xlvi.
xxvii. 28.	" " Babylon,	l.—li.

lii.	lii.

I was formerly of opinion that these two kinds of difference were to be judged alike, and were to be traced, not to a divergence of Hebrew MSS., but entirely to the ignorance, carelessness or caprice of the editor. I have now changed my view in so far that I am convinced that the case is not the same with the difference in form as with that in matter. The different order is certainly founded on a divergence in the Hebrew originals. If we had no other testimony to this than the text of the LXX., so far as this is the conscious and intended production of its author, this testimony would certainly be worthless. But in the first place, the Hebrew text is itself a witness, and secondly, we have in the LXX. an involuntary and impartial testimony. I believe that in the Comm. on xxv. 12-14; xxvii. 1; xlix. 34, and in the introduction to the prophecies against the nations, I have furnished proof that these verses (xxv. 12-14) presuppose the existence in their immediate vicinity of the עַל הַגּוֹיִם כִּכְרָר or rather that ch. xxv. belongs to this ספר. I think I have shown that the peculiar expression τὰ Αἰζάου at the close of xxv. 13 (LXX.), and the absence of xxvii. 1 in the LXX., with the strange chronology of xlix. 34, are evidence that the prophecies against the nations must at one time have had their place immediately after ch. xxv. and before ch. xxvii. This τὰ Αἰζάου shows that the superscription of the prophecies against Elam originally read like the rest, xlvi. 2; xlviii. 1; xlix. 1, 7, 23, 28, לְעֵילָם. The peculiar postscript to the prophecy in the LXX., however, which is no other than the missing verse xxvii. 1, proves that the Alexandrian translator had an original text before him in which the prophecies against the nations stood before ch. xxvii, and in such wise that the prophecy against Elam was the last, as at present in the Masoretic text. But how is it that the present Masoretic text of the prophecies against Elam no longer bears the old simple inscription לְעֵילָם but likewise the words transposed from xxvii. 1? I believe that it can be explained only in this way—that two originals were before the Alexandrian translator, of which one had the prophecies against the nations in the old place; the other agreed with the present Masoretic recension. The translator must have been guided by both. He adhered to the older recension so far as to retain its arrangement on the whole (altering only the sequence of the prophecies against the nations in detail). From this he adopted the position of ch. xxvii. ver. 1 immediately after the prophecy against Elam, while from the later text he took the περὶ Αιζάμ (𐤀𐤋𐤁𐤏𐤁𐤏𐤁𐤏 Hebr.). The misplacement of the prophecies against the nations must therefore have taken place before the preparation of the Alexandrian version. Its originator must have first overlooked xxvii. 1, and then altered it into an inscription for the prophecy against Elam, and he must also have put ch. xxvi. in its present place. Since in the LXX. the superscription of ch. xxvii. is still wanting, it is possible, nay, probable, that it was wanting in the later Hebrew copy of the translator. The present verse, xxvii. 1, of the Hebrew text, with the wrong name of Jehoiakim, would then be a later supplement. On the occasion of this error, comp. remarks on xxvii. 1.

As to the difference in matter between the Alexandrian version and the Hebrew text, I still retain the conviction which I expressed in my work, Der proph. Jer. u. Bab., and in HERZOG, Real-Enc. VI. S. 488, that the far greater part of the discrepancies are to be explained, not by a difference in the original text, but by the caprice, ignorance or carelessness of the translator. Proof of this in detail may be seen in the earlier editions of DE WETTE'S Introduction, in KUEPER, Jer. libr. ss. interpr. atque vindex, p. 177; in HÆVERNICK, Einl. II. 2, S. 250; in WICHELHAUS, De Jeremiæ versione Alexandrina, 1847, p. 67; in my work, Jer. u. Bab. S. 86; but especially in GRAF. (Commentar. S. XL. sqq.), who, as it seems to me, by a thoroughly impartial and careful investigation, has brought the matter to a conclusion. The arguments in favor of the LXX. still adduced in the later edition of BLEEK'S Einleitung (1865, S. 491) possess no validity.

4. The integrity of the text has been relatively but little questioned. With respect to some passages, I have been unable to avoid the suspicion of an interpolation. The chief of these are the following: x. 1-16; xv. 11-14; xxv. 12-14; xxx. 23, 24; xxxix. 1-14; li. 15-19. Ch. lii. even according to the editor, is not to be regarded as written by Jeremiah, as follows from the statement in li. 64, "Thus far the words of Jeremiah." I formerly regarded the passage l. 43-46 as also interpolated, but, on closer examination, am convinced of the erroneousness of this view. In reference to other passages (especially ch. xxx.—xxxiii. 1. li.), on renewed investigation, I am perfectly satisfied of their authenticity. Though Jeremiah was one of the most read of the prophets, his text has been handed down to us, on the whole, pure and unadulterated.

5. The book of Jeremiah occupies in the Canon the second place among the major prophets, after Isaiah and before Ezekiel. This position, being the historical one, is the most natural. MELITO, of Sardis, and ORIGEN (in EUSEB, Hist. Eccl. IV. 26 and VI. 25) in their lists of the Jewish canon make Jeremiah follow Isaiah, though between Jeremiah and Ezekiel the former inserts the twelve minor prophets and Daniel, the latter (omitting the twelve minor prophets altogether) only Daniel. But according to the Talmud, (Tractate Baba batra Føl. 14, b) the order was:—Regum libri, Jeremias, Ezechiel, Jesajas, duodecim prophetarum volumen. And ELIAS LEVITA (in Masoret hammasoret Pref. III.) testifies that this is the order in the German and French MSS. This Talmudic divergence from the natural order appears to have a genuine Talmudic reason. Since Jeremiah treats only of desolatio, Ezekiel first of desolatio and then of consolatio, Isaiah only of consolatio, they wished, as the tract Baba batra informs us, to connect desolationem cum desolatione and consolationem cum consolatione. For further particulars see ROSENUELLER, Schol. Proleg. in Jerem. p. 27; HERZOG, Real-Enc. VII. S. 253; NEUMANN, Comm. Einl. S. 10; DELITZSCH, Comm. zu Jes. S. XXII.

§ 5. LITERATURE.

Of the church-fathers THEODORET and EPHREM SYRUS wrote complete commentaries on Jeremiah. A commentary by the latter in Syriac is still extant (Tom. II. of the Roman Edition of PETRUS BENEDICTUS, 1740). JEROME commented on the first thirty-three chapters only. From ORIGEN we have only homilies. The edition of LOMMATZSCH gives nineteen in Greek, two in the Latin translation of JEROME and some fragments. According to CASSIODORUS (Lib. Inst. Div. cap. III.) there were forty-five homilies, which were also known to RIABANUS MAURUS (according to a passage in his Prefat. in Jerem.). Comp. LOMMATZSCH, Prolegg. in Tom.

XV., of his edition. GHISLERUS gives a catena of the Greek and Latin fathers in his commentary, of which hereafter.

Of Rabbinical commentaries the principal are those of RASCHI, DAVID KIMCHI, ABARBANEL and SOLOMON BEN MELECH.

There are Roman Catholic commentaries by RHABANUS MAURUS, RUPERT VON DEUTZ, THOMAS AQUINAS, ALBERTUS MAGNUS; by JOACHIM FLORIS, Comm. in Jer., Venice, 1525, and Cologne, 1577 (comp. GIESELER, [Church History, Philada. Ed. II., p. 300], etc., etc., and NEANDER, [Boston, Tr. IV. p. 291]); FRANC. ZICHEMIUS, Cologne, 1559; HECTOR PINTUS, Leyden, 1561, 1584 and 1590; ANDREAS CAPELLA, Tarracona, 1586; PETRUS FIGUEIRO, Leyden, 1598; CHRISTOF. DE CASTRO (Jesuit), Paris, 1609; CASP. SANCTIUS (Jesuit), Leyden, 1613; BENED. MANDINA, In pr. Jer. expositiones, Neap., 1620; MICHAEL GHISLERUS, In Jer. Commentarii cum catena PP. græcorum et comm. in Lamentl. et Baruch, Leyden, 1623. (This is the most complete commentary, and the most distinguished for patristic learning, that we have on Jeremiah, but heavy and with a Romish bias; comp. FABRIC., Biblioth. gr. ed. Harl. III., p. 734).

By Protestant theologians we have the following commentaries:—ZWINGLI, Complanatio Jeremiæ, Zürich, 1531, etc; MART. BUCER, Complanationes Jer. proph., Zurich, 1531; OECOLAMPADIUS, In Jeremiam proph. comment. libri tres, Strasburg, 1533; BUGENHAGEN, Annotationes in Jerem., Wittenberg, 1546; CALVIN, Prælectiones in Jerem., Geneva, 1563, etc. (notes, of lectures); VICTORIN STRIGEL, Conciones Jeremiæ proph. ad ebr. veritatem recognitæ, etc. Leipzig, 1566; LUCAS OSIANDER, *Jes. T., 1865; [MAURICE, The Prophets and Kings of the Old Testament, Cambridge, 1863; and the commentaries of T. SCOTT and MATTHEW HENRY.—S. R. A.]

I may also mention the peculiar, long-vanished Literature of a branch of the theologia prophetica, which set itself to the task of proving the Locos Communes of dogmatic theology by the prophets. This was done either by naming the locos contained in each passage, at the close of it (thus SEB. SCHMIDT, in his commentary, at the close of each chapter, evolves two locos from almost every verse); or by arranging the prophetic utterances according to the scheme of the dogmatic loci. Thus ex. gr. PHILIP HAILBRUNNER (Prof. in Lauingen) in his work, "Jer. proph. monumenta in locos communes theologicos digesta," Lauingen, 1586, enumerates 28 locos, comprising under each the appropriate passages from the prophet in a Latin translation. The same course is taken by JOH. HEINRICH MAJUS, Prof. in Giessen, who, besides a Theologia prophetica ex selectionibus V. T. oraculis secundum seriem locorum theolog. dispositis, Frankfurt, a. M. 1710, edited a similarly composed Theologia Davidis, Theologia Jesajana and Theologia Jeremiana (the complete title is: Theol. Jeremiana ex Jeremix vaticiniis et lamentationibus juxta articulos fidei ordine per theses collecta, Disput. Resp. Bened. Henr. Thering., Giessen, 1703).

PROPHET JEREMIAH.

1. THE INTRODUCTION.

CHAPTER I.

I. 1-3.*

1 The words of Jeremiah, the son of Hilkiah, [one] of the priests that were [LXX.,
2 dwelt] in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin, To whom the word of the Lord [Jehovah] came [was communicated]¹ in the days of Josiah, the son of Amon, 3 king of Judah, in the thirteenth year of his reign. It came also in the days of Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, unto the end of the eleventh year of Zedekiah, the son of Josiah, king of Judah, unto the carrying away of Jerusalem captive in the fifth month.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

*[The text of the common English Version will be retained in the prose portions of the book, with occasional corrections, included in brackets; but a new rendering of the poetical portions will be given, founded on a comparison of the German and English Versions with the Hebrew.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. The words of Jeremiah . . . Benjamin. We find a similar commencement in the prophetic book of Amos (i. 1) and in the Song of Solomon (i. 1). Etymologically וְיִרְמְיָהּ might certainly be rendered historia Jeremie (DE WETTE), compare וְיִרְמְיָהּ so frequent in the book of Kings (1 Kings xi. 41; xiv. 19, 29, etc.). Since, however, this book is not historic, but prophetic, since the prophet's work consisted essentially in preaching, since the other prophetic books bear inscriptions denoting discourses (וְכִסְיָא דְבַר) or visions (וְחִזְיוֹן), and since finally the historical narratives contained in the book are also the words of Jeremiah (so STARKE, adh. l.), it is more correct to take וְיִרְמְיָהּ in the sense of "words," which it certainly has in Song of Sol. i. 1. Concerning the name, origin and birth-place of the prophet, see the Introduction. Besides Jeremiah (and Nathan, 1 Kings iv. 5, Vide THOLUEK, Die Proph. und ihre Weiss. S. 20, u. 32), the prophet Ezekiel (i. 3; comp. Jos. Ant. X. 5, 1), and most probably Zechariah (i. 1; comp. KÖHLER, Sacharja, S. 9), were of sacerdotal origin. No special traces of his priestly descent are found in the book of our prophet, unless we reckon as such his accurate knowledge of the Law, especially Deuteronomy, of which the exposition will furnish proofs in great number.

Vers. 2 and 3. To whom . . . in the fifth month. The subject of came in ver. 3 is word of Jehovah, repeated from ver. 2. CHN. B. MITCHÆLIS falsely renders in the Halleische Bibel: idemque etiam fuit propheta. As regards the chronological statements in vers. 2 and 3, it should first be noticed that the two kings Jehoahaz and Jehoiakim are passed over, without doubt because each of them reigned only three months. Since Jeremiah labored from the thirteenth year of Josiah, consequently eighteen years under Josiah, and eleven years each under Jehoiakim and Zedekiah, he ministered altogether, including the six months under the two kings omitted, forty years in the midst of the theocracy. How long afterwards he labored, cannot be ascertained with any certainty. Comp. Introduction and remarks on xlv. 29. Since the book, as we have it, contains not only those words of Jehovah which were communicated to the prophet before the fifth month of the eleventh year of Zedekiah, but others of later date (ch. xl.—xlv.), this inscription does not comport with its present extent. According to xxxvi. 32, in place of the writing destroyed by Zedekiah, Jeremiah prepared another, which was twice as large as the first. When he completed the second roll, we are not told. After the destruction of Jerusalem in the fifth month of the eleventh year of Zedekiah, Jeremiah remained more than two months longer in the country (comp. xli. 1; xlii. 7). During this time, or perhaps after his arrival in Egypt (comp. rems. on ii. 13, 36), he may have continued his writing till the time mentioned, and provided it with the present inscription, vers. 1-3. Comp. EWALD, Die Propheten des A. B. II. S. 15. We have the contents of this writing in our present book, though not in the same order. On this point see the Introduction.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

ORIGEN, in his first homily on Jeremiah, regards the chronological statements of the inscription as a proof of the long-suffering of God. He says, § 3, "God had pronounced judgment against Jerusalem for its sins, and it was condemned to captivity. But as the time approaches, the compassionate God sends this prophet under the third king before the captivity. For the long-suffering God wished to grant them a respite, and Jeremiah was to prophesy, so to speak, the day before the captivity, as a preacher of repentance, in order that the cause of the captivity might be removed." ["Dr. LIGHTFOOT observes that as Moses was so long with the people as a teacher in the wilderness, till they entered into their own land, Jeremiah was so long to their own land a teacher before they went into the wilderness of the heathen." M. HENRY.—S. R. A.]

2. The Call of the Prophet by Word and Vision (i. 4-19).

a. His choice, call and aggressive destination.

CHAP. I. 4-10.

4, 5 Then the word of the Lord [Jehovah] came unto me,¹ saying, Before I formed thee in the belly² I knew thee; and before thou camest forth out of the womb I sanctified [separated] thee, and I ordained thee a prophet unto the nations. 6 Then said I [But I said], Ah,³ Lord God! [Jehovah] behold, I cannot speak: for 7 I am a child. But the Lord [Jehovah] said unto me, Say not, I am a child: for thou shalt go to⁴ all that [wherever] I shall send thee, and whatsoever I command 8 thee thou shalt speak. Be not afraid of their faces: for I am with thee to deliver 9 thee, saith the Lord [Jehovah]. Then the Lord [Jehovah] put forth his hand 10 and touched my mouth. And the Lord [Jehovah] said unto me, Behold, I have put my words into thy mouth. See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out and to pull down [extirpate and exterminate] and to destroy and to throw down, to build and to plant.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—Cod. 1092, DE ROSSI, Cod. D. Mosc., LXX., Vatic., THEODORET in Cod. Monac., ORIGEN, read אֱלֹהִים, misled by the previous context.

⁴ Ver. 7.—The preposition עַל might not unfitly in this connection be rendered "against" (MAURER), yet elsewhere עַל after הָלַךְ differs little in meaning from אֵל, 1 Sam. xv. 20; ii. 11; comp. Neh. vi. 17 and rems. on x. 1.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 5. Before I formed thee . . . to the nations. Observe the progress of thought in the three clauses of this verse—1. Before I formed thee, I knew thee: the Divine idea in eternity lies back of the creative act in time. Comp.

Ps. cxxxix. 15. 2. Before thou camest forth from the womb, I sanctified thee: the instrument prepared in accordance with the Divine idea is set apart for the sacred service. Comp. Isa. xlv. 4; xlix. 1; Acts ix. 15; Rom. i. 1; Gal. i. 15; Luke i. 15. 3. I ordained thee a prophet to the nations: it is expressly stated in what this sacred service consists: Jeremiah is to proclaim the word of the Lord as a prophet, not to one nation only, but to the nations generally.

Ver. 6. Then said I I am a child. Jeremiah perceives directly the difficulty and danger of this Divine commission. He therefore pleads his inability to speak on account of his youth. By a similar plea Moses seeks to escape the Divine legation, Exod. iii. 11; iv. 10, 13; but Jonah flees from before the Lord, i. 3.—Many expositors suppose that Jeremiah was then twenty years of age, but no definite age is designated by צע. The Rabbins understand by the term a boy by his fourteenth year. See Buxtorf, Lex. Chald. Talm. sub voce. MAUER more correctly concludes from the long continuance of the prophet's ministry (vers. 2 and 3, coll. xl. 1; xliii. 8), that he could not then have passed his twenty-fifth year.

Ver. 7. But Jehovah said unto me, say not . . . thou shalt speak. Jehovah rebuts the objection of Jeremiah at the outset, not by the promise of His assistance, but by a categorical declaration of His will. He is to go where he is sent, and speak what he is commanded. פל in itself might be taken in a personal sense (πρός πάντας, LXX.). But since the following פל is certainly to be regarded as neuter, and as the neutral signification, being the more general, includes the other, the former is to be preferred = wherever. We should also expect פל after the verb, and from its absence conclude that צע is intended for an adverb of place = whither (Zech. vi. 10).

Ver. 8. Be not afraid . . . saith Jehovah. Their faces refers to the persons indicated implicite in the word wherever, ver. 7. Here first the Lord removes Jeremiah's scruples by the promise of His protection and assistance. So with Moses, Exod. iii. 12; iv. 15; comp. Ezek. ii. 6; Josh. i. 5; vii. 9; Judges vi. 16; Matth. x. 18-20; xxviii. 20; Luke xxi. 17; Acts xviii. 9, 10.

Ver. 9. Then Jehovah put forth his hand . . . into thy mouth. The opposition of the prophet is now broken down. The Lord was too strong for him. Comp. xx. 7; 1 Cor. ix. 10.—So the Lord now proceeds to the solemn act of inauguration. In this we distinguish two points: (a) the communication of the necessary ability, ver. 9; (b) the conferring of the commission and privileges of the office. Both indicate a vigorous offensive attitude of the prophet, which corresponds to an equally strong defensive position, vers. 18 and 19. The first consists in the symbolical act of touching the lips. We call this act symbolical in so far as the touching of the lips and the words spoken were the visible and audible manifestation of a still deeper spiritual transaction. The Lord cannot literally have put His words in the prophet's mouth: He can only have given him the charism of which the words were the necessary result. "Attactus oris signum est notans officium spiritus sancti, quippe qui digitus Dei sit, aperiens labia ministrorum verbi, Ps. li. 13, 14, 17; Luc. xxi. 15" (FÖRSTER). The transaction is, however, to be regarded as an historical objective fact, though occurring outside the sphere of physical or bodily life, and therefore as in privatu, or a vision. Comp. DRECHSLER on Isa. vi. 7. We thus avoid a double error. First, that which apprehends the transaction as purely subjective: "as the moment when the presentiment first flashed clearly through the soul of Jeremiah, that his prophetic calling was of Divine appointment" (EWALD, Die Proph. des A. B. II. S. 26). Secondly, that according to which the transaction took place in the sphere of physical or corporeal existence. So STARKE, who, actually says that the "Son of God, in pre-Intimation of His blessed incarnation, appeared to Jeremiah in a human form."—This touching of the lips occurs several times, but always with a different meaning. In Isa. vi. 6 it is for the purpose of expiation, in Dan. x. 16 for the purpose of strengthening. Here in Jeremiah it is the outward form of inspiratio (ἐμπνεύσας). For the expression "I have put my word in thy mouth" (comp. almost the same expression in Isaiah li. 16) is, on the one hand, an explanation of the act of touching the lips, on the other the designation of that operation on the human spirit by virtue of which "holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost" (2 Pet. i. 21). From the following verso moreover we perceive that the prophet was prepared not only for speaking, but for acting, or, that his words were to be at the same time deeds, real exhibitions of power.

Ver. 10. See, I have this day . . . to build and to plant. These words represent the second part of the act of inauguration, the conferring of authority and of the commission. Authority is at the same time power. The prophet is not only formally authorized, but rendered physically capable. He is first authorized and empowered to act vigorously in the offensive. הפקדתי I have set thee as a פקיד, i. e., overseer, administrator (ἐπίσκοπος, οἰκονομος), consequently as my officer over the nations and kingdoms, which are my dominion and property. In הפקדתי is also included the idea of official plenipotence, which forms the legal basis of the prophet's ministry. The sphere in which this ministry is to be exercised is "the nations and the kingdoms." These are not designated more exactly, but the definite article and the plural denote that not only the kingdom of Judah, but all the nations and kingdoms are meant which were then present on the arena of history. They are enumerated xxv. 17-26. The commission which the prophet received with respect to them has two sides—a positive and a negative. First, he is to extirpate and exterminate (we may thus express the alliteration), to destroy and to throw down, but then also to build and to plant. The first he does by prophesying the Divine judgment, the second by the promise of Divine mercy and grace. נבט corresponding to נבט, is used of plants (xii. 14 sqq.; xxiv. 6; xlv. 4) נבט corresponding to נבט, of buildings (xxxix. 8; lii. 14; Ezek. xxvi. 9, 12). It is noteworthy that the negative side is expressed by four verbs, the positive by only two. With this the contents of the book correspond, as owing to the moral condition of the times, it contains more threatenings and rebukes than promises of grace It is full of the former with respect to Israel. The latter are found with respect to the theocracy, besides in many scattered passages, especially in ch. xxx.-xxxiii. With respect to the heathen nations both are found especially in ch. xlvi.-li. It is understood that the prophet was not actually to destroy and to build, but only by word, which as spoken by God involves the certainty of the accomplishment. Analogous modes of expression are found in Gen. xlix. 6; Isa. vi. 10; Ezek. xxxii. 18; xliii. 3; Hos. vi. 5. Rev. xi. 5.—Comp. Jer. v. 14; xxiii. 29.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. There is a vocatio immediata, which is however restricted to the bearers of the prophetic and apostolic office. We know of no prophet who was chosen and called by man to be a prophet. Aaron and Elisha are only apparent exceptions. Comp. Exod. iv. 14-16, 27; 1 Kings xix. 16. The apostles also were all called immediately by our Lord; Matt. iv. 18-22; x. 1; John i. 37; Acts ix.; Gal. i. 1, 11 sqq. Since then this vocatio immediata or extraordinaria is for those servants and instruments, of which the Lord will make use "ad fundandam ecclesiam," all those who wish to bear office in the church already founded must be called thereto rite, i. e. by the human organ authorized for this purpose. (Conf. August., Art. XIV.) Comp. BUDDE, Instit. theol. dogm. L. V., cap. IV., § 4.—TURRETIN, Inst. theol. elencht. Loc. XVIII., Quæst. 23.

2. The free creative act of the personal God, who prepares and forms His instruments according to His idea even in the womb, contradicts both the mechanical idea of development, and a one-sided traducianism.—It is simply remarked, that Catholic theologians (see CORN. A LAPIDE), in order to obtain analogies for the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, would conclude from ver. 5 that Jeremiah was conceived without original sin. NEUMANN understands הַקִּדְשָׁתִּין of a communication of the Holy Ghost to Jeremiah even before his birth. Comp. on the other hand HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, I, S. 65. [קִדְשָׁתִּין] does not primarily signify to be pure or holy, but to be separated from a common to some special purpose. The idea of purity, whether physical, ceremonial or moral, was originated by that of such separation. When, therefore, Jehovah declares that He had sanctified the prophet before his birth, the meaning is not that He had cleansed him from the pollution of original sin, or that He had regenerated him by His Spirit, as some have imagined, but that He had separated him in His eternal counsel to the work in which he was to be engaged." HENDERSON. So CALVIN.—"In this respect, as in many others, Jeremiah, who was sanctified from his mother's womb, and was known, i. e. loved, by God before he was conceived and was made a prophet to the Nations, was a figure of Christ, who was loved by the Father from the beginning . . . and who was the Prophet of all Nations. . . ." (see S. JEROME here and comp. S. CYPRIAN c. Judeos, I. 21; S. AMBROSE, in Ps. 43, and ORIGEN Homil. 1, in Jer.). S. JEROME says: "Certe nullum puto sanctiorem Jeremiam, qui virgo propheta, sanctificatusque in utero, ipso nomine prefiguratur Dominum Salvatorem." S. JEROME (who is regarded as a saint and as a great doctor of the church, by the Church of Rome) could not have written these words if he had known anything of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception (i. e. of the original sinlessness) of the Blessed Virgin, which is now enforced by the Church of Rome as an article of faith necessary to everlasting salvation." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

3. The divine call involves, 1. with respect to the called, (a) the duty, to discharge the commission received without shyness or fear of man, and without regard to his own weakness, (b) the privilege of the divine protection and assistance, and of certain success in his work; 2. with respect to those for whose sake the divine commission is given, (a) the duty of believing obedience, (b) the certain prospect of the realization of the threatenings or promises addressed to them.—ZINZENDORF ("Jeremiah a preacher of righteousness," S. 5 of the Berlin Ed. of 1830) remarks on ver. 10: "A general promise which is addressed not to court preachers and general superintendents and such like only, in their extended dioceses, but city and village pastors may a majori ad minus, safely conclude that it will apply also to their rooting out and pulling down, building and planting. Only [be] faithful! only faithful!"—I note that some have sought to derive from ver. 9 a proof of verbal inspiration, hence STARKE remarks: "Those sin against the Holy Ghost Himself who attribute to Jeremiah a rude style and solecisms, as ABARBANEL, JEROME, CUNÆUS (De Rep. ebr. III., 7) have done,"—further that POPE INNOCENT III., founded on ver. 10 his claim to the primacy over civil rulers. Comp. Decret. L. I. Tit. 33, cap. sollicite (FÖRSTER).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. This passage may be suitably employed on the tenth Sunday after Trinity. It is also especially adapted to Ordination and Installation sermons.

2. The Lord never allows His Church to lack the strength which time and place demand. He need not seek this or wait for it. He makes it. As the Lord elsewhere chose that which was foolish, weak and base in the sight of the world (1 Cor. i. 19-29; Matt. xi. 25; John vii. 48; Jas. ii. 5), so now he chooses one who to himself and others appears too young. It is not always the greybeard that is wanted (FÖRSTER). When God gives office He gives also understanding.—It would be presumptuous to begin a great work in one's own strength. It is natural that in view of a great and difficult task one should at first be afraid. (AMBROSE, De officiis ministrorum, I, 66: "Moyse et Hieremias, electi a Domino, ut oracula Dei predicarent populo, quod poterant per gratiam, excusabant per verecundiam.") But it would also be wrong if from pusillanimous despondency or love of ease, one should take no heed to an evident call of God.

"Mark, O my soul, God's word to thee,
And go at Christ's command,
Where'er He draws thee hasten on,
When He detains thee, stand," etc.

"The word and glory, Lord divine,
Not ours, O Christ, but all are Thine,

Grant then Thy gracious aid to those,
Who sweetly on Thy word repose."

(NIC. SELNECKER, in the hymn, "Abide with us, Lord Jesus Christ," etc., ver. 7).—Since the cause is not ours, but the Lord's, and we have not undertaken it in our own strength, but in obedience to His command, it devolves upon the Lord to protect His cause and His servant.—Where one receives an office from the Lord and conducts it according to the Lord's purpose and in His Spirit, there the Lord Himself is present with shield and spear, that is, with weapons of defence and offence.—The word of the Lord even in the mouth of the humblest of His servants, is a hammer which breaks the rock in pieces, and no rock is too hard or too high for it.—The work in the vineyard of the Lord. It must 1. be performed by men, whom the Lord prepares and sends. It is 2. a difficult and dangerous work. But 3. rich in success and reward.—The office to which the Lord appoints is 1. for the purpose of accomplishing His will,—needs, 2. the means which the Lord Himself provides.

3. STARKE:—"He who is called by the Lord to the office of preacher becomes indeed a sacrifice and instrument of God, in that he regards only God's will and command, and must without exception and without self-conceit do and proclaim that which the Lord commands him to do and preach.—Since the anger of God against sin and the punishment which will certainly follow has to be declared to whole kingdoms, a preacher must set their sins and the anger of God awakened thereby, before governors as well as subjects, the high as well as the low.—A teacher in view of gross corruption must not proceed softly; he must break down, root out, pull up and destroy.—When a teacher has by the Law destroyed the kingdom of Satan in the hearts of men, he must seek to build up the kingdom of Christ therein by the Gospel."

["Propheta nascitur non fit—A man is not educated unto a prophet, but originally formed for the office.—Samuel declared a message from God to Eli when he was a little child. Note, God can, when He pleases, make children prophets and ordain strength out of the mouths of babes and sucklings.—If God do not deliver His ministers from trouble, it is to the same effect if He support them under their trouble.—Earthly princes are not wont to go along with their ambassadors, but God goes along with those whom He sends." HENRY.—"You need not fear their faces—the thing that timid young men are most wont to fear. Think only that the Lord God is with you, and let His presence be your joy and strength." COWLES.—Nothing can sustain the prophet in His outward and inward conflicts but the assurance of his divine calling.—MAURICE says: "If Jeremiah had fancied that he was a prophet because there was in him a certain aptitude for uttering divine discourses and foreseeing calamities, who can tell the weariness and loathing which he would have felt for his task when it led to no seeming result, except the dislike of all against or for whom it was exercised,—still more when the powers and graces which were supposed to be the qualifications for it, became consciously feeble."—S. b. The Visions, Rehearsal and Programme.

CHAP. I. 11-16.

- 11 Moreover the word of the Lord [Jehovah] came unto me, saying, Jeremiah,
- 12 what seest thou? And I said, I see a [wakeful] rod of an almond tree. Then said the Lord [Jehovah] unto me, Thou hast well [rightly] seen, for I will hasten
- 13 [be wakeful (Germ., wacker) concerning], my word, to perform it. And the word of the Lord [Jehovah] came unto me the [a] second time, saying, What seest thou? And I said, I see a seething [boiling] pot, and the face thereof is
- 14 toward [from] the north. Then the Lord [Jehovah] said unto me, Out of the north an evil [calamity] shall break forth upon all the inhabitants of the land.
- 15 For lo, I will call all the families of the kingdoms of the north, saith the Lord [Jehovah]; and they shall come, and they shall set every one his throne [seat] at the entering of the gates of Jerusalem, and against all the walls thereof round
- 16 about, and against all the cities of Judah. And I will utter my judgments against them¹ touching [for] all their wickedness, who² [because they] have forsaken me, and have burned³ incense [sacrifice] unto other gods, and worshipped the works⁴ of their own hands.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 16.—The form אָרָם for אָרָם is frequent in Jeremiah, ii. 35; iv. 12; xii. 1. Comp. NAEGLSEN, Gr. § 55, 3, Ann.

² Ver. 16.—אֲשֶׁר before אֲנִי refers to the suffix in אֲנִי, and since it is to be regarded as explicative, introducing a more particular definition of רעה, we may translate it by: that, that namely. Moreover רעה here refers to the same expression in ver. 14.

⁴ Ver. 16.—כיעט, the plural, is found again only xlv. 8, the singular xxv. 6, 7; xxxii. 30; 2 Kings xxii. 17; coll. 2 Chron. xxxiv. 25.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In general this section is the continuation of Jeremiah's induction into the prophetic office, commenced in the previous section. This continuation consists in this, that the Lord at once causes the prophet to make a little trial or exercise in prophetic vision, in which he shows him not only the manner, but the main purport of the prophetic vision and announcement, i. e. the programme in outline of his prophetic ministry. The two sections thus stand in the closest reciprocal relation. Whether we are to assume an interval of time between them, is not clear from the text, which however does not forbid the supposition of a very brief interim.

Ver. 11. Moreover . . . rod of an almond tree. The question, "What seest thou?" is found not only here, in ver. 13 and xxiv. 3, but also in Amos vii. 8; viii. 2; Zech. iv. 2; v. 2. It is the object of the inquirer to assure himself that the person addressed has rightly seen, which thus presupposes a certain difficulty, as well as importance, in seeing correctly. Apart from the objective difficulty of always perceiving the object shown, which we meet with, ex. gr., in Amos viii. 2; Zech. v. 2; the subjective ability of beholding visions, the seeing power of the inner eye, as it were, had to be tested. שָׁקֵר is the almond (Gen. xliii. 11; Num. xvii. 8; Eccles. xii. 5). The word comes from שָׁקַר, vigilavit. What the cock is among domestic animals the almond is among trees. It awakes first from the sleep of winter: "floret omnium prima mense Januario, Martio vero poma maturat," says PLINY, Hist. Nat. L. XVI. c. 25.—The LXX have βακτηρία καρβύνη, baculum nucum. It is questionable whether by this they wished to designate a nut-tree-staff (with a hint at the sweet kernel in a bitter shell, as THEODORE and AMBROSE suppose, the latter in Epist. ad Marcellinam sororem, the 41st in the Bened. Ed.). For, according to HERACLUS EPHESIUS (κάρνα ἐκάλουν καὶ τὰς ἀμυγδάλας, etc.), HESYCHIUS (καρνας ἀμυγδάλας καὶ καστάνους) and others (see DRUSIUS ad h. l. cfr. Passow: καρνον, every kind of nut), βακτηρία καρβύνη may also mean an almond-tree-staff, as the LXX also translate Gen. xxx. 37, לֵוּ בַקֵּל by ῥάβδος καρβύνη· (לֵוּ is however the proper word in Hebrew and the dialects for almond-tree. See ANOLD in Herzog, Real-Enc., Art. Mandelbaum), and in Gen. xliii. 11, at least the Cod. Vatic. has κάρνα for שָׁקֵר, while the Cod. Alex. renders this word by ἀμυγδάλα.—But although the language allows the meaning of "almond" for שָׁקֵר, it has not been universally admitted here. BUGENHAGEN, ex. gr. translates baculum alacrem or virgam vigilantem, and expressly excludes the idea of an almond tree. For in another reference he makes this remarkable declaration; "Qui in hebraico nunc supersticiosius sua puncta (que tamen sciunt olim non fuisse) sequuntur, faciunt hoc loco: baculum amygdalinum. Sed si hoc placet ipsis, cur non postea faciunt etiam sic: bene vidisti, quia ego amygdalabor ad verbum meum." Most commentators admit the idea of "almond-tree" in שָׁקֵר, they differ only in this that some express this idea in the translation as that which is in reality the only one befitting the word, while the others for the sake of the similarity with the following שָׁקֵר prefer the radical signification (vigilare). The latter again are distinguished into those who take שָׁקֵר = שָׁקַר in the substantive sense, "watchman" (so CALVIN: baculus vigilis; ECOLAMPAD.: the watchman club), and those who retain the adjectival signification (vigilans, alacer).—The endeavor to recommend the latter meaning by the explanation, "virga vigilans pro minaci, incumbente, instar dextrae gladii vibrata" (ZWINGLI) is wrecked on the difficulty of a rod alone, without an arm to raise it or an object over which it is held, being recognized as vigilans. If on the other hand the staff be recognized by the prophet as an almond-tree staff, not only is this explicable but the subsequent explanation is connected easily and naturally with the idea of an almond-tree. EWALD has made the thought clear by the translation; A watch-staff of elder, for I will watch, etc.—THEODORE says, long-suffering is a sleep (Ps. xlv. 24; lxxviii. 65); watchfulness for vengeance an awaking. That He will not sleepily delay, but will be fresh and watchful to own by speedy fulfilment the word spoken by the mouth of His prophet,—this is what God says to the fearful, hesitating Jeremiah for his comfort and encouragement. But is xlvi. 17, which passage is adduced by FUERST), but always that of a stick or staff, and therefore agrees at least in signification with baculus, βακτηρία. The Hebrew expressions for a fresh branch are כִּטְהָה (Ezek. xix. 11 sqq.), שִׁנְךָ, כִּטְהָה עֵבֹתָ. 2. The connection requires that an instrument of chastisement be meant. The expositors have pointed with justice to the climax: rod—boiling pot. “Qui noluerint percutiente virga emendari, mittentur in ollam veneam atque succensam,” says JEROME. But a leafy branch is not an instrument of punishment.—The objection that the prophet would not then be in a condition to recognize the staff as from an almond-tree is unfounded. He might be able to do this even if we had reason to suppose that a dry almond-tree was shown him. To distinguish between different kinds of dry wood is not difficult for a half-informed man. We must imagine a staff stripped indeed of leaves and adapted for striking, but yet fresh, unbarked and sappy. Since it is just in its being fresh and full of sap that the point lies, we may certainly presume that it was an almond rod in this stage that was shown to the prophet. Perhaps the recognition was facilitated by the circumstance that the vision occurred at a time when the sap had just commenced to flow in the almond tree.

Ver. 12. Then said Jehovah . . . to perform it. VENEMA remarks on this verse: “Visum eo tendit, ut propheta experimentum suae aptitudinis ad munus propheticum caperet.—Bene vidisti: capax ergo es visionum propheticarum.” There seems to be some truth in this. In the other passages where the formula, What seest thou? occurs it is without the Thou hast well seen of confirmation. When it is here said to Jeremiah after his first vision there is certainly something encouraging in the fact, and it may not incorrectly be referred to the apprehension of incapacity expressed by the prophet in ver. 6. At the same time it corroborates what has been remarked on שִׁנְךָ. If it were a leafy twig, thou hast well seen appears to be superfluous, for there would have been no skill in distinguishing it—I will be wakeful, etc. Comp. xxxi. 28, where the Lord refers expressly to this passage. The paronomasia is the same as between כִּטְהָה and קִיץ (Am. viii. 2).—Observe that we have רִבְרִיבָה and רִבְרִיבָה. The word which the prophet has to proclaim is that of God, who will not allow His own word to be dishonored. The prophet need not be anxious either about its impression on the hearts of men or about the verification of his threatenings and promises; both will verify themselves. Comp. Heb. ii. 1; Isa. lv. 11.

Ver. 13. And the word . . . from the north. This second vision is closely related to the first, both as to form and matter, we are therefore not to suppose a long pause between them. In form this vision is like the first, but in matter it forms a climax, since, as already remarked, the boiling pot in relation to the simple rod of castigation appears to be an emblem of an extreme fury of anger. There is also a progress here, in that the second vision, with the explanation attached, plainly expresses why, how and by whom the judgment should be inflicted upon Judah. Thus far vers. 13-16 present an outline of the whole prophecy of Jeremiah, for the whole book is no more than a development of the great thought here expressed: Judgment upon Judah by a people coming from the north; and the consolatory portions are but exceptions, like single rays of light in the prevailing darkness of the picture.—A boiling pot, etc. Etymologically it is a pot blown upon, i. e., a pot brought to boiling by blowing the fire. Comp. חִיָּהּ וְרֵךְ Job xli. 11. The idea of BRENZ, that כִּי is here to be taken as = spina (spina, quae in die irae Domini ab igne hujus succenditur) is refuted by the singular. We should then expect כִּי־ים. Comp. Isa. xxxiv. 13; Hos. ii. 8; Nah. i. 10; Eccles. vii. 6, in which place the word is used in both meanings. The seething pot is an emblem among the Arabs of warlike fury. Comp. ROSEN-MUELLER, ad. h. l. Most expositors understand by the pot here the theocracy. The Chaldeans are then the fire inflamed to a violent heat, which boils the Jews in the pot (comp. Ezek. xi. 3, 7, 11; xxii. 20), and that which foams over is the inhabitants driven out of the holy land. So, ex. gr., says ŒCOLAMPADIUS: “Iherusalem ollae vel lebeti comparatur (ussagesotten Hauffen) in qua carnales homines per ignem coquantur, ut quasi spuma ebulliantur per fervorem.” But they have been led by the general similarity of these passages in Ezekiel to overlook the difference. There the pot, with the flesh in it and that which is to come out of it, as well as the fire, are expressly distinguished from each other. In reference to our passage VENEMA has correctly remarked: “Nihil hic de igne, nihil de folle et sufflatione aliunde orta; simpliciter memoratur olla sufflata, quae est olla in tumorem crecta et effervesceens.” And the prophet certainly sees nothing more than a pot boiling and foaming from the north. So that this itself is presented as the instrument of the severer punishment, and therefore symbolizes the Chaldeans. So BUGENIAGEN (“olla malum per Chaldaeos et Assyrios Judaeis paratum”). VENEMA (“olla representat regnum Chaldaeorum sub Nebucadnezare et vasta molimina coquens, et summe sese effrens, simul iratum et ad omnia absorbenda paratum”). With the opposite view of the pot is closely connected the incorrect interpretation of כִּי־פְנֵי צְפוֹנָה.

If we understand by the pot the Jewish people, and imagine this placed over a burning fire, which, though not expressly mentioned, we assume to be the Chaldeans, then it is natural to view כִּי־פְנֵי as the side of the pot turned towards the fire. But it is not the side turned towards the fire, but towards the prophet. For in the first place in the vision there is no fire, so that כִּי־פְנֵי could denote only the front of the pot, supposing it had one. It would, secondly, be difficult to show that the pot (or kettle, as some translate) had a side which could be expressly marked as the front. Thirdly, if the opposite view were correct we should read כִּי־פְנֵי אֵל not כִּי־פְנֵי צְפוֹנָה. For the prophet certainly sees the pot from his standpoint as in the north. If now we say that the pot was placed against a fire burning on its northern side, the prophet from his southern standpoint would certainly be unable to see the side towards the fire. I know that frequently in Hebrew the terminus a quo is put where we should use the terminus in quo or in quem (comp. NÄGELSB. Heb. Gram., 2d Ed., S. 228), but this mode of expression is applicable only when the object in question presents itself from just that point, at which it is according to our conception of it or towards which it is moving. In the present case, however, the side turned away from the prophet and not visible to him would be designated as that which is presenting itself to him (from the north). We therefore take פָּנִים as the side turned towards and displayed to the prophet, whence according to a frequent idiom (comp. Num. viii. 2; Ex. xxviii. 25; Ex. xl. 44) it is designated as the face of the pot, and on this account also no further emphasis is to be laid on it. It is merely the visible side as opposed to the invisible; and we therefore translate simply "and it looks from the north." The He locale in צַפְנָה, as in several cases after prepositions, does not serve to indicate the direction more definitely, Isa. xv. 10, 21, פָּנֵיהֶם וּצְפֹנָהּ Jer. xxvii. 16, but here as in צְפֹנָהּ appears to have lost its significance as a particle and to be in transition to a mere phonetic substantive termination.

Ver. 14. Then Jehovah said . . . the inhabitants of the land. From the north is a general and indefinite expression, and it remains so to the prophet until a great historical event renders it sharply defined. Until the battle of Carchemish a people from the north only is spoken of (iv. 6; vi. 1, 22; x. 22), after the battle this people appears distinctly as the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar (xxv. 9, etc). This settles the question whether by this northern nation the Chaldeans or Scythians were meant. All the older expositors held the former view. After EICHHORN'S example (Heb. Proph. II. 9), VON BOHLEN (Gen. S. 165), DAHLER (Jérémie II. 81), EWALD (Proph. d. A. B. 1, S. 361, 373; II., S. 9; Gesch. Isr. III. 392), BERTHEAU (Gesch. d. Isr. S. 361), HITZIG and others in general, as RÖSCH says (Zeitschr. d. morg. Ges. XV., S. 536) "pretty nearly all exegetical authorities," maintain the latter. Without wishing to oppose that which ADOLPH STRAUSS (Vatt. Zephanje, S. XV.), THOLUCK (Die Proph. u. ihre Weiss., S. 94), and GRAF (D. proph. Jer. erklärt, S. 16) have urged in favor of the older view, especially from the circumstance that the incursion of the Scythians was made at least five years before the public appearance of our prophet, I am still of opinion, that Jeremiah could have had neither the Scythians, nor the Chaldeans, nor any other people definitely in mind. He saw only this much, that a northern people would visit Judah as the rod of divine discipline. What people this would be, or rather what people all the families of the kingdoms of the earth would unite under their leadership, he knew not. He learned this first, as we have said, from the decisive turn given by the battle of Carchemish. We shall see when we come to consider the respective passages that where he characterizes this unknown people more particularly (comp. iv. 11; v. 15; vi. 22; x. 22; xiii. 20) his description suits the Chaldeans, and that afterwards when he names them (ch. xxv.) he is not conscious of correcting an error. Comp. GRAF, S. 17, etc.—We thus come to the question, how can Jeremiah call the Chaldeans a northern people, since Babylon lay to the east or south-east of Palestine? We are not to expect an exact localization here, since, as we have said, Jeremiah has no definite people in view. The origin of the Chaldeans in the Koordish mountains (J. D. MICHAELIS), the extension of the Babylonian kingdom to the north and the connection with it of the Medes and Assyrians (ECOLAMPADIUS, GROTIUS, and others) are not to be urged as reasons for this expression of the prophet. He knows only that they will come against Jerusalem from the north over Dan and the mountains of Ephraim (iv. 15; viii. 16). At the same time it was determined that these enemies belonged to the dominion not of a southern, but of a (in relation to this) northern empire, for which reason, after he had recognized the Chaldeans, the prophet does not cease to designate them as coming from the north; xxv. 9, coll. Ezek. xxvi. 7.—Shall break forth, etc. Vers. 14-16 contain the interpretation of the second vision, ver. 14 giving its general import. פָּתַח is used only of the opening of a closed gate, but metaleptically of the dismissal or exclusion of what was enclosed by it, whether in bonam partem, ex. gr. of prisoners (Isa. li. 14; Job xii. 14), or in malam partem of a calamity, as here. ZWINGLI remarks on this passage: "hac metalepsi 'aperiri pro prodire' non temere utuntur Latini, sed pro 'prodere' frequentius." [HENDERSON: "Though more to the east than to the north of Judea, the Hebrews always represent the Babylonians as living in, or coming from, the north, partly because they usually appropriated the term east to Arabia Deserta, stretching from Palestine to the Euphrates, and partly because that people, not being able to cross the desert, had to take a northern route when they came against the Hebrews, and always entered their country by the northern frontier."—S. R. A.]

Ver. 15. For lo . . . the cities of Judah. In this verse the general idea פָּתַח is more exactly defined. The calamity will consist in this that the Lord will call all the kingdoms of the north against Judah. But all is not to be emphasized. It is only meant that the (in relation to Egypt) northern empire will come with its whole force upon Judah. The expression "and they shall set every one his throne," etc., is very variously explained. CALVIN understands it as the arrangement for a permanent residence ("ut consistant tanquam domi sue") which is entirely unsuited to the connection. Others understand by the throne the seat of the general, from which orders are issued as well as judgments. The latter have been referred either to the hostile soldiers (so, ex. gr., SEB. SCHMID), or to Judah (STARKE, J. D. MICHAELIS, "describuntur ut assessores ejus judicii, quod v. seq. informatur"). The reference to the hostile soldiery does not agree with the context, the reference to Judah is in so far unsuited that a throne for the purpose of judging a city, is set not before the gates, but within the conquered city. I therefore concur with VENEMA, ROSENMUELLER, MAURER and others in the view, that the seat here is only a seat for sitting upon, and that to sit down before a city is simply to besiege it, as in Latin obsidere, and as the French say mettre le siège devant une ville. The phrase פָּנֵי יְרוּשָׁלַם expresses that Jerusalem will be surrounded by many such seats. They will be set especially before the gates of Jerusalem (פָּנֵי prepositive, as Gen. xviii. 1; xix. 11, etc.) because it is the metropolis and because the siege is directed against the gates, as the approaches to it. From the principal stations before the gates of the capital the attack may be directed not only against the walls of Jerusalem, but against the other cities of the land.

Ver. 16. And I will utter . . . their own hands. These words designate the visitation threatened in the preceding verses as a divine judgment, and name also the guilt which has brought such a judgment upon Judah. The expression פָּנֵי יְרוּשָׁלַם signifies to discuss rights with any one, i. e. to dispute (causam agere) between those who have equal rights (Jer. xii. 1), and partly as a judge with the accused (iv. 12; xxxix. 5). The expression here has the suffix of a definite person, which signifies that the case is not one of reciprocal rights, but entirely of the rights of the Lord, for the infraction of which the people are here called to account.

This discussion of the Lord with the people is not to take place in words, but by the judgment announced in the previous verses. ["The idea conveyed by the LXX is somewhat different, and I believe that it is what the original words mean, ἁλιψῶ πρὸς αὐτοὺς μετὰ κρίσεως—I will speak to them with judgment. The original literally is, 'I will speak my judgments to them;' that is, I will not speak words but judgments.—The verse may be thus rendered—'And I will speak by my judgments unto them,' etc." CALVIN'S Comm. I., 53. Tr's note.—S. R. A.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. In form both of these visions are objective symbols, in distinction from verbal symbols (parables, tropes, etc.) and from types. The prophetic element is essential to the latter, but not to symbols. The almond-tree staff is only an objective expression of the truth that the Lord is early awake to verify His truth. The seething pot also is only an actual representation of the judgment which is threatening Judah. The circumstance that this is future is not essential. While the type represents a future fact the symbol is only the emblematic expression of a speech, and may refer to the present, the past or the future.—It may be remarked that the older theologians used the expression theologia symbolica in a triple sense, (a) = theologia mystica, kabbalistica (comp. BUDDÉ, Inst. Dogm. p. 186), (b) = theologia of the confessions or creeds, (c) as correlative to revelatio symbolica, i. e. revelation imparted by bodily signs, in opposition to revelatio simplex, which passes internally from spirit to spirit (comp. BUDDÉ S. 25, etc., and STARKE, in loc.).—Concerning the Biblical symbols, comp. ZÜCKLER, Theologia naturalis, S. 200. [FAIRBAIRN'S Typology, passim. "Here is a beautiful type of the Resurrection, especially the Resurrection of Christ. 'Virga Aaron que putabatur emortua, in Resurrectione Domini floruit' (S. JEROME)." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

2. It may be asked whether the alacritas, vigilantia, assiduitas, diligentia Dei does not claim to be regarded as a special quality in opposition to the somnolentia, inertia, pigritia of men. The answer must be in the negative. In the conception of the absolute Spirit, who is at the same time the absolute life, the material basis is given for this vigilantia or diligentia as truly as holiness, love, faithfulness, wisdom serve for the formal (ethical and intellectual) basis: He that keepeth Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps. Ps. cxxi. 4.

3. The justice of God demands the satisfaction of His wounded honor (Isa. xlii. 8). The divine wisdom in connection with omniscience selects the instruments and fixes the time and manner of the judgment.

IDIOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. [On ver. 12. "Prophets have need of good eyes; and those that see well shall be commended, and not those only that speak well." M. HENRY.—S. R. A.]

God's justice is, 1. long-suffering: at first it uses only the rod (Rom. ii. 4); 2. recompensing zealously and severely: when the gentle chastisement is without result, it becomes a consuming fire (Ex. xx. 5; Ps. vii. 12; Heb. x. 31). [AMBROSE on Ps. xxxviii., quoted by WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

2. [On ver. 16. MATTHEW:—"We perceive as much from the words of the prophet as from the history, that this idolatry has now become deep and radical.—The state of mind which was latent in them and which they brought forth into full, conscious activity, is represented as an apostate state; not so much an adoption of false gods as a denial of the true. There is a great practical difference between the frivolous, heartless taste for foreign novelties, which was denounced by the earlier prophets, and the utter incapacity for acknowledging a God not appealing to the senses, which Jeremiah discovers in his contemporaries. He boldly sets up the faith of the heathen as a lesson to the Israelites, ii. 10, 11."—S. R. A.]

c. Repetition of the Commission and Promise as the basis of the impregnable defensive position of the Prophet.

I. 17-19.

- 17 Thou therefore gird up thy loins, and arise and speak unto them all that I [shall] command thee: be not dismayed [confounded] at their faces, lest I confound thee before them. For, behold, I have made [make] thee this day a defenced city, and an iron pillar and brazen walls¹ against the whole land, against² the kings of Judah, against² the princes thereof, against² the priests thereof and 19 against² the people of the land. And they shall [may] fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee; for I am with thee, saith the LORD [Jehovah], to deliver thee.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 18.—לְ is a feebler continuation of לְ. Comp. iii. 17; Ps. xxxiii. 23. NAEGELSB. Gram. § 112, 8.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In these concluding verses the general purport of section (a) is first repeated: ver. 17 from speak to faces, and the conclusion of ver 19, reproducing the conclusion of vers. 7 and 8. On the basis of this promise (comp. For I am with thee, ver. 19), however, the prophet is assured, in antithesis to the offensive position commanded in vers. 9 and 10, of an equally strong defensive position, and this is the new and characteristic element of this concluding section.

Ver. 17. Thou therefore . . . before them. A summons to set vigorously to work. The servant of God must be neither cowardly nor slothful. The expression, "gird up the loins," is frequently used in a proper as well as in a figurative sense; 1 Kings xviii. 46; 2 Kings iv. 29; ix. 1; Job xxxviii. 3; Ecces. xxxi. 17; Luke xii. 35; Eph. vi. 14; 1 Pet. i. 13.—Be not dismayed forms a climax in relation to Be not afraid, ver. 8, as in Dent. i. 21; Josh. x. 25.—

הַחֵיִת and הַחֲוֹת, כַּפְּיֵיהֶם and אַחֲתֵךְ correspond. [This play upon words may be expressed in English thus: "Be not dumbfounded before them, lest thou be confounded before them."—S. R. A.] Many commentators have hesitated at rendering the Hiphil of חַתַּת in the primary sense of "frangere, to break to pieces." They have thought the threatening would be too severe, "erigendus erat animus persuasione incolunitatis non minis ac metu frangendus," says SCHNURRER. They therefore take either חַתַּת in a reduced and grammatically inadmissible sense (BUGENHAGEN: quasi te terram; STARKE, "I should terrify thee;"; GROTIUS: nec enim timere te faciam; SCHNURRER supplies לֹאֲכֹר = putans concessurum me esse, ut tibi sit pereundem), or they understand the verb in the meaning which certainly pertains to the word, "to make afraid." But what sense is there in this rendering: "Be not afraid before them, lest I make thee afraid before them"? (ÉCOLAMP., MAURER, EWALD). If the prophet was afraid before his enemies he did not need to be rendered still more so. I take חַתַּת, with most commentators, in the sense frangere, conterere, which it has in the radical signification of the Kal.—to be broken in pieces, crushed (see FUERST), and which it undoubtedly has in such passages as Isa. ix. 8. The threatening is not too severe. Comp. 1 Cor. ix. 16, "For though I preach the Gospel, I have nothing to glory of: for necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel." From this we see that the inward pressure which a man of God feels in consequence of the divine operation is very strong. He who should resist this divine impulse, like Jonah, would be crushed by it. And it would be the just punishment of that faint-hearted disdain, which would reject such high honor from a miserable fear of man.

Ver. 18. For behold . . . the people of the land. I is emphatic in antithesis to thou, ver. 17. Thou gird up thy loins and do thy part, I will do mine, to protect thee. In the words "a defenced city and an iron pillar and brazen wall," the prophet is assured that for the difficult offensive commission which is given him he will receive a sufficient defensive equipment. Offence and defence stand in exact relation to each other. Reference is afterwards made to this promise, in xv. 20, 21. Comp. Ps. cv. 15.—On the subject-matter comp. Matt. x. 18, 19.—people of the land. This expression occurs frequently in the sense of "the common people": xxxiv. 19; xxxvii. 2; xlv. 21; lii. 6; Ezek. vii. 27, &c. It is the basis of the later Rabbinical usage according to which it signifies the "unlearned and ignorant" (Acts iv. 13) comp. Buxtorf. Lex Rabb. s. v. בְּדִי.

Ver. 19. And they shall fight . . . to deliver thee. בְּדִי with בְּ in the sense of prevallere, Gen. xxxiii. 26; 1 Sam. xvii. 9; Obad. 7; Jer. xxxviii. 22.—For I am with thee, comp. ver. 8.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. It is fundamentally the same sin, to labor in the Lord's vineyard without a calling, and not to be willing to labor when one has been called, for in both cases a man seeks his own, not that which is God's.

2. "He who fears nothing and hopes nothing may preach the truth. He who is unequal to either of these two will act more wisely for his own repose and more honorably for the truth, if he keep silence."—Dr. LEIDEMIR.

3. Behold I send you forth as lambs among wolves. Luke x. 3; Matt. x. 16 sqq. God's strength is made perfect in weakness. 2Cor. xii. 9.

4. Fear not those who kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul. Rather fear Him who can destroy both soul and body in hell. Matt. x. 28. God is no respecter of persons. Rom. ii. 11; Eph. vi. 9; 1 Pet. i. 17.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Duty and privilege of the servants of God
1. Their duty: (a) always to have their loins girded, (b) to proclaim without fear of man whatever the Lord commands. 2. Their privilege: —through the power of God to be obliged to yield to no power on earth.

2. The Lord's requirements and promise to His servants. 1. The requirement, (a) to be always ready for His service, (b) to accomplish that which is bidden without delay. 2. The promise: (a) that the Lord will be with them, (b) that no earthly power will conquer them. [M. HENRY: "He must be quick—Arise, and lose no time; he must be busy—Arise, and speak unto them, in season, out of season; he must be bold—Be not dismayed at their faces.—In a word he must be faithful; it is required of ambassadors that they be so. In two things he must be faithful. 1. He must speak all that he is charged with. He must forget nothing—Every word of God is weighty. He must conceal nothing for fear of offending. 2. He must speak to all that he is charged against. Two reasons why he should do this. 1. Because he had reason to fear the wrath of God, if he should be false. 2. Because he had no reason to fear the wrath of man, if he were faithful." —S. R. A.]

II. FIRST DIVISION.

The Passages relating to the Theocracy, Chaps. II.—XLIV.

(WITH AN APPENDIX, CHAP. XLV.)

FIRST SUBDIVISION.

The Collection of Discourses, with Appendices, Chaps. II.—XXXV.

1. The First Discourse.

CHAPTER II.

This chapter contains an independent discourse; it does not, as GRAF supposes, form, with chap. iii.—vi., a connected whole. For, as we shall show, chap. iii. begins a discourse clearly arranged and complete in itself, which would not bear any addition either at the beginning or at the close. The present discourse is of very general import, and contains probably only the quintessence of several discourses made before those in chap. iii.—vi., since it is scarcely probable that in the course of nearly two decades Jeremiah only addressed this short discourse, besides chap. iii.—vi., to the people. The position at the beginning, the style, the non-mention of the Chaldeans (comp. rems. on xxv. 1), besides the command "Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem" (ver. 2), and an intimation probably to be referred to the time of Josiah (ver. 35, see the Comm.), all point to the commencement of Jeremiah's prophetic ministry. This seems to be contradicted by some not obscure allusions to the flight of the remaining Jews to Egypt (vers. 16, 36 and 37; coll. chaps. xlii.—xlv). But since Jeremiah, as was remarked on i. 2, probably did not finish the second writing out of his book till after the destruction of Jerusalem (xxxvi. 32), possibly not till his arrival in Egypt, it is possible that he then added to this earliest discourse some allusions to the eventful journey to Egypt. He may have added them to this discourse for the reason that it contained some passages, the connection and purport of which especially invited such allusions to the emigration to Egypt. Compare ver. 15, the predicted devastation so exactly corresponding to the result, and ver. 33, the mention of the religio-political errors of the people.

After the introduction (vers. 1-3), the ever-recurring theme of complaint and threatening is treated in four tableaux or acts, the particular contents of which may be designated as follows:

1. Israel's infidelity in the light of the fidelity of Jehovah and the heathen (vers. 4-13).
2. Israel's punishment and its cause (vers. 14-19).
3. The lust of idolatry: deeply rooted, outwardly insolent, false at last (vers. 20-28).
4. Whose is the guilt? (vers. 29-37).

The Introduction.

II. 1-3.

1. And the word of Jehovah came also unto me, saying,
2. Go and cry in the ears of Jerusalem, saying,
Thus saith Jehovah; I remember of thee,
The kindness of thy youth,
The love of thine espousals,
When thou wentest after me in the desert,
In a land that was not sown.
3. Israel is a sanctuary unto Jehovah,
The first-fruits of his produce:
All who devour him¹ incur guilt;
Calamity will come upon them, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 3.—For תְּבִיאָתוֹ (Comp. NAEGELSE. Gram. S. 93, Ann.) some Codd. read תְּבִיאָתוֹ. It would be natural to pronounce the consonants תְּבִיאָתוֹ which has been also done by J. D. MICHAELIS who refers the word to אֲרִיִן לֹא יִרְיָעָה ver. 2, but the reference of the suffix to Jehovah is demanded by the connection.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These words form the introduction both to the first discourse and at the same time to the whole of Jeremiah's prophetic announcements. Indeed, it may be said that they contain the thought, which reaches far beyond the prophecies of Jeremiah, and lies at the foundation of the entire history of the theocracy, that notwithstanding the revolts on the one side and the punishments on the other, love is the key-note of the relation between God and Israel, and the Lord's inalienable property.

Vers. 1 and 2. And the word . . . not sown.

—It is probable that in the opening words of ver. 2 Jeremiah received the command to leave Anathoth and go to Jerusalem as the scene of his prophetic labors. For here only is the audience, to which he was to address himself, designated thus briefly by the word "Jerusalem." Everywhere else the address reads differently. Comp. xvii. 19; xix. 3; xxxv. 13.—I remember of thee. The expression occurs in malam partem Ps. lxxix. 8; cxxxvii. 7; Neh. vi. 14; xiii. 29: in bonam partem Ps. xcvi. 3; cvi. 45; cxxxii. 1; Neh. v. 19; xiii. 22, 31. In any case of thee contains an emphasis which should not be overlooked in the exposition.—The kindness of thy youth. The commentators dispute whether the kindness and love of God toward the people or that of the people toward God is meant. In behalf of the former view it is urged, (1) that in the following context the people is described as rebellious from the first, and (2) that with this the historical representation of the Pentateuch and other declarations of Old Testament passages accord. (Comp. especially Hos. xi. 1; Ezek. xvi.) To the first argument it may be objected that these verses form the introduction not to the second chapter only, but to the whole book, and although the greater part of this consists of threatenings, or rather because it does so, the prophet places the assurance of God's unchangeable fidelity in the foreground. Though Israel may have always sinned, yet originally he was united to God in love, and this fundamental relation is eternal and inviolable. Comp. Rom. xi. It cannot then be disputed that the infidelity of Israel was of an early date (comp. from of old, ver. 20) going back to the pilgrimage through the desert (the golden calf, and even prior to this, the murmuring of the people, Exod. xv. 24; xvi. 2; xvii. 2), but it must nevertheless be maintained that the acceptance by Israel of the privileges offered by the Lord, when He sent Moses, and the people trustingly followed him into the Red Sea and the wilderness, is to be regarded as the binding of an inviolable and perpetual covenant. Compare the short and significant, "and the people believed," Exod. iv. 31, with Gen. xv. 6, "and he believed in Jehovah"; Rom. iv. 3; Gal. iii. 6. To this also point many prophetic declarations, ex. gr. Hos. xi. 1: "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt." The period in the youth of Israel at which the Lord loved the people was that in which He brought them out of Egypt. For immediately afterwards (ver. 2), it is said of them that they sacrificed to Baalim, and burned incense to graven images. But then, in that important moment, when the Lord delivered Israel from the encircling power of Egypt, displaying His might so grandly, He concluded a covenant of love with Israel; they must therefore then have not only been found worthy of love, but have reciprocated His love. How sweet and precious Israel's love then was to Him is expressed by Hosea in the splendid image of the early figs, which the pilgrim finds in the desert, Hos. ix. 10. So, says the Lord, He found Israel in the wilderness, but alas! He has to add, "they went to Baalpeor, and separated themselves unto their shame." The objections are then unfounded which have been raised to the rendering of verses 2 and 3 in the sense of Israel's love for God, and other arguments speak positively in its favor, viz. (1) זָכַרְתִּי לָךְ. This dative has everywhere the sense of a reckoning to one's account in a good or bad sense. (See the passages cited above.) But since this is not possible here in a bad sense, for the kindness and love of the past are remembered only as good, it can be meant only in a good sense. If, now, Israel has a balance with Jehovah in an active sense, he (Israel) must have done something,—performed some service. It might be said that this service is in allowing himself to be loved, but this is himself to love. We are thus brought again to this point, that Israel in that opening period of his existence turned to the Lord with such love that, though of momentary duration, it sufficed to found an everlasting covenant and imperishable remembrance of its glory. We may also take הִכָּר in the sense of “the kindness of a maiden towards her master,” being justified in doing so by passages like Hos. vi. 4, 6. Indeed, in view of Isa. xl. 6, it might not appear unsuitable to recognize in הִכָּר the element of loveableness, gracefulness, which in itself is connected with the idea of love and grace, and etymologically in gratia, χάρις, grace;

(2) the words לִבְרַתְךָ אֲחֻרֵי favor this interpretation, since they represent Israel, a pilgrim through the desert, walking in the foot-prints of the Lord. Some indeed would understand these words as denoting, not the obedient following of the people, but the gracious precedence of the divine Leader. This interpretation, however, is arbitrary. The text expresses only the idea of following, or pushing after; we are not justified in exchanging this idea for another. (3) The third verse is manifestly in favor of Israel. When it is said (GRAF, S. 23), “It should be so, but how it became entirely otherwise is shown in what follows,” we reply, it has not become otherwise; but on this point we shall say more presently.

Ver. 3. Israel . . . come upon them.—Though in the words remember of thee it is implied that the kindness and love of the espousals are now only an object of remembrance, a lost joy, yet the third verse declares what a permanent relation was the result of that transient one, an indelible character having been impressed upon the people by that sometime connection with their Lord. They thus became a sanctuary of Jehovah, separate from the profanum vulgus of the nations. This thought is further expressed by a beautiful image: Israel is related to the Gentiles as the first fruits sanctified unto the Lord are to the multitude of common wild fruits, and as profane lips were forbidden to eat the former (Exod. xxiii. 19; Num. xv. 20, sq.; xviii. 12; Deut. xxvi. 1; comp. Lev. xxii. 16-26), so will guilt be upon those who touch the sacred first-fruits in the field of humanity. In accord with this image are x. 25; 1. 7; Ps. xiv. 4; lxxix. 7.—All who devour, etc. The instruments of discipline though chosen by the Lord Himself, by the manner in which they execute their commission, bring guilt upon themselves and call for the vengeance of Jehovah, as is especially set forth in reference to Babylon. Hab. i. 11; Jer. l. 11; xv. 23, 28; li. 5 (N. B.), 8, 11, 21.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Although in xxxi. 32 Jeremiah represents the covenant made with Israel at the exodus from Egypt as the worse because broken by them, and that a new one in the future, to be kept faithfully by the people, would be opposed to it (comp. xxxii. 40; 1. 5; Isa. lv. 3), and although in Rom. xi. 28 (“as touching the election beloved for the fathers’ sake”) the steadfastness of God is founded entirely on the promise given by Him and on the worth of the fathers in His sight, it is yet evident from our passage that the entering into covenant relation by Israel at the Exodus was not without significance. Though the covenant does not rest positively and in principle on that acceptance, yet this latter appears to be the negative condition sine qua non. Had Israel decidedly rejected Moses, had they refused to follow him into the wilderness, the promise given to the fathers would have been nullified. But if we should say that the people were obliged to believe in and follow Moses, we should injure the law of freedom, and endanger the moral value of human personality as well as the glory of God.

2. Every important historical appearance has its paradise or golden age. It is thus with humanity in general, with Israel, with the Christian Church (Acts ii. 41—iv. 37), with the Reformation, so also with single churches (Gal. iv. 14), and with individual Christians. This period of first, nuptial love does not, however, usually continue long, comp. Rev. ii. 4.

3. As Israel is called the firstling among the nations, so Christians are called the firstlings of His creatures, being regenerated by the word of truth (James i. 18, comp. WIRSINGER in loc., Rev. xiv. 5), in whom first that life-principle is active which is to renew heaven and earth. (Isa. lxxv. 17; lxxvi. 22; Rev. xxi. 1; 2 Pet. iii. 13). And since Israel as the firstling of the nations is called the sanctuary of God, so Christians by virtue of that principle, implanted in them by word and sacrament, of true, divine, eternal life, without regard to their subjective constitution are ἅγιοι, ἡ; ιερῆνοι (1 Cor. i. 2; Acts xx. 32, etc.), the community of the saints, in antithesis to the homo communis, i. e. natural, earthly, profane humanity. Thus as the firstling Israel cannot be devoured by its enemies, so likewise with the Church (community of the saints), Matt. xvi. 18; Luke xxi. 17; Matt. xxviii. 20; Rev. xii. 5, etc.

4. ZINZENDORF: “Jeremiah a preacher of Righteousness,” (S. 148). “Behold this maiden who is here described! Listen to her leaders, Moses and Aaron! Consider the rods with which she has been beaten and that unbelief and disobedience swept all but two away in the desert, and compare that with the words, ‘I remember still that we were together in the wilderness,’ quasi re bene gesta; and with the others which we heard before from Moses: ‘Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee, O people saved by Jehovah,’ (Deut. xxxiii. 29). The cause is to be found in this, ‘Thou followedst me.’”

5. IDEM (S. 150): “In the application to the people it is useful and well to show them that they also were once a maiden who 'followed' partly in the beginnings of the Gospel (see Acts iv. 4), partly in the beginnings of the Reformation. There is an important trace of this in the letter of Luther to the Elector Johann Friedrich. So it then appeared. Likewise in the earlier ages of the Church, even so late as last century, since certainly in the sermons of an Arndt, a Joh. Gerhard, a Selnecker, a Martin Heger, a Scriber, a Spener, a Schade, the people still made quite another figure, and had not only another form, but certainly also a different feeling."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. The period of first love (in a spiritual sense). (1) In experience extremely precious. (2) In duration relatively brief. (3) In effect a source of everlasting blessing.—2. The nuptial state of Christ's Church in its stages. (1) The first stage, first love, (2) second stage, alienation, (3) third stage, return.—3. The covenant of Christ with His Church, (1) its ground, election, (2) its condition, faith, (3) its promise, the Church an indestructible sanctuary.

2. The Infidelity of Israel viewed in the light of the Fidelity of Jehovah and of the Heathen.

II. 4-13.

- 4 Hear ye the word of Jehovah, O house of Jacob!
And all the families of the house of Israel!
- 5 Thus saith Jehovah, What injustice have your fathers found in me,
That they went far from¹ me,
And followed vacuity and became vacuous?
- 6 They said not: Where is Jehovah?
Who brought us up from the land of Egypt,
Who led us through the wilderness,
A land of deserts and pits,
A land of drought and the shadow of death,
A land which no man traversed,
And where no man dwelt?
- 7 And I brought you into the garden-[literally, Carmel-] land
To eat its fruit and its goodliness;
But ye came and defiled my land,
And made my heritage an abomination.
- 8 The priests said not, Where is Jehovah?
And those that handle the law knew me not;
The shepherds also rebelled against me,
And the prophets prophesied by Baal,
And followed those that cannot profit.
- 9 Wherefore I will reckon with you, saith Jehovah,
And with your children's children will I reckon.
- 10 For pass over to the isles [or countries] of Chittim, and see,
And send to Kedar, and well consider,
And see if there has been anything like this.
- 11 Has a people changed² gods, which yet are no gods?
But my people has changed its glory for that which cannot profit.
- 12 Be ye astonished, O ye heavens! at this,
Be ye horrified, utterly amazed [lit., shudder and be withered away], saith Jehovan.
- 13 For my people have committed two evils:
Me they have forsaken, the fountain of living waters,
To hew out for themselves cisterns,
Broken cisterns that hold no water.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 5.—הִיָּרָה [from upon=from near]. Comp. Gen. xxxii. 12; Exod. xxxv. 22; Jer. lli. 18; Am. lli. 15. The Hebrew loves to consider that as cumulation, which we represent as association.

² Ver. 11.—The form הִיָּרָה seems to require the root יָרָה, which occurs besides only in Hithpael, Isa. lxi. 6. Since the form הִיָּרָה follows directly afterwards, the present form may have originated in a mere oversight, as OLSENSEN supposes (‡ 39 f.; 255 o. i.)

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The conduct of Israel is compared (a) with the conduct of Jehovah towards him (vers. 4-9) (b), with the conduct of the heathen nations towards their gods (vers. 10-13.)

Ver. 4. Hear ye . . . house of Israel. Although the reformation of Josiah extended over the rest of the kingdom of Israel (2 Kings xxiii. 15-20; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 33), and although some from the tribes of Israel were present at divine service in Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxv. 18), the expression used here is too comprehensive to designate these only; it includes the whole nation. Comp. Isa. xlvi. 3; Jer. xxxi. 1.—Jeremiah addresses himself not only to those who are actually present, but to an ideal audience: to the whole people of Israel of all times and places, to all those whose common fathers had incurred the guilt reproved in the following verses, and bequeathed it to their descendants. Comp. the address to a still greater circle of ideal hearers, Deut. xxxii. 1; Isa. i. 2; Mic. i. 2; vi. 1, 2.

Ver. 5. Thus saith . . . vacuous. Observe the gradation: your fathers, you (vers. 7 and 9), your children's children; an historical survey which proceeds from the conduct of the fathers in the past and present, to the fate of the children in the future. The prophet by beginning with "the fathers," shows that Israel's ingratitude and disobedience was of ancient date. Moreover, these fathers were not those of any definite period, and therefore not as KIMCHI supposes, those who have lived since the entrance into the promised land. Could those who had accompanied the journey through the desert indeed speak thus?—The expression "What iniquity have your fathers found in me?" is an exhibition of the condescending love of God, who speaks just as though He were under obligation to Israel, and they had a right to call Him to account. Comp. Mic. vi. 3; Isa. v. 3. THEODORET: οὐ γὰρ ὡς κριτὴς κρίνει, ἀλλ' ὡς υπέκθινος ἀπολογίαν προσφέρει, καὶ ἐλεγχομένην βούλει ναὶ εἶπαι πράξει ἀνεῶνα οὐκ ἐπαρθε.—Followed vacuity and became vacuous. הַבָּל are the idols (x. 15; xiv. 22; Deut. xxxii. 21, etc.). He who devotes himself to that which is nothing and vanity, becomes himself vain. LXX. ἰμπατωμένησαν, of which there seems to be a reminiscence in Rom. i. 21. The words are found reproduced verbatim in 2 Kings xvii. 15.

Ver. 6. They said not . . . no man dwelt.—Comp. ver. 8. To ask "where is Jehovah?" is to ask after Him, to seek Him. To ask after him implies that He is forgotten or lightly esteemed. A land of deserts יַבְיָבָה, comp. i. 12; li. 43. שִׁוְיָה, comp. xviii. 20; Prov. xxii. 16; xxiii. 27. They are pits or holes in which man and beast sink. Comp. ROSENMUELLER, ad loc.—Shadow of death. Ps. xxiii. 4; Job iii. 5; xxviii. 3; Isa. ix. 1; Am. v. 8. [For a similar description of the Arabian desert, see ROBINSON, Bibl. Res., II., 502.—S. R. A.]

Ver. 7. And I brought you . . . an abomination.—אֲבִיָּדָה resumes the address of Jehovah from ver. 5. On the subject-matter compare Deut. viii. If פְּרָמֶל stood here in a merely appellative signification, the article would be either superfluous or insufficient. We should expect either merely כְּרָמֶל (or fruitful land, or הַרְמֶל הַזֶּה (in this fruitful land) for Palestine cannot be called the fruitful land κατ' ἰξοχόν, since there are many others more fruitful. To ascribe a demonstrative signification to the article is not allowable, since it has this only in formulas like הַרְפָּזִים הַיֵּשׁ. I believe, therefore, that the Prophet here intended Carmel for a proper name, with a hint, however, at the appellative meaning. So the Vulgate: in terram Carmeli. Carmel, in this reference, is contrasted with the desert, as a mountain with the plain, as a fertile cultivated land of forests, vineyards, gardens, and fields, with the desert sand, as a place of springs with the land of drought. Comp. JEROME on iv. 26.—And its goodness. This addition is not superfluous. The Vau is here the climactic and indeed, Gen. iv. 4.—But ye came. After that has been enumerated which the Lord did for the people, we are told what the people did against their Lord. Herein a comparison is instituted between the conduct of Jehovah and the conduct of the people.

Ver. 8. The priests said not . . . that cannot profit. That which in ver. 6 was laid as a reproach upon all, is now declared specially of the priests. It was their especial duty to seek and inquire after the Lord, comp. רָשָׁה, Jer. x. 21; Ps. ix. 11; xxxiv. 5, "שָׁאֵל, Judges i. 1; xxviii. 5; 1 Sam. xxii. 13; Josh ix. 11.—Who handle the law, not those who decide legal cases, but those who handle the book of the law. We see that the handling is intended in this external sense from the contrast, knew me not. Comp. xviii. 18; Ezek. vii. 26; Mal. ii. 7.—The shepherds ought to keep the flock well together and lead it, and how can they do this when they are themselves in rebellion against the chief shepherd? Comp. x. 21; xii. 10; xxiii. 1; l. 6.—By Baal (xxiii. 13) or through Baal, that is, through the influence and inspiration of Baal. It is opposed to "in the name of Jehovah" xi. 21; xiv. 15; xvi. 9, 20. Remark the antithesis: They would be prophets, and yet are the organs of falsehood, they would be leaders, yet themselves go astray. The imperfect יִיָּרָה is used of a permanent quality. Comp. NÆGELSEN.

Gr., § 87 d. There appears, moreover, in this expression, to be an allusion to בְּלִיעַל (comp. especially בַּל יִעָלֵי Isa. xlv. 9), perhaps also to לֹא אֶלֶּהִים, comp. also 1 Sam. xii. 21.

Ver. 9. Wherefore . . . will I reckon.—The comparison of Israel's conduct in the past and present, with that of Jehovah, results so much to the disadvantage of the former, that in the future, remote as well as proximate, only רִיב litigation is to be expected. Jehovah will now prosecute His claims. Isa. iii. 13; lvii. 16; coll. Ps. ciii. 9.

Ver. 10. For pass over . . . anything like this. Ver. 9 divides the two halves of the strophe, belonging to both, as the statement of the result. It is affixed to the first half by means of וְכִי and prefixed to the second by כִּי. Comp. Am.v. 10-12.—Chittim. The word כִּיִּים or כִּיִּים occurs eight times in the Old Testament: Gen. x. 4 (1 Chron. i. 7), Num. xxiv. 24; Isa. xxiii. 1, 12; Jer. ii. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 6; Deut. xi. 30. Comp. 1 Macc. i. 1; viii. 5. It is acknowledged that it denotes primarily the inhabitants of the "islands of the Eastern Mediterranean" (KNOBEL on Gen. x. 4). The name seems to have been given by way of preference to the island of Cyprus, the ancient capital of which was Citium, (HERZOG, Real-Enc., III. S. 215). We have, therefore, translated כִּיִּים "islands" in preference to "coasts."

It is evident that Chittim, in a wider sense, denoted Greece, and even the North-western coasts of the Mediterranean in general, since according to Dan. xi. 30, Antiochus Epiphanes was attacked by ships from Chittim, according to 1 Macc. i. 1, Alexander the Great, and according to viii. 5, Perseus came from Chittim [pronounced Kittim]. The Chittians are here the representatives of the West, Kedar of the East. For Kedar, according to Gen. xxv. 13, is a son of Ishmael; Jer. xlix. 28, Kedar is reckoned with the men of the East, כְּנָנִי קֶדָר. They are a pastoral people inhabiting the Arabian desert (Isa. xxi. 13-17; xlii. 11; lx. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 21; Ps. cxx. 5; Song of Sol. i. 5). The Rabbins designate the Arabians generally by Kedar. כְּנָנִי קֶדָר is the Arabic language. Comp. KNOBEL on Gen. xxv. 13. BUXTORF, Lex. Talm. et Rabb. p. 1976.—If, וְכִי in the conditional sense as ex. gr. Exod. iv. 1; viii. 22; Isa. liv. 15; Jer. iii. 1. Hence it may also be used as an interrogative particle, like אִם (comp. si in French). It never occurs in this sense, however, except in this passage. The passages, Job xii. 14; xxiii. 8, which FUERST adduces, may be otherwise explained.

Ver. 11. Has a people . . . cannot profit.—But my people has changed, comp. Am. viii. 7.—Which cannot profit. The idols are meant, comp. rem. on ver. 8,—xvi. 19; Hab. ii. 18.—This is the second comparison unfavorable to Israel which is instituted in this strophe. The heathen nations who have good reason to change their gods do not, but Israel, whose pre-eminence over all other nations is founded in their possession of the true God, exchanges Him for vain idols.

Ver. 12. Be ye astonished . . . saith Jehovah. The greatness of the crime can be estimated by none so well as the over-arching heavens, which can behold and compare all that takes place. Comp. Deut. xxxii. 1; Isa. i. 2. חָרָב, to be dry, stiff, is found here only in the sense of to be amazed. The imperative with o, corresponds to the intransitive signification: transitive חָרָב, Jer. i. 27.

Ver. 13. For my people . . . water. The two evils are a negative and a positive. The Lord, the fountain of living waters, who offered Himself to them, they have forsaken, and leaky cisterns they have dug, comp. xvii. 13. In the physical sense the phrase is used in Gen. xxvi. 19; "a well of springing water."—Fountain of living water; Ps. xxxvi. 10; Prov. x. 11; xiii. 14; xvi. 22. "Υδωρ ζῶν, John iv. 10; vii. 37 sqq.—The repetition of בְּאֵרוֹת, cisterns, reminds us of Gen. xiv. 10. Leaky wells are cisterns dug in the ground, which, having cracks in them will not retain the collected rain-water.

לֹא יִעָלֵי reminds us in sense and sound of לֹא יִעָלֵי, ver 8.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God's love is "meek and lowly of heart," Matth. xi. 29, comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 4. It is not a love which desires only to receive. It will take, but only on the ground of that which it has given. But since in giving it has done its duty, in taking it demands its rights. It would reap where it has sowed, and not let the devil reap what God has sowed, Isa. xlii. 8; xlviii. 11. Comp. Matth. xxv. 14-30.

2. Only the true is the real. Falsehood is mere appearance, and all that is based on falsehood, is only an apparent life. It disappears in the fire of judgment, Ps. lxii. 11; cxv. 9; cxxxii. 18.

3. When God tells us, I am doing this for thee, what art thou doing for me? we cannot answer Him one for a thousand. Every sin is at the same time the basest ingratitude towards the greatest benefactor and the most disgraceful rebellion against the truest, the most gracious and wisest Lord.

4. Since priests, pastors, and prophets, who have been regularly inducted into office may be deceivers, it is necessary to try the spirits according to the criterion given in 1 John iv. 1 sqq.

5. As we read here that the heathen adhere more faithfully to their false gods than Israel to the true God, so it is generally confirmed by experience that men, as a rule, pursue a bad cause with more zeal, devotion and wisdom, than a good one. Comp. the case of the unrighteous steward; Luke xvi. 1-8; 1 Kings xviii. 27, 28; Jer. iv. 22.

6. "His people, the nation on which He has bestowed the true religion, have the fountain, they can obtain water without difficulty, as much as they want, but they choose in preference, means difficult, new, insufficient, deceptive, rejected on trial and even in daily experience, rather than be willing to do as they should. Hence come the works of supererogation, the many ceremonies, vows, ecclesiastical regulations, which unquestionably are twice as difficult as to follow the Saviour, and have no promise for this life or for the life to come. . . . The sin is twofold: (1) they do not obey the Lord. (2) They will labor tooth and nail, if only they may not obey Him." ZINZENDORF, ut sup., S. 162.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On ii. 4 sqq. The ingratitude of man towards God: (1) It is not to be laid to the charge of God (2). It consists in this, that men (a) forget the divine benefits, (b) they adhere to idols (both coarse and refined), (3). It does not remain unpunished.

2. On ver. 12. ["These strongest terms in the language show how intensely amazed all the holy in heaven are at the monstrous folly of human sinning. That when men might have the infinite God for their Friend, they choose to have Him their enemy; that when they might have Him their exhaustless portion of unmeasured and eternal good, they spurn Him away and set themselves to the fruitless task of making some ruinous substitute: this is beyond measure amazing! Verily, sin is a mockery of human reason! It defies all the counsels of prudence and good sense, and glories only in its own shame and madness:" COWLES.—S. R. A.]

3. On ver. 13. All hunger and thirst is a desire for nourishment by those elements which are necessary to life. This brings us to the question:

What can quench the thirst of the soul?

1. It cannot be quenched by drawing from the broken cisterns of earthly good.

2. It can be quenched only by drawing from the fountain of life, from which the soul originally sprang, even from God.

4. On ii. 13. "Our double sin. It consists in this, that we (1) have forsaken the Lord, the living fountain, and (2) have dug for ourselves cisterns which hold no water." GENZKEN, Epistelpredigten, 1853.—"How is it that the Lord has to say, they have forsaken me, the living spring? It arises from this, that the hewn cisterns please us better. The creature attracts us so powerfully, all that is below has such an influence on the wavering heart, that it is drawn away from the living spring, and finds the cistern-water of this world more to its taste than the living water, the living God and His word." HOCHSTETTER. "Twelve Parables from the prophet Jer.," 1865, S. 6, sq. ["This may be applied to every sinner: qui relicto fonte fodit sibi cisternas rimosas; and to heretics: qui purum doctrine fontem in Scripturis et Ecclesia Dei deserunt et fodunt sibi cisternas cœnosas falsorum dogmatum (S. IRENEUS, III. 40; S. CYPRIAN, Ep. 40; A. LAPIDE). Comp. Eccclus. xxi. 13, 14, and Bp. SANDERSON, I. 361." WORDSWORTH. Comp. THOMSON, The Land and the Book, I. 443.—S. R. A.]

5. Those who have forsaken the true God, the Creator of all, and serve false gods, are worthy that all creatures should refuse them service. Deut. xxviii. 23. STARKE.

3. Israel's Punishment and its Cause.

II. 14-19.

- 14 Was Israel a slave? Was he a house-born (slave)?
Why then is he become a spoil?
- 15 The young lions roar over him,
They raise their voice,
And they made his land desolate:
His cities were burned up¹ without an inhabitant.²
- 16 Even the children of Noph and Tahpanhes³
Will depasture the crown of thy head.
- 17 Did not thy forsaking⁴ of Jehovah, thy God, procure thee this,
At the time when he was leading thee⁵ in the way?
- 18 And now what hast thou to do⁶ in the way to Egypt,
To drink the water of the Black river [Nile]?
And what hast thou to do in the way to Assyria,
To drink the water of THE river [Euphrates]?
- 19 Thine own wickedness shall correct thee,
And thine apostasies shall punish thee,
That thou mayest know and see⁷ how evil and bitter it is,
That thou hast forsaken Jehovah thy God,
And that⁸ the fear of me⁹ is not in thee,
Saith the Lord Jehovah of Hosts.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 15.—The Keri נִצְתָה is an unnecessary correction by the Masoretes, who here as in xxii. 6, regarded the plural as necessary with יָרָו. But the singular may be used, in accordance with the capacity of the 3d Per. Fem. Sing., to involve an ideal plural. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 105, 4, 6. EWALD, § 317, a. Whether נִצְתָה is derived from נָצַת (comp. EWALD, § 140, a.

FUERST, s. v. צִתָּה יִצֵּת to kindle (OLSHAUSEN regards it as a derivative from a root כּוּן, Lehrb. d. Hebr. Spr., S. 591), or נָצַת to destroy (iv. 7; ix. 11; Isa. xxxvii. 26; 2 Kings xix. 25) is undecided.

² Ver. 15.—כִּבְּלֵי יִשְׁבֹּן מִן מֵן is not to be taken as causal but local = away from without. Comp. iv. 7; ix. 9, 10, 11. There are two negatives: without no inhabitant. GESEN., § 152, 2.

⁵ Ver. 17.—פִּיעֵת כּוֹלֵי־בֶן, we should expect הוֹלִי־בֶן. The participle is used in a somewhat unusual manner, as concretum pro abstracto.

⁷ Ver. 19.—וּרְעִי וּרְאֵי. The intended consequences are represented as a command. Comp. Ps. cxxviii. 5; Gen. xx. 7; xii. 2; Ruth i. 9; EWALD, § 347, a. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 90, 2.

⁹ Ver. 19.—פִתְרֵתִי might be taken in an objective sense like כִּרְאֲבִים, Gen. ix. 2 (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 64, 4) = timor mei. אֵל would then have to be taken as a fortified ל as it in fact occurs, ex. gr., after verbs like נָתַן (Exod. xxv. 16) נִכְשָׁל (Isa. xiv. 10) נִנְהָל (1 Sam. ii. 27). But the suffix may also be regarded as the genitive of subject = terror, quem injicio. Then the construction would be entirely like that in Job xxxi. 23, פֶּה־אֵלִי and אֵל would be taken in its proper sense: my fear enters not into thee. The latter view seems to me the more correct, because in this the preposition receives its full significance.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In a new picture the prophet sees Israel in the form of slaves, evil entreated and dragged away by enemies, their land desolated, their cities destroyed. He asks the question: Why is this? The answer is: This is the consequence of their revolt from Jehovah, and their devotion to their idols.

Ver. 14. Was Israel a slave? . . . become a spoil? Who is the interrogator? God, the people, the prophet, or some other? Not the people; for this condition of misery is still future, perceived only prophetically, therefore still hidden from the people. It would then also read עַבְדִּי אֲרִצִּי. God also is not the questioner, for He it is who is asked, and who answers, (vers. 17, 18). A third person at a distance cannot be the interrogator, since the subject of inquiry being still future is not known by him. The prophet only can be the questioner. He perceives prophetically the future calamitous condition of his people, and he implores from God a disclosure concerning it.—As to the import of the question, it cannot possibly be regarded as requiring an affirmative answer, as HIRZIG supposes, explaining the meaning: “for is not Israel the servant of God or son of the house?”

For, 1. We must then read הֵלֵא; 2. We must then have יְבִר יהוה, or עֲבָדֶי; 3. יְלִיד בֵּית, never signifies the son of the house, but always the house-born slave in opposition to one who is bought. Gen. xiv. 14; xvii. 12, 13, 23, 27; Lev. xxii. 11.—The question must then be one requiring a negative answer; Israel is not a purchased slave but one born in the house. But how then could he be left like a mere thing for a spoil to the enemy? How far this has taken place is shown in the following verse.

Ver. 15. The young lions roar . . . without an inhabitant. This is the condition of Israel which the prophet sees with prophetic glance, and from which it seems to proceed that Israel has ceased to be God's son (comp. Ex. iv. 22; Deut. xxvi. 18; xxxii. 9 sqq.). עָלֵי GRAF renders = against him, because the lion only growls (הִנָּה) Isa. xxxi. 4) over prey that is slain. Strange! As though the lion could not roar for joy and from a desire for more, etc. Comp. Am. iii. 4. The connection requires the sense of “over,” since Israel appears to have already become a prey; his land is wasted, his cities destroyed. On this account the inquiry is made, whether then he is a slave and no longer Jehovah's first-born son. The imperfect עֲנָנִי denotes that the fact is not yet an objective reality but still pertains to the subjective conception of the prophet. What further follows is nevertheless represented as present or past. Comp. NAEGELSB., Gr. § 84, h.

Ver. 16. Even the children of Noph . . . thy head.—נָךְ (Isa. xix. 13; Jer. xlv. 1; xlv. 14, 19; Ezek. xxx. 13, 16) or כָּךְ (only in Hos. ix. 6; both forms are explained by the Egyptian

Mon-nufi, see Arnold in HERZOG Real-Enc. Art. Memphis), is the Hebrew name for Memphis, the ancient capital of lower Egypt. Tahpanhes (Δάφνη Πελούσια, Herod. II. 30. Τάφνας not Τάφναι, LXX. Jer. xliii. 8, 9; xlv. 1), was a fortified border city to the east. In these two cities especially, the Jews who fled to Egypt after the murder of Gedaliah, appear to have settled (xliiii. 7; xlv. 1; xlv. 14).—Depasture the crown, etc. Triple explanation: 1. The LXX and translations dependent upon it appear to have read פָּעַרְךָ or פָּעַרְךָ. For they translate ἐγρῶσάν σε καὶ κατέπαυσάν σε (the latter probably κατὰ σύνεσιν). The Vulgate also has constupraverunt te usque ad verticem. 2. Most expositors up to the time of the Reformation follow the Peschito version in translating affligent, contudent, contenter. They derive the word from פָּעַרְךָ confregit. 3. The only grammatically admissible derivation from פָּעַרְךָ pascere, depascere is found first (according to SEB. SCHMIDT) in LUTHER (but not in his translation). He is followed by most of the modern commentators. But it is decidedly wrong to take the imperfect here in the past sense, as GRAF does. If a definite, past fact, viz., the incursion of Shishak (1 Kings xiv. 25 sq.) were alluded to, we should have the perfect here. For there is no occasion to render this act of depasturing as taking place in the past (comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 87, 3). We are rather led by the mention of Noph and Tahpanhes to the conclusion that something in the future, resulting from the residence of the Jews in the places named (xliiii. 7; xlv. 1) is alluded to. We read in xlii. 15-22, that Jeremiah predicted complete destruction to the Jews who were proposing to flee from the vengeance of Nebuchadnezzar into Egypt. Particularly in xlv. 12 he insists that the last remnant of the fugitives in Egypt would be destroyed (ver. 14, "none of the remnant of Judah, which are gone into the land of Judah to sojourn there, shall escape or remain"). To this I refer the depasturing of the crown. The last and only covering, the natural covering of the hair, shall be taken from Judah, he shall be made entirely bald, that is, he shall be entirely swept away: "and they shall all be consumed," xlv. 12. ["The hair of the head being held in high estimation among the Hebrews, baldness was regarded as ignominious and humbling." HENDERSON.—S. R. A.] In the meantime I confess that the definite mention by name of these places is remarkable. The prophet has hitherto mentioned no names. As was shown above on i. 41 sqq., he does not yet know what nation is appointed for the accomplishment of the divine judgment on Judah. Why, when he is ignorant of the northern enemy, should he know so exactly the southern, who in comparison with the former is of almost no importance? Although I cannot agree with Ewald that vers. 14-17 did not originally belong here, since if we divide correctly, there is no break in the connection, yet ver. 16 may possibly be an addition which the prophet himself made when writing out his book the second time (xxxvi. 32), after the destruction of Jerusalem in Palestine or in Egypt. (Comp. Comm. on i. 3 and ii. 36, and the Introduction to chapter ii). ["I render it,

"The children of Noph and Tahpanhes have pastured down the crown of thy head."—Memphis and Daphne, distinguished cities of Egypt, are here put for Egypt herself. Jehoiakim made a league with Egypt, but was subjected to severe and shameful taxation. Such a process of slaving, taxation and consequent disgrace our passage forcibly describes." COWLES.—S. R. A.]

Ver. 17. Did not thy . . . leading thee in the way? The fate of the people described in vers. 14-16, so directly contradictory to the filial relation, is explained by their revolt from Jehovah. Comp. iv. 18.—This, is without doubt the object, forsaking, the subject. As here the leader is put for the leading, so elsewhere the proclaimer for the message (Isa. xli. 27), the destroyer for the destruction (Exod. xii. 13), the shooter for the shot (Gen. xxi. 16), the retractor for the retraction (Gen. xxxviii. 29). Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 50, 2; 61, 2 b, and below, ver. 25 פָּעַרְךָ and the remarks thereon.—The expression leading thee points back to led thee, ver. 6. It is not then God's leading in general which is meant, but His leading through the desert, the rather, as the following verse shows that their forsaking of Him was not confined to the time of their pilgrimage. ["Most of the moderns take לְךָ to be the nominative to the verb and in opposition to פָּעַרְךָ and render: 'Is it not this that hath procured it to thee,—thy forsaking,' etc.; but the common rendering seems more appropriate, as it includes both the agent and the act, charging directly on the former the guilt contracted by the latter.—By the way is meant the right way, the way of the Lord; and the leading of the Jews therein denotes the whole of the moral training which they enjoyed under the Mosaic dispensation. In spite of every motive to the contrary, they forsook Jehovah as the object of their fear and confidence." HENDERSON.—S. R. A.]

Ver. 18. And now what hast thou to do in the way to Egypt . . . to drink the water of the river? פָּעַרְךָ is in antithesis to פָּעַרְךָ ver. 17. The latter points to the ancient time, the former to the present. The way to Egypt according to the analogy of Am. viii. 14, is not the Egyptian idol-worship. We see this from the statement of its object,—to drink the water of Shihor. The sense is, what will the way to Egypt (or Assyria) avail thee, which thou takest in order to drink the water of the Nile, &c.: that is, to draw from this source power and re-invigoration, i. e. to procure help in Egypt (or Assyria)? Here the question arises, whether the facts experienced by the prophet were the occasion of this mode of expression. Josiah so far from seeking to obtain help from the Egyptians lost his life in contending against them (2 Ki. xlii. 29; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20). He did not undertake this contest as an ally of Assyria, for his object undoubtedly was to prevent these powers from encountering each other. Comp. the Article "Josiah" in HERZOG, Real-Enc.—Subsequently, indeed (Jer. xxxvii. 5; comp. 2 Ki. xlv. 20, and Jer. xliii.), we find Jeremiah's contemporaries laying claim to aid from Egypt, but at the same time the northern empire, by which we must understand Assyria, was the enemy which menaced them. Hence it appears that Jeremiah does not here, as in ver. 16 and probably also in ver. 3, allude to definite facts of recent date, but that he has in view only in general the propensity repeatedly manifested in the later history of Israel since Phul to seek help from the two heathen empires between which it was placed, instead of from Jehovah. In this period Egypt and Assyria are, as it were, two poles, which are always mentioned together in a stereotyped form in the most various connections. (Hos. xi. 11; Isa. vii. 23; x. 24; xix. 23 sqq.; xxvii. 13; lii. 4; Ezek. xxxi.) Particularly the seeking aid from Egypt and Assyria is a reproach made both by the older prophets (Hos. vii. 11, "They call to Egypt, they go to Assyria," xii. 2, comp. xi. 5) by his contemporaries (Ezek. xvi. 26 sqq.; xxiii. 2) and by Jeremiah himself elsewhere (Lam. v. 6). There is therefore no reason here for the inquiry whether by Assyria Jeremiah meant Babylon, for he has really, at least in the first intention, the true Assyria in mind.—שְׁחֹרֵר here as in Isa. xxiii. 3 is the Nile. The name signifies "the black, black-water" (Leyrer, Art. Sîchor in HERZOG R.-Enc.); hence, also, among the Greeks and Romans the name Mélag, Melo, from the black mud of the Nile (Comp. Servius on Virg. Georg. IV. 288 sqq. Æn. I. 745, IV. 246). נַהַר the Euphrates, as in Gen. xxxi. 21; Exod. xxiii. 31; Numb. xxii. 5, &c.

Ver. 19. Thine own wickedness shall correct thee . . . Jehovah of hosts. There is here a reference to vers. 17, 18. The wickedness described in these verses will correct Israel, that is, will produce the effects portrayed in vers. 14–16, and this correction will lead Israel to shameful but yet wholesome knowledge.—

Apostasies (אֲשֵׁרִיָּה) is a word used especially by Jeremiah. Except in this book it occurs in only three passages (Prov. i. 32; Hos. xi. 7; xiv. 5), the plural only in Jer. iii. 22; v. 6; xiv. 7. With this the train of thought in this strophe seems to conclude. It begins with astonishment at the desolate condition of the people (ver. 14 to ver. 16), then explains why it must be so (vers. 17, 18), and finally designates salutary knowledge as the intended effect of this severe discipline (ver. 19). The full form, "Saith the Lord," &c., seems to denote the close of a section. The following strophe, though an independent tableau, is closely connected with the preceding, opening a deeper insight into the source of the apostasy described in vers. 17–19.

3. The lust of idolatry: deeply rooted, outwardly insolent, false at last.

II. 20–28.

- 20 For from of old thou hast broken thy yoke,¹
 Thou hast burst thy bonds,
 And hast said, I will not serve.
 For upon every high hill
 And under every green tree
 Thou stretchest thyself as a harlot.
- 21 And yet I had planted thee a noble² vine,
 It was wholly of genuine seed.³
 But how art thou changed⁴ with respect to me
 Into bastards of a strange vine!
- 22 For though thou wash thyself with alkali
 And take thee much of the soap,
 Yet thine iniquity is a stain before me,
 Saith the Lord Jehovah.
- 23 How canst thou then say: I am not polluted,
 I have not followed the Baalim.
 Look at thy way in the valley!
 Know what thou hast done!
 A she camel, young, fast, involving her courses;
- 24 A wild she-ass,⁵ accustomed to the desert;
 In the desire of her soul she gasps for air,
 Her leaping,⁶ who can repel it?
 All, who seek her, become not weary;
 In her month they find her.

- 25 Guard thy foot from the loss of shoe,
And thy throat⁷ from thirst!
But thou sayest: In vain! No!
- 26 For I love strangers, and after them I will go.
As a thief is ashamed when caught,
So the house of Israel is put to shame,
They, their kings, their princes, their priests, their prophets:
- 27 Who say to a block, My father thou!
And to a stone, Thou hast begotten me.⁸
For they turn to me the back and not the face,
But in the time of their calamity
They say, Up and deliver us!
- 28 But where are thy gods which thou madest for thyself?
Let them arise, if they can save thee in the time of thy trouble.
For as many as thy cities
Are thy gods, O Judah!

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 20.—The Masoretes take שְׁבֵרְתִי and נִתְקַתִּי as in the first person. So, also, the Chaldee and Syriac versions and most of the Jewish expositors. As אֵיבֹר then, does not give a good meaning, unless with the Syriac, we arbitrarily assume the false gods to be objects of service, the Keri reads אֵיבֹר which must then be taken in the sense—transgredi verbum dicendum. But neither does יָבֵר occur in this sense without an accusative of the object, nor does this explanation suit the following כִּי.—The Masoretic punctuation is therefore erroneous, and the words are to be punctuated as 2nd Pers. Fem. according to the analogy of ver. 33: iii. 4, 5; iv. 19; xliii. 21; xxii. 23; xlvi. 11; Ezek. xvi. 18, 20, 22, 31, 36, 43, 44, 47, 51, etc. Comp. on this form Ewald, § 190 c; OLSHAUSEN, § 226, b; 232, h; and NÆGELS. Gr. § 21. Ann. 3.

² Ver. 21.—שׁוֹרֶק only here and in Isai. v. 2. The fem. form שְׂרָקָה Gen. xlix. 11.

³ Ver. 21.—זֵרַע אֱכָתָה literally: seed of truth, i. e. genuine seed, (Comp. Prov. xi. 18), opposed to נְכַרְיָה נִפְן.

⁴ Ver. 21.—כֹּרֶךְ. The passive participial form (Comp. Ewald, § 143, f) occurs, except here, only in the fem. form כֹּרְיָה (Isai. xlix. 21) and as Keri, Jer. xvii. 13. (Chethibh יִכְרֵי.) The meaning is not doubtful,—anomalous, alienated, bastard.

⁸ Ver. 27.—יִלְדֵתֶנִּי. So according to xv. 10 the Chethibh is to be spoken. The Keri יִלְדֵתֶנִּי is occasioned by אֲכָרִים, but needlessly, for the sing. may be used collectively. Those who pronounce יִלְדֵתֶנִּי overlook the fact that אֵת precedes, and that this second member is doubtless intended to designate the part of the mother. Wool my father,—a stone my mother!

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Israel's propensity to idolatry is ancient (ver. 20), deeply rooted (vers. 21, 22), yet at the same time betraying itself outwardly by the most passionate behaviour (vers. 23-25), but finally causing deep shame on account of the nothingness of its objects (vers. 26-28). The connection with the previous strophe is this, that here the forsaking of Jehovah (ver. 17), and the wickedness and apostasies (ver. 19), are more particularly explained.

The כִּי is, therefore, to be regarded as explicative.

Ver. 20. For from of old . . . as a harlot. עֲרֹלָם here as frequently (comp. Isa. xlii. 14; xlv. 9; lxiii. 16; Ps. xxiv. 7, etc.), is used of inconceivable duration.—Israel is compared with wild refractory draught cattle ('a bullock untrained,' xxxi. 18; a 'backsliding heifer,' Hos. iv. 16), because they refuse the discipline and guidance of the Lord (comp. v. 5; Prov. ii. 3), and are obstinate in carrying out their own carnal will.

—I will not serve. The second כָּ is also explicative. It forms the transition to the explanation of the imagery employed in Hemist. a.—Every high hill, etc., a frequent designation of the places especially sacred to the worship of nature. Comp. 1 Kings xiv. 23; 2 Kings xvi. 4; xvii. 10; Isa. lvii. 5; Jer. iii. 6, 13; xvii. 2; Ezek. vi. 13.—Stretchest thyself. מִצָּרְתָּ occurs only in Isa. li. 14 of one who is bound and thus bent crooked, in Isa. lxiii. 1 of the strong man, who bends proudly backwards; Jer. xlvi. 12 of the vessel, which we bend over in order to pour from it. Hence it seems to be used in the sense of παρακλινεσθαι or inclinari of the bending of the body in a woman who lies with a man. Comp. מִצָּרְתָּ of the man, in Job xxxi. 10.

Ver. 21. And yet I had planted thee . . . strange vine.—And I stands in strong antithesis to thou, ver. 20.—The antithesis is similar, which Isaiah sets forth between the vineyard for which all has been done, and the proprietor, whose hope is disappointed, Isa. v. 1 sqq. Comp. Ps. lxxx. 9 sqq.—That we are not to translate (with EWALD) as: “I have planted thee with noble vines,” as in Isa. v. 2, is clear from the identity of the object of נָטַעְתָּ with the subject of נִהְפַּכְתָּ.—Noble vine, properly reddish from שֵׁשֶׁרֶץ splendere, subrubescendum esse, comp. Isa. xi. 8; Zech. i. 8, and KOEHLER, ad loc.—That the red wine was considered the nobler, may be inferred from the fact that it was prescribed for the feast of the Passover. See LIGHTFOOT, Hor. Hebr. p. 478.—But how art thou changed, etc. It is not inadmissible to regard כִּי as the accusative, as GRAF, HIRTZ, and others suppose. The mere accusative frequently stands in apposition with the object, (or in passive construction with the subject, where we use a preposition of motion, and the Hebrew more commonly uses לְ, comp. לִילָה הִחֲשִׁיבֵךְ. Am. v. 8; vi. 11; Isa. xxviii. 38; xxxvii. 26. See NAEGELSB., Gr. § 69, 3.—The absence of the article before נִכְרָה is certainly abnormal, but not without example: xxii. 26; Isa. xxxvii. 4, 17; 2 Sam. vi. 3. See NAEGELSB. Gr. § 73, 2. Ann.

Ver. 22. For though thou wash thyself . . . thy iniquity is a stain before me. כִּי is causal. Israel is to be compared with degenerate vines; their depravation, therefore, is essential, since it cannot be removed by outward means.—This figure of speech is based on the work of the fuller. For simple washing is רָחַץ; כָּבַס properly to tread, to stamp, is the technical expression for the work of the fuller. Hence, also, we have Piel here, comp. NAEGELSB., Gr. § 41, 2; G1, 2, c. הִכְבַּסְתָּ is, therefore, properly, even if thou doest the work of a fuller, comp. Mal. iii. 2. The reflexive meaning is implied in the connection, and is sufficiently indicated by the following לָךְ נִתְרָם. נִתְרָם vitæ, is a mineral, פְּרִיִת (כָּר among the Greeks and Romans, also called nitrum) is a vegetable alkali. The former is obtained from water, the latter from the soap-plant. Comp. WINER, R. B. W., s. v. Laugensatz. [THOMSON, The Land and the Book, II. pp. 302, 303.—S. R. A.]—נִתְרָם is an ἀπαξ λεγόμενον. Some commentators render it (= כָּתַב) “ingrained, indelibly engraven is thy guilt.” Some render, “hidden, laid up,” others; “spotted, dirty, a stain.” The last meaning, which is certified by the dialects (Aram. מַחְתָּא macula, מַחְתָּא maculosus) is also required by the connection. Comp. Ps. li. 3, 9.

Ver. 23. How canst thou then say ? . . . involving her courses. The prophet has in mind an assertion actually made and often repeated by his contemporaries. This is the sense of the imperfect, comp. NAEGELSB., Gr. § 87, c.—Thy way in the valley, נָחַל must mean a definite valley, since hills, and not valleys were the places usually appropriated by the Israelites to idolatrous worship. In the vicinity of Jerusalem there was, however, a valley celebrated as a place of worship; the vale of Hinnom (vii. 31; xxix. 2, 6; xxxii. 35; Josh. xv. 8; 2 Kings xxiii. 10).—That the valley might be called absolutely נָחַלִּים is seen from the fact that the gate leading to it was called absolutely שַׁעַר הַנָּחַל (2 Chron. xxvi. 9; Neh. ii. 13, 15), comp. RAUMER, Palästina, 4 Aufl. S. 291.—A she-camel, etc., כַּבְרָה and פָּרָה stand in apposition to the subject of the preceding sentence, (viz., Israel. The former is feminine of כֶּבֶד, comp. Isa. lx. 6), camel-foal. The (unused) root כָּבַר signifies “to be early there,” hence כָּבַר, כֶּבֶד, כִּשְׁבָרָה is found here only as a verb. It means to “weave, cross, involve.” Hence שַׁרְוֹן shoestring, Gen. xiv. 23; Isa. v. 27.

Ver. 24. A wild she-ass . . . they find her. It is clear that the female is meant both from the connection and the construction of the following sentence:—Accustomed to the desert, (Job xxiv. 5; xxxix. 5), therefore, in general shy, wild and unconfined.—All who seek her, etc. Since they meet her half-way, there is no need to weary themselves with seeking her. In her month, that is, in her period of heat, they find her. This is the natural rendering. Other artificial explanations are found in J. D. MICHAELIS, Obsv., p. 17, and in ROSENMUELLER, ad h. loc.

Ver. 25. Guard thy foot . . . after them I will go. As a further proof of the intensity of this proneness to idolatry (vers. 21 and 22), the prophet adduces the answer of the people to all warnings against it, their decided declaration that they would not relinquish it. The words of admonition, “Guard,” etc., are not to be regarded as spoken by commission from the Lord. The figure of passionate running is continued, but man is now understood as the subject.—The construction is that of the concrete for the abstract. Comp. 1 Sam. xv. 23, where it reads “hath rejected thee from king,” while afterwards it is, “hath rejected thee from being king,” ver. 26 and viii. 7; in xvi. 1, it is “from reigning.” Comp. further ver. 17 and 1 Kings xv. 13; Ezek. xvi. 41.—נָחַר־ is not of the same gender as נָחַל, being feminine, but this variation is of no account. See remark on ver. 24.—We might as well translate: “Hold back thy foot, to be somewhat unshod,” as in Ps. lxxiii. 2, נָטַי רַגְלִי means inclinatum aliquid sunt pedes mei.—On the general subject, comp. xxxi. 16; Prov. i. 15.—As to the import of the warning, we are certainly not to take לָנֶפֶס with SCHNURRER, ROSENUELLER and others, as in Gen. xlix. 10; Deut. xxviii. 57; Ezek. xvi. 25 in the sense of crura et pudenda, and the disculeatio as denudatio. The prophet would merely say, 'Cease from thy mad running after idols, from which nothing accrues to thee, but wounded feet and a dry throat, i. e., bitter injury instead of the expected advantage.'—פָּנָה Part. Niph., from פָּנָה (comp. 1 Sam. xxvii. 1; Job vi. 26; Isa. lvii. 10; Jer. xviii. 12) = desperatum, perditum. The sense is: the warning is in vain. אֵין No! as in Gen. xlii. 10; Numb. xxii. 30, etc.—The following verses portray the contrast between the passionate striving of Israel after the favor of their gods, and the results thereof.

Vers. 26 and 27. As a thief . . . deliver us. Comp. Exod. xxii. 1, 6, 7. The thief is ashamed not merely because he is caught in his wickedness, but because at the moment of discovery he makes a ridiculous figure. Israel also plays this ridiculous part when the "poodle's heart" is displayed.—Put to shame. Comp. vi. 15; viii. 9, 12.—Who say, אָמְרִים, apposition to the nomen determinatum without the article, as frequently in the later books. See NAEGELSB., Gr. § 97, 2 a.—For they turn to me the back, etc. This period to the end of ver. 28, shows in three clauses the shameful character of idol-worship: (a) they turn their back on me; (b) in the time of calamity I am yet to help them; (c) I cannot then do so, but must direct them to their gods. These, however, are nowhere to be found, though as numerous as the cities in Israel.

Ver. 28. But where are thy gods.—O Judah! This inquiry is made of the idolaters as a punishment for their having previously made it in scorn of the faithful, comp. Ps. xlii. 4, 11; lxxix. 10; cxv. 2.—If they can save. We are reminded of Deut. xxxii. 37, 38. See KRUPPER, S. G. Comp. xi. 12. The indirect interrogative sentence is best understood as dependent on a verb to be supplied: let us see? For as many as the cities, etc., is repeated verbatim in xi. 13. וְיִשָּׁע is causal. One would think they could save thee, since they are so numerous. The close of this strophe corresponds to the close of the preceding, (ver. 19).

5. Whose is the guilt?

II. 29-37.

- 29 Why do you contend against Me?
Ye have, all of you, offended against Me, saith Jehovah.
- 30 In vain have I smitten your children,
Chastisement they have not accepted.
Your sword has devoured your prophets
Like a ravening lion.
- 31 O ye generation! see the word of Jehovah:
Have I been a desert, O Israel?
Or a land of deepest night?¹
Why do my people say: We ramble,²
No more will we come to thee?
- 32 Can a virgin forget her ornaments?—
A bride her girdle?
But my people have forgotten Me days without number.
- 33 How well trimmest thou thy way to seek love intrigue!
Therefore also to wickedness thou hast accustomed³ thy ways.
- 34 Even on thy skirts [wings] has been found
The blood of the souls of poor innocents.
Not at the place of burglary have I found it,
But on all these.
- 35 Yet thou sayest,⁴ I am innocent,⁵
Surely His anger is turned from me.
Behold, I enter into judgment with thee concerning this,
That thou sayest: I have not sinned.
- 36 How goest thou asunder⁶ much in changes of thy ways?
Even by Egypt shalt thou be put to shame,
As thou hast been put to shame by Assyria.

37 Also from thence^r wilt thou go forth, thy hands on thy head,
For Jehovah rejects thy supports,
And thou wilt have no success with them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 31.—כַּאֲפֵלִיאַ is ἀπαξ λεγ. Composed of כָּאֵפֶל and יה = caligo Jovæ, as שֵׁלֶה־בֶּת־יה = God's flame (of love) Cant. viii. 6. יה serves to enhance the force of the expression according to the analogy of הַרְרֵי אֵל "great deep," Ps. xxxvi. 6. תְּרַמְּבֵי 1 Sam. xxvi. 12, חֲרָרֶת אֵל 1 Sam. xiv. 15.—יה is also punctuated הֵי in connections, ex. gr., xxvii. 1, etc. The Masoretes have given two accents to the whole word in the text, because they were uncertain as to the etymology of the syllable יה and consequently as to its accentuation. KIMCHI found כַּאֲפֵלִיאַ in some codices, which EWALD also accepts and translates simply "darkness" ad form. כַּבְּלִיָּה viii. 18, coll. עֵלִיָּה, עֵלִיָּה.

² Ver. 31.—וְרָר only in Gen. xxvii. 40; Ps. li. 3; IIs. xii. 1. Radical signification vagari. We are not with ROSENMÜLLER to translate vagabundus. The perfect is used expressly to designate an accomplished fact.

³ Ver. 33.—לְכֹרֶת־י. On this form comp. rem. on ver. 20.—On the double accusative comp. EWALD, § 283, c; NÆGELSB. Gr., § 69, 2, c.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

As in the beginning of the discourse (ver. 5), the prophet proceeds on the ground, that Israel's revolt cannot be excused by any neglect on the part of Jehovah, but Israel is alone to blame (ver. 20). The Lord has allowed nothing to fail: neither discipline (ver. 30), nor the necessities of life (ver. 31), not even ornament and splendor (ver. 32). But the people have shown a taste and fitness only for the service of idols (ver. 33 a). The consequence is two-fold: (1) deep moral corruption (ver. 33 b-34) which at the same time affords the most striking proof of the rebellion of the people, which they boldly deny (ver. 35); (2) the shame of the people resulting from their political and religious wanderings (vers. 36, 37).

Ver. 29. Why do you contend . . . saith Jehovah. Israel's propensity to complain of the Lord was displayed even in the wilderness at Meribah (Exod. xvii. 2, 3, 7), and that Jeremiah's contemporaries manifested the same disposition is evident from v. 19; xiii. 22; xvi. 10. Not I, saith the Lord, towards you have failed, but you towards Me, even all of you. Comp. ver. 26.—The following verses enumerate what the Lord has done for Israel. Three things are mentioned; first, discipline.

Ver. 30. In vain . . . ravening lion—לִשְׂאֵן in vain, used only by Jeremiah among the prophets, iv. 30; vi. 29; xlvi. 11. Comp. besides, Exod. xx. 7; Deut. v. 11; Ps. xxiv. 4; cxxxix. 20.—אֶת־בְּנֵי־כֶם cannot be taken in a proper sense = your young men, as HIRTZ maintains, for Jehovah's blows were upon the whole people. When we reflect that the persons smitten by the Lord are those, who instead of accepting chastisement, slay God's servants, and further, that these same are afterwards, ver. 31, addressed as generation, and previously, in ver. 28, as Judah, there can be no doubt that the prophet has here in view the abstract communities, the people being designated as their children. Comp. v. 7; Lev. xix. 18; Joel iv. 6; Zech. ix. 13.—The smiting had not the intended effect (comp. v. 3) but was answered by the murder of the prophets, 1 Ki. xviii. 4, 13; 2 Chron. xxiv. 20 sqq. Comp. Matth. xxiii. 35, 37; Luke xi. 47, etc.—The second fact, with which the charge is indignantly repelled, is Jehovah's liberal provision for all the wants of the people.

Ver. 31. O ye generation . . . come to thee? The first words of this verse are attached by JEROME and MAURER to the preceding verse: tanquam leo vastator est hæc vestra ætas. But the beginning of the following sentence is then altogether too bald. It is better to take them as in the vocative, and the subject of the following verb. On the article with the vocative, comp. EWALD, § 327, a; NÆGELSB. Gr., § 71, Ann. 4.—It is disputed whether יהִי is to be taken in the sense of "age, generation" (EWALD: "The present people") or in the sense of "race, kind, breed." It is not clear why the generation then living should be rendered so expressly prominent. יהִי does not occur again, at least not alone in a bad sense. But from passages like vii. 29; Deut. i. 35; xxxii. 5; Ps. lxxviii. 8; Prov. xxx. 11 it is evident that the word is at any rate capable of such a determinatio in malam partem.—ראו See, comp. ver. 19, is a stronger הִנֵּה. The word of the Lord is held before them with the demand that they regard it.—Desert, i. e., barren land, where no bodily nourishment or necessaries are found.—Here follows the third point, which the Lord has not neglected; glory and adornment. He is Himself IIs people's highest glory, Israel's crown of glory is He (Gen. ix. 27; Isa. xxviii. 5). But they have forgotten this emblem of royalty, which causes them to rank above all other nations. The Lord is however Israel's jewel as her husband. This is the thought which suggests the figure in ver. 32.

Ver. 32. Can a virgin forget . . . without number? קַשְׁרִים besides only in Isa. iii. 20. Comp. Isa. xlix. 18. Is it a girdle or a fillet? DRECHSLER on Isa. l. c. translates "a small girdle of fine material," which unites both meanings.—The failure then is not in this, that the Lord has forgotten to make provision for the adornment of His bride, but that the bride has forgotten to make use of the ornament. Comp. xviii. 14.—Days without number. Comp. of old, ver. 20.

Ver. 33. How well trimmest thou . . . accustomed thy ways. לִבְיָסִיב cannot here be rendered in the sense of bonum simulare, exornare, as many of the ancients rendered, because then the following לִבְקֵשׁ אַהֲבָה does not afford a suitable meaning. It is therefore necessary to take it in the sense of scite instituire (MAURER) according to the analogy of vii. 3; Isa. xxiii. 16; Deut. ix. 21, etc. Observe the contrast: The people in criminal frivolity forget Jehovah, their highest glory, but with the greatest diligence employ means and ways to procure illicit love (with foreign nations and their idols). The effects of this are shown in what follows. לִבְיָסִיב is neither = but, as DE WETTE proposes, nor = לְהַבִּינִי (VENEMA, DATHE: ut confirmes militiam, assuefacis vias tuas), but simply = therefore, thus, in this way.—To wickedness. The article before רְעוּיָה (comp. iii. 5) is general. Israel has accustomed his ways not to particular wickedness, but to wickedness in general, to wickedness of every kind.—לְיָדֵךְ to teach, to accustom, as לְיָדֵךְ, ver. 24. In meaning the expression is coincident with that in xiii. 23, "accustomed to do evil."—On the subject-matter, comp. Rom. i. 24 sqq.—In what follows the statement is verified by an instance.

Ver. 34. Even on thy wings . . . on all these. The ׀ here resumes the ׀ in ver. 33 b. The special fact is introduced by the same particle as the general statement. In German "nämlich" [videlicet, namely] would be used. ׀ is used here, as frequently of the skirts, (wings) of a coat, 1 Sam. xxiv. 6; IIagg. ii. 12; Zech. viii. 23, etc.—Has been found. The plural נִכְרָאִים is explained thus, (1) an ideal plural is contained in ׀, namely, the idea of innocent blood, in which sense רְטִימִים is usually employed (the sing. ex. gr. Jer. xix. 4; Lam. iv. 13). The same construction in Ezek. xxii. 13, comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 61, 2, c, (2) with connected subjects the predicate may be governed in number by the main grammatical or logical idea. So also here the conception of the multiplicity of what has been stained by blood may have determined the number of the predicate. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 103, 6.—Not at the place, etc. כְּחַתְרֵיָה occurs only in Exod. xxii. 1 (2), and our passage may be explained by this. "If a thief be found breaking up (or at the place of burglary) and he be smitten and die, he (the doer) shall incur no guilt." Jeremiah alludes to this both in words and sense. The Lord has found the blood of the murdered (and we may here understand the blood of the prophets, ver. 30) not in the place of the crime committed by them. In this case their murderers would according to the law quoted above, be without guilt. But he says, "On all these have I found it." These words have given much trouble to the commentators. Disregarding the circumstance that the LXX, the Syriac and Arabic translations instead of אֵלֶּה read אֵלָה, and therefore translate ἐπὶ πάση ὄρει or sub quacunque arbore, and that JEROME combines the two renderings: "in omnibus istis quæ supra memoravi, sive sub quercu," having in mind the often denounced hill-worship (comp. ver. 20).—omitting those interpretations which are based on a wrong reading we mention only three proposed by eminent modern commentators: (1) EWALD translates after ABAN-BASEL, "not in the murderer's den found I it, but on all these, viz., summits." The objection to this is, that the word does not signify "den of murderers," and that the reference to Exod. xxii. 1 (2) is wholly ignored. (2) VENEMA, DATHE, VOGEL, GAAB, MAURER, UMBREIT and others attach the final clause to the next verse and take לְיָדֵךְ in the sense of "notwithstanding—notwithstanding all this thou sayest." This rendering leaves both the ׀ and the Tau cons. before האכרִי without any satisfactory explanation. (3) GRAF: "not for the sake of a crime didst thou kill the poor ones, but on account of all this," i. e. because they stood in the way of thy harlotry and opposed thy revolt. But it must be objected to this that we cannot say, "not at the breaking in hast thou met them (GRAF takes כְּחַתְרֵיָה as 2d person), but on account of all this." For here the verb "met" does not suit the second clause of the sentence. We should have to supply a suitable verb "hast thou killed them," which would be arbitrary, because the author, if he had this verb in mind, could not have omitted it. The whole question seems to me to turn on the correct rendering of כְּחַתְרֵיָה, namely, not as burglary in general, but the place of burglary. It is well known that substantives with כְּ (Mem loci) have this meaning, EWALD, § 160 b.—In the original passage Exod. xxii. 1, we may indeed translate "at the breaking in," but in the text, where it is not the seizure of the thief, but the subsequent discovery of blood-stains, which is spoken of, the place of burglary must be meant. Traces of blood are subsequently discovered, not at a burglary, but at the place where the surprised thief was wounded. If this is the correct rendering of this word, the final clause must also designate a place. If we consider that in the first clause the Lord has rebuked Israel for the murder of the innocents, it is appropriate that in the second He should bring a proof of this heavy charge. This proof is afforded in this way:—the Lord says He found the blood of the slain not in places where they had committed burglary, but on the persons of those He addresses. Thus "on all these" refers back certainly to thy skirts, but only indirectly. אֵלֶּה refers primarily to persons. We may suppose that the prophet pointed with his hand to his hearers.—In spite of this flagrant proof of guilt, Israel is so bold as to continue to maintain his innocence, and dares even to boast that the divine anger is already turned away from him.

Ver. 35. Yet thou sayest . . . not sinned. כַּשְׁׁרָאֵי. The translation of the LXX., ἀποστραφῆσαι and of the Vulgate, aversatur would suit very well in the connection, if it were grammatically justifiable. As the words read they make declaration of a fact, not a wish. כַּשְׁׁרָאֵי=nothing but, only, i. e. sure, certain. Comp. Gen. xxvi. 9; xix. 14, etc.—To what historical fact this erroneous assumption of Israel refers, it is difficult to say; perhaps to the narrative of 2 Ki. xxiii. 26 (observe also the resemblance of the words). Josiah's reforms might have given rise to the idea that the wrath of the Lord formerly threatened (comp. 2 Ki. xxii. 17) was now turned away from Judah. The people are here assured that this was not the case, because the reform was more outward than inward (at least among the masses).—I enter into judgment. Comp. i. 16; xxv. 31. He who denies the sin he has committed adds to his guilt and provokes a new manifestation of the divine judgment.

Vers. 36 and 37. How goest thou? . . . no success with them. אֲנִי (in Aramaic אֲנִי frequently = אֲנִי) has in Hebrew throughout the meaning of to melt, dissolve, go asunder. So of yielding to a misfortune (Prov. xx. 14), of the flowing away of water (Job xiv. 11), of the running out of the means of subsistence (1 Sam. ix. 7), of the disappearance of power (Deut. xxxii. 36). The infinitive אֲנִי designates not the end but the mode of the going asunder: quid diffinis mutando viam? The אֲנִי is the particle of the Infin. modalis. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 95, e. On the meaning comp. iii. 13.—As vers. 34 and 35 are dependent on ver. 33 b, so vers. 36 and 37 on 33 a. The inquiry, "how trimmest thou thy ways?" is resumed here more definitely.—In respect to the historical bearing of the passage, as we have already remarked on ver. 18, it is not known that Josiah ever sought aid from the Egyptians. From the time of Jehoiakim, who was an Egyptian vassal (2 Kings xxiii. 33 sqq.), much aid was continually sought. To this ver. 36 may refer. The expression "also from thence wilt thou go forth," seems even to imply a residence in Egypt. Comp. on ver. 16. As was remarked on this passage we admit the possibility of Jeremiah's having made this addition on the completion of his second writing. Comp. GRAF, ad loc.—רָאֵה Masc. referring to the people. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 60, 3, Anm.—It appears as if the story of Tamar and Absalom hovered before the prophet's mind. Comp. KUEPER, S. 55; 2 Sam. xiii. 19, "Est tibi nostra manus, in qua nos parte dolemus" (BUGENHAGEN).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

2. On ii. 14: "Peccatum ex hominibus liberis facit miserimos servos; ex filiis Dei mancipia diaboli." SEB. SCHMIDT.—"Is then Israel a servant or a bondman? So that get him who may, except the one father, whose son he is, he may starve him? A noble question to lead the soul to reflect what it is; a subject on which Joh. Arndt much labored and in which Fr. Richter of Halle lived altogether. He wrote a book on the exceeding nobility of the soul. . . . We can also form an idea from his poems, 'The soul is born to enjoy, something that is divine,'—'How bright the Christian's inner life,'—'O how happy are the souls,' etc., how important this subject was to him. And it is a great subject even if we leave aside all exaggerated mystical or still more loftily conceived ideas. It is enough that we are 'His workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works.' We must indeed be ashamed, and a preacher may well grieve his whole life long (as Spener is said to have done), that our glory is so departed." ZINZENDORF.

3. On ver. 17: Sin is the destruction of a people, Prov. xiv. 34. But the Lord is not willing that any be lost but that all should come to repentance (2 Pet. iii. 9). He therefore chastises them, not to destroy them, but by bodily sufferings to save the soul (1 Pet. iv. 1).

9. On ver. 20: Although the Lord's yoke is easy (Matt. xi. 29), it seems intolerable to our flesh, and we would rather sacrifice our children to Moloch and cut ourselves with knives and lancets (1 Kings xviii. 28) than bow to the chastisement of the Spirit and renounce carnal freedom.

10. On ver. 21: "Peccata tam contra sanam hominis naturam sunt quam labruscæ contra naturam bonæ vitis." SEB. SCHMIDT.

11. On ver. 21: Whatever comes from God's hand is good and welcome. Man was originally upright. He bore no principle of corruption within him. This came from without. Hence such depravity has become possible [actual, S. R. A.], as on its side renders necessary a complete remoulding (regeneration) of man.

12. On ver. 22: "We see in nature that affected beauties, which are intended either to hide deformities or give new adornments not proper to the person, only render one uglier than before." ZINZENDORF.

13. On ver. 25: ["The passage suggests that in many cases the plea of despair is not half honest. The heart takes it up simply as an apology for rushing madly and headlong into sin. To quiet conscience and to seem to lend some ear to reason, men try and even pretend to think there is no longer any hope from God, and hence that they may as well get all the good from sin they can while they can get any." COWLES.—S. R. A.]

14. On ver. 26: "It often occurs in the office of a preacher that he sees poor humanity in its nakedness. He must be on his guard that he use his victory with moderation and in such a way that the souls ashamed may see more hearty love and compassion than tyranny and assumption. . . . There ought not to be mere Hildebrands or mere Henry Fourths; a village schoolmaster may also show to one of his scholars that he is more concerned about his own authority than the pupil's salvation; and this has no better effect on the youth than his penance in the court at Canossa had on the Emperor Henry IV." ZINZENDORF.

15. On ver. 28. Necessity teaches prayer. Necessity compels men to cast away all false props and to stay themselves on Him, who alone endures everlastingly. Yet this may be done with insincerity, merely for outward advantage. Then will God say: He who will not serve Me, but will only serve himself with Me, has nothing to hope from Me. He may serve himself with those whom only he wishes to serve.

16. On ver. 30: MICH. GUISLERUS, in his commentary, discusses the question at length:—In how far it may be said that the Lord has smitten Israel in vain, since the means which God uses always correspond exactly to the end in view, and therefore the application of means without the attainment of the object is inconceivable. He answers in the words of PETRUS A FIGUEIRA: "Dicitur autem Deus frustra percussisse quantum ad finem extrinsecum, qui erat emendatio percussorum, non quantum ad internum, qui erat ipsemet. Ideo enim percutiebat etiam eos, quos sciebat non recepturos disciplinam nec emendationem, ut omnibus se bonum medicum, bonumque parentem demonstraret, utpote omnia faciendo ad egrorum sanitatem et filiorum disciplinam necessaria. Atque quoad hunc finem non frustra percussit, sed finem consecutus est." GUISLERUS more correctly distinguishes between a percussio gratiæ and a percussio justitiæ, the former for salvation, the latter for judgment. We must, indeed, say that the strokes of God are relatively, but not absolutely in vain. If they do not attain the end of conversion, they show at least that God has done His part, which is the meaning also of this passage; and they serve for "a testimony against them." Comp. Gal. iii. 4.

17. On ver. 30. In order that the divine chastisement may have the desired result, it is necessary that man enter into the divine purpose, i. e., that he understand what God would say to him, and whereto He would move him, and that he also hear and obey. This is to accept the chastisement. To accept chastisement is a sign of wisdom (Prov. viii. 10: xix. 20), while not to accept it is a sign of folly (Prov. i. 7: iii. 11, 12; v. 12, 23; xiii. 18; xv. 32. Comp. Ps. l. 17; Isa. i. 5).

18. On "Ye generation," ver. 31. "That is not to be denied, which Paul says to the Cretans, they are altogether κακὰ θησα. This applies sometimes to whole nations, sometimes to certain cities and places. Servants of Christ, who have fallen in such places where their hearers are of a bad sort, experience it indeed." ZINZENDORF.—On "Have I been a desert," etc. "Where God bestows most benefits, there He receives the least gratitude." FOERSTER.

19. On ver. 32. The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light (Luke xvi. 8).—A virgin who forgets her bridal ornaments might be compared to the foolish virgins who forgot their oil (Matth. xxv. 1), nay, she is even worse than these.

20. On ver. 33, a. Not only zealous, but clever and inventive is man in evil, but lazy and unskilful for good; comp. iv. 22.

21. On ver. 33, b. Φθειροσιν ἑσθὴ χρηστὴ ἀλλ' οὐ κακὰ (1 Cor. xv. 33). Every man is as his God. Everything, which is called a god, is inimical to the true God, therefore also to the absolute idea of the True and the Good. All kinds of idolatry, therefore, whether gross or refined, must demoralize men.

22. On ver. 35, a. Men frequently from obstinacy and pride will not confess their sins. Comp. 1 John i. 8. But ZINZENDORF (Pred. d. Ger. S., 184) remarks with justice on this passage: "It is not so absolutely obstinacy and wickedness, hypocrisy, dogmatism; but men really come by many sins in such a way that they do not know them. As that savage at Copenhagen who killed his comrade and was severely wounded, thought that he should die for such a legitimate cause (for the other had insulted him)."

4. On ver. 20. The endeavor to cast off the yoke of God is (1) an ancient one (the angels,

7. On vers. 29-32. When man quarrels with God, the fault is always on the side of man (Ps. li. 6). For (1) God chastises us, but we do not obey: (2) He bestows on us the necessaries of life, but we do not thank Him: (3) He makes us partakers of the highest glory, but we reject it with disdain.

8. On ver. 31. "Have I been a desert," etc., there is extant a homily of Origen on this text, the third of his homilies on Jeremiah. His fundamental thought is, God is a desert to none. This is true (1) in reference to all men (comp. Matth. v. 45) (a) in a bodily, (b) in a spiritual regard. For He was always a fruitful land to Israel, (a) when He blessed them and punished the heathen, (b) when He blessed the heathen and punished them, (c) even when He allowed the church of Christ to pass from the Jews to the heathen.—["An unjust imputation repelled by Jehovah. To an ingenuous mind God never appears so irresistible as when He addresses His creatures in the language of tender expostulation. Christians treat God as a wilderness (1) when they are reluctant to serve Him, (2) when they seek their happiness in the world. The ground of complaint is in them, not in God." PAVSON.—S. R. A.]

9. On ver. 32. "What is the adornment of clothes compared with the imperishable adornment of the righteousness of Christ! Food for moths and worms, and nothing more. Shall such a perishable adornment be so dear to thy heart that thou never forgettest to put it on when thou art going out, or when thou preparest thyself for church on Sunday: but the imperishable adornment be so unimportant that thou art ever forgetting it, even though so frequently spoken to concerning it? No, be followers of the apostle Paul, Phil. iii." HOCHSTETTER. "Twelve Parables from the prophet Jeremiah," S. 9.

10. On ver. 35. Obstinate impenitence. (1) It is blind to its own guilt. (2) It blasphemes God, accusing Him of unjust anger. (3) It will not escape just punishment.

THE SECOND DISCOURSE.

(CHAPTERS III.—VI.)

This discourse, according to iii. 6, belongs to the reign of Josiah, and moreover, according to iii. 4, 10; iv. 1 to the period of his reformation, which occupied from the twelfth to the eighteenth year of his reign. (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3, 8; xxxv. 19). Since Jeremiah began his ministry in the 13th year of Josiah, this discourse pertains to the period from the 13th to the 18th year of Josiah, consequently to the commencement of his ministry. Its position at the beginning of the book corresponds, therefore, entirely to the historical date of its composition.

The discourse falls into two main divisions and a conclusion. It may be arranged as follows:—

I. FIRST MAIN DIVISION (CHAPTER III. 1.—IV. 4.)

The Call to Return, יָשׁוּב.

1. Basis:—Notwithstanding Deut. xxiv. 1-4, a return is possible, iii. 1-5.
2. The call to return in the past, iii. 6-10.
3. The call to return in the future, iii. 11-25.
4. The call to return in the present, iv. 1-4.

II. SECOND MAIN DIVISION (CHAPTER IV. 5.—VI. 26.)

Threatening of Punishment on Account of their Neglect to Return.

1. Description of the judgment to be expected, iv. 5-31.
2. Proof of its justice by an enumeration of causes, chap. v.
3. Recapitulation, consisting of a combination of the call to return, the announcement of punishment, and the ground of punishment, vi. 1-26.

III. CONCLUSION.—OBJECT AND EFFECT OF THE DISCOURSE, (CHAPTER VI. 27-30).

FIRST DIVISION (CHAPTER III. 1-IV. 4).

The Call to Return, שׁוּב.

1. Basis:—Notwithstanding Deut. xxiv. 1-4, a return is possible.

III. 1-5.

- 1 . . . therefore, if a man dismiss his wife,
And she go from him and become another man's,
Will he return to her again?
Would not such a land be desecrated?
But thou hast whored it with many paramours,
YET RETURN TO ME, saith Jehovah.
- 2 Raise thine eyes to the hills¹ and see;
Where hast thou not been lain with?²
By the roads thou satest for them like an Arab in the desert,
And desecratedst the land by thy whoredom³ and wickedness.
- 3 And the showers were withheld,
And there came no latter rain:
But thou hadst the brow of a harlot,
And wouldst not be ashamed.
- 4 Hast thou not henceforth cried⁴ to me, my Father!
Thou, the companion of my youth!
- 5 Will he then everlastingly mark,⁵
And always bear a grudge?
Behold, thus didst thou speak,
And didst the evil and didst prevail.⁶

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 2.—לֹא שׁוּבָה לָהּ Per verecundiam the Masoretes always put for this the corresponding form from שׁוּבָה Deut. xxviii. 30; Isa. xiii. 16; Zech. xiv. 2. ["A few MSS. and the Soncín. Edition also exhibit שׁוּבָהּ."—HENDERSON].
³ Ver. 2.—וַיִּנְתְּנוּ a plural formation like חַנְתִּים, which occurs besides only in Num. xiv. 33, analogous to רִמְיָתִים, frequent in Ezekiel, ch. xvi. (vers. 15, 22, etc.), and ch. xxii. (vers. 7, 8, etc.). Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 48, 4.
⁴ Ver. 4.—On the form קָרָאתִי and דָּבַרְתִּי, comp. rem. on ii. 20.
⁵ Ver. 5.—To יִנְטֵר and יִשְׁכַּר, suppl. אָפוּ. Comp. ver. 12; Ps. ciii. 9.
⁶ Ver. 5.—On the form וַיַּעַל (for וַיִּזְכֹּר). Comp. EWALD, § 191 b. [NOTES translates this line, "but doest evil with all thy might," but comp. EXEC. rem.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

That these verses belong not to chapter ii. but to the following discourse, and indeed form its basis, is evident from the following reasons: 1. The fundamental thought of the previous strophe was that Israel had incurred misfortune not by Jehovah's fault but by his own. 2. It is shown in ch. iii. 6-11 that hitherto neither Israel nor Judah has been obedient to the call "return." In vers. 12-25 it is shown that in the distant future they will obey this call; in ch. iv.—vi. that if the people do not obey the call made to them now, in the present, they must expect severe punishment, to be inflicted by a people from the North. Since then the basis of the thought developed in iii. 1-5 is that the return of apostate Israel is brought into connection with the regulation of the Mosaic law, according to which a woman who had been divorced and married to another man, could not return to her former husband, it is manifest that ch. iii. 1-5 attach themselves to what follows, and not to the previous section. That לֹאכֵר in ver. 1 does not militate against this, will be shown immediately, and that this strophe serves as the basis of what follows will be clear from the explanation of שׁוּב.

Ver. 1. . . . therefore: If a man dismiss his wife . . . yet return to me, saith Jehovah.

The various explanations of לֹאכֵר may be divided into two classes. 1. The LXX. and the translations and commentaries which follow it, (of the later Comm. also GÜTCHERUS in Symb. Hagan., Cl. I, Fasc. 1) omit it altogether. The character of the LXX. renders it probable that this omission was founded not on MS. evidence, but in mere caprice. 2. It is connected with the preceding, viz., כָּאֵשׁ, ii. 37, by KIMCHI, ABAR-

BANEL, LUTHER, BUGENHAGEN, ECOLAMPADIUS, VATABLE, TREMELLI, MUENSTER, STARKE, MAURER and HITZIG. It is opposed to this connection, (a) that the contents of this verse are as heterogeneous with the previous verse as they are homogeneous with the following, as already shown; (b) that לאמר is separated from כנס by a sentence, so that it would be intolerably harsh to connect them. 3. Most commentators explain it by the aid of an ellipsis before לאמר, supplying יאמר, "יאמר, יש לי, אומר; so the Vulgate and the Roman Catholic divines; also RASCHI, ZWINGLI, BULLINGER, SEE, SCHMIDT, DE WETTE, ROSENUELLER, etc. But all these supplementations are arbitrary and unexampled.

An idea, on which לאמר depends as a more particular definition, would no more be unexpressed in Hebrew, than one before "therefore" in English. To render this clear we have begun the translation of this verse thus "... therefore." The passages Josh. xxii. 11; Jud. xvi. 2; Isa. ix. 8; xlv. 28 are indeed quoted as analogous. But in the passages in Joshua and Isaiah, the idea which serves as a point of support is not wanting, though only implied (comp. NÆGELSB. § 93, c). The passage in Judges might be appealed to if a corruption of the text were not very much to be suspected. 3. CALVIN and VENEMA seek to render לאמר in such a sense that it need not depend on the foregoing. CALVIN translates indeed dicendo, but would take this in the sense of par manière de dire or of posito casu. VENEMA modifies this interpretation, rendering "if it is said," and regarding it as the antecedent to which "saith Jehovah" at the close of the verse, corresponds:—"If it is said, Will a man return? etc.—yet saith Jehovah, thou hast been lowd, yet return to Me." But leaving out of account that לאמר would then be superfluous, this absolute use of it is quite undemonstrable. 5. J. D. MICHAELIS, EWALD and

GRAF acknowledge that this isolated לאמר is a grammatical anomaly, and therefore declare the text to be corrupt. They assume that either before לאמר a formula like יהי דבר אלי has dropped out, or that the date in ver. 6, after which לאמר contrary to rule, is wanting, should be transposed to this place. The latter would seem to be the most probable. [HENDERSON renders Further, which seems to be an evasion of the difficulty. The English Editor of CALVIN suggests that ל be rendered according to, "According to what is said," but as WORDSWORTH notes, this phrase is the universal formula for introducing a message from God; and he therefore regards it as used by the prophet to intimate that what he is uttering is a quotation from the Law of the Lord. COWLES renders "Saying" and connects it with the preceding context. BLAYNEY, "whilst thou sayest." NOYES, "it is said."—S. R. A.]—יהי is here, as frequently, used in a hypothetical sense, comp. Exod. iv. 1; viii. 22; Levit. xxv. 20; Isa. liv. 15. The following contains a partial verbal reference to Deut. xxiv. 1-4, where it is said, that a woman who has been divorced and married again, cannot when released from her second marriage by separation or death, again become the wife of her first husband, since this would be an abomination before the Lord, and increase the moral corruption of the land. יתן in an intransitive sense (comp. יתן Levit. xviii. 25) as in Isa. xxiv. 5; Ps. cvi. 38 = profanari, to be desecrated. The LXX. reads οὐ μανθίῃσεται ἡ γυνὴ ἐκέλευσεν; probably in connection with the previous translation μὴ ἀνηκάμψῃ πρὸς αὐτόν; which change without doubt was intended to render this sentence accordant with the subsequent application (return to me). The Syrohexapla translation however follows the Hebrew, and GRAE in his edition reads ἡ γῆ. So also SPHON. Both are certainly wrong.—התן with accus. of the person is found also in Ezek. xvi. 28. Most of the ancients (with the exception of the LXX. ἀνέκαμψες, Ar. el reverteteris? THEODOR. ἐπανθίεις, VICTOR. PRESB., πῶς ἐπιστρέφεις πρὸς με); render אלי (שוב אלי) as imperative; the moderns (MAURER, HITZIG, EWALD, UMBREIT, NEUMANN, GRAF) as interrogative. I decidedly regard the first as correct. As I have shown above it is the fundamental idea of the whole discourse that Israel is to return to his Lord. The adherents of the more recent interpretation also find themselves compelled, to avoid contradiction, to take the question not as a negation but as expressing wonder, which is not logically admissible; for why should the Lord wonder concerning that which, according to what follows, is His definite wish? The vau is therefore to be taken as adversative—"although in accordance with legal regulations, I ought not to receive you, yet I say, Return to me." The appeal to the passage in the law belongs to the domain rather of prophetic rhetoric than of morals; for the command refers to a physical relation, which does exist between Jehovah and His people. If however we interpret this relation spiritually, we prove too much, for every sin is spiritual adultery. When it was remarked above that this strophe forms the introductory basis of the discourse, it was meant that in this strophe, (a) an apparent hindrance, (b) a false presumption is removed which might stand in the way of a true return. The apparent hindrance is the legal regulation which is removed by an authoritative decree (vers. 1-3 a). The false presumption is that pseudo-conversion, which took place under Josiah, and which consisted in this, that the people sought to deceive themselves and others with fine words, which their deeds proved to be lies (vers. 3 b-5).

Ver. 2. Raise thine eyes . . . and wickedness. These words furnish the actual proof of "thou hast played the harlot," etc., ver. 1.—Hills. Comp. "high mountain," Isa. xiii. 2. Mons culmine planus, silva non contectus.

Ver. 3. And the showers were withheld . . . wouldest not be ashamed. The first hemistich refutes the objection that Israel committed this wickedness unreprieved, comp. ii. 30. The divine displeasure was rendered palpable by the withholding of the necessary rain (v. 25); coll. iv. 18; ii. 19), but Israel refused to be brought by this chastisement to perceive, confess and repent of his sin. With the boldness of a harlot who not only does not confess that she has done wickedly, but does it besides as though she had a claim to the recognition of her services,—with such boldness does Israel speak in a confident and affectionate tone to the Lord, and even ventures on a gentle reproach for undeserved severity. While ver. 2 expresses a subordinate thought which merely defines more particularly a point in ver. 1, and to which ver. 3 a is attached as a corollary, vers. 4, 5 express the second main thought of the strophe, to which ver. 3, b serves as a transition.

Ver. 4. Hast thou not henceforth cried to me . . . the companion of my youth?—Henceforth appears to refer to the time when the people recognized the divine anger in the withholding of the rain, for then they at once became, at least in words, friendly and officious. But it is not equivalent to יָצַדְתָּ, from times of old. We are thus led to conjecture that the three facts, withholding of rain, hypocritical conversion of the people, and this prophecy, were contemporaneous. This is also confirmed by a comparison of the dates in i. 2 and 2 Chron. xxxiv. 3. According to the latter passage Josiah began in the twelfth year of his reign “to purge Judah and Jerusalem,” while according to Jer. i. 2, our prophet commenced his ministry in the 13th year of Josiah. Now, since according to iii. 6, the present discourse belongs at any rate to the time of Josiah, and from its position and contents, probably to the beginning of Jeremiah’s prophetic labors, the prophet doubtless, as CHR. B. MICHAELIS, ROSENUELLER, HIRTZIG and GRAY, have also perceived, describes in vers. 4 and 5 the conduct of the people in the time of Josiah’s reformation, to which there is also a very distinct allusion in ver. 10. The prophet, therefore, says henceforth, because really even at the time when he proclaimed this divine message, such voices were still heard from the midst of the people. We need not, therefore, render it in the sense of haud ita pridem, nor shall cry, in the future. On companion of my youth, comp. Prov. ii. 17.

Ver. 5. Will he then everlastingly mark? . . . prevail. In these words of the first hemistich is a slight reproach. It is as though Israel’s misfortune was due to the pertinacious anger of Jehovah.—The sense of the second half of the verse is this:—the acts of the people are in contradiction to their words, that the latter were not honestly meant, but were false and deceptive. Observe the antithesis of saidst and didst. Comp. a similar want of uprightness on the part of the people, ii. 35.—יָצַדְתָּ didst prevail, is here used as in xx. 7, 9. Comp. Gen. xxxii. 28; 1 Sam. xxvi. 23; 1 Kings xxii. 22. It is strange here that the preceding verbs do not appear to involve the idea of effort, as is the case in the other passages and as the meaning of יָצַדְתָּ (to be grown, to be able, to set through) seems to require. But leaving out of account that עָשָׂה and יָצַדְתָּ following one another, seem to have a sort of proverbial character (comp. 1 Sam. xxvi. 25), it is evident that the idea of a struggle lies at the basis of the antithesis mentioned, and didst prevail intimates that the struggle will be decided in favor of the evil.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. That a man live a second time with a woman whom he has divorced, and who has been the wife of another man, is regarded as an abomination which corrupts the land. In what does this abomination consist? Not that the woman has previously been the wife of another, for then a divorced woman is not permitted to marry the second time, and all marriages of widows would be an abomination. In this case then the abomination must consist in this, that the man takes back a woman who had first been his wife, but afterwards another’s. Not the series $A+B+C$, etc., is forbidden, but the series $A+B+A$. But why is this? MICHAELIS, (Mos. Rechte, 1 S. 241, 2), after his manner seeks the ratio legis in this, that if the re-marriage were permitted, the second husband’s life would not be safe, should the old love be revived, or that the chastity of the woman would not be safe, her feminine modesty not being easily able to resist the advances of one to whom she had formerly yielded. But this is superficial talk. The matter must lie deeper than this, and be founded in the laws of a higher corporeality, which are still far too little known to us. It is remarkable that according to the Koran (Sur. II., 226), a man is at liberty to take back a divorced wife only in case she has been in the meantime the wife of another man. Comp. MICHAELIS, Mos. Rechte, I. S. 237.

2. “Quodlibet igitur studendum unicuique est, ut evitetur peccatum sicut fornicatio, quia per peccatum quodlibet quaedam cum aliqua creaturarum admittitur fornicatio, per quam membra Christi sunt membra iniquitatis, duoque fiunt in carne una.” GUISLERUS.

3. “How great is the goodness of God, when the sinner wilfully thrusts Him away from him, yet God receives him again into His favor when he truly repents! Ezek. xviii. 21, 22.” STARKE.

4. “Revertere ad me et mundaberis, reparaberis, si confundaris tibi et refundris mihi.” AUGUSTIN, contra Faustum, I. 15, i. f.

5. “The feeling of need to call God Father and beseech Him to save, is not an infallible sign of true penitence, Isa. xxvi. 16.” STARKE.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The mercy of God to sinners is,—1. On the one side endless (the prohibition of re-marriage with a former wife, who has been married to another,—the sinner is not dismissed, but is voluntarily apostate, sin is not a conjugal, but an adulterous relation,—still the Lord is ready to receive the sinner back); 2. On the other hand limited, in so far that it is connected strictly with the fulfilment of a condition (not a hypocritical return with fine words, but only sincere, earnest return, with fruits meet for repentance, can render us partakers of His grace).

2. The call to return in the Past.

III. 6-10.*

- 6 The LORD [Jehovah] said also unto me in the days of Josiah the king, Hast thou seen that which backsliding² Israel hath done? She hath gone up upon every 7 high mountain and under every green tree, and there hath played the harlot. And I said after she had done all these things, Turn thou unto me! But she returned not. And her treacherous sister [Faithless, her sister] Judah saw it.
8 And I saw, when for all the causes whereby backsliding Israel committed adultery I had put her away, and given her a bill of divorce;³ yet her treacherous⁴ sister Judah feared not, but went and played the harlot also. And it came to pass⁵
9 through the lightness [correctly: cry] of her whoredom, that she defiled the land,⁶
10 and committed adultery with stones and with stocks [wood]. And yet for [notwithstanding] all this her treacherous sister Judah hath not turned to me with her whole heart, but feignedly [hypocritically; lit. in falsehood] saith the Lord [Jehovah].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

* [As this passage presents no signs of poetry I have followed BLAYNEY, NOYES, and HENDERSON in giving it the form of prose. UMBRETT prints it in parallelisms, while WORDSWORTH renders not only these verses but the whole chapter as prose.—S. R. A.]

² Ver. 6.—כִּשְׁבָה rejection, revolt, apostacy, the abstract for the concrete; comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 13, 1. The word in this sense is peculiar to this chapter; comp. viii. 11, 12. Comp. also viii. 5.

³ Ver. 8.—כָּרַתְתִּיהָ. The plural here only, comp. Deut. xxiv. 1, 3; Isa. 1. 1.

⁴ Ver. 8.—פְּנֵיהָ is related to פְּנוּתָהּ as שׁוֹכֵב to כִּשְׁבָה. On the form comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 47, 1; EWALD, § 188, b.

⁵ Ver. 9.—וַיְהִי here as in 1 Sam. xiii. 22: xxv. 20, and elsewhere, stands for וַיְהִי. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 88, 7, Ann.

⁶ Ver. 9.—וַיְהִי אֶת־הָאָרֶץ, a frequent paratactic construction. Comp. וַיְהִי וַיִּלְכָּד, Gen. xxii. 24. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 87, 7; § 111, 1 b.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The theme of this strophe is "Return unto Me" (ver. 7, comp. ver. 10). It is however shown how this call hitherto, in the past, has been heeded, or rather not heeded, by Israel and Judah. The main regard of the prophet is naturally directed to Judah. Israel serves only as a foil; on the background of the transgression of Israel, which should have served for a warning to Judah, the sin of the latter stands out still more glaringly.

Ver. 6. And Jehovah . . . played the harlot. If as cannot be disputed there is a close connection between this strophe and the preceding, it is evident that this inscription is not in place. For it would indicate the beginning of a larger section, while here, on the contrary, there is intimate connection. The greater section begins at ver. 1. The isolated and puzzling לאכר requires a sentence before it, where then this inscription belongs. The reason of its transposition from ver. 1 may be, as GRAF supposes, that ver. 10 contains an evident allusion to the reformation of Josiah. But he overlooks the fact that such an allusion is contained also in vers. 4 and 5.—Upon every high mountain. Comp. ver. 13; ii. 20.—וַתֹּנִי. If this is not the 2d Pers. Fem., which would be possible only by a violent change of person, the formation is to be explained either according to the analogy of הִשְׁקַטִּי (Jer. xlvi. 7) as an Aramæism (comp. EWALD, § 191, c, and Ann.) or according to the analogy of הִכְחִי (Jer. xviii. 23)

as a הִ formation with prominence of the radical Yod (comp. EWALD, § 224, c). OLSHAUSEN (S. 510, Ann.) at once assumes an error.

Ver. 7. And I said . . . sister Judah saw it. It is not necessary, with GRAF and others to take וַאֲמַר in the sense of "I thought," and הִשָּׁב as 3d Pers., since the Lord not only thought this but really said it to Israel. This "Return to Me" is the underlying theme of all prophetic admonition (Jer. xxxi. 20). In this passage it is emphatic. It points back to the Yet return to me in ver. 1, and with the following returned not represents the main thought of the section. In form הִשָּׁב is like הוֹכֵל in ver. 5—And Faithless, her sister Judah. To take פְּנוּתָהּ as subst. abstr. corresponding to כִּשְׁבָה = faithlessness, would form a fine parallelism; but we should then expect כְּפִיּוּתָהּ. The form קָטוּל with firm a (בָּנִיר even or בָּנִירָה only here and in ver. 10) designates everywhere else only concreta. Comp. EWALD, § 152, 6. The position of the word and the absence of the article seem to intimate that it is intended for a proper name, and we have therefore written it with an initial capital.—The Keri וְהִרְאָה is unnecessary. וְהִרְאָה does not indeed occur elsewhere, but וְנִרְאָה does (1 Sam. xvii. 42; 2 Ki. v. 21; Job xlii. 16; Ezek. xviii. 14, Keri, 28); and וְנִרְאָה (1 Sam. x. 14) leaving out of account the analogous forms of other verbs, ex. gr. וְהִשְׁתַּחֲוָה, Jer. xxxiii. 20; xxxvi. 5, 26, etc.—The question whether it is to be translated “and Judah saw it,” or whether the object seen is contained in the following sentence beginning with וְיָ depends on the other, whether the following וְנִרְאָה is genuine and original.

Ver. 8. (And I saw) . . . played the harlot also. The construction: “I saw, that I, because she played the harlot, had dismissed Israel, and I gave her a bill of divorce, and Judah feared not,” is not so devoid of meaning, as GRAF supposes, if we change the paratactic mode of expression into the syntactic. The main object of saw is feared not. All that lies between has the force of a parenthetical clause of adversative signification: “And I saw, that, although I had dismissed Israel, and given her a bill of divorce, yet Judah feared not.” Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 111, 1, Ann. But at all events the connection of verses 7 and 8 is interrupted in a very awkward way by And I saw. Verse 7 concludes in this way, that Judah had seen how Israel had not returned at the call of Jehovah, and then ver. 8 designates as the object of the divine seeing what, according to the conclusion of the whole course of thought, vers. 8 b, 9, 10, must be the object seen by Judah. For the prophet draws a parallel between the behaviour of Israel and of Judah. Israel, first apostate, is called to repent, but returns not and is rejected. Judah sees this and—also does not return. It is evidently in this connection very essential that Judah should have perceived not only the impenitence of Israel, but also the punishment he thus incurred. The very sight of this destructive judgment should have brought Judah to sincere repentance. Judah’s seeing the impenitence, but not the judgment, the latter being ascribed to the Lord, introduces an inappropriate element into the connection, although we cannot say that an incorrect idea would be thus originated. If however we omit the words, and I saw, we have a perfectly clear and satisfactory connection. The critical authorities indeed give no safe support to its rejection. Only JEROME omits the word, but whether on MS. evidence, may be questioned. He is followed by LUTHER in his translation, and GULCHER. Symb. Hag., Cl. 1. Fasc. 1. The LXX. Chaldee and Arabic versions certainly found it in their copies of the original. But the Syriac appears to have read וְהִרְאָה, the same word twice, and this EWALD regards as the correct reading.—If וְנִרְאָה is an error it is at any rate a very ancient one. According to the rule of preferring the more difficult reading, it is certainly safer to retain it, although it is easy to conceive a reason for its insertion. If we strike it out, the words “her sister Judah saw” belong to the following sentence, and the second hemistich of ver. 7 consists merely of the words “But she returned not.” The brevity of this clause may have been the occasion of connecting the words “and Faithless,” etc., with ver. 7, but then it became necessary to introduce a verb in the beginning of ver. 8, as וְנִרְאָה or וְהִרְאָה.—For all the causes.

וְל before אָרוּה and אָשֶׁר after it, are found here only. Elsewhere אָרוּה is always connected with a following genitive (Gen. xxi. 11, 25; xxvi. 32. Exod. xviii. 8) or with suffixes (Josh. xiv. 6) וְל expresses the multitude of the adulteries (hence GRAF suitably translates “allidieweilen” = for all the causes). אָשֶׁר is rendered necessary to the connection of אָרוּה with a finite verb. As a relative particle in the widest sense, (Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 80, 1) it involves here the meaning of eo quod, thereby that, (on the ground of all the occasions that have been afforded thereby, that, etc.)

Ver. 9. And it came to pass . . . with wood. קָ is elsewhere always written plene.

On account of this unusual defective manner of writing the ancient translations seem to have derived the word from קָל; for the Vulgate translates “facilitate fornicationis suae contaminavit terram”; LXX. καὶ ἐγένετο εἰς οὐδένην ἢ πορνεία αὐτῆς. Arab., “fuit fornicatio ejus cum nihilo”; Chald. “levia videbantur idola in oculis ejus.”—But this defective manner of writing is not a sufficient reason for departing from the primary meaning (comp. Gen. xxvii. 22), nor is this in itself doubtful. Only we must not take קָ in the sense of “report” (Gen. xlv. 16), but the prophet means to say that so far as the land extends, so far also whoredom with idols, as a heaven-crying sin, defiles the land (comp. Gen. iv. 10). It may not be objected to this, that the cry for the vengeance of heaven does not defile the land, for this cry is not an immediate, but a mediate provocation of the divine justice; that is, by their very impudent appearance (this is their cry), their sin challenges the justice of God.—As to the construction with the accusative, we need neither to read וְהִרְאָה with EWALD, nor to strike out וְהִרְאָה with GRAF. For the intransitive verb may be taken in a passive sense, and accordingly, as the passive, may have an accusative of the proximate object which may be regarded as dependent on an ideal transitive. וְהִרְאָה is to be desecrated (comp. FURST), therefore properly rendered et profanatum est terram. This profanatum est is, however, properly no more than profanare in a passive-perfect statement; et factum est profanare terram. Comp. אֶל יְהוָה אֱתֵרֶךָ (2 Sam. xi. 25; coll. 1 Sam. viii. 6; See NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, Ann. 1; § 100, 2.) Certainly וְהִרְאָה וְהִרְאָה may also be said (Ps. cvi. 38.)

Ver. 10. Further, notwithstanding all this . . . but hypocritically, saith Jehovah.—If we should refer the words “Further,” etc., to what immediately precedes, they would retain no meaning, for it is absurd to say that Judah in spite of her idolatry had yet not repented. They refer rather to ver. 8, a, where it was said that the Lord had repudiated Israel. On this account a double accusative thought is added; (1) "feared not," etc., ver. 8 b.; (2) "notwithstanding all this," ver. 10. Although Judah had witnessed the punishment of Israel, she did two things; first, she continued the whoredom of idolatry, and then sought to appease Jehovah by a hypocritical conversion, by which the prophet apparently alludes to the reformation of Josiah, which was entered on in earnest by the king, but not by the people.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God in His judgments has in view not merely those who are primarily affected by them, but those who witness them also. If the latter do not allow themselves thus to be warned, their guilt increases just in the proportion that the judgment might have been an impulse and a help to repentance. Comp. 2 Kings xvii. 18; Prov. xxviii. 14; 1 Cor. x. 6, 11; 2 Pet. ii. 4-6, (ἰπὸδείγματα μελλόντων ἀσεβῆν τεδεικώς, ver. 6.)

2. "Blessed is he who is rendered wise by the losses of others." CRAMER. Comp. Jer. xviii. 5-8; Zech. i. 3.

3. GHISLERUS remarks that the present passage has been frequently interpreted allegorically. Thus the Abbot JOACHIM DE FLORE (ob. 1202, Commentary on Jeremiah, printed at Venice, 1525, and Cologne, 1577), interprets it of the Greek and Roman church (comp. HERZOG'S Real-Enc., VI. S., 713). NICOLAUS DE LYRA interpreted it of the rich monastic orders, and the mendicant friars; Cardinal HUGO (de St. Caro, one of the inquisitors of the Abbot Joachim, ob. 1263), of the "illiterati et sæculares pravi," and of the "improbi religiosorum et clericorum et literatorum."

4. ORIGEN also treats of this passage (iii. 6-10) in his fourth homily on Jeremiah (in JEROME it is the fourteenth). He understands by Israel, the whole Jewish people, and by Judah, the Gentile church which, in spite of the judgments inflicted on Israel before their eyes, had in the course of time fallen into many sins and errors.

5. EPHREM SYRUS emphasizes the encouragement contained in ver. 7 ("Return to me"), when he says (Tom. 1. In threnis de div. retributione, according to GHISLER.), "O miseranda anima quousque torpescis et de salute animum despondes? Quam veniam in die judicii assequeris, quum salvator per prophetam exclamet dicens: ad me revertere!"

6. On ver. 10. Though the reform of Josiah was only a pseudo-revival, it furnishes us with the means of judging how deep a genuine revival must go. If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out and cast it from thee (Math. v. 29; xviii. 8, 9; Mark ix. 43-48).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. The severity and the goodness of God in His dealings with the Jewish nation (Rom. xi. 22); (1) His severity in His judgments upon Israel; (2) His goodness in His constantly repeated invitations to return (ver. 7.)

2. The difference between false and true repentance. (1) False repentance; (a) its ground—servile fear; (b) its effect—external reform. (2) True repentance; (a) its ground—love to God; (b) its effect—honest fruits of sanctification.

3. The call to Return in the Future (iii. 11-25.)

a. How and whom God will call.

III. 11-17.

- 11 And Jehovah said to me, Apostasy Israel
Has justified her soul before Faithless Judah.
- 12 Go and cry these words to the north, and say,
Return¹ Apostasy Israel, saith Jehovah.
I will not lower my face² against you,
For I am merciful, saith Jehovah,
I do not bear a grudge for ever.³
- 13 Only acknowledge thy sin,
That thou hast transgressed against the Lord thy God,
And hast run hither and thither to the strangers under every green tree,
And ye have not heeded my voice, saith Jehovah.
- 14 Return, apostate children, saith Jehovah,
For I am your husband⁴ and take you one from a city,
And two from a tribe and bring you towards Zion.
- 15 And give you pastors after my heart,
And they shall pasture you with understanding⁵ and judgment.⁶

- 16 And it shall come to pass, when ye shall multiply,
 And spread in the land in those days, saith Jehovah,
 It will no more be said, Ark of the covenant of Jehovah!
 And it will no more come to mind,⁷
 Nor will they remember it or esteem it;
 Also they will not make it again.
- 17 At that time Jerusalem will be called Jehovah's throne,
 And all the nations shall gather to it,
 To the name of Jehovah, to Jerusalem,
 And will no more follow the perverseness of their evil heart.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The purport of this and the following strophe points evidently to the future. We find the call שׁוֹנֶה שׁוֹנֶה here also, addressed in the first instance to the Israel of the ten tribes, then to the whole people; but he who calls has the consciousness, that no longer, as hitherto, is he preaching to deaf ears. The times are changed. Israel repents, and a period opens before him of unanticipated outward and spiritual glory. The prophet comprises in his view first the past and the future, then the present, for the same reason that he treats of the present so much more at length; he has the present Israel most at heart; it is his object to subordinate the Past and the Future as means. Before, therefore, he enters in detail into the present condition of things, he seeks by brief and significant intimations concerning the past and future, to make an impression on the hearts of his hearers.

Ver. 11. And Jehovah . . . Judah. It results from the preceding section that Judah, besides the aids afforded by the temple and the legitimate royalty, had also the example of Israel before her as a powerful impulse to amendment. The consequence of leaving these advantages un-employed, is that Israel appears more righteous than Judah. Comp. Ezek. xvi. 51, 52, the reverse of the expression, κατακρίνειν, Matth. xii. 41, coll. ver. 27. This point, favorable to Israel, serves the prophet as a point of support for a consolatory prophecy which is addressed primarily to Israel.

Ver. 12. Go and cry these words towards the north . . . I do not bear a grudge for ever.—Go and cry, comp. ii. 2.—Towards the north. Comp. ver. 18. The prophet is to cry towards the north because Israel was carried captive into Assyria, towards the north. Comp.

xvi. 15; xxiii. 8; xxxi. 8.—Lower my face, comp. Gen. iv. 5, 6. The expression denotes that lowering of the countenance, which is accompanied by the look which Homer portrays in the expression ἰσόδρα ἰσῶν.—Bear a grudge, comp. ver. 5.

Ver. 13. Only acknowledge . . . heeded my voice. The only condition of the grace promised in ver. 12 is acknowledgment of sin. The prophet of course means that fruitful acknowledgment which includes corresponding action, comp. Luke xii. 10, 11.—הַפְּסוּד, comp. ii. 23, 25, 36 (הִתְפַּלֵּל) [lit. scattered (thy ways)].

Ver. 14. Return . . . towards Zion. The old call in a new form. No longer Apostasy Israel is addressed (so Israel alone is called, comp. ver. 6), but apostate children. This not only sounds more comprehensive, but seems besides in ver. 22, to be the common designation of both halves of the people. Observe further, that the following strophe, ver. 18, begins at once with the declaration that Judah and Israel would come together. This seems to be the performance of the command given them in ver. 14. Finally in vers. 14 and 17, the possession of Zion and Jerusalem is spoken of. Should Judah be excluded from this possession? Evidently then the prophet in vers. 11-13, turns first to Israel, who had the preference, because less was given him; but, although he does not expressly name Judah, wishing to excite her to emulation by the promise of salvation apparently addressed to Israel alone (comp. παρασηλοῖεν, Rom. xi. 14), yet in substance the pictures of the two kingdoms in the prophetic perspective, pass imperceptibly into one another, vers. 14-17. This strophe is thus preliminary to the following, in which the union of Israel and Judah is the fundamental idea.—For I am your husband, etc., פָּעַל (as verb. denom. = to be Lord, possessor, especially a spouse, to take a wife), is certainly elsewhere construed with an accusative (Isa. xxvi. 13; liv. 1;

lxii. 4), or with לָ (1 Chron. iv. 22). But the construction with לָ is possible, because the verbs of ruling (comp. Gen. iii. 16; Deut. xv. 6; Judges viii. 22) are thus connected. The explanation of KIMCHI, SCHLEUSSNER, SCHNURRER and others, who would take לָ here as in xxxi. 32, according to the doubtful analogy of the Arabic (See HENGSTENBERG, Christol., II., S. 416), in the meaning "to be disgusted, to disdain," is admissible neither here nor in xxxi., 32 (vide ad loc.), and the less in this place, that we are obliged to take לָ in the sense of although. It is also grammatically incorrect to take לָ in the sense of the future, as some do, following the example of the LXX. (κατακυριεύσω ὑμῶν). Rather does the Lord ground His promise of blessing on the fact that He is Israel's husband, and has never ceased and never will cease to be so. Comp. the remarks on ii. 1-3.—One from a city, etc. EICHORN, EWALD, GRAF understand this: "and even if so few fulfil the condition of true return," (named in ver. 13). But to the ear it would then be definitely stated that only a few would return. We should then also expect the antithesis of כִּפְתָה בֵּית אֲבוֹתַי or עֵבֶט. The expressions city and tribe (comp. Gen. x. 5; xii. 3; Ps. xxii. 28; xvi. 7), intimate rather that the prophet has the cities and tribes of the heathen in view. He would evidently indicate the great scattering of Israel, cast out among the heathen, and would say that great as this scattering was, if ex. gr., there were only one Jew in a city, or only two in a whole nation; yet these members of the holy family, almost vanishing amid the mass of the heathen, should not be forgotten. Thus also KIMCHI and ROSENUELLER. [NOYES and HENDERSON.]

Ver. 15. And give you pastors . . . understanding and judgment. The promise that Israel shall be gathered out of his dispersion (ver. 14) contains an allusion to the final period, and this point is now brought out more clearly. Pastors after God's heart can be those only, who are no longer as hitherto (comp. Hos. viii. 4), governed inwardly or outwardly by the spirit of the world, but who allow themselves to be guided by the Spirit of God alone, and are therefore fit instruments for the realization of God's kingdom upon earth. There is here an unmistakable allusion to David, the man after God's own heart (1 Sam. xiii. 14; Acts xiii. 22), and at the same time the representative of the idea of God's kingdom in its earthly realization (2 Sam. vii.), as well as to Solomon, who next after David, prayed for and received wisdom and judgment from God (2 Chron. i. 10, 11). The explanation of the older commentators, who understand by the pastors, Zerubbabel, Joshua, Ezra, or the Apostles and their successors, may have this much of truth in it that the return under Zerubbabel or the Christian Church may be numbered among the beginnings of the fulfillment of this promise. At any rate we must understand spiritual as well as worldly pastors

Vers. 16 and 17. And it shall come to pass . . . evil heart. These verses portray in a few but expressive traits the character of that future epoch. Its characteristic feature will be this, that in the place of a merely representative there will be a real and therefore, extensively and intensively, an infinitely active presence of God. The pastors of understanding and judgment will bring about a period of prosperity to which it is an essential element, that Israel from the little heap, which according to ver. 14 it will be on its return to the land, will become as to numbers a respectable nation. Comp. xxiii. 3, 4; Isa. xlix. 18-21; liv. 1-3. As in the beginning of the human race, as the basis of all further steps towards the attainment of its destiny, the command was given to be fruitful and multiply (כָּרִי וּרְבִי, Gen. i. 28; ix. 1), of which we are reminded by the sound of the words here (כָּרִי וּרְבִי), and as the family of Jacob in Egypt had first to develop into a great people before it could be the receptacle of the fundamental revelation of the kingdom, so according to this passage the Israel of the future is first to become numerous, in order to be fitted for the concluding and perfected revelation of the kingdom.—In those days. Though connected with the preceding by the accents, which make a pause at הָיָה הַיּוֹם, these words belong, at any rate in meaning to it it will no more be said. They correspond to לָ as tum to a previous quando.—Ark, etc., is not the accusative of the object dependent on say, but an exclamation; and the latter word, therefore, is not to name, to mention, but to say, to speak. The word "ark of the covenant" will no more be heard, because the thing itself and every thought of it will have disappeared. The ark will not be an object of desire or remembrance. In consequence of this it will no more be looked for or sought, as something that is missed (1 Sam. xx. 6; xxv. 15; Isa. xxxiv. 16; 1 Chron. xiii. 3) and still less prepared anew.—Will not make it. LUTHER: they will no longer sacrifice there, but עֲצִיבָה occurs in this meaning without an object-accusative only at a very late period (2 Ki. xvii. 32), and it is not credible that the prophet should designate this important idea by an expression so easily misunderstood. The Chaldee, RASCHI, GROTIUS and others render "and it shall no more take place," but they differ among themselves in reference to what shall no more take place. They thus resort to arbitrary supplementations (the taking of the ark into battle 1 Sam. iv. 11; ea quæ nunc in bello fieri solent; the previously stated). The only natural subject is ark.—Jehovah's throne. The period when the ark is lacking, described in ver. 16, does not represent a retrograde but a progressive interval. What the ark has hitherto been to Jerusalem (Exod. xxv. 18-22; Numb. vii. 89; Ps. lxxx. 2; xcix. 1) Jerusalem is now to be in relation to the nations. All Jerusalem is now to be the throne of the Lord. The prophet's glance penetrates to the remotest distance, without distinguishing the progressive stages into which the final period itself is divided. While thus this prophecy on one hand reminds us of Micah iv. (coll. Isa. ii. 2 sqq.; Zech. viii. 20; Jer. xxxi. 6. Comp. Casr. Micah der Morasth. S. 453), on the other hand it reminds us of Rev. xxi.—The declaration of this passage that Jerusalem itself will be the throne of God is covered by the declaration of the Apocalypse that the New Jerusalem will be the tabernacle of God with men (xxi. 3) as the earth was in the beginning (Gen. iii.), and as the glory of Melchisedek consists in his being the representative of that original relation to God. Comp. the article in HERZOG, Real-Enc. on Melchisedek, IX., S. 303. Comp. also Ezek. xviii. 35; Joel iv. 17. The correspondence of the Jerusalem of this passage with the New Jerusalem is further intimated by what is said in Rev. xxi. 22, 23, that the latter will have no temple, neither sun nor moon, but all these the Lord Himself will be to it. The analogy of this declaration with that in Jeremiah concerning the absence of the ark is strikingly evident. Comp. THOLUCK, Die Propheten und ihre Weiss. S. 154 and 194.—This analogy is finally confirmed by the declaration that all the heathen will assemble in the name of God at Jerusalem, for a similar declaration is made in Revelation, on the basis of many prophetic passages (Isa. lx. ; lxxi. 18 sqq.; Zech. xiv. 16; Zeph. iii. 9, 10; comp. Rom. ix. 24-26; x. 18-20) of the New Jerusalem in xxi. 24, 26.—To the name. The expression is supported by the passages Exod. xx. 21; Deut. xii. 5, 11: coll. 1 Kings viii. 16 sqq.; 2 Chron. vi. 5 sqq., where even the first earthly sanctuary is designated as the residence of the name of Jehovah. As the preposition לְ designates the direction in space, so לְ before אֵשׁ designates the object of the coming; to Jerusalem, however, cannot be the bare repetition of the idea in it (HITZIG) any more than the addition of a later hand, for it renders the sense more difficult, instead of more easy, on which account the absence of the word in the LXX and the Syriac is evidently due to the critics. We can regard it only with HENGSTEN-

BERG as the more exact definition of לְ אֵשׁ, before which אֵשׁ is to be supplied. It has then a causative sense; not Jerusalem is the object of the assembling of the nations, but the name of the Lord, which belongs to Jerusalem, and Jerusalem only in so far as the name of the Lord was inseparably connected with it.—And will no more follow, etc. The expression תִּפְרָדוּ is found on the basis of Deut. xxix. 18, also in Ps. lxxxi. 13, and in Jer. vii. 24; ix. 13; xi. 8; xliii. 10; xvi. 12; xviii. 12; xxiii. 17—in all these places of Israel. It has nothing in itself which requires this limitation, it may therefore be used also in a wider sense, so that the heathen, in so far as Jerusalem is also their centre, may be reckoned together with Israel. All then, Israel and the heathen, will finally lose their stony heart and receive a heart soft and filled with the Spirit (Ezek. xi. 19; xxxvi. 26), and not outwardly only but with the whole heart will they be subject to the Lord and His kingdom.—If we once more look over this strophe we are struck above all by the sublimely rapid progress of the prophet's discourse from the circumstances of the present to the remotest future. The prophet proceeds from the comparison of the Judah of the present with the Israel in a certain sense belonging already to the past. This comparison issues favorably to Israel. Thus a prophecy is called forth which sets in prospect before Israel the highest material and spiritual prosperity. With this two questions are connected. Since the realization of this prosperity is connected with the condition of Israel's conversion, the question arises, Will this conversion take place? and when? The prophetic gaze can in the inconceivably distant ages perceive no element of religious or political restoration in the Israel of the ten tribes, as these are in fact unknown even to the present day. It must then be reserved for the final period (אֲחֵרֵי הַיָּמִים Mic. iv. 1) to bring back the lost ten tribes to the light,—the light of knowledge and of salvation. But here another question also arises, Will not Judah also participate in this light of knowledge and salvation? These two questions then: What will become of Judah? and How is it as to the conversion required in ver. 13? still wait for a solution. We may indeed read this solution from ver. 14 between the lines. But the sublime haste of the prophet's flight hindered him from giving it in express words; he adds it therefore in the following strophe.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. ["Here is a great deal of Gospel in these verses, both that which was always gospel, God's readiness to pardon sin, and to receive and entertain returning, repenting sinners, and those blessings which were in a special manner reserved for gospel-times, the forming and founding of the gospel-church by bringing into it the children of God that were scattered abroad, the superseding of the ceremonial law, and the uniting of Jews and Gentiles, typified by the uniting of Israel and Judah in their return out of captivity." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

b. Supplement of the preceding, stating more exactly who is called and how the call is received.

III. 18-25.

- 18 In that day the house of Judah and the house of Israel shall walk together,
And shall come with each other from the north country
Into the land which I have given your fathers for an inheritance.
- 19 And I said: How will I put thee among the children,
And give thee a pleasant land,
The most glorious inheritance among the nations!
And further I said, My Father thou wilt call me,¹
And wilt not turn away behind me.
- 20 But! Was ever a woman faithless to her lover,
So were you faithless towards me,
O house of Israel, saith Jehovah.
- 21 A cry is heard on the hills,
The weeping supplication of the children of Israel;
That they have perverted their way,
Have forgotten Jehovah, their God.
- 22 Return, ye apostate children,
I will heal² your apostasies!
Behold, we come³ to thee,
For thou art Jehovah, our God.
- 23 As certainly as hills are false,
Mountains an empty sound,⁴
So certain is the salvation of Israel
With Jehovah our God.
- 24 Shame however hath devoured the gains of our fathers from our youth,
Their sheep and their oxen,
Their sons and their daughters.
- 25 Let us lie in our shame,
And our disgrace cover us,
That we have sinned against Jehovah our God,
We and our fathers from our youth to this day,
And have not heeded the voice of Jehovah our God.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe evidently consists of two parts, of which the first (ver. 18-19) treats of the participation of Judah in the prosperity promised to Israel, the second (vers. 20-25) of the conversion of both as one which satisfies all demands.

Vers. 18. In that day an inheritance. Reference to the last strophe. Comp. at that time ver. 17.—together, in the sense of heaping so that those are designated as upon one another, of whom we should speak as together, with each other, is frequent: Gen. xxviii. 9; xxxii. 12; Exod. xii. 9; xxxv. 22; Amos iii. 15; Job

xxxviii. 32. We see also that לְ is to be regarded as a preposition from the following sentences where their coming in company is manifestly the result of their meeting together. The promise of a reunion of the exiles from Judah and Jerusalem, and their return in company to the land of their fathers is found also,—to mention only the principal passages, in Hos. ii. 2; Isa. xi. 11; Jer. xxx. and xxxi.; 1. 4, 5; Ezek. xxxvii. 15-17.—It forms an essential element in the glorious picture of the future, which prophecy presents by the announcement of a glorious restoration of Israel to Canaan after long humiliation and dispersion. To the original passages Levit. xxvi. 42-45; Deut. xxx. 1-10; xxxii. 36-43 follows a long series of prophetic declarations, of which the most important are Ps. lxxii.; Isai. ii. 2-4; iv. 2-6; ix. 1-6; Chap. xxiv. sqq; lx. sqq; Jer. xxix. 10-14; xxx.,-xxxiii.; Ezek. xxxiv. 23-25; Joel iv. 16; Am. ix. 8; Ob. 17-21; Mic. iv. 5; Zeph. iii. 14-20; Zech. ii. 4, sqq. viii. 7 sqq; ix. 9 sqq. x. 8sqq.—Comp. AUBRELEN, der proph. Daniel, S. 391 sqq.—HEBART, The Second Visible Coming of Christ, (Die Zweite, etc. Erlangen. 1850. S. 70, 84, etc.)

Ver. 19. And I said . . . behind me. If above, in the concluding remark on the preceding strophe, we have correctly defined its relation to vers. 18-25, it follows that ver. 18 does not belong to the foregoing, and that vers. 19 and 20 are not connected as thesis and antithesis, as most modern commentators would have it. The reasons for this view are the following: (1) ver. 18 seems then entirely isolated. GRAF says: "Only in passing is a glance cast in this verse at the final destiny of Judah." But the destiny of Judah demands more than a passing glance. Either an elucidation concerning the fate of Judah must be interwoven with the contents of the preceding discourse, or Judah must be spoken of in appropriate measure in a special section. (2) According to the view which I combat, there is a hiatus between verses 18 and 19. With ver. 19, the discourse proceeds to an entirely new subject, the relation of which to the preceding can be designated neither by a separative nor by a connective particle. The Vau before אָנֹכִי accordingly appears not only superfluous, but interruptive. (3) If vers. 19 and 20 are so connected that the former declares the expectation cherished by Jehovah, the latter the sad non-fulfilment of this expectation, the discourse makes a spring from ver. 20 to ver. 21 which could not be more abrupt. No one would then expect the delightful continuation of the discourse after ver. 20. Suddenly and without preparation we are met by the description of Israel's penitence. In short, verses 19 and 20 do not then at all agree with what follows, and since they are equally severed from what precedes, they appear to be a wholly needless and interruptive interpolation. It will therefore be correct to attach ver. 19 closely to ver. 18, as a short but satisfactory description of the condition of the entire Israelitish people after their return to the land of their fathers. In the form of an objection, which is subsequently removed, ver. 20 then forms an appropriate transition to the second subject, concerning which, as remarked above, the prophet had to pronounce in this strophe. The emphatic אָנֹכִי , "I," on the one hand forms an antithesis to Israel and Judah in ver. 18, and on the other brings out the importance of the promise here given—Not a man, but I, Jehovah, declare this. אָנֹכִי is neither future, as ex. gr. SEB. SCHMIDT supposes, nor is it a narrative preterite, so as to refer to a definite event in the past, as ex. gr., ANABANEL reads, referring it to the exodus from Egypt. It simply presents this declaration of God as an accomplished fact. It asserts that there is a divine decree of the afterwards designated import. But thus this import is absolutely guaranteed, for the Lord's word is true, and what He says is certain (Ps. xxxiii. 4). The strange addition, γένοιτο κέρτε , which the LXX. make after καὶ ἐγὼ εἶπα , may be explained by the circumstance, as we may gather from THEODORET, that they understood אָנֹכִי not of God but of the prophet, and since I put thee among the children could not possibly be uttered by the prophet, they supplied him with words ex propriis.—The explanation of this expression of relation among the children, agrees well with that view of the connection which has been rejected by us, although it is still strange even according to this view, that ver. 20 should pass over to another picture. We should expect that the Israelites, in view of the gracious purpose of God expressed in ver. 19, would be designated as disobedient children (comp. Isai. i. 2), and not as a faithless spouse. We render the expression with the CHALDEE, BGENIAGEN, LETHIER, CLARIUS, GROTIUS, SCHMIDT, VENEMA, HITZIG in the sense of bestowing a rich paternal benediction. On the importance of such benediction, compare the remarks on ver. 16; KUEPER (S. 9.) calls this a benedictio vere theocratica. Israel and Judah, according to ver. 14, having returned in small numbers must before all become a numerous people. The promise in ver. 16, made primarily to Israel, is here presented to the view of both.—VENEMA mentions, that they say also in Dutch, jemant in kinderen setten. Comp. $\text{בְּיָשׁוּעַ בְּיָמֵינוּ}$ in salute ponere, Ps. xii. 6.—a pleasant land. Comp. Ps. cvi. 24; Zech. vii. 14.—a most glorious inheritance. It is a question whether to derive אֲנֹכִי from אָנֹכִי or from אָנֹכִי . Both are grammatically possible. Comp. NAEGELSN. Gr. S. 106; OLSHAUSEN, § 145, 6; EWALD, § 186 c; § 55, e. Comp. אֲנֹכִי (Gazelles) 1 Chron. xii. 8; and אֲנֹכִי (in the same meaning) Song of Sol. ii. 7; iii. 5.—It is of no account that the form occurs elsewhere only as St. constr. from אֲנֹכִי (Exod. xii. 41; 1 Kings ii. 5), and that אָנֹכִי in the sense of deus does not occur elsewhere in the plural, since for the sake of a play upon words the prophet might employ an unusual expression. The juxtaposition of the singular and plural to form a climax, is also, as is well known, not infrequent; Eccles. i. 2; Ezek. xvi. 7. Comp. NAEGELSN. Gr. § 61. 3. The decision is the more difficult since the meaning in both cases is the same (MAURER). Most commentators preferring the more normal form decide in favor of the derivation from צָבָא. Yet I would prefer the derivation from צָבָי. Since the juxtaposition of צָבָאָה צָבָי seems more pregnant and forcible than the flat and tautological גִּימִס צָבָאָה. Besides which the Holy Land is elsewhere called צָבָי אֶרֶץ, Ezek. xx. 6, 15; Dan. xi. 16, 41.— ואָכֵר we translate: "And further I said," for from the first divine decree flows a second of this import, that Israel will not only receive but show himself worthy of receiving. That which Israel spoke before (ver. 4) in hypocritical pretence, will be presented in the future, which the Prophet has in view, in glorious reality.

Ver. 20. But! Was ever woman faithless to her lover? . . . O house of Israel! saith Jehovah. In these words the Lord Himself raises a protest against the promise given to Judah and Israel in verses 18 and 19. How shall such glory be imparted to this people, who have hitherto been distinguished only for their infidelity? אֲנִי is taken by many, ex. gr. FÜRST (Handwb. s. v.) EWALD, (Lehrb. S. 273.) in a relative signification=so as, entirely so as. But there is no example of this meaning and it is not necessary that there should be here a particle of contingency or comparison. (Comp. Isai. lv. 9; coll. vers. 10, 11). We therefore take אֲנִי (which like אֵיף may from the meaning "tantum, only" obtain an affirmative as well as a restrictive sense) here=but, however, which meaning it undoubtedly has in Ps. xxxi. 23; lxxxii. 7; Isai. xlix. 4; Zeph. iii. 7. Since the prophet in this strophe has in view the period of re-united Israel, Israel or house of Israel is to be taken in these verses to 4, 2, not in the restricted sense of ver. 6 sqq. but in the wider sense mentioned. (Comp. Isai. i. 3, etc.)

Ver. 21. A cry is heard on the hills. . . . forgotten Jehovah, their God. With dramatic vividness the penitent people are now brought forward to refute the exception taken in ver. 20, in such a way that ver. 21 designates their appearance in general outlines, ver. 22 the call to the people to repent, repeated from ver. 14; and in the following verses it is shown by the verba ipsissima of the people, how they responded to this call.—On the hills. These high places which had formerly been the seats of wickedness (see ver. 2) are now the scenes of penitence, comp. vii. 29.

Ver. 22. Return, ye apostate children . . . for thou art Jehovah, our God. The same call as in ver. 14, from which we see that this passage is closely connected with that. The question; Will the people respond to the call? there obtruded itself. Here it is satisfactorily answered. It might be asked why the words "Return, etc.," do not come before ver. 21. But this verse is only to describe the disposition of the people towards repentance, their general penitence. Israel was indeed formerly "faithless" (ver. 20), but now they acknowledge their sin and are able to obey the call, should it again be heard as before (ver. 22, a) in a manner well-pleasing to God. (ver. 22, b-25)—I will heal, etc. The thought is from Hos. xiv. 5. In the connection of heal with the plural it seems to be implied that the Lord will both pardon the single acts, and remove the evil root.

Ver. 23. As certainly as the hills are false . . . Jehovah, our God. Without Dagesh forte כִּנְבֻעוֹת would mean the priests' caps, since the word occurs in this sense only; Exod. xxix. 9; xxviii. 40; xxxix. 28; Levit. viii. 13. But what have these to do here? The Masoretes have therefore punctuated the ו with Dag. forte, in order thus to secure the meaning of "hills." Now the explanation of the כִּן prepares new difficulties. The ancient translators ignore this כִּן altogether, and yet take the rest in the sense of colles. The later commentators (if they do not with LUD. DE DIEU take הֲרִים = offerre, i. e. victimas) either supply כִּן before הֲרִים or alter הֲרִים into הֲכִין. Besides this they differ very widely in determining the meaning of הֲכִין.— It seems to me that the prophet understood the word כִּנְבֻעוֹת in the sense of "hills," and chose it for the sake of its secondary meaning. Although the word occurs in the Old Testament only in the sense of "priests' caps," yet "hills" was the original meaning from which the other was developed, the word being transferred on account of the hill-like shape of the caps. Now as ex. gr. the word for weapon in German (Gewehr) has gradually assumed the meaning of musket, but might be used in its original and more general sense in a manner intelligible to every German, so here the prophet has employed a word restricted by usage to a special meaning, in its original signification in such a way that at the same time he intended an allusion to the secondary sense. Not the hills are the deceivers, but the priests, of whom Elijah on this account slew a great number (1 Kings xviii. 40). In הֲכִין which means tumult, strepitus, there may be an allusion to the bacchanalian noise of the unchaste idol-worship. Comp. Am. v. 23— לִטְקָר like לִטְוֶה has become an adverb and signifies false, deceptive, useless. (Levit. v. 24; xix. 12; 1 Sam. xxv. 21; Jer. v. 2; vii. 9; viii. 8; xxvii. 15; Zech. v. 4; Mal. iii. 5). אֲנִי is taken by the commentators both times in the affirmative sense. (iv. 10; viii. 8). It appears to me that this doubling includes also the idea of reciprocal relation (comp. פָּעַל-כֹּה־פֹּה): as certainly as the hills are vanity and nothing, so certainly is Israel's salvation in Jehovah, their God.

Ver. 24. Shame, however . . . their sons and their daughters. Not merely as vanity and nothing, but as positively injurious are the idols opposed to the real saving power of Jehovah. The Vau at the beginning of this verse corresponds especially to the last clause of ver. 23, as containing the main thought, and is accordingly adversative=however. הַבִּשְׁתָּה. From 11, 13; Hos. ix. 10 we see that בִּשְׁתָּה is here placed in parallelism with בָּעַל. KIMCHI remarks that in ancient names composed with בִּשְׁתָּה the place of this word is afterwards supplied by אֲשַׁבְּעַל. Hence for אִישׁ-בִּשְׁתָּה 2 Sam. ii. 8; אֲשַׁבְּעַל 1 Chron. viii. 33. For יִרְבְּעַל Judges vi. 32.

יְרֵבֶשֶׁת 2 Sam. xi. 21. From all this we see that the abstract בַּשֵּׁת is to be regarded primarily as an ironical synonym of בְּיָהוָה, the chief deity. From what, however, is ascribed in this passage to בַּשֵּׁת the prophet cannot have had merely Baal in mind but also the other idols. All these have from the youth not of the speaker, but of the people generally (comp. the golden calf, Exod. xxxii., and Baal Peor, Num. xxv.), devoured the substance of the fathers, in part immediately by sacrifices which were not due to them as to the Lord, in part mediately by the judgments which such apostasy brought upon the people.

Ver. 25. Let us lie . . . the voice of Jehovah, our God. As vers. 22-24 contain acknowledgment and confession, so ver. 25 contains shame and sorrow. As the penitent seats himself in dust and ashes (Job xlii. 6; Dan. ix. 3), so they casting themselves down in the feeling of their shame, would lie before the Lord, and as the penitent clothes himself in sackcloth (1 Kings xxi. 27; 2 Kings vi. 30; xix. 1, 2), or veils his face (Exod. iii. 6; 2 Sam. xv. 30), so would they, deeply feeling their disgrace, hide their countenance before the Lord (comp. the publican, Luke xviii. 13). The entire guilt which the people had incurred from their youth up (ii. 2; Hos. xi. 1) is according to the scale of Ps. xxxii. 5, to be expiated.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 21. Although Paul in Gal. vi. 4, 5, says that every one should prove his own work, that he may have praise in himself and not in another, and that every one will have his own burden, yet we read on the other hand that the people of Nineveh and the Queen of Sheba will in the day of judgment condemn the gereá of Christ's contemporaries (Matt. xii. 41, 42; comp. ver. 27; 11, 21, etc.). The apparent contradiction is dispelled when we consider that Paul in the Epistle to the Galatians urges the absolute standard against those who desire to find in the faults of others a mantle for their own, that is, that every one will be judged above all and essentially according to that which he is in and of himself. Christ himself, however, in the passages cited applies the relative standard to those who, in the blindness of their pride, believe themselves beyond comparison better than all others. To these it is said that a comparison may certainly be made, but that it will result to their disadvantage, since the guilt which they have incurred, notwithstanding the most favorable circumstances, will serve for a ground of mitigation for others, who have sinned in less favorable circumstances, (ἀνεκτότερον ἔσται, Matt. xi. 22, 24).

2. "Erubescet Sidon, ait mare. Quasi enim per vocem maris ad verecundiam Sidon adducitur, quando per comparationem vitæ secularium atque in hoc mundo fluctuantium ejus, qui munitus et quasi stabilis cernitur, vita reprobatur." Gregor M. in Isidor. Hisp. Vide GHISSLER. S. 289.

3. On vers. 12, 13. The grace of God is an open door to every one who knocks with the finger of penitence, 1 John i. 8-10. "Erranti medicina confessio—Cessat vindicta divina, si confessio præcurrat humana." AMBROS.

4. GHISSLER'S. "Deus sol hominis et homo sol Dei. Quod Deus sit sol hominis, indicatur eo, quod peccatores metaphorâ designati sint aquilonis. Ut enim ab aquilone sol sensibilis, ita a peccatoribus Deus, sol justitiæ longe est. Quod autem homo quodammodo sit et Dei sol, indicat ipsemet Deus, dum ait: revertere aversatrix Israel et non avertam faciem meam a vobis (Vulg.). Significat enim ad hominem se habere ut heliotropium ad solem: convertente homine se ad Deum, convertit statim et se Deus ad illum; coque non se avertente, nec Deus faciem suam ab illo avertit."

5. On ver. 14. "God in proof of his mercy keeps his covenant, which men have broken by their sins, as strictly and securely, as though they had never broken it. Ezek. xviii. 22." STARKE.

6. On ver. 15. Donatur, fato non decedit arbore mysta.

7. On ver. 16. "The ceremonial law and custom must have an end, and the ark of the covenant, as only a shadow of good things to come, must also cease to be (Heb. x. 1). It is therefore only a rabbinical fiction, that people still derive consolation from the second book of Maccabees (ii. 5), as though the ark of the covenant were somewhere in a mountain and would eventually be found, for the true ark of the covenant, which is found again, is Jesus Christ, the true Messiah typified by the Ark." CRAMER. The manner in which Jeremiah here speaks of the ark of the covenant is moreover so extraordinary that we may apply to it the words of Matthew xvi. 17. Flesh and blood have not revealed it unto thee, but my Father in heaven. The ark at that time in the reign of Josiah was again regarded with the greatest reverence (comp. 2 Chron. xxxv. 3; III. Esd. i. 3, 4). What a divinely lofty and distant view must the prophet have had to be able to treat the ark as he here does, as something of small account!

8. The view that this prophecy was fulfilled by the return under Zerubbabel and Ezra is opposed by the fact (1), that not even the whole of Judah, not to speak of the whole of Israel then returned (of the latter a few at most: comp. Ἡεζοα Real-Enc. XIV. S. 773; I. S. 651); (2), that not even Judah had then returned to the Lord, not to speak of the conversion of the heathen. Its fulfilment by the founding of the Christian church is contradicted by the fact, (1) that the reunion of Judah and Israel had not yet taken place, the latter people must still be regarded as unknown (comp. Ἡεζοα, Real-Enc. I. S. 651; XVII. S. 284); (2) that Israel in general has rejected the Lord and refused to enter the Christian church (comp. Rom. chap. xi.-xii.); (3) that the heathen have indeed begun to turn to the name of the Lord and to the Jerusalem that is above (Gal. iv. 26), but that this has taken place neither in such measure nor in such a manner that we can recognize in it the complete fulfilment of that which this passage declares of the conversion of all nations and the removal of their hardness of heart. We must therefore still wait for the complete fulfilment of this prophecy. The argument of BERTHEAU in his essay, "The Old Testament prophecies of Israel's imperial glory in his own land," (Die Alttest., Weiss, etc. In Jahrb. f. deutsche Theol. IV. 2, 4; V. 3,) which he urges from the point of view that many prophecies remain unfulfilled, because men on their part have not fulfilled the required conditions, is not applicable here, for in ver. 20, sqq., it is expressly said that Israel will comply most satisfactorily with the single condition imposed by the Lord. (ver. 13).

9. On vers. 18 and 19. As the separation of the kingdom of Israel from the kingdom of Judah may be regarded as the type of the denominational divisions in Christendom, so the reunion here promised may be regarded as a type of all true union. This must always rest on a double, negative and positive, basis: (1) on the fundamental return of both from the false ground on which they have been standing (typified by the common exit of both tribes from the north country, the land of captivity): (2) on unreserved sincere devotion to the Lord, who is for both the only source of life and truth, (typified in the words "My father, wilt thou call me, etc." ver. 19). The result of this will be a condition of glorious prosperity in the church (typified in the first clause of ver. 19).

10. On vers. 20-25. The peculiarities of true penitence meet us plainly in this section: it proceeds from the inmost heart (the weeping supplication of the people, ver. 21, as well as their deep shame evince this, ver. 25). It is free from all false penitence, which proceeds merely from the feeling of the disadvantageous consequences of wickedness. Its principle is rather sorrow at having grieved God by the rejection of His holy love. This is intimated by the second clause of ver. 21. True penitence, finally, is made known by the honest fruits of repentance. These are here set forth in the words "I will heal your apostasies" ver. 22, and by the detestation of evil, and yearning for the Lord, which are expressed in vers. 24, 25.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On ver. 11. "To what reflections should the declaration of Scripture give rise, that the divine judgment is determined by the comparison of men with each other? 1. We should reflect that it is impossible for us to institute this

It consists, (a) in the direction of the inmost heart to God (assembling at the throne of the Lord), (b) in the evidence of this direction of the heart in a holy walk (to walk no more according to the thoughts of the wicked heart).

6. On vers. 18 and 19. The conditions of true union, 1. common return from sin and error (Judah and Israel come together from the north), 2. common return to the source of life and truth (the inheritance of the fathers—dear father!—will not depart from me).

Return unto Me.
And if thou puttest away thine abominations out of my sight,
Then waver not,¹
- 2 But swear 'As Jehovah liveth!'
In truth and justice and righteousness,

- So that the nations bless themselves in him,²
 And boast of him.
 3 For thus saith Jehovah to the men of Judah and Jerusalem, Break up your fallow-ground³
 And sow not among thorns.
 4 Circumcise yourselves to the Lord,
 And take away the foreskin of your heart,
 Ye men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem ;
 Lest my fury break forth like fire,
 And burn, and there be no quencher,—
 On account of the wickedness of your doings.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The fundamental thought of the whole discourse (RETURN) is distinctly stamped on the head of this section. True and honest conversion is the indispensable condition of present life. All that the prophet has previously said, partly in severe rebuke, partly in friendly invitation, was to serve as an exhortation to procure an entrance into this life. If the people do not heed this exhortation, they fall inevitably under the just judgment of God.

Ver. 1. If thou returnest . . . waver not. These words point back to iii. 7 and 10. The call "Return to me" according to iii. 7, had been addressed to Israel in vain. Judah on the other hand, according to iii. 10, had been obedient to the call "Return," but not to the "to me," for their return was not hearty but hypocritical. We have shown above that by this is meant the reformation of Josiah. A hypocritical return is the same as one which is not to the Lord, for the hypocrite avoids indeed the forms in which his sins have hitherto been manifested, but he does not turn positively with his heart to the Lord. The Lord does not therefore allow the conversion occasioned by the reformation under Josiah to be regarded as unto Him. And hence the prophet thus addresses the people: if you would answer the call "Return to me" (iii. 7), it must not be done by a return "with falsehood" which is no return to me at all, but by such a conversion as may be truly thus designated.—Comp. Hos. vi. 14. An example of such a conversion, "not unto the Lord" is also the reformation of Jehu, 2 Kings ix. x. Comp. especially 2 Kings x. 31. In the reformation of Josiah, Judah did outwardly put away their abominations out of God's sight (2 Kings xxiii. 4 sqq.) but they were far from directing their hearts fixedly and alone to God. Instead of this they wavered, wishing partly to serve the Lord and partly also their idols. Comp. Zeph. i. 5. How ambiguous the conduct of the people must then have been is clear from 2 Kings xxii. 14 sqq.; xxiii. 25-27; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22-28. Comp. HEZOG, Real-Enc. VII. 36.—In translating בָּרַח by "waver"

I appeal to the radical signification of the word, "to oscillate," by virtue of which it is used of the waving of a reed (2 Kings xiv. 15), the flapping of wings (Ps. xi. 1; Prov. xxvi. 2), of the wandering of a fugitive (Gen. iv. 12) and of the shaking of the head, (Jer. xviii. 16; Ps. xlv. 15). From the meaning of commiserari which it has in several places (Jer. xvi. 5; xlvi. 17, etc.) it is evident that the word is also capable of being transferred to the sphere of spiritual relations.

Ver. 2. But swear . . . and boast of him. In swearing by Jehovah in truth, justice and righteousness is included not only that they swear the truth (Lev. xix. 12; Num. xxx. 3; Jer. v. 2 coll. Matt. v. 33) but also that they swear by Jehovah alone and not also by idols, as according to Zeph. i. 5. they then did. To refer בָּרַח to Israel, and then to assume either a change of person or a quotation from Gen. xviii. 18, (coll. xii. 3; xxii. 18; xxvi. 4; xxviii. 14) or to read בָּרַח (as ex. gr. E. MEIER) is arbitrary. The reference to God is perfectly justified by the connection. The moral course of Israel is to win over the heathen to God, who is the source of that power by which they pursue this course (1 Pet. iii. 1, 2), as on the other hand the sin of Israel is designated as causing the heathen to blaspheme (Rom. ii. 24, coll. Ezek. xxxv. 20, 23). As in Isai. lxx. 16, so also here בָּרַח signifies to recognize God as the source of all blessing, and therefore to seek all blessing only through him. "And boast of him," refers to the possession of the desired blessing. For they justly boast in a dispenser of blessing, who causes those who bless themselves in his name to appear really blessed. Comp. Isai. xli. 16; Jer. ix. 22, 23; Ps. xxxiv. 3; cv. 3.

Ver. 3. For thus saith Jehovah . . . sow not among thorns. בָּרַח here is not causative but explicative. The words return unto Me, waver not and swear by Jehovah in truth are so explained in what follows as to show plainly that the prophet has in view the hypocritical half-heartedness with which the people submitted to the reformation of Josiah. Break up your fallow-ground is from Hos. x. 12. Israel is not to sow on the unemployed field of his heart, but to break it up, as is done with wild land, which is cleansed from weeds only by deep and repeated ploughing. It was just in this that the people failed in Josiah's reformation. It was a sowing among thorns. Comp. Luke viii. 7.

Ver. 4. Circumcise yourselves to the Lord . . . your doings. Circumcision to the Lord is opposed to that which is done only in accordance with outward ordinance or custom. The latter is done merely on the body, the former on the heart also, of which sin is the real defiling foreskin. Comp. Levit. xxvi. 41; Jer. ix. 25, coll. Exod. vi. 12 (iv. 10); Jer. vi. 13. The expression "take away the foreskin of your heart" is a reminiscence from Deut. x. 16; xxx. 6. Comp. KUEPER, S. 10.—Men of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem, a frequent formula in Jeremiah (Comp. xi. 2, 12; xvii. 20; xviii. 11; xxv. 2; xxxv. 17, etc.) in which a certain prerogative of the citizens of Jerusalem is recognizable. Comp. viii. 1; xiii. 13; xix. 3.—My fury, etc. Comp. Am. v. 6; Jer. vii. 20.—The words on account of the wickedness, etc. (coll. xxi. 22; xxiii. 2; xxvi. 3; xlv. 22) are from Deut. xxviii. 20. The prophet in these words prepares the way for the transition to the second main division. Israel obeys not the call, the fury of the Lord must therefore break forth. The manner in which this will take place is described in section second.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 1. Mere turning from earthly things without positive returning to God, the pole of the soul, is not true repentance. So long as the prodigal son, after the loss of all earthly goods, had not formed the resolution of returning to his father, he was not yet in a penitent condition. A man, who should denounce this or that sin, but yet not devote himself wholly and decidedly to God, would thus give no guarantee of the genuineness or permanence of his conversion. Comp. what is said of following

Jesus, Matt. xix. 16; Luke ix. 59 sqq. For repentance to be honest, it must have the right object, i. e. it must be towards God.—CRAMER.

2. On ver. 2. Swearing by Jehovah involves the acknowledgment of His deity. For no one would swear by Him who was not convinced that He is the witness of truth and the avenger of falsehood. But when one swears by others he robs God of His glory and gives it to idols; Isa. xlii. 8.

3. On ver. 3. Rooting out weeds from the field of the heart is the most difficult part of repentance. Many would receive the gospel gladly if they were permitted to leave the thorns and sow the seed of the gospel among them. Comp. Matt. vi. 24; 1 Ki. xviii. 21.

4. On ver. 4. We Christians also know of a double circumcision, a bodily and a spiritual, which however are not related to each other, as the bodily and spiritual circumcision of Judaism. For according to Col. ii. 11 baptism corresponds to conversion as the περιτομή χειροποιητός, as the ἀπέκδοσις τοῦ σώματος τῆς σαρκός. Thus the sacrament of baptism is the spiritual and bodily basis of the περιτομή τῆς καρδίας, which is spoken of in Phil. iii. 3, coll. Rom. ii. 29; vi. 1 sqq.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. ORIGEN treats this passage in his peculiar style in his fifth homily on Jeremiah. Vide S. 149 and 164 sqq., ed. LOMMATZSCH.

2. On ver. 3. "We Christians also, like the Jews, love to sow under the hedges. We allow the divine word to be strewn on the field of our heart, we hear and read God's word on week-days and Sundays, but we also allow the thickets of evil passions and sinful habits to grow on."—HOCHSTETTER, 12 Parables (12 Gleichnisse, etc., S. 10).

3. True repentance consists (a) in decided turning away from evil (not sowing among the thorns but breaking up new ground); (b) in decided turning to God (positive devotion to God alone, ver. 1, so that He alone is served and worshipped, ver. 2).

SECOND DIVISION.

CHAP. IV. V.-VI. 26.

Threatening of punishment for neglecting to return.

The call, "return" was unheeded. The prophet therefore now proceeds to announce the punishment. He does this in three sections: in the first (chap. iv.) he announces the approaching calamity; in the second (chap. v.) he shows particularly its causes in the moral corruption of the people; in the third (chap. vi. 1-26) he recapitulates the main thought of the discourse, adding to the repeated proof of the incorrigibility of the people, a repeated admonition and a threatening of still severer judgments.

Description of the expected judgment (CHAP. iv. 5-31).

1. This is described as future under a triple emblem (iv. 5-18).

a. The first emblem: the Lion.

IV. 5-10.

- 5 Declare it in Judah and publish it in Jerusalem,
 And speak—and blow the trumpet in the land,
 Cry with a loud voice and say:
 Assemble yourselves, that we may go into the fortified cities.
- 6 Raise banners towards Zion,
 Flee! stand not!
 For I am bringing calamity from the North,
 And great destruction.
- 7 A lion cometh up from his thicket,¹
 And a destroyer of nations hath broken up.
 He is come forth from his place
 To make thy land a desert:
 Thy cities shall be desolate,²—without inhabitant.
- 8 For this gird on sackcloth, lament and howl!
 For the heat of Jehovah's anger hath not turned from us.
- 9 And it shall come to pass in that day, saith Jehovah,
 The heart of the king shall fail and the heart of the princes,
 The priests shall be amazed and the prophets full of horror.
- 10 And I said: Ah Lord Jehovah,
 Surely thou hast prepared³ deception for this people and Jerusalem, Saying: "ye shall have peace,"
 And yet the sword reacheth even to the soul.⁴

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 7.—כִּבְרוּ with Dag. forte, to emphasize the sharpening from כִּבֵּן (Ewald, § 255, d.) or כִּבֵּן (Olshausen, § 155, b.) The word is ἀπαξ λεγ. Comp. the related forms from כִּבֵּן Isai. ix. 17; x. 34; Gen. xxii. 13; Ps. lxxiv. 5.

² Ver. 7.—הָעָרִים is certainly Kal from הָעָרִים, which must here be taken in an intransitive sense. Comp. ix. 11; Isai. xxxvii. 26; 2 Kings xix. 25.

³ Ver. 10.—הַשֵּׁן with לְ as in xxix. 8; 2 Kings xviii. 29.

⁴ Ver. 10.—[Or even to the life, as Henderson, etc.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 5. Declare it in Judah . . . fortified cities. The prophet speaks, and indeed as the mouth of God. This is seen from the כִּבֵּן, "I," ver. 6. The persons addressed are primarily those who dwell on the border, who are to inform those in the interior, even as far as the capital, of the invasion of the enemy. That which is declared is not the command to blow the trumpet, and to cry "assemble," etc. For why should not those first addressed themselves at once cry to their next neighbors, "assemble," etc.? Accordingly all that comes after the general sentence, "declare—Jerusalem," is only introductory to "assemble." Thus it is evident that the Chethib עִבְרִית is not incorrect, and the Keri, which is followed by the ancient commentators and many MSS. is therefore unnecessary. "Assemble," etc., should have come after the first עִבְרִית. But the prophet (1) according to well-known linguistic usage adds an accompanying circumstance paratactically, (2) he distributes the command to cry into three parts, of which the two first refer to the form, the last to the contents.—On the construction comp. xiii. 18; 1 Sam. ii. 3; NÆGELSB. Gr. § 95, g. Anm.

Ver. 6. Raise banners towards Zion . . . great destruction. The signal is to be so arranged that it will indicate to the inhabitants the direction of flight. עִבְרִית only in the Hiphil = to fly to (Exod. ix. 19), and to make flight, i. e. to flee (thus only besides here in vi. 1; Isa. x. 31).—From the north points back to i. 13, 14. Compare the remarks there made.

Ver. 7. A lion cometh up . . . without inhabitants. The enemy is here represented by the emblem of a lion as in xlix. 19; l. 4, 17.—Without inhabitant. Comp. ii. 15, and the remarks thereon.

Ver. 8. For this gird on . . . turned from us. This last sentence points back to ii. 35. The people had expected a return of God to graciousness on the ground of their hypocritical return under Josiah.

Ver. 9. And it shall come to pass . . . full of horror. After the prophet in ver. 8 has summoned them to general lamentation, he describes the effect of the calamity on those who are called by their position to provide means and ways of defence; they are helpless, and lose their presence of mind. כָּל in the sense of understanding, ex. gr. Prov. xxviii. 26; xv. 32; Hos. iv. 11; vii. 11; Jer. v. 21. Comp. DELITZSCH, Psychol. IV., § 12.—Shall be amazed. Comp. Ezek. iv. 17; Job xvii. 9; xviii. 20.

Ver. 10. And I said . . . even to the soul. The prophet here declares what impression was made by the denunciatory prophecy upon himself, after he had previously in ver. 9 described the impression which its fulfilment will make on the chiefs of the people. This denunciatory prophecy does not at all harmonize with that earlier and exceedingly glorious one in ch. iii. 12-25. This was correctly perceived by JEROME, who says: "Quia supra dixerat: in illo tempore vocabunt Jerusalem solium Dei, etc. (iii. 17), et nunc dicit: peribit cor regis (ver. 9), turbatur propheta et in se Deum putat esse mentitum; nec intelligit, illud multa post tempora repromissum, hoc autem vicino futurum tempore."—Following the example of THEODORET very many commentators refer prepared deception to the false prophets, coll. 1 Kings xxii. 22. But is it conceivable that a true prophet like Jeremiah would have traced back false prophecy so directly to the Lord? Comparison with 1 Pet. i. 11 renders it conceivable that Jeremiah may himself have been deceived as to the difference of the times.

b. The Second Emblem: the Tempest.

IV. 11-13.

- 11 About this time it will be said to this people and Jerusalem,
A hot wind of the bare heights in the deserts
Comes thence against the daughters of my people—
Not to winnow and not to cleanse.
- 12 With full cheeks comes a wind to me from those.
Now will I also contend with them.
- 13 Behold, as clouds he ascends;
And as the stormwinds his chariots,
Swifter than eagles are his horses.
Woe to us, for we are destroyed!

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 11. About this time . . . not to cleanse. As the invasion of the lion-like enemy, so also the approach of the destructive desert-wind is to be announced in Jerusalem. The prophet alludes to the custom of signaling those who are threatened by a hurricane or flood. עִבְרִית (Acc. loci. xxxix. 4) seems also to point to this. כָּל (besides here also in Isa. xviii. 4; xxxii. 4; Song of Sol. v. 10) if we compare the words radically related to it (חַהֵב Isa. v. 13; חַהֵב Ps. lxxviii. 7; חַהֵב Neh. iv. 7; חַהֵב Isa. lviii. 11), appears to unite the meanings calidus, candidus, aridus, and to designate the brilliant clearness of the air heated by the hot-wind. So also JEROME (ventus urens), AQUILA (ventus fulgoris), SYMMACHUS (v. aestus). On the position of חַהֵב between the nomen regens and rectum, comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 63, 4 f.—Bare heights. Comp. iii. 2, 21. The bare rocky mountains of the eastern desert are meant, over which the dry, hot east wind blows (צִפְרִי the "wind of the wilderness." Jer. xiii. 24). Comp. Winer, R-B-W., s. v. Winde. The expression is found also in xii. 12.—Not to winnow, etc. It is not one of the winds, which is favorable to human industry, but a hostile, destructive wind.

Ver. 12. With full cheeks . . . contend with them. מִלֵּב here is fundamentally the same as in ver. 5 and xii. 6. The idea of "full" we are accustomed to apply to wind only as expressed in the translation. As hot wind denotes the quality so full denotes the quantity—from those refers to bare heights. The Lord says, the wind comes to me, because it is in His service. לִי is Dat. commodi.—I also refers to ii. 5, 29. The prophet of Israel according to these passages really contended with the Lord. Comp. the remarks on ii. 29. The sense is this: after they have presumed to contend with the Lord (or, to use His pretended fault as a pretext of revolt, comp. xlv. 18), He contends with them, i. e. He punishes them, and His instrument is he, who is understood by the wind. Comp. i. 16.

Ver. 13. Behold as clouds . . . we are destroyed. The prophet still retains his emblem in the region of the air, but he modifies it. The total impression of the hostile masses is now compared with threatening storm-clouds, the chariots in the rapidity of their motion and power of their impetus are like the storm-blast, the riders are like swift eagles. The prophet seems to have had IIab. i. 8 generally in mind. Comp. KUEPER, S. 76.

c. The Third Emblem: the Keepers.

IV. 14-18.

- 14 Wash thy heart from wickedness, Jerusalem,
In order that thou mayest be delivered.
How long do thy sinful thoughts tarry within thee?
15 For a loud call sounds from Dan,
A message of misfortune from Mount Ephraim.
16 Announce it to the nations!
Behold, call it out over Jerusalem:
Watchmen [Besiegers] are coming from a distant land,
They raised their cry over the cities of Judah.
17 For like keepers of a field are they over her from all sides,
For against me hath she rebelled, saith Jehovah.
18 Thy walk and thy works bring this upon thee;
This is thy wickedness, that a bitter thing (comes upon thee),
That it reaches even to thine heart.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The first emblem was from the animal kingdom, the second from the region of the air, the third is taken from the sphere of human life. The third appeals most strongly to the moral consciousness of the people; this calamity is held up before them as the punishment of their sin, and acknowledgment and renunciation of this as the only means of escape.

Ver. 14. Wash thy heart . . . tarry within thee?—Wash [Cleansc]. Comp. ii. 22.—Comp. the beginning and end of the strophe: the idea of wickedness forms the frame-work.

It is quite unnecessary to take מִלֵּב, with VATABLE and others, as causative. Comp. NAEGLSEN. Gr. § 105, 4 b. מִלֵּב from מֵלֵב in the sense of sin, while מֵלֵב, ver. 15, means calamity. Comp. Gen. xxxv. 18; Deut. xxvi. 14; Ps. lv. 4.

Ver. 15. For a loud call . . . Ephraim. It is high time to comply with the admonition contained in ver. 14 (comp. "how long," etc.). for the news is already received of the approach of the avenger. The prophet's mention of Dan and Mount Ephraim is a confirmation of the view expressed concerning from the north in i. 14. Comp. the remarks there made.

Vers. 16 and 17. Announce it to the nations . . . saith Jehovah. מְבַרְרִים verbally: cause מְבַרְרִים to the nations, that is, cause that these reflecting upon it are deeply impressed by the significance of the fact. From the meaning, to penetrate, to bore in (comp. FURST, Handb.), is developed the meaning of to remember, which is the common one, to consider, to reflect (Lam. i. 9; Ps. ciii. 14; Job vii. 7). This call to the nations is made only incidentally, not with a friendly purpose, but only to denote the greatness and importance of the event. The invasion of this enemy is something so great that it cannot be cried out loud enough, and this the rather since the nations round about Israel are implicated with them. Comp. ch. xxv.—It is therefore unnecessary to follow HIRTZIG as he follows the LXX. ΚΙΜΧΙ and others, in taking לָ = from or E. MEIER and others in rendering גוֹיִם = tribes (of Israel).—The business of watchmen, keepers of a field, is usually to protect from robbery and violence. But the prophet has such keepers in mind who do not remove their gaze from him to whom it is directed, as, ex. gr., those who beset a fox, a weasel or a polecat, so that the animal may either perish in his hole or be killed when he comes out. In short the prophet here means the same thing as he expressed in i. 15 by setting seats before the gates. Comp. 2 Sam. xi.

16, שָׁכֹר אֵל-הַעִיר; Jer. v. 6; vi. 25.—These raised their cry, etc. It is announced to Jerusalem, that the cry of these keepers has already sounded over the other cities of Judah. Jerusalem alone is still in the power of the enemy. Hence it is also said in ver. 17 that they are over her from all sides.—As in the beginning of the strophe, ver. 14, the exhortation to repentance as the only means of escape is prominent, so in ver. 17 b and ver. 18 is ungodliness as the self-inflicted cause of the punitive judgments.

Ver. 18. Thy walk and thy works . . . reaches even to thy heart. Comp. ii. 19.—Both this parallel passage and the parallelism in the verse itself prove that hemistich 2 is a subjective sentence (comp. NÄGELSB. Gr. § 109, 1). The two sentences with for represent the subject, this thy wickedness is the predicate. The bitter thing which comes upon thee is nothing more than thine own wickedness, here developing its own true nature.—The conclusion of the strophe reminds us of ver. 10, and in such a way as to show that the prophet intended a similarity in diversity.

2. The Prophet Hears and Sees the Enemy Present.

IV. 19-23.

- 19 My bowels, my bowels! Cramp¹ in the chambers² of the heart!
My heart palpitates! I cannot be silent,
For the trumpet's sound thou hearest,³ my soul,
The cry of battle.
- 20 Blow upon blow is reported,
For desolated is the whole land;
Suddenly my huts are desolated,
In a twinkling my tents.
- 21 How long shall I see the banner,
Hear the sound of the trumpet?
- 22 For my people are foolish, they know me not;
Silly children are they and undiscerning:
They are wise to do evil,
But doing good they understand not.
- 23 I look at the earth and behold—desolation and emptiness!
And up towards heaven, and its light is gone.
- 24 I look at the mountains and behold they quake,⁴
And all the hills are shaken.
- 25 I look and behold, man is gone,
And all the birds of heaven are fled.
- 26 I look and behold, the fertile field has become a waste,
And all its cities are desolated⁵—
Before Jehovah, before the fury of his anger.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 19.—אֲדוּלָהּ. The form of the Chethibh אֲדוּלָהּ is a grammatical anomaly and therefore certainly incorrect. The Keri reads אֲדוּלָהּ. This however would mean: I wait, expect (2 Sam. xviii. 14; Mic. vii. 7), which does not well suit the connection. The reading אֲדוּלָהּ or אֲדוּלָהּ which is expressed in the LXX, and is found in very many MSS. and editions (STEPH., JOS. ATHAS., Bibl. Mant.) should therefore be preferred. אֲדוּלָהּ (or אֲדוּלָהּ, comp. FEUERST, s. v.) is to twist one's self, to quiver with pain, grief or terror. Comp. v. 3; Ezek. xxx. 16.—As to the construction we may (a) divide after כִּיעֵי אֲדוּלָהּ, אֲדוּלָהּ, (c) כִּיעֵי אֲדוּלָהּ, אֲדוּלָהּ (so GRAF), or (b) after כִּיעֵי אֲדוּלָהּ, אֲדוּלָהּ (see HIRTZIG, E. MEIER), (c) כִּיעֵי אֲדוּלָהּ, אֲדוּלָהּ. I would give the preference to the last division, since חוֹל declared of קִירוֹת-לֵב (the expression here only) designates very appropriately the cramp of the heart, while לֵב הוֹקֵה evidently denotes the palpitation of the heart.

The cohortative form in אַחֲלֶהּ as in אֲשַׁמְעֶהָ, ver. 21, is not to be insisted on. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 89, 3 a.

1. שָׁבְעֵתַי, which is unnecessary. [Comp. GREEN'S Ileb. Gr. § 86, b.]

⁵ Ver. 26.—נִתְּצָה Niph. from נָתַן. Comp. Nah. i. 6. LXX.: ἐμπεπυρισμέναι, confounded with נִתְּצָה, ix. 9.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This entire strophe describes the desolation of the country from the standpoint of the present. The prophet places himself in spirit in that mournful future, and describes in the liveliest colors what he hears, sees and feels, as one who is present.

Ver. 19. My bowels . . . cry of battle. LXX.: τῆς κοιλίας μου ἀλγῶ. So also the authors of the Syro-Hexapla. ΗΙΤΖΙΑ has "my belly." The prophet in these and the following verses describes in a most drastic style the physical sensation which is produced by the immediate perception of the calamity.—Passages related in subject are Isa. xvi. 11; xxi. 2-4; Jer. xlviii. 36.—I cannot be silent (comp. IIab. i. 13; Job xli. 4) expresses that the prophet would relieve the inward pain, which he has just described, by speech. He does this by enumerating the occurrences which have so excited him.—The expression: hearest thou, my soul, seems to intimate that the prophet heard it not with the outward but the inward ear.

Ver. 20. Blow upon blow is reported . . . my tents. The exposition, which, following the Chaldee and Syriac, takes נִקְרָא for נִקְרָה (destruction meets destruction) is not correct, because the prophet in vers. 20 and 21 mentions what he hears, while in ver. 23 sqq. he relates what he sees. If, moreover, we consider that the prophet is here speaking of messages or signals, which report disasters, we see that the existence of a middle point is presupposed, to which these reports of misfortune proceed. We shall not then err, if we refer ver. 20 to the laying waste of the country surrounding the capital.

Ver. 21. How long shall I . . . trumpet. הַצֵּן the signal, ver. 6. Although this is seen it is mentioned among the things which the prophet hears because it also brings news, or a message.

Ver. 22. For my people are foolish . . . they understand not. This verse contains the answer to the question of the prophet, how long? Still long, is the answer of course, for the people are still as they were. So ΚΙΜΧΙ.—With Hemist. 2 comp. ii. 8; Mic. vii. 3.

Vers. 23-26. I look at the earth . . . fury of his anger. רָאִיתִי four times repeated shows plainly that the prophet would here render expressly prominent what he has seen, in antithesis to vers. 19 and 20, where he narrates what he has heard. But there is also a climax in the progress from the one to the other. While that which the prophet hears is only the herald and preliminary stage of the main catastrophe, in vers. 23-26 he portrays the condition of the country after the occurrence of this catastrophe. In spirit he beholds in the place of the once so fruitful land a dismal waste, over which the heavens veil themselves in mourning, and with which even lifeless and unintelligent creatures sympathize.—Ver. 23, reminds us of Gen. i. 2, 14, and therefore presupposes the existence of this passage. The land has, as it were, returned to chaos. Comp. Isa. xxxiv. 11.—The fruitful field a waste [lit., the Carmel the desert], a free reminiscence from Isa. xxxii. 15; xxix. 17. That Carmel here denotes not the mountain, but the fruitful field (comp. ii. 7), follows (a) from the connection, which declares the desolation not of a small strip, but of the whole country, (b) from all its cities, which evidently cannot be referred to that single mountain but only to the whole land. The article before Carmel and waste has a general significance, not a waste, but the waste had the fruitful field become, that is, the genus Carmel had passed over into the genus desert. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 71, 4.—Before, etc. Comp. xxiii. 9; xxv. 37.—On the general subject compare Joel ii. 10; iv. 15; Nah. i. 5; Isa. xiii. 10, 13; Ps. xviii. 8.

3. The Judgment is Irrevocably Determined, but it aims not at Absolute Destruction.

- 27 For thus hath Jehovah spoken:
The whole land shall be waste,
But I will not utterly make an end of it.
- 28 For this the whole land keeps lamenting,
And the heaven above wears the garment of mourning;
For this namely, that I have spoken and determined,¹
And I repent not, nor draw back from it.

- 29 Before the tumult of the horsemen and archers
The whole city is fled,
They are in their hiding-places, up on the rocks;
The whole city is abandoned, not an inhabitant therein.
- 30 But thou, destroyed one,² what art thou doing?
That thou clothest thyself in purple,
That thou puttest on cloth of gold,
That thou rendest thine eyes with paint?
In vain dost thou beautify thyself;
Thy lovers despise thee, they seek thy soul.
- 31 For I hear a cry like that of a parturient,³
The call of anguish, like one who bears for the first time:
The voice of the daughter of Zion,
Who panteth and spreadeth forth her hands:
Woe is me, for my soul succumbs⁴ to the murderers!

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 28.—E. MEIER reads 'נְפֹתַי instead of 'נְפֹתַי. But the Masoretic reading being the more difficult has the presumption of genuineness.

³ Ver. 31.—חוליה, Part. like בוסים in Zech. x. 5, קוים in 2 Ki. xvi. 7, etc. FUERST s. v. חוליה; EWALD, § 151, 6.

⁴ Ver. 31.—[HENDERSON: My soul fainteth because of murderers; NOYES, more freely: I am dying of murderers.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The theme of this strophe is contained in ver. 27. This has two parts: 1. The destruction is founded in an irrevocable divine decree. This is the main point which is expressed still more emphatically, vers. 28, 29, and in ver. 30, etc., placed in the light of a contrast (what can Israel's feeble attempts effect in opposition to the divine counsel?). 2. The second point, "but I will not utterly make an end," is briefly stated and not further discussed, but is for this purpose twice repeated in the course of the prophecy, v. 10, 18.

Ver. 27. For thus hath Jehovah spoken . . . make an end of it. The certainty of the statement in the previous strophe is found in the fact that Jehovah has thus spoken.—I will not utterly, etc., is, as we have said, a briefly stated parenthetical thought, which is only to give a correct limitation to the declaration of the first clause. Comp. Levit. xxvi. 44.

Ver. 28. For this the whole land keeps lamenting . . . draw back from it. Comp. Hos. iv. 3, whence the words האבול הא are taken.—This refers to the following I have spoken. The mourning posture of the earth and heavens mentioned in ver. 23 sqq. is here designated as the result of a divine decree. Not by chance, nor by the power of idols, did it take place, but by the power of the Lord. It should moreover be remarked that this strophe forms the transition to the following section, in which also the cause of the judgment is spoken of, but in another sense. While here only the immediate cause, the causa efficiens, of the calamity is mentioned, the prophet in what follows goes more deeply into the matter and designates the corruption of the people as the immediate, deepest provocative cause.—That is a repetition of for this. LXX., διότι ἐλάλησα καὶ οὐ μετανοήσω, ὄρησα καὶ οὐκ ἀποστρέψω ἀπ' αὐτῆς. We must first take spoken independently. Then the external announcement which is made to men through the prophet, is set over against the inner cause, which has a positive (determined) and a negative side (repent not). The last point is designated also by nor draw back from it, in order that the prophet may connect this declaration of God with the same made by Israel (iii. 7 sqq.; iv. 1).

Ver. 29. Before the tumult . . . not an inhabitant therein. This verse seems to interrupt the connection. Yet it may be justified as a brief and condensed description of the calamity which has been described at length in the previous strophes, and only hinted at in ver. 28. We might regard it as the explanation of from it, with which ver. 28 closes. On the neutral rendering of this Vide NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, 6 b.—It is not necessary to render (with GRAF and others) כָּל-הָעִיר = every city. It is, as the rule requires, the whole city. But the prophet understands the whole city, supposing this to be the general fate of all the cities. This collective rendering explains also therein in the plural.—עַבְיִם are obscure hiding-places. עַבְיִם comp. Job xxx. 6.

Ver. 30. But thou, destroyed one . . . seek thy soul. שָׂרַד (comp. נָטַי רַגְלִי, Ps. lxxiii. 2, inclinatum aliquid pedes mei) is to be rendered as neuter: Thou, as good as destroyed, a thing devoted to destruction. The expression is contemptuous. Vide NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, 4. [GREEN'S Gr., § 275, 5].—It can neither mean: if thou art destroyed, for then Israel can no more paint; nor: if thou shalt be attacked, for the word does not mean to attack. (Comp. שָׂרַדְתָּ, Ps. cxxxvii. 8). The prophet has in view the present attempts of Israel to procure assistance by coquetting with foreign nations (comp. ii. 18, 36, 37), which are foolish in opposition to the decree of Jehovah, solemnly announced in ver. 28, according to which Israel is already destroyed.—Thine eyes with paint. The effect of paint is to make the eyes look not only more fiery, but larger. Comp. HERZOG'S Real-Enc., Art. Schmink. XIII. S. 607 [SMITH, Dict. II. 657].—2 Kings ix. 30; Ezek. xxiii. 40.

Ver. 31. For I hear a cry . . . my soul succumbs to the murderers.—For refers to seek thy soul. On this account Israel cries: Wo is me, I succumb to the murderers. 31 b.—

(ל' כִּי) constr. prægnaus; my soul is weary, i. e. as one who succumbs to murderers. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 112, 7. [GREEN, 156, 1].

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 10. It is not here a matter for consideration, how God may be said to deceive men (comp. 1 Kings xxii. 20; Job xii. 24; 2 Thess. ii. 11), for it was only the opinion of the prophet, who here interrupts the discourse revealed to him by the expression of a subjective view, just as Paul in 1 Cor. vii. 10, 12, 25, 40, inserts his view of the λύγος κριγίου.

2. On ver. 14. ARISTOTLE (De partibus animal. II. 4) and PLINY (Hist. nat. XI. 37) remark that the heart alone of all the internal organs will not bear any injury. The latter says "solum cor viscerum vitæ non maceratur, nec supplicia vitæ trahit; lesurumque mortem illico affert." The heart also in a spiritual sense will not bear the least injury, as the fall shows. Yet though every sin is a death-germ, a poison, yet all poison is not equally rapid in its effects. BERNHARD of Clairvaux says in his Sermo de triplici genere cogitationum nostrarum (sub fin.) as follows: "Et primum quidem cogitationum otiosarum scil. ad rem non pertinentium lutum est, sed lutum simplex, id est non inherens, nec fœtens, nisi forte diutius immoretur in nobis, et per incuriam ac negligentiam nostram in alterum genus cogitationum vertatur, quod quotidie experimur. Dum enim otiosa tanquam minima spernimus, ad turpia atque inhonesta dilabimur. Secundum vero cogitationum genus non lutum simplex, sed viscosum ac limosum est. Nam tertium quidem sic cavendum est, non tanquam lutum aut limus, sed tanquam immundissimum ac fœtidissimum cœrum." He explains what he understands by this tertium genus in the words: "Dico autem cogitationes illas immundas penitus et fœtidus, quæ ad luxuriam, ad invidiam et vanam gloriam pertinent, cœteraque vitia detestanda."—He further says of the conflicts with sinful thoughts: "Quid ergo agendum, cum limosa cogitatio mentem subierit? Plane exclamandum nobis est eum sancto Jacobo: Ruben, primogenito meus, non creceas, ascendisti enim eubile patris tui (Gen. xlix. 3). Ruben enim carnalis atque sanguinea hujus modi concupiscentia est, quæ tunc eubile nostrum ascendit, eum non solum memoriam tangit cogitatione, sed et ipsum voluntatis stratum ingreditur et polluit prava cogitatione." GUISLER.

3. On ver. 22. (They are wise to do evil, but do not understand well-doing.) The Israelites are here designated as children of the world, for it is the manner of the world to be wise in worldly matters, but foolish in spiritual, as our Lord says (Luke xvi. 8) the children of this world are wiser in their own generation than the children of light in theirs, and Paul (1 Cor. ii. 14) says the natural man perceiveth nothing of the Spirit of God, for it is foolishness to him, and he cannot know it, for it must be spiritually discerned.—The blind man understands nothing about color. Every one is at home in his own element. But this is the greatest misery that the world knows, that man, the image of God, is not at home in His house, but in the Devil's, and that the greatest labor the world knows, scarcely suffices to bring him back into his Father's house.

4. On ver. 27. How wonderfully do the anger and love of God here touch! How proportionate appear both! How is one the limit of the other! God does not so love that He cannot be angry; and He is not so angry that He cannot love. He leaves room for His anger in order that justice may be preserved and the sinner reformed. Thus His anger is also guided by love, yea, in a certain sense it is a manifestation of love. Comp. SCHÖBERLEIN, Grundlehren des Heils, S. 50, 51. "Anger is the energy of love towards the sinner, the expression, namely, of its pain, that he himself has become untrue to his better self, and he who cannot be angry has no hearty love for this true I of another. . . . For the very reason that God in holy self-preservation places Himself in opposition to him, man is not really forsaken of God, but love is still with him in the might of its anger." Jer. x. 24; xxx. 11; xlvii. 28; Isai. xxvii. 8.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. The first eight verses of this chapter are part of the text of the fifth homily of ORIGEN (the whole text is Jer. iii. 21—iv. 8).

2. FÖRSTER remarks: "ex versu 31 haberi potest concio in funere mulieris, quæ in partu, vel post partum obiit."

3. True repentance is 1. a true return from evil (not a sowing among remaining thorns, not a merely external circumcision, but a circumcision of the heart and removal of abominations); 2. a true return to God (right and holy swearing, as a symptom of right and holy disposition); 3. a source of blessing for ourselves and others (thou shalt not be exiled—the heathen shall be blessed in thee).

4. On ver. 10. Warning against false peace. This is 1. a lie, for men say there is peace when the sword reaches even to the soul; 2. a misfortune, for it will disappoint the heart of those who cherish it.

5. On ver. 22. Since Scripture distinguishes a wisdom that is from above from a wisdom that is from below (James iii. 13-18), the question arises, wherein consists the difference between the two? 1. The wisdom from below is a wisdom in evil doing (a. unbelief, b. destruction, a. of self, β. of others—consequently absolute folly); Wisdom from above is wisdom in well-doing (a. faith, b. observing God's word in love—consequently blessing).

II. Demonstration of the justice of the judgments by the enumeration of their causes.

(CHAP. V. 1-31.)

The prophet enumerates these by first denouncing the universal corruption, especially in reference to the want of אֱמוּנָה. Vers. 1-6 he shows that truth and faith have entirely disappeared from public life; vers. 7-9 that אֱמוּנָה is wanting in conjugal relations; vers. 10-18 that none of this is any longer found in the sense of faith in God; vers. 19-24 he describes the idolatry resulting from unbelief; vers. 25-29 the deception and rude violence connected therewith; vers. 30, 31 finally he comprises all in a brief survey, in which the main points of this sad condition are set forth. The section contains six strophes of unequal length.

1. Universal want of truth and faith in public life.

V. 1-6.

- 1 Run through the lanes of Jerusalem and see,
And ascertain and search in her streets,
Whether ye find one, whether there be one,
Who doeth right and asketh after truth—
And I will pardon her.
- 2 And though they say "As Jehovah liveth," Even thus they swear falsely.
- 3 Jehovah, thine eyes, look they not for fidelity?
Thou hast smitten them, but it pained them not.
Thou destroyedst them,—they refused to receive correction;
They made their faces harder than a rock,
They refused to return.
- 4 And I said: These are only the poor!
They are stultified!¹
For they know not the way of Jehovah,
The judgment of their God.
- 5 I will go² to the great and speak with them,
For they know the way of Jehovah,
The judgment of their God.
Yet they have broken the yoke among them,
They have torn asunder the cords.
- 6 Therefore the lion from the forest slayeth them,
The wolf of the deserts³ rendeth them,⁴
The leopard lurks by their cities;
Every one who goes out is torn in pieces;
For many are their misdeeds, great their apostasies.⁵

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—נִאֲלָה from אָוֵל used only in Niphal. Num. xii. 11; Isai. xix. 13; 1. 36. The meaning is to become אֵוִיל fools, to be stultified, to act foolishly.

² Ver. 5.—אֶלְכָה לִי. Comp. NAEGELER. Gr. §112, 5 b.

⁴ Ver. 6.—יִשְׂרָם לְיִשְׂרָם (Prov. xi. 3, Keri). Comp. EWALD, §251, c.; OLSHAUSEN, §243, a. [GREEN, Gr. §141, 1.]

⁵ Ver. 6.—[BLATNEY, NOTES, HENDERSON render: their apostasies (rebellions) are increased.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Run through the lanes . . . I will pardon her. This verse contains the theme not merely of this strophe, but in a certain degree of the whole chapter. For the statements here of the universality of the corruption apply not only to the moral deficiency which is denounced in this strophe, but to all the sins of the people afterward enumerated. And in the second place the lack of honesty is the root of all the rest.—

Run through, comp. Am. viii. 12; Zech. iv. 10.—her streets, comp. Gen. xviii. 23 sqq.—right—truth. Since the prophet uses these two words in conjunction with each other, since in ver. 2 the unreluctance of the oath sworn in Jerusalem forms the contrast to the truth demanded, since further this moral deficiency is first designated as the most striking, manifesting itself in all the lanes and streets of the city, this being followed in the ensuing strophes by the more special sins against truth, we must understand the former word of “right, justice” (comp. Gen. xviii. 19; Exod. xxiii. 6; Job viii. 3) as the basis of all trade and intercourse, the guarantee of all security of life and property, but the latter as “truth and faith,” without which no public life can exist. The asker after truth cannot be he, who seeks it in others, for why should he in such a deficiency? but one who seeks it for its own sake, that he may have it and practise it himself.

Ver. 2. And though they say . . . swear falsely. There may have been many different kinds of swearing in use (comp. Matth. v. 34 sqq.). The formula “ Π ” was at any rate regarded as the most sacred and binding. But even the oath thus made was broken.— ןל . The passages which are adduced for the meaning “nevertheless, yet” (Isai. vii. 14; x. 24; xxvii. 9) are uncertain. We must therefore retain the original meaning (in reference to such a condition, this being the case)=even thus. The expression of identity;—an oath by Jehovah and a false oath are with them the same thing.

Ver. 3. Jehovah, thine eyes . . . refused to return. The explanation of חזרה (are not thine eyes true, reliable, do they not see correctly? Ps. xvii. 2) does not suit the connection. What ground would the prophet have for opposing such a supposition, as that the Lord had erred? It is evidently declared that the Lord seeks truth, in contrast with the declaration in ver. 1 that among the Israelites none asks after truth. After in ver. 2 he had shown by a striking example, to what a degree truth and faith were lacking in this people, he shows in ver. 3 how contrary this was to the will of the Lord. For (a) the Lord seeks אמת (as to the sense comp. Ps. liii. 3; as to the construction the ל here is used after a verb of motion to be supplied, as it frequently is, after such actual verbs, instead of אל , where the idea not of

Ver. 4. And I said: these are only the poor . . . the judgment of their God. The prophet interrupts his address to the people by communicating an objection which he himself made to the Lord. It is thus presupposed that the prophet was not at the moment of speaking first made acquainted with the judgment of the Lord concerning the moral condition of the people, as contained in vers. 1-3, but that he was previously aware of the divine purpose, so that he had time to go and make investigations among the higher circles of the people, the result of which he presents in ver. 5. These are only the poor; poor is the subject, these is the predicate: it is only the poor to which the previous description applies.

Ver. 5. I will go to the great . . . torn asunder the cords.—With them. Comp. i. 16; ii. 35; iv. 12.—Yet they. The particle אך stands here also in a restrictive sense. It is as though the prophet would say: I also really went; only the success did not meet my expectation, they had, etc. Comp. Dent. xviii. 20; 1 Sam. xxix. 9.—The great were the worst. They had burst all bands asunder. Comp. ii. 20.

Ver. 6. Therefore the lion . . . great their apostasies. The prophetic perfect—the prophet beholds the future as though it were past. Comp. NAEGELSEN. Gr. § 84, g.—The wolf of the deserts. There are two explanations of this. 1. The Chald., Vulg., Syr., after Hab. i. 8; Zeph. iii. 3 render the evening-wolf (coll. Ps. civ. 20). To this is opposed (a) the parallelism with from the forest, (b) the plural; since this never occurs elsewhere as the plural of ערב , nor is it at all here in place. Therefore most commentators take (2) ערבות as the plural of ערבה , the steppe, desert: the desert-wolf.—For many, comp. xxx. 13, 11.—On the subject-matter comp. Exod. xxvi. 22.

2. Their infidelity in marriage, in marriage with Jehovah as in human marriages.

V. 7-9.

7 What reason¹ have I to pardon² thee?
 Thy children leave me and swear by that which is no God.
 And I bound them in allegiance,³
 But they committed adultery
 And rushed⁴ into the harlot's house.

- 8 Fat stallions,⁵ dissolute are they;
 Every one neighs after his neighbour's wife.
 9 Should I not punish such as these? saith Jehovah;
 Or should not my soul avenge itself on a people like this?

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 7.—לֹחֶת לִּי can only mean grammatically: in reference to what? why? [GREEN, Gr., § 75, 2.]—לִּפְנֵי comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 17, 3; § 53, 1; EWALD, § 326, a. OLSHAUSEN, 222, e. [GREEN, § 231, 4, a].

² Ver. 7.—אֶסְלַח־לָהֶם (for which the Keri has אֶסְלַח־לָהֶם as in ver. 1) certainly did not, as HITZIG supposes, arise from לְסַלַּח, but the ancient form (ROSENEM.) is retained as being the more solemn (NEUMANN). Comp. OLSH. § 238, a. Ann. [GREEN, Gr., § 125, 1].

³ Ver. 7.—וְהִשְׁבִּיעוּ אֹתָם. Many Codices and Editions, as given by DE ROSSI, read וְהִשְׁבִּיעוּ. By far the majority of the translators and commentators follow this reading: LXX., Vulg., Chald., Syr., Arab., JEROME, THEODORET, RASCHI, KIMCHI, LUTHER, CALVIN, BUGENHAGEN, OECOLAMP., FÜRSTER, SEE, SCHMIDT, MUENSTER, GROTIUS, VENEMA, the English Bible, J. D. MICHAELIS, ROSENMUELLER, EWALD, UMBRETT, MEIER. The former reading is adopted, after the example of some of the Rabbins, only by ZWINGLI, CH. B. MICHAELIS, GAAB (=earnest petition, adjuvare), HITZIG (divine assistance in human marriage) MAURER, NEUMANN (and I made them swear; namely, falsely—a judgment of obduracy. Jer. vi. 9), GRAF. [BLATNEY, NOTES and HENDERSON follows the former. HENDERSON: though I supplied them abundantly.—S. R. A.]

⁵ Ver. 8.—כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם, Keri כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם; the former Hoph. from כָּן, the latter Pual from כָּן. Neither of these roots occurs in Hebrew. The form of the Keri can be brought only by a wide and circuitous process to afford a tolerable meaning: כָּן is regarded as the primitive root of כָּנָן (to weigh, hence כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם); the Part. Pual would then=weighed—it is however taken as=provided with ponderibus (strong genitals), probe vasati.—It is simpler to retain the Chethibh. כָּן from which כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם, cibus, alimentum (Gen. xiv. 23; 1 Chron. xi. 23) has also in the dialects the sense of nourish (comp. Dan. iv. 9), כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם are therefore well-nourished, fat horses. The word is perhaps chosen in allusion to כָּנָן. כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם has been variously explained (= כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם by the Rabbins; כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם, trahentes, i. e., genitalia, emissarii, by Jerome, the Chald., etc.: Ewald reads כִּבְשֵׁימַיִם which according to the Arabic is said to denote “lewd,” etc.). The simplest derivation is that from כָּנָן which indeed does not occur in Hebrew, but yet seems assured by the dialects and by כָּנָן in the sense “to err, to rove” (ii. 23). So most of the recent commentators.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

1. What reason . . . into the harlot's house. This strophe is an exact parallel to the preceding. As the beginning of the first strophe (ver. 1) presupposes a request for forgiveness, so does ver. 7. There it was: when you find one, who asks after truth, I will pardon. Here it is: How can I pardon? Thy children have forsaken me. There the chief reason for not pardoning was the lack of truth in public life. Here, indeed, the word אֶסְלַח־לָהֶם is not mentioned, but the substance is the same, only in a different, more restricted sphere. The breach of conjugal fidelity, first in a theocratic and then in a human sense, is also a proof of the lack of fidelity. As finally ver. 6 ends with a threatening of punishment, so does ver. 7. The three, 7-9, thus form a whole, complete in themselves, a tableau after the usual type of the strophes of this prophet.—and swore, etc., corresponds exactly to ver. 2. There their breach of fidelity was rebuked, because they swore falsely by Jehovah,—here, because they swore by those who were no gods (comp. ii. 11; Deut. xxxii. 17, 21).—And I bound them, etc. I believe that the difficulty in this sentence is solved if we transpose the paratactic mode of speech into the syntactic: and although I had allowed them to swear (had bound them by oath and allegiance) yet they committed adultery. The form of the word does not contradict this view, as GRAF supposes. We must not, however, think that this allowing to swear refers to the restoration of the Jehovah-cultus, effected by Josiah's reformation. For although that reformation, begun in the 12th year of Josiah, and ended in the 18th (2 Chron. xxxiv. 3, 8), as frequently remarked, did not result in an honest return, yet it is not to be supposed that Jeremiah, during the period to which this discourse certainly belongs, had to complain of public idolatry. In saying “thy children have forsaken me and sworn by no gods” the prophet has in view not the events of that period, but of the whole past history of the people. In the course of this history, from the Exodus onward, it often enough happened that the people fell into idolatry, and were received again by the Lord into covenant with Him. Comp. e. g., the repeated apostasies in the wilderness (Exod. xxxii.; Numb. xxv.), and the renewal of the covenant in Arboth Moab (Deut. xxix. 1); further, the continuance of the idolatrous cult, even after the capture of the Holy Land, and the repetition of the covenant under Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 13, sqq). With reference to this and other facts of the past (e. g., 1 Sam. vii.; 1 Kings xviii.): Jeremiah may well say: “thy children forsook me . . . and I let them swear, and they committed adultery,” etc., which according to our syntactic mode of expression is equivalent to: “although after their apostasy, to guard against another, I bound them by oath and allegiance, yet still again they committed adultery.” Comp. on this paratactic mode of expression the remarks on iii. 8 and NAEGELSBACH Gr. § 111, 1, Ann. This explanation combines these advantages, that (a) it is supported by the more difficult and critically, more secure reading,—(b) it agrees with the grammar, and (c) with the connection. For in the latter respect it is clear that the prophet very suitably

² Ver. 13.—[“This sentence is left out in the LXX. the Syriac and the Arabic, but retained by the Vulg.: Hæc ergo evenient illis—These things shall therefore come to them. This meaning the original will hardly bear. The reference seems to be to the prophet’s becoming wind, being so proved by the event.” Note by Eng. Ed. of CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

That these verses form a strophe is seen not from the unity of the contents, but also from the concordance of the commencement and the close. The whole strophe is only a picture in detail of the brief sketch in ver. 10a, “destroy, but not utterly.”—It is further evident that the fundamental thought of the strophe depends on ver. 1; that the people are wanting in הַיְהוָה is clear from the fact that they deny Jehovah, and consequently do not believe the word of His prophets.

Ver. 10. Scale her walls . . . for they are not Jehovah’s. The image of a vine in an un-walled vineyard suggests the expression.—The phrase for they are not Jehovah’s involves the idea of depravation. Comp. ii. 21.

Ver. 11. For they have been faithless toward me . . . saith Jehovah. The threatening of punishment repeated in a new form follows the fundamental declaration “Israel has been faithless towards the Lord.” The prophet says this of both kingdoms, though the kingdom of Israel was no longer in existence. We see that he still has always in view the entire past history of the people. Comp. the remarks on וְאִשְׁכֵּי at ver. 7.—Faithless (comp. iii. 7 sqq.) is evidently in antithesis to truth, vers. 1 and 3. It is a word of general signification, and would not in itself afford a new, specific element. It is therefore more particularly defined in what follows.

Ver. 12. They have denied Jehovah . . . shall we behold. It is here declared that they injured the truth in such a manner by their faithlessness, that they virtually denied the existence of Jehovah.—have denied, Josh. xxiv. 27; Isai. lix. 13. Comp. Prov. xxx. 9. The sense of this is explained unmistakably by He is not. If Jehovah is not, there is no possibility of a judgment to be effected by Him.

Ver. 13. And the prophets . . . so will it happen to them. It is the necessary consequence of Jehovah’s non-existence that the word prophesied in His name is regarded as nothing, or as wind. When it is said, the prophets are become wind, the reference is of course not to their persons, but only to their prophetic ministry: qua prophets they will prove to be mere wind-bags. הַרְבֵּי might certainly be rendered as a finite verb (comp. Hos. i. 2) and the article with the signification of Nota relationis (Gen. xxi. 3; Isai. lvi. 3; Josh. x. 24; 1 Chron. xxvi. 28; xxix. 17; EWALD, § 331 b; NÆGELSB. Gr., § 71, 5, Ann. 3). [GREEN’S Gr. § 245, 5 b.] The sense would then be: he who speaks is not in them, that is, what they say, they say entirely of themselves. But הַרְבֵּי might also be a nominal form (ad f. הַרְבֵּי) although this does not occur elsewhere. (Vid. FURST, s: v.) The meaning would then be: the speaker, the prophetic spirit. The LXX.: λόγος κενός. Both are grammatically possible, the sense in both cases being the same.—So will it happen to them. As they threaten us, so may it happen to themselves; let their empty threatening fall back upon themselves.

Ver. 14. Therefore thus saith Jehovah . . . and it shall devour them. Provoked by the bold declaration of unbelief in the word of the prophet, vers. 12, 13, the Lord here puts in the mouth of His prophet an emphatic repetition of the denunciatory prophecy, which from i. 13 onwards forms the focus of his prophetic announcement for the proximate future. Because Israel will not believe the word of the prophet, this word is to be equipped with the highest energy of a real active force. Comp. i. 9, 10.—The sudden change of person in in thy mouth should not offend. Comp. ver. 19, and NÆGELSB. Gr., § 101, 2 Ann.

Vers. 15-17. Behold I bring upon you . . . with the sword. This passage has its root in Deut. xxviii. 49 sqq. Comp. Isai. v. 26; Hab. i. 6; Am. vi. 14; Vid. KUEPER., S. 12, etc.—from afar. Comp. iv. 16.—House of Israel is here used as a common name, ii. 26; iii. 20, 21, 23; iv. 1, etc.—The prophet heaps all the predicates on the people appointed to inflict the punishment which might cause them to appear terrible in the highest degree to the Israelites; they are coming from a distance, all sympathetic disposition to spare is therefore distant from their hearts; they are an ancient people (יְהוּדָה of streams = unconquerable, ever-flowing, Deut. xxi. 4; Ps. lxxiv. 15,—of rocks, mountains, mountain-fastnesses = firmly founded, immovable, Numb. xxiv. 21; Mic. vi. 2; Jer. xlix. 19—designates firmly-rooted, impregnable power;—גִּבּוֹרֵי עוֹלָם designates ancient nobility and the hard-hearted and ruthless pride called forth by it); further, they speak a foreign, unintelligible language (from Deut. xxviii. 49): their quiver is on account of its form compared with an open grave—that the quiver has not a receptive but an aggressive relation may have been overlooked by the poet.—All the necessities of life will be devoured by the enemy (the devouring of the children seems to be based on a reminiscence of Deut. xxviii. 53, where, however, it is said, that the Israelites will devour the flesh of their own children. Comp. KUEPER, S. 12, 13;—moreover the prophet may have taken בְּצִלְעֵי in the more general sense, (comp. x. 25);—the fortified cities, in which Israel trusted (Deut. xxviii. 52) shall be destroyed (Mal. i. 4) with the power of the sword (sword as in the phrase “fire and sword” being employed for warlike implements generally, comp. Lev. xxvi. 6).—What people it is which is called to accomplish this, the prophet is not yet aware. Comp. the remarks above on i. 13 sqq. If he had known the name of the people, why should he not have mentioned it? To think of the Scythians because they once made an incursion through Palestine, and because there is a Scythopolis in the valley of the Jordan (comp. HEZCOC, Real-Enc. XIV. S. 170), is absurd. We can at most suppose that the prophet borrowed from the Scythian invasion some tints for the coloring of his picture. Moreover the whole description applies also to the Babylonians. These especially, according to Gen. x. and xi., might be regarded as an ancient people, even if we assume from Isai. xxiii. 13 that the Chaldeans were a younger branch grafted into the old stock. [HENDERSON:—"The antiquity ascribed to the invaders has special respect to the Chaldeans, a nation originally inhabiting the Carduchian mountains and the northern parts of Mesopotamia, but who had immigrated into the Babylonian territory, where they had a settlement allotted them; and being, like all mountaineers, distinguished for their bravery, doubtless composed the most formidable part of the invading army. See my comment on Isai. xxiii. 13. From its being affirmed that the Jews would not understand the language of this people, it follows that after they left their original abodes, they must have retained their native tongue, which was in all probability the mother of the present Kurdish,—a language totally different from any of Semitic origin, but showing much affinity with the ancient Persian."—S. R. A.]

Ver. 18. But even in those days . . . an utter end of you. Comp. iv. 27 and ver. 10, and the remarks on the latter passage.—Make an end is decidedly connected with the accusative, Nah. i. 8; Neh. ix. 31;—with עַל Jer. xxx. 11; xlv. 28—decidedly with אִתָּם—"with" in this passage;—when it occurs elsewhere: Jer. xxx. 11; xlv. 28; Ezek. xi. 13; xx. 17; Zeph. i. 18; it is uncertain whether אִתָּם is a Nota Accus. or a preposition.

4. Infidelity from blindness of heart and ingratitude.

V. 19-24.

- 19 And it shall come to pass, when ye say:
 For what cause doth Jehovah our God all these things to us?—
 So shalt thou say to them:
 As ye have forsaken me, and served strange gods in your land,
 So shall ye serve strangers in a land that is not yours.
- 20 Announce it in the house of Jacob,
 And publish it in Judah:
- 21 Now hear it, ye people, foolish and without understanding,
 Who have eyes and see not, ears and hear not!
- 22 Will ye still not fear me? saith Jehovah,
 Or will ye not tremble before me,
 Who have placed the sand for a boundary to the sea,
 As an everlasting barrier, which it will not pass?
 And though they rage, they can do nothing,—
 And though they roar, its waves, they come not over it!
- 23 But this people have an apostate and rebellious heart;
 They have revolted and are gone.
- 24 And say not in their hearts:
 We will fear Jehovah, our God,
 Who giveth rain, the early and the latter rain in its season,
 Who segeth to us the weeks as harvest-tide.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The main object of this section (chap. v.) is to present before the people the causes of this punitive judgment, as is especially evident in the beginning of this strophe. For the question (ver. 19): Why doth the Lord all this to us? would then refer to the whole, if vers. 14 to 17 did not present the principal object in the prophetic perspective. This question is therefore only a turn, in order to proceed to the main purpose of the section from another side. As, however, according to ver. 1-3, the lack of אֵלֹהִים is the chief cause of the judgment, so also in this strophe it is only a new species of this which is added: apostasy to the idols in consequence of mad blindness, which recognizes not Jehovah as the Almighty Creator, and hence denies Him the thanks which are due to Him as the Author of the most precious gifts of nature. The strophe falls into two parts: 1. Cause of the punitive judgment, ver. 19 (forsaking of Jehovah and idolatry); 2. Cause of this forsaking a double one: (a) being without heart (vers. 20-22); (b) an apostate and rebellious heart (vers. 23 and 24).

Ver. 19. And it shall come to pass . . .

that is not yours.—On the change of the person (אֲנִי—הָאֱלֹהִים) vide supra, on ver. 14.

Vers. 20 and 21. Announce it in the house of Jacob . . . ears and hear not.—House of Jacob frequently designates the whole people (e. g., in Numb. xxiii. 7; Deut. xxxii. 9; Jer. x. 25; Am. vi. 7), but here, as elsewhere (e. g. Isai. ix. 7; xvii. 4; Mic. i. 5), the kingdom of Israel, partly for the sake of the antithesis to Judah, partly on account of vers. 11 and 15. This in reality exists no longer as such, but ideally it is still ever present to the spirit of the prophet, and indeed with the more justice since its constituent parts were still in existence, though as membra disjecta. Observe that in chap. iii. Jeremiah sharply and emphatically distinguishes Israel and Judah, because he is speaking of the past and the distant future; in ch. iv. he uses in ver. 1 the conjoint appellation, but in what follows, having the present in view he turns to Judah and Jerusalem only (vers. 3, 4, 5, 6, 10, 11, 14, 16, 31); in ch. v. he still addresses Jerusalem in ver. 1, but in what follows (vers. 11, 15) the entirety of the people is more prominent in his mind, quite naturally, since he has to present the causes of the judgment predicted by him, which carry him back into the remote past. He could not then possibly restrict what he says in ver. 21 sqq. to Judah, for it all applies with equal force to Israel.—Foolish and without understanding. Comp. iv. 22; Hos. vii. 11. Have eyes, etc. Comp. Deut. xxix. 3; Isai. vi. 9, 10; Ezek. xii. 2. The apostasy of the people is here explained by their spiritual blindness and dulness generally, and this appears to have come upon them, because notwithstanding the grand displays of His power they had witnessed, they feared not the Lord.

Ver. 22. Will ye still not fear me . . . they come not over it. From the connection the prophet cannot intend an exhortation, but only the confirmation of a fact. It is thus not so much: Will ye not fear me then? as: Ye fear me not therefore.—The wide ocean with the immense body of its waves is an emblem of the wildest and most irresistible force of nature. And yet the Lord is strong enough to control this violence. Comp. Job xxxviii. 8-11; Ps. xxxiii. 7; Prov. viii. 29. [The sea is also an emblem of the world, and its waves of the turbulence of the nations, which are yet under divine control. Comp. Ps. xciii. 3, 4. HENGSTENBERG on John vi. 16-21.—S. R. A.]—They rage, comp. xlv. 7, 8; 2 Sam. xxii. 8; Ps. xviii. 8; subject—its waves.—Can do nothing. Comp. iii. 5; xx. 11; Isai. xvi. 12; Job xxxi. 23

Ver. 23. But this people . . . are gone. How can a people be impelled by the greatness of God's works to fear Him, who are not moved to such fear by His goodness? He whom the love of God wins not, is not won by His omnipotence, for the former is the stronger. The connection is therefore this, that vers. 23 and 24 introduce a new element of their unfaithful disposition, which has at the same time a causal relation to that which was previously mentioned in vers. 21, 22. The Vau in לֹא is adversative: I ask, Will ye still not fear? but to this question I can obtain no satisfactory answer, because this people is both apostate and rebellious.—These last named predicates are stronger than those in ver. 21, for those were negative, while these are positive. They are not only insensible and dull, but positively hostile. They can not—and what is worse—they will not. There is no occasion in the text to take and are gone as forming a climax (comp. Judges iv. 24; Gen. iii. 8). It rather corresponds to have revolted as its positive side: they break loose from the Lord and go away into the unmeasured distance, whithersoever their heart impels them.

Ver. 24. And say not in their hearts . . . as harvest-tide.—We will fear [Let us fear—HENDERSON] corresponds to the not fear me, ver. 22: neither the grandeur nor the kindness of God's works move them to fear Jehovah.—The rain is an emblem of blessing. Comp. iii. 3.—אֶשֶׁת is the general term, as we may perceive from Lev. xxvi. 4 (וְנָתַתִּי גֶשֶׁמִּים בְּעֵתָם). The double Vau before יוֹרֵה (early rain, October to December) and מְלִקֹּשׁ (the latter rain, in the spring, before the harvest) is disjunctive=et—et. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr. §110, 3. The Masoretes, not understanding this, would strike out the first Vau, but unnecessarily.—Secureth. The fruitfulness of the year depends on the regularity of the rainy seasons. Comp. Deut. xi. 14; 1 Sam. xii. 17, 18; RAUMER, Paläst. 4 Aufl. S. 90—[Vid. LIGHTFOOT, XII. p. 71].—The weeks as harvest-tide are the seven weeks of harvest from Easter to Whitsuntide [Passover to Pentecost] (Exod. xxiii. 16; xxxiv. 22; Numb. xxviii. 26; Deut. xvi. 9, 10, 16). They are called thus because the beginning and the close of the (principal) harvest was determined by the two festivals as by fixed boundary-lines. The חֶקֶת קִצִּיר (harvest-tide) correspond to the חֶקֶת עוֹלָם (everlasting barrier), ver. 22.

5. Infidelity as deceit and violence.

V. 25-29.

- 25 Your transgressions hindered such things,
Your sins withheld the good from you.
26 For godless [men] are found among my people;
They lurk, like fowlers crouch;

- They set traps, they catch men.
 27 As a cage is full of birds
 So are their houses full of unrighteous wealth.
 Therefrom they are become great and rich.
 28 They are fat, they shine, they overflow with iniquities:
 In justice they settle not the affairs of the orphan, and prosecute them;
 And the rights of the poor they procure not.
 29 Should I not punish such, saith Jehovah,
 Should not my soul avenge itself on a nation like this?

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 25 is closely connected with the previous strophe, but in such wise that it evidently does not belong to it, but conducts to a new passage. It involves in a certain measure a contradiction to the preceding. While in ver. 24 it was declared: they say not, let us fear the Lord, who gives us rain, etc., it is here said that Jehovah had not given them rain because of the sins of the people. And these sins are now so specified in what follows, that we see the prophet would confirm by new facts the fundamental thought of the section that אֲכִינָה has departed from Israel. Moreover the end here reverts to the beginning. For when he here speaks of the ruling of the כְּרִכָּה, and of the unrighteousness of those in power it is evident that the phrase "any one doing right or seeking truth," in ver. 1, is hovering before his mind. Ver. 29 shows by its identity with ver. 9, that it is the conclusion of the strophe, and thus in its structure this strophe entirely resembles that in vers. 7-9, which likewise begins and ends with a reference to the divine judgment.

Ver. 25. Your transgressions . . . from you. Comp. iii. 3; iv. 18. When the prophet here, as in iii. 3, refers to the withholding of the rain as past, he certainly had definite facts in view (c. g., 1 Kings xvii.; Am. iv. sqq.) and would intimate that the Lord not merely will punish, but already has punished, by which a guarantee is afforded of the infliction of the expected judgment.

Ver. 26. For godless men are found . . .

they catch men. יָשִׁיר is to be regarded as impersonal: it is lurked. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 101, 2.—כֶּשֶׁן יְקוּשִׁים. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 95, 2. [GREEN'S Gr., § 139, 2.—S. R. A.]

(פְּעֵנֶר כִּיפָה) פְּעֵנֶר כִּיפָה Prov. x. 25).—כִּשְׁחִית, destroyer generally (Exod. xii. 13; Ezek. xxi. 36), here specially, on account of הַצִּיב, destructive snares.

Ver. 27. As a cage is full of birds . . . become great and rich. כְּרִכָּה is evidently the antithesis of אֲכִינָה. At the same time the word is to be taken as abstr. pro concr. = res fraude parte, as עֵקֶל Ps. cv. 4; Eccles. ii. 19; comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 59, 1. From riches gained by deceit is developed violent injustice.

Vers. 28 and 29. They are fat . . . nation like this. Being fat is not all: luxury produces lust, it runs over like a seething pot, and that with iniquities [matters of wickedness: HENDERSON] (רִבְרִיבֵי) involving the ideas of res and verbum which are afterwards enumerated. עֵבֶר is construed as a verb of fulness with the accusative, like הִלֵּךְ Joel iv. 18. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 69, 2, a. — They settle not. Comp. Ps. x. 18; xliii. 2; Gen. xxx. 5; Jer. xxii. 16.—and prosecute them, might certainly be rendered grammatically = that they prosper [HENDERSON]. But then the plural is strange and the sense is flat. Therefore it is better to regard it as the positive side of settle not = and they carry them through.—Ver. 29, comp. ver. 9.

G. Comprehensive conclusion.

V. 30, 31.

- 30 Fear and horror have happened in the land;
 31 The prophets prophesy falsely,
 And the priests rule by their hand,¹
 And my people love to have it so:
 But what will they do when the end of the song comes?

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 31.—["The LXX. and the Fulgate have 'And the priests have applauded with their own hands,' and the Targum 'And the priests have blessed their hands.' Both mean the same thing (?) though the words are different; and Blayney (and Boothroyd) gives the same meaning. 'And the priests have concurred with them.' HOSLEY says the words literally are 'And the priests go down according to their hands;' that is, he adds, 'the priests go which way their hands permit, i. e., the priests are directed by them.'—When followed by לְ as here, the preposition never means according to, as HORSLEY renders it, but ever, upon, toward or against, and mostly 'upon.' See EX. ix. 9; Numb. iv. 9; Ps. vii. 10; lxxii. 6. Therefore the literal rendering is this. 'And the priests have descended upon their hands.' An idiomatic expression, which seems to mean, that the priests assisted the prophets, according to what is expressed by the Itregum, etc. Note by Eng. ed. of CALVIN, I. p. 303.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These verses express the result of the examination instituted by the prophet into the moral condition of the people, viz., that it was horribly bad in all ranks of life. While ver. 30 has reference to the entire section, ver. 31 refers especially to vers. 4 and 5.

Ver. 30. Fear . . . in the land.—Fear. Comp. Deut. xxviii. 37; 2 Kings xxii. 19; Jer. xix. 8; xxv. 9, etc.—horror, a horrible thing, xxiii. 14. Comp. xviii. 13; Hos. vi. 10.

Ver. 31. The prophets . . . when the end of the song comes. The prophets are first mentioned as the medium of all knowledge which determines to action. Comp. xx. 6; xxix. 9. The priests ought to have been a corrective to the misleading of the prophets, comp. Mal. ii. 7; Ezek. vii. 26. Instead of this they made profit by them.— וְלֹא־יָדְעוּ or וְלֹא־יָדְעוּ apart from its local signification, is a priestly terminus technicus, which means ad latus = under inspection, by appointment (1 Chron. vi. 16; xxv. 2, 3, 6; 2 Chron. xvii. 15, 17; xxiii. 18; xxix. 27; Ezer. iii. 10). So here. For an instance of such corrupting influence exercised by the prophets on the priests, see Jer. xxix. 24-32.—The corruption of the priests and prophets should in the last instance be rebuked by the sound sense of the people. But no. The people love to have it so. They do not cause a reaction but co-operate.—When the end of the song comes, or in reference to its end. The fem. suff. must be regarded as mental (ver. 20, comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, 6 b) and to be referred in general to the totality of the condition described by the prophet. The sense is: What will you do when the present condition enters upon its last stage of development, or as we say, when the end of the song comes? Comp. Isai. x. 3; Hos. ix. 5. [LIGHTFOOT, XII. p. 550.—S. R. A.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 1. "The wicked world has in the pious and believing a noble treasure and defence" (Gen. xviii. 32); LANGE.—Even Zoar is preserved for the sake of Lot, (Gen. xix. 20 sqq.)—Comp. Isai. xxxvii. 35.—GUISLERUS reminds us of a story which Pliny relates (vol. xxxv. cap. 10) of King Demetrius, who retired from the city of Rhodium, because he could not take it on its only accessible side without destroying some celebrated paintings of Protogenes.

2. ZINZENDORF here relates (S. 198) a story of M. Joh. Christoph Schwedler, ob. 1730. "Once when in the church at Wiese (Silesia) they were singing before the communion 'I will say to thee Farewell,' at the words 'Thy sinful, wicked living, pleases me not at all,' such an Elias-like zeal seized upon him, that raising his voice above the organ and the choral of a thousand voices, he cried out in tones of thunder, 'For God's sake what are you singing? What does not please you? The Lord Jesus does not please you. To him ye must say: Thou pleasest us not, then you would speak the truth; but you do say, the world.'—When now all, convicted by their consciences, sat there in grief and tears, and few knew how this happened to them, he said: 'Now, if it be thus as it should be, let him to whomsoever your sinful life has become offensive, confess it in the name of the Lord,' whereupon this verse was wept rather than sung."

3. On ver. 3. ORIGEN says in his sixth homily, of which the text is Jer. v. 3-5, "If now thou wilt that the beams of God's eye rest upon thee, embrace the virtues. So will it be with thee according to this 'the eyes of the Lord look for faith.' And if thou art such an one that the eyes of the Lord shine upon thee, then wilt thou say, 'the light of thy countenance rose upon us, O Lord,' Ps. iv. 7."—He asks for returns and that too in cash. This is the fund to which he applies and on which he depends. Words are of no value to him. But just this is the complaint: Faith is rare among the children of men (Ps. xii. 2); 'it is not every man's possession,' as it is there said. In these days preachers might exclaim with Isaiah: who believes? (Isai. liii. 1). And Abraham pleads with the Lord for Sodom on condition of five righteous persons being found in it (Gen. xviii.)." ZINZENDORF.—"Ecce verbera desuper et flagella non desunt, et trepidatio nulla, nulla formido est. Quid si non intercederet rebus humanis vel ista censura?" CYPRIAN, ad Demetrium.—"Haud grave est plagis affici, sed plaga meliorem non fieri gravissimum est." GREGOR. NAZIANZ.

4. On vers. 4 and 5. "A preacher has no more miserable and ignorant hearers than the respectable. While they are spelling their way back to the cross, and are getting so far as to know how to learn that we are saved alone by the grace of the Lord Jesus, till we get them so far as to understand that the command of the New Test. is to believe, and all that morality can lug about for eighty years is gone with a word: Son, be of good courage, thy sins are forgiven thee,—the ignorant would have been able to do it thrice. Enough has been said to show that a teacher greatly deceives himself, if he seeks among the respectable that comfort in his office, which he does not meet with among the common people." ZINZENDORF, S. 12, 13. Comp. S. 65, 66; 1 Cor. i. 26, 27.

5. On ver. 13. "Yes, the prophets are gossips. How does this sound and whence comes the saying? It sounds somewhat distinguished, and a teacher may draw it upon himself. Almost the whole body has incurred this, that they are reckoned with afterwards, and because after their discourse one has been able to do away with it by head work, he has finally come to the conclusion: the pastors are gossips; and the precious treasure of the public testimony is much calumniated. Whoever is grieved on account of the teachers, let him reflect that this arises not so much from the fault of the hearers as of the teachers. I will assure him: As soon as the words of the Lord become fire in his mouth, the hearers become wood, and criticism is at an end, and feeling comes and savor comes, be it unto life or unto death. From that time the preacher is in earnest, and laughter is forbidden by the hearers themselves." ZINZENDORF, S. 13, 14.

6. On ver. 15 sqq. "The prophet takes his direction from God's unchangeable calendar, as it was composed by Moses: Deut. xxviii. 49. Therefore he could well prognosticate how it would terminate with his disobedient people. It is of use, that we diligently peruse such an ever-enduring calendar, and ever have it before our eyes. For it is more certain than all other prognostications can be." CRAMER.

7. On vers. 21, 22. "Hear, ye mad people, that have no understanding! Will ye not fear me?" This is a glorious discovery of the omnipotence and majesty of God. If, however, men see one, they see all; but they have no ears to hear until the whole is changed. But that men are so secure and think not of Him who allows them to live so securely, this is indeed an insane business." ZINZENDORF, S. 202.

8. On ver. 24. "O man, as often as thou puttest bread into thy mouth, reflect, that God by this means of nourishment would bring thee to Himself. Cling not also to carnal bread, but let thy immortal soul be satisfied by God." STARKE.

9. [On ver. 25. "This passage is worthy of special note: for God's paternal favor does not so continually shine forth in our daily sustenance, but that many clouds intercept our view. Hence it is, that ungodly men think that the years are now barren, and then fruitful through mere chance. We indeed see nothing so regulated in every respect in the world, that the goodness of God can be seen without clouds and obstructions: but we do not consider whence this confusion proceeds, even because we obstruct God's access to us, so that His beneficence does not reach us. We throw heaven and earth into confusion by our sins. For were we in right order as to our obedience to God, doubtless all the elements would be conformable, and we should thus observe in the world an angelic harmony. But as our lusts tumultuate against God, as we stir up war daily, and provoke Him by our pride, perverseness and obstinacy, it must needs be that all things, above and below, should be in disorder, that the heavens should at one time appear cloudy, and that continuous rains should at another time destroy the produce of the earth, and that nothing should be unmix'd and unstain'd in the world. This confusion then, in all the elements, is to be ascribed to our sins: and this is what is meant by the prophet. Though indeed the reproof was then addressed to the Jews, we may yet gather hence a lesson of general instruction." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

10. On ver. 28. ZINZENDORF remarks on the words "and they prosper" that the chief cause of the condemnation of the rich man (Luke vi. 19 sqq.) was that he was prospered in all things in this world. He consequently received his good things in this life and fared sumptuously every day. Comp. Ps. xxxvii. 35; Luke vi. 25; Jas. v. 1 sqq.

11. On ver. 28. "It would be better for one to have the Turkish emperor with all his army for an enemy than a poor widow with her fatherless orphans. For the widow's tears are water which rises above all the mountains and then falls again and washes away all her enemies into hell." LUTHER. Comp. Wisd. xxxv. 18-21.

12. On ver. 31. "My people like it so." Like sought, like found. The people wish to have false preachers and get them, and a blind man leads the blind until both fall into the ditch, Luke vi. 39." CRAMER.—"How will it be at last? We finally become as accustomed to disorder as disorderly people, and the more everything goes to ruin, the less concerned are we. There is, perhaps, however, still an uncompromising servant or old friend of our Father, who is constantly repeating the little word to us: How will it be? How will it end at last? This is the peculiar office of the teacher, and nobody likes to hear him." ZINZENDORF, S. 203.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On ver. 3. Lord, thine eyes look for faith. Why does God impose faith as the only condition of salvation? 1. Because faith gives the greatest glory to God. 2. Because it is at the same time the easiest and most difficult exercise of the human heart. For (a) to believe, i. e., to accept God's grace as a free gift, every one is, and must be, able to do. (b) He who can do it, has vanquished himself at the one point and won all.

2. [On ver. 4. "All sin proceeds from some misapprehension of God. (1) Skeptical humor as to God's particular Providence, and inspection over all events. (2) Disbelief that He is concerned about the moral good or evil actions of men. (3) Abuse of the doctrine of God's foreordination, and (4) of His mercy. But (1) God's mercy will not interfere with His justice. (2) The execution will be no less severe than the threatening. (3) God will not accept less than He requires in the Gospel." DR. S. CLARKE.—S. R. A.]

3. On ver. 11. Obstinate unbelief. 1. Its nature: it denies God and therefore despises (a) God's word, (b) those who proclaim it. 2. Its punishment: the tables are turned; (a) the unbeliever, before fire, now becomes wood, (b) the word of God, before regarded as wood, becomes fire.

4. On ver. 19. Why doth the Lord our God all these things to us? Three answers to this one question: 1. John xiii. 7, What I do, thou knowest not now, etc. 2. Matth. xx. 15, Is it not lawful for me to do what I will? etc. 3. James i. 12. Blessed is the man that endureth temptation, etc. FLOREY, 1863.

5. On vers. 21, 24. Of the fear of God. 1. Motives from without, (a) God's displays of power, (b) His displays of grace. 2. Inner conditions: (a) That we open our eyes and ears, (b) that we allow ourselves to be impelled by that which we see and hear.

6. On ver. 24. (Harvest [Thanksgiving] sermon). The harvest-blessing: 1. From whom it comes. 2. To whom it leads.

7. On ver. 24. It is the Lord who faithfully guards the harvest forces. This truth calls for

1. humility and trust in the sowing of earthly seed; 2. confidence in working in this world; 3. hope in the interment of bodies in the earth. V. D. TRENK, Gesetz und Zeugniß (Law and Testimony), Apr. 1860, S. 226.

8. On ver. 24. The call which the present year's harvest makes on the hearts of men. It is, Fear the Lord. For 1, without Him all labor and toil is in vain; 2. He does not allow Himself to be interfered with in His government; 3. He gives and blesses without respect to our deserts and in spite of our sins. FLOREY, 1863.

9. On vers. 30 and 31. A cry of warning in a period of universal apostasy. 1. The condition of the people is shocking and abominable, for (a) the leaders of the people misguide them, (b) the people wish to be misled. 2. The consequences correspond to the guilt (comp. vers. 25, 14 sq., 6).

III. Recapitulation, consisting of a combination of the points already presented: the call to return, announcement of punishment and its reasons.

(CHAP. VI. 1-26).

1. Exhortation to flee from Jerusalem.

VI. 1-8.

- 1 Flee, ye children of Benjamin, out of Jerusalem,
And in Blow (Tekoa) blow the trumpet,
And over the vineyard (Beth-hakkerem) erect the signal,²
For calamity threatens from the north and great ruin.
- 2 Thou art like the meadow, the tenderly cared for,
O daughter of Zion.
- 3 Against her shall come shepherds and their flocks
And pitch their tents against her round about,
And depasture each his spot.
- 4 Sanctify war against her!
"Arise, let us go up at noon!
Wo to us, for the day has turned,
For the shadows of evening are lengthening.
- 5 Arise, and let us go up in the night
And destroy her palaces!"
- 6 For thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth,
Fell her trees,³ and raise a rampart⁴ against Jerusalem!
She is the city of which it is ascertained
That nothing but rude violence is found in her.
- 7 As a spring⁵ poureth forth its waters
So she poureth forth her wickedness.
Injustice and desolation are heard of in her,
Sickness and wounds are continually before me.
- 8 Be warned, O Jerusalem, lest my soul be forced from thee,
Lest I make thee desolate, a land uninhabited.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 1.—"The word has no connection with 'fire,' as mentioned in our version, which has been derived from the Rabbin. BLAYNEY'S rendering is 'light up a fire—beacon,' but the words admit of no such meaning." Ed. of CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

⁵ Ver. 7.—It is probable that בור here stands for באר, as the Masoretos suppose to have happened, vice versa, in 2 Sam.

xxiii. 15, 16, 20. This is also proved by the fem. suffix in כִּי־יָרֵךְ. For בָּרַךְ, pit is masc., while בָּרָךְ is fem. This change of gender between the noun and the suffix is probably also the ground of the Keri בָּרַךְ, which does not occur elsewhere. On the construction comp. v. 16, and NAEGELS. Gr., § 95, 2.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

That vers. 1-8 form a strophe is seen partly from their close connection (ver. 6 traces the undertaking of the besiegers to a divine command), partly from the fact that the eight verses contain the complete cycle of the fundamental thought of the prophet, announcement of judgment, statement of reasons (vers. 6 and 7) and call to reform (ver. 8). At the same time however a climax is evident on a comparison with the preceding context. For the prophet here sees the judgment upon Jerusalem so near its accomplishment that he already earnestly admonishes to fight those who live to the south of this city.

Ver. 1. Flee, ye children of Benjamin . . . great ruin.—Flee, comp. iv. 6.—Children [sons] of Benjamin is explained without doubt by the circumstance that Benjaminites formed a part (probably the principal part. Comp. GRAF, WINER, R. W. B., s. v., Jerusalem) of the inhabitants of Jerusalem. According to the original settlement of boundaries (Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16) Jerusalem belonged entirely to Benjamin. But even before David's time it was inhabited by Judeans (Josh. xv. 63) and Benjaminites (Judg. i. 21). Since David's time, being the capital of the whole country, it also belonged to the whole people (comp. RAUMER, Paläst. S. 339) and doubtless had inhabitants from all the tribes, which would not however exclude Judeans and Benjaminites from forming the bulk of the population. Jeremiah's mentioning only the latter may be explained by the fact that he himself was of the tribe of Benjamin (i. 1).—From [from the midst] is an antithesis to towards Zion, iv. 6. While there they were called upon to flee to Jerusalem, where at first they would find safety, now they are exhorted to flee from Jerusalem.—הִקְיֵץ (to blow, blow, Germ. stossen, Stoss. Comp. the place named Stoss in Appenzel, Switz.) is mentioned partly for the sake of the paronomasia and partly because it is a prominent point to the south of Jerusalem: for after the capital, the bulwark of the South, has fallen, this also is threatened and must think of flight. Tekoa lay 9 to 12 m. p. south from Jerusalem. It is mentioned in 1 Sam. xiv. 2; Am. i. 1, etc. JEROME says on this passage, "Thecum quoque viculum esse in monte situm, et 12 millibus ab Hierosolymis separatum quotidie oculis cernimus." According to Robinson (II. 406) [THOMSON, The Land and the Book, II. p. 424] the place is still called Tekoa, and is situated on a mountain covered with ruins.—For a similar paronomasia Vid. Mic. i. 10 sqq.—בֵּית־הַרְרִים is mentioned only here and in Neh. iii. 14. JEROME testifies that it was a considerable elevation, near to Tekoa.—According to Pococke it is the Frank mountain, "an insulated, lofty cone." Comp. RAUMER, Paläst. S. 223. [ROBINSON, Bibl. Res. II., pp. 171, 182-184. RITTEN, Geog. III., p. 96.—S. R. A.] כִּסְאָתָא from its radical meaning of elatio obtains a variety of derivative significations. See the Lexicons. Here as in Judg. xx. 28, 40, it denotes the sign raised high aloft, (elsewhere נָסַח).—For calamity, comp. iv. 6.

Ver. 2. Thou art like the meadow . . . daughter of Zion. The passage is difficult, and has been very variously explained. נֶחֱדָה is taken in the sense of "meadow" (LUTHER, NEUMANN); habitatric (VENEMA); shepherdess (SER. SCHMIDT). Most commentators render it = נְאוֹהָה (Song of Sol. ii. 14; iv. 3; vi. 3) pulchra, formosa. נֶחֱדָה from נָחַד delicate vixit (Paul here only) is without doubt = delicate habita, which is always well cared for, spured, never roughly handled, comp. הֶעֱנָה Deut. xxviii. 56; Isai. xlvii. 1.—רִכְבֵּי־אֵשׁ 1. assimilari (Vulg., KIMCHI, ARAB., PAGN., TREMELL., PISCATOR, etc.); 2. similis facta es (Syr.); 3. similis sum (SER. SCHMIDT); 4. peristi mihi (VENEMA); 5. as fair and luxurious have I imagined the daughter of Zion (derived from the meaning "to compare," comp. Song of Sol. ii. 17; viii. 14; FÜRST); 6. the fair and luxurious—I mean the daughter of Zion—to her come, etc. (EWALD, MEIER); 7. I make still (NEUMANN), exterminate (so most recent commentators). The connection requires without doubt the meaning of gay, well-tended and well-preserved meadow. For after, in ver. 1, a grievous calamity in general is set in immediate prospect before Jerusalem, we see from ver. 3 more particularly that this calamity will consist in a visitation of rough shepherds, who will ruthlessly depasture and desolate Jerusalem with their flocks. In contrast with its later condition, Jerusalem before its desolation can be represented under no more suitable figure than that of a meadow well-preserved and tended by its owner with special predilection. נֶחֱדָה designates not only a visitation generally, but also a pastoral visitation in particular (caula cum pascuo, FÜRST), as is clear from Job viii. 6; coll. Zeph. ii. 6. Comp. נְאוֹהָה Jer. ix. 9; xxiii. 10; xxv. 36. רִכְבֵּי־אֵשׁ is indisputably = similis fuit (Ps. lxxxix. 7; cii. 7; exliv. 4, etc.) It is usually construed with לִי (see the passages cited) or with לְאֵל (Ezek. xxxi. 8). But that it may also have the subject compared, without a preposition, in the nominative is seen from Ezek. xxxii. 2, where it reads כְּפִיר נִים נִרְכָּבִי, i. e., a lion among the nations art thou compared. Comp. Isai. xxxviii. 13. The meanings of Niph'al and Kal intrans. here, as frequently, coincide. The construction is explained thus, that רִכְבֵּי־אֵשׁ properly signify: to be as a comparison, as a thing compared; Egypt is (in Ezek. l. c.) compared; i. e., by way of comparison, figuratively designates, a lion. Israel (in this passage) is as a figure or comparison a meadow—רִכְבֵּי־אֵשׁ I take as the Syriac did, according to the frequent usage in Jeremiah (comp. on ii. 20) as 2 Pers. Fem.—The Masoretes have not added in the Keri the regular form here as in the other passages, which may be explained by the circumstance that they took רמתי as the 1st person. The article before נוה is generic as in iv. 25; comp. NÆGELS., § 71, 4, a.— before הַיְעַנְנָהּ is epexegetical = and indeed, comp. NÆGELS. Gr., § 111, 1 a.

Ver. 3. Against her shall come shepherds . . . each his spot. The enemies are compared with shepherds, who break in with flocks and ruthlessly depasture and tread down. Comp. Mic. v. 4, 5.—And pitch their tents, etc., comp. i. 15.—רַי side, place, spot. Comp. Lev. ii. 17; Deut. xxiii. 13; Isai. lvi. 5.

Ver. 4. Sanctify war against her . . . the shadows of evening are lengthening.—Sanctify as in Joel iv. 9; Mic. iii. 5; Zeph. i. 7; Jer. xxii. 7; li. 27. The expression refers to the solemn ceremonies attending the proclamation and commencement of war. Comp. Ezek. xxi. 26 sqq.—This and the following are calls made from the midst of the enemy.—The expressions exhibit the zeal of the enemy with dramatic liveliness. This zeal is so great that the unfavorable time of the day even cannot detain them. At noon, when the heat usually compels all to rest they depart, and when the evening comes they deplore it, but instead of going to rest prepare at once for the assault.—Has turned. Comp. Ps. xc. 9, [all our days turn away].

Ver. 5. Arise, and let us go up . . . destroy her palaces. אֲרַבְנֹת is translated by SCHNURER and EWALD, here and in ix. 20, by lofty buildings, in order to comprise the fortifications. But here, as frequently, the expression denotes the final object, the completion of the work of destruction. Comp. Jer. xvii. 27; Am. i. 4.

Ver. 6. For thus saith Jehovah . . . found in her. The besieging of Jerusalem by its enemies is not a baseless, vain undertaking. It rests on a double, solid ground: 1. Immediately on a divine command (פִּרְוֵה); 2. mediately on the ungodliness of Israel, which provokes the vengeance of Jehovah (וְלֵה עֵשֶׂק וגו' to ver. 7, fin.)—Fell her trees is evidently an allusion to Deut. xx. 19, 20, where it is commanded that Israel when they besiege a city, are not to cut down all the trees for the purposes of the siege (walls and machines.—Comp. WINER, R. W. B., and HERZOG Real-Enc. Art. Festungen). Here the enemy is commanded to do the exact contrary. Thus it is rendered evident how savage the enemy is and what Israel has to expect. The latter are so ungodly that the enemy is excused from those considerations which were imposed on the Israelites themselves in war. If this passage is thus based on Deut. xx. 19, 20, we are then justified in regarding עֵצָה פִּרְוֵה as a verbal reminiscence.—The following sentence is construed in three ways: 1. Hæc illa urbs—punitur quantaquanta est—oppressio in ea; 2. hec est urbs in quam animadvertitur,—tota illa oppressio in ea; 3. urbs ista—exploratum est, quod non est nisi oppressio in ea.—Of these interpretations the first must be unconditionally rejected, for פִּלְהָ is as unnecessary with הַפְּקָד, as it is necessary, to what follows. The second is the most generally adopted. But the abrupt הַפְּקָד is flat; we expect a stronger word and the imperfect, since the visitation is impending. I therefore prefer the third interpretation, adopted by ABARBANEL and SEB. SCHMIDT. Since פִּקְדָה=explorare (comp. Ps. xvii. 13; Job vii. 18) הַפְּקָד may well mean exploratum est. This agrees excellently with what follows: that their inward part is full of thoughts of violence is confirmed by the fact that they well forth these like a spring its waters; the cry thereof is heard, the effects thereof are visible (ver. 7). Levit. v. 23 also evidently hovered before the mind of the prophet. Since there only besides the Hophal occurs, though with another meaning; so there also is found the idea of עֵשֶׂק. For the restoration is there alluded to of that which any one has appropriated by violence (עֵשֶׂק) or by illegal retention of property entrusted to him. Though the thought in general is a very different one, yet a comparison of this passage explains (a) why the prophet here designates the sin of Israel as עֵשֶׂק (b) the choice of the singular word הַפְּקָד; also (c) the article in הָעִיר is satisfactorily explained, if the prophet refers to a former utterance. פִּקְדָה עֵשֶׂק פִּקְדָה is a confusio duarum constructionum, עֵשֶׂק פִּקְדָה פִּקְדָה עֵשֶׂק.

Ver. 7. As a spring . . . continually before me.—The Inf. הַקִּיר points to a root קיר; from which besides only קָרְתִי (2 Kings xix. 24; Isai. xxxvii. 25). The following הַקִּיר presupposes a root קר, from which no verbal form occurs in the Old Test. Yet by virtue of the relationship of the verbs עָי and עָי it not rarely happens that the same word derives forms from both conjugations. Comp. EWALD, § 114, a.—The interpretation is difficult of הַקִּיר הַקִּיר and בּוֹר קִיר means: to dig (2 Kings xix. 24), but קָרָר means (after קָרָר, קִירָר, coldness, קָר fresh), to be cold, fresh. The meaning to pour forth therefore seems to suit neither the one nor the other of these two roots. Hence after the example of the LXX. and JEROME many commentators have interpreted the passage thus: "As the cisterns keep their water cool, so Jerusalem keeps its wickedness constantly fresh" (GRAF). This rendering seems to be supported by בּוֹר meaning not spring, but pit, cistern. I cannot nevertheless regard this explanation as correct; for 1. the connection is opposed to it, according to our explanation, but also aside from this are heard of and before me afterwards require the meaning of to bring forth, reveal. 2. Although the root קיר in the single passage where it occurs has the meaning to dig, yet even in this place it is used of digging for water, and must include a reference to springing water, while the only noun derived from it is קִיּוֹר, which certainly does not denote a pit or cistern, but a spring or fountain, since, as it is generally used only in a poetic and figurative sense (comp. fountain of blood, Levit. xii. 7; xx. 18; fountain of tears, Jer. viii. 23) it expresses the idea of a spring in its highest and most original sense. Accordingly the meaning of to spring, to pour forth, is certainly not ascribed to הִקִּיר without reason. As to בּוֹר, it certainly does in itself denote a pit or cistern. But in the later books it also designates a pit, in which water is springing, a well-spring (puteus): Prov. v. 15; Eccles. xii. 6.—Injustice and desolation [Violence and spoil] is a standing formula: xx. 18; Ezek. xlv. 9; Am. iii. 10; coll. Hab. i. 3—are heard (comp. Isai. lx. 18) and the following before me are explained by the preceding pour eth forth, as all three members of the sentence afford proof of the fact ascertained, ver. 6.—In are con- tinually before me there is a climax; not only are deeds of violence heard of, but their most palpable effects are continually being witnessed.

Ver. 8. Be warned, O Jerusalem . . . a land uninhabited. Here also as above (iii. 1, 7, 12-22; iv. 1, 3, 4, 14, etc.) the prophet uses the threatening of punishment as a support for a call to repentance. The Lord's heart is still towards Jerusalem, though it is to be feared that it will be alienated from the stiff-necked, impenitent people. הִקִּיעַ from הִקִּיעַ (to be thrust away, to turn away) occurs only in the imperfect, while the perfect forms are formed from הִקִּיעַ. Comp. Ezek. xxiii. 17, 18.

2. The prophet is compelled by an inward pressure to announce the judgment of extermination, notwithstanding the unwillingness to hear on account of the universal horrible corruption.

VI. 9-15.

9 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth:

They shall glean the remnant of Israel as a vine.

Turn again and again thine hand¹ as a grape-gatherer to the baskets.

10 To² whom shall I speak and testify, that they may hear?

Behold their ear is uncircumcised, and they cannot hearken.

Behold the word of Jehovah is a mockery to them;

They have no delight in it.

11 But I am full of the fury of Jehovah,

I cannot longer restrain myself.³

Pour out over the child in the street

And over the company of youths together;

For both man and wife shall be taken,

The aged with him that is full of days.

12 And their houses shall come to others,

Fields and wives together,

For I will stretch out my hand against the inhabitants of the land,

Saith Jehovah.

13 For from the least to the greatest all are given to covetousness,

And from the prophet to the priest they practice deceit.

14 And healed the hurt of the daughter⁴ of my people most slightly,

Saying: Peace, Peace! And there is no peace.

15 They are put to shame,⁵ for they wrought abominations,

Yet they blush not, nor⁷ know how to be ashamed.⁶

Therefore will they fall with them that fall.

At the time that I visit them, they will be overthrown,

Saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 9.—הִשָּׁב יָדְךָ. It is quite unnecessary with HITZIG and GRAF to explain the suffix יך by the reduplication of the following כ (כְּבִצֵּר). The discourse is rather dramatically vivid as in vers. 3-6.—הִשָּׁב is to turn back as the grape-gatherer does his hand with respect to the basket, therefore—to turn again and again.

² Ver. 10.—יָלַד here as frequently in Jer. (comp. xix. 15; xxv. 2; xxvi. 15; xxvii. 19; xxviii. 8; xlv. 20) has almost the meaning of הָלַק, except that here the proximate idea of hostility may be detected in it.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe reproduces with some modification one side of the fundamental thought of the discourse: under a new figure (that of gleaning) the prophet announces the entire destruction of the people (ver. 9). Here however the thought occurs to him that he is really speaking in vain, because nobody wishes to hear him (ver. 10). This objection is removed by the fact that the prophet cannot be silent. He therefore gives free course to the prophetic impulse to pour out upon the whole people the fulness of the divine wrath (vers. 11, 12), which they have so richly deserved by their sins, (pre-eminently of covetousness, deceit and shamelessness, vers. 13-15).

Ver. 9. Thus saith Jehovah . . . to the baskets. Not hastily but carefully is the divine judgment executed: thorough work is done, as in gleaning (Isai. xxiv. 13; Ob. 5; Jer. xlix. 9). These words seem also to refer to a precept of the Law, namely, to that which expressly forbade the Israelites to glean (Levit. xix. 10; Deut. xxiv. 21). The case is the same here as with Fell her trees, ver. 6. This gleaning does not of course contradict what was said in iv. 27; v. 10, 13.—I will not utterly make an end. Even in gleaning something may be left. Comp. Isai.

vi. 11 sqq.; Zech. xiii. 8, 9. סָלְקָלוֹת—here only. EWALD, HITZIG, GRAF, MEIER, appealing to זָלְקָלִים Isai. xviii. 5 coll. תִּלְתְּלִים Song of Sol. v. 11, סִנְכַנִּים Song of Sol. vii. 9, would give it the meaning of "branches, tendrils," which they also regard as favored by the connection, since תִּשְׁבִּיב denotes to turn the hand against any one with a hostile intention (comp. Am. i. 8; Isai. i. 25; Ps. lxxxi. 15). But in the first place the plucking of grapes is not a hostile act, but a kindness to the vine. Secondly, the connection requires the idea of repetition, so that the phrase must not be taken in the sense of the passages cited, but much more according to the analogy of Ps. lxxii. 10; 2 Kings iii. 4; xvii. 3; as to turn back again and again. Thirdly, the mention of the basket portrays much more vividly the fate of the grapes than the mention of the branch would; for the former sets before us the grapes as definitively separated from the vine. Fourthly, the linguistic relations are in favor of the rendering "basket," for the word most nearly related, סָל, decidedly has this meaning (Gen. xl. 16, 17; Levit. xxix. 3).

Ver. 10. To whom shall I speak . . . delight in it. After in ver. 9 he has presented to their view the extremity to which they would be reduced, the objection occurs to the prophet that all his speaking is in vain.—Uncircumcised is used in the Old Test. of the ear in this place only. In the New Test. comp. Acts vii. 51. Of the heart, Levit. xxvi. 41; Deut. x. 16; Jer. ix. 25; Ezek. xlv. 7, 9. Of the lips, Exod. vi. 12, 30. We see from and they cannot hearken that it designates a substantial incapability, which, however, is guilty, as hardness of heart and perversity. Amockery, comp. xx. 7, 8.

Ver. 11. But I am full of the fury . . . full of days. The objection raised in ver. 10 is removed by the impossibility of keeping silence. On the subject comp. xx. 9.—The prophet feels as though the Lord's fury were his own, and he is so full of it that it is with him as in Matth. xii. 34 [out of the abundance of the heart, etc.].—Four, etc. The change of the person is here just as in Turn, etc., ver. 9. The Lord, whose fury he cannot restrain, calls to him to pour it out. With EWALD then to change to שָׁפַךְ is quite unnecessary. The fury shall be poured over the whole people, irrespective of sex or age. Comp. xviii. 21; Lam. ii. 21.—On company of youth comp.

xv. 17.—יִלְכְּדוּ is to be taken in the wider sense—to be caught, comp. Josh. vii. 15.—זָקֵן is the aged man without respect to his vigor, the man "full of days" is he who is superannuated and decrepit.

Vers. 12, 13. And their houses . . . practice deceit. Comp. viii. 10 sqq.—נִכְזְזוּ as in 1 Kings ii. 15; Numb. xxxvi. 7, 8. The prophet seems to be thinking of this latter passage in the same antithetical way, as of the passages from the Law in vers. 6 and 9. Comp. also Deut. xxviii. 30.—I will stretch. Comp. xv. 6.—In ver. 13 begins a repeated enumeration of the sins of the people as forming a motive for the fury described in ver. 11. The faults of covetousness, deceit and wantonness which smothered shame, are here rendered prominent. It seems as though the prophet as in ch. v. has still in mind the antithesis of אֶסְכְּנֶנָּה.—given to covetousness. The prophet seems to have thought of Isai. lvi. 11. Comp. KUEPER, S. 144. The same expression also in Prov. i. 19; xv. 27; Hab. ii. 9; Ezek. xxii. 27.

Ver. 14. And healed the hurt . . . no peace. This is the deceit, or at least one and a very important kind of deceit, which the priests and prophets practised, that they designated (as was certainly to their material interest) the course adopted by the people and the princes as true and saving. Comp. xiv. 14 sqq.; xxiii. 9-40; xxvii. 14, 15; xxviii. 1-10.—healed is intended ironically. The ariste denotes that they have done this hitherto.—And there is no peace. Comp. Mic. iii. 5; Ezek. xiii. 10 and supra, iv. 10.

Ver. 15. They are put to shame . . will be overthrown, saith Jehovah. וְהָיָה (comp. viii. 9; x. 14, etc.) means likewise to make a shameful figure, as וְהָיָה, to make fat, i. e., to become fat, וְהָיָה, to bring forth whiteness, i. e., to become white. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 18, 3. —They are put to shame, says the prophet, because those false predictions of peace have already been frequently falsified. And this could not be otherwise, since their prophecy was an abomination. The Lord therefore in respect to them does just the contrary of that which He does in respect of true prophecy (i. 12).—But notwithstanding this, that they were put to shame, yet they were not ashamed.—Not know how reminds us of Isai. lvi. 11.—fall with them, etc. When the victims of their false guidance fall, they will not, as they have hoped, escape scot-free, but will be overthrown. Comp. the expression in li. 49.

3. Because Israel would not hear the prophet announces to all lands and nations the impending judgment, to be executed by a people from the north.

VI. 16-26.

- 16 Thus has Jehovah spoken :
Stand in the ways¹ and look around
And inquire for² the paths of ancient times,
Which is the way of salvation ;³
And walk therein and find a resting place⁴ for your souls !
But they said : We will not walk therein.
- 17 Then I set⁵ watchmen over you, saying :
“ Hearken to the sound of the trumpet ! ”
But they said : We will not hearken thereto.
- 18 Therefore hear, ye nations,
And know, O congregation, what is among them.
- 19 Hear, O earth ! Behold I bring evil upon this people,
The fruit of their counsels.
For they have not heeded my words,
And my law—they despised it.⁶
- 20 To what purpose should incense come to me from Sheba,
And the sweet cane from a far country ?
Your burnt offerings are not grateful to me,
And your sacrifices are not pleasant to me.
- 21 Therefore thus saith Jehovah :
Behold I lay stumbling-blocks against the people,
And the fathers and sons together shall fall over them ;
The inhabitant and his companion shall perish.⁷
- 22 Thus saith Jehovah : Behold, a people comes from the north country,
And a great nation arises from the ends of the earth.
- 23 Bow and lance they bear,
Cruel are they and have no mercy.
Their voice roars like the sea,
And they ride upon horses,
Equipped as a man for war, against thee, thou daughter of Zion.
- 24 We have heard the report of them ; feeble are our hands,
Anguish has seized us, and trembling as a parturient.
- 25 Go not forth into the field, nor walk in the way,
For the sword of the enemy⁸—fear on every side.
- 26 Daughter of my people, gird thee in sackcloth,
And wallow thyself in ashes.
Make mourning as for an only son—bitter lamentation ;
For suddenly will the destroyer come upon us.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This last strophe of the discourse forms two parts. In the first part (vers. 16-20) the prophet shows the genesis of the calamity. The Lord had at first kindly directed Israel in the right way (ver. 16), but when they had refused to walk in it, He had solemnly threatened them with His punishment (ver. 17). Since they regarded not this also, He turns now with His announcement of punishment to all nations, calling them as it were to witness to the justice of His cause (vers. 18, 19). He refutes a negatory objection of Israel's (ver. 20). In the second part the merited destruction is announced to the people of Israel directly (vers. 21-26), first in general (ver. 21), then its execution is described in detail (vers. 22-25), so that (a) the nation from the North is again mentioned as the instrument of this execution, with more particular features; (b) the experience of the punishment is presented in the words of the suffering people. Finally the prophet calls upon the people to do that which alone remains to them, namely, to humble themselves in deepest mourning.

Ver. 16. Thus has Jehovah spoken . . . we will not walk therein. אָמַר compared with the progress of time in ver. 17 sqq. is to be regarded as preterite.—As the absence of the article is not to be pressed, we translate: stand in the ways, i. e., not in any or some, but in all. They are to compare by examination all the ways (רֶרֶךְ here as in Ps. cxxxix. 24; Am. viii. 14 = religion, cultus). A criterion is at the same time given them, by which to recognize the right way, viz., antiquity. The oldest is the true religion. Let them examine the different religions of the primitive period, in order to find the oldest among the old ways, which is then the way of good or well-being.

Ver. 17. Then I set watchmen over you . . . we will not hearken thereto.—Watchmen, used frequently by the prophet for seers and warners. Comp. Ezek. iii. 17; xxxiii. 7, coll. Isai. xxi. 11, 12; Jer. xxxi. 6.—Hearken to the sound, etc. Observe the climax: after Israel had rejected the friendly admonition in ver. 16, the prophets standing on the walls like watchmen must strike wholesome terror into their hearts by sounding the trumpet of their denunciatory prophecies. But even this is in vain.

The words hearken, etc., may be regarded as spoken by Jehovah or by the prophets themselves; for even the latter might admonish the Israelites to respect the warning, which they brought to them. Yet this admonition certainly seems more appropriate in the mouth of Jehovah. Comp. ii. 25.

Ver. 18. Therefore hear, ye nations . . . what is among them. After the Lord had found among the Israelites a hearing neither for friendly admonition nor for severe warning, He turns to the other nations, in order that they may learn Jehovah's judgment on His people and its true motives.—Concerning עֲרָה opinions are much divided. According to the connection and the unquestioned Masoretic reading it can mean neither testimony (Aqu.) nor troop (HITZIG) nor congregation in the sense of the Israelites, for an address to the whole or a part of the Israelite nation would form a most violent interruption in the parallelism and connection. I do not see why it should not denote the totality of the heathen nations, united as it were into a grand jury. It is true, no passage can be produced, where עֲרָה has exactly this meaning, but it is a word of such general signification, that it may fairly have this sense. For if in Judg. xiv. 8 it signifies a swarm of bees, in Job xv. 34 and Ps. xxii. 16 an assembly of the wicked, and in Numb. xvi. 5, the company of Korah, no one can say that it may not in certain circumstances be used of the assembly of the heathen. Since now according to the idea of the connection previously stated, the prophet turns in ver. 18 right diligently to the heathen, because Israel would not hear him, עֲרָה can denote no other than the totality of the heathen in antithesis to the single nations, who were addressed as הַגּוֹיִם; thus singuli et omnes. At the same time it is not improbable, that עֲרָה (comp. הוֹעִיר adjudicium citare, Jer. xlix. 19; l. 44) might also designate a "judicialis conventus" (so VENEMA, ROSENEM., J. D. MICHE.)—The phrase אֶת-אֲשֶׁר-בָּם is also variously interpreted. Some (LEISTE, ROSENEM.) translate: que in iis faciam, which presupposes an impossible ellipsis; EWALD would read פָּה instead of בָּם, GRAF changes into בְּפִי אֲשֶׁר הָעֲרָה. I find no difficulty in the text, as it exists. The heathen assembled, as it were for a jury, are first to know what thoughts Israel cherishes within. For this purpose a glance into their heart is afforded them by what is said in vers. 16 and 17. On the basis of this state of the facts it is then disclosed to them in ver. 19, what the Lord will bring as a punishment upon Israel. In I bring evil upon, upon is in antithesis to among in ver. 18.

Ver. 19. Hear, O earth! . . . they despised it.—Hear, etc., forms a climax in relation to ver. 18; the whole earth is called to witness. Comp. Deut. xxxii. 1 (coll. xxx. 19; xxxi. 28); Mic. i. 2; vi. 1, 2; Isai. i. 2. After the Lord has granted a glance into the heart of Israel, He shows the punishment which is the result of this inward condition, and which is therefore designated as the fruit of their counsels (comp. ii. 19; iv. 18).

Ver. 20. To what purpose should incense

. . . are not pleasant to me. לְכוֹנֵה the aromatic resin of a tree not yet definitely ascertained. Comp. Exod. xxx. 31; Levit. ii. 1, etc.; Isai. lx. 6; Herzog, Real-Enc. XVII. S. 602; XII. S. 504.—שָׁבַע (not to be confounded with שָׁבַע, i. e., Merod) is the tribe and home of the Sabaeans in Southern Arabia. Comp. Isai. lx. 6; Ezek. xxvii. 22; Joel iv. 8; Ps. lxxii. 15.—קִנְיָה הַטֵּיב, comp. Exod. xxx. 23 (קִנְיָה בַעֲלִים); Isai. xliii. 21; Ezek. xxvii. 19; Song of Sol. iv. 14 = calamus, the root of which was used in the preparation of the anointing oil. Vid. Winer, R. W. B., Art. Kalamus.—In these words the Lord meets an objection of the Israelites to the effect that they had not failed in outward worship. The sense of the reply coincides with 1 Sam. xv. 22; Mic. vi. 8; Isai. i. 11 sqq.; Ps. 1. 8 sqq.; li. 18, etc.—The juxtaposition of עוֹלֹת and זְבָחִים is also found in several of the passages mentioned, comp. Jer. vii. 21; Drechsler, Jer. 1. S. 63.

Ver. 21. Therefore thus saith Jehovah . . . and his companion shall perish. After the refutation of the vain objection in ver. 20 the prophet turns again to the people of Israel. He seems to presuppose that the people excited to jealousy by vers. 18 and 19, (comp. Rom. xi. 14) in opposition to their former disinclination even to hear the Lord, yet at least answer him. The answer is indeed worth nothing, and therefore now follows a direct announcement of judgment, addressed to the Israelites themselves, first, in this verse 21, in general.—Stumbling-blocks. Comp. Isai. viii. 14; Ezek. iii. 20.

Ver. 22. Thus saith Jehovah . . . ends of the earth. This and the following verses specify the calamity announced generally in ver. 21. For the third time the executioner is mentioned as a mighty nation from the North. (Comp. iv. 6 sqq.; v. 15 sqq.)—The passage repeated and applied to Babylon in l. 41-43.—'ס רַכְרַח' extrema terrae. Comp. Isai. xiv. 13, 15; Jer. xxv. 32; xxxi. 8, etc.

Ver. 23. Bows and lances they bear . . . against thee, thou daughter of Zion. Comp. Hab. i. 7.—Like the sea. Comp. Isai. v. 30; xvii. 12; xxiv. 14.—On the question what nation, see the remarks above on i. 14.—Equipped as a man for war. The singular attaching to cruel are they. On the change of number, comp. Ewald, § 317, b. As a man can neither denote one man, nor a hero. Rather do equipped and against thee (as the accents also denote) belong together and as a man for war declares how this preparation is made; not as a woman for peaceful labor, but as a man for war, is the enemy equipped against Zion.

Vers. 24 and 25. We have heard the report . . . fear on every side. A description of the feeling which Israel experiences on the incursion of the enemy, so that vers. 22, 23 on the one hand, and vers. 24 and 25 on the other correspond to each other as objective and subjective, or as cause and effect.—Anguish. Comp. iv. 31; xlix. 24; l. 43.—Trembling as, etc. Comp. Ps. xlviii. 8; Mic. iv. 9; Jer. xxii. 23; l. 43.—Ver. 25 is also related to ver. 21 as the effect to the cause: the not venturing out of Jerusalem is the consequence of what has been heard. The personification of Jerusalem as a woman lies at the basis of the forms תִּלְכִּי, תִּשָּׂא, for which the way is prepared by as a parturient, and continued by daughter of my people ver. 26.—Fear on every side, Ps. xxxi. 14; Jer. xx. 3, 10; xlvii. 5; xlix. 29; Lam. ii. 22; see especially remarks on xx. 10.

Ver. 26. Daughter of my people . . . come upon us.—Gird thee, etc., comp. iv. 8,—wallow, comp. xxv. 34; Mic. i. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 30.—Mourning, etc. Comp. Am. viii. 10; Zech. xii. 10.—Bitter lamentation. Comp. xxxi. 15; Hos. xii. 15.—The prophet in conclusion advises Jerusalem to do the only thing that remains to her; repent in sackcloth and ashes (comp. Isai. lviii. 5; Jer. xxv. 34; Ezek. xxvii. 30; Dan. ix. 3) and deep, sincere mourning. For their sins or their destruction? Doubtless for both. For the former is occasioned by penitence, the latter by inevitable destruction. Penitence and mourning can no longer ward off the destruction (as might have been possible before, comp. iv. 1-4; xiv. 6, 8). The prophet indeed expresses this in the words "for suddenly will the destroyer come upon us." But though the calamity cannot be warded off by penitence and mourning it may yet be thus mitigated, and the way may be thus prepared for subsequent restoration.

4. Conclusion: object and result of the Discourse.

VI. 27-30.

- 27 I have set thee a prover¹ among my people, the ore,²
That thou mayest know and prove their way.
28 They are all arch traitors,³ slanderers⁴—brass and iron;
Profligate are they all!⁵
29 The bellows glows,⁶ out of its fire comes—lead;
In vain one⁷ melts and melts,
The base⁸ are not separated.
30 Reprobate silver they are called,
For Jehovah has reprobated them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 27.—בְּחִין (on the form comp. EWALD, § 152, b) [GREEN'S Gr. § 185, 2, c] occurs here only. It is=בְּחִין (xi. 20; xvii. 10).

² Ver. 27.—כֶּבֶד־זָר, DURELL, GAAB, MAURER, HITZIG=כֶּבֶד־זָר, i. e., without gold, כֶּבֶד־זָר being equivalent to כֶּבֶד־זָר (Job xxxvi. 19) and כֶּבֶד unreduplicated as in כֶּבֶד־זָר (Judges viii. 2). EWALD, MEIER would punctuate כֶּבֶד־זָר (Separator) [HENDERSON: an explorer]. Yet both are unnecessary, if we take כֶּבֶד־זָר itself in the meaning of כֶּבֶד־זָר (Job xxii. 24) כֶּבֶד־זָר (Job xxxvi. 19) כֶּבֶד־זָר (Job xxii. 24) as also כֶּבֶד־זָר is used as of like meaning with כֶּבֶד־זָר (2 Chron. xxxv. 4), כֶּבֶד־זָר with כֶּבֶד־זָר (Gen. xv. 2, 3; Zeph. ii. 9), כֶּבֶד־זָר with כֶּבֶד־זָר (Exod. vi. 6; vii. 4, etc.), כֶּבֶד־זָר with כֶּבֶד־זָר (according to its radical meaning), etc. כֶּבֶד־זָר would accordingly=כֶּבֶד־זָר, abscessum, a piece, in the sense of a piece of ore cut off (comp. FUERST, s. v. כֶּבֶד־זָר and כֶּבֶד־זָר). I would however prefer not to make כֶּבֶד־זָר dependent on בְּחִין, from which it is remotely, but on עֵפָי, with which it is immediately connected. The construction is then as in דָּרָבָה זָרָה (Ezek. xvi. 27), הִכְלִיתוּ חֹב (Ezek. xviii. 7). Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 63, 4, g.

³ Ver. 28.—כֶּרִי כֹרִים is so expressed by the Vulg., Syr., Chald. and Aquila that it is evident they read כֶּרִי, which is also actually found in Cod. Regiom. I. and II. as well as in 22 Codd. of KENNICOTT and in 18 of DE ROSSI. This reading may have been occasioned by the unusual construction and the similarity of the passages Isai. i. 23; Hos. ix. 15. The construction is however not unusual in this, as substantives are not rarely thus connected. Comp. הִגְלֵם הַבְּלִים, עִבְרֵם עִבְרֵם, etc. Vid. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 61, 3.—כֶּרִי moreover may be (comp. וְעָנָה, 1 Kings xx. 43; xxi. 4) Part. Kal from כֶּרִי, so that from this form a double Part. Kal would be formed. [HENDERSON: desperate revolters.]

⁵ Ver. 28.—כִּשְׁחִיתִים. Comp. Isai. i. 4 (on the direct causative signification of the Hiphil—to do a pernicious thing). Vid. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 18, 3).

⁷ Ver. 29.—צָרָה צָרָה. The third plur. sing. is employed to denote an independent subject—one. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 101, 2, b.

⁸ Ver. 29.—רָעִים never denotes the dross directly.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet's sermon by no means aimed at a general conversion, it was rather to serve only as a touch-stone. By it a separating process was to be instituted, by which it would be decided which was good and which base metal (ver. 27). Unfortunately the great mass proved to be common brass (ver. 28). In the smelting-process also (past and future) the same result is presented. In two further figures which express essentially the same thing, the Lord compares Israel with a piece of ore, which in the fire produces lead, and again with one which contains silver, but unhappily so mixed, that the base cannot be separated from the true metal (vers. 29 and 30).

Ver. 27. I have set . . . their way. The people are denominated the ore, because their value is to be ascertained by the process of assaying. The term (רָצַף) is also doubtless chosen with reference to i. 18, where it is used of the prophet [a fortified (tried) city]. The nation is also tried, not as a fortress, but as ore which is yet to be proved.

Ver. 28. They are . . . all.—Slanderers. The prophet here as elsewhere (comp. remarks on vers. 13 sqq.), in thus particularizing appears to have had the eighth commandment in mind. Comp. LUTHER'S explanation: to betray, to backbite, or to make an evil report.—Brass and iron. These words state, still figuratively, the result of the proving, ver. 27: the ore contains not gold or silver, but only base metal.

Ver. 29. The bellows glows . . . separated. The bellows glows or is on fire. This refers of course to Israel: their fire is the fire in which they are melted, the fire of affliction, both of the past, the present and the future. Even the severest trials of affliction can produce from this people nothing but lead. It is seen that the prophet proceeds to a related figure, as immediately afterwards he also makes application of a third. The first figure represents the prophet as a trier of metals, who first takes the rough ore in hand in order mineralogically to distinguish its constituent parts. In the second figure the ore is exposed to fire, in order in this way to ascertain its metallic value. The result is lead. I find accordingly that the Keri קִיָּאֵשׁ, however explained, is an entirely necessary alteration.—In what follows the prophet makes use of a third figure. Israel is here definitely presented as silver ore. But in the smelting-places it appears that the silver is so mingled with the stone that the production of clear pure silver is impossible. Israel therefore remains—refuse, impure silver, which, as unfit for noble uses, the Lord rejects.—base [wicked]. The prophet passes from the figurative to the literal mode of speaking.

Ver. 30. Reprobate silver . . . Jehovah has reprobated them.—The conclusion is sad. But this reprobate silver is not Israel in general, but only the Israel of the present time. Comp. iii. 11-25; iv. 27; v. 10, 18.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 1 sqq. "It is very difficult to believe the preaching of God's anger and punishment, for we look at the powerful assistance, the watchmen, the towers and fortresses, and trust in them. But fortresses here, fortresses there! These cannot withstand human force, let alone the calamity which comes from God Himself." CRAMER.

[On ver. 2. M. HENRY: "The more we indulge ourselves in the pleasures of this life, the more we disfit ourselves for the troubles of this life." On ver. 4. "It is good to see how the counsel and decree of God are pursued and executed in the devices and designs of men, even theirs that know Him not, Isai. x. 6, 7."—S. R. A.]

2. On ver. 6. "This is the strongest and most dangerous mining-powder of cities and fortresses, when sin, shame, vice and wantonness get the upper hand. For instance, Sodom and Gomorrah." CRAMER.

3. On ver. 7. "Sin cries, rises and stinks up to heaven, so that God and the angels are obliged to shut mouth, nose and ears. Compare Gen. xviii. 20; Jon. i. 2." FÖRSTER.

4. On ver. 9. "God has two kinds of vintage: one is in grace, when He plucks His glorious grapes, the fruits of good works, and says: 'Destroy it not, for there is a blessing in it' (Isai. lxxv. 8). But where He finds only poisonous berries (Isai. v. 2) and is as one who gleams in the vineyard (Mic. v. 14) He employs other vintagers with iron gloves, and presses them out in His anger (Rev. xiv. 20) till neither stem nor stalk is left." CRAMER.

5. On ver. 10. "Patience! Perhaps it is not long since the preaching has begun. But in the beginning it is just so with one. When one year or forty accustomed to office, things are more tractable, God grant, not too comfortable. We must tell our story with a simple heart, as it is. We must be violent enough to gain a hearing. This joyful, honest, ever-enduring testimony of the truth, which is in us, will excite attention in time, and moreover never returns void (Isai. lv. 11)." ZINZENDORF.

6. On vers. 10, 11. "Draw off thy shoes, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground, Exod. iii. 5. Moses, Elijah, Elisha, David, the prophet before the altar at Bethel, our Jeremiah in particular, and Paul, the evangelical Apostle, used the severest and most feeling methods against the mockers of their religion in the least and the greatest, and it is evident that God will not allow Himself to be mocked. Freely as the heart is treated, and little the violence that God does to it, yet the creature is often cut short when it comes to testifying. For there is a great difference between respect and love. Love is a grace, but respect is in accordance with a creature's nature; it is imbued in every one. For the devil himself, if his hands are bound in the least (as then more is granted him than any other), when it comes to respect—must 'tremble' (Jas. ii. 19). The Lord teach the witness the right measure, that their threatenings and the feelings of men suitably concur, and that it may be with every witness for religion as with John, whom King Herod feared and heard him." ZINZENDORF.

7. On ver. 14. How beautiful are the feet of them that announce true peace! (Isa. lii. 7; Nah. ii. 1.) In like measure destructive are the feet of those who preach false peace. The latter are Satan, who transforms himself into an angel of light (2 Cor. xi. 14).

8. On ver. 16. "There are two kinds of patres. Some are the ancients, some the young. Of the young fathers Asaph says (Ps. lxxviii. 8): that they were not as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation (comp. Ezek. xx. 18). But as regards the ancient, original fathers, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, David, the Evangelists, Apostles and such like, these are the true fathers, who preserve God's word for us, that by means of it we may follow them, and ask after the former ways. Thus we go right and safely." CRAMER.

9. On ver. 16. "Hic arripiunt Papicolæ semitas antiquas, indeque nobis persuadere conantur, ut et nos semitas antiquas queramus, i. e., ut religione Lutherana valere jussa nos adjungamus ecclesiæ papisticæ, quam omnium antiquissimam nusquam non superbe jactitant. Sed nos ipsis 1. obvertimus illud Ignatii: nobis vera antiquitas est Jesus Christus, cui nolle obedire manifestum est exitium. 2. Argumentum, quod isthinc consarcinare satagunt, hunc in modum incertimus: ea ecclesia pro vera habenda, quæ omnium antiquissima. Atqui nostra—est antiquissima. Cæpit enim mox ab initio mundi in Paradiso cum Protevangelio (Gen. iii. 15, coll. xv. 6): Romanensium vero ecclesiæ, sicut ipsi haud diffidentur, circa a Chr. 606 cæpit. Ergo." FÖRSTER.

10. On ver. 16. "Those are the honest knaves, who tell the prophet to his face: we will not do it (Jer. xlii. 16). But such the Lord will honestly punish. For the servant, who knew his Lord's will and did it not, shall suffer double stripes (Luke xii. 47)." CRAMER.

11. [CALVIN: On ver. 19. "We may learn from this passage that nothing is more abominable in the sight of God than the contempt of divine truth: for His majesty, which shines forth in His word, is thereby trampled under foot; and further, it is an extreme ingratitude in men when God Himself invites them to salvation, wilfully to seek their own ruin and to reject His favor." On ver. 20. "And we see at this day, that men cannot be rightly taught, except we carry on war against that external splendor with which they will have God to be satisfied. As then men deceive themselves with such trifles, it is necessary to show that all those things which hypocrites obtrude on God, without sincerity of heart, are frivolous trumperies."—S. R. A.]

12. On ver. 27 sqq. "When goldsmiths wish to purify the silver, they add lead to it. When preachers would try their hearers, they must apply the law. The fire is God's word (Jer. xxiii. 29), the bellows the Holy Spirit in the mouth of the teacher, the metals the hearers, of which some are objectionable, others are unobjectionable." CRAMER.

13. On ver. 27. As Christ is called a sign which shall be spoken against, that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed (Luke ii. 34, 35), the power dwells in His word generally to compel men to separation and decision. For no one can remain neutral towards Him long. He is a touchstone which makes manifest the real condition of the heart, whether the man is of God or not of God, Heb. iv. 12; John viii. 47.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 6-8 may serve for the text of an exhortation to repentance. On the punitive justice of God. 1. With what it threatens us. 2. Why it threatens us. 3. How this threatening can be averted.

2. On vers. 6 and 7. "We find such fountains of evil in our own perverted hearts. Original sin is the true fountain of evil, from which from childhood up much water of obstinacy, disobedience, indolence, envy, falsehood is poured forth. And such water flows every year more abundantly. Soon also flows the water of vanity, of impurity and excess, of reviling and cursing. How does man help himself? Either he will not allow others to observe what wickedness comes from his heart, and hides his sins, or he is himself grieved that so much sin flows from his heart, and begins to stop the flow, i. e., he makes good resolves and proposes no more to commit the old sins. But lo! the streams break forth again, and the fountain of a depraved heart ceases not to flow. Again others allow the stream free course and pollute the city and the country with their sins, as the Jewish people did. Where is help to be found against this fountain of a depraved heart? In the fountain of which Zechariah prophesies, xiii. 1." HOCUSTETTER, 12 Parables from the proph. Jer., S. 12, 13.

3. [TILLOTSON on ver. 8. 1. The infinite goodness and patience of God towards a sinful people, and His great unwillingness to bring ruin upon them. 2. The only proper and effectual means to prevent the misery and ruin of a sinful people. 3. The miserable case and condition of a people when God takes off His affection from them."—S. R. A.]

4. On vers. 11, 12. The double trouble of a preacher of the truth. 1. From without, (a) indisposition to hear, (b) scorn. 2. From within, irresistible necessity of announcing the word of the Lord.

5. On vers. 13-15. Warning against false prophets: 1. Their course: they teach false worship, i. e., they lead not to God but away from Him, by (a) being silent as to the real inconvenient truth, (b) putting the conscience to sleep by a falsehood. 2. Their motive: covetousness, selfishness (ver. 13). 3. Their end: they are put to shame (ver. 15).

6. On ver. 14. [CHALMERS: "The evils of false security. 1. It is not based on the mercy offered by God. 2. It casts an aspersion on the character of God. 3. It is hostile to the cause of practical righteousness."—SPURGEON: "I have heard of a city missionary who kept a record of two thousand persons who were supposed to be on their death-bed but recovered, and whom he should have put down as converted persons, had they died; and how many do you think lived a Christian life afterwards out of the two thousand? Not two. Positively he could only find one who was found to live afterwards in the fear of God. Is it not horrible that when men and women come to die they should cry, 'Comfort, comfort!' and that hence their friends conclude that they are children of God, while after all they have no right to consolation, but are intruders on the enclosed grounds of the blessed God?"—S. R. A.]

7. On ver. 15. [SOUTH: "Shamelessness in sin the certain forerunner of destruction. 1. What shame is more effectual than law. 2. How men cast off shame. 3. The several degrees of shamelessness. 4. Reasons why shamelessness is so destructive. 5. The destruction by which it procures the sinner's ruin."—S. R. A.]

8. On ver. 16. Which is the good way? That which has 1, the right starting-point (the one, unalterable, ancient truth); 2 the right ending (rest for the soul). [DOOLITTLE has a sermon with this text on the theme, "Popery a novelty," and CALAMY has two on the Trinity!—S. R. A.]

9. On ver. 16. New Year's Sermon. What does a retrospect of the ways of the past year show us? 1. That they have been under God's wondrous guidance; 2. that they were intended to be only ways of salvation for our soul; 3. that we have often said, we will not walk in them; 4. that we should care best for our salvation, if we would henceforth walk in the good ways of God. FLOREY, 1863.

10. On vers. 18-21. The righteous judgments of God. 1. They do not shun publicity, but rather appeal to the moral sense of the whole world. 2. They bring upon men their merited recompense. 3. They can be averted, not by outward worship, but by honest submission to God's word (vers. 19, 20).

11. On vers. 27-30. The word of truth a touchstone for the human heart. 1. The good are attracted by it; 2. the bad turn away and are rejected.

3. THE THIRD DISCOURSE.

CHAPS. VII.—X.

The time of this discourse may be determined pretty accurately, since ch. xxvi. gives us information concerning the historical circumstances in which the discourse was delivered. We learn from it that in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim Jeremiah received from Jehovah the commission to place himself in the fore-court of the temple, and to announce to all the Jews who had come to worship (comp. xxvi. 2 with vii. 2) that if they continued to act in opposition to the repeated admonitions of the prophets (xxvi. 5, and vii. 13, 25) the Lord would make the temple like Shiloh, (comp. xxvi. 3-13 with vii. 3-14). Since the enemies who are to execute this judgment are still designated generally as a people coming from the North (comp. viii. 16), and not yet definitely as the Chaldeans, the discourse must have been delivered before the fourth year of Jehoiakim. Comp. infra on xxv. 1. The place which the discourse occupies in the book is therefore in accordance with the principle of chronological arrangement.

The contents of the discourse may be distinguished as follows :

Main thought: Indictment of the people on account of their three prevailing vices, with threatening of punishment.

I. FIRST CHARGE.

I. HYPOCRITICAL MINGLING OF THE WORSHIP OF JEHOVAH WITH IDOLATRY, AND OTHER MORAL ABOMINATIONS.

VII. 1—VIII. 3.

1. Fundamental: the fundamental requirement and promise, vii. 1-7.
2. Their demoralizing trust in the outward temple-service. Admonitory reference to Shiloh, vii. 8-15.
3. The hypocrisy of the worship of Jehovah, boasted of in ver. 4 sqq. is evinced by the idolatry practised elsewhere. Thus the nation is provoking a severe and inevitable judgment, vii. 16-20.
4. Refutation of the objection that the Lord Himself commanded the outward temple-service, vii. 21-28.
5. The abomination of idolatry in the highest degree a most evident proof of the hypocrisy of the people. Beginning of retribution, vii. 29-34.
6. The fulfilment of retribution corresponding to the idol abominations, viii. 1-3.

II. SECOND CHARGE.

THEIR RUINOUS PERSISTENCE IN EVIL.

VIII. 4-23.

7. Their stiff-necked impenitence and its punishment, viii. 4-12.
8. Further portrayal of the visitation announced in ver. 12, viii. 13-17.
9. Continuation: The visitation ends with the carrying away captive of Israel, to the inexpressible grief of the people and the prophet, viii. 18-23.

III. THIRD CHARGE.

THE GENERAL ENTIRE ABSENCE OF TRUTH AND FAITH.

IX. 1-21.

10. Description of the prevailing deceit, ix. 1-8.
11. First punishment: Desolation of the land and dispersion of the people, ix. 9-15.
12. Second punishment: Death snatching away an innumerable sacrifice, ix. 16-21.

IV. CONCLUSION.

IX. 22-25; X. 16-25.

13. The only means of escape and the reason why it is not used, ix. 22-25.
 14. The beginning of the end of retribution: Command to the people to retire; Lament of the desolated land; last watch-cry of the prophet: the enemy is here, x. 17-22.
 15. Consolatory glance into the future, x. 23-25.

I. FIRST CHARGE.

THE HYPOCRITICAL MINGLING OF THE SERVICE OF JEHOVAH WITH IDOLATRY AND OTHER MORAL ABOMINATIONS.

VII. 1—VIII. 3.

1. Fundamental: the fundamental requirement and promise.

VII. 1-7.

- 1 The word which came to Jeremiah from Jehovah, saying:
 2 Stand in the gate of the house of Jehovah
 And proclaim there this word, and say:
 Hear the word of Jehovah, all ye of Judah,
 Who have entered at these gates to worship Jehovah.
 3 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, the God of Israel;
 Amend your ways and your doings,
 So will I cause you to dwell¹ in this place.
 4 Trust² not to³ those lying words:
 "The Lord's temple, the Lord's temple, the Lord's temple is this."⁴
 5 But amend your ways and your doings!
 If ye execute judgment between every man and his neighbor,
 6 Oppress not stranger, orphan and widow,
 And shed not innocent blood in this place,
 And go not after other gods to your destruction;
 7 So will I cause you to dwell in this place,
 In the land which I gave to your fathers,
 From everlasting to everlasting.⁵

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 3.—[The Piel or intensive form of the verb must here have a continuative force, or it must have a permissive signification. There is no example of the simple signification to dwell attaching to this conjugation, so that the rendering of the Vulgate, which BLAYNEY adopts: I will dwell with you is not sustained; comp. ver. 12.^b HENDERSON.—S. R. A.]

² Ver. 4.—לֹכְמִים תִּבְטְחוּ (comp. ver. 8) is Dul. ethicus. Comp. 2 Ki. xviii. 21, 24; Cant. ii. 17; NAGELSB. Gr. § 112, 5, b.

³ Ver. 4.—אֵל־דְּבָרָי. More frequently בְּטָרִי is followed by בָּ or עַל (vers. 8, 14) but אֵל is not unfrequent, Jud. xx. 36; 3 Ki. xviii. 22; Tsai. xxxvi. 7, etc.

⁴ Ver. 4.—[Lit.: are these].

⁵ Ver. 7.—[Or: forever and ever].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet begins with friendly admonition and promise. In ver. 3 he briefly states in advance the fundamental requirement and promise. Vers. 4-7 continue this theme by opposing to false confidence in the apparently infallible objective guarantee of salvation in the possession of the outward temple (ver. 4) exhortation to positive (ver. 5) and negative (ver. 6) fulfilment of the true subjective condition of salvation, after which however the promise, which includes all further salvation for Israel, is repeated more at length. We easily recognize in this strophe the outlines of the whole discourse, for these exhortations correspond, if not in order in contents, exactly with the following exhortations and threatenings, the latter having also for their subject pseudo-worship of Jehovah, idolatry, impenitence, falsehood, deceit, violence, and finally exile.

Vers. 1, 2. The word which came . . . to worship Jehovah. A similar introductory formula is found in xi. 1; xviii. 1; xxi. 1; xxv. 1; xxx. 1; xxxii. 1; xxxiv. 1; xxxv. 1; xl. 1; xlv. 1.—In the gate of the house. If we compare xxvi. 2, where the historical particulars relating to this discourse are given, we see that Jeremiah delivered it in the fore-court (comp. xix. 14). Further information is derived from xxxvi. 10, where it is said that Baruch read the book of the words of Jeremiah "in the chamber of Gemariah, in the higher court, at the entrance of the new gate." Now since this new gate is the same under which the princes called Jeremiah to account for this very discourse (xxvi. 10), it is highly probable that the gate spoken of was not that which formed the main eastern entrance of the outer court (Ezek. xi. 1), but one of the gates which led from the outer into the inner or upper court. From this point the prophet could view the whole assembly of the people in the outer court, as well as the gates leading from without into it.—All ye of Judah. A great festival to Jehovah must have brought the whole people together, for they had not sunk into that state of entire alienation, which, ex. gr. prevailed under Manasseh, when they no longer worshipped the God of their fathers (2 Kings xxi. 2), but now they served other gods together with Him (ver. 6).

Ver. 3. Thus saith Jehovah . . . dwell in this place. These words express as to form the theme of the strophe, but at the same time also as to matter the positive main thought of the whole discourse, which however retires in what follows for the reason stated in vers. 24-28. הָיִתְּךָ ways and מַעֲלָלֶיךָ doings are distinguished like habitus and actus, the former denoting the inward inclination or disposition of the heart (comp. v. 16), the latter the outward fruits in the life (iv. 13; xviii. 11; xxvi. 13; xxxii. 19).—Cause to dwell. Comp. Numb. xiv. 30.—This place. The temple is meant primarily as the centre of the theocracy. Comp. ver. 6, where the desecration of the holy places by the shedding of innocent blood is emphasized (2 Kings xxi. 16; xxiv. 4; Matth. xxiii. 35), and then ver. 7, where this place and the land are distinguished, and ver. 13, where מְקוֹם is distinguished from Shiloh and taken in the more restricted sense of the holy places of worship.

Ver. 4. Trust not . . . temple is this. An example of similar threefold repetition is found in xxii. 29; Isai. vi. 3 coll. 2 Sam. xix. 1. For the sense comp. Mic. iii. 11.—הַכֹּהֵן. Without this word הַיְבֵל would be the subject, and the only meaning would be: templum est, i. e., we have God's temple. With this word הַיְבֵל is predicate, and the former the subject, and the difference in the sense is this, that it is not the existence, the possession of the temple generally, which is declared, but the concrete objects, to which the predicate applies, are indicated. We must therefore render this הַיְבֵל δεικτικῶς. The plural has been variously explained. The Chaldee refers the threefold repetition to the three main forms of worship and their appearance thrice in the year; JOSEPH KIMCHI to the three divisions of the temple-building (court, sanctuary and holy of holies); MENOCHIVS (vid. NEUMANN, S. 439) to the Jewish nation itself, coll. 1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; VENEMA and others to the temple and priests, and with reference to אֲתֵר-הַיְבֵל (Ps. cii. 28) finds also in הַיְבֵל the meaning of continuance and immutability.—In a purely linguistic view הַיְבֵל would apply best to the people, and the thought, that the people as the temple of God were safe from all danger to themselves or the sanctuary, would suit the connection. But the mention of the sanctuary at Shiloh (vers. 12 and 14) requires that in ver. 4 also the temple-edifice be referred to. Comp. especially ver. 14.—Nothing further then remains but to refer הַיְבֵל to the various parts of the temple; not merely the three divisions of the edifice proper, but also the other parts—walls, gates, courts, halls, etc. Still however the plural is remarkable, and a satisfactory explanation of it a desideratum. At any rate we perceive that it was a prevalent delusion among the people that the temple could not be destroyed, because it was Jehovah's. Three times is this emphatically repeated. And by the temple all else seemed to be secured. NEUMANN rightly calls attention to the circumstance that the people make use of the prouder expression

Vers. 5-7. But amend your ways . . . from everlasting to everlasting. Not the outward temple with its service ensures the favor of Jehovah, but the service, which is offered in His temple by sanctified hearts and which manifests itself in works of righteousness. That such works as are here (vers. 5 and 6) enumerated pertain especially to the Old Testament "righteousness," which is opposed not to grace but to violent unrighteousness, is proved by many passages: Ps. v. vii. ix. x. xi. xii. xv. xvii.; Jer. x. 24, 25; xxii. 3-17; Isai. i. 17, etc. Comp. ORTLOGH on the idea of צְדָקָה, etc., in REDELB. u. GUER.

1860, III. S. 403.—The אֵל before הַיְבֵל is quite abnormal, and there is no other instance of it. GRAF correctly supposes that it owes its origin to the similarly sounding sentence, xxii. 3.—To your destruction. Comp. xxv. 7.—From everlasting (comp. ver. 25) belongs to dwell. Israel is to inhabit the land given to the fathers, from the original epoch (vi. 16; Ps. xxiv. 7) at which they took possession of it even to the remotest future. Comp. on xxv. 5.

2. Demoralizing trust in the outward temple-service. Admonitory reference to Shiloh.

VII. 8-15.

- 8 Behold, ye trust in such lying words to your hurt.
 9 To steal, murder, commit adultery,¹
 Swear falsely and burn incense to Baal,
 And follow other gods which ye know not,— 10 And then ye come² and stand before me in this house,
 Which is called by my name: and say:
 We are delivered—to do all these abominations?
 11 Is then this house which bears my name
 Become a den of robbers in your eyes?
 Behold! even I have seen it, saith Jehovah.
 12 For go now to my place which was in Shiloh
 Where I caused my name to dwell at the first,
 And see what I have done to it
 On account of the wickedness of my people Israel!
 13 And now, because ye do all these works, saith Jehovah,
 And I spoke to you most urgently,³ but ye heard not.—
 I called to you, but ye gave no answer,— 14 Therefore I do to the house which bears my name
 In which ye put your trust,
 And the place which I gave to you and your fathers,
 As I did to Shiloh.
 15 And I cast you out from my presence,
 As I cast out all your brethren,
 The whole seed of Ephraim.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 8-11 state that Israel did not follow the exhortation given in ver. 3 sqq., but regarded the external place of grace as though it were a spot where one only needed to present himself in order to be delivered from all the evil consequences of sin,—so that the sanctuary was misused and became a den of robbers. The Lord dispels this allusion as to the infallible power to save of the supposed irrevocably chosen place of grace by pointing to Shiloh: as it is with this, so will it be with the temple and Jerusalem (vers. 12-15).

Ver. 8. Behold, ye trust . . . to your hurt. The statement corresponds to the warning in ver. 4, and affirms that this was not heeded by Israel. "To your hurt" depends on "trust." It is a litotes. The delusion causes injury in a twofold way, by demoralizing the people and thus rendering them ripe for the divine judgment. Comp. Isai. xlv. 10.

Ver. 9. To steal, murder . . . which ye know not. These words in connection with vers. 10, 11, designate the first effect of that hurtful confidence. The people, considering salvation as unconditionally guaranteed by the temple, fall into the delusion, that presence in the temple is sufficient to procure absolution after the practice of the most heinous abominations and license for new crimes, by which course the temple is turned into a place of security and concealment for robbers. The question expresses indignant amazement: What? Steal, murder, commit adultery, etc.? Such wickedness ye do, and then ye come, etc.—Incense to Baal, comp. xi. 13, 17.—And follow other gods which ye know not is taken verbatim from Deut. xi. 28; coll. xiii. 14. Comp. xix. 4; xlix. 3.

Ver. 10. And then ye come . . . all these abominations? The question is continued to אַתָּם, for it is this which is the object of the divine indignation, that the people can unite such moral contrasts.—Stand before me. The expression has the collateral idea of serving; comp. Deut. x. 8; 1 Kings i. 2; xvii. 1; xviii. 15; 2 Kings iii. 14; v. 16; Jer. xl. 10; Ezek. xlv. 15, etc.—Which is called by my name. This expression corresponds to put my name upon (nomen indere, imponere), Numb. vi. 27; 1 Kings ix. 3, 5; comp. Exod. iii. 18; v. 3; Deut. xii. 5, 11; xxviii. 10; 2 Sam. xii. 28; Jer. vii. 30; xxxii. 34; xxxiv. 15.—We are delivered. The people regard their standing before God, their service in the temple as an unailing means of removing all their guilt in a convenient external manner. The word therefore means: we are saved, freed from all the guilt and punishment of sin. Comp. Luke iii. 8.—Many commentators take לְצַדִּיק as=because: because ye have done these abominations? (ironical.) Others=although. The language will allow neither. It is the secondary object of their temple-service which is indicated. The primary, immediate object is expressed in וְצַדִּיק: they wish to purify themselves from their guilt. But as they do not use the right means for this, so also they are not actuated by the right motive,—it is not that they may henceforward hate and abandon their sin, but that like a sow they may return with the more gusto to their wallowing in the mire (2 Pet. ii. 22).

Ver. 11. Is then this house . . . saith Jehovah. In these words the prophet discovers to the people the very heart of their proceeding: with such usage the temple is not a place of salvation, but a refuge for robbers where they purify themselves from the blood and filth of their evil deeds, so as to be the readier for new ones.—Even I. This perception is confirmed ironically, but in a double sense. First by this word, secondly by act. In so far namely as the Lord treats the sanctuary at Jerusalem like that at Shiloh, He causes it to be understood that He regards it as a nest of robbers. That first point results from the evident reference of I have seen it to in your eyes, the second from the following For, ver. 12.

Ver. 12. For go now . . . my people Israel. In these words it is explained how far the Lord actually regards the temple as a den of robbers: we learn that He will treat it as He did Shiloh.

For is accordingly to be referred not to ver. 12 only, but to all that follows. The prophet thus shows the second calamitous effect (ver. 8) of those lying words (ver. 4).—To my place. This denotes the place as such, the spot on which the sanctuary stood, not the latter itself. On this spot nothing more was now to be seen of the sacred dwellings and vessels which once adorned it. A proof is thus furnished that when the Lord has once selected a place for His dwelling upon earth He is not irrevocably bound to this place to all eternity. Whether the city of Shiloh was then destroyed or not, and whether some ruins of the former sanctuary remained to testify of its previous existence, is a matter of indifference. Shiloh was still standing in the reign of Jeroboam I. (1 Kings xi. 20; xii. 15; xiv. 2) and Jeremiah mentions it as though it were still in existence (xli. 5). Comp. GRAF, ad loc.—HERZOG'S Real-Encyc. XIV. S. 269. [“Dr. ROBINSON found its ruins under the name of Seitun on his way from Jerusalem to Shechem.” HENDERSON.]

Vers. 13-15. And now, because ye do . . . the whole seed of Ephraim. The apodosis begins with ver. 14. With respect to the transition from the infinitive to the finite verb, see GRAMMATICAL REMS. on ver. 9.—וְכָל הָאָרֶץ. Comp. ver. 25; xxix. 19; and NAGELSBACH, Gr. § 93, f [GREEN'S Gr. § 282].—The place. The prophet cannot mean the whole country, any more than in vers. 3, 6, 7. As in ver. 12, it is the spot on which the house stands. This spot of earth is the hallowed and hallowing centre of the whole country, on which all other dwelling-places are founded. Comp. Exod. iii. 5.—For Ephraim as a designation of the ten tribes vide Hos. iv. 17; Isai. vii. 2, etc.

3. The hypocrisy of the worship of Jehovah, boasted of in ver. 4 sqq., is evinced by the idolatry practised elsewhere. Thus the nation is provoking a severe and inevitable judgment.

VII. 16-20.

- 16 And as to thee, pray not for this people,
And make not a cry and supplication for them,
Nor intercede with me; for I will not hear thee.
- 17 Seest thou not what they are doing
In the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem?
- 18 The children gather wood and the fathers kindle the fire,
And the women knead the dough, to make cakes for the queen of the heavens,
And pour out libations to other gods, to aggrieve me.
- 19 Do they aggrieve me? saith Jehovah.
Do they not themselves to their own shame?
- 20 Therefore thus saith the Lord Jehovah:
Behold, my anger and my fury is poured out in this place,
On the men and the cattle,
And on the trees of the field and the fruits of the land,
That it may burn and not be extinguished.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

How fixedly the judgment announced in vers. 14, 15 is determined upon by Jehovah, is evinced by this, that the prophet is forbidden to interpose with any plea (ver. 16). The motive of this seemingly harsh decree is indicated by reference to the idolatry still in full course in the cities of Judah and Jerusalem, and which forms a gloomy offset to that pseudo-Jehovah-worship mentioned in ver. 4. This idolatry may be directed primarily against Jehovah, but it will prove at last self-destructive to Israel (vers. 19, 20).

Ver. 16. And as to thee I will . . . not hear thee. JEROME remarks that "sanctorum preces Dei ire possunt resistere, Ex. xxxii. 10 sq.; Ps. cvi. 30; Numb. xvi. 46 sq." Comp. 1 John v. 16—הַיָּהוָה with הַיְהוָה is frequent, ex. gr., Ps. xvii. 1; 1 Kings viii. 23, etc.—This verse is repeated xi. 14; xiv. 11.

