"... Two hundred sixty-five parishioners came together to fulfill the mission statement of the event, which was 'to raise money for the needy of the community and to build community within the parish,'" said Lauterbach. "Everyone said that Hearts for the Community was St. Paul's (Church) at its best."

Bishop Jugis visits St. Gabriel School

CHARLOTTE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis paid a special visit to St. Gabriel School Jan. 14.

The St. Gabriel Faith Advisory Committee sponsored the bishop's visit, which brought a spirit of celebration to the school in anticipation of Catholic Schools Week.

Gathering in the cafeteria, students and faculty welcomed the bishop with songs and tokens of admiration, including a St. Gabriel School rain jacket, a pottery platter painted by the students, various school logo items, cards made by students and a book written by second-graders.

After the reception, Bishop Jugis toured the school and visited each classroom.

"The coolest thing about it was that he came to our class and let every one of us shake his hand and introduce ourselves. We met him one by one," said fourth-grader Sydney Oakley.

"How often does one get to meet a bishop personally, much less shake his hand and be called by name?" asked Mary Jo Reding, a fourth-grade teacher.

Reding's religion class was working on a Second Commandment project during the bishop's visit. Bishop Jugis joined in the project, which required students to learn the meaning of their names and write it on a "Called by Name" poster in the classroom.

"He was nice and friendly and spiritual. I think he will be a good bishop," said fourth-grader Brian Doyle.

Fourth-grader Laura Rudnicki was most impressed when the bishop learned the meaning of his name — Peter: the rock — and listed it on the classroom's poster.

"When he was about to leave, he blessed us," said fourth-grader Alyssa Theysohn. "I hope he comes again soon."

Catholic school students experience colonial life

GREENSBORO — Students at Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro recently went colonial.

Fourth- and fifth-graders, attired in period costumes, participated in a Colonial Fair Jan. 23, during which the students explored life during colonial times in the United States.

Volunteers from Greensboro's Tannenbaum Historic Park, which highlights life in North Carolina before, during and after the Revolutionary War's Battle of Guilford Courthouse, acted as tour guides on the students' journey into the past.

Harold Gunn, the park's programs coordinator, led the students in games including "Fox and Hound" and "Blind Man's Bluff." Other park volunteers led the students in a colonial-era dance and helped them weave through a "human loom."

Parents worked with the students pounding flower petals on muslin to produce dyed material that was then filled with potpourri. They also made their own "cup and ball" colonial toy, and competed to see who had the best aim.

A highlight of the afternoon was a snack of cornbread, gingersnaps and mulled cider, and students tasted the butter they had made the day before.

Staff saving lives

North Carolina Rep. Martha Alexander to enact legislation HB 1508, "Bioterrorism Preparedness," which reads: "Establish standards and criteria for the education and credentialing of persons trained to administer lifesaving treatment to a person who suffers a severe adverse reaction to agents that might cause anaphylaxis."

Knish is motivated by her five children, all of whom have severe allergies. Although the Knish family is well prepared for emergencies, she realized that many families and staff members would be unprepared for an allergic crisis.

"For example, what if a child with no known allergies stumbled into a yellow jacket nest and develops hives and respiratory distress?" she said. "The MACS program trains staff to become competent and confident in just such a situation."

A New England Journal of Medicine, study said 10 of 13 fatal or near-fatal anaphylactic reactions in children occurred outside of the home.

Knish read an article citing the increase in the number of people who were subject to severe allergic reactions and she recognized the need for a change in the way Catholic schools were equipped to handle incidents of such reactions.

"There are two groups of people," said Knish. "Those who know they have allergies and know the response protocol, and everyone else."

That "everyone else" group is the concern for the medical community. According to The Merck Manual, if a person is not treated for an allergic reaction within a few minutes, they cango into anaphylactic shock, a severe and sometimes fatal reaction to a specific antigen, such as wasp venom or penicillin, after a previous reaction.

MACS First Responders are trained to react to such an emergency in the absence of the school nurse. They learn to recognize the causes and symptoms of allergic reactions and respond accordingly. Responders attend a "refresher class" each year to keep their training current.

The first step in treatment is the administration of epinephrine with an EpiPen, an auto-injector that administers epinephrine, the definitive emergency treatment for severe allergic reactions. Immediate treatment is critical, as children progress very quickly to a life-threatening situation, due to their small airways and small fluid volume.

After administering the EpiPen, responders then enlist other people, if available, to assist them by calling 911, notifying the student's parents and monitoring the child's breathing and pulse.

Once a responder is trained and credentialed by the North Carolina Medical Care Commission to administer epinephrine, they can treat anyone, anywhere, in the absence of qualified medical personnel, said Knish.

Knish said there hasn't been an incidence of an allergic reaction since the protocol was instituted. Still, her goal is to train more people.

The program was developed in consultation with pediatricians, allergists, pulmonologists, emergency room physicians and the North Carolina Department of Emergency Medical Services and the North Carolina Office of Public Health. The program follows guidelines from the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP), and Knish confers with individual physicians at the AAP to ensure that the program conforms to the latest standards of practice.

The MACS protocol is currently being expanded to include training in the use of Automated External Defibrillators at Charlotte Catholic High School.

The program has been nominated for a national award, the Asthma Awareness Day on Capitol Hill, made by the Allergy and Asthma Network Mothers of Asthmatics (AANMA).

Deacons fill vital church roles

process of transition to priesthood. Men who are ordained deacons and remain in that state for the rest of their lives are permanent deacons.

The diaconate flourished during the second and third centuries, but soon began to decline due to the growing tension between the Presbyteria and the diaconate, the various monasteries taking over some of the deacons' charitable responsibilities and other factors.

By the seventh century, deacons in the western church became a transitional step toward priesthood and the role of the deacon became primarily liturgical.

In 1964, the Second Vatican Council decreed that the diaconate could be restored as a permanent and separate rank in the Latin rite and that married men could be ordained to this rank. Pope Paul VI restored the permanent diaconate in 1967.

The ordained deacon's call to service allows him to function as a minister of the Word (in preaching, catechetical instruction, retreat ministry and counseling); to be a visible reminder of the link between liturgy and the church's service to others in Jesus' name; and to serve the parish in those areas in which he is most adept.

A long journey

Men who aspire to be deacons in the Diocese of Charlotte share many things, but perhaps none is more important than patience. In this diocese, candidates for the diaconate go through approximately six-and-a-half years of diaconate training.

"The church is always open to those who feel the Lord has given them a calling to ordained life," said Rev. Mr. Wenning. "The process needs to start with their pastor and discerning the call."

The application process is extensive, involving interviewing, collection of data, credentials and recommendations. After the application process is complete, candidates for the permanent diaconate enter aspirancy, the initial step in the diaconate process.

Elements of aspirancy include understanding and appreciation of the diaconate vocation; prayer and formation in Liturgy of the Hours, the official liturgical prayers sanctifying the part of each day; spiritual direction; introduction to the history, spirituality and ministry of the deacon; and introduction to the pastoral ministries of the diocesan church. For about six months, aspirants prayerfully reflect on their call to the ministry. The academic phase of the training begins soon after for those who are selected to continue.

Minimum requirements for aspirants include being a Catholic for at least five years, "over (age) 35 and under 60," and, Rev. Mr. Wenning added with a laugh, "tolerance for lots of study."

Once ordained, permanent deacons may perform many of the sacramental ministries of the church except consecration of the Eucharist, anointing of the sick and reconciliation.

The permanent deacon is the only ordained man allowed to be married. However, if a deacon's wife passes away, he is not allowed to remarry. If a man is single, he is not allowed to marry after ordination. Of the 13,000 deacons in the United States, more than 85 percent are married and have families.

A liberating ministry

In July 2003, the permanent deacons of the diocese expanded their duties considerably by taking over the prison ministry program full time. Along with parishes throughout the diocese, deacons visit prisons on a regular basis to offer communion services, Bible studies and counseling to the residents of 32 of the 80 prisons located within the diocese's borders.

Each Monday at 6 p.m., a loudspeaker at the North Carolina Department of Correction's minimum-security facility in Waynesville announces that inmates are welcome to attend the Catholic service in a small white building that serves as the facility's chapel.

After Rev. Mr. Gerard LaPointe gives communion to the Catholic inmates, non-Catholics join them in a discussion based on the previous Sunday's Scriptures.

Rev. Mr. LaPointe gets to spend only an hour a week, but that hour is always filled with lively discussion.

"They ask a lot of questions, and they listen very intently," he said.

Rev. Mr. LaPointe started his prison ministry about six months ago. He used to drive Augustinian Father Terry Hyland, formerly the priest in residence at St. Margaret Church, to the prison but would wait outside, because he didn't have permission from prison officials to visit inmates. That started him thinking about getting involved in prison ministry himself.

Rev. Mr. Cilone said the inmates' sincere desire for change is what makes prison ministry so attractive to him. These are "men who, once they are in prison, start leaning towards religion and spirituality. They start reading the Bible," he continued.

Rev. Mr. Cilone said the prison ministry is not designed to convert prisoners to Catholicism, but rather to help them develop their spiritual lives and "let it take them wherever it takes them."

As a permanent deacon, "you have the opportunity to put faith into action in spite of individual failings or infidelities of the past," Rev. Mr. Wenning said. "For you are a reminder of Christ's love, grace and healing to all whom you serve."

Two historical books paint dim pictures

REVIEWED BY PATRICK J. HAYES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Steps from the site of the World Trade Center is New York City's oldest Catholic parish, St. Peter's. The mother church of New York counts three parishioners who have had causes for their canonization made. Among these is Pierre Toussaint ,who was born a slave in Haiti in 1766 and died a free man in New York in 1807. His body now lies under the altar at St. Patrick's Cathedral.

Toussaint is the subject of a new biography by Arthur Jones, an editor-at-large of the National Catholic Reporter. Apart from the formal biographical materials assembled for his cause before the Congregation for Saints' Causes, it is the only book about Toussaint in the last 20 years.

"Pierre Toussaint: A Biography," by Arthur Jones. Doubleday (New York, 2003). 342 pp., $24.95.

"The Habit: A History of the Clothing of Catholic Nuns," by Elizabeth Kuhns. Doubleday (New York, 2003). 228 pp., $23.95.

One would think, then, that this work is to be welcomed, but its muddled style and inclusion of frankly banal stories from Toussaint's life makes the book both a difficult and tiresome read. The first third of the book is a highly speculative account of the Haiti of Toussaint's boyhood and hardly mentions him at all. Jones concentrates more on the family who "owned" the young man than on Toussaint himself. When he does emerge in the narrative, we get superficial details.

Jones may be too enamored of an earlier account of Toussaint, an 1854 memoir by Hannah F.S. Lee, who gushed over his virtues. Two hundred pages into this biography, I wondered if I learned anything about the substance of Toussaint's life.

While this is not a scholarly book, Jones makes some effort at reading over important documentation on Toussaint, principally several hundred surviving letters, though there is no citation or much cogent analysis. The remaining few chapters at last showed glimmers of promise. These focus on Toussaint's New York years, which included tragic familial and personal losses, as well as his own Herculean philanthropic endeavors, such as support for the first order of black nuns in America, the Oblate Sisters of Providence.

Meanwhile, it is sad to report that "The Habit: A History of the Clothing of Catholic Nuns," by Elizabeth Kuhns, is similarly a narrative that limps. She writes that the book is "a journalist's summary of an extremely complicated and far-reaching topic." With the possible exception of the first two chapters, I think the author has taken on more than she can handle.

Contrary to the title, this history rarely talks about their habits or goes into much depth about the meanings and origins of their apparel. In fact, there is so much extraneous clutter — from the story of the Greek chilton (hardly the progenitor of the nun's habit) to early male monastic rules to medieval knights to Cromwell's 17th-century campaign to subdue Catholic Ireland — that when we do find the author discussing the habit it is as if we are suddenly emerging from a fog. Add to this several tendentious historical details or outright inaccuracies, and the volume makes for a strange portrait of a highly variegated way of living the Christian calling.

As with the Jones volume, there are some redemptive qualities to Kuhns' work. First and foremost are 22 pages of photographs depicting the garb of several religious orders of women, including a contemporary snapshot of Franciscan School Sister Clare Korte of the biology department at St. Mary's University in Minnesota. She dons a lab coat. We also get some sense of the habit's symbolic transformation in the years leading up to and following the Second Vatican Council.

I cannot give either of these books unqualified endorsement. So it may be a rather unorthodox suggestion for a reviewer to ask the reader directly to consider taking the money that would have been used to purchase these items and, in the spirit of Pierre Toussaint himself, make a donation to the national Retirement Fund for Religious.

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Starting Ash Wednesday (Feb. 25), liturgical purple will shroud worship spaces around the world as we Christians begin our Lenten journey toward Easter once again. Yes, the major penitential season of the church year awaits us. Lent provides a time to ponder how we have missed the mark in our lives, but perhaps more important, it is a time to focus on the generosity of God's forgiveness and to compare our own attempts to forgive in the light of God's grace.

"Forgiveness," after all, is a common word in the English language. We know what it means — or do we? In Webster's New College Dictionary I went searching for "forgiveness," which means "to cease to feel resentment against an offender or to give up claim to requital for an insult."

In other words, for the dynamic of forgiveness to work, we have to let go of the pain in our hearts and quit carrying rage and anger that continually gnaw at the center of our being.

In the Gospel of Luke, Jesus challenges his disciples and us with his radical teaching of love and forgiveness. The good news, according to Jesus, is we do not have to do this sometimes incredibly difficult task of forgiving alone. God gives us the ultimate example of kindness, mercy and forgiveness in Jesus while at the same time Jesus himself reflects the amazing truths about God that assure us we are never alone in our struggles.

In fact, this God we experience as Father, Son and Holy Spirit — this God who created the universe yet knows each of us intimately — does not hold a grudge and does not want to zap us into oblivion for our sins. Jesus assures us that if we can return good for evil, if we can forgo being overly critical and condemning, if we can stop clinging to the pain of past injustices, if we can place all the baggage of our lives in his hands, we can know the peace of being forgiven and the certainty that God is truly with us.

The Lenten purple unfolds again this week, the sign of a penitential season. "Forgive, and you will be forgiven. Give, and gifts will be given to you, in good measure, packed together, shaken down and overflowing." Jesus, the harbinger of joy, continually reminds us that it's all about grace.

Interest in, controversy over 'Passion' movie continue to grow

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — As Mel Gibson's movie "The Passion of the Christ" nears its Feb. 25 release date, interest in the film grows, as well as the controversy surrounding it.

An unidentified source close to Gibson told The New York Times Feb. 4 that Gibson would pull the line "His blood be on us and on our children" from the final version of the movie. The line from Matthew's Gospel, also known as the "blood libel," has been used for centuries to legitimize violence against Jews.

The line had not been in a version of "The Passion of the Christ" screened in Washington in November, but it was inserted into a version shown Jan. 21 in Winter Park, Fla.

Inclusion of the line made the Jan. 21 screened version "worse than the first" version he had seen last August in Houston, said Rabbi A. James Rudin, senior interreligious adviser for the American Jewish Committee, in a Jan. 30 commentary published by Religion News Service.

Holy Names Sister Mary C. Boys, one of four Catholic scholars who reviewed a draft copy of the film script last year, told a Seattle University audience Feb. 1 that the scholars had never said Gibson or the film was anti-Semitic.

Mel Gibson directs actor Jim Caviezel as Jesus during filming of "The Passion of the Christ."

"We said the film could be used to promote anti-Semitism," Sister Boys said. "That distinction seems to have eluded them (critics of the scholars)."

Gibson has long insisted that neither he nor his movie is anti-Semitic.

In their statement last June, the scholars said, "In this era, when ancient Christian anti-Semitic motives are being circulated widely because of international conflict, any Christian producer of a dramatic presentation of the death of Jesus has a considerable moral responsibility."

Sister Boys said that large numbers of Christians persist in believing in the error that the Jews bear responsibility for Jesus' death despite statements to the contrary from many Christian denominations.

The Catholic Church's Second Vatican Council document on interreligious relations, "Nostra Aetate," declared, "Even though Jewish authorities and those who followed their lead pressed for the death of Christ, neither all Jews indiscriminately at that time, nor Jews today, can be charged with the crimes committed during his passion."

At the same time, she added, Jewish people lack an understanding of how deeply intertwined the stories of the Passion are in Christian identity.

"Jews and Christians talk past each other on a topic that has been a source of bitter division for centuries, led to violence against Jews and compromised the integrity of Christian proclamation of the Gospel," Sister Boys said.

Archbishop William J. Levada of San Francisco, in a column in the Jan. 30 issue of Catholic San Francisco, the archdiocesan newspaper, said that when he was the invited guest speaker at the local Anti-Defamation League's monthly luncheon "my Jewish dialogue partners expressed emotions of nervousness about any escalation of anti-Semitism as a result of this movie. They further placed before me a challenge: 'Archbishop, what are you going to do about this?'"

He said, "We ought to work together to ease the tensions that many feel over the prospect of 'The Passion.' We ought to do what we can to make sure that this movie does not contribute to anti-Semitic feelings, much less anti-Semitic actions."

Noting he had only seen a preview trailer for the film, Archbishop Levada said, "When I go to see it (the film), I hope it will be a spiritual experience. At the same time, I will try to see it through the eyes of my Jewish brothers and sisters as well. I hope that if they go to see the movie, they may try to see it through Christian eyes as well.

"And I hope that they will know that there are Christians committed to stand in solidarity with them against any resurgence of anti-Semitism in our own country or abroad."

Despite uncertainties over the movie's content and interpretation, many have rushed to embrace it.

The number of advance group tickets being ordered is said to be the biggest in the relatively short history of advance purchase of movie tickets. The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, a supporter of Gibson and the movie, bought 1,200 tickets at $9.75 each and sold all of them at $5 each to its members.

Two members of a Texas Baptist church bought out an entire 20-screen movie theater to permit 6,000 people to see the movie after it opens.

Charles Robert Carner, a Catholic who directed the made-for-TV movie "Judas," which airs March 9 on ABC, told Catholic News Service he had been to a screening and called it "the best 'life of Christ' movie I've seen."

Archbishop Sean P. O'Malley addresses a rally of 3,000 people to defend traditional marriage Feb. 8 outside the Massachusetts Statehouse in Boston.

'Troubling' marriage ruling

He noted legislators "must reclaim their appropriate place in debating and enacting laws that address so fundamental a societal building block" as marriage, which "has been, is and always will be a union between a man and a woman."

The Boston archbishop urged Catholics and all those who value the "traditional, positive and forthright understanding of marriage" to take action against the ruling by contacting their state senators and representatives to point out their concern and urge them to support an amendment to the state constitution defining marriage as an institution for a man and woman only.

The ruling, which takes effect this May, notes a bill that would sanction civil unions, such as the one Vermont now has, "maintains an unconstitutional, inferior and discriminatory status for same-sex couples."

In 2000, a Vermont law established same-sex civil unions as the legal equivalent of marriage after the Vermont Supreme Court ruled it was a violation of the state constitution to deny same-sex couples the benefits that married couples have.

Opponents of the Massachusetts ruling have started lobbying for the Marriage Affirmation and Protection Amendment, but even if this amendment is approved by the Legislature it won't appear on the ballot until 2006.

An initial vote by lawmakers on a marriage amendment was scheduled for Feb. 11. In Massachusetts, the amendment approval process requires two consecutive votes by lawmakers to approve it before it would be placed on the ballot to be voted on by residents.

Under the expanded ruling, the state will be required to issue marriage licenses to qualified same-sex couples beginning May 16.

Bishop Paul S. Loverde of Arlington, Va., said in a Feb. 5 statement that he supports a bill currently before the U.S. House of Representatives that calls for a constitutional amendment defining marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

"I have supported that effort since its birth and I call on fellow Catholics and persons of good will to speak to their legislators, make their voices known on this critical debate, and defend the sanctity and dignity of marriage lest it be redefined by court rulings."

Among other opponents of the Massachusetts court ruling was Jay Sekulow, chief counsel for the American Center for Law and Justice, who called the decision "disappointing but not surprising."

Sekulow said the ramifications will "have reverberations throughout the country" and will not only put the issue of same-sex marriage "back on the radar screen of the American public" but will also be "certain to create additional constitutional questions about marriage — questions that will ultimately end up at the U.S. Supreme Court."

Such shock and surprise

Super Bowl debacle stems from society

Guest Column

FATHER CHRISTOPHER ROUX
GUEST COLUMNIST

I am not sure why so many people have expressed shock, surprise and disbelief at the display of the "performers" during the halftime show of the recent Super Bowl. Put into the much larger context of today's society, this display is nothing that should have elicited scandal.

Our society is one in which the human body and the gift of our sexuality is demeaned and mocked in almost every form of entertainment. Be it movies, radio or television, sexual display and innuendo are the normal routines. The constant degrading of women by men and even by women themselves has taken on phenomenal proportions. Men also allow themselves to be similarly degraded.

Ours is a society that has taken the beautiful act of sexual self-giving rightly reserved to married spouses and degraded it to an opportunity to use another person as an instrument for the satisfaction of one's desires.

Pope Paul VI predicted just this situation in his 1968 encyclical, "Humanae Vitae":

"Responsible men can become more deeply convinced of the truth of the doctrine laid down by the Church on this issue if they reflect on the consequences of methods and plans for artificial birth control.

"Let them first consider how easily this course of action could open wide the way for marital infidelity and a general lowering of moral standards. Not much experience is needed to be fully aware of human weakness and to understand that human beings — and especially the young, who are so exposed to temptation — need incentives to keep the moral law, and it is an evil thing to make it easy for them to break that law.

"Another effect that gives cause for alarm is that a man who grows accustomed to the use of contraceptive methods may forget the reverence due to a woman, and, disregarding her physical and emotional equilibrium, reduce her to being a mere instrument for the satisfaction of his own desires, no longer considering her as his partner whom he should surround with care and affection." (n.17)

Pope Paul VI predicted the use of contraceptives would result in the "general lowering of moral standards" as women become objectified through the contraceptive mentality. Treated as an object, they would lose the dignity and beauty they possess by virtue of being made by God in His image and likeness.

The "general lowering of moral standards" has also resulted in men being treated as objects. Thus, our society is dealing with widespread sexual abuse. In addition, since the contraceptive mentality places the emphasis on sexual fulfillment and excludes the openness to children, we now have as a result an average of 4,000 unborn children being destroyed daily through abortion.

In the words of the U.S. Supreme Court: "(Couples) for two decades of economic and social developments, have organized intimate relationships and made choices that define their views of themselves and their places in society, in reliance on the availability of abortion in the event that contraception should fail." (Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania et al v. Casey, Governor of Pennsylvania, et al)

The teaching of "Humanae Vitae" is definitive and unchangeable: any action which either before, at the moment of, or after the conjugal act, is specifically intended to prevent procreation, is intrinsically evil (n. 14). The use of contraceptives for the specific intent of preventing procreation is morally indefensible by anyone at anytime, and is very much at the heart of the continual downward spiral of morality in our country.

When I hear of the outrage so many had at the disgusting displays during the Super Bowl, I must ask: Are the parents allowing their children to listen to the music performed by these "artists"? Are the children watching the music video channels that promote the "artists"? Are the parents assisting their children in choosing clothing that is modest? Are the parents teaching their children the truths of the Catholic faith?

There are over 61.5 million Catholics in the United States, which is about 28 percent of the total population. What would happen if every Catholic knew and followed the faith as taught by Christ through his Church?

I suggest a major transformation of our society. The time has come to call on all Catholics to learn and practice their faith with the fervor of the earliest Christians. In the face of the opposition of the world, this may seem like a daunting task, but in the words of St. John Bosco: "The power of evil exists and lives on the cowardice of the timid and the good."

Let us courageously hold fast to the teachings of Jesus Christ and allow him to work through us in the reclaiming of our society.

Pope says faith shown by sick, suffering is precious gift

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY — The example of Catholics who, despite sickness and suffering, continue to express faith in the saving power of Christ is a precious gift for the church, Pope John Paul II said.

Marking the Feb. 11 celebration of the World Day of the Sick, the pope said: "Human existence is always a gift of God, even when it is marked by physical suffering of any kind. It is a gift which the church and the world must value."

The Catholic Church's main celebration of the day was being held at the Shrine of Our Lady of Lourdes in France, which was connected by satellite with Pope John Paul for his weekly general audience from the Vatican.

In his audience talk, Pope John Paul said that from a human point of view "suffering and sickness can appear to be absurd realities."

But, he said, when suffering is seen in the light of the Gospel, "one is able to gather its deep salvific meaning."

The Gospel message is that Christ suffers for and with all people, taking their pain and making it part of the path to salvation and new life, the pope said.

"Those who suffer must never be left alone," the pope said, and he thanked family members, medical professionals and chaplains who dedicate their lives to caring for the sick.

"It is a great act of love to take care of one who suffers," he said.

The pope prayed that Our Lady of Lourdes would watch over all who are sick, who are old or who are left alone.

"Soothe their suffering, dry their tears and obtain for each one of them the strength needed to accomplish God's will," the pope prayed.

Write love in the ashes

Guest Column

FATHER JOHN AURILIA, OFM Cap

While reflecting on the beautiful and challenging readings of Ash Wednesday, there is a verse not in those readings yet keeps coming to mind: "I have come to bring fire to the earth." (Lk.12:49) Why is this verse popping up on Ash Wednesday, when penance, repentance and fasting should be priorities? I don't know. I have learned not to discard thoughts that become stronger as soon as I try to get rid of them.

"I have come to bring fire to the earth, and how I wish it were blazing already." St. Luke reminds us that we are commissioned to carry the torch. Each one of us is duty-bound to make the love of God burn brightly in the world. I like what our schoolchildren often sing: "This little light of mine, I'm gonna let it shine!" Have you tried to imprison light or to make it disappear? Probably you did not succeed.

The marching order of every believer is to make the light shine and if your Ash Wednesday 2004 does not measure up with all the rules and regulations, as long as you let your light shine, you have accomplished your task.

Jesus did not recruit the apostles, disciples and us for his "secret service." He, instead, goes on with some startling statements that may shake our weak faith: "Do you suppose that I am here to bring peace on earth? No, I tell you, but rather division ... the father divided against the son, son against father, mother against daughter, daughter against mother, mother-in-law against daughter-in-law, daughter-in-law against mother-in-law." (Lk.12:51-53).

I will say it is not difficult at all to bring division between the in-laws; the opposite is true! The statement of Jesus is perplexing to many Christians, therefore we simply gloss over. Does Jesus want to break up families? The answer is a resounding "no."

When Jesus speaks about divisions among family, he tells us in a powerful way to keep our priorities in order. God should be the first priority, even if we may shake our relationship with our loved ones.

Another idea of peace is acceptance of the status quo, unwillingness to change and enjoyment of a false security in money, career and pleasure. Jesus is not going to bring this kind of peace! So let's welcome war, which shakes our security and makes us aware that we are ashes powerful enough to ignite fire on earth by our way of living and loving.

A revolutionary way of living and loving can be the following: "Mend a quarrel, search out a forgotten friend, dismiss suspicion and replace it with trust, write a love letter, keep a promise, forego a grudge, forgive an enemy, apologize if you were wrong, express your gratitude."

Write love on the ashes and you will be surprised not only by the experience of light, but the experience of a powerhouse called love. Let us not forget love is freely given and freely received. Jesus was so trustworthy of you and me to the point of not forcing love on us, but inviting us to love, knowing that we would accept the invitation.

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

I love the New York City tabloids. They're a colorful mix of news and entertainment. Maybe you shouldn't take everything they print too seriously, but they are hard to put down. I particularly enjoy the "Letters to the Editor." Here's where you find the unvarnished opinions of the man and woman in the street. A recent spate of letters recently caught my attention.

Bam is the city in Iran devastated by a horrific earthquake at the end of December. Iranian officials and international aid groups estimate 30,000-50,000 men, women and children perished. In the aftermath of this incredible loss of life, the United States did something it does very often. We put aside long-standing political differences with the government of Iran and jumped into the situation with millions of dollars of humanitarian assistance. Some of the first planeloads of help to arrive were from the United States of America.

To read many of the letters to the editor in those papers I mentioned, you'd think we'd committed a crime. After all, the letter writers say, these people are our sworn enemies. After seizing our embassy in 1979, they held dozens of American hostages for over a year. Today's Iranian government still shows few signs of relenting in its call for the destruction of the United States — called "the great Satan" by the Ayatollah Khomeini, their leader at the time of the hostage crisis. So, the letter writers ask, what are we doing helping a nation bent on our undoing?

Their frustration is neither hard to understand nor anything new. For all of our history, Americans have played to win. And that includes our dealings with other nations, even when it means war. But we also have an unusual habit of working to heal the wounds of conflict once it's over.

I mentioned this to my father when he was leaving for a business trip to Japan in the 1980s. How, I wondered, does he deal with folks he fought so vigorously back in the 1940s during World War II? His response is something I've heard echoed by many veterans. "Well, Jim, it's one of life's great truths that some of our best friends come from those who were once our enemies."

While that may be true, I think it takes a great people to make the first move toward reconciliation. That is, I'd suggest, being our very best selves.

So the same people who defeated Japan and Germany helped those nations rebuild economically and politically. This spirit is carrying us forward in our dealings with the people of Vietnam. And that reconciliation was, in some ways, the toughest of all. It's one thing to extend the hand of friendship to those we've defeated. It's quite another to swallow our national pride and re-establish relations with those who brought us to our most significant military failure.

But in victory and defeat, we have done what the world finds amazing. Have we done this in part for our own economic and political welfare? Of course. But we have also done it to acknowledge that we know we are truly part of the same human family.

That's what's happening now in Iran. We still have differences with the government of Iran. And since Iran is a theocracy, a government built around a particular religious perspective, our pluralism is, no doubt, hard for them to fathom. But thousands upon thousands of their people are homeless and badly hurt, and when people suffer, there is only need — and the willingness of those who can respond to do so.

So I must disagree with those letter-writers. I think that we as Americans can be proud when we care — not only for friends, but even more significantly, when we reach out help to those who aren't. Whether as a nation, or as individuals, when we love those who don't necessarily love us back, we show our very best selves.

How the laity give support to priests

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

A layman asked me how the laity can help priests.

"Keep your faith," would be my first response. Studies on the priesthood report one of the greatest sources of strength for priests is the laity's faith.

It may come from a dying layperson at peace with God; a family that was hit hard but doesn't despair; or an elderly person who is selfless.

No two things inspire priests more than celebrating Mass and seeing Christ lived in the daily lives of laity they serve.

The next thing is Mother Teresa's admonition: "Do not wait for leaders, do it alone and person to person."

As a young priest, I experienced the work of the Catholic Family Movement, The Catholic Worker Movement, the Knights of Columbus -- just a few Catholic organizations in which the laity took the lead in drawing people closer to Christ and the church.

Today's church is confronted with a new breed of challenges calling for a new class of lay leaders. In the worlds of medicine and biological experimentation, it is they who must deal with the ethics and morality of their work. It is they who ultimately must enforce moral standards in ecology, government, the workplace and globalization.

The church more than ever needs lay thinkers, doers and movers such as Jacques Maritain, Cesar Chavez, Maisie Ward, Dorothy Day and Mothers Seton, Teresa and Drexel (although sisters are in religious communities, canonically they belong to the laity) whose leadership qualities were stellar. Often they worked side by side with bishops and priests. Sometimes they nudged and hounded them. But as any priest who understands history knows, such people gave life to the priesthood by giving concrete meaning to the church in action.

Another way the laity can help priests is to be professional -- avoiding pettiness, jumping to conclusions, letting resentments rule, losing respect and failing to strive for excellence.

Priests, like laypersons, are human and don't always act in an adult manner. The more that laity maintain professionalism and adhere to the principles of civility, the better they help priests.

Last, and most important, I hope the laity never cease praying for priests. Prayer turns us toward God and brings the best out of us. When lay people enter into this state of mind and heart, they will find ways never before imagined to help priests.

The veneration of relics

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. What are relics? How are they obtained? And who determines what is done with them?

At times, even after they are buried, parts of the bodies of saints are sent to other locations to be kept or honored. In the past few years an apparent relic (leg bone, it was said) of St. Therese of Lisieux traveled to several cities in the United States, including a city near my home.

Surely bodies are not made to be in separate parts. Can you enlighten us? (Iowa)

A. The veneration of relics is one of those areas of Christian belief and practice which in themselves can be solidly founded theologically and spiritually. Experience proves, however, that this devotion has an almost built-in temptation for misunderstanding and abuse.

Veneration of the bodies of martyrs and other saints goes back to the beginning of Christianity. Sometimes the blood of martyrs was collected on a cloth to be kept by the community as a reminder of that person's fidelity and courage in professing faith in Christ.

By the 800s and 900s, problems began to surface. Possession of relics of certain saints became a source of prestige for monasteries and churches. When St. Thomas Aquinas died in 1274, for example, in the Cistercian monastery of Fossa Nuova, it is reported that the monks there decapitated his body to be sure of keeping his remains away from the Dominican friars, of which Thomas was a member.

The tug of war between Cistercians and Dominicans for his body continued for decades after his death.

Buying and selling, even stealing, bodies or parts of bodies of saints was common. Transferring relics gradually turned into an international business. To this day, Catholic law explicitly forbids "alienation" or permanent transfer of major relics from one place to another without the pope's permission (Canon 1190).

It is not surprising then that this bizarre dealing with bodies of saints should be reflected in popular piety of the Middle Ages and beyond. Veneration of relics gave rise to all manner of feasts, shrines and pilgrimages.

Possession of relics even became a sign of affluence and power. In 1393, at a royal feast, French King Charles VI distributed to guests ribs of his venerated ancestor St. Louis.

Some opposition to these practices was always heard, but even popes eventually became nearly powerless to do anything about them. Mishandling of relics, and their sale, eventually became one of the abuses in the church attacked by leaders of the Protestant Reformation.

In 1563 the Council of Trent offered three reasons for venerating the bodies of the saints. They were, and are, members of the body of Christ; they were temples of the Holy Spirit; and they are destined to be raised and glorified by the Spirit (Session XXV).

These motives are still valid, but experience understandably causes the church to be careful lest this less central aspect of Catholic devotion again grow out of proportion.

Apart from the canon mentioned above and conditions for placing relics in altars, veneration of relics is not even mentioned in the present Code of Canon Law. This may be due as much to the decline in enthusiasm for this sort of devotion as to any other reason.

Current norms for indulgences do not include any prayers or actions relating to relics of the saints. Honoring such relics can be a way of praising the goodness of God and seeking our own growth in holiness. It is necessary, and not always easy, to preserve that focus.

St. Margaret Church in Maggie Valley was dedicated in August 1969 on land purchased by Father Michael Murphy.

MAGGIE VALLEY — "It took me six years to build the church — three years to clear the land and three years to build the church."

With those words by the late Father Michael Murphy, founder of St. Margaret Church, comes a history filled with an evangelical fervor that built up the Catholic Church in western North Carolina.

Murphy, not yet a priest in 1950, arrived in North Carolina from Detroit in September of that year. Right away, he turned his attention to helping build churches in the mountain region of the state. He traveled to the town bearing his surname, where Father Lawrence Newman was trying to build a church with financial help from Murphy families throughout the country.

After visiting there, Murphy went on to Sylva and assisted in building St. Mary Church in memory of his late parents. The church was dedicated in August 1955.

Soon thereafter, he also aided in constructing the Newman Center for Catholic students at Western Carolina University in Cullowhee.

The lay missionary later bought 33 acres of land in Maggie Valley. A two-story building was converted for use as a chapel, where a Waynesville pastor celebrated Mass during tourist season. Murphy furnished the chapel with statues that had belonged to his mother.

The owner of a local restaurant suggested that Murphy purchase another property for sale in the area, owned by a retired Methodist minister. Murphy built a 25-unit motel on the site, naming it Falling Waters.

Later, Bishop Vincent Waters of Raleigh gave him permission to build a church on the land, and in August 1969, the new St. Margaret Church was dedicated.

Bishop Waters urged the zealous Murphy to ponder becoming a priest. After prayerful discernment, Murphy studied at St. Meinrad Seminary in Indiana and in May 1972, he was ordained into the priesthood by then-Bishop Michael J. Begley of Charlotte. Father Murphy was 80 years old at the time of his ordination.

After serving for a year at a North Carolina coastal parish, Murphy returned to the church he had built in Maggie Valley. As pastor of St. Margaret Church, he built a house that later would serve as a convent and a retreat house. In February 1977, the retreat building burned to ruins, but the flame of evangelization that burned in Father Murphy's heart raged on.

Father Murphy continued to own and operate Falling Waters Motel. Under Bishop Begley's direction, the motel was renovated for use as the Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center, and today remains a popular retreat spot year-round. In 1981, the pastor also donated a building on the land to the diocese for use as a parish hall.

Father Murphy's presence remained a constant in the parish community until the priest's death at the age of 99 in 1990. A parish hall, built and dedicated in the early 1990s, was named Murphy-Garland Parish Hall in honor of the priest who gave so much to the community.

Franciscan Sister Jane Schmenk, a friend of Father Murphy who operated Living Waters for over 20 years since the 1970s, wrote the biography of the priest. Entitled "Murphy: Apostle of the Smokies," the book is for sale at Living Waters.

The next resident pastor at St. Margaret Church, Father William Evans, continued the apostolic outreach to western North Carolina Catholics that Michael Murphy — as a layperson and priest — had begun.

That devoted enthusiasm still thrives in Maggie Valley, due to the succeeding priests at St. Margaret Church. In August 1996, Father Eric Houseknecht arrived as pastor and led a renovation crusade, yielding improvements to the church building, inner sanctuary, grounds, parish center, officers, rectory and elsewhere. Parishioners made the project a family undertaking, offering voluntary labor and donating a variety of items to their spiritual home.

In early April 1997, parishioners and visitors gathered for an open house to celebrate the enhancements.

By 1997, ministerial work at the parish existed for all ages; the youth group, for instance, began regularly serving their neighbors at a local soup kitchen. The parish also helps women and children who are victims of domestic violence at local shelters. Other ministries include faith formation, ministry to the sick, women's guild and the Father William M. Murphy Council of the Knights of Columbus, who donated $2,600 worth of emergency equipment to the parish in 2004.

In September 1998, Order of St. Augustine priests came to serve St. Margaret Church, including Augustinian Father Francis J. Doyle, who is the current pastor, and Augustinian Brother William C. Harkin, who is the current pastoral associate.

On June 8, 2003, Father Doyle blessed the recently installed cross near the church's columbarium, in use since August 20002. The cross was part of a bequest from the late Martha Knoesel, a seasonal parishioner.

With 175 registered households plus an additional 70 seasonal families and the retreatants at Living Waters St. Margaret Church stands in memory of Father Murphy's dedication to the Catholic Church while also testifying to the vitality of the faith in western North Carolina.

Youth garden receives national award

CHARLOTTE — St. Patrick School was selected from more than 500 youth gardening programs nationwide to receive a 2004 Youth Garden Grant from the National Gardening Association.

In recognition of this achievement, the school's youth gardening program will receive an assortment of garden products donated by leading companies in the lawn and garden industry.

"The students really take pride in coming out here," said Patty Dickson, a fifth-grade teacher. "They've worked hard to keep this alive. They're excited to see their project grow."

The garden is divided into sections and features plants and vegetables, a natural shelter area, an 18th-century herb garden, a biblical garden, an outdoor classroom area and a statue of Mary.

"It's a beautiful place for the students to gather and learn," said art teacher Bess Robinson.

Older students, who have been tending the garden for several years, are eager to help the younger students, said Dickson.

"We harvest the food and take it to the local soup kitchen or to Mother Teresa's nuns (the Missionaries of Charity, who have a convent in Charlotte)," said Robinson. "The students are able to plant, harvest and give back to the community."

"National Garden Association is proud to support this terrific kids' garden," said Joan White, education program director for the National Gardening Association. "This program was selected because of a demonstrated commitment to actively and creatively engaging youth in the gardening process and to improving the community."

The school is hoping to transform the garden into a national wildlife aviary, and add other sections in the future.

OUT OF THE SHADOWS

CSS, others work to help victims of human trafficking

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Catholic organizations such as Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte are working to bring the hidden problem of human trafficking out of the shadows.

An estimated 18,000 to 20,000 victims of human trafficking — most of them women and children — enter the United States each year. The number of people brought across international borders worldwide for the sex trade or other forced labor is placed at anywhere from 400,000 to a million or more annually.

Bishop Jugis to address protection of children at Mass

CHARLOTTE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis will deliver an Ash Wednesday message at St. Patrick Cathedral Feb. 25.

The bishop's pastoral message will call Catholics to prayer during Lent and will discuss sexual abuse of children by clergy. At the Mass, Bishop Jugis will distribute ashes.

The theme for this year's Lenten season as declared by Pope John Paul II is, "Whoever receives one child is my name receives me." (Mt. 18:15) It invites people to reflect on the condition of children, especially those abused at the hands of adults.

EXTENDING A HAND

Pope John Paul II extends his hand to a girl during Mass celebrated in St. Peter's Basilica for World Day of the Sick Feb. 11. The pontiff said that the faith shown by those who are sick and suffering is a precious gift.

Pope says faith shown by sick, suffering is precious gift

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The example of Catholics who, despite sickness and suffering, continue to express faith in the saving power of Christ is a precious gift for the church, Pope John Paul II said.

Marking the Feb. 11 celebration of the World Day of the Sick, the pope said: "Human existence is always a gift of God, even when it is marked by physical suffering of any kind. It is a gift which the church and the world must value."

The Catholic Church's main celebration of the day was held at the Shrine of Our Lady of Lourdes in France, which was connected by satellite with Pope John Paul's weekly general audience from the Vatican.

In his talk, Pope John Paul said that from a human point of view, "suffering and sickness can appear to be absurd realities."

But, he said, when suffering is seen in the light of the Gospel, "one is able to gather its deep salvific meaning."

The Gospel message is that Christ suffers for and with all people, taking their pain and making it part of the path to salvation and new life, the pope said.

"Those who suffer must never be left alone," the pope said, and he thanked family members, medical professionals and chaplains who dedicate their lives to caring for the sick.

"It is a great act of love to take care of one who suffers," he said.

The pope prayed Our Lady of Lourdes would watch over all who are sick, who are old or who are left alone.

"Soothe their suffering, dry their tears and obtain for each one of them the strength needed to accomplish God's will," the pope prayed.

After an evening Mass Feb. 11, Pope John Paul joined hundreds of sick people and their caregivers in St. Peter's Basilica.

The pope thanked the sick "for the prayers and sacrifices you generously have offered for me" and promised they were in his prayers, too.

Pope John Paul said the 2004 World Day of the Sick not only focused on the healings and spiritual blessings thousands of people have found during a pilgrimage to Lourdes, but on the fact that Mary is honored at Lourdes under the title of "the Immaculate Conception."

Later this year, the church will mark the 150th anniversary of Pope Pius IX's proclamation of the dogma that Mary was conceived without sin.

Bush uses visit to Catholic schools to promote voucher plan

WASHINGTON (CNS) — President George W. Bush visited a Washington Catholic high school Feb. 13 and praised the school's success in sending students to college. He held it up as an example of why he supports voucher programs.

In what the White House billed as a "conversation on parental options and school choice," the president and Education Secretary Rod Paige joined three Washington parents and the president of Archbishop Carroll High School in a panel setting to talk about a newly passed voucher program for Washington and other programs aimed at improving the nation's schools.

Bush praised Catholic schools in general for taking "the so-called hard-to-educate" and helping them to excel. Archbishop Carroll in particular deserves praise, the president said, for its record of sending 98 percent of its graduates on to college.

He said that level of success was "dashing false expectations" of how poorly schools in Washington do.

School president John T. Butler described the District of Columbia Opportunity Scholarships as "a breath of fresh air" for D.C. students. The program, which had to be passed by Congress and signed by the president, will give eligible students up to $7,500 to use toward tuition, fees and transportation expenses to attend nonpublic schools beginning with the 2004-05 academic year.

No questions were taken from the audience of invited guests and Archbishop Carroll students, although several met briefly with Bush when he arrived. Instead, Bush guided a 40-minute discussion among the panelists.

Vatican announces Eucharist as theme of 2005 Synod of Bishops

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The next world Synod of Bishops will meet in October 2005 to discuss the theme, "The Eucharist: Source and Culmination of the Life and Mission of the Church," the Vatican announced.

The theme was chosen by Pope John Paul II on the suggestions of bishops. The 2005 assembly will take place at the Vatican Oct. 2-29.

The announcement came the day after the pope named Archbishop Nikola Eterovic, a Croatian with long experience in Vatican diplomacy, as secretary-general of the Synod of Bishops.

The synod on the Eucharist will be the 11th general assembly of the synod since Pope Paul VI reinstituted the structure after the Second Vatican Council.

The worldwide meetings generally are held every three or four years. The last synod, focusing on the ministry of the bishop, was held at the Vatican in 2001.

The Eucharist was the topic of the pope's latest encyclical, issued in April 2003. It emphasized the importance of the Eucharist as the greatest gift God left to his church.

The encyclical also reaffirmed the traditional teaching of the church on the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist, on the need for validly ordained ministers for its celebration, and on the importance of following the church's liturgical norms.

Pope calls for commitment to safeguarding human rights in Iran

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II called for the continued commitment to the protection of human rights in Iran as well as to promoting greater understanding between peoples of different religious and cultural identities.

The pope made his remarks Feb. 12 to Kamal Kharrazi, foreign minister of the Islamic republic of Iran. The visit came on the 50th anniversary of diplomatic relations between Iran and the Holy See.

"Your presence here is a sign of the cooperation that, for more than 50 years now, has marked the official relations between the Holy See and your country," the pope said.

"I am confident that this spirit of collaboration will continue to grow ever stronger as we address issues of mutual concern to us," he said.

The pope highlighted the importance of working on "the ongoing commitment to safeguard the inalienable rights and dignity of the human person, especially in efforts aimed at promoting greater understanding among peoples of different religious, cultural and ethnic backgrounds."

With a rapidly growing population of more than 68 million, Iran has about 120,000 Christians and, of those, around 16,000 people are Catholic. Eighty-nine percent of the population is Shiite Muslim and 10 percent are Sunni. The remaining minority includes people of Zoroastrian, Jewish and Bahai traditions.

Although Iran's official religion is Islam, the constitution has made provisions to respect the rights of religious minorities.

Several church and Vatican officials familiar with the situation of Christians in Iran have praised the country's recent efforts in securing greater religious freedoms for religious minorities.

Vatican spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said after meeting with the pope, Kharrazi met with the Vatican's secretary of state, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, and Msgr. Pietro Parolin, undersecretary for relations with states.

Navarro-Valls said the leaders discussed the situation of the Catholic Church in Iran as well as collaborative efforts between the two countries concerning "interreligious dialogue, the promotion of peace and other international issues."

Vatican doves sometimes turn chicken

VATICAN (CNS) — The noble white dove has come to symbolize peace, fidelity, fraternity and hope, but the Vatican seems to have seen more than its fair share of doves suffering from a fear of flying.

Some might even say those doves are really just chicken. What's meant to be an impressive launch from the fifth-story window of the pope's studio instead turns into a feathery fiasco.

In 1998, both doves recoiled from their release and turned tail back inside the apostolic palace. Delighted, Pope John Paul II said, "It is clear this is a house of peace, because the doves don't want to leave."

This scene of one or both doves diving for papal cover has been repeated over the years.

Most recently, on Jan. 25, call it stage-fright, call it premonition: One dove refused to leave the pope's windowsill while the more gutsy of the two flew off to a grisly fate.

One Italian newspaper reported the bird of peace was later found injured from a seagull attack.

Vatican official, U.S. cardinal criticize South Korean human cloning ## Mining of stem cells "full of illicit acts"

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The first successful cloning of human embryos to provide stem cells marks a dangerous step toward the unregulated commercialization of human life, said a leading Vatican official.

Bishop Elio Sgreccia, vice president of the Pontifical Academy for Life, said Feb. 12 that the mining of stem cells from embryos, which are then discarded, was a procedure "full of illicit acts."

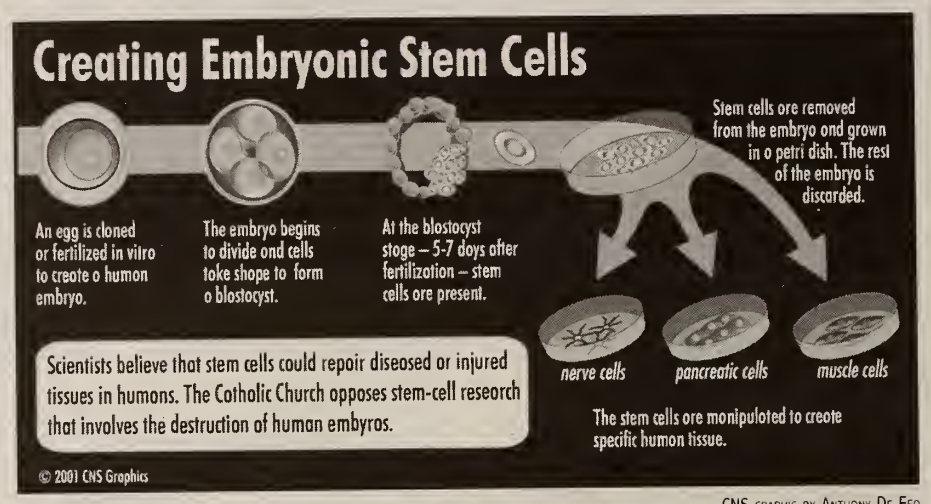
In the United States, Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore said the creation and destruction of human embryos "is a sign of moral regress."

"Seldom have researchers done so much harm to so many fellow humans, with so little justification," he said.

The church leaders were reacting to news that scientists in South Korea had cloned 30 human embryos and grown them to the stage where they produce stem cells. The stem cells, which have the ability to turn into any cell in the body, were then extracted and the embryos destroyed.

The scientists said they were trying to patent their technique and the stem cells produced. It was considered a major step toward so-called "therapeutic" cloning, which is undertaken not to create a human being but to produce stem cells that can be used to grow replacement tissue in treating disease.

The church teaches that human cloning is wrong and that any destruction of human embryos violates the right to life of the weakest human beings.



CNS GRAPHIC BY ANTHONY DE FEO

Scientists believe that stem cells could repair diseased or injured tissues in humans.

Bishop Sgreccia said that ethically, so-called therapeutic cloning is even worse than reproductive cloning at some levels because it involves the planned creation, exploitation and destruction of human life.

"From not only a Catholic point of view, this is a procedure full of illicit acts," he said.

"It's part of a much larger battle: whether economic profit should prevail absolutely over fundamental moral arguments, whether the survival of a human being should come first or the profits of the strongest — the industries and the multinationals that do business in this sector," he said.

Bishop Sgreccia said people should be asking whether the commercialization of a human embryo at the level of blastocyst — an early stage of about 100 cells — could help open the door to wider forms of exploitation, particularly in commercialization of organs from children and others in the Third World.

Bishop Sgreccia said the supposed therapeutic benefits of embryonic stem cells are far from proven. He said adult stem cells, taken from umbilical cords and other organs, have proven to be of equal or greater effectiveness in therapy.

"It has been fairly well shown that it is not necessary to extract embryonic stem cells to try to cure diseases like Parkinson's or Alzheimer's," he said.

"Our impression is that this is an effort to have human embryos at one's disposal and to remove every ban against their use, as if they were merely merchandise or material," he said.

Cardinal Keeler, chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee for Pro-Life Activities, said creating the embryos "solely to destroy them is the ultimate violation of research ethics."

He called for a worldwide effort to ban human cloning.

The cardinal also criticized the use of fertility drugs on the 16 Korean women who produced the 242 eggs used in the stem-cell experiment.

"These women were used as egg factories while their embryonic offspring were treated as nothing more than objects of research, their human dignity ignored in the process," he said.

Pro-life group takes on Georgetown University over aborted fetal cell lines

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A Florida pro-life group has pledged to continue its efforts to stop research at Georgetown University Medical Center in Washington that uses cell lines derived from aborted fetuses.

"It is an outrage and a scandal that any Catholic facility could condone the use of aborted fetal cell lines, regardless of how long ago the abortions occurred," says a petition addressed to Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington on the Web site www.cogforlife.org which is the site of the organization Children of God for Life.

The petition asks the cardinal to "use your authority and put an end to the unnecessary use of aborted fetal cell lines, which actually diverts important funding and hinders other noble and morally responsible research."

Debra Vinnedge, a member of St. Catherine of Siena Church in Clearwater, Fla., who is president and executive director of Children of God for Life, said petition received 2,000 online signatures in less than a week.

Cardinal McCarrick had asked Jesuit-run Georgetown last summer to look into "the origin of cell lines used in some of our research," according to a statement from Amy DeMaria, executive director of communications for the medical center.

"Our review revealed that [illegible] GUMC researchers were conducting long-term research using four different cell lines that had been derived decades ago from tissue that came from terminated pregnancies," DeMaria said. "These cell lines were not created at Georgetown University."

Jesuit Father Kevin T. FitzGerald, who holds the David Lauer chair for Catholic health care ethics at Georgetown and serves as research associate professor in the oncology department at the medical center, said the potential benefits of the research outweighed any harm from using the cells since no abortions were performed specifically to provide cell lines for research.

ANSWERING THE CALL

Lay ministry guides Catholics to deeper spirituality

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — "God pushed me into it," said Marie Cordero of the lay ministry program.

Now in her second year of the program in the Diocese of Charlotte, Cordero thought about enrolling for four years before she committed to it.

Cordero said the lay ministry program has increased her spiritual life tremendously.

"I have a thirst for more knowledge," she said. "There is not enough adult education — the more you get, the more you want."

"Lay ministry isn't just learning about your faith," said Frank Villaronga, director of the diocesan evangelization and ministry formation office. "It is a formational program, and the idea behind lay ministry is that participants are in the program in order to answer their baptismal call to ministry more fully."

Because the mission of the Catholic Church is one of evangelization, this answer includes not only learning about the Catholic faith, but also integrating that learning into one's personal life, because the faith response is one that requires action.

Janet and Jim Corrigan are in the second year of the program in Arden. She is a volunteer and substitute teacher at Immaculata School in Hendersonville; he is the secretary of the pastoral council at Immaculate Conception Church.

Lay ministry is a good program for converts to the Catholic faith, said Janet Corrigan. She said she feels more confident in discussing religious issues with students since enrolling in the lay ministry program.

"It's also good for anyone who thinks they know everything they need to know about the church," she said.

Most participants in the lay ministry program are trying to figure out what it means to be a minister, Villaronga said. The program is comprised of people who might already be involved in some kind of activity or formal ministry in their parish — prison ministry, catechesis, feeding the homeless — and those who are exploring various ministries.

Frank Villaronga, director of the diocesan evangelization and ministry formation office, teaches lay ministry at the pastoral center in Charlotte. Lay ministry teaches participants to answer their baptismal calls to ministry.

Villaronga tells participants in the first class of the program, "If you are in this program hoping to become lay ministers, I've got news for you: You already are ministers. By virtue of your baptism, you already are part of the mission of the church."

"The vision of Vatican II was that the laity are called to live out their faith in an active way in their own lives," he said.

Villaronga also pointed out the value of this "marketplace ministry" — the ministry that takes place in our day-to-day lives.

Secondarily, lay ministers contribute much-needed help to the sacramental ministers.

"Bishops, priests and deacons can't do it all," said Villaronga. Lay ministers can serve as counselors, spiritual companions, eucharistic ministers, catechists and in many other areas of the parish.

"It is important to empower the laity in many specific ministries in the name of the church," he said. "Primarily, people are called to live out their ministry in their everyday lives."

The office of evangelization and ministry formation is budgeted to receive $72,848 from the 2004 Diocesan Support Appeal, part of which assists participants in the lay ministry program by keeping tuition costs low.

Villaronga considers the lay ministry program an important prerequisite to the permanent diaconate program. The program provides diaconate candidates with primary formation and gives them an opportunity to explore their formation as laypeople.

Villaronga recommends the lay ministry program for all interested in learning more about their faith, growing in their faith, and learning how to live out their faith in a more active way.

The two-year program is comprised of 12 classes each year, covering such topics as Scripture, Christology, theology and history of the Catholic Church, Vatican II, liturgy and sacrament, morality, social ministry and the "nuts and bolts" of ministry. Classes meet in Charlotte, Greensboro and Arden.

Guidelines for Lent

Lent is the season the Catholic Church gives us to take stock and review our lives, to root out all that is not good and true and replace it with the faithful and the holy. In these 40 days, the Catholic Church turns to the ancient penitential practices of fasting, almsgiving and prayer. These practices remain as rich and life-giving in the year 2004 as they were when practiced by the early Christians and by our Jewish forbearers.

Fasting reminds us of our hunger for God, which no worldly thing can satisfy. Almsgiving reminds us that love of God and love of neighbor are inextricably intertwined, and that we bear responsibility for each other. Prayer reminds us to center our lives on God who alone gives meaning to all we do.

Lent is a most special time. The liturgies and devotions of Lent call us to a kind of spiritual "spring cleaning," identifying relationships that are disordered and sins that imprison and then seeking forgiveness and healing. We root out the darkness of sin so as to enter the Easter mysteries with a clean heart bathed in the healing, life-giving light of Christ.

Guidelines for Lent

1) The time of Lent is to be observed by Catholics as a special season of prayer, penance and works of charity.

2) Ash Wednesday, Feb. 25, and Good Friday, April 9, in particular, are the most important penitential days of the liturgical year. They are days of both fast and abstinence. All Fridays in Lent are days of abstinence.

3) The rule of fasting states that only one full meal a day can be taken. Two small meals, "sufficient to maintain strength," are allowed, but together they should not equal another full meal. Eating between meals breaks the fast, but drinking liquids does not. The rule of fasting binds all Catholics from age 18 to 59.

4) Abstinence refers to the eating of meat. Under the present law, it does not include egg or milk products, meat stock soups or gravies. The rule of abstinence binds all Catholics 14 years old and older.

5) The substantial observance of the laws of fast and abstinence is a serious obligation. Those whose work or health would be impaired are excused from fasting and abstaining. The individual conscience can decide if there is a proper cause to excuse. A more serious reason should be present to excuse from Ash Wednesday and Good Friday penance.

6) Self-imposed fasting on the other weekdays of Lent is recommended. Abstinence on all Fridays of the year is also highly recommended. The Peace Pastoral of the American Bishops, stating that prayer is incomplete without penance, urges Friday abstinences as something all American Catholics should offer up for the sake of world peace.

7) Parents and teachers should see to it that even those who are not bound by the laws of fasting and abstinence because of age are brought up in an atmosphere that is conducive to a sense of penance.

8) The faithful should be clearly and positively encouraged to receive the sacrament of reconciliation during Lent. There should be adequate time scheduled for confessions before Easter. Group reconciliation services should not be scheduled for the last days of the Holy Week. At no time is it permitted to schedule a group reconciliation service for the purpose of giving general absolution without individual confessions.

9) The liturgical directions of the Sacramentary and the Lectionary must be faithfully observed regarding all the special Holy Week rites.

10) Funeral Masses are not allowed on Holy Thursday, Good Friday or Holy Saturday. The funeral rite outside of Mass can be held either in church or at the chapel on those days, with a funeral Mass later.

11) The RCIA is incorporated into the liturgy during Lent. The Rite of Election is celebrated on the first Sunday of Lent. On the third, fourth and fifth Sundays of Lent, the Scrutinies take place during Mass.

CSS fights trafficking

"In almost all cases, language barriers, lack of contacts in the new land, beatings and fear of reprisals on family members left behind combine to keep the victims silent and unable to flee to safety," said Joe Purello, director of the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace of Catholic Social Services.

In April, Catholic Social Services will conduct a staff training day in Hickory that will include a workshop on how to identify the signs and symptoms of human trafficking and how to assist victims. Leading this workshop with be Laurie Latuda, a grants and program administrator with the Office of Refugee Programs in the U.S. bishops' Migration and Refugee Services.

These victims "often believe they are coming here to find the American dream," said Latuda.

Instead, many victims find forced labor, sexual exploitation or other contemporary forms of slavery, she said.

Because of the lack of legal immigration options, they sometimes pay people to smuggle them into the United States "and sometimes (the smugglers) turn out to be traffickers who enslave them," she said.

"There are networks of people who traffic in people, just like there are networks of drug traffickers or arms traffickers," said Latuda.

But those who profit from the trade of human beings often keep their victims under such close watch that finding those who need assistance is a huge challenge. Attending weekly Mass might be the only activity that the trafficker allows them to do alone.

"Oftentimes the only contact that people who have been trafficked have with the outside world is through religious ministers," said Latuda.

Uniting forces

Migration and Refugee Services provides administrative support to the Coalition of Catholic Organizations Against Human Trafficking, whose members meet four times a year to share information, educate themselves about particular aspects of the trafficking problem and have a dialogue with government leaders.

Coalition members gathered at the headquarters of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops Jan. 29 for:

— A presentation by and discussion with Dan Bryant, assistant attorney general for legal policy in the U.S. Department of Justice.

— An update on reauthorization of the Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act of 2000.

— A look at the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Refugee Resettlement's public awareness campaign on human trafficking, with an eye toward how coalition members can be involved.

"We need strong action today, at both the national and international level, to attack the evil of human trafficking," said Purello.

The Victims of Trafficking and Violence Protection Act, a U.S. law reauthorized in 2003, defines "severe forms of trafficking in persons" as "sex trafficking in which a commercial sex act is induced by force, fraud or coercion" or involves a minor or "the recruitment, harboring, transportation, provision or obtaining of a person for labor or services through the use of force, fraud or coercion."

Purello said the passage of this law was a "start in the right direction toward tackling this menace."

"Under this law, nations that are shown to support or turn a blind eye to human trafficking are to be denied U.S. aid; convicted traffickers are to receive harsher sentences; and victims of trafficking can receive special immigration status," he said.

Purello said voters must "let our legislators know we want this law strictly enforced. Nations that tolerate the victimization of their own people through human trafficking should receive no assistance from the American people."

Identifying victims

Coalition members each approach the problem from a different angle, according to Latuda.

The Catholic Health Association, for example, is offering posters for use in emergency rooms, doctors' offices or clinics to help health care providers identify those who have been subjected to trafficking. The poster also gives information on how to assist victims.

Patients who show signs of agitation, isolation, malnourishment, physical or sexual abuse and similar conditions and those who rely on "a companion" to tell their story may be victims of trafficking, the poster says.

If victims can be identified and certified by the federal government's Office of Refugee Resettlement, they become eligible under the law for the same benefits and services available to a refugee. The benefits may include food stamps, Medicaid, social services such as job preparation and English-language classes, and Social Security and welfare payments.

But in the three years since passage of the law, only 500 trafficking victims have been certified. Ninety percent of those were identified through Catholic ministers or social service agencies, said Latuda.

"We must do all we can to fight our culture's overwhelming trend to turn sexual activity into a commodity to be bought and sold," said Purello, adding that, "the trend to turn sex into a commodity (on TV, in movies, in popular music) often involves packaging sex with violence."

"We are also called to be much more conscious of the working conditions of laborers who make and provide the goods we buy," he said. "If a serious dent can be made in the demand side of the human trafficking business, then we will also see a significant fall in the numbers of people being trapped and exploited."

How to help

Anyone who suspects a trafficking situation that has not yet been reported or investigated should start by calling the Justice Department's "trafficking in persons and worker exploitation task force complaint line" at (888) 428-7581, advised Latuda. That will initiate a federal investigation into the matter.

People also can help the trafficked person obtain free or low-cost legal services from an attorney familiar with the provisions of the federal law. Sometimes, traffickers will provide attorneys for victims to get them released back into the traffickers' custody.

Latuda and others like her at MRS, who can be reached at (202) 541-3385, can help the trafficked person connect with local social service agencies that will help them before and after they are certified as trafficking victims.

Faith, hope — not blame — at 'Passion' core

Actor Jim Caviezel portrays Jesus on the cross in a scene from "The Passion of the Christ."

Director addresses controversy of film

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Blaming Jews for the death of Jesus is not the point of "The Passion of the Christ," said its director, Mel Gibson, in a Feb. 16 interview on ABC's "Primetime."

"It's not about pointing the fingers. It's not about playing the blame game," Gibson told Diane Sawyer. "It's about faith, hope, love and forgiveness. ... It is reality for me. ... I believe that."

When Sawyer asked him who killed Christ, Gibson replied: "The big answer is, we all did. I'll be first in the culpability stakes."

Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, also interviewed, said he did not believe either Gibson or his film were anti-Semitic, but "this movie has the potential to fuel anti-Semitism, to reinforce it."

Gibson said to be anti-Semitic "goes against the tenets of my faith, to be racist in any form. To be anti-Semitic is a sin. It's been condemned by one papal council after another. There's encyclicals on it ... to be anti-Semitic is to be un-Christian, and I'm not."

In the interview, Gibson acknowledged his film was "very violent, and if you don't like it, don't go ... If you want to leave halfway through, go ahead. You know, there's nothing that says you have to stay there."

The Motion Picture Association of America gave the film an R rating for its sequences of graphic violence. The rating means "restricted, under 17 requires accompanying parent or adult guardian."

Gibson added he wanted the violence to be "shocking" and "extreme."

"I wanted it to push the viewer over the edge," he said. "I think it pushes one over the edge ... so that they see the enormity of that sacrifice; to see that someone could endure that and still come back with love and forgiveness, even through extreme pain and suffering and ridicule."

"I wanted the full savagery of it to jump out of the screen and move people," he said. Still, "I've stopped way short of what I think happened."

"I don't think anybody under the age of 12 should go see it," he added.

Gibson said his film is "my version of what happened, according to the Gospels and ... the aspects of it I wanted to show."

"This is his vision, his faith," said Foxman. "He's a true believer, and I respect that. But there are times that there are unintended consequences."

"I hope that most people see it, Diane, as a passion of love," Foxman told Sawyer with regard to the movie's impact. "Maybe when it's all over, in a sobering manner, we'll be able to come back and look each other in the face and say, 'We have to deal with this hatred that's still out there.'"

Without specifically identifying anybody or anything, Gibson told EWTN, "There were dark forces that did not want us to make the film."

In the Feb. 12 The A.D. Times, his diocesan newspaper, Bishop Edward P. Cullen of Allentown, Pa., noted some of the "Passion" controversy "has been about just who crucified Jesus."

"This placing of blame is one of the oldest and most foolish of human games," going back to Genesis, when Adam and Eve started pointing fingers elsewhere when God confronted them with their sin, the bishop said.

"What caused the death of Jesus was sin," he said.

Bishop Cullen said, "It is ridiculous for any of us to think we can shift the blame to anyone else, whether past or present. If we use the crucifixion of Jesus as our excuse to look down on or to persecute others, we must also admit that in doing so we are not following the Lord, who forgave those who brought about his death. He forgave us!"

Criteria for dramatization of Passion based on Vatican II principles

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A 1988 statement by the U.S. bishops containing criteria on how to treat dramatizations of Christ's passion follows Vatican principles enunciated since the Second Vatican Council.

Church teaching on how Jews should and should not be depicted in retelling the Passion story is a matter of "going back to the way the church interprets the Scriptures," said Eugene Fisher of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs.

The bishops' "Criteria for the Evaluation of Dramatizations of the Passion" said "any presentations that explicitly or implicitly seek to shift responsibility from human sin onto this or that historical group, such as the Jews, can only be said to obscure a core Gospel truth."

Mixing the four Gospel Passion accounts and "extrabiblical records," it says, "leaves the widest possible latitude for artistic creativity and insight, but also for abuses and prejudices."

The document lists many things to avoid when writing a dramatic account of the Passion. Among them:

— "Jesus must not be depicted as opposed to the law (Torah)."

— "Jesus and the disciples must not be set dramatically in opposition to his people, the Jews."

— "Jews should not be portrayed as avaricious (e.g., in Temple money-changer scenes); bloodthirsty (e.g., in certain depictions of Jesus' appearances before the Temple priesthood or before Pilate); or implacable enemies of Christ (e.g., by changing the small 'crowd' at the governor's palace into a teeming mob)."

The document was based in part on "Guidelines and Suggestions for Implementing the Conciliar Declaration 'Nostra Aetate,' No. 4," issued in 1974 by the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations With the Jews.

In "Nostra Aetate," the Second Vatican Council said the church "deplores all hatreds, persecutions, displays of anti-Semitism leveled at any time or from any source against the Jews."

In advancing nun's cause, Vatican ignores her writings on the Passion

Sister Emmerich's visions inspire Gibson film

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — When Mel Gibson's film, "The Passion of the Christ," opens Ash Wednesday, a spotlight will turn on a little known but influential figure in the movie's genesis: German Sister Anne Catherine Emmerich.

Sister Emmerich, a mystic and stigmatic who died in 1824, is drawing attention for several reasons.

Gibson said he was inspired to make the movie in part by her book of visions, "The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ," which added detailed episodes to the Gospel account of Christ's suffering and death. Whether she actually wrote the book, however, has been questioned by Vatican experts.

Other scholars, Jewish and Catholic, have said Sister Emmerich's writings reflect the anti-Semitism of her time, particularly in her depiction of the Jews' role in Christ's death.

Pope John Paul II, meanwhile, is said to take an intense interest in Sister Emmerich and her life. Under his papacy, her sainthood cause has advanced to the point where she is expected to be beatified, probably sometime early next year.

In an interview with The New Yorker last fall, Gibson said Sister Emmerich's writings supplied him with "amazing images" and "stuff I never would have thought of."

In prerelease screenings attended by church officials in Rome, one recognizable scene from Sister Emmerich stood out: After Christ is scourged, Pilate's wife takes towels to a grief-stricken Mary so she can wipe up the blood.

Sister Emmerich also envisioned Satan as physically present among the crowd as it called for Jesus' death and witnessed his suffering. Gibson ended up casting a woman as Satan, which raised questions at the Vatican.

"The introduction of the figure of the devil does not seem in accordance with what is in Scripture," said U.S. Archbishop John P. Foley, the Vatican's top communications official, who has praised Gibson's film.

Throughout Sister Emmerich's narratives on the Passion, Jews are portrayed negatively and repeatedly called "wicked," "cruel" and "hardhearted." Yet that is not seen as a big problem among the Vatican's saint makers, who have downplayed her writings.

In fact, the very thing that is catapulting Sister Emmerich to wider fame — her mystical account of the Passion — was ultimately given no weight by the Vatican experts who have prepared the way for her beatification.

One official explained Sister Emmerich was practically illiterate, and her visions were written down by a popular romantic poet of the time, Clemens Brentano. Brentano published them after her death, and there's no way to tell how much liberty he took.

Sister Anne Catherine Emmerich is depicted in a holy card image from the Augustinian order. The German nun, a mystic and stigmatic, died in 1824 at age 49. Mel Gibson has said he was inspired to make his movie about Christ's passion in part by the book "The Dolorous Passion of Our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ," which is attributed to Sister Emmerich.

"Since it was impossible to distinguish what derives from Sister Emmerich and what is embroidery or additions, we could not take these writings as a criteria. Therefore, they were simply discarded completely from all the work for the cause," said Jesuit Father Peter Gumpel, who helped study the issue for the Vatican's Congregation for Saints' Causes.

In fact, Vatican officials said a common misperception is that in approving a sainthood cause, the church is giving a stamp of approval to everything the person may have written.

"When writings are approved, it's in a negative sense: that there's nothing in them against faith and morals. That's not the same as a positive approval," said one official of the Vatican's sainthood congregation.

So what has promoted Sister Emmerich "venerable" and worthy of beatification?

"She's being judged ... not on the basis of what she's written but on the basis of her virtues," Father Gumpel said.

Anne Catherine Emmerich entered an Augustinian convent in 1802 at age 28 and became known for her ecstasies, visions of the supernatural and "conversations" with Jesus.

She became bedridden in 1813 and developed the stigmata — bleeding wounds corresponding to those of the crucified Christ. A church investigation pronounced the wounds genuine. Ill for years until her death at age 49, she offered up her suffering for the souls in purgatory.

With the release of Gibson's movie, Sister Emmerich's written works are being promoted with new energy. Web sites citing "the book that inspired Mel Gibson's 'Passion' project" offer her writings on the passion, as well as her other volumes on the life of Christ, on Mary and on biblical revelations.

Yet in spite pf all this new attention, the Vatican has not set a date for Sister Emmerich's beatification. The ceremony could occur any time, since last year the Vatican approved a miracle attributed to her intercession.

Is the Vatican trying to avoid the impression of a "tie-in" with Gibson's movie?