Vers. 17 and 18. Seest thou not what they are doing . . . to aggrieve me. The motive of the severe prohibition in ver. 16.—The queen of the heavens is mentioned besides only in xlv. 17, 18, 19, 25. The form, which in Hebrew indeed has general analogies (ex. gr. הַיְהוָה) but does not otherwise occur, bespeaks the foreign origin of the phrase as of the thing. The expression "heaven's-queen" points to the worship of the stars, and indeed the moon as the feminine potency (together with the sun as the masculine) appears not seldom under this name. It is called by APULEIUS (Metaph. XI. init.) directly regina cæli, and in HORACE (Carm. Secul. 35) we find the words: Siderum regina bicornis audi Luna puellas. For more on this subject consult ABR. CALOV. Diss. de Selenolatria Viteb. 1630 (also in Theol. philol., Vol. I. p. 803 sq.). To the further question, what deity is represented by the moon, we can only answer that since it, as the female principle of fructification, corresponds to the sun-god Baal as the male principle, the feminine deity corresponding to Baal, i. e., Astarte, must be represented by the moon. HERODIAN (V. 6, 10) says expressly, Θυρανίαν Φοίνικες Ἀστρο-ἀρχήν (Græcism for Astarte) ὀνομάζουσι, σελήνην εἶναι θέλοντες. Comp. HEROD. III. 8.—On the Carthaginian inscriptions (Insc. Karth. 8), חַמְלֵכַת (= כְּלֵכֶת, i. e., the Nyct., Tavaiç, the Asiatic, originally Egyptian ARTEMIS appears as the feminine opposite of הַיָּהוָה. This is certainly no longer the original Phœnician Astarte, but a later modification with unchaste cultus, and probably admixture of star-worship. Comp. 2 Kings xxi. 3; xxiii. 4; Jer. xix. 13.—Comp. B. s. v. הַיָּהוָה). According to the הַיָּהוָה, xlv. 19, it is not improbable that the cakes were in the form of a moon; compare the cakes offered to Artemis as the moon-god in Athens under the name of αε-λίνας (Vid. GRAF ad loc.).—On the heathen custom of celebrating the new moon with fires kindled in the streets and sweet cakes, comp. SPENCER, De Legg. Hebr. ritual. L. III. Diss. IV. Cap. 3.—The etymology of הַיָּהוָה is uncertain. It is most probably derived from הַיָּהוָה, to prepare. Is it not perhaps connected with הַיָּהוָה (Am. v. 26)? With this adoration of the queen of heaven may have been connected as a later remnant the worship of the Collyridians, who existed in Arabia in the 4th century, and gave divine honors to the Virgin Mary, offering her little cakes of bread (κολλυρίδες), Vid. EPIPH. Hæc. 79.—And pour out libations. The infinitive here may certainly depend on the to (ל) before make (עָשׂוֹת) (comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 112, 8). But it must also be remarked that the Inf. הַיָּהוָה is used by Jeremiah in a very peculiar manner absolutely: xix. 13; xiv. 19 (where the ל perhaps from oversight stands instead of in vers. 17 and 18). At any rate it designates the drink-offerings pertaining to the meat-offering of cakes.

Vers. 19 and 20. Do they aggrieve me? . . . that it may burn and not be extinguished.—On aggrieve comp. Ezek. xxxii. 9.—themselves. אִתָּם reciprocal (comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 81, b).—fury is poured out (comp. Nah. i. 6).—In this place. The divine anger is poured out immediately in the centre of the Theocracy (אֶל) and from thence immediately over the whole land (עַל).

4. Refutation of the objection that the Lord Himself commanded the outward temple service.

VII. 21-28.

- 21 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, the God of Israel: Take your burnt offerings with the sin offerings and eat flesh.
- 22 For I spoke not with your fathers in the day that I brought them out of Egypt, Nor commanded them concerning burnt offerings and slain offerings.
- 23 But this I commanded them: "Hearken to my voice, That I may be your God, and you my people,

- And walk in all the ways that I command you,
That it may be well with you.”
- 24 But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear,
And walked after their own counsels²—
In the hardness of their evil heart,
And turned to the back and not to the face.³
- 25 From the day that your fathers went out of the land of Egypt,
To this day I send you all my servants,
The prophets, zealously and unremittingly.
- 26 But they hearkened not to me, nor inclined their ear.
But they stiffened their neck and acted more wickedly than their fathers.
- 27 And though thou speakest to them all these words,
Yet will they not hearken unto thee;
And though thou callest to them,
Yet will they not answer thee.
- 28 Therefore shalt thou say unto them:
This is the people that has not hearkened
To the voice of Jehovah, their God,
Nor accepted chastisement.
Truth is vanished and eradicated from their mouth.

³ Ver. 24.—[BLAYNEY, UMBREIT, HENDERSON render: and went (drew, turned) backward, and not forward. NOTES and IITZIG: turned the back and not the face.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The hypocritical people might appeal to the fact that their outward temple service was in accordance with the precepts of the Law. To this however it is opposed, that from the beginning the Lord directed His chief regard not to external worship, but to the obedience of the heart, and to this gave the promise of prosperity (vers. 21-23). But the people never observed this requirement of the Lord, though He caused it to be repeated often and urgently by the prophets (vers. 24-26). They will close their ears even to the exhortation of Jeremiah, and thus call down upon themselves the judgment of incorrigibility (vers. 27, 28).

Ver. 21. Thus saith Jehovah . . . and eat flesh. — Take, כָּפֵי (comp. Isai. xxix. 1), may be derived from קָפַץ or כָּפָה. (Comp. Isai. xxx. 1; Numb. xxxii. 14). The primary idea seems to be “to scrape, scratch, sweep,” from which are derived the meanings both of to sweep up or together (comp. also Deut. xxxii. 23) and to scrape off (Isai. vii. 20) and sweep away (Ps. xl. 15). כָּפֵי also stands after the word in the passages cited. Comp. iii. 18.—And eat flesh, an expression of contempt: throw all your sacrifices and burnt-offerings together and devour them as meat. Comp. vi. 20.

Vers. 22 and 23. For I spoke not . . . may be well with you. When the Rabbins emphasize in the day, etc., or when others appealing to Levit. i. 2, etc. find in this passage an indication of the voluntariness of the offerings, or at least of the view that only voluntary offerings are here spoken of, GRAF is certainly right in designating such points as subtleties. But to find in the passage a proof that Jeremiah was ignorant of any legal enactments with respect to sacrifices at the time of the Exodus, since in his time the middle books of the Pentateuch, which owed their origin to Ezra, were not in existence, as GRAF does, following IITZIG and others (comp. especially his latest work, On the historical books of the Old Test., Leipzig, 1866), is a proceeding for which there is no ground either in those books, in the writings of the preëxilic prophets generally (comp. only ex. gr., Am. iv. 5 with Levit. vii. 13; Hos. iv. 7-9 with Levit. vi. 18; xxvi. 26), or in this particular passage. For it is indeed true that the words that I may be your God and you my people (the substance of which is found in Exod. vi. 7 coll. Deut. xxix. 12) are a verbal quotation from the certainly peculiar 26th chapter of Leviticus (ver. 12), that the next line likewise resembles almost word for word Deut. v. 33 (the expression in all the ways occurs in this sense only in this passage of Deut.), finally that that it may be well with you also is exclusively Deuteronomic (v. 16, 26; vi. 18; xii. 25, 28; xxii. 27). But (1.) the book of Deuteronomy presupposes the preceding books of the Pentateuch and cannot be understood without them. Thus it is explained that precepts relating to the sacrifices do not here occur except in a summary (Deut. xii. 6, 11, 13, 14, 27) or modified form, according to the circumstances (comp. Deut. xii. 15 with Levit. xvii. 2 sqq.). (2) If this passage is to be understood in a literal sense, as by HIRTZIG and GRAF, the prophet would declare not only something incredible in itself, but also what would be in the highest degree prejudicial to the assumed post-exilic composition of the middle books of the Pentateuch. For how could these place the origin of the sacrificial enactments in the period of the exodus, if prophetic utterances like this and Am. v. 25 expressly contradict it? (3) As in Exod. xvi. 8 the words "Your murmurings are not against us, but against Jehovah," declare not that the Israelites did not murmur at all against Moses and Aaron (which is expressly maintained in ver. 2), but only that the sin of murmuring against Moses and Aaron vanished in comparison with the sin which they committed in their murmuring against the Lord Himself,—as Hos. vi. 6 likewise denies pleasure in sacrifices not absolutely but only relatively, in so far that it does not enter into comparison with the pleasure of the Lord in true piety (comp. Gen. xxxii. 29; lv. 8; 1 Sam. viii. 7)—so also in this passage the negation has a rhetorical, not a logical significance (comp. WINER, Gramm. N. T. Sprachidioms § 58, 7). Thus those commentators are right who find here this meaning, that the whole of the enactments relating to sacrifices do not enter into consideration in comparison with the importance of the moral Law. Comp. the parallel passages:—Isa. v. 11; lviii. 3 sqq.; lxvi. 3; 1 Sam. xv. 22; Mic. vi. 6-8; Ps. xl. 7 sqq.; Ps. l. 18, 19; Prov. xxi. 27; Matt. ix. 13. The expression: I will be your God and ye shall be my people, is found with special frequency in Jeremiah: xi. 4; xxiv. 7; xxx. 22; xxxi. 1, 33; xxxii. 38. VII. 29-34.

- 29 Shear off thy hair and cast it away,
And raise on the heights a wailing,
For Jehovah hath rejected and forsaken the generation of his wrath.
- 30 For the children of Judah have done that which is evil in my sight, saith Jehovah.
They have set their abominations in the house,
Which bears my name, to pollute it.
- 31 And they have built the high places of Tophet,
Which is in the valley of Ben-Hinnom.
To burn their sons and daughters in the fire;
Which I commanded not, neither did it come into my mind.
- 32 Therefore behold! the days are coming, saith Jehovah,
That it will no more be called Tophet and vale Ben-Hinnom,
But the valley of slaughter:
And they will bury in Tophet, because there is no room.

- 33 And the carcases of this people shall be for food
 To the birds of heaven and the beasts of earth,
 And there will be none to scare them away.
- 34 And I will cause to cease from this city of Judah,
 And from the streets of Jerusalem,
 The voice of gladness and the voice of joy,
 The voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride;
 For the land shall become a desolation.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

How little the appeal of the Israelites to the chosen place of mercy, and to their observance of the ritual, could help them (ver. 29) the prophet shows by setting forth their desecration of the sanctuary by Baal-worship, and their infraction of the Law by abominable practices which were directly forbidden in it (vers. 30, 31). Thus it is rendered most clearly manifest what shameful hypocrisy was concealed under the Jehovah-worship boasted of in ver. 4.

The rejection consequently announced in ver. 29 will consist in this, that the places in the vale of Hinnom hitherto considered sacred will be places of slaughter and burial, and that still a large number of unburied corpses will afford food for the beasts; the further consequence of which will be, that the land, bereft of its inhabitants, will become a barren waste (vers. 31-34).

Ver. 29. Shear off thy hair . . . generation of his wrath. קָצַר is properly crown: here it is used of the hair as the natural adornment of the head, comp. Numb. vi. 19. The cutting off of the hair was a sign of mourning, xvi. 6; xlviii. 37; Isa. xv. 2; Mic. i. 16, etc. Comp. HERZOG, Real-Enc. XVI., S. 363. [HENDERSON:—"Jerusalem is here addressed under the image of a female, who, in the depth of her grief for the loss of her children, deprives her head of its chief ornament, and betakes herself to the hills to bewail her bereavement." HENRY after BLAYNEY:—"The word is peculiar to the hair of the Nazarites, which was the badge and token of their dedication to God, and it is called their crown. Jerusalem had been a city, which was a Nazarite to God, but must now cut off her hair, must be profaned, degraded and separated from God, as she had been separated to Him. It is time for those who have lost their holiness to lay aside their joy."—S. R. A.]—On the feminine form in קָצַר , etc. Comp. NAEGLERSB. Gr., § 60, 7.—On the heights. Comp. iii. 21; ix. 9.—generation of his wrath. Comp. Isa. x. 6; Prov. xxii. 8.

Ver. 30. For the children of Judah . . . to pollute it.—in my sight, does not depend on have done, but on that which is evil. Comp. Jud. iii. 7, 12, etc., and NAEGLERSB. Gr., § 112, 5 b, (where moreover we must understand it in a physical sense [Isa. xiv. 16] as distinguished from the spiritual sense, Gen. xxviii. 8, etc.).—Their abominations. That Jeremiah refers to the abominable practices of Manasseh (2 Kings xxi. 4-7) has been fully proved by GRAF. I will only add that Jehoiakim represents the relapse into the principle forsaken by Josiah, and that this explains why responsibility for the sins of Manasseh is attributed to him and his contemporaries (2 Kings xxiv. 3; Jer. xv. 4), on which account also in this passage the abominations are spoken of as though they had been committed by Jehoiakim himself. This passage is repeated in xxxii. 34.

Ver. 31. And they have built . . . come into my mind. גְּבוּלֹת is not merely high places, but in a derivative sense every place of worship erected for idolatrous service, or every building for that purpose, as is proved by passages like 2 Kings xxiii. 15, where the גְּבוּלֹת is distinguished from the altar in it, and is burnt,—Ezek. xvi. 16, where high places are mentioned as composed of garments. Here also they are not the altars alone, but the places of worship with the altars. There appear to have been several such places in Tophet, this being intimated by the expression

$\text{בְּתוֹפֶת הַבְּנֵי־חִינּוֹם}$ Jer. xix. 13. Tophet, as is well known, was a place in the valley of Ben-Hinnom, where the horrible sacrifices of children (comp. SELDEN, De Düs Syr. Syntagm. I. 6) were offered to Baal (xix. 5—with which Molech, xxxii. 35, is parallel, comp. Levit. xviii. 21; xx. 2-5; 1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 10). But the derivation of the word is uncertain. Some (LORSBACH, GESEN., HITZIG, EWALD, FUERST, and others) appeal to Isa. xxx. 33 in favor of the rendering place of burning, deriving it from קָרַן = קָרַן to burn. Others (WINER, BÖTTCHER, GRAF, PRESSEL) finding their support in Job xvii. 6, give the word the meaning of sputum, abomination, horror, from the Chaldee קָרַן = to spew out. HOFMANN (in Weiss. u. Erf., II., 125) suggests the not improbable derivation from קָרַן and gives it the meaning of pit. A decision on this point is as difficult as with reference to the vale Ben-Hinnom. The situation of this valley is indeed fixed, as it is certain it was to the south of Jerusalem, but the views are various as to its exact location. Comp. Herzog, Real-Enc., IV. S. 710.—There is not perfect agreement even as to the name of the valley, the ancients regarding Hinnom as a proper name, of the moderns some deriving it from בְּנֵי־חִינּוֹם (by transposition=the valley of wailing, so HITZIG and GRAF), and others from בְּנֵי־חִינּוֹם (with the same meaning, so BÖTTCHER, De Inf., I. S. 82, 83). Were the valley only the vale of Hinnom, as in Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16; Neh. xi. 30, or the vale Beni-Hinnom (as in 2 Kings xxiii. 10 only, Chethibh) the appellative signification would have much in its favor. But as the name Vale Ben-Hinnom is the most frequent and certainly the original (Josh. xv. 8; xviii. 16; Jer. vii. 31, 32; xix. 2, 6; 2 Chr. xxxiii. 3; xxxiii. 6), the derivations given above are very insecure, and it is most advisable to retain the old interpretation.—To burn. Two passages coincide with this almost word for word: xix. 5 and xxxii. 35. In the latter passage, instead of this expression, we find to cause to pass through, which shows that it is not to be understood literally as Maimonides and other Jewish commentators suppose, but as an euphemism.—The words which I commanded not repeated in all three passages (comp. iii. 16), intimate that this custom was relatively a new one. Although the worship of Molech (the Ammonitish) is attributed even to Solomon (1 Kings xi. 7), yet the abomination of burning children was first introduced into Judah by Ahaz (2 Kings xvi. 3). Comp. MOVERS, Phœn. I., S. 327 sqq.—In the Pentateuch this cult was forbidden, Deut. xii. 30; xviii. 10.

Vers. 32-34. Therefore behold! the days are coming . . . a desolation. The place of worship, held sacred by the idolatrous Jews, but in fact desecrated, shall even for them be forever polluted. That this would be accomplished by a massacre on the spot, is not stated in the text. This would not have polluted it forever, as we read of Josiah that he polluted the places of idolatrous worship either by the burning of human bones (2 Ki. xxiii. 16, 20) or by filling them up with these (ver. 14) or the reverse, by strewing the ashes of the idols on the graves (ver. 6). At any rate he must have defiled Tophet (ver. 10) and other places (vers. 8, 13) in the same way. Here then also the pollution is caused by the interment, and the name "valley of slaughter" is connected with it only in so far that the vale is used as a place of burial only in consequence of the want of room, resulting from the great slaughter (comp. xix. 11; Ezek. ix. 7). But even thus a great number of corpses will remain unburied, which will be food for beasts (comp. Deut. xxviii. 26, whence ver. 33 is taken verbatim, and Jer. xvi. 4; xix. 7; xxxiv. 20).—None to scare, etc. Comp. Levit. xxvi. 6; Deut. xxviii. 26; Mic. iv. 4; Nah. ii. 12; Zeph. iii. 13; Jer. xxx. 10; xlvi. 27. The further result of the slaughter is depopulation, the cessation of every sign of normal human existence, complete desolation of the land. (xvi. 9; xxv. 10, 11, coll. xxxiii. 11). [HENDERSON:—"In ver. 34, reference is made to the joyous processions in which the bride and bridegroom are led through the streets, accompanied by bands of singers and musicians, which are common in many parts of the East, and even among the Jews in some parts of Europe. See my Biblical Researches and Travels in Russia, p. 217."—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

It is clear from the contents that this strophe is closely connected with the preceding. Death is to come in a new form, as it were, in those who

surface of the earth. Of the motive of the disinterment the prophet says nothing. He had certainly no idea of its being the search for booty (JEROME, HITZIG, [HENDERSON]). He has in mind only the punitive justice of God.—His before princes is to be referred to the kings, viz., the princes of each king or kingdom, or of the crown. Comp. xxiv. 8; xxv. 19; xxxiv. 21. We should have expected in reference to Judah their princes, as in Isai. iii. 4; Hos. vii. 16; ix. 15.—Spread them out. Observe the irony. DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On vii. 1. The exhortation which Jeremiah here addresses to his contemporaries is, as CHRYSSOSTOM remarks, substantially the same as that of John the Baptist to the Jews of his time: "Bring forth therefore fruits—meet for repentance, and begin not to say within yourselves, we have Abraham to our father; for I say unto you that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham." But there is a difference between trusting in descent from Abraham, and in the stone Sanctuary at Jerusalem. For as the tabernacle and the sanctuary at Shiloh have disappeared, so the temple built by Solomon and the ark of the covenant itself; and even the temple re-erected without the ark was destroyed a second time by Titus and not rebuilt, though according to the testimony of Josephus (Bell. Jud. VI. 2, 1) the mad resistance of the Jews was chiefly based on the idea that Jerusalem being the city of God was in no danger of destruction. Now while the sacred places and buildings for worship, from the tabernacle to the temple of Herod, were destroyed, never to be rebuilt (comp. iii. 16 לֹא יִבְנֶה עוֹד) the descent from Abraham, in spite of all temporary reversions, retains its eternal significance, as the Apostle Paul shows in Rom. xi., where he says, "If the first fruit be holy, the lump is also holy, and if the root be holy so are the branches. . . . If some of the branches have been broken off on account of unbelief, yet they may be grafted in again. . . . For according to the Gospel, he says, I regard them as enemies, but according to the election, they are beloved for the fathers' sake. For the gifts and calling of God are without repentance." If now to trust in descent from Abraham is in so far foolish and unjustifiable, as it does not prevent partial destruction of the nation, to trust in the outward sanctuary, constructed of earthly material, is still less justifiable, for this has no guarantee of continuance; it may indeed suffer total destruction without endangering the foundations of the theocracy. Just as unjustifiable as this confidence of the Jews in an earthly sanctuary as the chosen place of divine presence and blessing is every analogous confidence of the Christian church in a real or supposed divinely chosen earthly substratum of tokens of blessing, whether it be a place, office or race. All the places consecrated by the presence of the Lord and the ministry of His apostles have been destroyed and given up to the abomination of desolation: Jerusalem with the Mt. of Olives and Golgotha, Bethlehem, Nazareth, the whole of Palestine, Asia Minor and Greece, became Christian and yet fell a prey to the crescent. All the less may Rome count on perpetuity, since the chair of Peter rests not on divine but on arbitrary human institution. So also the legitimate ruling families of Europe, who so fondly imagine, that they are irrevocably chosen, should never forget that the Lord not only appoints but deposes kings. (Comp. Dan. iv. 32; v. 21).

2. PETRUS GALATINUS (d. Arc. cath. ver. v. 10) remarks (according to GUISLER.) that some Rabbins refer the lying word of the thrice repeated יִבְנֶה to the false hope of those who suppose that a third temple will yet be built. But this hope is not a false one. It certainly will not be realized in the erection of a third sanctuary of stone but in that spiritual body of which we must regard Ezekiel's temple as the type. Comp. BALMER-RINCK, on the prophet Ezekiel's vision of the temple, Basel, 1858, and my review of this work in Reut. Rep. 1860, H. III. S. 151, 2. This is not of course to say that the thrice repeated word does not really refer to the third temple.

3. "If God has not His temple and abode in the heart, that (viz., that thou hast an outward temple or house of God) will avail thee nothing." Mic. iii. 11, 12. STARKE.

4. "The words 'this is the Lord's temple' might properly be written on the hearts of believers," 1 Cor. iii. 16; Gen. xxviii. 17. STARKE.

5. "It is a heathenish delusion and false confidence to suppose that God is bound to any place or spot, as the Trojans thought because they had the temple of Pallas in their city it could not be taken, and in the present day the manner of the Papists is to bind Christ to Rome and the chair of Peter, and then defiantly maintain 'I shall never be moved' (Ps. x. 6). For, they say, the ship of Peter may sink a little, but not altogether. Then the only point that is deficient is this, that they are not the ship of Peter, but rather an East Indian man with a cargo of Indian apes and such like foreign merchandise, pearls, purple, silk, brass, iron, silver, gold, incense, lead, that they may carry on simony and make merchandise of religion, and deceive the whole world (Rev. xviii. 11 sqq.)." CRAMER.

6. On vii. 9-11. Necessary as the doctrine of the church is in the organic system of Christian doctrine it may become dangerous, if the church is regarded one-sidedly as an objectively saving-institution, and the subjective conditions of its operation are undervalued. For then it is regarded as alone necessary to salvation, and not only in the sense that this virtue is ascribed exclusively to one particular church in opposition to another, but also in the sense of supposing that the church alone, as an objective institution, is the means of salvation, a man needing to do nothing more than to enter into a passive relation to the church, i. e., without conscious resistance (obex). From this alone saving church there is but one step to the infallibly saving, i. e., to that, of which a passive member cannot be lost, however much he may steal, murder, commit adultery, swear falsely, etc. Where this ruinous delusion prevails men enter the church, perform the ceremonies, wipe their mouths, and say salvi sumus (וַיִּצְלָחוּ). But thus the church of Christ becomes a den of robbers.

7. On vii. 16. "This may serve to comfort you, for God thus testifies to the power of prayer, that it would stand in His way so that He could not go on. Therefore He had first of all to forbid the prophet from praying. Thus also He says to Moses (Exod. xxxii. 10) 'Let Me alone that My wrath may burn against them.' So much may a believing prayer accomplish." CRAMER.

8. On vii. 22, 23. In Ps. li. 16, 17, we read "For thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it: thou delightest not in burnt-offering. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise." Had sacrifices and burnt-offerings been positively displeasing to God, He would have forbidden them. But they must have been pleasing to Him even as types of the sacrifice on Golgotha. They displease Him only when He is to accept them instead of a broken and contrite heart. The sacrifices have thus a two-fold significance; objectively as types, and in so far as God beholds in every sacrifice that of Christ, they are pleasing to Him—subjectively, as the offering of man. But when in this relation God is to be satisfied with the fat and blood of an animal instead of the spiritual oblatio cordis, the sacrifice is displeasing. Thus as the sacrifice is on the one hand pleasing, on the other displeasing, Jeremiah might say that God did not speak of sacrifices, though on the other hand it is admitted, that He did speak of them.

9. On vii. 26. "It is an evil consolation, and one of the greatest exercises of the witnesses, when they are treated with such indifference, that they are not opposed, but also receive no real attention. Then is Satan most firmly seated, and his business best established when he has induced such a state of indifference. Phlegm in religion, patience in hearers (a sign that they are inured to blows) is an incurable evil. So long as they are calumniated, persecuted, mocked, the witnesses still have a handle. But the time, when one preaches and no one rises, is a miserable epoch for the ministry. Yet it must be endured, for it is either not general or a teacher is usually free. For because the Lord 'spews out of His mouth' such men and such times of lethargy are heralds of the overflowing of the divine judgments, and especially of the removal of the candlestick from its place, there is generally a new period for the teachers, and they become elsewhere a great nation (Exod. xxxii. 10)" ZINZENDORF.

10. On vii. 33. "Charitati Christiane et legi nature consentaneum est, ut hominum cadavera terra obruantur, unde Augustinus (De Civ. D. I. 13); non contemnenda et abjicienda sunt corpora justorum et fidelium, quibus tanquam organis et vasis suis ad omnia bona opera spiritus sanctus fuit usus." FÖRSTER.

It is essentially a community of saints and true believers. ("Congregatio sanctorum et vere erudentium." Conf. Aug. Art. VIII.) 2. Its existence is manifested, a. in the holy walk of its members (vers. 3, 5, 6); b. in the blessings of the Divine presence (vers. 3 and 7).

3. On vii. 8. [HENRY:—"The privileges of a form of godliness are often the pride and confidence of those that are strangers and enemies to the power of it. It is common for those that are furthest from God to boast themselves most of their being near to the church."—S. R. A.]

4. On vii. 8-15. An earnest warning against merely external ecclesiasticism. I. Its essence is: false confidence in the unconditional saving efficacy of a supposed or real sanctuary (vers. 8, 10). II. Its consequences are: 1. Demoralization (vers. 9, 10). 2. Desecration of the holy (ver. 11). 3. Destruction of the offenders (vers. 12-15).

5. On vii. 16. On Intercession. 1. When it is not in place (compare this verse with 1 John v. 16). 2. When it is in place. 3. What it can accomplish.

It is an ill omen for a people when God restrains the spirits of His ministers and people from praying for them. (4). Those that will not regard good ministers' preaching cannot expect any benefit by their praying. If you will not hear us when we speak from God to you, God will not hear us when we speak to Him for you."—S. R. A.]

6. On vii. 18. [HENRY:—"Let us be instructed even by this bad example in the service of our God. (1) Let us honor Him with our substance. (2) Let us not decline the hardest service, nor disdain to stoop to the meanest, for none shall kindle a fire on God's altar for naught. (3) Let us bring up our children in the acts of devotion; let them, as they are capable, be employed in doing something toward the keeping up of religious exercises."—S. 7. On vii. 22, 23. Of the true service of God. I. Its nature (1) not outward ceremonies, but (2) walk according to the divine commands. II. Its reward. (1) will be your God, that it may be well with you).

8. On vii. 24-29. Of disobedience to God's word. I. Its cause is, (1) not neglect on the part of God to make known His word to men (ver. 25). (2) Not the imperfect performance of his duties by the preacher (ver. 27) but (3) the hardness of men's hearts, who (a) walk only after the thoughts of their heart, and therefore (b) do not hear, do not believe, (ver. 28) do not wish to improve. II. Its consequence is (1) increasing moral corruption (vers. 24, 26) and (2) rejection on the part of God (ver. 29).

9. On vii. 25-28. The sad characteristics of an unbelieving epoch. 1. Contempt of the preaching of the divine word. 2. Stiff-neckedness in respect to the visitations of divine chastisement. 3. Increase of wickedness in spite of all the warnings of the past. (LUC. CLAUS.)—When is a people ripe for destruction? 1. When it despises the visitations of divine grace (ver. 25).

2. When it hardens itself in unbelief against God's word and voice (vers. 26 and 27). 3. When in spite of the divine judgment it departs the more into sin (vers. 26, 28).—The people Israel a warning example for the present race in view of the prevailing unbelief of the times. Their example is admonitory, 1. with respect to their ingratitude for God's gracious visitations; 2. with respect to their opposition to the true friends of the nation; 3. with respect to their frivolity in view of inevitable destruction. (DR. GR.)—Let the remembrance of our calling serve to awaken us. To this end let us consider. 1. What is our calling? 2. How does the Lord call us? 3. How long does He call us? 4. 7 Even the stork in the air knoweth his seasons,
The turtle-dove, swallow and crane keep the time of their coming,
But my people know not the judgment of Jehovah.
8 How say ye then, We are wise,
And the law of Jehovah is with us?
Behold! surely the lying style of the writer has brought forth only lies.
9 The wise men are put to shame,
Confounded and taken are they.
Behold! they have despised Jehovah's word,
What wisdom,⁷ however, is among them?
10 Therefore⁸ will I give their wives to others,
Their fields to the conquerors,
For from the least to the greatest they are all bent on gain;
From the prophet to the priest they all practise deceit,
11 And healed the hurt of the daughter of my people most slightly,
Saying, Peace, peace! when there is no peace.

- 12 They are put to shame, for they have committed abomination;
Yet they blush not, nor understand to be ashamed.
Therefore shall they fall with the falling,
At the time of their visitation will they be overthrown,
Saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—הִפְלוּ. The indefinite subject in Hebrew may be expressed as here by the 3d pers. of the plural or of the singular. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 101, 2.—On the disjunctive question comp. Gr. § 107, 4. [BLAYNEY, NOYES, UMBREIT, etc. render as in the text: HENDERSON has: Shall they fall; but incorrectly, for as HIRZIG says, the Jews cannot be the subject in ver. 4.—S. R. A.]

² Ver. 5.—שׁוּבָה (not שׁוּבָה, xxxi. 21; xlix. 4, nor שׁוּבָה, iii. 14, 22) is to be regarded according to EWALD, § 188 b, as a verbal form, and in a directly causative sense = to make a turn. Comp. rems. on xxxi. 21.—THIS PEOPLE is not in the relation of a genitive to the following JERUSALEM, as is evinced by the form, but the latter is in simple apposition to the former. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 66. [HENDERSON: this people of Jerusalem.]

⁴ Ver. 5.—תְּרָמִית (comp. xiv. 14, Keri; xxiii. 23; Zeph. iii. 13; Ps. cxix. 113) must here according to the connection be rendered in a passive sense = error.

⁵ Ver. 6.—כִּלְה־ is literally: its entirety. From the singular suffix we perceive that the nation is regarded as a single individual. Comp. EWALD, § 286, e.

⁷ Ver. 9.—הַכְּמָתָה [lit.: the wisdom of what?] sapientia cuius? Comp. xlv. 23; Gen. xxiv. 33; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 65, 2, b.

⁸ Ver. 9.—[“The LXX. omit these three verses with the exception of the first two lines of the 10th. The repetitious character of many parts of the book of Jeremiah leaves no reason to doubt that the repetition here of chap. vi. 12-15 is genuine. Theodotion and the Hexaplar Syriac supply the omission of the LXX.” HENDERSON.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The second point in the charge concerns the impenitent obduracy with which the people, true to their often censured character (comp. Exod. xxxii. 9; xxxiii. 3, 5; xxxiv. 9; Deut. ix. 6, 13; x. 16; xxxi. 27 coll. Jer. v. 3; Isai. xlvi. 4; Ezek. ii. 4; iii. 7) persist in the perverse course they have adopted (vers. 4-7). To be sure they will not admit that they have adopted a false course. They maintain on the contrary (comp. vii. 21 sqq.) that they are in the right way, because they are not lacking in instruction or knowledge of the law of God (ver. 8). But the prophet does not allow this to pass. He traces their imagined wisdom to the deception of their false leaders, of whom he predicts that with their pseudo-sophy they must be put to shame (ver. 9), and then he again announces to all in the words of a former discourse the judgment of God for their manifold wickedness (vers. 10-12). This strophe contains the main thought of this chapter, i. e., of the second part. The two following strophes describe only the particular features of the punishment.

Vers. 4, 5. And say to them . . . wish not to return. The simple introduction by and say shows that what follows is closely connected with the preceding. The meaning of שׁוּב is here, the first time to turn, to make any kind of a turn (comp. Josh. xix. 12, etc.), the second time to return.—It is evident that the prophet had hoped that Israel would have returned in view of his previous representations. No one who falls remains lying on the ground, and no one perseveres in the course he has taken without turning to one side or another, how then is it that Israel so obstinately persists in his perverse ways?

The answer is given in ver. 6. By the manner in which the prophet emphasizes the idea of turning we are forcibly reminded of iii. 1-4; iv.—Wish not to return, comp. v. 3; Hos. xi. 5.

Ver. 6. I inclined myself . . . stallion in the battle. It is best to regard this as an answer to the question why? in ver. 5. In order to be able to give the Lord a correct answer, the prophet listens. For thus he may be able to learn the true secret thoughts of their hearts. The information he thus obtains is not comforting; from their speeches he learns only the radically corrupt condition of their hearts, closed against all knowledge of the right. Hence their obduracy.—They do not speak that which is right, i. e., they not only are silent with respect to the right, but they speak that which is not right, which is false. Comp. Gen. xlii. 11, 19, 31, 33, 34, and Exod. x. 29; 2 Ki. vii. 9; Prov. xv. 7; Isai. xvi. 6; Jer. xxiii. 10; xlvi. 30.—Their conduct corresponds to their words; there is none who repents.—שׁוּב stands in opposition to the שׁוּב desired in vers. 4 and 5, with a certain irony; they are not wanting in שׁוּב turn, but they practise it only in the sense se avertere. This they certainly pursue with the greatest ardor. They turn away in their entirety.—in their courses. The plural form is explained by the collective idea of the noun, to which all refers. This plural gives a satisfactory sense, and it is therefore unnecessary to alter it as the Keri does according to xxiii. 10. As to the meaning: the word in 2 Sam. xviii. 27 has the meaning of violent running, hunting, chasing. This meaning is suitable to Jer. xxii. 17; xxiii. 10, and is also demanded by the connection here. They turn them in this sense, that with violent haste they pursue their chosen path.

Ver. 7. Even the stork . . . the judgment of Jehovah. What תִּסְדֵּר is, is very uncertain, since the distinctive marks mentioned in Old Testament passages (Levit. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18; Ps. civ. 17; Job xxxix. 13; Zech. v. 9) suit several birds, on which account (apart from the fact that the LXX. translate sometimes ἐπὶ οὐρα, sometimes ἐρωδιός or πελεκάν, the Targumists and Talmudists תִּסְדֵּרָא תִּסְדֵּרָא milvus albus, vide Buxtorf, Lex. Chald., p. 528) modern commentators are divided between "heron" (So Borchart, Gesen., Rosenm., Fuerst in his concordance, Ewald, Meier, and others) and "stork" (Winer, Fuerst Lex., Graf and others). Since the derivation from תִּסְדֵּר pius is the most natural and the designation of the stork as avis pia is very general (comp. ἀντιπελαργεῖν, although in single cases the filial piety of the heron is also celebrated, ELLAN, Anim. III. 23), I give my preference in this instance to the meaning stork. — הֶרֶב is the turtle-dove. That it is migratory in the East (comp. the American migratory pigeon) may be inferred also from Song of Sol. ii. 11, 12. Comp. Winer, R. W. B. s. v.—וְכֹסֵם וְעִגְוֹר. The meaning of these words is uncertain. Both words occur besides only in Isai. xxxviii. 14.—There it reads וְעִגְוֹר בְּנֵי אֲזַפְפָּאִי There the asyndeton is in favor of rendering עִגְוֹר as the predicate or in apposition to כֹּסֵם, but in the present passage the ׀ is opposed to it. Neither the dialects nor the early translators and commentators afford us any secure data. In order to deal fairly with both passages, we must take one of the two words in a sense which would allow it to be rendered both as in opposition and as an independent word, as, for example, we may say felis leo or felis et leo. Perhaps כֹּסֵם (for which the Keri and Palestinian could read כִּסֵּם) is an onomatopoeicum or imitation of the natural sound (Venetian Zysilia = swallow. Vide Rosenm.) and in this sense the name of the genus and species at the same time (comp. felis-felis). At any rate the prophet wishes to say that the irrational animals punctually obey the natural law which prescribes their return into a certain country, while Israel seems not even to know the rule instituted by Jehovah for their moral action.—But my people. Comp. Isai. i. 3; Jer. v. 4, 5.

Ver. 8. How say ye then . . . only lies. To the charge at the close of ver. 7 the prophet supposes the people to reply: We are wise, etc.; just as what is said in vii. 21 sqq., presupposes an appeal of the people to their observance of the ceremonial law, so here also the assertion is put into their mouth that they were well instructed in the law. It may be inquired whether תִּכְכְּמִים is here used in a general sense, or whether it contains an allusion to those who from the age of Solomon constituted a particular class of the supporters and promoters of culture by the side of the priests and prophets. (Comp. Barcn, Weisheits-Lehre der Hebräer, Strassb., 1851, S. 48). Jeremiah himself (xviii. 18) names wise men together with priests and prophets. But Ezekiel in the parallel passage vii. 26, uses elders for wise men, and generally it might be difficult to prove that in Jeremiah and elsewhere, (especially in Prov. i. 6; xiii. 20; xv. 12; xxii.

17; xxiii. 24), they appear as a special class and not rather as specially gifted men of every class and calling, as Solomon also was a תִּכְכֵּם, and with him men of the priestly and levitical orders (1 Ki. v. 9-11). Observe also that it is said not: wise men are among us, but, wise men are we.—That הֶרֶב must designate the Torah in the sense of the Pentateuch cannot be maintained, for the word occurs frequently in a more general signification, ex. gr., Isai. ii. 3; viii. 16. Certainly the word would have to be rendered in the narrower sense if hemistich 2 were to be translated: truly (אֲכַן comp. iii. 23; iv. 10) the lying style of the scribes has made it a lie. But on the other hand 1, to supply the suffix is not a matter of course, as it must be if the want of the suffix (which is certainly frequent, comp. Nægelsb. Gr., § 78, 2, Ann.) is to appear justified. 2, כֹּפְרִים, scribes in the sense of those who spin a web of human inventions around the word of God is of later date. Ezra, as is well known, was the first כֹּפֵר (comp. Ezra vii. 6, 11) but not in a bad sense, for the evil practices of the scribes were only a corruption of the praiseworthy labors commenced by him (comp. Herzog, R.-Enc. XIII. S. 733, etc.) Since the verb עָשָׂה is decidedly used in an absolute sense = to make, to work, (Exod. v. 9; xxxi. 4; 1 Ki. v. 30; xx. 40; Ruth ii. 19; Prov. xiii. 16; xxxi. 13) this passage can mean only: behold! he has worked for a lie, i. e., has done lying work, the pen of the scribe has produced lies. Scribes indeed occur almost up to the time of Jeremiah only as State-officials (Judges v. 14; 2 Sam. viii. 17; xx. 25; 2 Ki. xii. 11; xix. 2, etc.), but Baruch also is called a scribe (Jer. xxxvi. 26, 32), and since the canonical writings set before us the picture of a literary activity in a good sense, why may they not also have given us one in a bad sense? False prophets labored with their word in opposition to the word of the true prophets, why might they not do the same with their writings? Jeremiah here presupposes a literary activity which designated its productions as the directions of Jehovah, but not in truth. For what was thus written in the name of Jehovah, and doubtless with an appeal to the law, was human invention and lies. Comp. Isai. x. 1.

Ver. 9. The wise men are put to shame . . . what wisdom however is among them? The prophet for every "abuse of the name of God" declares the divine punishment. They are put to shame with their teaching and prophecy. The false scribes had evidently flattered the people and promised them good days to come. (Comp. infra ver. 11, and vi. 14; xxiii. 9; Ezek. xiii.). The contrary, says Jeremiah, will be the case, to their shame and their hurt.—Put to shame, comp. on ii. 26.—The wise here are not identical with those to whom the predicate wise is applied in ver. 8. For while the latter refers to all Israel, the former refers only to the scribes. These are called wise men, not because they formed a special class, but because they boasted of special insight into religious things.—Confounded, etc. Comp. xlviii. 1; i. 2. Because they have despised the word of the Lord and substituted their own wisdom, it will come to the light that they know nothing.

Vers. 10-12. Therefore will I give their wives . . . saith Jehovah. These verses refer not to the false prophets alone but to all those previously mentioned in common. They announce both to the whole people, who were addressed in vers. 4-7, and to their perverse leaders, to whom vers. 8 and 9 refer, their common, public, and outwardly palpable punishment, and in so far form the necessary conclusion of the strophe. This announcement is made in the form of a quotation, these three verses being a repetition of vi. 12-15. As it is the leaders of the people, the priests and prophets who are there spoken of (vi. 13-15), the verses suit this place very well, particularly as ver. 11, and healed, etc., so well proves the shaming of the false prophets (ver.

9). But nevertheless we see that this passage is a quotation and is not here in its original position. For ver. 10 is a contracted form of vi. 12, 13. Here also the sequence of thought is not quite correct, the causal ׀ following the illative particle לִכְנֹף. But that a copyist did not transpose the passages, but the prophet himself repeated with freedom his former utterance, is seen from the little alterations which betray a reproduction from memory as well as the hand of an author making free use of his own property, in vers. 10, 11, 12 (comp. x. 15; xi. 23; xxiii. 12, etc.). On the repetitions in Jeremiah see the table in NAEGELSB.: Jer. u. Bab. S. 128.—Comp. besides the excellent refutation of HIRTZIG's view as to the interpolation of this passage in GRAF, S. 135.

2. Further portrayal of the visitation announced in ver.

VIII. 13-17.

- 13 I will sweep¹ them utterly away, saith Jehovah.
There were no grapes on the vine,
No figs on the fig-tree,
The land was withered.—
So I gave to them² those who shall overrun them.
- 14 "What is then the ground on which we remain?
Assemble, let us go into the fortified cities and perish³ there?
For Jehovah, our God, has allowed us to perish
And given us water of poison to drink;
For we have sinned against Jehovah.
- 15 We hoped⁴ for blessing but no good came—
For a time of healing,⁵ and behold terror!"
- 16 From Dan is heard the snorting of his horses,
At the sound of the neighing of his stallions the whole earth trembles.
And they came and devoured the land and what was in it,
The city and those that dwelt therein.
- 17 For behold, I send among you serpents,
Basilisks, against which no charm avails,—
These shall bite you, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 13.—אֶסְפֹּף אֹתָם, אֶסְפֹּף, אֶסְפֹּף from סָפַף desinere, Hiph. finem imponere, consumere. As in הָיָה at the same time the idea of storm is contained (comp. סָפַף, procella) this compound evidently signifies to sweep away in a storm. The connection of two verbs, having roots of different or similar sound, in this construction frequently occurs. Comp. מִלְוִי. 9; Isai. xxviii. 28, and especially Zeph. i. 2, 3; where we find the same connection as in this passage (NAEGELSB. Gr., § 93, d. Ann.) The Hiph. אֶסְפֹּף occurs only in these three passages.

² Ver. 13.—The ancient rendering, occurring in the Chaldee and Syriac: and I recompensed to them that which they transgressed, is harsh and opposed especially by the difficulty of thus satisfactorily explaining the suffix.—The explanation preferred by most modern commentators: and I give them up to those who come over them—has against it, (1) that אֶתְּנֶנּוּ must be made into אֶתְּנֶנּוּ which besides is not a normal construction, comp. the remarks on יוֹצִיאֵן ver. 1; (2) that לָהֶם must be translated not "to them" but "to those," (3) that the suffix must be supplied to אֶתְּנֶנּוּ, which, as was remarked on עֲשֵׂה, can only take place where this supplementation is a matter of course.

⁵ Ver. 15.—מְרַפֵּא instead of מְרַפֵּא. Comp. ver. 11.

This strophe is entirely occupied with the further portrayal of the visitation which is announced in ver. 12. The object of the discourse, the visitation, appears under various images, according to the use of literal or figurative language. The speakers are also changed several times. First the Lord announces that He will sweep them away in the storm as unfruitful withered plants. Then they must themselves announce that they wish to flee into the fortified cities but without the hope of escape. For they themselves feel and express that they bear their death within them, as it were, the Lord Himself having given them poison-water as a punishment for their sins, and instead of healing they find (in the cities) only terror. (Vers. 14, 15). For they already perceive the approach of the enemy from the North (ver. 16 a), which the prophet confirms, describing in blunt words the sad end as already begun (ver. 16 b). At last the Lord Himself again speaks, and returning to the figurative mode of speech compares the threatening enemies with serpents of the poisonous kind, for whose bite there is no remedy (ver. 17).

Ver. 13. I will sweep them . . . overrun them. In what follows the motive of this punishment is presented. Israel is an unfruitful vine and fig-tree, a withered branch. The same figure in Ps. i. 3; Jer. xvii. 7; Isai. i. 30; v. 2; Mic. vii. 1; Luke xiii. 8.—I regard the words I will sweep them utterly away as a general statement of what follows. In this the Lord Himself accounts for the genesis of this declaration. He relates that he instituted an investigation, the result of which was that Israel was like an unfruitful, withered tree. In consequence of this He determined that they should be swept away by a storm: then I gave to them those who shall overrun them. (Comp. Isai. viii. 8; Dan. xi. 10, and Jer. v. 22; xxiii. 9). In overrun is evidently an allusion to whirlwind, to which sweep points, and the verse forms a sort of circle, the end returning to the beginning. The plural overrun intimates that in reality a number of persons would represent this storm. Comp. ver. 16.—The certainly peculiar expression וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ for then I appointed for them, hung over them, is explained by supposing that the prophet intended a play upon the words הַתַּנִּים הַמְּאֵנָה.

Vers. 14, 15. What is then the ground on which we remain? . . . and behold terror. The people themselves relate how that which was determined in the secret counsels of Providence was actually carried out. The prophet portrays how the people, seized by the foreboding of threatening destruction, felt themselves insecure in their abodes, and concluded to flee to the fortified cities. לָמָּה causal = why? Comp. ix. 11; Job xiii. 14. Yet I would take לָמָּה at the same time as local: on what? on what insecure ground are we sitting? I endeavored to express this double sense in the translation.—Assemble, etc., taken verbatim from iv. 5. The people thus do something to which the Lord had previously summoned them by His prophet, but to follow this advice now will not avail, since they so long openly transgressed the holy will of God, as revealed in His law. In all their measures for flight they have this consciousness: there is no help, we are already lost.—And perish there. Not to be saved, but only to perish somewhat later, to obtain a little respite, do they flee to the cities.—For Jehovah, etc. They know that their destruction is already determined upon, and that they bear death, as it were, in their bodies into the cities. This is the sense of given us water of poison, etc. Comp. ix. 14; xxiii. 15, and xxv. 15, 17; Lam. iii. 15; Ps. lx. 5. On וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ comp. וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ, R. W. B., s. v. Gift.—Vain therefore is also the hope, which they still maintain, because every man hopes while he lives. This passage is repeated in xiv. 19.

Ver. 16. From Dan . . . that dwelt therein. Hemistich a states the cause of the terror, again referring to a former declaration (iv. 16; vi. 22, 23). It appears that these words belong still to the speech of the Israelites, at least these may thus speak, since the words contain only the description of what was then perceived. But hemistich b describes the future as though it had already taken place. This could be done only by the prophet; וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ are therefore prophetic aorists. Comp. NAGELSB. Gr. § 88, 5. [GREEN'S Gr. § 262, 4.—S. R. A.]—The prophet interposes with and they came, etc., to say that the terror was not an empty one, but that the enemy thus announced had really come. The singular suffixes refer to the enemy represented as a single person. Comp. iv. 13.—וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ of horses, xlvi. 3; l. 11.

Ver. 17. For behold, I send . . . saith Jehovah. The discourse is now again figurative and Jehovah speaks Himself, as in the beginning of the strophe, ver. 13. We might compare a strophe like this with the variations of a musical theme. The more frequently the theme changes its form, the more impression does it make, the more ways of entrance are opened to it. That this verse has the character of a conclusion is seen, (a) from the return to the beginning, (b) from the climax, which is expressed in the figure of serpents inaccessible to all charms. This contains the idea of the most intensive destruction, excluding all possibility of healing. Since this is the main thought of the verse וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ is best referred to ver. 16, b.:—Thus is it, for, etc. The Lord Himself confirms the words of the prophet. This verse has moreover a striking resemblance to Gen. xlix. 17, and it would not be impossible that the prophet, reminded by the mention of Dan of the prophecy concerning him, makes use of the images there employed for his description of the enemy coming from Dan.—וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ (Isai. xi. 8; lix. 5; Prov. xxiii. 32) and וְיִתְּנֶנּוּ (Isai. xiv. 29) so called probably a shilardo (so GES. THES., FEUERST, DRECHSLER) are regarded by most modern commentators, following in this Aquila and the Vulgate (the LXX. vary) as the basilisk, a small, exceedingly poisonous kind of viper. On no charm, etc., comp. Ps. lviii. 5, 6, [4, 5].

3. Continuation: The visitation ends with the carrying away captive of Israel, to the inexpressible grief of the people and of the prophet.

VIII. 18-23.

- 18 O my comfort¹ in the sorrow!
My heart within me is faint.
19 Hark! a cry of my people from distant² lands:
"Is Jehovah not in Zion, or her king not in her?"
"Why have they provoked me to anger with their images,
With their foreign vanities?"
20 "The harvest is past, the fruit-gathering is over,
And we are not saved!"
21 For the wound of the daughter of my people am I wounded,³
I go mourning; horror hath seized me.
22 Is there no balsam in Gilead?
Is there no physician there?
Why then proceeds not the healing of the daughter of my people?
23 O that mine head were waters,⁴
And mine eye a fountain of tears,
That I might weep day and night
For the slain of the daughter of my people!

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 18.—כְּבִלְיָת is ἀπαῖς λει.—The radix כָּלַן illuminate, beam upon, (in Arabic of the rising sun) occurs only in Hiphil: Am. v. 9; Ps. xxxix. 13; Job ix. 27; x. 2. It is formed like כְּרִבְיָת (multitude, fulness, increase, Levit. xxiii. 37), כְּרִיעָת (pastio, flock, Jer. xxiii. 1), כְּעֵפִית (copy, Numb. xxxiii. 52). Comp. OLSL. § 218, a. The meaning is therefore: beaming, enlightening, exhilaration. [HENDERSON renders: my exhilaration within me is sorrow. NOYES, with a better sense: O where is consolation for my sorrow?—S. R. A.] The construction with עָל (comp. Am. v. 9) appears to be founded on the radical meaning, O beam on sorrow! The suffix of the first person refers to the whole, which is to be regarded as a single conception, in like manner as in וְרִבְבָן עֵינַי, comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 63, 4, g. According to the Keri, and even according to the Chethibh of several codices of KENNICOTT and DE ROSSI we should read כְּבִלְיָתִי in two words, which reading the LXX. seem to follow (καὶ ἐξοῦται ὑμᾶς ἀνιάτα μετ' ὀδύνης) yet without its being possible to give to this כְּבִלְיָת a satisfactory meaning. For many other explanations, comp. ROSENUELLER.

² Ver. 19.—The form כְּרִיעָת is found besides only in Isai. xxxiii. 17.

³ Ver. 21.—הַשְּׁפָר־הֶחֱפָר Hophi. here only. The Niph in this sense is frequent, cx. gr., Jer. xxiii. 9.

⁴ [Ver. 23.—In the A. V. this verse is ix. 1, but not in the Hebrew.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe, in which the nameless grief of the prophet at the destruction of his people is expressed in simple but highly poetical words, serves for the elucidation and completion of the previous one. In that the manner of the destruction, which the Northern enemy was to inflict, was not distinctly designated; at the most ver. 13 contained a dim intimation of a threatening captivity. That this will be the punishment of the people, is now distinctly expressed in this strophe. In deep sorrow (ver. 18); the prophet tells us that he has heard from distant lands the mournful question of his people, whether Jehovah is no longer in Zion (ver. 19, a). To this the answer of the Lord is: This is the punishment of idolatry (ver. 19, b).—New lamentation of the people: respite after respite and no salvation! (Ver. 20).—Finally the wailing of the prophet: the cause of his sorrow is the misery of his people (ver. 21) being hopeless (ver. 22), wherefore nothing remains for the prophet but to bewail this misery with endless weeping (ver. 23). Observe also in this strophe the dramatic character of the change in persons.

Ver. 18. O my comfort . . . is faint. Comp. the TEXT. AND GRAM. rems.—In the words within me is contained the idea of the heavy heart, which is felt as an oppression or burden. Comp. Ps. xlii. 6, 7, 12; xliii. 5; cxlii. 4; coll. xxxix. 4; Lam. i. 20.

Ver. 19. Hark! a cry . . . foreign vanities. The prophet beholds Israel in exile. Their eyes are still turned towards Zion as the chosen abode of the God of Israel (comp. Ps. xiv. 7; xx. 3; cxxviii. 5; cxxiv. 3; Isai. xxxvii. 32, etc.) but it appears that He has forsaken it. Comp. Mic. iv. 9.—This painful question is answered by the Lord Himself, who continues and accounts for this impression. The expression provoked to anger with their images reminds us of Dent. xxxii. 21; 1 Ki. xvi. 13, 26. Comp. Jer. xiv. 22; Ps. xxxi. 7.

Ver. 20. The harvest is passed . . . not saved. Period after period elapses without help coming (comp. Isai. lix. 9). Without observing ver. 19, a, or the time when this discourse was composed, most of the ancient commentators refer these words to the vain expectation of Egyptian help, which presupposes 2 Ki. xxiv. 1; or to that which is expressly announced in Jer. xxxvii. 5. On the other hand SCHEUBNER correctly remarks that the expression has somewhat of a proverbial character. Even those who are in exile still hope, as is also intimated in ver. 19 b, but still in vain.

Vers. 21, 22. For the wound . . . the daughter of my people.—I go mourning. Comp. iv. 28; xiv. 2. The prophet is inwardly broken, and to this corresponds his outward appearance.—The prophet tells us in ver. 22 why the wound of his people causes him so much pain: it is not only a very dangerous one, as is clear from all that precedes, but also, which is the worst, no one heals it. It is as though Gilead no longer possessed any balsam, or any man skilful in the application of it, though the balsam was especially, according to Pliny (Hist. Nat., XII. 54) exclusively, to be found in Palestine. The question: "Is there no balsam," etc., has then the meaning: Is Israel wanting in that which was given to him in preference to all other nations? It is plain that the prophet here alludes to the relation of Israel to Jehovah, as the peculiar "glory of the land." (Gen. xliii. 11, song = best fruits, of the land). Whether רִיחַ is precisely the resin of the balsam-plant, which elsewhere is called דִּשְׁשֵׁן, דִּשְׁשֵׁן, or דִּשְׁשֵׁן, is uncertain. Comp. WILNER, R. W. B. s. v. Balsam. It is mentioned as a remedy also in Jer. xlii. 11; li. 8, as an article of commerce, Gen. xliii. 11; Ezek. xxvii. 17.—Is there no physician there? GRAF would not refer there to Gilead, because it is not known that physicians were fetched from thence. But we may well suppose that in the land of the balsam the use of it was best understood. The prophet therefore wishes only to say: Is there then in Israel, where the true medicina salutis is found, no one who understands how to make the application of it? He silently answers this question in the negative, and gives the reason for it in what follows.—The healing. The same expression in xxx. 17; xxxiii. 6; 2 Chron. xxiv. 13; Neh. iv. 1. Comp. Isa. lviii. 8. The expression "baudage" does not suit in all these passages, but "healing" does everywhere. Comp. ROSENM. ad loc.

Ver. 23. O that mine head . . . daughter of my people. The poetry of suffering is presented most touchingly in these brief but thrilling words. It is the wish of the prophet that the whole interior of his head might dissolve into water, so that his eyes might be inexhaustible fountains of tears. For all he can do is to weep, and this is his only comfort.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 4. "In this consists our human blindness in spiritual matters, that he who has fallen cannot imagine he has fallen, he who errs will not be convinced that he errs. For the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him, 1 Cor. ii. 14." CRAMER.—"Labi humanum est, resurgere Christianum, nolle resurgere diabolicum." FÖRSTER.

2. On ver. 5. "The people will still go astray more and more, they hold so fast to their false worship that they will not be turned away, and this because they have no proper place: because they have the service of God in reserve only au pis aller, it does not so much concern them whether they lie or steal, whether they go right or wrong, they do not wish to go anywhere." ZINZENDORF.

3. On ver. 7. "God opens to us the book of nature not only that we may behold as in a mirror the divine wisdom and omnipotence, but that we may also take thence good examples of discipline and improvement. Isa. i. 3; Prov. vi. 6. For if we behold such examples in nature we ought surely to be ashamed that irrational creatures are so willing and obedient, and do that for which they are created, but we men (who were made in His image and sealed with the Holy Ghost on the day of redemption) are so opposed, rebellious and disobedient to Him. This will certainly, in the case of no amendment, lead to a devilish bad ending." CRAMER.

4. On ver. 5. "Manifeste docet nos, militiam non esse opus naturæ, sed voluntatis (προαιρέσεως)." THEODORET.

5. On ver. 7. "CHRYSOSTOM, homil. de Turtura seu de virtute: turturam dicit omnem castam ecclesiam, hirundinem vero Joannem hominum amatores, cicadam autem eloquentissimum Paulum, ecclesiam organum." GHSLERS.

6. On ver. 8. "Jeremiah finds some of those also among us, who (according to this description of the theologians of his country) either deduce propositions from the Scriptures which a child may see are not so, or make up sentences and bring them to the people, and when they are asked: Where is that in the Bible? reply unabashed: O there is much in the Bible that is no longer applicable! or, All that is true is not in the Bible." ZINZENDORF.

7. On ver. 9. GHSLERS here remarks that the concionatores bene predicantes sed male operantes are put to shame and judged by the progress in wisdom and virtue of their hearers. He adduces a passage from the 18th Sermon of Bernard on the Song of Solomon, where it is said that the preacher should be concha not canalis. "Illic pene simul et recipit et refundit; illa vero donec impleatur expectat, et sic quod superabundat sine suo damno communicat."

8. On ver. 13. Compare here Luke xiii. 6 sqq. and the New Year's hymn of RAMBACH, "One year after another comes," especially ver. 3. "Hew down, said He, the barren tree," etc.

9. On ver. 14. "Despair is the last point to which God in His just judgments allows the godless to fall (Matt. xxvii. 4, 5). Despairing men know indeed God's just judgment concerning them, but not so that they are penitent for their sins (Gen. iv. 13, 14)." STARKE.

10. On ver. 16. In accordance with the view widely extended among the church fathers and supported by Gen. xlix. 17 (see DELITZSCH ad. h. l.), that the Antichrist should proceed from Dan (comp. also Levit. xxiv. 11 and the supposed origin of Judas Iscariot from the tribe of Dan). IRENÆUS (Adv. Hæc. V. 30) remarks on this passage: "Jeremias non solum subitaneum Antichristi adventum sed et tribum, ex quo veniet, manifestavit dicens; ex Dan audiemus vocem velocitatis equorum ejus, etc. Et propter hoc non adnumeratur tribus hæc in Apocalypsi (vii. 5-8) cum his quæ salvantur."

11. On ver. 16. "As the snorting of the horses sounded long before in the ears of the prophet, so shall the voice of Christ forever sound in our ears: 'Arise ye dead and come to judgment.'" CRAMER.

12. On ver. 17. "Frustra ad Deum preces fundunt adversus serpentem antiquum qui Dei præcepta contemserint." GHISSLERUS.

13. On ver. 21. "Our connection with those who hear us continually is so full, so intimate, so tender, no one can understand it who has not experienced it. We get love, we get somewhat from the heart, which was broken for its enemies, and which could cry even on the cross: Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." ZINZENDORF.

14. On ver. 22. "A pastor of a separatistic spirit cannot make many things whole, and it will be better for him to testify in earnest for the building up of those whom he would rather see pulled down.—He who will help his religion must regard it not as a Babylon, but as a broken Zion, and this from his heart; then he asks for salve and help, then he mourns for the hurt of Joseph." ZINZENDORF.

15. On ver. 22. "Non solum in præsentì loco, sed et in multis aliis testimoniis scripturarum invenimus resinam Galaad pro pœnitentia poni atque medicamine, mirarique nunc Deum, quare vulnera Jerusalem nequaquam curata sint, et necdum cicatrices obduserint cutem, eo quod non sint prophete nec sacerdotes, quorum debeant curari medicamine." JEROME.

16. On ver. 23. The tears of Jeremiah are a prelude and type of the tears which the Lord wept over Jerusalem. Luke xix. 41. As the blood of Abel cried to heaven so do these tears, and it is here first truly manifest how ruinous it is for men when the servants of God exercise their office among them not with joy but with sighs (Heb. xiii. 17).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On vers. 4-9. An earnest admonition to all who know that they are walking in perverse ways. They are admonished 1. to uprightness. They are (a) not to palliate their sins, (b) least of all to palliate them by a false interpretation of the divine word, either α . themselves or β . allow others to do it (vers. 8, 9).—2. To speedy return, for (a) he who returns betimes may be helped (ver. 4 the falling, the erring, ver. 7 the migratory birds); (b) but he who wilfully persists goes to ruin (ver. 6, the mad stallion). [HENRY: Those who persist in sin oppose 1. the dictates of reason (vers. 4 and 5), 2. the dictates of conscience (ver. 6), 3. the dictates of Providence (the judgment of the Lord, ver. 7), 4. the dictates of the written word (vers. 8 and 9).—S. R. A.]

2. On vers. 4-7. God's complaint of the impotence of His people. 1. How far this applies to us; 2. what should awaken us to repentance; 3. what true repentance is. BRANDT. Epistelpredigten.

3. On vers. 10-13. Signs of the decline and fall of a nation. 1. Avarice reigns. 2. Priests and prophets teaching false worship, hush up and deceive the people with false comfort. Deacon HAUBER, in PALMER'S Casual-Reden. 2te Folge. I. Stuttgart, 1860.

4. On vers. 18-23. In times of great distress in the church this text gives us occasion to consider I. Zion's complaint. This is 1. (in its subject) (a) general (ver. 19, a), (b) special, of the true servants of the church (vers. 21, 23); 2. (in its object) directed (a) to being (for the moment) forsaken (ver. 19 b), (b) to the delay of help (ver. 20). II. Zion's guilt (ver. 19 b). III. Zion's salvation. This is conditioned (a) by the presence of the true means of salvation (word and sacraments), (b) by the true application of the same.

5. On vers. 20-22. The question of the divine word in our harvest-complaint and the answer of the divine word to our harvest-question. 1. Our harvest-complaint runs thus: the harvest is past, the summer is ended and no help is come to us. Then God's word asks thee: (a) What is at fault? Is it not thy sin? (b) Is it really true that there was no help for thee? 2. Our harvest question runs: Is there then no salve in Gilead? Or is there no physician there? Why then is not the daughter of my people healed? To this the word of God answers: (a) O yes, salve and physician are there. The salve is the word of the fathers and the physician is thy Lord. (b) It is because the salve and the physician are not employed that our people are not healed. FLORENT, 1862.

6. [On ver. 20. 1. Every person who still remains in sin may at the close of the year usefully adopt this lamentation. 2. A season of religious revival is also eminently a time of harvest, and such as lose this season may usefully adopt this lamentation. 3. Another situation to which this melancholy reflection is peculiarly liable is that of a dying sinner. DWIGHT—"There is in this text I. The acknowledgment of opportunity. II. The confession of neglect. III. The anticipation of doom." J. W. W.—S. R. A.]

7. [On ver. 22. I. Sin prevails as a disease. It is (a) hereditary, (b) pervading, (c) vital and inveterate, (d) deceitful, (e) often painful, (f) mortal. II. There is a physician. III. How then does this condition exist? Because men are (a) insensible of need, (b) disposed to procrastinate, (c) will not take the remedy simply. DR. A. THOMSON, of Edinburgh.—S. R. A.]

8. [On ver. 23. "The same word in Hebrew signifies both the eye and a fountain, as if in this land of sorrows our eyes were designed rather for weeping than seeing." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

III. THIRD CHARGE: THE GENERAL ENTIRE ABSENCE OF TRUTH AND FAITH.

IX. 1-21.

1. Description of the prevailing deceit.

IX. 1-8.

- 1 O that I had¹ in the desert a travellers' lodge,
That I might leave my people and go from them :
For they are all adulterers, a gang of knaves,
- 2 And bend² their tongue as their bow of deceit ;
And not by truth do they prevail in the land,
But proceed from wickedness to wickedness :
But Me they knew not, saith Jehovah.
- 3 Guard ye every one against his neighbor,
And trust no brother ;
For every brother practices deceit,
And every neighbor slanders.
- 4 One overreaches³ another, and truth they speak not ;
They taught their tongues to speak lies,
And weary themselves to commit iniquity.⁴
- 5 Thy habitation is in the midst of deceit ;⁵
And through deceit they refuse to know Me, saith Jehovah.
- 6 Therefore thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth :
Behold, I melt them and try them ;
For how should I act in view of the daughter of my people ?
- 7 A deadly arrow⁶ is their tongue, they speak deceit ;
With the mouth they speak⁷ to their neighbor peaceably,
But in the heart⁸ they lay snares.
- 8 Should I not visit them for such things? saith Jehovah.
Or should not my soul avenge itself on a people like this?

² Ver. 2.—The Masoretes punctuate ויררכו (the form like ויררכו 1 Sam. xiv. 22; xxxi. 2; ויררכו Job xix. 3) probably because they regarded the Hiphil as causative. But for various reasons (Id. EXEG. AND CRIT.) it is better with HITZIG, GRAF and MEIER to suppose that the reading, which corresponds to the consonants, ויררכו is the original and correct.
³ Ver. 4.—התלו. Comp. התלתו Job xiii. 9, and התלתו 1 Ki. xviii. 27. The forms may be Piel from התל or Hiphil from תלל. Comp. OLSU, § 257. EWALD, § 127, d.
⁴ Ver. 4.—הענה (iii. 21) Inf. constr., as הנה Ezek. xxi. 15, הנה Hos. vi. 9.—Comp. EWALD, § 218, c; OLSHAUSEN, § 191, b.
⁵ Ver. 5.—GRAF has rightly declared against the alteration of the text, while EWALD, appealing to the LXX., proposes נלאו שב תך בתוך כרכה כרכה. The infinitive שבת is frequently used with suffixes; Ps. xxvii. 4; cxxxix. 2; 1 Ki. viii. 30; Ruth ii. 7, etc.
⁶ Ver. 7.—Instead of the Chethibh שוחט jugulans, throttling, killing, the Keri would read שחנת which elsewhere occurs only with זהב (1 Kings x. 16, 17; 2 Chron. ix. 15) and seems to denote gold beaten thin. Although from this the meaning "pointed" may be derived, which is also expressed by the Syriac and Chaldaic, yet it is better to adhere to the reading of the text and to translate, a deadly murderous arrow.
⁷ Ver. 7.—דבר. The change of number is analogous to the frequently occurring change of person. Comp. Gram. § 101, Ann.
⁸ Ver. 8.—ארבו. The suffix is most naturally referred to the subject like that of פקרבו ver. 8. Idem v. 9, 29.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

As the main thought of the preceding chapter was contained in vers. 4-9 so the main thought of the present is found in vers. 1-8. The rest is added as a sequel. As in ch. viii. the stiff-necked impenitence of Israel is censured, so here (as the third charge) their falseness in every relation. The two following strophes (vers. 9-15 and vers.

16-21) relate to the punishment threatened by God. In vers. 1-8 the prophet portrays the want of fidelity and trust, the falseness, malicious desire to defame, which was prevalent among his contemporaries (vers. 1-5) and which would compel the Lord to subject them to the punishment of a severe melting and refining process. (vers. 6-8).

Ver. 1. O that I had in the desert . . . a gang of knaves. On travellers' lodge comp. xiv. 8. Living with his godless countrymen is so intolerable to the prophet that he would prefer the scanty protection of a tent erected in the desert to his present residence. [HENDERSON supposes the discomfort of a caravanserai to be alluded to.—S. R. A.]—Adulterers. The violation of conjugal fidelity or of the fidelity due to a neighbor by the invasion of his conjugal rights was censured by the prophet in the second discourse, in the passage where he reproaches the Israelites with their violations of faith, v. 7, 8.—יָחַד, he who acts secretly (Vide, FUERST) who deals in falsehood, deceit and treachery in general. This reproach also is found in ver. 11.

Ver. 2. And bend their tongue . . . saith Jehovah. The imperfect with Vau consecutive here designates not a single act, but oft recurring acts, from which this course is to be understood as habitual; this case is therefore to be numbered among those in which the imperfect with Vau consec. is used to designate a permanent quality. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 88, 9.—According to the Masoretes we must read: they caused their tongue to tread the bow of deceit. In this way the tongue would not be compared to a bow, (which might appear unsuitable to the Masoretes), but to an archer, and the bow would then be a purely ideal conception, a figure for the means and instrument of the intellectual activity connected with the tongue. But this would be a very artificial mode of expression. Since the tongue is elsewhere compared with a sword, (Ps. lvii. 4; lxiv. 3) and an arrow (infra ver. 7) it may also be compared with a bow and in Ps. lxiv. 3 this is the fundamental conception.—bow is used as a simile in apposition with tongue. Comp. Ps. xxii. 13; xi. 1. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 72, 4.—Deceit may according to the sense be referred either to bend or bow, but on account of its position it is better to refer it to the latter. On the construction comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 63, 4, g.—And not by truth. The prophet has especially the rulers in view. Comp. Ps. xii. 4, לֹא־יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה different from v. 3; לֹא־יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה here indicates the norm as in לֹא־יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה לְפָנָיו Vid. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5, b.—On wickedness to wickedness. Comp. xxv. 32.

Ver. 3. Guard ye . . . slanders. Comp. Mic. vii. 5, 6.—On every brother, etc. Comp. NAE-

GELSB. Gr., § 82, 1.—עַקֵּב יַעֲקֹב. Since this verb in Kal occurs besides only in Gen. xxvii. 36 and Hos. xii. 4, both times of Jacob (it is found in Piel in Job xxxvii. 4) it is certainly probable that the prophet, speaking here of the deceit practised by one brother towards another, had this early instance in view (Gen. xxv. 29 sqq.; xxvii. 35).—רָכִיל הִלְךְ go about for tale-bearing. Vide supra vi. 28.

Ver. 4. One overreaches another . . . to commit iniquity.—They taught. Comp.

ii. 33. The Niphal of לָמַד signifies elsewhere "to be weary, disgusted with a thing" (vi. 11; xv. 6; xx. 9). This meaning does not suit here. The connection requires the meaning to weary one's self. Comp. Gen. xix. 11; Isai. xvi. 12.

Ver. 5. Thy habitation . . . saith Jehovah. The verse has this object, to describe the relation of the deceitful race to the prophet and to Jehovah. They surround the prophet so that he dwells as the only honest man among deceivers (comp. Ps. cxx.); from the Lord however they turn away, the lying spirit rules them in such wise (comp. Gen. xxvii. 35; xxxiv. 13) that they know nothing of God and desire not to know Him. (Comp. v. 3).

Ver. 6. Therefore . . . daughter of my people. A corruption so deeply rooted and so widely extended can be removed only by a process of entire melting, which will certainly be grievous but will also refine. Comp. vi. 27, etc.—לֹא־יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה has by no means always a negative sense, (as for example Gen. xlv. 34, quomodo ascenderem? i. e., non ascendam) but as often a decidedly positive meaning, ver. 18, 2 Sam. i. 25, 27; how do ye advise me? 1 Kings xii. 6. So the Lord here asks, how He should act, if not as already indicated? He would say, there is nothing else remaining but to do this.—After לֹא־יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה, with reference to iv. 4; vii. 12, appears to me unnecessary, for לֹא־יִשְׁתַּחֲוֶה is used in a causative sense even immediately before names of persons. Comp. iv. 26; xxiii. 9. In both these passages it is also evinced by an explanatory addition that it is to be taken in a causative sense.

Vers. 7, 8. A deadly arrow . . . on a people like this. It might appear strange that the prophet, after he had properly concluded with ver. 6, should repeat the main point of the charge. But he evidently intended to conclude with the words repeated from v. 9, 29, in order to indicate by this conclusion that he had the section of his former discourse, so closely related to this, (ch. 5) in view. The words of the eighth verse could not however follow immediately on ver. 6. The words them for such things would thus obtain a false reference. The prophet was therefore compelled again to mention the sins of the people.

2. First punishment: Desolation of the land and dispersion of the people.

IX. 9-15.

- 9 On the mountains let me raise a weeping and wailing,
 And on the pastures of the desert a lamentation,
 For they are desolated, without a man to pass through them;
 And hear no longer the lowing of the cattle.
 From the fowl of the heavens to the beast they are fled—gone!
- 10 And I will make Jerusalem a heap of stones,
 The dwelling of jackals;
 And the cities of Judah I will make desolate
 Without an inhabitant,
- 11 Who is the man who is wise and understands this?
 And who is he to whom the mouth of Jehovah has spoken,
 That he may declare such things?
 Why was the land destroyed
 And laid waste as a desert without a man to pass through it?
- 12 And Jehovah said:
 Because they have forsaken My law which I set before them,
 And have not heard My voice, nor walked according to it;
- 13 But walked after the perversity of their heart,
 And after the Baalim which their fathers have taught them;
- 14 Therefore thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, God of Israel:
 Behold! I give to them, this nation,
 Wormwood to eat and poison water to drink.
- 15 And I scatter them among nations
 Whom neither they nor their fathers have known;
 And send after them the sword till I extirpate them.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The preceding strophe contained the main thought of the chapter; description of the want of truth and faith among the people. As already remarked, to this are attached two additional strophes, which are occupied with the judgment provoked by that moral corruption. The connection of this strophe with the preceding is effected by vers. 6 and 8, declaring how the Lord would try and purify the people and avenge Himself upon them. Verses 9 and 10 describe accordingly the desolation of the land ordained as a punishment; vers. 11-13 again set forth the main causes of the moral corruption (ver. 12 negatively, ver. 13 positively); vers. 14 and 15 show us the fate of the inhabitants driven from the lands, and serve therefore to supplement the figure contained in verses 9 and 10.

Vers. 9, 10. On the mountains . . . make desolate without an inhabitant. לַיְיָ may grammatically and according to the connection designate both the place and the object. Comp. in the latter reference ix. 17; Ezek. xxvi. 17; Am. v. 1. Yet it would be flat and prosaic to restrict לַיְיָ to the object. The poetic liveliness of the style requires us to refer it to the place (comp. iii. 21) and the object at the same time. —וַיִּבְרָן properly they are burnt, singed, and then generally desolated. Comp. ver. 11 and the remark on ii. 15. Compare besides xvi. 19; 2 Kings xxii. 13, 17; Neh. i. 3; ii. 17.—Without a man, etc. Comp. ver. 11, Zeph. iii. 6; Ezek. xxxiii. 28.—fled, etc. Comp. iv. 25; 1. 3.—And I will make, etc. Sudden change of subject. Jehovah Himself announces that not only the country but the cities, Jerusalem before all, shall be desolated.—heap of stones. Comp. li. 37.—וַיִּבְרָן (comp. x. 22; xlix. 33; Isai. xxxiv. 13; xxxv. 7; xliii. 20) and וַיִּבְרָן (Isai. xiii. 22) both mean jackals. Comp. Ges. Thes. S. 39, 1457, 1511.—Make desolate. Comp. ii. 15; iv. 17; xxxiii. 10; xlv. 19; li. 29, etc.

Vers. 11-13. Who is the man . . . have taught them. These three verses present the motive of the prospective desolation. It might be supposed that after what was said in vers. 1-8 this question would be superfluous. But we must not lose sight of the tableauxque character of Jeremiah's style. Thus this strophe, besides the new elements contained in vers. 9 and 10, 14 and 15, presents also the old elements in a modified form. The real root of this moral corruption is here indicated, viz., that Israel had turned from the Lord and to idols.—Who is he, etc. These words remind us of Hos. xiv. 9. It is only the wise man who knows, only he to whom the Lord has spoken, who tells the truth. The prophet presupposes that the correct knowledge of the true cause of the destruction (ver. 9) is not such an easy matter. The unspiritual sense seeks the cause everywhere but where it is really to be found. To it external accidental circumstances are at fault. To seek the reason in themselves, in the perversity of their own hearts, does not occur to the foolish Israelites. Hence it is that not Israel but the Lord answers in ver. 12. Among Israel there was none so wise as to know the reason. The Lord is obliged to declare it.—This and the suffix in such things point back to vers. 8 and 9;—to whom expresses in the form of a direct question in what relation that which was previously said is to be understood. It is knowledge of the reason, namely, which is treated of.—נִצְתָּה points back to נִצְתָּה, ver. 9, and is to be taken in the same sense.—Allusions to passages in Deuteronomy are here frequent. Comp. Deut. iv. 8; xi. 32; xxviii. 15; Jer. xxvi. 4; xlv. 10.—According to it refers back to my law. In ver. 12 the negative reason for the judgment coming upon the land is stated; in ver. 13 the positive. —Walked. Comp. iii. 17;

vii. 24; Deut. xxix. 18.—Baalim. Comp. ii. 8, 23; Deut. iv. 3.—On taught comp. xii. 16; Deut. xi. 19.

3. Second Punishment: death snatches away an innumerable sacrifice.

IX. 16-21.

- 16 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth: Consider ye,
And call for mourning women,¹ that they may come,²
And send for the skillful ones, that they appear;
17 And hasten, and raise a wailing³ over us,
That our eyes may run⁴ with tears,
And our eyelids overflow with water.
18 For—loud wailing is heard from Zion:
“How are we spoiled! We are greatly confounded;
For we have forsaken the land,
For they have thrown down our dwellings”
19 Hear then, ye women, the word of Jehovah,
And let your ear receive the word of his mouth,
And teach your daughters⁵ a song of lamentation,
And [teach ye] one another a dirge!
20 For death cometh in through our windows,
It enters into our palaces,
To exterminate the child from the street,
The youths from the free places.
21 [Speak: Thus saith Jehovah:]
And the carcases of men fall like dung⁶ on the field,
And like sheaves behind the reaper
When there is none to gather them.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In connection with the close of the preceding strophe, the prophet sets forth another element of the punishment, viz., the fruitful harvest, which the sword would yield. He does this by even now calling for the mourning-women to lament over the future destruction of Zion and the dispersion of the people (vers. 16-18); but not content with this, he also calls upon all other women, as by divine command, to instruct their daughters and one another in the art of wailing, for death will summon his victims in masses.

Vers. 16, 17. Consider ye . . . overflow with water.—Consider is emphatic (comp. ii. 10; xxiii. 20; xxx. 21) for what is required is something unusual. Usually mourning-women are called to weep over those who are already dead, and therefore others than those who call them. Here they are to raise their wailing over those very persons who call them, and over their future destruction.—Skilful. Since wailing does not require wisdom in the higher sense, and as the expression “wise women” is not proved to be a technical term for mourning-women (as sage femme for midwife), the word must denote only those who are skilful, experienced, in general, comp. x. 9, and “skilful of lamentation,” Am. v. 16. [Comp. also Matt. ix. 23, and THOMSON, The Land and the Book, I., p. 146.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 18, 19. For loud wailing . . . a dirge. The prophet feigns a kind of vision: the Israelites perceive, not with their bodily but spiritual ear, a loud wailing. This is future, and it is they who wail. The subject of lamentation is: we are destroyed (iv. 13), put to shame (li. 51), have been obliged to forsake the land, because the enemy has thrown down our dwellings. So I render, with RASCHI, ROSENMULLER, GRAF and others, since וַיִּפְּץ is not merely to throw away, but also to throw to the ground (Job xviii. 17; Ezek. xix. 12), and of the throwing down of a dwelling is expressly used in Dan. viii. 11.—Hear them. The second וַיִּשְׁמַע introduces a second reason for the wailing commanded in ver. 18. Ver. 18 speaks only of destruction and exile in general. But dirges presuppose particular cases of death. Therefore in vers. 19, 20 it is added, that the destruction and deportation will result in the death of many. This is introduced in this way: the mourning-women in the divine commission are further commanded to instruct not only their daughters, but also the other women in the art of wailing, for on account of the unusual number of deaths, a much larger number of mourners than usual will be required. The wailing of ver. 17 is not to be raised, therefore, because the women received the command contained in ver. 19, but because they received this command for the reason given in vers. 20, 21.

Vers. 20, 21. For death cometh in . . . when there is none to gather them. Death will not, as an enemy lurking without, attack those only who venture out to him, but will assault the people, penetrating into all their houses to fetch his sacrifices. The figure is like that in Joel ii. 9.—From the street. While death strangles the children and youths in the houses, he has at the same time taken them from the street and the places.—The words speak, thus saith Jehovah, are very disturbing. They interrupt the close connection, which according to the sense and the construction there is between and the carcases, etc., and ver. 20; they are wanting in the LXX., and the whole manner of expression is foreign to Jeremiah. For the imperative וַיִּקְרָא does not occur once in Jeremiah, either in the addresses of God to the prophet or elsewhere, and Jeremiah never says וַיִּקְרָא. He also never places וַיִּקְרָא before, but always after the beginning, like the Latin inquam, or at the close of the address.—And the carcases, etc. These words we read in 2 Kings ix. 37 of the corpse of Jezebel. Comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 11; Jer. viii. 2; xvi. 4; xxv. 33.—The stricken will lie like sheaves behind the reaper, but there is to be this difference, that while the sheaves are collected and taken home, the dead bodies will lie in the field unregarded. Compare the figure of the sheaves, Mic. iv. 12.

6. On ver. 11. It is always an important part of true wisdom to recognize the object of the divine chastisement. At Jericho (Josh. vii.) it was made known by an extraordinary revelation that the ban of sacrilege was resting upon Israel, and the lot further brought to light the author of the crime. But this mode of revelation is not the usual one. When punishment is the direct and immediate consequence of sin, ex. gr., when sickness follows on dissipation, and poverty on laziness and negligence, then every one who wishes, may easily see, whither the chastisement tends. But often the connection between sin and punishment is more remote and secret, although it is never an artificial and arbitrary, but always an organic and necessary one. Then is the time, in all humility and honesty to examine one's self in order to learn "why the land is laid waste."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet introduces the concluding part of his discourse with a general moral reflection, the object of which is to present the only means of escape from such fearfully threatening dangers, viz., a living and truly productive knowledge of the Lord (vers. 22, 23). Unfortunately the prophet is at the close of the strophe (vers. 24, 25) compelled to acknowledge the mournful fact that such a true knowledge of God by the people Israel was not to be expected, since they were a people of uncircumcised heart, and were therefore, notwithstanding their bodily circumcision, essentially like the uncircumcised heathen nations. From this it is evident that the passage (vers. 22-25) can be dispensed with neither from the inner connection nor the connection with the preceding context, and we should not therefore be justified in regarding it (with GRAF) as a later addition.

Vers. 22, 23. Let not the wise man . . . delight. As the things in which they are not to glory, wisdom, strength (power), riches, are certainly mentioned, because they appear above all to the natural man as the most desirable, comp. 1 Kings i. 13, where in substance these three ideas are placed in juxtaposition, with 2 Chron. ix. 22; Job xii. 13. But at the same time the prophet has doubtless in view actual circumstances and declarations previously made by him. The inclination of his hearers presumptuously to boast of external carnal advantages was censured by him in the seventh chapter (comp. vers. 4, 8, 10, 14, 24, 26, 28); that the Jews gloried in their wisdom is expressly stated in viii. 8, 9. The mention of strength seems to point back to ix. 2, and riches remind us of v. 26-28. The wisdom in which they are not to glory is not that which is called "better than strength" in Eccles. ix. 16, and which is essentially identical with that recommended in ver. 23, but it is worldly wisdom, which though it boast of enjoying divine direction, in truth rejects the word of God, and is therefore put to shame (viii. 8, 9,) against which also a warning is given in Prov. iii. 5, in the words, "Trust in Jehovah with all thine heart, but on thine own understanding rely thou not."—Strength is both physical strength (Ps. cxlvii. 10, Job xxxix. 19) and power (2 Kings x. 34, xx. 20).—Every man must have something in which to glory, i. e., which he esteems as his highest blessing and honor (without self-esteem) comp. Isai. li. 16; 1 Cor. i. 31; 2 Cor. x. 17.—Me must depend on knows alone, or also on to be wise (understand) (Ps. lxxv. 10; evi. 7.) I prefer the latter. Wise then does not, as GRAF assumes, contradict the beginning of ver. 22, but only opposes the true to the false wisdom. For in these, etc., is not the fundamental statement, but the explanation of the general וְיָדַע. Comp. NÄGELSB. Gr. § 109, 1 a.—God is to be known as the eternally existent, therefore the only true God, who exercises mercy, judgment and righteousness on the earth. There is an antithesis here to strength, etc., ver. 22 (ix. 2; v. 26 sqq.) But he who has learned to know the Lord as such, acts accordingly. Mercy is not in opposition to justice and righteousness as sometimes in Christian usage, but mercy is the root of righteousness, i. e., the disposition which does not with brute force trample upon the poor and weak, but with kindness and love secures to them their rights, and thus blessing and salvation. Comp. rems. on vii. 5, 6. Ps. cxlv. 17.

Vers. 24, 25. Behold! the days are coming . . . uncircumcised at heart. All here primarily depends on the explanation of the expression כְּיָדָע לְיָדָע = circumcision in foreskin. The explanations all circumcised in foreskin (LXX. and Vulg.) and all the circumcised, together with those who have the foreskin (TREMELL., PISC., ROSEN.) neither suit the connection, nor can they be justified grammatically. The explanation of HIRTZIG, GRAF, [HENDERSON, NOYES, BLAXNEY,] according to which circumcised in foreskin is equivalent to uncircumcised (HIRTZIG compares "a knife without a handle and to which the blade is wanting") imputes nonsense to the prophet. Grammatically the words can mean only: to circumcise in foreskin, i. e., circumcision, which is yet connected only with the foreskin, therefore no true circumcision. In favor of this explanation is 1. That the prophet mentions Judah among these nations. If it cannot be denied of this nation, that its circumcision was connected with the foreskin, the same must apply, though in a different sense, to the others. 2. If the prophet wished to mention only absolutely uncircumcised nations, why has he mentioned particularly these? He might then have omitted Judah, and mentioned all others in preference to these. The selection is evidently intentional. All these nations are either notoriously or—on account of their affinity of race with Israel—at least probably circumcised. The former was the case with the Egyptians (Herod. II. 36, 104). If circumcision was practiced only among the higher castes of the Egyptians (WINER, R. W. B. Art. "Beschneidung") this would be another reason for the prophet to reckon the nation generally among the "circumcised in foreskin." The כְּיָדָע לְיָדָע were undoubtedly circumcised. For it is evident from xxv. 23; xlix. 28, 32, that by this phrase Arabian tribes, especially the Kedarenes, are understood, of which Herodotus (III. 8) reports that they περιτρίκαλα κείρονται, περιζυροῦντες τοῖς κροτάφοις which was forbidden to the Jews (Levit. xix. 27; xxi. 5). The Kedarenes, however, were descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13; comp. HERZOG, R-Enc. 1, S. 463) who was circumcised by Abraham (Gen. xvii. 23) and among whose descendants the practice of this rite is continued even to this day, not by order of Mohammed (the Koran nowhere enjoins circumcision, comp. MICHAELIS, Mos. Recht. § 184) but as an ancient sacred custom. If now it cannot also be proved of the Edomites, Ammonites and Moabites (Gen. xix. 37, 38) that they had circumcision (John Hyrcanus gave the Edomites the alternative either of abandoning their country or accepting circumcision, and they chose the latter. JOSEPH. Antiqu. XIII. 9, 1) yet Jeremiah must have reckoned them among the circumcised. Whether he erred in this or not is another question. There is of course the possibility that the usage may have prevailed at his time among them also and afterwards declined, as even among the Israelites this law was by no means always punctually followed (Josh. v. 2, sqq. Comp. HERZOG. R-Enc. II. S. 108).—In short the juxtaposition of Judah and two other undoubtedly circumcised nations with three whose circumcision on account of their origin is possible and indeed highly probable, but not proved, shows that according to the intention of the prophet the expression (כֹּלֵי כְעֵרְלָה) is to be taken in the sense, which as we have shown above, is alone grammatically admissible.—With this also accords the causal sentence “for all the nations,” etc. It is entirely unnecessary to regard the article as a retrospective pronoun—all these nations. The prophet really wishes to say that all the nations of the heathens are uncircumcised, from which however it follows that those previously mentioned are so. If these are uncircumcised in spite of a circumcision, which from the standpoint of the theocracy must appear an unjustifiable imitation of the sacred sign of the covenant, and the whole house of Israel, including Judah, is uncircumcised at heart, it is explained why the Lord named Judah’s and the other nations’ circumcision—in foreskin. From this it further results that an improvement of Judah in the sense of ver. 23 is not to be expected, whence finally it follows that Judah is exposed to the judgment of the Lord as well as those other nations.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ix. 22, 23. “Paul says, He that glorieth, let him glory in the Lord (2 Cor. x. 17), and Jesus, This is life eternal that they might know Thee that Thou art the only true God and Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent (John xvii. 3). This is to glory, as though one should say, God be praised, I am right well and sound. To be sound in the faith is to have the knowledge of Jesus Christ, to maintain it, to grow in it. This is to prosper. To be silent concerning grace from humility is an affectation. To make a great noise of good works as our own, is ridiculous. For grace produces them, the power of God dwelling in us. We do nothing and should do nothing if it were left to us; but the work of God in us, that we believe, is not to be passed over in silence, moroseness, and ingratitude. What a noise do the humble saints in the Revelation make of their grace, freedom, priesthood, royal dignity, victory, redemption (chap. iv., v., vii., xii., xiv., xv., xvii., xix.). There is also nothing any longer secret when we bear His name on our forehead. O that the whole earth were full of our glorying in the Lord! ‘O that we were able, our songs so high to raise, That all the country round, might echo with His praise.’ The world and false theology recommend in this respect a certain silence, which shows that they do not know which is their proper sphere. And against them it is best to contend realiter by manifestation of the Spirit and of power. Let your light so shine before men that they may glorify the Father in heaven (Matt. v. 16).” ZINZENDORF.

For the Jews were indeed circumcised in the flesh, but this was to be a sign to them of righteousness, that they should be spiritually circumcised in faith and good works. But since such spiritual circumcision did not follow, and they remained uncircumcised at heart, the other fleshly circumcision helped them not, but redounded instead to their sin.” CRAMER.

6. On vers. 25, 26. Circumcision as a figure of the relation of man to God. 1. The three stages of circumcision, uncircumcised, outwardly circumcised, truly circumcised, correspond to the three stages of being without God, serving God outwardly, serving God in spirit and in truth. 2. As external circumcision without that of the heart is equivalent to uncircumcision, so the outward service of God without the inward is equivalent to no service at all.

From all this might well proceed some suspicion as to the authenticity of the passage vers. 1-16. In opposition to MOYERS, HIRZIG and DE WETTE, GRAF has fully shown that the supposed Isaiah II. could not be the author (S. 171 Ann.), although many relations are not to be denied. Who was the author and when and by whom the addition was made can scarcely be ascertained.

In Arabic the corresponding word designates a cutting instrument. Comp. Aram. הַצֵּד metere. The prefix צ may depend on מִעֲשֵׂהָ or on בָּרְתוֹ, or on both. The latter is the more probable since in fact the axe is the instrument which serves for felling and hewing. Comp. Isa. xlv. 14.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

According to ver. 2 the object of this passage is to warn Israel from the worship of idols. In this behalf first the nothingness of idols, the dead work of men, is shown (vers. 1-5). Then the incomparable greatness of Jehovah and in contrast with the origin of the idol images His overwhelmingly impressive self-existence and power, in view of which the adoration of empty idols appears disgraceful folly, are set forth as the source of all great phenomena in nature and history (vers. 6-16).

Ver. 1, 2. Hear the word . . . affrighted at them. דְּבַר, way. Comp. v. 4, 5. It is simply = religion, cultus. On this account and from what follows (ver. 3 sqq.) the "signs of the heaven" cannot be passing and chance signs, be they constellations (HIRZIG), or comets, darkness, etc. (ROSENM., GRAF), but only permanent signs which are connected with permanent worship, and affrighted is to be understood not of the momentary impression excited by an extraordinary phenomenon, but only of the constant religious terror manifesting itself in the ordinary worship (comp. Mal. ii. 5, and פָּחַד, Gen. xxxi. 42, 53). Were we to take affrighted in the former sense it would signify either an emphasis on the point of terror: ye may feel joy at favorable signs but ye are not to be terrified at supposed unfavorable signs—which would be a contradiction and at the same time confirm the superstition—or it would be: ye are not to conceive of the signs of heaven as under the influence of higher powers and therefore indifferent to human life, which would be a warning against astrology not in correspondence with the connection. In accordance with the subsequent warning against the worship of images idolatry only can be here spoken of, which renders not merely the extraordinary, but above all the ordinary signs of the heavens the object of adoration. The expression "signs" would refer less to the destination determined by the stars, Gen. i. 14, than to the ancient constellations (Job ix. 9), as whose signs appear the stars which form them (comp. the twelve signs of the Zodiac,

2 Kings xxiii. 5).—Because the heathen, etc., is not the argument of the author against idolatry—this does not come till ver. 13—but a statement of the reason, from the soul of the Israelites, why this service has so much that is seductive for them. This causal sentence corresponds to "accustom yourselves not." The learning and becoming accustomed is the effect of the example. How dangerous this was to the Israelites we learn from the warnings: Exod. xxiii. 24, 32, 33; Lev. xviii. 3; Deut. vii. 1 sqq. Comp. Judges ii. and iii.—כִּי here = because. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 110, 1.

Ver. 3. For the institutions of the nations . . . with an axe.—The institutions, etc., stand in antithesis to the ordinances of Jehovah, Lev. xviii. 3, 4.—Breath are they [lit.: is it]. The singular of the pronoun appears to involve a contemptuous collective sense—all that trash. Comp. ver. 8; EWALD, § 319, c; Josh. xiii. 14.—The nothingness of the deities which are here identified with the idol-images, is clear from their origin. If we trace the origin of the idol we find that the artificer found it as a tree standing among others in the forest, and as adapted to his purpose cut it down.—On the subject in cut out comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 101, 2 b. As to the object it is formally undefined, but from the connection is clearly recognizable as the idol.—Second stage: the forest tree becomes a work of art in the hands of an artificer and by the aid of an axe.

Ver. 4. With gold and silver . . . that it totter not. Third stage: adornment with precious metals (Isa. xxx. 20; xl. 19). Fourth stage: fastening on the place of exhibition (Isa. xli. 7).—Fasten them. Observe the change of number. (Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 105, 7, Ann. 2). With these words the construction passes into the plural. Comp. ver. 5. The subject of פִּקֵּי is ideal, namely the idea of the fastened derived from פִּקֵּי.—Comp. xli. 6, 7.

Ver. 5. They are as the pillars . . . is not in their power.—Pillars in a cucumber field. JEROME: in similitudinem palmæ fabricata sunt. Syr.; tanquam palmæ sunt erectæ, in which תִּבְרָה is taken according to analogy from תִּבְרָה and Judges iv. 5, but כקטטה is very freely translated. Others, following KIMCHI's example take תִּכְרֶה=תִּכְרֶה, columna (Joel iii. 3; Song of Sol. iii. 6) and תִּכְרֶה יָם (Jer. xxxi. 21); כקטטה however =turned work (Exod. xxv. 18; xxxi. 26; xxxvii. 7, 17, 22; Numb. viii. 4; x. 2 coll. Isa. iii. 24). The comparison is strange. More satisfactory is the explanation proposed by MOVERS, FUERST (M. W. B., S. 781), GRAF, according to which כקטטה, as in Isa. i. 8, signifies a cucumber field and תִּכְרֶה the scarecrows, or more correctly the priapus-pillars erected as such. These priapus-pillars are elsewhere ridiculed as useless watchguards (comp. Epist. Jerem. ver. 70: ὡςπερ ἐν σικνηράτω προβασκάνιον οὐδὲν φύλασσον οὕτως εἰσὶν οἱ θεοὶ αὐτῶν. Comp. PASSOW, s. v., προβασκάνιον, SELDEN de Diis Syriis, p. 300).—They must be borne. Comp. Isa. xlvii. 7.

b. The idols contrasted with Jehovah.

X. 6-16.

- 6 None is like Thee,¹ O Jehovah!
Great art Thou, and great is Thy name in might.
- 7 Who should not fear Thee, Thou King of nations?
For unto Thee is it due.²
For among all the wise men of the nations,
And in all their dominion there is none like Thee.
- 8 But altogether they are stupid³ and become fools:⁴
Vain instruction! It is wood!⁵
- 9 Silver plates are brought from Tarshish and gold from Uphaz.
The work of the smith and the hands of the smelter;
Blue and red purple is their raiment,
Artists' work are they all.
- 10 But Jehovah is truly God,
He is a living God, and an everlasting King:
Before His anger the earth trembleth,
And the nations cannot endure His wrath.
- 11 *Ye shall therefore say unto them: The gods,
Which have not made heaven and earth,⁶ Shall vanish away from the earth under the heaven.*
- 12 Who made the earth by His power,
Established the world by His wisdom,
And by His understanding spread out the heavens.
- 13 At the sound of His voice a heaving of waters in the heavens,
He bringeth up vapors from the ends of the earth;
He produceth lightnings with the rain,
And bringeth the wind out of His storehouses.
- 14 Stupid are all men there without understanding;
All the founders of idol-images are put to shame,
For a lie is their casting, and there is no spirit in them.
- 15 For they are vapour and work of deceit;⁷
In the time of their visitation they perish.
- 16 Not like these is the portion of Jacob;
For He forms all things and Israel is the stock of His inheritance:
Jehovah Zebaoth is His name.

¹ Ver. 6.—כְּאֵין כְּכֹדֶךָ is remarkable. VENEMA supposes a transposition of the כ from אֵין to כֹדֶךָ at the close of ver. 5, an hypothesis to which we can have recourse only in extreme cases, especially as the initial and final כ are different in form. NEUMANN would take כְּאֵין in a causal sense, but 1. it would be scarcely appropriate to designate the Lord as great merely in comparison with other great ones; 2. אֵין must also then be taken as causal in ver. 7. NEUMANN indeed does this, but thus he obtains only a linguistic monstrosity, which condemns itself and also his rendering of the word. HIRTIG would read לֹא־כִּי, as in xxx. 7, and with similarity of thought we should certainly expect similarity of expression. But might we not just as well require לֹא־כִּי to be read in xxx. 7, as in this place? The expression, from whence Thy like? is at least quite unusual. In this sense we elsewhere always find כִּי (Deut. iii. 24; iv. 7; 2 Sam. xxii. 32; 2 Kings xviii. 35; Ps. xvii. 32; lxxvii. 14; Mic. vii. 18 and the passages adduced by Hirtz himself Ps. xxxv. 10; lxxi. 19) while כִּי־אֵל or כִּי־יְהוָה occurs only in an ironical negative sense (ex. gr. Ps. xlii. 4; lxxix. 10; cxv. 2; Jer. ii. 27), or in the sense of earnest search (Jer. ii. 6, 8; 2 Kings ii. 14), but לֹא־כִּי never occurs in that sense.—לֹא־כִּי occurs frequently in Jeremiah, more frequently than in any other author of the Old Testament.—The preposition כִּי in this connection used evidently sometimes in a causal sense (vii. 32; xix. 11; Isa. i. 2; Ezek. xxxiv. 8), but mostly in a negative sense—away from, without. Two negatives thus united do not make an affirmative, but strengthen the negation. Comp. NÆGELS. Gr., § 106, 5; GES. § 152, 2. Everywhere, however, except here, כִּי depends on a preceding verb or noun, and indeed for the most part mediately, so that the preposition is to be considered as depending on an idea of existence (constructio pægnans) latent in the verb (or noun). Comp. Isa. vi. 11; Jer. iv. 7; xx. 9; xxxii. 43; xxxiii. 10, 12; xxxiv. 22; xlv. 22; xlv. 19; xlvi. 9; li. 29, 37; Ezek. xxxiii. 28; Zeph. ii. 5; iii. 6. In Jer. v. 9 only is this idea of existence explicitly present.—That in this place לֹא־כִּי stands so abruptly is very remarkable and contrary to the usage of Jeremiah.

² Ver. 7.—לֹא־מִן־הַנְּתִיבִים (which occurs only in this single form and place) = נְתִיבִים, decorum, consentaneum fuit, Isai. lii. 7; Ps. xciii. 5; Song of Sol. i. 10. On the feminine in the impersonal sense, comp. NÆGELS. Gr. § 60, 6, b.

⁴ Ver. 8.—וַיְכַסְּלֶיךָ. The verb here only—meaning (comp. בְּכַסְּלִים) stultum, stupidum esse.

⁶ Ver. 11.—וְאִתְּךָ is a harsher form of אִתְּךָ. Comp. FUERTZ, H. W. B. 1, S. 142. BUXTORF, Lex. Chald., p. 223. אִתְּךָ is again Hebrew and is referred by the LXX. to שְׂמִיָּא but by most commentators to אִתְּךָ.

⁷ Ver. 14.—תַּעֲשֶׂה תַּעֲשֶׂה־עִים. The noun here only, the verb Gen. xxvii. 12; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 6 and 7 contain the theme of the strophe: Jehovah is the highest, there is none like Him, all the world should fear Him. It is stupidity which opposes this truth, says ver. 8. The impropriety of this opposition is proved by the exposition of what idols really are. On the other hand the right of Jehovah maintained in ver. 7 is proved by the exposition of His attributes and works, vers. 10, 12, 13. From this exposition it is evident how well-founded on the one hand is the judgment pronounced against this opposition (vers. 14, 15), and on the other hand the justice of Jehovah and the welfare of the people who serve Him. (ver. 16.)

Vers. 6 and 7, None is like thee . . . none like thee.—In might is to be referred both to Thou and Thy name. Since the latter in relation to the former can designate only the name in the objective sense, the renown, glory, in might is equivalent to in manifestation of might, comp. xvi. 21.—Who should not negative expression for the positive,—all must fear Thee.—For among all. SEB. SCHMIDT here rightly calls attention to the fact that כִּי here is to be regarded as local not partitive, because otherwise God would be compared with men: among all the wise men and in the whole circuit of their dominion, therefore in the whole domain of their wisdom and might, no God is found like unto Jehovah. Comp. CASPARI, Micha der Morastite, S. 13 ff.

Ver. 8. But altogether . . . it is wood. That which really is does not correspond to that which ought to be. The entirety of the heathen (בְּנֵי־אֲדָמָה = unā, Targum Jon. בְּתַרְתָּא; the meaning in one contradicts the connection) feareth not the Lord, as it becomes them. This is to say, they are stupid as brutes.—Vain instruction! It is wood! If with GRAF we should construe these words like 3 a, we should develop the meaning that wood is wooden. But since this could not possibly be meant in the figurative sense, in which we use the word wooden, we should be obliged to take it literally, which, however we interpreted בְּנִיבִר, would yield only nonsense. Accordingly עֵץ cannot be the predicate of בְּנִיבִר. We must therefore regard the latter as a declaration made absolutely, with pregnant brevity, an exclamation which represents a sentence.—Since the radical meaning of הַבָּל is breath, vanitas, we are perfectly justified by passages like Eccles. i. 2; v. 6; xii. 8, in taking the plural in this sense, although an adhesion to the derived meaning (idols) may certainly be contained in the words בְּנִיבִר הֵן is therefore=institutio vanitatum, in the double sense of vain instruction and that which treats of vanities. At the same time the author may have had in mind an opposition to the "chastisement of Jehovah" (כְּנִיבִר) (Deut. xi. 2; Prov. iii. 11; Job v. 17).—Whatever also in idol doctrine is declared great and glorious of the idols is all vain lies and deceit. For the idol is wood! This points back to ver. 3, and at the same time declares in contradiction of what follows, that, though the idols may be ornamented with precious metals and material, the heart is still always wood. וְהָיָא is used here, as in ver. 3, collectively with a contemptuous side-meaning.

Ver. 9. Silver plates are brought . . . artists' work are they all. כִּי־בְּכָרֶיךָ beaten silver, therefore silver plates, comp. Gen. i. 6-8; Numb. xvii. 3, 4. I do not think that these and the following words are to be regarded as a continuation of It is wood or are brought, as forming a relative sentence. For ver. 8 compared with vers. 3, 4, is evidently intended to express that the idol is wood, a common material, and that the more precious metals, etc. are only the shell which covers the base kernel. The thought therefore that the idol is wood, silver and gold is remote from the connection. For what object silver and gold are brought from a great distance is not expressly stated, but is understood from the context, and especially from ver. 4.—Tartessus in Spain is mentioned as producing silver in Ezek. xxvii. 12.—The name אֹפִיר occurs besides only in Dan. x. 5, where פְּתָם אֹפִיר is spoken of. There are three views with respect to it: 1. Uphaz is designated as a real locality, and BOUGART (Phaleg. II. 27], supposes it to be Tabrobana (Ceylon) where according to Ptolemy (VII. 4) there was a river and harbor Phasis; (HITZIG and FÜRST, H. W. B. S. 37) a place in Yemen (comp. Usal, Gen. x. 27; Ophir, Sheba, Ps. xlv. 10; 1 Chron. xxix. 4; Ps. lxxii. 15); in which case Uphaz may be regarded either as a compound of אֶזְרָא וְאֹפִיר i. e. gold coast, or = Vipaza (Hypaphasis); 2. Uphaz is regarded as incorrectly written for אֹפִיר. So the Chaldee and Syriac, Theodoret and many of the moderns; 3. אֹפִיר is taken to be identical with כֹּנִיף purgatum (Part. IIoph. from כֹּנֵן 1 Kings x. 18, Vid. FÜRST, Conc. p. 895). But since, 1. The hypothesis of a scriptural error is opposed to the critical principle of preferring the more difficult reading; 2. Tartessus is designated only as a land of silver never of gold (with the exception of the general and later passage, Macc. viii. 3); 3. The East is elsewhere generally represented as the home of gold (comp. Havila, Gen. ii. 11, 12; Ophir, Sheba, ut supra)—and finally, 4. The connection of the passage requires the thought that the materials of the idols were brought from the most distant and opposite places. I am in favor of regarding Uphaz as a definite locality to be sought in the East, although it is not possible now to determine its position more exactly.—The work of the smith is in apposition with silver and gold.—אֵזָוֹת blue, אֲרָבָן red purple, comp. Exod. xxvi. 31, 36; xxvii. 16; xxviii. 8, 15, 33.—Artists' [lit. skilful ones] comp. ix. 16; Isai. xl. 20.

Ver. 10. But Jehovah... endure his wrath In contrast to the merely imaginary deity of the idols, Jehovah is designated as the true God (אֱלֹהִים in apposition, comp. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 66) in contrast to their lifelessness as the living (חַיִּים) adj. comp. ii. 13; the plural as in Deut. v. 23; 1 Sam. xvii. 26; Jer. xxiii. 36 coll.; Josh. xxiv. 19; Isai. xxxvii. 4, 17. Vide NAEGELSB. Gr. § 105, 4, a) in contrast to their powerlessness finally as the eternal governor (comp. Exod. xv. 18; Ps. x. 16; lxi. 7; xciii. 1 sqq.; xcvi. 1). Before such a mighty God the earth trembles (Exod. xix. 16 sqq.; Ps. lxxviii. 9; xcvi. 5; Nah. i. 5) and the nations are not in a condition to hold or to bear the fulness of His anger (the figure is that of a vessel which is burst by the liquid poured into it. Matt. ix. 17; comp. Jer. ii. 13).

Ver. 11. Ye shall therefore say . . . under the heaven. HOBIGANT, VENEMA, DATHE, BLAYNEY, DÜDERLEIN, ROSENUELLER, MAUREN, EWALD, GRAF, [HENDERSON—S. R. A.] and others declare this verse to be a gloss which has crept into the text. Even NEUMANN (S. 549 Ann.) inclines to this view. I must also decide in its favor. For 1. Since we must suspect the authenticity of vers. 1-10, 12-16, we have no interest in maintaining that of this verse, but a reason is afforded for the insertion of the verse just here. To the marginal gloss of a second a third might have added a second gloss in a foreign language. He would not have ventured to make such an irrelevant addition to the text of the prophet. Both glosses have in later times been unjustifiably admitted into the text. Jeremiah would certainly not have interrupted a Hebrew discourse by a Chaldee interpolation, when he elsewhere never uses this language, not even in the letter to the exiles, ch. xxix. The reasons which have been adduced in favor of their authenticity are specious only. They may be found in NEUMANN, S. 547, sqq. [Vide also Eng. Trans. of Calvin, II. p. 31, n.—S. R. A.]. 2. The verse breaks the connection in the most abrupt manner. Ver. 12 is by this verse suspended in the air, while without it, ver. 12 is connected quite regularly with ver. 10. The assumption of a parenthesis also (J. D. MICHAELIS) does not avail. For then the verse must be a necessary, not interruptive supplement to ver. 10, or preparation for ver. 12, neither of which is the case.

Ver. 12. Who made the earth . . . the hea- vens—Who made (עָשָׂה) is in apposition to the main idea of ver. 10: Jehovah Elohim. The absence of the article before such a participle standing in apposition after a Nom. determ. is frequent. Comp. ii. 27; Ps. ix. 12; civ. 2-4; Zech. xii. 1. Vide NAEGELSB. Gr. § 97, 2, a.—The contents of vers. 12 and 13 serve by the enumeration of facts as a confirmation of ver. 11, comp. ch. xxvii. 5; xxxii. 17.—established, etc. comp. Ps. lxxv. 7; lxxxix. 12; xciii. 1.—spread out, etc. comp. civ. 2; Isai. xl. 22; xlv. 24; li. 13; Zech. xii. 1.

Ver. 13. At the sound . . . storehouses.

This verse, with the exception of the beginning is found in Ps. cxxxv. 7.—Sound of his voice. It is not necessary with EWALD to take this for לְהַרְוֵהוּ קוֹל, or with MAURER for לְהַרְוֵהוּ קוֹלוֹ, or with HITZIG to make הַכֹּתֵן depend on הָרָוּה as the object. For the words mean simply ad vocem, quam edit. We are not then to take הַרְוֵה in the general sense (on the noise which His giving makes) but in the special sense which lies at the root of the expression בְּקוֹל נְתַן (xii. 8; Ps. xlv. 7; lxxviii. 34) i. e., “to make a noise, sound with the voice.” That the thunder is meant is evident from the context. Thunder, lightning, clouds, rain and storm are mentioned as the essential constituents of a tempest, comp. xi. 16.

Vers. 14 and 15. Stupid are all . . . they perish. In contrast to the living power of God the vanity of the idols is again set forth. While before Jehovah, when He arises, all trembles and is afraid, the worshippers of idols are by these merely—put to shame. The two members of ver. 14 a, stand in the relation of explicative, not of synonymous parallelism. The second is the explanation and more exact definition of the first. A change of reading therefore (חָכְם into אָרָם) or of the usual meaning of the word (נָעַר = arte factum, idol-image) is unnecessary. נָעַר we take in the explicative sense = to appear stupid, to prove so, comp. Isai. xix. 11; EWALD, § 123, b. נָעַר without insight, comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 112, 5, d.—Men appear in the entire nakedness of their stupidity, in so far as they are put to shame by their idols, which are not God, but dead castings.—Work of deceit. The sense is: a work by which they themselves are stultified and put to shame who make it.

Ver. 16. Not like these . . . is his name. The worshippers of Jehovah are yet again comprised with the idolaters, Jehovah is opposed to the idols, and the whole force of the demonstration is concentrated into the significant name of the true God. The first hemistich falls into two members. 1. Not like these is the portion of Jacob. The expression portion of Jacob reminds us of Deut. xxxii. 9; Ps. xvi. 5. Observe how by this expression Jehovah and His servants are aptly comprised together. 2. Again the first sentence has a double basis: as former of all things Jehovah is not like the idols, and as those who have this God for their portion and inheritance the Israelites are not like the heathen.—Stock of his inheritance. Comp. Deut. iv. 20; Ps. lxxiv. 2.—On the relation of this passage to li. 19, and of the Hebrew original of the Alexandrian translation, consult NÆGELSB. Jeremia u. Bab. S. 93, 131.

2. Beginning of the end of the retribution: Command to the people to retire; Lament of the desolated land; last watch-cry of the Prophet: the enemy is here!

X. 17-22.¹

- 17 Pick up thy bundle² from the earth, thou that sittest³ in distress!
 18 For thus saith Jehovah: Behold!
 I sling away the inhabitants of this land at this once,
 And bring them into straits, that they may find it so.
 19 Who is me for my hurt! My wound is incurable.⁴
 But I say: this is now my suffering and I will bear it.
 20 My tents are laid waste and all my cords are broken.⁵
 My children forsake me and are never here.
 There is none to pitch my tent and set up my curtains,
 21 For the pastors are become stupid and seek not Jehovah.
 Hence they have effected nothing prudent and their whole flock is dispersed.
 22 Hark, a message comes and great tumult out of the north country,
 That the cities of Judah are to become a desolation,
 For the habitation of jackals.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After by ix. 25 it is affirmed that the last and only means of safety is despised the prophet now in vers. 17 and 18 addresses a command to the people to remove into exile. The now desolated land is hereupon introduced as lamenting its misfortune and its causes (vers. 19-21). At last the prophet announces, as a herald or watchman on the lookout, that the enemy (long predicted and called to execute judgment) is present (ver. 22).

Ver. 17. Pick up thy bundle . . . distress. It is the prophet who speaks.—מֵאֵרֶץ = from the earth, away from the ground, for here we have to do not with the retirement of the possessors from the country, but only of the hasty gathering up of the few effects, which a poor exile might take with him. The word "bundle" has therefore a contemptuous side-meaning.—In distress. The prophet speaks this of the people already severely distressed by the enemy in the cities whither they have fled, viii. 14. Comp. xix 9: lii. 5.

Ver. 18. For thus saith Jehovah . . . may find it so. Jehovah Himself is now introduced as speaking, to give a reason for the command in ver. 17.—Since the time of the Judges the people had often been oppressed by foreign enemies within their borders, now they are to be dragged far away into banishment, comp. Isa. xxii. 17—That they may find it so. לִמְעַן יִמְצְאוּ. This expression, which has been very variously interpreted is explained most easily by remembering, a. its relation to bring into straits, b. the ease of supplying the indefinite object “it” (NAEGELSB. Gr., § 78, 2 Ann.), c. the close connection of the ideas “to find” and “to know.” With respect to the latter, I refer especially to Eccles. viii. 17 (and I saw that man cannot find all God’s work, that is done under the sun; though a man labor to seek [it], yet he finds it not, and though a wise man think to know [it], yet can he not find it). Comp. also Jer. xvi. 21.—He who is driven into straits must go whither he is driven. So God by affliction drives Israel into such straits that they must find, i. e., know what it is above all necessary and desirable for them to know, that great “it,” namely, which though unnamed, is well understood. Chap. Isa. xliii. 20; Hos. ix. 7.

Vers. 19 and 20. Wo is me . . . set up my curtains. That both these verses are the words of the country personified, is seen from “my children,” etc., in ver. 20, for neither the prophet says this, nor the people, who are identical with the children and not forsaken, but forsaking.—And I say. In these words also we have a proof that the land is the speaker. For the words express no consciousness of guilt, but a comfort, which the innocent land alone could find, in the fact that a calamity is laid upon it, which must be borne. At the same time we perceive in these words the first gleam of hope in a future deliverance. For men speak thus composedly only when they know that they will not have to bear perpetual but only transient suffering. Comp. v. 4. Also the suffixes of the 1st Pers. in ver. 20 are in favor of the land as the speaker.—Forsake me. Comp. Gen. xliv. 4; Numb. xxxv. 26; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 70, b.

Ver. 21. For the pastors are become stupid . . . dispersed. The land is the speaker: 1. on account of ׀; 2. because the metaphor of pastoral life is continued; 3. because in the mouth of the land this statement does not appear as the repetition of things which have been already frequently said, but as it were a confirmatory testimony from an impartial witness.—Become stupid. Comp. ver. 8,—effect nothing prudent. The meaning is to effect that which is prudent, sensible and in so far also prosperous, comp. xx. 11; Prov. xvii. 8.

Ver. 22. Hark, a message . . . jackal.—These words are, as it were, a last watch-call and signal which denotes (comp. i. 14; iv. 6; vi. 1, 22; viii. 16) that the enemy so frequently announced is present.—For a habitation, comp. ix. 10.

3. Consolatory glance into the future.

X. 23-25.

- 23 I know, Jehovah, that not to man belongs his way,
It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps.¹
- 24 Correct me, Jehovah, but only as it is just,
Not in thine anger, lest thou bring me to nothing.
- 25 Pour out thy wrath on the nations that know thee not,
And on the nations that call not on thy name;
For they have devoured Jacob, yea they consumed and destroyed him,
And his pasture have they laid waste.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 23.—וְיָדַעְתִּי יְהוָה (ὁδὸν ἀνθρώπου πορεύεται καὶ κατορθώσει πορείαν αὐτοῦ) and the Vulgate (nec viri est, ut ambulet et dirigat gressus suos), we might conclude that they read הִלֵּךְ הַיָּדָעִי, if we might assume any exactness in these translations, and if it were not evident from the Chaldee (וְיָדַעְתִּי וְיָדַעְתִּי הִלֵּךְ qui ambulat et dirigit), and the Syriac, that they also read הִלֵּךְ. It is impossible to justify the Van grammatically, when it stands before the infinitive. Even EWALD has accomplished nothing by reference to § 244, a. GAAR, by transposing the Vau, would read הִלֵּכְךָ, which is an equally unusual construction, and gives a feeble sense. The easiest way would be to read לְהִלֵּכְךָ, if the very facility of this reading did not stand in its way. The general meaning is clear, but we must abandon for the present an exact determination of the word.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These verses form a very appropriate conclusion. They involve an honest confession of sin in view of the numerous charges of the discourse. To the threatenings of punishment, however, corresponds the petition to punish not too severely, not in anger, but to pour out the fury on the heathen nations; the basis of which petition is the theocratic hope that Israel cannot be wholly rejected, but there must in the future be a day of grace for them, and vengeance on their enemies. The prophet must be regarded as the speaker, but as speaking not in his own name, but in that of the people.

Ver. 23. I know . . . his steps. Man has not the power to determine how and where he will go. Comp. Ps. xxxvii. 23; Prov. xvi. 1, 9; xix. 21.— יָדָעַתִּי is taken by HIRZIG=perishable, mortal. And the word, according to passages like Ps. xxxix. 14; lviii. 9; cix. 23; Job xix. 10, cannot be denied this meaning. But since the most natural sense: it is not for man, so long as he walks, to determine his course—seems equally appropriate, the word may be regarded as having a double sense, or, as uniting both these meanings.

Ver. 24 and 25. Correct me . . . and his pasture have they laid waste. In ver. 23 the thought is implicitly contained that Israel had wished in his own strength to walk in his own way contrary to the will of God. He now sees how greatly he has sinned and submits to the necessary and merited punishment, praying only for the utmost possible mildness and forbearance. The final conversion and re-acceptance of the people is thus set forth as prospective.—As is just, comp. xxx. 11; xlvi. 28. As was remarked on vii. 5; ix. 23, justice in the Old Testament is not opposed to grace, but to brutal violence. The antithesis of יָדָעַתִּי is not to יָדָעַתִּי , but to יָעַרְתִּי the violence (קָשָׁה) exercised toward the poor, the stranger, orphan and widow. In contrast to this he who consciously maintains the straight line of justice appears fairly disposed and mild, not making his subjective desires his law, but submitting himself to the objective law. Accordingly this as it is just, which evidently has its antithesis in the following: in thine anger, also involves the idea of mildness, because justice in contrast to that anger which is its own law, and respects no other, appears like mildness. It must be granted that this dualistic conception of God as just towards Israel, but wrathful towards the heathen, is not that of the New Testament. That it is the genuine Old Testament view is shown by passages like Ps. vi. 2; xxxviii. 2; lxxix. (where in vers. 6 and 7 our ver. 24 is reproduced); cxxxvii. 8. Observe, moreover, how the prophet here turns the tables. To Israel, now being severely punished, he presents the prospect of grace, but before the heathen, who are now God's instruments in the punishment of Israel, is complete destruction. Comp. Isa. xlvi. 6; Hab. i. 11; iii. 8-12, and Jer. i. and li., especially l. 10 sqq.—The repetition and accumulation of verbs in 25 b, is to portray graphically the rage of the enemies, comp. li. 34.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 6. There cannot be two highest Beings, or there would be none. In the idea of the Absolute is involved that of uniqueness. Polytheism has therefore no highest Being in the absolute sense. Where, however, traces of such are found, polytheism is about either to rise to monotheism (comp. FRIEDRICH NAEGELSBACH, nachhom. Theol. S. 140), or to dissolve into pantheism.

2. Who shall not fear thee? etc., ver. 7, GHISLERUS remarks: "S. Remigius, Episc. Rhemensis ex hoc loco probat, multos ex gentibus credidisse et placuisse Deo, additque in hoc multo magis dici Deum gentium, quoniam multo plures credunt in eum ex gentibus, quam ex Judæis." Comp. Rom. ii. 14, 15, and THOLUCK ad h. l.—John i. 4 (λόγος σπερματικός).

3. AUGUSTINE remarks on the Infinity of God, de Trin., V. 1. "Intelligimus Deum sine qualitate bonum, sine quantitate magnum, sine indigentia creatorem, sine situ presentem, sine habitu omnia continentem, sine loco ubique totum, sine tempore sempiternum, sine ulla sui mutatione mutabilia facientem nihilque patientem."

4. On ver. 10. In hemist. a, a proof of the Trinity has been repeatedly found. So ex gr., HALBRUNNER (Jer. proph. monumenta in locos comm. Theol. digesta, Lauingen, 1586, page 38), FÖRSTER (S. 61), and among the moderns NEUMANN (S. 547). The latter says . . . "the passage affords a sure testimony of the trinitarian view of God in the Old Testament; the truth of the Spirit, the life of the Father, the kingdom of the Son, comprising in themselves the fulness of all emanations of the divine existence in opposition to heathen superstition." But against this it may be urged that in opposition to the multiplicity of idols the author had to set forth not the trinity, but the unity of the divine nature, as he has done, in vers. 6 and 7, and that his purpose here (ver. 10) is merely to contrast the false gods with the true, the dead with the living, the powerless with the Almighty. That the contrast is exhibited in three points, we are not indeed to regard as accidental, but to explain it rather by the general significance of the number three, than by the purpose of intimating the Trinity.

5. On ver. 14: "All men are fools. Ye fools and blind, says our Saviour (Matt. xxiii). Such a word, spoken in season takes hold and produces conviction; but it must be administered with spirit and fire; for if it is only human words to men, they will make a quarrel out of them." ZINZENDORF.

6. On ver. 14 (A lie is their casting). This applies not only to the idols which men make of earthly materials, but to all self-made idols of the heart. The carnal mind, which tends downwards, feels annoyed by the nearness of God, and seeks therefore at all times to escape from it. But since man cannot do without God, he makes himself a god or gods, as he wants them. Whether these gods are visible and palpable images, or the abstract forms of speculation, the words of the text always apply to them; they are a lie, and there is no spirit in them. Accordingly there is heathenism enough in the midst of Christianity, and it may be asked, which is worse, the new or the old?

7. On ver. 16. What perfect historical reality and personality is here! A creator of the universe stands before us, one therefore, who has called all things into existence by His free, personal will, and who at the same time as the living personal Head of all the spirits governing the world is infinitely exalted above every limited local deity. But at the same time the relation of this Deity to the world is not an abstract and general, but a living and personal relation. For this God primarily holds immediate personal intercourse with one nation of the earth, as a father with his son, and He is this nation's greatest treasure and inalienable property, as on the other hand the nation belongs to Him as the object of His free personal election, which none may dispute or annul.

8. On ver. 19 (I must bear it). "I pray all teachers for God's sake, that they reflect and err not, that they do not, in order to retain their living, repeat these words of Jeremiah, and cover up their laziness, ill-success, frivolity, their own unfruitfulness and selfishness, with the excuse, 'this is my plague.' O no, what we should call a plague is burdens of a hundred-weight, from which we long to be freed, which crush us almost to death; persons from whom we would flee as a bird from a cage; a pressure under which we are martyred with shame, and yet have no permission to depart. These lead one finally, after many struggles and cries unto the Lord for his dismissal, and after an answer of absolute denial, to say in calmness: I believe this is now my plague, and I must bear it." ZINZENDORF.

9. On ver. 20. "The jealousy of the Saviour is so strict, that He will have His children directed to Him (Isa. xlv. 11), and the idea of the pastoral office with which some good teachers are infected, of regarding and treating souls as their souls, sheep as their sheep, children as their children, is in the highest degree opposed to His will. Hence He often, for a just judgment, does not allow their joy in souls to last, but lets them see and conclude more of their decline and less of their success, than there really is. For He will not give His glory to another, and the teachers are not Christ, but sent by Him, before Him." ZINZENDORF.

10. On ver. 21. "As sheep must either starve or be led to filthy and poisonous pasture, if their shepherds are fools, who do not know how to manage sheep, so is this much more the case in the spiritual pastorate." CRAMER.

11. On ver. 23. "The steps of every man are ordered by the Lord, what man understands His way? (Prov. xx. 24). And every man's way is right in his own eyes, but the Lord alone maketh the hearts certain (Prov. xxi. 2). Therefore we must pray: Lord, make known to me the way in which I should walk, for after Thee is my desire. Teach me to do Thy will, for Thou art my God; let Thy good Spirit guide me in a plain path (Ps. cxliii. 8-10)." CRAMER.

12. On ver. 23. "Certum est, nos velle, eum volumus, sed ille facit, ut velimus bonum, de quo dictum est, quod preparatur voluntas a Domino (Prov. viii. 35 sec. Sept.) Certum est, nos facere, eam facimus, sed ille facit, ut faciamus prebendo vires efficacissimas voluntati, qui dixit; faciam ut in justifi- cationibus meis ambuletis et julicia mea observetis (Ezek. xxxvi. 26, 27)." AUGUSTIN. De grat. et lib. arbit. Cap. 16.

13. On ver. 24. "There is a beautiful distinction between the suffering and punishment of the pious and the ungodly, which consists in modo et in fine. For when God chastises the pious He does it not with anger and fury, but as a discreet and kind father or teacher may discipline his son and disciple, without ill-humor. Thus also God does with His children. He does it, not that He may bring them to nothing, but that they may not esteem themselves innocent (xxx. 11). On the other hand He makes an end of the ungodly, and they must drink up the dregs (Ps. lxxv. 8)." CRAMER.

14. On ver. 25. "Querri potest lic, an contra infideles, ut hodie sunt Turce et Judæi, orandum? Orandum et contra eos et pro Es. Contra eos, quatenus persequuntur ecclesiam, pro iis, quatenus ecclesiam non persequuntur, ut convertantur, quemadmodum fit in Litania; forgive our enemies, persecutors and slanderers, and turn their hearts." FÜRSTER.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. [On ver. 7. SAURIN:—Fear may be 1. Terror. 2. A disposition to render God all the worship He requires, to submit to all the laws He imposes, to conceive all the emotions of admiration, devotedness and love, which the eminence of His perfections demands. 3. A disposition which considers Him as alone possessing all that can contribute to our happiness and misery. In the last sense (which is meant here) God is the only object of fear; for 1. God is a being whose will is self-efficient; 2. the only being who can act immediately on spiritual souls; 3. the only being who can make all creatures concur in His designs."—S. R. A.]

2. On ver. 10. There are three main forms of idolatry: 1. Polytheism, which does not deny the predicates of deity, but attributes them to false subjects.—2. Pantheism, which denies the subjects and the predicates.—3. Deism, which confesses the subject but denies the predicates.—These errors are opposed in ver. 10, from which we derive the theme:—The Scriptural doctrine of God in opposition to the errors of idolatry.—This teaches us to know God, 1. as the true, real God in opposition to those who attribute the divine properties to imaginary false gods; 2. as the living God in opposition to those who represent God as a mere all-pervading force; 3. as the eternal King, in opposition to those who represent God only as a transient work-master, and not as the ever active ruler of the world.

3. There is a homily of Origen (Hom. VIII. cd. LOMMATZSCH) on vers. 12-14, in which by the earth he understands the body, by בָּרָא (οὐκονέμνη) the soul, by the heavens the spirit. The clouds (mist) ver. 13 from the ends of the earth are the saints whom God has chosen from the least of the earth.

4. On vers. 14-16. It is manifest that the task of religion is not to make God, but to receive Him, who is, in faith. Every manufactured god is an idol. be it a visible one made with hands, or an invisible one made only in thought. The latter kind of idolatry is alas! very prevalent among us Christians. For a warning against such ruinous heresies, and for the confirmation of our faith in the God, whom as Christians we ought to serve, we institute on the basis of the text, a comparison between the manufactured gods and the God, of whom the Scriptures teach us. 1. The manufactured gods, 1. are deceit, etc., vers. 14, b; 15, a. 2. They perish when they are visited (in the day of divine judgment upon them they vanish into nothing). 3. Those who made them are with all their skill put to shame. II. The God, of whom the Holy Scriptures teach us. 1. He is not a lifeless deceptive image, for He has created all things, the visible and the invisible (Jehovah Zebaoth). 2. Being the source of all life He cannot perish. 3. Those who serve Him are not put to shame, for He is their treasure, as they again are His heritage (He is not only infinitely exalted above time and space, but infinitely near us, His children).

5. On ver. 10. From these words of the prophet we may learn what it is in great affliction and sorrow of heart to bow under the mighty hand of God. It is 1, that a man recognize the suffering as his suffering, i. e., (a) as that which he has himself prepared, (b) as that which is right for him, i. e., not too heavy and not too light, but exactly corresponding to its beneficent purpose; 2, that they suffer willingly, (a) in patience, (b) in hope.

6. On ver. 28. Theme: Man proposes, God disposes. This is 1, a humbling of our pride, 2, a strong support of our hope.

NOTE.—FÖRSTER remarks that these words may serve for the text of a concio valedictoria.

7. On ver. 25. Theme: How we should behave under the chastisements of God. 1. We should humbly submit to them as necessary and wholesome means of improvement. 2. We should be certain that they will not then transgress those bounds nor proceed to our destruction.

4. FOURTH DISCOURSE.

(CHAPTERS XI.—XII.)

WITH AN APPENDIX. CHAP. XIII.

The three chapters xi.—xiii. are headed in common by a longer superscription (xi. 1) such as those with which Jeremiah is accustomed to introduce the greater sections. A similar one occurs again in xiv. 1. But chaps. xi. and xii. only form a connected whole, as will hereafter be shown. In the passage xii. 14, where the prophet speaks of the wicked neighbors by which the inheritance of Israel was assailed, an allusion has been found to the event reported in 2 Kings xxiv. 2 and the time of composition of this discourse determined accordingly. (So DAHLER, MAURER, HITZIG, UMBREIT, GRAF). The discourse would accordingly pertain to the end of the reign of Jehoiakim. But in this case Jeremiah must have named the Chaldeans as the instruments of punishment, as he does without exception in all the discourses delivered after the battle of Carchemish. The fact that the Chaldeans are not mentioned is a sure sign that the discourse was delivered before the date mentioned, which falls in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (xxv. 1; xlvi. 2). Since now in the lifetime of Josiah a violation of covenant in the degree with which the people are reproached in xi. 9-13 (observe especially ver. 13) is not to be thought of, and the three months' reign of Jehoahaz is scarcely worth consideration, we are referred to the first years of Jehoiakim, consequently the same period to which the preceding discourse (ch. vii. 10) belongs. If what is said in xii. 9 sqq. of wicked neighbors has some reference to 2 Kings xxiv. 2 it can only be that we may perceive in the latter the at least partial fulfilment of the former. Comp. the comments on xii. 14.—Ch. xiii. is not connected with chaps. xi. and xii. It forms a well-compacted whole, the time and origin of which may be perceived partly from its silence with respect to the Chaldeans, and partly from what is said concerning the pride of the king. It must likewise belong to the first years of Jehoiakim. Comp. the preliminary remarks on ch. xiii. The principle of chronological arrangement is here also perceptible.

That xii. 7-17 is not a later addition, as MAURER, HITZIG and GRAF suppose, is evident, as it seems to me, from the structure of the whole.

The fundamental thought of the discourse is:

The contrast of the covenant and conspiracy.

(יְהוָה וְיִשְׂרָאֵל.)

1. Reminder of the recent renewal under Josiah of the covenant between Jehovah and the people, xi. 1-8.
2. First stage of the conspiracy; entire Israel, instead of keeping the covenant with Jehovah, conspires against Him, xi. 9-13.
3. Punishment of the conspiracy an inevitable, severe judgment, xi. 14-17. (Appendix to the previous strophe).
4. Second stage of the conspiracy: the plot of the Anathothites, xi. 18-23.
5. Third stage of the conspiracy: the plot in the prophet's own family, xii. 1-6.
6. The conspiracy of Israel punished by the conspiracy of the neighbors against them, xii. 7-13.
7. Solution of all antitheses by the final union of all in the Lord, xii. 14-17.

CHAPTER XI.

1. Reminder of the recent renewal under Josiah of the Covenant between Jehovah and the people.

XI. 1-8.

- 1 The word which came to Jeremiah from Jehovah, saying :
- 2 Hear ye the words of this covenant,
And speak ye to the men of Judah,
And to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.
- 3 And say to them : Thus saith Jehovah, the God of Israel :
Cursed¹ be the man who hears not the words of this covenant,
- 4 Which I commanded to your fathers
In the day that I brought them forth out of the land of Egypt,
And out of the iron furnace, saying,
Hearken ye unto my voice and do them [my commands]
According to all that which I command you ;
So shall ye be my people and I will be your God ;
- 5 To perform the oath which I swore to your fathers ;
To give them a land flowing with milk and honey, as it is this day.
And I said, Amen, Jehovah !
- 6 And Jehovah said unto me,
Proclaim all these words in the city of Judah
And in the streets of Jerusalem, saying,
Hear ye the words of this covenant and do them !
- 7 For I testified to your fathers on the day²
That I brought them out of the land of Egypt,
Even to this day urgently and unceasingly :
Hearken ye unto my voice !
- 8 But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear,
And went, every man in the hardness of his wicked heart ;
And I brought upon them all the words of this covenant,
Which I commanded them to keep ; but they kept them not.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 3.—וְאֵלֶּיךָ ver. 3, and the corresponding אֵלֶיךָ, ver. 5, remind us of Deut. xxvii. 15 sqq., especially ver. 26.—IRON FURNACE is found only in Deut. iv. 20 and (as a quotation) in 1 Ki. viii. 51. אֵלֶיךָ is not exclusively yet especially peculiar to Deut., since besides Gen. xliii. 3; Exod. xix. 21, 22 it occurs in the Pentateuch only Deut. iv. 20; viii. 19; xxx. 29; xxxi. 28; xxxii. 46.—שָׁמַרְתֶּם ver. 8, is found in the Pentateuch only in Deut. xxix. 18. Also the expressions so shall ye be my people, ver. 4, and a land flowing, etc., are not indeed peculiar to, but very common in Deuteronomy. (Comp. in reference to the former Exod. vi. 7; Levit. xxvi. 12; and Deut. iv. 20; vii. 6; xiv. 2; xxvi. 18; xxix. 9; xxxi. 12,—in reference to the latter Exod. iii. 8, 17, and Deut. vi. 3; xi. 9; xxvi. 9, 15; xxvii. 3; xxxi. 29).

² Ver. 7.—בְּיוֹם we should expect כִּי־יוֹם. The former is perhaps occasioned by יוֹם, ver. 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe forms the basis of the discourse. It must therefore, to be understood, be rendered in closest connection with what follows. It relates how the Lord once (in the 18th year of king Josiah, 2 Kings xxii.), after the discovery of the book of the law, admonished to the observance of the covenant formed between him and their fathers, and especially according to the standard of the 5th book of the Torah, both on the whole (vers. 1-5) and particulars (i. e., by repeated proclamation in the cities of Judah and streets of Jerusalem, vers. 6-8) indicating both the blessed consequences of covenant-fidelity (vers. 4 and 5) and the ruinous consequences of infidelity (ver. 8). In so far as ver. 10 relates the breach of the covenant so expressly enjoined in this strophe it is seen that this injunction must have been made previously, that therefore this strophe gives a representation of a past fact. But so far as the strophe reports only this inculcation of the covenant it is clear that it points to something later than its redintegration.

Vers. 1 and 2. The word which came . . . and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. The superscription is like vii. 1.—Hear, etc. Since, as previously remarked, what follows is to be regarded as the narrative of a fact which occurred in former times, hear does not refer to the contents of the word proclaimed in ver. 1, but of an earlier word. Ver. 1 refers therefore to the whole discourse, and before hear is to be supplied an introductory formula leading back to the real time of this inculcation of the covenant. The subject of hear is most probably according to ver. 6, the people of Judah and Jerusalem. The words stand at the head as a general call of awakening and admonition. וּדְבַרְתֶּם, LXX., καὶ λαλήσετε, which recommends the reading וּדְבַרְתֶּם. But according to the reading of the text it is the priests, elders and prophets, who in 2 Kings xxii. 1; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 29, are expressly mentioned as participating in the covenant. There are as it were three concentric circles. The smallest represents Jeremiah, who would bring home to the people the importance of keeping the covenant. But it cannot be denied that the want of an express designation of the subject is remarkable. Perhaps the brevity of the expression may be thus explained that the prophet wished to give mere hints, knowing that these would be sufficient to recall to the memory of his hearers the former more extended discourses.—The words of this covenant. The pronoun this designates the covenant as one before their eyes and well-known. Comp. this passage with 2 Kings xxii. and xxiii.; 2 Chron. xxxiv. (Vid., especially 2 Kings xxiii. 3, coll. xxii. 13; xxiii. 2; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 30), and there can be no doubt that by the words this covenant in vers. 2, 3, 6, 8, is meant that, the archives of which were contained in the book found by Hezekiah. The expression is found besides only in Deut. (v. 3; xxix. 13). The expression, words of the covenant, besides 2 Kings xxiii. 2; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 30, is found only Deut. xxviii. 69; xxix. 8, and in Jer. xxxiv. 18. This passage also (to anticipate) contains several references to Deuteronomy, from which it follows that the covenant-record, which both Jeremiah in this passage and the authors of the books of Kings and Chronicles (2 Kings xx. and xxiii.; 2 Chron. xxxiv.) have in view, is to be understood at least primarily and especially to be Deuteronomy.—Men of Judah. Comp. rems. on iv. 4. On the exchange of וָאֵל and וָאֵל, see rems. on x. 1.

Vers. 3-5. And say to them . . . Amen, Jehovah! Jeremiah receives the special commission to present before the people the importance of keeping the covenant: cursing and blessing being dependent on it. While in vers. 3, 5, the discourse seems to be addressed to the whole of the people, it turns in vers. 6-8, to the particular portions. Further, while the prophet in vers. 3-5 holds before the people the divine curse and blessing, he seeks in vers. 6-8 to make an impression on them by pointing to the fulfilment of the curse already taken place on their disobedient fathers.—In the day, etc. Comp. vii. 22; xxxiv. 13.—The pronoun them is to be referred to the plural conception of commands implied in according to all, comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 61, 1.—To perform the oath. In order to realize the existence of the oath, comp. Deut. viii. 18, coll.; xxvii. 26.—Amen, Jehovah is, as remarked, a quotation from Deut. xxvii. 15 sqq. The prophet gives it to be understood by this Amen, that he has understood the allusion contained in cursed, ver. 3.

Vers. 6-8. And Jehovah said unto me . . . but they kept them not. The prophet here reads the commission given him in the 18th year of Josiah, to make known the words of the covenant by reading them not only in the central sanctuary (comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 1-3), but also by repeated readings in the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem. The prophet may have accompanied king Josiah on his circuit, which is spoken of in 2 Kings xxiii. 15-20. Since it was the making known of a written document, the proclamation is most probably meant in the sense of reading, as וָאֵל generally signifies to read aloud; comp. 2 Kings xxii. 8, 10, 16; xxiii. 2; Jer. xxxvi. 6, 8, 10, 13, etc.—For I testified. Comp. Ps. l. 7, and the previously cited passages of Deut.—urgently. Comp. vii. 13, 25.—But they hearkened not. Comp. vii. 24.—hardness. Comp. rems. on iii. 17.

2. Entire Israel, instead of keeping the covenant with Jehovah, enters into conspiracy against Him.

XI. 9-13.

- 9 And Jehovah said unto me,
A conspiracy is found among the men of Judah,
And among the citizens of Jerusalem.
10 They are returned to the sins of their fathers,
Who scorned to hear my words;
And are gone after other gods, to serve them.
The house of Israel, and the house of Judah
Have broken the covenant which I made with their fathers.
11 Therefore thus saith Jehovah, Behold!
I bring upon them evil, from which they cannot escape;
And they will cry to me, but I will not hear them.
12 And the cities of Judah and citizens of Jerusalem shall go,
And cry to the gods to which they burn incense,
But help them—this they will not at the time of their calamity.

13 For as the number of thy cities are thy gods, O Judah !
 And as the number of the streets in Jerusalem
 Have ye set up altars of shame,
 Even altars to burn incense unto Baal.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Lord has made a covenant with the people, but when the people are regarded now (at the time when Jeremiah thus speaks), there is no longer any trace of it (the covenant made in the reign of Josiah) to be found, but only conspiracy. The prophet shows the existence of such a conspiracy in three stages: 1, in the entire people of Israel (vers. 9, 10); 2, among the people of Anathoth (vers. 18-23); 3, in the prophet's own family (xii. 1-6).—In this strophe the existence of such conspiracy among the people in general is just stated (vers. 9 and 10), then its punishment is announced, (ver. 11) which will be of such a nature that the gods will be unable to deliver from it (ver. 12), though Judah and Jerusalem worship so large a number of them (ver. 13).

Vers. 9 and 10. A conspiracy is found . . . which I made with their fathers. On is found (נִסְתָּרָה), comp. ii. 34; v. 26. נִסְתָּרָה=conspiracy against the rightful Lord, in opposition to the covenant (בְּרִית) which is in accordance with right and duty. In such conspiracies the time of the kings was especially rife (comp. 1 Kings xvi. 20; 2 Kings xii. 20; xiv. 10; xv. 15, 30; xvii. 4), as generally a disposition to conspire is attributed to the Jews (comp. DREUSLER on Isa. viii. 12; Acts xxiii. 12 sqq.).—The expression נִסְתָּרָה presupposes the covenant mentioned in ver. 1 sqq., and proves that this section is to be regarded as a reminder of a past fact.—House of Israel, etc. A comprehensive survey: not merely Judah and Jerusalem (ver. 9), but Israel and Judah have broken the covenant.

Vers. 11-13. Therefore thus saith Jehovah . . . to burn incense to Baal. Announcement of punishment.—For gives the reason and explanation of the declaration of ver. 12, that Israel will take refuge with the idols. This may happen because they have idols in numbers, and offer to them numerous acts of worship.—as the number. Comp. ii. 28.—altars of shame. Comp. rems. on iii. 24; Hos. ix. 10

XI. 14-17.

14 Therefore pray not thou for this people,
 Nor raise for them crying and supplication ;
 For I hear not, if they cry unto me on account of their calamity.
 15 What has my beloved to do in my house?
 To practise it—the enormity?
 Will crying and holy flesh take away from thee thy hurt?¹
 Then mayest thou exult !
 16 “Green olive-tree, splendid with goodly fruit,”
 Thus did Jehovah call thy name.
 Amid rattling thunder he set fire to it ;
 And they broke—its branches.
 17 And Jehovah Zebaoth, who planted thee,
 Hath pronounced evil against thee
 “On account of the wickedness of the house of Israel and the house of Judah
 Which they practised to their own hurt,² Provoking me and burning incense to Baal.”³

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 15.—The text here is certainly corrupt; 1, because, as it reads at present, it affords no intelligible meaning; 2, because the ancient translations indicate other readings. נִסְתָּרָה especially is unintelligible, whether we connect it with what goes before or after. The LXX. translate μη εὐχαι και κρια αγια ἀβελουσιν ἀπὸ σοῦ τας κακίας σου. They seem then to have read נִסְתָּרָה as some suppose, or more probably נִסְתָּרָה (ΒΥΖΟΥΡ, ΜΑΤΡΙΑ, ΘΕΑΙ). This latter word, indeed, occurs only in Ps. xxxii. 7 in the expression כָּלֵם כָּלֵם רָנִי; but since the word is formed quite regularly (comp. הַקֵּץ, הַקֵּץ, etc.) the plural רָנִים (instead of רָנִים, which elsewhere is certainly the form exclusively used: comp. OLSH., § 156), being analogous to the forms רָנִי, חָנִי, etc., since further רָנָה, also vil. 16; xl. 14; xiv. 12, coll. Ps. xvii. 1; 1 Kl. viii. 28, etc., signifies supplication, prayer, and is translated in xl. 14; xiv. 12 by the LXX. δέησις, since finally the idea of “beseeching, crying,” corresponds exactly to נִסְתָּרָה. I regard it as most probable that רָנִים was the original word in this place, but that the word, either purposely, because it does not occur elsewhere, or by mistake, was changed into the slightly differing form רַבִּים. If the question begins with הַרְבִּים, the following וּבְיַד יְהוָה is entirely in place.—פֶּשֶׁר-לְדָשׁ is found also in Hagg. ii. 12 of the flesh of sacrifice, and seems here especially to indicate the Illocusta or burnt-offerings, in which the flesh of the animal is burnt (Levit. i). The following words also are scarcely intelligible without an alteration of the text. We, therefore, after the example of many commentators, either render פֶּשֶׁר-לְדָשׁ as Hiph. (like וּבְיַד יְהוָה, 9, 2. Vide in loc.), or read יַעֲבִירָה. We connect כִּי after כְּעֵלְיָהּ (LXX., EWALD, MEIER, etc.), and obtain the sense, Will thy prayers and sacrifices take away thy wickedness (רַעְיָהּ has the double sense=sin and punishment) from thee? The thought then corresponds exactly to the close of ver. 14.

[BLAVNEY renders: Shall vows and holy flesh be allowed to come from thee? When thou art malignant, shalt thou then rejoice? NOYES and HENDERSON, adhering to the text, render, the former: While many pollute it with wickedness?—The holy flesh shall pass away from thee. For when thou doest evil, thou rejoicest; the latter: Committing as she doth the manifold enormity? And the holy flesh hath passed away from thee, etc. It seems, however, strained to render this expression “pass away” of their sacrifices being unacceptable to God.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This section is closely attached to the preceding as an appendix. In ver. 11 it was said that a punishment of Israel was determined upon, which they could not escape. For neither will the Lord hear their cries, nor the idols be able to help them.—The thought I hear not (ver. 11 b), is further explained in this strophe: 1. The Lord will not even hear the prophet (ver. 14 a); 2, nor the people (ver. 14 b) even though they offer prayers and sacrifices in His temple (ver. 15). Although the Lord even acknowledges Israel to be a beautiful olive-tree which He Himself planted, yet He must adhere to His determination to punish on account of the wickedness which Israel has practised (vers. 16 and 17).

Vers. 14 and 15. Therefore pray not thou . . . then mayest thou exult. At first the Lord explains that the intercession of the prophet will be of no avail in the same words as in vii. 16 coll. xiv. 11. He then says that the people's own supplication to avert the calamity will be in vain. This he elucidates in ver. 14, by showing that this beseeching, though offered in the temple and with sacrifices, is only a deceptive mask, under which is hidden the object of continuing in sin. יְיָ is not Jehovah nor the prophet, but the people, this being imperatively demanded by the sense of the question. What has my beloved to do in my house? can be asked only of such a beloved, whose appearance in the house of the Lord is not welcome. This can be Israel alone, who, although in themselves and originally the beloved of Jehovah, have yet been so estranged from Him, that the question may be fairly asked, what this faithless beloved (now ironically so called) has to do in the house of the Lord? The expression appears to be based on Deut. xxxiii. 12, where Benjamin, in evident allusion to his dwelling in the vicinity of the national sanctuary, is called the beloved of Jehovah. Comp. besides Isa. v. 1: Ps. lx. 7; cviii. 7; cxvii. 2.—The answer to the question is: To practise it . . . the enormity. As to the construction of these words, the anticipation of the object by a pronoun is nothing unusual. Comp. xxvii. 8; li. 56; 1 Sam. ix. 13; NAEGLER, Gr., § 77, 2.—But why this anticipation here? It presupposes that the object has been already mentioned, or is generally known. Now this כִּיפֹרָה, by which not any wickedness, but in accordance with the question, the hypocritical pseudo-worship of Jehovah is to be understood, has not been mentioned in the discourse hitherto. But in rhetorical vivacity the prophet presupposes as known, that which, now as before, deeply troubles him, and which by the initial words of the verse he has indicated with sufficient plainness. The thought and the expression recall unmistakably (as MAURER remarks) vii. 10: “and then ye come and stand before me in the house which bears my name, and say, we are hidden—to do all these abominations.” As here (vii. 10) the head of the wickedness is found in this, that Israel regard the temple-service as a sort of sow-washing (2 Pet. ii. 22), to which they betake themselves, not to purify themselves thoroughly, but only to make room for fresh filth, so in this passage the prophet says that Israel has nothing to do in the house of the Lord, but “to do it, the wickedness,” namely, that described in chap. vii., which, under the appearance of wishing to be freed from sin, only hides the object of more completely committing it. Accordingly כִּיפֹרָה is here to be taken in the sense in which it most frequently occurs, viz., in that of evil design, of purposed, conscious wickedness (Ps. x. 2; xxi. 12; cxxxix. 20; Job xxi. 27, etc.). The more full-sounding form (comp. OLSU. § 133) has a rhetorical reason, as also the rarer suffix forms following כִּי. This double form, (which does not occur elsewhere in Jeremiah) may both in itself and in its accumulation, be for the purpose of rhetorical effect and more particularly that of irony. With this agrees the distinctly ironical expression, then mayest thou exult, which bears reference to what has my beloved? etc., that is, to the manner in which the proud and secure people appeared in the temple. Not now, the prophet means to say, but then may you exult, when your prayers and sacrifices have helped you.

Vers. 16 and 17. Green olive-tree . . . incense to Baal. The occasion of the thought, prayers, etc. will not avert thy calamity. This will be on this account, viz., that the Lord, though He acknowledges Israel to be a beautiful olive-tree, planted by Himself, has determined to destroy him. The parable of the olive-tree in reference to Israel is found also in Ps. lii. 10 [8]; Isa. xvii. 6; xxiv. 13; Hos. xiv. 6.—Amid rattling, etc., (לְקוֹל) comp. on x. 13.—הַמְּוֹלָה synonymous with רֶבֶב, besides only in Ezek. i. 24. The prophet compares the catastrophe threatening Israel to a tempest.—Set fire, etc., comp. xvii. 27; xxi.

14; xliii. 12; xlix. 27; l. 32; Am. i. 14.—They broke. Since an intransitive meaning of the original word cannot be proved, we must regard as the subject either (by a rapid transition from figure to reality) the enemies, or it is to be derived from another root בָּרַךְ , the radical meaning of which is tumultuari, agitari, concitari (comp. FÜRST, II. W. B. and Concord. s. v.) The former is to be preferred, since fire is not followed by a mere shaking but a breaking of branches.—And Jehovah Zebaoth, etc. If in and they broke we perceived a partial transition into the sphere of reality (namely, in respect to the subject), here we perceive the transition to be complete. It is declared in plain words that the Lord has pronounced the judgment of condemnation on Israel, (xix. 15; xxvi. 19). In the word planted only, which contains a corroborative point, as it traces not only the name but also the existence of the beautiful olive tree to God (comp. ii. 21) is the figure still retained. On practised to their own hurt, comp. vii. 19; xliv. 3.

And remarked not, that they had had thoughts concerning me.
“Let us destroy the tree with its fruit,
And extirpate him from the land of the living,
That his name may no more be mentioned.”
20 But Jehovah Zebaoth judges with justice;
He tries the reins and heart.
I shall see thy vengeance on them,
For on thee have I devolved my cause.
21 Therefore this saith Jehovah of the men of Anathoth,
Who sought after thy life, saying:
“Prophesy not in the name of Jehovah,
That thou die not! by our hand”—
22 Therefore thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth:
Behold, I visit them,
The young men shall die by the sword;
Their sons and their daughters shall die of famine.
23 And there shall be no remnant of them,
For I will bring calamity on the men of Anathoth
In the year of their visitation.²

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet here also evidently speaks of a conspiracy, and of one which existed in a narrower circle (the city of Anathoth). Ver. 18 opens with the declaration that in what follows a fact will be communicated, of which the prophet received intelligence only from the Lord. In ver. 19 it is stated that this fact consisted in a plot against the life of the prophet. In ver. 20 the prophet expresses his hope that the Lord will avenge him. Vers. 21-23 announce the vengeance of the Lord in response.

Vers. 18 and 19. And Jehovah instructed me . . . no more be mentioned. The connection with 1 shows that the following verses are closely connected with the preceding. The construction in ver. 18 a is like xx. 7 a. By instructed me the prophet gives the Lord the glory and preintimates at the same time that it was something secret.—Their doings declares that this consisted in an act of wicked men.—Tame, comp. iii. 4; 2 Sam. xii. 3. [HENDERSON:—A lamb that has been tamed so as to be familiar and play with children. One such is commonly to be found in the house of the Arab.—S. R. A.]—With its fruit. HIRZIG would read בְּפֵרוֹתָא in its cup (comp. Deut. xxxiv. 7; Ezek. xxi. 3) because פֵּרוֹת signifies corn, not the fruit of a tree. But the idea of the product afforded by the tree such as serves for food is here essential. Comp. ver. 21 b. Since, as it is acknowledged דָּבָר originally meant food in general (comp. Gen. xlvii. 12; Isai. lxxv. 25; Job xxviii. 5; Prov. xxvii. 27) we here also understand by it the edible product of the tree. Why is the way of the wicked prosperous?

Why do all live in peace, who practise knavery?

They grow up, they also bear fruit:
Thou art near in their mouth, but far from their reins.

Regard me and prove my heart towards thee:¹
Pluck them out as sheep to the slaughter,
And set them apart for the day of execution.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe attaches itself closely to the preceding, proving conspiracy even in the narrowest circle, in the family of the prophet, where it was the least to be expected. After the prophet had given the Lord to understand his dissatisfaction that the ungodly, of whom ch. xi. treats, still pursue their course in safety (vers. 1, 2) and after he has expressed the hope of his justification and their destruction (ver. 3) the more confidently, that these people infect the air, as it were, with the poisonous breath of their unbelief, and render the land uninhabitable (ver. 4), the Lord answers him: If even the enmity of

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

As the undertakings of the conspirators against the prophet were virtually against the Lord also, so the prophet's action is a symbol of the judgment which the Lord will inflict in larger and severer measure. Therefore what is said in vers. 7 and 8 of abandoning house and heritage applies at the same time to the prophet who leaves his paternal house in Anathoth, and to the Lord who forsakes Israel. The positive punishment, however, which will consist in the combination of many enemies against Israel (vers. 9-11) corresponds exactly to that triple combination against the Lord and His prophet, spoken of in xi. 9-xii. 6.

Vers. 7 and 8. I have forsaken my house . . . have I hated it. After what, according to ver. 6, his house has inflicted upon him, nothing is more natural than he should leave it. It is, therefore, a matter of course, to regard the prophet himself as the subject of the verb have forsaken. But in the course of the speech it certainly becomes evident that Jehovah is the forsaker and Israel the forsaken and abandoned house (ver. 9 sqq.). ZWINGLI and BUGENHAGEN regard vers. 7 and 8 as the words of the prophet. The former considers that Jehovah begins to speak at "Go." I am of opinion, as already remarked, that the words are to be understood as having a double reference. The prophet declares that he has forsaken his father's house in Anathoth, that he has abandoned his heritage, his beloved, to the hands of those, who from enmity towards its possessors would abuse it. Yea, he has been compelled to hate and shun his heritage, since it has become hostile to him, and no longer affords him any security. He, whose life the inmates of the house were seeking, was most threatened in the very house, which he was inhabiting with them. He therefore says that his heritage has become to him as a lion, which one meets in the forest; and that he does not fear the lion without reason, is seen from the fact that it has roared against him, in which is an evident allusion to "with a loud cry have pursued thee," ver. 6. At the same time, as all the commentators recognize, these words are perfectly applicable to Jehovah. The point of connection is this, that the inimical relation of the prophet and his house is only a symptom of the enmity which Israel, as an entire nation, cherish towards the Lord their God. Hence it results, that the perfects in this entire passage are not altogether prophetic perfects. For they are based on the fact that the prophet is obliged to speak of that which has occurred between himself and his house as of past facts. He cannot, ex. gr., speak otherwise in vers. 7 and 8, than I have forsaken, repudiated, given, hated. But since this, at the same time, refers to Jehovah, these in so far still future facts are expressed by præterites, which yields the meaning that the action of the prophet as emblematical includes the action of Jehovah. Hence it is, that in accordance with the main fact in vers. 7 and 8, the whole discourse is presented as in past time. In so far as the words of ver. 7 refer to Jehovah, we may apply my house to the temple (comp. vii. 2-10, etc.), and my heritage to the people of Israel (comp. Deut. xxxii. 9), while the desire of my soul (הַרְבֵּי, ar. λελγ., comp. xi. 15; Ps. lxxxiv. 2) refers to the whole.

Ver. 9. Is my heritage . . . to devour.—That טֶמֶן is a bird of prey, or collectively, birds of prey, is placed beyond doubt by Gen. xv. 11; Isa. xviii. 6; Ezek. xxxix. 4; Job xxviii. 7. This meaning is therefore assured for this passage and Isa. xlvi. 11.—טֶמֶן, according to טֶמֶן, טֶמֶן, Judges v. 30 (comp. Aram. טֶמֶן tingere) can signify only the colored, variegated, as, from Jerome and the Syriac downwards, most of the commentators translate it: this parti-colored bird, which appears in their midst, is attacked by the other birds. Comp. the vouchers in Hirtz —' to me, is not equivalent to in relation to me, but merely expresses interest (Dat. ethicus). Whether the ה in the second טֶמֶן is an article or interrogative is doubtful. Grammatically the latter is preferable, but the former accords best with the sense. OLSHAUSEN, § 100, 1, maintains that it is grammatically admissible. Taken as a question, it expresses astonishment (comp. vii. 9).—Go is affirmative and confirmatory: yea, not only the birds, all birds (i. e., all nations) shall fall upon the heritage of the Lord.

Ver. 10. Many pastors . . . a barren waste. The same matter in a new form. Comp. vi. 3; Mic. v. 4, 5.—The ground property of my desire, comp. iii. 19.

Vers. 11 and 12. They have made it a desert . . . find means to escape. Not only the inhabited country, but the plains which serve for pasturage with their hills (comp. iii. 2, 21; xiv. 6), are laid waste, so that the devouring sword has swept through the whole land from one end to the other (comp. vi. 25; xxv. 29, xlvi. 10, 14).

Ver. 13. They have sown wheat . . . Jehovah's wrath. Total result:—No harvest, labor is vain,—weakness, shame. The thought is not, what a man soweth that shall he reap, but what a man soweth he shall not reap, the harvest shall fail, all the labor expended shall be lost. Of course it is a material harvest alone which is spoken of, comp. Deut. xxviii. 30 sqq.; Isa. lxxv. 21, 22; lxii. 8.—On tormented themselves, comp. x. 19; Ezek. xxxiv. 4, 21.—On profit comp. Who attacked the inheritance which I gave to Israel, my people, to possess:
Behold I pluck them forth out of their land,
And the house of Judah I will pluck forth out of their midst.
- 15 And it shall come to pass, after I have plucked them out,

To swear by my name 'Jehovah liveth,'
As they have taught my people to swear by Baal:
Then shall they be built in the midst of my people.
- 17 But if they hear not, I will utterly pluck up
And destroy such a nation, saith Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Even in these concluding words the fundamental idea is evidently that of association. The conspiracy of the nations against the covenant people who have conspired against their Lord (xi. 9; xii. 6) has for its first consequence, that the two are associated in punishment (ver. 14). But afterward when they have made common cause in penitence, and turning to the Lord, they are to be equally regarded in their redemption and re-establishment (ver. 16). In this only is there dissimilarity, that in the heathen nations a possibility of disobedience and consequent total destruction is assumed, which is not the case with respect to Israel (ver. 17).

Ver. 14. Thus saith Jehovah . . . pluck forth out of their midst. The enemies who, according to ver. 9, combine against Israel, are here seen to be chiefly their neighbors; comp. 2 Kings xxiv. 2, to which passage, however, I refer not as the occasion, but as the, at least, partial fulfilment of our prophecy. The Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites, are here mentioned, and in Ps. cxxxvii. 7 the Edomites also, as auxiliaries of the Chaldees in the work of Judah's destruction.—Judah and the neighboring nations will meet the same fate, because they have both sinned against Jehovah: Judah directly, the others indirectly; for what they did against Judah, was against Judah's God.—Out of their midst refers to the geographical position of Judah, and at the same time to ver. 9.—The carrying away of Judah involves their liberation from the attacks of their neighbors. Comp. besides xxv. 15 sqq.

Vers. 15-17. And it shall come to pass . . . destroy such a nation, saith Jehovah. Every nation shall be brought back (comp. xlv. 26; xlviii. 47; xlix. 6, 39), therefore also Israel. Consequently they are alike in this.—The highest and most glorious stage of the association is this, that the nations will be one among themselves and with Judah in the true worship of Jehovah, which is expressed as swearing by His name alone (comp. iv. 2; v. 7; Deut. vi. 13; x. 20). In this is, at the same time, given the unity of God with men; He in them, they in Him (John xvii. 21, 23). It is noteworthy that the nations are to be built (בְּתוֹךְ עַמִּים) in the midst of my people. Before Israel was in their midst (vers. 7, 9); now they are in the midst of Israel. Israel is now not merely the ideal, but the real stock which bears all. (Comp. Rom. xi. 17 sqq.—Isa. xlv. 22 sqq.; lvi. 1 sqq.; lxx. and lxxvi.)—In this only a dissimilarity between Israel and the nations comes fairly to light, that the possibility of resistance to the loving purpose of God is presupposed of the latter, but not of the former (comp. xxx. 10, 11).—On learn the ways, comp. x. 2; ii. 33.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xi. 3. "The curse of the Law excites anger, but the curse of the covenant abashes. I have seen an atheist tremble at the words 'If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be anathema (1 Cor. xvi. 22).' He remarked it himself, and sought to excuse himself by saying 'it was motus involuntarii.' But it was the words of the covenant, Thou shalt love." ZINZENDORF.

2. On xi. 5. "Hic παίδευμα latet et pro ministris verbi, et pro eorum auditoribus. Ministri exemplo prophete monentur, ut similes in officio promittuntur et animi alacritatem Deo probent, quemadmodum etiam de Jesaja legitur, vi. 8. Auditores hic docentur, ut de voluntate Dei ex verbo moniti in corde suo dicant; amen, promitti et parati ad obedientiam verbo præstandam." FÖRSTER.

3. On xi. 14. "Intercession for all men has good reason for it in the love which is due to one's neighbor, and it is also commanded, 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2, but on the part of those who offer it, a certain order is required so that it may be heard (Luke xiii. 8, 9; John ix. 31)." LANGHE Op. bibl.

4. On xi. 15. "It is a snare to a man to blaspheme the holy, and after that to seek vows [after vows to make inquiry] (Prov. xx. 24). For that is the manner of hypocrites, to offer St. Martin a penny and then steal a horse; and when they have opposed God and His word to the utmost, to turn afterwards to sacrifices, fasting and alms, and wish thus to exculpate themselves." CRAMER.

5. On xi. 16, 17. "God has appointed us to be trees of righteousness, plants of the Lord for His glory (Isa. lxi. 3). He, however, who bringeth not forth good fruit, is hewn down and cast into the fire (Matt. vii. 19)." CRAMER. ["Every sin against God is a sin against ourselves, and so it will be found sooner or later." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

6. On xi. 18. "Although the human heart cannot be fathomed (Jer. xvii. 9), yet nothing can be hidden from God, and He frequently reveals secret counsels, so that they are known and manifest, as in the case of Absalom and Ahithophel (Isa. viii. 10). Therefore do nothing in secret, in the hope that it will remain hidden, for the birds of heaven carry the voice, and the winged repeat it (Eccles. x. 20)." CRAMER.

7. On xi. 20. "The first New Testament vengeance was executed on the cross, when an evildoer who had mocked at Jesus, cringed on the cross, and asked for a gracious remembrance. The Lamb of God could scarcely wait the time of vengeance: To-day, said He, shalt thou be with Me in Paradise. According to this may the Jeremiahs of our times, the preachers of righteousness, take the measure of their holy desire for vengeance." ZINZENDORF. ["It is a comfort, when we are wronged that we have a God to commit our cause to; and our duty to commit it to Him, with a resolution to acquiesce in His definite sentence; to subscribe and not prescribe to Him." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

8. On xi. 20. "A teacher is advised to say this if he can, 'I have ceased to concern myself about myself.' DR. LUTHER says,

Once I grasped too many things:—
None staid; they all had wings:
But since I've weary grown,
And all away have thrown,
Not one from me has flown.
And do you ask, how can it be thus?—
Because I've cast my all on Jesus.

Messengers and servants, who concern themselves about their own injuries must have bad masters." ZINZENDORF.

9. On xi. 22. When the people will not endure the rod of Christ's mouth, with which He smites the earth (Isai. xi. 4), item His rods Beauty and Bands (Zech. xi. 7), God sends one with the sword to preach, which is followed by the red spice, and then we see what the smooth preachers have effected (Isai. xxx. 10)." CRAMER.

10. On xii. 1. "But can we conceive anything more humane and gracious than our dear Lord? We know beforehand that we are wrong; we do not doubt that He does all well, but it yet oppresses us. We should like to make a clean breast of it. Where shall we find one with whom we could do this? The fly on the wall, the domestic, the child, that comes in our way? Assuredly not! Straight to our Lord, the eternal and living God, with all our ill-humor, doubt, care, scruples! Pour out your heart before Him (Ps. lxxii. 8)." ZINZENDORF.

11. On xii. 1-3. "It is a common grievance, to live and experience that the ungodly are prosperous and the godly are unfortunate (Ps. xxxviii. 20; lxxiii. 12; Job xxi. 7; xxxi. 2), against which David wrote the xxxvii. Ps. Have recourse to the testimony that there is another life, when the tables will be turned and the evil will be recompensed with evil and the good with good (Isai. lxx. 13)." CRAMER.

12. On xii. 3. "The prosperity of the ungodly should exhort them to repentance by the long-suffering of God (Rom. ii. 4). But when even this does not avail, there are still people of this world, who have their portion in this life, who fill only their belly (Ps. xvii. 14) and carry nothing away. What profit then is there to them even if they had the whole world, and suffer injury to their souls (Matth. xvi. 26. The rich man in Luke xvi. 23)." CRAMER.

13. On xii. 4. "It is strange that even in the people of God the Epicurean opinion has found acceptance, that God sits idly in the heavens, caring nothing about what goes on below, doing neither that which is good nor that which is evil, (Zeph. i. 12), seeing not what men do (Ezek. viii. 10, ix. 9), and that future things are altogether hidden both from him and his prophet. So powerful is the devil among the children of unbelief." CRAMER.

14. On xii. 4. "Tales hodie sunt Epicuri de grege porci, quibus saxe est in ore, the devil is not so black, hell is not so hot, as the parson in the pulpit makes out. Sed his historia divitis epulonis occidenda (Luke xvi). Nam ibi—Christ puts forth his hand into hell-fire, snatches a brand out therefrom, and holds it in the face of all Epicureans, as though He would say, Smell, smell, how hot hell-fire is." FÖNSTER.

15. On xii. 5. "I have heard that an able preacher, when he had to deliver a trial sermon for the position of court-preacher, took this text. The exposition is plain. No servant of the Lord should long for more respectable, rich, discreet, sociable hearers. Let every one approve himself thoroughly in all changes, and be sure of his cause and lean not to his own understanding." ZINZENDORF.

16. On xii. 6. "Many must add to this, wife, child, colleague, domestics, and whatever more the Saviour mentions, which may be against a man. One is often offered by his mother to the dear God (i. e. dedicated to the pastoral office) but in an altogether different sense; and when he afterwards walks as becomes him, according to the gospel of Christ, those are his bitterest enemies, who hoped that he might comfort them in all their travail, and who not only do not gain anything from his labors as a witness, but must bear the shame and ridicule, that their son, brother, cousin, husband, father, friend, etc. will yet render them all unfortunate." ZINZENDORF.

17. On xii. 7, sqq. "They are sweet words and beautiful names with which the Lord baptizes and names His city, and it is so hard for it to be punished by God for its sins that we are long in learning to consider our own account." (Rom. xi. 21). CRAMER.

18. On xii. 7, sqq. "The heart of a believer is God's most cherished abode, but if man corrupt it with wilful sin, God must forsake this house." (Isai. lix. 2). STARKE.

19. On xii. 10, sqq. "A servant of the Lord who should follow on twelve hirelings or wolves may depend on this, that he will find nothing else than a house, a vineyard of the Lord, but a desecrated house, an uprooted vineyard, in which many preparations are needed before he can proceed to his regular work." ZINZENDORF.

20. On xii. 14, sqq. "The Christian church has a triple consolation. 1. That its enemies will be punished; 2. That God again has mercy on it; 3. That it also converts a part of its enemies and gathers them into its little flock of believers." CRAMER.

21. On xii. 16. "Some time since I found in the so-called Herrnhut lot-book for the year 1737 the words in the vision of Isaiah, lix. 17: Thy destroyer and they that made thee waste shall go forth of thee! Under them were these two lines, 'let them rather remain and attach them to us.' This is what Jeremiah says; they may yet come out right.—Paul has confirmed it by his example. Within three days he was a persecutor, a false teacher, a poor sinner, a justified sinner, a witness, an apostle. With joy would I bestow the same happiness on every one of those, whom I at this moment cannot regard otherwise than as the enemies of the cross of Christ." ZINZENDORF.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xi. 1-10 there is extant a homily of ORIGEN (the 9th in Lommatzsch's ed.) likewise on xi. 18-xii. 9 (the 10th) and on xii. 11-xiii. 1 (the 11th.)

2. FÖRSTER remarks that xi. 19, 20 accords with Matth. xxii. 15 sqq. (XXIII. Sunday after Tr.) and that the persecution of Jeremiah corresponds to the sufferings of the Lord. Likewise that xii. 2 bears relation to Luke xvi. 19 eqq. (I. Sund. after Trin.) and xii. 7 to Acts vi. 8 sqq. (St. Stephen's day, Sunday after Christmas), and to Luke xix. 41 sqq. (X. after Trin.)

3. On xi. 16, 17. The divine election is never intended to be a license from all discipline. Indeed when men break the covenant, the Lord interposes with punishment, which may proceed to instantaneous destruction. Surely God's gifts and calling are without repentance. If tho branches cut off abide not in unbelief they shall be grafted in; for God is able to graff them in again, Rom. xi. 23, 29.

4. On xi. 21. That which the people of Anathoth say here to Jeremiah, the people of this world say everywhere and at all times to the preachers of the truth. Comp. 2 Tim. iv. 3, 4. It is important then to preach the word, to be instant in season and out of season; to reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine (2 Tim. iv. 2).

5. On xii. 5. It is not becoming that we prescribe to God, to what extent He shall lay burdens upon us. Our patience and steadfastness are as elastic and extensible as our faith is firm and rock-like (Petrine, Matth. xvi. 18).

6. On xii. 14-17. When mankind depart from God they lose the bond of unity and of peace. They are divided then into parties, which contend with and exterminate each other. But when these have again united themselves with the Lord, the unity of the members is restored. Therefore there is liberty, equality and fraternity only in the Lord.

CHAPTER XIII.

Since the foregoing discourse is complete in itself, it is not correct to say that ch. xi.-xiii. form "a whole, one prophetic discourse" (GRAE, S. 174). Chap. xiii. on the contrary is an independent portion, but contemporaneous with the preceding. For although the cleft in the rock by the river Euphrates involves an obscure intimation of the place of exile, the enemies from the North are still spoken of indefinitely (comp. on ver. 20). This portion therefore belongs to the period before the fourth year of Jehoiakim. The reign of Jehoiakim is also indicated in what is said of the pride of the great, and especially of the King, ver. 12 sqq.—Comp. on the despotism of Jehoiakim, Comm. on xxii. 13-19.

As to the purport of this passage—it is a reproof of pride. Comp. ver. 9, "I will mar the pride of Judah and the pride of Jerusalem, for it is great;" ver. 2, "bottle," and the interpretation given of it; ver. 15, "be not proud;" ver. 17, "for your pride;" ver. 18, "humble yourselves, sit down."—The reproof is however addressed to the people in a threefold gradation—first the pride of the chosen people generally (ver. 9, Judah and Jerusalem) is rebuked under the figure of a destroyed girdle. This is then done with respect to the particular orders enumerated in ver. 13, which are represented under the figure of drunken pitchers breaking each other: finally the prophet humbles the pride of the highest, the king and the king's mother (ver. 18) and the form of the concrete mother of the country gradually passes over into the abstract, i. e., ideal, person of the daughter of Zion (Jerusalem, ver. 27). There are thus three strophes:

1. Vers. 1-11. The entire chosen nation a destroyed girdle.
2. Vers. 12-17. The particular orders broken pitchers.
3. Vers. 18-27. The father and mother of the country humbled, driven away, insulted.

1. The entire chosen nation a destroyed girdle.

XIII. 1-11.

1 Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah] unto me, Go and get [buy] thee a linen girdle,
 2 and put it upon thy loins and put it not in water. So I got [bought, procured] a
 [the] girdle according to the word of the LORD [Jehovah], and put it on my loins.
 3 And the word of the LORD came [was communicated] unto me the second time, 4 saying: Take the girdle that thou hast got [bought, procured], which is upon thy loins, and arise, go to Euphrates [Phrath] and hide it there in a hole [cleft] of the 5 rock. So [And] I went and hid it by Euphrates [in Phrath, or on the Phrath] as 6 the LORD [Jehovah had] commanded me. And it came to pass after many days, that the LORD [Jehovah] said unto me, Arise, go to Euphrates [Phrath] and take 7 [fetch] the girdle from thence, which I commanded thee to hide there. Then I went to Euphrates [Phrath] and digged, and took the girdle from the place where I had hid it, and behold, the girdle was marred [spoiled]; it was profitable [good] 8 for nothing. Then the word of the LORD [Jehovah] came unto me, saying:

9 Thus saith Jehovah:

Thus will I spoil the pride of Judah,
 And the pride of Jerusalem, which is great.

10 This wicked people, who refused to hear my words,
 Who walked in the hardness of their heart,
 And went after other gods to serve them and to worship them,
 They shall even be as this girdle, which is good for nothing.

11 For as a girdle lies around the loins of a man,
 So have I laid around myself the whole house of Israel,
 And the whole house of Judah, saith Jehovah,
 That they may be to me for a people,
 For a name, for praise, and for beauty ;
 But they hearkened not.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1 and 2. Go and buy thee a girdle . . . on my loins. The reason why the prophet was to buy a girdle appears in ver. 11. As of all parts of the clothing the girdle is that which fits most closely, so Israel of all nations is the most closely connected with Jehovah. And as a beautifully ornamented girdle serves to adorn a man (comp. HERZOG, Real-Enc., V. S. 407 ; VII. 717) so the Lord thought to put on Israel as an armament. The prophet was to buy a linen girdle without doubt, because the sacred garments of the priests were linen (comp. Exod. xxviii. 40 ; HERZOG, R.-Enc. VII. S. 714) and because Israel was to be a holy, priestly nation (Exod. xix. 6). On the question why the prophet was not to put the girdle in water there has been much debate. GRAF's view that the girdle was to be preserved from the injurious effects of the water, and kept new and undamaged, refutes itself. For no damage would be done to a linen girdle by washing, but it would rather be renewed. The prohibition to put the girdle in water evidently presupposes that the prophet would have washed the girdle when it became dirty. But this was not to be done. It was to remain dirty. As a dirty girdle it was to be taken to the Euphrates. Since now the girdle denotes the people, it was thus to be set before their eyes what was impending over them as having become unclean, and yet long borne by the Lord in their filth. So ROSENMULLER and MAURER.

Vers. 3-7. Take the girdle . . . profitable for nothing. פֶּרֶת is in Jeremiah always the Euphrates, xvi. 2, 6, 10 ; li. 63, though in ch. xli. we always find נְהַר-פֶּרֶת. Now it is inconceivable that Jeremiah made the long journey to the Euphrates twice "merely to show that a linen girdle is destroyed by lying a long time in the damp." Therefore פֶּרֶת is said by some to be a water-gap (פְּרִי) near Jerusalem (EWALD), by others an abbreviation of אֶפְרַת (BOCHART, VENEMA, HITZIG), by others again the whole is regarded as merely an allegorical narrative (STAEUBLIN, Neue Beitr. zur Erl. d. bibl. Proph. Gött., 1791, S. 129 sqq., GRAF). But I do not see why the words may not be regarded as historical truth, if only we do not apply the standard of the paltry present to the great past. Was it too much for a prophet to make a long journey in order to set visibly before the eyes of his people their impending fate? There are indeed narratives of such a kind as bear in themselves the necessity of a parabolic interpretation, ex. gr. when Jeremiah in xxv. 15 sqq. says that he took the wine cup of fury from the hand of the Lord and caused Jerusalem with all the cities of Judah, Pharaoh and many other kings and princes to drink of it. But where this is not the case we must be on our guard against transferring our standard of the suitable, or of the morally and physically possible to those times. I therefore do not perceive why the account in IIos. i. ; Ezek. iv. 5 is less real than what we read in Jer. xix. 1 sqq. ; xxvii. 2 ; Isa. xx. 3. And here also Jeremiah may have really made a double journey to the Euphrates for the most palpable warning of his people. But let us not expect that Jeremiah will trouble himself to affirm in many words what great result he accomplished by these journeys. He who relates so simply, without even an exclamation, how he was thrown into the miry pit (ch. xxxviii.) might here also leave it to his readers to estimate the importance of the facts.

[HENDERSON:—"On the authority of the LXX., Vulg. and other ancient versions, it has been taken for granted, that by פֶּרֶת here the river Euphrates is to be understood. That the name is elsewhere employed to designate that river is beyond dispute. Not reckoning the present verse, it occurs fifteen times with this application, but except in three instances, Gen. ii. 14 ; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20 ; Jer. li. 63, it never stands alone, but always has נְהַר, river, attached to it. Indeed the same must have taken place Gen. ii. 14 if that word had not been used immediately before פֶּרֶת, so that this passage ought not to be taken into account. With respect to Jer. li. 63 also, there was no necessity for employing the qualifying noun, as Serniah is supposed to be at Babylon at the time to which reference is there made, consequently in the closest contact with the Euphrates. It seems not a little strange, therefore, that the name should appear not fewer than four times in the present verse without the use of the qualifying term, if that river had really been intended. This circumstance appears to have struck the LXX., whose text, ver. 7, exhibits τὸν Εὐφράτην ποταμὸν. EWALD, who rejects the Euphrates, renders the word by Flussufer (bank of the river) and thinks that it may be used of fresh or sweet water rivers generally, or that it may express the same as the Arab.

I prefer the solution proposed by BOCHART, and adopted by VENEMA, DATHE and HITZIG, that פֶּרֶת is here only an abbreviation of אֶפְרַת, Ephrath, which appears to have been the original name of Bethlehem and its vicinity, and most commonly appears with the paragogic אֶפְרַת-הַה, Ephratha. The aphæresis of the prosthetic א is not without examples.—The whole extent of the prophetic journey therefore was only about six miles northward of Jerusalem. There at Bethlehem, he was to hide the girdle in a fissure of הַסֵּלֶעַ, the rock, some well-known rock in the vicinity of that town. Why he was especially sent to that place it is impossible to say, except that it may have been that the use of the term Prath might lead the Jews, when the symbolical actions came to be understood by them, to think of the Euphrates, to which they were to be carried away captive, as designated by the same name.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 8-11. Then the word . . . but they hearkened not. Observe in vers. 9 and 10 the relation of this parable to that which follows, of the pitchers. The girdle signifies the entirety of the people, the pitchers the individuals of all ranks. Hence in ver. 9, "the pride of Judah and Jerusalem," and in ver. 10, "this evil people," is spoken of, while in ver. 13 all ranks are enumerated. The meaning of the destruction of the girdle in the cleft of the rock is declared in vers. 9 and 10: pride shall be brought low, the chosen people shall become as a girdle, which is profitable for nothing. And certainly, though there was a partial return from exile, yet with the captivity in Babylon ceased the existence of Israel as an independent State with compact national unity. Observe in ver. 9 the doubling of the strong word גָּאֹן, pride, with the addition גָּדוֹל, great. The main thought of the passage is thus emphasized.—In the words, for a name, for a praise, etc., there appears to be an allusion to Exod. xxviii. 2, where it is said of the holy garments of Aaron that they should be "for glory and for beauty."

2. The particular orders—broken pitchers.

XIII. 12-17.

- 12 Therefore [And] thou shalt speak unto them this word: Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah the] God of Israel, Every bottle [vessel, pitcher] shall be filled with wine; and they shall [will] say unto thee, Do we not certainly know that every 13 bottle [pitcher] shall be filled with wine? Then shalt thou say unto them, Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah]:
Behold, I fill all the inhabitants of this land,
And the kings who sit for David on his throne,
And the priests and the prophets and all the citizens of Jerusalem with drunkenness, 14 And dash them one against another,
And the fathers and sons together, saith Jehovah.
I will not spare, nor have pity, nor be merciful,
So as not to destroy them.
15 Hear ye and attend! Be not high-minded! For Jehovah hath spoken.
16 Give to Jehovah, your God, the glory,
Before he causes darkness,
And your feet stumble on mountains of twilight,
And ye wait for light, but he turneth it¹ into dark shadow,
And change it² into cloudy night.
17 But if ye hear it³ not, my soul will weep in secret for your pride
And mine eyes shall weep sore and run down with tears,⁴
That the flock of Jehovah is carried away captive.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12. Announcement of the punitive judgment under a new figure, that of pitchers to be filled, which is not understood by the people. Jehovah explains the figure, vers. 13, 14. Admonition of the prophet to follow the warning of Jehovah, vers. 15-17.

Ver. 12. Therefore thou shalt speak . . . shall be filled with wine. After the declaration, in the words "they would not hear," ver. 11, that the symbolical action had been unsuccessful, a new attempt is set on foot by a visible parable to make an impression on the people. The first symbolical act was intended to bring the thoughts of God home to the people in an analytical way, the new parable takes a synthetical form. The short sentence, "every bottle shall be filled with wine," is set at the head of an obscure, mysterious problem. The people express their understanding of the sentence in the most natural physical sense, but with the silent assumption (we knew that before, no one need tell us that. Comp. Gen. xliii. 7) that this interpretation is not satisfactory. The Lord therefore develops His meaning more particularly in what follows.

Vers. 13 and 14. Then shalt thou say unto them . . . destroy them. It should first be observed that in the three parts of this discourse (ch. xiii.) there is a climax, in so far as the first part (vers. 9, 10) is addressed to the mass of the people, without distinction of the particular orders, the second part specifies these orders with evident emphasis on the favored classes, the third part applies to the king and the king's mother alone (ver. 18). The prominence of the higher classes in the second part is doubtless connected with the purport of the parable. They are compared with earthen pitchers. [HENDERSON: "These bottles are frequently of a large size. On entering the city of Tiflis, in 1821, the author found the market-place full of such bottles, consisting of the skins of oxen, calves, etc., distended with wine.—It is from this custom that our English word hogshead is derived—that term being a corrupt pronunciation of ox-hide."—But חרציק renders wine-pitchers, earthen vessels or pots.—S. R. A.] (Comp. Jer. xlviii. 12; Isa. xxx. 14; Lam. iv. 2). These pitchers are belied, to a certain extent swollen, but internally they are hollow and empty and moreover of frangible material. They are therefore an excellent emblem of that carnal aristocratic pride to which there is no corresponding inner merit. That this is the prophet's meaning is clear from the emphatically prefixed Be not high-minded (אַל-תִּגְבְּהוּ), ver. 15, and from pride (גִּוְהַ), ver. 17.—What a suitable punishment for such men, who are like pitchers, to be filled with wine of intoxication! שִׁכְרוֹן, drunkenness, designates the immediate subjective effect of the wine of fury (comp. xxv. 13; Isa. xxviii. 7; li. 17; Ps. lx. 5), of which the further objective effect is collision and breaking to pieces. The Midianites (Judges vii. 22) and the Philistines (1 Sam. xiv. 20), who exterminated each other, were also seized by a spirit of intoxication. If not in this sense, yet in that of mutual hatred, reciprocal oppression and injury in general, the prophet applies דָּשׁוּם, dash them, to the Israelites. But when a kingdom is divided against itself it cannot stand, Mark iii. 24.—The plural kings in ver. 13, intimates that not merely the then reigning king, but several, one after another (as the majority of the kings contemporary with Jeremiah were evil-disposed) were included in this category. The addition, who sit for David (comp. xxii. 4), sets forth that very element on which the pride of these kings especially rested. (Comp. 2 Sam. vii.).

Vers. 15 and 17. Hear ye and attend . . . carried away captive. The prophet interposes as a mediator with an earnest admonition to observe the divine warning. On high-minded comp. the foregoing remarks.—For Jehovah hath spoken, viz., every bottle, etc., ver. 12.—Give glory. Comp. Josh. vii. 19. It is opposed to be proud.—Cause darkness. Comp. Ps. cv. 28; cxxxix. 12. According to the connection it is easiest to regard God as the subject.—Stumble, reference to dash together, ver. 14.—Dark mountains are more than stones of stumbling. The prophet imagines them to be wandering in a mountainous country and in a dark ravine. Comp. Ps. xxiii. 4.—In secret places. The prophet will retire from the publicity, in which he has hitherto lived and labored, into solitude, in order that he may give way to his sorrow.—Weep in contrast with drunkenness, ver. 13: the prophet's eyes will overflow with tears.—Flock. Comp. ver. 20; Zech. x. 3. Even the disobedient people continue to be the Lord's flock.

3. The father and mother of the country humbled, driven away, insulted.

XIII. 18-27.

- 18 Say to the king and the princes, sit down low,¹
For fallen is your chief ornament,² your glorious crown!
- 19 The cities of the south are shut up, and no man openeth them;
Judah is carried away³ wholly, carried away completely.⁴
- 20 Lift up your eyes and see who are coming from the north.
Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock?
- 21 What wilt thou say, when he sets over thee those,⁵ Whom thou hast thyself drawn⁶ to thee for friends, as chief?⁷
Will not pangs seize thee as a parturient woman?⁸
- 22 And if thou sayest in thy heart, why have these things happened to me?—
For the greatness of thy iniquity are thy skirts discovered,⁹ Thy heels abused.¹⁰

- 23 Will a Cushite change his skin, or a leopard his spots?
Then shall ye also be able to do good, ye accustomed to evil-doing!
- 24 Therefore I will scatter them as the stubble,¹¹
That hasteth away¹² before the wind of the desert.
- 25 This is thy lot, thy measured¹³ portion from me, saith Jehovah, Because thou didst forget me and trust in falsehood.
- 23 Therefore I also have discovered thy skirts from before, That¹⁴ thy shame may be seen:—
- 27 Thy adulteries and ardent neighings, the enormity of thy unchastity—
On the hills in the field have I seen thy abominations!
Wo to thee, O Jerusalem! Wilt thou not be cleansed—still after how long!

² Ver. 18.—כִּרְאֲשׁוֹתֵיכֶם. Thus punctuated the word is found here only. On the derivation comp. OLSH. § 197, e, S. 374. The meaning is: that which is found at the head or on the head. (Comp. כִּרְגֵלוֹת Ruth iii. 4, 7, 8, 14). Elsewhere we find (occurring only in this form) כִּרְאֲשׁוֹתַי Gen. xxviii. 11, 18; 1 Sam. xix. 13, 16, etc.: and (erroneously punctuated) כִּרְאֲשֵׁי כִּרְאֲשֵׁי 1 Sam. xxvi. 12.—That which is found on the head is the ornament, which is more particularly designated as the crown. On the sing. masc. יָרַר comp. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 103, 4 b, 3.

⁴ Ver. 19.—שְׁלֹמִים שְׁלֹמִים adjective=שְׁלֹמִים integer. Comp. Am. i. 6, 9.

⁵ Ver. 21.—Since there is no nominative to פָּקַד, either mentioned or implied, in the connection, it must be either the ideal-general subject (One), or Jehovah, which in sense amounts to the same thing. All the commentators recognize a parenthesis as beginning with וְאֵת. But some conclude this with אֵתֶם (GAAB), others with עֲלֶיךָ (HITZIG, GRAF), others with אֲלֵפִים (EICHORN, DE WETTE, UMBREIT). It is opposed to the first rendering that then the sense of לְפָרְתִי remains indefinite, to the second, that then the parenthesis is either superfluous, if we consider עֲלֶיךָ=אֲלֵיךָ, or as incorrectly introduced by וְ, if עֲלֶיךָ is to be considered as=adversum te (Vulg., HITZIG). It would then need to be כִּי. I therefore agree with those who conclude the parenthesis with אֲלֵפִים. Then וְאֵת is sentence of condition with an adversative meaning (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 103, 4 e) which in its entirety is to be regarded as the object of פָּקַד. The meaning of this verb is that which occurs frequently: to set, ordain over one (comp. xv. 3).

⁷ Ver. 21.—לְרֵאשׁ, the thought is the same as in Lam. i. 5.

⁹ Ver. 22.—נָגַל וְנָגַל. Comp. Nah. iii. 5.

¹¹ Ver. 21.—קֶשׁ stubble. Comp. Ps. lxxxiii. 14; Isa. xli. 2; xlvi. 14.

¹² Ver. 24.—עוֹבֵר לְרוּחַ, literally stubble, which is related to the wind as going along, which runs from the wind. That עוֹבֵר also signifies discedere, abire, auferri is seen from passages like Ruth ii. 8; 2 Chron. xviii. 23; Ps. lxxxii. 7; Ezek. xlvi. 14. Comp. עוֹבֵר עוֹבֵר, Isa. xxix. 5.

¹³ Ver. 25.—כִּנְת־כִּדְרֵךְ. In Job xi. 9 also כִּנְתָה is to be derived from כָּר, with the meaning mensura=כִּרְהָ. Comp. OLSH., § 139, S. 263; FURST., Conc. S. 616, s. r., כָּר. Therefore it is not necessary to render כָּר here=upper garment, with reference to Ruth iii. 15 (coll. Ps. xi. 6; Isa. lxxv. 6), [as HITZIG does, declaring that כָּר never means mensura. HENDERSON: "As the noun is here parallel with גוֹרָל, the lot, which was specially employed in determining portions of land, it seems preferable to explain it of such measurements."—S. R. A.]

¹⁴ Ver. 26.—אֲשֶׁר is causal. Comp. Josh. iv. 23; 1 Ki. viii. 33; Zech. i. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The discourse of the prophet still rising higher, is now addressed to the king and his mother, thus to the heads of the State (comp. on ver. 13). He announces humbling of pride (ver. 18), overthrow of power and exile (ver. 19). Enemies from the north (ver. 20), whose friendship was formerly sought, will bring this about to the extreme miserly of the subjects (ver. 21), as a punishment for their sins (ver. 22). And since Israel is corrupt to the core, an amelioration on their part is not to be expected (ver. 24), wherefore the Lord must also scatter them to the winds (ver. 24), and as a just punishment of their wickedness (vers. 25-27 a), deliver them up to inconceivable woe (ver. 27 b). The address, which at first has the king and his mother alone in view (vers. 18, 19), passes over gradually more to the latter (vers. 20-22), and at last (since the king's mother may easily be regarded as the mother of the country and representative of the mother-country) to the entirety of the nation (vers. 23-27), the end of the discourse thus returning to the beginning (comp. vers. 9 and 10).

Vers. 18 and 19. Say to the king . . . carried away completely. — גַּבְרִיָּהּ is the queen-mother, who had precedence in rank over the many chosen women of the harem. Therefore the book of Kings (with two exceptions) always mentions with the name of the king, that of his mother.—Comp. xxix. 2; 1 Kings xv. 12; 2 Kings x. 13 (2 Chron. xv. 16).—Sit down. Here, also, the prophet attacks worldly pride.—Of the south. As the enemy comes from the north, the siege of the cities of the south is a sign that the capital is surrounded, and that flight to the south, is no longer possible. [HENDERSON following HIRTZIG, more correctly refers this to the complete desertion of the cities,—“the inhabitants having all been carried away into captivity, and not so much as one left to open the gates to a traveler.”—S. R. A].

Vers. 20-22. Lift up your eyes . . . thy heels abused. The circumstance that the princess is mentioned immediately before, and that ver. 20 b appears to refer to the shepherds of the people (the ideal person of the people is represented as wife, mother, daughter, but never as shepherdess), appears to me to indicate that the prophet has made use of the feminine forms נָשָׂא, רָאָה (lift up and see), with primary reference to princess:—thou hast thyself drawn, ver. 21, also seems to favor this. For such acts always preceded especially from the heads of the people, and how powerful the influence of the princesses was, is shown in Maachah, the mother of Asa (1 Kings xv. 13), Jezebel (1 Kings xvi. 31 sqq.), and Athaliah (2 Kings xi.). The sudden change of number is not unusual. Comp. NAEGLER, Gr., § 105, 7. Ann. 2.—As certainly as the prophet means by those coming from the north the same enemies, of which he has already spoken in i. 14, 15; iv. 6, etc., so certain is it also, that he does not know definitely what northern people were meant; comp. remarks on i. 14. Thus it is also declared that this prophecy must have been delivered before the fourth year of Jehoiakim. For from this year (comp. chap. xxv.) Jeremiah knows definitely that the nation is the Chaldeans.—What wilt thou say, ver. 21. It having been said of the ruling pair in the previous verse, that they are to lose their flock, it is here added by way of climax, that they will themselves come under the dominion of others, and indeed of those whose friendship might rather have been expected from the previous relations of the kings of Judah towards them. This cannot, indeed, be said of Jehoiakim, for although he had not engaged in direct hostilities against the king of Babylon (his revolt, 2 Kings xxiv. 1, must have taken place after the battle of Carchemish, and therefore long after this prophecy), he was yet a creature of his opponent Pharaoh Nechoh (2 Kings xxiii. 31). But of his predecessors, from Ahaz onward (comp. 2 Kings xvi. 7 sqq.), most of them had entered into more or less intimate relations with the northern empire, partly as seeking aid from it (comp. on ii. 18, 36), partly as introducing among themselves the forms of religion there prevailing (comp. Manasseh, 2 Kings xxi. 3; Amon, Ib. xxi. 20; Zeph. i. 5 coll. 2 Kings xxiii. 5, 11 sqq.), partly at least like Hezekiah in an apparently innocuous, but really fatal display of courtesy. If with this we take into account the relations of the Jewish kings to Assyria, as well as to Babylon, we are justified, both by the words of this passage, which speaks only generally of נְצַדְּמֵי אֲשׁוּר, and the inner unity of those empires (comp. the name Asshur, transferred to the Babylonian and Persian monarchy; 2 Kings xxiii. 29; Ezr. vi. 22).

Vers. 23-27. Will the Cushite . . . after how long! There might still be a means of escape—Reform. But this is not to be expected, because evil-doing has become the people's second nature. Comp. v. 3; vi. 10, 13-15, 27 sqq.; viii. 4-7; ix. 24, 25.—Therefore I also. Ver. 26. The declaration of cause and consequence are entwined after the manner of a chain in vers. 23-27; ver. 23 cause, vers. 24, 25 a, consequence; ver. 25 b, repeated cause; ver. 26, consequence; ver. 27 a, cause again; ver. 27 b, the final consequence. Yet since I have discovered thy skirts, evidently points back to ver. 22, where the same is said of the enemy, there is in the words, Therefore I also, not merely the antithesis to thou didst forget me, ver. 25, but also the thought; whatever the enemy does to thee is done according to my will; I am He who does it.—From before. Jeremiah quotes here only Nah. iii. 5, which passage also refers back to Isa. xlvi. 1-3 (comp. KREPER, S. 136, STRAUSS on Nahum, S. 95).—GRAF strangely maintains that נֶגְדְּמֵי cannot mean “over thy face;” that the expression never has this meaning. I refer only to 1 Kings xviii. 7, 39. But I also believe that the meaning face is not to be insisted upon, but that נֶגְדְּמֵי here as frequently (comp. i. 13) signifies the fore-part.—Still after how long! Jeremiah had maintained in ver. 23 the incorrigibility of the people. From the conclusion of ver. 27 it is seen, that he understands this only of the Israel of the present. In the future, though far distant, he sets forth in prospect the purification of the people, comp. iii. 18 sqq.; xii. 14 sqq.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xiii. 1-11. The Lord has put on Israel as a girdle for His own adornment and for Israel's highest glory. This figure is unquestionably one of the most precious which the Scripture employs to represent the mystery of election. Elsewhere Israel is called Jehovah's inheritance (Deut. iv. 20, vii. 6), His wife and His beloved bride (Hos.

ii. 16 sqq.; Jer. ii. 2), his first-born son (Exod. iv. 22), His servant (Isa. xli. 8), His flock (Jer. xiii. 17), his vineyard (Isa. v. 7), his signet-ring (Hagg. ii. 23. Vid. KÖHLER, S. 114). Like the last emblem, the girdle also denotes the closest intimacy, indispensable service, a valuable ornament. But great as is the love which the Lord thus shows to Israel in calling them His girdle, as great is the severity with which he declares, that the honor thus received will not save them from destruction. Let every particular Christian church mark this! However closely it may be attached to the Lord, this saves it neither from internal corruption, nor from external judgment, comp. Luke iii. 8, 9. Not this or that particular church, but the whole church only has the promise of infallibility (John xvi. 13) invincibility and permanent existence. (Matt. xvi. 18).

2. On xiii. 17. "This is a good advice. In the words of a hymn, 'when witnesses have sown God's word, they water it with prayer and many thousand tears.' In one hour more grace is drawn by weeping from God the lover of life, who allows Himself to be implored, and who hearkens to the voice of His servants; and hearts, which feel the tears of their lover, are thus brought nearer to their object in a quarter of an hour, than could be accomplished by three sermons. . . 'Everything is born in pain.' . . When ye can do no more, ye witnesses, go and weep and moisten your seed, then you will come again with joy bringing your sheaves with you." ZINZENDORF. Preces et lacrimæ sunt arma ecclesie.

3. On xiii. 18. "When the enemies are at the gate, the plague in the city or the village, and there is no escape, and human help there is none, then it is of some use for preachers to speak to their princes out of tune; at other times they would be regarded as insolent. . . Sometimes God's witnesses are clothed with an authority which no one understands, but all feel. Jehoram's visit to Elisha was for the purpose of decapitating him, and a polite conversation was the result, (2 Kings vi. 30 sqq.);" ZINZENDORF.

4. On xiii. 18. "A preacher is not to take court-soup and robes of grace and leave the hare's head unstript, but put salt even into Herod's wounds." FÖRSTER from a sermon of CELICH, 3 Dom. Adv.

5. [On ver. 23. "Inveterate habits are justly regarded as a second nature; but being moral in their character, instead of extenuating they aggravate the guilt of those who are the subjects of them. Strong, therefore, as is the physical reference here made, it can with no propriety be employed in support of the physical impossibility of moral reformation." HENDERSON.—"Learned men in our age do not rightly refer to this passage, when they seek to prove that there is no free-will in man; for it is not simply the nature of man which is spoken of here, but the habit that is contracted by long practice. Aristotle, a strong advocate of free will, confesses that it is not in man's power to do right, when he is so immersed in his vices as to have lost a free choice (7 Lib. Ethicon) and this also is what experience proves. We hence see that this passage is improperly adduced to prove a sentiment which is yet true and fully confirmed by many passages of Scripture." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xiii. 1-11. "God has cast off His first people, the whole house of Judah and the house of Jerusalem. . . God has put on us as a girdle in their stead. For He has not thrown away the girdle and remained naked, but has woven Himself another. This girdle is the church from the heathen. It should know that as God spared not the former, much more will He not spare it, when it sins and is not worthy of God's loins. But he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit (1 Cor. vi. 17) in Christ Jesus, to whom be glory and dominion forever. Amen." ORIGEN, Hom. XI. 6.

2. On xiii. 12-17. Exhortation to repentance: The earthen wine-pitchers of the prophet Jeremiah. 1. What they signify (the proud yet perishable world); 2. What will be their fate (vers. 14, 17); 3. What is the means of escaping this fate (vers. 15 and 16).

3. [On ver. 17. "Pride the great hindrance to the reception of the word. Pride will not seek 1, the knowledge of God. Pride (a) will not brook a rival: (b) is unwilling to be taught, (c) is unwilling to use the means of knowledge, (d) is unwilling to pray; 2, the favor of God; 3, likeness to God; 4, communion with God." PAXSON on Ps. x. 14.—S. R. A.]

4. On xiii. 23 sqq. The expression in ver. 23 opens up to us a comfortless perspective. But with God nothing is impossible (Matth. xix. 26). The conclusion of ver. 27 shows us that a purification, though slow and successive is possible, in that we obtain a point of support without ourselves, (Archimedes), and a new principle of life in Christ Jesus. [On ver. 23. I. The great difficulty of reforming vicious habits, or of changing a bad course, arises 1, from the general nature of habits; 2, from the particular nature of bad habits; 3, the natural and judicial consequences of the great progress and long continuance of a bad course. II. This difficulty is not desperate, but there is some ground of hope and encouragement. 1. There is left even in the worst of men a natural sense of the evil and unreasonableness of sin. 2. Very bad men when they have any thought of becoming better are apt to conceive some good hopes of God's grace and mercy. 3. Who knows what man thoroughly roused and startled may resolve and do? 4. The grace and assistance of God when sincerely sought is never to be despaired of. TILLOTSON.—S. R. A.]

5. [JER. TAYLOR uses ver. 26 as the text of a sermon on the invalidity of a death-bed repentance.—S. R. A.]

THE FIFTH DISCOURSE.

(CHAP. XIV.—XVII. 18).

A fearful drought gives the prophet occasion to offer a hearty and touching intercession for his people. The twice-repeated decisive refusal of his petition, based on the revolt of the people (xiv. 10 coll. iii. 3) compels him to take into view his own situation, rendered exceedingly dangerous in consequence of his prophetic ministry, and then also to present before the people the sad prospect, that from the present calamity which is not spoken of after xiv. 22, there is no hope of escape, but that far worse, even a fearful punitive judgment ending in captivity, is impending.

As to the time of composition no data are furnished by the mention of the drought (comp. rems. on xiv. 1). That it was before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and therefore before the decisive turning point in the history of the theocracy and in Jeremiah's prophecies, is evident from the circumstance, already urged, that nowhere in the discourse is the enemy mentioned as known. Twice only and in passages critically suspicious, are the northern iron (xv. 12) and the north country as the place of exile (xvi. 15) mentioned. On the other hand there are many traces that the discourse cannot have originated long before the fourth year of Jehoiakim or the discourse preserved in ch. xxv. The prophet, when he delivered this discourse, must have been a long time in office. For the hatred against him has become as much deeper as more general (xv. 10sqq.): he is mocked, because the fulfilment of his prophecy is so long delayed (xvii. 15): he moreover complains of the endless duration of his sufferings (xv. 18), while on the other hand he represents to the Lord that he has obtained universal recognition as a prophet of Jehovah (xv. 16). The command not to take a wife (xvi. 2) further indicates that the prophet, who at his calling was only a נַיִן (i. 6, 7) has in the meantime reached a mature age. The words "this one!" also (xvi. 21) seem to indicate that the great catastrophe was very near. It is also seen that this discourse must belong to the same period as ch. xiii. Comp. the introduction to the fourth discourse.

The attempts to ascribe different parts of the discourse to different periods (comp. GRAF, S. 208, 9) are rendered abortive by the fact that it is a well-compacted whole, as will be seen from the following table of contents.

CHAPTER XIV.

1. The first petition.

XIV. 1-9.

- 1 The word which came to Jeremiah concerning the drought¹ :
- 2 Judah mourns and her gates are in trouble,
Covered by mourning² even to the earth ;
And the cry of Jerusalem goes up.
- 3 And their mighty ones have sent their mean ones³ for water.
They came to the cisterns, found no water ;
Returned with their vessels empty.
Ashamed and confounded are they and cover their heads.
- 4 On account of the ground, which is dismayed, because there was no rain in the land,
The husbandmen are ashamed and cover their heads.
- 5 For the hind also in the field has brought forth
And—forsaken,⁴ for there is no green thing there.
- 6 And the wild asses stand on the high places,
They gasp for air like the jackals.
Their eyes have failed, for there is no herb there.
- 7 Though our sins testify against us, O Jehovah, Act⁵ for thine own name's sake ;
For many are our apostasies, against thee have we sinned.
- 8 O thou Hope of Israel, his deliverer in distress ;
Why wilt thou be as a stranger in the land,
Or as a traveller who pitches (his tent) for the night?
- 9 Why wilt thou be as a man taken by surprise,⁶
As a warrior who can give no help?
Yet thou art in our midst, O Jehovah !
And we bear thy name ; forsake us not !⁷

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—הַבְּצֻרָה may be the plural of בְּצֻרָה Jer. xvii. 8, which undoubtedly signifies drought, in case בְּצֻרָה Ps. ix. 10; x. 1 is to be otherwise rendered. Comp. עֲשֵׂתֶרֶת from עֲשֵׂרֶת. The plural does not necessarily imply many things, as GRAF supposes. In Hebrew all things which have extension in time or space (comp. בְּתֵלִים, הַשְּׂכִים, etc. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 61, 2, c) may be in the plural. The word means a drought, which extends through a plurality of moments (perhaps also of points of space). [HITZIG: The plural stands here ad designandam diuturnam continuationem siccitatis, Ch. B. Mich.—S. R. A.]

² Ver. 2.—קָרוּ לִי Const. prægnans. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 7.

³ Ver. 3.—The form צַעֲוִר is found here only, and xlvi. 4 in the Chethibh. Elsewhere צַעֲוִר.

⁵ Ver. 7.—On עֲשֵׂה comp. rems. on xviii. 23.

⁶ Ver. 9.—נִדְהַם ἀπ. λεγ., since SCHULTENS, is by most commentators derived from the Arabic (dahama—to fall upon, surprise).

⁷ Ver. 9.—אֶל-הַנְּחַנּוּ-נָּ literally ne deponas, dejicias nos (comp. Num. xix. 9). From this are developed the meanings relinquere (Gen. xlii. 33) and deserere.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A fearful drought prevails in the land. Proceeding from the whole to the particulars, from the higher to the lower, the prophet shows how the whole of Judah and Jerusalem mourns (ver. 2), how the rulers of the people send out their subjects in vain for water (ver. 3), how the husbandmen also in like distress stand in like coun-sternation. Passing to the beasts he describes how the terrible thirst conquers even the maternal feeling of the hind (ver. 6) and how the wild asses seek the heights in order to obtain some mitigation at least from stronger currents of air (ver. 6). To this the prophet attaches a hearty prayer that the Lord will not have regard only to the acknowledged sins of Israel, but for the sake of His own glory (ver. 7), will no longer act towards His people as a stranger, who will not help (ver. 8), or as one who has become powerless and cannot help (ver. 9 a), but as one who is near, their shield and Father, and who accordingly will not forsake His people (ver. 9 b).

Ver. 1. The word which . . . drought. Contraction of two sentences into one, the predicate of the main sentence having been attracted by the subordinate sentence and become its predicate, so that the subject of the subordinate sentence becomes the predicate. Comp. the same construction xlvi. 1; xlvii. 1; xlix. 34.—Most commentators following the example of Jerome understand this of a future drought, which they believe to be intimated in 2 Kings xxv. 3. The connection is, however, opposed to deferring the drought to the future, as well as that the historical accounts contain no data for the determination of any real time.

Isai. li. 1. NÄGELS. Gr., § 80, 6, 1). תה, dismayed, forms a climax with שׁוֹי ashamed (comp. FÜRST, H. W. B. s. v.) and can therefore be used of impersonal objects like the latter. 2. The First Refusal.

XIV. 10-18.

- 10 Thus saith Jehovah to this people:
They loved so to wander, their feet they restrained not;
Jehovah moreover hath no pleasure in them;
Now he will remember their guilt and visit their sin.
- 11 Then said Jehovah unto me:
Pray not on behalf of this people for good.
- 12 Though they fast, I hearken not to their cry,
And though they offer holocausts and oblations, I have no pleasure in them;
But by the sword, by hunger and pestilence I consume them

- 13 And I said:
Ah, Lord Jehovah! Behold the prophets say to them,
"Ye will not see the sword, and famine will not come to you,
For I will give you assured peace in this place."
- 14 And Jehovah said unto me:
The prophets prophesy falsehood in my name,
I have not sent them nor commissioned them,
Nor have I spoken to them;
False vision and divination and nothingness
And the deceit¹ of their heart they prophesy to you.
- 15 Therefore thus saith Jehovah concerning the prophets,
Who prophesy in my name though I have not sent them,
And who say, There shall be no sword or famine in this land:
By the sword and by famine shall these prophets perish.
- 16 And the people to whom they prophesy
Shall lie cast out in the streets of Jerusalem,
By reason of the famine and the sword.
And will have none to bury them,
Them, their wives, their sons and their daughters:
And I pour out over them their wickedness.
- 17 And thou shalt say to them this word:
Mine eyes shall flow with tears day and night and cease not,
For the virgin daughter of my people² is stricken with a grievous stroke,
With a wound very incurable.
- 18 If I go forth into the field, behold! the slain with the sword,
If I return to the city, behold! the tortures³ of famine!
For even prophet and priest go into the country and know nothing.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Lord answers the prophet's petition, that in the description of the thirst-stricken beasts he only describes the conduct of the idolatrous people and has thus himself shown the reason why the Lord must punish them (ver. 10). Therefore he (the prophet) may cease his intercession (ver. 11), and the people their ceremonies, for their destruction by famine, sword and pestilence is determined upon (ver. 12). Thereupon the prophet ventures to interpose in behalf of the people from another side. He calls attention to the fact that the prophets have sustained the people in their errors by false promises (ver. 13). Upon this the Lord declares them to be false prophets (ver. 14), and pronounces their destruction (ver. 15). Moreover the same destruction is impending over the people who believe in them (ver. 16), from which it is seen that the prophet has accomplished nothing by his intervention. The wound is incurable (ver. 17); everywhere in the country, as he wanders hither and thither, the prophet meets with death in its most terrible forms. He learns that neither prophet nor priest is any longer in a condition to propitiate the Lord, or avert the calamity from the people (ver. 18).

Ver. 10. Thus saith Jehovah . . . their sin. The commentators mistake the connection of this verse with the preceding, when they overlook, that in ׀, thus, the Lord refers to the description of the animals tormented with thirst (vers. 5 and 6), and finds in it a description of the passionate, ungovernable lust of the people for idolatry, the true, final cause of the ruin now come upon Israel. As the hind, impelled by her desire for refreshment, abandons her newly born young in order to seek for food, so Israel forsakes the Lord in order to satisfy his lust for idolatry. As the wild-ass runs to the high places, in order there, with wide-open jaws, to drink in at least a cooler breath of air, so Israel pants for idols. We are justified in this interpretation the rather as the prophet has previously used essentially the same emblems of idolatry. In ii. 24 he compared idolatrous Israel with the wild-ass, who (there indeed in the heat of sexual impulse) gasps for breath (comp. xiv. 6). Wandering (נָגַד) is there also censured in the people, as a symptom of their lust for idols, as in those who cannot restrain the foot (comp. ii. 25). In ver. 10 a, then there is a statement of the reason, why He is compelled to refuse, as He does in ver. 10 b, the petition of the prophet (ver. 7 sqq.). This second half of the verse is moreover taken verbatim from Hos. viii. 13; ix. 9.

Vers. 11 and 12. Then said Jehovah . . .

I consume them. To this denial the Lord adds by way of climax as before (vii. 16) a prohibition of further intercession, at the same time announcing that the people also will accomplish nothing by the ceremonies of divine worship, which train of thought we found also in xi. 14 sqq.—For good. Comp. Vers. 17 and 18. And thou shalt say to them . . . know nothing. The formula in ver. 17 never introduces greater sections. It occurs verbatim as here only in xiii. 12. Here certainly at the beginning of a strophe. But there is nothing in the tenor of the words to prevent their being used wherever a definite single word is to be marked. Comp. xxviii. 7.—

Let mine eyes, etc. As before (viii. 23; xiii. 17), the prophet here expresses the thought that nothing but weeping is left for him.—Stroke, etc. Comp. x. 19; xxx. 12.—For even prophet, etc. The prophet evidently wishes to say, that he has looked about everywhere, both in the country and the city, but has found only symptoms of irretrievable destruction. This moreover was not only his conclusion, for all the priests and prophets who, like him, had gone into the country, had also learned that there was nothing more to be done, so that it must be said of them: לֹא יָדְעוּ, i. e. non sapient (comp. Ps. lxxiii. 22; Job xxxiv. 2), they know nothing.—כִּחַץ occurs only in Gen. xxxiv. 10, 21; xlii. 34, as a finite verb, is contrasted in these passages with the Accusative and signifies at any rate not simply to go directly out, but (after the manner of business-people) to go hither and thither (commutare, ἐπιπορεύσθαι). Here then at any rate we must suppose a journeying directed to several points. The לֹא is explained by Jerusalem's being considered as the central point from which they went now this way now that way. The omission of the article before יָרֵא is not uncommon (comp. on iii. 2.)

3. The Second Petition.

XIV. 19-22.

- 19 Hast thou utterly rejected Judah, or has thy soul disgust at Zion?
Why then hast thou smitten us and there is no cure for us?
We hoped for peace but there came nothing good;—
For a time of healing, and behold terror!
- 20 We acknowledge, O Jehovah, our wickedness,
The guilt of our fathers, that we have sinned against thee.
- 21 Reject us not for thy name's sake;
Disgrace not the throne of thy glory;
Hold in remembrance, break not thy covenant with us.
- 22 Are there then among the vain deities of the heathen rain-dispensers?
Or will the heaven [itself] give rain?
Art not thou He, Jehovah, our God?
And our hope because thou hast made all these things?

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet is not easily turned from his intercession. He here begins again the second time. He asks the Lord why He has rejected Judah and Zion (ver. 19). He then adduces three reasons why this cannot be. 1. Israel acknowledges his sins (ver. 20); 2. Jehovah must help for His own glory and for the sake of the covenant (ver. 21); 3. There is no other dispenser of rain and of blessing than He (ver. 22).

Ver. 19. Hast thou utterly . . . terror. וְיִקְרַח repetition from viii. 15.

Vers. 20, 22. We acknowledge . . . made all these things. As in ver. 7, so also here (ver. 20), the prophet supports his petition on the confession of sin. Therefore he likewise adds, as in ver. 7, an appeal to the Lord's own honor. Hence he further strengthens his appeal by urging (a) that Zion's destruction would disgrace the throne of the Lord Himself, in so far as Zion in part is the throne of the Lord, and in part conceals Him in its midst (comp. on xvii. 12); (b) he reminds the Lord of the covenant made with Israel, which is to be kept, not to be broken. Comp. xi. 1 sqq.; Lev. xxvi. 11, 12, which passage seems to have been in the prophet's mind.—From ver. 22 we perceive plainly the connection with the first petition, ver. 1 sqq.—Art not thou He? הוּא is never a simple copula, not even in Eccles. (comp. i. 17 with ii. 13). Here it is demonstrative, i. e. referring to the previously mentioned idea of rain-dispenser. Thou alone art He, who art at the same time our God and the object of our hope. God alone is the rain-dispenser, for He has made all things. Comp. Job v. 10; xxxviii. 25, 26.—For thou hast made is the basis of Thou art he;—our God, etc., is therefore a parenthesis. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr. § 80, 3.—[HENDERSON: “From the commencement of ver. 19 to the end of the chapter the people are introduced as doing what the prophet was forbidden to do on their behalf.”—S. R. A.]

CHAPTER XV.

4. The Second Refusal.

XV. 1-4.

- 1 And Jehovah said unto me :
 If Moses and Samuel stood before me,
 Yet my soul is not inclined towards this people :
 Away with them from my presence ! Out with them !
 2 And if they say to thee : Out whither shall we go ?—
 Then say to them : Thus saith Jehovah :
 He who is for death to death, he for the sword to the sword,
 And he who is for famine to famine, and he for captivity to captivity.
 3 And I appoint over them four kinds, saith Jehovah :
 The sword to kill and the dogs to tear,
 The birds of heaven and the beasts of the field to devour and to destroy.
 4 And I make them a horror¹ to all kingdoms of the earth,
 On account of Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, king of Judah,
 And on account of what he did at Jerusalem.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—Here and in Ezek. xxiii. 46 רָעַע is found without marginal reading, but in Isa. xxviii. 19 the older form רָעַע. In the other places (besides those quoted in Jeremiah also 2 Chron. xxix. 8), where EWALD (comp. § 53, b) would read רָעַע (scarecrow, sport [of chance]) there is always the Keri רָעַע. Except in Isa. xxviii. 19, the word occurs only as the designation of the terminus in quem after וְיָצֵא or before וְיָצֵא. The root רָעַע has both in the Hebrew (it occurs in the Old Test. only in Eccl. xii. 3; Esth. v. 9; Hab. ii. 7) and in the dialects (comp. Dan. v. 19; vi. 27) the meaning of violent motion, commotion. Hence רָעַע is commotion, quaking, horror.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The second petition is refused with a decisiveness which allows of no repetition and the people are rejected from the presence of the Lord (ver. 1), but not to a definite place, for they are delivered up to destruction in the most various forms (ver. 2), and to destroyers of the most terrible kinds (ver. 3), so that their destruction will excite the horror of all nations; but all this will correspond to the seed of abomination which Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, scattered in Judah (ver. 4).

Ver. 1. And Jehovah said . . . out with them! Moses is an intercessor, Exod. xvii. 11 sqq.; xxxii. 11 sqq.; Numb. xiv. 13; Ps. evi. 23.—Samuel in 1 Sam. vii. 8; viii. 6; xii. 16-23; xv. 11; Ps. xcix. 6; Eccles. xlvi. 16. Comp. HENZOG, Real-Enc. XIII. S. 398.—Noah, Daniel and Job are mentioned in a similar manner in Ezek. xiv. 14; and in later times Jeremiah himself in 2 Macc. xv. 14.—The object of away, according to the preceding context, and to whither shall we go? ver. 2, can be no other than the people. Vers. 2 and 3. And if they say . . . to destroy. The question, whither shall we go? presupposes the thought of a mere banishment. It is declared in what follows that far worse than this is meant.—He who is for death. A fearful destructive blow is to follow, which causes the people to be scattered and drives individuals, without selection or respect of persons, into the hands of the agents of death.—Death, with sword, famine and captivity, is evidently the relatively spontaneous death by disease or pestilence (רָעַע), wherefore the latter word is also used with the other in xiv. 12; Ezek. xiv. 21; xxxiii. 27; comp. Jer. xliii. 11.—Ver. 3 fortifies this judgment of destruction, by declaring it in a certain measure permanent. For and I appoint declares that Israel is to be placed as it were under the jurisdiction of these four destructive forces, as also in Ezek. xiv. 21 it is expressly said that the Lord will send His "four sore judgments—the sword and the famine and the noisome beast and the pestilence," upon Jerusalem.—Kinds, כִּשְׁפָחוֹת, Comp. רִיךְ, the four generations, Prov. xxx. 11 sqq. Since the four instruments here mentioned correspond to the four kinds of destruction mentioned in ver. 2, it is evident that ver. 3 bears to ver. 2 not a logical but rhetorical relation. The sword moreover represents the judgment on the living, the three others the judgment on the dead. Comp. xiv. 16; Deut. xxviii. 26.

Ver. 4. And I make them . . . at Jerusalem. Repetition of the first half of the verse xxiv. 9; xxix. 18; xxxiv. 17. The expression is taken from Deut. xxviii. 25. Concerning Manasseh comp. 2 Kings xxi. 1-17; xxiii. 26; xxiv. 3. The biblical accounts dismiss the long reign of this king with remarkable brevity. We obtain the impression that this is the effect of a certain reluctance to recall this name, which represents the darkest portion of the history of Judah, an epoch which is to be regarded as the concentration and end of all ungodliness.

5. Further description of the sad fate impending over the rejected nation.

XV. 5-9.

- 5 For who will have pity on thee, O Jerusalem?
Or who will have sympathy for thee?
Or who will turn aside to wish thee well?

Then I stretched out my hand against thee and destroyed thee:
I was weary of repenting.

Some compare the phrase אִם יָגֵל בְּנֵי the mother with her children [Syr., Arab., C. B. MICH., EWALD, etc.—S. R. Others take אִם בְּהוֹרֵר to be in the construct state: the mother of the young man [CHALD., KIMCHI, J. D. MICH., HITZIG, etc.—S. R. EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After the definite refusal in vers. 1-4, the prophet can declare only that there is no further prospect of pity or succor for Jerusalem (ver. 5). The people having rejected the Lord, He rejects them, and will not as before retract this determination (ver. 6). Winnowed out of the country, Israel is bereaved of his men and sons (vers. 7-9 a); and the enemy will come with the sword after the fugitive remnant (ver. 9 b).

Ver. 5. For who will take pity . . . to wish thee well. From vers. 1-4 it follows with absolute certainty that Jehovah will no longer help, and that therefore Israel is inevitably lost. בְּ, For, implies a reference to this thought. No longer any escape! If the Lord will not, who else will have pity on the people? (Isai. li. 19; Nah. iii. 7). Who indeed will even ask how they are? שָׁאַל לְטוֹבוֹ properly = to ask after one's good health, to greet, Gen. xliii. 27; Exod. xviii. 7; Judges xviii. 15, etc.) The thought seems to be thus implied, that still less will any one do aught for the welfare of the people, or any longer intercede for them as the prophet has done (xiv. 7 sqq.; 19 sqq.). — Turn aside. כָּוֵר is here, as frequently, to deviate from the direct, proposed way, in order to turn to some other object, with which, as here, the idea of taking trouble may be connected. Ruth iv. 1; 1 Ki. xx. 39; Exod. iii. 3.

Ver. 6. Thou hast rejected me . . . of repenting. The reason for the declaration in ver. 5, that Israel is irretrievably lost, is stated in ver. 6, and more particularly in ver. 7 sqq. The reason first given, in ver. 6 a, is objective, it being declared what Israel has done to draw upon himself such a punishment. The words then I stretched to repenting express the subjective reason, i. e., they declare what facts on the part of the speaker (i. e., of God) are presented as causæ efficientes of destruction. The präterite וָאֵן, etc., is not strange; as the apostasy is an already accomplished fact, so also is the hostile position which God assumes towards it. The "stretched-out arm," which is so often mentioned as Israel's saving arm (Dent. iv. 34; v. 15; xxvi. 8, etc.), signifies the hostile position of God towards the enemies of the people. Elsewhere the stretching out of the hand frequently designates the declaration of war, or the command to use force; 1 Ki. xiii. 4; Job xv. 25; Isai. v. 25; ix. 11; x. 4; Jer. vi. 12; li. 25; Ezek. vi. 14; xiv. 9, 13, etc.—Perhaps also the assonance of וָאֵן to וָאֵן is intended.—Destroyed thee is a summary intimation of the import of the gesture I was weary, etc., a more particular definition, in so far as it declares that the destruction will no longer be deferred as heretofore by a gracious "repenting." Comp. iv. 28; vi. 11; Isai. i. 14

Vers. 7-9. And I winnowed them . . . before their enemies. I do not think with GRAF that שְׁעַר הָאָרֶץ is to denote the uttermost lands of the earth. How then could בְּ be used? The preposition retains its proper meaning, if as in Nah. iii. 13 we understand the exits of the land. The Lord winnows so powerfully that as the chaff flies out over the threshing-floor, so Israel flies out through the exits of the land to a distance.—Had not turned, etc., is a causal sentence.—In vers. 8 and 9 the prophet uses similar colors to those in xiv. 16, 17. Comp. xi. 22; xviii. 21.—The words וָאֵן בָּהוּר, variously interpreted by the commentators, are most easily explained by the antithesis to the subsequently mentioned יְלִרְהוּ בְּשִׁבְעָה. Even the strongest women, both those who have borne distinguished warriors, and those who have had numerous sons, shall perish. Without insisting on the singular in בָּהוּר I believe that it includes the idea of quality, as שִׁבְעָה does of quantity. (Comp. 1 Sam. ii. 5).—[HENDERSON:—"By the 'young spoiler' [text 'destroyer'] is meant Nebuchadnezzar II., who, when his father was old and infirm, had part of the Chaldean army committed to him, and after defeating Pharaoh Necho at Carchemish marched forward against Jerusalem and captured it. The attack being made at noon indicates the unexpectedness by which it was characterized, that being the time of day when, owing to intense heat, military operations are carried on with less vigor."—HITZIG: "The description in ver. 8 points to a lost battle; and on this hypothesis all the single features of the picture in vers. 7-9 may be brought into one point of view, so as to present one event. The author then refers to the battle of Megiddo, the more probably (2 Ki. xxiii. 29) as the figure of the sun setting in bright daylight might then be founded on the eclipse which took place in that valley 30th Sept., A. D. 610. (Vid. THENIUS on 2 Ki.)"—S. R. A.]—Breathed, etc., וָנִפְחָה. From Job xxxi. 39 the meaning of the word exspirare seems plain. The rendering "to sigh" is too feeble in this connection.—Her sun, the sun of her life, and the happiness (comp. Mal. iii. 20; Ps. lxxxiv. 12) which she had in her sons is gone down. וָנִפְחָה as in Gen. xv. 17; 2 Sam. ii. 24; Mic. iii. 6. בְּעֵד יוֹ, comp. the previous "at noon-day."—And confounded. וָבוֹשָׁה. The reference to the mother is to be preferred; for the sun itself does not suffer shame, but those who by the setting of the sun are reduced from the condition of an honored mother to the wretched state of a bereaved and childless one. In Isai. xxiv. 23 it is the sun and moon themselves which must pale before a more brilliant star.—Deliver to the sword. Comp. Mic. vi. 14.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 10.—כֹּלָה נִקְלָלוֹנִי. This wholly abnormal form (comp. OLSH., § 206 b) which as forma mixta has been variously explained, is evidently due, as J. D. MICHAELIS, HITZIG, GRAF, MEIER have recognized, to a wrong division. It should read כֹּלָהֶם קָלְלוּנִי. The attraction of the ם to the following word may have been occasioned by the circumstance that the form ending with it is not found elsewhere (similar formation כֹּלְכֶם Deut. i. 22. Comp. אֹתָהֶם Ezek. xxiii. 45, 47; אֹתָהֶם Gen. xxxii. 1; xix. 8). The 1st Pers. כֹּלָהֶם however is found in 2 Sam. xxiii. 6.

² Ver. 11.—אִם לֹא שְׂרוּתֶךָ. The Chethibh may be read שְׂרוּתֶךָ (who attack thee, anomalous inf. Kal. from שָׂרַר, as HITZIG), שְׂרוּתֶךָ (solvendo te, ROSENUELLER), שְׂרוּתֶךָ (inilium tuum, GESEN.), שְׂרוּתֶךָ solatio tua ss. crit., WINER), שְׂרוּתֶךָ (in different meanings: confirmabo te or exultarabo te, J. D. MICHAELIS; firmabo te, MAURER, EWALD; I do thee injury, I oppress thee, GESEN., Thesaur., MEIER). The Keri is שְׂרִיתֶךָ Piel from שָׂרַר, which verb occurs besides only in Job xxxvii. 3 (disputed in the latter place) and is said to signify to loosen like the Aram. שָׂרַר (comp. Dan. ii. 22; iii. 25; Ezr. v. 2). [So HENDERSON.—S. R. A.] The old translators vacillate and alter arbitrarily. Vulg., Targ., RASCHI, KIMCHI read שְׂרִיתֶךָ for שְׂרִיתֶךָ (comp. 1 Chron. xii. 38; OLSH., S. 70 and 412), which they regard as = reliquiae tuæ or finis tuæ thy remnant, thy exit, for which however אַחֲרִית always stands elsewhere. [A. V.: it shall be well with thy remnant]. I agree with GESENIUS in his Thesaurus and MEIER. The scriptio defect. is no objection. Comp. ez. gr. יִגְדִּילֶךָ Nah. i. 12; לִפְכָּהֲנִי Song of Sol. iv. 9. שָׂרַר means torsit, contorsit. Hence שָׂרַר, oppressor (Ps. viii. 3; xxvii. 11; liv. 7), שָׂרַר clond (contortum) שָׂרַר torques, שָׂרַר catena. The Lord tells the prophet for his consolation that the oppression will eventually be in favor of his best interests. Comp. ver. 19 sqq., לָטוֹב besides only in xxxii. 39. Elsewhere לָטוֹבָה (xiv. 11; xxi. 10; xxiv. 5, 6; xxxix. 16; xlv. 27).

⁷ Ver. 15.—לֹא־לֵאמְנָה, ix. 2; לִפְשָׁט, xxx. 11. Comp. Isai. xi. 3; xxxii. 1.

⁸ Ver. 16.—דְּבַר־יְ. The Chethibh דְּבַר־יְ is quite impertinent. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 105, 4 b, 3.

⁹ Ver. 18.—נַצְוֶה. Subst. (comp. Ps. lxxiv. 3; 1 Chron. xxix. 11) = perpetuitas. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 74.

¹⁰ Ver. 18.—אֲנִישָׁה, comp. xxx. 15; Isai. xvii. 11; Mic. i. 9.

¹¹ Ver. 13.—אֵי־כֶּבֶד. Comp. Mic. i. 14. It is the opposite of נְהַלֵּ אִירָה, Deut. xxi. 4; Am. v. 21. Comp. Exo. l. 27.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After a sorrowful lament of the prophet, that without any fault of his, all curse him (ver. 10), follows (if vers. 11-14 are genuine) first a comforting assurance from the Lord, that all will accrue to his advantage and that even his enemies in their distress will turn to him as suppliants (ver. 11); and then a description of this distress: it comes as iron from the North which cannot be broken by other iron or brass (ver. 12); all wealth in all the borders of Israel will be plundered on account of their sin (ver. 13), and the people will be carried away into a strange land in consequence of the violent and inextinguishable anger of Jehovah (ver. 14). In vers. 15-18 follows a further address of the prophet to the Lord, which, by the words "Thou knowest it," may possibly be connected with ver. 12, but may also be connected with ver. 10. The prophet prays the Lord for His gracious interposition, for vengeance on his enemies, for long-suffering forbearance, since he is indeed suffering for God's sake (ver. 15). He grounds his petition further on his willing devotion to the Lord as His instrument (ver. 16), and his having walked worthy of this great honor (ver. 17). In conclusion another lament of the prophet: Why is there then for me no cure, no recreation? (ver. 18).

Ver. 10. Wo unto me . . . all curse me. Had the intercession of the prophet in ch. xiv. been heard, his lot, in so far as it depended on his countrymen, would have been more agreeable. But now that so stern a refusal has been given he sees the whole fury of the people discharged upon his person. The mention of the calamity of the mother, vers. 8 and 9, reminds the prophet of his own mother, not however to lament on her account, but on his own, that he was ever born. Comp. xx. 14; Job iii. 3; 1 Macc. ii. 7. —Lending and borrowing cause most law-suits. The prophet neither receives loans from others

Ver. 11. Jehovah said . . . in time of distress. The formula Jehovah said ("אָמַר") thus prefixed is found besides only in Jer. xlv. 25, and in no other prophet. I cannot agree with GRAF, who in xlv. 25 would attach it to the preceding context. (Comp. הִנְנִי פֹקֵר). We cannot then say that this position of the formula is a proof of the spuriousness or corruption of the text.—The Lord presents to the prophet's view a second pleasing turn in his affairs: even his opponents, who now press him in a hostile way, shall then be brought to press him with supplications, because they perceive their only salvation to be in his intercession. This is more particularly explained in ver. 12.

Ver. 12. Will then iron . . . brass? The words are very variously construed. The most simple construction, which agrees well with the context, is to take the first iron, בְּרוֹז, as the nominative, and the two following as in the objective case. Will then iron, i. e. any other iron, brought by men, break the northern iron or brass? That the northern iron is the northern empire (xiii. 20) is clear. The most celebrated iron and steel manufacture among the ancients was that of the Chalybeans in Pontus, of whom Strabo says, οἱ δὲ τῶν Χαλδαίων Χαλκίβητες τὸ παλαιὸν ἀνορθώσαντο, XII. p. 826. Comp. J. D. MICHAELIS. Obscrv. phil. et crit., in Jer., Ed. SCHLETSNER, p. 136. [Comp. WINKER, R.-W.-B., II. S. 512; SMITH, Bibl. Dict., II. p. 1376.—S. R. A.]. It is accordingly quite suitable to represent this northern nation itself under the figure of the strongest iron. The connection with the preceding is this: thine enemies among the people will yet turn to thee as their only refuge, when they have learned their inability to master the northern iron. For the fulfilment see xxxvii. 3; xlii. 2 sqq.

Vers. 13 and 14. Thy substance . . . burn over you. These verses are evidently intended to give a plainer description of the distress, merely intimated in ver. 11, and briefly and obscurely described in ver. 12. The words are, however, taken from xvii. 3, 4, where they are found in the more original form and proper connection.—Not for hire. The thought occurs similarly only in Ps. xlv. 12. In this passage, however, it is the selling of the people, not of their property and treasures, which is spoken of. It is also a question whether in Ps. xlv. 12 the selling is to be understood in a literal sense =thou causest thy people to be sold into slavery by their conquerors at a mean price (comp. Joel iii. 8, 11, 12; VAMINGER on Ps. xlv. 12). Since now it is doubtful whether the thought that God sells His people for nothing or without return is biblical, and still more doubtful whether it may be said God sells the treasures of His people for nothing, the view gains in probability that there is here a corruption of the text. Comp. the TEXTUAL NOTE 4.

Verses 11 and 12 contain in themselves nothing to lead us to doubt their integrity, nor do they in the connection form an incongruous element. Ver. 11 contains a preliminary tranquilization of the prophet, ver. 12 a more particular characterization of the distress intimated in ver. 11, and the reason of approach imploringly, etc.—Thou knowest, in ver. 15, may be connected with ver. 12, in the sense: I cannot indeed conceive how that is possible, but Thou Lord knowest it. For since vers. 11 and 12 contain the words of the Lord to the prophet, "Thou knowest it" cannot be an appeal by the prophet to the divine testimony, but only for the purpose of self-tranquilization. But on the other hand it cannot be denied, that this interruption in the prophet's lament is the more remarkable, as Jeremiah afterwards continues in ver. 15 as though he had received no consolation (comp. especially ver. 18) and the consolatory statements of ver. 11 recur in ver. 19 sqq. For these verses also declare that the affliction will accrue to the honor and welfare of the prophet and that the enemies will yet be compelled to apply to him. This is also favored by the perfect appropriateness with which ver. 15 is connected with ver. 10. The prophet had in ver. 10 protested his innocence, for which in ver. 15 he appeals to the Omniscient as a witness. Verses 13 and 14 bear in a much higher degree the stamp of spuriousness. For 1. They prolong in an unnecessary manner (as mere filling out of the portrayal of the previously intimated distress) the interruption of the connection; 2. They are a mere quotation from xvii. 3, 4 and textually corrupt, with which it accords, that they contain an address to the people which does not suit the connection; 3. The words Thou knowest, ver. 15, are then disconnected, for neither can they be referred to the close of ver. 14 nor to vers. 13 and 14 together, since these verses contain neither the words of the prophet, nor anything which appeared incredible to the prophet.

Ver. 15 a. Thou knowest it . . . thy long-suffering. On thou knowest it vid. supra: comp. Ps. xl. 10; Ezek. xxxvii. 3.—And visit me, בָּקַרְךָ is frequently used of a gracious visitation of God after a period of disfavor: Gen. xxi. 1; Exod. iii. 16; iv. 31; Ruth i. 16; Ps. viii. 5, 6; Isa. xxiii. 17, etc. Comp. Ps. evi. 4.—

Avenge, etc. אֲנַקְמָה לִי properly=avenge Thee for my good upon my enemies. This construction here only. Comp. 1 Sam. xxiv. 13; Numb. xxxi. 2.—By thy long-suffering. Since the prophet is not himself conscious of having deserved the divine anger, the long-suffering can be referred only to the enemies: "Suffer not that in consequence of the delay of Thy vengeance I be swept away of my enemies."

Vers. 15 b-17. Know that . . . filled with indignation. In these words the prophet presents the grounds on which he expects help from the Lord. He first prays the Lord to consider that he is suffering for His (the Lord's) sake. Comp. Ps. lxix. 8 (Zeph. iii. 18). He then appeals to the willingness with which he offered himself as the Lord's organ, and his life in accordance with his high calling.—Thy words, etc. The prophet did not excoGITATE what he was to proclaim but found it, it was offered to him. The found is according to Old Test. usage frequently that which is present of itself in opposition to that which one has produced or procured by his own activity. Comp. Gen. xix. 15; 1 Sam. xxi. 4; xxv. 8.—Devoured. As in Ezek. ii. 8; iii. 3 coll. Rev. x. 9, 10, he designates by eating the eager complete reception of them into the mind. The commentators refer to PLATTES, Aulul. III. 6, 1, nimum lubenter edi sermonem tuum.—For I bear, etc. The word of the Lord may then have become the joy of his heart because it effected that "the name of Jehovah was named over him" (comp. rems. on vii. 10), i. e. that he was designated as a prophet of Jehovah in opposition to the prophets of the idols (comp. the prophets of Baal, 1 Kings xviii. 19; 2 Kings x. 19). This designation was to him an honorary title of the highest value. But by this it is not excluded that the word of the Lord in itself was already a cause of rejoicing to him.—I sat not. The prophet here describes how his life externally had been spent in accordance with the prophetic calling. He had avoided the society of idle, pleasure-seeking men, he had sat in solitude, the feeling of being divinely possessed as well as the sorrow caused by the predominant objects of his vision, viz. human sin and divine punishment, rendering him incapable of taking part in the proceedings of the merry.—Before thy hand. The expression "hand" designates the divine operation as immediate and irresistible. Comp. Isa. viii. 11; Ezek. iii. 14; viii. 1; xi. 5; xxxvii. 1, etc.—For thou hast filled me, etc. The prophet is filled with indignation and anger by what he beholds in consequence of the divine operation. He cannot possibly be angry with God. Rather is he full of the divine wrath (vi. 11) at the sin of men and at the necessity of punishing them. Moreover we see from ver. 16 that indignation is not the only feeling of the prophet, nor the only reason which detained him from the society of men. He was in part too divinely troubled, in part too joyful in God, to feel at home in such society. [HENDERSON: "The hilarity which the prophet had experienced was not that of the ungodly, who at their festive meetings treated divine things with scorn. With these he had had no fellowship, but because of the faithful communication of his inspired messages he had been expelled from society and made the object of their fiercest indignation. The occurrence of "indignation" with "hand" in this verse has generally induced the supposition that by the latter the afflicting power of God is intended; but it seems more in accordance with the bearing of the connection to regard the expression as designed to convey the idea of powerful divine impulse or prophetic inspiration. Comp. Ezek. i. 3; iii. 14, and frequently. Thus Vatavab, Clarius."—S. R. A.]

Ver. 18. Why then . . . precarious water. The prophet concludes with an exclamation of hopelessness. After what he could declare of himself in vers. 16 and 17 he thought he had some claim for protection and consolation. But there is no prospect of this. As in despair he therefore inquires, Why is this?—According to the sense the whole verse must be rendered as a question, and why therefore be referred to the second section of the verse.—Precarious. Comp. Isa. xxxiii. 16. ["On TINDAL's objections to this passage, see WATERLAND, Scripture Vindicated, p. 245." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

XV. 19-21.

19 Therefore thus saith Jehovah:

If thou return, I will cause thee again to stand before me;¹
And if thou bring forth the precious without the base, thou shalt be as my mouth.²
They shall return to thee, but thou shalt not return to them.

20 And I will make thee to this people a brazen wall, a strong one;
And they will contend against thee, but not prevail over thee;
For I am with thee to deliver
And to preserve thee, saith Jehovah.

21 And I preserve thee from the hand of the wicked,
And redeem thee from the might of the violent.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Lord answers the prophet by promising him anew, together with a mild correction and on the condition of blameless purity, the honor of being permitted to serve Him as His organ (ver. 19 a). He then promises the return to him of his enemies (ver. 19 b), inexpugnable firmness (ver. 20), protection and deliverance from all dangers (ver. 21).

Ver. 19. Therefore thus . . . return to them.—If thou return. In these words there is evidently a gentle reproof. In the preceding context, especially ver. 18, the prophet had allowed himself to be carried away into doubt of the fidelity and trustworthiness of the Lord. In this there was an element of alienation from the Lord. Without entering on a confutation or accusing the prophet directly of his departure, he gives him to understand that such a departure has taken place only by the conditional sentence, "If thou return." For turning back presupposes a turning away. Comp. iv. 1.—To stand before me, in the sense of mediatorship, which at the same time includes the honor of a servant and of one who stands very near his Lord: xv. 1; xviii. 20; xxxv. 19; xl. 10.—Bring forth, etc. From the context such a bringing forth only can be spoken of as on the one hand is opposed to the blameworthy utterances of the prophet in ver. 18, and as on the other hand qualifies him to be the Lord's mouth. הוֹצֵא is therefore to be taken in the sense in which it occurs, ex. gr. in Job xv. 13, which passage has in general a remarkable resemblance to the present. Then כִּן is away from, far from, without. Comp. x. 14; Job xi. 15; xxi. 9. Vid. NAEGELSB. Gr. § 112, 5 d.—On the subject-matter comp. CHAPTER XVI.

3. Instructions as to the conduct of the Lord's servant among the people who have incurred judgment.

XVI. 1-9.

- 1 The word of Jehovah came also unto me, saying,
- 2 Thou shalt not take to thee a wife,
Nor shalt thou have sons and daughters in this place:
- 3 For thus saith Jehovah of the sons and of the daughters born in this place,
And of their mothers that bare them,
And of their fathers that begat them in this land:
- 4 Miserable deaths¹ shall they die,
They shall not be mourned nor buried;
They shall become dung on the surface of the earth;
And by sword and famine shall they perish;
And their carcases shall serve for food to the fowls of heaven and the beasts of the earth.
- 5 For thus saith Jehovah: Enter not into the house of mourning,²
And go not to bewail them or to commiserate them;
For I have taken my peace from this people, saith Jehovah,—
The loving-kindness and the mercy.
- 6 Both great and small shall die in this land;
They shall not be buried and men will not mourn them,
Nor cut themselves, nor make themselves bald for them:
- 7 Nor will men break bread³ for them in mourning,
To console them concerning the dead;
Nor will they present them the cup of consolation,
Concerning father or mother.
- 8 And also thou shalt not go into the house of feasting [lit. drinking],
To sit with them to drink and to eat.
- 9 For thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, the God of Israel:
Behold, I take away from this place before your eyes and in your days,
The voice of joy and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride.

The root כְּרוֹחַ, which does not occur in the Hebrew, has according to the dialects (Arab. marsih, vox vehemens) the meaning of loud crying, be it for joy or sorrow.

³ Ver. 7.—פָּרֶכֶת interchangeably with פָּרֵשׁ (Lam. iv. 4)—frangere, dividere. With להם Isa. lviii. 7. Here להם is wanting, but is found in some codd. of Kennicott. The LXX. and JEROME also express it. At any rate the bread, corresponding to the cup of consolation, is intended, which in Ezek. xxiv. 17, 22 is called להם אֲנָשִׁים; Hos. ix. 4 להם אֲוִנִים. The suffixes לְנַהֲכּוֹ as in אֲכָלוּ and אֲכָלוּ refer to the idea present, not in the words but in the mind of the mourner. (Comp. EWALD, § 318 a).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet (in xv. 10) had cried to his mother in complaint: Why hast thou borne me? He had explained in ver. 17 that he lived alone and far from all society of cheerful men. The Lord had thereupon in vers. 19-21 consoled him and promised him protection and deliverance. But the great national calamities should nevertheless continue. Hence both the complaint of the prophet in ver. 10 and his separation in ver. 17 are approved. Yea, it is added in confirmation that he is not even to take a wife and beget children (xvi. 2), for these would not escape the universal calamity of death (vers. 3 and 4),—further that he is not to go into any house of mourning or give any token of sympathy in the cases of death, in order to indicate that the dead will remain without burial or mourning;—finally that he is not to go into any house of feasting, in order to indicate that all joy, especially all nuptial rejoicing, will cease.

Vers. 5-7. For thus saith . . . father or mother. The connection of ver. 4, with ver. 5 sqq., is as follows: the inhabitants shall perish miserably and lie unburied, for it is the command of the Lord that the prophet go into no house of mourning, i. e., it is the divine purpose to decree that punishment of which the command to the prophet is only the outward sign. The ground of this purpose is that God has withdrawn His favor from the people. That ye hearken not unto me;—

- 13 Therefore I cast you away out of this land
Into the land that ye have not known, ye and your fathers;
And there ye shall serve the⁴ other gods day and night,
Because⁵ I will shew you no favour.⁶
- 14 Therefore behold, the days come, saith Jehovah,
When it shall no more be said: As Jehovah liveth,
Who brought up the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt;

15 But: As Jehovah liveth,
Who brought up the children of Israel from the land of the North,
And from all lands whither he had driven them:
And I bring them back into their land, that I gave to their fathers.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The grounds of the punitive judgment described in the previous context are stated in this way, that the prophet is commanded to answer the people when, assuming an air of innocence, they inquire into these grounds (ver. 10): because your fathers forsook me and served other gods (ver. 11), and ye moreover have done worse (ver. 12), therefore I cast you forth into a strange land, where you may serve those gods; and will show you no more favor (ver. 13). To this are added two verses repeated in xxiii. 7, 8, in which it is declared that the oath by Jehovah who brought Israel out of Egypt, will be changed into the oath by Jehovah who brought Israel out of the north country. If these verses are genuine here, their object must be a double one: 1. Confirmation of the threatening pronounced in ver. 13. 2. Mitigation of the harsh utterance at the close of ver. 13, by the prospect of future deliverance. This strophe, moreover, forms the argument of the third division, for the three following strophes serve only to describe more in detail, and to elucidate some points in the first.

Vers. 10-13. And it shall come to pass . . . shew you no favour. This mode of speech, viz., the hypothesis of a question of the people and answer to it, is found v. 19; xiii. 22.—Therefore that your fathers, etc. Comp. vii. 24-28; ix. 11-15; xi. 7, sqq.—Hardness. Comp. iii. 17; ix. 13; xviii. 12.—that ye hearkened not. Comp. xvii. 23; xviii. 10; xix. 15; xlii. 13.—Therefore I cast, etc., comp.

xxii. 26, 28.—Into the land. The article is explained by the prophet's reference to what has been already said (xv. 14).—And ye shall serve. What was before sin is now punishment. The prophet has in view Deut. iv. 28; xxviii. 36, 64.—Day and night. The servants' toil consists in this, that they must attend to their service day and night.—Because I will shew. This causal sentence refers not to the first clause of the verse, which is circumstantially founded on the preceding context from ver. 10, but on the second. Because Jehovah has withdrawn His favor, they have to seek help of their idols.

Vers. 14 and 15. Therefore behold . . . gave to your fathers. לִבְנֵי, therefore, at the beginning of ver. 14 is entirely in place. On this very account, because Israel, according to ver. 13, were to be cast away into a foreign land, the form of oath is to be correspondingly altered. Accordingly the purport of vers. 14 and 15 is primarily not consolatory, but sad. It confirms the declaration concerning the captivity. In so far, and because Jeremiah frequently quotes himself, as well as because interruptions of a prophecy of sorrowful import by consolatory prospects also frequently occur (comp. iv. 27; v. 10, 18), these verses may well be genuine here. I bring back is then connected with I cast away in ver. 13. Moreover that the words, even if transferred by Jeremiah himself, are in their original position in xxiii. 7, is clear from the connection, as well as from "the more peculiar and concrete form of the ext." (Hirtzig) of this passage.

More particular description of the removal announced in xvi. 13.

XVI. 16-18.

16 Behold I send for¹ many fishers,² saith Jehovah, who shall fish them.³
After that I send for many hunters, who shall hunt them Down from every mountain, and from every hill,
And from out of the clefts of the rocks.
17 For my eyes overlook all their ways; they are not hidden from me,
Nor is their iniquity concealed from mine eyes

18 And I recompense the first time double their iniquity and sin,
 Because they have desecrated my land with the carcasses of their monsters,
 And have filled mine inheritance with their abominations.⁴

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 16.—לִשְׁלַח is used here with the meaning of "to send for, cause to be brought," exactly as in xiv. 3 in the expression שְׁלַח לַפִּי. It is, therefore, quite a mistake to assume an Aramaism here as in xl. 2 (comp. 2 Chron. xvii. 7; Ezr. viii. 16), or, to refer to entirely different passages, as 1 Kings xx. 7. Even Numb. xxii. 40, cannot be compared.

² Ver. 16.—רָגַץ. The word occurs besides only in Isa. xix. 8 and Ezek. xlvii. 10, in the former place in the form רָגַץ, in the second רָגַץ, without any proposed alteration of reading in the Keri. In the present passage the Keri probably proceeds from the endeavor to produce uniformity with צָרַץ.

³ Ver. 16.—רָגַץ. π. λεγ.—FUERST and EWALD (§ 127, a) would explain רָגַץ as an abbreviation of רָגַץ. But why should there not be a root with a weak ' as middle radical? Comp. NAEGELSE, Gr., § 37; OLSH. § 233 d, S. 486.

⁴ Ver. 18.—As כָּלֵא is not construed with בָּ, we must connect with כָּלֵא only הוֹרֵעַ (comp. ii. 7; xlv. 22).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe serves only to describe more fully the facts announced in ver. 13, Therefore I cast you, etc. The deportation is to take place, as it were, according to the rules of art. The enemies are therefore compared to fishermen who fish out a lake, and with hunters who exterminate the wild animals from a hunting-district, even from the most effectual covers (ver. 16). So also the hiding of the Israelites will not avail, for all their ways are so manifest to the Lord that their iniquity lies displayed before His eyes (ver. 17). And so He recompenses to them for the first time double their sin by banishment from the land which they have desecrated by their idolatries. In this it is implied that in case of a second provocation, God's punitive justice will apply a still higher measure than that of double retribution.

Vers. 16-18. Behold . . . abominations.—Many hunters. The reason why the adjective many is used, is that the prophet means to say: then again I send for many, viz., hunters.—Hunters is, therefore, exegetical. That רָגַץ is here used as a numeral (as in Ps. lxxxix. 51; Prov. xxxi. 29; 1 Chron. xxviii. 5; Neh. ix. 28), is less probable. From vers. 17 and 18 it is evident that fisher and hunter were not to bring together the Israelites out of exile, but to drive them out of their own land.—As it follows from בָּ, ver. 17, the figure declares that no concealment will profit them. As fishers and hunters, who proceed according to the rules of their art, know how to drive out the animals from all their hiding-places, so will the enemies do with the Israelites. The former will see through all the plans and measures of the latter and defeat them, for they are revealed to them by God, before whose sight those measures equally with the sins of Israel lie bare and exposed. Comp. xxxiii. 24; xxxii. 19.—רָגַץ, first time. [HENDERSON, following HITZIG, etc., renders "previously."—S. R. A.] The explanation according to which this word is referred to ver. 15 (HITZIG, EWALD, UMBREIT), would be perfectly satisfactory if it did not leave unregarded the evidently intended antithesis to כָּשַׁנָּה double. This requirement can be met satisfactorily without any alteration of the text (as attempted by GRAF, according to Isai. lvi. 7), if we recognize that the prophet assumes the possibility of a second visitation. Then he would say: for this first time double will be recompensed (Isai. lxi. 7; Zech. ix. 12), but in case of repetition a much severer measure will be rendered:—as in reality the second destruction by the Romans was total in comparison with the first merely partial one.—Because, etc. The punishment has an inner relation to the sin: they have desecrated the land and rendered it uninhabitable, they must therefore leave it.

3. Refutation of the objection (xvi. 10) that the people had committed no sin by their idolatry.

XVI. 19-21.

19 O Jehovah, my strength and my fortress,
 And my refuge in the day of distress!
 "To thee will the heathen come from the ends of the earth, and will say:
 Falsehood only have our fathers inherited,
 Vapour, and there is none among them that profiteth.
 20 Should a man make himself gods? And they are not gods!"
 21 Therefore behold I teach them this once,
 And teach them to know my hand and my might,
 And they shall know that my name [is] Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Having in vers. 14-18 given a confirmation and further description of the judgment threatened in ver. 13, the prophet in the two following strophes, xvi. 19-21, and xvii. 1-4 goes back to xvi. 10, where it is said that the people deny having sinned against Jehovah. This denial may have a double meaning. First it may be intended to declare that it is not a sin to serve other gods, together with Jehovah. Secondly, the meaning may be that the fact itself that Israel served other gods is disputed. To this denial in the first sense the prophet replies by directing his glance into the proximate future, in which the heathen will perceive what Israel has failed to perceive, viz., that the gods are vanity, that Jehovah is alone God, and that therefore idolatry is sin (vers. 19, 20). Now since Israel might and should long ago have perceived that which even the heathen will perceive at last, but did not do so, Jehovah will bring this truth to their knowledge by a thoroughly incisive lesson (ver. 21).

Vers. 19 and 20. O Jehovah my strength . . . not gods. Since the prophet addresses the Lord as my strength, etc., and then says that the heathen, after they have perceived the nothingness of the idols, will all come to this Lord, he includes himself, as it were, together with the heathen, among the believers in Jehovah, but excludes Israel from this communion, until instructed by the judgments they recognize their errors, and obtain the same saving knowledge.—My strength. Comp. Ps. xxviii. 7, 8; lix. 17; 2 Sam. xxii. 3.—Heathen [lit., nations.—S. R. A.] Even this word shows that it is not the tribes of Israel that are meant. (MEIER).—Falsehood only. Comp. x. 14; li. 17.—Our fathers inherited. The expression is still stronger than if it had been we inherited. The tradition is false from the very beginning.—Profiteth. Comp. Isai. xlv. 10; Jer. ii. 8, 11.—Should a man. The words of the heathen in which they themselves set forth the vanity of the idols. Manufactured gods are on this very account no gods. The sentence and they are not gods is to be taken in a causal sense. Comp. NAEGELSEN. Gr., § 109, 4.

Ver. 21. Therefore behold . . . my name Jehovah. From the connection the prophet's object cannot be to give instruction concerning the future conversion of the heathen. He only wishes, by the good which he says of the heathen, to set the folly of Israel in a clearer light. We are therefore after the sentences "I come to thee," and "the heathen will come to thee" to supply: but Israel comes not to thee. There is a reference to this thought in therefore. Because Israel has not the knowledge which he might long have had, as well as, or better than the heathen will have it in the future, the Lord will this once impart it to them.—This once (comp. x. 18) like the first time in ver. 18, refers to the impending first catastrophe of the theocracy by the Chaldeans. Israel is to feel the hand of the Lord, and thus learn to understand the significance of His name. The prophet evidently alludes to Exod. iii. 14. We perceive in what sense the understanding of the name is meant, from the words "I will teach them to know (i. e., to experience, to feel) My hand and My might," in comparison with the expression יָדַי, which is used of the idols in ver. 19. By that visitation, namely, will Jehovah manifest Himself as the Really Existent (this point from the connection is evidently here brought into the foreground) in opposition to the non-existent deities, and thus bring Israel to the consciousness that he has certainly sinned in worshipping other gods together with Jehovah. Comp. Isai. iii. 6, coll. Jer. xxiii. 27; Exod. vi. 3.

[“This passage (xvi. 19—xvii. 14) is appointed as the Haphtorah, or Proper Prophetical Lesson, to Lev. xxvi. 3—xxvii. 34, where God declares the vanity of idols, and the blessings of faith, repentance and obedience.” WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

CHAPTER XVII.

4. Refutation of the objection (xvi. 10) that the people had not generally served idols.

XVII. 1-4.

- 1 The sin of Judah is written with an iron stylus,¹ Graven with a diamond point on the tablet of their heart,
On the horns of their altars;
- 2 As their children remember their altars,
And their images of Baal² by³ the green trees, by the high hills.
- 3 My mountain together with⁴ the fields,
Thy substance and all thy treasures will I give up to spoil,
Thy heights!—for thy sin in all thy borders.
- 4 And thou shalt withhold thy hand from the inheritance which I have given thee;
And I cause thee to serve thy enemies in a land that thou knowest not:
For ye have kindled a fire in my nostrils that shall burn forever.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—צַפְרָן. This word, which occurs besides only in Deut. xxi. 12 is the nail, unguis, but since the finger-nail cannot be used for the engraving of ineffaceable writing, the word must mean a sharp, cutting instrument in general, in correspondence with the fundamental meaning of the root (= incidere, insculpere. ⁴ Ver. 3.—בְּ = in the midst, but in the sense of accompaniment, together with. Comp. xi. 19; NÆGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5, a.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The denial of having sinned against Jehovah (xvi. 10) must mean that the fact of idolatry is denied. Against such a bold and shameless assertion the prophet rises here with visibly increasing indignation. He says that the sin of Judah is certified, and as it were, recorded in the archives, viz. (a) in their own conscience, in which the memory of their idolatrous abominations is fixed like an ineffaceable brand, and (b) externally, on the horns of the altars, where the blood of the slaughtered children adheres as an equally ineffaceable memorial (ver. 1). These two testimonies were just as deep and inextinguishable to them, the actors present, as to the children the impression of that horrible cult which had snatched away so many from their midst would remain unforgettable. And so deep was this impression, that the mere sight of green trees and high hills was sufficient to refresh it continually (ver. 2). On the basis of the facts thus certified, the prophet repeats the announcement of the divine punishments, which will consist in plunder of substance, desolation of the land, according to the analogy of the year of release, and deportation into an unknown land (vers. 3 and 4).

Vers. 1 and 2.* The sin of Judah . . high hills. ORIGEN (Hom. XVI. ed. Lommatzsch., S. 301), ISID. HISP. (*De Pass. * The LXX. does not contain verses 1-4. Without doubt Jerome is correct in saying, Jordanis perpererunt populo suo. ORIGEN in the Hexapla gives under asterisks the following translation, which he found in other translators: Ver. 1. ἡμαρτία Ἰουδα γερραται ἐν γραβείοις σιδῆρῶ, ἐν ὄνυχι ἀδαμαντίνῳ, ἐγκεκολλημένη ἐπὶ τῶν στήθεσιν τῆς καρδίας αὐτῶν, καὶ τοῖς κέρασι τῶν θυσιαστηρίων αὐτῶν.

Ver. 2. Ἦνικα ἀναμνησθῶσιν οἱ υἱοὶ αὐτῶν τὰ θυσιαστήρια αὐτῶν καὶ τὰ ἄλογα αὐτῶν ἐπὶ ξύλων βασίος, ἐπὶ βουμῶν μετεωρίων, ὀρέων ἐν ἀγῶρῳ.

Ver. 3. Ἰσχυρὸν σου καὶ πάντα θησανρούς σου εἰς προνομήν ὄψω, τὰ ὑψηλά σου ἐν ἀμαρτία ἐν πᾶσι τοῖς ὀρείοις σου.

Ver. 4. *Καὶ ἀφαιρηθήσεται (ἀλλ. ἀφαιρήθησιν), καὶ ταπεινωθήσεται (ἀλλ. ταπεινωθήσῃ) ἀπὸ τῆς κληρονομίας σου, ἧς ἔδωκά σοι, καὶ ἀναβιβῶσῃ σε ἐν τοῖς ἔχθροῖς σου ἐν τῇ γῇ ἣν οὐκ ἔγνωσ' ὅτι πῦρ ἐπέκτανσάν ἐν τῷ θυμῷ μου, ἕως αἰῶνος κανοθήσεται. Ταῦδε λέγει κύριος. Thus in MONTAUSON, Herod., Tom. II., p. 210.—EUSEBIUS also, Dem. Ep. X. 5 (comp. p. 23), communicates the words, remarking that he found them in τὰς τῶν λαῶν ἐπιμνηστικῶν ἐκδόσεις, ἑπιμνηστικῶν παραδόσεων ἀπὸ μακρῶν ἐν τοῖς ἀρχαίοις τῶν παρὰ τοῖς Ο. ἀντιγράφοις. DESSAUS remarks that in nonnullis codd. greecis et in uno Vaticano leguntur sub asteriscis.*

since everywhere else (Isai. v. 9; vii. 23-25; ix. 17; x. 17; xxvii. 4) it is used in the meaning of "thorn." Comp. HERRZOG, Real-Enc. III., S. 642; WINER, R.-W.-B. I., S. 284.—On the tablet, etc. Passing momentary events make only a superficial impression. But whatever has exercised a long-continued and intensive activity is deeply graven. In opposition to the assertion (ver. 10) that Israel has not sinned against the Lord, the prophet points to the continuance of idolatry among the people, and the deep, inextinguishable traces, which it has left behind. These are double; of an external and internal sort. Internally is the conscience, the remembrance, the whole spiritual habitus, which keeps before Israel the fact of the long practised idolatry. Externally are the idol-altars, with the blood of the children offered upon them, crying towards heaven, which testify of the sin to all the world. It is therefore audacity on the part of the people to pretend that they have forgotten the fact. The expression write on the table of the heart is found also in Prov. iii. 3; vii. 3.—horns of the altars. That the idol-altars are meant is evident 1, from the plural, for there was but a single altar of Jehovah (J. D. MICHAELIS); 2, from the connection, for Israel's sin was to be read only on the idol-altars, not on the altar of the Lord,—or on the latter only in so far as they had perhaps used it for idolatrous worship (comp. 2 Chron. xv. 3; WINER, s. v. Brandopferaltar). The altars in ver. 2 are doubtless also those of the idols, and identical with those mentioned in ver. 1.—On the horns of the altar of burnt offering and the sprinkling of these with the blood of the guilt offering, comp. Exod. xxvii. 2 (coll. Ps. cxviii. 27); xxix. 12; Lev. iv. 18, 25, 30, 34; viii. 15; ix. 9. That the idol-altars also had such horns is clear from Am. iii. 14. Comp. WINER, R.-W.-B. s. v. Hörner.—Their altars, lit., your altars. On the change of person comp. rem. on v. 14; xii. 13.—remember. We may reject at the outset the ungrammatical explanations which either take זָכַר = זָכַר (so that their children remember, LUTHER, ZWINGLE, substantially CALVIN) or understand God as the subject of remember (SEB. SCHMIDT, CLERICUS, CH. B. MICHAELIS). All those interpretations are at least very harsh, which regard the Jews as the subject, (ut recordantur filiorum suorum ita altarium, etc., i. e. their altars are as dear to their hearts as their children, R. SALOMO, D. KIMCHI, ABARBANEL, DIODATUS, MAURER; remembering their children, they remember also the altars on which they offered them, ILITZIC) or which take

ב in the sense of because, if, (JEROME, Chald., Arab., and many later) or which find the apolo-
 1 is in ver. 3 (Ewald, Umbreit). Since in ver.
 1 there is evidently likewise the idea of a monu- mentum, a record assuring a perpetual remembrance, the reciprocal relation of vers. 1 and 2 is indicated at the outset. There is a third memorial of the sin denied by the Israelites, the testimony of which is the more unexceptionable as it proceeds from the mouth of children (Ps.
 viii. 3; Matth. xxi. 16): the remembrance by the children of that horrible worship to which so many from their midst fell a sacrifice. The prophet points to an effect of that horrid ritual, which is not indeed elsewhere expressly testified, but is in itself entirely natural. Why should not Moloch have been the terror of the Israelitish children, when there was such real and sad ground for it, as is wanting in other bugbears which terrify the children of the present day?—
 Their children is therefore the subject of remember, and the construction is as ex. gr., v. 26;
 vi. 7. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 95, 2.—Images,
etc. The אֱסָרִים are the masculine images of Baal
 [not of Astarte, as HENDERSON.—S. R. A.] (comp.
 1 Ki. xiv. 23; 2 Ki. xvii. 10; xxiii. 14, etc.) as אֱסָרוֹת are primarily and in general the images corresponding to the female principle of Baal.
 What was their form is still undecided, also whether they had special relation to the service of Moloch. Should the latter not be the case, yet their relation to the murderous rites of child-sacrifice is beyond a doubt. For children were offered to Baal in all his forms, comp. vii. 31; xix. 5; xxxii.
 35. Hertzog, Real-Enc. I. S. 638; IX., S. 715.—

By the green trees, עֵלֵי עֵץ. Hirtzig and Graf rightly take עֵל here in a causal sense connecting it with remember, not with altars. If the place was to be designated where the altars and images stood, we cannot conceive why the prophet should write “on green trees,” and deviate from the stereotyped form of “under every green tree.” It is accordingly more probable that it is to express that the mere sight of green trees and high hills awoke in the Israelite children the remembrance of those terrible altars and images.

We can certainly show no passage in which עֵל is used, after a verb of remembrance, of that which occasioned the remembrance. But all those passages are analogous in which עֵל designates the occasioning circumstances in general, ex. gr.,

 Comp. עֵלֵי כֶּה, Jer. ix. 11; Job xiii. 14.

Ver. 3. My mountain . . . in all thy borders.
 The words הַרְרֵי בְשָׂרָה are either connected with the preceding context in various ways (JEROME: Sacrificantes in agro; SYR.: in montibus et in deserto; Chald.: Super montes in agro; Arab.: in montibus et in agris; R. SALOMO, ABARBANEL, KIMCHI: O mons mi, qui in agro es, as a designation of Jerusalem, to which the previous context is addressed; ZWANGLI: ut filii recordantur orarum . . . collium, montium et agrorum; EWALD, MEIER: הַרְרֵי בְשָׂרָה as in apposition to גְּבֻעִית), or with the following, when it is either rendered as in the vocative, and Zion, as the high place of the country kal' ἱερόν, or Israel as sacrificing on mountains, or fleeing to mountains (CALVIN), is understood by it, or it is connected with thy heights (LUTHER), or as an accusative with thy substance (mon, m montium una cum agro . . . dabo, GESENIUS, GAAB, ROSENMEYER, UMBREIT).

 Hirtzig calls attention to xviii. 14; xxi. 13, where Zion is designated as צִיּוֹן הַרְרֵי and הַרְרֵי צִיּוֹן.
 But here the connection is quite different. In this place the prophet would evidently say that all property, movable and immovable, divine and human, dedicated to the service of God and the service of idols will be given up to plunder on account of their intensive (vers. 1, 2), as extensive and universally diffused sin (in all thy borders). For this reason also I do not believe that mountain is to be rendered as in the vocative. It is rather accusative, dependent on I will give, and the explanation already mentioned as that of GESENIUS, GAAB, ROSENMEYER and UMBREIT, is the correct one. The mountain of the Lord also is desecrated; it therefore, in so far as it contains property that can be so treated, will also, like the fruitful field, be given up to plunder. The prophet says fields, because he wishes to designate only the land, which produces substance and treasures, or things that may be plundered. Thy substance and all, etc., is a more particular explanation of my mountain. It tells us how a mountain and fields can be plundered. Thy substance, thy treasures have primary reference to fields. But that also which the mountain contained belonged in a certain respect to the people, and they were likewise despoiled of it. On the subject comp.
 xxvii. 16; xxviii. 3; li. 17 sqq.—Thy heights is in antithesis to my mountain. Even the sanctuaries dedicated to the idols were to be objects of spoliation. It is clear that thy heights is governed by give, but its abrupt position is strange. If we could connect exclusively with for thy sin, this difficulty would be removed.
 But not only the high places, but all that has been previously mentioned is given up on account of their sin. SYRS and the Arabic (MS. Oxon), omit thy heights altogether. Hirtzig translates “for atonement,” comparing Zech. xiv. 17; Deut.
 xxix. 11, and with respect to the construction, Deut.
 xxi. 29. But the expression in all thy borders would then be quite feeble and superfluous.
 GRAF after GESENIUS, DE WETTE and others:—
Thy heights with the sin cleaving thereto I give up. But was it necessary to guard against the thought that the Lord would give up the heights without the sin, or that He would omit the latter?
 How is such a separation of the heights and the sin even conceivable? Thy heights may then be regarded as an emphatic asyndeton—For thy sin. Comp. Mic. i. 5; 2 Kings xxiv. 3.—In all thy borders. This addition corresponds exactly to the previously stated extent of the punishment: Since the sin has been universally diffused, so all the possessions in the whole land will be made the means of punishment.

Ver. 4. And thou shalt . . . forever. In this verse בְּךָ causes the only difficulty. It has been either entirely passed over (SYRS, Arab., LUTHER), or explained in a more or less forced manner, as unfreely (Vatable), by thy iniquity, naked and bare, alone (so Jerome, on the ground of which Ewald would alter to לְכַרְךָ). But it is evident that Jeremiah had in view Deut. xv. 2, 3. This has been recognized by many expositors. Some (ex. gr., see Schmidt, Rosenm.) supply, therefore, יָרִיר from Deut. xv. 2. J. D. Michaelis was the first to suppose that יָרִיר alone should be read. Graf expresses this distinctly, and without doubt correctly. For on the one hand יָרִיר, however interpreted, yields no satisfactory meaning. On the other hand the expression וְשָׁמַט יָד כִּן, withhold thy hand, etc., corresponds perfectly to the connection. The year of release (comp. Deut. xv. 1-13), so called from the שְׁכִיטָה, the release of the debtor from the oppressive hand of the creditor, coincides with the Sabbath year (comp. Exod. xxiii. 10, 11; Levit. xxv. 1-7), in which the land is to remain uncultivated (comp. Saalschuetz, Mos. Recht., S. 162 ff.; Herzog, R-Enc. XIII., S. 204 ff.). The state of desolation, in which the land will be in consequence of the destined exile of the people is in Lev. xxvi. 24, 25 expressly compared with that Sabbath year, or year of release, and is called the Sabbath-time of the land (שְׁבֻתַת־יָרִיר). In 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21 (comp. 3 Esdr. i. 58) it is expressly set forth that the Babylonian captivity was the fulfilment of the divine word proclaimed by Jeremiah, according to which the land was promised its holiday (שְׁבֻתוֹת). But in no other place than this does Jeremiah intimate this thought. If now it is undoubted that this passage, with reference to Deut. xv. 2 coll. Lev. xxvi. 34, 35, designates the exile as a period of release for the land, we cannot avoid perceiving in יָרִיר an altered form of the יָרִיר of Deuteronomy. On I cause thee to serve, vide supra, on xv. 14.—For ye have kindled, etc. The words are a free quotation from Deut. xxxii. 22, while those in xv. 14, at least in their first part, agree verbatim with the original passage.

CONCLUSION (xvii. 5-18).

1. Retrospective glance at the deep roots of the corruption.

XVII. 5-13.

- 5 Thus saith Jehovah: Cursed the man, who trusts in men,
And makes flesh his arm, and whose heart departs from Jehovah.
- 6 He will be like one forsaken¹ in the desert
And will not see when good comes,
And will dwell in the arid places in the wilderness,
In a land salt and uninhabited.
- 7 Blessed the man who trusts in Jehovah,
And whose confidence Jehovah is!
- 8 He is like a tree planted by water,
And which stretches forth² its roots to³ the river,
And will not fear⁴ when the heat comes, and its leaf is green,
And in the year of drought it will not have care nor cease from fruit-bearing.
- 9 The heart is more deceitful than anything
And profoundly corrupt. Who can know it?
- 10 I, Jehovah, search the heart, try the reins,
Even⁵ to give every one according to his way,
According to the fruit of his doings.
- 11 A partridge, which fosters without having laid,
Is he who accumulates riches not by right.
In the half of his days he will leave them,
And at his end he will be a fool.
- 12 O throne of glory, height⁶ of beginning, place of our sanctuary!
- 13 Hope of Israel, Jehovah!
All who forsake thee are put to shame!
Those who depart⁷ from me must be written in the earth,
Because they have forsaken the fountain of living water, Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 6.—כִּיעָרֵךְ. The ancient translations all express here, doubtless on the ground of the antithesis in ver. 8, the name of a tree or shrub, while in Ps. cii. where alone the word occurs a second time, they all, in accordance with the context, express the idea of miser. Since now עָרֵךְ is formed after the analogy of גִּלְגָּל, רָרָר, זָלוּל, כִּכְבֵּב, (כִּיכֵב), etc. (comp. OLSH. § 189, a; NAEGLSEN. Gr., § 42, a, S. 87), since, further, the corresponding verbal root is given by II. 53 (עָרַעַר הַתְּעָרַעַר) unquestionably with the meaning denudare (comp. Isai. xxiii. 13; xxxii. 11; Hab. iii. 9. כִּיעוֹר nuditas, עָרֵם nudus, עָרֵי nudus, solitarius; Gen. xv. 2; Lev. xx. 20, 21; Jer. xxii. 30), the meaning of “naked, destitute, wretched,” is assured also in this passage. [HENDERSON: “I acquiesce in the opinion of Dr. ROBINSON, that it is the same as the Arab.

عرعر, Arar, the juniper-tree which is found in the vicinity of the Arabah, or the Great Valley, to the south of the Dead Sea. See Bibl. Res. II., 506. Thus DE WETTE: Wacholderbaum. The same form of the word occurs Ps. cil. 18, where the idea conveyed is that of naked, destitute. The point of comparison in the two passages of our prophet is the forlorn appearance of a solitary juniper, deprived of all nourishment in the arid desert.”—HITZIG referring to the composition of Ps. cil., after the flight of Jonathan into the desert of Tekoa, and the connection with Jer. xlviii. 6, where also flight is spoken of, decides that the word designates one who has fled or been driven into the desert, or one who has come into misfortune as starved or perishing.—S. R. A.]. On the words in xlviii. 6, עָרַעַר פִּכְדָּכֶם, comp. roms. there.

2 Ver. 8.—יֹבֵל. ἄπ. λεγ., synonymous with יָבֵל, Isai. xxx. 25; xlv. 4.

3 Ver. 8.—עָלָה עֵלָה as frequently in Jer. Comp. on x. 1.

4 Ver. 8.—וְלֹא יָרָא. The Keri reads יָרָאָה after ver. 6. The Chetibh should be punctuated יָרָא (Imperf. from יָרָא), corresponding to יָרָאָה, and is at any rate to be preferred; as also the ancient translations express it, with the exception of the Chaldee.

5 Ver. 10.—וְלֹתֶת. Comp. xxxii. 19. The Vau, which the ancient translations and many Codd. omit, is not so superfluous as GRAF supposes.

6 Ver. 12.—כְּרוֹם might grammatically be in the accusative, but as כָּכֹר appears to be contrasted with פְּשֶׁתָּה (iii. 21; xi. 13), so does כְּרוֹם with בְּמֹת כְּרוֹם.

7 Ver. 13.—יָכוֹר. The Chetibh יָכוֹרֵי would be formed like יָקוּם, יָהוּר; (OLSH. § 212). The form יָכוֹר as a noun, does not, however, occur elsewhere, and the sudden change of person is strange. The Keri reads יָכוֹרֵי. The meaning is the same (= those departing from me. Comp. קָבְצֵי, li. 1); the form is likewise a rare one. (Yet comp. ii. 21; Isa. xlix. 21; OLSH. § 172, b.) MEIER reads יָכוֹרֵי.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This long discourse ends with a concluding address in two parts, the first of which relates to general, the second to personal matters. In the first (vers. 5-13) the prophet indicates the most inward and hidden roots of the spiritual and physical corruption of his people. He mentions three chief moral defects, attaching to each the corresponding punishment. At the head he places the perverse disposition, which regards not the Lord, but flesh as the source and treasure of all blessing (ver. 5). The punishment of this sin is mentioned in ver. 6, the shadow being further deepened in vers. 7 and 8 by the contrast there presented. The second radical defect, designated in ver. 9, is the perfidiousness of the heart in connection with its weakness. In consequence of this habitus, the human heart is unfathomable to human sight, yet the Lord is in a position to look through and to judge it (ver. 10). Avarice is designated as the third destructive root to which every means is right, to which, however, poverty and shame must follow as a just recompense (ver. 11).—The last two verses express once more in a comprehensive manner, and after a solemn invocation of Jehovah, the judgment of destruction on all those who have forsaken Jehovah, the fountain of living water (vers. 12, 13).

Vers. 5 and 6. Thus saith Jehovah . . . salt and uninhabited. The prophet had in the previous context repeatedly designated the Lord as his and Israel's only safety: xiv. 8, 22; xv. 20, 21; xvi. 19. He, however, expressly intimated in xvi. 19, that the Israel of those times was wanting in confidence in this Saviour. Here he renders this sin of unbelief strongly prominent, portraying it according to its positive and its negative side. He mentions the positive side first. Man and flesh designate the totality of all earthly visible forces in antithesis to the spiritual power of the invisible God. It is precisely their visibility which withdraws the carnal mind from the invisible things to be apprehended by faith alone. The mind is first taken captive by things visible. Then having gained a firm footing in these, it breaks loose from the Invisible. It was so in the Fall. This confidence in things visible, however, is idolatry (comp. LUTHER's explanation of the first commandment). Hence the curse may well be an allusion to Deut. xxvii. 15 coll. xi. 28.—Man and flesh. (אָדָם וְבָשָׂר) synonymous also in Isa. xxxi. 3 coll. Job x. 4; Ps. lvi. 5. [“The Hebrew language, having three distinct words for man, has the advantage of our English in the finer shades of a passage like this, ‘cursed is the man (strong man) who trusteth in man (frail man of the earth) who maketh flesh (mere weakness) his arm.’” COWLES.—S. R. A.]—His arm, יָרְיָו, the organ for the exhibition of physical force. He who delivers over this function to another, i. e. makes him his arm, has him for his assistant, for protection and deliverance. Comp. Isa. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxxxiii. 9.—A land salt, etc. Comp. Job xxxix. 6; Ps. cvii. 34.—Will dwell. הָשָׁב intransitive, as in ver. 25; xxx. 18; l. 13, 39; Isa. xlii. 20.

Vers. 7, 8. Blessed the man . . . fruit-bearing. We might suppose that these verses were so co-ordinate with the two preceding that the two pairs would constitute an independent, self-contained whole. But then the following verses would be entirely disconnected. I therefore think that verses 7 and 8 are to serve as a foil to the thought expressed in vers. 5, 6, which is shown to be the main thought by its position.—As a tree. Comp. Ps. i. 3.—Drought. Comp. xiv. 1.

Vers. 9 and 10. The heart is more deceitful . . . his doings. Were the hearts of men, and especially of the Israelites, upright and directed to the true and the good, they must agree in word and deed with that which the prophet has declared in vers. 5-8. But there is nothing in the world so deceitful as the human heart, which understands the art thoroughly of pursuing the evil under the appearance of wishing the right (comp. ch. v. and ix. 2-8). This deceitfulness is however only a symptom of the deep depravity, the incurable sickness by which the heart is possessed.—Deceitful, עָרֵב. Comp. on ix. 3. The word occurs here only as an adjective with this meaning.—Corrupt, אָשָׁם. The meaning "desperate" is not contained in the word. It is everywhere = severely sick, incurable (xv. 18; xxx. 12, 15; Isa. xvii. 11; Mic. i. 9; Job xxxiv. 6), full of the deepest pain (ver. 16). No man is in a condition to see through the deceitful hypocrisy of the human heart, but the Lord can do it, and finds on this His knowledge, His strict and righteous judgment. Comp. xi. 20; xii. 3; xx. 12.—Even to give. Separating the statement of the object from the fundamental declaration, the word even sets forth the independence of the latter. God is not omniscient merely for the purpose of judging, but in His essential nature. Comp. besides comm. on vi. 2.

Ver. 11. A partridge . . . be a fool. As the third root of spiritual and bodily corruption the prophet names avarice, which is the root of all evil (1 Tim. vi. 10). The selfish inquire not about the right (comp. v. 1, 26 sqq.; vi. 6, 7; xiii. 8, 10), therefore the blessing of God is also denied them. Lightly come lightly go. Forsaken and put to shame the unrighteous man is at last like the bird, of which it is said that it collects the young of others and fosters them, but is forsaken by them as soon as they perceive that a stranger has usurped a mother's rights over them. The form of comparison is like that in Prov. x. 20; xi. 22; xvi. 24, etc. It is doubtful what bird is to be understood by קָרָא. The word is found besides only in 1 Sam. xvi. 20. The ancient translators and most of the Comm. understand the partridge, and the dialects also favor this rendering. Only natural history does not confirm this peculiarity of the partridge. Comp. WINER s. v. Rebhuhn. ["The ancients believed that she stole the eggs of other birds and hatched them as her own. See EPIPHAN. Physiol. cap. ix.; ISID. Orig. xii. 7." HENDERSON.—S. R. A.].—Fosters. נָרַךְ occurs besides only in Isa. xxxiv. 15. It is there expressly distinguished from בָּקַעַ, to hatch, and can mean only the gathering together and cherishing by warmth of the newly hatched young. WINER quotes inter al. a passage from OLYMPIODORUS: ὁ πέρδις * * * τοὺς ἀλλοτρίους προσκαλεῖται νεοττοὺς οἰταγες γρόντες ὑστερον, ὅτι οὐκ εἶδεν αὐτοῦ, καταλιμπάνουσαν αὐτόν. This agrees admirably with the sense and connection of the passage, though it must still remain undecided whether we have here a real popular opinion existing at the time of Jeremiah, or only one deduced from this passage.—Shall leave them refers to the riches. On ful comp. x. 8, 14.

Vers. 12 and 13. O throne of glory . . . Jehovah. Comprehensive conclusion in the form of a brief but solemn invocation of Jehovah. From Hope of Israel it is evident that the words of the prophet were addressed in the last instance to the person of the Lord. But he mentions first the exteriora, which are the places and bearers of His glory: his throne, the place where His throne stands, the sanctuary which surrounds it, for he wishes to set forth distinctly how foolish and criminal it is to do that, which he has censured in vers. 5, 9, 11 and which he afterwards comprises in one word, "forsake the Lord." Israel has given up the truly real and eternal sanctuaries for the miserable high-places of idolatry. I do not therefore hold the view that ver. 12 is addressed to Jehovah Himself, for the reason given by GRAF, that the Lord cannot possibly be called place of sanctuary.—O throne of glory. Comp. 1 Sam. ii. 8; Isa. xxii. 23; Jer. xiv. 21. The Lord's throne appears in the Old Test. in three degrees. First, Jerusalem is thus named (iii. 17), second, the ark of the covenant (Exod. xxv. 22; Ps. lxxx. 2; xoix. 1), third, the proper, so to speak, and transcendent throne (Isa. vi. 1; Ezek. i. 26; Dan. vii. 9; Ps. ix. 5; xi. 3; xlvi. 9; cx. 1). These three degrees are however so connected, that he who forsakes one does the same to the other. The prophet has primarily in view here, as at any rate in xiv. 21, the visible throne of the Lord.—Height of beginning. The idea expressed by קָרוֹם has also several gradations.

1. Mt. Zion is called קָרוֹם יְרוּשָׁלַיִם, Ezek. xvii. 23; xx. 40 coll. xxxiv. 14; Jer. xxxi. 12. 2. It is very often used to designate the transcendent abode of Jehovah, Isa. xxxiii. 5; lvii. 15; Mic. vi. 6; Jer. xxv. 30; Ps. xciii. 4; lxviii. 19, etc. The expression כְּרֵאשֵׁן, which occurs here only (comp. כְּרֵאשֵׁן, Prov. viii. 23) agrees with קָרוֹם in both senses. For that transcendent abode is from the beginning, eternally existing (comp. Ps. xciii. 2), and Zion also as chosen from eternity is in idea the eternal dwelling-place of God. (Comp. Ps. cxxxii. 13, 14 coll. Exod. xv. 17; xx. 24; Deut. v. 12).—Place of our sanctuary. Comp. Isa. lx. 13; Dan. viii. 11. Even the sanctuary of Israel (בְּקִדְשׁ) is a double one, an earthly and a heavenly. The former is made according to the type of the latter (Exod. xxv. 8, 9, 40; xxvi. 30). Thus though the expression refers primarily to the earthly sanctuary the heavenly is not excluded. There is no objection to the impersonal rendering of these three substantives in the prophet's addressing words of prayer to them. For what the prophet declares with respect to them: "All who forsake thee are put to shame," would be quite unprejudicial even if "Hope of Israel," etc., did not come between. But the three former are entirely sunk in this last conception, since it is only in and by Jehovah that they have any existence or meaning. Hence also the singular suffix in רָבִיבָה. The older commentators render throne of glory as nominative, either taking the first and the last three words together (solum glorie excelsum, ab initio locus sanctuarii nostri, CALVIN), or regarding throne (thronus, qui est altitudo ab æterno, est locus sanctuarii, SEB. SCHMIDT), or height (a throne in glory is the height of beginning, the place of our sanctuary, NEUMANN) as the nominative. According to these renderings however it is scarcely possible to find a suitable connection.—Hope of Israel. Comp. xiv. 8; l. 7.—Written in the earth. In the earth (in the dust, Job xiv. 8), where what is written will be speedily effaced, shall those who depart from me be written. The antithesis on the one hand would be to xvii. 1 (the sin in brass, the sinners in dust), on the other hand to the book of life (Exod. xxxii. 32; Ps. lxxix. 29; Dan. xii. 1; Mal. iii. 16; Luke x. 20; Phil. iv. 3; Rev. iii. 5; xiii. 8; xvii. 8; xxi. 27). MEIER reads: they vanished away in the land (Job xv. 30), all who are recorded in it (xvii. 1; xxii. 30) that they have forsaken the fountain, etc. This exegesis also is exposed to several objections: 1. that כִּי must be taken in the sense of vanish away; 2. the imperf. יִבְרָכָה!. I therefore prefer to adhere to the reading of the Chethibh. The rapid change of person forms no objection to this. Comp. on v. 14; ix. 7; xii. 13; xvii. 1. The Lord then continues in confirmation of the prophet's address.—Fountain, etc. Comp. ii. 13; Ps. xxxvi. 10.

2. Petition of the prophet for the safety of his person and the honor of his official ministrations.

XVII. 14-18.

- 14 Heal me, Jehovah, that I may be healed;
 Deliver me that I may be delivered, for thou art my praise!
 15 Behold, they say to me: Where is the word of Jehovah? Let it come now.
 16 But I have not hastened away from being a pastor after thee;
 And the calamitous day I have not desired, thou knowest.
 That which went forth from my lips was from thee.
 17 Be not¹ a terror to me, my refuge in the day of distress!
 18 My persecutors must be put to shame,
 But I must not be put to shame;
 They must be dismayed, but I must not be dismayed!
 Bring² upon them the day of calamity.
 And doubly³ with destruction destroy them!

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The second, personal half of the conclusion. The prophet prays for safety and deliverance for himself (ver. 14). In opposition to the scornful doubt in the fulfilment of his predictions, expressed in ver. 15, he prays on the ground of the fact that he had not hastened into the prophetic office, or declared his own inventions (ver. 16), that the Lord, his refuge, would not be a terror to him or suffer him to be put to shame, but his persecutors, and bring upon them the day of calamity and double destruction (vers. 17, 18).

It is used ironically also in Ps. xlii. 4, 11; lxxix. 10; 2 Kings xviii. 34, etc.—On Let it come now, comp. xxviii. 8, 9; Deut. xviii. 21, 22 coll. xiii. 2.—But I have not, etc. The prophet would deserve such scorn, if he had taken the word of the Lord into his mouth in his own strength, or deceitfully, as others did, xiv. 14, 15.—But he is not a pseudo-prophet, but a prophet against his will. Comp. i. 6 sqq.; xx. 7.—The words I have not hastened (לֹא אָצַח כִּי) have been variously explained. But all the commentators (when they do not alter the reading, as the Syr., which reads רָעָה (רָעָה) concur in understanding רָעָה of the spiritual pastorate. The thought that he had not hastened from the pastoral office or spiritual pasture after Jehovah does not however suit the connection. For he can wish only to defend himself against the imputation of having hurried. It is very remarkable that not a single comm. has yet thought of taking רָעָה in a physical sense; doubtless because the knowledge of Jeremiah's priestly descent has seemed to preclude the thought of his having been a shepherd. But why may not Jeremiah, who was called as a נָבִיא to the prophetic office, have previously tended his father's sheep? The shepherd's state was rendered sacred to the Israelites by the example of their fathers, and kings as well as prophets had proceeded from it (comp. Am. i. 1; vii. 14 coll. Exod. iii. 1). Moreover the פָּרָשׁ [pasture, common], which was possessed by every priestly and levitical city (comp. Josh. xxi. and 1 Chron. vi.), was according to Num. xxxv. 4 expressly intended "for the cattle." Anathoth also had its כְּנָרֵשׁ (Josh. xxi. 18). Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc. VI. S. 150. How well now it suits the connection if Jer. says: They scorn me as a prophet and yet I did not hurry away from being a shepherd (רָעָה—רָעָה—כְּבָרִיתָהּ). Going after Jehovah is in antithesis to going after the flock (comp. 1 Chr. xvii. 7). [HITZIG: "I have not hastened away not to keep after thee. In אֵין is the idea of wilfulness, following one's own impulse in any direction. 'I did not struggle away so that I should not be pasturing,' etc. אֲהַרִּיךְ does not suit the usual rendering of רָעָה as the trade of the shepherd, but leads to this, that Jahve is the shepherd, leader, and Jeremiah the lamb, Ps. xxiii. 1. Willingly following him (comp. 1 Sam. vii. 2; Numb. xiv. 24) he allowed himself to be fed by Jahve (comp. Prov. x. 21) with words of truth and with revelation, xv. 16." HENDERSON appears to follow HITZIG in this rendering.—WORDSWORTH: "Rather, I have not hastened backward from being a shepherd (a prophet) after thee. When I was called by Thee, I did not withdraw myself hastily from Thy service (see Gen. 23), but I obeyed Thy call without delay: and I did not desire the woful day."—S. R. A.]

And the calamitous day. Comp. rem. on ver. 9. From the connection the prophet can mean only the day of his entrance into the prophetic office. (Comp. xx. 7 sqq.; xv. 10, 11). For he needed not to give the assurance that he did not desire the day of calamity for the whole people. He might indeed have been reproached with loving to prophesy evil, but there is nothing of this in the text.—Thou knowest. Comp. xv. 15.—That which went forth, etc. That which has gone forth from his lips, since he has been a prophet, God knows and approves, he has nothing then to fear from the criticism of men. 2. "In earnest and hearty prayer there is a conflict between the spirit and the flesh. The flesh regards the greatness of the sins, and conceives of God as a severe Judge and morose being, who either will not help further or cannot. 6. On xiv. 11, 12. ["We further gather from this passage that fasting is not in itself a religious duty or exercise, but that it refers to another end. Except then they who fast have a regard to what is thereby intended—that there may be a greater alacrity in prayer—that it may be an evidence of humility in confessing their sins,—and that they may also strive to subdue all their lusts;—except these things be regarded, fasting becomes a frivolous exercise, nay, a profanation of God's worship, it being only superstitious. We hence see that fastings are not only without benefit except when prayers are added, and those objects which I have stated are regarded, but that they provoke the wrath of God as all superstitions do, for His worship is polluted." CALVIN.—S. R. A.] "Unbelief is a mortal sin, so that by it the good is turned into evil. For fasting or praying is good; but when the man who does it has no faith it becomes sin (Ps. cix. 7)." 7. On xiv. 14. "He who would be a preacher must have a regular appointment. In like form for all parts of divine worship we must have God's word and command for our support. If we have it not all is lost." CRAMER.

8. On xiv. 14 (I have not sent them). "This does not come at all into the account now-a-days; and I do not know, whether to such a preacher, let him have obtained his office as he may, in preaching, absolution, marrying and exorcising, or on any other occasion, when he appeals to his calling before the congregation or against the devil, the thought once occurs, whether he is truly sent by God. Thus the example of the sons of Sceva (Acts xix. 14, 16) is no longer considered, and it appears that the devil is not yet disposed by such frightful occurrences to interrupt the atheistical carelessness of the teachers." ZINZENDORF.

9. On xiv. 15. "The example of Pashur and others shortly afterwards confirms this discourse. This is an important point. One should however, with that modesty and prudence, which Dr. WIESMANN (Prof. of Theol. in Tübingen), who seems called of God to be a writer of church history, in his Introd. in Memorabilia historie sacre N. T. (1731 and 1745) which I could wish were in the hands of all teachers, repeatedly recommends, have regard to this also, when so-called judgments on the wicked are spoken of, that when the Lord in His wisdom and omnipotence exercises justice on such transgressors by temporal judgments, these are often a blessing to them and the yet remaining means of their salvation. It is related that a certain clergyman in a Saxon village, about the year 1730, felt such a judgment upon himself and his careless ministry, and after happy and humble preparation on a usual day of fasting and prayer, presented himself before his church as an example, and exercised on himself what is called church discipline, whereupon he is said to have fallen down dead with the words,

"My sin is deep and very great,
And fills my heart with grief.
O for thy agony and death,
Grant me, I pray, relief."

He is no doubt more blessed, and his remembrance more honorable, than thousands of others, who are praised by their colleagues in funeral discourses as faithful pastors, and at the same time, or already before, are condemned in the first but invisible judgment as dumb dogs, wolves or hirelings." ZINZENDORF.

10. On xiv. 16. "Although preachers lead their hearers astray, yet the hearers are not thus excused. But when they allow themselves to be led astray, the blind and those who guide them fall together into the ditch (Luke vi. 39)." CRAMER. ["When sinners are overwhelmed with trouble, they must in it see their own wickedness poured upon them. This refers to the wickedness both of the false prophets and the people; the blind lead the blind, and both fall together into the ditch, where they will be miserable comforters one to another." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

11. On xiv. 19. Chrysostom refers to Rom. xi. 1 sqq., where the answer to the prophet's question is to be found.

12. On xiv. 21. "Satan has his seat here and there (Rev. ii. 13). I should like to know why the Saviour may not also have His cathedral. Assuredly He has, and where one stands He knows how to maintain it, and to preserve the honor of the academy." ZINZENDORF.

["Good men lay the credit of religion, and its profession in the world, nearer their hearts than any private interest or concern of their own; and those are powerful pleas in prayer which are fetched from thence, and great supports to faith. We may be sure that God will not disgrace the throne of His glory, on earth; nor will He eclipse the glory of His throne by one providence, without soon making it shine forth, and more brightly than before, by another. God will be no loser in His honor in the long run." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

13. On xiv. 22. "Testimony to the omnipotence of God, for His are both counsel and deed (Prov. viii. 14). Use it for consolation in every distress and for the true apodictica [demonstration] of all articles of Christian faith, however impossible they may appear." CRAMER.—["The sovereignty of God should engage, and His all-sufficiency encourage, our attendance on Him, and our expectations from Him, at all times." HENRY.—"Hence may be learned a useful doctrine—that there is no reason why punishments, which are signs of God's wrath, should discourage us so as to prevent us from venturing to seek pardon from Him; but on the contrary a form of prayer is here prescribed for us; for if we are convinced that we have been chastised by God's hand, we are on this very account encouraged to hope for salvation; for it belongs to Him who wounds to heal, and to Him who kills to restore to life." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

14. On xv. 1. On the part of the Catholics it is maintained that "hoc loco refellitur hæreticorum error . . . orationes defunctorum sanctorum nihil prodesset vivis. Contrarium enim potius ex hisce arguendum suggeritur, nempe istiusmodi sanctorum mortuorum orationes et fieri coram Deo solere pro viventibus, et quando viventes ipsi non posuerint ex semet ipsis, illas esse iis maxime proficuas." GUISE. Tom. II. p. 296). To this it is replied on the part of the Protestants. 1. Enuntiatio isthæc plane est hypothetica. 2. Eo tantum spectat, ut si Moses et Samuel in vivis adhuc essent, adeoque in his terris pro populo preces interponeret suas, perinde ut ille, Ex. xxxii. hic vero 1 Sam. vii. (FÜRSTER, S. 86)." He also adds two testimonies of the fathers against the invocation of saints. One from AUGUSTINE, who (contra Maximin., L. 1), calls such invocation sacrilegium, the other from EPIPHANIUS who (Haeres 2) names it an error seductorum, and adds "non sanctos colimus, sed sanctorum dominum."—That the intercession of the living for each other is effective, CRAMER testifies, saying "Intercession is powerful, and is not without fruit, when he who prays and he for whom he prays are of like spirit." Comp. Rom. xv. 30; 2 Cor. i. 11; Eph. vi. 18, 19; 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2; 1 John v. 16. [To the same effect also CALVIN and HENRY.—S. R. A.]

15. On xv. 4 b. "Silicet in vulgus manant exempla regentum, utque ducum lituos, sic mores castra sequuntur."—"Non sic inflectere sensus humanos edicta valent ut vita regentum."—"Qualis rex talis grex." FÜRSTER.

16. "God keeps an exact protocol [register] of sins, and visits them to the third and fourth generation." CRAMER. ["See what uncertain comforts children are; and let us therefore rejoice in them as though we rejoiced not." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

17. On xv. 5. "When God abandons us we are abandoned also by the holy angels, and all creatures. For as at court when two eyes are turned away the whole court turns away; so when the Lord turns away all His hosts turn away also." CRAMER.

18. On xv. 7. "God as a faithful husbandman has all kinds of instruments for cleaning His grain. He has two kinds of besoms and two kinds of winnowing-fan. With one He cleanses, winnows the grain and sweeps the floor, so that the chaff may be separated from the good wheat. This is done by the Fatherly cross. But if this does not avail He takes in hand the besom of destruction." CRAMER.

19. On xv. 10. "The witnesses of Jesus have the name among others of being hard and rough people, from whom they cannot escape without quarreling. It is not only a reproach which Ahab and such like make to Elijah, 'Art thou he that troubleth Israel?' (1 Ki. xix. 17). But even true-hearted people like Obadiah do not thoroughly trust to them; every one has the thought, if they would only behave more gently it would be just as well and make less noise. Meanwhile the poor Elijah is sitting there, knowing not what to do; a Jeremiah laments the day of his birth . . . why am I then such a monster? Why such an apple of discord? What manner have I? How do I speak? 'For when I speak, they are for war' (Ps. cxx. 7). He does not at once remember that they called the master Beelzebub, and persecuted all the prophets before him; that his greatest sin is that he cares for the interests of Jesus in opposition to Satan." ZINZENDORF. ["Even those who are most quiet and peaceable, if they serve God faithfully, are often made men of strife. We can but follow peace; we have the making only of one side of the bargain, and therefore can but, as much as in us lies, live peaceably." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

20. On xv. 10 b. (I have neither lent nor borrowed at usury). "My dear Jeremiah! Thou mightest have done that; that is according to the custom of the country, there would be no such noise about that. There is no instance of a preacher being persecuted because he cared for his household. But to take payment in such natural products as human souls, that is ground of distrust, that is going too far, that thou carriest too high, and thou must be more remiss therein, otherwise all will rise up against thee; thou wilt be suspended, removed, imprisoned or in some way made an end of, for that is pure disorder and innovation, that smacks of spiritual revolutionary movements." ZINZENDORF.

21. On xv. 15 a. (Thou knowest that for thy sake I have suffered reproach). "This is the only thing that a servant of the Lamb of God should care for, that he does indeed suffer not the least in that he has disguised and disfigured the doctrine of God and his Saviour. . . . It might be wished that no servant of the Lord, especially in small cities and villages, would now and then make a quarrel to relieve the tedium, which will occupy the half of his life, and of which it may be said in the end: vinco vel vincor, semper ego maeculor." ZINZENDORF.

22. On xv. 16. "The sovereign sign of a little flock depending on Christ is such a hearty, spiritual tender disposition towards the Holy Scriptures, that they find no greater pleasure than in their simple but heart-searching truths. I, poor child, if I but look into the Bible, am happy for several hours after. I know not what misery I could not alleviate at once with a little Scripture." ZINZENDORF. [On ver. 17. "It is the folly and infirmity of some good people that they lose much of the pleasantness of their religion by the fretfulness and uneasiness of their natural temper, which they humor and indulge instead of mortifying it." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

23. On xv. 19, a. (And thou shalt stand before me: [LUTHER: thou shalt remain my preacher]) "Hear ye this, ye servants of the Lord! Ye may be suspended, removed, lose your income and your office, suffer loss of house and home, but ye will again be preachers. This is the word of promise. * * * And if one is dismissed from twelve places, and again gets a new place, he is a preacher to thirteen congregations. For in all the preceding his innocence, his cross, his faith preach more powerfully than if he himself were there." ZINZENDORF.

Note.—On this it may be remarked that in order to be the mouth of the Lord it is not necessary to have a church.

24. On xv. 19 b. (Before thou return to them) "We can get no better comfort than this, that our faithful Lord Himself assures us against ourselves. I will make thee so steady, so discreet, so well-founded, so immovable, that, hard as the human heart is, and dead and opposed, yet it will be rather possible that they all yield to thee, than that thou shouldst be feeble or slack and go over to them." ZINZENDORF.

25. On xv. 20. "A preacher must be like a bone, outwardly hard, inwardly full of marrow." FÜRSTER. ["Ministers must take those whom they see to be precious into their bosoms, and not sit alone, as Jeremiah did, but keep up conversation with those they do good to, and get good by." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

26. On xvi. 2. "It is well-known that in no condition is celibacy attended by so many evils as in that of the clergy and that this condition entails in a certain measure a present necessity of marrying. For if any one needs a helpmeet to be by his side, it is the man who must be sacrificed to so many different men of all classes. But all this must be arranged according to circumstances. Ye preachers! Is it made out that ye marry only for Jesus? . . . that you have the church alone as your object? and that you subject yourselves to all the hardships of this condition with its tribulations only for the profit of many? First, then, examine maturely in your offices, whether there is no word of the Lord, whether circumstances do not show, whether there is not an exception from the rule in your case, that you are to take no wife; whether Paul does not call to you in spirit, 'I would that thou wert as I.' May it not sometimes be said? 'Take no wife at this time or at this place!' or 'Take not another!' How does the matter look on closer examination? The rather, as it is known to the servants of Christ to be no hyperbolic speech, when it is said, 'The minister has slain his thousands, but the minister's wife her ten thousands.' He that loves anything more than Christ is not worthy of Him. If it cannot be cured endure it. But see to it the more, that those who have wives be as those who have them not (1 Cor. vii. 29). Lead your wife in prayer diligently and plainly, as Moses with Zipporah (Exod. iv. 25, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me). If they would not have you dead they must leave you your Lord. I know not when anything was so pleasing to me as when I saw a certain minister's wife weeping sorely from apprehension that her husband would not endure a certain trial. She saw clearly that he would retain his charge, but she feared the Saviour would make it hard to him." ZINZENDORF.

27. On xvi. 2. "Ridiculi sunt Papicolar, qui ex hoc typo articulum religionis suae de coelibatu sacerdotum extruere conantur. Nam 1. tota haec res fuit typica. Typica autem et symbolica theologia non est argumentativa juxta axioma Thomae. 2. Non simpliciter interdicitur conjugium prophetae in omni loco, sed tantum in hoc loco." FÖRSTER.

28. On xvi. 7. This passage (as also Isa. lviii. 7) is used by the Lutheran theologians to prove that panem frangere may be equivalent to panem distribuere, as also LUTHER translates: "They will not distribute bread among them." This is admitted by the Reformers, who, however, remark that it does not follow from this that frangere et distribuere also "in Sacramento equipollere, quod esset a particulari ad particulare argumentari." Comp. TURRETIN, Inst. Theol. Elencht. Tom. III., p. 490.

29. On xvi. 8. "When people are desperately bad and will not be toll so, they must be regarded as heathen and publicans (Matt. xvii. 18; Tit. iii. 10; 1 Cor. v. 9)." CRAMER.

30. On xvi. 19. "The calling of the heathen is very consolatory. For as children are rejoiced at heart when they see that their parents are greatly honored and obtain renown and praise in all lands, so do all true children of God rejoice when they see that God's name is honored and His glory more widely extended." CRAMER.—This passage is one of those which predict the extension of the true religion among all nations, and are therefore significant as giving impulse and comfort in the work of missions. Comp. Deut. xxxii. 21; Hos. ii. 1, 25; Joel iii. 5; Isa. xlix. 6; lxx. 1; Rom. x. 12 sqq.

31. On xvi. 21. "Nothing can be learned from God without God. God instructs the people by His mouth and His hand, verbis et verberibus." CRAMER.

32. On xvii. 1. "Scripta est et fides tua, scripta est et culpa tua, sicut Jeremias dixit: scripta est Juda culpa tua graphio ferreo et ungue adamantino. Et scripta est, inquit, in pectore et in corde tuo. Ibi igitur culpa est ubi gratia; sed culpa graphio scribitur, gratia spiritu designatur." AMBROS. de Sp. s. III. 2.

33. On xvii. 1. "The devil is God's ape. For when he sees that God by the writing of His prophets and apostles propagates His works and wonders to posterity, he sets his own pulpiteers to work, who labor with still greater zeal, and write not only with pens and ink, but also with diamonds, that such false religion may have the greater respect and not go down." CRAMER.

34. On xvii. 5.

"O man in human help and favor
Trust not, for all is vanity,
The curse is on it,—happy he,
Who trusts alone in Christ the Saviour."

[When water is blended with fire, both perish; so when one seeks in part to trust in God and in part to trust in men, it is the same as though he wished to mix heaven and earth together, and to throw all things into confusion. It is then to confound the order of nature, when men imagine that they have two objects of trust, and ascribe half their salvation to God and the other half to themselves or to other men." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

35. On xvii. 5. "A teacher is commanded to be the first to honor the authorities, to pray for them and be subject to them as God's servants. . . . But since the authorities, in all which pertains to the concerns of the soul, have part only as members, there is great occasion for this cursed dependence on flesh . . . when one from the hope of good personal protection . . . gives up the work of the Lord to the powers of the earth. . . . It is true the church is to have foster-parents who are kings. But nevertheless neither kings nor princes are its tutelar deities, much less lords and commanders of the church, but one is our Master, one our Judge, one our King, the Crucified." ZINZENDORF.

36. On xvii. 5. Reformed theologians, ex. gr., LAMBERTUS DANÆUS (ob. 1596) have applied this passage in the sense of John vi. 63, in their controversies against the Lutheran doctrine of the Supper. But as CALVIN declared, it is not the flesh of Christ, but only earthly flesh and that per contentum which is here spoken of. Comp. FÖRSTER, S. 97.

37. On xvii. 7. "Blessed are those teachers, who have betaken themselves to His protection, who once promised His Church, that even the gates of hell should not prevail against it. . . . Who has ever been put to shame who trusted in Him?" ZINZENDORF.

38. On xvii. 9. "This is a spiritual anatomy of the heart. Examples: Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxiii.); Hezekiah (Isa. xxxviii. 39); the children of Israel (Num. xiv.). Alii sumus dum letamur et omnia vita nobis secundo venio succedunt; alii vero in temporibus calamitosis, ubi quid præter sententiam acciderit. Comp. Ser. xi. 27." (MS. note in my copy of CRAMER'S Bible).

39. On xvii. 9. Niše kai úmψασο áπιστείν. This applies with respect to ourselves and others. For the defiant it avails as an extinguisher (Rom. xii. 3); but the despairing may be reassured by it (1 John iii. 19, 20).

40. On xvii. 14. (Thou art my praise). . . . "When a teacher confuses himself to the praise of the cross and lets all other matters of praise go, which might adorn a theologian of these times, and adheres immovably to this: 'I am determined to know nothing among you but Jesus Christ the crucified' (1 Cor. ii. 2).—amid all the shame of His cross He is victorious over the rest." ZINZENDORF.

41. On xvii. 16. (That which I have preached was right before thee). "It is not difficult to know in these times what is right before the Lord. There is His word; he who adheres to this strictly, knows in thou that he is right. . . . In all this it is the teacher's chief maxim, not to make use of the application without need, but to make the truth so plain in his public discourse, that the hearers must necessarily make the application to themselves. . . . 'Thus saying, thou reproachest us also,' said the lawyer (Luke xi. 45). . . . Others went away convicted in their consciences." ZINZENDORF.

42. On xvii. 17. "That is a period which straitens the hearts of witnesses, when their rock, their protection, their consolation, their trust is a terror to them. But under this we must bow and faithfully endure, and we shall have a peaceable fruit of righteousness. Discipline always ends gloriously." ZINZENDORF.

HOMEILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

On xiv. 7-9. Jeremiah a second Israel, who wrestles with the Lord in prayer. 1. In what the Lord is strong against the prophet: the sin of the people. 2. In what the prophet is strong against the Lord: the Name of the Lord (a) in itself. This compels him to show that He is not a desperate hero, or giant, who cannot help; (b) in that His name is borne by Israel. Thus the Lord is bound to show Himself as He who is in Israel (not a guest or stranger), and consequently the Comforter and Helper of Israel.—HEIM und HOFFMANN, The Major Prophets (Winnenden, 1839). As Daniel (ix. 5) prayed, We have sinned and committed iniquity, etc., so Jeremiah took his share in the sin and guilt of his people.—This is true penitence, when one no longer wishes to contend with God in tribulation, but confesses his sin and condemnation, when he sees that if God should treat us according to our misdeeds, He could find no ground for grace. But for His name's sake He can show us favor. He Himself is the cause of the forgiveness of sin.—Calver Handbuch [Manual]. Notwithstanding the ungodliness of the people the prophet may still say, "Thou art among us," because the temple of the Lord and His word were still in the land, and the pious have never all died out. [On xiv. 7-9. "Prayer hath within itself its own reward. The prayer of the prophet consists of confession and petition. 1. Confession fitly begins. It is the testimony of iniquity, and that this iniquity is against God. When we are to encounter any enemy or difficulty, it is sin weakens us. Now confession weakens it, takes off the power of accusation, etc. 2. Petition: For Thy name's sake. This is the unfailing argument which abides always the same and hath always the same force. The children of God are much beholden to their troubles for clear experiences of themselves and God. Though thou art not clear in thy interest as a believer, yet plead thy interest as a sinner, which thou art sure of." LEIGHTON.—S. R. A.]

2. On xiv. 13-16. Against false prophets. 1. They tell the world what it likes to hear (ver. 13); 2. The Lord denies them (ver. 14); 3. The Lord punishes them (ver. 15); 4. The Lord also punishes those who allow themselves to be deceived by them (ver. 16).—Tüb. Bibelw.: To enter the preacher's office without divine calling, what an abomination is that! But mark this, ye hirelings! the sentence of condemnation is already pronounced over you (Jer. xxiii. 21; Matt. vii. 15).—OSLANDER Bibl.: God avenges the deception of false teachers most severely, if not in this world in the next (Acts xiii. 10, 11).—STARKE: God punishes both deceivers and deceived, the latter cannot then lay all the guilt on the former (xxvii. 45).

3. On xiv. 19-22. The church's distress and consolation. 1. The distress is (a) outward (ver. 19), (b) inward (ver. 20), the reason of the outward, confession). 2. The consolation (a). The Lord's Name. [a] It is called and is One (ver. 22); [β] His glory and that of the church (throne of glory) are one; (b) the Lord's covenant (ver. 21).—What in the present circumstances should be our position towards God? 1. The divine providence, in which we are at present: 2. Our confession, which we make before God: 3. Our petition, which we should address to Him. VOELTER in PALMER'S Ev. Casual-Reden. [Occasional Discourses], 4th Ed., 1865.

4. On xv. 16. Sermon on a Reformation or Bible-Anniversary. The candlestick of the Gospel has been rejected by more than one church. We therefore pray: Preserve to us Thy word (Ps. cix. 43). 1. Why we thus pray (Thy Word is our hearts' joy and comfort); 2. Why we hope to be heard (for we are named by Thy name).

5. On xv. 19. CASPARI (Installation-sermon at Munich, Adv., 1855). These words treat; 1, of the firm endurance; 2, of the holy zeal; 3, of the joyful confidence, with which a preacher of God must come to an evangelical church.

6. Homilies of ORIGEN are extant on xv. 5 and 6; (Hom. XII., Ed. LOMMATZSCH); xv. 10-19 (Hom. XIV.); xv. 10; xvii. 5 (Hom. XV.). [On xv. 20. "I. God's qualification to be an overseer of the church. The metaphor of a wall implies, (1) courage, (2) innocence and integrity, (3) authority. II. The opposition a church-governor will be sure to meet with, (1) by seditious preaching and praying, (2) by railing and libels; (3) perhaps by open force. III. The issue and success of such opposition (they shall not prevail)." SOUTH.—S. R. A.]

7. On xvi. 19-21. Missionary Sermon. The true knowledge of God. 1. It is to be had in Christianity (ver. 19, a). 2. It will also make its way to the heathen, for (a) it is God's will that they should be instructed (ver. 21); (b) they are ready to be instructed (ver. 19 b, 20).

8. On xvii. 5-8. The blessing of faith and the curse of unbelief (comp. Ebal und Gerizim). 1. Why does the curse come upon the unbeliever? (He departs in his heart from the Lord). 2. Wherein this curse consists (ver. 6). 3. Why must blessing be the portion of the believer? (ver. 7). 4. Wherein this blessing consists (ver. 8).

9. On xvii. 5-8, and xviii. 7-10. SCULEIERMACHER (Sermon on 28 Mar., 1813, in Berlin): We regard the great change (brought about by the events of the period) on the side of our worthiness before God. 1. What in this respect is its peculiar import and true nature. 2. To what we must then feel ourselves summoned.

10. On xvii. 9, 10. The human heart and its judge. 1. The antithesis in the human heart. 2. The impossibility of fathoming it with human eyes. 3. The omniscient God alone sees through it; and 4, judges it with justice. ["The heart is deceitful—it always has some trick or other by which to shuffle off conviction." HENRY.—"It is extremely difficult for sinners to know their hearts. I. What is implied in their knowing their own hearts. 1. It implies a knowledge of their selfishness. 2. Of their desperate incurable wickedness. 3. Of their extreme deceitfulness. II. Why it is so extremely difficult for them to know their own hearts. 1. They are unwilling to know them. 2. Because of the de-ceitfulness of sin. They love or hate, as they appear friendly or unfriendly to them: (a) God, (b) Christ, (c) good men, (d) one another, (e) the world, (f) their own hearts, (g) the means of grace, (h) their convictions, (i) heaven—Improvement. The only way to know the heart is to inquire whether it loves God or not, etc. 2. Saints can more easily ascertain their true character than sinners can. 3. All changes in life are trials of the heart," etc., etc. EMMONS.—"I. The human heart exhibits great fraud and treachery. 1. We are changeable by that connection which the soul has with the body. 2. By its connection with external objects by our senses. 3. By its love of novelty and variety. 4. By its hasty resolutions. 5. By its self-love. II. Its excessive malice is seen in history and experience. III. Its deep dissimulation and hypocrisy render it inscrutable. Inferences: 1. We should entertain a sober diffidence of ourselves. 2. We should not be surprised when men use us ill or disappoint us. 3. We should take care and give good principles and a good example to those young persons under our guidance. 4. We should be ready to confess our offences to God. 5. We should bear in mind that we are under the inspection of one who searcheth the hearts," etc. JORTIN.—See also two Sermons by JER. TAYLOR.—S. R. A.]

11. RUD. KÜGEL (Court and Cathedral preacher at Berlin, 1855). Sermon on xvii. 9, 19, and Heb. xiii. 9: Two pictures: 1, the unregenerate; 2, the regenerate heart.

12. On xvii. 12, 13. Sermon for the dedication of a church, the anniversary of the Reformation, or on Whitsunday. The church of the Lord. 1. What it is in itself (place of sanctuary, throne of divine glory, house of Him, who is Israel's hope). 2. What it will be (it will ever remain firm, Matt. xvi. 18): 3. What they find who forsake it (ver. 19).

13. On xvii. 14-18. Cry for help of a preacher tempted on account of the truth. 1. The temptation (ver. 15). 2. The demonstration of innocence (ver. 16). 3. The cry for help, (a) negative (vers. 17 and 18), (b) positive (ver. 14). [On xvii. 14. The penitent's prayer. 1. The words express an earnest desire for salvation. 2. He applies to Almighty God for it. 3. Through the medium of prayer. 4. With confidence that he will be heard. DR. A. THOMSON of Edinburgh.—S. R. A.]

6. THE SIXTH DISCOURSE.

(CHAP. XVII. 19-27.)

This short passage is closely connected neither with what precedes nor with what follows. Many commentators have, indeed, devised an extensive frame, so as to include this passage in it together with the previous or subsequent context, but these artificial expedients are not satisfactory. The previous discourse is, as shown above, complete in itself, and requires no further addition. The following passages are also as peculiar and independent as this. This forms a small but important and in form a finished whole. Why should not the prophet have addressed short speeches to the people?

As to the date, all is in favor of the reign of Jehoiakim. 1. The state still exists in unenfeebled independence; no trace betrays that the power of the Chaldeans had become predominant, or that they were immediately threatening. 2. The censure of the transgression of so important a command corresponds rather with the times of the godless Jehoiakim, than of the pious Josiah. The great similarity with xxii. 1-5, which passage indubitably pertains to the reign of Jehoiakim, is in favor of referring this discourse to the same period. [HENDERSON: "Eichhorn, Rosenmüller and Maurer, are of opinion that this portion of the chapter belongs to the reign of Jehoiakim, who rapidly undid all the good which had been effected by Josiah, and among other evils encouraged the profanation of the Sabbath, with the due observance of which the prosperity of the State was bound up. The language of the prophet, however, is not objurgatory, as we should have expected, if the profanation in question had actually existed. It is rather that of caution and warning, with a promise of prosperity in case of obedience, and a threatening of destruction to the city in case of disobedience. It would seem, therefore, to belong to the time of Josiah, and to have been delivered in connection with or shortly after his reformation." —HITZIG refers this passage together with chapter xviii., to the period of Jeconiah, or that immediately following the death of Jehoiakim.—S. R. A.]

EXHORTATION TO HALLOW THE SABBATH.

XVII. 19-27.

19 Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah] unto me; Go and stand in the gate of the children of the people,¹ whereby the kings of Judah come in, and by the which they 20 go out, and in all the gates of Jerusalem; And say unto them, Hear ye the word of the LORD [Jehovah], ye kings of Judah and all Judah, and all the inhabitants 21 of Jerusalem that enter in by these gates: Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah]; Take heed ye to yourselves [Care with foresight for your souls],² and bear no burden on 22 the Sabbath-day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem; neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the Sabbath day, neither do ye any work, but hallow

 23 ye the Sabbath-day, as I commanded your fathers. But they obeyed [heard] not, neither inclined their ear, but made their neck stiff; that they might not hear³ nor 24 receive instruction. And it shall come to pass, if ye diligently hearken unto me, saith the LORD [Jehovah] to bring in no burden, through the gates of this city on the Sabbath-day, but hallow the Sabbath day to do [by doing] no work therein;⁴
 25 then shall there enter into [through] the gates of this city kings and princes⁵ sitting upon [who sit on] the throne of David, riding in chariots and on horses, they and their princes, the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem; and this city
 26 shall remain [be inhabited] forever. And they shall come from the cities of Judah and from the places about [environs of] Jerusalem and from the land of Benjamin, and from the plains and from the mountains, and from the south, bringing [people who bring] burnt offerings and sacrifices and meat-offerings and incense, and bring-27 ing sacrifices of praise unto the house of the LORD [Jehovah]. But if ye will not hearken unto me to hallow the Sabbath day, and not to bear a burden, even entering [or enter] into the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath-day; then will I kindle a fire in the [your] gates thereof, and it shall devour the palaces of Jerusalem and it shall not be quenched.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 19.—[ἄνθρωπος: Of the common man]. The Chethibh reads בְּנֵי-אָדָם, but this does not make any difference in the sense. If the absence of the article is not due to an oversight, it may be explained by the later, less exact use of language, of which we repeatedly find traces in Jeremiah (comp. iii. 2; vi. 16; xiv. 18).

² Ver. 21.—בְּנִפְתָּרוֹם. The construction is like Mal. ii. 13, 16, בְּרִצְרוֹם, בְּרִצְרוֹם. But בְּ is not =by, per, after verbs of petition or conjuration (by your life not. Vid. GESSEN., Theo. III., s. 1443), or—for the sake of (MEIER), but the Niphal involves the meaning of having regard to, observing, and בְּ depends on this. Comp. טָמְאָה מִי בְּעֵינַי, 2 Sam. xviii. 12. That this is the sense of the connection follows plainly from 2 Sam. xx. 10, “took no heed to the sword;” Deut. xxiv. 8, “take heed to the plagus.” Comp. NAUGELSB., Gr., § 100, 3.

³ Ver. 23.—שָׁמָעִי שְׁמָעִי (Chethibh, שְׁמָעִי) HELLER in Arcano Kri et K'lib, remarks that the Masoretes, when they wished to indicate the Scriptio plena, in order that the difference of their reading might be remarked, set the mater lectionis in another place in the word. So also in ii. 25; ix. 7; xxvii. 1; xxix. 23; xxxii. 23. Comp. the Explicatio lectionum masoret in the Hebrew Bible of SIMONIS, Halle, 1752.

⁴ Ver. 24.—On the form בְּדָה. Comp. EWALD, § 84, b; 247, d. OLSH., § 96, c; 40, h.

⁵ Ver. 25.—עָרִים is strange. GRAF not without reason, assumes an oversight, caused by the frequent juxtaposition of the two words. Comp. xlix. 33; Hos. xiii. 10; 2 Sam. xviii. 5; 1 Chron. xxiv. 6; 2 Chron. xxviii. 21; xxix. 30; xxx. 12; Esth. i. 16, 21, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Jeremiah is to go under the gate of the city and there warn all the people from the king downwards against the desecration of the Sabbath by bearing burdens and laboring as their fathers had done (vers. 18-23). If they would sanctify the Sabbath, their city should remain forever, and their gate should be witnesses of a lively traffic, of importance to the king's house, the city and the temple (vers. 24-26). But if they should continue to desecrate the Sabbath, an extinguishable fire should consume the gates and palaces of the city (ver. 27). Accordingly three parts may be distinguished in this passage.

Vers. 19-23. Thus saith Jehovah . . . nor receive instruction.—Go, etc. Comp. ii. 2; iii. 12; xix. 1.—Gate of the children of the people. This gate is mentioned here only. It is, therefore, difficult to determine its position with certainty, as according to VON RAUMER (Paläst., 4th Ed., s. 291), not two interpreters agree as to its position. The first question is whether it was a gate of the city or of the temple. GRAF correctly remarks that, with respect to a gate of the city שַׁרְיָה must stand first and אֶרֶב last (comp. 2 Chron. xxiii. 8). The name שַׁרְיָה would also be a very strange one for a city gate. The expression occurs with three meanings. 1. It designates the difference between strangers and natives, although in this sense שַׁרְיָה is found in the Old Testament not with the article, but only with suffixes: Gen. xxiii. 11; Judges xiv. 16; Lev. xix. 18; Ezek. iii. 11; Num. xxii. 5; Lev. xx. 17.—2. It designates a difference in rank among the people themselves, and in two degrees, the mass of the people in opposition to the king and the princes (2 Chron. xxxv. 7 coll. 8), and again the commonalty in opposition to the more respectable classes (Jer. xxvi. 23; 2 Kings xxiii. 6).—3. The expression designates the difference between priests and not priests, in which sense it corresponds to our term “laity” (2 Chron. xxxv. 5, 12, 13). It occurs only in the passages cited. Since now nothing is known of a gate of the city through which strangers might not pass, or of one through which only the kings and the dregs of the people, or only the kings and the rest of their subjects to the exclusion of the priests might pass, it follows that the gate must have been a gate of the temple through which only the laity went in and out, since special entrances were reserved for the priests. What gate it was it is difficult to say. The expression was probably not one in general use, but employed only by the priests, since according to the second explanation it included a somewhat dishonorable side-meaning. The rarity of the expression also justifies the conclusion that it was a temporary expression, i. e., in use only in those times, since as is well-known the city-gates of Jerusalem bore successively different names. Comp. RAUMER'S Paläst. S. 290, 1.—When in 2 Chron. xxiii. 5, the high-priest Jehoiada posted a third of his people at the שַׁעַר הַיְיָ , it is natural to suppose that this was the gate through which he expected Athaliah to pass. It is then further probable that this gate was identical with the one mentioned in our passage “whereby the kings of Judah went in and out.” [HENDERSON:—“The gate of the mass of the people . . . was in all probability the gate of David, corresponding to what is now called the Jaffa Gate, and was called the ‘people’s’ gate from the circumstance of its being the principal thoroughfare for the tribes in the South, the West, and the North-West.”—S. R. A.] That this gate, even were it a gate of the temple, was adapted to the proclamation of this divine message, is evident if we reflect (a), that this gate also might by the purchase and sale of temple-necessaries (comp. Matth. xxi. 12) be the scene of Sabbath-desecrating traffic; (b) that even if this was not the case, at any rate the gate was one which was much frequented, perhaps more than all the rest. —Not do any work. Comp. Exod. xii. 16; xx. 8sq.; Dent. v. 12sq.—The Sabbath was the day of Jehovah (comp. the passages quoted) a monimentum temporale for his service, hence the observance of this day stood or fell with the worship of Jehovah.—But they obeyed not. The first half of ver. 23 is taken verbatim from vii. 25.—Ver. 23 is parenthetical, suggested by AS I COMMANDED, etc.

Ver. 24-26. And it shall come . . . Jehovah Sitting upon the throne. Comp. xiii. 13; xxii. 4.—Shall remain. Comp. rems. on ver. 6.—Men of Judah. Comp. xxxii. 44; xxxiii. 13; coll. Josh. x. 40; Judges i. 9; Dent. i. 7; Zech. vii. 7.—The plains. שְׁפֵלָה is the low country between Joppa and Gaza, Josh. ix. 1; xii. 8; xv. 33 sq.; 1 Kings x. 27; Obad. 19; RAUMER, Paläst. S. 51.—South, צָפוֹן is the southern, as שְׁפֵלָה the western, קִרְבַּן the eastern, רָחֹק the northern, parts of the tribe of Judah, separating the two last mentioned. Comp. Josh. xv. 55 sq.; 2 Sam. xxiv. 7.

Ver. 27. But if ye will not . . . not be quenched. The negation before to bear must also be referred to enter. Comp. ver. 21.—Will I kindle. Comp. xxi. 14; xlix. 27; Am. i. 11.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On ver. 20. “It is no derogation to the sagacity of a teacher if he directs his public instructions, admonitions and warnings with some special adaptation to the rulers of the country. Only he must guard against offensive or abusive expressions, and see to it that he carefully distinguish between their office and their life, and be sure of his case, that he is not following the motions of nature, but the calling of the Lord. Acts xxiii. 3; 1 Ki. xiv. 7, 8.” STARKE.

2. Man in this earthly life needs, besides work, rest also for body and soul. It would be inept to have one rest day for the body and another for the soul. It would be equally so to have more or fewer holidays than God has ordained by sanctification of the Seventh day, whereby He who is the creator of time has at the same time given us the fundamental principles of its division. As the rest of the body is both negative and positive (abstinence from labor and recuperation of forces) so also is that of the soul. The soul is from God, and must on its day of rest be freed from earthly cares and brought into the element of its heavenly origin, as it were into a cleansing and invigorating bath. The observance by Christians of the first, instead of the Seventh day, as a weekly holiday is well founded in the fact that the day of Christ’s resurrection is also a day of creation, and so much the more glorious as the new and imperishable world is more glorious than the old and perishable world.

3. “Neglect not church going. For though the unbelieving heathen thought it a foolish course to spend the day in idleness, yet temporal subsistence will not therefore fail, but rather will the weekly work of other days flourish the more. Matth. vi. 33.” CRAMER.

4. [“God did not regard the external rite only, but rather the end, of which He speaks in Ex. xxxi. 13, and in Ezek. xx. 12. In both places He reminds us of the reason why He commanded the Jews to keep holy the Seventh day, and that was that it might be to them a symbol of sanctification. ‘I have given My Sabbaths,’ He says, ‘to you, that ye might know that I am your God who sanctifieth you.’ . . . And it appears from other places that this command was typical—Christ being the substance. Col. ii. 16.” CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The weekly holiday as the day of Jehovah and as the day of the Lord. 1. What they have in common. The weekly holiday is in both cases (a) a monument of the loving care of our God (a) for our body (3) for our soul; (b) a right of God which forms on our part a holy obligation towards God, ourselves, and our neighbor. 2. The differences. (a) The day of Jehovah is founded on the creation of the perishable world; the day of the Lord is founded on the resurrection of Christ, as of a new, eternal world; (b) the observance of the day of Jehovah was only legal, i. e., (a) imposed by external compulsion, (3) by requirements to be fulfilled by outward observance;—the observance of the day of the Lord is to be more and more an evangelical one, i. e. (a) a free, (b) a spiritually free one, i. e., satisfying the right as well as the obligation of personality.

[“What blessings God has in store for those who make conscience of Sabbath sanctification. 1. The court shall flourish. The honor of the government is the joy of the kingdom, and the support of religion would contribute greatly to both. 2. The city shall flourish. Whatever supports religion tends to establish the civil interests of a land. 3. The country shall flourish. By this the flourishing of a country may be judged of. What does it do for the honor of God? Those who starve their religion either are poor, or are in a fair way to be so. 4. The church shall flourish. It is a true observation which some have made, That the streams of all religion run either deep or shallow, according as the banks of the Sabbath, are kept up or neglected." HENRY.—S. [R. A.]

THE SEVENTH DISCOURSE.

(CHAPS. XVIII.—XX.)

As these three chapters appear under a common superscription of the longer form, which does not recur till chap. xxi., they are evidently to be regarded as a connected whole. They have in fact an internal connection, although they cannot by any means be considered as a rhetorical whole, or as a connected discourse. Two historical facts are here set before us, which are internally related, but are different as to time, and probably also as to their original record, to which are also attached both prophetic indications and subjective effusions. The first historical fact is the incident with the potter, related in ch. xviii. As in this chapter the impending judgment is still announced in the same general manner as before, the Chaldeans not yet being mentioned as the instrument, it is manifest that it must have been written before the decisive turning-point reported in ch. xxv., viz., before the battle of Carchemish in the 4th year of Jehoiakim. On the other hand chh. xix. and xx. were written after this crisis. For in xx. 4 we read "I will give all Judah into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall carry them captive into Babylon." Jeremiah does not speak thus till after that decisive battle. It is also noteworthy, that the prophet in xx. 2 is called יְרֵמְיָהוּ הַנְּבִיא, not simply יְרֵמְיָהוּ, which mode of expression likewise prevails only after the great crisis. (Comp. xxv. 2; xxviii. 5, 10, 11, 12, 15, etc.) It follows definitively that chh. xix. and xx. belong to the time of Jehoiakim from the circumstance that in the reign of Zedekiah, not Pashur, but Zephaniah, the son of Maaseiah, appears to be invested with the dignity of temple-officer (comp. xxix. 26 coll. xxi. 7; xxxvii. 3; lii. 24), and moreover as the successor of Jehoiada, which renders the probability that Pashur no longer held this office under Zedekiah so much the greater, especially if we consider that ch. xxix. belongs to one of the first years of Zedekiah (see the Introd. to ch. xxix.) Pashur, who in xx. 4 sqq. is threatened with being carried away captive to Babylon, had most probably met this fate with king Jehoiakim and that numerous company which is spoken of in xxix. 1 and 2 Ki. xxiv. 12-14.—Notwithstanding therefore that ch. xviii. belongs to an earlier period than chh. xix. and xx. they are placed together because both are based on symbolic actions, of which the productions of pottery form the substratum. In ch. xviii. the clay on the potter's wheel first fails, but is then immediately formed anew; in ch. xix. the vessel is ready-made, which being poured out is then (irreparably xix. 11) broken by the prophet. Both actions are of such a character as to set before the people that the Lord has not only the power but the will to destroy them. Nevertheless there is a great difference between the two actions, the first having a parænetic, the second more of a declarative character, as will be shown in the exposition. GRAF is of opinion that xix. 1-13 was written down at the same time with ch. xviii., because the event narrated in xx. 1 sqq., is related to the prophecy in vii. 30 sqq. as ch. xxvi. to vii. 12, and since the discourse in ch. vii. sqq. belongs to the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, so also the prophecy in xix. 1-13, and the event recorded in xx. 1-6 must belong to this time. But the latter was not recorded till afterwards, like all the narratives from the life of Jeremiah. The lyrical passage xx. 7-13 has no connection with the preceding context. But it may have been composed under the impression of the shameful treatment which Jeremiah had received in the temple, or subsequently in remembrance of this and other persecutions. The five verses, xx. 14-18, are said to be an independent fragment, an amplification of xv. 10, which was perhaps composed in consequence of the same occurrences, and were put here on this account, or only on account of its agreement with vers. 7, 8. To this I have to object; 1. It is an unnatural supposition that xix. 1-13 was written before xix. 14-xx. 6. For both passages are so closely connected that we cannot conceive what could have occasioned the prophet to defer the relation in xix. 14, etc., after having recorded the previous facts, together with the prophecy connected with them. The narrative xix. 14, etc., was certainly recorded after the prophet had already begun to call himself יְרֵמְיָהוּ, but only because the prophecy itself belongs to this later period. This is not identical with vii. 30-34, and does not therefore belong to the first years of Jehoiakim. The agreement in particular words and phrases corresponds only to the general usage of Jeremiah, to repeat himself frequently and extensively, and in different connections by no means justifies the assumption of identity. 2. The passage xx. 7-13 is closely connected with the previous context, as is especially seen in the words כְּגֹר כִּסְכִיב (comp. the Comm. on xx. 10); it is not however an objective and official word of God, but a memorial of subjective thoughts and feelings, which then moved the prophet, and thus bears to some extent the character of a private record. 3. The case is the same with xx. 14-18. This passage also is of an entirely subjective and private nature. To strike it out or explain it as only patched on accidentally is to deny the dualism which must undoubtedly have prevailed in the mind of the prophet. To transpose it from this place and set it before xx. 7 (as EWALD does, in this however opposed by GRAF) would be to disturb the natural course and the clear picture of the inner feelings of the prophet. For it is only too probable that in those troubled times a troubled frame of mind finally became predominant.

I am therefore of opinion that ch. xviii. belongs to the period before, chh. xix. and xx. to the period after, the fourth year of Jehoiakim, that the passages however being of related contents were placed in juxtaposition in the collection of prophecies; further, that xix. 1—xx. 6 is to be regarded as a closely connected whole, on which follows as an appendix a subjective effusion of double and contradictory purport, by which however we obtain a true picture of the prophet's then prevailing state of mind.

The discourse may be divided as follows:—

CHAPTERS XVIII. to XX.

THE SYMBOLS OF POTTERY.

FIRST SYMBOL:—THE CLAY AND POTTER.

CHAP. XVIII.

1. The parable of the potter and its interpretation in the negative sense.

XVIII. 1-10.

- 1, 2 The word which came to Jeremiah from the LORD [Jehovah], saying, Arise and go down to the potter's house and there I will cause thee to hear my words.
- 3 Then I went down to the potter's house, and, behold, he wrought a work on the
- 4 wheels. And the vessel which he was making¹ of [as] clay² was spoiled in the hand of the potter; so he made it again another vessel, as seemed good to the potter to
- 5 make it. Then the word of the LORD [Jehovah] came to me, saying,
- 6 Cannot I do to you as this potter does,
O house of Israel? saith Jehovah.
Behold as the clay in the hand of the potter,
So are ye in my hand, O house of Israel!
- 7 Suddenly I speak against a nation and against a kingdom,
To extirpate and exterminate and to destroy:
- 8 If now this nation, against which I have spoken, turn from its wickedness,
I repent of the evil which I thought to do unto it.
- 9 And suddenly I speak concerning a nation and concerning a kingdom,
To build and to plant:
- 10 If now it does that which is evil³ in my eyes,
So that it hears not my voice,
I repent of the good wherewith I promised to benefit it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—ונשחה. The perfects נשחה and נשח signify that these facts are not to be regarded as co-ordinate points in the course of the narrative, but as further developments of the נשחה כלאכנה, from which it is not necessary to assume that the word designates more than a single act (HITZIG, GRAF). The form נשחב is used (as ex. gr., Gen. xxvi. 17) for the reason that the word does not contain the main idea, but a subordinate one attached as it were by the preceding perfect. Comp. Gen. xxix. 2 sqq.; Isa. vi. 3; Dan. viii. 4; EWALD, § 342 b; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 81, b; § 95 g, Anm.

² Ver. 4.—כִּהְיֶה כֶּרֶם. These words have been unjustly suspected by different translators, transcribers, and commentators. They are not a gloss from ver. 6, but doubtless chosen with reference to this verse. The intention is to set forth prominently the punctum saliens by similarity of expression in the historical narrative and the application. The כֶּרֶם is to be regarded as Kaph veritatis—as clay, i. e., as he is accustomed to do to the clay. Comp. xv. 19; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5, c.

[WORDSWORTH: As clay sometimes falls in the hand of the potter.—HENDERSON. “כִּהְיֶה כֶּרֶם” with כֶּ instead of כ, is found in the text of fifty-eight MSS., has originally been in several more, and is now in five more by correction. It is likewise exhibited in seventeen printed editions, and alone makes sense.”—S. R. A. J.]

³ Ver. 10.—הִרְעִיָהוּ. The Masoretes would read הִרְעִיָהוּ, according to the usage which prevails elsewhere without an exception (comp. Num. xxvii. 13; Jud. ii. 11; iii. 7, 12, etc.; 1 Kings xi. 6; xiv. 22; Jer. vii. 30; xxxii. 30, etc.). The reading of the Chetibh is, however, evidently occasioned by הִטְוִיָה after, and רִיעִיָהוּ before it.

ENEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet receives the command to go into the potter's house, to receive there a revelation from the Lord. He obeys and is a witness how the clay is spoiled in the hands of the potter, as he works on the wheel, and how he immediately forms a new vessel out of the clay (vers. 1-4). Hereupon the prophet receives the word of the Lord: As the clay is in the hand of the potter, so is Israel in the hand of the Lord (vers. 5 and 6). As the Lord by penitence and conversion is dissuaded from the accomplishment of His threatenings, so by evil-doing He may be prevented from performing His gracious promises (vers. 7-10).

Vers. 1-4. The word . . . to the potter to make it. The superscription is like that in vii. 1; xi. 1.—הַגָּלְגַלִּים, wheels. The meaning of the word, which occurs besides only in Exod. i. 16 cannot be doubtful in this passage. With respect however to Exod. i. 16, it was the object of a literary controversy. Comp. BÖTTCHER in WISNER'S Zeitsch. f. wiss. Theol., Bd. II., II. 1, S.

49 ff.; RETTIG, BÖTTCHER u. REDSLOB, Stud. u. Krit., 1834; BENARY, Berlin, Jahrb., 1841; ERNST MEIER, Stud. u. Krit., 1842. [For a description and diagram of the wheel, see GESEN. Lex., s. v.]—As seemed good. Comp. xxvii. 5.

Vers. 5-10. Then the word . . . to benefit it.—On as the clay in the hand of the potter comp. Isa. xxix. 16; xlv. 9; lxiv. 7; Wisd. xv. 7; Eccles. xxxvi. 13; Rom. ix. 21.—Suddenly, vers. 7 and 9, is evidently not to be referred to the proximate verb, but to the main thought, i. e., to the apodosis. The mode of expression is paratactic. In our syntactic mode it would be: Suddenly, if I have spoken against a nation . . . and this nation turn, I will repent, etc. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 111, 1, Anm. Moreover, the word refers evidently to the rapidity with which the potter changes the form of the clay. Observation may be recommended as the best commentator on this passage.—To extirpate. Comp. i. 10.—Against which I spoke is not to be referred to wickedness, but to nation.

2. The interpretation of the parable in the positive sense.

XVIII. 11-17

- 11 And now speak indeed¹ to the men of Judah,
And to² the inhabitants [citizens] of Jerusalem, saying,
Thus saith Jehovah: Behold!
I frame evil against you, and think thoughts against you:
Turn ye now, each from his evil way,
And reform your ways and your works.
- 12 But they will say: No use!³ but our thoughts we will follow,
And will practise, each according to the obstinacy⁴ of his wicked heart.
- 13 Therefore thus saith Jehovah:
Inquire now among the nations, who hath heard the like?
The virgin Israel hath done a very horrible thing.⁵
- 14 Ceases⁶ from the rock of the field the snow of Lebanon?
Or do the strong,⁷ cool, rippling waters dry up?
- 15 That my people forgat me and burned incense to vanity,
And made them stumble in their ways, the ancient paths,⁸
To walk in roads of an unlevelled way,
- 16 To make their land a desolation,
An object of everlasting derision?⁹

He who only passes through will be astounded at it,
And will shake his head.¹⁰

17 Like the east wind will I scatter them before the enemy;
Back not face will I show them in the day of their fall.

⁸ Ver. 14.—Instead of זָרִים, which certainly affords no satisfactory meaning, the LXX. seems to have read זָרִים, the proud, splendid. So also MEIER in comparison with יְרוּנִים בְּיָם, Ps. cxxiv. 5. EWALD (and after him GRAY) derives זָרִים from זָרַר, to press. This word, however, signifies constrinxit, compressit, and the meaning to press forth is a bare assumption. If the word is to be altered, it is then better to agree with MEIER. [זָרִים from זָרַר, to compress, straiten, is descriptive of streams, as contracted within narrow channels, while descending through the gorges and defiles of the rocks. The use of the verb זָרַר, Arab. naza', نَزَلَ, descendit loco, confirms this view." HENDERSON. HITZIG renders "strange," as coming from afar, in the sense of the A. V., and refers to the unknown source of the pool of Siloam, etc.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After it had been shown in vers. 5-10 that the Lord was not bound by His promises with respect to the people, but has as much freedom as the potter with respect to the clay, He now makes the positive application of this parable. He declares what, like a potter, he is about to form, viz., calamity. The expression יִזְרַר, ver. 11, is the only point in which this strophe supports itself on the preceding parable, for in what follows there is no further reference to it. To the brief application and exposition of this word, is attached an exhortation to repentance and reformation (ver. 11 b), to which the people answer with stubborn rejection (ver. 12). On account of this unheard of (ver. 13), and unnatural apostasy (vers. 14, 15), desolation, dispersion and flight are again announced to the people as the divine punishment (vers. 16, 17).

Vers. 11 and 12. And now speak . . . wicked heart.—And now introduces the transition, after the basis has been laid for the proper object of the discourse. It has been shown that the Lord can form what He will, it is now positively declared, that He will frame evil.—I frame (יִזְרַר). In the transferred sense the word is used also in Isa. xxii. 11; xxxvii. 26; xlv. 11; Jer. xxxiii. 2.—Think. Comp. xlix. 30. The words from turn to way, are found verbatim in xxv. 5; xxxv. 15. In the last passage is found also the rest of the verse with the exception of וּרְכִישׁוֹ your works. Comp. vii. 8; xxvi. 13.

Vers. 13-17. Therefore thus . . . day of their fall. From the peremptory declaration which Israel made in ver. 12, it is concluded that this nation has rendered itself guilty of unfaithfulness, the like of which is found neither in history (ver. 13), nor in nature (ver. 14).—Inquire now. Comp. ii. 10, 11.—Virgin. Comp. Am. v. 2; Jer. xxxi. 4, 21.—Ceases, etc. According to the connection the prophet can only mean to adduce a fact in natural history which forms a parallel to the historical fact that a nation has never forsaken its gods. In general it is plain that he has chosen, as the example from natural history, the perennial connection of the snow on Lebanon, and of the fresh abundant springs, with the שָׁרַר. But what is this? Disregarding the various arbitrary and forced explanations, two views may be here considered. According to one it is Mt. Zion, according to the other, Mt. Lebanon itself. It is in favor of the former. 1. That Zion in xvii. 3 appears under the designation בְּשָׂרָה, and in xxi. 13 as הַקִּישׁוֹר. צִיֹּר. 2. That in Ps. cxxxiii. 3 also the dew of Hermon, which descends on Mt. Zion, is spoken of, and in Prov. xxv. 23 it is said: the north wind brings [Eng. Vers.: driveth away] rain. 3. That the expression snow of Lebanon intimates that the rock of the plain is not identical with Lebanon. On the other hand it may be objected to this explanation: 1. That a connection between the snow of Lebanon and the springs of Zion is very dubious. In a bold poetical figure the extension of the dew of Hermon over the whole land even to Zion, may be spoken of, but here a fact in natural history is treated of, which must have been familiar to the Israelites, and which must have set before them a clear representation of natural and most intimate union. Now other traces show that the Israelites acknowledged the sea to be the true and proper source of rain and moisture for the land, which it also is in fact (comp. 1 Kings xviii. 44, 45; Luke xii. 54; Winer, R. W. B., s. v., Winde; RAUMER, Paläst. S. 91). Hence in Palestine the rainy winds are the West and South-west, which the Arabs also call the "fathers of the rain." In Prov. xxv. 23 the north-west wind is probably to be understood by רִיחַ צָפוֹן, since the north wind, as with us, is cold, producing frost (Job xxxvii. 9, 10; Ecclus. xliii. 20). 2. In xvii. 3 הַרְרֵי כְּשֶׁרָה is a designation of the whole land, for it is not=my mountain set in the plain (as antithesis between mountain and plain) but my mountain together with the plain (antithesis between the sanctuary and the rest of the country inhabited and cultivated by men. Comp. the Comm.). The passage xxi. 13 also does not enter into comparison with this. For there evidently not Mt. Zion, but the house of David, is to be understood, of which it is said that it is like a rock in a valley, eminent above the surrounding level, whereby it is intended to designate, not the topographical position of Zion, but the relation of the king's house to his subjects. 3. That it is not said, Ceases the snow from the rock of the field, from Lebanon? but ceases the snow of Lebanon? etc., is certainly remarkable and in other circumstances would be a strong proof that the prophet wished to distinguish the rock and the mountain. For Lebanon alone presented to them the picture of a snow-capped mountain, and all the snow they had came from it. Add to this, that Lebanon was originally an appellative and signifies albedo (comp. Alpes, which were so called ab albis nivibus) whence there appears to me to be a play upon words in Lebanon: the Lebanon snow and the white snow. The absence of the article favors this, for if Lebanon were regarded merely as a proper name, it would require the article. Comp. NÄGELS. Gr., § 71, 4 b. [So HENDERSON.—S. R. A.]—In favor of the other view, according to which צִיֵּר עֲרֵי is Lebanon itself, is 1. that the perennial snow of a mountain, like Lebanon, which though in a hot climate is never free from snow, and on which the snow seems to have lost its peculiar quality of disappearing rapidly, is particularly adapted to serve as an emblem of the most faithful adherence. It seems as though TACITUS had this passage in view, when he wrote (Hist. V., 6): "Præcipuum montium Libanum erigit, mirum dictu, tantos inter ardores opacum fidumque nivibus. Idem amnem Jordanem alit funditque." Comp. J. D. MICHAEL, Observ. in Jer., p. 161.—Add to this that 2. the expression used of Lebanon seems particularly appropriate in this connection. For not only may Lebanon be mentioned as an isolated far-looking summit, but especially also as a protecting wall for the plains, which wards off the northerly storms and at the same time mitigates the heat. And is not this "protecting wall of the plains" an excellent emblem of the צִיֵּר עֲרֵי, which is spoken of in Isa. xxvi. 4, and of the צִיֵּר יִשְׂרָאֵל in Isa. xxx. 29? The snow never forsakes the עֲרֵי, but Israel, changeable as the snow, easily forsakes the צִיֵּר עֲרֵי.—Dry up. The meaning of tearing out, uprooting, which נָתַשׁ includes, is not inappropriate if taken in the figurative sense. The change into יָצַחְתִּי [dry up], which perhaps lies at the basis of the old translations, with the exception of the Vulgate, and which is supported on Isa. xix. 5; xli. 17; Jer. li. 30, is therefore unnecessary.—Waters. The wealth of springs on Lebanon is well known. The traveler KORRE assures us that nowhere did he see such large and numerous springs as on Lebanon. Vid. RAUMER, Paläst., S. 30. In Song of Sol. iv. 15 also the rippling waters of Lebanon are used as a comparison. The thought of the prophet is that as the snow covers Lebanon perpetually above, so the flow of waters at its foot is also perpetual. For the snow is the source of the springs. The expression therefore seems to have been chosen purposely to indicate the connection between the snow and the waters of Lebanon. An uprooting of the waters would be caused by the cessation of the snow. Comp. HITZIG on the passage.—Cold (קָרָה, comp. Prov. xxv. 25; xvii. 27) needs no change; the meaning "cold" is perfectly appropriate.—Rippling, נוֹלֵם, comp. Exod. xv. 8; Isa. xli. 3; Ps. lxxviii. 16; Prov. v. 15; Song of Sol. iv. 15.—That my people, etc. This gives the reason why the questions in vers. 13 and 14 have been put. Since the people have forgotten Him (ii. 32), the Lord looks about to see whether anything similar occurs elsewhere. Comp. Ps. viii. 5.—Made them stumble. The nominative is the collective idea of the idols designated by עֲבֹתָי, vanity. [HENDERSON: false prophets and idolatrous priests.—S. R. A.] Comp. 2 Chron. xxviii. 23.—When HITZIG and GRAF maintain that the old ways were not good, for even the fathers of the Israelites had sinned from ancient times by idolatry (ii. 32; vii. 25, 26; xi. 10), they forget that the good ways are more ancient than the people of Israel. Even if Israel since the exodus from Egypt had not served the Lord (which after ii. 2 notwithstanding vii. 25 is not to be maintained too unconditionally), yet the way of Jehovah was the way everlasting (vi. 16), and Israel's true and proper way, for their fathers at any rate served the God who from them is called the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and the fathers' way is de jure that of the children.—To walk, etc., is the immediate and first consequence of the effect designated by made to stumble, while to make . . . a desolation, ver. 16, denotes the mediate consequence.—Like the east wind. Comp. Exod. xiv. 21; Ps. xlviii. 8; Isa. xxvii. 8; Hos. xiii. 15; John iv. 8.—Back, etc. Comp. ii. 27.