Ambrosi said the reason is something more practical. It seems Sister Emmerich's native Archdiocese of Munster would like her to be beatified along with Cardinal Clemens Van Galen, an outspoken opponent of Hitler, whose cause is still waiting approval of a miracle.

In promotional terms, the church's agenda is clearly not Hollywood's agenda.

Book collects Vatican II teaching on church's relationship to Jews

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The U.S. bishops' Committee on Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs has published a compilation of Catholic teaching since the Second Vatican Council on the church's relationship with Jews and Judaism.

Titled "The Bible, the Jews, and the Death of Jesus: A Collection of Catholic Documents," the book includes excerpts from the Vatican II document on relations with non-Christian religions, "Nostra Aetate," which condemned all forms of anti-Semitism and affirms the continuing validity of God's covenant with the Jews.

It also contains "Criteria for the Evaluation of Dramatizations of the Passion," a 1988 document from the Committee on Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs.

The book, announced Feb. 11, was scheduled to be officially released Feb. 23, two days before the Ash Wednesday theatrical premiere of Mel Gibson's "The Passion of the Christ," which some Catholic scholars and U.S. Jewish leaders have said could foster anti-Semitism.

Other documents in the book include "Notes on the Correct Way to Present the Jews and Judaism in the Preaching and Catechesis in the Roman Catholic Church," which was a 1985 document by the Pontifical Commission for Religious Relations With the Jews, and "God's Mercy Endures Forever: Guidelines on the Presentation of Jews and Judaism in Catholic Preaching," a 1988 document by the U.S. bishops' Committee on the Liturgy.

"Behind all of these statements lies the determination of the church to oppose anti-Semitism and to understand more fully the salvation of all humanity in Christ while affirming the unique place of Jews and Judaism in the unfolding of the mysteries of salvation universally proclaimed by the church," said Bishop Stephen E. Blaire of Stockton, Calif., chairman of the bishops' Committee for Ecumenical and Interreligious Affairs.

He made the comments in a statement accompanying the announcement of the book's publication.

"The documents included develop Catholic teaching on the interpretation of Scripture, Catholic understanding and proper presentation of the passion and death of Christ, and the church's ongoing condemnation of the sin of anti-Semitism," he added.

Bishop Blaire credited Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore, episcopal moderator for Catholic-Jewish relations, with the idea of publishing an anthology of Catholic teaching on Jews and Judaism.

In his statement, Bishop Blaire quoted Cardinal Keeler: "Any Christians involved in the presentation of the events of Jesus' death must hold, in the words of the 1974 guidelines of the Holy See to implement 'Nostra Aetate' No. 4, an 'overriding preoccupation' not only to avoid portrayals of Jews that might lead to collective guilt, but also to replace them with positive ones." These guidelines are also included in "The Bible, the Jews, and the Death of Jesus."

"Nostra Aetate" repudiated all forms of anti-Semitism and called on Catholics to build mutual respect and understanding with Jews.

SUNDAY SCRIPTURE READINGS: FEB. 29, 2004

Feb. 29, First Sunday of Lent

Cycle C Readings:

1) Deuteronomy 26:4-10
   Psalm 91:1-2, 10-11, 12-13, 14-15
2) Romans 10:8-13
3) Gospel: Luke 4:1-13

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Outmann, Maria and their six children, a Kurdish refugee family, have worked hard to make a life in the United States although struggling financially since coming here four years ago.

I visit Maria in their small apartment almost weekly, and I usually bring extra household items, clothing or a few groceries. At Thanksgiving each year, I take them a turkey.

But on my third Thanksgiving turkey delivery my conscience started nagging me: Why are you taking them a turkey? They can use the food, plus I want to let them in on our American tradition. Thanksgiving is about celebrating family and God's providence. Why don't you invite them to Thanksgiving dinner in your home? (Gasp!)

My brother and his family are coming.

So? Haven't you had more than one family before?

I want it to be just us, cozy and comfortable.

The nagging didn't let up.

When finally I invited Maria and her family for Thanksgiving dinner, she squealed and clapped her hands. (She never did that at the arrival of a frozen turkey.) The celebration itself was wild with dishes, food and people everywhere. Conversation spilled into every room of the house, loud, animated and punctuated with laughter. My sister-in-law said what we all thought: It was the best Thanksgiving ever!

That Thanksgiving story speaks to this weekend's Lenten readings that remind us: We are not God. What we have in this life is a result of our loving God's generosity, not something we somehow deserve.

For me, the temptation is to think it's all mine to be selfishly hoarded, consumed or parsimoniously doled out to whomever I deem worthy. (How good of me to pick up an extra $10 turkey.) But the Old Testament passage explains "first fruits," the concept that we give back to our generous God the first and best — not the leftovers or extra — of the gifts bestowed on us.

God has provided me a lifetime of security in a comfortable home with a loving family — all available to be shared. What are home, family and celebration for if not simply to show me the nature of God's love? If I'm going to return that love, it can be no less.

The Little Tramp strikes again

Richard Schickel's fascinating documentary, "Charlie. The Life and Art of Charles Chaplin," illuminates the genius of a man who, for an entire generation, entertained audiences the world over. And even today, actors, directors and Hollywood craftspeople try to imitate Chaplin's astonishing energy and brilliance in the hopes of achieving even a sliver of Chaplain's success in entertaining the masses.

Although Schickel's documentary will hold its world premiere at the Cannes Film Festival in May, the program will debut on the TCM cable channel Wednesday, March 3, 8-10 p.m. EST. In fact, TCM will feature Chaplin films and shorts each Wednesday night in March (check local listings for details).

The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The film is not rated by the Motion Picture Association of America.

Making 'Judas' TV film a 'personal responsibility,' director says

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Directing the ABC made-for-TV movie "Judas" was "not just a job, but a personal obligation, a personal responsibility to the faith I take very seriously," said Charles Robert Carner, a Catholic with a long line of successes in the made-for-TV movie genre.

"Obviously, as a Catholic, it was important to me" to be able to tell the story of the relationship between Jesus and Judas, the apostle who betrayed him, Carner told Catholic News Service in a telephone interview from Los Angeles.

"Judas," which was originally titled "Judas & Jesus," will air Monday, March 8, 9-11 p.m. EST on ABC.

Carner got the directing job through his Catholic connections. "I know Father Frank," he said, referring to Father Frank Desiderio, head of Paulist Productions and one of the executive producers of the movie. "He was familiar with my work. We're both in Catholics in Media (Associates)," he said. "He asked me to make this, and I'm very grateful for the opportunity."

Although the Gospels focus on Jesus, there are many characters surrounding his life and ministry about whom much is unknown. Carner acknowledged the need to walk a fine line between the excesses of past filmed accounts of Jesus' life.

"If you look at 'The Greatest Story Ever Told,' it's respectful to the point of being tedious," Carner told CNS about the George Stevens' film that presented the traditional view of Christ as God incarnate.

"But 'The Last Temptation of Christ' was so self-conscious (about) shattering myths, it's like (director Martin) Scorsese was making a cold movie," Carner said. "And I don't want to trivialize people's religion, which is what screwed up Monty Python's 'Life of Brian.'"

Scorsese's film tried to present Christ as tempted by Satan to give up his role as Messiah for the life of an ordinary man. The Monty Python satire was about a contemporary of Jesus who is mistaken for him and eventually crucified by the Romans.

Carner believes he navigated those treacherous waters successfully, with the help of a solid cast.

Johnathon Schaech, who plays Judas, has "a marvelous intensity," he said. Jonathan Scarfe, who plays Jesus, projects "those intangible qualities of Jesus, a holistic sense of care and confidence and loving and values. I felt it was important the viewers get a sense of joy from him."

Fiona Glasscott, who plays Pontius Pilate's wife, Claudia, was "almost Machiavellian in the way she was able to influence Pilate."

He also lauded the script from Tom Fontana, best known for the series "Homicide: Life on the Street" and "Oz."

"You could make a whole other movie just on the interplay between Caiaphas and Pilate," Carner said. The movie features scenes between the Roman governor of Judea (Tim Matheson) and the Temple high priest (Bob Gunton) as they seek to maintain a fragile political equilibrium amid the growth of interest in Jesus.

"Judas" was filmed over 23 days in Morocco in 2001, according to Carner, a former member of the U.S. bishops' communications committee.

"We were in the mixing studio when Sept. 11 happened," Carner said, referring to the 2001 terror attacks that day in the United States.

"I went to work that day in a state of shock. Everyone was (in shock)," he added. "I called everyone together, and we said a prayer for the victims of these terrible attacks.

"People came up to me in tears and said, 'Thank you for making this move at this time.' It made them feel as if their work mattered," Carner said.

"Judas" stayed on the shelf for two years after it was completed.

"There have been reasons put forth at various times" for the delay in it being aired, Carner said. "ABC was waiting for the right moment. And, with the release of Mel Gibson's 'Passion' and all the attendant publicity, this was the right time. I can't say I blame them. If I were ABC, I'd try to find a good time to show this."

Since making "Judas," Carner directed "Red Water," the highest-rated original movie to be shown on basic cable, and "Crossfire Trail," the highest-rated Western feature to debut on basic cable, both on TNT.

Local band strikes chord with Abbey

Gaston Symphonic Band, Hamilton perform in Guest Artist Series

BELMONT — Belmont Abbey College continues its Guest Artist Series with a special concert by some of the best local artists in the Charlotte metro area.

The Gaston Symphonic Band will perform a free concert for the public in the Abbey Basilica at the college Feb. 22.

The concert will feature Suite No. 1 by Gustav Holst, Suite of Old American Dances by Bennett, Amparito Roca by Jaime Texidor, and Broadway one-step march and "Saint Thomas" by Sonny Rollins, arranged by Aubrey Winter.

The Gaston County Community Band was founded in 1993 by Seth Kirby, band director at Mount Holly Junior High. During Kirby's tenure, the Gaston County Community Band continued to grow into a full symphonic band of more than 60 members playing a variety of music.

To reflect this growth, the volunteer band eventually became known as the Gaston Symphonic Band.

Tim Hamilton was appointed interim director in 2000, when the group's founder became ill, and permanent director in 2001.

Hamilton is a graduate of Western Carolina University in Cullowhee, where he performed as an orchestral trumpeter with the Asheville Symphony Orchestra. He began his music teaching career in South Carolina. In 1996, he was named director of bands at Ashbrook Senior High School.

Currently, Hamilton is the director of bands at Belmont Middle School in Belmont.

The Guest Artist Series at Belmont Abbey College is made possible in part by the Associated Foundation of Belmont, with additional assistance from Sam Stowe III, Benedictine Father Kenneth Geyer and Abbot Placid D. Solari. Karen Hite Jacob is the series' coordinator.

Ministering the future of the Catholic Church

Ricardo Veloz, diocesan director of Hispanic youth and young adult ministry, displays the certificate he received in recognition of his completion of the "Adult Counselors For Youth Ministry" course at the Southeast Pastoral Institute.

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Ricardo Veloz, director of diocesan Hispanic youth and young adult ministry, recently completed 150 hours of study, "Adult Counselors For Youth Ministry," at the Southeast Pastoral Institute in Miami, Fla.

Veloz considered the most important focus of the program to be psychology for adolescents, where he learned how to help young people cope with their problems. Other courses included methodology, Christology and sociology.

Adolescents may be the most important people in the Catholic Church today, he said. The sociology course taught him how society integrates adolescents into it.

"The courses helped me to better understand the realities youth and young adults, especially Hispanics, face everyday," he said. "And also to understand the Catholic Church's position on youth and young adults."

Pope says Letter to Ephesians tells of salvation plan, God's love

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II, continuing a series of talks on prayer, said St. Paul's Letter to the Ephesians offers a powerful summary of God's plan for salvation and his love for humanity.

At the beginning of the letter, St. Paul's canticle — recited every Monday at evening prayer — touches upon the purpose of creation, the meaning of the sacrifice of Christ and the importance of the gift of grace, the pope said at his weekly general audience Feb. 18.

The pope, seated on his mobile throne on the stage of the Vatican's audience hall, read less than half his prepared talk, and his voice was weak.

He said St. Paul's meditation at the beginning of his Letter to the Ephesians reflects on the fullness of God's plan for humanity.

"The canticle is a hymn to the saving power of God revealed in Jesus Christ. In his infinite goodness God planned before the creation of the world to bring all things into one through his beloved Son," he said in the English summary of his talk.

"This mysterious plan of salvation culminates in the mystery of Christ and the church. Through Christ's blood shed on the cross we have received redemption and the forgiveness of our sins," he said.

"By grace we were predestined in love to become children of God and to share in the fullness of God's own life," he said.

The audience was enlivened by the songs and chants of groups of international visitors, who cheered as their names were read by papal aides. The pope was serenaded by choirs, small bands and a group of harmonica-playing pilgrims from Germany.

Near the end of the audience, the pope greeted some 100 bishops who sat behind him on the stage. They were attending a conference on holiness in modern society, sponsored by the worldwide Focolare movement, which is celebrating its 60th anniversary.

Focolare, also called the Work of Mary, is a Catholic lay movement seeking world unity through the living witness of Christian love and holiness in the family and small community.

In brief remarks to the delegation, the pope said Mary was the "sublime model" of holiness for the whole church.

Among the bishops in the group was Zambian Archbishop Emmanuel Milingo, whose brief marriage to a Korean follower of the Rev. Sun Myung Moon in 2001 caused the Vatican deep embarrassment. Archbishop Milingo reconciled with the pope and the Vatican and currently leads faith-healing prayer services at a spirituality center outside Rome.

Attractive concept of 'enough'

Coming of Age

KAREN DIETLEIN
CNS COLUMNIST

"If only I were thin enough. Then I'd be happy."

Those words came to me out of nowhere as I twisted and twirled in front of a department store mirror last week. I was trying on a cocktail dress, watching as the material bunched and stretched in all the wrong places. I looked terrible.

In an instant I flashed back to high school and saw myself standing in the corner of the girls' locker room feeling that I just wasn't pretty enough, that I just wasn't smart enough, that I just wasn't thin enough and that I could never be really happy until I was.

Then something occurred to me as I readjusted that too-tight skirt. I'd never thought of it back in school when I was busy trying to avoid showing off my flabby arms after dodge ball.

"Enough," I muttered, picking at the dress with my left hand. How much weight loss was enough? At first I mused 10 pounds — but wouldn't 30 be better? Or 40? Was I looking to fit into this particular frock or was I trying to be as skinny as Gwyneth Paltrow? Did I actually ever have a weight-loss goal that I was going to stick to and be happy with or was I just trying to pour water into a bottomless cup, mistakenly expecting it to overflow with blessings?

"Enough" is an attractive concept. Society implies that once we get "enough" we can coast through life much as Gwyneth glides gently across the red carpet at the Oscars.

But without a clear, definitive goal "enough" becomes a lie — a false promise of happiness, an undefined and often unattainable high point. It becomes the carrot forever dangling just out of reach. It becomes the treat that's forever in the future, the Christmas morning that never comes.

At what point does "enough" become — well, enough?

I didn't want to sacrifice my own personal happiness on the altar of "never enough." I wanted to play the violin, feel the music flow through me and enjoy it. So what if I'm not as good as Itzhak Perlman? I wanted to write, to place words together in order and consonance. So what if I don't have a Pulitzer Prize yet?

Big dreams and great ambitions are necessary. I have quite a few myself. I try to keep them close — and in perspective. Because if there's one thing I've learned in my experience with the word "enough" it's that people don't have to wait for it to be truly happy.

Even if waited for "enough" and became richer than Midas, with the body of Helen of Troy and the writing talent of Shakespeare in my pinkie toe I still could wake up one morning, face myself in the mirror and say bleakly: "I'm not good enough. I'm not pretty enough. I'm not smart enough."

And I can't imagine how awful that would feel.

There is happiness in the future, in the things that we will all eventually see and do and experience. But there's also happiness right here — right now — even though we are imperfect people, even though we don't always win first prize, get the guy or look our best all the time.

It took practice to eliminate "never enough" from my life, but I'm quite contented with the results so far. After all — "I am pretty," "I am smart," "I am good."

Don't they sound great?

For Lent: Lessons in love

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

February is the time of year when it seems appropriate to talk about love.

Clearly, St. Valentine's Day has become associated with people expressing warm affection, even undying devotion. And if it makes folks feel closer and fonder of one another to send cards and flowers or share a box of chocolates, I say, more power to them. However, the occasion I'm really thinking of is Ash Wednesday and the start of Lent.

Love is far more than an emotion: it is a force of heaven. God's love for his people is what propels us from the despair of death to the hope of eternity; from the mortality we contemplate on Ash Wednesday through the ultimate sacrifice of God's son on Good Friday to his glorious resurrection of Easter morning.

Whatever love we have for ourselves, for others and for God exists because God first loved us, not with simple sentiment, but with a miraculous power. I believe he expects our love to reflect his own, with words and actions that express our belief in the transforming potential of love.

So, this Lenten season I have a suggestion for what to give up. Give up apathy and ambivalence. Embrace God's love for your own. Think about ways to put love into practice in all the little and large moments of everyday life. Think about what love really means.

— Love is pleasant when it would be easy to be irritable;

— Love listens even when it's not convenient;

— Love speaks kindly of those whom others belittle;

— Love draws out the best from those who often fail;

— Love delights in giving attention rather than in attracting it;

— Love respects the other's point of view without necessarily accepting it;

— Love knows how to disagree without becoming disagreeable;

— Love rejoices at the success of others instead of being envious;

— Love puts up with others' idiosyncrasies without being self-righteous;

— Love strives to make a bad situation better instead of just complaining;

— Love avoids causing unnecessary pain even when it's difficult;

— Love helps those in trouble without expecting the favor to be returned;

Cardinal John Henry Newman said, "One little deed, done against natural inclinations for God's sake, though in itself of a passive character, to brook an insult, to face danger, or to resign an advantage, has in it power outbalancing all the dust and chaff of mere profession."

How small and insignificant love seems when put in these terms — until we try to live it. There's nothing easy about pouring out love through patient perseverance. Denying your own desires for the welfare of another and returning good for evil are considered weak by those who don't have the strength to do them.

So, when your thoughts this month turn to hearts, that's fine — as long as you treasure all love for the one heart pierced for love of you.

The Assumption of Mary

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. As a Catholic I believe what the church teaches about the Assumption of Mary. But I never learned any facts upon which this teaching is based. How can we have such an important feast and belief when there are no facts to back them up? Or have I missed something? (Indiana)

A. I'm not sure what you mean by facts. For many of our Catholic and Christian beliefs there are no physical "facts," if that's what you mean, to support them. What such facts do we have to bolster our faith in the presence of our Lord in the Eucharist, for example? Or our belief that the Bible is the word of God?

These are mysteries in the formal religious sense; we cannot know or comprehend them with our human faculties alone, without some direct revelation from God.

What Pope Pius XII wrote when proclaiming the dogma of the assumption (1950) applies to all divine mysteries. The virgin Mary's bodily assumption into heaven, he said, is a truth "which surely no faculty of the human mind could know by its own natural powers" ("Munificentissimus Deus," No. 14).

We believe that some authentic facts, realities, are not certifiable by physical evidence or purely natural processes of logic. Among these is the promise of Jesus Christ that he would be with and guide his community of believers, his church, until the end of time (Mt 28:20).

He assured the disciples that the Father would send the Spirit of truth, who "will teach you everything and remind you of all I told you" and "will guide you to all truth" (Jn 14:26 and 16:13).

The Spirit of Jesus will keep it safe from any direction or teaching that could get it seriously off track and endanger its mission to be a sure instrument and channel of God's saving grace for the human family. This is an essential "fact" of Catholic, and indeed all Christian, faith.

This leads to the further fact that, while the church speaks sometimes through the pope or the collective body of bishops, the official teachers in the church, the Holy Spirit also inspires, and speaks to and in, the whole body of the faithful on earth, bringing about what is known in theology as the "sensus fidelium," the consensus of believers.

Pius XII's declaration of the doctrine of the assumption is a perfect example. Before the operative words proclaiming the dogma, he devotes pages to explaining carefully exactly what is being done and especially establishing the extensive, centuries-old belief of Catholics worldwide that this teaching regarding Mary was revealed by God.

He reviews evidence of this belief in devotions and liturgy, in the dedication of churches, religious orders and every sort of religious institution and activity to our Lady under the title of her assumption.

He explains how the teaching accords with Scripture and other great Christian traditions, and why, for more than 1,000 years, theologians, including St. Albert the Great and St. Thomas Aquinas, witnessed in its favor. (If you want to read the whole document, Google search "Munifcentissimus Deus" on the Internet.)

Finally, four years before the declaration, he wrote to all bishops, inquiring whether the assumption could be proposed and defined as a dogma of faith. "Do you, with your clergy and people, desire that it should be (defined)?" he asked. The response was overwhelmingly positive.

Perhaps, especially dealing with things of God, "facts" are where you find them. As with love, God, beauty and nearly all other truly important facts of life, we do not understand. We just know.

Parents aging

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

I hate seeing people age, especially parents. I want to color the gray out of their hair and buy them a lifetime prescription for aging cream so as to erase, along with their wrinkles, my fear of being left alone in this world.

Young adults are entering that chapter in their lives when they must decide what to do if their parents are no longer able to meet their own needs. The young adults remember with nostalgia when Dad didn't suffer from prostate cancer and when Mom's eyes were still good.

Each generation has had to care for the one before it, of course. But since many young adults are prolonging the decision to start a family of their own, a growing number of 30-somethings are faced with the double responsibility of changing diapers and Depends.

"I thought the grandparents were supposed to be of help to us when we were raising babies," a disgruntled and exhausted friend said the other night as he flung himself on our couch after a full day of work, grocery shopping and helping his mom with a water leak.

Some of our parents are 60 going on 90, with many physical ailments and complaints. Some are as active and as mentally alert as they were in their prime. They still swim or walk or play tennis every morning. Some work at their health; others live on cocktails and smokes.

"Old age and the passage of time teach us everything," writes the ancient Greek Sophocles. People either age gracefully or awkwardly; they embrace life and its seasons of joy and sorrow, or they defy it and resist the rhythm of its days, shutting down all vitality before its time.

We young adults can learn a great deal from our parents on how to age, which so often reflects how to live.

Research shows that those who stay physically and mentally active throughout their later years can successfully avert and overcome many diseases and cancers that plague their inactive friends.

I am inspired by those in their 70s, 80s and beyond who engage in life as fully as they did in their 20s and are uninhibited by their age to try new things. They have taught me to embrace life as a young lover, and to appreciate each and every day.

Eventually, however, there is no escaping death and aging and gray hair and wrinkles. I fear the day I won't be able to worry about my mom and to hear her voice on the other end of the phone. Until then, I try to learn as much as I can from her lived experience.

BOONE — St. Elizabeth Church has its beginnings in the few Catholic families and several Catholic students at Appalachian State College (now University) who were present in Boone in the 1940s.

At that time, visiting priests from Lenoir and North Wilkesboro celebrated Mass in the homes of private residents or the movie theater in Blowing Rock. One of those priests was Father William Wellein, who in 1953 set up the "Madonna of the Highways Motor Chapel" in Boone. It was often parked beside the Carolina Pharmacy and served a largely tourist population.

Father Wellein later began celebrating weekly Masses at the old American Legion "hut" and was commissioned to purchase land for a new church. Fundraising began by 1957, and the first Mass was celebrated in the new church in November 1958.

St. Elizabeth Church had no resident pastor until the Glenmary Home Missioners assumed pastoral responsibility in 1963. Glenmary Father Edward Smith convinced a few Glenmary brothers to come and erect an adjacent Newman Center office complex and living quarters for the priest in 1965.

During the Glenmary administration of the parish, the Catholic population, both around Boone and at Appalachian State, continued to grow. The first parish advisory board was established in 1964. When Father Smith was assigned to South America in 1969, Glenmary Father Robert Cameron became acting pastor. He was followed by Glenmary Father Robert Bond, who helped St. Elizabeth to become financially stable and have a functioning parish council.

A Ladies Guild was soon organized, and in 1972, the Diocese of Charlotte was established and pastoral responsibilities were returned to the diocese with Father George Kloster as pastor. At the time, St. Elizabeth Church's rolls showed 303 members.

In 1974, Dominican Sister Ann Griggin arrived as Catholic campus minister and to serve the parish. In 1976 St. Elizabeth Church became covenanted with St. Luke's Episcopal Church.

In 1979, Father Frank Connolly became pastor. Outreach programs for the poor and disabled were accelerated, as well as efforts to reach Catholics not attending church. Birth Choice and Peace and Justice groups were organized also.

By 1982, there were 414 registered parishioners and weekend Mass attendance during the summer months averaged 600 people. The June-through-September staffing of the Church of the Epiphany in Blowing Rock was a response to the influx of vacationing Floridians escaping the summer heat.

By 1984, the parish family had outgrown the original 140-seat church building when a disastrous fire destroyed the structure. During the next four years, business was conducted at the rectory and Masses were celebrated in an Appalachian State auditorium and Boone United Methodist Church.

The office complex, which survived the fire, was moved across the street and rebuilt in 1985 as the Catholic Campus Ministry Center. Land was purchased for the new church building, complete with religious education space, socializing facilities and offices. The new structure opened in the spring of 1988 and was dedicated by then-Bishop John F. Donoghue on July 17 of that year. Continued parish growth necessitated the addition of two education wings, which were completed in 1993 under Jesuit Father H. Cornell Bradley's pastorate.

Father Damion Lynch served as pastor from 1993 until 1995, when Father Anthony Marcaccio administered until Father Conrad Hoover became pastor in 1996. Father John Schneider, the current pastor, came to the church in July 2000.

In November 2002, St. Elizabeth Church became part of WeCAN, the Watauga Crisis Assitance Network, a faith-bases ministry of churches working together to help the Watauga County residents in need.

Ministry life within the parish continues to thrive, including active participation in the faith formation program, the Knights of Columbus and campus ministry at Appalachian State. The parish is also involved in Hispanic outreach and offers a weekly Spanish Mass.

In 1993, the parish received the Mustard Seed Award from the National Catholic Education Association in recognition of their high level of involvement and participation.

The essence of ashes

CHARLOTTE — Lent is a holy season of repentance and conversion, said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

The bishop delivered the Lenten message during his homily at St. Patrick Cathedral on Ash Wednesday, Feb. 25. He called people to conversion, and to reflect on the condition of children during the Lenten season.

"Every year our Lord Jesus Christ invites us into this holy season of Lent, because he wants to work a miracle of repentance and conversion in our heart through his grace," said Bishop Jugis.

"It truly is a miracle, isn't it, when God's grace can move our hearts to repentance for our sins, and conversion to a more

CHARLOTTE — As part of its ongoing commitment to effectively deal with the sin of sexual abuse of minors by some clergy, the Diocese of Charlotte released information included in the national John Jay study Feb. 27.

The study, conducted by the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York, was commissioned by the all-lay National Review Board under the mandate of the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People." The report, compiled by figures submitted by almost all of the 195 U.S. dioceses, presented data on the nature and scope of the sexual abuse of minors by some priests from 1950 through 2002.

Also on Feb. 27, the National Review Board released a companion study on the causes and context behind clerical abuse of minors, based on a series of interviews with church leaders and specialists. When the bishops formed the board in 2002, part of its mandate was to develop those studies.

The 46-county Diocese of Charlotte reported 13 priests had allegations of sexual misconduct made against them since the establishment of the diocese in 1972. Upon investigation, two priests were exonerated. The percentage of priests with allegations against them is 1.9 percent of the 677 active and retired priests in the dio-

COUNTRY IN CRISIS

A woman is led away from her damaged vehicle after it was hit by stones during clashes between supporters of Haitian President Jean-Bertrand Aristide and opposition demonstrators Feb. 15 in Port-au-Prince. Haitian bishops appealed for calm amid a worsening crisis on the island-nation that has pitted supporters of the president against those wanting him ousted from office.

CRS: delivery of humanitarian aid threatened by unrest in Haiti

BALTIMORE (CNS) — Catholic Relief Services said food supplies at its centers in Haiti are running low and deliveries of fresh supplies are threatened by current unrest.

CRS, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency, warned of a potential humanitarian crisis in Haiti if commercial and aid supply lines continued to be affected.

"The situation is critical," Dula James, CRS country representative in Haiti, said Feb. 18.

That day, CRS began delivering several thousand metric tons of food and cooking supplies. However, the volatile environment — including spontaneous street protests, roadblocks and general social unrest — could threaten the delivery's implementation, affecting hundreds of thousands who depend solely on CRS food aid for survival, the agency said.

CRS said roadblocks manned by gunmen have made it difficult for supplies and humanitarian assistance to reach these areas.

The agency's partners in northern Haiti have reported shortages in food and household supplies. CRS was organizing support for parishes in the area to distribute basic necessities.

Some 60 people have been killed since a rebellion against President Jean-Bertrand Aristide began in early February.

Rebels have chased police from more than a dozen towns and cut supply lines to northern Haiti from Port-au-Prince, the capital, and from the western Dominican Republic, which shares the island of Hispaniola with Haiti.

The threat of violence and lack of communication have left Haitian citizens at the mercy of each day's events, CRS said.

Hospitals and schools closed and the cost of food, medicine and cooking fuel skyrocketed. In Gonaives, the country's fourth-largest city with a population of 200,000, all commercial deliveries were discontinued, CRS said.

CRS and Caritas partners continued to work in the areas that remained accessible and lobbied for the establishment of a humanitarian corridor to alleviate the suffering of the North.

Aristide, a former Salesian priest, became Haiti's first elected leader in 1991. He was ousted in a military coup shortly after his election and was restored to power in a 1994 U.S. invasion. He was re-elected in 2000 and now faces accusations of corruption and political violence.

Auxiliary Bishop Pierre-Andre Dumas of Port-au-Prince told Vatican Radio Feb. 17 that Haiti was "on the verge of civil war, and anarchy reigns over the island."

He said it was time for the United States, which returned Aristide to power in 1994, to remind the president what democracy means.

English-speaking bishops receive copies of draft of Mass prayers

ROME (CNS) — Bishops in English-speaking countries have been sent drafts of a new translation of the main prayers used at Mass, but one expert said the number of obviously modified texts would not be overwhelming.

Msgr. James P. Moroney, secretary of the U.S. bishops' liturgy committee, said "the only things that were changed were those things that needed to be changed for precision or proclamation."

The English draft of the "Ordo Missae," or Order of the Mass, was approved by the episcopal board of the International Commission on English in the Liturgy in January.

Copies were sent out Feb. 13 to every Latin-rite bishop in the United States, and other English-speaking bishops' conferences were expected to distribute the text about the same time.

Msgr. Moroney said he would not discuss specific suggested changes while the bishops were reviewing and offering their comments on the texts. He said the Order of the Mass contains "almost all of the changes" expected in the parts of the Mass recited by the congregation.

The Order of the Mass includes prayers that are used at every Mass. It does not include all of the prayers that change weekly during the liturgical year.

Catholic News Service obtained a copy of the draft in late February. In several instances, the new version of the Mass prayers includes more literal translations of the original Latin texts including the word order.

For example, the proposed Gloria begins: "Glory to God in the highest and peace on earth to people of good will."

The current English text says "Glory to God in the highest and peace to his people on earth."

In many instances, the proposed text uses more formal language than previously.

Pope approves six sainthood causes; Vatican sets May 16 canonization

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II formally paved the way for the canonization of four men and two women, the majority of whom are founders of religious congregations from the 19th century.

The six will be elevated to sainthood during a Mass May 16 in St. Peter's Square.

One of those to be canonized is Blessed Father Luigi Orione, founder of the Little Work of Divine Providence, a religious congregation and the Orione Family, made up of laity, religious and priests.

Blessed Gianna Beretta Molla, the only nonreligious of the group, was an Italian pediatrician who became known as the "pro-life saint."

She discovered she had a uterine tumor during the end of the second month of her pregnancy. In order to spare the life of the fetus, she decided to refuse an operation that might have saved her life.

Molla carried the girl to term in 1962, but died a week after giving birth.

The other causes set for canonization May 16 include:

— Blessed Jose Manyanet Vives, founder of the Sons of the Holy Family.

— Blessed Nimatullah Kassab al-Hardini, a Lebanese Maronite monk.

— Blessed Paola Busecchi-Tassis, founder of the Institute of the Holy Family and the Congregation of the Holy Family.

Early public lobbying for World Youth Day prompts Vatican criticism

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As Germany prepares to welcome more than 100,000 young people for World Youth Day in 2005, some countries, like Australia, are already lining up to host World Youth Day 2007.

But one official at the Pontifical Council for the Laity — the Vatican office in charge of overseeing World Youth Day events — was not pleased with the early publicity of countries' intentions to host future youth celebrations.

On Feb. 19, an Italian Catholic youth Web site reported Australian Catholic bishops agreed to propose Sydney as the next city to host World Youth Day after Cologne, Germany.

Reports also circulated that bishops of South Africa and Bolivia wanted their countries to be considered the venue for World Youth Day 2007.

This publicity prompted criticism from the head of the Pontifical Council for the Laity's Youth Section, Father Francis Kohn. With preparations still under way for the World Youth Day event in Germany, Father Kohn said, it was inappropriate to be announcing intentions to host the 2007 event.

"This is not very professional; it's too soon to announce such a thing, and it wasn't very prudent of Korazym to send this out so quickly," he told Catholic News Service.

He said it was the responsibility of the Vatican to announce who would be the candidates for hosting the next round of World Youth Day events.

"It's fine for the bishops to talk among themselves about wanting their country to host it and to come to an agreement about it and then to send us a letter of formal request. But to publish one's intentions before even making the request ... they risk doing something that will work against their intention," Father Kohn said.

FRANKLIN — The women went to hell and back, sort of.

Approximately 100 women from around the Diocese of Charlotte gathered for a spiritual retreat entitled "The Last Four Things" at St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin Feb. 13-15.

Father Matthew Kauth, administrator of St. Francis of Assisi Church, and Father Ray Williams, pastor of St. Mary Church in Sylva, spoke during the retreat about sin, purgatory, hell and heaven.

"It was a wonderful weekend," said Father Kauth. "My job was to take them through hell and sin."

Hell, he said, "is the inability to love. All sin is a disordered love. When we sin, we turn toward something we want more than God."

To be a saint, he said, takes much love. "Love is to give oneself away, to pour oneself out in sacrifice," he said.

Everything in life is a prelude to heaven, said Father Kauth, because everyone goes through purgatory either in this life or the next.

In 1999, Pope John Paul II described purgatory as "not a place" but a "condition."

Love, said Father Williams, "draws us through purgatory, which is actually a process we're going through now. I compared purgatory to a mountain we're climbing. This involves a struggle; it's not necessarily easy, but it can be adventurous."

Prayer isn't a struggle, said Father Williams, but the development of a relationship with God. By the grace of God, people can be saved.

"Self-love leads to a hellish existence," he said. "Loving God and neighbor is what saves us. Heaven is union with God and one another, and the glory to which we're called. I wanted them to take away real insight into that glory, and to be inspired by that."

Father Williams said the retreat participants left the retreat uplifted and with new ideas on how to approach the season of Lent.

Many of the women were inspired to strive for saintliness.

"It was real talk to help one become holy, to become a saint, which is what we should all be aiming for," said Bonny Dodge, a parishioner of St. Francis of Assisi Church.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Q. Why is Ash Wednesday 40 days before Easter? What is the significance of the number 40? How do you determine the date of Ash Wednesday?

A: Because the early Christians regarded Moses' parting of the sea as an Old Testament antecedent for Baptism and because Moses spent 40 days and 40 nights on Mount Sinai before encountering God, Christians used the number 40 as the length of the season to prepare catechumens for receiving the Sacrament of Baptism at the Easter Vigil.

The date of Ash Wednesday is counted back from the date of Easter — count back six Sundays and then go to the previous Wednesday. That is Ash Wednesday; those six Sundays are not counted as part of the 40 days.

Brighter futures looming in Greensboro

Operation Rice Bowl grant assists Montagnard refugees

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — Montagnard refugees are weaving a brighter future in Greensboro.

Last summer, parishioners from various Greensboro-area churches helped more than 20 Montagnard women develop or improve existing weaving skills. The project was made possible through a one-time $1,000 grant from Operation Rice Bowl, the Lenten program of Catholic Relief Services, and donations from area businesses, according to Sister of St. Joseph Phyllis Tierney, pastoral associate at St. Pius X Church.

Meeting twice a week for three months, 15 volunteers from Greensboro churches taught the Montagnard women to use electric sewing machines to sew curtains, make skirts and repair clothes.

Though weaving looms were common the women's homeland, access to sewing machines was uncommon.

Christians from the Central Highlands of South Vietnam, the Montagnard (a French word for mountain dweller) men would hunt and fish while the women would take care of hearth and home. They practices a primitive form of weaving, utilizing six separate pieces of wood instead of a fixed loom.

The Montagnards aided U.S. Special Forces during the 1960s and many became prisoners in re-education camps after the Vietnam War ended. Due to cooperative resettlement efforts of the U.S. Special Forces and the Department of State, North Carolina is currently the largest Montagnard resettlement site in the Western Hemisphere.

The Diocese of Charlotte has helped resettle more than 600 Montagnards in the diocese since 1986. Many of the refugees are those who fled to Cambodia after the communist Vietnamese government quelled their protests over intrusion on traditional tribal lands and religious prosecution.

H Ngeo, a Montagnard refugee, weaves using a traditional loom from Vietnam.

The Montagnards came to North Carolina with a strong faith and limited skills.

Minhthu Lynagh, a Montagnard woman and St. Pius X parishioner active in the resettlement of Vietnamese refugees, helped organize the Greensboro Montagnard women into a weaver's guild.

Before relocating to Greensboro, Lynagh worked with refugees in Washington and Florida. One of her goals was to help her fellow Montagnards build unity and healthy relationships among the different tribes.

Lynagh enlisted the assistance of the Greensboro Cultural Arts Center and a local yarn company, which donated excess swatches of yarn. Using their six-piece looms, the women began making shoulder bags ordered by people in the Greensboro area.

Pete Williams, a St. Pius X parishioner and custom wood working business owner, built and donated 35 wooden looms to assist the Montagnard women in their work.

As the women continued to work together successfully, Lynagh encouraged fellow St. Pius X parishioner Amy Debruycker to apply for the Operation Rice Bowl grant through the Office of Justice and Peace.

Each Lent, parishes and schools in the Diocese of Charlotte participate in Operation Rice Bowl (ORB), the Catholic Relief Services program of prayer, fasting, learning and giving. The majority of funds from the ORB collection help the national Catholic Relief Services office's worldwide anti-poverty programs. The remainder of funds stay in the Diocese of Charlotte, where the diocesan Catholic Relief Services committee sponsors a mini-grants program for local initiatives on international issues or projects.

The women received donated sewing notions, fabric and boxes of thread. In addition, eight donated sewing machines were repaired and given to the best students.

Lawyer discuses violence, religion in post-9/11 world

Renowned speaker latest headliner for Cuthbert Allen Lecture Series

BELMONT — Gil Bailie, J.D., will present "Religious Violence in the 21st Century" as part of the Cuthbert Allen Lecture Series at Belmont Abbey College March 10.

The events of Sept. 11, 2001 shattered the way Americans perceive safety and security. The results have been long lines of screenings at airports, the deportation of thousands of immigrants with visa problems and the vigilant eye by nearly every American to thwart any future terrorist threat.

Many are still analyzing the events of Sept. 11 for its lasting impact on American culture.

As a teacher, lecturer and writer, Bailie believes the Judeo-Christian tradition offers a way out of violence. For years, he has explored the deeper spiritual and anthropological implications of the literary and scriptural traditions of Western culture.

Drawing heavily on the influence of French Catholic thinker Rene Girard, emeritus professor of French language, literature and civilization at Stanford University, Bailie's book, "Violence Unveiled: Humanity at the Crossroads," won the 1996 Pax Christi USA Book Award.

"We believe Gil Baillie's work, building on the thought of cultural anthropologist Rene Girard, opens up a unique, rarely-heard perspective on the origins and psychological functions of violence," says Sister Jane Russell, chair of the theology department at Belmont Abbey College and member of the Cuthbert Allen Lecture Committee.

"As The Other Side said of his book, 'Violence Unveiled,' Bailie's 'insight into the roots of violence, and final message of redemption and hope reflect a truly innovative Christian cultural critique,'" said Sister Russell. "This insight and message seem particularly worth listening to in light of the current resurgence of 'sacred violence' in our post-9/11 world."

Bailie joins a long list of noteworthy newsmakers in the series, including Ralph Nader, Rev. Jesse Jackson, William Bennett, Wendy Shalit, Sister Helen Prejean, James Kilpatrick, and last year's speaker, Boston Globe reporter Tom Oliphant.

Bailie is founder and president of the Florilegia Institute of Glen Ellen, Calif., a nonprofit educational institute emphasizing the anthropological uniqueness and historical significance of the Judeo-Christian tradition, especially the Gospels. The Florilegia Institute is concerned with today's cultural and spiritual crisis and with more accurately assessing its underlying dynamics, its perils and its promise.

The Father Cuthbert Allen Visiting Speakers Program is named after Father Cuthbert Allen who had an interest in stimulating the Belmont Abbey College community to thinking about provocative issues of the day. He provided a fund to be used to invite influential leaders and decision-makers from all walks of life, including politics, government, literature and the media.

WANT TO GO?

Bailie will speak in the Haid Theatre at Belmont Abbey College on Wednesday, March 10 at 8 p.m. The lecture is free and open to the public.

Are students customers, or not?

Philosophy professor debates higher ed issue at Bradley Institute

BELMONT — For years, colleges and universities across the country have debated whether or not students should be treated, in a traditional sense, as customers. The answer depends on whom you ask.

Some students argue they are, in fact, paying customers who are in need of a college degree.

Others debate that the dangers of forcing academia into a corporatist mold would suffocate the notions of free inquiry, free expression, open discovery and dissent found on campuses. By doing so, they predict it would harm institutions and their students by devaluing faculty and lowering academic standards.

Methodist College's Michael Potts, Ph.D., will tackle the issue as he presents "Students Are Not Customers: A Critique of the Consumer Model of Higher Education" at Belmont Abbey College March 11.

The philosophy and religion professor's talk is part of the spring lecture series sponsored by The Bradley Institute for the Study of Christian Culture, and is free and open to the public.

Potts will speak about the practical issues of how colleges and universities market themselves.

Potts believes the relationship between an institution and its students should be a far different relationship than that of a commercial enterprise and its customers. He says if that difference is not observed, a corrupting element is introduced into the college campus.

Potts is currently an associate professor and chairman of the Department of Philosophy and Religion at Methodist College in Fayetteville. As the co-editor of the book, "Beyond Brain Death: The Case Against Brain Based Criteria for Human Death," Potts' area of academic specialization is in the field of bio-ethics.

He holds a bachelor's degree from David Lipscomb College, a master's in theology from Harding University Graduate School of Theology, a Master of Arts from Vanderbilt University and a Doctorate of Philosophy from the University of Georgia.

Potts has published in journals including "The American Catholic Philosophical Quarterly," "The Thomist,' "Perspectives in Biology and Medicine,' "Faith and Philosophy," "The International Journal for Philosophy of Religion," "The Journal of Medicine and Philosophy" and "The Journal of Near-Death Studies."

The Bradley Institute for the Study of Christian Culture, founded in 1996 provides opportunities for business executives, career professionals and clergy to examine relevant ethical, theological and philosophical topics within the context of their modern lives. Program topics range from business, legal and medical ethics to history and philosophy.

Saying 'yes' to love

and speaker for Catholic Answers, one of the nation's largest lay-run apostolates of Catholic apologetics and evangelization. He addressed the eighth-graders of Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School, the student body of Charlotte Catholic High School and parishioners of St. Vincent de Paul Feb. 19 and 20.

"It's important to have someone who promotes the Catholic Church's message of chastity in a positive, engaging manner," said Father John Allen, chaplain at Charlotte Catholic High School and director of diocesan vocations.

The Catholic Church's call for chastity is the same for everyone, regardless of a person's age or stage in life, Father Allen said.

Evert explained he promotes chastity rather then abstinence.

"Abstinence is saying 'no' to sex," he said. "Chastity is saying 'yes' to love."

According to the Catholic Answers Web site, "some think that 'chastity' simply means 'not having sex.' But that's abstinence: what you can't do and can't have. Chastity is what you can do and can have . . . right now: a lifestyle that brings freedom, respect, peace and even romance — without regret. Chastity frees a couple from the selfish attitude of using each other as objects, and makes them capable of true love."

Making a connection

Evert began his presentation with an attention-getting demonstration. He asked a boy to volunteer, and one proudly hopped up on the stage and towered over Evert.

Evert asked the audience to imagine that he and the young man were on a date. To set the scene, Evert gave him a long blond wig to wear.

"Now imagine that we're at the Grand Canyon overlooking the edge," Evert said, picking up his "date" in his arms and stepping closer and closer to the edge of the "canyon."

Evert compared premarital sexual activity to carrying someone to the edge of a cliff and dropping him or her. He asked the audience if they would ever put someone they love in such danger.

Romance without regret

"All boys feel lust, but they've been lied to about what it means to be a man," Evert asserted. "Don't get your manhood by robbing a girl of her purity, but instead by protecting it."

Evert quoted Ephesians 5:25-26, "Husbands, love your wives, even as Christ loved the church and handed himself over for her, to sanctify her..."

According to Evert, studies show that the earlier a person engages in sexual activity, the more partners he or she is likely to have, leading to more breakups and more heartache. In turn, these people have higher rates of abortion and divorce.

Students at Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School line up to sign a prayer book following Jason Evert's "Romance without regret" presentation at the school Feb. 20. Evert prays daily for each person who signs the book.

Throughout his presentation, Evert stressed the importance of today's decisions on tomorrow's outcomes. He explained that a marriage between two virgins has a divorce rate 70 percent lower than the national average. Even two non-virgins who save intercourse for marriage are two-to-three times more likely to stay married.

"The things that you want to do with your girlfriend...would you want a guy to do that to your future wife?" he asked the young men.

According to Evert, respect is a key component in healthy, successful relationships. A feeling of being used never brings a person peace, Evert said.

"When you start having sex, you're not spending time with each other, but with each other's bodies," he said. A lack of respect and communication breeds distrust, which often leads to a breakup.

"Then you've given someone a precious gift who didn't deserve it, and you can't get it back," he said.

Evert also stressed the damage that pornography can do to young men and women, because it trains men to see women as objects. When men marry, they transfer their fantasies and lust to their wives, who cannot live up to these impossible standards of beauty and sexuality.

By rejecting pornography now, Evert said young men are being faithful to their future wives.

Evert also encouraged the young women at Holy Trinity to dress and act modestly.

"Girls will never convince guys to respect their modesty until they convince themselves of it," he said. "The way a woman dresses invites a man to treat her as a gentleman would or as a beast would."

Evert suggested girls ask themselves, "Am I a date or a soul mate? A for-now girl or a for-ever girl?"

"Ultimately, God wants us all to be happy," Father Allen said.

"The peace and joy that come from chastity are worth more than all the pleasure in the world," said Evert. "Love means doing what is best for your beloved."

During this same period of 30 years, 18 allegations of sexual misconduct were made against the 13 priests in the Diocese of Charlotte, and the diocese paid $704,439 for counseling and other services to victims, and for legal fees.

In 2003, an additional amount of $10,892 was paid for counseling. However, no new allegations regarding sexual abuse of minors by clergy were reported.

Diocesan insurance funds and the diocesan general fund were used for payment. No money from the Diocesan Support Appeal nor parish savings were used.

"The publication of this information affirms the pledge of the Diocese of Charlotte to root out the sinful crime of sex abuse and to do everything humanly possibly to make sure that it will not recur," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

The bishop addressed the sexual abuse of minors by some clergy during his homily at St. Patrick Cathedral on Ash Wednesday, Feb. 25. He also called Catholics to prayer during this season of Lent.

"The theme for Lent this year as set forth by Pope John Paul II is, 'Whoever receives one such child in my name receives me.' It is an invitation for all of us, Catholic or not, to reflect upon the condition of children and especially those children who have been profoundly hurt by the violence of adults," said Bishop Jugis.

"We are called to protect children and young people," he said.

National perspective

U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops president Bishop Wilton D. Gregory of Belleville, Ill., noted that "we don't have comparable statistics" from other organizations or professions that could be used to gauge the significance of the John Jay data on clerical abusers and their victims.

"I would like to believe that the Catholic Church is taking a bold step not only because of the seriousness of this issue for us, but the seriousness of this issue for all of society. ... I trust that what we are doing will advance the knowledge of this horrible crime in other venues," he said.

In the Feb. 27 report of national figures covering 1950-2002, the total number of priests with allegations of abuse is 4,932. The report said there were 109,694 active priests in this time period, and using this number, 4.0 percent of all priests active between 1950 and 2002 had allegations of abuse.

A total of 10,667 individuals made allegations of child sexual abuse by priests. Of those who alleged abuse, the study contained information that 17.2 percent of them had siblings who were also allegedly abused.

The report said the amount of money already paid as a result of allegations, to victims, for the treatment of priests and for legal expenses was $507,000,000 (including a highly publicized $85,000,000 settlement not included in the surveys from dioceses).

Thomas Plante, a psychology professorin California who treats clergy sex abusers and their victims, said the 4 percent figure is keeping with previous estimates and may not be far off from the general adult male population.

He said there is child sex abuse in other religions and in professions such as teaching and coaching.

"The bishops can't change history, but we can make sure that it is not repeated by determining the nature and scope of the problem," said Bishop Jugis. "With this information, the bishops can determine whether the steps we have taken are adequate to the problem."

Protecting children

The Diocese of Charlotte was among the nearly 90 percent of U.S. dioceses in compliance with the U.S. bishops' national policy to protect children and respond to clergy sexual abuse of minors, according to the first national audit report released Jan. 6.

The report was based on an independent compliance audit conducted by the Boston-based Gavin Group, headed by William Gavin, a former FBI official, and overseen by Kathleen McChesney, a former top FBI agent and head of the U.S. bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection.

The Diocese of Charlotte was commended for its early proactive initiatives to ensure the protection of children and youths under its pastoral care. In 1994, the diocese adopted its "Policy of the Diocese of Charlotte Concerning Ministry-Related Sexual Misconduct by Church Personnel," which included the establishment of a review board, a group of volunteers not employed by the diocese, with the exception of one priest.

The group includes a psychological counselor. Their role is to review allegations of abuse and to make recommendations to the bishop.

The diocese was also commended for its comprehensive Safe Environment Program, which includes training programs and background investigations for clergy, volunteers, teachers and contractors who have contact with minors.

Since June 2002, more than 7,000 diocesan employees and volunteers have completed the Protecting God's Children Training Program to help them recognize and prevent the sexual abuse of children.

Auditors also recommended the Diocese of Charlotte's policy for reporting allegations of sexual abuse of a minor by clergy be made more readily available. The diocese complied with the recommendation through regular announcements in church bulletins, The Catholic News & Herald and its Web site, www.charlottediocese.org.

"Here in the Diocese of Charlotte, we have policies, people, programs and, most importantly, prayer to address this problem," said Bishop Jugis. "Prayer is the primary response for the people of God when confronted with something as evil as sex abuse."

"I pray on a daily basis for all victims, and I ask the 140,000 Catholics in our diocese to do the same," he said.

Catholic News Service contributed to this story.

Lenten message

faithful following in Christ."

The bishop said it was a "very personal dialogue" that Christ initiates between him and his people, "where he speaks tenderly but insistently to the heart: Turn away from sin, and return to me with all your heart."

Ash Wednesday is the first day of Lent, 46 days before Easter. Ashes are blessed and placed on the foreheads of Catholics to remind them of their sin and the joy that lies in repentance.

"Ashes, as an outward sign of penance, were already used in Old Testament times, and the Church has preserved this custom to the present day," said the bishop.

The ashes, said Bishop Jugis, express a desire for Christ to undertake an interior journey of conversion within his people.

"The journey of conversion is designed to lead us to the celebration of the sacrament of reconciliation before Easter," said Bishop Jugis.

The Lord tells people to change and become like little children to enter the kingdom of heaven, said the bishop.

"This is the conversion he asks of us all the time: Change, cultivate simplicity and trust in imitation of Christ, who identified himself with the little ones," said Bishop Jugis.

The bishop said Pope John Paul II has asked all people to reflect on the condition of children during Lent and be mindful of them, because welcoming children is a way of welcoming Christ.

"Jesus says, 'Whoever receives one such child in my name receives me,'" said Bishop Jugis. "What greater source of grace could we ask for during Lent than receiving Christ himself?"

Too many children, unfortunately, have been "profoundly hurt by the violence and misconduct of adults," said Bishop Jugis. "Sadly, this has even happened to some children in the Church."

Bishop Jugis said the John Jay report released Feb. 27 would "help us bishops determine whether the steps we have already taken to address the issue have worked, or if additional steps are still needed."

"Hopefully, it will serve as a model for a larger community to follow in eradicating sexual abuse of minors from our society," he said.

The bishop expressed his "profound sorrow" to "victims of this crime."

"Some clergy did not live up to their calling to be an image of Christ, the Good Shepherd," said Bishop Jugis. "We are all suffering with those who have been victims of this immoral behavior."

The bishop asked that, during Lenten practices of prayer, fasting and sacrifice, people pray for "God's grace to bring healing to our brothers and sisters who are victims, and for God's grace to bring healing to the Church."

"This certainly is the intention of my heart," he said.

PROTECTING GOD'S CHILDREN

Charlotte priest removed from ministry

Bishop addresses parish, celebrates Masses

BY DAVID HAINS
SPECIAL TO
THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis began his homilies at Our Lady of the Assumption Church by expressing that he would have preferred his first parish visit to be under different circumstances.

Bishop Jugis celebrated all Masses at the church Feb. 21-22 because Father Gregory Littleton was removed from active ministry and resigned his position as pastor Feb. 20. That action was a result of new information related to a violation of "The Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" as reported by the Diocese of Metuchen, N.J.

In homilies that wove Scripture passages into his message regarding Father Littleton's situation, Bishop Jugis said, "The Lord is kind and merciful, do not let your hearts be troubled or afraid." He offered prayers for the victims of sex abuse and Our Lady of the Assumption Church family.

Father Littleton was a priest in good standing in the Diocese of Metuchen when he transfered to the Diocese of Charlotte in 1997. No allegations of any wrongdoing were made against Father Littleton during his service in the Diocese of Charlotte.

In fall of 2002, Bishop Paul G. Bootkoski of Metuchen ordered a review of priest personnel files in response to the sex abuse scandal in the Catholic Church. As a result of the review, in October 2002 the Diocese of Metuchen sent portions of Father Littleton's psychological assessment to the prosecutor's office in Middlesex County, N.J.

At that time, the Diocese of Charlotte was made aware information was sent to the prosecutor, but Father Littleton's status as a priest in good standing was not changed because no other information was supplied to the Diocese of Charlotte.

Unlike the current diocesan policy, the policy in 2002 said the bishop needed a specific allegation in order to take action against a priest — something the Diocese of Charlotte felt it did not have in connection with Father Littleton. Today, an investigation would warrant the priest's removal from active ministry.

The Middlesex County prosecutor later declined to seek an indictment against Father Littleton in the matter.

In mid-February, 2004, Bishop Bootkoski relayed new information to Bishop Jugis regarding Father Littleton's case. Bishop Bootkoski also said he was including Father Littleton among Diocese of Metuchen clergy counted in the John Jay study.

After reviewing the new documents sent from New Jersey on Friday, Feb. 20, and considering the placement in the John Jay study, Bishop Jugis removed Father Littleton from ministry.

"This situation is difficult for the Our Lady of the Assumption parish and for me personally," said Bishop Jugis.

After the Masses, Bishop Jugis greeted parishioners, many of whom expressed sorrow over the situation. Others asked for additional details about the bishop's decision, but ethics and confidentiality rules regarding personnel matters prevented the bishop from elaborating beyond what was said in the homilies.

Bishop Jugis assured the parishioners that "God will take care of Father Littleton and God will take care of Our Lady of the Assumption parish."

Protecting God's Children

In the Diocese of Charlotte, policies, procedures, programs and people are in place to combat the sin of sexual abuse of minors. They are:

— A written policy to deal with the sin of sexual abuse that was put in place in 1994. This policy has been updated to reflect the values expressed in 2002 in the U.S. bishops' "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People."

— Procedures that encourage people to come forward if they have witnessed or experienced sexual abuse. The procedures can be found on the diocesan Web site, www.charlottediocese.org. The diocese also encourages anyone who has been a victim to report the incident to civil authorities. The diocese will cooperate in any investigation.

— People who will act as advocates for victims of sexual abuse. Three victims' assistance advocates are located in diocesan offices in Charlotte, Winston-Salem and Asheville.

— Training for clergy, staff and volunteers. Since June 2002, more than 7,000 diocesan employees and volunteers have completed the Protecting God's Children Training Program to help them recognize and prevent the sexual abuse of children.

— The Review Board. This group of volunteers, with the exception of one priest, is not employed by the diocese. The group includes a psychological counselor. Their role is to review allegations of abuse and to make recommendations to the bishop.

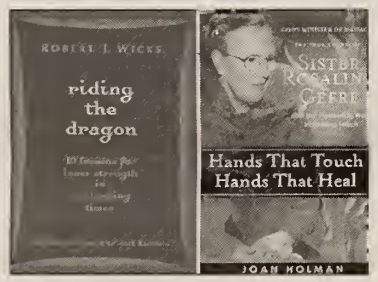
Two healers offer help for mind and body

REVIEWED BY EMILIE AST LEMMONS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"Riding the Dragon: Ten Lessons for Inner Strength in Challenging Times" has been on the Catholic best-seller list since it hit the bookstores in September. In it, Robert Wicks offers wisdom for staying afloat during low times of depression, burnout and grief.

Wicks has been helping people develop the psychological and spiritual tools of inner work for more than three decades. He is no stranger to dark nights of the soul, both in himself and others. A psychologist and professor in the pastoral counseling department at Loyola College in Maryland, his clients often are other healers and helpers — ministers, doctors, counselors and relief workers.



"Riding the Dragon: Ten Lessons for Inner Strength in Challenging Times," by Robert Wicks. Sorin Books (Notre Dame, Ind., 2003). 160 pp., $15.95.

"Hands that Touch, Hands that Heal: The True Story of Sister Rosalind Gefre," by Joan Holman. Sister Rosalind Christian Ministries (St. Paul, Minn., 2003). 114 pp., $12.95.

While many people flock to therapists in an effort to run the "dragon" into its cave, Wicks says greater inner growth comes from staying with problems and, as the title suggests, "riding the dragon."

"Often we seek security by either running away from our feelings of discouragement or attempting to conquer them," he writes. "Instead, we need to stay with them."

Among the ideas Wicks offers: Simplify and "prune" your life if you often find yourself becoming exhausted. Find "renewal zones," such as quiet walks, cheerful friends, or relaxing hobbies. Use kindness along with clarity when you assess yourself. Find love in small deeds. And perhaps most important: Allow yourself to rest in your darkness instead of seeking a quick fix. Trust that life will provide a new way for you.

Wicks also realizes that there are psychological and spiritual dangers involved in "living a full life of involvement with others." Feelings of "futility, fear, vulnerability and hopelessness" can be contagious. To keep a hopeful but compassionate heart, Wicks suggests steps for a "spiritual review of the day," a process that combines the "countertransferential review" that mental health workers use after sessions with clients with the theological reflection and self-examination that ministers do in prayer at the end of the day. It is an affirming way of conducting an examination of conscience.

"Hands that Touch, Hands that Heal" is the story of another healer — St. Joseph Sister Rosalind Gefre and "her pioneering work in healing touch."

Back in the days when massage was associated with prostitution more than health care, Sister Rosalind opened her first massage parlor in St. Paul, Minn. She knew then what mainstream medicine now confirms — that the healing touch of massage can remove headaches and muscle tension, stress and toxins.

But at the time, Sister Rosalind, now 73, faced city regulations that shut down her business, as well as a religious order that asked her to move out because it wasn't comfortable with the idea of a nun doing massage.

Almost 30 years later, Sister Rosalind is regarded as a leader in changing legislation on massage. She has five schools and six massage clinics in two states. Author Joan Holman weaves the nun's words in with her own narrative in this light biography. Photographs and some of Sister Rosalind's poems are included.

Why on earth didn't they tell anyone about it? They'd had the mother of all mountaintop experiences. They had seen, with their own eyes, their master transfigured, his glory revealed in all its dazzling, awe-inspiring splendor. They had seen Moses and Elijah discussing with Jesus the things that would befall him on his journey to Jerusalem.

How could they not shout from the rooftops the incontrovertible proof that Jesus' claims to be Messiah were true?

They had been certain enough at first. Peter had been so riveted by the transcendence of the moment that when Moses and Elijah appeared to be leaving, he proposed building three tents so the heavenly visitors could stay and the golden moment could be preserved forever. Yet the Gospel for the second Sunday of Lent concludes with an emphatic note on the silence of the disciples when they returned from the mountain.

Perhaps what changed their mood from ecstatic enthusiasm to sober, even frightened silence, was the command they heard from the shadow that overtook them: "Listen to him."

Listening to him, after seeing his glory, they could no longer ignore what Jesus already had been saying — and what they had been objecting to — about the passion that awaited him. With dawning clarity they began to understand that the triumphant vindication of Jesus, for which they were so eager, could be reached only by a path of struggle and trial.

To listen to Jesus in the days ahead, as we travel the Lenten journey with the rest of the church, is to choose a path of repentance and renewal. It is to recognize that the conversion to which this season calls us cannot be embraced without cost.

May the prayer, fasting and almsgiving which make up the discipline of Lent strengthen us for the journey.

Questions:

What is one fear that gets in the way of my listening faithfully to Jesus? To what Lenten discipline will I commit myself as a way of sharpening my hearing for the words of Christ in my life?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"After the voice had spoken, Jesus was found alone. They fell silent and did not at that time tell anyone what they had seen" (Luke 9:36).

Gibson's 'Passion' will be everything and then some to different people

Film should arouse opinions, deeper understanding

BY GERRI PARE
AND DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — (CNS) "The Passion of the Christ" (Newmarket) is an uncompromising, interpretive dramatization of the final 12 hours of Jesus' earthly life.

Unflinching in its brutality and penetrating in its iconography of God's supreme love for humanity, the film will mean different things to people of diverse backgrounds. Co-writer, producer and director Mel Gibson has undoubtedly created one of the most anticipated and controversial films of recent times.

Like other films on Christ's life, "The Passion" does not simply translate a single Gospel narrative onto the screen. Rather it is a composite of the Passion narratives in the four Gospels embroidered with nonscriptural traditions as well as the imaginative inspiration of the filmmaker. The result is a deeply personal work of devotional art — a moving Stations of the Cross, so to speak.

However, by choosing to narrow his focus almost exclusively to the passion of Christ, Gibson has, perhaps, muted Christ's teachings, making it difficult for viewers unfamiliar with the New Testament and the era's historical milieu to contextualize the circumstances leading up to Jesus' arrest. And though, for Christians, the Passion is the central event in the history of salvation, the "how" of Christ's death is lingered on at the expense of the "why?"

The film opens with a distraught Jesus (Jim Caviezel) facing down evil, personified as an androgynous being (played by Rosalinda Celentano), in the mist shrouded garden of Gethsemane and progresses to his death on the cross, followed by a fleeting, but poetically economic, resurrection coda. Flashbacks of his public ministry and home life in Nazareth with his mother, Mary (Maia Morgenstern), pepper the action, filling in some of the narrative blanks.

Each flashback in the film is a welcome respite from the near-incessant bloodletting, but more importantly for how it conveys Jesus' core message of God's boundless love for humanity, a love that does not spare his son death on the cross so that we might have eternal life.

Concerning the issue of anti-Semitism, the Jewish people are at no time blamed collectively for Jesus' death; rather, Christ himself freely embraces his destiny, stating clearly "No one takes it (my life) from me, but I lay it down of myself" (John 10:18). By extension, Gibson's film suggests that all humanity shares culpability for the crucifixion, a theological stance established by the movie's opening quotation from the prophet Isaiah which explains that Christ was "crushed for our transgressions."

Catholics viewing the film should recall the teachings of the Second Vatican Council's decree, "Nostra Aetate," which affirms that, "though Jewish authorities and those who followed their lead pressed for the death of Christ, neither all Jews indiscriminately at that time, nor Jews today, can be charged with the crimes committed during his passion."

Overall, the film presents Jews in much the same way as any other group — a mix of vice and virtue, good and bad. Yet while the larger Jewish community is shown to hold diverse opinions concerning Christ's fate — exemplified by the cacophony of taunts and tears along the Via Dolorosa — it fails to reflect the wider political nuances of first-century Judea. The scene of the stock frenzied mob uniformly calling for Christ's crucifixion in Pilate's courtyard is problematic, though once Christ begins his laborious way of the cross Jewish individuals emerge from the crowd to extend kindness — including Veronica wiping his face and Simon of Cyrene helping carry the cross, as a chorus of weeping women lament from the sidelines.

However, the most visually distinctive representatives of Jewish authority — the high priest Caiphas (Matia Sbragia) and those in the Sanhedrin aligned with him — do come across as almost monolithically malevolent. Caiphas is portrayed as adamant and unmerciful and his influence on Pilate is exaggerated. Conversely, Pontius Pilate (Hristo Naumov Shopov) is almost gentle with Jesus, even offering his prisoner a drink.

This overly sympathetic portrayal of the procurator as a vacillating, conflicted and world-weary backwater bureaucrat, averse to unnecessary roughness and easily coerced by both his Jewish subjects and his conscience-burdened wife, does not mesh with the Pilate of history remembered by the ancient historians as a ruthless and inflexible brute responsible for ordering the execution of hundreds of Jewish rabble-rousers without hesitation.

However the film is abundantly clear that it is the Romans who are Christ's executioners (a fact corroborated by both the Nicene Creed and the writings of Tacitus and Josephus).

The Roman soldiers are unimaginably — even gleefully— sadistic in flaying Jesus to within an inch of his life. "The Passion" is exceedingly graphic in its portrayal of the barbarities of Roman justice.

As depicted, the violence, while explicit and extreme, does not seem an end in itself. It is not the kind of violence made to look exciting, glamorized or without consequences. It attempts to convey the depths of salvific divine love. Nonetheless, viewers' justifiable reaction is to be repelled by such unremitting inhumanity.

In the end, such savagery may be self-defeating in trying to capture the imagination of the everyday moviegoer.

In contrast to Jesus' physical agony is the emotional desolation seen in the figure of the Virgin Mary. The viewer is pierced by the depth of Mary's understanding of Christ's divinity and her sublime acceptance of seeing her son suffer. It tears at one's heart to see Mary struggling to get close to Jesus as he walks through the winding, narrow streets carrying the cross. Seeing him suddenly fall, she is transported, along with the viewers, to Christ's childhood, to a time when she was able to scoop him up when he stumbled. When she finally reaches Jesus, and he is on the ground, crushed by the weight of the cross, it is he who comforts her with his words, "See, mother, I make all things new."

Morgenstern's portrayal of Mary is beautifully rendered, never more so than in the Pieta-like tableau when Christ's body is laid in her arms.

The juxtaposition of the wounded and bleeding body of Christ on the cross with scenes of the Last Supper compellingly underscores how the Eucharist is truly the body and blood of Christ. Other indelible images include a derided Jesus faltering under the weight of the cross intercut with his earlier triumphant entry into Jerusalem and a single raindrop — a tear from heaven — heralding Christ's death.

The power of the cross is also keenly conveyed. Jesus does not recoil from either the horrific scourging at the hands of the Roman soldiers or from carrying the burdensome cross. Instead, he declares his "heart is ready" and embraces the cross as if comforting a fallen sinner. These are truly moving and emotional points in the film.

Cinematically, there are flaws as well as triumphs in Gibson's film, such as a recurring tendency to slip into the horror-genre conventions, including a scene of a guilt-wracked Judas being taunted by little boys whose faces turn into those of grotesque, macabre ghouls. And close-ups of Christ's scarred and mutilated body are truly horrible.

For those coming to the film without a faith perspective it may have little resonance. But for Christians, "The Passion of the Christ" is likely to arouse not only passionate opinions, but hopefully a deeper understanding of the drama of salvation and the magnitude of God's love and forgiveness. It is not about what men did to God, but what God endured for humanity.

Because of gory scenes of scourging, torture and crucifixion, a suicide and some frightening images, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

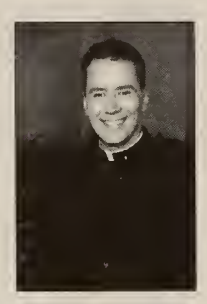
MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST



My friend Jack is a priest in his 60s who enjoys frequent visits to New York City.

Father Jack frequents concert halls and museums like no one else I know. He's also practical. He realizes that driving into Manhattan means finding parking and additional expense. So public transportation is his usual means of getting around.

He told me recently of an experience he had on the New York City subway.

When Father Jack got on, he was one of about a dozen people in the subway car. Shortly thereafter, a man boarded the train who was completely unkempt and talking loudly to himself. He was young man, over six feet tall and, to the folks in the car, he looked intimidating.

Nervous looks were exchanged. At the next station, four passengers got off. At the following station, another five left. In short order, everyone left the car except Father Jack and the young man.

Jack was disturbed, chastising himself for not wearing his clerical collar, which he thought might have given him a little cushion of safety.

The stranger glanced his way. He mumbled a little, growled a little and finally spoke to Jack. "Hey, man, you know what?"

"What?" Father Jack nervously responded.

"Man, you look just like some actor in the movies. What the heck, you know him, but I can't think of his name — in that scary movie about the crazy doctor!"

To which Father Jack responded: "You mean the doctor who loved a little Chianti with his fava beans?"

Father Jack had described the Hannibal Lecter character played by Anthony Hopkins in "Silence of the Lambs."

"Yes, that's the guy. You look exactly like that crazy doc!"

And in that moment, the ice was broken.

A smile crossed the young man's face. A connection was made. And the unknown suddenly became less frightening.

They began to talk about movies. About the theater. About acting. About life and dreams for life. And when Father Jack got off the train, they shook hands and wished each other well. Father Jack recalls thinking as he walked up the subway stairs: "You just never know."

When Father Jack told me about that meeting with the ultimately delightful stranger, he admitted he'd actually had a number of similar experiences when he's made an immediate judgment about what someone was or was not, only to learn differently.

We all make these split-second decisions, filled with certainty that our opinion — or our prejudice — is 100 percent correct. And as often as not, we're absolutely wrong!

Judging people by external appearance is almost always risky. None of us is simply the sum of our looks, but rather the sum of our hearts, our minds and our souls. And those aren't quickly read.

I remember the time I had the chance to meet Mother Teresa.

I was excited for weeks in anticipation. Here was a living saint. Here was a Nobel Peace Prize winner. Here was a world-renowned advocate for the poor. She'd have to be overwhelming, bigger than life. Her insights were sure to be profound.

Yet nothing was what I expected.

She was tiny and cast her eyes down in humility. Her words were unpretentious and completely understandable. She wasn't larger than life at all. But she was something much better, the essence of a life lived well with love for others.

There was nothing complex about her, just goodness plain and simple. She was not what I had expected. But she was everything she should have been.

Father Jack learned that with time, conversation and openness, a person he feared wasn't so fearsome at all. Wouldn't it be great if we could meet everyone the same way? The world would be much more peaceful if we didn't form opinions about people until we knew something of them, of their souls.

Pope says Christians must walk 'arduous path to holiness'

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II said every baptized Christian is called to walk "the arduous path to holiness" in order to be "authentic disciples of Christ."

At the start of the church's penitential season of Lent, the pope presided over a special Ash Wednesday liturgy Feb. 25 in St. Peter's Basilica.

The morning's weekly general audience was replaced by a solemn Liturgy of the Word celebration at the Vatican.

In previous years, the pope traditionally led an evening Ash Wednesday Mass in Rome's Basilica of Santa Sabina after holding a Wednesday morning audience. The Vatican had earlier announced a cutback in the day's events due to the pope's declining health.

But Ash Wednesday morning, the pope looked alert in royal blue vestments as he presided over the liturgy as well as blessed and distributed ashes among some of the faithful.

He also read out most portions of his homily but, as has become more common, skipped several sentences.

"This necessarily entails sacrifice and self-denial ... (and) the willingness to face every difficulty and overcome every obstacle to reach the appointed goal," the homily read.

The penitential act of administering the ashes, his sermon said, "underlines man's awareness of his sinful nature before the majesty and holiness of God."

"At the same time, it also shows one's willingness to accept the Gospel and turn (its message) into concrete action," the homily read.

The pope said the two formulas that accompany the placing of the ashes on the heads of the faithful remind man of his "transient and limited" nature ("For you are dust, and to dust you shall return") as well as issue an urgent appeal to change one's life ("Repent, and believe in the Gospel").

But the pope warned against ostentatious displays of penance during Lent.

"External gestures of penitence have value if they express an interior attitude, if they express the solid will to avoid evil and follow the path of goodness. This is the profound meaning of Christian asceticism," he said.

The pope emphasized the need for a "humble and meek acceptance of the will of God together with constant prayer."

Other typical penitential customs of Christian tradition include "abstinence, fasting, mortification and the giving up of goods," as well as "concrete gestures of welcoming our neighbor," he said.

"Lent represents a more intense time of spiritual training and generous service to our brothers and sisters," said the pope.

Specifically, he urged the faithful to engage in concrete acts of solidarity with needy children this Lenten season.

Referring to this year's Lenten message, "Whoever receives one such child in my name receives me," the pope said, "I wanted to draw attention, in particular, to the difficult conditions in which many of the world's children live."

He said he strongly hoped that "our small brothers and sisters, often abandoned, receive needed care, thanks in part to our solidarity" with them.

He added, "This is one concrete way of carrying out our Lenten resolutions."

During the prayers of the faithful, one petition asked God to look after those hit by violence and ethnic and religious divisions and to help guide nations toward reconciliation and peace.

Another asked that God help people "transform their consumerist behavior" into a lifestyle of "temperance that would allow our brothers and sisters to live with greater dignity."

Priestless parishes in America

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. I understand that more than 3,000 of the nearly 29,300 parishes in the United States are now without a resident priest pastor. In many of them, instead of Sunday Mass there is only a Communion service.

Does our obligation to attend Sunday Mass apply also to these Communion services? (Maryland)

A. What you say about priestless parishes is correct, and it seems that unless something major happens the replacement of Mass with Communion services will become more frequent as time goes by.

Church law on the subject is explicit; the faithful must participate in the Mass on Sundays (Canon 1247). When that is not possible, the obligation does not transfer to a Communion service or any other liturgy.

Of course, worshiping God in some way with our community of faith ought to be an integral part of keeping the Lord's Day holy. Participation in a Liturgy of the Word and Holy Communion together, when the opportunity is provided, is an appropriate way to meet that responsibility.

The ugly side of political campaigns

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

It's already going on, the airing of political campaign ads that say or show ugly things about the opponent. Most disturbing so far was the ad picked up by the TV news commentators that showed the face of Adolph Hitler morphing into the face of President Bush.

The Republican National Committee said the ad came from MoveOn.org. That group issued a disclaimer. (The ad had not been released by MoveOn.org, but it had been submitted to a contest run by that organization. MoveOn is an Internet political group that wants to see Bush defeated in November.) In spite of the disclaimer, the Republican ranting went on about dirty campaign tactics. The anger was understandable, considering the awful implications of linking Bush to Hitler.

But then, surprise. The Democrats pulled out a TV ad that had been effectively used by the Republican campaign of Saxby Chambliss before the 2002 election to discredit Democratic Sen. Max Cleland of Georgia. That offensive ad showed the face of Osama bin Laden morphing into Max Cleland's face. I had not seen that before, and I went apoplectic.

Cleland is a longtime friend, and much more than that he is a Vietnam War veteran who lost both his legs and one arm in battle. How could anyone put out a TV commercial implying this man is not patriotic! Oh yes, Cleland lost that election.

I met Cleland many years ago when he was addressing a rehabilitation agency dedicated to helping people with disabilities gain independence. Cleland, who had been head of the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs under President Carter and was at that time secretary of state in Georgia, was so perfectly qualified for that task.

He talked openly about the day that changed his life — Vietnam, April 8, 1968 — when a grenade explosion left him a triple amputee, but "lucky to be alive."

"Not many people believed that a 25-year-old former Army captain, losing two legs and one arm, could do much after that," he told me.

He spoke honestly of the years after suffering those terrible wounds when he had to pull his life together. He would become so discouraged that he would think "doing the right thing is ending it all."

He realized then that people who have extraordinary setbacks "have to dig down deeper — to discover more courage" than normally is needed.

"Before Vietnam, I thought courage was the absence of fear," he said.

He learned instead, that courage is accepting fear and turning to prayer so that you can now "focus on opportunity in the face of danger to take disabilities and turn them into possibilities, to turn your scars into stars."

Cleland wrote a book about his journey back to life. Its title, "Strong at the Broken Places," is from a line in Ernest Hemingway's "A Farewell to Arms": "The world breaks everyone and afterwards many are strong at the broken places." I remember being awed, even by the fact that Cleland had traveled by himself from Georgia to Connecticut. I vowed not to complain about my periodic bouts with sciatica!

I judge that linking this heroic soldier to the master terrorist was about the lowest a group could sink to. But it has had a good effect on me. I shall be ever on the alert for raw lies and hateful calumny in this election year of 2004. It is sad that we, through our political parties, have slipped into such shame.

A prayer that makes real sense

Surrendering to God's serenity is secret to recovering from darkness

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST

Now that we are nearly two months into 2004, I think we should all pray for the grace to revisit our New Year's resolutions. God can help us to do the things we are not able to do on our own.

It has been a brutally cold winter, and some people have felt a little blue. Cabin fever sets in from being confined indoors too long. But cheer up. When the sun comes out the snow melts. Keep your courage high, and look forward to the warmth of spring.

There is one prayer in particular which has helped a lot of people. Miracles of conversion and transformation come from this prayer, which is called the "Serenity Prayer." You've heard it before I'm sure:

"God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can and the wisdom to know the difference."

Everyone knows that opening, but there is more. Here is the prayer in its entirety:

"God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can and the wisdom to know the difference — living one day at a time, enjoying one moment at a time, accepting hardships as the pathway to peace; taking, as he did, this sinful world as it is, not as I would have it; trusting that he will make all things right if I surrender to his will; that I may be reasonably happy in this life and supremely happy with him forever."

The reference "taking, as he did, this sinful world as it is" refers of course to Jesus Christ. Alcoholics Anonymous has adopted the first part of this prayer as its own, and all the other addiction programs, such as Narcotics Anonymous, Gambler's Anonymous, etc., have done so as well. They keep the concept of a higher power as neutral as possible, since some addicts don't even believe in God.

Somehow they find a higher power for themselves and sidestep the entire theological issue. Each one decides who or what that higher power is.

For the Christian the entire prayer brings to light the great wisdom of the Gospel message. Whether you have ever had a problem with drink or drugs it makes no difference. The prayer speaks to the heart of every human being.

At the heart of it there is the word "surrender." It is something all of us have trouble doing. This prayer presupposes a deep faith in God, who is a caring presence in our lives. We know that he will do for us what we are unable to do for ourselves. Without his grace given day by day, minute by minute, we are powerless.

This is more than faith; it is a profound level of trust. Those who hit bottom realize that all their intelligence, strength and will power is useless before the demon that holds them in bondage. Their lives have become unmanageable, and until they turn their lives and their wills over to a force greater than themselves they remain helpless.

For the Christian this force, this power, is Jesus Christ, who is Lord and who has dominion over the powers of darkness.

The secret of recovery is in the words Jesus taught us, "Thy will be done, not mine."

Embracing reconciliation in its entirety

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

Lent is upon us, urging us to pull ourselves together spiritually. A way to accomplish this is to utilize the sacrament of reconciliation more fully throughout this liturgical season and to reflect on reconciliation in all its dimensions.

Most of us see reconciliation as going to confession. But it can also encompass making retreats and pilgrimages, fasting, almsgiving and doing works of charity.

In a retreat, we set aside a special time to examine our lives and how well we are living according to God's plan for us. A retreat goes hand in hand with the sense that we are endeavoring to get our lives back in order. Retreats create the hope of changing our lives for the better.

Pilgrimages get us into the spirit of holiness by introducing us to holy places and past saints. I never will forget standing before the glass coffin of Blessed Pope John XXIII in St. Peter's Basilica in Rome and thinking: "You tried to imitate a gentle, humble Christ and you so inspired us with your kindness. How I wish I could imitate you."

It was a special pilgrim moment; I felt touched by his sanctity. This same desire for holiness came over me when I visited the tomb of St. Francis in Assisi.

Fasting these days is not easy. Yet it is one of the best means for reducing our selfishness. When we fast, we deprive ourselves for the purpose of living according to a higher order in life, putting aside our needs in order to concern ourselves with those whose basic needs aren't being met.

Works of charity and almsgiving are a wonderful means of repaying God for the blessings he has showered on us. They promote gratitude, keeping us forever in the debt of God and making it difficult to turn our backs on him.

In Pope John Paul II's 1984 apostolic exhortation on reconciliation, we learn reconciliation is the best means of discovering where our hearts really are. The better we understand our internal disposition, the deeper at peace we are within ourselves.

Often subconscious guilt leaves us feeling downhearted, though we never quite know what the reason for this feeling is or take the time to bring it to the surface. The sacrament of reconciliation is an opportunity to surface the cause of our dejection and to put our hearts back in the right place.

When our conscience and God's voice within us are at one, we have a life. May your Lenten season be life — given for you!

St. Pius X Church contributes to spiritual growth of Greensboro Catholics

St. Pius X Church in Greensboro was dedicated in 1981 to accommodate the growing congregation.

GREENSBORO — Although St. Pius X Church was not founded until after the first Catholic parish was established in Greensboro, the two communities share an intertwined history.

The first Catholic church consecrated in the Guilford County seat was St. Agnes Church, dedicated in 1877. Benedictine monks assumed responsibility for the mission in 1888, and by century's end a new church was built and placed under the patronage of St. Benedict.

St. Benedict School was opened in 1926, and by the 1950s a larger facility was needed to accommodate growing numbers of students. Then-Bishop VincentWaters of Raleigh and Msgr. Hugh Dolan, pastor of St. Benedict Church, purchased a 14-acre site on which a school-chapel complex was built, along with a convent and rectory.

The classroom section of the facility opened its doors in March 1955 to 176 students. The school and church were named in honor of the pope canonized in 1955, St. Pius X. Daughters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., staffed the school, and Msgr. Dolan became the first pastor of St. Pius X Church.

Msgr. Dolan remained at St. Pius X Church for 20 years until a reassignment took him to Charlotte. He was succeeded by Msgr. Lawrence Newman, who was known for his dedication to Catholic education.

In 1977, Msgr. William Pharr succeeded Msgr. Newman as pastor of St. Pius X Church. Through Msgr. Pharr's guidance, the parish looked into the possibility of constructing a new church for the growing congregation. The formal request was submitted to then-Bishop Michael J. Begley of Charlotte in December 1978.

When Father George Kloster became pastor of St. Pius X Church in July 1979, planning and fundraising for the new church began. Ground was broken on March 2, 1980, and the new church was dedicated on March 29, 1981. About 400 registered families composed the congregation.

St. Pius X Church soon adopted a southern Peruvian mission that it continues to support. Also during Father Kloster's pastorate was the establishment of Dolan Manor in July 1979, a retirement center for low-income seniors located behind the church.

Father Frank Cintula succeeded Father Kloster in 1988, and Father Cintula's pastorate was followed by the arrival of the Order of Friars Minor Conventual — the Conventual Franciscans — in July 1990. They remained at St. Pius X Church until 1994, when Father Francis Connolly, a diocesan priest, was appointed to lead the parish.

In 1997, St. Pius X School underwent renovation and opened a new wing including classrooms, media center, computer lab, science lab and art room. At the time, the school had 411 students enrolled.

The same year, a new parish center was constructed to help meet the spiritual and social needs of a growing congregation. In 1999, the center was renamed the Kloster Center.

In October 1999, a new building with more than 20 units for Dolan Manor was dedicated. In July 2000, Father Connolly retired and a new permanent rectory was purchased. Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, former priest secretary to Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin, became and still serves as pastor of St. Pius X Church.

In August 2000, a new gym/athletic complex was opened. The center was dedicated in November 2000 and named the Francis T. Connolly Athletic Center, in honor of the former pastor.

Since Msgr. Marcaccio's arrival, endowments for the parish and school were established and now total more than $750,000, and a new rectory was purchased.

In 2002, the Korean Catholic community of the Triad began worshiping at St. Pius X Church.

Today, St. Pius X Church consists of more than 1,000 households that actively embrace stewardship as a way of life through approximately 70 established ministries. Planning is under way for the fundraising and construction of a columbarium. Jubilee celebration plans are also in the works for the 50th anniversary of St. Pius X School in 2005.

CHARLOTTE — "The Diocese of Charlotte is gifted with the presence of many seniors who have an abundance of knowledge, talent and expertise to offer to ministry," said Sandra Breakfield, director of diocesan Elder Ministry. "Likewise, they benefit greatly from a ministry geared toward them."

According to Breakfield, the objective of Elder Ministry, a division of Catholic Social Services which is funded primarily by the Diocesan Support Appeal, is to encourage seniors to continue their intellectual, social and spiritual development throughout their lives.

The ministry utilizes a holistic approach that addresses each individual as a whole person and values each individual as a unique being.

The ministry also strives to enhance the well-being, positive quality of life and continued independence of senior adults. This is accomplished through facilitating the development of parish-based support systems and through connecting seniors with community resources.

House passes Unborn Victims of Violence Act

GOVERNMENT ENABLED TO RECOGNIZE UNBORN CHILDREN AS VICTIMS

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The U.S. bishops' pro-life spokeswoman called House passage of the Unborn Victims of Violence Act Feb. 26 "a vote for justice for women and their children."

Under the measure, approved in a 254-163 vote, those who injure or kill a pregnant woman and her unborn child could be charged with two separate crimes by federal prosecutors.

"Abortion activists recoil from any acknowledgment of a child's existence before birth," said Cathy Cleaver Ruse, director of planning and information for the Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"But their arguments are as ridiculous as they are offensive," she said in a statement. "This legislation explicitly exempts abortion."

Fat Tuesday at St. Ann School

CHARLOTTE — The Mardi Gras spirit filled St. Ann School.

First-graders treated the school to its annual Mardi Gras parade Feb. 24. Students and faculty lined corridors as first-graders pulled their floats to New Orleans jazz music playing over intercom speakers.

The first-grade classes made their floats and masks for the parade. Before it began, first-graders ate their king cakes — students who found a baby Jesus inside got to wear the crowns and lead the parade.

This year, first-graders Isabelle Martella and Aiden Robidoux led the parade.

Mardi Gras, French for "Fat Tuesday," refers to the Tuesday before Ash Wednesday and to the parades and other festivities that take place during the days preceding Lent.

HANDFUL OF FUN

Brother Ed Sheehy created this wide-eyed furry creature for a retreat session with eighth-grade students. The 70-year-old Jesuit of Jersey City, N.J., has made puppets for more than 30 years and travels nationally and internationally putting on shows for children in churches, hospitals and schools.

Jesuit brother creates puppets that teach, entertain around world

JERSEY CITY, N.J. (CNS) — In Brother Ed Sheehy's office, a fiddler plays on the roof, a graceful rollerblader glides by and a trapeze artist performs to the tune of "Stars and Stripes Forever."

There's also a young Asian woman in traditional dress who is juggling a ball on her head as Blessed Mother Teresa counts her rosary beads.

These are just a few of the puppets Brother Sheehy has created over the years.

Once a baker of bread, shaping loaves, he now shapes wood and cloth into puppets that teach and entertain around the world, from Guyana to Jersey City.

"I haven't baked in 40 years," said Brother Sheehy, 70, whose hands come fully alive when they are animating a Ukrainian hand puppet or lovingly working the strings of a handcrafted marionette.

He saw his first puppet show in 1970; today, he has dozens of string, rod and hand puppets that take up all of his time.

"The rest of my life, I'm never going to have enough puppets," he said.

After cooking and coaching at schools in New York, he taught arts and crafts to children.

Four years ago, he moved to St. Peter's Prep School in Jersey City and a ground-floor studio crammed full of stuff: a sewing machine, traveling trunks, Styrofoam balls that will one day be marionette heads, swatches of fabric to make costumes, books on puppets and dolls.

There, and in places like Central Park where he can observe people, Brother Sheehy comes up with his ideas.

His puppets move like people move — walking, taking a rest, breathing, doing double takes, hiking up their pant legs before sitting.

"These are the things that make a puppet real," Brother Sheehy said.

The puppets have been around the world with Brother Sheehy, to Micronesia, Guyana, Indonesia and Nigeria, where they put on shows for local audiences. The trips have afforded him a unique chance not only to perform his ministry in other cultures, but also to learn about their puppetry traditions.

"It's like Broadway would come into this little village. It's quite an experience. They tell me people will be talking about this for months," said Brother Sheehy.

He visits schools, nursing homes and retired religious. Once a blind man came to a puppet show; Brother Sheehy let him handle all the puppets afterward.

"This is me, this is what I do and these are my puppets. It's not so much wood and glue anymore," he said.

Muslim sues pope, cardinals for alleged remarks against Islam

ROME (CNS) — An Italian Muslim activist filed a civil suit against Pope John Paul II and two cardinals, claiming they have shown contempt for Islam in violation of Italian law.

Adel Smith, president of the Muslim Union of Italy, filed his suit in the town of Aquila Feb. 28. Smith's suit asked for a judge to condemn the defendants' allegedly anti-Islamic comments, but did not ask for any monetary damages.

The Vatican press office had no comment on the suit.

The Muslim activist, who in October filed an unsuccessful lawsuit to have crucifixes removed from public school classrooms, cited comments in Pope John Paul's 1994 book, "Crossing the Threshold of Hope," as an example of the pope's defamation of Islam.

Vittorio Messori, the journalist who worked on the book with the pope, also was named in the suit.

In the book, Pope John Paul said, "Whoever knows the Old and New Testaments and then reads the Quran clearly sees the process by which it completely reduces divine revelation. It is impossible not to note the movement away from what God said about himself."

The God revealed in Islam, the pope said, is "ultimately a God outside of the world, a God who is only majesty, never Emmanuel, God-with-us."

Smith's suit also named Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, prefect of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, and retired Cardinal Giacomo Biffi of Bologna, Italy, for allegedly making anti-Islam comments.

Pope says Catholic lawmakers must defend sanctity of life, marriage

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Lawmakers, especially if they are Catholic, must not advance measures that go against the basic values of life and marriage between a man and a woman, Pope John Paul II said.

"It is part of the church's mission to not give up inviting all men and women of good will to build a society based upon fundamental and irrevocable values" that respect human dignity, the pope said Feb 28.

"Legislators, especially Catholic legislators, cannot help draw up or pass laws that are contrary to the basic and essential norms that regulate moral life," the pope said.

He said "a national and world order that is appropriate for the human being" respects and protects every person's right to life, starting "from the moment of conception to one's natural end."

"No one can claim for himself the power of violating this right," he said.

He defined marriage as "the union between a man and a woman ... open to life" and "another pillar of society" with specific rights and duties that needed safeguarding.

The pope said public authorities must instead protect and favor the family based upon the marriage of a man and a woman "if they (authorities) are to promote a social development that is just, stable and promising."

Single and married adults are invited for an evening of contemporary Christian music, food and fellowship. For more information, call Kathy Bartlett at (704) 400-2213.

Vatican says by its count Pope John Paul surpasses Leo XIII March 14

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As Pope John Paul II approached the mark of having the third-longest pontificate in history, the Vatican press office moved into the numbers game.

Most people count pontificate length in total number of years, months and days. In that case, the pope would surpass Pope Leo XIII on March 17, after reigning for 25 years, five months and two days.

But the press office said that if calculated in total number of days served since election — taking into account the extra day in leap years and the different number of days in each month — Pope John Paul would move into third place three days earlier, on March 14.

It gets even more complicated if pontificate length is computed from the date of ceremonial inauguration, once called coronation, instead of election. It was 11 days before Pope Leo XIII celebrated his coronation Mass, while Pope John Paul celebrated his inaugural Mass only six days after election.

So if tallied this way, the pope would pick up another five days on Pope Leo and gain third place even earlier, on March 9.

Whichever method is used, Pope John Paul is nudging Pope Leo XIII out of third place.

Or is he? St. Peter's pontificate is traditionally considered the longest in history, but no one knows exactly how long he led the church. In view of that, some historians do not even place St. Peter on their "longest pontificate" list.

In modern times, the longest pontificate was that of Blessed Pope Pius IX, who served for more than 31 years.

The Vatican press office's math concluded: Pope Leo died July 20, 1903, which was 9,269 days after the March 3, 1878, ceremonial inauguration of his pontificate and 9,280 days after his Feb. 20, 1878, election.

Pope John Paul was elected Oct. 16, 1978, and solemnly began his pontificate Oct. 22, 1978. March 9 marks 9,270 days after the inauguration of his pontificate and March 14 marks 9,281 days after his election.

St. Gabriel School selects new student prayer card

CHARLOTTE — As part of Catholic Schools Week celebrations, St. Gabriel School's Faith Advisory Committee sponsored the third annual Prayer and Art exhibition Jan. 26-30.

All students wrote prayers and created works of art to represent St. Gabriel School. In the process, students considered their personal understanding of what it means to be Catholic and what St. Gabriel School means to them.

From the selections, one prayer and one work of art were selected to be the symbol of the school for 2004. A prayer card for all students and faculty members was made from the chosen entries.

The new St. Gabriel School prayer cards were blessed and distributed after the Ash Wednesday Mass Feb. 25, celebrated with all the students in preparation for Lent.

The winners of the St. Gabriel School contest were second-grader Moira Shepard for artwork and fifth-grader Michaela Reinhart for the prayer:

"O Shepherd, Holy One:

Thank you for letting us, through our years at school, join together in thanks and praise for all of the blessings You have given us.

Throughout many years of teachings from Your house, we've learned that not just adults can be teachers, but the smallest child, can be a teacher.

And so, now we ask, in giving hearts, that we may always follow You, forever and ever. Amen."

Good children come from good parents

Parenting authority imparts advice at high school

BY SUSAN DEGUZMAN
CORRESPONDENT

KERNERSVILLE — Children imitate their parents, according to John Rosemond.

Rosemond, a family psychologist, author and syndicated columnist, spoke about raising children to more than 350 parents at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School Feb. 19.

Entitled "Assuming the Power of Parenthood," Rosemond's presentation addressed childrearing in today's society and the need for reorganizing the focus of the family.

"I know I am going to insult some of you," he admitted at the start of his lecture.

Rosemond placed blame on mental health professionals, accusing them of diagnosing children with an array of behavioral disorders based upon theories that lack appropriate evidence.

"Today's mother has been seduced by 'psychobabble' when it comes to the rearing of children," said Rosemond.

Parents carry a "terrible burden" today — if their children misbehave, society considers it the parents' faults.

This is unlike society of long ago, he said.

Marriage was the focus of the family for thousands of years throughout Western culture, and even back to the days of Sarah and Abraham, said Rosemond.

John Rosemond speaks to more than 350 parents about raising children at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School Feb. 19.

But in the 1960s, he explained, American culture took a turn against the establishment. From this turn, a progressive attitude was born where new ideas were better than old ideas and "Grandma's ideas were no longer desirable," he said.

Part of this attitude resulted in a shift to a child-centered family, which Rosemond finds is in direct contrast to this natural order of family life.

Rosemond recalled his parochial school years in the 1950s, when teachers did not have to deal with the current disciplinary problems. Children who misbehaved got punished at school, and maybe again at home.

Today, he said, parents try to figure out reasons for their children's misbehavior and let children explain their way out of punishment. This makes disciplining children confusing, difficult and ineffective.

Rosemond mapped out three stages of significant child-parent relationships.

The first stage is from birth through 2 years of age, the second is from 2 to 13 years old, and the last is from 13 to adulthood. In each of these stages, the parent-child role is different.

Rosemond believes that in our modern American society, many mothers are stuck in the first stage of parenting to children who have well outgrown it. Mothers feel a burden of responsibility and servitude from societal pressures to micromanage the lives of their children, not even realizing it is unnecessary and at the expense of themselves and their marital lives.

"If parents take good care of their marriages, they provide an inordinate amount of security to their children," said Rosemond.

He also explained that children need to see parents model marital life if they are to achieve it themselves.

One of Rosemond's 10 "Bill of Rights for Children" is: "Children have the right to find out early in their lives that their parents don't exist to make them happy, but to offer them the opportunity to learn the skills they — children — will need eventually to make themselves happy."

Rosemond is also the director for the Center for Affirmative Parenting located in Gastonia. He gives more than 200 presentations nationwide per year.

His books include "Parent Power," "Teen-Proofing," "Because I Said So," "A Family of Value," "Making the Terrible Twos Terrific!" and "Ending the Homework Hassle."

His visit to Bishop McGuinness was sponsored by the parent teacher organizations and five Triad-area Catholic schools — Blessed Sacrament School, Immaculate Heart of Mary School, Our Lady of Mercy School, Saint Pius X School, Our Lady of Grace School and Saint Leo the Great School.

Allegation cause of priest's removal

Father Patrick Leonard accused of abuse in other diocese

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Parishioners of St. John Neumann Church recently learned why their former parochial vicar was removed from service.

A letter from the Order of St. Augustine's provincial office read at Masses Feb. 28-29 revealed that an allegation of sexual abuse involving a minor against Augustinian Father Patrick Leonard dictated his removal from the parish in September 2003.

"Father Leonard left St. John's for immediate evaluation and treatment following an allegation that was brought to the attention of our Augustinian provincial last fall concerning Father Pat's ministry many years ago in another diocese," stated the letter.

Father Leonard was a priest in good standing when he came to the Diocese of Charlotte in 1998. No allegations of any wrongdoing have been made against him during his service to the diocese.

"While the matter was under investigation, it was the judgment of our province not to disclose any information publicly that was false or potentially harmful to persons involved," said the letter. "Our struggle in these matters is to preserve the values of truth and safety with appropriate confidentiality."

Reflecting the face of Christ

ELIZABETH MINISTRY OFFERS SUPPORT TO GRIEVING PARENTS

BY MARY MARSHALL
CORRESPONDENT

CHARLOTTE — Supporting mothers who have experienced a miscarriage, stillbirth or newborn death is a faith-strengthening experience for Tracy Webb.

"As women, we bring our tears and grief to each other and, through simple acts of communication, reveal the loving presence of God," said Webb, coordinator of the Elizabeth Ministry at St. Matthew Church.

Referring to the biblical story of Mary visiting Elizabeth, Webb said, "We don't know a lot about how these women ministered to each other during their pregnancies, but we do know that they offered one another support."

Support, said Webb, is what Elizabeth Ministry at St. Matthew Church offers to those who have experienced perinatal complications — the loss of a child through miscarriage, stillbirth or newborn death.

"Peer support ministry is a lovely way for us to be the face of Christ for one another," said Webb. "Those whom have experienced loss suffer. They've had a tragic experience and have a need to bring some meaning to it."

"Through the various support levels of outward participation, e-mail correspondence or phone calls, we reiterate that someone remembers, someone cares," she said. "That's huge in itself."

Rita Brennan (back), Kim Walters, Tracy Webb and Theresa Moritz are Charlotte-area parishioners involved in Elizabeth Ministry.

Webb became active in the ministry when she had a miscarriage 10 years ago while living in Florida. In 2002, Webb, whose family by then had moved to Charlotte, had another miscarriage.

"I felt called to begin the ministry here," said Webb. "I contacted Mercy Sister Jeanne Marie Kienast, pastoral associate, and discovered that in our large parish, many families with perinatal losses were searching for the same peer support that exists in the Bereavement Ministry."

Elizabeth Ministry is under the umbrella of the Bereavement Ministry at St. Matthew.

"No matter where you are in your loss journey, Elizabeth Ministry peers meet your need and hold your hand as together you walk with Jesus," said Rita Brennan, co-coordinator of the parish Bereavement Ministry.

When Theresa Moritz, a parishioner and now a peer minister at St. Matthew Church, had a miscarriage she turned to the ministry.

"The ministers recognized my loss — that it was a part of me," said Moritz. "It's a powerful thing to be with people who truly understand."

Kim Walters is currently training to be a minister. A member of St. Patrick Cathedral, she was referred to the Elizabeth Ministry at St. Matthew Church following her second miscarriage.

"It's a very lonely feeling when you lose something you wanted so badly," said Walters. "Through the Elizabeth Ministry, I realized God was opening his arms to help me."

Ministers attend the same training sessions required for bereavement ministers. In addition, Webb conducts an additional class specifically relating to the Elizabeth Ministry.

Eight women currently serve as ministers at St. Matthew Church. Sandy Buck is coordinator of the newly formed ministry at St. Mark Church in Huntersville.

Since St. Matthew Church's ministry began in October 2002, they have reached out to nearly 30 women who have suffered losses. To meet the needs of the parish, the ministry recently expanded to include infertility and perinatal and postpartum complications.

"As I serve others, I become lifted, renewed and more with God," said Webb.

The ministers agree that through the process of ministering, they receive more than they give.

Elizabeth Ministry's roots trace back to St. Bernard Church in Appleton, Wis., and its founders Bruce and Jeannie Hannemann, and the late Capuchin Father Kurt Gessner. Bishop Robert Morneau, auxiliary bishop of the Diocese of Green Bay, Wis., now serves as the spiritual advisor.

The international movement was designed to support women and their families during the joys, trials and sorrows of the childbearing years.

An informal meeting is planned at St. Matthew Church's Ministry Building at 7 p.m. on April 1. Parents with a perinatal loss will have the opportunity to include their child's name in the "Book of the Innocent."

CAMP TIMBERLAKE for boys

A choir sings during a memorial service for Laci Peterson at the First Baptist Church in Modesto, Calif., May 4. Peterson was eight months pregnant at the time of her death, and her husband, Scott, has been charged with double homicide. The Unborn Victims of Violence Act, proposed legislation to recognize unborn children as legal victims of violence, will be renamed Laci and Conner's Law.

Victims of Violence Act

the House rejected an alternative measure that would have increased penalties for those who attacked a pregnant woman but would not have recognized her unborn child as a victim of the attack as well.

The approved measure would enable the federal government to recognize that, when a pregnant woman is assaulted or killed in the commission of federal crimes of violence — such as a kidnapping across state lines or an attack that takes place on federal property — and her unborn child is harmed or killed as a result, the crime has two victims — the woman and her child.

"The little unborn child is intrinsically precious and valuable and deserving of standing in the law and protection," said Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., in urging passage of the bill.

Those who supported the legislation said it reflected the opinion of the majority of Americans, while opponents expressed concern that it would erode current abortion laws because it gives victim rights to unborn children. The legislation must now be taken up by the Senate.

In a letter sent to Congress Feb. 19, Baltimore Cardinal William H. Keeler urged lawmakers to approve the Unborn Victims of Violence Act as drafted and to reject any substitute that would nullify the intent of the measure.

The cardinal, who is chairman of the U.S. bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, also noted that legislation explicitly excludes abortion and thus it was "all the more disappointing that some insist the bill should nonetheless be defeated to somehow preserve a 'right' to abortion."

"This bill simply ensures that both mother and child are protected from violent assault and murder," the cardinal wrote.

He had warned that opponents of the legislation might "try to nullify it by offering substitute language" that would recognize only the harm done to the woman but not to her child. But he called this type of "single-victim approach" unfair to mothers and families who grieve the loss of their unborn children.

The bill has been dubbed "Laci and Conner's Law" after California murder victims Laci Peterson and her unborn son, Conner, who disappeared in 2002 and were later found dead. Laci's husband, Scott, is charged with the murders.

The cardinal referred to Laci Peterson in his letter, saying: "As Sharon Rocha, mother of Laci Peterson and grandmother of Conner, reminds us: 'There were two bodies that washed up in San Francisco Bay, and the law should recognize that reality.'"

The bill, sponsored in the Senate by Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio, has 25 co-sponsors. The House version was sponsored by Rep. Melissa Hart, R-Pa., with 136 co-sponsors.

About 30 states have laws offering some form of protection to unborn victims in crimes against pregnant women.

The House previously passed such a bill twice, in 1999 and 2001, but the Senate took no action either time.

"We encourage people in the Diocese of Charlotte to contact our two U.S. Senators by fax, e-mail or phone," said Maggi Nadol, director of the diocesan Respect Life office.

Nadol suggested calling the Capitol's switchboard at (202) 224-3121 and leaving the following message:

"Please vote for the Unborn Victims of Violence Act, S.1019, and oppose any single-victim substitute amendment."

Nadol said people may also want to visit the National Committee for a Human Life Amendment's Web site for a list of co-sponsors at http://nchla.org/uvva.htm.

Bishops, pro-lifers oppose N.J. stem-cell research budget proposal

METUCHEN, N.J. (CNS) — If New Jersey Gov. James E. McGreevey's $6.5 million budget proposal to fund a stem-cell institute is approved, New Jersey will become the first state to use taxpayer money for this type of research.

News of the prospective stem-cell center was met with strong opposition from the New Jersey Catholic bishops and pro-life organizations. The governor unveiled his budget Feb. 24.

In a statement from the New Jersey Catholic Conference, the bishops reiterated their position that embryonic stem-cell research violates the sanctity of human life.

They warned that publicly funded research poses profound moral questions, and urged individuals to contact McGreevey and their legislative representatives and let them know that they oppose the use of their tax dollars to pay for research that destroys human life.

Marie Tasy, public and legislative affairs director for New Jersey Right to Life, called the governor's budget proposal "unconscionable."

"It is bad enough that Governor McGreevey sold out humanity and ignored the will of the people to do the bidding of the biotech industry, he is now trying to force this immoral research down the throats of the taxpayers," she said. "Taxpayers should not be forced to fund this radical ... grisly experimentation on human beings."

McGreevey has been outspoken in his efforts to promote embryonic stem-cell research in New Jersey since a bill authorizing it was signed into law in January. On Feb. 13, the governor sent a letter to the state's Commissioner of Health and Senior Services, requesting that he help encourage the research.

Ministering to elders

Father Kieran Nielsen speaks to senior Catholics at the Fall Day of Reflection in October 2003. The annual event provides seniors an opportunity to gather and deepen their faith.

Studies have shown that faith, love and happiness are important factors in living a longer, more fulfilling life.

According to the Web site SeniorWorld Online, University of California-Berkeley scientists studied 8,000 men and women and found death rates were two to three times lower for those who had social ties, such as healthy relationships and deep religious beliefs.

Elder Ministry sponsors yearly events including the Spring Fling and Fall Day of Reflection, which provide an opportunity for elders to gather for entertainment, camaraderie, education and spiritual enrichment. An annual health fair highlights safety and health issues unique to senior citizens.

The Spring Fling combines recreational and well-being activities. In addition to activities such as bingo and arts and crafts, participants can have their blood pressure checked or attend a demonstration of Healing Touch therapy, a group of non-invasive techniques that certified practitioners use to promote self-healing by their patients.

"Spring Fling is like a homecoming or a family reunion for many of the seniors, and it is a day where everyone can forget the demands of life and join others in the spirit of oneness and friendship," said Breakfield.

Unlike the games and enrichment activities offered at Spring Fling, the Senior Fall Day of Reflection is a time for seniors to come together to explore and challenge their faith, Breakfield said.

"Seniors are very spiritually grounded," she said. "They need, and want, a special day to increase their faith."

Elder Ministry also collaborates with parishes and vicariates through a series of classes and workshops to address the concerns associated with aging. Although many churches already have ministries established for seniors, Elder Ministry helps them by partnering parishes in order to enhance their programs.

Elder Ministry has established training models for a variety of services including: information and referrals, respite volunteers, "friendly visitors," errands and shopping, transportation, reading, telephone reassurance, chore service and housekeeping, handyperson and yard work, correspondence and financial tasks, and pastoral care training.

Recognizing that each individual is unique with specific needs, interests, abilities and life experiences is a key to successfully ministering to seniors, Breakfield said.

"We must have respect and dignity for those we serve," she said. "We need to realize that each person has the right to make decisions about his or her personal future."

According to Breakfield, Elder Ministry is blessed with volunteers who have many talents and gifts and who are willing to share these through support, training and more.

"Seniors are the backbone of our ministry," said Breakfield. "This growing population is full of individuals whom we look to for insight and wisdom."

The Jesuits: corporate heroes?

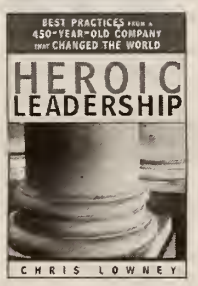
REVIEWED BY MICHELLE MARTIN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When St. Ignatius Loyola and his nine companions decided to formally organize themselves into a religious order, they called themselves the "Compania Jesus." Still, Loyola and the other founders of the Jesuits hardly saw themselves as an example of a business enterprise. Chris Lowney does.

Lowney spent seven years in the Jesuit novitiate in New York, leaving at age 25 to embark on a career in investment banking at J.P. Morgan. What he found in 16 years in the banking world was that many of the leadership principles and skills inculcated in Jesuit recruits translated well to the modern business environment. He makes his case in "Heroic Leadership: Best Practices From a 450-Year-Old Company That Changed the World."



"Heroic Leadership: Best Practices From a 450-Year-Old Company That Changed the World," by Chris Lowney. Loyola Press (Chicago, 2003). 330 pp., $24.95.

Lowney said the thought first occurred to him when Morgan started doing "360-degree feedback," meaning employees would have their performance evaluated not only by their supervisors, but also by their peers and those they supervised.

"I had this strong feeling of deja vu," said Lowney, who has since left Morgan to work with the Catholic Medical Mission Board in New York. "When we did it at Morgan, we rightly talked about ourselves being way ahead of the curve. But it was something I had already done with the Jesuits."

Lowney left the Jesuits but ended up in Asia — following in the footsteps of Jesuit missionaries — for J.P. Morgan, opening offices in Japan and Singapore. That led him to wonder whether St. Ignatius and other early Jesuits would have any other valuable insights for 21st-century business leaders.

After all, they lived and worked in a rapidly changing environment, not so different from today's. The invention of the printing press and the sudden availability of books and other written material created an information revolution similar to the one engendered by the recent development of instant, worldwide electronic communication, and established powers, such as the Catholic Church, found themselves challenges in ways they never imagined.

Loyola responded by forming a new kind of religious order: one that was mobile and adaptable, not tied to monastic lands or schedules, one that called for top-down control but individual initiative, where each individual member was encouraged to reach beyond his own attitudes and abilities to find the best way of fulfilling the Jesuit mission of "helping souls."

Loyola did it, Lowney writes, by establishing four core leadership values: self-awareness, ingenuity, love and heroism. Self-awareness was created by the mandatory Spiritual Exercises, which also taught recruits to look for novel solutions and to see the world with eyes of love. With those attitudes, heroic action followed: evangelizing in Asia, exploring uncharted territory around the world, and establishing the largest, most respected network of secondary schools in Europe over the course of a generation.

As examples, Lowney uses figures from early Jesuit history, from Loyola and St. Francis Xavier to those who aren't so well known, such as Matteo Ricci and Benedetto de Goes.

The book deliberately avoids exploring the role of God in all this, but Lowney readily admits that readers who take it seriously might find themselves contemplating the divine.

"When I talk about self-awareness, I talk about knowing who you are, what your core values are, how you relate to the world," he said. "For a religious person, that's going to lead right to God. For a shallow person, that's going to lead to trouble, because they won't know what they stand for."

And, Lowney said, he wouldn't be surprised if some people who don't consider themselves religious read the book and find themselves thinking about what inspired the Jesuits.

As for Lowney's Jesuit friends, he hopes they learn something also.

"It might give them a new perspective," he said. "Sometimes you have to be outside of something to look at it a new way."

Even St. Ignatius as a management guru?

"I was surprised," Lowney said, "when I started researching, at his enlightened attitude toward delegation. You see it in his letters: 'You are there and you will know best what is to be done and I will support your decision.' That's the kind of delegating people talk about now."

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

There's a saying that goes, "Life is what happens when you're making other plans."

I certainly have experienced the truth of that statement, as have several of my friends and acquaintances. Loved ones get cancer and die, cars get demolished in traffic accidents, children move away to college, jobs are gained and lost again, and possessions are stolen — and these just in my own family in the past year! Few of those events were anticipated, much less planned.

Thus, I can relate somewhat to the experience of Moses in the Exodus passage, for he was apparently minding his own business, watching his father-in-law's sheep, enjoying the scenery of Mt. Horeb when he encountered God speaking in a burning shrub.

It was enough of a shock to make him leave the family business of sheepherding and pursue the God business of bearing messages of liberation to his people while witnessing the unfolding of events he could not have predicted.

It is one thing to recognize a "theophany," or "God-appearance," in a mysteriously blazing bush — but quite another to discern God's message in the unanticipated events of our lives. There is a human tendency to view such events, especially the difficult ones that get our lives off track, as punishment rather than preparation for a higher calling.

Yet, the other Scripture readings this Sunday remind us of the enormity of God's love, mercy and patience. Faith gives one the ability to recognize in unexpected trials the cultivation that can break up the hardened soil of our hearts and bring us to fruitfulness.

The fire of God's love, experienced through suffering, may purify, but it does not consume.

Questions:

What unexpected difficulty has thrown your life off track recently? How have such experiences taught you about the depth of God's love for you?

'Patrick' movie portrays historical tale

BY GERRI PARE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK (CNS) — A saint who came back to the land where he had been enslaved, intent on spreading the Christian message of love andforgiveness, is recalled in docudrama style in "Patrick," to be shown Sunday, March 14, 10-11 p.m. EST on cable's Hallmark Channel.

The program corrects some common misconceptions: that Patrick was Irish and he drove the snakes out of Ireland (where they don't exist). Instead, he was born in Britain as the pampered, far-from-faith-filled son of a Roman nobleman. In his teens, his plush lifestyle and family were torn from him when slave traders kidnapped him and sold him into slavery to an Irish chieftain.

Serving as a shepherd, the distraught youth gradually turned to prayer and after six years made a daring escape and returned home. But memories haunted him and Patrick felt God wanted him to preach the Good News in pagan Ireland. Ordained to the priesthood, he sailed back to Ireland in 432 A.D. and in essence converted the entire populace. That this was accomplished without resorting to violence is a historical rarity.

Liam Neeson narrates the story of Patrick, mostly using the saint's own written words, which are spoken by Gabriel Byrne. Emmy-winning filmmaker Pamela Wagner weds a soulful Celtic music track to striking visuals of the Irish coastline and rugged landscapes. Violent images are discreetly blurred, making the program entirely family-friendly.

The viewer sees teen slave Patrick shivering on a barren hillside and can relate to his hopelessness and understand how he turned in his despair to God's mercy. Additional commentary to fill in historical context is provided by scholars and authors such as Frank McCourt. The program also addresses how the Irish monasteries Patrick founded were instrumental in preserving Western civilization's literary traditions through the Dark Ages.

A visually polished biography, it captures how the unfortunate youth matured spiritually and was able to return to Ireland not with vengeance in his heart but with a spirit of forgiveness and a desire to share God's abundant love.

Ben Stiller and Owen Wilson star in the lame comedy "Starsky & Hutch."

'Starsky & Hutch' catch familiar, tired script

BY DAVID DICERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Geographically situated amid rain-deprived southern California, Hollywood is no stranger to drought; it is, after all, a glorified desert.

Tinseltown's paucity of precipitation is mirrored by a creative drought of sorts, resulting in its trend of churning out pointless movies derived from old TV shows. In the past year alone there were supersized film versions of such TV series as "Charlie's Angels" and "I Spy."

The most recent victim of a dehydrated muse is Todd Phillips, the director and co-writer of "Starsky & Hutch" (Warner Bros.), a relentlessly unfunny comedy based on the 1970s' buddy-cop drama of the same name. Apparently, like barrels, recycling bins also have bottoms, which is where he must have found his script.

Set in the fictitious crime-ridden metropolis of Bay City, the film, as in the TV series, centers on two maverick cops: Brillo-haired Det. David Starsky (Ben Stiller), a short-fused bulldog with a badge, and his tow-headed partner Ken "Hutch" Hutchinson (Owen Wilson), a laid-back ladies' man.

Starsky's overzealous, run-through-a-brick-wall-to-catch-a-perp mentality has made him burn through partners faster than his flashy red Ford Gran Torino burns through tire treads. On the other hand, Hutch, who marches to his own Miranda Code, just wants to have fun and, unlike anger-management candidate Starsky, is not above fraternizing with shady characters like the pimpishly flamboyant informant Huggy Bear (Snoop Dogg).

This clash of personalities sets up the framework for much of what unfolds, making their investigation of crime kingpin Reese Feldman (Vince Vaughn), who has figured out a way to make cocaine undetectable to drug-sniffing dogs, a pro forma plot device.

While, in fairness, Stiller and Wilson work well together and generate some laughs (rare and guilty though they are), their chemistry does little to distract viewers from the inanity of the script. Full of forced humor and canned camp, the film's comedy gets stuck in a holding pattern of silly sight gags that never advance past spoofing '70s ambience. Most of the visual punch lines revolve around lampooning the era's comical coifs and retro couture.

Of course, there isn't much space for anything else since the filmmaker has crammed seemingly every song ever recorded that decade into the soundtrack, with just enough room left over for the prerequisite riffs of cheesy guitar wah-wah pedal music particular to shows of that period. Even the goofy outtakes during the closing credits are redundant; the whole film plays like one big blooper.

Fans of the 1975-79 series may not find much to applaud beyond the movie's faithful replication of Starsky's ubiquitous Torino and a late-in-the-game cameo by the original duo (David Soul and Paul Michael Glaser).

Part of the problem is Phillips never really decides what film he is making, vacillating awkwardly between outright parody and homage. However, with films like "Road Trip" (2000) and "Old School" (2003) under his directorial belt, it should come as no surprise that his ode to disco detective work has much the same sophomoric sleaziness as his previous forays into crudeville, including scenes involving perverted inmates (Will Ferrell), and oversexed cheerleaders (Carmen Electra and Amy Smart). The flick's lighthearted use of cocaine and the lax mores of the era as contrivances of comedy are also unwelcome.

In one of the film's lamer moments, Stiller and Wilson perform as mimes at a bat mitzvah for Feldman's daughter. Prompted by the boredom on the children's faces, the gangster briskly ushers them offstage — if only he could have as quickly ushered the whole movie off the screen.

Due to sexual situations involving partial nudity and same-sex kissing, recurring drug content, some violence and much crude language and humor, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is L — limited adult audience, films whose problematic content many adults would find troubling. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

'A wonderfully effective missioner'

Glenmary Father Tom Field dies at 64

CINCINNATI — Glenmary Father Tom Field, who served in the Diocese of Charlotte in the early 1990s, died Feb. 27, 2004 in Cincinnati. The native of Minneapolis, Minn., died following surgery on Feb. 23. He suffered from Parkinson's disease.

A Mass of Christian burial was celebrated at St. Mathias Church in Cincinnati March 4, with internment at Gate of Heaven Cemetery.

A member of the Cincinnati-based Glenmary Home Missioners for 29 years, Father Field entered Glenmary in 1974. His early assignments following his 1978 ordination included parishes in Alabama and Tennessee.

Glenmary Father Tom Field

In 1991, he assumed the pastorate of St. Joseph Church in Bryson City, and in 1992, the church's mission, Our Lady of Guadalupe, in Cherokee.

Over the next eight years, Father Field became well-known for his community involvement. Although he never liked to discuss his involvement, he proudly talked of the parish's involvement in a center for victims of domestic violence, Meals on Wheels, the local food pantry and many other outreach programs.

"Father Tom's personality and demeanor put people at ease," said Glenmary Father Dan Dorsey, president of Glenmary and a classmate of Father Field. "He had a wonderful gift of making people feel welcome in his presence, which made him a wonderfully effective missioner, especially to those with special needs."

Father Field's community involvement led to a death threat from the Ku Klux Klan while he served in Alabama.

After intervening to stop a Klansman from abusing his wife, Father Field received a note from the Klan saying they were going to shoot him.

"I backed off for a couple of days," said Father Field in 2000. "But then I said, 'I'm not going to let them scare me' and I went about my work."

A year later, he received another note saying the Klan had been observing him, and they thought he was doing OK. With his wry humor, Father Field said, "Gee, if the Klan likes me, I must be doing something wrong."

Those to whom he ministered would strongly disagree. To them, Father Field had a heart as large as the rural countryside he loved and in which he ministered.

When the advance of Parkinson's disease meant he could no longer serve as a mission pastor, in 2000 he moved to Glenmary's mission in Madisonville, Tenn., and served as its sacramental minister. Health issues forced him to move permanently to Cincinnati in 2001.

He is survived by his fellow missioners and many friends, including Mary Herr and Jim McCullough of Bryson City.

Father Field requested memorials be made to Glenmary Home Missioners, P.O. Box 465618, Cincinnati, Ohio 45246-5618.

Pope begins Lenten retreat, appeals for children in danger

POPE JOHN PAUL II

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Before beginning a weeklong Lenten retreat, Pope John Paul II made a special appeal for children victimized by adults.

Children "are often the innocent victims of the wickedness of men," he said at his weekly Angelus blessing Feb. 29.

"The church dedicates to them special care because it is Christ himself who tells us: 'Whoever receives one child such as this in my name receives me,'" he said.

"May this period of the liturgical year transform itself into a generous contest of solidarity toward these little ones, especially those in serious danger and difficulty," he said.

The pope dedicated his Lenten message this year to children, including those harmed by sexual abuse, forced prostitution, drug abuse, forced labor and military combat and human trafficking.

The pontiff made his remarks from his apartment window overlooking St. Peter's Square a few hours before the start of his week of spiritual exercises. All papal audiences and events were canceled for the retreat.

The retreat, also attended by many of the pope's top aides, was to feature the preaching of Italian Msgr. Bruno Forte, a professor of theology from Naples. The schedule also included daily prayers, recital of the rosary and adoration of the Eucharist.

Msgr. Forte was preaching on the theme, "Following you, the light of life," taken from Christ's words in St. John's Gospel: "I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will not walk in darkness."

In an interview with the Italian newspaper Avvenire, Msgr. Forte said that, paradoxically, it is Christ's suffering on the cross that brings light to Christians in every age. He said, however, there were two risks for Christians who contemplate Christ's Passion.

"To be avoided on the one hand is 'dolorism' that would make Christianity almost exclusively about suffering and death, when in reality we are witnesses of the resurrection," he said.

"On the other hand, however, there is the opposite risk, naive optimism, which can end up ignoring what price was paid for our salvation," he said.

On Feb. 28, the pope met with members of four Roman parishes in the Vatican's audience hall, resuming a series of encounters suspended last year. The pope has visited 301 of the 336 parishes in the Diocese of Rome.

Last year, because the pope could no longer walk unaided, the Vatican began inviting the remaining parishes to come to the Vatican. The pontiff remarked in late February that ultimately he wanted to visit with the faithful of all the parishes of his diocese.

The Feb. 28 event was the first group encounter of several parishes in a single audience. The pope celebrated Mass and, in his sermon, spoke about the need for a "strong and decisive struggle against the devil" in modern times. He said Lent was the time when all Christians are, like Christ before them, called into the "desert" and asked to purify themselves through prayer and penitential practices.

The sinful crime of sexual abuse of minors at the hands of clergy

What the Diocese of Charlotte is doing about it

From the Bishop

MOST REV. PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF CHARLOTTE

As Lent 2004 begins, the Catholic Church in America and the Diocese of Charlotte are once again under intense scrutiny for sins of the past.

The information found among the statistics of the John Jay study and the qualitative analysis of the National Review Board report were both released on Feb. 27. They are a painful reminder that over the past 54 years, some Catholic clergy members committed the sinful crime of child sex abuse.

The study was conducted independently by the John Jay School of Criminal Justice of the City University of New York and paid for by the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops. The National Review Board study was also conducted independently and paid for by the bishops.

The Diocese of Charlotte was founded in 1972. Since then, 677 men have served as priests. Based on a review of diocesan records, 13 priests had allegations of sexual misconduct made against them. Upon investigation, two priests were exonerated.

The percentage of priests in the diocese with allegations against them during this period is 1.9 percent. Of the 11 men for whom substantiated allegations were made, none are in ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte.

During this same period of 30 years, 18 allegations of sexual misconduct were made against the 13 priests and the diocese paid $704,439 for counseling and other services to victims, and for legal fees.

During 2003, an additional amount of $10,892 was paid for counseling. However, no additional allegations were made.

Diocesan insurance funds and the diocesan general fund were used for payments. No money from the Diocesan Support Appeal (DSA) and no parish savings were used.

The John Jay study has no real counterpart in any other profession. No institution has ever looked as deeply into its past in search of tragic information of this nature. But the bishops followed through on this study to make sure that this terrible problem will not recur.

The bishops of America undertook this study, knowing full well that it would put our church and this sinful crime in the spotlight. The bishops can't change history, but we can make sure that it is not repeated by determining the nature and the scope of the problem. With this information, the bishops can determine whether the steps we have taken are adequate to the problem.

Here in the Diocese of Charlotte, we have policies, procedures, people, programs and, most importantly, prayer to address this problem. Prayer is the priority response for the people of God when confronted with something as evil as sex abuse.

I pray on a daily basis for all victims of this crime, and I have asked the 140,000 Catholics in our 46-county diocese to do the same.

In addition to prayer, we have:

— A written policy to deal with the sin of sex abuse that was put in place in 1994. This policy has been updated to reflect the values expressed in 2002 in the "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People."

— Procedures that encourage people to come forward if they have witnessed or experienced sex abuse. The procedures can be found on our web site at www.charlottediocese.org.

We also encourage anyone who has been a victim to report the incident to civil authorities and we pledge our cooperation with any investigation.

— People who will act as advocates for the victims of sex abuse. Three victims' assistance advocates are located in diocesan offices in Charlotte, Winston-Salem and Asheville.

— Training for clergy, staff and volunteers. Since 2002, more than 7,000 diocesan employees and volunteers have completed the Protecting God's Children Training Program to help them recognize and prevent the sexual abuse of children.

— The Review Board. This group of volunteers, with the exception of one priest, are not employed by the diocese. The group includes a psychological counselor. The board's role is to review allegations of abuse and to make recommendations to me.

The theme for Lent this year as set forth by Pope John Paul II is, "Whoever receives one such child in my name receives me." (Mt 18:5) It is an invitation for all of us, Catholic or not, to reflect upon the condition of children and especially those children who have been profoundly hurt by the violence of adults.

Along with them, we remember those adults who are now carrying the scars of sexual abuse they received as children from some clergy several decades ago.

We are all called to protect children and young people. I am personally committed to the safety of children and proud that the Diocese of Charlotte is in full compliance with the "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" that was adopted by the bishops in June of 2002.

Peace be with you.

The faith of C.S. Lewis

Spirituality for Today

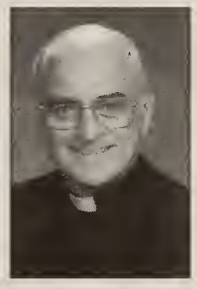
FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST



C.S. Lewis died Nov. 22, 1963. He was a Christian writer who had no peer when it came to challenging skeptics. Though he was a brilliant defender of the faith, it may come as a surprise to learn that Clive Staples Lewis was an atheist most of his adult life.

His mysterious conversion from nonbelief to exemplary faith was a miracle of grace. Such miracles give hope to many Catholic parents who have seen their sons and daughters fall away from the church.

The number of lapsed Catholics is growing, and we need to invite them back. We also need to be mindful of the 100 million secular Americans who never had any connection with the Catholic Church. Our goal is to proclaim the reality of the kingdom of God's love and joy.

But how do we do this? The secular culture has lost its sense of God, its sense of sin and its sense of the sacredness of family life. Evangelization is more a matter of prayer and personal holiness than of making proclamations from a soapbox.

Lewis wrote in his book "Mere Christianity": "If you read history, you will find that the Christians who did the most for the present world were just those who thought most about the next."

The Lord's Prayer contains the words "deliver us from evil." Lewis believed that we should pray with conviction to be delivered from evil powers. The liberals dismissed Lewis' concept of diabolical influence as "medieval" superstition. But Lewis was realistic. He would not have blamed 9-11 on the devil. He believed that evil is man's doing, but he insisted that it is not man's destiny.

He said, "The power of choice makes evil possible, but choice is also the only thing that makes possible any love, goodness or joy worth having." He urged us to choose love and joy. Pray that your loved ones will be delivered from evil so they may come to the knowledge of God's love and joy.

Joseph Laconte, writing about Lewis in the New York Times, Nov. 22, 2003, had this to say:

"Unlike the cynic, Lewis refused to blame the faith itself for the shortcomings of the church. Instead his writings offer bright glimpses into the moral beauty of divine goodness, what Lewis called the weight of glory. It is the vision of the holy that has produced many of the masterpieces of art and music. This same vision motivates the faithful to risk everything to relieve the world's suffering: caring for plague victims, defending the rights of children, guiding slaves to freedom, breaching war zones to feed the poor."

Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta comes to mind in this context. Unceremoniously, she did all of the above. I met her three times. When she asked me to give a retreat to her novices in New Jersey, I was thrilled. The thing I remember most about her was her joy.

"Joy is prayer," she wrote. "Joy is strength. Joy is love. Joy is a net of love by which you can catch souls. God loves a cheerful giver. One gives most who gives joy. The best way to show gratitude to God and people is to accept everything with joy. Never let anything so fill you with sorrow as to make you forget the joy of Christ risen.

"I tell this to my sisters," she continued, "and I tell this to you."

A personal memory of Captain Kangaroo

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

In late January when I heard that Captain Kangaroo, a man who brought positive teaching to our children for three decades, had died, I felt a personal sadness as I recalled a wonderful memory.

Bob Keeshan, the Captain, and his wife Jeanne invited me into their home on Long Island back in 1962. I was a brand new feature writer for a new Catholic newspaper, and they were willing to talk to inexperienced me. They were the first celebrities I ever interviewed, and they truly helped me get off to a good start.

The meeting came about through a coincidence. I met a woman who had been Jeanne Keeshan's classmate at the Catholic College of New Rochelle. She offered to suggest the interview to the famous couple. At the same time, I met a fellow member of St. Joseph's, the parish the Keeshans attended in Babylon, the Long Island town where they lived. She also suggested I interview this fine couple, so devoted to their faith and family.

I feared that people in important positions weren't exactly clamoring to be interviewed for my paper, The Long Island Catholic, which was then only a few months old. It had been started by Msgr. Richard Hanley, a charismatic priest, enthusiastic about Vatican Council II.

He believed the new Rockville Centre Diocese — just split off from the Brooklyn Diocese — should have its own Catholic paper. He believed the press, by presenting good reporting on the important work of the church, from parishes to the Vatican, could energize Catholics in their faith.

When I told him about the admiration I had for Captain Kangaroo, who was wholesomely entertaining and educating children every morning on his TV show, and that I thought I could get an interview, Msgr. Hanley said, "Go!"

I met with the Keeshans in their white colonial home, also meeting their three children, two parakeets, three cats and two dogs. I was surprised how young the Captain was, then 35, since he looked rather grandfatherly on television. "We decided upon a gray-haired, mustached Captain because there is a basic warm relationship that exists between an old person and a young child," he explained.

They talked about how important it is for parents to really connect with their children when their work requires them to be away from home a lot. They both also had a record of doing community service, saying they believed it is important for Catholics to bring their training into the community.

"The average non-Catholic will not approach a clergyman, but he will talk to a layman," Keeshan said. "On my school board work, I believe I did more good there as a Catholic than I could have done working for a church organization."

My own children always were a bit proud of me for having interviewed the Captain. Then my son Peter also had the privilege of meeting this television icon of his childhood memories. Bob Keeshan was the commencement speaker in 1988 when Peter graduated from Western Connecticut State University. Peter shook his hand, told him his mother once had interviewed him, and, to his surprise, the Captain said, "Oh yes, I remember."

To this day I remember the courtesy of the Keeshans, Jeanne, who died in 1990, and Bob, now with her, for trusting an untried young reporter to come into their home and probe their life story. They gave me affirmation and confidence and a lesson: that we never know the ways in which we affect another person.

The real value of good conversation

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

Nothing is more heavenly than feeling comfortable in a heartfelt conversation with another person who is welcoming and who can draw the best out of us.

What is the secret of good conversation?

Two great historical figures, Cicero, the great Roman statesman, and Pope Paul VI concurred that good conversation starts with clarity, which is more than enunciating words. It means making words precious and ensuring that the listener feels their preciousness.

When, for example, the word "entrepreneurial" is employed in the sense of being creative, the demands of clarity counsel us to restate it in different ways: being novel, thinking beyond the ordinary, being adventuresome and courageous. This makes clear what one is talking about and gives it flavor.

Kindness is part of good conversation — and it is an act of kindness to be clear. When we go out of our way to clearly define ourselves to another, it is a sign that we are well-disposed toward that person. We want to be on the same wavelength, to have an I-thou relation in which we not only share ideas but commit to the other out of respect.

Kindness sets aside egos and suspicion. It adopts the wholesome desire to be at one with the other person and as open as possible.

Cardinal John Henry Newman, who wrote a beautiful treatise on the nature of a gentleman, would remind us to take care to avoid saying anything that offends and always to try to make our listener feel that he or she is enriching us — not that we are enriching him or her.

Another excellent quality of good conversation is forgetting one's world and entering into the world of the person with whom we are speaking. There is a tendency when others are speaking to drift off into our own world of thoughts. Instead of listening, we springboard off their thoughts into our own ideas; we don't ever fully hear the other person. We don't fully enter into that person's world and remain there. (No wonder teachers often shout out in class, "Are you with me?")

If we could ever so little increase the art of good conversation today, I believe we would change the world. Wars, family breakups and endless court battles would be stemmed, while education would improve dramatically.

Best of all, we would experience an unimaginable harmony in our lives.

St. Matthew Church blossoms as spiritual home to many Charlotte Catholics

St. Matthew Church in Charlotte is one of the largest Catholic churches in the Carolinas.

CHARLOTTE — Several hundred Catholics gathered for the first Masses celebrated at St. Matthew Church in south Charlotte almost 20 years ago. Today, the church is one of the largest in the Carolinas and its membership continues to thrive.

Father (now Msgr.) Joseph Kerin was chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte when then-Bishop John F. Donoghue appointed him as pastor of the new parish created on Sept. 21, 1986, the feast of St. Matthew. It was the 10th Catholic parish to be named in Mecklenburg County.

Father Kerin celebrated the parish's first two Sunday Masses in early November in a local cinema, and liturgies in a Lutheran church and Charlotte Latin School followed. The movie theater Masses continued until 1989.

As parish membership quickly grew to 600 families, a fund drive was begun to construct a parish center to allow space for faith formation and meetings. The 18,000-square foot facility was dedicated on July 22, 1989, and Bishop Donoghue, Bishop Emeritus Michael J. Begley and now-Msgr. Kerin celebrated the dedication Mass in the new building.

For seven years, the parish center's gymnasium served as a sanctuary, a classroom area and reception hall. With more than 1,500 people attending Masses, discussions ensued about the need to build a new sanctuary on the property.

After about 18 months of planning and a year of designing, groundbreaking for the new building took place in October 1994. Following another year and a half of construction, the new 36,000-square foot sanctuary was dedicated by then-Bishop William G. Curlin on March 17, 1996. Almost 2,150 families composed the congregation at the time.

The stadium-style sanctuary seats more than 2,000 people, making it the largest Catholic church building in the Diocese of Charlotte. A small eucharistic chapel is utilized for adoration and makes the Blessed Sacrament visible to the congregation in the main sanctuary. Above the altar is a stained glass depiction of the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove. The piece was designed and crafted in Statesville. The peak of the interior ceiling is 52 feet high, and the large baptismal font is located in the center aisle.

In addition to the eucharistic chapel, meeting rooms, offices, a library, a bridal room, a choir rehearsal hall, a sacristy and rooms for ushers and altar servers are also part of the complex.

In July 1996, the Capuchin Fathers from the Province of the Stigmata of St. Francis arrived at St. Matthew Church to assume the pastorate. Capuchin Father Edmund Walker was appointed as pastor.

On July 7, 1999, Bishop Curlin appointed Msgr. John J. McSweeney as the third pastor of St. Matthew Church. Under Msgr. McSweeney's guidance, the parishioners once again prepared for future expansion.

On Sept. 15-16, 2001, the parish celebrated its 15th anniversary with a "Family Fun Day Festival." The following day, the parish held a groundbreaking to add a ministry building, a 85-foot tall bell tower, a 3,500-square foot daily Mass chapel that seats 175 people, and a 25-classroom, 62,600-square foot education center to its existing sanctuary and parish center. The parking lot was expanded to accommodate 900 automobiles, and is regularly filled to capacity.

The two-story, 30,000-square foot ministry building, called the New Life Center, was also built adjacent to the church structure to support groups and adult activities.

In 2003, the K-5 student body of All Saints School in Charlotte relocated to the education center and became St. Matthew Elementary School.

One hundred and four ministries now continue to thrive at the parish, with more than 4,000 trained volunteers actively involved. Ministries include eucharistic adoration; family enrichment; Respect Life; Habitat for Humanity; Boy and Girl Scouts; missions to Jamaica, Haiti and Kentucky; and Knights of Columbus and Columbiettes. A faith formation program with more than 3,000 students — from 3-year-olds to high schoolers — is administered by 347 faith formation teachers.

The church has six weekend Masses, including a Saturday Life Teen Mass, and Catholic Social Services counselors operate out of the facility. The parish, which emphasizes lay participation, has an active pastoral and finance council, and a variety of parish organizations and commissions tend to parish and community needs through liturgical, family, social, athletic and other forms of outreach.

Bishop Jugis celebrates rite of election

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — "It is spiritually rewarding to see how the Holy Spirit is working in the hearts and souls of people wanting to be fully initiated into the Catholic Church," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

The bishop welcomed approximately 80 catechumens and 212 candidates to the Catholic Church at St. Matthew Church March 6. The rite of election and call to continuing conversion at St. Matthew was one of three such events that took place in the diocese, introducing several hundred soon-to-be Catholics to Bishop Jugis.

Parishes from the western counties gathered for the rite Feb. 29 at Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville. On March 7, CHARLOTTE — Spirits are high at Our Lady of the Assumption School.

The school hosted the Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools Academic Games Tournament March 10-11, with almost 50 students from various MACS schools participating in the event.

The culmination of year-long training, the competition is part of the preparation for the national tournament in Kissimmee, Fla., in April. MACS will send 36 students to the national tournament.

The Academic Games, introduced at Our Lady of the Assumption School in 1994, is part of the Academic Games League of America that sponsors the yearly tournament for participating schools and districts. The Academic Games enhance school curriculum by providing an arena in which students engage in intellectual play with ideas drawn from language, logic, mathematics and social life.

"It's pretty intense, a lot of hard work, but it's also a lot of fun," said Deborah Watson, a parent and coach of the 12 third-, fourth- and fifth-graders competing for Our Lady of the Assumption School.

Bishops go on record in Senate in favor of traditional marriage

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The U.S. Catholic bishops again joined their voices to those calling for a constitutional amendment to preserve the traditional concept of marriage as a Senate subcommittee held a hearing on "the judicial invalidation of traditional marriage laws" on Capitol Hill March 3.

Although no representative of the bishops spoke at the hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on the Constitution, the chairman of the bishops' Committee on Marriage and Family submitted two 2003 statements on the topic and asked that they be included in the record for the hearing.

"We commend you for scheduling hearings ... on this vitally important issue," said Bishop J. Kevin Boland of Savannah, Ga., in a letter to the subcommittee chairman, Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas.

The two texts submitted by Bishop Boland were "Between Man and Woman: Questions and Answers About Marriage and Same-Sex Unions," approved by the full U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops last November, and a September document of the 47-member USCCB Administrative Committee titled "Promote, Preserve and Protect Marriage."

Palestinians carry a youth who was wounded during an Israeli raid on Nusseirat refugee camp in the Gaza Strip March 7. Israeli forces killed 14 Palestinians in two raids, after militant Muslims staged an elaborate attack on Israeli soldiers at the border of Israel and Gaza. Pope John Paul II offered prayers for the "unacceptable" acts of violence and terrorism in Iraq, the Holy Land and Africa.

Gaza violence increases danger faced by aid agency

JERUSALEM (CNS) — Recent violence in the Gaza Strip has made the work of aid agencies far more dangerous, a Catholic Relief Services official said.

Omar Shaban, project manager, said violence has made it difficult for his office to coordinate work with the agency's Jerusalem office.

"It does affect logistic issues such as going to the Jerusalem office or them coming to Gaza. It makes communication with Jerusalem more difficult. In general it has become more dangerous," Shaban said of the violence.

On March 6, Palestinian militants attacked Erez Crossing, the main crossing between Israel and the Gaza Strip. Four Palestinian militants and two Palestinian policemen were killed in the attack.

Shaban noted how CRS workers were at the crossing two days before the attack.

"Nobody knows what to expect from day to day," he said.

Following the attack, Israel closed the crossing, and its forces entered Gaza to root out militants. Some 15 Palestinians — including nine militants and four children — were killed in the military incursion. The crossing was reopened March 9.

For those three days, however, Gaza was closed off from the world, Shaban said. The Erez Crossing is used by thousands of Palestinian day laborers who must cross from Gaza into Israel for their work.

"If you ask a worker, he will not be happy because it affects his ability to earn bread for his family," Shaban said.

He said no CRS projects were affected by the most recent Israeli incursion. However, a kindergarten the agency helped construct was partially destroyed six months ago in a military action.

Constantine Dabbagh, executive director of the Gaza Area Committee of the Department of Services of Palestinian Refugees, which is affiliated with the Middle East Council of Churches, said over the past two years "thousands of homes" have been demolished in Gaza.

He noted that the 2,500 Christians who live in Gaza City share the same fate as their Muslim neighbors, and the constant violence has led to an increase in psychological problems and cases of malnutrition.

On two separate occasions, he and a staff member have narrowly missed being hit by Israeli rockets fired on Palestinian militants, he said.

"We believe in God and still ... hope that one day the international community will understand that the violence is against all Muslims, Christians and Jews. If there is no occupation, there will be no incidents. We will find our way to a better way to live," he said.

Increased role for women would benefit society, Vatican says at U.N.

UNITED NATIONS (CNS) — An increased role for women will benefit a society that is "organized solely according to the criteria of efficiency and productivity or of brute force," the Vatican said in a statement presented at United Nations headquarters in New York March 4.

It said women were "especially gifted" in showing the need to rise above self-interest and work for the betterment of all.

"Through feminine insight, women enrich the world's understanding, and help to make human relations between and amongst people more honest and authentic," it said.

The statement was presented to the Commission on the Status of Women by Marilyn A. Martone, who teaches in the department of theology and religious studies at St. John's University in New York's borough of Queens.

She told commission members, holding their annual meeting March 1-12, that the contribution of women to meeting the world's needs was made "at great sacrifice."

"This sacrifice mandates authentic equality in every area: equal pay for equal work, protection for working mothers, fairness in career advancements, equality of spouses with regard to family rights and the recognition of everything that is part of the rights and duties of all in a democratic society," she said.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope urges business leaders to balance profits, good of workers

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christian business leaders must combine strategies for making a profit with strategies for promoting the good of their workers and eliminating "the scourge of poverty," Pope John Paul II said.

Christian corporate executives express their faith through "the promotion of creative economic initiatives with enormous potential to benefit others and to raise their material standard of living," the pope said.

Pope John Paul sent his message to more than 70 business executives from 27 nations who met March 5-6 at the Vatican to discuss social responsibility and business ethics.

Pope John Paul said the conference took place "at a time when the financial and commercial sector is becoming increasingly aware of the need for sound ethical practices, which ensure that business activity remains sensitive to its fundamentally human and social dimensions."

"Since the pursuit of profit is not the sole end of such activity," the pope said, the Gospel challenges business leaders to respect "the dignity and creativity of their employees and customers and the demands of the common good."

Pope John Paul urged the leaders to pay particular attention to "the impact of global marketing and advertising on the cultures and values" of other peoples and to ensuring that global trade promotes development and cooperation, not just more profits for employees and shareholders at home.

Europe's Christian roots: Pope puts his stamp on the subject

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — After dozens of speeches and a couple of book-length documents on Europe's Christian roots, Pope John Paul II is tailoring his message to fit a smaller medium: postage stamps.

In mid-March, the Vatican is issuing a new series of stamps dedicated to the pope's eight visits to Poland. Each block of stamps includes special seals with papal quotations designed to tweak consciences in Eastern and Western Europe.