XVIII. 18-23.

- 18 And they said: Come, let us devise plans against Jeremiah,
 For the law shall not perish from the priest,
 Nor counsel from the wise,
 Nor the word from the prophet.
 Come, and let us smite him with the tongue,
 And give no heed to any of his words.
- 19 Give thou heed, O Jehovah, to me!
 And listen to the voice of my adversaries.¹
- 20 Shall then evil be recompensed for good,
 For they have digged a pit for my soul?
 Remember how I stood before thee to speak good for them,
 And to turn away thy wrath from them.
- 21 Therefore deliver up their children to famine,
 And give them over to the hands of the sword;
 And let their wives be childless and widowed,
 But let their men be sacrifices of death,
 Their youths be slain by the sword in battle.
- 22 Let a cry be heard from their houses,
 When thou bringest the murderous troop suddenly upon them;
 Because they have digged a pit to take me,
 And laid snares for my feet.
- 23 But thou, O Jehovah, knowest all their murderous plans against me;
 Cover not up their iniquity,
 Nor blot out² their sin before thy face;
 That they may be³ overthrown⁴ before thee;
 And in the time of thy wrath act against them.

³ Ver. 23.—וְהִי־ו. The Chetibh is וְהִי־ו. The Masoretes did not wish the series of jussive or imperative forms to be interrupted.—The word expresses the result, that they lie overthrown. Accordingly this sentence concludes the series of negative petitions; in conclusion follows the positive request: at the time of thy wrath, etc. It is evident that the change proposed by the Keri is unnecessary.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Here, as before, the prophet represents his adversaries as answering his faithful admonitions with words of personal enmity. Comp. xi. 19; xv. 10; xvii. 15. And as in these passages he always prayed that the Lord would avenge him, so here, but in stronger measure. (Vide infra DOCTR. AND ETHICAL No. 13, and the EXEGETICAL rems. on xx. 14). After showing the hostile disposition of his opponents, he turns in supplication to the Lord (vers. 19-23). In this prayer he beseeches the Lord to give heed to his and to his adversaries' speeches (ver. 19), and observe above all that they would recompense good with evil, while he has always sought their highest welfare from God (ver. 20). Therefore the Lord may permit death and destruction to come upon those who have digged a pit and laid snares for him (vers. 21 and 22); he is not to forgive these murderous associates their iniquity, but to overthrow them, and let them feel His anger (ver. 23).

Ver. 18. And they said... any of his words.—Let us devise (וְנִדְבַח) as in xi. 19 coll. xviii. 11.—For the law, etc. The meaning must be: We do not need this Jeremiah, for without him we shall always have priests to instruct us (Mal. ii. 7), wise men to advise us, prophets to proclaim to us the word of the Lord. Comp. Comm. on viii. 8-10; Ezek. vii. 26. It is of course presupposed that the instruction, etc. will be in accordance with their views.—With the tongue. That these smittings with the tongue (comp. ix. 2, 7; Ps. lxiv. 4, etc.) had the death of the prophet for their object is evident from ver. 23.

Vers. 19-23. Give thou heed. . . act against them. Observe the antithesis between Give no heed in ver. 18 and give thou heed in ver. 19.—Shall then evil. On the subject-matter comp. xiv. 7-21; 2 Macc. xv. 12-14. In ver. 14 we read: “ὁ φιλάδελφος οὗτός ἐστιν ὁ πολλὰ προσευχόμενος περὶ τοῦ λαοῦ καὶ τῆς ἀγίας πόλεως, Ἰερემίας ὁ τοῦ θεοῦ προφήτης.”—How I stood. Comp. xv. 1.—Into the hands. This expression is found also in Ps. lxiii. 11; Ezek. xxxv. 5; it is used in the sense of in potestatem, which meaning has various gradations. TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—בִּקְבֵקָה is found as an appellative in 1 Ki. xiv. 3, and as a proper name in Ezr. ii. 51; Neh. vii. 53, coll. בִּקְבֵקָה, Neh. xi. 17; xii. 9, 25. GESENIUS (Thes., I., p. 232 [Lex. s. v.]) derives it from בִּקְק, evacuavit (comp. ver. 7), according to the analogy of בְּרִבְרִים, הַרְחֵר, etc. So also OLSH, § 190, e. [HITZIG renders: a bottle,—NAEGLSB.: a pitcher,—from the maker of earthenware.—S. R. Å.]—יוצר חרש. There is also צִרֵי כֶּכֶל, Isa. xlv. 9 coll. liv. 16, 17. חרש, synonymous with חֶרֶס, is that which has become dry and rough by heat. (Comp. חֶרֶס, scabies a scabiendo, as Kräuze from kratzeln in German.) Deut. xxviii. 27, and חֶרֶס, sun, in Jud. viii. 13; Job ix. 7; then especially the burnt earthenware: חֶרֶס, Lev. vi. 21, etc. חֶרֶס, Lam. iv. 2.

² Ver. 1.—וּמְכַנֵּי. LXX., και ἀξέεις ἀπὸ τῶν πρεσβυτέρων, etc. They certainly did not read וּלְקַחְתָּ, but correctly supplied it from וּקְנִיתָ, for the prophet was not merely to buy the pitcher, but to take it with him. It is a species of very bold constructio praeponens, the verb to be supplied governing not the preposition present in the sentence, but the preposition of a second sentence, connected by ו, to which it forms a predicate. Comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 112, 7.

³ Ver. 2.—שֵׁעַר הַחֲרוֹטִית. The form חֲרוֹטִית is not the later, as HITZIG supposes, but חֲרוֹטִית is the only form used by the Rabbins, and from this both the Keri and the Xapreit (LXX.) or Ἀπριθ (Aqu., Symm., Theod.), of the Greek translators is to be explained. The Syriac text in the London Polyglot strangely has Chadsit.

⁴ Ver. 3.—Comp. 1 Sam. iii. 11; 2 Ki. xxi. 12. As to the construction כֶּל-שְׂמִינִיָּה Partie. absolutum to be resolved into a hypothetical sentence. (Comp. Exod. xii. 15; Numb. xxi. 8; NAEGLSB. Gr., § 97, 2 b); 2. אֲשֶׁר is accusative, attracted by שְׂמִינִיָּה; 3. The apodosis on account of the brevity of the sentence is without the connecting Van. ⁵ Ver. 4.—וַיִּנְכְּרוּ LXX. ἀπηλλοτριώσαν; Vulg., alienum fecerunt. This rendering accords both with the connection and the etymology of the word. The latter occurs in Piel besides only in Deut. xxxii. 7; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7; Job xxi. 24; xxxiv. 19. With the exception of the passages in Job, in which the Piel evidently has the meaning of the Hiphil, the meaning is everywhere appropriate, "to estrange one's self or another."

⁶ Ver. 8.—On the suffix form in כִּפְתָרָה comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 44, 4 Ann. coll. OLSH., § 131, i.

⁷ Ver. 9.—אֲשֶׁר יִצְיִקוּ לָהֶם—wherewith they procure them distress (Deut. xxviii. 53, 55, 57). אֲשֶׁר is the Acc. instrumentalis (comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 70, i.) which to Hiphil, which has the substantive idea contained in the verb with respect to the nearer object (comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 63, 1 Ann. 2; Judg. xvi. 16; Isai. xxix. 2, 7).

⁸ Ver. 13.—לְכָל. לְ is distributive. Comp. Ezek. xlv. 9. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 112, 5 b.

⁹ Ver. 13.—וְהֶכֶן. Comp. rems. on vii. 13; xlv. 17 sqq. coll. xxxii. 23. With respect to the construction, comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 92, 2 a.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet receives the command to buy an other pitcher from the potter, and in company with the elders of the people and priests to betake himself to the valley of Ben-Hinnom, near a gate, which appears here under the name of the Potter's gate (vers. 1 and 2). There he is to proclaim the words which we read in vers. 3-13. In these words a severe divine judgment is first proclaimed in general (ver. 3). Then the crimes are narrated in detail, which the people and the kings of Judah have committed in this place. Then the divine punishments are mentioned, of which the witness and theatre will be the valley of Ben-Hinnom or Tophet: 1. This will be called the Valley of Slaughter, (ver. 6), in consequence of the slaughter, which after the failure of the plans determined on by the people (here the prophet must have made the gesture of pouring out of the pitcher), both the enemy will make among the people, and the people among themselves (vers. 8-9). 2. The people and city shall be broken in pieces, which the prophet indicates by the breaking of the pitcher: Tophet for lack of room shall become a place of interment, and the city, with all the houses on whose roofs offerings have been made to Baal, shall become a place like the desolate and unclean Tophet (vers. 10-13).

Vers. 1 and 2. Thus saith . . . I shall tell thee. This opening is like that in xvii. 19—bottle, Heb. bakbuk, is an earthen pitcher with a long neck. The sound of the word seems to imitate the noise of water being poured out.—Comp. the Greek βῦν βῦζος, βουβιζη, and the German Kutterkrug.—Elders of the priests are mentioned besides only in Isai. xxxvii. 2 (2 Ki. xix. 2). Whether they are identical with the princes or chief of the priests (2 Chron. xxvi. 14; Neh. xii. 7) or only in general the most respectable of the priests is doubtful. Comp. OETLER, in HERZOG, R.-Enc., XII. S. 183.—Valley of Ben-Hinnom. Comp. Comm. on vii. 31 coll. ii. 23.—By the entry (בַּתֵּר), comp. Gen. xviii. 1; Jud. ix. 35, etc. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 70, c.—Potter's gate. 1. concerning the form, comp. TEXTUAL NOTES. 2. As to the meaning, (a) some of the older Rabbins, cited by KIMCHI, who however does not agree with them, are of opinion that the word is to be derived from הָרָם sun, and that by the sun-gate is to be understood the eastern gate of the temple, since there was no gate in the city-wall to the South. So also TREMELLIUS, PISCATOR, J. D. MICHAELIS and HITZIG, but they would have the southern gate of the outer court (a solis æstu sic dictam) understood to be the nearest way to Tophet. (b) The other commentators agree in deriving תֹּפֶת from הָרָם, testa.

But opinions greatly differ whether the gate was so called because the potsherds were thrown out there [the Chaldee paraphrast renders: the dung-gate], or because the potters lived in its vicinity, or because the clay-pits were just outside the gate. The last is the view of HOFMANN (Weiss. u. Erf. II., S. 124, etc. Vid. Comm. on vii. 31). Apart from the etymological signification of the word Tophet, which HOFMANN gives, it is in favor of this interpretation that this same place is called in Matth. xxvii. 7 ἀρχὸς τοῦ κεραμῆως (observe the generic article). This name decidedly favors the supposition that the place stood in closer relation to pottery than that of a mere depository of potsherds. White clay, a kind of pipe-clay, is also still dug there. Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc., V. S. 475; RAUMER, Pal. S. 306. Finally the choice of an earthen pitcher for the prophetic symbol must have been occasioned by the inner relation which the pitcher bore to the place of the action. If it was merely intended to indicate that death and destruction would come upon Jerusalem even so as to fill Tophet with corpses, the breaking and throwing away of any other object would have answered as well. But Jeremiah is to take an earthen pitcher because Tophet was the place where such vessels were produced, consequently nothing was more natural than to choose for this place of breaking an object to be broken which originated there, in connection with which it is not to be denied that other reasons, as the comparatively easy frangibility, and the climax in relation to ch. xviii. (there transformation, here destruction) may have co-operated. And by all this also it is not disputed that the potters may have lived in the vicinity of the clay-pits, and that the same place may have served at the same time for the deposit of potsherds and other refuse. 3. To what gate otherwise known does the pottery-gate correspond? The name occurs here only. The remark on xvii. 19 is here confirmed that the names of the gates of Jerusalem have been often changed. Many commentators proceed, as we have remarked, on the hypothesis that the city wall had no gates to the South. That this is an error will now scarcely be doubted by anyone. Comp. RAUMER, Pal., S. 291. On the southern side of the city were the well-gate [Zion-gate?—S. R. A.] and the dung-gate. Both opened on the Tyropæum, both therefore conducted to Tophet, the former being nearer to this place. But the latter corresponds better to the character of Tophet as an unclean spot, receiving the impurities of the city. Here also the cloaca Betzo disembogued. "The site of this gate," says RAUMER, S. 352, "is the lowest point of the city, to which all the filth of the city and the ravine of Siloah descends."—[Comp. THOMSON, The Land and the Book, II. 497]. A definite conclusion is however not to be reached with respect to things concerning which so much uncertainty still prevails.

Vers. 3-5. And say . . . into my mind. Here it is not recorded, as in xviii. 3, that the prophet performed the command received in vers. 1, 2, and thereupon in the valley of Hinnom received the revelation contained in vers. 3 sqq. For there (ch. xviii.) the revelation to be received was occasioned by the observations made at the potter's (xviii. 3, 4). There is no similar occasion here, so that ver. 3 proceeds at once to communicate the revelation.—And say, reads as though the previous discourse were continued, which cannot be the case on account of I shall tell. We shall not err if we attribute the mode of expression here chosen to the written representation.—Kings of Judah. After, in vers. 4 and 5, the abominations practised in Tophet have been enumerated, the announcement is now made of the corresponding punishments. This announcement, which appears to be a specification of the summary denunciation in ver. 3 b, is made in two stages, of which the first (vers. 6-9) is accompanied by the gesture of pouring out (ver. 7), and the second by the act of breaking (ver. 10).—The days come, etc., ver. 6. Vers. 10-13. Then shalt thou break . . . unto other gods. The second stage of the symbolic action. The progress consists in this, that by the breaking of the pitcher the total ruin of the city and people (therefore not merely of individuals) and by the casting into Tophet its desolation and defilement, or in other words its becoming itself Tophet, is symbolized.—As one breaketh (ver. 11). Though uttered concerning another object, we find the same words verbatim in Deut. xxviii 27, 35.—And they shall bury, etc. Comp. vii. 32. These words being wanting in the LXX., have been suspected. But they stand in a good connection, and correspond to the casting out, by which the pitcher was not merely broken but buried in Tophet. Consequently by this act Tophet is as it were dedicated to the purposes of a cemetery. Jeremiah says interments will be made in Tophet for want of room. This prophecy may have been fulfilled after the destruction of the city by Nebuchadnezzar (comp. xxxii. 29) though we have no positive statements to this effect. But Tophet, having once become a place of burial, must have accomplished this destination afterwards in a significant manner. It is the ἀγορὴ τοῦ κεραιῶος which was bought with the price of blood for the burial-place of pilgrims (Matth. xxvii. 3 sqq.; Acts i. 18, 19). And still at the present day Aeldama is the burial-place of pilgrims dying in Jerusalem; indeed the whole of the valley surrounding Zion on the West and South, on its right side, contains numerous rock sepulchres, a true "Necropolis," says RAUMER. Comp. his Pal., S. 305.—Ver. 12. Thus will I do, etc. The Lord will do to the city as is indicated by the breaking of the pitcher. Thus will Jerusalem become a heap of ruins, and unclean, for the want of room presupposes that even the city itself will be full of corpses. Therefore we find י before לָהֶן = and indeed. Comp. rems. on xvii. 10.—Shall be defiled, (טִמְאָה). [HENDERSON renders: which are polluted, shall be as this place; HITZIG, UMBREIT, NÆGELSBACH: shall be as the place of Tophet, the unclean, or unclean.—S R. A.]. Since the Hebrew in a much higher degree than our modern languages is capable of the constructio ad sensum, since especially an ideal plural is often contained in singular words (comp. 1 Ki. v. 17; 2 Sam. xv. 23. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 105, 2 f.) so the connection of the singular Tophet with טִמְאָה presents in itself no difficulty. Only it is not clear what are the several elements included in the unity of Tophet. HORMANN and others suppose them to be graves. I referred above, on vii. 31, to altars. This word is certainly elsewhere used as feminine. But in respect also to gender, the same ideal construction prevails in the Hebrew. (Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 60, 4). It appears to me therefore that the prophet had here the places of worship in view. These he calls unclean both on account of the abominations practised there, and the defilements caused by Josiah, 2 Ki. xxiii. 10. The other renderings (defiled as the predicate, or as in apposition to houses or to place or another division of the words: טִמְאָה טְבִיאוֹת) are opposed by such strong grammatical objections, that the remaining uncertainty of our explanation is scarce worth consideration in comparison with them. The houses of Jerusalem will however in this sense be like Tophet, that the place where they now stand, will in the future become as desolate and unclean as it.—Upon the roofs. Comp. 2. The opposition and punishment of Pashur.

XIX. 14.—XX. 6.

- 14 Then came Jeremiah [back] from Tophet, whither the LORD [Jehovah] had sent him to prophesy; and he stood in the court of the LORD's [Jehovah's] house; and 15 said to all the people, Thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth], the God of Israel: Behold, I will bring upon this city and upon all her towns all the evil that I have pronounced against it, because they have hardened their necks, that they might not hear my words.
 1 XX. Now Pashur, the son of Immer the priest, who was also chief governor¹ in the house of the LORD, heard [that] Jeremiah prophesied [prophecy] these things.
 2 Then Pashur smote Jeremiah the prophet, and put him in the stocks [prison] that were [was] in the high gate of Benjamin, [the Benjamin-gate, the upper] which was
 3 by [in] the house of the LORD [Jehovah]. And it came to pass on the morrow that Pashur brought forth Jeremiah out of the stocks [prison]. Then said Jeremiah unto him, The LORD [Jehovah] hath not called thy name Pashur, but Magor-missabib,
 4 ["Terror round about"]. For thus saith the LORD [Jehovah], Behold, I will make thee [give thee up] a [to] terror to [for] thyself and to [for] all thy friends: and they shall fall by the sword of their enemies and thine eyes shall behold it: and I will give all Judah into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall carry them
 5 captive into Babylon, and shall slay them with the sword. Moreover I will deliver all the strength [store]² of this city, and all the labours [gains] thereof, and all the precious things thereof, and all the treasures of the kings of Judah will I give into the hand of their enemies, which shall spoil them, and take them, and carry them to 6 Babylon. And thou, Pashur, and all that dwell in thine house, shall go into captivity: and thou shalt come to Babylon, and there thou shalt die, and shalt be buried there, thou, and all thy friends, to whom thou hast prophesied lies.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet betakes himself back from Tophet into the temple, and probably repeats there his predictions of calamity (vers. 14, 15). For this he is struck by Pashur, the governor of the temple, and committed to prison for the night (xx. 1-2). Released from this confinement in the morning, Jeremiah announces to Pashur that the Lord has changed his name to Magor-missabib, for he will be given up a prey to the torments of mortal anguish, his friends shall be slain before his eyes, Judah carried away to Babylon, all its treasures plundered; he himself shall survive all this, and die and be buried in Babylon, the prophet of lies in the midst of those whom he has deceived (vers. 4-6).

Vers. 14, 15. Then came Jeremiah . . . my words. As these words are closely connected with the previous context וַיִּבֶן, ver. 14, corresponds to וַיִּבֶן. In antithesis to וַיִּבֶן however בָּוִב has always the meaning of return. Comp. Numb. xxvii. 17; Deut. xxviii. 6; 1 Chron. xi. 2; Ps. cxxi. 8; cxxvi. 6.—Ver. 15. Thus saith, etc. It is incredible that Jeremiah spoke only these few words in the temple. He would then have said nothing new, and have given no motive to the evidently increased anger of the temple-governor. We must therefore refer all that I have pronounced specially to the words spoken in Tophet, and assume a repetition of these words, in order that the reference might be understood.—I will bring. Comp. 2 Sam. v. 2; Mic. i. 15, etc. OLSH., § 38, c.; § 208, d.—All her towns. Comp. XX. 1-6. Now Pashur heard . . . prophesied lies. According to Ezr. ii. 38; x. 22; Neh. vii. 41, there was a course of priests of the name Pashur. Not of this, however, but of the course named as that of Immer in these passages (comp. 1 Chron. xxiv. 14) was the Pashur of the text. He is not mentioned elsewhere. For though the name frequently occurs (xxi. 1; xxxviii. 1; 1 Chron. ix. 12; Neh. x. 3; xi. 12), none of the individuals designated by it can be regarded as identical with this Pashur. It is at most possible that the father of Gedaliah mentioned in xxxviii. 1 may be the same. Comp. HILZIG, ad loc.—Chief governor. The expression involves that there were several overseers (comp. JOSEPH. Antiqq., X. 8, 5). Without doubt the temple-watch (comp. WINEH, R.-W.-B., Art., Tempel at the end) was under the orders of the "governor." From a comparison of xxix. 25, 26, with lii. 24, it seems that the temple-governor took the second rank to the high-priest. As the head of the temple-police, Pashur now puts Jeremiah into the כַּהֲנֵיכָתָה. The expression occurs besides only in xxix. 26; 2 Chron. xvi. 10. It is without doubt a contrivance for shutting up in a crooked position (στροβιλωπήριον. Symm. πλοδοστράβη). Comp. Acts xvi. 24.—Gate of Benjamin, etc. From xxxvii. 13; xxxviii. 7, it is evident that there was a city-gate which led into the territory of the tribe of Benjamin, and was therefore called the gate of Benjamin. The one mentioned in the text is expressly distinguished from this as a temple-gate. The same name intimates identity of cause. We must then look for this temple-gate also in the direction of Benjamin, i. e., to the north. The upper gate corresponds to the upper court, forming one of the entrances to it. Whether this upper gate of Benjamin is the same with the new gate, leading to the upper court (xxxvi. 10; xxvi. 10) which, according to 2 Kings xv. 35, was built by Jotham, is questionable. Comp. Ezek. viii. 3; xiv. 5; ix. 2.—Not called Pashur, ver. 3. The signification of the name Pashur is very obscure. Most commentators derive the word from the Arabic pasaha=amplius fuit, and פָּשַׁר circumcirca. Hence FERST: extension—around. Others from פֹּשֵׁת, Lev. xiii. 5, 7, and חֹר, Josh. xxix. 22, as though "the widely extended authority of the man, making all pale" (comp. NEUMANN), were indicated. EWALD renders Joy (פֶּשֶׁת or פֶּשֶׁת from פִּישׁ, Mal. iii. 20) around (as though הֹרִי were pronounced חוֹל). MEIER: Spirit of the free (פֶּשֶׁת as in Job xxxv. 15 = extension, high spirit, pride; חֹרֶר = חֹרֶר the noble, the free). HILZIG and GRAF cannot dispute that Jeremiah had the etymology, obscure as it is to us, in view, for how otherwise can we explain the choice of the name which he gave to the priest? It is certainly natural that Pashur should have some meaning opposed to that of the name Magor-missabib. It is noteworthy that the explanation afterwards given in ver. 4, sqq., corresponds exactly to this name, in so far as Pashur seems to be always surrounded by terrors, but never himself brought to extremity, for he is to die and be buried in Babylon (ver. 6). In this sense the words thine eyes shall see, are especially important. For by these the position of a man is designated, who is not himself reached by the most terrible calamity, but is compelled continually to behold how this comes upon others, and therefore does not escape the torture of anxiety. I would therefore neither render לֵךְ thee. after נָרַךְ as distributive (xix. 13), nor would I allow it to depend on the latter, but on קָנַךְ, terror: I give thee up to fear for thyself and thy friends. This is to be the specific punishment of Pashur, that he is not visited by death itself, but by the constant fear of death.—To whom thou hast prophesied lies. From these concluding words we learn that Pashur was active, not merely as a priest, but also as prophet. But his prophetic office was assumed and false; and his behaviour toward Jeremiah may, in part at least, be thus accounted for.

3. APPENDIX.

CHAP. XX. 7-13.

THE PROPHET'S JOY AND SORROW.

This passage contains an outbreak of the deepest sorrow, called forth by the persecutions, whose object Jeremiah was, both in general and specially in the bad treatment just received (xx. 2, 3; comp. xi. 18; xv. 15; xviii. 18 sqq.). The close connection of the passage with the preceding context is evident, as it seems to me from the words Magor-missabib in ver. 10. For the application of this expression to the prophet is certainly most easily explained by the application which he himself had made of it in so pregnant a manner and to so prominent a personage as Pashur. If we further consider that to pass a night in the stocks must have been a fearful torture, and that it was the first time that the prophet had had to suffer bodily ill-treatment, we must admit that the historical epoch was perfectly adapted for the production of such a lamentation. It should, moreover, be observed that there is no superscription or designation of this effusion as "Word of the Lord." From this it follows that the prophet himself ascribes to this passage only a subjective and private character. The passage may be divided into two parts: 1. Vers. 7-13. Here the prophet rises from his lament on account of the persecution which had come upon him against his will to the expression of the most joyful hope. 2. Vers. 14-18. Here the feeling of sorrow, nay of despair, gets the upper hand, and the prophet sinks into a state of the most utter grief and despondency.

XX. 7-13.

- 7 Thou didst persuade me,¹ Jehovah, and I was persuaded:
Thou didst lay hold of me² and didst prevail over me.
I am become a derision daily; every one mocketh me.
- 8 For as often as I speak or cry,³
I must cry concerning violence and ill-treatment;
For the word of Jehovah is made to me a scorn and derision the whole day.
- 9 And if I say,⁴ I will no more make mention of him,
Nor speak henceforth in his name,
It becomes in my heart like a burning fire, shut up⁵ in my bones,
And I weary myself with refraining, and cannot.
- 10 For I hear the talking of many:
Terror round about! "Announce! We will announce it!"
All who are obligated to be at peace with me watch for my halting:—
"Perhaps he will allow himself to be taken!
Then we will overpower him and take our revenge on him."
- 11 But Jehovah is with me as a mighty hero;
Therefore my persecutors will stumble and not prevail.
They shall be grievously put to shame, because they have effected nothing,
With eternal disgrace, which is not forgotten.
- 12 But Jehovah Zebaoth tries justly;⁶ he sees reins and heart.
I shall see thy vengeance on them,
For on thee have I devolved my suit.
- 13 Sing to Jehovah, praise Jehovah,
For he has saved the soul of the poor from the hand of evil doers.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet first calls to mind that he had not thrust himself into the prophetic office, but undertaken it with reluctance (ver. 7 a). That his objections were well founded is shown by the result, for he has reaped nothing in return for his proclamation of the divine word but scorn and derision (vers. 7 b-8). But when he attempted to divest himself of the prophetic vocation, he found this impossible; there was an impulse from within, which burned like a fire and threatened to consume him unless he were relieved (ver. 9). And yet his ministry did not cease to be ruinous to him. He hears how the words of his prophecy, as "Terror round about" (xx. 3), are turned against him in derision, and used in denunciation of the prophet. Yea, even such as should be well disposed towards him watched curiously to spy out some false step, by which they might obtain the satisfaction of their feeling of revenge (ver. 10). He then consoles himself with the hope that everlasting shame will be the portion of his enemies (ver. 11), and that he will be avenged by God, the true knower of hearts (ver. 12). Finally in the anticipation of being heard, he breaks out into a summons to praise God as the Saviour of the poor (ver. 13).

Vers. 7 and 8. Thou didst persuade him . . . the whole day. On the subject-matter, comp. i. 5 sqq.

Ver. 9. And if I say . . . and cannot. The prophet describes his experience, when, having undertaken the prophetic calling, he attempts to escape from it. He had the feeling as if a fire were burning within him, which having no outlet would consume him, to which, therefore, he was obliged to give an outlet by expressing what was inwardly communicated to him. Comp. vi. 11; Am. iii. 8.—I weary myself. Comp. ix. 4; xv. 6.

Vers. 10-13. For I hear . . . evil-doers. כִּי For in ver. 10, cannot possibly refer immediately to ver. 9. It rather presupposes a similar thought to that to which the parallel כִּי in ver. 8 refers, and which is contained in ver. 7 b. We must, therefore, supply after ver. 9 a thought of this kind; since the cause remains, the effect also remains (namely, that indicated in 7 b). How far this is the case, is shown in the following sentence.—Talk, אִתְּךָ is fama, rumor, public talk, report (comp. Gen. xxxvii. 2; Num. xiii. 32; xiv. 36, 37; Prov. x. 18; xxv. 10). That it is a secretly circulated, softly whispered rumor, neither follows from the etymology (which is pretty uncertain; comp. FURST'S Concordance with his Lexicon), nor from the connection of the passage where it occurs.—Terror, etc. Magor-missabib. The expression occurs in vi. 25; afterwards also in xlvi. 5; xlix. 29 coll. Lam. ii. 22, besides Ps. xxxi. 14. Since the discourse to which vi. 25 belongs, is older than ch. xix. and xx., the prophet did not use the expression in xx. 3 for the first time, but only as a repetition of one previously used. In this passage the expression may be understood as only an ironical quotation. For 1. The form of the expression is not such that it can be designated as a popular form of threatening. מַגּוֹר, magor, is not only a comparatively rare word, but one which belongs exclusively to poetic and prophetic phraseology; it occurs only eight times in the Old Testament, and except once in Isa. (xxxii. 9 in another connection), only in the formula here used, six times in Jeremiah and in Ps. xxxi. 14. 2. The expression is evidently one peculiar to Jeremiah, as is clear from what has been stated; in addition to which may be remarked, that Ps. xxxi. contains so many elements peculiar to the style of Jeremiah or related to it, that the question whether Jeremiah was not its author is fully justified. As it can scarcely be doubted that those scoffers applied his own phrase to the prophet, it is further in the highest degree probable that they did this from an occasion on which it had been used by the prophet not by the way, but in a pregnant manner. This latter was, however, the case when Jeremiah changed the name of so important a personage as Pashur into Magor-missabib. The question is of subordinate interest in what sense they applied the expression to the prophet; whether it was as a menace against him, or as a reproach for his hostile disposition towards the community. Probably they wished to unite both.—All who are obligated, etc. Comp. xxii. 22; Ob. 8; Psalm xli. 10.—

Watch for my halting. צַלְעֵי in the meaning of "side," according to which "who cover my side" would be in apposition.—Friends [literally: men of my peace], from the want of a predicate, gives no sense [though adopted by SCHMID, SCHNURER, EICHORN, and GEBELIUS]. Doubtless it is, as in Ps. xxxv. 15, claudicatio, tottering, making a false step. For שָׁבַר in the sense of "to watch for, to lie in wait," see Ps. lvi. 7; lxxi. 10; Job x. 14; xiii. 27.—Overpower him. Comp. i. 19; xv. 20.—My persecutors. Comp. xv. 15; xvii. 18.—Not prevail. Comp. v. 22; iii. 5.—Effect nothing. Comp. Comm. on x. 21.—Eternal disgrace. Comp.

xxiii. 40.—But Jehovah (ver. 12). Comp. xi. 20.—Justly, פְּרָצָה might be accusative. But from the parallel with xi. 20, we perceive that it is intended to define more particularly the action predicated. The sense is also more satisfactory, if it is not merely said, what the Lord sees, but also how He sees it.—Sing, etc. A hymn of the hopeful man, who by faith possesses that which is still future (Heb. xi. 1).

b. For the present nothing but sorrow: The prophet curses the day of his birth.

XX. 14-18.

- 14 Cursed be the day wherein I was begotten!
Let not the day, wherein my mother bare me, be blessed!
- 15 Cursed be the man who brought tidings to my father, saying,
A son is born to thee, a man-child!—making him very glad.
- 16 And let that man be as the cities which the Lord overthrew without mercy,
And let him hear the cry in the morning and alarm of war at noontide,
- 17 Because he slew me not in the womb;
So that my mother might have been my grave,
And her womb have remained always gravid.
- 18 Wherefore came I forth from the womb,
To see labour and sorrow and my days consumed in shame?

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet curses the day of his begetting and the day of his birth (ver. 14). He further curses the man, who brought to his father the first news of his birth (ver. 15). He wishes that this man may be like Sodom and Gomorrah (ver. 16), because he did not kill him in the womb and thus prevent his birth (ver. 17). Finally he breaks out again into a lamentation:—O why must I be born to a life of misery and shame (ver. 18)? Two questions here arise. 1. Is such a cursing in the mouth of a prophet to be justified? 2. Is it in place in this connection immediately after the hopeful words in vers. 11-13? As to the first question, as a preliminary all those arbitrary interpretations are to be rejected, which understand by the day which Jeremiah curses, not the day of his birth, but some other day, especially some future day, as that of the destruction of Jerusalem (as according to Jerome the older Rabbins),—or which suppose that Jeremiah speaks not in his own name, but in the name of others (perditorum hominum),—or which suppose that Jeremiah complains here not of external but internal trials, or of the perversity of the people (Calvix), or that he gives an account of a trial which he had endured previously (in explanation of אֲבִיָּי, ver. 13, on account of which אֲשֶׁר אֲכַרְתִּי אֲשֶׁר or אֲכַר is to be supplied before ver. 14. SEB. SCHMIDT). It should be observed that this entire passage from ver. 7 onwards, is not proclaimed by the prophet as a word of Jehovah (Comp. 1 Cor. vii. 25). He gives us merely a true reflex of his human feeling. Who can dispute the possibility of a man like Jeremiah having such temptations of indignation and despair? Is it not human? Do the men of God cease to be men? Think of that man of God, Job, whose words evidently (iii. 3 sqq.) hovered before the mind of the prophet. It is further to be observed, that the cursing is merely a rhetorical form. It has no object. The long past day of his birth is as little an object, to which the curse might really attach itself as the man who announced to the father the birth of his son,—who in reality, probably, never existed. For were men witnesses of confinements? Is it not of purpose that the prophet speaks of a man, and not of a woman? Therefore CUNYSTON says concerning Job: "inanimatis facit injuriam" (GUTH. II., S. 523). Finally, however, it must be admitted, as SEN. SCHMIDT sets forth, that it manifests an infirmity on the part of the prophet. FÖRSTER even says: "Grande hoc et inexcusabile prophete peccatum est." And indeed the sinfulness of it consists partly in the high degree of impatience and ill-humor, which is here manifested, and partly in the form in which it displays itself. If this may be regarded as rhetorical hyperbole, yet this mode of expression is not New Testament, Christian, evangelical. We find here, too, somewhat of the spirit of the Ben-Hargem, to whom Christ said: Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of (Luke ix. 55). Comp. the DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL remarks on xviii. 20. The second question, whether this outbreak of indignation suits the connection, or is supposable as following vers. 11-13, is answered by many in the negative. EWALD even places vers. 14-18 before ver. 7. GUTH regards it as an independent fragment, a further development of xv. 10, which is placed here only on account of its agreement in purport with vers. 7-10. Now it must certainly be admitted that an outbreak of ill-humor such as this, after ver. 13, is in a high degree remarkable. But observe the following points: 1. It is not necessary to suppose that vers. 14-18 contain the expression of a state of mind, which followed immediately on that joyous state described in the previous context. There may have been a pause, a transition. None the less does the prophet portray the occurrences in his own mind with perfect correctness. He gives us to understand that his state of comfort did not long continue, but soon made way for its opposite. 2. This arrangement of the psychological tableaux corresponds also to the course of history: the prophet never attained in this life to the enjoyment of outward peace. If he had now and then a moment of rest and of hope, it was soon past. Ver. 18 corresponds only too exactly to the actual tenor of his life.

Ver. 14. Cursed be the day . . . be blessed. Even R. SALOMO and ABARBANEL, in order to avoid tautology took יָרֵרָה in the sense of bejet. They add that Jeremiah was begotten on the day that Manasseh killed the prophets of the Lord (2 Kings xxi. 16). Moreover comp. xv. 10; Job iii. 3 sqq.

Vers. 15-18. Cursed be the man . . . consumed in shame. The Rabbins say this man was Pashur.—Brought tidings בָּשָׂר with accusatives of the person, 1 Sam. xxxi. 9; 2 Sam. xviii. 19.—As the cities, etc. Allusion to Gen. xix. 25.—In the morning . . . at noontide = unceasingly, without any breathing pause. Comp. Ps. lv. 18.—In [A. V.: from] the womb. כִּרְחֵם. Comp. Job iii. 11. The preposition כִּן on account of the following sentence, cannot be = from-away, but is used here in accordance with that idiom, by which the terminus a quo is used for the terminus in quo, or in quem. Comp. נִקְרָם, eastwards. Gen. xi. 2. [Eng. Vers. "from the east"—S. R. A.] נָס מִפְּרָחֶק he flees into the distance. Isa. xvii. 13; Prov. vii. 19; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5 d. The man may be regarded equally well with Jehovah [HENDERSON], as the subject of slew, especially if we remember that the whole description is not of a historical but rhetorical character. Comp. Ps. xxxi. 10. ["While destitute of the sublime imagery employed by Job, this passage is not surpassed in pathos; there is a unity and condensation throughout, which heighten its poetical beauty." DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xviii. 2. "What is the prophet of God to learn in the house of the potter? How shall this be his Bible or his school? But God chooses the foolish things to confound human wisdom (1 Cor. i. 27)." CRAMER. ["An orator would never choose such an instance for the purpose of making an impression on his audience; still less for the purpose of exhibiting his own skill and liveliness. It must be for business, not for amusement, that such a process is observed."—"What we want in every occupation is some means of preserving the continuity of our thoughts, some resistance to the influences which are continually distracting and dissipating them. But it is especially the student of the events of his own time, of the laws which regulate them, of the issues which are to proceed from them, who has need to be reminded that he is not studying a number of loose disconnected phenomena, but is tracing a principle under different aspects and through different manifestations. A sensible illustration, if we would condescend to avail ourselves of it, would often save us from much vagueness and unreality, as well as from hasty and unsatisfactory conclusions." MAURICE.—S. R. A.]

2. On xviii. 6 sqq. Omne simile claudicat. Man is not clay, though he is made of clay (Gen. ii. 7). Consequently in vers. 8 and 10 the moral conditions are mentioned, which by virtue of his personality and freedom must be fulfilled on the part of man, in order that the divine transformation to good or bad may take place. If the clay is spoiled on the wheel, it cannot help it. It is probably only the potter's fault. Nothing then is here symbolized but the omnipotence of God, by virtue of which He can in any given case suppress whole kingdoms and nations, and transform them with the same ease and rapidity as the potter rolls up the spoiled vessel into a ball of clay, and immediately gives it a new form. It would be well for all to convince themselves, by witnessing the process, of the wonderful ease with which the potter forms the clay on the wheel.

3. On xviii. 6-10. "Cogitet unusquisque peccata sua, et modo illa emendet, cum tempus est. Sit fructuosus dolor, non sit sterilis pœnitudo. Tanquam hoc dicit Deus, ecce indicavi sententiam, sed nondum protuli. Prædicti non facti. Quid times, quia dixi? Si mutaveris, mutatur. Nam scriptum est, quod pœniteat Deum. Numquid quomodo hominem sic pœnitit Deum? Nam dictum est: si pœniterit vos de peccatis vestris, pœnitet me de omnibus malis, quæ facturus eram vobis. Numquid quasi errantem pœnitit Deum? Sed pœnitentiâ dicitur in Deo mutatio sententiæ. Non est iniqua, sed justa. Quare justa? Mutatus est reus, mutavit iudex sententiam. Noli terri. Sententiâ mutata est, non justitia. Justitiâ integra manet, quia mutato debet parere, quia justus est. Quomodo pertinaci non parit, sic mutato parit." AUGUSTIN, Sermo 109. De Tem. ad medium.

4. On xviii. 6-10. "Comminationes Dei non intelligendæ sunt absolute, sed cum exceptione pœnitentiæ et conditione impenitentis. Promissiones idem non sunt absolute sed circumscriptæ cum conditione obedientiæ, tum exceptione crucis. God stipulates everywhere for the cross." Comp. Deut. xxviii. FÖRSTER.

5. On xviii. 6-10. "Præscientia et predictio Dei non injicit absolutum eventus necessitatem rebus præscitis ac predictis." FÖRSTER.

6. On xviii. 8. "O felix pœnitentium humilitas! Quam potes es apud omnipotentem." BERNARD of Clairvaux.

[On xviii. 8-10. "I apprehend that we shall learn some day that the call to individual repentance, and the promise of individual reformation, has been feeble at one time, productive of turbulent, violent, transitory effects at another, because it has not been part of a call to national repentance, because it has not been connected with a promise of national reformation. We may appeal to men by the terrors of a future state; we may use all the machinery of revivalists to awaken them to a concern for their souls; we may produce in that way a class of religious men who pursue an object which other men do not pursue (scarcely a less selfish, often not a less outward object):—who leave the world to take its own course;—who, when they mingle in it, as in time they must do for the sake of business and gain, adopt again its own maxims, and become less righteous than other men in common affairs, because they consider religion too fine a thing to be brought from the clouds to the earth, while yet they do not recognise a lower principle as binding on them. But we must speak again the ancient language, that God has made a covenant with the nation, and that all citizens are subjects of an unseen and righteous King, if we would have a hearty, inward repentance, which will really bring us back to God; which will turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and of the children to the fathers; which will go down to the roots of our life, changing it from a self-seeking life into a life of humility and love and cheerful obedience; which will bear fruit upwards, giving nobleness to our policy and literature and art, to the daily routine of what we shall no more dare to call our secular existence." MAURICE.—S. R. A.]

7. On xviii. 10. "God writes as it were a reflection in our heart of that which we have to furnish to Him. For God is disposed towards us as we are disposed towards Him. If we do well, He does well to us; if we love Him, He loves us in return; if we forsake Him, He forsakes us. Ps. xviii. 26." CRAMER. ["Sin is the great mischief maker between God and a people; it forfeits the benefits of His promises, and spoils the success of their prayers. It defeats His kind intentions concerning them (Hos. vii. 1), and baffles their pleasing expectations from Him. It ruins their comforts, prolongs their grievances, brings them into straits, and retards their deliverances. Is. xlix. 1, 2." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

8. On xviii. 12. "Freedom of the Spirit! Who will allow himself to be brought into bondage by the gloomy words of that singular man, Jeremiah? Every one must be able to live according to his own way of thinking." DIETRICH, The prophet Jeremiah and Ezekiel briefly expounded. 1863, S. 59.—This is the watchword of impiety in all times. If in truth every one bears the divinity within him, then it is justified. But since every man bears within him only a θεῖόν γὰρ, a divine germ or spark, a point of connection for the objectively divine, and at the same time a point of connection for the diabolical, it is a hellish deception when one supposes he must follow his ingenium. For the question is, whether the voice from within is the voice of God or the voice of the devil. Here it is necessary to try ourselves and to open an entrance to the divine sun of life, so that the divine life-germ in us may be strengthened, and enabled to maintain its true authority.

9. On xviii. 11. On the summits of the high mountains, even in tropical countries, the snow does not entirely melt, and therefore the mighty cool springs at their feet never dry up. With those men only does the pure white snow of divine knowledge and godly fear never melt, whose heads are elevated above the steam and vapor of earthly cares and passions, into the pure clear air of heaven. And they it is, from whose bodies flow streams of living water (John vii. 38).

10. On xviii. 18. Consult the treatise of Luther: How a minister should behave when his office is despised?

11. On xviii. 18. (Come and let us smite him with the tongue, etc.). "It is indeed uncertain whether this is said by the preachers or by the whole people; but this is certain, that such actions are performed daily by those teachers, who know no other way of stopping the mouth of a servant of Jesus. 'And not give heed to any of his words.' This is au pis aller. If we can do him no harm, we will stop our ears, and he shall not convince us." ZINZENDORF.

12. On xviii. 19. (Give heed to me, O Lord). "This takes place in two ways. A teacher is looked at by the eye which is as flames of fire. He is also guided by the same eye, which looks on all lands, to strengthen those whose hearts are towards the Lord. No child can rest more securely in the cradle, while the nurse is looking for any fly that might disturb it, than a servant of the Lord can, to whom God gives heed." ZINZENDORF.

13. On xviii. 20. "It is a pleasing remembrance, when a teacher considers that he has been able to avert divine judgments from his people. It is also an undeniable duty. The spirit of Job, Moses, Jeremiah, Ezra, Nehemiah, Paul in this respect is the true spirit of Jesus Christ. He is a miserable shepherd who can give up his sheep and look on with dry eyes, while the fold is being devastated. Not to mention that teachers are now-a-days, by the salaries which they receive from their congregations, brought into the relation of servitude, and besides the regular obligation of the head are laid under indebtedness, as hospitals and other institutions, to pray for their founders. They give themselves the name of intercessors and thus bind themselves anew to this otherwise universal duty of all teachers." ZINZENDORF. But when the servant of God receives "odium pro labore, persecutio pro intercessione," this is "the world's gratitude and gratuity." FÖRSTER.

14. On xviii. 21-23. With regard to this prayer against his enemies CALVIN remarks, "this vehemence, as it was dictated by the Holy Spirit, is not to be condemned, nor ought it to be made an example of, for it was peculiar to the Prophet to know that they were reprobates." For the prophet, he says, was (1) "endued with the spirit of wisdom and judgment, and (2) zeal also for God's glory so ruled in his heart, that the feelings of the flesh were wholly subdued, or at least brought under subjection; and farther, he pleaded not a private cause.—As all these things fall not to our lot, we ought not indiscriminately to imitate Jeremiah in this prayer: for that would then apply to us which Christ said to His disciples, 'Ye know not what spirit governs you (Luke ix. 55).'" In general the older Comm. agree in this. OECOLAMPADIUS says tersely: "Subscribit sententia divina." FÖRSTER also says that originally such a prayer is not allowed, but that to the prophet, who by the divine inspiration was certain of the "obstinata et plane insanabilis malitia" of his hearers, it was permitted as "singulare et extraordinarium aliquid." The Hirschberger Bibel also explains the words as a consignment to the divine judgment, since God Himself has several times refused to hear prayer in their behalf (xiv. 13, 14), and they themselves could not endure it (ver. 18). Vide NEUMANN II. S. 15.—SEB. SCHMIDT says plainly, "Licet hominibus impis et persecutoribus imprecari malum, modo ejusmodi imprecationes non fiant ex privata vindicta, sed conditionate sint ad constantem eorum impietatem. Nisi enim ejusmodi imprecationes etiam piis essent licite, propheta non imprecatus esset persecutoribus gravissimam pœnam hanc." I believe that it is above all to be observed that Jeremiah does not announce these words (vers. 18-23) as the word of Jehovah. It is a prayer to the Lord, like xx. 7-18. That which was remarked on xx. 14-18, on the Old Testament character of the prayer, applies here also and in a higher degree. For here as there we may set a good share of the harshness to the account of the rhetoric. The standard of judgment may be found in Matt. v. 43. Many ancient Comm. ex. gr. JEROME, who regard the suffering prophet as a type of the suffering Saviour, point out the contrast between this prayer of Jeremiah's against his enemies and the prayer of Christ for His enemies (Luke xxiii. 34). The only parallel adduced from the New Testament is 2 Tim. iv. 4. But there it is ἀποδώσει (according to the correct reading of TISCHENDORF) not ἀποδώ (Text. Rec., KNAPP).

15. On xix. 1. "If man were only a Platonic ἀνάνθρωπος, and did not dwell in the flesh, but were pure spirit and soul, as the Schwenkfelder dreamed a man might be, he would not need such visible signs.—But because man consists of body and soul, God uses, together with the Holy Ghost, the word and Sacrament and other signs." CRAMER.

17. On xix. 10, 11. What is more easily broken in pieces than an earthen vessel? Equally easy is it for the hand of the Almighty to break in pieces the kingdoms of men. And if He spared not the kingdom of Judah, whose king was a son of David and the people the chosen nation, shall He spare the kingdoms of the heathen, none of which can point to any prophecy in its behalf, like that which we read in 2 Sam. vii. 16? Comp. Dan. ii. 21; iv. 14, 22, 29; v. 21; Eccles. x. 4, 8, 10, 14.

18. On xix. 11-13. This prophecy was not completely fulfilled by the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar. For Jerusalem was restored after this destruction. The second destruction, by the Romans, must then be regarded as the definitive fulfillment. Comp. JEROME ad loc.—Tophet was used by the inhabitants of Jerusalem for idolatrous purposes. In consequence, the fires of Tophet set Jerusalem on fire, and again the corpses which filled Jerusalem extended even to Tophet, and by reciprocal calamity Tophet became like Jerusalem and Jerusalem like Tophet.

19. On xx. 1, 2. "Πρώων τέκνα πῆματα. Honoris mutant mores." FÖRSTER. "Quod hic fuit tormentum, illic erit ornamentum." AUGUSTIN.

20. On xx. 3-6. "Mark, who is the stronger here: Pashur or Jeremiah? For 1. Jeremiah overcomes his sufferings by patience; 2. He is firm in opposition to his enemy and does not allow himself to be terrified by his tyranny, but rebukes him to his face for his sins and lies." CRAMER.

21. On xx. 3-6. Pashur's punishment consists in this, that he will participate in the terrible affliction and be a witness of it, without being able to die.—He is a type of the wandering Jew.

22. On xx. 7-12. The prophet could say with a good conscience that he had not pressed into this office. It was his greatest comfort that the Lord had persuaded and overpowered him, when resisting, and that afterwards the fire within kindled by the Lord compelled him to speak. Thus he at last becomes so joyful, that in the midst of his sufferings he sings a hymn on his deliverance.

Lord Jesus, for Thy work divine,
The glory is not ours, but Thine;
Therefore we pray Thee stand by those,
Who calmly on Thy word repose.

23. On xx. 14-18. "When the saints stumble this serves to us; 1. for doctrine: we see that no man is justified by his own merits; 2. for ἔλεγχος, i. e. for the refutation of those, who suppose that there are ἀναύρητοι; 3. for ἐπανόρθωσις, if we follow AMBROSE, who called to the emperor Theodosius: 'Si Davidem imitatus es peccantem, imitare etiam penitentem;'
4. for παιδεία, that he who stands take heed that he do not fall; 5. for παρηγορία, that he who has fallen may after their pattern rise again." FÖRSTER.

24. On xx. 17, 18. "The question is, Does a man do right in wishing himself dead? Answer: He who from impatience wishes himself dead like Job, Elijah, Jonah, Tobias, and here Jeremiah, does wrong, and this is a piece of carnal impatience. But when we think of the wicked world and the dangerous times in which we live and on the other hand of the future joy and glory, and therefore desire with Simeon and Paul to be released, we are not to be blamed." CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. The 18th homily of ORIGEN has for its text xviii. 1-16 and xx. 1-7. The 19th has xx. 7-12.

2. On xviii. 1-11. Comfort and warning, implied in the fact that the threatenings and promises of the Lord are given only conditionally: 1. The comfort consists in this, that the threatened calamities may be averted by timely repentance. 2. The warning in this, that the promises may be annulled by apostasy.

3. On xviii. 7-10. Comp. the HOMILETICAL on xvii. 5-8.

5. [On xviii. 12. "The sin, danger and unreasonableness of despair. The devil's chief artifices are to produce either false security and presumption or despair. Despair is 1. sinful, (a) in itself, (b) because it is the parent of other sins, as is seen in the cases of Cain, Saul, and Judas. 2. It is dangerous. 3. It is groundless, because (a) we still enjoy life and the means of grace, (b) of the long-suffering character of God, (c) of the universality of the scheme of redemption, (d) of the person, character and invitations of Christ, (e) of many instances of final salvation." PAYSON.—S. R. A.]

6. On xviii. 18-20. Text for a Sermon on the Anniversary of the Reformation. Opposition of the office which has apparent authority to that which has true authority; 1. The basis of the opposition: the assertion of the infallibility of the former office. 2. The mode of the opposition; (a) in not being willing to hear, (b) in the attempt to destroy the latter by violence. 3. The result of the opposition is nugatory, for (a) the Lord hears the voice of the opposers to judge them, (b) He gives heed to His servants to protect them.

7. On xx. 7-13. The trial and comfort of a true minister of the Word; 1. The trial: (a) scorn and derision; (b) actual persecution. 2. The comfort: (a) the Lord put him in office and maintains him in it; (b) that the Lord will interpose for His servants and thus, (1) help His cause to victory, and (2) save their persons.

8. THE EIGHTH DISCOURSE (AGAINST THE WICKED SHEPHERDS).

(CHAPS. XXI.—XXIV.)

In designating this portion of the book a discourse we do so only a potiori. For neither is it purely of the nature of a discourse, nor does it form ONE discourse, i. e., a connected rhetorical whole. The different portions of it, partly of historical, partly of rhetorical character, and pertaining to very different epochs, are however comprised under a common title, such as in Jeremiah is usually prefixed to the greater sections. These portions contain in general the same fundamental thought, viz., that which is stated in the title, "Against wicked Shepherds." By these wicked shepherds are to be understood all the leaders of the people, kings and prophets (and priests, xxiii. 11). The main trunk is formed by the powerful speech against Jehoiakim (xxii. 1-9, 13-23; xxiii. 1-8), which Jeremiah addressed to that violent despot before the gate of his palace, in presence of his court and the people. Around this discourse, enclosing it and interwoven with it, are grouped other portions of similar character. Originally a brief passage (xxi. 11-14) was prefixed to this discourse, on account of its purport, in which it is intimately related to xxii. 3-7 (comp. the Comm. on xxi. 11-14). This passage could not be subjoined after xxii. 9, because here the personal addresses connected with the words spoken to Jehoiakim, xxii. 13-19, had to be inserted, and after xxii. 30, the distance would be too great from the discourse to which it is related, xxii. 3-7. The passage xxi. 1-10 had to be placed before xxi. 11, although as to time the latest in the whole compass of chh. xxi.—xxiv. because in it a Pashur is spoken of. By this it seemed to be connected with ch. xx., in which also a Pashur plays the chief part. XXII. 13-23 followed originally immediately after xxii. 9 (comp. the preliminary remarks to xxii. 13-19). But since there was a brief passage, referring to Shallum-Jehoahaz (xxii. 10-12) the immediate predecessor of Jehoiakim, this had to be placed before xxii. 13. After xxii. 23 the passage referring to Jehoiakim (xxii. 24-30) naturally found its position. The passage xxiii. 1-8 followed finally as the original conclusion of the speech addressed to Jehoiakim, and as a consolatory glance into the future after the dark portraits of the kings of the present. From xxiii. 9-40 follows then the connected discourse against the false prophets. This was by no means delivered on the same day and in the same place as the discourse against Jehoiakim, xxii. 1—xxiii. 8. It may however in general belong to the same period, viz., the first four years of the reign of Jehoiakim, since there is no mention of the Chaldeans, and the reign of Josiah gave much less occasion for such a discourse. Chap. xxiv. finally corresponds to "the punitive judgments on the three predecessors of Zedekiah, and completes the judgment on the corrupt pastors and leaders of the people" (GRAF). The reason why this chapter was not inserted immediately after xxii. 30 is that it treats its subject in a form quite peculiar and different from the style of ch. xxii. It would accordingly appear too much like a foreign element after xxii. 30.

If accordingly we cannot speak of this discourse as one properly and logically concatenated, yet we may recognize a certain orderly arrangement of its individual parts. This will be manifest in the following synopsis:—

1. The king's question and the prophet's consolatory answer

XXI. 1-7.

1 The word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD [Jehovah] when king Ze-
 2 dekiah [] the priest, saying, Inquire, I pray thee, of the LORD [Jehovah] for us, for Nebuchadrezzar,¹ king of Babylon, maketh war against us; if so be that [perhaps] the LORD [Jehovah] will deal with us according to all his wondrous works, that he 3 may go up [withdraw] from us. Then said Jeremiah unto them, Thus shall ye say 4 to Zedekiah: Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah] God of Israel: Behold, I will turn back the weapons of war that are in your hands, wherewith ye fight against the king of Babylon, and against the Chaldeans, which besiege you without the walls [or your walls from without] and I will assemble [withdraw] them into the midst of this city.
 5 And I myself will fight against you, with an outstretched hand and a strong arm, 6 even in anger and in great fury, and in great wrath. And I will smite the inhabi-7 tants of this city, both man and beast: they shall die of a great pestilence. And afterward, saith the LORD [Jehovah] I will deliver Zedekiah, king of Judah, and his servants, and the people, and such as are left² in this city from the pestilence, from the sword, and from the famine, into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, and into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of those that seek their life: and he shall smite them with the edge of the sword, he shall not spare them, neither have pity, nor have mercy.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 2.—On the form of the name נְבֻכַדְרֶצְצָר comp. rems. on xxv. 1.

² Ver. 7.—The יְנִי here is logically incorrect, since after the general term THE PEOPLE, other survivors are not sup-possible. The LXX. omits it (καὶ τὸν λαὸν καταλειφθέντο). Comp. viii. 3; xxiv. 8; xxxviii. 4; xxxix. 9; xl. 6; xli. 10;
 lii. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

To the petition of King Zedekiah that the prophet would seek for them the interposition of Jehovah against Nebuchadnezzar (vers. 1, 2), the prophet answers that the Lord will cause the defenders of the city to retreat before the Chal-deans (vers. 3, 4), yea, will Himself contend against them with a great pestilence (vers. 5, 6), and will then surrender the survivors of the sword, famine and pestilence (among whom will be the king himself and his servants) to king Nebuchadnezzar, who will slay them without mercy by the sword (ver. 7).

Vers. 1, 2. The word which came . . .
 withdraw from us. The beginning is l. ke vii.
 1. Comp. ad hoc loc.—Pashur, the son of Mal-kiah, is also mentioned in xxxviii. 1.—Zephaniah, the son of Maaseiah, xxix. 25; xxxvii. 3; lii. 24. Both were priests (Malkiah and Ma-seiah are also names of courses of priests, 1 Chron. xxiv. 9-18); the latter כֹּהֵן גָּדוֹל the next after the high-priest (lii. 24). The embassy was therefore a respectable one.—Zedekiah sent once again with the same object to the prophet: xxxvii. 3. Comp. also Isai. xxxvii. 2sq.—On the relation of time Vide Comm. on xxxvii. 23.—Inquire, etc. The prophet was not merely to ask what will be done, but also to pray that whatever would serve for deliverance may be done, as is evident from perhaps Jehovah, etc. In xxxvii. 3 it is “Pray for us.” Comp. xlii. 2.—That he may go up from us. Comp. 1 Sam. vi. 20; 1 Ki. xv. 19; Jer. xxxvii. 5, 11. The figure of a person thrown down, from whom his vanquisher raises himself, lies at the basis of this expression. [HENDERSON: “The phrase means to recede from the incumbent attitude assumed by a besieging army.”—S. R. A.]

Vers. 3-7. Then said Jeremiah . . . have mercy. From the words in the midst of the city it is evident that the prophet places the line of defence within the walls. Thus the enemy presses the Jews no longer without but within the walls, and certainly the city is then as good as taken. This however is just what the prophet wished them to understand. I believe therefore that without the walls is to be referred not to turn back nor to fight, but to besiege.—Assemble. Comp. xvi. 5; Joel ii. 10; iv. 15.—Outstretched hand. Comp. Deut. iv. 34; v. 15; xxvi. 8. It should be remarked that everywhere else, with the exception of the formula “and his hand is stretched out still” (Isai. v. 25; ix. 11, 16, 20; x. 4 coll. 1 Chron. xxi. 16), outstretched is the adjective used with אֶרֶץ arm, and יָד mighty, with כַּף hand.—With anger, etc. Comp. xxxii. 27; Deut. xxix. 27.—With the edge of the sword. In Jeremiah here only.—Not spare them. Comp. xiii. 11.

XXI. 8-10.

8 And unto this people thou shalt say, Thus saith the LORD: Behold, I set before 9 you the way of life, and the way of death. He that abideth [remains] in this city shall die by the sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth out and falleth¹ to the Chaldeans that besiege you, he shall live,² and his life shall 10 be unto him for a prey. For I have set my face against this city for evil, and not for good, saith the LORD [Jehovah], it shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire.

² Ver. 9.—The Keri וְחַיָּה is here, as in xxxviii. 2, unnecessary. וְחַיָּה, corresponding to וְחַיָּה in hemistich a, is more correct.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

It is announced to the people that the life and death of individuals depends on whether they give themselves up to the Chaldeans or not (vers. 8, 9), for the destruction of the city by Nebuchadnezzar is irrevocably determined upon, (ver. 10). These words are closely connected both in form and in matter with the previous context. It is entirely appropriate that the prophet after having informed the ruler what the result of his military operations would be, announces also to the people or to individuals, what is alone left them to do for their escape. GRAF is correct in saying (p. 259), that the summons contained in vers. 8-10 could not have been addressed to the king's embassy. Nevertheless their form and purport testify to their having been addressed to the people contemporaneously with that answer to the king. It is not opposed to this that Jeremiah gave the same advice repeatedly on other occasions. (Comp. xvii. 11, 17).

Vers. 8-10. And unto this people . . . burn it with fire.—Unto this people, etc., corresponds to and thus shall ye say to Zedekiah in ver. 3, but not as being a part of the answer given to the king. But after the application, ver. 2, had been received by the prophet, a triple divine word was communicated to him. It is not expressly declared that this was the case, but this is the natural and necessary presupposition to the prophetic declarations, communicated in vers. 3-7, 8-10, 11-14.—I set before you, etc. The prophet evidently has in mind Deut. xi. 26, 27; xxx. 15, 16.—He that remains, etc. Comp. xxxviii. 2 and the Introd. to the 8th discourse. It is evident that to the prophet the will of God was of more importance than that which according to the limited view of man is required by the honor and interest of his country, so that by obedience to the former this honor and interest are best secured.—Falleth to the Chaldeans. Comp. xxxvii. 13, 14; xxxix. 9.—I have set my face (ver. 10). 11 And touching [to] the house of the king of Judah, say, Hear ye the word of the 12 LORD [Jehovah]; O house of David, thus saith the LORD [Jehovah]. Execute judgment [judge righteously]¹ in the [every]² morning, and deliver him that is 13 spoiled out of the hand of the oppressor, lest my fury go out like fire, and burn that

 14 say, Who shall come down⁴ against us? or who shall enter into our [refuges] habitations? But I will punish you according to the fruit of your doings, saith the LORD [Jehovah]; and I will kindle a fire in the forest thereof, and it shall devour all things round about it.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The royal family is appealed to in warning to exercise righteousness, that the anger of the Lord may not burn inextinguishably (vers. 11 and 12). Afterward, the non-fulfilment of this condition being presupposed, the judgment of destruction is proclaimed to the "rock of the plain," which is defiant in its inapproachability (vers. 13, 14). This passage cannot be contemporary with the two preceding; it must be of older date. For, 1. At the date to which xxi. 1-7 belongs, such an admonition and conditional threatening is no longer in place. In vers. 4-7 his own destruction and that of the nation is unconditionally announced to Zedekiah. 2. The stubbornness also, which is expressed in ver. 13, contradicts the dependency, with which Zedekiah humbles himself in ver. 2. 3. It is strange that after the king, ver. 3, the house of the king should again be specially addressed, since the king is included in the latter, and the exhortation to "judge righteously" applies above all to the king. Should it be said that in vers. 11-14 actual conversion is presented before the king as the only way of escape, it is contradicted by the whole situation and the character of vers. 1-10. Such proposals belong to an earlier stage, which in Judea, at the time of his embassy, was long past. We are referred by the connection of this passage with xxiii. 3-9 (on which comp. the Comm. ad loc.) entirely to the times of Jehoiakim. The text forms the transition to this discourse of reproof, addressed to the king. Certainly, ac-ording to the view of the compiler, this section must have been regarded as closely connected with the preceding, for and to the house, etc., in ver. 11, is grounded on thou shalt say in ver. 8.

Vers. 11, 12. And to the house . . . evil of your doings. The division of vers. 11 and 12 is awkward. The house of the king is in the narrower sense himself with his family, in a wider sense the entire court (comp. 1 Ki. iv. 6; xvi. 9, etc.). Here the house of the king is intended in the narrower sense 1, because afterwards the phrase "house of David" is used instead; 2, because judging was one of the chief functions of a king, which he could transfer to a substitute only in cases of necessity. (2 Ki. xv. 5 coll. 1 Sam. viii. 5, 6, 20; 2 Sam. xv. 2 sqq.; 1 Ki. iii. 16 sqq.; vi. 26; vii. 7; viii. 3-5).

Vers. 13, 14. Behold I am against thee . . . round about it. If these verses are not supposed to be attached to the preceding without any inner connection, by rock of the plain (צֶרֶף הַרְבִּישֵׁר) can be understood only the house of David. The house of David was addressed in ver. 12. Ver. 13 presupposes a negative answer of the person addressed, on which the address continues: "Behold I am," etc. XXII. 6-9 is indeed referred to, and it is maintained that here as there the destruction of the city appears to be the punishment for the sin of the royal family. But the sentence which say, etc., would represent the destruction of the city as the punishment of the obstinate security of the citizens. It remains either to regard vers. 13 and 14 as a disconnected addition, or to understand by צִיִּר הַיְיִטֵּר the royal family. According to this rendering עֵיִק, valley, and כִּישֹׁר, plain, are to be taken not in the local but figurative meaning. (Comp. rems. on xviii. 14). The royal family is compared to a rock rising in the midst of a plain. עֵיִק is low land, regio depressa et longe lateque patens (Ges., Thes.) comp. Job xxxix. 10, 21; Ps. lxx. 14. Comp. also עֵיִקֶיךָ Gen. xi. 2.—Rock of the plain defines more particularly in what sense the royal family can be designated as inhabiting the lowland; it is there enthroned as an elevation dominating all the rest. The inhabitants of this rock regard themselves as very secure. They compare themselves with beasts, which in their lairs or hiding-places are well-concealed. [HENDERSON: "By the valley is meant the Tyropæon, running down between Mount Zion and Mount Moriah, and by the rock of the plain Mount Zion, so called from its rapid ascent on the South-west, which renders its brow in this direction apparently more lofty than any other point connected with the city (Robinson I., 389).—S. R. A].—Come down. The prophet has in mind the image of a bird darting down upon its prey. Since the following, and who shall come down evidently indicate attacks by land, by these two figures the thought is expressed of a position secure on all sides.—I am against thee, comp. xxiii. 30-32; l. 31; li. 25.—But I will punish you. II. MAIN DISCOURSE.

CHAPS. XXII. and XXIII.

AGAINST THE WICKED KINGS AND PROPHETS.

1. Against the wicked kings, (xxii. 1-xxiii. 8).

a. The alternative offered the royal house.

XXII. 1-9.

- 1 Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah]: Go down to the house of the king of Judah,
- 2 and speak there this word. And say, Hear the word of the LORD [Jehovah], O king of Judah, that sittest upon the throne of David, thou, and thy servants, and
- 3 thy people that enter in by these gates. Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah]:
Execute judgment and righteousness,
And rescue him that is plundered out of the hand of the oppressor,¹ Strangers, orphans and widows oppress not, nor be violent towards them,
And innocent blood shed not in this place.
- 4 For if ye indeed do thus,
Then through the gates of this house,
Kings, sitting for David on his throne,
Shall enter in chariots and on horses,
He, his ministers² and his people.
- 5 But if ye hearken not to these words,
I have sworn by myself, saith Jehovah,
That this house shall become a desolation.
- 6 For thus saith Jehovah concerning the house of the king of Judah:
Gilead art thou to me, summit of Lebanon!
Surely a wilderness will I make thee,
Cities uninhabited.
- 7 And I consecrate against thee destroyers,
The man and his weapons,
Who shall fell thy choice cedars,
And cast them into the fire.

- 8 And many nations shall go by this city and say one to another,
Why has Jehovah done thus to this great city?
9 And they shall say:
Because they forsook the covenant of Jehovah their God,
And worshipped other gods and served them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 3.—עֲשׂוּךְ, if not written by mistake for עֲשׂוּךְ, occurs here only. It is formed like גְּדוּל, meaning oppressor.

² Ver. 4.—["A great number of MSS. and two of the earliest editions, read עֲבָדֵיךָ his servants, or ministers, according to the Keri." HENDERSON.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet receives the command to go down to the king's house and to deliver to the king and his servants, and to the people, the following divine message (vers. 1, 2): if they would practice justice and righteousness (ver. 3), kings of David's line should possess the throne in royal power and glory (ver. 4); if not, the king's house should be made desolate (ver. 5). For though hitherto like Gilead and Lebanon, it is to be devastated (ver. 6). Destroyers shall come and shall fell the cedars and cast them into the fire (ver. 7), so that afterwards it shall be asked in astonishment, why such a great calamity has come upon the city (ver. 8). To which no other answer can be given than that they forsook the covenant of the Lord and served idols (ver. 9).—As to the relation of these verses to the preceding (xxi. 11-14), the former appear almost only like an extension of the latter. Not only is the fundamental thought the same, but even in details there is great, in part verbal, agreement. The admonition which forms the basis, is found in xxi. 12 and xxii. 3, partly with the same words, only in the latter passage somewhat extended (comp. the second half of ver. 3). As to the promises and threatenings based on the admonition, the form of the alternative is not found in xxi. 11-14, for here the idea of non-fulfilment reigns exclusively. But in the form in which the punishment is announced there are great similarities; both times the royal house is compared with a wooded height, the wood of which will be consumed by fire. Since now repetitions occur so frequently in Jeremiah, there is nothing against the supposition that we have here before us two utterances, related in form and purport because they proceed from the same historical situation. That this situation was in the reign of Jehoiakim and before the crisis of the battle of Carchemish appears to me to admit of no doubt. For 1. there is no mention of the Chaldeans; 2. the king addressed is warned against despotic acts of violence. This warning corresponds neither to the character of Josiah nor to that of Jehoahaz, who was most probably elected by the people, because he was supposed to be free from despotic inclinations, and besides he reigned only three months. The warning, however, corresponds entirely to the character of Jehoiakim, who is also afterwards reproved for such acts of violence (vers. 13-17). 3. Jehoiakim is in vers. 13-15 especially reproached with his lust for building, which he gratified by despotic means. His cedar palace was a monument of this. Jeremiah is to go down to this proud house (ver. 1 coll. ver. 23), and announce to him the judgment of fire (ver. 7). It follows that 1. the section 1-9 refers to Jehoiakim; 2. it is closely connected with vers. 13-23.

Vers. 1-5. Thus saith . . . become a desolation.—Go down. Out from the temple. Comp. xxvi. 10; xxxvi. 12 coll. xviii. 2.—Thou, etc. Not the king alone, but his servants, and the people also are to hear the word of the Lord. All are to co-operate in complying with the admonition, as they will all be affected by the consequences.—Execute judgment and righteousness. Comp. vii. 6; xxi. 12; Ezek. xxii. 6, 7; xlv. 9.—The stranger. Comp. Exod. xxii. 20, 21.—For if ye will, etc. Comp. vii. 5.—There shall enter. Comp. xvii. 25 coll. xiii. 13.—But if ye will not hear. Comp. xvii. 27.—I swear by myself. Comp. Gen. xxii. 16; Isa. xlv. 23; Jer. xlix. 13.

Vers. 6-9. For thus . . . and served them. Gilead, which taken in its wider meaning, comprises Bashan (comp. V. RAUMER, Palästina, S. 229, sqq.), is a type of luxuriant fertility, especially with respect to pasturage. Comp. Num. xxxii. 1; Mic. vii. 14; Jer. l. 19.—Lebanon, the far-reaching, adorned with cedars, is also frequently elsewhere an emblem of the lofty and splendid: Isa. ii. 13; x. 33, 34; xxxv. 2; lx. 13; Hos. xiv. 6-8; Zech. xi. 1, 2.—The figures of blessing and exultation are applied to the house of David, not on account of its present prosperity, for this does not exist, nor only on account of its former prosperity,—under David and Solomon—for this is a secondary consideration with the Lord. From the words to me we perceive that the Lord has here in view rather the significance of the Davidic house, which He has most at heart, its universal and transcendent mission (2 Sam. vii.). For this reason we must not translate: Thou wast to me, but Thou art to me. The comparison with Lebanon is one of the points of coincidence with xxi. 31. Although the royal house of Judah thus stands before the Lord in such ideal glory, He will make it in outward form a desolation and ruin (comp. Isa. liii. 1-5).—On uninhabited comp. Comm. on ii. 15. But why cities in the plural? Evidently because the prophet wished to intimate that the judgment on the king's house will be declared in the desolation of the land and the destruction of the cities, especially the capital (ver. 8). It follows that ver. 6 stands to ver. 5 in the relation of more particular explanation, that for, ver. 6, is therefore to be regarded as an explicative. For not only the reason but the manner of the desolation is more particularly defined in vers. 6-9.—Consecrated. It is commanded by God and therefore a holy war. Comp. rems. on vi. 4. Therefore both the warriors and their weapons are designated as holy.—They shall fall, etc. The house of David is still regarded as a wooded mountain (comp. xi. 14). At the same time the remembrance of the cedar palaces (ver. 23; 2 Sam. vii. 2, 7; 1 Chron. xvii. 1, 6; 1 Ki. vii. 2) seems to prevail.—Cast them. Comp. xxi. 12, 14.—Vers. 8, 9. The prophet has Deut. xxix. 23 sqq. in mind. Comp. also 1 Kings ix. 8, 9.

b. Prophecy relating to the person of Shallum.

XXII. 10-12.

- 10 Weep ye not for the dead, neither bemoan him :
 Weep, weep rather for him that goeth away;
 For never shall he return, nor see his native land.
 11 For thus saith Jehovah concerning Shallum,
 The son of Josiah, the king of Judah, who reigned instead of his father,
 And who is gone away from this place :
 He will not return thither.
 12 For in the place whither they have carried him captive he will die,
 And will see this land no more.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

That these words were really spoken at the historical epoch to which they correspond (therefore neither earlier nor later) is felt if we weigh the terrible violence of the suffering, which, notwithstanding its brevity, is expressed in it. Jeremiah could speak thus only when it was necessary to give expression, and—a corrective, to the universal mourning at the loss of the noble king Josiah, which was as it were repeated in their horror at the captivity of his successor. Three months after his father's death (2 Ki. xxiii. 31-34), Jehoahaz was taken by Pharaoh Necho as a prisoner to Egypt. The sorrow was still lively at the death of his father. Now came this new misfortune. Many might hope for Jehoahaz: he is still young, he will survive and return. Jeremiah cuts off these hopes. There is more cause, he says, to mourn for Jehoahaz than for Josiah. The dead is more fortunate than the living. He intimates that he will perish miserably in captivity. This utterance is one of the oldest in the book.

Vers. 10-12. Weep ye not . . . this land no more. The absence of the article with לְיָמָיו may possibly be ascribed to the freedom which Jeremiah allows himself in the use of the article. Comp. rems. on iii. 2; vi. 16; xiv. 18; xvii. 19 (Chethibh). It is however also possible that לְיָמָיו, dead, may not express so definite a thought as לְיָמָיו, going away, because the dead are mourned in general, but those who go away only when their departure is such as it was in this concrete case, which is indicated by the definite article. On the subject-matter comp. viii. 3.—Concerning Shallum. אַחַר after Verbis dicendi or audi- endi=of, concerning: Gen. xx. 2; 1 Sam. iv. 19; 2 Ki. xix. 9, 32, etc. Comp. NAEGELSEN, Gr., S. 227.—It is beyond a doubt that this Shallum is Jehoahaz, the son of that Josiah who fell at Megiddo (2 Ki. xxiii. 29), but it is uncertain why he is here named Shallum. The passage 1 Chron. iii. 15, where four sons of Josiah are named (Johanah, Jehoiakim, Zedekiah and Shallum), is not clear and seems to have derived the name of Shallum from the present passage. Disregarding this, two views are before us. According to the former it is assumed that the Shallum named here had really another name, as cases of double names were, as is well-known, not uncommon among the Jews, especially in this period. (Comp. Uziah-Azariah, Eliakim-Jehoiakim, Mattaniah-Zedekiah. Comp. SIMONIS, Onomast., p. 20: Movers, Chronik, S. 156 sqq.; THENIUS, on 2 Kings xiv. 21). But only the possibility of Jehoahaz and Shallum being the same, not the actual case, is admitted. According to the other view the name Shallum is a nomen reale (HENGSTENBERG) i. e. a symbolical name. The ancients (JEROME and many of the older Rabbins) have taken the word in the sense of consummatio, completio, referring it to the destruction of the kingdom, and understanding by Shallum either Zedekiah or Jehoiakim. This explanation is however contrary to the clear purport of ver. 10.—שָׁלֹמִים may mean recompense (so GESENIUS), recompenser (FERNST, comp. רָחֵם וְיָמֵן; רָחֵם וְיָמֵן, “and to whom it is recompensed” (HENGSTENBERG). But in none of these meanings will the word exactly suit as a prophetic name. “Recompenser” is certainly not appropriate. But “recompense” and “to whom it is recompensed” are such general ideas, that the name might be ascribed as well to any other wicked king, who was visited by the divine judgment. The turn also, that the name may have been given per analogiam, in remembrance of the Israelitish Shallum, who reigned only a month (2 Ki. xx. 13) is not satisfactory. For then it must first have been evident that every king in general, whose reign was numbered by months, was called Shallum. Why otherwise should Jehoahaz only be so named, since Jehoiachin also reigned only three months? It is thus seen that both these modes of explanation have difficulties. I should decide in preference for the former, in the sense that Jeremiah, of the two names borne by the immediate successor of Josiah, retained the earlier, as the simple personal name, without regard to its meaning, since the other, the royal name (יהואחז), Jehovah holds, sustains) contradicted the historical, as also Jeremiah never calls the successor of Jehoiakim Jehoiachin, but only by his original personal name of Jeconiah or Coniah. Comp. ver. 24.—King of Judah is in apposition to Shallum, since it was only this name which needed further definition.—Who reigned, etc. Jehoahaz, although the younger son (comp. 2 Ki. xxiii. 31 with 36), was raised to the throne by the people (ver. 30), his elder brother Eliakim being passed over, and the rights of the primogeniture disregarded, most probably on account of Eliakim's character, which Jeremiah afterwards portrays in such dark colors. Eliakim does not seem to have submitted with a good will. He threw himself into the arms of the Egyptians. By the favor of Pharaoh Necho he became king in his brother's place, which position however he had to purchase by a tribute, which was very oppressive to the people (2 Ki. xxiii. 33-35). In Riblah Jehoahaz was taken prisoner, whether enticed thither, or in some other way, must remain undecided. He was then taken to Egypt and from that time nothing more is known of him. Comp. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 1 sqq.; Ezek. xix. 3, 4.—On Pharaoh Necho comp. the Encyclopædias.

c. Prophecy, respecting the person of Jehoiakim.

XXII. 13-19.

- 13 Woe unto him that buildeth his house by injustice,
And his upper chambers by unrighteousness;
Who uses his neighbor's service for nothing,
And payeth him not his wages!¹
- 14 Who saith: I will build me a wide house,²
And roomy upper chambers!³
And breaks out himself windows,⁴ Ceils it with cedar and paints it with vermillion.⁵
- 15 Wilt thou be a king, because thou makest a show with cedars?
Thy father, did he not eat and drink,
And execute justice and righteousness?
Then it was well with him.
- 16 He procured justice for the poor and the humble,
Then it was well with him.
Was not this⁶ the fruit of knowing me? saith Jehovah.
- 17 For thine eyes and thy heart are directed only to thy advantage,
And to the blood of the innocent, to shed it,
And to oppression and violence,⁷ to practise them.
- 18 Therefore thus saith Jehovah concerning Jehoiakim,
The son of Josiah, king of Judah.
They shall not mourn for him (saying),
Alas! my brother! Alas! sister!
They shall not mourn for him (saying),
Alas! Lord! Alas! his majesty!
- 19 With the burial of an ass shall he be buried;
Dragged and cast out far from the gates of Jerusalem.

OLSHAUSEN, § 111, c, Anm., is of opinion that חֲלוֹנִים is to be restored. But it is more natural, with J. D. MICHAELIS, HITZIG, GAAB, MEIER, to connect the following ו with the word and to read חֲלוֹנֵי.—Instead of כִּפְנֵי we must then read כִּפְנֵי, corresponding to the following כִּשְׁוֶה. Comp. NAEGELS. Gr., § 93, e. The manner of writing כִּפְנֵי might arise the more easily, as in the six passages where the word occurs in the Old Testament five have the passive part. in Kal. As Jeremiah evidently alludes to the erections of Solomon, it was natural to seek also this literal agreement. The radical signification of כִּפְנֵי [comp. צִפְנֵי and עִפְנֵי, Dent. xxxiii. 19; כִּפְנִיָּה, Jon. i. 5, a ship with a deck in distinction from an open boat; כִּכְנֵי, ceiling, 1 Ki. vi. 15, in distinction from בְּרִיקַע, floor; כִּפְנֵי, בְּתִיִּם, ceiled houses, as opposed to הַרְבַּב, Hag. i. 3] is certainly to cover; yet whether merely the roofing is meant, or also the clothing of the walls with cedar-wood (which is also a covering) appears to be doubtful.

⁶ Ver. 14.—חֲשָׁשׁ is found also in Ezek. xxiii. 14. According to the Vulgate, sinopsis, i. c. rubrica Sinopenais; LXX., μίλος—red, vermilion; KIMCHI, cinnabaris, minium.

⁶ Ver. 16.—On the nouter rendering of הָיָה, which besides appears here to be attracted by רִיעָה, comp. NAEGELS. Gr., § 60, 6, b.

⁷ Ver. 17.—כִּרְצָה, from רָצָה—רָצָה, crushing [comp. OLSH., § 386], occurs in this sense here only. It is not to be confounded with כִּרְצָה, cursus, viii. 6; xxiii. 10; 2 Sam. xviii. 27.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet cries, Woe to Jehoiakim, the king of Judah, who unlike his father Josiah, ruled despotically and oppressed the people, especially in behalf of his fine architecture (vers. 13, 14). Is the kingdom of heaven founded on cedar-beams? asks Jeremiah. Josiah knew a better foundation. He ate and drank indeed, but he practised justice and righteousness. Then it was well, and it was evident that to know the Lord was true prosperity (vers. 15, 16). Jehoiakim, a genuine despot, had only his own advantage in view, and to this end practised violence and the shedding of innocent blood (ver. 17). Therefore he will perish miserably, unwept, dragged and cast out like an ass, his corpse will lie far from Jerusalem (vers. 18, 19).—This declaration must have been addressed to Jehoiakim as the reigning king, for he is not only called king (ver. 18), but Josiah's reign is referred to as past and the end of Jehoiakim's as future. Thus this prophecy pertains to the reign of Jehoiakim, and since there is no mention of the Chaldeans, and Jehoiakim appears to be in full and undisturbed exercise of his despotism, to the beginning of it, i. e., before the crisis of the fourth year (chap. xxv.).

Vers. 13 and 14. Woe unto him . . . with vermilion. Comp. Hab. ii. 12; Mic. iii. 10.—Who useth, etc. Comp. xxv. 14; xxvii. 7; xxx. 8, etc.—And breaks out, etc. קָרַע is to tear to pieces, to cut up of garments (Gen. xxxvii. 29, 34) of bodies (by wild beasts, Hos. xiii. 8) of a book (Jer. xxxvi. 23). In Jer. iv. 30 it is used of the paint which makes the eyes look as if they were torn open, i. e., larger. In the sense of tearing open, it seems to be used here, only that the tearing seems to be effected not by painting, but by breaking through.

Vers. 15, 16. Wilt thou be a king . . . saith Jehovah. The prophet tells the king that not splendid buildings are the foundation of a kingdom, but righteousness, and proves this to him by the example of his father Josiah. Comp. Prov. xiv. 34; xvi. 12; xx. 28; xxv. 5; xxix. 14.—Makest a show, etc. (כִּתְחַרְחַר בְּאָרוֹ). On the verbal form. Comp. OLSH., § 255, a). The words have been strangely declared by many to be meaningless. But the meaning which the word has in xii. 5 (where alone it occurs), is equally appropriate here. There it is undoubtedly æmulari, to vie, (to heat one's self, to be zealous, from הִקְרָה to glow. Comp. Neh. iii. 20), and is connected with אָתּ=with, for the designation of the relation to a rival. Here it is not said, with whom Jehoiakim vies. That is a matter of course: He vies with all those who have also built cedar palaces, whether they were prior, contemporaneous, or subsequent to him. It is however said, whereby he seeks to surpass them, in אָתּוֹ, cedar, being taken generally, as in ver. 14.—Did he not eat, etc. Josiah enjoyed life also, he was no ascetic. But he did not sacrifice his duty and conscience to the pleasures of life, but practised the highest duty of a ruler, righteousness, in a manner pleasing to God. Thus he laid a secure foundation, and his rule was a prosperous one.—Was not this the fruit refers not to procured justice, but to it was well with him. For that the knowledge of Jehovah (the True) includes the practice of righteousness, Jehoiakim did not probably deny. But he did deny, if not in these, yet in praxi, that the true living knowledge of Jehovah ensures the desired satisfaction to a prince. Accordingly הָיָה, this, is predicate, וְיָדַעְתָּ, knowing, subject.

Vers. 17-19. For thine eyes . . . gates of Jerusalem.—For refers to a thought to be supplied: Not so thou, for, etc.—Blood of the innocent. Comp. Deut. xix. 13; 2 Kings xxiv. 4.—Alas! my brother, etc. The prophet quotes the verba ipsissima of the usual wail for the dead. Hence the apparently unsuitable Alas! Sister! He distinguishes the wail of the relatives (comp. 1 Kings xiii. 30), and that of the subjects (comp. xxxiv. 5) of the highest royal majesty, comp. Ps. cxlviii. 13; 1 Chron. xxix. 25.

Ver. 19. Dragged. Comp. xv. 3.—Far from, etc. כִּהְלָאָה as a collective idea, is the accusative governed by הִשְׁלַךְ. The place of casting away is, according to a well-known idiom, designated as one presenting itself from far beyond the gates of Jerusalem. Comp. EXEG. rems. on xx. 17; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5 d.—As to the fulfilment of the prophecy, it should first be remarked, that the latter is repeated in other words in xxxvi. 30. The historical accounts touching the end of Jehoiakim are very scanty. In 2 Kings xxiv. 6 we read only, “So Jehoiakim slept with his fathers.” This expression indicates nothing concerning the burial, which is the more surprising, as the book of Kings elsewhere always designates the place particularly. We are not justified in casting doubt on the statement in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, that Nebuchadnezzar bound Jehoiakim with two chains to take him to Babylon, on the ground that the Chronicler transferred what from ver. 6 onwards relates to Jehoiachin to his predecessor (GRAF). For this statement does not contradict that of the book of Kings. According to this also (xxiv. 1), Nebuchadnezzar went up against Jehoiakim. The book of Kings does not expressly say that at this time he carried away the vessels from the temple, but the case, as related in Chronicles, is in itself probable. It is here said that Nebuchadnezzar carried off simply “the vessels of the house,” etc., while in connection with Jehoiachin, he carried off “the goodly vessels,” etc. If then the account in Chronicles is not inauthentic, it affords sufficient data for the fulfilment of the prophecy in the text. Since Chronicles does not state that Jehoiakim was brought to Babylon, but only that Nebuchadnezzar bound him to take him thither, it is quite possible that he died on the way, and endured the sad fate prophesied in the text. We need not then assume either that Jehoiakim was taken from his grave, after the capture of the city under Jehoiachin, dragged through the gate and cast out, or that having died on the way, his body was delivered up by the Chaldeans for sepulture (VAHRINGER in HERZOG, R.-Enc. VI., S. 790).

d. The consequences to the people.

XXII. 20-23.

- 20 Go up to Lebanon and cry,¹
And in Bashan lift up thy voice and cry from Abarim,
That all thy lovers are broken in pieces.
- 21 I spoke to thee in thy prosperity,—
Thou saidst, I will not hear.
This was thy manner from thy youth,
That thou heardest not my voice.
- 22 The wind shall depasture all thy pastors,
And thy lovers shall go into captivity;
Then shalt thou be put to shame,²
And confounded for all thy wickedness.
- 23 Thou that sittest on Lebanon,
That nestlest in cedars,³
How dost thou groan⁴ when pains come upon thee,
Pangs⁵ as of a parturient!

¹ Ver. 20.—On the form יִצְעֶקִי , comp. OLSH., § 65 b, and § 234, c.

² Ver. 22.— $\text{כִּי אֵין תִּבְשִׂי}$. כִּי is pleonastic. Comp. ii. 35; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 103, 1 a.

⁴ Ver. 23.— נִחַנְתִּי . On the termination, comp. rems. on ii. 20; iii. 5. The form, as it stands, is Niph. of חָנַן (comp. OLSH. S. 593). But since a Niph. of חָנַן to be kind, gracious, nowhere else occurs, most modern commentators suppose that it is written for נִחַחְתִּי , and this for נִחַחְתִּי (from חָנַח to sigh, to groan). Yet FUERST is of opinion that a root חָנַן may be assumed, parallel to the Arabic hanina, to groan, to sigh, from which חָנַח , Job xix. 17 and our נִחַחְתִּי are derived. The latter plan would certainly be more simple than the assumption of a double change of consonants. The decision is still to be expected.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The people are next addressed,—after the king. They have harmonized too well with their pastors in worldly lust and pride, they must then share their fate. It is evidently this thought of the agreement of the people with such princes as Jehoiakim, which is prominent. Dwelling on Lebanon and making nests among cedars (ver. 23) pleased them, however displeasing the service might be to those who were compelled to render it (vers. 13-15). The passage is thus connected with the preceding, (comp. vers. 20 and 23, with vers. 6, 7 and vers. 13-15). The train of thought is as follows:—The people of Israel are required to announce from the highest summits of the mountains, bordering on their country, the fall of their lovers (ver. 20). For he who will not hear must feel. Thus it must be with Israel, who from his youth has never listened to the voice of the Lord (ver. 21). When then the pastors of Israel are blown away by the storm and their lovers are gone into captivity, Israel will expiate his wickedness in deep shame (ver. 22), and groan for his pride in profound anguish, like a woman in travail (ver. 23).

Vers. 20, 21. Go up . . . my voice. Lebanon, Bashan and Abarim, are named as the highest summits of the mountains bordering on Palestine.—Go up on Lebanon forms an ironical antithesis to that sittest on Lebanon. The people now proudly dwelling in cedars on Lebanon shall in the future mount^d on Lebanon (in the proper sense) to lament—an ascent which is really a descent. Bashan stands for the mountain of Bashan (Ps. lxxviii. 15), i. e., Hermon. On Abarim with Mt. Nebo, comp. Numb. xxi. 11; xxvii. 12; Deut. xxxii. 49; RAUMER, Paläst., S. 72. Israel is to raise his cry of lamentation from the bordering mountains that his shame and the conqueror's glory might be widely manifest as a terror to others.—All thy lovers must, according to the connection, mean the kings. For 1, it is inconceivable that thy pastors in ver. 22, are not the same as thy lovers, ibid. The former, however, are unquestionably the kings (xxiii. 1-8). 2. The very punishment inflicted on the kings, affected the people themselves immediately. Hence the humiliating lament to which they are summoned in vers. 20-23. 3. The punishment of the pastors and lovers is the same which was announced to Jehoiakim in vers. 18, 19. To the objection that a similar use of the word "lovers," cannot be produced, it may be replied that it is an unjustifiable demand, to require a proof of every special application of a meaning admitted in itself. אֲהָבָיִם means the lover; this is sufficient. It cannot be doubted that this in and of itself, might be said of kings, in reference to their people. The only question is, whether this mode of expression can be shown to be appropriate in particular cases. This is, however, the case here. For here the prophet (comp. ver. 2) announces the judgment to the people, because they sympathize with the sin of the king, both suffering and promoting it. When there is such concert in wickedness between prince and people, the prince may be named the paramour, unchaste lover (and this is the specific meaning of אֲהָבָיִם. Comp. Ezek. xvi. 39, 36, 37; xxiii. 5, 9, 22; Hos. ii. 7, 9, 12, 14, 15), of his people. Comp. besides Lam. i. 19.—Prosperity. The plural שְׁלוֹמָם is found here only. Since the singular=felicitas, rerum status securus atque secundus (comp. Ps. cxxii. 7; Prov. i. 32; xvii. 1, etc.), the plural is=res secundæ, prosperous, quiet, secure relations. So long as these lasted, Israel would know nothing of obedience to the voice of his God. Comp. ii. 25-28.—This was thy manner, etc. Comp. ii. 2, 23, 33, 36; Ezek. xxiii. 3.

Vers. 22, 23. The wind . . . of a parturient. The pastors are the leaders of the people, especially the princes. In this sense is רֵעִים also found in x. 21; xxiii. 1-8; l. 6. As the pastor is behind his flock to drive it, so the storm is behind the pastors to sweep them away. Comp. iv. 11, 12; xiii. 24; Hos. iv. 19.—Thy wickedness. Comp. ii. 19, iii. 2; iv. 18; xi. 15.—According to the sense, ver. 23 is a further development of thou shalt be put to shame, ver. 22. For the shame of the people will appear the more distinctly, the more proudly and securely they now live as on Lebanon. This is evidently intended in a double sense; (a) as an emblem of proud, unapproachable exaltation (comp. remarks on ver. 6); (b) as an allusion to the cedar-houses, into which they had brought the "glory of Lebanon" (Isa. lx. 13), so that Jerusalem, in a certain respect, is like Lebanon. For as on this mountain the birds make their nests in the cedars, so the princes of Judah built their nests of the cedars of Lebanon.

e. Prophecy relating to the person of Jehoiachin.

a. Before the Deportation.

XXII. 24-27.

- 24 As I live, saith Jehovah, though Coniah,¹
The son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah,
Were the signet ring upon my right hand,
Yet would I pluck thee thence.²
- 25 And I give thee into the hand of them that seek thy life,
And into the hand of those before whom thou fearest,
Even into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon,
And into the hand of the Chaldeans.
- 26 And I cast thee forth, and thy mother that bare thee,
Into another country,³ where ye were not born;
And there ye shall die.
- 27 But to the land whither their soul desires to return,⁴ Thither shall they not return.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 24.—On the form אֶתְקַנֶּךָ, comp. OLSH., § 68, d. coll. 97, a; EW. § 250, b. [GESEH. Gr., § 105, b.—S. R. A.]

³ Ver. 26.—If the twice repeated עַל-הָאָרֶץ (vers. 27 and 28) has not occasioned the article before אֶרֶץ, the case is analogous to the הַגִּבּוֹרִים וְנַכְרֵי, which see. Comp. also xvi. 13.

⁴ Ver. 27.—בְּנִשְׁאִים. Comp. xliv. 14; Deut. xxiv. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Jehovah swears by His life, that though Jehoiachin, the king of Judah, were the signet-ring on His right hand, yet He would tear it off (ver. 24), give him into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar (ver. 25), and hurl him forth, together with his mother, into a foreign land. There they shall die (ver. 26) and never return to the home for which they have so longing a desire (ver. 27). It is evident that this utterance is addressed to Jehoiachin during his reign. He is addressed as king; Nebuchadnezzar stands menacingly in the vicinity; the captivity is still future.

Ver. 24. As I live . . . thence. King Jehoiachin, Jehoiakim's son and successor, who however reigned only three months (2 Kings, xxiv. 8; three months and ten days, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 9), appears under the name of Jeconiah also in xxiv. 1; xxvii. 20; xxviii. 4; xxix. 2; 1 Chron. iii. 16, 17; comp. Esth. iii. 6. I believe that the abbreviation here denotes a disparaging treatment of the royal name. Somewhat of the feeling expressed in ver. 28 may be traced in it: "Is not this man Coniah a despised broken vessel?"—Since moreover Jeremiah never calls this king Jehoiachin (יְהוֹיָכִין), he is so called only in lii. 31), it is possible that Jeconiah was his proper, original name, and Jehoiachin only supplementary, assumed during his brief reign. Although Jeremiah acknowledges him as king, he guards against using a name expressing a false arbitrary hope, as he also retains the original personal name Shallum, instead of the inappropriately chosen royal name of Jehoahaz (xxii. 11).—Though Coniah . . . were, etc. If it were not for יִבִין (imperfect) I should be disposed to render in the sense of although he is. But אֲנִי with the imperfect cannot possibly be taken otherwise than in the sense of a conditional sentence. I do not think that we can regard the signet-ring here as a symbol of power, i. e. as a sign of investiture with royal authority. (Comp. Gen. xli. 42; Esth. iii. 10; viii. 2). For in this sense Jeconiah was really a signet-ring. But the signet is here only a jewel, a costly valuable ornament (Song of Sol. viii. 6). The Lord would therefore say: As I would pluck away the dearest jewel from which I had never parted hitherto, were it become bad, useless, therefore unworthy of me, so must I reject Jeconiah, as one who is despicable, useless, unworthy, even though he were the signet-ring on my right hand, which he is not. אֲנִי is here as in Ps. cxxxix. 8, 9; Am. ix. 2-4; Isa. x. 22; Ob. 4.

Vers. 25-27. And I give thee unto the hand . . . they not return. Comp. xix. 7; xxi. 7; xxxiv. 20, 21.—And thy mother. She was Nehushta, the daughter of Elnathan, 2 Ki. xxiv. 8. Comp. xiii. 18.

β. After the Deportation.

XXII. 28-30.

- 28 Is then this man Coniah a despised broken vessel?
 Or a vessel wherein is no pleasure?
 Why are they then hurled forth, he and his seed?
 And cast into the land which they know not?
 29 O land, land, land, hear Jehovah's word!
 30 Thus saith Jehovah: Write ye this man childless,
 As one who has no prosperity in the days of his life;
 For not one of his seed shall succeed
 To sit upon the throne of David and rule again over Judah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These words were spoken after Jeconiah had been carried away captive. Compare "I cast thee forth," ver. 26, with "hurled forth" and "cast" in ver. 28. Hence Jeconiah himself is not addressed, but the prophet speaks of him to others. He first sets forth how in the fate of Jeconiah the divine judgment of his unworthiness is manifested. The antithesis is here plainly felt to the "signet-ring on my right hand," ver. 24, and that in this comparison there was a cutting irony (ver. 28). Thereupon the prophet addresses the land directly, solemnly repeating יָרֵא thrice (ver. 29), to announce concerning it the fatal declaration of Jehovah, that no descendant of Jehoiachin will any more sit on the throne of David.

Vers. 28-30. Is then . . . over Judah. To the question of ver. 28 an affirmative answer is expected. Comp. rems. on vii. 9; xii. 9, coll. ii. 14. On the abbreviated name Coniah, the object of which comes out here with especial distinctness, comp. rems. on ver. 24.—Childless. Jeconiah was eighteen years old when he became king (2 Kings xxiv. 8), and it is expressly stated that he had wives. That he had some offspring is therefore not impossible, and is not even excluded by ver. 30. But even if he had no children, there was other "royal seed" (Dan. i. 3).—Into the land. Comp. ver. 26; xvi. 13. The article is explained by the circumstance that this unknown land at the same time hovered before the prophet as one often mentioned and definitely designated.—The repetition of land is to call attention to the fact that the prophet has somewhat unusually important to say with respect to the country. This is the announcement that none of the offspring of Jeconiah should possess the throne of David, by which it is at the same time indicated that an important change would take place in the throne itself, i. e. that it would cease and give place to the throne of a universal empire.—Write. The prophet has evidently in view those who are entrusted with the keeping of the family record (comp. SAALSCHÜTZ, Mos. Recht, S. 61; Ezek. xiii. 9; coll. Jer. xvii. 13; Ps. lxxix. 29; Isai. iv. 3). When it is said that they are to write him as childless, it is said only that he is to pass for such, not that he was really so. In 1 Chron. iii. 17, 18, his sons are at least mentioned. Whether they were natural offspring (observe the phrase כְּנִיָּהּ אֲזָרְיָהּ, the imprisoned Jeconiah [A. V.: Jeconiah, Assir, etc.—S. R. A.] or only legal (by a Levirate marriage), is doubtful, comp. EHRARD, Kritik der eo. Gesch. S. 201, sqq.—As one, etc. This sentence is subordinate to the preceding, as explanation and more exact definition: Jeconiah is called childless, because his whole life through he will be an unprosperous man. This will be manifest, in that he will have seed, but no successor. None of his descendants will succeed to his throne. Zedekiah was Jeconiah's uncle and the last king of Judah of the family of David. The text accordingly rather favors than opposes the hypothesis that Jeconiah had natural offspring.—Shall succeed to sit (יִשְׁבֵּה יָשָׁב)—he will not have success or prosperity, as sitting, etc. We should say: he will not have the good fortune to sit, etc.

f. Conclusion and Consolation, in a glance at the just and the justifier.

XXIII. 1-8.

- 1 Wo, pastors,¹ who destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture,² saith Jehovah!
 2 Therefore thus saith Jehovah, the God of Israel, concerning the pastors,³ that pasture my people:
 Ye have scattered my flock, and dispersed and not visited them.
 Behold I visit⁴ upon you the evil of your doings, saith Jehovah.
 3 And I will gather the remnant of my flock
 Out of all the countries whither I have dispersed them,
 And bring them back to their field;⁵ and they shall be fruitful and increase.
 4 And I awaken over them pastors who shall pasture them.
 And they shall fear no more nor be dismayed;⁶
 Neither shall they be missing,⁷ saith Jehovah.
 5 Behold the days are coming, saith Jehovah,
 That I awake unto David a righteous scion,
 Who shall reign as king and shall prosper,⁸
 And exercise judgment and righteousness in the land.
 6 In his days will Judah be saved,
 And Israel dwell securely;
 And this will be the name by which they will call⁹ him [Israel],
 Jehovah our righteousness.
 7 Therefore, behold, the days are coming that they shall no more say,
 As Jehovah liveth, who brought the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt, 8 But, as Jehovah liveth, who brought and led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country,
 And out of all lands, whither I had dispersed them;
 And they shall dwell in their own land.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—There is nothing remarkable in the absence of the article with רועים, for this is generally the case with רועי. It occurs with the article in seven places only: Isa. v. 20; x. 1; xxix. 15; xxxi. 1; Am. v. 18; vi. 1; Hab. ii. 6. Of these places, the first six have the plural, one the singular, but in a collective signification.

² Ver. 1.—כרעיית may designate both the act (Hos. xiii. 6) the place (Isa. xlix. 9), and the object (Jer. x. 21; xxv. 36) of the pasturing. Hence צאן-כרעייתי (comp. Ezek. xxxiv. 31; Ps. lxxiv. 1; lxxix. 13; c. 3) may mean both: the flock which I pasture (as chief shepherd), and: the flock which feeds on my pasturage. The sense is essentially the same.

³ Ver. 2.—Here רעים has the article, because the shepherds already mentioned (ver. 1) are meant.

⁴ Ver. 2.—פקד is here used for the sake of a paronomasia in bonam (comp. Ps. viii. 5; Exod. iii. 16) and in malam partem (comp. v. 9; xxv. 12; xxvii. 8; Hos. i. 4) comp. Zech. x. 3.

⁵ Ver. 3.—נויהן. Sing. Comp. OLSH., § 165, f. Since it is sheep which are spoken of, נויהן here as in 2 Sam. vii. 8; Isa. lxx. 10; Jer. xxxiii. 12; Ezek. xxv. 5 = pascuum, place of pasturage, field. The fem. suffix is remarkable. Comp. Gen. xxx. 39; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, 4.

⁶ Ver. 4.—היהו. Comp. xvii. 18.

⁷ Ver. 4.—יפקדו. This word is frequently used of missing, scattered or robbed sheep, 1 Sam. xxv. 7, 15, 21; comp. 1 Sam. xx. 18.

⁸ Ver. 5.—השכלי is best taken here in a double sense: rem bene, i. e., prudenter et feliciter geret. Comp. rems. on x. 21; Isa. lli. 13.

⁹ Ver. 6.—The reading יקרא which is found in some Codd. is occasioned by the endeavor to obtain a designation of the subject, perhaps also by the rarer form of suffix. With respect to the former point the well-known idiom may be referred to, according to which the subject is usually wanting with קרא in the meaning "they call." Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 101, 2, b. With respect to the latter comp. Hos. viii. 3; Ps. xxxv. 8; Eccles. iv. 12; OLSH., § 231, c.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This passage is in general suitably connected with the entirety of the previous context, since in relation to the previous specifications (xxii. 10-30), it may be regarded as a comprehensive conclusion. But originally it formed a connected whole only with xxii. 1-9; 13-23, since xxii. 10-12 must have been inserted afterwards. Going down into the house of the king, who can have been no other than Jehoiakim, Jeremiah first, in xxii. 1-9, addressed an alternative to him, the purport of which was such that servants and people were also obliged pro rata to apply it to themselves. For in vers. 13-19 he turned to the king alone with an incisive speech of rebuke and menace, to which was appended a singular one addressed to the people (vers. 20-23). Finally, in a grand survey, he contrasts with the deep decline, effectuated by the wicked pastors (xxiii. 1, 2), the other extreme, the salvation to be imparted to the re-assembled people, in the distant future, by the Messiah. The remnant restored to their home shall again become a numerous people (ver. 3). This people shall be fed in blessing by shepherds appointed by the Lord (ver. 4). In particular a "righteous scion," sprung from the stock of David, shall rule as king with wisdom and righteousness, to the prosperity of Judah and Israel,—a king, whose deepest significance for his people is expressed in the wonderful name given to the people—Jehovah our Righteousness (vers. 5-6). Oaths will then no longer be taken by the name of Jehovah, who brought Israel out of Egypt, but by the name of Jehovah, who brought back Israel from the north country to his native land (vers. 7, 8). The same antithesis, between deepest impending ruin and highest glory to be expected in the distant future, was found also in ch. iii.

Vers. 1, 2. Wo, Pastors . . . saith Jehovah. As the sections xxii. 1-9; 13-23; xxiii. 1-8 contain the discourse delivered in the house of the king, this section is immediately attached to xxii. 13-23. Both sections begin with יהוה. After the alternative in xxii. 3-9 also the prophet pronounces a double woe: first on the shepherds, i. e. on the person of the king then reigning, then on all which may be called bad shepherding. That the kings are to be understood by the shepherds follows: 1. from the previously stated connection of the discourse of which this passage forms a part; 2. from the description of the conduct of the bad shepherds (who destroy and scatter the flock, etc., vers. 1, 2) which appears to produce so much effect, both extensively and intensively, that we can recognize it only as the action of those who occupy the highest, most influential positions; 3. from the antithesis of the good shepherd, ver. 4, and of the righteous scion of David, ver. 5, in particular. For that beneficial influence (ver. 4) can only be that of the chief, and in ver. 5 the "righteous scion" is directly designated as king. They first corrupt the people morally, and thus effect the external destruction which culminates in their dispersion, comp. 2 Kings xvii. 21-23; xxi. 10-12; xxiii. 26, 27; Jer. xv. 4.

Vers. 3, 4. And I will gather . . . saith Jehovah. Comp. xxix. 14; xxxi. 8-10; Mic. ii. 12; Ezek. xxxiv. 12.—The remnant, etc. On this HENGSTENBERG remarks: "The gathering being promised only to the remnant (comp. Is. x. 20; Rom. ix. 27) indicates that justice accompanies mercy."—And they shall be fruitful, etc. Comp. rems. on iii. 16. In the following verse it should first of all be observed that the prophet has in view two older prophecies: First the foundation-prophecy of the future glory of the Davidic house in 2 Sam. vii. 12, where we read the words, "I will set thy seed after thee." The prophet's choice of this particular utterance here and in ver. 5, could not have been without the object of a double allusion to the passage above quoted, and to the name of Jehoiakim. Since this name (as well as the name יהויכין) is chosen undoubtedly with reference to the passage mentioned, it was natural that the prophet, thinking in joyful hope of that prophecy, should at the same time remember the contradiction, which prevailed between the present and the promised Jehoiakim. The second passage, to which Jeremiah more plainly alludes, is his own utterance in iii. 15. He must have been reminded of this the more readily that it relates to the same future period.

Ver. 5. Behold the days . . . in the land. The connection of this verse with the previous one is formed by behold the days. This expression does not refer to the difference in time. It does not declare that what is spoken of in ver. 5 will take place after the events of ver. 4, but is anti-thetic only to the present.—Pastors, etc., in ver. 4 is a figurative expression, which is explained in ver. 5 in proper language. On the question as to the relation of the singulars פֹּסְדֵי, scion, מֶלֶךְ, king, etc., to the plural רֹעֵי, pastors, there are three views. According to one רֹעֵי is to be taken as a generic plural, which does not exclude the possibility of one shepherd being intended. Thus HENGSTENBERG. On the other hand it is rightly objected that elsewhere Jeremiah presents the prospect of a multiplicity of rulers of the seed of David for the time of the great restoration: xxxiii. 17, 18—

"There shall not be wanting to David a man, Sitting on the throne of the house of Judah . . .

And to the priests and levites shall not be wanting a man,

Offering burnt-offerings," etc.

Ibid. ver. 22. "As the host of heaven cannot be numbered

Nor the sand of the sea measured;

So will I multiply the seed of David my servant, And the Levites that minister to me."

Ibid. ver. 26. "If I have not appointed the laws of heaven and earth;

Then also may I reject the seed of Jacob

And David my servant,

That I should not take of his seed to be rulers (מְשֻׁלִּים)

To the seed of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob."

According to the second view the passages just quoted are regarded as forming the measure of this, and accordingly the singular פֹּסֵד, scion, is taken in a collective sense. GRAF, who adopts this view, appeals (a) to the idiom, according to which it always has a collective meaning (Gen. xix. 25; Ps. lxx. 11; Ezek. xvi. 7; Is. li. 11); (b) to the idiom according to which דָּוִד, David, and דְּבַר דָּוִד as much designate the descendants of David, as אֲבֹתָי;

Jacob, and אֲבֹתָי דְּבַר יַעֲקֹב, the descendants of Jacob: Jer. xxx. 9; Hos. iii. 5; Ezek. xxiv. 23, 24; xxxvii. 24, 25; xlv. 8; xli. 16, coll. Jer.

xxx. 10; xlv. 27, 28; Isai. xlv. 1; xlv. 4; xlviii. 20, etc.—To this view it may be objected that this entirely ignores the fact that the Jews expected ONE great deliverer and restorer of their State, the MESSIAH. Comp. the article "Messias," by OEHLER in HERZOG, R.-Enc. We can only treat here of two points: 1. How is this passage related to the expectation of a single great son of David? 2. If it is based on this idea, how is it to be reconciled with the other that a number of princes of David's line will rule over Israel? As to the first question, I am of opinion that this passage declares the unity of the Messiah, notwithstanding that pastors preceding (ver. 4) intimates a multiplicity. I therefore propose a third view, taking יִצְחָק in a plural sense, but מִלְכֵי, etc., notwithstanding in the sense of unity. The reasons for this are as follows: 1. If Jeremiah wished to set forth a multiplicity, why did he not continue in the plural? Why does he not say "Who shall reign as kings?" מִלְכֵי has, in the comparatively few passages where it occurs, a collective sense. But not necessarily. It is germen, protos in general, and may accordingly designate as well a single individual as a number. If the prophet wished it to be taken in the latter sense, and therefore as absolutely identical with יִצְחָק, he must have indicated this by the plural. 2. Ezekiel and Zechariah, who, as is acknowledged, refer to this passage, evidently understood it in the sense of unity. Ezekiel says expressly in xxxiv. 23, "And I will set up one shepherd over them." And Zechariah in iii. 8, and vi. 12, used מִלְכֵי as a proper name, saying (iii. 8): "For I bring my servant Zemach" [The Branch]—and (vi. 12): "Behold a man, Zemach his name, under whom it shall sprout." As to the second question, previously raised, the subjective conception of the prophet is to be distinguished from the objective reality of the fulfilment. To the prophets the pictures of the future, which came within the circle of their vision, contained by no means always sharply circumscribed and distinctly impressed forms (comp. 1 Pet. i. 11). These forms were as little born entirely of the future, severed from the present. Rather were they eternal ideas, which had derived their body from the present. Of this kind are most of the Messianic prophecies. In reality Christ is a different king, priest and prophet, from what the authors of Ps. ii.; ex.; Deut. xviii. conceived, and yet His advent is the true fulfilment of those prophecies. Thus Jeremiah also sees together with the one grand form of the arch-shepherd, many others, whom he recognizes as His seed. If the prophet conceived among his offspring of a successor, in the sense in which successors of a no longer reigning prince are spoken of, this must have been a point which remained obscure to the subjective perception of the prophet,—in a similar manner, as it may have been dark to the prophet, how he could live so long, of whom it was said that He gave His soul an offering for sin (Isai. liii. 10). Objectively considered, even JEROME and THEODORET understood the apostles by the many יִצְחָק—an interpretation which is certainly exposed to the objection of too great limitation. It would be more appropriate, to consider, with others, that we, so far as we are ἐν Χριστῷ, are not only Abraham's seed (Gal. iii. 29) but also David's. We are indeed a royal priesthood (1 Pet. ii. 9); and He has made us not only priests but kings ἐποίησας αὐτοὺς βασιλείαν καὶ ἱερεῖς, καὶ βασιλεύουσιν ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς, Rev. v. 10, coll. i. 6). [HENRICKSON: "By the better shepherds whom Jehovah promises to place over His restored people, I understand Zerubbabel, Ezra, Nehemiah, the Maccabees, etc., under whose superintendence and rule they were re-instated in their possessions, and enjoyed protection against both internal and foreign enemies."—S. R. A.] If now the inquiry is made, how the prophet came to choose the expression מִלְכֵי, it was long ago pointed out by the Comm. that he had in mind Isai. xi. 2; liii. 2. As there the sprouting forth of a scion, from the apparently withered root of the house of David, is announced, so here the growth of a scion in the midst of a people, gathered again after a long dispersion, and thus about to enter upon a new national existence. This conception appears also to form the basis of the translation of the LXX., which translates מִלְכֵי here as in Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12, ἀναταλή. Comp. especially καὶ ὑποκάτωθεν αὐτοῦ ἀνατελεῖ, in the passage last mentioned.—Justice or righteousness is the chief quality of a good king according to the Old Testament doctrine. Comp. Ps. xlv. 5, 7, 8; lxxii. 1-4, 12-14; lxxxii. 2-4; ci. 1-8.—Hence righteous scion, of which the confirmation in fact is declared in shall exercise judgment. Comp. Ps. cxlvi. 7; ciii. 6, and the remarks on vii. 5, 6; ix. 23.

Ver. 6. In his days . . . our righteousness. Comp. Deut. xxxiii. 28, 29.—Repetition of our passage, xxxiii. 16.—Judah is fem. as in iii. 7; xiv. 2; xxxiii. 16; Lam. i. 3; Nah. ii. 1; Mal. ii. 11. It is then equivalent to daughter of Judah, Lam. ii. 2, 5. Comp. NÆGELSB., Gr. lx. 4.—They will call him. According to the explanation prevalent even from antiquity, this refers to righteous scion. But as Jeremiah is his own best interpreter, the name must be referred to Israel. For in the parallel passage, xxxiii. 16, where instead of "and Israel dwell securely," we read "Jerusalem shall dwell securely," the word he, in the latter clause of the verse ("and this is the name by which he shall be called") can refer to no other than Jerusalem. Jehovah our Righteousness is not then the name of the scion of David, but of the nation. It is a symbolical surname, which is distinguished from other names, in that it serves not for real use, but only for objective characterization, an ideal inscription, as it were. Hence this name is also ascribed to an object, which already has a name. For the nation is already called Israel, but nevertheless it is to be called "Jehovah, etc." The prophet does not mean that the old name is to be changed into a new one; for the name does not recur (except in the repetition of this passage, xxxiii. 16) and the nation appears as before under its old name, which is also a sacred, God-given name. (Gen. xxxii. 28.) Jerusalem elsewhere receives other names which are likewise not intended for daily use. In Ezek. xlvi. 35, the name יהוה שָׁמָר (The Lord is there) is attributed to the city. In Isai. lx. 14 we read "they shall call thee The city of Jehovah, the Zion of the Holy One of Israel." In a similar manner Nathan gives his pupil Solomon the name Jediah, which he never bore in reality. With respect to the name Emmanuel (Isai. vii. 14; viii. 8-10) the case appears to be the same.—Similar in form are the names Jehovah-nissi (Exod. xvii. 15), Jehovah-shalom (Jud. vi. 24), Jehovah-jireh (Gen. xxii. 14). The LXX. makes a proper name of it, Ἰωσεδέκ. I suppose with HERMANN (Gött. Wehn. Progr. 1752, comp. J. D. MICHAELIS, Observ. S. 189) that it referred the passage to the post-exilic restoration, and understood by Ἰωσεδέκ its representative, the high-priest Joshua, the son of Jozedek, which it always pronounces Ἰωσεδέκ (Hagg. i. 1, 12; Ezr. iii. 2, 8; v. 2; Neh. xii. 26). In favor also of this view is the Jewish interpretation of the passage concerning Zerubbabel, combated by THEODORET and EUSEBIUS (Dem. Ev. vii. 9), which seems to be supported by the LXX. The strange expression ἐν τοῖς προφήταις (THEODORET: αὐτὸς ἐν τ. πρ., perhaps a trace of the final syllable η, which is wanting in Ἰωσεδέκ; EUSEB. Ἰωσεδεκίμ) is also in its favor. It is indeed transferred from ver. 9, where it stands as a title, but it is not impossible that the Alexandrian translators perceived in it a reference to the post-exilic prophets, under whose co-operation Joshua and Zerubbabel labored. The Syriac and ΣΥΜΜΑΧΟΥΣ, moreover, read יְצַדֵּק, for they translate δικαιοσύν ἡμῶν.—If it is not the name of the Messiah, but of the people, then of course all the deductions are futile, which have been drawn from it in support of the deity of the Messiah. Only one thought remains, that Israel will be a nation, that will have no other righteousness than Jehovah's. Some would take יְצַדֵּק exclusively in the sense of "salvation" (GRAF). Without denying that it may have this meaning (comp. Rems. on vii. 5; ix. 23; Isa. xlvi. 12, etc.), I do not think that here צַדִּיקָה, יְצַדֵּק, or any similar word would have done as well. The prophet certainly chose יְצַדֵּק not without reason, i. e. not without regard to its specific meaning. We are therefore justified in taking it in the entire fulness of its verbal significance as expressing the thought that Jehovah is His people's righteousness and therefore their salvation. The expression is thus one of those which contain more than the prophet himself imagines, and we may therefore find in it also an antithesis to personal righteousness, which Israel thought to obtain by the works of the law (Rom. ix. 31, 32. xi. 7), but did not succeed. It has been further correctly remarked (Vide HENGSTENBERG, Christology ad h. l.) that Zedekiah changed his former name into this with reference to this passage. Compelled by Nebuchadnezzar to assume another name (2 Ki. xxiv. 17, comp. KEIL on xxiii. 34) he chose this, which may very well signify "Jehovah my Righteousness," and by which he expressed the presumptuous hope, that Jeremiah's glorious promise would find in him the beginning of its fulfilment—in which he expressed rather an irony than a glorification of himself.

Vers. 7, 8. Therefore . . . in their own land. These two verses are repeated with unessential alterations from xvi. 14, 15. They stand in both places in a suitable connection, and Jeremiah himself may here, as frequently, have reproduced his own words spoken before. The omission of these verses here by the LXX., and their supplementation at the end of the chapter, whereas ver. 6 closes with the words: Ἰωσεδέκ ἐν τοῖς προφήταις, I cannot, with HITZIG and GRAF, regard as a proof that the two verses were wanting in the Hebrew original of the Translator. The admitted capricious arbitrariness of this translator deprives his testimony of all demonstrative force. The occasion of the transposition may have been the circumstance that the verses have in xvi. 14, 15 a minatory, here a friendly, meaning, which led him to think that they must be introduced in the same connection as in ch. xvi. This end he attained by placing them at the close of the minatory prophecy against the prophets. It should further be remarked that both verses, in the positive part of their relative clauses, agree in part verbatim with ver. 2, and in so far might be regarded as superfluous in this place. But the main emphasis is to be laid on the main proposition, "they shall no more say, As Jehovah liveth, etc., but: As Jehovah liveth," etc., and in this sense they have the significance of a concluding doxology. The reduction of Israel from the later exile will furnish a more glorious substratum to the oath by the name of Jehovah.

2. Against the False Prophets (xxiii. 9-40.).

a. The Blind Leaders of the Blind.

XXIII. 9-15.

9 Against the Prophets:—

Broken is my heart in my breast, all my bones quake,¹
I am become like a drunken man, and a man whom wine has overcome,
Because of Jehovah and because of his holy words.

10 For the land is full of adulterers.

(For on account of the curse² the land mourns,

- The pastures of the desert are dried up;) And their course is become evil and their might not right.
- 11 For both prophet and priest are profane, Even in my house have I found their wickedness, saith Jehovah.
- 12 Therefore their way shall be to them as slippery places in the dark; They shall be driven³ that they fall therein; For I shall bring calamity upon them in the year of their visitation, Saith Jehovah.
- 13 Also in the prophets of Samaria have I seen perversity.⁴ They prophesied⁵ by Baal and led my people Israel astray.
- 14 But in the prophets of Jerusalem I saw what is horrible; Adultery and dealing in falsehood,— They strengthened the hands of the evil-doers, That they did not turn⁶ every one from his wickedness. They are all become to me like Sodom, And their inhabitants like Gomorrah.
- 15 Therefore saith Jehovah Zebaoth thus concerning the prophets: Behold, I feed them with absinthe [wormwood], And give them poison-water to drink, For from the prophets of Jerusalem profanation has gone out over the whole land.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 10.—The LXX., Syriac, and Arab. read אָלֵה instead of אָלֵה. So also HIRZIG and MEIER. אָלֵה, however, merely designates the effect as indirect, occasioned by the curse, with reference to Deut. xxviii. 15-65; xxix. 19-28.

³ Ver. 12.—יִדְרֹוּ from יָרַח, comp. OLSHAUSEN, § 265 e.

⁴ Ver. 13.—תִּפְלָה, insulsum, insipidum [unsavoriness]. Besides only in Job i. 22; xxiv. 12.

⁵ Ver. 13.—הִנְבְּאוּ. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 23, Ann. 9; Ezek. xxxvii. 10.

⁶ Ver. 14.—לְבַלְתִּי שָׁבוּ. This construction is found besides only in xxvii. 18; Ezek. xiii. 3. In Ezek. xiii. 23, where these words are quoted, we read לְבַלְתִּי-שָׁבוּ, but we are not therefore to assume an error here. The finite verb is admissible, because a condition, which actually existed, is to be designated.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet begins by describing his feelings at the reception of this revelation. His sensations were those of a man of broken heart, or of a drunken man (ver. 9). By this introduction we obtain a standard, by which to measure the importance of the following passage. First the moral condition of the people is described as very bad, especially from the prevalence of adultery. (Punishment of this the prevalent drought) (ver. 10). How could it be otherwise when the spiritual leaders of the people, prophets and priests were themselves profane men, who even desecrated the sanctuary with their crimes? (ver. 11). Therefore in the corresponding period punishment must come upon them also (ver. 12). Even the prophets in Samaria had led the people of Israel astray by their scandalous behaviour (ver. 13). The prophets of Jerusalem, however, had in the point of popular seduction, accomplished something truly horrible. Not only had they gone before with their example of wickedness, but had actually strengthened the evil-doers in their wickedness and restrained them from conversion, so that the nation had become to the Lord like Sodom and Gomorrah (ver. 14). Therefore, as the profaners of the land, they must be given poison to drink and be fed with bitterness (ver. 15).

Ver. 9. Against the prophets . . . holy words. To connect, as indicated by the accents, broken with against the prophets, is not grammatically impossible (comp. ex. gr. xxxi. 20), but not altogether appropriate in meaning. For a broken heart does not signify anger or indignation (which is the only state of mind Jeremiah could be supposed to be in towards the false prophets), but humiliation, anxiety, care. Comp. Ps. xxxiv. 19; li. 19; lx. 21; Isa. lxi. 1. But it becomes perfectly clear that we have here a superscription before us, when we observe that evidently the whole section, xxiii. 9-40, as relating to the prophets, is opposed to the preceding as relating to the kings, that the title consequently states the main purport, not only of the next verses, but of the whole following discourse. Such superscriptions are moreover common in the book of this prophet: xlv. 2; xlvi. 1; xlviii. 1, 7, 23, 28.—By holy words are meant the revelation contained in what follows. What shocked the prophet to such an unusual degree was doubtless a glance granted him into the depths of human depravity and on the other hand of the divine wrath. Comp. iv. 19; viii. 18 sqq.

Vers. 10-12. For the land is full . . . visitation, saith Jehovah.—For is causal. But since the reason of the prophet's great shock is not expressed in the next sentence only, but in the whole of what follows also, For is to be referred to the entire following discourse.—Adul- terers. That this crime prevailed most extensively is evident from v. 7, 8; ix. 1; xxix. 23. Where, however, הַזִּנְיָוִים in this respect is not discovered, it is difficult to find it in other respects, and especially in relation to God. Comp. rems. on v. 1.—For on account, etc. This sentence to dried up is to be regarded as a parenthesis. From the general calamity of drought may be argued the presence of a general guiltiness. Moreover, both the indication of the drought, which looks like a demonstratio ad oculos and the leading back to the false prophets (ver. 11), reminds us very strongly of xiv. 2, 13-18.—And their course is connected with “full of adulterers.” Their thought and endeavor generally (their walking and running, comp. viii. 6; Prov. i. 16; Isa. lix. 7; Rom. ix. 16) is directed to evil, therefore itself evil; they are strong only for that which is not right. Comp. rems. on viii. 6.—For both prophes, etc. This sentence states the reason why the moral corruption is so general: it cannot be otherwise, since the teachers and leaders of the people are not only themselves profane and godless, but practise their ungodliness even in the sanctuary, the most influential centre of theocratic life. Therefore the prophet says directly in ver. 15, From the prophets of Jerusalem is gone forth profanation over the whole land. Evidently profanation is there used with reference to profane here. On the subject comp. xxxii. 34; Ezek. viii. 3 sqq. The priests are moreover mentioned only incidentally; in the whole subsequent part of the discourse Jeremiah speaks only of the prophets. Perhaps the juxtaposition of the two is only a reminiscence from xiv. 18, where alone the expression occurs.—In the dark. Comp. Ps. xxxv. 6 [Thomson, The Land and the Book, 1., p. 106].—Year of visitation. Comp. xi. 23. It is apparent from this expression that the visitation is still in the indefinite future.

Vers. 13-15. Also in the prophets of Samaria . . . over the whole land. In these verses it is more particularly shown how the corruption extended from the prophets over the whole country. At the same time its merited punishment is announced to them.—The 1 here (Also) and at the beginning of ver. 14 (But) correspond, but the whole sentences are not parallel, for it could not be said: Both in the prophets of Samaria I see perversity, and in the prophets of Jerusalem what is horrible, the latter clause containing a climax. The expression is founded on a mingling of two ways of speaking, “both in the prophets of Samaria I see what is bad, and in the prophets of Jerusalem,” and “in the prophets of Samaria I see הַפְּלֵא, but in the prophets of Jerusalem even שִׁעִירוֹרָה.” Both are confounded in the sentence: both in the prophets of Samaria I see what is bad, and in the prophets of Jerusalem what is horrible.—We cannot well render these modes of expression word for word. Comp. the parallel, equally unfavorable for Judah, in iii. 6-10.—By Baal. Comp. rems. on ii. 8.—Led astray. In this leading astray by means of prophecy in the name of idols is the point of connection between vers. 10 and 11.—Horrible. Comp. v. 30.—Strengthened, etc. They thus not only seduced the people into wickedness by their example, but sustained them therein by the authority of their example and detained them from repentance.—The subject of are become is the prophets, while their must refer to Jerusalem.—The comparison with Sodom and Gomorrah is here as in Zeph. ii. 9, yet with this difference, that they are here the emblem of moral corruption, there of outward desolation.—Poison-water. Comp. viii. 14; ix. 14.—Profanation. Comp. iii. 9. In this last causal sentence (for from the prophets of Jerusalem has profanation gone out), the fundamental thought of the strophe again comes out clearly.

v. Warning against deception by the Prophets.

XXIII. 16-22.

- 16 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth,
Listen not to the words of the prophets who prophesy to you;
They deceive you.¹
They speak their own heart's vision, not from the mouth of Jehovah.
- 17 They say continually to my despisers:
Jehovah hath spoken,² “There shall be peace to you;”
And whosoever one walketh³ in the hardness of his heart,
There they say: no evil shall come upon you.
- 18 For he who hath stood in the counsel of Jehovah,
Let him perceive⁴ and hear his word,
Let him who hath marked my word⁵ proclaim it.⁶
- 19 Behold, a storm-wind of Jehovah!
Fury is gone forth⁷ and whirling storm—
Upon the head of the ungodly it will be rolled.

- 20 The anger of Jehovah will not turn back,
Till he execute and carry out the plans of his heart.
At the end of days ye will become aware of this.
- 21 I sent not the prophets, yet they ran,
I spake not to them, yet they prophesied.
- 22 But had they stood in my counsel,
Then they would have proclaimed my words to my people,
And have brought them back from their wicked way,
And from the wickedness of their deeds.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 16.—כַּהֲלִים, Hiph. here only. The Kal in ii. 5; 2 Ki. xvii. 15; Ps. lxi. 11; Job xxvii. 12. He who renders another frivolous, so that his mind is directed to what is frivolous, has led him astray, deceived him. Comp. xiv. 14; Ezek. xiii. 2, 3.

² Ver. 17.—אֲכָרִים אֲכֹר וְגו'. On the construction comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 97, 1, a, Anm.—Instead of דִּבְרַר הַלֵּךְ the LXX. and Syriac, according to the view of some, read דִּבְרַר. But they might have taken דִּבְרַר itself as a subst.=דִּבְרַר, as in Hos. i. 2; Jer. v. 13. The LXX. also connect the word with the preceding: τοῖς ἀποθουμένοις λόγον κυρίου, while the Syriac translates: dicunt eis, qui me exasperant; ex oraculo Domini pax erit vobis. דִּבְרַר certainly never stands as an introductory formula (=פֶּה אֲכָר): it most prevalently stands after אֲשֶׁר or כִּי־אֲשֶׁר. But as Jeremiah was quoting the words of the Pseudo-prophets he may have purposely avoided the current formula of the true prophets. As the more difficult reading then דִּבְרַר deserves the preference.

³ Ver. 17.—וְכָל הַלֵּךְ. The construction is not to be explained by the effect of the ל before כִּי־אֲשֶׁר, but the participle is used absolutely as it is frequently, especially after כָּל. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 97, 2 ḡ.

⁵ Ver. 18.—דִּבְרֵי. The Masoretes unnecessarily alter into דִּבְרוּ הַקְּשִׁיבִי with the accus. in Job xiii. 6; Ps. xvii. 1; lxi. 2.

⁷ Ver. 19.—הִמְהָה is in explicative apposition. יִצְאָה is to be taken as a perfect: the hurricane has already burst forth.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The main thought is: warning against false prophets who deceive the people and proclaim what comes not from the mouth of the Lord but from their own heart (ver. 16). Thus they proclaim peace to the despisers of the Lord, and impunity to those who go about in the hardness of their heart (ver. 17). Thus too they betray themselves. For he to whom is granted the honor of receiving information concerning the counsel of the Lord, cannot do otherwise than proclaim the Lord's word as he received it (ver. 18). But the word of the Lord never proclaims impunity to the despisers. Rather concerning these is to be expected a tempest of anger from the Lord, who will not rest till He has carried out all His plans. In the end of days this will indeed be marked (vers. 19, 20). Thus they are not sent or commissioned by the Lord (ver. 21). But even had they, without receiving any express commission, only assisted as witnesses to the counsel of the Lord they would have proclaimed the word of the Lord to the people, and have turned them from their wicked way (ver. 22). The warning against the false prophets is thus occasioned by the admission of the double fact, that the Lord has not sent them, and that they have not been present at the counsel of the Lord or received information thereof. That the Lord has not sent them will be proved by His doing just the contrary of what they predicted. But that they have not at all entered into the counsel of the Lord is seen from this, that what they proclaimed to the people does not agree with the genuine word of the Lord, and that they have not labored to turn the people from their wicked way.

Ver. 18. For he who hath stood . . . proclaim it. There are two modes of explanation: 1. He who has stood in the counsel of God, he sees and hears my word, he who has marked my word let him proclaim it (GRAF). 2. For who has stood in the counsel of the Lord? etc. The latter explanation would however either have the meaning, that no one had stood in the counsel of the Lord, which a prophet could not say, or we must take עָוָר בְּסוֹר in the sense of privately, without calling, assisting in the counsel of the Lord—which would be arbitrary and require before ver. 18 the supplementation of the double thought: "such things have I not said to them, and they cannot have heard them in my counsel (quasi me invito)." Hence כִּי can be taken in the sense of quisquis only according to the first mode of interpretation. (Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 79, 6). The connection is then as follows: Listen not to the prophets, they deceive you, for they proclaim their own thoughts, not my commissions, promising impunity to my despisers. For he who has stood in the counsel of the Lord, must proclaim the Lord's word, which cannot possibly be favorable to His despisers. The point of the thought is therefore contained in ver. 17: The despisers of the service of Jehovah were well-known people. If prophets, who pretended to speak in the name of Jehovah, promised such impunity, they thus proved themselves indisputably to be deceivers.—To stand in the counsel is not to sit in the counsel (Ps. i. 1). The latter designates assistance with an advisory voice.—Such an one is called עֵצָה טוֹבָה Isa. xl. 13. Comp. Rom. xi. 34. Standing in the counsel of the Lord, i. e. as hearers, is declared in the proper sense of prophets: Isa. vi. 1-8; 1 Ki. xxii. 19-23.—Yet we shall not err, if we assume that Jeremiah wishes the expression here to be taken in a wider sense, in which sense Am. iii. 7

נִלְהָ כוֹרֵו is used. Comp. Ps. xxv. 14. For we cannot suppose that all the prophets received all their revelations in the form in which, according to the passages cited, Micah and Isaiah received those mentioned.—Let him perceive [see]. How can the word of the Lord be seen? A reference to ii. 31; Eccles. i. 16 does not seem to me satisfactory. Certainly the divine revelation might partly be seen in vision (comp. וַיִּרְוֶה לְבַבִּי ver. 16; i. 11, 13; xxiv. 1), partly heard (1 Sam. iii. 9, 10); it could be received by the organ of the eye or the ear.—The effect of the seeing and hearing is indicated by “mark:” he who gives heed to my word, hears it not only with the outer but the inner ear, he may, etc.

Vers. 19, 20. Behold, a storm-wind . . . aware of this. In antithesis to ver. 17 it is here set forth, what the true intention of Jehovah is with respect to the people. Both verses are repeated xxx. 23, 24.—A storm-wind of Jehovah, not physical but spiritual; an outburst of divine wrath is proclaimed by the prophet.—Upon the head. Comp. 2 Sam. iii. 29.—Will not turn back. The storm will produce not merely a slight passing effect but a thoroughly destructive one. It will not cease till the will of the holy and just God is completely accomplished. Comp. Isa. xlv. 23; Ps. cxxxii. 11.—At the end of days, etc. Comp. Gen. xlix. 1; Numb. xxiv. 14; Dent. iv. 30; xxxi. 29; Isa. ii. 2; Jer. xlviii. 47; xlix. 39. A contrast to the present is here involved: you do not now regard it as possible; at the end of days, however, i. e. at the conclusion of this section of history in which we live, you will indeed perceive it, viz., that it can and must be thus. End of days, therefore, expresses a relative idea. Comp. ver. 12.

Vers. 21, 22. I sent not . . . their deeds. A new and perfectly clear reason for the desolation in ver. 16. How could those be true prophets whom the Lord sent not, to whom He spoke not? If, however, they should allege, that if not rite officially and de jure yet actually they had received information of the divine counsel, they must at least proclaim the word of Jehovah in its severity as hostile to the wicked and urging them to repentance. But since this is not the case they are irrefutably demonstrated to be false prophets and deceivers.

c. The Criminal Mingling of Man's word and God's Word.

XXIII. 23-32.

- 23 Am I a God at hand? saith Jehovah,
And not a God at a distance?¹
- 24 If a man conceal himself in a hiding place,
Shall I not see him? saith Jehovah.
Am I not he, who filleth heaven and earth? saith Jehovah.
- 25 I have heard what the prophets say,
Who prophesy falsely in my name;
“I have dreamed, I have dreamed.”
- 26 How long still is the fire in the heart of the prophets,
Who prophesy falsehood,—
The prophets of the deceit of their own heart?
- 27 Who make the endeavor² to cause my people
To forget³ my name by their dreams,
Which they relate one to another,
As their fathers forgot my name through Baal.
- 28 Let the prophet, to whom a dream came, relate the dream,
Let him to whom my word came, relate my word truly.⁴
What has the straw to do with the grain? saith Jehovah.
- 29 Is not my word just like the fire? saith Jehovah,
And like the hammer, which breaketh rocks in pieces?
- 30 Therefore behold, I am against the prophets, saith Jehovah,
Who steal my words one from another!
- 31 Behold, I am against the prophets, saith Jehovah,

Who take their tongue and pronounce oracles.⁵
 32 Behold, I am against them, who prophesy false dreams, saith Jehovah,
 And relate them and lead my people astray,
 By their falsehood and by their boasting.⁶
 I had not sent them nor commissioned them,
 They can also be of no profit to this people, saith Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

As though the exalted (ver. 23) and omniscient God, who fills heaven and earth would know nothing of it (ver. 24), the false prophets dared to give forth their dreams as the word of God (ver. 25). How long will this unreason, which is at the same time deception and self-deception, last? (ver. 26). How long will they seek by their dreams to bring Jehovah into oblivion among the people, as their fathers forgot Him for Baal? (ver. 27). With this is associated a second mischief, that they give out the dream not as their dream, but as Jehovah's word is to be proclaimed as such, connect this with their productions, though they have no more relation than the straw has to the grain (ver. 28), or to the fire, or the rock-crushing hammer (ver. 29). Hence the prophet finally formulates a triple charge against the prophets: 1. They steal God's words (ver. 31); 2. They ape the form of genuine prophecy; 3. They lead the people astray by their lying dreams:

Vers. 23, 24. Am I a God . . . saith Jehovah. The audacity of the false prophets, who did not fear to cover themselves with the name of Jehovah, is founded on the delusion that He was not in a condition to perceive their presumption. They regard the Lord as a God, who is only able to behold that which is near, i. e. can overlook only a limited domain. In opposition to this the Lord calls Himself אֵלֹהֵי כְרוֹק, i. e. a God who takes note of that which occurs even in the remotest distance, who from His throne in heaven overlooks also the earth, because as filling heaven and earth He is present in both. Comp. Am. ix. 2-4; Job xi. 8, 9; Ps. cxxxix. 7-12.

Ver. 25. I have heard . . . dreamed. This is the main charge, the sin which stands first in view of the omnipresent and omniscient God. Dreams were in themselves an acknowledged and legitimate medium of divine revelation. Comp. Numb. xii. 6; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6, 15; Joel iii. 1; Dan. vii. 1. But they occupy a low stage among the forms of divine communication. Comp. KNOBEL, Proph. d. Hebr., I., S. 174 seqq. HERZOG, Real-Enc., XVI., S. 297 ff.; DELITZSCH, Psychologie, Kap. IV., § 14.—These false prophets always speak only of their dreams as the media of their divine illumination. Of course!

For the dream is most withdrawn from the control of other men. Nothing is easier than to say, Last night I dreamed this or that. Who can refute it? The prophets thus make an immoderate and in itself suspicious use of dreams. They are dreamers, and it is remarkable that in Deut. xiii. 1, 3, 5 נְבִיאִים, by which there a false prophet is always meant, is regularly distinguished also as הַלֵּם הַלֵּם, a dreamer of dreams. [“Although it pleased God to reveal Himself sometimes in dreams to His faithful people of old, yet when false prophets arose, who opposed the true, such revelations were rare. We have no instance of them in Isaiah, Jeremiah, or Ezekiel, or other prophets who were opposed by false prophets.” WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.}]

Vers. 26, 27. How long . . . through Baal. By how long the Lord makes known that the conduct of these prophets, which is more particularly described in these two verses, is intolerable to Him. Great difficulty is caused by הַיֵּשׁ. The ancient translations coolly omit the הַיֵּשׁ and make it otherwise convenient to themselves. Vulg. and Chald.: usque quo istud est in corde, etc. LXX.: ἕως πότε ἔσται ἐν καρδίᾳ, etc. Syr.: quousque erunt in ore falsorum prophetarum propheticæ falsæ?—The interpretations which adhere to the text are three: 1. The question is asked by a double interrogative כַּתִּי and הַיֵּשׁ, which, however, amounts to this that the latter is quite superfluous. HIRZIG appeals indeed to xlvi. 27 and Mic. vi. 10. But in neither of these places is there a double interrogative. Besides the subject is wanting, and the thought: How long have they still the material for dreams? is certainly strange. 2. נְבִיאִים and נְבִיאֵי are rendered according to the construction נְבִיאֵי הַיֵּשׁ הַיֵּשׁ הַיֵּשׁ, Gen. ix. 20. Comp. EWALD, § 298 b, NAEGELSB. Gr., § 95, g, Ann. Thus EWALD and MEIER. But apart from this that both ignore the interrogative He, the construction with שׁ is without a precedent, forced and feeble in sense, for it seems as though the Lord expected an alteration in these prophets, though He had previously represented them as incurably corrupt (comp. vers. 11, 14), and according to ver. 27, expects nothing from them but the endeavor to bring Him into forgetfulness among the people. Is the thought suitable in this connection: "How long do the prophets purpose to be false prophets?" (MEIER). 3. The interpretation is most satisfactory which was first offered by LUDWIG DE DIEU and adopted by SEN. SCHMIDT, CHR. B. MICHAELIS, ROSENMUELLER, UMBREIT, GRAF and others, according to which לֵךְ כֹהֵן is to be rendered as an independent sentence (=how long still will this last?)

הֵיטָב לֵךְ to be taken as = have in mind? and הֵהֲשִׁיבֵנִי, ver. 27, to be regarded as a resumption of the question interrupted by the words following לֵךְ: have in mind the prophets, who . . . think they, to make my people forget? Although this interpretation gives a sense which is tolerably satisfactory, it is opposed by the grammatical difficulty, that הֵהֲשִׁיבֵנִי should stand after הֵהֲשִׁיבֵנִי as a recapitulation of the subject, which could not be absent after the interruption and the removal thereby effected of the proper subject. If then this interpretation also is not perfectly satisfactory, it is natural to suppose that the text is faulty. Should we not read הֵיטָב instead of הֵיטָב? Jeremiah had above, xx. 9, compared the irresistible impulse to proclaim the word of the Lord, to a fire burning in his heart. Could not he who loves to quote himself, and who knows how to wield the weapon of irony against his opponents, in order to set forth incisively the difference between the true and false prophets, ironically presuppose in the latter what, as he well knew, was possessed only by the true prophets? He, staggering under the burden of persecution, had said (xx. 9): "I will not speak any more in His name," but he was obliged to do so. Those who ought not compelled themselves to prophesy in the name of Jehovah. Did then such a fire burn also in their hearts? And if so, how long will it continue? Every one is summoned by these questions to make the comparison, but every one will also be obliged to confess that the miserable little flame of human egotism is not to be compared with the high and noble flame of divine inspiration, which burned in the prophet's breast.—The prophets of the deceit, etc. They deceive others, after and because they have deceived themselves. Comp. xiv. 14; Ezek. xiii. 2.—Cause to forget. On the subject-matter comp. ii. 32; iii. 21; xiii. 25; xviii. 15; i. 6.—One to another. Not every one to his colleagues, but every one to his fellow. For they have corrupted the people by their lies. Comp. ver. 32; xiv. 13 sqq.; xxiii. 14 sqq.; i. 6.—Through Baal. Comp. ii. 8. It is apparent that these false prophets did not prophesy in the name of an idol, but in the name of Jehovah, but they proclaimed in His name not His word but the deceit of their own heart.

Vers. 28, 29. Let the prophet . . . rocks in pieces. The Lord does not object if the prophets relate their own dreams as such. But they are not to mix them with the true word of God, and on the ground of this mingling utter them as a divine revelation. As the dreams are to be related as such, so also the real revelation of God is to be handed down purely, i. e. without addition or subtraction. It is clear that the connection requires this meaning for אֵשׁ. Comp. ii. 21; Prov. xi. 18. A mixture of the two elements is just as unsuitable as a mingling of empty straw with grain. The straw cannot be used with the grain, nor the grain with the straw. This comparison, and the following one of the hammer and "who steal," ver. 30, shows that Jeremiah here, i. e. from ver. 25, has in view not the presentation of the products of human subjectivity as the products of divine objectivity, but the mingling of the two elements. He censures the former in vers. 25-27. As merchants often sell wholly sham goods, or those which are partly sham and partly genuine, as genuine, so do these prophets. Both are certainly שָׁקֵר—

Is not my word like a fire? etc. A point in the comparison with straw is further developed. The straw is not only false ware, when found (as chopped straw) among the bread-corn, but simply as straw it has no strength, and is useless for defence or offence. So is also the word of the false prophets. In opposition to this, God's word is like the all-conquering fire (comp. Song of Sol. viii. 6, 7), or like the hammer crushing the hardest rock (Heb. iv. 12; Eccles. xii. 11). How despicable does the word of the pseudo-prophets appear in these comparisons and what a disgraceful mesalliance do they cause by their mingling! I do not think that the prevalent minatory and punitive import of the genuine prophecies was meant, for the Gospel is the most intensive force (1 Cor. i. 18-24; ii. 4; Rom. i. 16).

Vers. 30-32. Therefore behold . . . saith Jehovah. These three similarly opening verses recapitulate the main thoughts of the section in reverse order, in such wise also, that a point latent in the foregoing context (ver. 31), is now plainly set forth. Ver. 30 evidently corresponds to ver. 28. They steal the genuine words of God, not directly every one from his colleague (ver. 27), but every one from his fellow as he pleases, thus in part at first hand from true prophets, in part at second hand from false prophets, or where-soever they can find them. Unmixed falsehood betrays itself too easily and is insipid. But falsehood mingled with truth is powerful error, and the beauty of truth serves as an ornamental covering to its deformity. The second Behold, etc., ver. 31, corresponds to "who prophesy falsely in my name," vers. 25, 26. For thereby it is implicitly declared that they proclaimed their lies in the same form as the true prophets, as oracles of Jehovah. But how cheaply they hold these? All they needed was to set their tongues to work. How dear on the other hand did Jeremiah account the honor of being Jehovah's true prophet! Comp. xx. 7-9.—The third Behold, etc., corresponds to vers. 25-27, the import of which it plainly repeats.

d. The criminal use of the word "burden."

XXIII. 33-40.

- 33 And when this people, or the prophets¹ or priests,
Ask thee, What is the burden of Jehovah?
Thou shalt tell them what the burden of Jehovah is;²
Namely, "I reject you,"³ saith Jehovah.
- 34 And the prophet, the priest, or the people
That say, "Burden of Jehovah;"
On such a man and his house will I visit it.
- 35 Thus shall ye say, every one to his neighbour and every one to⁴ his brother:
What hath Jehovah answered? or What hath Jehovah spoken?
- 36 But "burden of Jehovah" ye shall no more take into your mouth;
For the burden will be to each his own word;
Because ye have perverted the words of the living God,
Jehovah Zebaoth, our God.
- 37 Thus shalt thou say to the prophet:
What has Jehovah answered thee?
Or, What has Jehovah spoken?
- 38 But if ye say, "Burden of Jehovah,"
On this account saith Jehovah thus:
Because ye say this word, "Burden of Jehovah,"
And I had sent unto you a message of this purport,
"Ye shall not say, 'Burden of Jehovah,'"—
- 39 Therefore, behold, I burden you⁵ and thrust you,
And this city which I gave to you and your fathers,
Away from my presence;
- 40 And lay upon you everlasting reproach,
And everlasting shame, that shall not be forgotten.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 33.—The article is general, and נְבִיאִים expresses the idea of species. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 71, 4, a.

² Ver. 33.—אֶת-מִשְׁאֵל-מִלֵּא. Many modern commentators follow the LXX. and Vulg. which read אֶתְּהֵם הַמִּשְׁאֵל, but incorrectly. In His answer the Lord purposely uses the words of the question: Verba retorquet. The arrow directed against him must, being reversed, strike those insolent questioners. It should indeed properly read אֶת אֲשֶׁר מִשְׁאֵל. But the necessity of retaining the words of the question justified this grammatical license, which moreover (Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 79, 6) is not altogether without precedent. אֶת depends on וְאָמַרְתָּ. Comp. xiv. 17, etc. The construction is therefore by no means so artificial and clumsy as EWALD supposes.

³ Ver. 33.—וְנִשְׁתַּחֲוֶינִי is not co-ordinated with וְאָמַרְתָּ, as is apparent from וְאָמַרְתָּ. It rather expresses the purport of that which Jeremiah is to proclaim as the "burden," etc. וְ is therefore—and indeed. It should only be remarked that וְ here in this meaning stands before a whole sentence, which, however, on account of its brevity is not thereby rendered less easily intelligible.

⁴ Ver. 35.—On the interchange of עַל and לְ, comp. rems. on x. 1.

⁵ Ver. 39.—וְנִשְׂתִּי נִשְׂא. The paronomasia requires us to read וְנִשְׂתִּי נִשְׂא, as the LXX., Vulg., Syr., and some Codd. and editions really do. It is not necessary to assume the Piel form וְנִשְׂתִּי, since forms like כָּל־אֲתִי Ps. cxix. 102; כָּל־הִנִּי 1 Sam. xxv. 33; צָמַת Ruth ii. 9, justify the assumption of וְ also in the Kal according to the analogy of the לִרְהוּ verbs.

Comp. OLSH., § 223, a, Anm.—The reading וְנִשְׂתִּי, which does not afford any satisfactory sense, but may be translated "I forget," or "I heard not," is doubtless occasioned by the unusual punctuation (וְנִשְׂתִּי). A proof that the latter is the original is found in the Inf. נִשְׂא, the נ of which is likewise abnormal and therefore a sure trace of the original נִשְׂא. כָּל־מִוֶּתֶן כָּל־מִוֶּתֶן is ἀπ. λεγ. and perhaps to be read כָּל־מִוֶּתֶן, after xx. 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The word of double meaning מִשְׁאֵל, which signifies both "saying" and "burden," was misused by the Jews, who were accustomed to ask the prophets mockingly what sort of a מִשְׁאֵל they had. Jeremiah is to tell those who thus ask, what sort of a burden threatens them, viz., that they shall be rejected (ver. 33), and each who thus asks shall, for this derision, be subjected to a special visitation (ver. 34). If any wish to ask the prophets, he is to make use of the expression, What has the Lord answered or spoken? (ver. 35). But the expression נשׁוֹן (burden and saying) is no more to be used, for this perversion of a divine word will be avenged, such insolent words falling back like a heavy burden on the head of their authors (ver. 36). The inquiry is to be made thus: What has the Lord answered or spoken? (ver. 37). If, notwithstanding, the forbidden word is used (ver. 38), the Lord will carry away the people like a burden (ver. 39), and give them up to everlasting shame (ver. 40).

Vers. 33, 34. And when this people . . . visit it.—What burden? It appears to have been the custom, whenever the prophets made their appearance in public to ask them if they had received any new revelation. There can be no doubt that נשׁוֹן means “saying, utterance,” as well as “burden.” Comp. the thorough demonstration in GRAF, S. 315. The passages from which it evidently follows that נשׁוֹן signifies effatum, any utterance, besides those where the verb נשׁוֹן is used in the sense vocem proferre with and without לִי, voice (Isa. iii. 7; xlii. 2, 11 coll. Exod. xx. 7; xxiii. 1; Numb. xxiii. 7; Ps. cxxxix. 20, etc.), are especially the following: Isa. xiv. 28; Lam. ii. 14; 2 Ki. ix. 25; Prov. xxx. 1; xxxi. 1. HENGSTENBERG and RUECKERT, following the example of JONATHAN, AQUILA, the Syriac, JEROME and LUTHER, would take the word exclusively in the sense of “burden.” We have translated “burden” above, but only because we have no expression, which without forcing unites both meanings. Of the many attempts to unite them by DE WETTE, EWALD, FÜRST, MEIER, none are really satisfactory. DE WETTE’s translation is most so. [Wehsagung: utterance of woe.—S. R. A.]. At all events the opposers emphasized the idea of burden. They wished to say that every declaration of Jehovah was only a new burden, that only what was burdensome, not what was pleasing, came from this God. In so far the question was one of blasphemous derision. It is implied by the word namely that what follows is a quotation. The passage to which Jeremiah refers is doubtless xii. 7, “rejected mine inheritance.” The significance of this passage is clear from the fact that it is reproduced in a comprehensive survey in 2 Ki. xxi. 14.—Will I visit it. Besides the judgment announced to the people generally on account of their sins, those who make use of the expression “burden” in a wicked manner, shall receive special punishment.

Vers. 35-37. Thus shall ye say . . . Jehovah spoken.—For the burden will be, etc. Even the insolent words will be to him who utters them a crushing burden, though the utterance of Jehovah, with respect to which he uses the term, is not in itself a burden at all.—These words are a parenthesis, and hence because ye have perverted, etc., is connected with ye shall no more take into your mouth and declare the result of using the forbidden word.—Living God. Comp. x. 10.

III. APPENDIX.

(CHAP. XXIV.)

POSTSCRIPT TO XXII. 13-30. The Fourth King.

XXIV. 1-10.

- 1 The LORD [Jehovah] shewed me, and behold, two baskets¹ of figs were set² before the temple of the LORD [Jehovah] after that Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, had carried away captive Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, and the princes of Judah, with the carpenters and smiths, from Jerusalem and had
- 2 brought them to Babylon. One basket had³ very good figs, like the figs first ripe,⁴ and the other basket had very naughty [bad] figs, which could not be eaten,⁵ they
- 3 were so bad. Then said the LORD [Jehovah] unto me, What seest thou, Jeremiah? And I said, Figs; the good figs very good, and the evil [bad] very evil [bad], that cannot be eaten, they are so evil [bad].
- 4 Again the word of the LORD [Jehovah] came unto me, saying:
- 5 Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah], the God of Israel: Like these good figs, so the captives of Judah, Whom I have sent away from this place into the land of the Chaldeans, Will I regard⁶ for good;
- 6 And will set mine eye upon them for good, And will bring them back into this land;

- And will build them and not pull them down,
 And plant them and not pluck them up;
 7 And will give them a heart to know me, that I am Jehovah,
 And they shall be my people;
 I however will be their God,
 When they return to me with their whole heart.
 8 But like the bad figs, which cannot be eaten they are so bad,
 —Thus saith Jehovah: I will make Zedekiah,
 The king of Judah and his princes,
 And the residue of Jerusalem, that are left in this land,
 And those that dwell in the land of Egypt.
 9 And I will make them a horror,
 A calamity for all the kingdoms of the earth,
 A shame and a proverb, a taunt and a curse,
 In all places whither I shall drive them.
 10 And I will send among them the sword,
 The famine and the pestilence;
 Till they be entirely extirpated from the land,
 Which I gave to them and their fathers.

¹ Ver. 1.—וְרוּחֵם. This plural form is found in this sense here only (in another sense Gen. xxx. 14). It is to be derived from a sing. רוּחַ. Comp. OLSH. § 216, d. Elsewhere the plural of רוּחַ is רוּחִים and רוּחֵי; 2 Chron. xxxv. 13; 2 Ki. x. 7.

² Ver. 1.—עָד is to determine, appoint. The Hiph. is diem dixit, in jus vocavit aliquem (Job ix. 19; Jer. xlix. 19; 1. 44). The Hoph. cannot therefore mean simply positum, collocatum esse. SEE SCHMIDT: duo calathi singulariter a Deo ante templum propositi, ut propheta inde sumeretur. GAAB: The baskets were appointed; they would not have stood there, if God had not had a special object in it. I also believe that in כִּוְנֵי is implied the idea of ex mandato. Yet it seems less probable to me that a mandatum speciale is meant, than that the prophet had in view that mandatum generale, of which we read in Exod. xxiii. 19; xxxiv. 26; Deut. xxvi. 2 sqq. The latter passage is particularly important.

⁵ Ver. 2.—הַבְּכֵרוֹת. The imperf. here as in vers. 3 and 8, might certainly be taken as a simple future;—which are not eaten. The prophet then expresses the certainty, that no one will be in a condition to eat these figs. But the sentence may also be taken with אֲשֶׁר in the sense of a general declaration; אֲשֶׁר is then = quales, which kind of figs cannot be eaten. The imperf. is then used to designate the permanent quality. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 87, d.

⁶ Ver. 5.—הִכִּיר = to recognize, with the collateral idea of approval, allowal. Comp. Ruth ii. 10, 19; and the expression פָּנִים in Deut. i. 17; xvi. 19; Prov. xxiv. 23.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After the carrying away of Jehoiachin the prophet beholds in vision two baskets of figs placed before the temple (ver. 1). The figs of one basket were very good, those of the other very bad (ver. 2). The prophet, when asked, affirms that he has perceived this correctly (ver. 3). Thereupon the Lord Himself interprets the vision: the good figs signify the portion of the people already carried away. The Lord will recognize them as good, bring them back, build and plant, inwardly renew them; He will be their God, they shall be His people (vers. 4-7). The bad figs signify the people left in Palestine with Zedekiah, and those who had already emigrated to Egypt (ver. 8). These shall be to all nations an object of horror and scorn (ver. 9), for the Lord will send among them the sword, famine and pestilence, till they are exterminated from the land (ver. 10). The date of this passage may be learned exactly from ver. 1. It was the time immediately subsequent to the carrying away of Jeconiah (2 Ki. xxiv. 10-12). HLTZIG correctly remarks, that the expression אֲחֵרֵי הַגִּלוֹת, after . . . carried away, ver. 1, without further distinction, does not permit us to think of another epoch than that immediately subsequent to the deportation. The prophecy is also best explained by the situation at that period. For, as GRAF remarks, those who remained may have triumphed over the others, and extolled their good fortune. On this feeling the prophet places a damper by the declaration, that the lot of the captives would be preferable to that of the others (comp. xx. 10). At all events the prophecy was delivered before the sending of that letter to the captives, which is treated of in ch. xxix. On the relation of this passage to the previous chapters consult the introduction to the Eighth Discourse.

Vers. 1, 2. The Lord . . . they were so bad. The opening is like that of Amos vii. 1, 4, 7; viii. 1. Comp. Jer. i. 11, 13.—Shewed me. This distinguishes the subjective act of vision from the object seen, and designates the former as caused by Jehovah. This distinction with respect to physical vision is found times innume-vable, (comp. the mode of expression in Gen. xiii. 10; xviii. 2; xxii. 4, 13, etc.), but has only a rhetorical significance. In passages like this and the above from Amos, to which may be added Zech. i. 8; ii. 1, etc., it cannot be a seeing with the outward eye which is spoken of. This is apparent, 1, from the object of vision; it is not supposable that baskets of bad and good figs were in reality placed before the temple; 2, from the question, What seest thou? The question evidently has a proper meaning, when there is a possibility of seeing incorrectly. On the point whether this is supposable in visions in a subjective and objective respect comp. the remarks on i. 11; 3, from the general character of the state in which the prophet must have been while talking with God. Such a conversation as is here reported can only have taken place εν πνεύματι. For man cannot see and hear God with the bodily senses. But if as talking with God he is εν πνεύματι, then he must also see what God shows him εν πνεύματι. For it is not supposable that in such a case there would be a duplicity of perception. The case being thus, Köllner is right in his remark (on Zech. i. 7) "wherever the description of a prophetic vision is introduced with the words הִנֵּה רָאִיתִי or הִנֵּה רָאִיתָ (here הִנֵּה רָאִיתִי) followed by הִנֵּה הִנֵּה, the prophet thus declares that as רָאִיתִי or רָאִיתָ he has beheld a vision, or had a vision, Isai. xxx. 10." As to the way in which the Lord opens the inner sense so that it can behold spiritual things, comp. 2 Ki. vi. 17.—Carpenters and smiths. According to 2 Ki. xxiv. 14-16, Nebuchadnezzar carried away beside the king, his mother and his wives, the princes, the officers, the mighty of the land, the strong and apt for war, and then the craftsmen and smiths. These were all the mighty men of valor, and only the poorest sort of the people were left. Nebuchadnezzar evidently wished to remove all who were fit for war, as well as those who were skilled in the preparation of warlike instruments. The smiths had once before been carried off for a similar purpose by the Philistines (1 Sam. xiii. 19). So far all is clear. But who now especially are the מְכַנְּנֵי? The word occurs only in the accounts of this occurrence: xxix. 2; 2 Ki. xxiv. 14, 16. Besides with the meaning of "custody, prison," in Isai. xxiv. 22; xlii. 7; Ps. cxlii. 8. The ancient translations greatly differ from each other. The LXX. have here θεσμίνας (comp. Bar. i. 9) in 2 Ki. xxiv. 14 and 16, τὸν ἀγκλιόνα: Syr. milites, satellites; Chald. juniores (so also RASCHI; Arab. mancipia (comp. the interpretation of HIRZIG) [who translates "hod-carriers," and refers the term to the descendants of the aborigines, who were condemned to be wood-splitters and water-carriers in Israel (Deut. xxix. 10; comp. Jos. ix. 21) deriving it from סָרַר socayer, and גַּר stranger.—S. R. A.] If we derive the word, which is certainly most natural, from כָּנַן, we have either the primitive meaning clausor, shutter, gate-shutter, or the derived: he who prepares what is necessary for shutting, shutting in, i. e., either locksmith; or if we derive from כָּנַן, those who prepare siege-works, engineers (EWALD). EWALD would certainly also allow the word to be taken in the sense of "purveyor," by which he understands people "who procure for the king the supplies of his kingdom." But he omits any further proof. HIRZIG, THENIUS, who are followed by GRAF and (as it seems also) by MEIER, who translates "daily laborer," compose the word of כָּס tribule-service and גַּר sojourner, and understand by it common laborers, or hod-carriers, in contrast to skilled artizans. For this interpretation however we find, 1, no analogy in the language, for neither הִנֵּקֶל which alone is adduced by HIRZIG, nor כָּס עֵבֶר (Josh. xvi. 10) suit here; 2. that in 2 Ki. xxiv. 14 it is expressly stated that בְּלֵת עַם-הָאָרֶץ, the common people, remained, and to these must have necessarily belonged those classes of the people, who were כָּס and גַּר. Compare the connection of the passage (2 Ki. xxiv. 13-16) and it will be found that HIRZIG's explanation does not agree with it. Since then, grammatically, the derivation from כָּנַן claudere is most natural, as there is further a כָּנְנָה which signifies "custody," etc., and consequently the meaning of shutting or of employment in that which serves to shut, or shut up (ex. gr., the bolts of gates, Deut. iii. 5; 1 Ki. iv. 13; Neh. iii. 3, 6, 13, etc.), which is the best founded etymologically, I understand, with most recent Comm. the locksmith, the workman, who makes what serves for shutting up in custody. What may be the relation of כָּנְנָה to הִרְשָׁה (carpenters), is certainly obscure. GRAF is meanwhile wrong in supposing that something more general is here to be designated. It may just as well be intended to set forth only a kind of artificer.

Vers. 3-7. Then said the Lord . . . with their whole heart. The construction is: as I acknowledge these good figs (am pleased with them), so I acknowledge the captives . . .—for good, i. e., to render them good. Comp. xiv. 11; Ps. lxxxvi. 17; Neh. v. 19; xiii. 31.—The tertium comparationis is: as one is pleased with good figs and retains them, but throws the bad away, so shall I be pleased with the captives of Judah and retain them, but reject those who remain.—And I will set, etc. Comp. xxi. 10.—and will bring them back. Comp. rems. on iii. 14-17.—and will build, etc. Comp. i. 10.—And they shall be my, etc. Comp. rems. on xi. 4.—When they, etc. Not "if" but "when." In accordance with the opening words of the verse the thought cannot be expressed hypothetically. Comp. moreover iii. 14-17; iv. 1-4.

Vers. 8-10. But like the bad. . . their fathers.—Thus saith Jehovah is a parenthesis. The ו is phonastic at the beginning of a direct sentence (comp. NARBELSU. Gr. § 109, 1, 4), so that the verbum dicendi to be supplied is to be borrowed from ver. 5, to which the ו refers. It is as though the prophet would say, I have already said, I repeat it, that, etc. As to the Jews then already living in Egypt, reference may not be made to xxii. 11. For those who were carried away with Jehoahaz are certainly included under the promised blessing, vers. 6-7, not under the curse. But it is to be supposed that since the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, after the battle of Carchemish, many Jews fled from Egypt to the king conquered in this battle as to their natural ally, as they also did afterwards (ch. xlii. sqq.).—A horror, comp. remarks on xv. 4.—A calamity. This after the example of the LXX. is struck out by IRZIG, EWALD, UMBREIT, GRAF. But why should not the prophet wish to say that the Jews should not merely be given up themselves to destruction but should be the cause of destruction to others also? Has not the Jewish people, sighing under the curse, even to the most recent times developed the bad elements of its native peculiarity in many ways, to the destruction of the nations among whom it has been driven?—A proverb, comp. xxix. 18, 22; Deut. xxviii. 37.—And I will send, comp. xxix. 17-22, where Jeremiah repeats the main thoughts of ch. xxiv.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxi. 2. "King Zedekiah sends word to Jeremiah, that the Lord is to do according to all His miracles, that Nebuchadnezzar may withdraw. A demand rather cavalierly made in such evil circumstances. But the noble are so unfortunate! It is indeed as though it only depended on them to arrange matters with God; as if He were only waiting for them, as if it were a point of honor not to be over-hasty, but first to await a little extremity. . . . It is a very necessary observance for a servant of the Lord, that he try his superiors, whether there is any trace remaining in them of having been once baptized, well brought up and instructed in the fear of the Lord. If he observe anything of this kind, he must insist upon it and especially not allow them to deal too familiarly with the Judge of all the earth, but plainly demonstrate to them their insufficiency and nothingness, if they measure themselves by Him. Though Zedekiah had spoken so superficially, Jeremiah answered him without hesitation, definitely and positively, and accustomed him to a different manner of dealing with the Lord." ZINZENDORF. "When the ungodly desire God's help, they commonly appeal not to His saving power to heal them, but to His miraculous power to save them, while they persist in their impenitence." STARKE.

2. On xxi. 8. "It is pure grace on the part of God, when He leaves to man the choice between the good and the evil; not that it is permitted him to choose the evil, but that he may choose freely the good, which he is under obligation to do, Deut. xxx. 19." STARKE. "God lays before us the way of life and the way of death. The way of life is however always contrary to human reason, and that on which it sees merely death and shame. . . . If thou wilt save thyself thou must leave the false Jerusalem, fallen under the judgment, and seek thy life where there seems to be only death. He who would save his life must lose it, and he who devotes it for the sake of the truth will save it." DIEDRICH.

3. On xxi. 11-19. "To be such a king is to be an abomination to the Lord, and severe judgment will follow. God appoints magistrates for His service and for the use of men; he who only seeks his own enjoyment in office, is lost. Jerusalem, situated on rocks in the midst of a plain, looks secure; but against God neither rocks avail nor aught else. The fire will break out even in them, and consume all around, together with the forest of cedar-houses in the city. The corruption is seated within, and therefore proceeds from within outwards, so that nothing of the former stock can remain. What shall a government do which no longer bears the sword of justice? What shall a church do which is no longer founded on God's truth as its only power?" DIEDRICH. Comp. moreover on the whole of ch. xxiv. the extended moral reflections of CYRILLUS ALEX. περὶ τῆς ἐν πνεύματι καὶ ἀληθ. προσκυνήσεως. Lib. I.

4. On xxii. 1. "Jeremiah is to deliver a sermon at court, in which he reminds the king of his office of magistrate, in which he is to administer justice to every man." CRAMER.

It was no easy task for Jeremiah to go into the lions' den and deliver such an uncourtly message to him. We are reminded of the prophet Jonah. But Jeremiah did not flee as he did.

5. On xxii. 1-3. ["But we ought the more carefully to notice this passage, that we may learn to strengthen ourselves against bad examples, lest the impiety of men should overturn our faith; when we see in God's church things in such disorder, that those who glory in the name of God are become like robbers, we must beware lest we become on this account alienated from true religion. We must, indeed, desert such monsters, but we must take care lest God's word, through men's wickedness, should lose its value in our esteem. We ought then to remember the admonition of Christ, to hear the Scribes and Pharisees who sat in Moses' seat (Matt. xxiii. 2)."] CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

6. On xxii. 10. ["Dying saints may be justly envied, while living sinners are justly pitied. And so dismal perhaps the prospect of the times may be, that tears even for a Josiah, even for a Jesus, must be restrained, that they may be reserved for ourselves and our children (Luke xxiii. 28)."] HENRY.—S. R. A.]

"Nequaquam gentilis plangendus est atque Judæus, qui in ecclesia non fuerint et simul mortui sunt, de quibus Salvator dicit: dimitte mortuos sepelire mortuos suos (Matt. viii. 22). Sed eos plange, qui per scelera atque peccata egreduntur de ecclesia et nolunt ultra reverti ad eam damnatione vitiorum." HIERON. Epist. 46 ad Rusticam. "Nolite flere mortuum, sed plorate raptorem avarum, pecunie sitientem et inexplebilem auri cupidinem. Cur mortuos inutiliter ploramus? Eos ploremus, qui in melius mutari possunt." BASILIUS SELEUCENSIS. Comp. BASIL, MAGN. Homil. 4 de Gratiarum actione post dimid.—GHISSLERUS.

7. On xxii. 6-9. "God does not spare even the authorities. For though He has said that they are gods, when they do not rightly administer their office they must die like men (Ps. lxxxii. 6) . . . No cedars are too high for God, no splendor too mighty; He can destroy all at once, and overturn, and overturn, and overturn. Ezek. xxi. 27." CRAMER.

Another passage from which it is seen how perverse and unjustifiable is the illusion that God's election is a surety against His anger, and a permit to any wilfulness. The individual re-representatives of the objects of divine election should never forget that God can march over their carcases, and the ruins of their glory, to the fulfilment of His promise, and that He can rebuild on a higher stage, what He has destroyed on a lower. Comp. remarks on ver. 24.

8. On xxii. 13-19. It is blasphemous to imagine that God will be frère et compagnon to all princes as such, and that He has a predilection for them as of His own kind. Does He not say to his majesty the king of Judah, with whom, in respect of the eminence of his dynasty and throne no other prince of earth could compare, that he should be buried like an ass, dragged and cast out before the gates of Jerusalem? This Jehoiakim was however an aristocrat, a heartless, selfish tyrant, who for his own pleasure trampled divine and human rights under foot. If such things were done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?

"He who builds his house with other people's property, collects stones for his grave." CRAMER.

9. On xxii. 14. ["It was a proof of luxury when men began to indulge in superfluities. In old times the windows were small; for use only was regarded by frugal men; but afterwards a sort of madness possessed the minds of many, so that they sought to be suspended as it were in the air. And hence they began to have wider windows. The thing in itself, as I have said, is not what God condemns; but we must ever remember, that men never go to excesses in external things, except when their hearts are infected with pride, so that they do not regard what is useful, what is becoming, but are carried away by fondness for excess." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

10. On xxii. 15. "God may grant the great lords a preference in eating and drinking and the splendor of royal courts, but it is not His will that these be regarded as the main things, but that true religion, right and justice must have the precedence;—this is the Lord's work. But cursed is he who does the Lord's work remissly. Jer. xlviii. 10." CRAMER.

11. On xxii. 17. "Description of haughty, proud, magnificent, merciless and tyrannical lords and rulers, who are accomplices of thieves." CRAMER.

12. On xxii. 19. ["God would have burial a proof to distinguish us from brute animals even after death, as we in life excel them, and as our condition is much nobler than that of the brute creation. Burial is also a pledge as it were of immortality; for when man's body is laid hid in the earth, it is as it were a mirror of a future life. Since then burial is an evidence of God's grace and favor towards mankind, it is on the other hand a sign of a curse, when burial is denied." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

13. On xxii. 24. "Great lords often imagine that they not only sit in the bosom of God, but that they are a pearl in His crown; or as the prophet says here, God's signet-ring. Therefore, it is impossible that they should not succeed in their designs. But God looks not on the person of the princes, and knows the magnificent no more than the poor. Job xxxiv. 19." CRAMER.

14. On xxii. 28. ["What is idolized will, first or last, be despised and broken, what is unjustly honored will be justly contemned, and rivals with God will be the scorn of man. Whatever we idolize we shall be disappointed in, and then shall despise." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

"The compliment is a very poor one for a king, who thinks somewhat of himself, and to whom it in a certain measure pertains that he be honored. . . . But here it is the word of the LORD, and in consideration of these words it is declared in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 12, to be evil on the part of Zedekiah, that he did not humble himself before Jeremiah. Teachers must be much on their guard against assuming such purely prophetic, that is, extraordinary acts. It cost the servants of the Lord many a death, who were obliged thus to employ themselves, and when it is easy for one to ape it without a divine calling he thus betrays his frivolity and incompetence, if not his pride and delusion." ZINZENDORF.

15. On xxii. 28-30. IRENEUS (Adv. Hær. III. 30) uses this passage to prove that the Lord could not have been Joseph's natural son, for otherwise he would have fallen under the curse of this passage, and appear as one not entitled to dominion ("qui cum dicunt ex Joseph generatum et in eo habere spem, abdicatos se faciunt a regno, sub maledictione et increpatione decedentes, quæ erga Jechoniam et in semen ejus est"). BASIL the Great (Epist. ad Amphiloichium) endeavors to show that this passage, with its declaration that none of Jechoniah's descendants should sit on David's throne, is not in contradiction to the prophecy of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 10), that a ruler should not be lacking from Judah, till He came for whom the nations were hoping. BASIL distinguishes in this relation between dominion and royal dignity.—The former continued, the latter ceased, and this period of, so to speak, latent royalty, was the bridge to the present, in which Christ rules in an invisible manner, but yet in real power and glory as royal priest, and at the same time represents Himself as the fulfilment of the hope of the nations. In like manner John of Damascus concludes that according to this passage there could be no prospect of the fulfilment of the promise in Gen. xlix. 10, if Mary had not virgineo modo borne the scion of David, who however was not to occupy the visible throne of David. (Orat. II. in Nativ. B. Mariæ p. med.)—AMBROSE finally (Comment. in Ev. Luc. I. III. cap. ult.) raises the question how Jeremiah could say, that ex semine Jechonie neminem regnaturum esse, since Christ was of the seed of Jechoniah and reigned? He answers: "Illic (Jer. xlii. 30) futuros ex semine Jechonie posteros non negatur et ideo de semine ejus est Christus (comp. Matt. i. 11). et quod regnavit Christus, non contra prophetiam est, non enim seculari honore regnavit, nec in Jechonie sedibus sedet, sed regnavit in sede David." GUISLERUS.

16. On xxiii. 2. "Nonnulli præsules grejis quosdam pro peccato a communione ejiciunt, ut penitent, sed quali sorte vivere debeant ad melius exhortando non visitant. Quibus congrue increpans sermo divinus comminatur: pastores, qui pascunt populum meum, vos dispersistis gregem meum, eiecistis et non visitastis eum." ISIDOR. HISP. de summo bono sive LL. sentt. Cap. 46. GUISLERUS.

17. On xxiii. 5, 6. EUSEBIUS (Dem. Ev. VII. 9) remarks that Christ among all the descendants of David is the only one, who rules over the whole earth, and everywhere not only preaches justice and righteousness by His doctrine but is Himself also the author of the rising [of the Sun] of righteousness for all, according to Ps. lxxii. 7: ἀνατελεῖ ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις αὐτοῦ δικαιοσύνη, καὶ πλήθος εἰρήνης ἕως οὗ ἀνταναν-ρεθῆ ἢ σελήνη (LXX.) CYRIL of Alex. (Glaphyr. in Gen. i. p. 133) explains Ἰουσεδέκ as justitia Dei, in so far as we are made righteous in Him, not for the sake of the works of righteousness that we have done, but according to His great mercy. Rom. iii. 24; Tit. iii. 5.

18. On xxiii. 6. ["If we regard God in Himself, He is indeed righteous, but not our righteousness. If we desire to have God as our righteousness, we must seek Christ; for this cannot be found except in Him. . . . Paul says that He has been given or made to us righteousness,—for what end? that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him. (1 Cor. i. 30). Since, then, Christ is made our righteousness, and we are counted the righteousness of God in Him, we hence learn how properly and fitly it has been said that He would be Jehovah, not only that the power of His divinity might defend us, but also that we might become righteous in Him, for He is not only righteous for Himself, but He is our righteousness." CALVIN. See also a long note in WORDSWORTH, to show that Jehovah our RIGHTEOUSNESS refers to Christ.—S. R. A.]

"The character of a true church is when the Lytrum, the ransom-money of Jesus Christ, is known and valued by all, and when they have written this secret, foolish and absolutely inscrutable to reason, in the heart with the finger of the living God: that Jesus by His blood has taken away the sins of the world. 'O let it ne'er escape my thought, at what a price my soul was bought.' This is the evening and morning prayer of every church, which is a true sister from above." ZINZENDORF.

19. On xxiii. 5-8. "The return under Ezra was also a fulfilment of this promise, but inferior and preliminary: not all came, and those who did come brought their sins back with them. They were still under the Law and had to wait for Righteousness; still in their return they had a pledge that the Messiah was yet to come and prepare the true city of peace. Now, however, all has been long fulfilled and we can enjoy it perfectly, if we have the mind for it. We have now a country of which no tyrant can rob us; our walk and citizenship is in heaven. We have been delivered from all our suffering, when we sit down at the feet of Jesus to hear His word. Then there is a power of resurrection within us, so that we can fly with our souls beyond the world and laugh at all our foes. For Christ has made us righteous by His daily forgiveness, so that we may also bring ourselves daily into heaven. Yea verily, the kingdom of heaven is come very nigh unto us! Jeremiah then longed to see and hear this more nearly, and now we can have it." DIEDRICH.

20. On xxiii. 9. "Great love renders God's servant so ardent, that he deals powerful blows on the seducers. He does not think that he has struck a wasp's nest and embittered his life here forever, for he has a higher life and gives the lower one willingly for love. Yet all the world will hold him for an incorrigible and mad enthusiast, who spares no one. He says himself that he is as it were drunk with God and His word, when he on the other hand contemplates the country." DIEDRICH.

21. On xxiii. 11. "They are rogues. They know how to find subterfuges, and I would like to see him who accuses a false and unfaithful teacher, and manages his own case so that he does not himself come into the dilemma." ZINZENDORF.

22. On xxiii. 13, 14. "In the prophets of Samaria I see folly. This is the character which the Lord gives to error, false religion, heterodoxy. But in the prophets of Jerusalem I find abomination. This is the description of the orthodox, when they apply their doctrine, so that either the wicked are strengthened or no one is converted." ZINZENDORF.

23. On xxiii. 15. "From the prophets of Jerusalem hypocrisy goes forth into all the land. This is the natural consequence of the superiority, which the consistories, academies, ministers, etc., have and in due measure ought to have, that when they become corrupt they communicate their corruption to the whole region, and it is apparent in the whole land what sort of theologians sit at the helm." ZINZENDORF.

24. On xxiii. 16. Listen not to the words of the prophets, they deceive you. LUTHER says (Allenb. Tom. II. p. 330): "But a Christian has so much power that he may and ought to come forward even among Christians and teach, where he sees that the teacher himself is wanting," etc.; and "The hearers altogether have the right to judge and decide concerning all doctrine. Therefore the priests and liveried Christians have snatched this office to themselves; because, if this office remained in the church, the aforesaid could retain nothing for their own." (Allenb. Tom. II. p. 508).

—The exercise of this right on the part of members of the church has its difficulties. May not misunderstanding, ignorance, even wickedness cause this to be a heavy and unjust pressure on the ministers of the word, and thus medietly tend to the injury of the church? Certainly. Still it is better for the church to exercise this right than not to do so. The former is a sign of spiritual life, the latter of spiritual death. It will be easier to find a corrective for some extravagances than to save a church become religiously indifferent from the fate of Laodicea (Rev. iii. 16).

25. On xxiii. 16. ["But here a question may be raised, How can the common people understand that some speak from God's mouth, and that others propound their own glosses? I answer, That the doctrine of the Law was then sufficient to guide the minds of the people, provided they closed not their eyes; and if the Law was sufficient at that time, God does now most surely give us a clearer light by His prophets, and especially by His Gospel." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

26. On xxiii. 17. "The pastors, who are welcome and gladly seen at a rich man's table, wish him in fact long life, good health, and all prosperity. What they wish they prophesy. This is not unnatural; but he who is softened by it is ill-advised." ZINZENDORF.

27. On xxiii. 21. ["There is a twofold call; one is internal, the other belongs to order, and may therefore be called external or ecclesiastical. But the external call is never legitimate, except it be preceded by the internal; for it does not belong to us to create prophets, or apostles, or pastors, as this is the special work of the Holy Spirit. . . . But it often happens that the call of God is sufficient, especially for a time. For when there is no church, there is no remedy for the evil, except God raise up extraordinary teachers." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

28. On xxiii. 22. "If I knew that my teacher was a most abominable miscreant, personally, and in heart the worst enemy of God in his parish; so long as, for any reason, he preaches, expounds, develops, inculcates the word of God; even though he should betray here and there in his expressions, that this word was not dwelling in him; if only he does not ex professo at one time throw down what at another time he teaches of good and true quasi aliud agendo: I assure you before the Lord that I should fear to censure his preaching." ZINZENDORF.

29. On xxiii. 23. "God's essential attribute is Omnipresence. For He is higher than heaven, what canst thou do? deeper than hell, what canst thou know? Longer than the earth and broader than the sea (Job iv. 8). And He is not far from every one of us (Acts xvii. 27)." CRAMER.—"We often think God is quite far from us, when He is yet near to us, has us in His arms, presses us to His heart and kisses us." LUTHER.—"When we think the Sun of righteousness, Jesus, is not risen, and is still behind the mountain, and will not come to us, He is yet nearest to us. The LORD is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart. 30. On xxiii. 28. ["When any one rejects the wheat because it is covered with chaff, and who will pity him who says that he has indeed wheat on his floor, but that it is mixed with chaff, and therefore not fit for food? . . . If we be negligent, and think that it is a sufficient excuse for despising the Word of God, because Satan brings in his fallacies, we shall perish in our sloth like him who neglects to cleanse his wheat that he might turn it to bread." CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

He who cannot restrain his mouth or his ink let him expectorate. But let him say openly and honestly that they are his own dreams, which he preaches. The false prophets certainly know that mere falsehood is empty straw. They therefore always mingle some of the genuine word of God amongst it. An unavailing mixture! It is in this mingling that Satan's highest art is displayed, so that he at the same time furthers his own work and testifies against himself. Comp. Gen. iii.

31. On xxiii. 29. God's word is the highest reality, life and power, while the dreams of the false prophets are pretence, death and weakness. God's word is therefore compared to a fire which burns, warms, and enlightens, so that it burns up the hardest flint, melts the thickest ice, illuminates the deepest obscurities. It is compared further to a hammer which crushes the hardest rocks into sand.—He who mingles God's wheat among his straw, will find that the wheat will become fire and burn up the straw (1 Cor. iii. 12-15). He who handles the word of the Lord purely, let him not despair if he sees before him hearts of adamant (Zech. vii. 12). He who seeks peace is not ashamed to bow beneath the hammer of the word. For the destructive power of the word applies to that in us which is opposed to God, while the God-related elements are loosed and set free by those very crushing blows.—He, however, to whom the peace of God is an object of derision, may feed on the straw of this world. But how will it be when finally the day comes that God will come upon him with fire and hammer? What then remains to him as the result of his straw-diet, which is in a condition to withstand the blows of the hammer and the fire?

Help, Lord, against Thy scornful foes,
Who seek our souls to lead astray;
Whose mockeries at mortal woes
Will end in terrible dismay!
Grant that Thy holy word may root
Deep in our hearts, and richer fruit
May ever bear to endless day.

"God's word converts, all other doctrine befools." LUTHER.

32. On xxiii. 29. "God's word in general is like a fire: the more it is urged the more widely and brightly it extends. God has caused His word to be proclaimed to the world as a matter, which they can dispense with as little as fire. Fire often smoulders long in secret before it breaks out, thus the power of the divine word operates in its time. God's word can make people as warm as if glowing coals lay upon them; it shines as brightly upon them, as if a lamp were held under their eyes; it tells every one the truth and purifies from all vices. He who deals evilly with God's word burns himself by it, he who opposes it is consumed by it. But the word of God is as little to blame as a lamp or a fire when an unskilful person is burned by it. Yet it happens that often it will not be suffered in the world, then there is fire in all the streets. That is the unhappy fire of persecution, which is kindled incidentally in the world by the preaching of the Gospel." JOS. CONR. SCHALLER, Pastor at Cautendorf, Sermons on the Gospels, 1742.

33. On xxiii. 30. "Teachers and preachers are not to steal their sermons from other books, but take them from the Bible, and testify that which they speak from their inward experience (John iii. 11). False teachers steal God's word, inventing a foreign meaning for it, and using this for the palliation of their errors." STARKE.—"Hinc illi cyprioi at auctions, who can obtain this or that good book, this or that manuscript? Here they are thus declared to be plagiarios; and they are necessarily so because they are not taught of God. But I would rather they would steal from true men of God than from each other."—ZINZENDORF.

34. On xxiii. 32-40. "When the word of God becomes intolerable to men, then men in their turn become intolerable to our Lord God; yea, they are no more than inutile pondus terre, which the land can no more bear, therefore they must be winnowed out, Jer. xv. 17." CRAMER.

35. On xxiv. 5-7. "He who willingly and readily resigns himself to the will of God even to the cross, may escape misfortune. But he who opposes himself to the hand of God cannot escape." CRAMER.—"The captives are dearest to God. By the first greater affliction He prepares their souls for repentance and radical conversion, so that He has in them again His people and inheritance. O the gracious God, that He allows even those who on account of sin must be so deeply degraded and rendered slaves, even in such humiliation to be His people! The captives are forgiven their opposition to God; they are separated from the number of nations existing in the world, politically they are dead and banished to the interior. Now, God will show them what His love can do; they shall return, and in true nearness to God be His true Israel." DIEDRICH.

36. On xxiv. 7. ["Since He affirms that He would give them a heart to understand, we hence learn that men are by nature blind, and also that when they are blinded by the devil they cannot return to the right way, and that they cannot be otherwise capable of light than by having God to illuminate them by His Spirit. . . . This passage also shows, that we cannot really turn to God until we acknowledge Him to be the Judge; for until the sinner sets himself before God's tribunal he will never be touched with the feeling of true repentance. . . . Though God rules the whole world, He yet declares that He is the God of the Church; and the faithful whom He has adopted He favors with this high distinction, that they are His people; and He does this that they may be persuaded that there is safety in Him, according to what is said by Habakkuk, 'Thou art our God, we shall not die' (Hab. i. 12). And of this sentence Christ Himself is the best interpreter, when He says, that He is not the God of the dead, but of the living (Luke xx. 38)."] CALVIN.—S. R. A.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xxi. 8. This text may be used on all occasions when an important decision is to be made or on the entrance on a new section of life, as, e. g., at synods, diets, New Years, beginning of the church-year, at confirmations, weddings, installations, etc. What the present day demands and promises: I. It demands from us an important choice. II. It promises us, according as we choose, life or death.

2. On xxii. 2-9. In how far the divine election is conditional and unconditional. I. It is conditional with respect to individual elected men, places, things. For 1, these become partakers of the salvation promised by the election only by behaviour well-pleasing to God; 2, if they behave in a manner displeasing to God, the election does not protect them from destruction. II. The election is unconditional with respect to the eternal ideas lying at the foundation of the single appearances, and their absolute realizations.

9. NINTH DISCOURSE.

(CHAP. XXV.)

WITH THREE HISTORICAL APPENDICES (CHAPS. XXVI.—XXIX.)

The superscription, xxv. 1, to which a similar one follows first in xxx. 1, shows that the compiler of the book regarded chh. xxv.—xxix. as a connected group. The motive of this arrangement may be recognized. First, the connection of ch. xxvii. with ch. xxv. is perfectly clear, the figurative discourse of the cup of wrath, which Jeremiah is to offer the heathen nations (xxv. 15 sqq.), having a practical commentary in the yokes, which, according to xxvii. 2-12, the prophet is to send to those nations. Ch. xxviii. is however based directly on ch. xxvii., since here the false prophet Hananiah breaks the yoke, which Jeremiah, according to ch. xxvii., had hung upon his neck, and Jeremiah replaces this wooden yoke by an iron one. In subject then these three chapters are closely connected. Ch. xxix., moreover, stands in intimate topical connection with chh. xxvii. and xxviii., since it is directed against the false prophets, who contradicted the prophecy of Jeremiah with respect to their position in Babylon. This chapter is, however, intimately connected with the following, in that it likewise has for its subject the conflict of the true prophet with the false prophets, and with the people as favoring the latter (comp. xxvi. 7, 8, 11, 16 with xxvii. 9, 14, 16). As ch. xxvi. is thus related in subject to chh. xxvii.—xxix., and in date to ch. xxv., it stands between them. Comp. my art. on Jeremiah in HERZOG, Real-Enc., VI., S. 486, 7.—The position of the group, chh. xxv.—xxix., here seems to be due primarily to chronological reasons. Ch. xxv., the basis of the section, belongs to the 4th year of Jehoiakim. The main trunk of the preceding section, chh. xxi.—xxiv., belongs to the beginning of the reign of this king, prior to his fourth year (comp. Introd. to the Eighth Discourse). All the portions following ch. xxix., belong mainly to the times of Zedekiah, or to the later period of Jehoiakim's reign (comp. ch. xxxvi.). Accordingly, ch. xxv. with its appendix is in the right place. It concurs with this, though without design, that with respect to its subject also this chapter is rightly placed; for its position in the middle of the book corresponds exactly to the central significance, which pertains to it in the collection of Jeremiah's prophecies.

We first then consider ch. xxv., the central prophecy, by itself. It may be divided into three sections:—

1. Vers. 1-11.—The Judgment on Judah.
2. Vers. 12-29.—The Judgment on Judah and the kingdoms of the world.
3. Vers. 30-33.—The Judgment of the world.

² Ver. 3.—On the adverbial use of הָ. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 79, 2 [GESZ. Gr., § 100, 2 e.].

³ Ver. 3.—אֲשֶׁר־יָם is possibly an Aramaism (comp. OLSH. § 191, g; 255, b), and is possibly on account of the rarer י in the final syllable (הַשְּׂרִים) is found only in xlv. 4, and Prov. xxvii. 14), as an addition to אָרָבָר, written purposely as 1 Pers. Imperf.; yet more probably it is a mere oversight and, therefore, according to the Keri, and related passages (vii. 13; xxv., xi. 7; xxv. 4; xxvi. 5; xxix. 19; xxxii. 33; xxxv. 14, 15; xlv. 4), to be read הַשְּׂרִים.

⁴ Ver. 5.—לְטַבְּרוֹ. On the construction, comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 90, 2.

⁶ Ver. 9.—וְאֵל. It is certainly easy, with the Vulgate and Chald. (the Syr. is doubtful), and some MSS. to read וְאֵת, or at least, as is also done by some MSS. to omit ו before אֵל. But there is no necessity for this. For וְאֵל is by no means without sense, and may be justified grammatically. It must not then be rendered as depending on שְׁלַח. For then the intermediate sentence, וְלִקְחוּתִי, etc., is intolerably harsh. But וְאֵל depends on לְקַחְתִּי. Then ו before אֵל = and indeed, as not seldom in Jeremiah (vi. 2; xvii. 10; xix. 12. Comp. besides Gen. iv. 4; 2 Sam. xiii. 20; Isa. lvii. 11; Am. iii. 11; iv. 10; Ps. lxxviii. 10). וְאֵל is used here as ex. gr., in Levit. xviii. 18 in the sentence תִּקַּחְתָּהּ לְאֵל־אָחֻתָּהּ thou shalt not take a wife to her sister. Comp. Ezek. xlv. 7; Lam. iii. 41. Even in the verse of the present 26th chapter we find וְאֵל in this sense: all the kings of the north, the near and far, אִישׁ אֵל־אָחֻיו, that is, one to the other = one with another. The prophet therefore says: behold, I send and take (or fetch) all the families of the North, and indeed to Nebuchadrezzar.

⁷ Ver. 9.—The pronoun הָאֵלֶּה stands δεσκατός; we must suppose a corresponding gesture of the hand.

⁹ Ver. 11.—לְשִׁמְרָה וְגוֹ. Comp. vers. 11, 12, 18; xviii. 16; xix. 8; xxix. 18; xlix. 13, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which was the first of king Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon (ver. 1), Jeremiah addresses to the whole of Judah and Jerusalem a prophecy of the following import (ver. 2): After Jeremiah had spoken to the people for 23 years, from the 13th year of king Josiah (ver. 3), after other prophets also had unceasingly held forth to the people (ver. 4), that in case of their conversion they would remain quietly in the land (ver. 5), but in case of their apostasy to idols they would experience the Lord's anger (ver. 6); and finally the people not having regarded these exhortations and threatenings, it is solemnly declared (vers. 7 and 8), that the tribes of the North under the leadership of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, would invade the land of Judea and the neighboring nations, lay everything desolate, and render these countries tributary to the king of Babylon for seventy years (vers. 9-11).—The pre-eminent significance of this prophecy is clear from the following data: 1. From the special detail of the introduction, which apart from the date, is distinguished from all other introductory formulas in Jeremiah, in that in vers. 1 and 2 it lays special emphasis on the object and address of the discourse. 2. From the date in ver. 1. It is the first time in which a date is prefixed to a prophecy of this seer. Only general indications of time are found in the earlier prophecies, and these only rarely (iii. 6; xiv. 1). We find exact chronological statements only on the entrance of the great catastrophe and the principal stages of its course; (xxviii. 1; xxxii. 1; xxxvi. 1; xxxix. 1, and the following chh.). 3. Here in ver. 2 Jeremiah calls himself for the first time נְבִיאָה (comp. the Intro. to the Seventh Discourse, chh. xviii.-xx.). It is as though he had renounced this title, till he could announce the beginning of the fulfilment of his minatory prophecy (comp. Deut. xviii. 21, 22). 4. The prophet casts a comprehensive glance at his whole previous ministry of 23 years, admits the fact that the people had paid no attention to his prophetic exhortations and threatenings, and announces the immediate infliction of the punitive judgment promised in such a case. Hence it is evident that he regards the present moment as forming a decisive crisis. The reason for this it is not difficult to perceive. While Jeremiah in all his previous prophecies speaks indefinitely of the judgment as one menacing from the north, he here for the first time names Nebuchadnezzar, the king of the Chaldeans, as he who would inflict it, at the head of all the "nationalities of the North" (ver. 9). The victory of Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish (comp. xvi. 2) and his ascension of the throne were the historic facts, in which the divinely inspired glance of the seer perceived the most important crisis in the history of the world. It was at once clear to him that the victor of Carchemish was the great divinely chosen instrument to inflict judgment on the theocracy and the other nations, and so in a certain sense to found the first universal empire. As his predictions of calamity at once attained concrete definiteness by this fact, so did his predictions of deliverance. He perceived and predicted with the same definiteness that the empire of the Chaldeans would last only 70 years, and that at the close of it would begin the redemption of the holy nation. It was hidden from him into how many stages and of what duration the fulfilment of these prophecies would be resolved. 5. In the same year Jeremiah, in obedience to the divine command, began to write out his prophecies (xxxvii. 1, 2). He did this, according to xxxvi. 3, 7, in the hope even at the eleventh hour of moving the hearts of the people by the total impression of his prophetic discourses, which at the same time intimates that a moment of conclusive and irrevocable decision had come.

Vers. 1, 2. The word . . . saying. Why the fourth year of Jehoiakim is the right moment for this important prophecy is clear from the additional clause: the same was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. Nebuchadnezzar had this year become king by the death of his father. As this circumstance is emphasized, it is highly probable that Jeremiah received the impulse to this prophetic discourse on the news of Nebuchadnezzar's accession. There is no contradiction in this to our previous designation of the battle of Carchemish as the occasion. The news of his father's death must have come to Nebuchadnezzar soon after that victory. The prophet mentions here merely the ascent of the throne, because he might presuppose that it was enough to mention the later fact to remind also of the earlier and not less important one. With respect to the chronological date, the statement of our passage that Jehoiakim's fourth year was the first of Nebuchadnezzar agrees with the statements in 2 Kings xxiv. 12; xxv. 8; Jer. lii. 12; xxxii. 1. It is generally admitted that this year was B.C., 605 or 604. Comp. Hofmann, Ägypt. u. israelit. Zeitrechnung, S. 51; Bunsen, Bible-work, I. S., cexi., cccx.; Niebuhr, *Ass. u. Vers. 3, 4. From the thirteenth year . . . to bear. Josiah, according to 2 Kings xxii. 1, reigned 31 years. According to i. 2 also Jeremiah's prophetic ministry began in his 13th year. He had therefore labored 18 years [or 19 years, according to Pusey and Wordsworth] under Josiah and four under Jehoiakim, and was then, especially if we reckon in the three months of Jehoahaz, in the 23d year of his ministry.—The words from but ye have not to hear (ver. 4) are, on account of the following saying, which belongs to sending, to be regarded as a parenthesis.

Exod. xxi. 12; Deut. v. 16.—For ever and ever is to be regarded as depending on turn, for the consolation consists, not in God's having appointed the land for an everlasting habitation, but in that it will be really such.—And provoke me not, etc., and I will do you no hurt, are sentences which express a purpose paratactically: comp. Naegelsb. Gr., § 109, 2.—On the subject-matter comp. vii. 6, 7.

Vers. 8-11. Therefore thus saith . . . seventy years. These verses contain the consequence necessarily resulting from the premises.—All the families of the north. A reference to the announcement often repeated since the commencement of his prophetic ministry, and now again appearing in the form which it had in i. 15, viz., that the enemy coming from the north is designated as "all the families of the north," an expression which is evidently not to be taken literally, but as the designation of an extended empire—And [even to] Nebuchadnezzar. [Comp. Textual Notes]. Previously northern nations only were spoken of, here we learn that they are first to be brought to the king of the Chaldeans and then (of course under his command) into the land. Since this explanation is grammatically possible, I give the reading in the text the preference, as the more difficult. Hitzig and Graf indeed maintain that the name of Nebuchadnezzar was inserted afterwards. Hitzig finds the mention of this name so altogether "frank" that he sees in it "a glossation of the gloss in ver. 12," and an impertinence, after the indefinite phrase "a horde from midnight" purposely left that name to be guessed. Graf, however, finds the mention of the name in no way compatible with the construction, for neither נְבוּצַדְנֶצְרִשְׁרָשֵׁשׁ (which he makes dependent on שלח) nor יָתָת nor יָתָת gives a satisfactory sense, the last because then Nebuchadnezzar would appear only as "supplementary." The latter objection disappears of itself in our explanation. HIRTZIG'S arguments, however, emanate too evidently from the objection which he has to any special and exactly fulfilled prophecy, to need serious refutation. We say: after the victory at Carchemish, Nebuchadnezzar's mission and its result were so fully made out to the prophet that there could be neither indistinctness nor hesitation with respect to the mention of his name.—The Lord calls Nebuchadnezzar his servant (עַבְדִּי, ver. 9) as in xxvii. 6; xliii. 10, the performer of His commands. He is to come with his hosts "over all these nations round about."—The voice of the bridegroom, etc. Comp. vii. 34; xvi. 9.—[The millstones and the light of the candle. "The one the sound of those who prepare daily food by grinding the hand-mill, see Exod. xi. 5 and Matt. xxiv. 41; the other the evidence of domestic habitation. Both emblems are combined in the Apocalypse (xviii. 22, 23)."—WORDSWORTH. Comp. also THOMSON, The Land and the Book, II., 275.—S. R. A.].—Ver. 11. This whole land. Since the prophet, from ver. 9 onward, has in view not only Judah but all the neighboring nations, "this land" is to be referred not only to Palestine but to the whole of the territory inhabited by those nations.—And these nations shall serve. HIRTZIG was the first to cast doubt on the genuineness of these words. DE WETTE (Eintl. S. 330) and GRAF (S. 322, 326) concur with him. On the other hand compare especially HAEVERNICK, (Eintl. II., 2, S. 225 sqq.).—What appears especially to offend HIRTZIG is the circumstance that the seventy years here would prove to be right within two years, nay, that if Darius the Mede is an historical personage, they would prove so exactly. "Such coincidence of history with prophecy would be a surprising accident; or else Jeremiah knew beforehand the number of years, which the dependence on Babylon would last." To this may be added the point, which GRAF renders prominent, that a prediction of destruction addressed to Babylon at the same moment when it is described as a power divinely commissioned to execute judgment, is somewhat unsuitable and improbable. So the seventy years here and in ver. 12 are regarded as an interpolation and vaticinium ex eventu, which does not very well agree with the statement, that it is transposed hither from xxix. 10, which passage is acknowledged to be genuine. For even if the sending of the letter in ch. xxix. occurred a decennium later, the promise of a liberation after seventy years, contained in ver. 10, is not by a hair less than xxv. 11, 12, either a genuine prophecy or a statement which happened to prove true. For the difference of ten years, in view of the many possibilities of longer or shorter periods is not so important that a general agreement may not be spoken of. We can of course enter into no controversy here with those who deny altogether any foreknowledge of future things on the basis of divine revelation, but if any is offended that the prophet here mentions a definite number, let him consider that without this definiteness the prediction would cease to be a prophecy in the true sense. That the dominion of the Chaldeans would not stretch in infinitum does not need to be prophesied. The chief source of consolation for Israel also is contained in this definite number. (Comp. Dan. ix. 2). ["Thus a safeguard was provided against the dangers to which God's captive people, Israel, were exposed in Babylonia, from the seductions of Chaldean idolatry; and a hope of restoration to their own land was cherished in their heart till the time of their chastisement was past."—WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.] "Prophetic analogy" also is not wanting for him, who in Gen. xv. 13-16 and Dan. ix. 24-26 sees anything but vaticinium ex eventu. Whoever finally maintains that this was not the right moment to pronounce a prophecy of the overthrow of Babylon mistakes both the nature of that historical event and the meaning and object of prophecy. We have already seen that the Babylonian empire was determined by the victory at Carchemish, and was not this a suitable moment to present a prophetic programme of the divine world-policy? Or should merely the subjection of Judah and other nations be spoken of and not the judgment upon Babylon? Let it be observed that in ch. xxv. the prophet presents three stages of the divine judgment; the judgment on Judah, on the nations forming the Babylonian empire, and finally on all the nations of the earth. In this general view of the divine judgments that on Babylon could not of course be omitted, if the prophet was not to give a false representation. Observe, moreover, that the prophet speaks of the overthrow of Babylon only in brief hints. He says of it only so much as is necessary on the one hand for the completeness of the picture, and on the other hand in order not to encourage Israel to obstinate resistance, while not altogether dispiriting them. For this reason almost all the minatory predictions conclude with a consolatory outlook. (Comp. iii. 12 sqq.; x. 23 sqq.; xii. 14 sqq.; xxiii. 3 sqq.; yea, even the prophecies against the heathen nations, xli. 26; xlviii. 47; xlix. 6, 39). There is then no reason, why the second half of ver. 11 should be declared spurious. On the contrary, the words, like the related ones in xxvii. 7, are entirely in place.—As concerns the numbering of the seventy years thus much is certain, that Jeremiah would say: In seventy years from this time Babylon will be visited. For, as shown above, he has placed the date, contrary to his former custom, at the head of the chapter, simply because this fourth year of Jehoiakim is at the same time the year of the battle of Carchemish and the first of Nebuchadnezzar, and because Nebuchadnezzar's victory and accession to the throne were the symptoms of a crisis in universal history, which germinally included all the other successes of the Chaldean king. From the moment when Jeremiah received the news of the victory at Carchemish, it was for him decided that Nebuchadnezzar would exercise universal dominion and that Judah, as well as the rest of the nations, would be subject to him; in xxvii. 6 indeed he represents this, by his categorical יָתָת, as accomplished, though in reality it was still waiting fulfilment. Hence also in xxix. 10 he does not alter the number, though this prophecy is of a later date. The seventy years have become to him a fixed measure of time, which at any rate has its point of commencement in that fourth year of Jehoiakim. Its final point is less clear. (Comp. on the different modes of reckoning, ROSENMFELLER on xxv. 11 and the literature there quoted). If we take the year of the battle of Carchemish as the beginning of the Chaldean empire, this corresponds best to the conquest of Babylon by Cyrus. As that first fact germinally involved the captivity, so did the second the deliverance therefrom. The dates are, as is well known, not yet determined with certainty. According to the reckoning approved by most, the battle of Carchemish took place in the year B. C. 605-4, the conquest of Babylon in the year 538. Between these two dates lies a period of sixty-seven years. [The Canon of PTOLEMY, confirmed by RAWLINSON, makes the reigns of Babylonian kings from Nebuchadnezzar to the end of Belshazzar cover sixty-six years. Comp. COWLES ad loc.—S. R. A.]. Aside from the possibility that a more exact agreement might result on more accurate knowledge, this number may suffice as a round sum. Comp. NIEBUHR, Assur u. Babel, S. 7. [“These seventy years begin with B. C. 606, the fourth year of Jehoiakim, and the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, when he made his first attack on Jerusalem, and end with the capture of Babylon in the first year of Cyrus, and the restoration of the Jews, B. C. 536. Comp. DAVISON, on Prophecy, p. 225; PRSEY, on Daniel, p. 267, who justly condemns the theory of some, who allege that seventy years is here either a mere approximate number or a symbolical one, signifying a long time.” WORDSWORTH.—S. XXV. 12-29.

- 12 And it shall come to pass, when seventy years are accomplished,¹ that I will punish the king of Babylon and that nation,² saith the LORD [Jehovah], for their iniquity, and the land of the Chaldeans, and will make it perpetual desolations.
- 13 And I will bring upon that land all my words, which I have pronounced against it, all that is written in this book, which Jeremiah hath prophesied against all
- 14 the nations. For [of them, even these] many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of them also [exact service]: and I will recompense them according to
- 15 their deeds and according to the works of their own hands. For thus saith [hath said] the LORD [Jehovah the] God of Israel unto me, Take the wine-cup [the cup of the wine] of this fury at my hand, and cause [give] all the nations, to whom I
- 16 send thee, to drink [of] it. And they shall drink and be moved [stagger] and be mad [stunned], because of the sword that I will send among them.
- 17 Then took I the cup at the LORD's [Jehovah's] hand, and made all the nations
- 18 to drink, unto whom the LORD [Jehovah] had sent me: Jerusalem and the cities of Judah and the kings thereof, and the princes thereof, to make them³ a desolation, an astonishment, an hissing and a curse; as it is this day; Pharaoh, king of
- 19 Egypt, and his servants and his princes, and all his people; and all the mingled [allied]⁴ people and all the kings of the land of Uz and all the kings of the land of the Philistines and Ashkelon [Askalon] and Azzah [Gaza] and Ekron and the
- 21 [whole] remnant of Ashdod, Edom, and Moab and the children of Ammon,—
- 22 and all the kings of Tyrus and all the kings of Zidon, and the kings of the isles
- 23 [coast land] which are beyond the sea, Dedan and Tema and Buz and all that are
- 24 in the utmost corners [cut short the hair], and all the kings of Arabia, and all the
- 25 kings of the mingled people, that dwell in the desert, and all the kings of Zimri
- 26 and all the kings of Elam and all the kings of the Medes [Media], and all the kings of the north, far and near, one with another, and all the kingdoms of the world,⁵ which are upon the face of the earth:—and the king of Sheshach shall drink after them.
- 27 Therefore [And] thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth], the God of Israel, Drink ye and be drunken and spue⁶ and fall
- 28 and rise no more, because of the word which I will send among you. And it shall be, if they refuse to take the cup at thine hand to drink, then shalt thou say unto them: Thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth]: Ye shall certainly [and 29 must] drink. For, lo, I begin to bring [do] evil on the city which is called by [bears] my name, and should ye be utterly unpunished? Ye shall not be unpunished, for I will call for a sword upon all the inhabitants of the earth, saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 12.—Hitzig would find an intimation of spuriousness in the reading ככל אמות. These forms are certainly prevalent in the later writings, but there are also instances of them in the earlier. Comp. Jud. vii. 1; Ps. xxv. 7; Mic. i. 5; Jer. xv. 13, etc. Comp. besides Olsh., § 8. 299, 344; 531.—The LXX. translates ver. 12, ἐκδικήσω τὸ ἔθνος ἐκείνου καὶ θήσομαι αὐτοῖς εἰς ἀφάνισμὸν αἰώνιον, thus omitting על כלך and שְׂדֵימִים נָאִם־י. But such an omission in the LXX. has no authority. The position of נָאִם־י (Hitzig finds it, as in ver. 9, too far back in the sentence) has nothing objectionable in it, if we consider that a double more remote object is connected with אֶפְקֹד by means of the preposition על. Comp. v. 15; xiii. 11; xvi. 5, etc.

² Ver. 12.—ועל־הנוי ההוא הוא is perfectly regular here (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 79, 3), as a pronoun referring to something more remote in opposition to what is said δευτικῶς, הַגּוֹמִים הָאֵלֶּה, הַמְּאֲרִיץ הַזֶּה, vers. 9 and 11. There is no rule, as MOVERS supposes, why אֶת־עוֹנֵם should not be separated from אֶפְקֹד by נָאִם־י. There is good reason for the subsequent position of כְּשֵׁדִים, in that guilt cannot be ascribed to the land as to the king and the people. The use of אָתּוּ finally is explained thus, that the prophet does not refer it to אֶרֶץ only (though this also is of common gender), but also to גּוֹי, as in ver. 9 also he refers וְשִׁמְתִים לְשִׁפְהָ וְגוֹי to the preceding גּוֹיִם and הָאֶרֶץ. These reasons would not therefore determine me to believe in the unauthenticity of ver. 12. But there are other reasons, which afford important testimony against the authenticity not only of this verse, but of the two following verses. Comp. EXEGETICAL NOTES.

³ Ver. 18.—אֶת־ם is construed like וְתוֹ in ver. 12, and the suffixes of the verbs in ver. 9 b.

⁴ Ver. 20.—ואת כל־היערב. The expression is found also in Exod. xii. 33, where it is said that רַב עֶרְבָב went with the Israelites out of Egypt; Neh. xiii. 3 (in both these places punctuated אֶעֱרַב), where it is said that after hearing the Torah they separated from themselves כִּלְ־עֶרְבָב; Jer. i. 37, where it is predicted that the sword will come also כִּלְ־הָעֶרְבָב אֶל כִּלְ־הָעֶרְבָב; Ezek. xxx. 5, where in a prophecy against Egypt, among those who are to perish by the sword, together with Cush, Phut, etc., כִּלְ־הָעֶרְבָב is mentioned. In all these places the meaning is easily perceived. They are συμμαχικοί, i. e. strangers who are mingled with a nation as μέτοικοι, allies, vassals, mercenaries. This meaning corresponds exactly to the root עֶרַב, which in Chald. and Syr. denotes miscere, in Hebrew however is found only in the subst. עֶרְבָב, the wool in weaving (Levit. xiii. 48-59), and in Hithpael הִתְעַרְבָב (to mix one's self in anything, Prov. xiv. 10, to enter into company with any one, Ps. cvi. 35; Prov. xx. 19; xxiv. 21; in the marriage relation, Ezr. ix. 2) only reveals this meaning.

⁶ Ver. 27.—קִיָּו. It is the other form of קוּא (Lev. xviii. 28). Comp. קִיא. Isa. xxviii. 8, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Leaving aside vers. 12-14 for the present, let us first take into view the relation of vers. 15-29 to the foregoing context. The prophet has been prophesying the judgment on Judah and the neighboring nations, to be executed by Nebuchadnezzar ("all these nations round about," ver. 9). In ver. 11 b he had intimated that the supremacy of Babylon over these will come to an end after 70 years. He had thus erected the bridge by which to pass to the prediction of a second and more comprehensive stage of divine judgment, viz., that it will also involve Babylon itself. How is this conceivable? Vers. 15-29 explain this. The Lord purposes to hold judgment over all the nations of the then known world, which also represent the aggregate of the subsequent Babylonian empire. He will begin with Judah. On this and the nations, only hinted at before in ver. 9 sqq., but enumerated in ver. 19 sqq., and several others, which cannot be numbered among those meant in ver. 9 (comp. vers. 25, 26), Babylon will itself be an instrument of execution. Was it however to be itself spared? Was it better than the nations subjugated by it? No, it will only drink the cup of wrath last. For if the chosen people is not spared, no other nation can expect that its offence (עֲוֹנֹתָם, ver. 12) will remain unrecompensed. We see that this passage presupposes the previous one, being its necessary supplement. For while in the first part, neighboring nations beside Judah are mentioned without being particularly designated, the second part gives a complete and orderly catalogue of nations, beginning with Judah and ending with Babylon, thus presenting a considerably extended circle before our eyes. While, however, in the second part, objects of punitive judgment only (and Babylon indeed as such) are mentioned, we learn from the first that Babylon will be the executor of the Divine will on the whole series of nations mentioned before it (vers. 18-26 a).

Vers. 12-14. And it shall come to pass . . . their own hands. The following reasons favor the unauthenticity, not only of ver. 12, but of the two following verses. 1. The whole passage, xxv. 12-14, is directed against Babylon. Now it has been already intimated in ver. 11, and will likewise be below in ver. 26, that Babylon herself will not be spared from the judgment of the Lord. But how briefly and obscurely are these intimations given! If Sheshach is really to be explained by the Atbash, and in this form to be regarded as a genuine word of Jeremiah's, this mysterious name would certainly be suitable for the purpose of speaking obscurely of the destruction of Babylon at this moment.

And there was reason for this. For the Jews were so little disposed in accordance with the will of Jehovah, to subject themselves to the Babylonian king, that all needed to be avoided, which would confirm them in this obstinacy. Is it then, in view of this, credible that the prophet, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, after the battle of Carchemish, spoke in so detailed and emphatic a manner of the destruction of Babylon, as is done in vers. 12-14? I think not. 2. Vers. 12 and 13 presuppose the existence of the prophecy against Babylon (chh. l. li.) For (a) the expression עֲרֻבֹת עוֹלָם, perpetual desolations, is an evident quotation from this prophecy. It not only occurs exclusively in this prophecy (li. 26 and 62, and besides only as עֲרֻבֹת עוֹלָם, Ezek. xxxv. 9), but in li. 62 it is significantly treated in a certain measure as its pith and token, so that the employment of this expression in the text is to be regarded as an intentional reference to chh. l. li. (b). The words "and I will bring upon that land all My words which I have pronounced against it, all that which is written in this book," in ver. 13, point likewise with all possible definiteness to the prophecy against Babylon as one in existence. Now since this, according to li. 59 was first composed in the fourth year of Zedekiah, it is thus already shown that vers. 12 and 13, so far as they presuppose the prophecy against Babylon, cannot possibly have been written in the fourth year of Jehoiakim. 3. The second half of ver. 13 presupposes also the existence of the other prophecies against the nations, and this too as one Sepher. Now though most of these prophecies are certainly older than the battle of Carchemish (comp. on xlv. 2 and the Intro. to chh. xlv. - li.), it is yet evident from the opposition in which the second half of ver. 13 stands to the first, that here that Sepher against the nations is meant, which contains the prophecy against Babylon. This Sepher however cannot, as we have said, have been in existence before the fourth year of Zedekiah. We might assume that Jeremiah himself, after the completion of the Sepher against the nations, subjoined here the words of ver. 13. The striking addition "which Jeremiah hath prophesied," etc., is however opposed to this. For is it credible that Jeremiah himself put these words in the mouth of the Lord? Every one will feel that these words offend not only against rhetorical concinnity, but against religious feeling. 4. The demonstrative הַזֶּה, this, after הַסֵּפֶר the book, evidently presupposes that he who wrote it regarded the present passage, i. e., ch. xxv., as belonging to the Sepher against the nations. For in any other case the demonstrative would be incorrect. Now it may certainly be proved that the prophecies against the nations must once have stood in immediate connection with ch. xxv. The LXX. still has it in this place, so that, omitting ver. 14, the prophecy against Elam (xlix. 34-39, Heb.) follows directly on ver. 13. Then the others come in the following order: against Egypt (ch. xlv.), against Babylon (chh. l. and li.), against Philistia, Tyrus and Sidon (xlvii. 1-7), against Edom (xlix. 7-22), against Ammon (xlix. 1-5), against Kedar (xlix. 28-33), against Damascus (xlix.

23-27), against Moab (ch. xlviii.). Then follows xxv. 15-33 as a comprehensive conclusion. This arrangement is certainly, as regards the order of sequence, not the original one, but it still bears, as a whole, unmistakable traces of the original connection. In and of itself indeed the circumstance that the LXX. brings the Sepher against the nations into connection with ch. xxv., inserting it between vers. 13 and 15 of this chapter, is not of any great weight, for it might be due to pure arbitrariness on the part of the translator. But there is another circumstance, which evidently cannot have sprung from arbitrariness, and hence lends great importance to that connection. The prophecy against Elam has in the LXX. a superscription (τῶν Ἀλμύ) and a postscript. This postscript is however nothing else but the first verse of ch. xxvii., which is wanting in the LXX. For the details concerning this see xxvii. 1, xlix. 34 and the Intro. to chh. xlv. - li. It is hence plain that the prophecies against the nations must once have had their place directly before xxvii. 1, and that the prophecy against Elam must have formed their conclusion. Chap. xxv. however was reckoned as part of the immediately following Sepher against the nations. Therefore the author could say with perfect correctness of ver. 13: in this book. Thus then ver. 13 was inserted in the text at a time, when the Sepher against the nations had its place immediately after this chapter, as a whole, which included it. It is not probable, for the reason adduced above, that the prophet himself inserted it. As to ver. 14 finally, the first half is taken almost verbally from xxvii. 7, and in such wise that the perfect יִגְבְּרוּ, shall serve, which is incorrect here though it corresponds perfectly with the context there, is retained. In xxvii. 7 יִגְבְּרוּ is used quite regularly in the sense of the future, after the preceding statement of time יָתֵן אֲרָצָהּ. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 84. o. In the present passage, however, none of the conditions are fulfilled on which the rendering of the perfect as future depends, while the perfect or present signification contradicts the context throughout. The second half of the verse, which Hitzig regards as the genuine supplement of ver. 11, strongly reminds us of l. 29; li. 24. On according to the works of their own hands, comp. vers. 6 and 7. In itself then the passage contains nothing which Jeremiah might not have written. But it is clear that if the preceding sentences are to be critically suspected this single little sentence is all the less able to maintain its position, as standing isolated it would disturb the connection. In conclusion we give a brief synopsis of the different critical views respecting this passage, omitting those which consider it wholly original, or only subsequently supplied by Jeremiah. 1. Ver. 11 b-14 inauthentic (GRAF). 2. Ver. 11 b-14 a inauthentic (HITZIG). 3. Vers. 12-14 a later addition (NAEGELSNACU). 4. Vers. 13 b-14, inauthentic (BERTHOLOD). 5. Ver. 13 b, inauthentic (VENEM, SCHNURER). 6. Ver. 13, the words אֲשֶׁר נָתַן יְיָ-כְלֵה-הָאֵשׁ, inauthentic (HENSLEB).
Vers. 15 and 16. For thus saith . . . will send among them.—For introduces the prof of the sentence pronounced in ver. 12, that even Babylon, called according to vers. 9-11 to universal dominion, will be punished in its time. It might seem strange that in the same breath, as it were, conquest and destruction are predicted of the Babylonians. The prophet explains how this will be in the following verses, to ver. 26. He says that all the nations will have to empty the cup of wrath, but Babylon last. In this it is implied that Babylon will first be the instrument of accomplishing the judgment on the other nations, but at last will itself be subject to judgment. Those who declare vers. 11 b-14 and ver. 23 b to be unauthentic, act therefore with perfect consistency. But it is wrong to reject a thought here, which is one of the foundation pillars of Jeremiah's prophecy (comp. especially li. 20-24), without which it must be regarded as partial, and which ought least of all to be wanting here in the prophet's great programme.—The figure of the "cup of fury" and "cup of trembling" is frequent in the Scriptures: Isai. li. 17, 22; Hab. ii. 16; Jer. xlix. 12; li. 7; Lam. iv. 21; Ezek. xxiii. 31 sqq.; Ps. lx. 5; lxxv. 9. The drinking of the cup is emblematic of suffering punishment, the effect of the drinking, intoxication and reeling, is the emblem of shattered forces and of lost hold and self-command.—I send thee. The sending is to be regarded in general as merely imaginary. Comp. i. 10. It was afterwards, at any rate, partially real. Comp. xxvii. 2 sqq. It is evident from הִזְמַת and especially from ver. 17 that the prophet describes an inward experience.—Because of the sword. Observe the transition from the figurative to the ordinary mode of speech.

Vers. 17 and 18. Then took I . . . this day. The prophet begins with Jerusalem. Why he does so is seen from ver. 29. We may conclude from this that the entire Sepher against the nations (chh. xlvi.-51) followed this present prophecy.—The kings thereof. The plural here, since Nebuchadnezzar, as is well known, caused three Jewish kings in succession to feel his supremacy, may be taken in the proper sense. It may also however be the general plural and in what follows, when the number of the conquered kings could neither be known to the prophet, nor is any check possible on our part, the plural must be taken as general. Comp. rems. on xix. 3.—To make them a desolation. Comp. vers. 9, 11; xxiv. 9; xlii. 18; xlv. 8, 22; xlix. 13.—As it is this day. The explanations "truly and certainly," or "as it is impending," or "as we have begun to experience," are grammatically impossible. The LXX. omit these words. They are at any rate a later addition, whether by the prophet or some other can scarcely be decided. Comp. xi. 5; xxxii. 20; xlv. 6, 22, 23.

Vers. 19-21. Pharaoh . . . children of Ammon. In this enumeration of the nations the prophet evidently proceeds in general from South to North, beginning with Egypt and concluding with the kings of the North (ver. 26). From Egypt he goes up to the South-West (Philistia), and South-East (Uz), then to the East (Edom, Moab, Ammon), and West (Phœnicia), of the holy land. With Phœnicia are connected the islands of the remote West, whereupon the prophet leaps over to the far East (Arabian nations), in order to get by the North-East (Elam, Media), to the North (ver. 26), when his view loses itself in the remote distance.—Mingled people. As to Egypt in particular we know exactly what Jeremiah understands by מִצְרַיִם, which he attributes to this country. They are without doubt foreign mercenaries (ch. xlv. 21); primarily those Ionians, Carians and Phœnicians whom Psammetichus took into his service, and to whom he afterwards assigned residences in Egypt (HEROD. II., 152, 154; DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth. 3te Aufl. I., S. 922);—but then also strangers from other nations, which Jeremiah (xlv. 9) and Ezekiel (xxx. 5) mention.—The case appears to be different with the mingled people in ver. 24, of which below.—The land of Uz. (אֶרֶץ הָעוּז).

The passages of the Old Testament where Uz is mentioned are Gen. x. 23; xxii. 21; xxxvi. 28; Job i. 1; Lam. iv. 21, and the present passage.—DELITZSCH (HERZ. R.-Enc., VI. S. 112) remarks that we can still say nothing more definite with respect to the situation of this country than that, as we are told in the addition at the close of the book of Job in the LXX., it lay ἐπὶ τοῖς ὄρεσι τῆς Ἰδομαίας καὶ Ἀραβίας. This is favored by the present passage, which includes the country in its catalogue directly after Egypt and before Philistia, (the latter corresponding to the South-eastern border-land), but especially by Lam. iv. 21 (daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz), and the origin of Eliphaz in Teman (Job ii. 11), which is an Edomite city (according to Jer. xlix. 7). Uz is not thus identified with Edom, in which case alone GRAR's remark that Uz needed not to be specially mentioned together with Edom, would be justified. Comp. however the articles on Uz and Esau by Dr. SPRENGER in the Journal of the Germ. Oriental Society (Zeitsch. d. d.-Morgent. Gesell., 1863, S. 373), who seeks to prove the identity of Uz and Esau from Oriental sources.—In opposition to FRIES (Stud. u. Krit., 1854, 2) DELITZSCH correctly remarks that he seeks for the country too far to the North, (in the province of El-Tellul, west of the Ilauran mountains).—The Philistines, etc. Of the five cities of the Philistines Gath only is wanting (Josh. xiii. 3; 1 Sam. vi. 17). It was deprived of its walls by Uzziah (2 Chron. xxvi. 6) and lost its importance (comp. Am. vi. 2). For the same reason it seems to be passed over in Am. i. 6 sqq.; Zeph. ii. 4; Zech. ix. 5 sqq. Comp. KÜHLER on the last passage.—Why Jeremiah speaks only of a "remnant of Ashdod" is explained by history. Psammetichus had after a siege of 29 years taken the city and destroyed it. (HEROD. II. 157). [RAWLINSON, Herodotus, II. p. 242.—S. R. A.]

All sea-washed land, whether continent or island, is called אִי. Here the collective אִיִּים, as elsewhere the plural אִיִּים (Isa. xl. 15; xli. 1, 5; xlii. 4, 10, etc.), denotes not merely the continental Phœnician colonies, but all the coast-lands, and thus also the islands of the Mediterranean.—In vers. 23 and 24 Arabian races are enumerated, which in opposition to אִי and in relation to Edom, Moab and Ammon, represent the remote east.—Dedan (דֵּדָן), comp.

Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 30; Job vi. 19; Isa. xxi. 14. This name is also borne by two different localities. The biblical Tema is "the most northern of all Arabian places," the second chief place in Djöf, three days journey from the territory of Damascus. Comp. HERZ. R.-Enc., XV., S. 706 [RITTER, Erdkunde, XII. 159; XIII. 384, etc.].—Buz (בּוּז), is mentioned in Gen. xxii. 21 as a son of Nachor and brother of Uz. Elihu (Job xxxii. 2) is a Buzite. It is at all events an Arabic tribe, but no further particulars are known. Comp. WINER, R.-W.-B., s. v., Buz.—All in the utmost corners (כָּל־צִוְיֹת־פְּתָחַי). comp. Comm. on ix. 25; xlix. 32.—Arabia (עֲרָב). It is well known that this word, which occurs first in Isaiah (xiii. 20; xxi. 13) designates, not the whole of the now so-called Arabia, but only a part bordering on Palestine (GESENIUS supposes the territory of the Ishmaelites. Comp. Thes., pp. 1066 and 1441; coll. Gen. xxv. 18). So also the mingled people that dwell in the desert designates Arabian peoples, of which we know nothing further. The expression all the kings of Arabia, occurs besides only in 1 Kings x. 15, where it is said that Solomon received 666 talents of gold beside what he had of the merchantmen and all the kings of the mixed peoples [Eng. Vers. Arabia] and the governors of the country. Comp. KEIL on the passage.—The עֲרָב of this passage and the book of Kings, were probably mixed states of various tribes, which for the sake of protection were tributary to some neighboring power. Such little unions seem to have been formed in the Arabian desert near the borders of Palestine, of which, however, the remembrance was lost in a comparatively brief period. The author of the book of Chronicles, at least, did not know what he was to understand by the כְּלָיִי עֲרָב (1 Kings x. 15). He therefore wrote for it simply כְּלָיִי עֲרָב (2 Chron. ix. 14). As to the fulfilment of these prophecies respecting the Arabian tribes, we are left, in the absence of all positive statements, to conjectures. Comp. NIENBUR. Ass. u. Babel., S. 209, 10; DRUCKER, Gesch. d. Alteth., I. S. 827, and what is subsequently remarked on ver. 26 a.

Vers. 25 and 26. And all the kings of Zimri . . . drink after them. The LXX. omits the kings of Zimri. AQUILA has Ζαυρί (MONTFAUCON, p. 221); Vulg. Zambre (Zambri); Syr. Samron; THEODORET, Ζαυρίση. He says παρά τῷ Ἐβραῖος καὶ τῷ Σύρω Ζευζραν εὐρίκαμεν. τῆς δὲ Χερσίρας ὀνόματι. Accordingly most expositors have taken Zimri (the name does not occur elsewhere as a gentilicium) for the nation descended from Sinran (Gen. xxv. 2). But where this nation is to be sought for is very uncertain. To think of the Ethiopic Zimiris (PLIN. Hist. Nat., 36, 16, 25), or the Ζευζρίται (STRABO, XVII. 1, 786) is forbidden by the connection.—Zabra also, the urbs regia between Mecca and Medina, of which GESENIUS reminds us (Thes., p. 421), will not suit. WINER (R.-W.-B., II., p. 465, 3d Ed.), mentions Zimara on the upper Euphrates in Lesser Armenia, and the city of the same name in Greater Armenia, and Zimura in Asia. Comp. RUETSCH, in HERZ. R.-Enc. XIV., S. 409.—None of these views are satisfactory. The matter must remain in suspensio.—Elam, the Medes (עֵלָם כַּדִּי). These two are also mentioned together in Isa. xxi. 2. As to Elam, it appears in the primeval period as an independent country with its own princes (Gen. xiv. 1, 9). It is maintained by many that Elam includes Persia, and therefore in the older period, stands for what was known in later times as כְּדָר (comp. DRUCKER, on Isa. xxi. 2), but this is denied by others (comp. VAININGER, HERZ. R.-Enc., III. S. 747). As to its position this much is certain, that it lay to the east of the Tigris, and, moreover, of its mouths. But the greatest uncertainty prevails with respect to its boundaries and extent. Comp. VAININGER, with KIEPERT's Atlas of the Ancient World, and M. NIENBUR, Ass. u. Babel., S. 354.—Media, situated to the north of Elam, forms the transition to the kingdoms of the north, of which Jeremiah mentions none by name. He speaks only of the near and the distant (comp. xlviii. 24). In chh. I. and li. "an assembly of great nations from the north country," is mentioned as the executors of the destined punishment on Babylon (I. 3, 9, 41-4. 48). Some are then called by name to accomplish this,—Ararat, Minni, Asbckenaz (li. 27), and Media [the Medes], (li. 28). From this we see that the Medes are reckoned among the northern nations, which does not contradict the present passage and might well be so, for Media extends certainly from the northeast to the north of Babylon.—One with another. Comp. rems. on ver. 9.—As to the fulfilment of this prophecy, thus much only is ascertained with certainty, that Nebuchadnezzar subjugated the lands west of the Tigris down to Egypt and the borders of Lydia. Whether he also subjugated the lands lying east, or the Median kingdom, is disputed. NIENBUR (Ass. u. Bab.) maintains that Nebuchadnezzar held his kingdom as a fief of Media, but without paying tribute. But after the death of Cyaxares, he ended victoriously a great war with Media (Id., S. 211 sqq). DRUCKER, on the other hand (I., S. 798, 844, etc.), combats both the dependence of Babylon on Media, and the victory over it. This controversy is of no importance for us. The prophet does not mean to say that God had given to Nebuchadnezzar all the five parts of the world, with all the beasts therein (xxvii. 6), and the men, for an actual possession, nor can this be maintained for all the lands here expressly mentioned by name. After the victory at Carchemish and Nebuchadnezzar's accession to the throne, the prophet recognizes this star, which has ascended the political horizon, as the sun which is to shine over all. In the grand prophetic view of history [which rests on the essential and regards the collateral as non-existent), since there has been any history at all, one nation always stands at the head of all the rest. This nation is that which rules the world, i. e., which dominates all the other nations, if not really, ideally or de jure, and is the representative worldly kingdom in antithesis to the kingdom of God. This is the sense of this passage, and of the later one, xxvii. 5 sqq. It may then well be said that this passage (xxv. 15-26) involves two judicial acts; one by which the Chaldean empire is founded, and a second by which it is judged (ver. 26 b).—The king of Sheshach (שֶׁשַׁח) (וכִּלְךָ שֶׁשַׁח) It seems indubitable from the context here and from li. 41, where the two ideas correspond in the parallelism, that Sheshach is Babylon, and this is acknowledged by all the expositors. MARSHAM is the only exception, who takes שֶׁשַׁח as equivalent to שִׁשְׁיָן (Shushan). Comp. Ges. Thes., p. 1486. But we are very much in the dark as to the origin, the etymology and the meaning of the word. It is easily understood that Jeremiah here used a word for Babylon which somewhat veiled the idea. He may have done this for the sake of his countrymen. For the object of his prophecy requires that the impression of terror, which the name of Babylon must have made on their minds, should not be weakened. Hence with the exception of chh. l., li., he says nothing against Babylon, and these chapters, as is clear from the mode of publication, were intended much more for the future than for the present. That regard for the Chaldeans was his motive for such concealment, I do not believe. It might be said that he was afraid, as indeed many, JEROME at their head, have supposed. Jeremiah, however, surely feared the Chaldeans no more than his own countrymen. What other motive he had for concealing the name of Babylon from the Chaldeans, we cannot conceive. What had the Chaldeans to do with him? If they received information of the prophecy, yet it was not written for them. In the only passage where שֶׁשַׁח occurs besides this (li. 44), the need of change has evidently occasioned the expression. Jeremiah namely, in connection with chh. l. and li., never uses the word Babylon in the two parallel members of a verse, except li. 49, where the antithesis requires it. Elsewhere he uses as parallel with Babylon either Chaldeans (l. 8, 35, 45; li. 24, 35, 54), or land of Babylon, (li. 29), or a figurative expression like hammer (שֶׁשַׁח, l. 23), or heart of my insurgents (שֶׁשַׁח, li. 1). He also twice uses instead of Babylon figurative expressions, as in li. 21. In li. 41 the name of Babylon occurs in the second clause. Accordingly it is quite in order that this name should not be used in the first clause of the sentence. Instead of it we have two synonymous expressions, of which one "the praise of the whole earth" is evidently of a figurative nature. The other is our שֶׁשַׁח. We see then that Jeremiah uses this expression in the one case for concealment, in the other for variety. Whence did he obtain it? Is it to be explained by the Atbash? Is it a species of Cabalistic Temura or anagram which is either simple (ex. gr.

בְּלִאָּהֵי, Exod. xxiii. 23=לִאָּהֵי), or elaborate?

The latter consists in turning the Alphabet round and beginning at the end (א for א, ט for ט, etc., hence Atbash), or in the middle (ל for א, מ for ב, hence Albam). Comp. BUXTORF, Lex. Chald., p. 248, 9; HERZOG, R.-Enc., VII. 205 [GSENIUS denies that the Atbash was in use in Jeremiah's time, and HIRTZIG accordingly attributes the anagram to a later period, when fear of Babylon furnished a motive for its use.—S. R. A.].—Has Jeremiah really made use here of such a play upon words? Many maintain this. It is said, if a prophet can make alphabetically arranged songs, he can make use of the Atbash. It may be that the two things are related, and hence I will not dispute the possibility. But I make this admission unwillingly and would rather say, with many of the elder theologians (ex. gr. SELDEN, De Diis Syr. Synt., II., Cap. 13): vix risum hic fortasse teneas. As regards the signification of the word, it is certainly most natural to think of the radix שֶׁשַׁח, coll. שֶׁשַׁח, שֶׁשַׁח, שֶׁשַׁח, שֶׁשַׁח, שֶׁשַׁח (Isa. xli. 64), and thence derive the meaning demissio, submersio, sinking down (HENGSTENBERG), humbling (GRAF). HENGSTENBERG remarks in opposition to my view (in Jer. u. Bab., S. 131), that the reason of its use is rhetorical, the prophet wishing to deprive of their terror the names Babylon and Casdim, which had a most terrible sound in the Israelitish ear, pointing by a slight alteration at the ruin hidden behind the greatness of Babylon; to which it may be replied, that these names were certainly not of terrible sound at the moment when destruction was being predicted to their bearers. This is however the case in xxv. 26, and in chh. l. and li. And why should Babylon be mentioned so frequently as the instrument of Israel's chastisement, without the "fearful sound" of the name being mitigated by the pleasant שֶׁשַׁח? The meaning "demissio, submersio" does not appear to suit at all in li. 41. For there it stands parallel with "praise of the whole earth." Others, therefore, have interpreted the name otherwise; CIR. D. MICHAELIS, urbs bellatrix from the Arabic shaka=fortitudinem in bello ostendit; J. D. MICHAELIS χαλκόπουλον, from the Arabic sakka=ferro obduracy portam; BOHLEN, atrium regis, from an analogy in modern Persian. But all this is dubious. I believe that the whole matter must be left still in suspensio. Perhaps the Assyrian Babylonian monuments will throw light on it. At least RÖDIGER (in Ges. Thes., p. 2486), refers to a discovery which RAWLINSON has made (comp. Journal of the Asiatic Soc., XII., p. 478) according to which שֶׁשַׁח was the name of a Babylonian deity. I have not been able any where to find a confirmation of this statement [Sir H. RAWLINSON has observed that the name of the moon-god, which was identical, or nearly so, with that of the city of Abraham, Ur (or Hur), might have been read in one of the ancient dialects of Babylon as Shishaki, and that consequently a possible explanation is thus obtained of the Sheshach of Scripture, (RAWLINSON'S Herodotus, I., p. 616). Sheshach may stand for Ur, Ur itself, the old capital, being taken (as Babel the new capital was constantly) to represent the country." SMITH'S Bible Dictionary.—S. R. A.].

3. The Judgment of the World.

XXV. 30-38.

- 30 But do thou prophesy against them all these words,
 And say unto them:
 Jehovah roareth from on high,¹
 And utters his voice from his holy habitation:
 He roareth against his pasture;
 With a clear cry, like the vintagers, he answers the inhabitants of the land.
- 31 Tumult reacheth to the extremity of the earth;
 For Jehovah hath a controversy with the nations;²
 He pleadeth³ with all flesh:
 The godless—he giveth them a prey to the sword, saith Jehovah.
- 32 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth:
 Behold, evil goeth forth from nation to nation,
 And a great tempest riseth from the ends of the earth.
- 33 And the slain of Jehovah shall on that day lie
 From one end of the earth to the other end of the earth:
 They shall not be lamented nor gathered nor buried;
 They shall become dung on the face of the earth.
- 34 Howl, O ye shepherds and cry aloud,
 And wallow, ye strong ones of the flock:
 For your days for slaughter are accomplished;⁴
 And I scatter you,⁵ that ye shall fall like an elegant vessel.
- 35 And the refuge shall vanish from the shepherds,
 And deliverance from the strong ones of the flock.
- 36 Hark! Crying of the shepherds and howling⁶ of the strong ones of the flock;
 For Jehovah devastates their pasture.
- 37 The fields of peace are desolated⁷ before the fury of Jehovah's anger.
- 38 He hath quitted, like a lion, his covert,
 For their land is become waste before the fury of the destroyer,⁸
 And before the fury of his anger.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 30.—יהוה כמרום ישאנו. These words to קולו are a quotation from Joel iv. 16; Am. i. 2, only that instead of כירושלים there, we have כמרום, and ממעון קדשו instead of מירושלים.

² Ver. 31.—ריב, with ב, as in Gen. xxxi. 36; Jud. vi. 32; Hos. ii. 4.

³ Ver. 31.—נשכט (to have a suit at law, litigare. Comp. ii. 25) with ל here only.

⁴ Ver. 34.—כי מלאו וגו'. The construction (constr. pregnans. Comp. NABELESB. Gr., § 112, 7) is as in Gen. xxv. 24.

⁵ Ver. 34.—הפצותיכם. The Masoretic would have this word pronounced הפצותיכם. Many MSS. and Eds. however read הפצותיכם. So also AQUILA, THEOD., SYMM. (οὐ σαλευσάμενοι ὑμῶν); JEROME, dissipationes vestrae [A. V.: your dispersions]. Now whether we connect this idea with the foregoing context ("your days are accomplished and your scatterings," as RASCHI, EWALD in his Crit. Gr., S. 186, MACRER, UMBRETT read), or with the following ("and as to your scatterings—," as KATZM and others; "and your scatterings will take place," as CUR. B. MICHAELIS), the construction is still artificial or faulty and the sense feeble. The Masoretic would have the form regarded as a verb. But since הפצותיכם is a monstrous form, HITZIG and GRAF would read הפצותיכם as Hiph., with strengthened ת, like החריה, xii. 5; xxii. 15 coll. הרגל Hos. xi. 3. The ת has given occasion to regard the form as a substantive; since, however, there are no substantives of the form הפצות, הפצות has been made from הפצות. I also adopt this view. As to the meaning of the word, however, I hold that of "scattering" to be correct. For 1. the Hiph. occurs only in this sense, never that of breaking; 2. breaking in relation to the preceding context would be tautologous, while it is very suitable to say that a part of the flock shall be slaughtered, another part scattered, but in such wise that the scattered also shall be overthrown and broken, like fine delicate vessels (כלי הכרה) Hos. xiii. 15; 2 Chron. xxxii. 27; xxxvi. 10; Neh. ii. 10; Dan. xi. 8); 3. The mention of the כִּנּוּג and of the כְּלִי־כֶסֶף ver. 35 (comp. פְּלִיט, the escaped) applies better to scattered fugitives than to broken vessels.

⁷ Ver. 37.—Since there is no intertance transporting the reader to the future, וַנִּרְכּוּ is to be taken either as preterite or present (comp. Comm. on xviii. 4; xix. 4, 5). The latter is to be preferred, since נִרְכּוּ is evidently parallel to וַיִּדְרֹךְ, which expresses the present (ver. 36). The participle נִרְכּוּם should be taken as preterite. (Comp. NAGELSB. Gr., § 96, 2).

⁸ Ver. 33.—יֹנֵה [destroyer, from וָנָה, to be violent] does not occur elsewhere as an independent substantive. It stands objectively after הָרָבֵב, Jer. xvi. 16; 1. 16, after יָעִיר, Zeph. iii. 1. More frequently it is not found. On the other hand, וַיִּרְוּ stands only before אָנָּה. The word does not occur in any other connection. The hypothesis of HITZIG, EWALD, GRAF is therefore well-founded, that with the LXX. and Chald. we are to read הָרָבֵב הַיּוֹנֵה הָרָבֵב.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

While in the previous section a long series of nations was adduced by name as the object of judgments, in such wise, however, that the enumeration ended indefinitely (ver. 26), in what follows no nation is mentioned by name, but the limits of the territory to be reached by the judgment are strictly defined in the words all the inhabitants of the earth (ver. 30), all flesh (ver. 31), from one end, etc. (ver. 33). From this it follows that the prophet here beholds the judicial act of God in its last and highest stage. After having, in vers. 1-11, described the judgment of the kingdom of God in the world, in vers. 12-29 the judgment of the kingdom of the world (i. e. that kingdom which represents the culminating point of history), he now describes the world-judgment, i. e. the judgment of all nations of the earth absolutely, without regard to their greater or less historical importance. We thus perceive here the same appearance, which not rarely occurs elsewhere (comp. ex. gr. Joel i. 15; ii. 1, 2 coll. iii. 4 sqq.; Isa. xiii. 9 sqq.; Zeph. i. 2-18; Matt. xxiv), viz., that single temporal acts of divine judgment are designated as types and preludes of the last and highest judgment.—The passage includes four sections: 1. vers. 30, 31, prediction of the judgment in general, declaration as to who is the judge, from whence the judge proceeds, how far the judgment will extend; 2. vers. 32, 33, more special description of that which the judge does; the storm rolls from nation to nation, till the whole surface of the earth is covered with the slain; 3. vers. 34 and 35, address to the judged; they are to howl and wallow, for the day of slaughter is come and there is no possibility of escaping it; 4. vers. 36-38, the judgment is in course of execution, the cry of the oppressed is heard;—afterwards all becomes quiet, the lion has desolated the land.

Vers. 30, 31. But do thou prophesy . . . saith Jehovah. The person of Jehovah is evidently presented in these two verses as the judge. His appearance is described in its terribleness, as at the conclusion of His judicial acts.—But do thou prophesy. With these words the Lord, having dismissed those who protest against the cup (vers. 28 and 29), turns to the prophet, in order to put into his mouth, not a more moderate, but on the contrary a more emphatic threatening of judgment. We see that the prophet plainly wishes to represent the judgment as proceeding from the upper sanctuary. He was the more obliged to do this as the earthly sanctuary was itself to be an object of the judgment. Comp. his pasture, directly afterwards. The roaring is immediately explained by the synonymous utters his voice, which in Old Testament usage is frequently a designation of the thunder (Ps. xviii. 1; xxix. 3 sqq.; xvi. 7; lxviii. 34; Joel ii. 11).—Against his pasture. The holy land, of course including Jerusalem and the temple. Here, as in ver. 18 coll. כּוּחַ ver. 29, the prophet names these sacred places first. On נוֹהַ, pasture, comp. x. 25; Ps. lxxix. 7; Exod. xv. 13.—With a clear cry, etc. Nature in uproar! Thunder, lightning and tempest! The thunder roars, the tempest howls, hisses, whistles. This is the הִדְדֵּךְ the hillo, heigh-ho, of the vintager (comp. הוֹלֵלִים, Jud. ix. 27), who, however, here wades in human blood instead of the blood of the grape; for in the words like the treaders, an allusion has, doubtless correctly, been found to the comparison of a bloody conqueror with a treader of the wine-press. הִדְדֵּךְ is found also in xlvi. 33; li. 14; Isa. xvi. 9, 10, and everywhere in a sense similar to that of this passage.—He answers. Comp. li. 14; Ps. xxxii. 18; cxix. 172.—Tumult reacheth, etc. Description of the whole tumult and its extent.—For Jehovah, etc. The Lord disputes not with individuals but with all. Therefore the noise is so fearful.—To the sword. Comp. xv. 9.

Vers. 32, 33. Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth . . . face of the earth. The person of the judge retires; what He does is brought into the foreground and is described as proceeding from the ends of the earth, from nation to nation, a destructive tempest (ver. 32), especially as a universal dying, in consequence of which the earth will be full of unburied corpses (ver. 33).—Goeth forth. Comp. ix. 2; xxiii. 19.—Ariseth. Comp. vi. 22.—Pleadeth, etc. Comp. Isa. lxvi. 16.—Shall not be lamented, etc. A quotation from viii. 2; xvi. 4. Observe, moreover, the Old Testament coloring of this description. The prophet's gaze remains fixed on the earth. Comp., on the other hand, Matt. xxiv. 30 sqq.; xxv. 31 sqq.; 1 Thess. iv. 16 sqq.

Vers. 34, 35. Howl . . . strong ones of the flock. The prophet turns to the judged themselves, chiefly to the shepherds and the strong ones of the flock. Since the judgment of the world appears generally in Holy Scripture as the overthrow of worldly empires by the kingdom of God (comp. Ps. ii. 8 sqq.; ex. 1 sqq.; Dan. ii. 44; vii. 27; 1 Cor. xv. 24 sqq.; Heb. xii. 26 sqq.; Rev. xi. 15), by which it is proved that the first shall be last, and the last first, and that God has chosen the foolish and weak things of the world to confound the strong;—we have here to understand by the shepherds and strong ones of the flock primarily the kings and princes (comp. “the kings thereof,” etc., ver. 18), as the most eminent bearers and representatives of worldly power. Still a limitation and an extension are in place; a limitation, in so far that by shepherds are most usually meant the kings of kings, i. e. the rulers of the world in general, here primarily Babylon,—an extension, in so far as the strong ones of the flock doubtless denote all that is great, strong and glorious in the world. Comp. Deut. xxxiii. 15; Ps. xxii. 13; Jer. l. 11; Ezek. xxxix. 17 sqq.—Wallow. Wallowing in dust and ashes is also elsewhere an expression of anxious supplication in the greatest distress. Comp. vi. 26; Mic. i. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 30.

Vers. 36-38. Hark . . . his anger. The prophet describes here both the judgment in its course (ver. 36) and the appearance of the earth after its accomplishment. The cry of the mighty and the strong is heard, for the Lord is devastating their pasturage. Here also only the shepherds and the strong ones of the flock, the fat rams, the strong steers, the wild stallions, are mentioned, for the Lord has chosen the weak ones of the world.—The fields of peace, the pastures hitherto peaceful.—Before the fury. Comp. iv. 26.—Like a lion. Comp. Hos. v. 14; Ps. x. 9.—For their land, *etc. We might perhaps expect therefore. But then the following reason before the fury, *etc., would be dragging tautology. The sentence with “∩” simply explains the figure used:—because the land, in consequence of the divine anger, is devastated by the sword, it may be said that it looks like a pasturage visited by a lion.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On vers. 3-7. “God is a long-suffering God, who desireth not the death of a sinner, but that he may turn and live, Ezek. xxxiii. 11. Therefore He gives the first world 120 years time for repentance, Gen. vi. 3. Lot preaches to Sodom and Gomorrah more than twenty-five years, Gen. xiii. 13 and xix. 14. Christ preaches repentance three and a half years, the apostles forty years, before the destruction of Jerusalem. But dost thou not know that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? Rom. ii. 4.” CRAMER.

2. How is it that those to whom the Lord has chiefly revealed His goodness and truth and whom He has made the bearers and medium of His promises; how is it, we ask, that it is just these men who are the most hardened in impenitence? The people of Nineveh, says the Lord, in Matt. xii. 41, will rise at the last judgment with this generation and will condemn it; for they repented at the preaching of Jonah and behold a greater than Jonah is here. And He cries, Woe to Chorazin and Bethsaida, for had such mighty works been done in Tyre and Sidon as were done in them, they would have repented long ago in sackcloth and ashes. And in like manner He says to Capernaum, which was exalted to heaven, that it shall be brought down to hell, for if such mighty works had been done in Sodom it would have remained to this day (Matt. xi. 21-23). The key is contained in the words “temple of Jehovah, temple of Jehovah,” vii. 4. Israel does not hear the “if” in the words of his calling and election. They regard themselves as chosen unconditionally, and on this account as better than all others, being such as need no repentance. Thus grace has become a snare to them, and so it is to all who use their privileges as a lever of their wickedness. (1 Pet. ii. 16). [The election to gracious privileges not being necessarily election to eternal life.—S. R. A.]

3. [Nebuchadnezzar my servant. It is remarkable that the Holy Spirit gives to Nebuchadnezzar by Jeremiah (xxv. 9; xxvii. 6; xliii. 10) the same title that Isaiah gives even to the Messiah Himself: namely, ‘My Servant.’ And inasmuch as the Chaldean king was appointed and empowered by God to conquer the nations, such as Ammon, Edom, Moab (which were types of the enemies of Christ and His Church,) we need not scruple to say that in these victories He foreshadowed the conquests of Christ, who made Himself a servant to do His Father’s will.” WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

4. On ver. 12. “Deus uti consuevit impiorum opera quoad malum pœnæ. Malum vero culpæ minime prodit, sed eos ipsos propter illud gravissime punit, præsertim si modum excesserint (Zech. i. 15). Solet istud illustrari apposita similitudine a virga, quam pater in castiganda sobole usurpat, usurpatum vero mox in ignem conficit.” FÖRSTER.

5. On ver. 12. “Verbum Domini est veracissimum tum in comminationibus, de quibus hic et 2 Reg. x. 16, tum in promissionibus, de quibus Ps. xxiii. 14. Unde scite AUGUSTINUS (de Civ. D. 22, 3); ‘venient hæc quoque sicut ista venerunt; idem enim Deus utraque promisit, utraque ventura esse prædixit.’—Per quod quis peccat, per idem punitur et ipse.” FÖRSTER.

6. On ver. 29. “Verissimum est illud CLEMENTIS ALEXANDRINI: proximus Deo plenissimus flagellis (the nearer God, the nearer trouble, the better Christian, the greater the cross: it meets him first who is nearest to God). Contra vero BERNHARDUS: Qui hic non in laboribus hominum, illic erunt in laboribus demonum.” FÖRSTER.

7. On ver. 30 sqq. “The strict judgment of God sounds much stronger and clearer than we can bear. Hence the 600,000 men were so terrified when they heard the voice of God, that they said: let not God speak with us, lest we die (Exod. xx. 19). It is well that we do not refuse to hear, or stop our ears against the sweet sound of God’s voice in the sacred office of the preacher, because we can have it (Ps. xcvi. 8), or the time will come, when we shall be obliged to hear its awful roaring, which God forbid. For when the lion roars, who shall not be afraid? (Am. iii. 8.)” CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The entire chapter treats of the divine judgments and affords occasion to speak of them (in a series of sermons) in various relations. We can thus speak, I. of the judicial acts of God according to the conditions of their manifestation. They are (1) required by the sins of men (vers. 5 and 6); (2) deferred by the love of God (vers. 5-6); (3) driven to accomplishment by the impenitence of mankind (ver. 7 sqq.).—II. Of the judicial acts of God according to the stages of their manifestation. (1) The preliminary, (a) in the life of individuals, (b) in the life of nations. God judges continually here below both single individuals and entire nations (vers. 9-29). (2) The final judgment; (a) in so far as it has already begun (vers. 9-11, 29 coll. 1 Pet. iv. 17; Matt. xxiv.). The theocracy in its outer relations is already judged; in this sense the universal judgment has begun at the house of God; (b) in so far as it is still future (single empires have already been destroyed, as well as single men, but the judgment of the world as a whole is still impending, ver. 30 sqq.).—III. The judicial acts of God differently represented in the Old and New Testaments. (1) In the Old Testament they are (a) represented in figures (vers. 30, 31 sqq., 38), (b) limited to the earth (vers. 30, 33); (2) In the New Testament they are represented (a) in their full superterrestrial reality, (b) as extended over heaven and earth. (Comp. in contrast to this passage Matt. xxv.; 1 Cor. xv.; 1 Thess. iv.; 2 Pet. iii.).—IV. The judicial acts of God differently felt, according to the different inward conditions of men—(1) As destruction on the part of the godless (ver. 7 sqq.); (2) As deliverance on the part of the pious (vers. 11 and 12).

B. The Three Historical Append.ces.

THE PROPHET OF THE LORD AND THE FALSE PROPHETS.

CHAPTERS XXVI. to XXIX.

It has been already shown in the introduction to the ninth discourse that these chapters stand here together, because their common topic is the conflict of the true prophet with the false prophets. Their position just here, however, is occasioned by the close historical connection of chh. xxvii., xxviii., with ch. xxv. There is thus a double connection, (1) that of chh. xxvii., xxviii., with ch. xxv. (Cup of wrath and yoke); (2) that of chh. xxvi.—xxix. with each other (false prophets). Before ch. xxvii., however, stands ch. xxvi., and thus separates the connected passages, ch. xxv., and chh. xxvii., xxviii., because it is the oldest in time. It comes before the fourth year of Jehoiakim. Perhaps also the four chapters were found in this order, and transposed here as a whole. Chh. xxvii., xxviii. belong to the fourth year of Zedekiah (Comp. Comm. on xxvii. 1). Ch. xxix. is somewhat earlier in date (Comp. the Introd. to this chapter). The arrangement of these four chapters is thus not consistently chronological. Perhaps first, the struggle of the prophet with the false prophets in their home (ch. xxvi.—xxviii.), then his struggle with those also who had emigrated to Babylon is represented. [“Jeremiah goes back here from the mention of the fourth year of Jehoiakim to the beginning of that king’s reign, in order to suggest to his readers an evidence, a fortiori, of God’s mercy and forbearance to Jerusalem. God gave solemn denunciations to Jehoiakim and Jerusalem in Jehoiakim’s fourth year. But He did more than this: He had sent a prophetic message of warning to him even at the beginning of his reign. Such considerations as these will suggest the reasons for which Jeremiah’s prophecies are not placed in chronological order.” WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

1. The conflict of Jeremiah with the false prophets before the fourth year of Jehoiakim.

XXVI. 1-24.

1 In the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah, king of Judah,
 2 came this word from the LORD [Jehovah] saying, Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah]:
 Stand in the court of the LORD’s [Jehovah’s] house and speak unto all the cities of 3 Judah, which come to worship in the LORD’s house, all the words that I command thee to speak unto them; diminish [omit] not a word. If so be [perhaps] they will 4 hearken, and turn every man from his evil way, that I may repent me of the evil, which I purpose to do unto them because of the evil of their doings. And thou shalt say unto them: Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah]: If ye will not hearken to 5 me, to walk in my law, which I have set before you, to hearken to the words of my servants the prophets, whom I sent unto you, both¹ rising up early, and sending 6 them, but ye have not hearkened: then will I make this house like Shiloh, and 7 will make this² city a curse to all the nations of the earth. So the priests and prophets and all the people heard Jeremiah speaking these words in the house of the 8 LORD [Jehovah]. Now it came to pass, when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking all that the Lord had commanded him to speak unto all the people, that the priests and the prophets, and all the people took him, saying, Thou shalt surely die.

9 Why hast thou prophesied in the name of the Lord [Jehovah] saying, This house shall be like Shiloh, and this city shall be desolate without an inhabitant? And all the people were gathered against Jeremiah in the house of the Lord [Jehovah].

10 When the princes of Judah heard those things, then they came up from the king's house into the house of the Lord [Jehovah] and sat down in the entry of the new gate³ of the Lord's [Jehovah's] house. Then spake the priests and the prophets unto the princes and to all the people, saying, this man is worthy to die; for he hath prophesied against this city, as ye have heard with your ears. Then spake Jeremiah unto all the princes and to all the people, saying, The Lord [Jehovah] sent me to prophesy against this house and against this city all the words that ye have heard. Therefore now amend your ways and your doings, and obey the voice of the Lord [Jehovah] your God, and the Lord will repent him of the evil that he hath pronounced against you. As for me, behold, I am in your hand: do with me as seemeth good and meet unto you. But know ye for certain, that if ye put me to death, ye shall surely bring innocent blood upon yourselves, and upon this city and upon the inhabitants thereof: for of a truth the Lord hath sent me unto you to speak all these words in your ears.

16 Then said the princes and all the people unto the priests and unto the prophets: This man is not worthy to die: for he hath spoken to us in the name of the Lord [Jehovah] our God. Then rose up certain of the elders of the land, and spake to all the assembly of the people, saying, Micah⁴ the Morasthite prophesied in the days of Hezekiah, king of Judah, and spake to all the people of Judah, saying, Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth: Zion shall be plowed as a field, Jerusalem shall become a heap of stones, And the mountain of the house woody heights.

19 Did Hezekiah, king of Judah, and all Judah put him at all to death? did he not fear the Lord [Jehovah] and besought [propitiated]⁵ the Lord [Jehovah] and the Lord [Jehovah] repented him of the evil which he had pronounced against them. Thus might we procure great evil [We however are about to commit great wickedness] against our [own] souls. And there was also a man that prophesied in the name of the Lord [Jehovah], Urijah the son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim, who prophesied against the city and against the land, according to all the words of Jeremiah. And [when] Jehoiakim, the king, with all his mighty men [warriors] and all the princes, heard his words [and], the king sought to put him to death: but [when] Urijah heard of it [and] he was afraid and fled, and went into Egypt. And Jehoiakim, the king, sent men into Egypt, Elnathan, the son of Achhor, and certain men with him into Egypt. And they fetched forth Urijah out of Egypt, and brought him unto Jehoiakim the king; who slew him with the sword, and cast his dead body into the graves of the common [sons of the] people. Nevertheless [But] the hand of Ahikam the son of Shaphan was with Jeremiah, that they should [did] not give him into the hands of the people to put him to death.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

It has been shown above that this chapter is not immediately connected with chap. xxv., but mediately through chh. xxvii., xxviii. The assertion of GRAF that "the narrative of this occurrence has no connection either with the preceding or with the following context" is incomprehensible. For if we do not agree with EWALD that each of the three supplements concludes with a glance at those prophets, who either prophesied what was directly false or did not defend the truth with becoming steadfastness (Proph. d. A. B., II., S. 137), it is yet indisputable that all these four chapters treat of the conflict of the prophet with false prophets, that they follow each other in chronological order, and that chh. xxvi.-xxix. presuppose ch. xxv. as their basis. This explains the position of ch. xxvi. here. I cannot accept the statement of GRAF that as a record of personal experiences it ought to have stood before ch. xxxvi.: for here the narrative would stand quite isolated topically, and chh. xxxiv.-xliv., are not the only place for the prophet's personal experiences, for they are inserted elsewhere, according to the connection of facts. Comp. chh. xx. and xxx. And this is the case with chh. xxvi.-xxix. We might rather expect that, on account of the relation of the facts, it would come after ch. xxiii. But on the one hand it would disturb the plan of that group (against kings and prophets) by partial details, and on the other the principal matter of chh. xxvii. and xxviii. has too close an historical connection with ch. xxv. to be separated from it, or even only to be placed before it. The reason why this chapter does not stand after chh. vii. sqq., where it properly belongs in historical connection, is that the series of great discourses was not to be interrupted by a long historical section. As far as ch. xviii. are discourses only. From this point onwards the historical element is successively brought forward. Although thus separated in position, this ch. xxvi. refers back to the great discourse in chh. vii.-x., and describes the almost fatal consequences, which it had with respect to the person of the prophet (vers. 1-19). At the same time, however, the opportunity is afforded for the narrative concerning another prophet, Urijah, the son of Shemaiah, who had no such courageous patron as Ahikam, and really fell a sacrifice to his fidelity to his calling at the command of the ungodly king Jehoiakim.

Vers. 1-6. In the beginning . . . all the nations of the earth. In the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, at any rate before the battle of Carchemish, since there is no mention made of the Chaldeans, Jeremiah receives the command to stand in the fore-court of the temple (comp. xix. 4, and EXEG. on vii. 2), and proclaim a revelation he has received to all the Jews who have come up to the feast. What feast this was we know not (comp. Comm. on vii. 2). The introductory formula in vii. 1 is: Go into the gate and proclaim as follows. Here it is said: Stand in the fore-court and proclaim all that I have commanded thee, without omitting anything. There the command to go into the gate precedes the revelation. Here the order is reversed. For here the words which I command thee, and omit not a word, point back to the revelation as one previously received. The latter especially would have no sense, if what is to be delivered by the prophet had not been already communicated. Still, however, in ver. 4 sqq., the chief contents of the discourse follow in a brief and pregnant recapitulation. There is no contradiction in this. It may have been that the prophet received the revelation of the great discourse in chh. vii.-x., at the same time with the command to deliver it in the temple, and that afterwards, when the moment of performance came, the command was repeated with a reference on the one hand to the revelation received (xxvi. 2), and on the other with a brief recapitulation of its main import (xxvi. 4-6).—Omit not a word reminds us of Deut. iv. 2; xiii. 1 coll. Rev. xxii. 19.—If so be they will hearken, ver. 3. It is apparent that the assembly to the feast must have appeared a specially favorable opportunity for a decisive attempt.—Repent me of the evil.

Comp. xviii. 8; ^ל as in vers. 13 and 19; xlii. 10; Jud. xxi. 6; 2 Sam. xxiv. 16.—rising early. Comp. vii. 13, 25; xxv. 3, 4.—But ye have not hearkened, retained as a reminiscence of the passage vii. 13, is to be regarded as a parenthesis; since the apodosis begins with ver. 6.—Like Shiloh. In these words the prophet reproduces most distinctly the main threatening of the great discourse in chap. vii. (comp. vers. 12 and 14, and the rems. thereon).—A curse. Comp. xxiv. 9; xxv. 18.

Vers. 7-11. So the priests . . . have heard with your ears. The priests and prophets here appear as the real opponents of Jeremiah. Very probably most of the false prophets were themselves priests. Comp. Comm. on xx. 6.—The people allow themselves to be carried away, though on the speech of the princes they are disposed to espouse the cause of Jeremiah against the priests and prophets (ver. 16), and in other circumstances would be ready to execute the sentence of death on him (ver. 24). The princes are not yet filled with that blood-thirsty hatred towards Jeremiah, which they afterwards manifest (ch. xxxvii. sqq.).—In the words like Shiloh they allude to vii. 12, 14, as in the following without an inheritance to ix. 10.—On gate of the Lord's house, comp. rems. on xx. 2.—Worthy to die. This expression (למשפט מות) occurs also in Deut. xix. 6; xxi. 22. As the first word in itself signifies judgment or condemnation, the phrase may from the connection denote judgment or condemnation to death. The expression in ver. 11 and Deut. xix. 6, may be taken in the first, in ver. 16 and Deut. xxi. 22 in the second sense.

Vers. 12-19. Then spake Jeremiah . . . our souls. In the words amend your ways the prophet repeats the chief requisition of his discourse in vii. 3, 5. It is thus to be seen that he is neither terrified nor evilly disposed towards his people. On this condition, but on this condition only, does he promise salvation. If they do not like this they may do with him as they will. They are, however, at the same time to know that in killing him they would bring upon themselves the guilt of shedding innocent blood. This answer of Jeremiah's, short and simple but firm and decided, appears to have made a deep impression on the judges and the people. For Jeremiah is acquitted. Some of the elders of the people (זקני הארץ), elders of the land, ver. 17, are distinguished from the שרים, princes, ver. 10, who are in the king's house, at court and members of the government, while the former represent the local magistrats throughout the country, comp. xxxvii. 15; xxxviii. 5, 25 sqq.) support this sentence by reference to a former occurrence. The prophet Micah, [of Mo-resheth, near Eleutheropolis, in Philistia. Евсѣв., Жеромѣ], had not been punished by Hezekiah on account of a similar utterance.—On the point, that the passage iii. 12 forms the climax of the minatory prophecies of Micah, and that Jeremiah quotes the book of Micah especially in the discourse in chh. vii.-ix. comp. CASPARI, passim. From the last mentioned circumstance it follows that Jeremiah himself reminds his hearers of Micah, and institutes a comparison between himself and this prophet. CASPARI however errs in attributing the discourse in chh. vii.-ix. to the reign of Josiah. [On the fulfilment of the prophecy of Micah and Jeremiah, comp. THOMSON, The Land and the Book, II., 475.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 20-24. And there was also a man . . . to put him to death. That this narrative about Urijah does not continue the words of Jeremiah's friends, is clear from the circumstance that in this case a precedent would be referred to unfavorable to Jeremiah. It is evident that they are not the words of his opponents from the absence of any introductory formula. Others affirm that this story must have related to a later period than the commencement of Jehoiakim's reign. This however depends on how far we extend the commencement. Apart then from the question, whether this occurred earlier or later, which it will be difficult to decide, I think, with GROTIUS, SCHEURER, ROSENUELLER and others, that Jeremiah himself adds this story in order to show in how great danger he then was of his life. At all events the events narrated had happened when Jeremiah wrote his book, which he did the first time in the 4th and 5th years of Jehoiakim (xxxvi. 1 sqq. : 9 sqq.), and the second time immediately after the destruction of the first book in the 9th month of the 5th year of Jehoiakim (xxxvi. 28 sqq.) The events might have occurred up to this time; and even if they belong to a later period, the possibility is not excluded that they were inserted here by Jeremiah himself. Yet it is easier to explain the phrases this city and this land, in ver. 20, if we suppose that the prophet had these expressions, which strictly taken presuppose an oral address, still in remembrance from the preceding conversation. Nothing further is known either of Urijah, or his father Shemaiah.—Elnathan the son of Achhor is also mentioned in xxxvi. 12, 25 among the princes favorable to Jeremiah. Jehoiakim appears to have been his son-in-law, for Nehushtha, the mother of Jehoiachin was, according to 2 Ki. xxiv. 8, a daughter of Elnathan. Achhor is mentioned in 2 Ki. xxii. 12 as one of the princes, who were in personal attendance on Josiah.—The graves of the common people (ver. 23) appear elsewhere as an unhallowed place (2 Ki. xxiii. 6). On the expression "sons of the people" comp. Comm. on xvii. 19.—Ver. 24. But the hand of Ahikam. The participle only, but, presupposes a thought, which easily flows from the previous context, so would it have been with Jeremiah. From the mention of Ahikam alone it is plain that it was he who caused the decision to be favorable to Jeremiah, (ver. 16 sqq.) He is also mentioned in 2 Ki. xxii. 12-14, together with Achhor, and according to xxxix. 14; xl. 5, and other passages, he was the father of the governor Gedaliah.

2. The conflict of Jeremiah with the false prophets in the fourth year of Zedekiah.

CHAPTERS XXVII. AND XXVIII

XXVII. 1-22.

1 In the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim [Zedekiah], the son of Josiah, king
 2 of Judah, came this word unto Jeremiah from the Lord saying, Thus saith the 3 Lord to me, Make thee bonds and yokes and put them upon thy neck, and send them to the king of Edom and to the king of Moab, and to the king of the Ammo-4 nites, and to the king of Tyrus, and to the king of Sidon, by the hand of the messengers which came to Jerusalem unto Zedekiah, king of Judah. And command them to say unto their masters, Thus saith the Lord of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth] 5 the God of Israel, Thus shall ye say unto your masters; I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground, by my great power and by my 6 out-stretched arm, and have given it to whom it seemed meet unto me. And now have I given all these lands into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, 7 my servant; and the beasts of the field have I given him also to serve him. And all nations shall serve him, and his son, and his son's son, until the very time of his land come: and then many nations and great kings shall serve themselves of 8 him. And it shall come to pass, that the nation and kingdom which will not serve the same Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babylon, and that will not put their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon, that nation will I punish, saith the Lord [Jehovah] with the sword, and with the famine, and with the pestilence, until I

9 have consumed² them by his hand. Therefore hearken not ye to your priests, nor to your diviners, nor to your dreamers, nor to your enchanters, nor to your sorcerers, which speak unto you, saying, Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon. For they prophesy a lie unto you, to remove you far from your land; and that I should drive you out, and ye should perish. But the nations that bring their neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon, those will I let remain still in their own land, saith the Lord; and they shall till it and dwell therein. I spake also to Zedekiah, king of Judah, according to all those words, saying, Bring your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon, and serve him and his people, and live.³ Why will ye die, thou and thy people, by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence, as the Lord hath spoken against the nation that will not serve the king of Babylon? Therefore hearken not unto the words of the prophets that speak unto you, saying, Ye shall not serve the king of Babylon; for they prophesy a lie unto you. For I have not sent them, saith the Lord, [Jehovah] yet they prophesy a lie in my name; that I might drive you out, and that ye might perish, ye and the priests that prophesy unto you. Also I spake to the priests and to all this people, saying, Thus saith the Lord [Jehovah]; Harken not to the words of your prophets that prophesy unto you, saying, Behold the vessels of the Lord's house shall now shortly be brought again from Babylon; for they prophesy a lie unto you. Harken not unto them; serve the king of Babylon, and live: wherefore should this city be laid waste? But if they be prophets, and if the word of the Lord be with them, let them now make intercession to the Lord of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth] that the vessels which are left in the house of the Lord, and in the house of the king of Judah, and at Jerusalem, go⁴ not to Babylon.

19 For thus saith the Lord of hosts concerning the pillars, and concerning the sea, and concerning the bases, and concerning the residue of the vessels that remain in the city, which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took not, when he carried away captive⁵ Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah from Jerusalem to Babylon, and all the nobles of Judah and Jerusalem; Yea, thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, concerning the vessels that remain in the house of the Lord [Jehovah] and in the house of the king of Judah and of Jerusalem; they shall be carried to Babylon, and there shall they be until the day that I visit them, saith the Lord; then will I bring them up, and restore them to this place.

XXVIII. 1-17.

1 And it came to pass the same year, in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the fourth year,⁶ and in the fifth month, that Hananiah the son of Azur the prophet, which was of Gibeon, spake unto me in the presence of the priests, and of all the people, saying, Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, saying, I have broken the yoke of the king of Babylon. Within two full years⁷ will I bring again into this place all the vessels of the Lord's house, that Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took away from this place, and carried them to Babylon: And I will bring again to this place Jeconiah the son of Jehoiakim king of Judah, with all the captives of Judah, that went into Babylon, saith the Lord, for I will break the yoke of the king of Babylon.

5 Then the prophet Jeremiah said unto the prophet Hananiah in the presence of the priests, and in the presence of all the people that stood in the house of the Lord [Jehovah]. Even the prophet Jeremiah said, Amen:⁸ the Lord do so: the Lord perform thy words which thou hast prophesied, to bring again the vessels of the Lord's house, and all that is carried away captive, from Babylon into this place. Nevertheless hear thou now the word that I speak in thine ears, and in the ears of all the people; the prophets that have been before me and before thee of old prophesied both against many countries, and against great kingdoms, of war, and of evil, and of pestilence.⁹ The prophet which prophesieth of peace, when the word of the prophet shall come to pass, then shall the prophet be known, that the Lord hath truly sent him.

10 Then Hananiah the prophet took the yoke from off the prophet Jeremiah's neck, 11 and brake it.¹⁰ And Hananiah spake in the presence of all the people, saying, Thus saith the Lord; even so will I break the yoke of Neuchadnezzar king of Babylon from the neck of all nations within the space of two full years. And the prophet Jeremiah went his way. Then the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, after that Hananiah the prophet had broken the yoke from off the neck of the prophet Jeremiah, saying, Go and tell Hananiah, saying, Thus saith the Lord; Thou hast broken the yokes of wood, but thou shalt make for them yokes of iron. For thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel; I have put a yoke of iron up in the neck of all these nations, that they may serve Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon; and they shall serve him: and I have given him the beasts of the field also. Then said the prophet Jeremiah unto Hananiah the prophet, Hear now Hananiah; The Lord hath not sent thee; but thou makest this people to trust in a lie. Therefore thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will cast¹¹ thee from off the face of the earth; this year thou shalt die, because thou hast taught rebellion against the Lord. So Hananiah the prophet died the same year in the seventh month.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ XXVII. 8.—The construction here is not an anacoluthon, but הַנְּוִי is accusative, and אֶת אֲשֶׁר is not co-ordinate to the first אֲשֶׁר but to הַנְּוִי; as to the nation which will not serve, and as to that which will not bow the neck, &c. Hence the singular יָתֵן stands properly also in the second relative clause. The sign of the accusative stands before the second אֲשֶׁר to distinguish it as an accusative from the first, which is nominative, (comp. EWALD, § 277 d, 2, and Gen. xlvii. 21; 2 Ki. viii. 31), and thus at the same time to indicate that אֲשֶׁר does not stand parallel to הַנְּוִי.

The reading of the Chetibh is found unimpeached by the Masoretes in xlvi. 2; li. 59. Probably the Masoretes wished, here as in xxxii. 1, the same punctuation for the word occurring twice in the verse, while in xlvi. 2 and li. 59, no occasion was given for such an effort at conformity. EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The two chh. xxvii. and xxviii. are so evidently parts of a whole that we do not seem to be justified in separating them. The occurrence here narrated is based entirely on ch. xxv. The sending of the yoke to the neighboring nations can indeed be regarded as the fulfilment of the commission received by the prophet in xxv. 15 only in so far as it may be understood in a double sense; in the sense of proclamation and the sense of the execution of the divine sentence.—The command to acknowledge Nebuchadnezzar as a world-ruler appointed by God is supplemented by the warning not to allow the deceptive promises of the false prophets to deter them from yielding in subjection to him (xxvii. 9-22). Notwithstanding this, one of the false prophets, Hananiah, the son of Azur, dares to give the prophet of Jehovah the lie and by breaking the wooden yoke, which the latter bore on his neck, to symbolize his liberation from the dominion of Nebuchadnezzar. Thereupon Jeremiah receives the command to replace the wooden yoke by an iron one, and to predict Hananiah's speedy death in the course of the year. Hananiah really died two months afterwards. The date of the whole occurrence is the fourth year of Zedekiah (xxviii. 1), since the statement in xxvii. 1 (beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim) is at any rate, and the other in xxviii. 1 (beginning of the reign of Zedekiah) is very probably incorrect. Further particulars on this point below.

XXVII. 1-11. In the beginning . . . dwell therein. There are weighty critical suspicions with respect to the first verse. In the first place the name Jehoiakim has long been a stumbling-block. How could the prophet receive a commission in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim to the ambassadors who had come to Zedekiah to the ambassadors who had come to Zedekiah הַבְּאִים, (ver. 3)? And how could the prophet execute the same commission to Zedekiah (ver. 12), and say in xxviii. 1 that in the same year, in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, Hananiah contradicted his prediction? HAEVERNICK indeed [H., 2, S. 217] says "the words הַבְּאִים וגו' (ver. 3) pertain to the compilation of the chapter,—to show how Zedekiah should fulfil that older prophecy of the time of Jehoiakim, and should behave towards the nations which were his allies." But this would presuppose that Jeremiah received a message to ambassadors who did not come to Jerusalem till from eleven to fifteen years afterwards. Further, according to this the name of Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans would have been mentioned in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim, while we have demonstrated that before the battle of Carchemish, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah did not yet know that the enemies coming from the north would be the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar. Add to this that the compiler must have proceeded very inconsiderately, to substitute the time of receiving the commission for that of its execution. We ought to have read in that case: In the time of Jehoiakim Jeremiah received the commission to declare the following to foreign ambassadors who should come. These ambassadors came in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah and unto them spake Jeremiah, etc. Instead of this we have: In the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign Jeremiah received the command to deliver this message to the ambassadors, who are come to Zedekiah, etc. To attribute to the supposed compiler such a violent treatment of the text is truly much worse than to assume an oversight of the copyist. It is, moreover, a wonder to me that, as far as my knowledge extends, no commentator has hit on the idea of taking הַבָּיָא in the sense of the Fut., or Fut. exaeti.: who come or will have come. There is unquestionably grammatical authority for this. For the participle, which in itself has no tense, may be taken according to the connection as present, past or future. Comp. NÆGELS., Gr., § 97; EWALD, § 333, b. Compare especially the same word in Isa. xxvii. 6=temporibus futuris, Eccles. ii. 16, הַיָּמִים הַבָּיָא diebus venturis, etc.—Whatever we have already urged is certainly opposed to this rendering of the word, viz. 1, the improbability of the communication of a message not to be delivered for fifteen years; 2, above all the entirely unhistorical mention of Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans in the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim. The objections to the reading Jehoiakim are of ancient date. JEROME helps himself out of the difficulty by connecting the verse with the previous chapter. It does not disturb him that thus ch. xxvi. begins and ends with a similar date; yet he supposes that it was this circumstance, which led the Seventy to omit the verse. The Syriac and the unprinted Arabs Oxoniensis read "Zedekiah." Likewise the Cod. Regiomont. II. KENNICOTT in his Diss. super ratione text. Hebr. V. T., I., p. 503; II., p. 346, Ed. TELLER, decidedly favors the view that a copyist who had forgotten that Zedekiah was also a son of Josiah was moved by xxvi. 1 to alter the name of Zedekiah into Jehoiakim. I also hold the view that xxvi. 1 affected the rendering of xxvii. 1, for as we shall see below at xlix. 34, chapter xxvii. has lost its original superscription by the oversight of a diakonast who added this verse of the prophecy against Elam as a postscript. Hence xxvii. 1 is still wanting in the LXX.; on the other hand the prophecy against Elam has in the LXX. a superscription and a postscript, in the Hebrew text a superscription which does not correspond to the general purport, and ch. xxvii. has obtained in the Hebrew a new beginning which was formed after xxvi. 1, while the original text of xxvii. 1, is to be sought nowhere else but in xlix. 34 (with the omission of אֶל-עֵלָם). So MOYERS and HIRTIG, with whom on this point I feel obliged to agree. From xxviii. 1 it is evident that by the beginning of Zedekiah's reign we are to understand his fourth year. This appears to be entirely suitable in point of fact. For it is not to be imagined that Zedekiah undertook revolutionary projects immediately after his ascension of the throne. As to the mode of expression, "beginning" is a relative idea, and the first half of a period may be designated as the beginning, the latter half as its close. From the words Thus saith Jehovah unto thee, it is moreover apparent that from ver. 2 onward the prophet communicates the words as he spoke them to the people. Comp. "saith Jehovah," ver. 11 and ver. 16. The introductory formula in ver. 1 b, is then not to be referred specially to the moment of revelation, but it has this sense, that all the actions and speeches related in what follows are the result of a revelation to the prophet.

Ver. 2. Bonds i. e. cords (ii. 20: v. 5: xxx. 8), not to hold together the wooden parts of the yokes, for such yokes there are none, but to fix the yoke to the body, are what Jeremiah is to prepare. So with לִטוֹת. The word (טוֹת, tottering above, crooked, broken from the branch, the bough, piece of wood) is in both these chapters used in a material sense, while יָ always denotes the yoke in a figurative sense (xxvii. 8, 11, 12; xxviii. 2, 4, 11, 14 coll. xxviii. 10 sqq.). Jeremiah is to put these yokes on his neck and send them by the messengers to their master. As certainly as the prophet should put a yoke upon his neck, and has really put it on (xxviii. 10 sqq. coll. Isa. xx. 2; Hos. i. 2 sqq.; Ezek. xii. 3 sqq.), so certainly should he really give the yoke to the messengers. This corresponded to oriental customs. If the messengers would not take the yoke with them, that was their affair. The four neighboring nations here mentioned (Edom, Moab, Ammon, Sidon) are named in the same order in xxv. 1, 2. NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 211) connects this consultation with the diversion, which resulted from Nebuchadnezzar's pretended expedition against Media after the death of Cyaxares in B. C. 594 (Vid. sup., xxv. 26). But this connection is altogether uncertain, and we must be content to be ignorant why that epoch was considered adapted for a revolt. At all events the words of the prophet made an impression on the king. For in the same year (593) we find him on a journey to Babylon (li. 59), which can have had no other object than renewed homage. When DRUCKER (S. 834, etc.) says the Phœnicians were then left to their fate and subjugated by Nebuchadnezzar, the first part of the statement is correct. But I doubt whether they then immediately revolted on their own account, and were again subjugated. For when Sidon (Ezek. xxxii. 29) is mentioned among the nations which had fallen before the sword of Nebuchadnezzar, before the twentieth year of this king (Ezek. xxxii. 17), therefore before B. C. 585, it does not seem at all necessary to assume that the Phœnicians revolted sooner than Zedekiah himself, who was moved to open revolt by Hophra.

the new king of Egypt, in B. C. 589. When also after the destruction of Jerusalem (586) only Tyrus among the Phœnician cities was still to be subdued, the conquest of the rest may have well taken place immediately before the attack on Judah and Jerusalem (588). The Edomites, Moabites and Ammonites, who are mentioned in 2 Kings xxiv. 2 as Chaldean allies against Judah, appear according to our passage in their love of freedom to have momentarily forgotten their ancient enmity towards Judah, as well as their fear of the Chaldeans. But they can scarcely have revolted. According to Ps. cxxxvii. 7 coll. Lam. iv. 21, 22; Ezek. xxxvi. 5 the Edomites were zealous co-operators at the destruction of Jerusalem.

Ver. 5. I have made, etc. The Creator has the right to dispose of His creatures. — As seemed meet unto me. Comp. xviii. 4.—Ver. 6. And the beasts of the field. Nebuchadnezzar is declared universal governor de jure divino.—Ver. 7. This verse is wanting in the LXX. MOVERS and HITZIG regard it as interpolated. Comp. on the other hand GRAF, S. 348, Ann. An interpolator would certainly not have interpolated so incorrectly. For Nebuchadnezzar was succeeded only by his son Evilmerodach, who was murdered by Neriglissar, his father-in-law. He was succeeded by his son Labosoarchad, a child who was killed after a reign of nine months, to make place for Nabonnet, one of the conspirators. The latter was Babylon's last king. On the contrary the LXX. omitted the verse because it seemed so inaccurate. The prophet does not, however, intend to be exact. The phrase "his son and his son's son" is to denote an indefinite but brief period (Exod. xx. 5; xxxiv. 7; Dent. v. 9). The chronicler seems to refer to this passage in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 20.—Shall serve themselves of him. Comp. xxv. 14. The expressions many nations, etc., remind us of l. 9, 41. When we remember that this passage originated at the same time with chb. 1. and li., this relationship may well have its foundation in the mind of the prophet.—Ver. 8. The nation which . . . that will not, etc. At first it seems natural to take the second sentence as the correction of the first: he who will not serve, or rather, he who will not voluntarily submit himself. For all, indeed, will serve. He who has to be compelled may expect the extremity of distress, while he who voluntarily submits will retain at least his land and his life. But unfortunately it is not grammatically allowable to take 1 in the meaning of "or rather." We must therefore make this distinction between "serve" and "put their neck under the yoke," that the former refers to the nations already subject to the Babylonian dominion, the latter to the others. In warning the heathen nations of their diviners, sorcerers, etc., the prophet puts the false prophets of the Jews afterwards mentioned in the same category with them.—Ver. 10. To remove. The consequence is represented as the object. Comp. ver. 15.—And that I should drive. Observe the return of the discourse from the secondary to the main form. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 99, 3, —vers. 15 and 22.

Vers. 12-15. I spake also to Zedekiah . . . prophesy unto you. As in ver. 2, the prophet here and in ver. 16 sqq. gives an account, not of the reception, but the execution of the divine commission. Comp. EXEG. rems. on xxvi. 2.—By the sword, etc. Comp. ver. 8.

Vers. 16-22. Also I spake to the priests . . . restore them to this place. Jeremiah speaks to the king of political subjection, to the priests and the people of the vessels which were the ornaments of the temple and its worship. These vessels carried away by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kings xxiv. 13) are according to the words of the false prophets to be brought back in a very brief period. In opposition to this Jeremiah makes the requisition on the false prophets to prove their authority by preventing through their intercession (יְצַדֵּק. Comp. vii. 16) the deportation of the vessels still in their possession.—The pillars (1 Kings vii. 15-22), sea (lb. 23-26), and bases (ver. 27 sqq.), were the largest and heaviest vessels, which were not therefore carried away the first time. Comp. EXEG. rems. on lii. 17.—All the nobles. Comp. Is. xxxiv. 12; Jer. xxxix. 6 and xxix. 2; 2 Kings xxiv. 11 sqq.—The refutation of MOVERS and HITZIG's assertion that vers. 16-21 are interpolated, may be seen in GRAF, S. 351. He has also on pp. 344, 345 shown that the abbreviated name-ending, which prevails in chb. xxvii.-xxix. (ר' instead of רִי) is not to be regarded as the sign of a later date of composition.

XXVIII. 1-4. And it came to pass . . . the yoke of the king of Babylon. In the same year, doubtless shortly after the occurrences narrated in ch. xxvii. came Hananiah from Gibeon (a city of priests, Josh. xxi. 17) and, therefore, probably himself a priest, in opposition to Jeremiah prophesying that in two years the Lord will break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar, and bring back the sacred vessels and king Jehoiachin, together with the other captives from Babylon. On the date "in the beginning" comp. Comm. on xxvii. 1. The month is mentioned on account of the statement in ver. 17.—The deceptive promise of Hananiah is directly opposed to what Jeremiah has said in xxii. 25, 27; xxvii. 16.

Vers. 6-9. Then the prophet Jeremiah said . . . truly sent him. Jeremiah replies: would that thou wert right! But only prophecies of calamity have the presumption of truth in their favor, for they are connected with danger to their author. Prophecies of good fortune may be flattery. We must, therefore, wait for their result.—On ver. 9 comp. Dent. xviii. 21, 22.

Vers. 10 and 11. Then Hananiah . . . went his way. Hananiah has the audacity to answer Jeremiah's speech by taking the yoke from his neck and breaking it, at the same time repeating his previous prediction (vers. 3 and 4). Jeremiah goes away for the time without uttering a word in reply. On יָצַדֵּק וְלֵאמֹר comp. EXEG. rems. on xxvii. 2.

Vers. 12-17. Then the word . . . seventh month. After some time Jeremiah received from the Lord a double message to Hananiah: 1. By the breaking of the wooden yoke all that he has effected is that an iron one takes its place, for iron will be the yoke, which Nebuchadnezzar will put upon the nations, according to the will of God; 2. Hananiah, who misuses the name of God and has misled the people into vain confidence, is to die this year. This also came to pass, for he died two months afterwards.—Yokes of wood. The plural is generic, as was remarked on xxvii. 2. Comp. NÆGELS. Gr., § 61, 2 d.—Yoke of iron. The prophet appears to have had Deut. xxviii. 48 in mind. On ver. 14 comp. xxvii. 6.—Rebellion (כרה), comp. xxix. 32. It is=revolt, rebellion, on account of the following אלה.—In the seventh month corresponds to fifth month, ver. 1.

CHAPTER XXIX.

1. The Letter to the Exiles.

XXIX. 1-23.

- 1 Now these are the words of the letter that Jeremiah the prophet sent from Jerusalem unto the residue of the elders which were carried away captives, and to the priests, and to the prophets, and to all the people whom Nebuchadnezzar carried away captive from Jerusalem to Babylon (after that Jeconiah the king, and the queen, and the eunuchs, the princes of Judah and Jerusalem, and the carpenters and the smiths, were departed from Jerusalem); By the hand of Elasah the son of Shaphan, and Gemariah the son of Hilkiah (whom Zedekiah the king of Judah sent unto Babylon to Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon), saying,
- 4 Thus saith the Lord of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth], the God of Israel, unto all that are carried away captives, whom I have caused to be carried away from Jerusalem unto Babylon: Build ye houses and dwell in them, and plant gardens and eat the fruit of them; Take ye wives, and beget sons and daughters; and take wives for your sons, and give your daughters to husbands, that they may bear sons and daughters; that ye may be increased there and not diminished. And seek the peace of the city whither I have caused you to be carried away captive, and pray unto the Lord [Jehovah] for it: for in the peace thereof shall ye have peace.
- 8 For thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: Let not your prophets and your diviners, that be in the midst of you, deceive you, neither hearken to your dreams which ye cause to be dreamed.¹ For they prophesy falsely unto you in my name: I have not sent them, saith the Lord. For thus saith the Lord, That after seventy years be accomplished at Babylon I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you, in causing you to return to this place. For I know the thoughts that I think toward you, saith the Lord, thoughts of peace and not of evil, to give you an expected end. Then shall ye call upon me, and ye shall go and pray unto me, and I will hearken unto you. And ye shall seek me, and find me, when ye shall search for me with all your heart. And I will be found of you, saith the Lord: and I will turn away your captivity,² and I will gather you from all the nations, and from all the places whither I have driven you, saith the Lord; and I will bring you again into the place whence I caused you to be carried away captive.
- 15, 16 Because³ ye have said, The Lord hath raised us up prophets in Babylon; Know that thus saith the Lord of⁴ the king that sitteth upon the throne⁵ of David, and of all the people that dwelleth in the city, and of your brethren that are not gone forth with you into captivity; Thus saith the Lord of hosts: Behold, I will send upon them the sword, the famine, and the pestilence, and will make them like vile⁶ figs, that cannot be eaten, they are so evil. And I will persecute them with the sword, with the famine, and with the pestilence, and will deliver them to be removed to all the kingdoms of the earth, to be a curse, and an astonishment, and an hissing, and a reproach, among all the nations whither I have driven them: Because they have not hearkened to my words, saith the Lord, which I sent⁷ unto them by my servants the prophets, rising up early and sending them; but ye would not hear, saith the Lord [Jehovah].

20 Hear ye therefore the word of the Lord, all ye of the captivity, whom I have 21 sent from Jerusalem to Babylon: Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, of Ahab the son of Kolaiah, and of Zedekiah the son of Maaseiah, which prophesy a lie unto you in my name: Behold, I will deliver them into the hand of Nebuchad-22 nezzar, king of Babylon; and he shall slay them before your eyes; And of them shall be taken up a curse by all the captivity of Judah which are in Babylon, saying, The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab,⁸ whom the king of Babylon roasted 23 in the fire; Because they have committed villany in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives, and have spoken lying words in my name, which I have not commanded them: even I know⁹ and am a witness, saith the Lord.

¹ Ver. 8.—כחלמים. Hiph. from חלם occurs only in 1sa. xxxviii. 16 and here; Part. Hiph. here only. The causative conjugation would not inappropriately intimate the self-made character of those dreams (Hitzig). The form is not without analogies. ² Ver. 14.—שבני in this connection is used transitively. That שבני cannot be taken as accusative of the object (I turn myself to the captivity) is evident from the circumstance, that, where the connection requires the imperfect we have אָשִׁיב; xxxii. 44; xxxviii. 11, 26 (Keri); xlix. 6, 39 (Keri); in Ezek. xxxix. 25; xxxviii. 7 we have even the perfect Hiphil.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Jeremiah did not limit himself to contending against the perverse nationalism of the Jews in their own home, for those who had already been carried away captive were in constant communication with home, and the accounts of the views and expectations prevailing among the former at all events influenced the conclusions of the latter. If they adapted themselves to their state of exile and described it as tolerable, when they saw its inevitable necessity, and admonished their countrymen to bow to this necessity, this was at any rate a powerful auxiliary to Jeremiah's preaching. Hence Jeremiah seeks to move the captives to humble submission to their lot, presenting before them on the one hand the true consolation of a deliverance to be hoped for after seventy years, and on the other hand most emphatically warning them against the false consolation of a deliverance in a shorter period, which the false prophets set before them. Jeremiah thus avails himself of the opportunity afforded by an embassy, despatched by Zedekiah to Babylon (xxix. 3), to send a letter to those who had been already deported. We know nothing further either of the object of the embassy or of the persons of the ambassadors. As to the time of the composition and despatch of the letter Hitzig has correctly remarked that all the data we have point to the period between the first and the fourth years of Zedekiah. The deportation under Jeconiah had taken place (xxix. 1, 2). The deportation appears to be that event on which the sending of the letter leans; there seems to be nothing more important as the occasion of it. Add to this that the counsel which Jeremiah gives suits the commencement of the exile. How are the exiles to arrange matters? Are they to compose themselves for a brief or lengthened sojourn? Jeremiah tells them they are to do the latter. It is incredible that he delayed this advice for years, the more so since of the seventy years of exile, for those who were carried away with Jeconiah, eight were already past. Besides this, it is not probable that Zedekiah in his fourth year, when he himself went to Babylon (li. 59), would send an embassy thither. I therefore agree with Hitzig, who ascribes the epistle to the first or second year after the deportation. The vision, of which ch. xxiv. relates, must have preceded this letter, not only because from its purport it must have followed immediately after the deportation of Jeconiah, while our letter presupposes the arrival of the captives in Babylon, but also because in several places in the letter reference is made to it (comp. ver. 10 with xxiv. 6; ver. 17 with xxiv. 2, 8; ver. 18 with xxiv. 9).—It is true many commentators regard vers. 16-20 as inauthentic, but incorrectly as we shall see.—The question, whether we have a true copy of the letter or only a later reproduction, or account of it, is variously answered. The last view has in its favor: 1. that the writing has not the form of a letter; 2. the apparently unconnected position of vers. 15-20. But what is the Hebrew form of a letter? From the few examples which the Old Testament affords (comp. 2 Sam. xi. 14; 1 Ki. xxi. 8; 2 Ki. x. 1-6; 2 Chron. xxx. 6; Ezr. iv. 8; Neh. vi. 5), we cannot derive any set form, and as to the absence of connection we shall hereafter show (on ver. 15 sqq.) that such an absence does not exist. I find therefore no reason for doubting the agreement of our letter with the original. It contains four parts: 1. vers. 4-7, the positive command to arrange for a longer sojourn in Babylon; 2. Warning against being deceived by the false prophets, since Jehovah promises deliverance and return only after seventy years; 3. vers. 15-20, Warning against trusting in the false prophets, especially in reference to that part of the people which had remained in Jerusalem, since it is devoted to destruction; 4. vers. 21-23, prediction of the severe punishment of two false prophets.

Vers. 1-7. Now these are the words . . . shall ye have peace. After the words of historical introduction, which give information concerning the receivers and bearers of the letter, follows the first part of the letter (vers. 4-7). As the command of God (ver. 4), Jeremiah proclaims to the exiles that they should build houses and lay out gardens (ver. 5), marry and give their children in marriage (ver. 6), and seek the welfare of the place assigned them as a residence as a condition of their own (ver. 7). HRZIG regards vers. 1-3 as showing traces of a later hand in the abbreviated forms of the names, the mention of Nebuchadnezzar, which name is omitted by the LXX., and in the remark that Jeremiah was a prophet. But comp. on the other hand GRAF, S. 342 sqq.—The residue of the elders. The explanation of HRZIG and GRAF that these were the elders who were not at the same time priests or prophets, cannot possibly be correct. For then this phrase must have come after, since those priests and prophets who were not elders, can be no others than those straightway mentioned. The supposition that the deceased elders must have been already replaced by others, so that the council of elders could not appear to the prophet as merely a residue, is unfounded. How could Jeremiah assume an organized community, when in his letter he exhorts them to enter into such relations. He will of course address those elders only who are alive.—Does the date in ver. 2 refer to “sent” or “carried away?” Manifestly to the latter, for if referred to “sent” it would declare that Jeremiah wrote immediately after the surrender, which is not to be imagined. The sentence “after that,” etc., is therefore to be referred to “carried away” and the sense is: “which Nebuchadnezzar carried away after that, in accordance with the required condition, Jehoiachin, with those afterwards named, surrendered himself. For נָשַׁר is used of the surrendering of besieged persons (2 Ki. xxiv. 12 sqq.; 1 Sam. xi. 3, 10; 1 Ki. xx. 31; Isa. xxxvi. 16; Jer. xxi. 9; xxxviii. 2, 21).—The queen. Comp. xiii. 18; 2 Ki. xxiv. 8, 12, 15.—The eunuchs, the princes. The two terms appear to be in opposition, but the princes of Judah were certainly not eunuchs. Either then is כְּרִיִּים to be taken in the sense of chamberlain, courtier (of which use there is certain proof. Comp. 2 Ki. xxiv. 14, 15. GESEN. Thes., p. 373), or else יָד, and, is wanting before כְּרִיִּים, princes.—On carpenters, etc., comp. rems. on xxiv. 1.—The Lord designates the captives as carried away by him: vers. 4, 7, 14, 20.—Increased there. This ancient theocratic blessing (Gen. xiii. 16; xv. 5; xvii. 2; Jer. iii. 16, 19) is thus to be preserved to the people even in captivity.

Vers. 8-14. For thus . . . carried away captive. The direction in vers. 5-7 is given by the prophet for two reasons, a negative and a positive. The negative reason is, the expectation of a speedy liberation, which false prophets seek to produce in the people and which is an illusion of their own dreams, a nonentity, by which they are not to allow themselves to be deceived (vers. 8 and 9). The positive reason is that not till after seventy years will the Lord verify His promise of grace. Then will the people call upon their God and seek Him, and He will hear and be found of them and turn away their captivity and bring them home from all the places where they have been dispersed (vers. 10-14).—Ver. 10. Seventy years. Comp. xxv. 11. The prophet does not calculate from the present, but he has in mind the absolute period of duration appointed to the Babylonian empire. Observe also, that he does not say: when the years of your exile are ended. The seventy years represent primarily the years of the Babylonian empire and only secondarily those of the captivity. The more justified are we in dating the seventy years from the siege of Carchemish. It should further be observed that the prophet opposes the arbitrary unfounded thesis of the false prophets, not in a harsh and severe but mild and consolatory antithesis, in which even the severest point, the seventy years' duration of the exile, is expressed in the most forbearing manner. The Lord evidently wishes to soften and win their hearts, which had been rendered obstinate by false consolation, by presenting the true. Hence also the gracious thoughts of ver. 11. I still know my thoughts, says the Lord, i. e. I have not forgotten them or let them pass from my view. אֲחֻרַיִת corresponds to our English “future” (to “have a future,” etc.). Comp. Prov. xxxiii. 18; xxiv. 14, 20; Ps. xxxvii. 37; Jer. xxxi. 17. The Lord, however, sets before the people not merely a future of outward prosperity, but above all a future of internal welfare, without which the former would be altogether inconceivable.—Ye shall go

(וְהִלַּכְתֶּם), ver. 12, is best taken of going to a place of worship. So that ye shall call and and pray are distinguished as private and public worship (comp. 1 Ki. viii. 20, 29, 30, 35, etc.). If the sentences of ver. 13 and “I will be found of you,” ver. 14, are not tautological, we must regard them as two sentences with two clauses each, the second forming the basis of the former; כִּי is not “when” but “for,” or “because:” ye will seek me and find me; because ye shall seek me with all your heart, I will be found of you.—Turn away your captivity. The expression is rooted in Deut. (xxx. 3), as generally in our whole passage this chapter hovered before the mind of the prophet. The expression is found with special frequency in Jeremiah, and chiefly in chs. xxx.-xxxiii. and xlvi.-xlix. To turn the captivity stands, however, for restitutio in integrum generally (Job xlii. 10; Jer. xxx. 18). The return from exile was only a weak beginning of the fulfilment of our prophecy. Comp. rems. on iii. 12 sqq.

Vers. 15-19. Because ye have said . . . saith Jehovah. Not only has ver. 15 been declared to be transposed hither from its first place, but the whole passage, vers. 16-20, has been pronounced spurious (Hirzig), which is thought to be the more justified, because the passage is wanting in the LXX. It seems to me that two things have been overlooked here. 1. Jerusalem with its remaining population and the theocratic king at their head naturally still continued to the exiles to be the sun of their happiness and their hope. So long as Jerusalem and the temple were standing, the main foundation of the theocracy was unshaken and the hope existed that the present temporary adversity might be followed any moment by a turn for the better. Hence also the prophecies of the false prophets dwelt above all on the continuance of Jerusalem. Even the present misfortune, the partial deportation of the people and the sacred vessels, although they had not predicted it, they could explain as a mere episode, which did not refute the main tenor of their promises, so long as Jerusalem and the temple were standing, and there were people in Jerusalem. Hence Jeremiah takes away the ground from under the feet of those false prophets, by predicting in vers. 16-20 the total destruction of the present population of Jerusalem, together with their king. We are not then to say that these words, vers. 16-20, apply to the population of Jerusalem. They certainly do so, but only secondarily. Primarily they are to overthrow the basis on which the false prophets of the captivity are standing. I can then regard the words only as necessary parts of the genuine letter, written by Jeremiah to the exiles, and cannot assume with GRAF that we have in this chapter only a report of the letter. 2. In its grammatical relations the ׀ in the beginning of ver. 16 has given the greatest trouble to the commentators. They have taken it mostly in the causal signification, which it certainly usually has in this formula, which however affords no sense, whether we connect ver. 16 with ver. 15 or ver. 14. It is here rather the pleonastic ׀ which so frequently introduces a direct statement. We have had it already in ver. 10. Comp. ii. 35; xxii. 22; and TEXTUAL NOTE.—Hath raised, etc. Jeremiah supposes a reply to vers. 8, 9. You despise our prophets; we however assure you that Jehovah raises up prophets not only in Jerusalem, but He has extended the inspiring influence of His Spirit even to Babylon. Hence the local form הָרָאָה .—The sword. Comp. ix. 15; xxiv. 10; xxvii. 8, 18.—Figs. The prophet has xxiv. 2 in view. That the exiles were acquainted with the vision in ch. xxiv. is possible but not necessary. This passage is intelligible to those who had no knowledge of ch. xxiv.—Ye would not hear. The 2 pers. plur. proceeds doubtless simply from the circumstance that the prophet quotes entire a frequent saying there: vii. 13; xxv. 3, 4, 7, 8; xxvi. 5. On ver. 20 comp. xxiv. 5.

Vers. 20-23. Hear ye therefore . . . witness, saith Jehovah. In conclusion the prophet predicts the punishment of two of those false prophets for their presumption and blasphemy generally by a terrible death. Nothing further is known of this Ahab and Zedekiah.—Slay them. It is very natural to suppose that Nebuchadnezzar feared the exciting preaching of such prophets and that he wished to terrify others by inflicting death in a terrible manner.—Ver. 22 a. Comp. xxiv. 9; xxv. 18; xxvi. 6 coll. Isa. lxxv. 15.—Roasted. Comp. Dan. iii. 6.—Villany, (נבלה) a deed of shame, facinus rationi legique divina repugnans (FRERST). Comp. Gen. xxxiv. 7; Deut. xxii. 21; Josh. vii. 15.—The Lord calls Himself a knower and witness, because He not only knows the truth, but brings it also to light. Comp. Mal. iii. 5. Levit. v. 1 may in general have been hovering before the mind of the prophet.

2. The Consequences of the Letter.

XXIX. 24-32.

- 24, 25 Thus shalt thou also speak to Shemaiah the Nehelamite, saying, Thus speaketh the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel, saying, Because thou hast sent letters in thy name unto all the people that are at Jerusalem, and to Zephaniah, the son of Maa-

 29 And Zephaniah the priest read this letter in the ears of Jeremiah the prophet.
 30, 31 Then came the word of the Lord unto Jeremiah, saying, Send to all them of the captivity [a message] saying, Thus saith the Lord concerning Shemaiah the Nehelamite; Because that Shemaiah hath prophesied unto you, and I sent him 32 not [without my having sent him] and he caused you to trust⁶ in a lie: Therefore thus saith the Lord: Behold, I will punish Shemaiah the Nehelamite, and his seed: he shall not have a man to dwell among this people; neither shall he behold⁷ the good that I will do for my people, saith the Lord; because he hath taught rebellion against the Lord.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 26.—כִּשְׁנָא. Only the Part. Pual and Part. and Inf. Hiphil of this word are found. The radical meaning is to be astray. (Comp. שָׁנָא, שָׁנַנְנָה, שָׁנָה). The Hiphil is used of raving in general, 1 Sam. xxi. 15, 16; כִּשְׁנָנָה likewise in Deut. xxviii. 34 and 1 Sam. xxi. 16; elsewhere only of prophets and always in a bad sense; Hos. ix. 7; 2 Ki. ix. 11.

² Ver. 26.—צִנְקָה. The word is ἀπ. λέγ. The root צִנְק also does not occur elsewhere in Hebrew. From the dialects the most suitable comparison is afforded by the Arabic zinq, collar, ring (Hirtzig). According to the older Rabbis in KIMCHI צִנְק = מִסְנַר לְיָדַיִם as כֹּהֶפֶת = מִסְנַר לְאָזְנוֹר. Symm.: μόχλος lever, pole, bar. GES. Thes., p. 1175. HIRTZIG rightly supposes that both instruments formed the complete instrument of torture, one serving to confine the neck, the other the hands and feet.

³ Ver. 27.—גְּעַרְתָּ. Properly to chide (comp. Gen. xxxvii. 10) then to interfere, to stop any one (Ruth ii. 16; Mal. iii. 11).

⁴ Ver. 28.—כִּי עַל-כֵּן. In itself these particles might be taken in the most natural sense; for on this account (viz., on account of defective control); but elsewhere they always designate the reason supposed as the object or result; xxxviii. 4; Gen. xviii. 5; xix. 8; xxxiii. 10; xxxviii. 26. Comp. REDSLOB, lexical. Erörterungen. Stud. u. Krit., 1811, S. 983 sq.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The letter, xxix. 4-23, caused great exasperation among the false prophets at Babylon. One of them, Shemaiah, complains to the overseer of the temple in Jerusalem that he did not interfere against the conduct of the mad Jeremiah. Jeremiah gets information of this letter and receives the command to announce to Shemaiah that his family shall become extinct, and that he himself will not see the salvation of Israel. The arrangement of the sentences in this passage is very irregular. In the first place all explanation concerning the proximate occasion of this utterance is passed over. Yet this may be accounted for by the fact that this may be learned from the tenor of the passage itself. The beginning will then be made with the command to make an announcement to Shemaiah. This announcement does begin in ver. 25, and takes its regular course to the close of ver. 28, so that in vers. 26-28 the letter is communicated verbatim, which gave the occasion for the announcement to Shemaiah. Here the address to Shemaiah breaks off without a conclusion. Instead of this, after the prophet has suddenly sprung back from the point of the communication by him to the point of the communication to him, the conclusion is given in the form of an address to the exiles, in which Shemaiah is spoken of in the third person (vers. 30-32). Here accordingly two announcements seem to have been made (comp. vers. 24, 25 with vers. 30, 31), which on account of their identical tenor the prophet allows to combine in the course of his narrative.

Vers. 24-28. Thus shalt thou . . . eat the fruit of them. We might indeed translate אֵל here, as in vers. 16 and 21, of [Shemaiah] instead of to, but ver. 25 contains a direct address to Shemaiah. Neither he nor his birth-place is mentioned elsewhere.—The letter, communicated in vers. 26-28, is addressed specially to the priest Zephaniah. When notwithstanding, in ver. 25, letters are spoken of which were addressed to all the prophets and all the priests besides Zephaniah, this may be explained in two ways; either there really were letters with the three addressees mentioned, the principal letter only being communicated to Zephaniah; or this letter was the only one, but designated in ver. 25 as intended to be communicated to a wider circle. Both explanations are grammatically possible. For letters (סֵפֵרִים) may be a general plural.

(Comp. כִּטּוֹת, yokes, xxviii. 13 and Isa. xxxvii. 14; xxxix. 1).—Zephaniah, the son of Maaseiah, was בְּהֵן מִשְׁנָה, second priest, lii. 24. Comp. xxi. 1 and xxxvii. 3.—Officers (פְּקִידִים). This also might in itself be a general plural, if the mention of the predecessor did not require us to refer it to both officers.—That is mad. Here the expression involves an insult to Jeremiah. Zephaniah was not to restrain all those who prophesied, but only those who were deranged and presumed to prophesy, and Jeremiah is reckoned among these.—In prison. Comp. xxx. 2.—This is long. By this the 70 years are meant (ver. 10), which, in comparison with the time predicted by the false prophets, would be a very long period.

Vers. 29-32. And Zephaniah . . . against Jehovah. The words of ver. 29 do not clearly indicate whether Zephaniah read the letter of Jeremiah alone or in the presence of others. We may conclude from the two embassies (xxi. 1; xxxvii. 3) that he was probably not personally hostile towards Jeremiah. We also find no indication that Shemaiah's letter was at that time of any injury to Jeremiah. It is indeed possible that Zephaniah, though unable to keep the purport of the letter altogether secret, yet acted with the utmost possible consideration toward the prophet. At any rate Jeremiah was not intimidated. Shemaiah receives a reproving answer from the Lord's prophet: his race shall be extirpated (the phrase "dwelling among his people" signifies a peaceful, secure existence, 2 Ki. iv. 13) and he himself will not have his eyes gladdened by the prosperity of his people.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxvi. 3. ["See how God waits to be gracious, waits till we are duly qualified, till we are fit for Him to be gracious to, and in the meantime tries a variety of methods to bring us to be so." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

2. On xxvi. 6. "Deus nulli loco præcise alligatus est ita, ut ecclesiam suam et doctrinam caelestem inde dimovere nequeat propter hominum ingratiudinem. Vehementer igitur errant Romanenses, dum ex auctoritate urbis Romæ suæ ecclesie ac religionis auctoritatem evincere satagunt. Multo rectius Hieronymus in hoc memorabili dicto, quod etiam allegatur in Jure Canon. Dist. 19: Non facile est stare loco Pauli et tenere gradum Petri cum Christo regnantium. Non enim Sanctorum filii sunt, qui tenent loca Sanctorum, sed qui exercent opera eorum." FÖRSTER.

3. On xxvi. 8 sqq. "Scarcely has Jeremiah done speaking than they take him to task, and threaten his life. What does Jeremiah do? Instead of vindicating himself he says: 'Reform your life, and hearken to the voice of the Lord, and it will be better for you,' ver. 13. You do not wish me to thunder away at you; reform then and I can let it alone. This preaching was reasonable, and produced an admirable effect. The priests and elders contradicted the priests, the parrhesia [free-spokenness, Acts iv. 13] of the man filled them with astonishment. 'He is not worthy of death,' ver. 16. A brief illustration of the saying 'We need not our senses lose, when our enemies accuse.' Jeremiah has to thank his honesty for this presence of mind, his profound meditation, his constrained calling, the necessity, the ardor, which urged him to preach, for no personal inclination had any share in it. I know in more recent times a man, who has unaffectedly practised Jeremiah's behavior, a pastor, a teacher, I might say a prophet of many thousand people. Whenever he had to vindicate himself (which happened now and then) he preached, he repeated to the commissioners the very things of which he was accused, confessed and denied not, but pressed them on their hearts, and showed aliud agendo his innocence, his mind, his steadfastness, and all at the same time so plainly that they always returned with full conviction and knew not whether they had gone forth to see a prophet or were sent to examine a culprit? 'Never man,' they said, 'spake like this man.' That cannot be counterfeited. One must be just as full of the matter, as absorbed in the subject, as pressed at heart, kindled with the same ardor in order to explain himself with the same indifference, repose and plainness, when there is a knife at his throat." ZINZENDORF.

4. On xxvi. 12 sqq. "Si injuriam deposueris penes Deum, ultor est; si damnum, restitutor est; si dolorem, medicus est; si mortem, resuscitator est." TENTULIANUS. ["Those that persecute God's ministers hurt not them so much as themselves." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

5. On xxvi. 7, 8, 11, 16. "Auctores persecutionis plerumque esse solent ii, qui in ordine ecclesiastico eminent." FÖRSTER. "Especially are the priests and men-pleasing prophets mad with Jeremiah, for if he is right they have lied." DIETRICH.

6. On xxvi. 18. ["By this it appears that a man may be a true prophet of the Lord and yet may prophesy the destruction of Zion and Jerusalem. When we threaten secure sinners with the taking away of the Spirit of God, and declining churches with the removal of the candlestick, we say no more than what has been said many a time, and what we have warrant from the word of God to say." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

7. On xxvi. 20 sqq. "Urias, a true prophet, preached like Jeremiah, therefore the king wished to kill him, so he fled to Egypt but could not escape. Jeremiah did not flee and was spared . . . Our running and anxiety are of no use. The wickedness of the world must for its judgment be displayed on God's servants, and these must yield to it; but on whom it is to come first God has in His own hand; and we may spare ourselves all our care and flight." DIETRICH. ["Nothing more is known of Urijah than is here related; but this incident suggests that God mercifully strove with His people by the ministry of many prophets whom He sent, rising up early and sending them (ver. 5) whose names are written in the Book of Life and are canonized in God's Martyrology, but do not appear in the pages of any earthly history." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

8. On xxvi. 24. "Monentur hic, Deum servis suis fidelibus subinde largiri quosdam patronos, ut Jeremize hic Achikamum et infra cap. 38 Ebedmelechum, Eliæ et prophetis συγχρόνους Obadiam 1 Reg. 18, Luthero Electores Saxonie Fridericum sapientem, Johannem pium, Johannem-Fridericum constantem." FÖRSTER.

9. On xxvii. 2-11. Historical times are preceded by a long series of centuries which present themselves to us as altogether obscure or only in the dubious twilight of tradition. Accredited history also comprises only a relatively small portion of the human race, for the nations which are added as ciphers to the factors of history form the majority. A universal ruler in the biblical sense is not one whose dominion actually extends over the entire globe—for there is none such—but he who represents the leader in the concert of history. This part is here given to Nebuchadnezzar. Among all the universal monarchies that represented by him appears richest in noble capacity. It is therefore compared to the golden head of the image in Dan. ii. Comp. AUBERLEN, der Prophet Daniel, S. 41 sqq.

10. On xxvii. 5 sqq. ["The things of the world are not the best things, for God often gives the largest share of them to bad men, that are rivals with him and rebels against him. Dominion is not founded in grace. Those that have not any colorable title to eternal happiness may yet have a justifiable title to their temporal good things." HENRY.—S. R. A.] "Great lords sit indeed on high thrones, but not firmly, for they are only God's vassals. And when they do not please Him and act accordingly, he can easily transfer the fief to another; Dan. ii. 21; iv. 14, 22." CRAMER.

11. On xxvii. 12. ["The conduct of Jeremiah, counselling Zedekiah and Jerusalem to submit to Nebuchadnezzar, has been represented as an act of political prudence to be imitated by Statesmen and Ecclesiastics, who are thereby justified in making large concessions of national rights and national independence in times of public emergency (STANLEY, Lect. 534).

But was it not rather one of religious duty?

God had revealed to the prophet that He had given the Nation into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, 'His servant,' on account of their sins, and they must submit to Him as the Minister and Vicegerent of God." WORDSWORTH. "Many might have prevented destroying providences by humbling themselves under humbling providences. It is better to take up a lighter cross in our way, than pull a heavier on our own head." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

12. On xxvii. 14. "It is one sign of our depraved nature that we are more ready to believe lies than the truth. For when Jeremiah and his colleagues preached, no one believed. But no sooner did the false prophet come and open their mouths, than all their discourses must be spoken directly from heaven, and what they said, must pass current on earth (Ps. lxxiii. 9). But not what Jeremiah said. Take for example our mother Eve; what God said was of no account, but what the serpent said was something purely excellent." CRAMER.

13. On xxvii. 18. "True prayer is a certain sign of Godliness and a fruit of faith and the Holy Ghost, which cries in our hearts: Abba, dear Father. Therefore he who cannot or will not pray is not a good Christian." CRAMER.

14. On xxvii. 18. "If they be prophets let them supplicate the Lord. This was the great demonstration of Elias, to which Jeremiah adheres. It is infallibly the case that a false teacher has no heart for the Saviour, and goes out of His way. A heretic, who has a heart to pray (and that too in secret) is certainly not far from the truth." ZINZENDORF.

15. On xxvii. 22. ["We are apt to set our clock before God's dial, and then to quarrel because they do not agree, but the Lord is a God of judgment, and it is fit that we should wait for Him." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

16. On xxviii. 1 sqq. "Wherever the dear Lord builds His church, the devil has a chapel near by." CRAMER. This Hananiah (comp. xxviii. 2, 11) shows us plainly what it is to lie or deceive in the name of God.

"O Lord, and must Thy glorious name
Thus be a cover to their shame?" FÖRSTER.

17. On xxviii. 6. "Amen! the Lord do so. Quite a different attitude of the prophet from the preceding. A false prophet, a miserable comforter disputes with him, brings good news and appeals to an oracle, a voice which he had perhaps heard more lately than Jeremiah. Jeremiah without getting warm about it, says I shall be heartily glad if it be so: but take care that you have understood it correctly. His opponent is encouraged and goes further, he breaks off the prophetic yoke from Jeremiah's neck. Jeremiah, with the same indifference, which he has shown from the beginning, goes his way . . . I dare not speak of anything, says Paul, which Christ hath not wrought by me (Rom. xv. 18)." ZINZENDORF.

18. On xxviii. 10, 11. "Chananias hic præbet exemplum impudentiæ Jesuuiticæ, cujus magistrum non abs re appellaveris Eumundum Campianum (1580) qui epistola quadum Theologos Angliæ provocare non erubuit, ponens inter alia verba hæc fere thrasonica: Si præstitero calos esse, divos esse, Christum esse, fidem esse, causam obtinui: hic non animosus ero? Occidi quidem possum, superari non possum. Pari impudentia Jesuuitas ante Colloquium Ratisbonense scriptitasse legimus: The Prædicantes should come, if they had a heart in their body, they would catch them alive: if they would bring a syllogism, which is in Bocardo, they would throw it at one's head and say it was in Bocallo." FÖRSTER.

19. On xxix. 7. "Monemur hic, orandum esse pro magistratibus et non tantum iis, qui nostræ religioni addicti et veræ ecclesie membra, sed etiam pro iis, qui extra ecclesiam adeoque gentes ut Nebuchadnezzar et Nero tyrannus (2 Tim. ii. 2). Nam ex salute reipublice etiam salus et incolumitas ecclesie constat. Et Lutherus perlegenter: Politia, inquit, servit ecclesie, ecclesia servat politiam." FÖRSTER. "Quod pastori hoc et ovibus." The symbol of the Emperor Charles the Bald.

20. On xxix. 11. "God always has compassion, and His heart breaks for us (Jer. xxxi. 20), for he exercises guardianship over His elect (Wisd. iv. 15). And he knows how, in all that he does, to mitigate His justice with His mercy, so that we may see how richly His mercy is diffused over all His works; that even when He punishes, He straightway has mercy again according to His great goodness, and causes His mercy to be the more richly dispensed, because He knows our frame (Ps. ciii. 14), viz., that we are flesh, a wind which passeth away and returneth not again (Ps. lxxviii. 40). CRAMER.

21. On xxix. 10, 11. "The waiting of the righteous has always something to depend upon, namely, the promise, and it is a duty to God to believe the promises, but an insult and dishonor to the name of the Lord when no faith is put in them. Is it not enough that ye injure me, will ye also insult the Lord my God? (Isa. vii. 13)." ZINZENDORF.

22. On xxix. 11. "God gives a happy ending; He also tells us beforehand, that we may honor Him by hoping; but He deals with us according to His wisdom and His righteousness, so that He chastens us as long as we need it. We cannot, therefore, do otherwise than place ourselves in His hands." DIEDRICH.

23. On xxix. 12. "Let this be firmly established among the brethren, that there is no sham about the hearing of prayer. I remember that once a great minister said across the table: My pastor wrote me that he had settled it with the dear Lord that my wife should live; I should be comforted. My wife died. Now my pastor congratulates me and says, I could now indeed see that she lived. No wonder. The Bible has a nose of wax; and gentlemen also can explain their own words. . . . Is it then to be in vain that the Lord Jesus has said; whatever ye ask believing that ye shall receive, shall be given unto you (Mark xi. 24; John xvi. 23; Matt. vii. 7; Jas. iv. 4)? . . . Test it as often as it is necessary; ask however in faith, and doubt not. I know most assuredly that you will be heard. But I regard it as a matter for consideration, whether one is to ask." ZINZENDORF.

24. On xxix. 15, 16. "A heavy cross often frees us from a heavier, which would otherwise have come upon us. The best way, therefore, is to be satisfied with God's ways, who can bring good out of evil (1 Pet. iv. 19; Gen. 1. 20)." STARKE.

25. On xxix. 24-32. "Those who seek their own consolation without God must be eternally deprived of the true consolation, which God grants to those who at this time humble themselves under Him. Those who preach false consolation confirm the resistance of men to the divine guidance and thus preach revolt, though intending to act conservatively. But in their blindness they do not see what sort of a time it is." DIEDRICH.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xxvi. 1-24. A sermon in rebuke of the corruptions of Zion. 1. Its purport (vers. 4-6); 2. How it is received (vers. 7-11); 3. How the preacher must defend himself (vers. 12-15); 4. What the fate of the preacher will be (a), in the most favorable case (vers. 16-19, 24) (b), in the most unfavorable case (vers. 20-23).

2. On xxvii. 1-22. How the Lord's servants are to treat Politics.—1. They are to point out to the people that it is the Lord who raises and overthrows the kingdoms of this world (vers. 2-8). 2. They are to admonish the people to do what the Lord commands (vers. 12, 13). 3. They are to warn against those who speak their own thoughts to the people (vers. 9-11, 14-17). 4.

They are to admonish to prayer and intercession (ver. 18 sqq).

3. On xxviii. 1-17. Of false and true prophets.

1. False prophets, (a) publish on their own responsibility what the people like to hear (vers. 2-4); (b) boldly contradict the true word of God (vers. 10 and 11); (c) come to shame, by the non-fulfilment of their predictions (vers. 8 and 9) and by their personal destruction (vers. 15-17). 2. True prophets (a) proclaim faithfully the true word of God, (b) fearlessly oppose the lusts of men and the lies of the false prophets; (c) They are honored (a) by the fulfilment of their prophecies, (b) by martyrdom, i.e., honor with God and posterity.

6. On xxix. 11. The thoughts of the Lord concerning us. 1. They are thoughts of peace and not of evil; 2, we must wait for their realization, for the Lord delays this, but he does not forget it.

7. On xxix. 11. Sermon at the funeral service of the Grand Hereditary Prince of Russia, delivered by Prof. Christiani, in Dorpat, 14 April, 1865: 1. Of the thoughts of peace which the Lord has had in this death; 2. Of the fruits and effects of these thoughts of peace.

8. On xxix. 11-14. Whereupon is our hope of peace based? 1. Objectively upon this, that the Lord Himself has thoughts of peace concerning us. 2. Subjectively on this, that we (a) call upon and seek the Lord with all our hearts, (b) patiently wait for the time of hearing.

10. The Book of Consolation.

A. THE TENTH DISCOURSE.

CHAPTERS XXX. and XXXI.

The close of the prophetic discourses referring to the entire Theocracy is formed by two prophecies of exclusively consolatory purport, of which, at least, the first (chh. xxx. and xxxi.) was intended to be preserved as a special writing (and only as such. Comp. rem. on xxx. 1). It is quite natural that these consolatory prophecies should form the close of the discourses; for salvation and peace will in reality be the end of God's ways.

The first of these consolatory prophecies is also the earlier in date. It is indeed one of the oldest parts of the whole book. The absence of any mention of the Chaldeans (the general "north country" occurs in xxxi. 8) is a sure sign of its composition before the fourth year of Jehoiakim. This discourse moreover is so closely related in its subject-matter to the second discourse (chh. iii.-vi.), or to its consolatory part (iii. 11-25), that we cannot but attribute it to the same period. We may indeed say that it is only a further development of the consolatory section mentioned. The relationship is seen both in general and in particulars. With respect to the first it may be remarked that Israel and Judah, here as there, form the ground of the division of the discourse, for as in iii. 6-10 a comparison is instituted between Judah and Israel in reference to the past, and in iii. 11-17 to the future, first of Israel, then (with a gradual transition) of Judah, and in iii. 18-25 the future return of both is described, so in ch. xxx. the prophet directs his attention first to entire Israel, in xxxi. 1-22 to Ephraim alone, in xxxi. 23-26 to Judah, in xxxi. 27-40 again to both. Though Jeremiah elsewhere also (Comp. rems. on xxx. 4) in single intimations views the nation according to its two divisions, yet he does this nowhere in so marked a manner as in chh. iii. and xxx.-xxxi.—Further, as in iii. 14-20 the return of the two halves of the nation into the holy land is the basis of all further prosperity, so also in chh. xxx. and xxxi. Compare xxx. 3, 10, 18; xxxi. 2, 8, 12, 16, 21, 23.—As further in iii. 21 sqq. the return is represented as the consequence of an honest inward turning, so also in xxxi. 18 the sincere penitence of the people is the reason of the return graciously permitted them. It should here be especially observed that in the section xxx. 16-22 the prophet gives variations of the idea of שׁוּב in the same way as he did in ch. iii. Comp. EXEG. rems. on xxxi. 22. The way also in which the penitential return is described in xxxi. 9, 18, 19 reminds us at many points of iii. 21. A series of expressions further may be specified which occur only in chh. xxx., xxxi. and iii.-vi.: עֲשֵׂה כְּלָה only in xxx. 11 and iv. 27; v. 10, 18, and besides in xlvi. 28, as a quotation from xxx. 11.—תָּעַר only in xxxi. 4 and iv. 30. כִּכְי וְתַהוֹנוּנִים only in xxxi. 9 and iii. 21. אֵל used of Jehovah in reference to Israel only in xxxi. 9 and iii. 19.—יִקְעִים only in xxxi. 20 and iv. 19. עָרַב in the sense of to be sweet only in xxxi. 26 and

vi. 20.—עֲצַמוֹ of sins only in xxx. 14, 15 and v. 6. תִּמְרָרִים only in xxxi. 15 and vi. 26.—פָּעַל to rule only in xxxi. 32 and iii. 14. We meet besides with expressions and utterances which are taken from chh. i. and ii., which also belong to that initial period. Thus above all xxxi. 28 coll. i. 10, 12; xxxi. 3 coll. ii. 2; xxxi. 10 אִיִּם coll. ii. 10 (the plural is found only in these two clauses)—כִּנְיָ only in xxxi. 16 and ii. 25.—There are further many points of contact with chh. xxii. and xxiii., which are, however, to be explained by the use of this chapter there. For as the prophet had occasion in xxiii. 3-8 to deliver a glorious Messianic prophecy, it was natural that he should be thus reminded of the earlier one of similar purport. In the main point, indeed, the words referring to the person of the Messiah (xxx. 9, 10, 21 coll. xxiii. 5, 6), the similarity is only topical. With respect to expression, both prophecies retain their own individuality. Still in the less important points there is an agreement in expression: xxx. 13 coll. xxii. 16; xxx. 14 coll. xxii. 20, 22; xxx. 16 coll. xxii. 22; xxx. 5, 6 coll. xxii. 23.—With respect to the verses xxx. 23, 24, consult the Exposition.

On account of the undeniable specific relationship, which exists between the present chapters and the second discourse (chh. iii.-vi.), especially the consolatory portion (ch. iii.), I am convinced that chh. xxx. and xxxi. owe their origin to the same time, the reign of Josiah (comp. iii. 6).

With the exception of xxx. 22-24, I cannot discover any spurious elements in these chapters. MOVERS and HITZIG have thought they could repeatedly recognize the hand of the assumed Isaiah II., but have been so satisfactorily refuted by GRAF, that I now only refer to him. GRAF himself regards xxxi. 35-40 as a latter addition. I think, however, that I have shown in the Exposition that these verses fit into the connection as integral parts, and that therefore, as the diction betrays no foreign traces, they are to be recognized as genuine and original.

The articulation of the discourse is as follows:—

The glorious Future of the People Israel at the end of days.

- I. THE THEME, xxx. 1-3.
- II. THE DELIVERANCE OF ENTIRE ISRAEL, xxx. 4-22.
 1. The great day of judgment of the world and deliverance of Israel, xxx. 4-11.
 2. The turn of affairs: The Lord for the chastised, against the chastiser, xxx. 12-17.
 3. The consummation of salvation, xxx. 18-22.
- III. THE SPECIAL DISTRIBUTION OF SALVATION TO THE TWO HALVES OF THE NATION, xxxi. 1-26.
 - a. Ephraim's share, xxxi. 1-22.
 1. The decree of restoration, xxxi. 1-6.
 2. Its execution, xxxi. 7-14.
 3. The threefold turn, xxxi. 15-22.
 - b. Judah's share.

The blessing of the sanctuary, xxxi. 23-26.
- IV. THE ENTIRE RENEWAL, xxxi. 27-40.
 1. The new life, xxxi. 27-30.
 2. The new covenant, xxxi. 31-40.

The Glorious Future of the People Israel at the End of Days.

I. The Theme.

XXX. 1-3.

- 1, 2 The word that came to Jeremiah from the Lord [Jehovah] saying, Thus speaketh the Lord [Jehovah] God of Israel, saying, Write thee all the words that I

3 have spoken unto thee in a book. For [Namely] lo, the days come, saith the Lord [Jehovah], that I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel, and Judah, saith the Lord [Jehovah]; and will cause them to return to the land that I gave to their fathers, and they shall possess it.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The superscription is one of the greater sort. It pertains to chh. xxx. and xxxi., a similar one not recurring till xxxii. 1. Jeremiah had certainly received this prophecy before, as follows from the words that I have spoken in ver. 2. Nevertheless ver. 1 is not merely the announcement of what is said in vers. 2 and 3, as HURZIG supposes, but the superscription of the oracle, for such superscriptions always stand as the introduction to the larger sections. As it here introduces the command to write and what is to be written directly follows (ver. 4 sqq.), the superscription refers to both. J. D. MICHAELIS is of opinion that we have here the expressum mandatum to collect the prophecies into a book, and that this is the first book, which closes with ch. xxxii. The Paralipomena, collected after the death of Jeremiah, form the second book. It is plain, however, that this view is altogether untenable, for this, apart from other reasons, that in vers. 2, 3 and 4 the command to write is referred to the next following prophecy, as SCHÜRER has already proved against MICHAELIS. These chapters also cannot be parts of that book which Jeremiah was caused to write in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (xxxvi. 2). For this book, according to xxxvi. 6 sqq., was intended to be read to the people, that they might hear "all the evil which the Lord purposed to do with them, that they might return every man from his evil way and the Lord might forgive them," so that it appears merely to have contained an exhortation and threatening. This also explains the great displeasure occasioned by it. It was cut into pieces from the first to the last leaf and cast into the fire (xxxvi. 23), which was certainly not the case with these chapters. Even ROSENMUELLER calls attention to the circumstance that Jeremiah here (xxx. 2) receives the command, "non, ut ante concionem habere et quæ ab eo sint annuntianda ad populum per sermonem deferre, sed libro inscribere." This prophecy was not to be delivered orally, but merely committed to writing, just as the prophecy against Babylon (li. 60 sqq.). The people were not then in the mood to hear these great beaming predictions of salvation. These were to be bequeathed as written documents, that on the one hand they might serve to encourage the people in their deepest distress, and on the other hand it might be evident that the Lord and no other had brought about this favorable turn in their affairs (Isa. xlvi. 5), but also, that the Lord had not afterwards altered His purpose, but already in the times of the deepest decline, when the people were receiving only threatening words from the mouth of the prophet, He had conceived and made known the plan of salvation. Comp. Isa. xxx. 8; Job ii. 2. The prophecy was thus preserved separately and only afterwards incorporated into the entire collection. It does not seem probable to me, as GRAP thinks, that it was included in the second enlarged book (xxxvi. 32). The words in xxxvi. 27 sqq. make throughout the impression that the second book in relation to the first contained only a heightened repetition. Nor can we see why, if these chapters are portions of a large book, they alone should bear at their head the special command to write them down. This command must either be found before all the single portions or only where the origin of the whole is mentioned. The special command to commit to writing which we find here (xxx. 2) shows that here also we have to do with a special independent writing.

Ver. 3. For lo. The construction seems to require לֵב to be taken in a causal sense, for it would be somewhat harsh to take it in the sense of "that," or "namely," on account of the following הִנֵּה and וְנָתַתִּי, which seems rather to require לֵב before it. On the other hand, the causal rendering also has its difficulties. For then in ver. 3 the main point is not expressed in the statement of the reason, viz.: the Lord wishes that when the good days come He may be able to point to the documentary evidence of His purpose of salvation, as a proof of His being the author of the present prosperity. This thought would have still to be supplied, while the words as they stand evidently state only the purport of the words, ver. 2. It will therefore be correct here to take לֵב="that" or "namely," in the sense in which לֵב, saying, occurs elsewhere. This latter word would not be suitable after in a book, because it would have meant that the purport of what was to be written in the book was to be stated, whereas it is the tenor of the words already spoken which is to be quoted summarily. This was necessary in order to define the general phrase all the words, which was liable to be misunderstood. Hence I think that לֵב is to be taken here as introducing the direct statement, which radically also is used only for the more common לֵב. Comp. NAEGLSEN. Gr. § 109, 1 a. The original act of speaking itself is certainly not related here, but the purport of a discourse already delivered is quoted, by which the לֵב obtains the somewhat modified (explicative) meaning of namely. The words from הִנֵּה to וְנָתַתִּי are therefore to be regarded as a quotation. Hence הִנֵּה and וְנָתַתִּי. They are not found verbatim as a whole in the following chapters or anywhere in Jeremiah; but they are an accurate synopsis of the words and thoughts which form the heads of the following promise of prosperity. For in ver. 18 sqq.; xxxi. 27-32, the return of the whole people of Israel to their home is represented as the close of the mournful past and the basis of a new and glorious future. Comp. iii. 14-18.—On bring again the captivity comp. Comm. on xxix. 11.—[“The four following chapters display a beautiful contrast to the three foregoing odes. The former denunciations of judgment and captivity for sin are here succeeded by promises of mercy and restoration to Jerusalem—promises to be fulfilled in the bringing back of all true Israelites to God by the Divine Deliverer and Redeemer, JESUS CHRIST. The joyful transition is marked by a sudden change from grave and mournful accents in solemn prose, to a jubilant outburst of poetic ecstasy." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

II. The Deliverance of Entire Israel (xxx. 4-22).

1. The great day of judgment of the world and deliverance of Israel.

XXX. 4-11.

- 4 And these are the words which Jehovah hath spoken concerning¹ Israel and concerning Judah:
- 5 For thus saith Jehovah:
We have heard a cry of terror,²
Fear and no deliverance.
- 6 Ask ye now and see if a male is parturient?
Why do I then see every man with his hands on his hips like a parturient,
And all faces turned into paleness?³
- 7 Alas! for great is that day, with none like it,⁴
And it will be a time of trouble to Jacob,
But—he shall be delivered from it.
- 8 And it shall come to pass on that day, saith Jehovah Zebaoth,
I will break his yoke off from thy neck,
And I will tear asunder thy bonds,
And strangers shall no longer enslave him:⁵
- 9 But they shall serve Jehovah their God,
And David their king, whom I will raise up⁶ for them.
- 10 But fear thou not, my servant Jacob, saith Jehovah,
And be not dismayed, O Israel.
For behold, I will deliver thee from afar,
And thy seed from the land of their captivity;
And Jacob shall return and rest,
And be tranquil and undisturbed.
- 11 For I am with thee to deliver thee, saith Jehovah.
Though I make a full end⁷ of all the nations,
Whither I have scattered them,
I will not make an end of thee;
But I will chastise thee according to justice,
And not leave thee unpunished.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—לְאֵל= in reference to, of, concerning, as in xxix. 16, 21; xxii. 11.

² Ver. 5.—קוֹל חֲרָדָה. קוֹל חֲרָדָה is found here only in Jeremiah. The terror is not occasioned by the sound of war, but the apprehension of judgment. Comp. Luke xxi. 25, 26.

³ Ver. 6.—לִירְקוֹן. Abstr. for concrete. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 59, 1. The expression is found here only.

⁴ Ver. 7.—כְּאֵין. Comp. rems. on x. 6, 7; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 106, 5.

⁵ Ver. 8.—The words from וְהָיָה לְיְהוָה to וְהָיָה לְיְהוָה are a quotation almost verbatim from Isa. x. 27 coll. xiv. 25. This explains the suffix in עָלָיו, which, as the passage in Isaiah, is to be referred to the inimical tyrants. If, with GRAF, we refer it to עֵקֶב, ver. 7, צוֹאֲרֹךְ immediately afterwards is intolerably harsh. It is true the person changes in בּוֹ, yet this is at least a new sentence, in which case the change has nothing surprising in it. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 101, 2, Ann.

⁶ Ver. 9.—אֶקְיָם is used here in the same sense as in vi. 17; xxiii. 4, etc.

7 Ver. 11.—אָנְשָׁה כְּלָה. This expression is found in Jeremiah (besides in xvi. 23, as a quotation from this passage) only in iv. 27; v. 10, 18. The construction with the accus. is the prevailing and original construction: Nah. i. 8, 9; Zeph. i. 18; Ezek. xi. 13; xx. 17; Neh. ix. 31. With וְ it is found here only. It appears to signify in this connection: to cause destruction among, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

What was summarily comprised in ver. 2 is now set forth in detail (ver. 4). Cry of terror, fear without a possibility of deliverance (ver. 5); all the men have their hands on their thighs like women in travail, all faces have become pale (ver. 6), for the great day of the Lord, a day with none like it, is breaking, a day which will be a time of dread even for Jacob, but yet at the same time the day of redemption (ver. 6), for on this day an end is to be put to Israel's servitude (ver. 8). Israel is from thenceforward to serve only his God and his king David (ver. 9), Judah and Israel are then to be brought back from the lands of their captivity to a peaceful habitation of their home (ver. 10), for while the Lord will execute on all the Gentiles a judgment of destruction, He will indeed chastise Israel so as not to leave him unpunished, but will not destroy him.

Vers. 4-7. And these . . . delivered from it. Apart from some brief intimations (ix. 25; xi. 10-17; xiii. 11; xxiii. 6; l. 4) the prophet makes Israel and Judah, the two great halves of the Israelitish nation, the subject of his longer discourses, only here (ver. 3; xxxi. 27), and in the second discourse (chs. iii.-vi.), which belongs to the time of Josiah.—Ver. 5. This for, which is logically indeed superfluous but not incorrect (ver. 4 announces the entirety of the following discourse as God's word and וְ, ver. 5, introduces the particulars), has rhetorically the character of a certain solemn breadth. With dramatic vividness the prophet transports us into the midst of the future, which he describes, causing those who are concerned to be the speakers together with himself. It is clear that the day of terror which he describes cannot be the day of Jerusalem (Ps. cxxxvii. 7). For (1) the day of the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans cannot be represented as at the same time a day of salvation for all Israel; (2) "the great day of the Lord like which there is no other" always designates the divine judgment in its highest and most comprehensive sense. For even when Joel, who is the first to speak of the great and fearful days (ii. 11), understands by it primarily the day of the devastation by locusts, he yet beholds in this special act only the first act of the great drama of judgments (iii. 4), with which he first connects the idea of the redemption and restoration of Israel (iv. 1, 7). After him Hosea speaks of the great day of Jezreel (ii. 2), on which Judah and Israel will return again united under their common head. Afterwards the judicial activity of God is mirrored before the eyes of Isaiah in the judgment on Babylon (xiii. 6), the return of the whole people being again connected with it (xiv. 1 sqq.). Next before Jeremiah finally, the idea of the "day of the Lord" forms the central point of Zephaniah's prophecy, and if he also understands primarily by the "great day" (i. 14) the day of the judgment of Jerusalem, yet he also regards all the judicial acts of God as elements or stages of the whole, and to him also the consummation of the judgment is the turning-point of the deliverance and restoration of all Israel (iii. 10 sqq.; 20). After Jeremiah there is Malachi only who speaks in express words of "the great and dreadful day of the Lord" (iv. 5).—No deliverance. Comp. vi. 14; viii. 11; Ezek. vii. 25; xiii. 10, 16.—Ask now, etc. Comp. xviii. 13. The prophet portrays with drastic vividness the effects of the terror by saying that he saw men behaving like women in the pangs of childbirth—pressing their hands on their loins. Comp. Isa. xxi. 3; Jer. vi. 21; xxii. 23; xlix. 21; l. 43.—That day. From that (הַיּוֹם) we see (1) that the prophet means a day not immediately impending, but (2) the same as was spoken of in vers. 5 and 6.—And it will be a time of trouble, etc. Israel also is not unaffected by the sufferings of that time (comp. Matth. xxiv. 21, 22); but for them it is only a crisis, which leads to salvation.

Vers. 8 and 9. And it shall come to pass . . . raise up for them. The deliverance announced in the concluding words of ver. 7 is described more particularly. It has its negative and its positive side. The nation will no longer serve strangers (ver. 8) but their God alone, and the King granted them by God, the Messiah (ver. 9).—Thy bonds. Comp. ii. 20; v. 5.—Enslave. Comp. xxvii. 7; xxv. 14.—Serve Jehovah. For Israel to serve his God is at the same time his first duty and the fundamental condition of salvation. This salvation is to be communicated by the anointed of the Lord, the second David. The Messiah is called David, not merely as a descendant of David still called by his name, but as a real David in the highest degree. As David was the founder of the earthly throne of David, so the Messiah as the fulfiller is the founder and occupant of the eternal throne of David. Jeremiah supports himself here chiefly on Hos. iii. 5, coll. Isa. lv. 3, while after him Ezekiel (xxxiv. 23, 24; xxxvii. 24, 25) leans on his predecessors, especially Jeremiah. The conception of the second David is analogous to that of the second Adam (1 Cor. xv. 45 sqq.). It is therefore altogether different from the Rabbinical doctrine of a double Messiah, Ben Joseph and Ben David, (comp. OHLER in HERZOG, Real-Enc., IX, S. 440; BUXTORF Lex., p. 1273) with which HAEVERNICK seems (Comm. on Ezek., S. 557) to confound the Christian conception. It is accordingly clear that we must protest against the lower view, that Jeremiah is here speaking of a Davidic dynasty (SANCTUS), or of Zerubbabel (GROTIUS; is David vocatur et hic et Ezek. xxxiv. 23; xxxvii. 24, nimirum sicut a Ptolemæo orti Ptolemæi, a Cesare Cesares), or indeed of a personally resuscitated David (V. AMMON, Fortd. d. Chr. I., S. 178; STRAUSS, Glaubensl. II., S. 80). This latter conception is imputed by HIRTIG to Ezekiel (ad loc. S. 245) as having thus interpreted the וְיָשׁוּב of Jeremiah. As to the rest comp. Comm. on ver. 21 and xxiii. 5; HENGSTENBERG, Christol. [Eng. Tr. II., p. 413 sqq.]

Vers. 10 and 11. But fear thou not . . unpunished. GRAF has called attention to the circumstance that these words are addressed to the people living in exile "in opposition to those delivered in ver. 9." More strictly we should say, that vers. 8 and 9. announce the salvation objectively (whence also Israel is spoken of predominantly in the 3d person), but in ver. 10 the subjective application follows in the exhortation to be comforted and not to fear, but yet with a repetition of the objective basis. It is not however to be denied that the adversative rendering "thou however" is not appropriate. MEIER translates "so fear thou nothing," evidently not accurately, but in the correct feeling that the connection requires an inferential rather than an adversative sentence. Comp. Isa. xlv. 1, 2, which passage certainly occurred to the prophet, the words "fear not my servant Jacob" being taken from it verbatim, and we are thus led to think that instead of אַתָּה here we should read אֲנִי with which the passage in Isa. commences. The latter certainly would correspond better with the connection. HIRTZIG and MOVERS find in these two verses the idiom of Isaiah II., and would therefore regard it as an interpolation by him. GRAF however has satisfactorily shown that with the exception of the expression עָנִי עָנִי (I say, with the exception of "אֶל-תִּירָאֵי") all the rest betrays the older, and specifically Jeremiah's, idiom. Why should not that evident quotation from Isa. xlv. 2 be just as good an instance for the priority of the alleged Isaiah II. in relation to the genuine Jeremiah? The union of Judah and Israel, which is here spoken of from ver. 3 onwards, may have reminded the prophet of that passage in Isaiah, which declares this union. Other declarations of Isaiah, as li. 7, may also have been in the mind of our prophet. Perhaps also passages like xlix. 12; lx. 4, 9.—Rest and be tranquil. Comp. xlviii. 11.—Undisturbed. Comp. rems. on vii. 33.—For I am with thee. Comp. xv. 20; xlii. 11.—Chastise thee. The expression is found in x. 24 in the same sense. Whether in Isa. xxviii. 26 also is disputable. On לֹא comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5, b.—And not leave thee, etc. From Exod. xxxiv. 7; the expression is found in Numb. xiv. 18, in Nah. i. 3, and here.—Comp. further xli. 27, 28, where these two verses are reproduced.

2. The turn of affairs: the Lord for the chastised and against the chastiser.

XXX. 12-17.

- 12 For thus saith Jehovah, thy wound is incurable,¹ Mortal thy stroke.
- 13 There is no one who undertaketh thy case,
For thy wound thou hast no remedies of bandages.²
- 14 All thy lovers have forgotten thee;
They ask not after thee;
For I have smitten them with the stroke of an enemy,
With cruel chastisement for the greatness of thy guilt;
Because thy sins are innumerable.³
- 15 Why criest thou over thy wound,
That thy sorrow is incurable?⁴
Because of the greatness of thy guilt,
Because thy sins are innumerable, I have done this.
- 16 Therefore all who devour thee shall be devoured,
And all thy oppressors shall go away together into captivity.
And they that spoil thee⁵ shall be a spoil,
And all thy plunderers will I give up to plunder.
- 17 For I will restore health unto thee,
And I will heal thee of thy wounds, saith Jehovah;
For they call thee "Outcast,"
"Zion, which no man asketh after."

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 12.—The construction of אָנֹכִי with לֹא is found here only. Perhaps Nah. iii. 19 was in the prophet's mind. The thought lying at the basis of this construction is: insanabile vulnere tuo, or more exactly: incurable is the predicate which belongs to your wound.