"Europe should seek unity for its future and for the good of the whole human family by returning to its own Christian roots," reads one mini-message.

Others strike similar themes: "To a Europe that is reuniting, Poland should offer its attachment to the faith and to Christian roots"; "Europe cannot stop looking for its foundational unity by turning to Christianity"; and "Europe, open the doors to Christ."

There are 16 little quotes in all, each bearing the pope's signature. With verbal economy, they highlight a deep papal concern over the moral and spiritual direction of a unified Europe.

For months, the pope complained loudly about a draft European constitution and its failure to even mention Christianity's role in the formation of its culture.

What the Vatican sometimes refers to as the "de-Christianization" of Western Europe is reflected in the church's own numbers. From 1978 to 2001, Catholics in Western Europe declined from about 60 percent to about 54 percent. In the East European countries outside the former Soviet Union, Catholics increased from 43 percent to 51 percent.

Those are reasons the pope is counting on heavily Catholic countries of Eastern Europe, like Slovenia, Lithuania and his native Poland, to impact policies when they are admitted to the European Union May 1.

The pope is not giving up on Western Europe, however. In recent talks to bishops from France and Belgium — two countries that have experienced a real drop in the practice of the faith — he sketched out some pastoral strategies.

SHAPING THE FUTURE

Role of Mary, women highlight World Day of Prayer service

BY ELLEN NEERINCX SIGMON
CORRESPONDENT

HICKORY — Women of today, like the Virgin Mary, help to shape the future, according to Xiomara Palma.

Palma, a native of Nicaragua and parishioner at St. Joseph Church in Newton, talked about the mother of Jesus as an example of faith for today's women during the World Day of Prayer service at Emmanuel Presbyterian Church March 5.

Palma spoke in Spanish and English during the service sponsored by the Hickory chapter of Church Women United. The service, entitled "In Faith, Women Shape the Future," was written by women of Panama.

"(Mary) is a wonderful example of a woman's faith because she did every little thing that a mother does for her children and she did everything that God told her to do," said Palma.

"She suffered the inclement weather and the poverty of the little town Bethlehem," said Palma. "I cannot imagine her sadness when she saw her baby lying on the place where the animals ate. Can you imagine that? I can't, because I have three little ones."

Palma compared Mary's situation to the situation of women trying to come into this country or living in Central America today.

"Many women of the world deliver their babies on the road while crossing the border of the United States, or in any poor place in other countries," she said. "I was a little girl when I saw terrible consequences of the civil war, but I saw the faith of women, too. Let me tell you that is a strong faith."

"Women are doing many things — taking care of our children, and teaching them with love and faith, because we are preparing good Christians for the world," said Palma. "In that way, women are shaping the future."

Near the end of the service, pieces of pottery were passed around to the participants as a reminder that, just as common materials can be shaped into useful containers, the Holy Spirit can shape lives, and men and women can become useful in God's hands.

Marilyn Dunphy and Yong Sun Thompson of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir look at a photo display of previous World Day of Prayer services during a reception at St. Aloysius Church in Hickory March 5.

Women from 18 Hickory-area churches were involved in the preparations for the worship service, including St. Joseph Church, St. Aloysius Church in Hickory and St. Francis of Assisi Church in Lenoir. The service was bilingual, with hymns sung and prayers spoken in both Spanish and English. More than 80 people from the community attended.

Carole Marmorato, a parishioner of St. Aloysius Church, served as the service's program director. She and the other women on her committee coordinated refreshments from seven churches, found Spanish- and English-speaking Christian women in the community to help with the service, and even found a woman from Panama who was able to bring items from that country to use for an altar display.

After Palma delivered her talk in English, she repeated it in Spanish.

"It took a lot of courage to deliver a reflection in her second language," said Marmorato, "but her faith came through in both languages."

RECOMMITTING THE FAITH

Deacons renew, candidates advance

CORRESPONDENT

CHARLOTTE — Deacons celebrate a covenantal relationship with God, said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

The bishop's first official meeting with the deacons of the Diocese of Charlotte occurred March 6 at St. Gabriel Church during their annual recommitment Mass and the rite of candidacy, an annual gathering to recommit themselves to their holy orders and to the bishop.

"The recommitment was special for me because it was the first opportunity I had to meet with the deacons as a body," said Bishop Jugis. "It is also a special day for the candidates for whom the liturgical rite is the first step toward ordination, which is also exciting for me."

Sixteen candidates celebrated, with Bishop Jugis, the rite of Admission to Candidacy for Ordination as Permanent Deacons.

"The day I have waited for has finally arrived when I have the opportunity to celebrate Mass with you, the deacons of the diocese; with the deacon candidates, with your wives and with your families," said Bishop Jugis during his homily at the Mass of celebration.

"We share the sacred ministry of the Church, so it is vital that we spend time together with the Lord," he said.

"Today, we also have the opportunity to renew our vows, knowing that we both have the responsibility to carry Christ," said Martha Medina, wife of Rev. Mr. Carlos Medina of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte. "It is also great to have all this spiritual support, standing next to my husband, because this ministry is for both of us."

Bishop Peter J. Jugis stands with the permanent deacons of the diocese during their annual recommitment Mass at St. Gabriel Church March 6.

To those who are aspiring to receive holy orders, Bishop Jugis said, "I rejoice to declare my acceptance of their intention."

The event "helps us to reflect on our own rite of candidacy and inspires not only those coming in but those of us who have been (ordained)," said Rev. Mr. Andrew Cilone of Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City.

The bishop told the deacons they were celebrating a covenantal relationship between themselves and God.

"In love he chooses you ... gives you the grace to respond and ... the sacramental grace to fulfill your ministry," said Bishop Jugis. "It is all a gift of God's love, to which you respond, 'Yes, Lord, here I am. Use me.'"

The bishop encouraged the deacons to freely share God's love with others through their sacred ministry. To this end, the deacons were encouraged to seek union with God through prayer.

Augustinian Brother William Harkin, a pastoral associate for St. Margaret Church in Maggie Valley, said it felt good to spend the day with other deacons.

"We are so spread out and the opportunity to get together is kind of rare," he said. "The recommitment is the perfect time to meet our new bishop, to renew our vows, our spirit, and our commitment to God."

ONE STEP CLOSER

Candidates move toward diaconate

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

CHARLOTTE — As 16 men moved closer to fulfilling their goals, one took another step in following his father.

During a Mass with Bishop Peter J. Jugis at St. Gabriel Church March 6, Ed Konarski Jr. and fellow candidates took the rite of Admission to Candidacy for the Ordination as Deacons.

"I found myself full of joy in the presence of so many people who have dedicated themselves to the service of the Lord," said Konarski Jr., of St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton. "I am excited and am looking forward towards the future. I feel good because this is an important step along my journey."

Konarski Jr. is not the first member of his family to enter the permanent diaconate. His father, Ed Konarski Sr., was ordained 11 years ago for the Diocese of Philadelphia.

"Growing up, my father gave me a very strong faith, and as I matured that faith was strengthened even more," said Konarski Jr. "I never thought about receiving the sacrament of holy orders until my father's ordination."

"As a father, I am very proud. To see my own family, my own son, involved is a blessing of the Holy Spirit," said Rev. Mr. Konarski Sr.

Other candidates are:

Students celebrate global community, collect shoes for needy

CHARLOTTE — Students at St. Gabriel School celebrated their heritage as part of the St. Gabriel International Fair Feb. 3-4.

Each grade level attended the exhibition for a 90-minute voyage around the world, visiting Puerto Rico, France, Italy, Netherlands, Russia, Nigeria and Antarctica — without leaving the school.

Parent volunteers served as ambassadors from the various countries and presented displays, artifacts and discussions of history, geography and their personal and cultural experiences.

Many students celebrated their heritage by dressing in international costumes for the fair.

As part of the fair this year, students participated in a global outreach ministry, including a shoe drive for Samaritan's Feet Ministry. Emmanual Ohonme, a native of Nigeria and president of Samaritan's Feet, inspired the students during an opening assembly for the fair.

St. Gabriel School achieved its goal of collecting 500 pairs of shoes for this ministry.

HIGH POINT — The media center of Immaculate Heart of Mary School now has a lot more color.

Seven murals depicting scenes from classic children's books were dedicated in a Jan. 29 ceremony.

Sarah Whicker, a senior at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School, conceived the mural project to earn her Gold Award, the highest award in the Girl Scouts. Whicker assembled a team of eight students, who met from August through October to choose the subjects of the murals and to paint them.

Bob Wehde, principal, and Janice Wood of the Girl Scouts Tar Heel Triad Council presided at the dedication ceremony.

Whicker is expecting to receive her Gold Award by April.

dential Trivia, Propaganda and Equations. Students develop critical thinking and analyzing skills for these games, which teach and encourage students to be assertive, to ask questions and to substantiate their own positions.

"It gets students involved in another avenue to be competitive, and show off what makes them special," said Watson.

The tournament is only one way Our Lady of the Assumption School challenges its students to excel. The school utilizes special programs such as ESL (English as a Second Language), L.E.A.P. (an accelerated learning program) and others and integrates them into its curriculum.

"ESL and L.E.A.P. are unique to Our Lady of the Assumption School," said Principal Patricia Murphy. "The children are receiving instruction targeted to their needs, and teachers work with smaller groups and are able to help students to serve their needs."

Watson said her daughter has benefited from the L.E.A.P. program.

"When they start a new area of study, such as math, they give a pre-test to the students," said Watson. "Those who pass go to the L.E.A.P. program, where they are continually challenged."

"The school has been very successful in using these programs as development tools for all levels of students and for students with challenges of a non-English language background," said Mike Ford, public relations specialist for MACS.

Bridging cultures

Gladys Silva, Spanish teacher at Our Lady of the Assumption School, is happy to work with ESL students, who often need a little extra help understanding the American culture.

"I work with them on basic academic skills: writing, reading comprehension, vocabulary and phonetics," said Silva. "The program is wonderful, one that is vital as we familiarize these students with the American ways."

Silva, originally from Chile, incorporates her experience with her English-speaking students.

"I try to make class fun as I introduce words, sentences and concepts through art, songs, dance, reading and writing along with a few games and videos," said Silva. "No child is ever embarrassed in my classroom. We are all learning together."

Not only are Silva's Spanish classes fun, they are community oriented.

At Christmas time, students made Spanish cards with English translations on the back for Asbury and Epworth Place nursing home. Second graders visited the nursing home, giving the cards to residents and singing "Nanita Nana" and "Feliz Navidad."

"Silva is loved by our students, families and teachers," said Murphy. "Her kindness, gentleness and respect of each of us permeate her classroom. She integrates subject matter with Spanish as students learn language and culture interspersed with geography and the fine arts."

Striding forward

Our Lady of the Assumption School was the second parochial school in Charlotte. Trinitarian Sisters began accepting students after the establishment of the parish in 1948. The original school was located on Central Avenue, but relocated to the corner of Shenandoah Avenue and The Plaza and was dedicated in June 1954.

By 1992, 305 students filled Our Lady of the Assumption School. A new and larger facility allowed it to grow.

The new Our Lady of the Assumption Church parish center was constructed on Shamrock Drive and dedicated in 1990. In September 1992, approximately 450 students began another chapter of the school at its new location on adjacent property.

Today, students are focused on building another school — in Africa. After getting the idea from a Samaritan's Purse book, students have held bake sales and collections and made and sold pins to raise $3,500 to help build the school, which will also be named Our Lady of the Assumption.

"They've raised almost $1,000 so far," said Murphy. "The students are very excited and are optimistic to make their goal."

Students have a tradition of reaching out to others. In 2002, the school participated in Operation Valentine — each student sent a valentine to an anonymous soldier overseas. In April 2002, Jennifer Mitra's third-grade class also wrote letters of friendship and gratitude to specific soldiers who were part of Operation Enduring Freedom.

"All of the students' letters were very touching and from the heart. They thanked the soldiers for keeping us safe and said they were praying for them," said Mitra.

While crafting their letters, the students put the names of the servicemen and women on their class prayer board.

"Parents were amazed at the work of the kids," said Mitra. "Many said they were praying ... from home."

The soldiers were quick to write back and send photographs to their newfound friends.

"When they got the responses, that boosted them higher than anything else could have," said Mitra. "They felt so special."

Spirits continued to soar at the school in 2003 as more than 60 third-, fourth- and fifth graders, along with 34 parents and faculty members, undertook the school's most ambitious field trip.

The group journeyed to the Wright Brothers National Memorial in Kill Devil Hills Dec. 10-12, 2003 to take part in the centennial celebration of the Wright brothers' historic first flight.

More than a school

Murphy said there is a great working relationship between the staff and parents, "who support the school very much."

She said the student council coined a phrase many years ago: "Not just a school, we're a family," and it still holds true today more than ever.

"Our Lady of the Assumption School is like a family. We all work together," agreed Silva. "The parents are very involved. The teachers and principal are so wonderful. Everyone helps — it's a great feeling to be here."

"All the teachers know every child," said Watson. "It's a wonderful place for my child to be, and she doesn't want to be anywhere else."

For Murphy, "watching the children learn and grow and do things is all so exciting and energizing."

In December 1998, Murphy was recognized for her work with the 1998 National Catholic Educational Association's Distinguished Principal Award.

Dr. Michael Skube, then-superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools, believed Murphy was an "excellent choice, in terms of what she's contributed to our diocese and Our Lady of the Assumption."

The Diocese of Charlotte's principals' association had nominated Murphy to represent them in the awards competition. She competed against principals from 11 states and took top honors in the South Atlantic region. She was among 7,100 principals across the country considered by the NCEA for 12 regional awards.

What makes Murphy and her colleagues so special? An NCEA press release credits the winners with being leaders in their dioceses and making "a lasting imprint on their Catholic elementary schools."

"I am really grateful for the recognition," said Murphy, " and I feel that the parents, the students, the teachers are part of that. We are all being recognized. It's a joint venture here."

Bishops favor traditional marriage

Carol McKinley of Pembroke, Mass., holds up a crucifix as she prays in front of the Massachusetts Statehouse in Boston Feb. 11. A defender of traditional marriage, McKinley was among demonstrators gathered outside as legislators convened for a constitutional convention to consider a proposed amendment that would outlaw same-sex marriage in Massachusetts.

for a federal marriage amendment to the U.S. Constitution as we continue to work to protect marriage in state legislatures, the courts, the Congress and other appropriate forums," the latter document said.

At the hearing, two Protestant leaders said the debate over same-sex marriage should not focus on civil rights or "adult love," but on what's best for children.

The Rev. Richard W. Richardson, a minister of the African Methodist Episcopal Church in Boston who is president and CEO of Children's Services in Roxbury, Mass., said the Black Ministerial Alliance of Greater Boston "strongly supports the traditional institution of marriage, as the union of one man and one woman."

"The institution plays a critical role in ensuring the progress and prosperity of the black family and the family community at large," he said.

"This discussion about marriage is not about adult love," Rev. Richardson added. "It is about finding the best arrangement for raising children, and as history, tradition, biology, sociology and just plain common sense tell us, children are raised best by their biological mother and father."

The Rev. Daniel de Leon, pastor of Templo Calvario in Santa Ana, Calif., the largest Hispanic evangelical church in the United States, concurred that the debate must focus on children.

"I fear that if we start to abolish marriage laws in our nation, we will go further down the path of teaching people that marriage does not matter for the well-being of children, it only matters for the pleasure of adults," he said.

Rev. de Leon said passage of a constitutional amendment to define marriage would "send a positive message to our children and their children. That we cared enough about the most basic institution of our society, marriage between a man and a woman, that we passed a constitutional amendment to preserve it for future generations."

"This is not, and must not be, about party politics," he added. "This must be seen as our struggle as a social family to bring stability to a divided house."

Hilary Shelton, director of the NAACP Washington bureau, disagreed with the need for an amendment.

"This discriminatory constitutional amendment appears to be nothing more than a highly divisive political ploy to distract the country from focusing on our overabundance of real problems and our tremendous lack of creative and effective solutions," he said.

Other witnesses at the hearing approached the debate over same-sex marriage from other angles.

Chuck Muth, president of Citizen Outreach, which advocates limited government public policies, said he and others in his organization oppose a constitutional amendment on the topic because they are against "the notion of addressing this issue of social policy in our nation's governing document."

"If the Goodridge decision by the Massachusetts Supreme (Judicial) Court is in fact an example of unelected activist judges imposing their will on the people of Massachusetts, that's a problem for the people of Massachusetts to resolve, not the people of the United States," he said.

Jon Bruning, attorney general of Nebraska, said he was at the hearing "because of the reality that four judges in Massachusetts could eventually invalidate Nebraska's ban on same-sex marriage."

"This country is heading down a path that will allow the judiciary branch to create a national policy for same-sex marriages," Bruning said. "I am here because I believe such a national policy should be crafted by the states in the first instance, or at a minimum by Congress with the approval of the states."

But two Democratic senators — Sens. Patrick Leahy of Vermont and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin — expressed strong opposition to any move to amend the Constitution on this matter.

"I believe a constitutional amendment on marriage is unnecessary, divisive and utterly inconsistent with our constitutional traditions, which this subcommittee has a special responsibility to protect," said Feingold.

The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court, by a 4-3 vote, has ruled the state's ban on same-sex marriages unconstitutional and ordered the state to begin issuing marriage licenses for same-sex couples on May 17.

An amendment to the U.S. Constitution declaring "that marriage in the United States shall consist only of the union of a man and a woman" has been introduced in Congress, with 112 cosponsors.

President George W. Bush called for approval of that amendment Feb. 24, saying that same-sex marriages would sever the institution of marriage from its "cultural, religious and natural" roots.

Welcoming the elect

catechumens and candidates from the eastern counties of the diocese participated in the rite at St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro. The diocesan commission on the RCIA designed the liturgical celebrations for the Diocese of Charlotte.

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults (RCIA) is the rite in which adults are baptized, confirmed and receive the Eucharist. RCIA was restored by the Second Vatican Council as the suitable way adults prepare for baptism. In 1974, the RCIA was formally approved for use in the United States.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, the RCIA ministry is currently undertaken by the office of faith formation in lieu of an office of liturgy. The office of faith formation is supported by funding from the annual Diocesan Support Appeal.

"It is through the sacraments that Christ's saving grace is communicated to us," said Bishop Jugis in his homily March 6. "Salvation is not just an idea, but is accomplished in us now through real grace, which really makes us into new beings, and puts us on the sure path to eternal life."

"I was also grateful to be with all the sponsors and the RCIA teams that were present," he said. "To be able to recognize the hard work they have done in accompanying these candidates and catechumens on their spiritual journeys to the celebration of the sacraments."

Bishop Jugis said he believes the sponsors, team members and pastors were just as joyful as the candidates and catechumens.

In a continuing effort to reach out to the increasing Spanish-speaking population of the diocese, the rite of election was celebrated in both English and Spanish. The readings alternated between the two languages, and hymns were sung in both as well. Bishop Jugis completed his homily with a special welcome to the Hispanic participants in Spanish.

Bishop Jugis said he considered it a beautiful expression of the changing reality of the Diocese of Charlotte that Catholics are welcoming the new immigrants into the life of their parishes.

"These immigrants are desirous of completing their initiation into the full sacramental life of the Catholic Church and desirous of growing in Christ," he said. "That is very encouraging to me. I expect and want that to continue and grow."

Before formally beginning the RCIA process, a person considers his or her relationship with Jesus Christ and is interested in some way in the Catholic Church. This period is known as the period of evangelization and precatechumenate.

After discerning their desire to join the Catholic Church, the inquirers may decide to continue the process and enter the period of the catechumenate. This stage can last for a few months or for as long as several years.

The next step is the request for baptism and the celebration of the rite of election. This rite includes the official enrollment of the names of those catechumens seeking baptism at the Easter Vigil Mass. At this time, catechumens from throughout the diocese, together with their sponsors, assemble and request baptism from the bishop. Candidates are also introduced to the bishop at this time.

The third formal stage is the celebration of the sacraments of initiation, which occurs during the Easter Vigil Mass on Holy Saturday. During the Mass, catechumens receive the sacraments of baptism, confirmation and Eucharist, and candidates receive confirmation and Eucharist. At this time, they become fully initiated members of the Catholic Church.

Following initiation at the vigil Mass, a final period of formation and education continues in the stage known as mystagogy. During this period, which lasts until Pentecost or later, the newly baptized reflect on the events of the Easter Vigil and continue to learn more about the Scriptures, the sacraments and the teachings of the Catholic Church.

Bishop Jugis said the rites of election were joyful celebrations and the joy of all the participants was apparent.

"I was delighted as bishop to see such evidence of the work of the Holy Spirit throughout the diocese," said Bishop Jugis. "It was inspiring to see so many individuals wanting to celebrate the sacraments of initiation."

Two books show grace at work

REVIEWED BY MAUREEN E. DALY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"The Mourner's Dance: What We Do When People Die" is actually a book very full of life. Beautifully written and surprisingly hard to put down, it takes a wide-ranging look at death customs, showing peculiarity, individuality and universality in human responses to the loss of someone.

Although I enjoy a walk in a cemetery, I was surprised to find this book so compelling. Katherine Ashenburg caught my attention and held it. A former arts editor at the Toronto Globe and Mail, a college professor, author on architecture and Dickens, Ashenburg is one of the very skilled practitioners of the literary movement called "creative nonfiction" or "literary journalism."

"The Mourner's Dance: What We Do When People Die," by Katherine Ashenburg. North Point Press/Farrar, Straus & Giroux (New York, 2003). 326 pp., $24.00.

"Our Lady of the Forest," by David Guterson. Knopf (New York, 2003). 326 pp., $25.95.

This way of reporting on things as they are, but with an author's voice, was called "new journalism" when Tom Wolfe did it 30 years ago. Lee Gutkind, editor of Creative Nonfiction magazine, says that the genre "allows a writer to employ the diligence of a reporter, the shifting voices and viewpoints of a novelist, the refined wordplay of a poet and the analytical modes of the essayist."

The style has also been called "immersion journalism." In Ashenburg's case, she was forcibly immersed in the world of mourning by the unexpected death of her daughter's 25-year-old fiance a short time before the scheduled wedding. Two families who had been about to unite in marriage found themselves planning a funeral together. The progress of Ashenburg's daughter, a young almost-widow, is the recurring focus of this book.

Drawing on cultures near at hand, Ashenburg produces what I think of as a typically Canadian multicultural mix — Inuit, English Victorian, Newfoundland Irish and Scottish, Italian, Greek, Macedonian, Czech, Polish, Jewish, Catholic, and several austere stripes of Protestant are stirred in with a New Age dash of Buddhism and an enthusiasm for the wide, cold outdoors.

But her research also took her to Japan, Mexico, Vietnam, Los Angeles and New England, and her reading ranged from Emily Dickinson to St. Gregory of Nyssa's account of his sister Macrina's death in 379. The list of books she consulted is entertaining reading in itself and the historical photographs are fascinating. Highly recommended.

Meanwhile, "Our Lady of the Forest" by David Guterson is a novel about an apparition of the Virgin Mary in a soggy, depressed logging town in the Pacific Northwest. Guterson is the best-selling author of "Snow Falling on Cedars," another very damp book set in a fictional fishing village on an island off the coast of Washington state.

The first printing of this new book was 350,000 copies, so it is no surprise that its arresting cover of a sweet woman's face with downcast, inward-looking eyes was in every bookstore in the last few months. Now the audio book is equally ubiquitous. The book may sell, but it will not be widely read or loved.

It has some strong points — the setting is so clearly evoked that it is like entering a new climate zone. Reading it made my hair frizz. Rain, mist, fog, mud, dripping leaves, wet feet, runny noses are in every scene. Guterson is also a sharp observer of society. He lets us listen in on the bitter views expressed in a working man's bar in a town with no jobs. He creates two teen characters who are not loved by their families and shows us what happens as a throw-away child begins to grow up. These portraits are compassionate and interesting.

But "Our Lady of the Forest" is mostly an unpleasant experience. For example, it has the saddest sex scenes I have ever read. There is nothing appealing in these loveless and lonely acts. It was surely a mistake to put one on the first page.

Guterson admits that he does not believe in apparitions or even in God, yet his book is not cynical or disparaging. Perhaps that is because Guterson, as a good novelist, is able to step into his characters, and he finds that some of them are sincere people who want hope and purpose in their lives.

In an interview at the time of publication Guterson said, "Whether the Virgin is literally present is irrelevant. What matters is that people believe she is, and because they believe, their lives are altered." And so, in spite of the author's unbelief, in the end, the book shows grace at work.

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

From the time I was a little girl in southeastern Colorado, I yearned to travel. A sophisticated excursion to Denver, in my mind, was somewhere just short of heaven. Then, on special occasions traveling might come with extreme adventure tinged with danger.

As my father would negotiate the winding Rocky Mountain roads, I would glory in the mountain beauty of whatever season we were in; however, the winter ice and snow were the ultimate test for my courage.

Sitting in the exact center of the back seat of the car, I reasoned, would allow me to throw myself to the opposite side of the seat no matter if the car were plunging to the left or the right. My ingenious and secret plan was my only defense against getting squashed on the boulders thousands of feet below us should the car begin to skid.

In the age before in-car television, my dad would keep my mother and me entertained with stories of what it was like in those very mountains when he was a boy or when his father, now long dead, was a young man driving freight wagons up the mountains to Leadville. I tried to imagine the enormity of no pavement, no cars, no trucks, only men and animals in the incredible cold, struggling along mountain roads.

Scary though these journeys sometimes were, my father's stories helped to alleviate some of my own fear as I sat there in the exact center of the back seat.

In the Gospel for this fourth Sunday of Lent, Luke tells us that two groups of listeners surround Jesus. One group eager to hear Jesus teach is comprised of the dregs of society: tax collectors and sinners. The other group includes the ever-present religious scribes and Pharisees who wait to criticize and entrap Jesus for his presumed heresy of eating, drinking and being present to the "wrong crowd."

Jesus, master of story, tells the "Parable of the Prodigal Son," although some would call it the "Parable of the Loving Father." Jesus designs his story to alleviate fear for his immediate listeners and those of us living today. For no matter how far we fall into self-righteousness or lives of "dissipation," God always is looking down the road for us, ready to invite us into the safety that lies in his open arms.

Questions:

Where do you recognize an element of your own life in the "Parable of the Prodigal Son"? In that element, how does Jesus' representation of the merciful, loving Father bring comfort?

Omar Sharif and Viggo Mortensen star in "Hidalgo," a fact-based crowd-pleaser set in the late 19th century about a guilt-ridden cowboy who enters a grueling 3,000-mile race across the Arabian Desert, during which he and his horse must endure sandstorms, brain-baking heat and desert raiders. Part old-fashioned boys' adventure yarn, part redemption parable, the film weds sweeping visuals and a strong narrative to craft a winning tale of friendship, fate, forgiveness and the indomitable spirit of man. # 'Pill' justifications still hard to swallow

BY HENRY HERX
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — How an oral contraceptive for women became available in 1960 and what its impact on society has been since then are recounted in the "American Experience" documentary, "The Pill," to be rerun Monday, March 22, 9-10 p.m. EST on PBS (check local listings).

The idea for the pill came from a 1951 meeting between aging feminist crusader Margaret Sanger and struggling scientist Gregory Pincus, whose research was funded by Sanger's wealthy friend, Katharine McCormick.

Since scientists cannot conduct tests on humans, Pincus turned to respected gynecologist John Rock to do the field tests.

A devout Catholic, Rock was convinced the pill did not violate the church's condemnation of birth control but instead was a means of making the rhythm method completely reliable.

After being approved in 1960 as a prescription drug by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration, the pill was such a success that the supply could hardly keep up with the demand, as 6 million women went on the pill over the next five years.

Though there were protests, there was no call for a boycott and Rock focused his efforts on proving the pill did not contravene Catholic doctrine.

In 1968, when told of Pope Paul VI's condemnation of the pill in "Humanae Vitae," Rock responded, "The hierarchy has made a bad mistake."

By the time of his death in 1974, Rock had learned the grim news that the pill could kill, because his field studies in Puerto Rico had discounted side effects that could prove fatal.

After congressional hearings in 1970, the hormone levels in the pill were drastically reduced, though feminists used the hearings as a forum for women's rights that attracted a new generation of activists.

Produced, written and directed by Chana Gazit, the program succeeds best in its account of the pill's development and how readily it was accepted by a post-World War II generation of well-educated women who wanted to be more than housewives.

Though touching on the opposition of the Catholic Church and others who decried the pill as a license for promiscuity, the program focuses on the social rather than moral effects of this contraceptive drug.

The result favors the feminist view of the pill's liberating benefits for women, an attitude seemingly confirmed by a concluding statistical estimate that "80 percent of all American women have taken the pill."

Whatever the truth of this estimate, some viewers may be left pondering the program's impartiality.

"The Pill" is a documentary that provides a lot of information but leaves a lot of questions unanswered.

Franciscan Sister Jane Schmenk dies at 86

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

TIFFIN, Ohio — Sister Jane Schmenk of the Sisters of St. Francis died at St. Francis Convent in Tiffin, Ohio, March 8, the same date as her 70th jubilee. She was 86.

A funeral Mass was held in the St. Francis Convent Chapel, with burial following in the convent's cemetery.

Born Jan. 13, 1918 in New Cleveland, Ohio, Sister Schmenk taught and was principal at various elementary and secondary schools in Ohio. She came to the Diocese of Charlotte in 1973 to minister on the Cherokee Indian Reservation.

In 1976, she became the first director of the newly opened diocesan facility, Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center, in Maggie Valley.

"She was extremely dedicated to the reflection center," said Augustinian Father Frank Doyle, pastor of St. Margaret Church in Maggie Valley and staff member of Living Waters. "She worked tirelessly for many years to foster a spirit of retreat and reflection here."

E. Preston Rhyne III, parish financial liaison, said he first met Sister Schmenk in Maggie Valley when he was performing a financial review of Living Waters.

"I remember her giving me a very difficult time that day, during which I tried vainly to hold my own," said Rhyne. "We finally reached a point of mutual respect we both carried forward to her retirement. Most of all, I remember a rough, tough woman who turned out to be a very kind, loving teddy bear."

Upon retiring as director in 1998, she continued to reside in Maggie Valley for two years while she wrote a biography of Father Michael Murphy, a builder of churches in the Smoky Mountain area who donated his motel to become Living Waters.

She said the book, "Father Murphy, Apostle of the Smokies," was written "about a man ordained at 80 by a friend who was 80."

Franciscan Sister Jane Schmenk

"She considered it her legacy to write his biography, and to let other people know about him," said Father Doyle.

"It was a blessing to still have her in the neighborhood," said Augustinian Brother Bill Harkin, director of Living Waters.

She was well known for her devotion to Father Murphy, said Father Doyle.

"Sister Jane was a very down-to-earth person, whose Franciscan spirituality was evident to all she met," said Mercy Sister Antonette Schmidt, diocesan director of young adult ministry. "Her hospitality was renowned as well as her dedication to growth of the Holy Spirit in the hearts of many."

"She was encouraging and invited religious and laypeople to consider developing skills for retreat direction and spiritual direction in the newly established Diocese of Charlotte," Sister Schmidt said. "She initiated training at Living Waters for this ministry."

According to her Franciscan sisters, Sister Schmenk enjoyed life and had a good sense of humor. She had recently commented, "I have come face to face with my physical (and mental) weakness and have accepted the fact that the old gray mare isn't what she used to be ... but [she] is enjoying to some extent the destabilizing environment of the stable."

Among the many activities Sister Schmenk enjoyed were playing cards, working crossword puzzles, cooking, creative writing, time with family and community members, reading and learning new ideas, especially about God's universe.

The Franciscan sisters said that when asked what her hopes and dreams were for the community she loved, Sister Schmenk responded, "... that we grow in wisdom and grace before God and share our gifts with the world. I also dream that our numbers will increase, that our lifestyle will attract vocations, and that we will always be a light in the darkness of greed and hostility."

"Sister Schmenk's passing marks the end of an era," said Mercy Sister Mary Timothy Warren, diocesan vicar for women religious.

"She was a significant part of the history of the Diocese of Charlotte," Sister Warren said. "She was the heart and soul of Living Waters."

KERNERSVILLE — Players recently took to the court to support a good cause.

Approximately 250 people came out for the "It's Better than your Grandfather's Basketball Show," where the Host Homes Challengers took on the Harlem Ambassadors at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School March 6.

The game's purpose was to raise awareness of and funds for Host Homes, an outreach of Catholic Social Services in Winston-Salem that serves young people between 10 and 17 years old and their families.

"It's Better than your Grandfather's Basketball Show" is the slogan for the Ambassadors.

"It means we offer a younger, fresher, livelier basketball show," said Dale Moss, Ambassadors' president.

The show features high-flying slam dunks, dazzling ball handling and comedy routines led by Ladé Majic, the "Queen of Show Basketball" and only woman coach/player of an all men's professional team.

The Ambassadors do not travel with a pre-selected opponent or present a choreographed show.

"We like to be challenged by the best local players," said Ladé Majic.

The local players included a firefighter, a financial specialist, a bank vice president, a detective, a judge and a sports reporter, among others.

Host Homes, established in 1987 by Catholic Social Services, offers individual and family counseling, temporary foster care, mentoring and a 24-hour hotline. Host Homes also coordinates Teen Council, a service organization for high school students; and Project Safe Place in Forsyth County.

Launched in April 1997, Project Safe Place is a collaborative effort to help reach other children in need. More than 70 public facilities and buildings in Forsyth County have been designated Safe Places to assist youth who are lost, children running from a bully or gang, or youth escaping problems at home.

Pope says believers must react to evil with faith, forgiveness

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — In the face of every threat of evil and violence, those who trust in God must react with faith, forgiveness and offers of peace, Pope John Paul II said.

Reflecting on Psalm 20 during his March 10 weekly general audience, the pope said the psalm, written when the ancient Israelites were threatened by war, "can become an invitation to never allow oneself to be captured by the attraction of violence."

"The just oppose every form of wickedness with faith, benevolence, pardon and the offer of peace," he said.

Pope John Paul said the first verses of Psalm 20 echo the fear of the Israelites on the eve of war and are full of pleas to God to save them and their king.

In the seventh verse, the tone changes, he said; the psalmist proclaims his total faith that God is with the Israelites and already has assured their victory.

The psalm, he said, expresses "a complete contrast between the position of the enemies, who count on the material strength of their chariots and horses, and the position of the Israelites, who put their trust in God and, therefore, are victorious."

The pope told an estimated 10,000 people crowded into the Vatican audience hall that the Christian tradition quickly identified Christ with the king prayed for in the psalm.

"He entered the world without an army but with the power of the Spirit and launched the definitive attack on evil and prevarication, against power and pride, against lies and selfishness," the pope said.

The Polish summary of the talk, read by an official of the Vatican Secretariat of State, said, "The psalm is a call that people who trust in God do not resort to violence to resolve difficult problems."

"Today's world needs to remember this: One can win with the weapons of goodness, forgiveness and benevolence," the Polish text said. "Let us pray that this messianic program of a victory through love would be welcomed by all peoples who desire peace in the world."

Pop culture. It's the devil. Or is it?

Yes, I'm aware of the sex, violence and lack of morality written into the scripts of many movies and sitcoms these days. I remember when my mother used to ban me from watching "Three's Company" because of the sexual innuendoes sprinkled through the dialogue of the three roommates.

Compared to episodes of "Sex and the City," Jack looks like Ozzie in the good-old days of "Ozzie and Harriet."

But if you take a closer look at the morality picture on the screen, today's storylines also are filled with moments of redemption.

Example? Go back to Oscar night 2000. The five films nominated for best picture that year all contained a bit of the holy.

There was "American Beauty," which won the Academy Award, about a man trying to make sense of the dysfunction around him who learns to appreciate beauty in everyday things. On the surface, the plot told the story of an emotionally immature man seeking sexual pleasure from his daughter's friend. Yes, that's despicable. But if you go deeper, there is the transparent undercurrent of sacramentality.

Priest-sociologist Father Andrew Greeley described this Catholic imagination as "grace lurking everywhere."

The competing four films had their own subtle spirituality woven into the plots: "The Green Mile" told a story about the healing power of goodness and love found in the most unexpected places. "The Insider" portrayed a modern David and Goliath story about the courage of one man to uncover the manipulation and corruption of the tobacco industry. "The Sixth Sense" detailed the struggle of souls and spirits on earth trying to work through their pasts to gain eternal rest. And "The Cider House Rules" touched on some difficult issues inherent to the issue of abortion.

Am I stretching the story line a little to see spiritual themes where only profanity and violence lie? Maybe. But young adults spend enough time in front of movie screens, TV sets and stereos to take pop culture seriously and, if possible, to use it as a tool for evangelization.

In his book "Virtual Faith," author Tom Beaudoin says that young adults search for and often find spiritual meaning in today's pop-culture: in sitcoms such as "Friends" and "Frazier"; in movies such as "Good Will Hunting" and "Saving Private Ryan"; and in song lyrics such as U2's "I Still Haven't Found What I'm Looking For" or the Beatles' "All You Need Is Love."

Studies show that teens spend three and one-half hours each day listening to music. That's almost 25 hours of song lyrics absorbed in a week, compared to an hour of Mass. But pop culture doesn't always have to compete with a priest's 15-minute sermon for the attention and direction of young minds. Movies, sitcoms and song lyrics can often complement and enrich the Christian message proclaimed by the church.

After viewing an inspiring film such as "Life Is Beautiful," which won its own Oscar, I emerge from the movie theater with the same uplifted spirit as when I walk out of Mass. I am encouraged to become a better person, to witness to the Gospel in my actions and to love more completely.

Young adults look for inspiration in everything that surrounds them, but especially in media. So it is in the best interests of religious educators to find ways to befriend the world of film, television and music.

Missionary in China

Parish Diary

FATHER
PETER J. DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

Our parish has a mission in China. Well, not exactly a mission, but we do have one missionary.

We are helping to support a woman from our parish who has gone to China to teach English. She was placed there through a foreign-mission program.

Her story tells us something about the future of missionary work in repressive countries. It also tells us about a new role for laity in the church. In the future, it will be lay missionaries who will be able to enter these controlled societies where clergy cannot go.

China does not officially allow missionaries. Religion is closely regulated by the communist government. If you are not part of some officially sponsored group, you cannot get into China.

But China does allow teachers of English and other subjects. Indeed, the Chinese are very keen to learn English to do business with all the American firms arriving on their soil as they "out source" our jobs to China.

So our parishioner is at a university in a major city of China. She supports herself by her work at the university, living in a single room in housing for foreign faculty. She teaches English to students there. She also sponsors an "English circle" in which students come under the guise of reading English texts. The text she uses is the English Bible and the Catechism of the Catholic Church.

Her "English circle" group is not large, no more than six to 10 enthusiastic students also interested in baptism and who desire to come into the church.

All our parish has paid is her roundtrip airfare each year, along with health insurance and a few other expenses; less than $2,000 per year. But the benefits are enormous, even eternal: the salvation of souls and the spread of the Gospel.

The program is not just helping the Chinese. It is helping her and helping us.

When our missionary was home this year she told our parish of the effect her mission is having on her life. She said: "This has saved my life. Literally saved my life."

Our missionary is a middle-aged woman who worked as a lobbyist. She is a convert to Catholicism herself. She went into business, but her business went bankrupt. Her love life hit a brick wall. She was losing hope.

One day she came to see me in some despair. I told her to do what Gideon did in the Bible, cast her "fleece before the Lord." In other words, take a risk in God's name.

After some weeks of discernment, I asked her, "What was your childhood dream?" She answered, "To go to China and be a missionary."

I said, "Well, do it. If it is the Lord's will, he will find a way to make it happen."

He did. She is now in her second year in China.

It is not often that a parish priest gets a sense of the meaning of salvation. We seldom know whether or not we make a difference. But our parish missionary's experience is making a difference in three sets of lives: It is bringing Christ to her students in China. It is saving her life from despair. And, it is giving us a lift by allowing us to share in her work.

Our words, our presence and our money are making a difference. My prayer now is for mission, for all of our parishioners.

Military chaplains — a special ministry

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

Many of us know that military chaplains have played a critical role in the nation's history, but probably few are aware that the chaplains' own history goes back right to the beginning.

Gen. George Washington wrote this on July 9, 1776, less than a week after the signing of the Declaration of Independence:

"The honorable Continental Congress having been pleased to allow a chaplain to each regiment, the colonels or commanding officers of each regiment are directed to procure chaplains accordingly, persons of good character and exemplary lives, and to see that all inferior officers and soldiers pay them a suitable respect. The blessings and protection of Heaven are at all times necessary, but especially so in times of public distress and danger."

And so the long and glorious story of American military chaplains began. They've been serving with distinction, and in many cases with heroism, ever since. Who can ever forget, for example, the stirring story of the World War II "Four Chaplains" — a priest, a rabbi and two ministers — who gave up their lifejackets to save others when their troop ship was torpedoed?

It would be good to report that the chaplains' corps is going as strong as ever, but the facts read otherwise. That's the message, certainly, from a man who should know: Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien, who heads the U.S. Roman Catholic Military Archdiocese. In that capacity, he has the awesome responsibility of seeing to the spiritual needs of all Catholics in the U.S. armed forces through their chaplains (plus the spiritual care of those in V.A. hospitals and all U.S. diplomatic personnel, and their families, serving overseas).

That's a tall order, and it takes a lot of chaplains to get the job done. But sadly, there aren't enough to go around. That happens to be the case right now in Iraq — an area, one imagines, of "public distress and danger," in the words of Gen. Washington — where only 25 Catholic chaplains are presently on duty.

Archbishop O'Brien, who has made two recent inspection trips to Iraq, heard from more than one G.I. that he was the first chaplain they had seen in weeks.

That's not the chaplains' fault, he made clear in an interview with Mark Pattison of Catholic News Service. They're "working day in and day out" to minister to the troops, he said, and the demands on their time are intense. One reason is that interest in the faith among the troops is "skyrocketing," he said. "For no other reason, they are happy to be alive."

Trying to attract new chaplains is a task that goes on full time. Active recruiting takes place constantly in dioceses and seminaries across the country. Bishops have been sympathetic and cooperative, according to the archbishop, because they're aware of the need. But too often they're facing priest shortages of their own.

Wherever he goes, and his travels are extensive, Archbishop O'Brien asks for prayers for vocations to the priesthood and to the chaplain program.

"We tell people prayer is the basis of resolving the lack of vocations, both to the Military Archdiocese and the priesthood in general. I am not sure we are praying hard enough — and if we don't pray, we don't deserve vocations."

And, while we're praying, let's remember to ask God to look after every member of the armed services, including their dedicated chaplains of all faiths.

How long was Jesus on the cross?

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. I'm reminded each Lent of a question about Jesus' death. According to St. Mark's account of the passion, Jesus was crucified at 9 in the morning (the third hour) and died at the ninth hour.

This means he hung on the cross for six hours, rather than the three hours we usually assume and the other Gospels say. How is this explained? (New York)

A. Some differences in the Gospels' chronology of Good Friday are traceable to the various themes and theologies of the evangelists who wrote them. But the problem you raise isn't that complicated.

All three synoptic Gospels note the "darkness" over the land from noon to the ninth hour, 3 in the afternoon, after which Jesus died. Neither Matthew nor Luke indicates a time for the crucifixion, but they describe several events after the crucifixion but before the darkness, implying that the time on the cross was somewhat more than three hours.

As he does so often, John makes the whole picture much less neat. The core of Hebrew faith through the centuries had been that God is their only king, a belief reaffirmed every Passover. Significantly then, John tells us (19:14-15) that, at the sixth hour, when Pilate presents Jesus to the Jewish leaders as king, the "chief priests" reject the ancient adherence to God as their only king by declaring, "We have no king but Caesar."

There seems little question that this chronology was adopted by John to connect that rejection of God and Jesus to the sixth hour, the hour when Passover regulations went into effect for the Jews.

John's timing of the crucifixion and death of Jesus would thus be quite different than in the synoptics, but he makes no attempt to provide any further chronology.

In any case, of course, Jesus would have remained on the cross a considerable time after his death while Joseph of Arimathea made arrangements with the authorities to assume responsibility for his body.

Left behind and illiterate

Looking Around

FATHER WILLIAM J. BYRON, SJ
CNS COLUMNIST

"No Child Left Behind" is an expression that surely will be heard in political conversations between now and next November. President Bush signed into law a bill bearing that title Jan. 8, 2002.

Since then, I've been wondering about the children who were left behind by the nation's schools 20, 30 and 40 years ago and who show up now in the ranks of America's illiterate. I hope political debate will focus on them. It would be great if both major political party platforms could come up with a plank that addresses the enormous problem of adult illiteracy in the United States.

In 1998, the National Institute for Literacy published a report ("The State of Literacy in America") that documents state by state, locality by locality, the extent of adult America's inability to: (1) read prose, (2) interpret information in tables and graphs and (3) manage everyday arithmetic — all related to one's employability and sociability in meeting the demands of daily life.

Many of the children who were left behind years ago are now in jail, or unemployed, or unfulfilled and struggling in a fast-paced, communications-dependent, information economy. Now in their 20s, 30s, 40s and older, they are also falling farther and farther behind in terms of prose literacy, document literacy and quantitative literacy.

Research indicates that in addition to wanting to become employable, many of these people want to overcome illiteracy in order to be able to read the Bible and help their children with homework.

Here's a policy idea that might help.

In order to provide an incentive for individuals who need help to seek it and to compensate for the collective national failure that left them behind decades ago, a volunteer serving as tutor/mentor/enabler would be able to give his or her client at the end of a one-hour session a voucher or coupon in the amount of $10, redeemable at designated food stores in the community.

Regardless of employment status or participation in any public assistance program, the client's eligibility for this coupon would be based solely on participation in a session aimed at curing illiteracy. Five hours a week would put $50 worth of food on the table and move the beneficiary five hours closer to a more fulfilling and productive life.

Members of Congress interested in knowing the extent of the illiteracy problem in their home districts can consult the National Institute for Literacy (800 Connecticut Ave. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006-2712). The NIL report makes clear that literacy is not something you either have or don't have. There is a literacy continuum that places people at different levels for different kinds of deficits (e.g. inability to find information in newspapers, or complete forms such as a Social Security card application or figure out a table of employee benefits).

Lots of people need help at the lowest of the several levels on this continuum. Of 191 million American adults (defined as age 16 or older), the survey found a total of between 21 percent and 23 percent, which translates to 40-44 million people, at the lowest literacy level.

It won't be hard to find them. The coupon will make it easier to get their attention. All we need is some White House enthusiasm and Congressional action to make it happen.

Immaculate Heart of Mary Church is high point for Triad Catholics

HIGH POINT — The first Mass in High Point was celebrated in 1903, when Catholics gathered with a priest in a local's home.

When land was donated to build a church, the Benedictine priests of Belmont Abbey joined fundraising efforts to begin a construction project. Work began in 1907, and in September, Benedictine Abbot Leo Haid dedicated the new church, placing it under the patronage of St. Edward.

It was that small mission community that would later become Immaculate Heart of Mary Church.

With the Diocese of Raleigh established in 1924, St. Edward Church was placed under diocesan administration. A home and property — the site of the future Immaculate Heart of Mary Church — were bought in 1928. Father John Manley lived in the home for a short period as St. Edward Church's first pastor.

Another building project began in 1942. Under the direction and with the support of Bishop Vincent Waters of Raleigh, a new church and school were constructed. Bishop Waters dedicated the new facilities in October 1947, placing them under the patronage of the Immaculate Heart of Mary.

Sisters of St. Joseph of Chestnut Hill, Penn., staffed the school from its founding until 1987. The on-site home that had served as a rectory since the late 1920s was converted for use as a convent. Meanwhile, Father Robert MacMillan — the eighth pastor of St. Edward Church and founding pastor of Immaculate Heart of Mary Church — took residence at a newly purchased home on Barbee Street.

The congregation has continued to grow steadily since the new parish came into existence. Periodic additions to and renovations of the church and school have been needed to accommodate the growth, including the construction of an eight-classroom educational wing for the school, and the removal of two meeting room walls to allow for more worship space in the church.

In June 1968, the rectory burned, forcing the move of the pastors to the convent. The Sisters relocated to nearby Maryfield Nursing Home's guesthouse. A new convent was dedicated in 1970, followed by a rectory in 1981.

Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point was dedicated in Feb. 2, 2002 and can accommodate 800 people.

Diocesan priests ministered to the parish until 1989, when Oblates of St. Francis de Sales priests arrived in High Point. Oblate Father Joseph Zuschmidt became pastor and Oblate Father Thomas Norris became parochial vicar.

In 1992, a demographic study of the parish and expected growth provided the foundation for a 20-year plan that called for the parish to build a new church on land more centrally located for the growing congregation.

A new sanctuary was the centerpiece of the plan, which also included several future buildings. In the spring of 1996, the parish purchased a tract of land on Johnston Street and Skeet Club Road, and a capital campaign was underway by October.

On Oct. 26, 1997, the congregation recognized its 50th anniversary as a parish with a special Mass and other celebrations.

Ground was broken for the new church in September 2000, and construction was completed in December 2001. Parishioners celebrated Mass for the first time in the new sanctuary on Dec. 24, and Bishop William G. Curlin formally dedicated the new sanctuary Feb. 2, 2002,

The new church, built to accommodate 800 worshippers, incorporates the "concept of life" through the stained glass windows, the altar and the tabernacle. Another unique feature of the church is the crucifix that can be closed to conceal the body of Christ, such as during Easter.

The church was designed so that it could be expanded to 1,200 people when needed. Currently, chairs are set up at some Masses to accommodate an extra 200 people.

Along with the new church, parishioners celebrate their community of faith. The parish's religious educational mission is a focal point, both at the church and the school, with programs serving hundreds of children and adults. Faith formation is run out of the old church facility.

A large number of ministries and outreach projects also enrich parish and community life, such as Scripture study groups, Knights of Columbus, Bethany Society, Mobile Meals, outreach to shelters, Guilford County Interfaith Hospitality Network, Habitat for Humanity and Boy and Girl Scouts.

In June 2002, Oblate Father John Kelly was appointed from parochial vicar to pastor, and Oblate Father Anthony Gilborges was appointed parochial vicar.

On March 9-10, the church celebrated its Parish Renewal, a "spiritual uplift" to motivate parishioners for the Lenten season.

The church is currently looking to become a sister parish with a church in Ecuador. Father Kelly also suspects the parish will again build to accommodate future growth.

The church continues toward the future, as conveyed in its mission statement, "to continue the work of the Lord Jesus by building up a community of faith in service in which every member is able to grow to the fullness of his or her Christian vocation."

Near overturn of Roe vs. Wade revealed in Justice Blackmun's papers

BY CAROL ZIMMERMAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — With the recent release of Supreme Court Justice Harry Blackmun's personal papers, many people have been looking closely at his observations on one specific case: the near overturn of legal abortion in a 1992 decision.

Blackmun's papers, all 1,585 boxes of them from his 24 years on the court, were made public March 4, exactly five years after his death. They provide a behind-the-scenes look at two decades of court decisions and shed particular light on just how closely the Planned Parenthood vs. Casey case in 1992 nearly went the other direction.

Within his files, stored at the Library of Congress, are several drafts of the Casey ruling with Blackmun's handwritten notes in the margins showing where he agreed with other justices or wanted to change their minds.

Particularly telling are notes about Justice Anthony Kennedy, who was initially voting in the Casey ruling to overturn the 1973 Roe vs.

Thirty college students think so. They learned the deeper meaning of love as they used Valentine's Day weekend to lend their hands and hearts to various ministries in the Diocese of Charlotte.

Sponsored by the diocesan Campus Ministry office, the "Give Your Heart Away to Service" weekend was held at the Sisters of Mercy McCarthy Spirituality Center in Belmont Feb. 12-14.

MOURNING IN MADRID

Nuns mourn the victims of the Madrid train bombings during a vigil in front of the Spanish Embassy in Lisbon, Portugal, March 12. Several bomb blasts had ripped through four packed commuter trains in Spain's capital the day before.

Ringing cell phones, twisted metal, last rites mark Madrid wreckage

MADRID, Spain (CNS) — Witnesses who entered the wreckage of Madrid's terrorist train explosions spoke of the unceasing sound of cellular telephones ringing as victims' families tried to contact them.

Grim images dominated local television, with body parts and blood splattered on twisted metal, as priests administered last rites to victims.

At least 200 people died and more than 1,600 were injured as 10 bombs exploded on commuter trains in the Spanish capital March 11. The majority of the victims were workers or students commuting into the capital.

Among those who responded to the scene were Madrid's priests, who were instructed by Cardinal Antonio Rouco Varela to make helping the victims their priority. Priests were sent to hospitals, morgues and the provisional morgue at Madrid's convention center.

At the convention center, priests found themselves praying and handing out crucifixes to anyone who wanted them. Among those at the convention center was Bishop Jesus Catala Ibanez of Alcala de Henares, whose diocese accounted for at least 40 of the victims.

Spanish Interior Minister Angel Acebes initially said the Basque separatist movement ETA was responsible for the bombins. Spanish forces recently foiled four potential ETA terrorist attacks, the most recent in early March as terrorists attempted to deliver more than 1,100 pounds of explosives into Madrid.

Spanish authorities also were investigating links to al-Qaida, because some security sources said the bombings departed from traditional ETA actions by using multiple, simultaneous explosions with no prior warning. The bombings also killed at least eight times more people than the ETA's previous most deadly attack.

At an evening Mass concelebrated by three bishops and 80 priests in Madrid's Our Lady of Almudena Cathedral, church leaders read a telegram from Pope John Paul II and an earlier statement from the Spanish bishops' conference.

Pope John Paul said the terrorist attacks "offend God, violate the fundamental right to life and suffocate the peaceful coexistence for which the church community and the noble Spanish nation deeply yearn."

"The Holy Father wants to reiterate his firm and absolute condemnation of such unjustifiable acts," Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, said in the telegram to Cardinal Rouco.

ETA stands for Euskadi Ta Askatasuma, or Basque Homeland and Freedom; it seeks an independent Basque nation. Since being formed in the 1950s, the ETA has claimed responsibility for killing more than 800 people.

Catholic-Methodist dialogue co-chairs say unity will happen someday

ROME (CNS) — The co-chairmen of the international Roman Catholic-Methodist dialogue said they believe someday the Christian churches will be one, but they are waiting to see how it finally happens.

"It is unfolding before my eyes," said Bishop Michael E. Putney of Townsville, Australia, the Catholic co-chair, March 11. "Where it is going and when it will end I do not know."

The Rev. Geoffrey Wainwright, the Methodist co-chair, said, "I do believe organic unity is on the horizon." But "I'm fairly sure it will not be in my lifetime."

The co-chairmen, in Rome for Vatican meetings, focused on how they became involved in ecumenism and how ecumenism has influenced their spirituality.

Both men said they were struck long ago by Christ's prayer that all his followers would be one "so that the world may believe."

Rev. Wainwright said that in his theological studies, he kept coming across powerful works by Catholic theologians that showed the truth presented about the Christian faith is more important than the author's denominational identity.

Asked why so much of ecumenism is focused on theological questions, rather than on working together to proclaim Jesus, he said churches need to know what they are proclaiming.

"Sometimes people say, 'Let's have a joint evangelization campaign.' But what church are you going to invite them to? And how can you explain to them that if they receive Communion in that church, they cannot receive it in another?" Rev. Wainwright said.

Bishop Putney said "you only discover who you are when you engage the other" and try to respond to someone who is exploring what you believe.

"Your articulation of your own faith becomes purer and purer," he said.

Without fanfare, pope's pontificate becomes third-longest in history

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — With zero fanfare, Pope John Paul II passed another milestone March 14, when his pontificate became the third-longest in church history.

If the pope noticed the event, he did not let on. He marked the day by praying the Angelus, as usual, with several thousand faithful gathered in St. Peter's Square.

Throughout his reign of 25 years and five months, he's never commented as the duration of his papacy surpassed those of almost all his 263 predecessors. The pope had headed the church for 9,281 days March 14 — one more than Pope Leo XIII, who held the papacy in the late 19th and early 20th centuries.

The 31-year, seven-month pontificate of Pope Pius IX is the longest to be verified by historians. St. Peter's papacy is traditionally considered the longest, but no one knows exactly how long he led the church.

Despite being slowed by neurological disease and arthritis, the pope, who turns 84 in May, continues to preside over a heavy schedule of meetings, liturgies and audiences.

The pope has a full slate of Easter activities planned in April. He starts a major round of "ad limina" visits with U.S. bishops this spring. Some at the Vatican are discussing papal trips later in the year — to Switzerland in June, France in September and possibly Mexico in October.

CHARLOTTE — All women are invited to join Women in the Word for weekly gatherings for prayer, reflection on Sunday scripture, music and sharing experiences of Christ in daily life. The group meets each Thursday, 9:45-11:45 a.m. in the family room of St. Gabriel Church, 3016 Providence Rd. For details, call Linda Flynn at (704) 366-9889. Divorced men are invited every third Wednesday of the month. TGIF is a healing ministry sponsored by Catholic Social Services, Charlotte Regional Office and St. Matthew Church. # 'Vox Clara' begins studying proposed translation of Order of the Mass

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As English-speaking bishops around the world began studying a proposed translation of the main prayers used at Mass, a Vatican congregation had its English advisers doing the same.

The "Vox Clara" Committee, which advises the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments, met March 9-11 at the Vatican.

The committee, whose name is Latin for "clear voice," includes a dozen cardinals and bishops from eight countries.

A new English draft translation of the "Ordo Missae," or Order of the Mass, was approved by the episcopal board of the International Commission on English in the Liturgy in January. ICEL sent the draft to bishops in English-speaking countries and to the congregation for comment.

The book includes the prayers used at every Mass, such as the Gloria, the Nicene Creed and the eucharistic prayers. It does not include all of the prayers that change each week during the liturgical year.

Translating the Order of the Mass is the first step toward translating the entire third edition of the Roman Missal, released in Latin by the Vatican in 2002.

The Vatican congregation established "Vox Clara" in 2001 to provide advice about English translations of liturgical texts and "to strengthen effective cooperation with the conferences of bishops in this regard," said a March 11 statement.

The statement said the committee's assessment of the proposed Order of the Mass "was positive, with many sections exhibiting a fine grasp of the precision and memorability required of vernacular editions of Roman liturgical books."

"To ensure the development of a strong and contemporary English style," the statement said, "general suggestions for improvement of the text were offered to the congregation as an assistance and support" to ICEL, which will meet in July to consider suggestions for changes offered by bishops around the world.

Committee members also made observations and posed questions regarding the ways in which the proposed translation attempted to apply the new translation rules contained in the 2001 Vatican instruction, "Liturgiam Authenticam" ("The Authentic Liturgy").

Msgr. John J. McSweeney, then-diocesan administrator, celebrated the Mass. The council was led at the time by Father Carl Kaltreider, pastor of the basilica.

CELEBRATING A SAINT

BAC, monastery mark St. Katharine Drexel's centennial visit

BELMONT — She spent her life caring for the needs of Native and African Americans everywhere.

Her journey led her to the small town of Belmont. There, she would donate $4,000 toward the building of a new Catholic church at Belmont Abbey, one that would have pews available so that all races — especially African and Native Americans — could worship together.

Now 100 years later, Belmont Abbey College and the Abbey's monastery will celebrate the visit, contributions and life of St. Katharine Drexel with a Mass, dinner reception and special ceremony March 25.

"Belmont Abbey is filled with strong men and women who helped shape the Benedictine Order and the Church hundreds of years ago," says Ruth Payne, director of campus ministry at Belmont Abbey College. "St. Katharine Drexel was a very strong, positive role model from the 20th century, whose rapport with the monastic community here resulted in building not only a church, but a tradition."

"The importance of the event is that it makes us understand a little bit of our history and that her presence here has added to the spirit of Belmont Abbey College," said Payne.

Mother Katharine visited Belmont Abbey on March 20, 1904, attending first vespers for the feast of St. Benedict. Thereafter, she and Bishop Leo Haid continued to engage in an active correspondence.

Later, Father Michael McInerney, a Belmont Abbey monk and architect who designed some of the college buildings, also designed many churches, schools, convents and hospitals supported by Mother Katharine.

Invited guests for the event, hosted by the school's Office of Campus Ministry, include Bishop Peter J. Jugis; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte; Sister Patricia Lynch, historian of the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament; representatives of the Sisters of Mercy, with whom St. Katharine first made vows; and members of St. Katharine's family who live in this region.

Pope John Paul II canonized Mother Katharine Drexel, a U.S. heiress who dedicated her life to educating African Americans and Native Americans, Oct. 1, 2000. She lived from 1858-1955. Her canonization made her the second American-born saint.

Representatives from student organizations, faculty, staff and local churches are also expected to attend the intimate affair.

"We've been aware for a long time of the significance of the relationship between St. Katharine and the Abbey," said Dr. Carol Brooks, director of corporate and foundation support. "Last year, we realized that we would soon be embarking on the 100-year anniversary of her visit here and we thought that we would like to mark that date with a celebration."

Payne said the event would affect not only the campus community of students, faculty and staff, but also the greater Catholic community, recognizing that St. Katharine also contributed to the building of Catholic churches in Gastonia and Charlotte.

"We are hoping that those who attend the event will glimpse the beauty of social justice as its seed was planted here 100 years ago," said Payne.

Pope Leo XIII, the author of the first social encyclical, "Rerum Novarum," launched St. Katharine on her path as a missionary among Native Americans and African Americans.

Born in 1858 to a family well known in banking and philanthropy, Katharine's travels through the northwest exposed her to the struggles of Native Americans. She became committed to relieving the suffering of Native Americans and African Americans.

In a visit to Rome, Katharine was advised by Pope Leo XIII to become a missionary to oppressed peoples. In 1891, after her novitiate at the convent of the Sisters of Mercy in Pittsburgh, Sister Katharine made vows as a religious, and founded the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament.

In 1893, Mother Katharine contributed $4,000 toward the building of the new Church of Maryhelp, the predecessor of Belmont Abbey's present basilica. She also contributed to St. Michael Church in Gastonia and St. Peter Church in Charlotte.

All of her philanthropy to churches rested on the condition that pews be made available for African Americans and Native Americans, bringing all races together for worship. Bishop Haid warmly embraced these conditions as a way to unite races for worship at the Abbey.

In her lifetime, Mother Katharine established many ministries and founded and staffed many schools for both African Americans and Native Americans, including Xavier University in New Orleans, the only predominantly black Catholic institution of higher learning in the United States.

In 1935, Mother Katharine suffered a severe heart attack and for the next 20 years lived her life in prayerful retirement until her death in 1955.

On Oct. 1, 2000, Pope John Paul II proclaimed Mother Katharine Drexel a "St. Katharine Drexel" at a solemn celebration of Mass in Saint Peter's Square in Rome.

FIRE Rally lights up Fort Mill

Speakers discuss sin, repentance, God's love

BY KATHY SCHMUGGE
CORRESPONDENT

FORT MILL, S.C. — The fires of faith were set ablaze at the Southeast FIRE Rally.

People from the Diocese of Charlotte were among the 1,075 attendees at the one-day event designed to ignite participants' faith experiences through challenging talks on Faith, Intercession, Repentance and Evangelism.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte and Bishop Robert J. Baker of Charleston celebrated the closing liturgy of the rally, held at the Charlotte Bobcats Training Center in Fort Mill, S.C., March 13.

Presentations were offered by Sister Ann Shields, superior of the Servants of God's Love in the Diocese of Lansing, Mich.; Ralph Martin, founding president of Renewal Ministries and founding editor of New Covenant magazine; Peter Herbeck, director of missions at Renewal Ministries; and Franciscan Father Dave Pivonka, vice president of mission effectiveness at Franciscan University in Steubenville, Ohio, and author of "Rocked by God."

Father Pivonka, who spoke on repentance, highlighted the history of sin, the need for sacrifice and, as Isaiah foretold, how the blood of the lamb would redeem the world. Christ's death, he said, was a part of God's plan to prove his love for humanity.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis offers a blessing to a participant of the Southeast FIRE Rally in Fort Mill, S.C., March 13.

"Christ's blood is on us and humanity is different because of that," said Father Pivonka. "He offered himself for my sake. He would be my substitute and take my place on that cross because of his passionate love for me, for all of us."

People can be freed from sin, said Father Pivonka.

"Don't tell me that sin is human. I don't buy that," said Father Pivonka. "Sin is dehumanizing because it takes me away from what God created me to be."

"Sin is always personal. We don't understand what our sin is doing if we think it is only breaking a law," he said. "Sin is always breaking a relationship."

Christ's blood was shed for everyone, and for the sins of the human race, said Father Pivonka.

"What is that sin you need that blood to free you from?" he asked the audience.

Unless people admit they are broken and need God's help, little can be accomplished in evangelization, according to Peter Herbeck, vice president and director of missions for Renewal Ministries.

"Simply begin with a prayer," suggested Herbeck. "I confess that I am a big chicken but I want to be a part of the 'Great Rescue.'"

Herbeck described evangelization as an invitation, one soul to another. He said that one should communicate the faith in terms of a gift from God, not just a set of rules.

"Jesus wants you to have a passion for souls," he said.

Martin, who co-hosts Renewal Ministries "The Choices We Face" television and radio program with Herbeck, spoke on faith.

"Ralph Martin is a man on fire with the love of Jesus Christ," said Darlene Kerfien, a parishioner of St. Joseph Church in Kannapolis. "I thank God for men and women who have been risen up by Christ to lift us to the calling that God has given each of us."

Sister Shields, author of several books including "Fire in my Heart" and host of the "Food for the Journey" radio program, spoke about intercession. She reminded the audience about the power of prayer and how "we can do nothing without God."

During his homily, Bishop Baker spoke about the power of the Holy Spirit, and he urged the participants not to be secure in anyone or anything but the Lord. To do this, he said, requires a full commitment of mind and heart.

"I hope this rally is a real shot in the arm and you will experience a deeper conversion, a need for reconciliation and a desire to share the Good News," said Bishop Baker.

Winston-Salem mayor discusses community service

WINSTON-SALEM — Mayor Allen Joines visited St. Leo the Great School March 8 to pay tribute to the students' outreach efforts.

The mayor's visit was originally scheduled for Catholic Schools Week in January, but inclement weather postponed his arrival.

An assembly was held for Mayor Joines, with an opening prayer by Father Johnathan Hanic, parochial vicar of St. Leo the Great Church.

Molly Riazzi, student council vice president, gave Joines a summary of the students' contributions to the community, including outreach efforts at Christmas and Easter, Caring Friends letters, fundraisers for the poor, Jump Rope for Hearts and Hoops for Hearts.

After Joines spoke to students about the importance of community service, he was given a tour of the school, and Riazzi presented him with a book of prayers written by the students.

Eighth-grader Joanna Braeckel read her prayer to the mayor:

"Dear God,

I am asking you to please bless Mayor Joines.

He does so much for our city from building roads and keeping all of us safe.

He keeps on doing more and more for the citizens.

Help him make all the right decisions.

Help him to find peace in You when he is troubled.

He works very hard for all of us,

and he deserves to be thanked a lot.

Please bless him as he works with other officials.

Keep him safe and help him to do what is right for Winston-Salem.

In Your name we pray,

Amen."

Lt. Cmdr. Tom Walsh, a Navy reservist, visited his sons Adam and Christopher and their fellow students at St. Gabriel School in Charlotte March 5.

Navy officer visits St. Gabriel students

CHARLOTTE — Students sat up a little straighter when the Navy SEAL entered their classrooms.

Lt. Cmdr. Tom Walsh, who has two children enrolled in St. Gabriel School, visited with students March 5 after returning from an overseas mission.

Kindergarten teacher Kerry Leasure, who instructs Walsh's son, invited the officer to speak to her class.

A 15-year veteran of the NAVY, Walsh spent 11 years in active duty as a SEAL (Sea, Air and Land), often on dangerous missions. It has been during his last four years as a reservist, however, that he said he experienced some of the most heartbreaking moments while working in East Africa and the Middle East.

Seven months after moving to Charlotte to work as an investment banker in August 2002, Walsh was called back to duty as a reservist. Twelve months later after completing his mission, he was reunited with his family in February.

Being a reservist is not for the weak at heart, said Walsh. Due to the volatile global environment and the United States' commitment to fighting the war on terrorism, his unit was sent to places with unspeakable poverty and the appalling aftereffects of war.

But Walsh is proud of the positive impact and contributions U.S. soldiers are making to better the lives of people in different parts of the world.

"We're building schools, roads, bridges, restoring water supplies, delivering food and building good will," he said. "We are accomplishing amazing things under very difficult circumstances."

Walsh also visited his elder son's second-grade class, where every student had written letters to him while he served overseas.

"It meant a lot to me to receive their letters. I was very excited," said Walsh.

For two years, third-, fourth- and fifth-graders have corresponded with their assigned military pen pals. The outreach ministry is sponsored by the St. Gabriel Church-School Liaison Committee, which is dedicated to enriching relationships between the church and school by helping students and parishioners become more involved with one another.

Each soldier listed with the parish has received Christmas letters and Valentine cards from St. Gabriel School students with messages of support and gratitude. Additionally, specific classes have supported family members of the student body who, like Walsh, are serving overseas.

In total, 12 classes have supported a number of different soldiers.

IRISH SAINT NOT REALLY SO IRISH

St. Patrick converts Ireland to Christianity

St. Patrick, Ireland's favorite saint, wasn't actually Irish. Nor did he drive the snakes out of Ireland (where they don't exist).

Rather, he was born in Britain as the pampered, far-from-faith-filled son of a Roman nobleman around 385 A.D. Patrick's real name is believed to have been Maewyn Succat, and his baptismal name was Patricius.

In his teens, his plush lifestyle ended and his family torn from him when his village was attacked and slave traders kidnapped him and sold him into slavery to an Irish chieftain. Serving as a shepherd on a lonesome hillside, the distraught youth gradually turned to prayer and after six years made a daring escape to Gaul (now France) and eventually returned home.

But memories of the Irish haunted him and Patrick felt God wanted him to preach the Good News in pagan Ireland. Ordained to the priesthood, he sailed back to Ireland in 432 A.D. and in essence converted the entire populace. That this was accomplished without resorting to violence is a historical rarity.

Patrick's success at winning converts upset the Celtic Druids. They arrested Patrick several times, but he escaped each time.

Patrick traveled throughout Ireland establishing monasteries across the country, which were instrumental in preserving Western civilization's literary traditions through the Dark Ages. He also set up schools and churches, which would help him in his conversion of Ireland to Christianity.

It is believed that Patrick raised people from the dead, though this cannot be substantiated. He is also said to have given a sermon from the hilltop that drove all the snakes from Ireland. Because no snakes were ever native to Ireland, many scholars believe this is a metaphor for the conversion of the pagans to Christianity.

Patrick's mission in Ireland lasted for 30 years. After that time, Patrick retired to County Down. He died on March 17, 461 A.D. The day has been commemorated as St. Patrick's Day ever since.

Though originally a Catholic holy day, St. Patrick's Day has evolved into a secular holiday, often celebrated with parades and festivals.

Legend of the shamrock

The shamrock, a three-leafed clover, is the national emblem of Ireland. It is widely believed that St. Patrick used the shamrock to illustrate the doctrine of the Trinity, but the idea cannot be proven.

The shamrock, which is also called the "seamroy" by the Celts, was a sacred plant in ancient Ireland because it symbolized the rebirth of spring. By the 17th century, the shamrock had become a symbol of emerging Irish nationalism.

As the English began to seize Irish land and make laws against the use of the Irish language and practice of Catholicism, many Irish began wearing the shamrock as a symbol of their pride in their heritage and displeasure with English rule.

funded by the Diocesan Support Appeal and donations, helped the college students answer the call from the U.S. bishops to put Catholic social teaching into action — the students were invited to choose from five service opportunities with the hope of making a difference in other people's lives.

Some students painted houses for Habitat for Humanity, others ate lunch and visited with homeless persons at Urban Ministries in Charlotte. Other students chose to work in Belmont with women and children in transition at Catherine's House, with people living with AIDS at House of Mercy, or with children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation at Holy Angels.

"My group went to Urban Ministries," said Samantha Bennert, a student from Appalachian State University. "While we were making cookies there, someone I met starting singing gospel songs and, within minutes, there wasn't a dry eye in the room."

"It was a day of affirmation for me," said Molly Murtola, a junior at Western Carolina University who hopes to minister to the poor after graduation.

"I met a man at Urban Ministry who told me he thought God brought me here today. It made me realize that we are all part of each other."

At Catherine's House, students volunteered to paint, clean or organize the kitchen pantry.

"A lot of people my age have ended up staying at a place like this," said Matthew Bennett, a student at Appalachian State University. "I feel that by painting a room, I may be actually helping someone I know."

"Everyone was so grateful for our help," said Saul Burleson, a junior at Lee University. "The residents have hard lives, and what we did today made their lives a little easier."

"We can't always understand why people suffer, but we can accept it in the suffering of Christ and take an active role in this world to change the way we think and feel," he said.

At Holy Angels, students served a Valentine's Day cake to the residents.

"Watching their faces light up as we sang and danced with them was so meaningful to me," said Melissa Kelly, a student at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte who is studying to be a special education teacher.

"Seeing these children made me realize that my calling will be difficult, but I believe it is worth doing and I still want to pursue it."

After their various jobs were complete, students spent the remainder of the day in small groups. They discussed how Christ and the Gospels were revealed to them.

"Even if I never go back to Urban Ministries again, the next time I bake cookies or see a homeless person, I will always remember my experience," said Kaitlyn Ranney, a student at Wake Forest University.

"I know a lot of people my age are feeling unfulfilled. They seem to be searching for something deeper," she said. "It makes me wonder what is missing. I plan on serving after my graduation and I need to know I am here for a reason."

"This experience was the first time in my life when I was surrounded by people whom I could be afraid of, but I wasn't," she said. "There is nothing like walking in someone else's shoes."

Alaina Gross, a student at Western Carolina University, was impacted by her visit with residents of House of Mercy.

"These people are staring death in the face, yet they are so joyful," said Gross, who told her fellow students to live life for every single breath.

"My hope is that we don't sweat the small stuff," said Mandy Carroll, from Wake Forest University. "There are people out there who wish they could just sweat the small stuff, but every day they have to deal with AIDS."

The students ended their weekend with a celebration of unity and a deeper understanding of where God might be leading each of them.

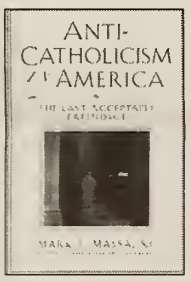
Exposing Anti-Catholicism roots in America

REVIEWED BY PATRICK J. HAYES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"Anti-Catholicism in America," by Jesuit Father Mark S. Massa, is an eye-opening chronicle and analysis of this insidious prejudice. It takes a firm constitution to look evil in the face, and Father Massa's book does not flinch. It is a welcome addition to the growing historical record of this American scourge.

Since obtaining his doctorate from Harvard, Father Massa has been a probing student of American culture. Today he co-directs the Center for American Catholic Studies at Fordham University, one of the leading research organs on the church's national experience.



"Anti-Catholicism in America: The Last Acceptable Prejudice," by Jesuit Father Mark S. Massa. Crossroad Publishing (New York, 2003). 245 pp., $24.95.

Father Massa begins by reviewing three standard explanations for why anti-Catholicism still rears its ugly head: cultural, intellectual, and sociological. Culturally, it is embedded in the nation's history, beginning with the English Puritans who brought a distrust of Catholics to the New World. Their recollections of the reign of Queen Mary Tudor, battles with Catholic Spain and George Foxe's bloody tales of Catholic torturers in his "Book of Martyrs" were still fresh and influential. The Puritan settlers passed their biases on to future generations.

Intellectually, Catholicism posed a challenge to post-colonial America. The response was to portray Catholics as unsupportive of democracy, reason and individual freedom.

There are two sociological currents that have influenced anti-Catholicism in America. One is nativism, which Father Massa defines as "a fear of 'outsiders' by cultural 'insiders.'" Another is the secularization of America, the decline of the importance of religion that coincided in direct proportion to the rise in the nation's pluralism.

However one chooses to understand the problem, anti-Catholicism remains with us. Father Massa recounts a brief history of this scourge through three centuries and then looks at several public expressions of the idea.

He examines the work of Paul Blandshard, whose scurrilous books on American Catholicism sold hundreds of thousands of copies in the 1940s and 1950s. The election of John F. Kennedy is analyzed in light of attacks from the Rev. Norman Vincent Peale and his associates. Other popular Protestants come under fire, such as the Rev. Jimmy Swaggart, who in the course of his ministry (which was not without its own problems) tangled with the late Bishop Stanley J. Ott of Baton Rouge, La., over the televangelist's assertions that Catholicism was a false religion offering "a fraudulent path to salvation."

In one of the most provocative chapters, Father Massa examines the contents and effects of a notoriously anti-Catholic cartoon series produced by Jack Chick. These "Chicklets" have penetrated popular culture through an estimated distribution that tops 400 million. Father Massa's exposure of Chick's canard is as thorough as it is humorous as, for example, when he supplies "a short course in Chicklet theology, if only to illustrate its amazing consistency over time (in which it is later than you think)."

Father Massa brings his careful argument to a close by making a distinction between self-critique born of love for the church and Catholic bashing. He notes that recent crises within the church are not occasions for prejudicial venting against the hierarchy, but respectful calls for accountability are positively imperative. Amen!

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I got fired from my first professional job after only three months.

A new college grad, with my bachelor's degree and a mistaken notion that I was God's gift to journalism, I traveled across the country to take a position as a reporter for the local daily in a small town. At 21, I was brand new to the workplace but didn't take editors' correction well and lacked respect for the meaning of "business attire."

I appeared, no doubt, to have an attitude problem, but mostly I was just an immature, inexperienced kid.

When the editor told me he was letting me go because I just wasn't cutting it, I realized immediately the truth about my failure. It was a result of my own misplaced pride and childish behavior.

Once I walked out the door, my know-it-all attitude turned to shame. I became a much humbler job seeker, visiting every newspaper in that state. A few editors were interested in hiring me until they found out why I'd left my previous job. This happened over and over again.

My assurances that I'd learned my lesson weren't enough as I suddenly looked to them like a problem waiting to happen: "Sorry, no openings."

I left for home feeling hopelessly marked for life. But on the way, I stopped at a newspaper office to apply for a sports-writing position I'd heard about. As I interviewed with the sports editor, I took a breath when we came to the part where he asked about my previous job. I admitted what had happened.

"Do I need to worry about that happening here?" he asked.

"No, sir."

"Good. Then there's no problem. You can start Monday."

Freed of the expectations of failure, I became a new person — and a pretty good reporter — working hard, coming in early, asking veteran writers and editors for advice, and appreciating every assignment I got.

In this weekend's Gospel, Jesus shows his mercy in forgiving the accused woman's failings and then further frees her from her sins with a simple dismissal of them as "past history" that won't be repeated. Our loving Lord, always pulling for us, allows us to start over, knowing that with divine encouragement we can grow to be the righteous person God created us to be.

Johnny Depp and John Turturro star in "Secret Window," an absorbing psychological thriller set in an isolated lakefront cabin about a successful novelist (Depp) who is terrorized by a stranger (Turturro) claiming the author plagiarized one of his short stories and demanding restitution, threatening the scribe with a brand of backwater justice that includes cold-blooded murder. Recurring gory violence, a discreet fleeting sexual encounter, some crude language and profanity. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

'Eternal Sunshine' beams with originality, cleverness

BY DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Despite a labyrinthine plot, artsy camerawork and a title that doesn't exactly lend itself to the marquee (swiped from a poem by Alexander Pope), Michel Gondry's bold new film, "Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind," (Focus) is one of the most original, cleverly crafted and emotionally resonant movies to come down the pike in a long time.

Cast against type, Jim Carrey stars as Joel Barish, a scruffy, unlucky-at-love loner who impulsively plays hooky from his job on Valentine's Day and hops a train to the tip of Long Island. Wandering along a desolate Montauk beach, he meets Clementine (Kate Winslet), a bohemian free spirit with blue hair.

Her mercurial elan coaxes Joel out of his introverted shell so that by the end of the 17-minute pre-credit sequence, their offbeat opposites-attract relationship is firmly established.

It seems only natural, therefore, to share in Joel's post-credits confusion when he approaches Clementine with a gift — what seems like a few days later — and she acts like she has never seen him before. Neither Joel nor the viewers are left scratching their heads long, as it is quickly revealed that (for reasons left rather vague) Clementine has employed the services of an enigmatic company called Lacuna, and had all memories of Joel erased from her brain.

Devastated, Joel decides to undergo the same procedure in a depression-easing tit-for-tat. The erasure takes place in Joel's dingy apartment one night, with the unconscious patient's head placed in what looks like an industrial-strength colander that systematically zaps his memories of Clementine one by one.

The film wisely avoids the pratfall of being overly technical in explaining the process involved, which undoubtedly would have weighed down a more mainstream movie.

Overseeing the procedure is Stan (Mark Ruffalo), and Patrick (Elijah Wood). The operation is nearly botched when Patrick splits to make a move on the now-available Clementine and Stan takes a breather by getting stoned with Lacuna's pretty blonde receptionist (Kirsten Dunst), who is also present.

Most of the action, of course, actually takes place in Joel's head — more specifically in his memories. During the mnemonic erasure, snippets of recollections play out, filling in the blanks of their rollercoaster relationship.

From the depths of his psyche, Joel, conscious of what's going on in his head but unable to abort the procedure, realizes that he truly loves Clementine — despite the painful reminiscences. He begins to retreat with his memories of happier days into the recesses of his mind, "hiding" Clementine in childhood memories, desperately clinging to some trace of her, before she is deleted by the oblivion of forgetfulness.

Reining in his rubber-faced repertoire and manic energy, Carrey delivers his most subdued yet resonant performance to date, while Kate Winslet delivers a fittingly frenetic performance, donning the hat of hyperactivity usually worn by her uncharacteristically restrained costar. Tom Wilkinson also shines as Dr. Howard Mierzwiak, the head of Lacuna, whose marital infidelities have unforeseen consequences for the star-crossed lovers.

The screenplay by Charlie Kaufman echoes the self-conscious quirkiness of "Adaptation" and "Being John Malkovich" (both also penned by Kaufman), but is by far the most developed in terms of character and human drama. But for those who have not acquired a taste for Kaufman's unconventional brand of storytelling, the at-times intentionally convoluted, nonlinear narrative may prove a bit confusing.

Camerawork by Ellen Kurras supplies the film with an impressionistic stream of haunting images enhancing the overall surreal feel of being trapped inside the dreamscape of Joel's mind. As he loses his hold on Clementine (or his memories of her), the road through Joel's head takes on the darker tones of a nightmare. In one particularly heart-wrenching scene, Joel cries out in vain, begging Stan not to erase the memory of an exceptionally happy moment he shared with Clementine.

Despite some unnecessary crassness, the film makes some poignant reflections about the centrality of memories in defining our personalities. And while no one would argue the vital role memories — both positive and negative — play in making us who we are, viewers should be vigilant against rationalist assumptions that would reduce a person to the sum total of his or her mental processes. For Christians, man is more than memories.

The film also touchingly explores the mixed bag of interpersonal relationships and the vagaries of the human heart as it wrestles with regret and missed opportunities.

While movies dealing with memory loss are quickly evolving into a separate subgenre ("50 First Dates," "Paycheck" and "Memento," to name just a few), Gondry's film is, by far, the most ingenious, audacious and, if you'll excuse the pun, memorable of the lot.

Given the plethora of puerility and surplus of schlock set to glut multiplexes in the coming summer months, this modest but inspired piece of filmmaking is a warming ray of sunshine.

St. Gabriel's Troop 174 recognizes accomplishments

CHARLOTTE — The 94th anniversary of Scouting in America was Feb. 8, and Troop 174 from St. Gabriel Church had a lot to celebrate.

During a special Mass at the church that day, the Scouts celebrated their accomplishments during the past year, including the recognition of four adult leaders for their service and dedication to Scouting.

Mike Newy, Kris Knudsen and Don Bohlen received the St. George Award presented by the National Catholic Committee on Scouting recognizing "their outstanding service to the spiritual development of Catholic youth in the Boy Scouts of America."

In addition, adult leader Jack Hagopian received the Golden Pelican award for his commitment to the spiritual development of Catholic youth in Scouting.

The adult recognitions are evident in the Scouts' work in fulfilling the basic Scouting principles, such as duty to God, duty to country and duty to others.

Boy Scouts and Cub Scouts are active in ministries within the parish, serving as altar servers, readers, eucharistic ministers, religious education instructors and participants in music ministry.

Many Eagle Scout projects have benefited Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School, the Diocese of Charlotte's Cardinal John Newman House for Seminarians, the home of Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin and the St. Gabriel Church rectory.

Scouting places importance to rank advancement, with the Eagle Scout being the highest rank a Boy Scout can achieve. This rank has such high standards that universities and employers recognize it as an indication of the person's character and ability to achieve.

An equally important goal that Scouts can strive to achieve for their faith is represented by the Ad Altre Dei Award, and three young men in Troop 174 will soon complete work to receive this award.

Jeff Malondo, David Rue and Adisson Demallie have put in many hours of community service and study of the Catholic faith, learning the correlation between the teachings of the church and the Boy Scouts' principles.

WINSTON-SALEM — One of college basketball's best coaches will be sharing his secrets of success next month.

Skip Prosser, head basketball coach at Wake Forest University for the past three seasons, will speak on "Winning in Life, On and Off the Court" at the Partners in Hope Event April 15 benefiting Catholic Social Services Piedmont Triad Office.

Prosser, who is a member of St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem, was asked to speak at the event because of his extensive work with young adults for the past 30 years.

"Prosser has been a mentor to young people for many years," said David Harold, director of the Piedmont Triad Office.

The Piedmont Triad Office offers several programs for young people, including Host Homes (an outreach program for troubled youth), Hand to Hand (services for teen parents) and Sisters/The Code, an after-school program promoting self-esteem, decision-making skills and abstinence.

Proceeds from the Partners in Hope event will benefit the various ministries of the Piedmont Triad Office, which include counseling, adoption and pregnancy services and limited emergency food and financial assistance, according to Harold.

Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin and Sister Dennis Eileen Gamber, Sister of St. Joseph, will serve as honorary co-chairs of the evening.

Wade decision written by Blackmun.

After writing the Roe majority opinion, Blackmun said he received more than 60,000 pieces of hate mail, a small sample of which is in the library collection of his papers.

The Casey case, which was upheld in a 5-4 vote, reaffirmed the "central holding" of the Roe decision but as a compromise position it also upheld four provisions of Pennsylvania's Abortion Control Act that it said would not pose "undue burden" on pregnant women, including informed consent, a waiting period, parental notification and other recordkeeping prior to abortions.

According to reports in Blackmun's files, Chief Justice William Rehnquist initially led a five-justice majority in the Casey case and he had been set to write the majority opinion when Justice Kennedy suddenly changed his mind.

Kennedy wrote to Blackmun saying he needed to see him whenever he "had a free moment."

"I want to tell you about a new development in Planned Parenthood vs. Casey, and at least part of what I say should come as welcome news," he wrote.

When Blackmun received Kennedy's note, according to his papers, he wrote the words "Roe sound" on a pink memo pad.

Nothing in the papers reveals why Kennedy, who is Catholic, changed his mind in the decision and ended up voting with Justices Sandra Day O'Connor, John Paul Stevens and David Souter.

Mark Chopko, general counsel for the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, said the details about Kennedy's change of mind in two 1992 cases is the most interesting part of Blackmun's papers.

"Certainly justices are allowed to reconsider their positions as the case develops and as their own thinking is aided by briefs and argument," he said in an e-mail to Catholic News Service. "It shows how close Roe was actually to being reversed. That reversal will have to wait for another day," he added.

Robert Destro, a professor at The Catholic University of America's Columbus School of Law, said Blackmun's papers reveal just how "suggestible" Kennedy is.

He said the notes show that Kennedy "didn't apply the law, but instead considered how it would play out in the newspapers."

Destro also told CNS in a telephone interview that he wasn't surprised by Kennedy's change of mind because in the Casey case in particular, it was "obvious that someone had changed sides."

Blackmun's notes reveal that another case in which Kennedy had a sudden change of mind was Lee vs. Weisman, a 1992 case challenging the constitutionality of clergy-led prayers at graduations.

Kennedy, who was initially going to write the opinion for a 5-4 majority upholding the prayers, wrote to Blackmun after several months saying that his "draft looked quite wrong." Kennedy's revised draft then became the opinion of the 5-4 majority which called the clergy-led prayers unconstitutional.

In both cases where Kennedy's swing vote made a difference, the U.S. Catholic Conference, as it was then called, filed friend-of-the-court briefs supporting what ended up being the minority opinion.

Blackmun's notes also reveal some of the struggle he personally faced with capital punishment decisions.

In a 1967 case in which the court upheld a conviction and death sentence, Blackmun, who was writing the majority opinion, added a concluding paragraph that showed his doubt about the sentence and the death penalty in general, adding that executive clemency might have been more appropriate.

After being criticized for this paragraph by two of the justices, he took it out, but his notes show that he regretted this decision.

"I continue to kick myself for withdrawing my comment about capital punishment," he wrote to then-Chief Justice Warren Burger. "In retrospect, I suppose it was expediency, namely to avoid a hoedown in court. Yet I was right about it and one never should compromise when one is right."

A reflection of "The Passion of the Christ"

Guest Column

FATHER JOSEPH SOBIERAJSKI, SJ
Guest Columnist

Someone suggested the other day that I might share my reflections on seeing "The Passion of the Christ" since everyone seems to be talking about the movie in either very positive or very negative terms, and as a result, some people are confused about its biblical accuracy, its possible anti-Semitism and its violent brutality.

I'm not quite sure how well I can talk to these things, but I would begin, however, by reminding everyone that "The Passion" is a movie, and like every work of art, it is subjective. It is subjective in the sense that it is a personal interpretation of an event by the director, and it also is subjective in the effect it has on the viewer.

We need only look at the history of art to see how various events from the Passion have been portrayed in the West. Raphael's "Crucifixion with Mary and St. John" reveals the Christ of Renaissance perfection, in a scene which belies what a Roman crucifixion was all about; there is no blood, no wounds, no sense of suffering in the handsome Apollo-like Christ, and those at the foot of the cross reverently mourn in graceful tranquility.

Yet, the crucifixion of Christ from Matthias Grunewald's "Ishenheim Altarpiece," created within the same time period, presents a violently tortured Jesus — his skin a putrid green with every lash of the whip, every bruise, every gash, every wound vividly shown and exposed. When painting the same scene, these two artists had different intentions, and we react to the two versions of the same scene in very different ways.

My own response to Mr. Gibson's movie was, almost to my surprise, quite positive. It is a powerful film. It is a violent film — perhaps the most violent film that most of us will ever see. It touched me deeply.

Why? I've meditated many times on the Passion of Christ in my ordinary prayer and my yearly retreats, but I have never understood, indeed I have probably tried not to understand, the suffering — both physical and psychological — that Jesus endured for me, for us.

Some would say that could be done with far less violence. Yet I think that the point is this: Christ took on all of our sinfulness, the sinfulness of human kind from the beginning to the end, and no matter how violent and inhuman his suffering is made on the screen, it doesn't even come close to what he endured. I didn't like watching what was on the screen, and I did turn my face away, and yes, the tears did well up. But I don't believe that all of the violence was simply there to pull on my emotions. Will this movie change my life? Well, I hope that those images of Jesus scourged, beaten and crucified will remain vivid in my own mind whenever my own thoughts turn in any way violent toward my brothers and sisters.

Is this a perfect movie? Of course not. Countless critics have already pointed out its shortcomings. Is it anti-Semitic? If you want to see anti-Semitism in it, you will. Is it true to Scripture? Yes and no. It is like doing an Ignatian contemplation on the Passion: it starts with Scripture, but also makes use of the imagination.

Was it too violent? Yes, for some, but I don't see the violence as gratuitous. As I mentioned above, it has a purpose. Does it give us a full view of the Jesus who taught, healed, fed and forgave, and then became the Christ through his passion, death and resurrection? No.

Any story, movie, painting or sculpture that considers one part of Jesus' earthly life as discrete in itself is going to give less than an accurate picture of who he was and what he did. From the Incarnation to the Ascension, the totality of Christ's life, death and resurrection is a unity. To look at only part of it is to see with a distorted eye.

Yet, does that stop us from celebrating Christmas as a feast in itself?

Do I recommend it? Well, I can only say that as difficult as it was to watch, I am not sorry that I saw it, and I will probably see it again. That said, be warned. This is one of those movies, one of those experiences in which way you get out of it depends very much on what you bring to it.

Pope at audience, asks St. Joseph to watch over families

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

By CINDY WOODEN
Catholic News Service

VATICAN CITY — Anticipating the March 19 feast of St. Joseph, Pope John Paul II prayed for families, particularly those in his native Poland, and encouraged young people to follow God's plan for their lives as St. Joseph did.

The pope's remarks about the feast day came at the end of his March 17 general audience; his main talk was a continuation of his series of explanations of the psalms used for evening prayer.

The mid-March audience was the first of 2004 to be held outside in St. Peter's Square. For 10 minutes before the audience began, the pope rode in an open popemobile, waving to and blessing the crowd.

Speaking to Polish pilgrims at the audience, the pope said the feast of St. Joseph "calls on today's families, comforted by the example of Mary and Joseph, who cared for the Incarnate Word with love, to draw from their (the Holy Family's) lifestyle inspiration in making daily decisions and strength in overcoming difficulties."

"Only in an authentic family, loving and united for life, can children reach a healthy maturity, drawing upon the example of unconditional love, faithfulness, mutual dedication and respect for life," the pope said.

"I pray that Polish families will be like this," he said.

He also spoke about St. Joseph in his remarks to Italians present in the square under a sunny spring sky.

The pope prayed that St. Joseph would help young people "to follow each day the desires of the Lord," that he would give support to those who are suffering and that he would help newlyweds accept God's plans for their new families.

In his main talk, the 83-year-old pope spoke about Psalm 21, a hymn of thanksgiving to God for his blessings on the king.

The Jews came to view the psalm as a hymn to the hoped-for messiah, the pope said, and later Christians read it as referring to Christ.

At the center of the psalm, the pope said, is gratitude for God's blessings on the king, particularly the blessing of life and of "length of days forever and ever."

With the resurrection, God gave Jesus not only a long life, but eternal life, he said.

"On the basis of this certainty, each Christian cultivates hope for the gift of eternal life," Pope John Paul said.

A funeral Mass on Ash Wednesday?

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS Columnist

Q. Two years ago, I was told we could not have a funeral Mass on Ash Wednesday. This year a funeral Mass was celebrated on that day. Has there been a change? (Texas)

A. Some slight changes have occurred in the past few years. According to regulations in the present Sacramentary (Missal), funeral Masses may not be celebrated on holy days of obligation, Holy Thursday, the Easter Triduum, and the Sundays of Advent, Lent and Easter. There is no prohibition for Ash Wednesday.

Similar rules govern Ritual Masses, connected with celebration of the sacraments or sacramentals (weddings, for example, and Masses with anointing of the sick or baptism). These are prohibited on Sundays of Advent, Lent and Easter, solemnities, days in the octave of Easter, All Souls Day, Ash Wednesday and during Holy Week (General Instruction of the Roman Missal, 3372 and 3380).

Note that it is funeral or ritual Masses that are prohibited. Funeral ceremonies, weddings and other sacramental liturgies without Mass may be celebrated on these days, with due respect, of course, for their liturgical character.

Message for Mel Gibson: A sequel to "The Passion"?

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

After months of publicity about Mel Gibson's film "The Passion of the Christ," I was anxious to see it — curious to see for myself how this film presents the truths of the Gospel. When I saw it, I must say honestly that I was deeply disappointed.

We see the torment, the torture and the death of Jesus. But I believe that unless one is very familiar with the Gospels, the violence on the screen, depicting the excruciating pain Jesus willingly accepted, cannot really be understood.

Many people I have talked to about this film agree and believe there should be a next step for Gibson. Cal Samra, the man who founded the Fellowship of Merry Christians, is one of them. He thinks the actor/director should do an even more challenging sequel titled "The Resurrection of Christ."

I spoke to Samra, and it struck me that he was onto something important.

Samra acted on his proposal by seeking out Gibson's company, Icon Productions, in Santa Monica, Calif., sending them a framed print of the painting "The Risen Christ by the Sea" and a letter that said:

"We think it is important that we not only experience the redemptive power and the suffering of the passion of Christ, but also God's great power, victory and eternal joy in an equally compelling movie production of his resurrection."

In our conversation, Samra was very clear in saying why he contacted Gibson.

"There's a major hole here. My thinking is that you can see what the Lord suffered and that really impacts you. But that's only half the story. I'm suggesting something extremely challenging: Do a sequel on the resurrection. There's so much more that goes on later. Can anyone ignore Christ's presence down the centuries?"

Samra told me that he has witnessed a new phenomenon that should be getting attention. Many modern churches are reviving the very old Christian tradition of resurrection celebrations. "One day is not enough to celebrate the resurrection," he explained.

He spoke of early Christians, naming the Greeks, Slavs and Italians, who had Easter celebrations that lasted a week, ending in "Bright Sunday," which was seen as the beginning of Christ's permanent presence in the world.

"These have died out over the last 1,000 years, but now a revival is happening," he repeated, mentioning several churches nationwide from Florida, Indiana and North Carolina to California.

At the First Presbyterian Church of Winter Haven, Fla., Bright Sunday has been celebrated again for the past five years, Samra told me. "Butterflies, a Christian symbol for the resurrection, were adopted as a decorating motif," he said.

"People are invited to dress in their brightest colors for worship that Sunday. Last year fiber optic lights were strung throughout the church. Included in each bulletin was a bookmark in the shape of a cross, with a butterfly and these words imprinted on it: 'Because I live, you also will live.'"

Samra's mission began 19 years ago after a traumatic experience catapulted him into a new understanding of God's love and goodness for each of us, revealed in the life, death and resurrection of his son, Jesus.

The fellowship Samra began, with the help of his wife, Rose, was sorely needed for it focuses on the light, laughter and joy Jesus gave to the world. The name of their publication says it well: "The Joyful Noiseletter."

I hope to read in it one day that Gibson was inspired to act on Samra's suggestion with a sequel titled "The Resurrection of the Christ."

A way of getting teens to Mass

Uncle Dan

DAN MORRIS
CNS COLUMNIST

As we struggle daily with pledges to go without something for the 40 days of Lent, we should take a serious look at the Adam-and-Eve Principle of the Universe: "Once you are told you may not do something, you want to do it all the more."

How come? Why would a nonbreakfast eater like myself, for example, develop an intense desire for International House of Pancakes after being told by a doctor not to eat before 9 a.m.?

Why will a 4-year-old circle the cookie jar for hours after being told to stay out of it? Yes, a 40-year-old will do the same thing.

We Catholics should use Lent to make this hands-off-the-apples thing work for us, not against us. Especially if Lent is a time to light a fire under our faith lives.

So maybe we should make it harder to go to church. Instead of using cattle prods to encourage our children to go to Mass, forbid it. Instead of paying your teen's car insurance as a bribe to attend confirmation classes, just tell the 16-year-old he or she may not attend church.

I can hear it now:

"My dear daughter, you may no longer attend confirmation classes. And we are thinking about making Mass off limits too."

"What?" asks daughter.

"You heard me. No confirmation. Probably no Mass."

"Is this a joke?"

"No joke. You just aren't mature enough to be confirmed. Stay away from St. All Saints for a while."

"But my friends are in that class."

"Tell someone who cares. Besides, that doesn't make you mature."

"Who says I'm not mature enough?"

Do not answer. Roll eyes.

"So, like, how do you measure maturity? I bet Msgr. O'Kneel thinks I'm mature enough."

"He doesn't live with you."

"We gotta talk about this."

"No we don't."

"I'm going to call Msgr. O'Kneel. And I can pay my own car insurance."

See? I think this will work. Of course, it could be a little tricky trying to persuade state and federal governments to pass laws making it difficult to attend church so that we will become fired up about attending church. Maybe we could tell our legislators there's no way they could do it. That might do it.

I think I hear voices in the cookie jar. I'd better go check.

The jobs and vocations young adults want

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

Terry Johnson, 30, graduated from the University of Notre Dame with an M.A. in theology and was eager to change the world. She worked for a large Midwestern parish for a few years, but became frustrated with rigidity among church staff: lack of open-mindedness to her new ideas and an absence of innovative ideas.

She began losing her love for the church; the energy and creativity that she evidenced while in school dwindled. So she packed up her talents and skills, and decided to try her luck at corporate America.

She bought a few nice suits and nylons, moved to a growing urban area and worked an office job — an entry-level marketing position — until she grew restless there too. The paycheck was nice, and the health benefits were incredible — not a small matter today when good health care is increasingly more difficult and costly to come by. But she left work feeling a bit empty.

"Am I really contributing anything to society?" she wondered. She returned to the question so many young adults ask over and over: "What is my vocation?"

Renee LaReau, a young-adult writer, chronicles the struggles of many 20- and 30-somethings in her book "Getting a Life: How to Find Your True Vocation." Like Johnson, LaReau and friends want to use their full potential, to find jobs that give glory to God. On top of that, it would be nice to get paid.

For LaReau, me and tons of other young adults, the word "vocation" used to conjure up images of religious life.

I can vividly recall the knot in my stomach as I explained to Sister Marie in fourth grade that I thought I was "called." When Sister Marie explained to our class that God calls a few special children to serve him in religious life, I was convinced my future involved taking care of elderly nuns in a building that resembled a retirement home.

I wanted to serve God, but my convent visits did little to attract me to that life. The fact that I loved God meant one thing: cutting my hair short and tucking it behind a veil.

As I studied religion in college, my understanding of "vocation" widened. I was relieved to discover that I might be able to shop at the Gap and still serve God.

LaReau articulates a similar experience when she writes: "Something happened to me gradually in my 20s as I went through college and graduate school, developed friendships and entered the working world. I began to sense that this concept of 'vocation' wasn't nearly as narrow as I'd thought. I began to catch some 'glimpses of grace,' hints that God was at work in the lives of my friends and family, that each of us was being called by God in our own way."

She quotes the spiritual writer Father Henri Nouwen, who wrote, "My deepest vocation is to be a witness to the glimpses of God I have been allowed to catch."

Indeed, vocation takes many forms in the lives of young adults today.

We know that no job is perfect and that no person, place, thing or career ever will fill the void that is simply part of being human. Only faith in a loving God and a few other things — like faithful friends, a caring family, a sense of humor — can help to satiate the thirst that keeps us searching, learning and wondering.

And when we grow exhausted, as we often do, it helps to know that we have the company of each other.

SALISBURY — Almost a century before a Catholic diocese was established in North Carolina, a small group of Rowan County Catholics gathered in Salisbury to celebrate their faith. That early presence led to the foundation of Sacred Heart Church, a parish rich in history and spirit.

The Roueche family, immigrants from Alsace, France, settled in Salisbury in the late 1830s. With the handful of Catholics living in the area attending, the Roueches hosted what was perhaps the first Mass celebrated in Salisbury. Father Timothy Cronin of the Diocese of Charleston, S.C., celebrated, and periodically returned to the town until his death in 1842.

Missionary priests visited Salisbury from time to time to celebrate liturgies in private homes during the next few decades. The local congregation grew, thanks in part to a number of converts to the faith. Cardinal James Gibbons, archbishop of Baltimore, Md., and vicar apostolic of North Carolina, occasionally celebrated Mass during his visits to Salisbury.

In 1881, Salisbury Catholics welcomed their first resident pastor, Father Patrick Moore, whose task it was to build a church in town. After a year of securing a site, fundraising and building, the completed church was dedicated by Bishop Henry Northrup of Charleston and named in honor of the Sacred Heart in 1882.

Benedictine monks assumed responsibility for Salisbury when Abbot Leo Haid became vicar apostolic of North Carolina in 1887. One of these monks, Benedictine Father Joseph Mueller, built the first rectory. The church was elevated to parish status in 1898, and the community again had a resident pastor to minister to its needs.

Sisters of Mercy from Belmont opened a private convent-school in 1910 near Sacred Heart Church. Through negotiations between the sisters and Bishop Eugene McGuinness of Raleigh, the school became a parish institution in the early 1940s.

As the congregation continued to grow, work began in 1940 to begin construction of a new church and rectory. In November, Bishop McGuinness, Abbot Vincent Taylor and monks from Belmont Abbey presided over the dedication ceremony.

Salisbury was incorporated into the Diocese of Raleigh in 1941, and Father Cletus Helfrich was appointed the first diocesan pastor to serve at Sacred Heart Church. He remained there until his death nearly 30 years later, overseeing church improvements and the elimination of the parish debt along the way.

A new Salisbury parish, Our Lady of Victories, was established in 1942 to serve black Catholics in the area. That community later merged with Sacred Heart Church.

During World War II, Sacred Heart Church served the pastoral and social needs of many Catholics stationed in the area. Saturday evening dances, Sunday morning breakfasts and other opportunities for fellowship were offered in the new church facility.

A new, split-level school was built in 1965 to accommodate the growing number of enrolled students.

Father Helfrich died in January 1971, the same year that Sacred Heart clergy's pastoral duties were extended to a newly built veterans' hospital in town.

The following year, the Diocese of Charlotte was formed and Father Thomas Clements was appointed pastor of Sacred Heart Church. Remodeling efforts during the 1970s and '80s included updating the layout of the church to conform to Vatican II standards, and refurbishing the basement and dedicating it to Father Helfrich's memory.

Father (now Msgr.) Anthony Kovacic, a native of Yugoslavia, was appointed to Sacred Heart Church in 1979. Through his guidance, a new diaconate program was established in the diocese.

In June 1982, Father Richard Allen was appointed to Sacred Heart Church. During his administration, a new entrance to the church was constructed and a colonnade built to connect the rectory and church.

By that year, the registered congregation was comprised of 435 families. The parish celebrated its 100th anniversary that year, and Msgr. John Roueche, a descendent of Richard Roueche, one of the Catholic pioneers in Salisbury, delivered the homily at the jubilee Mass. Msgr. Roueche was born, baptized, made his first communion, confirmed and ordained in Salisbury. He returned to the church in September 1993 to celebrate the 60th anniversary of his ordination.

A house located on the same block as the church was purchased for parish use in 1985. Named Marian House, it has been utilized as a preschool and for other parish functions. More classroom space has been added behind the house since then.

In August 1988, Father (now Bishop) Peter J. Jugis was appointed as parochial vicar of Sacred Heart Church. He served until the fall of 1989.

Father Clements also returned to Sacred Heart Church in 1988. Following a series of needs-targeting meetings, the parish kitchen was expanded and the parish hall refurbished.

On Oct. 11, 1992, priests and 300 parishioners of Sacred Heart Church gathered to honor three women who had given a total of 43 years to Sacred Heart Church. Arva Thomas retired after 10 years and Agnes Tompkins retired after 20 years as secretaries, and Mercy Sister Mary John Madden, principal, was honored for serving Sacred Heart School for 13 years during two assignments.

To welcome the growing number of Hispanic residents in Rowan County Sacred Heart Church began a full-time Hispanic ministry with a Spanish-language Mass in October 1995.

In April 2002, Mercy Sister Mary Robert Williams, pastoral associate since 1983, was honored with a Good Samaritan of the Year Award by the Civitan Club of Salisbury for her work in the parish and community.

A number of ministries thrive at Sacred Heart Church, including Knights of Columbus, Catholic Daughters, prison ministry and youth ministry, and Elizabeth Ministry is in its beginning stages.

Father John Putnam, who became pastor in July 2000 and is now also vicar forane of the Salisbury Vicariate and judicial vicar for the Diocese of Charlotte, now ministers to 830 families.

"It's a very ethnically diverse parish and that brings together a nice blend of the community," said Father Putnam.

The congregation continues to grow, and in 2003, the parish purchased a 40-acre tract of land with plans to build a larger church and school in the near future.

Pope: Patients must get nutrition, hydration as long as possible

'VEGETATIVE STATE' DOESN'T MAKE ONE LESS HUMAN, SAYS POPE

VATICAN CITY — Patients who are in a persistent vegetative state, even for years, must be given nutrition and hydration as long as their bodies can absorb the nourishment, Pope John Paul II said.

"The administration of water and food, even when delivered using artificial means, always represents a natural method of preserving life and not a medical act," the pope told an international group of physicians and ethicists.

The pope met the group March 20 at the end of a four-day meeting on the ethical decisions surrounding life-sustaining treatments for patients in a persistent vegetative state.

CHARLOTTE — Bishop Peter J. Jugis is returning to the Vatican.

Bishop Jugis is among the first U.S. bishops making their "ad limina" visits to the Vatican in late March, a series of encounters that combine prayer, pastoral planning and personal conversation with Pope John Paul II.

Bishop Jugis studied at the North American College, the U.S. seminary in Rome, and was ordained in 1983 by Pope John Paul II in St. Peter's Basilica.

The bishop will be at the Vatican March 27-April 2, along with nearly two dozen other bishops from the southeastern United States. The Diocese of Charlotte is part of

MEMORIES OF MOLDOVA

Peace Corps volunteer Jo Rogers of Pacific City, Ore., is pictured with a family in Briceni, Moldova, in 2003. She spent two years working in the poverty-stricken former Soviet republic.

Oregon Catholic woman spends two years in Moldova with Peace Corps

PACIFIC CITY, Ore. (CNS) — Jo Rogers, 71, spent two of her golden years working 5,000 miles from home in a poverty-stricken former Soviet republic strewn with pesticides and still polluted from the nuclear explosion at nearby Chernobyl, Ukraine.

She'd do it again, too.

As a Peace Corps volunteer in Moldova during 2001-2003, the member of St. Joseph Mission in Cloverdale, Ore., worked with elderly people who get almost no social support in the small nation.

Until recently, Moldova was a land without even a soup kitchen.

Rogers, a great-grandmother and veteran social worker, marshaled a network of Moldovan visiting nurses and linked them to older people in need. She paved the way for seniors to attend clinics and other service outlets. In the midst of it all, she also made friends and learned the value of a simple life.

A few years ago, Rogers met a former Peace Corps worker who told her that about 6 percent of the organization's volunteers are age 50 and older.

She did some research and decided to serve in Moldova, a country that is about the size of Maryland, sandwiched between Romania and Ukraine.

Despite the language barrier, Rogers was the only American living in the small regional hub of Edinet, where toilets are outdoors and schools and other buildings have no heat.

Rogers' small two-room apartment had a single electrical outlet. Her bed was hard, and she had to collect water from a nearby well.

She worked in clinics where patient rooms were unheated and the stained mattresses were filled with straw. Patients were required to bring their own linens. One day, she watched a man in his 50s die from a heart attack because the clinic had no working defibrillator and no oxygen.

In the north, a new Peace Corps-initiated soup kitchen served one meal a week, preventing the starvation deaths common in previous years.

For the very poor, the Russian and Romanian Orthodox churches operate church schools. The nation of 4.5 million has about 20,000 Catholics, but only three Catholic parishes.

"I missed contact with the church," Rogers said.

She read Scripture and prayed the Stations of the Cross in her apartment since it was two hours by bus to the nearest Catholic church.

Now at home, Rogers plans to visit many of the friends she made in the Peace Corps.

New yearbook of churches shows membership, giving on rise

NEW YORK (CNS) — Christian church membership and giving rose in 2002, but the proportion of giving for benevolences fell to a new low, says the new Yearbook of American and Canadian Churches.

Prepared for and edited by the National Council of Churches, the 2004 edition of the yearbook lists U.S. and Canadian church bodies with a brief description of each.

Total U.S. Christian church membership for 2002 was nearly 161.2 million, about 2.2 million higher than in 2001, the yearbook says. The largest denomination was the Catholic Church, with 66.4 million. The Southern Baptist Convention ranked second with more than 16.2 million members.

Most major churches recorded membership increases in 2002, but losses were recorded by the United Methodist Church, Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.), Lutheran Church-Missouri Synod, African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church and United Church of Christ.

Among 59 U.S. denominations that reported total giving nationwide in 2002, church contributions per member grew to $658.63, about $36 higher than the year before. Those denominations had a combined membership of nearly 47.8 million, who contributed a total of nearly $31.5 billion.

The Catholic Church does not provide national figures on membership giving, so it was not included in the yearbook figures. However Joseph C. Harris, a longtime researcher on Catholic giving patterns, recently estimated the nation's 66 million Catholics gave their church about $9.15 billion — $8 billion to parishes and $1.15 billion to dioceses and other Catholic organizations.

Vatican disapproves of killing of Hamas leader

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican spoke out against the killing of Hamas founder and spiritual leader Ahmed Yassin, assassinated March 22 by missiles from Israeli helicopters as he left a mosque in Gaza City.

"The Holy See joins the international community in expressing its disapproval of this act of violence, which is not justifiable in any state of law," said Joaquin Navarro-Valls, head of the Holy See's press office

In a statement released March 22, Navarro-Valls said, "The position and feelings of the Holy See are clearly expressed in the words of the Holy Father to the diplomatic corps on Jan.12."

Navarro-Falls highlighted a portion of Pope John Paul II's address earlier this year to ambassadors accredited to the Holy See, in which he addressed continued violence in the Holy Land.

"I will never tire of telling the leaders of these two peoples: The choice of violence, the recourse, on one side, to terrorism, and on the other side to reprisals, the humiliation of the adversary, hateful propaganda, all lead nowhere," said the pope.

"Only respect for the legitimate aspirations of both parties, a return to the negotiating table and the concrete commitment of the international community alone can be the first step toward a solution," he said.

Navarro-Valls said the pope had underlined in his speech that "true and lasting peace cannot come out of a simple show of force; 'it is the result of moral and juridical action.'"

Pope tells seminarians no conflict in serving diocese, wider church

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II reminded seminarians in the Neocatechumenal Way movement that there was no contradiction between serving the needs of their dioceses and fulfilling the church's universal mission of salvation.

In an address March 18 to some 120 members of Redemptoris Mater Seminary in Rome, the pope praised its success in forming "a great number of zealous priests."

But, he said, "You must avoid the false choice between pastoral service in the diocese to which you belong and the universal mission" to proclaim the Gospel "for which you are especially prepared through your experience with the Neocatechumenal Way."

Redemptoris Mater seminaries are run by the Neocatechumenal Way, an international movement in the church grounded in parish-based communities that provide religious instruction and fellowship.

The pope expressed his gratitude to the founders of the movement, Kiko Arguello and Carmen Hernandez, "who did so much to promote, within the Way, vocations to the priesthood and consecrated life." More than 30 Neocatechumenal Way seminaries have been set up around the world since the movement's founding in Spain in 1964.

The pope told the seminarians that upon their ordination, their bishop, not the movement, would be entrusted with deciding their "actual destination."

He said the bishop "has in his heart both the needs of the diocese and the needs of the universal mission. By entrusting yourselves to obey his decisions cordially and faithfully, you will find interior peace and serenity."

He added that whether they are called to serve the local diocese or be sent elsewhere to spread the Gospel "either way you will be able to express your missionary charism given that, even here in Rome, there is an ever-growing need for evangelization."

Ann Church meet the first Wednesday of each month with a luncheon and program at 1 p.m. in the parish activity center, 3635 Park Rd. All adults age 55 and older are welcome. For more information, call Charles Nesto at (704) 398-0879.

DID YOU KNOW?

THE CROSS — OFFICIAL SYMBOL OF CHRISTIANITY

The cross was a well-known symbol before the time of Christ. It was used as a special mark on clothes and buildings. However, when Christ was crucified, the cross became a symbol of suffering. With the resurrection of Christ, the Christians came to see the cross as Jesus' victory over death. At the Council of Nicaea in 325 A.D., Emperor Constantine issued a decree that the cross would be the official symbol of Christianity.

Eight to graduate from ministry extension program in May

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

NORTH WILKESBORO — A group from the Diocese of Charlotte recently took another step in their path towards ministry formation.

Eight people held their last LIMEX class together at St. John Baptist de la Salle Church March 18. The group turned in their papers for the final course, and was then highlighted at a Mass celebrated by Father John Hanic, pastor.

The LIMEX (Loyola Institute for Ministry Extension) program offers master's degrees and non-credit, continuing education certificates in religious education and pastoral studies from Loyola University of New Orleans.

The group from North Wilkesboro will be able to attend graduation ceremonies at Loyola University in May.

"They've worked hard and grown a lot in their faith as a result of their participation in the program," said Frank Villaronga, director of the diocesan office of Evangelization and Ministry Formation and the liaison between Loyola University and the Diocese of Charlotte.

The diocese began sponsoring the opportunity for higher education in 1998. Prior to that, the Oratory in Rock Hill, S.C., was the sponsoring agency for students in the diocese.

Founded in 1983, the 36-hour program offers a total of 12 classes for the non-traditional student, a person who works a full-time job or has a family and cannot attend classes on a college campus. Since the diocese does not offer a master's level program in those areas, people who wish to continue their educations can take advantage of LIMEX.

Participants can acquire a master's degree or a certification in continuing education, said Villaronga.

The students gather with a Loyola-trained facilitator and discuss what they have read for the class and have videos and audiotapes as supplements to their own study. Each class can require from one to four papers with up to 20 hours of preparation per week.

The 10 core courses consist of subjects such as practical theology, pastoral leadership and organization, church, sacraments and ethics and other classes. The two focus classes include youth ministry, Hispanic ministry, religious education and other areas of concentration.

"The students meet in groups, so they are able to be challenged and challenge others as they focus on practical theology," said Villaronga. "They integrate the material into their lives and into the complex world around them."

Villaronga said LIMEX groups can be formed anywhere there is interest. Currently, additional groups are being formed in Charlotte, Greensboro and the Smoky Mountain area.

ASHEVILLE — "It's the Hard-Knock Life" at Asheville Catholic School.

The first major production of the school's drama department, "Annie Jr.," played to a receptive and enthusiastic crowd opening night, March 18.

Based on "Annie," the popular Broadway musical, "Annie Jr." was directed by religion teacher Lisa Kennedy and involved more than 80 students — one third of the student body — either on stage or behind the scenes. The school's "junior" version, performed four times to more than 1,000 people March 18-21, featured shorter scenes and songs suitable for children in kindergarten through eighth grade.

"It was the school's first major drama production and the students showed all of Asheville what talented children we have."

— Lisa Kennedy

"It was amazing," said Kennedy. "It was the school's first major drama production and the students showed all of Asheville what talented children we have."

"The students produced the entire play, said Kennedy, from designing costumes to advertising. "They even baked the goodies sold at the concession stand," she said. "They made the play from A to Z."

When Kennedy came to Asheville Catholic School this year, she noted the school did not have a theater arts program, in which she has experience. She suggested an after-school program, which she said "snowballed" to dozens of students.

"Everyone — faculty, staff and parents — has been very supportive and encouraging," said Kennedy.

Before the March 18 show began, six "orphans" wowed the audience with their Irish step-dancing routine. The musical opened with the orphans, comprised of kindergarten through eighth-grade students, singing, "It's the Hard-Knock Life."

To get the various age groups to sing in unison and tune, Kennedy said they first practiced in small groups before coming together in the last three weeks.

Annie, played by third-grader Taylor Ruff, and Sandy, played by first-grader Emma Lenderman on opening night, had no trouble hitting the high notes of their duet, "Tomorrow."

Other cast members included eighth-grader Alex Swendsen as Daddy Warbucks and sixth-grader Daniel Bradley as President Franklin Roosevelt.

All four performances of "Annie Jr." were sold out before opening night. After the show, awards were presented to students who sold the most tickets and advertising, with recognition for the parents who assisted with the production.

Kennedy said there are plans to bring "The Sound of Music" to the school in February or March of next year.

"Our goal is to have 100 or more students in that show," she said.

Making strides

Holy Trinity students succeed with shoe drive

CHARLOTTE — Catholic middle school students are making a difference — feet first.

The sixth-, seventh- and eighth-graders at Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School worked diligently to make the recent Samaritan's Feet shoe drive a success.

The eight Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools (MACS) kicked off their "Shoe of Hope" collection drives Feb. 2. Samaritan's Feet sponsored the drives in the Catholic schools in celebration of Black History Month in February.

Samaritan's Feet barrels were set up in the MACS schools to receive donated shoes through Feb. 25.

Within the few short weeks of the drive's duration, shoes piled high in the thousands at Holy Trinity.

"The shoes just kept coming in," said Richard Roach, director of school campus ministry. "I've been teaching for over 24 years and have never seen this kind of response from students."

Local retailers joined the foot frenzy and anonymously kicked in up to 50 or 60 pairs a piece.

Roach credited the students' motivation to a message from Emmanuel Ohonme, founder and president of Samaritan's Feet, a Charlotte-based humanitarian and interfaith evangelical organization dedicated to providing shoes for the feet of impoverished families in the United States and the world.

Ohonme, a Nigerian native, conceived of the idea for Samaritan's Feet more than four years ago. His life was changed when, at the age of nine, he received his first pair of shoes from a "Good Samaritan" from Wisconsin who visited Ohonme's hometown of Lagos. Ohonme went on to participate in sports and eventually earned a full sports scholarship to attend the University of North Dakota.

Shoes collected from Samaritan's Feet drives have been sent to needy families in various parts of the world, often where shoes are a luxury. When the shoes reach the families, the missionaries wash the feet of the recipients, just as Christ did with his disciples, and they pray with them.

To hear the difference a single pair of shoes made in Ohonme's life was all the Holy Trinity students needed to get their feet moving, according to MaryAnn Jerrum, a member of the school's communications committee.

By March 22, the first truckload of shoes had been shipped out, and another truck was scheduled to pick up the overflow. The shoes would be sent to children in Africa and around the world.

"I can't believe he became a college basketball player all because of a pair of shoes," said one student.

As a result of the shoe drive, the Holy Trinity students were reminded of their ability to change a life and the additional gift of a renewed appreciation for the basics, starting feet first.

In April, the Diocese of Charlotte will support the Samaritan's Mile run to begin at Memorial Stadium in Charlotte, April 10.

Bishop meets pope

Region 14, which includes North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia and Florida.

Conducted by regional groupings over the next 10 months, the "ad limina" visits will represent the most extensive review of church life in the United States since the sex abuse crisis erupted into a national scandal two years ago.

But while the pope is expected to speak about priestly sex abuse, the agenda for the "ad limina" visits is much broader than that. Diocese by diocese, the meetings will take the pulse of sacramental life, vocational trends, liturgical developments, religious education and a host of other areas.

Bishop Jugis, like other bishops, will get about 15 minutes alone with the pope to discuss the situation in his diocese.

"I am looking forward to meeting with the Holy Father in person and telling him about the vitality of our parishes and the spirit of generosity the people in the diocese show in welcoming newcomers," said the bishop.

Bishop Jugis also plans to discuss how the Diocese of Charlotte has responded to priestly sex abuse issues.

"I will share with him all our diocese has done before and since the compliancy audit to create safe environments in our churches for our young people, and the number of clergy, employees and volunteers who have been trained to recognize signs of sexual abuse," said Bishop Jugis.

"Also, I'll tell him that I have been praying daily for victims of sexual abuse and that I have been asking the people of the diocese to pray for them," he said, "I will also tell him how the diocese has been offering assistance to victims who have come forward through the victims' assistance coordinators."

The "ad limina" visits are made every five years, and their name comes from the Latin phrase "ad limina apostolorum" (to the thresholds of the apostles), a reference to the pilgrimage to the tombs of Sts. Peter and Paul that the bishops are required to make.

Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin made his first "ad limina" visit as ordinary of the Diocese of Charlotte in March 1998.

"I told the Holy Father of the wonderful generosity of our people, and that I bring with me their prayers and love for him," said Bishop Curlin after his visit.

Bishop Curlin's visit with the pope, which also lasted about 15 minutes, included dialogue about the increase of Catholics and development of multicultural ministries in western North Carolina; Catholic schools, youth ministry and faith formation programs; and vocations in the diocese.

From the outside, "ad limina" visits may look a lot like branch managers being called to the head office. The bishops say that's not the mood on the inside.

"We're actually looking at it as a spiritual pilgrimage," said Australian Bishop Michael Putney of Townsville, who was in Rome for his "ad limina" visit in mid-March.

"The first thing is visiting the tombs of the apostles, and the second is spending time with the pope. Those are the priorities, although visiting the Vatican congregations is an important exercise in communion," said the archbishop.

Because of his frailty, Pope John Paul's participation in the visits has lessened in recent years. Unlike previous visits, this time U.S. bishops cannot count on concelebrating Mass with the 83-year-old pontiff or having lunch with him in his private apartment.

The pope still greets the bishops as a group and either delivers a talk or hands them the text. He still takes the time to meet with each bishop individually, although these encounters often last less than the standard 15 minutes of previous years.

Pope John Paul II embraces Bishop Peter J. Jugis at his priestly ordination at St. Peter's Basilica June 12, 1983. Bishop Jugis will return to the Vatican to meet with the pope for his "ad limina" visit in late March.

Especially for bishops on their first "ad limina" visit, the papal audience is an important moment. Typically, the pope listens more than he talks, but intersperses enough detailed questions to amaze some of his guests.

Media attention on these visits frequently focuses on problem areas, and the pope is sometimes depicted as a tough CEO who dishes out criticism. In fact, the pope takes care to highlight the positive as well as the negative, and generally he's very encouraging to the bishops.

Bishop Jugis said he had no concerns or worries about meeting with the pope.

"I feel very confident that we are serving the people of God considering the growth we have," said the bishop. "Many of our parishes are growing and expanding, and many are undertaking pastoral planning or completing capital campaigns for building projects," he said.

Vatican sources said the pope's speeches to U.S. bishops are likely to cover a wide range of issues, including:

— Pastoral challenges in the wake of the clergy sex abuse crisis.

— The bishop's role as teacher and a figure of doctrinal unity.

— Formation and selection of priesthood candidates.

— Evangelizing in a pluralistic society.

— Pro-life issues like abortion, euthanasia and genetic experimentation.

— The importance of the Eucharist and proper liturgical celebration.

— The ongoing tensions between the clerical and lay roles, along with the decline in priestly vocations.

— Marriage and family life and pastoral outreach to young people.

The sources said the pope's words undoubtedly will strike some political nerves during an election year. Abortion, homosexual unions, the death penalty, economic justice and the U.S. role in the world are all likely campaign issues that will find an echo in some papal speeches.

But the pope will try to make sure his words cannot be seen as meddling in partisan politics.

"He will state the principles and let others draw the conclusions," said one Vatican official.

Preparation for the "ad limina" visits begins long before the bishops arrive in Rome. Based on a 25-page list of questions from the Vatican's Congregation for Bishops, each local bishop prepares a five-year report detailing diocesan life under headings including family, education, doctrine and morals, clergy and religious.

The report goes to the Vatican, where a summary is prepared for the pope. In theory, the reports are due six months before the visits begin, but in practice they arrive much closer to the "ad limina" dates, according to several bishops. The Vatican also encourages a separate common report from each group of bishops, presenting issues that need to be taken up with Vatican offices during their visit.

When the bishops arrive in Rome, they typically go as a group to the major congregations — the Vatican departments dealing with bishops, doctrine, education and seminaries, and liturgy and sacraments. The bishops like to have quality time with the cardinal-prefect of the congregations, but that doesn't always happen.

"Since this is my first 'ad limina' visit, I will go to all of my meetings as a learner who is open to any questions the congregations may have about the Diocese of Charlotte," said Bishop Jugis.

On the third or fourth day of the visit, bishops usually split into subgroups or call individually on other Vatican departments, depending on personal interest or pending diocesan issues. They gather in the evening to share the results of their conversations.

All bishops say a spiritual highlight is concelebrating Mass in St. Peter's Basilica, near the tomb of the first pope. They celebrate a similar liturgy in Rome's Basilica of St. Paul Outside the Walls.

Both moments remind the bishops of how, in the earliest days of the church, St. Paul journeyed to Jerusalem and spent two weeks consulting with St. Peter about their respective ministries. In those days, the traveling was harder, the agenda was simpler, and St. Paul wasn't carrying a five-year report in his suitcase.

Planting seeds in the garden of God

Women explore God's motherly love

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Each spring for the past five years, women have gathered at St. Matthew Church to celebrate Mary's Annunciation, when she consented to be the mother of Jesus Christ. They socialize, pray and reflect on this pivotal event in the life of Mary.

This year's Women's Day brought together more than 130 women to ponder the theme "How does YOUR garden grow?" March 20. The day's discussions revolved around God's parental love and how to cultivate a relationship with God.

"What keeps you from planting your seed in God's garden and allowing him to nurture you with his love?" was brought up by guest speaker Susan Brady, former southern regional director of faith formation for the Diocese of Charlotte.

Brady described God as loving and nurturing, like a parent who never abandons or stops loving her child. Throughout the day, she vividly related the many ways God reaches out to people and how they can respond to his love.

God did not remain in the Garden of Eden, but rather went with Adam and Eve after their expulsion, she said.

"God says to us, 'Here I am, where are you?'" Brady explained to her audience. "Our God is a God of second, third, fourth chances."

Brady described four types of soil in which a gardener plants seeds. First is the open ground, where the birds can come and eat the seed before it has a chance to take root.

The second type of soil is in thorns that choke the seed. Third is amongst the rocks, which prevent light and water from reaching the seed.

The fourth, ideal, soil is rich and fertile, which provides the seed with the nourishment it needs to thrive. Brady compared Mary and her obedience to God's will to the rich soil.

"Will you allow the shadow of the Lord to overpower you and give birth to the power of Christ?" Brady asked.

She said there are signs God knows his word "has taken root in you. You produce serenity, peace and understanding. In turn, a person with these qualities is difficult to battle or upset."

Two participants at the St. Matthew Women's Day place flowers on the garden display. At the bottom of the display felt "stones" can be seen, which were removed from the garden and used to built the wall enclosing the garden.

She also stressed the importance of gratitude, which "shows you're paying attention," as a way to improve one's relationship with God.

"Gratitude will produce in you humility," she said. "It's very difficult to give someone a gift who won't receive it."

"Constant thanksgiving will allow you to build a wonderful rapport with God," she said. "That rapport in turn breeds joy."

"So much of life is acceptance, especially your relationship with God and the human condition," Brady said.

Brady urged the women to contemplate what "stones need to be removed from your garden."

These "stones" symbolize what is lacking in a person, what is a barrier to loving God and allowing her to return to the security of the Garden of Eden. Such barriers are frustration and fear.

Brady illustrated how stones can also have positive connotations. In ancient times, women sat on stones while giving birth. Therefore rocks were not associated with foundations, but with bringing forth life.

According to Brady, in his Gospel John wrote that at the end of our lives, God will give each of us a stone and on it will be written a new name, symbolizing who we really are.

"We were aiming for an uplifting day, one that is inspiring for women," said Beth McDuffie, a member of the Women's Day steering committee. "We want the women to leave feeling better about themselves."

"God is our master gardener," said Emily Bowling one of the participants. "We are plants in his garden, each with our own strengths and weaknesses. God provides all that we need to grow in his love."

ANNUNCIATION OF THE LORD MARCH 25

Mary has an important role to play in God's plan. From all eternity God destined her to be the mother of Jesus and closely related to him in the creation and redemption of the world. As Mary is God's instrument in the incarnation, she has a role to play with Jesus in creation and redemption. Mary becomes the eminent figure she is only by God's grace. She is the empty space where God could act.

Together with Jesus, Mary is the link between heaven and earth. She is the human being who best, after Jesus, exemplifies the possibilities of human existence. She received into her lowliness the infinite love of God. She shows how an ordinary human being can reflect God in the ordinary circumstances of life. She exemplifies what the Church and every member of the Church is meant to become. She is the ultimate product of the creative and redemptive power of God. She manifests what the incarnation is meant to accomplish for all of us.

New book examines issues raised in 'The Da Vinci Code'

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — "The Da Vinci Code," a best-selling book by Dan Brown, stirred up controversy with its assertions that the Gospels didn't tell the true story of Jesus and claims Jesus married Mary Magdalene and appointed her to lead a feminist spiritual movement.

"De-Coding Da Vinci: The Facts Behind the Fiction of 'The Da Vinci Code,'" a new book published by Our Sunday Visitor, examines these claims and countless others in the best seller and points out what it describes as factual and historical inaccuracies.

The best seller, published last year, begins with the premise that Leonardo da Vinci used his art to communicate secret knowledge about the Holy Grail. It then claims early Christians did not see Jesus as divine and also criticizes the church for keeping secret thousands of texts that detail Christ's humanity.

"De-Coding Da Vinci," which will be in bookstores in April, was written by Amy Welborn, a columnist for Our Sunday Visitor and formerly for Catholic News Service. It asserts that Brown's novel contains a mixture of "a number of different strands of speculation, esoteric lore, and pseudo-history published in other books."

Welborn said there is simply no evidence to support the premise that Jesus wanted to begin a movement focusing on awareness of the "sacred feminine" which was eventually suppressed by Emperor Constantine.

She holds up many of Brown's claims to credible scholarly sources with the hope that readers will be able to distinguish fact from fiction.

In her introduction, Welborn finds fault with "The Da Vinci Code" for its claims to historical accuracy. She said the book's "imaginative detail and false historical assertions are presented as facts and the fruit of serious historical research, which they simply are not."

After Welborn takes a close look at Mary Magdalene, the Gospels, women in Christianity, da Vinci's art, Opus Dei, the Holy Grail and other topics, she concludes a positive outcome from the popularity of "The Da Vinci Code" is the interest it stirred in thinking about who Jesus really is, what Christianity was all about, and issues of gender and spirituality.

"What's unfortunate," she writes, "is that the reading public has embraced the historical assertions made in 'The Da Vinci Code' with such enthusiasm."

She notes the way people have been so taken up by the book shows a "failure of churches of all kinds to communicate these very basic facts of history and Christian theology" to their members. She suggests that readers set themselves straight by going back to a source they most likely already have on their bookshelves — the Bible.

Editor's Note: "De-Coding Da Vinci: The Facts Behind the Fiction of 'The Da Vinci Code'" will be in bookstores this April.

Sorrow is one common reaction. Anger and grief and fear and puzzlement are others, often mixed together. Some will feel righteous indignation; others will be overwhelmed with gratitude. Many of us — our attention spans, sad to say, grown flaccid on a steady diet of overstimulation from television and video games and movies — will simply be bored.

There are many responses we may have then on hearing the solemn proclamation of the Lord's Passion on Palm Sunday and Good Friday.

One that offers us great hope for transformation is compassion. The word literally means "suffering with." It is different from pity, which looks on the suffering of others from afar. Compassion involves a deep connection with the one who suffers, a recognition of our fundamental kinship.

For followers of Jesus, the compassion arising from reflection on his suffering and death is a dangerous virtue. It breaks down the safe distance we often try to place between ourselves and the suffering of others. Compassion softens our hearts, not only to the pain Christ suffered on the torturous road to his execution, but also to the agony of Christ present in the suffering of his brothers and sisters living among us.

Where do we find the suffering Christ today? We find him in the deaths of children fallen before the onslaught of abortion; in the humiliation of people who are taunted and mocked for the sake of a laugh; in the ravages of malnutrition and disease visited upon the world's poorest people; in the oppression of those who confront economic and social injustice; in the devastating impact of addiction upon families and cultures.

In these final days of Lent, may we listen more carefully to the ancient story of Christ's suffering. May God grant us the gift of compassion and the courage to act on it.

'Scooby' sequel is for the dogs

Matthew Lillard and Scooby-Doo star in "Scooby-Doo 2: Monsters Unleashed," a stale sequel that finds the Scooby gang having to thwart a masked madman threatening to use a monster-making machine on their home town. Like its 2002 predecessor, the intentionally campy film stays true to its cartoon roots; however, it rarely progresses past the same sort of self-conscious parody of the first flick, resulting in a movie full of forced, retread humor and bloated special-effects sequences, lacking freshness — not to mention a coherent plot. Some mild crude language and puerile humor, as well as some scary action sequences. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

Poll: Most Americans don't blame all Jews for Jesus' death

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Less than 2 percent of Americans blame Jews and Jewish institutions of today for the death of Jesus, according to results of a poll taken within two weeks of the release of the movie "The Passion of the Christ."

By contrast, 24 percent of Americans familiar with the movie say Jews alive at the time were most responsible for Jesus' crucifixion.

Among those polled who had seen the film, 5 percent said "The Passion" made them more likely to hold Jews responsible, while 12 percent said it made them less likely to hold today's Jews responsible.

Nine percent said the movie made them less likely to hold Jews responsible, compared to 2 percent who said it made them more likely. Among both groups, at least 80 percent of those polled said the film made no impact on their attitude toward Jewish culpability.

The poll was commissioned by the San Francisco-based Institute for Jewish & Community Research.

"While the film may have a different impact elsewhere in the world, so far 'The Passion of the Christ' is not producing any significant anti-Jewish backlash" in the United States, said Gary Tobin, president of the Institute for Jewish & Community Research.

In a March 18 interview with Catholic News Service, Tobin said the polling results could differ over the long term and in other countries. After seeing the results from this survey, he said, "I think we'll have to do another poll."

Tobin said the results were "very good news that the teachings of Vatican II, and the teachings that have come from the Lutheran Church and other denominations, (are) what American Christians believe. In fact, they believe it to the tune of 98 percent. In all my life in polling, I've never seen 98 percent for or against anything."

He noted some Christian and Jewish leaders were "understandably worried" about anti-Jewish hostility as a result of the movie, adding their concern was "not unfounded given the rise of anti-Semitism around the world, and the central theme of Christ-killing in anti-Jewish prejudice."

In other survey findings, 62 percent said they were satisfied with "The Passion" the way it is, while 16 percent would have preferred more emphasis on Jesus' life and teachings; 64 percent said the movie provided an accurate and thorough portrayal of the meaning of Jesus' life, while 13 percent disagreed; and 62 percent said the film was true to the Gospels, while 19 percent said that director, producer and co-writer Mel Gibson imposed his own interpretation of events that may not be accurate.

The poll queried 1,003 adults, including 146 who had seen the movie, nine to 13 days after the film's Feb. 25 opening. The polling data is accurate within plus or minus 3.1 percentage points; the margin of error was 3.7 percentage points among respondents who had seen the film or were familiar with it.

Without Gibson's star appeal, 'Therese' film has trouble finding niche

BY LELNA PENNINO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROCKVILLE CENTRE, N.Y. — Absent the star power of Mel Gibson, who directed, produced and co-wrote "The Passion of the Christ," other privately funded Christian films are struggling to get into theaters.

One such movie is "Therese," the story of St. Therese of Lisieux, also known as the Little Flower, who lived a short life in a French Carmelite monastery doing little things with great love.

"Therese" had been scheduled for release last autumn, but it's been postponed until October to drum up public and monetary support.

"'Therese' is a different kind of film, filled with the innocence of simplicity and reveals the incredibly rich interior life of the human soul," said director Leonardo Defilippis, whose nonprofit firm, Luke Films, produced the film.

Although the 19th-century period production garnered a standing ovation from Catholic dignitaries associated with mission work at a private Vatican screening last May, it has not yet created a stir among the public.

"There have been difficulties," said Defilippis. He estimates the company still needs $2 million to open in select theaters. "This movie is a total work of charity. It has been done the 'Little Way' with all these little people scattered all over the world, trusting in this project."

"Therese" is relying heavily on publicity from a Web site called www.theresemovie.com and efforts from grass-roots religious volunteers to push the film into theaters.

"It's just how the Gospel started," Defilippis told The Long Island Catholic, Rockville Centre's diocesan newspaper. "Christ told the people around him and then the word just spread."

"Many miracles were needed to make this dream a reality," said Defilippis. Although St. Therese is a popular saint, Luke Films would need another miracle to drum up just a fraction of the attention "The Passion of the Christ" has achieved.

"Our movie, I have heard someone say, is like opening up a door and looking into a very private world. It's like looking into someone's soul," he said. St. Therese's adventures were mental, emotional and spiritual so "how do you go inside a young woman's heart and mind? That's the challenge. St. Therese is like the Blessed Mother, very hidden in the Gospel; there is not the drama of the Crucifixion."

St. Therese of Lisieux's story is a bittersweet one. She fell into depression after her mother died when Therese was 4. Her sister, who was like a second mother to her, left to join a Carmelite monastery a few years later. At 14, Therese fell in love with God, traveled to the Vatican and successfully petitioned the pope to allow her to enter a Carmelite religious order, although she technically wasn't old enough.

Although she died of tuberculosis when she was 24, Pope John Paul II proclaimed her a doctor of the church in 1997 — one of only three women to hold that honor — largely due to her philosophy of the Little Way. "What matters in life, is not great deeds, but great love," she wrote in her autobiography, "Story of a Soul," published after her death.

"She was not a Joan of Arc, not a Mother Teresa, she did not do dramatic things," said Defilippis. Yet the saint's Little Way resonates with many people including Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, who took her religious name in honor of the Little Flower and borrowed the saint's philosophy, "Do small things with great love."

"A lot of us haven't done anything so dramatic that it will appear in the press and that's OK," said Defilippis. "You don't need to climb Mount Tabor or save a multitude. If you have love, help your mother, a stranger; you have given a great gift."

The director is hopeful that "The Passion of the Christ" will create a media path so other Catholic and Christian movie producers can follow in the wake of its success.

"'The Passion' is stirring up all kinds of things and awareness of Christ," he said.

"It's God's providence that the 'Passion' go first; Therese would want it no other way. The master should lead and the servant will follow," he said.

The rules of medicine

Bradley Institute, BAC explore ethics in research

BELMONT — Missing cadavers at medical schools. Animal laboratory testing. Patient privacy and confidentiality. Experimental drug testing.

It seems everywhere you turn, medicine and research are making their way into newspaper headlines and on the news. More importantly, decisions made on these issues are beginning to come to light as some people are questioning the ethics involved.

The Bradley Institute and Belmont Abbey College will host a presentation by Dr. Edward Gabriele, "Within the Rules: The Limits of Integrity and Ethics in Medical Research," April 1. The event is free and open to the public.

Gabriele currently serves as director of Research Integrity and Ethics at the U.S. Navy Bureau of Medicine and Surgery and as special assistant to the Surgeon General of the Navy for Research Integrity and Ethics. He is responsible for overseeing a number of programs including human research, animal research, ethics faculty leadership and ethics publications programs.

He also holds an appointment as an adjunct assistant professor in the Development of Preventive Medicine and Biometrics at the Uniformed Services University in Bethesda, Md., where he provides consultation in research ethics.

A former director for the Office of Research Administration and the Human Subjects Protection Program at the Naval Medical Research Center, Gabriele has earned numerous degrees. He holds Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Science degrees from Villanova University, a Master of Divinity from The Catholic Theological Union and a Doctor of Divinity from The Catholic University of America.

In addition to his work in research administration, Gabriele serves as an academic theologian for various communities of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America, and is the author of nine books of liturgical poetry and pastoral reflection.

The Bradley Institute for the Study of Christian Culture at Belmont Abbey College, which is hosting Gabriele's visit, was founded in 1996 by its director, Dr. Robert A. Preston. Preston served Belmont Abbey College as its 13th president for six years until his retirement in 2001.

The Bradley Institute provides opportunities for business executives, career professionals and clergy to examine relevant ethical, theological and philosophical topics within the context of their modern lives. Program topics range from business, legal and medical ethics to history and philosophy.

The Institute is named for Rev. John P. Bradley, former president of Belmont Abbey College and former CEO and chairman of the board of Good Will Publishers of Charlotte.

Latin America in the 21st century

BAC hosts forum with local, international experts

BELMONT — Belmont Abbey College will hold a public forum, "Latin America in the 21st Century," April 3.

The event is free and open to the public.

"Latin America in recent years has not occupied a central stage in the American media," says Dr. Gabriela Tarazona-Sevillano, assistant professor and coordinator of International Programs at the college.

"There have been, however, a number of developments in the region which are important for academics, policy makers and the interested public," she said.

Tarazona-Sevillano said she hopes the forum will serve as a means to update students, academics, administrators and others on issues ranging from politics to economics and literature.

Other participants in the forum include: Dr. Alberto Hernandez, Spanish professor and department chair at Davidson College; Dr. Lyman Johnson, history professor at the University of North Carolina at Charlotte; and Dr. Mario Mansilla, Latin American specialist from Washington, D.C., who will be the keynote speaker.

Life of patients must be sustained, says pope

Life and the World Federation of Catholic Medical Associations, brought together dozens of speakers with differing points of view, especially regarding the moment when providing artificial nutrition and hydration goes beyond an act of protecting human life and becomes a burdensome fight against death and the hope for eternal life.

Pope John Paul told them, while "vegetative state" has been accepted as a medical description of the clinical condition of patients who give no sign of consciousness or awareness of their environment, too many people think "vegetative" also describes the patients themselves, as if they were no longer human.