² Ver. 13.—As כִּי־נֶאֱמַר does not agree with כִּי־נֶאֱמַר, I refer it, with GRAF, to what follows, in the sense of vulnus (that which is wrapped in bandages, as in Hos. v. 13, רַפְּאוֹת תַּעֲנִי = medicamenta tiganinis, dressings. Comp. xli. 11; Ezek.

xxx. 21. [A. V.: There is none to plead thy cause, that thou mayest be bound up. Others render: for thy cure thou hast, etc. HENDERSON: "I take רפואת to be a nominative absolute: as for medicines."—S. R. A.]

³ Ver. 14.—Here as afterwards in ver. 15, a whole sentence is twice dependent on לָךְ. (Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 9).

⁴ Ver. 15.—[A. V.: Why criest thou for thine affliction? Thy sorrow is incurable. WORDSWORTH after EWALD, UMBREIT, GRAF: Why criest thou for thine affliction, that thy sorrow is incurable.—S. R. A.]

⁵ Ver. 16.—ךִּשְׁתִּי. The Chethibh is to be punctuated כִּשְׁתִּי. Since the root כִּשְׁתִּי does not occur in Hebrew, this form is to be explained as an Aramaism for כִּשְׁתִּי, Keri כִּשְׁתִּי (l. 11; Isa. xvii. 14).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This whole strophe is most closely connected with ver. 11, and explains the three thoughts expressed in this verse: that Zion is chastised according to its deserts, but is not to be destroyed, while destruction shall be the lot of its enemies. Thus vers. 12-15 are a commentary on the words "chastise thee according to justice" in ver. 11. For it is here set forth that Israel is given over to severe sickness without a protector and physician (vers. 12 and 13), that all friends have forsaken the people so severely chastised by God, (ver. 14), which people moreover have no right to complain of such treatment, for the Lord has done this on account of their sins (ver. 15). The sentence therefore, etc. (ver. 16), refers back to the declaration in the 11th verse that the Lord will make an utter end of the nations, among whom He scattered Israel. The right of retribution is to be exercised on them in the fullest measure. Ver. 17 finally is connected with the third point in ver. 11, viz., that Israel is to be healed of his wounds after he has been apparently outcast and forgotten.

Vers. 12-15. For thus saith Jehovah . . . I have done this.—For introduces the proof that Israel will not really be left unpunished, but will be severely chastised, so that he will only not be utterly destroyed.—Mortal thy stroke. Comp. x. 19; xiv. 17. Ver. 13. There is no one, etc. Comp. v. 28; xxii. 16.—Thy lovers. Comp. xxii. 20, 22.—For . . . stroke of an enemy. When a man is forsaken by God his fellow-men also forsake him.—For the greatness, etc. In these and the following words to the end of ver. 15 lies the confirmation of according to justice, ver. 11—v. 6; xiii. 22.—Why criest thou? Israel has no right to complain of severe treatment. The Lord deals with him "according to justice," ver. 11.

Ver. 16. Therefore all . . . give up to plunder.—Therefore has no sense if we refer it to what immediately precedes. For it cannot be said that the enemies are to be destroyed, because the Lord has punished His people according to the greatness of their guilt. For if only strict justice prevailed, Israel deserved the same punishment as, or even severer punishment than the heathen. Comp. ii. 10 sqq. I therefore refer Therefore to ver. 11, to which this whole passage is only a corollary, and particularly to the words Though I make a full end of all the nations, etc. Israel's guilt is in the past, and cause of the present calamity, hence for in ver. 12. The destruction of the heathen is future, and the effect of the judgment pronounced by God in ver. 11, hence therefore, ver. 16.—All who devour thee. Comp. rems. on ii. 3; x. 25.—Go away together, etc. Comp. xxii. 22.—Shall be a spoil. Comp. [Vers. 12-15. "So desperate were the circumstances of the Jews in Babylon while enduring the punishment God had inflicted upon them for their crimes, that no human interposition which they would naturally expect, could avail for their deliverance. Egypt, Syria, Tyre, etc., which had formerly been their confederates, were all laid prostrate by the same haughty conqueror whose chains they themselves wore. They are accordingly represented under the metaphor of a body full of wounds, left entirely destitute of medical aid." HENDERSON.—S. R. A.]

3. The consummation of Salvation.

XXX. 18-24.

- 18 Thus saith Jehovah,
Behold, I will turn the captivity of Jacob's tents¹
And have mercy on his dwelling-places;
And [the] city² shall be built on its own heap,³ [of ruins]
And the palace shall be inhabited according to its right.⁴
- 19 And out of them shall proceed thanksgiving,

- And the voice of them that rejoice ;
 And I will increase them, and they shall not be diminished,
 And honor them, and they shall not be small.
 20 Their children also shall be as aforetime,
 And their congregation shall be established before me ;
 And I will punish all their oppressors.
 21 And their ruler shall be of themselves,
 And their prince shall proceed from the midst of them ;
 And I will bring him near and he shall approach me,
 For who is he, who would have pledged his heart to approach me? saith Jehovah.
 22 And ye shall be my people,
 And I will be your God.
 23 Behold, a tempest of Jehovah, fury is loose,
 Whirl-winds⁵—it will roll on the head of the ungodly.
 24 The fierceness of Jehovah's anger will not return,
 Till he do and execute the plans of his heart.
 In the end of days ye will consider it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 18.—אֶת־הָעִיר, poetical for house. Comp. iv. 20; 1 Kings viii. 66; Job xxi. 8.
² Ver. 18.—עִיר, without the article, therefore, not the city κατ' ἐξοχήν, i. e., Jerusalem, but the city generally, that is, any city.
⁴ Ver. 18.—עַל-מִשְׁפַּתוֹ יֵשֵׁב. HIRTZIG: The palace will stand in its proper place. GRAF [and HENDERSON]: shall be inhabited in its proper place. Both say that after an appropriate manner would be בְּמִשְׁפַּתוֹ. But the phrase may also mean according to its right. Comp. Deut. xvii. 11.—יֵשֵׁב is more than stand. It is here used intransitively as in xvii. 6, 25; Isa. xiii. 20; Ezek. xxvi. 20; Zech. vii. 7 (comp. NÄGELSB. Gr., § 63, 1), but the meaning of inhabit remains. If, however, we take the phrase=upon, in its place, then the idea of inhabit is superfluous, as HIRTZIG has rightly felt. I therefore consider "it will be inhabited as becomes it," as the correct rendering. A palace will not be inhabited as a beggar's hut. The prophet wrote עַל, through occasion of עַל-הַתְּלָה, but the second עַל must not therefore be regarded as being as local in signification as the first.
⁵ Ver. 23.—Instead of בְּתַהוֹמֵי הָעִיר, xxiii. 9, we read here בְּתַהוֹמֵי הָעִיר by which the paronomasia with תְּהוֹלָה is destroyed. The forcible בְּתַהוֹמֵי at the close is also wanting. As to בְּתַהוֹמֵי הָעִיר, this littp. occurs only here and in Hos. vii. 14 and 1 Kings xvii. 26. In Hosea the meaning "to alarm one's self," is most recommended, in 1 Kings xvii. that of "commorari" is necessarily required by the connection. In this passage the commentators vacillate greatly; an abiding storm (HENGSTENBERG); a rolling storm from גָּרַר, gargarizare (MILLER); turbo cuncta abripicis from גָּרַר, rapere, (GESEN. Thes., p. 305); a whirling storm, from גָּרַר=גָּרַר volvere. The last meaning would come nearest the original בְּתַהוֹמֵי הָעִיר. Comp. FUERST, s. v., גָּרַר, III. and גָּרַר.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The restored nation will in every respect present the picture of a flourishing commonwealth. The ruined dwellings will be rebuilt (ver. 18), praise and rejoicing will be heard from them, the number of the inhabitants and the honor of the State will be great (ver. 19); the latter will regain its former importance and preserve it, but all its oppressors shall be chastised (ver. 20); the ruler of the State shall no more be a stranger, but a native, who will at the same time stand in the closest relation to Jehovah (ver. 21); the people will be God's people, and the Lord his people's God (ver. 22). All this, however, applies only to the Israel which submits to the Lord. The day of the Lord will break upon the ungodly (vers. 5-7) like a tempest and destroy them (vers. 23 and 24).

Vers. 18-20. Thus saith Jehovah . . . oppressors. It is evident that the phrase turn the captivity may be taken here in a figurative sense, from its application to the ruined buildings. Comp. rems. on xxix. 4.—GRAF refers out of them, ver. 19, to the allies, HIRTZIG to the palaces, but in the sense that he regards the Israelites as the subject of the egression, in the sense of xxxi. 4, 13; xxxiii. 10, 11.—The latter could not well be excluded. But why should not the sound of sacred joy be heard from the dwellings of Israel in any sense, and therefore in the sense, that it proceeds from those who are within? This is at the same time a further adornment of the houses themselves, to which, in a collective sense, out of them is to be referred. These thus become, as it were, instruments of sacred music.—Isa. li. 3.—Of them that rejoice. Comp. xv. 17; xxxi. 4.—Diminished. Comp. xxix. 6.—As aforetime. As formerly "sub Davide et Salomone rerum statu florentissimo." ROSENMUELLER. Comp. Ps. lxxiv. 2; Lam. v. 21.—Their congregation. Comp. 2 Sam. vii. 10; Ps. cii. 29; Prov. xvi. 12; 1 Kings ii. 12.

Vers. 21 and 22. And their ruler . . . your

God. The description of the glorious future is crowned by the declaration of the relation of the prince to Jehovah. He is called מְלִיךְ, king, in ver. 9, here אֲדָרִי, ruler, and מְשִׁל, prince. This is not a low predicate, as J. D. MICHAELIS supposes, but a high one. For not every king may be thus called. There are counterfeit kings (Eccles. iv. 13; x. 16). This king, however, is אֲדָרִי, a predicate which is given to the King of all kings (Ps. viii. 2, 10; xciii. 4), and מְשִׁל is on his shoulder (Isa. ix. 5), and the key of David (Isa. xxii. 22), that he may open and no man shut, and shut and no man open. Comp. Mic. v. 1. This powerful ruler is of Israel's flesh and blood, no foreigner, no representative of the empire hostile to God's people. And not merely is this declared, but also that proceeding from the midst of the people, he may approach unto Jehovah. The mediatorial position of the king is here announced.—Him after bring refers to the king. HIRTZIG has correctly remarked that altogether too little would be said of the king if his Israelitish origin merely were set forth, but besides this negative reason, we have also in our rendering of כִּנְנוּ from themselves, and מִקְרָבוֹ from their midst, a positive necessity of referring the suffix to the king. 'Ο μεσιτης ἐνὸς οὐκ ἔστιν, Gal. iii. 20. He proceeds from the midst of the people and approaches God. An intimation has been rightly found in bring near and approach of priestly attributes (Exod. xxiv. 2; Numb. xvi. 5). The sentence with For states the reason why the Lord leads the prince to Himself. The reason is a negative one; there is no other who would be capable of entering into this relation of nearness and communion to God. All here depends especially on the correct understanding of the expression עָרַב אֶת־לְבָבוֹ, pledge his heart. The verb עָרַב, with the accusative, may signify two things only. Either "to stand, be a surety for some one, to vouch, guarantee" (comp. Gen. xliiii. 9 coll. xlv. 32. עָרַבְתָּ spopondit pro alieno, Prov. xi. 15; xx. 16; xxvii. 13 coll. Job xvii. 3; Isa. xxxviii. 14), or "to pledge something." For the latter meaning we can appeal only to Neh. v. 3. The meanings "applicare (Vulg.), convertere (Syr.), lubentem reddere (so in sense the LXX., Chald. and others), accommodare, formare (CALVIN)," have no grammatical basis, and are all occasioned by לָבוֹ. If we adhere to the two meanings which are proved, the second, as we have shown, rests only in the authority of one passage in the book of Nehemiah. It is not, however, to be used directly, but the meaning must first be derived from it "to stake, risk, venture." לָב heart, must then be taken as=שֵׁשׁ, soul, life. GRAF has adduced analogies in favor of this (iv. 18 coll. iv. 10; Exod. ix. 14; Ps. lxxxiv. 3 coll. xvi. 9; xxxi. 10; lxiii. 2), but of these only the first is of consequence, and even these passages only prove that the physical heart may also be designated as the aim of the sword which is threatening the life. There may be other cases where the connection allows the heart to be set for the life, but this is not the case here. Every one feels that here to say "heart" for "life," would be harsh. I therefore think that we must take עָרַב in the sense of "to be bail, to stand for another." We should then have to translate: for who stands bail for his heart, to approach to me? Ought we to take לָב in the sense of "courage" as HIRTZIG does? There are passages where it gets this meaning from the context (Gen. xlii. 28; 1 Sam. xvii. 32; 2 Sam. vii. 27; xvii. 10; Job xli. 15), but this is not its direct meaning. I think then that it must be taken here in its general sense as the seat of moral volition. The prophet wishes to say: Who can stand for his heart, that it approach me? and this can certainly be taken in the sense; that it has the will, the power, the courage, to approach me? The point of the thought is evidently in the antithesis, bring him and pledge his heart, i. e., between the divine causality and human spontaneity. No man can undertake to be a mediator between God and man in his own strength. For if one should even have the courage to begin this difficult undertaking, he cannot vouch for himself that he will have the power to carry it out. The nearer the man came to the glory of God, the lower would his courage fall. God alone confers the power to approach him, and he will confer it on him whom he has chosen to be a mediator. In so far now as approaching God is represented as something unattainable by human strength, it is clear that the prophet has not the ordinary priests' approaching to God in mind. The answer to the question: Who is he who would give his heart as surety, to approach me?—must evidently be: No one. Now not every Israelite indeed, but every normally created member of the priestly or high priestly family would be justified and authorized to approach God as a priest in the sense of the Mosaic law. Even these, however, are excluded by the no one, which the question requires as answer. Consequently the promised mediator can only be an extraordinary personage. Our text gives no further information, as to how the divine causality renders it possible for him to approach God, for this may be done in different ways, from without or from within, in a mechanical or an organic way.

Ver. 22. And ye, etc. The thought certainly accords well with ver. 21, since the inward communion between God and the people, which is predicted in ver. 22, is not otherwise possible, even in view of the question, For who is he? etc., than by a mediator; it is however the necessary glorious result of his ministry (comp. Heb. viii). Since, however, vers. 23 and 24 are decidedly to be regarded as a later addition (Vid. infra), the thought of our verse appears to be repeated immediately afterwards in xxxi. 1. Such a repetition of these words in immediate sequence is indeed surprising, but not impossible. Since in both instances the words are highly appropriate, in the first as the close of the prophecy relating to the whole, in the second as the beginning of that relating to the first main division, and since further in xxxi. 1 the inversion of the clauses of the sentence is designed to avoid monotony, I regard it as probable that the words are authentic in both instances. If they are to be accounted spurious in one case, I would vindicate the genuineness of xxxi. 1, since here they occur in a characteristic setting. Observe the words to all the families of Israel, which evidently correspond to concerning Israel and concerning Judah, xxxi. 4, and give xxxi. 1 the appearance of being a superscription to the following section.

Vers. 23 and 24. Behold, a tempest . . . consider it. The words are repeated with slight variations from xxiii. 19, 20. As eh. xxx. and xxxi. belong to the reign of Josiah (iii. 6. Comp. Introd.), and the prophecy, xxiii. 9-40, from which our verses are taken, cannot have originated before the first four years of Jehoiakim, it is clear that verses 23 and 24 cannot have stood originally in this place. Did then Jeremiah himself add them subsequently? I do not regard this as probable, since the words do not correspond to the general character of these chapters. These contain only a prediction of salvation; they represent the brightest and most joyful, we might say, the only untroubled moment in Jeremiah's life (comp. on xxxi. 26). The verses 23 and 24 accordingly have the effect of a dissonance. Whence, in such a time as the prophet describes, are הַשָּׁעִים whirl-winds to come (comp. xxxi. 18, 19)? And what thoughts of anger is Jehovah to carry out at a time when He has already turned the captivity of His people? I regard it as not impossible that some later writer thought himself compelled to separate the essentially equivalent words in xxx. 22 and xxxi. 1 by sentences which he deemed appropriate.

- 4 Again will I build thee and thou shalt be built, Virgin Israel;
Again shalt thou adorn thyself with thy tabrets,

² Ver. 2.—In להרגיעו the prophet evidently alludes to Deut. xxviii. 65. This Hiphil denotes quietem agere, to make a rest (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 18, 3). There is indeed no further instance to adduce in favor of the meaning quietum facere, yet, apart from its grammatical admissibility, it rests on a good foundation, partly in the etymology (comp. כָּרְגַע, Jer. vi. 10; מְרַנְנָה, Isa. xxviii. 12) partly in the connection.—On the anticipation of the object by the suffix. EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

According to xxx. 4 the prophet has in the previous passage been addressing Israel and Judah. Now he turns to Israel alone, as far as xxxi. 22, then in vers. 23-26 to Judah alone, finally in vers. 27-40 to the entire Israelitish nation. After the comprehensive promise (ver. 1), which now allots the consolation, assured in xxx. 22 to the entire nation, especially to the ten tribes; he announces that the residue of Israel has found grace, and that the Lord arises to bring it to rest (ver. 2). The people see the Lord approaching from a distance, and telling them that he loves them with an everlasting love, of which the previous respite was a proof (ver. 3). Then follows the consolatory promise that the Virgin Israel shall be rebuilt, that she shall again go forth in cheerful dances (ver. 4), that vineyards shall again be planted in Samaria, and those who have planted shall enjoy the fruit (ver. 5). And not only this. Israel will also again have recourse to the national Sanctuary, and go up for worship to Jerusalem.

Ver. 1. At that time . . . my people. The section begins as the previous one had closed. That glorious consolation is again proclaimed specially to the ten tribes, the most ruined and almost lost portions of the people. The alterations and extensions occasioned by its position in the beginning and the inversion mark at the same time the distinction in reference to xxx. 22.

Vers. 2-6. Thus saith Jehovah . . . our God. It is impossible that there can be a reference here to those who were delivered from the captivity in Egypt. Apart from particular objections, the ten tribes did not then obtain a special deliverance, and the whole description relates to the future, as is clear from up! to bring, etc., and still more plainly from vers. 4-6. The declarations of these latter verses only particularize what was said in vers. 2 and 3. The perfects in vers. 2 and 3 are also prophetical.—Has found grace. Israel had fallen into disfavor, now he has again found favor. In the desert the Lord finds the remnant spared by the sword of the enemy. It is certain that the prophet means the north-eastern desert situated between Palestine and the Euphrates. For the escaped of the sword, mentioned in li. 50 are not those which Jer. here has in mind. There he is speaking of Jews, here of those pertaining to the ten tribes. The prophet is thinking of them as they were during the period of their disfavor, oppressed and persecuted by enemies and driven out into the desert. There, in their deepest distress, the Lord finds them. We have however no right to deny that this prophetic picture of the future has its corresponding historical reality in an external, literal sense. Ver. 3. A dramatic change of persons! The people speak. They see the Lord appear from afar. For He had kept Himself afar off, He had indeed quite disappeared from the sight of the people. Now He is again visible, of course from Zion. Comp. Ps. xiv. 7; Isa. xlix. 9sq.—And I love. The connection of what Jehovah says with what the people say by means of Vau, and (HITZIG appropriately compares 1 Ki. xx. 34) makes the impression that the Lord at once agrees to what is said, confirms it, makes indeed glorious additions to it. Vau therefore = and indeed (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 111, 1, a) is connected with a collateral causal significance (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 110, 1, c), since that eternal love is the only ground of the appearance.—On the subject-matter comp. Deut. vii. 13; Isa. liv. 7, 8; 1 Ki. x. 9.—Build, etc. Build here is to be taken not merely in the sense of building walls, but of restitutio in integrum. Comp. Ps. xxviii. 5; cii. 17; Jer. xii. 16. [“This metaphor, which may appear harsh in English, is to be explained from the use of the Hebrew word banah, to build, as applied to the building up a family of sons (banim) and daughters (banoth) who are like living stones of the household, built up from the mother, wedded as a Virgin Bride to her husband.” WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]—Adorn thyself, etc. Comp. iv. 30. The kettle-drum, [or timbrel] is here designated as pertaining to the ornaments of a woman who appears in festal apparel.—Comp. xxxi. 19.—To the rebuilt cities and the restored commonwealth, it is also necessary in order that the people may be happy, that there be agriculture, especially the culture of the vine, the fruit of which rejoiceth the heart of man.—Mountains of Samaria (comp. 1 Ki. xvi. 24) are the mountains of the northern kingdom generally, in so far as they permitted the culture of the vine. Comp. Jud. ix. 27.—Hos. ii. 17.—Enjoy the fruit. Jeremiah here refers to the legal enactment, Lev. xix. 13-25, that the fruit of newly planted trees should not be eaten at all in the first three years, and in the fourth year they should be holy unto the Lord; not until the fifth year should they be enjoyed ad libitum (comp. SAALSCHÜTZ, Mos. Recht. S. 168, 9). This appropriation permitted from the 5th year onwards is designated by the expression הִלֵּל profanare, in usum profanum convertere. He who has planted a vineyard and has not yet enjoyed the fruit of it is free from service in war, Deut. xx. 6. It is also one of the punishments threatened to the ungodly man that he shall plant a vineyard but another shall make it common (Deut. xxviii. 30). In antithesis to this passage it is here promised as an element of blessing that the planter shall also be the profaner or partaker. (פִּתְּוֹלָה). Comp. Isa. lxxv. 21.—For there is a day, etc. All this blessing promised to Israel in vers. 4 and 5 shall and will be imparted to them on this account, that the people themselves will return to the service of Jehovah as of old. פֹּי For, ver. 6, thus gives the reason of Jehovah's action (vers. 4 and 5) in the behavior of Israel.—Watchmen. There were not only watchmen stationed on lofty eminences (comp. 1 Ki. xvii. 9; xviii. 8) to announce danger from enemies (iv. 6, 19; vi. 1, etc.) but also to announce the new moons and feasts. Comp. SAALSCHÜTZ, Mos. Recht., S. 387, 401.—The cry then, up to Jerusalem to worship Jehovah! sounds again as before the separation. Israel and Judah are again united in the Lord.

2. The Execution.

- 7 For thus saith Jehovah, Shout joyfully over¹ Jacob,
And exult² over the head of the nations! Sing praises³ aloud and say:
Deliver, O Jehovah, thy people, the remnant of Israel.
- 8 Behold, I bring them from the North country,
And collect them from the ends of the earth.
Among them are the blind and lame,
The pregnant and the parturient together;
A great assemblage shall they return hither.
- 9 With weeping shall they come, and with supplication.
I conduct them;⁴ I lead them to water-brooks,
By a straight way in which they shall not stumble:
For I am Israel's father,
And Ephraim is my first-born son.
- 10 Hear Jehovah's word, ye nations,
And proclaim it to the isles afar off;⁵ and say:
He that scattered Israel will collect him,
And guard him as a shepherd his flock.
- 11 For Jehovah has redeemed Jacob,
And liberated him from the hand of him who was too strong for him.
- 12 And they will come and shout on the summit of Zion,
And stream hither to the blessing⁶ of Jehovah,
For the corn and the new wine and the oil,
And for young lambs and calves:
And their soul shall be as a watered garden;
And they shall not languish any more.⁷
- 13 Then will the virgin rejoice in the dance,
And young men with the aged together;
And I will turn their mourning into joy,
And comfort them after their sorrow.
- 14 And I will satiate the soul of the priests with fat,
And my people shall be full of the blessing, saith Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After in the previous strophe the Lord has made known His purpose to liberate and restore Israel, the present strophe goes a step farther.

It contains a summons at the head of each of its two halves. The first (ver. 7) is addressed to the Israelites themselves, and exhorts them, after the Lord in the foregoing verses, 1-6, has made known His gracious determination, to approach Him now with petitions for its actual execution.

It is also at once promised that the Lord will respond to these petitions (vers. 8 and 9), for in these verses it is described how they will accomplish their journey from the North country and the most remote lands, a journey which will set in the most glorious light the filial relation of Israel to his God. At the head of the second half (vers. 10-14) is a summons to all nations to hear and proclaim the decree which God has formed with respect to His people, that, namely, they shall be liberated (vers. 10, 11) and be brought home to a glorious life in joy and abundance on their native soil (vers. 12-14).

Vers. 7-9. For thus saith . . . first-born son.—For refers not merely to ver. 7 but to all that follows. All that is subsequently said of the realization of the divine intentions is a proof of the truth of the promise given in vers. 1-6. The summons to exult joyfully is addressed to the individual members of the holy nation. Who else will then supplicate for Israel? The antithesis to ver. 10 also favors this view. There the heathen are summoned not to pray for Israel but to proclaim the purpose which the Lord has formed on this account. Israel is called the head of the nations. The prophet depends in this expression on those passages in the Pentateuch where Israel is called the holy nation, the treasure above all people, (Ex. xix. 5, 6; Lev. xx. 24, 26; Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; xxvi. 18), the great nation, to which the Deity approaches (Deut. iv. 7, 8), the people of inheritance (Deut. iv. 20), the highest above all nations (Deut. xxvi. 19); further on prophetic passages which designate the nation as chief of the nations (Am. vi. 1 coll. iii. 2) as one nation in the earth (2 Sam. vii. 23 coll. Numb. xxiii. 9; Deut. xxxiii. 28).—Deliver, etc. It is evident that this is meant as an earnest petition from the accusative thy people. By His promise in vers. 1-6 the Lord has given the Israelites the right and the courage to supplicate in comfort and in joy for the redemption of their nation. There is, it is true, an assonance in this word to the words of praise הוֹשִׁיעָה נָּפְשֵׁנוּ [Hosanna. A.V.: save now. Comp. Matth. xxi. 9] (Ps. cxviii. 25) which are however not merely words of praise, but according to their verbal significance, are at the same time a petition, and in so far as they are that form of petition which is sure of being heard are at the same time praise. Vers. 8 and 9 then contain the comforting promise that the petition will be heard. It is as if the Lord in ver. 7 had only provoked the petition, in order to announce His readiness to realize the promise given in vers. 2-6.—From the North country. As the אֲשֶׁר בָּרוּךְ came from the North, the אֲשֶׁר must also be brought back from the North country. Comp. iii. 12, 18; xvi. 15.—Ends of the earth. Comp. vi. 22; xxv. 32; 1. 41.—Among them, etc. The deliverance is to comprise the whole people. The weak and frail will then not be excluded, but be conducted in a manner suited to their circumstances. With tears of joy and contrition, with prayer and supplication to the Lord their God will they retrace their way. Comp. iii. 21; 1. 4. As in Ps. xlv. 15; Isa. lv. 12, a being led forth with gladness and with peace is spoken of, so here it is said that the Lord will lead Israel with supplication, i. e., in the continued spirit and practice of prayer. Only thus is the symmetry of the construction preserved, according to which a more particular definition is to be given to each verb by means of a prepositional expression.—To water-brooks, in a level and comfortable path, are they to be brought. Comp. Isa. xlvi. 21.—This careful guidance is truly paternal. No wonder; for Jehovah is Israel's father (comp. Deut. xxxii. 6; Isa. lxiii. 16; Jer. iii. 19; Herzog, R.-Enc., XVII. S. 252), and Ephraim is His first-born son. This predicate is ascribed to the whole nation. Exod. iv. 22 coll. Deut. xiv. 1. Here however Ephraim is purposely designated as first-born, in allusion to the preference, which Jacob awarded to the sons of Joseph (Gen. xlix. 22 coll. 4), and which is distinctly defined in 1 Chron. v. 2, where it is said that Judah obtained the dignity of chief ruler (נָּגִיד), but Joseph the birthright (בְּכֹרֶת). Comp. DELITSCH on Gen. xlix. 3, 4; HERZOG, R.-Enc. XIV., S. 709.

Vers. 10-14. Hear . . . saith Jehovah. The nations themselves which held Israel captive and mocked at his expulsion (xv. 4; xxiv. 9; xxix. 18), must proclaim the purpose of God to liberate His people. We are here reminded of the edict of Cyrus (Ezr. i. 1 sqq.). This proclamation by those hitherto in power is itself a new and important step towards the realization of the promise given in vers. 1-6.—Isles. Comp. EXEGEREMS on ii. 10; xxv. 22.—Scattered. Comp. xv. 7-xxiii. 3; xxix. 14.—Observe that the prophet, as in vers. 8 and 9 he had described the glory of the return, so now he portrays the glory of the arrival and the prosperity to be expected afterwards.—For the corn. Comp. Deut. xxviii. 51; Joel i. 10; ii. 19, etc.—Watered garden. Isa. lviii. 11.—Then will the virgin, etc. Comp. ver. 4. The dances of virgins with men according to our custom are not to be thought of, for such dancing was not practised by the ancients generally and especially not by the Hebrews. (Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc. XV., S. 414 sqq.). Men's dances also occur (comp. Jud. ix. 27; 2 Sam. vi. 14), but in general dancing was regarded as something particularly appropriated to women and especially virgins. (Comp. Exod. xv. 20; Jud. xxi. 21; xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6; WINER, R.-W.-B. s. v. Tanz). Hence the joy in the dance is to be referred to the virgin alone. When it is further said that youths and old men would rejoice with each other, this is to express the general diffusion of the joy. Not only youth, the period addicted to joyousness, but even age shall be infected by the joy, so that all ages and sexes will participate in it. And every rank also! Hence the priests are rendered especially prominent, their share in the sacrifices (Lev. vii. 32-34; ix. 21) being set forth as particularly fat, i. e. ample and dainty (the eating of fat being strictly forbidden, Lev. vii. 23-25).

3. The threefold Turn.

XXXI. 15-22.

- 15 Thus saith Jehovah: A voice is heard in Ramah,
Lamentation and most bitter crying;
Rachel weeps for her children,
Refusing¹ to be comforted for her children, for they are no more.²
- 16 Thus saith Jehovah: Restrain thy voice from weeping,
And thine eyes from tears:
For there is reward for thy work, saith Jehovah;
And they shall return from the land of the enemy.
- 17 There is also hope for thy future, saith Jehovah;
And children³ shall return to their border.
- 18 I have surely heard Ephraim bemoaning himself;
Thou hast chastised me,
And I allowed myself to be chastised like an untrained bullock:
Turn thou me again, that I may turn;
For thou art Jehovah my God.
- 19 For after my revolt,⁴ I repent;
And after I have learned to know myself,⁵ I smite on the thigh:
I blush, I am also ashamed
That I have borne the reproach of my youth.
- 20 Is then Ephraim a favourite⁶ son to me or a bosom-child,⁷
That whenever I speak against him I must still remember him?
Therefore my bowels heave towards him;
I must have pity on him, saith Jehovah.
- 21 Erect for thyself signals, set up for thyself poles,⁸
Turn thy mind to the highway, the way thou wentest!
Return, O virgin Israel,
Return to these thy cities.
- 22 How long wilt thou turn hither and thither,⁹ thou backsliding daughter?¹⁰
For Jehovah has created a new thing on earth:—
The woman shall turn the man.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 15.—מֵאַנְהָה. Comp. iii. 3; v. 3; viii. 5; xv. 18.

² Ver. 15.—כִּי אֵינָנִי. As in xi. 4 the plural pronoun is referred to a singular, regarded collectively, so here, the case being reversed, the singular pronoun is referred to a plural, regarded as a unity. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 61, 1; Ps. v. 9; Job xxiv. 24; פְּלֵהָה, viii. 6, etc.

³ Ver. 17.—The article is wanting before בְּנֵי, comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 71, 3.

⁴ Ver. 19.—אֲחֵרִי שׁוּבִי. This שׁוּבִי has been commonly taken in the same sense as in ver. 18 [A. V.: Surely after that I was turned], which has given rise to great obscurity and to arbitrary attempts to avoid it, as e. g. by VENEMA, who takes שׁוּבִי at once for לִי שׁוּבִי, i. e. after I had come again to myself. The only correct rendering is that of HITZIG and GRAF. They take שׁוּבִי in the sense of se avertere a Jove. They are justified in this by מִשׁוּבָה (iii. 6, 8, 11, 12, etc.), שׁוּבָה (iii. 14, 22), שׁוּבָה (viii. 5; xxxi. 22), and by the expression שׁוּבִי מֵאַחֵרִי (iii. 19), which does not indeed occur without the מֵאַחֵרִי in viii. 4, but it does in Josh. xxiii. 12. It seems as though the prophet, here also as well as in ch. iii., were endeavoring to bring the idea of שׁוּבִי into application in as great a variety of meanings as possible.

⁶ Ver. 20.—יָקָר. Hebrew here only; Chald. Ezr. iv. 10; Dan. ii. 11. It denotes, like יָקָר (xv. 19; Lam. iv. 2, etc.), and יָקָר (xx. 5), what is precious, a jewel.

⁷ Ver. 20.—שֶׁעֲשׂוּעֵי, נִטְעַן שֶׁעֲשׂוּעֵי, Isa. v. 7 coll. Prov. viii. 30, 31

⁸ Ver. 21.—תְּכַרְוּ-מִן הַתְּכָרָה from תְּכָרָה, prominuit, related to הֵכָרָה, palma truncus, x. 5, and תְּכָרָה, columna, Joel iii. 3, occurs here only. All other preparations are comprised in the brief phrase (גִּבְעָה לְפָנָי) שְׁתִּי לִפְנֵי הַיָּם. Comp. Exod. vii. 23; Ps. xlviii. 14.

⁹ Ver. 22.—הִתְחַמְקֶיךָ. The verb is found only in Cant. v. 6 and connected with חָמַק. The connection requires the meaning of "to turn one's self away," with which the only noun derived from it חֻמְקָה (Cant. vii. 2) accords. This can only signify "winding, rounding" (DELITZSCH: the swinging of thy loins). According to the etymology then the Hithp. must have the sense of turning one's self hither and thither.

¹⁰ Ver. 22.—הִתְשׁוּבָה. Observe that it is שׁוּבָה, not שׁוֹבָה, as in iii. 14, 22; Isa. lvii. 17. The passive form has doubtless the meaning of "turned away, alienated." The active form must primarily have an active meaning. The Piel from שׁוּבָה is primarily objective causative and signifies to make some one or something return, bring back (l. 19), restore (Ps. lx. 3; xxiii. 3), to render alienated (Isa. xlvii. 10). It may also have a subjective causative meaning: to make a turn, back or away, i. e. to turn one's self back, to desert. Hiphil has primarily this signification. (Comp. NAEGELSA. Gr., § 18, 3; 1 Ki. viii. 47). But the Piel forms also have it (Ew., § 120, c). As now it is decided by the connection in what sense the verb שׁוּבָה is to be taken, the meaning of the N. verba is also thus decided. It may then mean one who brings back, restores, alienates, and also one who turns, deserts. It has the latter meaning in xlix. 1 and Mic. ii. 4.—The Piel of hollow roots includes also the significance of the Piel (EwALD, § 121 a, coll. § 120). Especially does this word seem to me to involve the idea of שׁוּבָה in the causative sense, which corresponds to the following תְּכַרְוּ, i. e., in the sense of reducens (comp. מְשׁוּבָה, Isa. lviii. 12; OLSKI, S. 552).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe causes the return of Israel, set forth before us in prospect, to be seen from another side, viz. as at the same time an inward return to God, or conversion. In a wonderfully touching picture the prophet represents Rachel, the mother of the house of Joseph, as raising a lamentation at Ramah over the tracks of those who are going into exile, as though they were dead (ver. 15). Jehovah Himself, however, comforts her; a reward is still to be hoped for her work and comfort for the future, for the return of her children is promised (vers. 16 and 17). But is this possible? Yes, for Israel will turn inwardly to the Lord and thus fulfil that condition, which the outward return as a necessary consequence thereof must have. The prophet does this by introducing Ephraim as speaking and causing him to make an honest and hearty confession (vers. 18 and 19). On this Jehovah gives us to understand in touching words that His love for Ephraim is deeply rooted and invincible (ver. 20). Ephraim consequently receives the command to make all the preparations for return. Thus at the same time the (according to iii. 1) entirely new and unheard of case is now realized, that a woman, rejected and shared by other men, brings back her first husband (vers. 21 and 22).

Ver. 15. Thus saith Jehovah . . . they are no more. With respect to Ramah and the grave of Rachel the greatest obscurity still prevails. My view is as follows: 1. The tomb of Rachel was near Ramah. This definitely follows from this passage and 1 Sam. x. 2. DELITZSCH remarks (Comm. on Genesis, 2te Aufl. 2ter Theil., S. 53) that Rachel's weeping is heard in Ramah not because her tomb is in the neighborhood, but because, according to Jer. xl. 1, the exiles assembled there, but to this it is opposed (a) that according to 1 Sam. x. 2 the tomb of Rachel was positively near Ramah; and (b) that Rachel's weeping does not refer to the exiles mentioned in xl. 1; for these were Jews, while according to the whole connection of this passage, Rachel bewails the exile of the Ephraimites. 2. Ramah, near which was Rachel's tomb and where Samuel dwelt (1 Sam. x. 2) was in Benjamin, in the vicinity of Gibeah, north of Jerusalem. This is seen from Jud. xix. 13; Isa. x. 29; Hos. v. 8. In Josh. xviii. 25 it is expressly said that Ramah was in Benjamin. The original and complete name is Ramathaim Zophim (רַמְתַּיִם צוֹפִים), 1 Sam. i. 1 coll. ver. 19. The statement that Ramah was situated on the mountains of Ephraim (Jud. iv. 5; 1 Sam. i. 1) is not in contradiction to this, for the southern slopes of the mountains of Ephraim extended thus far. (Comp. HERTZOG, R.-Enc. XII., S. 515 [ROBINSON, Bibl. Researches, II., 315-317; 331-334; THOMSON, The Land and the Book, II., 503.—S. R. A.]). It has been objected to the identity of the Ramah of Samuel and the Ramah near Gibeah that Saul in seeking the she-asses took three days in going from Gibeah to Ramah (1 Sam. ix. 20), and that David fleeing from Gibeah took refuge in Ramah (1 Sam. xix. 18). Even RAUMER (Paläst. S. 219) lays some weight on these objections. [Comp. also SMITH, Bible Dict., s. v. Ramah.—S. R. A.]. As to the first, however, it is clear from 1 Sam. ix. 4, 5 that Saul did not follow the direct road, but seeking or pursuing the track of the asses, reached Ramah by a very circuitous route. With respect to the second RÜTERSCH (Henz. R.-Enc., ut sup.) has replied that David did not seek (temporary) protection from the city of Ramah but from Samuel. 3. There is also a Ramah in Gilead (Ramoth, Ramath Mizpeh, Josh. xiii. 26; xx. 8; xxi. 38, etc.); another south-west from Jerusalem, west of the mountains of Judea (Ramath-lebi, Jud. xv. 17=Eleutheropolis. Comp. RAUMER, Paläst., S. 185, G); a third in Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36); a fourth in Asher (Josh. xix. 29). A fifth place, which sometimes occurs under this name is Ramlah, a city which is not mentioned at all in the Old Testament (unless perhaps in Neh. xi. 33), of later origin, and very probably identical with Arimathea, and situated to the west of Jerusalem in the plain of Saron near Lydia (Diospolis). Comp. RAUMER, Paläst., S. 217, 8, 418. There is then no Ramah in the vicinity of Bethlehem! 4. Bethlehem is doubtless also called Ephrath or Ephrathah (Mic. v. 1; Ruth i. 2; 1 Sam. xvii. 12). Now if Rachel's tomb is in the neighborhood of Ramah it cannot be near Bethlehem, and the Ephrathah near which (Gen. xxxvi. 16, 19 coll. xlviii. 7) Rachel bore Benjamin and was buried, cannot be Bethlehem.

Now we read in 2 Chron. xiii. 19 of a place in the neighborhood of Bethel, the name of which according to the Chethibh is עֵפְרָיִם, but according to the Keri עֵפְרָיִם. The latter reminds us of Ἐφραΐμ or Ἐφρῆμ, a little town, which, according to JEROME, lay 20 m. p. north from Jerusalem, where Christ remained for some time after the resurrection of Lazarus (John xi. 54). JOSEPHUS also relates (B. Jud. IV., 9, 9) that Vespasian destroyed Βηθῆλ τε καὶ Ἐφραΐμ πολίχνηα, and then rode to Jerusalem. In Josh. xviii. 23 עֵפְרָה is mentioned among the cities of Benjamin. The same name recurs in 1 Sam. xiii. 17. EUSEBIUS in his Onomast., s. v. Aphra, says: "est et hodie vicus Ejffrem in quinto milliario Bethelis ad Orientem respiciens." The distances given point to the identity of Ephraim (Ephron) and Ophra. (Comp. ROBINSON, II., S. 333 sqq. [III., 124]; RAUMER, S. 189 and 216). Now it is remarkable that the Alexandrian translators in 1 Sam. xiii. 17 render the name עֵפְרָה by Ποσέρα, and on the other hand in Josh. xviii. 23 by Ἐφραθά (Cod. Alex. Ἀφρά). From this it seems to follow that even in very ancient times עֵפְרָה and אֶפְרַת were interchanged, and that hence not only the הוּא בֵּית לֶרֶם, Gen. xxxv. 19; xlviii. 7, but also the name אֶפְרַתָּה, xxxv. 16, 19; xlviii. 7, is to be regarded as a corruption of the original reading. I had reached this result before GRAY'S treatise on the situation of Bethel and Rama (Stud. u. Krit., 1854, IV., S. 868) became known to me.—The prophet goes back in spirit to the time when the inhabitants of the kingdom of the ten tribes were led away to Assyria into captivity. Since that time, he says, making use of figurative language, may be heard in Ramah, the greater city near Rachel's tomb (1 Sam. xx. 2), nightly wailing and bitter weeping (vi. 26). It is Rachel who is weeping for her children. The inhabitants of the kingdom of the ten tribes may be designated children of Rachel, because at their head stands the tribe of Ephraim, which is frequently mentioned as a representative of the kingdom of Israel, Isa. vii. 2-5, 8, 9, 17; xi. 13; Hos. iv. 17, etc.; Jer. vii. 15; xxxi. 9, 18, 20. The mother of the ruling tribe appears thus as the personification of the kingdom ruled by it. The spirit of Rachel is the genius of the kingdom of the ten tribes, whom the prophet represents by a bold poetical figure as rising from her tomb by night and bewailing the misery of her children.—Are no more. Comp. Isa. xvii. 14; Ezek. xxvi. 21.

Vers. 16 and 17. Thus saith Jehovah . . . their border. The Lord comforts Rachel by promising her a glorious reward for her maternal labor and care, (on restrain thy voice comp. guard thy foot, ii. 25. On there is reward comp. 2 Chron. xv. 7) viz. her children shall be redeemed from the land of captivity—and by setting before her the consolatory hope for the future, that the children will also return to their native land. On there is also hope comp. xxxi. 11.

Vers. 18 and 19. I have surely . . . of my youth. These verses give the inner reason of that joyful change; Israel will fulfil the condition required of him by the Lord (iii. 13 sqq.).

First the people express their acknowledgment that the chastisement was necessary for them, for they were like an untamed and untrained bullock (the prophet evidently has in mind Hos. x. 11), but they have also let themselves be chastened and accepted the chastening (v. 3). As Jeremiah here generally moves in the same circle of thought as in ch. iii., so especially in what follows, where also as there the idea of turning forms the central point or pivot of his representation.—Turn thou me, etc. The knowledge gained as the result of the chastisement produces a double effect: a positive and a negative. The positive effect consists in the desire to return to Jehovah. Meanwhile the people are well aware that willing is not performing. They therefore pray the Lord that He Himself will turn their hearts to Him, who alone is Israel's God. (This is the sense of the causal sentence. For thou art, etc.) Then only will they really return. The bodily return is connected with the spiritual in the closest causal relation. Comp. Rems. on שָׁנִי, ver. 19, and Lam. v. 21.—Lam. iii. 40; Ps. lxxx. 4, 8, 20.—The negative effect, which on their part forms the psychological condition of the positive, and is therefore introduced by for, is the inner turning and cutting loose from all that which had allured Israel, but had yet only brought him to hurt and shame.—The smiting on the side (רָחַק, רָחַק, duo femina cum natibus, comp. Ezek. xxi. 17) was a sign of mourning. Comp. WINER and HERZOG, R.-Enc., s. v. Traver.—I blush, etc. Comp. Isa. xlv. 16, 17.—The connection of this passage is then as follows: Ephraim has taken the chastening to heart. In consequence he addresses the prayer for power to return to Jehovah, for he has now learned to repent of his turning away from Him, and to be ashamed of the consequences.

Vers. 20-22. Is then Ephraim . . . the man. Jehovah grants the moving petition. Astonished at surprising Himself, as it were, in such tender feelings towards Ephraim, Jehovah asks Himself if then Ephraim is his favorite son, his darling child (enfant gâté), since often as he has been obliged to bring the severe judgment of rejection upon him, he has yet never been able to forget him.—Speak against. We may compare 2 Chron. xxii. 10, where it is said of Athaliah that she arose and הִרְגָה all the seed royal. But apart from הִרְגָה being here construed with a single accusative, we have in the parallel passage (2 Kings. xi. 1) הִרְגָה so that it is easy to suspect a mistake. Now הִרְגָה and נִדְּבָה in the sense of "speak," are frequently connected with הִרְגָה in different meanings: loqui per aliquem (Num. xii. 2), de aliquo (Deut. vi. 7; 1 Sam. xix. 3; Ps. cxix. 46 coll. 23), ad aliquem (Numb. xii. 8; Hab. ii. 1; Zech. i. 9, etc., Numb. xii. 2, etc., 1 Sam. xxv. 39; Cant. viii. 8). But it also signifies loqui contra aliquem, Numb. xxi. 7 coll. ver. 5; Ps. l. 20; lxxviii. 19. This last meaning corresponds perfectly to the connection here:—Often as I (יְהוָה) as in 1 Sam. xviii. 30; 1 Kings. xiv. 28) speak against him, i. e., cast him from me by a sentence of reprobation, yet I cannot forget him. I am always reminded of him again, and then the old feelings of love and pity are excited anew.—My bowels. DRECHSLER correctly remarks on Isa. xvi. 5, that דָּפְּקָה does not like σπλάγχνα, viscera, include the nobler entrails (the heart). The word does not therefore designate the innermost source of the feelings, but only a place of the external organism where these make themselves specially noticeable. Comp. Cant. v. 4; Job xxx. 27; Lam. i. 20; ii. 11; Isa. lxiii. 15; Jer. iv. 19.—The immediate effect of this excitation of love, is that Israel receives directions to make preparations for the journey homewards. Thus persons are to be sent in advance to set up stone pillars as way marks for the coming train, צִפּוּס, cippus, monumentum; comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 17; Ezek. xxxix. 15.—Israel's returning by the same road which he came is comforting in two respects, first in itself, second because it is known and easier to retrace.—The word these, before thy cities, shows unquestionably that the author has his point of view in Palestine, and not in the lands of the captivity. Comp. GRAF, S. 387, Ann.

Turn hither and thither. HIRZIG finds in this not incorrectly the collateral idea of delay. This accords well with how long? which expresses a certain degree of impatience. Israel does not respond quickly enough to the invitation to return. The Lord has to drive him. The expression backsliding daughter, occurs besides only in a much later passage, of the people of the Ammonites.—It is surprising, that the Lord in the midst of this assurance of His tenderest love, and after Israel in vers. 18 and 19, has manifested such sincere and deep penitence, should utter another word of harsh censure. In this passage there appears to me to be a play upon words. In the section iii. 1-iv. 2 namely, to which this discourse is most closely related in matter as well as in form, the prophet gives as many variations of the theme שׁוּב as possible, sometimes applying the idea to Israel and Judah in a physical, at others in a spiritual sense. A similar variation though in abbreviated measure is found in viii. 4, 5. In this passage also from ver. 19 onwards, the idea of שׁוּב forms the main thought. It is, however, variously modified: in vers. 16 and 17 the word is referred to bodily return, in ver. 18 to spiritual and bodily turning, and in ver. 19 to spiritual alienation, in ver. 21 again to bodily conditioned by spiritual turning. Now when the prophet in ver. 22 calls Israel שׁוֹבֵבָה, would he not thus wish to say that Israel is a person, who makes much of turning, who applies the idea of שׁוּב in every possible way? It appears to me that the prophet with the following sentence goes back again to the conceptions of ch. iii. In the beginning of this chapter he designates it as a crime profaning the land that a man return to his rejected wife, who has meanwhile been another's. Notwithstanding that Israel is such a wife, Jehovah yet calls her back to Himself. This is the repentance of which our passage speaks. For when the Lord does something which, according to His own law, has been hitherto regarded as inadmissible, this is certainly an exception to the rule, therefore something new and extraordinary. If now we ask how the Lord comes to make such an exception?—the answer is given in xxxi. 20. Israel has done this to the Lord, he is His darling child, whom he cannot forget. Israel is like a magnet which irresistibly attracts the Lord. Israel, the woman, here mentioned by the specific name of the sex נִקְבָּה, causes the Lord to turn to herself, who is also antithetically designated by the word בָּנָה which sets forth the specific distinction of the male sex. Thus the weak is victorious over the strong. It is not only a new thing that the Lord returns to his desecrated wife, but that this power to bring back proceeds from the weak, so that the strong succumbs to the weak. I therefore take הַסֹּבֵב in the sense of "to turn round, to cause to turn back." Although no passage can be shown where סֹבֵב is really used in this sense (everywhere where it occurs, it means either circire, Ps. xxvi. 6; lv. 11; lix. 7, 15; Cant. iii. 2, or circumdare; Deut. xxxii. 10; Ps. vii. 8; xxxii. 7, 10; Jon. ii. 4, 6), this is only accidental, for there is nothing in the radical meaning which excludes this sense. The root ס which is radically related to שׁוּב has the meaning of turning or returning in the widest sense. And that it may also stand for reverti is shown by the passage, Ps. lxxi. 20, 21, where the verb is interchanged with שׁוּב. It cannot then be denied that הַסֹּבֵב may mean reducit. הַשׁוֹבֵב would certainly be more suitable, especially as corresponding more exactly to שׁוֹבֵבָה, and it is not indeed impossible that the prophet did originally write הַשׁוֹבֵב. Neither the שׁוֹבֵבָה, nor in general the importance of the idea שׁוּב for the explanation of the whole passage, and particularly the reference to iii. 1 being understood, may have occasioned the change into הַסֹּבֵב, unless indeed it is an error of the copyist. It is not, however, at all necessary to alter the reading, since even this, as we have shown, gives the sense required by the connection. It is exceedingly difficult to give the play upon words in the translation, since we have no corresponding word with the same variety of meanings. I know no better rendering now than "thou turn-coat daughter," though the phrase is not particularly suitable as applied to a nation. This explanation is not a new one. It is essentially that of most of the Rabbins: "Proinde Hebraei hunc locum sic legendum contendunt: femina reducet virum, et hoc est novum in terra, at mulier, que passim aliis viris se prostituit, veteris mariti cupida, illum iterum sui amantem obtineat." MÜNSTER. My explanation of שׁוֹבֵבָה only is new, so far as I know, for all the commentators take the word as simply equivalent to שׁוֹבֵבָה. The other explanations of the passage whose number is legion, all do violence either to the language or the connection. To mention only the principal ones—the old orthodox explanation, which refer the words "a woman shall compass," etc., to the birth of the Saviour from a virgin, must take נִקְבָה in the sense of virgin, a meaning which the word never has nor can have. ANABANEL explains "femina viros circumdabunt, i. e. superabunt," understanding by the women the weak Israelites, by the men their strong enemies. But neither is this a new thing, nor has סֹבֵב this meaning. "Femina vertetur in virum" is the translation of ABULMALIN, R. TACHUM, who are followed by LUTHER (in the first editions of his Bible till 1538) and by EWALD among the moderns. The alteration of תִּסְבֵּב into תִּסְבֵּב, however, or the rendering of the former in a passive sense is forced: the sense also must be such as to agree with the context. The explanation proposed by SCHNURER, which is adopted by many modern commentators, is "the woman will protect the man,"—but neither corresponds to the connection, nor is it satisfactory in itself. When women protect men, either the men are become women and the women men, or there is no need of any protection.—The explanation given by HITZIG, "femina ambibit virum," which is found also in CASTALIO and CLERICUS (Vid. GRAF, S. 389) is not inappropriate in meaning, but cannot be justified grammatically. HENGSTENBERG, to whom GRAF attaches himself for want of a better, takes תִּסְבֵּב in the sense of "to keep one's self near, to persist in dependence, seeking protection" (Christology, Eng. Tr., II., p. 429). But this rendering is developed from the idea of "surrounding" which cannot be declared of a single person with respect to another. The sense thus obtained is also the reverse of the primary meaning of the words, on which the rendering is based. Radically the explanation of HENGSTENBERG is no other than that the man will surround the woman with his protection, as MEIER also actually renders the words in his translation. Besides the larger commentaries, there are many monographs on this passage. Lists of them are found in SEB. SCHMIDT, STARKE, J. D. MICHAELIS, Observ. in Jer., p. 248; ROSENMUELLER; DIETELMAIR in the Engl. Biblework, Tom. IY., S. 543. I add ANDR. DAN. HABICHHORST, Diss. de femina circumdante virum, 1670 and 1677.

[Of English and American commentators, BLAYNEY renders "a woman shall put to the rout a strong man." HENDERSON: "Woman shall encompass man," following however BLAYNEY and CALVIN in his explanation, "Jehovah would make the feeblest of them more than a match for the most powerful of their foes." WORDSWORTH retains the interpretation of the words, which refers them to the miraculous conception of the Virgin, quoting in favor of this view S. JEROME and JACKSON and PEARSON on the Creed, with references also to JUSTIN MARTYR, CYPRIAN, AUGUSTINE, LUTHER, ECOLAMPADIUS, CHEMNITZ, GALATINUS, CALOVIUS, HUETIUS, etc. NOYES translates "the woman shall protect the man," with the note, "there shall be a state of peace and security, so that those who are regarded as feeble and defenceless, and unfit for war, shall be competent to the defence of the country." COWLES agrees most closely with NÆGELSACH, referring "the woman" to the Virgin Israel, the people of God, who "instead of perpetually going about after other lovers, will go about (in the sense of seeking to win the love of) her own divine Lord."—S. R. A.]

b. THE SHARE OF JUDAH.

The Blessing of the Sanctuary.

XXXI. 23-26.

- 23 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, the God of Israel:
Yet will they speak this word in the land of Judah,
And in its cities, when I turn their captivity:
Jehovah bless thee, dwelling-place of salvation [or justice]¹
Mountain of the sanctuary!
24 And Judah shall dwell therein and all its cities together,
As husbandmen and those who go forth with flocks.²
25 For I refresh the panting soul,
And every languishing³ soul I satisfy.
26 Upon this I awoke and looked up;
And my sleep had been sweet unto me.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After the prophet had promised the ten tribes spiritual and material prosperity in richest measure, he now does the same with respect to Judah. Judah will also return to his country; the sanctuary, the central point and source of all blessing is again saluted with benedictions (ver. 23). The whole land is again inhabited; agriculture and cattle-breeding again flourish (ver. 24). For the Lord is disposed to afford help in every distress, satisfaction for every need (ver. 25). The prophet received this revelation in a dream. Its joyful import was the cause of his feeling on awaking that his sleep had been sweet (ver. 26). He remarks this specially because with no other revelation in a dream had he had a similar experience.

Vers. 23-25. Thus saith Jehovah . . . satisfy.—When I turn. Comp. on xxix. 14.—Jehovah bless thee. The words may mean either Jehovah will bless thee, or, Jehovah bless thee. The former bears more of the priestly character, the latter is more appropriate as spoken by the congregation. We find such a benediction specified in Ps. cxxii. 6-9.—Dwelling-place, etc. Comp. 1. 7, where Jehovah himself is so-called.—Mountain, etc., may be in apposition to dwelling-place, etc., and then the expression may either be a designation of the temple alone, or of the whole city of Jerusalem (comp. Isa. lxvi. 20; Zech. viii. 3). It may also be taken as an asyndeton, so that then the former will designate the holy city, the latter the temple. Finally the double phrase may designate both at the same time, i. e., the city including the temple, and as there is no reason for excluding either of the two, this may well be the correct rendering. Comp. Ps. ii. 6; xlvi. 2 sqq.; Isa. xi. 9; Joel iv. 17.—Ver. 25. Therein, i. e., the land, ver. 23.—Judah and all its cities. The expression cannot designate Jerusalem and the provincial cities (comp. xi. 12), nor the whole and the single parts of the nation, because such a distinction can be made only in abstracto. I therefore think that the prophet really distinguishes the people and the cities. Both sit, dwell, lie in the land. Comp. עָשׂוּ, xxx. 18; Zech. ii. 8; xii. 6; xiv. 10.—Ver. 25. For I refresh. The perfect is the prophetic perfect. It represents the future fact as already accomplished. For denotes that all that has been previously mentioned is only the realization of the purpose of Jehovah to relieve every distress and need, wherefore the satisfaction of hunger and thirst spoken of in ver. 25 is only to be understood as instar omnium. הָיָה of the thirsty. Comp. Ps. lxviii. 2; cxliii. 6; Prov. xxv. 25; Job xxii. 7; Isai. xxxii. 2.

Ver. 26. Upon this . . . sweet unto me.

If we take these words, with CHR. B. MICHAELIS, ROSENMUELLER, UMBREIT and others, as the words of God, we have the altogether crooked sense that Jehovah designates the time, when He was acting as a severe judge, as a time of sweet sleep. If we understand the people as awaking, then we have again the contradictory thought that the time of visitation is compared with a sweet sleep. The explanations of EWALD (quotation from a well-known song, which is to show that then they will have no more bad dreams), and of GRAF (therefore will it then be said, I awake, etc.), are too artificial, for they require the supplementation of introductory formulas which by no means offer themselves. As the words stand they can be understood only of the prophet. But it is a question, whether it is a real physical sleep or an ecstatic condition resembling sleep, which is spoken of. It is difficult to decide. HENGSTENBERG has declared in favor of the latter (Christology, Eng. Tr. II., 426). But in Zech. iv. 1, to which passage HENGSTENBERG appeals, the prophet is awakened to an ecstatic vision. I do not think, moreover, that the ecstatic condition is anywhere directly called sleep, and that he who awakes from it has the feeling of having slept. It cannot be doubted that dreams generally served as the physical means of divine revelation. Comp. rems. on xxiii. 25 and Numb. xii. 6; Joel iii. 1; 1 Ki. iii. 5; ix. 2. Jeremiah never tells us elsewhere in what bodily condition he was when he received his revelation, but of this he tells us that he received it in sleep. Why here only such a remark on the outward form of the revelation and the feeling which he had in connection with it? Let us remember that this prophecy is the only uninterruptedly consolatory one in the whole book. Is it not then very intelligible that that moment was never forgotten when, awaking after the reception of this revelation, he had the feeling of an exceedingly sweet and refreshing sleep? I therefore perceive in this brief remark an indication that Jeremiah himself regarded the moment of the reception of this revelation as a point of light in his otherwise rough and laborious prophetic career (comp. xx. 7 sqq.). We may indeed truly say that here we stand at the most comforting and brightest point in the prophecies of Jeremiah.—Upon this. עַל-זֶה may well mean "upon this," combining the local and causal senses (comp. iv. 28).—Looked up. The prophet mentions that he opened his eyes and saw, to intimate that he was really and fully awake, and that in a fully awake and self-conscious state he had the feeling that his sleep had been sweet. There is, as we know, a half-awaking, which is only apparent and therefore deceptive.—Sweet unto me. Comp. Prov. iii. 24; Jer. vi. 20.

IV. The Entire Renovation.

1. The New Life.

XXXI. 27-30.

- 27 Behold, the days are coming, saith Jehovah,
When I will sow the house of Israel and the house of Judah,
With the seed of man and with the seed of beast.
- 28 And it shall be that as I have been wakeful over them,
To pluck up and to root out,
To pull down, to destroy and to afflict,
So I will be wakeful over them,
To build and to plant, saith Jehovah.
- 29 In those days it shall no more be said,
The fathers have eaten sour grapes,
And the teeth of the children are blunted.
- 30 But every one shall die for his own iniquity:—
Every man who eats sour grapes,
His teeth shall be blunted.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Whether Jeremiah fell asleep again at once or whether the following revelation was separated by a longer interval from the previous one is a question which must remain undecided. Both cases are possible. At any rate there is a close logical connection. This and the quotation from i. 10 indicate that this passage by no means takes its origin from a sensibly later period. The prophet who, in ch. xxx., had treated of Judah and Israel, in xxxi. 1-22 only of Israel, and in xxxi. 23-26 only of Judah, now again directs his prophetic gaze on both (comp. iii. 18; v. 11). He promises the old theocratic blessing of great fruitfulness both of the men and the cattle (ver. 27), the absence of all that is destructive or afflictive, and on the other hand growth and progress on all sides (ver. 28). Entering more deeply into the ground of the previous destructive judgment, he sets before them so lofty a position and such energy of general morality that common guilt and solidaric implication of the following generations shall no more be spoken of. But the transgressions would be only exceptional cases, which would hence be no longer injurious to the whole, but only to the single individual (vers. 29 and 30).

Vers. 27 and 28. Behold the days. . . saith Jehovah. On the promise of fruitfulness, comp. rems. on xxix. 6.—I will sow. Comp. Gen. xlvii. 23.—I have been wakeful. Comp. rems. on i. 12, 10; xviii. 7, 9.

Vers. 29 and 30. In those days. . . be blunted. The proverb of the sour grapes and blunted teeth, here mentioned for the first time, may have a double meaning. It may mean the fathers have begun to eat sour grapes, but it is the sons only who have had their teeth blunted, i. e. the punishment does not always come immediately on the first who are guilty, but on those of the second, third and fourth generations. It may also mean that the punishment does not always come on the guilty father, but often only on the innocent son or grandchild. In the latter sense Ezekiel, chap. xviii., combats the proverb as a blasphemy of God's justice. In the former sense however the proverb involves no blasphemy, but expresses only what the law itself declares in the words, I am a jealous God, visiting the sins of the fathers on the children, to the third and fourth generation of them that hate me (Exod. xx. 5; xxxiv. 7; Numb. xiv. 18; Deut. v. 9; Jer. xxxii. 18; Lam. v. 7). This canon of the divine justice rests on the hypothesis that there is not only an individual but a corporate sin, a sin of families, races, generations, nations, states. Of course every such sin, common to many, has its history. It unfolds like every other germ, till it has attained its widest extent and fullest maturity. When the point of maturity is reached the judgment comes. Those who are then living have their teeth blunted, possibly indeed as the less guilty (think of Louis XVI., of France)—always, however, as the children of their fathers in the same sense as the expression is used in Matt. xxiii. 31, 32, i. e. as the apple falling not far from the trunk, as the organic continuation and perfection of the moral tendency adopted by the fathers. According to those who understand the proverb only in a bad sense, Jeremiah only declares in this passage "that Jehovah will not then as now be accused of unrighteousness in an ungodly proverb, but it will be perceived that each one has to suffer for his own guilt (GRAR)." Appeal is made in favor of this explanation to Deut. xxiv. 16. To which I make the following objections: 1. The non-employment of the pro-verb (in the false sense) proves certainly a correct knowledge of the justice of God, but only elementary, merely negative knowledge. It is not a symptom of greatly advanced knowledge to perceive that God does not punish any innocent person; while according to the whole connection of this passage a period of the highest prosperity of theocratic life is to be here described, an essential basis of which is a corresponding stage of religious and moral perfection. Comp. vers. 18 and 19.—2. The passage Deut. xxiv. 16 is to be regarded not as the norm of divine, but only of human punitive justice. By this declaration, that savage custom of the heathen merely was to be guarded against, according to which ob noxam unius omnis propinquitas was to perish. (Comp. Jud. xv. 6; МАЕВЕРНИК on Ezek., 8. 286). Comp. also 2 Ki. xiv. 6; 2 Chron. xxv. 4.—I accordingly do not supply they shall say after but, ver. 30, but I regard ver. 30 as the declaration of the prophet. The moral level will be so high that only individual transgressions will occur as isolated exceptions from the rule. In general, and as a whole, Israel will be a holy congregation in which the power of the prevailing spirit will not allow the evil proceeding from individuals to extend itself. This will be restricted to the individual author and lead to the ruin of himself alone. Comp. Isa. lx. 18, 20. I find here the same view of the moral condition, which the kingdom of God is to attain as the highest stage of its earthly perfection, which lies at the basis of the Sermon on the Mount, and which found its certainly only precursory and passing realization in the apostolic church at Jerusalem. For in Matt. v. 21 sqq., the Lord tells us what will be the prevailing spirit in His Church, and according to what standard any contravention by individuals will be punished, to which Acts v. furnishes a practical commentary. In this view of the passage its connection with what follows is also clear, this passage being a preparation for what the prophet says of the Lord's new covenant with the Church, and that being an elucidation of the present passage.

2. The New Covenant.

XXXI. 31-40.

- 31 Behold, the days are coming, saith Jehovah,
When I will make a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah :
- 32 Not like the covenant which I made with their fathers
In the day that I took them by their hand,¹
To lead them forth out of the land of Egypt ;
Which my covenant they broke ;
And yet I was their husband, saith Jehovah.
- 33 But this is the covenant which I will make
With the house of Israel after those days, saith Jehovah :
I will put my law within them, and write it on their heart,
And I shall be their God and they shall be my people.
- 34 And a man will no more teach his neighbor,
Nor a man his brother, saying, Know Jehovah !
For all will know me from² the least to the greatest, saith Jehovah :
For I will forgive their sin,
And their iniquity I will remember no more.
- 35 Thus saith Jehovah, who giveth the sun for light by day,
And the laws of the moon and stars for light by night,
Who excite³ the sea so that its waves roar,
Jehovah Zebaoth is his name :
- 36 If these laws perish before me, saith Jehovah,
The seed of Israel will also cease to be a nation before me forever.
- 37 Thus saith Jehovah, When the heavens above are measured,
And the foundations of the earth searched out beneath,
Then will I also reject the whole seed of Israel
For all that they have done, saith Jehovah.
- 38 Behold, the days are coming,³ saith Jehovah,
When the city shall be built for Jehovah,
From the tower of Hananeel to the corner-gate.

- 39 And the measuring-line⁴ shall go forth further,
Straight out to the hill Gareb and turn towards Goath.
40 And the whole valley of the dead bodies and of the ashes,
And all the land⁵ to the brook Kedron,
To the corner of the horse-gate towards the east,
Shall be holy unto Jehovah,
And shall no more be devastated nor destroyed forever.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This prophecy reaches its acme in the promise of a new covenant (ver. 31). This new covenant is the foundation of the moral condition set before us in vers. 29 and 30. For the essence of the new covenant, in distinction from the old, which was broken (ver. 32), will be an inward central union with God (ver. 33), the consequence of which will be, that on the part of men, outward instruction will be superfluous, the ground of which, on the part of God, is His forgiving love (ver. 34). This covenant has two further characteristics: 1. it will be eternal, as the eternal ordinances of nature (vers. 35-37); 2. it will also have in its train the penetration of the natural sphere with the elements of holy life. Jerusalem will be inwardly so holy to the Lord that even the unholy places, which the city has hitherto had, like all other cities, in its suburbs, will now, as being sanctified, be reckoned to the city itself (vers. 38-40).

Vers. 31, 32. Behold . . . Jehovah. Here also the prophet's discourse extends to both halves of the nation. The Lord will conclude a new covenant with the whole of Israel (xxxii. 40; 1. 5; Isa. lv. 3). This new covenant stands in contrast to the old, which the Lord made with the fathers of the Israelites "in the day when He took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt." Wrong as it would be to understand by this "day" the stay at Sinai, equally so would it be to restrict it to the day of the exodus (Exod. xii. 51; xiii. 3, 4). Two things pertain to the conclusion of a covenant, a performance and a condition or requirement; the concluding of the covenant between Jehovah and the people Israel then lasted through the whole period of the Mosaic legislation, just as long as the bringing forth out of Egypt lasted. The manuduction ends only with the promised land, and from the day of the exodus to the day of his death Moses did not cease to give laws to the people (Exod. xii. to Deut. xxxii.). Since now there is no grammatical necessity of taking "day" in a literal sense (comp. Isa. xi. 16; 2 Sam. xxi. 12; xxii. 1), we are justified in understanding by the covenant of ver. 32 that covenant which Jehovah concluded through the mediation of Moses in different acts (Deut. xxix. 1; comp. KURTZ, Gerch. d. A. B. II., S. 522 [History of the Old Covenant]) with the people Israel, and required as its condition the keeping of the Torah (comp. בְּהוֹרָאוֹ Deut. xxix. 24; xxviii. 1 sqq.; 13 sqq.).—Which my covenant. Which is at any rate to be referred to my covenant, since this is also the main conception in the previous clause of the sentence.—They is emphatic: they broke the covenant, not I. It was the weak side of this covenant that it could be broken, and had God made this only, there might have been a doubt either as to His omniscience or His holy love. The first covenant, however, was only preliminary, preparatory and typical.—And yet I was their husband. The LXX., which translates iii. 14 κατακριθεὶς ἡμῶν, here has ἡμέλησα αὐτῶν. So likewise in Heb. viii. 9. From the context we should certainly expect an idea corresponding to broke, i. e. a word by which Jehovah's relation to the covenant-breakers would be designated. Meanwhile grammatical considerations require us to take בְּעַל in the meaning, which it has everywhere else, namely =to possess, and indeed (predominantly) as spouse. But we cannot, with HENGSTENBERG, take the sentence and yet I, etc., as a promise (I will marry them), for that would be an anticipation of the turn of thought beginning with But, in ver. 33; we must rather, with EWALD, regard it as an antithetical statement of a fact: and yet I was (or: while I was their husband). Thus the emphasis rests on the idea of husband, and the sense is: it is not a covenant concluded inter pares, which each of the contracting parties may renounce, which they have broken, but a marriage alliance in which they represent the woman, who is never justified in desiring the dissolution of the matrimonial connection, or in effecting it. ["Probably the true rendering is, and therefore I rejected them (from baal, to refuse, to loathe). See the Syriac, ПОСОКЕ (Port. Mosis, pp. 5-10, GESIENUS, 130, and Mr. TURPIE's valuable work, The Old Testament in the New, pp. 251, 252)."] WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 33 and 34. But this is . . . remember no more. ὧ is "for," but in the sense of "but," because it corresponds to not, in ver. 32. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 110, 4.—Those days. It is not said these, for this would be the days of the present, while the word used refers to more distant days, to those namely, which will precede the turn to good, the ἡμέραι (ver. 16 sqq.).—I will put, etc. The prophet evidently has in view the stone tables of the Law, on which the ten "words," the kernel of the Torah, were written. This law of commandments (Eph. ii. 15; Col. ii. 14) externally imposed on men by a subordinate mediator (Gal. iii. 19), was ἀσθενής καὶ ἀνοφέλητος (Heb. vii. 19), wherefore it is also said of it οὐδὲν ἐτελείωσεν (Heb. vii. 19). It was only to render men conscious how far the human subject in and of himself was in a condition to satisfy the demands of a holy God, i. e. the law was to produce conviction of sin (Rom. iii. 20). Only a heart in which the law has been livingly written and in which it dwells, i. e. only a human will, which has become one with the divine will, and thus free, can continue in covenant with God (xxxii. 49; xxiv. 7; Ezek. xi. 19; 2 Cor. iii. 3). Only where this takes place is God truly the man's God, and the people God's people. To be God is to be the most exalted being, therefore the highest good, the source and end of life. Only where God is thus for man, is He truly his God. And a people only which stands in this relation to God, is truly God's people (comp. vii. 23).—HENXSTENBERG is of opinion that between the old and new covenants there is only a quantitative not a qualitative difference. "Parallel to the passage under consideration is the promise of God of the pouring out of the Spirit, Joel iii. 1, 2 (ii. 28, 29), so that what we remarked on that passage is applicable here also . . . As under the New Covenant generally in its relation to the Old there is nowhere an absolutely new beginning but always a completion only . . . so in reference to the communication of the Spirit, Joel puts only abundance in the place of scarcity, many in the place of few" [Christology, Eng. Tr. II., p. 439]. It is true no legal enactment of the Old Covenant is declared false in the New (Matth. v. 17-19); it is true that men knew even under the Old Covenant that the law, in order to be fulfilled must not be merely externally before the eyes, or merely in the head, but that it must be in the heart (Deut. xxx. 6; Ps. xl. 9; Prov. iii. 1-3). But this Old Testament having-in-the-heart, which is spoken of in the passages cited, is quite a different thing from that which Jeremiah means in this passage. There were many God-fearing Jews who had the law at heart, and in their heart, and who loved the Lord with all their strength, but was one of them justified by this observance of the law? We shall recur to this again directly.

Ver. 34. No more teach, etc. THEODORET says, τῶν δὲ ἡγίων ποίτων τὴ τέλος ὁ μὲν τὸν ἀδελφὸν βίος. We have however no intimation that the prophecy of ver. 34 will be fulfilled at another time than that which is spoken of before and afterwards. No passage can be shown in which the Old Testament prophets make predictions concerning the heavenly state. The prophet therefore sets before his hearers a period of terrestrial development in which the illumination of the Spirit (Joel iii. 1, 2; John vi. 45) will lead each of himself to the essentially correct knowledge of God. Reciprocal furtherance is certainly not thus denied.—For all will, etc. In these words the prophet indicates the proper basis of the gifts of grace previously named. So also the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews understands the passage, quoting x. 16 sqq. (in distinction from viii. 7 sqq.) so that after διδοὺς νόμους μου ἐπὶ καρδίας αὐτῶν καὶ ἐπὶ τῆν διάνοιαν αὐτῶν ἐπιγράψω αὐτοῖς he directly adds the concluding words of ver. 34, καὶ τῶν ἀμαρτιῶν αὐτῶν καὶ ἀνομιῶν αὐτῶν οὐ μὴ μνησθῆσονται ἔτι. Only where the real (not merely ideal and hypothetical) forgiveness of sins conditioned by the true atoning sacrifice is imparted (comp. Heb. x. 1-4), can there be the communication of the spirit of adoption (Gal. iii. 2, 5), and thus true knowledge, and the true walk according to God's will. And herein also consists the most radical objective difference between the Old Covenant and the New, in the former all is shadow and type, the latter only has the essence of the good things itself (Heb. x. 1). Not till the sacrifice was offered on the cross was the veil of the temple rent, and the way of access to God actually opened. Now even if Moses and Elias be pointed to (Matth. xvii. 3), it is certain that no one received the knowledge of the "mystery of godliness" (1 Tim. iii. 16) before the death and resurrection of our Lord. John was more than a prophet, and yet the least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he (Matth. xi. 9 sqq.). The for before I will forgive is therefore to be well observed. Here also we learn the meaning of כִּרְיָתִי כִּרְיָתִי. It is without doubt incorrect to take it in the sense of "constitute, to establish, make arrangements," for everywhere else it signifies to conclude a covenant. But where God concludes a covenant it is always at the same time He who works the will and the execution, whence also in this passage gifts of God only are mentioned. At the same time we are neither justified nor in a condition to give a definite historical date for the conclusion of the New Covenant. If we should designate the day of the crucifixion as on the part of God the moment when He entered into the New Covenant relation, yet on the part of mankind there would then be no corresponding date of acceptance. In the fact that the Covenant is in the most exalted sense granted, lies also the necessity of its acceptance. God does not give His Son for an uncertainty. The taking is included in the giving. In fact the measure of the covenant members becomes full by the successive accession of individual believers.

Vers. 35-37. Thus saith . . . Jehovah. Not only by its inwardness, but, also, closely connected with this by its eternal duration, is the New Covenant distinguished from the Old. The Old was broken by Israel and the nation therefore rejected by Jehovah. This will no more take place under the New Covenant. This will be as it were a second ordinance of nature. It will be as immovable as the great laws of nature.—Who giveth the sun, etc. The prophet has Gen. i. 14 in view. Comp. Ps. cxxvi. 8. The expression and the laws, etc., seems to be a reminiscence of Job xxxviii. 33, which comes out more plainly in xxxiii. 25.—Who exciteth the sea, etc., is taken from Isai. li. 15. There the might of the Lord, as it has been displayed in the wonders of history and of nature in general, is set forth for the comfort of Israel. Here all the emphasis lies on the idea of the fixedness and stability of the ordinances of nature, which God has created. That God can excite the mighty ocean is rather a proof of His power than an instance of the inviolate order of nature, and it is hence probable that the expression originated with Isaiah.—Ver. 36. If these laws, etc. As certainly as the laws of nature are inviolable, so certainly shall Israel everlastingly continue as a nation before the Lord (xxxiii. 20-26; Ps. lxxxix. 37, 38). The question is natural here: why then has Jehovah raised the eternal continuance of the people of Israel as it were to the rank of a law of nature? The answer is given in ver. 37, (which does not feebly hobble after, as GRAF supposes), not however with a solution of the problem, but with the declaration that the ground of the historical fact is as secret as the heavens above us are immeasurable, and the earth beneath us in its profoundest depths is unsearchable. Comp. xxxiii. 22, 26.

Vers. 38-40. Behold the days . . . forever.

—Tower of Hananeel. This tower designates, as is acknowledged, the North-East corner of Jerusalem. It is also mentioned in Zech. xiv. 10; Neh. iii. 1; xii. 39. The corner-gate (comp. 2 Ki. xiv. 13; 2 Chron. xxvi. 9, and also שַׁעַר הַקַּוֵּץ Zech. xiv. 10) designates the North-West corner. Vid. RAUMER, Paläst. S. 290. By these two points then the northern limit of the city is defined. As the tower of Hananeel and the corner tower were part of the fortifications of the city, there seems to be no further extension on this side.—Straight out, יָרָה accus. of motion to the question whither? To its opposite, i. e., straight out. Comp. Am. iv. 3; Josh. vi. 5, 20.—Gareb occurs here only as the name of a place, as the name of a person in 2 Sam. xxiii. 33; 1 Chron. xi. 40. The meaning of the word must according to גַּרְבַּי scabies, (Lev. xxi. 20; xxii. 22) be “scabby, leprous.” In accordance with the other localizations, this must mean, as GRAF has shown, the South-West corner. What Goath (גֹּאֵת) is, is quite uncertain. The word occurs here only. The Chald. פְּרִיַת עֵלְיָא (cow-pond), the Syr. lormeto, i. e., rocky hill, by which it seems to have understood the projecting rock of the castle Antonia (HITZIG, FUERST). VITRINGA and HENGSTENBERG take it as = גֹּל גֹּעֵתָה i. e., Golgotha. But both the etymology and topography are very uncertain. The valley of corpses and ashes is without doubt the vale of Hinnom in the South, for that was the place where all the refuse of the city ran or was carried. (Comp. Comm. on xix. 2). פְּנֵי is the unburied cadaver of men and beasts (xli. 9; Gen. xv. 11), גֹּעֵתָה is especially the ashes of burnt fat (Lev. i. 16; iv. 1). It is better to regard it as the ashes of the offal, burned without the camp, than of the sacrifices burned on the altar (flesh, skin, dung, Lev. iv. 11, 12; vii. 17, 19; viii. 17, 32; ix. 11; xvi. 27; xix. 6) and clothing (Lev. xiii. 52, 55, 57). The horse-gate was on the East of the city by the temple (Neh. iii. 18; xii. 39, 40). So far as we can perceive in general from these local determinations, the subject is not primarily, as in Ezek. xlvi. 15 sqq. an extension of the city. For the gain in space according to the boundaries mentioned is relatively insignificant. Only in the South-West, South, and at any rate in the South-East, are some small portions added to the city. The main point is that by this extension the places which were unholy were rendered holy. They were the purlieus of the city. If even these places are added to the city, it shows that the city no longer needs such places. It is in itself so thoroughly holy to the Lord that it will have nothing unholy to cast out. Nothing unclean will enter (Rev. xxi. 27), therefore nothing unclean will proceed from it. It will be thoroughly sanctified and enlightened, therefore safe from destruction to all eternity.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. JOH. CONR. SCHALLER, pastor at Cantendorf, says in his Gospel Sermons, (Hof. 1742, S. 628), “These chapters are like a sky in which sparkle many brilliant stars of strong and consolatory declarations, a paradise and pleasure-garden in which a believing soul is refreshed with delightful sweets of instruction, and solaced with sweetly flavored apples of gracious promise.”

2. On xxx. 1-3. The people of Israel were not then capable of bearing such a prophecy, brimming over with happiness and glory. They would have misused it, hearing to the end what was promised them, and then only the more certainly postponing what was the only thing then necessary—sincere repentance. Hence they are not yet to hear this gloriously consolatory address. It is to be written, that it may in due time be perceived that the Lord, even at the time when He was obliged to threaten most severely, had thoughts of peace concerning the people, and that thus the period of prosperity has not come by chance, nor in consequence of a change of mind, but in consequence of a plan conceived from the beginning and executed accordingly.

3. On xxx. 7. The great and terrible day of the Lord (Joel iii. 4) has not the dimensions of a human day. It has long sent out its heralds in advance. Yea, it has itself already dawned. For since by the total destruction of the external theocracy judgment is begun at the house of God (1 Pet. iv. 17), we stand in the midst of the day of God, in the midst of the judgment of the world. Then the time of trouble for Jacob has begun (ver. 7), from which he is to be delivered, when the fulness of the Gentiles is come in (Rom. xi.)

4. On xxx. 9. Christ is David in his highest potency, and He is also still more. For if we represent all the typical points in David's life as a circle, and draw a line from each of these points, the great circle thus formed would comprise only a part of the πρόνοια given in Christ. Nevertheless Christ is the true David, who was not chosen like Saul for his bodily stature, but only for his inward relation to God (comp. Ps. ii. 7), whose kingdom also does not cease after a short period of glory, but endures forever; who will not like Saul succumb to his enemies, but will conquer them all, and will give to his kingdom the widest extent promised; all this however not without, like David, having gone through the bitterest trials.

6. On xxx. 14. "Cum virtutem patientiæ nostræ flagella transeunt, valde metuendum est, ne peccatis nostris exigentibus non jam quasi filii a patre, sed quasi hostes a Domino feriamur." GREGOR. M. Moral. XIV. 20, on Job xix. 11." GUISLER.

7. On xxx. 17. "Providentia Dei mortalibus salutifera, antequam percussit, pharmaca medendi gratiâ componit, et gladium iræ suæ quædam præcipua acuit." EVANG. Hist. FÖRSTER.—"Feriam prius et sanabo melius." THEOPHYL. in Hos. xi." GUISLER.

8. On xxx. 21. "This church of God will own a Prince from its midst—Jesus, of our flesh and blood through the virgin Mary, and He approaches God, as no other can, for He is God's image, God's Son, and at the same time the perfect, holy in all His sufferings, only obedient son of man. This king is mediator and reconciler with God; He is also high-priest and fulfilled all righteousness, as was necessary for our propitiation. What glory to have such a king, who brings us nigh unto God, and this is our glory!" DIEBICH.

9. On xxxi. 1. "There is no greater promise than this: I will be thy God. For if He is our God we are His creatures, His redeemed, His sanctified, according to all the three articles of the Christian faith." CRAMER.

10. On xxxi. 2. "The rough heap had to be sifted by the sword, but those who survived, though afflicted in the desert of this life, found favor with God, and these, the true Israel, God leads into His rest." DIEBICH.

11. On xxxi. 3. "The love of God towards us comes from love and has no other cause above or beside itself, but is in God and remains in God, so that Christ who is in God is its centre. For herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us (1 John iv. 10)." CRAMER. "Totum gratiæ imputatur, non nostris meritis." AUGUSTINE in Ps. xxxi." FÖRSTER. "Before I had done anything good Thou hadst already moved towards me. Let these words be written on your hearts with the pen of the living God, that they may light you like flames of fire on the day of the marriage. It is your certificate of birth, your testimonial. Let me never lose sight of how much it has cost Thee to redeem me." ZINZENDORF. "God says: My chastisement even was pure love, though then you did not understand it; you shall learn it afterwards." DIEBICH. ["I incline to the construction given in the English version, both because the suffix to the verb is more naturally, 'I have drawn thee,' than 'I have drawn out toward thee,' and because there seems to be a tacit allusion to Hos. xi. 4, 'With loving-kindness have I drawn thee.'—A great moral truth lies in this passage so construed, viz., that the main power which humbles man's pride, softens his hard heart and makes him recoil in shame and sorrow from sinning, comes through his apprehension of God's love as manifested in Christ and His cross. It is love that draws the fearful or stubborn soul to the feet of divine mercy." COWLES.—S. R. A.]

12. On xxxi. 6. "It is well: the watchmen on Mount Ephraim had to go to Zion. They received however another visit from the Jewish priests, which they could not have expected at the great reformation, introduced by John, and which had its seat among other places on Mount Ephraim. The Samaritans were not far distant, and Mount Ephraim had even this honor that when the Lord came to His temple He took His seat as a teacher there." ZINZENDORF. ["God's grace loves to triumph over the most inveterate prejudices. . . No words could represent a greater and more benign change in national feeling than these: Samaria saying through her spiritual watchmen, 'Let us go up to Zion to worship, for our God is there.'" COWLES. "Ascendamus in Sion, hoc est in Ecclesiam" says S. JEROME. According to this view, the watchmen here mentioned are the Preachers of the Gospel." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

13. On xxxi. 9. "I will lead them. It is an old sighing couplet, but full of wisdom and solid truth:—

'Lord Jesus, while I live on earth, O guide me, Let me not, self-led, wander from beside Thee.'
—ZINZENDORF.

14. On xxxi. 10. "He who has scattered Israel will also collect it. Why? He is the Shepherd. It is no wolf-scattering. He interposes His hand, then they go asunder, and directly come together again more orderly." ZINZENDORF.

15. On xxxi. 12-14. "Gaudebunt electi, quando videbunt supra se, intra se, juxta se, infra se." AUGUSTINE.—"Premia celestia erunt tam magna, ut non possint mensurari, tam multa, ut non possint numerari, tam copiosa, ut non possint terminari, tam pretiosa, ut non possint cestinari." BERNHARD. FÖRSTER.

16. On xxxi. 15. "Because at all times there is a similar state of things in the church of God, the lament of Rachel is a common one. For as this lament is over the carrying away captive and oppressions of Babylon, so is it also a lament over the tyranny of Herod in slaughtering the innocent children (Matt. ii. 1-7)." CRAMER. "Premuntur justi in ecclesia ut clament, clamantes exaudiantur, exauditi glorificent Deum." AUGUSTINE. FÖRSTER.—"With respect to this, that Rachel's lament may be regarded as a type of maternal lamentation over lost children, FÖRSTER quotes this sentence of CYPRIAN: non animismus, sed premisimus (2 Sam. xii. 23). [On the application of this verse to the murder of the innocents consult W. L. ALEXANDER, Connexion of the Old and New Testament, p. 54, and W. H. MILL in WORDSWORTH'S Note in loc.—S. R. A.]

17. On xxxi. 18. The conversion of man must always be a product of two factors. A conversion which man alone should bring about, without God, would be an empty pretence of conversion; a conversion, which God should produce, without man, would be a compulsory, manufactured affair, without any moral value. The merit and the praise is, however, always on God's side.

He gives the will and the execution. Did He not discipline us, we should never learn discipline. Did He not lead back our thoughts to our Father's house which we have left (Luke xv.) we should never think of returning.

18. On xxxi. 19. "The children of God are ashamed their life long, they cannot raise their heads for humiliation. For their sins always seem great to them, and the grace of God always remains something incomprehensible to them." ZINZENDORF. The farther the Christian advances in his consciousness of sonship and in sanctification, the more brilliantly rises the light of grace, the more distinctly does he perceive in this light, how black is the night of his sins from which God has delivered him. ["It is the ripest and fullest ears of grain which hang their heads the lowest."—S. R. A.]

19. On xxxi. 19. "The use of the dear cross is to make us blush (Dan. ix. 8) and not regard ourselves as innocent (Jer. xxx. 11). And as it pleases a father when a child soon blushes, so also is this tincture a flower of virtue well-pleasing to God." CRAMER. "Deus oleum miserationis suæ non nisi in vas contritum et contribulatum infundit." BERNHARD. FÖRSTER.

20. On xxxi. 19. The reproach of my youth. "The sins of youth are not easily to be forgotten (Ps. xxv. 7; Job xxxi. 18). Therefore we ought to be careful so to act in our youth as not to have to chew the cud of bitter reflection in our old age. It is a comfort that past sins of youth will not injure the truly penitent. Non nocent peccata præterita, cum non placent presentia." AUGUSTINE. To transgress no more is the best sign of repentance." CRAMER.

21. On xxxi. 20. "Comforting and weighty words, which each one should lay to heart. God loves and caresses us as a mother her good child. He remembers His promise. His heart yearns and breaks, and it is His pleasure to do us good." CRAMER. 22. On xxxi. 23. The Lord bless thee, thou dwelling-place of righteousness, thou holy mountain. "Certainly no greater honor was ever done to the Jewish mountains than that the woman's seed prayed and wept on them, was transfigured, killed and ascended above all heavens." ZINZENDORF. "It cannot be denied that a church sanctifies a whole place. . . . Members of Jesus are real guardian angels, who do not exist in the imagination, but are founded on God's promise (Matt. xxv. 40)." IDEM.

23. On xxxi. 29, 30. "The so-called family curse has no influence on the servants of God; one may sleep calmly nevertheless. This does not mean that we should continue in the track of our predecessors, ex. gr., when our ancestors have gained much wealth by sinful trade, that we should continue this trade with this wealth with the hope of the divine blessing. . . . If this or that property, house, right, condition be afflicted with a curse, the children of God may soon by prudent separation deliver themselves from these unsafe circumstances. For nothing attaches to their persons, when they have been baptized with the blood of Jesus and are blessed by Him." ZINZENDORF.

24. On xxxi. 29, 30. "In testamento novo per sanguinem mediatoris deleto paterno chirographo incipit homo paternis debitis non esse obnoxius renascendo, quibus nascendo fuerat obligatus, ipso Mediatore dicente: Ne vobis patrem dicatis in terra (Matt. xxiii. 9). Secundum hoc utique, quod alios natales, quibus non patri succederemus, sed cum patre semper viveremus, invenimus." AUGUSTINE, contra Julian, VI. 12, in GHISLER.

25. On xxxi. 31. "*In veteribus libris aut nusquam aut difficile præter hunc propheticum locum legitur facta commemoratio testamenti novi, ut omnino ipso nomine appellaretur. 26. On xxxi. 31, sqq. "Propter veteris hominis noxam, quæ per literam jubentem et minantem minime sanabatur, dicitur illud testamentum vetus; hoc autem novum propter novitatem spiritus, quæ hominem novum sanat a vitio vetustatis." AUGUSTINE, c. Lit. Cap. 19.

27. On xxxi. 33. "Quid sunt ergo leges Dei ab ipso Deo scripte in cordibus, nisi ipsa presentia Spiritus sancti, qui est digitus Dei, quo presente diffunditur charitas in cordibus nostro, quæ plenitudo legis est et præcepti finis?" AUGUSTINE, l. c. Cap. 20.

28. On xxxi. 34. "Quonodo tempus est novi testamenti, de quo propheta dixit: et non docebit unusquisque civem suum, etc. nisi quia ejusdem testamenti novi eternam mercedem, id est ipsius Dei beatissimam contemplationem promittendo conjunxit?" AUGUSTINE, l. c. Cap. 24.

29. On xxxi. 33, 34. "This is the blessed difference between law and Gospel, between form and substance. Therefore are the great and small alike, and the youths like the elders, the pupils more learned than their teachers, and the young wiser than the ancients (1 John ii. 20 sqq.). Here is the cause:—For I will forgive their iniquities. This is the occasion of the above; no one can effect this without it. Forgiveness of sins makes the scales fall from people's eyes, and gives them a cheerful temper, clear conceptions, a clear head." ZINZENDORF.

30. On xxxi. 35-37. "Etsi particulares ecclesie in totum deficere possunt, ecclesia tamen catholica nunquam deficit aut deficiet. Obstant enim Dei amplissime promissiones, inter quas non ultimum locum sibi vindicant quæ hic habetur Jer. xxxi. 37." FÖRSTER.

31. On xxxi. 38-40. "Jerusalem will one day be much greater than it has ever been. This is not to be understood literally but spiritually. Jerusalem will be wherever there are believing souls, its circle will be without end and comprise all that has been hitherto impure and lost. This it is of which the prophet is teaching, and which he presents in figures, which were intelligible to the people in his time. The hill Gareb, probably the residence of the lepers, the emblem of the sinner unmasked and smitten by God, and the cursed valley of Ben-Hinnom will be taken up into the holy city. God's grace will one day effect all this, and Israel will thus be manifested as much more glorious than ever before." DIE-DRICH.

B. THE ELEVENTH DISCOURSE.

CHAPTERS XXXII.—XXXIII.

WITH AN APPENDIX (CHAP. XXXIV. 1-7).

The thirty-third chapter contains a revelation of somewhat later date than ch. xxxii. In xxxiii. 1 it is expressly stated that the contents of this chapter were communicated to the prophet separately, and subsequently to the revelation contained in ch. xxxii. The word second (שֵׁנִי) xxxiii. 1, however, designates this chapter as the second part or continuation of ch. xxxii., which also accords with its very similar purport. As ch. xxxii. shows us that the occupation of the Israelitish country by the northern foes does not prevent the Lord from commanding the prophet to purchase a piece of this very land, as a pledge that the time will come when the land can be bought and sold and inhabited and tilled in peace, so in ch. xxxiii., in connection with the destruction of many houses in the city of Jerusalem for the purposes of defence it is predicted that the city apparently devoted to entire devastation shall be rebuilt, that joy and rejoicing shall again prevail in it, that in the country breeding of cattle shall again be followed with blessing, and especially that from the house of David a "righteous sprout" shall proceed, by whom righteousness and salvation shall be diffused through the land. The throne of Israel shall no more lack a prince of the house of David, nor the worship Levitical priests. This covenant shall stand everlastingly as the laws of nature; innumerable as the stars of heaven or the sand of the sea shore shall be the seed of David and Levi. In the midst of the present mourning the prophet makes known these promises, for—and this is the formal basis, which ch. xxxiii. has in common with ch. xxxii.—the Lord has the power to do this; nothing is too wonderful for Him (comp. xxxiii. 2, 3 with xxxii. 17, 27). Without doubt these prophecies, proceeding from the court of the prison, are among the grandest which the prophet uttered. We shall see what a depth of misery this court of the prison involved for the prophet and for Israel. And in the very midst of this prophecy the abused prophet raises his voice in the most glorious prediction, that the wonder-working power of God may be recognized and praised, and faith, which rests not on the seen, but on the unseen (2 Cor. iv. 18), may be thus confirmed and encouraged. The fulfilment of this prophecy runs through all the stages of development, from that first feeble beginning, which was made after the return from exile, to the consummation of the βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν which the future æon will bring us.

From what has been said, it is evident that the present discourse forms a parallel to the earlier consolatory discourse, chh. xxx. and xxxi., and that both, being placed purposely at the close of the collection, may with propriety be called the Book of Consolation. Though the general purport of the two discourses is similar, some differences are also noticeable. While the first (chh. xxx. and xxxi.) may be compared to a picture which beams with light and color, and in which the shading is indicated only by a few though powerful strokes (comp. xxx. 5-7, 11; xxxi. 15, 16, 18, 19), the second seems like a picture, in which the deepest shades and the brightest light are equally divided and displayed in vivid contrast. Not only does the promise in the second discourse rise from present distressing circumstances, but the guilt of Israel, which is the cause of this distress, is portrayed with a strong hand (xxxii. 29-35). Still as the shade is stronger in the second discourse than in the first, so is the light. That which may be called the crown of all theocratic promise, viz., the Messianic kingdom, together with the priesthood standing inseparably by its side as a necessary supplement, is in the second discourse set forth much more clearly, much more comprehensively, and in much more various relations. While in the first discourse the Messianic king is spoken of in a few words only, and with no special emphasis, xxx. 9, 21, in the second the most prominent passage is occupied in detail with the Messianic king and priesthood. The passage xxxiii. 14-26, which is evidently to form the crowning close of the whole discourse, is entirely devoted to that most important subject of Messianic prediction.

The time of the composition of chh. xxxii. and xxxiii. is stated in the text. In xxxii. 1 it is expressly mentioned that the events there narrated took place in the tenth year of Zedekiah, the eighteenth of Nebuchadnezzar (i. e., B. C., 587), during the siege by the Chaldeans, and while Jeremiah was a prisoner in the court of the gaol. Only a little later followed, as a continuation and completion of the consolatory prediction, the revelation communicated to us in the thirty-third chapter (comp. xxxiii. 1).

MOVERS, DE WETTE and HITZIG regard ch. xxxiii. as worked over by the author of Isa. xl.-lxvi. This view has been so thoroughly refuted by GRAF that it will suffice to refer to him (comp. GRAF, S. 369, 415).—J. D. MICHAELIS (Orient. Bibl., XVII., S. 172 sqq.), JAHN (Vatt. Messian., P. II., S. 112 sqq.) and HITZIG dispute the genuineness of xxxiii. 14-26. MOVERS (de utr. Rec., etc., S. 41) declares that vrs. 18, 21 6-25 at least, are an interpolation. We may also appeal to GRAF for the refutation of this view (S. 369, 370, and his exposition of the passages in question). For a valuation of the circumstance that the section mentioned is wanting in the LXX, comp. GRAF, Einführung, pag. XLVIII. GRAF himself however regards xxxiii. 2, 3 as interpolated. I refer on the other hand to my exposition of this passage.

Since both chapters are so far of similar import, that ch. xxxiii. may be regarded as a continuation and extension of ch. xxxii., the two together may consequently be regarded as ONE prophetic discourse. They are not so, however, in a logical and rhetorical sense, since they did not originate contemporaneously. We shall therefore treat the two halves separately.

I. CHAPTER XXXII.

The most glorious future warranted in the midst of the most gloomy present by the purchase of a piece of ground in the enemy's hands.

1. The transaction of the purchase, xxxii. 1-15.
2. A prayer of praise and inquiry, xxxii. 16-25.
3. Nothing is impossible to the Lord, xxxii. 26-44.

II. CHAPTER XXXIII.

Promise of the most glorious future, given at the moment when the destruction of Jerusalem was already begun by its own inhabitants in the interest of defence.

1. Brief transition: summons to new prayer in the sense of xxxii. 16-25, and promise of a hearing, xxxiii. 1-3.
2. Destruction in the present. Glorious internal and external rebuilding in the future notwithstanding, xxxiii. 4-9.
3. The glorious city-life of the future, xxxiii. 10, 11.
4. The glorious country-life of the future, xxxiii. 12, 13.
5. The glorious kingdom and priesthood of the future, xxxiii. 14-18.
6. The kingdom and priesthood of the future eternal, xxxiii. 19-26.

1. CHAPTER XXXII.

The most glorious future warranted in the midst of the most gloomy present by the purchase of a piece of ground in the hands of the enemy.

1. The transaction of the Purchase.

XXXII. 1-15.

1 The word that came to Jeremiah from the Lord in the tenth year of Zedekiah, 2 king of Judah, which was the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar. For then the king of Babylon's army besieged Jerusalem: and Jeremiah the prophet was shut up in the court of the prison [or guard] which was in the king of Judah's house.
 3 For Zedekiah king of Judah had shut him up,¹ saying, Wherefore dost thou prophesy, and say, Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I will give this city into the hand 4 of the king of Babylon, and he shall take it; And Zedekiah king of Judah shall not escape out of the hand of the Chaldeans, but shall surely be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon, and shall speak with him mouth to mouth, and his 5 eyes shall behold his eyes; And he shall lead Zedekiah to Babylon, and there shall he be until I visit him, saith the Lord: though ye fight with the Chaldeans, ye 6 shall not prosper. And Jeremiah said, The word of the Lord came unto me, say-7 ing, Behold, Hanameel the son of Shallum thine uncle shall come unto thee, saying, Buy thee my field that is in Anathoth: for the right of redemption is thine to 8 buy it. So Hanameel mine uncle's son came to me in the court of the prison according to the word of the Lord, and said unto me, Buy my field, I pray thee, that is in Anathoth, which is in the country of Benjamin: for the right of inheritance is thine, and the redemption is thine; buy it for thyself. Then I knew that 9 this was the word of the Lord. And I bought the field of Hanameel my uncle's son, that was in Anathoth, and weighed him the money, even seventeen shekels of 10 silver.² And I subscribed the evidence [deed],³ and sealed it, and took wit-11 nesses, and weighed him the money in the balances. So I took the evidence [deed] of the purchase, both that which was sealed according to the law and custom [or 12 (containing) the assignment and limitation], and that which was open: And I gave the evidence [deed] of the purchase unto Baruch, the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, in the sight of Hanameel mine uncle's son, and in the presence of the witnesses that subscribed the book of the purchase, before all⁴ the Jews that sat in 13, 14 the court of the prison. And I charged Baruch before them, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Take these evidences, this evidence of the purchase, both⁵ which is sealed, and this evidence which is open; and put them 15 in an earthen vessel, that they may continue many days. For thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Houses and fields and vineyards shall be possessed again in this land.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 3.—אֲשֶׁר כָּלְאוּ. The Nota relationis is to be regarded as in the accusative. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 70, b; Num. xiii. 27; Isa. lxiv. 10; Ps. lxxxiv. 4.

² Ver. 9.—On the accus. הַפְּתִיחַ. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 70, g.—On the article. Id. 71, 4 a.

³ Ver. 10.—The article in פְּתִיחַ is again general. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 71, 4 a.

⁴ Ver. 12.—לְעֵינַי כֹּל. Misled by the Atnach, many suppose that ׀ is wanting here. But this לְעֵינַי does not belong to וְאֵתְּ, init. ver., but to הַפְּתִיחִים.

⁵ Ver. 14.—וְאֵת—וְאֵת. The two Vaus here as in ver. 20—both, and also comp. v. 24. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 110, 3. The construction would certainly be simpler and clearer, if וְאֵת were wanting before הַחֲתָמִים, and it would certainly not be impossible that, as GRAF thinks, this וְאֵת may have been repeated from ver. 11 by an oversight. A certain solemn breadth may, however, also have been intended. Then first the quantitative multiplicity or duplicity of the deeds may be generally set forth, then their qualitative unity (they form together only one deed of sale. Comp. vers. 11 and 12); finally the multiplicity is specified: there are two deeds, one sealed, the other open. The הַחֲתָמִים and הַחֲתָמִים can then both be referred at the same time to הַחֲתָמִים.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In the tenth year of king Zedekiah, during the siege of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, at a time when all hope of deliverance had vanished and the overthrow of the kingdom was certain to all those who were not blinded, Jeremiah, who was then on account of his prophecy of inevitable ruin held a prisoner in the prison court, received a divine revelation, which announced that the lot of ground of his uncle Shallum at Anathoth would be offered him for sale on account of his right of redemption. Hanameel, the son of Shallum, really came with this offer to Jeremiah. The latter recognizing the Lord's will, buys the lot, carefully observing all the formalities, as a sign that "houses, fields and vineyards will again be bought in the land of Judah."

Vers. 1-5. The word . . . shall not prosper. The superscription is again of the larger kind. It dominates chh. xxxii. and xxxiii. The word of Jehovah which it announces, is not merely the next following brief revelation of ver. 7, but all the revealed contents of both chapters. Comp. rems. on xxx. 1.—In the tenth, etc. Comp. rems. on xxviii. 1. The numerical statements are in entire agreement with xxxix. 1; xxv. 1; lii. 12.—Besieged. Comp. etc. 4; xxxvii. 5; xxxix. 1; Deut. xx. 12, etc.—Court of the prison. According to xxxvii. 15, Jeremiah was incarcerated by the princes in בֵּית הַחֲטָוִי [prison, literally: house of bonds]. When the king had him brought out for an audience, he besought that he might not be taken back to that prison. The king granted his request and had him kept in the court of the guard, הַיְצֵר הַפְּטָרָה, xxxvii. 21 coll. xxxviii. 6, 13, 28; xxxix. 14, 15). Accordingly this must have been at any rate a more tolerable place. The expression occurs, besides the passages mentioned, only in xxxiii. 1; Neh. iii. 25; xii. 39. בֵּית הַפְּטָרָה is custodia and may mean watch as well as custody. As his detention here afforded him relief, as he received visits and was supported from without (xxxvii. 21), we may with the greater probability suppose that it was the closed court in which the palace-watch was stationed.—Wherefore dost thou prophesy. Comp. xxi. 4 sqq.; xxxiv. 2 sqq.; xxxvii. 17. The words from I will give to Zedekiah to Babylon agree almost verbatim with xxxiv. 2, 3. From the slight differences we may infer that we have here two independent records, of which the passage xxxiv. 2-5 is in so far to be regarded as the more complete, as it gives the particulars of Zedekiah's fate after his captivity, while in xxxii. 5 all that relates to this is comprised in the words, "and there shall he be until I visit him." If we compare xxxiv. 4, 5 with xxxix. 7; lii. 11, we shall see that in the first passage the fate of the king is portrayed from its favorable, in the latter passages from its unfavorable side. The representations are by no means contradictory. In xxxiv. 4, 5 it is merely stated that the king will not die by a violent, but in peace by a natural death, and after his death will receive an honorable interment. This by no means excludes the cruel treatment, which he received according to xxxvii. 7; lii. 11. The indefiniteness of the expression visit and the prospective, leaving it open either to deliverance or death, was perceived even by Jerome, who says "visitation et consolationem significat et supplicium." It should also be not unobserved that the expression "die in peace," xxxiv. 5, admits of this double meaning.—Though ye fight, etc. These words are not found in the record, ch. xxxiv. Coming after the positive prediction of calamity they do not make the impression of being intended for an admonition, but appear to have the meaning of a statement of reason: if you fight with the Chaldeans it certainly cannot result otherwise; ye cannot then prosper. The prophet does not want to call forth a subjective volition, but merely to present the objective nexus rerum. On the subject-matter, comp. xxi. 9; xxvii. 8 sqq., as well as the introduction to xxxiv. 1-7, and the remarks on xxxiv. 1-5.

Vers. 6 and 7. And Jeremiah . . . to buy it. After that in vers. 1-5 the general situation had been portrayed in which the following event took place, ver. 6 begins the narrative of the event itself. This narrative is given as the report of a third person. From the word in ver. 6, to the close of the prayer in ver. 25, it is Jeremiah who speaks. It is, however, a third person who tells us that Jeremiah spoke all these things, as is seen from the words and Jeremiah said, ver. 6. This form of presentation is not unusual in this book. Comp. xix. 14, 15; xxvi. 7-9; xxviii. 5-7 coll. ver. 1; ch. xxxvii. etc.—Son of Shallum thine uncle. That the uncle was named Shallum is seen from vers. 8 and 9. Though Hanameel is also designated וְרִי, uncle, this is explained by the possibility of using this word in the wider sense. The meaning of “patruus” is the innermost of a series of concentric circles, which represent a progress from general to particulars. From the Canticles we unquestionably obtain the radical meaning of “caritas, amor” (i. 2, 4, etc.). From this is derived the meaning of “carus, amicus” (abstr. pro concreto as in מִרְעֵת), comp. Isa. v. 1; Cant. i. 13, 14, 16, etc. Now though the father’s brother is especially called the dear one, the friend of the family, this is an honorable distinction, which may of course in certain circumstances be transferred to another relative, as is doubtless the case here for the sake of brevity with respect to the son of the וְרִי.—Right of redemption. According to Lev. xxv. 25 in the case of an impoverished Israelite wishing to sell his piece of ground, his nearest of kin have the right of purchase. Comp. SAALSCHÜTZ, Mos. Recht., S. 147 sqq.; 483, 808 sqq.—The members of the tribe of Levi also, according to Numb. xxxv. 2 coll. Josh. xxi. owned real estate, viz., so much as was included in the precincts of the cities allotted to them (עָרֵי לֵוִי), comp. 1 Chron. vi. 40, 41). The statement in Lev. xxv. 34, that this real estate could not be sold appears simply to mean that the sale of priests’ property to those who are not priests was forbidden. Among the family the sale must have been possible, otherwise an illegal act would have been demanded of Jeremiah, not only by his cousin but by the Lord Himself. The right of redemption (קָנָה) had moreover its two sides. Towards the seller it was a duty, towards the more distantly related it was a right. Comp. Ruth iv.

Vers. 8-10. So Hanameel . . . in the balances. The right of inheritance was generally and especially among the priests the basis of the right of redemption. For it was indeed the sense of the whole institution, that the real estate should remain in the family. Accordingly it was always the next heir who was in the first place entitled and obligated to the קָנָה. We find no intimation in the Law what the relation of the קָנָה was to the פְּקֹדֶה (comp. SAALSCHÜTZ, Mos. R. S. 811). After all it appears to me that this was left to the friendly understanding of the two relatives, and the loyal disposition of the goel was reckoned upon. From the fact that the visit announced to him by revelation was really received, Jeremiah knew that the proposal, which his visitor made him, and of which the Lord had not yet said anything, was also an expression of the divine will.—The price seems small. This has been explained by supposing that the seller was driven to the sale by urgent need and that the property was depreciated by the war. Both may be correct, but I do not think that the small price is thus explained. This would have been unworthy of the prophet. Could Jeremiah buy as a speculator? Livy relates (XXVI. 11) that when Hannibal was before the gates of Rome the very field on which his camp stood was sold, “nihil ob id dimiunt pretio.” Comp. FLORES, II. 6 (Parva res dictu, sed ad magnanimitatem populi Romani probandam satis efficax, quod illis ipsis quibus obsidebatur dicitur ager, quem Hannibal castris insederat, ventalis Romæ fuit hastæque subiectus invenit emtorem).—Can the proud assurance of the Romans have produced a greater effect than the trust reposed by our prophet on the divine promise? I therefore think that seventeen shekels was the nominal price. Its smallness may be explained, apart from the possible smallness of the object purchased, by the nearness of the jubilee year. Though we have no data by which to determine how far distant the jubilee was from the time of sale, it may be safely assumed that the provisions of the law, Lev. xxv. 15, 16, were not unobserved. The year of manumissio, spoken of in ch. xxxiv., was not a jubilee. Comp. rems. on xxxiv. 14 and HUNZIC, R.-Enc. XIII., S. 212. Seventeen shekels in our money was little more than ten dollars. Comp. HERZ, R.-Enc., IV., S. 761.—Whence did Jeremiah obtain the money? Had he, the prisoner, for whom a daily scanty subsistence was furnished (xxxvii. 21), pecuniary means at command? His silence on this point shows that he regarded it as of little moment. There was probably more money than bread in the city. Baruch also might have procured him the funds.—After the account of the purchase and the price in ver. 9, the particulars of the transaction are specially enumerated in ver. 10. First the writing and sealing. From what follows we see that the deed of purchase was written in duplicate. One copy remained open, the other was closed with seals. “Quæ emtionum consuetudo hucusque servatur, ut quod intrinsecus clausum signacula continent, hoc legere cupientibus apertum volumen exhibeat.” JEROME on ver. 14. Whether the open copy also bore a seal cannot be definitely ascertained from the text. The object of the writing in duplicate appears to me to have been twofold. First, that which duplicates generally have, viz., to have a second copy in case the first is lost; secondly (and this is especially the destination of the sealed deed), in case of injury or defacement, which the open deed might suffer either by accident or design, to have an intact original. The circumstance that Jeremiah does not mention the witnesses till after the sealing is not to be explained, with HIRTZIG, as though the contents of the closed deed and the price were concealed from them. Evidently the prophet does not wish to confuse the three points in ver. 10. He therefore relates first of the deed (כַּפֶּר), then of the witnesses, then of the weighing of the money. The order of subjects then prevails, not however excluding the order of time, since the weighing out the money at any rate came last. If we should argue as HIRTZIG does, we should come to the conclusion that the witnesses had nothing at all to do with the documents. This, however, is contradicted by ver. 12, where it is expressly stated that the witnesses "subscribed the book of the purchase." As now in ver. 11, ver. 12 init., ver. 14 כִּי־יָרַד הַקְּנָה appears to be a general conception, to which the specifications given in the second half of the verse are subordinate, the word may in ver. 12 also designate both documents; they may therefore have both been subscribed by the witnesses.

Vers. 11 and 12. So I took . . . of the prison. The words הַקְּנָה הַחֲקִים, in ver. 11, are difficult. Those explanations do violence both to grammar and context which (a) assume an accusative of the norm; according to the law and customs, for which no instance can be adduced; (b) consider these words to indicate the contents of a third deed. כִּפְר. The enumeration in ver. 14 is opposed to this, and the difficulty of perceiving what laws and customs were observed in a third deed, and why this was drawn. Only one explanation is grammatically possible and in agreement with the context, viz., that which takes the words as in apposition to הַחֲתוּמִים. Then the question arises, what are we to understand by the words themselves? The respective definitions of the Mosaic law (comp. ex. gr. Deut. v. 28)? But why should these be written out in detail and be designated as the main contents of the חֲתוּמִים? It is better then to take קְנָה in the sense of statutum, establishing, settling, and חֲקִים in the sense of stipulation. The main thing established, i. e. the object of the purchase and the price, as well as the special stipulations or conditions of sale were then fully contained only in the חֲתוּמִים. Yet I confess that this explanation also is not perfectly satisfactory. We must wait for further illumination.—Baruch is here mentioned for the first time. Hence the more exact statement of his lineage. Josephus (Antt. X. 9, 1) calls him ἐξ ἐπισημοῦ σφόδρα οἰκίας ὄντα καὶ τῆ πατρῶα γλῶσση διαφέρόντως πεπαιδευμένον. The high position of his brother Seraiah at court (li. 59) seems to prove that he was of a respectable house.—Before all the Jews. The prophet intimates that two circles of witnesses are to be imagined surrounding the central point, formed by Jeremiah and Baruch, a narrower and a wider. The wider circle testifies to the witness of the narrower.

Vers. 13-15. And I charged . . . in this land.—In an earthen vessel. To keep the deeds from damp, moths or dirt. Can the earthen vessel have survived the abomination of destruction? It matters not. The main thing was the establishment of the fact that the Lord in the midst of their dread of destruction, at a moment when all hope for the future seemed to have fled, gave the promise of a glorious restoration, as indicated in ver. 15. The object of this promise was on the one hand to comfort those who were involved in the present ruin, and on the other hand to prove that the Lord had forewilled, foreknown and foretold the predicted favorable turn of affairs. Comp. rems. on xxx. 1. To attain the latter object the transaction had certainly to be brought to the knowledge of posterity in an authentic manner. For this purpose the documents themselves relating to the purchase, which would hardly contain any account of the accompanying circumstances, would be less useful than on the one hand oral tradition based on the declaration of many eye and ear witnesses, and on the other hand the written report of the prophet.

2. A Prayer of Praise and Inquiry.

XXXII. 16-25.

16 Now when I had delivered the evidence of the purchase unto Baruch the son of 17 Neriah, I prayed unto the LORD, saying, Ah LORD God! behold, thou hast made 18 the heaven and the earth by thy great power and stretched out arm, and there is 19 nothing too hard for thee [hid from thee]:¹ Thou shewest loving-kindness unto 20 thousands, and recompensest the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom² of their 21 children after them: the Great, the Mighty God, the LORD of hosts [Jehovah 22 Zebaoth] is his name. Great in counsel, and mighty in work³: for thine eyes are 23 open upon all the ways of the sons of men: to give every one according to his ways, 24 and according to the fruit of his doings. Which [who]⁴ hast set signs and wonders 25 in the land of Egypt, even unto this day, and in Israel, and among other men; and 26 hast made thee a name, as at this day; And hast brought forth thy people Israel
27 out of the land of Egypt with signs, and with wonders, and with a strong hand
28 and with a stretched out arm, and with great terror; And hast given them this 29 land, which thou didst swear to their fathers to give them, a land flowing with milk
30 and honey; And they came in, and possessed it; but they obeyed not thy voice, 31 neither walked in thy law⁵; they have done nothing of all that thou commandedst

24 them to do: therefore thou hast caused all this evil to come upon them.⁶ Behold the mounts [ramparts], they are come unto the city to take it: and the city is given into the hand of the Chaldeans, that fight against it, because of [σ in consequence of] the sword and the famine and of the pestilence: and what thou hast
 25 spoken is come to pass; and, behold thou seest it. And thou hast said unto me, O LORD GOD, Buy thee the field for money, and take witnesses; for [and yet] the city is given into the hands of the Chaldeans.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The main thought of this prayer is praise of the omnipotence, justice and grace of God. It consists of three parts: 1. Vers. 17-19; 2, vers. 20-23; 3, vers. 24 and 25. In the first part God's omnipotence is shown from the creation (ver. 17), then His justice from His providence in history (vers. 18, 19). In the second part God's omnipotence is shown from His leading of the people of Israel, as it was especially glorified in the deliverance from Egyptian bondage (vers. 20-22), then His justice from the terrible calamity which has now come upon the disobedient nation (ver. 23). In the third part, which is least in extent, but the most important, a problem or unsolved riddle appears to be proposed. It is said that the Lord sees this calamity, and yet commands the prophet to buy the lot of ground (ver. 24). All however which has been previously said of the Lord's omnipotence, especially "nothing is too hard for thee," in union with that which must be extolled of the Lord's grace towards Israel (ver. 21 sqq.), gives the key for the solution of that riddle.

Vers. 16-19. Now when . . . fruit of his doings. On ver. 17 comp. xxvii. 5; Deut. xxix. 9.—Thou shewest loving-kindness, etc. Comp. Exod. xx. 6; xxxiv. 7; Deut. v. 10. For לֹא יִפְּלֵא we find in Deut. vii. 9 לֹא יִפְּלֵא דָוָר. If we compare with this the phrase in the parallel clause וְרַב־גֵּימִים (Exod. xx. 5; xxxiv. 7; Numb. xiv. 18; Deut. v. 9) which can only signify the offspring of the third and fourth generation, it is clear that the phrase in the text is taken in such a general signification that the idea of "thousands, belonging to the thousandth generation" is included.—And recompensest, etc. Comp. rems. on xxxi. 29, 30.—The mighty God. Comp. Deut. x. 17.—Jehovah Zebaoth. Comp. x. 16; xxxi. 35, etc.—Great in counsel, etc. Comp. Isa. xxviii. 29; Ps. lxxvi. 5.—To give every one, etc. Comp. xvii. 10.

Vers. 20-23. Who hast set . . . evil to come upon them. It is as though it were said, thou who in Egypt didst set in operation a wonder-working power, which continues to operate until this day.—The antithesis of Israel and other men, as in Isa. xliiii. 4; Ps. lxxiii. 5.—As at this day. Comp. xxv. 18.—With signs. Comp. Deut. iv. 34; xxvi. 8.—Which thou didst swear. Comp. Gen. xii. 7; rems. on xi. 5.

Vers. 24, 25. Behold the ramparts . . . the Chaldeans. הַכְּלָלוֹת are the ramparts set up by the besiegers. Comp. xxxiii. 4; vi. 6.—Given, etc. The Chaldeans are indeed still without the city, but according to the prophet's idea this is as good as surrendered, and on the fall of the chief city naturally follows the exile and the impossibility of further cultivation of the soil.—In consequence of depends on given. Sword, famine and pestilence, bring the city into the hands of the enemies. Comp. xiv. 16; xxv. 16, 27; xxxviii. 9. The Lord sees the condition of the city and yet He commands the prophet to buy a field. The fact that the prayer closes with this paradox must be regarded as an expression of the most tormenting uncertainty and helplessness, if the prophet had not himself in the previous context accumulated the most ample material to dispel such doubts. This apparently unsatisfactory conclusion is thus in the highest degree skilful and elevated. He leaves it to the reader to find the solution of the problem, after giving him all the aid that he needs. The concluding sentence, and the city, etc., ver. 25 b, viewed as spoken by the prophet, appears at first sight a tautological repetition. We might therefore be tempted to take it as spoken by Jehovah: buy the field although the city, etc. But although is not suitable in the mouth of Jehovah, for whom, in fact, the apparent contradiction is non-existent. The sentence is then spoken by the prophet; but it is not co-ordinate with buy thee, but an exclamation, in which the main point in the apparent contradiction is expressly repeated from ver. 24. Comp. the translation and TEXTUAL NOTES.

3. Nothing is impossible to the Lord.

XXXII. 26-44.

26, 27 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying, Behold, I am the 28 LORD, the God of all flesh: is there anything too hard for Me? Therefore thus saith the LORD: Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the Chaldeans, and 29 into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, and he shall take it: and the Chaldeans that fight against this city shall come and set fire on [to] this city, and burn it with the houses, upon whose roofs they have offered incense unto Baal and 30 poured out drink offerings unto other gods, to provoke Me to anger. For the children of Israel and the children of Judah have only done evil before Me from their youth;¹ for the children of Israel have only provoked Me to anger with the work 31 of their hands, saith the LORD. For this city hath been to Me as a provocation of Mine anger [or for My anger] and of my fury from the day that they built it even 32 to this day; that I should remove it from before my face,² because of all the evil of the children of Israel and the children of Judah, which they have done to provoke Me to anger, they, their kings, their princes, their priests, and their prophets, 33 and the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. And they have turned unto Me the back [neck] and not the face: though I taught them, rising up early 34 and teaching them, yet they have not hearkened to receive instruction. But they 35 set their abominations in the house, which is called by My name, to defile it. And they built the high places of Baal, which are in the valley of the son of Hinnom [or valley of Ben-Hinnom] to cause their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire unto Molech; which I commanded not, neither came it into My mind, that they should do this abomination, to cause Judah to sin.³
 36 And now therefore thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel, concerning this city, whereof ye say, It shall be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon by the 37 sword, and by the famine, and by the pestilence; behold I will gather them out of all countries, whither I have driven them in Mine anger, and in My fury, and in great wrath; and I will bring them again unto this place, and I will cause them to 38, 39 dwell safely; and they shall be My people, and I will be their God: And I will give them one heart,⁴ and one way, that they may fear me forever, for the good 40 of them, and of their children after them: And I will make an everlasting covenant with them,⁵ that I will not turn away from [lit., behind] them, to do them good; 41 but I will put my fear in their hearts, and they shall not depart from me. Yea, I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land as-42 suredly [or in truth] with my whole heart and with my whole soul. For thus saith the LORD: Like as I have brought all this great evil upon this people, so will 43 I bring upon them all the good that I have promised them. And fields⁶ shall be bought in this land, whereof ye say, *It is desolate without*⁷ man or beast; it is 44 given into the hand of the Chaldeans. Men shall buy fields for money, and subscribe evidences [deeds]⁸ and seal them, and take witness in the land of Benjamin, and in the places about Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah, and in the cities of the mountains, and in the cities of the valley, and in the cities of the South: for
 I will cause their captivity to return, saith the LORD.

¹ Ver. 30.—On כִּנְיַת־יְהוָה (the fem. form here only). Comp. iii. 24, 25; xxii. 21.

² Ver. 31.—The יָגֵל is less surprising (since this preposition is frequently interchanged with אָל, [comp. rems. on x. 1, Isai. xxix. 11, 14], and even לְ [comp. יָגֵל-רְצוֹן Isai. lx. 7 with לְרְצוֹן lvi. 7; Jer. vi. 20]) than the suffix in the following לִי. Accordingly the construction, which takes יָגֵל in the causal sense and makes לְהַסִּירָה depend immediately on היתה, on account of the pregnant sense in which היתה must then be taken, and on account of the suffix in היתה is still more difficult. This latter word forms the transition to the special grounds of the judgments, of which vers. 32-35 treat. In ver. 32 first follows a specification of the subjects. Comp. ii. 20; xvii. 25. Then in vers. 33-35 a specification of the predicates.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

At the head of this discourse, the limp and diffuse style of which is peculiar to the prophet's later period, and is notably distinguished from that of the preceding discourse, we again find the thought, which the prophet has once before made the basis of a prayer (ver. 17): can anything be too wonderful for the Lord? (ver. 27). The answer is, No! Therefore Jerusalem shall indeed be destroyed by the Chaldeans (vers. 28, 29), as a well deserved punishment for the manifold abominations, by which Judah and Israel had provoked the Lord from the first (vers. 30-35), but therefore also a re-assembling and bringing back of the people to their own country shall take place (vers. 36, 37). Then will Israel be Jehovah's people and Jehovah be Israel's God (ver. 38); they will with unanimity serve the Lord to their own eternal welfare (ver. 39); the Lord will conclude an everlasting covenant with them, in consequence of which neither will He ever cease to do them good, nor will they ever again depart from the Lord (ver. 40); it will be a joy to the Lord to do them good, and with all His heart He promises them that from this time forward they shall be firmly planted and rooted in their land (ver. 41). With these two colors does the prophet paint the future of his nation, for (? ver. 42) this is the very proof of His omnipotence, to which nothing is impossible, that as certainly as He has now brought destruction on Jerusalem, He will one day also perform His promise of blessing to the people (ver. 42). Then will fields again be bought in the country, which is now called a desert (ver. 43); yea, with all the usual formalities will purchases be made, deeds drawn, sealed and witnessed in all parts of the country (ver. 44). The passage thus seems to be closely connected with the historical basis of Jeremiah's purchase of a field (ver. 7 sqq.), as well as to be a logical exposition of the main thought of ver. 27 b.:—nothing is impossible to the Lord, therefore He destroys Jerusalem and restores it again. It is because He is almighty that He can do both.

Vers. 26-29. Then came the word . . . provoke me to anger.—God of all flesh. The expression reminds us of Numb. xvi. 22; xxvii. 16, where God is called the God of the spirits of all flesh.—Is there anything, etc. Comp. ver. 17.—Therefore. The blinded Israelites thought it impossible that the chosen place of the sanctuary could be destroyed (comp. rems. on vii. 4; xxi. 13). They did not reflect that to the Lord nothing is impossible.—Set fire. Comp. xvii. 27; xxi. 10, 14; xxxiv. 22; xxxvii. 8.—Offered incense, etc. Comp. vii. 9; xix. 4, 13.

Vers. 30-35. For the children . . . Judah to sin. These six verses express the reason of the punitive judgment announced in vers. 28, 29. Verses 30, 31 give the general reason, vers. 32-35 the special. In vers. 30, 31 we find three causal sentences beginning with for. In what relation do these stand to each other and to the preceding context? The first for might refer (1) to the acts of the Chaldeans, or (2) to offered incense, etc., and poured out, etc., or (3) to to provoke me. It is not probable that it can refer to (2), for no one expects a reason in this connection for the Jews having offered incense to their idols, but for the Lord's giving up the place of the sanctuary to destruction. (Comp. on therefore ver. 28). This for may then refer either to (1) or (3). Regarded according to the subject both amount to the same, for what produced the anger of the Lord also brought about the destruction. The ground of the one is also the ground of the other. Add to this that a special ground of the to provoke me is expressed in the sentence immediately preceding. We shall thus have to refer the first causal sentence, ver. 30, essentially to the prediction of destruction in vers. 28, 29. This will accordingly have for its motive the objective fact of the habitual sinfulness of the Jews and Israelites, since done evil further strengthened by only expresses the habitual state. The second and third causal sentences set forth more the subjective element of the Divine anger: Jerusalem must be destroyed, for they have provoked Jehovah. It must not however be overlooked that the words have only provoked me to anger by the work of their hands look back to ver. 29 b. For (1) provoked is only a confirmation of to provoke; (2) the work of their hands is not their moral conduct in general (this would be only a tautological repetition of the first half of the verse), but the idol images are to be understood by it in a concrete sense, to which according to ver. 29 b incense was burned. Comp. i. 16; Deut. iv. 28; xxvii. 15. The prophet appears also to have had Dent. xxxi. 29 generally in view.—The third causal sentence forms a climax with the second. He no longer uses the expression to provoke but the cumulative and stronger expressions for My anger and for My fury. Jerusalem has filled the measure of the divine anger, hence the total destruction announced in vers. 28, 29. The expression this city has been to Me, for My anger and for My fury (on which the passages lii. 3; 2 Ki.

xxiv. 3, 20 seem to be founded) is unusual. The sense can only be that the city became an object of anger to Me. On ver. 33 comp. ii. 27; vii. 13, 25; xxv. 3, 4. On vers. 34, 35 comp. vii. 30, 31; xix. 5.—In ver. 35 the sentence neither came it, etc., does not depend on which, but is to be regarded as a new and independent sentence. Both sentences however, from which to abomination, are parentheses, and to cause . . . to sin is connected with cause . . . to pass.

Vers. 36-41. And now therefore . . . my whole soul. By and now Jeremiah designates the joyful present in contrast with the mournful past, which he described in the previous context. This is indeed not yet real but ideal, yet none the less certain; for this ideal present is based on the word of Divine promise. Therefore, as already remarked, corresponds to therefore in ver. 28, and now draws the second inference from the proposition that nothing is too wonderful for God. As from this followed the destruction which appeared impossible to the Jews, so also follows the apparently equally impossible restoration. אל העיר—with respect to this city, comp. xxii. 11; xxviii. 8, 9; xxix. 16, 21.—By the sword. Comp. because of the sword, ver. 24.—Behold I will gather them refers to the idea of “inhabitants, citizens” contained implicitly in the city, to which in the widest sense all those enumerated in ver. 32 belong. On the subject-matter comp. Deut. xxx. 3 sqq.; Jer. iii. 18-20; xxiii. 3; xxix. 14; xxxi. 8, 10.—Cause them to dwell safely. Comp. Hos. xi. 11; Ezek. xxxvi. 11, 33.—Ver. 38. And they shall be, etc. Comp. rems. on xxx. 32.—Ver. 39. And I will give, etc. The restoration and return must necessarily be at the same time spiritual (comp. xxxi. 18-20.) An essential element of this spiritual return is also the cessation of all enmity and discord among the members of the people, consequently the prevalence of a spirit of love and concord among them. Comp. Ezek. xi. 19; Jer. xxiv. 7; xxxi. 34.—One way. An allusion to the division introduced by Jeroboam I. between Judah and Israel. Comp. x. 2; Am. viii. 14.—That they may fear me. In this the unity of the way is manifested that they fear the Lord with one mind. The sentence is taken verbatim from Deut. iv. 10.—For the good of them. A reminiscence from Deut. vi. 24 col. x. 13; xxx. 9, 10.—Ver. 40. And I will make, etc. Comp. rems. on xxxi. 31, 32; i. 5. According to the stipulations of the covenant the Lord promises two things: (1) that He will no more turn away behind the people in respect of doing them good, i. e., that as a faithful shepherd to His people He will always follow them with His protective and blessed guardianship; (2) that He will also give the people themselves the power no longer to turn away from Him. We see that the Lord takes the prestanda entirely upon Himself. Hence also the construction ברית ל, ברת ברית ל, which does not occur elsewhere in Jeremiah.—That they shall not, etc. Comp. Deut. xvii. 20, Josh. xxiii. 6.—Yea, I will rejoice, etc. Comp. Deut. xxviii. 63; xxx. 9; Isai. lxii. 5.—I will plant, etc. This נטע is the opposite of נתע. Comp. i. 10; xviii. 7 sqq.; xxxi. 28.—In truth is explained in the following words. The first planting had been imperfect (comp. ii. 21) as much so as the first covenant, (xxx. 32). Because this was only hypothetical (vii. 5-7) and because the Lord knew that the condition would not be kept, He could not be in it with His whole heart. Now He knows (for He has Himself promised, ver. 40 b), that the condition will be fulfilled; therefore He can designate the planting as done in truth (i. e., without the reservation that it is only for a short time), and also as one which He performs with a full and undivided heart. Comp. 2 Sam. vii. 10.

Vers. 42-44. For thus saith . . . Jehovah. From ver. 27 onwards a double inference is drawn from the general proposition that nothing is impossible to the Lord (vers. 28-35, and vers. 36-41). From ver. 42 onwards the argument is different. It is to demonstrate the certainty of the promise, vers. 36-41. This is done by pointing to the fulfilment of the minatory prophecy, which was indeed regarded as impossible by blinded Israel. As certainly as the Lord has brought great calamity on us, and so verified His word on the one hand, so certainly will He verify it on the other hand.—Like as I have brought, etc. Comp. xxxi. 28.—Ver. 43. And fields, etc. Return to the historical point of departure. Comp. ver. 15.—In the land of Benjamin. Comp. xvii. 26; xxxiii. 13. Benjamin is mentioned not because Anathoth belonged to this tribe, but because the tribes of Benjamin and Judah constituted the Jewish kingdom. Benjamin as the smaller part of this kingdom is named only in general, while Judah as the main part is characterized according to its chief constituents, as they are also enumerated elsewhere. (Comp. besides loc. cit. Josh. x. 40; Jud. i. 40). [“The New Testament mentions the sale of lands in Judea in Apostolic times, when Jerusalem was about to be destroyed, and the church was to be planted in all the world (Acts iv. 34; v. 4).” WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

II. CHAPTER XXXIII.

Promise of the most glorious future given at a moment when the destruction of Jerusalem by its own inhabitants in the interest of defence was already begun.

1. Brief transition: Summons to new prayer in the sense of xxxii. 16-25, and Promise of a Hearing.

XXXIII. 1-3.

- 1 Moreover the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah the second time, while he was yet shut up in the court of the prison, saying,
- 2 Thus saith Jehovah, who does it,
Jehovah, who prepares it, to complete it,—Jehovah is His Name,
- 3 Call upon Me, and I will answer thee,
And will announce to thee great and hidden things that thou knewest not.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet, still in the court of the prison, receives a second time a revelation of an exceedingly comforting character. It is introduced by some words of Jehovah, which set forth His power to carry out his thoughts (ver. 2), as well as His readiness to afford the prophet on his request a glimpse into the great facts of the future, which the Lord intends to accomplish, notwithstanding that they are now regarded as impossible (ver. 3). Some would consider these words a later addition, because they cannot distinguish Jeremiah's style in them (GRAR). But GRAR himself has shown in opposition to MOYERS and HITZIG that the style of the alleged Isaiah II. is not seen in these verses, that rather the main elements (קרא יהוה) of calling upon God, יהוה שכן accord well with the style of Jeremiah. I add that שכן, in the sense of "forming thoughts," is found parallel with הכב כהשכבה in Jer. xviii. 11. The expression קעשה, as far as the meaning of the verb goes, has nothing specific about it, and the neutral signification of the feminine suffix is not foreign to the style of Jeremiah, iv. 28; xiii. 17.—On גרלות, etc., vid. infra.—What might most make the impression of a style differing from that of Jeremiah is this Introduction in itself, and especially the peculiar turn of ver. 3: Call upon me, and I will answer, etc.—But we must here well observe that these words are occasioned by the prayer of the prophet in xxxii. 16-25. The prophet had indeed already received an answer to this prayer in xxxii. 26-44. But he is here admonished to approach the Lord more frequently with such petitions. The God, who has the power to carry out His determinations, is ready and willing to afford him a glance into His great thoughts of the future. A proof of this immediately follows. Consequently the verses, xxxiii. 1-3, form a bridge of connection between chh. xxxii. and xxxiii. In the admonition to pray more frequently they point back to the previous context and prepare by the promise I will announce, etc., for the following disclosures.

Vers. 1-3. Moreover the word . . . knewest not.—Who does it. This passage both in the thought and the words reminds us of Isa. xlv. 11.—Jehovah is his name. Comp. x. 16; xxxi. 35; xxxii. 18. In the name of Jehovah lies the guarantee of His action. For what He is called He is.—And I will announce. It might here be asked whether the prophet is promised an insight into the inner connection of the divine arrangements (in the same sense as רמז is used of the solution of riddles, Jud. xiv. 12-14), or only a view of facts. I believe that the two are to be connected. The innermost grounds of the divine action are a secret to the prophet as to the angels (1 Pet. i. 11, 12). When however the Lord shows the prophet a chain of facts, it can not only be evident to him what will happen, but also how one thing follows from another. This may have taken place in only a limited degree, yet it furnished the prophet with a bridge of connection between the past and the present.

Hidden things, כערות. In Isa. xlviii. 6 we read ונצרות ולא ידעתם. The resemblance is unmistakable. The whole connection of the passage renders it incredible that the words in Isaiah are a quotation, they must therefore be so here. The reading here, כערות, may be due to a critical error (2 for 1), especially as the word does not occur elsewhere in this altered sense. It is always used elsewhere of walls or cities (Num. xiii. 28; Deut. i. 28; ix. 1; Josh. xiv. 12, etc.). Meanwhile it is also conceivable that the prophet may have written כערות. He frequently modifies the words which he quotes. This might take place the more easily as the related passage, Isa. xxxvii. 26, may at the same time have hovered before his mind. כערות is not in itself inappropriate, as it may signify "secluded, separate, inaccessible."

2. Destruction in the Present. Nevertheless glorious Internal and External Rebuilding in the Future.

XXXIII. 4-9.

- 4 For thus saith Jehovah, the God of Israel,
Concerning the houses of this city,
And concerning the houses of the kings of Judah,
Which were thrown down against the ramparts and against the sword,
5 Which are come to fight against the Chaldeans,¹
And to fill them with the dead bodies of men,
Whom I have slain in my anger and in my fury,
And for all whose wickedness I have hid my face from this city:
6 Behold, I bring it health² and cure, and heal them,
And reveal³ unto them an abundance⁴ of peace and truth.
7 And I turn the captivity of Judah and the captivity of Israel,
And build them as in the beginning.
8 And I cleanse them from all their guilt, with which they have sinned against me,
And pardon all their transgressions, with which they have sinned and transgressed⁵ against me.
9 And it [the city] shall be to me a name of joy,
A praise and an honor before⁶ all the nations of the earth,
Who shall hear all the good that I do unto them;⁷
And shall tremble and quake on account of all the goodness,
And on account of all the prosperity, that I procure unto it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 5.—כַּאֲמַר יְהוָה לְהַחֲרֹב וְגו'. This passage is a difficult one. MOYERS and HITZIG strike out פְּאִים entirely, after the example of the LXX., by which the sense certainly becomes easy. But how can this difficult word have got into the text? EWALD emends פְּאִים into הַחֲרָבִים, which he takes, after Ezek. xxvi. 9, in the sense of "heavy siege weapons, artillery." But the plural of חֲרָב is never חֲרָבִים. MEIER reads הַחֲרָב פְּאִים, and translates "and against the desolation of the invaders." Both this use of the infinitive, however, and the mode of expression (the ramparts are erected by the invaders not for the purpose of hindering the desolation of the invaders) render the alteration suspicious. If we adhere to the text the question is, To what does פְּאִים refer? It has been referred to the Chaldeans (veniunt ad pugnandum Chaldei, DE DIEU, SCHNURER, ROSENUELLER). In this case, however, אֵת would be nota nominativi, which is impossible. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 69, 1, Anm. 1.—Others refer it to the Jews. So JEROME, CHALD., SYR., SFB. SCHMIDT, VENEMA, J. D. MICHAELIS, and these translate either veniunt or venientium, referring אֵת בְּאֵת to the persons implied in the city. In the first case there is no subject designated, and in the second the connection with וְגו' פְּתֵי הָעִיר is very harsh, apart from the circumstance that the expression פְּאִים is not appropriate to the inhabitants of the city, and that אֵת לְכֹלֵם presents great difficulty with regard both to the suffix and the prefix. As the text now stands, we can take פְּאִים only as co-ordinate with הַחֲרָבִים in second apposition to פְּתֵי. The absence of the article is certainly not normal, but yet not without analogy. Comp. ii. 27; x. 12, 23; Ps. civ. 2-4; cxxxv. 7; Zech. xii. 1; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 97, 2 a.

² Ver. 6.—On אֲרַכְכָּה comp. Comm. on viii. 22. The suffixes in רַפְּאֵתֶיךָ and לְהֵם refer to the same object as the suffix in הַלֵּל, i. e. to the holy city. It is the same constructio ad sensum as in כְּאִים. See rems. on this.

³ Ver. 6.—וְגִלִּיתִי. In itself there is nothing to hinder this word from being derived from גִּלָּה, to reveal. Yet comparison with גִּלִּיתִי, xi. 20; xx. 12, leads us to think that the form may be traced to גִּלָּל, to roll (HITZIG), or with FUERST to גִּלָּה II., synonymous with גִּלָּל. Comp. Am. v. 24; Isa. xlvi. 18; lxxvi. 12.

⁴ Ver. 6.—עֲתַרְתִּי is ἀπ. λεγ. For the verb comp. Prov. xxvii. 6; Ezek. xxxv. 13.

⁵ Ver. 8.—פָּשַׁע־פָּשַׁע־פָּשַׁע radically means: to break, from which is developed the meaning: to revolt. It is stronger than הִטָּא. הִטָּא is the accusative of the instrument. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 70, i.

⁶ Ver. 9.—לְכָלֵּל. The preposition as in לְיַעֲיָי, xxviii. 1, 5, 11; xxxii. 12. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5, b. c.

⁷ Ver. 9.—אֲתָה (i. 16), but it may also be the accusative of the object. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 69, 2 d.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In connection with the view which the city of Jerusalem then afforded, with many houses thrown down in the interest of defence (vers. 4, 5), the prophet promises the city healing and peace (ver. 6), the return of all the exiles, restoration (ver. 7) and forgiveness of all sin (ver. 8). Jehovah will again make Jerusalem the object of His joy and His glory in view of all the nations of the earth, who will be most powerfully impressed by this marvel of restoration to peace and prosperity (ver. 9).

Vers. 4, 5. For thus saith Jehovah . . . from this city. By for at the beginning of ver. 4 the prophet introduces the specification of the great and wonderful facts of redemption promised in general in vers. 2, 3. This וְעַתָּה is thus the key of the whole chapter.—Concerning the houses. From Isa. xxii. 10 we see that houses were thrown down in sieges, to repair or strengthen the walls. It was natural that those houses should be used for this purpose which were nearest the walls, whether private or royal property, and it is unnecessary, with Hirtzig, to explain the prominence of the royal houses from the greater ease in obtaining them or the superiority of their materials. It is clear that we cannot render for ramparts and for sword, for in the first place, as has been repeatedly remarked, the Hebrew does not signify ramparts of defence but of attack (comp. xxxii. 24; vi. 6; 2 Sam. xx. 15; 2 Ki. xix. 32; Ezek. iv. 2; xvii. 17; xxi. 27; xxvi. 8; Dan. xi. 15), and in the second place, for sword would not be appropriate. We are not justified in rendering this singular in any other than the usual sense, especially as it is not at all certain that the plural בָּתֵּי הַחָיִל , Ezek. xxvi. 9, has any other than the usual meaning. Comp. HAEVERNICK, in loc.—

To take לְנֶגְדָם for לְנֶגְדָם and to attribute a causal meaning to it so that it is equivalent to through, is altogether arbitrary. It cannot be urged that the prophet here speaks of all the houses of Jerusalem as being destroyed. Jeremiah only takes occasion, in a view of the houses destroyed in behalf of the defence, to set over against this gloomy picture of the present, which certainly was the prelude of entire destruction, the most glorious picture of the future restored city. לְנֶגְדָם is here therefore—against.—Sword is evidently used by synecdoche for all manual weapons, while the ramparts also include the machines erected upon them, so that these two words comprise the totality of the implements of attack. Comp. Ezek. xxi. 24, 25.—Which are come, etc. Comp. TEXTUAL NOTES. As the text now stands it is declared of the houses that they are come (1) to fight with the Chaldeans, (2) to fill them (viz., the houses) with corpses. Now though the first may be said, in so far as by a bold hyperbole, the houses thrown down would be designated as moved forward into line of battle and taking part in the fray, still the second is in the highest degree surprising. For how can the houses come to fill them with corpses? This “them” must either denote themselves, which would be grammatically and logically incorrect, or it must be referred to the other houses, which would be doing violence to it, seeing that the other houses have not been previously mentioned. Then also the filling, etc., must be regarded as the unintended result, which seems forced. Since, then, the present text proves to be incapable of giving us a satisfactory sense, nothing further is left us but to resort to an emendation. We have mentioned in the TEXTUAL NOTES attempts already made, none of which, however, meet with our approval. Perhaps it would be better to read Jerusalem (xxxvii. 10), or to Jerusalem (xxxiv. 1-7 coll. xxxii. 24, 29) instead of the Chaldeans. Then the words are come would refer to ramparts and sword. The circumstance that these substantives are feminine is of no account. For the masculine come may be referred κατὰ σίγειαν to the persons, to whom the ramparts and sword serve as implements. (Comp. NAEGELSH. Gr., § 60, 4).—Them after fill would then be referred to the idea of houses, which is prominent enough in ver. 4 to justify such a construction. Perhaps also we might read to fill it (comp. לִלְמַלֵּא ver. 6). The alteration into the Chaldeans might be explained by the difficulty of understanding are come of the ramparts and sword, and by the idea that it might refer to the houses of the city or their inhabitants. Perhaps also the remembrance of xxxii. 5 may have assisted in this. Meanwhile I confess that I perceive the difficulties attending this conjecture also, and therefore will gladly receive better instruction.

Vers. 6, 7. Behold I bring . . . as in the beginning. In opposition to tearing down in ver. 4 the prophet promises bandages or healing, instead of filling with corpses he promises cure.—Peace and truth, i. e. genuine, lasting prosperity. Comp. xiv. 13; Ps. lxxxv. 11.—Build them. Comp. xxiv. 6; xxxi. 4. The expression is chosen with reference to the occasion of the prophecy, ver. 4. Yet the idea is not to be taken merely in the narrower sense.—As in the beginning. The phrase is used proleptical v. comp. ver. 11. XXXIII. 10, 11.

- 10 Thus saith Jehovah, Again shall be heard in this place,
Of which ye say, It is desolate without man and beast—
In the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem, which are desolate, Without man, without inhabitant and without beast—
- 11 The voice of joy and the voice of gladness,
The voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride,
The voice of those who say, Praise Jehovah Zebaoth,
For Jehovah is good, for his mercy endureth forever!—
Who bring thank-offerings into the house of Jehovah.
For I will reverse the captivity of the land as at the beginning, saith Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After, in the previous context, the restoration in general, viz. of the city and the state, had been promised on the basis of inward purification, the prophet now becomes more specific; city and country are again to be peopled and to become the theatre of joyous civil and religious life.

Vers. 10, 11. Thus saith . . . Jehovah. The subject of shall be heard is the voice of joy, etc., ver. 11.—This place is the land

XXXIII. 12-13.

- 12 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, Again will there be in this place,
Which is desolate, without man and beast,¹
And in all its cities a habitation [or pasture]
Of shepherds causing their flocks to lie down.
- 13 In the cities of the mountain, in the cities of the plain,
And in the cities of the south and in the land of Benjamin,
And in the environs of Jerusalem and in the cities of Judah,
The sheep will again pass under the hands of him that numbereth them, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 12.—ועיר-כהמה-אדם כאין אדם. The construction here is instead of באין in ver. 10. עיר expresses the idea of an all-embracing completeness, even to the extremest limits (comp. Gen. vi. 7; vii. 23; Num. viii. 4). עיר requires the supplementation of a corresponding verbal idea: ex. gr. 1 Sam. xviii. 4 ועיר הרבו; et ita porrexit usque ad, etc.—Where בין-עיר occurs there is a confounding of two constructions. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 111, 1.—In the passage under consideration עיר seems to have arisen from the בין in באין, which reminds us of the בין in constructions like בין-עיר בין-עיר.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet passes from the relations of the city to those of the country, the breeding of cattle will again flourish throughout the land.—This place Comp rems. on ver. 10.—Habitation of shepherds. Comp. rems. on xxiii. 3.—On ver. 13. Comp. xxxii. 44.—Under the hands. The expression designates the relation of the Lord, invested with full authority, to the person or thing given into His power, which is represented as on or in His hand, so that He can do with it according to His own pleasure. Comp. v. 31; xviii. 21; Job xvi. 11; 1 Chron. xxv. 2; iii. 6. So also here. The sheep pass or enter past, “on the hands,” i. e., as objects of which the numberer is bound to take notice. We are not to understand it as meaning guidance and protection in general. The expression numbereth (מִנָּה) which occurs here only in this sense

(comp. besides Ps. cxlvii. 4), is not used by chance, and therefore not to be identified with מִנָּה. It is to be emphasized that the sheep will have necessarily to be numbered. When there are a few sheep only, so that they can be surveyed with a glance, this is unnecessary. The whole connection of this passage forbids us to suppose that the prophet here, as in xxiii. 3, 4, makes use of figurative language to portray the prosperity of Israel as Jehovah's flock. He describes the joyful future as including all mental and spiritual well-being (comp. xxxii. 38-40; xxxiii. 8), but always on a corporeal and realistic basis. Comp. Dent. xxviii. 3-5; xxx. 9. [So also WORDSWORTH, who refers to Job x. 3 and 3 John 14, “Greet the friends by name.” HIRTIG however says “Literally, after the hand, acknowledging each by a movement. They were numbered to control the shepherd, regularly an I doubtless twice (VING. Ecolog., iii. 34), on being driven out and on returning home.”—S. R. A.]

5. The Glorious Kingdom and Priesthood of the Future.

XXXIII. 14-18.

- 14 Behold the days are coming, saith Jehovah, that I will fulfil
The good word that I have spoken of the house of Israel and the house of Judah.
- 15 In those days and that time will I cause¹
The sprout of righteousness to spring to David,
And he shall execute² justice and righteousness in the land.
- 16 In those days will Judah be saved and Jerusalem dwell safely,
And this will be her name, Jehovah our Righteousness.³
- 17 For thus saith Jehovah, a man shall never be wanting to David,
Who may sit upon the throne of the house of Israel.
- 18 And to the priests, the Levites, a man shall not be wanting before me,
Who may offer burnt-offerings and kindle meat-offerings,
And offer sacrifices continually.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 15.—אֶצְמִיחַ. In xxiii. 5 we find יִהְיֶה מִנָּה. The former corresponds better with the following צָמַח while the reading in xxiii. 5 is occasioned by the preceding הִקְמִיתִי, ver. 4. Instead of צִי צְרִיקָה we have here צִי צְרָקָה, but the meaning is the same. The change shows in this case, as in that of most other differences, merely that the prophet quotes freely from memory.

² Ver. 15.—וְעָשָׂה. Before these words מִלֵּךְ יְהוֹשִׁעַבֵּל is omitted. No essential alteration of the sense is thus produced, for the royal nature of the צָמַח is clear even, besides this passage, from vers. 17, 21, 26.

³ Ver. 16.—The divergence of this passage from xxiii. 6, which is very troublesome to many of the old expositors, they seek either to paralyze by taking הוּא as a nominative referring to צָמַח—and he who will call it (the Ecclēsia. New Testament) is Jehovah, our righteousness (FÖRSTER)—or by supplying הוּא אַחֲרַי and taking יְקָרָא as passive and לָהּ as לְ אֲדוֹרְתֵי, and he is the one who the city of Jerusalem will be called: the Lord, who is our righteousness (CRAMER).

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Passing from the general to the particular, the circumference to the centre, the prophet further declares with respect to the happy future, that in it the promise previously announced will be fulfilled (ver. 4), a sprout of righteousness shall spring from the stock of David, who will restore justice and righteousness in the land (ver. 15), and by whom Judah and Jerusalem will be raised to such a height of prosperity that the latter will actually bear the name “Jehovah our Righteousness” (ver. 16). The race of David shall never die out (ver. 17), nor the priestly tribe of Levi and the priestly service ever cease.

Vers. 14-16. Behold, the days . . . our Righteousness. What is "the good word" in ver. 14? The expression occurs besides in Jeremiah only in xxix. 10. There it refers, as is evident from the mention of the seventy years, to xxv. 11. If the expression is to be taken there in a special sense, so also here. For here we have a still plainer reference to a former promise (xxiii. 5, 6). The reference to the general salvation, i. e., to the most universal manifestation of salvation is thus not excluded. Though this view is favored by the circumstance that the prophet, as already remarked, proceeds in this chapter from the general to the special, yet the special salvation, to which ver. 15 sqq. refer, is the central point comprising all that has been said hitherto, being a condition of all salvation in the widest sense. HENGSENBERG incorrectly accentuates the two prepositions לָךְ and עָלַי. According to the usage of our prophet they are so like each other in signification, that one frequently stands for the other (comp. xxv. 1 coll. ; vii. 1 ; xi. 1, etc. ; xxvi. 15), or by the side of the other with absolutely identical meaning (xi. 2 ; xviii. 11 ; xxiii. 35 ; xxv. 2 ; xxvii. 19 ; xlv. 20).—Ver. 15. In those days, etc. In these words the chronological statement in ver. 14 is resumed after the interruption, so that in sense this beginning coincides with that in xxiii. 5. The addition and that time here as in l. 4, 20 possesses a merely rhetorical significance. It serves to render the declaration more solemn. The alteration from in his days (xxiii. 6) is unimportant. It is however important to note the change of Israel into Jerusalem, this being founded in the connection of the chapter. While the general object of the prophet, as is seen in ver. 14, is to show that the comforting prophecy given in former times, still holds good, notwithstanding the comfortless circumstances in which Jerusalem then was, being sorely pressed by the Chaldeans, yet he cannot avoid somewhat modifying the prophecy in accordance with the present occasion. This occasion according to ver. 4 is the sight of the houses thrown down in defence. In view of this mournful spectacle he had in vers. 6, 7 to promise healing of wounds, rebuilding of the city. He has also here the city of Jerusalem especially in view, though he does not by any means forget Israel, but on the contrary diligently sets forth its share in the promise given to Judah (ver. 14). Hence the alteration to Jerusalem.—With this it is also connected that the last clause states the name which Jerusalem will bear as a significant symbolical inscription. Comp. rems. on xxiii. 6.

Vers. 17, 18. For thus saith Jehovah . . . continually. The principal statement refers neither to ver. 15 nor to ver. 16 exclusively, but to both. Improbable as it must then have appeared at the time of Zedekiah that the house of David, which was reduced so low both inwardly and outwardly, should send forth so excellent and glorious a scion, equally so must the happy condition promised to the people in ver. 16 have appeared. Both however are shown to be possible by the announcement in ver. 17 of the everlasting continuance of the house of David and of its dominion over Israel. Observe, moreover, that it is not said on the throne of David nor on his throne (ver. 21 ; xiii. 13 ; xxii. 4), but on the throne of the house of Israel. The house of Israel is evidently here the whole of Israel, and the eternal duration of David's rule over it involves both the inner and outer rejuvenescence of the Davidic race, and the welfare of the people, which essentially depends thereon, since it may be subjected not to foreign rulers, but to their own native royal family.—A man shall never, etc. Comp. xxxv. 19. The sense of the expression is not, none shall ever be extirpated, but every one shall never be extirpated, so that none will be left. Herein is thus primarily contained only the promise of succession of rulers extending in perpetuum. HENGSTENBERG, however, calls attention to the circumstance (Christol., S. 516) [Eng. Tr., II., p. 464] that we are not to suppose a "perfectly uninterrupted succession," but only one that is not broken off entirely. The prophet moreover reproduces almost verbatim the ancient promise given to the house of David, as it is repeated on the basis of 1 Sam. vii. 16, by David in his parting words to Solomon (1 Kings. ii. 4), and afterwards by the latter himself at his dedication of the temple (1 Kings viii. 25), and finally by the Lord Himself in His renewed promise to Solomon (1 Kings ix. 5).—And to the priests, etc. A second pillar on which rests the redemption and secure continuance of Israel (ver. 16) is the normal permanence of the national priesthood. This is the Levitic.—The Levites is therefore in apposition (comp. Deut. xvii. 9, 13 ; Josh. iii. 3 ; Ezek. xlv. 15 coll. Deut. xxi. 5). The descendants of Levi, who according to the Mosaic law were alone eligible to the priesthood (Num. iii. 10 ; xvi. 40 ; xviii. 7), will be opposed to others who might possibly assume the priesthood to themselves. The question may here arise how this promise of the eternal continuance of the Levitic priesthood is related to other declarations, especially of the Epistle to the Hebrews, according to which this Levitical priesthood as only an inferior stage is to give way to a higher priesthood, viz., that after the order of Melchizedek (Heb. vii.-ix. coll. Jer. iii. 16 ; Ps. cx. 4). I believe that this question must be decided according to the standard of Matt. v. 17, 18. As not a tittle of the law is absolutely abrogated, and thrown aside as worthless, but is kept by being fulfilled and thus being elevated to a higher potency, so also the Levitical priesthood being absorbed by a higher, is lost in its outward, temporal and local form, but in its ideal character is now first established. Hence the expressions of this passage (as well as the related ones in Ezek. xl.-xli.) neither contradict former declarations of Jeremiah (asiii. 16 ; xxxi. 31-33), nor the doctrine of the Epistle to the Hebrews. Comp. rems. on ver. 22 and my review of "BALMER-RINCK, The Prophet Ezekiel's vision of the Temple" in REUTER'S Repertorium, 1860, Heft. III., S. 152.—Who may offer, etc. Comp. Exod. xxix. 18 ; Lev. i. 9, 17 ; ix. 10 ; Num. xviii. 17, etc.—The three species of offerings are mentioned also in xvii. 26 ; Num. xv. 3, 4.

XXXIII. 19-26.

- 19, 20 And the word of Jehovah came to Jeremiah, saying, Thus saith Jehovah :
 If ye will break my covenant¹ of the day and my covenant of the night,
 So that² there shall not be day³ nor night in their season ;
 21 My covenant with David my servant shall also be broken,
 So that he shall have⁴ no son to be king on his throne,—

 23 Moreover the word of Jehovah came to Jeremiah, saying :
 24 Hast thou not seen,⁸ what this people saith,
 “The two families which Jehovah had chosen he has rejected?”⁹
 And thus despise my people, that they are no more a nation before them [in their sight.]
 25 Thus saith Jehovah, If my covenant continue not day and night,

 26 Then will I reject the seed of Jacob, and David my servant,
 That I will not take of his seed rulers over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob :
 For I will reverse their captivity¹¹ and have mercy on them.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The preceding section concluded with the word “continually.” The idea thus briefly intimated, of a perpetual duration of the promised blessing, forms the main thought in what follows. As it does not lie within the power of man to break the covenant of the Lord, which ensures the change of day and night, so also the covenant is not to be broken which guarantees the perpetual succession of Davidic kings and Levitical priests (vers. 19-21). A natural guarantee of this duration will be given by the innumerable increase of the royal and priestly seed (ver. 22). In opposition to the presumptuous speech that Jehovah had chosen Judah and Israel and yet afterwards rejected them, which contains both a complaint against the Lord and a despising of the people (vers. 23 and 24), the assurance is again given that so long as day and night, and the fundamental laws of heaven and earth continue, so long also will kings of Jacob's and David's race rule over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Their rejection is only temporary. The Lord will turn the captivity of the people (vers. 25, 26). From this table of contents it is clear, that vers. 19-26 are related to vers. 14 18, just as in ch. xxxv. vers. 35-37, are to vers. 31-34. In form and character the section fully accords with the character of the prophet, as will be seen from a consideration of the particulars. HIRZIG'S view, which attributes the section to Ezekiel, is deficient in any solid basis. We may indeed infer from the introductory formulas (vers. 19 and 23), that the prophet received these revelations separately, but not that they are disconnected later additions, seeing that these formulas stand in the middle between the large (comp. xxxii. 1), and the small divisions (thus saith Jehovah). Moreover this formula with to Jeremiah, is found all along from ch. xxviii.; xxviii. 12; xxx. 30; xxxii. 26; xxxiii. 1, 19, 23; xxxiv. 12; xxxv. 12; xxxvi. 27; xxxvii. 6; xlii. 7; xliii. 8. Previously we find to me; i. 4, 11; ii. 1; xiii. 3, 8; xvi. 1; xviii. 5; xxiv. 4.

Vers. 19-22. And the word . . . who serve me. To break the covenant on which the changes of day and night are founded, is not in the power of man. For according to the divine promise (Gen. viii. 22) in no circumstances, not even in the case of an apostasy similar to that which occasioned the flood, will any change take place in the laws of nature, so long as the earth stands. In these words it is certainly declared that the earth will one day cease to exist, but it will then, according to the teaching of the Scriptures only pass to a higher stage of existence (Isa. lxx. 17; lxxi. 22; 2 Pet. iii. 13; Rev. xxi. 1), and this transition is not an annulling of the promise given to David, but only leads to a corresponding transition to a higher stage of realization.—My covenant of the day is the covenant which I have concluded with respect to the day, whose object is the day.—David my servant. Comp. 2 Sam. iii. 18; vii. 5, 8; Ezek. xxxiv. 24, etc.—These verses express substantially the same thought as xxxi. 32-37.—As the host, etc. The reference to the promise given to the patriarchs, Gen. xv. 5; xxii. 17; xxxii. 13 is evident, and corresponds with the mention of the same in ver. 26. HENGSTENBERG has pointed out with perfect justice that Jeremiah here by no means prophesies an unlimited increase of the royal and priestly posterity which, as JAHN remarks, would be only a burden on the people. But in perfect accordance with the declaration of the Lord, that all Israel shall be a "kingdom of priests" (Exod. xix. 6), and with the prophetic utterances (Isa. lxi. 6, "and ye shall be named the priests of Jehovah: men shall call you the Ministers of our God;" lxxi. 20, 21, "and I will also take of them to be priests and Levites [Levitic priests]"). Jeremiah here declares that the threefold promise of 1. innumerable increase; 2. the priestly and royal character of the whole people; 3. the everlasting continuance of kingdom and priesthood, will form a grand harmonious chord. If, as cannot be denied, Jeremiah has in view that time, in which all that is ideal will be real, his words cannot (whether he was conscious of it or not, is a matter of indifference), express anything else but this; the priestly and royal seed will be innumerable, because the whole nation having now become innumerable, will consist according to its original and essential idea of priests and kings. The innumerosness of the people, which was never actual even in the times of the highest prosperity (comp. 2 Sam. xxiv. 9) rests on the inclusion of the whole of regenerate humanity (Isa. lxxvi. 20).

Vers. 23-26. Moreover the word . . . have mercy on them. In the preceding verses (20-22) was positively declared the eternal duration of the covenant which Jehovah has concluded with the theocratic kingdom and priesthood: in the following verses this declaration is defended against a malicious attack.—It is altogether wrong to understand by "this people," foreign nations (SCHNURER understands Egypt, JAHN Chaldean warriors, MOVERS Samaritans, HIRZIG the neighbors of the Jews and of Ezekiel on the Chaboras). It was surely not worth the trouble to rebut such an assertion, if it were made by the heathen. Their judgment had no weight in such a case. But when Israelites, who ought to know the relation of their nation to the Lord, subscribed to such pessimism, a counter-testimony was in place.—It is evident that Judah and Israel are meant by the two families. It is clear both from the following phrase "my people," and "seed of Jacob," and "seed of Abraham, etc.," ver. 26. יְשׁוּעָה is often used in Jeremiah of national races; i. 15; x. 25; xxv. 9.—And thus despise, יָנָא is here "cum irrisione spernere," as in general the idea of rejection, rejection with disdain, is related to that of contempt. Comp. xiv. 21 where יָנָא is used as synonymous with יָנָא. These Jews thus pronounce on their own responsibility, without any occasion on the part of the Lord, a sentence of rejection upon their nation, thus on the one hand insulting God, as though He were inconsistent, on the other their nation, as though it were only good enough to be the foot-ball of its Lord's caprice.—A nation before them. From xxxi. 36 coll. xxxv. 19 we see that 1, "to be a nation" signifies national existence in opposition to division and scattering of the constituents of the nation; 2. that "before them" is not to be taken in a temporal but a physical sense; i. e., they maintain that they will no longer be witnesses of that national existence, that their eyes will no longer be gratified by the sight of such prosperity.—If my covenant, etc. Comp. xxxi. 35, 37. The charge is rebutted by an appeal to the guarantee involved in the order of nature. Is this more firmly established than the order of salvation? To supplement it by the following have appointed, as in 2 Sam. xxiii. 5, seems to me forced. If we do not wish to take לֹא according to Job vi. 21 as a substantive, it is sufficient to regard it as a negative particle: if my covenant is not daily and nightly, i. e., has no real, permanent existence.—Then will I reject the seed, etc. Observe that the charge in ver. 24 involved the rejection of both tribes. With a view to this, "seed of Jacob" is placed first as the main conception, "and David my servant", is inserted, because if the charge were well founded, the promise in vers. 17, 18 would also fall to the ground. Since now, however, the seed of Jacob is to remain in possession of his promise, the basis is thus given for the preservation of the seed of David. The priests are no longer spoken of specially, being included in the seed of Jacob. The prophet lays special emphasis on the seed of David, because in ver. 15 he started with this idea as the security and central point of the theocracy. He then connects this idea with that of the seed of Jacob by saying that there shall never fail a descendant of David to rule over the seed of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. In naming the three patriarchs he throws new weight into the scale in favor of the nation. Not only Jacob, but Isaac and Abraham also must have lost favor in the sight of God, if He reject their seed. They, however, are dear for the fathers' sake (Rom. xi. 28, 29 coll. i. 2, 16). Comp. Exod. ii. 24, 25; xxxiii. 13; Lev. xxvi. 42; 2 Kings xiii. 23; Ps. cv. 8-10; Isa. xli. 8.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxxii. 3. "An effect of anger and a procedure almost like that of Ahab with the prophet Micah. The same spirit prevails now-a-days. For without entering on an investigation, with what right or reason men are found who often in pretty general expressions in a call to repentance, borrow from the prophet all sorts of judicial threatening and point to this or that city, we cannot avoid seeing why they are always put in arrest. viz. for this cause, 'Why dost thou prophesy what we do not like to hear?' When one is sure of his cause, a noble disdain of such people would be the best means to use against them. But men cannot bear a bad conscience and threatenings of all sorts together, and the fear that it may be true has the foolish effect, that they cause the bearers of such unpleasant tidings to come to a bad end, in order to affright others from coming with similar messages." 3. On xxxii. 15. "The prophet had often enough declared the land lost to the Chaldeans. Here, however, he must testify that it is not lost forever: his purchase was to restore confidence in the future to other troubled souls. Thus the most afflicted servant of God must again be the most hopeful."—"When we are outwardly prosperous, we think no one can take our prosperity from us, and when trouble comes upon us, we again think that no one can help us. Both courses are, however, equally ungodly. Therefore God's servants must contradict both those who are at ease, and those who are in despair. The reverse is always right. In good days humble thyself, and in bad days let thyself be exalted, for then it is a great thing to do." DIEDRICH.

4. On xxxii. 9, 16, 24, 25. "Jeremiah also contends, but as a servant of the Lord. First he obeys and afterwards speaks about it. This is a noble way, by which every teacher, who knows the Lord, may prove himself. As soon as he observes that the Lord wishes this or that, it is not the time to expostulate, but to act, not to call anything in question, but to set to work. If then any hesitation is left, or one and another scruple, it is time afterwards to consult with the Lord about it, when one has first shown obedience." ZINZENDORF. ["Though we are bound to follow God with an implicit obedience, yet we should endeavor that it may be more and more intelligent obedience. We must never dispute God's statutes and judgments, but we may and must inquire, What mean these statutes and judgments? Deut. vi. 20." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

5. On xxxii. 25. TERTULLIAN (c. Marc., L. IV., c. 40) sees in the words "Buy thee the field for money," the prophetic passage to which Matt. xxvii. 9 refers, regarding the reading ἑλεμύου as correct. Comp. EUSEB. Demonstr. Ev., L. X., c. 4; AUGUSTIN, De consensu Evang., L. III., c. 7.

6. On xxxii. 27. To God there is no wonder [miracle]. There are wonders only on the lower stage of existence. Every higher stage is a wonder to the lower. Or is there only one stage of existence, and accordingly only one order of nature? When the North American savages cruelly murdered one of their number who had been on a visit to the Great Father in Washington, and told them of the wonders of civilization, as a demoniacally possessed liar, were they less in the right than our highly civilized savages, to whom it is a fundamental axiom, that there is no other world, but that which they can reach with their five senses? It is certainly not proved that there is a living, personal, omnipotent God. But this is not to be proved, it is to be felt from the heart. He who is born of God heareth His voice. To him also miracles cease to be aught irrational. He knows well how to distinguish between true and false miracles, but the former come to him like a voice from the higher world, in which he feels truly at home. For the stages of existence and orders of nature are not hermetically sealed towards each other, but the higher break through in order to lift the lower up to themselves.

7. On xxxii. 36 sqq. On the fulfilment of this prophecy comp. the Comm. on xiii. 14, and the Doctrinal notes on iii. 18-25, No. 8. As the threatening that Israel should be dispersed among all nations from one end of the earth to the other (Deut. xxviii. 64-66) has been literally fulfilled, why should not this promise also be literally fulfilled, that they shall be collected from all lands whither the Lord has cast them out? Why cannot this people be destroyed? Why do they retain their peculiarities with such tenacity, that neither the most raging fanaticism, nor the most humane cosmopolitanism, which is much more dangerous than the former, can mingle them with other nations; so that we can follow the course of their national stream through the sea of nations, as it is said of the Rhine that its water flows unmingled through the lake of Constance? Assuredly this people must yet have a future. Only thus much is correct, that the real kernel of these prophecies is offered to us in a shell which the prophets prepared from contemporary events, but it is difficult to determine where the shell ceases and the kernel begins. Comp. RINCK, The Scripturalness of the doctrine of the Millennial reign defended against HENGSTENBERG. Eberfeld, 1866, S. 45 sqq.

8. On xxxii. 26 sqq. "Is the consummation of the redemptive work possible while Israel is rejected as a nation? According to the Old Testament this question must be unconditionally negatived. This knows only a temporary rejection of Israel, which at the same time has this result, that Israel does not perish as a nation, but is preserved for future restoration. Is this law annulled since Israel despised the gracious visitation of the Messiah, the kingdom of God taken from them and given to a people which bring forth the fruits thereof? Are thus the predictions of the prophets, which treat of a glorification of Israel in the latter days, eternally abrogated on account of the nation's sin? Or can their fulfilment be found only in a spiritual manner in the Christian church, the main trunk of which was formed by a chosen few from Israel? These questions are answered in the affirmative by BERTHEAU (Old Testament prophecy of Israel's national glory in their own land. Jahrb. f. deutsche Theol., 1859 and 1860) in accordance with the older protestant theology (comp. especially HOLLAZ, Exam. theolog. ed. Teller, p. 1264 sqq.) as decidedly as according to our conviction they must, on the ground of Rom. i. 25 sqq., be negatived. It seems to us to be irrefragably established that when the times of the world-nations are full (Luke xxi. 24), Israel will obey the gospel call, and thus be prepared to welcome the Messiah (Matt. xxiii. 39); that for this reason in its dispersion among the nations of the earth it has never been absorbed by them, but preserved in separate existence for its final destination, because God's gifts of grace and calling are ἀμεταμέλητα." OEHLER in HERZOG, R.-Enc., XVII., S. 658, 9.

9. On xxxiii. 3. "This is the Lord's declaration to His obedient servant Jeremiah. My dear child, He says, thou hast acted according to my will, without knowing why. Thou hast done well. But I will make it clear to thee, so that thou wilt wonder no more; I will tell thee that and yet more, so that thou wilt at last say, 'Yes, let it be so.' We find such connections a few times elsewhere in the Scriptures. The Lord says, 'How can I hide from Abraham the thing that I do!' (Gen. xviii. 17.) And the same Lord declares to His disciples, whence comes this inclination or predisposition to tell something new to His disciples, 'Henceforth I call you not servants, for the servant knoweth not what his Lord doeth, but I have called you friends, for all things that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you' (John xv. 15). So also is it here with Jeremiah." ZINZENDORF.

10. On xxxiii. 6. Healing, restoration, joy and permanent prosperity are promised by the prophet to Jerusalem at a time when all seemed lost, and it seemed impossible to regain them. How desolate must it have then appeared in Jerusalem when one house after another was thrown down to furnish means of defence! How wildly raged the tumult of war, and how comfortless was the condition of the city shut in by the enemy and completely cut off from the rest of the country! To the mind of him, who then thought of Jerusalem in the future, pictures of destruction alone presented themselves. Jeremiah, however, whose sight was sharpened by the divine anointing, sees beyond the present abomination of desolation in the far distant future pictures of peace and, moreover, of everlasting peace, such as no eye has ever seen, nor hath it entered into the heart of man. There was the patience and faith of the saints (Rev. xiii. 10). 'Impossible' is a word, which does not occur in God's language.

11. On xxxiii. 8. "After the stubborn race has been partly annihilated and partly humbled, God will turn the captivity of the nation, as a whole. Israel cannot perish eternally. God will purify the people from their sins, by forgiveness, the only way in which men can be really freed from sin. Grace and forgiveness are the only ground on which we stand as Christians. This seems nothing to the world, and yet it is more than heaven and earth." DIEDRICH.

12. On xxxiii. 7-13. "An important doctrine meets us in these words, that it is not the gifts of God which we should seek to apprehend, but the love of God which is manifested in that He imputes not our sin to us. Otherwise we treat the Divine benefits like the fishes which swallow the hook with the bait." HEIM and HOFMANN, The major prophets expounded for edification, 1839, S. 509.

13. On xxxiii. 14-17. "All God's promises are at the same time fulfilled by the true man, the Son of Man, the pure sprout of David. He will be a King, in whom we have perfect protection from all destructive agencies, for He will help us from sin, procuring and executing on earth justice and righteousness for all mankind. As we all together inherited sin and death from Adam, so Jesus by His righteousness has brought justification of life for all men, if we would now only take it with joy. Jerusalem will itself bear the King's name, as he was called in xxiii. 6: Jehovah our Righteousness, i. e., that Jehovah bestows on us the righteousness, which is the bond, which at the same time unites us to the citizens of His celestial city." The innocence we here think of is not virtue recovered, that has passed through its season of trial, but it is Moral Perfection, darkened by no thought or knowledge of the contrary. This Paradisaical love is conjugal fondness, free from sensuous taint. This Rural Life is the constant flow of summer days, spent in gardens and afiel, exempt from our exacted toil. This piety of Paradise is the grateful approach of the finite being to the Infinite,—a correspondence that is neither clouded, nor is apprehensive of a cloud." 18. On xxxiii. 18-22. [WORDSWORTH rejects HENGSTENBERG's explanation that these words are to be applied to all Christians indiscriminately, and approves of the argument derived by the ancient Christian fathers from the passage in favor of the threefold order of ministers in the Christian church. He adds "The Gospel of Christ and the Church of Christ possess the spiritual essence of whatever was commanded in the Levitical dispensations. Whatever was local and personal in those dispensations has passed away. The Tabernacle, the Temple, their Sacrifices, their Sabbaths, their Annual Festivals, their threefold Ministry, all these have been spiritualized in the Gospel. Sinai is perpetuated in Zion. God answers: so long as heaven and earth are preserved by Me, it is for the sake of My kingdom, and as a pledge that it will not fail. Israel or, what is the same thing, David's seed shall be a royal seed, and the captivity which the people must now endure is transient. It is however impossible for the worldly to comprehend this, who persist in carnal repose as though no God could punish them, and again in affliction are so despondent, as though there were no God to help them any more." C. Historical Appendix to xxxii. 1-5.

(CHAP. XXXIV. 1-7).

From the introductory words to chh. xxxii. and xxxiii. we perceive that the event, which is here narrated (xxxiv. 1-7), falls in the 10th year of Zedekiah, since the conference, in consequence of which Jeremiah was confined in the court of the prison (xxxii. 3), must be that of which we have an account in this passage. Both passages agree almost verbatim in the announcement of the fate impending on the king and the city (comp. xxxii. 3-5 with xxxiv. 2, 3); especially is the phrase "thy mouth shall speak to His mouth, thine eyes shall see His eyes" peculiar to both. What is said in xxxiv. 4, 5 of the fate of Zedekiah is found in a condensed form in xxxii. 5 in the words, "and there shall he be until I visit him." The concluding words of xxxii. 5 "though ye fight, etc.," are not found in ch. xxxiv. (comp. rems. on xxxii. 1-5).—XXXIV. 1-7 is therefore evidently the special report, written by Jeremiah himself of his conference with Zedekiah. In consequence of this conference he was thrown back into the court, notwithstanding his favorable announcement to Zedekiah, xxxiv. 4, 5. The king might have expected something better from the prophet, as he approached when not called for. It was after this return to the court that Jeremiah received the revelation contained in chh. xxxii. and xxxiii. The event narrated in xxxiv. 1-7 also precedes these two chapters in the order of time. The report of it, perhaps written by the prophet immediately after the interview, is however, as a brief isolated passage, added as an appendix. It is evident that the conversation with Zedekiah did not long precede the facts related in chh. xxxii., xxxiii., from the circumstance that the confinement of Jeremiah in the court, which is spoken of in xxxii. 3 as a consequence of the conversation, was properly a remanding to prison. If then the first confinement, as appears from xxxvii. 17-21, especially ver. 21, falls in the last period of the siege, after the return of the Chaldeans from their diversion against the Egyptians (B. C. 687), the second incarceration cannot be placed earlier, but must be ascribed to a somewhat later date of the same year.

XXXIV. 1-7.

- 1 The word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD [Jehovah] when [or while] Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and all his army, and all the kingdoms of the earth, of [subject to, lit., the dominion of His hand] His dominion, and all the people,
- 2 fought against Jerusalem. and against all the cities thereof, saying, Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel: Go and speak to Zedekiah king of Judah, and tell him, Thus saith the LORD; Behold, I will give this city into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire: And thou shalt not escape out of his hand,
- 3 but shalt surely be taken, and delivered into his hand; and thine eyes shall behold the eyes of the king of Babylon, and he shall speak with thee mouth to mouth,² and 4 thou shalt go to Babylon. Yet [only] hear the word of the LORD, O Zedekiah king of Judah; Thus saith the LORD of thee, Thou shalt not die by the sword: But thou shalt die in peace; and with the burnings³ of thy fathers, the former kings which were before thee, so shall they burn *odors*⁴ for thee; and they will lament thee, saying, Ah [alas] lord! for I have pronounced the word [spoken a word], saith the LORD. Then Jeremiah the prophet spake all these words unto Zedekiah king of Judah in Jerusalem. When [while] the king of Babylon's army [power] fought against Jerusalem, and against all the cities of Judah that were left, against Lachish, and against Azekah: for these defenced cities remained of the cities of Judah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

During the siege (ver. 1) Jeremiah receives command to go and announce to king Zedekiah that the city will be given into the hands of the king of Babylon and burned (ver. 2). Zedekiah himself will be captured, brought before the king, and carried to Babylon (ver. 3). Yet he will not perish by the sword (ver. 4), but die in peace and be interred with royal honors, after the traditional manner (ver. 5). Jeremiah executed this commission punctually (ver. 6) at the time when Jerusalem and the still uncaptured fortified cities of Lachish and Azekah were being besieged (ver. 7).

Vers. 1-5. The word . . . saith Jehovah. The style in vers. 1, 2 bears the character of great diffuseness, such as is peculiar to Jeremiah in the later period of his ministry. Hence such phrases as all the people, ver. 1, and tell him, ver. 2, which strictly taken are superfluous, need not surprise us.—Of the dominion of his hand. This addition is a restriction and definition of the earth; not all kingdoms of the earth, but of the earth in so far as it was the "dominion of his hand." Comp. li. 28; 1 Ki. ix. 19.—Go, etc. Two questions here present themselves which it is not easy to answer. 1. How is the conference with Zedekiah here narrated connected with the other mentioned in xxxii. 3; xxxvii. 17? 2. What relation does that bear which is said in vers. 4, 5 of Zedekiah's end, to the other declarations concerning it (xxxix. 5-7; lii. 9-11; 2 Ki. xxv. 6, 7)? These two questions seem to be heterogeneous. There is, however, a close connection between them, for which reason we investigate the second question here instead of at vers. 4, 5.

Are the words of the prophet in vers. 2-5 to be understood in a good sense for Zedekiah, or as a menace? All depends on the understanding of the sentence yet hear, etc., ver. 4. VENEMA, CHR. B. MICHAELIS, HITZIG and GRAF are of opinion that this sentence proposes an exceptional case, viz., in case Zedekiah obeys the command to give himself up to the Chaldeans the threatening pronounced against him in ver. 3 will not be fulfilled, but he will die in quiet possession of his throne. The reasons urged for this explanation are: The pleasant prospect, which in vers. 4, 5 is placed before Zedekiah, would contradict the elsewhere constantly repeated exhortation to surrender himself; it would also be otherwise too favorable. Here it is presupposed that ver. 5 can be understood only of the quiet possession of the throne and of a peaceful end and honorable interment, which Zedekiah will receive as the reigning king. Aside from ver. 4 a, this explanation would certainly be possible. It is, however, also possible to understand ver. 5 as an antithesis to "thou shalt not die by the sword," not a violent death in battle, but a natural, peaceful end. This might be, even if Zedekiah died a prisoner (comp. lii. 11), as imprisonment is not necessarily a hinderance to the usual funeral obsequies. The Jews were generally well treated while in captivity,—many of them enjoyed the favor of the rulers, and excited the envy of the natives by their preferment, and most of them were undesirous of returning to their native land.—Jehoiachin was elevated to royal honors after twenty-seven years' confinement (lii. 31). Why may not Zedekiah have been kept in mild imprisonment and permission have been given to the Jews after his death to bury their king according to the custom of their country? This appears to be the only possible explanation, as the sentence "Thus saith the Lord of thee," ver. 4 b, cannot be other than a summary of the word of God, which, according to ver. 4 a, Zedekiah is to hear. I leave out of account that the other explanation would require "Listen to" or "Heed" the word, and also a designation of the divine word to which Zedekiah is to listen. But it would be indispensable that "hear the word," etc., should be plainly designated as a condition, and what follows as a consequence of the condition's being fulfilled. As the words now read ver. 4 b can be taken only as the word which Zedekiah is to hear. Ver. 4 a then expresses no condition, but in vers. 4 and 5 a restriction or more exact definition (not a continuation, as HITZIG supposes), is added to ver. 3. In ver. 3 it was said that Zedekiah should be captured and taken to Babylon. Vers. 4 and 5 mitigate this harsh sentence, adding that he shall not die by violence there, but in peace and be buried with royal honors. Thus rendered, the passage harmonizes with the other intimations, which are given with respect to the end of the king: xxxii. 5; xxxix. 5-7; lii. 9-11; 2 Ki. xxv. 6, 7. Is then this declaration adapted to excite the anger of the king? Though the first part of it is gloomy, the second presents some points of comfort. The terrible fate which befel the tyrant Jehoiakim (the words "will lament thee," ver. 5, are in evident contrast to xxii. 18) will not be Zedekiah's. His fate, when the severest crisis is past, will take a (relatively) better turn; he will at least enjoy a respectful treatment as a prisoner, and indeed again receive honor after death. Zedekiah is thus relatively favored. Should he for this have the prophet confined, as must have been the case if the conference reported here be identical with that mentioned in xxxii. 3? According to chh. xxxvii. and xxxviii., where the whole history of the relations between Zedekiah and the prophet is related according to its main features, the former confined the latter in the court only with benevolent intentions. In the first instance the court of the guard was assigned as a mitigation in contrast to the terrible detention he had suffered in the prison of Jonathan, the Scribe (xxxvii. 20). Afterwards the court of the guard was again assigned him out of kindness, after his still more terrible confinement in the pit (xxxviii. 13). Chh. xxxvii. and xxxviii. make the general impression that Zedekiah kept the prophet in custody only on account of the princes. Had it not been for these he would have given him his entire freedom (comp. xxxviii. 5). It should, moreover, be observed that according to xxiv. 2 Jeremiah seeks the king freely, while according to chh. xxxvii. sq. this scarcely seems possible. Then we have reports of two conferences of Jeremiah with the king. On the first he is brought from strict confinement in the house of Jonathan (xxxvii. 17), on the second he is brought after his deliverance from the pit (xxxviii. 14). The fear, which Jeremiah expresses on this latter occasion, shows that he had no desire to present himself before the king. Thus it appears as if the different accounts of Jeremiah's conferences with Zedekiah would not agree, especially does a confinement in the court of the guard as a punishment, according to xxxii. 3, seem to agree neither with chh. xxxvii. and xxxviii. nor with xxxii. 2-5. Meanwhile as the apparent want of agreement itself excludes the idea of an interpolation, and as there is nothing in the language which betrays a strange hand, we are forced to the hypothesis that in xxxii. 1-5 and xxxiv. 1-5 we have an account of a conference of Zedekiah with Jeremiah which is distinct from the two narrated in xxxvii. 17-20 and xxxviii. 14-16. From the words "wilt thou not certainly put me to death," xxxviii. 15, it is clear that Jeremiah did not expect a very kindly disposition on the part of the king. It is conceivable that the court was assigned him as a place of punishment, when after a voluntary visit to the king (comp. xxii. 1), he was dismissed with the ungracious words "back into the court!" Although, as we have shown, the words in xxxiv. 4, 5 are relatively favorable to the king, yet he may have expected something better of the prophet when he appeared uncalled for and have accordingly become indignant at the essentially invariable prediction of the capture of the city and his own imprisonment. If it is asked what was the object of this address to the king, not occasioned by the king but commanded by God, it is surprising that the prophet does not say what the fate of the city will be in case of voluntary submission (comp. xxxviii. 17). He does not, however, say fully what will be the fate of the king in case of stubborn refusal to surrender. Nothing is here said of Zedekiah's children together with the princes of Israel being killed before his eyes, of his own eyes being put out (lii. 10), or of his wives being given to the Babylonian princes (xxxviii. 21-23). This lack of an alternative distinguishes the present passage from xxi. 9; xxxviii. 2, 17.

This passage reads like an unconditional sentence, in which, however, it is expressly remarked that this still severe sentence is yet to be regarded as a mitigation. (Comp. vers. 4 and 5 with xxii. 18). It accordingly seems probable that this passage, together with the prophecy closely connected with it in chh. xxxii. and xxxiii., belongs to the period indicated in xxxviii. 28, i. e. to the period after the last exhortation which the prophet addressed to Zedekiah conditionally. Now a simple announcement is made to him of what will take place. The possibility that Zedekiah may yet tread the path of deliverance so often pointed out to him, is no longer thought of. It is still a great favor that the full terrible reality is not yet disclosed to him. He doubtless owed this as well as the relative mildness of his sentence to the good-will he had manifested towards the prophet. It certainly seems, as remarked above, that this announcement of his sentence, by the prophet who comes before him uncalled-for, first irritated him towards the latter, on which supposition the words, "Wherefore dost thou prophesy?" in xxxii. 3, would be explained.

And with the burnings of thy fathers. The burning of the dead was not a Jewish custom. Burning alive only occurs as a punishment, Lev. xx. 14; xxi. 9 coll. Isa. vii. 25—and there is a trace of burning corpses in time of pestilence in Am. vi. 10 (if כִּשְׂרָפִים=כִּסְרָפִים). At any rate in the present passage it is the burning of spices which is meant, 2 Chron. xvi. 14; xxi. 19. With this also will agree the dative of the pronoun and the form of the verb. Comp. the verb with the accusative of the thing and the dative of the person for whom the sacrifice is burned. Exod. xxx. 20; Lev. vii. 5; 2 Chron. xiii. 11. [CALVIN says, that to prevent putrefaction, the bodies of the dead were dried by a slow fire, but only at the burial of kings.—S. R. A.]

For I have spoken a word. Not merely breath, but a word which is spirit, life, power has the Lord uttered. (Comp. Deut. xxii. 47; Ps. xxxiii. 4; ex. 160; Prov. xxx. 5; Isa. xl. 8; lv. 10, 11; Jer. xxxiii. 29). The expression "I have spoken," without "word," is found with special frequency in Ezekiel, v. 13, 15, 17; xvi. 21, 24, etc.

Vers. 6, 7. Then Jeremiah . . . cities of Judah. The performance of the task is mentioned as a proof that Jeremiah had the courage to appear before the king with a message, which was by no means such as he wished to hear in a time of severe affliction.—Lachish and Azekah were both situated in the Sephela, the low country in the south-western part of the tribe of Judah (Jer. xv. 33, 35, 39). They were both fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 9). Lachish was besieged by Sennacherib (2 Ki. xviii. 14, 17; xix. 8; Isa. xxxvi. 2; xxxvii. 8). [“This celebrated siege is supposed by Layard to be depicted on certain slabs disinterred from the ruins of Nineveh.”—COWLES].—Fortified cities cannot well be taken as in apposition to cities of Judah, because this addition would either be superfluous or would give the wrong thought that unfortified cities were still left. It cannot also well be attached as a definition to remained: nam hęc oppida ex oppidis Judę munita supererant (ROSENUELLER). It is not credible that there were no other fortified cities besides these. It can only be in apposition to these; these, as fortified cities, were still left. The reason of their remaining is thus expressed, and this reason was the strength of their fortifications.

11. Historical Appendix to the Collection of Discourses.

(CHAP. XXXIV. 8-22 and CHAP. XXXV.)

At the close of the collected discourses we find two portions which may be regarded as an appendix, inasmuch as they afford a glaring instance of Israel's disobedience towards Jehovah, in contrast with the obedience of a non-Israelitish tribe towards the command of their ancestor. The history of the discharge of servants, ordered in the pressure of distress but taken back when the danger seemed to be past, is a proof how lightly obedience to Jehovah's law sat on the hearts of the Israelites, while the obedience of the Rechabites to their ancestral ordinances was deeply rooted and impregnable. Although the two portions are chronologically far apart, the first belonging to the tenth year of Zedekiah (more exactly to the time of the temporary suspension of the siege), the second to the reign of Jehoiakim (more exactly when the first invasion of the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar was expected); yet it is quite appropriate that they should stand side by side, since, as remarked above, the second serves as a foil to the first.

The reason for placing the older portion last may be that the following chapter (xxxvi.) belongs to the same period, viz., the fourth year of Jehoiakim.

The division into two parts is very clear and simple. The facts are narrated in xxxiv. 8-11. Then in vers. 12-16 the facts are recapitulated by the prophet with reference to the legal enactments, finally in vers. 17-22 the divine sentence is pronounced on the covenant-breaking Israelites.—Chap. xxxv. is plainly divisible into two halves. In the first (vers. 1-11) the facts are again related, in the second the parallel is drawn between the behaviour of the Rechabites and of Israel, and corresponding recompense announced to both.

A. THE DISOBEDIENCE OF THE ISRAELITES SHOWN IN THEIR BEHAVIOUR IN SETTING FREE THEIR SERVANTS.

XXXIV. 8-22.

- 8 This is the word that came unto Jeremiah, from the LORD, after that the king Zedekiah had made a covenant with all the people which were at Jerusalem, to 9 proclaim liberty unto them;¹ That every man should let his man-servant, and every man his maid servant, being an Hebrew or an Hebrewess, go free; that none should 10 serve himself of them;² to wit, of a Jew his brother. Now when all the princes, and all the people, which had entered into the covenant, heard that every one should let his man-servant, and every one his maid-servant, go free, that none should serve themselves of them any more, then they obeyed, and let them go.
 11 But afterward they turned, and caused the servants and the handmaids, whom they had let go free, to return, and brought them into subjection for [or compelled
 12 them to be]³ servants and for handmaids.⁴ Therefore the word of the LORD came 13 to Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; I made a covenant with your fathers in the day that I brought them forth out of 14 the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondmen, saying, At the end of seven years let ye go every man his brother an Hebrew, which hath been sold [or who hath sold himself] unto thee; and when he hath served thee six years, thou shalt let him go free from thee: but your fathers hearkened not unto me, neither inclined 15 their ear, And ye were now [to-day] turned, and had done right in my sight, in proclaiming liberty every man to his neighbor; and ye had made a covenant before me in the house which is called by my name [whereupon my name is called]:

- 16 but ye turned and polluted my name, and caused every man his servant, and every man his handmaid, whom he had set at liberty at their pleasure, to return, and brought them into subjection [compelled them], to be unto you for servants and for handmaids.
- 17 Therefore thus saith the LORD [Jehovah], Ye have not hearkened unto me, in proclaiming liberty, every one to his brother, and every man to his neighbor: behold, I proclaim a liberty for you, saith the LORD [Jehovah], to the sword, to the pestilence, and to the famine; and I will make you to be removed⁵ into all the
- 18 kingdoms of the earth. And I will give⁶ [or deliver] the men that have transgressed my covenant, which [who] have not performed the words of the covenant which they had made before me, when they cut the calf in twain, and passed between the parts thereof, the princes of Judah, and the princes of Jerusalem, the eunuchs, and the priests, and all the people of the land, which passed between the
- 20 parts of the calf; I will even give them into the hands of their enemies, and into the hands of them that seek their life: and their dead bodies shall be for meat
- 21 unto the fowls of the heaven, and to the beasts of the earth. And Zedekiah, king of Judah, and his princes will I give into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of them that seek their life, and into the hand of the king of Babylon's
- 22 army, which are gone up from you. Behold, I will command, saith the LORD, and cause them to return to this city; and they shall fight against it, and take it, and burn it with fire; and I will make the cities of Judah a desolation without an inhabitant.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 8-11. This is the word . . . for servants and for handmaids. Though the expression "to make a covenant" generally means that two persons pledge themselves to a mutual performance, which accrues to the advantage of both parties, the expression here denotes a performance which all do in common in the interest of a third, from which, however, advantage is expected for all. For the setting free was chiefly for the advantage of those set free. It was, however, also hoped that it would be for the general good, account being taken partly of the gratitude of the freedmen and their increased activity in the defence, partly perhaps also of the favor of Jehovah thus to be procured. It is clear that the word "covenant" is thus employed in essentially the same sense as usual.—To proclaim liberty unto them. The expression is found in this sense besides only in Lev. xxv. 10; Isa. lxi. 1; Ezek. xlvi. 17. Them of course refers to the servants mentioned afterwards. The law on this point is found in Exod. xxi. 1 sqq.; Lev. xxv. 39-41; Deut. xv. 12. Every servant of Hebrew origin was to be set free after six years' service (without respect to the Sabbatical year); according to Lev. xxv. this was to be done in the year of jubilee. This involves no contradiction, for in Lev. xxv. it is the law of the jubilee year which is given. The former enactment is merely supplemented from this point of view, the jubilee year is to end the service unconditionally, wherefore the price was to be determined by the time intervening before the jubilee (ver. 50 sqq. where it is the sale of Israelitish servants to heathen inhabitants which is spoken of, but there is no reason to doubt the application of this rule to the purchase by Israelites). Comp. SAALSCHUETZ, Mos. Recht. Kap., 14 and 101, § 3.—These legal prescriptions had, like so many others, remained unobserved. The reformation under Josiah may have revived the knowledge, but not the observance of them. The pressure of the siege aroused the thought that the observance of this law might be of use in both the ways above indicated. They therefore pledged themselves on the king's demand by mutual agreement to set free the Hebrew servants and maids, and as appears from ver. 9, all of them, even those who had not served six years. The supererogation with regard to some was outweighed by their short-comings with respect to the others. But—and this is a striking instance of false conversion, springing from bad motives,—when the danger seemed over on the withdrawal of the Chaldeans, they brought the servants again under the yoke.

Vers. 12-16. Therefore the word . . . for handmaids.—In the day. Comp. vii. 22; xi. 4; xxxi. 32.—House of bondmen. Themselves delivered from oppressive servitude, Israel should be kind towards their servants, which is expressly designated in Deut. xv. 15 as the motive of the law of manumission.—At the end of seven years cannot mean at the end of every seven years. This would contradict what follows, "after he has served six years," and the similar legal enactments (Exod. xxi. 2; Deut. xv. 12). It can only signify at the close of a septennium. The preposition ב then retains its proper signification;—from the close, i. e., when the close of the septennium, the seventh year, has begun. Comp. similar expressions in Deut. xv. 1; xiv. 28 coll. xxxi. 10.—Who hath sold himself. These words are a quotation from memory from Deut. xv. 12.—Turned, vers. 15 and 16. The meaning of the verb is the same in both cases, only the termini a quo and in quem are opposite.—Called, by my name. Every transgression of the divine commands, but especially a breach of a covenant sworn in His name, is a desecration thereof (comp. Lev. xix. 12; xx. 3).—At their pleasure. The expression occurs also in Deut. xxi. 14. It is there used of the captive woman, married but afterwards disapproved. Here the antithesis is evidently not property or family, so that the sense would be, what she possesses belongs to her, but thou shalt set her person at liberty. But the antithesis is the unfreedom of the sold, who must go wherever his master sends him, and the freedom of the dismissed, to go wherever he wishes. The word-then=according to, or at, their pleasure, וְצִוּוּ being regarded as the seat of desire, as in the expression "if it be your mind," Gen. xxiii. 8; 2 Kings ix. 15.

Vers. 17-22. Therefore . . . without an inhabitant.—Liberty is used the second time in ver. 17 ironically; because ye did not proclaim liberty (that which is taken back again directly is as good as none), liberty shall be proclaimed to you, but a liberty of which you will be the victims. [I set you, whom I have hitherto regarded as my servants, free, deliver you over, to your fate, to the sword, etc.—HITZIG].—The calf. Ver. 18 seems to me better connected with I will give [make], in which we are grammatically fully justified (comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 69, 3). So also LUTHER and others. The symbolical meaning of the rite here alluded to appears then immediately applied, in order to present before the covenant breakers the threatening punishment. They themselves are to be the calf cut in two. On this rite comp. Gen. xv. 10, and DELITZSC thereupon. According to the other explanation, "the calf" is in opposition to "the covenant." Then, however, the similarity in the fate of the transgressor to that of the calf, is only implicitly hinted at, not expressed. The late and anacoluthic resumption "I will give," in ver. 21, is then also troublesome.—In ver. 19 chiefs of tribes, city-chiefs (elders of the city), courtiers, priests and common people, are distinguished. When afterwards, verse 21, his princes are again mentioned with the king, we must attribute this to Jeremiah's diffuseness, and emphasize it the less, as it is very common to mention the king and princes together (xxiv. 8; xxv. 19, etc.).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxxiv. 8-11. "The peculiar difference between hypocritical repentance and true conversion. The hypocrites when they do penance, do it (1.) not from faith, but from fear of distress and danger, in which they are at the time; (2.) they do not make a change in all points of disobedience, but only in the ethical, as here with the jubilee year, as if there were nothing more to be altered; (3.) they do such things as make a show for the people and have a high regard, as the manumission, letting loose the rabble, would have a great noise and show, but meanwhile there were few thoughts of faith, love, fear of God, hope and thanksgiving; (4.) such penitence does not last long, but as soon as the distress finds a hole, the devotion goes with it." CRAMER.

2. On ver. 12. "Quæ locutione mystica (verbum Jovæ factum esse a Jovæ) qualis etiam, Gen. xix. 24, innuitur mysterium Trinitatis juxta regulam Lutheri commendatam nobis in aureo scripto de ultimis verbis Davidis. Insinuat enim hæc et similibus loquendi formulis pluralitas personarum, ut hic Filii et Spiritus sancti." FÖRSTEN.

3. On xxxiv. 15, 16. "Converted, but not rightly; friendship made when the foot is on the neck, Pharisaic repentance. Yet thus, there is often an interval, a period of rest and of refreshment for the kingdom of Christ. And God has this in view when He extorts conversions of this kind." ZINZENDORF.

4. On xxxiv. 15, 16, 18-22. The Jews thus committed a double sin: 1. They did not keep the promise made to each other and to the servants; 2. They desecrated the name of God by their disobedience and breach of the oath sworn in God's name and house.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

True repentance in distinction from false. 1. The occasion may be the same in both; external distress (comp. ex. gr., Isa. xxviii. 19; 1 Cor. xi. 32; Tit. ii. 12). 2. In false penitence the inward disposition remains unchanged; in true penitence man turns inwardly with pain and sorrow from evil and to God. 3. False penitence lasts as long only as the outward need; true penitence is a permanent condition of the heart, and notwithstanding single backslidings, advances to a more complete subjugation of the old man (the old Adam in us is to be drowned and perish by daily sorrow and repentance).

B. THE COUNTERPART TO THE DISOBEDIENCE OF THE ISRAELITES: THE OBEDIENCE OF THE RECHABITES (CHAP. XXXV.).

1. The Fact.

XXXV. 1-11.

1 The word which came unto Jeremiah from the LORD in the days of Jehoiakim
 2 the son of Josiah king of Judah, saying, Go unto the house of the Rechabites, and 3 speak unto them, and bring them into the house of the Lord, into one of the cham-
 4 bers, and give them wine to drink. Then I took Jaazaniah the son of Jeremiah,
 5 the son of Habaziah, and his brethren, and all his sons, and the whole house
 6 of the Rechabites; And I brought them into the house of the LORD, into the 7 chamber of the sons of Hanan, the son of Igdaliah, a man of God, which was by 8 the chamber of the princes, which was above the chamber of Maasiah the son of 9 Shallum, the keeper of the door [or, threshold]. And I set before the sons of the 10 house of the Rechabites pots¹ full of wine, and cups, and I said unto them, Drink 11 ye wine. But they said, We will drink no wine: for Jonadab the son of Rechab our father commanded us, saying, Ye shall drink no wine, neither ye, nor your sons for ever: Neither shall ye build house, nor sow seed, nor plant vineyard, nor have any: but all your days ye shall dwell in tents: that ye may live many days in the land where ye be strangers. Thus have we obeyed the voice of Jonadab the son of Rechab our father in all that he hath charged us, to drink no wine all our days, we, our wives, our sons, nor our daughters; nor to build houses for us to dwell in:
 neither have we vineyard, nor field, nor seed: but we have dwelt in tents, and have obeyed, and done according to all that Jonadab our father commanded us.
 But it came to pass, when Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came up into the land, that we said, Come, and let us go to Jerusalem for fear of the army of the Chal-deans, and for fear of the army of the Syrians: so we dwell at Jerusalem.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 5.— כַּדָּיִם , related to כַּדָּיִם , hill, designates here a larger round vessel (crater), from which the cups were filled. Comp. Gen. xlv. 2, 5, 12.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-5. The word . . . Drink ye wine. As the Rechabites did not live in houses, the house of the Rechabites must be taken in a gentile sense. The Rechabites were a branch of that tribe of Kenites, which springing from Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses (Num. x. 29), migrated with the Israelites from the desert to Canaan, and were therefore closely connected with them politically, as well as religiously (comp. Jud. i. 16; iv. 11; 1 Sam. xv. 6; xxvii. 10; xxx. 29). To what an extent this, especially the latter, was the case may be learned from what is said of Jonadab, the ancestor and law-giver of the Rechabites, in the book of Kings (2 Kings x. 15, 23). The injunctions which, according to vers. 6, 7, Jonadab laid on his descendants, were doubtless for the purpose of preserving their nomadic state and avoiding the evils of stationary and agricultural life. Jonadab appears to have forbidden the drinking of wine, not merely for the sake of the immediate consequences, which it might easily have, but also that the love of wine might not be the occasion of their becoming settled. The conscientiousness with which the Rechabites after three centuries still followed the commands of their ancestor, is a testimony that they held him in high honor. That he deserved this honor, and that it was shown him by others during his life-time, is seen in the respect with which Jehu treated him, taking him as a witness of his zeal in the service of Jehovah. Comp. KEIL on 2 Kings x. 12-17.—

The לְשֹׁכֵי הַבָּיִת were rooms in the buildings enclosing the fore-courts, appropriated to various uses (1 Chron. xxviii. 12 coll. ix. 26; Jer. xxxvi. 10, 12, 20, 21; Ezer. x. 6; Neh. x. 38). One of these rooms, which must have been a hall corresponding to the number of the persons, was named after "the sons of Hanan, the son of Igdaliah, the man of God." It is not known who this Hanan was. From the designation "man of Elohim," we may infer that he was a prophet (comp. Deut. xxxiii. 1; Josh. xiv. 8; 1 Sam. ii. 26; ix. 8, 10, etc.), and from "sons" (comp. 1 Kings. xx. 35; 2 Kings ii. 3, 5, 7, 15, etc.), that the room was a place of assemblage used by him and his pupils and adherents. Maaseiah, the threshold-keeper (of which there were three, iii. 24; 2 Kings xxv. 18, and who stood in rank immediately after the פֶּהַן קִשְׁנָה. Comp. 2 Kings xxiii. 4) is probably identical with the Maaseiah, whose son Zephaniah was a "second priest" (iii. 24; xxxvii. 3; xxix. 25, xxi. 1).—Of the region inhabited by the Rechabites we have no further indication than the brief notice, 1 Chron. ii. 55, from which we learn merely that they dwelt in the tribe of Judah. Jud. i. 16 agrees with this, where it is said of the Kenites, that they settled in the wilderness of Judah, which lies south of Arad (near the wilderness of Kadesh to the south of Hebron, RAUMER, Paläst., S. 172). As they were Nomads, they needed land suited to this mode of life. There is no objection to their southern position from the approach of the enemies from the North. For they might justly fear an inundation of the whole land, and therefore sought refuge in Jerusalem betimes, before they were cut off.

Ver. 11. Army of the Syrians. Aram is Syria in the more restricted sense. Before B. C., 738, when it became an Assyrian province, it played an important part among the foes of the Israelites (2 Sam. viii. 3 sqq., etc.), and afterwards it still appears among their number in the train of Assyria (Isa. ix. 11), as here in that of Babylon (comp. 2 Kings xxiv. 2).

2. The Application.

XXXV. 12-19.

12, 13 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth], the God of Israel; Go and tell the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Will ye not receive instruction to hearken 14 to my words? saith the LORD. The words¹ of Jonadab the son of Rechab, that he commanded his sons not to drink wine, are performed; for unto this day they drink none, but obey their father's commandment: notwithstanding I have spoken unto you, rising early and speaking [i. e., zealously and unceasingly²]; but ye 15 hearkened not unto me. I have sent also unto all my servants the prophets, rising up early and sending³ them, saying Return ye now every man from his evil way, and amend your doings, and go not after other gods to serve them, and ye shall dwell in the land⁴ which I have given to you and to your fathers: but ye have 16 not inclined your ear, nor hearkened unto me. Because the sons of Jonadab the son of Rechab have performed the commandment of their father, which he com- 17 manded them; but this people hath not hearkened unto me: Therefore thus saith the LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring upon Judah, and upon all the inhabitants of Jerusalem all the evil that I have pronounced against them: because I have spoken unto them, but they have not heard; and I have 18 called unto them, but they have not answered. And Jeremiah said unto the house of the Rechabites, Thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Because ye have obeyed the commandment of Jonadab your father, and kept all his precepts, 19 and done according unto all that he hath commanded you: Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel; Jonadab the son of Rechab shall not want a man to stand before me for ever.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The commands of Jonadab, the Rechabite, have been kept centuries after his death by his people who are not descendants of Abraham, and who consequently participate in the covenant of promise only mediately, and in the second line. Israel, however, has not obeyed the commands of Jehovah, the God of hosts, though they have been presented and inculcated unceasingly by prophets. Therefore all the threatenings pronounced by the Lord on Israel shall be fulfilled. But to the Rechabites it is promised, that Jonadab shall not want a man to stand before Jehovah.

Vers. 12-15. Then came . . . hearkened unto me. From "go," ver. 13, we see that Jeremiah was to speak these words, not in the "chamber," but outside, to the people.—Instruction. Comp. ii. 30; xxxii. 33.—Return ye now, etc. Comp. xxv. 5.

Vers. 16-19. Because the sons . . . forever.— Shall not want a man. Comp. rems. on xxxiii. 17.—To stand before me. As this expression involves the idea of service (comp. Comm. on vii. 10), and according to the connection that of the priestly service or worship (comp. Comm. on xv. 19), it is not merely the continuance of the Rechabite family, but its perseverance in the worship of Jehovah. It is said that there are still Rechabites in Asia. WOLFF, the missionary to the Jews, met them in Mesopotamia and Yemen. WOLFF designates the desert of Yemen near Senaar, as the proper residence of these Rechabites, who still assert their origin from Hobab, the brother-in-law of Moses. Comp. Dr. JOSEPH WOLFF's Travels.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. As the Lord says to the Jews of His time, Luke xi. 31, 32, that the queen of the South and the people of Nineveh will rise up in the judgment against the people of this generation, and will condemn them, for a greater than Solomon or Jonah is here, so might Jeremiah say to his contemporaries that the Rechabites would rise up against them, and condemn them, for a greater than Jonadab is here.

2. The Rechabites' obedience to their ancestor's command is in itself praiseworthy and exemplary. It is in perfect accordance with the fourth Commandment. Comp. Ecclus. iii. Were the Rechabites equally conscientious in their observance of the Divine commands? Would not a custom contrary to the divine command have been retained with equal tenacity on the authority of their chief? The family feeling and national spirit are natural. They do not mortify our flesh. They may, for the sake of the honor and interest of our family, which is mediately our own personal honor and interest, impel us to the most difficult performances. I have heard of children, on whom the inculcation of the divine commands made little impression; but when they were told, it is the King's will, they did what was desired of them. Comp. Mark vii. 8 sqq.

3. "All families could not pursue Rechab's mode of life, nor should they. God gives many different callings; happy are they who can feel content in the most simple, and who constantly preserve the feeling of being pilgrims in this world. It is also not contrary to God's ordering that distinct families, ranks and callings, are formed, or that special plans are adopted for the exercise of partnerships in certain times and circumstances, just as the church at Jerusalem introduced a kind of community of goods. We are only not to perceive any special sanctity in such arrangements; they are only practices, and all depends on the mind in which they are undertaken." DIEDRICH.

4. "*Abuti conseruerunt hac narratione de Rechabitis Monachi ad stabiliendam vitam monasticam, quemadmodum Bellarminus ex hoc capite causam eorum agere conatur (De Mon. HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

True obedience shown in the example of Israel and the Rechabites. 1. The Rechabites put Israel to shame, in so far as they obey the command of their earthly ancestor, while the latter does not obey the Lord's command. 2. The obedience of the Rechabites to the command of their earthly ancestor is however no pledge of their obedience to the commands of God. 3. Obedience to God's commands is guaranteed only among the spiritual Israel, i. e., among those, who by the Holy Spirit have become members of a higher order of nature, in which the will of God is written in the hearts of all, and has consequently become the innermost principle of life.—Or, 1. In respect to legal obedience the Jews are surpassed by the Rechabites (the difference between the two). 2. The obedience of the Rechabites to their ancestor does not guarantee their obedience to God (equality of the two). 3. Only spiritual Israel bears in itself the guarantee of obedience to God's command (the higher third).

SECOND DIVISION.

Historical Presentation of the most important Events from the fourth year of Jehoiakim to the close of the Prophet's ministry.

(B. C. 605—570).

CHAPTERS XXXVI.—XLIV.

To the collection of discourses and its appendices are now added historical sections. These contain, with the exception of the beginning and the conclusion, a continuous historical narrative. The beginning is formed by a single but highly important event of the fourth and fifth years of Jehoiakim's reign—the writing out of the prophecies (ch. xxxvi.) The conclusion (ch. xlv.) is formed by a portion, which, after a pause embracing 16-18 years, gives an account of Jeremiah's last appearance, in the midst of the people even in Egypt still devoted to idolatry. From ch. xxxvii. to ch. xlviii. the events are continuously narrated, which occurred from the beginning of Zedekiah's reign up to the arrival of the fugitive remnant in Egypt. It should be remarked that the presentation begins indeed with the beginning of Zedekiah's reign, but hurries rapidly over the first ten years (xxxviii. 1, 2) and begins the connected narrative with the imprisonment of the prophet, which took place in the tenth year of this king. The thread on which the events are hung is the personal experience of the prophet; the behaviour of the people towards the Lord's servant being both the ground and consequence of the fate which befel them. The single portions of this section may be arranged as follows:

A. The events before the capture of Jerusalem, chh. xxxvi.—xxxviii.

I. The writing out of the prophecies in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, ch. xxxvi.

1. The command and first writing, xxxvi. 1-8.
2. The reading to the people, xxxvi. 9-18.
3. The reading to the king, xxxvi. 19-26.
4. The prediction of punishment to Jehoiakim and the second writing, xxxvi. 27-32.

II. The events in the tenth and eleventh years of Zedekiah, chh. xxxvii. and xxxviii.

1. The embassy of the king and the imprisonment of the prophet in its first and second stages, ch. xxxvii.
2. Jeremiah in the pit (third stage of imprisonment), his conference with the king and confinement in the court of the guard (fourth stage of imprisonment), ch. xxxviii.

B. The events after the capture of Jerusalem, chh. xxxix.—xlv.

1. Jeremiah liberated from the court of the guard, and delivered to Gedaliah, xxxviii. 28 b—xxxix. 14.
2. Appendix to xxxix. 1-14; the promise made to Ebed-melech the Cushite, xxxix. 15-18.
3. Jeremiah liberated in Ramah and delivered the second time to Gedaliah, xl. 1-6.
4. The gathering of the people under Gedaliah, xl. 7-16.
5. The murder of Gedaliah and its consequences, ch. xli.
6. The hypocritical inquiry, xlii. 1-6.
7. The unwelcome answer, xlii. 7-22.
8. The flight to Egypt, xliii. 1-7.
9. Jeremiah in Tahpanhes, xliii. 8-13.
10. Jeremiah at the festival of the Queen of Heaven in Pathros. The last act of his prophetic ministry, ch. xlv.
 - a. The charge against the obstinately idolatrous people, xlv. 1-14.
 - b. The replication of the people, xlv. 15-19.
 - c. The recapitulation of the prophet, xlv. 20-30.
 - a. The refutation of the people's assertions, xlv. 20-23.
 - β. The positive prediction of severest punishment, xlv. 24-30.

A. The events before the capture of Jerusalem, (chh. xxxvi.—xxxviii.)

I. The writing out of the prophecies in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (ch. xxxvi.)

1. The Command and the first writing.

XXXVI. 1-8.

1 And it came to pass in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of 2 Judah, that this word came unto Jeremiah from the LORD, saying, Take thee a roll of a book, and write therein¹ all the words that I have spoken unto thee against Israel, and against Judah, and against all the nations, from the day I spake unto 3 thee, from the days of Josiah, even unto this day. It may be that the house of Judah will hear all the evil which I purpose to do unto them; that they may return 4 every man from his evil way; that I may forgive their iniquity and their sin. Then Jeremiah called Baruch the son of Neriah: and Baruch wrote from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the LORD, which he had spoken unto him, upon a roll of 5 a book. And Jeremiah commanded Baruch, saying, I am shut up [hindered]; I 6 cannot go into the house of the LORD. Therefore go thou, and read in the roll, which thou hast written from my mouth, the words of the LORD in the ears of the people in the LORD's house upon the fasting day: and also thou shalt read them in 7 the ears of all Judah that come out of their cities. It may be they will present their supplication² before the LORD, and will return every one from his evil way:
 for great is the anger and the fury that the LORD hath pronounced against this 8 people. And Baruch the son of Neriah did according to all that Jeremiah the prophet commanded him, reading in the book the words of the LORD in the LORD's [Jehovah's] house.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 2.—לְכָתֹב עַל (comp. rems. on x. 1) as is evident from vers. 4 and 29. In עַל יְשָׂרָאֵל however עַל has the meaning of "against," as we see from ver. 3, "all the evil."

² Ver. 7.—[NÄLGESE.: Their supplication will come (prevail) before Jehovah.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In the fourth year of Jehoiakim's reign Jeremiah receives the command to commit to writing the prophecies delivered by him from the beginning of his prophetic ministry (therefore for twenty-three years). The fourth year of Jehoiakim, as frequently shown already, was a turning-point both in the political world and in Jeremiah's ministry. It was then that in consequence of the battle of Carchemish both the call of Nebuchadnezzar to universal dominion was decided, and also the question, who were to be the northern executors of the judgment on Judah, so often predicted by the prophet. It was now clear that they would be the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar. The way to Palestine and beyond was open to them. Their arrival was to be expected after a very brief interval. It was the last moment when Israel could still propitiate the Lord by sincere penitence, and avert the threatening danger. To determine Israel to make use of the last gracious respite thus granted a last attempt was to be made by the presentation of Jeremiah's prophecies as a whole. They were now to hear at once, and in a concentrated form, what they had been hearing piece-meal in the course of twenty-three years, and that a powerful effect might be expected from the total impression, is seen from ver. 16. Jeremiah now, to discharge his exalted commission, dictates the words of Jehovah to his faithful Baruch, and commands him to read what he has written to the assembled people on the occasion of a fast-day, since he himself, Jeremiah, is hindered from being present.

Vers. 1-3. And it came to pass . . . their sin. From the period before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, we find in the book of our prophet as we have it at present, chh. ii.; iii.-vi.; vii.-x.; xi.-xiii.; xiv.-xvii.; xviii.; xxi. 11-14; xxii. 1-23; xxiii.; xxvi. Chh. xxv. and xlvi. 1-12; xlvi.-xlix. 33 are also to be reckoned in here, since they certainly precede the writing, which extended into the fifth year of Jehoiakim (xxxvi. 9). Chh. xxx. and xxxi. also belong here chronologically, but in subject they form a בְּרָאָה by itself (comp. xxx. 2), and cannot have been a part of the book here meant, which consisted only of minatory prophecies. The first writing however did not, according to ver. 32, contain all these passages, at least not in their present extent. The view of Hirtzig, that Jeremiah was not to write out the discourses for the first time, but only from the scattered leaves to compile them into a book, because the former would not have been possible even for the most retentive memory, has been well refuted by Graf from Hirtzig's own point of view. From my own point of view I remark that the same supernatural factor which operated in the production of the prophecies must have acted also in their reproduction (comp. John xiv. 26). Here neither the much nor the little enters into consideration, nor must we lay too much weight on the similarity of the prophecies, for even the variations of the theme have their specific object and occasion, and could not be arbitrarily altered.

It is remarkable that the expression הִלְלִיךָ apart from Ps. xl. 8, occurs only in Jeremiah and later writers (Ezek. ii. 9; iii. 1; Zech. v. 1, 2). Ps. xl., however, as is well known, is ascribed by many to Jeremiah. But comp. Isai. xxxiv. 4. HENGSTENBERG, Beiträge II., S. 494 sqq.—LEYRER in HERZ. R.-Enc., XIV., S. 18.—Ver. 3. It may be, etc. It is not expressly said, but may be understood, that the words of Jehovah were to be read after being written, as the effects mentioned could not be attributed to the mere writing, and so Jeremiah understood it, vers. 6-8.—That before they may return is difficult. We should expect and they will return, (comp. xxvi. 3). The prophet however distinguishes a nearer and a more remote object. The first is that they hear, not in a physical sense, for that was not problematic, but in a spiritual sense, i. e., in the sense of marking, observing, taking to heart. Comp. vii. 13; xxv. 3, 4, etc. The more remote and properly main object, to which the proclaiming and the marking were related only as means, was that they should be converted.

Vers. 4-8. Then Jeremiah . . . in Jehovah's house. Respecting Baruch comp. xxxii. 12. The reason why Jeremiah did not write himself is not necessarily that he could not. From xxxii. 10; li. 60 on the contrary it seems to follow that Jeremiah was well able to write. At least it is not apparent why in these passages it should not be said that Jeremiah dictated, since such a minute statement would well accord with the particularity of his style elsewhere. It may however easily be conceived that in the discharge of so great a task, the aid of a writer to take the mechanical part, was a necessity to the prophet. As the reading, according to ver. 9, did not take place till the ninth month of the fifth year of Jehoiakim, the writing occupied nearly a year.—Shut up (רָצַף). As, according to vers. 19 and 26, Jeremiah and Baruch were able to hide themselves, this cannot mean "imprisoned" as it may well do in xxxiii. 1; xxxix. 15. Jeremiah was therefore only detained or hindered. By what we have no means of ascertaining.—And read in the roll. Comp. Deut. xvii. 19; Neh. viii. 8, 18.—Upon the fasting day. The prophet does not mean either the regular yearly fast, which was observed in the seventh month (Lev. xvi. 29; xxiii. 27), nor does he expect in the ninth month several (extraordinary) fasts, so that we should translate "on a fast-day." The absence of the article is no more emphatic here than in iii. 2; vi. 16, etc.—Were the ordinary fast meant in ver. 6, and an extraordinary fast-day in ver. 9, as many of the older commentators suppose, we cannot conceive why only the second reading had results, but the first passed away without a trace.—Ver. 7. They will present. Comp. xxxvii. 20; xlii. 2 coll. xxxviii. 26; xlii. 9; Dan. ix. 18, 20, where we find the Hiphil. The expression is evidently a stronger form of "come before thee" (Ps. lxxix. 11; lxxxviii. 3; cxix. 170 coll. Job xxxiv. 28) in so far as it involves the idea of humble petitioning, and at the same time the collateral idea of prevailing, being heard. For that which falls down before one, can as little remain unobserved as that which comes before one.—And will return. The prophet presupposes that the words of Jehovah will render clear to the people above all the necessity of repentance, and that accordingly their prayer will above all have reference to power for the fulfilment of this indispensable condition. He also hopes that this effect will be produced by the reading, as by this the greatness of God's anger will be brought vividly before the minds of the people, and must produce a wholesome fear in them. In ver. 8 the accomplishment of the task is reported in general. The particulars follow. Comp. Hitzig in loc.

2. The reading to the people.

XXXVI. 9-18.

9 And it came to pass in the fifth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah, in the ninth month, that they proclaimed a fast before the LORD to all the people in Jerusalem and to all the people that came from the cities of Judah unto Jerusalem. Then read Baruch in the book the words of Jeremiah in the house of the LORD, in the chamber [cell] of Gemariah, the son of Shaphan the scribe, in the higher court, at the entry of the new gate of the LORD's house, in the ears of 11 all the people. When Michaiah the son of Gemariah, the son of Shaphan, had 12 heard out of the book all the words of the LORD. Then he went down into the king's house, into the scribe's chamber: and, lo, all the princes sat there, even Elishama the scribe, and Delaiah the son of Shemaiah, and Elnathan the son of Achbor, and Gemariah the son of Shaphan, and Zedekiah the son of Hananiah, and all the princes. Then Michaiah declared unto them all the words that he had heard when Baruch read the book in the ears of the people.

14 Therefore all the princes sent Jehudi the son of Nethaniah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of Cushi, unto Baruch, saying, Take in thine hand the roll wherein thou hast read in the ears of the people, and come.² So Baruch the son of Neriah took the roll in his hand, and came unto them. And they said unto him, Sit down now and read it in our ears. Now it came to pass, when they had heard all the words, they were afraid both one and other,³ and said unto Baruch, We will surely tell the king of all these words. And they asked Baruch, saying, Tell us now, How didst thou write all these words at his mouth?⁴ Then Baruch answered them, He pronounced⁵ all these words unto me with his mouth, and I wrote them with ink⁶ in the book.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In the fifth year of Jehoiakim and the ninth month Baruch on occasion of a public fast reads to the assembled people in the temple the discourses of Jeremiah, written down by him (vers. 9, 10). Michaiah, the son of Gemariah, gives notice of this to the princes assembled in the royal chancery, among whom was his father (vers. 11-13). Thereupon the princes cause Baruch to be brought with his roll, and commanded him to read it to them (vers. 14, 15). What he reads fills them with terror. They declare to Baruch that they must inform the king and inquire as to the particular circumstances of the writing (vers. 16, 17). Baruch replies simply that Jeremiah dictated the words to him and he wrote them down (ver. 18).

Vers. 9, 10. And it came to pass . . . all the people. The rendering of the "ninth month" of the fifth year of Jehoiakim as the ninth month of the civil year, i. e. about December, is favored especially by the circumstance that the statement of the months and days (comp. xxxix. 2), without a previous exact statement of the day and month of the beginning of the reign, would be unintelligible and purposeless, while, if we understand the months and days of the civil year, the matter is clear, provided that the fragments of the initial and concluding years are reckoned as full years.—Proclaimed a fast. It was at any rate an extraordinary fast, such as was not infrequently appointed in times of distress (comp. Joel i. 14; ii. 15; 1 Ki. xxi. 9, 12; 2 Chron. xx. 3), then probably occasioned by the danger threatening from the Chaldeans (comp. ver. 29). It is therefore very probable, that Nebuchadnezzar then (in December of the fifth year of Jehoiakim) had not yet retired from Jerusalem. This is opposed to those who make the battle of Carchemish immediately precede the siege of Jerusalem ("only a few weeks." Comp. GUSTAV RÖSCH, Art. Bibl. Zeitrechnung [Bibl. Chronology] in HERZOG, R.-Enc., XVIII., S. 464). The subject, proclaiming the fast, appears (as in Jon. iii. 5 coll. Joel i. 14; ii. 15) to be the whole people. Elsewhere it is the presiding officers who proclaim the fast (1 Ki. xxi. 9, 12; 2 Chron. xx. 3; Ezr. viii. 21). Whether by the former mode of expression anything is intimated concerning the suggestion of the appointment, or a rite in proclamations unknown to us, is not clear. EWALD, as it seems to me incorrectly, after the Vulg., connects "all the people" with "fast" as a genitive [jejunium omni populo].—In the chamber of Gemariah, ver. 10. Comp. rems. on xxxv. 2, 4.—This Gemariah is named immediately afterwards as one of the princes assembled in the royal chancery. He had, it seems, as scribe a room in the temple, and also took part in the official transactions in the scribe's chamber in the king's house. (Comp. infra on ver. 12). His father appears to have been scribe under Josiah (2 Ki. xxii. 3 sqq.). Possibly the family was a priestly one. (Comp. 2 Ki. xxii. 3 with 1 Chron. ix. 11, 12). His brother Alikam is mentioned as a protector of Jeremiah, xxvi. 24. On the upper fore-court and new gate comp. comm. on xx. 2; xxvi. 10. The room was situated not in the entry but at the entry, so that it might probably be entered directly from the gateway. At any rate it was a very frequented spot. As the higher court was that of the priests (comp. HERZ. R.-Enc. XV., S. 509), which the people might not enter, it is possible that the new gate led from the higher into the outer (Ezek. xl. 17), or great court (2 Chron. iv. 9), and that accordingly the room, from its elevated position, afforded a view over the great court. Comp. HIRZIG, in loc.

Vers. 11-18. When Michaiah . . . in the book. Michaiah, the son of that Gemariah in whose temple-chamber Baruch held his lecture, who was probably present in the chamber, thought himself called upon to inform his father. He found him in the royal chancery (so LUTHER). According to ver. 20, the princes go from the chancery into the court of the palace, to the presence of the king. Accordingly, the chancery appears to have been placed more on the outer side of the palace, probably for the sake of accessibility. The "scribe" Gemariah appears to have had the ecclesiastical department (ver. 10, minister of worship), and the "scribe" Elishama the political. The latter was thus chancellor, or Secretary of State. Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc. XIV., S. 2. On the general meaning of "princes" comp. the list of Solomon's princes, 1 Ki. iv. 2 sqq.—If Elishama is identical with the one mentioned in xli. 1 and 2 Ki. xxv. 15, which is not impossible, he was a prince of the royal family. Comp. on xli. 1.—Elnathab, the son of Achbor, was mentioned before in xxvi. 22.—Jehudi, etc. The name of his ancestor leads us to conclude that he was of Cushite descent. It is not probable that the name Jehudi was given with reference to the injunction in Dent. xxiii. 8, for there it is merely said that the descendants of the Edomites and Egyptians are not to enter the congregation of the Lord till the third generation. With respect to the other nations (with the exception of still more strictly excluded Canaanites, Ammonites and Moabites) there was no such limitation. They might be naturalized in the first generation on fulfilment of the conditions. Comp. SAALSCHUETZ, Mos. Recht, Kap. 92, § 3; Kap. 100, § 2. Moreover, both the father and grandfather bear Israelitish names, and Jehudi is a family, not a national name. The feminine, Judith, appears, even in ancient times, as a proper name among the Hittites (Gen. xxvi. 34). Comp. FURST s. v.—Sit down now. They are evidently friendly disposed. Comp. vers. 19 and 25.—I do not believe that they were terrified merely in the interest of Jeremiah and Baruch. It was possible to protect them. Without doubt the concentration of the threatenings did not fail of its intended object in their case.—It was clear that after the public reading in the temple, the matter could not be kept concealed from the king. Purposed concealment might be dangerous to those whose duty it was to report.—ROSENUELLER, HIRZIG, GRAF understand the question in ver. 17 as if the princes wished to know whether Baruch had not compiled the book against the will and knowledge of Jeremiah, from memory or written documents. But then the reading would have been different. [See TEXTUAL NOTES]. As the words stand, they seem to me simply to express the curious desire for a peep, as it were, into the prophet's workshop. They supposed that Baruch must have been a witness of secret transactions, and they, therefore, wish to know how the dictation, on the part of the prophet, was given, whether, ex. gr., consciously or in a state of ecstasy. Baruch answers that Jeremiah simply pronounced the words and he as simply wrote them down with ink. There was nothing wonderful about it. How HIRZIG can say that נָרַךְ cannot mean speaking, but only reading to another, I do not understand. Dictation requires no less an elevation of the voice than reading aloud, and may therefore be designated as "calling." The phrase "with his mouth" also seems to imply just the opposite of reading from a book. Comp. ver. 4 with vers. 6 and 10.

3. The Reading before the King.

XXXVI. 19-26.

- 19 Then said the princes unto Baruch, Go, hide thee, thou and Jeremiah; and let 20 no man know where ye be. And they went in to the king, into the court, but they laid up¹ the roll in the chamber of Elishama the scribe, and told all the words in 21 the ears of the king. So the king sent Jehudi to fetch the roll: and he took it out of Elishama the scribe's chamber. And Jehudi read it in the ears of the king, 22 and in the ears of all the princes which stood beside [before] the king. Now the king sat in the winter house, in the ninth month; and there was a fire on the hearth, 23 burning before him [the pot² kindled before him]. And it came to pass, that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves [columns], he cut it with the penknife, and cast it into the fire that was on the hearth [in the pot], until all the roll was con-24 sumed in the fire that was on the hearth [in the pot]. Yet they were not afraid, nor rent their garments, the king nor any of his servants that heard all these words.
 25 Nevertheless³ [And even though] Elnathan and Delaiah and Gemariah had made intercession to [prayed] the king that he would not burn the roll: but [yet] he 26 would not hear them. But the king commanded Jerahmeel, the son of Hammelech [the king], and Seraiah, the son of Azriel, and Shelemaiah, the son of Abdeel, to take [fetch] Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet: but the LORD [Jehovah] hid them.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The princes command Baruch, together with Jeremiah, to hide themselves (ver. 19). Thereupon they give the king personally notice of what has occurred (ver. 20). The king has the roll brought, read, cut and thrown into the fire, notwithstanding the intercession of three princes (vers. 21-25). He also wishes Baruch and Jeremiah to be taken into custody, but the Lord had hid them (ver. 26).

Vers. 19, 20. Then said . . . ears of the king. It is noteworthy that under the despotic and ungodly Jehoiakim the princes were friendly to Jeremiah, while under the weak but kindly-disposed Zedekiah they were hostile to him. The reason for this may be partly the outward circumstances, partly the personality of the king. Under Jehoiakim the danger was not so near, and Jeremiah's continual exhortation to submit did not make so much the impression of treachery and of a laming influence (xxxviii. 4). Add to this, that Jehoiakim's annoyance provoked opposition, as Zedekiah's weakness did insolence.—The proper dwelling-house of the king (doubtless identical with the winter house) stood in a court of its own, “which, regarded from the entrance, formed the hinder court of the whole citadel” (KEIL on 1 Ki. vii. 8).—They did not take the roll with them, in order as much as in them lay, to withdraw it from the eyes and fury of the despotic king. If the king himself had it fetched, they were not responsible for what he did with it.

Vers. 21-24. So the king . . . these words. —Beside the king. The king sat on the floor, those who were standing were therefore above him. Comp. Gen. xviii. 8; Jud. iii. 19; 2 Sam. xx. 11.—On the winter-house (Am. iii. 15) and the fire-pot comp. Winer, R.-W.-B. s. v. Huser, near the end. [“In common parlance, the lower apartments are simply el beit—the house; the upper is the 'alijeh, which is the summer-house. Every respectable dwelling has both, and they are familiarly called beit shetawy and beit scify—winter and summer house. If these are on the same story, then the external and airy apartment is the summer house, and that for winter is the interior or more sheltered room.” THOMSON, The Land and the Book, I. p. 478.—“The Orientals still use pots made of burnt earthenware for warming, instead of fire-places. These pots have the form of a large pitcher, and are usually placed in a hollow place in the middle of the room. When the fire is out, a frame like a table is put over them, and is covered with a carpet, and thus the warmth is kept in them. See also NIEBUHR and TAVERNIER in Winer, R.-W.-B. I., 468; STANLEY, Lect. 536-538.” WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]—The ninth month corresponds nearly to our December. It was therefore the cold and rainy season of the year.—Ver. 23. And it came to pass, etc. It is unequivocally evident from the words “until all the roll was consumed” that the book did not consist of many leaves, but only of one roll. The roll must also have been written on one side only or the whole could not have been read. That Jehudi did read the whole is evident (1) from the imperfect קָרָא : If Jehudi, after reading some sections, had cut them off and at the same time thrown them with the rest into the fire, we should have had the perfect.—It would then be a matter of indifference whether Jehudi threw the rest into the fire entire or after successive abscissions, for the latter is in itself a perfectly unessential circumstance. It is only of account if the successive reading was connected with it. Only in the latter case is the imperfect, expressing repetition in the past, in place (compare remarks on קָרָא , ver. 18).—(2) From the words “till all the roll was consumed” and the preceding words. Had Jehudi thrown all at once into the coals, it could at most be said that they looked on and waited till the entire roll was burned up. But as it is said, that Jehudi cut and threw into the fire till the whole roll was consumed, there must evidently have been a repeated cutting and throwing. Such a course, however, presupposes also a successive reading of the whole, for if he did not wish to read it, why should he not throw it all at once into the fire. With this also agrees the prefix וְ before קָרָא , which designates the coincidence (comp. Gen. xviii. 1; xxxix. 18; Deut. xvi. 6; 1 Kings i. 21), and accordingly in repeated actions must assume the meaning of “as often as.” How GRAF can deny this, is as inconceivable as the assertion, that the successive reading and cutting would be unnatural or indeed trifling. As to the first, the tenor was interesting and exciting enough to render the king desirous of knowing the whole; as to the second, it was the subservient Jehudi who would not wait till the end, to execute punishment on the hateful book. If the לְתוֹתָיִם were not single leaves, they were columns, the lines of which ran parallel with the margin of the roll. The expression doors, which occurs nowhere else in this sense, is easily explained by the square shape of the columns, which were probably also enclosed in lines. Jehudi's cutting the roll with his penknife, and not tearing it with his hands, is explained by the character of the material. Even if it were a papyrus roll, cutting was to be preferred to tearing, because in this latter way he would be sure to injure the next columns. It is, moreover, questionable whether they would have burned a leather or parchment roll.—Rent their garments. On this custom comp. Winer, R.-W.-B., Art. Trauer. By the servants of the king who "heard all these words," are here evidently to be understood those who heard them here for the first time, not those who had already heard them in the secretary's office. Their petition shows the respect which they entertained for the words of the Lord.

Vers. 25, 26. And even though . . . hid them.—Jerahmeel, the king's son. As according to 2 Kings xxiii. 36, Jehoiakim came to the throne when twenty-five, and was then in the fifth year of his reign, at most thirty years of age, he could not have had a grown-up son, such as this Jerahmeel must have been. "Son of the king" is, therefore, here a prince royal. Comp. xxxviii. 6 with xli. 1; Dan. i. 3.—Who Seraiah, the son of Azriel, Shemaiah, the son of Abdeel were, we do not know, but the messengers, judging from the rank of the first, appear to have been very respectable. Jehoiakim thus at least honored the prophet of the Lord, sending men of the highest rank to apprehend him. According to ver. 19 the kindly-disposed princes commanded Jeremiah and Baruch to hide themselves. They had obeyed. We are now informed that the Lord Himself had guided them in the choice of a hiding-place, and thus guarded against their discovery.

4. The Prediction of Punishment to Jehoiakim and the Second Writing.

XXXVI. 27-32.

- 27 Then the word of the LORD [Jehovah] came to Jeremiah, after that the king had burned the roll, and the words which Baruch wrote at the mouth of Jeremiah, saying, Take thee again another roll, and write in it all the former words that were 28 in the first roll, which Jehoiakim the king of Judah hath burned. And thou shalt say to¹ Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah]; Thou hast burned this roll, saying, Why hast thou written therein, saying, The king of Babylon shall certainly come and destroy this land, and shall cause to cease [exterminate] from thence man and beast? 30 Therefore thus saith the LORD [Jehovah] of [against]¹ Jehoiakim, king of Judah, He shall have none to sit upon the throne of David: and his dead body shall 31 be cast out in the day to the heat, and in the night to the frost [cold]. And I will punish² him and his seed and his servants for their iniquity; and I will bring upon them, and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and upon the men of Judah, all the evil that I have pronounced against them; but they hearkened not. 32 Then took Jeremiah another roll, and gave it to Baruch the scribe, the son of Neriah, who wrote therein from the mouth of Jeremiah all the words of the book which Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire: and there were added besides unto them many like³ words.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Vers. 29, 30.—לְךָ after אֶת־יְהוֹאִכִם has the meaning of "over, concerning," though from the connection in a hostile sense. Cf. ver. 31, where after אֶת־יְהוֹאִכִם the third time we find לְךָ, comp. remarks on x. 1.

² Ver. 31.—[Literally: I will visit upon.—S. R. A.]

³ Ver. 32.—[Or, as many more; literally: as many as they.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Jehoiakim could, indeed, burn the roll, but not the living word of God present in the mind of the prophet. He, therefore, gained nothing by his act. On the contrary he thus increased both his guilt and the number of the prophecies predicting calamity in the new roll.

Vers. 27-32. Then the word . . . like words.

The direct address to Jehoiakim in ver. 29 passes over into the indirect in ver. 30. But as the former is not to be conceived of as to the king in bodily presence, and as it was interrupted by the question put into the mouth of Jehoiakim, "Why hast thou written," etc., the transition to the third person is easily explained. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 101, 2. Anm.—Ver. 30. He shall have none, etc. The successor of Jehoiakim was his son Jehoiachin (2 Kings, xxiv.

6). But the reign of the latter was so brief (it lasted only three months) that it does not come into consideration. On what is said of his corpse comp. rem. on xxii. 19.—Like words. In itself דברים may certainly be referred to “words,” and the similar import of the additions to be thus declared. Then, however, it would stand better after “words.” Its position after “many,” seems to be to indicate that it is to be referred to this word, and that thus the quantitative similarity is to be declared. Accordingly the new collection must have been about double the size of the previous one.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On ver. 2. The object of the writing was not only that “littera scripta manet” (CRAMER: “the mouth speaks only to those who are present, but the pen to the absent; the mouth speaks only to the present hours and times, the pen many hundred years afterwards also.” Comp. Exod. xxxiv. 27; Deut. x. 4, 5; xvii. 18; Isa. xxx. 8; IIab. ii. 2), but also to collect all the single lightning strokes into one grand prophetic tempest. Moreover, it is a matter of course that the written word was of special use, not only to posterity, but also to the contemporaries in so far as it rendered possible continued study, repeated quiet contemplation, and careful comparison. Jeremiah certainly prevented no one from taking copies of his book.

2. On ver. 4. Did Jeremiah hold such a relation to the Spirit of God as Baruch to Jeremiah when dictating? Then it was a matter of indifference to whom the dictation was made. Then a Saul would do as well as a Samuel, if he could only write. The best writer would be the most chosen instrument. There was no mingling of the individuality of the prophet except in the MS., and that is lost to us with the original. All prophetic writings must have the same type as to form and purport, which, as is well known, is so little the case that according to the saying of BUFFON, le style c'est l'homme, the portrait of a prophet might almost be drawn from his style.

3. On ver. 5. “God’s word is not bound; 2 Tim. ii. 9. Paul for example wrote his most beautiful epistles from prison, as those to the Galatians, the Ephesians, the Philippians, the Colossians, to Philemon, and the second to Timothy.” CRAMER.

4. On ver. 14. “It is a good state of things when rulers ask for God’s Word, and cannot be answered or helped promptly and quickly enough to the fulfilment of their purpose. So it was a joy to Paul that he could tell Agrippa what the Lord had done for his soul, and his heart yearned after Agrippa, Festus and all those around them.” ZINZENDORF.

5. On ver. 16. “When a true servant of God gets his superiors so far that they hear him, he may surely not doubt, that he will also bring them to obedience. It is then not his, but the Lord’s affair.” ZINZENDORF.

6. On ver. 23. “The higher the enemies of God are, the more dangerous; the greater, the more bitterly opposed to the work of the Lord,

8. On ver. 25. “When John’s head was in question, Herod did not understand how he could resist his magnates. When Daniel is to go into the lions’ den, Darius has not the heart to refuse his princes. When Jeremiah is to be delivered up, Zedekiah says with great modesty to his princes: ‘the king can do nothing against you’ (xxxviii. 5). But when anything evil is to be done, the rulers can insist on having their own way. Here we have an instance: he hearkened not unto them.” ZINZENDORF.

9. On ver. 26. “Dominus eos abscondidisse dicitur, qua ratione olim Eliam (1 Reg. xvii. 2 sqq. et xviii. 12), nec non Elisæum (2 Reg. vi.), itemque Athanasium et Augustinum et nostro tempore Lutherum abscondidit.” FÖRSTER.

10. On ver. 27. [“Here is a sublime specimen of the triumph of God’s Word, when repressed by the power, and burnt by the rage of this world, whether it be in the suppression of the Scriptures, or in preventing their circulation, or in casting copies of them into the fire, or in the imprisonment and martyrdom of God’s preachers. II. The Events in the Tenth and Eleventh year of Zedekiah.

(CHAP. XXXVII. and XXXVIII.)

1. The embassy of the King and the Imprisonment of the Prophet in its First and Second Stage.

CHAP. XXXVII.

- 1 And king Zedekiah the son of Josiah reigned¹ instead of Coniah, the son of Jehoiakim, whom Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon made king² in the land of Judah.
- 2 But neither he, nor his servants, nor the people of the land, did hearken unto the words of the LORD [Jehovah], which he spake by the prophet Jeremiah.
- 3 And Zedekiah the king sent Jehucal the son of Shelemiah and Zephaniah the son of Maaseiah the priest to the prophet Jeremiah, saying, Pray now unto the LORD [Jehovah] our God for us. Now Jeremiah came in and went out among the people: for they had not put him into prison.³ Then Pharaoh's army was come forth out of Egypt, and when the Chaldeans that besieged Jerusalem heard tidings of them, they departed from Jerusalem.
- 6 Then came the word of the LORD [Jehovah] unto the prophet Jeremiah, saying,
- 7 Thus saith the LORD, the God of Israel; Thus shall ye say to the king of Judah, that sent you unto me to inquire of me; Behold, Pharaoh's army, which is come forth to help you, shall return [is returning]⁴ to Egypt into their own land. The Chaldeans shall come again, and fight against this city, and take it, and burn it with fire. Thus saith the LORD; Deceive not yourselves,⁵ saying, The Chaldeans shall surely depart from us: for they shall not depart. For though ye had smitten the whole army of the Chaldeans that fight against you, and there remained but wounded men among them, yet should they rise up every man⁶ in his tent, and burn this city with fire. And it came to pass,⁷ that when the army of the Chaldeans was broken up [had retired] from Jerusalem for fear of [before] Pharaoh's army, Then Jeremiah went forth out of Jerusalem to go into the land of Benjamin, to separate himself thence [to raise an inheritance there] in the midst of the people. And when he was in the gate of Benjamin, a captain of the ward [watch] was there, whose name was Irijah, the son of Shelemiah, the son of Hananiah; and he took [seized] Jeremiah the prophet, saying, Thou fallest away [art going over] to the Chaldeans. Then said Jeremiah, It is false [a lie]: I fall not away [am not going over] to the Chaldeans. But he hearkened not to him: so Irijah took Jeremiah, and smote him, and put him in prison in the house of Jonathan the scribe: for they had made that the prison. When⁸ Jeremiah was entered into the dungeon, and into the cabins,⁹ and Jeremiah had remained there many days; Then Zedekiah the king sent, and took him out: and the king asked him secretly in his house, and said, Is there any word from the LORD? And Jeremiah said, There is: for, said he, thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon. Moreover Jeremiah said unto king Zedekiah, What have I offended against thee, or against thy servants, or against this people, that ye have put me in prison? Where are now¹⁰ your prophets which prophesied unto you, saying, The king of Babylon shall not come against you, nor against this land? Therefore hear now, I pray thee, O my lord the king: let my supplication, I pray thee, be accepted¹¹ before thee; that thou cause me not to return to the house of Jonathan the scribe, lest I die there.
- 21 Then Zedekiah the king commanded that they should commit Jeremiah into the court of the prison, and that they should give [and they gave him] him daily a piece of bread out of the bakers' street, until all the bread in the city were spent. Thus Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison [or guard.]

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL

1 Ver. 1.—NAEGELSB.: And Zedekiah became king. The phrase וַיִּמְלֹךְ (instead of the simple וַיִּכְרֹךְ, as is especially common in the book of Kings. Comp. 1 Ki. xi. 43; xii. 17; xiv. 20, 31, etc.), does not occur except in xxiii. 5 where, however, there is more reason for the וַיִּכְרֹךְ. We must not, however, find a parallel, as Kimchi does, with such expressions as וַיָּבֹרֶךְ, where the noun stands in the accusative, nor with HITZIG attract וַיִּכְרֹךְ, and translate: and a king, Zedekiah, came to the government, etc., for Zedekiah was not king when he came to the government. וַיִּמְלֹךְ is rather to be taken as more exact definition of the predicate: and Zedekiah came to the government as king, etc. The pleonasm seems to accord with Jeremiah's more diffuse style.

2 Ver. 1.—אֲשֶׁר before הַמֶּלֶךְ is accus., and to be referred to Zedekiah. Comp. 2 Ki. xxiv. 17.

3 Ver. 4.—בֵּית הַכְּלִיא. Here, as in lii. 31, in which passages alone the word occurs, the Masoretes would alter without any necessity to כְּלִיא. Comp. GESEN., § 84, 13, etc.

4 Ver. 7.—שָׁב לָאָרְצוֹ. The participle, having itself no tense can, from the context, signify only that they are in the act of returning.

5 Ver. 9.—[Literally: your souls.—S. R. A.]

6 Ver. 10.—HITZIG correctly remarks that אֲנָשִׁים, in antithesis to כָּל-הָיָד denotes individuals, and that therefore it is more correct to connect אִישׁ כְּהַהֲלֹךְ with what follows, as the punctuation denotes, since it is evidently intended to express that these individuals, without any previous agreement, would arise, moved by a divine impulse, to perform the work of destruction.

7 Ver. 11.—וַיְהִי. This form stands here, a trace of the later usage, for וַיְהִי. Comp. iii. 9; xxxviii. 28 b; EWALD, § 245 b; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 83, 7, Ann.

8 Ver. 16.—כִּי at the beginning of the verse is surprising. Neither its causal nor its temporal signification is suitable here. The LXX. translate καὶ ἤλθεν, HITZIG, EWALD, GRAF and others read וַיְכַחֵשׁ with reference to 1 Sam. ii. 21, and 2 Ki. xx. 12 coll. Isai. xxxix. 1.

9 Ver. 16.—[Or: calls; NAEGELSBACH has: vaults. "Some suppose it to mean bent bars, by which the prisoner was confined, and in which he sat as in a cage in a distorted position, (GESEN., GRAF)." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

10 Ver. 19.—With respect to the form וַאֲנִי, the question is, how the Chethibh is to be pronounced וַאֲנִי or וַאֲנִי. Usually the former is adopted, an obscurity of the suffix-meaning being maintained as in וַאֲנִי. FUERST on the other hand (Vid. II. W. B. S. 66) is of opinion that we are to read וַאֲנִי, which stands for וַאֲנִי with the old plural termination, the traces of which are preserved in verbs and particles (Comp. OLSH., § 16, b). The decision is difficult, as the form is a solitary one with either punctuation.

11 Ver. 20.—[Literally: fall].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This chapter consists of two parts, reporting two events, which had their course or beginning in the pause occasioned by the departure of the Chaldeans. In the first part (vers. 1-10) it is related that Jeremiah replied to an embassy of king Zedekiah, which he sent to the prophet with the request for his intercession (vers. 1-5):—The army of Pharaoh which has come out to your assistance will return again to their own country, the Chaldeans however will resume the siege of Jerusalem and capture the city and burn it (vers. 6-8). Therefore deceive not yourselves! Even were the Egyptians to smite the entire Chaldean army, and there were only a few wounded men left, these would rise from their tents and burn Jerusalem (vers. 9, 10).—In the second part the imprisonment of the prophet is described, in vers. 10-16 its occasion and first stage, and then in vers. 17-21, the (by the favor of Zedekiah) less severe second stage.—Jeremiah had wished, during the pause caused by the temporary withdrawal of the Chaldeans, to leave Jerusalem and go into the land of Benjamin to attend to a little business of inheritance (vers. 11, 12). He was however detained at the gate by the commander of the watch, as he entertained the suspicion that Jeremiah wished to go over to the enemy (ver. 13). Jeremiah's assurance that he had no such intention was of no avail. He was brought before the princes, who caused him to be beaten and closely imprisoned in a dungeon, where he languished for some time (vers. 14-16). From this prison Zedekiah had him secretly brought one day, to inquire whether there was any word from the Lord. Jeremiah could answer in the affirmative, but could only give a revelation of the same tenor as before, Thou wilt be given into the hands of the Chaldeans. Still at the earnest petition of the prophet Zedekiah does not send him back to the prison, but has him confined in the court of the guard, and scantily supplied with bread (vers. 17-21).

Vers. 1, 2. And king Zedekiah . . . the prophet Jeremiah. With respect to Coniah comp. rem. on xxii. 24.—People of the land. Comp. rem. on i. 18.—Did not hearken. Comp. xxxvi. 31.

Vers. 3-5. And Zedekiah . . . from Jerusalem. Jehucal, the son of Shelemiah, is also mentioned among the "princes" in xxxviii. 1 coll. 4. Zephaniah, the son of Maaseiah, was, according to lii. 24 coll. xxi. 1; xxix. 25 a priest of the second order. The messengers were thus very respectable.—Pray now. The prophet is not merely to inquire, but to intercede. Comp. to inquire of me, ver. 7. From this it is apparent that notwithstanding the withdrawal of the Chaldeans the state of mind was not one of perfect confidence. The result of the conflict between the rival forces had still to be expected.—Came in and went out. This is emphasized in antithesis to the subsequent imprisonment and also to the statement in xxxvi. 26, that Jeremiah and Baruch had to hide themselves. The freedom in which Jeremiah lived accorded with the respect which the king showed him, and explains at the same time how Jeremiah could think of a journey. Both verses 4 and 5 are to be regarded as a parenthetical and explanatory sentence? (EWALD, § 341).—Pharaoh's army. This Pharaoh was Pharaoh Hophra (xliv. 30), successor of Psammutis, and ascended the throne B. C. 588. In the first, or at least the second year of his reign, seventeen years after the battle of Carchemish, he undertook to make war on Nebuchadnezzar, occasioned probably by the embassy of Zedekiah (Ezek. xvii. 15). Hophra was slain (comp. Ezek. xxix. 1-16; chh. xxx.—xxxii.) and the hopes excited in the Israelites by the withdrawal of the Chaldeans were shown to be nugatory.

Vers. 6-10. Then came the word . . . with fire. Jeremiah does not cease to demonstrate the vanity of their hopes. He might have insinuated himself into the favor of the king and great men by a prophecy correspondent to their wishes, but he does not. With inflexible fidelity he proclaims the word of the Lord as he has received it.—Deceive not your souls. Comp. xxix. 8; 2 Ki. xviii. 29 coll. 2 Chron. xxxii. 15. The prophet warns against self-deception. On this meaning of נָפְטָה comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 81, 2.

Vers. 11-16. And it came to pass . . . many days. Jeremiah wishes to use the time, while the ways are free, to do some business in the land of Benjamin, (probably from לחלק in Anathoth).

—To separate, etc. This is a difficult passage. LXX. translates τῷ ἀγορίῳ αὐτοῦ ἐκείθεν ἐν μέσῳ τοῦ λαοῦ, which THEODORET explains by πρὸς αὐτὸν ἀρτοῦς. The other ancient translations all express the idea of division of inheritance, in which they are followed by most of the commentators. The different explanations are as follows: ABARBANEL takes החלק in the sense of demulcere (to smooth. Comp. Prov. xxix. 5) and refers it to the people of Anathoth who were inimical to Jeremiah: Ad demulcendum eos blandis verbis, ut amarent ipsum et inter illos inveniretur, si abirent in exilium. KIMCHI, SANCTIUS: Ad dividendum se et separandum ab Hierosolymis, in quibus fuit in medio populi. LYRANUS: Ut agrum eorum (cap. xxxii.) separaret ab aliis. LUTHER: To till fields [Äcker zu bestellen]. HITZIG: To separate his own from the portions of land which had become common property in the Sabbatical year (which HITZIG regards as B. C. 588, on the basis of xxxiv. 8 seqq.). TREMELLIVS, PISCATOR, ROSENMUELLER: Ad lubricandum se ipsum, i. e., ad subducendum se. SEN. SCHMIDT: Ut divideret cum populo relicta Chaldeorum spolia, partemque sibi acciperet et in urbem secum sumeret. L. DE DIEU: Ut partitum commoraretur nunc hic nunc illic. All these explanations are manifestly forced or grammatically incorrect. The ancient interpretation alone, which understands לחלק of a division of inheritance, appears admissible according to the present form of the text. The form of the word is like לְשֹׁכֵר Isai. xxiii. 11. Comp. OLSH., § 78, c. In the midst of the people declares that the prophet had no secret purpose, but wished to transact his business with the usual amount of publicity. Comp. Ruth iv. In this explanation however some points must still be considered unsatisfactory. 1. That החלק must be taken in the specific meaning “to divide inheritance” in which it nowhere else occurs; (though חֶלֶק, חֵלֶקָה may mean patrimonium (Num. xviii. 20); 2. That to the Hiphil, in order to be able to connect it with נָפְטָה, must be specially also attributed the meaning of fetching, since primarily it contains only the idea of parting. Meanwhile, as said above, the text as it stands does not afford a satisfactory meaning. It has been attempted to alter the text. J. D. MICHAELIS would read לְחַלְקוֹ שָׁם or לְחַלְקָם שָׁם. This however would not be good Hebrew. The scriptio defectio לחלק, as well as the similarity of ק and ח renders it easier to read חֶלֶקָה נָפְטָה. חֶלֶקָה means to change, which meaning appears with various modifications. For not only all kinds of change of place are designated by it (comp. transit, Job ix. 11; transgressus est, Isai. xxiv. 5; abiit, Cant. ii. 11; perrexit, 1 Sam. x. 3; pertransiit, Jud. v. 26; periit, Isai. ii. 18, in which meanings it is for the most part synonymous with נָפְטָה) but change of material (comp. renovari, revirescere, Hab. i. 11; Ps. xc. 5) and of form (comp. Piel, Gen. xli. 14; Hiph., Gen. xxxi. 7, 41; xxxv. 2; further חֶלְקָה and חֶלְפוֹת). It might then be declared that the prophet's going to Benjamin had for its object a change of residence. חֶלֶקָה might very suitably be referred to Jerusalem. It might however also according to well-known usage (comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5, d) signify “in that direction, thither” (comp. Isai. xvii. 13). It might thus be intimated to us that the prophet had no intention of going over to the Chaldeans, or of fleeing to secure his personal safety, but simply of returning to his native place, because he knew that a residence in Jerusalem no longer afforded him any safety, and because he regarded his ministry there as ended. (Comp. STARKE, ad h. l.) It is however declared by the words “in the midst of the people” that he did not take this step alone and secretly, but publicly and in company with many others, perhaps of those who believed in his prophetic utterances. From this as well as from נָפְטָה (because it indicates that the prophet took his way not to the army of the Chaldeans, but in the opposite direction) it would be clear how unjustifiable the imprisonment of the prophet was. In this however I merely express my own supposition.—On the gate of Benjamin comp. xxxviii. 7, and rems. on xx. 2.—Thou fallest away to the Chaldeans. The expression נָפַל appears to be an allusion to the answer, which Jeremiah, according to xxi. 9, gave a former embassy of Zedekiah. I say a former. For at the time, to which ch. xxi. belongs, Jerusalem was besieged by the Chaldeans, but the prophet was at liberty (comp. xxi. 1, 2, and xxxvii. 3, with xxxvii. 17). After his imprisonment, related in xxxvii. 13, however, Jeremiah was not again set at liberty. Chap. xxi. must therefore be placed before the retirement of the Chaldeans related in xxxvii. 5.

—The princes, before whom Jeremiah was brought, were, as GRAF correctly remarks, not the same as those, who had so warmly espoused his cause under Jehoiakim (chh. xxvi. xxxvi.) These had probably been carried away with Jehoiachin into captivity (xxiv. 1; xxix. 2) comp. rems. on xxviii. 1.—The house of the secretary Jonathan, of which we have no further knowledge, was used as a prison, because there were parts of it adapted for such a purpose. These are designated (1) by the word בֵּית. This word does not necessarily everywhere mean a pit, though it certainly does in xxxviii. 6, 7, 9, as is shown by passages like Gen. xl. 15; Exod. xii. 29. It is at any rate a subterranean cavity, and בֵּית-הַבְּיֹר is a house where there are such cavities, for the word may be taken collectively. Such places are (2) designated as בְּיֹרֹת. The word occurs here only. In the dialects, according to the radical meaning, it is “to let one’s-self down, to encamp, to turn in,” and “a camp, a place to put up at, a booth, a cell.” (FUERST). Here it is evidently the subterranean cell of a prison. (Comp. ROSENUELLER ad h. l.)

Vers. 17-21. Then Zedekiah . . . court of the guard. The second stage of imprisonment! The weak king, dependent on his nobles, has the prophet secretly brought from his prison to ask him, whether there is not a word from the Lord which in their desperate condition would give them some light and comfort. From the scarcity of means of subsistence (ver. 21) it is seen that the city was again blockaded. Jeremiah’s prophecy (ver. 8) was thus already fulfilled. This was doubtless the circumstance which filled Zedekiah with so much solicitude, that he determined to have the prophet called, a step which involved humiliation to himself (comp. ver. 19), and it might also compromise him with the princes (comp. “secretly,” ver. 17).—From the circumstance that Zedekiah has the prophet brought from the prison in the house of Jonathan, it is plainly seen that we have not before us the same conference, as that spoken of in xxxii. 3-5 and xxxiv. 2-5. For in this Jeremiah took part voluntarily, and for this as a punishment he was confined in the court of the guard, (xxxii. 3). For the conference here recorded he was brought from the prison, and afterwards as a favor assigned to the court of the guard. Since now the other conference at all events belongs to the last stage of the siege, as was shown above on xxxiv. 1-5, which entire stage Jeremiah spent partly in prison and partly in the guard-court, the conference recorded here must be the earlier of the two.—It is accordingly also clear that the prophecy “thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon” cannot be, as GRAF supposes, identical with that contained in xxxii. 4, 5; xxxiv. 2-5, i. e., it is so in subject but not in time. Jeremiah boldly tells the king the truth; but he also uses the opportunity to promote his own personal interest. He does this by giving expression on the one hand to the consciousness of his innocence, which was exhibited with eclat in the shaming of the false prophets (vers. 18, 19), and on the other by beseeching earnestly that he may not be taken back to the dungeon (ver. 20).—On let my supplication, etc., comp. xxxvi. 7.—On court of the guard, comp. xxxii. 2.—On piece of bread and bakers’ street, comp. the articles “Backen” and “Brod” in HERZOG, R.-Encycl. [SMITH, Dict. I., 227].

CHAP. XXXVIII.

- 1 Then Shephatiah the son of Mattan, and Gedaliah the son of Pashur, and Jucal the son of Shelemiah, and Pashur the son of Malchiah, heard the words that Jeremiah had spoken unto all the people, saying, Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah]: He that remaineth in this city¹ shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: but he that goeth forth to the Chaldeans shall live; for he shall have his
- 3 life for a prey, and shall live. Thus saith the LORD, This city shall surely [or must] be given into the hand of the king of Babylon’s army, which shall take it.
- 4 Therefore the princes said unto the king, We beseech thee, let this man be put to death;² for thus³ he weakeneth⁴ the hands of the men of war that remain in this city, and the hands of all the people, in speaking such words⁵ unto them: for this man seeketh not the welfare [lit. peace]⁶ of this people, but the hurt. Then Zedekiah the king said, Behold, he is in your hand: for the king is not he that can
- 6 do any thing [the king can do nothing]⁷ against you. Then took they Jeremiah, and cast him into the dungeon [pit, or cistern]⁸ of Malchiah the son of Hammelech [the king] that was in the court of the prison: and they let down Jeremiah with cords. And in the dungeon there was no water, but mire: so Jeremiah sunk in the
- 7 mire. Now when Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, one of the eunuchs which [who]

- was in the king's house, heard that they had put Jeremiah in the dungeon; the king then sitting in the gate of Benjamin; Ebed-melech went forth out of the king's house, and spake to the king, saying, My lord the king, these men have done evil in all that they have done to Jeremiah the prophet, whom they have cast into the dungeon: and he is like to [or must; lit.: is dead] die for hunger in the place where he is⁹: for there is no more bread in the city. Then the king commanded Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, saying, Take from hence thirty¹⁰ men with thee,¹¹ and take up Jeremiah the prophet out of the dungeon, before he die. So Ebed-melech took the men with him, and went into the house of the king under the treasury, and took thence old cast clouts,¹² and old rotten rags [rags of tattered and worn out clothes], and let them down by cords into the dungeon to Jeremiah.
- And Ebed-melech the Ethiopian said unto Jeremiah, Put now these old cast clouts and rotten rags under thine armholes¹³ under the cords. And Jeremiah did so. So they drew up Jeremiah with cords, and took him up out of the dungeon: and Jeremiah remained in the court of the prison [guard]. Then Zedekiah the king sent, and took Jeremiah the prophet unto him into the third [or principal] entry¹⁴ that is in [to] the house of the LORD [Jehovah]: and the king said unto Jeremiah, I will ask thee a thing;¹⁵ hide nothing¹⁶ from me. Then Jeremiah said unto Zedekiah, If I declare it unto thee, wilt thou not surely put me to death? and if I give thee counsel wilt thou not hearken unto me? So Zedekiah the king swore secretly unto Jeremiah, saying, As the LORD [Jehovah] liveth, that¹⁷ made us this soul, I will not put thee to death, neither will I give thee into the hand of these men that seek thy life.
- Then said Jeremiah unto Zedekiah, Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah], the God of hosts, the God of Israel: If thou wilt assuredly go forth unto the king of Babylon's princes, then thy soul shall live, and this city shall not be burned with fire; and thou shalt live, and thine house: but if thou wilt not go forth to the king of Babylon's princes, then shall this city be given into the hand of the Chaldeans, and they shall burn it with fire, and thou shalt not escape out of their hand. And Zedekiah the king said unto Jeremiah, I am afraid¹⁸ of the Jews that are fallen to the Chaldeans, lest they deliver me into their hand, and they mock me.¹⁹
- But Jeremiah said, They shall not deliver thee. Obey, I beseech thee, the voice of the LORD [Jehovah], which²⁰ I speak unto thee: so it shall be²¹ well unto thee, and thy soul shall live.²¹ But if thou refuse to go forth, this is the word that the LORD [Jehovah] hath showed me: And, behold, all the women that are left in the king of Judah's house shall be brought forth to the king of Babylon's princes, and those women [they] shall say, Thy friends [men of thy place]²² have set thee on [over-persuaded] and have prevailed against thee:²³ thy feet are sunk in the mire,²⁴ and they are turned away back. So they²⁵ shall bring out all thy wives and thy children to the Chaldeans: and thou shalt not escape out of their hand, but shalt be taken by the hand of the king of Babylon: and thou shalt cause this city to be burned with fire.
- Then said Zedekiah unto Jeremiah, Let no man know²⁶ of these words, and thou shalt not die. But if the princes hear that I have talked with thee, and they come unto thee, and say unto thee, Declare unto us now what thou hast said unto the king, hide it not from us, and we will not put thee to death; also what the king said unto thee: then thou shalt say unto them, I presented my supplication before the king, that he would not cause me to return to Jonathan's house, to die there.²⁷
- Then came all the princes unto Jeremiah, and asked him: and he told them according to all these words that the king had commanded. So they left off speaking²⁸ with him [lit.: were silent from him]; for the matter was not perceived. So Jeremiah abode in the court of the prison [guard] until the day that Jerusalem was taken.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 2.—The same words as in xxi. 9. Only here וַיִּבְרַח and וַיִּלְכָּם are wanting, and instead we have at the close a repeated וַיִּרְוּ. The Chethibh וַיִּרְוּ is here as in xxi. 9 the more correct reading, agreeing better with the order of the sentence (וַיִּבְרַח וַיִּרְוּ), in sense superfluous, but in accordance with the verbose style of the prophet, is construed like Dent. iv. 42 coll. xix. 4; Ezek. xviii. 13; xx. 11; NARGELSD. Gr., 2 84, f. On the form comp. OLSH., 8. 480, 482, 460.

⁵ Ver. 4.—לְדַבֵּר. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 95, e.

⁶ Ver. 4.—The construction with ל, as in Job x. 6; Deut. xii. 30; 1 Chron. xxii. 19; 2 Chron. xv. 13; xvii. 4, etc.

¹⁰ Ver. 10.—חִיצִיג (and after him EWALD, GRAF, MEIER) would read שְׁלֹשָׁה, because thirty men is too many and אֲנָשִׁים is contrary to the syntax, and also in 2 Sam. xxiii. 13 the same correction is made by the Keri. This alteration does not appear to me to be necessary. Zedekiah might not have ordered the larger number for the sake of the drawing up (for which four men would suffice, as Hitzig reckons), but for greater security and to hinder any resistance. The syntax is not opposed to this. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 76, 4; GESL. § 120, 2; 2 Sam. iii. 20; 2 Ki. ii. 16 coll. 17.—In 2 Sam. xxiii. the text is corrupt in many places.

So also כַּחֲבוֹת from כָּהַב, to rend, to tear (xv. 3; xxii. 19; xlix. 20). The article, which is shreds, tatters, rags. The article, which the Keri excised, is abnormal and probably occasioned by הַכַּחֲבוֹת, ver. 12. כְּלָחִים also is not found elsewhere. The root כָּלַח is found only in Isa. li. 6, in the meaning of diffuere, unless we assume another כָּלַח, synonymous with כָּרַח (Isa. xxxviii. 21; Lev. xxi. 20), to rub, rub away, and כָּרַק, to rub, polish (xvi. 4; Lev. vi. 21; 2 Chron. iv. 16).

¹³ Ver. 12.—From the connection this must be the meaning [not knuckles of the fingers]. Comp. Ezek. xli. 8, the only place where אֲצִיָּלָה occurs besides. In Ezek. xiii. 18 we find אֲצִיָּלָה יָדַי in a related meaning as to both words, for the latter is used by Ezekiel also in the wider sense, as is seen from ver. 20, where וְרוּיֹת stands for it. ¹⁷ Ver. 16.—אֵת אֲשֶׁר. If the Chethibh is correct, which is favored by the greater difficulty of the reading, these words simply = cum qui. The relative frequently includes the idea of the demonstrative pronoun (comp. vi. 13; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 80, 5). Since now וְהוּא is in the accusative, the pronoun relating to it must also be in the accusative; since, however, אֲשֶׁר must at the same time be the nominative to עֲנֵהָ, it evidently involves the double conception of cum qui, which is only rendered possible by the אֵת. In Latin it would be impossible to say quem in such a case.

In the Hithp. the meanings of “to gratify, indulge one's self” and “to mock” appear to be united, the LXX. usually rendering the word by ἐμπαίζω, in this place, however, by καταμωκάσμαι.

²⁵ Ver. 23.—On the absence of a subject comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 97, 2, b.

²⁶ Ver. 24.—Comp. Gen. xix. 33, 35; 1 Sam. xxii. 15; Job xxxv. 15. This also seems to be a pregnant construction, the prefix ב accordingly being dependent on the idea of penetrating latent in רָע. That it would be regarded as partitive I cannot believe. We should then expect בְּן.

²⁷ Ver. 27.—This inf. (למותר) depends on הַשִּׁבְנִי וְלִכְלֵהִי, and ל designates here not the subjective purpose, but the objective result. Comp. Gen. xix. 21; Num. xi. 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The chapter consists of two parts. In the first part (vers. 1-13) it is narrated how the princes prevailed on Zedekiah to give up Jeremiah to them, on account of his continual exhortations to surrender, that they might render him harmless (vers. 1-5). They then lower him down into a pit of mud, from which however the king has him drawn up, on the petition of the Cushite Ebed-melech (vers. 6-13). In the second part (14-23) it is recorded how the king has the prophet brought from the court of the guard, to which he had returned from the pit, for a secret conference (vers. 14, 15). The king desires that Jeremiah disclose the future to him without reserve, and promises him with an oath that his life shall be spared and protected. Jeremiah has, however, nothing else to say to the king, but that surrender is the only way of escape (vers. 16-23). Then the king forbids the prophet to communicate the purport of this conference. In accordance with the king's command, Jeremiah tells the princes, who really come to inquire from him about the conversation, that he only petitioned the king that he might not be taken back to the house of Jonathan, the secretary. The princes have to depart with this answer. Jeremiah, however, remains in the court of the guard till the capture of the city (vers. 24-28).

Vers. 1-6. Then Shephathiah . . . in the mire. Jeremiah, brought back into the court of the guard, has further opportunity of intercourse with the people, and uses it again and again to counsel voluntary surrender as the only means of escape.—Of the four princes, who hear the prophet's discourse, Shephathiah, son of Mattan, and Gedaliah, son of Pashur, are not further mentioned; Jucal, son of Shelemiah, is evidently identical with Jehucal, son of Shelemiah, xxxvii. 3. Pashur son of Malchiah, has been mentioned in xxi. 1. Pashur was of sacerdotal (comp. rem. on xxi. 1), Jucal of Levitic descent (comp. 1 Chron. xxvi. 1, 2, 9, 14). These "princes" were thus neither "raised from a lower rank," as GRAF supposes (on xxxvii. 15), nor do their former relations to the prophet lead us to conclude that they were inimically disposed towards him. We do not send, to present petitions, as is the case in xxi. 1, 2; xxxvii. 3, personas ingratas. The intended departure of Jeremiah (xxxvii. 12) seems thus to have awakened suspicion against him.—On ver. 3 comp. xxi. 10.—Seeketh not the welfare. On the subject-matter comp. xxix. 7; Deut. xxiii. 7; Ezer. ix. 12.—The charge against the prophet is unjust. He has the true welfare of the people in view, viz. that which is in accordance with the divine will, and the confidence which he seeks to break, is not a fully satisfied heroic courage, founded on genuine trust in God, but carnal obstinacy, which must lead to destruction. It is inconceivable how any one can fail to see this and take the part of the prophet's opponents. Comp. Duxcker, I. S. 831. The king, fearing on the one hand the higher power supporting the prophet, and on the other not having the courage openly to oppose the princes standing in corpore before him, delivers the prophet into their hands. That he expected the prophet would be merely taken back to the house of Jonathan (GRAF) I do not believe. The princes had decisively demanded Jeremiah's death (ver. 4). Their not having him executed at once, but thrown into a pit, where his escape would appear possible only by a miracle, may have been due either to their wickedness or to a certain fear of shedding the blood of the prophet. Comp. Gen. xxxvii. 22-24.

Jeremiah is now thrown into a cistern, which bears the name of an otherwise unknown prince, Malkiah (comp. rem. on xxxvi. 26), probably because he had it dug. The pit may have been often used as the severest imprisonment. The princes in letting down Jeremiah into it may have intended either his most painful death, or an evasion on their part, that they had not shed his blood, but only thrown him into a prison appropriate to such traitors. If he perished there the guilt would not be theirs. In the central point of the theocracy, opposed to prophets and priests who are filled with diabolical hatred and a weak king led by them, this solitary "servant of Jehovah" is at the lowest stage of humiliation and of suffering. All the hatred of Jerusalem, "that killeth the prophets and stoneth them that are sent unto thee" (Matt. xxiii. 37), culminates at this time in this behaviour towards Jeremiah, by which the measure of guilt was fulfilled and the sentence of destruction was pronounced over the unhappy city. The fulfilling and completing antitype of this historical event is certainly not what happened to John the Baptist (as HENGSTENBERG supposes, Christol., II. S. 400 [Eng. Tr., II., 403]), but what our Lord Himself suffered, who was also the object of the most intense hatred on the part of carnal Israel, as being the prophet of its final overthrow (Matt. xxiii. and xxiv.).—Comp. Ps. lxxix.

Vers. 7-13. Now when Ebed-melech . . . court of the guard. The expression "one of the eunuchs" (comp. lii. 25) seems to intimate that a real eunuch is here meant. As the Mosaic law forbade such mutilation (comp. Deut. xxiii. 1) and, on the other hand, it is not improbable that eunuchs were then employed in the service of the harem (2 Ki. xxiv. 15), it is not very strange to find a foreign eunuch in the service of a Jewish king, with whom, as we infer from vers. 22, 23, the harem occupied an important position. That Ethiopians were preferred for such service seems to be indicated by some traces (comp. Dan. xi. 43; TERENT. Eun., I. 2, 85), as at the present day most of these people come from upper Egypt. (Comp. WIKER, R.-W.-B. s. v., Verschnittene. [SMITH'S Dict., I. 590].) Ebed-melech [servant of the king] (עֲבֵד־מֶלֶךְ) is the proper name of the man, chosen with reference to his function. This name is so purely Hebrew and in accordance with the man's position at the Jewish court, that it is not to be conceived how FURST could come to suppose that it is a Hebraized from an Ethiopic name. Comp. R.-W.-B., S. 583.—This Ebed-melech is moreover a proof that the called are not always the chosen, that on the contrary the last are often the first. A stranger, a heathen, a Moor feels compassion for the prophet and horror at the crime committed on him, while in Israel not a hand or tongue is moved in his favor. Comp. Luke iv. 25; xix. 40; Matt. viii. 10.—Who was in the king's house. A relative sentence which expresses that Ebed-melech received the news, while he was present in the palace, but the king was absent, sitting in the gate of Benjamin. Comp. xxxvii. 13.—Have done evil, ver. 9. Comp. xlv. 5; Mic. iii. 4; 2 Ki. xxi. 11.—וַיִּכַּח הַחַיִּים. This may certainly mean grammatically, "and he had died," etc. But Ebed-melech does not wish to blame them, that instead of death by famine, which he would have suffered without this, they had inflicted on him another death, but that they had placed him in a position in which he must die at any rate, but must inevitably before all succumb to the famine. As is well known the Imperfect with Vau consecutive may represent any action which is not really past, but only represented as such, while in reality it is present or future, or even merely the wish, command, or assumed possibility of it. So here, that is related as an accomplished fact which is merely undoubtedly to be expected. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 88, 5; Jer. viii. 16; ix. 2; xx. 17.—Ebed-melech pre-supposes two things, (1) That the detention in the pit is not in itself absolutely fatal; (2) but that Jeremiah must at all events die of hunger in the pit. The latter pre-supposition is evidently founded on this fact, that in the general scarcity of means of subsistence one who was thrown into a pit might least of all expect to be provided for.

Vers. 14-16. Then Zedekiah . . . seek thy life. How long after the liberation from the pit the following conference took place, is not stated. HIRTZIG supposes that Zedekiah sent for the prophet very soon after his liberation, perhaps on the same day, since otherwise the evasion in ver. 26 would have lost all probability, for "days or weeks later, being left alone in the meantime, Jeremiah must have been set at rest with respect to the king's designs." But with a king of so weak and vacillating character Jeremiah could not, even after weeks, be safe from cruel measures towards his person. All that can be said is, that immediately after showing a favor a contrary treatment was less to be feared than some time afterwards. Nothing more exact can be determined. At all events, in the interval between the deliverance from the pit and the conference no remarkable event occurred.—Third entry. What entrance to the temple this was is unknown. At any rate, it must have afforded a suitable place for a secret conference.—HIRTZIG, by the use of 2 Ki. xvi. 18; xxiii. 11; 1 Chron. xxvi. 18, has attempted a clever combination, which is, however, based on too insecure premises to be satisfactory. [The outer entrance ("the king's entry without," 1 Ki. xvi. 18) leading from the citadel and after the time of Ahaz from the temple into the προάστειον, where there was the cell of a royal eunuch, 2 Ki. xxiii. 11.—S. R. A.]—From the prophet's answer we see that he neither trusted the king with respect to his own person, in spite of the favors he had received from him, nor with respect to the subject in hand did he expect any receptivity to the divine communications. Proudly and boldly he at first declines to answer the question. But the king swears to him that he will neither put him to death himself nor surrender him to his enemies.—Zedekiah swears by the God of life that he will preserve the prophet's life. Comp. xvi. 14, 15.

Vers. 17-23. Then said Jeremiah . . . to be burned with fire. Jeremiah again offers the king the alternative which had been so frequently presented before, either voluntary surrender to the Chaldean generals (ד'רצו, comp. xxxix. 3, 13, Nebuchadnezzar, himself was in Riblah, xxxix. 5) and at least the safety of his life and preservation of the city, or continued resistance and destruction of the city and the endangering of his own person. Observe the negative expression, "thou shalt not escape," in ver. 18. Comp. xxxii. 4, 5; xxxiv. 2-5. Zedekiah, however, cannot make up his mind to follow the advice of the prophet. He alleges that he fears ill-treatment from the Jews who had already gone over to the Chaldeans. It can scarcely be supposed that this fear was seriously intended, though those transfugæ might represent a party, which was discontented with the government of Zedekiah and ascribed all the calamities of the State to him. For even the quieting assurance of Jeremiah, ver. 20, makes no impression, which would have been the case if the king had had no other reason. There was really no reason to distrust the prophet's assurance.—In case Zedekiah, from fear of the insults of his fugitive subjects, refuses to follow the admonition of the prophet, the prospect of insult to his wives is set before him.—This is the word that Jehovah hath showed me. This does not logically follow as apodosis to the protasis if thou refuse, etc. A middle clause is wanting expressing the thought, thus shalt thou know, or I have to announce to thee as follows. Further, יהוה is the standing formula with which the subject of the vision is introduced, xxiv. 1; Am. vii. 1, 4-7; viii. 1. Accordingly ver. 21 b seems to be contracted from "hear now the word which I speak in thine ears, wlioh Jehovah," etc. (xxviii. 7). It is not, however, denied that the expression in itself is admissible as it stands. Comp. Ezek. xi. 25.—The prophet's setting before the king the prospect of the deportation of all his remaining wives, seems to intimate that these were a specially esteemed part of his household, in other words, that he had a large and to him very dear harem. The expression "the women that are left in the king of Judah's house," in distinction from "thy wives" in ver. 23, indicates that there were still wives of former kings as fixtures in the royal household (comp. 2 Sam. xii. 8; MICHAELIS, Mos. Recht., I. S. 207; SAALSCHUETZ, Mos. Recht., S. 85), and that even the deportation under Jehoiachin (2 Ki. xxiv. 15), had by no means exhausted the supply of these fixtures. I do not think that by the "women that are left," are to be understood the maidens, as distinguished from the wives, as GRAF supposes. For their being taken forth to the princes, points to higher rank and estimation. A satirical speech is placed in the mouths of these women, the first part of which is found verbatim (with the exception of יהוה instead of יהוה) in the prophecy of Obadiah (ver. 7). On the indications that Jeremiah borrowed from Obadiah, and not the reverse, comp. CASPARI, Obadja, S. 8, and the article Obadja in HERZOG, R.-Enc.—Turned away back. Comp. xli. 5; Isa. xlii. 17; Ps. xxxv. 4; xl. 15; cxxix. 5. As in the first clause, so also in the second two verbs are employed to express the thought, of which the second expresses the result of the first. The warrior sinking in the mire must fall back. The words are characteristic of Zedekiah. They represent him distinctly as a weak man, dependent on the influence of others. No wonder then that instead of a victor's psalm, with which the women usually receive a conqueror (1 Sam. xviii. 7), a song of mockery awaits him. Observe also, that this satirical song is not put into the mouths of Zedekiah's own wives, for these (in ver. 23) are evidently distinguished from the other occupants of the royal harem.—Taken by the hand. As שׁוֹבֵר signifies only "to seize," the words can mean only: thou wilt be taken by the hand, or into the hand of the king, etc. The former would be a mode of expression foreign to the style of the prophet (comp. xx. 4; xxi. 7; xxvii. 6; xxix. 21; xxxii. 3, 4; xxxiv. 3, etc. The second construction (Constr. prægians. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 112, 7) is frequent in Jer. iv. 31; xi. 7; xiv. 2; xxv. 34; xxxii. 20; comp. also infra, vers. 24 and 27. The sentence is to be regarded as the contraction of two thoughts into one, according to the example of xxxiv. 3.—The following sentence is also strange. For Jeremiah to say to Zedekiah, Thou wilt burn the city, although correct in a certain sense, is contrary to his usual mode of expressing himself. The LXX., Syr., Chald., read שׁוֹבֵר . The punctuation שׁוֹבֵר may be occasioned by אֵל . The latter is, however, not seldom used to emphasize an antithetical new conception, for which we should say: but as to, etc. Comp. EWALD, § 277, d, and especially the passages Ezek. xvii. 21; xlv. 3; Jer. xxxvi. 22; 2 Ki. vi. 5. So EWALD, HITZIG, GRAF, MEIER and others.

Vers. 24-28. Then said Zedekiah . . . was taken. The king feared that if the import of his conversation with Jeremiah were known, he would be regarded as vacillating and be suspected of inclining to the view of the prophet. Though he knew that the fact of the conversation could not remain concealed, he wished, however, that it might be represented as occasioned by Jeremiah himself, and as relating purely to his personal interests.—And thou shalt not die, may be regarded as a threat on the part of the king, but at the same time also as a reference to the danger threatening from the princes. For the king would say: I will have you put to death if you betray me, and the princes will kill you if they learn that you have summoned me again to surrender. In the supposed inquiry of the princes, ver. 25, the words hide it not from us, and we will not put thee to death, are a parenthesis, the latter expressing the threat, which Zedekiah presupposes in case the prophet should refuse to make a satisfactory statement.—I presented, etc. Comp. rems. on xxxvi. 7. The pit is not mentioned here. Zedekiah seems thus to presuppose that Jeremiah need not fear a taking back to the pit, from which he had been liberated at the king's command, but that a return to the prison of Jonathan (xxxvii. 15), to avert which he had already offered a petition, might be regarded as possible. The latter seems to have been an ordinary place of confinement, while the pit was only an extraordinary one.—The princes really come to Jeremiah. The fact of the conference thus did not remain concealed, but concerning the import of it, nothing had become known (the matter was not perceived). They must have regarded the declaration of Jeremiah made in accordance with the king's command as probable, for they do not urge the prophet further, but withdraw in silence. After this Jeremiah remained in the court of the guard till the capture of the city. On that which further occurred between Jeremiah and Zedekiah during this last stage of his confinement comp. rems. on xxxii. 2-5; xxxiv. 1-5.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xxxvii. 2, 3. The Lord's words Zedekiah did not care to hear, but the help of the Lord he would have liked to have. This seeking for help then did not proceed from a truly believing heart. It was merely an experiment, as in time of need one tries everything. Hence Zedekiah did not venture to come to the Lord himself, but Jeremiah was to intercede for him. "It is, however, in vain for intercession to be made for him, and he himself does not help to pray. Take the example of Pharaoh, Exod. viii. 29; ix. 28; x. 17." CRAMER.

2. On xxxvii. 5-10. Nothing is more bitter than in time of greatest need to see apparent help again disappear. Raised from the depths, one is then cast back into a still profounder deep. The Jews had invoked the aid of the Egyptians on their own responsibility. It was a triumph of worldly policy. The Lord disappoints their calculations. He is not to be so easily put out. The Chaldeans withdraw, but only to defeat the Egyptians, and then return. And Jeremiah must be the prophet of this disappointed hope. A few mortally wounded men, he must proclaim, would suffice to execute the Lord's decree on Jerusalem. Comp. 2 Sam. v. 6.

3. On xxxvii. 10. This passage is also adduced as an instance of the so-called scientia media or de futuro conditionato (Vide BRUNDE, Inst. Dogm., pag. 228), together with 1 Sam. xxiii. 11, 12; Jer. xxxviii. 17; Ezek. iii. 6; Matt. xi. 21, 22; xxiv. 22; Acts xxvii. 31. STARKE.

4. On xxxvii. 11, 12. If Jeremiah really wished to leave Jerusalem, because in the city he no longer hoped to secure safety or any success to his ministry (comp. STARKE: "It appears that the prophet would betake himself to the country-people, because he hoped from them better results in penitence and the averting of the divine judgments, since hitherto he had been mostly hindered in his office by the priests and the court"), he was in error and took an arbitrary step. For in the first place the servant of God, who is at his post, is under divine protection, and in the second, he had to proclaim the will of God again and again to the stubborn people. There was then still the possibility of their obedient submission to the divine will. Jeremiah did afterwards repeatedly show that deliverance was still possible on the condition of submission (xxxviii. 2, 3, 17), and also, as he had to proclaim ruin unconditionally (xxxii. 3-5; xxxiv. 2-5), this testimony was necessary, partly as a proof of the inviolability of the divine counsel, partly to cut off all excuse for the Jews afterwards, partly as a foil to the glorious Messianic prophecies (chh. xxxii. and xxxiii.) which pertain to this last stage before the destruction of the city. If then Jeremiah really had the purpose at that time to leave the city, it was an arbitrary step, which was not to succeed, and for which his arrest and what followed was a just punishment. In this sense DIEDRICH also says (S. 120), "The saints also err, and God deals with them punctiliously, so they also must be docile under the divine chastisements."

5. On xxxvii. 15. "Jeremiah's prophecies applied to the whole situation (political), and he thus could not avoid the appearance, which his disposition to recommend to the king the surrender of the city occasioned. God be praised! our Lord's kingdom is not of this world. His servants may renounce the matters, which pertain thereto, with full freedom, and this the more because the Lord raises the instruments who are to labor for the amelioration of the State and the circumstances of mankind also from this kingdom, but gives the prophets of the New Testament a complete dispensation therefrom; of which we have a living example in Jesus and all His Apostles, who did not meddle by a word in any of the civil matters of the authorities, under whom they taught. Justice and chastity were Paul's themes with the procurator Felix, which were matters of the interior, and that is enough." ZINZENDORF.

6. On xxxvii. 17. "The king was commanded to put the book of the law before him, and always have it with him, Deut. xvii. 19. As now he did not do this, he must be in awe even of his own servants: sometimes he must look at his counsellors through his fingers and let them do as they will, and though he might have been a master, he must be a servant. For God poureth contempt upon princes and looseth the covenant of the mighty (Job xii. 21)." CRAMER.

7. On xxxvii. 18-20. In the consciousness of his official dignity the prophet proudly appears before the king, saying, Although it has come out clearly that I was right and your prophets wrong, you have done me injustice. Nevertheless he applies with humble and earnest petition to the king in behalf of his person, that he may not be taken back again to the dreadful prison. "After Jeremiah's example, one may well petition tyrannical magistrates for a mitigation of persecution, but not speak to please them for the sake of the mitigation." CRAMER.

8. On xxxviii. 1-4. Jeremiah is like a running spring, which has an abundance of water. The mouth of the tube may be stopped. But no sooner is a slight temporary opening afforded, than the water breaks forth with full power. Although he knew what was before him, he was not silent. For he could not be silent (xx. 9). Even if they had beaten him to death on the spot with clubs, yet dying he would have cried: he that goeth forth shall live. Jeremiah was, however, no arch-traitor, but the truest patriot in all Israel. Is not this proved by the courage, with which he inflexibly repeated his apparently so unpatriotic counsel? Certainly his opponents regard him as the most dangerous man among the people, just as Ahab accused Elijah of troubling Israel (1 Kings xviii. 18), Amaziah Amos (vii. 10), the Jews Paul (Acts xvi. 20).

9. On xxxviii. 5. Legal right to carry out their will, in opposition to that of the king, the princes had none. Zedekiah's speech, therefore, displays only his individual weakness. He also shows by it how little he was subject to God. For had he been faithful to God, he would have found means to compel the obedience of his princes. He who has the right, has also the Lord on his side. If this was manifest in the case of the poor priest Jeremiah, how much more so in that of the king. But this king was no Jeremiah.

10. On xxxviii. 6. No prophet was ever maltreated so pitifully as Jeremiah. He represents the culminating point in the humiliation of the servant of Jehovah, but also the extreme point in the alienation from God of the theocracy, which was immediately followed as a merited punishment by the deepest outward decline. Therefore in Jeremiah also must "Christ's resurrection become visible (DIEDRICH)."

11. On xxxviii. 7-13. A Moor, a heathen, must have compassion and raise his voice against the enormity, while all Israel was silent. Thus is completed the testimony to Israel's decline, and the guilt appears to be a common one.

12. On xxxviii. 14, 15. This seems to be the manner of princes. They say: I wish to hear the truth, the truth only, the whole truth. And when one tells them the truth, he draws upon himself their highest displeasure. For these lords, accustomed to a Homeric life of the gods (θεοὶ ἥϊα ζῶντες), do not like to be disturbed in this their bliss. Nothing, however, affects them more rudely than the truth. Zedekiah even does not seem to have been in earnest with his "pray, hide nothing from me," for otherwise he would at least have done what he could to follow the prophet's counsel.

13. On xxxviii. 19-23. Zedekiah gives as a pretext his dread of mocking and maltreatment from the fugitive Jews. For these, the malcontents, who attributed all the blame to his government and had therefore fled, might possibly have him delivered over to them, and then take their revenge on him. Jeremiah assures him that he has no insult to fear from them. But he will be exposed to the most sensible insults from a quarter where he would least expect it, viz., from the women of his own harem. To be received by his own wives with insulting songs, instead of songs of victory—what greater disgrace could be conceived for a man and a prince? Incidit in Scyllam qui vult vitare Charybdin.

14. On xxxviii. 24-27. Did Jeremiah participate in a prevarication, or not? The opinions on this point are divided. FÖRSTER says: Non quidem disertis verbis mentitus est Jeremias; interim tamen hoc ejus factum speciem quandam mendacii habet, vel certe est dissimulatio, quæ non omni ex parte excusanda. Others on the other hand call attention to two points: 1. Although in vers. 15-17, no such request is mentioned as, according to ver. 26, Jeremiah is said to have made, it is yet implied, both in the words of the prophet in ver. 15, and in the answer of the king, ver. 16. It follows from what is said by both of them, that Jeremiah wished that he might neither be put to death nor brought into such a condition as would inevitably involve his death. Consequently, he at any rate, cherished the same wish, which he expressed to the king in xxxviii. 20. 2. If then the declaration of ver. 26 does not contain the whole truth, it contains no untruth. The princes, however, had no right to demand the whole truth from Jeremiah. For they were simply murderers. No one, however, is bound to a murderer to expose himself to his knife, by the confession of the truth. This latter view may well be the correct one. [Comp. WORDSWORTH and STANLEY, Jewish Church, p. 524.—S. R. A.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xxxvii. 3. To supplicate the Lord or to intercede with the Lord is indeed right, but it is useless and wrong to desire the help, but not the Lord Himself. [Sinners contradict their prayers, and thus render them unsuccessful, by their lives. LATHROP.—S. R. A.]

2. On xxxvii. 5-10. Instructive example of the difference between man's help and God's help. Man's help self-sought, self-made, shows at first indeed a joyous hopeful countenance, but it is hollow and vacuous, and confidence therein is self-deception. In due course it shows itself perfectly powerless, indeed it turns to the contrary, to destruction. God's help on the other hand is announced at first under gloomy aspects and hard conditions (surrender to the Chaldeans), but these hard conditions are wholesome chastisement, from which proceed life and salvation.

3. On xxxvii. 11-13. "It is the manner of God's enemies, that they shamefully misinterpret the acts of His servants, when these indeed justify themselves, but when they find no hearing they suffer and are silent; only from the confession of the truth they will not forbear." The Major Prophets, by HEIM and HOFFMANN.

4. On xxxviii. 4. "Worldly people are still disposed to reproach the preachers of the Gospel with the injury which they inflict on the commonwealth, because they seek to hinder the God-forgotten course of the commonwealth, as the worldly people wish it to be. One must not be put out by this, but go on." HEIM and HOFFMANN.

5. On xxxviii. 4-13. As at the time of Christ the external theocracy was approaching its final overthrow, so at the time of Jeremiah it was its precursory overthrow. Christ was the prophet of the former, Jeremiah of the latter. As Christ was accused of being an arch-traitor and corrupter of the people (John xi. 48, 50), so also Jeremiah. The true ground here, as there, was diabolical hatred to the divine truth and carnal dependence on outward supports and their own excellence. The princes, who threw Jeremiah into the pit, correspond to the rulers of the people at the time of Christ, the weak Zedekiah to the weak Pontius Pilate, Ebed-melech to those believers from the heathen (the ruler of Capernaum, the Canaanitish woman, the Samaritans) who put Israel to shame by their faith. And as Jeremiah is delivered from the pit, so Christ after three days rises from the grave.

6. On xxxviii. 19-23. Our ways and God's ways. 1. Our ways: (a) preserve us not from that which we feared (ver. 22); (b) they lead to destruction (ver. 23). God's ways: (a) preserve us from that which we feared (vers. 19, 20); (b) they lead to safety and life (ver. 20)

B. The Events subsequent to the Capture of Jerusalem (chh. xxxix.—xliv).

XXXVIII. 28 b—XXXIX. 14.

28 b. And he was there! [And it came to pass] when Jerusalem was taken, XXXIX. 1 (In the ninth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the tenth month, came Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon and all his army against Jerusalem, and they besieged it. And in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, in the fourth month, the ninth day of the month, the city was broken up. And [that] all the princes of the king of Babylon came in, and sat in the middle gate, even Nergal sharezer, Samgar-nebo, Sarsechim, Rab-saris, [or the chief of the eunuchs] Nergal sharezer, Rab-mag [or the chief of the Magi], with all the residue of the princes of the king of Babylon. 4 And it came to pass, that when Zedekiah the king of Judah saw them, and all the men-of-war [or and all the men-of-war saw them], then they fled and went out of the city by night, by the way of [to] the king's garden, by the gate betwixt the 5 two walls: and he went out the way of the plain. But the Chaldeans' army pursued [hastened] after them, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho: and when they had taken him [and took him] they [and] brought him up to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon to Riblah in the land of Hamath, where he gave 6 [held] judgment upon him. Then the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah in Riblah before his eyes: also the king of Babylon slew all the nobles of Judah. 7 Moreover he put out Zedekiah's eyes, and bound him with chains [a double chain], 8 to carry [take] him to Babylon. And the Chaldeans burned the king's house, and the houses of the people, with fire, and brake down the walls of Jerusalem.

9 Then Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard [halberdiers, lit.: executioners] carried away captive into Babylon the remnant of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to him [the deserters, who had gone over to him], with the rest of the people that remained. But Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard left of the poor of the people, which had nothing, in the land of Judah, and gave them vineyards and fields³ at the same time. Now Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon gave charge concerning Jeremiah to Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard, saying, Take him, and look well to him, [set thine eyes upon him] and do him no harm; but do unto him even as he shall say unto thee. So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard sent, and Nebushasban, Rab-saris [chief of the eunuchs] and Nergal-sharezer, Rab-mag [chief of the Magi], and all the king of Babylon's princes: Even they sent, and took Jeremiah out of the court of the prison [guard], and committed him unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, that he should carry him home [into the house]: so he dwelt among the people.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 28 b.—These words cannot either logically or grammatically be connected with the previous context. The Vulg. and Chald. translate ungrammatically: et factum est, ut caperetur Hierosolyma. The Syr. omits the words altogether. The LXX. translate merely יהיה, connecting it immediately with xxxix. 1. On the other hand, an entirely appropriate sense and connection is furnished, if the words are connected with ver. 3. On יהיה comp. rems. on xxxvii. 11. The Masoretcs, moreover, objected to the present division of the text, as may be seen from their פִּכְכָּה פִּנְחָצֵעַ פִּכְכָּה (lacuna in medio versu). Comp. GeseN.: Lehrgeb., S. 124; HUFFELD, Stud. u. Krit., 1837, S. 835. Similar cases are found in Gen. xxxv. 22; Num. xxv. 19; Josh. iv. 1; Ezek. iii. 16, etc. Comp. FUESS, Propylæa Masorae, § 29 in the Concordance, p. 1369.—In ver.

1, פִּנְחָצֵעַ is wanting in our text, possibly through the oversight of the transcriber; הוא is likewise wanting before וְכָל-יְהוּדָה; וַיִּצְרֻ עָלָיו is contracted from the longer sentence “and pitched against it, and built forts against it round about, so the city was besieged.” Finally הַבְּקֵיָה הָעִיר is contracted from “the famine prevailed (was sore) in the city, and there was no bread for the people of the land, and the city was broken up.” It is evident that the author of this text was concerned only to present the main thoughts.

² Ver. 5.—The expression כִּי-יִשְׁפֹּט אֶת-כָּל-בְּנֵי-יִשְׂרָאֵל for “to hold judgment,” occurs only in Jeremiah: i. 16; iv. 12; xii. 1. The present account also has the form here only, while in 2 Ki. xxv. 6 we find כִּי-יִשְׁפֹּט. Moreover the expression is not found elsewhere with the following אֶת and with the meaning “litigare, hold judgment,” but it signifies elsewhere (Ps. xxxvii. 20; Isa. xxxii. 7) simply “to speak justice.”—This is a point which would favor the Jeremian origin of ch. lii. (comp. HAEVERNICK, Einkl., II. 3, S. 233), if this grammatical agreement might not be due to other causes.

³ Ver. 10.—דָּגָן is ἀπ. λέγ.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The text of this chapter is interwoven with portions from chap. lii. (2 Ki. xxv.). Immediately after the opening words an abridged account is interpolated from lii. 4-7 (2 Ki. xxv. 1-4), of the capture of the city mentioned in these words (vers. 1 and 2). Then after ver. 3, vers. 4-10 a similarly abridged account of the flight, capture and punishment of the king, and of the burning of the city and deportation of the people is added from lii. 7-16 (2 Ki. xxv. 4-12). What further follows (vers. 11-14) is not derived from elsewhere, but with xxxviii. 28 b, and xxxix. 3, forms the only independent portion of this section, xxxix. 1-14. The question, whether the statements in vers. 11-13, agree with ver. 3, will be treated in the Exec. Rems. Here it may simply be observed that after the excision thus made the original constituents of the section are occupied purely with the person of the prophet, informing us that by order of Nebuchadnezzar, the captain of dragoons Nebuzar-adan has the prophet brought out of the court of the guard and given in charge to Gedaliah, son of Ahikam, after which Jeremiah remained “among the people.”

XXXVIII. 28 b.—xxxix. 2. And it came to pass . . . broken up. As the verses 1, 2 cannot in any way be grammatically connected with the preceding and following context, they may be regarded as a parenthesis. The mention of the capture of Jerusalem in xxxviii. 28 b occasioned the insertion of this chronological notice relating thereto. It is evident that this insertion was not made by the prophet himself, but proceeded from a later source. Even KELL acknowledges that the account of the destruction of Jerusalem, which is contained in two recensions, Jer. lii. and 2 Ki. xxiv. 18—xxv. 4, cannot have proceeded from the hand of the prophet (comp. Commentar zu den BB. d. Könige, 1865, S. 10, 11 with which, however, what is said in S. 378 Anm., does not quite agree). Since now vers. xxxix. 1, 2 are taken from that account of the destruction of Jerusalem which we find in Jer. lii. and 2 Ki. xxv., and this account (comp. the narrative of Jehoiachin's end, Jer. lii. 31-34), must necessarily be of later date than Jeremiah, the extract from that account cannot have been made by Jeremiah. These verses are, therefore, to be regarded as a gloss, which probably came into the text, not by the will of the author, but by the fault of the transcriber. Once having entered the text, they pressed back also those words at the close of the previous chapter, since the parenthesis was doubtless then found to be too long and disjointed, and the connection of the words with ver. 3 impracticable. What means the oldest commentators took to fit the words to the previous context, we have already seen.

Ver. 3 That all the princes . . . king of Babylon. These words attach themselves as we have shown to xxxviii. 28 b. How long after the capture of the city this event took place, the words themselves do not inform us. For the connection of the sentence, xxxviii. 28 b, may designate both an immediate chronological sequence, or a longer interval. Let us first regard more particularly the place and object of the assembly, and the persons assembled. The place is called the gate of the middle. As is well known, David had first conquered and fortified (2 Sam. v. 7, 9) Mount Zion, the city of David, which JOSEPHUS (Antiq. V., 2, 2) calls the καθ' ἑσπεραν πόλις in distinction from the κάτω πόλις. The expression seems to denote one of the gates in the wall separating this upper and lower city. It does not occur elsewhere. Perhaps, however, עִיר הַתִּיכְנָה (Keri הַתִּיכְנָה) 2 Ki. xx. 4 is connected with it. ARNOLD (HERZ.: R.-Enc. XVIII., S. 629) [SMITH, Dict., I. 1027] supposes that the middle gate is to be sought in the middle of the north wall of Mt. Zion. If the gate of the middle is then to be sought, not in the outer city-wall, but in the interior of the city, perhaps as the main entrance to the upper city, it appears to be a central point quite favorable for the commander's purpose. At the same time the sitting of the commander in this gate, as the central point of the city-life (comp. on the significance of the gate in this regard, HERZOG'S R.-Enc. XIV., S. 721) may have been the signal of the formal and solemn taking possession. In taking their places where the rulers and elders of Jerusalem were accustomed to discharge their office, the Chaldean princes gave it to be understood that they were now masters of the city. That they had "taken up their quarters" in the gate, as GRAF supposes, I do not think. For a gate is no place for living in, least of all for princes. As we perceive from 2 Ki. xxv. 1 (Jer. lii. 4), Nebuchadnezzar himself began the siege, but left its continuation to his generals, he himself being at the time of the capture in Riblah (2 Ki. xxv. 6; Jer. xxv. 9: xxxix. 5). These generals are now enumerated. HIRTZIG has made the ingenious conjecture, that the four names which we here read, are to be reduced to three, of which each is followed by an official title. Thus Nergal-sharezer bears the title Sangar, which in the Persian signifies "he who has the cup," so that it is equivalent to Rabshakeh (Isa. xxxvi. 2) the cup-bearer. Nebo, which in compound names never occurs in the last place (which is certainly correct), is to be connected with the following name. Sar-sechim is identical with Rab-saris (for כַּרְסָה from כָּרַח, or כָּרַח eccare, from which כַּרְסָה knife, is equivalent to eunuch). This idle, sportive accumulation of designations of a man has now after Nebo supplanted the second half of the real name, Shasban (ver. 13). We thus obtain three names, each with a title: 1. Nergal-sharezer, cupbearer; 2. Nebushasban, chief-eunuch; 3. Nergal-sharezer, chief-magian. This conjecture, on which GRAF has bestowed his approbation, is very plausible, especially as Rabsaris is certainly called Nebushasban in ver. 13, and we cannot conceive why the chief-eunuch, of which there cannot well have been more than one, bears a different name in ver. 3, from that in ver. 13. According to HIRTZIG the last two names in ver. 13 agree with the corresponding ones in ver. 3, the only difference being in the first name, which is however fully explained by the circumstance, that during the interval which had elapsed between ver. 3 and ver. 15, Nebuzar-adan, who was highest in rank of all the princes, had arrived, and is therefore named first in the latter passage instead of the Nergal-sharezer of ver. 3. The sense and connection are thus in favor of HIRTZIG'S conjecture, but it still lacks a secure etymological basis. That Sangar means cup-bearer, and Sar-sechim is equivalent to Rab-saris, is not yet sufficiently proved. On the name Nergal-sharezer comp. NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Bab., S. 37, 42, 43, Ann. [On the identification of Nergal-sharezer with Nerglissat, son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar, see RAWLINSON, Ancient Monarchies, III., 232, 528, and SMITH'S Bible Dictionary, s. v.—S. R. A.] On Nebo also, ib. S. 30, 34.

Vers. 4-10. And it came to pass . . . at the same time. This passage is, as already remarked, taken with abbreviations from lii. 7-16 (2 Ki. xxv. 4-12). The object is evidently to give, in a compressed picture of the general distress, a background to the original representation, relating merely to the fate of the prophet. That this was necessary, together with ch. lii., must be doubted. For what author will unnecessarily write the same thing twice over? Or would not the author of ch. xxxix. expect that the reader could himself derive the necessary elucidation of this narrative from ch. lii.? xxxix. 4-10 is however taken from ch. lii., not from 2 Ki. xxv. For if we compare xxxix. 4 with lii. 7; xxxix. 5 with lii. 8, 9; xxxix. 6 with lii. 10 (N. B.: the slaughter of the princes is not mentioned in 2 Ki. xxv.) and xxxix. 7 with lii. 11, we shall find that the present passage contains all which distinguishes the narrative of ch. lii. from that in 2 Ki. xxv., while in no point does it agree with 2 Ki. xxv. in opposition to ch. lii. In the verses xxxix. 8-10 the narrative in relation both to ch. lii. and 2 Ki. xxv. is so much abbreviated, that any special relationship with one of the two passages is not perceptible. They differ in this section however only in single words, which have no bearing on the essential import, so that we may say that the present text is related to ch. lii., as well as to 2 Ki. xxv., as extract and elucidation. On this more below. If, now, xxxix. 4-10 is indisputably of later date than ch. lii., so as to presuppose this chapter, we cannot avoid regarding the text as originally a marginal gloss, which was gradually by the fault of the transcriber incorporated into the text. As regards particular points, the words "And it came to pass that when Zedekiah," ver. 4, may be recognized as a skillfully added connecting gloss, for 1, the original text contains nothing of this; but lets the flight follow immediately on the breaking in of the Chaldeans, lii. 7; 2 Ki. xxv. 4; 2, it is also in itself improbable, that Zedekiah deferred his flight till the Chaldean princes had taken their post in the middle gate. The flight was effectuated in a direction opposite to that in which the enemies from the North approached, viz., by the exit to the South "on the way to the garden of the king through the gate between the double wall." This garden of the king is mentioned only in Neh. iii. 15, where it borders on the pool of Siloah. Comp. ARNOLD in HERZOG, R.-Enc., XVIII., S. 630 u. 635; LEYRER in the same, XIV. S. 371. [SMITH, Dict., I., 653]. According to ARNOLD this garden of the king is probably identical with the garden of Uzza (2 Ki. xxi. 18, 20). The gate between the double walls also is mentioned only here and in the parallel passages. It is to be sought for in the exit of the Tyropæon, and is probably identical with the gate of the fountain (Neh. ii. 14; iii. 15; xii. 37). Comp. ARNOLD, S. 629 et pass.; THEIVS, BB. d. Könige, S. 456; ROBINSON, Pal. II., S. 142.—The double-wall mentioned besides here (and parallel passages) only in Isa. xxii. 11, appears to have been a double connection between Zion and Ophel. But concerning this there are various views. Comp. THEIVS, The graves of the kings of Judah in ILLGRU'S Zeitschr. f. hist. Theol., 1844, I. S. 18 sqq.; HERZOG, R.-Enc., V. S. 157; XIV. From this southern exit Zedekiah turned eastward to the עֲרֵבָה. This is the general term for the plain or vale of the Jordan, both on its eastern (comp. Deut. i. 1; iii. 17; iv. 49; Josh. xii. 1) and its western shore (comp. Josh. viii. 14; xi. 2, 16; 2 Sam. ii. 29). Yet it seems as though Arabah is not only to be taken in a narrower and wider sense, (in the wider it comprises the entire depression of the lake Gennesaret to the Elamitic gulf, of which the southern half, from the southern end of the Dead Sea, is still called Wady el Araba) but to be generally of a fluctuating character. For in Deut. xi. 30 for instance the region of Sichem, where Mts. Ebal and Gerizim are situated, is reckoned to the Arabah. Zedekiah is overtaken in the עֲרֵבֹת יְרֵחוֹ. This is a part of the Arabah, the enlargement of the Jordan-valley, three leagues wide, near Jericho, watered by the brook of Elisha.

The captured king is taken to Riblah, the northern boundary city of Palestine, at the source of the Orontes, (Numb. xxxiv. 11) the point of juncture for the roads eastward to the Euphrates, southward to Damascus and the Jordan, and westward to Phœnicia, which had previously been the head-quarters of Pharaoh Necho (2 Ki. xxiii. 33). Here Nebuchadnezzar held judgment over him. Nebuchadnezzar had made him king (2 Ki. xxiv. 17). Zedekiah was therefore a rebel against him (lii. 3; 2 Ki. xxiv. 20).

The punishment which Zedekiah had to suffer for his revolt was a cruel one: his children were slain before his eyes, likewise all the great men of Judah (הַגְּבֹרִים for שְׂרָרִים lii. 10 probably as a reminiscence from xxvii. 30); he himself was blinded and carried in chains to Babylon. From to carry, ver. 7, onwards, the abridgement is great and in so far unfortunate that one main point is omitted, viz., the circumstance that Nebuchadnezzar on the news of the capture of Jerusalem sent the captain of his body-guard, Nebuzar-adan, to Jerusalem, who arrived there four weeks after the capture. The mention of this circumstance was important, because without it the appearance of Nebuzar-adan, from xxxix. 9 onwards, is wholly unaccounted for. One consequence of this omission is also that in ver. 8 it is not Nebuzar-adan who burns the city, but the Chaldeans. Why the temple is not mentioned among the objects burned is not clear. In ver. 4 the obscure and superfluous words "the poor of the people," found in lii. 15, are omitted, and instead of "that fell to the king of Babylon," we have simply "that fell to him," עָלָיו (2 Ki. xxv.

11, עַל כָּל־בְּלָיָהוּ, almost the only point in which ch. xxxix. approaches more nearly to 2 Ki. xxv. than ch. lii.). Since the king of Babylon has not been named just before (comp. ver. 6 fin.) "to him" can refer only to the Nebuzar-adan mentioned in the following verse; a reference which cannot be historically justified, since by the deserters mentioned are to be understood such only as went over before the conquest. After the deserters our text mentions besides "the remnant of the people." In antithesis to the "remnant of the people that remained in the city" can be understood only the inhabitants remaining in the country. In the place of the second הָעָם we find in 2 Ki. xxv. 11 הַהֶמְכָּן, in

Jer. lii. 15 הָרֵאָתָי. The former denotes "tumult, multitude of people" (comp. Isai. xiii. 4; xvii. 12) and our text takes the latter doubtless in the same sense. Whether correctly is another question. Comp. rems. on lii. 15. Nebuzar-adan, the "captain of the guard," is here named for the first time. Sent by the king to Jerusalem on receipt of the news that Jerusalem is taken (comp. lii. 12; 2 Ki. xxv. 8), he immediately assumes the chief command, as is evident from this passage, and the following (xxxix. 10-12; xl. 1-5). The nature of his office, as well as the expression "who stood before the king" in lii. 12, indicate that he took precedence of all other princes.—The tenth verse, in this differing from the rest, contains an extension of the original text, the expression "the poor" being explained by the addition "which had nothing," wanting in ch. lii. and 2 Ki. xxv. The author evidently held it to be desirable (though unnecessary), to call attention to the fact that לָךְ is not here to be taken in the sense of "afflicted, miser." The brief phrase "for vine-dressers and for husbandmen" in lii. 16; 2 Ki. xxv. 12 (Keri) he extends into a sentence.—The words "at the same time" (in the same day) are to mark the difference in time between what was last narrated and what follows. It might otherwise have seemed as if the events narrated in ver. 11 occurred contemporaneously with those in vers. 9, 10.

Vers. 11-14. Now Nebuchadnezzar . . . among the people. STRUENSEE, MOVERS, GRAF, MEIER, dispute the genuineness of vers. 11-13, HIRTZIG only of ver. 13. The objections to the authenticity appear to be the following: 1. The commission given to Nebuzar-adan is, according to xl. 1, not executed. Only in Rama (xl. 1) does Nebuzar-adan (comp. xl. 4) what ac-ording to xxxix. 11, 12 he was commanded to do. 2. If Nebuzar-adan, who according to lii. 12 came to Jerusalem four weeks after its capture, first ordered the liberation of Jeremiah from the court of the guard, Jeremiah had remained there four weeks after the capture, which is in contradiction to xxxviii. 28. 3. The three vers. are wanting in the LXX. 4. As to ver. 13 in particular, it is a mere connecting clause, rendered necessary by the insertion of vers. 11, 12. For ver. 14 could not be connected directly with ver. 12; for the subject of "sent" would then be obscure. By the mention of Nebuzar-adan the connection with ver. 12 and the previous context, and by the mention of the other princes the connection with ver. 13 is established. I do not think that these arguments are conclusive. As to the first point, Nebuzar-adan certainly made the necessary arrangements for the execution of his commission. He liberated the prophet from the court of the guard, and entrusted him to Gedaliah for his further maintenance. But he seems not to have been in a condition to keep the prophet specially in view, so that he might be preserved from any personal malignity. In the confusion which was necessarily connected with the destruction of the city, the prophet, who voluntarily or involuntarily had been included in the multitude of the people, was treated like the rest. He was bound like the others. It was only in Ramah, where probably the first halt was made, and the arrangement of the caravan was definitely adjusted, that the captain of the halberdiers remembered his commission with respect to the prophet. There he liberated him from the chains, which he had borne "among all that were carried away captive" (xl. 1) and committed him the second time to Gedaliah (xl. 6). With regard to the second point it should first of all be remarked that "day," xxxviii. 28, must not necessarily be understood in the most restricted sense. This word, as is well known, frequently designates the period of an historical event in general, without any thought of a day of twenty-four hours. Comp. vii. 25; xi. 7; Jud. xviii. 30, etc. If now we consider that the princes who, according to xxxix. 3, sat down in the middle gate, thus took possession of Jerusalem in the name of the Chaldean king, but could not undertake further measures with respect to the fate of the city till they had heard from him, it cannot truly be surprising that for four weeks, till the arrival of Nebuzar-adan (lii. 12) things remained essentially as before, and that thus Jeremiah could not be removed from the court of the guard. The absence of the vers. 11-13 in the LXX. (which moreover omits the whole section 4-13, while it has vers. 1, 2) is of no significance, the reasons for it being apparent. The translator wished by the omission of vers. 11, 12 to avoid an apparent contradiction, by the omission of ver. 13 a repetition. As to the fourth argument it falls to pieces of itself, in so far that ver. 13 seems necessary in any case, whether we regard vers. 11, 12 as genuine or not. The names of the princes might indeed be named together after יְשַׁלְּחֵהֶם. But we see that the author's thoughts (after vers. 11, 12) were so much occupied with Nebuzar-adan that he names him first and as the chief personage (hence יְשַׁלְּחֵהוּ ver. 13), adding the rest only by way of supplement. When now after the long series of names and titles he repeated the principal verb once more, and in the plural, this is evidently done purely in the interest of perspicuity. We cannot then regard the arguments against the genuineness of vers. 11-13 as valid. On the other hand the following positively favor the genuineness: 1. In point of idiom there is nothing which is foreign to the prophet's usage. It is worth notice that in ver. 11 the name of the Chaldean king is Nebuchadrezzar (as Jeremiah is always accustomed to write it) while in ver. 5 we read Nebuchadnezzar. The expression נְבֻזַרְאֲדָן is one current in Jeremiah. It is found thirty-eight times, more frequently than in any of the other prophets. The expression נְבֻזַרְאֲדָן is found besides here and xl. 4 only in Gen. xlv. 21. The phrase "do him no harm" (on the Dog. f. in נֹכַח comp. OLSN. § 83, f) is not indeed specifically Jeremian, but by no means as GRAF asserts, an unnecessary explanatory addition. Could it have been unnecessary to enjoin on Nebuzar-adan that no harm should be done to Jeremiah? Was this beyond the reach of possibility? The actual fate of the prophet gives the answer to this question. Or could the נֹכַח be omitted? Then we should have an ambiguous expression. For, strictly taken, the sentence without נֹכַח would make it Nebuzar-adan's duty to behave indifferently towards Jeremiah. 2. It is in favor of the authenticity that the passage (vers. 11-13) is shown to be neither a foreign property, borrowed from elsewhere (like vers. 1, 2; 4-10), nor an interruption of the connection, but on the contrary as necessary to furnish a perfectly clear picture of the occurrences. That the passage is not borrowed is acknowledged by all. That the course of Nebuzar-adan, as it is related in xl. 1-6 presupposes a commission of Nebuchadnezzar is involved in the nature of the case. For how could Nebuzar-adan dare to distinguish a single person with such favors if he had not been sure of the approval of his master? And is it then improbable that this approval was assured to him by a positive commission? Must an interpolator have invented this commission when Nebuchadnezzar may have heard a thousand times from the mouth of deserters that there was a prophet in Jerusalem who incessantly and with constant danger to his life had designated Nebuchadnezzar as an instrument in the hand of the Lord and submission to him as the only way of escape? And if Nebuchadnezzar had heard this, is there any reason for regarding the commission as the idle, unhistorical conjecture of a later editor? I believe that the narrative in vers. 11-14, in most intimate connection with ver. 3, presents us with the events in a perfectly natural manner, both as to form and contents. It is not at all necessary to take נֹכַח, ver. 11, as pluperfect. For this command was actually given after the event related in ver. 3, which we have regarded above as the act of solemn taking possession. After Nebuchadnezzar had received the news of the capture of Jerusalem he sent Nebuzar-adan with his further orders. Among these was one respecting the person of the prophet. This alone is here mentioned, as the subject of the verses xxxix. 3, 11-14, is simply the personal experiences of Jeremiah. In the execution of this commission, the princes, at whose head no longer stood Nergal-sharezzer but Nebuzar-adan, had the prophet taken out of the court of the guard. This could not be done before, because till the arrival of Nebuchadnezzar all had to remain in general the same as it had been at the capture of the city. Jeremiah was now given in charge to Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam. This Ahikam, of a noble family (comp. 2 Ki. xxii. 12, 14), had already favored the prophet (xxvi. 24). Gedaliah evidently belonged to that small party, who having taken Jeremiah's prophecies as the rule of their political course, had gone over to the Chaldeans (xxxviii. 19). Gedaliah was to bring the prophet from the court of the guard אֶל-הַגָּדֹלֹת. By this some have understood the temple (HITZIG), others the king's house (GRAF, et al.). But according to lii. 13 (2 Ki. xxv. 9), both these were burned down by Nebuzar-adan, together with the other houses of Jerusalem, directly on his arrival. And assuredly those large public buildings were not the last to which the Chaldeans applied the destroying hand. It is credible that some private dwellings might be preserved to the last, to afford shelter to some privileged persons. "Into the house" may thus designate the genus, private dwelling in general, in contrast to "quarters at the public expense," such as the court afforded, it thus remaining undecided whether the private dwelling in which Jeremiah was taken were Gedaliah's own house, or some other. In this private dwelling Jeremiah was not placed under confinement. He could freely go in and out. And so he had intercourse with the people, doubtless warning and comforting them with his prophetic words, and was thus in the vast confusion of the destruction, plundering and deportation, treated by the soldiers who had charge of the details like the mass of the populace, i. e., bound in chains, and placed in the trains of captives. Nebuchadnezzar's order thus remained unobeyed, without any fault of Nebuzar-adan and Gedaliah, till they reached the station of Ramah.

2. Appendix to xxxix. 1-14.—The Promise made to the Cushite Ebed-melech.

XXXIX. 15-18.

15 Now the word of the LORD came unto Jeremiah, while he was shut up in the court of the prison [guard], saying, Go and speak to Ebed-melech the Ethiopian, saying, Thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth], the God of Israel; Behold, I will bring¹ my words upon this city for evil, and not for good; and they shall be² accomplished in that day before thee. But I will deliver thee in that day, saith the LORD [Jehovah]: and thou shalt not be given into the hand of the men of whom thou art afraid. For I will surely deliver thee, and thou shalt not fall by the sword, but thy life shall be for a prey unto thee: because thou hast put thy trust in me, saith the LORD [Jehovah].

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Cushite Ebed-melech, to whom the words of our Lord may be applied (Luke xix. 40), "if these should hold their peace, the stones would cry out," is here honored by a special consolatory promise. In the nature of the case this falls into the period after the occurrence related in xxxvii. 7-13. The expression shut up, etc., is found besides only in xxxiii. 1 (comp. xxxii. 2). As we know from other grounds that chh. xxxii. and xxxiii. pertain to the last stage of the confinement in the court of the guard (xxxviii. 23, comp. on xxxvii. 17), we may place our brief passage in the same period as that great consolatory discourse. This portion might, therefore, be attached to those chapters. It is, however, evident that the contents are too trifling in comparison with the importance of that great theoretic book of consolation, and that the historical connection seems better preserved in this place. After the prophet had related his own experiences till the capture of the city, he appends this brief prophecy uttered shortly before that epoch. In connection with ch. xiv. it would have been neither historically nor topically in the right place.

Vers. 15-18. Now the word . . . saith Jehovah. Two thoughts lie at the foundation of ver. 16: 1. The fulfilment of my threatenings against Jerusalem shall take place before thine eyes. Ebed-melech is to see what he before believed. This is, as it were, the imminent reward of faith, its crown and corroboration. 2. Notwithstanding that all Jerusalem with all the people therein perishes the person of Ebed-melech shall remain unimpaired. This is the second physical and palpable reward of faith.—As the import of God's word cannot be conceived of as indifferent, admitting of fulfilment either in a good or a bad sense, "for evil" must be regarded as dependent on "words." Comp. xxi. 10.—In that day, ver. 16, refers necessarily to the point of time in "I will bring," and expresses that the moment of fulfilment will be at the same time the moment of visible perception. There may be a fulfilment which takes place invisibly. Compare what is said under xxv. 11 of the invisible reality of the beginning of the exile. In the same day Ebed-melech is to experience the power and grace of God in the deliverance of his own person. For he is not to be given into the hand of the men of whom he is afraid (ver. 17). It might be asked whether the Chaldeans are meant, or the Jews who were hostile to him on Jeremiah's account. The expressions used in the following verse thou shalt not fall by the sword, and especially the contrast to the general destruction, involved in thou shalt have thy life for a prey (comp. xxi. 9; xxxviii. 2; xlv. 5), favor the former. Ebed-melech believed and trusted in the Lord. He held the word of the Lord, which Jeremiah proclaimed, to be true, he dared to oppose Jeremiah's enemies; he consequently did not set his hope on the means of escape, on which these foolishly trusted, but on the Lord. In the words put thy trust, then, there is a double point of applause and of confidence.

And the captain of the guard took³ Jeremiah, and said unto him, The LORD [Jehovah] thy God hath pronounced this evil upon this place. Now the LORD [Jehovah] hath brought it,⁴ and done according as he hath said: because ye have [had] sinned against the LORD [Jehovah], and have not obeyed his voice, therefore this thing is come upon you.
- 4 And now, behold, I loose thee this day from the chains which were upon thine hand.⁵ If it seem good unto thee to come with me into Babylon, come; and I will look well unto thee: but if it seem ill unto thee to come with me into Babylon, forbear: behold, all the land is before thee: whither it seemeth good and convenient
- 5 [right] for thee to go, thither go. Now while he was not yet gone back [answered],⁶ he said, Go back also to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, whom the king of Babylon hath made governor over the cities of Judah, and dwell with him among the people: or go wheresoever it seemeth convenient unto thee to go. So the captain of the guard gave him victuals and a reward [present], and let him
- 6 go. Then went Jeremiah unto Gedaliah the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; and dwelt with him among the people that were left in the land.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In the unavoidable confusion Jeremiah, contrary to the command of the king (xxxix. 11-14), is included among the captives, and bound with chains. This error is first remarked in Ramah. The captain of the halberdiers has him immediately liberated, and gives him the choice to go with them to Babylon or remain in the country. As Jeremiah, as it appears, hesitated in answering, the captain of halberdiers, guessing the wish of the prophet, decides himself that he is to remain. Provided with a supply of food and presents, Jeremiah hereupon betakes himself to Gedaliah, who was appointed by Nebuchadnezzar governor over the country, in Mizpah.

Ver. 1. The word . . . unto Babylon. The superscription is of the larger kind. It extends over the four chh. xl.-xl.iii., for a similar one recurs only in xlv. 1. Since the formula, "the word that came," etc., appears constantly as the superscription to the longer sections (comp. vii. 1; xi. 1 [xiv. 1]; xviii. 1; xxi. 1, etc.), it has gradually assumed a double character. It is primarily, according to the meaning of the words, the announcement of a word of God spoken to the prophet. Since, however, these words represent at the same time the main sections of the prophetic book, historical narrative being annexed only as introductory or supplementary commentary, the formula has gradually become the superscription of a main section, even where historical narrative predominates. This is certainly nowhere to so great an extent the case as here. In a less degree it is found also in xxi. 1-3 (comp. "And Jeremiah said," ver. 3). The formula is certainly never found as a superscription of a purely historical section. Nor are chh. xl.-xl.iii. such. For in xlii. 7-22 we have an account of a revelation made to the prophet, to which all the previous and subsequent context is related as historical background. In xliii. 8-13 is a second oracle, from which it again follows, that we are to regard the formula in this verse as a comprehensive title of a section, which may refer not only to other matter besides a revelation, but also to more than one revelation. Moreover the superscription here is related also to i. 3. For there the narrative of the events till the deportation in the fifth month of the eleventh year of Zedekiah is announced. Our section, being written at a later date, records the events immediately after this date, and till the arrival in Egypt.—When he had taken him. This is to explain why a liberation of Jeremiah can be spoken of, after what is narrated in xxxix. 11-14. Nebuzar-adan had to liberate the prophet in Ramah, because he had taken him captive (by a misunderstanding. Comp. rems. on xxxix. 11-13), and bound him with chains.—Being bound, etc., more particularly describes in what condition Jeremiah was in consequence of being taken, and when he was liberated by Nebuzar-adan.—Among all, etc. This addition also is evidently to contribute to the explanation of Jeremiah's being bound. Jeremiah standing alone would not have suffered this indignity. It was only in consequence of his remaining "among the people" (xxxix. 14), and was contrary to the purpose of the general. It has been already remarked above that Ramah, being the first station after Jerusalem, served as the place of assembly and final arrangement of the caravan, (in reference to its position. Comp. rems. on xxxi. 15).

Vers. 2-4. And the captain . . . thither go. What Nebuzar-adan here says to Jeremiah presupposes that he was well acquainted with the purport of his prophecies, and that he acknowledged their fulfilment as a manifestation of the power of the God in whose name they had been pronounced. It could not be difficult for a heathen to admit that the national deity of the Jews, enraged because this people preferred other deities to Him, had given them up to their enemies. Nebuzar-adan may also have spoken Hebrew, though the mode of expression betrays that Jeremiah gives only the sense, not the precise words of his speech. Vers. 5, 6. Now while . . . in the land.

The words יְעֹרְנֵי לֹא יִשְׁבּוּ mock at every attempt to explain them according to the grammar and lexicon. For 1. It is contrary to rule to take יְעֹרְנֵי as simply equivalent to יָעַר, since it is a complete sentence (and he is still), and either requires no predicate or it can have one only in the form of a participle or adjective. It must be יְעֹרְנֵי, or יָעַר הוּא לֹא יִשְׁבּוּ, or יָעַר לֹא יִשְׁבּוּ, or יָעַר, or יָעַרְנָה, or something like this. 2.

The connection with the following יָעַר by the mere י is likewise abnormal. We should expect, since in sense יָעַרְנָה cannot simply continue the speech interrupted by a parenthesis—as a contradiction would thus be produced—some connective formula like יָעַרְנָה. 3. The meaning of יָעַר is enigmatical. For whomsoever we take as the subject, Jeremiah or the king of Judah or Gedaliah, or (with SEN. SCHEIN) the inhabitants of the place of residence selected by Jeremiah, or an indefinite "they," no satisfactory meaning is obtained. The ancient translators therefore rendered with arbitrary freedom, LXX. ὁ δὲ μὴ ἀποστρέψας ἀνάστροψον πρὸς τὸν Godoliam. Vulg.: et necum noli venire, sed habita apud Godoliam. Syr.: dxil etiam ad eum: si maneat, comorare in medio populi apud Geduliam. Chald.: et si tu non vis reverti, revertere ad Geduliam. I consider the text corrupt. Since in ver. 4 Nebuzar-adan leaves it to Jeremiah to go wherever he wishes, but ver. 4 says distinctly that he must return to Gedaliah, there must have stood between the two a sentence reporting the preference, which Jeremiah somehow intimated, to remain in the country. How this sentence read is no longer to be ascertained. Since from Jeremiah's not returning it could not be concluded that he wished to return, while from his not answering this conclusion might easily be drawn, since more honor would be done to the Chaldeans if Jeremiah preferred a residence in their country to one in his desolated home, I am of opinion, that originally some form of יָעַר stood here, involving the idea of answering.—Nebuzar-adan now dismisses the prophet with a supply of food (יָעַרְנָה, comp. lii. 34; Prov. xv. 17) and presents (כִּשְׂאֵת, literally load, what is carried away, i. e. presents. Comp. Esth. ii. 18; Am. v. 11). Jeremiah, following the advice given him, betakes himself to Gedaliah in Mizpah, doubtless that city among the five of this name which was situated in Benjamin, and is named together with Gibeon and Ramah in Josh. xviii. 25, 26; comp. 1 Sam. vii. 16; x. 17; 1 Ki. xv. 22; 1 Macc. iii. 46; RAUMER, Paläst., S. 213. XL. 7-16.

7 Now when all the captains of the forces¹ which were in the fields, even they and their men, heard that the king of Babylon had made Gedaliah the son of Ahikam governor in the land, and had committed unto² him men, and women, and children, and of the poor³ of the land, of them that were not carried away captive to Babylon; then they came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, even⁴ Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and Johanan and Jonathan⁵ the sons of Kareah, and Seraiah the son of Tanhumeth, and the sons of Ephai the Netophathite, and Jezaniah the son of a [the] Maachathite, they and their men. And Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan sware unto them and to their men, saying, Fear not to serve the Chaldeans: dwell
10 in the land, and serve the king of Babylon, and it shall be well with you. As for me, behold, I will dwell at Mizpah, to serve the Chaldeans,⁶ which will come unto us: but ye, gather ye wine, and summer fruits, and oil, and put them in your 11 vessels, and dwell in your cities that ye have taken. Likewise when all the Jews that were in Moab, and among the Ammonites, and in Edom, and that were in all countries, heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant⁷ of Judah, and that 12 he had set over them Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan; Even all the Jews returned out of all the places whither they were driven, and came to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah, unto Mizpah, and gathered wine and summer fruits 13 very much. Moreover Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the 14 forces that were in the fields, came to Gedaliah to Mizpah, and said unto him, Dost thou certainly know that Baalis the king of the Ammonites hath sent Ishmael the son of Nethaniah to slay thee?⁸ But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam be-
15 lieved them not. Then Johanan the son of Kareah spake to Gedaliah in Mizpah secretly, saying, Let me go, I pray thee, and I will slay Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and no man shall know it; wherefore should he slay thee, that all the Jews which are gathered unto thee should be scattered and the remnant in Judah 16 perish? But Gedaliah the son of Ahikam said unto Johanan the son of Kareah, Thou shalt not do this thing:⁹ for thou speakest falsely of Ishmael.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 7.—הִפְקִיד אֹתָם. This Hiphil denotes not only inspicierem, but also inspicendum facere: xli. 10; xxxvi. 20; xxxvii. 21; Ps. xxxi. 6; Isa. x. 23; 2 Chron. xii. 10, in which case he to whom the inspectio is committed is designated in various ways by ל, by אֵת, by בְּיָד or עַל יָד.

⁴ Ver. 8.—The Vau is explicative—and indeed. Comp. NAEGELSEN. Gr. § 111, 1.

⁵ Ver. 8.—2 Ki. xxv. 23 has only "Johanan son of Kareah." The words "and the sons of Ephai" are also omitted, so that "the Netophathite" is referred to Tanhumeth. Instead of יְהוֹנָתָן finally we read there יְהוֹנָתָן. From these alterations it follows that the present text is the original. For the similarity of the names Johanan and Jonathan, which appears more in writing than in speaking, as well as the obscurity of the name עִפְיָ (which according to the Chetivim is to be spoken עֹפְיָ, according to the Keri עִפְיָ. Comp. עֵינֵיהָ. Gen. xxv. 4; Isa. lx. 6; 1 Chron. ii. 46, 47) well explains the omission of these words, while their insertion in the text appears in the highest degree improbable.

⁶ Ver. 10.—"Literally, to stand at the face of the Chaldeans: to be their representative, and to do their will, and also to mediate with them in your behalf (Hitzig):" WOODSWORTH.—E. R. A.]

⁷ Ver. 11.—נֶחֱמָתָיִם. Comp. xlv. 7; Gen. xlv. 7; 2 Sam. xiv. 7.

⁸ Ver. 11.—לְהַפְתֵּךְ נֶפֶשׁ. Comp. Gen. xxxvii. 21; Dent. xix. 6, 11; xxvii. 25; NARBELSB. Gr., § 70, f.

⁹ Ver. 16.—לֹא-רָצִיתִי. The Keri would read רָצִיתִי (comp. on this form OLSU., § 240, a Ann.), unnecessarily. Comp. xxxix. 12; Gen. xxii. 12; Job xiii. 20.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The leaders of the scattered bands roving through the country, who had managed to escape the Chaldean forces, assembled to Gedaliah in Mizpah on the news that he had been set by Nebuchadnezzar over the country (vers. 7, 8). Gedaliah, after promising them on oath on his part protection and support, urges them to collect whatever the land contains of the necessaries of life and willingly to serve the Chaldeans (vers. 9, 10). The dispersed Jews from the neighboring countries also gathered about Gedaliah (vers. 11, 12). It however came to be rumored that one of those band-leaders, Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, of the royal stock, had been incited by Baalis, king of the Ammonites, to murder Gedaliah. The rest of the band-leaders, therefore, warned Gedaliah of Ishmael, but Gedaliah believed them not (vers. 13, 14). One of the leaders, Johanan the son of Kareah, even offered to murder Ishmael secretly. Gedaliah, however, would not permit it, declaring the suspicion prevailing against Ishmael to be based on a lie (vers. 15, 16).

Vers. 7, 8. Now when all . . . their men. These two verses are also found in 2 Ki. xxv. 23 in an abridged form.—This Ishmael was, according to xli. 1, of royal lineage, which partly explains his enmity to Gedaliah. The other persons named are otherwise altogether unknown.—Who the sons of the Netophathite were (the place belonged to Bethlehem, comp. 1 Chron. ii. 54; ix. 16; Neh. vii. 26; Ezr. ii. 22) is as little known as what the proper name of the Maclathite was (Maclath a province of Syria on the north-eastern borders of Palestine, Dent. iii. 14; Josh. xii. 5 coll. 2 Sam. x. 6, 8; RAUMER, Polist., 8. 226, 7). Comp. rems. on xlii. 1.

Vers. 9-12. And Gedaliah . . . fruits very much. Ver. 9 is also found in 2 Ki. xxv. 24, reproduced with the noteworthy alteration, "to be the servants of the Chaldeans" instead of "to serve the Chaldeans." The former expression however (we should expect at least "servants of the king of the Chaldeans") corresponds neither to the usage of the prophets, nor the connection of the passage. Remarkably also the LXX. translate here: μή φοβηθήτε ἀπο προσώπων τῶν παιδῶν τῶν Χαλδαίων, while in 2 Ki. xxv. 24 they have μή φοβησθε παρθένων τῶν Χαλδαίων.—What Gedaliah has sworn to them is, according to ver. 10 a, that he would stand in Mizpah before the Chaldeans, who would come to them. He means by this that he would be the medium of intercourse with the Chaldean ambassadors, officers, soldiers, etc., and would represent the interest of the country with them (comp. xv. 1). The Jews on their part are to care for their sustenance by collecting the fruits still to be found in the country (it was now autumn, comp. lii. 12; xli. 1). In the desolated and plundered land this was naturally a matter of the highest importance. The collected supplies they were to preserve in the cities which, according to their own choice, they had taken into their possession. On the news that Nebuchadnezzar had left of the Jewish people, as it were a remnant of root in their land, and over this feeble remnant had appointed Gedaliah overseer, the dispersed Jews also returned from the neighboring lands, in order to gather around Gedaliah in Mizpah, who must thus have been a persona grata.

Vers. 13-16. Moreover Johanan . . . of Ishmael. Whether Baalis, king of the Ammonites, had any special hatred towards the person of Gedaliah, or whether he wished to destroy the Jews' last point of cohesion and crystallization, is uncertain. His making use of Ishmael may have been due to the personal jealousy of this man, who as a prince royal (xli. 1) regarded Gedaliah's post of honor as properly belonging to him. The plan became known. The captains came to Mizpah (in the fields is not a thoughtless repetition from ver. 7, but indicates that the bands were still essentially the same, namely, free corps roving through the country) to warn Gedaliah. He, however, did not believe them. And when Johanan alone in secret conference offered to kill Ishmael, he directly forbade him, declaring the accusation to be a lie.

5. The murder of Gedaliah and its consequences.

CHAP. XLI.

- 1 Now it came to pass in the seventh month, that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah the son of Elishama, of the seed royal, and the princes of the king, even ten men with him, came unto Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam to Mizpah; and there they did
- 2 eat bread together in Mizpah. Then arose Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, and the ten men that were with him, and smote Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan with the sword, and slew him, whom the king of Babylon had made
- 3 governor over the land. Ishmael also slew all the Jews that were with him, even with Gedaliah, at Mizpah, and the Chaldeans that were found there, the men of war.

- 4 And it came to pass the second day after he had slain Gedaliah, and no man
 5 knew it, that there came certain [men] from Shechem, from Shiloh, and from Samaria, even fourscore [eighty] men, having their beards shaven and their clothes rent, and having cut themselves [their bodies], with offerings and incense in their 6 hand, to bring them to the house of the LORD [Jehovah]. And Ishmael the son of Nethaniah went forth from Mizpah to meet them, weeping all along as he went:
 And it came to pass, as he met them, he said unto them, Come to Gedaliah the son 7 of Ahikam. And it was so, when they came into the midst of the city, that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah slew them and cast them into the midst of the pit 8 [slew them into the cistern],¹ he, and the men that were with him. But ten men were found among them that said unto Ishmael. Slay us not: for we have treasures in the field, of wheat, and of barley, and of oil, and of honey. So he forbore, and 9 slew them not among their brethren. Now the pit [cistern] wherein Ishmael had cast all the dead bodies of the men, whom he had slain because [by the hand] of² Gedaliah, was it [that] which Asa the king had made for fear³ of Baasha king of Israel: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah filled it with them that were [the] slain.
 10 Then Ishmael carried away captive all the residue of the people that were in Mizpah, even the king's daughters, and all the people that remained in Mizpah, whom Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard [halberdiers] had committed to Gedaliah the son of Ahikam: and Ishmael the son of Nethaniah carried them away captive, and departed to go over to the Ammonites.
 11 But when Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, heard of all the evil that Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had done, 12 then they took all the men, and went to fight with Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, 13 and found him by the waters that are in Gibeon. Now it came to pass, that when all the people which were with Ishmael saw Johanan the son of Kareah, and all 14 the captains of the forces that were with him, then they were glad. So all the people that Ishmael had carried away captive from Mizpah cast about and returned, 15 and went unto Johanan the son of Kareah. But Ishmael the son of Nethaniah escaped from Johanan with eight men, and went to the Ammonites.
 16 Then took Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces that were with him, all the remnant of the people whom he had recovered from Ishmael the son of Nethaniah, from Mizpah, after that he had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, even mighty men of war,⁴ and the women, and the children, and the 17 eunuchs, whom he had brought again from Gibeon: and they departed, and dwelt in the habitation of Chimham,⁵ which is by Beth-lehem, to go to enter into Egypt, 18 because of the Chaldeans: for they were afraid of them, because Ishmael the son of Nethaniah had slain Gedaliah the son of Ahikam, whom the king of Babylon made governor in the land.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 7.—Pregnant construction. Comp. NABOULSB. Gr., § 112, 7; 2 Ki. x. 14; 1 Mac. vii. 19.

² Ver. 9.—גִּבְעוֹן. J. D. MICHAËLIS conjectures פֶּרֶץ (comp. vi. 7 Keri), which reading is said to be found in one Codex of De Rossi (comp. ROSENMUELLER ad l.). The LXX. translate φρέαρ μέγα τοῦτο ἔστιν, as if they had read פֶּרֶץ הַגְּדוֹל הַזֶּה, which reading is adopted by DAHLER, MOYERS, HITZIG, GRAF. It would afford a good meaning. But the reading is not to be altered unnecessarily.

³ Ver. 9.—כִּפְנֵי, before, properly "on account of," but used here in the sense of "against." Comp. Jud. ix. 21; 1 Chron. xii. 1.

⁵ Ver. 17.—גִּבְעוֹת פְּחִיזָם (Keri). The Chetivim seems to require the pronunciation גִּבְעוֹת פְּחִיזָם. The meaning of the word is not apparent. The old translators all express, though with great want of clearness and agreement among themselves, a proper name. Only JOSEPHUS (Antiq. X., 9, § 5) says: εἰς τινὰ τόπον μάδραν λεγόμενον. He evidently read גִּבְעוֹת (wall, protection, hurdle. Comp. Zeph. ii. 6).—גִּבְעוֹת is ἄρ. λεγ., but from its etymology must mean hospitium, diversorium.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The suspicion against Ishmael was only too well-founded. He really murders Gedaliah and his retinue, consisting of Jews and Chaldeans (vers. 1-3) also seventy Israelites who were bringing offerings to the destroyed sanctuary (vers. 4-9). The rest of the people he leads away captive from Mizpah, but is overtaken by Johanan and the other band-leaders. The captives immediately leave him, and he escapes with eight men to the Ammonites (vers. 10-15). Thereupon the leaders assemble the whole people in the neighborhood of Bethlehem, to prepare for removal to Egypt, for in consequence of the murder of Gedaliah they think that they will be liable to the extreme vengeance of the Chaldeans if they remain longer in the country.

Vers. 1-3. Now it came to pass . . . men of war. There is a brief extract from these verses in 2 Ki. xxv. 25. The event took place in the seventh month, therefore three months after the capture of the city (xxxix. 2), and two after the destruction and deportation by Nebuzar-adan (lii. 12; 2 Ki. xxv. 8). Ishmael was of the royal, therefore David's seed. Neither he nor his father Nathaniah (1 Chron. xxvi. 2, 12; 2 Chron. xvii. 8, Levites are thus named) are mentioned elsewhere. Nathaniah is called the son of Elishama. Whether this person is identical with the "scribe" mentioned in xxxvi. 12, 20, 21, or the Elishama named in 2 Sam. v. 16; 1 Chron. iii. 6 (8); xiv. 7 as a son of David is meant, is not apparent. Both cases are possible. In the latter Elishama would be the ancestor of the family, "son" being used according to a well known idiom, in the wider sense. Ishmael would then belong to a collateral branch of the royal family.—Princes of the king. It is clear that the king of Judah is meant. Not so clear the grammatical connection. It may be referred to "royal seed." Hirtzig in opposition to this correctly remarks that the "princes" did not form an hereditary caste. It is therefore, according to some, governed by "of." Is it not however a matter of course that Ishmael as a prince belonged to the מַלְכֵי, especially as this word by no means designates a definite category of greatness? Further, is it probable that Ishmael with ten men could overpower the entire Jewish retinue of Gedaliah, together with the Chaldean soldiers (ver. 3), eighty men (ver. 7), who if not provided with arms were with legs, and then lead away captive against their will the whole population of Mizpah (ver. 14)? We are thus recommended to take מַלְכֵי as a nominative = and great men of the king. It would then be declared that Ishmael and other Jewish nobles (doubtless each with his own retinue), and ten men who formed the personal retinue of the former, accomplished the deed. The passage lii. 10 would not contradict this. For since even the Chaldeans could not kill any one whom they did not have, that passage states only that the Chaldeans took the life of all the princes who fell into their power. Now besides here מַלְכֵי never occurs in Jeremiah of the great men of the Hebrews, but only of the Chaldean grandees in general (xxxix. 13), and of the principal court-officers in particular. Comp. Rab-Mag., etc., xxxix. 3, 13, etc.—It is then natural to suppose that the words "and the princes of the king" are a gloss, occasioned by the difficulty of crediting such deeds to a little band of eleven men.

Slew him. These words expressly set forth that though several smote Gedaliah with their swords, Ishmael was the real murderer, upon whom rested the immense responsibility of having killed the Chaldean king's chief officer in the country. I therefore do not think that, as Hir-zig and Graf propose, we must read "smote" also in the singular (מִצַּח). That by "all the Jews that were with Gedaliah at Mizpah" we are not to understand the whole population of the city, is apparent from ver. 10. It is rather the armed men, who were at the disposal of Gedaliah as governor, who are intended and who, whether permanently or temporarily, were strengthened by Chaldean soldiers.

Vers. 4-9. And it came to pass . . . with the slain. Ishmael knew how to guard against the murder of Gedaliah being known immediately outside the city. He evidently intended to use Mizpah as a trap. So it happened that on the second day the approach of a troop of men was announced, who from a distance presented the appearance of a peaceful caravan, and from the burdens they bore one promising booty. They came from Shechem, Shiloh and Samaria. The LXX. read Σαίχη, and Hirtzig, as well as Graf, is disposed to give this reading the preference, since thus a more correct order (according to geographical position we should have Shiloh, Shechem, Samaria) and vicinage of the cities is obtained. Salem would then be the place mentioned in Gen. xxxiii. 18, 19 as near Shechem (comp. Hirtzig, R.-Enc., XLII. S. 326). But the authority of the LXX. is, as is well known, unreliable. Shiloh also lies so near the road that travellers proceeding from it might meet with those coming from Samaria and Shechem. As to the order, as this in itself was a matter of indifference, a more external circumstance may well have suggested it: the word of one syllable is placed first, then that of two syllables, and of these again that of five consonants after that of three.

From 2 Chron. xxxiv. 9 it is apparent, that at the time of Josiah there was still in the cities of the ten tribes a "remnant of Israel," which contributed to the house of the Lord in Jerusalem, which appears as a resumption and continuance of the co-operation, which even in the reign of Hezekiah the pious Israelites had afforded in establishing the worship of Jehovah in Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxx. and xxxi.) These men came as mourners over the destruction of the sanctuary (comp. on xvi. 6; xlvii. 5; xlvi. 37) with gifts of meat and incense offerings, as the beasts necessary for burnt offerings could not well be brought from so great a distance. Doubtless the feast of Tabernacles, occurring in the Seventh month (Lev. xxiii. 34; Numb. xxix. 12; Deut. xvi. 13) was the occasion of their coming. Although they could not hope to find altar and priests in the holy place, they would still deposit their gifts there in order at least to manifest their devotion. Guotius calls attention here to the expression of Papinian (Instit. de rerum divisione, § Sacra): "Locus, in quo vobis sacra sunt edificata etiam diruto edificio sacer adhuc manet."

What was the motive of Ishmael's act? It is supposed by some that he feared to be betrayed, and therefore killed those strangers whom he could not drag away with him. But he only needed then not to admit them into Mizpah. Graf sees in the deed an act of revenge which Ishmael took on these Israelites for the murder of his relatives and associates in rank (lii. 10), because these, living with heathens, had for a long time been Assyrian and Chaldean subjects. But these Israelites, coming with all the tokens of deepest sorrow, had shown themselves to be well-disposed towards the Jews, and it is inconceivable how Ishmael could have chosen them for the objects of his vengeance. I think he had simple robbery in view. For after this Ishmael, who was evidently a rough and wild man, had from personal jealousy, to the disadvantage of his people and in the political interest of his Ammonitish protection, assassinated the noble Gedaliah, he must either attempt to maintain himself in the latter's position or flee. When he quickly, before the matter has become known, murders a peaceful caravan of temple pilgrims, and spares only a few of them, who offer him treasures, and at last drags with him as captives the whole turba imbellis from Mizpah into slavery, he shows himself to be simply a robber.

Ver. 6. Weeping all along as he went [lit. : in going and weeping]. LXX. : αὐτοὶ ἐπορεύοντο καὶ ἔκλαιον. They then refer the words to the eighty. HITZIG and GRAF find this reference quite in order. Why should Ishmael weep? We might suppose it to be perfectly clear that Ishmael wept to deceive those people, in order to present the appearance of a person who from internal grief was not thinking of worldly things at all, much less of robbery and murder. HITZIG and GRAF however deny that Ishmael wept at all, because he had no ostensible reason for doing so. HITZIG says he would not weep for the fate of the temple, since he did not in them meet again old friends for the first time since its destruction, he did not go to meet them in ceremony as notorious temple-pilgrims, nor was he himself on the way to Jerusalem. GRAF says if he had wept like the pilgrims over Jerusalem, this would have been unnatural behaviour for one who was sojourning in the vicinity of the city. But are these reasons? It is scarcely credible that they can be intended seriously. If in those days of the most tremendous national calamity a train of Jewish pilgrims, bearing themselves all the signs of grief, meet another Jew weeping, about what will they suppose that he is weeping? Will they not most naturally suppose that he accords with the general mourning of the country? There can be no doubt this was the supposition which Ishmael wished to produce in the pilgrims' minds. There may have been one and another among them who regarded the weeping comar as not a partaker in the general grief, it sufficed for Ishmael that he was generally regarded as such. Murder and robbery are not expected from such a person. Ishmael tried in this way to deceive them. If they had mistrusted him his project must have failed or he must have tried other expedients. HITZIG and GRAF fail to convince us that they would have more readily believed a person who was not mourning, but who invited them to Gedaliah in a tone usual at other times. GRAF also urges that it was not necessary for Ishmael to shed tears the whole way, even though it was a short one, which however is implied in the grammatical construction (comp. on this point NAGELSB. Gr., § 93, b, Ann.) To this it may be replied that Ishmael could not know how sharp-sighted any one of the eighty might be, so that he would rather begin to weep too early than too late, and consequently traversed the greatest part of the distance, perhaps the whole way from the gate, weeping.

Come to Gedaliah. Why Gedaliah invites them he does not say. Many reasons might be imagined: Gedaliah might wish to show them hospitality, or to accompany them, or to impart some injunction or warning in his gubernatorial capacity. At any rate he was a powerful man, whose requisition was not to be ignored. They therefore followed. But in the midst of the city, at any rate in a place where eleven men sufficed to close up both their advance and their retreat, in some narrow lane, Ishmael fell upon them. Ten of them evidently perceived at once why this was done. They saw that it was robbery on which he was intent. They therefore promise him קְרִטְוֹתַי, i. e., promtuarum subterranea (from קָרַף abscondidit), such being used from the earliest times in many countries of Asia and Africa for the concealment and preservation of the fruits of the earth. Comp. ROSENUELLER ad. l., and GESENIUS Thesaurus, s. v. : Winer, R.-W.-B., s. v. Ernte.—By the hand of Gedaliah. The words are difficult. The explanations: by the fault of Gedaliah, on Gedaliah's account, (i. e., as friends of Gedaliah); coram Gedalia, i. e., together with Gedaliah, una cum Gedalia, in potestate Gedalia (i. e., as imperio G. subjectos) are all ungrammatical. The normal significance of the words seems to me to afford an appropriate meaning. Ishmael had made use of Gedaliah's name, to allure them to destruction. He had called to them: Come to Gedaliah (ver. 6), and on the authority of this name they had followed him. Thus we may well say that Ishmael killed them by means of Gedaliah. Of course the person of Gedaliah was not the instrument of execution, but his name was the means by which their wills were determined in the intended direction.—Was that which Asa, etc. We read in 1 Ki. xv. 22 that king Asa, with the material of which Baasha had fortified Ramah built Geba-Benjamin and Mizpah. This pit appears to have been part of these works of fortification, but as to its destination we are not informed. Was it a cistern, a ditch, or a mere pit, which might defend a narrow approach, and in ordinary times was bridged over? HITZIG assumes the latter. But as GRAF remarks, the pit appears according to ver. 7 to have been situated in the interior of the city. It cannot have been a ditch, such never being called בֵּיר. It was then probably a large and deep cistern (Comp. ROSENUELLER on ver. 7), which was built to afford water to the fort, and which accordingly might be reckoned among the means of defence, with which Asa provided the city for fear of Baasha. Whether the pit, which is here spoken of, is identical with the great bore that is in Sechu, 1 Sam. xix. 21, and with the ὄριον μέγα 1 Macc. vii. 19, must be left undecided.

Vers. 10-15. Then Ishmael . . . to the Ammonites. The intimidated, and probably in addition unarmed people, among them the king's daughters (probably in the wider sense of princesses, as "king's son," xxxvi. 26; xxxviii. 6), Ishmael carried away captive, either to use them as slaves or to sell them. Meanwhile however the Jewish band-captains had received intelligence of the events in Mizpah. They hasten thither with their people, and encounter Ishmael by the "great water" near Gibeon. Gibeon is only half a league distant from Mizpah in a north-easterly direction. Till Ishmael had done with the eighty pilgrims and the gathering of the rest of the population prior to their departure, so much time might pass that the captains could hurry up and almost reach him in Mizpah. The "great waters" of Gibeon are a pond. Comp. 2 Sam. ii. 13. Robinson (II. 351, 2) recognizes Gibeon in the village El-Jib. [Comp. Thomson, The Land and the Book, II., p. 516.—S. R. A.] At the east of the village he found a beautiful fountain and the remains of a large water-tank. All Ishmael's prisoners left him at once to attach themselves to Johanan. Ishmael escaped with eight men. It seems then that there was a fight, in which he lost two of his ten men.

Vers. 16-18. Then took Johanan . . . in the land. It cannot be denied that there is some difficulty in the relative sentence from whom he had recovered to son of Ahikam. Especially troublesome is from Mizpah. Also the singular יִשְׁמָאֵל as well as the sentence after he had slain, etc. (we should expect: after they had driven Ishmael off) are striking; so too the relative sentences whom he had recovered from Ishmael and whom he had brought again from Gibeon, as they both state the same fact. Hirtzig supposes that "whom Ishmael carried away captive" should be read after

ver. 14. Certainly the connection thus becomes clear and intelligible. And as the sentence whom he had recovered from Ishmael stands directly between whom Ishmael carried away captive from Mizpah, ver. 14, and whom he had brought again from Gibeon, fin. ver. 16, it is quite conceivable that an exchange may have taken place.—Mighty men of war. It is evident from these words that the great mass of the Jewish people still left were assembled in Mizpah, comp. xl. 7-11 —It is the more strange that Ishmael could take all these captive with ten men. Were they unarmed? Were they surprised? Did Ishmael terrify them with threats, by making a false show of Ammonitish help at hand?—However this may be, Johanan betakes himself with all these to a more southern rendezvous on the road to Egypt. This according to the Keri is called the "habitation (hospice, caravanserai) of Chimham [Kimham]," who according to 2 Sam. xix. 37-40 was the son of the Barzillai who purveyed so well for David and his army on their flight. Why did an inn or caravanserai in the vicinity of Bethlehem bear the name of Chimham? We do not know.—This point was to serve as a meeting-place. There were still single bands or individuals scattered through the country. Preparations had also to be made for the march through the desert. The vengeance of the Chaldeans, in spite of the surely provable innocence of the Jews, appeared however so certain, and the fear of it was so great, that the resolution to flee to Egypt was already fixed, before they asked the prophet's advice. Hence this act was a mere farge.

6. The hypocritical inquiry.

XLII. 1-6.

- 1 Then all the captains of the forces, and¹ Johanan the son of Kareah, and Je-zaniah the son of Hoshaiah, and all the people from the least unto the greatest, came
- 2 near, and said unto Jeremiah the prophet, Let, we beseech thee, our supplication be accepted before thee, and pray for us unto the LORD [Jehovah] thy God, even for all this remnant; (for we are left but a few of many,² as thine eyes do behold us):
- 3 that the LORD [Jehovah] thy God may shew us the way wherein we may walk, and the thing that we may do.
- 4 Then Jeremiah the prophet said unto them, I have heard³ you; behold, I will pray unto the LORD [Jehovah] your God according to your words; and it shall come to pass, that whatever thing the LORD [Jehovah] shall answer you, I will declare it unto you; I will keep nothing back from you. Then they said to Jeremiah, The LORD be a true⁴ and faithful witness between us, if we do not even according to
- 6 all things for the which the LORD thy God shall send⁵ thee to us. Whether it be good, or whether it be evil⁶ we will obey the voice of the LORD our God, to whom we send thee; that it may be well with us, when⁸ we obey the voice of the LORD our God.

⁴ Ver. 5.—The expression עַד יָבֹא is found besides only in Prov. xiv. 25 coll. ver. 5. עַד יָבֹא Ps. lxxxix. 38; Isai. viii. 2.

⁸ Ver. 6.—כִּי־ is here necessarily because, not if. For there is no question about their obeying. They will obey, but expect prosperity from this obedience as such, apart from the immediate result of the step commanded them. Comp. xxiv. 7.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The people request the prophet to inquire of the Lord what is to be done (vers. 1-3); Jeremiah promises to do so (ver. 4). The people therefore solemnly promise punctual obedience to all that the prophet shall disclose to them as the commands of their God (vers. 5, 6).

Vers. 1-3. Then all . . . that we may do. Jezeiah is here called the son of Hoshaiah; in xl. 8 he is called the son of the Maachathite, in xliii. 2 Azariah is named as the son of Hoshaiah. There must then have either been two Jezeahs and two Hoshaiahs, or there is an error in the text. The LXX. has in xlii. 1 and xliii. 2 Ἀζαρίος υἱὸς Ἠσαίου. There is thus the possibility that here Jezeah is written by mistake for Azariah.—These leaders and the whole people with them address to the prophet the humble petition (comp. rems. on xxxvi. 7; xxxvii. 20), that he will address to Jehovah in their behalf, the small remnant of the great nation, a prayer for instruction concerning the path to be taken.

Vers. 4-6. Then Jeremiah . . . our God. When the people express their readiness to submit to the direction of Jehovah, however this may turn out, but afterwards (xliii. 2-7) rebel so decidedly against this direction, their declaration here must be explained either as hypocrisy or on the supposition that the question was not of remaining in the country, but there was doubt only as to the direction of their flight. They appeal to the Lord to appear as a true and faithful witness against them, if they do not submit to the divine indication expected through the prophet. The Lord however is, as is presupposed in every oath, at the same time Witness and Judge.

7. The unwelcome answer.

XLII. 7-22.

7 And it came to pass after ten days, that [or that after ten days] the word of the 8 LORD [Jehovah] came unto Jeremiah. Then called he Johanan the son of Kareah, 9 and all the captains of the forces [band-leaders] which were with him, and all the 10 people from the least even to the greatest, and said unto them, Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah] the God of Israel, unto whom ye sent me to present your supplica-11 tion before him; If ye will still abide¹ in this land, then will I build you, and not pull you down; and I will plant you, and not pluck you up: for I repent me 12 of the evil that I have done unto you. Be not afraid of the king of Babylon, of whom ye are afraid; be not afraid of him, saith the LORD: for I am with you to 13 save you, and to deliver you from his hand. And I will shew mercies unto [prepare pity for]² you, that he may have mercy upon you, and cause you to return³ 14 to your own land. But if ye say, We will not dwell in this land, neither obey the 15 voice of the LORD your God, Saying, No; but we will go into the land of Egypt, where [that]⁴ we shall see no war, nor hear the sound of the trumpet, nor have 16 hunger of [for]⁵ bread; and there will we dwell: and now⁶ therefore hear the word of the LORD, ye remnant of Judah; Thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth] the God of Israel; If ye wholly set your faces to enter into Egypt, 17 and go to sojourn there; then it shall come to pass⁷ that the sword, which ye feared, shall overtake you there in the land of Egypt; and the famine, whereof ye were 18 afraid, shall follow close after you there in Egypt; and there ye shall die. So shall it be with all the men that set their faces to go into Egypt to sojourn there; they shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: and none of them

18 shall remain or escape from the evil that I will bring upon them. For thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth] the God of Israel; As mine anger and my fury hath been poured forth upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem; so shall my fury be poured forth upon you, when ye shall enter into Egypt; and ye shall be an excruciation, and an astonishment [horror] and a curse, and a reproach; and ye shall see this place no more. The LORD hath said concerning you [Jehovah hath spoken to you] O ye remnant of Judah; Go ye not into Egypt: know certainly that I have admonished [warned]⁸ you this day. For ye dissembled in your hearts [deceived yourselves],⁹ when¹⁰ ye sent me unto the Lord your God, saying, Pray for us unto the LORD our God; and according unto all that the LORD our God shall say, so declare unto us and we will do it. And now I have this day declared it to you; but ye have not obeyed the voice of the LORD your God, nor any thing¹¹ for the which he hath sent me unto you. Now therefore know certainly that ye shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence, in the place whither ye desire to go and to sojourn.

- ⁸ Ver. 19.—היעיד, literally to bring in witnesses, then to adduce testimony (according to the directly causative mode of speaking, on which comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 18, 3). - ⁹ Ver. 20.—התעוה is also to be regarded as directly causative = errationem fecit (HESEN.) Comp. Prov. x. 17. It is therefore doubtful whether ב indicates the object or the place. The word is at least not found elsewhere with ב of this person. The prophet might well say, ye have erred in your souls, i. e., in your volition and thought, and have thus taken a false direction, while ye supposed ye were on the right track. The Chaldaic התעוה is evidently a mistake. The Keri is correct התעוהם [NOYES strangely renders, "ye err to your ruin."—S. R. A.]
- ¹⁰ Ver. 20.—כי = when. Comp. Jud. ii. 18; Ps. xxxii. 3; Ezek. iii. 19.
- ¹¹ Ver. 21.—ולכל may mean, and indeed with respect to all, etc. Since, however, only one point is treated of, the emphatic expression of a multiplicity of points is remarkable. I therefore think that the word stands in simple parallelism to the first clause, while שבע is construed only with ב, a construction which (apart from שבע לקור, Gen. iii. 17; Jud. ii. 20; Ps. lviii. 6) is peculiar to the later idiom: N-h. ix. 29; xiii. 27; 2 Chron. x. 16; Dan. i. 11; Lev. xxvi. 21. A double disobedience is thus declared against Jehovah and against the prophet.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After ten days the prophet receives answer from the Lord, which he immediately communicates to the leaders, and to the whole people (vers. 7, 8). If they remain in the country they shall have nothing to fear from the Chaldeans, but the Lord will so direct the heart of the king that he will aid in their restoration (vers. 9-12). If, however, they do not remain in the country, but from fear of the Chaldeans flee to Egypt, they shall perish there by the same calamities, which they thought to escape by flight (vers. 13-18). Finally the prophet urgently admonishes them not to despise this warning, although he knows only too well, that it was pure self-deception when they inquired of the Lord by Him, since they had already resolved not to obey the Lord's command. Well, they shall also know, that they will come to their ruin in the place, whither their desires lead them (vers. 19-22.)

 Vers. 7-12. And it came to pass . . . your own land. The opinion of HITZIG and GRAF, that Jeremiah used the ten days in procuring information and arriving at a clear and firm conviction, is in accordance with modern science but not with history. The prophet really received the answer to his prayer for divine direction (comp. ver. 4; xxxii. 16) not until after ten days. It is significant that he received it on the tenth day (comp. Ezek. iii. 16), although we cannot stop here to investigate the ground of this significance (comp. [on symbolical numbers] HENZO, Real-Enc., XLIII., S. 381). On to present, etc. comp. xxxviii. 25.—On for I repent, etc. comp.

xxvi. 3.—Cause you to return. When we consider, that the prophet has in view not only the return of those who had been already carried away into exile, but may also with perfect correctness regard those as such who have assembled at Bethlehem and prepared to leave their home, turning their back upon it, the alteration [cause to dwell] proposed in the text seems unnecessary. It was not unpatriotic policy, nor intolerance, nor selfishness, nor any view based on human foresight, which caused the prophet to speak thus. For, humanly considered, there was nothing left for the Jews but flight. The hope for further indulgence on the part of the Chaldean king must seem like madness. The prophet, however, does not reckon alone with human factors. He is the organ of God, to whom nothing is impossible (xxxii. 26 sqq.), and who especially has the hearts of kings in His hand, and turns them whithersoever He will (Prov. xxi. 1).

Vers. 13-18. But if ye say . . . this place no more. The words from neither obey, ver. 13, to dwell, ver. 14, are a parenthesis.—Sound of the trumpet. Comp. iv. 19, 21.—Remnant, etc. Comp. xli. 16; xlii. 2, 19; xliii. 5.—Wholly set your faces. Comp. ver. 17; xlv. 12; 2 Kings xii. 18.—By sword, famine and pestilence (comp. xiv. 12; xxi. 9; xxvii. 8, 13; xxix. 18; xxxii. 3 b; xxxviii. 2; xlv. 13), will the disobedient perish in Egypt, and not a single individual will escape (comp. xlv. 14; Lam. ii. 22; Josh. viii. 22). As on Jerusalem, so also on them will the fury of the Lord be poured out (vii. 20; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 21); they shall become an object of cursing, horror and derision (comp. xxiv. 9; xxv. 18; xlv. 22, etc.), and never return to their native land (comp. rems. on vii. 3).

Vers. 19-22. Jehovah hath . . . to sojourn. In a very earnest closing speech the prophet sets forth that the Lord Himself has spoken to the people. Then he reminds them that they have been warned. They cannot then have the excuse of ignorance. In the third place the prophet discovers to them their self-delusion. They perhaps imagined that they honestly desired the right, when they commissioned him to present their petition before God. What, however, is opposed to this honest intention easily appears to them to be incorrect, and therefore justifying them in resistance. The prophet therefore desires to convince them that they did not honestly wish to do the right. It was self-deception, when they declared themselves ready to obey unconditionally the divine command.—In the fourth place, the prophet tells them before they had opened their mouth to reply, what was now passing in their minds, viz., that they had formed the fixed resolution not to obey the faithfully reported direction of Jehovah, in spite of their solemn declaration given in vers. 5, 6.—In the fifth place, finally, he proclaims to them, that the very place, to which an irresistible longing attracts them, will be their destruction. He announces this apodictically, because he knows that they will inevitably do what will bring them to this.

8. The Flight to Egypt.

XLIII. 1-7.

- 1 And it came to pass, that when Jeremiah had made an end¹ of speaking unto all the people all the words of the LORD their God, for which the LORD their God had
- 2 sent him to them, even all these words, Then spake Azariah the son of Hoshaiah, and Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the proud² men, saying³ unto Jeremiah, Thou speakest falsely: the LORD our God hath not sent thee to say, Go not into
- 3 Egypt to sojourn there: but Baruch the son of Neriah setteth thee on [has excited thee]⁴ against us, for to deliver us into the land of the Chaldeans, that they might
- 4 put us to death, and carry us away captives into Babylon. So Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces [band-leaders], and all the people,
- 5 obeyed not the voice of the LORD, to dwell in the land of Judah. But Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the captains of the forces, took all the remnant of Judah, that were returned from all nations, whither they had been driven, to dwell in the
- 6 land of Judah; even men, and women, and children, and the king's daughters, and every person that Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard [halberdiers] had left with Gedaliah the son of Ahikam the son of Shaphan, and Jeremiah the prophet, and Baruch the son of Neriah. So they came into the land of Egypt: for they obeyed not the voice of the LORD: thus came they even to Tahpanhes.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—כָּלִיתָ as in xxxvi. 8.

² Ver. 2.—הַזֵּבִים. The word occurs here only in Jeremiah. The LXX. omits it, and reads instead καὶ πάντες οἱ ἀλλογενεῖς, xliii. 17, reading זָרִים for זֵבִים. The reverse in xviii. 14; li. 2.

³ Ver. 2.—אֲמָרִים. Instead of אָמַר, because the words spoken do not follow immediately. Comp. xiv. 15; xxiii. 17.

⁴ Ver. 3.—מִכִּיתִי. Comp. xxxviii. 22; Isa. xxxvi. 18.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

On the communication, which Jeremiah made in the name of Jehovah to the Jews, these declared, that they regard it, not as a message from their God, but as the result of incitement by Baruch, who is friendly to the Chaldeans (vers. 1-3). Thereupon they, with the whole mass of the remaining population, including Jeremiah and Baruch, commence their journey to Egypt, where, on their arrival, they settle first in Tahpanhes (vers. 4-7).

Vers. 1-3. And it came to pass . . . into Babylon. The phrase all these words indicates that the words written in ch. xlii. are an exact rendering of the prophet's verbal communication. Comp. li. 60.—On Azariah, the son of Hoshaiah. Comp. rems. on xlii. 1.—On what facts this charge against Baruch was supported, it is difficult to perceive. From this book we learn only that Baruch was a faithful adherent and servant of the prophet. It was doubtless merely the circumstance that Baruch, to the envy of many, was the most intimate of all the Jews with Jeremiah, which gave a handle to the accusation.

Vers. 4-7. So Johanan . . . Tabpanhes.—All the remnant of Judah. Those who had returned from the dispersion are mentioned first, probably because among them there were few or none of the "poor of the land" (xl. 7). It seems surprising that in ver. 6 a specification follows which, on account of the mention of the king's daughter, does not correspond to the general statement in ver. 5 b. But the specification concludes with children, and with king's daughters commences the description of the second division of the remnant of Judah. Besides, those who had returned, viz., the king's daughters and all the other souls are mentioned. If we consider that in ver. 5 a, the heads of those who had remained in the country are named as the subjects of the deportation, it is intelligible that besides these the princesses were the most eminent personages in this category (comp. xli. 10).—Every person. Comp. Josh. x. 28. The expression is so general that it comprehends all the other members of the remnant of Judah (comp. xli. 16).—On Tahpanhes comp. rems. on ver. 8.

9. Jeremiah in Tahpanhes.

XLIII. 8-13.

8, 9 Then came the word of the LORD unto Jeremiah in Tahpanhes, saying, Take great stones in thine hand, and hide them in the clay [mortar]¹ in the brick-kiln, which is at the entry of Pharaoh's house in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the men of 10 Judah; and say unto them, Thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth], the God of Israel; Behold, I will send and take Nebuchadrezzar, the king of Babylon, my servant, and will set his throne upon these stones that I have hid; and he shall 11 spread his royal pavilion² over them. And when he cometh,³ he shall [he shall come and] unite the land of Egypt, and deliver such as are for death to death; and such as are for captivity to captivity: and such as are for the sword to the sword.
12 And I will kindle a fire in the houses of the gods of Egypt; and he shall burn them, and carry them away captives: and he shall array himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd putteth on his garment; and he shall go forth from thence 13 in peace. He shall break also the images [statues] of Bethshemesh [the house of the sun], that is in the land of Egypt; and the houses of the gods of the Egyptians shall be burned with fire.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 9.—כִּלְטִי is ἀπ. λεγ. The analogies milât, molto (Syr.), μάλαθα, malla, are vouchers for the meaning of "mortar, cement, clay."

² Ver. 10.—The meaning of שֹׁפָרֹד is doubtful. The word occurs here only. HITZEL, with J. D. MICHALIS, refers to sufra (Arab. for corium orbiculare, quod solo insternitur), which agrees with nal' (Arab. the leathern veil of the judge of life and death). According to the text the throne is to be first placed on the stones, and then the שֹׁפָרֹד stretched above it. Is a veil spread over a throne? And is not נֹתָה the technical term for the spreading of a tent? The meaning "pavilion," seems then most suitable, it being, however, still doubtful whether it be so named a splendore (שֹׁפָר, nituit, שֹׁפָרָה, splendor, pulchritudo), or a cavitate (comp. שׁוֹפָר, tuba, שֹׁפָרָה, Pi. Job xxvi. 13) ["The Keri proposes שֹׁפָרִיר as the proper form, which is, indeed, that in which nouns, with the third radical germinated, most frequently appear. Comp. כְּנִיר, Prov.

³ Ver. 11.—כְּנִיר. Chethibh כְּנִיר. The Keri would unnecessarily strike out the suffix. Comp. rems. on xi. 15; xxvii. 8; xxxi. 2; xli. 3; xlviii. 44.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In Tahpanhes Jeremiah receives the command to hide great stones in the clay of a brick-kiln, opposite the royal palace in the sight of the Jews, and to tell them that the Lord will bring king Nebuchadnezzar to Egypt, and that he will erect his throne and stretch his tent on these stones (vers. 8-10). Then will Nebuchadnezzar visit the land of Egypt with all the terrors of war, burn the idol-temples, subjugate the land completely to his sway, and depart in peace (vers. 11 and 12). It is especially emphasized at the close that Nebuchadnezzar will break in pieces the statues of Beth-shemesh and burn up the idol-temples (ver. 13).

Vers. 8, 9. Then came . . . men of Judah. When we compare the larger superscriptions, xl. 1 and xlv. 1, it is evident that the first introduces the events after the deportation, the second the occurrences in Egypt. Hence it might seem as if this passage were not in place, or as if the superscription, which stands in xlv. 1, belonged in this place, xliii. 8. But it is evident from xlv. 1 that the passage, which begins with this superscription, is to narrate what happened to the Jews already established in Egypt (who dwelt in the land), while the event related here is, as it were, a part of the journey. For Tahpanhes (comp. ii. 16) is the eastern boundary city of Egypt, situated on the Pelusian branch of the Nile. Here Jeremiah, by a symbolical act, was to set before the eyes of the Jews, how impossible it is to escape from the Lord (comp. the prophet Jonah), and that by their removal from Egypt they had only come from bad to worse. Thus clear as is the meaning of the symbolical act in general, the definition of the details is still difficult. The word brick-kiln (כְּנִיר) occurs, besides here, only twice in the Old Testament: 2 Sam. xii. 31, and Nah. iii. 14. In the first passage it is related that David caused them to pass under saws, harrows and axes of iron. It then continues, "and made them pass through the brick-kiln" (the Chethibh has, doubtless incorrectly, כְּנִיר, which is no word). When we recall the frequently occurring phrase "made his son to pass through the fire" (comp. 2 Ki. xvi. 3; xxi. 6, etc.), we cannot doubt that a similar cruel mode of death is spoken of here also. As such also appears the putting into heated brick-ovens (כְּנִיר), brick, from which the denominative verb כְּנִיר, to make bricks, Exod. v. 7, 14). In the second passage, Nah. iii. 14, the Assyrians are ironically called upon to "repair the fortifications, go into the mud and tread the mortar, and repair the brick-kiln." EICHMORX, HIRTZIG and GRAF think it incredible that a brick-kiln can have stood immediately opposite the royal palace. Hence HIRTZIG takes the word in the sense of a projection of tiles or brick-work under the threshold, a stone-floor probably cemented over. Besides the analogies in Arabic, the meanings of כְּנִיר in later Hebrew (area, massa, tabula, quadrata. Comp. BUXTOFF, Lex. Chald., p. 1120) favor this rendering. On the other hand, as GRAF himself correctly remarks, it is equally incredible that Jeremiah could have torn up the pavement before the gate of the king's palace, and inserted large stones. I am now quite of NEUMANN's opinion that we are to regard this brick-kiln not as permanently, but only temporarily, present.

The brick-yard need not have been in the court of the royal palace and directly before the doors of the building. It may have been situated opposite the gate of the outer court or avenue to the palace. The place may have been designated to the prophet on account of this position, and perhaps also because it was the place, from which the material was taken for the extension of the palace now building, as NEUMANN [comp. also HENDERSON] supposes. In this case the thought would be expressed that Egypt, to whose protection the Jews had fled, was only weak, fragile clay. Since the prophet was to hide the stones in the clay, it is evident, that he did not place them visibly on the surface, and therefore set them up on the walls of the brick-kiln. Brick-kiln must be, therefore, understood as pars pro toto. The whole place is called כְּנִיר, not merely the oven. Jeremiah is to hide the large stones in clay belonging to this kiln. He is to lay the foundation for a future ideal building. In place of the weak clay, which signifies Egypt, the Lord lays the foundation stones of a power, which He intends to found, the bearer of which will be His servant (ver. 10), or the organ of His will. It is a fact, still hidden in the womb of the future, that Egypt will groan under the foot of the Babylonian conqueror; but the stones guarantee this fact. Men of Judah were present as witnesses (ver. 9), when they were laid. The significance of the stones is disclosed to these witnesses. The memory remained; the word of the Lord was pledged. On the fulfilment comp. the remarks on xlv. 29, 30.

Vers. 10-13. And say unto them . . . burn with fire. On Behold, I will send, etc., comp. xxv. 9.—The Lord Himself has hidden the stones, and in so far the prophet was only an instrument. On these stones Nebuchadnezzar shall one day erect his throne and stretch his tent.—HIRTZIG thinks that the erection of a tent would not be threatening, or dangerous; on the contrary, it would be only a matter of curiosity. It seems to me, however, that Nebuchadnezzar's tent, erected before the royal palace in Tahpanhes, is dangerous enough, signifying neither more nor less than the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar.—Such as are for death. Comp. rems. on xv. 2. The sense of the expression is, that not only one kind of destruction will come upon Egypt, but many, and that each one will also really devour the victims apportioned to it.—Away captives, viz., the idols. Comp. rems. on xlvi. 7.—And he shall array, etc. Commentators have frequently, and as it seems to me, quite unnecessarily, stumbled over this expression. How does a shepherd put on his garment? In general like any other person, but there is this difference, that in doing so the shepherd has regard to no one, because no one sees him. He therefore puts on his garment entirely at his own whim and convenience. So according to his own pleasure, without the slightest regard to others, will Nebuchadnezzar deal with conquered Egypt. After he has thus made Egypt his own property, he will depart in peace, without any one being able to detain or harass him or rob him of his booty.—Ver. 13 is surprising. The discourse seemed to have concluded with ver. 12. For what is there to report of Nebuchadnezzar's doings in Egypt, when his departure is already announced? Further, the second clause of the verse is tautological. Comp. burn them, ver. 12. Finally the addition that is in the land of Egypt is very surprising, for did Jeremiah, writing in Egypt, need to say this? Hence not merely three words (in the original text), but the whole verse, might be suspected. If, however, these words originated with the rest, then by Beth-shemesh must be meant not the temple of the sun at Heliopolis, but this city itself. The images of Beth-shemesh are above all the obelisks, of which there was an unlimited number in the city. Of the oldest, which however were not the largest (comp. Herod II., 111), one still remains in its place. Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc., X., S. 610 sqq.

[The fulfilment of this prophecy is confirmed by JOSEPHUS (Ant. X., 9, 7). "It is also probable, that during the thirteen years in which some of Nebuchadnezzar's forces were engaged in the blockade of Tyre, he extended his campaign into Egypt; and there is a confirmation of this opinion in the narrative of MEGASTHENES in STRABO, XVI., 687. JOSEPH. Ant. X., 11, 1; c. Apion. I., 20. ABULFEDA, Hist. Ante-islam., p. 102." WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xl. 1-3. "Although the calamity, which has come upon Jerusalem, is great and terrible, God does not allow such evil to befall it that good will not result from it, as the Chaldean captain not obscurely intimates, that he has made a fair beginning in the knowledge of the true God. For he confesses, first, that the God of the prophet is a lord; secondly, that He knows future things; thirdly, that He causes His servants to proclaim these beforehand; fourthly, that God has conducted the war and done everything; fifthly, that He was displeased with the sinful manners of the people (among which idolatry was the worst); sixthly, that He has punished their disobedience to His word." CRAMER.

2. On xl. 4. "The friendliness, shown to the prophet, appears to proceed from men, but it comes from God. For God's works are all made so that they are hidden among the creatures; for as He conceals His wisdom in the creation of heaven and earth, as He hides His kindness in the fruits of the earth, so also He disguises His help in the king of Babylon. For God executes His works now by rational and anon by irrational creatures. As when He fed Elijah by the widow and by the ravens and by the angels (1 Ki. xvii. 3 sqq.; 14 sqq. and xix. 5). For all are His instruments." CRAMER.

3. On xl. 2, 3. "Nebusaradan attestacione sua comprobat et confirmat veritatem ac certitudinem predictionum prophete. Unde haud insecute colligi conjicere potest, quod Satrapa ille Babylonicus praedictus fuerit agnitione veri Dei caque salvatus. Et sic Deus subinde aliquos ex Magnatibus ad sui agnitionem et aeternam salutem traducit (Ps. lxxviii.). Potest istud exemplum ἐλεγκτικῶς obverti absoluto Calvinianorum decreto." FÖRSTER.

4. On xl. 5. "In this, that Jeremiah preferred remaining in the country to going to Babylon, it strikes me further—that a discreet man, who knows the world and his heart and the true interest of God's cause—is as much as possible contented, and does not think to better himself by going further. He is willing to remain at court unknown, and at any rate he would rather be taken away than go away.—The advice, which Solomon gives, is verified, 'Stand not in the place of great men.' We are a generation of the cross, and our symbol is 'an evil name and little understood.'" ZANZENDORF.

5. On xl. 5. In Babylonia honor and a comfortable life invited the prophet, in Judea danger, dishonor and need in the desolated country. In Babylonia a respectable field of labor was opened to him among the great mass of his people, in Judea he had only rabble and condottieri about him. Jeremiah, however, was not a bad patriot, as many accused him of being. By remaining in Judea he showed that the import of his prophecies, apparently friendly to the Chaldeans and hostile to the Jews, had proceeded from the purest love to his people and his fatherland. Thus he imitated Moses, of whom it is written in Heb. xi. 25, that he chose rather to suffer affliction with the people of God than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. The holy ground of the fatherland bound him to it, and in addition—if he went, who was to take spiritual oversight of the poor forsaken remnant, to proclaim the word of God and bestow on them consolation and admonition? Those who were in Babylon had Ezekiel. And could not the Lord raise up other prophets for them? So he remained with the sheep, who had no shepherd. Jeremiah had not sought his own through his whole life, nor did he here.

6. On xl. 7 sqq. "Human reason, and indeed nature shows, that in worldly government men cannot be without a head. For as the bees cannot be without a queen, or the sheep without a shepherd, so no large number of people can exist without a head and government. God has wisely ordered it, and we should be thankful for the authorities." CRAMER.

7. On xl. 11 sqq. We may well perceive in this "remnant of Judah" a fulfilment of the prophecy in Isa. vi. 11 sqq.: "Then said I, Lord, how long? And he answered, Until the cities be wasted without inhabitant, and the houses without man, and the land be utterly desolate, and Jehovah have removed men far away, and great is the forsaking in the midst of the land. And if a tenth remains in it, this again must be removed. Yet as the terebinth and the oak, in which when they are felled, a ground-stock still remains, so is its stock a holy scion."

8. On xl. 13 sqq. Gedaliah, in whom not only Nebuchadnezzar, but also his people, had confidence, must have been a noble man, to whom it was difficult to think evil of his neighbor. "Those who are of a pious disposition, cannot believe so much evil, as is told of people. But we must not trust too much, for the world is full of falseness (Wisd. xxxvii. 3). He who believes too easily, will be often deceived, and he who believes no one is also deceived. Therefore is he indeed a happy man, who can preserve the golden mean." CRAMER.

9. On xl. 13 sqq. "Misfortune is like the waves of the sea; when one is broken another follows, and the end of one trouble is the beginning of others." CRAMER.

10. On xli. 1-3. "Judas's kiss and Jacob's brethren are very common in the world and take after their grandfather Cain, who spake kindly to Abel and yet had blood-thirsty thoughts (Gen. iv. 8). Yea, they take after their father, the devil, who is a murderous spirit (John viii. 44), and disguises himself as an angel of light (2 Cor. xi. 14)." CRAMER.

11. On xli. 1 sqq. "Similia perfidiae exempla (simulate fraternitatis): 2 Sam. xiii. 24; xx. 9 sqq. Quadrat etiam huc historia nuptiarum Parisiensium celebratum 1572 mense Augusto." FÖRSTER.

12. On xli. 4 sqq.

"Murder and avarice love to go with each other, And one crime is often a prolific mother."—CRAMER.

13. On xli. 16 sqq. It is very remarkable that even this last centre and rendezvous of the unfortunate people must be destroyed. It might be supposed that with the destruction of the city and deportation of the people the judgments would have terminated. It seems as if the deed of Ishmael and the removal of the remnant to Egypt transcended the measure of punishment fixed by Jehovah, for the Lord did not send Ishmael, and the removal to Egypt He directly forbade. And yet it seems that only by Ishmael's act and the flight to Egypt could the land obtain its Sabbath rest, which is spoken of in Lev. xxvi. 34, 35.

14. On xlii. 1-6. "Had not Johanan and his people asked for advice, but gone directly to Egypt, their sin would not have been so great. They feigned, however, submission to the will of God, while they yet adhered to their own will. It is a common fault for people to ask advice while they are firmly resolved what they will do. For they inquire not to learn what is right, but only to receive encouragement to do what they wish. If we advise them according to their inclination they take our advice, if not, they reject it.—We must be on our guard when we appeal to God's decision, that we do not previously decide for ourselves. For thus we fall into hypocrisy, which is the most fatal intoxication and blindness." HEIM and HOFFMAN, The Major Prophets. ["Those will justly lose their comfort in real fears, that excuse themselves in sin with pretended fears." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

15. On xlii. 7. After the murder of Gedaliah the anger of Nebuchadnezzar seemed inevitable. But the Lord, to whom nothing is impossible (xxxii. 17), promises to perform a miracle, and restore Israel to new prosperity in their land if they will give Him the honor and trust in Him. Nebuchadnezzar's heart is indeed in His hand. If this is not acknowledged and Nebuchadnezzar more feared than the Lord, their sin is then against the first commandment.

16. On xlii. 13 sqq. "God reminds His people of the favor with which He adopted them as His people, which was the most sacred obligation to obedience; that Egypt was to them a land of destruction, a forbidden land, as indeed all confidence in human aid is forbidden to those who would live by faith, which was known to them from the history of their fathers and all the prophets. It is a great sin to deem one's self safer under the protection of man than under that of God. It is incomprehensible, how blind unbelief makes people, so that the Jews have not yet learned the truth in the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple of God." HEIM and HOFFMAN. "Fides futurorum certa est ex præcedentibus." TERTULL. "Veniens hæc quoque sicut ista venerunt." AUGUSTIN.—FÖRSTER.

17. On xliii. 2 sqq. "Hypocrites forsooth do not wish to be regarded as rejecting and setting themselves in opposition to God's word, or accusing God of falsehood. For then is all the world pious, and no one refuses to be submissive to the dear Lord. God is truly God and remains so. It is only against this parson Jeremiah that they must act: he lies, he is not sent, his ruling and preaching cannot be endured." CRAMER.

18. On xliii. 3. "Observe the old diabolical trick: when preachers practice God's word and their office with zeal, the world understands how to baptize it with another name and call it personal interest, as even here Baruch must bear the blame, as if he only wished to vent his anger on them and be contrary." CRAMER.

19. On xliii. 6. The ancients here examine the question why Jeremiah accompanied the people to Egypt and take occasion to discuss the 1 Comm. de fuga ministrorum with reference to AUGUSTIN, Epist. 150 ad Honorar. With respect to Jeremiah, it is clear that he did all in his power to avert the journey to Egypt. After the whole people, however, were once on their way it was impossible for him and Baruch to remain alone in the deserted country. They were obliged to go with their flock. The more these were wandering, the more need they had of the shepherds. Thus, even if they were not compelled, they had to go with them. It seems, however, to follow from the expression $\Pi\Omega\lambda$, ver. 5, that no choice was given them. The people wished to have the prophet with them. In no case can we say that Jeremiah fled, for according to his own prophecy, he knew that he was going to meet ruin in Egypt.

20. On xliii. 8-13. At the present day when we wish to convey to posterity the account of some accomplished fact, or the prediction of some fact to be accomplished (ex. gr. a last testament), we take paper and ink, write it down, seal it, have it subscribed by witnesses and preserve it in the registrar's or recorder's office.

In ancient times they took a simpler and surer way. Jacob and Laban simply erected a heap of stones (Gen. xxxi.), the two and a half tribes (Josh. xxii.) built an altar on the bank of the Jordan. As long as the heap and the altar were standing, the record was transmitted from generation to generation for what object these stone witnesses were set up, and thus, that which it was desired to convey to posterity lived in the memory of men. Jeremiah also knows how to use ink and pen (ch. xxxii.), but here he returns once more to the old manner of preserving archives. He simply places great stones in the clay, declaring what they signify, viz., that here, on this spot, Nebuchadnezzar's tent shall stand. Whether the Egyptians and Jews then believed him or not, is of no consequence. The record of these stones and their meaning at any rate remained alive, and the Lord's word was thus safely preserved till the day of its fulfilment.

HOMELETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On ch. xl. 1-12; xli. 1-3; xlii. 1-16. Israel, the chosen nation, is in its destinies a type of human life in general. Consider only the exodus from Egypt. So also the destinies of the people of Israel, after the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, are pretypical. For 1. The deportation of the whole people in chains and fetters is a type of our universal human misery, from which no one (not even Jeremiah) is free. 2. The fate of Gedaliah and the journey to Egypt is a type of the insufficiency of all mere human help. 3. As the Jews after Gedaliah's murder, so men at all times, find protection and deliverance in the Lord alone.

2. On xl. 1-6. The Christian in the tumult of the world. 1. He is regarded externally like others. 2. The eye of the Lord watches with special care over him, so that (a) not a hair of his head is bent, (b) all his wants are provided for. 3. He, however, on his part directs all his efforts to the kingdom of God and His righteousness, and will not be turned aside from this either by the violence or the friendliness of the world.

3. On xl. 7-xli. 3. Gedaliah's fate an example of what befalls even the most noble in times of deep corruption. 1. They enjoy general confidence. 2. They are incapable of attributing extreme wickedness to men. 3. They become a sacrifice to their confidence. 4. They are therefore not in a condition to stay the divine judgments.

4. On xlii. 1-16. What is the surest way of coming to the right conclusion in difficult cases? 1. To inquire of the Lord. 2. To obey unconditionally the direction which the Lord communicates. ["We must still in faith pray to be guided by a spirit of wisdom in our hearts, and the hints of Providence." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

5. On xliii. 1-7. Characteristic example of the artfulness of the human heart: the Jews inquire of the Lord and promise to obey His direction (xlii. 20). But when the direction does not accord with their wish, they at once declare it to be supposititious, not from the Lord. The prophet must be a liar, an alleged enemy has incited him. But what was long previously determined in the heart is obstinately brought to execution. ["Those that are resolved to contradict the great ends of the ministry, are industrious to bring a bad name upon it. It is well for persons who are thus misrepresented that their witness is in heaven, and their record on high." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

6. On xliiii. 8-13. The ways of the Lord are wonderful. Israel flees before Nebuchadnezzar far away to Egypt. But there they are not safe. The Lord causes it to be proclaimed to them that at the entrance of the king's palace at Tahpanhes Nebuchadnezzar's tent shall stand. Now indeed there is a brick-kiln there, in the clay of which Jeremiah is to place stones, the foundation stones, as it were, for the Chaldean king's pavilion. Thus the Lord lays the germs of future events, and whatever He prepares in secret He reveals in His own time to the glory of His wisdom, omniscience and omnipotence.

10. Jeremiah at the Festival of the Queen of Heaven in Pathros. The Last Act of his Prophetic Ministry.

a. The charge against the stubbornly idolatrous people.

XLIV. 1-14.

- 1 The word that came to Jeremiah concerning [for, to] all the Jews which dwell [who dwelt] in the land of Egypt, which dwell at Migdol, and at Tahpanhes, and
- 2 at Noph, and in the country of Pathros, saying, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, the God of Israel: Ye have seen all the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, and upon all the cities of Judah; and, behold, this day they are a desolation, and no
- 3 man dwelleth therein; because of their wickedness which they have committed to¹ provoke me to anger, in that they went to burn incense, and to serve other
- 4 gods, whom they knew not, neither they,² ye, nor your fathers. Howbeit I sent unto you all my servants the prophets, rising early and sending them, saying, Oh,

5 do not this abominable thing³ that I hate. But they hearkened not, nor inclined 6 their ear to turn from their wickedness, to burn no incense unto other gods. Wherefore my fury and mine anger was poured forth, and was kindled in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem: and they are wasted and desolate, as at 7 this day. Therefore now thus saith the LORD, the God of hosts, the God of Israel:
 Wherefore commit ye this great evil against your souls,⁴ to cut off from you man 8 and woman, child and suckling, out of Judah, to leave you none to remain: In that ye provoke me unto wrath with the works of your hands, burning incense⁵ unto other gods in the land of Egypt, whither ye be gone to dwell, that ye might cut yourselves⁶ off, and that ye might be a curse and a reproach among all 9 the nations of the earth? Have you forgotten the wickedness [evil]⁷ of your fathers, and the wickedness of the kings of Judah, and the wickedness of their [his]⁸ wives, and your own wickedness, and the wickedness of your wives, which they⁹ have committed in the land of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem?
 10 They are not humbled even unto this day, neither have they feared, nor walked in 11 my law, nor in my statutes, that I set before you and before your fathers. Therefore thus saith the LORD of hosts, the God of Israel: Behold, I will set my face 12 against you for evil, and to cut off all Judah. And I will take the remnant of Judah, that have set their faces to go into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, and they shall all¹⁰ be consumed, and fall in the land of Egypt; they shall even be consumed by the sword and by the famine: they shall die, from the least even unto the greatest, by the sword and by the famine: and they shall be an execration, and 13 an astonishment, and a curse, and a reproach. For I will punish them that dwell in the land of Egypt, as I have punished Jerusalem, by the sword, by the famine, 14 and by the pestilence: So that none [there shall be none escaped or remaining] of the remnant of Judah, which are gone into the land of Egypt to sojourn there, shall escape or remain, that they should return [and then to return] into the land of Judah, to the which they have a desire to return to dwell there: for none shall return but such as shall escape.¹¹

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 3.—In להכעסני and ללכת the ל is the gerundial (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 95; e), in לקטר לעבר it is the supinal (Id., § 95, f). Comp. xi. 17; xxxii. 32.

² Ver. 3.—הכזה is not to be regarded as accusative, since this has been already expressed by the suffix in ריעים, but as nominative. The third person stands in close connection with the preceding, the הפה with the sudden change of person (comp. infra vers. 5 and 10 and NAEGELSB. Gr., § 101 Ann.) is however explained by ואתם, with which a return is made to the second person used in the beginning of the sentence (ver. 2).

³ Ver. 4.—הך as in Jud. xix. 24.

⁴ Ver. 7.—רעה must here have the same sense as רעות, ver. 9. For the connection is: the רעה that ye now do can only be explained, by your having forgotten the רעות of the past. Since now רעות must necessarily be taken in a double sense, so must also רעה in this passage. והכרית is a gerundial infinitive. On נפשות comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 81, 1 c.

⁵ Ver. 8.—להכעיסני and לקטר are also gerundial infinitives (comp. ver. 3).

⁶ Ver. 8.—In ver. 7 הכרית has a definitely expressed object. Many would supply this here. Others take לכם for אתכם, according to the analogy of xl. 2. הכרית may, however, also be taken in a directly causative sense=prepare extermination, so that the dative would have nothing abnormal in it. Comp. הרניו Jer. i. 34; הוכיח Isa. ii. 4; הצריך Isa. ii. 11 with ל; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 69, 1 Ann. 2.

⁷ Ver. 9.—From עש אשר עש רעות it would follow that רעות is to be taken in a moral sense. But can it be said of those who are censured on account of their persistence in these sins: Have you forgotten your sins? J. D. MICHAELIS is therefore disposed to read השפחתם, with a marginal reading of a Königsberg Codex: malis peccando memoriam peccatorum ante commissorum obliterastis. But this reading is not sufficiently authenticated. We must therefore take רעות, as in ver. 7, in a double sense, so as to designate at the same time the mala posse and the mala culpa (comp. Gen. i. 15). Their forgetfulness of the sufferings which they had drawn on them by their sins is the cause of their obstinate persistence in the latter.

⁸ Ver. 9.—רעות נשיו. Both the introduction of the "wives" and the singular suffix are surprising. The LXX. read τῶν ἀρχόντων ἑμῶν. שריכם or נשייכם would certainly correspond better to the connection, as well as to the usage of the prophet elsewhere (comp. vers. 17, 21; i. 18; ii. 26; xxiv. 8; xxv. 18; xxxii. 32; xxxiv. 21). But the more difficult reading is to be preferred. The singular suffix is not to be referred to Judah, since the expression "wives of Judah" is never used elsewhere nor suitable to the connection, but to the king of the time. Comp. Hos. iv. 8; Zech. xiv. 12; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 195, 7, Ann. 2.

⁹ Ver. 9.—אָסר עֶשֶׂה. Change of person as in vers. 3, 5. Comp. NÆGELS. Gr., § 101, 2, Ann.

¹⁰ Ver. 12.—וְהָיָה כֹּל. According to the accents the sentence is to be construed as in the translation. On כֹּל comp. Isa. xxx. 5; EWALD, 286, e.

¹¹ Ver. 14.—בִּי אִם כִּלְטִים. Strictly taken these words form a direct contradiction to the beginning of the verse, which declares that there shall be a פְּלִיט or שְׂרִיר, and the words כִּי לֹא יִשְׁבְּנו are no other than the confirmation of this statement. It is therefore natural to regard the words as a later addition, as HITZIG does. The brevity of the previous sentence, and its apparent contradiction of ver. 28 seemed to require this supplementation. In ver. 28 it is expressly stated that some, having escaped, will return, and it is hence evident that the declaration here, ver. 14, is not to be taken with absolute literalness.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The word of the Lord is communicated through Jeremiah to the Israelites dwelling in Egypt; ye have seen how I have punished Judah and Jerusalem for their idolatry (vers. 1-6). Why then do you continually commit the same wickedness? Have ye forgotten the lecture? It appears so, for they have not humbled themselves, nor endeavored to keep the law of God (vers. 7-10). Therefore shall the remnant of Judah in Egypt, even like unto Judah and Jerusalem, be destroyed by sword, famine and pestilence, and at most single fugitives shall return home (vers. 11-14).

Ver. 1. The word . . . saying. We have here the last document of Jeremiah's prophetic ministry. Far from home, after terrible judgments, he has still the same thing to say to the Jews as at first. They have not become wiser or better. From Tahpanhes they had spread abroad in the land. What occasion had brought them together in so large an assembly, is not indeed stated in the superscription, which is of the greater sort (comp. xl. 1; xxxvi. 1; xxxv. 1; xxxiv. 1, etc.), but is evident enough from what follows.—Dwelt. The fugitives have already established themselves in fixed abodes. Comp. rems. on xliii. 8.—Migdol (comp. xlv. 14; Ezek. xxix. 10; xxx. 6 coll. Exod. xiv. 2; Num. xxxiii. 7) was one of the north-eastern boundary points of Egypt [near Syene]. In Herodotus (II. 159) and the LXX. the place is called Μάγδωλον; according to the Itiner. Anton. (p. 171) it was twelve Roman miles from Pelusium.—On Tahpanhes comp. rems. on xliii. 8.—Noph is Memphis, the ancient capital of lower Egypt. Comp. rems. on ii. 16.—Pathros (comp. ver. 15; Isa. xi. 11; Ezek. xxix. 14; xxx. 14) is upper Egypt. Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc., I. S. 149. The assembly was held, according to ver. 15, in Pathros. A considerable time must have elapsed since the migration, because we find the colony already dispersed and settled in different places. On the other hand the meeting cannot have occurred so long after the migration that those who are addressed by Jeremiah can belong to the second generation. They were the Jews who had come into the country (ver. 8), and the longing for home was still strong in them. Comp. rems. on vers. 29, 30

b. The Replication of the People.

XLIV. 15-19.

15 Then all the men which knew that their wives had burned incense unto other gods, and all the women that stood by a [there in the] great multitude [assembly], even all the people that dwelt in the land of Egypt, in Pathros answered Jeremiah, saying, *As for the word*¹ that thou hast spoken unto us in the name of the Lord, we will not hearken unto thee. But we will certainly do whatsoever thing [word] goeth forth [has gone forth] out of our own mouth; to burn incense unto the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, as we have done, we, and our fathers, our kings, and our princes, in the cities of Judah, and in the streets of Jerusalem: for then had we plenty of victuals, and were well,² and saw no evil. But since we left off to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her, we have wanted all things, and have been consumed³ by the sword and by the famine. And when we burned incense to the queen of heaven, and poured out drink offerings unto her, did we make her cakes to worship her,⁴ and pour out drink offerings unto her, without our men?

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

From the purport of this passage it is manifest that the people had come together to celebrate a festival in honor of the queen of heaven, and to perform the vows they had made. The assembly consisted principally of women. Hence they were the chief speakers. They now declare to the prophet that they will not obey his words (ver. 16), but perform their vows, and make their offerings to the queen of heaven, as they had also done at home. It was then well with them (ver. 17), only since they neglected her worship, has it gone badly with them (ver. 18). In addition, they (the women) had devoted themselves to the service of this goddess only with the concurrence of their husbands.

Ver. 15. Then all . . . saying. The assembly consisted (1) of men, who well knew that their wives offered incense to other gods (comp. rems. on ver. 3); (2) of women, who were a great multitude. From the circumstance that the "great assembly" is designated as consisting of women, it has been rightly concluded that they formed the majority, which explains the emphasis laid on the women in vers. 24, 25.—The Jewish women thus appear to have come together from all parts of Egypt to a festival of the queen of heaven, which was held in a place of upper Egypt (Pathros), not more particularly designated, in order there to perform their vows made to this goddess. The men seem to have been both those who lived in the neighborhood and those who had come from a distance as husbands of a part of the women mentioned. The assembly consisted (3) of representatives of all the people, who were settled in Egypt, among whom we must suppose individuals, who were neither husbands nor wives.—In Pathros accordingly designates the place of meeting, and is not to be connected with lived but with answered. The prophet had endeavored by his discourse, vers. 2-14, to hinder the observance of this idolatrous festival, but was not successful.

Vers. 16-19. As for the word . . . without our men.—We will not hearken. Comp. vii. 16.—The expression whatsoever word has gone forth out of our mouth indicates vows that had been made (comp. Num. xxx. 3, 13; xxxii. 24; Jud. xi. 36). On the queen of heaven comp. rems. on vii. 18.—And when we burned. According to the apodosis this ought properly to be in the feminine instead of the masculine, as in ver. 15 (מִקְטֹרֶת). The masculine form has not only a general justification, as being the chief form, and frequently occurring for the feminine (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, 5, 4), but also a special, since the speakers had in view the en-ture number who took part in the offering. According to Num. xxx. 7 sqq., the women were responsible for the observance of their vows only when approved by their husbands (or fathers, comp. ver. 4). Hence they now declare, that in consequence of having obtained the concurrence of their husbands they are at any rate free from all personal responsibility. On cakes comp. rem. on vii. 18. It is evident from the later passage, that this cult was not first adopted in Egypt, but imported from home.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

To the assertion of the people that it had gone well with them so long as they had served the queen of heaven, and that their misfortunes dated from their cessation of this service, the prophet answers with a non post hoc sed propter hoc. It was precisely on account of this idolatrous cult (ver. 21) which Jehovah could no longer suffer, that their misfortunes had come upon them (ver. 22). And for the sake of emphasis Jeremiah repeats this bitter truth once more (ver. 23).

β. The Positive Announcement of Severest Punishment.

XLIV. 24-30.

24 Moreover Jeremiah said unto all the people, and to all the women, Hear the 25 word of the LORD [Jehovah's word] all Judah that are in the land of Egypt. Thus saith the LORD of hosts [Jehovah Zebaoth] the God of Israel, saying: Ye and your wives have both¹ spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hand, saying, We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her; ye will surely accom-26 plish² your vows, and surely perform your vows. Therefore hear ye the word of the LORD [Jehovah's word] all Judah that dwell in the land of Egypt; Behold, I have sworn by my great name, saith the LORD, that my name shall no more be named in the mouth of any man of Judah in all the land of Egypt, saying, The 27 LORD God [Adonai Jehovah] liveth. Behold, I will watch over them for evil, and not for good; and all the men of Judah that are in the land of Egypt shall be con-28 sumed by the sword and by the famine, until there be an end of them. Yet a small number that escape³ the sword shall return out of the land of Egypt into the land of Judah, and all the remnant of Judah, that are gone into the land of 29 Egypt to sojourn there, shall know whose words shall stand, mine, or theirs.⁴ And this shall be a sign unto you, saith the LORD, that I will punish⁵ you in this place, 30 that ye may know that my words shall surely stand against you for evil: Thus saith the LORD: Behold, I will give Pharaoh-hophra, king of Egypt, into the hand of his enemies, and into the hand of them that seek his life; as I gave Zedekiah, king of Judah, into the hand of Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, his enemy, and that sought his life.

⁵ Ver. 29.— בְּקֶרֶב with עַל as in ver. 13.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

As that which the land and people of Judah had experienced from the Chaldeans, was a punishment for their previous wickedness, so in the future also new calamities will be the recompense of their newly-repeated offences. The Jews persist in performing their idolatrous vows. Well, they shall do so (ver. 26). But they shall also hear, that there will soon be no longer a Jew in Egypt, who may even take the name of Jehovah into his mouth (ver. 26). For they shall be exterminated by sword and famine (ver. 27), and only a few shall return into the land of Judah, that this stubborn people may learn who is in a position to execute his will, Jehovah or they? (ver. 28). And this may serve for a token, that the Lord will make good His word, that Hophra, king of Egypt, will be given into the hand of his mortal enemies, just as Zedekiah was given into the hand of his enemy, the king of Babylon (vers. 29, 30).

Vers. 24, 25. Moreover Jeremiah . . . your vows. The women are here also expressly mentioned (see rems. on ver. 15). In ver. 25 even the predicate to ye and your wives, as well as the predicates in the concluding sentence of the verse has the feminine form.—The sentence and fulfilled with your hand is to be regarded as a parenthesis, occasioned by the circumstance, that the discharge of the vows was already in progress at the very moment the prophet was speaking. We may conclude from this, that the words in vers. 24 sqq. were spoken later than the preceding context, viz., towards the close of the meeting.

Vers. 26-28. Therefore hear . . . or theirs. As you obstinately carry out your will, hear what the Lord will do to effect His. He has sworn by His great Name (comp. xxii. 5; xlix. 13; li. 14), that a time will yet come, when no Jew in Egypt will any more take the name of Jehovah into his mouth as an oath (comp. iv. 2; v. 2; xii. 16), simply for this reason, that there will be none there (ver. 27). "In the form of asseveration the name of Jehovah would be still retained, although they had long since become devoted to the service of other gods. But Jehovah, who is an קַדְוֹשׁ אֱלֹהִים [jealous God], rejects honor and acknowledgment which He must share with others; and so His name shall no longer be heard from the mouth of any Jews in Egypt." HIRTZIG.—In Behold, I will watch, there is evidently a reminiscence of i. 12, so that the close of the prophecies is thus connected with the beginning.—Only a few individuals will escape the sword and return home (comp. rem. on ver. 14).—A small number. Comp. Gen. xxxiv. 30; Deut. iv. 27; Ps. cv. 12.—And thus Israel shall learn by this fact, whose word will stand (כִּי יִשְׁמַע). Comp. viii. 9; Gen. xxiv. 23; כִּי יִשְׁמַע, Isa. xiv. 24; vii. 7; xlv. 10), theirs (vers. 17, 18) or Jehovah's.

Vers. 29, 30. And this shall be a sign . . . sought his life. The Jews might think that in Egypt they were out of sight of their God, whose throne was in Jerusalem. To expel this delusion the prophet announces to them a sign, that the Lord has them well in view. When they see this sign it will be a pledge that the punishments threatened in vers. 26-28 will really overtake them. The sign will consist in this, that Hophra, the Egyptian king, will be given into the hands of his enemies, as Zedekiah was into the hands of Nebuchadnezzar. Now Herodotus certainly relates (II., 161 sqq.) that Apries [Manetho, Θιάσρις, LXX., Θιάσρη], (i. e., Hophra) whom he calls after Psammethichus the most fortunate of the earlier kings, in consequence of an unsuccessful battle with the Cyrenians, had to experience a revolt of the Egyptians. Amasis, who was sent to treat with them, himself went over to the rebels, and Apries was compelled to fight the Egyptians under Amasis with an army consisting only of foreign auxiliaries. He was so presumptuous as to think, says Herodotus, that no God could cast him from his throne, so firmly was he seated upon it. He was, however, vanquished and taken captive. Amasis now indeed treated him very well in the palace, but the Egyptians took it ill that he was so indulgent to his and their greatest enemy. Therefore Amasis delivered Apries up to the Egyptians, who strangled him (II., 169). If we compare this narrative with the passage under consideration, we find that they agree perfectly, not only in speaking of a "surrender of Hophra into the hands of those who sought his life" (comp. וְיִשְׁמַע and וְיִשְׁמַע, ver. 30 a, with the singular in hemistich b) but also in this, that the circumstance of the surrender of the king being predicted as a sign, appears to be thus well accounted for, in Apries having by his obstinate arrogance challenged the divine Nemesis. But how about the chronology? It has been assumed that the surrender of Apries occurred at too late a date for it to have served as a sign, or that Jeremiah could have lived to any proximate period. The death of Apries must certainly be placed in B. C., 570 (comp. DECKER, S. 930; M. NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Bab., S. 217). We have remarked above on ver. 1, that the Jews are still designated as having come into the country (vers. 8, 12, 14), and therefore not as born in it, and a strong longing for the land of their fathers is still ascribed to them (ver. 14). But does this prevent us from supposing that they have been already about sixteen years in the country? There is nothing opposed to this in the text. This simply records that they had settled down at different places, and were now assembled for a festival in Upper Egypt. This might happen as well after sixteen years as after two, but better then, than in the first year. A longing for home is not yet altogether extinguished in the Jews even at the present day. Comp. Ps. cxxxvii.—As to the age of Jeremiah—if he was a יָעָר, about twenty, in the thirteenth year of Josiah (comp. i. 2, 6), he must have been about seventy-six or seventy-seven in the year B. C., 570. This is not impossible. What object could the subsequent insertion of this verse as a vaticinium post eventum, alleged by HIRTZIG and GRAF, have had? There was no need for it (as there perhaps was for כִּי אֵת פְּלִיטָתוֹ, ver. 14), and if it was not Jeremiah's custom to offer tokens, this would all the more have deterred from such an interpolation. Even if we grant that there are no other tokens of this kind to be found in Jeremiah, this does not involve the impossibility of his ever having given such a one. He might have a special reason for doing so here. I think I can perceive such a reason in the presumptuous declaration on the part of the king, recorded by Herodotus. This prediction of the fate impending over the king was the answer of the true God to this provocation. The point of the prediction is evidently directed against this latter. That which Jeremiah loudly proclaimed in an open assembly of the Jewish people could not remain hid. The king could and should hear it, even though he held the old Jewish soothsayer in disdain. Only thus is it explained why Jeremiah gave a token just now, and why he gave just this. He was obliged to predict his fate to the king, in order that when this came, the hand of God might be recognized in it, and at the same time this prediction was to be a pledge to the Jewish people for the fulfilment of the judgment threatened by him. Let us remember how the mighty hand of the Lord was once displayed through Moses on Egypt and its king, in order that they might perceive that He was the Lord, and His the earth (Exod. vii. 5, 17; viii. 22; ix. 14, 29; x. 2). After the lapse of a thousand years the last remnant of the theocratic nation return as fugitives to the same Egypt, from which the Lord had so gloriously conducted them. Israel had failed of the high goal, appointed for it—but the Lord had remained the same, and His last prophet like His first was commissioned to be the medium of announcement to the proud empires of the just judgments of the only true God, who does not allow Himself to be despised with impunity.

How now was the threatening fulfilled that the remnant of Judah in Egypt should perish by sword and famine, except a few who should return home (ver. 28), and none should be left in Egypt who could take the name of Jehovah for an oath on his lips (ver. 26)? In the first place it may here be mentioned, that it is a matter of indifference to this question, whether Nebuchadnezzar really came to Egypt and fulfilled the prophecy in xliii. 8-14, or not. I leave entirely out of account the fabulous record of Megasthenes (in STRABO, XVI., p. 687, a; JOSEPH., Antiqq., X., 11, 1; c. Ap., I., 20), that Nebuchadnezzar subjugated not only Egypt, but also Lybia and Iberia, and came to the pillars of Hercules, yea even to Thrace and the Pontus (comp. HÆVERNICK, Comm. on Ezek., S. 496 sqq., and the narratives confirming the conquest of Egypt in Arabian authors: ABULFEDA, Hist. ante-Islam., p. 102. FLEISCHER, Abdollarif, Rel. de l'Egypt., p. 184, 247; ed. DE SACY). But JOSEPHUS, as is well known, relates also (Antiqq., X., 9, 7) that Nebuchadnezzar in the fifth year after the capture of Jerusalem himself led an army to Cælo-Syria, and after the conquest of this country, made war also on the Ammonites and Moabites, and invaded Egypt. On this occasion he killed the king then reigning in Egypt, set up another in his stead, and again led Jews away captive to Babylonia. Now if whatever in this account relates to the Egyptian king be decidedly erroneous (Comp. M. NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Bab., S. 215, Ann. 5), it is, however, still possible that Nebuchadnezzar, during the thirteen years siege or blockade of Tyre, which began directly after the conquest of Jerusalem, had the desire and the leisure to make an expedition through Cælo-Syria and the East-Jordanic countries to Egypt. It would make no essential difference if he entrusted this expedition to one of his generals. The prophecy in xliii. 8-14, may then have been fulfilled. Captive Jews and Egyptians may also have been really carried away on this occasion. Comp. lii. 30; M. NIEBUHR, S. 215, et passim. But, as we have said, the question, what happened to the Jews still living in Egypt B. C., 570, is not affected by an expedition of the Chaldeans to Egypt ten or twelve years earlier.

It is surprising that in ch. xliv. the extermination of the Jews living in Egypt is so definitely prophesied, while some centuries later we find the Jews in Egypt very numerous, and Egypt a centre of the Jewish diaspora (comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc., XVII. S. 285.). Alexander the Great finds so many Jews in Egypt, that he peoples the city founded by him, and named after him, chiefly with them (comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc., I., S. 235). How did these Jews come into Egypt? Till the time of Nehemiah (about B. C., 444), Judea was so thinly populated, that it certainly could not afford to send out colonists. The many Persian expeditions to Egypt (B. C., 525, 484, 460, 458, 373), may indeed have carried many single Jews with them. The same may also be said of the brief occupation of Palestine by Taches, king of Egypt (B. C., 361). It is related of Oehus, that in his expedition, undertaken B. C., 350 for the reconquest of Egypt, he dragged many Jews with him to Egypt. It is, however, added that he afterwards took part of them back to Babylon, and part of them he banished to Ilyrcania. Comp. HERZFELD, Gesch. d. V. Isr., etc., [History of the Israelitish nation from the completion of the Second Temple to Simon Maccabeus], I., S. 118. It is recorded of Alexander the Great himself that on his expedition to Egypt he incorporated many Jews and Samaritans in his army (comp. HERZFELD, S. 120, et pass.), but it is scarcely probable that he left all these warriors behind in Egypt. When in Babylon, he wished to rebuild the temple of Belus, he had Jews in his army, as is related by Ilicatus in JOSEPH., c. Ap., I., 22 (p. 1186 sqq., ed. OBERTHUER). Whence then the great number of Jews that Alexander found already in Egypt? I believe we must seek them for the most part in the descendants of those who immigrated with Jeremiah. But then the prophecy was not fulfilled. May we not assume that the idolatrous practices ceased among the exiled Jews in Egypt, as well as among those in Babylon? And if this was the case, how can it be a question, what turning-point we must suppose between the idolatrous period, in which we still see them in Jer. xlv., and the later one of fidelity to Jehovah? May not the powerful words of the aged and venerable Jeremiah, and the literal fulfilment of the prophecy uttered by him respecting the king (xlv. 29, 30) have produced an overpowering impression on their minds? According to tradition (HERON., adv. Jovin., 2, 87; TERULLIAN, Scorp. 8; EPIPHAN., περι τῶν προφητῶν, Opp., II., p. 239) Jeremiah was stoned by his countrymen in Tahpanhes. But this legend is surely without foundation. If they stoned him, they must have done it after the discourse in ch. xlv., which was not delivered in Tahpanhes (xlv. 15). It is, however, also possible that the idolatrous inclination in them, as in their countrymen in Babylonia, was now exhausted, and that the Lord in view of their repentance, repented Him of the evil, which He had spoken against them (xxvi. 18, 19).

In the foregoing chapter they wish it to be considered as having to do only with Jeremiah's private person, but now they are become bolder so that they contradict him officially and thus God Himself, not considering that they know what he says to be spoken not on his own, but on God's account, which is a great blasphemy of God." CRAMER.

6. On xlv. 17. "The ungodly are blind. For they ascribe all their good fortune to their idolatry. When, however, a misfortune comes God and His word must be to blame, and they say: It is vain to serve God (Mal. iii. 14). The charge of the Papists is used again now-a-days, when times are dear and the country suffers such like chastisements, that it is the fault of the Gospel; since on the other hand their mass is regarded as a regular Egyptian Meleket, by which they think to obtain temporal and eternal blessings both for the living and the dead." CRAMER.

7. On xlv. 17. "Non ovum ovo tam simile est atque huic Judæorum orationi nostrorum hominum vox contententium, sub papatu aureum fuisse sæculum, cum tamen contrarium testentur historicæ de bellis, peste et fame in papatu, præsertim ea, quæ incidit in annum Christi 1315, quo tempore, fere tertia pars Germaniæ partim fame, partim peste extincta. Hinc versus: Ut lateat nullum tempus famis, ecce cueullum." FÖRSTER.

8. On xlv. 17. "Non mirum, quod urbes peste vexentur, cum Esculapius et Dii ab iis procul absint, nam ex quo Jesus colitur, nihil jam utilitatis a Diis consequimur. PORPHYRIUS." MS. note in my copy of CRAMER'S Bible.

9. On xlv. 19. "There is no doubt that the inconstant, frivolous women were the first to be seduced into idolatry, as Eve (2 Cor. xi. 3). When these are taken captive, he then proceeds farther, and knows how to bring in the Adam also. Therefore keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom (Mic. vii. 5)." CRAMER.

10. On xlv. 19. "The harmony and complaisance of married people is never more easily secured than when it is against the Lord, and it is nothing unusual for domestic peace to be aduced as the cause of a lack of zeal in religion. It is an ancient custom; Ahab, Ahaziah and Solomon only followed Adam. The wife had to be deceived by a subtle serpent; the man was bound to keep peace in the family; she gave him and he ate." ZINZENDORF.

11. On xlv. 20. "God remembers the good and the evil; the good that He may reward it, the evil that He may punish it." CRAMER. ["God will have the last word. The prophets may be run down, but God cannot." HENRY.—S. R. A.]

12. On xlv. 26. "This is the severest punishment of all, that God takes away His holy name and word, as He says in Deut. xxxii. 20: I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be. And this is the famine, not of bread, but of the word of God which they seek and yet do not find (Am. viii. 11)." CRAMER.

13. On xlv. 29, 30. Between Moses and Jeremiah, between the exodus from Egypt and the return thither of the remnant, there lies a period of almost a thousand years, and what a history! But the Pharaoh, under whom Israel made the exodus, Menephtes (comp. LEPSIUS in HENZ., R. Enc. 1. S. 115) is described by Herodotus as an arrogant and ungodly man (H., 111), just like Hophra. And at both times Israel was a poor despised heap in the land of Egypt. But the heathen were to know that the God of this despised heap is the only true God, and that their idols were naught, as also Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar and Darius the Mede had also to learn (Dan. ii.-vi.).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xlv. 1-14. The holy love of God: 1. long-suffering; 2. just.

2. On xlv. 9-14. How ruinous a course it is to forget the chastisements of the Lord. This will be shown, if we ponder that this forgetfulness 1. implies chastisement already suffered, 2. proves its want of good results, 3. calls forth severer chastisements from God.

3. On xlv. 15-18. The utmost alienation of a people from their God, shown in the example of the Jews in Egypt. 1. They place the benefits received to the account of their idols. 2. The evils suffered they place to the account of the Lord. 3. They renounce their obedience to the Lord. 4. They vow their service to their idols.

4. On xlv. 26, 27. The severest punishment which the Lord can bring upon a people, who have hitherto served Him. 1. It consists in this, that the Lord removes the candlestick of His word from among this people, i. e. that by depriving them of the means of grace, He brings Himself into forgetfulness among the people. 2. It is founded in this, that this people on their part have striven to forget the Lord. 3. It has the effect, that this people is given up to the powers of evil to their complete destruction.

Appendix to the Prophecies Relating to the Entire Theocracy.

THE PROMISE GIVEN TO BARUCH (CHAP. XLV).

While in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, according to ch. xxxvi., Jeremiah was dictating to his true friend and servant, Baruch, the revelations hitherto received, the latter appears to have been quite overpowered by a feeling of deep sorrow and anguish. Then Jeremiah receives a commission to address to him some words of consolation. This brief address doubtless formed the conclusion of the whole, of the original writing of which an account is given in ch. xxxvi. For it is incredible that Baruch was overcome with grief, when he had written the prophecies against the heathen, so far as these were extant in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, in their original position after ch. xxv. and before ch. xxvii. (comp. rems. on xxv. 12-14 and the Introd. to chh. xlv.-li.); these being of relatively consolatory import to the Israelites (comp. especially xlix. 1 sqq.). But when he could survey at a glance the entirety of the threatening words pronounced against the theocracy, this may have been the moment when he broke out into the utterance recorded in xlv. 3. The word בְּכַתְּבוֹ, ver. 1, is not opposed to this. For it is not necessary to take the prefix in the sense of "whilst." It merely expresses that Baruch received the revelation at a time when he was at work as an amanuensis, neither before nor after; but does not determine whether he received it at the beginning, in the midst, or at the end of this time. Even when the prophet had dictated to him his last words his work was not done: he had still to look over and revise what he had written. It is therefore not credible, that the great main work was interrupted by this personal communication. The present chapter is thus an appendix to the entire collection of Jeremiah's prophecies. Its position at the close corresponds to the dignity and importance of Baruch, who as the faithful friend and amanuensis of the prophet was closely connected with the book as a whole, while Ebed-melech, for whom a similar word of promise is found in xxxix. 15-18, came into contact with Jeremiah only at a single epoch. The revelation concerning him was therefore inserted at the corresponding place in the narrative.

XLV. 1-5.

- 1 The word that Jeremiah the prophet spake unto Baruch the son of Neriah, when he had written [was writing] these words in a book at the mouth of Jeremiah, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah, king of Judah, saying,
 2, 3 Thus saith the LORD [Jehovah], the God of Israel, unto thee, O Baruch: Thou didst say, Woe is me now! for the LORD hath added grief to my sorrow; I fainted
 4 [am weary]² in my sighing, and I find no rest. Thus shalt thou say unto him, The LORD saith thus: Behold, that which I have built will I break down, and that
 5 which I have planted I will pluck up, even this whole land.³ And seekest thou great things for thyself? seek them not: for, behold, I will bring evil upon all flesh, saith the LORD; but thy life will I give unto thee for a prey in all places whither thou goest.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 2.—On עַל in הָיָה עַל comp. rems. on x. 1.

² Ver. 3.—The verb בָּעָרַפְתִּי is found besides in Jeremiah only in li. 58.

³ Ver. 4.—As to the construction here, many are of opinion that the article is wanting before אֶת־הָאָרֶץ, as ex. gr. Gen. xxxii.

23. But we should then have אֶת־הָאָרֶץ. Others would take אֶת־הָאָרֶץ in the emasculated sense, in which it "approaches to" לְ—in respect to, as to (Ewald, § 277, d). But in the connection of this passage אֶת־הָאָרֶץ appears plainly as the sign of the accusative, governed by the preceding transitive verb. I therefore think that אֶת־הָאָרֶץ is used here simply with an emphatic significance, which we may express by inserting the word "even:" even the whole land, even this! Comp. Num. xviii. 23; Isa. vii. 14. This is also the case with הָאָרֶץ after a personal pronoun: הָאָרֶץ אֶת־הָאָרֶץ אֶת־הָאָרֶץ, Isa. xliii. 25; Jer. xlix. 12, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In the fourth year of Jehoiakim, when Baruch, the son of Neriah, was writing out the prophecies of Jeremiah at his dictation (vers. 1 and 2), the proclamation is made to him, in answer to his expression of sorrow (ver. 3): that the Lord is intending to desolate the whole land (ver. 4), but he, Baruch, without laying claim to greater things, should accept, as a reward of distinguished grace, that whithersoever he might be cast, he should everywhere escape with his life (ver. 5).

Vers. 1-3. The word . . . find no rest. After Baruch (comp. rems. on xxxii. 12) had finished writing what was dictated to him, Jeremiah receives the command to address a prophecy to him, concerning only his own person.—Baruch was evidently powerfully affected by the total impression made by the prophecies upon him (comp. rems. on xxxvi. 1, 16). In addition to the sorrow, which he must have felt with every other Israelite, at the present disturbed condition of his native land, was the anxiety for the future, which had been awakened by the minatory predictions he had heard.—Grief. Comp. viii. 18; xx. 18; xxxi. 13.—I faint. The same thought as in Lam. v. 5.

Vers. 4, 5. Thus shalt thou . . . thou goest. Two things are involved in these words: 1. Although the theocracy is the Lord's creation, it is yet His fixed determination to destroy His work. With respect to the expression, comp. i. 10; xviii. 7, 9; xxxi. 28.—Even this whole land. If we compare xxv. 15-26, we shall perceive that this determination to destroy is to be understood in a twofold degree, and accordingly יְרֵא is to be taken in the double sense of land and earth. The whole earth and the existence of all nations upon it is the Lord's work, but the Lord will cause His judgment to issue on all this, His work. But Israel's land and people is especially His sanctuary, the first fruits of His increase (ii. 3), His precious inheritance (iii. 19; Ezek. xx. 6, 15), and of course Baruch's sorrow relates above all to the ruin threatening his own, the chosen nation. It is thus declared by the words, "this whole land," that it is not a partial visitation, but a total devastation of the country, which is impending.—2. If now the whole (comp. xiii. 12; xxv. 31) is under sentence of total destruction, no single individual can claim a high degree of positive earthly prosperity. Even the best must be content, if only mere earthly existence, bare life, is guaranteed him. This is done here with respect to Baruch. Thus a measure is given of the degree and extent of the calamity relating to the whole. Comp. xxi. 9; xxxviii. 2, 17.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Baruch did not act as secretary for hire but for love. He esteemed it an honor and a happiness, that by his skill he could serve the Lord, to whom he owed it. Therefore a glorious reward is imparted to him unsought, so that his name and remembrance are immortalized in the sacred record by an oracle addressed specially to him. This honor is to be esteemed still higher than the assurance, that this wretched mortal life should not be taken by violence before its time.

2. On xlv. 3. "Non Stoicos nos esse convenit, qui ἀπάθειαν commendare atque asserere soliti, qualis etiam fuit Münzerus ejusque progenies Anabaptistæ." FÖRSTER.

3. On xlv. 4. Compare the remarks on vii. 4. There is no delusion more ruinous than to suppose that the Lord cannot destroy His own work again. The destruction will certainly only come upon the bad. But it is the bad on the earth, among the chosen people, in the church and on the throne, who imagine themselves to be secure, in spite of their badness, by the fact of the divine appointment or choice, whereby they make God the servant of sin. God has created the earth. He will destroy it by fire. But a new earth and a new heaven will proceed from the conflagration. He has thrown down the holy city and temple and scattered the people of Israel. But the Ἰσραὴλ κατὰ πνεῦμα still lives and will one day permeate the Ἰσραὴλ κατὰ σάρκα with new life again (Rom. xi.). The Christian Church in the East has been devastated by Islam, and what guarantee then have Rome, Geneva and Wittenberg that it will not be with them as with Jerusalem? Princes too are not to understand the divine right of legitimacy as that God can appoint princes but cannot depose them. Yet even if all present Christian churches were to be destroyed and all thrones overthrown, neither the Church of the Lord would cease to be, nor the magistracy, which is ordained of God (Matt. xvi.; Rom. xiii.).

4. On xlv. 5. "Felices frustra nobis promittimus annos semper enim curæ tristitiæque premunt." Quotation by FÖRSTER.

5. On xlv. 5. Endeavor not after high things. Is it then not a great thing in this world, laden as it is with a curse (Gen. iii. 17-19), if one has sustenance and clothing? (1 Tim. vi. 8). And is it not the greatest thing of all, if one knows that his soul is saved in heaven, even if he must take the place there, with which the prodigal son would have been content in his father's house? (Luke xv.).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xlv. 2-5. A word of consolation and exhortation for all the tried children of God. 1. Let no one be surprised at the heat, which he encounters, as though something strange had happened to him. 2. Let every one be satisfied with the one thing needful: (a) for his body, (b) for his spirit.

2. On xlv. 4. God's own institutions. We must distinguish in these: 1. the temporary form (not secured against decay and outward ruin); 2. the everlasting kernel (this is indestructible and bears in itself the guarantee of eternal duration and ever more glorious development).

III. SECOND MAIN DIVISION.

The Prophecies Against Foreign Nations.

(CHAPP. XLVI.—LI.)

The prophets of Israel could not avoid bringing the heathen nations also within the sphere of their predictions. They were compelled to this, partly even from their theocratic and particularistic point of view, in so far as the interests of the theocracy were essentially affected by the standing or falling of their heathen neighbors, and partly in a general view, as they represented the idea of the all-embracing divine love and providence. Hence we find declarations concerning heathen nations in most of the prophetic books. We find these prophecies relating to heathen nations, comprising larger groups, in Isaiah, chh. xliii.—xxliii., in Ezekiel chh. xxv.—xxxii., and here also in Jeremiah xli.—li.

The main trunk of these prophecies is formed by a Sepher, which according to its principal part, owes its origin to the period immediately before the battle of Carchemish (comp. rems. on xli. 2). As Amos makes his way through a cycle of seven nations to his main goal, the kingdom of Israel (i. 3—ii. 5), and as Ezekiel predicts a judgment on seven nations, so our Sepher also contains declarations against seven nations: Egypt, Philistia, Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damascus, and Elam. This arrangement is evidently intentional; proceeding from Egypt the prophet advances to the Philistines; from these he springs across to their eastern neighbors and concludes with Elam, as representing the distant East and North. It is evident that these seven utterances form the main trunk of the Sepher against the nations, from two circumstances. First, that in none of them is Nebuchadnezzar or the Chaldeans mentioned. This is the certain and constantly observed sign of composition before the battle of Carchemish. Secondly, that five of them (or six, comp. infra, rems. on xlix. 34—39) have a similar commencement, viz.

לְמוֹצַיִם לְמִצְרַיִם, etc. This grammatical form is closely connected with the common superscription, The word of Jehovah which came to Jeremiah against the nations, xli. 1.

The prefix לְ, viz. expresses the comprehension of the following special prophecies under this general title (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5, b). On this point, however, two things are to be remarked. 1. The prophecy against the Philistines (ch. xlvii.) bears a superscription according to a different formula, and provided with a special date. We shall show, on xlvii. 1, that this prophecy is older than the six others of the Sepher against the Nations, that it is indeed the oldest of all the prophecies of Jeremiah against heathen nations. It was therefore already extant, when the Sepher was formed, and was therefore included in it, just as it was. 2. The prophecy against Elam (xlix. 34—38) likewise bears a title differing both in form and purport, by which the utterance is assigned to the fourth year of Zedekiah. With this superscription the case is quite peculiar. In the LXX., viz. ch. xxv. continues after ver. 13: Ἄ ἐπορήθησαν Ἱερουσάλημ ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη τὰ Αἰθίοπαι. Hereupon follows the prophecy which we read in the Hebrew text xlix. 35—38. At the close of this, however, we find the words: Ἐν ἀρχῇ βασιλείουτος Ζεδεκίου βασιλεύσας ἐγένετο ὁ λόγος οὗτος περὶ Αἰθίοπαι. The prophecy against Elam in the LXX. thus has a superscription and a postscript, which is unexampled in Jeremiah. Now, however, the double circumstance comes in, that in the LXX. the superscription of ch. xxvii. is wanting, the same which in the Hebrew text contains the evidently and admittedly false name Jehoiakim, and that in the Hebrew text the prophecy against Elam is in xlix. 34 assigned to the fourth year of Zedekiah, though Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans are not mentioned, as they usually are in prophecies subsequent to the battle of Carchemish. From this state of the case I draw the following conclusions: 1. The prophecy against Elam must originally have had the superscription לְיַעֲקֹב, in conformity to the superscriptions of the prophecies against Egypt I., Moab, Ammon, Edom and Damascus. For only thus is the abrupt τὰ Αἰθίοπαι in the superscription of the prophecy in the LXX. explicable. The article τὰ proceeds from the circumstance that they connected Αἰθίοπαι grammatically with τὰ ἔθνη, to which neither grammar nor criticism give any justification, for they arbitrarily separated אֲשֶׁר יְהוָה יְרֵא עַל-הַגּוֹיִם, from the previous context, and made it the superscription, then arbitrarily placed לְיַעֲקֹב as if in opposition to הַגּוֹיִם, and finally, with equal arbitrariness, transposed the whole prophecy hither, for it stood originally in another place. From the postscript, viz. we see that 2. the prophecy must originally have stood, as it still does in the Hebrew text, at the close of the Sepher against the nations, but immediately before ch. xxvii., this postscript being evidently no other than the first verse of ch. xxvii. (modified according to circumstances), which is entirely wanting in the LXX., and in the Hebrew contains the wrong name of a king. How did this prophecy come by a postscript, since no other prophecy in Jeremiah has such an one? Whence came it that xxvii. 1 is entirely wanting in the LXX.? To say nothing of the circumstance, that the date ἐν ἀρχῇ βασιλείουτος Ζεδεκίου in the prophecy against Elam is as incorrect as xxvii. 1 is undoubtedly alone correct (comp. rems. on xxvii. 1 and xlix. 34). But how now does verse 1 of ch. xxvii. come to be the postscript, in the Hebrew the superscription to the prophecy against Elam? Evidently the prophecies against the nations must once have had their place after ch. xxv. and before ch. xxvii. 1. They were, however, taken away from this place, and xxvii. 1 went with them, whether it was that it was really taken for the postscript of the prophecy, or by an unintentional error. If this view is correct it is thus determined that the Sepher against the nations then concluded with the prophecy against Elam. Whether the subsequently added prophecies against Egypt II., against the Arabians and against Babylon were then incorporated in the Sepher cannot be ascertained. Where, however, did the Sepher begin, or rather on what portion of our book did it follow? Chapter xxv. cannot have preceded it, for it is quite out of the question, that it can ever have had place between chh. xxvi. and xxvii. Since that detached verse (xxvii. 1) is found at the close, or at the beginning of the prophecy against Elam, and not at the close of the passage xxv. 15-38, it necessarily follows that this passage did not follow, but preceded the Sepher against the nations. Thus the Sepher cannot have been attached to xxv. 14, 13 or 12. It can, therefore, have had its place only between xxvii. 1 and xxv. 38. Both the present form of the text in the LXX., and the purport of xxv. 13 b, show that it must have been placed in the immediate neighborhood of this verse. For what reason? The verses 12, 13 and 14 of ch. xxv., are directed against Babylon. They treat of the ruin of Babylon with an emphasis and a detail, which do not correspond at all to the historical fact to which ch. xxv. owes its origin. The first half of xxv. 13 decidedly presupposes the prophecy against Babylon, pertaining to the fourth year of Zedekiah (comp. li. 59). From this it follows, that the Sepher against the nations can have been transposed from its original place between xxv. 38 and xxvii. 1 to that before xxv. 15, only with the prophecy against Babylon, therefore after its becoming known. We shall not err if we suppose that the words in xxv. 11, "and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years," gave occasion both to the more extended portrayal of the visitation of Babylon only implicitly, intimated as we have it in the verses xxv. 12-14, and also the transposition hither of the Sepher against the nations now extended by the prophecy against Babylon. The LXX. version flowed from a recension affording this form of the text. For omitting ver. 14, it is connected with ver. 13, and then gives, though in a different order from the Masoretic text, the prophecies against the nations, and as a comprehensive conclusion follows the passage xxv. 15-38 in ch. xxxii. From ch. xxxiii. onward the remaining chapters follow in the same order as in the Masoretic text, only that a chapter is not devoted to the prophecy for Baruch, this appearing in the LXX. merely as the conclusion of ch. li. Another diakenast (who it was it would be impossible to determine) now found it more to the purpose to separate the prophecies against the nations from the passages relating to the theocracy. And thus they were then, without making any alteration in vers. xxv. 12-14, transposed to the place, where we now find them in the Masoretic text.—The prophecy against Babylon was, however, the only addition to the original Sepher against the nations. Two new portions were inserted at appropriate places between the original ones, viz.: 1, a second prophecy against Egypt (xlvi. 13-26) which expressly mentions the name Nebuchadnezzar, xlvi. 13-26; 2, a prophecy against the northern Arabian kingdom (xlix. 28-33), in which at any rate Nebuchadnezzar's name is mentioned in vers. 28 and 30. The insertion of the second prophecy against Egypt after the first, and that against the Arabians after that against Damascus, and before that against Elam, cannot be regarded as other than appropriate.

1. THE SUPERSSCRIPTION.

XLVI. 1.

- 1 The word of the LORD [Jehovah:] which came to Jeremiah the prophet against the Gentiles [THE NATIONS].

This superscription extends over the whole of the prophecies here brought together and forming a בְּרָרָה. It thus forms the heading to chh. xlvi.-li., and introduces the second main division of the Book. The form is the same as in xiv. 1; xlvii. 1; xlix. 34. On the grammar, comp. rems. on xiv. 1

2. THE FIRST PROPHECY AGAINST EGYPT

XLVI. 2-12.

- 2 Against [concerning] Egypt, against the army of Pharaoh-necho king of Egypt, which was by the river Euphrates in Carchemish, which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon smote in the fourth year of Jehoiakim the son of Josiah king of Judah.
- 3 Prepare ye the buckler and the shield,
And move ye on to the battle.
- 4 Harness the horses, and mount ye horsemen,
And stand forth with your helmets,
Furbish¹ the spears, put on coats of mail.²
- 5 Why, (as) I see, are they dismayed—retreat?
And their heroes are dashed to pieces;
They flee in haste, and turn not again?³
Fear round about!⁴ saith Jehovah.

- 6 Let not the swift flee away;⁵
Nor let the mighty escape!
Northwards, by the margin of the river Euphrates, they totter, they fall.
- 7 Who is he who riseth up like the Nile,
His waters roll along like the streams?⁶
- 8 Egypt riseth up like the Nile,
His waters roll along like the streams;
And he said, I will up, cover the land,
Destroy⁷ the city and them that dwell therein.
- 9 Mount ye⁸ the horses, and rage, ye chariots;
And let the mighty warriors go forth:
Cush and Phut, who handle the shield,
And Lydians, that handle and tread the bow.⁹
- 10 And that day is a day of vengeance for the LORD, Jehovah Zebaoth,
That he may avenge himself on his enemies;
And the sword shall devour¹⁰ and be satiate,¹¹
And be drunken with their blood:
For a slain offering has the LORD, Jehovah Zebaoth,
In the land of the North by the river Euphrates.
- 11 Go up towards Gilcad and fetch balm, Virgin daughter of Egypt!¹²
In vain takest thou many medicines;
There is no plaster¹³ for thee.
- 12 Nations hear of thy shame,
And with thy crying the earth is filled,
For one warrior threw down another,
They are both of them fallen together.¹⁴

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 4.—כֹּרֵךְ. Comp. Lev. vi. 21; 2 Chron. iv. 16. The meaning is to clean, polish by rubbing.

¹⁰ Ver. 10.—וְאָכְלָה וְנָוִי. As was remarked on ver. 1, these perfects with the Vau conversive can be taken in a future sense only. Nothing in the context transposes us into the past. All previous verbs relate to the future, and if the day were to be designated as past this would have to be done either disertis verbis, or by וְהָאֵכָל. Except on a false interpretation of ver. 2, we obtain the impression from vers. 7-9 that it is the future which is being described, and if the day (ver. 10) is recognized as future, the following verbs can only be so rendered. ¹³ Ver. 11.—הַעֲלָה. Comp. xxx. 13. The word occurs only in these two passages in Jeremiah, and in these only with the meaning of "something laid on, bandage, plaster."

¹⁴ Ver. 12.—נָבַר כְּנָבַר. The prefix נָ is to be taken in its proper, instrumental signification: One stumbles by another, because one throws another over the heap. Comp. Lev. xxvi. 37.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After the double, viz., general and special title (vers. 1, 2), two pictures are presented before us. The first (vers. 3-6) is the more general and indefinite; warriors are admonished to equip themselves for battle (vers. 3, 4). Then, however, directly follows a description of the defeat and terrible flight, with a statement as to the place of the battle (vers. 5, 6). In the second picture not only is Egypt mentioned as the army addressed by the prophet, but it is also portrayed in colors taken from specially Egyptian relations. That we have, moreover, two pictures before us, is seen from the circumstance, that in vers. 7-12

the whole course of the struggle from beginning to end is described in its main features: the prophet sees the Egyptian host approaching like the overflow of the Nile (vers. 7, 8); he then summons horses, chariots and all warriors (among them the neighboring nations, forming part of the host), to the fight (ver. 9). But the fight does not end well for Egypt: it is a day of the vengeance of Jehovah on Egypt, a sacrificial feast, in which Egypt is the slaughtered victim (ver. 10). The consequences of the lost battle are so fatal to Egypt, that it cannot recover, and the report of its overthrow fills the world (vers. 11, 12).—Does this passage contain a prophecy of the battle, or does it presuppose the battle as already fought? I think the former. For according to ver. 10 (אֶת־הַמִּלְחָמָה לְיָמֵינוּ), the battle is evidently still future. But the prophet felt himself moved to this prophecy, not during the advance of the Egyptian host from its country, but when it had already taken up a position on the Euphrates and the decisive conflict was there to be expected. This follows clearly from ver. 2 in connection with ver. 6 b, and ver. 10 b, as will be further seen in the exposition of these passages. The prophetic and poetical prediction of the approaching battle comes into the foreground, but this does not exclude brief significant hints with respect to the consequences of the battle for the whole future of Egypt.

Ver. 2. Against Egypt . . . of Judah. לְמִצְרַיִם, comp. xxiii. 9; xlvi. 1; xlix. 1, 7, 23, 28. The prefix לְ restricts the general idea expressed in the main superscription to a special part. Comp. xix. 13; Ezek. xlv. 9; Lev. xii. 6, 7. Pharaoh-necho (נְכֻחַ, 2 Ki. xxiii. 29-35) was the sixth king of the twenty-sixth dynasty. He reigned after his father, the great Psammetichus, from B. C., 610-595. Comp. ДУКОВЕР, I., S. 817, 925; HERZOG, R.-Enc. X., S. 257.—He came from Egypt by sea, landed to the north of Carmel in the bay of Aco, and defeated Josiah at Megiddo (608). Jehoiakim was his creature (comp. 2 Ki. xxiii. 34). He was thus at the time de facto ruler of Judah. After the battle at Megiddo, it must have been easy for him to subjugate Phœnicia and Syria, for who was there to offer him any resistance? The power of the Assyrians, Medes and Babylonians, was concentrated in and around Nineveh. Nineveh fell B. C., 606. Now first did the Babylonian army advance under the leadership of Nebuchadnezzar. It met the Egyptians at Carehemish. The city was situated at the confluence of the Chaboras [Chebar or Khaboor], and the Euphrates, on a peninsula formed by the two rivers. Here was the principal passage across the Euphrates (comp. NEUMANN, S. 205, 369; HERZOG, Real-Enc. VII., S. 379), and here as “the extreme line of defence of his new province” (NEUBUR, S. 363), Necho took up his position. He must have lain here for some time, whether because the siege of the city occupied much time, or because it was a part of his plan not to advance further, but here in a favorable position to await the enemy. Observe in the text the double relative sentence which was, etc., and which Nebuchadnezzar, etc. It is doubtless not by accident that by the first of the two, the first mentioned stay of Necho at Carehemish is especially set forth. If the chief emphasis lay on the battle, that first sentence would have been quite superfluous. It would have been enough to say: “which Nebuchadnezzar smote by the Euphrates in Carehemish.” From the emphasis on the stay by the Euphrates it is clear to me that this, and not the battle, was the occasion of the prophecy. When Jeremiah learned that the Egyptian army had taken up a position at Carehemish, he recognized at once the importance of the situation. He knew, that now a collision between the southern and northern empires was inevitable, that there on the Euphrates the destinies of the world would be decided for the proximate future. Egypt on the Euphrates! This was the fatal juncture which summoned him to prophetic utterance. Observe, also, that in the prophecy itself he does not yet mention Nebuchadnezzar (he names him, as I have frequently shown, only after the battle), but he twice mentions in a significant manner the position on the Euphrates (ver. 6 and ver. 7): an evident proof that it was this, which led him to speak. He foresees that it would eventuate in a battle. And with equal definiteness, he sees what the result will be (vers. 5, 6; ver. 10 sqq.). The entire superscription (ver. 2) was added subsequently by the prophet on the writing of the prophecy. In the first relative sentence he indicates the occasion, in the second he declares that the fulfilment followed very speedily in the fourth year of Jehoiakim (B. C. 605-4). The date refers primarily to “smote,” but it does not follow that the prophecy may not have been made the same year, or sooner. The particulars here are not to be determined, but it is possible that the news of the establishment of the Egyptians on the Euphrates, did not reach Jerusalem before the fourth year of Jehoiakim. NEUMANN is of opinion that the battle had already taken place in the third year of Jehoiakim (Ass. u. Bab., S. 50, 86, 370), and that hence the date here refers to the composition of the poem, not to the historical event of the battle. The chronological relations are not to be investigated here, but exegetically it seems to me as impossible to put a point after smote (NEUBUR, S. 86, Ann.), as to refer in the fourth year to the word, etc., ver. 1, as GRAF proposes. Apart from their being so far removed from each other, ver. 1 is a general title referring to all the following chapters, including ch. li. The construction too, would then be obscure and forced. We should then have to take לְמִצְרַיִם as a more particular defence: with respect to Egypt, however, in the fourth year; which would give the sense that only this prophecy was uttered against Egypt, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim, which is incorrect.

Vers. 3-6. Prepare ye . . . the fall. The first battle-picture commences with the call to the warriors to prepare buckler and shield (the Egyptian monuments show two kinds of shields, a larger [רָעָרָה] and a smaller. Comp. NEUMANN, II., S. 383), to harness the horses (to the chariots) and to mount. פָּרָשִׁים designates the horses for riding in distinction from carriage-horses in 2 Sam. i. 6; 1 Kings v. 6; Joel ii. 4;

Ezek. xxvii. 14. This usage being established, and the parallelism favoring the meaning "equi," I believe that הַפָּרָשִׁים is to be translated not in the vocative, but as in the text: and mount ye riders. Of the other expressions in ver. 4, the first, after horses and riders, must refer to the footmen, the rest, as in ver. 3, to all species of arms.—In the second act of the first picture, the prophet sees the army defeated: Why, I see, are they dismayed? Comp. xxx. 6. As הַכָּה (they) is the nominative and הָרָא requires the accusative after it in a still higher degree than הָרָא, our passage cannot, as GRAY supposes, be explained by Ezek. xxxvii. 19 coll. Gen. vi. 17, but I see must be taken as a parenthetical sentence.—The description closes significantly with two perfects, the prophet sees the tottering and falling as accomplished facts. Comp. ver. 12.

Vers. 7-12. Who is he . . . fallen together. The second battle picture is more in detail, more concrete, and as it were painted with specifically Egyptian colors. The prophet sees the Egyptian army approaching like the overflowing Nile. The immediate preparations for the battle are described in ver. 9, as in ver. 4, only still more concretely. Cavalry, chariots and footmen are equally distinguished. I am therefore of opinion that we must render עָלָה here as in ver. 4 "mount the horses."—The chariots are to rage (comp. Nah. ii. 5), the mighty warriors to go forth on foot. Egypt's neighboring nations accompany the expedition, and the Ethiopians and Lybians are described as shield-bearers, and therefore masters of close combat (co-minus), the Lybians (comp. Gen. x. 13 coll. 22; Isa. lxvi. 19; Ezek. xxvii. 10) as archers. The three nations stand together, as here, as Egyptian auxiliaries in Ezek. xxx. 5 coll. Nah. iii. 9. On Lydians לִיִּדִים, comp. ARNOLD in HERZOG, Real.-Enc., VIII., S. 510.

All these preparations, however, do not ensure the victory, it being ordained that the day of battle shall be a day of vengeance for Jehovah, and a bloody sacrificial festival. Egypt both in ancient and more recent times has injured the theocracy, and now stands opposed to the chosen instrument of the Lord, Nebuchadnezzar, and must therefore be subdued.—Day of vengeance. Comp. li. 6; Isa. xxxiv. 8; lxi. 2; lxiii. 4.—Sacrifice. A slain offering, where the original meaning of the verb (comp. Numb. xxii. 40; 1 Ki. i. 19) comes into the foreground, but the word must not be taken in its literal signification. Comp. Isa. xxxiv. 6; Zeph. i. 7. In the last two verses the consequences of the lost battle are described. Egypt is ironically called upon to fetch balm from Gilead (comp. rems. on viii. 22). But the blow was fatal. Therefore remedies are of no avail, to however great extent applied. The fearful defeat cannot of course remain hidden. The nations must learn the shame of Egypt, since the cry of the stricken ones fills the world (xiv. 2 coll. Isa. xlii. 11). Ver. 12 b contains a step backwards, an additional statement of reason. This is occasioned by the evident endeavor to close the second picture in correspondence to the first.

3. THE SECOND PROPHECY AGAINST EGYPT.

XLVI. 13-26.

With an Appendix, xlvi. 27, 28.

- 13 The word that the LORD [Jehovah] spake to Jeremiah the prophet, how [concerning the coming of] Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, should come and [to] smite the land of Egypt.
- 14 Proclaim ye it in Egypt and publish it in Migdol, Publish it also in Noph and Tahpanhes.
Say ye, Stand fast¹ and prepare thyself;²
For the sword hath devoured thy neighbors.
- 15 Wherefore is thy bull³ dragged away?
He stood not, for Jehovah thrust him away
- 16 He causeth many to totter;
One also falleth upon another:
And they say, Up! let us return to our own people,
And to the land of our birth, from the murderous sword.
- 17 There they cry:⁴ Pharaoh, king of Egypt, is lost;⁵
He hath lost the time through neglect!
- 18 As truly as I live, saith the king,
Jehovah Zebaoth is his Name;

it to some Egyptian word unknown to us. Why Pharaoh is ruined the prophet proceeds to tell us. כוֹנֵן is the appointed season (Gen. i. 14; xvii. 21; xxi. 2, etc.) עֵבֶר of passing over a time is quite usual (comp. ex. gr., viii. 20; Job xxx. 15).

⁶ Ver. 20.—קָרַץ. The word occurs here only. The root קָרַץ signifies "to pinch, press together" (of the eyes Prov. vi. 13; x. 11; xxxv. 19, of the lips Prov. xvi. 30) then "to pinch off" (Job xxxiii. 6). קָרַץ is then pinching, pinching off, or that which pinches. The old translations are vacillating: LXX. ἀπόσπασμα; Chald. עֲקִיבֵי קָטְלוּן populi interfectores; Syr. exercitus; Vulg. stimulator. Attaching himself to the last ROSENUELLER translates stimulus; COCCIEUS, SCHULTENS, BUCHHORN, HITZIG, GRAF, MEIER, gad-fly [Bremse], comparing the Arabic quarsa, papugil (pulcr), quāris, insectum cincti simile, or quirs, a kind of small fly. Much more unsuitably EWALD adduces quarsli, and understands by it a great, fearful monster. The meaning excidium, which the Rabbis, GESNIUS, UMBREIT and others attribute to the word, does not correspond very exactly to the specific radical signification. Following this and the Arabic analogies I regard the meaning gad-fly as correct, which suits the connection admirably. Comp. Exod. xxiii. 23; Deut. i. 44; vii. 20; Isa. vii. 18; Ps. cxviii. 12. [BLAVNEY translates "breeze" though he admits the radical meaning and the Arabic analogies: NOYES has "destruction" as the A. V., NEUMANN, FUERST, etc.—S. R. A.]

⁷ Ver. 20.—The reading פָּחַץ in the LXX., Chald., Syr., Arab., and many codd. of KENNICOTT and DE ROSSI is only a weak correction.

⁹ Ver. 26.—שָׁבַן is used here in the neutral sense, as in Isa. xiii. 20; Jer. xvii. 6, 25; xxx. 18; i. 13, 39.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This prophecy cannot be regarded as an immediate contemporaneous continuation of the previous one. 1. The title announces it as an independent passage. There is not the slightest ground for regarding this as a later addition, for it contains nothing which Jeremiah could not himself have written. 2. In ver. 26 Nebuchadnezzar is mentioned by name. Jeremiah never does this before the battle of Carchemish. As now we must assign the passage xlv. 1-12 to the period immediately before that battle, it follows that the present passage must have originated at a later period. 3. If the superscription in ver. 13 expresses nothing with regard to the time of composition, but only states the main purport of the passage, it is yet clear that a prophecy concerning the coming of Nebuchadnezzar more probably originated at a time in which Jeremiah demonstrably expected this coming than at a time of which we have no trace that the prophet cherished this expectation. The prophet does not express the definite expectation that Nebuchadnezzar will come to Egypt, before xliii. 8-13. Previously, indeed, we have a general declaration, that Egypt will succumb to him (xxv. 19; xlv. 11, 12) but none purporting that he will himself enter the country. It is therefore much more probable that this passage is contemporaneous with xliii. 8-13 than that it belongs to the time of xlv. 3-12. The reason, which GRAF urges against this hypothesis, that Jeremiah there prophesies the conquest of Moab, Edom, Ammon, etc., in consequence of the battle of Carchemish, but with respect to Egypt, had contented himself with a song of triumph over its defeat, is not of weight; for evidently Egypt is the most important of all the countries, against which chh. xlv. - xlix. contain prophecies. It is hence no matter of surprise, if we have two prophecies against it, of which the first (xlv. 3-12) treats of the defeat and destruction of Egypt in general (xlv. 11, 12), the second specially of the latter.

This prophecy, like the preceding one, evidently consists of two halves. In the first the Egyptian cities are summoned to equip themselves against the approaching enemy (ver. 14); then the thought is expressed, that all, which is great in Egypt, Apis (ver. 15) the foreign auxiliaries (ver. 16), Pharaoh (ver. 17) must bow before the greatness of the Chaldean prince, who approaches like Tabor among the mountains and Carmel in the sea, in order to carry away the Egyptians into captivity (vers. 18, 19). In the second half the quantitative conception seems to prevail. Egypt is a fair, fat cow, but a gad-fly from the North brings destruction to it (ver. 20). Their mercenaries also, who are here compared to fatted calves, flee (ver. 21). Egypt is further compared to a forest, in which stand innumerable trees. Yet there is only a hissing like a snake in a thicket, while the enemies proceed to cut down the trees (vers. 22, 23). Finally it is proclaimed in blunt words, without a figure, that Egypt with its gods, its kings, and all who trust in them, must be given into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar, but that a time will come, in which Egypt will be inhabited as quietly and undisturbed as of old (vers. 24-26). The two halves are distinguished thus: 1. The Egyptian power is described from its intensive and qualitative, in the second from its intensive or quantitative side. 2. The first half closes with the prospect of exile, the second with a consolatory outlook into a distant but happy future.

Ver. 13. The word . . . Egypt. The superscription is of the larger kind, but in the form which occurs besides only in xlv. 1 and i. 1. It is indubitable that such a superscription introduces a specifically new passage. The only question is, Who composed this, the prophet himself or a later writer, who had no right to do it? No reasons can be urged against its composition by the prophet, either general or special. The form לְכוּא, both alone and with a second infinitive depending on it, is very common in Jeremiah; it is found more frequently in him than in any other book of the Old Testament. (Comp. xxxvi. 5; xl. 4; xli. 17; xlii. 15, 17, 22; xlv. 12; xlvi. 16). ל also after a verb. dicendi is Jeremian. Comp. xxviii. 8, 9.

Ver. 14. Proclaim . . . thy neighbors. Egypt is alarmed, before all the boundary-cities. On Migdol, Noph and Tahpanhes, comp. rems. on ii. 16; xlv. 1.—Immediate preparations are necessary, since the surrounding countries, the neighbors, have already been devastated by the hostile sword. Comp. xxi. 14; xlvi. 17, 39; xlix. 5.

Vers. 15-19. Wherefore . . . without an inhabitant. The three heads of Egypt are Apis, the army consisting of foreigners, and the king. The overthrow of this triad is here described. With respect to the form it is noteworthy that the transition is made with the same turn from the summons to prepare and the description of the defeat as in ver. 5.—The Apis, which had hitherto in divine majesty enjoyed most undisturbed existence in his temple, is now dragged away like a common ox to the slaughter, and can make no resistance, for it is Jehovah who thrusts him on, as it were, from behind. Numb. xxxv. 20; Ezek. xxxiv. 21. It is Jehovah, likewise, who causes great defeat among those upon whom the power of Egypt in war depended. Since the time of Psammetichus foreign mercenaries (מִצְרַיִם, xxv. 20; Ezek. xxx. 5) composed the main strength of the Egyptian forces. (Comp. DUXCKER, I., S. 922); but they are unable to resist the enemy whom God sends against them. They therefore flee to their homes.—Falleth upon another. Comp. xxix. 9, 26.—Murderous sword. Comp. rems. on xxv. 38.—The king himself finally, whom the Egyptians adored as an incarnation of the deity (comp. DUXCKER, I., S. 150, "The Egyptians went further in their exaltation of their rulers than any other nation, even according to divine worship to their despots") becomes an object of ridicule.—Lost the time. These words signify that he has allowed the time to pass by. What time? The gracious respite appointed by Jehovah? Not impossibly. The prophet then places the confession in the mouth of the Egyptians, that they have not followed the advice given them in xxv. 15 coll. xxvii. 8. In contrast to this humiliation of the Egyptian king the prophet exalts (verse 18) the greatness of the true king, the King of all kings, the Lord of hosts, Jehovah, and that of His chosen servant and instrument (xxv. 9; xxvii. 6), the king of Babylon. Jehovah, who is called king also in xlvi. 15; li. 57, swears solemnly by Himself (xxii. 5, 21; xlv. 26), that he, who is not indeed here mentioned by name, but is plainly recognized from the connection, viz. the king of Babylon, will on his expedition to the other kings be as Tabor to the mountains rising to the north of it (comp. RAUMER, Pal. S. 37) and will present himself as Carmel seen from the sea, for this "looks like a watch-tower westward over the Mediterranean" (RAUMER, S. 45). In such circumstances should it fare better with Egypt than with Judah? No, the former also cannot escape captivity. He is therefore called upon to prepare himself for this.

פְּלִי גִּוְלָה— (comp. Ezek. xii. 3 sqq.) are a very necessary equipment, such as exiles are allowed to take with them. As the capital of Judah was not spared, so the capital of Egypt, Memphis, shall be destroyed (comp. ii. 15).

Vers. 20-23. A finely formed heifer . . . no number. In a new double picture Egypt's destruction is here portrayed. These pictures refer, as already remarked, more to the extent and quantity of the Egyptian forces, the first setting forth their volume, the second their numerical strength. Accordingly Egypt is first compared to a state-cow, which is of course to be regarded as well kept. We are involuntarily reminded of Pharaoh's fat kine in Gen. xli. 18.

גִּוְלָה is moreover a young cow, but one which has attained its full vigor, for it may be three years old (xlvi. 34; Isa. xv. 5; Gen. xv. 9), give milk (Isa. vii. 21, 22), be already trained (Hos. x. 11), draw the plough (Jud. xiv. 18), but also may still rejoice in the untamed wildness of its life (xxi. 18).—This cow is to be attacked by a gad-fly coming from the north, from whence Jeremiah is accustomed to see the Chaldeans coming (comp. i. 14, etc.). [BLAYNEY and WORDSWORTH find here a probable allusion to the legend of Io, who was transformed into a heifer, and driven by a gad-fly into Egypt, where she was worshipped as Isis. Comp. VING, Georg., III., 147; OVID, Metam. Lib., I.—S. R. A.]

The double is coming portrays the vehemence of the assault. Comp. Ezek. vii. 6; Ps. xvi. 13. The same fullness and breadth are seen in the well-kept mercenaries as in Egypt itself. (Comp. HERON., II. 158; DUXCKER, I., S. 922). They are fattened calves, and consequently lazy, as is seen in their fleeing instead of fighting.—Turn. Comp. rems. on ver. 5.—Day of destruction. Comp. Deut. xxxii. 35; Jer. xviii. 17.—Time of visitation. Comp. x. 15; i. 27.—In a second picture it is described how the forces of the Egyptians, though so great in number, are overcome. Egypt is in this behalf compared to a forest, which serves for the abode of a serpent. The serpent has retired into a thicket. It is only heard to hiss. Thus the ancient power of Egypt, which led Ezekiel to compare it to a crocodile (xxix. 3; xxxii. 2), is come to an end. It is only a serpent hissing with impotent rage in a thicket. It no longer attacks nor bites, for it is afraid. There is also reason for this. For the enemies rush upon it with power (לְחֵץ, comp. Zech. iv. 6); they come upon it with axes (comp. xlix. 9) as hewers of wood. Whether this figure is occasioned by the circumstance that the Persians, Massagetes, and Scythians made use of battle-axes, as GRAF supposes, or whether it has no connection with this, must be left undecided.—Ver. 23. With their axes the enemies hew down the forest, i. e. they kill the warriors, destroy the fortifications and supplies. This forest is not to be otherwise come at, for it is unsearchable, impenetrable. A thin forest may be taken possession of by going through it, but a thick, impenetrable one must be cut down tree by tree. The enemies can do this, for they are more numerous than the locusts.—Not to be searched (הַקָּר) I would not refer to the enemies, 1. on account of the sing. number; 2. because then the same thought would be expressed three times.—In the following context the thought of Egypt's subjugation is expressed without a figure.

Vers. 24-26. The daughter . . . saith Jehovah.—Put to shame. Comp. ii. 26; vi. 15; xlviii. 1; 1. 2, etc.—The God of Israel, who is more powerful than the gods of the Egyptians, declares that He will visit the Amon of No (the highest deity of the Egyptians, comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc. 1., S. 286, which had its seat in Thebes, hence called נַאֲמֹן Nah. iii. 8; comp. ib. X., S. 392), Pharaoh and the land itself, and further all the other kings (i. e. those entitled to be so) and gods, and finally Pharaoh and the entire mass of those who trust in him as a god. (Comp. rems. on ver. 17). The style is here very broad and verbose, in order to express the completeness of the destruction. All these shall fall into the hands of those who seek their life (comp. rems. on xlv. 30), and be given into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar and his servants.—And afterwards, etc. If we compare on the one hand ver. 19, and on the other passages like xlviii. 47; xlix. 6; xlix. 39, it appears in the highest degree probable, that here at the close a favorable prospect is to be opened up to the Egyptians. In the days of old, ancient Thebes, of which no one knows when it was built, was peaceful, unassailed and prosperous. A remembrancer of this condition can be understood only as a word of blessed promise.

Appendix to the Prophecies against Egypt; a Consolatory Declaration to Israel.

XLVI. 27, 28.

- 27 But fear thou not, my servant Jacob,
 And be thou not dismayed, O Israel;
 For behold, I will save thee from afar
 And thy seed from the land of their captivity,
 And Jacob shall return and be at rest,
 And quiet, and none shall make him afraid.
 28 Fear thou not, my servant Jacob,
 Saith Jehovah, for I am with thee.
 For I will make a full end of the nations,
 Whither I have dispersed thee:
 But I will not make a full end of thee,
 I will correct thee in measure and not leave thee unpunished.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

This brief consolatory passage is reproduced here from xxx. 10, 11. The discrepancies are slight. In ver 27 נָאֵם is wanting after עֲבָדִי יַעֲקֹב. In ver. 28 the initial words of ver. 27 are repeated to יַעֲקֹב with אֲנִי appended, which is not the case in xxx. 11. Further, in xxx. 11 לְהוֹשִׁיעֶנָּה stand after אֲנִי אֲתֵּן; instead of הַרְחִיקֵנוּ we find in xxx. 11 הַפְּצִינוּךְ; finally, in the latter place אֲתֵּן אֶךְ stands for אֲתֵּן.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

It is acknowledged that these words stand in the original and suitable connection in ch. xxx., as well as that they are not necessary to ch. xlv., and would not be missed if they were omitted. Still it may be said that every injury befalling the enemies of the theocracy is a corroboration of the latter, and that it cannot be unsuitable also to express in words this mutual relation founded in the nature of the case, the two going constantly hand in hand in chh. 1., li. (Comp. 1. 4-6, 17-19, 28, 33; li. 5, 6, 10, 35, 45, 50). But the overthrow of the Babylonian kingdom by Cyrus bore the deliverance of Judah immediately in its womb. This can be said of the conquest of Egypt no more than of that of the other small nations against which chh. xlvii.-xlix. are directed. Hence in these three chapters there is no trace of that mutual relation. Why then just here? And how does it agree with the fact that elsewhere in Egypt Jeremiah pronounces only the severest threatenings against the Israelites (chh. xlii.-xlv.)? There is much then that is opposed to the genuineness of the passage, while on the other hand it is easy to suppose that a later seer saw fit to oppose this light to the former shadow. Moreover, as we have said, the words are not absolutely unsuitable here, and we cannot therefore deny the possibility, that Jeremiah, who, as is well known, is very fond of quoting himself, himself felt the need of causing the light of Israel to shine brightly on the dark background of their ancient enemy, Egypt.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. FÖRSTER states four reasons why the prophets had to proclaim judgment on the heathen nations also. The first is διδασκαλικός: it is to be known that the prosperity of the heathen is not lasting, but that heathendom has no basis of true prosperity. The second reason is παρηγορικός: the pious are not to fear that the heathen will get the upper hand and suppress the church. The third is ἐπανορθωτικός: God's people are to guard against forming alliances with the heathen and trusting in their help. The fourth is ἐλεγκτικός: a conclusion is to be drawn a minori ad majus: if God does not spare the heathen who are deprived of His light, how much less will He spare His people, if they despise the light of His word.

2. "Jeremiah's God is also the Lord of all the heathen and makes their destinies. They find it so according to their words and especially their posture towards the chosen people Israel. They haste to their destruction, for one nation only is eternal; this, however, is the nation which has been passed through a thousand sieves and in comparison with others is no nation. That which is in Israel, as in other nations, passes away, and only that which it has above other nations remains eternal. Jeremiah prophesies most against Egypt, Moab and Babylon, in which the wealth, the jealous, scoffing manner of the mean world, and the cavalier spirit of great states is rebuked. . . . He who rightly understands this sees here not sermons addressed to generations long since passed away, but to the natural humanity streaming through this world, as it is continually presented with new names and yet always with the same carnal impulses and based on the same unreason. To him, who thus understands Jeremiah, he is again alive, and the Jewish legend is fulfilled, that Jeremiah must come again before the Messianic kingdom can bloom up again in glory. Yea, let Jeremiah rise truly for thee to mourn, and Christ, with the hosannas of His eternal hosts of disciples, will not longer be hidden from thee, and in Him thou wilt have all things." DIEBRICH.

3. On xlv. 6. "The race is not to the swift. Eccles. ix. 11. Therefore let not the strong man glory in his strength. Jer. ix. 22. Also are horses and chariots and such like things of no avail: for to those who have not God on their side, all is lost." CRAMER.

4. On xlv. 10. "God may long delay His reckoning. This Pharaoh-necho had killed the pious Josiah, conquered his son Jehoiachaz and laid the land of Judah under tribute. But guilt rusts not, however old, and though God comes slowly He comes surely." CRAMER.

5. On xlv. 10. "Although the ungodly go free for a long time and rejoice with timbrel and harp and are glad with pipes and spend their days in wealth (Job xxi. 12), yet he lets them go free like sheep for the slaughter, and spares them for the day of slaughter (Jer. xii. 3)." CRAMER.

6. On xlv. 25. "Bonum confidere in Domino et non in principibus (Ps. cxlvi.). When their help is most needed they lie down and die." FÖRSTER.

7. On vers. 27, 28. "When God turns things upside down and takes care that neither root nor branch remains, His little flock must be preserved. The punishments which redound to the destruction of the ungodly redound to the amelioration of the golly. For from these He takes the eternal punishment, and the temporal must also redound to their advantage, but the ungodly drink it to the dregs." CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xlv. 1-12. The power of God in contrast to human power. 1. Human power confides in its strength; (a) in a qualitative (vers. 3, 4, 7); (b) in a quantitative respect (ver. 8). 2. The divine power strikes it down, whereby (a) arrogance is chastised (vers. 5, 6, 11); (b) the righteousness of God is satisfied (ver. 10).

4. PROPHECY AGAINST THE PHILISTINES.

CHAP. XLVII.

- 1 The word of Jehovah, which came to Jeremiah, the prophet, against the Philistines, before Pharaoh had smitten Gaza.
- 2 Thus saith Jehovah:
Behold, waters rise out of the North,
And become an overflowing torrent,
And overflow the land and whatever is therein,
The city and those that dwell therein;
And the men shall cry aloud,¹
And all the inhabitants of the country shall howl,
- 3 Before the thundering hoof-beat² of his horses,³
Before the rattling of his chariots,⁴ the rumbling of his wheels.
Fathers, for feebleness⁵ of hands, turn not for their children,

- 4 Because of the day that cometh to extirpate all the Philistines,
To exterminate from Tyre and Sidon every escaped one that might help;
For Jehovah extirpates the Philistines,
The remnant of the coasts of Caphtoz.
- 5 Baldness is come upon Gaza,
Ashkelon is struck dumb,⁷ the remnant of their valley.
How long wilt thou still wound thyself by cutting?
- 6 Alas! sword of Jehovah, how long ere thou wilt rest?
Back⁸ into thy sheath, rest and be still!
- 7 How canst thou rest? Jehovah has given it a charge Against Ashkelon and against the sea-shore—
Thither⁹ has he appointed it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 2.—In regard to the construction, there are only two principal verbs from 2 b to 4 a: וְנִעְקָוּ and הִפְנוּ. Evidently whatever comes before the latter depends on the former, and what follows on the latter.

2 Ver. 3.—שָׁעֲטָהּ ān. ley. From analogies like לָעֵץ and לָעֵץ and בָּעֵץ and קָיָם and קָיָם (Samar.), בָּיָל and בָּעֵל (comp. FUERST, II.-W.-B., s. v. בָּיָל) there can be no doubt that the radix is identical with שָׁטַח, which appears to me, according to שׁוּט flagellum, שָׁטָם (Ezek. xxvii. 8, remiges, remigare=remis percutere), שָׁטַח (strike out, discurrere), to have the radical signification of “beating.”

3 Ver. 3.—אֶבְרִי. Comp. rems. on xlvi. 15.

4 Ver. 3.—רָעַשׁ לְרִכְבוֹ. The construction with ל seems to proceed here from a striving after change. Otherwise in ver. 6. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 67, 2.

5 Ver. 3.—רַפְּיוֹן is ān. ley.

6 Ver. 4.—לְהַכְרִית. Comp. xlv. 7. We should expect עֲזָרָה שְׂרִיד. But the radical meaning of שְׂרִיד is not reliquus, but clapsus. Hence the meaning of the expression is not “every helper remaining,” but “every escaped one that might help,” i. e. even the weakest, separated, ineffective helper.

7 Ver. 5.—If we should take נִדְרָהָה in the sense of “being destroyed,” the prophet must have suddenly dropped his figure. I therefore take דָּרָה, with GRAF, in its original meaning=דָּכַם (comp. Ps. xlix. 13), and regard this being made dumb as a lower grade, or preliminary, of destruction, for Philistia still supplicated and according to ver. 7 b the enemy has still to take Ashkelon and the sea-coast.

8 Ver. 6.—דָּאֲכַפ־, put up thyself. Comp. Ezek. xxi. 35.

9 Ver. 7.—The emphatic repetition of the object by שָׁם is the reverse of the anticipatory construction, which occurs more frequently in Jeremiah. Comp. ix. 14; xi. 15; xli. 3; li. 56, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

From the North the prophet sees the hostile hosts approaching like great water-floods against the Philistines. Terror will seize these to such a degree, that fathers will not once look round after their children. Then will the Philistines be extirpated even to the last remnant, and the last helper be taken from the Phœnicians (vers. 2-4). Gaza and Ashkelon will fall, for the consideration that the sword of the Lord has already had enough bloody work, and will now stand still before the last of these cities, does not hold good (vers. 5-7).

Ver. 1. The word . . . smitten Gaza. According to history Jeremiah lived to see one, and possibly two conquests of Gaza by Pharaoh, for Herodotus relates (II., 159): Σήροισι περὶ ἧ ὁ Νεκὸς συμβαλὼν ἐν Μαγδόλω ἐνίκησε· μετὰ δὲ τὴν μάχην Κάδυστην πόλιν τῆς Συρίας εὐθὺς ἐξῆλθεν εἰς αὐτὴν. Thus after the battle of Megiddo (for this is admitted to be Μάγδολος) Pharaoh-necho conquered Gaza. That Κάδυστις is Gaza (according to the Egyptian Katatu; comp. DUNCKER, I., S. 342, 818) is now generally acknowledged. Comp. M. NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Bab., S. 369; ARNOLD in Herzog, R.-Enc. IV., S. 672; GRAF ad h. loc., S. 523; DUNCKER, etc.—Possibly Gaza had also been conquered by Psammethichus. He took Ashdod, according to Herodotus (II., 157), after a twenty years' siege. DUNCKER is correctly of opinion “that the siege of Ashdod could not well be undertaken, before Gaza and Ashkelon had been captured” (S. 816, Ann.). Jeremiah must have survived the capture of Ashdod, for he speaks in xxv. 20 of the remnant of Ashdod. This must also have occurred in the second decennium of his prophetic labors, since Psammethichus cannot have commenced his expeditions against the Philistines before B. C., 640 (comp. DUNCKER, S. 816). If then Jeremiah did witness a conquest of Gaza in consequence of the undertaking against Ashdod, it was yet an event of relatively small importance. Gaza appears by no means to have been destroyed, for in the same passage, where Jeremiah speaks of the remnant of Ashdod (xxv. 20), he speaks of Ashkelon, Gaza and Ekron, as cities still intact. It is inconceivable that this capture of Gaza, which if it took place, was of secondary importance, could be the occasion of this prophecy, since the words “before Pharaoh smote Gaza,” can be understood only of a celebrated, well-known conquest of Gaza. Any other must have required a more particular designation. Add to this, that when Jeremiah prophesies the visitation of Philistia, and mentions the cities to be destroyed by name, he could not have left Ashdod unmentioned, if the great and celebrated siege of this city was then in progress. From his not mentioning it, we may with safety conclude that the capture of this city was already a fact in the past. From all which it follows that the superscription must refer to the capture of Gaza by Pharaoh-necho, which, Herodotus says, took place after the battle of Magdolos or Megiddo. Two points are now to be observed:—

1. This capture took place before the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the battle of Megiddo occurring in B. C. 608 (comp. DRUCKER, S. 817). It is perfectly intelligible that Necho, who, as we have seen above, landed with his army in the bay of Acco, sought to keep his retreat open by subjugating the large fortified cities of Philistia, especially Gaza, the key of the road to Egypt. He would have been lost after the battle of Carchemish, if he had not taken these precautionary measures. Accordingly the present prophecy belongs not to those which Jeremiah published in the year 604, after the battle of Carchemish, but is older. It agrees with this, that in this chapter the Chaldeans and Nebuchadnezzar are not mentioned, but an enemy from the north is spoken of generally.

2. If now the waters rising from the north (ver. 2) are the Chaldeans, as according to Jeremiah's constant usage they must be, this superscription has not the sense that it asserts the fulfilment of the prophecy by the conquest of Gaza which soon followed on the part of Necho, but on the contrary it is to declare, that Jeremiah prophesied destruction to the Philistines by an enemy from the north, at a time when conquest by an enemy from the south was impending. It might indeed be alleged that Jeremiah understood by the "waters from the north" the Egyptians, because they were then making their attack on Philistia from the north. This, however, was only an accidental circumstance which Jeremiah would certainly have designated as such. It was natural that at a time when the Egyptian forces, after the battle of Megiddo, were turned against Philistia, Jeremiah should find occasion for a prophecy against this country, but that at this time he should designate its destruction as the work of a northern enemy, corresponds perfectly to the character of that prophet who buys land which is in possession of the enemy (ch. xxxii.), and proclaims to the Jews in Tahpanhes, that the throne of the Chaldean king will stand before the gates of the royal palace (ch. xliii.) I do not think that the capture of Gaza was made by the army of the Egyptians returning defeated from Carchemish. I lay no great weight on Herodotus' placing it immediately after the battle of Magdolos, yet it is in itself improbable that Necho could have deferred the capture of "the key to Egypt" so long, or have accomplished it with his defeated army.

Vers. 2-4. Thus saith . . . coasts of Caphtor. The figure of an overflowing stream is frequently used of armies. Comp. ex. gr., Isa. viii. 7; Jer. xli. 7.—From the north. Comp. i. 13-17.—And overflow. Comp. viii. 16.—The city, etc. Comp. xli. 8.—On turn not. Comp. xli. 5. The exhaustion caused by the terror of that day will hinder even parents from going to the help of their children. A similar expression, but in a different sense, is found in Mal. iii. 21; Luke i. 17.—The prediction of ver. 4 was soon afterwards fulfilled. The Phœnicians in the dis-trass caused by the Chaldeans which followed the destruction of Jerusalem, must have grievously missed the aid of their Philistine neighbors.—The remnant, etc. Comp. Am. ix. 7; Gen. x. 14; Deut. ii. 23; Ezek. xxv. 16; Zeph. ii. 5. It is certain that a part of the Philistines originated from Caphtor, but not whether by Caphtor we are to understand Creta or the coast of the Egyptian delta (so STARKE, Gaza, S. 76). Comp. HERTZ. R.-Enc., the articles "Philistia," "Creta," and "Caphtor."

Vers. 5-7. Baldness . . . appointed it. While in the previous context the catastrophe is designated as still future, it appears here in great part to have occurred. The prophet in spirit sees the country already in the hands of the enemy. Gaza, the strong southern fortification, the key of the country is, as it were, a head shaven bare (comp. ii. 16); Ashkelon, the seaport, the mouth of the stream of traffic, is a mouth struck dumb. It is not yet, indeed, destroyed like Gaza, but its gates are closed. No one any more goes in or out, for the enemy is before them.—Remnant of their valley. In the topography of Philistia a hilly country (in the east), and a low country may be distinguished. Comp. VAHNINGER'S art., Philistia in HERTZ. R.-Enc. XI., S. 553. Although the proper name of this low land is שְׁפֵלָה, it is yet possible that גִּזְזָה also may be put for it (comp. 1 Sam. xxxi. 7). It must further be admitted that Ashkelon and Gaza are not inappropriately termed the remnant of the valley, for they were the strongest cities: the enemy coming from the north through Judea, has beset the hill region (שְׁרֵיטָה, Josh. x. 40; xii. 8. Comp. VAHNINGER, ut sup.); in the low country Gaza and Ashkelon resist the longest; when these are fallen, the last remnant of the low lands, consequently the whole land, is in the power of the enemy.—Their and the following sentence how long, etc., refer to the whole Philistia. These self-woundings were a heathen custom in conjunction with earnest supplication of their deities (comp. 1 Ki. xviii. 28; HERTZ. R.-Enc., Art. Baal). The prophet then represents the Philistines here as humbling themselves. They perceive that it is the God of Israel, who is bringing this judgment upon them (comp. 1 Sam. v.), they therefore appeal to Him after their manner for grace. The prophet tells them, however, that this can no longer help them, the judgment having already begun with the facts intimated in ver. 5, a. This explanation appears satisfactory. I cannot, therefore, conclude to read with GESENIUS (Theo. s. v., גִּזְזָה, HITZIG and GAFF after the LXX., אַנְקִים) (Anakim), much as this reading has in its favor, affording, as it does, a suitable supplementation to "remnant of the coasts of Caphtor," ver. 4, and an appropriate allusion to Gath, the chief residence of the last of these giants (1 Sam. xvii. 4; 1 Chron. xx. 5-8). Alterations of the reading are to be permitted only in cases of extreme necessity. The words of ver. 6 contain the import of the supplications accompanying the self-woundings. There seems to me to be an intimation that these were the words of the Philistines in the expression of Jehovah (יְהוָה), for though not bad

Hebrew, it has a foreign sound and makes the impression that the speakers attribute the sword raging against them only unwillingly and hesitatingly to Jehovah. In vi. 25; xii. 12, the construction is different.—In ver. 7 the prophet answers the petition of ver. 6. In the first clause attaching himself closely to the question, a change of person is thus occasioned, as so often in Jeremiah. Comp. v. 14; xii. 13; xvii. 13; xxi. 12 (Chethibh), xxxvi. 29, 30; xlvi. 3, 9.—The sea-shore is used in Ezek. xxv. 16 also of Philistia, but it is not impossible that, as GRAF supposes, it may refer also to the Phenicians of ver. 4. It also intimates that the enemy will advance from the East. Comp. xxiii. 19, 20; xlvi. 10; Isa. lv. 10.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Among all the neighboring nations the Philistines were those who showed enmity to the Israelites longest and with most success. For from the times of Shamgar (Jud. iii. 31) down to Hezekiah (2 Ki. xviii. 8), they were both hostile (comp. עֲלֵי אֶרֶץ, Ezek. xxv. 15), and dangerous neighbors. Even Israel's great heroic and victorious period, the time of Samuel, Saul and David, did not result in rendering these opponents perfectly innoxious (comp. 1 Ki. xv. 27; xvi. 15; 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17; xxviii. 18). Ezekiel even mentions them among those who delighted with malicious joy in the fall of Jerusalem. Since now it is perfectly natural that the theocratic prophecy should include the Philistines and reckon the destruction of these old enemies among the bright points in Israel's future (comp. Isa. xi. 14; xiv. 28, 29; Obad. 19; Am. i. 6; Zeph. ii. 4; Ezek. xxv. 15), our prophecy is probably the earliest of Jeremiah's predictions against foreign nations. As, however, Jeremiah in ver. 6 predicts a humbling of the Philistines, so Zechariah their complete conversion to the Lord and their reception into Israel (ix. 7).

HOMEILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On xlvii. 1. The inviolable majesty of the divine word has nothing to fear from an apparent momentary violation. Jeremiah predicts too the Philistines' destruction by an enemy from the north, at the moment when an enemy from the south was about successfully to assail them.

3. On xlvii. 6. "The terribly pathetic discourse which the prophet here holds with God's sword, should remind us; 1, that no calamity comes, but by the Lord's will; 2, that it goes no further than God will; 3, that it will not cease before God will." CRAMER.

5. PROPHECY AGAINST MOAB (CHAP. XLVIII).

Although Israel had received the command by Moses, not to oppress or make war on the Moabites (Deut. ii. 9), the Moabites, on their part acted in a most hostile manner towards Israel, and according to Balaam's counsel (Num. xxxi. 17), did them greater injury by seducing them to idolatry, than they could have done with weapons of war. In consequence of the command given by Moses, the Israelites took possession of none of the country of the Moabites, but the Arnon, which had formed the boundary line between the Moabites and Ammonites (Num. xxi. 13; Jud. xi. 18), now formed that between Moab and Reuben (Deut. ii. 36; Josh. xiii. 9). From this time the history of the relations between Israel and Moab falls into two periods. The first extends from the occupation of the transjordanic country to the subjugation of the Moabites by David (2 Sam. viii. 2). During this period many struggles took place between the two nations with varying success (Jud. iii. 12 sqq.; 28 sqq.; 1 Sam. xiv. 47). The second period embraces the subjection of the Moabites under David and his successors (after the division under the kings of Israel) to their revolt after the death of Ahab (2 Ki. i. 1; iii. 4, 5). The third period again is one of hostility with varying success (2 Ki. iii. 6-27; xiii. 20), but closes with the occupation of the region to the north of the Arnon by the Moabites in consequence of the deportation of the East-jordanic Israelites by Tiglath Pileser (2 Ki. xv. 29; 1 Chron. v. 6, 26). The fourth period embraces their entire subsequent history. In this the only account we have of wars between the two nations is, that Moabitish troops were sent against Jehoikim after his revolt from the Chaldeans (2 Ki. xxiv. 2). Under Zedekiah we see the Moabites in league with Israel against the common enemy, the Chaldeans (Jer. xxvii. 1-3), of which Josephus (Ant. X., 9, 7) records that Nebuchadnezzar in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem subjugated the Ammonites and Moabites. In this fourth period fall the other prophecies against Moab, with the exception of the brief oracle, Am. ii. 1-3, viz., those of Isaiah (ch. xv. and xvi. coll. xxv. 16-19) Zephaniah (ii. 8-11), Jeremiah (ch. xlviii.), Ezekiel (xxv. 8-11).

No proof is needed that Jeremiah had occasion to direct a prophecy against this old hereditary foe. The account in 2 Ki. xxiv. 2 shows that even specially at that time the disposition of the Moabites was hostile to Judah; for this prophecy certainly belongs to the time of Jehoikim and before the fourth year, the Chaldeans and Nebuchadnezzar not being mentioned. The form of the superscription favors its contemporaneity with the first prophecy against Egypt (xlv. 1. 2). Comp. rem. on that passage.—Jeremiah's object in this prophecy was evidently to reanimate, as it were, the former declarations of similar purport, and comprise them together for the sake of a powerful total effect. From ver. 29 onwards, there is a constant, more or less free, use of older utterances. Of special importance appeared to our prophet the prophecy of Isaiah, itself reproducing an older oracle (Isa. xvi. 13). He makes very extensive use of it, particularly of vers. 29-38. Amos also (comp. כְּנִי-שָׂאוֹן, ver. 45, and הַקְרִינֹת, vers. 24 and 41, with Am. ii. 2). Zephaniah (comp. הַנְרִיל, vers. 26 and 42, with Zeph. ii. 8, 10) and even older utterances of the Pentateuch (comp. vers. 45, 46 with Num. xxi. 28, 29; xxiv. 17) have not been left unemployed. Thus the prophecy has not only become very long, but many unevennesses have been produced by the introduction of foreign matters. MOYERS and HUTZIG have thus been misled to assume various interpolations. GRAF, however, has satisfactorily rebutted these attacks on the integrity of our text. As regards the structure of the discourse, it consists, according to the peculiarity of Jeremiah's style, in pictures of various extent, of which we number eleven. The first five are predominantly occupied with the description of the punitive judgment breaking in upon Moab (vers. 1-25), while the four following (vers. 26-42) have the reasons of this judgment for their subject. The last two pictures (vers. 43, 44, and vers. 45, 46) are related to the two main divisions as supplements, in so far as they contain nothing new, but draw only on two older sources, viz.: 1, a drastic passage by Isaiah, which moreover has nothing to do with Moab; 2, some declarations of the book of Numbers referring to Moab. The last verse is a consolatory glance forming a conclusion to the whole.

1 AGAINST MOAB.

- Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, the God of Israel:
 Woe unto Nebo, for it is laid waste!
 Confounded and taken is Kiriathaim!
 Confounded and broken to pieces is the citadel [Misgab].
- 2 The glory of Moab is departed.
 In Heshbon they have spun evil against her.
 "Up! and let us cut her off from being a nation!"¹
 Thou also, O Madmen, art made mad [feeble].²
 Behind thee cometh the sword.
- 3 Hark! Crying from Choronaim—
 Desolation and great ruin.
- 4 Broken in pieces is Moab!
 They cry aloud towards Zoar.³
- 5 For the ascent of Luhith is ascended with weeping, with weeping.⁴
 For on the descent of Choronaim are heard the oppressors⁵ of the cry of woe.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 2.—Whether הַרְבִּי is Kal or Niph'al, is doubtful. Both are possible. The Niph'al meaning would correspond best to the connection. Comp. OLSH., § 243 d, with EWALD, § 140 b.

³ Ver. 3.—I concur with GRAF in reading צוֹרְקָה, following the LXX., instead of צִיְוֹרָה. In Isa. xv. 5, which passage the prophet had in view here, the fugitives of Moab flee צִיְוֹר, and in ver. 34 of this chapter, צִיְוֹר is mentioned with Choronaim. The reading צִיְוֹרָה which appears also to have led the LXX. astray, so that they write Zoyōpa instead of Σογγογ, as they elsewhere render צִיְוֹר (Gen. xiv. 2; xix. 22 sq.; Isa. xv. 5) seems to have arisen in a similar manner with שׁוֹכֵעַ, אֹשֵׁיהוּ, etc. Comp. rems. on xvii. 23. The analogy of xiv. 3 finally produced the alteration into צִיְוֹרָה.

⁴ Ver. 5.—יִיגְלוּ is a paronomasia with יִגְלוּ; grammatically it is the third person singular impersonal. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 101, 2 b. Instead of the second כִּי, we have כִּוּ in the passage in Isaiah. It is natural to suppose that here כִּי arose from a blending of the following כִּי with the preceding כִּי, in consequence of its distinct or defective writing of the vowel. DELITZSCH also (Jes., S. 207) attributes the reading to a mistake. It is not, however, to be denied that Jeremiah may possibly have written כִּי. Then it would be more advisable to take the second as an emphatic rhetorical repetition of the first with omission of the preposition (comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 8), than to give it the part of the subject. For, when we compare cases like יִגְלוּ בְּשָׁנָה יִשְׁנָה בְּשָׁנָה יִגְלוּ, we must not forget that here the immediate juxtaposition of the two assonant words is essential.

⁵ Ver. 5.—Comp. צִיְוֹר with accus., and following יָגַל as a designation of the term, ad quem; Jul. ix. 31; Isa. xxix. 3, and on the construct state, as a substitute for the preposition, NAEGELSB. Gr., § 61, 5 c. In accordance with the exegesis of this passage, as given below, we are neither to take צָרָה as an abstraction=angustia, nor with HITZIG to read צָרָה (צָרָה), and regard this as the literal name, and connect it as a gloss with צָרָה, meaning the same, nor with GRAF to take צָרָה (which does not once occur in old Hebrew) in connection with צָרָה=cry of murder.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet proclaims destruction to Moab by, as it were, sketching a great picture, in which we not only perceive the abomination of desolation embracing and, as it were, enveloping the whole country, but also distinguish particular points marked by glaring colors. In the enumeration of the cities there is a general progress from north to south.

Against Moab. The superscription leans for support on xlvi. 2. Comp. the introduction to chh. xlii.-li.

Ver. 1. Thus saith . . . citadel. That the mountain Nebo is not meant, is seen from the verb, both in its sense and form (fem.). The city of Nebo (comp. ver. 22; Num. xxxii. 3, 38) was situated, according to the Onomasticon of JEROME, eight Roman miles south of Heshbon, while Mt. Nebo was six miles west of this city. Comp. RAUMER, Paläst., S. 265.—Kiriathaim (comp. ver. 23; Gen. xiv. 5; Num. xxxii. 37; Josh. xiii. 19; Ezek. xxv. 9) is one of the oldest cities of the East-Jordanic district. BERKHARDT (Travels in Syria, II., S. 626) found ruins of a place called Et-Taim, half an hour west of Medaba, which, however, does not well harmonize with the statement of JEROME, who places Kaplaða (Koroiatha, Kiriathaim), ten Roman miles west of Medaba. Comp. RAUMER, S. 263, 4 et pass.; HERZ. R.-Enc., VII., S. 710.

The citadel [Misgab]. It is very probable from the context that a definite locality is meant, for otherwise either the citadel of the last mentioned city must be intended, or the citadels of Moab generally. In both cases, however, we should expect the word to have a suffix. Hence the chief fortress of the Moabites, Kir-Moab, or Kir-heres (comp. vers. 31 and 36; Isa. xv. 1; xvi. 7, 11; 2 Ki. iii. 25) has been correctly understood. No appeal can be made in behalf of this view to Isa. xxv. 12, since it is extremely questionable whether a definite locality is there intended. Comp. DRECHSLER on Isa. xxv. 12. On Kir-Moab, comp. HERZ. R.-Enc. VII., S. 558 sqq.

Ver. 2. The glory . . . the sword. From vers. 29, 30, we see that the Moabites were inclined to proud self-praise, but we cannot here take the word translated glory in the subjective sense, as the whole strophe has for its subject the destruction of real objects. It is, therefore, here as in Deut. xxvi. 19; Jer. xiii. 11; li. 4, the subject of their glory.—The name of the city Heshbon gives occasion for a play upon words. We translate "span" after the example of MEYER. Heshbon was then in the possession of the Ammonites (xlix. 3). On arriving at the boundary the enemy projects his plan of attack. Comp. rems. on ver. 45. After the deportation of the East-Jordanic tribes by Tiglath-Pileser (2 Ki. xv. 29; 1 Chron. v. 26), the Moabites appear to have taken possession of their territory. Hence Isaiah (xv. 4; xvi. 8, 9) mentions Heshbon among the Moabitish cities. The Ammonites must have come subsequently into possession of the city. Comp. GRAF, S. 554; VON RAUMER, S. 262 and 269, 270.—A place called Madmen, in Moab, is not expressly mentioned elsewhere, but there seems to be a trace of it in the figure of the dung-pit (Isa. xxv. 10), to the choice of which Isaiah may have been occasioned by the existence of such a place, as JOSEPH KIMCHI supposed. Besides a בְּרִכְתָּה is mentioned in Benjamin, Isa. x. 31; אֲרֵבְרָה in Judah, Josh. xv. 31; אֲרֵבְרָה in Zebulun, Josh. xxi. 35. Hence בְּרִכְתָּה here also is not to be taken as an appellative, as some modern commentators would do, following the LXX., Vulg. and Syr., but as a proper noun.

Vers. 3-5. Hark . . . cry of woe. From Choronaim (comp. Isa. xv. 5) a loud cry is heard, and at the same time the noise of the city falling into ruins. Comp. iv. 6; vi. 1; i. 22; Is. lix. 7; lx. 18.—GRAF has made it very probable that by Moab in ver. 14 is to be understood, not the country, but the city (Num. xxi. 28; Isa. xv. 1; Num. xxii. 36). The mention of several cities in connection, and the feminine gender of the verb (comp., however, the masculine in ver. 11) favor this. I refer also to Num. xxi. 15, where עָרַי alone seems to be given as the name of the city.—The first hemistich of ver. 5 is taken almost verbatim from Isa. xv. 5, there being a difference only in the last words. As we have Luhith in Isaiah, without any difference in reading, we are justified in following the Keri, which has the same here. From the other reading (לִּיחֹת)=tables, boards) a suitable sense can be wrung only with difficulty. "Est usque hodie vicus inter Areopolim (i. e., Ar-Moab) et Zoarum nomine Lulitha," says JEROME in the Onomasticon. By For the declaration of the preceding verse, that the inhabitants of Ar-Moab cry towards Zoar, is explained, viz., the ascent of Luhith, which is on the road designated, they are seen to ascend weeping.—In the second half of the verse we find a much altered copy of the second half of the verse in Isa. xv. 5. Instead of "in the way of Horonaim" it is in Jeremiah, "in the descent of Horonaim." The present form of the text appears to me to betray an effort after greater distinctness and closer correspondence to the topography. Hence the ascent of Luhith is opposed to the descent of Horonaim. He who would go from Ar-Moab to Zoar, would have to go down a declivity at Horonaim, and ascend an elevation at Luhith. Similarly VITRINGA on Isa. xv. 5, only that he makes Luhith come first after Ar-Moab and Horonaim afterward, which, however, evidently contradicts the connection: In Isaiah it reads "they raise a cry of destruction," and here it might be objected, how could those who go up by Luhith weep, because they raise a cry at Horonaim? When the ascent of Luhith is taking place, the descent of Horonaim lying in the rear is vacant. Or are the people of Horonaim supposed to have remained behind, when the stream of fugitives passed through from Ar-Moab? How could this stream raise a cry at Horonaim while ascending Luhith? They might, however, be anxious when they heard the oppressors behind them at Horonaim. I therefore think that צָרָה, which has given the commentators so much trouble, and produced so many curiosities of exegesis, is quite correct. צָר is the oppressor; for צָר is premere, urgere aliquem hostili modo. The genitive is to be taken in that wider and freer sense, which the construct state so frequently has. The oppressors of the cry of woe are those who cause the cry by their oppressions.

2. Summons to flight, which yet will not secure safety.

XLVIII. 6-10.

- 6 Flee, save your lives!
But they shall be¹ like a forsaken one² in the wilderness.
- 7 For on account of thy confidence in thy bungling work³
And in thy treasures shalt thou also be taken,
And Chemosh shall go into captivity,
His priests and his princes together.⁴
- 8 And the spoiler shall come upon every city,
And the city shall not be delivered;
The valley also shall perish,
And the plains shall be devastated—as⁵ Jehovah hath spoken.
- 9 Give wings⁶ unto Moab, for it will flee forth.
But its cities shall be desolation
Without any to dwell therein.
- 10 Cursed be he who doeth Jehovah's work remissly,
And cursed be he who keepeth back his sword from blood.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 6.—וְהָיָה נֶהְיֶה. If the condition to be expected as a consequence of the flight were to be designated, וְהָיָה or הָיָה would be grammatically more correct. Hence I take וְ in the adversative sense, and the Imperf. as a simple announcement. The plural of the third person refers to the ideal plural contained in the collective נֶפְשֵׁיכֶם.

² Ver. 6.—It has been with reason supposed that פְּעִירֵיךָ is to be read instead of פְּיִרְוֵיךָ, according to the analogy of xvii. 6. The opinion that the strange word was also the name of a city, and indeed of the well known Aroer, may easily have given occasion to the reading of the text. The ancient translations vacillate: the LXX. translate ὄρος ἀγέλιος (פְּעִירֵיךָ). Vulg.: myrica (virgultum humile et spinosum); Syrus: truncus arboris, stips. All these renderings lack proper etymological foundation. GASENIUS (Commentary on Isa. vii. 2), and in his Theaurus (S. 10, 74), fixes the meaning of rudra, ruina, on פְּיִרְוֵיךָ itself, but for this also there is no etymological basis.

⁴ Ver. 7.—יָהּ (Chethibh) does not occur elsewhere in Jeremiah. In the parallel passages, also, we find יְהוָה.

⁶ Ver. 9.—נְצַנְיָהּ from the radical meaning micare, promicare, has also the meanings of "forehead-late" (of the high-priest, Exo 1. xxviii. 36-38), "flower," and "wing," in which last it occurs here. In Chaldee it is used for ala, Is. cxxxix. 9; for fin Lev. xi. 9. Comp. Buxtorf's Lex. Chald., p. 1907. The choice both of this word and the following נְצַנְיָהּ seems to have been occasioned by an effort at paronomasia. For נְצַנְיָהּ also (properly נְצַה, Comp. נְצִיץ, wing; Ezek. xvii. 3, 7; Job xxxix. 13—the נ for the sake of uniformity with הַנְּצַנְיָהּ. Comp. Nægel's Gr., § 93 d. Altn.), is ἀτάξ ἀεγούρον.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This strophe portrays the destruction threatening Moab by summoning the people to flight, but at the same time distinctly declaring that this would not avail. This summons is made in a double gradation: 1. Moab is simply called upon to flee (ver. 6 a), but it is directly remarked that Moab would only barely escape and then be recaptured (vers. 6 b-7 a), and that in consequence the entire people, idols, priests and princes at their head, would be carried into captivity, while all remaining immovable property would be destroyed (vers. 7 b, 8). 2. The means of flight are offered to Moab in a figure (9 a) but, as the second half of the verse briefly intimates, the end will yet be the same, namely, devastation (ver. 9 b). It cannot also possibly be otherwise, for the Lord makes known His fixed resolution to destroy Moab, by threatening remissness or forbearance in the work of destruction with His curse (ver. 10).

Vers. 6-8. Flee . . . hath spoken. The call to flee is evidently intended ironically, for the announcement directly follows that the condition of the fugitives will be an extremely wretched one, that they will indeed be again taken.—Like a forsaken one,—like Aroer. Three Aroers are known; in Judah (1 Sam. xxx. 26), in Gad (Num. xxxii. 34; Josh. xiii. 25; Jud. xi. 33; 2 Sam. xxiv. 5), and in Reuben (Deut. ii. 36; iii. 12; iv. 18; Josh. xii. 2; xiii. 9; Jud. xi. 26). The first cannot possibly be meant. How one of the two others, whether that on the Arnon, or that further to the north, in the vicinity of Rabbath-Ammon, can be called "Aroer in the wilderness," it is difficult to perceive. For if even on the basis of Isa. xvii. 2, the city be supposed to be then destroyed, it is yet strange that a destroyed city should be designated as situated "in the wilderness," since this expression by no means involves the idea of destruction. Hence I have adopted the alternate reading proposed, which is favored by what follows. Neither a city, nor a tree, nor ruins, can flee and be taken, but this may easily happen to one nudatus et desertus in the wilderness. The causal sentence, ver. 7, has then the sense: thy flight will no longer procure thee protection, as one forsaken in the desert finds out, for thou also (like other nations) wilt be taken. And this will be the punishment of Moab for having founded its happiness on false supports.—Chemosh (the Chethibh כְּמֹשׁ is perfectly unique) was the national god of the Moabites and Ammonites (1 Ki. xi. 7; 2 Ki. xxiii. 13; Jud. xi. 24). Moab is, therefore, called the people of Chemosh (ver. 46; Num. xxi. 29); accordingly here, also, his princes are called princes of Chemosh. The idol goes into captivity when his image is carried away. Comp. xlix. 3; Am. i. 15; Hos. x. 5, 6. The passage Am. i. 15 seems to have been in the prophet's mind here, as in xlix. 3.—Ver. 8 describes the destruction of the immovable property; cities, valleys (all river-valleys in antithesis to elevated plains and mountains), and plains (כְּשֹׁרֹת the plateau of Rabbath-Ammon, south as far as the Arnon. Comp. Deut. iii. 10; iv. 43; Josh. xiii. 9, 16, 17, 21; xx. 8; RAUMER, Pal. S. 71 ff.)

Ver. 9. Give wings . . . therein. In comparison with ver. 6 there is evidently a progress here; there it is a mere call to flight, here the call is to afford Moab the only still imaginable means for this, viz., wings. The one call is as ironical as the other. There is a strengthening of the irony in the word "for," which designates the fleeing away as the object not of the speaker, but of Moab. Comp. Isa. xvi. 2.—The second half of the verse corresponds as a brief synopsis to all that has been mentioned from ver. 6 b to ver. 8, as the result of the first summons (ver. 6 a). The expression is as in xlvi. 19; xlix. 17; li. 43; iv. 9, etc.

Ver. 10. Cursed . . . from blood. These words are the foil to the foregoing description. On this background the irony appears in its full strength. From these words we perceive what was the true meaning of the summons to flight, and how much more bitter the severity is rendered by these contrasting announcements (ver. 6 b-ver. 8; ver. 9 b). Moab's destruction is designated as the work of the Lord, because this is no more than the execution of a decree of judgment pronounced by Him. Comp. xxv. 31; xlvi. 10; li. 6.—Remissly. Comp. Prov. x. 4; xii. 27.

3. The Transfusion.

XLVIII. 11-13.

- 11 Moab hath been at ease from his youth,
And he lay still on his lees,
And was not drawn off from one vessel to another,¹
Neither hath he gone into exile:
Therefore hath his taste remained in him,
And his fragrance hath not changed.
- 12 Therefore behold, the days are coming, saith Jehovah,
That I will send unto him tilters, who shall tilt him up,
And empty his vessels and dash his dishes in pieces.
- 13 And Moab shall be put to shame by Chemosh,
As the house of Israel was put to shame by Bethel, their confidence.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 11.—On לֹא־לֵךְ for לֵךְ comp. rems. on x. 1.

² Ver. 12.—הִיָּצַדְתָּ, incline, only here and ii. 20 in Jeremiah. In הָיָה הַיַּיִן the object is Moab, or the wine representing it; since it is to be mentioned what is made empty there must be another object to הִיָּצַדְתָּ, and as נֶבֶל (originally a leather bottle, and then cadus, urceus; comp. xiii. 12; Lam. iv. 2; Isa. xxx. 14) offered itself as a paronomasia [alliteration] to הִיָּצַדְתָּ, it is given as the third object, though really the object remains the same. In order to render the alliteration we have translated, after LUTHER, [BLAYNEY, NOYES, WORDSWORTH] "tilters" and "tilted;" [COWLES: emptyers; and the former after MEIER, render "dash" and "dishes."—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In a very palpable figure the prophet compares Moab with wine, which has never been drawn off into another cask and has therefore retained its taste and scent unchanged (ver. 11). The Lord will transfuse Moab and cause his old cask to be broken in pieces (ver. 12), and then, like Israel, he will be put to shame by his idols.

Vers. 11-13. Moab . . . their confidence. Since the Moabites took the land from the original inhabitants, the Emims (Deut. ii. 10), they had generally remained in quiet possession of it. They had never been carried into captivity, as had been the case with Israel in their stay in Egypt and the deportation of the ten tribes. That this is the meaning of the figure is expressly declared in ver. 11, by the words neither hath he gone into exile. It seems to me doubtful whether Jeremiah has reference to Isa. xxv. 6; at any rate, on account of the difference in the main thoughts, the reference can be only cursory and verbal. Essentially the same thought, however, is expressed in the same words in Zeph. i. 12, whence it is probable that Jeremiah had this passage in mind. Four points are distinguished: 1. As a basis the fact that Moab has never been transfused. 2. The primary consequence that its taste and odor have remained. So far as this refers to the outward status rerum, a great degree of national prosperity is thus designated. In so far, however, as the words refer to the inward habitus, or to their relation to God and connected with this to His people, they express a sense unfavorable to Moab. They declare that Moab has never been thoroughly purified, never been freed from its enmity to the Lord and His people. 3. As a secondary consequence, it is mentioned, that a time of visitation is impending on Moab, since it cannot possibly be privileged against such a season. The instruments of the visitation are designated, in accordance with the figure in ver. 11, as coopers, who are to tilt up the old casks, empty and then break them in pieces. 4. As the final result it is mentioned that Moab will be put to shame by Chemosh as Israel by Bethel. The long undisturbed quiet was physically considered a benefit to Moab, but spiritually a gracious opportunity which it did not make use of. Hence Moab must become wise, like Israel, by loss and suffering (comp. 1 Ki. xii. 28-33).

4. The Vanity of Human Glory.

XLVIII. 14-17.

- 14 How can ye say, we are heroes
And strong men for the war?
- 15 Desolated is Moab and his cities go up,¹
And his best young men go down to the slaughter, Saith the King, Jehovah Zebaoth is his name.
- 16 Moab's destruction is near approaching,
And his calamity hastens on apace.²
- 17 Bemoan him, all his neighbors,
All ye, who know his name,
Say, how is the mighty stem broken,
The splendid rod!

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 15.—The singular הַיְּלָה is certainly surprising, but the alteration of the text to הַיְּלָהִים (the spoiler of Moab and his cities goes up) [as J. D. MICR., EWALD, GRAF, BLAYNEY], seems to me unnecessary. I believe that Jeremiah had in view the passage in Jud. xx. 40 (הַיְּלָהִים כָּל־הַיְּלָהִים הַשְּׂמֵרָה), and that thus the sing. masc. is explained, which moreover in the principle of the ideal number (the entirety of the cities regarded as a unit. Comp. NAEGLSB. Gr., § 105, 4 a) has a grammatical support.

² Ver. 16.—Comp. Isa. xiii. 22; lvi. 1; NAEGLSB. Gr., § 95, 3 b.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

All human glory is turned to shame, whether one glorify himself, as, according to ver. 14, Moab had done, to which the destruction of all his warlike power stands in strong contrast (ver. 15), or good friends and neighbors praise us. These may soon and easily find occasion (ver. 16) to turn their song of praise into a lamentation.

Vers. 14, 15. How can . . . his name. In opposition to Moab's boastful glorying in his warlike strength, desolation is announced in general and destruction according to a just Nemesis of the main objects of his glorying: the fortified cities, which seemed to rest immovably on their foundations, must fly away in smoke;

the strong youths, who aimed high, must go down to slaughter.—Go down, etc. Comp. Isa. xxxiv. 6, 7; Jer. 1. 27; li. 40.—Saith, etc. Comp. xli. 18; li. 57.

Vers. 16, 17. Moab's destruction . . . splendid rod. So near and certain is the destruction of Moab that his neighbors and friends are called upon to bemoan the overthrow of this power so highly extolled hitherto by themselves.—Bemoan him. Comp. xv. 5; xvi. 5; xxii. 10.—Neighbors (comp. xli. 14; xlvi. 39; xlix. 5), literally those round about him, therefore most intimately acquainted with him, ye who know his name, being the more distant acquaintances. (Comp. the related expressions in Ps. lxxxvii. 4; Job xix. 13; xlii. 11; Ps. lvi. 14; lxxxviii. 9, 19).—The mighty stem. Comp. Ps. cx. 2; Ezek. xix. 12, 14.

6. Message to the Fugitives on the Arnon.

XLVIII. 18-25.

- 18 Come down from thy glory and seat thyself in the thirsty,¹
Thou inhabitant daughter of Dibon!²
For the spoiler of Moab is advancing against thee,
He destroyeth thy strongholds.
- 19 Place thyself by the wayside and look out,
Thou inhabitress of Aroer;
Ask of the fugitive and her who is escaped!³
Say, What hath been done?⁴
- 20 "Moab is confounded, for she is broken down."⁵
Howl and cry!⁶
Proclaim it on the Arnon, that Moab is destroyed;
- 21 And judgment has come on the land of the plain,
On Holon and on Jahazah, and on Mephaath,
- 22 And on Dibon, Nebo and Beth-diblathaim,
- 23 And on Kiriathaim, Beth-gamul and Beth-meon,
- 24 And on Kerioth and Bozrah,
And on all the cities of the land of Moab, far or near.
- 25 The horn of Moab is broken off,
And his arm is shattered"—saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 18.—Judging from the parallel passage (Isa. xlvii. 1) we must read with the Keri יִשְׁכַּח צָמָא everywhere else signifies thirst. "To seat one's self in the thirst," however, sounds very strange. We must then either punctuate צָמָא, or regard צָמָא as a collateral form of צָמָא (comp. לָבֵן with לָבֵן, Gen. xlix. 12; חֶלֶב with חֶלֶב, Exod. xxiii. 19). In Latin also silentia is used for regiones aride. Comp. PLIN. Hist., N. X. 73; XII. 23; XXV. 11.

² Ver. 18.—"שבת בת-דיבון." This form of expression is found besides here only in xli. 19. The construction is as in בתגילת פת ציון, Isa. xxxvii. 22. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 64, 4.

³ Ver. 19.—"ונמלטה." The different gender is to express the variety. On the irregular accentuation of נמלטה comp. OLSH., S. 253 and 363.

⁴ Ver. 19.—"On היתה" and its difference from the masc. (the idea of multiplicity involved in the feminine) comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, 6 b.

¶ Ver. 29.—The alteration of the Keri (to accord with the following קִרְיָתִי) is unnecessary, since the fem. form of the imperf. evidently attaches itself to the preceding קִרְיָתִי, etc. Accordingly it is Aroer, which is addressed, not Moab.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

An animated picture! First some concrete forms of cities are directly addressed: Dibon is to go down, Aroer to question the fugitives (vers. 18, 19). The answer of the latter is sad enough. Arrived on the Arnon, where Aroer is situated, and thus on the borders of the mishor, they proclaim that it is at an end with Moab, for all the cities of the northern half of the country are taken (vers. 20-24). From this it follows as the total result, that the power of Moab is broken (ver. 25).

Ver. 18. Come down . . . thy strongholds. Isa. xlvii. 1 was here in the prophet's mind, "Come down and sit in the dust, O virgin daughter of Babylon."—On Dibon, which, as we conclude from thy strongholds, was a fortified city and was situate a league north of the Arnon, comp. Num. xxxii. 3, 34; Josh. xiii. 9, 17; Isa. xv. 2; RAUMER, Pal. S. 261.

Ver. 19. Place thyself . . . done. To the inhabitants of Aroer, the southern boundary city of the קִרְיָתִי (comp. rems. on ver. 8) the sad summons is addressed to go out into the street, to spy out (comp. Nah. ii. 2) and then to make inquiries from the approaching train of the fugitives.

Vers. 20-25. Moab . . . saith Jehovah. These verses contain the answer of the escaped. —Judgment. The choice of the expression is occasioned by the mishor, plain, which signifies not merely plain, but segitas, justitia. Comp. Ps. xxix. 11; xlv. 7; lxxvii. 5. Judgment is thus to come upon the land, whose name also signifies "land of righteousness." The cities mentioned afterwards are all in the Mishor. Holon (different from another in Judah, Josh. xv. 51) is mentioned here only. Jahaza (Comp. Isa. xv. 4; Num. xxi. 23; Josh. xiii. 18; Jud. xi. 20) lay, according to ERSEBATS and JEROME, in the vicinity of Medaba. Comp. RAUMER, S. 263.

—Mephaath is elsewhere called מִפְעָת (Josh. xiii. 18) or מִפְעָת (Josh. xxi. 37; 1 Chron. vi. 64). According to the passages cited from the book of Joshua it belongs to the tribe of Reuben and to the Mishor.—Dibon. Comp. rems on ver. 18.—Nebo. Comp. rems. on ver. 1.—Beth-diblathaim is not mentioned elsewhere in the Old Testament. Its position is clear from the statement of JEROME, that Jahaza was situated between Medaba and Diblathaim. (Vid. Oronasticon s. v. Jaffa).—Kiriathaim. Comp. rems. on ver. 1.—Beth-gamul occurs here only. If PORTER is correct in recognizing Bozrah, Kerioth and Beth-gamul in the present ruined cities of the Hauran, Bosra, Kureiyeh and El Jemal, we have here three cities not in Moab, but separated from it by the entire territory of the Ammonites. Comp. RAUMER, Pal. S. 251, 2. This hypothesis is, however, improbable, since real Moabitish cities can be shown for Bozrah and Kerioth. See below.—Beth-meon was named in full Beth-baal-meon (Josh. xiii. 17); elsewhere Baal-meon (Num. xxxii. 38), and is designated among the other places as belonging to the Mishor and to the tribe of Reuben. Comp. RAUMER, S. 259 and 261.—Kerioth. Comp. ver. 41 and Am. ii. 2. SEETZEN found a place on Mt. Attarus (comp. קִרְיָתִי Num. xxxii. 34, 35) called El-Karriât, which he decidedly regards as Kerioth not Kiriathaim. Comp. RAUMER, S. 251, 2.—Bozrah. There is a Bozrah mentioned as in Edom (comp. rems. on xlix. 13) and one as in the Hauran, but the latter not in the Bible. It was the Bostra of the Romans, the birth-place of Philippus Arabs. Immense ruins still testify to the importance of the city. Comp. RAUMER, S. 244. Since, however, a place בִּצְרָה in the Mishor is expressly mentioned (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8; xxi. 36), and since the LXX. always render this name by Bocop, we do not hesitate to recognize בִּצְרָה in this בִּצְרָה.—And on all the cities, etc. From the context it can only be the cities to the north of Aroer which are meant, for according to ver. 19 sqq., the fugitives announce to the people of Aroer that both the cities further to the north, and also those more to the south in the vicinity of Aroer were already taken. From this it follows that the whole northern half of the country was in the hands of the enemy, and consequently Moab's horn and arm (the biblical types of dominion and strength, comp. Ps. lxxxv. 5, 11, 1 Sam. ii. 31; Ps. x. 15) are broken.

¹ Ver. 26.—קִפַּץ an onomatopœitic word, denotes originally "to spank, to clap." Comp. קִפַּקְתִּי עַל יָרֵךְ, xxxi. 19. Then it is frequently used of striking hands: Num. xxiv. 10; Job xxxiv. 37; Lam. ii. 15.—שִׁפְךָ is used in part for קִפַּץ (Job xxvii. 23), and in part as an independent root with meaning sufficere. In the latter signification it occurs, however, in the Hebrew of the Old Testament only in the imperfect שִׁפַּךְ (1 Ki. xx. 10), and (perhaps) in the Hiphil (Isa. ii. 6), and besides (perhaps) the substantive שִׁפְךָ (Job xxxvi. 18). Yet in consequence of the interchange of the related radical קִפַּץ occurs in Job xx. 22, as also in the Aramaic קִפַּץ and קִפְקִנָא in the sense of sufficiency and superfluity. Here it is evident that the rendering "that Moab had superfluity in his vomit"¹ (MEIER) is feeble, and moreover unsafe, since the prefix בִּ is striking, and it is not proved that the meanings of sufficiency (of the things) and of having a superfluity (of the persons) are united in the verb. The common radical meaning of קִפַּץ to strike, to clap, gives a perfectly satisfactory sense. Comp. Isa. xix. 14.

³ Ver. 27.—שִׁפְךָ=object of derision as in Job xii. 4.

⁴ Ver. 27.—The fem. נִמְצְאָה is unjustly suspected by the Masoretes. Comp. rems. on הֲרָתָה, ver. 20.

⁵ Ver. 29.—נֶאֱדָר is an adjective (Comp. Isa. ii. 12; Ps. xciv. 2), and to be referred to Moab.

⁶ Ver. 30.—Isa. xvi. 6 concludes with לֹא־בָן פִּרְיֵי עֵשֶׂי. Here the words לֹא־בָן עֵשֶׂי, also are added. And the Masoretes punctuate so as to connect פִּרְיֵי with עֵשֶׂי as its subject. We cannot, however, doubt that פִּרְיֵי, in accordance with the fundamental passage, belongs to לֹא־בָן. It would then be "the nothingness (comp. 2 Ki. xvii. 9; Prov. xv. 7) of his boastings (Isa. xlii. 25; Job xi. 3)," while the words עֵשֶׂי לֹא־בָן seem to declare the nothingness of his deeds.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

To ver. 42 the prophet describes specially the judgment of God on the criminal arrogance of Moab, which he manifested particularly towards Israel and Israel's God. First, generally, (vers. 26-30) the disgraceful fate of a drunken man, who falls into his own vomit (ver. 26), is announced as a just punishment for the scorn, with which they always treated Israel when chastised by his God (ver. 27), and further, the fate of the dove driven into the fearful clefts of the rock (ver. 28) as a punishment for his insolent and false arrogance (vers. 29, 30).

Vers. 26, 27. Make ye him . . . shookest thyself. A man, who is beastly intoxicated, falls into his own vomit, and how does he provoke to its full extent the derisive laughter of the beholder! So shall it be to Moab for his boasting against Jehovah. This making drunk reminds us of the figure of the cup of wrath (xxv. 15 coll. xiii. 13). As there, those who make drunk are those whom the Lord has appointed His agents in executing the punishment.—Magnified himself. Comp. ver. 42. The expression seems to be taken from Zeph. ii. 8, 10, an older prophecy against Moab. Comp. also Joel ii. 20.—The objection on the part of Moab that this is too severe a punishment is met with the intimation that Moab had done the same to the Israelites.—When he was found, etc. This is usually also taken as a question. But was not Israel really often caught in thievery and punished for it? Jeremiah expressly affirms this in ii. 26. What reason would Moab otherwise have had for scorning Israel? I therefore regard DN as a participle of time=when, as often as (Num. xxi. 9; Gen. xxxviii. 9). It is then thus admitted that Israel had been more than once caught in criminal conduct and punished, but observe that it is said among thieves. In this there is an allusion to the fact that Israel was only seduced by others, and that the principal thieves, to which Moab belonged, were his heathen neighbors.—Yea, for, etc. This is the answer to the question. We supply Yea.—קָרַי=pro sufficientia, pro ratione (Isa. lxvi. 23; Zech. xiv. 16), comp. xxxi. 20. From the latter passage we see also that (וְ) him is to be referred to thy words.—Shook-est thyself. This may be shaking of the head (comp. xviii. 16) or shrugging of the shoulders, but equally in either case is it an expression of scorn.

Ver. 28. Leave . . . yawning ravine. The preceding figure was adapted to humble Moab's national pride, the present relates to his warlike pride. They boasted greatly of their valor in war (ver. 14), and doubtless also of their excellent fortifications (comp. ver. 18). They are now told that they will be driven from their bulwarks and into the rocky mountains, there like a wild pigeon to pass a troubled, ever threatened existence.—On the walls. The word is found besides only in Isa. vii. 20, where it undoubtedly signifies beyond. עָבַר, however, signifies not merely the side beyond, but the side generally. (Comp. xlix. 32; 1 Ki. v. 4; Exod. xxxii. 15). On the doves in Palestino comp. Heuzog, Real-Enc., XV. S. 425.

Vers. 29, 30. We have heard . . . effected. These two verses are no more than a reproduction, extended by a few additions, of Isa. xvi. 6 in accord with Zeph. ii. 10. In this quotation the prophet expresses the thought, which is expected as a foundation to vers. 26-28, viz., an answer to the question, whence comes on the one hand Moab's scorn towards Jehovah and His people, on the other, the particularly severe punishment of the same? Answer: to the pride of Moab corresponds both his scorn against Israel and the chastisement, which he receives on the part of Jehovah. Hence the prophet labors by an accumulation of terms to describe the arrogance of the Moabites as surpassing all bounds.

2. Moab utterly Destroyed.

XLVIII. 31-35.

- 31 Therefore I howl over Moab,
And over Moab, the whole of it, I cry.
Over the men of Kir-heres there is sighing.¹
- 32 My tears over Jazer flow even to thee, thou vine of Sibmah:
Thy shoots are gone over the sea,
Even to the sea of Jazer they did reach.
On thy fruit harvest and thy vintage is the spoiler fallen;
- 33 And joy and gladness is taken from the fruit fields and the land of Moab;
And I cause the wine to fail from the wine presses;
They will not tread with shouting,—
With a shouting that is no shouting.
- 34 From the cry of Heshbon even to Elealeh,
Unto Jahaz they raise their voice:
From Zoar to Horonaim, the three year old heifer.²
For even the waters of Nimrim shall be desolations.³
- 35 And I destroy Moab, saith Jehovah,
Him who ascends⁴ the high places and burns incense to his gods.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 31.—The correction אֲהַדְנָה, which MEIER allows himself, is unnecessary and not sufficiently authorized by the examples adduced by him (Mic. vi. 10, אֵשׁ for שׁ, ver. 11, אֲזַבְּהָ for זֹבְבָה, רוֹאֵר for רוֹאֵר (רוֹאֵר)).

² Ver. 34.—עִנְלֹת is used of nations in xlv. 20; l. 11; Hos. iv. 16; x. 11. The genitive עִנְלֹת is explained by analogies like עִנְלֹת הַרְרֵי בְנֵי אֲרָם, anno quarti, i. e., numerii (Jer. xlv. 2; li. 59; 2 Kl. xvii. 6), כְּשֵׁפֹת אֲרָם (Lev. xxiv. 22), אֲרָן אֲרָם (2 Kl. xii. 10).

³ Ver. 34.—We have adopted the translation of MEIER [German]—Nimrim nimmer rinnen [Nimrim will never run, which expresses the alliteration of the Hebrew, but is rather a free rendering]. The נ at the beginning of the verse is transferred-from Isaiah, where it is fully in place. In the present passage it can only introduce a single point in corroboration of the main proposition (ver. 31).

Ver. 35.—Is בְּעֵלָה a participle or a substantive? Grammatically the latter is the easier (comp. ver. 5), but the discrepancy with בְּבָטֵר is disturbing. We may take it then in the direct causative meaning (ascensum faciens. Comp. on xlvi. 5, 2), and observe the remark of GRAF that correspondence with this word occasioned the choice of the Hiphil participle.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

After the reason and manner of the judgment on Moab have been set forth in general, the latter is now described more in particular. This is done by the prophet's first expressing (ver. 31 a) what feeling he has in consequence of his knowledge of the destruction threatening all Moab (i. e., no longer merely the northern half as in vers. 18-25), and then turns to single places of the whole land, with special emphasis on the destruction which is impending on the vine and fruit culture of Moab (vers. 32, 33), as well as the worship of the idols connected therewith (ver. 35).

Ver. 31. Therefore . . . there is sighing. This verse begins with a free rendering of Isa. xvi. 7. While there the third person is used, here Jeremiah speaks in the first person, being evidently himself shocked by the fearful import of the message which he has to deliver. Comp. Isa. xv. 5; xvi. 9, 11; xxi. 3 and DRECHSLER ad loc.—In the words, the whole of it, he declares that here he has not merely the northern half of the country, the Mishor, but the whole country in view, mentioning a series of cities from the north to the extreme south (ver. 34).—Over the men, etc. In the original passage it reads "over the raisin-cakes of Kir-hareseth will ye sigh, deeply troubled." There is no need of seeking aid from indistinctly written MSS., it being quite in Jeremiah's manner to substitute for a marked and strange expression, one softer and more usual. He has evidently omitted the concluding words and substituted אֲנָשִׁים (men) for אֲשֵׁי (grapes, raisin-cakes). The second person plural would be in too strong a contrast to the first person in the hemistich, and therefore the third person singular masculine is chosen, which is to be taken in its impersonal sense.

Vers. 32, 33. My tears . . . no shouting. In Isa. xvi. 9 it reads "Therefore I will bewail with the weeping of Jazer." If we take בְּבָטֵר of the text in the sense of a comparison the connection in meaning with the original would disappear, and then no good ground for the comparative is apparent. Jaazer, according to the Onomast. (s. v. Azer and Jazer), was 15 m. p., Sibmah only five hundred paces from Heshbon. They were, therefore, neighboring towns in a fertile district abounding in fruit and wine. Since then they were thus, as it were, sisters, the centres of agriculture closely connected by solidarity of interest, and the blow which strikes one affects the other also, one is not to be bewailed alone, but both at the same time. This is essentially the meaning of בְּבָטֵר (in the weeping over Jaazer is contained also that over Sibmah) and of בְּבָטֵר (Sibmah participates in the tears which flow over Jaazer).—The district of Salt, in the vicinity of which Jaazer must have been situated (comp. RAUMER, S. 262, 3) is still very rich in vines. Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc., XVII. S. 611.

The elements of the two following sentences also are found in Isa. xvi. 8, "branches" only instead of "shoots" and "sea," being wanting before Jazer. The sea of Jazer may denote only a pond or great basin. That the term may be so used is shown by the "sea" in the temple (1 Ki. vii. 23). "The sea of Jazer was probably some celebrated large pond, like the ponds of Heshbon, in which the water of the Wady (Nahr) Sir, which springs near by, was collected. SEEZTEN found some ponds there still." DELITZSCH, Jes., S. 211 [Eng. Tr., p. 334]. RAUMER, Pal., S. 263, Ann. The hypothesis that the repetition of the word sea is based on a scriptural error is therefore unnecessary. The widely extended (even according to Isa. xvi. 7, 8, over the Dead Sea) wine-culture of Moab is poetically represented under the figure of a single vine. Comp. DRECHSLER [and ALEXANDER] on Isa. xvi. 8.—On thy fruit-harvest, etc. Comp. xl. 10, 12. Instead of vintage, which suits the connection better, we find in Isa. xvi. 9 "harvest," and instead of spoiler the more forcible but less distinct "shouting."—And joy, etc., from Isa. xvi. 10. Comp. Joel ii. 20; iv. 15. Carmel (fruit-fields) cannot possibly be a proper noun here. For what occasion had the prophet to make such a spring?

In Isa. xvi. 10, also stands מִן הַכְּרֵמֶל , but there without the following and the land of Moab, and hence evidently in an appellative significance. The prophet would say: joy and gladness having vanished from the vineyards they have departed from the whole country.—And I cause, etc. These words are altered from Isa. xvi. 10 b, in a peculiar manner. Instead of they will not tread with shouting, we read in Isaiah "the treaders shall tread out no wine in their presses." The following words contain the justification of the rendering given. It is emphasized that the treading will be altogether without shouting. A shouting will indeed be heard, not, however, such as pertains to the treading of grapes (xxv. 30), but another, a warlike shouting. The word is elsewhere only applied to war-cries, li. 14.

Ver. 34. From the cry . . . be desolations. These words to their voice are taken, with modifications from Isa. xv. 4. The cry of Heshbon, as it is called in Jeremiah, represents at the same time a place, and consequently serves as a terminus a quo. On Heshbon comp. rems. on ver. 2. Eleath (now El Al) lies only half an hour from Heshbon. Comp. Numb. xxxii. 37; Isa. xvi. 19; RAUMER, S. 261. Jahaz (identical with Jabza, ver. 21) must, according to Numb. xxi. 23 have lain to the south-east, towards the desert. Zoar (comp. ver. 4) and Horonaim (ver. 3) represent the south country of the Moabites. We distinctly meet here the idea of the whole of Moab (ver. 31) in contrast to the limitation, in which Moab is spoken of in vers. 18-25. The individual elements are taken from Isa. xv. 5. There Eglath-shalishiyah appears to stand in apposition to Zoar. In the present passage it is as formally co-ordinated with the name Horonaim. Both are possible only if Eglath, etc., is either a place near both the cities in question, or a predicate equally applicable to both. The latter view is favored by the grammatical structure, for in the former case we should expect עַל־זוֹר (comp. on Jahaz, ver. 21, etc.) In what sense, however, are these cities called Eglath-shalishiyah? KÜSTER (Stud. u. Krit., 1862, I., S. 113 ff.) perceives herein a topographical definition. Eglath was a Tripolis, and "Egla of the third part" is equivalent to the third part of Eglath. Eglath is the principal name, Zoar and Horonaim the names of the two other parts. It is however surprising that of this group of cities, which must certainly have been of some importance, we find no trace elsewhere. We should also expect the reverse order. Shalishah-Eglath, and if Eglath, Zoar and Horonaim form one city, what is the cry from Zoar to Horonaim to mean? DELITZSCH (on Isa. S. 206) [Eng. Tr., p. 336] attaches himself to GESenius and his predecessors (Vulg., Targ.) taking the words to signify "juvæna tertii, i. e., anni" = indomita, jugoque non assueta. Yet he does not refer the predicate to Moab (which can be done in Isaiah only with great harshness, and in Jeremiah not at all) but to Zoar "the beautiful, fortified, hitherto unconquered city." Although the reason why Zoar should be so called is not very transparent, the language compels us to give this exegesis the preference. Whether Horonaim deserved the predicate in the same degree as Zoar is a question of minor importance, for the transference to Horonaim, which is mentioned only one line after in Isa. xv. 5, can be only accidental.—For even, etc. Comp. Isa. xv. 6. If by בְּת־נִמְרַיִם we are to understand Beth-Nimrah, we shall thus be carried into the extreme north-west of the country, not inappropriately to the purport of the strophe. (Comp. the whole, ver. 31). The name and character of Beth-Nimrah favor the identity, for this place at the mouth of the Wady Shaib or Shoëb in the plain of the Jordan is still celebrated for its wealth of springs. Comp. Winer, R.-W.-B., s. v. Bethnimra. Yet it must be confessed, that according to the connection, a place in the South, as the ruined Numère with the spring Moyet Numère (DELITZSCH, S. 207) [Eng. Tr., p. 327], might be meant.

Ver. 35. And I destroy . . . to his gods. The prophet has Isa. xv. 2 and xvi. 12 in mind. What he means by the words בְּנִיבֵיהֶם is not perfectly clear. They may mean, who erects the high places, throws them up (HITZIG) or, who offers on the height (literally: offerers of the height), or who ascends to the height: or, finally, the ascending to the height. Each of these renderings has its light and its shadow. In Isa. xvi. 12, however, the idea of going up to the sanctuary is expressed. Hence I give those explanations the preference which take בְּנִיבֵיהֶם in the sense of ascending.

3. The Lamentation for the Dead.

XLVIII. 36-38.

- 36 Therefore my heart sighs over Moab like flutes,
And my heart sighs like flutes over the men of Kir-heres;
Because the remnant¹ of what was gained has perished.
- 37 For every head is bald, and every beard cut short,
Upon all hands cuttings, and on the loins sackcloth!
- 38 On all the roofs of Moab and in his streets all is lamentation:²
For I have broken Moab like a vessel
Wherein there is no more pleasure, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 38.—In regard to the construction, the abstract stands for the concrete. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 70, 1.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet feels his heart to be, as it were, a mourning flute in view of the great loss of Moab (ver. 36) and this all the more that he perceives in Moab itself on every hand lamentation for the dead (vers. 37, 38 a). This is also warranted, for the Lord has broken Moab like a vessel which has become worthless (ver. 38 b.)

Ver. 36. Therefore . . . perished. This verse is parallel to ver. 31. For 1, both begin with therefore; 2, in both the object of the utterance of feeling is designated as Moab (hardly Ar Moab ver. 4, on account of "whole," ver. 31— and why should Jeremiah have constantly omitted the ער?) and Kir-heres; in both cases an analogous thought is introduced by the particle "therefore:" there the expression of howling and crying, here the sighing of the heart compared with the tone of a funeral flute. "Therefore" in ver. 36 then refers not to the special calamities enumerated immediately before, but to that general description, which we have read in vers. 25-30. Moreover here also the single elements of the discourse are taken primarily from Isa. xv. This employment of foreign property explains much of the unevenness in the arrangement of the sentences. Isa. xvi. 11 and xv. 5 are in the prophet's mind, but he changes the harp, spoken of in Isa. xxi. 11 into the flute, as is correctly remarked, because the flute is the instrument used in mourning, and thus conformity is obtained with the funeral customs afterwards described. On the use of the flute in mournings for the dead comp. Matth. ix. 23. JOSEPH. Bell. Jud. III., 9, 5; OVID Fast. VI., 656; HERZOG, R.-Enc., XVI. S. 364.—Because, etc. The words are from Isa. xv. 7, but there they are the object of the following verb (שָׁחַתוּ) instead of which we here find perished. The words remnant, etc., must therefore be the subject of the verb, since שָׁחַת never means "to lose" but only "to be lost, to perish." The plural of the predicate is explained by the collective meaning of the subject.—עַל-כֵּן is also here taken from Isa. xv. 7, but it cannot possibly signify "therefore" as it does there. So unless we assume an error there is nothing left but to take it as equivalent to עַל-כֵּן אֲשֶׁר, a meaning which is certainly not proved, since this very passage is adduced as the strongest evidence (comp. GESEN., Theo. pag. 669). A double reason is then given for the mourning of the prophet in ver. 36: 1. a mediate, ver. 36 b; 2. an immediate, vers. 37, 38 a. Whence dost thou know that all is lost? From the fact that all mourns.

Vers. 37, 38. For every head . . . Jehovah. Isa. xv. 2, 3 is the original passage. On bald comp. vii. 29; xvi. 6. Instead of cut short (נִרְעָה) Isaiah has "cut off" (נִרְעָה) cessa. In the latter passage however the editions vary. Comp. DELITZSCH, S. 205 [Eng. Tr., p. 325].—Cuttings. Comp. xvi. 6; xli. 5.—Sackcloth. Comp. iv. 8; vi. 26; Joel i. 8.—Roofs. Comp. Isa. xxii. 1; HERZOG, R.-Enc. XVI., S. 363.—All is lamentation. In Isaiah "everything wails, melting into tears."—For I have broken, etc. The ground of the facts which cause the lamentation is, that (not chance, or any human or demonic power, but) Jehovah has broken Moab. In like a vessel, etc., Jeremiah quotes himself, xxii. 28.

4. Pride comes before a Fall.

XLVIII. 39-47

- 39 How is she broken! How do they howl!
How has Moab turned the back shamefully!
And Moab shall become a derision
And a horror to all his neighbors.
- 40 For thus saith Jehovah: Behold like an eagle he flies,
And spreads his wings over Moab.
- 41 Taken are the cities,¹
And the fortresses captured,²
And the heart of the heroes of Moab in that day Shall be like the heart of a parturient woman.³
- 42 And Moab shall be destroyed from being a nation,
For against Jehovah hath he magnified himself.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 41.—קַרְיֹת cannot here as in ver. 14, be a proper name on account of the following בְּעִירוֹת. The plural קַרְיֹת does not indeed occur in an appellative sense elsewhere, but this forms no objection, since the prophet may have chosen this form with reference to the names of the Moabitish cities. Comp. OLSH., § 146 d; 152 a.

² Ver. 41.—On the singular נִהַבְשָׁה comp. NAROELSB. Gr., § 105, 4, b; EWALD, § 317, a.

³ Ver. 41.—The expression אִשָּׁה כֹּצֵרָה (mulier uterum comprimens) occurs here and in xlix. 22 only. On the subject-matter comp. iv. 31.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

With ver. 33 the quotations from Isa. xv. and xvi. cease; the beginning of ver. 39 reminds us of the beginning of vers. 31 and 26; vers. 39 and 41 are evidently closely related, reproducing, as it were, the fundamental thought of vers. 26, 27 that Moab is to become a derision, because he has magnified himself against the Lord. I therefore take vers. 39-41 as one strophe. This begins with an exclamation: how is Moab broken, given up to shameful flight, and thus become an object of ridicule and horror (ver. 39)! This effect corresponds exactly to the cause, for a powerful enemy, comparable to a powerful eagle, is to come upon Moab (ver. 40). In consequence the fortified places are taken, the courage of all the warriors broken (ver. 41), and Moab stricken from the roll of nations. This is his punishment for having magnified himself against Jehovah.

Ver. 39. How is she . . . his neighbors. Moab is here again conceived of as feminine. Comp. rems. on ver. 20. Since this passage was generally in the prophet's mind, הָרָה also must be taken in the meaning which it has there, viz., of being broken. (Comp. Isa. vii. 8). The first result of this being broken is howling. We however take הָרָה as 3d pers. perf., since the imperative here, as afterwards in בּוֹשׁ, does not suit the connection. The further consequence is shameful flight (בּוֹשׁ to be regarded as in the accusative. Comp. Mic. i. 11). From all this it follows lastly that Moab is become two things, a derision (vers. 26, 27) and a terror (xvii. 17) to all his neighbors.

Ver. 40. For thus saith . . . over Moab.

—For is argumentative. The effect corresponds to the cause. The choice of figures is founded on Deut. xxviii. 49, where the people of Israel are assured in case of apostasy of severe judgment, to be executed by a nation coming from afar. In iv. 13 also there was an echo of this passage. It is possible that Isa. xvi. 11 was in the mind of the prophet, even as this present passage lay before the prophet Ezekiel, when in xvii. 3 he used the same figure of Nebuchadnezzar. Who the eagle is here the prophet does not say. If what we have said in the introduction concerning the date of composition of this and the contemporary prophecies against the Nations is correct, the present passage is in so far dissimilar to xvi. 13 in that there Nebuchadnezzar is mentioned just before (ver. 13). Here the non-mention is due to the circumstance that the prophet did not yet know who was the chosen instrument for the execution of the judgment.—And spreads, etc. Here also a passage from Deuteronomy (xxxii. 11) seems to have hovered before the prophet's mind. This however applies only to the expression, for here the spreading of wings is intended in an exactly opposite sense. Comp. also Job xxxix. 26. A repetition of this passage and of the following verse is found in xlix. 22.

Vers. 41, 42. Taken . . . magnified himself. The prophet here passes into the literal style of discourse.—From being, etc. Comp. ver. 2 and Isa. vii. 8.—For against Jehovah, etc. This points back to ver. 26, and here as there is to be regarded as a reminiscence from Zeph. ii. 8, 10. The prophet here brings to a close that part of his prophecy, which has the pride of Moab especially for its object.

III. Two Appendices with a Concluding Word (xlviii. 43-47).

1. Application to Moab of a passage from Isaiah.

XLVIII. 43, 44.

- 43 Terror¹ and ditch [pit] and trap² on thee,
Thou inhabitant of Moab,³ saith Jehovah.
44 He that fleeth⁴ from the terror shall fall into the ditch,
And he that riseth from the ditch shall be taken in the trap;
For I bring upon them, upon Moab,⁵
The year of their punishment, saith Jehovah.

¹ Ver. 43.—פַּחַד fear, terror, is found besides in Jeremiah only in xxx. 5 and xlix. 5.

² Ver. 43.—פֶּתִית pit, only in ver. 28. כַּנּוּ snare, only in the plural, xviii. 22. [The rendering ditch for pit and trap for snare is given to express the alliteration of the original pa'hath, pa'hath, pa'h.—S. R. A.]

³ Ver. 43.—וַיִּשֶׁב כְּמוֹאֵב. This expression is entirely contrary to the usage of Jeremiah, as he never uses the singular in this connection. Isaiah however uses the singular in a similar connection.

⁴ Ver. 44.—The Chetibh הִנְיָם (comp. FURBER, Concord, S. 641, 1365) is a form which does not occur elsewhere, so the Keri would read הִנְיָם after Isaiah. An echo of this passage is found in Lam. iii. 47.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Application of a passage from Isaiah (xxiv. 17, 18). That Jeremiah is the original here, and at most took the remote analogy of Am. v. 19 for his model, appears to me an entirely unwarranted assertion. This pithy drastic play upon words corresponds as much more to the Old Testament master of such word-play, Isaiah, as it is contrary to the softer and more fluent style of our prophet. In addition it is inconceivable that at the close of his discourse, where he has evidently already exhausted himself and has for some time been speaking only in quotations, he should suddenly make such a pithy original utterance. 2. The Testimony of the Book of Numbers concerning Moab, and concluding word.

XLVIII. 45-47.

- 45 In the shade of Heshbon the fugitives stand powerless;¹
For fire² goes forth from Heshbon,
And flame from the midst of Sihon,
And it devoured the side of Moab
And the crown (of the head) of the sons of tumult.³
- 46 Woe unto thee, Moab!
Destroyed is the people of Chemosh,
For thy sons are led away into prison,
And thy daughters into captivity.⁴
- 47 And I turn the captivity of Moab at the end of days, saith Jehovah.
—Thus far the judgment on Moab.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 45.—On the privative כִּין כִּפְחַן comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 112, 5, d; Jer. x. 14.

² Ver. 45.—אֵשׁ is used in Numbers as feminine, as it usually is, but here as masculine, as in Ps. civ. 4. (In Job xx. 26 פַּח regarded as neuter is in apposition. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, 4 coll. Jer. xx. 9.)

³ Ver. 45.—כִּרְקַרְקַר, Numb. xxiv. 17, not being appropriate to the present passages (it signifies suſſodit, radicibus evertit from כִּרְקַר ſodit) we cannot say that כִּרְקַרְקַר is the original reading, although it seems to suit the passage in Numbers better, and is really the reading of Cod. Samarit. Jeremiah, dealing very freely after his manner with the text of his sources, may have substituted a word of similar form. שֶׁאוֹן is of like meaning with שֶׁת, as the latter stands for שֶׁאֵת, Lam. iii. 47 (as שֶׁת Job xli. 16 for שֶׁאֵת, Lam. xiii. 11) and this for שֶׁאֵת. Comp. OLSH., § 153.

⁴ Ver. 46.—The form שֶׁבִיָּה is found in Jeremiah here only. Since he uses שֶׁבִיָּה (שֶׁבִיָּה) only in the connection of שֶׁבִיָּה he was obliged, in order to have a corresponding word to שֶׁבִיָּה, to choose either שֶׁבִיָּה or שֶׁבִיָּה, which latter occurs more rarely than the former, since it is found only in Isa. lii. 2.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

With the exception of ver. 45 a, the verses are a free reproduction of Num. xxi. 28, 29; xxiv. 17. The prophet who already in the previous context has brought into use old prophecies against Moab, does the same here with some passages of the book of Numbers. It is only natural that Jeremiah should not leave unemployd those ancient utterances occasioned by the first conflict between Israel and Moab. This use is evidently the main intention, and no emphasis is therefore to be laid on the less strict connection of the words with the previous context, and with each other. GRAF has, therefore, rightly rejected the hypothesis of MOYERS and HITZIG, that these verses are a later gloss.

Vers. 45, 46. In the shade . . . captivity. As the passage to be used speaks of a going forth of the fire from Heshbon upon the Moabites (Num. xxi. 28), the Moabites must be represented as having come into the district of Heshbon. This is done by assuming a flight of the Moabites in that direction (doubtless also with a reference to "he that fleeth," ver. 41). It has indeed been correctly remarked that as the enemy is approaching from the north, the flight could not be towards Heshbon (comp. rems. on ver. 19 sqq.), but all that concerns the prophet is to show that the ancient sentence will be verified anew in this judgment on Moab. It is assuredly not his meaning that this will take place literally in the form chosen by him (for which Isa. xxx. 2, 3, also was, perhaps, in his mind). Ver. 45 a is thus a mere connecting clause, of which the expressions are not to be emphasized.—Powerless declares that the fugitives, who for protection had betaken themselves to the shade of Heshbon, receive from thence no strength but the contrary. The following Q which is also taken from Num. xxi. 28, need not then be taken in an a versative sense (but).—From the midst of Sihon. In Num. xxi. 28 it reads, “from the city of Sihon.” Heshbon is called in xxi. 26 the city of Sihon the king of the Amorites. Owing to the omission of city here, I would neither alter the text with J. D. MICHAELIS, EWALD and MEIER (סִיחֹן for סִיחֹן) so as to read, from the house of Sihon, nor with GRAF, conceive an ideal presence of Sihon (with reference to Gen. xlix. 10), but as in ver. 4, and more frequently according to GRAF, Moab stands for Ar-Moab, and elsewhere usually Shechem for city of Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 18), so here also the name of Lord of the city stands for the city itself. The sense of from the midst, is that fire breaks forth from between the openings of the city (i. e., the gates of the walls and towers).—The side of Moab. Num. xxiv. 17, “and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel, and shall smite the borders of Moab.” As here the subject is a staff which smites, the borders can mean only the sides of the body. Accordingly in this passage also it is more natural to think of the side (MEIER) as burnt or roasted by the fire, than the end of the beard [HENDERSON: corner of the beard], which would inflict no material injury.—And the crown, etc. Num. xxiv. 17, “and destroy all the children of Sheth.” Sheth has also the meaning of tumult. The children of tumult are homines tumultuosi. The designation corresponds on the one hand to the arrogant character of the Moabites mentioned in vers. 26-30, and on the other hand there seems to be an allusion to Am. ii. 2, where it reads “and Moab shall die with tumult.”—Woe unto thee, etc., from Num. xxi. 29. Moab is called the people of Chemosh (comp. ver. 7) as Israel the people of Jehovah (Num. xi. 29; xvii. 6; Jud. v. 11).—For thy sons, etc., Num. xxi. 29; he gives his sons up as fugitives, and his daughters into captivity. It is apparent that the original is softened down. Comp. Gen. xii. 15.

Ver. 47. And I turn . . . on Moab.—Close of the chapter. Comp. xli. 26; xlix. 6, 39.—I turn. Comp. xxx. 3, 18; xxxiii. 7, 11.—At the end of days. Comp. rems. on xxiii. 20. The expression points to that final period in which the heathen also will be converted to the God of Israel. Comp. iii. 17; Isa. xxiv. 13-16; xxv. 6; Hagg. ii. 7.—Thus far the judgment. Comp. ver. 21; h. 64. With the exception of the latter passage (on which comp. the exeg. rems.) this formula is not found in Jeremiah. It appears to be a later addition.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

But although Goliath was such a mighty fellow he had yet to bite the grass, 1 Sam. xvii. 50. 5. Pride and Arrogance. These never do well, but act with violence and injustice. 5. On ver. 11. “Moab retained its old character; being far from the traffic of the great world it was well pleased to keep to itself. Yet things cannot continue thus in this world forever, every family and every nation is at some time rudely terrified from its rest, for what is peculiar, natural or national is not in itself the good. This comes here only through conflict and tribulation, and by God’s word among men. One’s own way is full of idolatry, and all idols will in like manner come to shame: the golden calf of the Israelites certainly first, but afterwards Kamosh.” DIEDRICH.

7. On vers. 26, 27. Proud men rejoice with malicious pleasure when they can treat one, whom they do not like, as a caught thief. HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. “How many are still like the Moabites?

For how many are there of those who depend on their power and violence, their fortified cities and buildings, riches, money and property, and set all their hope and confidence thereupon! How many are there of those who, when they have been some time at peace, become secure and think there is no more trouble from the rising to the setting of the sun! How many of those who rely on their own strength and say, let the enemy come, they are a match for him! How many who, when they surpass others in bodily and mental gifts or in perishable goods, become proud and despise, ridicule and treat badly their inferiors, as if they had found such among thieves, as God the Lord here says! Not to mention that even the dear God is not exempted. For although all good and perfect gifts come only from above, from the Father of light (Jas. i. 17), yet many will not acknowledge this, but ascribe them to their own wisdom and skill, do not thank God for them, and thus make themselves and the outward means, by which they obtain one and another thing, the idol which they serve." Bibl. Summarien, Halle, 1848.

2. On ver. 10. Remissness in the work of the Lord. 1. Wherein it consists (in not doing or doing ill that which is commanded. Comp. Saul in 1 Sam. xv., and doing that which is forbidden). 2. Its causes (Selfishness, Pride, Unbelief, Cowardice, Indolence, worldly interests). 3. Its punishment (to be cursed).

[JEREMY TAYLOR: 1. He that serves God with the body, without the soul, serves God deceitfully. 2. He that serves God with the soul, without the body, when both can be conjoined, doth the work of the Lord deceitfully. 3. And they who think God sufficiently served with abstaining from evil, and converse not in the acquisition and pursuit of holy charity and religion.—S. R. A.]

3. On ver. 42. The world's boldness towards God. 1. Whereon it is supported (on the one hand on the real [material] powers apparently standing at its behest alone; on the other hand, on the apparent powerlessness of God's servants, who have only truth and right on their side). 2. What its end will be (Destruction, or termination of national existence). [COWLES: "If all the historians who record the ultimate extinction of nations were inspired of God to give the true reasons of their fall, we should often meet this testimony, 'Perished of national pride, producing contempt of God and of fundamental morality.'"] —S. 6. Prophecy against the Ammonites.

XLIX. 1-6.

The Ammonites also, the brother nation of the Moabites, (Gen. xix. 37) after centuries of various conflict (comp. Jud. iii. 13; x. 7 sqq.; xi. 32; 1 Sam. xi.; 2 Sam. x., xi., xii. 26; 2 Chron. xx.; xxvi. 8; xxvii. 5) in consequence of the deportation of the East-Jordanic tribes have appropriated a part of their territory. This fact forms the point of departure for the present prophecy. Older prophecies against Ammon are extant only by Amos (i. 13-15) and Zephaniah (in consequence of a declaration against Moab, (ii. 9, 10). Of these Jeremiah has made considerable use of the prophecy of Amos. Comp. the exposition. There is at most an echo of the brief utterance of Zephaniah in the expression desolation, ver. 2. coll. Zeph. ii. 9. Since Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans are not named, the prophecy must be older than the battle of Carchemish, and since the beginning agrees in form with the beginning of the first prophecy against Egypt (xlvi. 2), and the prophecies against Moab (xlviii. 1), Edom (xlix. 7) and Damascus (xlix. 23), the supposition is natural that the date of its origin is the same as that of these prophecies.

1 AGAINST THE CHILDREN OF AMMON.

Thus saith Jehovah: Has then Israel no children, or has he no heir?
Why then does Malcom inherit Gad and his people dwell in his cities?

2 Therefore behold, the days come, saith Jehovah,
That I cause the war-shout to be heard against Rabbah of the children of Ammon;
And she shall become a desolated heap,
And her daughter shall be burned with fire:
And Israel shall be heir to his heirs, saith Jehovah.

3 Howl Heshbon, for devastated is Ai!
Cry, ye daughters of Rabbah, gird on sackcloth;
Lament and run to and fro' on the walls;
For Malcom must go into captivity,
His priests and his princes together.

- 4 Why boastest² thou of the valleys?
Thy valley is flowing away,³ thou rebellious daughter,
Who trusted in her treasures;—"Who will come to me?"
- 5 Behold, I bring fear upon thee, saith the Lord, Jehovah Zebaoth,
From all thy neighbors;
And ye shall be driven away, each one before him;
And there shall be no gatherer of the fugitives.
- 6 But nevertheless I will turn the captivity of the children of Ammon,
Saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- 1 Ver. 3.—הַשׁוֹטֹט. On the form comp. OLSH., § 67, Ann., 272, a.
- 2 Ver. 4.—לְהַלְלֵךְ invariably denotes to boast, to brag. The object of the boasting is most frequently connected by
3. Comp. iv. 2; ix. 22, 23; Ps. xlix. 7, etc.
- 3 Ver. 4.—וְכִי עֵינֶיךָ. The explanation of EWALD and GRAF, "of the luxuriance, the superfluity of thy valley" would suit the connection, but the abstract rendering of כִּי is an objection, since this form (כִּי) elsewhere is used almost wholly in the formation of participles, very rarely of substantives of concrete meaning, as בְּנֵי people, יְרֵךְ city. כִּי occurs (in the masc. form) only of a man with emission of seed (Lev. xv. 4), in the fem. of a woman with emission of blood (Lev. xv. 19), and of Canaan as a land flowing with milk and honey (Exod. iii. 8, 17; Lev. xx. 24; Num. xiii. 27, etc.). Hence the explanation: thy valley flows away, passes away, or redundat sanguine confessorum, does not correspond to the use of the word elsewhere. I would, therefore, explain with SCHLEUSNER: quid gloriaris vallibus tuis? (quod scilicet) fecunda sit vallis tua? Thus one idea is expressed independently of the preposition.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Four parts may be plainly distinguished. In the first (vers. 1, 2) the prophet alludes to the fact, from the theocratic point of view regarded as improper, that the Ammonites had taken possession of the Gadite territory (ver. 1), and declares that this cannot remain so. Ammon must be involved in war, the capital with the neighboring cities destroyed, and Israel again put into possession of his country (ver. 2). In the second part (ver. 3) a brief specification follows, in the third (vers. 4, 5) a reason for the punitive judgment, with express indication, that the recompense would correspond exactly to the inculpation. In the fourth part (ver. 6) the prophet concludes with a consolatory outlook into the future.

Vers. 1, 2. Against . . . saith Jehovah.—The prophet here presupposes the possession of the Gadite territory by the Ammonites in consequence of the deportation of the East-Jordanic tribes by Tiglath-Pileser (2 Ki. xv. 29; 1 Chron. v. 6, 26. Comp. Introd. to ch. xlviii.). Amos refers to former attempts by the Ammonites for the same object (i. 13).—Malcom. Jeremiah has Am. i. 15 in view. In this passage Malcom appears to me to be used in a double sense. Why should the king be mentioned only with the people of the Ammonites? Why does Amos say of Damascus (ver. 5) and Philistia (ver. 8), "him that holdeth the sceptre," and of Moab (ii. 3) "the judge?" Did he not wish it to be understood that the expression used only of Ammon, was to be taken here in a special sense? I believe, then, that Malcom (Am. i. 16) refers primarily to the King, but in such wise that an allusion to the God is also intended. This allusion was all the plainer, if the Ammonites really, as MOVERS supposes (Phœnic., I, S. 323. Comp. HERZOG, Real-Enc., IX., S. 714), called the god כִּי־מֶלֶךְ, i. e., our king. With reference to this he might fitly, when the Ammonites were spoken of, be called כִּי־מֶלֶךְ by the Israelites. It is, therefore, unnecessary here, and in ver. 3 to read כִּי־מֶלֶךְ, as EWALD, GRAF and MEIER would do, after the example of the LXX. and Syr. Since we cannot express the specific meaning of the word by the translation, we have retained Malcom as if it were a proper name.—The war-shout, etc., is a reminiscence from Am. i. 14.—Rabbah Beni Ammon. This was the complete name of the city (comp. Deut. iii. 11; 2 Sam. xi. 1; xii. 26 sqq.). It was called Rabbah, the great, the capital, in contrast to the neighboring cities. Comp. HERZ., R.-Enc. XII., S. 469.—A desolate heap, literally hill of desolation, therefore, heap of ruins. Comp. Josh. viii. 28 and Zeph. ii. 9.—Burned with fire. This also reminds us of Am. i. 14 (comp. OLSH., § 242 b).

Ver. 3. Howl Heshbon . . . princes together. The immediate consequences of the war-shout being heard are specified. Heshbon is to howl. It was then an Ammonitish city. Comp. rems. on xlviii. 2, 45. It is given as a reason that Ai is destroyed. What city this was is not to be ascertained. VENEMA's and EWALD's explanation (Rabba ita vastata est, ut jam sit tumulus ruderum) is forced. GRAF would read הָרָר with reference to Rabbah. But Rabbah could be called הָרָר only in the appellative sense, and then it must have the article. To suppose that Ai is transferred hither from Josh. viii. 28, because there alone the expression "heap of desolation" occurs, is to attribute to the prophet either ignorance or carelessness. Many commentators therefore (J. D. MICHAELIS, HITZIG, comp. V. RAUMER, S. 168, Ann. 150) are disposed to assume an East-Jordanic Ai, which expedient seems to me thus far the best.—There is no reason for taking daughters of Rabbah in a different sense here from ver. 2.—Sackcloth. Comp. rems. on xlviii. 37.—On the walls. I do not see why these should be regarded as the walls of a sheep-fold, as many would do. What is more natural in a city, against which the enemy is advancing, than to run up and down on the walls to take measures for defence? That the city walls may be meant is evident from Ps. lxxxix. 41; Ezek. xlii. 12.—For Malcom, etc. These words are taken from Am. i. 15. Only in the present passage we have his priests for "he," which is evidently not from misunderstanding, but to emphasize more plainly the intended meaning of Malcom. Comp. rems. on xlvi. 7.

Vers. 4, 5. Why boastest thou . . . fugitives. Reason of the primitive judgment. The pride, the stubbornness, the security of Ammon must be correspondingly punished. Comp. xlvi. 26, 30.—Rebellious daughter. Comp.

xxxi. 22.—Who will come to me? The Ammonites' boast, Who will come to us? The Lord tells them, the enemies will come upon them, and that from all sides, yea, even behind them, so that the Ammonites will be driven straight before them, and because the enemies come from all sides will be so scattered that no one will be in a condition to collect the fugitives again.—Fear. Comp. xlvi. 43, 44.—Each one before him. Comp. "every man straight before him," Josh. vi. 5, 20; v. 13.—Gatherer. Comp. Isa. xiii. 14; lvi. 8; Nah. iii. 18.

Ver. 6. But nevertheless . . . Jehovah. Ammon also is to share in the salvation of the future, which is to issue from Israel unto all nations. Comp. rems. on xlvi. 47 and xlix. 39.

7. Prophecy against Edom (xlix. 7-22).

On account of their relationship to the Israelites, the Edomites, in consequence of an express divine command, were not treated as enemies on the journey to Canaan (Deut. ii. 4; xxiii. 7). Saul, however, conquered them (1 Sam. xiv. 47). David subjected them entirely (2 Sam. viii. 14). In this state of dependence they remained after Hadad's attempt at revolution had failed (1 Ki. xi. 14-22) till the reign of Joram, when they revolted (2 Ki. viii. 20-22; 2 Chron. xxi. 8). Amaziah and Uzziah indeed made by no means unsuccessful attempts to bring them again into subjection (2 Ki. xiv. 7, 22), but their success was not lasting. In the reign of Ahaz the Edomites again invaded Judea (2 Chron. xxviii. 17), and in the time of the Chaldeans we also find their ambassadors among those who came to Zedekiah to consult concerning means to be taken in common (Jer. xxvii. 3); but at the destruction of Jerusalem they are on the side of the Chaldeans, greeting the destruction of the long hostile city (comp. עֲלֵיךָ עֵלֶם, Ezek. xxxv. 5) with scornful triumph (Lam. iv. 21; Ezek. xxxv. 15; xxxvi. 5; Ps. cxxxvii. 7).

As regards the date of our prophecy, the construction of the superscription (לְאֶדוֹם), as well as the non-mention of the Chaldeans, point to the same date at which the other portions with similar superscription, at the head of which is the first against Egypt (xli. 1-12), originated, i. e., the time immediately before the battle of Carchemish. Comp. rems. on xlvi. 1, 2, and Introduct. to the Prophecies against the Nations.

Of special importance for our prophecy is its relation to the prophecy of Obadiah directed against Edom. They correspond to each other as follows:

Jer. xlix. 7	and	Obad. 8.
" " 9	"	" 5.
" " 10	"	" 6, 7.
" " 14	"	" 1.
" " 15	"	" 2.
" " 16	"	" 3, 4.

That Jeremiah drew from Obadiah, and not vice versa, has been shown by CASPARI (Der Proph. Obadja ausgel. Leipzig, 1842) in such an exhaustive manner that there can be no further question on this point. The quotations then from Obadiah extend only to ver. 8 of his prophecy. On the other hand, the following context (Obad. 9 sqq.) has frequent points of contact with Joel, which is not the case in the previous context, and it is just in these verses that the indubitable references to the capture of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans are found (comp. Obad. 19, 16). Hence recently either the old theory has been retained (held by AUGUSTI, KRAHMER, EWALD, MEIER in ZELLER'S Jahrb. I. 3, S. 526) of the use of an older source in common on the part of Jeremiah and Obadiah (comp. MEIER, die proph. BB. d. A. T. übersetzt u. erk., S. 368 [The proph. Books of the O. T. transl. and explained]), or it is supposed that Obad. 9-21 was a later addition, composed after the Chaldean catastrophe. This is not the place to enter into this difficult investigation specially or with the precision which it requires. I content myself therefore with putting two questions: 1. Is it then so decidedly demonstrated that Obadiah quotes Joel and not Joel Obadiah? 2. How is it, that in vers. 12-14 Edom is only warned against committing hostilities against Judah "in the day of their calamity?" Such hostilities had certainly been already committed (vers. 10, 11, 15, 16). But is it not clear from the turn which the discourse takes (with וְאֵל) in ver. 12 that the prophet distinguishes two points of time, a past and a future? Once already have the Edomites greeted the calamity of Jerusalem with malicious joy. When now they are warned against doing this again, is it not presupposed that Jerusalem is still by no means wholly destroyed, but that the really great day of calamity is still impending (observe the וְיָסַד repeated eight times in vers. 12-14)? Would it not accordingly be exegetically more exact to suppose that the prophet, finding occasion in the hostility displayed by the Edomites in a transient occupation of Jerusalem, warns them from a repetition on the great day of Jerusalem, which he foresees as inevitable, and on the presupposition that this warning will not avail, threatened them with a just recompense?

Of the other older prophecies against Edom (Isa. xxxiv. 5-17; Am. i. 11, 12; Joel iv. 19) Jeremiah has made no use.

The whole prophecy is plainly to be discriminated into three parts. The first (vers. 7-13) has for its topic the judgment to be executed on Edom according to the elements of its outward appearance (vers. 7-10) and its objective inward ground, which is the decree of Jehovah. The second part (vers. 11-18) is predominantly occupied with the statement of the subjective ground of the visitation, i. e. with the guilt of Edom. The third part (vers. 19-22) brings before us the subject of the destination, that is, the instrument thereof, chosen by Jehovah.

1. The judgment on Edom in its external appearance and objective reason.

XLIX. 7-13.

- 7 AGAINST EDOM. Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth :
 Is there no longer wisdom in Teman?
 Hath counsel vanished from the intelligent?¹
 Is their wisdom expended?²
- 8 Flee, turn, bow low,³ ye inhabitants of Dedan!
 For the destruction of Esau I bring upon him,
 The time, when I visit him.
- 9 If vintagers come to thee they will leave no gleanings,
 If thieves by night they destroy their fill.
- 10 For I have stript Esau bare, discovered his hiding places,
 And he cannot hide himself.⁴
 His seed is destroyed and his brethren and his neighbors,
 And he is no more.
- 11 Leave⁵ thy orphans, I will preserve their life,
 And let thy widows confide⁶ in me.
- 12 For thus saith Jehovah, Behold,
 They, whose rule it was not to drink the cup, must drink it,
 And art thou⁷ to remain unpunished?
 No, but thou shalt drink.
- 13 For I have sworn by myself, saith Jehovah,
 That Bozrah shall become a desolation,
 A reproach, a desert⁸ and a curse;
 And all her cities shall become desolate for ever.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The destruction of Edom is described, 1. as it appears outwardly, 2. according to its inner reason in the divine decree. First the irresistible nature of the attack is set forth, in opposition to which all the renowned wisdom of Edom will be unavailing (ver. 7). The Dedanites, the neighbors and commercial allies of Edom, are warned to consult their own safety (ver. 8). The enemies will come, and, like vintagers or thieves, make a clean sweep (ver. 9). It will turn out that Edom's material means of defence, his rock fortresses regarded as impregnable, together with his own and his allied offensive forces, cannot avert destruction (ver. 10). This must be so, because it is the will of Jehovah. This is seen in Jehovah's taking charge, as it were, of the widows and children of the Edomites, which presupposes the death of their guardians (ver. 11). Jehovah must permit their death, as without being unjust, He cannot spare Edom the cup which Israel had to drink. Edom must therefore drain it irrevocably (ver. 12) for Jehovah (in accordance with the imperative demands of His justice) has sworn, that Edom will be a prey to everlasting desolation (ver. 13). Thus the strophe concludes, and from the similarity of this conclusion with ver. 18 it is seen, that in both cases we have a larger section of the discourse.

Ver. 7. Against Edom . . . expended. Wisdom and intelligence are necessary in carrying on war (Prov. xxiv. 6) and where these fail, all is lost. This lack is observable in Edom. This is the more striking since the wisdom of Edom and especially of Teman was celebrated from of old. Comp. Ob. 8; Job ii. 11 (Teman was the home of Eliphaz); Baruch iii. 22, 23. On Teman comp. HERZ., R.-Enc., III., S. 650. [COWLES on this verse.—S. R. A.]

Ver. 8. Flee . . . visit him. On Dedan comp. rems. on xxv. 23. They were not Edomites but neighbors (Ezek. xxv. 13), and at all events connected with them by mercantile intercourse (comp. Isa. xxi. 13). Hence they are also threatened by the tempest which is breaking over Edom. They are therefore admonished to look to their own safety.—For, etc. Comp. ver. 32; xlv. 21; vi. 15.

Ver. 9, 10. If vintagers . . . no more. Ver. 9 is taken from Obad. 5. The sense is clear. It could not be so if we should render the sentence interrogatively, as many do, in too servile adherence to the passage in Obadiah. Ver. 10 reminds us of Obad. 6, though there we read "searched out" and "sought up" for stript bare and discovered. These terms applied to Esau refer to the uncommonly strong fortress-dwellings, occupied by the Edomites. Comp. rems. on ver. 16.—His seed is destroyed, etc. "Both the real Edomites and the descendants of related and other nations, which were mingled with them, as the Amalekites, Gen. xxxvi. 12; Horites, Gen. xxxvi. 20; Simeonites, 1 Chron. iv. 42 and neighboring tribes, as Dedan, ver. 8. Tema and Buz, Jer. xxv. 23" are to be destroyed says GRAF. He also justly remarks that the expression his brethren and his neighbors appears to have been occasioned by "men of thy confederacy" and "men of thy peace" in Obad. 7.—And he is no more. Comp. Isa. xix. 7.

Ver. 11-13. Leave thy orphans . . . desolate forever. HIRTZIG sees in ver. 11 a preliminary conclusion parallel to ver. 6 and xlvi. 47. But ver. 11 is no conclusion, being followed by two sentences with for, vers. 12, 13, of such a purport that no inference favorable to Edom can possibly be drawn from them. I therefore take ver. 11 with THEODORET, NEUMANN and others, as irony. The Edomites are called upon, the men, namely, to leave their widows and orphans. Observe that it is not said, wives and children. The death of the men is presupposed. When Jehovah immediately adds that He will care for the survivors, this is a poor consolation for the Edomites who do not believe in Jehovah. For what other care but such as slaves receive, can be expected from Him, who announces as his unalterable determination so total a destruction of Edom, as in vers. 13, 17, 18, 20, 21?—I will preserve, etc. Comp. Exod. i. 17, 18; 2 Sam. xii. 3; 1 Ki. xviii. 5; Isa. vii. 21. We see from these passages that the meaning of the word is primarily negative: not kill, but secondarily positive: do what is necessary for the preservation of life.—Whose rule it was not, etc. It was an abnormal thing for Israel, the chosen people, to be obliged to drink the cup of wrath.

I therefore take מִשְׁפָּט in the sense of norm, law, rule. Comp. xxx. 11; viii. 7.—The cup. Comp. xxv. 15 sqq.—Unpunished. Comp. xxv. 29.—Have sworn, etc. Comp. xxii. 5.—A desolation. Comp. xxv. 11, 18; xlv. 6, 22.—Bozrah (Isa. xxxiv. 6; lxiii. 1; Am. i. 11, 12) was one of the most important cities of Edom (comp. xlvi. 24) of which there are still remains under the name of Besseyra, i. e. Little Bozrah. Comp. RAUMER, Pal., S. 278.—Desolate for ever. Comp. xxv. 9.

2. The Judgment on Edom according to its subjective reason.

XLIX. 14-18.

- 14 I have heard a report from Jehovah,
 And a messenger is sent among the nations:
 "Assemble yourselves and come up against her,
 And rise ye for the war."
 15 For behold, I make thee small among the nations;
 Despised among men.
 16 Thy object of horror¹ deceived thee,
 The pride of thy heart,
 Thou that dwellest in the clefts of the rock,
 Thou that occupiest the height of the hill.
 Even though, like an eagle, thou buildest thy nest high,
 I will bring thee down from thence, saith Jehovah.
 17 And Edom shall become a wilderness;
 Every one that passeth by shall be horrified,
 And jeer on account of all her strokes.
 18 As in the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah,
 And their neighboring cities, saith Jehovah,
 No man will dwell there,
 Nor a son of man sojourn in her.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 16.—הַפְּלִיטָה does not occur elsewhere. It is usually taken in the sense of terror=פְּלִיטָה (Jer. xxi. 4) and understood to mean the terror which Edom inspires. But because the following verb is in the masc. some have thought it necessary to separate הַפְּלִיטָה from it and regard it as an isolated exclamation (comp. הַפְּכַכְּם, Isa. xxix. 16) which SCHLEUSSNER renders O arrogantiam tuam; HITZIG, "fear to thee;" GRAF, "horror at thee." But this exclamation appears somewhat exaggerate¹. Why should a people, who are deceived by pride, be especially inspired with fear? Is not this very common? Was the pride of Edom greater than that of Moab (xlviii. 29)? Or was it threatened with a worse fate? I find it more suitable to take הַפְּלִיטָה in the sense of פְּלִיטָה. The latter word in 1 Ki. xv. 13; 2 Chron. xv. 16 designates an idol, an idol-image. This is called a terror, an object of holy horror, as frequently פָּחַד, Gen. xxxi. 42; כּוֹרָא, Isa. viii. 13; אֵיזִים, Jer. l. 33 are used in an analogous sense. The LXX. may have the same idea, translating ἡπαργία σου, i. e., risus, focus tuus. According to SCHLEUSSNER, they had Priapus in mind, for which also JEROME holds כַּפְּלִיטָה in 1 Ki. xv. and 2 Ki. xv. Rabbis also, according to KIMCHI's testimony, have understood the word of זָרָה, i. e., idolatry. Among the moderns, J. D. MICHAELIS and MEIER adopt this view. The gender of the verb is no hindrance, for the prophet could properly use the masc. when thinking of the person of the idol. Comp. NAEGELB. Gr., § 50, 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Jeremiah proclaims in the words of Obadiah, that nations will be summoned to make war upon Edom, to make her small and despised (vers. 14, 15). To such a procedure has Edom given occasion by her idolatrous abominations and her pride. This pride is now to be punished (ver. 16) and Edom is now to become a horrible waste and like Sodom and Gomorrah (vers. 17, 18). These verses are taken with modifications from Obadiah 1-4. The main thought is evidently expressed in ver. 16; the statement of the subjective cause of the punitive judgment, impending over Edom.

Vers. 14, 15. I have heard . . . among men. Hemistich 1 is taken from Obad. 1 only with the alteration of "we have heard" (Israel) to "I have heard," and "arise ye" to "assemble yourselves." The report which the prophet bears directly from the Lord and the message (רִשָׁה viator, nuntius, Prov. xiii. 17; xxv. 13; Isa. xviii. 2; lvii. 9) which is sent among the nations are of the same purport. We must regard the report however as expressing not only the command itself, but also that it has been issued. Hemist. 2 is extended in Jeremiah. It reads in Obadiah "Arise ye, and let us rise up against her in battle." Ver. 15, taken from Obad. 2, states the object of the war, for the attainment of which the nations are summoned. The words correspond to vers. 11-13, expressing the decree of Jehovah concerning Edom, the execution of which is the object of the war. "For" is wanting in Obadiah. In small and despised there is evidently an antithesis to Edom's pride (ver. 16). Hemist. 2 reads in Obadiah, "thou art greatly despised."

Ver. 16. Thy object of horror. . . saith Jehovah. We evidently have here the kernel of the strophe, that by which it is distinguished from the context, viz., the guilt of Edom is here stated, the subjective reason of her destruction. While Obadiah mentions as this reason only "the pride of thine heart" (ver. 3), Jeremiah mentions also the "being a terror;" or, as I understand the word, the horror, i. e., the idol. We may well conceive that wishing to extend the text of his source the prophet would insert a word which would state the ground of Edom's moral corruption. Whence does arise the moral pollution of the heathen world? According to Rom. i. from idolatry. Here also Jeremiah would say that it was really the idol which deceived Edom, pride being involved in idolatry.—The pride of thy heart is then in apposition to horror. It is in accordance with this that inaccessible rock-castles are designated as the ground of pride, for, were not all heathen idols local deities? Was not then the idol who had built these rocks and continually protected them the real lord on whom their proud confidence was founded?—Clefts of the rocks, etc. It appears to me beyond doubt that Jeremiah had here in view the peculiar character of the Edomite cities, especially the capital, which was called Sela (2 Ki. xiv. 7; Isa. xvi. 1). Comp. the remarks on Bozrah, ver. 13. The second hemistich is abbreviated from Obad. 4. Comp. Am. ix. 2.

[“The descriptive points in this verse are wonderfully accurate. Petra, the ancient capital of Edom, for ages the main thoroughfare of the great trade and travel between India and Mesopotamia on the East, and Egypt and North Africa on the South-West; the seat therefore of wealth and art, perhaps of wisdom also, and culture, held a position of great military strength. It was built in a vast ravine, partly on the broad area inclosed by lofty precipitous walls of rock, which by some of nature's mighty convulsions had been rent asunder, and partly in those very fronts of lofty rock, chiseled out with immense labor, so that the pillars of the temples and the apartments of its tombs and dwellings were wholly cut from the solid, eternal rock. Here—her nests built high in these crags like the eagle's—old Petra sat in her pride and her strength, cherishing the vain fancy that no power could ever bring her down. But the Almighty spake and it was done!—The site of ancient Petra, for ages unknown, has been brought to light during the present century. A number of travelers have visited and explored it. Laborde, Dr. Robinson and others, have given full and precise statements of its wonderful ruins, placing Petra in the front rank of those ancient witnesses who bear their silent but resistless testimony to the precision of the old prophetic descriptions, and to the marvellous correspondence in the most minute details between prophecy and history—the prophecy of twenty centuries ago and the history of to-day.” COWLES.—S. Vers. 17, 18. And Edom . . . sojourn in her. These verses do not contain any reminiscences from Obadiah, but they do from Jeremiah himself and from other writings.—And Edom, etc., is formed after xxv. 11, 38. Comp. l. 13.—Every one that passeth. Comp. xix. 8.—As in the overthrow, etc., is from Deut. xxix. 22. Comp. Isa. xiii. 19; Jer. l. 40. The expression neighboring cities points to Deut. xxix. 22, where Admah and Zeboim are mentioned with Sodom and Gomorrah. Comp. 3. The instrument chosen by Jehovah for the destruction of Edom.

XLIX. 19–22.

- 19 Behold, as a lion he cometh up
From the pride of Jordan to the evergreen pasturage,
For in a twinkling I drive him (Edom) from thence.¹
And who is chosen?² Him will I set over him.
For who is like me? And who will appoint me the time?
And who is the shepherd that would stand before me?
- 20 Therefore hear the counsel of Jehovah which He hath counselled against Edom;
And His thoughts, which he has thought concerning the inhabitants of Teman:
Verily they will be dragged along, the feeble little sheep;
Verily their pasturage will be astounded³ at them.
- 21 At the sound of their fall⁴ the earth trembles.
Crying⁵ The sound of it⁶ is heard on the Red Sea.
- 22 Behold, as an eagle he ascends and flies,
And extends his wings over Bozrah;
And the heart of the heroes of Edom on that day
Will be as the heart of a woman in anguish.

them like a lion, as the lion brings upon the weaker animals, i. e., they shall be dragged away (xv. 3; xxii. 19)—carried into captivity. Thus will the land be desolated, as the prophet poetically expresses it in the words, the land will be horrified at the sudden stillness and desolation. There is a similar personification in Job vii. 10, (Ps. ciii. 16). From this it follows 1. that the entire representation of these two verses is based on a figure of a place of pasturage; 2. that by the new shepherd, a conqueror is understood who will desolate the land and carry the people into captivity; 3. that the sentence with therefore, occasioned by the emphatic causal sentence of three clauses, ver. 19, b, contains no more than an emphatically repeated inference (A, then B, therefore A), consequently the same thought in substance, which was already expressed in I will drive him from thence. On ver. 20 a comp. ver. 30: xviii. 11; xxix. 11; Isa. xiv. 26, 27; xix. 12 — Teman, comp. ver. 7. The “smallest of the flock” are the weakest, most helpless, who are least adapted for flight or resistance, and most for being dragged away.— [HENDERSON adheres to the A. V., making “the smallest of the flock” the nominative.—S. R. A.] —At the sound, &c., immediate effect of the overthrow of the power of Edom. Comp. Ezek. xxvi. 15; xxxi. 16; Isa. xliii. 13; Jer. li. 29.—The whole passage, vers. 19-21, is repeated and applied to Babylon (l. 44-46).

Ver. 22. Behold . . . in anguish. That which is in ver. 19 declared by means of a figure taken from a lion, is here repeated in the form of a figure derived from an eagle. The first half of the verse is taken from xlviii. 40, the second from xlviii. 41. The reason of the assailer of Bozrah appearing here as an eagle may be that the “castellated rock” of this city is designated as accessible only to an eagle. Comp. RAUMER, *Pal. 3. Prophecy against Damascus.

XLIX. 23-27.

*Out of a large number of small kingdoms (thirty-two are mentioned in 1 Ki. xxi. 1, 16) with which the Israelites after the period of the Judges had to endure many conflicts, (Jud. iii. 8; 1 Sam. xiv. 47; 2 Sam. viii. and x.), a large one was formed after David's death by Rezon, with Damascus for its capital (1 Ki. xi. 23, 24). With this great Syrian kingdom also the two kingdoms of Israel had to endure many and severe conflicts, (1 Ki. xv. 13 sqq.; xx. 1 sqq.; xxii. 1 sqq.; 2 Ki. v. 1 sqq.; vi. 8 sqq.; viii. 28, 29; x. 32, 33; xii. 17; xiii. 3; xiv. 25; xv. 37; xvi. 5, 6), till at last the Assyrians, solicited by Ahaz of Judah, (2 Ki. xvi. 7-10), fell upon Syria and brought the country permanently under their dominion (2 Ki. xvi. 9). We need not seek the fulfilment of Jeremiah's prophecy of the destruction of Damascus in a particular “conquest and devastation of the country by Nebuchadnezzar.” (GRAF). For even if Nebuchadnezzar did seize Syria and Damascus and treat them with a certain degree of hostility (whether as an Assyrian province or as an Egyptian tributary) yet the prophet's perspective extends over the whole future of Damascus (comp. the Introd. to chh. l. li.). He sees in one picture what in the fulfilment will be divided into many stages, comp. HERZOG R.-Enc. III., S. 260.*

As regards the date of the prophecy both the superscription and the purport of it indicate that it formed part of that Sepher, beginning with xlv. 1, which owes its origin to the period before the battle of Carchemish. Comp. Introd. to the Prophecies against the Nations.

23 AGAINST DAMASCUS.

- Ashamed are Hamath and Arpad,
 For a bad report have they heard: they are dissolved.¹
 In the sea there is terror,² it cannot rest.
- 24 Enfeebled is Damascus, she turns to flee,
 And terror³ seizes her,⁴
 Anguish and sorrow lay hold on her like a parturient.
- 25 How! Is not the city of renown abandoned,
 The place of my delight?
- 26 Hence her youths fall in the streets,
 And all men of war shall perish on that day, saith Jehovah Zebaoth.
- 27 And I kindle a fire in the wall of Damascus,
 Which shall devour the palaces of Benhadad.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ Ver. 23.—נָכַן used frequently of the effect of fear in loosening the compagines corporis; Exod. xv. 15; Josh. ii. 9, 24; Ps. lxxxv. 4; Isa. xiv. 21.
- ² Ver. 23.—בִּים רָאָהָה. Since the following words הַשִּׁקָּט לֹא יִבָּלְלֶיךָ are taken verbatim from Isa. lviii. 20, the previous words in Isaiah may rule the previous words here. There we read הַרְשִׁיעִים בְּיָם נִזְרָשׁ. It would now be certainly most convenient to read בְּיָם in the present passage instead of בִּים. Jeremiah however does not quote the last words accurately as a whole. And בִּים is also not without difficulty. We should expect it to be in the construct state. I therefore think that the reading in the text is the correct one.—רָאָהָה is fear, terror, unrest. Comp. Josh. xxii. 24; Prov. xii. 25; Ezek. iv. 16; xii. 18, 19. The subst. in Jeremiah here only; the verb in xvii. 8; xxxviii. 15; xlii. 16.
- ³ Ver. 24.—רָכַט âp. ley. a Syriac word, without doubt chosen purposely. Comp. רָכַת, Hos. xiii. 1.
- ⁴ Ver. 24.—הַחֹזֶקֶת is so punctuated by the Masoretes that it is evident they took Damascus for the subject (errorrem prehendit) having in view passages like Isa. xliii. 8; Job xviii. 20; xxi. 6. But the punctuation הַחֹזֶקֶת would correspond better to Jeremiah's usage. Comp. vi. 24; viii. 21; i. 43.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

An enemy coming from the north threatens first Hamath and Arpad, which are thus thrown into commotion, like a tempestuous sea (ver. 23). This agitation reaches also Damascus, hence discouragement, anxiety, in part flight (ver. 24). The city is not abandoned by all the troops (ver. 25), hence a great blood-bath and destruction of the army in the streets (ver. 26) and destruction of the city by fire (ver. 27).

Ver. 23. Against Damascus . . . cannot rest. The superscription is as in xlvi. 2; xlviii. 1; xlix. 1, 7. I cannot at all discover that the superscription is too limited, as Graf supposes, for in fact this brief utterance is occupied only with Damascus, the cities Hamath and Arpad being mentioned only to designate the successive advance of the calamity and the direction in which the enemy comes. It is a matter of course that the fall of the capital involves that of the kingdom, hence the superscription is incorrect neither in itself nor in relation to the purport of the passage. According to Num. xxxiv. 8 Hamath is to be the northern limit of the land to be occupied by Israel. The boundaries were also really extended thus far at times. Comp. 2 Ki. xiv. 23 with 2 Chron. viii. 4. The city was situated on the Orontes to the North of Damascus, and was afterwards called Epiphania by the Greeks. Comp. Jerome on Am. vi. 2, 14. Arpad, which is always named together with Hamath (Isa. x. 9, comp. Delitzsch on the passage; xxxvi. 19; xxxvii. 13), must have been situated in the neighborhood of this city. We thus see that the prophet expects the enemy from the North, as it was natural that the army of the Egyptians then in northern Syria should turn his gaze in that direction. Hamath and Arpad stand confounded in consequence of the evil tidings. They flow away, dissolve, pass away with anguish.—The following words are taken verbatim from Isa. lvii. 20. Jeremiah has doubtless from this passage the idea of the sea in general in his mind. The expression נָכַן had directed his thoughts to that passage and still exerts some influence. He thus imagines these cities as a wildly agitated sea. In the swaying hither and thither of the waves is mirrored the inward unrest and anguish. It is not then the real sea that is meant (litteic), but the human multitude compared to a sea. (Comp. Isa. xvii. 12; viii. 7, 8).

Vers. 24-27. Enfeebled . . . Benhadad. The bad report reaches even the capital, and this in consequence falls into critical agitation. Despair seizes on the inhabitants. A part turns to flight. (Comp. rems. on xlv. 5, 21). Anguish takes hold upon them.—How? Is not, etc. We are not justified in regarding the negative as a strong affirmation, or taking abandoned in the sense of, left free, spared. Rather does the prophet say really: how then is the city not forsaken? (Comp. 2 Sam. i. 14). He is astonished and complains, that it has not been abandoned. This would have been better for the Syrians. For just because it has not been, their youths fall in their streets and their whole army is destroyed. Flight might have saved them.—City of renown, etc. Comp. li. 41; Isa. lx. 18; lxii. 7.—My refers to the prophet and there is no irony in it. He lamented that the city was not abandoned. He has a human pity for the destroyed city as he has a human joy in its beauty. Comp. rems. on xlvi. 31. [The Vulg., Syr., Chald., omit my. BOUROYD maintains that this omission is necessary to make good sense!—S. R. A.].—The youths. Comp. ix. 20.—Ver. 27. And I kindle. The whole verse in its main constituent is taken from Am. i. and ii. Comp. Am. i. 4, 7, 10, 12, 14; ii. 2, 5.—In the wall, not on the wall, for the wall itself does not burn, but within the wall, so that all which the wall includes is consumed by the fire. The palaces of Benhadad are the royal palaces, since Benhadad (there were three of them, 1 Ki. xv. 18, 20; xx. 1-3; 2 Ki. vi. 24; viii. 7, 9; xiii. 3, 24, 25) was the best known name of Syrian kings.

9. Prophecy against Kedar and the Kingdoms of Hazor.

XLIX. 28-33.

From Damascus the prophet turns his gaze eastward to the bordering Arabians, comprised in the designation of the title. In xxv. 23, 24 Jeremiah mentions among the populations to be subdued by Nebuchadnezzar several Arabian tribes. We feel impelled to suppose that the limits of the Arabian conquests of Nebuchadnezzar were undefined in the mind of the prophet, for we shall be obliged to distinguish a real and ideal dominion of that ruler, though the boundary line between the two is a vague one. It is unnecessary to inquire after a special occasion for this prophecy. Nebuchadnezzar being now universal ruler, the Arabs, being the immediate southern neighbors of his native country, cannot possibly be omitted from subjection to his power. Moreover, the Arabs had enough to do with the Israelites from the time of Gideon (comp. Jud. vi.-viii.; 2 Chron. xvii. 11; xxi. 16, 17; xxvi. 7).—As regards the date of this prophecy we have in the mention of Nebuchadnezzar's name a sure proof that it was written later than most of its sisters in chh. xlvii.-xlix., for only a single one of these (the second against Egypt, xlv. 13-28) mentions Nebuchadnezzar. If his expedition against the Arabian tribes were really the first, which he made after his ascension to the throne (comp. the exeg. rems. on vers. 23, 29) this prophecy might be ascribed most fitly to the time in which he was preparing for the undertaking.

- 28 Against KEDAR and the kingdoms of HAZOR, which Nebuchadnezzar¹ the king of Babylon smote,
Thus saith Jehovah:
Arise, go up against Kedar,
And spoil ye the sons of the east.²
- 29 Their tents and their flocks shall they take,
Their curtains and all their utensils;
And their camels shall they take for themselves,³
And shall cry over them, "Terror round about."
- 30 Flee, run apace, stoop, ye inhabitants of Hazor, saith Jehovah,
For Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon hath planned a plan against you,
And hath had thoughts against you.
- 31 Up! Move against a nation at ease,⁴
That dwelleth securely, saith Jehovah.
They have neither doors⁵ nor bolts,
They dwell apart by themselves.
- 32 And their camels shall become a prey,
And the multitude of their flocks a plunder;
And I scatter to all (the four) winds, those with cropped hair-corners,
And from all sides I bring their destruction, saith Jehovah.
- 33 And Hazor shall become a habitation for jackals,
A desolation in perpetuity:
Not a man shall dwell there,
Nor a son of man sojourn therein.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 28.—The י with which the king's name is written in the Chethilth is due to a scriptural error occasioned by the word יָרִיב standing just before.

² Ver. 28.—יָרִיב. On the singular imperative form comp. OLSH. § 235, 6.

⁴ Ver. 31.—The form שְׁלֵי formed like יָעִיר (comp. OLSH. § 180, Ann.) is found here only. Elsewhere שְׁלֵו (Job xvi. 12; xx. 20) or שְׁלֵי (Job xxi. 23).

⁵ Ver. 31.—לֹא דְלָתִים by this are meant not house-doors, but city gates. Comp. Deut. iii. 5; 1 Sam. xxiii. 7.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Plunder, desolation and dispersion by Nebuchadnezzar are proclaimed to the pastoral tribes living in Arabia to the East of Palestine. First the enemies are called upon to advance, and with war-cries to fall upon the Arabs and spoil them (vers. 23, 29). The Arabs, however, are admonished to flee and hide themselves, to escape the plans formed against them (ver. 30). Hereupon the enemies are summoned anew to the attack, and are told, as if to allure them, that they have to deal with a people at peace and not intrenched behind bulwarks (ver. 31). Rich booty is placed before them in prospect. Dispersion on all sides will be the result, corresponding to the attack on all sides (ver. 32). The land shall be devastated and cease to be a habitation for man (ver. 33).

Vers. 23, 29. Against Kedar . . . terror round about. Kedar is named in Gen. xxv. 13 as the second son of Ishmael, with which the Arabian tradition agrees. Comp. HERZOG, R.-Enc. I. S. 463. [Comp. KEIL and DELITZSCH, Comm. on the Pentateuch (Eng. Ed.) Vol. I. p. 261]. They lived "in the desert between Arabia Petraea and Babylonia" (КНОБЕЛ, Gen. S. 212), and are frequently mentioned as rich in flocks, living in tents (Song of Sol. i. 5; Ps. cxx. 5; Isa. xlii. 11; lx. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 21) and celebrated for their skill in archery (Isa. xxi. 16, 17). Comp. rems. on ii. 10.—Hazor, different from the localities of this name in Palestine (Josh. xi. 1-3; xii. 19; xix. 36; Jud. iv. and v. 1; 1 Ki. ix. 15; xv. 25)—Josh. xv. 23, 25—Neh. xi. 33), is mentioned here only as a district in Arabia. According to NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 210 coll. 428), Hazor is "the present Hadshar, a district which occupies the whole north-eastern corner of Nedshed, and to which in the wider sense the coast lands of Lachsa also belong." This corner is formed by the southern course of the Euphrates and the Persian Gulf. With regard to the meaning of the name it is natural to think of Isa. xlii. 11 and to suppose that הַצֹּר denotes the inhabitants of the הַצִּירִים, i. e. villages without walls and gates (comp. Gen. xxv. 16). DELITZSCH remarks on Isa. xlii. 11, "the settled Arabs are still called Hadarije in distinction from Wabarije, the tent Arabs; hadar, הַצִּיר, is the fixed dwelling-place in contrast to bedā, the steppe, where the tents are erected temporarily now here and now there." Accordingly הַצֹּר and הַצִּיר are related not as opposites, but only as the more limited and more extended idea, and Jeremiah would address his words to Kedar and to all other Arabs dwelling in הַצִּירִים. With this would accord not only the Chaldean incursion generally, which it is easier to regard as directed against a settled people than against nomads, but especially the description of the devastation in ver. 23, which seems to presuppose not the pasturage of a passing horde but the abiding-place of men who build houses. It seems opposed to this, however, that in ver. 29 the tents and curtains of the attacked are spoken of, according to which part of them at least were tent-dwellers. It is also surprising that in Isa. xlii. 11 the Kelarenes are inhabitants of הַצִּירִים, while elsewhere (comp. the passages cited) they are described as tent-dwellers. I believe that all may be united in the hypothesis that there were some Kedarenes living in tents and some in villages, and that the text has in view both these and also the other tribes settled in villages of northern Arabia.—Which Nebuchadnezzar, etc. These words appear to be a later addition, as otherwise the prophecy characterizes itself as a vaticinium post eventum. Yet even HIRZIG remarks, the addition is "contained in the LXX, and preserving the older form of the proper name as in xlv. 30 is relatively very old, and probably genuine and certainly contains historical truth, which is not handed down elsewhere." NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 209, 10) and DEXCKER (Genh. des. Alterth., I. S. 827) are of opinion that Nebuchadnezzar, after returning from the victory of Carchemish, had strengthened his internal dominion, first taking into consideration "the extension of his dominion over the Arabs on the lower Euphrates, in North Arabia and the Syrian desert" (DEXCKER). It is to be remarked in this connection, that according to CRESIUS, whose statement DEXCKER regards as credible (S. 804, 806 Ann. 2, etc.), the Babylonians had already brought Arabs with them to the siege of Nineveh.—The expression "sons of the East" is the "general designation of the Arabs, especially the nomad tribes of northern Arabia" (ARNOB in HERZ., R.-Enc. I. S. 460). Comp. 10. Prophecy against Elam.

XLIX. 34-39.

Elam is mentioned in the Old Testament in Gen. x. 22; xiv. 1, 9; Isa. xi. 11; xxi. 2; xxii. 6; Jer. xxv. 25; Ezek. xxxii. 24; Dan. viii. 2; Ezra iv. 9. Comp. supra ad xxv. 25. It is here mentioned as the representative of the more remote populations, beyond the Tigris, all those who are enumerated in the catalogue of nations beyond the Tigris in xxv. 25, 26. M. NIEBUHR assumes as certain a victorious war of Nebuchadnezzar with Elam between the ninth and twentieth years of his reign (Ass. u. Bab. S. 212). In this, however, he relies not on positive historical testimony but only on inferences, the correctness of which may be disputed. We are further in no need of an actual overthrow of Elam by Nebuchadnezzar. The kernel of the prophecy is an idea which retains its truth even if Nebuchadnezzar had never made war on Elam.

Why Jeremiah chose Elam as the representative of the eastern nations is not apparent. The supposition of EWALD (Proph. d. A. B., II. S. 130), that "the wild warlike Elamites had acted as auxiliaries shortly before in the deportation of Jehoiachin and the first great deportation of the people, and in this had shown themselves particularly cruel," does not appear to be well-founded. For 1. if the Elamites already served in the army of Nebuchadnezzar they needed not to be subjugated; 2. the superscription affords no sure criterion of the date. For it is highly probable that it is placed here by mistake, as we shall show on ver. 34. The prophecy does not mention Nebuchadnezzar by name, and we must therefore regard it as of the same date as the others in chh. xlvi.-xlix. against the nations (except xlvi. 13 sqq. and xlix. 28-33).

- 34 The word of Jehovah which came to Jeremiah the prophet with respect to Elam, in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah, king of Judah, saying,
- 35 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth:
Behold, I will break the bow of Elam,
The chief part of their strength.
- 36 And I will bring upon Elam four winds from the four corners of heaven,
And will scatter them to all those winds;
And there shall be no nation whither the dispersed of Elam¹ shall not come.
- 37 And I will terrify² Elam before their enemies,
And before those who seek their life;
And I will bring calamity upon them,
The fierceness of my anger, saith Jehovah;
And I will send the sword after them,
Until I have utterly consumed them.
- 38 And I will set my throne in Elam,
And destroy king and prince from thence, saith Jehovah.
- 39 And it shall be at the end of days,
I will turn the captivity of Elam, saith Jehovah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 36.—עֵינֵיהֶם in the Chethibh has expressions such as ver. 13; xxv. 12; ii. 26, 62, etc., in view.

² Ver. 37.—וְהִרְרִיתִי comp. OLSH., S. 563, 4,—xlvi. 26; ix. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The bow of the Elamites, wherein their strength consists, shall be broken (ver. 35). They shall be attacked and scattered on all sides (ver. 36), and be pursued to destruction (ver. 37). In the country itself the Lord will hold strict judgment and exterminate all the rulers (ver. 38). Yet in the distant future Elam also shall be liberated and obtain salvation (ver. 39).

Ver. 34. The word . . . Judah. There are well-founded doubts as to the authenticity of this superscription. We have hitherto found without an exception, that in all prophecies which are older than the battle of Carchemish, Jeremiah never mentions Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldeans, while in all the oracles subsequent to this catastrophe he knows and names Nebuchadnezzar as the Lord's chosen instrument. If now this prophecy really dates from the beginning of Zedekiah's reign, why is not Nebuchadnezzar mentioned? Why are the agents of the punishment spoken of in as general a manner as in the older prophecies? Or must not Nebuchadnezzar be necessarily regarded as the agent, as GRAF supposes (S. 576)? I hold it quite impossible for Jeremiah in the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah to have thought of any other than Nebuchadnezzar as an instrument of the execution, or to have left this point even in suspense. Compare only xxvii. 5 sqq., where the whole earth, with all that is thereon, is given over without exception or reserve to the Chaldean king. Add to this an external circumstance. Unreliable as the Alexandrian translation in general is, yet in some circumstances it may serve to indicate the original form of the text (comp. GRAF, Eintl. S. LVII.). This is here the case. As is well-known the prophecies against the nations have in the LXX. their place immediately after that indication of a Sopher, containing them, in xxv. 13, and this prophecy against Elam is at their head. It is introduced with the words: ἀ ἐπροφήτευσεν Ἱερεμίας ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη τὰ Αἰθίοι. It further closes with the words: ἐν ἀρχῇ βασιλείουτος Σεδεκίου βασιλέως ἔγενετο ὁ λόγος οὗτος περὶ Αἰθίοι, and these words form in addition the beginning of ch. xxvi. However severely we may judge the arbitrariness of this translator, it must be admitted that this exceeds the customary degree thereof, which is substantially confined to abridgement (comp. GRAF, Eintl., S. XLIII.). What could have induced him to invent this postscript, since the brief oracle was sufficiently characterized by the prefixed words τὰ Αἰθίοι (evidently corresponding to the Hebrew בְּאֵתְיוֹן), but on account of its brevity added as in apposition to the preceding ἐπὶ τὰ ἔθνη? Whence now that postscript? It is remarkable that in the LXX. the first verse of ch. xxvii. (Heb.) is wanting. It is the verse with the undoubtedly false name of Jehoiakim! Now ch. xxvii. stands in the closest topical relation to ch. xxv. In the symbolic sending of the yoke it forms an actual commentary to the symbol of the cup of wrath, xxv. 15 sqq. Ch. xxvi. on the other hand belongs to a much earlier date, and is merely inserted here, because it likewise (as ch. xxvii.) has for its subject the conflict with the false prophets, and bears as date the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim. Compare the Introduction to the Ninth Discourse (ch. xxv.), and the rems. on xxvii. 1. This postscript now which the LXX. subjoins to the oracle against Elam suits exactly (only with the omission of the words περὶ Αἰθίοι) in the place of the verse wanting at the beginning of ch. xxvii., and, which is a matter of importance, it contains the right king's name, viz., that of Zedekiah. The supposition is thus pressed upon us that the prophecies against the nations originally had place immediately after ch. xxv., that ch. xxvii. was connected directly therewith (without the intervention of ch. xxvi.), that the prophecy against Elam formed the conclusion of the oracle against the nations, and that by mistake the Diakemonast who altered that original order, removed xxvii. 1, and attached it, as a postscript, to the oracle against Elam. In this behalf the words "against Elam," had to be inserted. This alteration must have been made in very early times, for it makes itself felt in both the Hebrew text and in the LXX. only with this difference.

that in the text, on which the LXX. was based, the misplaced words still stood at the close of the word directed against Elam, so that this had a superscription and a postscript, while in our Masoretic recension the postscript is made into the title by the assumption into it of the words בְּאֵתְיוֹן. For this purpose the form of the sentences must also have been altered, so that it was in correspondence with the superscription, xlvii. 1 and xlviii. 1, while in the Greek text (xxvi. 1) the old form is still perceptible. Thus substantially MOYERS and HITZIG, with whom I feel compelled to agree in the main.

Vers. 35-39. Thus saith . . . saith Jehovah. It seems to me far-fetched to take בְּאֵתְיוֹן in the sense of virī fortes as HITZIG and GRAF would do, after the example of the Targum and several Rabbis. This meaning also does not seem to me to be proved. For in Isa. xxi. 17 the word is to be understood peculiarly (comp. DELITZSCH, ad loc.). In 1 Sam. ii. 4 and Hos. i. 5, it stands by synecdoche for all the means of attack and defence. And it is thus to be rendered here the rather as we know from history, that the Elamites were really celebrated as archers (comp. Isa. xxii. 6; Livy XXXVII. 27; HERZOG, R.-Enc. III. S. 748). The bow was the chief part of their strength (comp. ii. 3; Am. vi. 1, 6). When HITZIG inquires "why limit the breaking to the bow?" the answer is, because it was the main element of their power. To break their bow was to render them defenceless. When this is done, the advance is made upon them positively; from the four corners of the heaven are the four winds to rage against them and drive them one to another, i. e., the four winds shall scatter them to the four winds (comp. ver. 32; Zech. ii. 10; vi. 5). Without a figure, they shall be attacked on all sides and scattered on all sides, so that there will be no nation in which such Elamites are not to be found. That this is the sense is clear from ver. 37, where the same thing is expressed without a figure.—In the country itself will the Lord erect His throne (comp. the related but not identical expression, i. 15 and xliii. 10), i. e., He will sit in judgment, and the heads of the people must appear to receive their sentences. But Elam also at the end of days shall share in the salvation which the Lord shall then bring to all nations by the Messiah (comp. xlix. 6; xlviii. 47). It is also not to be doubted that this word of consolation applies not to Elam alone, but to all the nations before mentioned.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. On xlix. 1. Has then Israel no heir? So the prophet tells the Ammonites. But to Israel himself he speaks differently; I will cast you out from my presence, as I cast out all your brethren, the whole seed of Ephraim (vii. 15). Thus the Ammonites have no right in Israel, and Israel, although he has forfeited his claim with respect to Jehovah, still has a right to his country with respect to the Ammonites, which he will one day, through God's grace, make good again. "Israel will one day possess and rule his possessors and rulers. This is Israel's eternal calling, which, in spite of every sin, must again be manifested, and is fulfilled in the Christian church to which all nations are given as a possession. Even now Jeremiah by God's word, of which he is the bearer, has power over Ammon as over all the heathen world. He surveys their whole character, and already holds judgment. In him is Israel's majesty and triumph even though on this account he is most mocked by the Jews." (DIEDRICH). As then the servants of Malcom occupied the territory of Israel, so since then have the servants of Mohammed occupied the territory of the Christian church in Asia and Europe. In both cases it was a judgment on the latter without conferring any right on the former. A time, however, will come when the restoration of Israel and of Christianity to their country, and their right will take place at the same time.

2. On vers. 4, 5. "The real confidence of the world is always on Mammon. They would satisfy the deity with their dead self-devised works, but with desire and the tension of all their powers does the world serve material interests, as they are now-a-days called? Soon, however, Ammon's corn-fields are overflowed by enemies, then even their confidence gives way to despair." DIEDRICH.

3. On ver. 7. "We see here, how God puts to shame those who depend on their wisdom and craftiness, so that we may ask: is there no more wisdom or counsel among the wise? Is their wisdom come to naught? Paul also writes of this (1 Cor. i. 19, 20) from the prophet Isaiah (xxix. 14 coll. Jer. ix. 23, 24). Bibliche Summarien, etc.

4. On ver. 7 sqq. "Although Edom was the nation nearest to Israel both in relationship and acquaintance, it is thus only a precursor of Antichrist, who endeavors to hide a worldly character in Christian forms. Edom is irritated by the existence of Israel, the presence of the pure word of God is always a thorn in his conscience. From Edom came Herod who wanted to murder the child Jesus, and who also mocked the suffering Saviour. Edom was celebrated for wise proverbs; it possessed high mental endowments; but are not even these put to shame, when not accompanied by the fear of God?" DIEDRICH.

5. On ver. 12. Israel was the chosen nation, the son of the house (comp. Exod. iv. 22; Jer. xxxi. 9), and yet he was severely chastised. Further, there were in Israel many just and pious men, who did not share the sins of their people, but zealously contended against them. But even these also had to bear the severe chastening. "Prophets and priests were also carried away to Babylon; Daniel, Ezekiel and pious men like Ananiah, Azariah, Mishael, and probably very many others," says Theodoret. How then could another nation expect to be treated differently? Comp. Prov. xi. 31; 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18. There will, however, be a similarity also in this that finally the chastisement of both, the chosen nation and the other, will redound to their eternal welfare. Comp. ver. 39. PSA. cxix., cxxxvii.

6. On ver. 16. "Fortifications may be constructed and made due use of, but they must not be depended upon. For no fortification is too strong or too high when God is angry, and will punish. And he has various ways of bringing them into the hands of the enemies as, He can cause provisions to fail; or a spark to fall in a powder-magazine; water may be wanting; there may be pestilence or the dysentery or mutiny among the soldiers, or bribes may be used as scaling ladders. Then all is in vain." CRAMER. "What the world calls protection, cannot protect against God's judgment; death mounts over all rocks." DIEDRICH.

7. On ver. 19. "God gives all authority and respect, and takes it all away. For He it is, who poureth contempt upon princes, Job xii. 21; Ps. cvii. 40; Isa. xl. 23." CRAMER. ["We need not be surprised by such a searching question as that in the present passage concerning CHRIST, when we remember that Edom is the prophetic type of Christ's enemies," etc. WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

8. On ver. 25. "God can suffer moderate joyousness, but to be joyous from security and in an Epicurean manner, is commonly a preliminary to destruction, Matt. xxiv. 39." CRAMER.

9. On ver. 30. "Non est quo fugias a Deo irato, nisi ad Deum placatum, AUGUSTIN in Ps. lxxiv."—FÖRSTER.

10. On ver. 38. Where judgment is held there is the Lord's throne. For even the idea of judgment is divine, and all judges are the lower representatives of the highest judge. Woe to those judges who proceed so as to efface the idea which they represent. Well for us that there is a superior tribunal which will reverse all unjust judgments, and in all points bring true justice to the light, before which also summum jus will not be summa injuria.

11. On ver. 39. "In promissione spondetur Persis vocatio ad regnum Christi, cujus primitiæ fuerunt Magi (Matt. ii.), qui et ob id a Chrysostomo Patriarchæ gentium appellantur." FÖRSTER. [The fulfilment of this prophecy was seen, in part, when the Magi came to our Lord at Bethlehem; and still more on the day of Pentecost, when 'Parthians, Medes and Elamites' listened to the preaching of St. Peter at Jerusalem, and were received into the Christian church (Acts ii. 9, 14)."] WORDSWORTH.—S. 11. Prophecy against Babylon (chh. l., li.).

INTRODUCTION.

1. Before the battle of Carchemish Jeremiah predicted to his people a severe visitation by a people coming from the north, whom he afterwards recognized as the Chaldeans, and then constantly proclaimed that Israel and the other nations would be saved from complete destruction only by subjection to Nebuchadnezzar. It may, therefore, be said that during part of his ministry he spoke of the Chaldeans unknowingly in a manner favorable to them. There is no contradiction, however, as many suppose, in his here predicting the destruction of Babylon itself, and in the same manner by a people coming from the north (l. 3, 9, 41; li. 48). For Jeremiah would only say that for the present, in the proximate future, Babylon is the instrument of judgment on all nations (l. 23; li. 20 sqq.), but the time is coming when Babylon itself must drain the cup of wrath, in punishment for the sins which it has incurred in the execution of its mission (l. 11, 24, 28, 32; li. 6, 11, 24, 30, 56). Jeremiah's declarations for and against Babylon are thus related to each other, as in xxv. 27 the brief declaration, "and the king of Sheshach shall drink after them," is to the previous announcements that Babylon shall offer the cup of wrath. It is not strange to find a prophecy against Babylon in Jeremiah, but must be regarded as perfectly natural.

2. Prophecy against Babylon has a history. First, Isaiah, probably moved by the embassy, which Merodach-Baladan sent to Hezekiah (Isa. xxxix.; 2 Ki. xx. 12 sqq.) proclaimed the judgment of destruction on Babylon (Isa. chh. xliii., xiv., xxi.; xliii. 14; xlvi. 1-2; xvii.; xlviii. 14 sqq.). He is followed by Micah, who, in a brief declaration, comprises all which Jeremiah has said in his whole book for and against Babylon, "thou shalt dwell in the field, and thou shalt go to Babylon; there shalt thou be delivered; there the Lord shall redeem thee from the hand of thy enemies." Mic. iv. 10. Habakkuk then, the cotemporary of Jeremiah, prophesied before him, but after the battle of Carchemish, against Babylon, characterizing it not only in the narrower sense as a power hostile to the people of Israel, but also in a higher and more comprehensive sense as a worldly power, self-deifying, and the enemy of God. Jeremiah finally appropriates his predecessors and represents the acme of Old Testament prophecy against Babylon. He thus forms the main foundation for the prophecy of the Apocalypse concerning the Babylon of the final period. It is, however, to be observed that he gives relatively less prominence than Habakkuk to the ideal significance of Babylon as a type of ungodly, self-deifying, worldly powers. The latter does this in brief but wondrously profound and significant utterances. "For, lo, I raise up the Chaldeans, that powerful and irrepressible nation, which goes as far as the earth extends, to occupy dwellings which are not. Terrible and fearful are they: from themselves proceed their judgment and their dignity" (i. 6, 7). "Then he overflows with courage and transgresses and becomes guilty: this his power is unto his God" (i. 11). "Lo, inflated, not upright is his soul within him, but the just by faith shall live" (ii. 4). "Yea also because wine stultifies a man, who is arrogant and is not contented, who enlargeth his desire as hell, and is like death and cannot be satisfied, but draweth to himself all nations and gathereth to himself all nations" (ii. 5).—Jeremiah by no means passes over this element, but he rather intimates it only in single words, in those significant names which he gives to Babylon when he calls it Double defiance (l. 21), Pride (as personification in l. 31, 32), Heart of my opponents (li. 1), Golden cup making the whole earth drunk (li. 7). We may then say that of the two contemporary prophets, who lived to see the culmination of the Babylonian power, Jeremiah draws the grandest and most complete picture of the destruction menacing Babylon, but in such wise that he only intimates the ideal element which represents Babylon as the centre and type of all worldly enmity to God, while Habakkuk, who, notwithstanding the external insignificance of his little book, has a powerful and profound mind, gives us deeper glances into the inner life of the Babylonian empire.

3. It is not, however, the prophets who first stamped Babylon as a centre and type of ungodly empire. This character was impressed upon it from the earliest period. It was the locality of the first earthly principdom. That Nimrod, whose memory is preserved to the present day by the ruined tower of the Birs Nimrod, and who still lives in the traditions of the East as a great criminal and enemy of God, had, according to Gen. x. 8 sqq., Babylon as the beginning of his dominion. The first aristocrat, hero of the chase and of war, conqueror, and despot, proceeded from Babylon. Add to this, that the Babylonian tower-structure is, according to its most essential nature, to be regarded as an undertaking of human pride begun without God and in man's own strength. The tower was to be a memorial of a period of gigantic effort and aspiration towards the political concentration of the human race into one irresistible power. Thus we see that the ideas of earthly power and glory were from the first native to the soil of Babylon. Comp. NÆGELSB., Jer. u. Bab., S. 5 sqq.; PERIZONIUS, Orig. Babylonicæ, Cap. 10-12; JAHN, Archæology I., I, S. 80, coll. DEYLING, Observ. Sacræ., P. III., p. 19 ff.—BRIAN WALTON in his Polyglott, Lond., Prolegg. I., pag. 3; HETZEL, Gedanken über den babylonischen Thurmbau, Hildb., 1775; GÖRRES, Die Völkertafel des Pent., Regensburg, 1845, I, S. 51. The seed sowed in that primitive period reached its full bloom in Nebuchadnezzar. By him Babylon was really made the first "all-devouring" universal monarchy, by which I mean that his power was greater than that of the Assyrians before him, or the Persians and Romans after him. But he also devoured the theocracy, i. e., the only point on this earth where the kingdom of God was represented in the form of a human popular and civil life. Since that time the kingdom of God as such has had no place on earth. It is still as the church in the embrace of worldly power. Babylon, however, the first worldly power which brought the kingdom of God into this condition, appears from that time in the Scriptures as the worldly power, κατ' ἐξοχήν, so that not only what the Old Testament prophets declare of the different representatives of worldly dominion, of Egypt (Rev. xi. 8), Tyre (Rev. xviii. 11 coll. Ezek. xxvii.). Nineveh (Rev. xviii. 3, 5 coll. Nah. iii. 4; Jon. i. 2), is transferred in the New Testament to Babylon, but even the name of Babylon itself is attributed to the final form of the worldly power, antichristian Rome. Comp. Rev. xvii. 9, 18. See in general Rev. xiv. 8; xvi. 9, and especially chh. xvii., xviii. This subject is treated more in detail in NÆGELSB. Jer. u. Bab.

4. With regard to the etymology of the name Babylon there have been two opposite views. According to one, which was first broached by STEPHANUS BYZANTINUS and the Etymologicæ Magn. s. v. Βαβυλών, the name, designates Bel as the founder of the city. ΕΙΜΕΜΟΡΝ (Biblioth. d. bibl. Litt. III., S. 1001) accordingly explains בְּבֶל as arising from Bâb Bel, i. e.; porta or aula Beli. GESIENUS (Thesaur., pag. 212), TUCH and others modify this view, in so far that they translate בְּבֶל domus Beli, since the word is written in Arabic bâbel, and bâ is frequently used in Arabic names of cities for bî, bêl. KNOBEL (Gen., S. 123) derives Babel from Bar-bel, i. e., arx (βασις, בֵּרֶה) Beli. It is opposed however to these explanations that they are supported on partly much too recent and partly altogether insecure linguistic analogies. The other explanation is founded on Gen. xi. 7, 9 (נְבֻלָה שְׂפָתָם, ver. 7 and (כִּי שָׁם בְּבֶל יִשְׁפֹּט כָּל-הָאָרֶץ). According to this בְּבֶל arose from בְּבֶל. The punctuation of the first syllable is to be explained after the analogy of בְּבֶל for בְּבֶל, בְּבֶל for בְּבֶל (Ew. § 158, c; OLSH. § 71, § 189, a). For the Segol of the second syllable appeal might be made to בְּבֶל (DELITZSCH on Gen. xi. 9). The meaning would be confusio. Comp. Exod. xxix. 2, 40; Lev. ii. 4-6; further, בְּבֶל, farrago; בְּבֶל, troubling, blemish (Lev. xxi. 20). These explanations are also favored by the ancient translations. ONKELOS translates נְבֻלָה, Gen. xi. 7, by נְבֻלָה, ver. 9, by בְּבֶל, confudit. Comp. BUXTORF, Lex. Rabb. et Talm., pag. 309. The Peshito version has in xi. 9 babel (comp. CASTELLI, Lex., pag. 100); SAADIAH balbala confudit.—Comp. GABLER, Urgeschichte II. 2, S. 228. HÆVERNIC, Einleit. i. A. T., I., S. 147, 8.—The Babylonian monuments lead to still another etymology. According to OPPERT, namely (Exp. en. Mesop. II. S. 46), the word reads on the monuments Babi-ili, Babilu. Bab is the Semitic בַּב door, Ilu the Ἥλος in Diodorus, the Κρόνος of the Greeks, Saturn, the god of the deluge. The meaning of the name would then be Porta Dei diluvii. Comp. ib., S. 67, 157, 259.—Which of these explanations is the correct one is by no means decided, for even the cuneiform inscriptions, presupposing that they are correctly deciphered, represent a late date in relation to the origin of the name, and it is a question whether the Babylonian scholars themselves knew the correct etymology of the word. [Comp. also SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible, s. v., Babel, Babylon; RAWLINSON, Ancient Monarchies, I., p. 149; ib., Herodotus, II., p. 574; DR. PUSEY, Lectures on Daniel, p. 271, n, quoted in WORDSWORTH ad loc.—S. R. A.]

5. The genuineness of this prophecy has been shown by me in detail in my work Jeremia und Babylon, S. 69 ff. GRAF also acknowledges it (S. 580 ff.). Only EWALD and MEIER, so far as I know, still persist in maintaining its unauthenticity. "This portion evidently belongs to the last period of the exile, and cannot therefore proceed from Jeremiah," says the latter (Die prophet. Bücher d. A. T., S. 350, 2). I myself formerly regarded the passage l. 41-46 as a gloss, but I have now retracted this opinion. But after repeated investigation I cannot regard the passage li. 15-19 as original. Consult the exegesis. In respect to the word שְׁפָטָה, li. 41, also, my suspicions have not yet been removed.

6. In what manner the prophecy is related to its fulfilment has been fully shown in NÆGELSB. Jer. u. Bab., S. 135. I add to the remark there, that according to THEODORET Jews were the last inhabitants of the destroyed city of Babylon, the following notice from OPPERT (Exp. I., S. 135): "Hillah fut fondée par Seifeddaulet vers l'an 1100 à la place de l'antique ville de Babylone, τὸ ἄστυ. Jusque-là, des Juifs avaient habité seuls la ville ou plutôt les ruines de Babylone; en 1030 après Jesus-Christ ils quittèrent ces lieux." Many later witnesses thus corroborate the statement of THEODORET, that the people of Israel could not separate themselves from the corpse of the city, which had destroyed Jerusalem and the temple.

7. In regard to the division of the portion, I am no longer of opinion that the whole is to be discriminated into three main sections with thirteen subdivisions. I still think that three chronological stages may be distinguished, in so far as the destruction of Babylon is represented partly as future, now in the stage of preparation (comp. l. 9, 21, 26, 41) partly as present, in the process of execution (comp. l. 14, 24, 35, 43, etc.; li. 1, 11, 27), partly as already accomplished (comp. l. 2, 15, 46; li. 39, 41, 46, 57). And these three stages are so distributed that the first is chiefly in the beginning, the second chiefly in the middle, the third towards the close; but not so sharply defined that l. 21—li. 33 may be regarded as the second and the foregoing and following as the first and third divisions. The single tableaux or pictures, of which, according to the peculiar style of Jeremiah, the discourse consists, are more distinct. I find nineteen of these, exclusive of the superscription and the historical close. The exegesis will exhibit these in detail.

1. The Superscription.

L. 1.

- 1 The word which Jehovah spoke against Babylon, against the land of the Chaldeans, by Jeremiah the prophet.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The form of the superscription is like those in xlv. 1; xlvi. 13. The expression יְרֵמְיָהוּ is not found in any other superscription of Jeremiah's. It occurs in this sense only in xxxvii. 2. In my work, Jer. u. Bab., S. 22, I have proposed the hypothesis that there is in this an intimation that this prophecy, according to li. 59 sqq., was given only by the hand, not by the mouth of the prophet. יְרֵמְיָהוּ defines more particularly the idea of יְרֵמְיָהוּ and guards against too narrow a rendering. Comp. l. 8, 45; li. 51.

2. The cord broken; Israel free (Ps. cxxiv. 7).

- 2 Declare it among the nations,
 Publish it and erect a signal;
 Publish it, conceal it not.
 Say "Babylon is taken, with shame stands Bel,
 Merodach is thrown down, with shame stand her images,
 Thrown down are her idols."
 3 For a nation cometh against her from the north,
 And will make her land desolate,
 That no inhabitant shall be therein
 From man down to beast they flee; up, away!
 4 In those days and at that time, saith Jehovah,
 The children of Israel shall come,
 They and the children of Judah together;
 Weeping shall they come
 And seek Jehovah their God.
 5 After Zion shall they inquire,
 Their faces turned thitherward:
 "Come, let us join ourselves¹ to Jehovah.
 In a perpetual covenant² that shall not be forgotten."

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 5.—בָּאוּ וּנְלוּ. Both forms are Imperative, and there is no need either to take בָּאוּ as Perf. or to alter נְלוּ into נָלְיוּ (GRAF.). Comp. EWALD, §226, b; OLSH., §264; Joel iv. 11; Isa. xliiii. 9.

² Ver. 5.—בְּרִית עוֹלָם. Accus. modulis. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., §70, i; xxxi. 31, 32; xxxii. 40.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The prophet in the first two verses goes to work analytically, first (ver. 2) causing the destruction of Babylon to be proclaimed aloud to all nations, and then (ver. 3) saying, how and by whom this destruction will be accomplished. This analytic description serves him, however, only as a basis for a promise important to him above all, viz., that in those days the captives of Israel and Judah being liberated, will come home and be united to their God in an eternal and unforgettable covenant (vers. 4, 5).

Vers. 2, 3. Declare it . . . up, away. The importance of the matter is shown in the grandeur and animation of the opening, in which the summons to proclaim and the declaration of the destruction are five times repeated. Comp. iv. 5, 6; v. 20; xxxi. 7; xlvi. 14.—Erect a signal, *i. e., for the rapid spread of the tidings. Comp. li. 12, 27; iv. 6; vi. 1; Isa. v. 26; xliii. 2.—Conceal it not. The address seems to be to the friends of Babylon, who might be disposed to withhold this Job's post.—Taken. Comp. viii. 9; x. 14; xlvi. 24; xlviii. 1.—Bel and Merodach are not different deities, but one and the same (comp. DELITZSCH on Isa. xlvi. 1). The temple of Belus (comp. Herod. I. 181, 2) was also the temple of Marduk, as he is called on the monuments. Here he was worshipped as the Bilu rabu (בְּעֵל רַב) as deus augurationis and protective deity of Babylonia. "Toute la dynastie Babylonnienne (says OPPERT, Exp. en Mesop., Tom. II., p. 272) le met (Merodach) à la tête des Dieux, et l'inscription de Borsippa le nomme le roi du ciel et de la terre. Nebo prend la seconde place et les autres divinités ne paraissent que rarement." Comp. Tom. I, p. 178, 9.—That he is not Mars, as I formerly supposed and HAHN in DRECHSLER'S Jesaja on xxxi. 1 (II., 2, S. 212) directly maintains, is decidedly affirmed by OPPERT (p. 271).—The purport of the proclamation is expressed in vers. 2*b* and 3 only. From ver. 4 we have the words of the prophet, who predicts in what manner these results will be attained. This is seen from the imperfects יְהִיָּה, יִשָּׂא, etc.—A nation from the north. Comp. ver. 9. The destroyers of Babylon are to come from the north, and in li. 27, 28 nations to the north and north-east of Babylonia are mentioned. Comp. the map in NIEBUHR'S Ass. u. Bab., and S. 135, Ann. 1; 427, 8.—Moreover, the remarkable parallelism should be noticed, Babylon, once the nation from the north, menacing Israel, is now attacked by such a nation. Comp. ii. 15; iv. 7; ix. 9; xxxiii. 12; li. 62.

Vers. 4, 5. In those days . . . forgotten. The destruction of Babylon is immediately followed by the redemption. The prophets so regard it as to comprise all the stages of its fulfilment through several thousand years in one picture. To this picture belongs above all the reunion of the tribes of the northern and southern kingdom (comp. iii. 14-16) and then their honest conversion to the Lord (comp. iii. 21; xxxi. 9-19; Hos. iii. 5), the return to Zion (xxxii. 8), the conclusion of a covenant with Jehovah, which shall not be broken and forgotten like the first (comp. Gen. xvii. 10; Lev. xix. 5-7; Deut. xxix. and xxx.). Comp. also Jer. xx. 11; xxiii. 40.

3. The Chastisement of the Chastiser.

L. 6-13.

- 6 A lost herd¹ was² my people:
Their shepherds had led them astray on seductive mountains,³
From mountain to hill they went,
Forgot their fold.
- 7 Whoever found them devoured them,
And their oppressors said: We incur no guilt,
Because they have sinned against Jehovah,
The true pasturage and their fathers' hope, Jehovah.
- 8 Flee out of Babylon and—
Let them go⁴ forth out of the land of the Chaldeans,
And be as the rams before the sheep!
- 9 For behold, I raise and lead⁵ against Babylon
An assembly of great nations from the north country;

- They equip themselves against her, there⁶ she is taken—
 Their arrows⁷ like those of a successful⁸ hero, who returneth not empty, 10 And Chaldea shall become a prey;
 All that plunder her shall be satisfied, saith Jehovah.
 11 For thou rejoicedst,⁹ for thou exultedst, robber of my heritage,
 For thou skippedst like a thrashing¹⁰ calf
 And neighedst like the strong steeds.
 12 Your mother is put to great shame,
 She that bare you blushes.
 “Behold the last of the nations, wilderness, waste, and steppe,”
 13 Because of the wrath of Jehovah it shall be uninhabited,
 And shall be wholly a desolation:
 Whoever passeth by Babylon is amazed,
 And mocks her on account of all her strokes.

- Ver. 6.—The plural אֲבָרוֹת depends on the ideal plural in אָצַן. Comp. NÆGELS. Gr., § 105, 3; Gen. xxx. 38; Jer. xxxiii. 13; Job i. 14.
 2 Ver. 6.—The Chethibh הִיהָ is referred to the subject as e. g., in Gen. xxxi. 8. The Keri is therefore unnecessary.
 3 Ver. 6.—הֵרִים שׁוֹבְכִים. The Chethibh is usually read שׁוֹבְכִים (iii. 14, 22) the Keri שׁוֹבְכִים. I think, however, that we must read the Chethibh שׁוֹבְכִים (comp. xxxi. 8; xlix. 4), and understand it in the meaning of “alleviating, seductive mountains.” We then take the word in the same sense as those who follow the Keri, and find our support like them in passages like Isa. xlvii. 10. Comp. rems. on xxxi. 8.
 4 Ver. 8.—Chethibh אֲצָא. This sudden change of person is not uncommon. (Comp. v. 14; xii. 13; xvii. 13; xxi. 12 Chethibh); xxxi. 3; xxxvi. 29, 30; xlv. 3-6; xlvii. 7. NÆGELS. Gr., § 101, 2, Ann.
 5 Ver. 9.—מִעִיר וּמִיְעָלָה. Observe the paronomasia and compare li. 1, 11; Isai. xlii. 17.
 6 Ver. 9.—מִשָּׁם. If this word is regarded as local, it is difficult after לָהּ לָרֶכֶב לָהּ to find a suitable terminus a quo. I therefore prefer to understand it with ROSENUELLER, DE WETTE, UMBREIT, of time. Comp. Hos. ii. 17; Job xxxv. 12.
 7 Ver. 9.—הֲצִין. The suffix is to be referred to the entirety of those nations regarded as one male person.
 8 Ver. 9.—מִשְׁכִּיל. Comp. x. 21; xxiii. 5.
 9 Ver. 11.—The Keri הִתְשַׁחֲחִי, etc. is occasioned by הִתְשַׁחֲחִי, but is unnecessary, for the prophet conceives the Chaldean nation as one female individual, as in הֲצִין the enemies as one male. Comp. e. g., iii. 8-10, and אֲפִיבָם in ver. 12.
 10 Ver. 11.—רֶשָׁא. Part. from רָשָׁע to thrash (Hos. x. 11), רָשָׁא for רָשָׁא as e. g., Lam. iii. 12; comp. ÖLS. § 103, e, Ann. 164, b.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Israel has certainly sinned greatly by idolatry (ver. 6), and has therefore been deservedly chastised by his enemies (ver. 7). But now the hour of deliverance strikes (ver. 8), for the Lord sends against Babylon great hosts of nations from the north, who will attack it successfully (ver. 9). In consequence Babylon itself shall become a prey (ver. 10), and receive the punishment for having discharged its office as punisher of Israel with arrogant and malicious joy (ver. 11). It shall thus be the last of nations, and the country be a horrible wilderness (vers. 12, 13).

Vers. 6, 7. A lost herd . . . hope, Jehovah. Comp. Ezek. xxxiv. 4, 16; Ps. cxix. 176; Luke xv. 1, 6.—Their shepherds. Comp. x. 21; xii. 10; xxiii. 1 seq.—Seductive. The mountains may well be thus called, which by means of the worship of high-places practised upon them, exerted such an irresistible charm on the heart of carnal Israel. Comp. ii. 20; iii. 2; vi. 23; xvii. 2.—Whoever found them. Comp. ii. 3; x. 25; xxx. 16. In this expression there is evidently an intimation that Israel has been often devoured. The enemies had a certain degree of justification in this, but in yielding to the illusion that they could not sin against Israel, forsaken by his God, and could therefore do any thing to him, they incurred great guilt, as is seen in what follows.—True pasturage. Zion is called נִוְה־רֶעֶךָ in xxxi. 23. Here Jehovah Himself is so called, as elsewhere a fortress (Ps. xviii. 3) sun, shield (Ps. lxxxiv. 11), shade (Ps. cxxi. 5).—Father's hope. Comp. xiv. 8; xvii. 13.

Vers. 8-10. Flee . . . saith Jehovah. The tables are turned. Babylon must now suffer the punishment of injustice. The hour of deliverance has struck for Israel and the other nations held in bondage. Hence the summons is made to Israel to flee. Comp. Isa. xlviii. 20; lii. 11; Zech. ii. 10.—As the rams, etc. The sense is not both that Israel is to press forward in order to save himself before all, but rather that it is to go before all (comp. ver. 16) as an example and leader in the flight.—North. Comp. rems. on ver. 3.—Like those, etc. Comp. iv. 31; xvi. 22; NÆGELS. Gr., § 65, 3 Ann.—Who returneth, etc. Comp. 2 Sam. i. 22.—Chaldea, Kasdim as the name of the country, as in li. 24, 35; Ezek. xi. 24.—A prey. Comp. xlix. 32.

Vers. 11-13. For thou rejoicedst . . . stroke.—I take קְ simply as “for,” so that ver. 11 gives the reason why Chaldea is to become a prey. The imperfects then designate the action as continuing in the past. Comp. NÆGELS. Gr., § 87 f.; Jer. xv. 9; xxxvi. 18.—Vers. 12, 13 conclude the discourse with a lively description, sketched in a few powerful strokes of the condition of Babylon after the attack predicted in vers. 9, 10. The prophet beholds this as though it had been produced in his presence. Hence the perfects is put to shame, and blushes (xv. 9). Observe that the prophet here addresses the single individuals of the nation. Hence your mother and last of the nations. Comp. Ps. cxxxix. 9; Am. ix. 1; Jer. xxxi. 7.—Waste (רָצָה). Comp. li. 43.—Uninhabited. Comp. Isa. xliii. 20; Jer. xvii. 6, 25; xxx. 18.—Whoever passeth. Comp. xviii. 16; xix. 8; xlix. 17.

4. The Vengeance of Jehovah.

L. 14-16.

- 14 Array yourselves against Babylon round about, all ye archers, Shoot¹ at her, spare not² the arrows,
For against Jehovah hath she sinned.
- 15 Cry against her round about!
She stretcheth forth³ her hand;
Fallen are her bastions,⁴
Thrown down are her walls.
For Jehovah's vengeance it is.
Avenge yourselves on her!
As she hath done, do also unto her.
- 16 Exterminate the sower from Babylon,
And him that handleth the sickle at the time of harvest.
Before the destroying sword let every one turn to his people,
And every one flee into his own land.

³ Ver. 15.—Owing to the animation of style, the perfects are without the connecting Vau. Comp. Josh. vi. 5, 10, 16, 20; 1 Sam. xvii. 20.

⁴ Ver. 15.—חֲסִינֵיהָ or חֲסִינֵיהָ (Chetiabih) occurs here only. Likewise the form of the Keri חֲסִינֵיהָ. The root appears to be חֲסָה, from which at most in Hebrew the proper name חֲסִינֵיהָ is derived. Related, however, is חֲסָה, to be strong, firm (Arab. assa) from which חֲסָה (Isa. xvi. 7) the foundation-walls and the Aram. חֲסָה, plur. חֲסָה (Ezr. iv. 12; v. 16; vi. 3), which the prophet chose purposely. Comp. ver. 23. From the radical meaning "to be strong," may also be derived that of fortification, defence, bastion.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This picture is a supplement to the foregoing, and a further delineation of particular features. (a) The attack is described more in detail (vers. 14, 15 a); (b) the connection between the fall of Babylon and its malignant pride (ver. 11) traced through the idea of recompense and vengeance of Jehovah (vers. 14 b, 15 b); and (c) the desolation of Babylon, described generally in vers. 12, 13, is rendered more palpable in ver. 16 by the setting forth of single characteristic features.

Vers. 14, 15. Array . . . unto her.—Array evidently refers to equip (יָרָה), ver. 9, but as the attack was only ordered there in general, the manner of it is here more specially designated. Comp. ver. 29; xli. 9.—Both these verses correspond exactly in their structure. Each begins with a summons to attack, and closes with a causal sentence of the purport that this warlike proceeding is an act of Jehovah's vengeance. Yet there is a gradation in the two, for while in ver. 14 the attack is described in only its first stage, ver. 15 brings before us the last decisive storm in the words Cry against her, which has the surrender for its immediate consequence. That the words are to be understood in this sense, seems to me clear from round about. Comp. ver. 14. The triumphant cry sounds not from the environs, but from within the city.—Stretcheth forth her hand. This is a token of subjection. Det manus vincique se patiat. CICERO, De Amic. Cap. 26 fin. Comp. 2 Chron. xxx. 8; Lam. v. 6.—For Jehovah's, etc. This point also is here expressed more strongly than in ver. 14 b, and thus forms the transition from ver. 14 to the threatening of judgment. Babylon has called forth the vengeance of Jehovah by its malicious pleasure and arrogant violence. Comp. ver. 28; li. 6, 11, 36; xli. 10.—As she hath done. Comp. ver. 29; Ps. cxxxvii. 8; Rev. xviii. 6, 7.

Ver. 16. Exterminate . . . his own land. This verse also specializes a general idea expressed in the previous context, viz., that of desolation, and this from two points of view. It is first said that what had hitherto been an ornament of the city, and had increased their power of resistance, viz., the fields inside the walls (Diod. Sic., II. 9; CURR. v. 4; PLIN. Hist. Nat., XVIII. 17), will be given up to desolation for lack of men. It is evident that the prophet had these fields within the city in view from the fact that he is describing the siege of the city of Babylon throughout. Then, however, he predicts the flight of all who are not Babylonians (for the Babylonians will fall by the sword), Israel at their head (ver. 8). Comp. xlv. 16; Isa. xiii. 14.

—Destroying sword. Comp. xxv. 28; xlv. 16. In the latter passage the LXX. translates as here, μήχανα ἰσχυρὰ, which Theodoret explains: πρὸ τῆς Βαβυλώνης Ἀσπίς ὁ Κίριος κτεταραστός καὶ Ἰωνᾶς καὶ Ἀβύρας. Another explanation is given by WALTON (Polyglott, Lond., Tom. I., pag. 47. Introd.): Ira columbæ [xxv. 28], gladius columbæ designant iram et gladium Chaldeorum, in quorum labaro erat columba argentea pennis inauratis Samiramem representans.

5. The Happy Turn.

L. 17-20.

- 17 A scattered sheep is Israel, which the lions chased.¹
 First the king of Assyria devoured him,
 And last this Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones.²
 18 Therefore thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth, the God of Israel;
 Behold, I visit the king of Babylon and his land . . .
 As I have visited the king of Assyria.
 19 And I bring Israel home to his pasturage,
 To pasture on Carmel and Bashan,
 And on mount Ephraim and Gilead his soul shall be satisfied.
 20 In those days, at that time, saith Jehovah,
 The iniquity of Israel shall be sought for,³—and it is gone!
 And the sins of Judah—but thou findest them not.⁴
 For I will pardon him whom I reserve.

² Ver. 17.—שׁוֹרֵץ here only. It is formed like שׂוֹרֵץ, denominative from שׂוֹרֵץ. As this signifies “to strip off, to gnaw off” (Num. xxiv. 8; Ezek. xxiii. 34), so the former means “to bone, to destroy the bones.”

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Hitherto Israel has been a poor frightened sheep, driven and devoured by two mighty wild animals, Assyria and Babylon (ver. 17); but the tables are to be turned. Assyria has already received its chastisement. That of Babylon will not be deferred (ver. 18). Then will Israel again feed peaceably on his own pasture (ver. 19). The reason of this wonderful change consists in this, that the Lord will show kindness to His people and forgive them all their iniquity (ver. 20).

Vers. 17-19. A scattered . . . be satisfied. Assyria destroyed the northern, Babylon the southern kingdom. In both cases the destruction was complete, and consequently represented by the figure of devouring, only with this difference that as a still higher degree the breaking of the bones is mentioned in the second case. After the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes the kingdom of Judah still remained as the skeleton of the theocracy. In destroying Jerusalem and the temple Nebuchadnezzar, as it were, broke its bones.—As I have visited. Comp. xlv. 25. The then already long past destruction of Nineveh is thus the type and pledge of the destruction of Babylon.—Bring Israel home. Comp. As in the mention of Assyria and Babylon, vers. 17, 18, there was a reference to the community of the two halves of the theocratic nation in misfortune, so here their union in prosperity is expressly set forth. Comp. rem. on ver. 4. The reason of their restoration to prosperity is here mentioned; Jehovah's grace which will grant forgiveness to the survivors, and cause their guilt to disappear without a trace.

6. One Hammer crushed by the Other.

L. 21-23.

- 21 Against the land of DOUBLE-DEFIANCE;¹
 Go up against it and against the inhabitants of VISITATION!
 Slay² and burn after them, saith Jehovah,
 And do according to all that I commanded thee!
- 22 Cry of war in the land and great ruin!
- 23 How is the hammer of the whole earth crushed and broken!
 How is Babylon become a horror of desolation among the nations!

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 21.—EWALD has well remarked that the word כְּרָתִים is used in antithesis to אֲרָם-נְהָרִים, Mesopotamia. Not Double-river, but Double-defiance (comp. Zweibrücken [Etipontes] in Germany) was to be Babylon's title. For similar names comp. c. g., Mic. i. 10. The word does not occur elsewhere. It may be derived from כָּרַר, although the mention of Israel by this name (Ezek. ii. 7; xlv. 6) may be regarded as analogous to, or an imitation of (comp. פְּקוּד, ver. 21, and Ezek. xxiii. 23) this expression. A singular כָּרָה from כָּרָה, rebellis fuit, also does not occur. כְּרָתִים is a new form made by the prophet. FUERST would derive it from כָּרַת, to which he ascribes the meaning of "lordship." But the analogies כוֹרָה (Job xxxvi. 22; Aram. כָּרָא, כָּר, כָּרִים, כָּרוֹת, Mic. i. 12) are very uncertain, and admit of another explanation. The word כָּרָה, rebellis fuit, is always used elsewhere of Israel, but this limitation of the use is not necessarily founded in the radical signification. There is no reason then why a word formed from the root, new and specially ad hoc, should not be applied in another case. In regard to the dual it is ungrammatical to attribute to it the significance of a climax, which it never has elsewhere.

² Ver. 21.—הָרַב a denominative from הָרַב. Comp. ver. 27; 2 Ki. iii. 23.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A complete picture, the specific element of which is the prophet's showing how the Lord sends a chosen instrument to crush Babylon, which has hitherto served Him as such in the chastisement of mankind. In brief but powerful lines is described the summons to the instrument (ver. 21), the execution of the commission (ver. 22), the result (ver. 23).

Vers. 21-23. Against the land . . . among the nations. What is meant by the double defiance it is difficult to say. We may regard it not inappropriately as the double visitation of the theocratic nation by Assyria and Babylon (vers. 17, 18). The name, however, is given only to Babylon, which according to this view represents only half the defiance. The connection seems to require an interpretation according to which Babylon itself receives the whole reproach, and here, as it seems to me, two points may be observed: 1. The defiance which Babylon manifested both towards man and God, in revolting against the king of Assyria its master, and in sinning against Jehovah by its arrogant demeanor towards Israel. 2. The double defiance, which Babylon manifested in the earliest period in the erection of the tower of Babel and the founding of the first worldly kingdom (Gen. x. 8 sqq.), and in later times by its behaviour towards the theocracy. I formerly inclined to the latter view, but now give the former the preference, because it is more natural and presents more clearly the element of doubleness. For the sin of Babylon against the Lord in earlier and more recent times is too entirely one and the same for it to be represented as a double one.—Against it. Comp. ver. 3. The singular appears to me to be due to a different reason from that in ver. 3, for there we find גּוֹי, nation, which according to what follows is to be taken as collective. Here, however, the subject is left indefinite. This is the more surprising, as previously the enemies of Babylon are always called upon in the plural (vers. 14-16). When then in the following ver. 23 Babylon is designated as the crushed hammer, i. e. as the instrument of Jehovah, which He Himself has destroyed, is it not most natural to regard as the subject of the imperative in ver. 21 the instrument of which the Lord will make use in the destruction of His former instrument? Then, however, it is natural to place over against the Babylonian hammer (כְּטִישׁ, comp. GROTIUS ad loc.), viz., Nebuchadnezzar, another hammer, i. e. over against the already known and mentioned (ver. 17) representative of the first empire, the representative (certainly only sometimes present in the idea) of the other empire called to its destruction. Comp. li. 20.—Visitation is also a name formed ad hoc, and given to Babylon in antithesis to its double-defiance, which deserves visitation. Thus the former name designates Babylon's guilt, the latter its punishment. Comp. vers. 18 and 31 and Ezek. xxiii. 23, which passage is based on this. Comp. HAEVERNICK on the passage.—Burn. Comp. xxv. 9.—Cry of war, etc. Comp. iv. 6; vi. 1; xiv. 17; xlviii. 3; li. 54.—How, etc. Comp. Isa. xiv. 12; Jer. li. 20, 41.

7. Babylon surprised and destroyed, Israel liberated.

L. 24-28.

- 24 I have placed¹ a net for thee and thou art also taken,
 O Babylon, and thou knowest it not.
 Thou art found and also caught,
 For against Jehovah hast thou striven.²
- 25 Jehovah hath opened his arsenal,
 And brought forth the weapons of his wrath;
 For the LORD Jehovah Zebaoth hath a work in the land of the Chaldeans.
- 26 Come hither even the last, open her storehouses,³ Cast it up as heaps of rubbish and burn it,⁴ Let there be nothing left of it.
- 27 Slay all her bullocks,
 Down with them to the slaughter-house!
 Woe unto them, for their day is come,
 The time of their visitation.
- 28 Hark! the fleeing and escaped from the land of Babylon,
 To proclaim in Zion the vengeance of Jehovah, our God,
 The vengeance of his sanctuary.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In this picture the element of secrecy and surprise as excluding all resistance, which will prevail at the capture of Babylon, is made prominent (ver. 24). This mode of capture is rendered possible by the Lord's having opened His armory and brought into use all the means of attack which it affords. He has done this because He would manage the business with Babylon as a matter of the highest importance (ver. 25). As now, however, the Lord has emptied His arsenal against Babylon, so also shall all store-houses in Babylon be emptied and all living and dead treasures contained therein be destroyed (vers. 26, 27). The escaped of Zion, however, shall bring home the joyful tidings of Jehovah's vengeance (ver. 28). We see that these verses also furnish a complete picture progressing from the beginning to the close with special prominence of single specific elements.

Ver. 24. I have placed . . . striven. In this placing of a net or snare lies the element of commencement on account of which we regard this verse as the commencement of a new picture. This must be so the rather as ver. 23 evidently contains a conclusion. The prophet in spirit sees Babylon unexpectedly caught in a net or snare. How literally this would be fulfilled Jeremiah himself might have no idea (comp. 1 Pet. i. 11). Twice was Babylon taken by stratagem, and both times so that the city was in the power of its enemies, before it was aware. Herodotus says (I. 191), with reference to the capture by Cyrus, that if the Babylonians had known or observed his plan (the diversion of the Euphrates) they could have inflicted great injury on the Persians. But these came upon them quite unexpectedly (ἐξ ἀπροσδοκήτου σφί παρέστησαν οἱ Πέρσαι), the outer parts of the city being already taken before those who dwelt in the central parts had observed what was going on (τοῖς τὸ μέσον οἰκιστοῖς οἱ μανθάνει ἑαλωκοτας). With reference to the capture by Zopyrus, however, he says (III. 158) that a part of the Babylonians, who saw the entrance of the Persians through the gate opened by Zopyrus, fled, the rest remaining every one in his place till they also perceived that they were betrayed (ἐς ὃ δὴ καὶ οἱ τὴν ἐπιπλοὴν προέδραμον).

Vers. 25-28. Jehovah . . . sanctuary. The capture of a city like Babylon by an overwhelming surprise is not possible without great means. Such are now provided by Jehovah, for He opens His arsenal (comp. x. 13; li. 16) to take from it all necessary implements of war (comp. Isa. xiii. 5). This He does because He has a בְּיָמֵינוּ, a business in the land of the Chaldeans.

A business or work of Jehovah is always a great and important matter, and is therefore not to be performed negligently (xlvi. 10). To the execution of this work He now summons His servants and instruments (ver. 26), who are to come יָבֹאוּ . If we refer this to the city (attacked from the end, not from the middle) the meaning is feeble and unsuitable, for a city can only be attacked from without and thus from the ends of it. If it be rendered "from all ends" (round about, vers. 15, 29) we miss the word for "all." Hence it is best to take it with EWALD and GRAF

=ad unum omnes. If the outermost come, all come. Comp. Gen. xix. 4; xlvii. 2; Isa. lvi. 11; Ezek. xxxiii. 2. To the opening of the arsenal of Jehovah is to correspond the violent breaking open and emptying of the storehouses of Babylon.—Slay all, etc. The bullocks are the representatives and chief personages of the human population. 8. The Punishment of Pride.

L. 29-32.

- 29 Call against Babylon archers;¹
 All ye that bend the bow camp against it round about!²
 No escape! Recompense her according to her work,
 Just as she hath done, do ye also unto her,
 For against Jehovah was she proud,
 Against the Holy One of Israel.
 30 Therefore shall her young men fall in her streets,
 And all her warriors shall be cut off in that day, saith Jehovah.
 31 Behold I come to thee, O Pride, saith the Lord, Jehovah Zebaoth.
 For come is thy day, the time of thy visitation.
 32 Then Pride totters and falls,
 And none helps him up;
 And I kindle a fire in his cities,
 Which shall devour all round about.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 29.— רַבֵּי . As there is no substantive here as in ver. 41; xvi. 16, the meaning appears to be different. Derived from רָבַרְב (Gen. xlix. 23; Ps. xviii. 15 coll. רַבֵּרַב Gen. xxi. 20) רַב is found with the meaning of "archer," also in Job xvi.

² 13; Prov. xxvi. 10.

² Ver. 29.— אֶל-יְהוָה . The Keri unnecessarily adds הָ from ver. 26.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Warriors are summoned to recompense Babylon for the pride which it has manifested towards Jehovah (ver. 20). Its men shall perish (ver. 31). Thus will the Lord on the day of recompense bring their pride to totter and fall; no one will raise it up, fire will consume all its power (vers. 31, 32).

Ver. 29. Call . . . of Israel. Convocatio militum initium belli. Comp. ver. 14. הַשְׁמִיטֵנִי is taken by most commentators and translators in the sense of vocare, convocare, as in li. 27; 1 Ki. xv. 22 coll. 1 Sam. xv. 4.—All ye, etc. Comp. ver. 14.—Recompense, etc. Comp. ver. 15; xxv. 14.—Proud. Deserved humiliation of the pride of Babylon is predicted by earlier prophets: Isa. xiii. 11; xiv. 13 sqq.; xlvii. 7, 8; Hab. ii. 5, 8.—Holy One of Israel. Comp.

li. 5. This expression is peculiar to Isaiah. "All Isaiah's prophecies bear this name of God as their peculiar stamp. It occurs twelve times in chh. i.-xxxix., seventeen times in chh. xl.-lxvi." DELITZSCH on Isa. vi. 3.

Vers. 30-32. Therefore . . . round about. Ver. 30 is repeated almost verbatim from xlix. 26. The only difference is that here we have her warriors for the warriors. The verse is not necessary, but rather disturbing, for ver. 31, is closely connected by Pride with ver. 29 (pride). 9. Israel Free, the Sword upon Babylon.

L. 33-40.

- 33 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth :
 Oppressed are the children of Israel and the children of Judah together,
 And all their captors hold them fast,
 They refuse to let them go.
- 34 Their Redeemer is strong, Jehovah Zebaoth is his name.
 He will well prosecute their cause,
 That he may give rest¹ to the land,
 And procure disquiet to the inhabitants of Babylon.
- 35 A sword upon the Chaldeans, saith Jehovah,

 And upon her princes and upon her wise men.
- 36 A sword upon the coxcombs, that they become fools,
 A sword upon her heroes, that they be dismayed.
- 37 A sword upon their horses and their chariots,
 And upon all her auxiliaries in her midst, that they become as women,
 A sword upon her treasures, that they be plundered.
- 38 Drought² upon her waters, that they dry up ;

³ Ver. 38.— יָבֵשׁ is used for "idols" here only. Comp. Gen. xiv. 5; Deut. ii. 10, 11; Ps. lxxxviii. 16; Job xx. 25. [In Ps. lxxxviii. 16 the word is translated "terrors."]

⁴ Ver. 39.— יָבֵשׁ (in Jeremiah here only, comp. besides Ps. lxxxii. 9; Dan. xi. 30) from יָבֵשׁ , d. certum, are inhabitants of the desert, especially wild beasts. יָבֵשׁ from יָבֵשׁ (to howl, comp. DELITZSCH on Isa. xlii. 21) are jackals. Ibn-Awi is the Arabic name for jackal. Our translation "Shubus and Uhus" [horned owls], is based on formal grounds. [UMMER and BLAYNEY read "wild-beats and jackals" or "wild-dogs." Itizic as in the text.—S. R. A.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Proceeding from the condition of bondage in which Judah and Israel are found (ver. 33), the prophet predicts deliverance by the strong hand of Jehovah (ver. 34), which to Babylon signifies destruction of all that supports its power and glory: the inevitable fate of an idolatrous people (vers. 35-38). In consequence of this Babylonia will become a deserted and horrible waste (vers. 39, 40).

Vers. 33, 34. Thus saith . . . inhabitants of Babylon. The prophet, who knows the exile of Israel as an accomplished fact and has predicted for years the exile of Judah as impending, may well describe Judah and Israel as oppressed, held fast by their captors (צָרִים , captivatores, Isa. xiv. 2; 1 Ki. viii. 46 sqq.; Ps. cxxxvii. 3). It is the same thought which lies at the foundation of the summons to flight (ver. 8 coll. vers. 4 and 28).—They refuse, etc. As Pharaoh, Exod. vii. 14-27; ix. 2.—The strong captor is, however, opposed by a still stronger deliverer of Israel,—Jehovah. With the exception of the words "Jehovah Zebaoth is His name" (x. 16; xxxi. 35; xxxii. 18; xxxiii. 2), the first half of ver. 34 is taken from Prov.

xxiii. 11 coll. xxii. 23; Isa. xlvii. 4; xlviii. 20.—That he may give rest, etc. Since it may be appropriately declared of Babylon, as the "hammer of the whole earth," ver. 23, that it has disquieted the earth (Isa. xiv. 16), and that consequently its disquieting must contribute to the peace of the earth, I agree with those who take שָׁלוֹם in its usual meaning, "to make rest, quiet" (Deut. xxviii. 65; Isa. xxxiv. 14; li. 4; Jer. xxxi. 2).

Vers. 35-38. A sword . . . foolishly trust. In these verses it is specially shown how the Lord will conduct His cause with Babylon and bring disquiet upon it. The sword is as it were cited to exercise the office of avenger, both in general and in particular. For as its objects are designated: 1. the Chaldeans in general; 2. the inhabitants of the capital, with the resident princes, wise men (counsellors of the king), Magians (מַגִּיֵּן, "talk, chattering," xlviii. 39; Isa. xvi. 6; Job xi. 3; here personally the lying prophets, astrologers, Isa. xlv. 25, comp. DELITZSCH ad loc.; xlvii. 13, xix. 13) and warriors; 3. horses, chariots and auxiliaries (xxv. 20; comp. НЕВУНН, Ass. u. Bab., S. 206 Ann. 2 and the article "Griechen" in the Register S. 519; li. 30); 4. treasures and water, on which last the power and safety of Babylon in great measure depended. (Comp. li. 13, 36; Isa. xxi. 1 and DELITZSCH ad loc.).—For it is a land, etc. This sentence corresponds to ver. 34. As there the positive reason of the destruction breaking over Babylon is stated, so here the negative. The positive ground is the strength of Jehovah (שִׁיבָה, ver. 34), the negative is the powerlessness of the idols. Comp. li. 47, 52.—Foolishly trust. The prefix שָׁ [on] may designate either the means and instrument, or the supporting or moving reason. The former yields the conception that the idol-images served as the instruments of mad behaviour, the latter that they were the ground thereof. Without doubt the latter is the more correct. The senseless, inflated, arrogant behaviour of the Babylonians was supported by their belief in idols. Comp. שָׁ with שָׁ in ii. 8 and the Greek μαίνεσθαι ἰπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ. HEROD. IV. 79.

Vers. 39, 40. Therefore shall . . . sojourn in her. The first half of ver. 39 is composed of reminiscences from Isaiah (Isa. xiii. 21, 22; xxxiv. 14). The second half of the verse is taken verbatim from Isa. xiii. 20. Comp. ver. 13; xvii. 6. Ver. 40 is a repetition of xlix. 18, but taken originally from Isa. xiii. 19 coll. Am. iv. 11. The original passage on which all these prophetic utterances are based is Deut. xxix. 22.—Comp. xlix. 33; li. 43.

10. Non tu, sed tibi.

L. 41-46.

- 41 Behold, a people cometh from the north,
And a great host and many kings break up from the ends of the earth.
- 42 Bow and lance they bear,
Cruel are they¹ and without compassion.
Their sound roareth like the sea,
And on horses they ride equipped like a man for the battle Against thee, thou daughter of Babylon.
- 43 The king of Babylon hath heard the report of them,
And his hands are feeble;
Anguish hath seized him, trembling as a parturient.
- 44 Behold, like a lion he ascends
From the pride of Jordan to the evergreen pasturage,
For in a twinkling I drive her² from thence,
And—who is chosen? Him I set over her.
For who is like me, and who will order me?
And who is the shepherd who may stand before me?
- 45 Therefore hear the counsel of Jehovah that he hath counselled against Babylon;
And his thoughts which he hath thought against the land of the Chaldeans:
Yea, they will be dragged away, the weak little sheep,
Yea, the pasturage will be amazed concerning them.
- 46 With the cry, "Babylon is taken," the earth trembles,
And a crying is heard³ among the nations.

³ Ver. 46.—נשכתי is occasioned by xlix. 21, and moreover comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., §60, 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This entire passage consists of quotations, vers. 41-43 being taken from vi. 22-24, vers. 44-46 from xlix. 19-21. As the prophet has already repeatedly designated the enemy as one coming from the north, it was natural to apply the former prophecy of the enemy threatening Judah from the north to Babylon, and it must also be admitted that the prophet would find it appropriate to transfer the prophecy of the chosen instrument for the destruction of Edom (xlix. 19-21) to the similarly chosen instrument of the destruction of Babylon. Although thus the quotations here are accumulated to a degree greater than heretofore, I am yet convinced (contrary to my former view in Der proph. Jer. u. Bab., S. 128 ff.) that the passage is genuine and original. The idea of the unity of God's judgments and of just recompense was to be represented here. This would receive no detriment, even if every single feature of the former prophecies did not seem adapted to be applied to Babylon. This, however, is not the case, for we find in the text such modifications as the application to Babylon required; daughter of Babylon, ver. 42; King of Babylon, ver. 43; against Babylon and the land of the Chaldeans, ver. 45; Babylon is taken, ver. 46; among the nations, for, in the Red Sea, ver. 46. What is not altered is not then opposed, according to the author's judgment, to its application to Babylon. The figure in ver. 41 a is therefore not inappropriate. The pride of Jordan and evergreen pasturage belong to the picture. The lion, which, from the reed-thickets on the Jordan, falls upon the flocks feeding near the bank (comp. rems. on xlix. 19), is a figure which may be applied to any case of overpowering hostile attack. Likewise the description of the northern people (vi. 23) is by no means so special that it may not be applied to any people advancing with warlike impetuosity. Moreover, Jeremiah, when he wrote vi. 22-24, neither had the Chaldeans specially in view, nor are they so very different from their neighbors, the Medes.

The addition and many kings in ver. 41 is thus explained, that in the conception of the prophet the picture was present of a host of enemies, composed of many different elements (comp. li. 27, 28).

11. The Heart of the insurgents, the Fanners and the Invidiate.

LI. 1-6.

- 1 Thus saith Jehovah:
Behold, I raise up against Babylon,
And against the inmates of the heart of my insurgents
A destroying wind.¹
- 2 And I sent unto Babylon fanners,²
Who shall fan it and empty out its land,
For upon it are they from all sides in the day of calamity.
- 3 Against him that bendeth let the archer bend his bow,
And against him who lifteth himself up³ in his harness,⁴
And spare ye not her young men,
Banish ye the entire host.
- 4 That the slain fall in the land of the Chaldeans,
And the pierced through in her streets.
- 5 For Israel and Judah are not widows⁵ from their God,⁶ Jehovah Zebaoth,
But their land is full of guilt on account of the Holy One of Israel.
- 6 Flee out of Babylon, and let every man deliver his soul;
Let not destruction come upon you through their sin.
For it is a time of vengeance for Jehovah,
He rendereth recompense unto her.

- 2 Ver. 2.—וְרִים. The analogy of xlvi. 12 seems to require the punctuation וְרִים. וְרִים is very troublesome. Although violence by strangers is spoken of in many places (comp. ver. 51), this idea does not at all suit this connection, and the frequent occurrence of וְרִים while וְרִים is not found elsewhere (only וְרִים occurs in Ruth iii. 2), may indeed have occasioned the Masoretic punctuation, unless וְרִים itself may be taken as Part. Kal. after the analogy of הָרָה, יָרָה, כָּלָה, etc. (comp. OLSU., § 245, a).
- 3 Ver. 3.—וְאֵל-יָתֵעַל. This is the main difficulty in ver. 3. For, 1. this Hithp. form does not occur elsewhere, 2. the abbreviated Imperfect form, if the word comes from עָלָה, is surprising. According to the laws of the Hebrew language, however, יָתֵעַל can come only from עָלָה (comp. OLSU., § 269, d). It must then signify "lift one's self up." Then the abbreviated form is strange, which might be in place after אֵל, but not after אֵל. I do not think, however, that we need be so scrupulous in the matter. As in Jeremiah (and elsewhere) the full form stands where we should expect the abbreviated (comp. iii. 7; EW., § 224, c), so may the latter stand where we should expect the former. Comp. Jer. xvii. 8, Chethibh; EWALD, § 224, c, Ann.; GES., § 123, 2, Ann. Then the rest, according to the reading of the Chethibh, affords no difficulty. - 6 Ver. 5.—מְאֹרְהוּ. Pregnant construction. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 112, 7.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Babylon, the heart of Jehovah's opponents, shall be fanned like chaff (vers. 1, 2). Without a figure; a strong, warlike power shall east down Babylon (vers. 3, 4). For Israel and Judah are not forsaken widows; rather shall they be delivered and Jehovah's vengeance executed on Babylon (vers. 5, 6).—The passage thus consists of two halves: vers. 1-4, and vers. 5, 6. In the first half the judgment on Babylon is announced, (a) under the figure of fanning, vers. 1, 2; (b) in unfigurative language, vers. 3, 4. The second half is related to the first as a statement of the reason (FOR, ver. 5). The judgment, namely, is impending, because the Lord will show Himself a faithful husband with respect to Israel, a righteous recompenser with respect to Babylon.

Ver. 1, 2. Thus saith calamity.

Whether לִבְ קַמִּי [heart of my insurgents] is to be explained by the Athash [or principle of alphabetical inversion, according to which it is equivalent to Casdim, the Chaldeans] is doubtful, for the expression might be used by the prophet without any reference to that permutation of letters. As he called Babylon Double-defiance and Visitation in l. 21 and Pride in l. 31, so might he call it Heart-of-my-insurgents. This designation was a natural one. It is founded in the significance which the idea of Babylon has in the consciousness of the entire Old and New Testament prophecy. For though it is only in the Apocalypse that Babylon is distinctly set forth as the comprehensive centre of all and every hostility to the Lord and His kingdom (comp. NÆGELSB. Jer. u. Bab., S. 10 ff.), this representation is rooted in the views of the Old Testament prophets concerning Babylon, and we shall not err if we regard this passage as the chief basis of this conception of Babylon by the New Testament revelator, according to which it is declared to be the "Mother of harlots and abominations of the earth" (Rev. xvii. 5). Still it is remarkable that the name כְּסִיָּים should form, according to the Cabbalistic play upon words, an expression with a suitable meaning (comp. Buxtorf, Lex. Chald., p. 248, 9; Herzog, Real-Enc., VII., S. 205). The expression הַיָּעִיר רִיחַ signifies indeed everywhere else (ver. 11; Hagg. i. 14; Ezr. i. 1, 5; 1 Chron. v. 26; 2 Chron. xxi. 16; xxxvi. 22) "to awaken, excite the spirit." But the expression is not necessarily restricted to this meaning. In this passage where fanning is spoken of, the context requires the meaning "wind." It seems that the expression first began to come into use in the time of Jeremiah, for previously it does not occur. It is however quite natural that a mode of expression still in its formative state should at first waver in its signification. Only when it has become fixed by long usage in a definite sense can it no longer be taken in another sense without misapprehension.—Who shall fan. Comp. xlix. 32, 36.—And empty. Comp. xix. 1, 7; Isa. xxiv. 1; Nah. ii. 3. Here the prophet passes from the figurative to the literal mode of speech, for the fanning will consist in just this, that the land will be emptied, men and property being carried away.—For upon it, etc. Comp. iv. 17; xvii. 17, 18.

Ver. 3-6. Against him unto her.—Spare not, etc. Comp. Isa. xiii. 18; Jer. 1. 14.—Fall, etc. Comp. vers. 47, 49, 52; xxxvii. 10; Isa. xiii. 15.—Not widows, etc. Comp. Isa. l. 1; liv. 4-6; Lam. i. 1.—Their is to be referred to Babylon. The sense of this half of the verse is: it might appear as if the Lord were better disposed towards Babylon than Israel, because the latter is a captive in the power of the former. It is not so. Babylonia is laden with guilt with respect to Jehovah, and is therefore under the curse of the Holy One of Israel. I do not see what there is unlike Jeremiah in this verse. That אֲשָׁמָה for guilt does not occur elsewhere in Jeremiah is nothing to the point. The occurrence of the expression Holy One of Israel here, as in l. 29, is not strange in view of the frequent quotations from Isaiah. With respect to the connection with the preceding and following contexts, however, it should be mentioned that ver. 5 in an exceedingly appropriate manner gives a double reason for the announcement contained in vers. 1-4: 1. a negative one (Israel is not rejected); 2. a positive one (Babylon is full of guilt). Ver. 5 is also connected with ver. 6 in two ways: 1. as an integral part of the entire discourse, vers. 1-5, in so far that ver. 6 draws the inference from all that has gone before (vers. 1-5); 2. specially by the words, "Let not destruction come upon you through their sin," which apparently refer to "their land is full of guilt."—Flee, etc. Comp. Isa. xiii. 14; xlviii. 20; Jer. xlviii. 6; l. 8.—Let not, etc. Comp. xlix. 26; l. 30—Gen. xix. 15.—For it is a time, etc. Comp. 12. The golden Cup broken.

LI. 7-10.

- 7 A golden cup was Babylon in the hand of Jehovah,
Which made all the earth drunken:
Of its wine have nations drunk,
And nations have become mad.
- 8 Suddenly is Babylon fallen and shattered:
Howl over her, take balsam for her pain,
If so be she may be healed.
- 9 We have healed¹ Babylon, but she was not healed:
Forsake her and let us go each into his own country:
For her judgment reacheth² unto heaven,
And towers up even to the clouds.
- 10 "Jehovah hath brought forth our righteous works:
Come and let us declare in Zion the work of Jehovah, our God."

² Ver. 9.—On יָרָדָה specially comp. iv. 10, 18.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These verses also contain a picture complete in itself. For the prophet shows us first Babylon at the height of its power, when it was like a golden cup, in which Jehovah gave the nations the wine of His wrath to drink (ver. 7). Now the parts are changed. Babylon is itself "a sick man," and the prophet therefore calls upon the nations that have become tributary to him to give him medicine (ver. 8). These answer that they had tried this in vain, and mutually expect each other to flee from the common prison (ver. 9). Israel is one among these nations, and therefore calls upon those who belong to it to journey home, and in their home declare the mighty acts of the Lord in the deliverance and justification of His people (ver. 10). We see that the discourse is dramatically arranged, and as to its purport, proceeds from the height and greatness of Babylon to its fall.

Vers. 7, 8. A golden cup . . . be healed. The prophet had here xxv. 15 in mind. That which in l. 23 and li. 20 is expressed by the figure of the hammer is expressed here by the figure of the cup, except that in the hammer the element of irresistible power, in the golden cup that of pride and glory, is more prominent. The cup, however, is "in the hand of Jehovah." It is therefore Jehovah's instrument, and what it bestows is the gift of Jehovah. From the effect of this gift we see that its object was punishment. The nations are intoxicated by it, and become like mad (comp. xxv. 16). This figure portrays the overwhelming fulness of destructive effect which they were obliged to receive.—Comp. Rev. xvii. 2, 4.—[Babylon, "like a fair harlot, has bewitched thee with the love potions of her idolatries." WORDSWORTH. The same image is used in the Apocalypse. Comp. also DOCTRINAL NOTE No. 17.—S. R. A.]—Now Babylon itself is thrown down, shattered, sick unto death. The expression "Babylon is fallen" seems to be taken from Isa. xxi. 9. Comp. Rev. xiv. 8; xviii. 2. The figure of the cup is abandoned gradually. It is still perceived in the word shattered, but the balsam and the pain presuppose a living organism. Those who are called upon must be the same who afterwards speak, vers. 9, 10. It is the nations conquered and held in captivity by Babylon which speak, among them Israel. They are the same who were spoken of in l. 8, 16. These are summoned to heal Babylon, because they are now his servants, and thus obligated to render him assistance.—Balsam. Comp. xlv. 11; viii. 22.

Vers. 9, 10. We have healed . . . our God.

Those who are called upon do not refuse to render the service, but this is shown to be in vain. They express this after having made the attempt, and hence the perfect tense—vi. 14; xv. 18; xvii. 14. They thus express that in the service of Babylon they have honestly done what they could for its deliverance. As all their attempts have proved vain, they think of their own safety by flight into their native lands. Comp. Isaiah xiii. 14; Jer. xlvi. 16.—The reason why Babylon was not to be helped lies in the immeasurable greatness of the evil which has come upon it. The punitive judgment advances upon them so overpoweringly that it reaches even to the sky. Comp. Ps. xxxvi. 6; vii. 11; cviii. 5.—Israel, who is especially benefited by the breaking of the prison, rejoices above all that his honor is saved, that he has not everlastingly disappeared and perished as something entirely bad, but is still preserved as good for something. We might be tempted to take righteous works (צַדִּיקוֹת) in the sense of "salvation" (comp. Isa. lxii. 1), but the plural is opposed to such a rendering. For though the "righteousnesses of Jehovah" are spoken of in the sense of "saving acts" (comp. Jud. v. 11; Ps. ciii. 6) the righteousness of Israel, which the Lord has brought to light, cannot well be other than such facts as render manifest that Israel is still worthy the honor of being the people of Jehovah (comp. Is. lxii. 2). Comp. Ps. xxxvii. 6; Jer. 1. 20.

13. The triple Threatening.

LI. 11-14.

- 11 Sharpen¹ the arrows, fill the shields!²
 Jehovah hath awakened the spirit of the kings of Media,
 For his mind is against Babylon to destroy it;
 For the vengeance of Jehovah it is,
 The vengeance of his sanctuary.
- 12 Against the walls of Babylon raise standards,
 Strengthen the watch, appoint watchmen,
 Lay the ambush!
 For as Jehovah hath thought so also hath he done—
 All that he hath spoken against the inhabitants of Babylon.
- 13 O thou that dwellest on great waters, on greatness of treasures!
 Thine end is come, the ell of thy section.³
- 14 Sworn hath Jehovah Zebaoth by himself:⁴
 "Have I filled thee with men as with grasshoppers,
 So shall they sing over thee the song of the vintage."

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 11.—הִכְרִי is properly to polish, but arrows are polished by being sharpened. The word is thus rendered by the Chaldee and Vulgate.

² Ver. 11.—שָׁלְטִים. The meaning is doubtful. It may be quiver, arrow, or shield. ROEDIGER, in Ges. Theol., p. 1418, decides for the last, and I also think that both the parallel passages (comp. Song of Sol. iv. 4 with 2 Chron. xxiii. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 11; 1 Chron. xviii. 7) and the use of the word in Aramaic favor the meaning "shield." To fill the shields is a phrase like brachio implere. Comp. מִלֵּא קֶשֶׁת, Zech. ix. 13, and KOEHLER thereon. [WORDSWORTH prefers the translation quivers as given by the Vulg., Syriac, and Targum. COWLES: "The Hebrew word means primarily to fill. GESENIUS supposes it means here, 'Fill the shields with the soldiers' own body, i. e., put them on; while MAURER suggests the sense, 'Fill them with oil; anoint them as a preparation for service, urging that this is in harmony with the preceding clause, 'Polish the arrows,' and corresponds with Isaiah xxi. 5, 'Anoint the shields.'"—S. R. A.]

³ Ver. 13.—According to this rendering [A. V.: measure of thy covetousness], בְּצַעַךְ is inf. Kal from בָּצַע (comp. בְּתַרְךָ, xlvi. 7; OLSHN., § 245, b) meaning to strike off, cut off, etc.

⁴ Ver. 4.—בְּנַפְשׁוֹ. Comp. Am. vi. 8.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A triple call of threatening against Babylon forming a climax; first (ver. 11 a) a general summons to war, with mention of the warlike power thus called upon, then (ver. 12 a) an immediate attack on the walls of the city is commanded, and in the third place (ver. 13), its approaching end is announced. Each of the calls is, however, followed by a statement of reasons, in which also a climax may be perceived. For ver. 11 b announces the decree of Jehovah and its cause; ver. 12 b contains the assurance that with the Lord purposing and acting are the same thing. Ver. 14 strengthens the threatening of ver. 13 by reference to a solemn oath of Jehovah.

Ver. 11. Sharpen . . . sanctuary.—Hath awakened, etc. Comp. rems. on ver. 1. This passage is taken from Isa. xiii. 17, from which we see that the definition of the enemies, threatening from the north (l. 9, 41), as the Medes is older than Jeremiah. Comp. ver. 28. In this sentence the prophet informs us to whom the summons of the preceding clause is addressed. The second half of the verse contains a double statement of cause, first the proximate and immediate, then the remote and mediate, but at the same time deepest ground of the summons. Comp. l. 15, 28.

Ver. 12. Against the walls . . . of Babylon. The military signals are to precede the attack on the walls of Babylon. On account of against the walls, D, standards, seems here to be not the mere general signal of convocation or message, but a military sign indicating a particular point of attack. The word also denotes the flags of ships (Isa. xxxiii. 23; Ezek. xxvii. 7). Comp. WINER, R.-W.-B., s. v. "Fahnen" and "Schiffe." The watch and watchmen appear to be related to each other as defensive and offensive (comp. 2 Sam. xi. 16, and HITZIG).—Ambush. Comp. Josh. viii. 14-16; Jud. xx. 33-35.—For, etc. To wish and to do are to be shown to be identical with Jehovah. Comp. iv. 23; Lam. ii. 17; Zech. i. 6; viii. 14, 15.

Vers. 13, 14. O thou that dwellest . . . vintage. The greatest supports of the power of Babylon were the waters surrounding it (comp. vers. 32 and 36; l. 38; Isa. xxi. 1; Ps. cxxxvii. 1), and the great riches which Nebuchadnezzar accumulated (comp. Βασιλῶν ἡ πολὺ χρυσός, Æsch. Pers. 52, and OPPERT, Exped. en Mésop. l. p. 175), and which rendered it possible for him to erect his immense buildings. DUNCKER says in reference to this: "Nebuchadnezzar had no need to fear that he would exhaust the subjects of his native land by the cost of his buildings. The immense booty of Nineveh, the greater part of which accrued to the Babylonians, the plunder of Jerusalem, the tributes of Syria and the Phœnician cities furnished the greatest means. The fruitfulness of the Babylonian territory, the produce of the fields depended on the overflowing of the Euphrates. By an extensive system of dams, canals and conduits, Nebuchadnezzar succeeded both in conducting the water of the Euphrates to every point of the Babylonian plain, and in draining the marshes and averting the violent inundations, which were not infrequent" (Gesch. d. Alterth., I., S. 846). Add to this that these water-courses were of the greatest importance for the defence of the country. "Their object was primarily irrigation and navigation; but they afforded at the same time strong lines of defence against the enemy," says NIENHUR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 229).—On a cylinder in the possession of Mr. Thomas Phillips, which has been deciphered by Grotefend, Nebuchadnezzar says (according to OPPERT, p. 231): "Tout autour je fis couler de l'eau dans cette digue immense de terre. A travers ces grandes caux comparables aux abimes de la mer, je fis faire un conduit." Comp. Id., p. 234.—Their end is come. Comp. Gen. vi. 13.—Ell of thy section. There are two renderings of this, "measure, end of thy fury, avarice, gain." So GROTIUS, CAPELLE, CHR. B. MICHAELIS, ROSENMUELLER, EWALD, HITZIG. But עֵל is the ell or yard measure, and does not involve the idea of full measure, or end. Hence the other rendering is to be preferred, which, after the example of Jerome (pedalis præcisionis tunc), is adopted by VENEMA, J. D. MICHAELIS, EICHHORN, DE WETTE, GESENIUS, BÖTTCHER (Proben altestam. Schriften, S. 289, Ann. m.), MAURER, GRAF. The idea lying at the foundation of the expression "the ell of the cutting thee off," is that the thread of life is measured, and when a definite number of yards is reached, will be cut off. Comp. Isa. xxxviii. 12; Job vi. 9.—Have I, D, N, 'D, are not here particles of asseveration, as in 2 Sam. xv. 21; 2 Ki. v. 20, but conditional, if I have filled thee with men as with grasshoppers (comp. xli. 23), this was only in order to be able to tread the more abundant vintage (רָבַחְךָ. Comp. rems. on xxv. 30). Hence even the song of the treaders is a sign of their work yielding abundant returns.

Passage inserted from x. 12-16.

LI. 15-19.

- 15 Who maketh the earth by his power,
Establisheth the globe by his wisdom,
And by his understanding stretched out the heavens.
- 16 At the sound of his voice, throng of waters in the heavens,
And vapors he bringeth up from the ends of the earth;
He maketh lightnings to the rain,
And bringeth the wind out of his chambers.
- 17 All men stand there mute, without understanding;
All the founders of idol-images are put to shame,
For a lie is their molten work, no spirit is therein.
- 18 They are vapor, turned to ridicule;
At the time of their visitation they perish.

- 19 Not so the portion of Jacob;
For he formeth all things and the rod of his inheritance.
Jehovah Zebaoth is his name.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This whole passage is a quotation from x. 12-16. It interrupts the connection in a disturbing manner. For even if the words in vers. 15, 16 may be regarded as suitable to support the thought that Jehovah, who has sworn in ver. 14 to destroy Babylon, has also the power to realize this threat, the following exposition of the vanity of idols is a superfluous appendage to the present prophecy. There is no point either in the following or previous context which requires such an exposition. It is a mere digression.

Add to this, that in ver. 19 the words יִשְׂרָאֵל are omitted before שֶׁבַט (comp. x. 16). If this omission is not due to a mere oversight, it betrays the hand of an emendator, who, to honor the tribe of Judah, wishes to remove the appearance as though only the Israel of the ten tribes were the stock of Jehovah's inheritance. EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A picture very clearly complete in itself. The prophet sees in spirit a large number of persons before him who are to serve the Lord for a hammer, in order therewith to dash to pieces nations and kingdoms, especially, however, Babylon in all its parts, and thus to recompense to it what it has inflicted on Zion.

Vers. 20-24. A hammer. . . saith Jehovah. In l. 23 Babylon was called "the hammer of the whole earth," and it might certainly be addressed again in the same way here. Many expositors, the LXX., JEROME, THEODORET at their head, are of opinion that it is so. But 1, it should be observed that another word and, indeed, one formed ad hoc is chosen. Comp. TEXTUAL NOTE 1. May not the prophet have intended to indicate by using another word, specially formed for the occasion, that he meant another hammer than that spoken of before in l. 23? 2. The perfects with the Vau consecutive may, indeed, be taken in a past sense (comp. xviii. 4; xix. 4, 5; xxxvii. 11), but this construction is not normal. The imperfect would be more correct. 3. וְשִׁלְמֶיךָ, ver. 24, must at any rate be taken in a future sense. Since, however, this word is a perfectly similar form to the previous perfects and similarly construed, there is a presumption that the perfects are also to be rendered as futures. 4. In l. 21 we found an ideal person addressed, of which the Lord would make use as His instrument in the chastisement of Babylon. It is to the same that the prophet here turns. That he referred in thought to l. 21, 22, is evident from פָּנֵי, which he opposes to פַּטֵּשׁ there used. He here, however, extends the task appointed to the hammer, for it is not to visit Babylon only, as in l. 21, but many nations and kingdoms. Who this chosen instrument was to be the prophet was ignorant.—To take כֶּלֶב weapon, as singular for כְּלָי, with HIRTZIG and GRAF, appears to me unnecessary. The former is not a single weapon, but comprehends all weapons of war. The objects enumerated as to be broken form in a certain measure a circle, proceeding from the great and strong to the small and weak, and then rising from the young man and maiden again to the great and strong.—Chaldea. Kasdin as the name of the country, as in l. 10 coll. li. 35.—Before your eyes, is to be referred to I recompense, since it would be superfluous referred to have done, and expresses the thought that those who now hear of the destruction of Babylon will also see it, and thus be convinced by ocular demonstration of the truth of Jeremiah's prediction.

15. The Destroying Mountain.

LI. 25, 26.

- 25 Behold, I come to thee, thou destroying mountain,
 Saith Jehovah, which destroyed the whole world;
 And I stretch forth my hand over thee,
 And roll thee from the rocks and make thee a burnt mountain.
 26 And they shall take no stone of thee for a corner,
 Nor a stone for foundations,
 But thou shalt be perpetual ruins, saith Jehovah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Babylon is here compared to a mountain, which has a widely destroying influence. This can refer only to a volcano, and with this it agrees that the mountain, after being laid bare to its rocky heart, is said to be a burnt-out mountain (ver. 25). So much, however, has it suffered by the destroying energies that its stones are not even available for building material.—We see that these two verses afford a picture perfectly complete in itself. [COWLES: "This blending of the figures of the volcano and the avalanche may not conform to the nicest rules of rhetoric, but none can say the conceptions are not grand and their significance both clear and strong."—S. R. A.]

Vers. 25, 26. Behold, I come . . . saith Jehovah.—Behold, etc. Comp. xxi. 13; xxiii. 30-32; l. 31.—The expression destroying mountain [הַר הַפְּטֵשׁוֹת], occurs besides only in 2 Ki. xxiii. 13, where the mount of Olives (or the southern peak thereof, the mons scandalis or offensionis of ecclesiastical tradition; comp. KEIL on Kings, S. 362), is so called [A. V. "Mountain of corruption"]. The Mount of Olives evidently received this appellation from the corrupting influence which proceeded from it in religious matters. May not Babylon also be called a destroying mountain in spiritual relations? If then we remember that the name of Babylon is connected even in primæval traditions with defiant worldly power and idolatry (comp. l. 29-32, and NÆGELSEN, Jer. u. Bab., S. 5 ff.), we may well suppose that the prophet also had the corrupting spiritual influence of Babylon in mind (comp. also l. 38; li. l. 44). We are not, however, justified in restricting his view to this single point, the element of destructiveness in a physical sense being also quite natural. It is repeatedly expressed in this prophecy. Comp. the hammer, l. 23, and the cup, li. 7 coll. xxv. 15-17.—We may then assume that Babylon is designated as a destroying mountain in a spiritual and physical reference. Perhaps in the term "mountain," there is also a hint at the tower which was widely visible, and corresponded to the widely extended influence. As to the picture in itself the question arises, What sort of a mountain had the prophet in mind? How must a (natural) mountain be constituted so as to be fitly designated a widely destroying mountain? I am of opinion that this designation can be given only to a volcano, for men seek the vicinity of mountains because these afford protection to their habitations and agriculture. Even the vicinity of volcanoes is not shunned, because these become dangerous only from time to time, and the general advantage of their vicinity outweighs the temporary disadvantage. The following description seems also to point to a volcano. How otherwise can we explain the words "roll thee from the rocks," than of a volcanic eruption? The mountain is to be laid bare, the overlying strata are to be thrown down so that nothing will remain but the skeleton,—the masses of stone which form its interior. All this can be said only of volcanoes. And when finally the result of this process is designated by the words וְנִתְּתֶיךָ לְהָר שָׂרָפָה, is not this a good conclusion to the figure drawn from a volcano? שִׂרְפָה is combustio, exustio. Comp. Isa. ix. 4; lxiv. 10. A mons combustionis or exustionis is either one from which the combustio issues, or one which suffers or has suffered combustion. In the former case it would be difficult to perceive how this could be a punishment. In the latter case the question arises, whether the mount of combustion is to be understood as burning or burnt out. If we regard the previous and following context, we cannot doubt that the words "make thee a mountain of combustion," designate the result of the process, which is further described in ver. 26. The mountain is so burnt out that its stones are not even available for building materials. To GRAF's remark that "this latter point in itself doubtful was hardly so established in the experience of a Jew, that he could make use of it as a figure which would commend itself to his countrymen," I reply, that it did not need much experience to know that stones cracked or vitrified by fire, are bad building material, and that, moreover, here at the close the discourse evidently passes from figure to reality. The prophet has certainly the burnt-up city in view, the stones of which could not be used for building purposes. [COWLES: "In fact, large building stones were never there. Her immense structures were built of brick, either sun-dried or kiln-burnt. Hence the great mass of these materials lie to this day more or less decomposed in the mountains of rubbish which mark the site of that once magnificent city."—S. R. A.] —But thou shalt, etc. Comp. ver. 62; xxv. 9.

¹ Ver. 29.—וּתְרַעַשׁ. The Imperf. with Vau consec. is used here because the prophet transports himself so vividly to the future that he regards it as already past. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 88, 5. There is therefore no necessity of reading וּתְרַעַשׁ with MEIER.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A very animated picture! Three main groups may be plainly distinguished, and a conclusion. The first group (vers. 27-29) shows us the enemies of Babylon, the Medes with the nations subject to their dominion advancing against Babylon with so great an army that the earth trembles. The second group is composed of the Babylonian warriors, who, overwhelmed by the success of the enemy, let their hands fall in powerless and spiritless dismay (ver. 30). In the third group we perceive the king of Babylon, who, sitting in his castle, receives from all sides the news of the capture of the city (vers. 31, 32). In the closing words the prophet expresses the thought that all which is now being done to render the city splendid and glorious is no more than the preparation of the threshing-floor, on which in a short time the harvest will be piled. These verses are clearly distinguished from those which precede and follow, and exhibit a clear and connected picture.

Vers. 27-29. Raise ye . . . inhabitant. Ver. 27 evidently contains a new beginning, for it summons to that which has to be done in the beginning of a warlike expedition. Comp. ver. 12; 1. 2.—Consecrate, etc. It was the custom to commence every war with sacred rites (comp. HERZ., R.-Enc., and WINER, R.-B.-W., s. v. "Krieg"); but here, as in Isa. xiii. 3, the war appears to be designated as a holy one, because it has to do with a "work of Jehovah" (l. 25) and "the vengeance of His sanctuary" (l. 28). Comp. vi. 4; xxii. 7; Joel iv. 9; Mic. iii. 5.—Call. Comp. l. 2, 29.—Ararat. Comp. Gen. viii. 4. [COWLES: "The name Ararat is Sanskrit, meaning 'the holy land,' a name probably due to traditions of Noah's ark."—S. R. A.].—In Isaiah (xxxvii. 38 coll. 2 Ki. xix. 37) a land of Ararat is spoken of. THEODORET says on the present passage, Ἀραράτ ἤν Ἀρμενίαν καλεῖ. According to Moses of Chorene (Hist. Armen. p. 361) Ararat was the chief district of Armenia and divided into twenty circuits. Comp. DELITZSCH on Isa. xxxvii. 38.—Minni also, which occurs here only, Ps. xlv. 9 being doubtful, belongs to Armenia: it was, according to NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab. S. 427 coll. 136), the second chief state of this country.—Ashkenaz must be sought for at any rate in the neighborhood of Armenia, since Togarmah is the brother of Ashkenaz according to Gen. x. 3, and "the country on the Pontus, Ararat and Caucasus is in general the home of the children of Japheth" (NIEBUHR ut sup.). KNOBEL (Völkertafel and on Gen. x. 3) regards Ashkenaz as the Asorum genus and says in reference to this passage: "The Ashkenaz mentioned in Jer. li. 27 appears to be a remnant of the Asi nation in Asia." [Comp. also KEIL and DELITZSCH on Gen. x. 3, Tr. l. p. 163.—S. R. A.]. In general these three peoples here mentioned correspond to the "nations from the north" which are spoken of in l. 3, 9.—Appoint a captain—טַפְּכָר. The word occurs besides only in Nah. iii. 17. The meaning is doubtful. All we learn from the context is that something hostile to Babylon is intended. The words against her follow four times in vers. 27, 28, and cannot be taken in another sense the third time from the other three. It is therefore not a measure within Babylon but against Babylon which is spoken of. Appoint is then used as in xv. 3. I do not think that number, multitude can be the point of comparison between this and the parallel horses (it is certainly not so with כַּנְוָר in Nah. iii. 17), and that therefore the word designates "troops" of any kind (GRAF, MEIER). It is admitted by most commentators that it is an Assyrian word. (Comp. STRAUSS on Nahum, S. 123). In the inscription of Bisutum, the Assyrian text of which has been rendered in Hebrew letters by OPPERT, (Exp. en Mésop. II. p. 238), the word כַּר occurs times innumerable in the sense of "King," as a title of Darius. Comp. also STRAUSS, S. 124 Ann., etc.; BRANDIS, Gewinn, etc., S. 101, 2. טַפְּכָר might thus be a compound of כַּר. The circumstance that the different nations have their leaders in their "kings" is no ground against this hypothesis, for the multifarious host would still need a common head. I therefore adhere provisionally to the meaning "captain."—Like bristly locusts. Comp. ver. 14. The comparison is very graphic, both with respect to the number and also the form and movements of the animals. Comp. CRENER on Joel i. 4.—Consecrate nations is repeated as a sign that the prophet will yet make new and important additions to the nations already mentioned.—Kings of Media. The plural is no more to be regarded as an absolutely indifferent matter than as depending on distinct historical knowledge. It simply leaves open the possibility of a plurality. A great war with Babylon would certainly occupy the whole royal family of Media and might occupy several Median kings in succession. For an analogous case comp. xvii. 20; xix. 3.—Jeremiah's mention of the Medes is significant for two reasons: 1. because at that time, in the fourth year of Zedekiah (155 Nabon.—B. C. 593), Nebuchadnezzar was in all probability at war with Media. His father-in-law, Cyaxares, had died the year before, B. C. 594. This was a favorable epoch to cast off the previous supremacy of Media. "We think that we may unhesitatingly assume that Nabukudrussur had to undertake a great war with Media in the years 154 and 155," says NIEBUHR (Ass. u. Bab., S. 212, 3 and on his reasons for this view Ib. S. 211 and S. 284).—2. because in the mention of the Medes there is a strong argument against those who assert that this prophecy was composed post eventum, during the captivity, for at this time the Persians and not the Medes would have been designated as the conquerors of Babylon. Comp. ver. 11.—

Her satraps. Comp. vers. 23 and 57.—To make, etc. Comp. Isa. xiii. 9; Jer. ii. 15; iv. 7; ix. 10; xlvi. 19; i. 3; li. 47.

Ver. 30. The heroes of Babylon . . . broken.—Become women. Comp. i. 37; Nah. iii. 13.—They have burned. The subject is the enemies.—Bars are broken. Comp. Am. i. 5; Isa. xlv. 2; Lam. ii. 9.—As only the capture of the city is described, the burning of the dwellings must not be referred to a burning of the whole city, presupposing the capture. It must rather be intended as a parallel to the breaking of the bars. The sentence discloses that the enemies had begun their work by setting the dwellings on fire. [Compare the account of the siege of Babylon in XENOPHON as given by WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 31, 32. Courier . . . confounded. The prophet conceives of the king as in the midst of the city, in his citadel. When the city is taken "from the end thereof" (comp. i. 26) the messengers hastening to inform the king would meet each other. This is a sad meeting, an accumulation of calamities which reminds us of the Job's posts (Job i. 13 sqq.).—Passages. פָּסָגִים, are passages. Forts may be meant, but also bridges or tunnels, or even the stations of the messenger or ferries, since on account of the walls a landing could not be made at pleasure. Concerning the bridges which connected the two banks of the river in the middle of the city and the tunnel under the Euphrates, which connected the two royal castles, comp. OPPERT, I. S. 192, etc. The Euphrates, moreover, had no fords, and the article forbids us to think of the bed of the Euphrates, laid dry by the diversion of the stream (Herod., I. 191), as it denotes that definite and well-known points of transition are meant. The expression may well be referred to the bridge, the ferry-stations and perhaps also to the tunnel. Both this sentence and the following parts of ver. 33 belong to the announcements spoken of in ver. 31.—The ponds burned with fire. This sentence is enigmatical. The view that the burning is not to be understood literally, but merely to be taken as figurative for drying up, for which an appeal is strangely made to 1 Ki. xviii. 38, seems to me as untenable as that, according to which the burning is to be referred merely to the sedge. The former view is opposed by the formal reason that the figure would be an unsuitably exaggerated one, the latter by the material reason that the burning of the sedge seems purposeless. But are the great water-works of Nebuchadnezzar to be conceived of as having no wood-work about them? Did not the flood-gates at least consist of wood? The great basin of Sepharvaim, e. g., might be opened and closed by flood-gates (comp. DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Atterth. I. S. 849). If the Euphrates were dried up and it was wished to complete the act of demolition, the destruction of the sluices by fire might be an appropriate way of accomplishing this. I do not mean to say that I perceive a special prediction in these words. Jeremiah paints the picture of the destruction of Babylon in colors, which in general betray a correct knowledge of Babylonian circumstances. This picture could not be applied to the capture of any city at pleasure, but the coloring is nowhere so specific that we must say it is either a mantic prediction or a vaticinium post eventum. Jeremiah's mind was occupied only with the great theme,—Babylon will fall and be destroyed, and Israel will be delivered. He greatly varies this theme, and here and there a feature finds a surprisingly accurate fulfilment, but there may be here a deeply hidden connection between cause and effect, which we cannot fathom or demonstrate, and the prophet had no foreknowledge of this agreement of his words with the future reality. Comp. i. 24 and the rems. on li. 39. KUEPER in the Beweis des Glaubens, February and March, 1867.—Are confounded. Comp. Isa. xiii. 8. The words as the purport of the message correspond exactly to what was reported as a fact in ver. 30. [Comp. HEROD., I. 181; ARISTOT., Polit. III. c. 1; RAWLINSON, Anc. Mon. III. 363; and PUSEY, on Daniel, p. 268, in WORDSWORTH and his note on the fulfilment of this prophecy.—S. R. A.]

Ver. 33. For thus saith . . . to her. For attaches these words closely to the previous verse. What follows is separated by its specific contents, and thus the statement of reason forms a conclusion. When Jeremiah wrote Babylon stood at the zenith of its bloom. The rejoinder might then be made to him, How canst thou, contrary to all appearances, speak of such an enfeebling of this glorious army and of the capture and destruction of these impregnable bulwarks? Jeremiah replies, Babylon is a threshing-floor. All that is now done to render her great and glorious is no more than a preparation of the floor by treading. In a short time, however, the season of harvest will come to her. Jeremiah here leans back upon i. 26. The glorious city shall one day serve only as a threshing-floor for all the treasures harvested by her enemies.

- 34 Nebuchadrezzar, king of Babylon, devoured us, he crushed us,
 He put us away as an empty vessel,
 He swallowed us like a dragon,
 He filled his belly¹ with my best and cast us out.²
- 35 "My wrong and my flesh be on Babylon," say the inhabitress of Zion,
 "My blood on the inhabitants of Chaldea," say Jerusalem.
- 36 Therefore thus saith Jehovah:
 Behold, I fight thy battle, and execute thy vengeance,
 And cause her sea to dry up and seal up her spring.
- 37 And Babylon shall become ruins, the abode of jackals,
 A terror and an object of scorn, which is bare of inhabitants.
- 38 They will roar one with another like young lions,
 They will growl⁴ like the young of the lioness.
- 39 For their intoxication I prepare them a drinking-bout,
 And make them drunken that they may rejoice,
 Fall asleep to a perpetual sleep
 And never awake, saith Jehovah.
- 40 I will bring them down like lambs to the slaughter,
 Like rams with he-goats.

² Ver. 34.—כִּי־עָרַנִי. The singular suffix has induced the Masoretes to make the previous verbs conformable to this, but this change of number is by no means rare. Comp. ix. 7; x. 4; xiii. 20; xlv. 9; NAVELSB. Gr., § 105, 7 Ann. 2. Some commentators would attach the word to the following, and read כִּי־עָרַנִי because the Hiph of עָרַנִי signifies to wash, rinse away (Isa. iv. 4; Ezek. xl. 38; 2 Chron. iv. 6), and does not occur elsewhere in Jeremiah, while עָרַנִי is very common with him (viii. 3; xvi. 15; xxiii. 3, 8; xxvii. 10, 15, etc.). The meaning of rinsing, however, lies at the foundation of that casting away ("the Hiph. of עָרַנִי is to cast away, wash away," DELITZSCH on Isa. iv. 4, & 89), and the brevity of the second half of the verse is not without analogy. Comp. I. 26; II. 28.

³ Ver. 35.—שִׁבְתִּי. Comp. Isa. xii. 6. The expression occurs only in these two places.

⁴ Ver. 38.—נָעַר, snarl, growl, is an ἀν. λεγ.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Nebuchadnezzar has devoured Israel, emptied his land and caused it to stand like an empty vessel, having cast out the people (ver. 34). For this Israel invokes the vengeance of Jehovah (ver. 35). To this desire the Lord declares Himself willing to respond; as Babylon has emptied Israel, so shall it become an empty unwatered desert; as Nebuchadnezzar has devoured Israel like a dragon, so shall the Chaldeans roar like lions; as they have revelled in Israel's flesh and blood, so shall they empty the cup of wrath even to fatal drunkenness, and be brought as sheep to the slaughter (vers. 36-40). Three main thoughts are thus plainly distinguishable, the expositio facti, the complaint and the sentence.

Ver. 34. Nebuchadnezzar . . . cast us out. Nebuchadnezzar has devoured (I. 7, 17) and crushed (literally disturbavit, Ex. xiv. 25; xxiii. 27; Josh. x. 10; 2 Chr. xv. 6) Israel; and then let the land stand like an empty vessel. HITZIG regards the words he put us away, as spoken by the land, but this view is opposed by the plural pronoun. It is better to regard the people and land as speaking together. Then the first clause refers to the persons, the second to the land, the third to the particular things, which the enemy took with him as plunder out of the country.—Dragon, נָחַשׁ, is 1, bellua maritima, κίτρος, (Gen. i. 21; Job vii. 12; Ps. clviii. 7). 2. Serpent (Ex. vii. 9, 10, 12; Dent. xxxii. 33; Ps. xci. 13). 3. Crocodile (Isa. xxvii. 1; li. 9; Ezek. xxix. 3; xxxii. 2; Ps. lxxiv. 13). In this place it is usually translated dragon, this being viewed as a modification of the second meaning. It is really a matter of indifference what great animal is intended, and it therefore suffices to render the word by a general term.