"I feel an obligation to reaffirm vigorously that the intrinsic value and the personal dignity of every human being does not change no matter what the concrete situation of his life," the pope said.

A human being "never becomes a 'vegetable' or an 'animal,'" he said.

"Even our brothers and sisters who are in the clinical condition of the 'vegetative state' maintain their human dignity in its entirety," he said. "The loving gaze of God the Father continues to watch over them, recognizing them as his children who are particularly in need of assistance."

Pope John Paul said that as long as the patient is not dying artificial nutrition and hydration must be considered "ordinary and proportionate and, as such, morally obligatory to the degree that — and as long as — they reach their aim, which consists in providing nourishment to the patient and easing suffering."

The pope said an evaluation of continuing care's monetary costs cannot outweigh the value of protecting human life.

Pope John Paul also urged doctors and parishes to do more to help the families of patients in a persistent vegetative state.

"They cannot be left alone with their heavy human, psychological and economic burden," he said.

Dr. Salvino Leone, a moral theology professor who works with the Hospitaller Order of St. John of God in Rome, said there is "a profound ethical and conceptual" distinction between causing death and letting someone die.

One must never hasten a patient's death, he told the conference March 20, and one always must provide pain relief, nutrition and hydration and take precautions so that bedsores and infections do not develop.

But a Christian, Leone said, also must recognize "letting die is a service to the gift of God, the humble consciousness of being a creature in the face of divine will and the acknowledgment of his absolute lordship over human destiny. In a single word: It is a true act of faith."

Determining the exact moment when it becomes ethical to let someone die is difficult to determine, conference speakers said, and some argued there even are instances when the artificial provision of nutrition and hydration is so burdensome to the patient and his or her family that it is not obligatory.

Dr. Gianluigi Gigli, president of the federation of medical associations, said the different positions presented at the conference reflected the complexity of the issues involved and the continuing search by Catholic ethicists and physicians to make decisions informed by the best medical opinions and the highest moral standards.

Ann Verlinde, president of the International Committee of Catholic Nurses, said that because nurses spend so much time with patients and their families their opinions should be given greater weight on hospital ethics boards and in discussions with individual families about continuing or withdrawing certain types of care.

In many situations, she said, "nurses find it easier than doctors to say, 'It is finished; let them go. We will be with them, caring for them as they die.'"

Msgr. Kevin T. McMahon of St. Charles Borromeo Seminary in Philadelphia said that with patients in a persistent vegetative state artificially delivered nutrition and hydration are simply "the medically assisted supply of food and drink."

He said people should keep in mind that, while a return to consciousness is "highly improbable" after one year in a vegetative state, withholding nutrition and hydration always results in death.

Msgr. Marco Frisina, director of the Diocese of Rome's liturgy office, told the doctors March 17 that when medical treatment is useless the focus must turn toward helping the patient die a "good death" — not in the way proponents of euthanasia mean, but in the sense of dying with the sure hope of eternal life.

Perspectives

A pastoral perspective on the pill

Guest Column

FATHER MATHEW BUETTNER
GUEST COLUMNIST

The March 12, 2004 issue of The Catholic News & Herald article entitled, "'Pill' justifications still hard to swallow," which featured a PBS documentary on the popularity of the oral contraceptive, could have left the reader in confusion regarding the Catholic Church's teaching on the birth control pill.

As a young priest, I have encountered a number of Catholics who seem to be confused on the Church's teaching regarding birth control. Some claim that they have never heard the Church officially condemn artificial birth control (contraception). Others may know what the Church teaches, but may not know why she teaches it. And others claim that the teachings concerning birth control are "gray matter" and therefore, the couple (or one's conscience) has the responsibility to decide whether contraception is right or wrong, acceptable or unacceptable.

This pastoral perspective on the pill seeks to bring clarity to a timely and controversial topic by briefly addressing the above concerns.

Sexuality and procreation can only be understood in the context of the marital covenant, as authored and defined by God and articulated by Divine Revelation. The "Catechism of the Catholic Church" states, "Conjugal love involves a totality, in which all the elements of the person enter. ... It aims at a deeply personal unity, a unity that, beyond union in one flesh, leads to forming one heart and soul; it demands indissolubility and faithfulness in definitive mutual giving; and it is open to fertility." (No. 1643)

In other words, whenever spouses engage in expressing conjugal or nuptial love, their act of love involves totality, unity, indissolubility, fidelity and fruitfulness (fecundity) by its very nature. The act is designed to communicate the intimate and total giving of oneself to one's spouse, just as the reception of Holy Communion communicates the total self-donation of Christ to His bride, the Church.

Christ withholds nothing from the gift of himself to His Church, which is the fruit of His life-giving passion, death and resurrection. Likewise, nuptial love speaks the sacred words of Christ, "This is my body given for you." Therefore, each time husband and wife engage in conjugal love, they renew their wedding promises as they give themselves to one another totally, faithfully and fruitfully.

On the other hand, a contraceptive act, by its very nature, does not speak the language of nuptial love. Whether the contraceptive is chemical (like the pill) or physical (like the condom), a barrier is placed between the spouses who attempt to communicate love, resulting in the withholding of self, specifically one's fertility. Regardless if the couple willingly chooses to place a barrier between their union or intends to impede nuptial love, the frustrated act bespeaks a lie: "This is my body not given for you." It no longer communicates a love that is total or fruitful; it no longer truly expresses their wedding promises.

Consequently, the Church cannot ever accept contraception as a legitimate means of birth regulation. That is why the Church clearly teaches in paragraph 2370 (of the catechism) that:

"[E]very action which, whether in anticipation of the conjugal act, or in its accomplishment, or in the development of its natural consequences, proposes, whether as an end or as a means, to render procreation impossible" is intrinsically evil.

There is no ambiguity or "gray matter" in this particular teaching because there is no "gray matter" in an act which, by its very nature, impedes the natural ends of the marital act: union and procreation, love and life. Therefore, neither the couple nor the individual conscience have the capacity to define whether contraception is morally right or wrong, acceptable or unacceptable.

The couple does have a responsibility, however, to regulate procreation. The catechism maintains that, "For just reasons, spouses may wish to space the births of their children. It is their duty to make certain that their desire is not motivated by selfishness but is in conformity with the generosity appropriate to responsible parenthood" (No. 2368).

That is why the Church supports and encourages couples to use natural methods of birth regulation (Natural Family Planning), since these methods utilize the natural periods of infertility designed by God. These natural methods respect God as the arbiter of life, as well as respect the natural rhythms created by God in the human person. Moreover, natural methods promote the goods of marriage and have none of the dangerous side effects to a woman's health clearly demonstrated by use of the pill.

As couples prayerfully discern the use of birth control in their families, I encourage them to research the issues (please consult the Couple to Couple League Web site for further information: www.ccli.org), speak candidly with a priest that they trust, and ultimately to discover the liberating truth offered by the Church, who faithfully speaks on behalf of Christ, her Bridegroom.

Pope at audience, appeals for an end to violence

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II appealed for an end to "so much blood that continues to be spilled in many parts of the world."

"The world is still fearfully marked by hate, violence, terrorism and war," he said.

"The need for mankind to open up its heart and make a courageous effort toward mutual understanding remains urgent," the pope said during his March 24 weekly general audience.

The pope reminded the several thousand pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square that March 25 the church celebrates the feast of the Annunciation of the Lord. The day recalls the angel Gabriel announcing God's plan to the Blessed Virgin Mary that she give birth to the Son of God.

The pope said Mary's acceptance to take part in the Incarnation "opened the doors to the fulfillment of God's salvific plan for the redemption of all men and women."

In a portion of his speech the pope did not read aloud, it said, "each one of us is called to join one's own 'yes' to the mysterious plans of providence" with Mary and Jesus' unconditional acceptance of God's plan for them.

"Only by fully following the divine will can that joy and true peace that we all ardently desire spring forth," it said.

Speaking with a clear voice, the pope said the Italian church sets aside March 24 as a day of remembrance and prayer for missionary martyrs.

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

He said the missionary priests, consecrated people and lay faithful who were killed last year should not be forgotten.

"Among the many victims that the news documents every day, there are many unarmed people who are hit (by violence) while ... carrying out their duties," the pope said.

According to the Italian Missionary Youth Movement, which sponsors the annual day of remembrance, 35 Catholic missionaries were killed in 2003. Of those, 22 missionaries lost their lives in Africa, 11 in the Americas and two in Asia.

Meanwhile, the pope said the time it takes "for justice and peace to reach every part of the world becomes a longer and longer wait. How else to respond to this thirst for hope and love if not by turning to Christ through Mary?"

The pope ended his address by calling on the Virgin Mary to help "stop evil, bring about a change of heart" in all people and "rekindle the light of hope for everyone."

He as glad for the hospitality and I ex-ected him at around 11 p.m.

I knew that Brian would arrive tired nd spent. His father was a real hero for im and the loss of this giant of a man as hard for him. So when the front door ell rang at precisely 11 that night, I ent quickly to open the door and invite y friend to get out of the bitter cold eather and come into a home where e'd find comfort and support. I had food repared and a bottle of wine opened for y friend. But when I threw the door pen, the surprise was mine.

Instead of Father Brian, the man tanding before me was a stranger. Haggard and bedraggled in a torn arka, he looked hurt. His hands were splints and his first words told his eed: "I'm cold and I'm hungry and I'm pain. Can you help me find shelter?"

Now I know all about the Golden ule and I've done my share of talks ased on the mantra, "What Would esus Do?" but this guy was clearly not who I wanted to see that frigid night. I on't know what my face communi-ated to him, but I do know what was my heart.

I wanted him to be anywhere but at my front door. I wanted to ask him, dripping with sarcasm, why he'd only realized that he was homeless at 11 p.m. I wanted to suggest the county had a Social Services Department he should check out. I wanted to tell him that I'd rather not get involved in bringing into the rectory someone I didn't know, who might well be a danger. In other words, my heart was anywhere but connected to a spirit of welcome and hospitality. Brian Barr was entitled to kindness. He was a known quantity. But this guy was a stranger and an unwelcome one at that.

No, I didn't say any of the things in my heart or mind to the man that night. Thank God, I did the right thing. I was able to give him something to eat, arrange for a place for him to stay and get him a ride to the shelter. There probably would be other hard nights for that man, but his visit to our parish would not be one of them.

As we chatted, the suspicious looking stranger became simply someone who had a painful life tale to tell. He was good and gentle. He was someone like all of us, just a man who'd seen better times and hoped they'd return one day. And he wasn't looking to hurt anyone. He just had nowhere else to go. He was Owen.

I'm happy the night ended that way. I'm glad a cold and tired and damaged soul found rest, shelter and nurture for an evening. But I also wrestle with what was in my heart. It made me realize something probably many of us grapple with.

Warmth and welcome don't come that easily. Oh, sure, we love people we know and trust. But where's the merit in that? Giving hospitality to someone like Brian, that's an easy pleasure. But making way for someone like homeless Owen, that's another matter entirely. I was struck that night by the chasm that existed in my heart. To the known friend: welcome, love and kindness. To the unknown but even needier stranger: suspicion, resentment and a struggle to be kind.

And yet, I suspect that when and if you and I get the chance to enter heaven, we won't only be welcomed by friends and family. The hospitality committee won't all look like Father Brian Barr. No, I suspect the gatekeepers to heaven might well look much more like the Owens of our world. I hope he lets us in.

Good movie, great marketing

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

Mel Gibson is going to make a for-ne from his film, "The Passion of the hrist." To what does he owe his suc-ess? The quality of his filmmaking? es, in part. His subject matter? No, he as, after all, telling a well-known story. is marketing plan? Yes, yes, yes.

The movie represents a unique ex-erience for the average American audi-nce at which it is aimed. It is uniquely rutal in depicting the suffering of our ord during the last 12 hours of his life. Many films have shown people being illed, some in grotesque ways. But no ainstream film has ever shown one erson enduring such savagery for vir-ually the entire length of the movie.

So how do you get so many people to o straight from church, encouraged by eir pastor, to a movie theatre to see this orrific story unfold? If you are Gibson, ou create a bold new marketing plan.

Gibson's plan to screen the movie religious audiences was born out of ecessity. He could find no major studio back what appeared to be an out-ndish proposal. Imagine the conver-ations he must have had with studio xecutives three or four years ago when he project was starting.

"I want to make a movie about the crucifixion of Jesus in which he is beaten like no one ever has been before and I want the characters to speak ancient Aramaic, Italian and Hebrew with no subtitles. Can you give me several million dollars?"

Not surprisingly he ended up using his own money and added the subtitles.

His budget may have been slim but his marketing goal was the same as any other movie. Get people to talk about his movie and then buy tickets to see it. His plan was to let religious groups screen the movie before the Ash Wednesday opening, but only if they signed a pledge agreeing not to write about the content before the opening.

Of course they were free to talk about the impression the movie made. The buzz that this approach created was spectacular. From the first of the year until Ash Wednesday the secular media carried almost daily stories about the movie; it was shown to the pope, to the president, to religious broadcasters, to Billy Graham. And everyone who saw it was saying the same thing; the movie was like nothing they had ever seen before.

Jewish groups screened the movie and expressed concerns about the depiction of the Jews, and presto, another round of news stories took off.

Word of mouth is the most convincing kind of advertising and generally can't be bought. Gibson had a priceless publicity machine at work for him and it looks like "The Passion" could be the highest grossing movie of all time.

So what can a Catholic discern from this experience?

First, that marketing was as important as the message of the film. Other religious movies, such as "The Gospel of John," were as well made, but were complete flops at the box office. And second, that by supporting this film we are sending a message to Hollywood that we are interested in more movies like it. Hollywood will crank out whatever it thinks will sell tickets.

The crucifixion, as we know, isn't the only story of violence, injustice and suffering to be found in the Bible. But we also know that the message of Scripture is one of love, not brutality. Future movies based on scripture should be judged on this basis, not on the amount of cruelty that we witness on the screen.

Catholic Church on UFOs

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. With all the theories today about UFOs and interspace travel, does the Catholic faith have anything to say about life on other planets? Could there be?

If there is intelligent life somewhere else, would that mean that Jesus Christ would need to die on every planet to save the people? (Wisconsin)

A. There's no way the Catholic Church would know any more than anyone else whether intelligent life exists on other galaxies or universes. It hasn't attempted to speculate on the subject, and there's no reason it should.

The spiritual condition of any conscious, intelligent life that might flourish elsewhere is even more of a mystery. Beginning with the possibility of a race of beings that might still be in some sort of original innocence (to use terminology we're familiar with), there's a whole rainbow of conceivable circumstances in which such creatures might live.

About the only sure claim we can make in such matters is that God's creative imagination and power are certainly not exhausted by the humanity and other creatures on this earth. Countless other life forms might exist with the ability to know and love and relate to the Creator in a conscious way. What "salvation" might mean for these creatures we have no clue.

Considering the exuberant generosity with which God so lavishly showers life of all kinds on the world around us, one might suspect that this divine extravagance is not limited to our time and place. Any theory about whether or how that might happen, however, is pure speculation.

Specific teachings of the church about the saving grace of Jesus being necessary for salvation apply, as far as we can know, only to members of our human family. As I said, concerning the relationship God might have established between himself and creatures of another world, we cannot make even a respectable guess.

MARS HILL — One cannot fully know the history of St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill without knowing the influence of a Jesuit priest who diligently served Catholic communities north of Asheville during the early decades of the 20th century.

Jesuit Father Andrew Graves, from the order's Maryland Province, arrived in Madison County in August 1937. He came to staff the little Catholic chapel in Revere called Church of the Little Flower. Now defunct, the chapel provided a home to one of the most notable missionary priests of the period and region.

Even today, the populations of Madison, Yancey and north Buncombe county towns are relatively small compared to such Tar Heel cities as Charlotte, Greensboro and Winston-Salem to the east. Back in the 1930s, people there were even more scattered, and the Catholic community in the area was quite sparse.

Although their numbers were few, the Catholics of the region did have a history dating back to the mid-1800s, as noted by Father Graves, who wrote a historical account of the Catholic Church in northwestern North Carolina.

Father Graves assumed a pastorate in a town where very few Catholics resided and questions about the faith abounded. With the population so scarce, no great numbers of converts were recorded during his priestly service, but Father Graves became known for leading a pioneering ministry of ecumenism in the years preceding the Second Vatican Council.

Father Graves was a man reputed and loved by Madison County folks, Catholics and non-Catholics alike, for his preaching, his generosity and his outreach to people of all faiths. His robust interest in sports is also well remembered by county residents, who recall that Father Graves often rode buses with area children to state competitions.

Health reasons soon brought Father Graves from Revere to Hot Springs in northwest Madison County. There, he helped build another Catholic church, Chapel of the Redeemer, and acquired the house that would later become the Jesuit House of Prayer retreat center.

Father Graves remained in northwestern North Carolina for decades to come, serving in ministry and later becoming known as a historical writer and researcher. He died in Philadelphia in September 1995.

Over time, the core of the Catholic community in Madison County began to center in Mars Hill, today a town of fewer than 2,000 residents and yet the largest in the county.

With Jesuit priests and Sisters of Mercy serving them, members of the Catholic community in Mars Hill became a mission of the Chapel of the Redeemer by 1981. The mission gathered for Masses in several storefront chapels and — perhaps in that ecumenical spirit of Father Graves — on the campus of Mars Hill College, a Baptist institution.

The Mars Hill mission became a parish under the patronage of St. Andrew in November 1985. The following year, the Yancey County Catholic community in Burnsville, Sacred Heart Church, was placed in the missionary care of St. Andrew the Apostle Church.

A multipurpose facility was constructed several years later in Mars Hill, and was dedicated in November 1991. Jesuit Father Francis Reese was pastor at the time.

The Jesuit tradition continued in Madison and Yancey counties, with the people of St. Andrew the Apostle Church and its mission served by Jesuit Father Edward Ifkovitz from September 1996 until July 2002; at that time, diocesan priest Father David Brzoska was appointed pastor.

The community of the church and mission continued to grow over the years, and parishioners have become involved in a number of ministries including Habitat for Humanity, feeding the homeless, county health care services, issues facing Appalachia and outreach and education to the growing Hispanic community in the area.

Father Reese, now retired, and Mercy Sister Peggy Verstege, who runs the Jesuit retreat house in Hot Springs, both assist with Hispanic ministry at St. Andrew the Apostle Church and Sacred Heart Church.

Summertime visitors increase attendance at both churches, and construction is beginning at Sacred Heart Church to expand and remodel the worship space. At St. Andrew the Apostle Church, small faith groups are being formed to study Scripture, religious books and more.

Father Brzoska said parishioners have a "real desire to grow in their love and understanding of God, and to look at how to integrate their faith and spirituality into their everyday lives and what we can do as individuals and a community to promote that experience in a practical way, inside and outside of the church community."

Bishop tells pope of ecumenical issues and growth in diocese

By DAVID HAINS
SPECIAL TO THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

VATICAN CITY — Bishop Peter J. Jugis awoke at 1 a.m. Monday, March 29. He was in Rome for his weeklong "ad limina" visit.

The time difference between Rome and Charlotte is seven hours and he had arrived only the day before. But it wasn't jet lag that kept him from sleeping; it was an appointment scheduled for 11 a.m. with Pope John Paul II.

"I couldn't sleep anymore and so I was praying and preparing to meet the Holy Father," said Bishop Jugis.

Bishop Jugis and 23 other bishops from the southeastern United States were the first group of American bishops to make their "ad limina" visits to the Vatican. The highlight of the visit was a 15-minute, one-on-one meeting with the pope during which each bishop discussed his diocese and an-

WASHINGTON —The crowds outside the Supreme Court March 24 waged shouting matches over whether the Pledge of Allegiance should mention God.

But inside the courtroom, the justices seemed most concerned with whether a California man even has the legal right to seek the change on the grounds that it harms his daughter to be exposed to the words "under God."

Arguing his own case against the Elk Grove Unified School District, California physician and lawyer Dr. Michael Newdow told the court that even though he does not have primary custody of his daughter he has a right not to have his atheist beliefs demeaned in her eyes

U.S. Senate passes Unborn Victims of Violence Act

Pro-life activists commend 'Laci and Conner's Law'

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Passage of the Unborn Victims of Violence Act by the U. S. Senate drew praise from pro-life groups and criticism from advocates of keeping abortion legal.

"We applaud the Senate for voting for justice for women and their children," said Cathy Cleaver Ruse, director of planning and information for the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities.

"No woman should ever be told she lost nothing when she loses her child to a brutal attacker," Ruse added.

The Senate approved the bill by a vote of 61-38 March 25. It had passed in the House Feb. 26 by a vote of 254-163.

President Bush said he looked forward to signing it into law. "Pregnant women who have been harmed by violence, and their families, know that there are two victims — the mother and the unborn child — and both victims should be protected by federal law," he said.

The Unborn Victims of Violence Act is also known as "Laci and Conner's Law" after Laci Peterson and her unborn son, Conner, whose disappearance and deaths drew national attention. The California woman was nearly eight months pregnant when she

HEAVENLY BODY

The planet-like object Sedna is depicted in a conceptualized illustration. The bottom three panels show the first detection of the faint distant object on Nov. 14, 2003. Sedna was identified by the slight shift in position noted in the three pictures taken at different times. All that is known about its appearance is that it has a reddish hue.

Vatican scientist named to panel to define new object in solar system

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — One of the Vatican's top planetary scientists has been chosen to be part of a five-man team of international astronomers to decide if Sedna — the most distant object yet seen orbiting the sun — is really a planet.

The new body currently lies some 8 billion miles away from the sun, "almost twice as far away as anything else in the solar system," said U.S. Jesuit Brother Guy Consolmagno, an astronomer at the Vatican Observatory.

But, because it is such a recent discovery and because it is so far away, scientists are not yet sure how to classify the new world.

"There was no working group on planets because no new planet has been discovered for the past 70 years, and there is no working definition of what a planet is, either," Brother Consolmagno told Catholic News Service.

The International Astronomical Union — a world body made up of about 100 member nations, including the Vatican — set up the working group to decide on an official definition of a planet. The union also will decide whether Sedna — named after the Inuit goddess of the Arctic Sea — can join the solar system's planetary club.

Sedna is three times farther away from the sun than the farthest planet, Pluto, and it takes 10,000 earth years for it to make one trip around the sun; its days last about 40 hours. Surface temperatures on Sedna are thought to hover around minus 400 degrees Fahrenheit, Brother Consolmagno said.

If the International Astronomical Union decides Sedna is a planet, it will get the name of a Roman god, as is the tradition; otherwise, it will retain the name its discoverers gave it, Sedna.

Planet or not, many scientists still consider Sedna an exciting find because it is expanding notions of how the solar system was formed and what can be found in its outer reaches.

This ever-expanding universe can have two kinds of effects on someone's personal relationship with God, said Brother Consolmagno.

"A pessimist can say 'Oh the world is so big and I'm so small, how can God ever see me?' But an optimist can say 'The world is so big and God still notices me, that just shows how big God really is,'" he said.

Holy Saturday ceremonies to bring 150,000 new Catholics into church

WASHINGTON (CNS) — More than 150,000 people will join the Catholic Church in the United States on Holy Saturday, April 10, according to figures compiled by the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Evangelization.

Nearly 64,000 will join with their bishops in diocesewide celebrations, usually held at the cathedral, while another estimated 90,000 men and women will formally become members of the church in ceremonies at their new parishes.

Of the 63,891 participating in diocesan ceremonies, more than 26,000 will be completing the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults and will be baptized, confirmed and receive the Eucharist for the first time on Holy Saturday. More than 37,000 others, already baptized as Christians, will become full members of the Catholic Church at those ceremonies.

Those who participate in the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults are called catechumens, while Christians who are already baptized are called candidates.

The 2004 numbers from the dioceses are slightly higher than the 62,261 who joined the church on Holy Saturday in 2003.

At least 17 U.S. dioceses will bring in groups larger than 1,000 people, with the largest groups of candidates and catechumens in the Archdiocese of Los Angeles (3,070) and the Diocese of Galveston-Houston (1,797).

In the Diocese of Charlotte, more than 600 people are expected to join the Catholic Church.

Pope meets members of American Jewish aid agency

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — By loving and assisting others, Christians and Jews act on the knowledge that they are created in the image and likeness of God, Pope John Paul II said.

The pope met March 29 with members of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, an international organization providing aid to Jewish communities in need, as well as emergency disaster relief around the world.

Pope John Paul told committee members, "Your visit is yet another sign of the bonds of friendship between the Jewish people and the Catholic Church, bonds which we hope will grow ever stronger."

The pope told the members that the duty to assist and serve others flows from the fact that Jews and Christians believe they were created in God's image and endowed with an ability to love.

"It is through love that we fulfill our destiny to act in the likeness of God," he said.

The commandment in the Book of Leviticus to "love your neighbor as yourself," is a call "to serve those who need our help to live in security, justice and freedom," the pope said.

The Jewish distribution committee is celebrating its 90th anniversary this year.

Pope says path to holiness passes through confessional

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The path to holiness passes through the confessional, Pope John Paul II said.

Addressing participants of a Vatican-sponsored study seminar March 27, the pope said the sacrament of penance deserves rediscovery as a moment of purification and spiritual enlightenment. It's not something Catholics can do without, he said.

"It would be an illusion to want to become holy, which is the vocation everyone receives from God, without approaching with frequency and fervor this sacrament of conversion and sanctification," he said.

The pope said going to confession by its very nature brings purification, as the penitent bares his conscience and feels the deep need for forgiveness and spiritual regeneration.

"We will never be holy enough not to need this sacramental purification. A humble confession, carried out with love, induces an increasingly delicate purity in the service of God," he said.

He said confessors should act as spiritual guides to penitents, helping them to recognize their sins and commit themselves to avoiding sin in the future.

Penance is also necessary for priests, he said.

"Even if we are called to exercise the sacramental ministry, we have our own faults in need of remittance," he said.

The study seminar was sponsored by the Apostolic Penitentiary, the Vatican office that deals with matters of conscience involving the sacrament of penance and procedural issues concerning indulgences. It is headed by U.S. Cardinal J. Francis Stafford.

For details, call Karen Wepasnick at (704) 541-1891 after 3 p.m.

Grosnick was one of 16 seminarians from 11 archdioceses, dioceses and religious communities received by Auxiliary Bishop Robert P. Maginnis of Philadelphia into the rite, which is celebrated during the seminarians' second year of graduate theological studies at the seminary and is required as part of the formation process.

"Although Justin is one of our many outstanding seminarians for the Diocese of Charlotte, we rejoice that his journey to the altar is being marked by the reception of this special ministry in which he will share more deeply the celebration of Mass," said Father John Allen, director of vocations for the Diocese of Charlotte.

CONVERSION TO CHRIST

Bill Huebsch makes a point during his talks on "Whole Community Catechesis" at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton March 27.

Catholic author discusses whole community catechesis

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

MORGANTON — Conversion: falling in love — with Jesus. Imagine your parish so on fire with the love of Christ that it permeates everything everyone does.

Catholic author and catechist Bill Huebsch talked about conversion as the goal of "Whole Community Catechesis" at St. Charles Borromeo Church March 27. Some 84 people from 26 parishes attended the daylong program.

The 1997 edition of the "Catechism of the Catholic Church" defines catechesis as, "education of children, young people, and adults in the faith of the Church through the teaching of Christian doctrine in an organic and systematic way to make them disciples of Jesus Christ."

"Oh, yes, we talk about Christ in our classes and pray in our prayer corners, and try to help our students understand how Christ is in the church," Huebsch said, "but knowing about Christ and actually meeting Christ are two very different things, according to the GDC."

Evangelization, he said, means falling in love with Christ and turning your heart to him.

Heubsch's books include, "The General Directory for Catechesis in Plain English: A Summary and Commentary" (2001), "Whole Community Catechesis in Plain English" (2002) and "Handbook for Success in Whole Family Catechesis" (2004).

The term "whole community catechesis" comes from GDC paragraph 254:

"The Christian community is the origin, locus and goal of catechesis. Proclamation of the Gospel always begins with the Christian community and invites man to conversion and the following of Christ. It is the same community that welcomes those who wish to know the Lord better and permeate themselves with a new life."

"Conversion precedes catechesis, " Huebsch said.

What is conversion?

"It's an encounter with Christ that leads to a deeper life in the Church," Huebsch said. "Being a Catholic is not joining a club. It's an ongoing process of being initiated into a community of Christ. Eucharist is a sacrament of initiation. You're initiated every week. Every time you receive Eucharist it's another conversion."

When you have that encounter with Christ, Huebsch said, "you have a supple sense of self: you let the Spirit take you a little more, you reach out more spontaneously to people, without embarrassment. You have flexibility with others. Love, rather than principles, is what matters. You have greater generosity toward others and endless patience with others as they sort out their lives."

He pointed out that, often, conversion doesn't happen, because American Catholic religious education frequently takes place in a "schoolhouse framework" in which attendees learn about Christ, but never become immersed in Christ. Confirmation is often seen as "graduation" from religious education.

"Confirmation becomes not a sacrament of initiation but a sacrament of termination," Huebsch said.

Whole community catechesis, however, is built on four "planks."

"The first plank ... is that, in whole community catechesis, the total parish is involved in learning and sharing the faith," Huebsch said. "Every Christian of every age in the parish is involved, not just children. ... Whole community catechesis provides a framework within which such parishwide faith sharing happens every week, year in and year out."

One way to do this, he said, is to have a weekly question based on the Sunday readings. For instance, "When you heard the beatitudes today, which one really touched you?"

Huebsch said the most profound way to "help yourself remain in a process of turning your heart to Christ over and over" and to "help others experience lasting Christian conversion" is through faith sharing "within our programs and throughout our parishes."

The second plank is the building of households of faith — 50 percent of catechetical activity should involve building such households.

"The household is the context in which whatever we teach in religious education class becomes the stuff of real, everyday life," Huebsch said.

Thus, Plank No. 3 — education — is for everyone.

Parents don't drop off their children for "CCD," they participate with them in "catechetical assemblies." Each child (first to eighth grade) has a sponsor, usually one or both parents, who attends religious education with the child. The sponsor does not have to be Catholic.

High school students have sponsors who are not their parents.

"The fourth plank of whole community catechesis is that it is more like a movement within the parish than a program," Huebsch said.

"It's a movement of the Spirit of Jesus in the world," he said. "It's a movement within our own hearts. ... To become a Christian, in short, is to join a movement, not a club. It's an unending process of announcing the Good News and assisting folks to live by it."

Whole community catechesis can radically change a parish, Huebsch said.

For the parishes that adopt a program of conversion and evangelization, Huebsch said, "there's a fire in those parishes and that fire is what the Holy Father is trying to light in the whole church."

Members of the 2004 Fire Bowl team from St. Ann School show off their first-place trophies. The fifth-graders competed in a seven-round, single-elimination quiz bowl answering questions about fire and life safety March 17.

St. Ann School students win Fire and Life Safety Bowl

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — What is the best way to put out an electrical fire? What three elements are needed to ignite a fire?

These are the types of questions St. Ann School students answered to win the first place prize in the 26th Annual Fire & Life Safety Bowl. The quiz contest is designed to educate students across Mecklenburg County about fire and life safety.

Fourth- and fifth-grade students from 32 public and private schools in Mecklenburg County took part in the competition at the Oasis Shrine Temple in Charlotte March 17. St. Ann School has competed for the past five years. In three of the previous competitions, they won second place.

The team from St. Ann School consisted of Gina Federal, Nicole Eagle, Grace Cahill, Sloane Phillips and Tim Wahl, coached by Diane Troy. Cahill was named most valuable player.

Students had to buzz in, Jeopardy-style, to answer questions, said Sister Helene Nagle, a Sister of St. Joseph and principal of St. Ann School. This aspect made the competition more difficult than if they had taken a written test.

In addition, if a student said that a true-or-false statement was false, they had to explain what would make the statement true.

The competitors had studied about 400 questions incorporating chemistry, math and history, said Sister Nagle. They even devoted two Sunday afternoons to prepare for the bowl, practicing their response time and grammar.

"How they presented themselves was an important part of the bowl," she said. "This is our main academic competition."

When the team from St. Ann School reached the final round, they called the school to ask for prayers.

St. Ann School's first place win awarded them with $500 and the John W. Knowles Award, a silver bowl engraved with the school's name, along with individual trophies for each team member. The award is named in honor of Mecklenburg County's longtime fire marshal, who retired in 1998.

The 2004 Fire & Life Safety Bowl was presented by the Mecklenburg County Fire Marshal's Office, Charlotte-Mecklenburg Schools and other sponsors. In addition to teaching students about fire and life safety, the Fire Marshal's Office hopes they will share their knowledge with their friends, family and community and help make Mecklenburg County a safer place.

Lunch and love

First-graders at St. Ann School in Charlotte continued their Lenten good works by making lunches for homeless persons at the Urban Ministry Center in Charlotte March 16. The students made a total of 200 lunches, each containing two sandwiches, cookies, carrots and an apple. The first-graders are also collecting gently used books for the Thompson Child Development Center.

GREENSBORO — Through their physical education classes, students at Our Lady of Grace School helped raise money for the American Heart Association by joining in with children from across the country in the annual Jump Rope for the Heart.

Jeff Kinlaw, physical education teacher at Our Lady of Grace School, coordinated the jump-roping fundraiser with a representative of the American Heart Association that was held during all gym classes the week of Feb. 16.

The students raised more than $3,000. A check was presented to Jeff McPherson of the American Red Cross Feb. 25.

OLG students go multicultural

GREENSBORO — Kindergarten through eighth-grade students at Our Lady of Grace School "traveled" to many countries during the annual Multicultural Day March 11.

Each grade studied a specific country and its culture and prepared its classroom by making crafts and food native to the particular country of study.

Then the students packed brown paper bag "suitcases" and wore "passports" around their necks to visit each country. As they entered the doorway of a particular country, their passports were stamped to log their travels.

This year, kindergarten students learned about China and crafted Chinese dragons for their visitors. First-graders learned about Egypt, studying hieroglyphics, the Sphinx and camels. Visitors to Egypt sampled various fruits, two types of puddings and hummus on pita bread.

Second-graders focused on England, making kingly crowns for their heads and enjoying a British tea party, complete with special teacups and scones, as well as Beatles music.

Third-grades learned about Argentina, and many students came dressed as Argentine cowboys and cowgirls. They made gaucho belts and sampled an Argentinean peach drink.

Bishop meets pope

swered any questions the pope may have.

Bishop Jugis met with the pope in a library of the apostolic palace in the Vatican. Bishop Jugis said the room was very close to the familiar balcony room from which the pope often addresses crowds gathered in St. Peter's Square.

The first thing the pope wanted to know about was the status of vocations to the priesthood and the consecrated religious life of sisterhood.

"I was really proud to tell him that we have 16 seminarians studying for the priesthood and that we are getting ready to ordain three men from the transitional deaconate," said Bishop Jugis. "He was also very interested in vocations to the religious life including the sisterhood. I mentioned to him that our largest foundation is the Sisters of Mercy. He was nodding his head and smiling as I mentioned the Sisters of Mercy."

The pope then asked the bishop about the status of ecumenism in the Diocese of Charlotte. Bishop Jugis described his October ordination at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, which was attended by religious leaders from several denominations. In addition, the bishop cited the many interfaith meetings and prayer services that routinely take place in the diocese.

One topic of special interest to Bishop Jugis, which he had planned to talk about with the pope, was the warm reception Catholics in the diocese have given to the Hispanics now living in western North Carolina. When describing the situation, the pope expressed surprise that so many Mexicans had come to the diocese.

"I told him that there are many people moving into our area because of the job opportunities and the quality of life," said Bishop Jugis. "I also told him of the efforts of diocesan priests to minister to the Latino population."

During the conversation about Hispanic ministry, Pope John Paul and Bishop Jugis spoke in Spanish, in which both men are fluent. The other parts of their conversation were in English.

"Ad limina" visits are held once every five years. During 2004, all of the U.S. bishops will make the trip to Rome to visit with the pope and to deliver quinquennial reports — documents that describe the status of Catholic life in a diocese. The bishops also visit various offices of the Roman Curia for discussions about the different needs their dioceses may have.

In addition to the meeting with the pope, another highlight of the pilgrimage is a visit to the tombs of St. Peter and St. Paul.

According to Bishop Jugis, the frail physical condition of the 83-year-old pontiff — who suffers from a neurological disorder, believed to be Parkinson's disease — did not affect their conversation.

"He struck me as doing very well and was very attentive, following very carefully everything I was saying," said the bishop. "His physical weakness was not a hindrance to the conversation and his desire to know what was happening in the Diocese of Charlotte."

"I came away from the meeting awed and humbled. It was a very holy moment," said Bishop Jugis. "I spent the afternoon reflecting on our meeting."

Bishop Jugis also felt that the visit would have a long-term impact on his ministry.

"The thing that will affect me most is the continued realization of the mystery of the Church," said Bishop Jugis. "Christ established this church — it is a divine institution. The mystery of the church is the presence of Christ, alive in mere mortal instruments. The pope is human, yet his office, his election and vocation are willed by Christ, the head of the church."

At press time, Bishop Jugis and the other bishops were scheduled to meet with the pope as a group April 2. The Catholic News & Herald will carry an account of the meeting it its next issue.

Court weighs 'under God'

by a school exercise that refers positively to the existence of God.

Justice Anthony Kennedy in particular seemed to struggle with why Newdow thinks he has the right to bring the claim that the pledge violates the Constitution.

He asked Newdow if he had considered the common sense conclusion that his daughter would be the subject of a public outcry if "God" was removed from the pledge. And, he said, it is a dispute with which she "probably doesn't agree."

Newdow said he had addressed that by keeping his daughter's name off the case when he filed it and by subsequently rephrasing it as an infringement of his own civil rights. But, as Kennedy pointed out several times, Newdow's argument supporting his claim that he has legal standing to bring the case always began with a description of his daughter putting her hand on her heart and reciting the pledge.

Newdow said the words "under God" are tantamount to the kind of school-led prayer the court has ruled unconstitutional in previous cases.

"'Under God' is as religious as you can get," he said.

Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg said "under God" is much less like a prayer than the first words of the patriotic song, "God Bless America," which children sometimes sing in school.

By comparison, the phrase in the pledge comes in the middle of something recited by rote "and the child doesn't have to say them," Ginsburg said.

"The issue is whether the government can put those words in her mouth" over her father's objections, Newdow said.

But, as the noncustodial parent, "you don't have the right" to make that claim, Ginsburg reminded him.

The girl's mother, Sandra Banning, said in a brief to the court that she and her daughter are practicing Christians who have no objection to the phrase "one nation under God" in the pledge.

"On the first day of third grade, she was the first in her class to volunteer to lead the pledge," Banning told reporters outside the court later.

Attorney Terence Cassidy, arguing on behalf of the school district, told the court that district policy requires the pledge to be recited daily in elementary school classrooms as a patriotic exercise. And neither Newdow's daughter nor any other student is required to say it. A 1948 Supreme Court ruling in a case brought by Jehovah's Witnesses, whose beliefs preclude taking oaths, said students nationwide may opt out of participating in the pledge.

Solicitor General Theodore Olson, arguing in support of the school district, said Newdow has no legal right to make the claim of damage on his daughter's behalf and that the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals erred in saying he had legal standing to make the case.

If the justices do consider the merits of the claim about the pledge itself, Olson said, he has found opinions by 14 different Supreme Court justices saying there is a significant difference between the pledge and other government-sponsored religious acts.

"The Pledge of Allegiance is not a religious exercise," he said.

Justice Stephen Breyer told Newdow that while the pledge is not perfect it does a fair job of providing a unifying patriotic statement that encompasses the beliefs of a broad segment of the populace. "It seems the purpose of unification at the price of offending a small number of people like you" is a valid civic exercise, he said.

Only eight of the court's nine justices heard the case, which could complicate efforts to issue a decisive ruling.

A decision in the case is expected before the court adjourns for the summer.

In new book, pope describes confrontations with communist authorities

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — In a soon-to-be-published book about his 20 years as a bishop in Poland, Pope John Paul II tells of almost daily confrontations with communist authorities and describes his efforts to adopt a new and more open style of pastoral ministry.

The book, a 200-page personal reflection written last year, will be published in Italian May 18, the pope's 84th birthday. Its probable English title will be, "Get Up, Let Us Go," a phrase taken from the Gospel account of Christ's last encounter with his Apostles.

As bishop of Krakow in the 1960s, Karol Wojtyla, the future Pope John Paul II, was a prolific writer. In a soon-to-be-published book about his years as bishop, the pontiff describes his confrontations with Poland's communist government and his efforts to create a new style of ministry.

Joaquin Navarro-Valls, Vatican spokesman, said the pope, in an introduction, describes the work as a collection of "memories and reflections" rather than a chronological account. It begins in 1958, when he learned about his episcopal appointment during a canoe trip in the Polish mountains, and covers the period up to his election as pope in 1978.

Navarro-Valls said the new book is sprinkled with personal details and humor. The revelations are sometimes simple: "I've always like to sing," the pontiff mentions at one point.

"I think the pope made a special effort to write in a way that could be understood by the greatest number of people," the papal spokesman said.

Gian Arturo Ferrari, director-general of Mondadori publishing house's book division, said the pope offers an inside look at some of his many conflicts with officials of the Polish regime.

"It's not an analysis of communism, but a description of a daily confrontation with the communist authorities. It was a very combative situation," Ferrari said.

The pope also describes his efforts to evangelize among Polish intellectuals, his friendships during those years, and his attempt to adopt an "open-door" policy at his episcopal residence, so that he would be accessible to people from all walks of life.

The pope completed the work in Polish between March and August of last year, dictating to an aide. The Italian version is completed; the Vatican is finishing the work on translations in English, French, German and Spanish.

Ferrari said it was uncertain whether the English edition would be ready by the May 18 Italian publication date. He said Mondadori had engaged an agent to find a U.S. publisher, and similar efforts were being made in other countries.

A portion of the earnings from the book was to go to a special fund to be used for charitable causes at the pope's discretion.

Navarro-Valls said he doubted this would be the pope's last big literary work.

He said that for years the pope had been thinking of a new autobiographical volume on his career as a bishop, but did not have time to write it until 2003. He also was prompted by two anniversaries that year — the 45th anniversary of his ordination as a bishop and the 25th anniversary of his election as pope.

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Some of the best family vacations we've ever taken have been the van trips that started in the dark at 5 a.m. — the children still foggy with sleep, curled up on the back seats under their blankets while my husband and I greeted a clean windshield and the open road.

While the early departure time ostensibly gave us a jump-start on the many miles we needed to travel before nightfall, I always liked beginning the journey with a quiet van and the promise of sunrise. It always came — the misty gray horizon giving way, little by little, to purples, pinks and finally a sliver of pale yellow light — heralding the dawn of long-awaited relaxation and family adventures around the next bend of the road.

I think of Mary of Magdala rising from sleep on that first Easter morning, physically and emotionally drained from the events of the previous days, stumbling through dewy grass and dusty gravel to fulfill a practical mission. Setting out while it was still dark, she expected to find a dead body and was shocked to find an empty tomb.

In John's Gospel, she and the disciples were greeted by a resurrection sunrise that at first brought a mixture of dismay, puzzlement and, only gradually, the dawn of faith.

There is something about the slow, steady progress of daybreak that offers a wonderful metaphor for the discovery of the risen Lord in our lives. Many times we set out stumbling in the darkness, intent upon our goals and tasks, drained of hope, expecting to find something predictable and coming up empty.

Nevertheless, resurrection always comes — not in blinding flashes of light, but more often as a gradual unfolding of radiance that illuminates dark corners and creates hope.

Those sunrise experiences sustain us, but they also compel us to tell others about the life just around the bend that, as St. Paul writes, is "hidden with Christ in God."

Questions:

How has your observance of Lent prepared you for a "sunrise experience" at Easter? In what aspect of your life do you expect to find the resurrection light of Jesus unfolding?

Cows Maggie, Mrs. Caloway and Grace star in the animated feature "Home on the Range," a family-friendly adventure in which the cows decide to capture a notorious desperado for the reward money to save their beloved dairy farm from the auction block. The film turns the traditional Western on its horns in telling a rip-roaring cowboy yarn about teamwork and camaraderie, resulting in a barnyard full of fun for moo-viegoers of all ages. Some brief mild rude humor and innuendo, as well as some cartoon violence. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. # Senate passes Unborn Victims of Violence Act disappeared in December 2002; Laci and Conner's bodies were found the following April.

Under the law, anyone who harms a woman's unborn child while committing a federal crime, such as assaulting the woman on federal property, commits a distinct crime against the child in addition to the crime against the woman.

Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., lost by a 50-49 vote on her attempt to replace the measure with a "single victim" substitute bill which would have eliminated language defining an unborn child as "a member of the species homo sapiens, at any stage of development, who is carried in the womb."

Her substitute proposal would have increased penalties for an attack on a pregnant woman by adding a second charge of harm to the pregnancy, avoiding any mention of a second victim.

Although the legislation adopted specifically excludes any application to voluntary abortion, Feinstein called it "the first strike against all abortion in the United States."

"It is encouraging that our federal legislators moved in a positive direction regarding the sanctity of life," said Maggi Nadol, director of the Diocese of Charlotte's Respect Life Office. "With the passage of the Unborn Victims of Violence Act, unborn children are given a small voice that has been silenced for so long."

"I encourage all Catholics and all people of good will to continue to pray for even more legal safeguards for the protection of life of the unborn," said Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte.

The week before the Senate vote, Cardinal William H. Keeler of Baltimore, chairman of the bishops' Committee on Pro-Life Activities, urged passage of the bill.

"This bill simply ensures that both mother and child are protected from violent assault and murder," he said.

Ruse, responding to attacks on the legislation by supporters of legal abortion, said, "We are grateful to the Senate for ignoring the offensive claims of the abortion lobby and its allies in Congress. Abortion activists may recoil from the acknowledgment of a child's existence before birth, but their efforts to erase the child as a second victim in a violent crime are an insult to all women and families who have lost a loved one to violence."

Maggie Gray, president of the National Council of Catholic Women, said passage of the new legislation "closes a 'justice gap' for unborn children by recognizing their injuries and providing legal redress."

Father Frank Pavone, national director of Priests for Life, said the Senate vote "is another sign that our legal system is experiencing a new moment of awareness in regard to the unborn child."

The American Life League said it was encouraged that 61 senators were "willing to publicly state that a preborn baby is a human being." But the league said it could not support the language of the new legislation because "this law has a clearly stated exception for abortion," perpetuating "the lie that some preborn babies' rights are worth defending and others are not."

PLEDGES AND PRAYERS

Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church in Grensboro, explains the adoption pledge certificate that the St. Pius X School students signed as a reminder to pray over the next nine months for unborn children in danger of abortion.

Prayer cards let students spiritually adopt unborn children

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — The day was very special, said sixth-grader Matthew Bednar.

"Because this is the day (the angel) Gabriel came to Mary and said she would have a son," said Bednar, a student at St. Pius X School. "Yesterday, I adopted an unborn child named Joseph. Someday I hope to meet him on earth or in heaven."

That special day to which Bednar referred was celebration of the feast of the Annunciation of the Lord, celebrated March 25 this year. Msgr. Anthony J. Marcaccio, pastor of St. Pius X Church, incorporated the feast with the celebration of life.

Msgr. Marcaccio wrote out a prayer pledge for the spiritual adoption of an unborn baby who is in danger of being aborted. Students wrote the names of unborn children they spiritually adopted on the card. They then signed a pledge saying that they would pray for that baby for the next nine months, in the hope that abortion would not be an option for the mothers.

The pledges were gathered and presented to Msgr. Marcaccio during the offertory at Mass March 25.

"The pledges will now be embossed with the church seal and will then be redistributed to the children to be placed (possibly in a frame) ... in a prominent location in their homes to remind them of their pledges to pray for the unborn children they had just agreed to adopt and pray for," said Mark Akerman, principal of Pius X school.

Akerman said many of the students used their own middle names in choosing the names of unborn children, which made the pledges more personal.

"I liked being able to choose a name for the baby. I think this was a good experience," said sixth-grader Tommy Flannery. "Yesterday, I adopted an unborn child. I named him Frank. I will be praying for him every night."

During his homily Msgr. Marcaccio reminded the students that nine months from that day would be Christmas Day, and that they pledged to pray for little babies to be born and see the light of day.

"Some people don't believe this," said Msgr. Marcaccio. "We know that the spirit of God is with that child. God loves that child."

During his March 24 weekly general audience, Pope John Paul II spoke of the feast of the Annunciation of the Lord, and told several thousand pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square that Mary's acceptance to take part in the Incarnation "opened the doors to the fulfillment of God's salvific plan for the redemption of all men and women."

At St. Pius X Church, sixth-grader Melissa Medina said the Annunciation was special because "if Mary hadn't accepted the baby, Jesus would never have been born and we wouldn't have freedom today."

"That's kind of like me accepting the baby that I adopted just today," she said. "I will try to keep this unborn baby in all of my prayers."

At the end of Mass, Jennifer Spillane, a junior at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville, told of her participation in the March for Life in Washington, D.C., Jan. 31, where thousands of youth gathered to celebrate life and protest the U.S. Supreme Court's decision that legalized abortion 31 years ago.

Looking Around

FATHER WILLIAM J. BYRON, SJ
CNS COLUMNIST

"Never, never do for others what they can do for themselves." This is the "Iron Rule" of the Industrial Areas Foundation.

The what foundation?

OK, it is not the greatest label that might have been chosen back in 1940 by Saul Alinsky to name his new Chicago-based organization working for change in neighborhoods affected by industrial growth.

Saul Alinsky?

Although his is no longer a household name, Alinsky earned a place in history as a famous agent of change and master community organizer.

A community organizer?

This is a practical, street-smart professional who believes and puts into action Alinsky's conviction that "change means movement; movement means friction; friction means heat; heat means controversy."

A community organizer's idea of a community organization is one that brings people together around an issue that calls for change and then mobilizes the power resident in those people to achieve the desired change.

"Organizing for Power, Action and Justice" is the subtitle of a new book, "Roots for Radicals" (Continuum), written with the assistance of Michael Cowan by Edward T. Chambers, Alinsky's successor as head of IAF. It is a memoir and a playbook meant to inform and inspire anyone willing to work, not just hope, for change.

"Organizers are agitators, catalysts and public-life coaches," says Chambers. "They make things happen. They are rooted in the holy books, democracy's founding documents, and the lives of public heroines and heroes. They are radicals in the best sense of the word.

"The 'why' question is important to the professional organizer, who needs a nagging curiosity about how it is that people, events and politics are this way or that way. They are generally feared and misunderstood for standing against the status quo. They are public people who seek collective power to act for justice.

"Being an organizer is not about being liked, but ... about being respected. Organizers march to a different drummer."

The title for this book, "Roots for Radicals," is the suggestion of the late Msgr. Jack Egan, who, as a young Chicago priest, worked with Alinsky to secure and protect the housing interests of otherwise powerless people on Chicago's South Side.

Before his death in 1972, Alinsky had written "Reveille for Radicals" and "Rules for Radicals." Msgr. Egan subsequently saw the need to complete the trilogy with a reflection on the roots — spiritual, historical, practical and strategic — needed to pit persistence against resistance in the struggle for justice.

Big Ed Chambers, Alinsky's faithful disciple, stepped up to the challenge.

This short book probably will have to be read twice by anyone considering a personal investment of time and energy in the struggle for community improvement in a context of just relationships. This is not to say that it is dull or difficult reading, not at all, but simply to make the point that it takes time to assimilate the strategic thinking that reflects the genius of Alinsky and his pragmatic, sometimes counterintuitive approach.

"There are all kinds of organizers," says Chambers, "mothers of families, labor agents, ministers, teachers, CEOs, managers, politicians and others." And he adds, "This profession is for the few, not the many."

Age is important. "It's best to begin a career in organizing from ages 24 to 26," says this veteran, who started organizing for Alinsky at age 26.

His book belongs in the hands of young people today who may be "turned off" by politics but could be "turned on" to the challenge of grass-roots organizing for social justice.

Pope says Christ's suffering calls people to work for justice

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Christ's suffering and death not only frees individuals from sin, but calls them to bring justice and healing to the world, Pope John Paul II said.

Through baptism into Christ's passion, Christians are given a share in his kingship and priesthood in order "to build up and sanctify all creation," the pope said March 31 at his weekly general audience.

At the audience, the last before Holy Week, Pope John Paul focused his talk on a canticle from the Book of Revelation telling of a heavenly host singing hymns of praise to "the Lamb who was slain."

The canticle, used in the church's evening prayer, also speaks of a scroll with seven seals that could be opened only by Christ.

"That book contained the whole series of divine decrees that must be put into action in human history so that perfect justice will reign," the pope said.

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

"The basis of Christ's power over history," and, therefore, of his authority to open the scroll, "is nothing other than his paschal mystery," the pope said.

"Christ was slain, and with his blood he ransomed all humanity from the power of evil," he said.

"The redemption he offers does not have only the function of rescuing us from our evil past, healing our wounds and relieving our misery; Christ gives us a new interior being which makes us priests and kings, participants in his own dignity," the pope said.

Letters to the Editor

Pill perspective appreciated

We thank Father Matthew Buettner for giving us a glimpse into the beautiful depths of the Catholic Church's teaching on marriage ("A pastoral perspective on the pill," March 26).

We have studied contraception's damaging effects upon women's health, family life and society, and we are convinced that if couples were aware of the many dire consequences of this practice, they would never engage in it. Dr. Janet E. Smith's work on this issue (available at www.ccli.org) has helped hundreds of thousands of families choose a better way.

Since moving to Charlotte, we have met many young couples who have discovered the joy and freedom of God's plan for married life. The contentment that characterizes these families is remarkable. Natural Family Planning has been called "marriage insurance," because there is a near-zero divorce rate among those who use it.

Remaining open to the blessing of children is an invitation to the Lord to dwell in the very heart of the family. Where God dwells, love remains. And love is the source of all joy in this life.

How good to know that the Church has always proclaimed this truth, and that she always will.

Bosco advice is unadvisable

I just finished reading Antoinette Bosco's March 19 Bottom Line column ("Message for Mel Gibson: A sequel to 'The Passion'?"). I can't quite figure out what this column is doing in a Catholic paper.

She writes of the need to "revive resurrection celebrations." One day is not enough, she writes, to celebrate Christ's resurrection, and so she encourages us to celebrate "Bright Sunday" one week after Easter. As an example of this "very old Christian tradition," she holds up the First Presbyterian Church of Winter Haven, Fla., where it is duly celebrated with butterflies and fiber optic lighting.

I would assume Mrs. Bosco is a Catholic, but how could she miss the fact that, for the Catholic Church, Easter (the principal celebration of Christ's resurrection) is not a day, but an entire season of the Church year, lasting a full six weeks? While those Presbyterians in Florida are hanging butterflies from the ceiling, we Catholics will be celebrating the Octave of Easter, Divine Mercy Sunday.

Catholics wanting a fuller celebration of the resurrection need only look into their own Catholic tradition and participate in what the Church has given us in her calendar — not to mainstream Protestantism and its reinterpretation of some supposed "ancient Church tradition."

Don't try to fix what is not broken. Don't try to find what's not been lost.

Murray's Musings

KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

As April Fool's Day was Thursday, April 1, I considered writing a humorous column in honor of the day.

But instead of taking the easy way out, I decided to use this space to answer some of the letters and questions I've received from readers over the last few months.

I dug deep into the mailbag and sorted through the stacks and stacks of envelopes to unearth your most pressing inquiries. I hope you find the questions and answers insightful and useful. Enjoy!

Q. My wife and I are Catholic, but our relatives here in North Carolina are radical Protestants. They don't want to spend any time with us because of our Catholic faith, and when they do, it is only to try and convert us away from what they call a "sinful religion."

How can I make them accept us, without driving them away? (Nancy Steele, Sylva)

A. Unfortunately, you're not alone, as I know of many Catholics who are being "persecuted" — often by loved ones — because of their faith. But, remain strong. Remember, Jesus died for all of us sinners, and you must pray for your Christian relatives that their eyes and hearts will be opened, and they will come to see that we are all sons and daughters of the good Lord above.

Or, next time they come around, you can poke them with a stick until they go away.

Q. I often see you at various church events around the diocese, and you seem to be in fantastic shape. Your body is well toned, you always have a radiant tan and not one hair on your head is ever out of place. What's your secret? (Monica Allen, Charlotte)

A. I floss. A lot.

Q. OK, Mr. Smartypants, answer me this: Before Prohibition, who owned the most property in Chicago other than the Catholic Church? (Bonnie Wiechec, Highlands)

A. P'shaw, that's easy! Schlitz Brewery actually owned more property, believe it or not. And, for what it's worth, Columbia University is the second largest landowner in New York City after the Catholic Church. How do ya like me now?

Q. Are you a ninja? (Tom Pattison, Huntersville)

A. Yes. Yes, I am.

Q. 666 is the number of the Beast. What else can you tell me about him? (Jolené Nichols, Mooresville)

A. Not much, really. Except that 660 is the approximate number of the Beast, DCLXVI is the Roman numeral of the Beast, 1010011010 is the binary of the Beast, $665.95 is the retail price of the Beast, $699.25 is the price of the Beast plus sales tax, $769.95 is the price of the Beast with accessories and replacement soul, $656.99 is the Target price of the Beast, Route 666 is the way of the Beast, 666F is the oven temperature of the Beast, 666I is the BMW of the Beast and 668 is the next-door neighbor of the Beast.

Q. When I grow up, can I be just like you? (Peter Asher, Forest City)

A. The life of a ninja is complex and full of peril. You will have to train rigorously, undergo a battery of physical and psychological difficulties, and often endure many hardships and sacrifices.

Plus, you will need to floss. A lot.

More unsung heroes than we can count

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

Recently, I wrote a column on caregivers as unsung heroes who sacrifice daily helping those unable to help themselves.

Several weeks after that column, I received a letter with a generous check from a woman who asked that I distribute the money to caregivers I knew. I did as she requested. Afterward, I received a beautiful letter from a caregiver who said she had enlisted a lawyer to help her save the little her parents had left and that the money I'd sent was the exact sum she needed to pay the lawyer.

As I read her letter, it occurred to me that when I wrote about caregivers I had focused solely on them and their sacrifices. It hadn't occurred to me that many of these caregivers are supported by people such as the caring woman who wrote to me. They, too, are unsung heroes we seldom — or never — hear about. In fact, if we counted them as caregivers, the number of caregivers we would find in one parish alone would be staggering.

Care-giving requires all the strength one has to perform it day after day. When people become disabled through physical illness or old age, they need constant care. Some must be fed, cleaned, moved and constantly reaffirmed.

You don't get used to these types of tasks, especially when the one you are caring for is your own flesh and blood. And too, when we love someone dearly, we hurt all the more in seeing them fail. This, more than taking care of their physical needs, leaves caregivers drained.

Equally wrenching is a dark cloud that forever hovers — the fear of losing a loved one. No matter how strong caregivers may be, they cannot go it alone for long. Sooner or later, the pressure may start to win out — unless, that is, there is someone to support them.

Without a doubt, prayer is a powerful support. But unless caregivers border on sainthood, they can use all the help they can get from those who personify the corporal works of mercy.

These people may be neighbors who bring meals or who take turns in helping caregivers so that they can have a break. These people may be parishioners who constantly check in to see if everything is OK, or lawyers and doctors lending their services pro bono.

In the eyes of society, this is not glamorous work, but it is a corporal work of mercy, and blessed is he or she who performs it!

The feast of the Annunciation's importance today

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. I'm puzzled by the relative lack of importance attached the feast of the Annunciation (March 25) by the church. Dec. 8, the feast of Our Lady's conception, is a day of obligation, but the feast of Our Lord's conception is not.

The church teaches that life begins at conception, and the Annunciation marks the event when the Word became flesh. It would seem that promoting this feast would both honor our Lord and emphasize our commitment to the church's teaching about the origin of life.

Our Catholic paper not long ago had an article about a Catholic English martyr, Margaret Clitherow. Her feast, they said, is on the feast of the Annunciation. Can another saint be commemorated on that day? (Pennsylvania)

A. Your question is a good and interesting one, particularly since the Annunciation is apparently the first event in Mary's life to be honored liturgically by Christian people.

In addition, it was widely believed in the early centuries of Christianity that March 25 was the day of Christ's death. St. Augustine (died 430) echoed a long tradition when he declared that Jesus was put to death March 25, the same day of the year on which he was conceived ("De Trinitate," Book 4).

By that time, a church had been built in Nazareth to commemorate the Annunciation, which would seem to indicate some liturgical celebration of that feast already.

Probably the feast of the Annunciation would have developed into a more solemn celebration except for one fact. For centuries, in both Eastern and Western parts of Christianity, the widely accepted practice was that no eucharistic liturgy could be celebrated during Lent except on Sunday. In fact, no feast at all was to be observed during what then was called the "great fast."

Since March 25 usually occurs during Lent, often on the days of the Sunday "scrutinies" for catechumens, and even during the solemn celebrations of Holy Week, this would bar the celebration of any feast in March, even the Annunciation.

To avoid the problem, some Christian churches tried to move the feast to the week before Christmas, Dec. 18, or during January, but these alternatives never became popular. Eventually, about the year 700, despite Lent, the feast finally was established on March 25.

Even today, of course, March 25 often falls in the final days of Lent or during Holy Week, in which case the feast may be observed later, during the Easter season.

The pro-life implications of this feast are not overlooked. Increasingly today, parishes and dioceses give special attention, liturgically and in other ways, to the fact that since we honor the presence of the Word in the womb of his mother from the beginning of her pregnancy, so we should respect the sacredness of other human beings from the moment of their conception.

Finally, as with March 25, feasts of several saints are observed every day of the year, though most of them are not on the calendar for celebration by the universal church. Even Dec. 25 has at least half a dozen saints whose feast day occurs along with the birth of Christ.

Sacred Heart Church serves spiritual needs of Burnsville Catholics

BURNSVILLE — The history of Sacred Heart Church in Burnsville is intertwined with that of Catholic churches in neighboring Mitchell and Madison counties, including St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill.

Jesuit Father Andrew Graves came to Madison County in 1937 to serve as pastor of the now-defunct Chapel of the Little Flower in Revere. Barely a handful of Catholics lived in the mountain region at the time, but the small mountain chapel would prove to serve a missionary role in decades to come.

Father Graves eventually relocated to Hot Springs, where a Catholic mission had existed since the 1880s. The Jesuit priest was instrumental in establishing the Chapel of the Redeemer in Hot Springs, where he also acquired a home that his later successors would model into the Jesuit House of Prayer, a retreat center.

By the early 1980s, the majority of Madison County Catholics had centered in and around Mars Hill, and the community there became a mission of Revere. In November 1985, the mission attained parish status and was placed under the patronage of St. Andrew the Apostle. The Chapel of the Redeemer, for a time, became a mission of St. Andrew the Apostle Church.

Meanwhile, in the Yancey County town of Burnsville, a small Catholic population was slowly growing.

In the early 1930s, Jesuit Father Louis Toups, Father Graves' predecessor who had also served the Catholic populations in Revere and other towns in Madison, Mitchell and Yancey counties, occasionally visited Burnsville from Hot Springs to celebrate Mass. The celebration of Mass in Burnsville continued intermittently in private homes, an American Legion hall and a building on the town square until the mid-1950s.

At that point, Glenmary Missioners were appointed to the Mitchell County pastorate of St. Lucien Church in Spruce Pine and its mission, St. Patricia Church in Linville, which is no longer in diocesan use. Father Francis Schenk served as the first Glenmary pastor of the three churches.

In August 1959, then-Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh acquired two acres on Summit Street in Burnsville, and Father Schenk began directing the construction of a multipurpose church facility, complete with a rectory and parish hall.

Bishop Waters dedicated the new building, called Sacred Heart Church, in June 1962. The local Catholic population numbered 28.

Diocesan priests began serving St. Lucien Church and its mission in 1968, the first being Father (now Msgr.) Felix Kelaher.

By the early 1980s, about 50 families were worshipping at Sacred Heart Church, and Father John M. Pagel, pastor, oversaw an expansion. By removing a rectory living room wall, seating capacity in the church was increased from 110 to 140. Adult education and CCD (faith formation) programs were introduced and cultivated at that time.

Sacred Heart Church was placed under the ministerial care of St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill in 1986. With the addition of the Yancey County church to its parish region, St. Andrew the Apostle Church's territory expanded to more than 1,000 square miles over Madison, Yancey and north Buncombe counties.

Jesuit Father Edward Ifkovitz served as pastor of St. Andrew the Apostle Church and Sacred Heart Church from September 1996 until July 2002, when diocesan priest Father David Brzoska became pastor.

In recent years, the ministerial outreach of Sacred Heart Church has expanded further to include Mexican migrants working in Yancey County's tobacco and lumber industries. With more than 200 members, the Hispanic community gathered in December 1997 for the annual Our Lady of Guadalupe celebration. The festival at the church continues to remain a popular celebration for Hispanic parishioners.

Jesuit Father Francis Reese, pastor of St. Andrew the Apostle in the early 1990s and now retired, and Mercy Sister Peggy Verstage, who runs the Jesuit retreat house in Hot Springs, both assist with Hispanic ministry at Sacred Heart Church and St. Andrew the Apostle Church.

Each year in October, the parish's St. Francis of Assisi celebration draws more than 300 local Hispanics to the event.

Summertime visitors increase attendance at both churches, and construction is beginning at Sacred Heart Church to expand and remodel the worship space to increase seating capacity from 110 to 160 people.

Ministries and outreach are an important aspect of parish life at Sacred Heart Church, with a number of parishioners actively involved in the local hospice, Reconciliation House for needy persons, the local animal shelter, as well as the Knights of Columbus and the Women's Guild, which is starting an Angel program to visit people who are homebound or in hospitals or nursing homes.

CHARLOTTE — Priests must conform to Christ in holiness and constant conversion, and nurture this union by daily prayer, said Bishop Peter J. Jugis.

"I say that it is important for us to take these words to heart, because conforming our lives to Christ in holiness and in constant conversion is essential to the life and ministry of priests," said Bishop Jugis.

The bishop offered these words during the chrism Mass, one of the Catholic Church's most solemn Masses, at St. Patrick Cathedral April 6. During the annual Mass, priests rededicate themselves to their mission as shepherds within their parishes, and the bishop blesses the oils to be used throughout the diocese in the upcoming year.

Nearly 64,000 joined with their bishops for the diocesan Rite of Election and Call to Continuing Conversion at the beginning of Lent. Another estimated 90,000 men and women celebrated those rites at the parish level.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, 506 people from various parishes participated in the

A SIGN OF GOD'S LOVE

Thousands of pilgrims fill St. Peter's Square for a Palm Sunday Mass led by Pope John Paul II April 4. Passion Sunday, popularly known as Palm Sunday, marks the beginning of Holy Week, the solemn celebrations of the passion and resurrection of Christ.

Pope, at Palm Sunday Mass, says cross is sign of Christ's love

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The cross of Christ is a sign of pain and glory, of Christ's love for humanity and of his victory over death, Pope John Paul II said on Palm Sunday.

"On the cross, Jesus died for each one of us," he said in his homily April 4 during the Mass in St. Peter's Square.

To the singing of "Hosanna," priests carrying olive branches and young people carrying tall, leafy green palm branches processed to the altar where Pope John Paul sat holding a braided palm.

The Mass also marked World Youth Day, and thousands of young people from around the world joined the pope for the celebration.

Pope John Paul told the youths not to be afraid to proclaim the Gospel of the cross in every circumstance.

"Certainly, the message the cross communicates is not easy to understand in our epoch when material well-being and comforts are proposed and sought after as priority values," he said. "Do not be afraid to go against the current."

The cross, he said, has two aspects that cannot be separated: "It is painful and glorious at the same time. The suffering and humiliation of the death of Christ are intimately tied to the exaltation and glory of the resurrection, he added.

"Dear brothers and sisters, dear young people, never forget this consoling truth," he told them. "The passion and resurrection of Christ constitute the center of our faith and sustain us in our inevitable daily trials."

At the end of the Mass, those in St. Peter's Square watched by satellite as young people in Berlin welcomed the World Youth Day cross to Germany after it had traveled throughout Europe.

The cross will be carried to each of Germany's dioceses before being taken to Cologne, where the next international celebration of World Youth Day is scheduled for August 2005.

The pope, speaking from the Vatican, encouraged "the whole church in Germany to mobilize itself for this great event."

Vatican official tells U.N. of growing religious discrimination

GENEVA (CNS) — A growing, subtle form of religious discrimination can be seen in attempts to exclude anyone from speaking out on social issues from the perspective of their faith, a Vatican diplomat told a U.N. agency.

"While respecting a healthy sense of the state's secular nature, the positive role of believers in public life should be recognized," Archbishop Silvano Tomasi told the U.N. Commission on Human Rights.

The archbishop, the Vatican's representative to U.N. offices based in Geneva, spoke to the commission April 1 about religious freedom.

"The place of religions in society and their desire to participate in public life at the service of the people have been part of recent debates that have been provoked by political events and increased pluralism in many countries of the world," the archbishop said.

Religion is an important part of people's lives and it is natural that they bring their values to bear on public discussions, he said.

Archbishop Tomasi said the Universal Declaration of Human Rights acknowledges not only the right of an individual to believe what he or she wants, but also the right for believers to form communities and for those communities to express the faith they hold in common.

Instead of banning faith from public discussions, he said, promoting religious freedom means encouraging people to get to know each other's faith, to respect differences and to work together for peace and justice.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope urges end to 'infernal cycle of mutual violence' in Holy Land

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II urged the international community to take necessary steps to end the "infernal cycle of mutual violence" in the Holy Land.

The pope also said the increase in global terrorism underscored the need for reform of the United Nations, in order to strengthen its peacekeeping role around the globe.

He made the remarks April 2 in accepting the new Lebanese ambassador to the Holy See, Naji Abi Assi.

The pope said that in the face of more than half a century of conflict between Israelis and Palestinians, the international community "must not flee from its own responsibilities under the pretext of dealing with other pressing situations."

He said Palestinians and Israelis must be pressured to undertake a real dialogue and show political courage in negotiating a solution that respects the rights of all sides.

The pope said it would take mutual forgiveness in order to heal the wounds inflicted by so many decades of violence in the Holy Land.

He said he was concerned about the wider effects of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in a world that is already politically unstable in many areas.

The "unjustifiable and worrisome outbreaks of international terrorism" point to the need for changes in the way the United Nations functions, he said. The organization should be "strengthened in the way it makes decisions and takes action, with the aim of reducing the sources of tension and of guaranteeing peace," he added.

Vatican official welcomes U.S. Unborn Victims of Violence Act

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The new U.S. Unborn Victims of Violence Act is a "juridically and ethically" important law that finally recognizes the fact that a fetus is a human being, said Bishop Elio Sgreccia, vice president of the Pontifical Academy for Life.

"I would say this is a law that has come a bit late," Bishop Sgreccia told Vatican Radio April 2, the day after President George W. Bush signed the law recognizing an unborn child as the second victim when a violent federal crime is perpetrated against a pregnant woman.

Bishop Sgreccia said that until the new measure was enacted U.S. law gave so much emphasis to a "woman's freedom" when pregnant that no room was left to offer any legal recognition of the life of a fetus.

The new law, he said, recognizes "the other priority principle, which is that the fetus represents a human being who has juridical relevance and who must be respected as a human being."

"This should be recognized unanimously within (the framework of) human rights," Bishop Sgreccia said.

Under the law, anyone who harms a woman's unborn child while committing a federal crime, such as assaulting the woman on federal property, commits a distinct federal crime against the child in addition to the crime against the woman.

Bishop Sgreccia was asked why he thought it was so difficult to get the rights of a fetus legally recognized.

"I think it is because it goes against a principle of so-called 'autonomy,' a libertarian principle that wants to give adults the power of life or death over a fetus," the bishop said.

Such a position, he said, "is anti-human because it goes against the equality of all people, of all human beings. The human being does not begin at birth; it begins earlier."

sioned by Pope John Paul II, will be on display. There will be no reconciliation service or Mass. The prayer service is spreading word about divine mercy, one of the church's newest devotions, which is embraced by Pope John Paul II.

HIGH POINT— A special Mass on Divine Mercy Sunday will be celebrated April 18 at 3 p.m. at Maryfield Chapel, 1315 Greensboro Rd. The Divine Mercy Chaplet will be recited at 2:45 p.m. and the sacrament of Reconciliation will be offered at 2 p.m. preceding the Mass. For more information call (336) 886-2444.