Ver. 35. My wrong . . . Jerusalem. After the representation of the condition of things, Israel here appears as a plaintiff, and demands as his right the punishment of the oppressor.—

My wrong. Comp. Gen. xvi. 5.—My flesh and my blood point back to devoured, ver. 34.—Inhabitants of Chaldea. Comp. ver. 24; l. 10. ["By my flesh we are here to understand the blood-relations of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, or the Jews throughout the country, who were killed or carried captive to Babylon." HENDERSON.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 36-40. Therefore thus . . . with he-goats. The Lord receives the complaint of Israel. He declares himself ready to execute the punishment desired. The close connection of the words with ver. 35 is clear from therefore, and from its whole purport.—I fight, etc. Comp. l. 34; li. 6, 11, 56; l. 15, 28.—Cause to dry up, etc. The abundance of water, to which the land of Babylon owes its fertility and power, the Lord will dry up and even seal up the springs. Comp. l. 38.—Her sea. Comp. rems. on ver. 13. "The main land, on which Babylon stands, is . . . a large . . . plain, which is so broken up with marshes and lakes by the Euphrates, that it floats, as it were, in the sea. The low land on the lower Euphrates is, as it were, wrung from the sea; for before Semiramis erected the dikes, the Euphrates used to overflow it all (πελαγίζειν, Herod., I., 184); Abydenus (in EUSEB. Præp., IX., 41), even says that at first it was all water, and was also called θάλασσα." DELITZSCH on Isa. xxi. 1.—Become ruins. Comp. ix. 10; xviii. 16; xix. 8; xxv. 9, 18; xxix. 18; li. 29. According to the theory of recompense which the Lord has presented in ver. 36 (comp. ver. 6) the desolation and evacuation here predicted corresponds to the emptying, which Israel, according to ver. 34, had experienced from Babylon.—In ver. 38 it is not an element of the punishment, but on the contrary the revelling of the Babylonians in the enjoyment of their plunder, which is described (comp. ii. 15; Am. iii. 4).—Ver. 39. While now they are in the heart of their greedy enjoyment (comp. Hos. vii. 4-7) the Lord will prepare them a banquet of his own kind. He will pour them out a full cup, but of wrath (xxv. 15-27). Of this excitement and sleep will be the consequence—the excitement of anguish and the sleep of death (ver. 57).—That they may rejoice, is therefore intended ironically. Comp. Isa. xxi. 5, and DELITZSCH, ad loc.—The remarkable fulfilment of these words in the surprise of the Chaldeans while feasting (Dan. v. 1 sqq.; HEROD., I., 191; CYROP., VII., 23) is no more to be traced to special prediction, than the fulfilment of vers. 31, 32; l. 24. The prophet has no expectation that his picture of wild carousal, and the exchange of this for another ironically so-called, would correspond so literally to the facts. That this was the case was not, however, due to a coincidence, but to divine Providence. Comp. rems. on vers. 31, 32.—I will bring them, etc. Comp. xlvi. 15; l. 27. Lambs, rams, he-goats! All classes of the population are to fall a sacrifice to the butcher's knife. Comp. Isa. xxxiv. 6; Ezek. xxxix. 18; Jer. l. 8.—This description also, from ver. 38 onwards, stands in evident contrast to the devouring of Israel by the Chaldeans, in ver. 34.

18. The Demolition of the Prison, the Liberation of the Captives.

LI. 41-46.

- 41 How is Sheshach taken,
And the praise of the whole earth captured!
How is Babylon become a horrid waste¹ among the nations!
- 42 The sea is come up over Babylon,
With the multitude of its waves is she covered.
- 43 Her cities are become a desolation,
A land of aridity and steppe,
A land wherein no man will dwell,
Which no son of man will pass through.
- 44 And I visit Bel in Babylon,
And take from his mouth what he hath devoured,
And no more shall the nations flow to him:
The wall also of Babylon is fallen.
- 45 Go out from the midst of her, my people,
And let every one save his soul from the fury of Jehovah's anger.
- 46 And let not your heart faint,²
Nor fear on account of the rumor which is heard in the land,
For in that year the rumor comes³ and the year after⁴ another,
And feud in the land, ruler against ruler.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- ¹ Ver. 41.—קָטָן is stupor in v. 30; viii. 21. As in the verbal root, so also in the noun, the idea of being rigid and confused is connected with that of horrible desolation. Comp. ii. 15; iv. 7; i. 3, 23, etc.

- ⁴ Ver. 46.—וְכָל־רִיבֵי־בָבֶל is to be regarded as neuter. Comp. NÆGELSB. Gr., § 60, 4.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

A double picture! As in vers. l. 1-5, on the background of Babylon destroyed the prophet sees Jerusalem delivered. He thus first shows us Babylon taken and desolated (vers. 41-43), the gods robbed of all ability to retain plunder or attract worshippers, and even the strong, proud walls thrown down (ver. 44). He then summons Israel to flee from the abomination of desolation (ver. 45), and not to be afraid at the alarm of war (ver. 46).

Vers. 41-44. How is Sheshach . . . is fallen. Comp. l. 2.—Sheshach. Comp. rems. on xxv. 26. If it is to be derived from שָׁפַט to stoop down, and taken in the sense of “humiliation, submission,” the idea does not accord with the following “praise of the whole earth.” It must wait further illumination.—Praise, etc. Comp. xlviii. 2; xlix. 25. Herodotus says of Babylon, ἐκεκδήθητο ὡς οὐδὲν ἄλλο πάλισμα τῶν ἡμεῖς ἴδμεν (I., 178).—The sea, etc. We might think here of the sea of nations (comp. Isa. viii. 7, 8; xvii. 12; Jer. xlv. 7, 8), especially since in ver. 36 and ver. 43, the contrary is expressed. It is, however, possible that the prophet would really say both, viz., that Babylon will be exposed to horrible aridity and fearful inundations. The Euphrates, when left to itself, has at some times too much, and at others too little water. Nebuchadnezzar’s great water-works were to regulate the supply, and when these are destroyed (comp. ver. 32) Babylon incurs the double danger.—Her cities, etc. Comp. ix. 10.—Land of aridity, etc. Comp. ii. 6; l. 12.—No man, etc. Comp. ix. 9-11; xlix. 18, 33; l. 40.—Bel (comp.

rems. on l. 2) is here mentioned as Babylon’s highest deity, and accordingly as the shield of its power and glory. Whoever conquers and plunders Babylon, conquers and plunders Bel, and whatever Babylon retains of plundered property in its hand, that has Bel. He has, as it were, swallowed all (comp. ver. 34; l. 17). Israel then with all the plunder of Jerusalem (comp. Dan. i. 2) may be represented as “devoured by Bel,” and this he is to restore. He is also no longer to have the renown of being a powerful protector. Foreigners shall no longer stream thither to commend themselves to his protection and be amazed at his glory. On the expression, comp. Isa. ii. 2.—The mention of the wall of Babylon (comp. ver. 58; l. 15) again as by way of supplement, may seem surprising. The walls of Babylon, however, seem here to be regarded as a sanctuary of Bel. This is intimated in their names; Imgur-Bel, i. e., Bel protect, was the name of the outer wall comprising 450 stadia, Nivitti-Bel, i. e., residence of Bel, was the name of the inner wall, 360 stadia long. Comp. OPPERT, I., S. 227. [The name of the king also was Belshazzar.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 45, 46. Go out . . . ruler. That which, according to vers. 41-44 is to come upon Babylon, is the effect of Jehovah’s wrath. In order that this may not fall upon the Israelites also, they are to flee. Comp. ver. 6; l. 8.—From the fury, etc. Comp. iv. 8, 26; xii. 13; xxv. 37, 38; xxx. 24.—Feud, etc. Comp. xxx. 21; xxxiii. 26.—The prophet evidently presupposes a great war. Comp. rems. on ver. 28. This passage reminds us of Matt. xxiv. 6; Luke xxi. 23. [Comp. RAWLINSON, Anc. Mon., III., p. 515, as quoted in WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

19. Babylon’s fall an Occasion of Joy to Heaven and Earth, but especially to Israel.

LI. 47-52.

- 47 Therefore behold, the days come that I visit the idols of Babylon,
And her whole land shall be put to shame,
And her wounded ones shall all fall in the midst of her.
- 48 But heaven and earth, and all therein, shall rejoice over Babylon,
For from the north come¹ the destroyers, saith Jehovah.
- 49 As Babylon caused² the slain³ of Israel to fall,
So at Babylon are fallen the slain of the whole land.
- 50 Ye that have escaped the sword,
Go on,⁴ stand not still:
Remember Jehovah from afar,
And let Jerusalem come into your hearts.

- 51 "We are ashamed, for we have heard reproach, Shame covers our face, for strangers are come into the sanctuaries of Jehovah's house."
52 Wherefore behold, the days come, saith Jehovah, that I punish her idols;
And in her whole land groan^s the slain.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- 1 Ver. 48.—The singular יָבוֹא stands here as an anticipated predicate. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 105, 4, 6, 3.
2 Ver. 49.—Before לִנְפֹל should be supplied הַיְתָרָה. The sense of the connection is then Babylon tended to, occasioned, the fall. Comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 95, 3 b.
3 Ver. 49—וְהַלְלִי need not be taken as vocative. It is the construction of a sentence in which the infinitive represents the predicate, and the subject is implied in a substantive, depending on a preposition. Comp. v. 26; vi. 7; xvii. 2; xxxiv. 9; NAEGELSB. Gr., § 95, 2.—If we take it as voc. (HITZIG, EWALD, GRAF, etc.), the two clauses of the disjunctive sentence either contain the same thought, or we must take לְ as the לְ actoris, which is harsh. The Perf. נִפְלָה is according to this interpretation the prophetic perfect. The prophet sees the strages of the Babylonians as something which has already happened. Hence he addresses the Israelites as having escaped from the overthrow.
4 Ver. 50.—הֲלֵכִי. This imperative occurs here only. The choice of the expression is, however, explained by the circumstance, that הֲלֵךְ here does not signify to go away, but as is clear from the antithesis הַעֲמִידִי (comp. Gen. xix. 17; Jer. iv. 6) to go on, and is thus used with a certain emphasis. Hence it is also unnecessary with the LXX. to connect the ה with the previous word, and read בְּהֲרִבָּה or בְּהֲרִבָּה.—Comp., moreover, ver. 45; 1. 3, 28.
5 Ver. 52.—אֲנִי in Jeremiah here only. Comp. Ezek. xxvi. 15.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

We may observe in this passage that it gradually exhausts itself, and hastens to the conclusion. We may also perceive the effort to revert to the commencement. Hence the great similarity of these verses to 1. 3-5. Babylon's idols are to be visited, the land confounded, and filled with the slain (ver. 47), to the joy of heaven and earth. The destroyers coming from the north are to accomplish this (ver. 48). Thus will be recompensed to Babylon what it has done to Israel (ver. 49). The Israelites, however, are encouraged to go home comforted (ver. 50). They seem not to understand the call, for they answer with complaining words, from which it is seen that no other feeling could find place in their hearts, than that of the disgrace they had suffered (ver. 51). But the prophet comforts them by skillfully repeating the opening words of the picture, indicating that even for their disgrace the promised visitation of the idols and of their country would procure satisfaction (ver. 52). If our division is correct, and ver. 52 is really the close of the strophe beginning at ver. 47, and if, as cannot be doubted (see the proof in detail below), these verses reproduce in a certain measure the beginning of the whole prophecy, 1. 2-5, an artificial arrangement is here noticeable, of which a trace also recurs in the last picture, for ver. 58 also in its purport refers back to ver. 53.

Vers. 47, 48. Therefore behold . . . saith Jehovah.—Therefore draws a further special conclusion from the premises stated in the previous context. The main purport of this picture follows from all which has been previously stated as the decree of Jehovah concerning Babylon.—Behold, the day. Comp. ix. 24. This formula is found fourteen times in Jeremiah, vii. 32; xvi. 14; xix. 6, etc.—The idols, etc. Generalization of what is said in ver. 44 of Bel alone. In 1. 2 also the confusion of Bel, Merodach and the idols generally is spoken of. Comp. ver. 52.

—Put to shame. Comp. xlvi. 13.—Her wounded. Comp. ver. 4.—If we render "slain," we get no suitable meaning from the sentence, even if the emphasis be laid on "in the midst of her," we must, therefore, take the word in the sense of wounded, as in Ps. lxi. 26; Job xxiv. 12. All the wounded will fall, i. e., all their wounds will be mortal.—Ver. 48. Shall rejoice, etc. These words express the main thought of the first part (vers. 47, 48) and at the same time the only new element. Heaven and earth certainly must rejoice when once again the justice, wisdom and power of the Lord celebrate a triumph, and it is anew evident that He, and not the devil, is Lord in the world. Comp. Isa. xiv. 23; xlix. 13; Ps. xcvi. 10, 11.—The sentence gains much in clearness if we regard it as a parenthesis, and refer the following causal sentence to ver. 47. According to the logical sequence the destroyers are the first cause, and the destruction of Babylon the second cause of the rejoicing. If we do not take the imperative sentence as a parenthesis, we must at least refer the causal sentence to all the foregoing context, so that the destroyers appear as the ground both of the fall and the rejoicing. The words for from the north, also remind us of 1. 3 coll. 1. 9, 41, standing here in the same connection as there.—Destroyers. Comp. ver. 53.

Vers. 49-52. As Babylon . . . the slain. In this second part of the picture the prophet expresses substantially the same thought as in the first, but with special application to Israel and emphasis on the idea of recompense. The sin of Babylon against Israel shall be recompensed, and Israel, at first unable to receive the joyful tidings, is greatly comforted by the repeated solemn proclamation of judgment on the destroyers.—Remember, etc. These words remind us vividly of 1. 4, 5.—From afar. Jehovah is still always considered as dwelling in Zion. Comp. xli. 5.—Come, etc. Comp. iii. 16; xlv. 21.—The Israelites answer to the call, but with words of grief. They cannot receive the joyful tidings. Their minds are still full of the feeling of the disgrace they have suffered. It is as though they would say, What is the thought of Jehovah and Jerusalem for us? Have we not from thence recollections only of the deepest shame and reproach? We are put to shame and we are ashamed (comp. ix. 18), for we have heard reproach, scorn and ridicule as the part of the heathen (vi. 10; xxiv. 9), the consequence of which is that shame covered our face (Ps. lxi. 8; xxxv. 26; lxxi. 13). This scorn which has come upon us refers however to the fact that strangers (comp. v. 19; xxx. 8; Isa. i. 7) have come into the sanctuaries (i. e., into all parts, even those forbidden to profane feet) of Jehovah's house. It must appear surprising that the Israelites respond to the joyful call of the prophet, ver. 50, with words of grief. The strophe cannot therefore possibly be concluded here, or it would end in a harsh dissonance. We therefore attach ver. 52 to it. Even on this account, says Jeremiah, skilfully repeating the opening words of the picture, shall the idols be visited and their land filled with the slain. The prophet speaks very appropriately of the visitation of the idols, for just this is the recompense for the disgrace inflicted on the house of Jehovah.

20. No wall is a defence against the Lord.

LI. 53-58.

- 53 "Even though Babylon should mount up to heaven,
And tower up¹ his defences² to a precipitous height,
From me will destroyers come to her," saith Jehovah.
- 54 A loud crying from Babylon
And great ruin from the land of the Chaldeans!
- 55 For Jehovah destroyeth Babylon,
And extirpates from her the loud noise.
And her waves roar like mighty waters,
The noise of their calling resounds.
- 56 For there is coming upon her, upon Babylon, a destroyer,
And her heroes are taken, their bows broken;³
For a God of recompense is Jehovah,
Who well requiteth.
- 57 "And I make drunk her princes and her wise men,
Her counts, her dukes and her heroes,
That they may sleep a perpetual sleep,
And never awake," saith the King:
Jehovah Zebaoth is his name.
- 58 Thus saith Jehovah Zebaoth,
"Babylon's broad wall⁴ is laid bare,⁵
And her high gates burn⁶ in the fire!
Thus then have peoples labored in vain,
And nations wearied themselves⁷ for the fire."

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 53.—The Piel בָּצַר denotes to cut off, to separate sharply. This is used in the sense of fortifying, like קָלַל in בְּצִיּוֹרָה, Isa. ii. 15; xxxvii. 26 coll. כִּבְצָר, because fortifications are sharply separated from their surroundings. Comp. Isa. xxii. 10.

² Ver. 53.—קְרִיַת עֵינַי is here as עֵינַי בְּנִדְרַל, Jud. ix. 51; Ps. lxi. 4; Prov. xviii. 10; עֵינַי צִיּוֹר, Ps. lxii. 4; עֵינַי עֵינַי, Isa. xxvi. 1; Prov. x. 12; xviii. 11, a strong bulwark for defence or protection.

³ Ver. 56.—חָתַת—to make חָת, i. e., to make cracked. Comp. פָּתַח, Isa. xlviii. 8; ix. 11; פָּתַח, Isa. li. 13; and with respect to the meaning "broken," 1 Sam. ii. 4; on the singular, comp. נִאֲרָעֵלֶב, Gr., § 105, 4, b.

⁴ Ver. 58.—הַכְּוֹת is construed as sing. here only. Evidently the totality of the walls, which, in a certain aspect, was a six-fold line of circumvallation (comp. וּפְּרֵיט, p. 228, etc.), is regarded as a unit. Comp. חָוָל, § 318, o.

⁵ Ver. 58.—עֵרַר עַצְמוֹ. Inf. abs. Pihpel. (comp. עֵרַר, § 253, Ann.) with Hithpalp. from עָרַר, to strip one's self, c. c., thrown down, discovered to their foundations. Comp. נִיָּרָה, Hab. iii. 13; Psalm cxxxvii. 7; and Isaiah xxiii. 13; Ezek. xiii. 14.

⁶ Ver. 58.—צָתַת. Comp. xlix. 2; Isa. xxxiii. 12; עֵרַר, § 242, b.

⁷ Ver. 58.—Regarding these words as original to Habakkuk, we may also regard וַיִּנְפּוּ as a scriptural error, it being easy to write this instead of וַיִּנְפּוּ. Comp. נִאֲרָעֵלֶב, Jer. u. Bab., S. 97.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The main thought of the picture is that no dead or living wall can save Babylon, for the Lord, the righteous recompenser, has determined upon its fall. The dead wall of Babylon will not avail, because the Lord will send destroyers, as first expressed in ver. 53. In the following verses the fulfilment of this declaration is exhibited: great noise is heard from Babylon (ver. 54). Whence comes this? Hence, that the Lord has begun the work of destruction on Babylon—destroying both the great masses (ver. 55) and the élite of the population. His justice requires this (ver. 56). Substantially the same thought closes the discourse as began it, and both the beginning and conclusion appear as the verba ipsissima of Jehovah, so that in form also the end reverts to the beginning. The princes and wise men of Babylon may be designated as its living wall. They shall be made drunk with the cup of Jehovah's wrath, and sleep an everlasting sleep (ver. 57). The dead wall, with its lofty gates, shall be subjected to fire, so that it will be made manifest that the immense work, the fruit of the labor of many nations, was achieved in vain, to be consumed by fire (ver. 58).

Ver. 53. Even though . . . saith Jehovah. In the opening words there appears to be a double allusion: 1. to the tower of Babel, Gen. xi. 4; 2. to the high walls with which Babylon was surrounded. Their height must have been very great. Even if the statements of 200 yards (HERODOTUS) and 250 yards (OROSIUS) are to be considered exaggerated, the lowest estimates of the ancients (PHILOSTR., Apoll. Tyan., i. 1, 25) speak of three and a half plethra, i. e., 150 feet (OPPERT, Exp., i. p. 224, 5).—Comp. Ob. 4; Hab. ii. 9; Jer. xlix. 16.—Destroyers. Comp. ver. 48. [WORDSWORTH: "We may compare also the words of Nebuchadnezzar still extant on this cylinder: 'In Babylon is the tower of my abode. . . . To make more difficult the attack of an enemy against Imgur-Bel, the indestructible Wall of Babylon, I constructed a bulwark like a mountain," etc.—S. R. A.]

Vers. 54-56. A loud crying . . . requiteth. That ver. 54 describes the execution of what is threatened in ver. 53, the work therefore of the destroyers (comp. l. 22, 46; xlvi. 3) is seen from vers. 55, 56. It is at the same time clear from the connection that the loud noise spoken of in ver. 54 is the united consequence of a double operation directed to the two main portions of the Babylonian population. At one time the work of the destroyers is against the great mass of the people. This is the sense of loud noise and her waves. The sentence And her waves, etc. expresses the result. The destruction of Babylon and the extirpation of the great tumult of nations cannot take place without bringing the masses of the people into wild and noisy excitement, for, as was remarked on ver. 42, masses of people may certainly, as here, be compared with masses of water.—Roar. Comp. v. 22; xxxi. 35; Jer. li. 15—Jer. vi. 23.—Afterwards, however, the work of the destroyers is against the élite of the people, the heroes, i. e., the brave men and warriors (ver. 30; l. 36) and their weapons.—For a God of recompense, etc. The causal particle refers of course not only to the immediate, but all the previous context. The object of recompense is here stated as the ground of Jehovah's procedure against Babylon, as in l. 15, 28; li. 6, 11, 36. Comp. 2 Sam. xix. 37; Isa. lix. 18.

Vers. 57, 58. And I make . . . for the fire. These verses also contain, like ver. 53, the verba ipsissima of Jehovah, and ver. 58 also treats of the dead wall. When, in ver. 57, it is said of the princes, wise men and warriors (comp. l. 35, 36; li. 23, 28), that the Lord will make them drunk and cause them to sleep a perpetual sleep (comp. rems. on ver. 39, whence these words are taken, and xxv. 15, 16, 27), it is evidently to be thus intimated that the Lord will paralyze all the forces which might be able in any way to delay the fall. It may then be said that the prophet treats in ver. 57 of the destruction of the living, in ver. 58 of the dead stone defences. I may be allowed here to insert a passage relating to the building of the walls from the cylinder-inscription already mentioned, as given by OPPER (Exp., i. p. 230). "Babylon is the refuge of the God Merodach; I have finished (observe that Nebuchadnezzar is the speaker) Imgur-Bel, his great enclosure. In the thresholds of the great gates I have adjusted folding-doors in brass, very strong railings and gratings (?), I have dug its ditches, I have reached the bottom of the waters, I have constructed the banks of the trench with bitumen and bricks. Wishing to preserve the pyramid more efficaciously and to defend it from the enemy and the attacks which might be made on Babylon the imperishable, I caused to be constructed in masonry in the extremities of Babylon a (second) great enclosure, the boulevard of the Rising Sun, which no king had made before me. I had the ditches made dry, and caused the banks to be constructed on barrels." Here follow the words quoted above in ver. 13.—The walls of Babylon, however, were not the work of Nebuchadnezzar alone. According to an inscription, now at Aberdeen, some share in the glory of this work is due to Assarhaddon, the son of Sanherib. He says (OPPERT, p. 227, etc.), "Babylon is the city of laws, Imgur-Bel is its enclosure, Nivitti-Bel its rampart; from the foundation to the battlements I founded, continued, enlarged them." OPPER is of opinion that these words express too much, and that Nabopolassar, and especially Nebuchadnezzar, are to be regarded as at least the completers of the work. As to the destruction of the wall, OPPER says (p. 225, etc.), "It is to be presumed that the outer wall, encroached upon by Cyrus, spoiled by Darius, filled with breaches by Xerxes, did not exist at the commencement of the fourth century of the vulgar era. The ditches had been filled—and at least in the greater part the wall had disappeared which was so imposing to the enemies of Babylon, and which inspired Jeremiah with the words recorded in li. 53, 58."—Thus then have peoples, etc. These words are found with slight alteration (transposition of in vain and for the fire) in Hab. ii. 13. Habakkuk was the contemporary of Jeremiah, and also prophesied the punitive judgment to be executed on Judah by the Chaldeans. As in i. 6 Habakkuk expressly mentions the Chaldeans, he cannot have prophesied before the battle of Carchemish, for it is inconceivable that the appointment of this nation was disclosed to him earlier than to Jeremiah. It is possible that he wrote in the reign of Zedekiah, for we see from chap. i. that the dominion of the Chaldeans had then lasted for some time. If now the words "Behold, is it not of the Lord of hosts?" which in Hab. ii. 13 immediately precede the words common to this passage, are to be regarded as a formula of quotation, it is not impossible that this is the passage which he quotes, although, of course, it cannot be denied that both may have drawn from a common source. It is, however, grammatically more correct to take לָאֵלֹהִים in the sense of command or determination (as in Josh. xi. 20; Ezek. xxxiii. 30), and to translate (with EWALD, MEIER) "it is decreed of the Lord that the nations," etc., and then it is more probable that the words are original to Habakkuk. They suit the context admirably. For Habakkuk wishes to show that a building erected with blood and injustice cannot endure, from which in passing we may derive the important information that Nebuchadnezzar did not execute his immense works without despotic violence.—Labored and wearied themselves are synonymous expressions, comp. Isa. xl. 38 sqq.; so that if we render and wearied themselves (as required by the text here, but not in Hab. ii. 13), we must understand this in an enhanced signification, as exhausted themselves, or are sinking, which it is doubtful if the word will bear. Nor is it in accordance with the sense and connection of the original passage to attribute to the nations, who were compelled to build the wall, a sinking when the wall falls! It is for them rather a victory than a defeat. This long discourse, as EWALD remarks, "very suitably closes with this sentence of Habakkuk, which is here quite appropriate." —לָאֵלֹהִים בְּרִיקָה (to a sufficiency in vain), involves a certain irony. The great wall will be good enough to satisfy the lust of the all-devouring annihilation, or of the fire. It is therefore stronger than לָרִיק, Isa. xlix. 4; lxxv. 23. Comp. Nah. ii. 13.

21. Historical conclusion.

LI. 59-64.

59 The word which Jeremiah the prophet commanded Seraiah the son of Neriah, the son of Maaseiah, when he went with Zedekiah the king of Judah into Babylon in the fourth year of his reign. And this Seraiah was a quiet prince [caravan-marshall]. So Jeremiah wrote in a book all the evil that should come upon Babylon, even all these words that are written against Babylon. And Jeremiah said to Seraiah, When thou comest to Babylon, and shalt see, and shalt [see that thou]² read all these words; then shalt thou say, O LORD [and say, O Jehovah], thou hast spoken against this place, to cut it off, that none shall remain in it, neither man nor beast, but that it shall be desolate for ever. And it shall be, when thou hast made an end of reading this book, that thou shalt bind a stone to it, and cast it into the midst of Euphrates: And thou shalt say, Thus shall Babylon sink,³ and shall not rise from [because of] the evil that I will bring upon her: and they shall be weary [exhausted].⁴ Thus far are the words of Jeremiah.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 60.—On the sense of the Imperfect רָבִינָא comp. NAEGEL'S Gr., § 87, 1.

² Ver. 61.—וְרָאִיתָ. This word cannot mean "and when thou seest it (for the first time)." The suffix would certainly not be wanting in that case. Nor can we see why the reading should take place at the first sight of the city. Both time and place might then be very unfavorable. It is rather the apodosis; then see to it. It is incited upon him that he discharge his commission with circumspection. Comp. 1 Ki. xii. 16; Ps. xxxvii. 37; Isa. xxii. 11.

³ Ver. 64.—שָׁקַיְתָהּ, demergi, desidere, in Jeremiah here only. Comp. Am. viii. 8; Is. 5.

⁴ Ver. 64.—If the word וַיַּעֲבֹר is not genuine, it can have come here only through the transposition of the following words, "Thus far," etc., with which the copyist, through carelessness or of purpose, connected this. This, however, involves the inauthenticity of vers. 59-64 or their original position before l. 1. HITZIG says the passage "bears some marks of genuineness, none of the contrary," and it is incredible that it stood before l. 1, since it would then appear that this great prophecy was only of secondary importance. If, then, vers. 59-64 are genuine and in their original position, the same must be said of the concluding words, since they could never have had their position before ver. 59. A copyist could not have added וַיַּעֲבֹר by mistake. Jeremiah, then, must have done it. His object probably was to give a token of identity to the sinking prophecy by an unmistakable quotation from it. The ancient translations, with the exception of the LXX., which is of no authority, all express the word. Comp. NAEGEL'S Jer. u. Bab., S. 96.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

When King Zedekiah, in the fourth year of his reign, made a journey to Babylon, Jeremiah gave to Seraiah, the brother of Baruch, the marshal, the prophecy against Babylon to take with him and read in Babylon, and then with prayer to the Lord to cast it into the Euphrates.

Ver. 59. The word . . . caravan-marshal. The commission which Seraiah receives really forms the chief part of this section. For after ver. 60, in which the restoration of the roll forming the basis of this commission is described, all the rest contains only the words in which Jeremiah imparts the commission.—Seraiah, according to xxxii. 13, must be a brother of Baruch, the friend and assistant of our prophet, which explains why the commission was given to him. Other persons named Seraiah are mentioned in this book, xxxvi. 26; xl. 8; lii. 24. It seems to have been a common name among the priests. Comp. 1 Chron. vii. 6, 14; Ezr. vii. 1, 4; Neh. x. 2; xi. 11; xii. 1, 12.—It is not perfectly clear why Zedekiah went to Babylon. His fourth year is the same in which the envoys of the neighboring nations met in Jerusalem, to treat concerning a defensive alliance against the Chaldean power. Comp. rems. on xxvii. 1 and xxviii. 1. NIEBUHR thinks that the diversion then made by Nebuchadnezzar's war with Media was the occasion of this meeting (Ass. u. Bab., S. 211). The journey to Babylon shows that nothing came of the project, whether that the reports from the East caused the matter to appear too dangerous, or that the warnings of Jeremiah made some impression.—A quiet prince (שֶׁרֵי מְנוּחָה). This expression has been interpreted in the most various and strangest ways, concerning which comp. ROSENUELLER and J. D. MICHAELIS ad loc. The latter was the first to give the substantially correct rendering in his Translation of the Old Testament, 1778, Leader of the caravan. MAURER first proposed "Reisemarschall," marshal of the journey. Literally it denotes "Prince of the resting-place." Comp. Numb. x. 33.

Vers. 60-64. So Jeremiah wrote . . . exhausted. We may assume that this journey of Zedekiah was the occasion of the prophecy against Babylon. For homage, if not the only object, was certainly one of the objects, of the journey, and it therefore involved a deep disgrace to the theocracy. How fitting it was that the prophet should make use of this journey to furnish the medal with an appropriate reverse. While the king of Judah, in view of all, was casting himself in homage before the throne of the Chaldean king, Seraiah was to cast a roll in the Euphrates, on which was recorded as a divine decree the destruction of Babylon and deliverance of Israel.—That Jeremiah copied the prophecy from the book-roll mentioned in xxxvi. 32 (GRAF) is only supposable, in case Jeremiah successively increased that collection of writings begun in the fifth year of Jehoiakim, first inserting the present prophecy in it, and thus giving Seraiah a copy, a confirmation of which hypothesis may be found in the expression in a [שֶׁרֵי, one] book. It is, however, possible that Jeremiah would thus intimate that he purposely wrote the prophecy upon one roll, in antithesis to the many rolls forming the main collection. The reason of the prophet's care to write the whole on one roll, would then doubtless be that one could be handled more easily and safely than two.—The reading was evidently for a threefold purpose: 1. With respect to the city of Babylon it was an announcement of judgment (HITZIG), which appears the more significant, as the announcers were not in a condition to make a declaration against Babylon, coming, as they did in all humility, to do homage. 2. With respect to God, it was to be affirmed that the people of Israel had taken solemn notice of the divine promise. Hence after the reading the Lord is to be expressly addressed and reminded of the word of His promise in its main features (comp. ver. 62 with l. 3; li. 26). He is thus, as it were, to be taken at His word and pledged. 3. To the Israelites there was naturally a great comfort in all this, which must have been of special value to them in that moment of deep shame.—The sinking of the roll in the Euphrates is added to the reading as supplementary and confirming the words by a visible symbolic action. The roll being compelled to sink by the stone and thus outwardly given up to destruction, suggests the thought that this external part was no longer necessary after, by the reading, the purport had been received into the living spiritual archives of the consciousness. At the same time, as is expressly stated in ver. 64, the sinking by the weight of the stone is to represent symbolically the ruin of Babylon.—Shall not rise, as the roll with the stone will not.—From the evil does not designate the element in which Babylon is to sink, but the figure is here forsaken and the transition made to literal speech. שֶׁרֵי then = in consequence of [because of, the evil].—Shall be weary. These words might certainly be dispensed with, as they rather injure than promote the clearness of the sense. As is well understood, however, the easier reading is by no means always the more correct. The question depends on whether the finer and more hidden sense which may be contained in the words is able to balance the formal reasons which favor their spuriousness. Comp. the TEXTUAL remarks.

Thus far the words of Jeremiah. These words, which I cannot regard as misplaced (comp. rems. on ver. 64) have simply the object of indicating that ch. lii. does not proceed from Jeremiah himself, but is the addition made by another person.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "Daniel's Babylonian empire resumes, as it were, the thread which was broken off with the tower-erection and kingdom of Nimrod. In the Babylonian tower-building the whole of the then existing humanity was united against God; with the Babylonian kingdom began the period of the universal monarchies, which again aspired after an atheistical union of entire humanity. Babylon has since and even to the Revelation (ch. xviii.) remained the standing type of this world." AUERLEN, Der proph. Daniel, S. 230.

2. For what reason does Babylon appear as a type of the world? Why not Nineveh, or Persepolis, or Tyre, or Memphis, or Rome? Certainly not because Babylon was greater, more glorious, more powerful or prouder and more ungolly than those cities and kingdoms. Nineveh especially was still greater than Babylon (comp. DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth. I. S. 474, 5), and Assyria was not less hostile to the theocracy, having carried away into captivity the northern and larger half of the people of Israel. Babylon is qualified for this representation in two ways: 1. because it is the home of worldly princelom and titanic arrogance (Gen. x. 8; xi. 1-4); 2. because Babylon destroyed the centre of the theocracy, Jerusalem, the temple and the theocratic kingdom, and first assumed to be the single supreme power of the globe.

3. "When God has used a superstitious, wicked and tyrannical nation long enough as His rod, He breaks it in pieces and finally throws it into the fire. For even those whom He formerly used as His chosen anointed instruments He then regards as but the dust in the streets or as chaff before the wind." CRAMER.

4. "No monarch is too rich, too wicked, too strong for God the Lord. And He can soon enlist and engage soldiers whom He can use against His declared enemies." CRAMER.

5. "Israel was founded on everlasting foundations, even God's word and promise. The sins of the people brought about that it was laid low in the dust, but not without hope of a better resurrection. Babylon, on the other hand, must perish forever, for in it is the empire of evil come to its highest bloom. Jeremiah owns the nothingness of all worldly kingdoms, since they are all under this national order to serve only for a time. We are to be subject to them and seek their welfare for the sake of the souls of men, whom God is educating therein; a Christian however cannot be enthusiastic for them after the manner of the ancient heathen nor of ancient Israel, for here we have no abiding city, our citizenship is in heaven. The kingdoms of this world are no sanctuaries for us and we supplicate their continuance only with the daily bread of the fourth petition. Jeremiah applies many words and figures to Babylon which he has already used in the judgments on other nations, thus to intimate that in Babylon all the heathenism of the world culminates, and that here also must be the greatest anguish. What, however, is here declared of Babylon must be fulfilled again on all earthly powers in so far as, treading in its footprints, they take flesh for their arm and regard the material of this world as power, whether they be called states or churches." DIEDRICH.

6. On l. 2. In putting into the mouth of Israel, returning from Babylon, the call to an everlasting covenant with Jehovah, the prophet causes them 1. to confess that they have forgotten the first covenant; 2. he shows us that the time of the new covenant begins with the redemption from the Babylonish captivity. He was far, however, from supposing that this redemption would be only a weak beginning, that the appearance of the Saviour would be deferred for centuries, that Israel would sink still deeper as an external πολιτεία, and that finally the Israel of the new covenant would itself appear as a μυστήριον, εἰς ὃ ἐπισημοῦσιν ἄγγελοι παρακλῆσαι (1 Pet. i. 9-12).

7. From what Jeremiah has already said in xxxi. 31-34 of the new covenant we see that its nature and its difference from the old is not unknown to him. Yet he knows the new covenant only in general. He knows that it will be deeply spiritual and eternal, but how and why it will be so is still to him part of the μυστήριον.

8. On l. 6. Jeremiah here points back to ch. xxiii. Priests, kings and prophets, who should discharge the office of shepherds, prove to be wolves. Yea, they are the worst of wolves, who go about in official clothing. There is therefore no more dangerous doctrine than that of an infallible office. Jer. xiv. 14; Matt. vii. 15; xxiii. 2-12.

9. On l. 7. It is the worst condition into which a church of God can come, when the enemies who desolate it can maintain that they are in the right in doing so. It is, however, a just nemesis when those who will not hear the regular messengers of God must be told by the extraordinary messengers of God what they should have done. Comp. xl. 2, 3.

10. On l. 8. "Babylon is opened, and it must be abandoned not clung to, for the captivity is a temporary elastisement, not the divine arrangement for the children of God. God's people must in the general redemption go like rams before the herd of the nations, that these may also attach themselves to Israel, as this was fulfilled at the time of Christ in the first churches and the apostles, who now draw the whole heathen world after them to eternal life. Here the prophet recognizes the new humanity, which proceeds from the ruins of the old, in which also ancient Israel leads the way; thus all, who follow it, become Israel." DIEDRICH.—"The heathen felt somewhat of the divine punishment when they overcame so easily the usually so strongly protected nation. But Jeremiah shows them still how they deceived themselves in thinking that God had wholly rejected His people, for of the eternal covenant of grace they certainly understood nothing." HEIM and HOFFMANN on the Major Prophets.

11. On l. 18. "The great powers of the world form indeed the history of the world, but they have no future. Israel, however, always returns home to the dear and glorious land. The Jews might as a token of this return under Cyrus; the case is however this, that the true Holy One in Israel, Christ, guides us back to Paradise, when we flee to His hand from the Babylon of this world and let it be crucified for us." DIEDRICH.

12. On l. 23. "Although the Chaldeans were called of God for the purpose of making war on the Jewish nation on account of their multitudinous sins, yet they are punished because they did it not as God with a pure intention, namely, to punish the wrong in them and keep them for reformation; for they were themselves greater sinners than the Jews and continued with impitence in their sins. Therefore they could not go scot-free and remain unpunished. Moreover, they acted too roughly and dealt with the Jews more harshly than God had commanded, for which He therefore fairly punished them. As God the Lord Himself says (Isa. xlvii. 6): When I was angry with My people I gave them into thine hands; but thou shewedst them no mercy. Therefore it is not enough that God's will be accomplished, but there must be the good intention in it, which God had, otherwise such a work may be a sin and call down the divine punishment upon it." Würtemb. Summ.

13. On l. 31-34. "God calls Babylon Thou Pride, for pride was their inward force and impulse in all their actions. But worldly pride makes a Babylon and brings on a Babylon's fate. . . . Pride must fall, for it is in itself a lie against God, and all its might must perish in the fire; thus will the humble and meek remain in possession of the earth: this has a wide application through all times, even to eternity." DIEDRICH.

14. On ver. 33. "Israel is indeed weak and must suffer in a time of tyranny; it cannot help itself, nor needs it to do so, for its Redeemer is strong, His name The Lord Zebaoth—and He is now, having assumed our flesh, among us and conducts our cause so that the world trembles." DIEDRICH.

15. On l. 45. "An emblem of the destruction of anti-christian Babylon, which was also the true hammer of the whole world. This has God also broken and must and will do it still more. And this will the shepherd-boys do, as is said here in ver. 45 (according to LUTHER'S translation), that is, all true teachers and preachers." CRAMER.

16. On ch. li. "The doctrines accord in all points with the previous chapter. And the prophet Jeremiah both in this and the previous chapter does nothing else but make out for the Babylonians their final discharge and passport, because they behaved so valiantly and well against the people of Judah, that they might know they would not go unrecompensed. For payment is according to service. And had they done better it would have gone better with them. It is well that when tyrants succeed in their evil undertakings they should not suppose they are God's dearest children and lean on His bosom, since they will yet receive the recompense on their crown; whatever they have earned." CRAMER.

17. ["Though in the hand of Babylon is a golden cup; she chooses such a cup, in order that men's eyes may be dazzled with the glitter of the gold, and may not inquire what it contains. But mark well, in the golden cup of Babylon is the poison of idolatry, the poison of false doctrines, which destroy the souls of men. I have often seen such a golden cup, in fair speeches of seductive eloquence: and when I have examined the venomous ingredients of the golden chalice, I have recognized the cup of Babylon." ORIGEN in WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A.]

"The seat and throne of Anti-christ is expressly named Babylon, namely, the city of Rome, built on the seven hills (Rev. xvii. 9). Just as Babylon brought so many lands and kingdoms under its sway and ruled them with great pomp and pride (the golden cup, which made all the world drunk, was Babylon in the hand of the Lord (li. 7), and all the heathen drank of the wine and became mad)—so has the spiritual Babylon a cup in its hand, full of the abomination and uncleanness of its whoredom, of which the kings of the earth and all who dwell on the earth have been made drunk. As it is said of Babylon that she dwells by great waters and has great treasures, so writes John of the Romish Babylon, that it is clothed in silk and purple and scarlet and adorned with gold, precious stones and pearls (Rev. xviii. 12). Of Babylon it is said that the slain in Israel were smitten by her; so also the spiritual Babylon is become drunk with the blood of the saints (Rev. xvii. 6). Just, however, as the Chaldean Babylon is a type of the spiritual in its pride and despotism, so also is it a type of the destruction which will come upon it. Many wished to heal Babylon but she would not be healed; so many endeavor to support the ruinous anti-christian Babylon, but all in vain. For as Babylon was at last so destroyed as to be a heap of stones and abode of dragons, so will it be with anti-christian Babylon. Of this it is written in Rev. xiv. 8: She is fallen, fallen, that great city, for she has made all nations drink of the wine of her fornication. And again, Babylon the great is fallen, and is become the habitation of devils and a hold of all foul and hateful birds (Rev. xviii. 2). As the inhabitants of Babylon were admonished to flee from her, that every man might deliver his soul (li. 6)—and again, My people, go ye out from the midst of her and deliver every man his soul, etc. (li. 45)—so the Holy Spirit admonishes Christians almost in the same words to go out from the spiritual Babylon, that they be not polluted by her sins and at the same time share in her punishment. For thus it is written in Rev. xviii. 4, I heard, says John, a voice from heaven saying, Go ye out of her, My people, that ye be not partakers of her sins and that ye receive not of her plagues, for her sins reach unto heaven and God remembers her iniquities." Wurtemb. Summarien.

18. On li. 5. "A monarch can sooner make an end of half a continent than draw a nail from a hut which the Lord protects.—And if it is true that Kaiser Rudolph, when he revoked the toleration of the Picards and the same day lost one of his principal forts, said, 'I thought it would be so, for I grasped at God's sceptre' (WEIS-MANNI, Hist. Eccl. Tom. II. p. 320)—this was a sage remark, a supplement to the words of the wise." ZINZENDORF.

19. On li. 9. We heal Babylon, but she will not be healed. Babylon is an outwardly beautiful but inwardly worm-eaten apple. Hence sooner or later the foulness must become noticeable. So is it with all whose heart and centre is not God. All is inwardly hollow and vain. When this internal vacuity begins to render itself externally palpable, when here and there a rent or foul spot becomes visible, then certainly come the friends and admirers of the unholy form and would improve, cover up, sew up, heal. But it does not avail. When once there is death in the body no physician can effect a cure.

20. On li. 17, 19, 20. "The children of God have three causes why they may venture on Him. 1. All men are fools, their treasure is it not; 2. The Lord is their hammer; He breaks through everything, and 3, they are an instrument in His hand, a heritage; in this there is happiness." ZINZENDORF.

21. On li. 41-44. "How was Sheshach thus won, the city renowned in all the world—thus taken? No one would have thought it possible, but God does it. He rules with wonders and with wonders He makes His church free. Babylon is a wonder no longer for its power, but for its weakness. We are to know the world's weakness even where it still appears strong. A sea of hostile nations has covered Babylon. Her land is now a desolation. God takes Bel, the principal idol of Babylon, symbolizing its whole civil powers in hand, and snatches his prey from his teeth. Our God is stronger than all worldly forces, and never leaves us to them." DRENNICH.

22. On li. 53. "Yea, so it is with all walls and towers, in which God's word is not the vital force, even though they be entitled churches and cathedrals . . . God's church alone possesses permanence through His pure word." DRENNICH.

23. On li. 60-64. When we wish to preserve an archive safely, we deposit it in a record-office where it is kept in a dry place that no moisture may get to it. Seraiah throws his book-roll into the waters of the Euphrates, which must wash it away, dissolve and destroy it. But this was of no account. The main point was that he, Seraiah, as representative of the holy nation had taken solemn stock of the word of God against Babylon, and as it were taken God at His word, and reminded Him of it. In this manner the matter was laid up in the most enduring and safest archive that could be imagined; it was made a case of honor with the omniscient and omnipotent God. Such matters can, however, neither be forgotten, nor remain in dead silence, nor be neglected. They must be brought to such an end as the honor of God requires.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On l. 2. This text may be used on the feast of the Reformation, or any other occasion with reference to a rem bene gestum. The Triumph of the Good Cause, 1. over what enemies it is gained; 2. to what it should impel us; (a) to the avoidance of that over which we now triumph; (b) to the grateful proclamation of what the Lord has done for us, by word and by deed.

2. On l. 4-8. The deliverance of Israel from the Babylonian captivity a type of the deliverance of the Church. 1. The Church must humbly acknowledge the captivity suffered as a just judgment of God. 2. She must turn like Israel inwardly with an upright heart unto the Lord; 3. She must become like Israel to all men a pattern and leader to freedom.

3. On l. 5. A confirmation sermon. "What is the hour of confirmation? 1. An hour which calls to separation; 2. an hour which leads to new connections; 3. an hour which fixes forever the old covenant with the soul's friend." FLOREY, 1863.

4. On l. 18-20. Assyria and Babylon the types of all the spiritual enemies of the church as of individual Christians. Every one has his Assyria and his Babylon. Sin is the destruction of men. Forgiveness of sins is the condition of life, for only where forgiveness of sins is, is there life and blessedness. In Christ we find the forgiveness of sins. He destroys the handwriting. He washes us clean. He is also the good shepherd who leads our souls into green pastures, to the spiritual Carmel.

5. On l. 31, 32. Warning against pride. Babylon was very strong and powerful, rich and splendid. It seemed invincible by nature and by art. Had it not then a certain justification in being proud, at least towards men? No; for no one has to contend only with men. Every one who contends has the Lord either for his friend or his enemy. It is the Lord from whom cometh victory (Prov. xxi. 31). He it is who teacheth our hands to fight (Ps. xviii. 35; cxliv. 1). His strength is made perfect in weakness (2 Cor. xii. 9). He can make the lame (Isa. xxxiii. 23; Mic. iv. 7) and mortally wounded (Jer. xxxvii. 10) so strong that they overmaster the sound (comp. ver. 45). He can make one man put to flight a thousand (Deut. xxxii. 30; Isa. xxx. 17). With him can one dash in pieces a troop and leap over a wall (Ps. xviii. 29). No one accordingly should be proud. The word of the Lord, "I am against thee, thou proud one!" is a terrible word which no one should conjure up against himself.

6. On l. 33, 34. The consolation of the Church in persecution. 1. It suffers violence and injustice. 2. Its redeemer is strong.

7. On li. 6. God the Lord manifests such favor to Israel as to declare Himself her husband (ii. 2; iii. 1). But now that Israel and Judah are in exile, it seems as if they were rejected or widowed women. This, however, is only appearance. Israel's husband does not die. He may well bring a period of chastisement, of purification and trial on His people, but when this period is over, the Lord turns the handle, and smites those through whom He chastised Israel, when they had forgotten that they were not to satisfy their own desire, but only to accomplish the Lord's will on Israel.

8. On li. 6. A time may come when it will be to separate one's self. For although it is said in Prov. xviii. 1; he who separateth himself, seeketh that which pleaseth him and opposeth all that is good—and therefore separation, as the antipodes of churchliness, i. e., of churchly communion and humble subjection to the law of the co-operation of members (1 Cor. xii. 25 sq.) is to be repudiated, yet there may come moments in the life of the church, when it will be a duty to leave the community and separate one's self. Such a moment is come when the community has become a Babylon. It should, however, be noted that one should not be too ready with such a decision. For even the life of the church is subject to many vacillations. There are periods of decay, obscurations, as it were, comparable to eclipses of the stars, but to these, so long as the foundations only subsist, must always follow a restoration and return to the original brightness. No one is to consider the church a Babylon on account of such a passing state of disease. It is this only when it has withheld the objective divine foundations, the means of grace, the word and sacrament, altogether and permanently in their saving efficacy. Then, when the soul can no longer find in the church the pure and divine bread of life; it is well "to deliver the soul that it perish not in the iniquity of the church." From this separation from the church is, however, to be carefully distinguished the separation within the church, from all that which is opposed to the healthy life of the church, and is therefore to be regarded as a diseased part of the ecclesiastical body. Such separation is the daily duty of the Christian. He has to perform it with respect to his private life in all the manifold relations, indicated to us in Matt. xviii. 17; Rom. xvi. 17; 1 Cor. v. 9 sqq.; 2 Thess. iii. 6; Tit. iii. 10; 2 John 10, 11.—Comp. the article on Sects, by PALMER in HERZOG, R.-Enc., XXI., S. 21, 22.

9. On li. 10. The righteousness which avails before God. 1. Its origin (not our work or merit, but God's grace in Christ); 2. Its fruit, praise of that which the Lord has wrought in us (a) by words, (b) by works.

10. On li. 50. This text may be used at the sending out of missionaries or the departure of emigrants. Occasion may be taken to speak 1, of the gracious help and deliverance, which the Lord has hitherto shown to the departing; 2, they may be admonished to remain united in their distant land with their brethren at home by (a) remembering the Lord, i. e., ever remaining sincerely devoted to the Lord as the common shield of salvation; (b) faithfully serving Jerusalem, i. e., the common mother of us all (Gal. iv. 26), the church, with all our powers in the proper place and measure, and ever keeping her in our hearts.

IV. Conclusion.

HISTORICAL APPENDIX, CONTAINING A BRIEF SURVEY OF THE EVENTS FROM THE BEGINNING OF THE REIGN OF ZEDEKIAH, TO THE DEATH OF JEHOIACHIN (ch. lii.).

By the concluding words of li. 64 (Thus far, etc.) the final editor of the book evidently wished to indicate that the words of Jeremiah cease with ch. li., and that, therefore, what follows is not from him, but some other. We are thus expressly warned by those concluding words against the mistake of attributing chap. lii. to the prophet. Nevertheless the chapter has been considered by D. KIMCHI, ABARBANEL and many others, as a work of Jeremiah. SEB. SCHMIDT, e. g., in opposition to the opinion of ABARBANEL, says that the men of the great synagogue took the history of the destruction of Jerusalem from the Book of Kings and inserted it here, "ne forte erremus in eo, quod supra scriptum est." And afterwards "Contrarium potius statuimus, scripta hæc esse a Jeremia propheta et transsumta in librum Regum, sicut in cum historia Hiskie ex Jesaja translata est, cum aliqua tamen variatione, ut appareat, utrumque scriptorem habere quod sibi proprium et a Spiritu sancto inspiratum." All orthodox commentators of the older period do not however adopt this view. The strict Lutheran FÖRSTER, e. g., says in his Commentary, which appeared in 1672, "Hucusque fuit prophetia Jeremie. Coput istud ultimum ab alio quodam viro pio et sancto ἐπιτάφιατος quasi loco superadditum fuit vel huc transscriptum ex II. Reg. c. 25."—Among the more modern authors HÆVERNICK adopts the view that Jeremiah wrote the history of Jehoiachin and Zedekiah just as Isaiah wrote that of Hezekiah. He then, as editor of the Book of Kings allotted its natural place to this description in 2 Ki. xxv. (Eint. II., 1, S. 172) while Jer. lii. was added to these by the collectors of the prophecies. He afterwards (II. 2, S. 248) modifies this view, at least declaring vers. 31-34 to be a subsequently added notice, which, however, passed naturally and probably at the same time to 2 Ki. xxv.—KEIL (Eint. II., Aufl., S. 261; Comm. über die proph. Geschichtsbücher des A. T., III. Bd., 1865, S. 378, 9) is of opinion that an extended history of the last times of the kingdom of Judah, composed "perhaps by Jeremiah or Baruch" (in the Eint., etc., it is "either by Jeremiah or by Baruch"), was in existence. The two narratives of Jer. lii. and 2 Ki. xxv. were brief extracts from this. Most commentators, however, are of opinion that the present passage belonged originally to the Book of Kings, and was inserted by a later hand with several lesser and one great modification (the insertion of Jer. lii. 28-30, in the place of 2 Ki. xxv. 22-26). I also adopt this view in substance, for the following reasons: 1. The introduction of the passage (lii. 1, 2) contains the standing formula of the Book of Kings, with which the succession of a new king is usually recorded. This introduction is thus undoubtedly original in the Book of Kings. For whoever composed it, and from whatever source it may have been drawn, it was at any rate, as it now reads, written originally for the Book of Kings, and in Jer. lii. is only a transposition from thence. 2. The rest also is so composed that it cannot be said there is anything contained in it contrary in form or purport to the usual character of the Books of the Kings. 3. There is, therefore, a strong presumption that the narrative also thus introduced was originally written for the Book of Kings, to which it is essential and indispensable, and which, without it, would be so much mutilated, while the Book of Jeremiah receives in it a conclusion however useful, yet essentially foreign. 4. The transference from the Book of Kings is made purposely and with consideration. This is evident from the fact that the brief section, vers. 28-30, was inserted instead of the narrative concerning the fate of the Jews remaining in the country, which is only a brief extract from Jeremiah, chh. xxxix.-xliii., and therefore in the Book of Jeremiah would have been an unnecessary repetition. 5. As to the form of the text the relation is as follows: (a) in vers. 1-5, Jer. lii. has some traces of an older form of the text, not yet purified from roughnesses. Comp. וַיְהִי־הָעֵדֶה־עַד־הַשְּׁלִיכוֹ ver. 3, with 2 Ki. xxiv. 20. Likewise the older form נְבִיכָרָךְ ver. 4, with 2 Ki. xxv. 1. [†] On the other hand וַיִּהְיֶה ib. betrays the hand of an emendator. (b) In vers. 6-11, the text of Jer. lii. is in general, especially as regards completeness and correctness much better; ver. 6 contains the indispensable statement of the month, which is strangely lacking in 2 Ki. xxv. 3; so also Jer. lii. 7 contains the verbs indispensable to the sense, וַיִּבְרָחוּ וַיִּצְאֻהוּ וַיִּבְרָחוּ. Ver. 10 b contains the statement concerning princes of Judah, ver. 11 a similar one concerning the imprisonment of Zedekiah, which are both wanting in 2 Ki. xxv. The text of 2 Ki. xxv. thus appears here to be more than contracted (comp. also אֶת־וְאֵת, 2 Ki. xxv. 5 with צָרְקָהוּ Jer. lii. 8, whereby the harshness occasioned in 2 Ki. xxv. 7 by a change of subjects is removed). The absence of those essential parts of speech in vers. 3, 4, can be the result only of the transformations which the text has suffered. Thus also the other wants of the text may be explained, and there is no necessity for assuming the common use of a third source. (c). From vers. 12-23 the Book of Kings shows in vers. 8-17 a text variously emended and purged from real or apparent offenders. In ver. 8 Nebuchadnezzar, ib. עָבַד for עָבָד, and יְרוּשָׁלַם for בָּי, in ver. 9 כָּל־בֵּית־נְדוּל for the more difficult בְּנֵדוּל. In ver. 10 the superfluous כָּל is absent before הוֹלֵת; in ver. 11 for the same reason is wanting זָבִיחוֹת הָעֵס; the rare word הַצִּמּוֹן is altered into the more current הַחֵיכּוֹן, in ver. 12 we read בָּלוֹת for בָּלוֹת, which does not occur elsewhere; ib. the name Nibuzaradan seemed superfluous; ib. גְּבִים Chethibh for גְּבִימִים, not occurring elsewhere; in ver. 14 בְּדָקוֹת, and likewise in ver. 15 the כִּפִּים, כִּירוֹת and כִּירוֹת, because otherwise these names would be mentioned twice, also in ver. 15 the two neighboring words to the two last mentioned have disappeared; in ver. 16 with perfect justice the statement concerning the twelve oxen is absent; ib. we find the easier לְהַשִּׁיעַ; in ver. 17 the apparently superfluous וְהַעֲפִיטִים is wanting in the beginning, then all from הוּס, perhaps because these statements were already to be found in 1 Ki. vii. 15, 16; in ver. 17 אֶהְיֶה is wanting after הַפְּתִיחַ; ib. שָׁרֵשׁ is an evident mistake; after ver. 17 that is entirely wanting which forms Jer. lii. 23, perhaps because its main import had been already expressed in 1 Kings vii. 20. — (d). In verses 24-27 again the text of Jeremiah lii. shows itself to have been emended, but not happily; in ver. 24 הַפְּעִינָה is only an apparent improvement; in ver. 25 אֲשֶׁר הָיָה is certainly plainer; ib. שְׂבִיעָה is doubtful; the absence of the article before כָּפַר seems to proceed from ignorance. (e). In the concluding section, vers. 31-34, again the text of the book of Kings betrays the hand of the emendator; in ver. 27 (2 Ki. xxv.) הַכֹּשֶׁה is obscure, but וַיִּצְאֵהוּ אֶת־וְאֵת seemed evidently superfluous; instead of the rarer form כָּלִיָּה stands the more usual כָּלִיָּה, כָּלִיָּה כָּלִיָּה is a simplification; שָׁנָא in ver. 29 is a later Aramaic form; in ver. 30 כָּבֵל is wanting as superfluous, for the same reason also יוֹם כוֹתוֹ.

From all this it seems to follow that Jer. lii. is certainly a transposition of 2 Ki. xxv. but that in the former passage we have a better text, neither disfigured by needless correction nor by other injuries. Whether the author of the book of Kings is Jeremiah himself, or whether especially at the close of his history he made use of this prophet's writings, I leave undecided. This much, however, is certain, that this chapter neither stood originally in this place, nor is it an extract made by another person from the same source, from which 2 Ki. xxiv. 18-25, 30 was derived. Whatever opinion, however, may be held regarding the sources, Jer. lii. was not drawn therefrom by another person, but transposed from the book of Kings, and yet has preserved the text more pure than the original passage. The object of the transposition was evidently first to furnish the reader of the prophecies with the necessary historical guidance. The object may also have been prominent to show how completely and exactly the threatenings of the prophet against the stiff-necked people were fulfilled.

1. The capture of the city, together with the circumstances immediately previous and subsequent thereto.

LII. 1-11.

1 Zedekiah was one and twenty years old when he began to reign, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. And his mother's name was Hamutal the daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah. And he did that which was evil in the eyes of the LORD, according to all that Jehoiakim had done. For through the anger of the LORD [For so] it came to pass in Jerusalem and Judah [that Jehovah was angry] till he had cast them out from his presence, that [And] Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon. And it came to pass in the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month, in the tenth day of the month, that Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon came, he and all his army, against Jerusalem, and pitched against it, and built forts [a rampart]

5 against it round about. So the city was besieged⁴ unto the eleventh year of king 6 Zedekiah. And in the fourth month, in the ninth day of the month, the famine was sore in the city, so that there was no bread for the people of the land [the 7 common people]. Then the city was broken up [through], and all the men of war fled, and went forth out of the city by night by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden; (now the Chaldeans were by the city 8 round about;) and they went⁵ by the way of [to] the plain. But the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho; 9 and all his army was scattered from him. Then they took the king, and carried him up unto the king of Babylon to Riblah in the land of Hamath; where he gave 10 judgment upon him. And the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah before 11 his eyes: he slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah. Then he put out the eyes of Zedekiah; and the king of Babylon bound him in chains [a double chain], and carried him to Babylon, and put him in prison till the day of his death.

¹ Ver. 3.—הִשְׁלִיכוֹ, if there be no mistake in the writing, is an abnormal form of the infinitive. Comp. OLSH., § 191, b, f; EWALD, § 238, d. On the neuter meaning of the fem. verb הִתְהַרְהַר comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 60, 6, b; Isaiah xi. 20; 2 Kings xxiv. 3.

² Ver. 4.—The differences between the text here and in 2 Kings xxv. 1, 2 are as follows: 1. Instead of הָיָה בְּשִׁנָּה here הָיָה בְּשִׁנֹּת הַחֲשֵׁמַיִם there. The latter mode of expression (anno noni, i. e., numeri, comp. NAEGELSB. Gr., § 65, 2, c) is found in Jer. also in xxxviii. 1, Chethibh; xxxii. 1, Chethibh; xlvj. 2; li. 59. Besides also in lii. 23; xxix. 30. 2. 2 Kings has the later form in Heb., Nebuchadnessar (comp. xxi. 2-7; xxiv. 1; xxxii. 1; xxxv. 11; xxxix. 11; xliii. 10; xlv. 30; xlvj. 2; l. 17 with xxvii. 6, 20; xxviii. 3; xxxix. 5; HIRTZ on xxiv. 1). 3. הָיָה, 2 Kings, instead of הָיָה, which is required by וַיִּכְנֶן:

³ Ver. 4.—The word הִיָּק occurs, besides here and in the parallel passages, only in Ezek. iv. 2; xvii. 17; xxi. 27; xxvi. 8. It is thus a later word. The root הִיָּק does not occur in Hebrew, but is very common in the Chaldee, Syriac and Samaritan, where it has the meaning, speculari, inspicere, circumspicere, הִיָּק is therefore specula, the watch-tower, from which the besieged city may be watched and assailed. With this agrees well Isa. xxiii. 13, where the בְּרוֹמֵינִים of the Chaldeans are spoken of. It is surprising that the word never occurs in the plural, as we should expect, if it designated only the single towers. We may therefore suppose that it signifies the whole line of circumvallation, including the towers, and is thus a potiori, a collective designation. As the Chaldeans were celebrated for their skill in sieges (comp. HERZOG, Real-Enc., IV., S. 394), the word may have passed from their language into the Hebrew. Comp. KEIL on 2 Ki. xxv. 1; HAEVERNICK on Ezek. iv. 2, S. 49; GESEN., Theol., p. 330.

⁴ Ver. 5.—כְּצֹר is primarily coarctatio in general and then specially coarctatio by means of obsidio, hence it assumes the latter meaning in connections like עִיר כְּצֹר (Ps. xxxi. 22; lx. 11), כִּי בָּנָה (Deut. xx. 20), עַל כֵּן נָתַן כִּי עָלָה (Ezek. iv. 2), כִּי בֹאֵה בְּפִי (2 Kings xxiv. 10; xxv. 2), without involving a complete suppression of the radical signification. Comp. x. 17; xix. 9.

⁵ Ver. 7.—Instead of וַיִּלְכְּ we find in 2 Ki. the manifestly less correct form, וַיִּלְכָּ.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-3. Zedekiah . . . king of Babylon. These three verses are of the same purport with 2 Ki. xxiv. 18-20, with only two unessential differences. In the latter passage, ver. 20, we find וַיִּהְיֶה for וַיִּהְיֶה, and עַד-הִשְׁלִיכוֹ for עַד-הִשְׁלִיכוֹ, in both cases an easier and more correct reading, of which it is more natural to suppose that it arose out of the other, than the reverse. The present passage then has the presumption of originality in its favor. Comp., moreover, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11-13.—For through the anger, etc. The reason for Jehovah's anger is punishment, in ver. 2, however, to which the for refers, it is sin, not punishment, which is spoken of. Accordingly the words are not to be taken as causal, but as was shown on xxxii. 31 (p. 287) עַל is used here as frequently elsewhere for אֵל or לְ, and עַל-אֶפְרַיִם is the statement of the effect: it came to pass that Jehovah was angered—which may be said of what happened in Jerusalem, as well as against it.

Vers. 4, 5. And it came to pass . . . Zedekiah. These words are found almost exactly the same in 2 Ki. xxv. 1, 2, and in an abridged extract in xxxix. 1. Compare also Ezek. xxiv. 1. For the exposition of the parts reproduced in ch. xxxix., see there the differences between our text and that of the Book of Kings. Comp. the TEXTUAL NOTES.

Vers. 6, 7. And in the fourth month . . . the plain. These opening words, found also in xxxix. 2, are wanting in 2 Kings, although the statement of the day without that of the month, makes no sense, and also the words and went out of the city, though thus the sentence loses its predicate. KEIL (on 2 Ki. xxv. 4) supposes that not only the predicate has fallen out after all the men of war, but also still more before these words, in 2 Ki. and Jer. lii., namely, the words found in xxxix. 3, "and it came to pass, when Zedekiah the king of Judah saw them," because the king (according to 2 Ki. xxv. 5; Jer. lii. 8; xxxix. 5) was among the fugitives, and because the words "and all the men of war," have no proper connection with the previous context and could not form an adverbial sentence. But if KEIL were right, the whole verse xxxix. 3 must have dropped out, since them refers to the persons mentioned in it. We have already shown on ch. xxxix. that vers. 1, 2, 4-10 are only an abridged extract from ch. lii. and that the words quoted above are only a connecting clause between the original and genuine ver. 3, and the following verses derived from ch. lii. These words are therefore of later date than ch. lii., and cannot have been omitted before "and all the men," etc. The previous mention of the king is not necessary, since he is included; the sentence moreover is not adverbial, but a narrative of a by no means unusual construction (comp. EWALD, § 346, b).

Vers. 8-11. But the army . . . of his death. The Book of Kings reads "him" instead of Zedekiah. It is plain that the former could be more easily derived from the latter than the reverse.—In the land of Hamath is wanting in 2 Ki. xxv. 6, while it is found ib. ver. 21 (comp. 2 Ki. xxiii. 33).—He gave judgment. 2 Ki.

xxv. 6, has "they gave," etc., on which comp. rems. on xxxix. 5.—The first half of ver. 10 agrees with xxxix. 6, even to the there added words, "in Riblah." In 2 Ki. xxv. 7 it reads, "and they slew the sons," etc., the Chaldeans of ver. 5 being still the subject. The second half of ver. 10 is entirely wanting in 2 Kings. The blinding and binding in chains of king Zedekiah is narrated in both places in the same way, but in 2 Ki. the singulars put out (נָצַר) and bound him (וַיַּצְרֵהוּ) are the more surprising, as the sentence is contained in the plural carried him (וַיִּצְרֵהוּ). 2 Ki. xxv. is entirely silent on the confinement of Zedekiah in Babylon. HITZIG justly calls attention to the fact that בֵּית-הַפְּקָדוֹת is not simply a prison, this being always otherwise expressed (comp., e. g., ver. 31). Jeremiah, who is not blinded, is put into prison; but Zedekiah, the more guilty, is blinded and put into the house of correction. Comp. SIMSON on Jud. xvi. 21. The LXX. also has ἐς οἰκίαν φυλάσεως. Yet it appears that towards the end his confinement was less rigorous, and that an honorable interment was granted him after his death, for this is the purport of the promise made to him through Jeremiah in xxxiv. 1-5.

2. The Destruction of the City and Deportation of the People.

LII. 12-16.

- 12 Now in the fifth month, in the tenth day of the month, which was the nineteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon, came Nebuzar-adan, captain of the guard [of the halberdiers], who served [stood before]¹ the king of Babylon, into Jerusalem.
- 13 And burned the house of the LORD [Jehovah] and the king's house; and all the houses of Jerusalem, and all the houses of the great men [every great house],² burned
- 14 he with fire. And all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of
- 15 the guard, brake down all the walls of Jerusalem, round about. Then Nebuzar-adan captain of the guard [halberdiers] carried away captive certain of the poor [a part of the lowest] of the people, and the residue of the people that remained in the city, and those that fell away, that fell to the king of Babylon, and the rest of
- 16 the multitude [work-people].³ But Nebuzar adan the captain of the guard left certain of the poor [part of the meanest]⁴ of the land for vinedressers and for husbandmen.⁵

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 12.—For לְפָנָי, of which words the former owes its punctuation to the erroneous connection with יְרוּשָׁלַם (hence also לְפָנָי, 2 Kings reads נִבְזַרְאֲדָן as a correction, and 'ר' without בֵּי. He ought doubtless to read נִבְזַרְאֲדָן. Comp. xxxv. 19; Jud. xx. 28.

² Ver. 13.—Before נְרוֹל the article is wanting in 2 Ki. according to rule. Comp. NAEGELSA. Gr. § 82, 6. But the construct state of בֵּית is surprising in both cases. Probably it read originally, בֵּית נְרוֹל, as HITZIG supposes. A mistake (comp. the בֵּית twice before) caused בֵּית, from which came בֵּית הַנְּרוֹל. This can be taken only in the sense of rhetorical emphasis, הַנְּרוֹל being collective for "the great" (2 Ki. iv. 8; v. 1). Then certainly the constr. state is perfectly normal, but in 2 Ki. the traces of an older form of the text are to be recognized. Before חוֹכֵת ver. 14 is wanting in 2 Ki. the certainly unnecessary כֹּל, before רַב-טַי however the grammatically necessary אֵת.

³ Ver. 15.—Instead of יְהִיר־הָאֲבוֹן, 2 Ki. has יְהִירֵהוּ. The word אֲבוֹן must have seemed obscure even to the authors of the text of 2 Ki. xxv. and Jer. xxxix., the one rendering it as above, the other by הָעָם הַשְּׂאִרִים. In Prov. viii. 30 הַכֹּלֵן and in Song of Sol. vii. 1 אֶכְלֵן certainly has the sense of work-man, and accordingly we may take the word here as a collective designation of the הָרָשׁ and בְּכִנְרָה, whose deportation is spoken of in xxiv. 1 and xxix. 2. Thus Hitzig, Graf, MEIER, KEIL, on the other hand, appeals to xxxix. 9. But this passage, as well as 2 Ki. xxv. 11, proves only that to both authors the word הַכֹּלֵן appeared strange. Whether they interpreted it correctly is another question. If it should be alleged that it is a word appertaining only to a higher style, we reply that it would not be an easy alteration from הַכֹּלֵן.

⁴ Ver. 16.—Instead of כְּרִלֹת 2 Ki. has כְּרִלָּת. This also betrays the hand of the corrector, since כְּרִלֹת does not occur elsewhere either as plural or singular (EWALD, §165, c). It is the plural of רִלָּה (xl. 7; 2 Ki. xxiv. 14; xxv. 12)—tenitates, insignificances.

⁵ Ver. 16.—The name Nebuzar-adan appeared superfluous to the author of 2 Ki. xxv., having been mentioned in ver. 12. The word נְבֻזַרְאֲדָן, which does not occur elsewhere, he altered into נְבֻזַר (from נָבַז, fodit, aravit). Comp. remarks on xxxix. 10.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 12-14. Now in the fifth . . . round about. Instead of the tenth day, 2 Kings (as also Bar. i. 2) mentions the seventh, as the same text also states three cubits instead of the five in ver. 23, and five men instead of the seven in ver. 25. HITZIG, THENIUS, GRAF, KEIL [BLAYNEY, HENDERSON] rightly suppose that these differences arose from the interchange of the letters of the older alphabet used as numerals. Which statements are correct is not ascertainable. THENIUS [comp. also WORDSWORTH] declares the statement here made to be the correct one, because the Jews afterward kept the ninth day as a fast. But on the other hand comp. KEIL on 2 Ki. xxv. 8.

Vers. 15, 16. Then Nebuzar-adan . . . husbandmen.—The poor of the people, which is wanting in 2 Ki., has come here either by mistake from ver. 16, where it also begins the sentence, or it is to express the thought that the poor people did not all remain behind, but were partly carried away. The latter is probably the correct view.—Multitude [work-people]. It is difficult to decide which is the correct rendering. Both suit the sense, for a remnant of work-people might just as well be spoken of as a remnant of the masses of the people (either in antithesis to the warriors or the population of the city). I prefer to take the word in the sense in which it undoubtedly occurs in Prov. viii. 30 [then was I as a workman with him], and Song of Sol. vii. 1.

3. The Carrying away of the sacred Vessels.

LII. 17-23.

- 17 Also the pillars of brass that were in [belonged to]¹ the house of the LORD, and the bases, and the brazen sea that was in the house of the LORD [Jehovah] the
- 18 Chaldeans brake, and carried all² the brass of them to Babylon. The caldrons [pots] also, and the shovels, and the snuffers, and the bowls, and the spoons, and
- 19 all the vessels of brass wherewith they ministered, took they away. And the basins,³ and the firepans,⁴ and the bowls, and the caldrons [pots], and the candlesticks, and the spoons, and the cups;⁵ that which was of gold in gold, and that which was of silver in silver [which were entirely of gold or silver]⁶ took the captain of
- 20 the guard [halberdiers] away. The⁷ two pillars, one⁸ sea, and twelve brazen bulls that were under⁹ the bases, which king Solomon had made to [for] the house
- 21 of the LORD [Jehovah]; the brass¹⁰ of all these vessels was without weight. And concerning the pillars, the height¹¹ of one pillar was eighteen cubits; and a fillet of twelve cubits did compass it; and the thickness thereof was four fingers; it was
- 22 hollow.¹² And a chapter of brass was upon it; and the height of one chapter was five cubits, with network¹³ and pomegranates upon the chapter, round about, all
- 23 of brass. The second pillar also and the pomegranates¹⁴ were like unto these. And there were ninety and six pomegranates on a side; and all the pomegranates upon the network were a hundred round about [round about were a hundred].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 17.—Instead of לְבֵית אֱלֹהִים we read in 2 Ki. xxv. 13 בֵּית אֱלֹהִים. The latter—which were in the house of Jehovah, the former—which belonged to the house, etc.

2 Ver. 17.—In 2 Ki. כל is wanting before נְהַיְרָם as in ver. 14 before הַכֹּתֶה.

3 Ver. 19.—כַּפִּים-1 (1 Ki. vii. 50; 2 Ki. xii. 11), כִּכּוֹת, 2 Sam. xvii. 23, כִּכּוֹת) from כָּף, Latin, bowl (Ex. xii. 23; Zechariah xii. 2) not to be confounded with כָּף, threshold (ver. 21). כִּכּוֹת כִּכָּף are expressly mentioned in 2 Ki. xii. 11.

4 Ver. 19.—כִּהָתוֹת- (from הָתַה, to hold, seize, specially used of bringing fire, Isa. xxx. 14; Ps. vi. 27) are vessels for carrying burning substances, whether coals (Lev. xvi. 13) or heated iron bars (Num. xvi. 17 sqq.).

5 Ver. 19.—כַּנְקִיּוֹת are mentioned besides only in Ex. xxv. 20; xxxvii. 15; Num. iv. 7, and in all these places among the utensils of the shew-bread-table (comp. rem. on כַּבֹּת, ver. 17) and as pertaining to libation, וַיִּשְׂרֹף בְּכַף הַכִּנְקִיּוֹת. In Ex. xxv. 27 these vessels are expressly designated as to be made of gold.

6 Ver. 19.—The double position of וְכַף and כַּכָּף has the sense of "only" or "wholly" (exclusive). Comp. מְכַסְּבוֹת. Gr., § 22 b.—The words וְיָתֵת הַכִּירֹת and וְיָתֵת הַכַּנְקִיּוֹת are wanting in 2 Keri. It is not worthy that thus (a) the repetition of כִּירֹת and כַּנְקִיּוֹת, and (b) the plural כַּכָּפִים, which occurs nowhere else in the sense of "the same" are avoided; (c) that the words following; כִּירֹת and כַּכּוֹת are also removed.

7 Ver. 20.—With respect to the construction of ver. 20 we are to regard the substantives not first absolutely as in the accusative; as to the pillars, etc., their brass was not to be weighed. The verb is to express that it was found to be proper which raised the weight of the brass to such a degree.

8 Ver. 20.—Instead of וְהָרַד הַכֶּרִי the Keri would have read (not in 2 Ki.) וְהָרַד, probably because both numbers stand before and afterwards without the article. Grammatically both are possible. Comp. NAGELB. Gr., § 71, 2 d and 3.

9 Ver. 20.—The explanation of הַחֵת in the sense of "instead" is as given as the assumption that the text originally read וְהַכַּנְקִיּוֹת is arbitrary.

10 Ver. 21.—Instead of לְנֹחֶשֶׁת (the suffix by anticipation, comp. NAGELB. Gr., § 77, 2; Jer. li. 16 and on xlviii. 11) we find in 2 Ki. xxv. 16 simply לְנֹחֶשֶׁת.

11 Ver. 21.—The Keri וְקוֹנֵה, with which the Chethibh in 2 Ki. xxv. 17 and 1 Ki. vii. 11 agrees, is unnecessary, for קוֹנֵה may be regarded as the accusative of measure (comp. NAGELB. Gr., § 70, c): eight cubits was a pillar as to height.

12 Ver. 21.—On the construction comp. NAGELB. Gr., § 97, 2 a and Ann. 1.

13 Ver. 22.—לְכַבֵּךְ from כָּבַךְ, nectare, plectere ians (comp. כָּבַךְ Num. i. 13; Job viii. 13; כָּבַךְ, thicket, Gen. xxi. 13, etc.), is opus reticulatum, network. Comp. 1 Ki. vii. 17 sqq.; 2 Ki. i. 2; 2 Chron. iv. 12, 13; Job xvi. 12.

14 Ver. 22.—רַכְנִים- at the close of ver. 22 is wanting in 2 Ki. xxv. 17, and we find in 1 Ki. vii. 11 יַרְדֵּי-הַרְחֵבָה. This makes the impression that this expression seemed unsuitable to the author of Jer. li. (I must denote רַכְנִים with the network), both on account of the רַכְנֵי and because the pomgranates were also named after the network, and that, in order besides the general וְכָלֵהָ to set forth a special part, he chose in preference the last mentioned, the רַכְנִים.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 17-20. Also the pillars . . . weight. Concerning the brazen pillars of Solomon's temple comp. 1 Ki. vii. 15-22; 2 Chron. iii. 15 sqq.; Winer, R.-W.-B., s. v. Jachin und Boaz; Herzog, R.-Enc. VI. S. 366, 7. [Wordsworth, ad loc., and Smith's Dict. s. v.].—The כַּכּוֹת, bases (comp. 1 Ki. vii. 27 sqq.), were pedestals or stands, four cubits long, four broad and three high, to serve as supports for the ten basins required in washing the flesh of the sacrifices (2 Chron. iv. 6). Comp. Kitt on the Books of Kings.—The brazen sea (comp. 1 Ki. vii. 23-26; 1 Chron. xviii. 8; 2 Chron. iv. 2-6) served for the priests' washing (comp. Exod. xxx. 18 sqq.). Winer, R.-W.-B. s. v.—Herz., R.-Enc. IX. S. 236 sqq. [Comp. Wordsworth and Smith's Dict.].—Of the smaller vessels are mentioned כִּירֹת, pots for carrying away the ashes from the altar; שֶׁטִּים, shovels for removing the ashes; כַּיִּמְרוֹת, not to be confounded with כַּיִּמְרוֹת, a vine-dresser's knife, occurring in three places only besides this: 1 Ki. vii. 50; 2 Ki. xii. 14; 2 Chron. iv. 22, and always with כַּיִּמְרוֹת, of uncertain meaning; Vulg., etc., psalteria; LUTHER, etc., knife; GESENIUS, etc., scissors, lamp-scissors, at any rate an instrument so-called a carpendo; כַּיִּמְרוֹת, which is wanting in 2 Ki., probably that it might not occur twice, from יָרַק; sparsit, therefore vas unctis spargitur, bowls, mentioned in Exod. xxvii. 3; xxxviii. 3; Num. iv. 14 among the altar-utensils, therefore used for sprinkling the blood of the sacrifices, but comp. also Am. vi. 6; כַּבִּיט, likewise of uncertain meaning. LXX. σπάγχα, flesh-fork, flesh-hook, the moderns—spoons, pans, bowls, on account of their resemblance to the brazen hand. Comp. Kitt on Kings. In Exod. xxv. 20 these appear among the utensils of the table of shew-bread, comp. Num. vii. 14, 23, etc. Winer, R.-W.-B. and Herz., Real-Enc. s. v. Schalen-Luch. All these vessels were of brass [HENDERSON, copper]. In the following verse the golden and silver vessels are also enumerated, which the Chaldeans carried away. Hirtzig has unjustly attacked ver. 19 as spurious, for it does not interrupt the connection, since evidently in vers. 18, 19 all the smaller vessels are to be enumerated, the larger ones having been mentioned in ver. 17. These latter could, of course, be only of brass, but the total amount of the brass plundered was so great that it seemed to merit the special emphasis given to it in ver. 20. The golden and silver vessels are not there mentioned, because it was only the brazen ones which were of such immense weight. The pots, sprinkling cups and spoons are mentioned a second time in ver. 19, simply because there were such utensils both of brass and of gold and silver. Hirtzig's opinion that all the golden and silver vessels had already been carried away at Jehoiachin's deportation, certainly finds some support in 2 Ki. xxiv. 13 ("all the vessels of gold"). From the circumstance, however, that only golden vessels are spoken of, we may conclude that the cream only was then removed, i. e. the most valuable. The golden vessels of low value as well as all the silver remained for the thorough evacuation made by Nebuzar-adan.—The words and twelve brazen bulls which were under are rightly wanting in 2 Ki. xxv. 16. For they contain a double error: 1. the twelve bulls were not under the bases, but under the sea, according to 1 Ki. vii. 25; 2 Ki. xvi. 17. 2. In 2 Ki. xvi. 17 it is expressly related that Ahaz had already taken away the twelve bulls and replaced them by a substructure of stone. Whether they went is not indeed stated, but no more is it recorded that they were restored to their original position. I therefore, in opposition to KEIL (Comm. on Kings), agree with those who regard the words in question as the arbitrary addition of some one, whose mind was not clear about the "bases," and who had forgotten the passage in 2 Ki. xvi. 17. [Comp. WORDSWORTH].

Vers. 21-23. And the pillars . . . a hundred. Supplementary and more particular description of the pillars.—And the pillars is wanting in 2 Ki. The height is also stated at eighteen cubits in 1 Ki. vii. 15. The description there given is in general the basis of this.—And a fillet, etc., to the end of the verse, is also wanting in 2 Ki.—If the pillars were twelve cubits in circumference, the diameter (comp. WILNER, R.-W.-B. s. v. Jachin und Boas) was about four cubits, which gives a perfectly correct proportion. The thickness of the brass was four fingers. Thus the pillars were hollow, as indeed is remarked.—A chapitor. This is the capital, coronamentum of the pillar. Comp. 1 Ki. vii. 16; 2 Chron. iv. 12, 13.—Instead of five cubits 2 Ki. xxv. 17 has three. The number five is the correct one according to 1 Ki. vii. 16.—Of one is unnecessary, but not incorrect, since of course it is understood not of a second capital, but the capital of the second pillar. It is evidently based on 1 Ki. vii. 16.—The pomegranates were also an ornamentation on the hem of the priest's ephod, or surplice (Ex. xxviii. 33, 34). A figure of it may be seen in THIENUS, Comm. on Kings, Taf. III. Fig. 2 bb.—Ver. 23 is entirely wanting in 2 Kings. Ninety-six pomegranates on each pillar were placed לְרֵיבֹוֹן , i. e. towards the wind, towards the four winds or sides [HENDERSON after HITZIG, towards the air, the outside of the capitals]. The expression is found here only. Comp. Ezek. xxxvii. 9. It is clear that this is the meaning from the statement that the entire number of the pomegranates attached to the network was a hundred. There must then have been also a pomegranate at each corner.

4. The Execution of the Representatives of the People and Statement of the Number of the Captives.

LII. 24-30.

- 24 And the captain of the guard [halberdiers] took Seraiah the chief priest, and 25 Zaphaniah the second priest, and the three keepers of the door: He took also out of the city a eunuch [court officer], which had the charge [was¹ overseer] of the men of war; and seven men of them that were near the king's person, which were found in the city; and the principal scribe² of the host [the scribe, the prince of the host], who mustered the people of the land; and three-score men of the people
 26 of the land, that were found in the midst of the city. So Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard took them and brought them to the king of Babylon to Riblah.
 27 And the king of Babylon smote them, and put them to death in Riblah in the land
 28 of Hamath. Thus Judah was carried away captive out of his own land. This is the people whom Nebuchadrezzar carried away captive: in the seventh year three 29 thousand Jews and three and twenty: In the eighteenth year of Nebuchadrezzar he carried away captive from Jerusalem eight hundred and thirty and two persons:
 30 In the three and twentieth year of Nebuchadrezzar Nebuzar-adan the captain of the guard carried away captive of the Jews seven hundred forty and five persons: all the persons were four thousand and six hundred.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 25.—In 2 Ki. xxv. we find וְהָיָה for וְהָיָה . The former does not necessarily, as HITZIG asserts, signify "which is." וְהָיָה takes the place of the copula generally, without reference to time. Comp. EWALD, § 297 b.

² Ver. 25.— וְהָיָה . In 2 Ki. xxv. וְהָיָה , which I regard as the more correct reading.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 21-27. And the captain . . . out of his own land. These verses differ from the corresponding verses in 2 Ki. xxv., with the exception of some trifling variations in language, only in the statement of a number (seven instead of five in ver. 25), of which hereafter. It is related that representatives of all classes of the people, priests, officials and simple citizens had to suffer death, evidently in token that Nebuchadnezzar held not only the king but the people guilty of rebellion. At the head of those executed stands the high-priest Seraiah, who is nowhere mentioned in the book of Jeremiah. According to 1 Chron. v. 40 he was the son of Azariah and grandson of Hilkiah; according to Ezer. vii. 1, Ezra was descended from him.—After Seraiah is mentioned Zephaniah, doubtless the same who is mentioned in xxi. 1; xxix. 25, 29; xxxvii. 3 as priest simply and son of Maaseiah. Here he is called the second priest, but in 2 Ki. xxv. second priest only without the article. As according to 2 Ki. xxiii. 4 (where as here three grades of priests are enumerated) there were several second priests, the reading of the Book of Kings is probably the correct one. Comp. Oehler in Herzog, R.-Enc. VI. S. 203, 4.—The keepers of the door [or threshold] are also mentioned in 2 Ki. xii. 10; xxii. 4; xxiii. 4; Jer. xxxv. 4. As only three of them are mentioned, we must regard these as the superiors of the four thousand Levitical שְׁמֵרֵי דֹר (1 Chron. xxiii. 5). For further details consult Oehler in Herzog, R.-Enc. VIII. S. 354-6.—In the second category of those executed are mentioned certain inhabitants of Jerusalem, who held offices at court, especially in the war-department. The city here seems to stand in antithesis both to the temple (ver. 24) and to the country (ver. 25 b). The one שְׂרֵיף (court-officer, but possibly at the same time eunuch, comp. rems. on xxix. 2) was not the overseer, but only an overseer, etc. He was therefore one of the generals, perhaps commander of the city garrison.—And seven men. In 2 Ki. xxv. we read five men, whether correctly or incorrectly cannot here be decided as in vers. 12 and 22. The analogy of these cases however favors our text.—That were near the king's person, literally, "that saw the king's face," viz. in the sense of a daily custom, is a designation of high, yea, highest position (Esth. i. 14; comp. Matt. xviii. 10). These were therefore officials of high rank, and as it is not said that they were endued with military functions, they may be regarded as representatives of the civil authorities.—Scribe, the prince of the host. Scribe is not a writer in our sense. The title belongs not only, as Graf supposes, to the "people of the pen," but is given to the highest officers of State. Comp. 2 Sam. viii. 7; xx. 25; 2 Ki. xii. 11; 1 Chr. xviii. 16; xxvii. 32. And in 2 Chr. xxvi. 11 it is expressly recorded that Uzziah's army went out "by the hand of Jeiel the scribe." This Sopher was not the leader of the host, but chief of the war-department, minister or secretary of war. Comp. Saalschuetz, Mos. Recht. S. 63.—And threescore men.

These sixty men appear as the third class of persons executed, and representatives of the country population, as is indicated by their number and the remark that they were found in the midst of the city (2 Kings xxv. 19 "in the city"). This remark would be altogether superfluous, if the object was not to set forth that these men did not originally belong to the city.—On Riblah comp. rems. on xxxix. 5.—The words, Thus Judah was carried away captive out of his land, are found in both texts and in both places are appropriate. For in Jeremiah they form the transition to the numbering of the deported, and in 2 Kings they lead to the account of what happened in the country after the deportation. They therefore furnish no data for the solution of the question which of the two recensions is the original. Moreover, there seems to be an allusion in them to i. 3.

Vers. 28-30. This is the people . . . four thousand and six hundred. This section is entirely wanting in 2 Kings. It is difficult to bring it into harmony with the other statements respecting the deportations. The differences are as follows: 1. This section speaks of three deportations, while according to the other testimonies of the Old Testament there were only two (under Jehoiakim and Zedekiah). 2. The section follows a divergent chronology, stating that the deportations took place in the seventh, eighteenth and twenty-third years of Nebuchadnezzar, while this very chapter (ver. 12) and 2 Ki. xxiv. 12; xxv. 8 name the eighth and nineteenth years of Nebuchadnezzar as the dates of the deportation, but know nothing of any in the twenty-third year of this king. 3. According to this passage three thousand and twenty-three were carried away the first time, eight hundred and thirty-two the second time, seven hundred and forty-five the third time, total four thousand six hundred, which sum is expressly given at the close of ver. 30. According to 2 Ki. xxiv. 14-16, however, eighteen thousand souls were carried away at the first deportation alone. There are no counter-statements with regard to the other numbers, but their smallness is surprising; of this hereafter. On these points we make the following remarks: 1. By the seventh year in ver. 28, we are certainly to understand the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, since both the other deportations are dated in years of this monarch. 2. These statements are not necessarily erroneous, but may possibly follow another reckoning of the years, and perhaps the same as Josephus follows (Antiq. X., 8, 5; C. Ap. I. 21), though evidently only on the basis of this passage. Comp. Niebuhr, Ass. u. Bab., S. 68 sqq. 3. Ver. 29 mentioning the eighteenth year after ver. 12 has stated the nineteenth as the date of the same fact, shows that we have here another author. 4. The view of Ewald (Gesch. d. F. Isr., III., 1 S. 435) which Graf also adopts, that in ver. 29 we are to read שְׁבַע עָשָׂר שָׁנָה, that accordingly one year before the last capture of Jerusalem three thousand and twenty-three were carried captive from the country (hence הָאָרֶץ), after the capture eight hundred and thirty-two from the city (hence הַיְרוּשָׁלַיִם, ver. 29), and finally five years later from the land already somewhat repopulated seven hundred and forty-five, has much in its favor, but is yet not perfectly satisfactory. For the circumstance that the difference between the eighth and nineteenth, and the seventh and eighteenth years of Nebuchadnezzar is the same, does not authorize us to supply a word עֲשָׂרָה, fallen out after עֲבָרָה. Then, too, the deportation of the mass of the people during the war, at a time when the Egyptian army was to be feared (comp. xxxvii. 5), is scarcely probable. Finally the assumption of a deportation five years after the capture of the city is pure hypothesis, for which there is no positive testimony. It is also not to be supposed that five years after the destruction, admitting the return of a few scattered individuals, an almost equally great number could be carried away as after the destruction of the capital. Would not these have rather again betaken themselves to flight? 5. Even if we grant that the strikingly small numbers of the exiles are to be judged from a specific point of view, and therefore do not necessarily imply an error, any more than the number of the years of Nebuchadnezzar's reign, yet the differences between vers. 12 and 23 still remain, with the exceedingly obscure third deportation, as irremovable stones of stumbling, and I therefore agree with NIEBUHR, when he says, "it cannot be a subject of doubt that vers. 23-30 in the fifty-second chapter of Jeremiah are a gloss."

5. The Favorable turn in the Fate of Jehoiachin.

LII. 31-34.

- 31 ¹ And it came to pass in the seven and thirtieth year of the captivity of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, in the five and twentieth day of the month, that Evil-merodach king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, lifted up
 32 the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah, and brought him forth out of prison, and spake kindly unto him, and set his throne above the throne of the kings that were 33 with him in Babylon, and changed² his prison-garments: and he did continually 34 eat bread before him all the days of his life. And for his diet, there was a continual diet given him of the king of Babylon, every day a portion [the day's requirements] until the day of his death, all the days of his life.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 31.—2 Kings xxv. for כִּלְכְּלוּ has כִּלְכְּלוּ אִתּוֹ; וַיִּצְאָה is wanting; for הַכְּבִּיאִי it reads בְּלֵא, instead of לְכַבֵּא לְכַבֵּא more simply כָּבַא כִּבְעַל; further עָשָׂה for עָשָׂה (ver. 33); for לְפָנָיו תָּמִיד the same words reversed, for לְפָנָיו תָּמִיד (ver. 31) merely תָּמִיד; the words עַד יוֹם מוֹתוֹ are entirely wanting in 2 Kings. All these alterations indicate that the author of 2 Ki. xxv. endeavored to give an, in his opinion, improved text.

² Ver. 33.—עָשָׂה is the Hebrew, עָשָׂה (2 Ki. xxv.) the later Aramaic form. Comp. OLSH., § 223, Ann., and § 246, b. Ann.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

To this section there is an almost exactly corresponding one in 2 Ki. xxv. (27-30). The differences are unessential: instead of the twenty-fifth day, 2 Ki. xxv. 31 has the twenty-seventh (comp. ver. 25, where the reverse is the case), so that one is tempted to think that one of the two authors has interchanged these two passages; (comp. also rems. on ver. 12). For other differences comp. the TEXTUAL NOTES.—The expression to lift up the head, is found also in Gen. xl. 13 coll. 19 and 20, and designates the elevation of one who is prostrate. Comp. the expression in another sense in Ex. xxx. 12; Num. i. 2, etc.; Ps. lxxxiii. 3.—In the first year of his reign. It was evidently an act of grace, which Evil-merodach performed on the occasion of his ascending the throne. May not the influence of

Daniel and other highly esteemed Jews at the Babylonian court have operated in favor of the imprisoned king?—Out of prison. Comp. rems. on xxxvii. 4.—Above the throne. This expression does not mean that Jehoiachin received a seat on the same level, but surpassing the others in height, but that his seat stood higher up than the others, i. e., that he could sit nearer to the king. Whether the others were princes constantly or transiently present, may be left undecided. Perhaps both.—His diet, אֲרִיזָה (comp. xl. 5), evidently comprehends all that Jehoiachin needed for himself and household, besides the food which he had at the royal table. The accumulation of expressions, indicating that Jehoiachin continued without interruption to the end of his life to enjoy royal honors, shows that this fact gave great satisfaction to the author.—On the chronological relations, comp. NIEBUHR, Ass. u. Babel., S. 87 sqq.; DUNCKER, Gesch. d. Alterth., I, S. 864, 5.

—The ascension of the throne by Evil-merodach occurred in the year B. C., 561. It is not absolutely impossible that Jeremiah was still alive at this time. Supposing that he began his ministry at the age of twenty, he would be then about eighty-six. Comp. the dates in xxiii. 3, and lii. 31. It is also not impossible that he received in Egypt the news of Jehoiachin's exaltation. But this notice includes not only the liberation of the ex-king, but his death (vers. 33, 34). Thus vanishes all probability of Jeremiah's being its author, as well as from the consideration that the notice, if proceeding from Jeremiah, must have been found in another place, and not at the close of this supplement, evidently compiled by a later hand.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. "Docemur hoc capite, quod comminationes divine non sint de pelvi fulgura, quodque Deus pro misericordia sua infinita calamitates a se immissas mitigare plerumque soleat, si seria interveniat poenitentia." FÖRSTER.

2. On vers. 1-3. "From this we see why God sometimes places ungodly rulers over a country, who cast it to destruction. It is done on account of the rulers' and the people's sins, that they may draw down the well merited punishment, as Sirach says. On account of violence, injustice and avarice, a kingdom passes from one nation to another (x. 8). So also says King Solomon. Because of the sins of a nation occur many changes of rulers, but for the sake of the people who are intelligent and reasonable, the State is prolonged (Prov. xxviii. 2)." Wurtemb. Summarien.

3. On ver. 4. "God allows many slight and mild punishments to come as warnings, till at last comes the finishing stroke. This is a witness to the divine long-suffering (Rom. ii. 4)." CRAMER.

4. On ver. 6. "The fact that in this siege compassionate women had to kill and eat their own children (Lam. iv. 10) is a reminder that by bodily hunger God would punish; 1. satiation and disgust towards His holy word and soul-foe; 2. the terrible offering up of children to Moloch; 3. the loose discipline of children." CRAMER.

5. On ver. 7. "No fortress can protect the ungodly, even though they had their nest in the clouds." CRAMER.

6. On ver. 8. "An example of faithless, perjured men of war. But as Zedekiah broke his oath to the king at Babylon, he was paid back in the same coin." CRAMER. "His people forsook the poor king Zedekiah on his flight and he was captured, from which we see that great men cannot depend on their body-guard; these flee in time of need, and leave their masters in the lurch. The surest and best protection is when we have the holy angels for our guard . . . This angelic protection is, however, to be obtained and preserved by faith and godliness, but is lost by unbelief and ungodly conduct." Wurtemb. Summ.

7. On vers. 9-11. The punishment of perjury. "Ubi monemur, quod fides hosti, etiam barbaro, qualis hodie Turca, a Christianis data, immunc violantia." FÖRSTER.

8. On ver. 9. sqq. "God had shown Zedekiah by Jeremiah a way in which he could escape the calamity. But because he forsook the Lord and would not follow it, the others were only leaky cisterns (Jer. ii. 13). For woe to the rebellious who take counsel without the Lord (Isa. xxx. 1). This is useful for an instance against the holy by works, who reject God's way of escaping the Devil; when they devise other ways for themselves they are caught by the Chaldeans of hell." CRAMER.

9. On ver. 12 sqq. "Holy places, external ceremonies and opus operatum do not avail for hypocrites. . . . If God punished His own institution so severely, how shall human institutions remain unpunished?" CRAMER.

10. On ver. 12. "Quale fatum, ne et nostris oblatum templis . . . creemus, ne profanemus templa ulterius tum externa vel materialia, tum interna vel spiritualia in cordibus nostris, de quibus 1 Cor. iii. 16 sqq.; vi. 19 sqq." FÖRSTER.

12. On ver. 15. "He who will not serve God and his neighbor at home and in quiet, must learn to do it in a strange land in affliction and distress." CRAMER.

13. On ver. 24 sqq. "As teachers are often to blame for their behaviour that sin gets the upper hand in a community, it is exceedingly just when God brings such for an example into great punitive judgment (1 Sam. ii. 27-34)." STARKE.

14. On ver. 24. "The priests are caught and slain: 1. because they could not believe the truth for themselves; 2. because they led others astray; 3. because they appealed to the temple of the Lord; 4. because they persecuted the true prophets; 5. because they troubled the whole church of God. But he who troubleth shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be (Gal. v. 10)." CRAMER.

15. On ver. 31 sqq. "Sane omnino verisimile videtur judicio Philippi Melancthonis in Chron. part. I fol. 33 Evilmerodichum amplezum esse doctrinam Danielis de Vero Deo, quam et pater publico edicto professus est, eamque ob causam in clementiam exercuisse erga regem Jechoniam." FÖRSTER. — "Narrant Hebræi hujusmodi fabulum: Evilmerodich, qui patre suo Nabuchodonosoro vivente per septem annos vider hostatus, ante regnaverat, postquam ille restitutus in regno est, usque ad mortem patris cum Joakim rege Jude in vinculis fuit; quo mortuo, quoniam rursus in regnum succederet, et non susceperetur a principibus, qui metuebant, ne viveret qui dicebatur extinctus, ut scilicet patris mortui faceret, aperuit sepulcrum et cadaver ejus unco et funibus traxit." JEROME on Jer. xiv. 18, 19. JOSEPHUS speaks of it as follows: "Ἄβελσαρ, ὁ βασιλεὺς ἔβριθε τὸν Ἰεζωναν τὸν δεσμῶν ἄρειος ἐν τοῖς ἀνικαιοτάτοις φλογὶ εἶχε . . . Ὁ γὰρ πατὴρ αὐτοῦ τὴν πίστιν οὐκ ἐόλασε τῷ Ἰεζωνῳ, παραβῆντι μετὰ γυναικῶν καὶ τέκνων καὶ τῆς συγγενείας ὄλης ἕκαστος ἐπιπὼν ἰππὸ τῆς πατρίδος, ὡς ἀνὴρ κατασκαφῆν ἠρπῆσεια τῇ πολιορκίᾳ." (Antiqq., X. 11, 21.)

16. On ver. 31 sqq. "Ceterum potest hoc exemplum, quod Jechonias rex dignitatis suæ in exilio Babylonia restitutus, refutari excepto Judæorum contra vaticinium Jacobi (Gen. xlix. 10) de Messia jam dudum exhibitum, postquam per Romanos scriptum de Julia ablatum, et quod texuorum Messie jamjam nascituri esse debuit." FÖRSTER.

17. On ver. 31 sqq. "No one should despair in misfortune, for the right hand of the Highest can change all (Ps. lxxvii. 10) and Christ rules even in the midst of His enemies (Ps ex. 2). For His are the praise, the glory and the power from everlasting to everlasting. Amen." CRAMER.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. On vers. 1-11. The truth of the word "What a man soweth, that shall he also reap," exhibited in the example of the Jewish State under Zedekiah.

1. The seed (ver. 2); 2. The crop (a) the siege, (b) the famine, (c) the capture of the city and flight of the king, (d) the punishment of the king and his princes, (e) the fate of the people (ver. 3).

2. On vers. 12-20. The rejection of Judah appears at first sight a contradiction. For Jerusalem is the holy city (Matt. iv. 5; Neh. xi. 1, 18), the city of God (Ps. xlvi. 5; xlviii. 2, 9; lxxviii. 3); the temple is the house of Jehovah (Jer. vii. 2, etc.); God's service rests on divine authority (Ex. chh. xxv.-xxvii., xxx., xxxi). But God cannot contradict Himself. We have, therefore, to show "the unity of the divine thoughts in the choice and rejection of Jerusalem." 1. The rejection was a conditional one (vii. 3 sqq). Hence notwithstanding the election the rejection involved nothing contradictory, but was a necessary consequence of the unfulfilled condition.—

2. The election remains (a) objectively notwithstanding the rejection; it is (b) subjectively brought to its realization by the rejection, the latter as a means of discipline operating to produce the disposition, from which alone the fulfilment of this condition can proceed. Comp. rems. on xxxii. 41, p. 288.

3. On vers. 24-27. "That great lords sometimes make an example of gross miscreants, promotes righteousness, only it must not be done on the innocent, or with such severity that there is no proportion between the crime and its punishment (Josh. vii. 25)." STARKE.

4. On vers. 31-34. The deliverance of Jehoiachin. 1. It shows us that the Lord can help (a) out of great distress (grievous imprisonment of thirty-seven years), (b) in a glorious manner. 2. It admonishes us (a) to steadfast patience, (b) to believing hope, Ps. xiii. ["It was a prelude and pledge of the liberation and exaltation of the Jewish Nation, when it had been humbled and purified by the discipline of suffering; and of its return to its own land; and a joyful pre-announcement of that far more glorious future restoration which the prophets in the Old Testament, and the Apostles in the New foretell—of Israel to God in Christ; to whom, with the FATHER and HOLY GHOST, be ascribed all honor, glory, dominion, adoration and praise, now and forever. Amen."] WORDSWORTH.—S. R. A. J.

manifestly, are the canonical ones. The Talmud also, in the Treatise Baba Bathra Fol., 14 b. enumerates twenty-four books, probably in accordance with the number of letters of the Greek alphabet, which was made to correspond with the Hebrew alphabet by adding to the latter the double yod, ם, that was used to express with reverence the name of Jehovah. The Talmud now reckons the Lamentations among the Hagiographa, which it arranges in the following order, Ruth, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Solomon's Song, Lamentations, Daniel, Esther, Ezra (with Nehemiah), Chronicles. The Masorites introduced a third modification, arranging the Hagiographa thus,—Chronicles, Psalms, Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther, Daniel, Ezra. But only the Spanish manuscripts preserve this order. The German give the order thus,—Psalms, Proverbs, Job, Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Chronicles. This is the usual order in our Hebrew editions of the Bible.—In the Septuagint, the various recensions of which differ from each other, another principle of arrangement prevails. This depends generally on the distinction of the books into historical, poetical and prophetic, in which order they succeed each other. But Lamentations is added to the prophetic book of Jeremiah. The Latin versions follow the same order, both the Itala and Vulgate. The Council of Trent has sanctioned this arrangement, in Decr. I., Sessio IV., where the Lamentations, without being mentioned, are reckoned with the Prophetic Book of Jeremiah. Our Protestant Bibles assign the book to the same place.

3. The Masoretic arrangement of the Hagiographa, in separating from the other books and placing together the five Megilloth [or festival rolls, which were appointed for rehearsal on certain feast and memorial days],—is purely conjectural. For not earlier than the Masorites do we find these five books placed together. The order of the German manuscripts is accommodated to the succession of holy-days. On this account the Song of Solomon comes first, because it was read at Easter; then follows Ruth (Whitsuntide); then the Lamentations. These were read on the ninth of Ab, on which day the Jews commemorated the destruction of both the first and second Temples. (See HERZOG, R.-Enc., VII. p. 254).—As the Israelites have appointed the Lamentations for that great mourning festival, it is also a rule with them that an Israelite, when mourning a death, read no other book than Job and Lamentations. (HERZ., R.-Enc., XVI. p. 364).—In the Romish Church, passages out of the Lamentations are read on the last three days of Holy-week. Three lessons are assigned to each one of the three days; the lessons are, on Maundy-Thursday, I. i. 1-5, II. i. 6-9, III. i. 10-14; on Good Friday, I. ii. 8-11, II. ii. 12-15, III. iii. 1-9; on Saturday, I. iii. 22-30, II. iv. 1-6, III. v. 1-11. Every lesson concludes, by way of response and versicle, with the words, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, convertere ad Dominum Deum tuum, turn to the Lord thy God. (See Officium hebdomadae sanctae, Separat-Abdruck aus Dr. REISCHL's Passionale. München, 1857. Die Charwoche in ihren Ceremonien und Gebeten, herausg. mit Guttheissung des bischöfl. Ordinariats, Speier, 1856. NEUMANN, Jeremias von Anatot. II., S. 486). With reference to the musical execution of the Lamentations in Holy-week at Rome, see Die Reisebriefe von FELIX MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY, Leipzig, 1861, S. 166 ff. (Brief an Zeller in Berlin). In the Evangelical Church LUDECUS and LOSSIUS have arranged passages of the Lamentations for Divine service during the solemnities of Holy-week, the former for the solemnities of the last three days, the latter only for the solemnity of the Sunday in Holy-week. And Nicolaus Selnecker has liturgically arranged the whole of the Lamentations in the German language (in his Kirchen-Gesänge, 1587), not for Holy-week, but for the festival of the Tenth Sunday after Trinity (the destruction of Jerusalem). Further on this subject, see SCHÖBERLEIN, Schatz des liturg. Chor-und-Gemeindegesanges, II., S. 444 ff.

§ 2. CONTENTS AND STRUCTURE.

1. The general subject of the Lamentations is the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. That this book is a prophecy of the destruction of Jerusalem, as Tremellius and others have asserted (see FÜRSTER, Comm. in Thr., p. 5), is an utterly groundless opinion, which we mention only for curiosity's sake.* Similar Songs of lamentation, having for their subject

* [This assertion of utter groundlessness is rather strong. 2 Chron. xxxv. 25 and the declaration of Josephus (Ant. B. X., ch. v. § 1) afford some ground on which to rest the hypothesis, that these Lamentations are the elegy written on the death of Josiah, and that they assumed the form of a prophecy of the utter destruction of the city, which Josiah might have pre-the death of individual persons, or political catastrophes, occur in the Old Testament. See the citations in § 1, 1. But no lamentation of equal length and so artistically constructed is now extant. The peculiar structure which is common to all these songs shows that they all have one general subject. In Song I., the poet himself is the first speaker, vers. 1-11 b, whilst he introduces to us Zion [Jerusalem] * as an ideal person. He pictures here the sad consequences of the destruction, whilst he indicates the causes of the same (ver. 8). In the second half of the chapter (vers. 11 c.—22) the personified Jerusalem herself speaks, portraying her misfortunes under manifold images, explaining their causes and praying for help and vengeance. In Song II., in the first part of it, the poet himself speaks, (a) ascribing the destruction to the agency of the Lord (vers. 1-9), (b) depicting the consequences of the destruction (vers. 10-12), (c) addressing the object of the destruction, namely, the personified Jerusalem, expressing his grief, his opinion as to the causes of the catastrophe, and exhorting her to prayer (vers. 13-19). To this exhortation Zion, here represented by the wall of Jerusalem [Zion], responds in a prayer breathing the deepest and acutest sorrow (vers. 20-22). In Song III., which evidently forms the climax of the whole, the poet introduces as speaking that man, who in those troublous times had suffered more than all others, and consequently had attained, as it were, to the very summit of the common calamity, for he had suffered not only from the enemy what was common to all, but also from his own people and associates, a thing unheard of save in this particular instance. This sufferer was the Prophet Jeremiah. He does not name him, it is true, and it is evident that he has in his eye, not the person of the prophet merely, but rather the servant of the Lord as a representative of the (Ἰσραὴλ πνευματικὸς) spiritual Israel, yet all the particular features of this Lamentation are borrowed from the history of that prophet (vers. 1-18). This section ends with a cry of despair (ver. 18). But immediately the poet lets a morning twilight, as it were, succeed this night of despair, (vers. 19-21), which through the utterances of united believing Israel soon expands into daylight, beaming with the most radiant consolation (vers. 22-38). In what follows successively, the evening twilight gathers, and then the poem sweeps back into such a night of grief and mourning, that Israel begins to confess his sins (vers. 39-42), but then gives vent to lamentations on account of those sins (vers. 43-47), until finally, in the last and third part, Jeremiah again takes up the word in order to weep out his grief over Zion's misery and sins, (those sins which were likewise the source of his own misfortunes), and to implore the Lord, in beseeching prayer, for protection and for righteous avengement upon his enemies (vers. 48-66). In Song IV., the poem loses more and more of its ideal character. In the beginning indeed we find an ideal and well sustained description of Israel, as if it were the nobility of the nations, and then, further, of the princes of Israel, as the noblest among the noble, and then, appearing in sharper relief by standing out on such a back-ground, a delineation of the sufferings endured by those nobles (vers. 1-11); but in the second half of the chapter the poem becomes more prosaic: the chief guilt is imputed to the prophets and the priests, whose well-deserved punishment is then portrayed in the gloomiest colors (vers. 12-16). Then follows a description, graphic in the highest degree in spite of its brevity, of the events occurring from the extinction of the last gleams of the rays of hope kindled by the Egyptians, till the imprisonment of the king (vers. 17-20). The conclusion is a short address to Edom, which is ironically congratulated at the downfall of Jerusalem, while, at the same time, the punishment of its malicious joy is foretold (vers. 21, 22). In Song V., the style is almost entirely prosaic. For, with the exception of ver. 16 a, no poetical expression is found in the whole chapter, rather only a concrete graphic picture of the naked vented by a thorough reformation, but which his partial reformation delayed for a brief time, only to make it the more tremendous when it did come. Therefore, if we assume that the Lamentations are the elegy which Jeremiah wrote on the death of Josiah, and especially if we assume that Jeremiah foresaw the inefficiency of Josiah's policy (see STANLEY'S Jewish Church), it would not seem strange that an elegy, written by Jeremiah, the prophet of the destruction, should be a prophecy of the destruction of the city, which now, on account of Josiah's death, was hastening all the more rapidly to its fearful conclusion. Nor is it in itself incredible, that the future should be presented in vision to God's prophet as distinctly as a picture of the historic past. While we accept Isaiah xl.-lxvi. as the production of the prophet who wrote the earlier portions of that book, we would speak only with respect of the opinion of those who see in the Lamentations a descriptive prediction of what was to come to pass, while we reject the opinion itself as, on the whole, untenable.—W. H. H.]

reality. The alphabetical acrostic is entirely wanting in this chapter. The whole chapter is intended as a prayer; for it begins and ends with words of petition (vers. 1, 19-22). What lies between is only a narration of the principal afflictions, which had befallen those who had been carried to Babylon and those who had fled to exile in Egypt (vers. 2-18). The concluding prayer expresses the hope that the Lord, who cannot Himself change, nor altogether reject His people, will bring them back again to Himself and to their ancient splendor (vers. 19-22).

2. As regards its external structure, the composition of this book, both as a whole and in its several parts, is so artistic, that anything like it can hardly be found in any other book of Holy Scripture. First of all it is significant, that there are five Songs. For the uneven number has this advantage, that the middle part of the whole Poem is represented by a whole number, and does not fall between two numbers, as it would in case there were an even number of songs [i. e., the middle part of the whole poem is represented by one Song, and is not composed of parts of two songs]. By this means the prominence of the middle Song and, in connection with that, an ascent and a descent, a crescendo and decrescendo movement, with a clearly marked climax, is made possible. Thus it is manifest that the third chapter constitutes the climax. And this is truly and really so in two respects, both as to matter and form. As to the first, we have already shown that the first two chapters bear an ideal and highly poetical character. They constitute only the front-steps to the third chapter, which, externally, as the middle of the five songs and by its internal character, conducts us into the very middle of the night into which Israel sank, and then of the day which rose over Israel. For are not the frightful sorrows which the Prophet Jeremiah, the servant of God and representative of the spiritual Israel, had endured, and which rose at last to that terrible exclamation—My strength and my hope is perished from Jehovah (iii. 18), the expressions of the highest outward and inward temptation which can befall a true servant of the Lord? Here it should be observed that in iii. 1-17, there is no reference to God except as the author of those sorrows which are represented, on that account, as Divine temptations; while the name of God is not even mentioned till at the end of ver. 18, where, as the last word, with startling vehemence, the name “JEHOVAH” is pronounced. Here then we see the servant of the Lord, in the deepest night of his misery, on the brink of despair. But where exigency is greatest, help is nearest. The poet could lay up in his heart everything that he had against God, but he could not shut God Himself out of his heart. On the contrary it was proved, that after he had given the fullest expression to what he had in his heart against God, God Himself was deeply rooted therein. The night is succeeded by the dawn of morning, as represented in vers. 19-21. With ver. 22, breaks the full day. This ushers in with full effulgence the light of Heavenly consolation. Suffering now is seen to be the proof of God’s love. In this love, that suffering finds its explanation, its limit, and its remedy. As the pyramid of Mont Blanc, seen at sunset from Chamouny, its summit gleaming with supernal splendors, whilst below, the mountain has already disappeared wrapped in deepest darkness (See GÖTTE’S Letters from Switzerland, Nov. 4, 1779; Aug. 12, 1840), so, out of the profound night of despair and misery, this middle part of the third song and of the whole book towers upward, radiant with light. From this culmination point, the poet again sets out upon his downward track. Evening twilight follows the bright day (vers. 40-42) and passes into a night dark with misery (vers. 43-47). From the beginning of the section, so full of hope and encouragement (ver. 22), the poet speaks in the plural number, as if he would make it most emphatically apparent, that this was common property. He continues to speak in the plural number till after the beginning of the third and last part of the Song, when the night has begun again. Then once more (ver. 48), the poet speaks in the singular number. But he no longer speaks of those highest temptations, which were the subject of vers. 1-18, but of those inferior ones, which men inflict upon us. He treats of them also much more briefly; and from ver. 55 to the end of the chapter, finds relief in a prayer for help and avengement.—It is evident that this chapter consists of three parts. The first part includes vers. 1-21; the second, vers. 22-42; the third, vers. 43-66. The second part represents the culmination point of the whole book. It constitutes the point of separation between the crescendo and decrescendo movement. The latter continues in chapter fourth, in which the ideal and poetical sensibly subside, until at last in chapter fifth the style changes into plain prose.—With this artistic arrangement of the matter, the external form or structure corresponds. Every one of the five Songs has 22 verses, according to the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, only in the third Song every verse is divided into three members, hence it has 66 (masoretic) verses. The first four Songs are acrostics. In the first two Songs the verses consist of three distiches. It has been usual to recognize four distiches in i. 7 and ii. 9, but improperly: for there is no fixed measure for the length of each member of the distich; and there are, therefore, in the places referred to, only three distiches, some lines of which are composed of a greater number of syllables than the others have. The third chapter shows by its external dress that it is the middle and climax of the whole. The three distiches of each verse (corresponding to three Masoretic verses successively) begin with the same alphabetical letter. The middle part, namely iii. 19-42, is still further distinguished, as the dome crowning the whole building, as follows: (1). Every verse-triad constitutes a finished whole with respect to sense [is one complete sentence]. (2). In vers. 25-39, each distich begins with the same word, or with a similar word (see Intr. to chap. iii.). (3). While in vers. 1-18, the name of God is mentioned only once, and then with peculiar emphasis at the end of ver. 18, in vers. 19-42 we read the names of God repeatedly, and so arranged that in vers. 22, 24, 25, 26 we have יהוה יהוה; in vers. 31, 36, 37 יהוה alternating with יהוה in vers. 35, 38, in ver. 40 again יהוה and at last in ver. 41 יהוה. Observe here, particularly, that יהוה occurs in the Lamentations only in the two places named above, and יהוה occurs only once, in the beginning of the decrescendo movement, ver. 58, whilst in chapter first it is used three times, vers. 14, 15 (twice), and in chapter second seven times, vers. 1, 2, 5, 7, 18, 19, 20. Chapter fourth is indeed an acrostic, but the decline of the poetical afflatus is indicated externally by the verses being composed of only two distiches. The solemn names of God יהוה and יהוה occur no more, on the other hand יהוה occurs three times, vers. 11, 16, 20. The fifth chapter indicates its relation to the four preceding ones only by the number of verses (22). The acrostic dress entirely disappears. The style has become prose. Yet the name of God יהוה is found three times in the words of prayer, vers. 1, 19, 21.

We have here only one other matter to remark upon, the question why in chapters ii., iii. and iv. פ is placed before ג. This is usually explained as a copyist's mistake. In fact some Codd. in KENNICOTT and DE ROSSI have these verses in their usual places. The Peschito also gives these verses in their proper alphabetical order. The Septuagint places the letters in their proper order in the margin, but leaves the verses themselves to follow each other in the order of the original. But this supposition of an error of transcriber is refuted, (1) by the fact that it is repeated three times, (2) by the impossibility of supposing that in chap. iii. three verses could have been transposed by mistake, (3) by the interruption of the sense which would result in chapters iii. and iv. [if the present order were changed]. If some Codd. and Versions have the letters in their right order, this is evidence of revision and correction. Others (as RIEGLER) explain this irregularity as merely arbitrary, others again (BERTHOLDT) as the result of forgetfulness on the part of the author. GROTIUS holds the singular opinion that the order in chapters ii., iii., iv. may be that of the Chaldaic alphabet, and therefore that Jeremiah in chap. i. "speaks as a Hebrew, in the following chapters as a subject of the Chaldeans." THENIUS would explain the alphabetical difference by a diversity of authors, but the unity of the plan, already proved above, and the unity of the language used, which will be proved in § 3 (to which also belongs the threefold אלה at the beginning of chaps. ii., iii., iv.) contradict this most decidedly. EWALD is (even still in his Second Edition, p. 326) of the opinion that the ג in chapter i. "might have been transferred to its own place by later hands." But this would be a manifest interruption of the connection: for ver. 16 is directly connected in the closest manner with ver. 15 by גל פן therefore, [גל-אלה, for these things?], whilst ver. 18 [17?] begins a new thought. The liberty which the older poets especially allowed themselves in pursuing the alphabetical order (see Ps. ix, x., xxv., xxxvii., cxlv., and KEIL in HAEVERNICK'S Introduction to Old Testament, III, p. 50) are manifold [See BARNES' Introduction to Job, pp. 44, 45]. Whether they were influenced in this by a then prevailing diversity of method in respect to the succession of the letters, is not yet by any means sufficiently ascertained, but is nevertheless the most likely explanation of that liberty. See DELITZSCH on Ps. cxlv., p. 769.*

§ 3. AUTHOR AND TIME OF COMPOSITION.

1. That the Prophet Jeremiah was the author of this book, not only is an old tradition, but has been maintained by the majority of commentators up to the present time. Yet there is no canonical [Scriptural?] testimony for it. For neither in the later books of the Old Testament, nor in the New Testament, is Jeremiah ever named as the author of Lamentations. There is not in the above named parts of the Holy Scriptures a single quotation from the Lamentations. The passage in James i. 12, which is appealed to, has only a very general resemblance to Lam. iii. 26; and as regards Zech. i. 6, the expression $\text{יְהוָה יָהֵךְ כַּאֲשֶׁר זָכַר}$ [Jehovah hath done like as He purposed] is not specific enough, and if it is a quotation could refer to Jer. li. 12, as well as to Lam. ii. 17. But the Alexandrian translation has preceding i. 1, these words, $\text{καὶ ἐγένετο μετὰ τὸ αἰχμαλωτισθῆναι τὸν Ἰσραὴλ καὶ Ἱερουσαλὴμ ἐρημωθῆναι, ἐκάθισεν Ἱερεμίας κλαίων καὶ ἐθρήνησε τὸν θρήνον τοῦτον ἐπὶ Ἱερουσαλὴμ καὶ εἶπε.}$ ["And it came to pass, after Israel had been carried away captive, and Jerusalem was become desolate, that Jeremiah sat weeping, and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said."] The Vulgate also has these words, except that in place of the simple καὶ εἶπε [and he said], it has the words, et amaro animo suspirans et ejulans dixit ["and with a sorrowful mind, sighing and moaning, he said" (DOUAY)]. The Arabic gives exactly the words of the Septuagint. The Targum Jonathan begins with the words, Dixit Jeremias propheta et sacerdos magnus [Jeremiah the prophet and chief priest (? $\text{דִּבֶּר הַנָּבִיא הַגָּדוֹל}$) said]. Josephus in the *Antiq. Jud. L., x. c. 5, § 1, after he has spoken of the death and burial of King Josiah, says, $\text{Ἱερεμίας δ' ὁ προφήτης ἐπικύθειον αὐτοῦ συνέταξε μέλος θρηνητικόν, ὃ καὶ μέχρι νῦν διαμένει}$ ["and Jeremiah the prophet composed an elegy to lament him which is extant till this time also" (WHISTON'S Josephus)]. † THENIUS is of the opinion that this asserts only the existence of the elegy on the death of Josiah composed by Jeremiah, and has no reference at all to the Lamentations. But I believe that THENIUS here is in error. For the words of Josephus cannot be translated the (solemn) elegy on Josiah, because in that case it must have been called $\text{τὸ ἐπικύθειον αὐτοῦ}$ [the elegy on him]. We can only translate thus,—Jeremiah composed as an elegy on him a lamentation song, which is still extant. To call it τὸ ἐπικύθειον (the elegy) would imply that the poem then existing really belonged to the species "elegy," that is to say, it possessed all the peculiarities of such a poem and was manifestly the solemn [elegy] on the deceased king Josiah that the customs of the times demanded. ‡ But the absence of the article marks the still*

* [GERLACH: Intr. pp. 9, 10: "The general remark 'that the Poet strictly confined himself to the external form, only so long as the thought accommodated itself to it without artificiality' (KELL, Eint. S. 378; b. HAEVERNICK, III. 58), does not suffice, . . . for the evident ease with which the Poet elsewhere manages the Form, [shows] that another arrangement of the alphabet would have had no difficulties for him. And how little the observations which NEUMANN (S. 490, 503) makes in the way of explanation, contain an explanation in reality, may be shown by his remark on ii. 16, where he says, 'Let us only reflect on the difference between מִן פִּי mouth, and עַיִן eye, and we here at least comprehend the transposition, where the mouth is the exulting mouth of God's enemies, the eye—God's watchful eye over the life of His people.' That could only be the real meaning if the following עַיִן -verse treated of God's eye watching for the protection of His people; on the very contrary, it does treat of the execution of punishment. But in view of the unsuccessful results of the special and repeated attempts to throw light on the darkness of this anomaly, the author must close this part of his preliminary discussion with a non liquet."] † [The literal translation is, "Jeremiah the prophet composed an elegy on him, a lamentation song, which is extant now." The words "a lamentation song," so obviously superfluous, suggest the question, whether the words καὶ συνέταξε , or words of similar import, may not once have preceded μέλος θρηνητικόν , and been dropped out on a presumption of error by those who took for granted that all Jeremiah wrote still survived? This would suit what immediately follows, which consists of an account of Jeremiah's writings.—W. II. II.] ‡ [THENIUS: Josephus "only said, that Jeremiah had composed the (solemn) elegy [funeral-poem] on Josiah, and that this was still extant in his (Josephus') time; how and where, whether in writing or in the mouth of the people [by oral tradition] he does not say, and least of all does he say that he finds that particular dirge (the singular number should not be unobserved) in the קְוֵי [Book of Lamentations]; had he believed this, since he adhered almost exclusively to the version of the LXX., he would have surely added to διαμένει [is extant] the words ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις [in the Lamentations]." The strongest point in this argument is, not the interpolation of the definite article, to which Dr. NAEGBELBACH justly takes exception, but the fact that Josephus not only fails to say that this dirge is extant in the Book of Lamentations, but speaks of it only in the singular number as "a song of lamentation" (μέλος θρηνητικόν). We can account for this only, by supposing that he regarded the five songs as essentially one, and that having already characterized it as a lamentation song, he could extant μέλος θρηνητικόν [song of lamentation] as not necessarily belonging to the species "elegy," but only as a μέλος [song] which had served as an elegy. This admirably suits the Lamentations, which indeed contain not a single syllable referring to a dead king. Add to this, that Josephus in the same chapter, after he had related the death and burial of Josiah, seizes the opportunity to give a short notice of the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, and of their writings. For after the words quoted, he proceeds thus, "This prophet also predicted, and left [those predictions] in writing, the calamity that was coming upon the city, and truly as well that destruction which has in our days come upon us, as the Babylonish captivity. But not only he foretold such things, but the prophet Ezekiel, who first wrote and left behind him two books concerning these things." However we understand the somewhat obscure words concerning the writings of Ezekiel, this much at least is evident, that Josephus intends to give here a brief notice of the writings of the prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And so he says, Jeremiah has left behind him two writings, a lamentation song and prophecies, Ezekiel has likewise left behind him prophecies, and truly in two books. THIENIUS says, if Josephus had meant our Lamentations by that μέλος θρηνητικόν [lamentation song], then he would have written ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις [in the Lamentations]. But I maintain on the contrary, that if Josephus meant the θρήνοι [Lamentations] by the μέλ. θρήν. [lamentation song], the addition ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις [in the Lamentations] was not necessary [see note, p. 6.—W. H. H.], but if he intended to say what THIENIUS makes him say, then he would have written οὐκ ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις [not in the Lamentations]. For since Josephus in this place speaks, not only of the elegy on Josiah's death, but likewise of the writings of Jeremiah generally, and since in his times our Lamentations were already regarded as a writing of Jeremiah's, as we know by the superscription of the Septuagint, he should, not to be entirely unintelligible, expressly declare that he did not mean by this μέλος θρηνητικόν [lamentation song] which Jeremiah had composed on the death of Josiah, the θρήνοι [Book of Lamentations]. Since he has not done this, every one who knows that there are two writings in the canon which are referred back to Jeremiah as their author, must understand the words of Josephus as intended to designate those two writings extant in the canon. According to this, therefore, Josephus regarded Jeremiah as the author of the Lamentations, in which he, as Jerome did (Comment., Zech. vii. 11), recognized the elegy on Josiah mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxv. 25. Among the moderns, USHER, J. D. MICHAELIS (on LOWTH de sacr. poes. Hebr. Not. 97, pp. 445 sqq.), and DATHE (propheta maj., ed. 1) shared this opinion, but both the latter receded from it (see N. Or. Bibl. I., 106, and DATHE proph. maj., ed. 2). The Talmud also regards Jeremiah as the author of Lamentations (Baba batr., Fol. 15, Col. 1), Jeremias scripsit librum suum et librum regum et threnos [Jeremiah wrote his own book and the book of Kings and the Lamentations]. This is the opinion also of the church fathers, all of them, (see ORIGEN in EUSEB. hist. eccl., iv. 25, JEROME in PROLOG. galeat., and on Zech. xii. 11) and of later theologians. The learned and whimsical HERMAN VON DER HAARDT, in a Programme in which he announced a commentary on Lamentations (Helmstädt, 1712), was the first to deny the authorship of Jeremiah ascribing the book to Daniel, Shadrach, Meshach, Abednego, and the king Joachin, assuming that each one of them had written one chapter. Later, the unknown author of an Essay in the Tubingen Theol. Quart., 1819, Part I,—afterwards, though only in the way of conjecture, AUGUSTI, in his Intr. to the Old Test. Scrip., p. 227,—and again COXZ in BENIGEL'S Archiv, IV. pp. 161, 162, 422 sqq.,—express themselves as against the authorship of Jeremiah. KALKAR also in his commentary (Hafniae, 1836) thinks it suspicious that the Book so long retained its place among the Hagiographa and that the Greek version of it differs so much from that of the prophetic book, although he will not allow that those circumstances are decisive, as in fact they are not. EWALD, who in the first edition of the Poetical Books of the Old Testament (1839, V. 1, pp. 139 ff.) in no way impugned the traditional opinion, has since (GESCH. Isr. IV. S. 22 ff.; see JAHRB. für bibl. Wissenschaft, VII. S. 151; Port. Bucher, 2te. Aufl. I. Th. 2te. Hälfte, p. 321 ff.) expressed his opinion to this effect, that 'Jeremiah's authorship, with nothing to prove it, may be regarded as impossible on the ground of the language alone.' He believes that the not add that this Song was found (ἐν τοῖς θρήνοις) in the Songs of Lamentation, without seeming to specify one single Song of the five as separately and particularly intended. THIENIUS in his quotation of Josephus omits the word θρηνητικόν (16th Ed., Leipzig, 1855, p. 116), and seems to have wholly overlooked it.—W. H. H.]

author was probably one of Jeremiah's disciples, "BARUCH or some other." BUNSEN also [before EWALD] ascribes the authorship to BARUCH (Gott in der Geschichte, I. S. 426). THENIUS announces the opinion in his commentary (10te. Lief. des kurzgef. exeg. Hdb. z. A. T., 1855, § 3 der Vorbem., S. 117,) that chapters ii. and iv. are indeed by Jeremiah, but the other parts proceeded from other authors. He combats the argument drawn from tradition, and whilst he infers from the difference between the præmium of the Septuagint and that of the Vulgate, that there was a Hebrew original, he also infers from the absence of the same in the Hebrew Codd. that the Jews doubted its genuineness, and thus he accounts for the transposition of the Lamentations to the Ketubim [or Hagiographa]. He contends further, that the traditional opinion is not confirmed by the subject-matter, spirit-tone and language, or by the character of unity in the Book itself.* He finds it highly unlikely that Jeremiah should have treated of the same subject five times.† He says further, "It requires only a very ordinary degree of æsthetical sensibility to distinguish the difference between Odes ii., iv., which are really fine, unconstrainedly animated, methodical and natural in arrangement and succession of ideas, and remarkable for their simplicity, and the dissimilar and weaker Songs, i., iii., which, whatever excellence they have in other respects, are hampered with the external form, in many ways artificial, here and there heaping up images and confusing them together and losing themselves in reminiscences of the past." To this he adds, that i., iii., v., among other things, record circumstances in which Jeremiah had no part. Finally the fact, that in ii., iv., the verses beginning with D precede those beginning with V is only explicable by assuming a diversity of authors. Agreeably to these sentiments, THENIUS ascribed chapters ii., iv., to Jeremiah, as already remarked, but is of the opinion that chapter i. was composed "some time after the destruction of Jerusalem, by one who had remained in the land, and who at least was acquainted with chap. ii.;" and that chap. iii. was composed, also by one remaining in the land, shortly before the last deportation. He regards Song V., finally, as "the entirely disconnected poetry of a man there [in the land] who was probably a leader of a crowd of nobles, who having refused to join the expedition to Egypt, wandered about everywhere seeking a safer place of refuge."‡ These arguments of THENIUS have no matter-of-fact foundation, and cannot therefore be convincing.

As for me, formerly I was so convinced that Jeremiah was the author, as to declare this conviction in the article "Lamentations of Jeremiah," in HERZOG's Real Encyclopædia, and even in various places in my exposition of Jeremiah. But my conviction has been shaken on more accurate examination by the following matters of fact. 1. The tradition originates from the testimony of the Alexandrian translation. But on what does this testimony itself rest? We are compelled to ask this question, for the authority of that translation is by itself an entirely insufficient foundation. It is possible that the Alexandrian translator had predecessors in his opinion. But no evidence of that nature has come to us.‡ It is further possible that he, or his

* [GERLACH: "The grounds of EWALD's opinions [as to the authorship] are only philological; but how venturesome it is to attempt to decide on such grounds alone, is shown by a comparison between THENIUS and EWALD; the former of whom, on philological grounds—those very grounds the perception of which may belong only to 'an æsthetical sensibility thoroughly practised'—imputes chapters i., iii., v. to another author than the author of chapters ii. and iv., which he leaves to Jeremiah; whilst EWALD, and truly in our opinion with entire correctness, remarks, that 'all these five songs, in the structure of their language, and in their rhetorical and poetical characteristics, as well as in thought and doctrine, and also in their historical allusions and descriptions, have a similarity so complete, that every competent judge will ascribe them to only one Poet.' (Bibl. Jahrb., VII. S. 151. Comp. Dichter d. A. B., 3d Aufl., S. 325 f.)"]

† [GERLACH: "Against the authorship of all five Songs by Jeremiah, THENIUS again raises a general objection in the question, whether it were probable that Jeremiah had treated one and the same subject five times. But if, according to his own declaration, the treatment of the same subject twice over has 'nothing strange in it considering the extraordinary character of the event lamented,'—then this objection to the five Songs appears all the more trivial when it is found on examination, that each Song treats of the common subject from a different point of view. * * * But this objection is entirely destroyed by the acknowledgment, arrived at from most different stand-points, of the 'internal, organic connection' (KEIL) of all five Songs, of which statement EWALD especially has made great use (Bibl. Jahrb., VII. S. 152; Gött. gel. Anz., 1863, S. 834 f.; Dichter des A. B., 3d Aufl., S. 323)."] GERLACH adds in a note, that with the proof of this "internal, organic connection" between the five Songs, the various attempts to assign the composition of the Songs to different times, or to bring them into different arrangements, must fall to the ground.—W. II. II.]

‡ [GERLACH, with reference to THENIUS' theory concerning Song V., says, "It is difficult seriously to discuss the possibility of such conjectures in order to prove them: THENIUS has not even attempted the proof and has thus spared those who come after him the trouble of refutation."]

§ [The evidence may not be satisfactory to Dr. NÆGELSBACH, but he should not say so absolutely that there is "no evi-predecessors, or both, derived that opinion from the book itself. For it is easy to suppose that the prophet, who had himself lived to see Jerusalem's fall, should write upon it an appropriate dirge. This was more likely to be supposed since this prophet had formerly been acknowledged as a composer of dirges (2 Chron. xxxv. 25). Moreover, how could a tearful song over Jerusalem's downfall fail to be expected from that prophet who had said, "Oh, that my head were waters, and mine eye a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people!" (viii. 23). Add to this, that in chapter iii. the poet seems to identify himself with the prophet, and that the undeniably obvious and sympathetic harmony with the prophetic writings of Jeremiah seems to confirm that identity. The probability, therefore, that Jeremiah may have written a book of this description, cannot be denied. But how stands it with the evidence which the book itself, in ch. iii., seems to give in regard to its author, and how with the harmony in the way of thought and language? As for the internal evidence of ch. iii., in the first and third parts of that chapter the prophet Jeremiah certainly speaks. But the question occurs, whether he speaks as the author, or whether the author makes him speak? Either is in itself possible. For since the author in i. 11 makes the personified Zion speak, he may likewise in ch. iii. make the prophet Jeremiah, as the representative of the Ἰσραὴλ πνευματικός [the spiritual Israel], speak. But, on the other hand, since in ch. ii. the author is the speaker and there speaks of himself in vers. 11, 13, so in iii. 1-23, 48-66, the author may be the speaker, and according to the purport of the contents, he is speaking of himself. But here two things are to be taken into account. The first is this, that ch. iii. (see the exposition) constitutes the middle and climax of the whole book. Here the artistic construction reaches its highest pinnacle, and the prophet speaking in the first and last of the three parts, forms with his mournful lamentations the background for the bright and consolatory section contained in vers. 22-42. Is it now likely that Jeremiah would thus have made his own person the middle-point of the poem and would have done this with so much art? To me this seems not likely, even though it is assumed that the prophet speaks here in the name of the whole Jehovah-faithful Israel. Jeremiah, who was so modest and humble, would at the most have let his personal sufferings appear, if at all, only as an element or constituent part of the suffering which the faithful Israel had to suffer in common. But it does not seem like him thus to place his own person in the foreground as he does in that section which begins with "I am the man," iii. 1. In regard to the artistic construction, I have already in the Introduction to his Prophecies (‡ 3), confessed that Jeremiah's style is not deficient in art. See for example his second discourse, chs. iii.-vi. But this refinement of art, this acrostic, this adroit periodic versification, these ingenious transitions in iii. 19-21, 39-42, this crescendo and decrecendo movement resting upon dence." The bare fact of the existence of the words referred to in the Septuagint, a translation on the whole so faithful, and made by Jews who almost superstitiously venerated the written word and scrupulously adhered to Hebrew originals, is some evidence, constituting a probability at least, that the Septuagint copied these words from Hebrew MSS. Then again the grammatical structure of the sentence suits the assumption that it is a translation of a Hebrew original. The general agreement of the Vulgate with the Septuagint and yet the difference between the two, would indicate that the Vulgate is not a mere copy of the Septuagint, but obtained the words from an independent source. Even THEOPHYLACT is satisfied with the evidence that these words must have had a Hebrew original, and feels it incumbent upon him to explain why they are not found in our existing Hebrew Bibles. GERLACH: "Whether the Vulgate derived that introduction from the LXX, the [additional] words being added or having fallen out of the text of the LXX. [since the Vulgate was written], or whether both, independently of each other, reproduced a note found in their manuscripts, is of no importance, since the grammatical construction of the words in either case refers to a Hebrew original, which preceded both. In this, to be presumed Hebrew original, we have to recognize the oldest tradition concerning the author. But that this [superscription] was not accepted by the editors of our received text, cannot be explained with THEOPHYLACT by the assumption, 'that it was not regarded as satisfactory, that those editors were doubtful at least whether Jeremiah had composed the first song,—for that immediately follows after καὶ εἶπε [and he said].' Since this superscription could have no other object than to connect the Lamentations with a preceding writing (see the καὶ ἐγένετο κ. τ. λ. [and it came to pass, etc.]), and that writing could only be the prophecies of Jeremiah, after which a part of the Jews placed them, then the absence of the superscription in those manuscripts which place the Lamentations among the Hagiographa, is self-explained and nothing less than proper."—W. II. II.]

* [Had he done so he would have violated no rule of good taste or propriety. He could, moreover, without charge of egotism, direct attention to himself, because he was the prophet of Jehovah and the representative of pious Israel and in his sufferings a representative of the Prophet of all prophets and the Head of Israel. But, in fact, there is not a word in the whole chapter, that any good man might not have written of himself without a breach of humility, and in "the brightly-shining comfort-section" (vers. 22-42) Jeremiah hardly alludes to himself at all. That part is not in the first person, but in the third person, and is not personal to the prophet, but passes beautifully and modestly into general truths of universal application.—W. II. II.]

the five-fold division of the whole poem—truly all this seems not like Jeremiah. In his writings nothing similar to this is found.* Would any one ascribe the most perfect product, in regard to the external artistic structure, of the Old Testament Scriptures, to that same prophet whose style is elsewhere characterized as sermo incultus et pene subrusticus, if indeed one pauses to recognize his style at all, and does not rather direct his attention to those rerum coelestium mysteria which are concealed under the sacramentis literarum? Nevertheless, I freely grant that neither the psychological, nor the rhetorical argument can, by itself alone, claim to be decisive.

But another argument must be added to these, namely, Secondly, The prevailing character of the language in the Lamentations. This differs very considerably from that of the prophetic book. Although the author of Lamentations has much in common with that prophet, not only in general as a Hebrew writer, but also in particular by a designed reference to the writings of Jeremiah, yet on the other hand, he has so much that is peculiar to himself, and so much that Jeremiah has not at all, or has only in a different form, that it is difficult to believe in the identity of the two. I have spared myself no trouble to compare every word of the Lamentations (with the exception of such as are constantly recurring, as הָיָה, אִישׁ, etc., without which Hebrew cannot be written) with the writings of Jeremiah. I have availed myself for this purpose of the Concordance of FÜRST, and have found the same correct and to be depended upon, with the exception of what is given in respect to the word אֶרְנִי. The following is the result of this painfully laborious comparison, wherein I refer in every instance for authentication to the exposition of the passages in which the words occur.

[NOTE.—The bearing of the argument to be derived from the verbal differences, between the Prophecies of Jeremiah and the Book of Lamentations, is critically examined in the Appendix to this Introduction. The writer of this note, unwilling to insert his dissent from the very learned and conscientious author of this Introduction in the text of these pages, and unable to condense the reasons for his dissent in notes at the bottom of the pages, would here refer the reader to the Appendix, for a general summary of arguments in confirmation of the opinion that Jeremiah was the author of the Lamentations.—W. CHAPTER I. Ver. 1. The phrases רַבְרִי עָם and רִי בְנוֹם occur only here. The singular שָׂרָה as an appellation, only here. מְרִינָה is not foreign to Jeremiah's times, but is never used by him. הִתְהַלַּח לְפָנַי, never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 2. לְחַיִּי never in Jeremiah. אֵינִי כִנְהָם, only in this chapter, vers. 2, 9, 16, 17, 21, and in Eccles. iv. 1 (although the Piel of the verb נָהַם occurs in Jer. xvi. 7; xxxi. 13).—Ver. 3. עֲנִי five times in Lamentations. Jeremiah uses neither it nor the root עָנָה. See iii. 33: v. 11. For עָלָי Jeremiah says עָלַי רַב or בָּרַב. עֲנָה, עֲנָה, עֲנָה (Jeremiah says מְנַחֵם, מְעַרְם, never in Jeremiah).—Ver. 4. אָמַל never in Jeremiah. מְוַעַר, which occurs in Lamentations six times, and always in the sense of a time or place of a festival, is found twice in Jeremiah, but both times in the general sense of tempus fixum. The expressions כִּי בָצִיָּה, שׁוֹמֵם (see vers. 13, 16; iii. 11), the termination יָיִן, the verbs אָנַח (see vers. 8, 11) and אָנַח (four times in Lamentations) never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 5. הִלַּךְ שָׁבוּ is peculiar to this place. The sing. צָר, which occurs five times in Lamentations, is never in Jeremiah. He uses only the plural.—Ver. 6. יָצָא בֵּן for forsaken only here. אֵיל הַדָּר (masc.), כִּרְעָה (Jeremiah always בְּכִרְעָה) never with Jeremiah. רָרַךְ Jeremiah uses only with suffixes.—Ver. 7. מְרוֹדִים, only here, iii. 19, and Is. lviii. 7. כִּתְחַכֵּר (see vers. 10, 11; ii. 4) never in Jeremiah. He uses

* [Shall we doubt whether Shakspeare wrote Tarquin and Lucrece, and Venus and Adonis, because in all his plays there is nothing similar to the very artificial construction of these Spenserian poems? Can we expect the same style, the manifestations of precisely the same qualities of genius in a formal stately poem, like those mentioned, and in the free unembarrassed composition of the stage play? Shall we expect to find no new traits of genius and evidences of versatility of talent, when the orator-prophet, who has electrified Israel by his impromptu bursts of eloquence, called forth by passing events and pressing emergencies, sits down to the careful composition of a lyrical dirge, to be constructed in accordance with pre-determined artistic rules? It is possible that one might read Tarquin and Lucrece, and say that its author was incapable of writing Shakspeare's plays. Another might read the prophecies of Jeremiah and say, their author was incapable of producing the Lamentations. Both would be mistaken.—W. H. H.]

only חִכְרָה. חִכְרָה כְּשֶׁבֶת אֵן. לֵעָ.—Ver. 8. חָטָא (see iii. 39) never in Jeremiah. He uses only הִטָּא. נִדְרָה (only here), הִזִּיל (only here), עָרְוָה never in Jeremiah. אָחֹר (see ver. 13) occurs in Jeremiah only with הַלֵּךְ or נָכַח.—Ver. 9. נָטְקָא, נָטְקָא never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 10. כְּחִכְרָה never in Jeremiah (see ver. 7).—Ver. 11. אָנַח (see ver. 4), כְּחִכְרָה (see ver. 7), אָבַל, נָבַט, הִשְׁבִּיב, נִפְשָׁא (see ver. 12; iii. 63; iv. 16; v. 1), never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 12. עִבְרִי רָדַךְ (see ii. 15), יֹם חֲרוֹן אָבו (Is. xiii. 13) never in Jeremiah. See ii. 1. עוֹלָל (see ver. 22; ii. 20; iii. 51) Jeremiah uses only once in the sense of racemari. Once also in Hithp. xxxviii. 19.—Ver. 13. דָּוָה, רָשָׁת (see v. 17) never in Jer.—Ver. 14. שָׁקַר אֵן. לֵעָ. Hithp. only here. אֲרָנִי in Jeremiah never alone, but always joined with יְהוָה; in Lamentations fourteen times, and always alone.—Ver. 15. קָרָא כּוֹיָגַר, כָּלָה never in Jeremiah. נָתַן לְפִי only here.—Ver. 16. בְּכִיָּה only here. כְּנַחֵם see ver. 2. בְּשִׁיב, נִפְשָׁא, see ver. 11. שׁוֹמְמִים, see ver. 4.—Ver. 17. אֵין כְּנַחֵם, see ver. 2. נָדָה (see ver. 8) never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 18. כָּרָה פָּה never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 19. רָפָה, Piel, נָגַע never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 20. עָר, see ver. 5. חִכְרָה (see ii. 11), נָהַפֵּךְ לְפִי never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 21. נָאֲנַח, see ver. 4. כְּנַחֵם, see ver. 2.—Ver. 22. רָעָה לְפָנַי כִּי never in Jeremiah.

CHAPTER II. Ver. 1. יָעִיב אֵן. לֵעָ. יֹם אֵף יְהוּדִים (see i. 12; ii. 21, 22) never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 2. בָּלַע, Piel, never in Jeremiah, in this chapter five times. Instead of לֹא חָמַל (see ver. 17) Jeremiah says נָאֹת יַעֲקֹב. לֹא נָחַם only here.—Ver. 3. Jeremiah uses only the Niphal of נָבַע. חָרַי אֵף never in Jeremiah. חִשְׁבִּיב אָחֹר, see i. 8. יָפִין, Jeremiah uses only once, and then not in a figurative sense. Jeremiah never says כְּבִיב, he uses in this connection always כְּבִיבִים or כְּבִיבוֹת.—Ver. 4. נָצַב Niph. never in Jeremiah. כְּחִכְרָה, see i. 7, 10, 11. אָהַל בַּת צִיּוֹן only here.—Ver. 5. נִפְלִיעַ, see ver. 2. הִאֲנִיָּה רִאֲנָה from Is. xxix. 2.—Ver. 6. כּוֹיָגַר, see i. 4. שָׁבַה Piel only here. שָׁבַת in Jeremiah only in the passage xvii. 21-27.—Ver. 7. נָנַח never in Jeremiah; in Lamentations three times, ii. 7; iii. 17, 31. אֲרָנִי, see i. 14. נָאֲרַר in no form in Jeremiah. הִכְבִּיר, Hiph. never in Jeremiah, he once only uses the Pual (xiii. 19).—Ver. 8. בָּלַע, see ver. 2. Jeremiah does not use the Hiph. of אָבַל. חָל never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 10. עָבַר never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 11. דְּכַעוֹת never in Jeremiah; he uses only הִפְעִיָּה. חִכְרָה, see i. 20. כִּבְרָה, liver, never in Jeremiah. עָטַף (three times in Lamentations and only in ch. ii., namely, vers. 11, 12, 19) never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 12. הִתְעַטַּף, see ver. 11. Hithp. הִשְׁתַּפַּךְ never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 13. דָּפָה Piel, שָׁוָה and בַּת יְרוּשָׁלַם (the last in Lamentations again ver. 15) never in Jeremiah. Jeremiah never constructs רָפָא with ל.—Ver. 14. Jeremiah never uses the verb חָהַר alone, nor הִזָּה שׁוּא. The latter is an expression occurring in Ezekiel. Also חָמַל, for which Jeremiah says הִפְלָה (xxiii. 13).—Jeremiah never uses נָלַח with עַל (see again iv. 22). כְּשִׂאוֹת (chosen with reference to Jer. xxiii. 33-40) only here. Jeremiah uses שׁוּא only in the formula לְשׁוּא כְּרוּחִים (probably framed with reference to Jer. xxvii. 10, 15) is אֵן. לֵעָ.—Ver. 15. Jeremiah never says כָּפַס כָּפַס, nor עִבְרִי רָדַךְ (see i. 12), nor הִנְיָע רֹאשׁ. For the last Jeremiah says הִנְיָר יְרוּשָׁלַם, see ver. 13. The שׁ, relat., never in Jeremiah; in Lamentations four times, ii. 15, 16; iv. 9; v. 18. כְּלִילַת יָפִי is an expression of Ezekiel's (xxvii. 3; xxviii. 12). כְּלִיל is never found in Jeremiah.—Ver. 16. פָּצָה (see iii. 46), חָקַר never in Jeremiah.—Ver. 17. בָּלַע, see ver. 2.—Ver. 17. בָּצַע, Piel never in Jeremiah. He uses only בּוֹצֵעַ בָּצַע. אֲכָרָה אֵן. לֵעָ. וְלֹא חָמַל, see ver. 2. קָרַךְ once in Jeremiah, קָרַח never.—Ver. 18. פָּנָה (see iii. 49) only here. בַּת עֵין only elsewhere in Ps. xvii. 8.—Ver. 19. רֹאשׁ אֲשַׁכְרֶוּת. נָשָׂא כְּבִים שָׁפַךְ לֵב. רֹאשׁ כָּל-הַיְצוֹת is found in Nah. iii. 10; Isa. li. 20; in the Lamentations again iv. 1; in Jeremiah never.—Ver. 20. רֹאשׁ רְהִיטָה, see i. 11.

xxviii. 12, and nowhere else.* That the Lamentations may be the source from which Ezekiel obtained these phrases, no one can believe who has read Ezekiel in the places referred to with attention. For in those places (especially in chapter xiii.) everything is so peculiar and so impressed, in construction and expression,—as where he uses תִּפְּלָה,—with the distinct individuality of Ezekiel, that a borrowing of the words is not to be thought of. I say the words, for that Ezekiel had in mind the substance of Jer. xxiii., cannot be doubted. If then in Lam. ii. 14, 15, we have quotations from Ezekiel, what is the inference with reference to the authorship of our Book by Jeremiah? In the prophetic book, even in the latest parts of it, we find no trace of the adoption of Ezekiel's phraseology.† If we detect this here, it must be conceded that Jeremiah might have received already some parts of Ezekiel's Book before the whole was finished. Were the Jeremiac origin of the Lamentations established in other respects, then perhaps we could allow this particular matter to pass without question. But since the differences in language strongly shake that traditional opinion, we are obliged to say that a quotation from Ezekiel in the Lamentations argues rather against the opinion that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations, than for it. See further below, under 2d general head of this section.

We are therefore compelled to decide that the tradition which has the Septuagint for its first representative rests on no solid foundation, and is in opposition especially to the philological characteristics of the book. But who then did write the Lamentations? We can take it for granted that the author must have been an eye-witness of the incidents related in his book. For he speaks with such warmth of feeling, with such clear insight and accurate knowledge of the events he narrates, that it is evident that he does not speak of matters learned at a distance and through others, but of those of which he has a direct personal knowledge and experience. Especially the last two chapters, which have a more prosaic character exactly reflecting the things as they actually were, are copious in details which seem to us to be copied from life. In chapter fourth the author, alluding to the humiliating sufferings of the people, in order to heighten the effect, describes the Israelites generally as the nobility of the nations, and then especially singles out the nobility of Israel, and contrasts their former with their present condition. Since he thus extols the nobility of his people, with manifest predilection, yes, enthusiasm (see iv. 7, comp. i. 6, and remarks on those places), and since in this connection he says nothing at all of the culpability of those high in rank, which Jeremiah makes so eminently conspicuous (Jer. ii. 26; v. 5, 25-28; xxiii. 1, 2; xxxiv. 19; xxxvii.; xxxviii.; xlv. 17), but on the contrary, very decidedly blames the prophets and priests, as the causers of the misfortune (ii. 14; iv. 13-15), all this seems to indicate that our author belongs to the order of the שְׂרָפָיִם [the princes, or nobles].‡ In this opinion we are strengthened when we read the description

* [Dr. Naegelschach credits himself in the Preface with the important discovery that Lam. ii. 14 is a quotation from Ezekiel. The fact that this is a new discovery is suspicious. May he not have mistaken a mere coincidence in the use of language for a citation of one author from another? Our suspicion grows into certainty when we find that a quotation from Ezekiel in this passage involves the necessity of an absurd and impossible translation of the word תִּפְּלָה,—“Thy prophets saw for thee falsehood and white-wash!” As regards the other words involved in these supposed quotations in ii. 14, 15, there is nothing so unique or remarkable in them, but that they might have occurred to any two different writers. But even if they were phrases of striking peculiarity, both writers might have borrowed them from the popular dialect of the day. The American people gave to English literature in our last war many words and phrases that have since appeared simultaneously in our best writers. So the Jewish people, fearfully awakened from the delusions into which their false prophets had betrayed them, may have cried out in their passion חֲזוּ שׂוֹנֵא, and lamented over their ruined city as כִּי בָּלִיתָ יְכִי; and Ezekiel and Jeremiah, even on the assumption that the latter had not seen or heard the prophecies that were uttered in Chebar, may both have adopted the phrases that were passing from mouth to mouth. We ought not to forget, either, that both prophets were inspired by the same Spirit, and hence coincidences in thought and expression were to be expected. Our object in these remarks is simply to show, that the repetition in the Lamentations of words and phrases in Ezekiel, does not presuppose an acquaintance with Ezekiel's prophecies. But in point of fact Ezekiel's prophecies contained in chapters xii. xiii. xxi. xxii. were in all probability known to the Jews in Palestine almost as soon as published in Chaldea. See notes on ii. 14, 15.—W. II. II.]

† [We do find great resemblances in phraseology between the two; and if every remarkable expression occurring in two authors, must be in one of them a quotation from the other, either Jeremiah quotes Ezekiel, or Ezekiel Jeremiah, very often. Observe, for instance, the peculiar use of גֹּלְיָהּ in the sense of captivity, and the use of symbolical names, especially בְּקוֹר, Jer. i. 21; Ezek. xxiii. 23.—W. II. II.]

‡ [This is not complimentary to the author. The book itself furnishes evidence that its author could not be blinded by

iv. 17-20, where the author so vividly and intelligently describes, as only an eye-witness could, the king's flight and his capture. He must therefore have been one of the king's companions and belonged to his court. But he seems himself to have escaped capture. Else he had shared the fate of the other princes captured with the king, who according to Jer. lii. 10, were put to death together at Riblah. Since he was not captured, neither could he have been transported, but must have joined himself to the company of those remaining in the land who afterwards fled to Egypt. Hence v. 9, 10 relate to his personal experience.

2. As regards the Time of Composition, chapter second at least must have been written after the book of Ezekiel was known: for vers. 14, 15 of that chapter presuppose Ezekiel xii., xiii., xxi., xxii., xxvii., consequently the first part of his writings (i.-xxxii) at least. These verses could not have been added at a later period, for they were necessary to the completeness of the alphabet from the first. Still less could the whole of the second chapter have been composed at a later period, for the whole work, based from beginning to end on its five-fold construction, was in fact made out of one casting. But when the first copy of Ezekiel's writings may have reached Egypt, it is impossible to ascertain. We can only say this much, that the latest date mentioned in Ezekiel's writings is the 27th year of Jeconiah's captivity (Ezek. xxix. 17). This refers us to the year 571 or 570 B. C., and consequently to a period about which time, according to the greatest probability, Jeremiah's death occurred. For though we were obliged to show [in the Commentary on Jeremiah, lii. 31-34] that it was not absolutely impossible for Jeremiah to have lived till the year 561, B. C., yet this is only the extremest imaginable possibility. Much more likely is it that he lived only till about the year 570. See Intr. to Jeremiah, pp. ix., xii. But Ezekiel, even if he received his last revelation in the year 571-570, must after that have consumed some time in finishing the composition of his book, and more time still must have elapsed before a copy of his writings could come from Chebar to Egypt.* Besides, is it credible that Jeremiah, in his old age and while suffering every affliction, wrote a book so artistic in its construction, and so full of sprightliness, as the Book of Lamentations is? It can as little be inferred from iii. 4, that the author was old, as it can from iii. 27, that he was young. But the freshness and vivacity with which the book is written, and the labor which it has cost, make it improbable that it was written by an aged man in the last stage of his vital powers.

3. That the five songs are the work of one and the same author, is evident from the following facts and considerations: (1.) The unity of the plan, proved above. (2.) The thrice repeated initial word אֶיְיָ, in i. 1; ii. 1; iv. 1. For it would be indeed remarkable in the highest degree, if different writers had begun their songs with precisely the same word. (3.) The similarity of the language. Although verbal peculiarities occur, which distinguish the songs from each other, yet a common language prevails in all. In regard to the first point, the phrase אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ occurs four times (i. 2, 9, 17, 21) and אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ once (i. 6) in the first chapter, and in no other; אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ three times (i. 4, 8, 11) and substantive אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ once (i. 22), and in no other chapter; אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ (אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ) three times in the first (vers. 7, 10, 11), once in the second chapter (ver. 4); אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ five times in the second chapter (vers. 2, 5 bis, 8, 16), and exclusively there; the same is true of אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ, which occurs three times, although in different forms, in ch. ii. (vers. 11, 12, 19); and אֶיְיָ אֶיְיָ occurs three times in ch. ii. (vers. 1, 21, 22), and only there. Each of the following words occurs twice in ch. iii., אֶיְיָ (vers. 7, 9), אֶיְיָ (vers. 5, 19), אֶיְיָ (vers. 21, 24, comp. vers.

the prejudices of rank, nor meanly capable of exempting his own rank from just censure. The internal evidence is in favor of the opinion that he was himself a prophet and a priest, and intimately associated with the nobility of the land, if not himself a noble.—W. H. H.]

* [It is here assumed that Ezekiel's prophecies were not published till all of them, or a large portion of them, had been carefully collated in book-form and that then they were formally circulated. The modern process of writing, printing, and publishing, seems to be in the writer's mind. In fact, probably, each prophecy, whether first spoken or written, was instantly and rapidly communicated to all the Jews. It would travel, with marching armies and numerous caravans, to Palestine, and thence by various channels to Egypt, not only in written form, but repeated orally and accurately by those, who in that age of few books and fewer readers, were able readily and exactly to memorize all that their prophets and poets composed. It may be proper here again to refer to the fact that Ezek. i.-xxiii. was certainly complete before the destruction of Jerusalem, and may have been finished a year, or longer, before that event.—W. H. H.]

18, 26), חֲכָרִים (vers. 22, 32) כָּכֶךְ (vers. 43, 44), עֵינָהּ and עֵינָהָ (vers. 36, 59). In ch. iv. לָמוֹ occurs twice (vers. 10, 15). In ch. v. no similar repetition of characteristic expressions occurs. I believe that these more frequent repetitions in the first chapters are due to the more lavish expenditure of art, for which those chapters are remarkable. Not that these repetitions are themselves indications of art; they are rather the involuntary consequence of that constraint which an artificial style imposes upon the writer. As the Poet becomes better accustomed to the artificial form in ch. iii., these repetitions decrease in number.* To the same cause we must ascribe the peculiarity that the Divine name יְהוָה occurs only in the first three chapters. Up to the culmination point, which we recognize in the middle of ch. iii. (vers. 19–40), we find this Divine name, which belongs rather to grave and solemn discourse, thirteen times, and afterwards in the decrescendo passage it occurs only once (iii. 58).† Apart from these repetitions in one and the same chapter, which prove nothing against the identity of the author, many characteristic expressions are repeated in several chapters, a fact which testifies that one and the same style, or habit of speaking, prevails throughout the whole Book. The following expressions thus occur. יָנָה, i. 4, 5, 12, and iii. 32, 33. עָנִי, i. 3, 7, 9, and iii. 1, 19. עָנָה, deprimere, iii. 33, and v. 11. יָנָה, ii. 7, and iii. 17, 31. נִינָה, iii. 14, 63, and v. 14. לֹא חָמַל, ii. 2, 17, 21, and iii. 43. רֵאשׁ כָּל-חַיִּצּוֹת, ii. 19, and iv. 1. טוֹב (happy), iii. 26, and iv. 9. צָר (sing.), i. 5, 7, 10, and iv. 12. חֲפִיט, i. 11, 12; iii. 63; iv. 16; and v. 1. גִּלְהָה עַל, ii. 14, and iv. 22. דָּרוּה, i. 13, and v. 17. שׁ, relat., ii. 15, 16; iv. 9; and v. 18. כּוֹעֵר (place or time of a festivity), i. 4, 15, and ii. 6, 7, 22. שִׁכִּים, i. 4, 13, 16, and iii. 11. כְּרִירִים, i. 7, and iii. 19. חֲטָא, i. 8, and iii. 39. עֲכָרִי הֲדָךְ, i. 12, and ii. 15. עוֹלָל (עוֹלָל), i. 12, 22; ii. 20, and iii. 51. חֲכָרְכָר, i. 20, and ii. 11. שִׁיב אָחֹר, i. 8, and ii. 3. כִּחְכָר (כִּחְכָר), i. 7, 10, 11, and ii. 4. פָּצָה, ii. 16, and iii. 46. הִפְגִּיחוֹת, ii. 18, and iii. 49. לְחֵי, i. 2, and iii. 30. עֵבֶר, ii. 10, and iii. 29. גִּשָּׂא לִבְךָ, ii. 19, and iii. 41. I think that this comparison, which contains only those instances that are most apparent to the eye, strengthens the principal argument for the identity of the author of the several songs, which argument consists in the unity of the plan on which they are constructed.

§ 4. LITERATURE.

We have the Patristical Commentaries of THEODORET and EPHRAEM SYRUS.—JEROME has not explained this Book. The short Tractatus in Jeremix Lamentationes, which is found under his name in the editions of his works, and which is nothing but a mystical interpretation of the alphabet, was composed, according to GHISLER., SIXTUS SENENSIS and BELLARMINÉ (see GHISLER., p. 5), by RHABANUS MAURUS, according to BALLARIUS and others (see VALLARS. Tom. V. p. 1011), by the venerable BEDE.—The book of Lamentations was held in high esteem

* [We must wholly dissent from any such explanation of these repetitions. To do so, were to transform some of the most beautiful and impressive passages in these poems into litanies, that betray the carelessness or the want of skill of the sacred writer. There are few instances in which the reasons for the repetition are not apparent: none in which we cannot imagine that they were intended for rhetorical or poetical effect. The constantly recurring theme in the first song, there is no comforter, or she has no comforter, is one of the master strokes of a great poet. This emphasizes again and again the theme of the whole poem. This is the very acme of the distress of the daughter of Jerusalem, who having forsaken her God, now sitteth solitary, herself forsaken both of God and men, she hath no comforter! So in the second song, the day of His wrath, and the frequent recurrence of the words anger and wrath serve to keep in view the one great thought of this particular song, that God Himself had appeared as an enemy and an avenger. Not only was Jerusalem as a forsaken woman without a comforter, God had turned against her. He had destroyed His own Zion where He dwelt among His people, and all that they suffered, they suffered at His hand, and we are not for a moment allowed to forget that we are reading of what God does in the day of His wrath. The repetitions in the first chapter of that tremulous word גָּאָה, till we seem to hear the broken sighs of priests and people, yea, and of the forsaken sufferer herself; and in the second chapter, of the short expressive word בָּלַע, till we understand that nothing has escaped the desolations of Heaven's wrath, that everything is literally and utterly swallowed up or consumed, are instances of that masterly art by which a great poet impresses an idea on the mind by a single word, repeated again and again, with increasing emphasis, where a writer of inferior ability would weaken the force by dividing it among many words. But without multiplying instances, it may be well here to make a general observation which will apply to all these repetitions, and that is that the language of violent passion, and especially of grief, is always broken up into short words, and indulges in the frequent repetition of them.—W. H. H.]

by the Fathers. GREGORY NAZIANZEN says of it (in his Orat. prima de pace, according to GHISLER, p. 4), "As often as I take this book into my hands, and am engaged in reading those Lamentations (whenever I do read it, I desire to be modest in the enjoyment of prosperity), my voice choked with emotion is lost, my eyes are filled with tears, and I seem to see the very calamity he describes and lament with him in his lamentations." The alphabetical acrostic furnished rich material for allegorical interpretation. Thus CASSIODORUS (explic. Ps. xxiv., in GHISLER, p. 3), says, "Jeremiah bemoaned the captivity of Jerusalem in a quadruple alphabetical Lamentation, indicating to us, by the sacrament of letters, the mysteries of celestial things."—With respect to Rabbinical Commentators, we refer to those mentioned on the Prophet Jeremiah, to whom we must add ABEN EZRA.—There is a Hebrew Commentary by M. The translation is one of the first into English directly from the Hebrew, and is characterized by great simplicity and force, and an agreeable musical rhythm. The notes are curious, but of little exegetical value, and abruptly terminate with the sixth verse of the second chapter, as if the author tired of them, for he closes with this singular remark: “And further large commenting I shall not need. ADDITIONAL REMARKS ON THE QUESTION OF AUTHORSHIP.

BY W. H. H.

The commonly received opinion that Jeremiah was the author of the Lamentations is sustained by the following considerations:

1. The presumptive probability that Jeremiah was the author is strong. Dr. NAEGELSBACH concedes its force (see p. 9).

Jeremiah survived the fall of the city long enough to have written this book. The authentic records of his history close with his residence among the Jewish fugitives in Tahpanhes, Egypt (Jer. xliii. 8): Whether we accept the early Christian tradition that "the Jews at Tahpanhes, irritated by his rebukes, at last stoned him to death" (SMITH'S Bib. Dict.), or the report that he was "put to death by king Hophra" (MILMAN'S Hist. of the Jews); or adopt the more likely belief of the Jews, "that on the conquest of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, he with Baruch made his escape to Babylon or Judea and died in peace," having lived to add the last words appended to his prophecies, Jer. lli. 31-34 (see SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. "Jeremiah," STANLEY'S Jewish Church, Series 2d, p. 620),—it is at least certain, that Jeremiah survived the destruction of Jerusalem long enough to have written the Lamentations, which include historical facts not complete till after the death of Gedaliah and the flight to Egypt. Surviving, it is next to incredible, that he, the prophet of the destruction, should not be the author of this poem of lamentation over the great event and issue of his prophetic career. Who can read first his prophetic book and then this description of the city and the people after the destruction of the former, and not say,—if Jeremiah still lived, Jeremiah and no other was the painter of this picture, in which all the conspicuous figures are what his former writings would lead us to expect, which presents an exact fulfilment of all he predicted, and which so corresponds with the doctrine, facts and previsions, contained in the prophetic book, that when we turn from one to the other, it is difficult to say which picture is most like the reality,—which is the mirror that most accurately reflects the downfall of the State and the dispersion of the people! "The poems belong unmistakably to the last days of the kingdom, or the commencement of the exile. They are written by one who speaks, with the vividness and intensity of an eye-witness, of the misery which he bewails. It might almost be enough to ask, who else then living could have written with that union of strong passionate feeling and entire submission to Jehovah, which characterizes both the Lamentations and the Prophecy of Jeremiah?" (SMITH'S Bib. Dict. art. Lament.). Who can believe that Jeremiah, after continuing to speak and write for God through a long life-time, so suddenly dropped the pen and remained silent and suffered a total eclipse from the splendor of an unknown author, to whose identity neither Scripture nor tradition give us the slightest clue?

2. The presumption that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations is confirmed by the most decisive testimony of tradition.

Few historic facts are sustained by a tradition so ancient, so long undisputed and so generally received. The truthfulness of this tradition was never, we may say, seriously questioned till the middle of this century, when EWALD gave his verdict against it. Up to that time, with the exception of an anonymous writer in 1819, and the whimsical VON DER HAARDT in 1712, it was universally accepted by Jews and Christians. We trace it back through the Vulgate, the Syriac and the Septuagint versions, to the probable evidence of Hebrew MSS. earlier than the oldest of those versions (see note p. 8). The existence of such Hebrew MSS. is entirely probable. It is easier to account for the loss of what once were the connecting words between the Prophecies of Jeremiah and the Lamentations, by the transfer of the latter to the Hagiographa, than it is to explain the insertion of the words in the Septuagint and their reproduction, with additions and changes, in the Vulgate, if they never existed in Hebrew originals. It is impossible to suppose that the Septuagint translators inserted in the text a mere presumption of their own, "derived from the book itself," as Dr. NAEGELSBACH suggests. If it could be proved that they did not find these words in Hebrew MSS., we must believe that they received them through written or oral tradition, that had descended to them from earlier ages and was, in their times, universally accepted and undisputed. It is not credible that such a tradition could have been founded in error. When and how could an error, in reference to the authorship of this book, have come into universal acceptance previous to the translation by the Seventy? It is asserted that other writings, of unknown authorship, were attributed by the Jews to Jeremiah (SMITH'S Bib. Dict.; STANLEY'S Jewish Ch.). But there is no evidence of their having attributed to him a canonical book, that had always been esteemed canonical, and had never been lost sight of or forgotten. There is reason to believe that this book was highly valued by the exiled Jews, and was in their possession on their return from captivity (SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Lam.). From that time to the time of the translation of the LXX., the Jews, cured of idolatry, cherished their sacred Scriptures and especially revered the memory and the words of the prophet Jeremiah. During this long period, we can fix upon no point of time, when the true history of this extraordinary book could have been lost, when the brilliant name of its real author could have lapsed into oblivion, or when the fable could have been fabricated, that was destined to be universally accepted as a historic truth, that Jeremiah was that author.

3. The facts related or referred to in the book render it certain that Jeremiah wrote the book.

We have already ascertained that he lived long enough after the events alluded to had happened, to have written about them. We have also intimated that the topics discussed or suggested in the Lamentations are exactly what we would expect to find in a writing of Jeremiah's, composed after the destruction of Jerusalem. To this we now add, that the assumption that the Lamentations were written by one, who had been both a spectator of the events described and a participator in those events, points directly to Jeremiah as the probable author of the book. This assumption, indeed, is not inevitable; for not all graphic descriptions of events are written by those who participated in them: what eye-witness, for example, could bring the reader more immediately into the presence of actors and scenes far remote from the writer, than DEAN STANLEY, who has given us his eloquent version of the same incidents in Jewish history? But granting the assumption in the present instance, who could have been a more authentic writer of the facts contained in the Book of Lamentations, than the prophet Jeremiah? Or what great event is described in that Book, that was not witnessed and participated in by the prophet Jeremiah? Dr. NAEGELSBACH suggests only one possible exception; he would infer, from the description of the flight from Jerusalem and the pursuit and capture of the king and the princes, that the author of Lamentations was a companion of the king and one of the princes of the court. To this we answer; 1st. There is no intimation that even one of those princes escaped the slaughter at Riblah: "and the king of Babylon slew the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes: he slew also all the princes of Judah in Riblah." 2d. There is absolutely nothing, in the brief allusion in the Lamentations to the flight and capture of the king, that indicates that it was written by a companion of the king. The only possible reference to this tragical incident is contained in two verses, iv. 19, 20.* The 19th verse,—"Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heaven; they pursued us upon the mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness,"—is in no sense personal to the writer, nor is its application to be restricted to the king and his army; but is spoken with reference to the whole people, as the preceding verses show, and refers to the rapid pursuit of all fugitives from the city, whether they endeavored, like the king, to find safety in the mountains of Jericho or the wilderness of Judea, or in any other mountains or wildernesses in the vicinity of the doomed city. The first member of ver. 20,—"the breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the LORD, was taken in their pits,"—simply states the fact of the king's capture, without any incidental detail, such as would indicate a description of the event by an eye-witness; and the second member of this verse,—"of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen,"—is the language of the people generally, not of the companions of the king only, for the desire of the nation doubtless was, that their king should escape to some place of security, even among the heathen, whither they might follow him, and where they might gather around him and perpetuate their monarchy and nationality. There is, then, nothing in these two verses to embarrass the conclusion that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations.

Having shown that there is nothing in this Book involving the personal experience and observation of the author, that renders it impossible for Jeremiah to have been that author, we come now to the fact, that there is much in this Book which belongs peculiarly and exclusively to the personal history of that prophet. This is especially true of the third chapter or song. Here we clearly have the prophet Jeremiah speaking to us. Dr. NÆGELSBACH himself is compelled to acknowledge this. But he says that the writer of the Book personifies the prophet and puts these words into his mouth. Who can believe this? Who could justify the sudden intrusion of a new speaker into such a finished composition, without a hint, either preceding or following his soliloquy, as to his name, rank, or official position? Who would imagine that any intelligent author would attempt such an abrupt assumption of another man's personality? Who can believe in the possibility of such a complete identification between an author and a character dramatically introduced into his poem? Either Jeremiah wrote the whole poem, or he wrote no part of it. If he wrote the whole, the 3d chapter, beginning with the words "I am the man that hath seen affliction," is natural, lucid and appropriate. If Jeremiah did not write the poem, this third chapter is certainly intended to deceive us into the belief that he did. Otherwise, it is an anomaly and solecism in literature, that no reputable writer could be guilty of. The argument that a modest man would not make himself the central object in his own poem, is of no force; especially when we remember that the poet is also the prophet of Jehovah, and not only on that account a representative man, but a living prophecy in his own life, as Hosea was. Besides, the argument may be offset by another consideration, that a poet, as skilful as the author of Lamentations was, would not leave us to guess who the central figure of his poem is, by the mere accidental coincidences of historical details. Indeed, we find in this absence of hisname and titles the best evidence, that the modest Jeremiah was himself the author; for if another had written the Book, he would have had every inducement to tell us, that the great and holy prophet Jeremiah was the speaker in this 3d Song. The whole argument for modesty, however, is greatly overstrained, and receives no support from the free and frank way in which Jeremiah speaks of himself in his prophecies.

4. Characteristics and similarities of style add still further evidences to the fact that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations.

Arguments derived from style are precarious. The investigations into the authorship of Junius admonish us that the most astute critics may be deceived, and that it is possible for an author to excel himself in one single production beyond the recognition of his most intimate and sagacious friends. In the present instance, we encounter the difficulty of determining what are the general characteristics of Jeremiah's style. Till the critics decide this point, the question whether the Lamentations harmonize with his style must be demurred. "JEROME complained of a certain rusticity in Jeremiah's style," an idea that NÆGELSBACH seems to accept (See p. 12. Sermo ineultus et pene subrusticus.)* LOWTH confesses that he can discover no vestige of this rusticity, he thinks that in several of his prophecies he "approaches very near the sublimity of Isaiah," he regards Ezekiel as "much inferior to Jeremiah in elegance" (Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, GREGORY'S translation, II., pp. 88, 89). LOWTH also compares him to Simonides; and SER. SCHMIDT compares him to Cicero (SMITH, Bib. Dic., Art., Jeremiah). Bishop WORDSWORTH, speaking of him as "peculiarly the prophet of the affections," calls him "the Euripides—and more than the Euripides—of the Hebrew canon" (Introduction to Jeremiah, p. xv.).—There is again a conflict of opinion in regard to the merits of the Lamentations as a work of art and taste. EWALD speaks of it slightly as possessing some merit. NOYES almost reproduces EWALD's language, when he says, "The Lamentations are, indeed, possessed of considerable merit in their way, but still betray an unpoetic period and degenerated taste" (Introduction to Psalms, p. 48). On the other hand, NÆGELSBACH accords the highest place to the Book as a work of art, and regards its production as far above and beyond the ability of the uncultured and almost rustic Jeremiah. He is certainly right in his appreciation of the style of the Lamentations, and many of the best judges of style agree with him. "Never was there a more rich and elegant variety of beautiful images and adjuncts, arranged together within so small a compass, nor more happily chosen and applied" (LOWTH, De Sac. Poes. Heb. Prælect. XXVII. KITTO, Cyc. Bib. Lit.). "Never did city suffer a more miserable fate, never was ruined city lamented in language so exquisitely pathetic. Jerusalem is, as it were personified, and bewailed with the passionate sorrow of private and domestic attachment: while the more general pictures of the famine, the common misery of every rank, and age, and sex, all the desolation, the carnage, the violation, the dragging away into captivity, the remembrance of former glories, of the gorgeous ceremonies, and the glad festivals, the awful sense of the Divine wrath heightening the present calamities, are successively drawn with all the life and reality of an eye-witness. They combine the truth of history with the deepest pathos of poetry" (MILMAN, Hist. of Jews, vol. I. B. viii. p. 260). Before we leave this matter of the general characteristics of the style of Jeremiah's prophecies and of the style of the Lamentations, we would repeat an assertion already made, that there must be, in the nature of the case, great diversity between "the oratorical prose" (as Bishop WORDSWORTH calls it) of the one* and the rhythmical lyrical poetry of the other.

The acrostic structure of the Lamentations is regarded as a peculiarity of style that Jeremiah would not have adopted. "DE WETTE maintains (Comment. über die Psalm, p. 56) that this acrostic form of writing was the outgrowth of a feeble and degenerate age, dwelling on the outer structure of poetry when the soul had departed. His judgment as to the origin and character of the alphabetic form is shared by EWALD (Poet. Büch., I, p. 140). It is hard, however, to reconcile this estimate with the impression made on us by such Psalms as the 25th and 34th; and EWALD himself, in his translation of the Alphabetic Psalms and the Lamentations, has shown how compatible such a structure is with the highest energy and beauty" (SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Lament., n. g.). The modern acrostic—the spelling out of words or sentences in the initial letters of rhymed verses—is justly regarded as a species of literary trifling, pleasing only to a fanciful, finical or puerile taste. If the alphabetical acrostic of the Hebrews is also to be regarded as belonging merely to the curiosities of literature, the chief or whole merit of the production consisting in the acrostic itself, or derived from the difficulties to be overcome, an exhibition of literary acrobaticism—poetry on an alphabetical tight-rope,—then we may condemn it as an evidence of vitiated taste, and should regard it as beneath the dignity of any inspired writer, and especially of such a glorious and venerable prophet as Jeremiah was. But we find on examination, that these alphabetical Hebrew poems have great merit, aside from their acrostic form, which they retain when stripped of that form, as they are in our modern translations. This and the fact that this form was ever adopted by inspired writers, lead us to the conclusion that the Hebrew alphabetical acrostic must have served a far higher purpose than our modern acrostics do. It is not impossible that it may have belonged to the highest art of ancient Hebrew poetry, though we, now, may not be able to appreciate all the excellencies an ancient Hebrew might have discerned in this species of writing.†

* "There remains a single class of poets among the Jews—a class peculiar to that people—the prophets. The most of them delivered their predictions in poetry. It is sui generis. It is not precisely poetry, nor is it oratory. It is sublime vision. The event seen passing before the mental eye of the prophet is revealed in lofty rhythm, in glowing imagery. It is eloquent in the highest sense, and stands near the line where oratory and poetry meet. It will be observed that the most impassioned strains of the greatest orators become rhythmical, and have a solemn march which resembles vision. We see it in all their greatest efforts" (Pres. Quart. Rev., Jan. 1861, Art. IV., Hebrew Lang. and Poetry, p. 463).

† GERLACH: "That the alphabetical arrangement may be regarded as inappropriate to Jeremiah, when his soul was filled with sorrow, can only be maintained by regarding the metrical style of poetry as generally inconsistent with deep grief, which no one presumes to do. Here the argument finally depends on the question as to the signification of this alphabetical arrangement. DE WETTE (Comm. Psalms, p. 58), declares it 'a rhythmical artifice, a product of the later and degenerated taste' (E. REUSS in HERZOG'S Encyc. V, p. 906. Speierlei), and EWALD (Poet. Büch. I, S. 139. 3 Auft. I, S. 201) esteems it a sign of 'declining art,' against what SOMMER (bibl. Abhandl. S. 94) says for the higher age of this form of poetry (as HIRTZ also, at least he does not deny the Davidical authorship of Ps. ix. and x. on account of the alphabetical structure). But if it were proved that such an artificial construction were, on general grounds, unworthy of the prophet, then 'with equal propriety we would condemn the Songs, Befiehl du deine Wege, by P. GERHARDT, and Wie schön leucht uns der Morgenstern, by NICOLAI, since there is an artificialness in the beginning of the verses, such as we could not expect in poets so prominent and vigorous' (HENGSTENBERG, 1s. 2, S. 93); and even THIENLUS allows (S. 190) that this were hypercritical. So Without doubt it had mnemonic advantages and also served the purpose of an artificial vinculum for thoughts and sentences having no close logical connection. But we cannot accept the opinion that these were its only or even its chief recommendations.* Jeremiah might have been influenced by the first reason in adopting this style in the Lamentations: but the other could hardly have influenced him, for the Lamentations are not composed of thoughts and sentences loosely connected, as has been too often asserted, needing to be strung together by this alphabetical artifice; on the contrary there is a very close logical connection and a consecutive flow of thought in these poems, and that this is not always apparent is owing to this very alphabetical structure, which sometimes breaks up and interrupts the sense, and is in this respect an actual hinderance to the natural and proper connection of sentiment and expression. It is, therefore, impossible that Jeremiah chose it for the purpose of supplying by artificial means the lack of logical connection in the subject matter of his poem. He must have been influenced by other considerations. What were they? We can, we think, specify three reasons, any one of which would justify his adoption of this style, and all of which probably combined in determining the external structure of this exquisite poem. 1. The assistance afforded by this alphabetical structure in maintaining the rhythmical parallelism of the poem. The parallelism of the Lamentations, as may be seen at a glance, is not the usual parallelism of thought and sentiment, so characteristic of Hebrew poetry: but it is strictly the parallelism of rhythm (see NOYES, Introduction to Psalms, pp. 43-46). "The simply rhythmical parallelism holds the most prominent place in the Lamentations of Jeremiah. Here the parallelism of thoughts is to be reckoned almost among the exceptions, and when it does occur, it is, for the most part, the subordinate parallelism of a member by itself; in general, the rhythm alone predominates, and that too with a regularity which is rare among Hebrew poets, producing here a suitable effect, namely, monotony of complaint" (NOYES, ib., p. 45). This rhythm consists in dividing each verse into three members in chap. i., ii., iii., into two members in chap. iv., and in making each verse of chapter v. consist of one member, and in balancing each member with a cæsura, "which coincides with the sense and the accent," though "we are sometimes under the necessity of abandoning the accents, because they follow the sense, while the rhythm is independent of the sense" (NOYES). This peculiar construction gives to the Hebrew original "that conciseness and brevity" which, as HENDERSON remarks (Introduction, p. 277), it is impossible to exhibit in a translation. But rhythmical parallelism, as NOYES observes, "is too loose a form to retain an exuberant matter without passing over into the prosaic style." This is to be guarded against. In the absence of the parallelism of thoughts and sentiments, how shall the writer distinguish his poetry from mere prose composition, in which rhythm often occurs without constituting poetry? To meet this difficulty, the advantage of the artificial restraint of the alphabetical structure is obvious. At equal periods, both writer and reader are reminded, in the absence of parallel thoughts, that the rhythmical parallelism is ended, and is to begin anew. Thus the writer is checked and curbed, and saved from the fault of an inelegant redundancy of expression, while the reader is instructed to observe the proper inflections and to expect some new change of thought or expression. If the original was written without points, as doubtless it was, we can readily apprehend how almost necessary some such artificial help to correct writing and reading, as this alphabetical strucmuch the stranger is the contradiction into which he falls when he asserts (S. 124), that the expansion of the alphabetical structure in ch. iii., is 'an artificiality, to which only a less spiritual poet could confine himself, and which alone by itself repels the thought that Jeremiah could have composed this poem.' Very far from necessarily indicating a peculiarly artificial style, 'the alphabetical structure rather belongs to the means of giving to poetical writing the character of connectedness which is necessary to it' (HENGSTENBERG, ib. loc.), and has for its object 'to give to such songs, as do not allow of being rounded-off and finished by the internal development of the thoughts, the character of a complete composition by means of passing through the whole alphabet—the symbol of completeness' (KEL in HÆVERNICKE, Eint. III. 8, 48, vgl., 514)."

* LOWTH: "The acrostic or alphabetical poetry of the Hebrews was certainly intended to assist the memory, and was confined altogether to those compositions which consisted of detached maxims or sentiments without any express order or connection" (GREGORY'S Trans. II., Lect. 22, p. 134). GERLACH with dogmatic positiveness denies that the object of this form was "of the external sort, to assist the recollection of the learners, as HUET, LOWTH, and lately TIENENTIS assume." It could not fail, however, to facilitate the memorizing of the poems thus written; and in an age when the recitation of poems from memory was the prevailing fashion, and in lyrical poems the recitations were sung, rather than pronounced, to the accompaniment of music, the alphabetical structure possessed advantages that the greatest poets would not despise. GERLACH is also at fault, when, like LOWTH, he would confine the use of the alphabetical structure to the connection of detached sentences or thoughts only loosely related to each other.

ture afforded, may have been. It is not impossible that the poem, as originally written, could not have been intelligibly read, without great difficulty, but for this artificial and alphabetical arrangement. 2. This artificial structure gives to the Poem an expression of unity and completeness. The five songs, each of twenty-two verses, four of them alphabetically arranged, the middle one repeating the alphabet three times, the last one, not alphabetical, but short, rapid and metrical, compose a symmetrical whole, that would be vitiated by any structural change whatever. Even through the eye, this external form, when clearly written, must have conveyed to the mind a conviction that the five Songs composed one poem. The visual effect was an aid to the intellectual apprehension of the design and spiritual purport of the poem. It is one, and only one.* The architectural idea suggested by NÆGELSBACH is thus perfected, a temple rising to the crowning dome supported by the well proportioned columns that rest on a common foundation. Or we may imagine our poem a Jacob's ladder, each golden round of which is denoted by a letter; as this ladder rises from earth to heaven, the separate steps, at first wide apart, grow closer together, and then their distinctive marks are lost to sight and we can only see that the top of the ladder is overshadowed with the glory of God amidst the clouds of incense of prayer and adoration. These illustrations, if deemed over fanciful, may yet serve to show how the alphabetical structure of the poem assists our conception of it as a whole, binds together its separate parts and gives it the expression of unity and completeness. 3. The alphabetical structure was a mechanical assistance to the writer, helping him to curb and control his own emotions and check the ebullitions of violent and turbulent grief. This is the view taken by the author of the article on Lamentations in Dr. WM. SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible. He says, "the choice of a structure so artificial as that which has been described above, may at first sight appear inconsistent with the deep intense sorrow of which it claims to be the utterance. Some wilder, less-measured rhythm would seem to us to have been a fitter form of expression. It would belong, however, to a very shallow and hasty criticism to pass this judgment. A man true to the gift he has received will welcome the discipline of self-imposed rules for deep sorrow as well as for other strong emotions. In proportion as he is afraid of being carried away by the strong current of feeling, will he be anxious to make the laws more difficult, the discipline more effectual. Something of this kind is traceable in the fact that so many of the master-minds of European literature have chosen, as the fit vehicle for their deepest, tenderest, most impassioned thoughts, the complicated structure of the sonnet; also in DANTE'S selection of the terza rima for his vision of the unseen world. What the sonnet was to Petrarch and to Milton, that the alphabetic verse system was to the writers of Jeremiah's time, the most difficult among the recognized forms of poetry, and yet one in which (assuming the earlier date of some of the [alphabetical] Psalms . . .) some of the noblest thoughts of that poetry had been uttered. We need not wonder that he should have employed it as fitter than any other for the purpose for which he used it." Bishop WORDSWORTH gives the same reason why Jeremiah adopted this form. "Like persons of strong emotions, he trembles at the power of his own passions, and resorts to mechanical helps, which may employ his attention, and may save him from being overcome by his feelings, and swept away by the strong tide and current of the violent impetuosity of his passions. As an Alpine traveller, skirting the sharp edge of a precipice, is not unthankful for the wooden hand-rail which runs along it, and by which he supports his steps if his eyes become dizzy at the sight of the dark deep gulf and the foaming cataract below him, so Jeremiah does not disdain to lean on artificial supports in the most vehement outbursts of his emotions. His Lamentations amid the ruins of Jerusalem are the most impassioned utterances of Hebrew poetry; and the alphabetical arrangement of the stanzas, which at first sight may seem to be a rigid mechanical device, was doubtless designed, not only as a help to the memory of his Hebrew fellow-countrymen, who would recite them in their captivity and dispersion, but also to be a stay and support to himself in his own vehement agitations" (Introduction to Jeremiah, p. xv.).

The vigor and vivacity of style have been urged as a reason why Jeremiah could not, in his old age, have composed the Lamentations. These we are told reveal a young man. The expression in iii 27 is appealed to as a plausible evidence that the writer was young. This sage observation, however, "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth," is certainly the grave, mature reflection of an old man. The young are not apt to appreciate the benefits of affliction. It is the old man of long experience and long observation, who looking backward, as it is the habit of old men to do, discerns the wholesome discipline there was in the sorrows and trials of earlier years. In this very verse, therefore, as in the whole book, we recognize the tone and spirit of an aged man;—of a man who has, in fact, left hope in regard to the things of this world behind him, and exchanged it for a sublime faith in the fulfilment of Divine purposes and promises in a future that lies beyond the terminus of his own individual life-time,—such faith as bought the field in Anathoth, when the prophet was fully persuaded that he himself would derive no benefit from it.—But it is not certain that Jeremiah had arrived at an extreme old age when the Book of Lamentations was written. In the thirteenth year of Josiah, he speaks of himself as "a child." He may have been then as young as was Samuel, when he was called to the prophetic office, in which case Jeremiah would have been not more than fifty-three years of age when Jerusalem was destroyed. But had he been twenty years old in the thirteenth year of Josiah, he would have been just over sixty at the destruction of Jerusalem, and in the very prime of intellectual and moral vigor.—But granting the possibility that he might have been seventy or eighty years of age, or even older, it should not surprise us, that he, the prophet of God, writing by inspiration of the Spirit of God, should produce a book which is confessedly written with a mental force unabated and a versatility of genius unimpaired. Nor would it be "by any means a singular instance of a richer and mellower imagination at the close of life, than during its morning or its meridian. This for example was remarkably the case with the magnificent BURKE." The writer just quoted, speaking of the Book of Ecclesiastes and its aged author, says: "Solomon, at the close of his life here hived up the wisdom of past years for our instruction. * * The setting of the sun of the great Master of wisdom, whom God Himself made chief of learned men, threatened indeed to be enveloped with dark clouds, but its rays broke nobly forth before it passed below the horizon, and upon those clouds are painted the rich hues of mingled imagination and philosophy" (Pres. Quart. Review, Jan. 1861, Art. IV., p. 462). Jeremiah, too, at the close of life, compressed the spirit and the teachings of all his prophecies into one wondrous poem, excelling all he had before written in the vigor of its conception, and force, beauty and pathos of its expression. His life and his ministry had been like a stormy day. But that day was not abruptly ended, as was threatened, in the dark night of Jerusalem's destruction. For him there remained a protracted evening twilight, comparatively calm and tranquil, though sorrowful always and perturbed with some fitful returns of stormy experiences, as the animosities of Egyptians and Israelites against him, provoked by his prophecies in Tahpanhes, indicate (see Jer. xliii., xliv.): and in these chastened hours, before his life finally dissolved in tears, his genius gathered into one harmonious composition, the spirit and truth of his eloquent prophecies, to remain for ever the crown and glory of his ministry in the church of God.

We have shown that there is nothing in the style of the Lamentations incompatible with the belief that Jeremiah was their author. We are now to exhibit the evidences of certain similarities of style between Jeremiah's Prophecies and the Lamentations, which confirm our belief that both Books were the production of one author. 1. The individual temperament of Jeremiah, as evinced in his acknowledged writings, was precisely that of the elegiac poet of the Lamentations; occupied with the present and actual, rather than given to discursive flights into the regions of the distant and possible; sensitive, quick in susceptibility; ready to express his emotions and never concealing them, revealing "unreservedly the secret recesses and inmost working of his own heart" (WORDSWORTH); passionate in his grief, and prone to linger among the causes of his sorrow and brood over them and harp upon them; and tender-hearted towards others and sympathetic, throwing himself "unhesitatingly into the condition of those to whom he speaks" (WORDSWORTH). 2. The religious characteristics of Jeremiah reappear in the Lamentations. The same disposition to hold both God and the people firm to covenant engagements: the habit of tracing suffering to sin: the quick discernment of punishment, past or coming, on Jew and Gentile. What has been said of Jeremiah with reference to his prophecies, may be affirmed of the author of the Lamentations: "the Religion, the Monarchy and the other Institutions of his country, seem to be absorbed and concentrated in him; and his own individuality is lost in sympathy with them. His prophetic sternness is a consequence of the intensity of his zeal for the glory of the God of Israel, and of his love for the People of the Lord" (WORDSWORTH, Intr. Jer., p. xv.). 3. The following general "marks of style" have been indicated (see SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Jeremiah) as characteristic of his prophetic writings, all of which are manifest, some of them very distinctly, in his Lamentations. Reminiscences and reproductions of what earlier prophets had written. Influences on his mind of the newly discovered law, and especially of the Book of Deuteronomy. A tendency to reproduce himself—to repeat in nearly the same words the great truths which affected his own heart, and which he wished to impress on the hearts of others. Analogies drawn "not from the region of the great and terrible, but from the most homely and familiar incidents (xiii. 1-11; xviii. 1-10)." 4. It is a striking peculiarity of Jeremiah, which we find repeated in the Lamentations, that the future deliverance of Israel is set forth under the form of the destruction of their enemies. Thus elegies, i., iii. and iv., end with predictions of the punishment of hostile nations, where we would expect an announcement of deliverance and salvation for Israel. Turn now to the prophecies of Jeremiah and read his predictions against Egypt (xlvi.), Philistia (xlvii.), Moab (xlviii.), Ammon, Edom, Syria, Kedar, Hazor, Elim (xlix.), and Babylon (l., li.). Do we not recognize the same prophetic spirit, and the same peculiar, characteristic recognition of the heathen nations in their "typical character, as representatives of various kinds of enmity against the church of Christ" (WORDSWORTH, Intr. Jer., p. xiii.), so that their humiliation or destruction is tantamount to the glory and deliverance of the people of God? 5. Incidental evidences of the identity of the author of Jeremiah's prophecies and of the Lamentations, in many minute points of resemblance.—"As in the Prophecies of Jeremiah, so here, the causes of the exile of the people, and of the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple, are represented to be the vices and crimes of the covenant people (compare i. 5, 8, 14, 22; iii. 39, 42; iv. 6, 22; v. 16, with Jer. xiii. 22, 26; xiv. 7; xvi. 10-12; xvii. 1-3), their guilty reliance on false prophets and profligate priests (comp. ii. 14; iv. 13-15, with Jer. ii. 7, 8; v. 31; xiv. 13; xxiii. 11-40; xxvii. etc.), their false confidence of security in Jerusalem (comp. iv. 12, with Jer. vii. 4-15), their vain hope of the assistance of weak and perfidious allies (comp. i. 2, 19; iv. 17, with Jer. ii. 18, 36; xxx. 14; xxxvii. 5-10), HÆV. Einl., S. 515" (KEIL, Einleitung in A. T., § 127, p. 379).—"In both" (the prophecies of Jeremiah and the Lamentations) "we meet once and again, with the picture of the 'virgin daughter of Zion,' sitting down in her shame and misery (Lam. i. 15; ii. 13; Jer. xiv. 17). In both there is the same vehement outpouring of sorrow. The prophet's eyes flow down with tears (Lam. i. 16; ii. 11; iii. 48, 49; Jer. ix. 1; xiii. 17; xiv. 17). There is the same haunting feeling of being surrounded with fears and terrors on every side (Lam. ii. 22; Jer. vi. 25; xlv. 5). In both the worst of all the evils is the iniquity of the prophets and priests (Lam. ii. 14; iv. 13; Jer. v. 30, 31; xiv. 13, 14). The sufferer appeals for vengeance to the righteous Judge (Lam. iii. 64-66; Jer. xi. 20). He bids the rival nations that exulted in the fall of Jerusalem prepare for a like desolation (Lam. iv. 21; Jer. xlix. 12)" (SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Lamentations).—Besides undeniable repetitions, there are many similarities of thought and structure. There are passages in the Lamentations that seem Jeremiah-like, echoes and suggestions of his prophecies, though we cannot always connect them with any particular utterance of that Prophet. Sometimes, again, the one distinctly and promptly suggests and recalls the others. For example. In Lam. i. 20, "Behold, O LORD, for I am in distress; my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me," and in Lam. ii. 11, "my bowels are troubled within me, my liver is poured upon the earth," we recognize the man of whom it has been said—with reference to Jer. iv. 19, "My bowels, my bowels! I am pained at my very heart; my heart maketh a noise in me"—"through the chambers of his innermost heart there is a shudder" (EWALD, quoted by STANLEY). Lam. ii. 14, aside from its verbal similarities, could only have been written by the author of Jer. xxiii. 36-38. The same clarion voice that rung out the cry as if from the ramparts of Babylon in Jer. li. 12, is heard resounding from the broken walls of Jerusalem in Lam. ii. 17. He who arrested himself on the very verge of a criminal despair, when he wrote Lam. iii. 18 (see the Commentary), surely had in his mind the words he had before written in Jer. iv. 10 and xx. 7.

And the author of Lam. iii. 10,—“He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, and as a lion in secret places,”—was only in imagination transferring to himself that perilous position, in which he had with grief and horror contemplated “the struggles of the expiring kingdom of Judah, like those of a hunted animal,—now flying, now standing at bay, between two huge beasts of prey, which, whilst their main object is to devour each other, turn aside from time to time to snatch at the smaller victim that has crossed their midway path.”

5. Last of all, and most conclusive as a rebutting argument to Dr. NAEGELSBACH's assertion, we have the striking verbal analogies between these two books. But now we come into direct collision with Dr. NAEGELSBACH's assertion, that the language is not the language of Jeremiah.

It would be a stronger argument to say that Jeremiah did not write Lamentations, because it introduces a great many thoughts and ideas not contained in his prophecies, than it is to urge the appearance of new words, or of old words in new combinations, not found in his prophecies. For it is notorious that men of letters have greater command of language than of thoughts, greater versatility in expressing the same thought in different words, than of infusing original ideas into old words. But Dr. NAEGELSBACH has succeeded in making his argument very imposing and formidable in appearance at least, by spreading out upon his pages a long list of assumed variations in language between Jeremiah's prophecies and the Lamentations. Only ten verses in the whole book have escaped his acute criticism, the results of which are all displayed to full advantage. While the patient labor evinced by this minute catalogue is to be commended, the reader will feel that Dr. NAEGELSBACH might have spared him the almost equal labor of entering into all the details of the work of investigation, by classifying its results under a few general heads. Had he done so, his pages would have presented to the eye at least, a less startling array of facts and instances,—but he himself might have discovered, in the process of generalization, that those facts and instances are more apparent to the eye than they are to the understanding. In reviewing this catalogue we ought, first of all, to remember that great differences in style and language, between two such books as the prophecies of Jeremiah and the Lamentations, even if the productions of one author, were to be expected; and then, secondly, we should inquire, whether the differences that do exist are such as are compatible, according to the rules of a just criticism, with their being the productions of one author. With regard to the first point, we should observe, that the prophecies, for the most part, have somewhat of the character of unpremeditated, extemporaneous effusions, designed to produce an immediate effect on the hearts and consciences of the king, the princes, priests, prophets and people. Therefore they were expressed in the common colloquial words, idioms and phrases of daily life. These prophetic deliverances often assumed the forms and diction of poetry. But it was the poetry of the orator, rather than of the writer. Eloquence always is poetical. This is especially true of oriental eloquence. But its poetry is the expression of impassioned thoughts in language imaginative and ornate, spontaneously and unconsciously falling into harmonious cadences, that with us who speak the English language grow into rhythmical periods, but with the Hebrews passed into parallelisms and regularly constructed sentences, divided by cesuras and accents into parts corresponding more or less accurately in length. Such is the poetry we find in the prophecies of Jeremiah; touching our hearts by their pathos, as in the weeping Rachel, refusing to be comforted, or in the plaintive cry, Is there no balm in Gilead, no physician there? or in the outburst of his own grief, when he exclaims, “Oh, that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughter of my people;” again delighting us with beautiful imagery, as by the heath in the desert, the wayfaring man, the athlete wearied by the footmen before he contends with the horses; or overwhelming us with the grandeur and sublimity of his conceptions, as in chapter fourth, where he depicts “the tokens attesting the forthcoming of the Lord to vengeance. Chaos comes again over the earth. Darkness covers the heavens. The everlasting mountains tremble. Man disappears from below and the birds fly from the darkened air. Cities become ruins, and the fruitful places wildernesses, before the advancing anger of the Lord. Byron's Darkness is a faint copy of this picture,—it is an inventory of horrible circumstances, which seem to have been laboriously culled and painfully massed up. Jeremiah performs his task with two or three strokes; but they are strokes of lightning” (GILFILLAN: Bards of the Bible).

Jeremiah's Prophecies contain much real poetry, not only such in virtue of intensity of feeling and vividness of illustrative description, but in virtue of the parallelisms and alternating sentences, which mark Hebrew poetry as distinctly as rhythm and rhyme do English poetry. Even unpoetic translators have felt compelled to give it the external garb of poetry, by marking its periods with lines, though some, like our own lamented Dr. J. ADDISON ALEXANDER, have ineffectually protested against ever arraying Hebrew in these modern vestments. But, after all, the poetry of Jeremiah's Prophecies is the production of a Hebrew orator, rather than of a Hebrew writer. The fourth chapter, for instance, from which the description of the coming judgment is taken, was a fervent address to the people, designed to stir them up to repentance. It was a sermon, an exhortation, a prophetic message from God to His Church. Its poetical features were incidental to its impassioned style. The same remarks will apply to all the poetical portions of the Book; and much of the Book is undeniably simply prose, historical or ethical. Throughout he seeks, not poetical, but oratorical effect. He speaks, not as the poet, but as the preacher. Unlike the Prophecies, the Lamentations are in the strictest sense a poem. This poem was composed in circumstances very different from those in which the Prophecies were produced, and for a very different purpose. The prophet-preacher and orator had fulfilled his unsuccessful mission and retired in a measure from public view. He was in exile with that portion of his countrymen who had fled to Egypt. Here he, who had passed the whole of the former part of his life amidst the excitements and agitations of events more critical and important than any that had occurred in the history of the Jews since they entered on possession of the promised land, now in his old age experienced comparative quiet and leisure. There were, it is true, sorrow and suffering enough around him. The fifth chapter of the Lamentations affords hints of these, and the first chapter tells us how "the pursuers overtook them in the straits." Yet life in that Egyptian exile was stagnation compared with the turbulent history of the prophet's former years. The venerable and broken-hearted man had time now for careful composition. He improved the melancholy hours in the production of a lyrical poem, in which his object was, not as in his prophecies, to produce some immediate effect upon his countrymen, but to publish to the world such a description of God's judgments on Israel, as should redound to the glory of God and convey lessons of wisdom and piety to the Church in all time to come. Everything in this poem shows premeditation and pains-taking in the execution, such as we might expect of the prophet in the circumstances in which he was placed. He imposed upon himself the most artificial rules then practised by the writers of poetry, either by his own preference, or to adapt his poem to the prevailing tastes of the Hebrew people. The initial letters of the verses were to be alphabetically arranged, and in the middle chapter or song the alphabet was to be thrice repeated by giving the same initial letter to every clause of each verse; each verse of the first three chapters was to consist of three periods, or members, the fourth chapter of two, and the fifth of one, agreeing externally with what Dr. NAEGELSBACH has described, in musical terms, as a crescendo and decrescendo movement; and each period or member of a verse was to be composed of two parts, clearly marked, both to the mind and ear, by a pause. These were the rules or laws of composition adopted. Yet these artificial restraints were to be so managed that they should not interrupt the continuity of thought, prevent harmony of expression, or destroy the unity that should characterize the five songs as the component parts of one perfect poem. To fulfil all these requirements, a careful choice of words and phrases was imperative. Deliberation was necessary at every step. And the Poet must go beyond the resources of his accustomed dialect and habit of speaking and writing, and cull from the whole Hebrew language the words, idioms and expressions that best suited his purpose. The result inevitably was the occurrence in this poem of a phraseology that is nowhere else found, either in the prophecies of the same author, or in any other single Book of the Holy Bible. How could it be otherwise? We think, therefore, that it ought to be assumed and granted, as a foregone conclusion, that the Lamentations, even if written by Jeremiah, should contain words, phrases, and turns of thought expressed by a novel use of words, nowhere produced in his book of prophecies. Granting this, we are next to ask, whether the verbal differences between the prophecies of Jeremiah and the Lamentations are of such a character as to compel us to the decision that they could not be the productions of the same author? For a full answer to this question, we must refer to the remarks made upon these verbal differences, as they occur, in the following commentary. But a sufficient answer is contained in the statement, that all these differences may be explained, consistently with the presumption that Jeremiah is the author of this book, by a due consideration of the following rules, or laws of construction. In the application of these rules, frequent reference will be made to the poems of SHAKSPEARE compared with his plays. The choice of these poems for this purpose is induced by the fact that Mrs. CLARK'S Concordance to Shakspeare's Plays enables us to detect what is new and peculiar in his poems as compared with his plays. Time has not allowed a full examination of these poems. Only some thirty verses of the two larger poems, "Venus and Adonis," and "Tarquin and Lucrece," have been subjected to a rapid investigation. We should not expect as many verbal discrepancies between the plays and poems of SHAKSPEARE, as may exist between the Prophecies and Lamentations of Jeremiah, for two reasons. The plays of our English poet are so voluminous that they might be expected to exhaust even his vocabulary, while the prophecies of Jeremiah could not possibly call into use all the words and expressions at the command of a writer or speaker of even ordinary fluency. And again, there is less difference between the blank verse of SHAKSPEARE'S plays and the rhymed verse of his poetry, than there is between the poetry of the Prophecies and that of the Lamentations. SHAKSPEARE had occasion to employ over and over again in his dramas the very words that must be repeated in his poems: while Jeremiah would need for his Lamentations a diction to a great extent unlike that in which his Prophecies were composed. Yet in the very first stanza of Venus and Adonis, consisting of six lines, there are four instances of words or expressions that do not occur in the plays of the dramatist, purple-colored face, weeping morn, hied, sick-thoughted, and two that occur only once in his plays, rose-checked and bold-faced. In the first stanza of Tarquin and Lucrece, consisting of seven lines, there are three instances of words not found in the plays, trustless, lust-breathing, and lightless. With such facts as these before us, we ought to be prepared for great novelties in the style and language of the Lamentations. And yet we will find that what Dr. NÆGELSACH has so elaborately spread out before us as novelties, may be classified under the following six heads.

(1). New combinations of words familiar to the writer and occurring with more or less frequency in his Prophecies. These seldom involve real differences in language and style, and it is unfair to cite them as such. They are in nearly every instance similarities in the habit of the writer's phraseology, that prove his identity. When we find in Venus and Adonis expressions like these, loaded-satiety, time-beguiling, ashy pale, blue-veined, thick-sighted, or, in Tarquin and Lucrece, silver melting dew, high-pitched, all too timeless, death-boding, do we doubt whether SHAKSPEARE wrote these poems, because these particular combinations of familiar words do not occur in his plays? The very first specifications of NÆGELSACH are of this character, רַבְּתֵי עַם and בְּנֵי בְּנֵי, i. 1. These are, in fact, indications of Jeremiah's authorship. For the writer who used the expression in Jer. li. 13, בְּנֵי אוֹצְרֹת, full of treasures, would be very likely to say רַבְּתֵי עַם, full of people; and the writer, who was accustomed to the use of רַב in the sense of great (Jer. xli. 1; xxxii. 19), would be very likely to follow the phrase רַבְּתֵי עַם with this other phrase, involving a poetical play upon the word and a pleasant repetition of sound to the ear, בְּנֵי בְּנֵי, great among the nations. To specify כִּרְב, i. 3, as a peculiarity of style, is a species of literary trifling unworthy of the name of argument. Any writer might connect so common a preposition with a familiar noun. If Jeremiah did it only once, so Isaiah in all his writings uses this expression once, and only once (xxiv. 22). Besides, כִּרְב occurs twenty-one times, scattered throughout the Bible from Genesis to Zechariah. הִלְבֵּן שֶׁבִי, i. 5, involves a peculiarity of construction as likely to be perpetrated by the writer of Jer. xxii. 22 and xxx. 16, who says יִלְבֵּן יִלְבֵּן, as by any one else. Many of the specifications given by Dr. NÆGELSACH fall under this first head, and are, in fact, strong evidences of Jeremiah's authorship.

(2). A word not occurring in Jeremiah's prophecies (perhaps not in any other Scriptures), simply because the idea it represents does not occur. Thus in i. 1, שָׂרָה, princess, is the only place in the whole Bible where a princess is distinctly indicated. Hence the word occurs only here. Is it fair to put this down as an indication of style? In fact, however, we claim the evidence of this very word in behalf of the traditional theory. For the word in the plural, שָׂרוֹת, princesses, was familiar to Jeremiah in the other Scriptures. If he never used it in his prophecies, it was because he had no occasion to do so: but he does use the verb from which it is derived and other derivatives from it; and so often does the word שָׂר, for a prince, ruler, chieftain, or distinguished person, occur in his prophecies, that we should expect the feminine form of that word, שָׂרָה, would be most likely to occur to the mind of the author of those prophecies, when, for the first time, he desired to speak of a princess.—The word כְּרִינָה, province, i. 1, does not occur in the prophecies, because Jeremiah had no occasion to use it in that book. In Venus and Adonis we read for the first time in SHAKSPEARE of a dive dapper, a much more uncommon word in English literature than כְּרִינָה is in Hebrew.—The word לֶחִי, cheek, i. 2, Jeremiah had no occasion to use in his prophecies. When for the first time he would speak of the cheek, what word should he use, but the only one used by the inspired Scriptures with which he was familiar? See Deut. xviii. 3; 1 Kings xxii. 24; (2 Chron. xviii. 23); Job xvi. 10; Cant. i. 10; v. 13; Is. i. 6; Mic. iv. 14. (The word occurs in thirteen other places, where it seems to mean the jaw.) This word, therefore, gives all the testimony that can be extracted from it, in favor of Jeremiah, and not against him.

(3). Forcible expressions that occur in other Scriptures extant in Jeremiah's times, which he, therefore, would not be unlikely to repeat; sometimes indeed they may be intended as quotations.—אֵין קְנִיחָם, there is no comforter, i. 2. See Eccl. iv. 1. If Solomon years before had used the expression and given it currency in the Hebrew language, is it strange that Jeremiah repeated it? Or if Solomon was allowed to use it only once in the whole book of Ecclesiastes, without risking his title to the authorship of that book, may not Jeremiah be permitted to use it in only one chapter of all his writings? Or, if there is anything in the argument at all, ought we not to conclude that the author of the first chapter of Lamentations could not have written the other chapters, because this unique expression occurs five times in the first chapter and not at all in the others?—הָיְתָה לְמִסֵּ—, became tributary, i. 1. This phrase was familiar to Jeremiah in Gen. xlix. 15; Josh. xvi. 10; Deut. xx. 11, besides many similar expressions in the old Scriptures.

(4). Words so familiar to the common dialect of Jeremiah's times, that their use by him can occasion no surprise, though they do not occur in his prophecies.—We find in the Venus and Adonis words like the following, which do not occur in SHAKSPEARE's plays: saddle-bow, toy as a verb, stalled up (he uses the noun stall often, the verb stall only once, but stall up never, a point our German critics would make very emphatic, if discussing the authorship of this poem), unripe, overswayed, overruled in the sense of ruling over another, uncontrolled in the sense of unconquered, dishevelled, spright, souring, disliking as an adjective, etc. Yet who that is acquainted with the literature of the times in which the great dramatist lived, discovers any thing remarkable in his use of these words? Neither should it surprise us that Jeremiah has happened not to use many current words in his prophecies, which he has chosen to use in the Lamentations. For example, עָנִי, of which we shall speak again. עֲבָרָה, i. 3, which occurs in Ex. twelve, in Lev. five, in Num. thirteen, in 1 Chron. eight, in 2 Chron. three, and in Ez. two times, and once in Gen., in Deut. and in Is. So כָּנִיחַ, i. 3, is found in Gen. viii. 9; Deut. xxviii. 65; Ruth iii. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 16; Is. xxxiv. 14.

(5). Slight grammatical variations, licenses allowed every poet; the use of a verb in a tense in which it does not happen to occur in the prophecies; the use of nouns as adjectives, or vice versa; and similar peculiarities.—i. 3, כָּנִיחָה instead of כָּנִיחַ; ver. 4, the ending ׁ־; ii. 13, רָפָא construed with לָ; ver. 14, הָיְתָה without שָׂא; iii. 6, Hiph. of כָּבַד, etc. As well might we question the authorship of Venus and Adonis, because SHAKSPEARE, often as he uses the verb lie, never in his plays has the preterite lied; nor 'miss for misbehaviour; nor the participle distilling, though he has distil four times, distilled ten, distillative and distilment each once; nor the adjective sappy: nor the participle souring: or the authorship of Tarquin and Lucrece, because in the plays the adjectives made out of nouns, trustless, lightless, batchless, do not occur; nor does the verb stows, though the participle stowed occurs three times; nor the verb cypher, though the noun does; nor the noun blur, though the verb does; nor do the participles parling, pawning. We must remember, too, that the inflections of Hebrew words, the changes produced by affixes and suffixes, and the omission or retention of vowel consonants, give a greater variety of grammatical forms than our English words can possibly undergo.

(6). The exactions of poetry, and especially of the very artificial structure of this poem.—Though the Lamentations may not be strictly rhythmical, yet the sentences are carefully balanced. There is, too, an evident regard to melody in the choice of words. יְבָרָה and כְּנִיחַ in i. 3, each occurring at the cesura, and both harmonizing with other words in the verse, show that the phraseology was influenced by regard to melodiousness. In spite of the loss of the correct pronunciation of Hebrew, there can be no reasonable doubt of this. Thus we might account for שִׁנְיָם, iii. 11, by the pleasing alliteration. The necessities of the alphabetical construction sometimes affected the choice of words, as we seem to see in the repetition of vav conversivo in iii. 16–18, and of נָרַךְ in vers. 7 and 9. This may account for the abrupt introduction of the bear, בַּר, in ver. 10, where the lion would have been quite sufficient, if the acrostic had not invited the bear to come too.

If, now, keeping these rules in mind, the following catalogue is carefully examined, there will be found in it little to weaken our confidence in the traditional opinion that Jeremiah wrote the Lamentations, and some things that will strengthen that belief.

When our fervent popular preacher leaves the pulpit, whence he had been accustomed to address the masses on the passing events of the day, or from which he poured forth instruction, warning, invective and exhortation adapted to produce immediate effects; and comes, as it were, to recite before a listening world a dirge on the fall of Jerusalem, that has been carefully prepared, according to the most artificial rules of poetry, known and practised in his day,—we expect to see him, not in his “home-costume,” but dressed for the occasion,—we expect, nay we demand, that his poem shall exhibit in its phraseology, as well as in its thoughts, the results of a careful premeditated selection of words and phrases, that may often lie beyond the habit of his customary “unconscious and undesigned” way of speaking and writing. Judged by this rule, even the long list of variations enumerated above, were they all found to be actual evidences of a difference of style, should not appal us or drive us to the conclusion that Jeremiah could not have been the author of Lamentations. But in point of fact, the long catalogue given above contains comparatively few evidences of even verbal differences between the prophecies of Jeremiah and the Book of Lamentations; and none that may not be explained consistently with the theory that Jeremiah wrote Lamentations. Take out of that catalogue all the ἀπαξ λεγόμενα (and Jeremiah’s prophecies will show such a list of these, as may raise the question whether their occurrence is not a characteristic of his style?); all the repetitions of the same word or phrase, as there is no comforter; all the words for which no synonym or equivalent occurs in the prophecies, and where of course the introduction of new words was inevitable, as princess, province, check; all the combinations of common words into new expressions that any writer of ordinary ability is constantly producing, and that do not really amount to peculiarities of diction, as full of people, great among the nations; and all slight grammatical changes that cannot be regarded as novelties in a writer who uses the same grammatical forms in other words, as the changes effected on words used in the prophecies by number, gender, mood, tense, or the particles attached to them, or the prepositions with which they are construed; remove all these from the catalogue, which ought to be thus sifted before we can reach the truthful result of our analysis, and we shall find little left on which to rest an argument against the authorship of Jeremiah. What the residuum would be, may be discovered in the twenty-four instances (see p. 13) on which Dr. NÆGELSBACH has taken his last stand, and which he evidently regards as constituting the strongest evidences in the whole Book that Jeremiah did not write it. These words then claim special attention. If it can be shown that they are not incompatible with the fact of Jeremiah’s authorship, it is not likely that any other words or phrases in the whole catalogue are. יְלִיךְ appears only twice and then in close connection in Lam. iii. 35, 38. In both instances it seems to designate God (though some, as BLAYNEY, give it a different sense in ver. 35); but it is applied to God as a descriptive title, rather than as a name. God is spoken of as the High One, He is not addressed as such. That the author of Lamentations does not call upon God by this title, by which He is designated in Deut. xxxii. 8, and in many of the Psalms, might be claimed as a coincidence between this book and the prophecies of Jeremiah. But the argument that Jeremiah would not be likely to apply to God a word he himself uses (xxii. 2; xxxvi. 10), and which is so constantly associated with God in the old Scriptures (see Gen. xiv. 18, 19, 20, 22; Num. xxiv. 16), and which Jeremiah the pious priest and prophet, must have so often used in the liturgical Psalms (vii. 18; ix. 3; xxi. 8; xlvi. 5, etc.) is too feeble to withstand the first assault. The citation of the next word אֲרִי־יְהוָה, without any allusion to the question of its genuineness, does not seem entirely ingenuous. Certain it is that many MSS., some early editions and some of the older versions have יהוה instead of אֲרִי־יְהוָה in every one of the fourteen places referred to in the Lamentations. The evidence in favor of this reading is so strong that in every instance BLAYNEY translates Jehovah, and BOOTHROYD, in his critical Hebrew Bible, marks אֲרִי־יְהוָה as a probable corruption. If we consider the reluctance with which the Jews would regard the connection of the name of Jehovah with the judgments befalling themselves, we can imagine that doubts as to the יהוה and suggestions of אֲרִי־יְהוָה, may have passed in the course of transcription from the margin into the text. But on the supposition that אֲרִי־יְהוָה may be the true reading, it is not impossible to reconcile this with Jeremiah's authorship. Though Jeremiah may have preferred to connect with אֲרִי־יְהוָה the name of יהוה, yet in this poem the artificial style (see Rule 6, p. 31) requiring short terse sentences may have forbidden his usual habit. Yet for the sake of variety of expression, or affected by that indefinable taste that guides the poet and which we may not be able always to detect in reading a foreign language, especially one the original pronunciation of which is lost, Jeremiah may have preferred to write אֲרִי־יְהוָה alone, instead of יהוה alone. The likelihood that the choice of this word was influenced by the arbitrary rules of his poem may be inferred from the fact that the word always takes an important accent. Or again, Jeremiah may have been reluctant to connect the covenant name of God, the name associated with promise, grace and favor, with the fierce and destructive judgments that destroyed His own people and His own Temple. The remarks of WORDSWORTH on the use of this name in the prophecies give us a sufficient reason, if one is needed, why Jeremiah should depart from his usual custom and omit יהוה after אֲרִי־יְהוָה: "The prophet appears thus to intimate in the Lamentations, that now, in her captivity and humiliation, Jerusalem felt the lordship of Jehovah, the God of Israel; but by reason of her sins, no longer felt that lordship to be exercised by Him as JEHOVAH, i. e. as the God of His covenanted people, to protect them" (note on Lam. i. 14). The other words need not detain us long. הִבִּיט occurs five times. Each time it is emphatic, and three times it is intended to intensify the meaning of רָאָה, i. 11, 12; v. 1. It is well chosen for this purpose, nor do the prophecies of Jeremiah suggest a word that both in form and sense would have been equally effective in these places. The word itself must have been familiar to Jeremiah and according to Rule 4, p. 30, cannot be regarded as a peculiarity of style. It occurs in Genesis three times, Exodus two, Numbers three, 1 Samuel four, 1 Kings three, 2 Kings once, 1 Chronicles once, Job three times, Psalms seventeen, Proverbs once, Isaiah fifteen times, Amos once, Habakkuk five times, and Jonah three. עָנִי and the verb from which it is derived עָנָה. This is not exactly accurate. Jeremiah uses the verb עָנָה in its usual meaning of answering frequently, vii. 13, 27; xi. 5; xiv. 7; xxiii. 35, 37; xxx. 3; xxv. 17; xlii. 4; xlv. 20: and the derivatives from it in that sense, עָנָה fourteen times, עָנָה eleven times. He also uses עָנָה in the intensive sense of shouting, xxv. 30; xi. 14. But what is more to our purpose is, that once at least he uses the derivation עָנִי, poor, miserable, xxii. 16, from עָנָה in the sense of being bowed-down, oppressed. He thus at least recognizes the root of עָנִי, and if in only one single verse of his prophecies we find עָנִי, miserable, shall we be surprised that in only one part of his writings we find עָנִי, affliction? Besides, this word also, according to Rule 4, p. 30, cannot be regarded as a test of authorship. See Gen. xvi. 11; xxix. 32; xxxi. 42; xli. 52; Ex. iii. 7, 17; iv. 31; Deut. xvi. 3; xxvi. 7; Isa. xlvi. 10, and other books of the older Scriptures. שֹׁנֵם. This word may be regarded as quite characteristic of Jeremiah; for he uses it in so many of its forms: in Kal pret. ii. 12; ful. xviii. 16; xix. 8; xlix. 17; l. 13; in Niphal pret. iv. 9; xii. 11; part. xxxiii. 10; in Hiphil pret. x. 25; ful. xlix. 20. Why then may he not also use it in Kal participle (see Rule 5, p. 31), especially since he had before him the examples of 2 Sam. xiii. 20; Isa. xlix. 8, 19; liv. 1; lxi. 4 bis, and since his cotemporary Ezekiel twice used this participial form, xxxvi. 3, 4? (See Rule 4, p. 30). גָּנָה. Jeremiah uses the derivative גָּנָה, viii. 18; xx. 18; xxxi. 13; xlv. 3; and was familiar with the verb (Rule 4, p. 30) in Isa. li. 23; Job xix. 2 and his cotemporary Zephaniah iii. 18. אָנַח. See Joel i. 18; Ex. ii. 23; Prov. xxix. 2, which passages may have been in his mind (see Rule 3, p. 30). See the word also (Rule 4, p. 30) in Isa. xxiv. 7; Ez. ix. 4; xxi. 11 bis, 12. נָח. נָח is used three times, the first time as the initial word of ii. 7, when the mind of the writer would be going out in search of a suitable word, and not following the unconscious flow of thought and expression; see Rule 6, p. 31. Having used it once, it would readily occur to him again, when the sense suited; and it may be observed that the second time it is used, it stands as an initial word, iii. 17, just where an unusual word would be expected, although the initial letter of its root is not there required. How familiar it was to the dialect of his times (Rule 4, p. 30) may be judged from Hosea viii. 3, 5 and its occurrence in many Psalms and in the Chronicles. הָנַח here again we have a word first appearing as an initial, i. 8, and once repeated, iii. 39, to which the remarks made on last word will apply. It might be said that הָנַח, which is used in the prophecies, would have afforded the proper initial letter. הָנַח may have been preferred for its brevity, and as a matter of taste on account of הָנַח immediately following. Its frequent occurrence in the Pentateuch and its use by Amos and Isaiah would meet the requirements of Rule 4. As there is an acknowledged mistake in the K'thib iii. 39, it is not impossible that the correct reading there is הָנַח instead of the accepted K'ri. בָּחַר. Jeremiah in his prophecies uses הָבַח only three times and then in an abstract sense, iii. 19; xii. 10; xxv. 34. The use of בָּחַח in Joel iv. 5; Cant. v. 16; Hos. ix. 6, 16, seems to designate that word as better chosen for the idea meant to be expressed. See Rule 4 above. בָּלַע, here again we have a word first occurring as an initial ii. 2, where the Poet is deliberately choosing the best and most forcible word for his purpose and not writing unconstrainedly. The Prophet once uses the verb in the Kal, li. 34. May he not then use it in the Piel, when that form is better suited to his purpose, especially since Habakkuk and Isaiah and older writers set him the example?

לֹא חָמַל, ii. 2, 17. Because Jeremiah once said לֹא נָחַם, xx. 16, and once לֹא נִחַתִּי, iv. 28, are we to assume that he could not twice say לֹא חָמַל? The argument is not only worthless, it is truthless, for Jeremiah does say, xiii. 14, לֹא אֶחְמֹל, and xxi. 7, לֹא יִחְמַל, besides often using the word חָמַל. We claim this phrase, therefore, as distinctively characteristic of Jeremiah. יִזְרְקוּ עֵפֶר, dust, ii. 10. Could not Jeremiah repeat a word made classical in Job ii. 12, יִזְרְקוּ עֵפֶר, and write עַל-רֹאשָׁם, and write הֵעֵלֵי עֵפֶר עַל-רֹאשָׁם? See Rule 3, p. 30. But it so happens that Jeremiah in his prophecies has no occasion to use an equivalent word, he does not speak of the dust, and therefore according to Rule 2, p. 29, this is no indication of his habit of speech. עָטַף. This word occurs only in Genesis, Job, Psalms, Isaiah, Jonah and Lam. The Niphal form is found only in Lam. ii. 11, the Kal. part. plural, in Gen. xxx. 42, Lam. ii. 19, the Hithpael in Jon. ii. 8, Lam. ii. 12. We can imagine no valid reason why Jeremiah might not have used it. הָזִיק, which occurs twice in ii. 14, is not found in the prophecies of Jeremiah, but its derivative הִזִּיק is, Jer. xiv. 14, xxiii. 16. It is used by Isaiah often, by Amos, Micah, Habakkuk and Ezekiel, and is also found in the Pentateuch, in Job, Psalms and Proverbs. See Rule 4, p. 30. פָּצַח occurs twice, ii. 16, iii. 46, both times as an initial word. See Rule 6, p. 31, and with the same connecting words. If the word does not occur in the prophecies of Jeremiah, neither is the same idea exactly expressed. Hence they contain no equivalent for this expression of opening the mouth against one. See Rule 2, p. 29. We have the same words in Ps. xxii. 14. פָּצַח with פֶּה is used Gen. iv. 11; Deut. xi. 6; Num. xvi. 30. See the word also in Jud. xi. 35, 36; Job xxxv. 16; Isa. x. 14; Ez. ii. 8; Ps. lxvi. 14; cxliv. 10, 11. Rule 4, p. 30. חָשֶׁךְ. Jeremiah in his prophecies seems to have had occasion to use a substantive for darkness only three times; and each time he used a different one, xiii. 16, עֲרַבְל; xxiii. 12, אֲפֵלָה; ii. 31, כְּאֲפֵלְיָה. It cannot be said, therefore, that any one of these words was characteristic of his style, but on the contrary, the choice of a new word, so far as the evidence goes, is characteristic of his style. Besides, he uses the verb חָשַׁךְ, and was familiar with the noun in the sacred Scriptures. See Rule 4. Nor is it improbable, as NÆGELSBACH himself suggests, that the words חָשַׁךְ וְלֹא אֹר, in Am. v. 18, 20; Job xii. 25, were in his mind. See Rule 3, p. 30. גִּינֵה. Jeremiah did not use this word in the prophecies, because he had no occasion to do so. In that book there is no equivalent for it. See Rule 2, p. 29. He found the word ready for him when he wanted it, in Job, Psalms, Isaiah and Habakkuk. See Rule 4. יָחַל. See again Rule 4.

נִשְׂאָה פְּנֵי. This phrase is frequent elsewhere, as Dr. NÆGELSBACH allows. See Rule 4. And observe, moreover, how the use of the expression is induced by the poetry. The initial word of the verse, iv. 16, is בְּנִי, this is repeated in the second member to mark the parallelism. The whole construction of the verse is verbally artful, and should we grant that the phrase is not idiomatic with Jeremiah, we could still account for his use of it in this particular passage. לְכוּ. This is simply a rare form that might be adopted by Jeremiah, as well as another. See Gen. ix. 26, 27; Isa. xlv. 15; liii. 8; Ps. xxviii. 8. וְ rel. The use of this prefix is characteristic of Ecclesiastes and the Canticles, yet if Solomon was the author of those books, and also of the Proverbs and the seventy-second Psalm, he could at pleasure drop this peculiarity. Why then may not Jeremiah be allowed to use the abbreviated relative four times in the Lamentations, without impeaching his title to its authorship? "The occurrence of אֲשֶׁר in Judg. v. 27 casts no suspicion on the genuineness of that verse, though וְ is used elsewhere in the Song of Deborah, ver. 7. Nor, on the other hand, does a single וְ, where אֲשֶׁר is the prevailing form, discredit Gen. vi. 3, or Job xix. 29" (LANGE'S Song of Sol. Introd. § 1, Dr. GREEN'S note). The constant tendency to rhythm, at least the terseness of style, is sufficient for the adoption of a form here, which the less compressed poetry of the Prophecies did not require. The abbreviations 'gan and 'miss both occurring near the beginning of Venus and Adonis, constitute no ground on which to rest an argument with reference to the author of that poem. See Rule 6, p. 31. Finally, בְּקֶרֶב without a suffix. This happens once in the Lamentations, iii. 45. The same thing happens elsewhere in the Old Testament sixty-one times, in Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, 1 Samuel, 1 Kings, Psalms, Proverbs, Isaiah, Joel, Amos, Micah and Habakkuk; and Jeremiah himself is once imprudent enough to use בְּקֶרֶב, vi. 1, without a suffix.—The conclusion to which we are forced, after this too patient examination is, that the phraseology of the Lamentations is beyond all doubt compatible with the tradition that Jeremiah the Prophet was their author.

On the other hand, there are striking verbal analogies between the book of the Prophecies of Jeremiah and the Book of Lamentations, sufficient of themselves to convince us, that the two Books are the productions of one author. What has been remarked of Jeremiah's writings generally is found to be true of the Lamentations also,—“his language abounds in Aramaic forms, loses sight of the fine grammatical distinctions of the earlier Hebrews, includes many words not found in its vocabulary (EICHORN, Einkl. in das A. T., III. 121),” (SMITH'S Bib. Dict., art. Jeremiah). CARL FRIEDRICH KEIL, in his Introduction to the Old Testament, gives us the following specimens, by way of example, of characteristic words and phrases common to both books. “כִּינִירִי” כִּינִירִי, ii. 22, compare with כִּינֹר כִּינִירִי, Jer. vi. 25; xx. 3, 10; xlv. 5; xlix. 29; the frequent use of שָׁבַר and שָׁבַר בַּת-עַמִּי, ii. 11, 13; iii. 47, 48; iv. 10, compared with Jer. iv. 6, 20; vi. 1, 14;

viii. 11, 21; xiv. 17; xxx. 12, etc.; יָרַר כִּי־ס, or יָרַר רִמְיָהוּ, i. 16; ii. 11, 18; iii. 48, 49, compared with Jer. viii. 23; ix. 17; xiii. 17; xiv. 17. Compare in full such passages as iii. 14, and Jer. xx. 7: iii. 15, and Jer. ix. 14; xxiii. 15: iii. 47, and Jer. xlvi. 43: iii. 52, and Jer. xvi. 16: iv. 21, and Jer. xxv. 15, 27: and i. 8, 9, and Jer. xiii. 21, 26. Besides, only a few peculiar words occur as נִשְׁקָר, i. 14; יָעִיב, ii. 1; שָׁתָם, iii. 8; כָּפַשׁ, iii. 16; צָפַר, iv. 8; הֶאֱלָח, and כִּנְיַת-לֵב, iii. 65; and peculiar forms of words, as מִשְׁכָּת, i. 7; כְּרִיחִים, ii. 14; פּוֹיָה, ii. 18; iii. 49, etc." (Einleit., § 127, S. 379). We need only refer to Dr. NÆGELSBACH's own Commentary for abounding evidences of coincidences in the use of language in the two books. He makes incessant reference to Jeremiah for the explanation of words and phrases. He often, too, with a generous and honorable frankness that we respect and admire, acknowledges that peculiar words and phrases found in Lamentations, occur also in Jeremiah, and sometimes in no other Hebrew writer. Since, then, it is conceded that much of the language of this book is characteristic of the writings of Jeremiah, and since we have shown above, that words and phrases used in this Book, and not found in Jeremiah's Prophecies, are not so numerous and of such a character as to render it incredible that Jeremiah wrote this Book, it is not necessary to delay the reader longer, but leave the further development of this argument to the following Commentary.

THE

LAMENTATIONS OF JEREMIAH.

CHAPTER I.

LAMENTATION OF THE DAUGHTER OF ZION OVER THE RUIN OF JERUSALEM AND JUDAH [OR RATHER, THE LAMENTATION OF THE DAUGHTER OF JERUSALEM OVER THE DESTRUCTION OF THE CITY, THE NATION AND THE TEMPLE.—W. II. II.].

[The song is naturally divided into two parts of equal length. Vers. 1-11 describe the wretched condition of the city. Vers. 12-22 are, more strictly, the lamentation over this condition. In both sections the speaker is the ideal person of the genius or daughter of the city, who twice, vers. 9, 11, interrupts the description of the first section, which is given in the third person, with an outcry of pain uttered in the first person.—W. II. II.]

I. VERS. 1-11.

- ⌘ VER. 1. How sitteth solitary
The city that was full of people!
She is become as a widow!
She that was great among the nations,
A Princess over the Provinces,—
Is become tributary.
- ⌘ VER. 2. Bitterly she weepeth in the night,
And her tears are [constantly] upon her cheeks.
She hath no comforter
From among all her lovers:
All her friends have dealt treacherously with her,
They have become her enemies.
- ⌘ VER. 3. Judah is gone into exile,
From oppression and from heavy bondage.
She dwelleth among the heathen:
She hath not found rest:
All her pursuers have overtaken her
Amidst her straits.
- ⌘ VER. 4. The ways to Zion are mournful
Because none come to her appointed services.
All her gates are destroyed.
Her priests sigh:
Her virgins are sorrowful:
And she, herself,—is in bitterness!
- ⌘ VER. 5. Her adversaries are exalted,
Her enemies prosper.
For Jehovah hath afflicted her
For the greatness of her sins.
Her young children are gone captives
Before the adversary.

- 1 VER. 6. And departed from the daughter of Zion
 Is all her beauty.
 Her princes have become like harts
 That find no pasture,
 And go, without strength,
 Before the pursuer.
- 2 VER. 7. Jerusalem remembers, in the days of her tribulation and of her wanderings,
 All her pleasant things that she had in the days of old.
 When her people fall by the hand of the adversary
 And there is no helper for her,—
 Her adversaries behold her—
 They mock at her Sabbaths !
- 3 VER. 8. Jerusalem has grievously sinned ;
 Therefore is she become vile.
 All, who honoured her, despise her,
 For they see her nakedness.
 Yea, she herself sigheth
 And turneth backward.
- 4 VER. 9. Her filthiness is on her skirts.
 She considered not her end,
 Therefore she came down wonderfully
 She has no comforter.
 Behold, O Jehovah, my affliction,
 For the enemy magnifieth himself.
- 5 VER. 10. His hand has the oppressor stretched out Over all her precious things :
 For she saw heathen
 Come into her sanctuary :
 Of whom Thou didst command
 ‘That they come not into Thy congregation.’
- 6 VER. 11. All her people sigh,
 Seeking for bread ;
 They give their precious things for food
 To sustain life.
 See, Jehovah, and consider How wretched I am become !

ANALYSIS.

The logical construction is preserved, although rendered difficult by the constraint of the alphabetical arrangement of the verses. From ver. 1 to the last clause of ver. 11, the poet speaks. [Rather the poet puts this language into the mouth of a third person, who is revealed to us in vers. 9, 11, and still more plainly in the whole of the second part, vers. 12-22, as the ideal representative of the ruined city.—W. H. H.] Vers. 1, 2 present to us the ideal person of Jerusalem, sharply defining the contrast between what she was and what she is now. Ver. 3 personifies in like manner the tribe of Judah. Vers. 4-6 depict the present condition of Jerusalem in ruins, in the midst of which description the ideal person in her grief is introduced; and also, by way of contrast, her successful foe: the forsaken roads of the city, the broken gates, the mourning priests and virgins, the exiled people, and especially the nobles plunged from splendor into the deepest misery, are the separate features which compose this picture. [The especial subject of this description is not the city, strictly speaking, but Zion, the crown and glory of the city. Around the ideal daughter of Zion all the accessories of the picture are drawn. Jerusalem, herself, is the immediate subject of the following verses.—W. H. H.] Ver. 7 relates again to the ideal Jerusalem and informs us how she remembers with pain her former estate, whilst now suffering bitter mockery from her foes. Vers. 8, 9 declare the cause of the judgment, already indicated in ver. 5, namely, the heinous sin of Israel: in consequence of which sin, heathen, ver. 10, had intruded into the sanctuary of Zion, which was forbidden in the law. Finally, ver. 11, to the last clause, describes the distressing famine of the besieged people. From the last clause of ver. 11 to the end of the chapter, the Poet lets Zion herself speak, as she had already done parenthetically in ver. 9.

VERS. 1, 2.

1 How doth the city sit solitary, that was full of people! how is she become as a widow! She that was great among the nations, and princess among the provinces,
 2 how is she become tributary! She weepeth sore in the night, and her tears are on her cheeks; among all her lovers she hath none to comfort her: all her friends have dealt treacherously with her, they are become her enemies.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1.—בָּרָר, subst., solitariness, is to be regarded as in the accusative. See iii. 23; Lev. xliii. 46; Jer. xv. 17; xlix. 31, לָבָרָר, Num. xxiii. 9; Mic. vii. 14.—רַבְתִּי. The ׀ is archaic. See OLSH., §123. d. [In שָׂרָתָה also. The paragogic ׀ was, originally, perhaps, a mark of the genitive, as the corresponding letter in Arabic. Occurs in poetry and in compound names, as אֲדֹנָי־בְּנֹק, בְּלִכְי־עֲדָק. HENDERSON.] The archaic ׀, not infrequent in Jeremiah, x. 17 (K'tib); xxii. 23; xlix. 16; li. 13. Yet this particular word occurs only here.—רַב, great, in the qualitative sense, not merely multus, but also magnus, potens, great, powerful, occurs often; Ps. xlviii. 3; Is. lxviii. 1; lvi. 12; Jer. xli. 1. See רֵב טַבְּחַיִּים, et sim., and רַבָּה, the metropolis of the Ammonites. The phrase רַב בְּנוֹיִם occurs only here. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (1) p. 29.]—The ׀ after שָׂרָתָה indicates the object over which the Princess rules. See FERST. [BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, translate over, instead of among.]—שָׂרָה is synonymous with רַבָּה, e.g., שָׂר טַבְּחַיִּים, Gen. xxxvii. 36; xxxix. 1, et al., and שָׂר כְּרִיכִים, Dan. i. 7, 9, et al. are synonymous with טָרַח וְרַב טָרַח. The sing. שָׂרָה excepting as the proper name Sarah, occurs only here. Plural in Judges v. 29; Is. xlix. 23; 1 Kings xi. 3; Esth. i. 18, shows that it is an old word and in earlier times peculiar to poetry. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (2) p. 29.]—כְּרִינָה, province, satrapy, in sing. occurs only in books of Ezra (ii. 1), Nehemiah (i. 3; vii. 6; xi. 3), Ecclesiastes (v. 7), Daniel (viii. 2; xi. 24), and especially Esther (i. 1, 22; iii. 12, 14, et c.) in plu. in Esth. i. 3; viii. 9; ix. 3, 4, 16; Ezek. xix. 8; 1 Kings xx. 14, 15, 17, 19 [not 2 Kings xx. 19, a mistake of FERST copied by NAEGELSBACH], Eccles. ii. 8. Its use in Ezekiel and Kings shows that it was not unknown in the time of Jeremiah. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (2) p. 30.]—כָּסַח. W. ROBERTSON, Key to Heb. Bib., derives from כָּסַח, to melt, dissolve, "a consuming of strength, virtutem dissolutio et confectio." FERST. from same verb taken in a secondary signification, to split, divide, separate, und v., hence metaph. to number, measure, distribute. The only evidence of such a secondary signification of the verb is in the derivatives themselves, כָּסַח and כָּסַחָה. The old quaint idea seems better. "כָּסַח from כָּבַח, because it doth melt and dissolve, as it were, the substance of those who are forced to be tributaries." GESenius says this is not "tolerabile," and derives from כָּסַח to number. But there is a word already from that root, כָּסַחָה, meaning tribute in the strict sense, while כָּסַח means any sort of tribute-service or bond-service (see crit. notes below), having a sense that cannot be extracted from a verb signifying to number.—W. II. II.]

Ver. 2.—בָּכּוּ תִבְכֶּהָ. The infinitive construct before a finite verb expresses intensity, after it continuity. She weepeth sore or sorely, BROUGHTON, E. V., BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, or bitterly, NOYES, not continually, as old Eng. vers., DIODATI, FRENCH vers., WORDSWORTH, and NAEGELSBACH.—W. II. II.]—לְחָיִי never occurs in Jeremiah. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (2) p. 30.]—Jeremiah uses the Piel נָחַם, xvi. 7; xxxi. 13; but not the phrase אֵין כְּנֶהֱמָה occurring in this chapter four times, and elsewhere only in Eccl. iv. 1. [See Intr., Add. Rem. (3) p. 30.]—Jeremiah uses אֲרִבְרִיָה xx. 4, 6; רָעֵי xxix. 23; v. 8; vii. 5, et c.; בְּנֵי iii. 8, 11, 20; v. 11; xii. 6, et c.; אֲיָב, frequently, vi. 25; xv. 11; xviii. 17, et c.—הָיָה לְאִיכִים—occurs elsewhere only in Ps. cxxxix. 22.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. How, אֵיךָה. The second and fourth chapters also begin with this word. It is used by Jeremiah (viii. 8; xlvi. 17), and not seldom in Deuteronomy (i. 12; vi. 17; xii. 30; xviii. 21). In Isaiah it occurs once, i. 21, a passage which seems to have been in our Poet's mind. There, as here, the ideal person of Jerusalem, i. e., of the city of Jerusalem (in distinction from the tribe of Judah, to which ver. 3 relates), is the subject. The personification is apparent: 1. From the expression, sits solitary. 2. From the words, as a widow. The comparison with a person shows that the subject of comparison is regarded as a person. 3. The singular forms in ver. 2, she weeps, her tears, her cheeks, et c., as certainly indicate a personification, as the plural forms would prove a reference to the concrete multitude of the exiles. The Poet then has in his eye, not, perhaps, the collective person of the exiled people, but the ideal person of the city of Jerusalem, now ruined. This person he sees in the spirit, sitting solitary amidst the devastated holy places.—Doth the city sit solitary. Solitary, because she has lost her inhabitants, her children. This is evident from the antithesis,—the city that was full of people. [NOYES: "There are several Roman coins extant, representing on the one side the emperor Vespasian, and on the other a woman (the daughter of Zion) sitting upon the ground under a palm tree, in a mournful attitude, and having around her a heap of arms, shields, et c. The legend is JUDEA CAPTA—Judea taken."]—That was full of people! In regard to sense and construction, see Jer. li. 13; 1 Sam. ii. 5. [HENDERSON: "It is impossible to determine what was the extent of the population of ancient Jerusalem. Before the revolt under Rehoboam it must have been very great, especially during the celebration of the three annual festivals, when the males congregated there from all parts of the country: and even after that event, there is reason to believe that, as the metropolis of the southern kingdom, the number of inhabitants was considerable. It not only continued to be the resort of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, but was one of the principal mercantile cities of the East.”—How. [The repetition of the How in the second and the last clauses of the verse, as in our English version, is not only unnecessary, but mars the rhythmical construction and interrupts the consecutive flow of thought. There is no more propriety in its repetition in ver. 1, than there would be in ver. 2, which in form and matter is a continuation of ver. 1. The particle, as used in the beginning of the verse, is ejaculatory, not interrogative. It rouses and directs attention, with fine poetical effect, to the image of the ideal Jerusalem, once representing a city full of people, now seen as a dejected woman, sitting solitary, as in the deepest grief. The attention thus gained, the description goes on to the end of ver. 2, adding feature to feature, and circumstance to circumstance, with admirable art and graphic power, till the picture is complete.—W. H. H.]—Is she—she is become as a widow! In Is. i. 21, the faithful city has become a harlot. Here, where we have a poem not of invective and denunciation, but of lamentation, the populous city has become as a widow. For she is no longer (בְּעִלְיָהּ) a married one, since she no longer enjoys communion with Jehovah, her Husband (בְּעַלָּהּ). See DELITZSCH on Isaiah liv. 1 sqq.). She is a woman forsaken (Is. liv. 6), and the reproach of widowhood (Is. liv. 6) rests upon her. The expression as a widow (בְּאַלְמָנָהּ, as one forsaken, widowed) implies that Jerusalem has not lost her husband utterly and forever, but she is only separated from him for a period. There is in the particle as a foreshadowing of reunion. See the expression as widows in v. 3.—She that was great among the nations. [Dr. NÆGELSBACH’S punctuation, which is the punctuation also of the Sept., Vulg., and some more modern versions, requires us to connect these words with the preceding declaration. She is become as a widow, the great one (Die Grosse) among the nations. This is, however, in violation of the masoretic punctuation, and does not seem to strengthen the meaning that Dr. N. derives from the expression as a widow. See critical notes below. Nor is there a necessary antithesis between being as a widow and having been great among the nations. If we adopt the punctuation of the Sept. and Vulg., we should adopt the translation in full of one or the other of those versions, both of which do preserve an antithesis. The Sept. reads She is become as a widow, i. e., a lone, forsaken woman, who was filled with nations. The Vulg. reads, She the lady of nations became as a widow. The punctuation in our present Hebrew Bibles, which is retained by our English version, BROUGHTON, GATTAKER, NOYES, and GERLACH, certainly makes the sense clearer and the thoughts more copious. The city sits solitary that was full of people! She is become as a widow! She that was great among the nations. . . . is become tributary.—W. H. H.]—And princess among the provinces. That not only Israelitish, but foreign provinces also, were at times governed by Jerusalem, is sufficiently established in history. [See David’s conquests and sovereignty over the neighboring states, 2 Sam. viii. 1-4; x. 6-19; the extent of Solomon’s dominions, 1 Kings iv. 21, 24; 2 Chron. ix. 23, 24; the power of Judah in the reign of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xvii. 10, 11, and in that of Uzziah, 2 Chron. xxvi. 6-8. See also Ezra iv. 20, “There have been mighty kings also over Jerusalem, which have ruled over all countries beyond the river; and toll, tribute, and custom, was paid unto them.”—W. H. H.]—How is she become—is become. [See remarks on How above.]—Tributary. [“Obliged to pay tribute-service. This is the common meaning of the word.” NOYES.]

יְשֵׁבָה כָּרָד, sitteth solitary. This cannot mean dwelleth alone. For the isolated location of the city could be no misfortune, since contact with heathen neighbors was forbidden as injurious. (See Num. xxiii. 9; Lev. xx. 24, 26; Deut. xxxiii. 23; Ex. xxiii. 31-33; Judg. ii., iii.) Nor can יְשֵׁבָה have the sense of situation, place of location, for יָשָׁב never has that sense in the Hebrew. See GESEN., Theo. In Ps. cxxii. 5; cxxv. 1; Zech. ii. 8; xii. 6; xiv. 10 it has either the active signification of inhabiting, or the passive of being inhabited (see Jer. xvii. 6, 25; xxx. 18; 1. 13, 39, et al.). That this last named passive signification does not suit here is evident from the contradiction involved by the words solitary and as a widow. We can only translate How sits solitary the city. [FUERST, Lcx., “יָשָׁב, to sit, as an expression of being bowed down, struck down and forsaken, with לָאֲרִין, Is. iii. 26; Job ii. 13; עַל-עֵפֶר, Is. xlvi. 1; כָּרָד, Lam. i. 1; iii. 28; כְּשֹׁמֵם, Ezr. ix. 3; אֲלֻמָּנָה, Gen. xxxviii. 11; Is. xlvii. 8.”] רַבְּתַי It is probable that the form רַבְּתַי, in the kindred passage, Is. i. 21, influenced the choice of the form of the word here.—בְּאַלְמָנָהּ, as a widow. In antithesis to עַם רַבְּתַי, full of people, רַבְּתַי, bereaved of children, childless, would be first suggested: but this word occurs only once, Is. xlix. 21. עֲקָרָה, also, occurs once only (in connection with אֲלֻמָּנָה, Jer. xviii. 21. עֲקָרָה is the barren woman, מְעַקְרָה or מְשַׁקְלָת is abortum faciens, Ex. xxxiii. 26; 2 Kings ii. 19, 21, or infanticida, Ez. xxxvi. 13. אֲלֻמָּנָה suits admirably, in that it involves the impossibility of bearing children in the future. And that is what the Poet would say. Jerusalem is placed in a condition in which it is impossible for her to become a mother of children, Ps. cxiii. 9. The other feature, that she is also a widow robbed of the children already born to her, is further brought out in what follows. I do not believe, therefore, that Jerusalem is here called a widow, because she is bereaved “of king and princes, and the protection and guidance of rulers,” as VITRINGA and others after him (lately ENGELHARDT), appealing to Is. xlvii. 8, have been inclined to think. Besides that, בְּאַלְמָנָהּ is not synonymous with לֵא, RASCHI has already remarked. Compare לָכֵס at the close of this verse, and לְיוֹנָה, Is. i. 21. The word אֲלֻמָּנָה is often found in Jeremiah, vii. 6;

xv. 8; xviii. 21; xxii. 3. [HENDERSON is too positive when he says, "The כּ in כּפֹלְכֵנָה is simply that of comparison, and is not intended to express any hope that she would be restored from her widowed state, as JARONI fancifully supposes." Comparison is not assertion: a thing is not what it is compared with. If כּ then does simply indicate a comparison, yet it leaves a possibility, and hence a hope of restoration from a widowed state; and there is certainly more than a 'fanciful' distinction between being a widow, לֹא־לִכְנָה, and being like one, כּפֹלְכֵנָה.—W. H. II.]

—הִיָּתָה לְכַנָּה, has become tributary. The expression is found in Genesis (xlix. 15) and in Dentonomy (xx. 11); and is especially frequent in 1 Kings (v. 27, 28; ix. 15, 21) and in Judges (i. 23, 30, 33, 35). It is also found in Isaiah (xxxi. 8). The etymology and fundamental meaning are not quite certain. At all the places cited the word indicates bond-service, or rather, collectively, services (see עֵבֶר, כֶּסֶף עֵבֶר, Gen. xlix. 15; Josh. xvi. 10; 1 Kings ix. 21). It first occurs in the sense of tributum, a money tax, very late, Esth. x. 1. It is, however, unimportant whether we take the word in our text in the one sense or the other. Nor can we from this word determine the exact period of time, as J. D. MICHAELIS would do, when he says: "Therefore she is still standing, but has become tributary. This first happened under the Egyptians" (he has here in mind evidently 2 Kings xxiii. 33). "To what time then is this to be referred,—to that of the clegy on Josiah, or to that of a later period?" If Jerusalem was no longer standing, and not a human soul dwelt there, yet the place on which the ruins of Jerusalem remained had become, with the whole land, a part of the territory subjected to the Chaldeans.

Ver. 2. She weepeth sore in the night.—She weeps and weeps the night throughout. [This translation is beautiful and expository, but for grammatical reasons the E. V. is to be preferred. See the Gramm. Notes.—W. H. II.] The sorrowing widow weeps in the night. Not in the night-time only, in distinction from day-time,—nor, as EWALD prefers, 'until the night.' For why should she not weep during the night also? Precisely this is the meaning of the poet. She weeps in the night, but not only a part of the night, for that were nothing wonderful, but so that her weeping fills up the time which is usually spent otherwise. So is בְּלַיְלָהּ to be understood in Num. xiv. 1, "and the people wept that night." See Jer. vi. 5; xxxvi. 30, et al. [HENDERSON: "To express the more aggravated character of the weeping, it is represented as indulged in even during the night—the period of rest and quiet."]—And her tears are on her cheeks. 'Tears, Jer. viii. 23; ix. 17, et al. The absence of a predicate index, which renders the supplement of the copula 'are' necessary, gives the idea evidently that the tears on her cheeks are constantly there, have fixed there, as it were, their permanent place. [HENRY: "Nothing dries away sooner than a tear, yet fresh griefs extort fresh tears, so that her cheeks are never free from them."]—Among all her lovers she hath none to comfort her.—She has no comforter.—[That this phrase has an important meaning is to be inferred by its recurrence four times in this chapter (vers. ii. 9; xvii. 21; see also ver. 16), and from its being an unusual form, occurring elsewhere only in Eccl. iv. 1. It can have no common-place meaning. It refers indirectly to the loss of the Comforter—their God.—W. H. II.]—All her friends have dealt treacherously with her, they are become her enemies. The words lovers and friends indicate the human supports on which Jerusalem foolishly and presumptuously believed she could rely, especially all those nations whose friendship she had so often preferred, instead of trusting in Jehovah. See ver. 19; Jer. ii. 13, 18, 33, 36, 37; xxii. 20, 22; Hos. ii. 7 sqq.; Ezek. xxiii. These places show, in harmony with history, that the nations toward which Israel felt itself drawn in amorous love, but by which at last they were not only deserted, but treated with even positive hostility, were especially Assyria, Babylon and Egypt. With reference to Egypt, see particularly Ezek. xxix. 6, 7, 16. See EWALD in loc. [HENDERSON: "The lovers and friends were those neighboring states which were allies of the Hebrews,—and their idol-gods, which they worshipped, and in which they trusted. Egypt especially was the object of their confidence, but not even she durst venture to come to their help against the Chaldeans. Those in the more immediate vicinity actually joined the northern enemy on his irruption into the country. 2 Kings xxiv. 2."]

I. 3.

3 Judah is gone into captivity, because of affliction, and because of great servitude; she dwelleth among the heathen, she findeth no rest: all her persecutors overtook her between the straits.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3.—גִּלְתָּה, see Jer. i. 3.—נָנִי, found in Lam. i. 3, 7, 9; iii. 1, 19, does not occur in Jeremiah; yet Isaiah uses it xlviii. 10; occurs also in Pentateuch; Gen. xvi. 11; xxix. 32; xxxi. 42; Ex. iii. 7; Deut. xvi. 3; xxvi. 7, etc.; in Psalms ix. 14; xxv. 18; xxxi. 8, and in other writings of earlier origin than Lam.—כָּרַב is found in Is. vi. 22; xxiv. 22; Nah. iii. 4, et al.; Jeremiah says אֶלְרַב, xxx. 14, 15, or בָּרַב, xlii. 22.—עִבְרָה, does not occur in Jeremiah, yet frequently in Penta-teach, and in Is. xiv. 3; xxxii. 17; xxviii. 21.—כָּנָוֹחַ occurs Gen. viii. 9; Deut. xxviii. 65; Is. xxxiv. 14, is not used by Jeremiah; he uses כָּנָוֹחַ, xlv. 3. [See Intr. Add. R. (4). p. 33. (6). p. 31.]—עָצַר occurs in Jer. xlii. 16 (see also xxxix. 5; lii. 8.)

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 3. The tribe of Judah is the subject here, as the city of Jerusalem was in vers. 1, 2, and is conceived of similarly as an ideal person.—Judah is gone into captivity, because of affliction and because of great servitude. Into exile is Judah gone from oppression and severe servitude. It has been correctly remarked that from oppression and from hard servitude cannot refer to the involuntary exile of Judah, since it is added she findeth no rest. For who may expect rest for a people carried into captivity? But voluntary fugitives might hope to find rest. Of such voluntary exiles, Jeremiah speaks in xl. 11, 12, and from Jer. xliii. 4-7 we learn that all these finally agreed together to seek rest in Egypt. That they found no rest there exactly agrees with what the prophet had declared, xlii. 13-22, to the people stubbornly persisting in the flight to Egypt. When the Poet speaks here of Judah as a fugitive, seeking rest and finding none, the reason for his doing so may be surmised from the fact that he himself belonged to that part of the people that were living in exile. We may suppose, also, that he regarded this part of the nation as a representative of the whole nation, because they consisted of people who were at least free. It is much like saying,—Judah is no longer with those who have become mixed with a foreign people as slaves. If it yet survive, it survives in a voluntary exile, where, notwithstanding its distressed state and reduced numbers, it still retains at least its personal liberty. [BLAYNEY: "Our translators, who have rendered, Judah is gone into captivity because of affliction and because of great servitude, seem to have adopted the notion of the Chaldee Paraphrast, who represents the Jews to have been carried into captivity in retaliation of their having oppressed the widow and the fatherless among them, and prolonged illegally the bondage of their brethren who had been sold them for slaves." HENDERSON adopts this view, that Judah is here represented as suffering captivity on account of, or because of her oppressing and cruelly enslaving her own people, see Jer. xxxiv. But the other view, that Judah sought by voluntary exile to escape the oppression and enslavement of the Chaldeans, is recommended by the reasons given above, and is adopted by BLAYNEY,

C. B. and J. D. MICHAELIS, BOOTHROYD and NOYES. HOUBIGANT, quoted approvingly by BOOTHROYD in his Heb. Bib., connects the words "from oppression and hard servitude" with the words "she findeth no rest," an obvious and awkward attempt to escape the difficulty of the supposed causal sense of כָּנָוֹחַ. HUGH BROUGHTON translates Judah leaveth country after affliction and much bondage.—W. H. H.]—[She dwelleth among the heathen, lit., nations, i. e., the heathen nations. The word dwelleth conveys an idea of a settled permanent abode, not required by the Hebrew, עָצַר. The German, sitzet, which NÆGELSBACH uses, is better (see ver. 1). The fugitive, fleeing before her pursuers, finds at last a place among the heathen, where she sits down in hoped-for security: but in vain; her pursuers overtake her, as the hart is found by the hunter, in the straits or defiles of the mountain, from which there is no escape. See ver. 6, they flee like harts before the pursuer.—W. H. H.]—She findeth no rest: all her persecutors, pursuers, in antithesis to all her lovers and all her friends in ver. 2 (see i. 6; iv. 19; Jer. xv. 15; xvii. 18; xx. 11) overtook her between the straits. עָצַר (Sing. עָצַר) occurs, besides here, only Ps. cxvi. 3; cxviii. 5. It can mean neither ἐπιβουτεῖς (so Sept., which erroneously takes it for a participle), nor termini, ὀπισθοποῖ (so Chald., Venetian Greek, et al.). It means angustie, narrow defiles from which there is no outlet. The figure is taken from the chase. See the German phrase, "in die Engen treiben," "to drive one into straits." [W. ROBERTSON: "עָצַר, a straight, or a straightening distress." FUERST: "to take one in the straits, i. e., to get one at last into our power, a proverbial phrase." The present use of the English word straits (as 'reduced to straits,' 'in great straits') explains the sense here, but does not justify the translation, overtook her between the straits.—W. H. H.] The fugitive Judah sits indeed in the midst of a heathenish people, but has found there no rest. She would flee still further, were it possible. But whither could the Jews, with their wives, their children, and all their goods, have fled beyond the desert-surrounded Egypt? They dwelt there, it is true, but they dwelt amidst straits. All their pursuers (and that there were enough of them in Egypt, old and new, is evident from Jer. xlv. 12, 18, 26 sqq.) could reach them there.

I. 4-6.

- 4 The ways of Zion do mourn, because none come to the solemn feasts: all her gates are desolate; her priests sigh, her virgins are afflicted, and she is in bitterness.
- 5 Her adversaries are the chief, her enemies prosper; for the LORD hath afflicted her for the multitude of her transgressions: her children are gone into captivity before the enemy.
- 6 And from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed: her princes are become like harts that find no pasture; and they are gone without strength before the pursuer.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 4.—אֲבֵל־אֲבֵל, adj. mournful [not desert, waste, devastated, as FUERNST says, which destroys the beautiful personification —W. H. H.], occurs Gen. xxxvii. 35; Is. lvii. 18, et al., never in Jeremiah. The verb אֲבֵל he uses, in the same sense as the adjective here (iv. 28; xii. 4, 11; xiv. 2; xxiii. 10) [and also the noun אֲבֵל, vl. 26, et al.—W. H. H.] Isaiah uses the adjective, lvii. 18; lxi. 23.—כִּבְּלֵי־, see Jer. ii. 15; ix. 10, 11.—The expression כָּנַף (see Gen. xxiii. 10, 18) is not found in Jeremiah. כִּוְיָ־ is found in Jeremiah twice, viii. 7; xlvi. 17, both times in the sense of tempus fixum. In the Lamentations the word occurs six times, and always in the sense of a time of feast, a festival, l. 4, 15; ii. 6, 7, 22, or the place of a feast, ii. 6. [It may have here the sense of an appointed time. Ordinary services in the Temple are neglected. None flock to Zion at the usual times of service.—W. H. H.]—The part. שׁוֹכֵם is not in Jeremiah: he uses the part. נִיפֵחַ, xxxiii. 10, and שָׁכַם, xii. 11. The plur. ending יָ־ (see iv. 3, K'tib), is not found in Jeremiah.—The root אָנַח Jeremiah does not use, either in a verbal or a substantive form (see Lam. i. 8, 11, 21).—נִינְוֹת־, see הוֹנָה below.—כָּר־ Jeremiah does use, ii. 19; iv. 18.

Ver. 5.—As shown above, הִיוּ לְרֹאשׁ is a Deuteronomic, שָׁלַף a Jeremic expression. For grammatical form of latter, see OLSH., § 233, b. הוֹנָה never occurs in Jeremiah, but frequently in Lamentations, l. 4, 12; iii. 32, 33: elsewhere, Is. li. 23; Zeph. iii. 18. [Vulgate derives it from הִנָּה, which sometimes means to speak; quia Dominus locutus est super eam; Douay, because the Lord hath spoken against her. But SEPT., SYR. and Versions generally derive it from הִנָּה.—W. H. H.]—עַל־רֹב is entirely Jeremic (see on כָּרַב, ver. 3). פִּשְׁעֵי־ in Jeremiah only once, v. 6.—עִוְרָל־, Jer. xlv. 7; יַעֲרָל־, Jer. vi. 11; ix. 20.—הִלָּךְ שְׁבִי־ is peculiar to this place. שְׁבִי cannot well be an accusative, since to go into exile is always elsewhere expressed by הִלָּךְ בְּשָׁבִי, see ver. 18. [HENDERSON: her children are gone captives before the enemy.]—The sing. צָר, which is frequent in Lam. (i. 7, 10; ii. 4; iv. 12), never occurs in Jeremiah: he uses only the plural (xxx. 16; xlvi. 10) and צָרָה (iv. 31; vi. 24, et al.).

Ver. 6.—זָנָה כִּן־, for forsaken, lost, is peculiar. [HENDERSON: "For כִּן־בַּת the K'ri and some MSS. read more correctly כִּפְתָה. The phrase is also thus quoted in the Rabboth." This best suits the rhythm.—W. H. H.]—הָרָר־ is never found in Jeremiah; nor אָלַל (yet see אֲלָלָה, xiv. 5); nor כָּרְעָה (Jeremiah always says כָּרַעַת, x. 21; xxiii. 1; xxv. 26). We find expressions in Jeremiah analogous to כָּחַ בְּלֹא יוֹעִיל, ii. 11, בְּלֹא יוֹעִיל, v. 7, פָּרָא אֲרֵיחִים, is found in Jeremiah, but only with suffixes, xv. 15; xvii. 18; xx. 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

These verses contain a description of the present condition of the city and people of Jerusalem [or, a new aspect of their condition is presented.—We have here another of those changes which impart to these poems a highly dramatic character. A third personage is introduced,—“the daughter of Zion.” The ideal person here is not that of the city of Jerusalem, formerly in outward splendor and estate a queen among the nations, now fallen and humbled (vers. 1, 2), nor yet that of the tribe of Judah, or of the theocratic people, now a fugitive among the heathen (ver. 3).—but of Zion, formerly the seat of the theocracy, the abode of God, the Temple where Judah and Jerusalem worshipped, now forsaken and despoiled. No longer do the people gather to her appointed solemnities. Silence reigns on Zion, broken only by the sobs of her priests and the moaning of her virgins, a higher evidence than either the ruined city or the exiled people, that the glory was departed from Israel.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 4. The ways of Zion, The way to Zion, those ways which lead to Zion: not the streets of the city, as ROSKNEUMULLER thinks, for the latter are called חַיִּצוֹת (see Hos. vii. 1 with vi. 9), do mourn, are mournful (Prosopopeia, as, e. g., ii. 19; Jer. xiv. 2; xxxiii. 10; Am. i. 2), because none come to the solemn feasts, forsaken by those who used to come to her feasts [because there are none coming to her appointed services. Appointed assemblies, including all occasions of stated worship, whether daily sacrifices or annual festivals, would more correctly interpret the sense than either “feasts,” “solemn feasts,” or “festivals.” —W. H. H.]—All her gates are desolate, destroyed. Concerning the city itself, its gates are destroyed. But ruined gates are the sign of a ruined city. [“Destroyed,” so NARGELSBACH, zerstört, Sept. ἠφανισμένα=razed to the ground, Vulg. destructæ. E. V. and modern Versions generally read desolate. It is the gates of Zion, not the gates of the city of Jerusalem, that are here referred to. Those sacred barriers are removed. The holy place has lost its sanctity. It is open now to the intrusion of any who please to enter. See ver. 10: “She hath seen that the heathen entered into her sanctuary whom Thou didst command that they should not enter into Thy congregation.” What could more forcibly express, in accordance with Jewish ideas, the idea that the theocratic glory had departed from Israel?—W. H. H.]—Her priests sigh: her virgins are afflicted, sorrowful. Two classes of the inhabitants are named,—the priests and the virgins: the former the nobility, the latter the flower and ornament of the nation. The former sigh under heavy oppression; the latter, who formerly rendered every festival attractive, with dances and pastimes (see Jer. xxxi. 13; HEUZ. Real. Encyc., XV., pp. 414, 415), are now sorrowful. It is thus intimated that every possibility of making a joyous festival is gone. See Jer. vii. 34; xvi. 9; xxv. 10; xxxiii. 11; comp. xxx. 19. The Sept. reads, instead of sorrowful, ἀγούμεναι=led away; the translation evidently of נִהְיִיתָ, which either really stood in the text, or was erroneously substituted by the Alexandrian for the rare word נִינְוֹת. EWALD follows the Sept. Incorrectly, it seems to me. נִינְוֹת is sufficiently expressive, if it be taken as an indication of the prevailing grief and in antithesis to the indications of the public rejoicings that existed in former times. [The mention of "the priests" particularly shows that the sacred precincts of Zion, where they ministered, and where "the virgins" went up to the solemn feasts with joy and gladness, are before the Poet's eye. To say that the priests are mentioned because they constituted "the nobility" of the inhabitants of the city, is not only awkward, but untrue. NOYES translates the last clause Her virgins wail: a meaning of the original word not licensed by authority.—W. H. H.]—And she is in bitterness. In these words the whole is summed up. [It is, perhaps, impossible to give in English the exquisite force of the original. NÆGELSBACH nearly reproduces it in German, "Und ihr—ist wehe."—W. H. H.] Here it is evident that the ideal person of Zion is the embodiment of all the particular members and ranks of the community (des volkslebens). [If this were indisputably evident, it would not militate with the fact that Zion represented the religious life as Judah did the political life of the people.—W. H. H.]—This relative conclusion shows that the Poet proposes to pass to something new. In fact, ver. 4 describes the positive sorrows and afflictions of the people: ver. 5, a. b., the good fortune of her enemies as the natural reciprocal effect of the misfortunes of Judah; vers. 5, c., 6, the negative side of the painful experience of the people, namely, the losses they sustained.

Ver. 5. Her adversaries are the chief, lit., have become the head [i. e., her superiors. BLATNEY and NOYES: or, the head over her. BOOTHROUD.] In Deut. xxviii. 13 a promise is made to Israel, if obedient, "and the Lord shall make thee the head and not the tail," and in same chapter, ver. 44, the reverse is threatened, if disobedient. The Poet, without doubt, had these passages in his mind.—Her enemies prosper. The darkness of Israel's sorrows is deepened by the brilliant prosperity of her enemies. The expression occurs in same sense, Jer. xii. 1. See Ps. exxii. 6; Job xii. 6.—For the LORD hath afflicted her for the multitude of her transgressions. This advantage on the part of their enemies had not happened by chance, nor by mere arbitrariness or unrighteousness on the side of God, but by an act of Divine rectitude in the punishment of Israel for their sins. What is professedly made conspicuous in ver. 8 is here anticipated. [Observe, in connection with Zion, as the representative of the religious element of the theocratic idea, in distinction from the national, the name Jehovah is first introduced, and the calamities suffered by the people are first distinctly ascribed to their sins;—the sins especially of priests and ministers of religion, and of hypocrisy, formalism and idolatry on the part of the people.—W. H. H.]—Her children are gone into captivity, her young children are gone captives. From here to end of ver. 6 the Poet describes what Judah has lost. And first, her children. עֲלֵלִים are little children (see ii. 20; iv. 4; Jer. vi. 11; ix. 20). These are compelled as captives to go forth before the oppressor into foreign lands. See Joel iv. 2, 3.—Before the enemy. [The word ad- versary (so BROUGHTON) is preferred to enemy, E. V., because the word in Hebrew is the same as that rendered "adversaries" in the first clause. Oppressor and oppressors might be well substituted.—W. H. H.] What renders this more dreadful is the idea that the little children are torn away from parents and brothers and sisters, to be driven as merchandise by their purchasers, some to one place and some to another. [HEN-DERSON: "In the representations which we find on ancient sculptures nothing is more affecting than to observe females and young children driven as captives before their conquerors." Observe, young children are mentioned in connection with Zion because they, in a peculiar sense, are the care of the church, of the religious rather than the political rulers, the lambs of the flock entrusted to the spiritual shepherds of Israel. Nothing could more forcibly express, in accordance with Jewish ideas, the fact that God had forsaken His people, than that the heathen were suffered, without Divine hindrance, to carry away these young children, the children of the covenant, into captivity and slavery. It is this thought that constitutes the poetic climax, showing how severely Jehovah afflicted Zion for her sins.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 6. And from the daughter of Zion all her beauty is departed. Zion has lost, not only her dearest and most precious ones, her children, but also her beauty, her glory. This last feature is represented by the princes, with whom, and before them all, the king is to be classed. [What then was the beauty of Zion—the King and the Princes, or God Himself? The beauty of Zion was the presence of Jehovah and the maintenance of His worship on the Holy Mount. See Lam. ii. 1, 6; 1 Sam. iv. 21, 22; Ezek. vii. 20-22; Ps. 1. 2, "Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined," Ps. xvi. 9, "Oh, worship the Lord in the beauty of holiness," בְּהַרְרֵת־קִדְשׁ, Ps. cxxiii. 13, 14. The beauty of Zion departed when God forsook His people, suffered the Temple to be destroyed, Jer. lii. 13, and the ordinances of worship to be discontinued. The condition of her princes, like hunted harts, pursued and overtaken, is the consequence of the destruction of Zion, whence they are driven forth, deprived of all spiritual nourishment. God is no longer with them. No more are they fed with the bread of Heaven; and therefore, like starved and parched harts, they fall an easy prey to their pursuers.—W. H. H.]—Her princes are become like harts that find no pasture; and they are gone without strength before the enemy. These noble and fleet-footed animals lose, by hunger, their strength and the power of flight. They are caught and driven at pleasure. So the princes of Zion, formerly her pride and strength, are driven forth by the pursuer. The Sept. and JEROME have κρῶτες, arietes, =rams. They read or understood אֵילִים. But evidently אֵיל is the stag or hart (see Deut. xii. 15; xiv. 5; xv. 22): rams would not suit in this connection, since rams do not belong to those animals of the chase, which only suffer themselves to be taken by men, when hunger deprives them of power to escape.

I. 7.

7 Jerusalem remembered in the days of her affliction, and of her miseries, all her pleasant things that she had in the days of old, when her people fell into the hand of the enemy, and none did help her: the adversaries saw her, and did mock at her sabbaths.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 7.—יְמֵי יְנִינָהּ is not the object of זָכְרָה, but indicates the time, as is evident from the absence of ל before זָכְרָה. The accusative יְמֵי answers, as frequently, the question, When? See my Gr., §70, d. [BLAYNET: "HOUBIGANT supposes that we ought to read בְּיָמֵי for יְמֵי; but I am inclined to think that it is not the ב, but the י, which has been sunk before יְמֵי, by means of the preceding word having been terminated with the same letter,—a mistake of which we find numberless instances originating from the same cause. יְמֵי signifies during the days, or since they began, as יְמֵי קָרָם does presently after, in or during former days." BOOTHROYD quotes this note with approval in his Hebrew Bible. HENDERSON says, "in יְמֵי there is an ellipsis of ב, of which there are numerous examples." But nouns may be "used absolutely to express the relations of time," see GREEN'S Gr., §274, 2.—W. II. II.]—כְּרָרִים, not from כָּרַר, but from רָר, dissipari, vagari (Hos. xii. 1; Jer. ii. 31), is ragatio, erratio, vita extorris et erraticæ (FUEBST). The word is found, besides here and iii. 19, only at Is. lviii. 7. [Dr J. A. ALEXANDER translates כְּרָרִים יְנִינָהּ, the afflicted, the homeless, and remarks, "LOWTH's version—the wandering poor—is now commonly regarded as substantially correct. כְּרָרִים is properly an abstract, meaning wandering (from רָר), here used for the concrete wanderers." Accepting the opinion of LOWTH and ALEXANDER, I have put "wanderings" in the text. FUEBST, in his concordance, derives the word from רָרַר, as above, but, in his Lexicon, from כָּרַר, and translates it expulsion, persecution, misery. W. ROBERTSON says, "כְּרָרִים, her mournings, her lamentations, her miseries or calamities, or her rebellions, for the word may be referred to the root רָרַר, in High, to mourn, to lament; or to the root כָּרַר, to rebel." BLAYNET says it "comes from כָּרַר, to descend from a higher to a lower condition," and so translates it abatement. The variety of meanings put upon the word is indicated in the following English Versions: BROUGHTON, veiation; BLAYNET, abasement; BOOTHROYD, misery; HENDERSON, persecution; NOYES, oppression. But wanderings is evidently best supported by its use and most natural derivation, and suits the meaning here, but in iii. 19 it seems to denote simply a condition of wretchedness.—W. II. II.]—כַּחֲמֹרֶיהָ, only here and ver. 11, K'tib. Neither כַּחֲמֹר, nor כַּחֲמֵר, found in Jeremiah. He uses only חֲמֹרָה (iii. 19; xii. 10; xxv. 34).—יְמֵי קָרָם. In Jeremiah we have יְמֵי קָרָם, xvi. 29.—בְּיַד could be into the hand [E. V., BLAYNET, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, NOYES] instead of by [BROUGHTON]; the difference is not important.—[BLAYNET: "Instead of צָרִים רָאִהָ I propose to read רָאִהָ הַצָּרִים." An ingenious, but unnecessary, unauthorized change.—W. II. II.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 7. Jerusalem. [Here occurs another of those sudden changes which give to this poem its highly dramatic character. In the preceding verses, which may be properly regarded as introductory to all that follows, the city, the nation, and the church have been successively introduced. Now Jerusalem is named for the first time. Jerusalem, here, must be regarded as generic and comprehensive; the representative of the theocratic idea; the head of all the cities of Israel, the type of its nationality, the seat of its worship, where God dwelt in its consecrated Zion. The ideal persons who have already appeared,—the ruined city, pictured as a sorrowing widow and dethroned and conquered queen, of vers. 1, 2,—the exile, fleeing from misery and bondage, seeking a home among heathen, but finding no rest, no escape from trouble and persecution, of ver. 3,—the daughter of Zion, despoiled of her beauty, bewailing the absence of worshippers, the invasion of her sacred courts by heathen, the captivity of her infant children and the humiliation of her proud leaders and princes, of vers. 4-6,—all now are embraced under the generic name of JERUSALEM, which from this verse to the end of the chapter is personified as the representative of the theocratic idea.—W. II. II.]—remembered, remembers. The unfortunate cannot forbear recalling their former prosperity, the remembrance of which serves both to comfort them and to increase their sorrow. Zion follows this propensity of nature.—in the days of her affliction and of her miseries, all her pleasant things.—All the glorious things, of a spiritual and of a temporal nature, which had fallen to the lot of the chosen people from the beginning of their history, are now the subject of painful remembrance.—that she had in the days of old. See ii. 17; Is. xxiii. 7; xxxvii. 26; Mich. vii. 20. [BROUGHTON: "in the old time." HENDERSON: "from ancient days."] EWALD regards the words, all the pleasant things she had from the days of old, as erroneously transplanted here out of ver. 10. His principal reason seems to be that they spoil the rhythm. VAHINGER supposes that this verse, as well as ii. 19, contains four members. I see no necessity for this. We are only to regard the two members of the first part of the verse as of greater length. There is apparently no exact measure for the number of syllables of the several members. The thought that Jerusalem in her misery remembers her present misery [which would be the sense according to EWALD's emendation] is unnatural: for זָכַר [to call to mind, to remember] always suggests something distant, remote, in reference to space or time, and, in the latter relation, either past or future. Besides, the words, "that she had in the days of old," so appropriate in ver. 7, would be altogether superfluous and confusing in ver. 10.—when her people fell into the hand of the enemy, when her people fall by the hands of the oppressor.

This is a more particular description of "the days of her affliction." They were the days when her people fell by the hand of their enemies.—and none did help her, and she has no helper. [So all the Eng. Versions, except E. V.]—the adversaries saw her, her oppressors behold her. The construction is determined by what precedes, according to acknowledged usage. See my Gr., § 99.—[רָאָה—to see, has here the sense of looking at in the way of inspection, beholding (BROUGHTON), perhaps in the sense of 'looking at a person with satisfaction or joy,' to 'feast the eyes upon one with malicious joy' (see FUERST'S Lex.). The remark of Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER on Is. liii. 2, that רָאָה "means to view with pleasure only when followed by the preposition כִּי," needs qualification.—W. H. H.]—and did mock—they mock—at her Sabbaths. מִשְׁבֹּת is an ἀπ. λεγ. The sense of the word itself is clear. It can only mean cessationes, excidia [cessations, destructions]. But the choice of a word else unused, seems to indicate that the scorn of their enemies was of an equivocal character; namely, they scoffed not only because Zion had come to its end, but likewise because now a general Sabbath, a day of rest for the land in a bad sense, had begun. We have then a proof that the Sabbath was to the heathen, even before the days of Rome (see Juv. Sat. XIV. 96-106; Pers. V. 179-184; Mart. IV. 4, 7), an occasion for mockery. [HUGH BROUGHTON: "This prophesieth how in Babel they will mourn for desire unto their feasts, which in their Land they would not keep aright. And the Chaldeans will scoff at their Sabbatisms, as did long after HORACE, OVID, and other Poets,—and TULLY, too, deserving to have his head cut off and his tongue pricked, as he had. The Ps. cxxxvii. commenteth upon this verse."] This early mockery of the Jewish Sabbath would be more likely to happen, since it would naturally come to the ears of those who destroyed Jerusalem, that the commandment itself predicted to the disobedient people a time of desolation, as an involuntary Sabbath rest of the land. See Lev. xxvi. 34, 43; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 21. I believe, therefore, that the old explanation of Vulg., Arab., LUTHER, L. CAPELLE, translating מִשְׁבֹּת

by Sabbaths, is right, so far as it allows an equivocal sense of this word. [This word has given the translators and commentators much trouble. The Sept. translates it by μετοικεσία, "and mocked at her captivity," deriving the noun from שָׁבַח, captivum ducere. The other Versions vary. BLAYNEY: "discontinuance;" HOUBIGANT justly observes that שָׁבַח is nowhere used for Sabbath, etc. But without taking the liberty which he does of substituting another word, משְׁבֹּתה, the use of the verb שָׁבַח will justify giving to משְׁבֹּתה a sense well suited to the exigence of the passage, namely, 'her discontinuance,' that is, the ceasing, or causing to cease, of her, or of her former prosperity." BOOTHROYD and NOYES: "destruction." HENDERSON: "they laughed at her ruin," "מִשְׁבֹּתֶיהָ, lit., her ruined circumstances; the state of the complete cessation of all the active businesses of life. Root, שָׁבַח to cease; Hiph., to put an end to, cause to cease." BROUGHTON: "Sabbatisms;" (which, as preserving the equivocal sense, is to be preferred).—BLAYNEY: "Some critics have been willing to discard this line, Her oppressors behold her—they mock at her Sabbaths—as well as the fourth in ii. 19, but for no better reason than because all the other periods in the two chapters consist of three lines only. But I think this not a sufficient ground, in opposition to the authority of all the Hebrew copies and ancient Versions." HENDERSON, who makes four lines of this verse, and only three of the others, remarks, "there is no reason to believe that Jeremiah considered himself so rigidly bound to adhere to his triple arrangement, as on no occasion to break through it in order to give utterance to a thought forcibly bearing on the statement which he had just made." Why then adopt an artificial style at all? But there is no necessity for making four members instead of three of this verse. Each member consists of two distinctly marked clauses; and in this verse the first member has two clauses of more than usual length. NÆGELSBACH'S arrangement of the lines in sixes, instead of triplets, plainly disposes of this difficulty, and its correctness is vindicated by the accents.—W. H. H.]

I. 8-11.

- 8 Jerusalem hath grievously sinned; therefore she is removed: all that honored her, despise her, because they have seen her nakedness; yea, she sigheth, and 9 turneth backward. Her filthiness is in her skirts; she remembereth not her last end; therefore she came down wonderfully: she had no comforter. O LORD, behold my afflictions; for the enemy hath magnified himself. The adversary hath spread out his hand upon all her pleasant things: for she hath seen that the heathen entered into her sanctuary, whom thou didst command that they should not enter 11 into thy congregation. All her people sigh, they seek bread: they have given their pleasant things for meat to relieve the soul: see, O LORD, and consider; for I am become vile.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 8.—חָטְאָה חֲטָאָה. See my Gr., § 293, d, note. The form חֲטָאָה (frequent in Deuteronomy, xv. 9; xxi. 22, etc., comp. Is. xxvi. 7; iii. 12; Hos. xii. 9) is never found in Jeremiah, and in Lam. only here and iii. 39. Jeremiah uses only the form חָטְאָה, xvi. 10, 18; xxvii. 1, 3; xxviii. 23, et al. The verb חָטְאָה is frequent with him, ii. 35; iii. 25; viii. 14.—[BLAYNEY: “For לְיַנְדָּהּ, which occurs nowhere else, nineteen MSS., and the first edition of the Hagographa, read לְיַנְדָּהּ, as at ver. 17 and various other places.”] כִּכְבְּדָהּ, not found in Jeremiah; 1 Sam. ii. 30; 2 Sam. x. 3; Prov. xiv. 31.—The Hiphil form, הִיזִל (not to be confounded with הִזְיִל from יָזַל, Is. xlvi. 21), occurs only here. See OLSÉN, § 255, h, note. In Jer. xv. 19 we find וְהִזִּיל, abjectum, vile. [The word is from יָזַל, Chaldaic inflexion. See BENJAMIN DAVIDSON, Analyt. Lex., § 18, 14; or from יָזַל, see FÜRST, Lex.—W. II. II.] יָגְרוּהָ, not found in Jeremiah. See Is. xviii. 3; Ezek. xvi. 37. [CRANMER, BISHOPS’ B., filthiness; BROUGHTON, BOOTHROYD, NIVYS, shame.]—אֶהְיֶה is found in Jeremiah only with הִלְךָ, xv. 6, and נָכַח, xxxviii. 22; xlv. 5.

Ver. 9.—טִמְאָתָהּ. EWALD, wholly unnecessarily, would read טִמְאָתָהּ, she polluted (§ 291, b). The word is not found in Jeremiah.—בְּיָאִים, acc. adverbial. See נִפְלְאוֹת, Job xxxvii. 5; נִרְאוֹת, Ps. lxx. 6; כִּישְׂרִים, Ps. lxxv. 3; my Gr., § 70, k.—הִזְרִיל requires neither נִפְשׁוּ nor פָּזַן to complete the sense. The object lies in the verb itself. The direct causative is needed (see my Gr., § 18, 3). זִיל also means, to play the part of or to affect greatness; see Jer. xviii. 26, 42; comp. 1 Sam. xl. 41. [FÜRST gives this verb an inchoative sense, to grow violent. This sense of the word seems to have influenced the inaccurate translation of BLAYNEY, Behold how an enemy hath aggravated mine affliction. BOOTHROYD gives same sense.—W. II. II.]

Ver. 10.—פָּרִיטֶהּ (see vers. 13, 17; iv. 4) is not strange to the vocabulary of Jeremiah: iv. 21; xvi. 7; xlviii. 40; xlix. 24.—Before פָּרִיטֶהּ supply אֲשֶׁר.—[HENDERSON: “The הַ in פָּרִיטֶהּ is merely the fuller form of the pronominal fragment for פָּרִיטֶהּ, the common form. It is omitted in some MSS.”]

Ver. 11.—כִּיחֲבוּדֵיהֶם, see vers. 7, 10. [HENDERSON: the form is “quite irregular. It is corrected in the K’ri, which rejects the י. The word is thus exhibited in a great number of MSS. and in eight printed editions.”]—בְּאֶכְלֶהּ בְּ indicates something given in the way of price or wages; see Gen. xxix. 18; xxx. 26; Is. vii. 23; my Gr., § 112, 5, a. אָכַל is not found in Jeremiah. He says אָכַלָהּ, xii. 19; or בְּאֶכְלֶהּ, vii. 33; xvi. 4; xix. 7; xxxiv. 20.—נִפְשׁוּ נִפְשׁוּ נִפְשׁוּ occurs vers. 10, 19; Ruth iv. 15; Ps. xix. 8; Prov. xxv. 13, never in Jeremiah.—וְהִפְטָהּ—וְהִפְטָהּ. These two imperatives are found together, only in the reverse order, in Job xxxv. 5; Is. lxiii. 15; Ps. lxxx. 15; cxlii. 5. In the Lamentations we also have וְהִפְטָהּ, ver. 12; וְהִפְטָהּ, ver. 1, and וְהִפְטָהּ alone iii. 63. Jeremiah never uses the verb נִפְשׁוּ, which Isaiah uses constantly, v. 12, 30; viii. 22; xviii. 4; xlii. 18; lxiii. 15; xx. 5, 6, etc.—וְהִלְךָ occurs once in Jer. xv. 19. See וְהִלְךָ, ver. 8. The word is used in a contemptuous sense; Zion [Jerusalem] has become a נִכְוָה (Jer. xxii. 28) when she ought to be וְהִלְךָ (Jer. iii. 19). [וְהִלְךָ is properly the participle of וְהִלְךָ, to shake to and fro, to totter, hence figuratively to be low, bad, contemptible, abject, mean, and then again figuratively to be miscrable, unhappy, in which last sense it is used here. See FÜRST, Lex.—W. II. II.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 8. It is sin that has made Jerusalem an object of abhorrence. Her uncleanness has become notorious: therefore those who might comfort her keep far from her, while her heathen oppressors, who, according to the law, should keep away from her, have free access to her.—Jerusalem hath grievously sinned. [Lit., hath sinned a sin. This Hebraism suggests the idea, not only of a sin of a grievous character, but of sin persevered in, and its guilt aggravated by constant repetition. So CRANMER translates: “Jerusalem hath sinned ever more and more.” NÆGELSBACH, poetically, if not accurately: Gesündigt, gesündigt hat Jerusalem. CALVIN: “Here the Prophet expresses more clearly and strongly what he had briefly referred to, even that all the evils which the Jews suffered proceeded from God’s vengeance, and that they were worthy of such a punishment, because they had not lightly offended, but had heaped up for themselves a dreadful judgment, since they had in all manner of ways abandoned themselves to impiety. This is the substance of what is said.”—W. II. II.]—Therefore she is removed.

[Correctly, therefore she is become vile. WESTMINSTER ANNOTATIONS: “She is become as a woman separated for her uncleanness,” Lev. xv. 19; Ezek. xxii. 10; xxxvi. 17; or, an abominable thing, for so also is the word used in an abstract notion, Lev. xx. 21; 2 Chron. xxix. 5; Ezra ix. 11. So ver. 17.—W. II. II.]—All that honoured her despise her. Those who formerly honored Jerusalem, her friends and allies, now despise her. [CALVIN: “This also did not a little increase the grievousness of her calamity; she had been repudiated by her friends, by whom she had before been valued and honored. The reason is mentioned.”]—Because they have seen her nakedness. By the discovery of her nakedness we are to understand, not merely that after the removal of all protecting covering (i. e., of all means of defence), men could see and even enter into the precincts of her innermost recesses, but especially that in this way the nakedness of Jerusalem, in a moral sense, has become notorious. In reference to her nakedness in this moral sense, Nebuzaradan said (Jer. xl. 3), “because ye have sinned against Jehovah, and have not obeyed His voice, therefore this thing is come upon you.” See DELITZSCH on Is. xlvii. 3: “The nakedness of Babylon is her shameful deeds, which are become manifest as such." The same figure of speech is found in Hos. ii. 10; Nah. iii. 5; Ezek. xiii. 37.—Yea, she sigheth. [Yea, she herself, or, as for herself she sigheth, etc.—W. H. H.]—And turneth backward. The shame of Jerusalem is so manifest that she herself cannot deny it. There remains nothing for her to do, but groaning to hide herself. See ver. 13; ii. 3; Ps. ix. 4; xlv. 11; lvi. 10. [The sense seems to be that she herself is so self-convicted and stricken with grief and mortification, that she can only sigh and turn her back upon the spectators in the vain endeavor to hide her shame. This would be very natural in the case of a naked woman, and such is the disagreeable image employed by the poet. NAEGELSACH: und wendete sich zurück, lit., and turned herself round. The only other sense that can be put upon the phrase is to regard it as expressive of despair. So CALVIN, "to turn backward means the same as to be deprived of all hope of restoration." But the correctness of such an interpretation is far from obvious. The other is more natural and probable. WEST. ANNOTATIONS: "Yea, she sigheth and turneth backward for shame; as those in such case would do, that have any shamefacedness, or spark of ingenuity at all in them, see Is. xlvii. 5: for they seem to swerve here from the genuine sense, who understand the term turning back as intimating a want of power to stand to it, or to rise and recover again, as Jer. xlv. 5."—W. H. H.]

לְנִירָה, vile. The old translators derive the word from נִירָה, vagari, errare, in the sense of agitatio, jactatio facta, i. e., agitata jactata est. Others take it in the sense of כְּנִירָה (Ps. xlv. 15), that at which men shake the head [as an expression of contemptuous pity.—W. H. H.]. But the connection requires that the word be used in the sense of that which excites abhorrence: for, according to the following clause, Jerusalem is despised because men now see her nakedness and her uncleanness. Since the lengthening of a syllable, to compensate for the doubling of the following consonant, is not infrequent [see הַיְלִיָּהּ, next clause, and GREEN'S Gr., § 141, 3.—W. H. H.], we may take נִירָה as another form of נִירָה (ver. 17). See OLSÉN, § 82, c. But נִירָה is that which one avoids, flings away from him as vile, abominates, that which is unclean, an object of abhorrence, and then the condition [or state, in the abstract] of uncleanness. It is especially used of the uncleanness of women (Lev. xii. 2; xv. 19, etc.). Here it would denote the person afflicted with such uncleanness, and become, on that account, an object of abhorrence, as Ezek. xviii. 6 speaks of אִשָּׁה נִירָה. Neither נִירָה nor נִירָה occur in Jeremiah.

[The authorities for the translation of this word are about equally divided. Those that agree with our author are: the Syr., horror; Ital., a laughing-stock; Ger., ein unreines Weib; BLAYNEY, one set apart for unclean; HENDERSON, unclean; NOYES, vile. On the other hand we have: Sept., fluctuation; Vulg., instable; Targ., va- grant; CRANMER and BISHOPS' B., therefore she is come in decay; E. V. and BOOTHROYD, therefore she is removed. CALVIN, therefore she is become a wanderer; "the word ought properly to be applied to their exile, when the Jews became unfixed and vagrants:" to which his English Editor, Rev. JOHN OWEN, adds this note, "the reference here is evidently to banishment, and not to uncleanness, as some take it, because the noun is sometimes so taken, persons being removed from society on account of uncleanness." HUGH BROUGHTON, therefore came she into dispersion, "such uncertainty of place as Cain had, Gen. iv., wandering from place to place." The argument derived from the connection seems to be decisive in favor of the first opinion, therefore is she become vile, or abominable, NAEGELSACH, zum Abscheu.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 9. Her filthiness is in her skirts.—Zion [Jerusalem] for a long time trifled with sin. She believed the evil she did would not become manifest to her injury. Now it is all become manifest. Her uncleanness has come to the surface: it is no longer hidden within her, but it is on her skirts (see Jer. xiii. 22, 26; Nah. iii. 5). [WORDSWORTH: "It is visible to all; she cannot deny her uncleanness." CALVIN refers this to the punishment, rather than the guilt of their sin; as LOWTH remarks: "she carries the marks of her sins in the greatness of her punishment." The idea of personal uncleanness, however, is stated with such revolting plainness that we cannot fail to see that the very punishment consists in the exposure of her moral pollution. See Jer. ii. 19, 22, 34.—W. H. H.]—She remembereth not her last end. She considered not what the end would be. She did not in the beginning reflect what the consequences of her sin must be. [ASSEM. Annot.: "She remembered not. She considered not, when time was, what the issue of her wicked courses would be, what they would bring her to at last; see Deut. xxxii. 29. So was it with Babel, Isa. xlvii. 7, and with this people, though forewarned of it, Jer. ii. 25." CALVIN understands this to mean, "that the Jews were so overwhelmed with despair, that they did not raise up their thoughts to God's promises;—they were so demoted by their sorrow, that they became stupidified, and entertained no hope as to the future." This interpretation grows out of the view that the first clause refers to the punishment of sin and not to sin itself; and is inconsistent with the apparent sense, with the context and with the ordinary use of the phrase "remembering the latter end."—W. H. H.]—Therefore she came down wonderfully.—Lit. She considered not her latter end, and came down wonderfully. In consequence of her want of consideration she has fallen and is degraded from her high estate. See Deut. xxviii. 43; Jer. xlviii. 18.—She had—has—no comforter. See ver. 2.—O Lord, behold my affliction, for the enemy hath magnified,—doth magnify—himself.—A pious ejaculation, which is put in the mouth of Zion [Jerusalem] herself. Jehovah is implored to observe how proudly the enemy, to whom Zion [Jerusalem] is no match, exalts himself. [HENDERSON: "After ascribing the fall of Jerusalem to heedless indulgence in sin, by a striking prosopopeia, he introduces her as in-ploring the compassionate regard of Jehovah." See, for a strikingly similar rhetorical construction, Gen. xlix. 18.—The idea in the last clause, for the enemy magnifies himself, is that the enemy increases his insolence and violence (see gram. note above), he is growing more and more vindictive. This may be considered, not only as a reason why Jerusalem utters a cry to God, but as an argument addressed to God for His interposition. So CALVIN represents it: "The Prophet, in order to obtain favor, says, that enemies had greatly exalted themselves. And this deserves a special notice; for what seems to occasion despair to us, ought, on the contrary, to encourage us to entertain good hope, that is, when enemies are insolent and carry themselves with great arrogance and insult us. The greater and the less tolerable their pride is, with more confidence may we call on God, for the Holy Spirit has not in vain taught us this truth, that God will be propitious to us when enemies thus greatly exalt themselves, that is, when they become beyond measure proud, and immoderately indulge themselves in every kind of contempt."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 10. Since Zion [Jerusalem] has not preserved the sanctuary of her heart from pollution by the enemy of her soul, but has suffered that enemy to rob her of her spiritual treasures, she must not wonder if her earthly enemies desecrate by their presence her earthly sanctuary, and stretch out the hand towards its precious things.—The adversary hath spread out his hand [for rather, stretched it out, (so FURST, NÆGELSACH, and ASSEM. Annot.), as about to seize and appropriate them.—W. H. H.], upon all her pleasant things. Precious, or glorious things. The vessels and treasures of the Temple are intended (see 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10; Jer. lii. 17 ff.), as is evident from the explanatory conjunction for with which the next clause begins: for she hath seen that the heathen entered into her sanctuary, whom Thou didst command that they should not enter into Thy congregation. In Deut. xxiii. 2, 3, we find the command never to allow Ammonites and Moabites to come into the congregation of the Lord. This special command was afterwards applied to all the heathen: Ezek. xlv. 7, 9; Neh. xiii. 3. We are reminded also of the Porch of the heathen, violation of which, according to Josephus (Jewish Wars, VI., 2, 4; comp. Acts xxi. 28), was forbidden on pain of death. [Observe the antithesis between sanctuary and congregation. ВООПРЯЖЕНОУ expresses this in his translation, in which he says "the sense is given and not the idiom." Surely she hath seen nations enter into her sanctuary, whom Thou didst forbid to enter even into Thy congregation. Those who were forbidden even to worship with the people, had intruded into the holy place—only priests might enter. "If even their entering to perform an act of worship would have been construed as a violation of the precept, how much more when it had for its object destruction and spoliation" (HENDERSON).—W. H. H.]

[NÆGELSACH translates: For she saw heathen who came into her sanctuary. It would be better to translate, For she hath seen how heathen came, etc. I have tried to preserve the same form of the verb נָטַח in both clauses by making heathen

the object of one verb and subject of the other. If this is a fault, I share it in company with old HUGH BROUGHTON and with BLAYNEY. The CRANMER and BISHOPS' BIBLES give the sense excellently: "Yea, even before her eyes came the heathen in and out of the sanctuary; whom Thou (nevertheless) hast forbidden to come within Thy congregation."—It is difficult to preserve the force of the final word נָטַח, without putting the clause in quotation marks. The possessive pronoun in the English version "thy congregation" must refer to the people, not to God.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 11. To dreadful spiritual distress is added the greatest bodily want, hunger. The Israelites must part with their jewels in order to procure necessary food. See ver. 19. [All her people sigh. The distress is real and universal. In ver. 4 the priests sigh; in ver. 8 the ideal person, Jerusalem, sigheth; but here we have, not a poetical image, but the actual groaning of the people, suffering with hunger and searching for food.—They seek bread, or rather seeking for bread. This expresses the reason for their sighing.—They have given (they give) their pleasant things (precious things, BROUGHTON, CRANMER, BISHOPS' BIBLE, HENDERSON, NOYES; jewels, NÆGELSACH, WORDSWORTH); for meat (food). By precious things are, doubtless, meant those ornaments which oriental women value so highly. "A striking illustration of this is given by MR. ROBERTS:—"the people of the East retain their little valuables, such as jewels and rich robes, to the last extremity. To part with that, which has perhaps been a kind of heirloom in the family, is like parting with life. Have they sold the last wreck of their other property; are they on the verge of death?—the emaciated members of the family are called together, and some one undertakes the heart-rending task of proposing such a bracelet, or arm-let, or ear-ring, or the pendant of the forehead, to be sold. For a moment all are silent, till the mother or daughters burst into tears, and then the contending feelings of hunger, and love for their 'pleasant things' alternately prevail. In general, the conclusion is to pledge, and not to sell their much-loved ornaments; but such is the rapacity of those who have money, and such the extreme penury of those who have once fallen, that they seldom regain them" (Oriental Illustrations, p. 483). "Under such circumstances, and particularly in times of public calamity, it often happens that jewels and other property of most valuable description, are disposed of for the merest trifle, that a little bread may be obtained to relieve the soul" (Pictorial Bible, Lon. See also Comp. Comm.).—W. H. H.]—To relieve the soul [marg. E. V., to make the soul to come again]. The meaning is evident from 1 Kings xvii. 21, 22; 1 Sam. xxx. 12; Jud. xv. 19. [To sustain life: lit., to cause the breath, or life to return. "This mode of expression is founded on the idea, that when one is faint, the breath or life is as it were gone" (HENDERSON). See Job ii. 4, "all that a man hath will he give for his life."—W. H. H.] See, O Lord, and consider. See vers. 9, 20; ii. 20; v. 1; comp. iii. 63; iv. 16.—[For I am become vile. How wretched I am become. There is certainly, as HENDERSON remarks, "something incongruous in assigning her vileness as a reason why God should regard Jerusalem;" what is here meant is, as HENDERSON acknowledges while he retains the word "vile," "not her moral pollution, but her abject and despised condition, which was exposed to all around her." —NAEGELSBACH with the last clause of this verse begins an entirely new section. In all that follows, he says, down to ver. 16 Zion herself speaks. She entreats first Jehovah, then all passers-by to regard her misery. In fact, however, the address of Jerusalem to Jehovah begins with the last clause of ver. 9, and is continued down to end of this verse. The appeal to God in the last clause of ver. 10, which Thou commandest, etc., and again this prayer to God at the close ver. 11, shows that the whole is addressed to Him: the use of the third person instead of the first in the first two clauses both of ver. 10 and ver. 11, does not refute this, as the change from the first to the third person is so frequent in Hebrew descriptive poetry.—W. H. H.]

PART II.

I. 12-22.

- ↳ VER. 12. Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?
Behold and see
If there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow,
Which is inflicted on me,
Wherewith Jehovah hath afflicted me
In the day of His fierce anger!
- Ⓜ VER. 13. From on high hath He sent fire into my bones,
And it subdued them.
He hath spread a net for my feet,
He hath turned me back.
He hath made me desolate—
All the day long sorrowful!
- ↳ VER. 14. The yoke of my sins is bound fast to His hand.
They are twined together,
They rise up above my neck.
He hath caused my strength to fail.
The Lord hath delivered me into the hands of those Whom I cannot resist.
- Ⓜ VER. 15. The Lord hath made despicable all my mighty men
In the midst of me.
He hath proclaimed a set-time against me
To crush my young men.
The Lord hath trodden the wine-press
As to the virgin, Judah's daughter.
- ↳ VER. 16. For these things I weep.
Mine eye, mine eye—runneth down with water,
Because the Comforter—Restorer of my soul—
Is far from me.
My children are perishing
Because the enemy prevails.
- ↳ VER. 17. Zion stretches out her hands,
But there is no Comforter for her.
Jehovah has given charge concerning Jacob
That his neighbors be his enemies.
Jerusalem has become
An abomination in the midst of them.

- 5 VER. 18. Jehovah—He is righteous :
 For I have disobeyed His commandment.
 Hear, I pray you, all ye peoples,
 And behold my sorrow.
 My virgins and my young men
 Are gone into captivity.
- 7 VER. 19. I called to my lovers :
 They deceived me.
 My priests and my elders
 Expired in the city,
 For they sought food for themselves
 To revive their souls.
- 7 VER. 20. Behold, O Jehovah, how I am distressed !
 My bowels are greatly troubled.
 My heart is turned within me,
 For I have grievously rebelled ;
 Abroad the sword bereaveth,
 At home —Death !
- 5 VER. 21. They heard that I sigh,
 That I have no Comforter.
 All my enemies heard of my trouble.
 They rejoiced that Thou hadst done it,
 That Thou hast brought the day Thou hadst proclaimed.
 But they shall be like me !
- 7 VER. 22. Let all their wickedness come before Thee ;
 And do unto them
 As thou hast done unto me
 For all my transgressions :
 For my sighs are many
 And my heart is faint.

ANALYSIS.

From the last clause of verse 11, the Poet lets Zion [Jerusalem] herself speak, as she had done already, parenthetically, in ver. 9. This method of recital continues to the end of the chapter, with a single interruption, ver. 17, where the Poet himself throws in a word. [There is no necessity for supposing a change of speaker in ver. 17.—W. H. H.] Zion [Jerusalem] invites all who pass by, ver. 12, to convince themselves by their own observation, that there is no sorrow like unto her sorrow ; it streamed as fire through her bones, whilst at the same time a net had caught her feet, ver. 13. She was the victim of sins of her own sowing, in consequence of which she had been helplessly given up to mighty enemies, ver. 14 ; her heroes had proved themselves powerless, for her enemies had been called together against Judah as to a feast at the wine-press, ver. 15. It is most natural that Zion's [Jerusalem's] tears should flow without ceasing for such calamities, and all the more natural since after the catastrophe all hope failed her, ver. 16. By way of confirmation the Poet repeats, in his own words, the thoughts expressed by Zion [Jerusalem] in the preceding context, ver. 17 : that she stretches forth her hands for help in vain, that the Lord had called together all her foes against her, so that she now stood in the midst of them as an object of abhorrence. Vers. 18-22, Zion [Jerusalem] speaks again. Once more she repeats, vers. 18, 19, in the way of recapitulation, the acknowledgment of her sin, the invitation to consider her great distress, the description of the principal items of the same, the banishment of her efficient youth, the defection of human allies, the pitiable death by starvation of her venerable priests and elders. The last three verses are a prayer. May the Lord regard her misery ; the hopeful heart is broken by the blows of the angel of death, ver. 20. May the Lord bring upon her malignant enemies such a day of vengeance as He had brought upon Zion [Jerusalem], vers. 21, 22. The last two lines of ver. 22 are a final exclamation of pain, from which it is evident that the petitions offered to the Lord had not availed to allay the deeply-seated agony of mind.

I. 12.

- 12 Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by ? behold, and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me, wherewith the LORD hath afflicted me in the day of his fierce anger.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 12.—כִּלְעֵנְבֵי יָרֵךְ. This phrase is found in ii. 15; Job xxi. 29; Ps. lxxx. 13; lxxxix. 42; Prov. ix. 15.—אֵם-וִישׁ, comp. ver. 18. These words, by brevity and simplicity, are highly poetical.—עֵינַיִל. The Pual conj. occurs only here; the active in ver. 22; ii. 20; iii. 51; Jer. vi. 9 in the sense of racemari [to glean]; so JEROME renders it in our text, Who has gleaned me.—W. H. H.], comp. Jer. xxxviii. 19.—הוֹגֵרָה, see הוֹגֵרָה, ver. 4.—פְּוִים הִי. This expression is found only here and Is. xiii. 13. חָרוֹן אַפּוֹ is an expression common with Jeremiah, iv. 8, 29; xxv. 37, 38; xxx. 24; xlix. 37.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12. Zion [Jerusalem] addresses herself now to men, especially to all "passers by," in order to gain their attention and stir up their sympathy for her sufferings. [This address, according to NÆGELSBACH, extends to ver. 16, but in fact, to the end of ver. 19, when Jerusalem again addresses herself to Jehovah.—W. H. H.]—Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? The Hebrew is very difficult and hardly capable of a satisfactory explanation. It seems to me that the only allowable explanation is this: not on yourselves (look), but look and see whether any sorrow is as my sorrow. [See crit. note below. There is a difficulty first in deciding whether the first word in the Hebrew is a mere particle of wishing: oh if, oh that, utinam, would that! Or whether it is the particle of negation. If the former, then we may adopt BLAYNEY'S translation, "O that among you, all ye that pass by, ye would look and see, if there be a sorrow like unto my sorrow," etc. Thus our text is a call for sympathy. But there is little in favor of this interpretation. But if the word referred to is a particle of negation, then there are other difficulties: is it a simple negative, or a negative of interrogation? In either case, what is the meaning? If it is a simple negative, we may explain it in several ways. 1. We may, as NÆGELSBACH does, connect the negative with the following verbs, Look not on yourselves, but look and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow. Or, 2. We may translate literally, it is not to you, and then we may explain it in two ways: either as an enunciation of the fact that what had befallen her had not befallen them; so HUGH BROUGHTON, This hath not befallen you, O all that pass by the way. Consider ye and see if, etc.; or it may be taken as a complaint that her sorrows were so slighted—and then the sense is, It is nothing to you, i. e., you have no concern in it or care for it. Or, 3. We may translate it in the form of a wish or prayer, 'let not that befall you that hath befallen me.' If we take the word interrogatively, then we may suppose a word omitted, 'Whether or no shall I call upon you,' etc.; or we may render it as the English version has it, and in favor of which we have the weight of authority on the part of translators and commentators: Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? WEST. ANNOT.: "Do ye make light of mine afflictions? or, do ye not regard them, and lay them to heart? as complaining that her calamities were so slighted by others, and endeavoring to move them to some commiseration of her. See somewhat the like form of speech in the prayer of those holy men to God, Neh. ix. 32."—Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto me. WEST. ANNOT.: "The manner of persons that sit weeping and wailing, as wandering outcasts, by the wayside, is wont to be no other than is here deciphered, in a proneness to acquaint others with their calamitous condition (so ver. 18), and to aggravate them in relation of them, as being such as had never the like been known or heard of before. See iii. 1; iv. 6."—Wherewith the Lord (Jehovah) hath afflicted me in the day of His fierce anger. See ver. 5. "By the transcendent greatness of mine affliction ye may easily perceive that there is a special hand and work of God in it. See Is. x. 5." WEST. ANNOT.—W. H. H.]

לֹא אֵלֵיכֶם. The Sept. reads οἱ πρὸς ὑμᾶς, where without doubt we should read οἱ πρ. ὑ. Vulgate: O vos omnes. Chald.: Adjuro vos omnes. Syr., very literally: Nihilne ad vos omnes viatores? Arab.: O quotquot viam transitis! That the Sept.

read לֹא as לֹא is very probable. There is nothing that should prevent our pointing it so today, if any thing were to be gained by it. But לֹא (for which we have לֹא, 1 Sam. xiv. 30; Is. xlvi. 18; lxiii. 19) never stands as a simple interjection, but is a conjunction, and always requires a verb after it. We could indeed supply such a verb (Oh, that my call might compel your attention, or the like); but it is difficult to supply the right word, and we cannot conceive why the Poet should leave the reader to supply it. If we read לֹא (which, according to the Masora, stands 25 times for לֹא, see FURST), then there are two ways of explaining it. Either it may be understood interrogatively: nonne ad vos? Then אֵלֵיכֶם must be supplied, as Prov. viii. 4 reads, אֵלֵיכֶם אֵי שִׁים אֵלֵיכֶם. But there אֵלֵיכֶם is expressed. To supply it here, seems to me, were equally as difficult as the supply of a word after לֹא would necessarily be. Or, לֹא may be understood as a negation. In this sense ABEN EZRA and ROSENUELLER take it, whilst they supply the words הִנֵּעַ אֶשֶׁר קָדְרָה לִי, i. e., hucusque non tetigit vos, quod mihi accidit; vos tanta mala, quanta nos opprimunt, nondum estis experti. But this explanation is evidently very arbitrary. אֵלֵיכֶם is to be regarded as dependent on הִנֵּעַ, which is often construed with אֵלֵי. Num. xxi. 9; Ps. xxxiv. 6; cii. 20; Is. xxii. 11, etc. This explanation is not, it is true, entirely satisfactory. But may not the forced construction arise from the constraint of the alphabetical arrangement of the text? [See remark above.

לוא here is the same as הלא, see FURST and 1 Sam. xiv 30. The omission of the interrogation ה is accounted for by the desire to employ ל as the initial letter. HENDERSON: "לוא is a strong mode of expressing the negation לו', which has here all the force of a substantive put interrogatively, as it is in the common version: Is it nothing?"—W. H. H.]

I. 13-16.

13 From above hath he sent fire into my bones, and it prevaieth against them: he hath spread a net for my feet; he hath turned me back; he hath made me desolate
 14 and faint all the day. The yoke of my transgressions is bound by his hand; they are wreathed, and come up upon my neck; he hath made my strength to fall; the LORD hath delivered me into their hands, from whom I am not able to rise up.
 15 The LORD hath trodden under foot all my mighty men in the midst of me: he hath called an assembly against me to crush my young men: the LORD hath trod-16 den the virgin, the daughter of Judah, as in a wine-press. For these things I weep; mine eye, mine eye runneth down with water, because the comforter that should relieve my soul is far from me; my children are desolate, because the enemy prevailed.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 13.—כרום occurs often in Jeremiah: xvii. 12, etc.; כפרום, xxv. 30.—עצבות, Jer. viii. 1, and elsewhere.—וירדנה. The word is obscure. It is the Imp. Kal. of רדה. But רדה signifies to tread upon, govern. The subject can be אש, since this word is also used as a masculine להט, Ps. civ. 4). The singular שמה refers to עצבות, since the bones are regarded as constituting one body. See NAGELS. Gr., § 105, 7, rem. 2. We translate, therefore, and it subdued them. [FURST: (וירדנה) and he caused it (the fire) to become master. BLAYNEY translates, and hath caused it to penetrate into my bones, and says, "This is obviously the right construction, and it is that which is approved by the LXX." But the Sept. uses the verb καταγαγεν,—and obviously neither that verb nor the Hebrew means to penetrate. All the other versions use the word 'prevail,' 'subdue,' or 'govern,' except BOOTHROYD, who blindly follows BLAYNEY.—W. H. H.] רדה, Jer. v. 31. Comp. Lev. xxv. 43, 46, 53.—פרט. See ver. 10. רשת occurs not again in Lamentations and not at all in Jeremiah.—השיבני. The Hiphil form, caused me to turn. This favors the idea of the net as the instrument of preventing escape; see below.—W. H. H.]—שוכבין. See שוכבין, ver. 4.—רוה. This word does not occur in Jeremiah. It is found, besides here, v. 17; Lev. xv. 23: xx. 18; Is. xxx. 22.

Ver. 14.—נשקרו is ἀπ. λέγ. The root קד, which reappears in אקד, Ligare (Gen. xxii. 9), אקד, Aram. אקד, Ligavit (see אקד, nodus, Is. lviii. 6) cat-ena, kettle (observe the change of the aspirate to the sibilant, comp. יץ and sus, ילף and silva, טעפ and super, אלס and sal, שרג and ארג, Ges. Thes., p. 1318), seems to have the signification of binding, tying. EWALD conjectures that נשקרו may have been the common technical term for harnessing.—נל, frequent in Jeremiah: ii. 20; v. 5; xxviii. 2, 4, 11, 14; xxx. 8. In נל and נל the Poet seems to aim at a play upon words.—כשע occurs only vers. 5, 14, 22; Jer. v. 6.—The Hithpahel השתרג only here; elsewhere only the Pual, Job xl. 7. [DOOTHROYD, translating נל as if it were נל, is compelled to translate ישתרג in the sing., His yoke II hath twisted on my neck.—For a similar use of נל with נל, in the sense of rising above the object indicated, see Deut. xxviii. 43.—W. H. H.]—הכשיל. Kal frequent in Jeremiah; Hiph., labare fecit, Jer. xviii. 15; Hoph. Jer. xviii. 23.—בירי. Construction as in Jer. ii. 8. See my Gr., § 63, 2, f. ["A noun is sometimes put in the construct before a succeeding clause with which it is already connected,"—particularly when the relation is itself omitted, בירי השלה, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send" (GREEN'S Gr.). This construction renders it necessary to take קים in a transitive sense; or else to introduce a word besides the relative; so B. V.: from whom I am not able to rise up. NOTES: against whom I cannot stand up. Whom I cannot withstand or resist. This seems to be the sense, and is not foreign to the use of קים.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 15.—כלה. Piel only here; Kal, Ps. cxix. 118; Pual, Job xxviii. 16, 17.—אפיר, often in Jeremiah, viii. 16; xlv. 15; xlvii. 3; i. 11. In Lam. only here.—קרא כונו, Lev. xxiii. 4. See ver. 4. Jeremiah generally uses the noun in the sense of tempus finum [and that is its meaning here, OWEN: He hath brought on me the fixed time to destroy my young men.—W. H. H.]—לשבר בחאי. A peculiar expression, yet see Jer. ii. 22.—רדן נת ל. A peculiar use of ל [it seems to mean with relation to, as to, quoad.—W. H. H.]. נת, not in Jeremiah, yet he uses רדן of the treaders of the wine-press, xxv. 30; xlviii. 33; li. 33.—פתית, in Jeremiah once, of the Egyptians, xlv. 11, and once in the connection פתית עמי, xiv. 17; comp. xviii. 13; xxxi. 4, 21. In Lam., besides here, only in li. 13, comp. ii. 10.

Ver. 16.—בוכיה (see פריה, Is. xvii. 6 and elsewhere; OSH., § 177, 6) occurs only here. Yet Jeremiah uses בוכיה, xii. 6, and בוכיה, xxxi. 15: in the last place in connection with נל, as here; elsewhere בכה is constructed with acc. viii. 23, ל, xxii. 10, or כַּפְּנֵי, xiii. 17. [GREEN, Gr., §209, 1, and PAULI, Anal., p. 264, attribute the form to the fact that ל was originally the last radical of the verb. PAULI, in his Key, p. 63, n, informs us that "the Prophet uses the feminine gender for the purpose of expressing meekness and the intensity of his grief." A rather remarkable instance of a rule made to meet a supposed case. Fortunately we are not obliged to allow the Prophet to unsex himself, since not the Prophet himself, but the ideal and feminine Jerusalem is the speaker.—The verb, properly intransitive, is used in a transitive sense: my eye runs down water. A peculiar Hebrew idiom to express abundance, Joel iv. 18, הַלְלֵנָה חֵלֶב, the hills shall run milk. See GREEN'S Gr.—W. H. H.]—The part כְּנָדִים Jeremiah does not use.—שׁוֹמְקִים, see ver. 4.—נָבַר is found Jer. ix. 2.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 13–16 contain a particular account of the various sufferings endured, together with their efficient causes.

Ver. 13. The sufferings [of the city] appear under two images. The first image is derived from the fire that falls from Heaven (Gen. xix. 24; Deut. xxix. 23; Ps. xi. 6). Heavenly fire burns more fiercely than earthly; it cannot be quenched. [The image of fire is suggested by the last words of the preceding verse, "in the day of his fierce anger," which may be rendered in the day of His glowing or burning anger. So CALVIN, in die excandescitiae iree suae.—From above, lit., from on high. CALVIN: "the expression is emphatical, for the Prophet means that it was no common or human burning; because what is ascribed to God exceeds what is human or earthly."—Hath he sent fire into my bones. CALVIN: "They who interpret bones of fortified places, weaken the meaning of the Prophet. I take bones in their proper sense, as though it were said, that God's fire had penetrated into the inmost parts. This way of speaking often occurs in Scripture.—David deplored that his bones were vexed or troubled, Ps. vi. 2. And Hezekiah said in his song, "As a lion he hath broken my bones," Is. xxxviii. 13."—W. H. H.]—And it prevaieth against them. And it hath subdued them, or got the better of them. [CALVIN: "The Prophet says that fire had been sent by God, which ruled in his bones,—that is, which not only burnt the skin and the flesh, but also consumed the bones." The CRANMER and BISHOPS' BIBLES translate very freely, but preserve the sense, "From above hath He sent down fire into my bones, and it burneth them cruelly."—W. H. H.]—The second image is derived from the hunter, who lays nets for the wild beast.—He hath spread a net for my feet. [CALVIN: "There is another similitude added, that God had spread a net before her feet,—and thus He had taken away every means of escape. She had been ensnared by God's judgments, so that she was bound over to ruin, as though she had fallen into toils or snares."—He hath turned me back. See ver. 8. This and the two following clauses contain ideas by means of which the poet seems to pass over from the image to the reality. [But is not this clause to be explained by the metaphor of the net, by which, when she sought to escape, she was turned back? So CALVIN understands it: "She had been turned back by the nets of God." Or we may explain it consistently with the metaphor, as the WESTMINSTER ANNOTATIONS do: "Cast me down backward; thrown me down and laid me on my back."—He hath made me desolate, and faint all the day: or, better, sorrowful all the day: so NÆGELSBACH and CALVIN.

CRANMER'S B. and BISHOPS' B. both render it, "He hath made me desolate, so that I must ever be mourning." CALVIN: "It is stated in the third place, that she was desolate all the day, so that she sorrowed perpetually."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 14. A third metaphor, which indicates the cause of the ruin which has befallen Zion [Jerusalem].—The yoke of my transgressions is bound by His hand, to His hand. Zion [Jerusalem] may not be relieved from her guilt, but rather it is tied fast upon her as a yoke. And truly this is done by God's hand. But what God binds, that He holds fast; no mortal power can loosen it. [HENDERSON: "The next metaphor is taken from agricultural life. As the hand of the ploughman firmly binds the yoke on the neck of the ox, so inseparably had the punishment of the iniquities of Jerusalem been connected with her rebellious conduct towards Jehovah."—There is some uncertainty as to the verb in this clause. In the Keri or Masoretic reading and in several MSS. and printed editions of the Bible, the verb used means to be watched; and the verb is taken in the sense of watching in the Sept., Syr. and Vulgate, and the old versions generally. It is singular that NÆGELSBACH does not refer to this reading, since it is the one adopted in the text of the German Bible. Dr. BLAYNEY and the Rev. JOHN OWEN, insist that this is the correct reading. All the versions and translators adopting this reading, except the Vulgate, take the word rendered yoke not as a noun, but as a preposition. Mr. OWEN translates thus: He hath watched over my transgressions, by His hand they are twined. This gives a good sense. "To watch over transgressions," is similar to "watch upon (or over) the evil" in Dan. ix. 14; it is to watch over them in order to punish them" (J. OWEN). But the grammatical objections to this rendering are nearly insuperable. See Crit. Note below.—Another point of interest is whether we should translate by His Hand, or in, or to His hand. The former is adopted by NÆGELSBACH, HENDERSON and BOOTHROYD, and has the sanction of the English Version. The latter in His hand, is supported by Sept., Vulg., BISHOPS' BIBLE, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, and NOYES, and is recommended by the sense, and also best expresses the primitive sense of the preposition. The BISHOPS' BIBLE reads, the yoke of my transgressions is bound fast to His hand; and appends this note, "The bondage through sin is most grievous, which therefore is called the yoke of sins, fastened in or to God's hand because by no means it can be shaken off or remitted, but only of God's grace and mercy." NOYES: "The yoke of my transgressions is fastened in His hand. A metaphor drawn from the practice of a husbandman, who, after fastening the yoke upon the cattle, keeps the cords wound round his hand. So she says the yoke of her transgressions, i. e., the consequences of them, is fastened upon her neck, and the cords connected with it wound round the hand of God, so that she could not throw it off." CALVIN has a long note to the same effect.—W. H. H.—They are wreathed and, or, [leaving out the conjunction which is not in the original] they come up—rise up above—upon my neck. Comp. Ps. xxxviii. 5. As if the yoke were fastened by many cords, interwoven together, and forming, as it were, a heap or elevation upon the neck. The verbs being in the plural must have for their subject the word "transgressions," hence it is evident that he regarded the sins themselves as the cords which fastened the yoke on the neck. And very certainly sins constitute the bond between the guilty one and his guilt. [WORDSWORTH: "My sins are twined together, so as to fasten the yoke upon my neck. Comp. Deut. xxviii. 48. The reason of this comparison is that sins become punishments (peccati pona peccatum), and are a sore burden, too heavy for the sinner to bear (Ps. xxxviii. 4)."] HENDERSON: "To express more forcibly the complicated character of the iniquities of the Jews as entailing punishment upon them, they are said to entwine or interweave themselves, the idea being probably borrowed from the intertwining of withes for the purpose of binding the yoke with them." The expression, they come up upon my neck (variously rendered, they go over my neck (BROUGHTON), come up about my neck (BISH. BIBLE), rise up on my neck (HENDERSON), are laid upon my neck (NOYES), may express the idea of a burden in addition to that of a yoke, that the sins wreath themselves into a yoke that is heavy and burdensome on the neck, "a yoke which is insupportable" (WORDSWORTH, NOYES),—or the idea may be, that the yoke is so wreathed together and knotted as it were upon the neck, that the head cannot be withdrawn from it. The last seems to be NÆGELSBACH'S idea. So CALVIN, "we ought to bear in mind the two clauses—that God's hand held the yoke tied, and also that the yoke was bound around the neck of Jerusalem, * * * it is tied, and so fastened, that it cannot be shaken off." So also BROUGHTON, who translates, they plat themselves; they go over my neck, and in a treatise on "Jeremie's Lamentations" explains this passage thus: "The yoke of their sin was platted over their head. The state in Jeremie's time was so entangled with the idolatry of the Egyptians and their other friends, that they could not get their head out of it."—W. H. H.] In what follows the Poet as in ver. 13, drops the metaphorical style for the literal.—He hath made my strength to fail. He has broken my strength. [The primitive meaning of the Hebrew verb suggests the idea of one tottering to and fro, staggering from weakness (see Is. v. 27), as, in the present instance, under a heavy yoke. Our E. V. vainly strives to preserve this idea in a phrase that is awkward and needs explanation, "He has made my strength to fall." BLAYNEY comes nearer the primitive meaning of the verb by using the word "stumble" instead of "fall," hath caused my strength to stumble. But it is doubtful if the verb, in the form in which it is used, expresses more than the idea of weakening or exhausting the strength. OWEN: "He hath weakened my strength." CALVIN: corruiere fecit (vel, debilitavit) robur meum.

BISHOPS' BIBLE and HENDERSON: "He hath caused my strength to fail."—W. H. H.—The Lord hath delivered me into their hands, from whom I am not able to rise up, whom I cannot resist.—The Lord, Adonai. This name, Adonai, never occurs alone in the prophecies of Jeremie, but is always followed by Jehovah (and that, too, according to the Masoretic punctuation יהוה אדני, i. 6; ii. 19, 22; iv. 10; vii. 20; xiv. 13; xlv. 26; xlix. 5; l. 31. But in the Lamentations, Adonai is never followed by Jehovah, and stands alone in fourteen places, i. 14, 15 twice; ii. 1, 2, 5, 7, 18, 19, 20; iii. 31, 36, 37, 58 [see Introduction, Add. Rem., p. 32. If Adonai is the correct reading, its significance is thus explained by WORDSWORTH: "The prophet appears thus to intimate in the Lamentations, that now, in her captivity and humiliation, Jerusalem felt the lordship of Jehovah, the God of Israel; but by reason of her sins, no longer felt that lordship to be exercised by Him as Jehovah, i. e., as the God of His covenanted people, to protect them. A similar feeling made Solomon abstain in Ecclesiastes from the use of the name Jehovah altogether."]

[The argument of OWEN for reading יצקרו instead of יצקרו, that where all the versions agree, there is a strong presumption that they are right, is offset by the difficulty of construction in that case and the necessity it involves of changing יצקרו into יצקרו upon in the first clause, and the verb יצקרו they rise up into the noun and pronoun יצקרו his yoke in the third clause. The difficulties of construction are evident in the translations of BLAYNEY and OWEN, the two advocates for this reading; BLAYNEY gives the verb in the singular a plural noun for its subject, my transgressions have been closely watched; and OWEN renders the verb, which is confessedly a passive verb and so rendered by the Sept. and all the old versions except the Vulgate, which OWEN himself says "hardly gives any meaning," in an active sense, He hath watched over my transgressions. A reading involving three changes in the Masoretic points, and even then incapable of correct grammatical construction, surely ought to be rejected.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 15 The Lord hath trodden under foot.—Hath cast away, or rejected [despised or made despicable—W. H. H.]. This verse begins in the literal style of speaking, and ends in the metaphorical. [If our English version is to be retained, trodden under foot, then the metaphor is begun in the first clause, and beautifully developed as the verse proceeds. But the E. V. cannot be sustained, see Critical Note below.—W. H. H.] All my mighty men.—Heroes, Ger. Helden [FRANKST: great men].—In the midst of me; in meiner Mitte. [CALVIN. "She says, in the midst of me. And this ought to be observed, for if they had fallen on the field of battle, if they had been taken in the fields by their enemies, such a thing would not have been so grievous; but that they had thus been laid prostrate"—or rather, deprived of strength to resist and thus rendered contemptible,—"in the very bosom of the city, was indeed a token of vengeance from above."—He hath called an assembly against me.—He has proclaimed a solemn feast [a set time.—W. H. H.] against me.—to crush my young men,—to break in pieces my young men. As to a festive gathering the Lord calls her enemies to Jerusalem. The purpose of this festive gathering is indicated in a general way by the words against me; but is more clearly indicated by the words to crush or break in pieces my young men. In this expression is already shadowed forth the following metaphor; for the wine-press breaks to pieces, crushes the berries. [WORDSWORTH: "An oxymoron; the term to call an assembly signifies the gathering of a holy convocation for festal rejoicing, or other religious purposes. But now the religious festival of Jerusalem hath ceased (see ver. 4), and God has called an assembly of enemies to crush her. Compare the expression to sanctify war, or consecrate an army against a city. See on Isa. xiii. 3; Jer. vi. 4; li. 27, 28; Joel iii. 9."—Though it may impair a beautiful figure, it seems better to take כָּרַס in its usual meaning of a set time. God appointed the time, as for a great solemnity, and it came according to His appointment the time to crush the young men.—W. H. H.]—The Lord hath trodden the virgin, the daughter of Judah, as in a wine-press.—The Lord trod the wine-press of the virgin Judah's daughter. We find substantially the same image used, Joel iv. 13; Isa. lxiii. 2, 3; Rev. xiv. 18-20; xix. 15. [OWEN: The wine-press has the Lord trodden as to the virgin, the daughter of Judah.]

כָּרַס. The meaning is tollere, lüpfen [to lift up, to remove a thing from its place, to cast it away, and thus to treat it with contempt, or to destroy it, as the case may be. The old lexicographers, tracing a remote analogy between this verb and כָּרַד, gave to it the sense of treading down, or treading under foot, which is adopted here by E. V., BROUGHTON, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD and NOYES; but has not the sanction of the ancient versions. CRANMER and BISHOPS' BIBLE translate it hath destroyed. HENDERSON: hath cast away. So NÄGELSBACH: verworfen hat: so also the Sept., ἐξῆρεν, and the Vulg., abstulit. So also NOYES in Ps. cxix. 118, "Thou castest off all who depart from Thy laws;" which ALEXANDER translates, "Thou despisest all those straying from Thy statutes," in which he agrees with the Sept., ἐξουδενώσας, and with the Vulg., sprevisisti. This sense, "Thou hast despised," is very suitable to our text. It is still better to give the Piel the force of Hiphil, Thou hast caused to be despised, or rendered despicable, "my mighty men in the midst of me." See CALVIN's note above on the words "in the midst of me," and observe how admirably then the first clause of this verse follows the last clause of the preceding verse: She is given up into the hands of those she cannot resist, and thus her mighty men in the midst of her are made objects of contempt. On the other hand, to translate as NÄGELSBACH, FÜRST and HENDERSON, "The Lord has rejected, or cast away, all my mighty men in the midst of me," is awkward and not very intelligible.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 16. For these things I weep.—This refers back to ver. 12. Zion [Jerusalem] asserted in ver. 12 that no sorrow was like her sorrow. The correctness of this assertion is established, vers. 13-15, by matters of fact. Zion [Jerusalem] then, in ver. 16, refers in the words for these things I weep, back to the foregoing assertion, whilst she repeats the same with emphasis though in other words.—Mine eye, mine eye. The emphatic repetition of the same word is not infrequent with Jeremiah; iv. 19; vi. 14; viii. 11; xxiii. 25.—Runneth down with water. See iii. 48; Jer. ix. 17; xiii. 17; xiv. 17.—Because the comforter. See ver. 2.—that should relieve (marg., bring back) my soul,—the Reviver of my soul: see at ver. 11 [the Restorer of my soul, more nearly expresses the original, which is purposely generic and pregnant.—W. H. H.]—Is far from me. [Five times in this poem we have an allusion to an absent comforter; vers. 2, 9, 16, 17, 21. That there is an allusion to God the Holy Ghost seems evident. The addition of the words "Restorer of my soul," reminding us of Ps. xxiii. 3, makes this plain. DIODATI: "The comforter, namely, God by His Holy Spirit." It was the absence of God who comforts His people by His word and Spirit, that Jerusalem deplored, and she might have expressed her grief in the words of the Psalmist, "Why standest Thou afar off, O Jehovah? Why hidest Thou Thyself in times of trouble (x. 1)?" NOYES betrays the theologium odium in his version, violating the grammar and changing the text, to destroy any possible reference to a Divine personality, "Far from me are they that should comfort me, that should restore my strength." We may translate כִּנְיָחַם the comforter, or a comforter, the one comforting, one that comforts, but cannot make plurals of it and כִּנְיָחַם, or get the idea of "strength" out of כִּנְיָחַם.—W. H. H.]—My children are become desolate,—perished, lit., have become perishing; same word as is used in ver. 4, "her gates are desolate"—destroyed.—W. H. H.]—Because the enemy prevailed—prevails [or has become more powerful. Some take this as if an explanation of the preceding,—that Jerusalem is comfortless because the children, who should comfort her, are themselves helpless. But this is too broad a distinction between Jerusalem and her children, and destroys the unity of the ideal image of the mourning daughter of Jerusalem. We are to take the last words as stating a result, rather than a cause of the helpless Jerusalem, forsaken of her comforter, who could restore her life, and therefore unable to prevent her children from perishing under the superior power of the enemy.—W. H. H.]

[עֵינַי עֵינַי. Mine eye, mine eye. BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD and NOYES omit the repetition on the authority of the ancient versions and some Hebrew MSS. All the other modern versions retain it; even the Douay departs from the Vulgate so far as to read "my eyes." We cannot agree with BLAYNEY that the repetition incumbers the metre. It is more difficult to account for the repetition in so many MSS. than for its omission in a very few. BLAYNEY feels this, when he taxes his ingenuity by suggesting that "perhaps עֵינַי may originally have followed בְּיָדֶיהָ, and have been thus the ground of the transcriber's mistake." OWEN, the editor of CALVIN, says: "Though the Sept. and Vulg. do not repeat the 'eye,' yet the Targ. has 'my two eyes'" [so the German, meine beiden Augen] "and the Syr. 'mine eyes.'" All the ancient versions, therefore, do not omit the second עַיִן, as has been asserted. Most of the Heb. MSS. contain it; and it is very emphatic, highly poetical, and "quite in the style of Jeremiah."—W. H. H.]

I. 17.

17 Zion spreadeth forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her: the LORD hath commanded concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him: Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 17.—פָּרְשֵׁהָ. The construction of Piel with פָּ follows the analogy of the Hiphil, then too Piel may have a direct causative signification. See my Gr. §18, III., 2, 3; §69, 1, rem. 2. The Hiphil is found so construed in Jer. xviii. 16. See Ps. xxii. 8; Job xvi. 10. ["As the object of an action may, in certain cases, be regarded as the instrument with which it is performed, some transitive verbs admit a construction with פָּ, with" (GREEN'S Gr., § 272, 2, b) See Judg. iii. 27, פָּרְשֵׁהָ בְּשׁוֹפָר. BLAUNY: "Five MSS. read בִּידָה, and the Roman edition of the LXX. represents χεῖρας αὐτης in the singular; but the Alexand. and Complut. editions read χεῖρας."—W. H. H.]—לִיעֲקֹב. לִ here is not a sign of the dative, but a preposition of place. [CHALDEUS explains, as quoted by ROSENMUELLER, 'Jehovah imposed on the house of Jacob the commandments and law, that they should keep them; but they themselves transgressed the decree of His word.' It is impossible to crowd so much meaning into three words. The לִ obviously does not indicate a commandment given to Jacob, but a commandment given concerning Jacob. See לִבְתִּילַת, ver. 15.—The ancient versions which give בִּידָה, ver. 8, the idea of wandering, all agree that נָרָה in this verse has the sense of uncleanness. Yet OWEN would insist on translating it here "a wanderer" or fugitive.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 17. The excited speech, begun with last clause of ver. 11, ends with ver. 16, as if from sheer exhaustion. We get the impression from ver. 16, that Zion [Jerusalem] can speak no more on account of pain and tears. Therefore the Poet allows her a pause. He speaks again himself, in order partly to corroborate what has been said, and partly to adduce new matter. [There is no necessity for assuming a change of speakers. See remarks on vers. 11, 12.—The three ideal persons successively introduced in vers. 1-6, representing the city, the nation, and the Temple,—Jerusalem, Judah, and Zion,—appear again, grouped together, in ver. 17, but in a reverse order,—Zion, Jacob, and Jerusalem.—The poetical effect of this separate stanza, following and preceding several connected stanzas, is very fine.—W. H. H.]

Zion spreadeth forth—stretches out—her hands, and there is none to comfort her,—but there is no Comforter for her. See ver. 2. The underlying thought is evidently this: Zion imploringly stretched out her hands for help, but finds none, neither from men nor from God, for Jehovah Himself commanded her neighbors, from whom first of all help was to be expected, to behave in an unfriendly way towards her. [HENDERSON: "Spreading out the hands is a token of the greatest distress." The commentators generally agree in regarding this as a gesture indicating pain; some even regard it in the sense of wringing the hands; so CHALDEUS, quoted by ROSENMUELLER, expandit Zion manus suas prae angustia, sicut expandit mulier, qui sedet ad pariendum." (See Jer. iv. 31.) But holding up or stretching out the hands is a natural gesture of entreaty, and is constantly used in the Bible in connection with prayer to God. See especially Ex. ix. 29, 33; 1 Kings viii. 33; Is. i. 15; Ps. xlv. 21; exliiii. 6, where the same Hebrew verb is used as here. NAGELSBACH, ADAM CLARK and ASSEMBLY'S ANNOTATIONS give it this sense in our text. And it is exceedingly appropriate as an act of Zion, the ideal representative of the religious element of the theocracy and the seat of worship. Zion stretches out her hands in prayer, seeking the Divine Comforter (see ver. 16), but finds Him not: while Jacob, the representative of the theocratic people, is surrounded with enemies, and the queenly city, the seat of the theocratic government, is become an object of abhorrence.—The unusual occurrence in the Hebrew of the preposition with before the word hands led some of the Jews to adopt a singular translation, which DIONATI adopted in the Italian version: "Sion distributeth bread to herself with her own hands." A description of the want of comfort, because that amongst the Jews, the kinsfolks and neighbors did use to bring food to them that mourned for the death of their nearest friends, inviting them to take food and to comfort themselves; see Deut. xxvi. 14; Jer. xvi. 7; Ezek. xxiv. 17; Hos. ix. 4." DIONATI'S ANNOTATIONS.—W. H. H.]—The Lord [Jehovah] hath commanded—given a charge, see Num. xxvii. 19—concerning Jacob, that his adversaries should be round about him,—that his neighbors should be his enemies. The word translated in E. V. round about him does not indicate the place where his enemies were assembled, but is to be understood personally, as Jer. xlviii. 17, 39: Jehovah so ordered it that his neighbors became his oppressors.

[The use of the masculine pronoun his, instead of the feminine her, shows that there is a distinction between the ideal persons described. When the same person is introduced in ver. 3, under the tribal name of Judah, the feminine particles are used: but the substitution of the name "Jacob" suggests with propriety the idea of a man, rather than of a woman.—The use of masculine or feminine forms in Hebrew indicate often delicate shades of feeling or depths of thought. See PAULI'S Analecta, Lect. XXX.—W. II. H.]—Jerusalem is as a menstruous woman among them—Jerusalem has become an object of abhorrence in the midst of them. The consequence is that Zion [Jerusalem] at last stands in the midst of her oppressors as a woman defiled with blood and become an object of horror.

I. 18, 19.

- 18 The LORD is righteous; for I have rebelled against his commandment: hear, I pray you, all people, and behold my sorrow: my virgins and my young men are gone 19 into captivity. I called for my lovers, but they deceived me; my priests and mine elders gave up the ghost in the city, while they sought their meat to relieve their souls.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 18.—כִּי־פִיהוּ כְרִיתִי. This phrase in full does not occur in Jeremiah. He uses כָּרָה alone, with an accusative following, iv. 7, comp. v. 23.—[HENDERSON: "For עַמִּים read with the Keri הַעַמִּים in the vocative." All ye peoples; BROUGHTON, CRANMER, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, NOYES.—W. II. H.]

Ver. 19.—The Part. כָּאֵהָב is found in Jeremiah, xxii. 20, 22; xxx. 14.—He also uses רָכַח, iv. 20, but not in Piel.—יָנַח is not found in Jeremiah.—[The ׀ prefixed to יִשְׁכְּבוּ has the force of in order that, as in Job x. 20, and the phrase is fully translated by our infinitive.—The Sept. and Syr. add the words—and found none.—W. II. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 18. Vers. 18, 19 contain nothing new. They only recapitulate. But it is noteworthy that Zion [Jerusalem], who is now again in a condition to speak [see remarks on preceding verse], begins with an acknowledgment of the righteousness of God and of her own unrighteousness.—The Lord is righteous—Righteous is He, Jehovah. [OWEN: "Righteous He Jehovah: the pronoun is used instead of the verb is—a common thing in Hebrew."] This acknowledgment, that the Lord is righteous, is found in Jer. xii. 1. See Deut. xxxii. 4; 2 Chron. xii. 6; Ps. cxix. 137; cxxix. 4; cxlv. 17.—For I have rebelled against His commandment. Better, disobeyed His commandment, lit., resisted His mouth. The same expression occurs in Num. xx. 24; xxvii. 14; 1 Kings xiii. 21, 26.—Hear, I pray you [the Heb. particle of entreaty, שָׁ], all people [lit., all peoples], and behold my sorrow. Although willing to confess her guilt, yet Zion [Jerusalem] feels the need of human sympathy. She summons, therefore, as in ver. 12, all peoples to observe her sorrow. [Since men of the acknowledged taste of HENDERSON and NOYES sanction the use of the reduplicated plural peoples, we may be allowed to retain it; especially since no other word in English is its exact equivalent.—W. II. H.]—Then she recounts, as in vers. 13-15, the principal causes of her sorrow. The first is the captivity of her young women and young men, who are her pride and strength.—My virgins and my young men are gone into captivity. See vers. 4, 5, 15.

Ver. 19. The second particular feature of her sorrow is, that her friends and allies had deserted her.—I called for my lovers, but they deceived me—I called to my lovers, they deceived me. See ver. 2.—The last and crowning cause of her sorrow is, that those who represented the dignity and honor of Zion [Jerusalem] are reduced to miserable extremities in order to preserve their lives.—My priests and mine elders gave up the ghost—expired or perished—in the city. [HENDERSON: "Elders, occurring as it here does in immediate connection with priests, is to be understood in an official sense, and not as simply indicative of old age. Both, without respect to dignity of office, were under the necessity of going in quest of food." They died in the city—not from the sword of the enemy on the battle-field, but while hemmed in by surrounding enemies, and seeking food in vain within the walls; they perished from sheer starvation.—W. II. H.]—While they sought their meat to relieve their souls—for they sought food for themselves in order to revive their souls. See vers. 6-11. [WORDSWORTH: "for they (even the priests and elders) sought for meat (and sought in vain) to recover their fainting souls." For themselves, לָלוּ; ROSEN-MUELLER explains the pronoun as used in a reflexive or reciprocal sense. It is certainly emphatic, and suggests the severity of the famine, when the nobility are forced to go themselves in search of food to preserve their own lives.—W. II. H.]

I. 20-22.

20 Behold, O LORD, for I am in distress; my bowels are troubled; mine heart is turned within me: for I have grievously rebelled: abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there
 21 is as death. They have heard that I sigh; there is none to comfort me: all mine enemies have heard of my trouble; they are glad that thou hast done it: thou wilt bring 22 the day that thou hast called, and they shall be like unto me. Let all their wickedness come before thee; and do unto them as thou hast done unto me for all my transgressions: for my sighs are many, and my heart is faint.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 20.—The sing. צַר never occurs in Jeremiah. See ver. 5. [NÆGELSBACH here, inadvertently (or else he would have cited this ver. at ver. 5), mistakes the noun צָר or צַר, used at ver. 5, for this צַר, which is 3d sing. perf. of צָרַר, and is so given by GESENIUS, FÜRST and DAVIDSON, and is translated as a verb by nearly all the versions.—W. H. H.]—יָנִין In Jer. iv. 19; xxxi. 20.—חֲכַרְכַּרְוּ, to boil, move in an undulating manner; except here and ii. 11, only in Job xvi. 16.—See OLSEN, § 252, b.—The pause accent Athenai belongs under קִרְבֵּי. [An unnecessary change of punctuation.—W. H. H.]—כָּרָה. See ver. 18. The Inf. כָּרוּ is found only here.—The Piel שָׁכַל, in Jer. xv. 7. Comp. i. 9; Lev. xxvi. 22; 1 Sam. xv. 32.—כָּחוּן-וּ, foris, Jer. xxi. 4.

Ver. 21.—שָׁרַעְתִּי. The Sept. and Syr. improperly render it in the Imperative.—W. H. H.]—אָנַחְתִּי, see ver. 4.—רָעָה, a very current word with Jeremiah.—עִישֵׂת, Jer. xxxii. 41.—עִישֵׂת as the antithesis of speaking, as Jer. iii. 5. [If we take doing here as the antithesis of speaking, the absence of the affix is emphatical. Thou hast done, acted, as well as spoken. This verb often occurs without an object expressed. See FÜRST, Lex.—W. H. H.]—הִבְאֵתָהּ, as Jer. vi. 19; xi. 11, and elsewhere.—קָרָא, of prophetic proclamation, Jer. ii. 2; vii. 2; xix. 2.

Ver. 22.—הִבָּאָה. On account of the Imperative יָבֹאוּ, we must understand this as stronger than a wish: let it come, which is grammatically allowable. See my Gr., § 89, 3 c.—The phrase בָּאָה רָעָה לְבָנִי is not found in Jeremiah.—יָבֹאוּ. See ver. 12. [WORDSWORTH says, "the primary notion" of this word "seems to be that of plucking," and refers to GESEN., 633. So CRAMER'S L.: Thou shalt pluck them away even as thou hast plucked me. The Sept. gives it the sense of racemandi, gleanings; and substitutes 3d person plur. for 2d sing., and does not translate לִי at all. Καὶ ἐπιφύλλισον αὐτοῖς, ὡς τρόπον ἐποίησαν ἐπιφύλλιδα. The Vulg. takes it in the sense of gathering the vintage, and preserves the grammatical construction of the original: vindemia eos sicut vindemiasti me. Instead of the ἐπιφύλλισον of the Codex Vaticanus, the Codex Alexandrinus has ἐπιφύλλισον, which seems to mean reject them as vile. That our version is correct would appear from the use of יָבֹאוּ for actions, doings, or deeds. See Jer. xvii. 10; Prov. xx. 11. See ROSENMUELLER.—W. H. H.]—יָגַל כָּל-פִּשְׁעֵי לִבִּי. See ver. 5, 14.—אָנַחְתִּי, ver. 6.—דָּוִן-יָגַל is found in Jeremiah, viii. 15, comp. Is. i. 5.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Poet closes with a prayer, which is composed of an exordium, ver. 20 a; two principal parts: 1. Ver. 20 b, to ver. 21 c. 2. Ver. 21 c, to ver. 22 c; and a conclusion, ver. 22 c.

Ver. 20. Behold, O Lord; for I am in distress.—Behold, O Jehovah, how I am distressed! With these words, Behold, O Jehovah, how badly it fares with me, first of all, the attention of Jehovah is directed to Zion, and her misfortune is in general terms commended to His consideration.—The words Behold, O Jehovah, are the same as See, O Jehovah, of ver. 11.—Then follows the first part of the prayer, which extends to ver. 21 c, in which are successively detailed the causes of her distress, proceeding from those of an internal to those of an external character. 1. We have her sufferings subjectively considered, in two particulars—(a). My bowels are troubled. [HENDERSON: My bowels are made to boil. NÆGELSBACH: Meine Eingeweide wallen siedend auf. The Hebrew word "is strongly expressive of that violently excited state of the intestines which is occasioned by excessive grief" (HENDERSON), or rather, which was employed as an image of mental perturbations and distress.—W. H. H.] (b).—Mine heart is turned within me. The expression is found in this sense, of the turning of the heart as a symptom of the most painful affection, only elsewhere in Hos. xi. 8. In another sense, Ex. xiv. 5.—2. We have a statement of the reason which has occasioned her chastisement.—For I have grievously rebelled. Since I rebelliously have rebelled. These words belong evidently to what follows, and accordingly the particle at the beginning is not for, but since, or because. For the first and immediate result of disobedience was the punishment described in what follows, rather than the suffering caused by that punishment. Besides if this clause belongs to what precedes it, then the first half of the verse has four members, and the last only two. [The sense is not affected, whether we connect this with what precedes, or with what follows. The irregular division of the verses is too common to authorize here a change in the Masoretic punctuation, such as NÆGELSBACH proposes (see Gram. note above), merely for the sake of an equal division of this verse.—W. H. H.]—3. We have the punishment itself in declarations of concentrated meaning.—Abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death.—Rages without the sword, as within Death. For the sense according to kindred places, we have Jer. xiv. 18; Ez. vii. 15. By death in antithesis to the sword it is natural to understand, death wrought by hunger, or pestilence. See Jer. xv. 2; xviii. 21. [BOOTHROYD: "Death as it were acting in propria persona, and not by the instrumentality of another, as when a person is slain by the sword" (Biblia Hebraica). See Jer. ix. 21; Hab. ii. 5. ADAM CLARK gives examples from the poets of similar personification of death. —W. II. II.]