GREENSBORO — Burke Balch, director of medical ethics at National Right to Life, will speak at St. Pius X Church, 2210 N. Elm St., April 23 at 7 p.m. He will be speaking on assisted suicide and euthanasia. ## DID YOU KNOW?

THE GRAPES OF WRATH

In addition to being used by John Steinbeck as the title of a novel and occurring in the "Battle Hymn of the Republic"; the Grapes of Wrath are an allusion to the winepress image of Revelation 14:19-20 that teaches about the harvest of the earth and the impending doom of the ungodly.

Churches dedicate statues on feast days

CHARLOTTE — Two parishes recently gained new additions to their sanctuaries.

St. Helen Church in Spencer Mountain and St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte both received and blessed statues in separate ceremonies.

Capuchin Father Stanley Kobel, parochial vicar of St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte, blessed a statue of St. Helen on her feast day, Jan. 4, at St. Helen Church. The Capuchin Franciscan order, which staffs St. Thomas Aquinas and Our Lady of Consolation churches in Charlotte, also helps staff the small Spencer Mountain church.

The statue was donated by Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte, and the church community.

Father Mark Lawlor, administrator of St. Vincent de Paul Church, blessed a statue of St. Joseph with an infant Jesus at Mass on the feast of St. Joseph, March 19.

Hand-carved in Italy, the statue completes the Holy Family in the church.

Sacred Heart parishioner receives humanitarian award

SALISBURY — Elizabeth "Libby" Duncan Koontz didn't wait for doors to open for her — she did it herself.

The Salisbury-Rowan Human Relations Council she helped found honored local residents recently who keep opening those doors, such as Sonia Marie Trutie Fisher, a member of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

Fisher received a 2004 Elizabeth Duncan Koontz Humanitarian Award March 23.

Fisher is a native of Cuba who came to Salisbury in 1957 after marrying a U.S. serviceman. She's been active at Sacred Heart Church, coordinated Meals on Wheels for 11 years, given more than 100 volunteer hours at the W.G. "Bill" Hefner V.A. Medical Center, sits on the board of the Rowan County Literacy Council and serves as an interpreter for Spanish-speaking patients at Rowan Regional Medical Center.

"I'm honored," she said. "I must return, in some way, what this country, this community, has done for me."

The 2004 Elizabeth Duncan Koontz Humanitarian Awards are named for a Salisbury woman who fought for racial equality and women's rights. A 1938 graduate of Livingstone College and a school teacher, Koontz led the movement to integrate the N.C. Teacher's Association and was the first black and first female president of the National Education Association.

In 1964, she was one of 16 Americans who visited the Soviet Union at the request of the Saturday Review. In 1965, she was president of the President's Advisory Council on Education of Disadvantaged Children. She headed the Women's Bureau of the Department of Labor under President Richard Nixon, was a delegate to the United Nations Commission on the Status of Women in 1970 and chaired the National Commission on Working Women for seven years.

She retired as assistant superintendent for the N.C. Department of Public Instruction and died in 1989.

DANCING TO A DIFFERENT BEAT

Unique residency brings African culture to Catholic school

BY CAROLE McGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Students in Asheville recently got a taste of Africa.

Asheville Catholic School spent a week immersed in African culture March 29-April 2. The experience, part of the school's yearlong Artists in Residence program, involved "The Magic of African Rhythm," a cultural arts group working in the Raleigh-Durham area of North Carolina.

The Shabu family, originally from West Africa, is the core of the Magic of African Rhythm, which specializes in various forms of cultural artistic expression. A grant from the Asheville Area Arts Council, and additional assistance from the school fund, brought members of the Shabu family and their "Ngoma for Children" residency to the students.

"Ngoma" is the "rhythmic thread that links drumming, singing, dancing, dramatic and visual artistic expression together," according to information supplied by the Shabu family.

Third-, fifth- and seventh-graders rotated through various aspects of the residency, which emphasizes "ways in which the community plays a role in other countries as well as our own," said Chris Lenderman, a school parent who applied for the grant.

Maisha "Mama" Shabu and her husband Baba spent 20 years living and developing their art in Africa.

Maishu told the students African folktales relating to the importance of community. One tale was about Jeli, a storyteller who tells a folktale but adds a bit of personal flavor while keeping constant the basic story.

Third- and fifth-graders retold the story in groups while seventh-graders retold the story adding personal embellishments. The students then discussed the differences and similarities in each version.

Baba, a textile designer in both East and West Africa, taught the students the Adinkra system of textile design, which uses symbols that correspond to the character development traits emphasized in schools.

The Adinkra cloth, which had its origin in Ghana, Africa, gets its name from the person to whom the first cloth was presented. Each student chose a symbol that was meaningful to him or her and stamped that symbol on the cloth.

One of the cloths will be auctioned in May at a school fundraising dinner.

Maishu and Baba's children were also involved in the residency. Their son, Teli, taught the students how to play African drums while their daughter, MaBinti, taught African dance routines. The students practiced traditional African rhythms throughout the week, including the Cou-Cou from West Africa and the Samba, which originated in the Congo.

Kuumba Zuwena, school receptionist, taught the students several Swahili phrases, morning greetings and how to sing "Happy Birthday," which they sang to surprise one of their teachers on his birthday.

Zuwena said she helped the students develop their "singing ears," opening them up to different sounds in West African chants.

Before the Friday morning Mass, fifth-graders played African rhythms on the drums. Afterward, the three participating grades gathered for a traditional African meal eaten in native African style — with their fingers. Bowls carried by the youngest child in the group were used to wash the hands before and after the meal.

Emilia Ricci, a school parent who once worked in Nigeria, prepared the meal that featured foods from all over Africa.

The residency ended with an assembly for the remaining student body, faculty, staff and guests. With an Adinkra cloth made by the third-, fifth- and seventh-graders as a backdrop on the stage, fifth-graders opened the event with a drum call inviting everyone to join them for the program.

"This is done in every African ceremony," said Maisha Shabu.

Third-graders incorporated songs into their retelling of the African folktale of Bali, a boy who comes to realize that he needs his community and it needs him. Fifth-graders danced to seventh-graders' drumming showing what different animals look like. Then the seventh-grade performed a warrior dance.

"The children really enjoyed this," said Donna Gilson, a third-grade teacher. "The seventh-grade asked whether we could do this again next year."

SPARKING LEADERSHIP

Workshop to motivate leaders, volunteers

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

GREENSBORO — Lay leaders and volunteers within the Diocese of Charlotte will have a unique opportunity to enhance their leadership skills at an upcoming workshop.

"Keeping the Spark Alive," a one-day workshop sponsored by the diocesan Education Vicariate, will be held at St. Paul the Apostle Church Saturday May 1.

"This workshop is recommended for anyone involved in lay ministry — catechists, parish staff and parish volunteers," said Frank Villaronga, director for diocesan evangelization and ministry formation.

"The topics that will be addressed are pertinent not only to church ministry, but also to day-to-day ministry within our families, neighbors and coworkers," he said.

The workshop will be divided into two parts, each beginning with a keynote speaker and followed by four breakout sessions. Part I, "Keeping the Spark Alive," will feature breakout sessions addressing motivating volunteers, avoiding burnout, time management and pastoral collaboration. Part II, "Unity in Diversity," will focus on communicating with compassion, collaborating with consideration, dealing with differences, Christian conflict resolution and the cultural challenge.

The 2004 leadership training workshop will be unique from years' past in one important aspect, as it will conducted in both Spanish and English.

Participants will attend the opening prayer, lunch and the closing together, Villaronga said. They will separate for parts of the workshop that will be presented in each language.

"The Spanish sessions will be similar to the English, but not identical," said Villaronga. "The Spanish morning session will focus on the implementation of the Hispanic pastoral plan."

Also, the Spanish and English sessions will mirror each other in the way they address unity in diversity topics, Villaronga said.

"The English sessions will focus on how to be welcoming and open to the immigrant cultures," he said. "As the dominant culture, we also need to understand how to empower these immigrants, because they are Catholic Christians."

"The Spanish sessions will reflect the English-speaking sessions," Villaronga explained. "As people who are being welcomed into a different culture, how do they learn to adapt to the culture? What are some of the important cultural differences? What do they need to be aware of?"

It becomes a give-and-take, Villaronga said. The dominant culture learns that it needs to be welcoming, while the immigrants learn they will be welcomed, but they also need to learn to adapt to a new culture.

"It's vitally important that we start recognizing that we are not two dioceses — one English-speaking and one Spanish-speaking," said Villaronga.

In 2000, the Education Vicariate began offering the leadership training workshop to enable the participants to become more effective parish and community leaders. Topics have included: communication and collaboration, evangelization and enculturation, developing advocacy skills, providing human services in the parish, civil law and legal concerns, facilitating faith experiences, issues of enculturation and canon law.

Villaronga will be the keynote speaker for the morning session May 1. Terry Aiken, director of youth ministry at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point, will be the afternoon keynote speaker. Breakout session presenters will include Christine Richards, an instructor of business communications at Belmont Abbey College; Mercy Sister Antonette Schmidt, diocesan director of young adult ministry; and Paul Kotlowski director of diocesan youth ministry.

MANY VOICES LIFTED IN SONG

Charlotte Catholic choir performs at Carnegie Hall

CHARLOTTE — Fifty-one members of the Honors Ensemble at Charlotte Catholic High School took part in the National Youth Choir concert at Carnegie Hall in New York City March 20.

The students were part of a 477-voice choir consisting of high school students from across the United States to perform at the Isaac Stern Auditorium, the largest of Carnegie Hall's three performance halls with an audience capacity of 2,804.

The students learned seven pieces of choral music written by Mozart, Mendelssohn, Clausen and Mulholland. The clinician who prepared these students in two days was Dr. Andre Thomas, a world-renowned conductor, arranger and composer and director of choral music at Florida State University.

Two of the pieces performed were written by Thomas.

The students earned money from several fundraisers to help pay for their four-day trip. Eight parents accompanied the group, along with Dottie Tippett, the school's choral director.

In addition to performing in one of the world's most prestigious venues, the Charlotte Catholic students were able to see "The Lion King" on Broadway; visit Rockefeller Center, the Empire State Building, Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island; and eat lunch in Little Italy.

Tsiona Shay of the Israeli Postal Authority displays letters to God at a post office in Jerusalem March 31. Letters addressed to God are among the undeliverable mail collected by the service on a regular basis.

Letters to God often find final destination in Jerusalem post office

BY JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

JERUSALEM — In the gray, florescent-lit office of the undelivered letters department of the Israel Postal Authority the letters gather.

They are the letters people send to God and are addressed in a variety of ways: "God, Israel"; "The Almighty God, Jerusalem"; "Jesus Christ, Jerusalem"; "To Good Jerusalem"; "Angels of Heaven."

"People who feel lonely, people in despair send letters to God," said Yitzhak Rabihiya, spokesman for the Israel Postal Authority. "These are very private letters."

This is also the place where letters to Santa Claus are sent — a far cry from his legendary workshop in the North Pole.

Most of the letters arrive in waves around Christmas and New Year's and the Jewish holidays of Rosh Hashana and Yom Kippur, Rabihiya said.

The letters are written by people of all ages, in every language — including Arabic — and come from all over the world. They ask for love, health, peace, money, help with studies — and many ask for forgiveness, said Avi Yaniv, director of the department.

"There was a letter from one girl who had stolen a few things and asked God to help her stop stealing," Yaniv said. "Other people who stole things even send the money covering the cost of the item."

The money is sent to charity, he said.

Because the department deals with all letters with insufficient or undeliverable addresses, certain employees are permitted by law to open the letters to try to determine where they were meant to be sent. Not all the letters to God are read, and as with all the letters that reach the postal authority employees strictly protect the confidentiality of the writers, Yaniv said.

According to Israeli law, the contents of the letters can be published only 15 years after they were written, Yaniv said.

Sample letters show that most letters are handwritten; some are written with awe and a tone of great respect, while others are much more relaxed and familiar in style.

"Dear God, How are you doing today? I hope and pray you are doing fine and feeling great," wrote one person from the United States.

Another person from an undisclosed country wrote seeking help for some financial difficulty: "Please God, help me. I am entrusting you with my fears."

One man from Spain wrote asking for peace for Israel and the entire world. A woman from an undisclosed country asked for forgiveness for forging dates on a prescription, while another woman from an undisclosed country asked God to help her with her addiction to pistachios.

"My God! A lot of time has passed partly because of lack of courage and partly because of lack of faith. ...Today I am gathering courage and asking to stay away from pistachios for the rest of my life. ... I ask to be rid of pistachios and fruit and dried fruit and all the other drugs which damage me. ... I am now in a stage of gaining weight. Allow me to accept myself as I am and to forgive myself," she wrote.

The letter that stands out in Yaniv's mind is the letter his department received from a widow who asked God to allow her husband to appear in her dreams so she could see him again.

"She loved her husband so much. It touched me," Yaniv said.

Several times a year the letters are taken to the Western Wall in Jerusalem's Old City, and there the rabbi of the Western Wall deposits them in the cracks of the wall, following an ancient Jewish tradition, Yaniv said.

Jews believe that the Holy Land is the center of the world, that Jerusalem is the center of the Holy Land and that the Western Wall is the holiest place in Jerusalem, "closest to God," Yaniv said.

"Our only role is to get the letters to whom they were addressed. When it is addressed in this case to God, there is no place to send it, so we take it to the rabbi at the Western Wall," Rabihiya said.

"We see it as an important role. We feel that by doing this we are fulfilling the mission asked of us by the people who wrote these letters trying to get to God. We don't have an address for God, but we try to do our best," he said.

St. Mark students walk, raise funds for diabetics

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

HUNTERSVILLE — Students at St. Mark School are leading the march against diabetes.

According to the American Diabetes Association, St. Mark School has raised the most money of all schools participating in the School Walk for Diabetes. Walking in shifts throughout the day April 1, the kindergarten through sixth-grade students helped raise more than $16,200.

St. Mark School is currently first among the participating schools in North Carolina and the Southeast, said Suzanne Fulcher, the ADA's state coordinator for School Walk for Diabetes. When all the numbers are calculated, St. Mark School may be first in the entire nation, she said.

"It's a major accomplishment, especially in our first year," said Sherri Petrilli, school nurse who organized the walk. "I'm so overwhelmed with it all."

Fifth-grader Katie Wackerman, one of two St. Mark School students diagnosed with diabetes, was happy to see her fellow classmates making laps around the school parking lot.

"I think it's cool," said Wackerman, "that they would come out here and walk for all the diabetics and make a difference."

The students crafted a "Wall of Honor" — a poster in the school lobby that contains the names of friends and family with diabetes, for whom the students were walking.

Petrilli also helped organize a number of other diabetes-related activities, including a pep rally and "Penny Wars" among the classes, which raised more than $1,600.

The fifth- and sixth-graders also learned what it was like to have diabetes by following the routines and schedule of a diabetic for a day. Classes also learned about the importance of exercise and nutrition.

The cause of diabetes continues to be a mystery, although both genetics and environmental factors such as obesity and lack of exercise appear to play roles, according to the American Diabetes Association's Web site.

Diabetes is a disease in which the body does not produce or properly use insulin, a hormone needed to convert sugar, starches and other food into energy needed for daily life.

There are 18.2 million people in the United States, or 6.3 percent of the population, who have diabetes. While an estimated 13 million have been diagnosed with diabetes, unfortunately, 5.2 million people (or nearly one-third) are unaware that they have the disease.

All of the credit for St. Mark School's successful event went to Petrilli and the students, said Dr. Walt Pryzgocki, principal.

"This program joins a list of student services that include financial support for Holy Angels (in Belmont), St. Mark Church's Angel Tree, the American Red Cross' Disaster Relief, Samaritan's Feet and others," he said.

"This school has existed for only eight months," said Przygocki. "This 'culture of service' is due to the students, teachers and parents of St. Mark Catholic School."

SAINT YOU SHOULD KNOW

ST. BERNADETTE

Marie Bernarde Soubirous was born at Lourdes, France, Jan. 7, 1844. Called Bernadette as a child, she lived in poverty and on Feb. 11, 1858, she saw a vision of the Virgin Mary. Daily visions followed and on Feb. 28, a spring flowed where none had been before, and on March 25, a vision directed her to build a chapel on the site. In 1866, Bernadette became a nun; she died in 1879. Lourdes soon became one of the great pilgrimage centers of modern Christianity where many miracles have been reported. Sister Bernadette was canonized in 1933. Her feast day is April 16.

OLG students sweep Battle of the Books

GREENSBORO — Our Lady of Grace School students know their books.

The Middle School Battle of the Books team took first place in the system-level competitions of the N.C. State Battle of the Books in Concord March 8, and first place in the regional competition at Providence Day School in Charlotte March 29.

The Battle of the Books program is for middle school students who read from a list of books established by the state Battle of the Books committee, and then compete in quiz-bowl-style tournaments to test their knowledge of the books.

The Our Lady of Grace School team now advances to the state level of the competition, representing the Independent School District (private/parochial/home schools) in North Carolina. The competition will take place at the University of North Carolina at Greensboro April 30.

The purpose of the Battle of the Books program is to encourage reading by all students at the middle school level. Students, regardless of ability, are exposed to quality literature representing a variety of literary styles and viewpoints by prominent authors in the area of young adult literature. The game format creates interest and excitement in reading.

The North Carolina Association of School Librarians assumed sponsorship of Battle of the Books in 1991. In 2000, the North Carolina School Library Media Association became a co-sponsor of Battle of the Books, and independent schools became a region for competition.

The Legend of the Easter Egg

Simon of Cyrene was on his way to the marketplace carrying a basket of eggs, when he came upon a crowd of people. A Roman soldier came over to Simon and said. "Follow me." Simon was told to help a man named Jesus carry a heavy cross that Jesus would be crucified on later that day. Simon set his basket of eggs aside and went to help Jesus.

Along the difficult way, Simon became friends with the man who was going to die. Jesus shared with Simon some of his teachings. Before the solders nailed Jesus to the cross Jesus thanked Simon and whispered in his ear, " I will give you a sign that I have spoken the truth and you will know that I have risen from the dead."

Later that day, Simon was saddened by the death of Jesus. He was hoping the promise that Jesus had made would come true, but he received no sign. After two days, Simon suddenly remembered his basket of eggs. He ran to the marketplace to find them. When he looked in the basket, he saw the sign Jesus had promised. Each of the eggs had changed. Some were brightly colored and other had beautiful designs on them.

Simon knew that Jesus was alive! As he ran to tell his friends, shouts of "Alleluia" were heard all over Jerusalem.

Many join Catholic Church on Holy Saturday

Rite of Election with Bishop Peter J. Jugis at three locations — Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville Feb. 29, St. Matthew Church in Charlotte March 6 and St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro March 7.

"I was delighted as bishop to see such evidence of the work of the Holy Spirit throughout the diocese," said Bishop Jugis. "It was inspiring to see so many individuals wanting to celebrate the sacraments of initiation."

Of the 63,891 who participated in diocesan ceremonies in the United States, more than 26,000 will be baptized, confirmed and receive the Eucharist for the first time on Holy Saturday. The other 37,000-plus, already baptized as Christians, will enter full communion with the Catholic Church at those ceremonies.

In the Diocese of Charlotte, 137 will be baptized, confirmed and receive the Eucharist for the first time, while 369 will enter full communion with the church.

"It is spiritually rewarding to see how the Holy Spirit is working in the hearts and souls of people wanting to be fully initiated into the Catholic Church," said Bishop Jugis.

The numbers from the diocesan ceremonies in early Lent of 2004 are slightly higher than the 62,261 recorded in diocesan ceremonies in 2003. About three-quarters of the dioceses responded to the Secretariat for Evangelization's survey.

"The common denominator seems to be a discovery of a more meaningful and religiously satisfying faith," said Dr. Cris Villapando, director of the Office of Faith Formation in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"All of the incoming people have in some way undergone a conversion," he said.

At least 17 U.S. dioceses will bring in groups larger than 1,000 people, with the largest groups of candidates and catechumens in the Archdiocese of Los Angeles (3,070) and the Diocese of Galveston-Houston (1,797).

The Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults is an ancient rite that was reinstituted in the church following the Second Vatican Council. It is the usual means for adults to come into the church.

Those who are not yet baptized are called catechumens, while Christians who are already baptized are called candidates.

"The approach in RCIA is based on the ritual text RCIA No. 75, which is really strategies for conversion therapy," said Villapando.

Infant baptisms take place in parishes throughout the year, and it is estimated that there will be more than 1 million performed in 2004.

In the Holy Saturday ceremonies, adults will enter the church in every diocese of the country and in virtually every one of the nation's nearly 19,000 parishes.

"In the end, this journey (of conversion) is Christocentric and enables the people to focus fundamentally on Christ and not the imperfections of pastoral agents," said Villapando.

Prequel of 'Da Vinci Code' is more of the same — with one difference

BY JOSEPH R. THOMAS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The resurrection of Dan Brown's moribund "Angels & Demons" is something of a literary miracle.

The book, on merit, succumbed quietly enough when it was first published four years ago. But then, last spring, came Brown's "The Da Vinci Code," a water-into-wine Doubleday phenomenon that is still on the best-seller list with more than 6 million copies celebrating the physical and intellectual derring-do of Harvard symbologist Robert Langdon.

"Da Vinci," then, is the reason "Angels & Demons" was rescued from the Simon & Schuster morgue (Atria is a Simon & Schuster imprint), being reissued in paperback as a prequel to "Da Vinci." Because it showed remarkable strength we now have the hardcover version.

The similarities between "Angels" and "Da Vinci" are many, but space prevents us from examining them at length. Let it simply be noted that both open with a murder in unusual circumstances, the victim in "Da Vinci" being a curator in the Louvre, whereas in "Angels" it is a priest-scientist who has created anti-matter in a bottle while working for a Swiss research firm that considers the God of tradition to be but a stand-in for science as the Almighty.

In both instances, a phone call to Langdon initiates a swirl of literally artful sleuthing. In "Da Vinci," the summons pairs him with a leggy cryptologist who is the slain curator's granddaughter. In "Angels" he finds himself working with the victim-priest's leggy daughter by adoption.

A "bio-entanglement physicist," she is thought to be the only other person privy to the anti-matter secret. But of course she isn't. Otherwise we wouldn't have had a corpse with his eye plucked out, and Langdon would still be home in bed.

If you are familiar with "Da Vinci," you know that in it the church is demonized. That continued the pattern Brown established in "Angels," where the demonization is aimed mostly at structure and practice, whereas in "Da Vinci" the target is dogma and belief. Although the reader of one book is likely to feel a sense of deja vu in reading the other, there is a monumental difference.

On the copyright page of "Angels" you will find this notice: "This book is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places and incidents are products of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. ..." Indeed, as soon as Langdon boards a strange-looking plane that will whisk him from Boston to Geneva in an hour we know we are in the realm of fantasy.

Not so in "Da Vinci." There Brown asserts, "All descriptions of artwork, architecture, documents and secret rituals in this novel are accurate." Thereafter he weaves fact and fiction together deceptively, imparting an aura of authenticity to the whole while shredding core beliefs and giving Jesus both a wife and a child. The charade, which finds Langdon pursuing clues secretly hidden in Da Vinci's art, argues that the church has murderously sought to suppress its "feminine side."

In "Angels," Bernini and his works are the source of the clues, with the plot hinging on the placement of anti-matter of unbelievable force under St. Peter's Basilica. The anti-matter is due to explode at midnight in the midst of a conclave to choose a successor to the pope who himself has been murdered.

But first, a long-dormant secret brotherhood of scientists, The Illuminati, must be reinvigorated to set up the science-religion conflict. And for maximum effect, St. Peter's Square must be filled with people enticed there by the grotesque hourly murders of four cardinals kidnapped from the conclave.

There is, of course, a surprise ending, although the anti-matter does explode and the display, live and on TV, is indeed spectacular. Nevertheless the basilica and Vatican City are saved thanks to Langdon and an unlikely cohort.

In the end, bodies lie scattered all over Rome's liturgical landscape, the new god, Science, reigns supreme and Langdon, after a long and tiring day, finds himself in bed with the bio-entanglement physicist who earlier disproved a favorite Einstein theory by using "atomically synchronized cameras to observe a school of tuna fish."

Thanks to "Da Vinci," this heretofore sow's ear of a book has become a silk purse.

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Much as the disciples were gathered, in this weekend's Gospel passage, the 18 young people were gathered in a room. Only these youths were not fearful, and the door was not locked or even closed. They were in the final hour of a weekend fast in solidarity with poor people throughout the world.

During the fast they grew increasingly aware of the magnitude of the suffering, the causes of hunger and their own responsibility to work to alleviate it. They collected money for Catholic Relief Services and food for a local food pantry. They listened as a pantry client told her life story, then emptied their pockets to give her gas money. They became more and more fervent in their prayer as they came to understand Jesus' compassion for the poor. By the closing session, each made a personal commitment to continue fighting against hunger.

Thomas, too, was already a committed disciple of Jesus, but he had trouble believing something incredible that he had not witnessed. Jesus seemed more than happy to oblige his faithful followers with the gift of a personal appearance. He did the same thing for those youths at the end of their fast.

They had just finished stating their commitments when an elderly man and his grown son appeared in the doorway. The older man had long gray hair, was missing some teeth and used a cane. Both were disheveled.

Now, I have experienced meeting Jesus in someone in need on more than one occasion. But my first thought this time was that these young people would think I had set this up.

They told me the father was ill, that they were passing through on their way from Alabama to New York and had run out of gas and money. I gave them some dollars to get farther down the road and thanked them for coming.

As they left, one of the youths grinned, "What just happened?" she asked. As I explained, they smiled and nodded. No doubters there.

Questions:

When have you experienced the presence of Jesus after believing? What tempts you to unbelief?

John P. Jackson, a member of the 1978 American team that first examined the Shroud of Turin, demonstrates to visitors at the Turin Shroud Center of Colorado how dimensions of the reputed burial cloth of Christ correspond with the standard unit of measure in early Palestine.

Shroud of Turin experts say Gibson film sparks new interest in cloth

Experts see '40 percent increase' in inquiries about shroud

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

COLORADO SPRINGS, Colo. — The wide publicity and controversy surrounding "The Passion of the Christ" have brought a spike of new interest in the Shroud of Turin.

John P. and Rebecca S. Jackson, who run the Turin Shroud Center of Colorado in Colorado Springs, and Barrie Schwortz, who runs the Web site www.shroud.com, reported a recent increase in calls or visits.

"This is normally a busy time of the year for us, but there's been about a 40 percent increase" in phone calls, said Rebecca Jackson, associate director of the center. A daughter of Orthodox Jews who is now Catholic, she has written and lectured on Jewish aspects of the shroud.

John Jackson, a Catholic, doesn't see belief in the shroud's authenticity as simply a matter of faith.

"Are we trying to replace science with faith? No, not at all," he said. "But this would all be pointless if it doesn't lead us to faith."

Schwortz said that while science may never reach clear knowledge as to how the image was imprinted on the shroud he has his own conclusion. "The only logical answer or explanation for the Shroud of Turin is that it wrapped the body of Jesus after he was crucified," he said.

Schwortz, a former imaging consultant at Cedars-Sinai Medical Center in Los Angeles, said he was a Jew when he started studying the shroud and remains a Jew today.

He sees his constant Jewish faith as a way to remain unbiased in his shroud research, however.

Belief that the shroud was the one that covered Jesus' body does not require belief that Jesus rose from the dead, he said, although many Christians believe the resurrection may explain how the image came to appear on the shroud.

Schwortz contended there is clear evidence that casts a serious shadow on the carbon-14 dating tests performed in 1988 at three separate laboratories, all of which concluded that the cloth dated from around the 13th or 14th century. Those tests led many to conclude the shroud is a fake.

"There is empirical, scientific evidence now in existence that shows that that section of the cloth was, in fact, a reweaving," he said.

Jackson, too, is unconvinced by the carbon-14 tests.

"They would still have to explain the image with all of its characteristics," he said. "I just couldn't see how a forger could have done it."

Bishop McGuinness students perform at guitar festival

KERNERSVILLE — The Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School Honors Guitar Ensemble performed in the All-Regional Guitar Festival at Guilford College in Greensboro March 27-28.

The ensemble was invited to perform as the opening act for the guitar orchestra, made up of selected high school students from around the Triad area. Two Bishop McGuinness students, Matthew Ostler and Beth Hurley, were selected.

Bishop McGuinness students who performed in the ensemble included Sandy and Paul Gerlach, David Laux, Greg Means, Katie Goodman, Alex Frye, Andrew Mealin, Michael Sage and Charlie Smith.

"It went very well," said Dr. Alan Hirsh, music director at Bishop McGuinness. "It was an honor for us to be asked to do that."

The group performed a number of selections during their 20 minute act, including arrangements by Hirsh and "The Shire" from the recent "Lord of the Rings" movies.

Hirsh, who is also adjunct guitar instructor at Wake Forest University and Guilford College, founded and directs the Piedmont Guitar Orchestra, now in its eighth year.

High school students to visit, work in Mexico

KERNERSVILLE — Students from both Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School and Cardinal Gibbons High School in Raleigh will travel to Mexico for a special mission trip April 7-17.

The trip is designed to heighten students' awareness of conditions in a nation and culture that are quite different from their daily experience at home. The students will also participate in a building and painting project while there.

Traveling to San Luis de Posoti during Holy Week, the students will spend Easter weekend experiencing the special worship activities for that feast in a small-town setting.

This will be followed by a bus excursion to the village of El Realejo, where the students will work with children in the local church and school environments, teaching them English and reinforcing their own facility with Spanish.

On Wednesday of Easter week, students will travel by bus to Mexico City, stopping in the city San Miguel de Allende. While visiting there, they will stop at the Basilica of Our Lady of Guadalupe, the Zocalo and the Museo de Anthropologia.

Participatants in the trip are being asked to keep journals of their experiences.

To prepare for the trip, the Bishop McGuinness and Cardinal Gibbons students have held numerous fundraisers to offset the cost of their participation. The Bishop McGuinness campus minister and members of the Spanish faculty will accompany them.

CHARLOTTE — Paula Knish, a registered nurse for Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools (MACS), has been named a winner of the Capitol Hill 2004 Sunny Award.

"I am not particularly comfortable getting recognition," Knish said. "However, I welcome the opportunity to get the program further revised and put it online or in print, as it could help folks."

The award is given annually by the Allergy and Asthma Network Mothers of Asthmatics Organization (AANMA) to recognize "an individual, coalition, or organization whose accomplishments at the local or state level resulted in changed laws, policies, or procedures affecting students with asthma or allergies in the school setting."

Knish was recognized in the national competition for making a difference on the state level. She worked with North Carolina Rep. Martha Alexander to enact legislation HB 1508, "Bioterrorism preparedness," which reads: "Establish standards and criteria for the education and credentialing of persons trained to administer lifesaving treatment to a person who suffers a severe adverse reaction to agents that might cause anaphylaxis."

Knish then coordinated a program to educate teachers and coaches on how to respond with epinephrine for allergic emergencies resulting in anaphylaxis. This program has been used as a model in other school systems as well. The Catholic News & Herald reported Knish's work in developing the First Responder protocol in the Feb. 13 issue.

Kathie Holder, MACS Health Director, nominated Knish for the award.

"I want to emphasize that I merely coordinated the project, and there are many kind-hearted health care professionals who volunteered their expertise to make the program a success," said Knish.

Knish said she and Dr. Glen Errington, an allergist with the Carolina Asthma and Allergy Center in Charlotte, plan to co-author a paper on the topic of allergic emergencies.

"Dr. Errington will work with the American Academy of Pediatrics and American Academy of Allergy and Immunology to make sure we have the 'gold standard' of practice for the protocol," said Knish.

Knish said she was motivated to initiate the program by her five children, all of whom have severe allergies. She also thanked her husband, Dr. Edward Knish, "whose patience and love sustain me."

Catholic middle schoolers experience BAC's Catholic Schools Day

BELMONT — They may be too young to drive. They can't register to vote yet. And alcohol is definite out of the question.

But college is what they can begin to plan for — that's something more than 600 middle school students are found out.

Students from across North and South Carolina attended Belmont Abbey College's Third Annual Catholic Schools Day Celebration April 1. The middle schoolers got a taste of what college life is like at one of the only private, Catholic liberal arts college in the southeast.

Students from Holy Trinity Middle School in Charlotte, Sacred Heart School in Salisbury, St. Michael School in Gastonia, Immaculata School in Hendersonville, Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro and St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem were among the schools treated to a day of tours, athletics, a cookout and questions and answers.

"Each year we really look forward to celebrating our Catholic heritage and reaching out to the younger members of the community with this event," said Rebecca Hethcox, the college's assistant director of admission.

"Ideally, this is a great way to transition students and prepare them to ultimately attend Belmont Abbey College, but we're also very happy to get them in the mindset of going to college in general," she said.

Hethcox, who organized the event, said students got a glimpse into the wide range of benefits and activities Belmont Abbey College offers its students and the Catholic community.

The visit included Mass in the basilica; a brief history of the college with President Abbot Placid Solari, OSB; a discussion on student life with Karen Van Norman, dean of student life; and a talk about Abbey athletics with Eliane Kebbe, athletic director.

The day also includes a cookout at lunch where students can mingle and talk about their experiences.

Belmont Abbey College, named one of the country's leading, private liberal arts colleges by U.S. News and World Report, was founded in 1876 and celebrates its heritage and is inspired by the Benedictine monastic tradition. Listed on the National Register of Historic Places, the College and Abbey Basilica greet thousands of visitors each year.

Students, principal switch roles for a day

WINSTON-SALEM — Principal Georgette Schraeder did her best not to show up late for class at St. Leo the Great School.

She wasn't teaching the class. She was attending it as a student.

Wearing a school uniform, Schraeder became a student for a day — and even took a few tests — while fourth-grader George Freiberger and sixth-grader Lucy Freiberger shared principal duties March 30.

"It was very interesting," said Schraeder. "And the (sixth-grade) science test was hard."

The swap was the result of a fundraising event staged by the school's Parent Teacher Organization.

To help offset the debt for repairing and replacing roofs at St. Leo the Great Church and School, the PTO put on an elaborate event at the NC School of the Arts in Winston-Salem March 13. Funds raised exceeded $30,000.

Part of the event included a silent auction, with items including golf lessons, dinner parties hosted by teachers, trips to the beach, platters decorated by students, book shelves decorated to represent a special theme for each of the school grades, and a chance to be principal for a day.

George and Lucy started their day as principals by leading the student body in prayer in the gym. The siblings spent the day visiting and observing classrooms, overseeing tornado and fire drills, checking uniforms and having special visitors in the office.

Schraeder said the acting principals enjoyed their duties for the day, but "they really enjoyed me taking their tests."

DID YOU KNOW?

NO POPE PETER

The tradition of popes changing their names upon election traditionally dates from Sergius IV (1009-1012). The story retold is that his name was Peter di Porca and he changed it, deferring to St. Peter, considering it unseemly to style himself Peter II. Actually, prior to this, some popes had changed their names to drop a name of pagan origin. The tradition allows pontiffs to show esteem for a predecessor, signal a vision or style and demonstrate a total commitment to the office.

Pope, liturgies set the mood when bishops visit Rome

Pope John Paul II poses with U.S. bishops at the Vatican April 2. Bishops from the states of Florida, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina and the Military Archdiocese were wrapping up a week of activities at the Vatican for their "ad limina" visit. Seated are Military Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien, left, and Miami Archbishop John C. Favalora. Standing from left are Bishops Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte, N.C.; Robert N. Lynch of St. Petersburg, Fla.; F. Joseph Gossman of Raleigh, N.C.; Robert J. Baker o f Charleston, S.C.; Victor B. Galeone of St. Augustine, Fla.; Thomas J. Wenski, coadjutor of Orlando, Fla.; J. Kevin Boland of Savannah, Ga.; and Gerald M. Barbarito of Palm Beach, Fla.

Bishop Jugis calls meeting good exercise in 'communio'

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — While bishops making their "ad limina" visits to Rome spend more time meeting than praying, the mood of the visits is set by concelebrated Masses and individual time with Pope John Paul II, several U.S. bishops said.

Whether ordained a bishop 20 years ago or five months ago, the bishops agreed that the visits they are required to make to Rome every five years underscore the fact that they are "brother bishops" and not branch managers of a global corporation.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis of Charlotte said the others helped him relax before his March 29 private audience with the pope.

"I wasn't intimated because the other bishops put me at ease," he said. "They told me it is not a quizzing (about the diocesan report), but that it is a friendly conversation."

The 47-year-old bishop said he was "very much in awe" at being alone with Pope John Paul, but the pope set the tone by commenting on his age.

"He asked when I was ordained," Bishop Jugis said, and the pope explained how he became a bishop in Poland at the age of 38.

"It was a tender moment of sharing," Bishop Jugis said.

The bishop also told the pope that the pontiff had ordained him to the priesthood in 1983.

"It was a very human exchange and conversation," Bishop Jugis said.

At the same time, he said, the Masses and prayers, the meetings with the pope and Vatican officials also make it clear that "the church is a divine institution and that Christ is the head of the body."

The "ad limina" visit, he said, "is a good exercise in 'communio' — it underlines the communion of the pope, the Vatican officials and the bishops. We are all drawn together under the power of the Holy Spirit to further the mission of the church."

Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta, a former bishop of Charlotte, was making his fourth "ad limina" visit.

"All of the bishops would tell you the same thing: The Masses create a sense of community and of supporting each other," he said.

He presided and gave the homily at the March 31 Mass, concelebrated by the bishops from North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida and the U.S. Archdiocese for the Military Services.

In his homily, Archbishop Donoghue spoke of the apostle Paul's courage in preaching the Gospel and living his faith even in the face of martyrdom.

"Christ is the only one who can free us to be brave, to be courageous for his sake and to make us worthy to teach and defend the church and the souls who shelter in her care," the archbishop said.

"We bishops want to have that kind of courage, and we want our people and all the people in the church to pray to the Holy Spirit to send this courage into our hearts because there is so much in this world which rises against our faith," he said.

Easter duty

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. I am in my 70s and go to Mass whenever I'm able. I want to make my Easter duty by going to Communion, but can I do that without going to private confession? I know I have not committed any serious sins, but I still don't go to Communion as often as I'd like because I cannot go to confession easily; sometimes it's months or years. (Florida)

A. First let's clear up your "Easter duty" obligations. According to Catholic Church laws, all the faithful who have received first Communion should receive Holy Communion at least once a year. Unless something serious stands in the way, that should be done during the Easter time, which lasts from the beginning of Lent to Pentecost (Canon 920).

The obligation for sacrament of penance during this period is binding only if it is necessary for an individual to receive the Eucharist. The Code of Canon Law (989) states that all who have reached the age of reason are obliged to confess any serious sins once a year.

In this law, as in past similar rules, the church does not intend to impose a new obligation for confession, but merely prescribes a time within which mortal sins should be confessed so that, if for no other reasons, the Eucharist might be received. Thus the law about annual confession does not apply to someone who is not aware of an unconfessed mortal sin.

I realize many Catholics are under the same misconception as you seem to be about yearly confession being an Easter duty for all Catholics. The present regulations that I just quoted, however, are nothing new. They go back at least to the Fourth Lateran Council (1215; Chapter 21), which makes clear it is speaking of mortal sin.

The Baltimore Catechism (official revised edition No. 2), from which many older Catholics studied their faith, asks what is meant by the church commandment to confess our sins once a year. This commandment, it responds, means that we should make a good confession each year "if we have a mortal sin to confess" (Question 293).

The Catechism of the Catholic Church refers to Canon 989 in its explanation of the obligation for annual confession (No. 2042).

You realize, I hope, that this is not what the church recommends; it is simply the bare minimum required. Any Catholic who understands that the sacrament of reconciliation does much more than forgive serious sin, how it helps us repair our sinfulness and other weaknesses, and how it reconciles us to God and our fellow members of the human family will normally receive this sacrament more than once a year, mortal sin or not.

Please reconsider and start receiving the Eucharist whenever you go to Mass. From what you told me, nothing prevents you from doing that right now, even if some time goes by between your opportunities to go to confession.

Meaning of crucifix letters

Q. What do the letters INRI stand for at the top of the crucifix? Sometimes the letters are IHS. I've been told that means "I have suffered". Is this true? (Ohio)

A. The Gospel of John (19:19) tells us Pilate placed an inscription on the cross of Jesus which read "Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews." The first letters you mention are an abbreviation of those words in Latin, "Iesus Nazarenus Rex Iudaeorum."

The symbol IHS (I've never seen them on a crucifix, incidentally) are the first three letters of the name Jesus in Greek. The symbol was in Christian use long before the English language developed, so it could not have an English meaning.

Easter triduum provides time to turn heart to Christ, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — The Easter triduum is an opportunity for Christians to relive the mystery of their salvation and to turn their hearts toward Christ, said Pope John Paul II.

The three days before Easter — Holy Thursday, Good Friday and Holy Saturday — mark a time of "preparation to relive the great mystery of our salvation" and "make more alive the turning of our heart toward the one who died for us out of love," he said April 7 at his weekly general audience.

Before his address, the pope was driven in his open-air jeep through the square. The pope seemed tired and his speech was badly slurred, causing him to skip many portions of his prepared text.

Quoting a passage from the Letter to the Philippians, the pope said, Jesus Christ "humbled himself, becoming obedient to death, even death on a cross. Because of this, God greatly exalted him."

"These words succinctly show us the mystery of the passion and death of Christ as well as let us catch a glimpse of the glory of the Easter of resurrection," he said.

The pope underlined some of the Easter triduum traditions the church celebrates every year.

The pope said on the morning of Holy Thursday every diocese celebrates the chrism Mass during which th bishop blesses the oils used throughou the year for the sacraments of baptism confirmation, ordination and the anoint ing of the sick.

"That evening the Last Supper i remembered with the institution of th Eucharist and the priesthood," he said.

"On Good Friday, the church recall the passion and death of Christ . marked by penitential processions an the pious practice of the Stations of th Cross, which help internalize the mys tery of the cross," he said.

"The evening of Holy Saturda marks the start of the solemn Easte Vigil," he said.

In a portion of his speech not rea aloud, the pope said this event entails th lighting of the paschal candle that sym bolizes "Christ who illuminates ever person."

By meditating upon the word c God, "the ecclesial community reflect upon the great promise of definitive fre dom from the slavery of sin and fro death," said the pope's written address.

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

The Easter challenge

Guest Column

FATHER JOHN AURILIA, OFM Cap

To identify Easter with beautiful lilies and colored eggs may not be the best way of capturing the wonder of Easter. I'd rather look at Easter as a challenge for greatness and a gigantic leap of faith.

There is no doubt that Easter is connected to happiness, which is not a one-day event, but a lifetime event. You've heard the Chinese proverb: "If you want happiness for an hour, take a nap; if you want happiness for a day, go fishing; if you want happiness for a year, inherit a fortune; if you want happiness for a lifetime, help someone."

Jesus' promise of happiness rests on you. If you want heaven on earth, you can have it. You can also make hell out of the daily hardships, conflicts and disappointments.

Did you know that Niagara Falls is called "the parable of a beautifying disaster"? Here is why:

Niagara River is not one of the great rivers of the world. Running from Lake Erie to Lake Ontario, it is only a few miles long. But what makes the river significant is that at Niagara Falls there is a tragedy in the channel — a break in the even flow of the stream, so the waters make a stupendous leap into the gorge below. As they are shattered and bruised on the rocks beneath the falls, however, there is cast up into the sunlight the exquisite rainbow of the Niagara, which is one of the best wonders of the world.

Life is like that. The challenges of Easter are making a blind leap of faith into an overwhelming abyss of suffering, believing in life when we experience death, knowing that defeat will be victory. The sunlight of God's love makes a rainbow out of the rain.

To say that Jesus beautified disaster is not completely wrong. To live a great life, we need a great cause to which we can connect the meaning of our struggles, a cause to live by or, if needed, to die by. At Easter, we hear the familiar story of Christ's triumph, his death and resurrection, and we feel in part of the story, however, there is a difference between the conviction of the historical event of the resurrection and the faith in the risen Christ.

The famous tightrope walker, Blondin, on one occasion carried a man across a tightrope stretched perilously above an admiring crowd. In the forefront of the crowd was a boy, gazing in wonderment with his open mouth. Blondin noticed the lad and said: "Do you believe that I could carry you across that tightrope?"

The boy replied, "I'm sure you could."

"Well, then," said Blondin, "jump up and I will do so."

The boy promptly reacted: "I said 'I believe.' I didn't say 'I would do it.'"

Poor boy, he never experienced the thrill of being carried by a star!

The challenge of Easter is that it is not enough to believe Jesus has risen and is alive today. Faith involves taking a further step and translating our faith into action.

An empty tomb, so says the cynic, is a poor foundation on which to establish a world religion. It may be so, but our faith has gone beyond that event; it has left the empty tomb 20 centuries ago. The message of Easter is not written in the past tense; it is indeed written as we go about our daily activities and encounter Christ where we least expect.

The Easter story is simple and powerful, and we should not forget that Jesus' victory came after Jesus' tragedy. Lilies and Easter eggs are indeed part of our Easter legend; life and love are the real challenges of the Christian Easter.

Stay tuned — more to come: He came singing love, he lived singing love, he died singing love. If the song is to continue, we must do the singing!

What do Muslims believe?

Spirituality for Today

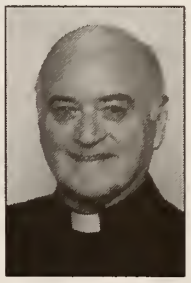
FATHER JOHN CATOIR CNS Columnist



Jesus broke from tradition in the Sermon on the Mount and thereafter was considered an outcast. Presenting a higher standard, he said, "You've heard it said, love your neighbor and hate your enemy, but I say unto you, love your enemy" (Mt 5: 43, 44).

How is it possible to love an enemy in today's world?

Keep this in mind: Muslim terrorists who want to kill us are a tiny faction of Islam. They are to Islam what the Ku Klux Klan was to Christianity. We shouldn't paint all Muslims with the same brush. The Islam religion teaches people to live in peace and to worship the one true God, Allah.

Muhammad was born in Saudi Arabia in 570 A.D. He become a traveling merchant but he was haunted by God's presence. With the help of a rich patroness, he retired to pursue spiritual goals. Going daily to Mount Hera, he prayed alone for hours.

He said God spoke to him through an angel and the Koran, the bible of Islam, was dictated to him on that mountain by the angel Gabriel.

As a traveling merchant, he become familiar with the Jewish Bible and the New Testament, and was well aware of Mary, Jesus' mother. In fact, Mary is mentioned with reverence in the Koran.

In 622 A.D., when Muhammad emerged from his retreat, he began preaching his new religion. Mecca's people rejected him violently. Escaping cruel beatings, he fled to Medina, a city 270 miles north of Mecca, and continued preaching: "There is only one God, his name is Allah, and Muhammad is his greatest prophet."

During his first three years in Medina he only managed to attract about 40 followers, but then things turned around. He eventually was able to return to Mecca with an army large enough to destroy all the pagan shrines and establish Allah as the one, true God.

Muhammad died in 632 A.D., leaving a monumental legacy.

There are now nearly 1 billion devout Muslims in the world. The Five Pillars of Islam give an insight into the spirituality of Islam: faith, pray, fast, give alsm, make a pilgrimage to Mecca at least once in your lifetime.

Our Muslim neighbors in America are good people. They are our fellow citizens. The activities of the terrorists frighten them. They fear reprisals, even though they are innocent. They are not our enemies.

Let us love them. They deserve it — not to mention the fact that Jesus commanded us to love them.

New way to read an old book

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS Guest Columnist

Did you ever have one of those experiences where a question sends you hurling through time and space back to a childhood memory? I was recently in a conference room at the Pastoral Center in Charlotte when I took one of these involuntary time trips.

The occasion was a meeting with the Education Vicariate, which coordinates the functions of seven diocesan agencies that educate the faithful. It includes campus ministry, schools, evangelization, faith formation and youth and young adult ministry. As the newly appointed director of communications, I was getting oriented to the offices and agencies of the diocese.

After explaining some of my communication goals in the meeting, Mercy Sister Patricia Durbin of the diocesan Media Center asked me if I was studying the catechism. The question took me back more than 40 years to Holy Family School in New Rochelle, N.Y., where I was asked that question many times by my fifth-grade teacher, Sister Paula Marie. As I recall, I wasn't the best of students and her question was meant to get me to spend more time on my schoolwork and a little less on daydreaming, baseball and recess, which were my priorities.

Sister Durbin's question, although asked in a much more kindly way, got to the core of what my job for the diocese is all about.

A big part of what I do is to respond to calls from the news media. During the first two months of the year — as the diocese's compliancy audit was released in January and the John Jay Study of clergy sex abuse in February — dozens of reporters called with questions about everything from sex abuse data in our diocese to the Catholic Church's view on celibacy.

They also asked about the ordination of women, homosexuality and the church, the crucifixion and the proper pronunciation of Bishop Peter J. Jugis' last name. (It's "jew-gis," not Jungis, Junkin or Jurgis as some reporters have called him.)

In a typical public relations setting, a person in my position often gets answers to complex questions from a CEO or some other leader. Business conditions often dictate rapid changes in direction that often aren't recorded in writing. Sister Durbin was trying to tell me it's different in the Catholic Church. Answers to complex questions from reporters can often be found in the catechism.

The "Catechism of the Catholic Church" is far different than the old "Baltimore Catechism" that I studied under Sister Paula Marie's guidance. You may remember the first question and answer in that book: "Who made us?" "God made us." The current edition of the catechism was published in 1997 and is a systematic presentation of the faith and of Catholic doctrine. But at more than 900 pages, it can be a little daunting for the layperson and even more so for reporters who are working on deadline.

Fortunately we have the Internet. One Web site in particular, www.scborromeo.org, has a very useful search engine that allows you to get answers easily to your questions. The Web site belongs to St. Charles Borromeo Church in Picayune, Miss. Webmaster John Meyer went through the painstaking chore of breaking down the entire catechism into separate paragraphs, allowing the search engine utility to quickly zero in on a topic.

Let's say that you have been seeing and reading news stories about same-sex unions and you are wondering what the church has to say. If you enter the word "homosexual" into the search engine, you come up with four matches that will explain church teaching on the subject. Enter the word "marriage" and you come up with 73 hits.

In an age when media accounts gloss over complex subjects or present arguments that make you wonder where your faith stands on the issue, you can now get answers. Church teaching has never been so easy to access; it is literally at our fingertips.

Sister Paula Marie, wherever you may be, I am finally reading my catechism.

Bishop, priests celebrate chrism Mass

bot of Belmont Abbey; Abbot Patrick Shelton, pastor of St. James Church in Hamlet; and other clergy of the diocese, gathered with about 100 priests and many of the permanent deacons who minister in the diocese to celebrate the liturgy with the people of faith whom they serve.

Bishop Jugis said the sacrament of Holy Orders "already conforms our lives to Christ in holiness. The sacrament marks us with a special character and indefectibly unites us to Christ, the high priest."

This union is a "sacramental identification with Christ, which Christ has willed," said Bishop Jugis. "It makes it possible for his priesthood to continue personally in the church."

"We are blessed by his consecration of us into his sacred priesthood," he said.

The bishop said priests must "nurture this union with Christ in a practical way by prayer every day."

"It's an intentional choice that we make to seek union with Christ in holiness and in constant conversion," said Bishop Jugis. "Our priestly ministry of sanctifying, reconciling, preaching, teaching and shepherding draws all of its power and its meaning from him."

"We have got to be familiar with him, and always strive for personal friendship with him," he said.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis pours into the chrism oil the fragrant balsam, a naturally derived aromatic essence, which was then consecrated.

Bishop Jugis discussed his recent visit with Pope John Paul II at the Vatican.

"... In his address to the bishops of Region 14 making the 'ad limina' visit to Rome, the Holy Father touched on a theme that is appropriate for us to take to heart as we renew our priestly promises today," said Bishop Jugis. "The Holy Father addressed the topic of renewal that is needed now in the church in the United States."

The Catholic Church is undergoing a "purification," said the bishop, "and is now in need of healing, rebuilding and reconciliation."

"All of this, the Holy Father says, will lead to a 'holier priesthood, a holier episcopate and a holier church,'" said Bishop Jugis.

Bishop Jugis said the pope also discussed "a disturbing loss of the sense of the transcendent and an affirmation of a culture of the material" in American society.

"But we know Christ is transcendent and ever present," said Bishop Jugis to the priests. "Our pastoral ministry makes the grace of Christ present in the lives of his holy people. Our pastoral ministry makes the love of Christ present in our society."

"Let this chrism Mass be a true renewal of our love for the sacred ministry and our love for Jesus Christ.

The recommitment ceremony which followed the Liturgy of the Word, included the priests' renewal of dedication as ministers of Christ striving to be more like Christ and being faithful to the sacred mysteries and sacramental life of the church.

Also during the Mass, Bishop Jugis blessed three oils used in sacramental and liturgical practices for all of the faithful throughout the coming year.

The oil of the sick, used to anoint the ill and dying, was blessed first. Next came the blessing of the oil of catechumens, which is used during the rite of baptism. The consecration of the chrism — a duty that belongs to the bishop alone — took place near the close of the Mass. Chrism — perfumed with balsam, an aromatic oil derived from trees — is an oil of consecration used after baptism and during confirmation, the ordaining of bishops and priests, and the blessing of churches and altars.

Vials of the oils are dispensed to every parish and mission church in the diocese. With the sacred oils — and having recommitted themselves to the mission they share with their bishop — the priests returned to their parishes rededicated in spiritual union with the diocesan faithful.

Trial testimony said to show truth behind abortion support

BY NANCY FRAZIER O'BRIEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: This story contains some graphic descriptions of abortion procedures.

WASHINGTON — The graphic and often disturbing testimony about abortion at trials in San Francisco, New York and Lincoln, Neb., "provides a telling backdrop" to the scheduled April 25 demonstration in Washington in support of legal abortion and other issues affecting women, according to the U.S. bishops' chief pro-life spokeswoman.

"This demonstration is not for some abstract notion of 'choice,'" said Cathy Cleaver Ruse, director of planning and information in the bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities.

"As the testimony shows, it is for a very real, very cruel and very painful way of killing

MONROE — One would think that a brand-new sanctuary would provide some growing room, but Our Lady of Lourdes Church's new sanctuary was overflowing on the day of its dedication.

Enthusiastic worshippers filled the pews, aisles and an additional seating area in the vestibule for the dedication of the new church building, celebrated by former pastor Bishop Peter J. Jugis April 18.

Four years of fundraising and planning, which had begun under previous pastors, continued during the two-year tenure of then-Father Jugis and concluded under the administration of Father James Cassidy, culminated with the dedication on Divine Mercy Sunday.

The parish has quadrupled in size over the last dozen years, said Austin Doherty, chairman of the parish council.

"Ten or 12 years ago, there were 300 registered families," he said. "Now there are about 1,200." About 840 of these families are Hispanic.

For the past few years, Mass has been celebrated four times each weekend, including twice in Spanish, in the activ-

NEW LIFE FOR KNEELERS

Damian Bondi adds a piece of wood to a stack gleaned from old kneelers at St. John the Baptist Church in Whiting, Ind., in late March. Volunteers were fashioning the salvaged wood into shelves and coatracks to be sold to raise money for the parish school.

Indiana parish finds inventive use for old kneelers

WHITING, Ind. (CNS) — St. John the Baptist Church in Whiting is undergoing a major facelift. So are the 73-year-old church's kneelers.

As the church undergoes a restoration, its old kneelers are undergoing a transformation to become shelves and coatracks by parishioners Tom Dabertin and Damian Bondi.

Last December, Precious Blood Father John Kalicky, pastor at St. John, offered a kneeler to Dabertin, who took it home and made it into a shelf. When Dabertin returned with the shelf, several parish workers said they would like one. That led to an idea to raise money for the church.

Dabertin and Bondi have begun transforming the 300 kneelers. Bondi dismantles them, removing screws and nails. Dabertin then picks up the pieces and runs the boards through a planer, removing the old finish and any scratches. He guides the pieces through a shaper that produces curved edges and then he assembles the main section and the side legs into shelves.

Left behind were the kneelers' metal hinges, but the restoration crews recommended Dabertin and Bondi attach the hinges to leftover wood to make coatracks.

Dabertin figures he has enough material for 250 shelves and 50 coat racks. He and Bondi have already received orders for 50 shelves. They plan to continue working until the orders or materials run out.

Each man averages six hours a week on the project.

The two volunteers are also pressure-stamping the back of each product with this message: "St. John the Baptist Catholic Church 1931-2003."

Each shelf costs $25; a coatrack costs $10. Length ranges from three to four feet, depending upon the size of the original kneeler and the condition of the wood. In some cases, the wood is chipped or has suffered salt damage. In other cases, nails have prevented cracks from spreading. All proceeds benefit the parish school, where Dabertin and Bondi each have two children.

"It's an opportunity to make a few bucks for the parish," said Bondi, a retired steelworker. "Some of the older people might like a memento. Other people have had kids at the school."

Father Kalicky, himself a carpenter, said the shelves and racks are a "nice reminder, a nice souvenir of the church."

Study: Hundreds of U.S. parishes help poorer sister parishes

WASHINGTON (CNS) — About 1,350 U.S. parishes say they support a poor parish in the United States or abroad, said a Center for Applied Research in the Apostolate (CARA) report.

Of the parishes supported abroad, 83 percent are in Latin America. Parishes in 55 foreign countries receive support from U.S. parishes.

The report was based on responses from a survey of 5,831 parishes across the United States conducted in 2001 by CARA, which specializes in social science research for Catholic organizations.

Of the parishes CARA surveyed, 4,670 responded to questions about supporting another parish. Of that number a total of 1,350, or about 30 percent, reported such partnerships.

There are about 19,000 parishes in the United States.

U.S. parishes involved in "sister" relationships are larger and more affluent than those parishes without such a relationship, said the CARA report.

Those parishes that support other U.S. parishes average 1,400 registered households and average $470,000 annually in weekend Mass collections, said the report.

U.S. parishes that support foreign parishes average more than 1,000 registered households and $380,000 annually in weekend Mass collections, it said.

In contrast, parishes with no sister relationships average about 800 registered households and $260,000 annually in weekend Mass collections, it said. U.S. parishes also provided food, clothing, educational materials and religious supplies, said the report.

An area that gets the least support is sponsorship of immigrants to the United States, it said. "Fewer than a tenth of partnering parishes ever do this."

The survey was commissioned by the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for the Church in Latin America.

Pope appeals for release of hostages in Iraq, decries violence

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II appealed to radical groups in Iraq to show "feelings of humanity" and release the hostages they are holding.

At the same time, the pope deplored the "inhuman" violence in the Holy Land, the day after the leader of the Palestinian militant organization Hamas was assassinated in an Israeli missile attack.

"I am following with great sadness the tragic news coming out of the Holy Land and Iraq," the pope said April 18. "May the bloodshed among brothers end. Such inhuman acts are contrary to the will of God."

The pope said he joined in the prayers of families "who are fearful for their loved ones, especially those who have been taken as hostages."

"I invite the kidnappers to have feelings of humanity. I implore them to return to the families the persons who are in their hands, while I pray to the merciful God for the population of the Holy Land and Iraq, and for all those working for reconciliation and peace in those regions," he said.

Armed groups have held civilians from several countries, including the United States, Japan, the Czech Republic, Australia and Denmark; some have been released.

Four armed Italians working for private security operations in Iraq were abducted and one was killed execution-style, an act that shocked many in Italy. Negotiations were continuing for the release of the remaining three.

The groups also were holding at least one U.S. soldier and apparently wanted to trade him for prisoners being held by U.S. forces.

Papal calling: daily message now available for U.S. cell phones

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The words of Pope John Paul II — if not his voice — are now available on most U.S. cell phones.

Through a service called "The Pope's Thought of the Day," an Italian firm is making the pope's message available to cell phone users.

The service began April 7 to Cingular and Verizon Wireless customers. After a test was conducted April 14 on AT&T Wireless' system, the papal message service became available to AT&T Wireless customers and is to be made available to other wireless service providers soon.

In all, the estimated 105 million cell phones that have text-messaging technology, or about 70 percent of all U.S. cell phones currently in use, will eventually be able to access the service.

"The Pope's Thought of the Day" is selected by the Vatican press office, according to Acotel USA, the U.S. branch of the Italian company Acotel. The messages are culled from his speeches, homilies and writings.

The service began a year ago in Italy, and subsequently expanded to Ireland, England and Malta. Tarantino said Acotel is working with the Vatican to provide Spanish-language messages.

The messages are available at noon Eastern time each day.

The texts aren't long, given the somewhat confined screen of cell phones.

For example, the April 5 message read: "May Christ, the way, the truth and the life renew you so that you will be his friends and witnesses in the world." The message from the day before that read: "Mary teaches us that to pray we must enter our own room and, after closing the door, speak to the Father in secret."

There is a 30-cent fee charged for each message.

To subscribe, cell phone users can send a text message saying "Pope on" to the number 24444. To unsubscribe, callers use the same number to send the text message "Pope off."

Catholic responsibility to welcome others, speaker says

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

MAGGIE VALLEY — "There's only one table and that's God's table," Elizabeth Dudas said, "and the symbol of that is the eucharistic table."

Dudas, ministry consultant with Glenmary's Department of Pastoral Services in Nashville, Tenn., presented "Making Room at the Table," April 17 at Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center. The Smoky Mountain Vicariate sponsored the program.

"There's a lot of pain out there in our communities, and it's our responsibility as Catholics to welcome everyone God sends to us," Dudas said. "God has always used immigration to bring about his kingdom."

Augustinian Father Francis J. Doyle, pastor of St. Margaret of Scotland Church, saw another dimension.

"This is a pro-life issue, yet this is never addressed," he said. "We have to bring the same passion of respect for those already here as for the life coming into the world."

The program looked at immigration and described ways to provide hospitality to immigrants, migrants, visitors, tourists and seasonal parishioners. That includes making efforts to welcome everyone, learning about other cultures, welcoming people not just to the parish but to the wider community and avoiding assumptions about others.

For instance, some immigrants rarely had access to the sacraments in their own countries because a priest may have visited their villages only once or twice a year. Eduardo Bernal, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate, said immigrants with that background often don't understand the importance of sacraments and attending Mass.

Elizabeth Dudas explains ways to welcome people during "Making Room at the Table" at Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center in Maggie Valley April 17.

"Don't assume that people who come from other countries live the faith the same way you do," he said. "Get to know them first, and then help them adjust to the new reality."

Welcoming immigrants is not optional for Catholics, said Dudas.

"Our bishops say that as a Catholic Church, we have a moral obligation to do all we can to help immigrants, reminding us that we were once immigrants, too," Dudas said.

This help, Dudas suggests, applies to everyone and includes greeting others, inviting them to be part of the parish's regular community-building, encouraging seasonal visitors to take part in parish activities, and "sensitively considering visiting migrants in their camps and temporary homes."

It also means, Dudas said, becoming aware of the plight of migrants through educational programs, creating opportunities for immigrants to tell their stories, being host for a program with an immigration attorney on immigration rights, and celebrating National Migration Week, sponsored by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops in January each year.

According to the USCCB Web site: "National Migration Week, as envisioned by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, presents the entire Church with an opportunity to 'open wide the doors' to welcome newcomers, to educate others about the harsh realities faced by immigrants, migrants, and refugees, and to motivate each community to act in solidarity with people on the move."

Although the week following the feast of the Epiphany is designated National Migration Week, the USCCB Web site says dioceses are "free to choose the specific date on which to mark their own observance."

Parishes and individuals can help immigrants, migrants and refugees feel at home, Dudas said, by collecting and distributing items they need such as school supplies, warm clothing and household items; and supporting youth activities that promote acceptance and understanding among young people.

"God wouldn't give us this challenge if he didn't think we were up to it," Dudas said. "God's time is always the right time."

Second-graders at St. Matthew School explore ancient, present-day communities

CHARLOTTE — Second-grade students at St. Matthew School recently took a stroll through time.

Teacher Elaine Giglio's class completed their projects on Communities in Civilization April 5. Under Giglio's guidance, the students researched, wrote and presented projects ranging from ancient Egypt to present-day communities.

Some students built castles, model airplanes and volcanoes, and they even learned how to make perfume.

Giglio said the assignment helped the children understand how civilization has progressed in areas such as education, home life, work life and religious life.

CHARLOTTE — A local division of the Ancient Order of Hibernians spent St. Patrick's Day celebrating Irish culture and following a tradition of helping others.

The AOH Sons of Erin Division donated books on Irish history and culture to the Charlotte Catholic High School library March 17. This is the second year the Sons of Erin Division has donated books to the high school's library on the Irish saint's feast day.

The Sons of Erin Division plans to continue donating similar books eventually to merit a library shelf called the Hibernian Collection.

They also presented a check in support of seminarians to Father John Allen, director of the diocesan vocations department. The AOH hopes to make the support an annual event on St. Patrick's Day.

The Sons of Erin upheld another St. Patrick's Day tradition by attending Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral March 17, with AOH brother and Ceol na Gael Pipe Major Mike Holian playing the bagpipes outside the cathedral before and after Mass.

The Sons of Erin Division also participated in the annual Charlotte St. Patrick's Day Parade March 13 with its marching unit and Ceol na Gael Pipe Band Parade. The group has served corned beef sandwiches at the accompanying festival for the past two years. Funds raised support the group's Hiberian charities and division projects throughout the year.

'EQUAL IN DIGNITY IN THE SIGHT OF GOD'

Parishioners with autistic children seek inclusive worship atmosphere

BY IRENE VOTCH
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BERTHA, Minn. — Most parents who bring their children to Mass can tell at least one story of when their child's behavior became disruptive: The baby suddenly cried inconsolably, the toddler threw a tantrum, the preschooler loudly insisted on a bathroom break or refused to leave her sister alone.

For most parents, it is the story of an isolated incident or two. But for parents of autistic children, like John and Carol Race, their stories are of ongoing disruptive behavior by their children and of rejection and chastisement by those around them at Mass.

Among the Races' five children is an autistic son. They are members of St. Joseph Parish in Bertha.

One Saturday evening, they attended Mass in St. Paul at the Cathedral of St. Paul and received a negative reaction from a person seated nearby who asked them to move.

At another parish, the pastor chastised Carol Race after Mass for her son's behavior.

"People at first think it's a discipline problem and assume that a good spanking would clear everything up," she told the St. Cloud Visitor, newspaper of the St. Cloud Diocese.

While a "good spanking" might be the worst treatment for a child with disruptive behavior, it is especially inappropriate for autistic children.

Autism is a lifelong, complex condition in which a child has problems to varying degrees with language, socialization and learning. Those with severe problems are referred to as "low-functioning." Those with less severe problems are referred to as "high-functioning." Many are somewhere in between.

The Autism Society of America estimates that 1.5 million — or one in every 200 — people in the United States have some degree of autism.

Adam Race has been determined to be low-functioning. He is now 9 years old and large for his age, requiring the Races to take specific measures so that the whole family can participate in Mass together. They sit in the last pew, reserved for them, and use a tether that keeps Adam close to his mother or father.

Carol Race offers an encouraging smile to her 9-year-old son, Adam, during Mass at St. Joseph Church in Bertha, Minn. Adam, who has been diagnosed with autism, requires much of his parent's attention during Sunday services.

The Races provide Adam with a supply of wrapped candy with which he busies himself during Mass. But none of this guarantees Adam will not be disruptive.

He generally hums during each hymn while picking up and dropping his candy on the pew. Sometimes he throws the candy. Sometimes he throws himself.

To their credit, St. Joseph's parishioners do not frown or whisper at the situation in the back pew. In fact, one 12-year-old parishioner offers her help each Sunday, often taking the other Race children into her pew so Adam's parents can more easily respond to his needs.

Some might think the family should not insist on bringing a child who is persistently disruptive to Mass. But Carol Race thinks it is important that the family worships together.

The U.S. bishops have said that children with persistently disruptive behaviors have a right to be at Mass.

In their 1995 document on "Guidelines for Celebration of the Sacraments with Persons with Disabilities," the bishops wrote: "By reason of their baptism, all Catholics are equal in dignity in the sight of God and have the same divine calling." They also wrote, "Catholics with disabilities have a right to participate in the sacraments as fully functioning members of the local ecclesial community."

"It's more than a right," said Father Ron Damico, a priest of the Diocese of Columbus, Ohio. In his 2002 book, "The Joy of Worshiping Together," Father Damico wrote that every member of a Catholic parish has a duty to be present to the other members in parish liturgies.

"Everybody has something to contribute," he said when he learned of the Race family's efforts to include Adam in their family and parish worship.

"I see all kinds of ways that this person is a gift to the community," he said, adding that Adam may have the responsibility "of teaching people how to love."

"We're often self-focused so we don't see people like this as gifts," he said. "We think they're keeping us from getting anything out of Mass. But we have to find ways. We have to get used to one another."

Father Tom Knoblach, pastor of the Bertha parish and St. Edward's Parish in Henning, said he believes people with disruptive disabilities present "important lessons for us to learn. They reveal to us something of the brokenness of the human condition."

Describing their inclusion as "a kind of countercultural sign in the life of the church," Father Knoblach said people with disabilities are a reminder that it is "human imperfection that is the mark of membership in the kingdom of God."

Abortion testimonies provide 'telling backdrop' for pro-life supporters

nearly viable and even post-viable unborn children," said Ruse.

The "March for Women's Lives" is sponsored by groups that include Planned Parenthood Federation of America, the plaintiff in the San Francisco trial.

U.S. District Judge Phyllis J. Hamilton heard closing arguments April 16 in Planned Parenthood vs. Ashcroft, the San Francisco challenge to Congress' ban on the partial-birth abortion procedure. But similar trials aimed at overturning the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act continued in Lincoln and New York.

Hamilton gave no indication on when she might rule. But she told attorneys in the case that she would not issue an injunction with nationwide effect.

"I would have some hesitance to do that" while the other two cases were pending, she said.

The U.S. District Court judges in the other two cases are Judge Richard Conway Casey, who is hearing National Abortion Federation vs. Ashcroft in New York, and Judge Richard G. Kopf, who is presiding at Leroy Carhart vs. Ashcroft in Lincoln. Both of them issued nationwide injunctions against enforcement of the partial-birth abortion ban when they agreed to hear the cases, but Hamilton issued a preliminary injunction that applied only locally.

No matter what the outcome in each case, the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act is likely to end up before the U.S. Supreme Court.

The law bars a type of abortion that is usually performed in the second or third trimester. In it, a live fetus is partially delivered, then the skull is punctured to sever the brain stem before the whole body is delivered.

Under the law, doctors who perform such abortions, which are also known to physicians as "intact dilation and extraction," are subject to up to two years in prison.

Testimony at the three trials covered not only the partial-birth procedure but other abortion methods.

The testimony has come mostly from medical professionals and has covered such issues as what women are told before their abortions, whether the partial-birth procedure is ever medically necessary and whether unborn children can feel pain.

In New York, Dr. Gerson Weiss, chairman of the department of obstetrics, gynecology and women's health at New Jersey Medical School in Newark, spoke in graphic detail about the difficulty of counting the fetal parts after a dilation and extraction abortion involving dismemberment.

"You can count there is a limb here, I can see feet and hands, I can see skull fragments, I can see trunk," he said April 7. "But when you see little pieces, if there are little pieces left behind that are torn off, you can't fully reconstruct and you cannot fully count the small pieces."

In San Francisco, Dr. Katharine Sheehan, medical director of Planned Parenthood in San Diego and Riverside Counties, testified about the use of Digoxin "to cause fetal demise" before an abortion.

""We like to prevent an eventuality of a live birth, and because it seems to make the procedure move along a little bit easier on the day of the procedure," she said.

Testifying in New York, Dr. Carolyn Westhoff, a professor of obstetrics and gynecology at Columbia University in New York and attending physician at New York Presbyterian Hospital, said she did not tell women undergoing dilation and extraction abortions that the child's skull would be crushed and his or her brain suctioned out.

"Those are details that would be distressing to my patients and ... information about that is not directly relevant to their safety," she said.

Westhoff also talked about how stabbing the head with scissors or her finger causes it to look "a little wrinkly and collapsed, but the facial structures are not disturbed at all by that procedure." She said there are "small coffins" and "little hats" available to parents who wish to see, photograph or bury their child.

Dr. Kanwaljeet Anand, a University of Arkansas pediatrician, testified in Lincoln that his research on pain in infants and children had convinced him that there would be "severe and excruciating pain caused to the fetus" by the partial-birth abortion procedure.

But some of the testimony provided information about the humanity of the unborn child.