[צַר לִי, impers. lit., it is strait to me, that is, I am in a strait, I am distressed, I grieve. לִי-צַר-לִי seems itself a cry of distress, the sharpness of which is lost in the E. V., for I am in distress.—My bowels, etc. It seems impossible to reproduce this in an English form; at least our ideas of the commotions of the bowels have no association with agitations of the mind. To say with HENDERSON, "my bowels are made to boil," though it seems to be sanctioned by the meaning of the verb, yet does not really express the idea of violent motion, as witnessed in boiling water, or the surging of the ocean, which is the idea intended. To say with NOYES, My bowels boil, is worse yet, as the verb is strictly passive. If we might be allowed to ignore the figure, and say simply, my mind is greatly agitated, we would more correctly interpret the words to English ears, than by a figurative use of the word bowels, that never was ingrafted into English thoughts and feelings. If we could accept the opinion that in ancient usage the word bowels denoted the upper viscera and was not restricted as by modern usage to the lower viscera (see ALEXANDER on Is. xvi. 11), we might substitute the word bosom with advantage. But accepting the usual signification of כָּעֵי, we can give to הִכְרַחֲבֵנִי no other English form than we have done, greatly troubled. OWEN: "Troubled, or disquieted, is the rendering of all the versions, and also of the Targ. As it is a reduplicate, the verb means greatly troubled or greatly disturbed, or violently agitated."—לִי-יָהַרְבַּן

יָהַרְבַּן. ROSENUELLER refers to a similar phrase in Ps. xxxviii. 11; לִבִּי כְתָרָר, cor meum circumit, circumagitur: ALEXANDER explains it of "the palpitation of the heart, denoting violent agitation."—W. H. II.]—The reading כְּפִתּוֹת, whatever may be urged against it, is very old, for the Sept. has ὡς περὶ θάνατος. But it is impossible to attach to this כּ (if it be understood here as a particle of comparison, or as a so-called Kaph veritatis), a pertinent sense. For פִּתּוֹת stands here in antithesis to כְּהוֹיֵץ; כְּהוֹיֵץ is their common predicate; and to fill out the sense there should be a subject indicated corresponding to חָרַב. To supply חָרַב again, or with EWALD the idea "something similar" before כְּפִתּוֹת, would give us a construction in the highest degree forced and unnatural. Unless we suppose a mistake of the transcriber and read simply חָרַב, as the Syriac has it, there is nothing left but to transpose the words, and to read כְּפִתּוֹת בְּפִתּוֹת, which the text of the Sept. seems to sanction, for since the Sept. translates ὡς θάνατος ἐν οἴκῳ, its authors apparently read the Hebrew words in the order indicated. [ROSENUELLER: "PAREAU regards the כּ, placed before כְּפִתּוֹת in this place, not as the particle of similitude, but what the Grammatarians call the כּ veritatis, which not seldom is used for the name of the thing or person referred to. But I prefer to suppose, with LÖWE and WOLFSOHN, that the words are to be transposed, as may be done; מְהוֹיֵץ שְׁפִלָּה חָרַב כְּפִתּוֹת בְּפִתּוֹת, without the sword bereaves, even as death within."—HENDERSON has a curiously unsatisfactory remark, which his translation does not clear up, "the Caph is the Caph veritatis expressing the reality of the thing." What "thing?" Famine or pestilence? We must either adopt NÆGELSBACH's opinion, with which Sept., Syr. and Arab. agree, and transpose the words, Abroad the sword has bereaved me, as death at home; or suppose an awkward prosopopœia in the substitution of the word death for famine or pestilence, in which case the כּ is strictly the כּ veritatis; or we must translate as HENDERSON (though his translation is at variance with his explanation), Abroad the sword bereaveth, in the house it is as death, and accept the suggestion of CALVIN, that the כּ is the כּ of similitude, at home it is as death, as if he would say, nothing met them at home but that which was like death itself. There is as little, if not less, difficulty in the first of these explanations, as in either of the others.—W. II. II.]

Ver. 21. 4. We have the rejoicing of her enemies at her misfortunes. This subject, now first alluded to, the Poet dwells upon at some length, whilst he only briefly indicated the matters that have been mentioned.—They have heard that I sigh, there is none to comfort me,—that I have no comforter.—All mine enemies have heard of my trouble. What the enemies heard is described as if it came to them borne on successive waves of rumor, proceeding by degrees from the circumference to the very centre of their grief. At first they heard how Zion [Jerusalem] bitterly mourned, because left alone, without Comforter and Helper (see ver. 2), she was exposed to the violence of her enemies. Then they [her enemies] began to comprehend the nature and extent of her misfortune. But they rejoiced that Jehovah had done it, that is to say, He had actually brought about the day which He had before predicted.—They are glad that Thou hast done it, Thou wilt bring the day that Thou hast called (Marg., proclaimed). They rejoiced because Thou hast done it, that Thou hast brought the day Thou hadst proclaimed. It will be observed that I take the last clause as epexegetical. This seems to me necessary. For, 1. To give a precatory sense to the last clause [as LUTHER, let the day come; HENDERSON: Bring the day which Thou hast announced; NOYES: O bring the day which Thou hast appointed.—W. II. H.] is very forced. 2. These words are a very suitable explanation of the preceding clause: the Lord has done it by bringing about in fact the day He had predicted or proclaimed, that is to say, He had not merely spoken, but acted [not merely threatened, but carried His threat into execution, by doing what He had said

He would do]. Least of all can we say, Thou bringest, Thou proclaimest the day, for this would require a change in the order of the words in the Hebrew, and the text should read וְהָיָה יוֹם הַבְּרָאָה. EWALD, following the Sept. [Ἐπιήγαγες ἡμέραν, ἐκάλεσας καιρὸν], supplies וְהָיָה [an appointed time] after וְהָיָה יוֹם הַבְּרָאָה. This is unnecessary and arbitrary. [CALVIN explains this clause as NAEGELSBACH does: and his English translator, OWEN, remarks: "Our version is wrong in rendering this clause in the future tense. The reference is not to the day of vengeance to the Babylonians, but to the day of vengeance which God had brought on His own people. The versions, except the Syr., give the verb in the past tense." So WORDSWORTH: "They are glad that Thou hast done it; that Thou hast brought (upon me) the day (of sorrow) which Thou hadst proclaimed (by Thy prophets, who warned me of my impending destruction)." — W. H. H.]. That the Lord had threatened the people of Israel with eventual destruction, was well known to the heathen. See Jer. xl. 2, 3. — And they shall be like unto me. The second principal part of the prayer begins with this petition, that the Lord would visit her enemies with the same fate which had befallen her. [WORDSWORTH: "The Edomites, Moabites and Ammonites, who exulted over the destruction of Jerusalem, will share the same fate, at the hand of the same enemy. See iv. 21; Jer. xii. 14; xxv. 21; and Babylon herself also will be punished for her cruelty to Zion (Jer. l. 9, 10; li. 35; Is. xlvii. 6)]."

It cannot be objected to the above interpretation, that then the adversative sentence should begin with וְהָיָה, for the subject of the adversative sentence is the same as that of the preceding one, only viewed in a different light. Whilst what precedes shows what the enemies hitherto had done (שָׂשׂוּ, שָׂכְנוּ, שָׂכְעוּ), the adversative sentence shows what in the future will be done to them: therefore, from וְהָיָה יוֹם הַבְּרָאָה the perfect only is used, from וְהָיָה יוֹם הַבְּרָאָה the imperfect only. If the sentence began with וְהָיָה יוֹם הַבְּרָאָה, the proper grammatical construction would be וְהָיָה יוֹם הַבְּרָאָה.

כְּכִנִּי. — [שָׂכְעוּ]. ROSENMUELLER: "In the repetition of this word there is emphasis, as below, iii. 43, 44; Ps. cxxiv. 1, 2. The introduction of this verb, at first, without a subject expressed, was doubtless an expedient suggested by the alphabetical arrangement of the verses which required an initial ש: but its introduction in the next clause, with the subject expressed, and that in an intensified form, — "heard (have they) that I sigh," etc. — "ALL my enemies heard of my trouble," — is one of those triumphs of the art of the true poet, by which he makes even the artificial and arbitrary laws of poetry contribute to the force and beauty of his sentiments. — כִּי. OWEN: "There are here two instances of כִּי being carried on to the next clause, —

Heard have they that I sigh, that I have no comforter:
All mine enemies have heard of my evil: they have rejoiced
That Thou hast done it, that Thou hast brought the day
Thou hast announced."

It is better, however, to consider each כִּי as uniting the two clauses that follow it as in close apposition, in each case the latter clause being explanatory of the preceding one: They heard that I sigh, I have no comforter, i. e., I sigh because I have no comforter. They rejoiced that Thou hast done it, Thou hast brought the day, i. e., Thou hast done it by bringing the day. — Thou hast done it. The gloss of the famous Jew, JARCHI, quoted by ROSENMUELLER, is singular, and shows what far-fetched interpretations of Scripture have been allowed: "Thou hast afforded the occasion why my enemies have hated me and rejoiced in my misfortune, because Thou hast given us commandment not to eat and drink what they do, nor to enter into marriages with them. If only I had joined myself in marriage with them, they would have been disposed to pity me and the children of their own daughters." — W. H. H.]

Ver. 22. Let all their wickedness come before Thee. The expression come before Thee is to be understood in the sense of becoming acquainted with. See Gen. xxxvii. 2. — And do unto them as thou hast done unto me for all my transgressions [see gram. notes above]. For my sighs are many and my heart is faint. The conclusion of the prayer contains a declaration of fact. It is impossible to refer this to the thoughts immediately before expressed: for neither confession of sin ("for all my transgressions"), nor prayer for the retribution of the injustice done by her enemies ("do unto them as they have done unto me"), could suggest this concluding sentence. Rather, it relates generally to the prayer for help, which is contained as well under the second head, as in the first part of the prayer. This last clause, containing the evidence of her need of help, naturally recalls the prayer for help.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Vers. 1-3. This change of fortune, befallen the holy city and holy people, may well claim our sympathy in the highest degree. But at the same time we should let it be to us a solemn warning. For if this was done to the green tree, what shall be done to the dry (Luke xxiii. 31)? If God rejected the people whom He called the apple of His eye (Deut. xxxii. 10), if He exposed to destruction the city, in reference to which He said, that "His fire is in Zion, and His furnace in Jerusalem" (Is. xxxi. 9), what claim can the people, kingdoms and dynasties of the Gentiles have? — what claim can the particular Christian churches even have? — what claim can Rome, Geneva and Wirttemberg have to the privilege of eternal existence? Truly, since the Lord could destroy Jerusalem and entirely lay waste Canaan, without being unfaithful to His promise given to the Fathers, even so He can remove the candlestick of every particular Christian church, without breaking the promise given to the church at large, that the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it (Matth. xvi. 18).

2. Vers. 1-11. "From Jeremiah's passionate lamentation over the wretched condition of the Jewish land and people, we derive a lesson in reference to the manner in which one in great affliction and misery may be allowed to behave.

There have been found, among the heathen, persons reputed for wisdom, some of whom have held the opinion, that a wise, intelligent man should be altogether emotionless, neither rejoicing in good fortune, nor cast down by bad fortune, but willing to let things be as they are. But we see the very opposite of this in pious, holy persons, especially here in Jeremiah, where he bitterly laments the misery of his people and fatherland. Could he have hoped for deliverance from that misery, or any mitigation of it, how heartily would he have rejoiced! And such emotions, if properly controlled, are not obnoxious to God, since He Himself has implanted them in our human nature. As it would displease a faithful father, should his children laugh when he punished them, so it cannot please God when His people show no sign of grief on account of His chastisements. If we should, in the ordinary affairs of life, rejoice with those who rejoice, and weep with those who weep (Rom. xii. 15), and as the elect of God, holy and beloved, should manifest hearty commiseration towards the suffering (Col. iii. 12), much more should we, in times of general and national calamities, not then be joyful, but heartily mourn and lament on account of the losses and evils suffered by the public generally. Those who do not so, the Lord God reproves; because they eat and drink joyfully, and are not at all concerned for the calamity of Joseph, He threatens severely to punish their false security." WUERTEM. SUMM.

3. Ver. 1. The Targum Jonathan compares the destruction of Jerusalem with the expulsion from Paradise: "It was with Jerusalem as with Adam and Eve, when they were judged, who were ejected from the Paradise of pleasure, and then the Governor of the universe lamented over them."—ORIGEN conceives that under the image of Jerusalem, formerly noble and splendid, but now become widowed and servile, the human soul is represented: "In a sublimer sense, Jerusalem, in the enjoyment of felicity, abounding in people and nations, and the head of provinces, is the (divina est anima) soul which is of divine origin. * * * Even as we are permitted to see Jerusalem, living in the greatest prosperity, with a large population, crowded with foreigners, and head of the provinces, but when virtue fails, desolate and widowed and enslaved, so that it becomes tributary to the enemy that conquered it, so it happens to the soul of him who has fallen from virtue." GHISLER., p. 11.—So also OLYMPIODORUS: "She became as a widow, having been deprived of the bridegroom—the Logos."—So also RHABAN MAURUS: "Lamentation is made for the faithful soul of man, which formerly was full of virtues and controlled its various passions, governing the appetites of the flesh; but afterwards inflamed by the fire of lust through the agency of malignant spirits, deprived of angelical consolation and wanting divine communion, it was given over to serve as many masters as it had vices." Ibid., p. 10.—HUGO A SANCTO VICTORE: "When God reigning in our hearts governs us, then the flesh subjected serves Him in the outward life, and in proportion as we are inwardly more humbly submissive to Him, we have in a stronger degree the mastery over the outward life. Thus, therefore, our soul, when it had God for its King, was within 'full of people,' i. e., of virtues, and without was also 'mistress of the nations'—that is, of carnal desires, and 'a princess of provinces'—that is, of the bodily senses. But now she is 'solitary,' because she has lost her king; she is a 'widow,' because she is separated from her husband; she is 'tributary,' because she serves the vices to which she is subject." Ibid.

4. Ver. 1. Jerusalem, in this passage, is regarded by many as a type of the church. So says PASCHASIUS RABERTUS: "The Prophet mourns, not only because she sitteth in garments soiled with dust and earthly deeds (sedet pulvereis et terrenis operibus sordidata), but especially because she 'sitteth solitary.' Solitary, moreover, because 'as a widow.' And widowed, because she has been deserted by her husband on account of the filthiness of her turpitude. But it should be observed that she is said to be 'as a widow,' and not really a widow; since, although she is despised by her spouse, yet her rights of marriage remain, so that if she should reform and discharge the duties of her former love, she may at least receive her husband and immortality through her penitence." GHISLER., p. 9.—HUGO A SANCTO VICTORE allegorizes in another fashion: "How is it that while we perceive so many people in the church, we see the church herself 'solitary?' Because we can find hardly any one who may be esteemed as truly with the church. * * * As Christ remains untouched by the crowd pressing upon Him (Mark v. 24-34), so the church, the body of Christ, 'sitteth solitary' amidst a multitude, because the Catholic faith has many professors, but few imitators." Ibid., pp. 9, 10.—In another way still, the ABBOT RUPERT VON DEUTZ: "What city is it that was 'full of people,' etc.? That holy city, Jerusalem, forsooth, the mother of us all, whose citizens we are, whosoever of us are believers. That city, before the creation of the world, was already full of people in the foreknowledge or predestination of God. * * * How has it come to pass that she should sit solitary, should become as a widow, should pay tribute? Forsooth by transgressing; namely, by one man's sinning, the first man's, for in him the whole multitude of his posterity sinned and suffered condemnation. Thus has it come to pass that the holy city should sit solitary—should sit, as it were, as a widow, not having her husband—God, a church holy through faith, though cast out of Paradise, a wanderer in this world, suffering through exile, death and an offended Lord—that is, paying penal tribute for sin." Ibid., p. 10.

[5. Vers. 1-11. With regard to the allegorical and mystical interpretations of this song, we may adopt the language of KIRRO on 1 Sam. xvii: "Although we do not, with some, think that 'these things are an allegory,' * * * it is impossible for the experienced Christian to read it without being reminded of eventful passages in his own spiritual history. There is no doubt some mysterious connection between even the external things of Scripture history, and the inner things of our spiritual life, which 'the wise' are enabled, by the Spirit's teaching, to discern, and which renders the seemingly least spiritual parts of the holy writ richly nourishing to their souls"

(Daily Bible Illustrations).—SCOTT: "The serious mind perceives abundant cause to meditate, with solemn awe and deep concern, on the tokens of His indignation at the sins of men. * * * How is it that so many populous cities now sit solitary? That so many flourishing empires are now become tributary and enslaved? Whence are the tears, with which vast multitudes wear away their restless nights and joyless days; whilst they mourn the loss of dear relatives, the treachery of professed friends, the cruelty of enemies, the oppression of the powerful, the fury of persecutors, grievous servitude and multiplied afflictions? Whence is it, that idolaters now occupy the places where flourishing churches once were? That the ways of Zion are deserted, her ordinances interrupted or profaned, her gates desolated, her priests and people in bitterness, or cut off? How is it that the adversaries of the church are the chief, and prosper, and that her children are in captivity? However we may vary our inquiries, the same answer recurs: the fierce anger of the Lord for man's transgressions hath filled the earth with sighs and groans, with tears, sickness and death. * * * Sin fills our consciences with remorse and our hearts with terror; deprives the soul of strength and confidence; perverts every pleasant thing and every good gift of God, and even His truths, Sabbaths and ordinances into occasions of deeper condemnation and misery. * * * Among the manifold evil effects of sin, the pious mind is peculiarly grieved, when, being committed by professors of true religion, it causes the enemies of God to blaspheme, and to mock and scoff at the truths and ordinances of His word and worship. We be to the world because of such offences: and we be to those by whom such offences come, except their repentance be as deep as their transgressions are aggravated. We ought to prefer any of the other temporal effects of sin to this. Should any be wonderfully brought down from the height of affluence to the depth of penury; should their honor be changed for contempt; should they have no comforter in affliction, and be constrained to part with all their pleasant things for bread to sustain life; nay, should they have the prospect of dying by famine; yet all this ought to be considered as far less afflicting than that their sins should cause the name, truths and ordinances of God to be blasphemed; and men to stumble and fall and perish forever, through the increasing prejudice, hardness and impiety that they have excited. Even the profanation of sacred things, and the sacrilege of those who, in different ages, have laid their rapacious hands on the substance which was dedicated to the support of religion; and the contempt with which the clerical office hath been treated by profligates and infidels; have in great measure been chargeable upon the atrocious sins of professors and preachers of the gospel, who have rendered themselves vile, and exposed themselves to shame by their evident misconduct: and therefore the Lord hath made them vile and contemptible even to the most abandoned of mankind." (Practical Observations).—W. H. H.]

6. Vers. 1-3. "If God's chastisements begin, they come not once, twice, or thrice only, but they follow one after another, as one wave pursues another in a tempestuous ocean (Ps. xlii. 8). For no misfortune comes alone, as is plainly seen in the present instance in the case of the Jews." CRAMER according to EG. HUNNIUS (Ser. 2, p. 28).

7. Ver. 4. "What an unspeakable blessing of God it is, when He gives public tranquility, so that people may come in crowds and regularly observe the holy rites of Divine worship, the world knows not, until God creates a famine of His Word and people seek for it over land and water without finding it. Let us be admonished to love the Word of God and the sanctuary where it is preached. Example: David, Ps. xxvi. 8; xxvii. 4." CRAMER by EG. HUNNIUS (Ser. 2, p. 19). "O how many people there are who sigh after the precious gospel and have willingly gone in crowds over many miles to the places, where alone they could obtain and enjoy it. These will on that day stand up and condemn those, who have had it at their very doors, and yet have regarded it so disdainfully and treated it so carelessly." EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 2, p. 20.

8. Ver. 5. "God has, on account of Zion's sins, set her enemies in authority over her. What does not this signify! The enemy governs at pleasure! Thus the church must be trodden under foot by the world—and this drives her anew to penitence and prayer. The youth must go bound into slavery. To be obliged to see this, breaks the heart. He who will not understand that it is the enemy of souls, who leads the children, bound by lusts and false doctrine, to hell, that person must regard every thing that he reflects upon in a gross and literal sense." DIEDERICH.

9. Ver. 5. "The devil is the author of our spiritual captivity (Col. i. 13; 2 Tim. ii. 26), Christ is our Redeemer (John viii. 36), the means of redemption are—in respect to the price paid (ratione acquisitionis) the blood of Christ (Zech. ix. 11; Col. i. 14),—but with regard to its actual application to us (respectu autem exhibitionis) the Word and Sacraments, especially Baptism which by ST. BASIL, in his Homily on 'Holy Baptism,' is called 'the ransom for captives' (1sa. lxi. 1)." FÖRSTER.

10. Ver. 5. FÖRSTER here considers the question, how the participation of children in the sufferings of their parents for sins of which the children are innocent, may be explained. He refers in this connection to LUTHER's explanation of Ex. xx. 5, where it is said: "This question, why the son suffers for the father, the prophet Ezekiel hath treated of and says (xviii. 2), 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge;' and Jeremiah says (xxx. 29?), 'Our fathers have sinned and are gone, but we must suffer for their sins:—and it is still so in our days; we sin and deserve what those who come after us must suffer. We are not to understand by this that the child is damned on account of the father, as if it referred to the [eternal] punishment of souls. 'All souls,' says God by Ezekiel (xviii. 4), 'are mine: as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine; the soul that sinneth it shall die.' But we should understand this of temporal punishment; He punishes children on account of the fathers, by letting them die who must yet at any rate die."

11. Ver. 5. For the multitude of her transgressions.—"If thou fearest not sin, fear at least that which sin leads to." AUGUSTIN by FÖRSTER.

12. Ver. 6. Her princes have become like harts, etc.—"The deer is an extremely timid animal, and on that account the heart of a deer is reproachfully imputed to the timid, as appears by this verse of HOMER: "O son of Atreus, having dog's eyes and the heart of a stag." And the Apothegm of Philip of Macedon from STROEUS is well known: "an army of stags with a lion for a leader, were better than an army of lions with a stag for a leader." FÖRSTER.

13. Ver. 6. All her beauty is departed.—"Now they will consider well the mercies of the Lord they formerly possessed, and how little they had valued them. Such reflections God awakens by means of affliction, and herein again is mercy, though enjoyed only in the midst of tears." DIEDRICH.

14. Ver. 7. And did mock at her Sabbaths.—"A corresponding punishment (pœna αντίστροφός) answers, by the just judgment of God, to the sin of Sabbath profanation; viz., the derision of the Sabbath (comp. GREGOR. NAZIANZ. The festivals of the people become the door of sins)." FÖRSTER. [ADAM CLARKE: "The Jews were despised by the heathen for keeping the Sabbath. Juvenal mocks them on that account:

Cui septima quæque fuit lux Ignava et partem vitæ non attingit ullam. Sat. V.

'To whom every seventh day was a blank and formed not any part of their life.' ST. AUGUSTIN represents Seneca as doing the same:—"Intulit id eos facere affirmans, quod septimani ferme partem ætatis suæ perdent vacando, et multa in tempore urgentia, non agendo lædantur. "That they lost the seventh part of their life in keeping their Sabbaths; and injured themselves by abstaining from the performance of many necessary things in such times." He did not consider that the Roman calendar and customs gave them many more idle days than God had prescribed in Sabbaths to the Jews."]

15. Ver. 7. Jerusalem remembered.—Sinning first and remembering afterwards has brought many into great trouble.

16. Ver. 8. Jerusalem hath grievously sinned.—"We, Jerusalem, must suffer on account of our sins, and this chiefly makes our sorrows so very bitter: sin is the sting of death and of every evil." DIEDRICH. [CALVIN: "Here the Prophet expresses more clearly and strongly what he had briefly referred to, even that all the evil which the Jews suffered proceeded from God's vengeance, and that they were worthy of such a punishment, because they had not lightly offended, but had heaped up for themselves a dreadful judgment, since they had in all manner of ways abandoned themselves to impiety. It is common to all to mourn in adversities; but the end of the mourning of the unbelieving is perverseness, which at length breaks out into rage, when they feel their evils, and they do not in the meantime humble themselves before God. But the faithful do not harden themselves in their mourning, but reflect on themselves and examine their own life, and of their own accord prostrate themselves before God, and willingly submit to the sentence of condemnation, and confess that God is just."]

17. Ver. 9. [Her filthiness is in her skirts.—"Much of the Jewish law is employed in discriminating between things clean and unclean; in removing and making atonement for things polluted or prescribed: and under these ceremonies, as under a veil or covering, a meaning the most important and sacred is concealed, as would be apparent from the nature of them, even if we had not, besides, other clear and explicit authority for this opinion. Among the rest are certain diseases and infirmities of the body. * * * The sacred poets sometimes have recourse to these topics for imagery, even on the most momentous occasions, when they display the general depravity inherent in the human mind (Isa. lxi. 6), or exprobrate the corrupt manners of their own people (Isa. i. 5, 6, 16; Ez. xxxvi. 17), or when they deplore the abject state of the virgin, the daughter of Sion, polluted and exposed (Eam. i. 8, 9, 17; ii. 2). If we consider these metaphors without any reference to the religion of their authors, they will doubtless appear in some degree disgusting and inelegant; if we refer them to their genuine source, to the peculiar rites of the Hebrews, they will be found wanting neither in force nor in dignity." LOWTH: Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, Lec. VIII.]

18. Ver. 9. She remembereth not her last end.—"It is a peculiarity of sin, that while it may rest a long time in a man's heart without disturbing him, yet whenever God begins to show His wrath, it wakes up and stings as a serpent and makes a wound that no one can heal (Ecclesiasticus xxi. 2). It would be well for us to reflect, when the devil makes sin as sweet as honey, that there may be poison concealed in it." CRAMER by EG. HUNNIUS (Ser. III., p. 27). ["My son, hast thou sinned? Do so no more, but ask pardon for thy former sins: Flee from sin as from the face of a serpent; for if thou comest too near it, it will bite thee: the teeth thereof are as the teeth of a lion, slaying the souls of men. All iniquity is as a two-edged sword, the wounds whereof cannot be healed." Ecclesiasticus xxi. 1-3.]

19. Ver. 10. "If we have failed to keep diligently the gates of our heart and through some one of our senses lying open the old enemy have found entrance, he advances thence by means of depraved suggestions and illicit lusts into the very sanctuary of our soul, where the Holy Trinity used to dwell by means of true faith, and he despoils that sanctuary of the wisdom and virtues that beautify and embellish it, and we become miserable and most deserving of being overwhelmed with shame." RHABAN. MAURUS by GHSLER. p. 36.

20. Vers. 8-10. "Not the person, but the doctrine sanctifies a place, much less can a place sanctify the person and the doctrine. To which is pertinent that saying of JEROME in his Epistle to Heliodorus,—'It is not easy to stand in the place of Paul and to hold the rank of Peter, both of whom reign with Christ.' Whence it is said,—'They are not the sons of the saints who occupy the places of the saints, but those who do their works.' Wherefore if Jerusalem, the holiest of all cities in the judgment of God Himself, is nevertheless declared in our text to be the wickedest of all cities, who will not rather say this of the city of Rome, which to-day, all the world knows, is the abyss of superstitions and of all possible abominations." FÖRSTER.

21. Ver. 11. See, O Lord, and consider: for I am become vile.—"The righteous are oppressed in the church that they may cry out, they cry that they may be heard, they are heard that they may glorify God." AUGUSTIN by FÖRSTER. [CALVIN: "We said yesterday, that the complaints which humbled the faithful, and, at the same time, raised them to a good hope, and also opened the door to prayers, were dictated by the Spirit of God. Otherwise, when men indulge in grief, and torment themselves, they become exasperated; and then to be kindled by this irritation is a kind of madness. The Prophet, therefore, in order to moderate the intensity of sorrow, and the raging of impatience, recalls again the faithful to prayer. And when Jerusalem asks God to see and to look, there is an emphasis intended in using the two words; and the reason given does also more fully show this, because she had become vile; so that the church set nothing else before God, to turn Him to mercy, but her own miseries. She did not, then, bring forward her own services, but only deplored her own miseries, in order that she might obtain the favor of God."]

22. [Ver. 12. Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, which is done unto Me.—HENRY: "She justly demands a share in the pity and compassion of spectators. How pathetically does she beg their compassion! ver. 18. This is like that of Job, xix. 21. Have pity, have pity upon me, O ye my friends! It helps to make a burden sit lighter. if our friends sympathize with us, and mingle their tears with ours; for this evinces that, though in affliction, we are not in contempt, commonly as much dreaded as anything in an affliction."]

23. Ver. 12. "This is allegorically expounded to be the voice of Christ hanging on the cross, or of souls in Purgatory. * * * Or it is the voice of the church in tribulation. * * * Of the same nature is the anguish of the mother when in labor, or mourning her dead children, or dreading separation from her husband, or carried captive with her children among enemies. * * * It is the voice of the truly penitent soul, for there is no greater desolation than separation from God." BONAVENTURA by GUISLER, pp. 41, 42.

24. [Ver. 12. HENDERSON: "The words of this verse have been very generally applied, in the language of the pulpit, to the sufferings of our Saviour, and unquestionably they graphically describe the intensity of those sufferings; but considering the extent to which the original sense of the passage has been lost sight of, and the accommodated one substituted in its room, it would be well to notify that the secondary meaning is merely an accommodation of the words." WORDSWORTH: "This sorrowful exclamation may, in a secondary and spiritual sense, be regarded as coming from the lips of CHRIST on the cross, bewailing the sins and miseries of the world, which caused Him that bitter anguish, of which alone it could be properly said, 'that no sorrow was like unto His sorrow.'" Thus GEORGE HENBERT, in "The Sacrifice:"]

"Oh all ye, who pass by, whose eyes and mind
To worldly things are sharp, but to Me blind,
To Me, who look eyes that I might you find:
Was ever grief like Mine?"

* * * * *
But now I die; now all is finished.
My wo, man's weal: and now I bow My head:
Only let others say, when I am dead,
Never was grief like Mine."—W. H. H.]

25. Ver. 12. "Our Saviour could have used this apostrophe on the day of the preparation for the Passover, which might without impropriety be called, in the very words of this text, the day of the wrath and indignation of the Lord, inasmuch as on that day He poured out His wrath as if by a sudden impulse, on His own Son, in accordance with the testimony of Isa. liii. Speaking briefly: the suffering of Christ was infinite and infernal in regard to its atrocity, though not with regard to its duration; and this should be urged in refutation of the frivolous, carping objection of the disciples of Photinus, who with most impious sophistry assert, that the passion of Christ, because not eternal, could not be expiatory of sins which are infinite in guilt. Preachers ought to and can, by means of this prophetic exhortation, stimulate their hearers to more attentive meditation on the Lord's passion." FÖRSTER.

26. Ver. 12. "Zion's sorrow exceeds all other sorrow, for Zion is fully sensible of the nature of her sin,—which is the sin of a horrible rebellion against God Himself:—and, at the same time, she feels for the lost sinners, who were called by her word and whom she could have wished to see not lost. Zion's sorrow is fulfilled and completely realized in Jesus Christ, of Him have the prophets, and all saints, and all who are His, interpreted it.—these know only Christ. He who indicts the sorrow is God the Father, and He who bears it, in the fullest sense, is the Son of God." DIETRICH.

27. [Ver. 13. POOL: "The holy man owneth God as the first cause of all the evil they suffered, and entitles God to their various kinds of afflictions, both in captivity and during the siege, looking beyond the Babylonians, who were the proximate instrumental cause."]

28. Ver. 14. "Although it may have the appearance of wrath, that God should punish the Jewish people so severely with servitude, famine, disgrace and the contempt of their enemies, yet thereby God promoted their eternal benefit, since many of them were brought by these means to a knowledge of their sins they had not otherwise attained. Moreover, God does many a 'strange work' (Isa. xxviii. 21), in reference to that which He esteems His own. Example, MANASSEH." CRAMER by EG. HUNNIUS (Ser. III., pp. 28, 29).—"Oh! how salutary is the blow, when God punishes a man for his sins here in this life, and by such temporal punishment preserves him from the future eternal and terrible wrath of God and from unquenchable Hell-fire! Thus that holy teacher AUGUSTIN speaks, in his Confessions: Lord, burn me here, saw me in pieces here, pierce me here, stone me here. Only spare me in that world." EG. HUNNIUS, id. loc.

29. Ver. 14. "Punishment daily increases because guilt increases daily. AUGUSTIN. Sins because they excite the wrath of God, which is an intolerable burden (Prayer of MANASS., ver. 5), are themselves well called, and are, a yoke and an intolerable burden (Ps. xxxviii. 4; lxx. 4)." FÜRSTER. ["My transgressions, O Lord, are multiplied: My transgressions are multiplied, and I am not worthy to behold and see the height of Heaven, for the multitude of mine iniquities. I am bowed down with many iron bands, that I cannot lift up mine head, neither have any release: for I have provoked Thy wrath, and done evil before Thee; I did not Thy will, neither kept I Thy commandments: I have set up abominations, and have multiplied offences." (The Prayer of MANASSEH.)—HENRY: "We never are entangled in any yoke, but what is framed out of our own transgressions. The yoke of Christ's commands is an easy yoke, Matt. ix. 30; that of our own transgressions a heavy one: God is said to bind this yoke, and nothing but the hand of His pardoning mercy will unbind it."]

30. Vers. 12-15. "We should observe here, what is the real source of all tribulation and adversity on earth; namely, not blind chance, not celestial agencies, not men, who err in their opinions, or cause misfortunes through wantonness or malice: in these we may find a secondary cause, but the highest cause, which should be first and most considered, is God. The Lord, says Jeremiah, has filled me full of grief; He has sent from on high a fire into my bones; the Lord has so severely handled me that I am not able to rise up. The Lord Himself freely confesses all this and says, 'Is there evil in the city, which I, the Lord, have not done?' (Am. iii. 6). Therefore if we would escape evil, we must go to no one but God, and see to it that we are reconciled with Him in regard to our sins. Würtemb.: Summar."—[SCOTT: "It may properly be inquired of all that pass by, whether the suffering of the people of God be nothing to them? If they have no thought of compassionating or attempting to alleviate their distresses, they may at least behold and be instructed; they may see in them the holiness of God, the evil of sin, the emptiness of forms, the fatal effects of hypocrisy and impiety: and they may take warning to flee from the wrath to come, by considering the temporal miseries to which sin exposes men in this world, 'For if the righteous scarcely are saved, where will the ungodly and profligate appear?' If the rod of correction be so terrible, what will the sword of vengeance be?—But whatever may be learned by viewing the desolations of Jerusalem, * * * far more may be learned from looking unto Jesus, and His sufferings and death. Does He not, as it were from the cross, call on every heedless mortal to attend to the scene? Does He not say, 'Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? Behold and see if there be any sorrow like unto My sorrow, wherewith the Lord hath afflicted Me, in the day of His fierce anger against the sins of those whom I came to seek and save? Is it nothing to you that I am here a sinless sufferer? That I, the well-beloved Son of the Father, am consumed by the fire of His wrath, and that My heart in the midst of my bowels is even as melting wax, and all my bowes out of joint, and that mine enemies stand staring on and insulting over Me? Is it nothing to you that the Father hath wreathed on My neck the yoke of man's transgressions, and laid on Me the iniquity of all His people?' I say, doth not our suffering Immanuel seem thus to address us? And does it not behoove us to consider, who this Sufferer was, what He suffered, and why He suffered at all? Here we may see the evil of sin, the honor of the law, and the justice of God, more than in all the other scenes that we have been contemplating: here we may learn the worth of our souls, the importance of eternal things, the vanity of the world, and the misery of fallen man. Here we may see the only foundation of our hope, and the source of our comfort and happiness. Here we may learn gratitude and patience, meekness and mercy, from the brightest example and the most endearing motives. Let then all our sorrows lead us to contemplate the cross of Christ, and to mark the way He took through sufferings and death to His glory; that we may be comforted under our trials, and cheerfully follow our Fore-runner, that where He is, there we may be also."]

31. [Ver. 16. Because the Comforter that should relieve my soul is far from me.—The church suffering for her actual sins becomes a type of the Saviour suffering for the sins of the church imputatively. Here we have another cry from the cross. "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani. My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" Those who forsake God will be forsaken of Him, and those who are forsaken of God, will seek in vain for any other comforter, and will be left to cry out with tears and lamentations and 'spread forth their hands,' ver. 17, in vain, because 'there is none to comfort' them. The constant allusion to an absent Comforter in this Song, see vers. 2, 9, 16, 17, 21, is significant. There is nothing like it in the other Songs of Lamentation.—W. II. II.]

32. Ver. 17. Zion spreadeth forth her hands, and there is none to comfort her.—"She receives compensatory punishment, in that, having refused to hear Him, who stretched out His hands (Isa. lxx. 2), and to seek safety under His wings (Matt. xxiii. 37), she herself should afterwards stretch out her hands and not find a comforter." AMBROSE by GUISLER, p. 53.—"The ancient church (Sion) spreadeth forth her hands, i. e., her legal works and carnal righteousnesses, but there is none to comfort her on account of those works, for the Lord does not justify her through them. But what [is the result of this exhibition of her good works]? If she expects to be justified by spreading out her hands after this fashion, God hath commanded that her adversaries, i. e., her sins, should be round about her, and her sins are much more numerous, nay without comparison, innumerable, and her thousand justifications are as if she were an unclean woman, as a prophet elsewhere testifies, when he says: 'But we are all as an unclean thing, and all our righteousnesses are as filthy rags' (Isa. lxiv. 6)." RUPERTUS ABBAS by GUISLER, p. 54.

33. Ver. 18. "It is an ingenious and considerate method of discipline, when the good God would make us better and wiser, not by words, but by examples in other persons. Happy are they, who become wise thus by the misfortunes of others." CRAMER.—The Lord is righteous. "Here recurs a common saying, to which the church bears her most illustrious testimony, in the same way as Mauritius the General, when about to be beheaded, is said to have pronounced publicly these words from Ps. cxix.: 'Just art Thou, O Lord, and just are Thy judgments,' FÜRSTER. [The Mauritius referred to is Mauritius Tiberius, sometimes called St. Maurice, though not the Saint usually so designated. Before he himself was beheaded, his five sons were massacred before his eyes; "and Maurice, humbling himself under the hand of God, was heard to exclaim, 'Thou art just, O Lord, and Thy judgments are without partiality.'" (Fueyc. Brit.)—W. H. H.]

31. Ver. 19. I called for my lovers, but they deceived me.—"Under God's judgments we first learn, how foolish it was ever to have expected anything good from the world, to which we paid our earliest court, as Judah to Egypt, and from the Princes of the world. They have betrayed me, is ever said of all nations, whenever the church has relied upon the great ones of a nation as such. The world is the church's field, which bears thistles and thorns. Those who trust to the world must come eventually to beggary, and thus miserably prolong their lives; whereby they may possibly recover their senses." DIEDRICH.

35. Vers. 20-22. "Here the question occurs, whether we may pray against our enemies, since Christ says, 'Love your enemies' (Matt. v. 44)? Answer: There are two kinds of enemies. Some, who bear ill-will towards us personally for private reasons, concern ourselves alone. When the matter extends no further than to our own person, then should we privately commend it to God, and pray for those who are ill-disposed towards us, that God would bring them to a sense of their sin; and, besides, we ought, according to the injunction of Christ, to do them good, and not return evil for evil, but rather overcome evil with good (Rom. xii. 17, 21). But if our enemies are of that sort, that they bear ill-will to wards us, not for any private cause, but on account of matters of faith; and are also opposed, not only to us, but especially to God in Heaven, are fighting against His holy Word and are striving with eager impiety to destroy the Christian church;—then indeed should we pray that God would convert those who may be converted, but as for those who continue ever to rage, stubbornly and maliciously, against God and His church, that God would execute upon them according to His own sentence judgment and righteousness (Ps. cxxxix. 19)." CRAMER by EG. HUNNICUS (Ser. III., p. 36).

36. Ver. 20. [Behold, O Lord.—CALVIN: "The people turn again to pray to God; and what has been before said ought to be remembered, that these lamentations of Jeremiah differ from the complaints of the ungodly; because the faithful first acknowledge that they are justly chastised by God's hand, and secondly, they trust in His mercy and implore His aid. For by these two marks the church is distinguished from the unbelieving, even by repentance and faith."]—For I am in distress. "Such is the distress which arises from a disturbed conscience, of which AMNOSIUS says (Lib. I., ep. 18), There is no greater pain than that which wounds the conscience with the sting of sin." FÜRSTER.—[Abroad the sword bereaveth, at home there is as death. ΗΓΓΑ ΒΡΟΥΧΤΟΝ: "Deut. xxxii. They shall be brent with hunger and eaten up with burning and bitter destruction: without, the sword shall rot; within shall be fear. St. Paul, 2 Cor. vii. 5, calleth Moses and Jeremy both into mind, saying when we came into Macedonia my flesh had no rest, we were always in distress, without was fighting, within was fear. Thus divinely honoreth he the Songs of Moses and Jeremy, as having their words still before him, joining Moses' prophecy with Jeremy's story, and showing how the Apostles were vexed in the world, as Jerusalem of the Chaldeans."]

37. Ver. 21. Thou hast done it.—"It is most worthy of observation, that the church in this prayer having turned towards God openly declares, Thou hast done it. Whence it is plainly to be inferred that all calamities are sent by God (θεοπειροται)." FÜRSTER.

33. Vers. 21, 22. "O that God would let this day come soon, in which the disciplina of His children has an end and the flames of God's wrath shall consume the rods of His chastisement forever! Then, in truth, our sins and the Devil will be once for all under our feet, and the whole world, which now vexes us, will descend into the abyss with howling and shrieks. In the heart of the Prophet, speaks also the Christ, who judges the world and will make it His footstool: and if we are really Christians, then we have, at the same time and in full measure, both sorrows and confidence; yet often the sense of sorrow exceeds, so that we say, my sighs are many and my heart is faint. But these sighs will be turned into joy (John xvi. 20-22), for they are the birth-throes of the new life and of the eternal world. Happy is he who has a part therein." DIEDRICH.

39. Ver. 22. "Although our prayer is not a work of merit on account of which God should hear us, yet it is a means by which we are heard (Matt. vii. 7)." CRAMER.—[CALVIN: "We, in short, see that the faithful lay humbly their prayers before God, and at the same time confess that what they had deserved was rendered to them, only they set before God their extreme sorrow, straits, griefs, tears, and sighs. Then the way of pacifying God is, sincerely to confess that we are justly visited by His judgment, and also to lie down as it were confounded, and at the same time to venture to look up to Him, and to rely on His mercy with confidence."—ΗΓΓΑ ΒΡΟΥΧΤΟΝ: "The first alphabet row is ended in the prophecy of ending the wicked kingdoms which should be brought under Babel's yoke, to show that all these troubles are in God's Providence settled in the most exquisite order for His judgments."]

40. [PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou hast hitherto dealt so mercifully with us, we may anticipate Thy dreadful judgment; and that if Thou shouldst more severely chastise us, we may not yet fail, but that being humbled under Thy mighty hand, we may flee to Thy mercy and cherish this hope in our hearts, that Thou wilt be a Father to us, and not hesitate to call continually on Thee, until, being freed from all evils, we shall at length be gathered into Thy celestial kingdom, which Thine only-begotten Son has procured for us by His own blood. Amen." CALVIN.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 1-11. On a fast-day, a church consecration, a festival in commemoration of the Reformation, at a Synod, or on similar occasions prompting to earnest warning, the congregation could be instructed, on the ground of this text, that the judgment which befell the Old Testament Zion by means of the Chaldeans is a warning example to the New Testament Zion. In doing so, it would be proper to consider: 1. The original glory of the Old Testament Zion, ver. 7 a. 2. Her presumptuous security and temerity, ver. 9 a. 3. The wickedness that became prevalent in consequence thereof, vers. 5 b, 8 a. 4. The judgment of God, for that wickedness, in its details; intrusion of enemies, ver. 10, desolation of the city, ver. 1, captivity of the people and of the Priests and Princes, vers. 3-6, discontinuance of public worship, ver. 10, famine, ver. 11, triumph of enemies, vers. 5, 7, 9, disgrace and misery of the people, vers. 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 9. 5. The inference to be drawn from all this for our benefit; how that which happened to them may also happen to us, (Luke xxiii. 31; Rom. xi. 21-23; Rev. ii. 5).

2. Ver. 12. A sermon of consolation, on the occasion of a death, or other great misfortune. Our text suggests remedies for great pain. These are—I. Of a natural kind. 1. The sympathy of all men: 'I say to you all, etc., look and see, etc.' 2. Comparison with the pain of others: "see if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow,"—where we are warned against the error of supposing our pain the greatest that ever was, and are reminded that some are more unfortunate than ourselves. II. Of a spiritual kind. 1. The Lord has inflicted the wounds. 2. The Lord will heal them. [Consider, here, especially the active sympathy of Christ. To the question 'Was ever any sorrow like unto my sorrow!' we may answer, 'Yes, Christ's, and greater, too?' If "His visage was so marred more than any man, and His form more than the sons of men," it was because, more than any man, He was "stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted." He bore the whole burden of our guilt and He suffered its full penalty. "The Lord laid on Him the iniquity of us all," and 'He bore our griefs and carried our sorrows.' Why? Not only in the way of atonement, but that He might be a merciful High Priest, to sympathize with us and to help us. See Heb. ii. 17, 18; iv. 15, 16.—W. H. II.]

3. Vers. 12-22. A sermon on penitence; when a calamity, that may properly be considered as a Divine chastisement, calls for repentance. Subject: The calamity, which has befallen us, considered in the light of Divine righteousness and love. I. It proceeds from Divine righteousness. 1. Not another, but the Lord, has ordained it against us, vers. 14, 15. 2. It corresponds exactly to what we have deserved, vers. 14, 18. II. It proceeds from Divine love. 1. It admonishes us to sincere repentance. 2. It dissuades us from confiding in any false hope or support, vers. 13-16, 21. 3. It incites us to seek help from God in a believing spirit, ver. 20.

4. Ver. 20. FLOREY—Biblical Guide for spiritual funeral discourses, Leipzig, 1861, No. 385: "Well is it for a distressed widow, in her agony, to look to the Lord. For—1. The Lord knows thy pain, which He Himself has inflicted. 2. The Lord soothes thy pain, for He is the best Comforter. 3. The Lord changes thy pain, sooner or later, into a blessed experience of good."

CHAPTER II.

LAMENTATION OF THE POET OVER THE DESTRUCTION OF ZION: [THE DESTRUCTION DESCRIBED AND ATTRIBUTED TO JEHOVAH.—W. H. II.]

[“The first song expresses sorrow over the disgrace of the city: the second describes the terrors of the destruction of the city and Temple” (GERLACH, Intr., p. 5), and connects them with the vengeance of God. In the first song, the city is the conspicuous object, and Zion and the holy places appear as accessories to her former honor and her present disgrace. In the second song, God's personal agency in the calamities described is the controlling idea (see vers. 1-9, 17, 20-22), and the Temple or Zion, as the place of His habitation, is the prominent object, while the city appears only as the locality or scene of Zion's former glory and the present cause of her deepest distress. The first words in each suggest the theme of each:—“How doth the city sit solitary! How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in His wrath!”*—The chapter is composed of two sections: 1. vers. 1-10, a description of the judgment which the Lord had inflicted; 2. vers. 12-22, lamentations over this judgment. The similarity of the general structure of Songs I., ii., their division into two almost equal parts, the first chiefly descriptive, the second more strictly composed of lamentations, is an evidence that they were written by one author, and help to compose one complete and symmetrical poem.—W. H. II.]

PART I.

VERS. 1-10.

⌘ VER. 1. How doth the Lord cover with a cloud, in His anger,
The daughter of Zion!
He, from Heaven, hath cast down to the ground
The glory of Israel,
He remembered not His footstool.
In the day of His anger.

* [In an alphabetical poem, where attention is directed to the initial letters, it may not be without significance that in Songs I., ii., the initials of the first three words are similar, spelling ז'ן, that may mean hated, despised, or an enemy. In the initials of the first four words of i. we have יהו'א, clemency.—W. H. II.]

- 2 VER. 2. The Lord swallowed up and spared not All the habitations of Jacob :
 He demolished in His wrath
 The strongholds of the daughter of Judah :
 He cast down to the ground—He polluted
 The kingdom and its princes.
- 3 VER. 3. He broke in hot anger
 Every horn of Israel.
 He turned back His right hand
 Before the enemy.
 And He set Jacob on fire—
 As a flame of fire devoureth round about.
- 4 VER. 4. He bent His bow as an enemy :
 He stood—with His right hand as an adversary—
 And destroyed
 All the delights of the eye.
 In the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion
 He poured out, as fire, His fury.
- 5 VER. 5. The Lord became as an enemy :
 He swallowed up Israel ;
 He swallowed up all her palaces ;
 He destroyed all His strongholds :
 And increased in the daughter of Judah
 Mourning and lamentation.
- 6 VER. 6. And He laid waste as a garden His tabernacle :
 He abolished His appointed solemnities :
 Jehovah caused to be forgotten in Zion
 Appointed solemnities and Sabbath days :
 And rejected in His furious anger
 King and Priest.
- 7 VER. 7. The Lord cast away with disdain His altar,
 He abhorred His Sanctuary.
 He gave up into the enemy's hand
 The walls of her palaces.
 They shouted in Jehovah's house
 As on a day of appointed solemnity.
- 8 VER. 8. Jehovah purposed
 To destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion.
 He stretched out a line :
 He withdrew not His hand from devouring.
 Then He caused rampart and wall to mourn ;
 They languished together.
- 9 VER. 9. Her gates have sunk into the ground :
 He destroyed and broke her bars.
 Her King and her Princes among the Gentiles—
 There is no law !
 Her Prophets also Find no vision from Jehovah !
- 10 VER. 10. The elders of the daughter of Zion Sit on the ground,—they are silent,—
 They throw up dust upon their heads,
 They put on sackcloth.
 The virgins of Jerusalem
 Bow their heads to the ground.

ANALYSIS.

In this song, as in the preceding one, the alphabetical construction interferes with the succession of the several steps and parts of the great drama in their regular order; yet, on close examination, some regard to the arrangement of events, with reference to their nature and occurrence, is observable. There is given, first of all, a comprehensive survey of the whole work of destruction, vers. 1, 2. Then follows a brief recital of the events of the war, from its beginning to the capture of the city, vers. 3, 4. Then is described the complete destruction of the Temple, the houses and the walls, by Nebuzaradan, four weeks after the capture of the city (see Jer. lii. 13, 14), vers. 5-9 a. Thus far only the material objects of the destruction are spoken of. What follows relates the sufferings of the persons who were involved in the catastrophe. From ver. 9 b we learn the fate of the King, Princes and Prophets; in ver. 10 we see the elders and the virgins lamenting; in ver. 11 the Poet describes his own sufferings, etc. [NÆGELSBACH does not recognize the very obvious division of this chapter into two parts. GERLACH makes three sections, vers. 1-10, 11-19, 20-22.—The first part naturally divides itself into two equal sections: vers. 1-5 contain a general description of the punishment of Zion; vers. 6-10 relate particularly to the destruction of Zion itself.—W. H. H.]

II. VERS. 1, 2.

1 How hath the Lord covered the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger, and cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Israel, and remembered not 2 his footstool in the day of his anger! The Lord hath swallowed up all the habitations of Jacob, and hath not pitied; he hath thrown down in his wrath the strongholds of the daughter of Judah: he hath brought them down to the ground: he hath polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1.—יעִיב. From the verbal stem, עִיב, from which is עֵב, a cloud, only this single form occurs, and this is ἄν. λεγ. [בְּאַפּוֹ. GERLACH: "not with wrath (EWALD), but in His wrath, as similar expressions at the close of this ver. and in vers. 2, 6, 21, 22, show."—אֲרִי. See Intr. Add. Rem. p. 32.]—הִשְׁלִיךְ.—Only used in Hiph. and Hoph.; frequent in Jeremiah, vii. 15, 29; ix. 18; xli. 9, etc.—אֲרִי. Accusative of place, in answer to the question, Whither? 1 Sam. xxv. 23; 1 Kings i. 31; Is. xlix. 23; Amos ix. 9; Ob. 3; Ps. cxlvii. 15; my Gr., § 70, b. Jeremiah uses אֲרִי as accusative after verbs of going and coming very frequently, xxxvii. 12; xl. 12; xlii. 14; xliiii. 7, etc.—תִּפְאָרֶה. תִּפְאָרֶה, a corresponding word, is very frequent with Jeremiah, xlvi. 17; xlii. 11, 18; xxxiii. 9.—וְכָר, in same sense, Jer. xxxi. 20; xv. 15. מְדוֹם, not found in Jer.—Jeremiah never says יוֹם אֶף. The only place in which he connects אֶף with the idea of a particular time, he says בְּעֵת אֶפְךָ, xviii. 23. The expression is found in Lam. only here and vers. 21, 22.

Ver. 2.—בְּלֵעַ. Jeremiah uses only Kal, and that only once, li. 24. Piel in this chapter five times, vers. 2, 5, 8, 16, nowhere else in Lam.—[אֲרִי. See Intr. Add. Rem. p. 32.]—לֹא תִמְלֵל. [K'ri, ולא, "The asyndeton is much used in this species of verse at the half pause." BLAYNEY.] Jeremiah uses the word תִּמְלֵל, xiii. 14; xv. 5; xxi. 7; i. 14; li. 3. But to express the thought, which תִּמְלֵל לֹא here represents, Jeremiah uses וְלֹא נָתַם, xx. 16. [With all deference, the thought in xx. 16 is only analogous to the thought here, which is exactly expressed in the passages first cited. This is not to be overlooked in considering the peculiarities of Jeremiah's style and language.—W. H. H.]—נְאוֹת יַעֲקֹב. נְאוֹת occurs only here. [BLAYNEY translates נְאוֹת pleasant places, following the Sept., πάντα τὰ ὠραία, and the Latin, omnia speciosa. DOTAY: all that was beautiful in Jacob. Though נְאוֹת is used in this sense in the Piel, there is no clear case where the noun has this sense; it designates either dwellings, Ps. lxxiv. 20; lxxxiii. 13, or pasture-grounds regarded as the dwellings of shepherds and their flocks, Am. i. 2; Jer. ix. 9; xxv. 37; Ps. xxiii. 2; lxx. 13. FURST translates it here unprotected, open cities, opposite of walled and fortified places.—W. H. H.]—הָרָם. Jeremiah uses frequently, i. 10; xxiv. 6; xxxi. 28, etc.—He uses עִבְרָה only twice, vii. 29; xlviii. 30.—מְבַצְרֵי בַת-יְהוּדָה.—See Jer. i. 8; v. 17.—חֲלָל.—Piel, occurs in Jeremiah, xvi. 18; xxxi. 5; xxxiv. 16; comp. Is. xliii. 28.—מְמַלְכֵה וְשִׁירָה.—Sept. has βασιλεία αὐτῆς. They must have read מְמַלְכֵה as in ver. 9. The Syriac and Arabic read so also. Yet the authority of the Septuagint is much too precarious to change the reading of the text, which is also found in the Vulg. and Chal. Besides, it is much easier to explain how מְמַלְכֵה, at the time in sight at ver. 9, could originate from סַפְּלִיכָה, than it would be to account for the reverse. מְמַלְכֵה in connection with שִׁירָה (the suffix of which refers to the former) and with reference to נְאוֹת, מְבַצְרֵים, is without doubt to be taken in the sense of royalty=kingship, regia potestas. Jeremiah uses the word in this sense, xxvii. 1; xxviii. 1. [FURST: dominion, reign, kingdom.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. How—see i. 1—hath the Lord covered—doth the Lord cover—the daughter of Zion with a cloud in his anger. The Poet has evidently the image of a thunder-storm in his mind. The wrath of Jehovah envelops Zion in a cloud, out of which the destroying lightning (see next clause) descends upon her. [WORDS-wrath: "The Lord hath poured out His fury on Zion, as in a tempest, and has dashed down her beauty as with lightning, and has not spared the Ark of His Sanctuary." GERLACH: in his wrath. "The frequent repetition of this expression (see at the close of vers. 3, 6, 21, 22) shows that this chapter is especially intended to exhibit the fury of the wrath of God against Jerusalem; as in the first chapter the repetition of the formula, indicating the absence of help and comfort, corresponds to the description of the extreme distress described in that chapter." The expression daughter of Zion occurs i. 6, and Jeremiah iv. 31; vi. 2, 23.—And cast down from heaven unto the earth the beauty of Israel. To understand this it is necessary to determine first of all to whom the words from heaven refer. At the first glance they seem to refer to the object of the verb cast down. In that case the beauty of Israel would be in Heaven and from Heaven hurled down to the earth. But in what sense was the beauty of Israel in Heaven? To answer this, we must first know what is meant by the beauty or glory of Israel. The word in the original תְּפִלָּה, by itself, could indicate the Temple which the Israelites called בֵּית הַתְּפִלָּה which [lit., house of our glory; E. V., our beautiful house], Is. liv. 10; comp. ix. 7; lxiii. 15; or, the ark of the covenant, in reference to which the daughter-in-law of Eli gave to her child the name of Ichabod, which is thus interpreted (1 Sam. iv. 21, 22), "And she named the child Ichabod, [Marg.: where is the glory? or, there is no glory], saying, The glory is departed from Israel (because the ark of God was taken, and because of her father-in-law and her husband): and she said, The glory is departed from Israel; for the ark of God is taken." See Ps. lxxviii. 61. The word תְּפִלָּה is, however, in itself too abstract and general, and there is too little in the context to fix its definition, to allow us to say with confidence that it denotes in the concrete any particular object. We are obliged, therefore, to acquiesce in its general sense, and to understand by it the glory of Israel in general, especially all that distinguishes Israel as the chosen people before all peoples. All this is truly, by the destruction of the Theocracy, cast down to the ground. Should we now refer from Heaven to the object of the verb cast down, then we must take it figuratively, as expressing the height of the glory or beauty of Israel, which is thus denoted as towering up to Heaven. But Heaven שָׁמַיִם is never used in this figurative sense in the Old Testament. The places which are cited as proving such a use of the word (Gen. xi. 4; Job xx. 6; Isa. xiv. 12; Dan. iv. 8; 2 Chron. xxviii. 9; comp. Gen. iv. 10) are entirely irrelevant. In the New Testament only Matt. xi. 23; Luke x. 15 ("and thou, Capernaum, which art exalted unto Heaven," etc.) afford possible analogies for such a figurative use of this phrase. Therefore I believe (with DATHE, KALKAR and others) that from Heaven is to be referred to the subject of the verb cast down: the Lord from Heaven casts down the glory of Israel to the ground. This also suits admirably the idea expressed in the verb in the first clause, כָּסָה = to cover with a cloud, under which the image of a thunder-storm is suggested. From the Heavens the Lord, by a stroke of lightning, casts down the glory of Israel. From Heaven, מִשָּׁמַיִם, is often used in this sense, Josh. x. 11; 2 Sam. xxii. 14; Gen. xix. 21; Ex. xvi. 4, etc.—And remembered not His footstool in the day of His anger. The ark of the covenant is explicitly called the footstool of Jehovah in 1 Chron. xxviii. 2, where David says, "I had in mine heart to build an house of rest for the ark of the covenant of the Lord and for the footstool of our God" [and for the footstool. "The conjunction and is exegetical, and the same with that is." So says JOSEPH MEDE in his article on Ps. cxxxii. 7. "We will go into His tabernacle, we will worship at (towards, MEDE) His footstool."—W. H. H.]. The ark of the covenant may be so called, because He, who is enthroned upon the cherubim (2 Sam. vi. 2; Ps. lxxx. 2; xcix. 1) [see also 1 Sam. iv. 4, which MEDE translates sitteth upon the cherubims.—W. H. H.], has the cover of the ark of the covenant [the mercy-seat] at His feet, wherefore it is also said, that the Lord speaks

מִלְּפָנֵי הַכִּסֵּא מֵעַל הַרְחֵם from above the mercy-seat, Ex. xxv. 22; Num. vii. 80. Therefore, without doubt, the ark of the covenant is to be understood as the footstool, towards which worship is said to be directed in Ps. xcix. 5; cxxxii. 7. [ALEXANDER: on Ps. xcix. 5. "Exalt ye Jehovah our God, and prostrate yourselves to His footstool.—Bow down (or prostrate) yourselves, as an act of worship. Not at His footstool, as the mere place of worship, but to it, as the object, this name being constantly given to the ark, 1 Chron. xxviii. 2; Lam. ii. 1; Ps. cxxxii. 7; Isa. lx. 13. Even in Isa. lxvi. 1, there is allusion to the ordinary usage of the terms. The ark is here represented as the object of worship, just as Zion is in Isa. xlv. 14, both being put for the God who was present in them." CALVIN: "The design of the Prophet is to show to the people how much God's wrath had been kindled, when He spared not even His own sanctuary. For he takes this principle as granted, that God is never without reason angry, and never exceeds the due measure of punishment. As, then, God's wrath was so great that He destroyed His own Temple, it was a token of dreadful wrath. * * He (the prophet) could not have better expressed to the people the heinousness of their sins, than by laying before them this fact, that God remembered not His footstool in the day of His anger."—The three members of the verse are so related to each other, that the first exhibits Zion as completely enveloped as it were in a thunder cloud, the second represents the glory of Israel as destroyed by the lightning, the third dwells especially on the fact, that the Lord had not so much as spared the holiest of holy things, the ark of the covenant.

[כָּסָה] NAEGLSACH translates it verdunkelt; GERLACH, unwölkt; HUGH BROUGHTON, beclouded.—OWEN, in a note to his translation of CALVIN, observes that this verb is clearly in the future tense, and proposes to translate it, "Why should the Lord in His wrath becloud the daughter of Zion?" "Then follows," he says, "a description of what had happened to Zion, He hath cast from Heaven," etc. SCOTT seems to take the same view of the expostulatory character of the sentence, when he says, the prophet "inquires, with mingled surprise and regret, how the Lord, the Author of her afflictions, could be induced thus to distress her?" But it is better to take the verb in the sense of the present, How doth the Lord cover, etc., as BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NÆGELSBAUGH and GERLACH. The Poet "assumes an ideal point of vision prior to" the actual occurrence of the event, "and so regards it as future." Yet while he speaks, the thing is done: and the description is completed in the past tense. The future as thus used in Hebrew, is best translated by the present in English. See GREEN'S Gr., § 263, 5. "The intermingling of different tenses in relation to the same subject, which is so frequent in poetry, foreign as it may be to our modes of thought, does not justify the conclusion that they are used promiscuously or without regard to their distinctive signification" (Ib. note "a.>"). If we accept NÆGELSBAUGH'S idea of the thunder-cloud and the lightning, the use of the future in the first verb is very forcible. The Poet sees the cloud gathering, and while he looks, the lightning has flashed and the work of destruction is complete.—ABEN-EZRA, according to ROSENUELLER, see also CALVIN, explains the word to mean lifted up to the clouds. God exalted the daughter of Zion to the clouds, "in His wrath," that He might cast her down from a greater height. "For when one wishes to break in pieces an earthen vessel, he not only casts it on the ground, but he raises it up, that it may be thrown down with greater force" (CALVIN). We need some evidence better than this ingenious argument that the word can have this meaning.—The Chald. and Syr., GESENIUS in his Theas., MAURER and J. D. MICHAELIS translate the word sprevit, contumelia vel opprobrio affecit, dishonored, disgraced, finding for this sense an analogy in the Arabic. The principal argument for this is, that he who is thrown down from Heaven is not surrounded with clouds. We answer 1. According to NÆGELSBAUGH above, "from Heaven" refers to the subject and not to the object of the verb "cast down." 2. The figure of the thunder-cloud implies rather that the cloud covered the doomed City and Temple, and not that they were lifted up into the clouds. 3. There are two subjects expressed, as well as two verbs. Not the daughter of Zion, but the glory of Israel is cast down to the ground.—GERLACH gives a poetical explanation to the first two clauses, "Jerusalem is compared to a star, that once shone brightly, but was first clouded over and then thrown to the earth:" and seems to imagine an allusion to Isa. xiv. 12. But his beautiful star shines only in his fancy, and not in the text.

Ver. 2. The Lord hath swallowed up.—The Poet has in mind the idea of a yawning abyss. See Ex. xv. 12; Num. xvi. 30–32; xxvi. 10; Deut. xi. 6; Ps. cvi. 17. [All the English versions translate the verb swallowed up, except HENDERSON (destroyed) and the Douay (The Lord hath cast down headlong, from Vulgate, precipitavit).

Yet it seems manifest, from the use of the same word in vers. 5, 8, 16 (see also Hab. i. 13; Isa. xxv. 7, 8; xlix. 19; 2 Sam. xx. 19), that the word is used merely to signify utter destruction, without intending to suggest, even in a figurative sense, the exact method of destruction, as by such "a yawning abyss" as is referred to in passages cited by NÆGELSBAUGH. GERLACH has destroyed, vertigit, CALVIN also, perdidit.—W. H. H.]—All the habitations of Jacob. The word rendered habitations includes the ideas of dwellings and pasture-grounds. It indicates the places where the Nomadic spread his tent and allowed his flock to graze. Hence the frequent phrase נְאוֹת קִדְרָר [lit. dwellings of pasture-land], Ps. lxx. 13; Jer. ix. 9; xxiii. 10; Joel i. 19, 20; ii. 22. And hath not pitied. See vers. 17, 21; iii. 43. And spared not. [So the Sept. and Vulg. E. V. pitied, is most in accordance with the use of the word: yet the idea of sparing, in the exercise of mercy, is suggested by the order of the words in the original, The Lord swallowed up and spared not all the habitations of Jacob. So CALVIN, BROUGHTON, GERLACH.—W. H. H.]—He hath thrown down—demolished, in His wrath the strongholds of the daughter of Judah. The strongholds of Judah stand in antithesis to the habitations of Jacob; not only the open unprotected places, where the people dwell among their pasture and grazing lands, but also the fortified cities were visited with destruction.—The daughter of Judah, see i. 15; ii. 5. The expression is very suitable, since only Judah still had any strongholds. See Jer. xxxiv. 7.—He hath brought them down to the ground: He hath polluted the kingdom and the princes thereof. He cast down to the ground, He polluted the kingdom and its princes. The expression

הִנְיַע לְאָרְצוֹ, to bring down to the ground, is used very explicitly of fortified places in Isa. xxv. 12; xxvi. 5, comp. Ezek. xiii. 14. Yet to refer it here to what precedes, results in a troublesome asyndeton. Then, too, the structure of the verse would be irregular, for the second idea and clause of the verse would have three lines or members, and the third only one. Finally, there is an idea in bringing down to the ground [or made to touch the ground; margin, E. V.], akin to that of pollution, which immediately follows. For majesty is polluted by being brought into contact with common dust. Compare Ps. lxxxix. 40,

הִלַּלְתָּ לְאָרְצוֹ נְיָרוֹ, "Thou hast profaned his crown, by casting it to the ground." [In favor of NÆGELSBAUGH'S construction is 1. the absence of the conjunction. 2. The prevailing meaning of the verb נָנַע followed by לְ, to touch, to come in contact with. 3. The natural division of the verse. 4. The excellent sense. This construction is adopted by ROSENUELLER, EWALD, NEUMANN, BLAYNEY and NOYES. The only objections to it are 1, the application of the phrase brought down to the ground, in Isaiah, to the razing of fortified places; and 2, which is a stronger objection, the Masoretic punctuation.—W. H. H.]

II. 3, 4.

3 He hath cut off in his fierce anger all the horn of Israel: he hath drawn back his right hand from before the enemy, and he burned against Jacob like a flaming fire, which devoureth round about. He hath bent his bow like an enemy: he stood with his right hand as an adversary, and slew all that were pleasant to the eye in the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion: he poured out his fury like fire.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3.—וְיָצַק. Only the Niph. is found in Jer., xlviii. 25; 1. 23.—וְיָצַק, not in Jeremiah.—וְיָצַק, Jer. xlviii. 45.—וְיָצַק, see Jer. xxi. 14; xlv. 14; 1. 32. Jeremiah always employs as the object of וְיָצַק in this sense, וְיָצַק or וְיָצַק.

Ver. 4.—וְיָצַק, Jer. ix. 2; xlv. 9; 1. 14, 20; li. 3.—There is no sufficient reason for questioning the pointing of וְיָצַק as Part. Niph. It is in apposition with וְיָצַק, [is used of God's coming in judgment in Isa. iiii. 13; Ps. lxxxv. 1. Its close connection with the next verb should not be unobserved. He stood or set Himself—His right hand as an adversary—and slew, etc.—W. II. II.] Jeremiah never uses the Niph. וְיָצַק, only the Hiph., v. 26; xxxi. 21, and Hithp., xlv. 4, 14.—The verb וְיָצַק (see Lam. ii. 20, 21; iii. 43), is scarcely current with Jeremiah. He uses only the Part. (xxx. 21) and Inf. Kal. (xv. 3). [Lowth, Prelim. Dissert. on Isaiah, and Blayney supply after this verb וְיָצַק, every youth, from the Chaldee Paraphrase, to supply an apparent defect in metre.—W. II. II.]—The expression וְיָצַק occurs only here.—[The recurrence in Jeremiah of the figures of bending the bow and of pouring out fury as liquid fire (see Jer. iv. 4; vii. 20; xxi. 12; xlii. 18; xlv. 6) may be regarded as evidences of authorship.—W. II. II.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 3, 4. When it is here said that the Lord had broken the horn of Israel, then that He had deprived him of his right hand, then that He had kindled a fire in Jacob, and as an enemy had assaulted him, it is evident that a climax is intended. There is described first the deprivation of the power of resistance, then the deprivation of help, then the progress to positive hostility. THIENIS sees in vers. 3, 4 a full statement of all the incidents of the war, from the capture of the frontier fortresses to the taking of the city by storm. He understands, therefore, by the horn of Israel, “those places of defence which were prominent, like horns, consequently frontier fortresses;” hath drawn back his right hand, etc. describes the retreat of the Jewish armies to the capital; he burned against Jacob, etc., the effusion of the hostile troops over the land of which they were to become masters; he hath bent his bow, etc., the institution of siege; he stood with his right hand, etc., and slew, etc., the assault and storming of the city; he poured out his fury like fire, the capture of the city. Some of this hits the true sense, but not all. That horn should indicate the frontier fortresses, is artificial. It is to be considered, too, that the phrase is וְיָצַק, all the horn [it may mean, however, every horn: the absence of the article makes this sense most probable.—W. II. II.] To draw back the bow would not indicate the first attack of the city, for that attack was not made with arrows only. To stand with the right hand as an adversary does not mean to begin to fight with the right hand, and does not therefore describe an exclusively hand to hand fight. Certainly, as already remarked, the description advances from merely negative to directly positive hostility, but the latter is described, not by the successive steps of the siege, but according to the various and—as far as practicable—simultaneous events of the achievement, wherein the most impressive event, representing, of course, the end, is placed last of all.

Ver. 3. He hath cut off—He broke—in his fierce anger—in hot anger. See Ex. xi. 8; Deut. xxix. 23; Is. vii. 4; 1 Sam. xx. 34; 2 Chron. xxv. 10. [The pronoun his supplied in E. V. is unnecessary, and weakens the sense. There is a rhetorical climax in the words—anger, אַף, ver. 1; wrath, עֲבָרָה, ver. 2; and heat of anger, or hot, fierce, furious anger, אַף, ver. 3.—W. II. II.]—All the horn of Israel—Every horn of Israel. See Jer. xlviii. 25; Ps. lxxv. 11. According to constant usage, the horn is a symbol of power; see Ps. xviii. 3; lxxv. 5, 6, etc. [CALVIN: “We know that by horn is meant strength as well as excellency or dignity; and I am disposed to include both here, though the word breaking seems rather to refer to strength or power.” NOVIS: “every horn, i. e., all her means of defence.”]—He hath drawn back—He bent back—his right hand from before the enemy. Does the pronominal suffix his, in וְיָצַק, his hand, refer to Jehovah, or to Israel? Grammatically either is possible, and the sense in either case is substantially the same. The answer must depend on which interpretation best agrees with the usage of speech. The expression in full, as it is here, is found nowhere else in the Old Testament. It is worthy of remark that Jeremiah never uses וְיָצַק—right hand, in a figurative sense. The word occurs in his book only once, xxii. 24, and then in its literal sense. The only places that can be adduced as parallel to this phrase are, on the one side, Ps. lxxiv. 11 (with reference, perhaps, to the expression וְיָצַק—a stretched-out arm, Ex. vi. 6, and elsewhere), and on the other side, Ps. xlv. 11; lxxxix. 43, 44; comp. Is. xli. 13.

Whilst the first named passage distinctly expresses the thought that Jehovah draws back His hand, and that His right hand, the other passages declare that the Lord let the people or the edge of the sword fall back from before their enemy. It seems to me that in our passage the word אָחֹרֶךָ, back, backward, standing in connection with כַּפְּי־אֹיִבַי, before the enemy, decides for the latter meaning. For in Ps. lxxiv. 11 it is merely רָשִׁיב־יָדְךָ, thou withdrawest thy hand. Here the אָחֹרֶךָ, backward, must change the sense. Drawing back the hand is merely the opposite of stretching it out (רָוַע־בְּטִיָּה) and an act of volition consistent with the possession of strength. But falling back before the enemy is a symptom of weakness, which could not be asserted of the hand of Jehovah. As it is said elsewhere that Jehovah strengthens the right hand (Is. xli. 13), or elevates it (Ps. lxxxix. 43), so it can be said that He lets it fall back (as if it had become weak), and this falling back of the right hand is the same, as is elsewhere explained, as a falling back of the person generally (Ps. xli. 11), or of the sword (held by the right hand, Ps. lxxxix. 44). [OWEN (in a note on CALVIN): "GATAKER, HENRY, BLAYNEY, and HENDERSON, consider the right hand as that of Israel—that God drew back or restrained the right hand of Israel, so that he had no power to face his enemies. But SCOTT agrees with CALVIN; and favorable to the same view are the early versions, except the Syr., for they render the pronoun his own, suam; the Targ. also takes the same view. Had the word been hand, it might have been applied to Israel; but it is the right hand, which commonly means protection, or rather God's power, as put forth to defend His people and to resist enemies. This is farther confirmed by what is said in the following verse, that God stood with His right hand as an enemy. See Ps. lxxiv. 11." GATAKER's argument, in Assembly's Annotations, on the other side, is very strongly put, and agrees in its main points with NÆGELSBACK'S. Yet, for the following reasons, it seems necessary to stand by the versions and interpreters that refer the pronoun to God. 1. The pronoun usually belongs to the subject of the verb where its personal object is not specified. By adhering to this rule, we would often escape uncertainty and confusion. 2. After such an introduction as in ver. 1, How hath the Lord done all this, and the subsequent use of His with reference to God (ver. 1, His anger, twice, His footstool; ver. 2, His wrath; ver. 4, His bow, His right hand, His fury, etc.), it certainly seems arbitrary and violent in this instance to refer it to another subject. 3. It is awkward, to say the least, to make his right hand in ver. 3 mean one thing, and in ver. 4 another. 4. Throughout this whole passage, vers. 1-10, the people of Israel are represented as passive objects of Divine wrath, and no allusion is made to the slightest activity on their part in resisting the instruments of wrath, as would be done here if his refers to Israel. 5. This makes excellent sense, and preserves the continuity of the thought, verging as usual towards a climax. God breaks off the horn of Israel, that they can no longer oppose their enemies; He bends back

His own right hand, and thus withdraws His own opposition to those enemies; and while Israel lies thus helpless in themselves and deprived of God's help, He pours down upon them the fiery fury of His own wrath, and becomes Himself like an enemy fighting against them. The bending back of His hand may be intended to express God's resistance to His own merciful impulses towards His own people. He forcibly bends back the hand He had already stretched out in Israel's behalf.—W. II. II.]—And he burned against Jacob like a flaming fire, which devoureth round about.—And He set Jacob on fire, as a flame of fire which devours round about [i. e., He, as a flame of fire which consumes all around it, set Jacob on fire]. רָוַע־בְּ of the object is so often used in the signification of setting on fire, then of consuming by fire (Num. xi. 1, 3; Is. xxx. 33; xlii. 25; xliii. 2; Jer. xlv. 6; Job i. 16; Ps. cvi. 18), that we may take it here unhesitatingly in the same sense. This, indeed, is the only admissible sense. For should we take in Jacob, רָוַע־בְּ, in a local sense, we must still understand רָוַע־בְּ of the kindling of the fire, in which sense only is the Piel used (comp. Ex. xxxv. 3; Jer. vii. 18; Ezek. xxi. 4). Then, too, we see the force of the particle of comparison, וְכַמֵּן, like a flame. Evidently the meaning is that the Lord had become to Jacob as a flaming fire. He had become so by kindling the consuming fire of war in the land. See Deut. xxxii. 22.

Ver. 4. He hath bent His bow like an enemy. The Lord attacks Israel with all kinds of weapons: and so with the bow. Comp. Ps. vii. 13; Deut. xxxii. 23. [CALVIN: "Stating a part for the whole, he includes in the bow every other weapon." KIRTO: "The Hebraism for bow is like that for bread. As the latter includes all food, so does the former include all weapons." (Daily Bib. Ill., Vol. 3, p. 295.)—He stood with His right hand as an adversary. He stood at his right hand as an adversary. We cannot take his right hand as the subject of the verb (עָמַד)—erecta est manus ejus instar hostis (KALKAR) [His right hand stood erect like an adversary, BLAYNEY]—for neither does the verb mean to be erected, raised up, nor does its gender allow this construction. I think it also incorrect to take his right hand as the accusative of the instrument, as THEIGUS, VAHINGER and others do. For to stand with the right hand as an adversary is an unusually odd expression, with no example to sustain it. EWALD would give to the verb עָמַד the meaning of taking aim at something. [So HENDERSON: He hath steadied His right hand like an adversary. "The point of the comparison here is obviously that of the care taken by the archer to obtain a steady aim."] EWALD appeals to Ps. xi. 3, but the phraseology in that place is entirely different. I think that passages like Ps. cix. 6; Zech. iii. 1 illustrate this. In those places the enemy is represented as standing at the right hand. As it is said elsewhere that the friend and helper stands at the right hand, in order to support and strengthen the right hand (Ps. xvi. 8; lxxiii. 23; cix. 31; cx. 5; cxxi. 5; Is. xli. 13), so it is also said that the enemy places himself at the right hand, in order, by hemming it in and weakening it, to overcome its resistance. That יְמִינִי, his right hand, has to be taken as an accusative of place, is no objection (see my Gr., § 70, c; Ex. xxxiii. 8), though elsewhere a preposition is used (see the places above referred to, Ps. cix. 6; Zech. iii. 1 and Ps. xlv. 10). [The ingenious reference of his right hand to Israel is peculiar to our author: though CHALDEUS, as quoted by ROSENMUELLER, adopts a similar construction, but with reference to the enemies of Israel:—"He has placed himself at the right hand of Nebuchadnezzar, in order to assist him." Besides the absence of the preposition which this interpretation would seem to require, a very strong objection to it is the sudden change of person. For the principal reasons for supposing the right hand in ver. 3 refers to God, because God is the subject of the preceding clause, and no other person is specified, we believe the right hand in ver. 4 also refers to God; if his bow means God's bow, and not Israel's, then his right hand would naturally mean God's, and not Israel's, or Nebuchadnezzar's, or any other person's. It is not necessary, however, to violate grammar by giving to the Niphal participle an active or perfect sense, as EWALD and others have done. We can translate literally thus: He stood, or was standing, or set Himself—His right hand as an adversary. The ellipsis is characteristic of Hebrew poetry, and may be supplied by quoad, as to, or exegetically with, as in our version: He stood with His right hand as an adversary. WORDSWORTH: "The Prophet first has a general view of the awful form of the Almighty, and then beholds His Right Hand putting itself forth as an enemy against Zion." ROSENMUELLER: "He has placed Himself as regards His right hand, as if with it He would hurl at me a javelin." See GERLACH also.—W. H. H.]—And slew all that were pleasant to the eye—And destroyed all that charms or delights the eye. The delights of the eye (see i. 7, 10, 11) are evidently those in whom the eyes of parents take the greatest delight, the virgins and the young men, i. 18. [CALVIN: He slew all the chosen men. It is better to take the verb הָרַג, to kill, slay, metaphorically, as in Ps. lxxviii. 47, for destroy (HENDERSON).—W. H. H.]—In the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion. If the daughter of Zion is the body of the inhabitants of Zion, then the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion is the dwelling-place of those inhabitants, i. e., the city. [These words are connected with what follows, not with the preceding clause: In the tabernacle of the daughter of Zion poured He out like fire His fury. So BLAYNEY, GERLACH, NÆGELSBACH. CALVIN prefers it. The Masoretic punctuation requires it.—W. H. H.]—He poured out His fury like fire. The figurative idea of the outpouring of wrath, conceived of as liquid fire, is found elsewhere in iv. 11; Hos. v: 10; Jer. vi. 11; x. 25; xlii. 18; comp. xiv. 16. That the Poet would indicate the capture and destruction of the city, is clear.

II. 5.

5 The LORD was as an enemy: he hath swallowed up Israel, he hath swallowed up all her palaces; he hath destroyed his strongholds, and hath increased in the daughter of Judah mourning and lamentation.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 5.—אֶרְכֹּץ, in Lam. only here and ver. 7. Often in Jeremiah, vi. 5; ix. 20, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

According to Jer. lli. 13, 14 (see also 6, 12), four weeks after the capture, Nebuzaradan had burned 'the house of Jehovah, the house of the king, all the houses of Jerusalem, and every great house,' and destroyed the walls. To these facts vers. 5-9 a seem to refer, though they relate only to the destruction of the palaces, the holy places and the walls. [The particular description of destruction of holy places begins at ver. 6.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 5. The Lord was as an enemy. The Lord became as an enemy. This is specified, first of all, as the cause of these calamities. As an enemy, see ver. 4, and פָּאֲרַכְנָה as a widow, i. 1.—He hath swallowed up (see ver. 2) Israel, He hath swallowed up all her palaces; He hath destroyed his strongholds. Israel, on the one part, and the palaces and strongholds, on the other, are to each other as the people and the city. Palaces here, as remarked, seem to correspond to "the king's house" and "all the houses of the great men," or "every great house," פְּלֶכֶת הַמְּדִינָה in Jer. lli. 13. Strongholds, see ver. 2.—He hath destroyed his strongholds, is a quotation from Jer. xlviii. 18. Commentators differ with respect to the suffixes in אֶרְכֹּצְתִי, her palaces, and קִבְצָרָיו, his strongholds. Some think the feminine suffix her refers to the daughter of Zion, ver. 4, the masculine suffix his to Israel. Others think that Israel itself may be conceived of, at one time as the name of the country, at another as the name of the city. [This is the opinion of GERLACH, who refers to a very similar instance in Hos. viii. 11, where the feminine suffix is attached to the same word as here, אֶרְכֹּצְתִי, her palaces, and where, as here the masculine would be expected.—W. H. H.] J. D. MICHAELIS would read אֶרְכֹּצְתֵי, palaces of Jehovah. THENIUS conjectures that הִיאֵר, her, has been changed into הִיאֵר, his, by the omission of a stroke of the pen. But all the commentators, so far as I see, have overlooked the fact that the last words are a quotation. In this way we easily explain the masculine suffix, which not only disagrees with her palaces, but violates the rule by which, every where else in the Lamentations, Zion is conceived of as a female person. The word is either a very old scribal error for הִיאֵר, thy strongholds (yet the Sept. has τὰ ὀχυρώματα αὐτῆς), or the Poet has chosen the suffix that best preserved the similarity of sound with the original text. He could do this in virtue of the greater freedom which prevails in the Hebrew with respect to denoting the gender. See my Gr., § 60, 4. As in Ezek. xxiii. 36-49, where Aholah and Aholibah are spoken of, the suffixes are constantly changed (see especially ver. 46); so here also possibly, the suffixes are changed even after a masculine or feminine idea floated before the mind of the Poet. [The mere recurrence of two not very remarkable words in succession, can hardly be regarded as a quotation. But unfortunately there is in the present instance a dissimilarity which is very prejudicial to the idea of a quotation. Here we read הִיאֵר, in Jer. xlviii. 18 it is הִיאֵר, and our author is obliged to suppose a possible scribal error, or to invent an auricular theory of quotation. It seems necessary here to adopt the opinion of those who, according to ROSENUELLER, refer the masculine suffix to God and the feminine to the daughter of Zion. He swallowed up all her palaces, He destroyed His own strongholds. This is not to be discarded as a mere conjecture where every other mode of interpretation is purely conjectural. It is recommended by the arguments adduced for the explanation of his in ver. 3. It avoids the difficulty of supposing that pronouns of different genders refer to the same person. The her refers to the ideal person Israel, the daughter of Jerusalem. Her palaces are the habitations of the people. His own strongholds are the defences of Zion which is His habitation. Grammar and Rhetoric both commend this explanation.—W. H. H.]—And hath increased or multiplied in the daughter of Judah, see i. 15, mourning and lamentation. The last words in the original are a beautiful paronomasia, borrowed from Is. xxix. 2, הַאֲנָה וְהַאֲנָה. [HEN-DEPERSON: "Sorrow and sadness." VITRINGA: Moxor ac maestitia. GERLACH: Betrübniß und Trobsal. NAGELSACH: Echzen und Krächzen]. See יְהוָה וְיְהוָה, Gen. i. 2; שׂוֹאֵה וְשׂוֹאֵה, Job xxx. 10; שְׂמֵחָה וְשְׂמֵחָה, Ez. xxxv. 3.

II. 6, 7.

6 And he hath violently taken away his tabernacle, as if it were of a garden; he hath destroyed his places of the assembly: the LORD hath caused the solemn feasts and Sabbaths to be forgotten in Zion, and hath despised, in the indignation of his 7 anger, the king and the priest. The Lord has cast off his altar, he hath abhorred his sanctuary, he hath given up into the hand of the enemy the walls of her palaces; they have made a noise in the house of the LORD, as in the day of a solemn feast.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 6.—The verb נִזְכַּח is found in Jer. xxii. 3; xiii. 22.—שָׁן for שָׁן, see Crit. note below.—The definite article in בְּנֵי is in accordance with recognized philological usage. See my Gr., § 71, 4 a. DRECHSLER, Is., Vol. ii, p. 203 n. [The definite article was used in comparisons because "the Hebrew commonly conceived of the whole class of objects of which he spoke." See GREEN'S Gr., § 245, 5 d.—W. H. H.]—בִּלְעָדָה, the first time is used of festival place (see Ps. lxxv. 8; comp. 1 Sam. xx. 35), and then of the festival itself (see i. 4). [See Crit. note below.]—שָׁן. This Piel form is found only here. It must be taken in the accusative sense.—שָׁן occurs in Jeremiah only in xvii. 21-27, where the profanation of the Sabbath is referred to.—נִזְכַּח, in Lamentations only here; in Jer. xiv. 21; xxiii. 17; xxxiii. 24.—עָנָה, in Lamentations only here; in Jer. x. 10; xv. 17; i. 25.

Ver. 7. נִזְכַּח, three times in Lam., ii. 7; iii. 17, 31, never in Jeremiah. אֲדַנִּי, see i. 14 [Intro. Add. Rem. p. 32].—נִזְכַּח. This verb is found only here and in Ps. lxxxix. 40. [BLAYNEY renders it as Niph., His sanctuary is accursed, but conjectures from Sept., ἀπειράσας, the true reading may be נִזְכַּח, N substituted for נ, He hath shaken off His Sanctuary. As the meaning could only be conjectured from the ancient versions (see ALEXANDER, Ps. lxxxix. 40), it is not improbable that the Sept. gave it the sense of נִזְכַּח. So BROUGHTON, cast off, and CALVIN, repuilul vel reject procul ab animo suo. The fundamental signification of the verb is to reject, to repudiate. FUERST gives the Piel sense, to cast down entirely, to repudiate, to reject. This agrees with the accepted translation of Ps. lxxxix. 40. The sense of abhor, derived from a cognate Arabic root, would suit that place, as well as this; and is more agreeable to the corresponding word in the first clause, הִיאֵר, if the fundamental idea of הִיאֵר is to be foul, to stink, as GESENIUS says, though FUERST, with good reason, denies this. The idea of abhorring or of rejecting with disdain or disgust, is given to both these verbs by NAGELSACH and GERLACH. NAGELSACH translates, The Lord rejected with disdain His altar, He abhorred His sanctuary, and GERLACH just reverses the expressions, The Lord abhorred His altar, He rejected with disdain His sanctuary.—W. H. H.]—בִּקְרָשׁ, See i. 10; ii. 20, twice in Jeremiah, xvii. 12; ii. 51.—הִיאֵר, see 1 Sam. xxiii. 20; Ps. xxxi. 9, is not found in Jeremiah. The only part of the verb he uses is the Pual, and that only once, xiii. 19. [NAGELSACH translates this verb "verschloss," shut up, see marg., E. V.

He makes no remark upon its meaning. FÜRST regards כָּנַר to surround, enclose, Hiph. to shut up, and כָּנַר to flow out, Hiph. to deliver up, as entirely distinct verbs, and says that "all attempts to unite their meanings must be regarded as failures."—W. H. H.]—אֲרֻכְנֹתֶיהָ. The connection requires us to understand this of the sanctuary, although no place can be cited in which אֲרֻכְנֹן is used of the Temple; for Jer. xxx. 18, to which some appeal, is to be explained otherwise: See notes on that place. J. D. MICHAELIS would read, אֲרֻכְנֹתֶיהָ, palace of Jehovah. קוֹל נְהַיֵּנוּ, see Jer. xxii. 20.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 6-10 describe particularly the destruction of the holy places. Here God claims a special property. Everything is His. The emphatic use of the pronoun, shows that it is also significant in ver. 5, his strongholds as distinguished from her palaces.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 6. And He hath violently taken away His tabernacle (marg., hedge) as if it were of a garden. And He laid waste as a garden His tabernacle. The meaning of the verb is to use violence, to offer violence. To do violence to a garden is to lay it waste. The laying waste of a garden has these peculiarities; it is easily done, it is in some sense a crime against nature, and for that reason a garden laid waste is a revolting as well as a sad spectacle.—But what is the meaning of the word שָׁן, translated tabernacle

(marg., hedge)? That it stands for כֶּךְ, cannot be doubted. כֶּךְ constantly denotes that sort of (hütte) hut, cot, bower, that is made of wicker-work [or plaited twigs, boughs], also lairs of beasts similarly constructed, Jer. xxv. 38; Ps. x. 9. [J. A. ALEXANDER: "The Hebrew word is commonly applied to any temporary shed or booth, composed of leaves and branches." But, according to FÜRST, the word is derived from כָּן=to protect, and means properly, "the covering, protecting, screening thing (not a thing woven together out of branches) hence a covering, hut, tent; a covert, lair."—W. H. H.] Then it denotes a house generally, and especially the holy tabernacle, Jehovah's house, Ps. lxxvi. 3; as does also כֶּכָּה, Ps. xviii. 12; Job xxxvi. 29: comp. סִכְמַת; Am. v. 26.—If now it is said, that the Lord hath done violence to His tabernacle as to a garden, the tertium comparationis, the point of the comparison, consists in the facility with which the end is accomplished and in the contrast between the proper condition of things and that which the laying waste has produced. As easily as one might root up plants, fell trees and plough the ground, has the Lord overthrown the firm walls of His sanctuary; and as sad and incomprehensible as the appearance of a devastated pleasure garden is the spectacle of the sanctuary in ruins. The comparison is the more apt, because the city of God, with her joyous fountains, springing from the dwelling-place of the Most High (Ps. xlii. 5; comp. lxxxiv. 1-4), could with truth be called הַיְדֵיבֶה—גַּן־יְהוָה Jehovah's garden (Is. li. 3), παραδείσος ἐλλογίας, a Paradise of glory (Sirach xl. 27). [On the whole, our English Version seems best to express the true sense of this difficult passage, "and He hath violently taken away His tabernacle as if it were of a garden," i. e., as if it were but such a cottage in the garden as vinedressers were accustomed to build till the vintage was past. So CALVIN. This interpretation involves a play on the word שָׁן, as properly meaning a garden house, and also denoting God's tabernacle.—W. H. H.]—He hath destroyed His places of the assembly. He destroyed His place of assembly (Festort). [So HENDERSON. NOYES: place of congregation. BLAYNEY: His congregation. It is better (see note below), to translate, He abolished His appointed services, or solemnities.—W. H. H.]—The LORD hath caused the solemn feasts and Sabbaths to be forgotten in Zion. Jehovah exterminated [caused to be forgotten] in Zion festival [appointed times of Divine service] and Sabbath.—The result of the destruction of the place for holding festivals is, that the festivals themselves can no longer be celebrated and are forgotten. By Zion, not Mount Zion, but the holy city generally is meant [on the contrary, in the strictest sense the holy places are intended].—And hath despised, in the indignation of His anger, the king and the priest. And rejected [so FÜRST also] in the fury of His wrath King and Priest. Since the festivals are no longer celebrated, those persons who were appointed to officiate in them, are by their omission removed from active service. That the kings belonged to this class of persons is evident, because they were, not only God's representatives to the people, but also intercessors with God in behalf of the people. "The Israelitish king (especially in the persons of David and Solomon) bore a certain priestly character, in that the king at the head of the people and in their name worshipped God and, on the other hand, brought back to the people the Divine blessing (2 Sam. vi. 17, 18; 1 Kings iii. 4; viii. 14, 15, etc.; 55, 56, etc.; 62, 63, etc.; ix. 25; 1 Chron. xxix. 10, 11, etc.; 2 Chron. i. 6; comp. Ez. xli. 1-12)." OENLER in Herz., Real-Enc. VIII., pp. 12, 13.

שָׁן. That this word stands for כֶּךְ is evident, because, I. ש and ס frequently are interchanged, especially in the later language (see כַּיִן and שַׁיִן, 2 Sam. i. 22, פָּרַס and שָׁרַס, רָפַס and שָׁפַס, Ges. Thes., p. 931. EWALD, § 50 a). 2. We find in Ex. xxxiii. 22 the verbal form שָׁפַתִּי for כָּפַתִּי, and in Is. v. 5 כִּשְׁפָה for כִּכְסָה, Mich. vii. 4. 3. Since שָׁכַךְ and כִּשְׁפָה occur only in the places cited, and שָׁן is found only here, it would appear that these forms are not so much indications of an independent root שָׁכַךְ, as merely different ways of writing כֶּכָּה. [When GERLACH says that כֶּךְ never means hütte, a cot, tent, or tabernacle, he overlooks Ps. lxxvi. 3, where it undoubtedly describes the holy Temple as God's tabernacle house or dwelling-place. To his argument that שָׁן would be an unsuitable designation of the Temple, because if it means a house at all, it can only mean such a house as a cot or bower made of twisted branches of trees, it may be replied; 1. the Temple might be so called in allusion to the ancient tabernacle which was temporary and movable; 2. אֶשׁ may be derived from אָשַׁף in the generic sense of enclosing, and not in the particular sense of enclosing with a hedge or fence, as אָשַׁף to weave. Indeed GERLACH seems to give up the very point for which he so ably contends, that אֶשׁ cannot mean a house, when he gives it here the sense of an enclosure (Gehege) and applies it to the whole sacred enclosure, including of course the Temple. HENDERSON, also, translates the word His inclosure.—W. H. II.] The Sept. translates καὶ διεπέτασεν ὡς ἄμπελον τὸ σκῆναμα αὐτοῦ [He tore up as if it had been a vine His tabernacle]. It would seem that Job xv. 33 was in the mind of the translator, where it is said, $\text{יִצְחָקֹם בְּנִפְנֹךְ בְּרִטּוֹ}$ [He shall shake off his unripe grape as the vine, E. V. EWALD accepts (in his 3d ed.) the Sept. translation, and supposes בְּנִפְנֹךְ , instead of בְּנִפְנֹךְ , to be the true reading. To this GERLACH objects—1. That בְּנִפְנֹךְ cannot mean to tear up, to pull out; 2. The conjecture that בְּנִפְנֹךְ may have existed in the text is unnecessary, since the Sept. translator may have interpreted בְּנִפְנֹךְ as a vineyard and translated it by ἀμπελος=a vine, as בְּרִטּוֹ is translated by the Sept. in Lev. xxv. 3, 4.—W. H. II.] The explanation of PAREAU, ROSENUELLER and KAIKAR, et violenter abripuit sicut sepem horti sepem suam [NOYES: He hath violently torn away His hedge, like the hedge of a garden], according to which בְּנִפְנֹךְ would be taken for בְּנִפְנֹךְ , is not grammatically allowable, since such an omission of the governing word, after the particle of comparison, could only occur where the context necessarily required the word to be supplied,—as, for example, when it is said, Is. lxiii. 2, $\text{בְּגָדֵיךָ כְּרִדְךָ בְּגָדֵיךָ}$ [thy garments like the garments of him that treadeth in the winevat"], we supply the idea of בְּגָדֵיךָ before בְּרִטּוֹ , because the garments could not be compared to the person of the man treading the wine-press. So Gen. xviii. 11 and other passages which might be adduced here, are to be explained. See my Gr., § 65, 3, note 103, 2. But in our passage there is no necessity for supplying אֶשׁ before בְּנִפְנֹךְ , because the laying waste of the house can very well be compared to devastation of a garden. The explanation of THENIUS, “He injured that which was, in respect to His house (בְּיָסוּד), standing in an entirely subordinate relation, the garden, by which is meant the Temple courts,” is altogether too artificial. If the courts could be called the garden of the Temple, for which, however, THENIUS adduces no evidence, why did not the Prophet at once call it simply בְּנִפְנֹךְ ? [GERLACH: “The translation of THENIUS, He injured as the garden of His tabernacle, i. e., that which was the garden with respect to His Tabernacle, speaking analogically (whereby the two courts surrounding the Temple-edifice and connected by terraces, would be designated, which might be poetically regarded as the garden belonging to the Palace of the King of Israel), requires בְּנִפְנֹךְ to be taken in the construct case in spite of the article—an anomaly, for the justification of which (see EWALD, § 290, d; GESENIUS, § 103, 2, n) something more is demanded than the remark, ‘ בְּנִפְנֹךְ stands in an entirely subordinate relation,’ for in point of fact it absolutely determines the meaning of בְּנִפְנֹךְ —“the garden of His tabernacle.— בְּנִפְנֹךְ . This word occurs six times in Lam., i. 4, 15; ii. 6, bis, 7, 22. Our translators render it in five different ways, and in this verse, where it occurs twice, in two different senses. In i. 4; ii. 6 they call it the solemn feasts; in i. 15, an assembly; in ii. 6, places of the assembly; and the phrase $\text{בְּנִפְנֹךְ בְּנִפְנֹךְ}$, they translate in ii. 7, as in the day of a solemn feast, and in ii. 22, as in a solemn day. That the word could have such variety of meaning in such close connection is improbable. The word is derived from אָשַׁף , to appoint. It means something fixed, determined upon, appointed. It is used in the sense of a set time, an appointed place, a time or place appointed for meeting together, especially for purposes of religious worship, and hence the regularly appointed and observed ordinances or services of worship. As connected with the assembling of the congregation for worship, it is not unlikely that the word acquired some ambiguity in its use, like our English word church, referring sometimes to time or place of service, sometimes to the people engaged in the service, and sometimes to the service itself. But we can always trace in the use of the Hebrew word its original signification of a set or appointed time, place or service: and never, perhaps, has it the simple unqualified meaning of an assembly, a congregation, a festive occasion. There is no necessity of ascribing to it so many significations in the Lamentations, and two entirely different meanings in two successive lines of this one verse. In i. 15 it may have its primitive meaning of a set time. In ii. 7, 22 the phrase $\text{בְּנִפְנֹךְ בְּנִפְנֹךְ}$ may mean a day appointed, fixed upon, predetermined, for any especial occasion. In the other three places, where it occurs, it refers to the services appointed to be celebrated in the Temple. The reference is probably to the daily services of sacrifice, praise and prayer. The cessation of the annual feasts and greater festivals, which were of infrequent occurrence, would not be so remarkable as the abrupt and entire cessation of morning and evening prayer which had been observed, without intermission, for nearly five hundred years, or ever since the Temple was first consecrated.—There is, therefore, no real difference in the use of this word in the Prophecies of Jeremiah and in the Lamentations.—W. H. II.]

Ver. 7. The Lord hath cast off—The Lord rejected with disdain—His altar,—He hath abhorred—He abhorred—His sanctuary. The altar and sanctuary are recognized as the central points and chief places of Divine worship. By this it is obvious that בְּנִפְנֹךְ , sanctuary, here must signify, not in its widest sense the Temple generally, which has been already sufficiently indicated by אֶשׁ , tabernacle, and בְּנִפְנֹךְ , place of assembly, ver. 6, but in its narrower sense the sanctuary proper, the Temple which contained the Holy place and Holy of Holies. This sense best corresponds with בְּנִפְנֹךְ [an altar, in the widest sense, or place where offerings are made.—W. II. II.], for not the altar alone, but the holy place and the holy of holies were places of offering (Ex. xxx. 1-10).—He hath given up—He gave up—into the hand of her enemy the walls of her palaces. The connection requires us to understand by the walls of her palaces the walls of the sanctuary. [The altar is treated with contempt, the holy places are defiled, the edifice itself is given into the power of the enemy, and where we once heard the voices of a worshipping people, is heard now the wild clamor of heathen idolators.—W. II. II.]—They have made a noise—they shouted, or raised a cry or clamor—in the house of the LORD—in the house of Jehovah—as in the day of a solemn feast [lit., like a day—a time appointed, which can only refer to some regularly appointed festival of the church, and is here to be so translated, though we might render in conformity with ver. 6 and ch. i. 4, 15, a day of appointed religious services, with reference, however, to the great festivals of the church.—W. II. II.]. A clamor, loud as a festival jubilee, but of a different origin and character, is heard in the temple. It is a festival for their enemies, not for Israel (i. 15). At this feast Israel is the victim sacrificed. [WORDSWORTH: “a noise, a cry of jubilee. There is a contrast between the former shout of festal joy of worshippers in the Temple, and the cry of exultation of the Chaldeans, ‘Down with it! Down with it to the ground!’” GERLACH: “קול (cry) is not to be understood, with PAREAU and ROSENMUELLER, of the war-cry, but of the shouts of joy and triumph on the part of the enemy, as the comparison with the jubilee-festival shows (see Is. xxx. 29).” See crit. note, ver. 6.]

II. 8, 9.

- 8 The LORD hath purposed to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion; he hath stretched out a line, he hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying: therefore 9 he made the rampart and the wall to lament; they languished together. Her gates are sunk into the ground; he hath destroyed and broken her bars: her king and her princes are among the Gentiles: the law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the LORD.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 8. The LORD hath purposed—Jehovah purposed—to destroy the wall of the daughter of Zion. As has been remarked, we are explicitly informed, Jer. lii. 13, 14; 2 Kings xxv. 9, 10, that four weeks after the capture of the city, Nebuchadnezzar had destroyed the Temple, the houses and the city walls. Of the destruction of the walls the passages cited speak with special emphasis (Jer. lii. 14 and 2 Kings xxv. 10), “and all the army of the Chaldeans, that were with the captain of the guard, brake down the walls of Jerusalem round about.”—He hath stretched out a line—He stretched out the measuring-line. The architect employs the measuring line in order to build correctly. Jehovah applies it in order to level the wall to the ground in the most literal manner. This figure substantially occurs in Amos vii. 7-9; the expression first occurs in Is. xxxiv. 11; 2 Kings xxi. 13 and Job xxxviii. 5 [see Zech. i. 16. GERLACH: “The use of the measuring line denotes that the destruction of the building will be executed with the same rigorous precision with which an architect carries out his preconceived plan. MICHAELIS’ explanation is too artificial; ‘a line, as it were, designated the extent of the destruction, that the devastating punishment might be proportionate to the guilt.’” J. A. ALEXANDER: on Is. xxxiv. 11. “The sense of the metaphor may be, either that God has laid this work out for Himself and will perform it (BARNES), or that in destroying He will act with equity and justice (GILL), or that even in destroying He will proceed deliberately and by rule (KNOBEL), which last sense is well expressed in ROSENMUELLER’S paraphrase, ad mensuram vastabitur, ad regulam depopulabitur,” it is laid waste by measure, it is depopulated by rule. While the idea of the thoroughness and completeness of the work of destruction, as indicated by GERLACH, suits better here than any of the other explanations suggested above, and is undoubtedly included in the meaning of the words, yet the main thought is, that God Himself predetermined the extent of the destruction; Jehovah purposed it and He stretched out a line to mark its beginning and its end. Human instruments were both incited and restrained by Him. It was a line stretched out, not after, but before the destruction, not to show its extent, but to define its limits, “designed to point out what was to be destroyed” (OWEN).—W. II. II.]—He hath not withdrawn his hand from destroying (marg., swallowing up). He with- drew, or averted not, His hand, see ver. 3, from devouring, destroying, swallowing up, see ver. 2. [What He had designed, He executed. He withdrew not His hand till the full measure of destruction indicated by the line was complete.—W. H. H.].—Therefore He made—Then made He—the rampart and the wall to lament—rampart and wall mourn. The two words, rampart and wall, are united as here in Is. xxvi. 1. “Rampart,” חָלַל (see 2 Sam. xx. 15; Ob. 20) is the pomœrium, the circumvallation, or the smaller wall in front of the chief wall. [FURST: “The outermost fence of fortifications, the glacis, the (outermost) rampart around the city walls, pomœrium, πορτειχισμα, antemurale.” In 2 Sam. xx. 15 it is rendered in E. V. by “trench.” In Ob. 20, not expressed in E. V., it means, according to FURST, a province.—W. H. H.].—They languished together. A prosopopœia, as in the preceding expression, “He made rampart and wall mourn,” and in i. 4. Comp. vers. 18, 19.

Ver. 9. [In vers. 1-8 the Lord executing His wrath has been constantly before us. Now the work is done: and in vers. 9, 10, we are afforded a brief glance at the results, after the catastrophe was over.—W. H. H.] The first part of this verse may be taken as a continuation and conclusion of the foregoing description; or as merely a recapitulation, by way of transition to what follows. If the latter is correct, then the gates are to be regarded as a part of the walls, and with the walls sunken into the ground. But, since the gates constituted the most important part of the walls, and were in fact the very centres of public life (see their use as Forums, Deut. xxi. 19; Ruth iv. 1; 2 Sam. xix. 9; 1 Kings xxii. 10) and were moreover the keys to the city, we may regard them as representative of the city itself, and so understand the first part of ver. 9, as a comprehensive conclusion of the preceding description.—Her gates are sunk into the ground. The sense of the verb by itself (קָבַע is not to sink down, but to sink into), as well as the prefix בְּ, shows that קָבַע is not to the earth, but into the earth. The ruined gates sink into the earth, and on account of the accumulation of ruins are buried beneath the level of the ground. [ASSEM. ANNOT. “The Jewish Doctors upon the place, out of their Talmudists, tell us strange stories of the gates of Jerusalem sinking down into the ground, that they might not come into the enemies’ power, because they were the work of David’s hands: and some of ours run as wildly wide another way, expounding it of the Priests and Judges that were wont to sit in the gates, see v. 14. I conceive no more to be meant than that the gates were thrown down to the ground, and lying along there (such of them and such parts of them as had escaped the fire, i. 4; Neh. i. 3; ii. 3, 13, 17), were buried in the rubbish when the walls were demolished. See Neh. ii. 13, 14; iv. 10.” GERLACH: “This is said of the gates because they were so completely destroyed (PAREAU, THIENUS, buried under rubbish), that no more trace could be seen of them than if they had sunk into the ground, not because (as MICHAELIS says) the gates overthrown by the enemy sunk into ditches dug under them.”]—He hath destroyed and broken.—He destroyed and broke in pieces [literally and phonetically shivered, שִׁבְרָה]—her bars [the bars that secured the gates, see Ps. cvii. 16.—W. H. H.].—Her King and her Princes are among the Gentiles, the heathen. From this point the discourse relates to persons instead of things. If the king and princes were already among the heathen, then the transportation into exile had already taken place.—The law is no more—there is no law, (Kein Gesetz ist mehr vorhanden). תּוֹרָה, law, may denote by itself the whole law, a particular part of the law, or the law as a rule of conduct, considered, however, subjectively with respect to the theory, i. e., as the matter of instruction (institutio, doctrina) is in fact the fundamental meaning of the word). Add to this that אֵין תּוֹרָה, there is no law, may grammatically refer to the whole preceding sentence (“there they cannot practise the law,” LUTHER) [the King and Princes are among the Gentiles, where they cannot observe the law]; or merely to בְּגוֹיִם, among the Gentiles (“who have no divine revelation,” KALKAR), [“among the Gentiles” who are “without law,” which would be a correct translation of the Hebrew. HUGU BROUGHTON gives this sense and refers to Rom. ii. 14, “Her King and her Princes are among the heathen that have no law.”—W. H. H.]; or it may be taken as an independent proposition. If we compare such passages as Jer. xviii. 18

(לֹא-תֵאבֵד תּוֹרַת מִפְּהֵי) (“the law shall not perish from the priest”), Ez. vii. 26 (תּוֹרַת הָאֲבֵר מִפְּהֵי) (“but the law shall perish from the priest”), Mal. ii. 7 (יִבְקְשׁוּ מִפִּיהֶוּ) (“and they should seek the law at his mouth”), we would incline to the opinion that תּוֹרָה, law, refers only to instruction out of the law and administration of the law by the priests. But why then are not the priests named? And have not the kings and princes, as judges and guardians of the legal order (Deut. xvii. 8-20), their share in the administration of law? I believe, therefore, that while אֵין תּוֹרָה, there is no law, is to be taken as an independent proposition, it is to be understood in the widest sense, as indicating that there was no longer any sort of administration (whether priestly or kingly) of the law. [GERLACH adopts the translation Her king and her princes are among the heathen without law, with LUTHER’s explanation, referring the words without law to the whole preceding part of the sentence, “Her king and her princes are among the heathen where they cannot observe the law, or enjoy it.” A strong objection to this is that it transfers our thoughts and sympathies from the deplorable condition of Jerusalem, which is here the subject of description, to the personal condition of her king and princes in a far distant land. Besides, the very structure of the sentence leads us to expect something directly relating to the daughter of Zion. When we are told that her king and her princes are among the heathen, we are prepared to hear of some evil resulting to her from their absence. What that evil result is, we are in fact informed if we understand the Poet to mean, that on account of the absence of “her king and her princes," she is deprived of "the law." This agrees substantially with NAEGLSBACH'S interpretation, but he has erred in making two wholly independent sentences of what is really only one, though consisting of two poetical parts as the rhythmical structure requires. The correct translation is—Her king and her princes among the heathen—there is no law. This is recommended by the two arguments which GERLACH very forcibly urges in favor of his rendering. 1. It is in accordance with the Hebrew accents, which NAEGLSBACH entirely ignores and violates, and which connect the words without law, or there is no law with what precedes. 2. "This explanation, agreeing with the accents, is further recommended by the fact that the two last members of verse 9 describe the fate of those persons, standing to the city in the relation of Helpers and Counsellors or Comforters (her king and her prophets), of whose help and counsel, or comfort, the city had been deprived, even as (according to the first member of ver. 9) she had been deprived of the external means of protection. It is the deprivation of all these, formerly the medium of divine help, that the Poet mourns (see Hos. iii. 4; xiii. 10; Is. iii. 2)," GERLACH. Another argument for the translation suggested is, that it renders a verb in the first part of the sentence unnecessary, or helps us at least readily to supply it. If we make two wholly independent sentences, as NAEGLSBACH does, then there is not in the whole book a similar instance of the omission of a verb: and, indeed, it is somewhat conjectural what verb ought to be supplied; the simple fact, that the king and princes are among the Gentiles, is not of itself and necessarily an evil, we must add to this another idea that they are exiled, or imprisoned, or disgraced, or suffering, or dying among the Gentiles. If, on the other hand, we read the two clauses as intimately connected and interdependent, as the accents imply, then the proper verb in the first clause, if indeed any verb is necessary, is suggested by the last clause, and the construction is not wholly unparalleled in the book. Her king and her princes among the nations—there is no law, plainly means (Because), her king and her princes (are) among the nations—there is (for her) no law. So in i. 2. And her tears on her cheek, there is no comforter to her from all her lovers, means undoubtedly, and her tears (are) on her cheek (because) there is no comforter," etc. In both cases the two clauses are related as cause and effect, and in both the use of the Hebrew לֹא, which contains in itself the verb "to be," prevents what would be the case otherwise and what would be an anomaly in this book, the occurrence of a whole sentence without a single verb expressed. In the other instances in this book, in which our English translators have thought it necessary to supply the verb to be, its omission in the original is highly poetical and very expressive. 1. 4. "And she is in bitterness," וְהִיא בְּכָרָה, lit. and she—bitterness to her, and i. 20, "for I am in distress," בְּצָרָה לִי, lit. for trouble to me, are Hebrew idioms quite synonymous with the old English forms "woe's her," "woe's me!" In i. 22, "for my sighs are many, and my heart is faint," lit. for many my sighs, to my heart sickness, the omission of the verb, while it does not mar the sense, intensifies the expression, when these words are read in their close connection with the preceding prayer. So in our text, the absence of the verb is due to the broken, rapid, vehement style of the poetry of passion; Her king and her princes among the heathen—there is no law. But if we take the first clause as a complete and separate statement of the mere fact that her king and her princes are among heathen, the omission of the verb must be regarded as a blemish and a carelessness of which the writer of the Lamentations is no where else guilty.—The meaning of law, according to this interpretation is obvious. The law of the land, which was the law of God as especially revealed for the government of the Jewish theocracy, is no longer observed and administered, for its guardians and administrators, the king and the princes are in exile. All "legal observances" were swept away (HENDERSON). The law, moral, ceremonial and judicial, as regarded its administration in Judea, "was no more" (OWEN).—W. II. II.]—Her prophets also find no vision from the LORD. Also her prophets receive no longer vision [revelation from God, divine communication] from Jehovah. These words have been taken as evidence that the Poet, in the whole of the foregoing description, had in mind only the condition of the Israelites remaining in the land. But if Jeremiah received an answer to the question which he put to the Lord ten days after he asked it (Jer. xlii. 4, 7), then it could not be said that the prophets could receive no vision from the Lord. I believe, therefore, that the Poet here had in mind the great body of the people who had been carried into exile. Those who, with their king, princes and priests, were "among the heathen," and on that account "without law," were the ones who were also without prophets. [Not the people as such, whether in exile, or remaining in Judea, but the ideal person of "the daughter of Zion" (see vers. 1, 4, 8, 10) is the subject of this description. That her gates were sunken into the ground and her bars broken into pieces, localizes the scene depicted in Jerusalem. It is, further, her king and her princes who are "among the heathen," so that she is left "without law." In strict reference to this mystical personage, representing the genius of the theocratic people mourning amid the ruins of Jerusalem, it is now added "also her prophets find no vision from Jehovah." To suppose the Poet in the first clause of the verse to speak of Jerusalem, and in the two following clauses of the people in exile, is to cause an abrupt transition from one subject to another subversive of all unity of construction, and to cover with a cloud of rhetorical confusion, in addition to the cloud of Divine anger, the unique and beautiful conception of the daughter of Zion sitting solitary and forlorn, weeping, helpless and comfortless, amidst the ruins of the theocratic city. If, as NAEGLSBACH argues, it could not be said that the people remaining in the land were without "vision from Jehovah," because Jeremiah received an answer to his question as related in Jer. xlii 4-7, much less may it be affirmed that the exiles were without "vision from Jehovah," since at that very time Ezekiel was exercising his prophetic office in Babylonia.

In point of fact, however, the time of which the Poet speaks is subsequent to the period referred to in Jer. xlii. 4-7: a time, not only succeeding the destruction of the city and the transportation of the mass of the people to Babylonia, but posterior to the flight of the fugitives to Egypt, carrying the Prophet with them, as is evident especially from Lam. iv. 17-20; v. 6, 9. At this time, doubtless, Jeremiah himself in Egypt, and Ezekiel and perhaps Daniel in Babylonia, and not improbably other prophets, whose names have not come down to us, were speaking to the people as moved by the Holy Ghost. How then could it be said that the prophets of the daughter of Zion found no vision from Jehovah, since whatever was spoken by a prophet of God, whether in Jerusalem or at any distance from it, was, according to our theocratic idea, intended for the whole church, however its members might be scattered? The answer is that her prophets found no vision from Jehovah which had for its object her deliverance from her present sorrows. Her material defences were broken down, her natural guardians and the administrators of her laws were in captivity, and her prophets had no word from the Lord for her relief, her help, her comfort. Indeed the words of her prophets at this time, as these very Lamentations show, while not without intimations of a future deliverance, destroyed every vestige of hope of any immediate interposition of God in her behalf. Jeremiah delivered no encouraging prophecies to the Jews after the city was destroyed. There is nothing in Ezekiel of an encouraging character, after this event was fully consummated, if we except the obscure visions relating to a remote future in the last chapters of his book. Daniel delivered no prophecy containing any promise of temporal blessing to the Jews, till towards the very close of the captivity. As SCOTT remarks, "There seems to have been at this period a very peculiar suspension of that information and encouragement, which the prophets had for many ages been employed to communicate to the people. Except Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel, no prophet is mentioned from the beginning to the end of the captivity, when Haggai and Zechariah were raised up. This chasm was an evident token of divine displeasure, and must have been a very sensible aggravation of the suffering endured by the pious remnant."

II. 10.

10 The elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground, and keep silence: they have cast up the dust upon their heads; they have girded themselves with sackcloth: the virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10.—יָשְׁבוּ לָאֲרֶץ. See יָרְדוּ לָאֲרֶץ, Jer. xiv. 2 [they lie mourning on the ground].—The form יָרְכוּ (see OLSH., § 143, d, 265 c) is not without analogies in Jeremiah, for he says יָרְכָה, viii. 14; יָרְכִינָה, xiv. 17. [FUERST makes the word Niph., DAVIDSEX, Kal.]—עָפַר does not occur in Jeremiah [nor any equivalent for it.—W. II. II.]—הָגִירָה שָׁקִים, see Jer. iv. 8; vi. 26; xlix. 3.—הוֹרִידוּ, Jer. xlix. 16; li. 40.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 10. To the dignitaries of the Theocracy there belonged two classes, in whose sorrow the grief of the people found its most eloquent expression,—these were the elders and the virgins. See i. 4, 18, 19. [These are now introduced as mourning over the devastated Zion, the absence of the law and of prophetic vision.—W. II. II.]—The elders of the daughter of Zion sit upon the ground and keep silence [lit. They sit on the ground, they keep silent, elders of daughter Zion]. The elders, formerly called together to give counsel, now are silent without any counsel to give. [They are speechless, not only counselless. They have no words even for sorrow. "Small griefs are eloquent,—great ones dumb" (CLARKE).—W. II. II.]—They have cast up dust upon their heads—they sprinkle dust on their head. [Lit., They cast up, or throw up dust upon their head.] See Josh. vii. 6; Job ii. 12; Ez. xxvii. 30.—They have girded themselves with sackcloth—they gird on [or put on] sackcloth [or sacks]—The virgins of Jerusalem hang down their heads to the ground—The virgins of Jerusalem sink to the earth their head. The virgins also, who were wont to be called officially to act as the mouth-piece of the people, when the feeling of general joy was to be expressed, now are dumb and hang down their heads to the ground.

PART II.

II. VERS. 11-22.

- 3 VER. 11. Mine eyes failed with tears,
 My bowels were troubled,
 My liver was poured on the ground,
 For the ruin of the daughter of my people,—
 Because child and suckling fainted away
 In the streets of the city!
- 4 VER. 12. To their mothers they say—
 Where is corn and wine?—
 Whilst they fainted as the wounded
 In the streets of the city,—
 Whilst they poured out their soul
 Into their mothers' bosom.
- 5 VER. 13. What can I testify to thee?
 What liken to thee, thou daughter of Jerusalem?
 What compare to thee,
 That I may comfort thee, daughter of Zion?
 For great as the sea is thy ruin!
 Who can heal thee?
- 6 VER. 14. Thy prophets predicted for thee
 Falsehood and delusion,
 And uncovered not thy guilt
 To avert thy captivity.
 But then they predicted for thee
 False burdens and expulsions!
- 7 VER. 15. All that passed by the way
 Clapped their hands at thee;
 They hissed and wagged their head
 At the daughter of Jerusalem.
 Is this the city of which they used to say—
 Perfect in beauty,—Joy of the whole earth?
- 8 VER. 16. All thine enemies
 Gaped at thee with their mouth,
 They hissed and gnashed the teeth;
 They said,—We have utterly destroyed—
 Yea, this is the day we have looked for—
 We have found [it]—we have seen [it]!
- 9 VER. 17. Jehovah did what He purposed:
 He fulfilled His word
 That He commanded in the days of old.
 He demolished and pitied not.
 He made the enemy joyful over thee;
 He exalted the horn of thine adversaries:
- 10 VER. 18. Their heart cried out unto the Lord.
 O wall of the daughter of Zion,
 Let tears run down like a river
 Day and night,
 Give thyself no rest,
 Let not the daughter of thine eye cease.

- פ VER. 19. Arise—cry in the night—
 In the beginning of the night watches;
 Pour out thy heart like water
 Before the face of Jehovah:
 Lift up thy hands to Him, for the life of thy young children,
 That faint for hunger, at the head of every street.
- ג VER. 20. See, Jehovah, and look!
 To whom hast Thou done this?
 Should women eat their fruit—
 Children whom they have nursed?
 Should Priest and Prophet
 Be slain in the sanctuary of the Lord?
- ש VER. 21. The boy and the old man
 Lay on the ground in the streets.
 My virgins and my young men
 Fell by the sword.
 Thou hast killed—in the day of Thy wrath—
 Hast slain—hast not pitied!
- ת VER. 22. Thou callest together, as on an appointed day of solemnity,
 My terrors from round about.
 And there was not, in the day of Jehovah's wrath,
 One that escaped or was exempt.
 Those I have nursed and brought up—
 My enemy consumed them.

ANALYSIS.

[These verses, strictly speaking, constitute the lamentation, for which the preceding description has prepared the way and furnished the theme.—W. II. H.] In ver. 11 the Poet describes his own suffering, especially as produced by the terrible fate of the starving children and their mothers, ver. 12. In vers. 13, 14 the Poet seeks to inform us of the extent, and, at the same time, of the moral cause, of their misfortunes. In vers. 15, 16 he describes the malicious rejoicings of their enemies. In ver. 17 he draws attention to the fact that the great catastrophe was simply the punishment of disobedience, which God had long determined upon and predicted. Vers. 18, 19 are an exhortation to a prayer of wailing, addressed to the personified wall of Jerusalem [Zion]. To this exhortation vers. 20–22 are the response. So this chapter closes, like ch. i., with a sort of prayer, which, however, is not a direct prayer, but only upbraids God by asking how He could have permitted such horrible and outrageous crimes!

II. 11, 12.

- 11 Mine eyes do fail with tears, my bowels are troubled, my liver is poured upon the earth, for the destruction of the daughter of my people; because the children and 12 the sucklings swoon in the streets of the city. They say to their mothers, Where is corn and wine? when they swooned as the wounded in the streets of the city, when their soul was poured out into their mothers' bosom.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11.—עֵינַי הֵם—פָּרַדְוּ, in Jer. xiv. 6.—The plural רְבִיעוֹת, only here and Ps. lxxx. 6. Jer. uses only the Sing., viii. 23; ix. 17; xiii. 17; xiv. 17; xxxi. 16.—[The Niph. נִשְׁפַּךְ cannot have active sense, which NAEGLERBACH gives it, nor is this necessary to his interpretation of the passage.—W. II. H.]—כִּבְדִּי, the liver (never in Jer.), see Ex. xxix. 13, 22; Lev. iii. 4, etc., so called because omnium viscerum et gravissimum et densissimum est (GALEN, de usu partium, 6, 7, in Ges. Theol., p. 656). [Sept. translates it ἡ δόξα μου, my glory. But the undoubted use of the word as meaning the liver, and its connection here with eyes and bowels, are conclusive.—W. II. H.]—בֵּית עֵינַי—שִׁבְרֵי, is entirely Jeremiaic, vi. 14; viii. 11, 21. Again in Lam. iii. 43; iv. 10.—Verb עָטַף, three times in this chap., vers. 11, 12, 19; never in Jer.—עוֹלֵל יוֹנֵק. Comp. Jer. xlv. 7.—חֶרֶב וְקִרְיָה, not unusual in Jer., v. 1; ix. 20; xlix. 25.

Ver. 12.—The Hithp. הִשְׁתַּבַּךְ, besides here, only in iv. 1 and Job xxx. 16.—חָיִק, Jer. xxxii. 13.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In vers. 11, 12 the Poet proceeds to describe his own grief. Ver. 11. Mine eyes do fail with tears—mine eyes have become dim in consequence of tears [mine eyes failed with tears; Old English, were spent, BROUGHTON. The eyes are represented as exhausted, worn out, by weeping.—W. II. H.]. See Jer. xiv. 6; Lam. iv. 17; Ps.

ix. 4; ex. 82, 123.—My bowels are troubled—my bowels are tumultuously moved. See i. 20. He depicts his sorrowful emotions by showing how his eyes and bowels have become affected by them. [Bowels, here as elsewhere, are used in a sense entirely figurative. His eyes, literally, wept. But the poet never intended to indicate the literal movement of his bowels as an evidence of his grief. The bowels, according to Hebrew habits of thought and expression, were the seat of mental emotions, especially of a painful nature. His tears kept pace with his agony of mind. A correct translation would be, my soul was greatly moved. See notes on i. 20. The verbs in this verse are preterites, and ought to be so rendered.—W. H. II.]—My liver is poured out upon the earth—my liver has fallen out to the earth [lit., was poured out on the ground]. The pouring out of the liver cannot be understood as if it were emptied of its fluid contents, for it has no such contents. Nor can we say that, properly speaking, the flowing out of the bile, caused by compression of the liver, is intended. So FÜRST, who explains this text by Job xvi. 13. For in that case, the bile should be designated as being poured out. Rather, the Poet would say, that the liver itself falls out from him, as it were; as we say that a man's heart falls out from him [that he loses heart?]. The liver is thus evidently regarded as the seat of emotions, the reverse of those which at that time controlled the Poet. The liver is described as the seat of pleasure and courage (see DELITZSCH, Psychologie, IV., § 13, p. 228, 1st ed.; p. 268, 2d ed.). The falling out of the liver, then, denotes the loss of all joyousness and courage; and is conceived of, it would seem, as the consequence and climax of the fermentation of the viscera in general, described in what precedes. The whole phrase is peculiar to this passage. [The physiological explanations of many commentators (see BLAYNEY, HENDERSON) require us to regard the Poet as suffering from bilious diarrhoea. The Hebrews (probably not so well versed in physiology as the commentators imagine) identified the physical life with the substance of the soul, and associated mental activity with the organs and functions of physical vitality, locating intellectual action in the head and heart, and purely emotional in the heart and lower viscera, as the liver and the bowels. Remembering this, we may dismiss the unpleasant suggestions of the movement of the bowels and ejection of bile from the liver, in the literal sense, and, escaping the painful presumptions of colic and jaundice, allow our Poet to express the anguish of his soul in the metaphorical language of his race. The liver is here regarded, says NOYES, as the seat of feeling, and its being poured out on the ground, remarks GERLACH, is explained by such analogous expressions as Ps. xlii. 5, I pour out my soul; Job xxx. 16, My soul is poured out. "Here, as with regard to many other of the bodily organs as mentioned in Scripture, there is not only a literal sense capable of universal interpretation, but a metaphorical import that cannot be communicated by any literal version, unless when the same metaphorical signification happens to exist also in the language into which the translation is made. Dr. J. M. Good touches on this subject in the Preface to his Translation of the Song of Songs, and is disposed to contend that such allusions, in order to convey their real signification, should be rendered, not literally, but equivalently; and we so far agree with him as to think that the force and delicacy of many passages must be necessarily impaired and their true meaning lost, when the name merely is given, in a language where that name does not involve the same metaphorical idea. * * * Among ourselves the spleen is supposed to be the region of disappointment and melancholy. But were a Jew to be told, in his own tongue, that the inimitable COWPER had long labored under the spleen, he would be ignorant of the meaning of his interpreter; and, when at last informed of it, might justly tell him that, although he had literally rendered the words, he had by no means conveyed the idea" (The Pictorial Bible).—W. H. II.]—For the destruction—on account of the ruin—of the daughter of my people, because the children and the sucklings swoon (margin, faint) in the streets of the city. [Lit., in the languishing or fainting of child and sucking-babe in the streets of the city.] The Poet's grief was caused by the ruin of his people in general, but especially by the frightful sufferings of the poor children, which he represents as the very acme of the calamity.

Ver. 12. The Poet describes, in a manner graphic and true to nature, what he had said in a general way (ver. 11) of the wasting away of the children. The strokes of his pencil are few in number, but suffice to place before our eyes an exact picture of those heart-rending scenes.—They say to their mothers—To their mothers they said. The imperfect (אָמְרוּ) is used to indicate an act in the past often repeated. Comp. my Gr., § 87, f. For it is evident the Poet describes a past condition of things, namely, that ensuing on the capture of the city. At that time, when neither the famished city (see Jer. lii. 6), nor the conqueror, who had no time then to think of it, furnished the means of subsistence, the famine must have been at its highest stage. [The word, which is future in form, should undoubtedly be translated by our present. So E. V., CALVIN, BROUGHTON, BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, GERLACH. It is an instance of the future used, as our present is, in graphic descriptions. See ver. 1, אָמְרוּ, covers. To their mothers they say.—W. H. II.]—Where is corn and wine? Corn (אֵינָן) which usually occurs in connection with grapes (אֵינָן), see Jer. xxxi. 12), here denotes, neither baked bread alone, as most commentators think, nor only roasted corn, parched corn, as THEIXIS would have it. For the hungry children longed only for food in general [not for a particular kind of food]. Corn, here, is to be taken, therefore, in the general sense, which אֵינָן, bread, formerly had, a meaning which the word seems to have in Ps. lxxviii. 24 also, where the manna is called corn of heaven, אֵינָן שָׁמַיִם. The Poet does not say, but every one feels, how this question, which they could not answer, must have cut into the hearts of those mothers.—When they swooned—whilst they fainted [lit., in fainting].

The prefix בְּ , in, here has a temporal sense: they said so whilst they were wasting away. [So in the last clause. In breathing out their soul, i. e., they said so, whilst they were dying. CRANMER'S Bible gives a free translation, but admirably expresses the sense of the whole verse. "Even when they spake to their mothers: where is meat and drink? For while they so said, they fell down in the streets of the city, like as they had been wounded and some died in their mothers' bosom."—W. H. H.].—As the wounded in the streets of the city. Although not wounded, yet they died a painful death as the wounded do. [The idea rather is, not necessarily that they died, all of them at least; but, overcome with weakness and suffering, many of them fell suddenly in the streets as if wounded, whilst others died in their mothers' bosom.—W. H. H.].—When their soul was poured out—whilst breathing out their soul—[lit. in breathing out].

The soul pours itself forth, whilst the breath streams out. It is also the same as expire,—into their mothers' bosom—in the lap of their mothers. THENIUS would understand the bosom. But the mothers are regarded as sitting on the ground, and the children lying in their laps. [Bosom is better. There were children of all ages among those alluded to. Some old enough to seek for food themselves and fall down in the streets of the city. Some able to ask in words for food and drink. Others sucklings, ver. 11, and these doubtless are especially meant as breathing out their soul in their mothers' bosom while vainly seeking nourishment at the breast.—W. H. H.] THENIUS rightly draws attention to the Hitpaël forms of the verbs in the second and third clauses (וַיִּשְׁתַּבַּח and וַיִּשְׁתַּבַּח). These indicate how the children struggled, and how intense the conditions of their wasting away and expiring were.

II. 13-14.

- 13 What thing shall I take to witness for thee? What thing shall I liken to thee, O daughter of Jerusalem? What shall I equal to thee, that I may comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion? for thy breach is great like the sea; who can heal thee?
- 14 Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee; and they have not discovered thine iniquity, to turn away thy captivity; but have seen for thee false burdens, and causes of banishment.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 13.—The K'tib אֶעֱיֶדֶךָ is certainly wrong, since עֵיֶד is never used in Kal. We must read, therefore, according to the K'ri אֶעֱיֶדֶךָ . The meaning of הָעֵיֶד is to give testimony, bear witness. The person whom the testimony concerns is usually indicated by בְּ . Yet there are three places where the accusative in the form of a suffix stands in the place of בְּ . Of the witnesses who were brought forward against Naboth, it is said, 1 Kings xxi. 10, וַיִּעֲרֶהָ , and in ver. 13, וַיִּעֲרֶהָ . In Job xxxi. 11 it is said, and here in a good sense (bonam partem) $\text{וַיִּעֲרֶהָ וַיִּתְּעֲרֶנִּי$. According to these and other analogies, which are placed together in my Gr., § 78, we may take the suffix here as denoting the remoter object in the dative case. [So SEPT.: Ti μαρτυροῦσθε μοι. CALVIN: Quid contestabor tibi. BOOTHROYD: What shall I testify to thee? The words have been variously rendered. CRANMER'S BIBLE: What shall I say of thee? BISH. BIBLE: "What shall I say unto thee?" BROUGHTON: What testimony shall I bring for thee? BLAYNEY: What shall I urge to thee? HENDERSON: What shall I take to witness? carelessly overlooking the suffix. NOYES: How shall I address thee?—The Piel רָפָה is comparare, conferre, to compare one thing with another. See Is. xlvi. 5; xl. 18, 25; Song Sol. i. 9. Only the Kal occurs in Jer. vi. 2.—The Hiphil הִשְׁוֶה , which occurs only here and Is. xlvi. 5, has the same signification, no form of the verb שָׁוָה is found in Jeremiah.—

$\text{הַפֶּת יְרִשָׁלַיִם}$. In the Lamentations only here and v. 15, never in Jeremiah. [The definite article here is emphatic, and is well rendered by NAGELSBACH, "thou daughter of Jerusalem."—W. H. H.].— וַאֲנִיחֶכָּהּ . The Piel נִחַח in Jer. xvi. 7; xxxi.

13. [The force of אֶעֱיֶדֶךָ here is to express the end or design, that I might comfort thee. CALVIN].— $\text{בְּתוֹנִית פֶּת־אֵי}$.— $\text{בְּתוֹנִית פֶּת־אֵי}$, see i. 15.— $\text{כִּי־גִדּוּל כֶּסֶם}$. The expression is found only here; yet comp. Jer. vi. 23; i. 42. שִׁבְר . Very frequent in Jeremiah, see ver. 11.— רָפָה , Jeremiah uses frequently, iii. 22; viii. 22; xvii. 14, etc., but never in construction with ל .—[The future form of the verbs, which NAGELSBACH renders as simple presents, express an optative sense, what may, can or shall I testify, etc.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 14.—Verb רָוַח Jeremiah never uses.— נָלָה , which Jeremiah uses not infrequently, xi. 20; xxxiii. 6; xlix. 10, is construed with עַל only here and iv. 22. The significance of this construction is, the disclosing of a matter concealed. [The phrase is elliptical; they had not removed that which covered their iniquity as a veil (CALVIN, GERLACH, ROSEN-MÜLLER, etc.). BLAYNEY: "For עַל the Syr., seems to have preserved the true reading לָךְ ." Besides the lack of authority for this emendation of the text, the recurrence of this verb with עַל in iv. 22, seems conclusive.—W. H. H.].— עָנִין Jeremiah often uses ii. 22; iii. 13; xiii. 22, etc.—The singular כִּשְׂאָה , in sense of effatum, is found in Jeremiah only in the familiar passage xxxiii. 33-40, where he forbids the use of this expression. The plural occurs only here.— שָׂוָה in Jeremiah only in the adverbial expression לִשְׂוָה , ii. 30; iv. 30; vi. 20; xviii. 15; xli. 11; whilst in Ezekiel we find וַהֲוִין שָׂוָה , xii. 24; כִּהְוָה , xliii. 17; קִכְס־שָׂוָה , xxi. 28.— כִּדְרֵיחִים is ἀπ. λεγ.; הֲרִיח means detrusit, Ps. v. 11, expulsi, Jeremiah viii. 3; xxxii. 3, 8; xxix. 14, 18, etc., diripuit, dirjecit, Jer. xxiii. 2; i. 17, but also abduxit, Deut. xiii. 6, 11, seduxit, Deut. xiii. 14; 2 Chron.

xxi. 11; Prov. vii. 21. [OWEN: "There seems to be a mistake in this word of a ר for a ר, two letters very similar; for the Targ. the Syr. and the Arab., must have so read the word, as they render it in the sense of what is deceptive, fallacious, or imaginary. It is in the list rendered phantasms. The word occurs in Jer. xxii. 14, and is applied to chambers through which air or wind passed freely. It may be rendered here winds or airy things. Such was the character of the r prophecies. This is far more suitable to the passage than expulsiōns or rejections, as given by the Sept. and Valg." As the verb רָרַר sometimes, though rarely, has the sense of misleading, seducing, may not the idea of fallacious have been derived from כִּרְרָר? There is no necessity, however, for imposing such a meaning upon it here.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In these two closely connected verses, the Poet expresses the thought that the true prophets cannot repair the injury the bad prophets have caused. He greatly desires to comfort Zion, by way of prophetic testimony in her behalf, and by way of comparison to her advantage with other sufferers. But it is impossible: for immeasurable and irretrievable injury has been done by the false testimony of her prophets.

Ver. 13 What thing shall I take to witness for thee? What testify I to thee? [What can I testify to thee?—W. H. H.] The Poet means prophetic testimony (see רָרַר, testimony, Is. viii. 16), and that in the sense of instruction, warning, correction, (see Jer. vi. 10), not in the sense of comforting by promises. See below, next clause of this verse, on the words that I may comfort thee. [While the word signifies prophetic testimony, to bear witness in behalf of God, it may signify divine testimony either for or against a person, and here the former is intimated both by the construction (see critical note below), and by the following words that I may comfort thee. Besides the Prophet was actually testifying against the people in the name and by the Spirit of God. But he received no favorable message in their behalf. There is an allusion to ver. 9, "her prophets also find no vision from Jehovah."—W. H. H.] What thing shall I liken to thee—What liken to thee,—O thou daughter of Jerusalem? What shall I equal to thee—what compare to thee,—that I may comfort thee, O virgin daughter of Zion? It is a comfort for the unfortunate to know that others have endured equal suffering. This comfort cannot be given to Zion. The idea of comforting can be referred to all three of the preceding verbs, although to testify רָרַר, never means prophesying in order to comfort and make happy, but has always the sense of warning, correction: yet even warning, correction and instruction may be a comfort. [Where this Hebrew verb occurs in the sense of warning or protest it is always connected with its object by the significant preposition ל or עָל. Here the word may be taken simply in the sense of bearing witness, in which sense it is favorably used (even in Hiphil) in Job xxix. 11, see also Mal. ii. 14. The meaning is, What can I, as a prophet of God and in the name of God, testify for God in thy behalf, in order to comfort thee? WORDSWORTH: "What prophetic testimony shall I utter in God's name, in order to console thee? I have no message of comfort for thee; and thy misery is so great, that I can find no likeness or parallel to it, wherewith to assuage thy sorrow."—W. H. H.]—For thy breach is great like the sea—for great as the sea is thy rum, or injury; who can heal thee?

That is to say, Zion's hurt is immeasurable, and incurable. [BLAYNEY: "The breach or wound, which Jerusalem had received, is by an hyperbole said to be great, deep or wide, like the sea, which is, as it were, a breach made in the earth." HENDERSON: "No cannot find any object to put in parallel with the lamentable condition of Jerusalem. The only exception is the sea, which, on account of its vast dimensions, alone furnished a fit emblem of the magnitude of the devastation effected by the Chaldeans." ASSEM. ANN.: "Such a breach, as not some small river, but the sea is wont to make, when it hath rent asunder and got thorow the sea-walls, that before kept it out; such as cannot be made up again. See Jer. li. 42; Ez. xxvi. 3; Job xxx. 14." CALMET: Un océan de maux, un déluge de douleurs, une mer d'affliction, A sea of miseries, a flood of troubles, an ocean of sorrow.]

Ver. 14. Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee. Thy prophets foretold to thee deceit and white-wash. [Thy prophets prophesied to thee falsehood and delusion. The last word (רָרַר) has been variously translated, though NÆGELSBACH alone can claim the unique and parabolical idea expressed by white-wash. This meaning is suggested by the use of the word in Ez. xiii. 10-15; xxii. 28, rendered in our version untempered mortar. Whether Ezekiel meant white-wash, or not, which is doubtful, the word can have no such meaning here. To daub a wall with white-wash is feasible. To prophesy white-wash is impossible. The Hebrew word (רָרַר) seems to have suggested the idea of something viscous, sticky, slimy; hence applied to lime, mortar, as by Ezekiel; or to the white of an egg (Job vi. 6), from which comes the idea of insipidity, want of savor, which is the sense adopted in our text by BROUGHTON: The prophets have looked out for thee things vain and which have lost the saltiness, and by CALVIN, insipiditatem, vel insipidum, tastelessness or insipidity; this sense easily suggests the idea of folly, in which sense the word in our text is rendered by most of the versions; SEPT.: ἀποπίπτει; VULG.: stultus; LUTHER: thörichte Gesich'e; E. V.: foolish things. The word as thus used would imply more than mere absurdity, which is the sense BLAYNEY and BOOTHROYD give it. It means a folly that is chargeable with guilt, in which sense the cognate word רָרַר is used in Job i. 22 (see BARNES' Notes), xxiv. 12: a folly especially that is deceptive, that does not fulfil the expectations it excites, in which sense the same word רָרַר is applied to false prophets in Jer. xxiii. 13.—We have not in English a word that will express both these ideas,—delusive folly or foolish delusions. GERLACH uses the word Blendwerk, false-show, delusion, but acknowledges that it expresses only the effect, and not the contemptible character of what the prophets did. The word stuff, adopted by HENDERSON, "thy prophets see for thee vanity and stuff," is hardly equivalent to the Hebrew word. He borrowed it from GATAKER, who says, "They took upon them to be seers, but saw not what they should see, and told what they saw not, nothing but vain and frivolous stuff, the froth of their own fancies, Jer. xxiii. 16, 26; xxvii. 14, 15."—W. H. II.] The expression חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל [saw vain things; E. V., prophesied falsehood], is found five times in Ezekiel and only in Ezekiel, xiii. 6, 7, 23; xxi. 34 [E. V. 29], xxii. 28. The expression חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל [E. V., here, foolish things, in Ezek., untempered mortar], is also Ezekiel's, for it is used by him emphatically four times, in the same chapter that contains the phrase (חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל) just referred to, xiii. 10, 11, 14, 15; and it is used again by him, and that, too, in immediate connection with the same phrase (חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל) in xxii. 28. The thirteenth chapter of Ezekiel is directed against the false prophets. Ezekiel in that denunciatory discourse has before his eyes what Jeremiah had said relative to the same subject (chap. xxiii.). Now in Jer. xxiii. 13 occurs the expression חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל, in the prophets of Samaria I saw חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל [E. V., folly, marg., an unsavory, or an absurd thing]. חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל [the word in our text] never occurs in Jeremiah. Besides here, it occurs only in Ezekiel at the places above cited, and in Job vi. 6. For its meaning see the thorough discussion of MAEVERNICK in his Comm. on Ezekiel. The whole passage in which Ezekiel uses the expression חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל in the sense of white-wash, and to which xxii. 28 afterwards refers, bears throughout the peculiar characteristics of Ezekiel's metaphorical style. We cannot, therefore, doubt that Ez. xiii. was written earlier than our chapter: and also that the words from נְבִיאֵי הַפֶּלַל originated from the above cited places of Ezekiel. See the Introduction, § 3. [The inference contained in the Introduction and implied here, that if this is a quotation from Ezekiel, Jeremiah could not be the author of the Lamentations, is entirely gratuitous. The thirteenth chapter of Ezekiel must have been written before the final destruction of Jerusalem; "about five years" before "Jerusalem was taken and destroyed," according to WORDSWORTH. Even if the prophecy of Ezekiel had been nearly or quite contemporaneous with the destruction of Jerusalem, it is a mere assumption, incapable of proof, that Jeremiah could not have possessed a copy of that prophecy, even if we are obliged to believe that he wrote these lamentations immediately after the destruction of the city. With the close intercourse that must have subsisted at the time between Babylonia and Palestine, with an invading army constantly flowing in and meeting detachments guarding captives and spoils going out, and with the lively sympathy that must have existed between Ezekiel and Jeremiah, and between the pious Jews in exile and the pious Jews in Judea, it would be neither impossible nor unlikely that the utterances of those prophets should be interchanged as rapidly as they were committed to writing.—In point of fact, however, it is by no means clear that this passage is a quotation from Ezekiel. As to the first expression, it is composed of two words only, both in frequent use in the earlier Scriptures and in the prophets who preceded Jeremiah. And as to the second, it is used in a connection entirely different from that in which it occurs in Ezekiel, and very obviously in a different sense. How prophesying חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל could be suggested by daubing a wall with חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל, it is difficult to see. How the word can mean the same thing in both places, is also beyond the power of ordinary perception. There would be as much propriety in giving the word the meaning of white-wash or mortar in Job vi. 6 as here. This is no more a quotation from Ezekiel, than Ezekiel's use of the word is a quotation from Job.—W. H. II.]—And they have not discovered thine iniquity, to turn away thy captivity—And uncovered not thy guilt, to turn thy captivity [i. e., to prevent it, or avert it. So the Syr. translates it.] The expression, turn thy captivity, founded on Deut. xxx. 3, is frequent in Jeremiah (see xxxii. 44; xxxiii. 7, etc.), and with Ezekiel (xvi. 53; xxix. 14, etc.). But in the connection in which it here occurs, it does not mean, as it does in the places referred to, vertere captivitatem, i. e., reducere captivos [turn the captivity, i. e., bring back the captives], but can only mean avertere captivitatem [avert, or prevent the captivity]. By open exhortations to repentance, the prophets would have averted the captivity (see Ez. xxii. 30, 31). The words are connected with what precedes. [ASSEM. ANN.: "They laid not thy sins before thee, to bring thee to repentance, whereby thy present miseries might have been prevented, Jer. vi. 13, 14; viii. 11; xxiii. 17, 22." GERLACH and others understand this to mean that, after the captivity was a fact, the prophets had not led the people to a repentance that would have delivered them from it, see Ps. xiv. 7; Job xlii. 10; Jer. xxx. 18. But this sense would not be pertinent here. Our text looks back to one of the original causes of the present misery. What her prophets might have done to prevent it, they cannot now do, even if by doing it they could terminate that misery; for now her prophets can find no vision from Jehovah, ver. 9. If they had exercised their power aright when they possessed it, the captivity would have been averted. This is the idea now in the Poet's mind.—W. H. II.]—But have seen for thee false burdens and causes of banishment—And they foretold to thee sayings of deceit and of seduction. [But then they saw for thee burdens of falsehood and expulsions.—W. H. II.] The connecting thought is, And so prophesied they, etc.—False burdens—oracles of deceit, חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל, are declarations of delusory purport, which result not felicitously, but ruinously.—Causes of banishment, seductions, חֲזוֹן הַפֶּלַל, can signify, ambiguously indeed, either seductions or banishments. Both predicates may refer to the discourses of the false prophets. LUTHER makes the last feature only conspicuous. "But they have preached to thee wantonly, in that they have preached thee out of the land." THENIUS rightly draws attention to the fact that Jeremiah, xxvii. 10, 15, in a passage where he warns of the false prophets, expresses emphatically and exactly the same thought which is contained in our verse, "Hearken not ye to your prophets * * * for they prophesy a lie unto you, to remove you far from your land; and that I should drive you out (הִרְחַתִּי אֹהֲבֵיכֶם), comp. ver.

15, לֹכְדֵי עֵץ הַדֵּי' אֹהֲבֵיכֶם, and ye should perish." It is therefore very possible that the Poet, by the choice of this word, seemingly invented ad hoc for his present purpose, would give us to understand that he had in view not only the declarations of Ezekiel, but also those of Jeremiah pertaining to this matter. Thus the verb נָטַף [from which the Hebrew noun is derived] is, as seen from the examples adduced, especially current with Jeremiah. It is found in this prophet nineteen times, elsewhere in the old Testament thirty-four times, ten of which are in Deuteronomy. But that it may be used here ambiguously, its connection with נָטַף indicates. [There are three objections to the translation of NÆGELSBACH. 1. It makes the last clause of the verse a mere repetition of the first clause. 2. It is very doubtful if the last word, rendered seduction (NOTES, seductions), can have that meaning. WORDSWORTH gives its literal meaning as drivings away, and explains it consistently with the general idea adopted by our author, "the prophecies of thy false prophets, to which thou didst hearken, instead of listening to God, have banished thee, and driven thee away from thy home." 3. The word rendered by NÆGELSBACH, WORDSWORTH, NOYES and others, prophecies, and in E. V. burdens, cannot mean any prophecy, without reference to its subject or character, but designates a prophecy of a threatening or minatory nature. The correct translation then is, But they saw for thee burdens of vanity and expulsions or banishments. But how could this be true of the false prophets? HENGSTENBERG (on Zech. i. 9) understands the rain burdens and exiles or dispersions, which the false prophets predicted as referring to the enemy. "The false prophets endeavor to make themselves beloved by the people, by predicting a great calamity, which should come upon their powerful oppressors." (So also DIODATI.) The objection to this is that it does not naturally follow the second clause of the verse, and is, after all, only a repetition of the first clause. HENDERSON takes the word burdens as meaning the causes of punishments, as our version has rendered the last word causes of banishment. "The false prophets, in their attempts to account for the captivity, invented any one but the true one,—the apostacy of the Jews." This preserves the logical connection between the three clauses of the verse, but is philologically untenable, for the idea of causes of punishment is not suggested by the words used. The probable explanation is suggested by the use of the future with } conversive, which, while it makes the verb a preterite, suggests a time posterior to that to which the preceding preterites referred. Her prophets having predicted vain and foolish things, and failed to bring the people to repentance, and so save them from captivity, then at last, after the captivity occurred, themselves predicted for her burdens of misfortune and of banishments. Those very prophets who once prophesied so many things full of flattery, overwhelmed and panic-stricken in the hour of calamity, see nothing but evil for the daughter of Zion, and were loudest in their predictions of punishments and misfortunes. This would agree with the interpretation already given to the words in ver. 9. Her prophets also find no vision from Jehovah, i. e., no vision of good, of blessing, they have only visions of evils, prophetic burdens full of apprehensions and fears. Another explanation suggests itself from the double meaning of the verb to see, הִיָּה, which may mean merely to see, or to see by prophetic inspiration. It may be taken in the former sense, with a satirical purpose. These prophets did see prophetically, or pretended to do so, visions from God that were vain and delusory, but they afterwards actually saw in course of fulfilment the burdens of misfortune and banishment pronounced by Jeremiah and formerly derided by them. The use of the word נָטַף, if it necessarily means false (though it may possibly mean simply misfortune, see Job vii. 3; Is. xxx. 28; Hos. xii. 12), would be a valid objection to the last interpretation, but not to the other, for in that case the burdens were false burdens, suggested by their own excited and terrified imaginations. The force of the future with } conversive, following verbs in the preterite, may be expressed here thus, but then, i. e., after the captivity, they saw false burdens and expulsions.—W. II. II.]

The thought is entirely Jeremic. See ii. 8; xiv. 13-15; xvii. 14-16, etc. In Lamentations it occurs only once again, iv. 13.—[נָטַף. After all that has been asserted to the contrary, the evidence from its derivation and use is, that this word means simply a burden, and, as applied to prophecies, an announcement of punishment or vengeance imposed on its object as a burden. The verb נָטַף never means to pronounce, except in a figurative sense, as if the voice were lifted up in loud outcries or shouting; and its derivative נִטְפָה is not used in a single instance where it can only mean a simple declaration or announcement, or where we cannot trace at least a figurative allusion to something that is borne or carried as a burden. It is used twenty-four times of a literal material burden (Num. iv. 15, 19, 24, 27 twice, 31, 32, 47, 49; 2 Kings v. 17; viii. 9; 2 Chron. xvii. 11; xx. 25; xxxv. 3; Neh. xiii. 15, 19; Is. xxii. 25; xxx. 6; xli. 1, 2; Jer. xvii. 21, 22, 24, 27); ten times of a literal mental burden or care (Num. xi. 11, 17; Deut. i. 12; 2 Sam. xv. 33; xix. 36; 2 Kings ix. 25; 2 Chron. xxiv. 27; Job vii. 20; Ps. xxxviii. 5; Ez. xxiv. 25); twice where it seems to refer to usury laid as a burden on the unfortunate (Neh. v. 7, 10), once for punishment as a burden (Hos. viii. 10), twenty-four times with reference to prophecies that may fairly be regarded as of a minatory character, laying burdens on their objects (Is. xiii. 1; xiv. 28; xv. 1; xvii. 1; xix. 1; xxi. 1, 11, 13; xxii. 1; xxiii. 1; Jer. xxiii. 33 twice, 34, 35 twice, 38 thrice; Ezek. xii. 10; Nah. i. 1; Hab. i. 1; Zech. ix. 1; xii. 1; Mal. i. 1), three times where it is translated by E. V. song, and in the margin carriage, where the idea of the care of religious services involves the idea of a burden

(1 Chron. xv. 22 twice, 27), and twice where it may mean a solemn charge laid as a burden on those to whom it is given (Prov. xxx. 1; xxxi. 1). A careful examination of these passages, the only ones except our text where the word occurs, will strongly confirm the opinion that מְשֹׁה never means simply effatum, a declaration, an ordinary oracle or prophecy, but always one implying a burden of evil foretold or imprecated. —W. H. H.]

II. 15, 16.

15 All that pass by clap their hands at thee; they hiss and wag their head at the daughter of Jerusalem, saying, Is this the city that men call The perfection of beauty, The joy of the whole earth? All thine enemies have opened their mouth against thee: they hiss and gnash the teeth: they say, We have swallowed her up: certainly this is the day that we looked for; we have found, we have seen it.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 15.—כִּפְּקוּ וְנָחְפוּ. Num. xxiv. 10; Job xxvii. 23. See Jer. xxxi. 19 (Ez. xxi. 17); xlviii. 26.—Jer. nowhere uses the expression שָׂרַק רֹאשׁ. He says instead הִנִּיד בְּרֹאשׁוֹ, xviii. 16, comp. Ps. xlv. 15.—The ו, relativum, which is used here, and in ver. 16, evidently because words from the common colloquial dialect are quoted, occurs in Lam. only in these two verses and in iv. 19; v. 18, and not at all in Jer. The Pron. rel. must be regarded as in the accusative of the nearer relation (in reference to whom they said it, see my Gr., §70, e. f.), since אָמַר never directly means to call (see Is. v. 20; viii. 12; Eccles. ii. 2). The Imperfect here indicates repetition in past times; see on יִאֲמְרוּ, ver. 12.—בְּלִילֹת. This word-form and its variations are frequent in Ezekiel (see xvi. 14; xxiii. 12; xxxviii. 4; xxvii. 24); Jeremiah never uses them. See Ps. i. 2, יִפְּי מִבְּלֵל is mentioned as going out of Zion.—Jeremiah (xlix. 25) and Ezekiel (xxiv. 25) use מִשׁוֹשׁ by itself, each only once.

Ver. 16.—With reference to the transposition of the initial letters פ and ע in chaps. ii., iii., iv., see the Intr.—Jeremiah never uses שָׂרַקָה: in Ez. it is found once, ii. 8.—שָׂרַקוּ. See ver. 15.—The verb שָׂרַק occurs only in Job xvi. 9; Ps. xxxv. 12; xxxv. 16; cxii. 10, and is used only of grinding the teeth, gnashing with the teeth.—בְּלִעְנֵנוּ, vers. 2, 5, 8.—Jer. often uses the Piel לָקַח, viii. 15 (xiv. 19); xiii. 16; xiv. 22: it is not found in Ezekiel.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In these verses the Poet depicts the scornful triumph of heathen and inimical nations over the ruin of Jerusalem. [SCOTT: "The idolaters took the words out of the mouth of the Jews, and derided them for glorying in their holy city and its peculiar protection and privileges. The combination of scorn, enmity, rage and exultation, which the conquerors and spectators manifested, when gratified by the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, are set before the reader with peculiar pathos and energy. The whole scene is presented to his view as in some exquisitely finished historical painting: and the insulting multitudes, who surrounded the Redeemer's cross, can hardly be forgotten on the occasion."]

Ver. 15. All that pass by clap their hands at thee; they hiss and wag their head—They clap their hands over thee all who pass by the way. They hiss and shake their head. [All that passed by the way clapped their hands at thee, they hissed and wagged their head. OWEN: "Jeremiah relates what had taken place, the verbs being in the past tense. Our version is not correct in rendering the verbs in the present tense. The old versions follow the Hebrew."—W. H. H.] Some (OTTO, THENIUS) interpret this verse as the expression, not of mockery, but of amazement. They say not all who passed by would have mocked. That may be. But the number who would not was certainly decreasingly small. For by the עֲבָרֵי הַדֶּרֶךְ, passers of the way, we must understand travellers and strangers. The Israelites were no longer in that empty land, and if there were some, yet to them the destruction of the city was only too well known. But clapping the hands is a gesture especially of surprise. Besides, it is further said, that they hiss. The Hebrew verb שָׂרַק signifies, it is true, primarily to whistle, and does not always express scorn and mockery (see Is. v. 26; vii. 18). שָׂרַקוּ with לְ, Is. v. 26; vii. 18; Zech. x. 8, does not express scorn and mockery, but with עַל it always does, 1 Kings ix. 8; Job xxvii. 23; Jer. xix. 8; xlix. 17; i. 13; Ez. xxvii. 26; Zeph. ii. 15. We whistle to a person to call his attention, but to whistle at or over a person implies derision.—W. H. H.] But the connection here decidedly favors the sense of 'scornful hissing.' For שָׂרַק, to hiss, must be taken in the same sense in which it is immediately used in the next verse, which is closely connected with this verse. There it undoubtedly has this sense. Add to this, that the shaking of the head is always an expression of scornful wonderment; Ps. xxii. 8; cix. 25; Job xvi. 4; Is. xxxvii. 22 (2 Kings xix. 21).—At the daughter of Jerusalem. See ver. 13. [Mark the distinction between thee in the first clause, and the daughter of Jerusalem in the second clause. In the first chapter the city itself is prominent and foremost, and Zion appears as an accessory to her past grandeur, once her crowning glory, but now in ruins, the cause of her deepest disgrace and anguish. In this chapter the relations of the two are reversed. Zion here stands forth in ideal personification as the conspicuous figure, and the city, the daughter of Jerusalem, once her chief honor and her joy, is now the chiefest cause of her shame and grief.—W. II. II.]—Saying, Is this the city that men call—Is that the city of which it used to be said.—The perfection of beauty—Perfect in beauty.* The expression is borrowed from Ezekiel, xxvii. 3, where the prophet so calls the city of Tyre, and xxviii. 12, where he indicates the king of Tyre as “perfect in beauty.”—The joy of the whole earth. This expression is used of Zion in Ps. xlviii. 3. [ALEXANDER: “It is called the joy of the whole earth, as a source of spiritual blessing to all nations.”] See Is. xxiv. 11. Jerusalem is called the joy of the whole earth, and not merely of the whole land [i. e., the land of Israel (OWEN)], as is evident, because that which is perfect in beauty must be all this, and because all the strangers and travellers passing by it are represented as moved at first with astonishment. Joy at her beauty can be reconciled with envy and hatred of her inhabitants.

Ver. 16. This verse enters into very close connection with the preceding one. It treats of the same malicious rejoicings of the enemies over the downfall of Jerusalem. But it proceeds farther in its statements, for while in ver. 15 only the passers-by, in ver. 16 all her enemies are represented as rejoicing and exulting.—All thine enemies opened their mouth against thee.

All thine enemies gape their mouth at thee [lit., All of thy enemies opened at thee wide their mouth]. The gaping, or distorting of the mouth, in behoof of scornful laughter, is indicated again in iii. 46, where these words are almost verbally repeated, and with the expressions here used in Ps. xxii. 14.—They hiss [lit., they hissed] see ver. 15—and gnash [lit., gnashed] the teeth. As this is elsewhere an expression of suppressed rage, so here it is an expression of satisfied rage. See Ps. xxxv. 16, 21, 25.—They say [lit., said], we have swallowed her up—we have devoured* [i. e., completely destroyed]. Not only those enemies who had personally taken an active part in the destruction of Jerusalem, are intended, but all had a share in what some actually achieved,—so far, at least, that all could say, “We have destroyed.”—Certainly this is the day that we looked for—Yea, this is the day we have expected.* It is evident that the restriction involves an assertion; if only this day (as the day of total destruction), and no other, could afford satisfaction to the enemies, then certainly that day afforded satisfaction in the highest degree. See Jer. x. 19.—We have found, we have seen it.—Finding, מָצָאנוּ, is the antithesis to seeking, striving. Seeing, רָאִינוּ, which involves the idea of certainty on the ground of seeing with the bodily eyes (see Ps. iv. 7; lxxxv. 8), is the antithesis to merely wishing and hoping. The heaping together of words arranged asyndetically [we have looked for, we have found, we have seen,—the original can hardly fail to remind us of the famous Veni, vidi, vici] portrays the intensity and the completeness of their satisfaction.

II. 17.

17 The LORD hath done that which he had devised; he hath fulfilled his word that he had commanded in the days of old: he hath thrown down, and hath not pitied: and he hath caused thine enemy to rejoice over thee: he hath set up the horn of thine adversaries.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 17.—עָשָׂה אֱלֹהִים זֶה—See Deut. xix. 15.—The verb פָּעַל, in Jer. only in Kal and in the connection פָּעַל פָּעַל, vi. 13; viii. 10. In the sense of absolvere, filling up, it is found Is. x. 12; Zech. iv. 9.—אָכַר is found no where else in the Old Testament. The form אָכַר, once very frequent, especially in Ps. cxix., is found neither in Jer. nor Ez.—פָּעַל Jer. uses very frequently.—מָצָאנוּ, see i. 7.—פָּעַל, twice in Jer.; in Lam. only here.—חָרִים קָרָנוּ. This expression is not found in Jer.; he only once uses the word קָרָנוּ, see on ver. 3.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 17. [In ver. 17 the direct address to Zion is resumed, and is continued through vers. 18, 19.—W. II. II.] The ruin of Zion, as above described, was not a fortuitous event. God had for a long time foreseen and decreed it as eventually inevitable. Hence the historical catastrophe is nothing else than a realization of a divine purpose. It was, then, God Himself who destroyed the holy city and afforded to her enemies the rejoicings of which vers. 15, 16 speak. To those verses this verse refers throughout.—The Lord hath done that which he had devised Jehovah accomplished what He had decreed. See Jer. li. 12, “for Jehovah hath both devised and done that which He spake.” Zech. i. 6 expands the same thought by the emphatic expression of the middle term, “Like as Jehovah of hosts thought to do unto us, according to our ways, and according to our doings, so hath He dealt with us.” [HENRISON: “However the enemies of the Jews might tauntingly exult in their destruction of the Jewish metropolis, that disastrous event was ultimately to be referred to the purpose of Jehovah to punish its inhabitants for their sins "] —He hath fulfilled his word that he had commanded in the days of old. The Lord had, in very ancient times, when He founded the Theocracy, commanded His servants to warn His people that in case of disobedience they would have to suffer the punishment of destruction. See Lev. xxvi. 14-39; Deut. xxviii. 15-68. [SCOTT: "This reference to the ancient predictions against Israel for their sins, is of great importance; both as it shows that these prophecies were then extant and well known among the Jews, and that they were understood by the pious remnant exactly as we now explain them."—BLAYNEY, followed by BOOTHROYD, divides the verse thus: Jehovah hath accomplished that which he had devised; he hath fulfilled his word; what he constituted in days of old, he hath destroyed and not spared; and says, "To this construction we are determined by the metre. The sense is good, and perfectly adapted to the place, and corresponds nearly with what is expressed Jer. xlv. 4." All this is true. But, on the whole, the Hebrew accents rather favor the common division, the metre does not demand the change, and the repetition of the pronoun אֲנִי directly before its governing verb has a poetical and rhythmical effect, according to the common division, not to be overlooked.—W. H. H.]—He hath thrown down—He demolished, or destroyed.—And hath not pitied—And pitied not. See ver. 2.—And he hath caused thine enemy to rejoice over thee—He made the enemy joyful over thee. [CALVIN: exhilarated their enemies.]—He hath set up the horn of thine adversaries—He exalted the horn of thine oppressors. This expression is purely poetical. See in particular 1 Sam. ii. 10; Ps. lxxv. 11; xcii. 11; cxlviii. 14; 1 Chron. xxv. 5.

II. 18, 19.

- 18 Their heart cried unto the Lord, O wall of the daughter of Zion, let tears run down like a river day and night: give thyself no rest; let not the apple of thine
- 19 eye cease. Arise, cry out in the night; in the beginning of the watches pour out thine heart like water before the face of the Lord; lift up thy hands toward him for the life of thy young children, that faint for hunger in the top of every street.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 18.—הוֹכַחַת. BOERMAL would altogether erase this word. HOUBIGANT reads: אֲדוֹנֵי אֵל-בְּתוּלַת פֶּת צִי. HERDER: הַמְבוֹת [of הַמְבוֹת, i. e., ezardescere [servulo zelo corripere. So BLAYNEY: Their heart cried out, before Jehovah with fervency, O, etc.] DATHE, after the Syriac: אֵל-אֲדוֹנֵי הוֹכַחַת בֵּת צִי. J. D. MICHAELIS: אֲדוֹנֵי אֲדוֹנֵי, i. e., clamat cor eorum ob fundamenta murorum. Tu filia Zion descendere fac, etc. THENIUS would read הָנֵם instead of הוֹכַחַת. EWALD, in his later edition, reads עֵינַי לִבִּי. He compares Ps. lxxii. 2, and translates, indefatigably cry to Jehovah, O wall of the daughter of Zion! The reading הוֹכַחַת, however, is confirmed by the SEPT. For this translates, Ἐβοήσῃ καρδία αὐτῶν προς κύριον: Τειχὸς Σιών καταγάγετε ὡς χειμάρρους δάκρυα, etc. JEROME does not change the text, but he translates, Clamavit cor eorum ad Dominum super muros filie Zion.—The verb פָּגַג in the sense torpidum, languidum esse, Niph. examinatum, enervatum esse, Gen. xlv. 26; Hab. i. 4; Ps. lxxvii. 3; xxxviii. 9. The substantive פִּגְגָה occurs only here: הַפִּגְגָה iii. 49. The construction לִבִּי פָּגַגַת לִי is a very strong, perhaps the strongest, example of the use of the construct case for the mere purpose of the external connection of words. See EW., §287, a, 2; 283, b. דָּבַח is used here in the general sense of cessare.

See Josh. x. 12, 13; Jer. xlvii. 6.
 Ver. 19.—קִיָּבִי. See Jer. ii. 27; xiii. 4, 6; xviii. 2.—רָגִי. See Jer. xxxi. 7; Prov. i. 20.—בְּלִילִי. See i. 2.—לְרֵאשִׁית לְרֵאשִׁית, an expression only found here.—נִבְיָה פָּנִי.—אֲשַׁכְּרוֹת. See Jer. xvii. 16.—[אֲדוֹנֵי. HENDERSON: "Instead of Adonai forty of KENNICOTT's, and forty-eight of DE ROSSI's MSS., together with seven more of his originally, and the Hagiographa printed at Naples, read Jehovah. The Venetian Greek version has τὸ ἰδιότου. On these authorities I have not scrupled to follow this reading in the translation." BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NOTES, adopt this reading.—W. H. H.]—פָּפְגִי-שָׁאָה, not in Jeremiah.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 18. Their heart cried unto the Lord—The first words of ver. 18 have given the commentators great trouble. Various readings have been invented. I believe that neither a different reading, nor an artful construction is necessary. Only we must not regard the words, Their hearts cried unto the Lord, as an independent sentence (LUECKENBUESSER, THENIUS) thrown in by the way. Rather, these words constitute the introduction and means of transition to all that follows down to the end of the chapter. First of all, let it be observed, from the second clause of ver. 18, the Poet lets Zion herself speak with reference to what he had been saying in vers. 13-17. This change in the method of recital he precedes with the brief word of introduction above indicated. But what he now puts into the mouth of Zion, as an outpouring of the heart to Jehovah, he divides into two parts. First of all, in vers. 18 b, 19, they to whom the pronoun their (the suffix in לִבִּי, their heart) refers address the wall and summon it to prayer. In vers. 20-22 the prayer itself follows, which accordingly must be regarded as the prayer of the wall of Zion. They of whom it is said, Their heart cries unto the Lord, are evidently particular individuals. But these persons would not appear before God in their individual capacities, but rather seek the mediation (der idealen Gesamtheit) of the whole church, regarded in its ideal or mystical unity. Thus the cry of their heart comes to God through the mouth (der Gesamtheit) of the united people [theocratically and by personification regarded as a unit]. Thus it is explained why the words, Their heart cried unto the Lord, are not immediately followed by words addressed to God, but by an appeal to the wall of Zion, which by answering this appeal brings before the Lord that which filled their heart, as mentioned in ver. 18 a. That those individuals should thus seek the mediation of the whole church (Gesamtheit) is very natural. For not the individual Israelite, but Israel is the universally historic reservoir and organ of the redeeming grace of God. With Israel is the covenant of grace made, and only as covenant members of Israel have individuals any claim on covenant grace. Now, therefore, as in the Psalms (cxxxv. 19; cxlvii. 12; cxlix. 1-3, etc.) the congregation is often summoned to offer praise and thanks to the Lord, so here it is summoned to make its complaint to the Lord. If this is done here in a very peculiar fashion, by summoning to prayer the wall of Zion as if it were the symbol of the theocratic unity (der Gesamtheit), yet this is justified by the historical circumstances out of which our Song originated. Zion stood as long as the walls held together. But as soon as these were broken through, Zion was lost (see Jer. lii. 7, וַיִּבְרַח הָעָם מִלְּפָנֵי הַיְהוָה כִּי נִשְׁבְּרָה הַחֹמַיִם וְהָעִיר נִשְׁבְּרָה then the city was broken up). Is it surprising that an Israelite, who had experienced the siege and capture of Jerusalem, should take the wall for all that it enclosed? This trope is, on the whole, no more bold, than where elsewhere the frontiers are taken for the country they bound, the house for its inhabitants, the purse for its contents. The pre-eminent importance of the wall may be clearly perceived from the fact that in Nehemiah's time everything depended on its restoration. See Neh. vi. 15, 16; xii. 27-43; comp. Ps. cxxii. 3. If the wall of the daughter of Zion is thus taken for the daughter of Zion herself, it should not surprise us that the same activities are attributed to the wall which belong properly to the daughter of Zion, and that it is exhorted to weep and to pray for its children. Mourning and exhaustion have already been attributed to it in ver. 8 above, and in i. 4 the ways of Zion are represented as mourning. Further, Is. iii. 26 and xiv. 31 have been correctly referred to, where the predicates of mourning, lamenting and howling are imputed to the gates. [The first words of the verse must refer to the enemies who are the subject of the preceding verse. There is no other nominative expressed to which the pronoun their (the suffix in דָּבָר) can belong. To refer it back to the passer-by in ver. 15, as BLAYNEY does, is unnecessary and unnatural. To suppose that it refers to the pious Jews is to suppose an abrupt ungrammatical, and awkward transition, to which there is no parallel in the Lamentations. The pronominal suffixes in these Songs are employed with singular accuracy. If we keep in mind the proper meaning of the verb rendered cried, which is to cry out, to vociferate (Deut. xxii. 24, 27; Is. xlii. 2), we readily see the connection. Even these heathen enemies recognized the hand of God in the destruction of Jerusalem, and their heart expressed this conviction in loud outcries and shouts addressed to the Lord,—Adonai the Lord of the heathen, as well as of Israel. This may throw additional light on the words in ver. 7, "They have made a noise in the house of Jehovah, as in the day of a solemn feast." (It is not impossible that the choice of a proper initial word may have led to this continued reference to the heathen.) After the word Lord there ought to be a full stop. This is indicated in the Hebrew by the accent Aathnah, which rarely occurs so near the beginning of a verse. What follows is not what the enemies cried, nor indeed can it be, for the Hebrew word so translated is intransitive. Whenever that word, קָרָא is followed by anything spoken or said, the verb אָמַר to say, is introduced, Ex. v. 8, they cry, saying: 15, xvii. 4; Num. xii. 13; 2 Kings iv. 1; vi. 26, cried—saying: 1 Kings xx. 39; 2 Kings iv. 40; vi. 5, cried—and said. The only seeming exception to this construction, 2 Kings ii. 12, where Elisha cried, My father, my father! etc., is due, probably, to the broken disconnected ejaculations of the prophet, that could hardly be preceded by the verb אָמַר, as if he had said something with deliberation. It must be observed, too, that they were only ejaculations, outcries that he uttered, and the verb is not followed by אָמַר as it is here. But here, where אָמַר is used, a long and connected address, like this to the walls of Zion, could not be the object of the verb קָרָא to cry. Had the prophet intended to tell us what the enemies said to God, he would have followed the word קָרָא, they cried with the usual phrase and said. We must take therefore the following touching address to the walls, as the words of the Prophet. We thus avoid the exceeding awkwardness of introducing a long address to the walls of the city with the singular announcement that they cried to the Lord, when there is not, according to NÆGELSBACH, a single word actually addressed to the Lord, for the prayer in verses 20-22 is the prayer of Zion. We moreover dispense with the necessity of the laborious distinction between the individual members of the church and the mystical unity of the untranslatable Gesamtheit. We have here an eloquent poetical address by the prophet to the ruined walls, which by personification and synecdoche represent the afflicted daughter of Zion.—WORDSWORTH: "O wall of the daughter of Zion. The Prophet appeals to the wall of Jerusalem, as that which once encircled her with defence, but now lies prostrate, and which, being reduced to ruin, was the fittest representative of the city in her desolate condition. He gives a voice to the stones of the wall, and makes them weep for her sorrow. We need not be surprised by such a prosopopeia as this, any more than by his exclamation, O earth, earth, earth (xxii. 29), or by the language of Hab. ii. 11: The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam shall answer it; or by our Lord's words (Luke xix. 40), If these should hold their peace, the stones would cry out." Comp. GERLACH, p. 75.—W. H. H.]—Let tears run down like a river day and night. The expression, precisely as it is here, is found no where else. For similar expressions, see iii. 48; Jer. ix. 17; xiii. 17; xiv. 17.—Give thyself no rest; let not the apple of thine eye cease [or leave off; i. e., shedding tears (NOYES)]. The daughter of thine eye. This expression is found elsewhere only in Ps. xvii. 8. בַּת, daughter, is here apparently an abbreviation of בַּתַּי, entrance, door, gate, Zech. ii. 12. The pupil is the door, the opening of the eye, because in it lies the power of sight. See FUERST Lex., GESEN. Theol., p. 841. DELITZSCH on Ps. xvii. 8. [ASSEM. ANN.: "That which we call the ball, or apple of the eye, from the spherical figure of it, that the Hebrews call the daughter of the eye, either as the dearest and tenderest part of it, Deut. xxxii. 10; Prov. vii. 2, or from the figures that seem to appear in it, whence also it is termed by the Greeks the damsel, by the Latins the babe of the eye." See Deut. xxxii. 10; Prov. vii. 2, and ALEXANDER on Ps. xvii. 8. BLAYNEY understands the tear as so called "with great propriety and elegance;" but this is supported by no evidence, and is rendered improbable by analogous terms applied to the pupil of the eye, by Hebrews, Greeks and Romans, as indicated above.—W. H. H.] VER. 19. Arise, Rise up.—[GERLACH: "Up." OWEN: "The meaning as stated by GATAKER, is, Rise from thy bed; for she is exhorted to cry in the night. The Hebrew word is familiar and precious to us as the same our Saviour uttered, Mark v. 41. "Talitha cumi," κομῆ, ἰσῆ, —W. H. H.].—Cry out in the night, in, or at the beginning of the watches. The Hebrews divided the night into three watches ["the first, commencing at sunset and extending to what corresponded to our ten o'clock; the second, from ten till two in the morning; and the third from that time till sun rise" (HENDERSON)]:

the middle one was called ראש־חֲסֵרֵי הַלַּיְלָה, the middle watch, Judges vii. 19; the last אֲשַׁכְרֵת הַבֶּקֶר, morning watch, Ex. xiv. 24; 1 Sam. xi.

11. Since in Judges vii. 19 the beginning of the middle watch is called ראש־אֵ הַרְתָּ [lit., head of middle watch], so ראש־חֲסֵרֵי הַלַּיְלָה [lit., head of night watches], the beginning of the night watches generally, would be the time of the first watch. See WINER, R. W. B., s. v., Nachtwachen. [The opinion that this was the name of the first watch, seems to rest entirely on its use here. Yet there is much reason to doubt if it has here that sense. To rise in the first watch of the night, which began before ordinary bed-time, is not very suggestive of sleepless grief and anxiety. The passage in Judges favors GERLACH's conjecture, that the expression denotes the beginning of each successive watch in the night. He refers to the similar use of ראש, head, beginning, in this same verse, and quotes the remark of MICHAELIS, that ראש־חֲסֵרֵי הַלַּיְלָה means, not the first of all the openings, but the beginning or head of every one of them. So ראש־חֲסֵרֵי הַלַּיְלָה means not the first of the night watches, but the beginning of each successively. At every watch, or as often as you hear the watchman announce the hour, cry out to God in prayer.—W. H. H.] The preposition used here in Hebrew, לְ, means towards or about that time (see Gen. iii. 8; viii. 11). The sense is, About the time, when formerly every one resigned himself to his first sleep, the one here addressed should rise up to painful mourning.—Pour out thine heart like water. This seems to denote, first of all, the melting, dissolving of the heart by grief (see Ps. xxii. 15; lviii. 8; comp. 1 Sam. vii. 6), and then, the open unreserved outpouring of the heart (see Ps. lxxii. 9; xlii. 5; cii. 1).—Before the face of the Lord [Jehovah, see Textual note above].—Lift up thy hands toward him. Lift up to him thy hands. See Ps. lxxiii. 5; cxix. 48. [CALVIN: "The elevation of the hands, in this place and others, means the same thing as prayer; and it has been usual in all ages to raise up the hands to Heaven, and the expression often occurs in the Psalms (xxviii. 2; cxxxiv. 2); and when Paul bids prayers to be made every where, he says, 'I would have men to raise up pure hands without contention' (1 Tim. ii. 8)."]—For the life of thy young children, lit., for the souls of, etc. As is seen by the words following (that have fainted, etc.), the object of holding up the hands is, not to save the children (ROSENMUELLER), but to mourn over their loss. See at vers. 11, 12. Besides, the children are designated, also, as in the verses just named, not as the only, but as a principal object of lamentation. See vers. 20-22. [GERLACH: "To raise the hands is, according to the fixed use of words, the same thing as to pray, iii. 41; Ps. xxviii. 2; lxxiii. 5; cxxxiv. 2 (see 1 Tim. ii. 8), and therefore cannot be understood, with THENIUS, as a gesture of the deepest distress. If he would confirm this opinion by the fact, that according to the whole train of thought their fate is already determined and can only be mourned over, and therefore an exhortation to pray for the life of the languishing ones would no longer be in place; then we answer, that in that case no prayer in behalf of the city would any longer be proper, for its fate was fulfilled; yet it would be proper for those who are found surviving in great want, as in fact a prayer immediately follows on the thought of this calamity in i. 11, 20: See, Jehovah, how I am distressed. And, further,

עַל-נַפְשִׁי [for the soul] does not indicate the already ended life (THENIUS, DE WETTE), for which נַפְשִׁי (the life principle) would be a singular expression; and, further still, it would be inconsistent with the descriptions given in ver. 11 and iv. 4, 5, where not the death of those who have fainted, but the distress of those still living, rends the hearts of their mothers." GERLACH's opinion is confirmed by the words to Him, אֱלֹהֵי, lift up thy hands to him, i. e., to God in prayer.—W. H. H.]—That faint for hunger in the top [lit., at the head] of every street—Who have fainted for hunger at the opening of every street. See iv. 1; Is. li. 20; Nah. iii. 10. That the wall, in the poet's conception, strictly and only represents Zion, is plainly evident from this, that the Israelitish children are designated as the children of the wall. This could be done with the more propriety from the fact that the wall had a certain motherly character. Did it not embrace the people with its arms? Did it not truly, in a certain mother-like manner, bear them on its bosom? [WORDSWORTH: "The wall, which girdled Jerusalem, is regarded as a mother, which nurses the inhabitants, her offspring, in her bosom; and she laments for the children which lie at the end of the streets, extending from one side of the city to the other."]

II. 20-22.

- 20 Behold, O LORD, and consider to whom thou hast done this. Shall the women eat their fruit and children of a span long? shall the priest and the prophet be slain in the sanctuary of the Lord? The young and the old lie on the ground in the streets: my virgins and my young men are fallen by the sword: thou hast slain them in the day of thy anger; thou hast killed and not pitied. Thou hast called, as in a solemn day, my terrors round about; so that in the day of the LORD's anger none escaped nor remained: those that I have swaddled and brought up hath mine enemy consumed.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 20.—לֹלֵל. See i. 12; iii. 25.—[אם. HENDERSON: "אם is twice used in this verse with the force of a demonstrative interjection." He translates, Behold! women eat their fruit, infants of a span long; Behold! priest and prophet are slain, etc. This is manifestly wrong. In the very few instances in which אם has the force of an interjection, it retains a conditional sense, and never introduces an unqualified affirmation, or statement of an unquestioned matter of fact (see Hos. xii. 12; Job xvii. 13, 16; Prov. iii. 34; Jer. xxxi. 20). Besides, the future form of the verbs requires here a conditional or potential sense.—W. II. II.]—הָרַגְנִי. See ii. 4. [HENDERSON: "The nominative to הָרַגְנִי is כֹּהֵן and נָבִיא taken singly." The German enables NAEGELSBACH to preserve the Hebrew construction, Soll erwürgt werden Priester und Prophet!—W. II. II.]—נִקְרָאתִי. See ii. 7.

Ver. 21.—שָׂכַבְנִי. Jeremiah uses שָׂכַב only once, נִשְׁכַּחָה iii. 25; but we find K'ri (decidedly arbitrary) in iii. 2, שָׂכַבְתָּ.—לֹאֲרִין. See vers. 2, 10, 11.—הַזְנוֹתֶיךָ. Acc. loc. See my Gr., §70, a, β. ["The accusative is used after verbs of rest, in answer to the question where?" NAEGELS. Gr.]—נִיָּר וְזָקֵן. See Jer. ii. 22.—טַבַּחְתָּהּ. See Jer. xi. 19; xxv. 34; li. 40. The expression seems to involve an antithesis to טַבַּחְתִּים, ver. 20.

Ver. 22.—הַקָּרָה. The imperfect, when compared with the preceding and following perfects, seems to be due entirely to the necessities of the acoustic. [Perhaps, the future here, as in ver. 20, has a conditional or potential sense. So OREX, who connects it with the words, See, O Jehovah, and consider. In this case the י following would have the sense of for; or as in E. V.; so that. Shouldst Thou call together, as on a festival, all my terrors from round about! For there was not, etc. BLAXNEY, in his emendation of the text, overlooks the necessity of a ת initial.—כִּי־יִסַּח כִּי־יִסַּח. See ver. 6.—W. II. II.]—רַב־יָתִירָה. Piel not in Jeremiah, nor does he use the verb in this sense. See Ezek. xix. 2.—פָּלַם. See Jer. v. 3; ix. 15; xiv. 12; xlix. 37, etc. [BLAXNEY (followed by BOOTHROYD) takes this word for כָּל with suffix, and translates: Those whom I had fostered and made to grow were all of them my enemies. The pointing, פָּלַם not כָּלַם, the Versions, and the sense, are all against this.—W. II. II.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The opinion of CHR. B. MICHAELIS (which ROSENUELLER seems to adopt), that the following prayer is set forth by the prophet himself, as a form of prayer (instar formularis), in behalf of the daughter of Zion, who is exhorted to pray in vers. 18, 19, hardly needs refutation. That the wall of Zion, i. e., Zion herself, utters the prayer in vers. 20-22, is evident, both from the exhortation to prayer in vers. 18, 19, and from the substantial agreement of vers. 20-22 with what vers. 18, 19 had indicated as the subject matter of this prayer of lamentation.

Ver. 20. Behold, O LORD, and consider—See, O Jehovah, and look. This exact formula occurs i. 11. The prayer in i. 20-22 (comp. i. 9) also begins with See, Jehovah.—To whom thou hast done this. [As the pronoun is interrogative, that form should be preserved: to whom hast Thou done thus? The question thus interposed between the appeal to God to look, and the description of what He will see if He look, is very forcible and does not mar the sense as the ordinary construction does, but makes it more apparent.—W. II. II.] The Lord had done this, not to a heathen nation, but to the people of His own choice, to whom all the promises of His blessing were given (comp. Gen. xii. 2, 3; xv. 5; xviii. 18; xx. 17, 18; xxvi. 3, 4; xxviii. 14, etc.).—Shall the women eat their fruit and children of a span long?—Should women eat their fruit, the children whom they nursed? This is a single indirect question, although it is contained in two members. אם, if [literally translated, the question is, if—shall eat women their fruit, etc.] is dependent on יִסַּח, see [see if this is so, or should be so]. The sense of the question, moreover, is not, whether it had ever been heard of that mothers had been driven by hunger to eat their own offspring? (ROSENMUELLER), for then the perfect tense ought to have been used. But what is asked is, whether that thing, speaking in a general way, may be supposable, possible, or right; and to express this the imperfect must be used. The explanation of THENIUS, "Had they then been obliged to eat, etc., i. e., Had Thy judgments gone so far, that, etc.," is not sufficiently grammatical. What is asked is, whether this thing, generally speaking, would be allowed to happen? The answer to this question would involve another, whether it had been suffered to happen at that time? But the latter question is not directly contained in the words used.—The crime here mentioned is clearly designated as a punishment to the rebellious people; Deut. xxviii. 53; Jer. xix. 9. See 2 Kings vi. 28, 29; Lam. iv. 10.—Shall the priest and the prophet be slain in the sanctuary of the Lord—Should priest and prophet be slain, etc. [ASSEM. ANN.: "Should God endure to see His own house polluted with the blood of His own priests and such as bore the name at least of His prophets."]

פְּרִים, their fruit. The masculine suffix has induced most interpreters unnecessarily to change the reading. [As the Sept. has καρπὸν κοιλίας ἀνδρῶν, and Chal. and Arab. similar readings, it has been conjectured that the original text was פְּרִי בָטֶן, of which the ב changed into ד is all that remains in the present text. BLAYNEY suggests פְּרִי רֵחַם. OWEN has an original device of his own to meet this presumed difficulty. He says, "Fruit, in the sense of offspring, is applied to men as well as to women. We may take the final mem in רֵחַם as a pronoun, their wives; the same are meant as in verse 18, their voice [heart?], i. e., the citizens of Jerusalem. Thus the construction will be quite grammatical. Should their own wives eat their offspring." That would mean their wives ate, not their own, but their husbands' children. This would furnish preachers with a text against polygamy, or the cruelty of step-mothers! HENDERSON is satisfied with a magisterial appeal to euphony: "The masculine suffix is adopted instead of the feminine, to agree in form with רֵחַם preceding."—W. H. H.] It is not even necessary, with CUR. B. MICHAELIS, to keep in mind mothers and fathers. The masculine, as the more comprehensive and higher sex, includes the feminine too. See my Gr. § 60, 5; Jer. ix. 19; xlv. 19, 25; Gen. xxxi. 9; Ex. i. 21, etc.—טָפְחוֹם occurs only here. It is the abstract of the verb טָפַח, which is found only in ver. 22 below. The latter (different from טָפַח, Is. xlviii. 13) is a denominative from טָפַח, palma, the hand-breadth, palm of the hand, and seemingly signifies palms gestare (the Latins say ulnis gestare). KIMCHI, VITRINGA, KALKAR would understand the expression of the smoothing of the limbs, as of the swaddling clothes and bands, with the palm of the hand. [With E. V., children of a span long, agree VULO.: parvulos ad mensuram palme; LUTHER: die jüngsten Kindlein einer Spanne lang; BROUGHTON: infants that may be spanned, and HENDERSON: infants of a span long. The idea of children carried in the hands is adopted by BLAYNEY: children of palms, i. e., "little ones dandled on the hands;" ROSENMUELLER: infantes quos suis manibus tractant; GERLACH: die Kinder, die man auf Händen trägt; and NOYES: children borne in the arms. The marginal reading in E. V., children swaddled with their hands, is thus explained in ASSEM. ANN.: "Because the verb means to mete or to stretch out aught with the hand, as Is. xlviii. 13. Hence both the Chaldee Paraphrast and the Rabbins here expound it the children of swaddlings; the children whose limbs the mothers were wont to stretch out and stroke, as if they were meting or measuring them with their hands, to fashion them and make them grow straight and proportionable; and to the same purpose also to make them up with swathing bands; for this word ariseth from a root frequent in the Talmudists, for a wrapper of linen, wherewith to wrap up aught; as also, for a veil, or apron, or the like, in Scripture, Ruth iii. 15; Is. iii. 22; and this interpretation receiveth further strength from what followeth here, ver. 22." CALVIN translates parvulos educationis, which OWEN translates, infants while nursed, the children of nursings, or nurturings (educationum). BOOTHROXD: their little nurslings. The Sept.: those sucking the breasts. After examining these various translations and interpretations, it is obvious that NÆGELSBACH has expressed the true meaning of the word, whatever is its fundamental primitive idea,—the children whom they nursed,—taking the last word in its most comprehensive sense.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 21. The young and the old lie on the ground in the streets—Boy and old man lie on the ground in the streets. [So GERLACH. BLAYNEY, NOYES: The boy and the old man. HENDERSON: Boys and old men.—The verb is preterite, and ought to be so translated. He is describing what was then past. The boy and the old man lay on the ground. BLAYNEY: have lien.—W. H. H.]—My virgins and my young men. See i. 4, 18; ii. 10; v. 11.—Are—have—fallen by the sword. See Jer. xix. 7; xx. 4; xxxix. 18. [BLAYNEY imagines the metre needs improving, and translates, My virgins and my young men are fallen; with the sword hast thou slain them, in utter disregard of the accents, besides the necessity of supplying a pronoun not expressed.—W. H. H.]—Thou hast slain them in the day of thine anger; thou hast killed and not pitied—Thou hast killed in the day of thy anger (see ver. 2); hast slain and not pitied (ver. 2). [The asyndetical construction, as in ver. 16, is vehement and forcible. Thou hast killed, hast slain, hast not pitied. To supply the conjunction and or personal pronoun them weakens the sentence.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 22. Thou hast called—Thou callest together—as in a solemn day—as on a feast-day. See ver. 6.—My terrors round about [lit., from round about, from every direction, so that they were surrounded by them. So BROUGHTON. CALVIN: "Here he uses a most appropriate metaphor, to show that the people had been brought to the narrowest straits; for he says that terrors had on every side surrounded them, as when a solemn assembly is called. They sounded the trumpets when a festival was at hand, that all might come up to the Temple. As, then, many companies were wont to come to Jerusalem on feast-days—for when the trumpets were sounded all were called—so the Prophet says that terrors had been sent from every part to straiten the miserable people." OWEN: "My terrors mean my terrifiers, according to the Vulg., the abstract for the concrete."—W. H. H.]—So that in the day of the LORD'S anger none escaped or remained—And there was not on the day of Jehovah's wrath an escaped one or a survivor. [The two words rendered escaped and remained seem to express the same idea; namely, to escape. As there were multitudes who survived the slaughter and still remained on earth, we cannot translate the second word by either of these terms, unless we regard them as merely hyperbolic. Probably the meaning is that none entirely escaped the effects of God's wrath, and we may translate thus, there was not one that escaped or was exempt. This is consistent with the meaning of the verb from which the noun is derived (שָׁרַד, elabi, to escape, to get clear, i. e., of condemnation or punishment), and is confirmed apparently by Jer. xlii. 17. "they shall die by the sword, by the famine, and by the pestilence: and none of them shall remain or escape," i. e., shall escape or be wholly exempt (comp. Jer. xlv. 14).—"from the evil that I will bring upon them." We may understand the phrase in our text as elliptical for the fuller expression as we find it in Jer. xlv. 14, remain or escape from the evils, שָׁרַד וְנִלְמַד כִּפְנֵי הָרָעָה. We may translate the sentence impersonally, there was not that escaped or was exempt. The wrath of the Lord descended on all things and all persons. The city and Zion, the walls and the gates, the sanctuary, palaces and houses, and all the inhabitants, without regard to age, sex or condition, were involved in a common ruin.—W. H. H.]—Those that I have swaddled.—Those I have carried or nursed, see ver. 20—and brought up, hath mine enemy consumed—my enemy destroyed them. It is evident that the prayer is a prayer of lamentation, and with respect to its object responds to the exhortation contained in ver. 19 by giving the first place to the principal subject of that verse, without restricting itself to that subject, which is, besides, rather intimated than expressed.

סְכָלִים, terrors, every where else means skelter, place of accommodation, dwelling, commoratio, peregrinatio (Gen. xvii. 8; xxviii. 4; xxxvi. 7; xxxvii. 1; Ex. vi. 4, etc.), granary (Sing. סְכָלָה, Ps. lv. 16). None of these meanings suits here. It is better therefore to derive it from סָכַר, terrifying, which occurs frequently in Jeremiah, vi. 25; xx. 3, 4, 10; xlv. 5; xlix. 29. [GERLACH: "This word is certainly a designation of the enemy (Vulg.: qui terrent me), but is not to be restricted to them, see i. 20, since the formula so frequent in Jeremiah (vi. 25; xx. 4, 10; xlv. 5; xlix. 29) is a general expression for a position threatened on all sides with dangers and the terror prevailing therein."—EWALD, according to GERLACH, takes the word in its more common signification and insists that it relates to the same persons named in the second and last clauses of the verse. "The word denotes my villagers round about, and the inhabitants of the defenceless country towns and villages are intended, who were related to the chief protecting city as farmers, סְכָלִים (Sept. παροικίαι). Thus the whole verse plainly alludes to a great event in the days of the siege. All the inhabitants of the country rushed into the principal city (as happened similarly under Titus) as if a great feast as of old were to be held in this city,—but alas! it would be in the end for them, at the final capture, the great festivity of murder." This makes excellent sense of the whole verse, and is recommended by preserving the same subject throughout the three clauses of the verse,—which cannot be said of BLAYNEY'S translation, Thou hast convoked, as on a set day, such as were strangers to me round about, which gives us a new theme in each clause. But, as GERLACH remarks, the analogy of i. 15, the fact that the authority of the Sept. is weakened by its evident mistranslation of the formula in the prophetic book—fear on every side, and the difficulty of supposing that the flight of the country people to the city could be designated as a summons from the Lord, should confirm us in the usual translation of this passage.—W. H. H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Ver. 1. "Olim erat regnum Israelitarum in sublimi, jam sub limo." FÖRSTER.

2. Ver. 1. "When Jeremiah says throughout, the Lord has done it, disregarding what Babel did, he would teach us, when injury is inflicted upon us by the world and men, that we should regard, not the instruments, who could not injure the least hair of our heads, but God, who does and ordains it (Lam. iii. 37; Am. iii. 6; Is. xlv. 7; Sir. xi. 14), that He (1) is impelled to it by our sins, and (2) that He prepares His punishments in Heaven, before they are inflicted on transgressors. This serves to make us patient. Example: Job says not, The Devil, the Chaldeans, the Arabians, did this, but God has done it." CRAMER, according to EG. HENNING, Ser. I., ch. 2, p. 45.—[Ver. 1, etc. How hath Jehovah, etc. "The grief is not so much that such and such things are done, as that God has done them; this, this is their wormwood and gall." "To those who know how to value God's favor, nothing appears more dreadful than His anger; corrections in love are easily borne, but rebukes in wrath wound deep." MATT. HENRY.]

3. Ver. 1. "Bellarmine is not wise in attempting to establish the worship of images from this text, and especially from Ps. xcix. 5 (Lib. II., de cultu imaginum, cap. 12). For the Psalmist would not have the pious worship the temple of the Lord, or the ark of the covenant, or mercy-seat. . . . Therefore, in Hebrew it is not said, Worship His footstool, but Worship at [er toward] His footstool. AUGUSTINE understands this as said with reference to the human nature of Christ, in which the Logos is adorned with Divine worship (λατρεία). But this interpretation rather strengthens than weakens the argument of the Jesuit." FÖRSTER.

4. Ver. 1. "If men themselves are not worthy,

He rejects all their ceremonies. He inquires nothing about stone houses with their splendor, nothing about the external form of the church, but He will prepare for Himself the souls of individuals in the fire for all eternity." DIEDRICH.

5. Ver. 2. "The Abbot RUPERT, in his commentary on the books of Kings (B. V., ch. 14) understands the fall of Jezebel out of the window (2 Kings ix. 33),—as well as the passage before us, which is expressed in the Vulgate thus, "the Lord hath cast down headlong . . . all that was beautiful in Jacob,"—as a prophecy of the vengeance which Israel has incurred, for the shedding of the blood of Christ; and he then says, 'That fall has been heard of throughout the whole world. Lo! that synagogue which slew Christ, where is it? Truly, whatever seems to remain may be compared to what the dogs left of Jezebel's body.'" GHISLER, p. 70.

6. Ver. 2. "PASCHASIUS RADBERTUS observes on this passage, that kingdom, king, priest, Temple, stronghold, etc., may be nothing else than 'as it were, some great prophet or prophecy' contained in earthen vessels. 'But now that Christ has come, since the various predictions concerning Him, which were contained in those vessels, have been fulfilled, they have all been cast down and broken, destroyed and scattered, polluted and profaned, that all the mystical and unutterable secrets which were concealed in them should be made apparent to the whole world, being revealed more clearly than light.'" GHISLER.

7. Ver. 2. He hath polluted, etc. "This is, truly, the result of the profanation of the Divine name and majesty, which was at times extremely common even among the chief men; and this result is in accordance with the rule of divine justice in Wisdom xi. 17—Wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished." FÖRSTER. "The secret of their strength was taken away from the people in the persons of their princes, as Samson lost his strength when he had violated his vow." DIEDRICH.—[Ver. 2. PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou settest before us at this day those ancient examples by which we perceive with what heavy punishments Thou didst chastise those whom Thou hadst adopted,—O grant, that we may learn to regard Thee, and carefully to examine our whole life, and duly consider how indulgently Thou hast preserved us to this day, so that we may ever patiently bear Thy chastisements, and with a humble and sincere heart flee to Thy mercy, until Thou be pleased to raise up Thy Church from that miserable state in which it now lies, and so to restore it, that Thy name may, through Thine only-begotten Son, be glorified throughout the whole world. Amen." CALVIN.]

8. Ver. 3. "This consideration can and ought to check pride and arrogance, and prevent us from fiercely erecting our horns, being mindful of that notorious saying:

Cornua qui faciunt, ne cornua ferre recusent.

And from Zeel. i. 18-21 we learn, that the Lord can easily raise up smiths to break the horns of those who are fierce and insolent." FÖRSTER.

9. Ver. 5. "God has made Christ a horn of salvation to His church, that it should receive from His fulness grace, blessing, strength and power. Whoever will not make use of Christ for this purpose, his carnal ability will soon go to wreck and ruin. Luke i. 69." STARKE.

10. Ver. 5. "When Judea denied the mystery of our Lord's incarnation, which the Gentiles believed, the princes of Judea fell into contempt, and these Gentiles, who had been oppressed while guilty of unbelief, were elevated into the liberty of the true faith. But Jeremiah, foreseeing long before it happened this fall of the Israelites, says, The Lord has become as if He were an enemy, He has overthrown Israel, He has overthrown all his walls, He has overthrown His defences." GREG. PAPA, Lib. XI., Moral. Cap. 10, quoted by GHISLER, p. 76.

11. Ver. 5. וְהָיָה כְּהָיָה. "The VULGATE version has, humiliatam et humiliationem [one humbled and humiliation]. AVENARIUS interprets invecutum et invectionem [attack and assault by sea] and explains it as relating to naval conflicts and the various methods of assaulting an enemy: since both words are from anah, which properly signifies to be carried in ships." FÖRSTER. [NOTE.—FÖRSTER either misquoted the Vulgate, or intended only to give the sense, in his understanding of it. The Vulgate is humiliatum et humiliatam; which the Douay translates "and hath multiplied in the daughter of Judea the afflicted, both men and women." The VULG. is a translation of the SEPT.: καὶ ἐπλήθυνεν τῇ θυγατρὶ Ἰουδα ταπεινοῦμενον καὶ ταπεινωμένον.—W. H. H.]

12. Ver. 4, 5. "Here a distinction between the evil of crime and the evil of punishment is to be observed. God is not the efficient cause of the evil of crime. The opinion of PETER MARTYR, in his Commentary on the first chapter of Romans, is, therefore, impious and horrible,—'I cannot deny that God is in every way the cause of sin.' God is, however, the chief cause of the evil of punishment, being a just Judge and the avenger of crimes. In this sense the inimical acts of the Babylonians are here attributed directly to Him." FÖRSTER.

13. Ver. 6, 7. "The Lord, who never suffers Himself to be forgotten 'causes our solemn feasts and the Sabbaths of our rest to be forgotten,' not because the rites of our religion do not please Him, but because the former tabernacle of God or the temple of the Holy Ghost in us is profaned, and there is now no place in which those rites may be so offered as to please God." PASCHAS. RADBERTUS by GHISLER, p. 79.

14. Ver. 6, 7. "The Romanists, therefore, err when they pretend that Rome is the fixed and immovable seat of the church. For although the Catholic and universal church cannot cease to exist (Matt. xvi. 18), yet that particular churches have perished and can perish, experience testifies, yea Rome herself testifies by an example in her own history. . . . What is here related of the temple at Jerusalem, that it should assuredly be demolished and overthrown, has happened to temples of Christ at the hands of the Turks. It is a fact also especially memorable, that on the 29th day of May, in the year 1453, the Turks having assembled and taken Constantinople, the temple of Sophia, esteemed so sacred, was turned into a horse-stable. And this is what was long ago written in Ps. lxxviii. 59-64, and also Ps. lxxx. 13, 14." FÖRSTER.—[Ver. 7. "Had he only spoken of the city, of the lands, of the palaces, of the vineyards, and, in short, of all their possessions, it would have been a much lighter matter; but when he says that God had counted as nothing all their sacred things,—the altar, the Temple, the ark of the covenant, and festive days,—when, therefore, he says, that God had not only disregarded, but had also cast away from Him these things, which yet especially availed to conciliate His favor, the people must have hence perceived, except they were beyond measure stupid, how grievously they had provoked God's wrath against themselves; for this was the same as though heaven and earth were blended together. Had there been an upsetting of all things, had the sun left its place and sunk into darkness, had the earth heaved upwards, the confusion would have hardly been more dreadful, than when God put forth thus His hand against the sanctuary, the altar, the festal days, and all their sacred things. But we must refer to the reason why this was done, even because the Temple had been long polluted by the iniquities of the people, and because all sacred things had been wickedly and disgracefully profaned. We now, then, understand why the Prophet enlarged so much on a subject in itself sufficiently plain." CALVIN.]

15. Ver. 7. "Wherewith one sins, therewith is he punished (Wis. xi. 17). But because the most heinous sins had been perpetrated at the altar and Divine worship, so now at the altar the severe chastisement is inflicted, that they must be deprived of it." CRAMER.—[Ver. 7. They have made a noise in the house of Jehovah—"Why did He grant so much license to these profane enemies? even because the Jews themselves had previously polluted the Temple, so that He abhorred all their solemn assemblies, as also He declares by Isaiah, that He detested their festivals, Sabbaths and new moons (i. 13, 14). But it was a shocking change, when enemies entered the place which God had consecrated for Himself, and there insolently boasted, and uttered base and wicked calumnies against God! But the sadder the spectacle, the more detestable appeared the impiety of the people, which had been the cause of so great evils. * * * That the Chaldeans polluted the Temple, that they trod under foot all sacred things, all this the Prophet shows was to be ascribed to the Jews themselves, who had, through their own conduct, opened the Temple to the Chaldeans and exposed all sacred things to their will and pleasure." CALVIN.]

16. Ver. 9. "God is careful to punish contempt of His word by taking away that word. The curse which they chose, that is come to them; the blessing they did not choose, that is far from them, Ps. cix. 17." CRAMER.

17. Vers. 1-10. "Although God, properly speaking, allows Himself to repent of nothing, and His gifts and callings admit of no change (Rom. xi. 20), yet it is evident from this passage, that He is bound to no particular people, especially if that people prove to be godless and unthankful towards Him. He had chosen the people of Israel for His own peculiar people, Jerusalem for His dwelling, where He had, as it were His fire and His hearth (Is. xxxi. 9), and had lifted it up to Heaven; but when it became ungrateful and disobedient, He considered not all this, but cast down to the earth all the glory of Israel, laid waste His own tabernacle, destroyed His dwelling, overthrew His altar. For God is not only merciful and kind, but also an angry and just Judge, who will not let iniquity go unpunished, and makes His chastisements the more severe in proportion to the kindness He has shown to a people, when they are ungrateful and godless. This should be a solemn warning to us." Würtemb. Summ. ["Even those doctrines, ordinances and regulations, which are most exactly scriptural, when scrupulously retained by men destitute of the Spirit of God, are but a lifeless carcass of religion: and when made a cloak for iniquity, God abhors them. So that, in the day of His wrath for national wickedness, He will despise temples and palaces, kings and priests, establishments and forms of every kind." SCOTT.]

18. Ver. 10. They have cast up dust upon their heads, etc. Luctus pro luxu, FÖRSTER.

19. Ver. 11. "Effusion of the liver is carnal mortification." BONAVENTURA, quoted by GUSLEL, p. 91.

20. Ver. 13. "When God punishes His people on account of their sins, He punishes them more severely than He does other peoples. It may be said of Him, The dearer the child, the harder the rod." OSANDRI BIBLE IN STÄCKE. ["When we wish to alleviate grief, we are wont to bring examples which have some likeness to the case before us. For when any one seeks to comfort one in illness, he will say, 'Thou art not the first nor the last, thou hast many like thee; why shouldst thou so much torment thyself; for this is a condition almost common to mortals.' * * * The Prophet, then, means that comforts commonly administered to those in misery, would be of no benefit, because the calamity of Jerusalem exceeded all other examples; as though he had said, 'No such thing has ever happened in the world; God had never before thundered so tremendously against any people.' * * * Great as the sea is thy breach; that is, 'Thy calamity is the deepest abyss. I cannot then find any in the whole world whom I can compare to thee, for thy calamity exceeds all calamities; nor is there anything like it that can be set before thee, so that thou art become a memorable example for all ages.' But when we hear the Prophet speaking thus, we ought to remember that we have succeeded in the place of the ancient people. As then, God had formerly punished with so much severity the sins of His chosen people, we ought to beware lest we in the present day provoke Him to an extremity by our perverseness, for He remains ever like Himself." CALVIN.]

21. Ver. 14. "Preachers, so soothing, are smooth-preachers and dumb dogs, who bring great and irreparable injury to a whole country, for the sun shall go down over such prophets and the day shall be dark over them (Mic. iii. 6). And although they may receive for a long time good-will and favor, money and encouragement from men, yet they lose, together with their hearers who delight in such accommodating ministers, all favor from the living God; Gal. i.

10; James iv. 4." CRAMER according to EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 3, ch. 2, p. 64. ["They had wilfully drunk sweet poison." CALVIN.—PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that though Thou chastisest us as we deserve, we may yet never have the light of truth extinguished among us, but may ever see, even in darkness, at least some sparks, which may enable us to behold Thy paternal goodness and mercy, so that we may be especially humbled under Thy mighty hand, and that being really prostrate through a deep feeling of repentance, we may raise our hopes to Heaven, and never doubt that Thou wilt at length be reconciled to us when we seek Thee in Thine only-begotten Son. Amen." CALVIN.]

22. Vers. 15, 16. "He who suffers an injury, need not mind mockery. It is the Devil's special delight to make a mock of the church and of all the pious, so that the godless are known by their great Ahs and Ohs (Wis. v. 3)! Let not, however, ridicule cause us to waver, but let us remain firm and faithful to God. For blessed are ye when men, for My sake, revile and persecute you and say all manner of evil against you (Matt. v. 11). For God can easily and speedily take away again such reproach and put to silence the triumphing of the wicked, and apply to them the song—Mine eyes will see that they shall be trodden down as the mire of the streets (Mic. vii. 10)." CRAMER quoted by EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 4, ch. 2, p. 73).

23. Vers. 14–16. "This is, in truth, the root of the calamity, that the prophets in the service of the people had preached in accordance with carnal pleasures; they had not disclosed but concealed the misdeeds of the people, and thus had preached the people out of their country, and into captivity. How then was this? Had they invented new precepts? made another catechism? No, nothing at all of this sort! But it sufficed for the purpose of destruction, that they mistook the Gospel, and exercised no control over the people in conformity therewith, but instead of that practised a false policy. Now the enemies of Jerusalem and of God's people mock and imagine that all the glorious promises of the Word of God of a kingdom of grace among men have come to naught. They imagine that they have now made it evident by their power, that the mystery of God's grace and election is naught. Poor fools! They know not that God is in all this; they know nothing of that God, who suffers with us and for us, and leads us through suffering to glory." DIEDRICH.

24. Ver. 17. "When we experience God's judgment and chastisements on account of our sins, we ought always to look back (1) on our sins, (2) on God's frequent warnings of punishment, (3) on His unchangeable faithfulness, and (4) on His great power and His right hand which can change all things, Ps. lxxvii. 11; Dan. ix. 8; Ps. li. 5." CRAMER, quoted by EG. HUNNIUS, Ser. 4, Ch. II., pp. 74 ff.—[Ver. 17. He hath fulfilled His word that He had commanded in the days of old.—"Had the Prophet touched only on the secret counsel of God, the Jews might have been in doubt as to what it was. And certainly as our minds cannot penetrate into that deep abyss, in vain would he have spoken of the hidden judgments of God. It was, therefore, necessary to come down to the doctrine, by which God, as far as it is expedient, manifests to us what would otherwise be not only hidden, but also incomprehensible; for were we to inquire into God's judgments, we would sink into the deep. But when we direct our minds to what God has taught us, we find that He reveals to us whatever is necessary to be known; and though even by His word, we cannot perfectly know His hidden judgments, yet we may know them in part, and as I have said, as far as it is expedient for us. . . . Let us then hold to this rule, even to seek from the Law and the Prophets, and the Gospel, whatever we desire to know concerning the secret judgments of God; for were we to turn aside, even in the smallest degree, from what is taught us, the immensity of God's glory would immediately swallow up all our thoughts; and experience sufficiently teaches us, that nothing is more dangerous and even fatal than to allow ourselves more liberty in this respect than what behooves us. Let us then learn to bridle all curiosity when we speak of God's secret judgments, and instantly to direct our minds to the word itself, that they may be in a manner inclosed therein." CALVIN.]

25. Ver. 18. "In this exhortation, the requisites of true and ardent prayer are shown. (1) The first of these is the cry of the heart to God, by which devoutness, or the earnest and ardent desire of the heart is denoted. For, as CYPRIAN says, in his 12th Sermon on the Lord's Prayer, God hears not the voice, but the heart. And it is commonly said, When the heart does not pray, then the tongue labors in vain. (2) Tears, i. e., by metonymy, true penitence, of which tears are signs, as appears in the case of the sinful woman (Luke vii. 38), and of Peter (Luke xxii. 62). And well-known is that saying of the orthodox Father, The tears of sinners are angels' bread and angels' wine." FÖRSTER.

26. Vers. 18–22. "Here we have a lesson,—when, to whom, and how, we ought to pray. We should pray always and not faint, as Christ teaches us by a parable (Luke xviii.), but especially when there is a great and immediate necessity, as Jeremiah did here, and David, The anguish of my heart is great, O bring me, Lord, out of my distresses (Ps. xxv. 17). To this Lord the prophet Jeremiah here points the people. God Himself calls us to come to Him only, and says, Call upon Me in the day of trouble, I will deliver thee and thou shalt glorify Me (Ps. l. 15). Not alone should your mouth pray, but, says Jeremiah, let your heart cry to God. For the Lord is near to those who call upon Him, to those who call upon Him with earnestness (Ps. cxlv. 18). We should present before Him circumstantially our necessity and solitudes, with tears and sighs, as Jeremiah here directs. For although God well knows beforehand what distresses us and what we need, before we tell Him (Matt. vi. 8), yet the recital of our pressing necessity serves to make us more earnest in prayer; for God will have those who pray, such as those who worship Him in spirit and in truth (John iv. 23)." Würt. Summarien.

27. Ver. 19. Arise, cry out in the night.—"The prayer of night—how readily it rises to God the only Judge, and to the Holy Angel who undertakes to present it before the Heavenly altar! How grateful and bright, colored with the blush of humility! How serene and placid, disturbed by no clamor or bustle! And last of all, how pure and sincere, sprinkled with no dust of earthly care, incited by no praise or flattery of beholders!" BERNARD, Serm. 86 on the Canticles, in GHISLER, p. 108.

28. Ver. 20. Behold, O Jehovah, and consider.—"It is most proper, when any one is overwhelmed with affliction, that he keep it not entirely to himself, but disclose it to such persons as may come to his relief in the way either of help or of comfort. But to no one can we better and more advantageously lament our distresses and sollicitudes, than to our dear God, for He is our confidence, a strong tower from our enemies (Ps. lxi. 4)." CRAMER quoted by EG. HUNNIVUS, Ser. 4, ch. 2, p. 78.—[PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thy Church at this day is oppressed with many evils, we may learn to raise up not only our eyes and our hands to Thee, but also our hearts, and that we may so fix our attention on Thee as to look for salvation from Thee alone; and that though despair may overwhelm us on earth, yet the hope of Thy goodness may ever shine on us from Heaven, and that, relying on the Mediator whom Thou hast given us, we may not hesitate to cry continually to Thee, until we really find by experience that our prayers have not been in vain, when Thou, pitying Thy church, hast extended Thy hand, and given us cause to rejoice, and hast turned our mourning into joy, through Christ our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

29. Ver. 21. The young and the old.—"When general judgments proceed from God, the old and the young must suffer together: the old, because they have not rightly educated the young: the young, because they have imitated the wickedness of the old." CRAMER.

30. [Vers. 19-22. "Comforts for the cure of these lamentations are here sought for and prescribed. The two most common topics, that their case is neither singular nor desperate, are here tried, but laid by, because they would not hold. No wisdom or power of man can repair the desolations of such a broken, shattered state. It is to no purpose, therefore, to administer these common cordials; therefore, the method of cure prescribed is, to refer her to God, that by penitent prayer she may commit her case to Him, and be instant and constant in her supplications, ver. 19. Arise out of thy despondency, cry out in the night, watch unto prayer; be importunate with God for mercy, be free and full, be sincere and serious; open thy mind, spread thy case before the Lord; lift up thine hands towards Him in holy desire and expectations; beg for the life of thy young children. Take with you words, take with you these words, ver. 20. Prayer is a remedy for every malady, even the most grievous. And our business in prayer is not to prescribe, but to subscribe to the wisdom and will of God; Lord, behold and consider, and Thy will be done." HENRY.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 1-10. As a warning against a proud confidence of security, our text can be used for a sermon on this theme.—The judgment on the members of the old covenant is a solemn warning for the members of the new covenant. 1. The judgment.

1. Who judges? The Lord. 2. How does He judge? With rigorous righteousness. 3. Why does He judge? Because His wrath has been provoked by sins. II. The warning. 1. They were the natural branches; we engrafted ones (Rom. xi. 24). They had for their part only the revelation of the law; we the revelation of grace. 2. From this it follows that we have to expect a similar judgment, not only with the same, but assuredly with greater certainty.

2. Ver. 9. The blessing of a well ordered political and ecclesiastical condition of affairs. 1. What belongs to such order? 1. That the civil magistracy administer the law. 2. That the teachers of God's word rightly divide it. II. What are the salutary fruits thereof? 1. In a temporal point of view, Order, Right and Righteousness, peace and general prosperity. 2. In a spiritual point of view, Glory to God in the highest, peace on earth and good will from God to men.

3. Vers. 11, 12. These verses could be preached upon in a time of severe famine. 1. Describe the actual condition of things. The distress: 1, of the children; 2, of the parents. II. Exhort to lively sympathy and the actual manifestation of pity.

4. Vers. 13, 14. The hurt of the daughter of Zion. 1. Wherein it consists. 2. Its causes. 3. Its cure.

5. Vers. 13, 14. The immense responsibility of the office of the preacher. 1. To whom are the preachers responsible (and whose word have they therefore to publish)? 2. What blessings may they be the authors of by a constant consideration of this responsibility? 3. What injury may they do by not considering the same?

6. Vers. 15, 16. Warning against malicious joy in the misfortunes of others. We understand this in a double sense; whilst we (1), warn against such conduct as may make one a subject of the malicious joy of others; (2), we warn against malicious exultation over the misfortunes of others.

7. Vers. 16, 17. The impressive sermon which is contained in great calamities. 1. These warn us; 1, against the pride which goes before a fall; 2, against malicious joy over the fall of our neighbor. II. They instruct us, 1, to consider the warnings of the Lord; 2, to recognize plainly His hand in the blows which befall men.

8. Vers. 18-22. The prayer of the distressed. 1. It comes out of the heart. 2. It is the expression of deep pain. 3. It is not satisfied with few words. 4. It is directed confidently to the Lord.

CHAPTER III.

THE MIDDLE SONG CONSTITUTING THE CLIMAX OF THE POEM: ISRAEL'S BRIGHTER DAY OF CONSOLATION CONTRASTED WITH THE GLOOMY NIGHT OF SORROW EXPERIENCED BY THE SERVANT OF GOD [AS REPRESENTED BY JEREMIAH HIMSELF].

This Song, which as the third one of the five holds the middle place, is the culmination point of the whole book, and thus affords a strong argument for the opinion, that the whole book is constructed on one carefully considered plan. It is the culmination point, both as to its matter and as to its form. As to its matter, because we have here the sublimest conceptions of suffering. As to its form, because here the art of the Poet displays itself in full splendor. This appears, first of all, in the alphabetical arrangement. Whilst the other songs have only twenty-two alphabetically arranged verses, this one contains sixty-six verses, arranged in triplets, the three verses of each triplet beginning with the same letter. Each verse is a distich, composed of a rising and falling inflection. The ternary division is observable not merely in reference to the verses beginning with the same initial letter, but with regard to the arrangement of the whole: for the whole Song is naturally divided into three parts. The first part embraces vers. 1-18: the second, vers. 19-42: the third, vers. 43-66.

PART I.

III. 1-18.

- ⌘ Ver. 1. I am the man who saw affliction
By the rod of His wrath.
- ⌘ Ver. 2. He led me and brought me Into darkness and not light.
- ⌘ Ver. 3. Surely against me He turned His hand Again and again the whole day long.
- ⌘ Ver. 4. He caused my flesh and my skin to waste away,
He broke my bones.
- ⌘ Ver. 5. He built around and encompassed me
With bitterness and distress.
- ⌘ Ver. 6. He caused me to dwell in dark places,
As the dead of old.
- ⌘ Ver. 7. He hedged me in that I should not go forth,
He made my chain heavy.
- ⌘ Ver. 8. Also, lest I should cry and call for help,
He shut out my prayer.
- ⌘ Ver. 9. He hedged in my ways with hewn stone,
He made my paths crooked.
- ⌘ Ver. 10. A lurking bear was He to me—
A lion in ambush.
- ⌘ Ver. 11. He drove me aside—He tore me in pieces—
He left me suffering and alone.
- ⌘ Ver. 12. He bent His bow, and set me
As the mark for the arrow.
- ⌘ Ver. 13. He shot into my reins
The sons of His quiver.
- ⌘ Ver. 14. I became a laughing-stock to all my people,
Their song all the day.
- ⌘ Ver. 15. He filled me with bitter things.
He made me drunk with wormwood.
- ⌘ Ver. 16. He broke my teeth with pebbles,
He covered me with ashes.
- ⌘ Ver. 17. Thou didst thrust me away from peace:
I forgot good.
- ⌘ Ver. 18. Then I said, My confidence and my hope
Are perished from Jehovah!

ANALYSIS.

After the first triad of verses, containing the theme, the Poet, or rather the person whom the Poet represents as speaking (and who will be understood as always intended, where the sense allows it, when for the sake of brevity we say "the Poet,") describes what he had suffered physically, vers. 4, 5; and in regard to light and freedom, vers. 6, 7; how the Lord had rejected his prayer, ver. 8; shut up his way, ver. 9; attacked and worried him like a bear or lion, vers. 10, 11; made him a mark for his arrows, like an archer, piercing into his very soul, vers. 12, 13; how he had thus become an object of scorn to the people, ver. 14; and drunk with bitterness, ver. 15; and how, as it were, they had given him pebbles to bite and covered him with ashes, ver. 16. In vers. 17, 18, he expresses the sense of these images in literal language; God has deprived him of peace and happiness, till he was well nigh compelled to throw away his confidence in God. Thus ends this first part, in which the name of the Lord is not mentioned except as the last word of ver. 18, where it appears with peculiar emphasis and, as it were, with a grating dissonance. It is to be observed, however, that in the whole of this first part, only those sorrows which God had sent upon His servant are spoken of; or rather, all sorrows which befall him are made to appear as Divine temptations. Hence the suppression of Jehovah's name till the very close; where at length it is announced, that it may be more dreadfully apparent whom it was that the Poet was on the point of renouncing.

PRELIMINARY NOTE.

The following general remarks on this section are to be observed. 1. It contains a description of the personal sorrows of one prominent man. This man was distinguished by his position as well as by his sufferings. The former is evident from ver. 14, where it is said he had become a derision to all the people; this could only happen to one who stood out conspicuously before the eyes of all the people. The second appears from the fact, that he is described as one burdened with sorrows more than all other persons (vers. 1-3). 2. We must recognize in the man thus made conspicuous the prophet Jeremiah. For not only the description beginning at ver. 52, undoubtedly refers to what befell this prophet as related in Jer. xxxviii., but also, before that passage occurs, ver. 14 plainly indicates this prophet (see the exposition). There is then no doubt that this Song is put into the mouth of the prophet Jeremiah. 3. As in chapter second, in the first nine verses, the destruction of Jerusalem is described as the act of God, so in this chapter the Poet ascribes all his sorrows to God as their author. He represents them as divine temptations. There is only this difference, that whilst in chap. ii., the name of God is frequently mentioned (יְהוָה, ה'הוה; vers. 1, 2, 5, 6, 7, 8), in chap. iii. God is spoken of in vers. 1-16, only indefinitely in the third person, in ver. 17 He is first addressed in the second person, and in ver. 18 He is at last distinctly mentioned by name (יְהוָה). This is evidently a designed climax. I do not think with ENGELHARDT (p. 85), that a tender conscience prevented the Poet from in-litigating the Lord, explicitly by name, as the author of his profound mental agitation; for what he did in chapter second, and repeats in ver. 18 of this chapter, he could have done in vers. 1-16. But this making the name of God prominent in the last verse, at the culmination point of the description of his sufferings, is due to the art of the Poet, of which this Song affords striking evidence.

III. 1-3.

1, 2 I am the man that hath seen affliction by the rod of His wrath. He hath led 3 me and brought me into darkness, but not into light. Surely against me is he turned; he turneth his hand against me all the day.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1.—כָּבַר not infrequent in Jer., xvii. 5, 7; xxii. 30; xxiii. 9, etc. In Lamentations in this chapter only, and here four times, vers. 1, 27, 35, 39.—Jeremiah never uses אָנִי see i. 13. The choice of the word here seems due to similarity of sound with אָנִי, comp. Ps. lxxxviii. 16.—שָׁבַט in Jeremiah only in the two critically suspected places, x. 16; xv. 19, where שָׁבַט נִחַלְתוֹ is found. This exact phrase שָׁבַט יְבַרְתֶּהוּ is found (as has not been before remarked, that I know of) in Prov. xxii. 8, in that part of the Proverbs, too, which is acknowledged to be the oldest and which extends from x. 1 to xxii. 16. The expression there is used in the sense of being blamed by men; here, the suffix refers to it God.—בָּרָה, see ii. 2.

Ver. 2.—נָהַג not in Jeremiah in any form.—חָשֶׁךְ Jeremiah often uses, ii. 16, 17; xxxi. 9; xxxii. 5.—The substantive חָשֶׁךְ never in Jeremiah. He seldom expresses this general thought, and when he does, he uses other words; נֶשֶׁךְ, צַלְמוֹת, יִצְרָף, גִּשְׁפָּה, xiii. 16, 17; ii. 6, אֶפְרַיִם; xxxiii. 12, כְּאֶפְרַיִם; ii. 31. [If he preferred here a word he never used before, euphony alone would suggest it to him. It happens, however, that of the five words in his prophecies above cited, four of them he uses only once, and the fifth, צַלְמוֹת, only twice; and one of the five, כְּאֶפְרַיִם, is not found else where in the Bible. Where such variety of terms are used to express the same idea, the introduction of another new one may be deemed as characteristic of the author. At least this word חָשֶׁךְ, affords no evidence against Jeremiah's authorship of Lamentations.—W. H. II.].—וְלֹא, see ii. 1, 2, 14, 17; iii. 7, 49; iv. 6.—With respect to the Acc. loci, see ii. 21.

Ver. 3.—שָׁבַב הַפֶּה יָדוֹ. In regard to the peculiar idiom by which an adverbial idea is expressed by a finite verb, see my Gr., § 95, g. n. [Also GREEN'S Gr., § 263]. In Jer. xviii. 4, שָׁבַב occurs in a similar construction [see marginal reading in E. V.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. I am the man.—[The references to the personal experiences of the prophet Jeremiah in this chapter are too evident to be disputed. That these words were the words of Jeremiah himself must be the opinion of all who read this chapter unprejudiced by a theory to the contrary (see Introduction). But we are not to regard him as speaking here as a private person. He speaks as the Prophet of Jehovah raised up at that particular juncture, to stand between the people and their covenant God, to reveal His will to them and to present their interest to God at the throne of grace, for these were the twofold functions of the prophet's office. The Prophet therefore was a representative man. He stood for the people. He suffered for the people. He spoke for the people. Hence in this Song Jeremiah easily passes from the singular to the plural forms of speech, from I and me, to we and us. [GERLACH: "The supposition that in this chapter the personal sufferings of the Prophet are the subject of his Lamentation (MICHAELIS, PAREAU, MAURER, KALKAR, BLEEK in his Introduction), cannot be certainly proved, either from ver. 14 (see Comm. on that ver.), nor from the description contained in 53-55, where the possibility of a figurative sense cannot be denied. In opposition to this opinion are the following arguments. 1. From the fact that we imperceptibly takes the place of I in ver. 22 and vers. 40-47, we may conclude that in the rest of the chapter also, the prophet does not speak only in his own name and of his own person. 2. Unless we would destroy the whole connection of the chapter, we must allow that the calamity, recognized in vers. 42, 43, as the punishment of the sins of the people (we have sinned), is the same calamity which is described in vers. 1-18 with reference to the experience of a single individual—an opinion, which, by manifold agreements between the two sections, is shown to be correct. 3. The lamentation of the Prophet over his own past suffering, in the actual presence of a great national calamity, would be no less improbable, than the position of this chapter, in the middle of four others lamenting the national calamity, would in that case be inappropriate. The Lamentation of this chapter is then correctly understood only, when it is regarded as a lamentation of every one of the individual pious Israelites, as a lamentation which, while proceeding from self-experienced mental sufferings, has its truth, nevertheless, for all pious israelites, in whose name the Prophet speaks. This was perceived by ABEN EZRA, when he designated the individual Israelites as the subject lamenting, and in this most modern interpreters (ROSENUELLER, EWALD, THENIUS, NEUMANN, VAHINGER) agree."—W. H. II.]—That hath seen affliction—who saw misery, i. e., experienced it. RASCHI is of the opinion that the verb here expresses the idea of living to see the fulfilment of the destruction predicted, which would suit Jeremiah alone. But in that case it would at least have been necessary to say (יָרָא) the affliction, or misery. The verb may have the sense, in a general way, of experiencing or living to see, as frequently (see Jer. v. 12; Ps. xvi. 10; xlix. 10; Eccl. viii. 16; ix. 9). But the distinction between prophecy and fulfilment is too feebly indicated, to admit of RASCHI's interpretation. The Poet has rather in view the distinction between higher and comparatively inferior degrees of suffering. He would simply say that he had suffered more than all other persons. Besides, man (אָדָם) would be too indefinite.

We would expect seer (רֹאֵה), or prophet (נָבִיא); [I am the prophet, and seer, who has lived to see the fulfilment of my own predictions.]—By the rod of his wrath.—The expression can only mean, that the Poet had seen misery in consequence of God's using the rod of His wrath. Compare Is. x. 5, where the Lord calls the Assyrian the rod of My anger, and Job ix. 34; xxi. 9, where the rod of God is spoken of in a general way. [CALVIN: "At the very beginning he acknowledges that whatever he suffered had been inflicted by God's hand . . . there is included in the word wrath a brief confession, especially when it is added by the rod, or staff."]

Ver. 2. He hath led me and brought me—He led and brought me—into darkness but (or, and) not into light.—The metaphor, [of light and darkness for prosperity and adversity] is found in Am. v. 18, 20; Job xii. 25, expressed in the same Hebrew phrase.

Ver. 3. Surely against me.—The threefold prominence given to the person speaking, by the repetition of the personal pronoun three times in the beginning of the Song, is not without a reason. These introductory verses thus acquire a thematic character, i. e., it is thus indicated that the speaker intends to make his own person especially a theme of discourse. His justification in this is, that he can with good reason assume to himself the personality punished to the greatest degree by sufferings of every sort. While he was this, he was also at the same time a leader, as it were, of all punished in the same way, therefore the representative of a whole class of sufferers, —of the Israel, hated by men but beloved of God, of the Ἰσραὴλ κατὰ πνεῦμα—the spiritual Israel. This explanation would not stand, if we were to understand the whole people as indicated by the man in ver. 1. That the whole people are not so designated by the man, will be seen further on. For the present, the expression itself, the man, furnishes an argument against it: for throughout the book Zion is always spoken of as a female. See his strongholds, ii. 5, where only the masculine pronoun is used in reference to Zion, and there only because the words are a quotation. [Probably the pronoun there refers to God, not to Zion. See the Notes.—W. H. II.]—Is he turned; he turneth his hand against me all the day.—turned he his hand always again the whole day. [He turns His hand again and again the whole day long. The Hebrew is very idiomatic. The true construction is explained by the grammatical note of NAEGELSBACH above, referring to the use of a verb in an adverbial sense. The best grammarians and Versions agree in this construction. Our English Version is obviously wrong, not only because it translates both verbs transitively, but because it translates them in different tenses and is obliged to supply the words against me in the last clause. The verbs are both future and ought to be taken in the sense of the historical imperfect, because the Prophet would express the constant repetition of God's strokes, or else as a present tense, because the prophet is referring to sufferings not yet at an end.—W. H. II.] All the day.—See i. 13; iii. 14, 62. [He smote me and continues smiting me again and again, all the day long.—W. H. II.]

and trouble.—He hath builded against me and compassed me with gall and travail. He built up against me and round about me poison and difficulty. [He built around me, and encompassed [me] with bitterness and distress.—W. H. H.] The image of a beleaguered city lies at the foundation of the thought here. But we are not, with the older commentators, to supply wall (כִּנּוּר), or some similar word after the verb built, but rather are to take gall and travail [poison and difficulty] as the object of that verb. The connection of words and thoughts here is singular, and has not up to the present time been sufficiently elucidated. Perhaps the Poet would say that the Lord had surrounded him, not only with hardships of every sort, but with adversities in themselves ruinous. It is however possible that in the word poison, שָׁרָר, the idea of bitterness (see Ps. lxix. 22) may predominate. Any way a sudden transition, from a figurative to a literal style of speaking, is effected. [There is perhaps no more difficulty here than is created by an attempt to reduce a metaphorical expression to the terms of a literal and actual fact. To enclose and encompass one with bitterness and trouble or distress (using the abstract for the concrete, i. e., with circumstances causing bitterness and distress), as if these were obstructing walls, is undoubtedly the sense of our text, and is adopted by most of the versions and commentators.—W. H. H.]

[The SEPT., the TARG. and the ARAB. (not the VULG. as BLAYNEY says), render שָׁרָר, as if it were שָׂרָר, my head. But these and all the ancient versions translate the same word in ver.

10, by gall. The SEPT. also translates שָׁרָר as a verb, ἐδόχθησεν. BLAYNEY adopts these readings of the SEPT., but instead of elucidating the meaning, confuses it still more by a new translation of the first clause: “He hath built upon me, and encompassed my head, so that it is weary.” HENDERSON adopts partially the SEPT. translation, but discovers a new and doubtful meaning for the second verb, שָׂרָר, He hath builded against me and struck me on the head, and it is distressed. FUERST proposes (See his Lex. under the word שָׁרָר) to carry out the military idea suggested by the verbs, thus; He has surrounded me with fortifications and a trench. But it is hardly necessary to accept the new and unauthorized derivations of these words, when their frequent use gives us a sense, that is, indeed, metaphorical, but none the less clear and expressive, and sustained so generally by the Versions, old and new.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 6. To the obstructions of the way are added the obstructions of light. This whole verse is reproduced word for word in Ps. cxliii. 3.—He hath set me in dark places. He caused me to dwell in darkness.—As they that be dead of old.—As the dead of olden time. Ps. lxxxviii. 5-7 and 11-13, afford the best commentary on this. There are those dead before the appointed time, whom the Lord remembers no more, and to whom He shows no more the wonders of His grace. The expression is found only here and in Ps. cxliii. 3. [We may translate it either the dead of old, or the forever dead. BLAYNEY: “God had involved him in such a depth of distress, that he was as incapable of extricating himself, as those who had laid long in the dark mansions of the dead were of making their escape thence.” GERLACH; “He is thrust into the darkness of the grave (Ps. lxxxviii. 5, 6), or of Sheol (Ps. lxxxviii. 7; Job x. 21, 22)—as an image of distress, Ps. xxx. 4; lxxxviii.—like the dead of eternity, the forever dead (Vulg., mortui sempiterni).—Most commentators (MICHAELIS, ROSENUELLER, MAURER, DE WETTE, EWALD, THENIUS, NEUMANN, BÖTTCHER) explain, the dead of old—those a long time dead; but whether dead a long or a short time makes no difference, and this, as CONZ has correctly remarked, ‘would occasion an absurd ambiguity, as if the dead, who have been but a little while dead and buried, might not lie in darkness.’ The CHAL.: Mortui qui vadunt in alterum seculum (mundum).”—W. H. H.]

Ver. 7. A climax! Not only has the Lord surrounded him with obstacles and deprived him of light, but He has also taken away his freedom. He is imprisoned and fettered! He hath hedged me about, that I cannot get out. He hedged me in that I could not get out [or, that I should not escape, or go forth.—The very words of Christ in the passion psalm, lxxxviii. 9 (WORDSWORTH)]. He hath made my chain heavy,—He made heavy my chain, or fetter.

Ver. 8. The Lord accepts none of the sufferer’s prayers. He hears him not. [HENDERSON: “The prophet places himself in the position of a prisoner, who is securely immured, and to whose supplications for deliverance, how earnestly soever they may be made, no attention is paid.”] Also when I cry and shout, he shutteth out my prayer. Also though I cry and call for help, my prayer has he barred or bolted. [The idea is, hindered or obstructed. He has taken means, by anticipation, to prevent my prayer for help from being heard, either by Himself, or by any other who might possibly come to the rescue. The change from the future tenses, to the preterite tense, seems to indicate this meaning.—W. H. H.] The sense cannot be that the Lord prevented the prayer from going out of the man’s heart, for in fact he cried (see ROSENUELLER in loc.), but that He shut up the way of access to His own ear and heart. Comp. ver. 41; Prov. i. 28. [WORDSWORTH: “So the suffering Messiah says, Ps. xxii. 2, “O my God, I cry in the daytime, but Thou hearest not.” GERLACH: “However loudly he prays, the Lord has closed His ear; ver. 41; Job xix. 8; Is. i. 15; Jer. vii. 16; Ps. xviii. 42; Prov. i. 28.”]

Ver. 9. The right way is built up against the Poet, so that he seems compelled to false ways.—He hath inclosed—he hedged in [same word as in ver. 7]—my ways with hewn stones. If hewn, then large stones, for we do not build with small ones. Comp. Ex. xx. 25; 1 Kings v. 31; Is. ix. 9; Am. v. 11; Ezek. xl. 42.—He hath made—he made—my paths crooked. The Poet would say that he had been forced to crooked and false paths. See crooked ways, Ps. cxxv. 5; crooked things, Is. xlii. 16. [At the first glance this would seem to be a continuation of the figure contained in verses 7, 8. This impression is due to the repetition of the word שָׂרָר, hedged in, and to the climax implied by hewn stone. The idea, in that case, is, that having imprisoned him and loaded him with fetters and shut out his cry for help, God proceeds, as it were, to make his imprisonment permanent and secure, by building up around him a wall of hewn stone. If this is so, then the last clause cannot mean He made my paths crooked, for one in the situation described must remain an inactive, passive sufferer; but it would mean that God had made all paths of escape impassable. The principal avenues of escape (דַּרְכֵי) are built up with hewn stones, barriers that cannot be scaled. The smaller paths (גְּבוּלֵי) are broken up, turned upside down, and thus rendered impassable. This is GERLACH'S view. It is better, however, to regard this verse as introducing a new metaphor, which is continued in ver. 10. "He next conceives of himself as a traveller whose way is blocked up by a solid wall, and who, being compelled to turn aside into the devious pathways of the forest, is exposed to the rapacity of wild beasts" (HENDERSON). This view is recommended by the following considerations. 1. The figure of an immured and fettered prisoner is already complete, and could receive no additional force from what is here said. 2. The repetition of the verb נָצַר, hedged in, which in ordinary cases would indicate a continuance of the same subject, is accounted for here by the necessity of a word with the same initial letter. 3. The expressions "my ways" and "my paths," favor this construction. They are his, because he is expected to pursue them. Were they simply the ways and paths of possible escape from the place of confinement, they would not, strictly speaking, be his at all, for he could not use them. 4. This explanation makes the next verse less abrupt, and produces a regular and beautiful succession of metaphorical pictures. 5. The idea of simply breaking up or turning over the hypo-paths, as expressed by the Hebrew verb נָצַר, does not correspond with the security against escape expressed by building up the main avenues of escape with hewn stone. 6. The common translation, He made my path crooked, best agrees with the force of the Hebrew verb, and is adopted with great unanimity by the Versions and commentators. OWEN: "The meaning is turned aside. He had built, as it were, a wall of hewn stones across his way, and thus He turned aside his goings or his paths, so that he was constrained to take some other course." WORDSWORTH: "Not only hath He blocked up my way with hewn stones, but He has turned my paths aside from their proper direction." So E. V., BROUGHTON, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, and NOYES.—W. H. H.]

III. 10-18.

10, 11 He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, and as a lion in secret places. He hath turned aside my ways, and pulled me in pieces: he hath made me desolate. He hath bent his bow, and set me as a mark for the arrow. He hath caused the arrows of his quiver to enter into my reins. I was a derision to all my people, and their song all the day. He hath filled me with bitterness, he hath made me drunken with wormwood. He hath also broken my teeth with gravel-stones, he hath covered me with ashes. And thou hast removed my soul far off from peace: I forgot prosperity. And I said, My strength and my hope is perished from the LORD.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10.—Jeremiah never mentions bears. (The need of an initial ד would naturally suggest the bear in connection with the lion. See Intr., Add. Rem. (6), p. 31.—W. H. H.)—Jeremiah uses נָצַר only once, in the phrase הַרְבֵּי הָאֲרָכִים, li. 12.—

כִּסְתָרִים Jeremiah uses often, xiii. 17; xxiii. 24; xlix. 10.

Ver. 11.—בָּשָׁח, ân. Aeyôu. In the Aramaic it stands for נָחַח in frustra dissecuit (Lev. i. 6, 12), for טָבַח dilaniavit (Job xvi. 9), for שָׁבַח dissecuit, פָּרַק fregit (1 Sam. xv. 33; Ps. vii. 3). See CHR. B. MICHAELIS in ROSENMUELLER and GES. Thes., p. 1153.—For relation of שׂוֹכֵם to Jeremiah's style and use of language, see l. 4. שָׂם Jeremiah uses not infrequently, xii. 11; xiii. 16; xvii. 5, etc. שׂוֹכֵם would be suggested here as alliterative with preceding word.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 12.—הַצֵּיבֹה in Jer. v. 26; xxxi. 21.—כִּטְרָה, in the sense of custodia, a place of custody, frequently in Jeremiah, xxxii. 2, 12, etc. In the sense of a mark, only here, Job xvi. 12, and 1 Sam. xx. 20. See GESEN. Thes., p. 511 s. v. חָיָה. With regard to its Aramaic termination נ— (see שָׂנָא, iv. 1). See OLSH., § 28 f., 108 e [GREEN'S Gr., § 136 d]. This is no evidence against Jeremiah authorship, since, not only analogies occur in Jeremiah (see רָשָׁע, l. 11; נִשָּׂא, xxiii. 39), but scattered examples occur also in older books. See OLSH. as above.—חָיָה, Jer. ix. 7; l. 9, 14, etc.

Ver. 13.—11pl. הַבַּיָּא often in Jeremiah, lii. 14; xx. 5; xxv. 9, 13, etc.—Jeremiah also uses אֲשַׁפֵּה (v. 15), but בָּנֵי אֲשַׁפֵּה occurs only here. The arrow is called בֶּן־קֶשֶׁת in Job xii. 20. See בְּנֵי־רֶשֶׁף, sons of flame, of lightning, by which many interpreters understand arrows, others sparks, and others birds. See also צֶהָר: בְּנֵי צֶהָר Zech. iv. 14; בְּנֵי שָׁבוּן, Is. v. 1.

Ver. 14.—The words הַיְיָ שְׁחָק are taken from Jer. xx. 7, where it is said, הַיְיָ לְשׁוֹחֵק כָּל־הַיּוֹם כֹּה־לֵּאמֹר לֵי, הַיְיָ שְׁחָק. Jeremiah never uses. See Lam. lii. 63; v. 14.

Ver. 15.—Jeremiah uses Hiph. הִרְוָה, v. 7.—כָּרְרוּ-יָם, besides here only in Ex. xii. 8; Num. ix. 11.—Hiph. הִרְוָה, Jer. xxxi. 25.—לְעֵנָה, wormwood, absinthium, Jeremiah uses in ix. 14; xxiii. 15.

Ver. 16.—The verb כָּבַשׁ, concludere, comminere, is found besides here only in Ps. cxix. 20.—The verb כָּבַשׁ occurs only here. It is in Hiph., and means obruit, cooperuit. [All the ancient Versions seem to have considered כָּבַשׁ same as כָּבַשׁ. The Sept., ἐβωμισέν με σποδόν, is rendered by Vulg. cibavit me cinere, “as if from כָּבַשׁ came the Latin word cibus” (BLAYNEY); but this meaning cannot be extracted from the fundamental sense of the root (see FEUERST). The Targ. rendered it laid low, which gives good sense, and is adopted by BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, OWEN and C. B. MICHAELIS. The Arabic, rolled me in the ashes, which is adopted by LUTHER, E. V. MARG., J. D. MICHAELIS and EWALD. The Syr., besprinkled, or covered, which is generally accepted as the correct meaning.—W. H. H.]—אָפַר in Jeremiah only in the kindred expression הִתְפַּלֵּשׁ בְּאָפַר, vi. 26; Comp. Ezek. xxvii. 30.

Ver. 17.—נָרָה—Jeremiah never uses: see ii. 7.—נָרָה, Jer. xxiii. 33.—טֹבְחָה—frequently in Jeremiah, xiv. 11; xviii. 10, 20, etc.

Ver. 18.—וְאָמַר. See ver. 54; Jer. iii. 17, 19.—נָצְחָה. Only נָצְחָה occurs in Jeremiah, and that with reference to time, duration. It is in Hiph., Jeremiah never uses: but see Prov. xi. 7; Ezek. xix. 5; xxxvii. 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 10. While in what precedes we were told how the sufferer was deprived of all means of escape, what follows describes the positive weapons of offence with which he was assaulted. [By regarding ver. 9 as in close connection with what precedes, the introduction of the bear and lion in ver. 10 is abrupt and irrelevant. A prisoner, closely immured, has nothing to fear from bears and lions lurking in their coverts. Connect ver. 9 with ver. 10, however, and the sense is apparent. A traveller, prevented by barricades and stone walls from pursuing the way he would go, is compelled to follow crooked paths environed with danger of encountering lurking wild beasts. See notes on ver. 9.—W. H. H.]—He was unto me as a bear lying in wait, and as a lion in secret places. A lurking bear was he to me,—a lion in ambush. The image of a bear lying in wait occurs only here. See, however, Hos. xiii. 7, 8; Am. v. 19; Prov. xxviii. 15. The figure of a lion lying in wait occurs in Jeremiah xlix. 19; l. 14; comp. ii. 30; iv. 7; v. 6; xii. 8. Elsewhere, see Ps. x. 9; xvii. 12.

Ver. 11. Bears or lions, when they attack a flock, spring upon them, tear the sheep in pieces and leave those they do not eat weltering alone in their blood. This last has happened to the Poet. He hath turned aside my ways—he drove me aside. He hath made my ways turn aside [lit.], that is to say, He drives me from the right, direct way. And pulled me in pieces, he hath made me desolate. He tore me in pieces and cast me away lonely and miserable. Should we translate, He tore me to pieces, mutilated me, and understand this to mean that the wild beast had eaten his victim, then this would not suit the other figures used in the text. On this account, we must understand this tearing in pieces only in the sense of discerpere, of mangling, lacerating. So EWALD, mich zerrupfend. The Poet would say that the beast of prey had seized one of the scattered flock, had throttled it and left it for dead, lying alone in its misery. For we must carefully observe the two ideas expressed here in the last Hebrew word, שָׁוַם, that of desolation, destruction (see i. 4, 13, 16), and that of solitariusness, loneliness (Is. liv. 1; 2 Sam. xiii. 20). [This word, שָׁוַם, may express any object of suffering forsaken of God and men, exciting, therefore, either pity or astonishment. See the use of the verb and its derivatives in ch. i.: Is. liv. 1; Job xvi. 7; xxi. 5; Ps. cxliii. 4. The fundamental signification of the root is to be motionless, filled with dread. This is the idea here. A solitary sheep, torn by the wild beast, lying alone in its suffering, and apparently dead. He made me desolate, or a desolation, may be a literal translation, but does not convey the sense which can only be done by inventing a phrase, as NÄGELSBACH has done. The idea is best condensed, perhaps, in the words, He left me suffering and alone.—W. H. H.]

כָּרַר cannot be taken here in the sense it always has elsewhere, refractarius, rebellis. The word in this sense is Part. Kal. of כָּרַר, and occurs only in Hos. iv. 16. Here it can only be, either Pilel of כָּרַר [so DAVIDSON], or Poel of כָּרַר (OLSH. § 254). It is, in either case, a verbal form, occurring nowhere except here, and meaning He made my ways turn aside, that is to say, he drove me from the right, direct way. THEINUS lays too much stress on the word, when he translates, He has dragged me aside. [The idea is, He causes me to diverge from the way, to escape the lurking beast; but in vain, for he springs upon me, rends me, and leaves me weltering in blood. BLAYNEY gives us an original translation of his own. “He hath turned full upon me. כָּרַר is applied, Hos. iv. 16, to a refractory heifer, that turns aside, and will not go forward in the straight track, as she is directed. Here it is to be understood of a bear or lion turning aside toward a traveller, to fall upon him in his way.” GERLACH understands the word here to signify turning back, instead of turning aside, that is, arresting the fugitive and sending him back to prison. But neither the context, nor the signification of the word allow of this sense. JARCHI, according to GERLACH, regarded כָּרַר, as a denominative from כָּר, spinis opplevit vias meas. So HUGH BROUGHTON, My ways hath He made thorny.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 12. In a new figure the Poet describes the Lord as an archer, who has made him his mark. [HENDERSON: “The idea of a hunter was naturally suggested by the circumstances just referred to. This is beautifully expressed in language borrowed from such employment.”] He hath bent—He bent—his bow.—Sec. ii. 4.

And set me as a—the mark for the arrow. The second half of the verse seems to be an imitation of Job xvi. 12.

Ver. 13. Continuation of the figure employed in ver. 12. He hath caused the arrows of his quiver to enter into my reins.—He shot into my reins the sons of his quiver. The Lord not only aims at the mark, He hits it, and that right in the centre. The reins are here regarded as the central organs, as frequently with Jeremiah (xi. 20; xii. 2; xvii. 10; xx. 12), not in a physical sense, however, but in a psychological sense, as appears from ver. 14. See DELITZSCH Psychologie, § 13, p. 268, 2d Edition.—The expression sons of the quiver, occurs only here. ROSEN-MUELLER quotes not inappropriately the pharetra gravida sagittis of HORACE (Ode I. 22, 23).

Ver. 14. It happens here that the Poet suddenly loses the figure. But it seems as if he would indicate by means of ver. 14, that by the arrows of which he spoke in ver. 13, he meant the arrows of derision. Jeremiah ix. 7 explicitly calls the deceitful tongue (לְשׁוֹן כִּרְכִּיף), a sharpened arrow (חֵץ שְׂוֹתָף). See Is. xlix. 2.—I was a derision to all my people.—I have become a laughing stock to all my people. Altogether unnecessarily many interpreters (even THEIXIS and EWALD) take עַבְרֵי, my people, as a rare plural form for עַמִּים, peoples, nations (as, it is asserted, in 2 Sam. xxii. 44; Ps. cxliv. 2. See EWALD, § 177 a). This rests on the presumption that the subject of the Lamentation is not the Prophet, but the people of Israel. We have already above, at vers. 1-3, declared ourselves against this opinion, and will return to the question again below, at ver. 40 sqq. [HENDERSON; “Instead of עַבְרֵי my people, a considerable number of MSS. read עַבְרִים, and four הַעַבְרִים in the plural; but this reading, though supported by the Syr., seems less suitable than the former. There is no evidence that the Prophet was treated otherwise than with respect by foreigners. Instead of meeting with any consideration from his countrymen, fidelity in the discharge of his duty to whom had been the occasion of all his personal troubles, he was made the butt of their ridicule, and the theme of their satirical songs.” See Jer. xx. 7.] And their song all the day. [The conjunction and is not in the original, and is omitted by NÆGELSBACH.—W. H. H.] The expression, their song (שִׁירֵיהֶם), is from Job xxx. 9; comp. xii. 4; Ps. lxi. 8-13.

Ver. 15. After the short interruption of ver. 14, the Poet returns to the figurative style of speaking. He exhorts, as it were, his stock of images, in order to depict the adversities which befell him. He must also receive them as meat and drink, and that too in copious measure, and he must be covered with them as with ashes. [SCOTT: Vers. 14-16. “In the midst of his other troubles, the prophet was derided and insulted by the people, over whose approaching calamities he so pathetically mourned; and they made him the subject of their profane songs, for which they were at length made a derision and a song to their enemies. Thus the Lord filled him with bitterness and intoxicated him with the nauseous cup, of which he was made to drink, instead of the cordials that his case seemed to require: and instead of nourishing, palatable food, his bread was as it were mixed with gravel, which brake his teeth, and put him to great pain when he attempted to eat: and he was covered with ashes, as a constant mourner and penitent.”]—He hath filled me with bitterness (marg., bitternesses). He satiated me with bitterness. [The Hebrew verb is used to denote satiety after eating, Deut. vi. 11; Hosea iv. 10. The connection seems to require this sense here. He was required to eat bitter things, or bitter herbs (see FENESTRÆ’S Lex.), and drink wormwood till he was filled.—W. H. H.]—He hath made me drunken with wormwood.—He made me drunk with [or, made me drink to excess of] wormwood. See ver. 19.

Ver. 16. He hath also broken [lit. And he broke. Vers. 16-18 each, begin with and (or vav conversive) for the sake of the initial letter, which is translated here also. It can be omitted in translation altogether, though it may denote here an intimate connection between this verse and ver. 15, as between eating and drinking.—W. H. H.] My teeth with gravel stones.—He broke my teeth with pebbles. It is a matter of indifference whether we regard this as meaning bread mixed with stones, or stones instead of bread. He hath covered me with ashes.—He covered me with ashes. The ashes here seem to be intended as a symbol of mourning, as they are in the well-known usages of mourning. See 2 Sam. xiii. 19; Job ii. 8; Mic. i. 10.

לִפְתָּל, lapillus, a little stone, occurs besides here only in Prov. xx. 17 (Ps. lxxvii. 18). [Prov. xx. 17, “Bread of deceit is sweet to a man; but afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel,” seems to be an allusion to the grit that often is mixed with bread baked in ashes, and thus may explain this passage. BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, OWEN and HENDERSON, translate the word grit. HENDERSON’S inelegant translation, He hath made my teeth cranch grit, and EWALD’S er liess meine Zähne zermalmen Steine, is inconsistent with the use of the preposition עַל, the presumptive power of the verb שָׁבַר (see GERLACH), and the apparent meaning of this passage especially when compared with Prov. xx. 17,—the pebbles were not broken by the teeth, but the teeth were broken by the pebbles.—A curious result of translating from a translation is exhibited in the VULG. The SEPT. having rendered this Ἐξέβαλεν οὖτος τοὺς ὀδόντας μου, the VULG., taking numeros as calculus arithmeticus, translated Et frevit ad numerum (in full number, or by number, DOUAY “one by one”) dentes meos.—W. H. H.]

Vers. 17, 18. These verses constitute the conclusion and culmination point of the Lamentation. The speaker, dropping the metaphorical and adopting the literal style, utters a threefold declaration. 1. That the Lord had thrust him back, as it were, from the dominion of peace (שָׁלוֹם, peace, is to be taken in its broadest sense, see below). To this objective act, what follows corresponds as subjective. 2. That the speaker has been deprived of all happiness, even to the recollection of it. 3. That he—and this is the name of his sorrow—regarded even his confidence and hope in Jehovah as destroyed.

Ver. 17. And thou hast removed my soul far off from peace.—Thou thrustest away my soul from peace. This is a quotation from Ps. lxxxviii. 15, which Psalm our Poet so often avails himself of. This explains why the Poet so suddenly addresses God in the second person. [WORDSWORTH: "By an affecting transition, the Prophet turns to the Almighty, whom he sees present, and addresses Him, Thou hast removed my soul far off from peace; adopting the language of another Passion Psalm (lxxxviii. 14-18)."]

Peace (שָׁלוֹם) is happiness in the widest sense, as often, and stands in parallelism with good (טוֹבָה). See Jer. viii. 15; xiv. 9, "We looked for peace, but no good came." I forgot prosperity (marg., good).—I forgot good. The speaker has been deprived of all happiness, even to the recollection of it. [LOWRY: "So Joseph speaking of the seven years of famine saith that 'plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt.'"]

Many old translators take שָׁלוֹם as the subject of הִנָּחֵהוּ. JEROME: Expulsa est a pace anima mea. VENET. GR.: 'Ἀπέστη ἀπ' εἰρήνης ἢ ἐμῆ ψυχῆ. SYRIAC: data est obliuioni a pace anima mea. [CALVIN: Et remota fuit a pace anima mea. BROUGHTON: and my soul is cast off from peace.] But these translations evidently proceed from philological ignorance. For הִנָּחֵהוּ is never used intransitively (not even in Hos. viii. 5). These translators seem also to have stumbled at the fact that here suddenly God is addressed in the second person. Among the moderns also, THENIUS and EWALD take שָׁלוֹם as the subject. But they take הִנָּחֵהוּ likewise in a sense it never has, namely, of loathing. THENIUS translates, so that I loathe happiness. EWALD: Happiness has become loathsome to me. To this we object, because no one ever feels a loathing of happiness,—nor is שָׁלוֹם equivalent to life, in which case it might indicate a satiety or weariness of life, but שָׁלוֹם is the enjoyment of life. They have overlooked the fact that this passage is a quotation from Ps. lxxxviii. 15, of which our Poet so often avails himself. There it is said לִכְהֵה יְהוָה הִנָּחֵה נַפְשִׁי. This explains why the Poet so suddenly addresses God in the second person, and determines the meaning of הִנָּחֵה, which can only be, as everywhere else, re-jicere, repellere. That הִנָּחֵה is construed with כֵּן (as elsewhere only once, in Hiphil, 2 Chron. xi. 14) need not surprise us, for there is nothing in the word itself that would make this construction appear as unauthorized or even strange. [GERLACH, while rejecting the opinions of THENIUS and EWALD, adopts the idea of the old translators, Und es ward verstossen vom Frieden meine Seele, and strangely appeals to 2 Chron. xi. 14, to justify the intransitive use of the verb.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 18. And I said, My strength and my hope is perished from the Lord.—Over and gone from Jehovah is my confidence and hope. [BROUGHTON: And I thought in myself, my state is undone and my hope from the Eternal. HENDERSON: And I said, My confidence is perished, and my hope from Jehovah. Not only had all present enjoyment been annihilated, but all prospect of future prosperity had been cut off."] The Poet here represents the sum total, as it were, of his punishment, the separate details, which he has been narrating, beginning at ver. 1, being regarded as the several items of a sum in arithmetic. The result is an alarming one. His confidence and his hope in the Lord had been almost destroyed by the unintermitted blows of the rod of wrath (vers. 1-3). But they had not been actually destroyed. This we learn from the expression, and I said, נִאֲמַר. Without this word ver. 18 would have a much more equivocal sense. But this indicates that the Poet would represent the loss of his confidence, not as an actual fact (else he would have said נִאֲמַר), but as merely an anticipatory thought. He said, i. e., he thought so to himself, as in Jer. iii. 7, נִאֲמַר represents merely a speaking to one's self, i. e., a thought, a feeling. [See instances of this use of the expression in Gen. xxvi. 9; 1 Sam. xx. 3; 2 Sam. xxi. 16; 1 Kings viii. 12, etc.—W. H. H.] That he had not actually lost his confidence is, finally, most apparent from what follows, where the Poet, with all his soul's energy, refastens the bond of confidence that had threatened to break. [HENRY: "Without doubt it was his infirmity to say thus, Ps. lxxvii. 10, for with God there is everlasting strength, and He is His people's never failing hope, whatever they may think."] נִאֲמַר followed by כֵּן, has different senses. This כֵּן often indicates the person or place suffering the loss; אָבַר כְּנוֹס כִּפְנֵי, Ps. cxlii. 5; comp. Job xi. 20; xviii. 17; Jer. xviii. 18; xxv. 35; xlix. 7, 38, etc. It can be taken thus here. For the thought that Jehovah has lost the confidence of the Poet, can be expressed in the form here used. Yet it is well to observe here that the words cannot be translated, my confidence and my hope in Jehovah are lost [as NOYES does]. For the object of confidence is always indicated by אֵל, עַל, or, as especially after הִנָּחֵהוּ, Ps. xxxix. 8, by לְ. But the sense is, my confidence is perished away from Jehovah, it has lost its direction towards Him. It is a constructio pœgnans: my confidence is turned away from God, and thus has become destroyed. כֵּן could also be taken with reference to the efficient cause. See יִאבְדוּ יְרֵעִים כִּפְנֵי אֱלֹהֵי יִאבְדוּ, Job iv. 9; Ps. lxxx. 17. [So BLAYNEY and BÖOTHROYD: Jehovah hath caused my strength and my hope to fail.] Yet, if כֵּן had only this sense, and not at the same time the local sense of away from, we would rather expect כִּפְנֵי יִאבְדוּ יְרֵעִים כִּפְנֵי אֱלֹהִים, as we read Ps. lxxviii. 3, יִאבְדוּ יְרֵעִים כִּפְנֵי אֱלֹהִים, נֶאֱחָז.—That this root contains the ideas of splendor, strength and endurance, is certain. Which is its original meaning is disputed. Here, as in 1 Sam. v. 29, the idea seems to be strength with the modification of perseverance, persevering steadfastness and confidence. At least this best suits the intimately connected word הִנָּחֵהוּ.

ANALYSIS.

In the second part, vers. 19-42, the Poet rises out of the night of sorrow into the clear day of comfort and hope; yet he allows, as it were, a morning dawn to precede, and an evening twilight to follow this day. Vers. 19-21 contain a transition. The Poet can again pray! He prays the Lord to be once more mindful of him, vers. 19, 20; and on his own part he sets about to seek for grounds of comfort, ver. 21. These he finds, first of all, in the fact that Israel is not completely destroyed, that there is yet a remnant, as a starting point for a return to the better fortune which is now at hand. This fact is due to the grace and mercy of God, the continuation of which the Poet recognizes with the deepest joy, vers. 22-24. From this point of view, afforded by the Divine mercy, the Poet now looks upon his sorrows:—the Lord even when He smites, always means it for good, vers. 25-27;—if it be borne patiently, with silent submission, vers. 28-30,—then the rays of Divine compassion will again appear, vers. 31-33. Viewed from this stand-point, every sorrow, even that inflicted upon us by human malignity, seems a wholesome divine ordinance,—so that not the sorrow itself, but only the sin that caused it, is to be deplored, vers. 34-39. Such a lamentation for sin, the cause of the affliction suffered, the Poet now begins, not in his own name, but in that of all the people, vers. 40-42. And as he had skilfully introduced this lamentation by the self-accusation in ver. 39, so these three verses, 40-42, serve him as a means of transition to a new lamentation over the misfortunes that had befallen the nation. With the words לא כִּלַּחַתְּ, Thou hast not pardoned, ver. 42, he turns to the description of the common misfortune.

PRELIMINARY NOTE.

In this eminently consolatory passage, vers. 19-42, with its introduction, vers. 19-21, and conclusion, vers. 40-42, every triad of verses constitutes, as regards sense, a complete whole. The effect of similarity⁴ of construction is further heightened in vers. 25-39, by the fact that the triplets of each verse begin, not only with the same initial letter, but with the same word, or with similar words. Thus vers. 25-27 begin with טֹב, vers. 28-30 with the Imperfects יִתֵּן, יִתֵּן, יִתֵּן, vers. 31-33 with בֵּן, vers. 34-36 with הֵן before an Infinitive, and vers. 37-39 are interrogative sentences. It should also be observed that from ver. 22 the Poet no longer speaks in the first person singular. It is as if he felt the necessity, at this culmination point of the Poem, of letting the individual step back behind the sublime and universal truth which he pronounces.

III. 19-21.

19 Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall.
20, 21 My soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humble in me. This I recall to my mind, therefore have I hope.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 19.—עֲנִי. See remarks i. 3.—בְּרִירִי, see i. 7. [GERLACH translates it expulsion, exile, verstossung. BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, OWEN: abasement. HENDERSON: persecution. BROUGHTON: revelation.]—לְעֵנָה, see ver. 15.—רָאֵתִי, see ver. 5.

Ver. 20.—The verb שָׁחַח occurs, except here, only in Ps. xlv. 26; Prov. ii. 18. The root שָׁחַח is nowhere found.—(תִּשְׁיָהּ). To take | in the sense of quod (ROSENMUELLER, VAHINGER, ENGELHARDT), is an arbitrary rendering that receives no support from the reference to Gen. xxx. 27.

Ver. 21.—The expression אֶל־לֵב הַשֵּׁבִי, to take something to heart, is never found in Jeremiah: see Deut. iv. 36; xxx. 1; Is. xlv. 19; xlv. 8; 1 Kings viii. 47.—אוֹחֵל־. See Jer. iv. 19. The anomalous form there found, אוֹחֵלֶךָ, is traced back to אוֹחֵל or אוֹחֵל, but אוֹחֵל in no form occurs in Jeremiah; therefore here again a difference in the use of language is apparent. Forms of אוֹחֵל occur in Lamentations only in this chapter, namely, verb forms in vers. 21, 24, noun forms in vers. 18, 26. [If Jeremiah could coin an entirely new word in his prophecies and use it only once, we might allow him to introduce into the Lamentations words already coined and familiar to him in other Scriptures, even if he confine this use to one place or one chapter.—W. II. II.]—עַל־כֵּן has its usual signification, therefore, for that reason.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

* The artistic management of the composition should be here observed. The whole preceding recital from ver. 1, constitutes a crescendo movement, which ends in ver. 18 with a shrill dissonance, enhanced by the fact that it closes with the name of Jehovah, here mentioned for the first time. But this dissonance, after ver. 21, is lost in the most agreeable harmony. The three intervening verses, 19-21, constitute the transition from discord to harmony.

Vers. 19, 20. As if shocked that so terrible a thought could come into his mind, the Poet rouses himself up and directs a cry of anguish from the depths of his heart to the Lord, that He would not forget and reject him, but would graciously remember him. [GERLACH: "The prophet is certain, that if God will only be rightly mindful of the misery poured out over him, His pity must be excited (VAH.), and this certainly is immediately expressed with assurance in ver. 20."]

Ver. 19. Remembering mine affliction and my misery, the wormwood and the gall.—Remember [so E. V., margin, all the English versions except BLAYNEY, the TARG., VULG., and SYR.] my affliction and my wanderings (see i. 7), wormwood and gall! The Poet thus represents to the Lord the most striking features of his sufferings as depicted in the preceding verses. [The repetition of the three emphatic words, in which the idea of misery is condensed, אַף affliction or misery, ver. 1, גַּלְגַּל wormwood, ver. 15, אַרְגָּל gall or bitterness, ver. 15, shows that this verse is a brief and emphatic recapitulation of the whole preceding description. But with all these in view, the Prophet rejects the thought he was tempted to indulge, as expressed in ver. 18, and "does not let go his hold on the God of his life; but is convinced that if He will only regard him, all will be well". (HENDERSON).—W. II. II.]

Many interpreters stumble at the fact that the Poet, immediately after the cry of despair in ver. 18, should again address a prayer to Jehovah. Many, therefore, (BÖTTCHER, THENIUS) take זָכַר and הִזְכִּיר, ver. 20, as the subject of a hypothetical proposition, Remember my misery . . . yea, my soul remembers it and humbles itself in me. [E. V.: Remembering mine affliction . . . My soul hath them still in remembrance and is humbled in me.] But to take the Inf. Constr. זָכַר in a finite sense, is altogether ungrammatical and without precedent. EWALD, indeed, takes זָכַר as an Imperative, but as an address "to the first best hearer." He also takes הִזְכִּיר, ver. 20, for the third person feminine, My soul, holds up before itself [remembers with self-reproach], it humbles itself in me. It seems to me that all these interpreters exaggerate the suddenness of the transition from the cry of ver. 18 to the prayer of ver. 19, and do not rightly apprehend it. They overlook the softening effect of אָמַר, and I said [i. e., to myself], and they fail to observe that the prayer immediately following in ver. 19, plainly shows that the language of ver. 18 was the expression of a rash but conquered moment of despair. Thus the Poet, by the fact that he can again pray in this way, plainly gives us to understand that his despair had secured no strong foot-hold in his breast. Some regard הִזְכִּיר, ver. 20, as the second person masculine indeed, but in the Indicative sense,—truly thou thinkest thereon,—indicating the hearing of the prayer uttered in ver. 19. But in that case the sentence should not be continued with the Imperfect. It should have been, וְשָׁחָה. See my Gr., § 84, n. f. ["The perfect is used to denote a fact which can only be represented as accomplished in actual reality, but which happens, as respects time, in the immediate, unconditioned future." NÄGELSACH'S Gr.] We not only regard זָכַר as a prayer directed to the Lord, but הִזְכִּיר, ver. 20, as an emphatic repetition of it. [Some old commentators translated זָכַר as the Inf., but regarded ver. 19, as in close connection with ver. 18. See MÜLLER: Secundam quosdam est זָכַר infinit., ut sit sensus: perit spes mea, recordante me afflictionis mee (GERLACH). The interpretation of this verse must be determined by the gender and person, or subject of הִזְכִּיר in ver. 20.—W. II. II.]

Ver. 20. My soul hath them still in remembrance, and is humbled in me.—*Remember, yea remember, that my soul composes itself in me. [Lit. Remembering Thou wilt remember, i. e., according to the familiar Hebrew idiom, Thou wilt certainly remember. CRAMER BIB.: Yea thou shalt remember them; for my soul melteth away in me. OWEN: Remembering thou wilt remember them, for bowed down within me is my soul. NOYES: Yea, thou wilt remember them, for my soul is bowed down within me. GERLACH: Remembering Thou wilt indeed remember that my soul is bowed down within me. The last is undoubtedly most literal and exact.—W. II. II.]—After the prayer, so emphatically repeated, Remember, Oh do Thou remember, what immediately follows can only indicate something favorable,—that my soul composes itself in me. The meaning of the verb שָׁחָה (see also שָׁחָה and שָׁחָה) can only be sedere, desiderare, [to sit, sink or settle down]. The Kal in Ps. xlv. 25, is evidently taken in a bad sense, "For our soul is bowed down to the dust," שָׁחָה לְיָסֵר נַפְשֵׁנוּ. The Hiphil (for there is no apparent reason for forsaking the K'tib) is to be taken either in the indirect causative sense, denoting to cause that something sinks, sits down, or in direct causative sense, to cause sinking, to sink one's self, to sit down. Since, according to what precedes, the Poet's soul had been excited in the highest degree, furiously agitated (see תַּכְרִיכַר, i. 20; ii. 11), the meaning to sink itself, sit down, become calm, would be admirably appropriate here, and the more so because, according to what precedes, the Poet had brought reproach upon his soul, by an ebullition of feeling of an unjustifiable kind, and bordering upon defiance. It is certainly seemly for such a soul to sink down, as it were, into itself, and to become still, as the ocean returning to rest after a furious storm. The expression in me, בְּי, is used here as in Ps. xlii. 5, 6, 7, 12; xliii. 5; cxxxi. 2; cxlii. 4; Jer. viii. 18, etc. See DELITZSCH Psych., IV., § 1, pp. 151, 152. There lies in it the idea of hearing, as if the heart felt burdened. [Wordsworth: "My soul  sinks down upon me. The soul (Hebr. nepesh) is the seat of the agitated affections, and it sinks down, as it were, in a swoon, upon the Spirit (Hebr. ruach), the diviner faculty, and overwhelms it. Comp. Ps. xlii. 4-6; xlv. 25; lxxvii. 3; cxlii. 3."—The commentators have succeeded in obscuring the meaning of this verse, by many possible or impossible translations, for which the curious may safely consult GERLACH, but the real meaning is expressed by the most natural translation of the words, Remembering Thou wilt remember, i. e., Thou wilt surely remember, that my soul sinks within me, or is bowed down in me, or upon me (literally, according both to NÄGELSACH and WORDSWORTH), i. e., is humbled in penitence and overwhelmed with sorrow. So GERLACH.—W. II. II.]

Ver. 21. This I recall to my mind (margin., make to return to my heart), therefore have I hope.—This will I take to my heart, on this account will I hope. The effect of the soul's becoming submissive and acquiescent is, that it now again takes to heart those facts which, notwithstanding all hardships endured at the hand of the Lord, yet always encourage the exercise of confidence in Him. This (וַיִּחַ) cannot refer to what precedes. Still less can therefore (עַל-כֵּן), of the second clause. For what precedes is only a prayer, with no positive promise. Ver. 21 is the immediate introduction to the impressive consolatory section which begins with ver. 22. It is shown in what follows, why the Poet still cherishes hope. See the conclusion of ver. 24, therefore will I hope in Him. [The awkward reference of the this and therefore of ver. 21, to what follows, which is rendered necessary by the translation of ver. 20, adopted by NÆGELSBACH and others, is a strong argument against the correctness of that translation. 1. The position of the this, as the first word of the sentence, strengthens the likelihood that it refers to something just stated, rather than to something about to be stated. If we explain its position in the sentence by the necessity of the proper initial letter, this may show how much the style is affected by the artificial structure of the poem, and greatly weakens the argument of those who imagine they discover differences between the style of the Lamentations, and of Jeremiah's Prophecies. But 2. The this and therefore, if they refer to what follows, lead us to expect an immediate, clear and definite proposition, to which they would logically correspond. But there is no such proposition stated, but certain general truths follow, which only remotely and by a mental process of our own minds, can be made to satisfy the requirements of the this and therefore in ver. 21. 3. The attempt to establish a connection between the therefore I hope in ver. 21, and the same expression at the end of ver. 24, as if one were an index finger pointing forward, and the other an index finger pointing backward, showing that all that lies between them is the this, on account of which the prophet says therefore I hope, is open to the following objections. (a) The therefore of ver. 24, can only logically refer to the words immediately preceding, "Jehovah is my portion, saith my soul." (b) The therefore, in ver. 24, is restricted to what immediately precedes by the addition of the words "in Him." If it had been intended to correspond with and explain the declaration of ver. 21, it should have been "therefore I hope in this," i. e., in the doctrine contained in all the preceding verses, to which the this of ver. 21 refers. (c) The fact that there is as much in the verses immediately following ver. 24, as in those immediately preceding it, to afford hope and comfort, makes it exceedingly improbable that ver. 24 terminates a section begun in ver. 21. (d) If the therefore, of ver. 24, refers to a proposition preceding and not following it, it is likely that the therefore of ver. 21 does also. 4. The translation of ver. 20, as CRANMER'S BIBLE, OWEN and NOYES translate it (see above on ver. 20), or as ROSENUELLER translates it (Enim vero reminisceris, hoc animo meo meditor), and still more as GERLACH translates it, Thou wilt certainly remember that my soul is bowed down in me, or upon me, renders the meaning of ver. 21 clear and unequivocal. This assurance, that God is mindful of the soul that is bowed down upon itself, in sorrow and penitence, the Prophet takes to heart, and therefore hope revives in his bosom. We thus have a graceful and easy introduction to the beautiful passage that follows in which the thought expressed in ver. 20, that God is mindful of the submissive patient sufferer, is expanded and reappears at every point.—W. H. H.]

* [Wordsworth mistranslates NÄGELSACH,—Remember, remember Thou, that my soul sinks within me. (Ist denke, dass meine Seele sich beruhigt in mir. Ich beruhigen means to quiet, compose one's self. Beruhigen, his notes explain the Hebrew in the sense of sinking down into a state of rest after great agitation.—W. II. II.)

III. 22-24.

22 It is of the LORD's mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions 23, 24 fail not. They are new every morning: great is thy faithfulness. The LORD is my portion, saith my soul; therefore will I hope in him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 22.—[תַּכְנִי]. GERLACH argues that the use in Jer. xlv. of תַּכְנִי, in ver. 18, for the first person plural, and of תַּכְנִי, in vers. 12, 27, for the third person plural, is decisive evidence of the Jeremiaic use of language in the Lamentations.—W. H. H.]—The plural תַּכְנִי, not found in Jeremiah, is frequent elsewhere, ver. 31; Gen. xxxii. 11; Is. lxiii. 7; Ps. lxxix. 2; cvii. 43, etc.—רַחֲמִים, Jer. xvi. 5; xlii. 12.—כָּלִי, Jer. viii. 20; xiv. 6; xvi. 4, etc.

Ver. 23.—הַדְּשִׁים is in apposition to רַחֲמֵי-הוֹשִׁיעַ, Jer. xxxi. 22, 31.—לַבְּקָרִים, Is. xxxiii. 2; Ps. lxxiii. 14; ci. 8.

Jeremiah uses לַבְּקָרִים in this sense only once.—אֲמַנְנָה, Jer. v. 1, 3; vii. 28; ix. 2.

Ver. 24.—The expression אֲמַנְנָה נַפְשִׁי occurs only here.—לִי. This construction with לִי occurs, Ps. xxxviii. 16; xlii. 6, 12; xliii. 5; Mic. vii. 7, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 22-24. It should be especially observed here that the passage which is full of the richest comfort and which includes vers. 22-42, constitutes the middle portion both of the third chapter and of the whole book. For as chapter third occupies the middle place among the five Songs, so the two decades of verses, vers. 22-42, constitute almost exactly the middle part of chapter third. Here the author skilfully introduces the sunshine. He permits the bright day of hope and resignation to follow the night of despair described in ver. 18. Immediately following these verses, however, the misery of the people and of the Prophet is again depicted in the gloomiest colors, so that this bright part is, as it were, framed in on both sides with deep darkness, which serves as a back-ground to make the colors of this picture of consolation stand out with greater distinctness. And so, as it were, the dome of the building, artistically constructed of these tearful Songs, rises up as a pyramid of light out of painful darkness, by which means the comforting truth, that for believers the sun of happiness will at last triumph over the night of misery and suffering, is placed conspicuously in the clearest and strongest light. First of all the joyful announcement is made, vers. 22-24, that, by the grace of God, Israel is not yet completely undone. There is still a remnant which can serve as a connecting link for the new order of things. This great favor Israel owes to the mercy of God, which is not yet exhausted, but rather in consequence of it the faithfulness of God renews itself every morning, so that the Poet can proclaim with assurance, as a noble anchor of hope and consolation, that the Lord is his portion, and that he may still say to his God "Thou art mine."

Ver. 22. It is of the LORD'S mercies that we are not consumed, because his compassions fail not.—Because of Jehovah's mercies we are not consumed [Gnaden Jehovah's sind es, dass wir nicht gar aus sind. So also, word for word, GERLACH], for his compassion has no end. [The E. V. is more accurate, because his compassions fail not.—W. H. H.] The fact that the Poet here speaks in the first person plural, when elsewhere, down to ver. 40, he speaks only of himself, is explained by what has been already shown, that he fastens the cords of his own personal hope to the fact that the people still exists, even if only as a weak remnant. But that even such a kernel remains, he ascribes to the grace of God. [See these transitions from singular to plural and back again, explained in remarks introductory to the chapter.] The use of the plural in mercies involves the idea of manifestations of grace, or illustrations of grace, in the way of instruction and of example. Many acts of Divine grace shown to many individuals, combine in the result. Since the mercies (the several acts of grace) of Jehovah can only be regarded as the effluence of His compassion, we take the second ׀ as a causative particle, "for His compassion has no end." The compassion of God is the ground of His graciousness, in consequence of which Israel is not entirely undone.

If we could take הַרְחִיבָהּ for the third person plural, as the CHALDAIC, SYLLAC and many moderns do (EWALD, THENIUS, DELITZCH on Is. xxiii. 11), the sense of this place would be entirely clear. [We could then translate with CALVIN, The mercies of Jehovah! surely they are not consumed. In which OWEN, BLAYNEY and BOOTHROYD substantially agree.—W. H. H.] But, notwithstanding the fact that in Ps. lxi. 7, רַחֲמֶיךָ seems even more plainly than here as if it must be taken for the third person plural [not necessarily. See J. A. ALEXANDER in loc.], yet OLSHAUSEN is certainly right when he shows, § 82 u, that the insertion of ׀ as a compensation for the reduplication of the consonant, is in violation of all the established rules of Grammar. It may be that at several of those doubtful places that are referred to (Is. xxiii. 11; Lam. iii. 22; Ps. lxi. 7; Prov. xxvi. 7; Ezz. x. 16) false readings have slipped in. But here this supposition is unnecessary. Here as in Num. xvii. 28, and Jer. xlv. 18, רַחֲמֶיךָ is the first person plural.

Ver. 23. They are new every morning. [They, i. e., the mercies of Jehovah, which are ever renewed because His compassion fails not: for His mercies are the fruit of His compassion (see notes on ver. 22).—W. H. H.]—Great is thy faithfulness.—Faithfulness is only a form of compassionate love. It is love enduring in all circumstances. [CALVIN: "Were God to take away the promise, all the miserable would inevitably perish; for they can never lay hold on His mercy except through His word. This, then, is the reason why Scripture so often connects these two things together, even God's mercy and His faithfulness in fulfilling His promises."]

Ver. 24. Vers. 22, 23, treated only of objective facts. From these a subjective conclusion is now drawn. Since the Lord is so gracious, merciful and faithful, the Poet esteems Him as the dearest treasure of his soul, as his best portion, and the foundation of his hope. The LORD is my portion.—My portion is Jehovah. This seems to refer to Num. xviii. 20, where the Lord, having told Aaron that he should receive no hereditary portion in the land, says to him, "I am thy part [portion] and thine inheritance." The same expression is found in Ps. xvi. 5; lxxiii. 26; cxix. 67; cxlii. 6. See Jer. x. 16; li. 19; Dent. xxxii. 9. Saith my soul.—[CALVIN: "He speaks emphatically, that his soul had thus said . . . The unbelieving also confess that God is the fountain of all blessings, and that they ought to acquiesce in Him; but with the mouth only they confess this, while they believe nothing less. This then is the reason why the Prophet ascribes what he says to his soul, as though he had said, that he did not boast like hypocrites that God was his portion, but of this he had a thorough conviction."] Therefore will I hope in him.—See ver. 21.

III. 25-33.

25 The LORD is good unto them that wait for him, to the soul that seeketh him.
 26 It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the 27, 28 LORD. It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth. He sitteth 29 alone and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him. He putteth his mouth
 30 in the dust, if so be there may be hope. He giveth his cheek to him that smiteth 31 him: he is filled full with reproach. For the LORD will not cast off for ever.
 32 But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude 33 of his mercies. For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 25.—Kal of קוֹה is not found in Jeremiah; he uses only Niph'al iii. 17, and Piel viii. 15; xiii. 16; xiv. 19, 22. Kindred expressions are found in Ps. xxv. 3; lxix. 7; Is. xlix. 23.—The expression דָּרַשׁ אֶת יְהוָה is found in Jeremiah several times and in different senses, x. 21 (?); xxi. 2; xxix. 13; xxxvii. 7. Yet none of these places seem to have been in the Poet's eye. If some earlier declaration was in his mind, it was apparently Deut. iv. 29, where it is said כִּי הִרְשָׁנִי בְּיָדָי וּבְכַף יָדָי וּבְכַף יָדָי וּבְכַף יָדָי.

Ver. 26.—[See crit. notes below.]—הִשְׁיִיגָה, Jer. iii. 23.

Ver. 27.—עָל. See i. 14. עָל נִשְׂא occurs only here.—נִעְרִים frequently in Jeremiah, iii. 4; xxiv. 25, etc.

Ver. 28.—נָטַל, not in Jeremiah. It occurs, besides here, only in 2 Sam. xxiv. 12; Is. lxiii. 9. יָטוּל, Is. xl. 15, is probably from נָטַל, to turn aside (see DELITZSCH at this place), of which verb Jeremiah makes frequent use, xvi. 13; xxii. 26, 28.

Ver. 29.—[This verse is wanting in the Sept.]—אֵי־לֵא Jeremiah uses often, xxi. 2; xxvi. 3, 7; li. 8. [CALVIN: "The particle אֵי־לֵא expresses what is difficult; for when anything appears to be incredible, the Hebrews say, If it may be."]—The phrase הַתְּקוּהָה יֵשׁ is found not only in Prov. xix. 18, but also in Jer. xxxi. 17.

Ver. 30.—Neither the Part. בָּכָה, nor לָחֵץ, see i. 2, occurs in Jeremiah: אֵי־לֵא is found in Is. i. 6.—The expression שָׁבַע בְּחַרְפָּה occurs only here, yet there is a similar construction [of שָׁבַע with בָּ, instead of Acc.] in Ps. lxxv. 5; lxxxviii. 4. The words שָׁבַע and חַרְפָּה, by themselves, are current in Jeremiah; see for the first, xxxi. 14; xli. 10; i. 10, for the other vi. 10; xv. 15; xx. 8; xxiv. 9, etc.

Ver. 31.—Jeremiah never uses וָגָה, see ver. 17; ii. 7.

Ver. 32.—הוֹנָה, see i. 4; v. 12.—רָחַם, often in Jeremiah, xii. 15; xxxi. 20; xlii. 12, etc.—כָּרַב הַכָּרָב is found, pointed thus, Ps. cvi. 45, besides Is. lxiii. 7.—With regard to grammatical construction, see ver. 22.

Ver. 33.—The verb יָנָה, inclinatium, depressum esse (Piel again in Lam. v. 11) Jeremiah uses in no form.—מָלְכוּ, see Deut. xvi. 23.—יָנָה is Imperf. Piel of יָנַח, the Hiph. of which we have in ver. 32. This form occurs only here: it is shortened from יָנִיחָה, as יִרְדֵּךְ, ver. 53, from יִרְדֵּךְ. See OLSEN, p. 547.—פָּנֵי אִישׁ, not found in Jeremiah; he says only once אָרַם כִּנֵּי אָרַם, xxxii. 19. [If he could use this latter phrase "only once," he was not so addicted to it that he could not use the other "only once."—W. II. II.] The phrase, besides here, is found only in Ps. iv. 3; xlix. 3; lxii. 10. At the last two places אָרַם כִּנֵּי אָרַם occurs in the immediate context.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 25-33. The thought underlying this section is,—the Lord has kind purposes towards the children of men in all circumstances; even if He chastises them, He does it for their good; men should so deport themselves in misfortune that they may ensure the attainment of the Lord's wholesome intention. Then will He permit His mercy to return again. [Here we plainly see the expansion of the assertion made in ver. 20, that the Lord will be mindful of the soul bowed down upon itself in submissive sorrow.—W. II. II.]—The three verses, 25-27, begin with the same word טוֹב good, and evidently belong together, as in this section generally the connection of verses beginning with the same initial is very apparent. Thus in the three following triads, vers. 28-30, 31-33, 34-36, the verses begin not only with the same letter, but with homogeneous words.

Ver. 25. The LORD is good—Good is Jehovah—unto them that wait for him,—to them who trust in Him. [Wait, waiting in hope, is the correct idea.—W. II. II.],—to the soul that seeketh him.—The idea of טוֹב=good, is presented to us in three aspects in vers. 25-27. Here we have the fundamental idea, that the Lord Himself is good. This belongs to His nature. He is good even when He causes pain. Man though in trouble, perceiving the goodness of the Lord, cannot defiantly murmur or faint-heartedly despair. He must rather hope even in Him who slays him, seek even Him who seems to thrust him away from Himself.

Ver. 26. It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the LORD.—Happy is he who keeping silence waits for the salvation of Jehovah. [The Hebrew construction is difficult. The authorities differ on important points. But all the translations result in the same essential meaning, which is, on the whole, as well expressed in our common English version, as in any. It is good both hopefully and silently, i. e., un murmuringly, submissively, to wait for the salvation of Jehovah.—W. H. II.] From the proposition that the Lord is good to those who wait for Him and seek Him, follows necessarily this other, that the man is fortunate, even in the midst of chastisement, who patiently and silently hopes for the salvation of the Lord. Thence it appears that טוב, good, here is to be taken in the sense of felix, happy, fortunate, which it undoubtedly has in iv. 9; Jer. xlv. 17; Is. iii. 19; Ps. exii. 5.

[טוב. The attempt has been made to take this word in verses 26, 27 as a repetition of the statement in ver. 25, that Jehovah is good. Thus NEUMANN (see GERLACH), Good is Jehovah to those who hope in Him. . . Good—and who waits. . . Good to the man, etc. This creates a very harsh ellipsis in ver. 26, and reduces the meaning in ver. 27, down to this, that Jehovah is good to that man only who bears the yoke in his youth. BLAXNEY and BOOTHROD avoid these two difficulties, by translating קָוָה in ver. 25 as a singular noun (which OWEN claims as the correct reading on the authority of the Syr.), and by introducing an illative particle (therefore, hence) in ver. 26, that is not in the Hebrew. BLAXNEY: Jehovah is gracious unto him that waiteth for Him. . . He is gracious, therefore let him wait. . . He is gracious unto a man, etc. BOOTHROD: Jehovah is good to him that waiteth for Him. . . He is good, hence let him hope, etc. Besides the grammatical difficulties above stated, these two translations, by making an independent proposition of ver. 27, teaches the wretched doctrine that God is necessarily gracious or good to a man who is afflicted in his youth. They are, too, open to the grammatical objection that GERLACH brings against NEUMANN'S translation, that it would require the suffix at the end of verse 26, instead of the name Jehovah. The repetition of the word טוב in these verses should, doubtless, be regarded merely as a sort of initial rhyme, intended to please the ear and the eye, and to fix the attention.—W. H. II.]—If טוב is taken in the sense of felix, the following יְחִיל explains itself. It is insufferably harsh to take this as Imperf. Hiph. as many do. EWALD refers to this, § 235 a. The examples adduced by him in that place, afford no analogy to the case before us. Why should not טוב here be construed precisely as it is immediately afterwards in ver. 27? The double י is easily explained, if we take יְחִיל as a verbal adjective from יָחַל, as GESENIUS (Thes., p. 590, comp. 327), WISER, FUERTS and others do, although this adjective does not occur elsewhere. An objection to this may be urged from דָּבַק, which is only found besides here in Is. xlvii. 5, and Hab. ii. 19, where it has an adverbial signification. But the question is, whether דָּבַק is a pure adverb, or not rather an original adjective noun (see אֵילָם, a forefront, porch).

EWALD affirms the latter, § 204 b. Comp. § 163 g. In this original adjective signification may דָּבַק stand here. MAURER, indeed, proposes to take יְחִיל and דָּבַק substantively, bonum est expectare et silere; propr., expectatio et silentium= tacita expectatio. He refers in this connection to רָכִיל. But, as EWALD shows, § 153 a, this formation occurs even where it has an abstract sense, as רָכִיל obtretractio, כָּלִיל totality, yet there is always a passive idea beneath it, as, for example, retributio originally retribution, dispositio originally the being disposed. So also רָכִיל was originally obtrectatum, כָּלִיל consummatum. According to this יְחִיל would be expectatum. But this sense does not suit here. The connection requires the pure abstract idea of expectatio. Therefore we take יְחִיל and דָּבַק in the adjective sense, and the double י for as well as, as also, or both—and. [Both hopeful and silent or submissive.]

Ver. 27. It is good—Good is it—for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth.—If that one is happy, who silently waits and endures, then it follows that sorrow itself has its good side: for it begets that silent endurance. It is the hot fire that ripens that noble fruit. Therefore in the next place the Poet calls bearing the yoke something good. He adds, it is true, in his youth. This seems to have caused the interpreters difficulty, even in old times. The Aldine edition of the Sept., and thereupon THEODORION, translated ἐκ νεότητος αὐτοῦ, from his youth. And in fact many Codices read ἐκ νεότητος, from his youth. But the idea of youth is not to be taken in too restricted a sense. By it the Poet would indicate evidently, not youth in opposition to manhood, but the period of still fresh unbroken strength, in opposition to the period of broken and diminished vitality. He would then understand manhood as included in youth. He would not exclude the thought that it may be wholesome, in a certain sense, for the old to bear the yoke. He means only that the time of vigorous strength is especially the time when bearing the yoke may be of advantage. For then a man is pre-eminently pliable. Then can he learn, in the school of the cross, things that will be of the greatest use to him in his later life. [CALVIN understands the yoke as that of instruction, instead of chastisement; submission to the teacher. So the Chaldee paraphrases explain it. But the whole context requires us to understand the yoke of affliction and submission to Divine Providence. See especially the following verses, 28-33.—W. H. II.]

J. D. MICHAELIS has concluded from this verse, that Jeremiah wrote it when a young man. It seems to me that there is some truth at the foundation of this remark. In this third chapter the person of the speaker stands out in the foreground. In the connection of this chapter, then, this expression can certainly be better understood in the mouth of a man in the vigor of his strength, than in the mouth of an old man. Since then Jeremiah, at the time of the capture of Jerusalem, stood at the very least on the threshold of old age, having a ministry of forty-two years behind him, which he had begun rather after, than before, or at his twentieth year (see Introduction to Jer. Proph., p. xiii.), therefore this place is rather against than for Jeremiah's authorship of this Song. [Is it natural for a young man to talk about patiently and silently bearing a yoke? Is it not natural for an old man, looking back upon a long experience, to recognize the benefit of early crosses and afflictions? Could we imagine anything more likely to be said by the pious Prophet in his old age, than what is here said? And is it not just what his personal sufferings that begun in his youth long before Jerusalem was destroyed, would have led him to say? And, finally, do we not recognize everywhere in these Lamentations, the spirit of one who has been long a stranger to happiness, who,—unlike the young man, strong, sanguine and self-reliant,—has lost all hope save a hope in God, looking far onwards into the hidden future, that is to be waited for in silent passive, submission?—WORDSWORTH: "The sentiment before us is very appropriate to Jeremiah, who had been chastened in early life by God, and had thus learnt a lesson of patience and cheerful resignation under the severest personal afflictions; and he here recognizes the benefit of that early discipline."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 28. He sitteth alone and keepeth silent.—The bearing of the yoke is not unconditionally wholesome for a man, but only when it is done in the right way. That is no right and wholesome way of bearing the cross, when one is impatient and perverse, and desires to shake off the yoke. Rather, the yoke should be borne in silent and patient submission.—The sitting alone is in opposition to cheerful intercourse with men. This Jeremiah himself makes explicitly conspicuous, when he says, xv. 17, "I sat not in the assembly of the joyful [E. V., the mockers], nor rejoiced; I sat alone, because of Thy hand: for Thou hast filled me with indignation." Only in silence and solitude do Divine chastisements affect the heart. Whoever permits himself to be diverted by the noise of the world, drowns the voice of God, which speaks to our heart by means of the yoke. Compare, besides, i. 1; Lev. xiii. 46.—And is silent: comp. ii. 10, 18; Jer. xlvii. 6; xlviii. 2.—Because he hath borne it upon him,—when [because] He imposed it on him. The old translators (SEPT., JEROME, SYRIAC) have taken the verb in the sense of taking upon one's self [so E. V., CALVIN and OWEN], because they thought, the subject being wanting, the subject of the immediately preceding verbs must be supplied. But the Hebrew verb (שָׁבַר), as also (שָׁבַר) means toltere, imponere [to lay upon, to impose]. The whole context readily supplies Jehovah as the subject, and the word itself gives the object. [BROUGHTON, HENDERSON, NOYES and GERLACH, all agree with NÆGELSBACH, in taking the verb in an active sense, and in making God the subject of the verb,—because, or when He laid it upon him. CALVIN, evidently dissatisfied with his own rendering, confesses that the expression does not seem natural to him, and suggests another reading. NOYES remarks that

"the name of God is understood, as often in Job," and refers to his note on Job iii. 20.—W. H. H.]

[LUTHER, PAREAU, DE WETTE, MAURER, THENIUS and NOYES, make vers. 28-30 dependent on '2, that, in verse 27, and expository of the meaning of bearing the yoke. It is good that a man bear the yoke in his youth, that he sit alone and is silent, etc., that he put his mouth in the dust, etc., that he give his cheek to him that smiteth him, etc. This gives a good sense; but the emphatic idea in ver. 27, is,—not that a man bear the yoke, but that he bear it in his youth; it is hardly possible, therefore, that vers. 28-30 can be an expansion of ver. 27, without showing why it is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth. We are compelled, therefore, to interpret vers. 28-30, independently of ver. 27.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 29. He putteth his mouth in the dust.—This expression is found only here. It is different from the expression lick the dust (Ps. lxxii. 9; Mic. vii. 17; Is. xlix. 23). For whilst the latter denotes only the lowest degree of subjection, the former denotes likewise speechlessness, since he who has put his mouth in the dust cannot speak. Yet it is not meant that he who is humbled in the dust cannot say anything at all. Only he shall restrain himself from murmuring. Ejaculations of humble imploring prayer may be extorted from the heart. As such an ejaculation we must regard the words—if so be there may be hope,—perhaps there is hope. For if we take these as the words of the Poet, then we cannot understand why they occur just here. They would in that case stand as well or better at the end of ver. 30, in place of he is filled full with reproach. Here at the close of ver. 29, they are only in place, if they can be brought into organic union with the first member of the verse. This is done if we take them as what the humbled one is permitted to say, or rather to think, in spite of his putting his mouth in the dust. I do not on this account think, that we should supply לֹאֲכַר, saying, for it would illy suit to say—he becomes dumb speaking. We must, therefore, understand the sentence, as indeed a declaration of the humbled one, but as an independent exclamation, not grammatically connected with the preceding sentence.

Ver. 30. If the three propositions, vers. 28-30, be compared one with another, a certain gradation will be perceived. For sitting alone and silent is comparatively easy. To put the mouth in the dust and yet to hope, is more difficult. But the hardest of all, without question, is to present the cheek to the smiter and patiently accept the full measure of disgrace that is to come upon us.—He giveth—offers—his cheek to him that smiteth him.—By him that smiteth him we are not to understand, exclusively and immediately, God. For God smites not immediately, but by the instrumentality of men. "The Lord hath bidden him," said David in reference to the revilings of Shimei (2 Sam. xvi. 11). For the sense, see Job xvi. 10; Matt. v. 39. [CALVIN: "There are many who submit to God when they perceive His hand; as, for instance, when any one is afflicted with a disease, he knows that it is a chastisement that proceeds from God; when pestilence happens, or famine, from the inclemency of the weather, the hand of God appears to them; and many then conduct themselves in a suitable manner: but when an enemy meets one, and when injured, he instantly says, 'I have now nothing to do with God, but that wicked enemy treats me disgracefully.' It is then for this reason that the Prophet shows that the patience of the godly ought to extend to injuries of this kind."—He is filled full with reproach.—[CALVIN: "There are two kinds of injuries; for the wicked either treat us with violence, or assault us with reproaches; and reproach is the bitterest of all things, and inflicts a most grievous wound on all ingenuous minds."]

Ver. 31-33. The triad now following states the reason why it is good not to despair in trouble, but to persevere in silent hope. The reason is contained in three specifications; or, more correctly, in two, the second of which is shown in two particulars.

Ver. 31. The first reason is a negative one. For the Lord [Adonai, not Jehovah. Yet see Intr., Add. Rem., p. 32.] will not cast off for ever.—The same expression as Ps. lxxvii. 8; comp. xlv. 24; lxxiv. 1. CALVIN: "It is certain there will be no patience, except there be hope . . . As patience cherishes hope, so hope is the foundation of patience; and hence consolation is, ac-

ording to Paul, connected with patience; Rom. xv. 4."]

Ver. 32. The second reason contains two particulars. The first is a positive one: the compassion of God after He has a long time smitten, will yet appear again. But though he cause grief, yet will he have compassion according to the multitude of his mercies.—For if He has afflicted, then is He moved to compassion according to His great mercy. With regard to the meaning, see Hos. vi. 1, Job v. 18; 1's. xxx. 6 (5). [See also Is. liv. 7, 8; Ps. lxxxix. 32-34.]

Ver. 33. The second particular of the second reason is expressed in a negative form: God must, after He has smitten, have compassion again, because chastisement is not with Him an end, but a means. The essential disposition of His heart is love. Therefore chastisement is not the proper or true expression of His feeling towards us. For he doth not afflict willingly [marg., from his heart], nor grieve—yet He grieves [and grieves.—W. II. II.] the children of men.—From the heart: Not out of His heart, but if we may be allowed to speak of God anthropopathically, chastisement comes from His head. The antithesis indicated here is not expressed in the context [willingly, see Num. xvi. 28]. For the sense, see Ps. cxix. 75; Jer. xxxii. 41; Deut. xxviii. 63.

III. 34-39.

34, 35 To crush under his feet all the prisoners of the earth. To turn aside the 36 right of a man before the face of the Most High. To subvert a man in his cause, 37 the Lord approveth not. Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the 38 Lord commandeth it not? Out of the mouth of the Most High proceedeth not 39 evil and good? Wherefore doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins?

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 34-36.—The three infinitives which begin these verses, can only depend on רָאָה. But רָאָה in connection with אָל or עַל has the meaning of intueri in aliquid, fixing the eyes on something (Is. xvii. 7; Ex. v. 21). Owing to the affinity between אָל, עַל, and ל (See Ew., § 217, c, d, i), ל רָאָה can be used for אָל רָאָה. So Ps. lxxiv. 6, and here [GERLACH refers also to 1 Sam. xvi. 7]. The necessity of choosing a word beginning with ל, on account of the alphabetical arrangement, has here at any rate decidedly prevailed. [NEUMANN, according to GERLACH, makes these infinitives dependent on לָא of ver. 33, God does not willingly allow all that Israel suffers; but this involves great difficulty in interpreting last clauses of vers. 35, 36.—W. II. II.]

Ver. 34.—רָאָה does not occur in the Kal, Jeremiah uses it once in the Pual, xlv. 10.—The suffix in רָאָה (the peculiar opinion of OTTO, who takes it as synonymous with "לפני, we dismiss), can only be referred to the subject concealed in רָאָה. Use the Participle instead of the Infinitive, and the reference is instantly plain.—אָכַר Jeremiah never uses.

Ver. 35.—The phrase הָטָה כִּשְׁפֹט כֹּף never occurs in Jeremiah. [Yet he was most familiar with it, especially in his favorite book of Deuteronomy.—W. II. II.] He uses הָטָה many times in another sense, v. 25; vi. 12; vii. 24, etc.—כִּשְׁפֹט, comp. מִשְׁפֹּט אֱבֹיֹנִים, Jer. v. 28.—עֲלִיוֹן as a name of God, not in Jeremiah; he uses the word only twice, in a local sense xx. 2; xxxiv. 10. [See Intr., Add. Rem. p. 32.]

Ver. 36.—עֵיִת, only Fiel, Pual and Hithp., occur. The word does not occur at all in Jeremiah. In Lamentations the substantive עֵיִתָּה, ver. 59, is also found.—רִיב, Jer. xv. 10; xxv. 31, etc.—The construction עֵיִתָּה פְּרִיבֹ אָרָם פְּרִיבֹ seems to be chosen to vary the phrase from ver. 35; for elsewhere we find only עֵיִת כִּשְׁפֹטָ (Job viii. 3; xxxiv. 12), עֵיִתָּה (Job viii. 3), or כֹּף רָרָה (Ps. cxlvi. 9).

Ver. 37.—[רָהָה]. NÆGELSACH in his Grammar refers to a similar use of 3d Pers. Fem. Sing. of verb in Jud. x. 9; 1 Sam. xxx. 6, וְהָעֵרָ לִי, Jer. vii. 31; xix. 5, וְעֵלְתָה עַל-לְבַי, Jer. xlv. 21, וְהָעֵלְתָה עַל-לְבַבִּי, and Josh. xi. 20; 2 Kings xxiv. 3, הִיִּתָה. The last two examples show that OWEN is wrong when he says that this verb is "probably always masculine, when it has this meaning," and should, therefore, be taken here as second person masculine.—W. II. II.]

Ver. 33.—I do not think that ver. 33 depends on אָמַר in ver. 37, as LUTHER translates, Who then may say, that such a thing is done without the Lord's command, and that neither evil nor good comes out of the mouth of the Most High? For אָמַר in ver. 37 is not merely to say, but it involves here the abstract idea of command, which does not need an object following after it, in order to define it. But ver. 33 must be taken independently as a question. See Exeg. notes below on ver. 36.—רָעוּת, Jer. xlv. 9.

Ver. 29.—חַי רַם רָם reminds us of the grammatical construction of חַי רָם, Ps. xlii. 3; lxxxiv. 3; 2 Kings xix. 4, 16. Jeremiah uses the adjective חַי only in the formula of an oath, "חַי; or, אֲנִי חַי, iv. 2; v. 2; xii. 16, etc.: in xxxviii. 2, it seems to be a verb,—see at that place.—רָם רָם, see i. 8; Jeremiah uses neither in the singular nor in the plural.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 34-39. We have already, at ver. 30, discriminated between an indirect and an immediate chastisement. It is there left undecided, which may be intended. But this point remaining uncertain must now be made plain. All the grounds of consolation, brought together in what precedes, must be acknowledged as valid and substantial. But they apply only to such sorrows as those of which God is esteemed the immediate author. But how is it with those sorrows which the malice of men inflict upon us? The opinion might arise, that these evils befall us without the intervention of God, and that He takes no notice of them. Yet these evils are very numerous; and what consolation can be afforded against these evils from what is said in vers. 25-33, to those who are suffering under the hand of God? To this question it is now explicitly answered, in vers. 37, 38, that nothing in the world is done without God's will, that no man has the power to act with absolute creative independence, that both good and bad fortune depend on the will of the Lord. Consequently there is no reason for sighing despairingly over any calamity, whatever it may be. There is no absolute misfortune—except sin! All sorrow of the heart then concentrates itself on the source of evil, on wickedness.

Ver. 34. To crush—to trample—under his feet.—The pronoun his must refer to the subject of the infinitive to crush. [OWEN absurdly refers it to man in the last verse, where the last words literally are children of man.—W. H. H.] All the prisoners of the earth.—This cannot mean literally all the prisoners on the whole earth. This is evident from the use of the verb to see (רָאָה), ver. 36, in the perfect tense. The Poet can only have in his eye real, concrete circumstances. Only those prisoners can be intended, already spoken of above, i. 3, 5, 18. אֶרֶץ, earth, [improperly translated land, by BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD and HENDERSON] is not against this; see Ps. xlv. 4; xxxvii. 3. DELITZSCH at this place, GES. Theol., p. 154. [BLAYNEY'S arguments that the prisoners intended are those held and enslaved for debt, could satisfy no one but himself.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 35. To turn aside the right of a man—to bend the right of a man [i. e., to deprive a man of his legal rights.—W. H. H.]. See Ex. xxiii. 6; Deut. xvi. 19; xxiv. 17; xxvii. 19; 1 Sam. viii. 3; comp. Prov. xvii. 23; xviii. 5; Is. x. 2.—Before the face of the Most High.—The author thinks here of the omnipresent and omniscient God, who enthroned on high looks far down on Heaven and earth (Ps. cxlii. 5, 6).

[BLAYNEY translates רָאָה (the Most High) here a superior: asserting that it cannot refer to God, because no one can wrest judgment where He is the Judge. The meaning evidently is, however, to pervert judgment at earthly tribunals, though this is done, as it were, before the very face of the Most High, who sees all things and is present everywhere.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 36. To subvert.—The word means to bend, to bend down, and is used both in reference to persons (Job xix. 6; Ps. cxix. 78; Eccl. vii. 13), and things (Am. viii. 5; Job viii. 3, etc.). A man in his cause—in his law-suit. The Lord approveth (marg., seeth) not. Has not the Lord seen that? In this sentence the signification of the verb and the form of the proposition are doubtful. As regards the meaning of the verb רָאָה, I do not believe it can be taken in the sense of choosing, preferring (see Gen. xli. 33; Dent. xii. 13; 2 Sam. xxiv. 13); or in a sense derived from that meaning, agreeing to, allowing (EWALD). For where רָאָה has the meaning of choosing, there are always a number of objects placed before the sight, among which the subject, after looking round by way of examination, makes his choice. But it cannot be said that where God permits the injustice done by men, He has positively chosen it. [The learned and sagacious commentator, in the heat of his argument, has made a singular blunder. The proposition is not necessarily a question, involving an affirmative answer, but may be a direct affirmation, that God does not approve, choose, or look with favor on such injustice

(רָאָה לֹא).—W. H. H.] Further, this sense would not suit the construction of the infinitive with לְ depending on רָאָה (see Gram. note, vers. 34-36, above). We are obliged then to take this verb in its natural, original sense of seeing. But in that case it is clear that the proposition must be taken as a question, as in verse 38. For it were a contradiction to say, the perverting of the right before the face of the Most High, the Lord does not see. What is done before the face of the Lord, He cannot fail to see. This is the very basis of the argument. If there were anything which the Lord doth not see, we might allow that that particular thing was done without His consent. But since He sees everything, then must everything that is done, be done with His consent. The absence of the interrogation is no more remarkable than at ver. 38. See for example Job ii. 10, my Gr., § 107, 1. The perfect form of the verb, רָאָה, shows that the Poet had here especially in mind the oppression that had befallen Israel and the Prophet. He would say, Must not the Lord have seen all the misery which the Israelites had suffered as captives, or by the injustice of the mighty, all the misery especially which had extorted from the Poet the foregoing lamentation? If he had had in his eye, not the concrete and actual, but merely general and possible facts, he would, without doubt, have used רָאָה, as BÜTTCHER has remarked. See below נִצְּחָה, ver. 33. [The English version, the Lord approveth not; or as BROUGHTON has it, the Lord liketh not, is undoubtedly correct, and is adopted by BLAYNEY (who translates the verb seeth not, but explains it in the sense of not approving), BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON and WORDSWORTH. It avoids the harsh and arbitrary explanation of supposing vers. 34-35, the language of an objector, who affirms the Lord doth not regard these acts of oppression and injustice, as CALVIN and OWEN suggest. It also avoids the equally arbitrary assumption of NÆGELSACH, GERLACH and NOYES, that these words are put interrogatively. There is nothing in the form or context to suggest a question. Ver. 38 is no parallel to this case: for there the question is suggested by the question that precedes and the question that follows it: the whole triplet is in the interrogative style. It is dangerous to allow the right to assume an interrogation for the sake of surmounting a difficulty. Were this license generally accepted, the Bible could be made to teach the very reverse of what it does teach, by assuming that its positive affirmations, are interrogations emphasizing the contradiction of what is apparently asserted. The opinion that רָאָה means to view with pleasure, preference or approbation, only when followed by the preposition בְּ, has been so generally accepted, that Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER hesitated to give רָאָה followed by לְ that meaning in Is. liii. 2. Yet only that meaning suits that passage: and in 1 Sam. xvi. 7, we have רָאָה with לְ twice in this exact meaning of regarding with pleasure, with favor, with approbation,—"man looketh on the outward appearance, but Jehovah looketh on the heart." It will be found on examination of those passages where רָאָה is construed with בְּ, that the preposition intensifies the sense and seems to denote looking steadfastly at a thing, feasting the eyes upon it with inward delight, or with exultation as over a prostrate foe. But רָאָה without בְּ, is also used to express the idea of looking at a thing with indulgence and allowance, where no special complacency is implied. It is thus used here, and in exactly the same sense that it has in Hab. i. 13, "Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil," כִּירוֹתָ רָעַת. WORDSWORTH: "The sense is,—For a man to crush under his feet all the captives of the earth (as the Chaldeans crushed indiscriminately their Hebrew captives, without regard to sex or age), to pervert a man's cause in the face of the Most High, to subvert a man in his cause—this the Lord does not look on with approval. For He is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 37. Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the Lord commandeth it not?—Who is he that spoke and it was done, unless the Lord commanded it? [NOYES: "Who is he that can command anything to be done, so that it shall be effected, unless Jehovah permit or order it to be done?"] This verse affords the proof that the evils, enumerated in vers. 34-35, had not befallen those who suffered them, without God's consent. This verse reminds us that there is only one single absolute creative causality; for the words יְהוָה אָמַר [He said—and there was] do, without doubt, refer to the creative-word (Gen. i. 3, etc.). Were there a man of whom it could be said,—He spoke and it was done, He commanded and it stood fast (Ps. xxxiii. 9), then it might be possible that those evils had befallen Israel at his command, and not Jehovah's. Evidently the Poet has in mind these words just quoted from Ps. xxxiii. 9, although he quotes from memory as appears from the substitution of יְהוָה for יְהוָה. But see the femin. in such cases, my Gr., § 60, 6 b [see Gram. note above]. The second clause of ver. 37 is evidently suggested by the second clause of Ps. xxxiii. 9, only it is changed into a negative sentence, which serves likewise to define the implied negative of the first clause. There are some, indeed, in reference to whom the expression יְהוָה אָמַר [he spoke and it came to pass] might in a certain sense be used, but only when the Lord has also commanded what is done. There is no one whose will is efficient without the consent and command of the Lord. The explanation, Who then may say, that such a thing is done without the Lord's command? (LUTHER, ROSENMUELLER and others), is ungrammatical. It ignores the imperfect with Wav consecut. [The thought is the same as in Amos iii. 6, Shall there be evil in a city, and the LORD hath not done it?—OWEN gives an entirely new version. Who is he who says, That Thou art! Lord who dost not command? This is on the assumption that vers. 34-38 contain the sentiments of an objector, whose argument now is, in vers. 37, 38, "that God as a Lord or Sovereign does not command or order events, and for this reason, because both evil and good cannot come from Him." This interpretation, harsh, difficult and against authority, could only be accepted in case רָאָה לֹא, ver. 36, must mean does not see, regard or observe, and not does not approve, (see notes, ver. 36), and also in case יְהוָה in this verse, must be rendered as 2d person masculine, and not 3d person feminine (see Gram. note above).—The connection of this triplet with the preceding one, according to Dr. NÆGELSACH's interpretation of ver. 36,—has not the Lord seen that?—is very obvious. But it is no objection to the other interpretation—the Lord does not approve, that these three verses recognize God's agency in the evils that befall men. It is the problem constantly recurring in the Bible, that God does not approve of oppression and injustice, and yet God makes sin the punishment of sin. No one can sinfully injure his neighbor with God's approbation: and yet the injury he does is God's providential chastisement of transgressors.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 38. Out of the mouth of the Most High proceedeth not evil and good?—Does not out of the mouth of the Most High the evil and the good? If there is no one who is able to make his will efficient without God's permission, then follows necessarily the general proposition, that everything, as well evil as good, proceeds from the mouth of God, i. e., is done by God's command. It certainly is not the Poet's intention here to suggest any reflections on the origin of moral evil. He has in his eye, according to the whole context, only the contrast of prosperity and adversity. By the evil he means physical evil or misfortune, and by the good—physical good or happiness. And although misfortune is frequently a consequence of moral evil, according to vers. 34-36, yet he regards this consequence only with reference to its bearing on human welfare, and not with reference to its causation. What he wishes to say is, that the Lord permits wrong and violence, as well as those actions that tend to promote happiness, in order, according as His purpose may be, to chastise or to bless. But he did not intend to say that God had positively willed what is evil, although the signification of evil is not exhausted in the idea of chastisement.

Ver. 39. Since happiness and misfortune are both equally willed of God, both must be good, and nothing belonging to either of them should cause us to murmur. As a man who has brought upon himself wholesome sickness by means of bitter medicine, ought not to complain of that medicine, but should blame himself for having caused the necessity of using it, so a man should not complain of the evils which befall him, for these are only the necessary means of curing the sickness of sin, of which he himself is guilty. If he will lament, let him lament for his sin. See Jer. xxx. 15.—Wherefore doth a living man complain (marg., murmur).—For what sighs the man who lives? The verb, רָחַץ, is respirare, gemere, to sigh with the kindred idea of murmuring, Num. xi. 1, which is the only place except this, where the word occurs. The expression a living man, חַי אָדָם, is difficult. It cannot be taken, with PAREAU and ROSENMUELLER, as synonymous with אָדָם, a man, in which case חַי, living, would be, properly speaking, superfluous. Neither can it be taken for חַיִּית, vita, life, in which case the sense would be cur queritur homo vitam scil. calamitosam (MAURER) [why complains man of life, i. e., because it is calamitous]? As little can it be called as long as he lives (J. D. MICHAELIS); or, although he lives, since he yet lives and could do something better than sigh (EWALD). The only sense corresponding to the context is, what does the man as a living one sigh for? As a living one, i. e., as one who still finds himself in this life's school of discipline. How should we in the time appointed for affliction mourn over our afflictions? A living man should not allow himself to be surprised by "the fiery trial" as if thereby some strange thing happened unto him (1 Peter iv. 12): only that happens to him which is natural and inevitable. A man for the punishment of his sins?—Every one on account of his sins. This can only be the answer to the question proposed in the first member of the verse, designed to rectify the evil in view,—not sufferings, but sins should be lamented.

[The difficulties of this verse are great, as is evident from the variety of translations and interpretations it has suffered. Four questions are to be answered. 1. The meaning of the verb rendered complain or murmur? 2. The force of חַי, living? 3. The sense in which a man, אָדָם, of the second member of the verse is to be taken? 4. Whether the whole verse composes one question, or includes a question and a responsive exhortation or a question and a simple answer?—1. The meaning of the verb רָחַץ? ABEN EZRA derived it from רָחַץ, and rendered it by רָחַץ, to lie (see CALVIN, FUERST, GERLACH). Hence MÜNSTER, taking ver. 38 as a denial of Divine Providence, explains ver. 39 thus: blasphemia hæc vox est 'mentiturque homo in peccatis suis,'—this is a blasphemous saying 'and man is a liar in his sins' (GERLACH). ISAACKI derived the verb from רָחַץ (FUERST). From this root possibly, by some far-fetched analogy, BROUGHTON brought his unique translation, which has the sole merit of relieving us of the difficulty of explaining a living man, חַי אָדָם, and a man, אָדָם, by making one the subject, and the other the object of the verb,—what should living man grudge any person after his sin? But what this means the learned Hebraist has not explained. CALVIN is very positive that the word here and in Numbers, means weary one's self. "Why should he weary himself, a living man, and a man in his sins? for as long as men thus remain in their own dregs, they will never acknowledge God as the judge of the world, and thus they always go astray through their own perverse imaginations." Others render it in a similar sense: "Why doth he afflict himself by his sins? Why doth he procure evils to himself by the committing of sin?"—"Why doth he vex himself?" (to wit, by impatient carriage under God's hand), even a man in his sin, persisting still in the same" (see GATAKER). The Versions and Lexicographers, however, with great unanimity, and apparent reason, derive the verb from רָחַץ, to breathe hard, to sigh, and take it in the sense of murmuring, complaining, as above. There is no room to doubt that this is its meaning. 2. What is the force of חַי. PAREAU and ROSENMUELLER, deny that this word is emphatic. They claim that חַי, alone, is used for man, referring to Ps. cxliii. 2, and regard אָדָם, added here, as a mere redundancy of language by Jeremiah, who was not chary of words, verborum non parcior. We are then to take the expression living man, as meaning simply a man, as we often say living man, or mortal man where the adjective is superfluous: (ROSENMUELLER translates the text simply mortalis.) To this we answer 1. The word חַי in Ps. cxliii. 2, is emphatic:—None living, i. e., no living man is just, or innocent in God's sight. The inference may be allowed, possibly intended, that those not now living may have passed into a state of innocency in God's sight. 2. The position of the word after אָדָם (reminding us, as NÆGELSBACH says, of חַי אָדָם, see gram. note above) and also the accent it bears* show that the word is emphatic. In this case it is difficult to assign any other

* OWEN, in utter violation of the accents, connects חַי with אָדָם, and translates,

Why complain should man,
Any man alive, for his sin?

meaning to it, than that which EWALD and most commentators do, why sighs man living, i. e., since he lives. Dr. NÆGELSBACH says it cannot have this meaning: but he gives no reason why it cannot: and his own translation involves this sense, (what does a man sigh for who lives, der lebt?) while his explanation in the commentary, man as a living one (als ein Lebender), "i. e., as one who still finds himself in this life's school of discipline," adds to the original, and what he calls impossible idea, of one who yet lives, another and fanciful notion of his own. MICHAELIS, EWALD, GERLACH, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON and NOYES, all agree in the sense which our English Version seems to suggest, which WORDSWORTH also adopts and explains thus: "Wherefore does a man, whose life is still spared by God's mercy, and to whom, therefore, the door of repentance and pardon is not yet closed, murmur (see Num. xi. 1, where the same word, literally signifying to breathe hard, is used), instead of using his breath and life in order to pray for forgiveness, and to amend his practice?"

3. In what sense are we to take נִנְּרָ, a man, in the second member of the verse? While אָדָם is the generic name for man in the widest sense, נִנְּרָ is supposed to be a more distinctive and honorable designation, as implying a man possessed of manly qualities. Some suppose that it is used emphatically here in this sense, as BLAYNEY suggests. Since most languages have a variety of words signifying man, most of the Versions render אָדָם of the first member, and נִנְּרָ of the second, by terms of corresponding significance, as if intending to express an emphasis in the last term,—ἀνδρῶπος, ἀνὴρ; homo, vir; Mensch, Mann,—a distinction that seems to be aimed at in English in a version given by GATAKER, Why should a living wight complain, or murmur, any man for his sin? This distinction, if intended, would give a good sense, Why should a living man, a truly manly man murmur at the punishment of his sins? The Arabic gives the following sense: He who dissolves himself in lamentations and sighs, is a weak man; the strong man is ashamed of his sins (Prediger-Bible). CORN. VAN WAENEN, according to ROSENUELLER, inferred from the Arabic that נִנְּרָ has the sense of being affected with shame, and joining it to נִנְּרָ in spite of the strong disjunctive accent, translated thus: Why does the mean man (homo vilis) dissolve himself in lamentations? The noble man (vir nobilis) will restrain himself for shame on account of his crimes. But there are no proofs or analogies for this strongly contrasted use of אָדָם and נִנְּרָ. We can, however, take נִנְּרָ here, as Dr. NÆGELSBACH does, in a sense that אָדָם often has, of every one, each man individually considered. See Joel ii. 8; Jer. xvii. 5, 7; Jos. vii. 14, 17, 18; 1 Chron. xxiii. 3. There are many other passages where the word may be rendered every man or every one. GESENIUS gives it this meaning in our text. This rendering prevents the necessity of breaking up the verse into two separate and distinct members. 4. Does the whole verse include a single question? Many versions take the first member as a question, and the second as a responsive exhortation. So the old Geneva, which NOYES adopts: Wherefore then murmureth the living man? Let him murmur at his own sins! GERLACH's objections to this are well taken. The antithesis would then require that in the question some cause of murmuring should be stated, which the prophet would indicate as an improper one; as, 'Wherefore murmureth living man on account of his misfortunes? Let him murmur on account of his sins.' It may be said that the cause may easily be inferred from the context. Still it would seem strange that such an important antithesis was not distinctly expressed. Besides, this rendering makes it necessary, not only to repeat the verb contained in the first member and not expressed in the second, but to change it from the Indicative mood to the Imperative, why does he murmur, let him murmur. These difficulties are overcome by taking the verse as a question and a simple answer, not expressed in a hortatory form. So Dr. NÆGELSBACH: Why does the man who lives mourn? Every one on account of his sins. So MAURER, quoted by GERLACH, quid i. e., cur queritur homo dum vivit? Unusquisque ob peccata sua. Hinc ille lacryme! Peccatis sibi quisque contraxit de quibus queritur mala. "Why does man mourn whilst he lives? Every one on account of his sins. Hence those tears! By his sins each one has brought on himself the evils he complains of." A great objection to dividing this verse into question and answer is, that it mars the rhythmical parallelism which is a peculiar feature of this poem [see Intr., Add. Rem., p. 23], and quite destroys the remarkable and beautiful symmetry between the several verses of each triplet, which prevails in this part of the poem. For the same reason that each verse in this triplet should be a question, if one is, each verse ought to contain a question and an answer, if one does,—or else each verse should form an entire question by itself. Besides, the connection seems to require such a construction. The declarations that God does not inflict evil willingly, from His heart, that He does not look with favor on oppression and injustice, and yet that nothing comes to pass without His permission, whether it be evil or good, prepares us for the question, Why then does man murmur when he suffers in the righteous Providence of God for his sins? Why should living man—man whose life is mercifully spared—complain or murmur, every one on account of his sins, i. e., of the effects of his sins? The idea of dividing the sentence into a question and response arose, undoubtedly, from the difficulty of taking נִנְּרָ in the usual sense of a man. But by rendering it every one, and remembering that אָדָם is generic, like homo, ἀνδρῶπος, Mensch, and can be best expressed in English by men, as even in German LUTHER rendered it, Wie murren denn die Leute im Leben also? the apparent difficulty of construction entirely disappears. Why should living men complain or murmur, every one on account of his sins? There can be no valid objection to understanding sins as put for their effects, the sufferings or punishment they involve. So most of the versions and interpreters. Or we can take sin in the sense of guilt, liability to punishment. WORDSWORTH: "Literally, for his sins—for his own fault. Why does the sinner murmur at God for that which he has brought on himself by his own sin, and which may be removed by repentance?

See what follows."—The Future form of the verb implies here a conditional sense, why should, etc. —W. II. II.]

III. 40-42.

40 Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the LORD. Let us lift 41 up our heart with our hands unto God in the heavens. We have transgressed 42 and have rebelled: thou hast not pardoned.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 40.—רָפְעֵת, perforare, pervestigare, is not found in Jeremiah. See Ps. lxiv. 7; Prov. ii. 4; xx. 27.—רָקַרְךָ, fodere, eruere, perscrutari, occurs in Jer. xvii. 10; xxxi. 37.—[GERLACH: "The LXX have taken the forms רָפְעֵת and רָקַרְךָ for fem. part. niph."]—עָדָה is emphatic, EWALD, 217, c. let us go back, not half way, but the whole. [ROSENMUELLER and THENIUS deny that it is emphatic, and represent it as equivalent to אֵל. GERLACH agrees with NÆGELSBACH, and refers to Hos. xiv. 2, 3, where both prepositions stand side by side with a difference of meaning not to be mistaken.]

Ver. 41.—אֶל־לְבָבֵנוּ is cumulative, as Lev. xviii. 18; Ez. xliv. 7. [Also Ez. vii. 26. The unusual use of this preposition led the Rabbins to fanciful interpretations of the text. Some have put upon it the mystical sense, lift up our heart to our hands, in order to second prayer with practice, (GATAKER).—W. II. II.]—לִבְבֵנוּ אֶל־בְּשָׂמֵינוּ occurs only here. See Deut. iii. 24; 1 Kings viii. 23.

Ver. 42.—נִתְּנָה, only occurs six times in the Old Testament, viz., besides here, Gen. xlii. 11; Ex. xvi. 7, 8; Num. xxxii. 33; 2 Sam. xvii. 12, seems to be chosen here only for the sake of the acrostic. [Very likely; yet, as a master of art, the Poet has made the necessity of the choice subserv the force and beauty of thought and expression. (הַתְּנָה) and נִתְּנָה, both expressed, are emphatic and antithetical.—W. II. II.]—עָדָה in Jer. ii. 8, 29; iii. 13, etc.—כִּי־רָדָה, See i. 18, 20; Jer. iv. 17, v. 23.—כָּל־יָמַי, frequently in Jer. v. 1, 7; xxxi. 34, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 39 constitutes the transition to something new. If there must be sighing, let it be sighing over sin says ver. 39. This exhortation is responded to in vers. 40-42, for these contain a penitential lamentation of the people for their sins. This shows that our explanation of the last member of ver. 39 is right. For, unless אֶת־חַטֹּאתֵינוּ, sin, be taken in the entirely inadmissible sense of punishment (MEIER, EWALD), [E. V. See notes on ver. 39], that second member of ver. 39 cannot be taken as a continuation of the question, but only in the sense of an affirmatory restriction, as we have done. It is to be observed, moreover, that the Poet here again speaks in the first person plural. We have shown above, at ver. 22 (תְּרַנְּנֵנוּ), that the consoling hope, declared in the passage beginning with ver. 22, rests directly upon the fact that the people is not extinct, that there is yet a kernel remaining which can serve as a point of connection for the restoration. After the Poet, on the ground of this matter of fact, which he regarded as a pledge for the continuance of Divine grace, had made known his hope, and declared likewise his convictions that sufferings were no real misfortune, and that not on their account, but for sin, should men sigh, it is entirely natural that he utters the penitential lamentation, enjoined in ver. 39, not in his own name alone, but in that of the whole people. For the sufferings, of which he had before spoken, were not in fact punishments for his sins; but they were the righteous chastisement of the sin of the whole people. The whole people then has to join in the penitential lamentation, which the Poet begins to sing in ver. 40.

Ver. 40. All true penitence must begin with acknowledgment of sin. But the knowledge of sin with men is the result of candid self-examination. Therefore, the penitential lamentation of the people begins with an exhortation to self-examination. Let us search and try our ways. Let us examine our ways and search. [Instead of murmuring against God, let us examine and search our conduct for the causes of God's displeasure and our misfortunes, in order to correct them.—W. II. II.]—And turn again to the LORD.—And return to Jehovah. The preposition in the Hebrew is forcible. [See Gram. note above]. Let us go, not half way back, but all the way back to Jehovah. Such a half-way return was, for example, the Reformation under Josiah; see Jer. iv. 1-4, and the remarks at that place. This idea of returning to Jehovah, as is well known, plays a very conspicuous role in Jeremiah; see iii. 1, 4, 12; viii. 4, 5; xxxi. 16-22, and the comments on those passages. [HENDERSON: "From the assumption of the plural in this and the immediately following verses, it is obvious that, in those which just precede, Jeremiah has in view the punishment to which the Jews, as a people, were subjected."]

Ver. 41. Let us lift up our heart with— together with — our hands unto God in the Heavens.—Without the lifting up of heart and hands to God there is naturally no right return to God imaginable. [CALVIN: "He bids us banish all hypocrisy from our prayers. * * When affliction comes, it is a common thing with all to raise up their hands to heaven, though no one should bid them to do so; but still their hearts remain fixed on the earth, and they come not to God. * * As prayers, when they are earnest, move the hands, our Prophet refers to that practice as useful. At the same time he teaches us that the chief thing ought not to be omitted, even to raise up the hearts to God; Let us, then, he says, raise up our hearts together with our hands to God; and, he adds, to God who is in Heaven: for it is necessary that men should rise up above the world and go out of themselves, so to speak, in order to come to God." It should not be overlooked that the Prophet connects the outward forms of expression with the heart's sincerity as constituting the prayer of true penitence. There is nothing here to encourage those to think that they pray, who discard the attitude and gestures and even words of prayer, and fancy that they pray in their hearts. That prayer is an unuttered desire, a trembling emotion of the soul, a sigh, a tear, the glancing of an eye,—are only poetical truths, and, in plain prose, are only half-truths, and, as sometimes understood, half-falsehoods. The Bible never separates the prayer of the heart from its formal expression in words and acts.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 42. The first half of the verse attains the summit of the succession of thoughts begun in ver. 40, and to which the path was broken in ver. 39.—We have transgressed and rebelled.—We have sinned and have been disobedient. [Rebelled is a better rendering. The pronoun we, doubly expressed in the original, as the first word in the sentence and in the forms of the verb, "is here emphatical, as though the faithful had taken on themselves the blame of all the evils, which the greater part ever sought to disown" (CALVIN). OWEN: "To give the proper emphasis to the pronoun, the version ought to be as follows, We, transgressed have we, and re- belled."—W. H. H.]—By these words the exhortation contained in last clause of ver. 39 is complied with, for they are the expression of a deep and sincere grief for sin. The second half of the verse constitutes, in a way similar to that of the last clause of ver. 39, the transition to what follows. For the words—Thou hast not pardoned—constitute an intermediate member between the two statements, which have respectively for their subjects, guilt and punishment. Guilt is followed with punishment, if not pardoned. That it is not pardoned in the present instance, this last clause of the verse declares.—Observe the pronouns answering to each other, We—Thou. [Both doubly expressed in the Hebrew. Both, therefore, emphatic.—W. H. H.]—Hence it is evident that the Poet does not wish to reproach the Lord, but, on the contrary, to make His proceedings conspicuous. [HENDERSON: "The confession is supposed to be made while the exile still continued. There is implied a fervent hope, that now it was made, the captivity would be reversed."—The breaking up of this verse into two distinct separate propositions is not such an injury to the versification as was deprecated in ver. 39. Because we have now passed the section where the symmetrical uniformity of the verses was to be preserved: because, again, this verse is a real transition to what follows, with which it is so intimately connected that GERLACH begins the new section with ver. 40: because, again, the We, וַיִּשְׁבְּ, and Thou, תִּשְׁמַר, preserve a perfect antithesis, and give us a parallelism in sentiment as well as in rhythm: and because, finally, the poetical effect of this abrupt appeal to God, like the sudden outburst at the end of i. 11, See, O Jehovah, and consider, justifies the departure from the stricter forms of construction.—W. H. H.]

PART III.

III. 43-66.

- ◻ VER. 43. Thou didst cover Thyself with wrath and pursue us, Thou didst slay,—Thou didst not pity.
- ◻ VER. 44. Thou didst cover Thyself with clouds
So that no prayer could pass through.
- ◻ VER. 45. Thou madest us offscourings and refuse
In the midst of the nations.
- ◻ VER. 46. All our enemies
Gaped at us with their mouth.
- ◻ VER. 47. Terror and the pit came upon us—
Desolation and destruction.
- ◻ VER. 48. Mine eye runneth down with streams of water
For the ruin of the daughter of my people.
- ◻ VER. 49. Mine eye overfloweth unceasingly, Without intermission,
- ◻ VER. 50. Until Jehovah from Heaven
Look down and behold.

- ʃ VER. 51. Mine eye paineth my soul
 Because of all the daughters of my city.
 ʃ VER. 52. They that were without cause my enemies Hunted me down like a bird.
 ʃ VER. 53. They destroyed in the pit my life
 And cast a stone over me.
 ʃ VER. 54. Waters flowed upon my head.
 I said,—I am lost!
 P VER. 55. I called upon thy name, O Jehovah,
 Out of the depths of the pit.

 Judge Thou my cause.
 7 VER. 60. Thou hast seen all their vengeance,
 All their devices against me.
 ʃ VER. 61. Thou hast heard their revilings, O Jehovah,
 All their devices against me.
 ʃ VER. 62. The lips of my enemies and their thoughts Against me, all the day long, ʃ VER. 63. Their sitting down and rising up, observe Thou;
 I am their song!
 7 VER. 64. Render to them a recompence, O Jehovah,
 According to the work of their hands.
 7 VER. 65. Give them blindness of heart.
 Thy curse on them!
 7 VER. 66. Pursue them in wrath and exterminate them
 From under the Heaven of Jehovah.

ANALYSIS.

The third part, vers. 43-66, is to be compared to the night returning again after the day. From ver. 43 to ver. 48, the Poet speaks in the first person plural. The whole people unite in describing the severe calamity suffered on account of God's wrath. From ver. 48 to the end, the Poet again speaks in the first person singular. But in the first part of this passage, in vers. 48-51, the common misfortune is still the subject of his lamentation. He begins again to speak of himself in ver. 52. He first describes, vers. 52-54, the terrible ill-treatment suffered at the hands of men, according to Jer. xxxviii. 6. Vers. 55-66 contain a prayer, so that this Song, as well as the first and second, closes with a prayer. This prayer is in three parts. Vers. 55-58, thanks for deliverance from the grave. Vers. 59-63, a statement of all the injury which his enemies had done, and were constantly doing to the Prophet. Vers. 64-66, a prayer for righteous vengeance. The symmetry of the external form, which we have observed in the middle section of the Song, is wanting here, as it is also in the first part of the Song. For according to the sense, first, five verses are connected together, vers. 43-47; then, four, vers. 48-51; then, three, vers. 52-54; finally, twelve, which are again separated into subdivisions of four, five and three verses. The articulations of the discourse no longer correspond with the triplets of verses: neither is the symmetry of the initial words carried out.

As the evening twilight gradually deepens into night, so the discourse of our Poet passes over from the bright day-light of consolation, which irradiates the noble central section of our book, back again into the gloomy description of those sufferings with which Israel and the Prophet of the Lord were punished. We stand at the threshold of the last of the three sections of the third Song. If not exactly, yet almost exactly has the Poet distributed the lights and shadows, so that the first and the last of the three parts contain the shadows, and the second one affords the light. For of the 66 verses of the chapter, 22 constitute a third part. But the middle section, after the transition verses, 19-21, extends from ver. 22 to ver. 40, after which vers. 40-42 follow as another transition, corresponding to the first one as the evening twilight does to the dawning of the morning. If we add both of these transition passages to the middle section, then the first of the three sections consists of 18, the second of 24, and the last again of 24 verses.

III. 43-47.

43 Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us: thou hast slain, thou hast not 44 pitied. Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass 45 through. Thou hast made us as the offscouring and refuse in the midst of the peo-46, 47 ple. All our enemies have opened their mouths against us. Fear and a snare is come upon us, desolations and destruction.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 43.—כִּכְרָךְ, which does not occur in Jeremiah, is used as a direct causative, as afterwards, ver. 41; See Ps. cxi. 8. [GERLACH: "Gesenius Thes., and Otto take כִּכְרָךְ as a reflective verb." Otto, quoted by ROSENMEYER, says Al recipere verbum כִּכְרָךְ usurpari possit, non dubium; but he prefers here to supply nos as the object of the verb. To make the pron. suf. in הִרְדִּיכְנִי the object of כִּכְרָךְ, however, is impossible, since the latter, when it has the meaning of covering, is always construed with עַל, or ל' affixed to its object.—W. H. II.]—כִּבְאֶרְךָ, see Jer. xxi. 5.—[לָלִי. HENDERSON: "Upwards of eighty MSS., twelve printed editions, the ALEX. copy of the LXX., the Arab., Syr., Vulg. and Targ., read לָלִי."]]

Ver. 44.—Jeremiah uses only the plural of כִּי, and that only once, iv. 13.—כִּי־בֹרַח הַפֶּלֶא, for the construction, see my Gr., § 106, 6. [The preposition כִּי is very peculiarly used as a negative. When the idea of motion from a place is involved, then that which is denied is connected with the verb simply by כִּי. NAEGELSACH'S Gr., § 103, 6.]

Ver. 45.—כִּהָהוּ, כִּהָהוּ, detergere, evertere, Est. xxvi. 4, is sweepings, dirt. It occurs only here. [In Is. v. 25 we have כִּיהָהוּ, sweeping, refuse, filth (J. A. ALEXANDER).—W. H. II.]—כִּאֲוֹכ־, as a substantive, only here. See EWALD, § 219, a.—Jeremiah expresses the thought contained in this verse in another fashion, see xv. 4; xxiv. 9; xxix. 18; xxxiv. 17; xlii. 18.—כִּי־בֹרַח הַפֶּלֶא seems to imply the dispersion of Israel among the nations. כִּי־בֹרַח is nowhere found in Jeremiah, he always uses instead בִּתְרוֹךְ, xii. 16; xxix. 32; xl. 1; xli. 8, etc.; once only he uses כִּי־בֹרַח, vi. 1, and besides כִּי־בֹרַח with suffixes frequently iv. 14; xiv. 9; xxxiii. 9, etc. [Certainly then כִּי־בֹרַח is not foreign to his style.—W. H. II.]

Ver. 47.—וּפְהַת־פְּהַר פְּהַר וְהַשְׁקֵר־וְהַשְׁמַת. The paronomasia, an imitation of וּפְהַת־פְּהַר, is an invention of our Poet, for it is found only here.—וְהַשְׁמַת, apparently from שָׁמַת, tumultuari, strepere, is contracted from וְהַשְׁמַת. In Num. xxiv. 17, is found שָׁמַת. The meaning seems to be the same as that of וְהַשְׁמַת, strepitulus, tumultus. See וְהַשְׁמַת, Jer. xlviii. 45, and the remarks at that place. Also וְהַשְׁמַת, Is. lix. 7; lx. 18.—וְהַשְׁמַת, see ver. 43; ii. 11, 13; iv. 10, is very frequent with Jeremiah, iv. 20; vi. 14; viii. 11, 21, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 43. Thou hast covered with anger, and persecuted us.—Thou madest out of Thy wrath a veil [or covering] and didst pursue us. As Thou hast not pardoned, ver. 42, constitutes a negative term of connection, so does Thou madest a covering of Thy wrath a positive one. For the veil of wrath with which the Lord covers Himself, conceals in its bosom the lightnings of wrath of which the Poet proceeds to speak. [The causative meaning given to the verb by Dr. NAEGELSACH, and implied, though not affirmed by GERLACH, is certainly possible (see Ps. xc. 4, לָךְ בְּאֶכְרְתֵי יָדְךָ לִי, lit., With his wing He will make, or provide, J. A. ALEXANDER, a covering for thee), and is strongly recommended here by the absence of an object expressed. He made a covering of the wrath and pursued us, is the same as saying, He enveloped Himself in His wrath and pursued us. The definite article before wrath, the wrath, points to Jehovah's wrath, and makes the reflective force of the verb more apparent. In the next verse, where the cloud does not specify any particular cloud, but only clouds generically, the expression of לָךְ, for Thyself, is more elegant. These slight grammatical distinctions can hardly be expressed in English, in which it is best to give the same form in both verses.—The purpose of the covering is not that of concealment, but of preparation for the pursuit of His enemies. He dismisses His pity and gathers His wrath around Him as a veil that covers the whole person, that He may slay and not pity. Or His wrath itself may be regarded as furnishing His weapons of offence, the armory out of which flash the lightnings of His wrath. Therefore the objection of J. D. MICHAELIS, BOETTNER and THENIUS, that he who conceals himself, does not pursue others (although a concealed enemy may, nevertheless, be a pursuer), is not valid. We must either take the verb in a causative or reflective sense, or supply לָךְ, Thyself, from the next verse. This last is exceedingly awkward. If the order of the verses was reversed, this might be tolerated, though even then it is inconsistent with the usual independent completeness of each separate verse in the Lamentations. But to say "Thou didst cover with wrath"—and then hold the mind in suspense, as to the object covered, till it is announced in the next verse, is awkward to say the least, and certainly has the effect, as THENIUS asserts, of throwing all that follows the word wrath into a parenthesis.—Our English Version and others which make us, at the end of the verse, the object of the covering cannot be correct if the verb is here used in the sense of covering (see Gram. note above). Some old expositors, alluded to by GATAKER, take the verb in the sense of being hedged in. BLAYNEY and OWEN take it in this sense, and suppose an allusion to the practice of hunters who surrounded their game with toils, and then attacked them. Thou hast fenced in with anger and chased us (BLAYNEY). Thou hast in wrath enclosed us and chased us (OWEN). But how can there be an allusion to this practice of hunters in the next verse, where they give the verb the same meaning,—Thou hast enclosed Thyself in a cloud (OWEN)? HENDERSON also, without allusion to hunting however, gives the verb in both verses a similar meaning, Thou hast shut us up in anger, —Thou hast shut Thyself up in a cloud. But the Hebrew verb when followed by the preposition ל, to, prefixed to the pronoun, as it is in the next verse, certainly means covering one's self with something, as with a garment or a veil. See ver. 44, note. Hence it is best to take it in the same sense in this verse.—W. H. H.]—Thou hast slain, thou hast not pitied.—Thou didst kill without mercy. [The E. V. is more literal. Many versions have spared, instead of pitied. The latter meaning is better here, and the more usual signification of the verb when not joined to a preposition. See ii. 2, 17.—W. H. H.] See ii. 21. Here begins the enumeration of the aggressive acts of the Divine punishment, through which the wrath, as it were, spent itself. See ver. 66; i. 6; Jer. xxix. 18, etc.

Ver. 44. Thou hast covered thyself with a cloud, that our prayer should not pass through.—Thou madest of the cloud a covering for Thyself that no prayer could pass through. See at ver. 8. The twice recurring verb כִּסִּיתָ, thou coveredst, has been differently interpreted. EWALD would take what follows the word wrath, in ver. 43, as a parenthesis. But these words closely connected with what precedes by † consecutive, contain no mere secondary thought. Others (LUTHER, THENIUS) translate, Thou hast covered (overwhelmed) us with wrath. But the verb has always and only the meaning of friendly sheltering, veiling or covering; of friendly, in that case we would expect at least פָּנֶיךָ [instead of פָּנֵיךָ, with wrath, instead of with the wrath]. But, aside from the constraint put upon the Poet by the alphabetical arrangement [inducing him to repeat the same word for the sake of the initial letter], I think that two grades or kinds of covering are indicated. The first was that, in consequence of which persecution and war came upon Israel,—the second was that, in consequence of which, God heard not the prayers addressed to Him amidst the calamity of war. In favor of this view is the twofold nature of the veils or coverings indicated. The first time it is the wrath with which the Lord envelops Himself. Out of this veil of wrath shoot forth the lightnings, as out of a thunder-cloud, which kindle the fire of war in Israel. The second time the veil or covering is only a gloomy, dense cloud, which, like a bulwark, prevents prayer from passing through. Whether the Poet here thought of the historical pillar of cloud (Ps. xcix. 7), or of an ideal one (Ps. xcvii. 2), must remain undecided. See, besides ver. 8; Ps. lv. 2, and especially Sir. xxxii. 16, 17.

Ver. 45. Thou hast made us as the off-scouring and refuse in the midst of the people.—Thou didst make us off-scourings and refuse in the midst of the nations. Since the Lord permitted no prayer to pass through to Him, the work of destruction, spoken of in ver. 43, made unimpeded progress; the consequence of which was, that Israel, ground down to the dust, is now an object of contempt among heathen nations. [Off-scouring, sweepings, what is swept away.—Refuse, what is rejected as worthless, what is thrown away.—CALVIN: “Paul says, that he and his associates were the off-scouring (περψήματα) of the world, 1 Cor. iv. 13. He means that they were despised as off-scourings or scrapings. * * What the Prophet had in view is not obscure; for he means that the degradation of the people was not hidden, but open to all nations, as though God had erected a theatre in Judea, and there exhibited a remarkable and an unusual example of His vengeance,”—among the nations. WORDSWORTH: “The nations, among which we Israelites are scattered. Such the Jewish nation has been for 1800 years; and such it will remain till it turn to God in Christ.”—W. H. H.] See Is. xxiv. 13.

Ver. 46. Here again, in the order of the initial letters, D is followed by D, and not Y. That this was the original order of the verses and not the result of later changes, the context undeniably proves. It is, therefore, certainly incomprehensible how any one could have thought of placing the triad of vers. 46-48, after that of vers. 49-51 (MEIER) [BOOTHROP, likewise].—All our enemies have opened their mouths against us.—gaped at us with their mouth. This verse, which contains only a more particular definition of what is meant by דִּבְרוּם [refuse, or as Dr. NÆGELSBACH translates it Schande, shame, disgrace] in ver. 45, has already occurred almost word for word, in ii. 16, which see.

Ver. 47. Fear and a snare—terror and the pit. A quotation from Jer. xlviii. 43; Is. xxiv. 17. [CALVIN, BROUGHTON, BLAYNEY, NOYES, NÆGELSBACH and GERLACH, all translate the second word pit, as it is rendered in Jeremiah and Isaiah, in the places cited above. In the latter place, Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER says, “It is a probable, though not a necessary supposition, that the terms here used are borrowed from the ancient art of hunting. פֶּחַי [fear] would then denote some device by which wild beasts were frightened into snares and pitfalls. It is at least a remarkable coincidence that the Romans gave the name formido to an apparatus used for this purpose.” We may, however, take fear in its usual sense, without destroying the allusion to hunted wild beasts, suggested in this passage by pit, and in Jeremiah and Isaiah by pit and snare. He who flies for terror falls into the pit. So JARCHI, quoted by GERLACH. CALVIN: “He compares here the anxieties into which the people had been brought, to a pitfall and dread. * * The meaning is, that the people had been reduced to such straits, that there was no outlet for them;

* * filled with dread, they sought refuge, but saw pitfalls on every side.”—W. H. H.] Is come upon us.—fell to our lot [happened to us, or came upon us], desolation and destruction—shame and hurt. [The E. V. is better, and is adopted by most versions. See Gram. note above.—W. H. H.] In these pithy and forcible words the Poet sums up all that Israel had suffered.

III. 48-51.

48 Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water for the destruction of the daughter 49 of my people. Mine eye trickleth down, and ceaseth not, without any intermission.
 50, 51 Till the LORD look down, and behold from heaven. Mine eye affecteth mine heart, because of all the daughters of my city.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 48.—The first clause is found in Ps. cxix. 136, almost word for word. For construction, see my Gr., § 63, 2 a. [After verbs of plenty and want, the accusative denotes the more remote object (NAEG. Gr.).—פָּלַגְךָ Jeremiah never uses. [Observe it is here the initial word, where special choice and even preference for novelty of expression would be expected.—W. H. II.]

Ver. 49.—The verb נָזַר, of which Jeremiah uses the Hiphil, once only [Jeremiah seems to have been predisposed to use words only once,—so new words in Lamentations need not surprise us, Jeremiah being the author.—W. H. II.], xviii. 21, occurs only in Niph. and Hoph. Such places as 2 Sam. xiv. 14; Job xx. 28; Ps. lxxvii. 3, give it the sense of overflowing, as well as of being poured out.—וְלֹא הִרְבֵּינָהּ, Jer. xiv. 17.—וְאֵל-הִרְבֵּינָהּ seems to be only another form of the same thought in Ps. lxxvii. 3, where we read the words פָּנֵי יְרֵי נָזְרָה וְלֹא הִפְגֵּן is debilem, languidum esse, viribus defici (Gen. xlv. 26; Hab. i. 4). Both פָּנֵה, ii. 18, and הִפְגֵּן, signify remissio, relaxatio.

Both are ἀπ. λεγ. See ii. 18 and remarks there.
 Ver. 50.—שָׁקַף (comp. σκῆπ-ρεσθαι, spectare) is prospicere, despicere. It occurs only in Hiph. and Niph.; is not found in Jeremiah; see Deut. xxvi. 15; Ps. xiv. 2; lili. 3; cii. 20, in all of which places the word is used with the addition of כִּפְרוּם or כִּשְׁכִּים.

Ver. 51.—If we compare the Hithp. הִתְעַלֵּל, which in such places as Num. xxii. 23; Judg. xix. 25; 1 Sam. xxxi. 4; Jer. xxxviii. 19, has the sense of satisfying one's desire by violence; if, further, we compare the substantives עֲלִילָה and יְעִילָה, which denote, not merely generally facinus, a deed, but also especially a bad deed (see Deut. xxii. 14, 17; Ps. cxli. 4; Ez. xx. 43; Jer. xiv. 18; xi. 18, etc.);—there can be no doubt that the idea of doing a harm inheres in the Poet also. In i. 12, 22; ii. 20, where also this word occurs, this idea is made expressly apparent by other words of this sense. But we are authorized by the above citations, to take the word in this sense, without such express indication of its meaning in the context. [GERLACH: יְעוּלָה with ל, to do some one an injury, occurs in i. 12, 22; ii. 20; therefore there is nothing unusual in the ל here, as EWALD says.]—BÜTCHER would read יְעוּרָה, of all the weeping of my city. But even if Piel is authorized by Jer. xxxi. 15; Ez. viii. 14,—and כָּל with the Inf., by Deut. iv. 7, yet פְּכוּתֵי would be expected [and then would be ungrammatical, as GERLACH shows]. But no change in the reading is necessary.—כִּן is causal, as Deut. vii. 7, 8; Joel iv. 19; Is. liii. 5; Prov. xx. 4, etc.—יְעוּרָה, Is. xlv. 13; 2 Sam. xix. 38.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 48-51. These four verses treat of the eye of the speaker, as the organ by means of which he manifests his pain:—for ver. 50 contains only a thought subordinated to that of ver. 49. The new succession of thoughts begins with the last member of a triad (the פ triad). Nothing like this has occurred before in this Song [where the triplets have been remarkable for their unification]. Would the Poet thus intimate that he has passed the culmination-point of his Poem, and therefore the culmination-point of its artistic structure also? It is not easy to decide. Besides, the fact that these verses are of the character of one sustained and continuous transition period, is itself an indication of artistic execution. For while in these verses the Poet himself is the speaker, yet he speaks of his own pain with reference to the public calamity [thus connecting what is here said with what precedes], whilst from ver. 52 he not only himself speaks, but he speaks of himself [so that these verses form a connecting link with what follows, and the subject gracefully passes from the public calamities to the private griefs of the speaker.—W. H. II.].

Ver. 48. Mine eye runneth down with rivers of water.—See Ps. cxix. 136. We find the same sentiment in Jer. viii. 23 [E. V., ix. 1], ix. 17 [E. V., ix. 18], xiii. 17; xiv. 17; Lam. i. 16.—For the destruction of the daughter of my people.—See ii. 11.

Ver. 49. Mine eye trickleth down, and ceaseth not, without any intermission.—Mine eye overflows unceasingly, without intermission. [Lit., My eye is poured out, or overflows, and ceaseth not, so as not to be (from not being) intermission. In correct English, My eye overfloweth, unceasingly without intermission. GERLACH: “intermissions, not of miseries (MICHAELIS, ROSENUELLER, see Vulg.), but so that there is no cessation, without discontinuance. See Lexicons and EWALD, § 323, a.”—W. H. II.]

Ver. 50. Till—or until—the LORD—Jehovah—look down and behold from Heaven.—As already remarked, this is a thought subordinate to that of ver. 49, which it limits, or qualifies. The Poet's tears shall flow without ceasing, not absolutely for ever, but until the Lord, by graciously regarding them, shall cause them to cease. [When God looks down and beholds, He begins to hear prayer and afford saving grace. See Ps. cii. 19, 20. HENDERSON translates, While Jehovah looketh down and beholdeth from Heaven, and remarks, “The Prophet regarded it as a great aggravation of the calamity, that the Lord should see it all, and yet not interpose for its removal." But this is to take the Hebrew preposition עַל in an unusual sense, and is wholly inconsistent with the constant tenor of Bible language, which represents God as averting His face from those who offend Him, and as looking only on those who are objects of His favor. Besides, here God has wrapped Himself in His wrath, ver. 43, and in dark impenetrable clouds, ver. 44, that He may not be moved to compassion either by the sight or the cries of the sufferers.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 51. The description passes, as it were, from without to within. In vers. 48, 49, the weeping of the Poet had been described with regard to its extent [its unintermitted continuance], but here the intensity of that weeping is made apparent from its internal effect on his soul.—Mine eye affecteth mine heart (marg., my soul)—Mine eye paineth my soul [or gives it pain, that meiner Seele weh, makes my soul ache.] The eye hurts the soul, when it increases the pain of the soul, by adding thereto a physical pain. It is true that weeping is generally a relief to the sorrowful. But when weeping weakens the eye so that it smart, then the soul, as I said, feels that as an aggravation of its own pain. See Ps. vi. 7. [CALVIN: "Mine eye grieves my soul. He had said, that his eye flowed down, and then, that it was like a fountain, from which many streams or rivers flowed: he now adopts another mode of speaking, that his eye troubled or grieved his soul." BROUGHTON: Mine eye worketh into my soul. BLAYNEY: Mine eye worketh trouble to my soul. NOYES and GERLACH take my soul as if it were simply a personal pronoun. Mine eye is painful to me (NOYES), or pains me (GERLACH). But to my soul, לִּנְפֹשִׁי , as the expressed object of the verb, is indubitably emphatic. So WORDSWORTH: "Mine eye vexeth my soul (nephesh), the seat of passion (see ver. 20) by the misery which it sees, and for which it weeps." See Gram. notes above.—W. H. H.]—Because of all the daughters of my city. It is not necessary to change the Hebrew here, as BÖTTCHER proposes (see Gram. notes above), for i. 4, 18; ii. 10, 21, show that the Poet regarded the sad fate of the tender virgins as one of the culmination points of the general calamity. For the same reason, I do not think that by the daughters of my city are intended daughter cities. [Töchterstädte, i. e., cities dependent on Jerusalem. So EWALD. BLAYNEY too: "Probably the lesser cities and towns dependent on the metropolis are hereby intended, see Jer. xlix. 2."] The Poet nowhere else refers to such cities. Besides, it should be observed, that daughters of my city is in parallelism with daughter of my people, ver. 48. This gives a beautiful symmetry to the whole paragraph; the first and last verses, vers. 48, 51, each closes with a statement of a reason for his weeping, while the intervening verses describe the extent and character of his weeping. [The English version indicates in the margin a possible translation, which CALVIN alone has had the audacity to adopt: Mine eye affecteth mine heart more than all the daughters of my city. This would seem to mean, that his heart was more affected by his own grief, than by that of all the daughters of Jerusalem; or, that his grief affected his own heart, more than it did the daughters of his city. But CALVIN explains it as meaning, that he wept more than all the girls in Jerusalem! "As the female sex, as it is well known, are more tender and softer than men, the Prophet amplifies his lamentation by this comparison, that in weeping he exceeded all the young women of the city, so that he had almost forgotten his manhood." KALKAR takes the daughters of the city in the impossible sense of incolæ urbis (an ingenious adoption of a feminine form used for common gender), and translates I was more vehemently affected than all the inhabitants of the city. The simple and natural translation of the words gives such good sense and is so in harmony with the sentiments of the whole poem, as shown above, that it is astonishing what wasteful invention has been used to find out some other sense.—W. H. H.]

III. 52-54.

52, 53 Mine enemies chased me sore, like a bird, without cause. They have cut off 54 my life in the dungeon, and cast a stone upon me. Waters flowed over mine head; then I said, I am cut off.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 52.—The verb צָדַר Jeremiah uses once, xvi. 16.— צָבֹר Jeremiah never uses. [Jeremiah often uses צֹרָר in the collective sense for soul or birds. In one single verse, xii. 9, he twice uses עֵיטִים , meaning birds of prey, ravenous birds. This passage in Lamentations is the only place where he has occasion to speak of a single bird pursued by the hunter. If he had ever used another word in the same sense, צָבֹר would have been chosen for this place for the sake of the alliteration, צֹרָר צָבֹר צָדַר , and also as suggesting the twittering of the helpless victim.—W. H. H.]—The expression חַיֵּי הַחַיִּים occurs only here. In Ps. xxxv. 19; lxi. 5, שְׁנֵי חַיִּים occurs, both times in parallelism with חַיֵּי שֶׁקֶר . This shows that חַיֵּי הַחַיִּים belongs, as an adverbial qualification, to חַיֵּי , not to צָדַר .

Ver. 53.— צָבַת occurs in Kal only here. Niph. is without doubt extingui (Job xxiii. 17), exarescere (of water, Job vi. 17); Piel is perdere, to destroy (Ps. lxxxviii. 17; cxix. 132); Hiph. has the same sense (Ps. xviii. 41; liv. 7; lxi. 5, etc.). צָבַת might indeed have an intransitive sense, to be sunk in silence, in speechlessness, that is to say, to be destroyed, to per- ish, in favor of which sense are the kindred roots רָוַם, רָכַם, רָכָה, and the Dialects. [So HENDERSON: They have made my life silent in the dungeon.] But since in all the parallel members of the paragraph, vers. 52-54, the enemies are the subject, it is necessary to regard them as the subject of נָצַתָּה; also, and to take this word in a transitive sense. If נָצַתָּה signifies destroy, כְּבֹרָר can signify in the pit, or into the pit. In the latter case it would be constr. pręgnans. This would be more correct, because it better answers to the fact. For the enemies did not succeed in destroying the life of the prophet in the pit, but casting it down into the pit for the purpose of destruction.—וְרָרָה with reference to the form, see וְרָרָה, ver.

33 [GREEN'S Gr., § 150, 2.]

Ver. 51.—נָצַתָּה is manare, fluere. Kal occurs only here. Elsewhere the Hiphil at two places, Deut. xi. 4; 2 Kings vi. G. [The use of Kal may indicate that the word here denotes, not as in Hiphil, dashing over, overwhelming, but, like נָצַתָּה and נָצַתָּה, to melt, dissolve, flow, trick's down. This sense is favored by the preposition לְ, to, on, not over.—W. II. H.]—וְאֶכְרֵתִי, see וְאֶכְרֵת, ver. 13.—וְנִגְרַתִּי, נִגַּר is dissecare, discindere. Jeremiah never uses it. Niph., besides here, in Is. lii. 8; Ps. lxxxviii. 6; Ez. xxxviii. 11, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 52-54. The speaker here returns to the description of his own personal sufferings. The central point of these sufferings is the pit, into which the Prophet has been thrown, and that by enemies who were personally hostile to him without cause (ver. 52), and who pursued him incessantly (ver. 52) with vindictiveness and mockery (vers. 60-63). Ought we to interpret all that is said of the pit as merely figurative? So far as what is said of the pit alone, this could be done. But what the Poet says of his enemies, cannot possibly be a mere figure of speech. When he mourns that though he had given them no cause for hatred, they had, nevertheless, incessantly insulted him and pursued him with measureless vengeance,—this surely is no figurative way of speaking. We have already shown that the subject who speaks in this song (except in those parts in which the Poet speaks in the first person plural) cannot be the people. The enemies, further, cannot be the Chaldeans, because they are called those that are my enemies without cause, and because the Poet speaks of his being already delivered from their power and now only invokes [not deliverance from them but] the vengeance of God upon them (vers. 55-66). On the other hand, Jeremiah speaks of his enemies, xx. 7-12, exactly as is done here. He describes their insulting mockery (For I heard the defaming of many) and their vindictiveness (we shall take our revenge on him, וְנִקְחָה נִקְחָהּ כִּפְנֵי, ver. 10, comp. Lam. iii. 60), and hopes that God will avenge him upon them (let me see thy vengeance on them, ver. 12). Since the description of his enemies in this place exactly corresponds with that which Jeremiah gives of his enemies, all of which is confirmed by so many facts related in his prophetic book (xi. 18-20; xii. 1-6; xxvi. 8; xxxvii. 11-15; xxxviii. 4-6), can we doubt that what is said of the pit should be taken literally, especially if we consider the fact that what is here said agrees substantially with what Jeremiah says, chap. xxxviii., of the pit into which he was actually thrown by his enemies? We are sure, therefore, that the Poet here had in his eye the persecutions which Jeremiah suffered from his enemies. He personates Jeremiah. The chief subject of the third song is Jeremiah.

Ver. 52. Mine enemies chased me sore, like a bird, without cause.—Hunted, hunted have they me like a bird, all mine enemies without cause. Like a bird: see Ps. xi. 1, where the soul of the persecuted innocent is likewise compared to a bird. [They that were without cause mine enemies hunted me down like a bird. So BLAYNEY and NOYES render the verb צָדָה, which seems to mean, not to hunt, in the abstract sense, but to obtain by hunting, to seize, to lay hold of, and as used here in an intensive sense, would imply persevering and successful hunting. DOUAY: My enemies have chased me and caught me like a bird. Hunted me down like a bird expresses the idea suggested by the comparison.—As even a bird is at last tired out and hunted down by a persevering pursuer. The point of the comparison is the perseverance of the successful hunter in pursuit of a bird: as David says of Saul's tireless and remorseless pursuit of him, "The King of Israel is come out to seek a flea, as when one doth hunt a partridge in the mountains" (1 Sam. xxvi. 20). This idea is expressed in the Paris ed., 1805, of the French, Ceux qui sont mes ennemis sans cause m'ont poursuivi à outrance, comme on poursuit un oiseau. The French of MARTIN gives the same sense. The commentators generally fail to explain the comparison. CALVIN, who supposes the lack of "both prudence and courage" in birds is referred to, is evidently wrong, both as to the fact that birds are thus deficient, and as to its application here. Both GESSENIUS and FUERST explain the verb, צָדָה, as used here, in the sense of laying snares as for a bird. This gives a good sense, and carries out the comparison; but it is adopted by none of the versions, and seems inconsistent with the general use of the verb and the intensive meaning suggested by the duplication.—W. II. H.]

Ver. 53. They have cut off my life in the dungeon.—They destroyed in the pit my life [i. e., sought to destroy it. See Gram. notes above. From Jer. xxxviii. 4, it is certain that their object in throwing him into the pit was to kill him.—W. II. H.]—And cast a stone upon me, and threw stones upon me. But should we translate they threw stones upon me, or they cast a stone over me [i. e., over the mouth of the pit]? Jer. xxxviii. says nothing of either the one or the other. Yet it is possible that Jeremiah, whose statements in that chapter were confined, with admirable reserve, to the principal circumstances, might have omitted this point. And it is also possible that the author of our song, in case he were not Jeremiah himself, may have added this particular, either from hearsay, or out of his own invention. [The addition of a new fact affords a strong presumption that Jeremiah wrote this book. One personating him would have adhered to facts well authenticated in his history.—W. II. H.] Grammatically considered there is nothing in either the verb or the noun decisive in favor of the one or the other explanation. The verb רָרַח , which is used in Joel iv. 3, Ob. 11; Nah. iii. 10 of casting the lot, and in Jer. i. 14 of shooting an arrow, Zechariah uses also of throwing down iron [?] horns (ii. 4; E. V. i. 21). The word only occurs in the places cited. But if Zechariah uses the word of throwing down objects of such size and weight, then it could properly be used also of throwing a heavy stone over the opening of the pit. The noun, אֲבָנִים , further, can as well signify collectively a number of stones as one stone, for it frequently has that meaning after רָרַח , Lev. xx. 2, 27; xxiv. 23; Josh. vii. 25; 1 Kings xii. 18 ($\text{וַיִּרְבֹּזוּ בּוֹ אֲבָנִים}$), comp. Num. xiv. 10, xv. 35; Deut. xxi. 21. But the preposition, בְּ , upon me, favors the explanation they cast stones on me. For the difference between בְּ and אֵל or עַל is, that the former, as FÜRST says, denotes "decided vicinity," or "such motion as is connected with the attainment of its object," whilst by the latter is expressed "motion toward without nearness." They threw a stone on me, that is to say, over me on the mouth of the pit, would be expressed by עַל . [Though there is a foundation for this distinction between these two prepositions, yet they are often used indiscriminately, without affecting the sense, as for instance with the verbs רָרַח , יָגַע , רָבַק , too, בְּ , too, is used in the general sense of over, as with כָּשַׁל , in the sense of ruling over, or having the management of affairs, see Ps. ciii. 19; Gen. xxiv. 2; xlv. 8, 26; Deut. xv. 6; Judges viii. 22; Josh. xii. 5; 1 Kings v. 1. If the use of בְּ here in the sense indicated by E. V. is not absolutely forbidden, it is certainly to be preferred. 1. It would have been a wanton outrage to throw stones upon the Prophet after he was cast into the pit. 2. It seems incredible that Jeremiah should not in his narrative of the affair have mentioned such a remarkable incident, if it had occurred. 3. They could only have thrown the stones for the purpose of killing him, and how then had he escaped death? 4. The fact that the pit was covered over with a stone, to prevent his possible escape, was a most likely occurrence, and yet one that, because likely and even to be presumed, might have been passed over without special mention. Finally, all the versions, except NÆGELSACH's and GERLACH's, render it as in E. V.; GATAKER indicates both senses without deciding in favor of either.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 54. Waters flowed over my head.—Waters dashed (surged) over my head. This cannot be meant of the flowing together of the water in a physical sense, over his head. For in Jer. xxxviii. 6, it is expressly said that there was no water in the pit, only mud. Besides, the flowing together of water over his head must inevitably have had for its speedy consequence the death of him who was thrown into the pit. Either the words mean merely, water ran on my head; or, what is more likely, this way of speaking should be understood as metaphorical, as also in Ps. lxi. 3 (2), 15 (14), 16 (15), he who is sunk in the mire, speaks at the same time of being drowned by the water-flood. That he intends this as an image descriptive of the greatest peril of death (see Ps. xviii. 17 (16); xxxii. 6; xlii. 8 (7); lxxxviii. 17 (16), 18 (17); cxxx. 1; cxliv. 7), is evident also from Ps. lxi. 2 (1), where for the waters are come in even to my soul can only be taken in a figurative sense. [In Ps. lxi. all is figurative. But here, where all the rest is literal, to take one term alone as figurative, is unnatural. It would be better, with HENDERSON, to take the whole description as figurative, and as having no direct allusion to the account given in Jer. xxxviii. 6-12. But this is not necessary. The words may only mean Water ran on my head. See Gram. notes above. If there was mud in the bottom of the pit, there was a supply of water in some quantities from some source. The mere condensation of the vapor in the atmosphere against the sides of the pit, would produce some, and there may have been from small springs supply enough to trickle down and splash upon his head. The language, if suggested by any Psalm, was more likely that of xl. 3 (2), than of the lxix.—and brought me up from a pit of noise, and from the miry clay,—where the noise referred to seems to be that of running water. The Prophet, sinking in the mud beneath, and reminded by the water falling on his head that he was in danger of drowning, might well exclaim I am lost, I am already as good as gone!—W. H. H.]—Then I said, I am cut off,—I said, I am cut off. NOYES: I am undone. GERLACH: I am lost. Comp. Ps. lxxxviii. 5.]

III. 55-66.

55, 56 I called upon thy name, O LORD, out of the low dungeon. Thou hast heard 57 my voice; hide not thine ear at my breathing, at my cry. Thou drewest near 58 in the day that I called upon thee: thou saidst, Fear not. O Lord, thou hast 59 pleaded the causes of my soul; thou hast redeemed my life. O LORD, thou hast 60 seen my wrong; judge thou my cause. Thou hast seen all their vengeance, and 61 all their imaginations against me. Thou hast heard their reproach, O LORD, 62 and all their imaginations against me. The lips of those that rose up against 63 me, and their device against me all the day. Behold their sitting down, and 64 their rising up; I am their music. Render unto them a recompence, O LORD,

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 55-66. These twelve closing verses contain a prayer, so that ch. iii., like chs. i. and ii., ends with a prayer. This prayer is divided into three parts. In the first part, vers. 55-58, the speaker thanks the Lord for his deliverance from the pit. In the second part, vers. 59-63, he reminds the Lord of all that his (the speaker's) enemies had done and were still doing to him. In the third part, vers. 64-66, he prays the Lord to avenge upon his enemies the evil they had done to him.

Ver. 55. I called upon thy name, O LORD—Jehovah. The speaker begins by recalling the prayer which he had addressed to the Lord out of the pit. HRTZIG is of the opinion that we have this prayer in Ps. lxi. DELITZSCH also concedes that there is much to favor this opinion; see his Bible Commentary on the Psalms, 1867, p. 438. [The caption of this Psalm ascribes it to David. There is no internal evidence sufficient to set this aside and to prove that the Psalm was written by Jeremiah or some one else "during the captivity at Babylon." Its appropriateness to Jeremiah when in the pit, is only a proof of the singular adaptation of the inspired psalms to the wants of God's children in all varieties of emergencies and circumstances. That Jeremiah repeated this Psalm when in the pit, is most likely. That it was present to his mind when writing these Lamentations is rendered probable by many suggestive thoughts and sentiments.—GERLACH and NOYES translate the verbs, from ver. 55 to the end, in the present tense. This makes the translation in some respects smoother and the sense in some places more apparent. But the references are to deliverances past, pointing hopefully, amidst present and unrelieved afflictions, to deliverances yet in the future. For this reason alone, the preterite sense of the verbs should be retained, even if the difficulties of translation were greater than they really are.—W. H. II.].—Out of the low dungeon—out of the hellish (höllischen) pit. A similar expression [differing only in the preposition.—W. H. II.] is found in Ps. lxxxviii. 7. If our Poet had in mind Ps. lxxxviii., which I regard as certain, then it is probable that he used this peculiar expression in the same sense in which it is used there. Ps. lxxxviii., it is true, is commonly understood of an affliction of another kind (by leprosy, vers. 9, 16): but there is room for the question, whether this psalm, "the gloomiest of all the lamentation psalms," as DELITZSCH says, does not also apply to that gloomiest of all situations which any servant of the Lord in the Old Testament ever experienced? In that case הַיְיִתִּיתִי, hellish, should be understood, not of Hades itself, but of the Hades-like place in which the Prophet found himself. It would then indicate not merely the locality, but the condition of the Prophet. [See Gram. notes above. There is not necessarily in these words an allusion to Sheol, nor is hellish pit even a correct translation of the words, which mean literally, a pit of low or under places, or pit of depths; out of the depths of the pit, if not an exact is yet a sufficiently accurate rendering. GERLACH, while he also supposes an allusion, in a figurative sense, to Sheol, translates, aus der Grube der Tiefen, out of the pit of the depths, meaning perhaps, figuratively, the infernal regions. But the passages in which this and similar expressions occur do not justify the idea that the pit of Hell or Sheol, i. e. the place of the dead, is intended, even figuratively. The literal sense out of the pit of depths, a poetical expression for depths of the pit, is most consonant with the fact that the Prophet alludes to the time when he was literally sinking in the mire at the bottom of the well.—W. H. II.]

Ver. 56. Thou hast heard my voice,—Thou heardest my voice. The Poet gratefully recognizes the fact that the Lord heard his cry,—Hide not thine ear at my breathing, at my cry,—[saying] Hide not Thine ear to my refreshment, to my cry. This is not a prayer which the speaker now addresses to the Lord [but the prayer which he did make when he was in the pit]. It is connected with קוֹלִי, my voice, as an explanation of the purport of that cry, and it shows what the speaker prayed for at that time.—The word רָחַם [E. V. breathing, NAEGLER. refreshment] occurs besides here only in Ex. viii. 11 (15) [and is there rendered by Sept. ἀνάψυξις], signifies undoubtedly the obtaining breath, ἀνάψυξις (see 1 Sam. xvi. 23; Job xxxii. 20; Esth. iv. 14). It is not synonymous with צַעַק, cry, but it denotes the end to which the latter serves as the means. [The sense is, as given by NOYES: Hide not Thine ear from my cry for relief. But a more exact translation is given by BLAYNEY: Hide not Thine ear from my relief at my cry;—so BROUGHTON: Hide not Thine ear from my release at my prayer. The verb means strictly to veil (and is so rendered here by GERLACH, Veil not Thine ear), and then to conceal, hide. "To veil the eye is, not to look at what is set before it; and to veil the ear is, to render it deaf to what is said;" remarks OWEN, who proposes the translation Deafen not Thine ear. FUERST, in his Lex., says, Turn not away Thine ear. CALVIN renders it, Close not Thine ear.—My breathing. WORDSWORTH: "My respiration, my recovery of breath. Comp. Ex. viii. 15, the only other place where the word occurs, and where it is rendered respice." The word relief seems in accordance with the use of the word in that passage, and exactly to represent the sense it has here.—But how are these last words connected with the first words of the verse? The difficulty which has embarrassed commentators here, is one of GERLACH's arguments for taking the perfect verbs in a precativè sense and rendering them in the present, which apparently meets the difficulty. But the objections to this have been stated above on ver. 55. To supply intermediate words and thoughts between the first and second members of the verse, as Thou heardest my voice, therefore now, in my present exigency, hide not Thine ear, etc., or therefore I now am encouraged to pray Hide not, etc., is at least arbitrary.* To regard the last member as independ-

* DIDOTAT's comment on this verse is an instance of interpretation, where a fervid imagination supplies ideas not con-

dent of the first, an interjectional prayer, introduces an abrupt and serious break in the consecutive flow of the thought. Besides, both of these interpretations are open to the objection that קוּלִי שָׁמַעְתָּ, Thou heardest my voice, is not equivalent to saying, Thou didst answer my prayer, or receive it favorably; a mistake that even GEN-LACH has fallen into. The word קוּל denotes any audible sound or noise. Thunder (1 Sam. vii. 10), the blast of a trumpet (Ex. xix. 19), the crackling of thorns under a pot (Ecl. vii. 6), the rustling of a shaken leaf (Lev. xxvii. 36), the singing of birds (Ps. civ. 12), the bleating of sheep and lowing of oxen (1 Sam. xv. 14), the roaring of a lion (Jer. xii. 8), the shout of a multitude and clamor of a battle (Ex. xxxii. 17), etc., the sound of the human voice in speaking, singing, weeping, etc., are all represented by the common generic word קוּל, a sound, a noise. In three passages the word is used in the sense of rumor, or the bruit of common fame: Gen. xlv. 16; Ecl. x. 20; Jer. iii. 9. When connected by ע or ל to verbs implying compliance with a request, obedience to a command, acceptance of advice, or the like, usage allows the word to stand in a specific sense for prayer, command, injunction, or the like;

as Gen. xxx. 6, שָׁמַע בְּקוּלִי, hath heard my voice, i. e. my prayer. In no other case does this word, alone and by itself, signify a command, prayer, or speech, or words spoken. It does not designate articulate utterance, but the sound produced by speech, or ought else that makes a noise, or is audible. Its meaning is always evolved from the context, and when spoken words are intended, it is almost invariably followed by לְכוּר, אָבַר, or some similar word. Its use in Hebrew is so purely idiomatic, that the sense may often be better given in English by its entire omission, than by a verbally literal translation. This is often done in our English version: Gen. xlv. 2, he wept aloud; 1 Kings xviii. 27, cry aloud, ver. 28, they cried aloud; Neh. viii. 15, publish and proclaim; Job xxix. 10, The nobles held their peace; Prov. xxvi. 25, when he speaketh fair, etc. In Cant. ii. 8; v. 2 (see Prof. GREEN in LANGE), and Isa. xl. 3, 6 (see EWALD), the word may be rendered as an interjection, Hark! It is obvious, therefore, that קוּל cannot be translated prayer.

קוּלִי שָׁמַעְתָּ can only mean Thou heardest the sound of my voice. What that sound was, whether of weeping, lamentation or supplication, is left to be explained, and is explained by the words following; the sound, or cry was, Hide not Thine ear from my prayer for relief. Similar constructions are frequent, especially with Jeremiah. Jer. iii. 21, a sound was heard upon the high places—weeping supplications; iv. 31, The cry of the daughter of Zion—woe is me now! etc.; viii. 19, The voice of the daughter of my people—Is not Jehovah in Zion? etc.; see Jer. xxxi. 15; Ez. iii. 12, I heard a voice—Blessed be the glory of Jeho- vah, etc.; Job xxxiii. 8, 9, I have heard the cry of words—I am clean, etc.; iv. 16, 17, I heard a voice—shall mortal man, etc.; Ps. cxvi. 1, He hath heard my voice—my supplications; cxix. 149, Hear my cry—Jehovah quicken me, etc. See Isa. xxviii. 23, 24; xxxii. 9, 10; Prov. viii. 4, 5; Micah vi. 1, 2; Prov. i. 20, 22; viii. 1, 4, 5. In all these passages the word קוּל is immediately put into expository words. So in our text, the second member of the verse is in apposition with the first and explanatory of the word קוּל, Thou heardest my cry—Hide not Thine ear from my prayer for relief.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 57. The Poet now describes what the Lord did after hearing the prayer of the suppliant.—Thou drewest near in the day that—or the day when—I called upon Thee. See Ps. xx. 10; lvi. 10; cii. 3; cxxxviii. 3.—Thou saidst, Fear not. See Jer. i. 8; xxx. 10; xlvi. 27, 28.

Ver. 58. The Lord has not only spoken, but also acted. [Vers. 57, 58 are amplifications of ver. 56, showing how the Lord heard the prayer (there recorded).—W. H. H.]—O Lord, thou hast pleaded the causes of my soul—Thou hast fought, O Lord, the fights of my soul! It is evident that the Poet intends by these conflicts (רִיבִים) the attacks of his enemies, which he has described in vers. 52-55, and for which, from ver. 59 onward, he implores vengeance. That the struggles on which his life depended were severe, appears both from vers. 52-55 and from the following words Thou hast rescued my life. [The Versions generally take the words in the judicial sense, as in our English Bibles. The commentators fail to explain the significance of the metaphor. Pool's annotation is a curious instance of blindly unsaying in the note what is said in the text,—“Thou hast been wont to take my part against my enemies, not like a lawyer by word of mouth, but actually and really pleading my cause.” Pleading a cause, metaphorically speaking, must at least involve the idea of securing justification, or exemption from punishment, before some legal tribunal, real or imaginary. This idea is not appropriate here, nor is it so in other places of the Bible where the same Hebrew words are similarly translated. This leads us to doubt the judicial interpretation of the terms used. Dr. NAEGELSBACH'S translation is supported by Is. xlix. 25, I will contend with him that contendeth with thee, and I will save thy children; xli. 11, they that strive with thee shall perish; xxxiv. 8, the controversy of Zion; Ps. cxxxv. 1, E. V., Plead my cause, O LORD, with them that strive with me: fight against them that fight against me, where the first clause is rendered by Dr. ALEXANDER, Oppose my opposers, strive with my strivers, or contend with my contenders, which is recommended by the parallelism; and Jer. ii. 36, E. V., I will plead thy cause and take vengeance for thee, which Dr. NAEGELSBACH translates, I fight thy fight, and avenge thy vengeance. But the words may have another meaning still. רִיב has an acquired sense, from the idea of conducting a cause before a tribunal, of managing another's affairs, and also of protecting their person, property and rights. In this sense the tained in the words themselves: “Thou hast always been ready to relieve me when I have called upon Thee; O continue in doing so now at this present.”

word seems to be used in Is. i. 17, E. V., plead for the widow. J. A. ALEXANDER: "Be friend the widow, take her part, espouse her cause. * * The common version (plead for the widow) seems to apply too exclusively to advocates, as distinguished from judges;"—a remark that will especially apply in the present case. The word seems to have the same sense in Is. li. 22, and Jer. i. 34. In the last the expression is רִיב רִיב אֶת-רִיבָם, E. V.: He shall thoroughly plead their cause, LUTHER and NAEGELSACH, He will certainly accomplish, or carry through (durchführen) thy cause, where the idea seems to be that of zealously and successfully prosecuting the interests of another. This is the meaning which GERLACH adopts, Thou managest the business of my soul, i. e., as he explains, the affairs which concern his life and his salvation. This idea of God's controlling interposition in those matters in which the Prophet's life was in jeopardy seems to me the idea here expressed.—W. H. H.]—Thou hast redeemed my life.—Thou hast rescued my life. [The propriety of connecting this verse with vers. 55-57, instead of with vers. 59, 60, and thus dismembering the triplets, is very dubious.—W. H. H.]

Vers. 59-63. These verses embrace, as remarked above, the second part of the prayer. The speaker here reminds the Lord of all the evil which he had suffered from his enemies, as the Lord Himself had seen and heard, and prays Him (vers. 62, 63) to consider well what his enemies yet continually designed against him. These verses contain a brief intimation of the prayer which he presents at large in vers. 64-66, that the Lord would execute justice (ver. 59).

Ver. 59. LORD—Jehovah—thou hast seen.—By these words, which are repeated in ver. 60, and the words Thou hast heard in ver. 61, the speaker confirms the reality of the deeds of which he accuses his adversaries. [They are also to be understood as expressions of faith in God's love, and personal interest in His saints. Not only is everything open to the eye and ear of God. But He is observing the conduct and the language of those who injure His people, with jealous indignation, which will eventually break out in judgments.—W. H. H.]—My wrong. The Hebrew word עֲוֹנָה, occurs only here, but the verb from which it is derived is found in ver. 36, עָוִית, If the latter is used in the sense of bending [deflection, subversion] and in particular of bending of the right [subverting one in his cause], then the noun here means, violation of right, injury illegally done to one. [CALVIN and GERLACH translate the word oppression, or subversion, suggesting judicial perversion of justice. It is generally, however, taken in the more general sense of wrong or injury. CALVIN says "the word is rendered by some iniquity, but in an ironical sense," i. e., the wrong my enemies impute to me. But the word is with almost entire unanimity taken in a passive sense. ROSENMUELLER: quæ mihi fiat injuria. NOYES: the wrong done to me; so BLAYNEY and BOOTHROYD.—W. H. H.].—Judge thou my cause—judge my right. [So BROUGHTON. GERLACH: Secure to me right or justice. Literally, it is judge my judgment, where the noun seems to be taken in the cognate sense of my cause. See FURST, Lex. NOYES: Maintain Thou my cause.—W. H. H.] These words are a pious ejaculation, anticipatory of the prayer fully detailed in vers. 64-66, and evidently called forth by the antithesis of עֲוֹנָתִי, my wrong. To judge the right of a man is to bring it to its deserts by means of judgment. A kindred passage is Jer. v. 28. Comp. Zech. vii. 9; 1 Kings iii. 28; Is. xvi. 5. [See also Ps. ix. 5 (4).]

Ver. 60. Thou hast seen all their vengeance.—The word נִקְמָה is not in its original meaning vindictiveness, as THENIUS supposes, but simply ultio [taking vengeance] (comp. נִקְמַת דָּם, Ps. lxxix. 10, נִקְמַת הַיָּבֹל, Jer. i. 28, אֵל נִקְמָה, Ps. xciv. 1, etc.). Here also it is vengeance, but in an abstract-collective signification, inasmuch as his adversaries had executed on the Prophet more than one single act of vengeance. See xi. 20; xx. 12. [CALVIN: vengeances. GERLACH: revengefulness.]—And all their imaginations against me—all their devices against me. The Poet seems to allude to certain passages in Jeremiah, namely, xi. 19; xviii. 18, where this very same word, כַּחֲשָׁבוֹת, is emphatically used of the machinations of his adversaries.

Ver. 61. Thou hast heard their reproach—reviling—O LORD—Jehovah. See the introductory remarks above on vers. 22-24.—And all their imaginations—all their devices—against me.—Twice in the Book of Jeremiah the devices, כַּחֲשָׁבוֹת, of his adversaries are spoken of; twice also the Poet uses it here.

Ver. 62. It is better every way to refer this verse to the Behold or observe, הִבֵּיטָה, of ver. 63, than to the, שָׁמַעְתָּ, Thou hast heard, of ver. 61. For if referred to what precedes, ver. 62 would contain a tautology, because what is the product of their lips and their thoughts must be, in any case, substantially the same with what the Lord has heard according to ver. 61. But if ver. 62 be referred to what follows then we gain a beautiful gradation; the lips indicate what the enemies speak, הִגִּינוּם, their meditation, what they think, and their sitting down and their rising up, what they do. [The position of the word Behold, הִבֵּיטָה, in the Hebrew, at the end of the first member of ver. 63, favors this construction. Yet it ought to be remarked, that the connection of ver. 62 with ver. 61, creates no unpleasant tautology but the repetition of the same ideas under new terms would be forcible and poetical.—W. H. H.]—The lips stand for what they utter. [CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, translate speeches; NOYES, words.] See שִׁפְתַי נִבְּעוּ, lips, or language of Canaan, Is. xix. 18; a lip or language I understood not, Ps. lxxxi. 6 (5). Compare כּוֹצֵא שִׁפְתַי, utterance of my lips, Jer. xvii. 16.—Of those that rose up against me—my adversaries [so BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NOYES, ROSENMUELLER, GERLACH].—And their device against me—and their thoughts against me. Thoughts, meditation, Ps. xix. 15 (14). [BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD and OWEN, render the word muttering. HENDERSON and NOYES, machinations. But the sense of meditation, thoughts, is adopted generally.

ROSENUELLER, cogitatio.—W. H. H.]—All the day long: a particular conspicuous also in Jer. xx. 7, 8.

Ver. 63. Behold their sitting down and their rising up.—To refer these words, with THEIXUS merely to consensus [sitting and deliberating together] of the enemies, is inconsistent with the context and the use of the words. For evidently, according to the context, the Lord should observe the whole conduct and doing of the enemies, and that not merely with regard to what was common to them all, but with respect to individuals. And further, according to the usage of the word, as apparent in such places as Ps. cxxxix. 2; Is. xxxvii. 28; Deut. vi. 7; xi. 19, the expression indicates the daily conduct and actions of a man. [GROTIUS: otia et negotia. CALVIN: “By sitting and rising, he means all the actions of life, as when David says, ‘Thou knowest my sitting and my rising.’” Ps. cxxxix. 2; that is, whether I rest or walk, all my actions are known to Thee. By rising, then, the Prophet denotes here, as David did, all the movements or doings of men; and by sitting, he means their quiet counsels; for men either deliberate and prepare for work while they sit or rise, and thus move and act.”]—I am their music—song. See ver. 14. He calls himself their song, their singsong (EWALD), because they busy themselves with him all the day long, though in a malevolent and scornful way. As one often hums a melody to himself all day long, so they do not let the thought of the hated servant of God depart out of their heads, but are constantly devising evil against him. I am their song denotes, then, the result of what is said in the first member of ver. 62 [Thou hast heard their reproach], and the first member of ver. 63 [observe the lips—the language—of my enemies], and relates to the all the day long, of ver. 62, and their sitting down and rising up, of ver. 63. [I am the constant subject of their derision and merriment. WORDSWORTH: “Compare the Passion Psalm, lxi. 12, I was the song of the drunkards. There the word neginah is used, here the cognate word manginah.”—W. H. H.]

Vers. 64-66. In these last three verses, the Poet prays directly that the Lord would take vengeance on his enemies according to their desert.

Ver. 64. Render unto them a recompense, O LORD—Jehovah,—according to the work of their hands. [BROUGHTON: “St. Paul translatheth this verse against ALEXANDER, the copper-smith, 2 Tim. iv. 14.” The phrase is borrowed from Ps. cxviii. 4.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 65. Give them sorrow (marg. obstinacy) of heart. Thou wilt give them blindness of heart. The word rendered blindness, עִוְיוֹן, according to the fundamental idea of the root עָוָה, to enlose, to veil (see עָוָה, עָוָה, עָוָה), can only mean veiling, covering (κάλυμμα τῆς καρδίας, veil of the heart, 2 Cor. iii. 15). It seems then that blindness [CALVIN, ROSENUELLER, NOYES, GERLACH], not hardness [BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON], is meant. See Deut. xxviii. 28. On what DELITZSCH (Psychol., p. 291) grounds his conjecture, that it may be a name for madness, I do not comprehend. [The opinion that the word means madness is derived from the Arabic, and is maintained by C. B.

MICHAELIS and A. SCHULTENS. See ROSENUELLER, GERLACH. See Text. and Gram. notes. —By blindness of heart we are to understand a reprobate mind, involving the idea of stupidity (CALVIN) produced by sin.—If the future verbs in vers. 54, 56, are taken as Imperatives, the verb in this verse should also be so translated, Give them blindness of heart—W. H. H.]—Thy curse unto them,—upon them.

Ver. 66. Persecute and destroy them in anger—Pursue them in wrath and exterminate them—from under the Heavens of the LORD—Jehovah. See Deut. ix. 14, which place seems to have been in the eye of the author. [CALVIN, regarding the Heavens as designating God's throne, interprets the meaning to be that their destruction should testify the Divine sovereignty and Providence. So FAUSSET: “destroy them so, that it may be seen everywhere under heaven that Thou sittest above as Judge of the world.” This is very forced. The idea is simply that of utter extermination; destroy them so completely, ut non sint amplius sub caelis, that they may no longer exist under Heaven. MICHAELIS, GERLACH.—BROUGHTON concludes the chapter with the following characteristic note: “Jeremy, ch. xxiv., told how the men of the third captivity should come to nothing. And Ezekiel prophesied only in their days, but they would take no warning. This threefold alphabet endeth in their threefold and absolute destruction. Yet Ezra was of that captivity; but an infant. And of Anathoth, cursed by Jeremy, one hundred and twenty-eight returned, Ezra ii.”—The enemies of Jeremiah returned not.—W. H. H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. [“It has been alleged, that some of the prophetic portions of Holy Scripture which foretell the sufferings of Christ, especially the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah and the sixty-ninth Psalm, have no reference to Jesus of Nazareth, but were fulfilled in the person of Jeremiah. True it is, that the language of that fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and of that sixty-ninth Psalm, had a remarkable applicability to Jeremiah. But why was this? Because Jeremiah was not only a prophet, but a prophecy. Jeremiah is among the prophets what Job is among the patriarchs. Jeremiah is the suffering prophet. He was a signal type of ‘the Man of Sorrows.’ He was a figure of Him who suffered on the cross, and who conquered by suffering.” WORDSWORTH, Intr. Jer., p. ix. “Jeremiah is called by the Christian Fathers the πρόφητης ἀδίστατος of the Prophets, and this qualified him to be what he is also called by them, the εὐμεταδίστατος.” Ib. note. “The Christian church, from ancient days, has set apart the Lamentations of Jeremiah, for her own solemn offices in the week of her Lord's Passion; and in contemplating the Prophet Jeremiah sitting amid the ruins of Zion and pouring out his sorrow there in piteous cries of agony, she has ever had a vision of Christ hanging upon the Cross, and mourning over the ruins of our fallen human nature, which caused the bitterest pangs of His anguish there.” Ib., p. x.]

2. “In this chapter, the heralds of the word are admonished, that it is their duty, in times of great distress, to prescribe to their hearers a suitable remedy for their misfortunes, the component parts of which would be, 1. The recognition of sins by means of the punishments inflicted: 2. Confidence in God's compassion: 3. Earnest prayer. As for the rest, this chapter compared with the others, shines like a star of exceeding brilliancy, from which the rays of a variety of doctrines emanate and give forth their light." FÖRSTER.

3. [I am the man, ver. 1. "This Lamentation is only rightly understood, when it is regarded as a lamentation of every pious Israelite,—as a lamentation which, while proceeding from self-experienced spiritual sorrows of the Prophet, has its truth for all pious Israelites, in whose name the Prophet speaks. ABEN EZRA, long ago, perceived this, and indicated the individual Israelites as the subject of the lamentation. In this opinion later commentators mostly concur (ROSENUELLER, EWALD, THENIUS, NEUMANN, VAHINGER). EWALD finely says, in connection with the close of chapter second, which is so barren of consolation: 'Yet, will lamentation and despair nowhere end? Then, there suddenly appears, in the third place, a particular man; the very one who can, from his own peculiar experience, lament most profoundly, so that here for the third time the cry of despair is renewed with still greater vehemence; but he is the one who can also, from his own profoundest reflection on the eternal relation of God to humanity, come to a right knowledge of his own sins and of the necessity of repentance, and therewith also to the exercise of believing prayer. Who is this individual, who thus laments, thus thinks and prays?—whose I unconsciously, but at exactly the right place, passes over into the we? O man, he is the representative of thine own self! Let every one now speak and think as he does! And thus, by the direct means of this speech, begun with the greatest difficulty, the sense of pain has been imperceptibly lost in the exercise of prayer. Thus this composition shows us how in the wildest whirlpool, divine composure is to be won: each one must win it by sinking down himself into the full earnest truth; and even if one does not immediately find it, yet there is no more likely beginning for something better; wherefore here a particular individual is set before us as accomplishing in himself this most necessary work.' In this individualizing lies also the explanation of the manifold points of resemblance between our chapter and the Book of Job, from the passion-history of which the Prophet derives lamentations and images for the representation of the passion-history of Israel." Dr. ERNST GERLACH, Klag. Jer., p. 81].

4. Vers. 1-18. "Here we have, at first, a lamentation of the Prophet Jeremiah, not so much over his people, as rather over his own misery. . . . Here we see, that the pious are subjected to two different sorts of affliction. One of these is temporal, affecting the body or worldly possessions and welfare; the other is spiritual, affecting the soul, when they think, that God has become their enemy, and will no longer be gracious to them, but will reject them now and forever. The first is, in truth, a cause of much suffering, especially to flesh and blood; but this pain is nothing, compared with that spiritual temptation, when one can no longer confide in the favor and grace of God, as we here see in the case of Jeremiah, who so ruefully bemoans himself, that he is a wretched man, who must bear the rod of the wrath of God, who has thrust him out of the light into the darkness, and pursued him as a bear or a lion, or as a more open and declared enemy. David also experienced many of the same temptations, as we find ever and anon in his Psalms. Thine arrows stick fast in me, and Thy hand presses me sore, he says in Ps. xxxviii. 3 (2). I said in my despair, I am cut off from before the eyes of the Lord, Ps. xxxi. 23 (22): whilst at other times he had been so courageous, that he said, I was not afraid of many hundred thousands that set themselves against me round about, Ps. iii. 7 (6); God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble; therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, Ps. xlvi. 2, 3 (1, 2). This sounds very differently from the lamentation here of Jeremiah, who represents God as his worst enemy. This should, first of all, serve to comfort the pious; if they fall into similar temptations, they should not think that they are the first to whom such things have happened, but should know that many pious and holy persons have experienced the same trials. But to the ungodly, this should serve as a warning; they should consider, if this is done in a green tree, what will be done in the dry? (Luke xxiii. 31). If the righteous are scarcely saved, where will the ungodly and sinner appear? (1 Pet. iv. 7)." Würtemb. Summarien.

5. Vers. 1-9. "Jeremiah speaks here in his own name, and whilst he utters the grief of his own heart he seeks by his example to excite others to repentance, for the key-note that sounds through all his lamentations is, that his distress comes from God. The greatest cause of distress is this, that prayer, the only resource in misery, avails no more. Elsewhere it is said, 'The name of the Lord is a strong fortress, the righteous man runneth thither and is protected,'—and, 'He who will call on the name of the Lord shall be blessed,'—or, 'Call on Me in trouble, then will I deliver thee, then thou shalt praise Me.' In truth, the Holy Scriptures are crowded with testimonies, which promise answers to prayer and help to the prayerful; indeed, since one of the titles of God is 'He who heareth prayer,' it is evident that to hear prayer is founded in His eternal nature. What then the Prophet here says is contrary to Scripture. But it is true, and so we must understand Jeremiah, that God not seldom hears the prayers of believers, whilst He proves their patience and leaves them long in darkness and uncertainty. This has been, as it was with Jeremiah, the common experience of Christians, who have been obliged to observe in themselves, how quickly the human heart loses courage and prayerful ardor, when God does not hasten to our help." HEIM und HOFMANN, die grossen Propheten.

6. "The Prophet first describes what he himself experienced of the holy cross under the Old Testament. It was necessary for him to be typically a sacrifice for all people. He was obliged to this according to the purpose of God. God's object in all this was, to use him in His kingdom to the end of time as one of the most important of His instruments. In this respect He is indeed a real type of Christ. Although the light is not wanting in his dark sayings, yet it shines not nearly so clearly as we experience it in the New Testament, by the testimony of the Apostles, where they also testify of their cross. For they already behold His glory with their eyes. On this account Paul gloried most lovingly in his cross and his weakness." DIEDRICH.

7. "In this third chapter such an earnest, intense lamentation of the Prophet is written, that many have regarded it as referring to nothing else than to the sufferings and death of Christ. For this reason, where Christ is painted with His body lacerated with the thongs and the crown of thorns on His head, the beginning of this chapter is found recorded in Latin on the picture." EG. HUNNIUS.

8. The old expositors find here free scope for their allegorical interpretations. Thus PASCHASIUS RABBERTUS, in his Preface to his third book on Lamentations, says, "The more attentively I examine this—as it were—funeral lamentation over the whole body of the people, the more profound are the mysteries which appear concerning Christ and His body, so that the mournful discourse may be by turns interpreted, now of the Synagogue, then especially of the Church, and then again of the Passion of Christ." GHISLERUS, p. 120. And of BONAVENTURA the same author remarks, that he says, "This is so evidently a lamentation for Christ and His members, whose sufferings are here described, that it is impossible to find in it a literal sense, without distortion."

9. Ver. 2. "By light he represents prosperity, by darkness adversity, Is. v. 30; xlv. 7; lviii. 10; Job xxii. 11, on which last passage the great LUTHER, in a marginal gloss to the text of the German version of the Bible, comments very nervously, thus: Trouble and misfortune are called darkness, happiness and prosperity light. Here the verses of CAMERARIUS, written on 2 Chr. xx. 12, may be quoted:

In tenebris vite densa et caligine mundi,
Cum nihil est toto pectore consilii,
Tum nos erigimus Deus ad te lumina cordis,
Nostra tuamque fides solius oratopen."—FÖRSTER.

10. Ver. 7. "To God πάν ἄπορον πόριμον, i. e. To God every impassable road is passable. Of the same purport are the following sayings, which are worthy of being observed and remembered: PHILO: deficiente omni humano concilio incipit divinum, where human expedients fail, Divine begin; TAULERUS: egrediente natura ingreditur Deus, God enters when nature exits, LUTHER: tempus desperationis tempus auxilii, the time of despair is the time when help comes. The greater the need, the nearer is God." FÖRSTER.

11. Ver. 8. BONAVENTURA refers the words to the prayer of Christ on the Mount of Olives,—If it be possible let this cup pass from Me (Matt. xxvi. 39). GHISLER., p. 129.—"The Omnipotent God, knowing what is to our advantage, feigns not to hear the cry of the suffering, that He may increase their usefulness and that their lives may be purified by discipline and they may seek elsewhere that tranquil rest, which cannot be found here." RHABANUS, in GHISLER., Ib.—"The most efficacious antidote (ἀντιξίφάρμακον) to this temptation is Hope (Heb. xii. 3-11), to which effect are the sayings of AUGUSTINE, God does not give quickly, that thou mayest learn to desire more ardently; and, What God would give, He withholds." FÖRSTER.

12. Ver. 8. [Prayer: "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou didst in former times so severely chastise Thy people, we may in the present day patiently submit to all Thy scourges, and in a humble and meek spirit suffer ourselves to be chastised as we deserve; and that we may not, in the meantime, cease to call on Thee, and that however slowly Thou mayest seem to hear our prayers, we may yet persevere continuously to the end, until at length we shall really find that salvation is not in vain promised to all those who in sincerity of heart call on Thee, through Christ our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

13. Ver. 10. "The real appearance of the Lord is not that of a lion or a bear (Is. xxxviii. 13; Job x. 16), but of a Shepherd taking the most faithful care of His sheep. With respect to this pastoral care, see Ps. xxiii.; Is. xl. 11; Jer. xxiii. 3, 4; Ez. xxxiv. 16. And BERNARD beautifully says, Christ redeems His sheep at a costly price, feeds them sumptuously, leads them with solicitous carefulness, lodges them securely." FÖRSTER.—["Hark is the complaint when Jeremiah compares God to a bear and a lion. But we have said that the apprehension of God's wrath so terrified the faithful, that they could not sufficiently express the atrocity of their calamity; and then borne in mind must also be what we have stated, that they spoke according to the judgment of the flesh; for they did not always so moderate their feelings, but that something fell from them worthy of blame. We ought not, then, to make as a rule in religion all the complaints of holy men, when they were pressed down by the hand of God; for when their minds were in a state of confusion, they uttered much that was intemperate. But we ought, on the other hand, to acknowledge how great must be our weakness, since we see that the strongest have thus fallen, when God exercised severity towards them." CALVIN.]

14. Vers. 17, 18. "All other temptations are as nothing, compared with those in which God seems to set Himself in hostility to a man. For as long as the pious taste the grace of God and perceive His fatherly tenderness, every adversity is so much the more easily endured by them and they can be joyful and of good cheer even amidst external causes for sorrow. See Ps. lvi., lxii., lxxiii. But, on the contrary, if God disguises Himself in some severe aspect before them, and dissembles, and acts as if He hears them not, is not favorably disposed to them, but may be in the highest degree opposed to them and against their interests,—then lamentations commence, then begins that secret sorrow of the soul, that excessive anguish, under which they faint away and must sink to Hell, did not God hold His hand over them and abridge their anguish. These are the buffetings of Satan, the very dregs of hellish temptations, they are the floods of Belial that will overwhelm human strength. Then they [the tempted] lose heart; for when, as it were, they lie in darkness, immured in an eternal prison of every kind of trouble, when the Lord closes His ears to their pitiable cry, yes, when He has bent His bow against them and set them up as a mark to shoot against them all His darts and arrows, when He has utterly ejected them from peace and all that is good, in all respects which the Prophet here relates in detail of himself, then at last they come to think, as Jeremiah did, when he said, My strength and hope is perished from the Lord, until God again lets the gentle sun of His Divine heavenly consolation and fatherly goodness shine out from amidst the darkness of the temptations; but in the meanwhile they must for a long time have a taste of that future wrath, which the damned must hereafter eternally suffer. Besides Jeremiah's case here, the Scripture presents us with a pitiable representation and sorrowful instance of a man thus distressed, and a special example for us in the case of the patient Job. . . . David also in Psalm xxxi., I said in my haste I am cut off from before Thine eyes. Yes, even the Son of God was compelled to feel in His holy soul a similar spiritual temptation (yet without any sin), when on the cross He said, My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me?" EGR. HUNNIUS.—"What is here written by Jeremiah is not new and unheard of; but very many examples occur in Scripture, of those who have been harassed by this same temptation. The following examples, however, are especially appropriate here: Abraham, Gen. xvi. 1 (2); David, Ps. xxxi. 23 (22); lxxvii. 8-10 (7-9); Iezekiah, Is. xxxviii. 10, Job, vii. 15; xix. 6, 22; Jonah, ii. 5 (4); Paul, 2 Cor. xii. 9; to whom may be added, those most eminent Theologians of our own age, Matthesius, Weller and Hausmann, and especially Luther, who was obliged to sit in that sieve of Satan, particularly in the year of Christ 1527, about the time of the festival of the Visitation of Mary, concerning which paroxysm of his, by far his most violent one, D. JOH. BÜGENHAGIUS has written a curious account, which is contained in Tom. iii. Jen. Germ. Fol. 401." FÖRSTER. In the Leipzig edition, this production is found in Vol. XXII., pag. 498 ff., under the Title, "D. Jo. Pomerani und Justi Jonæ Historie von Lutheri geistlichen und leiblichen Anfechtungen anno 1527."—"Faith sometimes is so stifled, that even the children of God think that they are lost, and that it is all over with their salvation. . . . There is no doubt but that the Prophet also expressly reminded the faithful that they ought not to despair, . . . though the devil tempted them to despair, but that they ought then especially to struggle against it. This is indeed, I allow, a hard and perilous contest, but the faithful ought not to faint, even when such a thing happens to them, that is, when it seems to be all over with them and no hope remains; but, on the contrary, they ought nevertheless to go on hoping, and that indeed, as the Scripture says elsewhere, against hope, or above hope (Rom. iv. 18). . . . Were any one to ask, How can it be that hope and despair should reside in the same man? the answer is, that when faith is weak, that part of the soul is empty, which admits despair. Now, faith is sometimes not only enfeebled, but is also nearly stifled. This, indeed, does not happen daily, but there is no one whom God deeply exercises with temptations, who does not feel that his faith is nearly extinguished. It is then no wonder, that despair then prevails; but it is for a moment. In the meantime, the remedy is, immediately to flee to God and to complain of this misery, so that He may succor and raise up those who are thus fallen." CALVIN.]

15. Ver. 19. "Just as wormwood tastes very bitter, but serves many useful purposes, so the cross, for the present, seemeth not to be joyous (Ileb. xii. 11). Nevertheless, it is a medicine for us. Wormwood (Vermuth) has its name, thus (wehre dem Muth), control the spirit [temper, or mettle of the soul]. For wormwood restrains from lewdness, disperses the bile, neutralizes poison, and destroys all bad vermin and corruption, all of which and much more, in a spiritual sense, is done by the dear cross. Therefore, let us esteem this our spiritual medicine." CRAMER.—"Was it necessary that Christ Himself should be given gall to drink, why then should we be able entirely to abstain from the like?" CRAMER.

16. Vers. 19-33. "We see here that there are two sources of consolation, internal and external. The internal is, when one is sure in his heart that he has a gracious God, of whom he may expect every good thing in all difficulties and distresses. But this consolation sometimes expires, as we see here in the case of Jeremiah, and from the words and sayings of David, as we have shown above from his Psalms. It often seems as though God Himself, together with Heaven and Earth, is against one. How now should it be with one placed in such temptation? Answer: He should lay hold of the external consolation, which he finds, not in his heart, but in the Holy Scripture, in so many and divine consolatory declarations, which God therein presents to us, together with many examples in the cases of those to whom God has fulfilled and verified such promises. And then also he should carefully consider these heart-moving words, which Jeremiah here uses, which he did not get from his heart, for that spoke to him in a very different fashion, but he received them from the Holy Ghost; thus, It is of the Lord's goodness, that we are not consumed, His mercy fails not, but it is new every morning; The Lord is gracious unto him who waiteth for Him, and to the soul that inquires after Him; It is an excellent thing to be patient and to hope for the help of the Lord; He does not cast off for ever, but He is indeed sorry and moved by compassion according to His great mercies, etc. These and similar sayings we should, in great temptations, take hold of and hold them fast in faith, in spite even of the thoughts and objections of our own hearts. Thereby will God revive in a troubled heart the internal consolation, so that one can say with Jeremiah, Thou wilt be again graciously mindful of me, for so my soul assures me. This I take to heart, therefore I still hope." WÜRTEMB. SUMMARIEN.—"It is the habit and custom of God, first thoroughly to prove men by affliction, and after that to hear His children, if they, as fine gold and silver tried in the oven, are found to be clean and pure. As it is again written, Whoso adheres to wisdom shall dwell securely, and although at first she sets herself in opposition to him, and brings fear and dread upon him, and proves him with her rod and tries him with her chastisements, until she finds that he is without guile, she will then return to him in the right way, and comfort him and show him her secrets. Sirach. iv. 18-21 (15-18)." EGD. HUXNUS.

17. (Ver. 21. Prayer. "Grant, Almighty God, that as there are none of us who have not continually to contend with many temptations, and as such is our infirmity, that we are ready to succumb under them, except Thou helpest us,—O grant, that we may be sustained by Thine invincible power, and that also, when Thou wouldst humble us, we may loathe ourselves on account of our sins, and thus perseveringly contend, until, having gained the victory, we shall give Thee the glory for Thy perpetual aid in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

18. Vers. 22-24. "These are approved texts and cordials for all stricken hearts. 1. God's mercies and compassions, which we may set over against God regarded as a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24. 2. That His compassions fail not, with which we may resist the temptation, that God will no more be gracious and has forgotten our affliction and oppression, Ps. xlii. 25 (24). 3. That His mercies are new every morning, which we oppose to our temptation when we are compelled to say with David, I am chastened every morning, Ps. lxxiii. 14. 4. That God is faithful, to meet the temptation, that God will make it too hard for us to bear, 1 Cor. x. 13. 5. That God will be our portion and reward, that we will be richly recompensed in Heaven." CRAMER.

19. Vers. 22, 23. "The whole purport of this truly golden maxim is consolatory, and to this end it is to be pleaded in view of the magnitude of the evil both of our guilt and of our punishment. With this accord Rom. v. 21, and Ps. cxxx. 7, as well as the following from AUGUSTINE, God's compassion exceeds the misery of all mankind. The abuse of this maxim is fourfold. The first is that of the Epicureans, who, from like passages of Scripture, in which the immensity of the Divine pity is treated of, deduce that ancient piece of jargon (κοκκυσιδόν), Let us continue in sin that grace may be the more abundant, Rom. vi. 1. The second abuse is that of Origen, who concluded that, because of the infinite compassion of God; the damned would at length some time or other, be liberated from the torment of Hell and be saved (Hom. ix. in Jerem.). The third abuse is that of Huber (Samuelis mort., 1624), who, from the amplitude and universality of God's compassion, presumed to fabricate the doctrine of universal and unlimited election. The fourth abuse is that of the Photinians, who so far expand the words of Scripture concerning the compassion of God, as blasphemously to assert, that God, out of His mere compassion alone, forgives our sins, without any compensation and satisfaction rendered by Christ." FÖRSTER.

20. Ver. 24. "LUTHER has finely comprised the distinction between hope and faith, in the following well-rounded period: Faith looks at the word which promises, Hope at the thing promised, (Fides intuetur verbum rei, spes vero rem verbi)." FÖRSTER.—["Were God to take away the promise, all the miserable would inevitably perish; for they can never lay hold on His mercy except through His word. This, then, is the reason why Scripture so often connects these two things together, even God's mercy and His faithfulness in fulfilling His promises." CALVIN.]

21. [Vers. 24, 25. "It next occurred to the Prophet, that whatever he lost or suffered, or witnessed of the sufferings of his people, his grand interest was secure. He was satisfied that the Lord was his all-sufficient Portion. He was conscious that he had chosen Him as his portion, and expected his happiness from Him, and not from the world; and therefore he determined still to hope in Him, and refer all his concerns to His wisdom, truth, and love. In this he evidently proposed himself as an example to his people, that they might seek comfort from God when all other comfort failed. And though they might not be able confidently to aver that the Lord was their Portion, yet they might remember that He was kind and merciful to those who wait for Him and seek Him." SCOTT.]

22. Ver. 25. "When we men are in trouble or temptation, the Devil is accustomed to portray and represent God to us as very different from what He really is. For he depicts him as an ungracious, pitiless, wrathful Judge, not to be treated with, who would only kill us and damn us and not wish us to be happy, and thus the Devil would frighten us and drive us to despair. We should remove our eyes from this frightful image of Satan's conjuring, and look upon the Lord as the Prophet Jeremiah here depicts for us His countenance, as it were; yea, as God portrays Himself in His holy word, namely thus, The Lord is friendly to the soul that seeks after Him." EGD. HUXNUS.

23. Ver. 25. "God's love both prepares the way for and rewards ours. Being more benignant it precedes ours; being more faithful it is returned [by ours]; being more attractive it is sought after. It is rich to all who invoke its aid, yet has nothing better than its own self. It devotes itself to the deserving, reserves itself for a reward, applies itself to the souls of the saints for their refreshment, gives itself in payment for the redemption of the captive. Thou art good, O Lord, to the soul of him who seeks Thee. How gracious, then, to him who finds Thee! But here indeed is something wonderful, that no one can successfully seek Thee unless he have first found Thee. Dost Thou, therefore, wish to be found that Thou mayest be sought; to be sought, that Thou mayest be found? Thou art one who can be sought and found, yet not prevented (præveniri). For although we say, 'In the morning shall my prayer prevent Thee,' Ps. lxxxviii. 14 (13), yet there is no doubt that all prayer is lifeless that inspiration has not prevented (non prævenit)." BERNARDUS in libro de diligendo Deo, quoted by GHSLER. p. 144.

24. [Vers. 25, 26. "God is good to all His creatures; but in particular to them that wait for Him, to the soul that seeks Him. While trouble is prolonged and deliverance deferred, we must patiently wait for God's gracious returns to us; and while we wait for Him by faith, we must seek Him by prayer; they that do so will find it good, ver. 26, and to hope that the Salvation of the Lord will come, though difficulties lie in the way, to wait till it does come, though it be long delayed; and while we wait to be quiet and silent, not quarrelling with God, or making ourselves uneasy, but acquiescing in the Divine disposals; Father, Thy will be done! If we call this to mind, we may have hope that all will end well at last." MATT. HENRY.]

25. Ver. 26. "In the practice of Christianity, hope and patience, the most efficient of virtues, engage mutually in common labors, and neither without the other can discharge its duty." FÜRSTER.—"The little herb, Patience, does not grow in every body's garden. But we are admonished to seek it, because, 1. It is a very precious virtue, and a part of the service we owe to God, according to the first table. 2. It contains in itself another virtue, namely, hope in God. 3. It is easier for us to practice it, if we accustom ourselves to it from our youth. 4. It can overcome many wrongs, abuses and outrages. 5. Misfortune will not continue for ever, Is. liv. 7. 6. At all events the end will be favorable. 7. God does not willingly afflict us (from His heart), but always designs something different and better for us, and dearly wishes that He might not punish us at all (Ilos. xi. 9)." CRAMER.

[God, when He takes my goods and chattels hence,
Gives me a portion, giving patience.
What is in God is God; if so it be
He patience gives, He gives Himself to me."
ROBERT HERRICK.]

26. Vers. 26-36. "These are admirable and, beyond measure, comforting words, with which the holy Prophet opens the abyss of God's mercy and comforts therewith himself and the people. As if he would say, It is against God's nature to subject us to such hard discipline, and to let us be driven and injured by the world. But He does it for the very best reason, not to ruin, but rather to edify, not to grieve but to fill with joy forever. For He is not of the disposition of the children of men, who, if their anger is once excited, there is no end to it. But God, although He causes grief, and lets His wrath, sternness, and justice be seen, yet He is again moved to pity as soon as men cordially repent of their sin and transgression. Therefore, this present captivity should not be regarded as if He had eternally rejected His poor people, and would never turn their captivity, or as if He would indeed allow His captives to be trodden under foot, or, much less, as if he would subvert the right of a man, or allow his cause to be turned aside before the Most High, as if the Lord saw it not, or knew nothing of it. Far be it from this! He knows and sees how cruelly the tyrants oppress their captives; He, moreover, graciously regards the patience of the oppressed, and will help them again according to His mercies." EGID. HUNNIUS.

27. Ver. 27. "It is added here that a man should be accustomed to cross-bearing (τη σταυροφορία) from his youth. And we may also with propriety apply here that saying of the Poet, A teneris assuescere multum est, There is great advantage in being accustomed to a thing from a tender age. For patience begets experience (Rom. v. 4).—experience, I mean, in matters of cross-bearing. Vexation gives understanding

(Is. xxviii. 19, [Vulg. and Douay]). But what doth he know that hath not been tried? (Sir. xxxiv. 9). For, as NAZIANZEN puts it, οὐ πρόσωπα χριστιανισμῶς, ἀλλὰ πίστις, Christianity is faith, not outward appearances. And LUTHER says, Unexperienced persons are merely unprofitable theorizers. But since it is of advantage, in order to become more fully acquainted with any course of discipline, that one should be subjected to it from a tender age, so does it especially conduce to the acquisition of experience in matters of cross-bearing, if one is trained in them from his youth." FÜRSTER.—"Jeremiah himself bore the yoke in his youth. He was very young, according to Jer. i. 6, when he was called to the prophetic office (in the 13th year of Josiah), and from the beginning he experienced much opposition and many trials, hence after eighteen years under Joakim and eleven years under Zedekiah, he was able to endure yet severer persecution. The earlier he had learned to bear the yoke, the better was he able to bear it later in life. It is a golden truth that is here expressed. The cases of Joseph and David also confirm it. A youth of hardships has already brought forth much fruit of godliness, and educated many staunch men for the kingdom of God. Therefore be thou also reconciled to a youth of hardship." CALWER, Handbuch der Bibelerklärung.—"We ought not only to bear the yoke, but to bear it in our youth. For if we bear it late in life, we begin by exercising penitence for the past, rather than by acquiring strength. Let us then anticipate the flight of the years of our youth by suitable discipline, that we may each of us say, O God, who feedest [E. V., Thou hast taught] me from my youth (Ps. lxxi. 17); rather than be obliged to lament at the remembrance of our faults, saying, Remember not the sins of my youth and of my ignorance (Ps. xxv. 7 [See Vulg.])." AMBROSE, Serm. 2, on Ps. cxix. 9.—Deus vult longi prelii militem, God chooses the soldier who has passed through a long fight. HILLARY'S Exposition of Ps. cxix. 9, quoted by GHSLER., p. 146.—"What praise is due to old men, if failing in strength and having been released from long continued labor, they prefer to take their rest? On the other hand, what glory is due to young men, when in the very fervor of youth itself, they moderate their lives by a regimen of strict morality?" CASSIODORUS, in Ps. cxix. 83, quoted by GHSLER., p. 147.

29. Ver. 29. יָנִים, if so be, peradventure. "This particle affords to the Romanists no support for their fiction of doubt.* LUTHER'S interpretation may be seen in his marginal note on Joel ii. 14." FÜRSTER.

30. Ver. 30. "It may be asked here, whether this sentence refers to toleration [the passive, non-resistant endurance of evil]; whether the words, if any one is struck on the cheek, etc., may not seem to support the Anabaptists, who endeavor to prove, from this and similar passages of Scripture, especially from Matt. v. 39, 40, that all species of revenge is forbidden to Christians? But a distinction must be made between public and private, and lawful and unlawful revenge." FÖRSTER.

*I. e., in regard to God's willingness to pardon, on which they rest the necessity of propitiating Him by penance.—W. II. II.]

31. [Vers. 31-33. PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as it is expedient for us to be daily chastised by Thy hand, we may willingly submit to Thee, and not doubt, but that Thou wilt be faithful, and not prove us with too much rigor, but that Thou wilt consider our weakness, so that we may thus calmly bear all Thy chastisements, until we shall at length enjoy that perfect blessedness, which is now hid to us under hope, and as it were sealed, until Christ Thy Son shall reveal it at His coming. Amen." CALVIN.]

32. Ver. 33. "He does not afflict men from His heart. This is not to be understood absolutely (ἀπλῶς), but comparatively, namely, with respect to [what may be called] God's own special work, which consists not in afflicting, but in doing good. Briefly, His disposition towards us is like that of a father towards his son, in reference to which AUGUSTINE very beautifully says, He is both a father and a God when He caresses; and when He smites, still is He a father. . . . With which agrees this saying of NAZIANZEN: Μεῖζον τοῦ μέτρον τῆς φιλανθρωπίας ὑπὲρ τὸ μέτρον τῆς παιδαγωγίας. The measure of His philanthropy exceeds the measure of His severity as a disciplinarian." FÖRSTER.—"The very essence of His being inclines Him to bless, therefore it is written, He does not afflict from His heart His children of the human race; but if they despise His blessing, it is His to smite and requite them with the greater severity." 32. [Vers. 34-39. PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as we are at this day tossed here and there by so many troubles, and almost all things in the world are in confusion, so that wherever we turn our eyes, nothing but thick darkness meets us,—O grant that we may learn to surmount all obstacles, and to raise our eyes by faith above the world, so that we may acknowledge that governed by Thy wonderful counsel is everything that seems to us to happen by chance, in order that we may seek Thee, and know that help will be ready for us through Thy mercy whenever we humbly seek the pardon of our sins, through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

33. Vers. 37, 38. "In respect to the sins of men, He is not entirely inactive. Not, indeed, as if He took pleasure in their sins, or moved men to commit them, or had ordained men to their sins. That be far from Him! But because from the very first He had entire knowledge of them (Jer. xxiii. 24; Ps. cxxxix. 7-12; Job xxiv. 23; Sir. xxiii. 27, 28; Wis. i. 6-10). . . . Therefore it follows, that all the punishments of sin are sent and controlled by God, to His own people, indeed, for the purpose of discipline, but to the ungodly, for their punishment (Is. xlv. 7; Am. iii. 6). . . . Therefore that is an execrable error of some of the heathen philosophers, who taught that what happened to a man, whether good or evil, came by chance, even as his luck befell him: but that God troubled Himself with the affairs of men, was not to be thought of: but that He sits in Heaven, in undisturbed repose, and lets men here, between themselves, plunge, wade or swim as they can, since He takes no concern in their affairs." EGD. HUNNIUS.—"Who then can say that anything is done without the Lord's command? This is a precious word. For first, all adversaries, however lively their devices may be, are only messengers and servants of my Lord, and must obey Him, when He has purposes of love in my behalf for them to accomplish. And, as LUTHER says, Our God is entire Master of the art of whipping a rogue by the hands of others. . . . For the rest, I should not regard the thoughts and devices of all my adversaries, but the loving purposes which my Lord intends to accomplish by them, as David sings, He has spread a table for me in the presence of mine enemies, and filled my cup to overflowing. Whilst they rage and roar, be of good cheer and say, St. Peter cannot prevent God from giving what He will. . . .

Ihr lieben Feinde sorgt so viel, mir Noth und Gram zu machen, Seht doch, ihr seid Handlanger blos in meines Herren Sachen!
Wohl gränzte ich mich bitterlich, wenn ich es nicht erkannte,
Dass doch mein Herr der Wundarzt ist und ihr nur Instrumente.
Wie selig, wer er hat erkannt, dass aller Fäden Enden
Von aller Menschen Werk und Wort ruhn doch in Göttes Händen.

There is then only one real misfortune for men on earth, and that is Sin!" THOLOCK, St. Christl. Andacht, XXVIII., S. 162.

34. Ver. 38. "Two words occur here which need to be more accurately defined. The first question is, what is the exact idea of evil in this passage? CALVIN, too, broadly extends its meaning so as to cover all the evils that are done, and that happen in the world, thus not obscurely embracing all sins. But from the context even a blind man may perceive, that the Prophet is not speaking of evil in general, . . . but in fact of that particular species of evil, which is usually called the evil of punishment. For the evil of crime, as such, evidently cannot and ought not to be in any manner attributed to God as its author or producing cause (Deut. xxxii. 4; Ps. v. 5 (4); Rom. ix. 14; 1 John i. 5; James i. 13); but the evil of punishment is, here and in various other places in the Sacred Scriptures, imputed to God as a just Judge (Is. xlv. 7; Am. iii. 6; Sir. xl. 32). The other word referred to, is that translated commandeth (τὸ, jubere). In the Hebrew it is צוה. . . . CALVIN twists this word to mean the secret decrees of God, by which He bends the purposes of men hither and thither, according to His own arbitrary will. Whence he infers, that nothing is done without the command and foreordination of God. He adduces the example of Shimei [2 Sam. xvi. 5, 10], who had command to curse. If he had understood this with reference to the evil of punishment, his words would have borne the appearance at least of truth. But what CALVIN in this passage makes so broad, that he writes, Nothing can be done without the Divine mandate, including sins likewise, cannot and ought by no means to be allowed; for the contrary is most clearly attested by what is written in Jer. xix. 5; xxiii. 32; xxix. 23; Sir. xv. 10-22." FÖRSTER.—["Let us now see how God commands what is wrongly and foolishly done by men. Surely He does not command the ungodly to do what is wicked, for He would thus render them excusable; for where God's authority interposes, there no blame can be. But God is said to command whatever He has decreed, according to His hidden counsel. There are, then, two kinds of commands; one belongs to doctrine, and the other to the hidden judgments of God. The command of doctrine, so to speak, is an evident approbation which acquits men; for when one obeys God, it is enough that he has God as his authority, though he were condemned by a hundred worlds. . . . But God is said to command according to His secret decrees what He does not approve, as far as men are concerned. So Shimci had a command to curse, and yet he was not exempt from blame; for it was not his purpose to obey God; nay, he thought that he had offended God no less than David [2 Sam. xix. 19, 20]. Thus this distinction ought to be understood, that some things are commanded by God, not that men may have it as a rule of action, but when God executes His secret judgments by ways unknown to us. Thus, then, ought this passage to be understood, even that nothing is carried on without God's command, that is, without His decree, and, as they say, without His ordination. It hence appears, that those things which seem contingent, are yet ruled by the certain providence of God, so that nothing is done at random. And what philosophers call accident, or contingent (ἐνδεχόμενον), is necessary as to God; for God decreed before the world was made whatever He was to do; so that there is nothing now done in the world which is not directed by His counsel. * * * Now they who object and say that God is thus made the author of evils, may be easily refuted; for nothing is more preposterous than to measure the incomprehensible judgment of God by our contracted minds. . . . This, then, is our wisdom, to embrace only what the Scripture teaches. Now, when it teaches us that nothing is done except through the will of God, it does not speak indiscriminately, as though God approved of murders, and thefts, and sorceries, and adulteries; what then? even that God by His just and righteous counsel so orders all things, that He still wills not iniquity and abhors all injustice. . . . How much soever the most wicked may indulge themselves in their vices, He still rules them, . . . that He may punish sins with sins, as Paul teaches us, for he says that God gives up to a reprobate mind those who deserve such a punishment, that He gives them up to disgraceful lusts, that He blinds more and more the despisers of His word (Rom. i. 28; 2 Thess. ii. 10). And then God has various ways, and those innumerable and unknown to us. . . . Thus we see that God is not the author of evils, though nothing happens but by His nod and through His will,—for far different is His design from that of wicked men. . . . In a word, as far as the Heavens are from the earth, so great is the difference between the works of God and the deeds of men, for the ends, as I have said, are altogether different." CALVIN.]

35. Ver. 39. "The danger here is, that very few sufficiently examine themselves. Whoever does this will discover, how God punishes our sins, and we suffer no undeserved distress." ILEIM u. HOFFMANN, die grossen Propheten.—It is usual with unrenewed men commonly, to become enraged at him who punishes them, even when their punishment is entirely just. Thus we read in the Revelation of John (xvi. 9, 11, 21), that men will blaspheme the name of God, who pours out the vials of His wrath upon them, and that they will not repent of their sins. This perversity of the heart, which mistakes right for wrong, and wrong for right, will reach its utmost height in the last days, but its roots reach back to the beginning of the world, where they started with the lies of the Serpent (Gen. iii. 4, 5).—"The evils of punishment are only the effects, or fruits, of the evils of sin (Rom. vi. 23; Jas. i. 15). Hence AUGUSTINE says, with great propriety, 'Punishment daily increases, because sin increases daily; the chastisements of God continue without cessation, because crimes among the people are equally persistent.' But, on the other hand, AMBROSIVS says, with truth; 'God had been ready to change His sentence, if thou hadst been willing to amend thy wickedness by penitence.'" FÖRSTER.

36. Vers. 40-42. ["How are we to get the pardon of our sins? The Prophet tells us:—1. Let us examine ourselves. 2. Let us turn again to the Lord. 3. Let us lift up our heart; let us make fervent prayer and supplication for mercy. 4. Let us lift up our hand; let us solemnly promise to be His, and bind ourselves in a covenant to be the Lord's only: so much lifting up the hand to God implies. Or, let us put our heart on our hand and offer it to God: so some have translated this clause. 5. We have transgressed; let our confession of sin be fervent and sincere. 6. And to us who profess Christianity it may be added, Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ as having died for thee; and thou shalt not perish, but have everlasting life." ADAM CLARKE].

37. Vers. 40, 41. "When Jeremiah says, Let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord; let us lift up our hearts with our hands unto God in the heavens; he reminds us of the proper method to be observed in prayer, namely, sincere confession of sin and repentance must precede our petitions. For we know that God does not hear impenitent sinners (John ix. 31). This method God Himself also has taught us to observe, since He says in Is. i. 15, If ye make many prayers, I will not hear you. Why? For your hands are full of blood. But He immediately adds good counsel: Wash and make yourselves clean, put away your evil doings from before Mine eyes, then come and let us reason together." WÜRTEMB. Summarian.

38. Vers. 39-42. "Here two very different kinds of murmuring are indicated. One that of the ungodly which Isaiah has described, viii. 21, If they suffer hunger, they will fret themselves and curse their king and their God. But besides this, a very salutary kind of murmuring is suggested, which is not directed against God or men, but consists in a man's being discontented with himself and fretting over his sins and forsaking them, and in examining his life that he may know how wicked he has been, since he has not been afraid to sin before the face of God, most holy (Is. lxiv. 6; Dan. ix. 5-14). . . . But that prayer and confession of sins may be acceptable to God, it is required, that not only the mouth may pray, but, as Jeremiah says, the heart and the hands must be lifted up to heaven. For where the mouth only prays, and the heart is not in it, God esteems such spiritless prayer as little as the prayer of those Pharisees and heathen, who, when they wished to pray, babbled much with their mouths, without spirit or sincerity (Matt. vi. 5-8; Is. xxix. 13). . . . Yet we learn from these few brief words of the Prophet Jeremiah, that prayer is not to be deferred too long, nor delayed by impenitence. Otherwise it will be too late to call on God and come to Him with prayer, as happened to the Jews, who delayed their repentance and prayer till God's wrath was already kindled. And when they afterwards called on God, it availed nothing (with regard to averting spiritual punishment), therefore they uttered this lamentation, Thou hast covered Thyself with a cloud, that no prayer could pass through (Is. i. 15; lxx. 1-3; Mic. iii. 4; Prov. i. 28.)" EGID. HUNNIUS.

39. Ver. 41. "In such prayer we must persevere, and not as it were desist if help does not come immediately, but must always continue to pray, till the Lord look down from Heaven and behold us, as Jeremiah here says. For God has not such tender ears that He would soon grow weary of hearing, as those men of whom it is said, a beggar may be neither poor nor worthy, —but they will treat him graciously, if he persist tenaciously in his entreaties (Luke xi. 9; Col. iv. 2; 1 Thess. v. 17)." Wärtemb. Summarien.

Ut tua pertingat penetretque in oratio cœlum,
Corido sit ex puro, sit brevis alique frequens.—FÖRSTER.

["Let us lift up our heart with our hands,—the antidote to hypocrisy. Ps. lxxvii. 4; 1 Tim. ii. 8." FAUSSET].

40. Vers. 42, 43. ["The Prophet proceeded to direct the confessions of his people and to put words into their mouths. He humbly acknowledges that they had transgressed and rebelled against God; and as He had not pardoned, it was plain they had not repented; this was the cause of all their miseries, of which he led them humbly and submissively to complain to the Lord. He had covered them with His anger, pursued them by His judgments, and destroyed them without pity; and He had so covered Himself with a thick cloud, that their prayers could find no admission. The hypocritical prayers of the people for deliverance were rejected; and even the fervent prayers of the Prophet in that behalf were discouraged." SCOTT.—"If the Lord has not pardoned our sins, we may be sure, that it is because we have not repented and believed His Gospel: yet we may be forgiven, even though we have not the comfort of it." SCOTT.]

41. Ver. 44. "This cloud is not physical but mystical, a cloud, namely, condensed from the mists and vapors of our sins, the Holy Spirit thus interpreting it in Is. lix. 1, 2; Ps. lxxvi. 18;

John ix. 31. With which agrees that saying of AUGUSTINE, Præfacti peccatores sunt Dei illusores non oratores, Hardened sinners mock God, they do not pray to Him. If therefore we wish our prayers to be heard, this cloud must be dispersed by true and sincere repentance, as Isaiah exhorts, i. 15-18." FÖRSTER.—"However it may have an angry and threatening appearance, that God should draw a dark cloud-covering over His face, yet after all it is no iron wall, but only a cloud that may be easily dissipated, and when God removes our sins as a veil (Is. xliv. 22), then He drives this cloud away." CRAMER.

42. Vers. 44-49. ["The prolonging of troubles is sometimes a temptation, even to praying people, to question whether God be what they have always believed Him to be, a prayer-hearing God; and the distresses of God's people sometimes prevail to that degree, that they cannot find any footing for their faith, nor keep their head above water, with any comfortable expectation." HENRY.]

43. Ver. 50. "Till the Lord behold from Heaven. This phrase is found also in Ps. cii. 20 (19); xiv. 2; xxxiii. 13; Gen. xviii. 21. ZANCHIUS († 1590) endeavors to prove from this expression that Heaven in which God is said to dwell, is a place in the created universe (ens creatum) above the visible heavens. But this is absurd. For it would follow, 1. That God is not everywhere, but is contained in Heaven, which is contrary to the doctrine taught in 1 Kings viii. 27. 2. That the birds in the air are nearer God, than are the pious and faithful on earth; thus AUGUSTINE argues (Book 2, the Sermon on the Mount, ch. ix.), If the habitation of God is believed to be in the Heavens, regarded as the higher parts of the world, then the birds are in reality better off than we, for their life is nearer to God." FÖRSTER.

44. Ver. 51. "His grief is so great, that it is not diminished by tears (as it ought to be, according to the ordinary course of nature), as the Poet says,

Expletur lacrymis, egeriturque dolor,

[Ovid, Tristia, 4, 3, 38], (appeased by tears and spent is grief), but rather is so intensified that it consumes his soul, i. e. his life, the heart, the seat of life, being consumed." FÖRSTER.

45. Ver. 53. "We are aroused to fervent prayer, by our own special calamity, as by an alarm-bell. Thus the people of God here acknowledge, that in the deepest anguish, when almost sunk into the ground in the graves of the lost, they had called on the name of the Lord and had been heard. As often then as God now casts a man into the grave, that is to say, lets him sink into some temporal misfortune or mental despair, he should remember that he is thereby summoned to prayer, that he should lift his heart to God and call upon Him with sighing and weeping." EG. HUNNIUS.

46. Ver. 55. "The prayer of the righteous, says AUGUSTINE, is the key of Heaven; as prayer ascends, the compassion of God descends." FÖRSTER.

47. Vers. 48-66. "Jeremiah thought that injustice was done him, although he did not regard himself as innocent before God, but ascribed everything that befell him and his people, to his own sins and to the sins of the people; yet he held that injustice was done him by his enemies, who persecuted him on account of the word of God. And in the same way may one, when he suffers wrong from his enemies, appeal to his innocence before God and men, as David says, Lord do me justice, for I am innocent (Ps. xxvi. 1). But before God no one should esteem himself guiltless, but we should remember that the evil which befalls us undeservedly at the hands of our enemies, is deservedly sent upon us by God, on account of other sins, that we should repent of. In repentance, moreover, no one should look and wait for others, before he himself makes a beginning, but as Jeremiah here sets an example of repentance before others, so should every one else do. Then, at least, there will be a general repentance, and God will regard our repentance and will hear us according to His promise, for which we shall praise Him for ever and ever. Amen." Würtemb. Summarien.

48. Ver. 57. ["Fear not. How powerful is this word when spoken by the Spirit of the Lord to a disconsolate heart. To every mourner we may say, on the authority of God, Fear not! God will plead thy cause, and redeem thy soul." CLARKE.]

49. Ver. 60. ["Thou hast seen. Everything is open to the eye of God. Distressed soul! though thou knowest not what thy enemies meditate against thee; yet He who loves thee does, and will infallibly defeat all their plots, and save thee." CLARKE.—"As soon as any trial assails us, we imagine that God is turned away from us; and thus our flesh tempts us to despair. It is hence necessary that the faithful should in this respect struggle with themselves and feel assured that God has seen them. Though, then, human reason may say, that God does not see, but neglect and disregard His people, yet on the other hand, this doctrine ought to sustain them, it being certain that God does see them. This is the reason why David so often uses this mode of expression." CALVIN.]

50. Ver. 60. "Quæ hic tormenta, crunt illic ornamenta. What are our torments here, will be our ornaments there." AUGUSTINE.

51. Vers. 64-66. With regard to prayer against enemies, see Doctrinal and Ethical remarks on i. 20-22.—[Prayer. "Grant, Almighty God, that as at this day ungodly men and wholly reprobate so arrogantly rise up against Thy Church, we may learn to flee to Thee, and to hide ourselves under the shadow of Thy wings, and fully to hope for Thy salvation; and that, however disturbed the state of things may be, we may yet never doubt but that Thou wilt be propitious to us, since we have so often found Thee to be our deliverer; and that we may thus persevere in confidence of Thy grace and mercy, and be also roused by this incentive to pray to Thee, until having gone through all our miseries, we shall at length enjoy that blessed rest which Thou hast promised to us through Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen." CALVIN.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 1-18. The lamentation of the Prophet.

1. A source of consolation to the pious in severe temptation. 2. A solemn warning to the ungodly. "We learn, here, how God often permits even His dearest children and the most holy of His chosen ones to be deeply tempted on earth, that they may have to some extent a taste of the agony of Hell. . . . But the ungodly, who live in this world tranquilly and happily, should regard the case of the righteous as a mournful foretelling of the pains of Hell, whereby they will yet, at some time, as by a mighty thunder-clap, be awakened out of their profound and dangerous sleep of false security." EG. HUNNIUS.

2. Vers. 19-21. How he who is tempted should strengthen himself in severe affliction. 1. He should lament his sorrow unto the Lord (pour out his heart before Him, Ps. lxxii. 9 (8); cii. 1 (title); cxlii. 3 (2)). 2. He should be assured that God is mindful of him (by Christ we have the knowledge of Divine Adoption, Rom. viii. 15, 16). 3. He should, on this account, rejoice in hope (Rom. xii. 12; 1 Thess. v. 16; Rom. v. 2).

3. Vers. 22, 23. Sermon on a special day of fasting and prayer by the court-preacher GRÜNEISEN, in PALMER'S ev. Casual-Reden, Bd. 1., S. 271. "Our text instructs us, 1. How God, even in times of affliction, shows His regard for us. 2. How we also, in such affliction, should show our regard for God."

4. Vers. 22, 23. "With what we may comfort ourselves when we feel that we are forsaken. 1. The goodness of the Lord, that helps to sustain us, so that we are not utterly overwhelmed. 2. The compassion of the Lord, which we experience every day. 3. The faithfulness of the Lord, which enables us to hope firmly in the fulfilment of all His promises." FLOREY, bibl. Wegweiser für geistliche Grabreden, Nr. 46.

5. Vers. 24, 25. "The happiness of a believing soul even in painful circumstances. 1. The consolation which it takes to itself,—God is my portion. 2. The resolution to which it is stimulated,—I will hope in Him. 3. The experience it makes proof of,—the Lord is gracious." FLOREY, ib. Nr. 47.

6. Vers. 26, 27. "The benefits of early affliction. 1. They teach at a time when men are most susceptible of instruction; and they teach them [what they most need to learn at that time of life] to recognize the vanity of earthly things and to give heed to the Word of God. 2. They purify at a time when the heart is in the greatest danger of being corrupted; and they purify them from [those besetting sins of youth] selfishness and sensuality. 3. They strengthen them at a time when strength is weakest and temptations to sin are the strongest; and they strengthen them especially to patient endurance on this earth and separation from this earth." FLOREY, ib. Nr. 48. See TROST und MAHNUNG an Gräbern, ii. Bändch., S. 154.

7. Vers. 27-33. The chastisements of the Lord. 1. He chastises not for the sake of making men miserable (ver. 33). 2. He chastises not forever (vers. 31, 32). 3. He chastises that we may learn, (1) patience (vers. 27, 28), (2) silence, quietness (ver. 29), (3) meekness (ver. 30), (4) hope (ver. 29).

8. Vers. 27-33. The Divine discipline. 1. Its source; Love (vers. 31-33). 2. Its means; Sorrow and joy (vers. 27-33). 3. Its aim; the perfecting of the man of God (vers. 27-30, see 2 Tim. iii. 17).

9. Vers. 31-33. "The blessed change with which believing Christians may console themselves. 1. After pain follows pleasure. 2. After death, life. 3. After separation, a restoration." FLOREY, as above, Nr. 49.

10. Ver. 32. "The history of the year's harvest an image of our history for the year. The resemblance appears in these respects: 1. How finely the whole country looked; 2. With what difficulty it withstood the power of the storm; 3. How, nevertheless, God's hand has protected us." BRYER S. E. (in Plauen), Harvest Sermon, 1866.

11. Vers. 37, 38. "No misfortune happens without God's will. 1. This is a great comfort to those on whom misfortune has fallen; for (1), they will not vex themselves unnecessarily with self-inflicted reproaches; (2), they will be more susceptible to the voice of the Gospel; (3), they will humble themselves under the mighty hand of God. 2. This is a strong support for the confidence in God of those who properly consider it; for (1), they will be freer from anxious cares; (2), stronger in their reliance on God's guidance; (3), they will be more perfect in the spiritual man. 3. This is a solemn warning to those who embrace this opinion; (1), that they do not sin against the wisdom of God; (2), that they do not violate brotherly love; (3), that they do not forestall the judgment of God's word." FLOREY, same as above, Nr. 251. See Trost und Mahnung an Gräbern, i. Edehen. s. 216.

12. Vers. 18-39. Sermon of G. CHR. DEICHERT on Midlent Sunday (see Stern aus Jakob, Stuttg., Liesching, 1867: "This Lenten Sunday brings us into sorrow's school, where we shall learn hope in God, under severe chastisement and in bitter trouble; where we shall learn submissive meekness, and yet have hours of respite, when we may take breath, gather fresh strength, and address ourselves anew to the conflict. But the first thing is that we pass the examination [or trial for entrance into this school]."

13. Vers. 39-42. "Weighty words for every one who is under the cross and in trouble. This, then, is no time for unbelieving, impatient, impenitent murmuring, but a time when we should examine ourselves, and learn in what respects we deserve what the Lord says to us, by means of such chastisements, and when we should submit patiently to His will, who smites us righteously, and thus implore grace." CALWER Handbuch Bibelklärung.—"If God chastises the sinner, but with measure, so that He still spares his life, then should not man, whose life is spared by the grace of God, lament on account of God's righteousness, and on account of the punishment of his own sins; rather every one should lament on account of his own sin, which has brought that punishment upon him; every one should complain of himself (not of God), for this is an indication of true penitence." LISCO.

14. Vers. 39-42. The murmuring that is forbidden and that which is commanded. 1. Forbidden, because unjustifiable, is murmuring over the evil we are obliged to suffer as a punishment of our sins (vers. 39, 42). 2. Commanded, is murmuring over our sins, by which we have offended God; and this is right only when it results (1), in sincere repentance (ver. 40); (2), in hearty prayer for God's grace.

15. Vers. 44-50. Of wrestling with God in prayer. 1. This presupposes an attack that God has made upon us, through the cross and trouble (vers. 45-47, comp. vers. 1-17). 2. It consists (1), on our part, in vehement prayer (vers. 48, 49); (2), on God's part, in the repeated rejection of our prayer (ver. 44). 3. It ends (1), on our part, with believing perseverance in prayer; (2), on God's part, with God-like acceptance of our prayers (ver. 50).

16. Vers. 48-66. Prayer of the innocent and persecuted man for help against his enemies. 1. Description of the wanton oppression of his enemies and the heart-felt lamentation of the oppressed (vers. 48-54). 2. Whither this one had turned himself [for help] in this difficulty. (Vers. 55-58; "We, who had been cast, as it were, into the pit of destruction and the abyss of terror and distress, knew not whither to betake ourselves, except unto Thee alone, O Lord! We called upon Thee out of our anguished hearts, and Thou didst hear us. Since Thou hast begun to hear, hide not now Thine ears from our sighs and our cries.") 3. Prayer, that God will not let the wickedness of his enemies go unrevenge. (Vers. 59-66: "With Thee, truly, O Lord, I have nothing to say, because one cannot answer Thee for one thing of a thousand. But this we commend to Thee, O Lord, as the Righteous Judge, that our enemies, without any justifying cause, have tyrannized over us so grievously. Thou hearest also their reproach, which is uttered not only against us, but much more against Thy holy name. Because they will not cease from this outrageous insolence, do Thou then set about to requite them, as they have deserved. Let their heart be terrified, that is now defiant; let them feel Thy curse, which now they despise"). Fifth Sermon of ERD. HUNNICUS on the 3d chap. of Lamentations.

CHAPTER IV.

ZION'S GUILT AND PUNISHMENT GRAPHICALLY DESCRIBED BY AN EYE-WITNESS, [OR THE SUFFERINGS OF THE PEOPLE OF ALL GRADES AND RANKS OF SOCIETY.—W. H. H.]

The Song consists plainly of four parts [or sections], vers. 1-6; 7-11; 12-16; 17-20; and a conclusion, vers. 21, 22.

PART I. VERS. 1-11.

SECT. I. VERS. 1-6.

- ⌘ VER. 1. How doth gold become dim!
 The choice gold change its color!
 The hallowed stones are cast forth
 At the head of every street.
- ⌘ VER. 2. The noble sons of Zion,
 Who are equal in value to the purest gold,
 How are they esteemed as earthen pitchers,
 The work of the hands of the Potter!
- ⌘ VER. 3. Even jackals drew out the breasts,
 They suckled their whelps.
 The daughter of my people became cruel,
 Like ostriches in the wilderness.
- ⌘ VER. 4. The tongue of the sucking babe cleaved
 To the roof of his mouth for thirst:
 Young children asked bread.
 There was no one to break to them.
- ⌘ VER. 5. They that fed on dainties
 Perished on the streets:
 They that were borne on scarlet Embraced heaps-of-dirt.
- ⌘ VER. 6. For greater was the iniquity of the daughter of my people
 Than the sin of Sodom,
 Which was overthrown as in a moment
 And no hands came against her.

SECT. II. VERS. 7-11.

- ⌘ VER. 7. Her princes were purer than snow,
 Whiter than milk,
 They were more ruddy in body than corals;
 Their form—a sapphire.
- ⌘ VER. 8. Their visage became darker than blackness;
 They were not known in the streets:
 Their skin cleaved to their bones,
 It became dry like a stick.
- ⌘ VER. 9. Happier were those slain by the sword
 Than these slain by famine,
 Those pierced-ones, whose lives gushed forth
 While yet there were fruits of the field.
- ⌘ VER. 10. The hands of tender-hearted women Cooked their own children;
 They became food for them
 In the ruin of the daughter of my people.

VER. 11. Jehovah fulfilled His fury;
 He poured out His fierce wrath.
 And He kindled a fire in Zion,
 And it consumed her foundations.

ANALYSIS.

[The first elegy related especially to the city of Jerusalem; the second, to Zion and the holy places; the third, to the sufferings of the prophet, as a representative of the spiritual Israel; this fourth elegy, relates to the sufferings of the people generally, embracing all classes.—W. H. II.]
 The two parts, comprising the first-half of the chapter, vers. 1—6, 7—11, correspond with each other, both in matter and form. In the first part, vers. 1—6, is described the sad fate of the sons of Zion, noble scions of the noblest lineage (Jer. ii. 21). A contrast is presented, not only between their great worth and their pitiable fortune, but also between the fate that befell them, who constituted the living treasure of Zion, and the fate of its material wealth, vers. 1, 2. Then is described the harrowing grief, caused by the sufferings of little children, which could not possibly be relieved, vers. 3—5. Finally this part closes with the general remark, that Zion's guilt, if inferred from these facts, had been even greater than Sodom's, ver. 6.
 In the second part, vers. 7—11, the Poet first describes the noble appearance and character of the Princes of Judah, and then, in striking contrast, the frightful wrongs they had endured, vers. 7—9; a description which evidently constitutes a parallel to that contained in vers. 1, 2. So, also, parallel to what was said of the children in vers. 3—5, is what we read on the same subject in ver. 10; only what is here said in ver. 10, constitutes a climax to what was related in vers. 3—5. The second part, like the first, ends with a general remark; Zion has suffered the full measure of Divine wrath, ver. 11.

IV. 1, 2.

1 How is the gold become dim! how is the most fine gold changed! the stones of 2 the sanctuary are poured out in the top of every street. The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, how are they esteemed as earthen pitchers, the work of the hands of the potter!

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1. יָגַם, see i. 1.—יָגַם, Hophal only here; elsewhere only Kal occurs, and that only twice, Ez. xxviii. 3; xxxi. 8. If the signification of יָגַם, demanded by the context in Ez. xxviii. 3, is latere,—and in xxxi. 8, is obscurare, then it naturally follows that the signification of the Hophal here is obscurari; though it is not yet clearly apparent how this meaning agrees with the idea of accumulation (Sammeln), which lies in the words יָגַם יָגַם יָגַם. [HENDERSON; “יָגַם” to congregate, Arabic, tezil, obstruxit, as clouds, when collected, do the heavens; hence to grow, or make dark, obscure the lustre of anything. LXX. ἐμαρπύθη.”]—יָגַם. With respect to its Aramaic form, see iii. 12; 2 Kings xxv. 29; Eccl. viii. 11. [BLAYNEY: “Twenty-five MSS. and one edition read יָגַם.”] The word has the signification of alium, diversum esse, mutari,—only in later Hebrew, Esth. i. 7; iii. 8; Mal. iii. 6; and that in accordance with the Chaldaic, which often uses יָגַם in this sense, Dan. iii. 27; v. 9; vi. 18.—פָּתַם, is not found in Jer.; it stands in parallelism with יָגַם; in Job xxxi. 24; Prov. xxv. 12; it is used with פָּתַם, Cant. v. 11. [The Sept. have ἀργύριον, not because they read הַכֶּכֶר, but because they were unwilling to repeat the word gold. ROSENMCLELLER.]

Ver. 2. יָקָרִים. In Jer. only in xv. 19.—כָּלָא only here. The expression seems to be taken from Job xxviii. 16, 19, where we read of wisdom כָּלָא כָּלָא כָּלָא. לֹא הִכְלָה בְּכָתֶם כָּלָא is tollere, pendere. [Jerome translates amicti auro, which CALVIN prefers. “The value, and not the appearance is evidently meant,” (OWEN); it is the explanation of יָקָרִים, precious.—W. H. II.]—פָּוּ from פָּוּ, secernere, purgare, does not occur in Jer.; yet see x. 9. The article generalizes the meaning.—Jer. never uses the Niphal נִחְשַׁב—נִחְשַׁב, Jer. xiii. 12; xlviii. 12.—חָרִישׁ, Jer. xix. 1; xxxii. 14. The construction with ל, as Is. xxix. 17; Ps. cvi. 31. Elsewhere, after נִחְשַׁב that with which the comparison is made is indicated by ב, יָגַם, or the simple nominative.—יָצַר, frequent in Jer. x. 16; xviii. 2, 3, 4; xix. 1, 11; etc. [No occasional use of a new word can invalidate the presumption created by the use of the image of a potter's vessel, that Jeremiah was the author of this poem.—W. H. II.]—The expression בְּיִשָּׁה, occurs here only.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. How. That this song also begins with this exclamation (יָגַם) is a strong argument for the identity of the author. It is in the highest degree improbable that different authors not only composed alphabetical songs on the same subject, but also began them with the very same word. How is the gold become dim!

how is the most fine gold changed! How may gold become black, the precious treasure change its color? The correct understanding of this verse depends on the understanding of the next verse and its relation to this verse. THEOPIUS would substitute in ver. 2, houses of Zion for sons of Zion (יָגַם instead of יָגַם). Without dwelling on the fact, that not the least critical evidence for such a change of the text is offered, the context affords sufficient evidence against it: for not only would houses equal in value to gold be an exaggerated hyperbole, but it is evident from the antithesis involved in the expression the work of the hands of the potter, and also from the subject of the parallel verses 7-9, that men are intended. But if we retain the reading sons of Zion, and if the meaning is that the sons of Zion, regarded as precious, are equal in value [comparable] to gold, then it is obvious in what sense gold and precious stones are spoken of in ver. 1. It is not of the fate of the Temple-gold and Temple-walls that he speaks [CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, NOYES, and seemingly WORDSWORTH]; but the Poet asks how is it possible that noble gold should lose its brightness, that the precious stones should be thrown upon the street? Thus, says he, it happened to the sons of Zion, who are such jewels. And thus, what never happened in the case of material treasures and jewels, has occurred in the case of these living, metaphorical jewels. We take, then, ver. 1, as a question, relating to what was likely to happen according to the usual course of things. This is involved in the use of the imperfect tense in the Hebrew verbs [עָצַב, etc.], which refer to matters not yet completed as, it was becoming dim or obscured, etc. In any other sense the perfect tense would have been necessary. Nor can these imperfects be referred to the work of destruction while in course of execution (THENIUS); for it would certainly be very singular to represent the Jews as saying, whilst the work of destruction was going on, "How is now the gold in the Temple blackened by the smoke! How now are the stones of the Temple-wall rolled down!" Those, over whose heads everything was going to pieces, could not be thinking of such minute and particular details as these. Rather, in the form of a question, what had never before been known to happen, is here affirmed. [The form is interrogative, only so far as the interjection of surprise suggests a question as to the possibility of an event, else unparalleled. The construction is the same as in i. 1, How siteth solitary the city that, etc.] So here, How doth gold become dim! That the reference is to men, and not to literal gold and jewels, is the opinion of BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, ROSENUELLER, GERLACH and others. GERLACH: "Since the chapter contains not one word (unless here) of the destruction and robbery of the Temple and palaces, but describes especially what befell the men, rather than the edifices of the city, (which latter theme had already been exhaustively discussed in chap. ii.), therefore the first verse must not be taken literally and explained of the Temple and its ornaments (Chald., MAURER, KALKAR, THENIUS; see i. 10). It is rather to be taken figuratively, either generally of the fall of all that was high and valuable in Israel, of which particular instances are cited in what follows, or, as MICHAELIS and ROSENUELLER have preferred, specifically, as explained by the following verse, which interprets the gold and holy stones of ver. 1, by the sons of Zion, whilst the words are thrown down at all the street-corners, find their explanation in the more detailed description of ver. 5. Besides, this designation of the sons of Zion as stones of holiness (אֲבִנֵי-קֹדֶשׁ), has an analogy in the stones of a crown (אֲבִנֵי-יָגוֹן, precious stones) in Zech. ix.

16. From this it appears, how unauthorized is the presumption (MICHAELIS, ROSENUELLER), which would perceive in the expression, stones of holiness, a reference to the stones on the breast-plate of the High Priest and, therefore, a designation of the Priests (whilst the gold denotes the people generally, and the precious ore [fine gold] the Princes), or would understand the words stones of holiness as referring directly to the stones on the breast-plate of the High Priest (MAURER [NOYES], see BELLERMANN, Urim u. Thum., S. 21. 'With the Israelites, thrown about dead on the streets, on account of their sins,—the holy stones—regarded as symbols of the people—will, at the same time, be scattered about at the corners of the streets.') The literal interpretation of the stones as the stones of the walls of the Sanctuary, by THENIUS and NEUMANN, [CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, etc.], (in which case the words should be אֲבִנֵי-הַקִּיר, is controverted by the improbability of their being scattered about through all the streets of the city,—an opinion, which is not made more acceptable by the conjecture of THENIUS, that all the streets of the city terminated near the Temple in an open square, for in any case the expression would then be very strongly hyperbolic.)—W. H. H.]—Become dim.—The signification of the verb (עָצַב, obscurari), is to be taken, not in the sense of a momentary effect, but of a continuous obscuration. For not a superficial and transient, but a deep and abiding depravation is affirmed in ver. 2, of the gold-like sons of Zion. What is said, then, is this, How can gold lose its bright lustre, and become dull, tarnished, black?—[How. The repetition of the how in the English version is as unnecessary here as in i. 1.—The most fine gold.—The Hebrew word for gold here is not the same Hebrew word used in the preceding clause. BROUGHTON has supplied the lack of an English equivalent by retaining the Hebrew word: How is the gold dimmed! how is the pure ethern changed! The Hebrew word (פָּתַח) has been variously derived and interpreted. Three explanations have received the sanction of high authority (see LANGR'S Comm., Cant. v. 11). It has been derived from פָּתַח, to hide, to hoard, hence esteemed precious. So BARNES, Job xxxi. 24. Dr. NAEGELSEBACH seems to adopt this sense. The English version also by using the superlative most fine gold. But if the word itself meant precious gold, the addition of the adjective טוב, good, would be superfluous. It has been derived, again, from פָּתַח in the supposed sense of being solid, dense, hence massive gold: so BLAYNEY, the best massy gold. Others derive it from פָּתַח=פָּתַח, to shine, to glitter, and explain it of some very valuable kind of metal like gold (so GERLACH the costly ore, or metal, Erz); or of a particular kind of gold that shines and sparkles, genus auri fulgentis, a micando (FÜRST'S Concordance). This last meaning seems to agree best with the sense here, the use of the word in Cant. v. 11, and the very peculiar use of the verb in Jer. ii. 22. According to ROSENUELLER, Chaldea rendered it נִי, splendor, the Syriac and JEROME, color.—Changed, faded or changed its color. GERLACH: "This can only denote a change of color, or loss of brightness, since the gold could not be changed in its substance." W. H. H.]—The stones of the Sanctuary are poured out in the top of every street. Thrown down are the stones of the sanctuary [stones of holiness, or consecrated stones] at the corners of all the streets. The expression stones of the sanctuary (אבני קֹדֶשׁ), is found only here. By itself it might properly denote the stones of the Temple walls, particularly since these are also called costly stones (קִרְוֵי יְקָרָה), 1 Kings v. 31 (17); vii. 9-11. But who would take the trouble to carry these away and pour them out in the corners of the streets? What THENIUS says of the concentration of the principal streets at the foot of the Temple-hill, is very problematical. Besides, the connection requires the sense of precious stones: for with such, not with wall-stones, however excellent, are the Sons of Zion compared as precious (קִרְוֵי יְקָרָה), and precious stones (אבני יְקָרָה), are often named, as here, in connection with gold, 2 Sam. xii. 30; 1 Kings x. 2, 10, 11. In regard to the use of precious stones in the Sanctuary, they were not only attached to the garments of the High Priest (Ex. xxviii. 9, 17-20; xxxix. 6, 10-13), but they were employed for ornamenting the Temple itself (2 Chron. iii. 6; 1 Chron. xxix. 2). Who would pour out such valuable stones in the corners of all the streets, that is to say, in the first corner one happened to come to? Even the enemy did not do that. Yet this thing happened to the sons of Zion though they were most precious jewels.

Ver. 2. The precious sons of Zion.—Zion's sons, the noble ones (בְּנֵי יְקָרָה, comp. קִרְוֵי יְקָרָה, honorable women, Ps. xlv. 10 (9)). That we are to understand here by the sons of Zion, the nobility of the people [CALVIN, HENDERSON], I do not believe. The expression is too comprehensive, and nothing prevents our understanding the following predicates of the chosen people generally,* who were in their totality a kingdom of priests (Ex. xix. 6). The Princes are spoken of for the first time in the second part, vers. 7-11, which constitutes throughout the climax of the first part.—Comparable to fine gold, who are equal in value to gold [lit., those who are weighed with pure gold. HENDERSON: "As what is weighed is estimated according to the contents of the opposite scale, the verb came to be employed in the sense of comparing one thing with another. Comp. Job xxviii. 16, 19."]—Fine gold, זָהָב, is pure, solid gold. [This is still another Hebrew word for gold, indicating its quality. BROUGHTON anglicizes it, Fesse ore, as he does פְּהַם in ver. 1, which he calls cethern. BLAYNEY: the purest gold.—W. H. H.] They are estimated by the gold, that is to say, their value is represented by a mass of gold, the weight of which is equal to their own. The expression is figurative.—How. [The repetition of this word זָהָב, is forcible. It serves to connect this verse with ver. 1, and to continue and complete the sentence begun with the same word in ver. 1. It shows that one idea of horror and amazement pervades the whole sentence, and hence that the gold, choice gold, and hallowed stones, of ver. 1, are identical with the precious sons of Zion, in ver. 2.—W. H. H.]—Are they esteemed as earthen pitchers—potsherd-pitchers—the work of the hands of the potter! [WORMSWORTH: "As Jeremiah himself had represented them to be shattered in pieces for their sins, xix. 10, 11." GATAKER: "As bottles of sherd, or earthen stuff, so Jer. xix. 1, 10; as things of no repute or worth, 2 Cor. iv. 7. See Jer. xxii. 28." GERLACH: "The point of comparison is the worthlessness of the material out of which they are made, see Is. xlv. 9."] precious, comparable to gold, by passages in which children are represented as of more value than any other gift of God, Gen. xv. 2; xxx. 1; Ps. cxxvii. 3. There is no necessity for this. It is much more natural to take these two introductory verses as embracing a general description of the humiliation of the whole people. The verses that follow give us the details of the picture, with reference to particular classes of people.—W. H. H.]

IV. 3-5.

3 Even the sea-monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones:
4 the daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness. The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth to the roof of his mouth for thirst; the young
5 children ask bread, and no man breaketh it unto them. They that did feed delicately are desolate in the streets; they that were brought up in scarlet embrace dung-hills.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 3.—[יָדוּן יָדוּן (K'ri, יָדוּן)]. Sea-monsters, E. V., BOOTHROYD: sea-calves, E. V. marg.: dragons, BROUGHTON, BLAYNEY, OWEN; serpent, CALVIN; jackals, HENDERSON, NOYES, FURST, Lex.: wolves, GERLACH: wild-dogs, THENIUS.]—הָיָה, never used in Jeremiah, is used of pulling off the shoe, in Dent. xxv. 9, 10; Is. xx. 2. The sense of drawing, seems to lie at the foundation of this root (see Hos. v. 6). Whether a second root הָיָה (from which comes הָיָה, one equipped, a warrior) may be affirmed, or whether the original identity of both may be established, we cannot now stop to inquire.—שָׁד, mamma, Jeremiah never uses [because he never had occasion to speak of the female breasts or teats.—W. H. H.]—Of the verb יָנַק, Jeremiah uses only once the Participle יֹנֵק, xlv. 7, in a substantive sense. [The only time Jeremiah in his prophecies had occasion to speak of a suckling, or make any allusion to a mother's nursing a child at the breast, he uses the participle of the verb יָנַק. What verb then would Jeremiah have been more likely to use in this place?—W. II. II.]—נָגַר, young-one [whelp], is found once in Jeremiah, in the form נָגַרִי, li. 33, see Nah. ii. 13.—בַּת-עַפְרַיִם. See ii. 11; iii. 48.—לְאַכְוֹר. The verb to be or become must be supplied. See EWALD, § 217 d, a. אַכְוֹר (Jeremiah uses only אַכְוֹרִי, vi. 23; xxx. 14; 1. 42) is the cruel one, Job xxx. 21. We would expect the feminine form; but that is never used, and, besides, the masculine form seems intended to convey the idea of unwomanly, unmotherly; it is as if we were said, Zion has become a hardened man.—בְּעֵינַיִם. The Masorites connect the two words and read בְּעֵינַיִם. It is true that עֵינָן occurs only here (elsewhere the ostrich is called בַּת-עֵינָה, the daughter of screeching, Mic. i. 8; Job. xxx. 29, etc.). Yet the K'ri is to be approved of. For, on the one hand, the separation could easily happen by mistake; and, on the other hand, עֵינַיִם, as the K'tib has it, gives no satisfactory sense. It must be translated, For criers (Heuler) in the wilderness (are they). To supply הַפִּהָה here is difficult, and who are the criers in the wilderness? The children, or (as others prefer) their parents? [Forty-five of KENNICOTT'S MSS., and seventy-seven of DE ROSSI'S, and most of the early printed editions of the 15th century, according to HENDEPERSON and GERLACH, have בְּעֵינַיִם, without any reference to another reading, "NEUMANN, in support of the K'tib, would understand by the crying ones (Heulenden) the wild beasts of the wilderness, as the Venetian Greek, ὡς σαρπηφες" (GERLACH).—W. II. II.]

Vers. 4.—וְגַם-הִבְכָּה. The same phrase is found in Job xxix. 10; Ps. cxxxvii. 6; comp. xxii. 16 (15); Ez. iii. 26, where אָל is used.—Jeremiah uses הִבְכָּה never [because he never had occasion to, not happening ever to speak of the palate, or roof of the mouth.—W. II. II.]. רִבְּבָה twice, xliii. 11; xliii. 16: יוֹנֵק once, xlv. 7: לְשׁוֹן frequently, v. 15; ix. 2, 4, 7, etc.: צִבְיָה once for צִבְיָה, xlviii. 18.—עוֹלָלָהִים. See i. 5; ii. 19; Jer. vi. 11; ix. 20 (21).—פְּרִישׁ, a scribal variety for פִּרְשׁ, as Mic. iii. 3; see Is. lviii. 7; Jer. xvi. 7.

Vers. 5.—אָכַל-לֶחֶם is frequently constructed with בְּ (Ex. xii. 43-45; Lev. ii. 11; Jud. xiii. 16), but nowhere except here with לְ. EÖRTCHER urges the לְ, and translates admitted to dainties, or directed to dainties [לְ] having a local sense, as 2 Sam. ix. 7, or Job xii. 8. See THENIUS]. THENIUS supposes the allusion to be rather to the external surroundings of delicate food, than to the food itself. But it is not apparent how אָכַל can mean to admit, to direct, or how לְ can denote something around. If לְ is to be explained as a Hebraism, then we must adopt a pregnant construction, and regard לְ as dependent on an omitted verb of craving after, longing for. See Prov. xxiii. 3, 6, אֶל-תִּתְאוּ לְמִטְעַפּוֹתָיו, comp. xxiv. 1. To eat after dainties would, then, be the same as seeking to eat such. Our book, however, was written at a time when an Aramaic expression cannot surprise us. Besides, there is found in Jeremiah an undoubted example of this Aramaic לְ, as a nota accusativi, xl. 2. [Note this as a mark of Jeremiah's authorship, that is a set-off, at least, against many of the trivial exceptions to his style.—W. II. II.] See EWALD, § 277, e. [GESENIUS Gr., § 151, e. "It is a solecism of the later stylé, when active verbs are construed with לְ, instead of the accusative, as לְ אָכַל, Lam. iv. 5."—GERLACH takes the whole expression adverbially, nach Herzenslust assen, they ate according to their heart's desire.—W. II. II.]—מְעֵרְנֵימֵם. See Gen. xlix. 20; 1 Sam. xv. 32; Prov. xxix. 17. מְעֵרְנֵי, Jer. li. 34, is composed of מָן and עֵרְנֵי (Ps. xxxvi. 9 (8); 2 Sam. i. 24.—נִשְׁכָּה). See Jer. iv. 9; Ez. iv. 17, where the word is used as here of persons.—אֲכָן is the technical word for the nurture of children: see אֲכָן, Num. xi. 12; Is. xlix. 23; 2 Kings x. 1, 5; Esth. ii. 7: אֲכָנָה, Ruth. iv. 16; 2 Sam. iv. 4. The fundamental meaning seems to be to carry, support, raise up; see אֲכָנָה a column, אֲכָן, אֲכָנָה, the one who erects a building, the architect. אֲכָנֵי are then gestati, see Is. ix. 4. Jeremiah uses Niphal, xv. 18; xliii. 5, and Hiphil, xii. 6; xl. 14, but only in an ethical sense.—הוֹלֵךְ-לֶחֶם does not occur in Jeremiah.—The word אֲשַׁפְּרוֹת occurs only here. The plural אֲשַׁפְּרוֹת in 1 Sam. ii. 8; Ps. cxliii. 7; Neh. ii. 13; iii. 13, 14; xii. 31. The signification is undoubtedly dirt (Koth). For its derivation, see EWALD, § 186, e; OLSH., § 211, a.—The verb הִבְכָּה, Jeremiah uses in no form. Piel is to embrace.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 3. Vers. 1, 2, describe the misfortunes of Zion from a theocratic point of view; vers. 3-5 show how terrible they were, as seen from a natural point of view, by describing the pitiable misery of the poor children: see i. 5; ii. 11, 12, 19, 20. Even the sea-monsters (marg. sea-calves) [jackals, or wolves] draw out [drew-out] the breast, they give [gave] suck to their young ones. That the Hebrew word translated sea-monsters, תַּיִךְ, here stands for תַּיִם = jackals (see Jer. ix. 10 (11); x. 22; xiv. 6, etc.), was an opinion of the Masorites, which many of the moderns have adopted from the Syriac. In fact, תַּיִךְ is the Aramaic plural ending (see Olsh. § 111 b), which would not be surprising here. תַּיִךְ, as a singular (see Jer. li. 34) is bellua maritima (see Gen. i. 21), which is defined at one time as a dragon, at another as a whale, at another as a crocodile, at another as a serpent (comp. Ex. vii. 9, 10; Deut. xxxii. 23; Ps. lxxiv. 13, etc.). That the sea-monsters draw out for use the teats, which are contained in the breasts as in bags or sheaths, BOCHART (in the Hierozoicon, tom. iii. p. 777, ed. Rosenmüller) authenticates, by many evidences, as a fact known to the ancients. There is on this account, therefore, no reason for departing from the sense indicated by the text. [There are, however, several other reasons for regarding this word as an Aramaic plural for jackals or for wolves (GERLACH), which belong to the same family. These are, 1. The plural forms of the verbs (drew out, gave suck) and of the suffix (their young-ones), which would require תַּיִמִּים instead of תַּיִךְ, if sea-monsters were intended. 2. The fact that וּלְ is used of the whelps of lions, bears, dogs, and animals of similar species. 3. The authority of the Masorites. 4. The frequent occurrence of Aramaic forms in Jeremiah's writings. 5. The agreement of so many versions and commentators, ancient and modern. 6. The probability that jackals, wolves, or animals of that description, would occur to the mind of the Prophet in connection with the events of which he speaks. There was nothing to suggest the monsters of the deep, and the comparison, if referred to them, seems forced and far-fetched. But as the Prophet recalls the consequences of the destruction of Jerusalem, as he remembers how the foxes even now had possession of the mountain of Zion, v. 18, he cannot forget how hungry beasts of prey had revelled in the land, and prowled about the deserted villages and even the streets of Jerusalem itself. Even those beasts had shown the instincts of natural affection at least. And hence the natural contrast between them and the mothers, who, before the beasts appeared on the scene, forsook their own babes and refused to give them nourishment. It should be observed here that the verbs in this verse and in all the following description are in the past time. The Prophet is describing what had happened; not what was then transpiring. This use of the perfect tense shows that he was referring, not in the abstract, to what it is in the nature of jackals to do, but in the concrete, to what had been actually observed of them. Even (the D is emphatic) jackals, that infested the depopulated country, drew out their breast, etc.—The expression drawing out the breast is suggested by the common habit of women in drawing out the breast from the covering robe and presenting it to the child; a mulieribus lactantibus, quæ laxata veste mammam lactanti præbent (JUNIUS, quoted by GERLACH).—W. H. II.]—The daughter of my people is become cruel, [became cruel. Lit. was turned into a cruel one (GATAKER), see Job xxx. 21. CALVIN says: “The daughter of my people is come to the cruel one, for the people had to do with nothing but cruelty, . . . He, then, does not accuse the people of cruelty, that they did not nourish their children, but on the contrary, he means that they were given up to cruel enemies.” But the preceding part of this verse and what follows in vers. 4, 5, and especially in the climax presented in ver. 10, require the sense given in our English version, in which the versions agree with great unanimity. The Prophet gives us a frightful instance of the effect of suffering and starvation. Mothers became more unnatural than jackals or hyenas that suckle their young; and forsook their babes, not merely to avoid the sight of pains they could not alleviate, but to escape the exhausting demands upon their own waning strength,—nay, the mania induced by extreme suffering destroyed their affection for their children.—W. H. II.]—Like the ostriches in the wilderness. In reference to the want of feeling towards its young in the ostrich, THIENIS refers to OKEN’S Natural History (vii. s. 655, ff.). See BOCHART, Hieroz. P. II. L. II. cap. 14, pag. 824; cap. 17, pag. 851 seqq. ed. ROSENK.—WINER R. W. L. s. v.

Strauss. Job xxxix. 13-17. [“On the least noise or trivial occasion she forsakes her eggs or her young ones, to which perhaps she never returns: or if she does, it may be too late either to restore life to the one, or to preserve the lives of the others. Agreeably to this account, the Arabs meet sometimes with whole nests of these eggs undisturbed; some of them are sweet and good, others are addled and corrupted; others again have their young ones of different growth, according to the time, it may be presumed, they may have been forsaken of the dam. They often meet with a few of the little ones no bigger than well-grown pullets, half-starved, straggling, and moaning about, like so many distressed orphans, for their mother.” (SHAW’S Travels, quoted by NOYES). “The Arabs call the ostrich the impious or ungodly bird, on account of its neglect and cruelty towards its young,” (BARNES on Job xxxix. 13).]

Ver. 4. The tongue of the sucking child cleaveth [cleaved] to the roof of his mouth for thirst. See Job xxix. 10; Ps. cxxxvii. 6, comp. xxii. 16 (15); Ez. iii. 26.—Young children ask [asked] bread [see ii. 11, 12], and no man breaketh it unto them [and there was no one to break to them].

Ver. 5. They that did feed delicately, they that ate dainties [or, fed on dainties, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, NOYES].—Are desolate in the streets, perish [perished] on the streets, [i. e. by starvation, while seeking in vain for food.—W. H. II.].—They that were brought up in scarlet, they who were carried on crimson [carried on cloths, or borne on couches of scarlet, crimson, or purple color, made of costly materials of Tyrian dyes.—W. H. II.] Scarlet, the red dyeing material, got from the cochineal worm; see Ex. xvi. 20; Is. i. 18.—Embrace dunghills, embrace the dirt [embraced dirt-heaps, the heaps of dirt, refuse (RUBBISH, FUERST’S Lex.), lying in the streets of the city.—W. H. II.]. To embrace the dirt (see Job xxiv. 8, embrace the rock) can only mean to have it between the arms, which is done by them who lie in the dirt. Sterquilinea arripiunt, et super ea veluti toto corpore incumbunt, ut fame confecti cibum inde eruant. (They eagerly grasp the dunghills, stretched out upon them, as it were at full length, that, dying of hunger, they may thence seize their food).—PAREAU. [The idea of seeking food in the dirt-heaps of the city streets, confuses the two very distinct members of this verse. Little children, who had been fed on delicacies, perished in the streets while vainly seeking food; and thus, those, who had been borne on costly couches covered with the richest goods, lay now dying, with outstretched hands embracing, as it were, the heaps of filth in the city streets. To embrace the dirt is a familiar image in all languages: to embrace the dirt-heaps of an oriental city, so proverbially filthy, intensifies the figure. The whole description is highly poetical.—W. H. II.]

IV. 6.

6 For the punishment of the iniquity of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom, that was overthrown as in a moment, and no hands stayed on her.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 6. The expression הפניקה is taken from Gen. xix. 25 (וַיִּפְּקֵהוּ אֶת-הָעָרִים), comp. Jer. xx. 16, and בְּמִהֲפִיקָהּ, Deut. xxix. 22; Is. xliii. 19; Am. iv. 11; Jer. 1. 40). הִלָּךְ is derived, not from הָלַךְ, but from הִלָּךְ (so derived apparently by the Sept. and Syr.). The latter denotes to relax, to be powerless, Judg. xvi. 7; Is. lvii. 10; it can also very well be said of the hands, and there is no necessity of resorting, by any artificial method, to a modification of the idea of gyrate. In reference to this word, see Jer. v. 3. Jer. uses the Kal of גָּדַל, v. 27, and the Hiphil, xlvi. 26, 42.—עֵינֶךָ is frequent with him, ii. 22; iii. 13; xliii. 22; etc.—בֵּית-עֵבְרִי, see ii. 11.—הִטָּאתְּ often in Jer. xvi. 10; xvii. 13; etc.—רָנַע also, iv. 20; xviii. 7, 9.—כָּמוֹ-רָנַע occurs only here; yet see כִּרְנַע, Num. xvi. 21; xvii. 10; Ps. xlii. 19.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 6. With this verse the Poet concludes the first part of his Song. This verse corresponds to ver. 11, which constitutes a similar conclusion. In both cases the Poet draws a general inference from the preceding particular facts, which he had related in detail. In this verse the inference is, that the guilt of Zion was proved to be greater than the sin of Sodom.—For the punishment of the iniquity (marg. For the iniquity) of the daughter of my people is greater than the punishment of the sin of Sodom.—And the guilt of the daughter of my people was greater than the sin of Sodom. I cannot agree with those who take עֵינֶךָ and הִטָּאתְּ in the sense of the punishment of sin. This sense is not capable of proof. In all the cases appealed to for this purpose (Gen. iv. 13; 1 Sam. xxviii. 10; 2 Sam. xvi. 12; Is. v. 18; Ps. xxxi. 11), on more exact examination, their original meaning of sin, guilt, appears to be their real meaning. And this is true in reference to הִטָּאתְּ, for which some would justify the sense of pœna peccati, from the passages Num. xxxii. 23; Is. xl. 2; Zech. xiv. 9. See DRECHSLER on Is. v. 18. In גָּדַל = was greater, lies, then, the thought, it being allowable to infer the cause from the effect, that Zion's guilt is shown to be greater than was the sin-guiltiness (Sündenschuld) of Sodom. There is certainly in the vav before גָּדַל a causal intimation. For it amounts to the same thing, as far as the sense is concerned, whether I infer the effect from the cause with the words and so, or the cause from the effect with the word for. This causal use of the vav, moreover, is sufficiently established; see Ps. vii. 10; lx. 13; xcv. 5; Prov. xxiii. 3; Gen. xxii. 12; Jer. xvi. 12; xxxiii. 36; xxxi. 3; Is. xxxix. 1; Hos. iv. 4; vi. 4; etc. See my Gr. § 110, 1. [The Vav coordinates the proposition with what precedes in the relation of cause to effect. These things were so, for the sin was greater, etc. As the vav is here the initial letter, the stress laid upon it shows the masterly manner in which the author of the poem often makes the acrostic, which in common hands would be constrained and merely artificial, contribute to the spirit and force of the sentiment. This is true, whether we take the words discussed, in the sense of sin or the punishment of sin; but the fact that it is emphatic is an argument in favor of the sense in which Dr. NÆGELSBACH construes it, and this added to the doubt whether עֵינֶךָ and הִטָּאתְּ ever do mean the punishment of sin, may decide us in favor of his translation. The other translation gives good sense and fits in admirably with the context, and is adopted without hesitation by all the English versions and commentators (except WORDSWORTH), and by CALVIN and GERLACH. Yet CALVIN says: "If any one prefers the other version, I will not contend, for it is not unsuitable; and hence also a most useful doctrine may be drawn, that we are to judge of the grievousness of our sins by the greatness of our punishment; for God never exceeds what is just when He takes vengeance on the sins of men. Then His severity shows how grievously men have sinned. Thus, Jeremiah may have reasoned from the effect to the cause, and declared that the people had been more wicked than the Sodomites. Nor is this unreasonable; for . . . the Prophets everywhere charged them as men who not only equalled but also surpassed the Sodomites, especially Ezekiel (xvi. 46, 47). Isaiah also called them the people of Gomorrah, and the king's counsellors and judges, the princes of Sodom (Is. i. 9, 10). This mode of speaking is then common in the Prophets, and the meaning is not unsuitable." The Sept. translates both words avoia; the Vulg. one iniquitas, the other peccatum.—W. H. H.].—That was overthrown as in a moment. Sodom's guilt was great, and the punishment decreed for it corresponded to the greatness of its sin: it was destroyed instantaneously by fire falling from Heaven (see Gen. xix. 25), whereby its punishment was proved to be supernatural and divinitus immissa [sent from God]. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God (Heb. x. 31). [BLAYNEY: "Sodom was destroyed by a sudden act of God, which the Prophet thinks preferable to lingering and wasting away with disease or want, as was the case in Jerusalem during the long siege."]—And no hands stayed on her—and no hands became slack (relaxed) thereby. That Sodom was destroyed, not by the hands of men, but by the hand of God alone, is a fact that is emphasized as giving intensity to the severity of its punishment. Yet, our Poet would say, the fate of Jerusalem was still more terrible, because its guilt was greater than Sodom's. With what propriety this could be affirmed, is easily comprehended. For there had not been on the part of Sodom and Gomorrah such fulness of manifestation of the long-suffering love of God, as in the case of Jerusalem, (see Jer. vii. 13, 25; xi. 7; xxv. 4; Ez. xvi. 46-48; Is. i. 10; Matt. xi. 23, 24). But if it be asked, in what respect Jerusalem's fate had been more dreadful than that of Sodom, the answer, it seems to me, is contained in the עָבַר כְּכֹסֵי רֵגֶל—as in a moment. Sodom's sufferings in death were brief: there were no starving children, no mothers who cooked their children. Jerusalem's sufferings were long and protracted, whereby was produced that horrible crime! Eversio Sodomæ fuit instar subitæ apoplexiæ, eversio autem Hierosolymæ fuit instar lentæ tabis [the overthrow of Sodom was a kind of sudden apoplexy, but the overthrow of Jerusalem was a kind of slow consumption], says FÖRSTER. [Dr. NÆGELSACH has not made his sense of this difficult clause very apparent. It seems hardly credible that כָּה should mean thereby (dadurch). If the verb is derived from הָלַח instead of הָלַל, the translation of either BLAYNEY or OWEN, is to be preferred. BLAYNEY translates nor were hands weakened in her, referring to the suddenness of the destruction, and forming a parallelism with the preceding clause, overthrown as in a moment. OWEN translates, and not wearied against (or over) her were hands, and says, "This is substantially the Sept. and Syr. GROTIUS says that the meaning is, that Sodom was destroyed not by human means, that is, not by a siege as Jerusalem had been." WORDSWORTH: "And no hands were weary on her. No human hands were wearied by destroying her, but she was suddenly consumed by the hand of God." If we accept of the usual derivation of the verb from הָלַל, then the translation of THURNEUR may be commended for its simplicity, and is supported by the dual form of הַיָּדַי=hands, and no one in her wrung the hands. But, as GERLACH shows, the dual form is constantly used for the plural (see הַיָּדַי, all hands, Is. xiii. 7), and the verb הָלַל is used with הַיָּדַי of the object, of brandishing the sword against the cities of Ephraim (Hos. xi. 6): we may, therefore, understand the sense to be, and no hands (i. e., human hands) were wrung round (or brandished) against it, men's hands were not brought against it. This seems to correspond with Dr. NÆGELSACH's interpretation, and is the sense generally adopted. BOOTHROUD: Without the hands of men. HENDERSON: And no hands attacked her. NOYES: Though no hands came against her.—W. H. H.]

IV. 7-9.

7 Her Nazarites were purer than snow, they were whiter than milk, they were 8 more ruddy in body than rubies, their polishing was of sapphire: Their visage is 9 blacker than a coal; they are not known in the streets; their skin cleaveth to their bones; it is withered, it is become like a stick. They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger: for these pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 7.—כֹּסֵי. The word occurs only in Job xv. 15; xxv. 5; and in Hiph. Job lx. 30.—וָרָר does not occur in Jeremiah. [Yet נִרְרָה, Jer. vii. 29, is a remarkable coincidence in the use of language, if הָרַרִים means crowned-ones, as Dr. NÆGELSACH suggests.—W. H. H.]—נֶלֶג, Jer. xviii. 14.—The verb נֶלֶג, splenditum esse, nitere, is found only here. The adjective נֶלֶג in Jer. iv. 11.—הָלַב in Jeremiah only in the phrase וְזֶה הָלַב הָאֵרֶן וְזֶה הָלַב הָאֵרֶן, xi. 5; xxxii. 22.—Kal אָרַם is found only here. The sense without doubt is to be red, reddish. The same meaning adheres to the derived conjugations, Pual Ex. xxv. 5, xxvi. 11; xxxv. 7, 23; Neh. ii. 4), Hiph. (Is. i. 18), Hitpacl (Is. i. 18). The word does not occur in Jeremiah.—עָצָב (in Jer. viii. 1; xx. 9; xxiii. 9) stands here as pars pro toto. See Prov. xv. 30; xvi. 24; and יָעַב, Ps. cxxxix. 15. [BLAYNEY absurdly translates, They were redder on the bone, and thus explains, "In the preceding line the whiteness of their skin is described; in this their flesh, which was red underneath towards the bone, marking their high health."—(see Ez. i. 26; x. 1) does not occur in Jeremiah.]

Ver. 8.—חֲשֵׁהוּ. Jeremiah uses the Hiphil, only once, xiii. 16.—שֹׁהַר occurs only here (see שֹׁהַר, J. r. ii. 18). [The translation of BLAYNEY, dusker than the dawn, and of HENDERSON, darker than the dawn, would require us to translate שֹׁהַר, and then the comparison could only be with the darkness of the very early dawn, and would be an awkward figure at that.—W. H. H.]—הָאָרָם. See Jer. xi. 16.—נִכְרָה, Niph. of נָכַר, see Prov. xxvi. 24; Job xxxiv. 19. In Jeremiah Piel is found, xix. 4, and Hiphil xxiv. 5.—נִצְפָה, firmiter adherere, only here.—עָרַם, see iii. 4.—וְגַם, see Jos. ix. 5. In Jeremiah the verb יָבַשׁ is often found, xxiii. 10; i. 33, etc. The adjective יָבֵשׁ he never uses.—יָיִן is frequent in Jeremiah, ii. 20; lii. 6, 9, 13, etc.

Ver. 9.—For the meaning of הַיָּדַי, see iii. 26.—The expression הָלַח הָרַב is found in Jer. xiv. 18, but is especially frequent with Ezekiel, xxxi. 17, 18; xxxii. 21-21.—שֵׁ רֵלָטִיבִי, see ii. 15.—יָבָהּ. The word is found in Jeremiah only in xlix. 4, and then in another sense. Here it most evidently denote the dissolving of life, i. e., the lingering dying of the starving. The word does not, indeed, occur elsewhere in this sense, for everywhere else it stands for the virile flux or female menses, or for confluence or abundant flowing together (וַיִּזְרַח וַיִּבְרַח, Ex. iii. 8, etc.), or for copious water-floods (Ps. lxxviii. 20; cv. 41; Is. xlviii. 21). But the connection absolutely requires us to take the idea of flowing, which the word undoubtedly has, in this modification of it. PAREAU, also, with propriety, calls attention to the closely related word דָּבַח, tabescere (Jer. xxxi. 12, 25; Ps. lxxxviii. 10). He also shows that in the Latin, a similar affinity exists between tabescere and liquescere. For as SENECA at one time says (Epist. 26) incommodum summum est minui et deperire et, ut proprie dicam, liquescere, so he says another time, (Medea, ver. 590), in rivos nivibus solutus sole jam forti, medioque vere, tabuit Hæmus. [See critical notes below.] מְרַקְרֵק. Jeremiah uses the word twice, xxxvii. 10; li. 4, and both times the Part. Pual.—The expression מְרַקְרֵק is found in Deut. xxxii. 13; comp. Ez. xxxvi. 30; Is. xxvii. 6; Judg. ix. 11. מְרַקְרֵק does not occur in Jeremiah, but מְרַקְרֵק does, iv. 17; xviii. 14. מְרַקְרֵק, here, cannot possibly have the positive sense of giving out, failure, or that of positive causality. It must rather be taken in its negative sense, away, far from, without. See ver. 13; and Jer. xlviii. 45; Job xi. 15; xxi. 9. See my Gr., § 112, 5 d.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 7-11. The plan of this part [which may be regarded as the antistrophe to vers. 1-6.—W. H. H.] is exactly similar to that of vers. 1-6. It begins with a description of what the Princes of Zion had to suffer. This description corresponds evidently to what was said generally of the sons of Zion, vers. 1, 2, of whom the Princes are the flower. But vers. 7-9 form a climax to vers. 1, 2, which appears in the fact that what is said of the Princes of Zion, in vers. 8, 9, surpasses what is said of the sons of Zion in the last clause of ver. 2. Ver. 10 corresponds in a similar way with vers. 3-5, what was said there, being surpassed here. Ver. 11, finally, corresponds with ver. 6; for like it, ver. 11 contains a definite, comprehensive and inferential conclusion.

Ver. 7. Her Nazarites—her Princes. That מְרַקְרֵק here cannot denote the Nazarites is evident, not so much from the description which is given of them, for that would be very suitable to a Samson for instance, as from the fact that the Nazarites were a mere fraction of the whole people, too scattered and numerically insignificant to be mentioned here with such particularity. Rather as they [the Nazarites] were said to be coronati, crowned ones, from their unshorn hair [see Num. vi. 19, הִתְגַּלְחוּ אֶת־נְטָרוֹ = his crown is shaven off of him; מְרַקְרֵק, the unshorn hair, or crown, Jer. vii. 29.—W. H. H.], so the Poet here calls the Princes crowned ones [see מְרַקְרֵק, to encircle, hence מְרַקְרֵק, a crown, diadem or chaplet.—W. H. H.] from the golden crown which they wore. It is true this is a poetical expression, which is not of frequent occurrence; for we can only compare Gen. xlix. 26 (Deut. xxxiii. 16), where Joseph is called מְרַקְרֵק, the crowned one among his brothers. It is, besides, very apparent that the Poet was required to select a subject, to which the brilliant predicates, which he heaps up in ver. 7, would be appropriate. [GATAKER gives the same meaning and derivation to the word, and refers to Nah. iii. 17, מְרַקְרֵק, thy crowned ones, or honorable ones. It seems more likely, however, that the word designates Princes or nobles, not from any allusion to their being crowned, which is not obvious, but because they constituted a separate and distinguished class of persons, were set apart for honorable offices, as the Nazarites were for strictly religious services (non voto sed dignitate separati; NOLDIUS, quoted by GERLACH). So CALVIN explains the word in Gen. xlix. 26, and BLAYNEY and GERLACH here. BOOTHROYD translates nobles. NOYES, princes. HENDERSON retains the word Nazarites.—W. H. H.]—Were purer—more shining [glistering, glänzender]. The word in Job xv. 15; xxv. 5, represents the brightness of the heavens and the stars.—Than snow. The comparison with the glistening white snow is found, also in Ps. li. 9 (7); Is. i. 18.—They were whiter than milk. [Purer than snow, whiter than milk, according to ordinary Bible usage, are beautiful metaphors for innocence of character and life. Here, however, they refer entirely to physical appearance, the resplendent beauty of their complexion, as is plain from what follows: not of their garments, as some have imagined, but of their bodies, as is evident from the antithesis in the next verse.—W. H. H.]—They were more ruddy in body than rubies (Röthlicher strahlten sie am Leibe als Korallen), their body was of a more reddish hue than corals. “Red on white is the normal color of the human complexion, the prime-color of beauty, Cant. v. 10; Lam. iv. 7,” says DELITZSCH, Psychol., p. 75. [CALVIN, understanding Nazarites as intended, supposes that their red color was a mark and evidence of God’s favor as in the cases of the Hebrew children recorded in Daniel. “We know that the Nazarites abstained from wine and strong drink: hence abstinence might have lessened somewhat of their ruddiness. For he who is accustomed to drink wine, if he abstains for a time, is apt to grow pale; he will then lose almost all his color, at least he will not be so ruddy; nor will there appear in his face and in his members so much vigor as when he took his ordinary support. Jeremiah, in short, teaches us that the blessing of God was conspicuous in the Nazarites, for He wonderfully supported them while they were for a time abstinent.” This necessity of appealing to a possible miracle may itself create a doubt, if Nazarites are here referred to at all. That in such a corrupt state of society as existed, at that period of their history, among the Jews, there were many who assumed the vows of the Nazarite, is doubtful. There is no allusion to the existence even of Nazarites among the people at this time, in either the prophetic or historical books. But that there was not only such a class, but that they were so remarkable for their piety and so acceptable to God, that God gave them such evidences of His favor as were bestowed on Daniel and his brethren, making them conspicuous among men by their personal beauty, especially by the ruddiness of their complexion, we cannot believe. And it would be incredible and horrible that upon that particular class the heaviest judgments descended, as is related in the next verse. If we infer from their personal beauty, in ver. 7, that they were special favorites of Heaven, we must conclude, from the transformation of their appearance into that of ugliness, in ver. 8, that they were also special objects of Divine wrath. The two things do not agree. This alone proves that Nazarites are not intended. The description of their personal appearance, which could only apply to Nazarites, by some such forced construction as requires CALVIN to invoke the aid of a miracle, is entirely appropriate to that class of the nobility represented by the Princes, who lived delicately and luxuriously, and whose faces, not embrowned by exposure to the weather, nor seamed and roughened by a life of hardship, were flushed and shining from the effects of high living, and whose persons beamed and glistened, as it were, from the care bestowed upon them, and the pains taken to beautify and adorn themselves. Perhaps the idea conveyed by the Hebrew verbs of the glistening quality of their white and red complexion, may be due to the then prevailing use of unguents.—W. H. H.]—Rubies, corals, דָּוִדָּן. Concerning this word, which occurs besides in Job xxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 15; viii. 11; xx. 15; xxxi. 10, opinions are much divided. The translations are entirely at variance: Sept. λίθοι, Symm. τὰ περὶ θηπέα, Chald. lapides pretiosi, Syr. sardinus, JEROME, ebur antiquum. Among the moderns, BOOTHUS (animadv. ss., IV. 3), whom J. D. MICHAELIS, GESenius, MAURER and THIENIS [HENDERSON, NOYES, GERLACH, FÜRST] follow, maintains the signification to be corals; against which BOCHART (Hieroz. P. ii., L. V., Cap. 6, 7, ed., ROSENK., Tom. iii., pag. 601 seqq.) contends for pearls. His opinion is especially maintained by PAREAU (not on this passage, but in his remarks on Job xxviii.) and supported with new arguments. LEYER also (in HERZ. R.-Enc. XI., p. 399) is inclined to adopt this side. The decision is difficult. Corals agree best with the context, since the existence of reddish pearls is too slightly established, and the meaning of glistening for the Hebrew דָּוִדָּן is entirely hypothetical.—Their polishing was of sapphire, a sapphire was their form.—Their polishing, their form, Ger. Gestalt; Fr. taille; Lat. forma, figura [Eng. mien, general appearance]. The word (דָּוִדָּן, from דָּוִדָּן iii. 54) occurs in this sense only here. In the description of Ezekiel's temple it is used of the northern porch, xli. 12-15; xlii. 1, 10, 13. [BLAYNEY, after BRAUNUS (see Pictorial Bible), taking the word from דָּוִדָּן to divide, or intersect, translates, their veining was the sapphire; alluding to the blue veins appearing through the white and red complexions. So BOOTHROYD and ADAM CLARKE. This would be either a mark of beauty, or an intimation of the bloated condition of the luxurious and pampered nobility. In either case, the sense is good, and is recommended by the fact that snow, milk and corals indicate color, and therefore sapphire, too, would naturally suggest the characteristic color of that gem. דָּוִדָּן, however, would more likely indicate the cutting of a gem, and hence its form, taille, and in case of the sapphire, which is next in hardness to the diamond, its brilliancy of appearance. GERLACH: "The words are not to be understood of color (as of the veins showing through, or of the garments, as Cant. xxviii. 18), but, on account of the characteristic דָּוִדָּן, excisio, taille, of the perfect shape, the consummate beauty of bodily form (Körperbau). Sapphire was their form (Gestalt), that is to say, so beautiful and without fault, as if they were a polished image made out of precious stone."—W. H. H.] White as milk and snow, red as corals, and shining as sapphire, is the appearance of the nobles as here described. This seems to constitute a climax to vers. 1, 2: for the Poet evidently, in ver. 7, paints with gayer and more variegated colors.

Ver. 8. In glaring contrast with ver. 7, he now describes what has befallen the nobles in consequence of the great catastrophe.—Their visage—their appearance [so BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, OWEN, GERLACH: their countenance, NOYES: their visage, BROUGHTON, BOOTHROYD].—Is [was, or became. The verbs are all in the past tense. So GATAKER and OWEN render them. The Prophet is still looking back to what had taken place, though now to a time posterior to that indicated in ver. 7. He is describing the change that took place in the appearance of the nobles, while the city was still standing, and they were seen in the streets.—W. H. H.] Blacker than a coal—darker than blackness [so marg. E. V., CALVIN, BOOTHROYD, GERLACH, WORDSWORTH. BROUGHTON and NOYES, like the E. V. Vulg., RASHI, KIMCHI, black coals. Sept., soot. OWEN suggests darker than Sihor, or the river Nile, see Jer. ii. 18.] They are not [were not] known—recognized—in the streets. See ver. 5. The sense is, in their houses they might perhaps be recognized, but not on the streets.—Their skin cleaved [cleaved] to their bones. See Job xix. 20; xxx. 30.—It is withered, it is become like a stick—it is [it became] dry as wood. [The English version—it is withered—arose from taking the adjective dry, for the verb to dry. No other English version has it so.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 9. This verse enters into close connection with ver. 8. Here it is declared that the miserable condition described in ver. 8, is the consequence of starvation; and at the same time, the reflection is made that death by hunger is more dreadful than death by the sword.—They that be slain with the sword, are better than they that be slain with hunger; Happier are they who are slain by the sword, than they who are by hunger slain [Happier were the slain by the sword, than the slain by the famine. Translating the words in the past time, removes them from the category of a moral or psychological reflection, and restores the harmony of the style as a poetical description of actual events. It reminds us, too, that the nobles suffered from the sword, as well as by famine. They who died quickly by means of the sword were more fortunate than those who suffered a lingering death by starvation. So in ver. 6, the Prophet regards, for similar reasons, the destruction of Sodom as less severe and terrible than that of Jerusalem.—W. H. H.]—For these pine away—marg., flow out,—stricken through for want of the fruits of the field—Who pine away pierced in the heart for want of the fruits of the field. This clause declares two things in reference to those slain by the sword (חַלְלֵי חֶרֶב), and those slain by hunger (חַלְלֵי רָעָב), one in which they agree, and one in which they differ. 1. That wherein they agree; they are both pierced through (פִּקְדָּוֹתֵי). 2. That wherein they differ; those that starve, melt away, that is to say, they die slowly, whilst with the others, death is quickly over.

[The Versions and commentators accept generally the translation given above of the last clause of this verse. Yet there are serious objections to it, and cogent reasons for adopting a different rendering. 1. It is taken for granted that the relative שֶׁהֵם must refer to the last subject mentioned, those slain or killed, by hunger. It is more grammatical to refer it to the principal subject of the preceding clause, which is those slain by the sword, regarding the sentence as only begun in the first clause and finished in the second. The words רָעָב, בְּחַלְלֵי רָעָב, than those killed by famine, could be transposed to the end of the verse without changing the grammatical construction in the least, (though it would mar the rhythm and the poetical paronomasia), and this shows that they are entirely subordinate to the main idea. 2. A meaning is forced upon the verb צָיַן, of melting or pining away, as descriptive of a slow death, which it has in no other place in Scripture. In the only place where it has been supposed to have the meaning of dissolving, Jer. xlix. 4, Dr. NÆGELSBACH himself says it has not that sense (see gram. note above), and if it has, it would imply rather a sudden, mysterious disappearance, than a slow and prolonged dissolution. The affinity between the Latin words tabescere and liquescere, brought forward by PARÉAU, and confirmed by a quotation from SENECA, which has been repeated by nearly every commentator since, even last of all by GERLACH, is of no force whatever; not only because the usage of Latin thought and expression is of no authority in Hebrew; but because liquescere, the fundamental idea of which is to become liquid, to melt, has a natural affinity to tabescere, to melt gradually, be dissolved and hence, metaphorically, to waste or pine away, while צָיַן, the fundamental idea of which is to flow out or gush out, has no natural affinity to צָיַן, even if the fundamental idea of צָיַן is to melt, and certainly no affinity to צָיַן in the only senses in which it is used in the Hebrew Bible, of pining away, or being distressed with sorrow or fear. On the other hand, the only sense in which the word צָיַן is elsewhere used, as when it is applied to the sudden and violent gushing out, or rapid overflowing of water, see Ps. lxxviii. 20; cv. 41; Is. xlvi. 21; Ex. iii. 8, admirably describes the death of those whose lives flowed away as the blood gushed from their hearts, pierced with a sword. 3. The future form of the verb צָיַן, is entirely ignored. It may be difficult, with our different modes of thought, always to detect the purport of a change in the Hebrew tenses, but it is quite certain that these changes are never purposeless; and here, where a future is suddenly thrust in among preterite tenses, it must have an important bearing upon the meaning intended. What the force of the future here is, depends on the subject of the relative and of the verb. If that subject is those slain by the famine, רָעָב, חַלְלֵי רָעָב, then the future may have an optative sense; these would have flowed out having been pierced, i. e., they would have preferred to die by the sword. But if, as is more likely, the subject is those slain by the sword, חַלְלֵי חֶרֶב, then the future has the sense in which Jeremiah so often uses it, of the historical imperfect, and then, too, the relative שֶׁהֵם has its more proper sense of those who; Happier were those slain by the sword—those who gushed out having been pierced, i. e., who died instantly as the blood gushed out of their hearts. 4. A metaphorical meaning is thrust upon פִּקְדָּוֹתֵי=being or having been pierced, which the word can hardly bear, namely, pierced with the sharp pains of hunger. The word is only used of being pierced through bodily with some sharp weapon, as a sword or spear. It is never used metaphorically, not even in Zech. xii. 10; xiii. 3, which have been appealed to; nor yet in Prov. xii. 18, where the piercings of a sword are compared to wounds inflicted by a wicked tongue, for even there the word derived from our verb is used in the literal sense of bodily piercings, made by a sword. The word might, it is true, in our text, be an instance of bold, audacious metaphor. But when there are so many other reasons for taking it in its literal sense, we may spare ourselves the task of justifying a metaphorical one. 5. The preposition כִּן, is taken in an unusual sense. CALVIN and others construe it blindly,—pierced through by the fruits of the earth, and explain “that all the productions of the earth took vengeance on this wicked people, by refusing the usual supply.” This is too extraordinary a personification of the fruits of the earth to be allowable, and it is a strange thing to charge a crime on an agent that has no existence. We would rather adopt the opinion of Jarchi who explained that their death was caused by the weeds and roots with which, in their hunger they had filled themselves, though it is something new to call weeds and roots, fruits of the earth. The usual explanation is, that they died for want of the fruits of the earth. It is doubtful if כִּן can be explained in any such sense, as Dr. NÆGELSBACH seems to concede, when he says it can only be taken in the sense of away, far from, without. There is less difficulty with this word, if we understand the clause in the sense expressed by the Septuagint, ἐπορεύθησαν ἐκκεκενημένοι ἀπὸ γεννημάτων ἀγρῶν, they were driven away, having been pierced, from the fruitful fields. So Chaldaeus: “Those fled away, when they were pierced, from the products and fruits of the field, i. e., they were full and satisfied, since they were pierced when their bellies were full of food;” and J. D. MICHAËLIS, “who, suddenly pierced, forsook the rich fruits of the earth (on which they dwelt).” This explanation really contains the idea expressed by BLAYNEY’S translation, “those, being thrust through, pass away before the fruits of the field, i. e., they pass away at one stroke, before the means of subsistence fail, and so experience not the misery of wanting them." Darius supposes a direct comparison between the suddenness of their death and the proverbial withering of the grass. "Quicker yet than the mown grass, they vanished who were pierced with the sword." This idea of their dying before the famine came, throws additional light on the use of the future tense in יָבִיזוּ, lit., they were gushing forth from the fruits of the field. The last clause of the verse is a more specific statement of what is said in the first clause. Happier were those who fell by the sword, than those who starved to death, especially those who being pierced through, died while yet there were supplies of food in the city. This is the idea I have endeavored to express in the new translation. BOOTHBY'S translation—For those pierced pass away, but these for want of the fruits of the field, would require a new text.—W. H. H.]

IV. 10.

10 The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children : they were their meat in the destruction of the daughter of my people.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 10.—רַחֲמָנִי (see EWALD, § 164, a; OLSEN, p. 412, f) is ἀπ. λει. According to the sense it seems to denote, not the external habits of life, as רַפְּהָה and רַחֲמֵהוּ (Deut. xxviii. 56), but the inner habitus, softness and tenderness of feeling. The etymology favors this, see רַחֲמִים and רַחֲמֵם.—The verb בָּשַׂל does not occur in Jeremiah.—לֶחֶם is found in Jeremiah once, xxxi. 29.—פְּרוֹת, according to FÜRST, a secondary form of פְּרוֹת, Ps. lxi. 22 (OLSEN, p. 417), is found only here. More properly it should be taken, with EWALD (see § 165 c), MAURER, OLSHAUSEN, for the Inf. Piel, see הִיָּה לְבָגֵר, לְבָלוֹת, Is. vi. 13; Ps. xlix. 15.—The form לָכֹן Jeremiah never uses.—בָּשַׂר. See ii. 11.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 10. This verse exactly corresponds, with respect to its subject, to vers. 3-5, and constitutes in relation to those verses a climax. For whilst vers. 3-5 speak of the pining away of the children, here the yet more terrible fact is told that mothers consumed their own children.—The hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children. The hands of tender-hearted women cooked their own children.

They were their meat in the destruction—they were food for them in the ruin—of the daughter of My people. The Poet would say, that the complication of feelings and sensations, caused by their terrible calamity, hurried away even tender-hearted women to the commission of this most horrible crime. See ii. 20. [HENDERSON: "Compare 2 Kings vi. 28, 29; Lev. xxvi. 29; Deut. xxviii. 56, 57. For a most graphic description of such a horrible scene, see JOSEPHUS' account of the siege under Titus, Bell. Jud. cœp. x. 9."]

IV. 11.

11 The LORD hath accomplished his fury ; he hath poured out his fierce anger, and hath kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 11.—פָּלָה, Jer. ix. 15; xiv. 12; xxvi. 8, etc. See ii. 22.—חִכְרוּ, see ii. 4.—צָרוּ, see i. 12.—יָצָה. All existing forms of this root are very frequent with Jeremiah, ii. 15; ix. 9, 11; xvii. 27, etc.—יָסַד, Jeremiah never uses. See Ez. xxx. 4; xlii. 14; Am. i. 4, 7, 10; Ps. cxxxvii. 7, etc.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 11. This verse closes the second part of the Poem, in a way entirely similar to that in which ver. 6 closes the first part. In both there is placed in our hand, as it were, a measuring rule, that we may be able to measure the extent and the significance of the catastrophe which has befallen Zion. Only in ver. 6 is indicated the measure of the greatness of Zion's guilt, but here the measure of the Divine wrath. [The remarkable correspondence between vers. 1-6 and 7-11, which Dr. NAGELSMACH has so skillfully developed, is argument enough for rejecting the arrangement of GERLACH, who assigns ver. 11 to the second general division of the Poem.—W. H. H.]—The LORD hath accomplished his fury ; he hath poured out his fierce anger, and hath kindled a fire in Zion, and it hath devoured the foundations thereof. Jehovah fulfilled His wrath, He poured out (die Glut seines Zornes) His hot anger, and kindled a fire in Zion that consumed her foundations. [GERLACH remarks that the foundations of the city were not literally destroyed, but that this denotes in a general way that the city was razed to the ground. This is explicitly said of Zion, or the sacred part of the city, with special reference to the Sanctuary, which was completely destroyed. See Deut. xxxii. 22; Jer. xxi. 14;

vii. 20. We may regard this as a prophecy of a future destruction that was to come on Zion, when not one stone should be left upon another; or, if not a prophecy, at least an instructive commentary on the causes which led to that catastrophe, and on the catastrophe itself as the result of the wrath and fiery indignation of Jehovah God, accomplishing the threatening of His holy word.—W. H. ii.]

PART II.—IV. 12-22.

SECT. III. VERS. 12-16.

- 4 VER. 12. The kings of the earth believed not,
Nor all the inhabitants of the earth,
That an oppressor and enemy would come Into Jerusalem's gates.
- D VER. 13. On account of the sins of her Prophets,
The crimes of her Priests,
Who shed in the midst of her Blood of the righteous.
- 2 VER. 14. They stumbled like blind men through the streets, Defiled with blood
So that men could not Touch their garments.
- D VER. 15. "Away! unclean!" men cried to them, "away! away! touch not!"
When they fled away, they still stumbled,
Men said among the heathen,
"They shall not longer tarry."
- D VER. 16. The anger of Jehovah scattered them;
He will no longer look upon them.
Men showed no favor to priests,
They had no compassion for elders.

SECT. IV. VERS. 17-22.

- y VER. 17. As for us, our eyes failed, still looking
For our vain help:
On our watch-tower we watched
For a people that could not save.
- 3 VER. 18. They hunted our steps
That we could not go in our streets.
Our end drew near, our days were fulfilled,
Yea, our end was come!
- p VER. 19. Swifter were our pursuers
Than the eagles of heaven:
On the mountains, they chased us;
In the wilderness, they lay in wait for us.
- 7 VER. 20. The breath of our nostrils, the Anointed of Jehovah,
Was taken in their pits,
Of whom we said,
Under his shadow will we live among the nations.
- 2* VER. 21. Exult and be glad, daughter of Edom,
That dwellest in the land of Uz,
To thee, also, shall the cup pass over,
Thou shalt be drunk and make thyself naked.

ת VER. 22. Consumed is thy guilt, daughter of Zion,
 No longer does He make thee captive.
 He visits thy guilt, daughter of Edom,
 He uncovers thy sins.

ANALYSIS.

PART THIRD, vers. 12-16, treats of the causes of the terrible catastrophe. What even the heathen had not deemed possible, ver. 12, had been brought about by the sins of the prophets and priests, especially by their blood-guiltiness, ver. 13, in consequence of which they had been proscribed by their own countrymen, and not only so, but even in foreign countries they had been chased from place to place, and scattered and treated in the worst manner, without respect to age or condition, vers. 14-16. PART FOURTH describes the failure of the hope resting on Egyptian help, ver. 17; for the Chaldeans, in order to prevent the flight of the king, kept the most careful watch, whereby this means of escape was prevented, ver. 18; when, nevertheless, the flight was at last attempted and frustrated by the rapid pursuit, the only hope the fugitives still cherished, to be able to live among a foreign people, in the enjoyment of freedom, at least, under the shadow of their own king, was destroyed, vers. 19, 20. The last two verses, 21, 22, which constitute the conclusion of the whole, contain a short address to Edom, which, on account of its malevolent joy at the downfall of Zion, is forewarned of a similar fate, whilst in the same connection, the prospect is exhibited to Zion of the remission of her guilt and an end of her captivity.

Vers. 12-16. This third part contains an exposition of the causes of the punishment inflicted. What had been regarded, even among the heathen, as impossible, namely, that the gates of Jerusalem should be entered by force, ver. 12, this the godless priests and prophets, by their bloody cruelty, had rendered possible, ver. 13. Thus they became an object of abhorrence to Israel and to the heathen, vers. 14, 15, so that, tolerated nowhere, they were scattered abroad and compelled to suffer the hardest of fates, ver. 16.

IV. 12-16.

12 The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed that the adversary and the enemy should have entered into the gates of 13 Jerusalem. For the sins of her prophets and the iniquities of her priests that have 14 shed the blood of the just in the midst of her. They have wandered as blind men 15 in the streets, they have polluted themselves with blood, so that men could not 16 touch their garments. They cried unto them, Depart ye; it is unclean; depart, depart, touch not: when they fled away and wandered, they said among the heathen;
 16 They shall no more sojourn there. The anger of the LORD hath divided them; he will no more regard them: they respected not the persons of the priests, they favoured not the elders.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 12.—The Hiphil of אָכַן, once in Jeremiah, xii. 6.—פְּלִכֵי-אַרְיָן, Jer. xxv. 20.—[וכל]. The ו, omitted by K'ri, and by some MSS. and Masoretic editions, and by Sept., is expressed in Syr., Chald. and Vulg. בְּלֵאֵינֵי הַתְּבֵל.—The תְּבֵל is found in Jeremiah only in the critically suspected passages x. 12; li. 15. The phrase כָּל יִשְׁבֵי הַתְּבֵל is found verbatim Ps. xxxiii. 8, comp. xxiv. 1; xcvi. 7.—Jeremiah never uses צַר in the singular, see i. 5, 7, 10. צַר is used in connection with אָנִיב, as here, in Esth. vii. 6.—שִׁעְרֵי יְרוּשָׁלַם, Jer. i. 15; xvii. 19, 21, 27; xxii. 19.

Ver. 13.—בְּקַרְבָּה. See Jer. iv. 14; vi. 6; etc., and remarks on Lam. iii. 45.—The expression, רַם צְרִיקִים, occurs only here: elsewhere it is always said רַם נְקִי, e. g. Deut. xxi. 8; 2 Kings xxiv. 4, or רַם הַנְּקִי, Jer. xxli. 17, or רַם נְקִים, Jer. xix. 4.

Ver. 14.—Jeremiah uses נִנֵּי once, xiv. 10. See Zeph. i. 17.—נִנֵּי, once in Jer., xxxi. 8. [BLAYNEY and OWEN take עִנִּירִים as participle Pual of עָנַר to rouse or excite.]—פְּחֻצֹת.—See vers. 5, 8.—נִנְאָלוּ פְּרָם.—The words are taken from Is. lix. 3. נִנְאָל, softened from נִנְעַל (Lev. xxvi. 11, 15; Jer. xiv. 10). With reference to form, blended of Niph'al and Pual, see OLSH. § 275, EWALD, § 132, b., DELITZSCH, Is. p. 566 [GREEN'S Gr., exceedingly defiled, § 83, c. 2, § 122, 2]. נִנְאָל is found in Jeremiah only in the sense of loosening, redeeming; see lii. 58.—The construction of יִבְלֶה with the finite verb is equivalent to the same with the Infinitive, i. 14. See iii. 3, 5; Esth. viii. 6; my Gr. § 95, g. rem. יִבְלֶה is frequent in Jeremiah, see iii. 5; xviii. 6; xx. 7, etc.—נִנְעֵי in Jeremiah, iv. 10, 18; xii. 11, etc.—לְבָשׁ, Jer. x. 9.

Ver. 15.—כִּיר in Jeremiah, v. 23; xv. 5, etc.—טָמֵא in the Singular, never in Jeremiah: he uses only once הַטְּרָאִים, xix. 13. [If he could use the plural only once, why not the singular only once?—W. H. H.]—In the words כִּירֵי אֶל-הַנְּעִיבֵי the Poet seems to have in mind Is. lii. 11, where the same words are used, only they are addressed, not to the unclean, but to the clean.—נִינֵי (kindred to נִיר, נִיס, and occurring in this signification only here) is not found in Jeremiah. [GERLACH derives נִנְעֵי from נִצָּה, which Jeremiah does use in its Aramaic form, and in same sense as here, Jer.

xlviii. 9.—W. H. H.]—נִינֵי—נִינֵי, see גַּם־רָאָה, Ps. xc. 9.—Jeremiah uses נִינֵי frequently in chs. xlii-xliv. (see xlii. 15, 17, 22, etc.)—Hiphil הִלְחִיף is found in the P. ophet only once, xxxi. 12, whilst it occurs in this chapter three times, vers. 15, 16, 22.

Ver. 16.—הִלְקֵהוּ (Hiphil occurs in Jeremiah only once in a passage critically doubtful, xxxvii. 12) is to scatter, as Gen. xlix. 7. With regard to its singular number, see my Gr. § 105, 6.—וְיִשְׂרָאֵל, see i. 11.—The phrase מִן־פְּנֵי־הַמָּוֶת, elsewhere very frequently (see Deut. x. 17; 2 Kings v. 1; Job xiii. 10; Ps. lxxxii. 2; Prov. xviii. 5; Is. iiii. 3; Mal. ii. 9; comp. Lam. v. 12), is not found in Jeremiah.—Of הִלְחִיף Jeremiah uses the Niphil only once, xxii. 23.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 12 skilfully introduces the exposition of the causes of what had happened, since the presumption, entertained even by the heathen, that it was impossible for any human enemy to take Jerusalem by force, was disproved (zur Foliegegeben wird) by the sad reality.—The kings of the earth, and all the inhabitants of the world, would not have believed—had not believed—that the adversary and the enemy should have entered—that an oppressor and enemy would come—into the gates of Jerusalem. It is clear that this verse contains a hyperbole. For Jerusalem had been captured more than once before the days of Nebuchadnezzar (see 1 Kings xiv. 26; 2 Kings xiv. 13, 14; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11; 2 Kings xxiii. 33-35). In spite of this fact, the opinion that it could not be taken by force may have prevailed among the heathen, but hardly to the extent which the Poet here seems to ascribe to it. [Not only was Jerusalem regarded as well-nigh impregnable, because it was strongly fortified by nature and art; but there was a prevailing sentiment among men that it was under the special protection of the Almighty. The heathen idolaters knew to their cost that the God whom the Jews worshipped was a God of great power. They believed that the city of Jerusalem and its Temple were under the special protection of that God. The discomfiture of Sennacherib's army in the days of Hezekiah at the very gates of Jerusalem, and the prolonged siege of the city by the armies of Nebuchadnezzar, were well calculated to deepen the impression that the God of the Jews would not suffer the city to be taken. To this sentiment the Prophet here refers. What he says is pregnant and inferential. He assumes that to be true, which even the heathen believed, that the city could not be taken unless God gave it up to destruction. God's giving it up to destruction implied that the city was guilty of great and heinous sins; and without pausing to state an inference so patent, the Prophet proceeds at once to specify the particular sins which led to a catastrophe that had astonished the kings of the earth and all the inhabitants of the world. He thus condenses several thoughts into one expression;—what even heathen had not expected had happened, and was evidence to all the world of the horrible wickedness, which must have provoked God to forsake His people! There is no reason, therefore, for the suspicion that the Prophet indulged in poetical exaggeration, even if "Jerusalem had been captured more than once before the days of Nebuchadnezzar." In point of fact, however, this last assertion may be questioned. There is no clear evidence that Jerusalem had ever before fallen into actual possession of a heathen enemy. There is no evidence at all that it had ever been taken by assault. On the occasions referred to in 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11 and 2 Kings xxiii. 33-35, it does not appear that the city of Jerusalem was actually occupied by the enemy, or even visited by them, and there is no intimation whatever of its being attacked and taken by arms. From the account given in 2 Chron. xii. 4-9, we would infer that Rehoboam bought peace by giving up the treasures of the city; and that if he surrendered the city at all, he did so without waiting for battle. JOSEPHUS declares that Shishak took the city without fighting (Ant. B. viii. ch. x. § 3)—and that this was the only time it ever was taken before Nebuchadnezzar (Jewish War, B. vi. ch. x. § 1). But there is no positive evidence that the Egyptians actually took possession of the city. The account of the invasion of Judah by the Philistines and Arabians, 2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17, is very brief and vague. If the king's house which they rifled, was the palace in Jerusalem, it does not follow that the whole city fell into their possession, or that it was taken by assault. Joash, king of Israel, 2 Chron. xxv. 21-24, undoubtedly took possession of the city and dismantled and destroyed its defences. But Joash was not a heathen king, neither did he take the city by assault. Having already defeated the armies of Judah in the field, he seems to have met with no resistance at all before the walls of Jerusalem.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 13. EWALD takes vers. 12, 13, as a question. Would the kings of the earth . . . believe, that the enemy and oppressor had entered the gates of Jerusalem only on account of the sins of her prophets . . . who shed blood . . . in the midst of her? The objections to this are:

1. The negative particle, אֵל, ver. 12, is not the same as the interrogative particle הֲ. Should we take it as intended for אֵל־הֲ—is not, an affirmative answer would be expected. 2. EWALD is obliged to insert, between vers. 12, 13, an only which is not in the text, for he perceives that the heathen might be shaken in the opinion referred to, by a general apostasy of the people, but not by the apostasy of particular individuals.—MEIER and KALKAR, on the other hand, connect vers. 13, 14, and take the verb וַיִּזְנוּ=they wandered, in ver. 14, as predicate of the principal proposition. But in this case the people must be regarded as the subject, which contradicts the whole context. We must, therefore, regard ver. 13, with THENIUS and most others, as an exclamation; or, as MAURER does, simply a הִיאֵלָה זֹאת=this came to pass, after ver. 13.—For—on account of—the sins of her prophets and [there is no conjunction in the Heb.] the iniquities of her priests, that have shed the blood of the just in the midst of her. See Jer. xxvi. 7-24, where it is manifest that the chief guilt of the blood of the martyrs rested on the priests and prophets. Compare Jer. vi. 13-15; xxiii. 11-15, with ii. 34; vii. 6; xix. 4; xxii. 3, 17; Ez. xxii. 25-29; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 14. [GATAKER: "Not that the people were not faulty, as well as either of these, in those wicked pranks and practices that were then committed; but that these were foremost and forwardest ring-leaders and encouragers of them unto those wicked courses, which they should have reprov'd in them, and from which they should have endeavored to restrain them." CALVIN: "He mentions one kind of sins, that they shed the blood of the righteous in the midst of Jerusalem. They had no doubt led the people astray in other things, for they flattered their vices and gave loose reins to licentiousness; but the Prophet here fixed on one particular sin, the most grievous; for they had not only, by their errors and false doctrines and flatteries, led away the people from the fear of God, but had also obstinately defended their impiety, and by force and cruelty repressed their faithful teachers, and put to death the witnesses of God; for by the righteous or just he no doubt means the prophets. For what JEROME and others say, that blood had been shed because false teachers draw souls to perdition, is frivolous and wholly foreign to what Jeremiah had in view; for the word righteous cannot be applied to those miserable men who were ensnared to their own ruin. Then Jeremiah, after having denounced the sin of the prophets and the iniquity of the priests, mentions the savage cruelty which was as it were the summit of all their vices."]

Ver. 14. They have wandered as blind men in the streets, they have polluted themselves with blood. They staggered as blind (men) through the streets, defiled with blood. [Wandered. The verb is more frequently used in the sense of staggering, reeling (so GERLACH), or stumbling (BROUGHTON, NOYES), than in any other, and this sense is very appropriate to the uncertain motion of blind men, who are not much addicted to wandering about the streets.—W. H. H.).—As blind men. The idea cannot be caedum perpetrandarum insatiabili cupiditate occaecati [blinded by insatiable desire to commit murders], as ROSENMUELLER would have it; for they have in fact already shed blood and therefore it is added that they were defiled with blood. Rather, they are, as it were, drunk with the blood they have already shed, and in this drunkenness they go along as if blind, not observing whom they may chance to touch with their blood-stained clothes.—So that men could not (marg. in that they could not but) touch their garments—when one could not [i. e. lawfully] touch their garments.—So that (EWALD, THIENIS). בלא cannot be so rendered. It stands before the whole negative sentence, as before a single word. This sentence contains a statement on the subject of Levitical cleanness, with respect to the uncleanness they contracted by the contamination referred to. Thus: They staggered . . . in a condition in which it was not lawful for any one to touch them. [GERLACH, whose explanation agrees with that just given, except that for no sufficient reason he renders the verbs in the present tense, has more accurately expressed the sense of the original, than, perhaps, any other commentator. "According to the whole drift of the chapter, which describes the consequences of the judgment with respect to particular classes and conditions of the people, the following verses present a description of the judgment inflicted on the wicked Prophets and Priests, but not a mere fragment of the history of the late siege. This opinion is confirmed by the very first words of ver. 14 (they stagger as if blind), which denote elsewhere, as a comparison with Deut. xxviii. 28, 29; Jer. xxiii. 12; Isa. xxix. 9; lxx. 10 shows, the effect of Divine punishment. * * The Prophets and Priests should be the eyes of the people; they have become blind and stagger about helplessly (rathlos und hüllos) as blind men do; thus has God's hand smitten them on account of their sins. The evil marks of their sins they carried about with them openly, so that all the world could recognize them and avoid their touch, lest they should become themselves unclean."—Other translations and interpretations have been given, all involving great difficulties. BLAXNEY'S is unique. "They ran frantic through the streets, they were stained with blood; such as they could not overpower, they touched their clothes. The meaning is, that if they could no otherwise harm those they met with in the streets, they defiled them by touching their garments." This, besides the impossible translations, is open to the objection (that may be made to ROSENMUELLER'S and BOOTHROYD'S glosses, who represent the Prophets and Priests, blinded by passion, seeking for blood), namely, that the prophets and priests shed the blood of the just, "not by raving through the streets, sword in hand, but in a more secret way, by instigating their agents" (NOYES).—W. H. H.]

Ver. 15. They cried unto them, Depart ye (marg. ye polluted); it is unclean; depart, depart, touch not:—Away! unclean one! they cried to them,—away! away! touch not! Who calls כרתו [=depart ye, begone, or away!]? Not the murderers, as is evident from the words they cried [i. e. men cried] unto them [for the pronoun must refer to the murderers.—W. H. H.]. THENIUS thinks, those who met together may have called out thus to each other. But לאלו (to them) cannot mean one another. It might, indeed, be taken in the sense of de iis [concerning them], as PAREAU prefers, with an appeal to Ps. iii. 3; lxxxvii. 5, etc. But then the second half of the verse, in which those murderers suddenly appear as fugitives, is deprived of its appropriate explanation. I take the words then as a call addressed to the murderers. According to Lev. xiii. 45, the lepers were required to call out to those meeting them, בלא טבא, טבא ["unclean, unclean!"]. The same cry is here addressed to those, who, without reflecting on their uncleanness, stagger about on the streets, as if blind, amongst those walking there. [WORDSWORTH: "The Priests and Prophets, who, in their spiritual pride, formerly said to others, 'Come not near to me; I am holier than thou' (Is. lxxv. 5), shall be loathed by others, as being polluted by blood, and men shall cry to them tâmê! tâmê! (unclean! unclean!)—words which the leper was obliged to cry out, in order to keep others from him (Lev. xiii. 45). The singular number (unclean) is here used, in order to connect the words with that cry of the leper"]. But this cry—אָוַי! אָוַי!—away! depart ye!—is addressed to them most urgently, and so repeatedly that they recognize themselves as proscribed, and—are compelled to flee. The threefold repetition of אָוַי! אָוַי! אָוַי!, away! seems to me to indicate, that not merely immediately after the murders, but persistently all contact with them as with unclean persons was avoided. Thus they were, as was said, proscribed.—When they fled away and wandered—when they had fled away they continued fugitively wandering about [for] they said among the heathen, They shall no more sojourn there—it was said among the heathen, They shall not longer tarry. Now that they had fled, yet even in a foreign land they found no rest. THENIUS, most unnecessarily and very awkwardly, supposes a flight to the Chaldeans, who had separated these outlaws without affording them a permanent place of abode (אָוַי) and carried them away into captivity to various different places. But those enemies of Jeremiah, who hated him so bitterly and persecuted him, especially on account of his constant admonition to submit themselves to the Chaldeans (see Jer. xxxvii., xxxviii.), certainly did not themselves go over to the Chaldeans. Rather, it is only indicated here, in a general way, that those outlaws might have fled to heathen nations. But if they had, the words אָוַי! אָוַי! (also they wandered) show that their אָוַי! (wandering) did not end with their אָוַי! (flight). If they had fled, also they wandered about, that is to say, if they on their flight, after manifold wanderings, thought that they had found at some particular place a secure retreat, then men said even there among the heathen, they shall not tarry longer. They are then driven away even from there. This so plainly reminds us of the restless and fugitive wanderings of Cain, the first murderer, that we take for granted that the Poet had Gen. iv. 12-14 (אָוַי! אָוַי!) in his mind. [If אָוַי! in ver. 14 means they staggered, as men smitten by God with judicial blindness, it seems necessary to give it the same meaning in ver. 15. The sense is explained by the judicial use of the word as expressive of God's judgments; see ver. 14. GERLACH: "When they fled away, they have likewise staggered about, which, on account of the evident reference to אָוַי! (they staggered) in ver. 14, must mean that they staggered about as helplessly as they did before in the city; and were avoided in the same way. For if they would escape the scorn of their own people by a hasty departure from them, yet the nations, from whom they sought a hospitable reception (אָוַי!), would refuse it to them. Men said, They shall no longer remain as guests; see Dent. xxviii. 65, 66: 'and among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest.'—W. H. H.]

Ver. 16. The anger (marg. face) of the LORD hath divided them—Jehovah's countenance has scattered them. Thus the Poet describes what is known to him of the actual condition of those outlaws, in consequence of their banishment. They could not even remain together, but must be scattered. By the expression the face of Jehovah, the scattering is traced back to Jehovah as its cause, who had not lost sight of them, but had directed upon them His countenance inimically. See Ps. xxxiv. 17 (16). [See also Lev. xvii. 10; Ps. xxi. 10 (9). In the latter passage the words in the time of Thine anger, are literally in the time of Thy face. There may be an allusion here to Jer. xvi. 17, 18, "For Mine eyes are upon all their ways; they are not hid from My face, neither is their iniquity hid from Mine eyes. And I will first recompense their iniquity and their sin double." When God forgives our sins, we may say, "Thou hast cast all my sins behind Thy back," Is. xxxviii. 17. But when He punishes them, we are compelled to say, "We are consumed by Thine anger, and by Thy wrath are we troubled. Thou hast set our iniquities before Thee, our secret sins in the light of Thy countenance." Ps. xc. 7, 8.—W. H. H.]—He will no more regard them. The verb is future, אָוַי!. The Poet predicts for the scattered ones, that there will be no more favorable change of Jehovah's mind towards them.—They respected not the persons of the priests, they favoured not the elders. The priests found not forbearance, the elders found no compassion [or, we may translate more literally as E. V. understanding that the subject of the verbs are the heathen, or men generally; and the wicked murderous priests and elders are the objects of the verbs. God has irretrievably cast them away; and men scorn and injure them.—W. H. H.] Men deal with them without regard to their condition or age.

IV. 17-20.

17 As for us, our eyes as yet failed for our vain help: in our watching we have 18 watched for a nation that could not save us. They hunt our steps, that we cannot 19 go in our streets: our end is near, our days are fulfilled; for our end is come. Our persecutors are swifter than the eagles of the heaven: they pursued us upon the 20 mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness. The breath of our nostrils, the anointed of the LORD, was taken in their pits, of whom we said, Under his shadow we shall live among the heathen.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 17.—עֹרְיָנָה [K'ri, עֹרְיָנָה]. The form is a monstrosity. For, 1. עֹר never stands in the plural with suffixes. 2. If we suppose that the suffix is joined to עֹרִים, then it should be written עֹרְיָהָ or עֹרְיָהָן. 3. The suffix form יָנָה is entirely abnormal. The only possible analogy would be נְוִיָּהָהָנָה, Ez. i. 11, according to which עֹרְיָנָה would be contracted from עֹרְיָהָנָה. But on what does the plural suffix depend? To meet this difficulty the Masorites read עֹרְיָנָה. [So CALVIN, while we were yet standing; BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, OWEN, while yet or still we existed. BLAYNEY conjectures that the final ה "is a corruption, not of a single י, but of two י, the latter of which ought to be prefixed to הַכְּלִינָה, whereby by its conversive force, it not only clears the passage from all difficulty, but brings the text into a perfect agreement with the LXX, Syr. and Vulg. Versions." But here also the difficulty remains that the suffix would be joined to עֹרִים. OLSEN (2 222, g.) on this account assumes that עֹרְיָנָה stands for עֹרְיָנָה, and that the K'tib is the result of an error in writing. The latter seems to me also probable: only I believe that the feminine ending of the suffix is correct, and that the ם before נָה was occasioned by the immediately following הַכְּלִינָה. The word then had the sound originally of עֹרְיָנָה (1 Kings i. 22). עֹרְיָנָה, as a proposition, with a predicate to be supplied, is it is true also abnormal, even if only the idea of bring is supplied. Yet the sense is pertinent. She, that is to say Jerusalem, still stood. We may refer for the grammatical construction to Jer. xl. 3. [This is ROSENZWEILER'S explanation. But there is no particular reference to the city in the whole preceding part of the Song; and neither the city nor Zion is in the mind of the writer or the reader. If then we adopt the reading עֹרְיָנָה, the explanation of THIENIS is certainly to be preferred, "Whilst this was or happened, —namely, the incident just related with reference to the fugitives." But GERLACH is of the opinion that יָנָה can be taken as suff. 3 pers. fem. plur. referring to the eyes. He refers to an analogous case in Ps. lxxiii. 5, אֲיִנְיוֹ in יָנוּ, and explains its occurrence here as influenced by sympathy with הַכְּלִינָה and a desire to distinguish the suffix from the singular form in עֹרְיָנָה, 1 Kings, i. 22. Then the translation is Yet our eyes wasted themselves in looking for our help. So BROUGATOR, Even yet our eyes are spent at our vain help, and NOYES, Still did our eyes fail, looking for help in vain. The same sense may be retained if we adopt the K'ri, adhuc nos (sc. confitemur) vel potius oculi nostri confitebantur (GERLACH). Yet if the K'ri is adopted, the lit. translation would be, as yet we, see Josh. xiv. 11. The fact that this is the initial word, gives to it an emphasis, both accurately and felicitously expressed in the English Version, As for us still our eyes failed looking for our vain help.—W. II. II.] הַכְּלִינָה עֵינֵינוּ. See ii. 11.—עֹרְיָנָה, in Jer. xxxvii. 7. For the construction of הַכְּלִינָה, see my Gr. 63, 4, g. [The possessive pronoun, as a suffix, may come between a noun and the word qualifying it, and then the pronoun and qualifying word are to be expressed together: our help of vanity=our vain help. See NAEGELS, Gr.—W. II. II.]—הַכְּלִינָה in Jer. xvi. 19; x. 3, 8; ii. 5, etc.—צָבָה is ἀπ. λεγ. צָבָה, in Jer. vi. 17; xlviii. 19.—הוֹשִׁיעַ, Jer. xi. 12; xiv. 9; xlii. 11, etc. See also לוא יוֹעִיל, Jer. ii. 11. Yet Is. xlv. 20 seems to have been especially in the Poet's mind, where it is said אֵל-אֵל לֹא יוֹשִׁיעַ.

Ver. 18.—Concerning צִיָּר, see iii. 52. With reference to the signification insidiare, lying-in-wait for, see Mic. vii. 2; Prov. vi. 26, and the nearly related צָרָה, 1 Sam. xxiv. 12. The reading צָרָה, which some Codices have after the analogy of Prov. iv. 12; Job xviii. 7, gives a less suitable sense. [The change of צָרָה into צָרוּ may have been suggested by the difficulty of interpreting the former in accordance with its proper signification of seizing, catching or obtaining by hunting. See Notes below.—W. II. II.]—עֵצֶר, in Jeremiah once, x. 23. [BLAYNEY: "The LXX. instead of עֵצֶר seem to have read עֵצֶרִינוּ, our little ones." Here again is a change of the text suggested, doubtless, by the difficulty of hunting (or seizing upon as prey) the footsteps.—W. II. II.]—For the construction of מְלִכֹת, מְלִכֹת, ver. 9.—רָחֹב, Jer. v. 1; xlviii. 28, etc.—קָרַב, see iii. 57.—מְלֵאֵי יָמֵינוּ. The expression is elsewhere used of filling up the measure of the days of one's life, see Jer. xxv. 34; 1 Chron. xvii. 11.—כָּן, Jer. ii. 3, comp. Am. viii. 2; Ez. vii. 2-6.

Ver. 19.—קָלִים. The Prophet uses the adjective קָל in ii. 23; iii. 9; xlv. 6. רָרְפִינוּ, see i. 3.—The phrase נִשְׁרִי occurs only here: yet see Prov. xxiii. 5; xxx. 19.—רָלַק is properly speaking to glow with heat, to burn, Ps. vii. 14; Ez. xxiv. 10. Then it is used in the transferred sense of hot pursuit, and indeed at first with אֲחֵרֵי (as it were, burning after one) Gen. xxxi. 26; 1 Sam. xvii. 53. Only in this place is the word construed directly as transitive with the Acc. of the object. Jeremiah never avails himself of the word.—כְּדָרָר, very frequent in Jer., ii. 2, 6; iii. 2, etc.—אָרַב, see iii. 10.

Ver. 20.—The expression רוּחַ אֲפִינוּ is not found in Jeremiah; but, founded on Gen. vii. 27, in Ex. xv. 8; Ps. xviii. 6 (2 Sam. xxii. 16); Job iv. 9; comp. Cant. vii. 9.—מִשְׁחָ is not found in Jeremiah. See 1 Sam. xxiv. 6, 7, 11; xxvi. 9, 11, 16, 23; 2 Sam. i. 14, 16; xix. 22; xxiii. 1.—לָרָר, Jeremiah uses frequently. See ii. 56; xxxviii. 28; xlviii. 1, etc.—שְׁחָתָה, (comp. שְׁחָתָה, Prov. xxiii. 10) is found, besides here, only in Ps. cvii. 20.—צָל, Jer. vi. 4; xlviii. 45.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 17-20. With few but telling strokes the Prophet here sketches a picture of the events which constitute the last stadium of the great catastrophe, ending with the imprisonment of the king. He describes how they in Jerusalem had placed their last hope on Egyptian help, which was not realized, ver. 17. Then, omitting all that had reference to the capture of the city itself, he passes over to the flight of the king, which he describes so graphically, that we are obliged to regard him as a participator in the events he narrates. He describes how they were so closely watched, that soon all hope of escape forsook them, ver. 18. With extraordinary celerity they were pursued, ver. 19, and the king was imprisoned. With that, their last hope, the hope that they might live under his shadow, in the enjoyment at least of liberty, even if among foreign people, was frustrated, ver. 20.

Ver. 17. As for us, our eyes yet failed for our vain help. Yet stood she! Our eyes longed after our vain help. She, that is to say Jerusalem, still stood, exclaims the Poet with emphasis, and thus transports us into the historical event of which he treats. [For the reasons stated above in Textual and Grammatical Notes, the correct translation seems to be, Still did our eyes fail looking for our vain help. Literally, Still our eyes exhausted or spent themselves (looking) for our vain help.—W. H. H.] The Poet describes here the yearning long-cherished hope of Egyptian help. The retreat of the Chaldean army (Jer. xxxvii. 5) had greatly strengthened that hope. But it proved delusive. Instead of the Egyptian army, the Chaldeans were soon seen again approaching the city (Jer. xxxvii. 8; xxxiv. 22). [Our vain help. CALVIN: "There is an implied contrast between empty and fallacious help and the help of God, which the people rejected when they preferred the Egyptians."]—In our watching—on our watch-tower [so BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, NOYES, GERLACH, DAVIDSON Lex., FUERST Lex.]—We have watched for a nation that could not save us—we watched for a people that helps not [or, will not help (GERLACH), or, may not, i. e. cannot save.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 18. They hunt our steps, that we cannot go in our streets—They watched our steps that we could not go on our streets. EWALD understands the first half of the verse as referring to an edict of the Egyptian king, which prohibited the refugees who were in Egypt from carrying on traffic of any kind with Palestine. This was considered, and not without reason, the harshest measure that could be imposed upon them. But we have not the least knowledge of any kind of trade with the markets of Palestine at the time of its depopulation, or of any prohibition of visiting those markets. Besides, it is not at all probable that the Jews, who had fled to Egypt, impelled by fear of the Chaldeans, would have had any desire to go back again within the reach of the power of the Chaldeans. Then, too, this thought in this connection seems an excessively awkward ὑστερον πρότερον [putting last first]. THENIUS and VAHINGER [BLAYNEY, also] understand these words of the besieging towers, whence the streets were bombarded and so walking in them was prevented. I will not deny that from these towers (see remarks on Jer. lii. 4, 5) the city might be watched. But to refer the words that we could not walk in the streets to the bombardment of the streets, seems to me a singular notion. We are not to suppose that the besieging machines of the ancients carried cannon. [Remembering how narrow the streets of oriental cities are and how protected, often, by the buildings projecting over them, it is obvious that no besieging towers could so command the streets as to expose the citizens to the aim of the enemies' weapons.—W. H. H.] We read in Jer. lii. 7, 8, "And all the men of war fled, by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden: (now the Chaldeans were by the city round about;) and they went by the way of the plain. But the army of the Chaldeans pursued after the king, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho; and all his army was scattered from him." See 2 Kings xxv. 4, 5. From this description it appears, 1st. That Zedekiah with his men of war endeavored to escape secretly, and did so escape by a flight at night from a gate situated on the west side of the city. 2d. That the Chaldeans sought to prevent his escape. This is evident from their surrounding the city, as well as from the secret flight and immediate pursuit. It is also obvious, a priori, that Nebuchadnezzar was near at hand for the very purpose of getting possession of the person of the king. Now does not our passage answer exactly to all this? All the steps of the beleaguered citizens were observed, so that they could not go upon their streets unhindered. I do not understand רחכות=streets of the country roads. But I believe that the passages leading out of the city, as for example the way between the walls, can be classed with the רחכות=streets. [The verb rendered hunt, ציד, means (see remarks on iii. 52), not merely to hunt, but to take by hunting, not merely to lay snares (NOYES), but to ensnare or take in snares.

It clearly has this meaning, it seems to me, both in Mic. vii. 2 and Prov. vi. 26. The word rendered streets, רחכות, means the streets of a city, as is plainly evident here from the expression our streets. בְּרַחֲוֹתֵינוּ, in our own streets, can only mean the streets of our city, and that no out of the way passages between the walls, but streets that were common property, and which they were accustomed to walk in. Our text then can only mean that those who appeared on the streets were at once arrested. Zedekiah and his army were not captured in the streets, but far away from the city. It is obvious, therefore, that neither this verse, nor the following one, refers particularly to the flight and capture of Zedekiah and his army. It relates to a time posterior to that event. The city was already in possession of the Chaldeans: the enemy had entered into the gates of Jerusalem (ver. 12), which did not occur till one month after Zedekiah's capture. The Prophet having announced in ver. 11, that the Divine wrath was accomplished, and Zion consumed with fire to the very foundations thereof, goes back in vers. 12-16, to attribute this event to the sins of the prophets and priests, and to show how they were abhorred and punished,—then in ver. 17, he tells us, how those that were left in the city continued to the very last to hope for Egyptian aid,—in ver. 18, that they could not escape from the city, for they were captured the moment they appeared in the streets,—in ver. 19, that those who did manage to escape from the city, were pursued and captured, whether they fled to the mountains or the desert,—and ver. 20, declaring that their king was already a prisoner, recognizes the fact that the kingdom is destroyed and their independent nationality is at an end. With all this the last half of ver. 18 harmonizes; when they found that the Egyptians did not come, and that they were wholly in the power of the Chaldeans, then it was evident that their end was near, their days fulfilled,—yea, their end had actually come! We translate the first half of the verse, therefore, They hunted our steps, or they ensnared our steps, that is, they were on the watch for us and caught us as a wily trapper watching the steps of his game, so that we could not go in our streets.—W. H. H.]—Our end is near, our days are fulfilled; for our end is come. [Our end approached, our days were fulfilled, for (or yea, ja, GERLACH) our end arrived, or was actually come. There is no change of tense from the first half of the verse.—W. H. H.] These are the ipsissima verba of the fugitives, which describe most graphically how they felt, when they observed that their flight was discovered. Since many survived those days, among others the king and the Poet himself, it is evident that these words are to be interpreted, not of what happened, but of what they feared would happen. Besides, the second half of the verse, composed of two members, is climacteric; for in the first, the end is indicated only as near, but in the second as come, and therefore the measure of life as fulfilled. [These words were not the words of “fugitives,” for reasons given above. They may have been the words of the would-be fugitives, those who would have escaped from the city if they had not been arrested in the streets of the city. It is better, however, to regard them as the words of the Prophet. The Egyptians did not come to the rescue. Escape from the city was impossible. Then, says he, our end approached, the days of our national existence were accomplished, yea our end actually arrived, when the city was consumed with fire, and the people transported to Babylon.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 19. Our persecutors are—our pursuers were—swifter than the eagles of the heaven. The image of the eagles is taken from Jer. iv. 13, where it is said of the enemy from the north “his horses are swifter than eagles.” See 2 Sam. i. 23. Their apprehension proves to be well founded. The pursuit was begun instantly and with the greatest energy.—They pursued us upon the mountains, they laid wait for us in the wilderness. On the mountains they chased us, in the wilderness they were on the watch for us [GERLACH: laid snares for us.] It is to be observed that the way from Jerusalem to Jericho, at first over heights (beginning with the Mount of Olives) leads directly down into the plain of the Ghôr. See the full description of this road in RITTER’s Geography, xv. 1, pp. 485 ff. Let the suffixes of the first person be carefully observed in this whole narration of the flight of the king, vers. 18-20. Would not one, who knew of the facts only by hear-say, have used the third person? And does not the first person show, as also the animated clearly defined particulars do, that he himself had participated in the flight from that fierce pursuit? [Granting that the flight and pursuit of the king are here intended, there is surely nothing in the description that necessarily implies the presence of the author with the king. But we have seen above that this verse cannot relate to the flight and capture of the king. The Prophet is simply relating the fate of the people and confirming his declaration that their end, as a people, a nation, had come, ver. 18. The Egyptians did not arrive for their relief. Those who ventured into the streets were seized and made prisoners. Those who managed to escape were hotly pursued or fell into ambushes carefully prepared in view of their flight. They were now hopeless and helpless. And to crown all, their king was a prisoner, ver. 20, and even if they could escape from their pursuers, they could not rally around his sacred person and preserve their independent sovereignty in some foreign land. Thus in very truth their end had come, which is the point the Prophet has in his mind.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 20. The breath of our nostrils. [OWEN: “A kingdom cannot exist without a king. Hence the king may be said to be the breath or the life of the body politic.”]—the anointed of the LORD—of Jehovah—was taken in their pits—[CALVIN: in their snares. BROUGHTON: was caught in their trap.]—Of whom we said, under his shadow—[or, according to OWEN and NOYES, under whose shadow, we said,—see Is. xxx. 2, 3; Hos. xiv. 8 (7); Ez. xxxi. 17.—We shall live among the heathen—[the nations, CALVIN, BROUGHTON, BOOTHROYD, OWEN, NOYES, GERLACH. BLAYNEY: “To live among the nations, probably means to exist in a national capacity, or as one among them.”] It is not the purpose of the Poet to sound the praises of the king. The literal meaning of the words and the connection utterly refute the idea, adopted by the Chaldaic, Raschi and many modern commentators, that this refers to the pious Josiah, whom Jeremiah, according to 2 Chron. xxxv. 25, glorified in a song of lamentation. The King here meant can only be Zedekiah. He was a weak, but a good-natured king. He resembled Louis XVI. of France. Like him he may also have been well-beloved. But the principal point was that he was king, and especially the theocratic king. SENECA says (de Clementiâ, i. 4, according to a quotation of PAREAU’S), Ille (princeps) est spiritus vitalis, quem hæc tot millia (civium) trahunt [he (the sovereign) is the vital breath, which so many thousands (of citizens) inhale]. Much more the theocratic king, the Lord’s anointed, the bearer of the promises (2 Sam. vii.) was a living pledge of the continuance and prosperity of the people. See Ps. xxviii., especially ver. 8, and DELITZSCH on that place. We can see, besides, from the words of whom we said, etc., what plan with reference to the future was entertained by the fugitive Jews. They hoped to escape to a friendly heathen nation, and there gathering around their king as their shield and security of a better future, pass their days at least in freedom. [WORDSWORTH: “It has been objected by some, that the Lamentations could not have been written by Jeremiah on the occasion of the destruction of Jerusalem, because such words as these, could not be applied to such a vicious king as Zedekiah. But such an objection as this betrays an ignorance of the nature of true loyalty, as taught by Almighty God in the Old Testament, as well as in the New. He teaches us to distinguish the person of the sovereign from his office, and to venerate his authority as from God

* [Is this question well put by one who regards the third Song as the composition of another than Jeremiah himself?—W. H. H.]

(Rom. xiii. 1-7), whatever may be his personal character. Even Saul was 'the Lord's Anointed,' and was revered and bewailed as such by David. See on 1 Sam. xxvi. 8, 11, 16, 23; 2 Sam. i. 14, 16. And our blessed Lord and His Apostles teach us to obey a civil ruler, as God's deputy and vicegerent, in all things not unlawful, although that ruler may be a Tiberius (see on Matt. xxii. 21) or a Nero (see on Rom. xiii. 1-7; Titus iii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 13)." CALVIN: "God made David king, and also his posterity, for this end, that the life of the people might, in a manner, reside in him. As far then as David was the head of the people, and so constituted by God, he was even their life. The same was the case with all his posterity as long as the succession continued. . . . But we must observe that these high terms in which the posterity of David were spoken of, properly belong to Christ only; for David was not the life of the people, except as he was the type of Christ and represented His person. Then what is said was not really found, in its fullest significance, in the posterity of David, but only typically. Hence the truth, the reality, is to be sought in no other but in Christ. And we hence learn that the Church is dead, and is like a maimed body, when separated from its Head. . . . In short, Jeremiah means that the favor of God was, as it were, extinguished when the king was taken away, because the happiness of the people depended on the king, and the royal dignity was as it were a sure pledge of the grace and favor of God; hence the blessing of God ceased, when the king was taken away from the Jews. . . . We shall live, they said, even among the nations under the shadow of our king; that is, 'Though we may be driven to foreign nations, yet the king will be able to gather us, and his shadow will extend far and wide to keep us safe.' So the Jews believed, but falsely, because by their defection they had cast away the yoke of Christ and of God, as it is said in Ps. ii. 3. As then they had shaken off the heavenly yoke, they in vain trusted in the shadow of an earthly king, and were wholly unworthy of the guardianship and protection of God."

IV. 21, 22.

21 Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz: the cup also shall pass through unto thee; thou shalt be drunken, and shalt make thyself naked. The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion; he will no more carry thee away into captivity: he will visit thine iniquity, O daughter of Edom; he will discover thy sins.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 21.—ישׁתְּבִי. For the form see Jer. x. 17. [May we recognize a peculiarity of Jeremiah in this form?—W. H. H.]—שׁוּשִׁי, see i. 21.—כּוֹס, Jer. xxv. 15, 17, 28; xlix. 12; li. 7, etc. The expression תִּעְבְּרֶיךָ is peculiar to this place.—שָׁבֵר, inebriari, Jer. xxv. 27; xlviii. 26; li. 7, 39, 57.—Hithp. of עָרָה only here. Jeremiah uses the verb in no form. Perhaps there lies in תִּתְעַרְי an allusion [ironical?] to that עָרָה, עָרָה of the Edomites, Ps. cxxxvii. 7.

Ver. 22.—The perfects in this verse indicate, that the Poet transfers himself into the future, in such a manner that he sees what is yet future, as if it were actually transpiring before him.—עֵינַי, see ver. 6.—הֵם, frequent with Jeremiah, i. 3; vi. 29; xxiv. 10, etc. The phrase עֵינַי הֵם occurs only here.—Jeremiah uses Hiphil of הִגִּיל very often, xx. 4; xxii. 12, etc.: also the Piel, see ii. 14, where the construction with עַל also occurs.—פָּקֵד, Jer. v. 9, 29; xxv. 12, etc. The phrase פָּקֵד עֵינַי is a characteristic of the Pentateuch, Ex. xx. 5; xxxiv. 7; Lev. xviii. 25; Num. xiv. 18; Deut. v. 9: yet it is also found in Jeremiah, xxv. 12; xxxvi. 31.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 21, 22. In conclusion the Poet addresses a word of threatening to Edom, in the midst of which a word of comfort addressed to Zion, renders the severity of the threatening still more impressive. That the Edomites most maliciously rejoiced in the destruction of Jerusalem, and even contributed towards it, we know from Ps. cxxxvii. 7; Ez. xxv. 12; xxxv. 15; xxxvi. 5. See remarks on Jer. xlix. 7-22, to which the ironical וְשִׂשִׁי וְשָׂבֵר, rejoice and be glad, here refer.

Ver. 21. Rejoice—exult—and be glad, O daughter of Edom, that dwellest in the land of Uz. Whether this refers to an extension of the dominion of Edom that existed at that time, or at an earlier period, or whether it merely refers to such an extension in a general way, is very questionable. EWALD (on this text and Gesch. d. B. Isrl. IV. S. 9) is of the opinion, that Nebuchadnezzar had extended the dominion of the Edomites "in the land of Uz far to the north-east." But this position of the land of Uz [north-east of Idumea] is very problematical. See remarks on Jer. xxv. 20. At all events, the words are most easily explained if the dwelling in the land of Uz is regarded as an evidence of success and a cause for rejoicing on the part of Edom. The historical accounts are too sparse to enable us to ascertain anything on this subject with certainty. See CARL VON RAUMER, Eastern Palestine and the land of Edom, in BERGHAUS' Annals, 1830, Vol. I. pp. 563, 564. [Broughton: "From Esay to the Herods Edom hated Jacob, and no less than ten prophecies are against them, as BARBINEL noteth upon Obadiah." CALVIN: "The Idumeans, above others, had manifested hostility to the chosen people. And the indignity was the greater, because they had descended from the same father, for Isaac was their common father; and they derived their origin from two brothers, Esau and Jacob. As, then, the Idumeans were related to the Jews, their cruelty was less tolerable; for they thus forgot their own race, and raged against their brethren and relatives."—The cup also shall pass through unto thee—also to thee shall the cup pass over. [CALVIN: "He employs a common metaphor; for adversity is denoted in the Scripture by the word cup; for God, according to His will, gives to drink to each as much as He pleases. . . . Nor does He allow any one either to reject the cup offered, or to throw away the wine, but He constrains him to drink and to exhaust to the very dregs as much as He gives to each to drink. Hence it is for this reason that the Prophet says now that the cup would pass over to the Idumeans; for we know that, shortly after, they were subdued by the Chaldeans, with whom they had before been united. But when they had by their perfidy fallen off from their treaty, they were in their turn punished"].—Thou shalt be drunken. Thou shalt get drunk. [By drunkenness here we are to understand "that judicial infatuation" (BLAYNEY) which leads to all sorts of shame and self-injury, and exposes its subject to the cruel mercies of his enemies.—W. H. H.].—And shalt make thyself naked. Drunkenness and denudation, intoxication and shame go together: see Gen. ix. 21; Hab. ii. 15, 16.

Ver. 22. The punishment of thine iniquity (marg. simply, Thine iniquity) is accomplished.—Blotted out is thy guilt [or we can translate Dr. NAEGELSBACH'S translation, Thy debt is paid, Getilgt ist deine Schuld. GERLACH: thy guilt is at an end. All the English translators, except OWEN, take יָצָרָה in the first member of the verse as the punishment of iniquity, and in the second member as iniquity itself. OWEN translates the word iniquity in both members, but explains the first as meaning punishment: "to complete iniquity," he says, "can here mean no other thing than to complete the punishment due to it." It is an awkward confusion of terms and injures the antithesis between the two members of the verse to put two meanings on this one word. We are, doubtless, to take the word in both clauses in the sense of guilt, desert of and liability to punishment, and understand the whole verse as intended in a prophetic and anticipatory sense. The exile the Jews were now suffering would exhaust, as it were, the demands of justice against them; and in view of this the Prophet says, Thy guilt is blotted out, or cancelled, or at an end. WORDSWORTH: "Rather, thy sin (see ver. 6) is accomplished, completed and taken away; and for this use of the verb (tām) here, see iii. 22; Jer. vi. 29; xlv. 12; where it is rendered by consumed, and GEXEN. 867."—W. H. H.].—He will no more carry thee away into captivity—he will not banish thee longer [lit. he will not add to banish thee. This does not imply, as many commentators seem to apprehend, a promise that God would never again send the Jewish nation into captivity. But it means only that their present exile should not be prolonged beyond the limit determined by their guilt. It involves rather a promise of a return to their own land, when their iniquity was thus cancelled by the punishment received.—W. H. H.].—He will visit thine iniquity—He visits thy guilt. See i. 8.—O daughter of Edom, he will discover—he uncovers—thy sins. The two halves of the verse correspond to each other: each of them has the name of a nation for its central point; to the גָּלְיָהּ, אֲדוֹמָה, finished or cancelled is thy guilt, of the first half, corresponds the גָּלְיָהּ, אֲדוֹמָה, he visits thine iniquity, of the second; and to the גָּלְיָהּ, אֲדוֹמָה, to banish thee, of the first half, corresponds the גָּלְיָהּ, uncovers, of the second.

[This is more apparent in Hebrew, because the last two words referred to are derived from the same verbal root. Some have attempted to make the correspondence complete by giving the same sense to both these words. Thus BOOTHROYD translates the first he will no more expose thee, and the second he will expose thy sins. But the Hiphil form of the first phrase will not allow us to translate it in the same sense as the Kal form of the second word, nor does the Hiphil ever seem to be used in any other sense than that of leading away, causing to go away, driving away, or carrying captive. HENDERSON, on the other hand (BLAYNEY and OWEN give the same sense), translates the first phrase he will no more hold thee captive, and the second he will carry thee away captive because of thy sins, which agrees with the marginal reading in our English Bible. But the Kal might mean to go away into captivity, but cannot have the Hiphil sense of carrying away. More than this, the grammatical construction would require us to understand that he made their sins captive instead of their persons. And more than all the Hebrew phrase is constantly used in the sense of uncovering sins, for the purpose of exposing them to contempt, rebuke and punishment. For these reasons it seems necessary to acquiesce in the translation above given.—WORDSWORTH: "He hath uncovered the sins of Edom; and hath covered those of Israel."—W. H. H.]

*Note on Authorship. It seems to me that this Song contains some hints in reference to its author that are worthy of consideration. 1. The brilliant descriptive sketch of the Princes of Judah, given by the Poet in ver. 7, should be considered. 2. He charges the blame of the prodigious misfortune entirely to the Priests and Prophets, vers. 13-15 (see also ii. 14), whilst it appears from Jeremiah that the secular leaders of the people [die weltlichen Grossen] were not less guilty. See Jer. ii. 26; v. 5, 25-28; xxiii. 1, 2; xxxiv. 19; xxxvii., xxxviii. xlv. 17. His way of putting things conveys to us the impression, that the author may have been an accomplished member of the lay aristocracy, possessed of great love for his own particular order. 3. This conclusion is favored by the fact, as he gives us very plainly to understand, that he wns one of the companions of the king in his flight, vers. 17-20. It would seem then, that he was one of the polished and well-disposed Princes belonging to the Court of the King. Was he, perhaps, that Seraiah, who was the son of Neriah and brother of Baruch (Jer. li. 59)? [The arguments here indicated have been already sufficiently answered. It remains only to say, 1. That Jeremiah was fully equal to a much fuller and more "brilliant" description of the princes, than that contained in ver. 7, both from his personal knowledge of the court, and his imaginative, poetical and rhetorical abilities, as exhibited in his book of Prophecies. 2. The author, even supposing him to be one of the Princes, can not be charged with the criminal partiality of attempting to throw a veil over the sins of his own peers. While ver. 13 charges special guilt on Prophets and Priests, as also Jeremiah (himself both Prophet and Priest) does; yet the whole people are represented as given up to sin, like the inhabitants of Sodom of old, ver. 6; and the h, with which ver. 6 begins, shows that the secular nobility, represented in ver. 5 as those who "fed delicately" and were "brought up in scarlet," suffered the punishment of their own "iniquity." If it could be shown that the book of the prophecies of Jeremiah, written by a Prophet and Priest, sought to extenuate the guilt of those two classes and to lay the blame chiefly on the secular nobility, then there might be some show for the argument that this Book of Lamentations, which lays the onus of the guilt on Prophets and Priests, was not written by Jeremiah. But the very opposite of this is true: and in Jer. xxvi. 7-24, the Prophet actually represents the Princes as resisting the conspiracy of the Prophets and Priests, to put him to death. Who then would be more likely to show a preference for the Princes, to the other two orders alluded to, than Jeremiah himself? In fact, however, no such preference is shown. 3. Vers. 17-19 do not and cannot describe the flight and capture of the king and his army. If it were possible to interpret them of those events, we must decide that they are anything but "graphic," and have none of the characteristics which would mark the report of an eye-witness of those events and a participator in them. Only an author capable of the brusque personation of Jeremiah in the third chapter, by the abrupt introduction of "I am the man," could possibly be guilty of such an awkward and preposterous absorption of the king, princes, and "all the men of war" in his own person, by tumbling them all into the narrative condensed into the single pronoun "us," without any other announcement or the slightest intimation of the rank, character and numbers of the who now appear upon the scene. As Dr. NAEGELSBACH can accept the absurdity involved in the idea that Jeremiah was not the author of the third chapter, he can be pardoned for the absurdity involved in the idea, that the "us," in ver. 17 of this chapter, means king Zedekiah and his companions in flight, including "all the men of war." But where are the graphic features of the description, "die er so anschaulich beschreibt, dass man sich fast genöthigt sieht, ihn für einen Theilnehmer derselben zu halten," i. e., that there is no escape from the conclusion that the writer was a participant in the scenes he describes? Where are the allusions to the facts that they escaped under cover of the "night," "by the way of the gate between the two walls, which was by the king's garden," that "all the men of war" went with the king and that when the king was taken the army was "scattered from him" (2 Kings xxv. 3-5; Jer. lii. 6-8)? On the other hand, here are facts inconsistent with those referred to, that they were on their watch-towers, watching for help, not attempting escape, ver. 17, and that they could not go in the streets without being arrested by those who hunted their steps, ver. 18, involving the idea that the city was already in possession of the enemy,—whereas, before the enemy were actually in the city, Zedekiah and his army made a secret and unobserved escape, and were not pursued till after they had gone completely round the walls of the city from west to east and were on their way to the plains of Jericho. Finally: it should be observed that the completeness of the Poem requires us to interpret these last verses of the events that followed the capture of the king. They describe the last scene in the catastrophe, the feelings and the fate of the people, remaining in the city, when the Chaldeans took possession of it and proceeded to their work of plunder, violence and destruction. And it is written just as we would suppose Jeremiah, who was found in imprisonment by the Chaldeans, at that time, and who actually witnessed what he describes, would have written it.—W. H. H.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Ver. 1. "If the violation of a material Temple, such as that of Jerusalem formerly was, is so sad and sorrowful a spectacle; how much more sad and sorrowful would be the violation of spiritual temples, such as the bodies of Christians? Yet they are violated by other crimes against conscience, as well as especially by fornication and murders (1 Cor. vi. 15-20). But woe to such a violator! For he in turn shall be destroyed by the just judgment of God (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17)." FÖRSTER.

2. Vers. 1, 2. The children of Zion are here denoted as of noble extraction, and on that account compared to precious metals and precious stones, which never could become so black and vile, as to be thrown into the corners of the streets as worthless. Israel was in fact the nobility of the human race. For the heathen are nothing else than the homo communis, the ordinary natural man, without higher life-power. But Israel, as the chosen people, represented the power of the higher and eternal life, though only typically. Therefore it represents only, as it were, the lower nobility, or nobility in the lowest degree. Yet this is always a real nobility. The meanest Jew carries about with him to this day, in his crooked nose, a diploma of nobility, which elevates him above all the nobility of our modern European aristocrats, for he is thereby legitimized as a son of Abraham. But what is this and all other kinds of nobility of the earthly high-born, compared to the nobility of those born again of Christ through the Word and Sacrament? Nothing but "dung," as Paul decides, who in Phil. iii. 8 tears his theocratic patent of nobility into shreds. For all that springs from the earth, is perishable, corruptible, subject to bondage (Gal. iv. 23-25); but what comes from Heaven, is incorruptible, eternal, glorious, truly free (Gal. iv. 26). Before that absolute nobility, moreover, all earthly distinctions vanish away; here is neither Jew nor Greek, here is neither bond nor free, here is neither male nor female; for ye are all one in Christ Jesus (Gal. iii. 28). And on this account the Apostle speaks such earnest words against those who violate their Christian nobility (1 Cor. iii. 16, 17; vi. 14-16).

3. Vers. 1, 2. "We are here reminded that there is no greater happiness on earth, than when Churches and Schools are built, in which God's pure word is preached and His worship duly and rightly observed; as on the other hand, there can be no greater evil than when all these are destroyed, wherefore Jeremiah here mourns first of all and most of all over such a destruction. And although Churches are not adorned with gold and silver, as the Temple at Jerusalem was, yet God's word and Divine worship rightly performed are more than all silver, gold and fine gold. To which purpose David says, The words of the Lord are pure words; as silver tried in a furnace of earth, purified seven times, Ps. xii. 7 (3). The law of Thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver, Ps. cxix. 72. Therefore we should look to it, that we do not by despising the divine word forfeit such a precious treasure, as did the Jewish people; on the contrary, loving God's word and observing diligently a pure worship and by the maintenance of pure doctrine, we should look to it, that the precious gold does not grow dim nor the fine gold lose its lustre." Würtemb. Summarien.

4. Ver. 2. "The Jews excelled in three respects: in profound and accurate knowledge of God (Ps. cxlvii. 20); secondly, in the beauty of a virtuous life (Sir. xlv. 6); thirdly, in careful observance of a pure worship (1 Mac. iv. 43)." THOMAS AQUINAS, in Ghiesler., p. 176.

5. Ver. 2. "Sons of Zion, to wit of that looked-for city, which the Lord hath built, that it may be seen in its glory,—sons of the supernal Jerusalem, which is free, our mother; illustrious by the dignity of their condition; clothed in the primest gold, by their likeness to God. How then have we, who have become esteemed as earthen vessels, degenerated from these [Sons of Zion] into these vile and fragile bodies!" BERNHARD V. Clairv. in Ghiesler., S. 177.

6. Ver. 2. "Let men of noble rank regard this as said to themselves, lest, because they are likened to gold on account of the celebrity of their family, they grow proud and imperious, but rather let them be persuaded to remember, that they are in the hands of the celestial potter (Sir. xxxiii. 13), who can easily transmute gold into earthen vessels, yea, and break these up into pieces (Ps. ii. 9)." FÖRSTER. [SCOTT: "The glory of outward distinctions and privileges may soon be obscured: Sin tarnishes the beauty of the most excellent gifts; and when the Lord leaves churches or nations, their 'glory is departed.' But that 'gold tried in the fire' which Christ bestows, will never be taken from us; nor can its excellency be diminished."]

7. Vers. 3, 4. [SCOTT: "Extreme necessity has a tendency to render the heart callous and unfeeling: they who have improperly indulged their children when in prosperity, have often been most regardless of them in distress: and the human species has frequently been found more cruel and insensible, than the most ferocious and stupid of the irrational creatures."]

8. Ver. 5. "Per quod quis peccat, per idem puni-tur et ipse, that in which a man sins is the means of his punishment." FÖRSTER. [HENRY: "It is the wisdom of those who have abundance, not to use themselves too nicely, for then hardships, when they come, will be doubly hard, Deut. xxviii. 56."]

9. Ver. 6. "As the grace afforded us in the manifestation of the word of God is greater than that given to the inhabitants of Sodom, so is our impenitence more heinous, and severer punishment on that account is to be expected. So Christ clearly shows in Matt. xi. 20-24. Verily! we should not despise this thunder-clap; for it certainly applies to us, who are richly endowed with the gospel, but do not walk consistently with it or worthily of it, but its daily invitations, inducements, and warnings are given to the wind; thus, as the Prophet Jeremiah here says, The iniquity of my people is greater than the sin of Sodom, that was suddenly overthrown." EGID. HUNNIUS. "The sin of the people called of God is always the greatest, because it has most abused the revelation of God. Therefore is its punishment also worse than that of Sodom, which was suddenly destroyed, without suffering long torments from barbarous enemies. God often chastises us here longer than He does the heathen; but He does it to spare us the punishment which is eternal." DIEDRICH.

10. Ver. 6. "We are admonished here, that as there is disparity of punishments, so is there disparity [in the heinousness] of sins. Hence the paradox of the Stoics, who esteemed all sins equal, is shown to be false." FÖRSTER. "The iniquity of the Jewish people was rendered greater than the sin of the inhabitants of Sodom, because the latter transgressed only the law of nature, while the former transgressed both natural and written law." RHABANUS in Ghiesler., p. 185.

11. Vers. 7, 8. This is an instructive example of the perishable and transient nature of all merely earthly splendor. What is there in all the beauty, wealth, and pomp of the young noblemen and their wives and daughters! Can there be a finer picture of the aristocrat's condition than we read here in the seventh verse? Is not the difference between the common race of man and the nobly bred placed here before our eyes in the distinctest manner? Yet, it is seen from ver. 8, that if our Lord God has only hung the bread-basket above their reach, the bodies of princes make no better show than those of burghers and peasants. From which we learn that there is no essential difference between them.

12. Ver. 7. "Kings and Princes, their courts and courtiers appear, now-a-days, just the same as they were long ago portrayed in David's Psalms, in the Ecclesiastes and Proverbs of Solomon, and in the Wisdom of Sirach. What we say of them now in German, Latin, or French, is just what was said long ago in Hebrew or Syriac." DOCTOR LEIDEMIT, p. 43.

13. Ver. 9. "Four principal judgments are especially enumerated by the Prophet Ezekiel in his fourteenth chapter; namely, War, Famine, Pestilence, and Wild-beasts. Of these, Famine is by no means the least, but by far the greatest and most severe, so that here, in the Lamentations, it is said, That it may have been better for those killed by the sword than for those who perished through hunger. But this is not meant of hunger that happens by chance, or is the result of natural causes alone, but we must regard scarcity and starvation as God's rod (Deut. xxviii. 23, 24)." EGD. HUNNIUS.

14. Ver. 10. If mothers cooked their children, this was an unnatural crime, only to be explained as the effects of blind madness. But had not Israel also, against its better nature, forgotten the Heavenly Father (Is. i. 2-4)? [HENRY: "This horrid effect of long sieges had been threatened in general, Lev. xxvi. 29; Deut. xxviii. 53, and particularly against Jerusalem, in the siege of the Chaldeans, Jer. xix. 9; Ez. v. 10. I know not whether to make it an instance of the power of necessity, or of iniquity; but as the Gentile idolaters were justly given up to vile affections, Rom. i. 26, so these Jewish idolaters, and the women particularly, who had made cakes to the queen of Heaven, and taught their children to do so too, were stript of natural affection, and that to their own children. Being thus left to dishonor their own nature, was a righteous judgment on them for the dishonor they had done to God."]

15. Ver. 11. "The Lord accomplished His fury upon Jerusalem, when her wickedness was full, just as the sins of the Amorites were, when they were destroyed (Gen. xv. 16). He did, indeed, pour out (effudit) the fire of His indignation, but it was only when she (Jerusalem) had abandoned herself (se diffudit) to the commission of all sorts of vices and crimes; and He devoured her foundations, when she had refused to accept the foundation, which is Christ. Truly she rejected Him, the precious, square stone, laid at the foundation of our whole structure: Who, when He saw this same unhappy Jerusalem, wept over her, saying, that in her not one stone should be left upon another (Matt. xxiv. 2)." PASCASIUS in Ghisler, p. 192.

16. Ver. 11. [CALVIN: PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou showest by Thy Prophet that, after having long borne with Thine ancient people, Thy wrath at length did so far burn as to render that judgment above all others remarkable,—O grant that we may not, at this day, by our obstinacy or by our sloth, provoke Thy wrath, but be attentive to Thy threatenings, yea, and obey Thy paternal invitations, and so willingly devote ourselves to Thy service, that as Thou hast hitherto favored us with Thy blessings, so Thou mayest perpetuate them, until we shall at length enjoy the fulness of all good things in Thy celestial kingdom, through Christ our Lord. Amen."]

17. Ver. 12. "The Holy Ghost here teaches us that there is on earth no city so secure, no kingdom so powerful, no stronghold so impregnable, that it may not be destroyed by sins and unrighteousness (as by the strongest battering-rams, CRAMER). On that account, to trust in strongholds is idle, and is rebuked and condemned by the Holy Ghost." EGD. HUNNIUS. "The heathen princes themselves had not before this believed that such a calamity could happen to Jerusalem, for they regarded it with a certain feeling of awe, because they had an inward testimony that the true God had prepared there a place for His manifestation." DIEBICH.

18. Ver. 13. "The Holy Spirit further teaches us here what a corrupt condition ensues in the whole spiritual theocracy, when those quit the right path of the only true, genuine service of God, who should most of all keep to it, namely, the teachers among the people, who should be to them those whose lips should preserve instruction, and out of their mouth should be sought the law of the Lord of Sabaoth. When they let God's word and pure instruction slip, the people are well-nigh done for. Then follow all the preposterous things which Jeremiah here indicates by the mention of false Prophets and bloody-minded Priests." EGD. HUNNIUS. [CALVIN: "This passage teaches us that Satan has from the beginning polluted the sanctuary of God, by means even of sacred names; for the prophetic office was honorable—so also was the sacerdotal. God had established among His people the priesthood, which was, as it were, a living image of Christ: there was then nothing more excellent than the priesthood under the Law, if we regard the institution of God. It was also a singular blessing that God promised that His people should never be without Prophets. As then Prophets and Priests were two eyes, as it were, in the Church, the devil turned them to every kind of profanation. This example then reminds us how much we ought to watch, lest empty titles deceive us, which are nothing but masks or spectres [phantoms]. When we hear the name of Church and pastors, we ought reverently to regard the office as well as the order which has proceeded from God, provided we are not content with naked titles, but examine whether the reality also corresponds. Thus, we see that the whole world has, for many ages, degenerated from true religion; under what pretext? even this,—that those who led astray miserable souls boasted that they were the vicars of Christ, the successors of the apostles, so that they still arrogantly boast of these titles, and are inflated with them. But we see what happened in the time of Jeremiah. . . . Prophets and Priests had destroyed the very Church of God."—WORDSWORTH: "This sin of the Priests and Prophets of Jerusalem, who conspired against Jeremiah, and slew other servants of God, reached its height when they murdered the Just One; see the words of Christ, Matt. xxiii. 31, 37; and of the first martyr, Acts vii. 52; and of St. Paul, 1 Thes. ii. 15; and those of James the Just, who himself was murdered by them at Jerusalem, Jam. v. 6."]

19. Ver. 13—15. "Thence follows the most pernicious corruption, and from that again the persecution of the really true doctrine and of its faithful followers and servants. . . . This is always the way and character ecclesie malignantium, that is to say, of the congregation and faction of malicious hypocrites, inquisitors and conspirators, that they, from perverted love for their preconceived error and prejudice, are excited and inflamed by instigation of the evil spirit with such bitter hatred against pure doctrine and its faithful defenders, that they begin to maintain their error with fist and sword, and to persecute the churches of God, and thus sprinkle themselves with the blood of the righteous, to shed which they incite others, and give them counsel and help thereto. . . . Further, as those priests, in Jeremiah's time, covered over and adorned all their falsehoods and tyranny with the pretence of the succession and of the titles and names of the church, on which account they cried out against Jeremiah, Templum Dei, Templum Dei, 'here is the Temple of the Lord, here is the temple of the Lord, here is the Temple of the Lord' Jer. vii. 4; and, again, Jer. xviii. 18, 'Come, let us devise devices against Jeremiah; for the law shall not perish from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the Prophet;' so in our day, the constant everlasting cry, with the Pope and his crowd, that they shout against us, is—Church, Church, Church! The Pope cannot err in the faith and articles of religion, for he is a successor of St. Peter, and sits in his chair. Yet the church of God is not so bound to the external succession or order but that those, who certainly were in the orderly external succession of the Levitical priesthood, established by God Himself, in Jeremiah's time, and also in Christ's, wandered far, far away from the truth, and those who sat in Moses' seat, namely the Scribes and Pharisees, became the bitterest enemies of our Lord Jesus Christ and of His chosen, holy church (Matt. xxiii.). What then may not happen in the case of the Pope, who can, without difficulty, prove that God in the New Testament proposes to have a Pope who shall exalt himself over all, but in fact, through St. Paul, has designated such a Primate of the Papacy as an unfailing sign of the Antichrist? (2 Thess. ii. 3, 4)." Egid. HUNNIUS.

20. Vers. 13, 14. "Such to-day are the sanguinary priests of Rome, and especially the Jesuits, who wish to be esteemed priests κατ' ἐξοχήν. . . . Hence those famous emblems of theirs (Jesuitæ in Censura Coloniensi, Fol. 136): 'If LUTHER had been removed before his fortieth year by fire or sword, or if others were removed from the midst of us, the whole world would not be confounded by such abominable dissensions.' In accordance with these sentiments are those of Andrew Fabricius Leodius, Counsellor of the Princes of Bavaria, in his Preface to the Harmony of Augustine's Confessions, 'Let our most mighty emperor gird his sword upon his thigh, and subdue these heretics, the most pernicious enemies of the Christian name. The shedding of Lutheran blood is useful, for by that means the members are preserved entire.'" FÜRSTEN.

21. Vers. 13, 14. "When God has in view the purification and reformation of an ecclesiastical constitution, dependence is, least of all, to be placed on Theologians by profession, and their assistance and support, or even only their comprehension and assent. When the economy of the Old Testament came to an end, the Priests and Scribes were the bitterest enemies and persecutors of Jesus and His doctrine, the stupidest in the whole world to understand the Scriptures which testified of Him. Huss and other witnesses for the Truth, were adjudged to the funeral-pile, not by the laity, but by their own colleges and professional associates. How was it in this respect in LUTHER's time? The Princes and laity were always more just, more tolerant, more easily convinced of the truth, more prepossessed in its favor, than the Bishops, the Scholars and the clergy generally." Doctor LEIDEMIT, p. 41.

22. Ver. 15. [HENRY: "They upbraided the corrupt Priests and Prophets, with their pretended purity, while they lived in all manner of real iniquity. You were so precise, you would not touch a Gentile, but cried, Depart, depart, stand by thyself, I am holier than thou, Is. lxx. 5. Thus the prosecutors of Christ would not go into the judgment-hall, lest they should be defiled. But can you now keep the Gentiles from touching you, when God has delivered you into their hands? When you fly away and wander, . . . these serpents will not be charmed or enchanted . . . no, they will not respect the persons of the priests, nor favor the elders."—SCOTT: "The wickedness of those who are by office engaged to support religion, and yet betray her interests, is the great cause of national judgments, and of the ruin of flourishing churches: especially when they have shed the blood of the just in the midst of them. They who have thus polluted their garments, have commonly been recompensed in the same way; and rendered an execration even to the vilest of mankind."]

23. Ver. 17. "Hence appears the truth of David's apothegms in Ps. cxviii. 8, 9; cxlvi. 3, 4; with which accords Jer. xvii. 5; as well as the Son of Sirach, vi. 7-9, where, on the margin, LUTHER wrote these beautiful rhymes,

Freunde in der Noth
Gehen 25 auf ein Loth.
Sollt's ein harter Stand sein,
Gehen 50 auf ein Quentlein." FÜRSTER.

"Pious people should, according to this, avoid putting their trust in men, as a great sin and a species of idolatry, and all the more because all such trust in men leads us into danger, finally disappoints us and covers us with shame. For men either wish not to help us, or when they are willing they cannot, or when they promise it, they do not keep their promise, for their very nature is vanity. Hence David takes occasion to dissuade us from trusting in men or gazing after them, when he says in Ps. lxii., Men are only vanity; men of high degree are wanting, they weigh less than nothing, whatever they may be." Egid. HUNNIUS.

24. Ver. 18. "Here occurs a proof text concerning the fatal end and period of affairs, which is decreed, as our text bears witness, to cities and nations,—nay to all things in the universe (Ecl. iii., Sir. xiv. 20), but above all to individual men (Job xiv., Ps. cxxxix. 16). That end depends indeed on the foreknowledge of God, but not simply and absolutely on that foreknowledge, but as that foreknowledge is directed with regard to second causes, especially with reference to piety and impiety, as is attested both by the promises of God, such as that added to the fourth [fifth] commandment (Eph. vi. 2. 3), and by His threatenings, Ps. lv. 24 (23). Hence it appears, that the end of human life is not so definitely ordained as by fate, because it can be prolonged by the practice of piety, and shortened by the practice of impiety." FÖRSTER.

25. Ver. 19. [CALVIN: "When the hand of God is against us, we in vain look around in all directions, for there will be no safety for us on mountains, nor will solitude protect us in the desert. As, then, we see that the Jews were closed up by God's hand, so when we contend with Him, we in vain turn our eyes here and there; for, however, we may for a time entertain good hopes, yet God will surely at last disappoint us."]

26. Ver. 20. In the Sept. the verse reads: The Spirit of our countenance, Christ the Lord was taken in their destruction (συγληφθη ἐν ταῖς διαφθοραῖς), of whom we said, In his shadow will we dwell among the nations. JEROME translates, The Spirit of our mouth, Christ the Lord, was taken in our sins, to whom we said, In thy shadow will we dwell among the nations. It is, therefore, not to be wondered at that this passage was regarded by the ancients generally as one of the most decided Messianic prophecies. "This text," says GHISLER., "was very frequently quoted by the early Fathers, and was interpreted by their common consent of Christ the Son of God." A collection of the various patristical expositions may be found in GHISLER. They make chiefly a threefold use of the text. 1. TERTULLIAN proves from it against PRAXEAS (cap. 14), that the Father could in no sense have been a facies [form or manifestation] of the Son, but, on the contrary, the Son was a facies [manifestation] of the Father. 2. They recognize in this passage a clear prediction of the sufferings of Christ. Thus, for example, THEODORET says, "Let the Jews say, Whom does the word of prophecy call Christ? Who of those called Christs by them, whether king, or prophet, or priest, has been named Lord (κύριος)? But they could not point to such an instance, although they made use of much falsehood. It is evident, therefore, that the Prophet foretold as the Saviour and our Lord (κύριον), Him who has been taken by them through the destruction of their impiety." [THEODORET adapts his language to that of the Septuagint (see above), συλληφθέντα παρ' αὐτῶν διὰ τὴν τῆς ἀσεβείας αὐτῶν διαφθοράν.—W. H. H.] 3. But they find also the calling of the Gentiles predicted in this text. ORIGEN, particularly, says this (Hom. on Cant. ii. 3) with reference to Luke i. 35, "If, therefore, the overshadowing of the Most High attended the conception of His (Christ's) body, it is reasonable that His shadow shall give life to the Gentiles."

27. Ver. 20. "The question arises, how could these titles (Messiah, breath of the people's nostrils, shadow), apply to the wicked king Zedekiah? They apply to him, not by reason of his personal character, but 1st, by reason of his office, which ought to have been, and was expected by the Hebrews to be what these titles import. 2d. By reason of the Antitype, of whom David, with his posterity, in his kingly office was a type. But who is this Antitype? Our Lord Jesus Christ, the son of David according to the flesh (2 Tim. ii., Rom. i.), that anointed one of the Lord (Luke

ii. 26), whose breath is in His nostrils (Is. ii. 22), and who is our shadow against the heat of God's wrath (Is. xxv. 4), and to whom the Lord God gave the throne of His Father David (Luke i. 32, 33). Magistrates are here admonished both of the authority and the functions of their office. They, too, can be called by that name of authority—the anointed of the Lord. And the functions of their office are, that they may be, by their counsel and efficient aid, the breath of the nostrils,—and such a shadow as that prefigured in the tree in Dan. iv. 7-9 (10-12)." FÖRSTER.

28. Ver. 21. "Here is a proof-text concerning ἐπιχαρεκακία, rejoicing in the misfortunes of others, from which crime Christians, of all men, should be furthest removed. For those who delight in the misfortunes of others, stripped of all humanity, no longer imitate the tastes and dispositions of mankind, but those of the devil." FÖRSTER.—Cup. FÖRSTER remarks here that the figure of a cup is used metaphorically in three ways. 1. Cup denotes the misfortune of the righteous as well as that of the ungodly, Ps. lxxv. 2. It denotes the good or bad fortune of the righteous, Ps. cxvi.; Matt. xx. 22; xxiii. 39, 42; Mark x. 38; John xviii. 11. 3. It denotes the misfortune of the ungodly, Is. li. 17, 22; Jer. xxv. 15; Lam. iv. 21; Ez. xxiii. 31; Hab. ii. 16; Rev. xiv. 10; xvi. 19.

29. Ver. 21. "We learn from this that God has filled their certain measure of trouble for all men, and He lets the cup pass round and no one is overlooked, as it is written in Ps. lxxv., The Lord has a cup in His hand, and fills it full of strong wine, and pours out from the same, but the ungodly must drink up the dregs. That is, the pious must also drink of the cup of wormwood, sorrow and pain. But Christ has presented for them the forestasted cup of such a bitter, sour potion, and with the wood of His cross has made sweet and tolerable for His own to drink the bitter waters of Mara, as is beautifully and figuratively represented in Ez. xv. 23-25. But the ungodly must at last taste the lees and dregs of God's wrath, which potion constitutes their final and utter ruin." EGID HUNNIUS.

30. Ver. 22. He will no more carry thee away into captivity. "Here it is, indeed, averred, that the Lord would not after this again cause the people to remove from the land, which certainly seems to conflict with the prolonged exile which the Jews at this day are enduring. But the answer is easy and obvious, from the rule commonly accepted by Theologians: All God's promises are to be understood as having the condition of penitence annexed to them." FÖRSTER.

31. Vers. 21-22. "Zion's punishment will sometime have an end, because God in spite of all His judgments upon His people, will yet fulfil His kingdom; the punishment of Edom, on the contrary, and of all maliciously disposed worldly powers, is eternal and without hope. Heathendom, as such, cannot be regenerated, notwithstanding all God's judgments; it can only perish, because it has not God's word. But the greater is God's punishment of His people, the more sure is His plan for their salvation. That same Christ, who said, 'Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from Me,' and sweat blood, yet most certainly was and continued of His own accord and by His own act in the bitterest agony of death and in the deepest humiliation, and He has brought to light our eternal victory, for as many of us as abide in faith on His word, however helpless at present we may be in ourselves. Christ is our life and our strength." DIEDRICH.

32. Ver. 22. [CALVIN: PRAYER. "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou seest that at this day the mouths not only of our enemies, but of Thine also, are open to speak evil,—O grant that no occasion may be given them, especially as their slanders are cast on Thy holy name; but restrain Thou their insolence, and so spare us, that though we deserve to be chastised, Thou mayest yet have regard for Thine own glory, and thus gather us under Christ our Head, and restore Thy scattered Church, until we shall at length be all gathered into that celestial kingdom, which Thine only-begotten Son our Lord has procured for us by His own blood. Amen."]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Vers. 1-6. The destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans an example of God's great and impartial righteousness. 1. Israel was among the nations, what gold is among the metals and precious stones are among minerals, vers. 1, 2. 2. But the sin of Israel was greater than the sin of Sodom, ver. 6. 3. Therefore the punishment of Israel was severer than that of Sodom, vers. 3-5.

2. Vers. 7-11. The relation of spiritual hunger to physical. 1. The relation as it should be. a. Both are sanctioned, Matt. vi. 11, 32; 1 Tim. vi. 8. b. But spiritual exigency should have the preference, Matt. vi. 33; iv. 4; xvi. 5-12; Jno. vi. 27, 32-35. 2. The relation as it should not be, Luke xvi. 19-31. 3. The consequences of the perversion of the right relation. a. With regard to physical hunger, Lam. iv. 7-11. b. With regard to spiritual hunger, Amos, viii. 11, 12; Rev. ii. 5.

3. Vers. 12-16. The warning, which John Baptist gave to the Jews, Begin not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our Father (Luke iii. 8), concerns all persons and communities, in this day, who believe that they are assured of their Divine vocation. How well grounded this warning was, could be shown at that time by a reference to the first destruction of Jerusalem. Let us avail ourselves of the same fact in order to impress the solemn truth, that no Divine vocation can save us from eventual destruction. For, 1. Israel's vocation was (a) attested by the promises given to the Patriarchs; (b), confirmed by many proofs of actual Divine interposition in their behalf; (c), recognized even by the heathen. 2. This vocation was not unconditional, as carnal Israel imagined. 3. The non-fulfilment of the conditions, for which the Priests and Prophets were chiefly guilty, ensured as a consequence the judgment of the first destruction. Conclusion: What befell Israel, the natural olive tree, may much more readily befall that which is only an engrafted branch (Rom. xi. 12) of the same.

4. Vers. 12-16. The great responsibility of those possessed of spiritual authority. 1. The duty is imposed upon them, of directing the people by word and example to keep the conditions on which the Divine promises have been given. 2. To them belongs the guilt, if by their neglect, the people find the curse instead of the blessing.

5. Vers. 17-19. Human help is useless. For, 1. It, is by itself, impotent. 2. Those who depend upon it, (a), experience the pain of disappointed expectation; (b), they come to a terrible end.

6. Ver. 20. The reciprocal duties of rulers and subjects. 1. The duties which subjects owe to their rulers. It is to be observed, that the Prophet, "in this text confers an honorable title on the ungodly king Zedekiah, that he calls him the Anointed of the Lord, and here a beautiful lesson is taught us, with what respect we should regard and speak of our superiors and rulers, and honor in them the office, which God has conferred upon them, even if in personal character they are wicked and ungodly." 2. The duties which rulers owe to their subjects. Let them remember that their "office, in the words of the Prophet, should be, next to God and under God, a refuge under whose shadow their poor subjects may live." EGID. HENSIUS

7. Vers. 21, 22. The reciprocal relation of those who suffer and those who take pleasure in the sufferings of others. 1. That one, who first has suffering, will afterwards have joy, if he bear his suffering in the right way. 2. That one, who first has malicious pleasure in the sufferings of others, will at last have sufferings himself, (a), because he has calumniated God by the presumption that He was not influenced by love in His punishments; (b), because he has been destitute of love to his neighbor and thereby has provoked against himself the sentence of retaliation (Mark iv. 24).

8. Ver. 22. [HENRY: "1. An end shall be put to Zion's troubles. The punishment of thine iniquity is accomplished, O daughter of Zion. The troubles of God's people shall be continued no longer, than till they have done the work for which they were sent. 2. An end shall be put to Edom's triumphs. He will visit thine iniquity, O daughter of Edom. It is spoken ironically in ver. 21, Rejoice and be glad, O daughter of Edom. This is a good reason why we should not insult over any who are in misery, because we ourselves also are in the body. But those who please themselves in the calamities of God's church, must expect to have their doom, as aiders and abettors, with them that are instrumental in those calamities. Sooner or later, sin will be visited and discovered."]

CHAPTER V.

DISTRESS AND HOPE OF THE PRISONERS AND FUGITIVES: [EXPRESSED IN THE FORM OF A PRAYER;
OR, E. V., A PITIFUL COMPLAINT OF ZION IN PRAYER UNTO GOD.—W. H. H.]

- VER. 1. Remember, Jehovah, what has come upon us!
Look down and see our reproach.
- VER. 2. Our inheritance has fallen to strangers,
Our houses to aliens.
- VER. 3. We have become orphans, without father,
Our mothers—as widows.
- VER. 4. Our water we have drunk for money,
Our wood comes for a price.
- VER. 5. On our necks we have been pursued;
We have been weary,—there was no rest for us.
- VER. 6. Towards Egypt have we stretched the hand,— Towards Assyria,—to be satisfied with bread.
- VER. 7. Our fathers sinned. They are no more;
We have borne their iniquities.
- VER. 8. Servants have ruled over us:
There was none to deliver from their hand.
- VER. 9. At the peril of our lives we get our bread,
Because of the sword of the desert.
- VER. 10. Our skin has been parched as an oven,
Because of the ragings of hunger.
- VER. 11. Women in Zion have been humbled,— Virgins—in the cities of Judah.
- VER. 12. Princes have been hung up by the hand:
The persons of Elders have not been honored.
- VER. 13. Young men have carried mill-stones;
And boys have fallen under [burdens of] wood.
- VER. 14. Elders have forsaken the gate,—
Young men—their music.
- VER. 15. Ceased has the joy of our heart;
Our dance has been changed to mourning.
- VER. 16. The crown has fallen from our head.
Woe unto us! for we have sinned.
- VER. 17. For this our heart has become faint;
For these things our eyes have become dim.
- VER. 18. As to Mount Zion, which has become desolate,
The foxes have walked upon it!
- VER. 19. But Thou, Jehovah, reignest forever;
Thy throne is from generation to generation.
- VER. 20. Wherefore should'st Thou always forget us,
And abandon us for length of days?
- VER. 21. Turn us, Jehovah, unto Thee, and we shall turn; Renew our days as of old;—
- VER. 22. If Thou hast not utterly rejected us,
And art wroth against us exceedingly!

ANALYSIS.

The subject is chiefly composed of the particular incidents of those grievous days which followed the capture of Jerusalem. The Poet lets the people speak, yet not as an ideal female person, but in the first person plural as a concrete multitude. The Song is divided into an introduction, ver. 1, two principal parts, vers. 2-7, 8-16, and a conclusion, vers. 17-22. In the introduction, ver. 1, the Lord is entreated to regard the sorrows that had befallen Zion [the people]. In the following two principal parts, vers. 2-16, these sorrows are described in detail. The first part embraces vers. 2-7. All their property, fixed and movable, is seized by the enemy, ver. 2; families are scattered, fathers have disappeared, mothers are as widows, ver. 3; the captives receive no subsistence, they must buy what they need, though as the product of their own land it is really their own property, ver. 4; on the march to Babylon, they are driven beyond their strength, and no rest is allowed them, ver. 5. Besides all this, the whole people do not even remain together. Whilst one party is compelled to throw itself into the arms of the Egyptians, another party belongs to Assyria; both are in such straits as to rejoice if able only to prolong their lives, ver. 6. But this great misfortune is caused by the sins of the fathers, the consequences of which now their posterity have to bear, ver. 7. The second principal part embraces vers. 8-16. Whilst those forced to Babylon groan under the rods of the rough servants, who are their drivers, ver. 8, those who wander to Egypt, must seek for subsistence amidst constant danger from the robbers of the desert, ver. 9: both parties suffer the consuming pangs of hunger, ver. 10. To this is now added a recital, partly the recollection of what had already been endured, partly an exhibition of what they still experienced, of the sufferings from which no class of the population was exempted: women have been dishonored, ver. 11; noble princes hung up or outrageously ill-treated, ver. 12; young men compelled to carry heavy hand-mills, and boys loads of wood, ver. 13. Sitting in the gate—the delight and glory of old men, and playing on stringed instruments—the pleasure of young men, have come to an end, ver. 14. In general, among all classes, deep mourning has succeeded to pleasure and joy, ver. 15. The crown of glory has fallen from the head of Zion, and, verily, those who suffer this, are obliged to acknowledge, that it has happened, not merely because their fathers had sinned (ver. 7), but because they themselves have sinned, ver. 16. The conclusion contains a prayer, to which vers. 17, 18 are introductory. In these verses it is declared, that all the affliction of the Israelites culminates in the destruction of the Sanctuary. But this thought suggests the encouragement, which the Poet now presents in his prayer; although the external Sanctuary is destroyed. Thou Thyself, O Lord, remainest for ever, ver. 19. Wherefore shouldst Thou forget and forsake Thy people for ever? ver. 20. Lead us back to Thyself, that we may be again what we have been in former times, ver. 21. This will be done, for it is not to be supposed, that Thou canst have utterly rejected us, ver. 22. [Ver. 1, introductory; vers. 2-10, descriptive of general suffering from oppression and want of necessities of life; vers. 11-13, instances of individual suffering; vers. 14-18, effect on the feelings and sentiments of the people; vers. 19-22, the prayer.—W. H. H.]

PRELIMINARY NOTE ON CH. V.

This chapter is not acrostic. Yet it is evident from the agreement of the number of the verses with the number of the letters of the alphabet, that the chapter should be regarded as belonging to the four preceding ones as a member of the same family. The acrostic is wanting, because the contents are in prose. The Poet would make apparent, even in the external form, the decrecendo movement, which we perceive from the third chapter onward. Were there not 22 verses, this chapter might be regarded as an entirely disconnected supplement. But the number of verses is a vinculum, that in a way even externally observable, unites this prosaic chapter with the preceding poetical ones.

[Various reasons may be given for the absence of the acrostic in this chapter.* 1. There may be something in the notion that the alphabetical structure was not allowed to embarrass freedom of thought and expression in prayer (GERLACH, ADAM CLARKE). 2. We may suppose the writer felt less need of the artificial restraint in controlling his feelings and restricting their expression. It is not true that this Song "is of less impassioned character" than the others, as WORDSWORTH says, but it is true, as he further says, that "the writer, being less agitated by emotions, and having tranquilized himself by the utterance of his sorrow, and by meditations on the attributes of God, did not need the help of that artificial appliance to support and control him." Besides, new restraints are imposed upon the writer in this Song, which more than supply any assistance derived from the alphabetical curb in the preceding songs. The verses are reduced from three and two members each, to a single member, and this not only balanced by a cesura or pause as in the other songs, but composed of corresponding parallelisms of ideas and expressions. To have added, to the production of these distinct and emphatic parallelisms, the difficulties of the acrostic, could have served no useful or artistic purpose. 3. In the last fact referred to, the introduction of parallelisms of thought and sentiment, may be found the most satisfactory reason for the absence of the acrostic. As long as the parallelisms were merely rhythmical, as in the first four songs, the alphabetical index served a good purpose in rounding off and defining the successive verses. Now it is no longer needed. We find here then an argument in favor of the theory advanced, in Additional Remarks to the Introduction, p. 23, in reference to the relation of the Acrostic to rhythmical parallelisms.

Is this chapter poetry or prose? Dr. NÆGELSACH says, "the acrostic is wanting because the contents are in prose."* He certainly cannot mean that the chapter is prose, because the

* [The opinion of BERTHOLE, that the Prophet "either had no more time to spend in the troublesome choice of initial words, or that he grew tired of this trifling process and deliberately relinquished it," (quoted by GERLACH in his Intr. p. x.), is sufficiently refuted, not only by its own irrelevance, but by what has been said in reference to the acrostic in Additional Remarks to Intr. pp. 23, 24.—W. H. H.]

* [We cannot misunderstand our author, for besides speaking of this as a "prosaic chapter" and comparing it with the preceding "poetical chapters" (see also Intr. pp. 3, 4, 5), he puts his new translation into good German prose—while he has given us most beautiful metrical translations of the other four chapters.—W. H. H.]

the number of its verses. It is enough that the plaintive lyre pours forth a final strain of impassioned, yet melting and delicious harmony.—

W. H. II.]

V. 1.

1 Remember, O LORD, what is come upon us: consider and behold our reproach.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 1.—זָכֹר. See Is. xxxviii. 3; Mic. vi. 5; Job iv. 7.—חַפְּצֵיטָהּ. See l. 11. [BLAYNEY: "Forty-one MSS. and four Editions read with the Masora תְּכַתֵּבָהּ, with the הַ paragogic." HENDERSON: "The הַ thus added to the Imperative, expresses the emotion of ardent desire on the part of the speaker." חֲרַפְתָּנוּ—See iii. 30; Ps. lxxiv. 22; lxxxix. 51.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Remember, O LORD, what is come upon us,—Remember, Jehovah, what has befallen us,—consider and behold—look and see—our reproach.—[The word translated consider (see i. 11), when followed by רָאָה, to see, means to direct attention to a thing in order to see it. BLAYNEY and NOYES translate, Look down and see—which gives the sense, but the word does not express direction, but the intensity of looking.—W. H. II.] This first verse constitutes the introduction. It contains the prayer, that Jehovah would regard the affliction and reproach fallen on Zion [the people], some features of which the Poet recounts in what follows. The Poet presents himself before God, as it were, and all that follows is to be regarded as addressed to God.

V. 2-10.

2, 3 Our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to aliens. We are orphans
4 and fatherless, our mothers are as widows. We have drunken our water for money;
5 our wood is sold unto us. Our necks are under persecution: we labour, and have 6 no rest. We have given the hand to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians, to be 7 satisfied with bread. Our fathers have sinned, and are not: and we have borne 8 their iniquities. Servants have ruled over us: there is none that doth deliver us 9 out of their hand. We gat our bread with the peril of our lives, because of the 10 sword of the wilderness. Our skin was black like an oven, because of the terrible famine.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 2.—נִהְיֵהָה, frequent in Jeremiah, ii. 7; iii. 19; xii. 7-9, etc.—נִהְפְּךָ, see i. 20; iv. 6. Jeremiah uses in this sense נִכְכַּךְ, vi. 12. This word represents the transfer of property to another owner, in Is. lx. 5 also.—רָרִים Jeremiah uses frequently, ii. 25; iii. 13; v. 19, etc.—נִכְרִים Jeremiah uses only once, in the fem., נִכְרִיָּה, ii. 21.

Ver. 3.—תּוֹם, Jer. v. 28; vii. 6, etc.: in Lamentations only here.—אֲנִי אֶשֶׁב. See Is. xlvi. 1; Jer. ii. 32; my Gr., § 106, 3. [אֶשֶׁב=shub, without, NAEGLER. Gr.] The K'ri, אֶשֶׁב, is unnecessary.

Ver. 4.—כִּימַיְנוּ, Jer. vi. 7; xlv. 7; l. 38.—כִּכְבֵּךְ, Jer. vi. 20, etc.—עֲצִים, Jer. v. 14; vii. 18, etc.—קָחִיר, Jer. xv. 15.—יָבֵא. EWALD translates, our wood is sold for silver. He also takes כּוֹא in the sense of the Latin vinea, vauis. But I do not think that כּוֹא is ever used in this sense. At the most, only 1 Kings x. 11 could be cited, where the word is used with reference to the revenues.

Ver. 5.—צָאָר, see i. 14.—רָרָךְ, Jer. xix. 18; Lam. i. 6: in the sense of driving, chasing, the word is not elsewhere found in Jeremiah. [It is doubtful if that is its sense here.—W. H. II.]—עֲנִי, Jer. xlv. 3, which place is very closely allied in sense to our place here, li. 58.—הַיְחָל. The Hophal is found only here: Jeremiah uses only the Hophal הִיחַלְתִּי, xiv. 9; xxvii. 11; xliii. 6.

Ver. 6.—כְּצַרִּים and אֲשׁוּר are to be taken as Acc. localis, in answer to the question whether? See my Gr., § 70, b. [There is no necessity of supposing an ellipsis of the preposition לְ, as HENDERSON; nor any grammatical reason for translating, O Egypt, O Assyria, as BLAYNEY does, diverting the prayer from God to these heathen nations.—W. H. II.]—עֲבָרִי, see iii. 30.

Ver. 7.—אֵינָם. Four times in this chapter, the Masorites would read י, where it is wanting in the text, vers. 3, 5, 7 twice. But the author generally uses Vav sparingly. Only once is the second clause of the verse begun with ך. In this verse, an error might arise from its use. If it were אַיִנִּים, some would be led to understand their non-existence, as the consequence of their sinning. See Jer. x. 20. But this cannot be the author's meaning; for he immediately asserts that the generation now living has to bear the punishment. Their being no longer in existence, therefore, is the simple result of the course of nature.—כָּבֵל Jeremiah never uses. It represents bearing the burden of sin, Is. liii. 4, 11; comp. xlv. 4, 7.—עָוָן, see ii. 14.

Ver. 8.—כָּשֵׁל, Jer. xxii. 30; xxx. 21, etc.—פָּרַק, see Gen. xxvii. 40; Ps. vii. 3; cxxxvi. 24; Jeremiah never uses the word, neither does it occur again in the Lamentations.

Ver. 9.—בְּנֵי־עָוֹן (בְּנֵי־פְרִיָהּ, see my Gr., § 112, 5 a). See i. 11; 2 Sam. xxiii. 17; 1 Chron. xi. 19.—הֶבְיֵיאָה, see i. 21. [We have the future here, as the historical imperfect, implying the recurrence of what is related.—W. H. H.]—לְהִתֵּן, i. 11.—הַרְבֵּה הַפְּדָרָה, which can only indicate the robber tribes of the desert (Gen. xvi. 12), is found only here. [CALVIN translates הַרְבֵּה, drought, and wonders that any one ever thought of calling it sword. It may have the meaning of drought in Deut. xxviii. 22, though even there E. V. has sword. In this verse, all the Versions, and commentators generally, translate sword.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 10.—פָּכַר occurs only in Niphal, and besides here only in three places, Gen. xliiii. 30; 1 Kings iii. 26; IIos. xi. 8. The sense is caefactum, adustum esse (see הִכָּר, i. 20; ii. 11). The plural shows that עָוֹר is regarded collectively. [It also shows the preference in this Song for termination in ך. Yet, “fifty-eight MSS., and the Soncino Bible read עוֹרֵינוּךְ in the plural” (HENDERSON).—W. H. H.]—עָוָר, see iv. 8.—הַנְּזִירָה, see IIos. vii. 6, 7, is not found in Jeremiah, [nor any equivalent for it.—W. H. H.]—לְעֵבֹתָהּ, astus vehemens, Jeremiah never uses. It is found, besides here, only in Ps. cxix. 53; xi. 6.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 2-10 describe the distressed condition of the people generally, and especially the sufferings caused by deficiency in the necessaries of life. Vers. 2, 3, describe their disinherited and bereaved condition.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 2. Our inheritance is turned to strangers, our houses to aliens—foreigners. [CALVIN: “The land had been promised to Abraham four hundred years, before his children possessed it; we know that this promise had been often repeated, ‘This land shall be to you for an inheritance.’ . . . No land has ever been given to men in so singular a way as the land of Canaan to the posterity of Abraham. As, then, this inheritance had been for so many ages possessed by the chosen people, Jeremiah does not without reason complain that it was turned over to aliens.”]—Our houses to aliens. Many expositors (VALHINGER for instance) understand from the second clause of this verse, that not all the houses of Jerusalem had been destroyed, but those which still remained were at the disposal of the Chaldeans; which is the same as saying that they dwelt in them. They appeal to 2 Chron. xxxvi. 19, where the destruction of the palaces only is spoken of. Although in Jer. lii. 13; 2 Kings xxv. 9, it is expressly said that all the houses of Jerusalem were destroyed, yet, they say, this is to be regarded as merely a rhetorical hyperbole, since elsewhere the houses of the great [the nobility] are alone specified. Compare Jer. lii. 13. We have, however, no evidence that the Chaldeans inhabited Jerusalem after its destruction; and Nehemiah (ii. 3) mourns that Jerusalem is הֲרָבָה, desolate, and its gates burned with fire. When it is said here that the houses were given up to the Chaldeans, this can only mean that they disposed of them as they pleased. In fact, they destroyed the houses, but carried away the movable property found in them as booty. Although the houses and their contents could be designated as an inheritance, yet by הִתְלָהּ, inheritance, which is here distinguished from the houses, the land is especially intended (see Lev. xx. 24; Num. xvi. 14; xxxvi. 7-9; Jos. xiii. 23; etc.). We may say, therefore, that הִתְלָהּ, inheritance, and בָּתִּים, houses, are related to each other substantially as fixed and movable property.

Ver. 3. We are orphans and fatherless—we have become orphans, fatherless [without a father, CALVIN, BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NOYES, GERLACH]—and our mothers are as widows. That the first words cannot be understood exclusively of the loss of their own fathers, is evident from the expression as widows. PAREAU is of the opinion that widows and orphans indicate, in a general way only, as a proverbial formula, tritissimam sortem [a very sad lot], and appeals to Is. i. 17; Ps. xciv. 6; James i. 27. But in all those places, widows and orphans in the strict sense of the terms, are to be understood. THENIUS understands by the mothers, the wives of the King, who were with the little company among whom our song originated. But even if we allow, that as some of the Princesses of the royal family, according to Jer. xli. 10, escaped transportation, so also may some of the wives of the royal harem, yet we cannot suppose that the Poet indicated these as the mothers of himself and his companions, because they were not, in fact, their mothers, nor was it customary to call them so. EWALD refers orphans and fatherless to the loss of the sovereign (the father of his country, ii. 9; iv. 20) and of the theocracy, but widows to the communities and cities (i. 1). This is without doubt correct, as far as this, that all the Israelites had, in this respect, become fatherless and their mothers widows. But why might not the Poet, at the same time, have alluded to the fact, that in the prevailing confusion most of the mothers could not certainly know whether their husbands were dead or alive, and therefore it could be correctly said of them that they were “as widows” (see i. 1)? I believe, therefore, that ver. 3 embraces every species of orphanage that might have existed at that time. [There were so many orphans and mothers separated gives the sense thus, ligna nostra pretio empta cervicibus nostris imposita in urbem importantur, our wood bought with a price and laid upon our necks is carried into the city. The explanation of the Syriac produces a very harsh Zeugma in ver. 4, renders the following sentence unintelligible, and expresses a thought that may be termed at least unnecessary. The objections to the other versions are as follows. 1. בְּנִיחָר, for pay, ver. 4 must be taken, either as dependent on a verb to be supplied (emta), or as belonging to אֲנַחְנוּ, in the very unsuitable sense, that the Jews were paid for carrying the wood. 2. The symmetrical proportions of the verses are destroyed; ver. 4 is too long, ver. 5 too short. We will then follow the Masoretic division of the verses. But as thus arranged, this verse has undergone various interpretations. PAREAU translates super cervicibus nostris insessores patimur, we bear sitters [riders] upon our necks. But בְּנִיחָר cannot mean we are ridden, or we carry riders. As little can it mean naturally, we bear persecutors or oppressors, which would correspond with PAREAU's idea, only without a figure. Others (RASCHI, DE WETTE, EWALD, 1st ed., MEYER, VAHINGER, ENGELHARDT) translate on our necks the yoke, or the yoke on the neck are we persecuted. But as THENIUS has remarked, the yoke here is a superadded idea entirely arbitrary. [BLAYNEY reads עַל, yoke, instead of the preposition עַל, upon. But we must then, as he does, take the verb in a sense it cannot have of being burthened with, With the yoke of our necks are we continually burthened; or, as BOOTHROYD does, supply the preposition on and the verb is, and make an independent proposition of the first two words, The yoke is on our necks, we are pursued; or, as NOYES does, supply two propositions, With the yoke upon our necks, we are driven.

HENDERSON, without changing עַל into עַל, thinks that upon our necks we are persecuted expresses "elliptically the great hardship to which the Jews were reduced in being compelled as captives to bear a heavy yoke on their necks;" and translates, We are persecuted with a yoke on our necks. So WILLIAM LOWTH seems to understand the text and refers to Deut. xxviii. 48. "We are driven to our work like the bullock that has a yoke about his neck" (ADAM CLARKE).—W. H. II.] All these explanations fail in this that they let עַל depend, not immediately on בְּנִיחָר, but very unnecessarily on an entirely different idea supposed to be concealed therein. THENIUS and EWALD (2d ed.) have perceived the right sense, when they translate, on the neck were we pursued (so EWALD: THENIUS expresses the same sense by the words, they pursued us over our necks, i. e. since they are ever close behind us). I translate, We are driven on over our necks, that is to say, so that the driving goes over our necks onwards—and this idea corresponds exactly with our German phrase, "über Hals und Kopf" [lit. over neck and head, i. e. headlong]. LUTHER: "über Hals." [In fact: Man treibt uns über Hals.] Besides, בְּנִיחָר cannot be taken in the sense of pursuing, for not fugitives, but captives are here spoken of, who are already in the hands of the enemies and are driven onward without mercy. This appears plainly from vers. 5, 8. The meaning to drive, to chase, undoubtedly lies in the root נָרַךְ (see the kindred roots נָרַךְ, נָרַךְ, נָרַךְ), and is as plain as daylight in such places as Lev. xxvi. 36 (the sound of a falling leaf shall chase them), Job xxx. 15; Is. xvii. 18. [It would be a relief to accept Dr. NÆGELSBACH's simple explanation, and translate, They drove us, or we were driven headlong, or as we would say in our colloquial English, heels over head, but there is no evidence that the Hebrew words are used in any such colloquial sense. The next best thing is to adopt the translation of MAURER, THENIUS, EWALD, OWEN and GERLACH, which Dr. NÆGELSBACH also approves of, On our necks were we pursued, i. e. our pursuers followed us so closely as to be, as it were, on our necks. "We are hunted by pursuers who are ever hanging over our neck" (WORDS-WORTH). The objection to taking the verb in the sense of pursuing, on the ground that the people are here considered as captives and not fugitives, grows out of the incorrect interpretation of ver. 4, and involves an entire misconception of the intention of this Song. It is not the design of the Prophet to give a detailed account of successive and related events, but to heap up together, in one rapid and vehement recapitulation, all the wrongs, indignities and sufferings the people had endured, without reference to times or places.—W. H. II.]

Ver. 6. Whilst the Poet describes the onward march of the larger part of the people to the land of banishment, he is reminded that the people are, by this means, still more widely separated and torn asunder; for one part, by far the smaller part, has been compelled to turn southwards towards Egypt. [This verse confirms the opinion that the Prophet is not relating successive events in the order of their occurrence and in their relations to each other; but is stating independent facts and instances, all of which contribute to present to God an appeal for pity and mercy. There is no close connection, therefore, between vers. 5, 6, such as OWEN and GERLACH would find, when they say that ver. 6 relates what they did when so closely pursued. According to Dr. NÆGELSBACH's interpretation, that ver. 5 refers to the Jews on their way to Babylonia, driven before their captors, the connection of ver. 6 is impossible. While they were so closely pursued that their pursuers were on their necks, did even a small part of them miraculously escape and flee to Egypt? Dr. NÆGELSBACH does not mean to assert this; but his theory of interpretation would seem to demand it.—W. H. II.]—We have given the hand to the Egyptians, and to the Assyrians to be satisfied with bread,—Towards Egypt stretched we the hand,—Towards Assyria,—in order to be satisfied with bread. To stretch out the hand can mean here only, to stretch out the hand as a suppliant; see Jer. l. 15; 1 Chron. xxix. 24. [CALVIN: "To give the hand, is explained in three ways: some say that it means humbly to ask; others, to make an agreement; and others, to extend it in token of misery, as he who cannot ask for help, intimates his wants by extending his hand.

But the Prophet seems simply to mean that the people were so distressed by want, that they begged bread." But in what sense did the Jews stretch out the hand to Assyria? They had submitted to this great power, not willingly, as they had thrown themselves into the arms of the Egyptians, but by compulsion. Yet they must, if they would live, stretch out their suppliant hand, to receive a morsel of bread from the hand of Assyria bestowing it upon them. But what power is intended by Assyria? It has been understood of Assyria strictly speaking, which carried the ten tribes into exile. But it would be strange, indeed, if the Poet here overlooked the Babylonish exile. That he says Assur, and not Babel, may be explained on the ground that he has in mind the Assyrian, as well as the Babylonish captivity. While Babel never stands for Assur and Babel, the name Assur is so used as to embrace both countries; see 2 Kings xvii. 24; xviii. 11; xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11. The brief words of our text exhibit also the fact, that Israel no longer existed as a nation, but was entirely given over to the power of the kingdoms of this world, on whose favor its very life depended; and, while the smaller part found itself in the power of Egypt, the larger part, which included both Israel, carried away into Assyrian exile, and Judah, deported to Babylon, is subject to Assur,—to Assur in the widest sense of the term, understanding thereby, not only Assyria in the strict sense, but Babylon also. See also Jer. ii. 18. [NOYES is of the opinion that giving the hand, imports submission, as in Jer. l. 15; to stretch out the hand to be bound, as it were. Thus, he remarks, "in 2 Chron. xxx. 8, what is translated in the common version yield yourselves unto the Lord, is in the original give the hand to the Lord." The context here, nevertheless, favors the idea that the Jews were reduced in many instances to abject beggary, and entire dependence for the necessaries of life on these heathen nations, the greatest enemies their country had.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 7. Our fathers have sinned and are not: and we have borne their iniquities.—Our fathers have sinned: they are not; we bear their sins. [There is no sufficient reason for rendering the last verb as a present. The English version is more literal.—W. H. H.] Comparing this verse with ver. 16, a certain parallelism is observable. In both the sins of the people are asserted to be the cause of the calamities previously described. But ver. 7 says, Our fathers have sinned and we bear their guilt. Ver. 16, on the contrary says, Woe to us, we have sinned. Here, as in i. 5, 8, 9, 14, 18; ii. 14; iii. 42; iv. 6, 12-14, the description of calamities endured constitute a principal feature in the confession of sin. As one paragraph ends with ver. 7, and another with ver. 16, ver. 8 begins a new paragraph. [This division separates verses closely allied. The subject down to ver. 10 is chiefly related to sufferings connected with the want of the necessaries of life. With ver. 11 begins a description of individual instances of outrage and cruelty (vers. 11-14), followed by a description of the effects of all these calamities, public and private, on the theocratic people who offer the prayer. Ver. 16 is as intimately connected with what follows, as with what precedes it.—W. H. H.] There is at least some truth in the assertion made in ver. 7. For the great catastrophe had been brought about, not only by the guilt of the last generation, but also by that of previous generations (Jer. iii. 25; xv. 4; xvi. 11, 12). But ver. 7, without ver. 16, would contain only a partial view of the truth. The two verses complete each other. [WORDSWORTH: "The sins of their forefathers were visited upon them, because they themselves had sinned, as they themselves confess. . . . There is, therefore, no reason for supposing, with some, that these words could not have been written by Jeremiah, being at variance with the doctrine in Jer. xxxi. 29."—And are not (אֲנִי, without), see GA. notes above; they are not.) These words connect themselves rather with what follows, than with what precedes. Our fathers have sinned. Whilst they are no more, we bear their sins.

Ver. 8. Servants have ruled over us: there is none that doth deliver us out of their hands.—[None delivered from their hands.] Who are these servants? Satraps are suggested. So say those who understand ver. 5 of the residence of a part of the people in Palestine or elsewhere. But we see from ver. 5, that the subject of discourse is the march of the actually exiled hosts. Satraps, it is true, are the king's servants, but they are not merely servants, they are not slaves. That men of distinguished descent and high rank should stand under Satraps was a reproach, when considered in a theocratic point of view, but not to be regarded as a matter of sufficient importance to be mentioned in this place. Besides, in fact Gedaliah ruled in Judea, himself a Jew and, according to the testimony of Jeremiah (xl. 7-12), a well-disposed man. But that real slaves were employed for overseers and drivers of the marching captives, this was certainly in the highest degree hard and likewise disgraceful. [This again is to be regarded as one feature of the great variety of sufferings that befell the people. It is not necessary to suppose that the whole people were at any time under the lordship of slaves or under-servants. It is not necessary to suppose an exclusive reference to the bands of captives that were driven to Babylonia. It is enough that in their degraded state it often happened that they had to submit to domineering and harsh treatment from men that were themselves menials.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 9. We gat our bread with—at—the peril of our lives, because of the sword of the wilderness. ROSENUELLER refers this verse to the dangers which the corn-transporters out of Egypt may have had to encounter in the wilderness. But is it supposable that corn was brought from Egypt, when the larger part of the people had been led away to Babylon, and the smaller part had themselves fled to Egypt? EWALD, on the other hand, finds in these words "a remarkable indication, that most of the fugitives in Egypt dwelt at the north-eastern border close to the desert," and so were compelled "to wring their bread from the desert and its robbers." But when in the world was bread brought from the desert, even by those dwelling on the borders of Egypt, and not from the interior of the country? THENIUS presumes that this Song was written amid the circumstances of one of those small companies that remained in Palestine and were scattered about in that land. These, falling in on their pasture-grounds with the warlike tribes sojourning among them, would be compelled to get their subsistence by fighting for it. But that supposition is confirmed neither by the history (observe Jer. xli. 1, "all the people," etc.), nor by the contents of our Song (compare ver. 8 especially, with the opinion of THENIUS, that the little company, among whom the Song was written, preferred liberty in poverty, to dependence in prosperity, ver. 6). The view of VAHINGER rests on the same opinion, and differs from that of THENIUS only in this, that he understands the bringing of bread to refer to merchant travellers who were in peril from Bedouin robbers. I am of the opinion, that the expedition here indicated, was an incident belonging to the experience of those Israelites who had not been led away to Babylon, and especially of those who had fled to Egypt. It is allowable to suppose, both from general reasons and particularly from ver. 6, that this one of the two parts of the people is intended. Much is touched upon in the Song, that happened to all in common (vers. 2, 3, 7, 10-12); much that only befell those who suffered captivity (vers. 4, 5, 8); here (ver. 9) we have a description that suits only the condition of those fugitives to Egypt, who yet retained their freedom. But I refer the verse, not as EWALD to those already settled in Egypt, but to events and circumstances preceding their settlement. According to Jeremiah xli. 8, ten men bought their lives of Ishmael, the murderer of Gedaliah, at the price of provisions which they had hidden. From this we see that provisions were scarce and that there were bands of robbers who hunted for them. Is it not then in the highest degree probable, that the crowd which fled to Egypt (Jer. xli. 16-18), both while they were still in Palestine, and frequently when they were in the desert, could obtain what was necessary for subsistence only at the peril of their lives?—[We gat our bread. Here again we have a future tense, נָתַן; intimating the frequent recurrence, and doubtless the continuance, at the time of writing, of this peril.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 10. Our skin was black like an oven. [So BROUGHTON, CALVIN and HENDERSON. See Ps. lxxviii. 13.] Our skin is burnt [has been burnt] like an oven. [This sense is the one generally adopted, on the ground that it is more consistent with the effects of famine, and more congenial with the derivation and use of the Hebrew word. BLAYNEY and NOYES translate the verb parched.—W. H. H.]. The effect of hunger on the skin is compared to that of heat on the walls of the oven. Like these, that has become hot, dry, hard, cracked. There was hunger enough with the two parts of the people, who stretched out their hands, one to Assyria, the other to Egypt, until the one had arrived in Assyria and the other in Egypt.—Because of the terrible (marg. terrors, or storms of) famine,—because of the heat (or hotness, Gluten) of hunger. [Because of the burning (BROUGHTON) or burnings (CALVIN, NOYES). GERLACH translates the word raging, or fury (Wüthen), and so it is rendered by ALEXANDER (in Ps. xi. 6; cxix. 53, the only other places where the word occurs), who remarks, that "no English word is strong enough to represent the Hebrew except rage or fury." BLAYNEY translates stormy blasts of hunger, and HENDERSON the hot blasts of famine.—W. H. H.]

V. 11-13.

11 They ravished the women in Zion, and the maids in the cities of Judah.
12, 13 Princes are hanged by their hand: the faces of elders were not honoured. They took the young men to grind, and the children fell under the wood.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 11-13. The sufferings of individuals, of all ages and conditions, especially their degradation, are described. These verses still further confirm the opinion, that this Song belongs to no special time or locality, but that it is a general enumeration of the various evils the people had suffered, from the time when Jerusalem was invaded, to the time when the Prophet indited this Poem.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 11. In this and the following verses (to ver. 15) are described the sorrows which befell particular classes of persons at the capture of the city. These are incidents which partly belong to an earlier period of the history, and partly still continue in force. The violation of the women and the hanging up of the Princes are past events, but the pain they caused still survives.—They ravished—dishonored. [OWEN: "There is here a delicate word for a disgraceful act. The words literally are,—Women in Zion they humbled (or, were humbled). It is humbled by the Sept. and Vulg." They suffered not only the worst, but all sorts of indignities.—W. II. II.]—The women in Zion and the maids—virgins—in the cities of Judah. [BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON and NOYES translate the first word matrons. The Hebrew word is as generic as our word women. Besides, this transfers the antithesis from Zion and the cities of Judah, where it belongs, to the distinction between matrons and maids, which the parallelism does not require. The women generally were humbled, even in Zion, yea and throughout all the cities of Judah. CALVIN: "He mentioned Zion rather than Jerusalem,—it was indeed to state a part for the whole; but that place we know had been chosen by God that His name might be there worshipped. . . . As, then, God had there His palace, that He might dwell in the midst of His people, it was a disgraceful sight in the extreme to see women ravished there, for the temple of God was thus violated."—W. II. II.]

Ver. 12. Princes arc—were [have been]—hanged up—hung—by their hand [i. e. suspended by the hand.—W. II. H.]. This has been explained in three ways. 1. The Princes hung themselves with their own hand. But since, according to Deut. xxi. 23, he that is hanged is accursed of God, this is incredible. Why could they not have killed themselves in some other way? CALVIN indeed surmises, that they were compelled to hang themselves. But would not this have been explicitly stated, if the Jews had been compelled to do it? 2. At their side [i. e. Princes were hung beside or near the cities (so EWALD), or at the side, or in near proximity to the humbled women]. But against this are (1) the masculine suffix, (2) and yet more the preposition עַל, —it should be לְיָדָם (1 Sam. xix. 3; Prov. viii. 3; 1 Chron. xviii. 17; xxiii. 28). Only two places can be named, where עַל may stand for לְיָד, namely, 1 Sam. xxi. 14; Job xv.

23. But in the first passage it is, וַיִּהְיוּ לְיָדָם, he raved in or under their hands; and in Job xv. 23, the sense, as the connection shows, is—he knows that he himself (by his own hand) has prepared the day of darkness. Nothing else remains for us, therefore, but to translate, 3. by their hand, and to refer the suffix to their enemies. The sense, indeed, is somewhat feeble; but verbal and substantial arguments render this explanation necessary. [GERLACH adopts the same view. Besides the evident awkwardness of this construction, it is open to the very serious objection, that the enemies have not been mentioned in the preceding context, nor are they prominently in the mind of either writer or speaker. The preceding verse merely tells us that women in Zion and virgins in the cities of Judah had been humbled. But by whom? The natural inference is, by the public enemy. Yet this is not said; is not even inevitable, and if it were, the mind of the reader is occupied with the women who suffered, not with the men who inflicted the injury. The pronoun, if it refers to any subject in the preceding verse, must, it would seem, refer to the women, or possibly to the cities. But that it does not refer to either of these is evident from its gender, and from the absence of any intelligible sense in which it can refer to them. We must conclude that it refers to the persons immediately named in close and preceding connection, and who according to all fixed rules of grammar, must be its subject. If this is so, then it can only mean either, what CALVIN says, that the Princes committed suicide, and that by hanging themselves, which as has been said is utterly incredible; or else, what the collocation of the words in the original naturally suggests, that the princes were hung up, i. e. suspended, by the hand, or their hand. The pronoun may properly be dispensed with, for its presence here seems entirely due to the preference of the writer for words ending in D; it belongs to the rhyme, or assonance, and is not intended to be emphatic. So the Vulgate translates, omitting the pronoun: Principes manu suspensi sunt.—HENDERSON also omits the pronoun; but he overlooks the Niphal form of the verb and makes the enemy its subject. He translates, Princes they hung up by the hand. BOOTHROYD, more correctly, Princes were hung up by the hand. He supposes that the Princes and elders were first murdered and then hung up. OWEN: "The most obvious meaning of the words is, that Princes were hung or suspended by the hand, and not by the neck. Such a punishment. . . . may have been a barbarity resorted to by the Chaldeans. This seems to be the meaning conveyed by the Versions and the Targum." If they were not tortured to death in this way, it is not unlikely that "the sons of Zedekiah," and "all the Princes of Judah" were slain in Riblah by being beheaded, and that their headless trunks were suspended by the hands on the walls of the city. Thus the headless, naked body of Saul, and the bodies of his three sons, were fastened to the walls of Bethshan (1 Sam. xxxi. 8-12). "It was a custom with the Persians, after they had slain, strangled, or beheaded their enemy, to hang their bodies upon poles or empale them. In this way they treated Mithraeus of Miletum, and Leonidas of Laedemon. See Herodotus, Lib. vi. c. 30; Lib. vii. c. 238" (ADAM CLARKE). Or, there may have been instances in which Princes were thus suspended, not after death, nor for the purpose of killing them, but as an ignominious and torturing punishment. It is said that "no punishment is more common in the East. Has a master a refractory slave, . . . several men are called, who tie the offender's hands and hoist him to the roof till he beg forgiveness" (Comp. Comm.).—W. II. II.] The faces of Elders were not regarded. This is said in allusion to Lev. xix. 32, "Thou shalt honor the face of the old man," comp. Lev. xix. 15; Ex. xxiii. 3. Although in the places referred to, the word Elders is intended as a designation of age, not of dignity, yet we are obliged to take it in the latter sense here; because it is placed in parallelism with Princes, and because the aged in contrast with the youthful are spoken of in ver. 14.

Ver. 13. They took the young men to grind—the young men are obliged to carry the mill—[NOYES: Young men carried mill-stones]. The Vulgate translates, Adolescentes impudice abusi sunt (same ns, Adolescentes multationem passi sunt). [DOUAY: They abused the young men indecently, which is explained by this note, "i. e., made them grind naked in the mill." But the second clause of the verse is against any such interpretation of the first clause. The explanations, Juvenes ad molendum sumserunt, Young men were taken to grind, and Juvenes molas agitarunt or versarunt, Young men shook or turned mills, are verbally incorrect, for the verb נָטַן does not mean agitare, to shake: to give it the sense of turning, לָּ would be necessary. But the simple literal meaning of the word [to lift, GERLACH:—to carry], entirely suffices. For not only was the carrying of the hand-mills on the journey a heavy burden, but that they carried these implies that they were also compelled to turn them, i. e., to grind with them. As thus explained, the first clause corresponds with the second. And [The omission of the conjunction in this song, where it might be expected, makes its expression here more emphatic. Young men have been compelled to carry mill-stones, even boys, or mere children have fallen under the heavy burdens of wood they were forced to carry.—W. H. H.] the children fell under the wood.—Boys fall [properly, fell, or have fallen.—W. H. H.] under the wood. The בְּחוּרֵי, the most blooming and strongest of the youth were obliged to carry the mill-stones (see HERZ. R.-Enc. x. p. 82), the boys generally were required to drag the wood. [The most laborious and menial services were required of the Jewish youth and children.—W. H. H.]

V. 14-18.

14 The elders have ceased from the gate, the young men from their music. The 15 joy of our heart is ceased; our dance is turned into mourning. The crown is 16 fallen from our head: woe unto us, that we have sinned! For this our heart is 17 faint; for these things our eyes are dim. Because of the mountain of Zion, which 18 is desolate, the foxes walk upon it.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

[Vers. 14-18 depict the depressing effects of these various wrongs and humiliations on the feelings and deportment of the people.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 14. The elders have ceased from the gate, the young men from their music. [The German language enables GERLACH to give a verbally literal translation: Die Aeltesten feiern vom Thor, die Jünglinge von ihrem Saitenspiel. We have no words in English that so accurately translate שָׁבַת and נָטַן. NOYES' translation, which is also LUTHER'S—The elders sit no more at the gate; the young men have ceased from their music—restricts the meaning of the first clause, mistranslates the verb, and renders it necessary to supply a verb in the second clause. The idea is not merely that the elders no longer occupy their seats in the gates,—but that they rest or cease from all those duties and pleasures that pertain to their age and dignity. While elders here designate old men, in antithesis to young men, it is not to the exclusion of the official elders, who are regarded as types and representatives of those past middle-life,—of those who especially delighted in resorting to the gates of the city, whether their official duties called them there or not. HENDERSON: "It is common in the East for aged men to meet in the open space without the gate of the city, to pass the time in narrating or hearing the news of the day, or the stories of bygone years. From this an easy transition is made to the jocund pastime of the young."—W. H. H.] The gate was, as it were, the court of the elders of the people, and, at the same time, the principal place of social entertainment. See WINER, R. W. B. s. v. Thore. For this reason, and also on account of the second clause of the verse, we must consider, not only the discontinuance of public business, but the loss of that pleasure which the gate afforded to the older men. The young men from their music. THENIUS remarks correctly that Jeremiah "in the threatenings, vii. 34 and xvi. 9, expresses himself concerning the loss of happiness in a way similar to this, and yet differing from what is said here." [To suppose this verse to refer especially to the city of Jerusalem (CALVIN) is in itself absurd. There were no longer gates, elders, or young men in Jerusalem, of whom these things could be said. Throughout this song, the Prophet generalizes and does not particularize with reference to times and places.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 15. Whilst, as has been said, vers. 11-14 enter into details, vers. 15, 16, generalize the facts. [Ver. 14 is more closely connected with what follows than with what precedes it. It describes the disheartening effects, on the minds and conduct of the people, of what had happened. It does not state, as all the preceding verses do, some special cause of humiliation or suffering.—W. H. H.] The joy of our heart is ceased; our dance is turned into mourning.—[Ceased has the joy of our heart, changed to mourning our dance. Is ceased. GATAKER: "Heb. hath rested: the same term that was before, ver. 14, and it may seem to have some glance at such mirth and cheer, as they were wont to have at their solemn festivals and on their Sabbaths, Deut. xvi. 11, 14; xxviii. 47, 48; 2 Chron. xxix. 36; Ps. xlii. 4; lxxxi. 1, 2; xcii. 1, 2."—W. H. H.]

Ver. 16. The crown is fallen from our head [marg. The crown of our head. So BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, HENDERSON, OWEN. It is more literal, but bad English. The crown of the head, in English, is something very different from the crown on the head. The one cannot fall without the head it belongs to. The other may fall from the head; so here: Fallen has the crown from our head.—W. H. H.] Woe unto us, that—for—we have sinned. I must regard the second half of this verse as a conclusion [i. e. of a paragraph, or one of the principal parts of the chapter], corresponding to that of ver. 7. I do not, therefore, believe that ver. 16 is to be connected with ver. 17, and that by the crown on our head is to be understood "Jerusalem, as a diadem set upon Zion with its splendid palaces" (THEXIVUS), although the expression by itself could have such an interpretation. Rather, I believe that the first clause of ver. 16 is in very close connection with ver. 15; and that the first clause of ver. 16 declares, that not only all joy, but also all honor has forsaken Jerusalem. The crown on the head of Jerusalem had consisted in this, that she was great among the nations, a princess among the provinces, and perfect in beauty, the joy of the whole earth (i. 1; ii. 15). [It confuses the sense to suppose that Jerusalem is the subject from whose head the crown has fallen. The people generally are the subject; "the crown of our head has fallen." In the loss of independent nationality, and of all honor among the nations, who now treated them with the utmost contempt, the crown had indeed fallen from their heads. However intimately related are vers. 7 and 16, however striking and fine it would be, rhetorically considered, if each stood in the position of an emphatic conclusion to corresponding strophes (if this is poetry), or paragraphs (if it is prose); yet, in point of fact, each of these verses is too intimately connected with the verses immediately following it, to be separated from them without injuring the logical connection of the thoughts.

—W. H. H.]—We have sinned! A gratifying advance is observable here, in so far as the people now openly and honorably confess their own guilt. See iii. 39-42.

Vers. 17, 18. These two verses constitute the introduction to the closing prayer, vers. 19-22. They refer to a fact which must be the cause of deepest pain to a heart truly attached to theocracy,—the desolation of the holy mountain. But this gloomy and dark image constitutes only the back-ground for those noble and consolatory thoughts with which the Bard (Sanger) comforts himself in his prayer.

Ver. 17. For this our heart is faint; for these things our eyes are dim. (On this account is our heart faint, therefore are our eyes become dim. For the reasons given above we refer the pronominal phrases הַיְּזָהִי, on this account (darob) [E.V., for this], and הַיְּזָהִי, therefore (darüber) [E.V., for these things], to what follows in reference to Mount Zion in ver. 18. [The objections to this interpretation are insuperable. 1. In point of fact, the desolation of Zion was not the only, nor the absorbing cause of grief, as is evident from the whole of the preceding part of this Song, in which abundant and terrible causes of distress are given, without a single allusion to the desolation of Zion. 2. The second pronominal suffix הַיְּזָהִי (correctly translated in English Version, for these things) is plural, and must include more than the first suffix הַיְּזָהִי (for this thing), which is singular. It is obvious that both cannot refer to the single statement in ver. 18, that Mount Zion has become desolate. Nor can it be said, that two things are stated in ver. 18, namely, that Mount Zion is desolate; and that the foxes run upon it. For the latter statement is a mere expansion or illustration of the first: and it would be very absurd to make the latter a special and additional cause of grief, regarded as in any sense distinct from the first great fact that the mountain is desolate. 3. This interpretation involves a redundancy of relative expository phrases, all referring to the same thing, that is useless, inelegant, and utterly incongruous with the prevailing style of composition in the Lamentations, which is terse, compressed and remarkable for the absence of words not actually indispensable, as, for example, of the connecting ! (which the Masorites were so anxious to insert), and of the repeated verb, causing a constant recurrence of the Zeugma, see vers. 2, 3, 6, 8, 11, 14, 19. Is it likely that such a writer would say, on account of this thing (הַיְּזָהִי), on account of these things (הַיְּזָהִי), on account of (הַיְּזָהִי) Mount Zion, etc., our heart is faint, our eyes are dim: using three relative expository phrases, where one would have sufficed? 4. By referring the verse to what precedes it, these relative phrases, instead of being redundant and cumbersome, become significant and impressive. For this (namely, that the crown has fallen from our head because we have sinned), our heart is faint; for these things (namely, all the evils that have been recited), our eyes are dim. We may then take ver. 18 as an additional reason for lamentation, translating לע , on account of, or take it as an independent, but not unrelated, thought, translating לע , as to: see remarks on that verse.—W. H. H.]—Our eyes are dim [our eyes have become dim]. We must regard weeping, according to ii. 11, as the immediate cause of the eyes becoming dim. [Weeping suggests itself as a sufficient physical cause, and if the Prophet means this, then our eyes have become dim, is a poetical way of intimating how greatly they have wept. But there is no allusion to tears in the context; the period of violent weeping, indeed, we may regard as past: and the parallelism is better carried out by regarding the dimness of the eyes as the effect of the faintness of the heart. So NOYES: “our eyes are dim; i. e., through faintness the sight of our eyes departs. On the other hand, the eyes are said to be enlightened when the strength is restored and faintness departs. See 1 Sam. xiv. 29.” We are not to restrict the thought to merely physical causes and effects. The faintness of the heart suggests a moral cause, the effect of which would be that moral dimness of sight which ensues, when God is no longer seen and hope expires. It is this underlying thought that connects ver. 17 with ver. 18.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 18. Because of the mountain of Zion, which is [has become] desolate, the foxes walk upon it. The Mount of Zion is here evidently intended, not in the restricted sense, but in the wider sense in which it “includes Moriah.” See DELITZSCH on Ps. ii. 6; ix. 12; lxxvi. 3, etc. [The name Zion is used throughout the Lamentations, with great uniformity and precision, of Jerusalem as the theocratic city, where God has His dwelling-place, and always with special reference to the most sacred precincts of that city, where were the Temple of God and the palace of the king. Here the word Mount makes the designation more plain. The whole city, doubtless, is intended; but it is the city regarded as the dwelling-place of God, the throne of the Theocracy. Probably the word is always used by the Prophets in this sense; and a regard to this fact will spare us the difficulties of determining whether Mount Moriah, the Temple mount, was included generically in Mount Zion, or is always to be distinguished from Mount Zion.—W. H. H.]—The foxes walk [have walked] upon it. Where these beasts live the habitations of men must have ceased to exist. See Ps. lxxiii. 11; comp. Judg. xv. 4; Ez. xiii. 4. It may also be properly assumed, that if Jerusalem had been destroyed within a few weeks, those ravenous beasts were busily engaged roaming through its holy precincts seeking for the carcases of the dead. [FOXES. שׁוֹנֵי לַיָּם. Jackals, BOOTHROYD, WORDSWORTH, GERLACH. See KITTO'S Cyc. Bib. Lit. If preying on dead men was mentioned, or even distinctly hinted at, we might be sure that the jackal, or wolf, or some other ravenous member of the canine species, is probably intended; for foxes are not addicted to this. A better reason for supposing that jackals are meant, is the plural form of the word (though this could be explained by the preference of the writer for terminations in D), as if they went about on the Holy Mount in companies; for the jackal is a gregarious, the fox a solitary animal. But the Hebrew לע , may mean, not walking about on the mountain, but walking in the frequentative sense, or living (see לע , Piel in Eccl. iv. 15) in the mountain. In this case the reference would be to these animals, whether foxes or jackals, having their burrows there, remaining there permanently and undisturbed. This gives a better idea of the utter desolation that reigned on Mount Zion, and is more consonant with the fact, that more than “a few weeks” must have elapsed since the city was completely destroyed and consumed to its foundations, and, therefore, there were no corpses there to invite the predatory excursions of the jackals.—But what is the connection of ver. 18 with ver. 17? How is the preposition לע to be translated? BROUGHTON very elegantly preserves the obscurity of the original; “For this our heart is sick, for these things our eyes be dim. For Mount Zion which is desolate, the foxes walk upon it.” We can translate לע , as in the preceding verse, on account of, and then this verse is immediately connected with the preceding verse, and assigns an additional reason, why the heart is sick, and the eyes dim, namely, that Mount Zion is desolate. That is the same as saying, that God has withdrawn from His people: their heart is faint and their eyes dim on account of past and present troubles, and also because there is no prospect of relief for them, for God’s house is destroyed, and Jehovah has forsaken His people. This is excellent sense, and were there no question as to the grammatical construction we might be satisfied with it. But we may translate לע , as to (GERLACH, über), as to Mount Zion which has become desolate, the foxes have walked upon it. Thus rendered, this verse is independent of the preceding verse as to grammatical construction, but intimately related to it in sense. This is recommended by several considerations. 1. לע , by itself, rarely has the sense of on account of. 2. The לע , relativum, properly throws the idea connected with it into a parenthesis. If so, then the idea that Zion lies waste, is not the prominent idea, but is subordinate to what, in itself is an insignificant fact, that the foxes walk upon it. Surely that could not constitute the climax of their grief, who had to lament for dishonored women, princes, and elders, and the cruellest oppression of tender children! 3. If the foxes walking on Zion is a fact significant of something else of far deeper import (as in truth it is, though this method of construction does not suggest that interpretation), yet in such a case it is to be observed, that the לע should be repeated before the last clause. Our heart is faint, our eyes dim, Because of Mount Zion, because the foxes walk upon it. In every case the construction is awkward. 4. By taking לע in the sense of as to, we have perfect grammatical construction: As to Mount Zion, which has become desolate, the foxes walk upon it! 5. This at once suggests the real force of the expression, the foxes walk upon it, and gives dignity to what else would be an insignificant culmination point of the sublime grief expressed in what precedes. As to Mount Zion, from whence ought to come our help and salvation, the foxes have it now for their home! It is no longer the dwelling-place of God, and the refuge of His people. This is no sentimental effusion of grief, that the foxes roam where the proud and happy city once stood. It is the expression of a terrible truth, that Jehovah had forsaken His people; and what had been His dwelling-place, now laid waste and destroyed, is the home of wild beasts. This explanation is favored by the emphatic declaration that follows in ver. 19, and especially by the emphatic expression of the personal pronoun: Thou, Jehovah art forever. Thy dwelling-place is the home of the wild beasts, but Thou Thyself dost still exist, dost still reign, and Thy people pray Thee to return to them, and have mercy upon them.—W. H. H.]

V. 19-22.

19 Thou, O LORD, remainest forever; thy throne from generation to generation.
 20, 21 Wherefore dost thou forget us forever, and forsake us so long time? Turn thou 22 us unto thee, O LORD, and we shall be turned; renew our days as of old. But thou hast utterly rejected us; thou art very wroth against us.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

Ver. 19.—[BLAYNEY: "The LXX., Syr., Vulg. and Arabic all express the conjunction at the beginning of this verse. Two MSS. read וְאֵתָּהּ, and so it is found in the notes of the celebrated printed Bible, No. 300"]—בְּכִסֵּאֲךָ, frequently in Jeremiah, i. 15; iii. 17, etc.—וְיָרֵךְ לְדָוִד Jeremiah never uses. He says only once וְיָרֵךְ לְדָוִד, i. 39. [The writer who only once used a common expression with a common preposition, is the very one who would be likely only once to use the same expression with another preposition.—W. H. H.]

Ver. 20.—לְצִנּוֹת, Jer. iii. 5; i. 39.—שָׁכַחְךָ, Jer. ii. 32; iii. 21, etc.—יָגַבְךָ, Jer. ii. 13; xli. 7, etc.—אָרְךָ Jeremiah never uses. See Ps. xxiii. 6; xciii. 5.

Ver. 21.—The verb תִּרְשַׁע (except here, used only in Piel and Hiph.) is not found in Jeremiah.—כִּכְרָם, see Jer. xxx. 20.

Ver. 22.—כִּי־אֵם, Jer. xiv. 19, ii. 37; vi. 30, etc.—קִנְיָךְ, Jer. xxxvii. 5.—כִּי־אָרְךָ Jeremiah uses twice, xviii. 13; xlviii. 16; יָגַבְךָ never. [Poor little יָגַב, slighted by Jeremiah twice! takes its revenge by having the last word to say against his authorship of the Lamentations.—W. H. H.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 19-22. This short prayer contains four thoughts. 1. A positive source of consolation; the throne of the Lord stands immovably fast, ver. 19. 2. A question: Why then should the Lord forget His people forever? ver. 20. 3. A petition: that the Lord would re-establish His people spiritually and temporally, ver. 21. 4. A negative source of consolation: the Lord cannot be angry forever, ver. 22.

Ver. 19. Thou, O LORD.—Thou, Jehovah. [BLAYNEY, BOOTHROYD, NOYES: But Thou, Jehovah. See Textual notes above. Whether the originally belonged to the text or not, the emphatic expression of the personal pronoun אַתָּה, and the parallelism between vers. 18 and 19, involve the sense of but, yet, or as to, before the pronoun. As to Zion, it is desolate,—but Thou endurest forever, or as to Thee, though Thy dwelling-place is gone, Thou endurest. GATAKER indicates this in this brief note, "But, or Yet, to be supplied."—W. H. H.].—Remainest forever.—[lit., sittest forever. But when this is said of God or of human monarchs, it always refers to their occupying the throne; see Ps. lxi. 8 (7); ix. 5 (4), 12 (11); Zech. vi. 13. The king sits, the subject stands. The instant mention of the throne, shows that this must be the meaning here. Not God's continual existence, but His uninterrupted sovereignty over His creatures. HENDERSON and NOYES translate, sittest as king. But this seems to lower the thought to a comparison with human monarchs. Though God is called and is a King, yet it is not as any ordinary king that He occupies the throne. GERLACH translates, Thou art enthroned forever. This produces a slight tautology. Thou reignest forever (GATAKER), may, perhaps, be as accurate a translation of the word, as our English affords.—W. H. H.].—Thy throne from generation to generation. See Ps. xlv. 7; lxxxix. 5; xciii. 2. In opposition to the desolation of the external sanctuary, the Poet holds up before himself the consolation, that the Lord Himself nevertheless sits firmly on His throne and His kingdom remains immovable. The heathen could destroy the Temple; to the Lord Himself they could do no harm. See Ps. ix. 8 (7); xxix. 16, cxlvi. 10; cxxv. 1.

Ver. 20. Wherefore dost thou forget us forever, and forsake us so long time? (margin, for length of days). Why shouldst Thou forever forget us, and forsake us for long time? It ought to be distinctly observed, that it is not said שָׁכַחְתָּנוּ, Thou hast forgotten, עָזַבְתָּנוּ, Thou hast forsaken. The Poet does not ask, Why hast Thou forgotten and forsaken us forever? But why wouldst or shouldst Thou forsake us forever? That He would do this, the Poet cannot believe. See Ps. lxxiv. 2 (1); lxxvii. 8-10 (7-9). [As

OWEN has suggested, we are undoubtedly to regard this as a prayer for present and immediate relief. The Prophet well understood that the captivity would not end before seventy years. That for that time at least Zion must remain desolate. He also firmly believed that after that time, the people would return to their own land, and God would dwell on Mount Zion. He could not therefore ask, with any reference to the possibility of such a thing, if God intended to forsake the Jewish people forever? But what He does ask is, if He would forever or always (אָנְכִי, constantly, continuously) forget and forsake for length of days, for a long period of time, or for all their life-time, that suffering generation of His people? Would He leave them in their present misery without any relief, any show of mercy? Though Zion was desolate, and God had withdrawn His theocratic presence from the people, and the Prophet knew that He would not in that sense return to the people again, till that sinful generation was dead, yet, he says, Thou still art God, Thou reignest forever, Thy throne remains unmoved by any mundane events,—why then shouldst Thou continuously, persistently forget us and completely abandon us to our present sorrow? The pronoun us here, embraces the persons of those embraced by the us in the preceding verses of the Song. Had he intended the people as such, and not the people individually considered, he would probably have used some such designation as the daughter of Thy people, or simply Thy people. The prayer as thus interpreted was answered. Long before the captivity ended, God had mercy on the sufferers, gave them favor in the eyes of men, and relieved them from many of their distresses. The verse then ought to be translated, Wherefore shouldst Thou always forget us, shouldst Thou abandon us—i. e. to our present misery—for length of days, that is, for any long but indefinite period of time?—W. H. II.]

Ver. 21. Turn Thou us unto Thee, O LORD—Jehovah—and we shall be turned. The Poet well knows that a restoration is possible; but he also knows its conditions. He has before his eyes what is said in Jer. xxxi. 16-22; iii. 1-4, 12, in which the idea שׁוּב [to turn] is employed in a variety of ways.—The words הֲשִׁיבֵנוּ וְהִשְׁבִּיבֵנוּ [turn us and we shall turn] are a direct quotation from Jer. xxxi. 18. See remarks on that passage. Comp. Ps. lxxx. 4 (3), 8 (7), 20 (19). The question is whether the Poet prayed only for temporal, or only for spiritual restoration? It is in point of fact not imaginable, that there could be one without the other. But he knows that in order to either kind of restoration, the Lord must take the initiative. And especially, first of all, He must lead back the people to Himself. Only when the Lord has accomplished this—but then most certainly—will the people return back to the Lord and to the place of His gracious presence and so be restored to the old covenant relationship. [There are three ways of understanding this prayer, which Dr. NÆGELSBACH has not distinguished with his usual admirable perspicuity. 1. It can be understood as a prayer for the restoration of the old condition of things, involving a return to their own land. OWEN: “‘The meaning of this sentence is,’ says GROTIUS, ‘Restore us to Thy favor, that we may be restored to our ancient state.’ Were this evidently the meaning, the rendering ought to be thus,—Restore us, O Jehovah, to Thyself, that we may be restored.” It is obvious that the words so translated do not express what is claimed for them. Restore us to Thyself, that we may be restored, can only mean that we may be restored to Thyself. This might involve as a consequence the return of the “ancient state.” But if that had been the main idea, it would have been differently expressed. Besides people are apt to pray for what they most need and are likely to get. The pressing need of the people now, was instant relief from suffering. This they might have without a return to their land. The latter they could not expect for themselves, and were sure that it would come eventually to a future generation. 2. In a strictly theocratic sense. That God would bring them back to Himself and they be restored to His favor and blessed with all the blessings of the covenant. This would not involve necessarily an immediate return to their own land; and gives a good sense. Yet it does not seem fully to express the natural meaning of the words. Nor is it grammatically correct to take שׁוּב in a passive, instead of an active sense. 3. It can be regarded as a prayer for converting grace. Turn Thou us to Thyself and we shall turn, i. e. to Thee. This is the simplest and most natural translation. It is consistent with the fact, that the people throughout this Song, while speaking collectively, are yet regarded as individuals. It harmonizes with the evident meaning of ver. 20. It is such a prayer as was eminently proper in their circumstances. It is consistent with the whole doctrine of the Bible in regard to converting grace, or the grace of repentance. Finally, it prepares the way for the final petition, renew our days as of old.—W. H. II.].—Renew our days as of old. The construction is a prolepsis. Renew our days, i. e. vitam, vitæ conditionem, Job x. 5, so that they may be as they were formerly. [This petition is general and comprehensive. It reaches forward to the time when all they had possessed and enjoyed would be theirs again as a people,—Country, Temple, Priest, Prophet, and King. But it does not require the instant or even speedy fulfilment of these things; nor does this petition afford any ground for the argument (OWEN) that the preceding petition must be of the same purport.—W. H. II.]

Ver. 22. But Thou hast utterly rejected us; (marg. For wilt Thou utterly reject us?) Thou art very wrath against us. Or hast Thou wholly rejected us, and art exceedingly angry with us? The verse contains, as remarked above, a negative fundamental statement. The meaning of the conjunction אֲבָרָא לִי [but, except, unless] is, it may be then that. See Gen. xxviii. 17; Is. xlii. 19; Prov. iii. 12; my Gr. § 110, 4, note, EWALD, § 356. The idea of realization is to be supplied before the conjunction, from the foregoing prayer; this will be done, unless Thou mayest have utterly abandoned us. [CALVIN: Except Thou hast wholly rejected us, and hast become very angry with us. BOOTHROYD puts the first clause interrogatively, For wilt Thou altogether cast us off? Thou hast been wroth against us exceedingly. But both verbs are preterites, and neither can be taken in a future sense. For the same reason, the verbs cannot be translated as NOYES renders them, taking both clauses interrogatively, For shouldst Thou utterly reject us? Shouldst Thou be so exceedingly wroth against us? We must either accept the sense of Dr. NAEGELSBACH'S translation, with which CALVIN and GERLACH agree, or accept the text of the English Version, with which agree Sept., Syr., Arab., Vulg., Targ., BROUGHTON, BLAYNEY, HENDERSON, and OWEN, an imposing weight of authority. If we adopt the latter sense, then we must accept of OWEN'S as the only possible explanation, that the reference is to themselves as individuals, not as representatives of the Jewish race. They knew that God had not utterly rejected the nation. They knew that as a nation, they would be restored to their land. In either case, the opinion that this prayer is a prayer for immediate relief as individuals, and not for final restoration as a nation, is evident. For, if we adopt the sense of the text of the English version, we cannot believe that Jeremiah meant to announce the utter rejection of the nation; and if we prefer the sense of the margin of the English version, we cannot believe that Jeremiah would close this magnificent poem with a question involving the possibility of God's utter rejection of the whole nation. Rather, we must regard these closing words as one last plaintive cry for mercy,—unless Thou hast utterly rejected us, who are now in misery, and hast become exceedingly angry with us, so that Thy wrath cannot be appeased, and the mercy, we implore in vain for ourselves, is to be reserved for another and more pious generation of Israelites.—W. H. H.]

The Hebrew codices repeat, for the purpose of synagogue reading, after ver. 22, the words of ver. 21, as they do also [repeat the verse before the last, after the last verse] at the close of Isaiah, Malachi, and Ecclesiastes, "in order to close with consolatory words." See DELITZSCH, Is. p. 651. [HUGO BROUGHTON: Turn us, O Eternal, unto Thee, and we shall return: renew our days as of old. The ver. 21 is one of the four which, in the Massoreth Bible, are printed as a postscript for better memory. Another is the last save one in Ecclesiastes, another the last save one in Esay, the fourth the last save one in Malachi, as I noted upon Ecclesiastes. These sayings contain the main of the writers. That in Ecclesiastes biddeth us look for all happiness in the world to come, that of Esay telleth how all Moyses' policy shall end. That of Malachi sheweth how John Baptist shall begin the New Testament. And this of Jeremy telleth that God will begin a new state for his people. Upon that they studied in Babylon fifty years, and they made themselves a golden age, knowing that the kingdom of Christ was in suffering. Afterwards they are plainly told of the true kingdom, and be renewed, as of old. This verse was given in the beginning of the captivity for a comfort that way." WORDSWORTH: "Turn Thou us unto Thee, O Lord, and we shall be turned. A very appropriate prayer for Israel weeping over the ruins of Jerusalem,—destroyed first by the Chaldean armies, and next, on the anniversary of the same day, by the power of Rome, for its sins. Israel says, 'Turn Thou us, O Lord, and we shall be turned;' and the Apostle of Israel, the great Hebrew of the Hebrews, St. Paul, says, 'Even unto this day, when Moses is read, the veil is upon their heart. Nevertheless, when it shall turn unto the Lord, the veil shall be taken away' (2 Cor. iii. 15, 16). May He hasten the time! Then the dirge of Lamentation will be changed into a jubilee of joy."]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Ver. 1. Remember, O LORD. "It is unworthy of the majesty of God to impute the fault of forgetfulness to Him, but He may be entreated to be mindful or to remember, in order to render speedy assistance to the needy, and thus make manifest what [viz. His remembrance] was before concealed." RHAMANUS in GIBSLER., p. 213.

2. Ver. 1. [Consider, and behold. CALVIN: "The words, though brief and concise, yet contain a useful doctrine, that God is pleased to bring help to the miserable when their evils come to an account before Him, especially when they are unjustly oppressed. It is indeed certain, that nothing is unknown to God, but this mode of speaking is according to the perceptions of men; for we think that God disregards our miseries, or we imagine that His back is turned to us when He does not immediately succor us. But He is simply to be asked to look on our evils, . . . as soon as He is pleased to look on the evils we suffer, aid is at the same time prepared for us."—Our reproach. CALVIN: "There is mention especially made of reproach, that the indignity might move God the more; for it was for this end that He took the people under His protection, that they might be for His glory and honor, as Moses says. As then, it was God's will that the riches of His glory should appear in that people, nothing could have been more inconsistent than that, instead of glory, they should have nothing but disgrace and reproach. This, then, is the reason why the Prophet makes a special mention of the reproach of the people."]

3. Ver. 1. "He does not say, 'Remember, O Lord, our enemies, that they may suffer as their deeds deserve,' but, 'Be mindful of what has happened to us,' as if he would say in effect, 'Remembering the evils which we suffer take them away, but overlook the doers of them.' When he says, 'What has happened,' or 'what has been done to us,' he discriminates between what we suffer and what is natural [normal], for these evils are not natural or normal, but accidental, resulting from the manifold effects of sin." PASCANUS in GIBSLER., p. 213.

4. Ver. 1. "The cross seems all the lighter when we lament over it to a true, confidential friend, and show him how it pains us, and he with brotherly sympathy or good advice, removes from us a part of our burden. But men cannot always help us, however sincerely they desire to do so. But he who commends his affairs to God, complains to the right and faithful Helper, who has invited us to pray to Him (Ps. xiii. 6; xxvii. 8; xxxvii. 6; lv. 23; Sir. ii. 11)." ELD. HEN-

NUS. "In adversity we should not, with the Papists, fly for assistance to the dead, who are ignorant of our afflictions (Is. lxiii. 16;) nor, with the superstitious and profane, to magicians and wizards (Is. viii. 19, 20); but, after the example of the church in this passage, we should fly to the Lord (Hos. vi. 1-3 [E. V. Hos. v. 15-vi. 2]; 2 Chr. xx. 12)." FÖRSTER.

5. Vers. 2-16. "Because everything contained in this list of evils was long before predicted to the Israelites with the greatest exactness [lit. to a very hair's breadth] in the ancient Mosaic list [of curses], contained in the twenty-eighth chapter of Deuteronomy, . . . we learn from the agreement of the Mosaic list with the manifest eventu or fulfillment in the captive people of Judah, how the threatenings, contained for us in God's word are to be regarded, not as mere empty, inefficient words to terrify us, but for an undoubted, sure, and certain reckoning and list, whereby God's temporal and eternal wrath from Heaven against the ungodly is revealed and threatened, as it is written in the first chapter of Romans." EGID. HUNNIUS. "This is useful, that we may carry the cup straight, and look well to ourselves, lest it may happen to us in the same way that faith comes to be experience." CRAMER.

6. Ver. 2. "That these things may not happen to us also, let us be pious, upright, and temperate in the acquisition, possession, and use of our property; in reference to which Paul admonishes us in 1 Cor. vii. 30, 31, that while we are in the world, we should not use the world [Vulg.], that we may have worldly possessions, but should possess them as though we had them not. Besides that threefold woe of Habakkuk (ii. 6) presses hard upon us. Use is commendable, abuse criminal." FÖRSTER.

7. Ver. 3. Our mothers are as widows. "By mothers are intended the seven synagogues, which are known to have been established principally on the Mount Olives, from which flowed the milk of doctrine. . . . But in the time of the siege or of the Chaldean ravages, their children having been removed, they were abandoned and consumed with fire." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 214.

8. Vers. 4, 6, 9, 10. "We learn especially how God punishes the misuse of His gifts of plenty and abundance; when, for instance, men are not thankful to God in times of profusion and cheapness, but squander uselessly His gifts, wine and fruits of the earth, by gormandizing and carousing, gluttonizing and guzzling, banqueting and tipping; then God withdraws His blessings and gifts; food becomes scarce so that it is not easily procured; and He sends a famine so that water and precious bread can hardly be obtained, as was the case with the Jewish people. But they had well deserved it by their rioting, which the Prophet Isaiah long before rebuked, when he enumerated, among other gross vices of the house of Judah, drunkenness also, and called down a woe upon it (Is. v. 11-13, comp. Amos vi. 4-7) . . . But the punishment terminates not in temporal poverty. Excessive indulgence in eating and drinking is such a pernicious vice that a man forfeits thereby his part in the Kingdom of Heaven (1 Cor. vi. 9, 10), and must be deprived of eternal happiness, and must suffer thirst with the rich drunkard eternally in the flames of Hell (Luke xvi.; Is. v. 14)." EGID. HUNNIUS.

9. Ver. 6. "According to the real meaning of the Hebrew, the church weeps for her children, when members of Christ and ministers of the altar, for the sake of earthly things, give the hand to those more powerful or to worldly men, who are rendered foul by the blackness of their [ill-gotten] wealth or other crimes." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 216.

10. Ver. 7. "Undeservedly, O Roman, must thou pay the penalty for the sins of thine ancestors." HORACE, Odes, B. IIL, Ode 6. "Already have we sufficiently expiated the perjury of the Laomedonian Troy with our blood." VIRGIL. Georg. I., 501, 2. "This is rightly lamented in the church also, that when the priests and the princes of the earth are delinquent, for their faults, as it were, the people are punished." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 218. "When their kings act the fool, the Greeks are punished." HORACE.

11. Ver. 7. [POOR's Annot.: "We must not understand this in the same sense as Ez. xviii. 2, where God reflecteth upon them for using a proverb to this sense. It is the Prophet who here speaketh, and in the name of the godly Jews, who would not excuse themselves as if they suffered merely for their forefathers' sins. But the Prophet confesseth and bewaileth that God had punished their iniquities and the iniquities of their forefathers together; and it was better with their forefathers who had sinned, and were dead and gone, than with them, upon whom the punishment of their iniquity did abide, and was like so to do for a long time."—Our fathers have sinned, and are not. CALVIN: "Our Prophet's object was to turn God to mercy; and to attain this object he says, 'O Lord, Thou indeed hast hitherto executed just punishment, because our fathers had very long abused Thy goodness and forbearance; but now the time has come for Thee to try and prove whether we are like our fathers; as then, they have perished as they deserved, receive us now into favor.' We hence see that thus no quarrel or contention is carried on with God, but only that the miserable exiles ask God to look on them, since their fathers, who had provoked God and had experienced His dreadful vengeance, were already dead."—And we have borne their iniquities. CALVIN: "When he says that the sons bore the iniquities of the fathers, though it be a strong expression, yet its meaning is not as though God, without reason, punished their children and not their fathers; for unalterable is that declaration, 'The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, nor the father the iniquity of the son; but the soul that sinneth it shall die' (Ez. xviii. 20). It may yet be said that the children are loaded with the sins of their fathers, because God, as He declares by Moses, extends His vengeance to the third and fourth generation (Ex. xx. 5). And He says also in another place, 'I will return into the bosom of children the iniquity of their fathers' (Jer. xxxii. 18). God then continued His vengeance to their posterity. But yet there is no doubt but that the children who had been so severely punished, bore also the punishment of their own iniquity, for they deserved a hundred deaths. But these two things well agree together, that God returns the iniquity of the fathers into the bosom of their children, and yet that the children are chastised for their own sins."

HENRY: "They acknowledge the reproach of sin which they bear. This comes in, in the midst of their complaints, but may well be put in the front of them. This is not here a peevish complaint, or an imputation of unrighteousness to God, like what we have in Jer. xxxi. 29; Ez. xviii. 2, but a penitent confession of the sins of their ancestors, which they themselves had also persisted in, for which they now justly suffered. Thusthey submit themselves to the Divine justice, and refer themselves to the Divine pity. And, truly, the sins God looks back upon in punishing, we must look back upon in repenting, and must notice all that will help to justify God in correcting us. And if we be penitent and patient under what we suffer for the sins of our fathers, we may expect that He who punishes will pity, and soon return in mercy."

11. Ver. 8. "Here occurs a lesson concerning slavery, in reference to which we must hold, that it may be regarded as belonging to the law of nations, but cannot be considered as belonging to the law of nature, because man was created and born for a state of liberty, but slavery is the punishment of sin, as is evident from Gen. ix. 25, where slavery was legally imposed upon Ham, who is, as it were, the patriarch of slaves." FÖRSTER.—[Servants have ruled over us. CLARKE: "To be subject to such is the most painful and dishonorable bondage:—

Quid domini faciant, audent cum talia fures?
Virg. Ecl. iii. 16.

"Since slaves so insolent are grown,
What may not masters do?"

12. Vers. 11-14. "We see by means of a passage relating to the Jews of that same period, when women begin to be haughty and virgins proud, that they are brought to dishonor and shame (Is. iii. 16-24). We see and learn also, when princes and chief men and the nobles in a land and nation boast of their position and worth, what perchance sometimes happens to them on that account. . . . Likewise when the old men or elders in the gates, or in their courts, let every sort of unrighteousness go free and for the sake of reward and gifts pervert the right, and yet will not allow their jurisdiction to be amended, as the elders in Judah would not be rebuked by the Prophets, then we see and learn, what follows thereon, that God lets the court and court-houses at last be reformed by the warriors with the broad axe, that court and judges may be converted, and court-houses lie in dust and ashes.

. . . Further, if the young men make too much of their sports, and young women of their songs and dances, we see and learn that God can cast the instruments of music out of their hands, and change their songs and dances into woful lamentations, as happened to the wilful youth among the Jewish people: to those who, before the Babylonish captivity, treated that matter too lightly, misused their music in their feasts and entertainments, so that the Prophets, Isaiah in his fifteenth chapter, Amos in his sixteenth, as also Jeremiah and others, were compelled to preach against it with all their might. But because their preaching was not heeded, God sent the Babylonians, who stopped their proceedings, so that their pipes fell into the ashes, and their stringed instruments into the dirt, and they at Babylon had to hang up their harps on the willow-trees that were there, as is said in Ps. cxxxvii., and to carry instead of them mill-stones and wood, till they stumbled and fell under their burdens." EGIN. HUNNIUS.

13. Ver. 13. "The children fell under the wood. The reason for this, according to our explanation was, because they were unwilling to believe on the Christ hanging on the wood. Hence one of the Apostles says, The cross is foolishness to the Gentiles, and to the Jews a stumbling-block. So then, they fell down under the wood, because they were unwilling to acknowledge that life which hangs upon the wood in order to destroy death." PASCHASIUS in GUISELER., p. 218.

14. Ver. 14. Music. "Music is an unsuitable mode of expression for grief." Another saying of RHARANUS in GUISELER., p. 221. [And one wholly unworthy of repetition; especially impertinent as a comment on a lyrical dirge that sang its sorrows with the accompaniment of musical instruments. The young men gave up their merry, jovial songs, to stand weeping around their aged Prophet, as he poured out the lamentations of the church, in measured cadences, that added the melting pathos of music to his words and helped to relieve their swelling hearts of some of their tumultuous grief.—W. H. H.]

15. Ver. 16. The crown is fallen from our head. "When the church loses the grace of faith, her crowning honor falls from her head, because she exchanges the Lord of glory for the perfidy of falsehood. But that the Lord is indeed the crown of the church, Isaiah testifies, when he says, 'In that day the Lord of hosts shall be a crown of glory and a diadem of joy to the residue of His people' (Is. xxviii. 5). . . . Virtually the crown on our head vanishes, when His good-will is lost. In reference to which the Prophet sings in congratulatory strains, 'With the shield of Thy good-will Thou hast crowned us, O Lord,' Ps. v. 13 (12)." PASCHASIUS. [CALVIN: "By the crown of the head he no doubt understands all those ornaments, by which that people had been adorned. They had a kingdom and priesthood, which were like two luminaries or two precious jewels; they had also other things by which the Lord had adorned them. As, then, they were endowed with such excellent things, they are said to have borne a crown on their head. But a crown was not only taken for a diadem,—it was also a symbol of joy and of honor; for not only kings then wore crowns, but men were crowned at weddings and feasts, at games also, and theatres. The Prophet, in a word, complains that though many ornaments did belong to the people, yet now they were denuded of them all: The crown, he says, has fallen from our head."—"We can use this plaint to-day, not inappropriately, with regard to the condition of the Roman empire; and that it may be restored, by Divine favor, to its integrity and splendor, we should devoutly pray." FÖRSTER.

16. Ver. 16. The crown has fallen from our head. "Here arises a question, how can this be reconciled with the promise or prophecy of Jacob, in Gen. xlix. 10? . . . The Rabbins have given it as their opinion, that the prophecy of Jacob must be understood thus,—The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, until the king of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar, comes, who will cast down the sceptre of Judah. To this we answer, firstly; That their banishment was only a punishment for an inconsiderably short time. . . . Again it happened, that after the Babylonish captivity they had again their own regent in their own country. . . . Besides, God so wonderfully ordered it, that in the midst of the Babylonish captivity this sceptre of Judah made itself plainly visible. Whereas Daniel and his companions, who were of the royal lineage, and also of the house of David, were not only elevated to high position at the Babylonian court, but Daniel was appointed at Babylon one of the chiefest princes over the whole land (Dan. iii.). . . . Add to this, that Jehoiachin, the king of Judah, must be raised up again from the dust, and honored and treated as a king." EGID. HUNNIUS.

17. Ver. 16. [Woe unto us, that we have sinned!] CALVIN: "When we are pressed down by adversities, Satan will excite us to sorrow, and at the same time hurry us on to rage, except this doctrine comes to our minds, that we have to do with God, who is a righteous Judge. For the knowledge of our sins will tame our pride, and also check all those clamorous complaints, which the unbelieving are wont to utter when they rise up against God. Our evils, then, ought to lead us to consider God's judgment and to confess our sins."—SCOTT: "As wasting wars, terrible famines, and heavy oppressions or persecutions come upon nations, for the sins of former and present generations, when their appointed measure of iniquity is filled up: so the accumulating sins of a man's whole life will be punished with tremendous vengeance at last; except he obtain an interest in Him, 'who bare our sins in His own body on the tree.' The wrath of God turns the sinner's mirth into mourning, his liberty into bondage, and his honor into disgrace: for this the crown is fallen from our heads, and woe unto us that we have sinned!"]

18. Ver. 17. "Rightly is the heart said to be made sorrowful on account of sin, because where iniquity takes possession of the heart and burdens it, it is no longer the habitation of the Holy Spirit; but the whole mind is obscured by the mist of sin, while the grace of the Most High Paraclete disdains to shed abroad its enlightening influences in that mind. For the Holy Spirit of knowledge flees from deception (factum, i. e. ficturam, fraudem), and wisdom will not enter a malevolent soul." RHABANUS, in GHISLER., p. 221.

19. Ver. 18. The foxes walk upon it.—"The same fate which Mount Zion formerly experienced, many Mount Zions, i. e. churches, experience to-day, which a few years ago were enthusiastically devoted to the Lutheran faith, but now, alas for their wretchedness! the foxes run about them destroying the vineyards (Cant. ii. 15)." FÖRSTER.

20. Vers. 19-21. "After Jeremiah has related copiously and in detail all his own sorrows and those of his people, he closes at last with a prayer, to be a lesson to us, that we should do likewise. And as Jeremiah did not permit himself to be deterred from prayer by his own sins and those of the people, which were more in number than the sands of the sea, nor frightened from it by the grievous wrath of God; so we also, neither on account of our sins, nor yet because of the wrath of God, should restrain prayer." Würtemb. Summarien.

21. Ver. 19. Thou, O LORD, remainest forever. "His is an eternal continuance. But that Being (Esse) which exists, is that Being (Esse), in which the Father in the Son and the Son in the Father exist, so that they have a common eternity and are essentially one forever." PASCHASIUS in GHISLER., p. 223. [FAUSSET: " (Ps. cii. 12). The perpetuity of God's rule over human affairs, however He may seem to let His people be oppressed for a time, is their ground of hope of restoration."—CALVIN: "When we fix our eyes on present things, we must necessarily vacillate, as there is nothing permanent in the world; and when adversities bring a cloud over our eyes, then faith in a manner vanishes, at least we are troubled and stand amazed. Now the remedy is, to raise up our eyes to God, for however confounded things may be in the world, yet He remains always the same. His truth may indeed be hidden from us, yet it remains in Him. In short, were the world to change and perish a hundred times, nothing could ever affect the immutability of God. There is, then, no doubt but that the Prophet wished to take courage and to raise himself up to a firm hope, when he exclaimed, 'Thou, O God, remainest forever.' By the word sitting or remaining, he doubtless meant that the world is governed by God. We know that God has no body, but the word sitting is to be taken metaphorically, for He is no God except He be the Judge of the world."]

22. Ver. 19. [Thy throne from generation to generation.] CALVIN: "The throne of God designates the government of the world. But if God be the Judge of the world, then He doeth nothing, or suffereth nothing to be done, but according to His supreme wisdom and justice. . . . The throne of God is set in opposition to chance or uncertain changes which ungodly men dream of; for when they see things in great confusion in the world, they say that it is the wheel of fortune, they say that all things happen through blind fate. Then the Prophet, that he might not be cast down with the unbelieving, refers to the throne of God, and strengthens himself in this doctrine of true religion,—that God nevertheless sits on this throne, though things are thus confounded, though all things fluctuate; yea, even though storms and tempests mingle as it were heaven and earth together, yet God sits on His throne amid all these disturbances. However turbulent, then, all the elements may be, this derogates nothing from the righteous and perpetual judgment of God. This is the meaning of the words; and hence fruit and benefit may be easily gathered."]

23. Ver. 20. Wherefore dost Thou forget us forever? "Not that God could have lost the treasures of memory or of knowledge; but because He delays, on account of some hidden purpose, to render aid immediately, while He seems to contemn those who pray to Him and offers no consolation to their hearts. . . . By reason of human frailty, the mind burdened with troubles thinks God forgetful. For forgetfulness closes the fountain of charity, quickly takes away the faculty of compassion, blunts the edge of the grace that is to be conferred, and does not allow immediate assistance to those who are placed in misery." PASCASIUS in GUISLER., p. 224. [CALVIN: "He seems here to expostulate with God; but the faithful, even when they patiently bear their evils, and submit to God's scourges, do yet familiarly deposit their complaints in His bosom, and thus unburden themselves. We see that David prayed, and no doubt by the real impulse of the Spirit, and at the same time expostulated, 'Why dost Thou forget me perpetually?' Ps. xlii. 1. Nor is there a doubt but that the Prophet took this complaint from David. Let us, then, know, that though the faithful sometimes take this liberty of expostulating with God, yet they do not put off reverence, modesty, submission, or humility. For when the Prophet thus inquired why God should forever forget His people and forsake them, he no doubt relied on his own prophecies, which he knew had proceeded from God, and thus he deferred his hope until the end of the seventy years, for that time had been prefixed by God. But it was according to human judgment that he complained in his own person and in that of the faithful, that the affliction was long; nor is there a doubt but that he dictated this form of prayer to the faithful, that it might be retained after his death. He, then, formed this prayer, not only according to his own feeling, and for the direction of those of his own age; but his purpose was to supply the faithful with a prayer after his own death, so that they might flee to the mercy of God. We now, then, perceive how complaints of this kind ought to be understood, when the prophets asked 'How long?' as though they stimulated God to hasten the time; for it cannot be, when we are pressed down by many evils, but that we wish help to be accelerated; for faith does not wholly strip us of all cares and anxieties. But when we thus pray, let us remember that our times are at the will and in the hand of God, and that we ought not to hasten too much. It is, then, lawful for us on the one hand to ask God to hasten; but, on the other hand, we ought to check our impatience and wait until the suitable time comes. Both these things the Prophet no doubt joined together when he said, Why shouldst Thou perpetually forget us and forsake us?"]

24. Vers. 21, 22. "Since the people in their prayer longed so earnestly for their fatherland, that they might be permitted to return home again, we should take example from this, in what fashion we should yearn after the heavenly fatherland, out of which we have been driven by sin and transgression, and thrust into this empty Babylon of a sinful world. . . . In Ps. cxxxvi. the unspeakably great joy is described, which the Jews will experience when they return again into their fatherland, out of the Babylonish house of slavery and imprisonment. . . . If the people of God so rejoiced and exulted with loud shouts of joy, over the return to their earthly fatherland, how much greater joy there will be, when the elect are actually in the great blessed home-gathering, brought into the eternal, imperishable Jerusalem." EGID. HUNNIUS.

25. Ver. 21. "Whom the Lord hath converted, that one will assuredly be saved, 'but whom He hath despised, no man can correct,' Eccl. vii. 13 [Vulg.]. But when he says, Renew our days as from the beginning, he seems to ask this, that as from the beginning He made the first Patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob devoted to Himself in the plenitude of their faith and love, that He would therefore make them [who offered this prayer] also faithful and devoted to Himself, by bestowing upon them the same gifts, which was promised to them in the advent of Elias, by the Prophet Malachi, as many think (Mal. iv. 5)." RHABANUS in GUISLER., p. 224.

26. Ver. 21. Turn Thou us unto Thee. "Except by grace no backslider can be converted; because it is of ourselves that we have fallen, but of God that we rise again." PASCASIUS in GUISLER., p. 224. [HENRY: "They here pray for converting grace, to prepare and qualify them for mercy; Turn us to Thee, O Lord. This implies an acknowledgment of their own weakness and inability to turn themselves, and that the cause of their distance was in themselves. There is in our nature a bent to backslide from God, but no disposition to return to Him, till His grace works in us both to will and to do. So necessary is that grace, that we may truly say, Turn us, or we shall wander endlessly; and so powerful and effectual is that grace, that we may as truly say, Turn us and we shall be turned; for it is a day of Almighty power, in which God's people are made willing and obedient."] And we shall be turned. "When we are converted, we are recalled to the beginning of renovation; but when that is attained, we will be renewed." PASCASIUS in GUISLER., p. 224. Renew our days as of old. "God has been ready to change His sentence, if thou hadst been willing to change thy wickedness by penitence." AMBROSE on Luke, in FÜRSTEN. [WILLIAM LOWTH: "Do Thou give us the grace of conversion and amendment, and then Thou wilt remove Thy heavy judgments, and restore us to that happiness and prosperity which we formerly enjoyed."]

27. Ver. 22. "He did not utter these words as if despairing of the salvation of his people, but that he might manifest his excessive grief on account of the prolonged humiliation and rejection of his nation. For he saw by the Spirit of prophecy, that the Jews themselves, at the advent of Christ, would not believe. . . . But of the ultimate conversion of his nation he entertained no doubt,—but believed most fully that in the seed of Abraham all the families of the earth would be blessed; in which universal promise themselves also are certainly comprehended." RHABANUS in GUISLER.

28. Ver. 22. "As long as we wander here in this world, we shall be called upon to observe the condition of the condemned and lost, and when we see it, we will indeed mourn over it. Yet the Church of Christ is everywhere to be found, if men seek her, and she triumphs over all death. In her also many ages perish; we shall mourn for her in time, but will be comforted in eternity, for our mother is that Jerusalem, which is from above, which is free. She is eternal, and those who here suffer for sin and have comfort only in grace, they are citizens of that eternal city." DIEDRICH. [SCOTT: "Though we should mourn over the miseries of the world, and the low estate of the Church, yet the true Zion, to which believers are come, cannot be desolated, but remaineth for ever, even as the throne of our God in Heaven. This inheritance cannot be forfeited or alienated; nor can our mansions be possessed by strangers; or our relation to God, as espoused and adopted into His family, abrogated; or the liberty, wherewith Christ hath made us free, taken from us; the freeness of our salvation, disannulled; or our joy and glorying in Christ, made void. Various tribulations may make our hearts faint and our eyes dim: but our way to the mercy-seat of our reconciled God still is open; and we may beseech Him not to forsake or forget us; and plead with Him to turn, and renew us more and more by His grace; that our hopes may revive and our consolations abound as in the days of old. For the eternal and unchangeable God will not utterly reject His Church or any true believer, whatever our trials, fears or lamentations may be. Let us then, in all our troubles, put our whole trust and confidence in His mercy; let us confess our sins, and pour out our hearts before Him; and let us watch against repinings or despondency, whatever we suffer, or witness of the troubles of our brethren; for this we surely know, that it shall be well in the event with all who trust, fear, love and serve the Lord."]

29. [Prayer. CALVIN: "Grant, Almighty God, that as Thou didst formerly execute judgment so severe on Thy people,—O grant, that these chastisements may at this day teach us to fear Thy Name, and also keep us in watchfulness and humility, and that we may so strive to pursue the course of our calling, that we may find that Thou art always our leader, that Thy hand is stretched forth to us, that Thy aid is ever ready for us, until, being at length gathered into Thy celestial kingdom, we shall enjoy that eternal life, which Thine only-begotten Son has obtained for us by His own blood. Amen."]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

1. Ver. 1. If we say, Remember, O LORD, consider and behold, this supposes that the Lord can, in some way, forget something or not see it. But in fact He is omniscient and omnipresent. If then He sometimes, in some way, seems not to know or to see something, this is to be regarded as a test (Prüfung) imposed upon us. He would then be awakened, as it were, He would be urged to think of these things and to look upon them. This reserve on the part of God has a twofold design. He would thereby, first of all, bring us to a knowledge of ourselves. For then only will we urge another, who will not hear us, with unceasing importunity, to render us assistance, when we find that we have not in ourselves, even with our utmost exertion, the means of relief. Secondly, God would thereby prove our faith. Compare the parables of the unjust Judge (Luke xviii. 2-8) and of the friend who knocks at midnight (Luke xi. 5-10). On this text, therefore, a sermon might be preached with reference to The wise purposes which God has in view, when He long closes His ears to our prayer. He would by this means, 1. lead us to self-knowledge; 2. try the strength of our faith.

2. Vers. 1-7. These verses would afford a text, in times of severe chastisement by the hand of foreign enemies, for a sermon on the theme, The cry of need of a people severely oppressed by an enemy. 1. This is a cry justified by the facts (vers. 2-6). 2. A penitential cry (ver. 7). 3. A believing cry (ver. 1).

3. Vers. 8-16. On these verses also a sermon could be preached in the days of a great national calamity brought about by the oppression of the public enemy. The thought might be extracted from these verses, that the separate items of suffering correspond with the sins that have been perpetrated (per quod quis peccat, per idem puniatur et ipse, Wisdom of Sol. xi. 16). Theme: The just judgments of God. I. What they consist in. 1. Because we allowed ourselves to be ruled by our sins, now servants rule over us. 2. Because we despised the bread of life, which was freely and generously proffered to us, we must ourselves seek, with great difficulty, to get our daily bread. 3. Because we hungered not after righteousness, we must now suffer great pain from bodily hunger. 4. Because we crucified not our lust and passions, our wives and daughters are become the victims of the lusts of others. 5. Because we honored not our old men and rulers, our Princes and Elders are now ill-treated by foreigners. 6. Because the youths and boys would not bear the easy yoke of the Lord, they must now bear the heavy yoke of our enemies. 7. Because old and young had been too much addicted to worldly pleasure, they must now relinquish all joy, even that which in itself is innocent and allowable (vers. 14, 15). 8. Because we have not striven after the crown of life, the crown of earthly honor is dashed from our head. II. Whereto they should excite us. 1. To genuine lamentation over our sins. 2. To believing invocation of Divine grace and mercy.

4. Vers. 15, 16. FÖRSTER remarks, "These verses afford material for an address to be delivered in a time of public mourning, or at the funeral of a prince or any man of illustrious merit in the commonwealth, either ecclesiastical or civil."

5. Vers. 17-22. In times of great internal or external distress of the church, these words would afford a text for a sermon, and the theme thence deduced is, The complaint and consolation of the Church. I. The complaint. 1. The cause of it (ver. 18). 2. The expression of it (ver. 17). II. The consolation. 1. The power of the Lord of the Church is not shaken. 2. He has not rejected His Church forever, but will re-establish it, (a) inwardly, (b) externally.

6. Vers. 21, 22, and iii. 21-26, preached upon by CUNO MAURICE ZIMMERMANN, when pastor in Döbeln; How God the Lord renews His Church. 1. Behold with adoration and thanksgiving how He did it in the days of Luther. 2. Behold with rapture and obedience, how He does it in our day. In "My last six official sermons in Döbeln, in the year 1863." Leipzig, Teubner, 1864.

TWO NEW VOLUMES OF Lange's Commentary.

Messrs. CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co.

HAVE THE GRATIFICATION OF ANNOUNCING FOR IMMEDIATE PUBLICATION, THE LONG ANTICIPATED COMMENTARY UPON

THE GOSPEL OF JOHN,

TRANSLATED AND EDITED BY

Rev. PHILIP SCHAFF, D.D., assisted by E. R. CRAVEN, D.D., and the late E. D. YEOMANS, D.D.

One Vol. 8vo., 650 pages, cloth, $5.00.

This volume will universally be regarded as the Commentary of Commentaries upon the "Gospel of Gospels." It gathers up the results of the latest research, and is, besides, enriched with the fruits of the original labors of some of the first living Biblical Scholars. Completing the Gospels, it worthily finishes an important section of what is universally regarded as the most important Biblical enterprise of the age.

ANOTHER GREAT HISTORICAL WORK.

The History of Greece,

By Prof. Dr. ERNST CURTIUS.

TRANSLATED BY ADOLPHUS WILLIAM WARD, M.A., FELLOW OF ST. PETER'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, PROFESSOR OF HISTORY IN OWEN'S COLLEGE, MANCHESTER.

To be completed in five volumes crown 8vo., at $2.50 per volume.

PRINTED UPON TINTED PAPER, UNIFORM WITH MOMMSEN'S HISTORY OF ROME AND THE LIBRARY EDITION OF FROUDE'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

Volume I. Now Ready.

Curtius's History of Greece is similar in plan and purpose to Mommsen's History of Rome, with which it deserves to rank in every respect as one of the great masterpieces of historical literature. Avoiding the minute details which overburden other similar works, it groups together in a very picturesque manner all the important events in the history of this kingdom, which has exercised such a wonderful influence upon the world's civilization. The narrative of Prof. Curtius's work is flowing and animated, and the generalizations, although bold, are philosophical and sound.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

"Professor Curtius's eminent scholarship is a sufficient guarantee for the trustworthiness of his history, while the skill with which he groups his facts and his effective mode of narrating them, combine to render it no less readable than sound. Professor Curtius everywhere maintains the true dignity and impartiality of history, and it is evident his sympathies are on the side of justice, humanity, and progress."—Athenæum.

"We cannot express our opinion of Dr. Curtius's book better than by saying that it may be fitly ranked with Theodor Mommsen's great work."—Spectator.

Now Ready.

THE THIRD AND CONCLUDING VOLUME OF Chips from a German Workshop.

VOL. III.—ESSAYS ON LITERATURE, BIOGRAPHY, AND ANTIQUITIES.

By F. MAX MÜLLER, M.A., &c.,

FOREIGN MEMBER OF THE FRENCH INSTITUTE.

Uniform with Volumes I. and II., and with Lectures on the Science of Language. Price of "Chips from a German Workshop," per volume, in cloth, $2.50.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

"The sixteen papers now put forward by this accomplished scholar, under the modest title of Chips, are as various as they are instructive and entertaining."—Notes and Queries (London).

"A more delightful volume has not been published for a very long time. Bearing marks on almost every page of the profoundest scholarship, it is full of thought, fresh, vigorous, and elevating; and all the more instructive that it is not the thought either of a purely German or purely English thinker, but of one who unites in himself, in a very unusual degree, the best mental qualities and tendencies of both nations."—Globe (London).

"Mr. Max Müller shows in this volume, as in many of his former works, that he can treat the abstrusest topics in such a style as to attract the general reader. The contrast presented in the first essay between the Emperor, the Pope, and Luther, is one of the grandest passages in the whole book, significant of the spirit in which the author looks back upon the events of his country's history and of the power with which he can reproduce them."—Athenæum (London).

"Mr. Müller always writes gracefully and effectively, and the thoughts to which he gives utterance are generally profound and pertinent to whatever subject he has in hand. Even the reader who differs from him cannot but enjoy what he reads and profit by it."—Examiner (London).

The Bible Commentary

A PLAIN EXPLANATORY EXPOSITION OF THE HOLY SCRIPTURES
FOR EVERY BIBLE READER.

To be published at regular intervals in royal octavo volumes at the uniform price of $5.00 per volume.

THE HOLY BIBLE,

According to the Authorized Version, A. D. 1611.

WITH EXPLANATORY AND CRITICAL NOTES AND A REVISION OF THE TRANSLATION

BY BISHOPS AND CLERGYMEN OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND.

The BIBLE COMMENTARY, the publication of which will shortly be commenced, by CHARLES SCRIBNER & CO. simultaneously with its appearance in England, had its origin in the widely felt want of a plain explanatory Commentary on the Holy Scriptures, which should be at once more comprehensive and compact than any now published. Projected in 1863, the selection of the scholars to be employed upon it was entrusted to a Committee named by the Speaker of the British House of Commons and the Archbishop of York (for the names of this Committee and list of contributors see another page), and through the agency of this Committee, there has been concentrated upon this great work, a combination of force such as has not been enlisted in any similar undertaking in England, since the translation of King James's version of the Bible. Of the THIRTY-SIX DIFFERENT DIVINES who are engaged upon the work, nearly all are widely known in this country as well as in England, for their valuable and extensive contributions to the Literature of the Bible, and in this Commentary they condense their varied learning and their most matured judgments.

The great object of the BIBLE COMMENTARY is to put every general reader and student in full possession of whatever information may be necessary to enable him to understand the Holy Scriptures; to give him, as far as possible, the same advantages as the Scholar, and to supply him with satisfactory answers to objections resting upon misrepresentations or misinterpretations of the text. To secure this end most effectually, the Comment is chiefly explanatory, presenting in a concise and readable form the results of learned investigations carried on during the last half century. When fuller discussions of difficult passages or important subjects are necessary, they are placed at the end of the chapter or volume.

The text is reprinted without alteration, from the Authorized Version of 1611 with marginal references and renderings; but the notes forming this Commentary, will embody amended translations of passages proved to be incorrect in that Version.

The work will be divided into EIGHT SECTIONS which it is expected will be comprised in as many volumes, and each volume will be a royal octavo. Typographically special pains has been taken to adapt the work to the use of older readers and students.

N. B. The American edition of the Bible Commentary, will be printed from stereotype plates, duplicated from those upon which the English edition is printed, and will be fully equal to that in every respect.

THE FIRST VOLUME OF

The Bible Commentary

It is expected, will be published during the month of April, simultaneously with its appearance in England. It will contain:

THE PENTATEUCH,

The books of which will be divided as follows, among the contributors named:

GENESIS.....	{	Rt. Rev. E. HAROLD BROWNE, Bishop of Ely, and author of Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles .
EXODUS.....		Chap. I-XIX. THE EDITOR.
“.....		Chap. XX. to the End, and
LEVITICUS.....		Rev. SAMUEL CLARK, M. A.
NUMBERS AND DEUTERONOMY. {		Rev. T. E. ESPIN, B.D., Warden of Queen's Col- lege, Birmingham.

Making one vol. royal 8vo, of nearly 1000 pages, being the only complete Commentary upon the Pentateuch, in one volume, in the English language. Price in cloth, $5.00, less than one-half that of the English edition.

PROF. PORTER'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. THE HUMAN INTELLECT;

With an Introduction upon Psychology and the Human Soul. By NOAH PORTER, D.D., Clark Professor of Moral Philosophy and Metaphysics in Yale College.

One Volume 8vo. Nearly 700 Pages, - - - - $5.00

This is by far the most thorough and comprehensive work upon Mental Science ever published in this country. It is pronounced and positive against the materialistic tendencies of the cerebral and physiological schools of MILL and BAIN, and aims to guide the more advanced students to a clear understanding and a just estimate of the questions which have perpetually reappeared in the history of Philosophy. The typographical arrangement of the volume—the more important principles of facts being in larger print—adapts it for use as a text-book, while its fulness of statement makes it invaluable to all interested in Mental Science.

CRITICAL NOTICES.

From the North American Review.

"This copious, well-digested treatise will challenge the attention of students of philosophy on both sides of the ocean. Whatever dissent special portions of the work may awaken, discerning readers will appreciate the acute and vigorous tone of the discussions, the familiarity with the course of speculation that is everywhere manifest, and the obvious anxiety of the author to treat in a fair and manly spirit the theories and arguments which he seeks to controvert. As a preparatory discipline for the student of theology, law, or physical science, a treatise like the present is invaluable."

From the Princeton Review.

"After a careful examination of this truly great work, we are ready to pronounce it the most complete and exhaustive exhibition of the cognitive faculties of the human soul to be found in our language, and, so far as we know, in any language. More extended and elaborate discussions on some single faculties, or questions emerging from them, may perhaps be found, though even these are few and far between. * * * Its contents fully equal those of a collected volume of LEIBNIZ, and another (somewhat abridged) of LOCKE's works, and, we think, of more than half the seven volumes of DUGALD STEWART's works now before us. * * * In short, the work is a monument of the author's insight, industry, learning, and judgment; one of the great productions of our time; an honor to our country, and a fresh proof that genuine philosophy has not died out among us, and that those are not wanting who see that false philosophy must be counteracted by that which is true."

From the New Englander.

"We lay down the volume with a sentiment of respect and admiration for Professor PORTER's earnest zeal, and his wide attainments, which we have seldom felt toward an American author. In comprehensiveness of plan and in elaborate faithfulness of execution, the work is far before any other in our language. For such a labor of years and such an example of enthusiasm in the pursuit of abstract truth, the author's countrymen may well be proud of him. We suspect that their grateful appreciation of an aim so high and well sustained will rank him, perhaps, foremost among our American scholars, in the loftiest and most difficult walks of investigation."

Prof. H. B. Smith, in the American Presbyterian Review.

"It is a long time since we have had such a solid volume of philosophy from an American author, or one so able it is abreast of the sharp discussions of the day, and on some points takes the lead in our country."

Pres. McCosh, of Princeton College, in the Independent.

"The author treats his subject carefully and lovingly. It is evidently his life-work, on which he has spent years of pleasant and profitable labor. We are able to say, unhesitatingly and conscientiously, that it is worthy of the pains which have been bestowed upon it. It reflects the highest credit on the teacher who has constructed it, and on the famous college of which he is an ornament."

From the Bibliotheca Sacra.

"This is the most important contribution to Mental Science which has been produced in our country for many years. It is the result of a life-long study, and reflects honor not only on its author, but also on our national character. It is a thorough and exhaustive treatise, and deserves the studious attention of our clergymen, as well as professional scholars."

From the Methodist Quarterly Review.

"The publication of this work is a marked event in the history of Mental Science, not only in our country but in the English language. It is not only a standard, but in its fulness, symmetry, and completeness, it is a standard without a competitor. Let every student who would master the mysteries of Intellectual Science master the contents of this work."

From the New York Tribune.

"Prof. PORTER's manner is worthy of all praise. He is equally free from dogmatism and flippancy. His tone is calm, discriminating, judicial. If he still clings to the traditions of early education, he is none the less a sincere searcher after truth."

From the New York Evening Post.

"It is a wonderful work, embodying an amount of labor frightful to imagine—a sustained mental effort, of which, considering merely its duration and intensity, few minds in the country are capable, not to mention its superior vigor and comprehensiveness. It is a fascinating book, too, for every mind that has any taste for this class of studies."

From the New York Observer.

"It constitutes one of the most important contributions to metaphysical literature that has been made in our day. We welcome it, not only as a production of American genius, but as a standard book of reference, as well as a text-book for students in our colleges and seminaries."

From the Boston Watchman and Reflector.

"The work is a most important contribution to the literature of its kind. Indeed, for clearness and profundity of discussion, exactness of statement, aptness of illustration, and mingled beauty and strength of style, we know not where to find its equal among the great standard works upon Mental Philosophy."