Anand talked about studies that looked at the senses of taste and smell experienced by unborn children.

"For example, if you put a sweet substance, say saccharine, into the amniotic fluid, ultrasound studies showed that the fetus starts swallowing the amniotic fluid much faster than before this sweet substance was introduced," he said. "And if you introduce a bitter-tasting oil into the amniotic fluid, the swallowing stops. So from early on, the fetus seems to have a sweet tooth."

Ruse said the trial transcripts "should be required reading for every politician who voted" to keep partial-birth abortion legal and will provide "a permanent public record" in the words of abortion providers themselves.

"From this day forward, Americans will judge abortion by its chief proponents — in their own words," she said.

DISCERNING THE CALL

Women contemplate religious life in discernment houses

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Hush. Listen. God may be calling you.

"Many people miss God's call — either they're too busy or they misinterpret it," said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of diocesan Hispanic Ministry. "Sometimes they hear the call but say 'that's asking too much.'"

But when people determine to what God is calling them, "that's their sure way of being happy," said Sister Inkrott.

Everyone has a vocation, "a call from God to respond in some way," said Sister Inkrott. "And there are many different ways — we have vocations to religious life, to priestly life, to the single life and to the married life."

To help women discern a call to the religious life, Sister Inkrott's order — the Sisters of St. Francis of Tiffin, Ohio — have established a discernment house in Charlotte, staffed by Sister Inkrott and Franciscan Sister Joan Ann Gilsdorf.

"There are a lot of people who don't have contact with sisters," said Sister Inkrott. "So a house of discernment would be one way that women could ask questions, see firsthand what a vocation to the religious life is and ask, 'Is this for me?'"

A discernment house is not a first step, but a way to investigate a calling, said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott.

Life in discernment

Going to a discernment house is not necessarily a first step toward becoming a nun, said Sister Inkrott.

"It's not becoming a candidate or novitiate, but it's something to help a person discern whether or not God is calling them to this life."

"It's been very helpful and I'm enjoying it," said Lourdes Toribio, the Franciscan Discernment House's first resident. "It's a lot different than what I thought."

The Sisters of St. Francis consider Toribio to be an "associate," someone who shares the journey and dream of St. Francis of Assisi. Toribio's residency is one of three associate options offered by the order — to live at a discernment house for a year or more and be involved in the ministry of the sisters.

Other associate options include one of a spiritual nature, with prayer, faith-sharing and reflective opportunities; and another characterized by a deeper involvement in the life and ministries of the sisters, but without living in residence at a local house.

Toribio, 22, originally from Mexico, has been living at the discernment house since September 2003. When she's not cooking or praying with the sisters, Toribio assists Sister Inkrott with Hispanic ministry and tutors at Our Lady of the Assumption Church in Charlotte.

She also is starting a sacramental preparation class for Spanish-speaking parishioners at St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte, said Sister Inkrott, "with dreams of doing even more."

Toribio was among the Hispanic youth, ages 16-27, to participate in the second session of Taller Pascua (Easter Workshop) 2004 at Immaculate Conception Church and Immaculata School in Hendersonville in November 2003. The group finalized chapters for the book, "A Life Project Towards Happiness: Your Calling," published by the Southeast Pastoral Institute this year to help Hispanic youth discern vocations.

"I'm learning a lot about the different cultures — both Anglo and Hispanic," said Toribio. "I'm looking to learn more, and continue to follow the call I have received."

If Toribio decides to pursue her interest in becoming a Sister of St. Francis, her next step is to become a pre-candidate and then candidate, when she becomes a canonical member of the order. This is followed by two years as a novitiate, with one year spent in prayer and spiritual study and one year in ministry and preparation.

After the novitiate, the next step is to make a temporary profession for a number of years, followed by final profession with permanent vows.

"If people don't try it, don't make any steps toward investigating a calling, they'll have that hanging over their heads all their lives," said Sister Inkrott. "I've heard people say they've had a drawing toward religious life, and for whatever reason they didn't follow it."

Inspirations of Mercy

The Franciscan Discernment House in Charlotte, which can accommodate up to four associates, has been in the "idea stage" for several years, said Sister Inkrott. While conceptualizing the house, Sister Inkrott met with the Sisters of Mercy who run the McAuley discernment house in downtown Belmont.

There are currently three women — college students from Charlotte, Asheville and South Carolina — at the inquiry level with the Sisters of Mercy.

"The inquiry level is the first time a woman contacts us — either by phone, letter or e-mail — with an interest in the religious life," said Mercy Sister Mary Cabrini Taitano, vocations minister for the Sisters of Mercy in North Carolina.

"The discernment begins there, with informal conversations to get to know each other ... to form a relationship and introduce her to religious life," she said.

If a woman chooses to pursue a life as a Sister of Mercy, the next step is pre-candidacy, said Sister Taitano. This includes providing an autobiography, recommendations, sacramental documents, work history and submitting to a background check.

The idea, said Sister Taitano, is to determine the candidate's values — does she have a sense of calling? A pattern of personal prayer? An active sacramental life in church? An idea of community and the personal responsibility of living in community?

Mercy Sister Virginia, a 24-year-old novice from the island of Tamatam in the Federated States of Micronesia, is currently in her second-year novitiate at the Sisters of Mercy in Belmont. She is preparing to make her first vows in Guam in September.

"The discernment continues until she makes final vows," said Sister Taitano. "It's a long engagement."

Religious life

During Bishop Peter J. Jugis' "ad limina" visit to the Vatican March 29, Pope John Paul II asked him about vocations in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"He also was interested in vocations to the religious life, especially to the sisterhood," said Bishop Jugis. "He asked me on two different occasions, 'Are there any women interested in joining the religious life?'" So I did say, 'Well, yes.'"

"Persons seeking to follow God's call to become a member of a religious community have many opportunities in the Diocese of Charlotte to experience the life and works of several orders of women religious," said Mercy Sister Mary Timothy Warren, vicar for the diocesan Office of Women Religious.

There are currently 17 orders of women religious working in various capacities throughout the Diocese of Charlotte.

"These women are engaged in ministries of pastoral care, medical fields, social outreach, catechetics, education, Hispanic outreach, administration, visitation to the sick, bereavement counseling and hospital chaplaincy," said Sister Warren.

Although many religious orders have age limits for consideration, there are a variety of women entering discernment houses.

"We're trying to meet the people where they are," said Sister Inkrott. "We have people coming in who are older, some have been working for a long time. Some communities are seeing grandmothers coming in."

"One of our sisters is a grandmother," said Sister Taitano. "We have accepted women who are divorced with annulled marriages, and women who are widowed."

"We can have a variety of careers — teachers, nurses, pastoral associates, cooks," said Franciscan Sister Margaret Slowick, director of diocesan campus ministry for the Diocese of Toledo, Ohio. "It's not a career that defines us, it's the call to be a sister."

"It's a life choice, like the married or single life," said Franciscan Sister Leanne Kerschner, vocations director for the Sisters of St. Francis at Tiffin. "What I do, I can do anywhere."

But the religious life isn't always an easy one, the sisters agreed.

"There are some sisters in our community who had to work hard and give up a lot in order to follow what they felt their calling was," said Sister Inkrott.

"It's a continuing challenge," said Sister Taitano. "It's a journey that's never really done. For example, people make marriage vows and then have to live them out."

Some women explore the religious life for the wrong reasons, such as to escape childhood or abuse issues.

"The convent is not an escape from the problems of the world," said Sister Slowick. "Women in religious life are often more aware of what's going on in the world; we're involved in a lot of social justice issues."

Vocations directors help interested women sort out their calling before they join, said Sister Kerschner.

"Somehow you know where God is calling you, if you take the time to listen," said Sister Slowick.

FAITHFUL ASKED TO PRAY FOR VOCATIONS

It's not a vocations crisis but a commitment crisis, priest says

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — The Catholic Church throughout the world will celebrate the 41st World Day of Prayer for Vocations on Sunday, May 2, the Fourth Sunday of Easter.

The purpose of the day is for "all of the faithful join in fervent prayer for vocations to the priesthood, to the consecrated life and to missionary service," said Pope John Paul II.

"Indeed, our primary duty is to pray to the 'Lord of the harvest' for those who already follow Christ very closely in the priesthood and religious life, and for those whom he in his mercy continues to call to such important ecclesial service," said the pope.

The day will "provide an opportunity for the local church to mobilize the many people in the diocese dedicated to vocation efforts — vocation personnel, priests, religious, teachers, parents, as well as all the faithful in the diocese — to discuss the need for vocations, to pray for an increase in vocations and to consider participating in creating a positive atmosphere surrounding church vocations," says Father Edward J. Burns, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Vocations and Priestly Formation.

"A lot of people say that religious are dying out. I don't think that's necessarily true," said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of Hispanic Ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte. "We're fewer, but not dying out."

Sister Inkrott resides at the Sisters of St. Francis' new discernment house in Charlotte. The home was established to help women discern a possible vocation to the order by observing and living with the sisters.

Father Burns said the church in the United States is not suffering from a vocations crisis. Rather, he said, modern culture is suffering from a commitment crisis.

"It's not easy to make a commitment these days," said Father Burns, keynote speaker at the 2004 Evening with the Bishop event to benefit the Vocations Investment Partnership for the Diocese of Jefferson City, Mo.

"But that is exactly what we are called to do," he said.

All of the faithful must "rally around those who do make commitments to the church, to live a holy life," said Father Burns. "We need to support all vocations in all ways and in all seasons. It's so vital for us as church, in order to express the mission of Christ."

All the church must help create what he called a "vocation culture" — "a culture whereby young men and women may courageously respond to God's call, and to live out a life of commitment — commitment to the Gospel message, to a life of service, and life in the church."

Recent polls in the United States have indicated this generation of young people is "more spiritual than ever," said Father Burns.

"Compared to the generation of World War II, the spirituality they possess is one that needs further nurturing and further formation," he said. "It is a spirituality of young people so dedicated to their relationship to God, and so hungry for the truth and the Gospel message — the truth that is proclaimed in the church."

He talked about how important it is for every Catholic to stand in solidarity with people who are engaged in ministry and mission. "We do have the capacity and ability to support one another in all of our ministries, in our vocations, in all that we give to the church and one another," he said.

He urged his listeners to stand up to the mass media when reporters or comedians only talk about the church in terms of priests who have sexually abused children. Such references, he said, ignore the breadth of the Catholic Church's many ministries.

Father Burns said everyone in the church must be clear about his or her mission. Religious communities must be clear about their unique charisms, and diocesan priests must be clear about their priestly identity.

Parents, he said, have a responsibility to create an environment in the home that enables the entire family to pray for vocations. Parents and grandparents must ask themselves whether they discuss vocations at home and encourage their children to pray for them. Teachers must be aware of how vocations to ordained ministry and the consecrated life are presented in textbooks and in the classroom.

Religious sisters and brothers, Father Burns said, must be asked whether the way they live out the charism of their community makes young women and men want to inquire about religious life.

Priests, he said, must ask themselves whether their prayer life and personal example and the way they preach and celebrate the Eucharist properly nourish and nurture young people, so that they might also reflect on a call to vocation.

"All of us," he said, "are called to nurture, to mentor, to teach and to invite, to create this vocation culture."

"Ultimately, as we look at the tasks that lie ahead of us, we come before the Lord, repeating the words of the psalmist in all that we do in vocation ministry and all we do in inviting young men and women to respond to priesthood and religious life: 'Lord, bless our endeavors' and 'give success to the work of our hands.'"

'Left Behind' series called 'overtly anti-Catholic'

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The popular "Left Behind" series of Christian apocalyptic novels denies a number of Catholic teachings and "is both subtly and overtly anti-Catholic," says an article in The Living Light, a quarterly publication of the U.S. bishops' Department of Education.

The quarterly's winter 2003 issue devoted articles to "Left Behind," the fundamentalist "rapture doctrine" behind it, a Catholic understanding of the end times when Christ will come again, and the large gap religious educators see between what Catholics know and what they should know about church teaching in that area.

The articles' authors warned Catholics could easily be drawn into such fundamentalist teachings if they have not received solid formation in Catholic teaching about the last things — death, judgment, heaven and hell.

The issue appeared before the 12th and final novel in the series, "Glorious Appearing," hit bookstores March 30.

Since authors Tim LaHayes and Jerry Jenkins began the series in 1995, its first 11 novels have sold more than 40 million copies, with a spinoff youth series kicking the number of copies to around 60 million.

"While they appear to be based on the Bible, the 'Left Behind' books actually promote a nonbiblical fear in opposition to Catholic teaching about a hope-filled end time," wrote religious educator Joyce Donahue in an article analyzing the theology of the series in relation to Catholic teaching.

She gave a synopsis of the first 11 books, starting with the first, when "mysteriously, all over the world, all small children and 'good' adults suddenly disappear." The central characters learn those who disappeared were taken up to heaven in the "rapture" before the seven years of global tribulation that — according to rapture belief — will precede Christ's second coming.

Donahue cited key conflicts between theories propounded by LaHaye and Jenkins in the novels and Catholic teaching, including their approach to the Book of Revelation and other apocalyptic passages of Scripture.

"Any fundamentalist reading of apocalyptic Scripture is not Catholic teaching," she said. "A seven-year tribulation between the 'rapture' and the return of Christ is not biblical. Scripture teaches that Christ will come after a period of tribulation and that all believers will at that time be taken up to heaven to be with him."

Rapture theology relies on St. Paul's First Letter to the Thessalonians where he says when Christ comes a second time, "the dead in Christ will rise first. Then we who are alive, who are left, will be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air."

The word "rapture" comes from the Latin verb "rapere," used in St. Jerome's Latin translation of that passage to express the notion of the just being "caught up" with the Lord.

But as Donahue and the author of another article, theologian Paul Thigpen, pointed out, rapture theology teaches about a third coming of Christ — first in his birth in Bethlehem, second in his secret coming to snatch away the just before the tribulations of the end time, and third at the end of the world to reign in glory.

Catholic and mainstream Christian teaching holds that when Christ comes in glory at the end of this age, it will be his second coming, not his third.

Donahue commented, "A 'second chance' at salvation (for those not taken up in the second coming) is not biblical. ... We will all, at the same time, receive the final judgment — Mt 13:37-43. The postrapture, prejudgment scenario in the 'Left Behind' books borders on Pelagianism because characters seem to be working to redeem themselves."

An early heresy in Christianity, Pelagianism held that grace depended on human initiative, not on God's initiative.

The "Left Behind" books also present a "harsh and judgmental" image of God, offer a theology of suffering that is not Catholic — the rapture saves the good from the trials of the end time — and "deny the efficaciousness of baptism," wrote Donahue.

On the nonbaptismal approach to salvation, "people in the series are saved at a specific moment by saying a verbal formula," and in the children's series "a minister describes this to the kids as a 'transaction ... a deal,'" she wrote. "Salvation takes place only when a person tells Jesus Christ that he or she accepts salvation."

"In contrast," she wrote, "the Catholic Church teaches that salvation is a process effected and celebrated in the sacraments of initiation and continuing through Christian life."

She described ways in which the series is anti-Catholic, including the portrayal of "a self-centered, obese American cardinal" becoming pope in an election rigged by the Antichrist and then leading "the Antichrist's new one-world religion."

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Tears flow in many forms, sprung from a thousand different causes.

They come as fat, salty droplets running down the face of a child stung by the unfairness of life; streaks in the makeup of a woman showing friends the quilt her recently deceased mother made for her 50th birthday; wet smears on the blotchy, wrathful face of a man whose job has been exported to another country in order to punch up the share prices of company directors; glittering pools flooding the eyes of a heartbroken young couple making their long goodbyes at the airport.

Sometimes they are hidden, perceptible only in the crushing headache, the dark mood, the angry words of those who hide their tears from fear of vulnerability.

Tears come to mind on hearing the promises made to us in Sunday's reading from the Book of Revelation. When we shine the light of that passage on our experience of all the different kinds of tears arising from the human condition two truths stand out.

The first is that God's commitment to vindicate all those who remain faithful to him does not eliminate the fact that tears are part of the human story. Discipleship in Christ cannot be lived without compassion, and compassion opens us up to all the sadness of the world from the shallow and momentary to the deep and lasting. To attempt a life without tears is to condemn ourselves to live only on the surface.

The second truth here is that God's compassion and fidelity are so great that every tear — from the most fleeting and inconsequential to the longest flowing and most deeply felt — will be wiped away by God's tender and loving hand.

Loss, anger, disappointment, fear, desolation, physical pain — in the end they are all provisional. Nothing can outlast the love and mercy of God.

Questions:

What is one time someone helped you to experience God's consolation? Is there someone in your life whose tears might need to be acknowledged and wiped away?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"For the lamb ... will shepherd them and lead them to springs of life-giving water, and God will wipe away every tear from their eyes" (Revelation 7:17).

Marquette University studies newspaper coverage of 'Passion' film

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — An analysis of newspaper coverage of the movie "The Passion of the Christ" conducted by Jesuit-run Marquette University in Milwaukee showed there was more positive than negative coverage in news stories, although news stories with neutral coverage outnumbered the positive and negative coverage.

William Elliott, dean of Marquette's College of Communication, said level of coverage extraordinary and that the study's results, released April 8, confirmed his own instincts of what he saw in the press.

The first phase of the Marquette study covered the 10 highest-circulation U.S. newspapers. The second phase will cover at least one newspaper in each of the 50 states.

Under analysis were stories published between Jan. 1 and March 20; the film was released Feb. 25. The 10 newspapers averaged 35 stories each over that time period, or close to one story every other day.

Other movies, Elliott said, may generate newspaper coverage, but in the case of a series such as "The Lord of the Rings," it would be "directed to a small group of Tolkien readers, and appears a lot on the entertainment pages."

News articles made up 42.1 percent of all newspaper coverage of "The Passion." Of the 146 articles, 50 were judged to be positive and 21 negative, but 75 were considered neutral.

Letters to the editor accounted for 23.3 percent of the coverage of the film, making them the next largest portion of "Passion" newspaper coverage. Of 81 letters, 31 were judged to be negative, 27 positive and 23 neutral.

Of the 47 feature stories, which accounted for 13.5 percent of all newspaper coverage, 29 of the stories were neutral, 11 were negative and seven were positive.

Reviews of "The Passion of the Christ" were almost evenly split, with 11 being neutral, 10 positive and 10 negative. Of editorials about the movie, 13 were negative, 13 were neutral, and only four were positive.

The Marquette study also examined what the newspaper articles discussed about the movie. The religious nature of the film was the most prevalent topic, with 197 stories referencing it. The other subject touched upon in a majority of the articles that were studied was whether the film could be seen as anti-Semitic.

"While anti-Semitism was frequently discussed, it was considered a major issue in only 30.4 percent of the articles," the study's executive summary said. "The most frequent interpretation was that the issue was a minor part of the story and one side of the issue was presented."

Other topics found in the coverage were, in descending order: the film's violence, its historical accuracy, the movie's production and promotion efforts, and the quest of director Mel Gibson.

Regarding stories about the film's violence, the study said, "violence was not only a significant theme of the coverage, the results ... show that the issues surrounding violence often come in the form of negative articles."

Kindergarteners, senior citizens celebrate Easter

CHARLOTTE — Kids and adults at St. Matthew Church and School proved Easter is fun for any age.

Approximately 115 kindergarten students and 160 members of the parish's S.T.A.R. group (Seniors That Are Retired) enjoyed an Easter luncheon at the church's New Life Center April 7.

The students made Easter cards for the seniors, who baked cupcakes and provided Easter candy for the children. The students then sang for the seniors after lunch.

The Easter Bunny and helpers from Charlotte Catholic High School also joined the festivities. Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church, and Father Duc Duong and Father Carmen Malacari, parochial vicars, judged the seniors' Easter bonnet contest.

Some Christian parishes hold modified Seder observances because the Last Supper, at which Jesus instituted the Eucharist the night before his death, is traditionally believed to have been a Seder meal.

Abbey's alumni magazine wins awards

BELMONT — He wore a green flight suit, dark shades and had a dazzling smile.

At first glance, you could have easily mistaken the attractive flight surgeon who graced the Winter 2003 cover of CROSSROADS, Belmont Abbey College's alumni magazine, with a famous actor from the movie "Top Gun."

The similarities, of course, were all coincidental.

But it certainly couldn't have hurt when judges for the Communicator Awards read about 1968 graduate Ed Antosek's journey from Belmont Abbey College to Iraq. They also got to know others such as NBC Television personality and 1967 graduate Dr. Kevin Soden; they experienced Abbey events firsthand through photos such as Homecoming 2003 and New Jersey Day at the Races; and learned about exciting news and discoveries like Father Abram Ryan, and La Casa's grand opening on campus.

It was this that judges based their decision to award Belmont Abbey College's alumni magazine, CROSSROADS, with five Communicator Awards in its 2004 Print Media competition. The College won Awards of Distinction for its Winter 2003 issue in the following categories; Writing/Magazine; Magazine/Educational Institution; and Most Improved Magazine. Belmont Abbey also won Honorable Mention in the following categories; Photography/Magazine; and Design/Magazine Interior.

"We're all very proud of this achievement," said Teresa Sowers McKinney, director of public relations at Belmont Abbey College and the magazine's editor-in-chief. "But I think we all feel the magazine's impact would not have been possible had it not been for the amazing stories the Abbey's alumni bring to the table."

The Communicator Awards is an international awards competition that recognizes outstanding work in the communications field with entries judged by industry professionals. Belmont Abbey College was chosen from among 3,743 in this year's competition from advertising agencies, corporate communications departments, educational institutions, government entities, designers, writers, video production professionals, broadcast and cable operations and other businesses throughout the country.

"There's no better reward than seeing everyone's hard work — from someone in the office taking time to write an extra article to a student taking some extra time out of his or her day to pose for a picture — every little bit adds something special to the magazine," said McKinney.

CROSSROADS is published biannually by the Office of Public Relations with assistance from the Alumni Office and the Development Office. The magazine features success stories of alumni and current students of the Abbey and includes news, sports, arts, calendar events, alumni news and open letters from the abbot and alumni president.

"I think no matter what, whether it's events or publications, as an institution — we need to bring them to the next level and make sure the alumni feel welcome," said 1999 graduate Fran Kirk Piñeros. "We need to continue to reinforce that connection alumni have with the Abbey."

Belmont Abbey College, named one of the country's leading, private liberal arts colleges by U.S. News and World Report, is home to nearly a thousand students with diverse religious and cultural backgrounds who represent more than 18 countries and 34 states.

Hundreds walk to fight AIDS

BELMONT — An estimated 250 walkers participated in the 11th Annual Walk for AIDS April 4.

The three-mile jaunt through historic Belmont raised awareness of the HIV/AIDS problem in the region and funds to cover operating expenses of the House of Mercy, a nonprofit residential living facility serving persons with advanced AIDS.

Founded by the Sisters of Mercy, the House of Mercy is the region's only facility providing 24-hour compassionate care for persons living with advanced AIDS. More than 200 men and women have resided at House of Mercy, which is in its 13th year of operation.

"Some view House of Mercy as a somber, sad place. Yes, there is death here, but there is also good fellowship, laughter and joy between the residents and staff," said Stan Patterson, president of the House of Mercy. "In some cases, they come from dysfunctional relationships. Here, there is an opportunity for families to reconcile."

After the walk, The South Fork Boys, a local bluegrass band comprised of three Belmont teens, performed for the walkers at a picnic reception at House of Mercy.

Worldwide, 20 million persons have died from AIDS and more than 40 million are estimated to be living with HIV. Southern states, with a third of the U.S. population, account for approximately 46 percent of all new HIV/AIDS cases, according to the Center for Disease Control and Prevention. Twenty-one hundred cases of HIV disease were reported to the N.C. Division of Public Health in 2003.

The N.C. Division of Health & Human Services estimates at least 21,000 North Carolinians are living with HIV/AIDS, with one-quarter to one-third of this number unaware of their status.

ity hall, the parish having outgrown the 120-seat church.

This growth necessitated the construction of a new 11,955 square-foot church adjacent to the original structure, where Mass had been celebrated for much of the past 60 years in Monroe.

The new church will seat 719 people for Mass, six times that of the old building, which will continue to serve the parish as a space for baptisms, funerals, weddings and daily Mass.

The centerpiece of the new sanctuary is the 6-foot corpus of Christ, which hangs on a 10-foot cross over the altar. Eventually, statues will fill two alcoves in the front of the church and Stations of the Cross will adorn the walls, said Lucille Jackman, a member of the building committee.

"It is with a sense of overflowing joy and profound gratitude to God that we celebrate this Mass of dedication of the new church of Our Lady of Lourdes parish," said Bishop Jugis in his homily.

The bishop gave his homily in both English and Spanish, out of respect for the large number of Hispanics in attendance.

The bishop thanked the priests and deacons in attendance: Abbot Placid Solari, OSB, of Belmont Abbey; Augustinian Father Cassidy, pastor; Msgr. William Pharr, pastor from 1965-69; Msgr. John McSweeney, pastor of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte; Father Christopher Roux, parochial vicar of St. Mark Church in Huntersville; and Rev. Mr. Edwin Rodriguez and Rev. Mr. Jesus Reyes, deacons for Our Lady of Lourdes Church.

During the nearly three-hour Mass, more than 700 parishioners and special guests watched as Bishop Jugis blessed the church with holy water, holy chrism oil and incense, "to signify the superabundant grace and holiness of the sacrifice of Christ."

"But the anointing with sacred chrism and incense only symbolically represents what is the real consecration of this place by Christ himself — the presence of the eucharistic sacrifice, the sacred banquet with Christ our king," he said.

At the conclusion of the Mass, parish council chairman Doherty presented a visibly moved Bishop Jugis with the crucifix that had hung in the church's rectory. The bishop selected this same crucifix as the model for the cross on his episcopal coat of arms when he was ordained in October 2003.

Remarkably, the new church was completed both under budget and early, said Jackman. Thanks to a relatively mild winter, construction proceeded quickly from its groundbreaking until completion in late March. The building was first used for the Palm Sunday Masses.

According to Doherty, the majority of the capital needed for the new church was raised over the past four years. He expects the balance to be paid off by the end of 2005.

"Today salvation has come to this house," said Bishop Jugis. "May Christ fill up our hearts and fill out this place with his divine presence."

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

A recent editorial in the Winston-Salem Journal criticized Bishop Peter J. Jugis for not making himself available to news reporters for interviews.

The editorial, entitled, "A Bishop's Silence," said it was time for the bishop to talk. But, as most Catholics know, the bishop has been talking regularly and often since his installment in October. In addition, when he speaks, he invites the news media to cover what he has to say.

Bishop Jugis is the pastoral leader of our diocese and, as such, the most appropriate way for him to speak is from the pulpit, which he does in churches throughout the diocese every Sunday. The editorial writer from the Winston-Salem Journal, and any other reporter, is welcome to listen and learn at any one of these Masses.

The bishop understands that news organizations have an interest in some topics more than others and has accommodated those needs. For example, on Ash Wednesday at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte, the bishop addressed a topic that the secular news media has a great deal of interest in: the sinful crime of clergy sex abuse. The news media was given advance notice of the homily, written copies of it were distributed to reporters and a video and audio feed of the service was available. Audio of the homily can still be found on the diocesan web site, www.charlottediocese.org.

Coverage was widespread with radio, television and newspapers all carrying stories. The bishop also spoke out about sex abuse in a lengthy op-ed piece that editors of The Charlotte Observer, the Asheville Citizen-Times and the Winston-Salem Journal, found worth publishing.

Most importantly, the bishop's messages to the faithful are covered in The Catholic News & Herald. The bishop publishes this newspaper; it is first to report his official comments and has the authoritative and most thorough coverage of his activities.

Granted, the audience for The Catholic News & Herald is not as large as some newspapers in the diocese, but there is a trade-off for anyone who is quoted in the secular news media. In return for the notoriety that comes with being quoted, you have to be willing to have your words and ideas filtered and condensed. Filtering occurs because everything from the bias of a reporter to the point of view of a given publication affects how a story is portrayed.

Condensing is the squeezing of ten pounds of information into a five-pound bag. There is rarely enough room in a newspaper or time on television to give a subject a complete airing. News stories are abridged versions of reality.

Most people who are quoted by news organizations, such as politicians, don't have much choice: either they work with reporters or they fall off the public's radar. It's different for the bishop. He can connect with Catholics via this newspaper or the Internet. But more importantly, he has the pulpit, a place where he can comment on our spiritual welfare, God's plan for our salvation and topics such as community justice.

These topics and others should be far more important for Catholics and non-Catholics than the fast-changing and often whimsical agenda of the news media.

God offers faithful a safe haven from evil and chaos, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY — God offers the faithful a safe haven from chaos and evil, said Pope John Paul II.

"The Lord surrounds the faithful with a horizon of peace that keeps out the uproar of evil. Communion with God is a source of serenity, joy, tranquillity; it is like entering an oasis of light and love," he said at his weekly general audience.

Looking refreshed and happy in the warm Rome sunshine, the pope read brief passages from an otherwise long audience address. He spoke slowly and deliberately though his speech was slurred. He also gave short greetings in 10 different languages to the some 40,000 pilgrims gathered April 21 in St Peter's Square.

In his catechesis, the pope focused on the image of the house or temple of God as a refuge that offers peace and serenity to those who place their trust in him.

He said those who are faithful to God may become isolated or be confronted by hostile forces because of their faith.

They know their belief "creates isolation and provokes even contempt and hostility in a society that often chooses personal advancement, outward success, wealth and unhindered pleasure as its standard," he said.

He said those who believe in God are never alone and a "surprising peace is kept in their heart because ... the Lord is my light and my salvation; whom should I fear?"

In a portion of the speech he did not read aloud, the pope wrote, "inner calm, fortitude of the soul and peace are gifts that are obtained while finding refuge in the temple, while resorting to personal and community prayer."

In his greeting to Polish pilgrims, the pope made mention of the importance of Christianity for a united Europe.

April 23 marks the feast day of St. Adalbert, one of Poland's patron saints, whose life and death "became the foundation of the nation and Polish identity," the pope said.

St. Adalbert "reminds us once again that only with Christ is it possible to build a solid, common, European home," he said.

Predominantly Catholic Poland will be the largest nation to join the European Union May 1 together with nine other Central European and Mediterranean countries.

The structure of pastoral councils

Guest Column

GEORGE K. COBB
GUEST COLUMNIST

Editor's note: This is the second of a series of columns on pastoral councils.

While the parish pastoral council is the thinking, planning and reflection group for the parish, the commissions are made up of the people who actually help to make the plans become realities.

The members of the commissions are individuals in the parish commissioned by the pastor to carry out a particular ministry in the parish that is particular to his role as pastor. They are spiritually called to this ministry. It falls to the pastor, pastoral council and the commission to imitate the Twelve Apostles, prayerfully discerning those persons in the faith community who may have a calling to a particular ministry. This same discernment should occur every time there is a need to fill positions in the faith community, including the pastoral council.

Existing organizations or committees relate to the pastoral council through the appropriate commissions. It is common in parishes across the Diocese of Charlotte to delegate commissions to the level of another committee. This is contrary to the intent of the diocesan policy.

Commission members are called and are the principal body responsible for overseeing the proper carrying out of the ministry in accord with the pastoral plan. The pastor, pastoral council and the faith community should recognize this calling. Commission members should be installed in their ministry during Sunday liturgy.

Commissions are established within every parish with size and membership dependent upon the size of the parish. Each commission is responsible for establishing a working plan, including a mission statement, goals and objectives, the recommendation to the pastor of policies concerning matters pertaining to the commission, evaluating programs and policies, and approval of its budget.

The commissions should endeavor to become the experts in the parish concerning the ministry that they carry out. For example, the Community Life Commission should be trained in all pertinent aspects of social justice and commission members should take their obligation to be educated in the subject seriously.

Canon law specifically requires that individuals in a particular ministry be trained in that ministry (Canon 229 §1). The pastor and pastoral council must also take seriously this obligation that all engaged in ministry must be trained and insure that opportunities are provided for proper formation. Money must be budgeted annually to insure that the laity are properly trained.

The commission structure is: Liturgy, Community Life, Family Life, Ecumenism/Evangelization, Education, Administration/Communication.

With the completion of the strategic plan of the diocese, "Crossing the Threshold with Christ," it was recommended Ecumenism to be a separate commission with Communication being added to Evangelization. In this way, the commissions better reflect the nature of Evangelization and Ecumenism as understood in the Catholic Church today.

David Robinson — Beyond the image

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

Stories on the sports pages these days are as likely to be about sex, drugs and money as they are about who won and who lost, so it's a pleasure to read about an athlete who's as much a hero in real life as he's been in a gym. Meet David Robinson, basketball star — who may one day be better remembered as David Robinson, humanitarian.

Robinson, 38, retired last year after a glittering career with the San Antonio Spurs, where he helped win two NBA titles and once reigned as the league's Most Valuable Player. Already named one of the 50 top players of all time, he's a sure bet for the Hall of Fame. And what has he been up to since retiring?

Starting a school, for one thing — and putting $9 million of his own money into it. The Carver Academy — named for George Washington Carver, African-American scientist and social leader (and Robinson's personal hero) — is not just any school. Faith-based, with a 15-1 student-teacher ratio and a schedule that begins with chapel each day, the academy stresses integrity, service, leadership and discipline.

I read about the Carver Academy, and about the incredible generosity of the man who started it, in a New York Daily News story written by Wayne Coffey. And quite a story it is. Robinson and his wife, Valerie, decided to launch the school as the kind of place they wanted their own boys to attend. Robinson's good friend Red McCombs, former owner of the Spurs, tried to talk him out of the idea, warning him of all the problems he'd face and pointing to the scholarships he'd established through the David Robinson Foundation.

"I told him he was already doing a lot," McCombs explained.

But McCombs was hardly surprised when Robinson persisted in going ahead with his plans. After all, he knew the man.

"People from coast to coast ask me, 'Is this guy really as good as his image'?" McCombs says. "My response is, 'No, he's better.'"

Academics has always been a prime concern for Robinson, who majored in math during his undergraduate days at the U.S. Naval Academy. But so is excellence in general, not to mention the development of solid values. Robinson serves as a minister at large for the Oak Hills Church in San Antonio, where he leads a weekly Bible study session. He tries to pass his ideas on faith along to the students at Carver, because to him they're what matter most in life.

"Everything in life is not dictated by money," Robinson told Wayne Coffey. "It's dictated by what kind of legacy you're going to leave, and what kind of man you are going to be."

Robinson's academy, now two years old, has brightened up a once run-down neighborhood in San Antonio. Set in a modest building on a six-acre site, it houses 83 children up to grade 4. Each year a grade will be added, and a $6-million expansion plan is already in the works.

"The kids are happy here," he said. "They love coming here. You know you're impacting young lives, and that's the best part of it."

Parents of Carver Academy students couldn't agree more. "David Robinson is a phenomenal man," said one mother. "I feel blessed every day that my son goes to this school."

Do Catholics believe in the Eucharist?

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Several times I have heard speakers tell us that most Catholics don't believe in the Eucharist anymore. They say it is because priests do not urge old and young parishioners to be reverent and especially because Catholic education classes do not teach true doctrine.

One priest gave the same ideas in a talk just the other night, quoting surveys that he says show Catholics do not accept the presence of Jesus in the Eucharist. Is that true? Do surveys really prove that? (Pennsylvania)

A. I've heard the same claims, though it seems to me they were more vocal several years ago than they are now. I too find such accusations hard to accept. In my 50 years as a priest, I have certainly experienced nothing to support them.

Schools in every parish I have worked with or known of are clear and thoroughly Catholic in their teaching about the Eucharist. There is always unevenness and need for improvement in education, including religious education. These broad accusations, however, undermining and defaming Catholic schools around the country, contribute nothing helpful to the faith and life of Catholic people.

As for the surveys, I'm not at all sure they indicate a decline in eucharistic faith. For one thing, there were no such surveys in earlier times to measure against.

Second, I have read a few of these studies. They prove that, no matter how fair their authors may think them to be, it is impossible to capsulize our beliefs about the Eucharist in a few brief questions that people could answer without leaving room for serious confusions.

It took the church centuries to develop satisfactory eucharistic language. The 16th-century Council of Trent (Session 13) summarized that development in describing the true and substantial eucharistic presence of our Lord. Yet even that language is being refined and clarified to this day, as the Catechism of the Catholic Church, for example, demonstrates.

Our belief in the real presence of Jesus Christ — "body and blood, soul and divinity," as the older catechisms put it — needs to be carefully understood. It can be, and often has been, misinterpreted. From former times even to the present, people not of our faith sometimes mistook what we mean by eating the body of Christ, seeing it as implying some sort of cannibalism.

Thoughtful Catholics may not know all the technical theological terminology, but they know what they believe. They tend to be cautious of language that could be open to a caricature of our faith. We are, after all, as the church teaches, dealing here with a profound mystery that no human words will ever adequately express.

Finally, it is simple reality that some Catholics feel an urgent need to deplore what they see as a crisis of faith so they can lay the blame on whatever it is they currently dislike in the church: English liturgy, women lectors, Latin Masses, lay eucharistic ministers, celibate priesthood and so on.

Various factors always affect the quality of people's faith — in the Eucharist as in everything else. Fortunately, the Eucharistic Prayers at Mass express plainly what the Eucharist is and why. From the words of institution (consecration) to the calling down of the Holy Spirit and the many expressions of thanksgiving, when these are proclaimed clearly and listened to carefully the true faith is present and alive.

When the faithful make their act of faith at Communion time by saying "Amen" — I affirm it — after being offered "the body of Christ," they declare quite well what they believe. It is worth remembering that for centuries, when the Mass was once before in the language people understood, the Mass — the word and the Eucharist — was the primary place where faith was planted and nourished.

Maybe we need to look there a little more closely.

Questions may be sent to Father Dietzen at the same address, or e-mail: jjdietzen@aol.com.

One nation 'Under God'

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

A carnival-like atmosphere developed as reporters, protesters and onlookers descended upon the U.S. Supreme Court March 24 to hear the atheist Michael A. Newdow's case that his daughter should not be subjected to reciting the words "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance.

How should Catholics and others steeped in the Judeo-Christian tradition react when such an effort is undertaken by someone like Newdow? Do we start a a religious war against atheists?

Not with soldiers or bombs, obviously. Of course, there's always the possibility of letter-writing, an e-mail blitz, phone calls and other efforts to support the nation's Judeo-Christian heritage.

But do we undertake a relentless battle to destroy the illogical and destructive thinking of such people? Following the same line of thought, do we resort to character assassination? The aging Newdow is undoubtedly beyond his prime. Is he going through a mid-life crisis and making this his last hurrah?

Do we respond to Newdow on his own terms and argue that there is no such thing as an atheist because if you say you don't believe in God, you are admitting there is a God? You can't disbelieve what doesn't exist in your mind.

Or do we just dismiss the whole affair as one more carnival to which the Supreme Court has opened itself? Will it, like most carnivals in the past, quickly pass and be forgotten? Is no reaction the better course?

As Christians, we have the responsibility to evangelize others. Should we react to an effort such as Newdow's with evangelization, trying harder to share the good news and bring about a change of heart in people like him?

I believe that the best way to deal with atheists is to imitate par excellence the God they deny. There is an evening prayer that priests in particular recite that captures God's attitude beautifully: "Grant Lord, that we may see in each person the dignity of one redeemed by your Son's blood so that we may respect the freedom and the conscience of all."

No matter how deeply we feel about making war, promoting character assassination, making people eat their words or sending them to oblivion, God's way encourages us always to maintain respect of the person's conscience and freedom.

God never forces us, but always leaves us to our own designs, knowing that justice always will win out. This must be our disposition in heated debates.

Living as truly as we can as Christians is the best way to make Christians.

The original church will continue to be used for the celebration of baptisms, weddings, funerals and daily Mass.

MONROE — The fortunes of World War II put the Catholic Church on the map in Union County and are responsible for the founding of Our Lady of Lourdes Church.

In 1941, a priest from St. James Church in Hamlet offered monthly Mass to the few Catholics living in Monroe at a local's house. The establishment of nearby Camp Sutton as a training site for servicemen preparing to enter combat overseas resulted in an influx of soldiers descending upon the normally quiet area. These soldiers were from all over the country and many of them were Catholic.

A U.S. Army chaplain offered Mass at the camp and shortly thereafter two priests of the Congregation of Priests of Mercy arrived from Brooklyn, N.Y., to establish a church in Monroe.

Mercy Father James Hudson became the first pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Church, officially established May 10, 1942. The first Sunday Mass was celebrated in the Center Theatre on Main Street May 31, 1942. More than 500 soldiers, their wives, relatives and the few local Catholics celebrated solemn high Mass in the Monroe High School auditorium on Christmas, 1942.

At war's end in 1945, the exodus of Catholic soldiers from the area significantly reduced Mass attendance, but some of those who had married local women decided to settle in Monroe. From this seminal group, mostly comprised of men from Tennessee, New York, Wisconsin and Indiana, the Catholic presence in Union County grew.

Through the efforts of the Priests of Mercy and the generosity of benefactors from Brooklyn, Boston and across the Northeast, a new church building was dedicated by then-Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh April 24, 1946.

The Priests of Mercy faithfully served Our Lady of Lourdes Church and its missions, St. Joseph in Monroe and later Sacred Heart in Wadesboro, dedicated in September 1947, for several years. The parish rectory for Our Lady of Lourdes Church was built in 1955, and priests from the Diocese of Raleigh assumed the spiritual care of the growing parish and its missions in 1960. Father Robert Shea became the first diocesan pastor.

When the Diocese of Charlotte was established in 1972, then-Bishop Michael J. Begley invited the Oblates of Mary Immaculate to assume the pastorate of Our Lady of Lourdes Church. In 1973, Oblate Father Donald Joyce became pastor, followed by Oblate Father George Waggert in 1976 and Oblate Father Paul McCartin in 1978.

A parish hall was built during these years to accommodate the growing congregation, which had reached 154 families by 1981. In 1984, during the pastorate of Oblate Father Martin Walsh, it became necessary to build an education building for the growing number of children in religious education.

In 1988, the Oblates transferred charge of the parish to priests of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. Holy Ghost Father Edward Vilkauskas became pastor to approximately 250 families.

Our Lady of Lourdes Church continued to grow, with a number of parishioners increasing almost weekly. Approximately 650 people of the 1,000-member parish celebrated their 50th jubilee anniversary with an outdoor Mass celebrated by then-Bishop John F. Donoghue May 10, 1992. By February 1996, as then-Bishop William G. Curlin and the parish celebrated the church's 50th anniversary, a fund for the new church building had already been established.

Over the next decade, the Spanish-speaking population of Monroe grew exponentially, and with it the parish of Our Lady of Lourdes Church. By 2004, more than 1,200 families were worshipping each weekend at the church, including at least 840 Hispanic families.

Along with the Women's Guild, Men's Club and Knights of Columbus, parishioners became actively involved in RCIA, faith formation and a Bible study group.

The parish provides monthly evaluations for Hispanic schoolchildren to assess their progress and needed areas of improvement. An active Hispanic young adults group serves the growing Spanish-speaking population in Monroe.

Father Vilkauskas and parishioners broke ground for the new church Aug. 12, 2000, with a bilingual ceremony reflective of the community's faithful optimism and multicultural heritage.

In 2000, Father Carlo Di Natale Tarasi arrived as pastor, and newly ordained Father Luis Salvador Osorio became parochial vicar. In July 2001, then-Father (now Bishop) Peter J. Jugis became pastor.

After nearly two years at Our Lady of Lourdes Church, Father Jugis was elected the fourth bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte. In September 2003, Augustinian Father James Cassidy assumed the position of pastor of the church.

On April 18, 2004, Bishop Jugis returned to celebrate the dedication of the new Our Lady of Lourdes Church.

The new 11,955-square-foot church features seating for 719 worshippers. In the near future, statues will fill two alcoves in the front of the church and Stations of the Cross will adorn the walls.

Catholics explore ancient form of prayer

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — In the semi-darkened room, several confirmation students lay scattered along the path of the prayer labyrinth. Quiet, spiritual music played in the background, but they couldn't hear it.

Each student was wearing a set of headphones — a familiar sight for eighth-graders — but instead of listening to Eminem or No Doubt, they were enjoying Christian music by artists such as Michael W. Smith.

In a new take on an ancient style of prayer, 80 students from St. John Neumann Church journeyed along a labyrinth as part of their confirmation retreat.

The labyrinth used was a contemporary version of a cathedral labyrinth, which combines ancient Christian tradition with contemporary music, meditations, art, media and activities at 11 stations along the path.

Patrick Tylicki, an eighth-grader at Mint Hill Middle School, said he expected a maze.

Whereas in a maze a participant can run into dead ends, a labyrinth has only one twisting path that weaves its way to the center and back out again. There is only one entrance and exit, no dead ends, and no crossing of paths with a choice of which way to turn.

U.S. bishops receive new liturgy instruction; few changes seen

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The head of the U.S. bishops welcomed a new Vatican instruction aimed at curbing liturgical abuses, and a liturgy expert predicted it will require few changes in most U.S. parishes.

The instruction, "Redemptionis Sacramentum" ("The Sacrament of Redemption") was issued April 23 by the Vatican Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments.

The document's 60-plus pages are devoted almost entirely to explaining what should be done and listing abuses to avoid in the celebration of Mass and the conduct of eucharistic devotion outside Mass. Its subtitle is "On Certain Matters to Be Observed or to Be Avoided Regarding the Most Holy Eucharist."

Msgr. James P. Moroney, executive director of the bishops' Secretariat for the Liturgy, said the most significant change the document will bring to most U.S. parishes is the removal of flagons or pitchers of wine from altars at Masses where HUNTERSVILLE — Seniors of the Diocese of Charlotte descended upon St. Mark Church for a day of enrichment and entertainment at the 18th Annual Spring Fling April 22.

Nearly 200 seniors, from as close as St. Mark and as far away as St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem, gathered for line dancing, safety and health presentations, yoga, crafts and more. As at past Spring Flings, bingo reigned supreme as the ## Church worker going to prison for protest says Gospel her motivation

COLUMBIA, Md. (CNS) — Betsy Lamb, Baltimore archdiocesan coordinator of formation programs, went to prison in April, convicted for her convictions.

"I would do it again, if that seems like the thing to do," she said shortly before traveling to Danbury Federal Correctional Institution in Connecticut to begin her six-month sentence for trespassing in a protest last year at Fort Benning, Ga.

Lamb said she was "a little apprehensive" about going to prison but does not regret what she did to sentence her to spend 180 days and nights in a low-security, concrete prison where most of the inmates are doing time for drug crimes.

During last November's annual protest aimed at closing an Army training school for Central and South American military personnel at Fort Benning, Lamb and 26 other protesters crossed a police line and were arrested as they tried to climb the Army base's eight-foot fence topped with barbed wire.

The Army school used to be called the School of the Americas, but in 2001 it was closed briefly and then reopened as the Western Hemisphere Institute for Security Cooperation. Protesters want it closed permanently, citing some of its alumni who have been implicated in torture, murder and other human rights violations.

A 1990 congressional task force found five of the training school's graduates were among the nine soldiers arrested for the murder of six Jesuit priests, their housekeeper and her teenage daughter in El Salvador in November 1989. Every year since, large protest demonstrations have been held at the gates of Fort Benning on the anniversary of those murders.

The activist organization SOA Watch has compiled lists of dozens of former students the group says have been implicated in some of Latin America's most notorious human rights crimes. The U.S. government says only a small number of students were involved in criminal activities and that the program's focus has changed over the years.

But Lamb, 65, said stories she has heard convince her otherwise, and that's why she crossed the line last November.

"The people I talked to in Latin America said, 'Please, when you go back, try to close the SOA,'" she said, "and that really affected me."

Because her November arrest was her fourth, she was given a prison term rather than probation or a fine.

Pro-lifers offer largely silent witness at March for Women's Lives

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Vastly outnumbered by the hundreds of thousands taking part in the April 25 March for Women's Lives in Washington, pro-life groups conducted a largely silent witness along the march route.

"Today we're being silent," said Georgette Forney, founder of Silent No More Awareness. "It won't do any good to engage them. This is not the forum."

About 90 members of the organization lined one sidewalk near the start of the march route bearing signs and wearing T-shirts with a pro-life message.

Holding a sign that read, "I regret my abortion," Forney said one March for Women's Lives participant told her, "Have another baby." "Like somehow I can substitute one for another," Forney added.

Other gibes directed at the group included "Why don't you go play out in the street," "I didn't regret my abortion," "You should see a therapist about that," and "Choose Satan. He'll give you eternal life."

At a second location along the march route, close to 100 pro-lifers lined the curb at an intersection.

There, Andrea Staargaard, 19, talked about the abortion she had at 16 at a Pennsylvania abortion clinic. State law required parental consent, and Staargaard wanted to avoid telling her family.

"A doctor even suggested that I use a fake name," she said.

In the three years since the abortion, "I never stop thinking about it," Staargaard said. One source of solace after her abortion was joining the Catholic Church.

Pope says democracy could deteriorate, disappear if not built on ethics, values

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Democracy is in danger of deteriorating and disappearing if its foundations are not built on ethics and Christian values, said Pope John Paul II.

Politicians today must "cultivate those human and Christian values which make up Europe's rich, ideal heritage," he said.

This heritage "gave life to a civilization which over the centuries fostered the rise of an authentically democratic society," the pope said April 26.

"Without ethical foundations, democracy risks deteriorating over time and even disappearing," he said.

The pope gave his address to some 200 people gathered to mark the 100th anniversary of the birth of Giorgio La Pira, a Sicilian-born professor, politician and former mayor of Florence known for promoting peace and disarmament during the nuclear arms race.

The pope said La Pira's life reflected an "extraordinary" example of "a politician and a believer, able to unite contemplation and prayer with social and administrative action, with special attention paid to the poor and suffering."

The pope urged his audience to follow in the footsteps of "this prophet of peace." He said La Pira applied "the methodology of the Gospel" in political theory and practice, drawing inspiration from "the commandment of love and pardon."

Giorgio La Pira died in 1977. His sainthood cause is being prepared at the diocesan level in Florence.

Pope beatifies six, including Colombian nun, Polish prince

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Faith in God can transform people into heroes of love and sacrifice, Pope John Paul II said as he beatified four religious women, a Polish prince who became a priest and a Portuguese laywoman.

"They are eloquent examples of how the Lord transforms the existence of believers when they trust in him," the pope said during the April 25 Mass in St. Peter's Square. They demonstrate that "love for Christ is the secret of holiness."

The four religious beatified included Mother Laura Montoya, the first blessed to be born, live and die in Colombia.

Blessed Montoya, who lived 1874-1949, founded the Missionaries Sisters of Immaculate Mary and of St. Catherine of Siena, to work among the indigenous peoples of Colombia. The pope established Oct. 21 as her feast day.

The Polish prince, Father August Czartoryski, was born in 1858 in Paris. He joined the Salesians in 1887 and died in 1893, a year after being ordained to the priesthood. His feast day is Aug. 2.

The pope said he hoped that like Blessed Czartoryski today's young people, "who look for the way to discern the will of God for their lives," will discover their vocation through prayer and with the help of "wise guides."

Beatifying Alexandrina Maria da Costa, the Portuguese laywoman, the pope focused on how she offered her suffering for the salvation of sinners and on her devotion to the Eucharist, "which became her only food for the last 13 years of her life."

She suffered progressive paralysis after having jumped out of a window at age 14 "to save her purity" when three men broke into her house. By 19, she devoted her life to prayer and began having mystical experiences; every Friday for four years, she mystically "lived the sufferings of the Passion," according to a Vatican biography.

In his homily, the pope said her life offered Christians an example of how they could "make more noble everything that is painful and sad in life" by offering everything in love for God.

The pope declared Oct. 13 as her feast day.

He also beatified:

— Mother Lupita Garcia Zavala, also known as Mother Maria Guadalupe, the Mexican co-founder of the Congregation of the Servants of St. Margaret Mary and the Poor. The feast day of the nun, who lived 1878-1963, is April 27.

— Italian Sister of Charity Giulia Nemesia Valle, who lived 1847-1916. Her feast day is June 26.

— Spanish Salesian Sister Eusebia Palomino Yenes, who lived 1899-1935. Her feast day is Feb. 9.

Belmont Abbey celebrates Catholic heritage with Founders' Day

Monastery, college present Mercy Sister Picôt with honorary degree

BELMONT — Mercy Sister Rosalind Picôt received an honorary degree during Belmont Abbey College's Founders' Day celebration April 21.

The program, which celebrated 128 years of Catholic heritage at Belmont Abbey, began with solemn vespers in the Abbey Basilica, where an honorary doctorate of humane letters was presented to Sister Picôt, regional president of the Sisters of Mercy of North Carolina.

A native of Wilmington, Sister Picôt entered the Sisters of Mercy in 1955. She served as director of formation before joining the council. She became vice president and then president of the regional community of North Carolina in the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas.

She has served also as a delegate to the governing chapters of both the regional community and the Institute of the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas.

During her career, Sister Picôt made an impact on young minds throughout the Charlotte region, teaching at Sacred Heart Grade School in Belmont, St. Michael School in Gastonia, Charlotte Catholic High School and Our Lady of Mercy High School in Charlotte

She also served as a leader in the community and in education as principal at the two high schools.

After completing her doctorate, Sister Picôt served in administration at Sacred Heart College in Belmont and was vice president for academic affairs at the college when it ceased academic operation in 1987.

Sister Picôt has served on various civic, social service and educational boards. Through the years, she has conducted numerous studies and analyses of educational programs, as well as workshops on adult development, spiritual development, secondary school administration, leadership, organization and the functioning of boards of directors.

Sister Picôt is one of four recipients to receive an honorary doctorate from the Abbey this year.

Others include Bishop Peter J. Jugis; Jim Palermo, executive in residence at Johnson & Wales University in Charlotte; and Dr. Richard Boyce, professor of preaching and pastoral leadership at Union PSCE at Charlotte, all of who will receive honorary degrees during the college's commencement exercises on May 8.

Sister Picôt received her degree early because a scheduling conflict prevented her from receiving it during the May commencement.

Church victimized by break in

CHARLOTTE — St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte was broken into during the night on Sunday, April 25.

Thieves forced open a door and broke into a safe where the offertory collection from weekend Masses was kept. Sound equipment used by the choir was also taken in the robbery. A police report placed the value of the robbery at $18,000.

In a letter to parishioners, Capuchin Father Ignatius Zampino, pastor, said the church has insurance to cover the loss of the cash and equipment and the parish was working with police and diocesan officials to ensure that security at the church is tightened.

Seniors fling into spring

activity of choice for most of the seniors.

Each year since 1986, diocesan office of Elder Ministry has hosted the Spring Fling as a day where seniors can forget the demands of life and join others in the spirit of oneness and friendship, said Sandra Breakfield, director of Elder Ministry.

Elder Ministry, a division of Catholic Social Services, provides guidance to parishes within the Diocese of Charlotte in order to enhance the well-being of older adults. Annual events such as the Spring Fling and Fall Day of Reflection provide an opportunity for senior citizens to gather for entertainment, camaraderie, education and spiritual enrichment.

"Our goal is that the seniors enjoy being together and participating in the activities," Breakfield said. "The spirits and faces of the people spoke volumes — everyone seemed to enjoy themselves."

Many of the attendees took advantage of the opportunity to participate in several of the recreational activities, including music trivia and a sing-along on the piano led by Mary Finlayson, a parishioner at Our Lady of Assumption Church in Charlotte; and a presentation on cooking with herbs and container gardening by Marta Carlson of Paradise Gardens.

Aside from an abundance of recreational activities, the seniors had several opportunities to focus on their health and well-being. Participants could have their blood pressure checked by Carole Cloer, a registered nurse from Interim Healthcare.

Cloer outlined the major concerns of senior citizens: health conditions such as high blood pressure, cardiac problems, stroke, arthritis and type II diabetes; medication costs; making their savings last; and not becoming a burden on their families.

Participants could also attend a safety seminar presented by Ron McKinney, chief of police in Cornelius.

There is a major difference between the generations, McKinney said. Seniors don't think in terms of being deceived. He cautioned the participants to be more aware when interacting with home-repair technicians and when using a credit card in public, and reminded them to inform the police department when going on vacation.

More health information came from Judy Fryer and Bob Sterr of Foot Solutions, who provided facts about choosing the proper footwear to provide stability, care of arthritic and diabetic feet and tips for healthy feet.

"We try to offer opportunities for fun and fellowship, but also add a learning component to the day," Breakfield said. "That way, there's something for everyone."

A planning committee, consisting of parishioners from five churches, meets each year to plan the Spring Fling, Breakfield said. They evaluate previous years' programs and decide which activities to include for the upcoming event, always trying to provide a variety of programs.

Breakfield said she could not coordinate the Spring Fling without the generosity of the presenters, all of whom volunteered their time, and the Knights of Columbus from St. Mark Church, who set up the church and classrooms for the event and cleaned up afterwards.

SAFETY TIPS FOR SENIORS

As people grow older, their chances of being victims of crime decreases dramatically. But a lifetime of experience, coupled with the physical problems associated with aging, often make older Americans fearful. Though they're on the lookout constantly for physical attack and burglary, they're not as alert to frauds and con games — the greatest crime threat to seniors' well-being and trust.

Want to conquer fear and prevent crime? Take these common-sense precautions.

Be Alert When Out and About

- Go with friends or family, not alone.
- Carry your purse close to your body, not dangling by the straps. Put your wallet in an inside coat or front pants pocket.
- Don't carry credit cards you don't need or large amounts of cash.
- Use direct deposit for Social Security and other regular checks.
- Whether you're a passenger or driver, keep car doors locked. Be particularly alert in parking lots and garages. Park near an entrance.
- Sit close to the driver or near the exit while riding the bus, train or subway.
- If someone or something makes you uneasy, trust your instincts and leave.

Make Your Home Safe and Secure

- Install good locks on doors and windows. Use them! Don't hide keys in mailboxes and planters or under doormats. Instead, leave an extra set of keys with a trusted neighbor or friend.
- Ask for photo identification from service or delivery people before letting them in. If you are the least bit worried, call the company to verify.
- Be sure your street address number is large, clear of obstruction, and well lighted so police and other emergency personnel can find your home quickly.
- Consider a home alarm system that provides monitoring for burglary, fire and medical emergencies.

Watch Out for Con Artists

- Don't fall for anything that sounds too good to be true — a free vacation; sweepstakes prizes; cures for cancer and arthritis; a low-risk, high-yield investment scheme.
- Never give your credit card, phone card, Social Security or bank account number to anyone over the phone. It's illegal for telemarketers to ask for these numbers to verify a prize or gift.
- Don't let anyone rush you into signing anything — an insurance policy, a sales agreement, a contract. Read it carefully and have someone you trust check it over.
- Beware of individuals claiming to represent companies, consumer organizations or government agencies that offer to recover lost money from fraudulent telemarketers for a fee.
- If you're suspicious, check it out with the police, the Better Business Bureau or local consumer protection office. Call the National Consumers League Fraud Information Center at (800) 876-7060.

Get Involved in the Community

- Report any crime or suspicious activities to law enforcement.
- Form a neighborhood watch to look out for each other and help the police.
- Work to change conditions that hurt your neighborhood. Volunteer as a citizen patroller, tutor for children, office aide in the police or fire departments, mentor for teens, escort for individuals with disabilities.

STEWARDS OF THE LORD

Catholics challenged to nurture God's gifts at conference

DULUTH, Ga. — More than 340 parish representatives from throughout the Southeast, including the Diocese of Charlotte, recently attended the Regional Stewardship Conference to gain insight on ways to make stewardship a way of life.

The conference, held at the Atlanta Marriot Gwinnett Place March 27, was sponsored by the dioceses of Charlotte, Raleigh, Charleston, S.C., and Savannah, Ga.

Five people attended from Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe, including Mary and John Pollick.

Mary Pollick, chairwoman of her parish's stewardship commission, said the conference allowed her group to exchange suggestions and contact information with others.

"We pulled ideas from other places that had successful ministries," she said.

Keynote speaker Bishop Robert Morneau, auxiliary bishop of Green Bay, Wis., talked about "Stewardship: An Expression of Our Christian Life."

The author of several books and essays, Bishop Morneau discussed the questions that he said kept him awake at night — "What have you done with the garden entrusted to you?" and "What return can I make to the Lord for all he's done for me?"

Stewardship, said the bishop, consists of "four unsplit infinitives, including gratefully receiving God's gifts."

"We are so blessed to have so many gifts," said Bishop Morneau. "And if I am to be a eucharistic person, then I have to give thanks to God for all he has given me."

Stewards must also responsibly nurture and tend God's gifts, said the bishop.

"You should not stay out of your gifted area too long," he said. "My biggest fear is getting to the gates of heaven and being told I was an eight-cylinder car but I only used two cylinders."

The bishop said stewards must also justly and charitably share God's gifts and return them abundantly.

In the Diocese of Green Bay, there are 380,000 Catholics in 186 parishes, he said, but one-third of those Catholics give "nothing — no time, no talent, no treasure."

"The concept of stewardship has the power to change the answer to the question: 'Who am I and what am I doing here?'" said Bishop Morneau.

The bishop spoke of a friend, a 44-year-old man who is quite wealthy. One day the man told the bishop that he was simply a "trustee" of his wealth, and that it all belonged to God.

"Stewardship is inclusive," said Bishop Morneau. "It's a way of life. It's not just finances, though that's a big part of it. It's impossible to have joy without generosity."

"All of us are stewards of our church and faith," said Pollick. "We need to take ownership of our parishes. When we do, we need to be good stewards of what we've been given and use our time, talent and treasure."

"We are radiators of God's love and light. We are revealers of God's beauty," said Bishop Morneau. "May we do that well."

Youth 'Fan into Flames'

Hundreds of youth learn power, love, self-control

BY KATHY SCHMUGGE
CORRESPONDENT

LAKE WYLIE, S.C. — The flames of faith were stoked among Catholic youth.

With beautiful weather and Lake Wylie as the backdrop, Camp Thunderbird was the perfect stage for hundreds of high school students to "Fan into Flames" their fervor for God at the 27th Annual Diocesan Youth Conference April 23-25.

"We are very impressed to see that these 300 youth and their leaders are such faithful and on fire Catholics," said Peg Ruble, associate director of diocesan youth ministry and an adult mentor of the Diocesan Youth Advisory Council, who helped organize the event.

The DYC is the largest annual diocesan gathering, bringing together high school youth from around the Diocese of Charlotte for a theme-centered weekend of keynote speakers, entertainment, daily Mass and reconciliation, and workshops led by youth and young adults.

This year's "Fan into Flames" theme was chosen by the Diocesan Youth Advisory Council, which consists of youth from all 10 vicariates of the diocese. The theme evolved after the youth read II Timothy (1:6-7): "For this reason, I remind you to stir into flames the gift of God that you have through the imposition of my hands. For God did not give us a spirit of cowardice but rather of power and love and self-control."

The weekend's workshops showed youth how to fan that flame through power, love and self-control.

"Timothy for Today," facilitated by Brendan Budlong, youth minister from the Diocese of Raleigh, covered the subheadings of the event's theme. He compared spiritual strength to physical strength, and told the youth they had to exercise their spiritual muscles by studying Scripture, learning their faith and attending other, similar conferences.

When he asked his audience to list ways the Catholic faith is unique, they responded with answers such as the Eucharist, Marian devotion, the papacy and priesthood and church tradition.

Budlong also explained the importance of prayer and how the Catholic Church has many different ways to converse with God, describing the Augustinian, Franciscan, Ignatius and Thomist prayer styles.

The "Wow! Now It Makes Sense" workshop was facilitated by Carl Brown, a licensed counselor, parishioner of Good Shepherd Church in King and adult mentor of the Diocesan Youth Advisory Council.

Brown empowered youth with information they could use to explain their faith in a simple and clear way.

"Now I will know what to tell people when they ask me questions about my faith," said Megan Peeters from St. John Neumann Church in Charlotte.

In "The Seven Deadly Sins" workshop, Rev. Mr. Mike Langsdoft of Holy Family Church in Clemmons explained and clarified the various sins, including lust.

"Lust is a desire for something for your own pleasure, disregarding the feelings of another," said Rev. Mr. Langsdorf. "God calls us into a relationship with him that is unbelievable. Put your vices aside, recognize them and seek forgiveness; then you will be free to live as God wants you to live."

Langsdorf's daughter, Beth, who started participating in diocesan youth conferences as a teenager, now works as an adult member on the Diocesan Youth Advisory Council. She was impressed at the program the youth put together and said that it was much more spiritual than what she remembered from her earlier experiences.

"The conference answered a lot more questions that the teens have about their religion," said Beth Langsdorf. "It also made learning the faith a fun and positive experience."

Friday evening Mass was concelebrated by Father Dean Cesa, pastor of St. John the Baptist Church in Tryon, and Father Frank Seabo, administrator of St. Margaret Mary Church in Swannanoa.

Saturday morning Mass was concelebrated by Augustinian Father James Cassidy, pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe, and Capuchin Father Stan Kobel, parochial vicar of St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis; Father John Putnam, judicial vicar and pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury; and Father Kobel concelebrated Mass for the youth on Sunday.

In addition to daily Mass and workshops, the weekend included a high ropes course challenge, a concert by the contemporary Christian band Silar's Bald and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament.

DYC imparts youth ministry awards

Awards were distributed to recognize outstanding efforts on behalf of youth ministry at the 27th Annual Diocesan Youth Conference April 23-25.

Youth ministers were recognized for five and 10 years of service with certifications and pins. Other awards include:

The Bishop William G. Curlin Award for Outstanding Pastoral Ministry went to the youth group of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury for their response to an accident involving two 15-passenger vans in Rowan County in fall 2003.

The Bishop Michael J. Begley Award for Outstanding Service to Church, Community and Family went to Zachary Carter of St. Barnabas Church in Arden.

Carter was selected for his participation in numerous parish and community groups and activities, fundraisers conferences and retreats, including his work as a youth representative on the parish pastoral council.

The Eagle and Cross Award for Service and Justice, a national recognition by the Federation for Catholic Youth Ministers, was presented to Michelle Lail of St. Mary Church in Shelby.

Lail assists in teaching more than 20 third- and fourth-grade students in St. Mary Church's faith formation program and has organized her school's Operation Christmas Angel program for less-fortunate children.

The For God and For Youth Award, a national recognition for adult leaders committed to executing holistic and healthy youth ministry, went to Father John Putnam, judicial vicar and pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury.

"Over the past 10 years, Father Putnam has always done what he could to promote youth ministry," said Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry. "He has an ecclesial mind, a sense for the broader church."

Catholics explore ancient form of prayer

Confirmation students move along the path of the labyrinth. Contemporary labyrinths combine ancient Christian tradition with modern music, meditations, art, media and activities at intervals along the path.

A traditional labyrinth is a circle 30-42 feet in diameter that is divided into quarters. These sections are interconnected so that when a traveler seems to be close to the center, an abrupt turn takes him or her on a longer meditative journey.

There has been a recent re-emergence of the labyrinth as a prayer tool within the Christian community.

According to Jacqueline Messick of St. Paul the Apostle Church in Greensboro, who coordinated a labyrinth walk for the parish in April 2003, the labyrinth is divided into three stages.

The walk to the center is the first stage and meant to be spent as a time of cleansing. The traveler tries to eliminate things that separate him or her from the divine; things like anger, self-pity and prejudice must be discarded along the way.

"This is accomplished through prayerful centering, which clears and prepares one to meet God," said Messick.

The second stage is at the center, where the traveler — having been cleansed of worldly encumbrances — opens his or her heart and mind to the Holy Spirit. It may be as simple as feelings of peace and calmness or as eye-opening as a sudden insight, said Messick. One must allow the Holy Spirit to speak to the soul.

The journey out is the third stage of the labyrinth. The traveler moves out into the world renewed in faith to do the work of Jesus and his church.

The contemporary version used by St. John Neumann Church was designed to explore several themes: journey, letting go, centering and incarnation.

Each station of the labyrinth explored an aspect of one of these themes, accompanied by a song, reading and activity.

For example, the third station, "Letting Go" encouraged participants to let go of their concerns by imagining that their worries were held in a stone, which they then dropped into a basin of water, imagining them falling into God's lap.

The exercise was designed to help students learn to turn to God in times of difficulty and realize they are a part of God's creation.

Other stations explored listening to God, seeing one's "true image" and reflecting on one's relationships with others.

"It is a different type of praying experience that gently reminds us that we are all pilgrims on a journey to the sacred center where God is," said Messick.

"(Walking the labyrinth) taught me more about forgiving people and brought me closer to God," confirmation candidate Tylicki said.

LABYRINTHS: AN ANCIENT TRADITION

Labyrinths and mazes

Mazes and a range of labyrinth designs are found all around the world in many cultures and civilizations. They are found carved in rock, ceramics, clay tablets, mosaics, manuscripts, stone patterns, turf, hedges and cathedral pavements. The earliest known designs are about 3000 years old.

The significance of them for the various cultures of which they were a part and the story of how they developed from one place to another (or simultaneously appeared in several) is often mysterious and hard to fathom. The most ancient and widespread design looks complicated but can be drawn quite easily if you know the method.

The labyrinth has since ancient times been associated with the legend of the Minotaur, the monster half-man, half-bull that dwelt in the heart of a labyrinth on the island of Crete. Theseus was able to get to the center of the labyrinth, slay the Minotaur and find his way out again by following the thread he had trailed behind him on the way in.

But the story has caused confusion ever since, because clearly the Minotaur's lair was a maze in which you could get lost, whereas a labyrinth, however confusing it looks, has only one twisting path that weaves its way to the center and back out again. There is only one entrance and exit, no dead ends, and no crossing of paths with a choice of which way to turn.

Parish prayer labyrinth

Parishioners at Prince of Peace Church in Plano, Texas, walk along a labyrinth as a contemplative form of prayer. The 36-square-foot canvas is modeled after a labyrinth on the floor of Chartres Cathedral in France.

Cathedral Labyrinths

The Romans adapted the ancient labyrinth symbol as a decorative floor pattern, and the Christian artists and thinkers of early medieval times developed the Roman pattern into a new and beautiful form, which was used as a feature in many medieval cathedrals. It was marked out on the floor in colored stone or tiles and usually between 10 and 40 feet in diameter.

A range of designs were explored, but the pattern used at Chartres Cathedral in northern France is the archetype and perfection of all medieval labyrinths. Fortunately it has been well-preserved, and in recent times pilgrims have taken to traveling to Chartres specifically to walk it.

While we cannot be exactly sure what the labyrinths were used for, they were clearly a symbol of the Christian way, representing the path of the soul through life. Medieval pilgrims re-enacted this, following the path of the labyrinth in the cathedral on their knees as a means of prayer, or to symbolize the journey to Jerusalem, or as a ritual to mark the end of a pilgrimage.

People walked it on the eve of their baptism or confirmation, as an aid to contemplative prayer in Holy Week, and as an illustration both of the life of the Christian and of the life of Christ. But after medieval times the spiritual uses of labyrinths were forgotten, and they fell into disuse. Many were destroyed between the 17th and 19th centuries.

Contemporary Labyrinths

In recent years, labyrinths have been rediscovered as a Christian spiritual tool, most notably through the work of Dr. Lauren Artress at Grace Cathedral in San Francisco, which has had worldwide influence. The labyrinths of the current revival have mostly been based on the Chartres pattern, although often adapted to suit circumstances. Many of the new wave of "alternative worship" groups in the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand have incorporated labyrinths into the forms of worship that they are pioneering.

The result is a contemporary version of a cathedral labyrinth, which combines ancient Christian tradition with contemporary music, meditations, art, media and activities at intervals along the path. Several features are unique to the design:

- It is a new labyrinth pattern rather than one of the old patterns, with straight lines instead of curves, which make it much easier to mark out.
- It incorporates "stations" and activities en route.
- To walk it, the participant listens to a series of music tracks with spoken meditations on a personal CD player.
- It blends the ancient practice of labyrinth walking with contemporary popular culture — music, televisions, computers and things from everyday life. This use of what might be termed "icons of the present" suggests that the holy can be represented in the language of the here-and-now, of which popular culture is a significant part. God meets us in the stuff of everyday life, in the real world.

The result is not, in any normal sense, a church service, but an interactive environment resembling a contemporary art installation, self-evidently constructed and playful, with visitors coming and going as they please during opening hours. However, this installation offers more than an aesthetic experience — it will take you on a spiritual journey.

By Catholics for Catholics

Writers Bosco and Weigel give testimony on their faith

REVIEWED BY MITCH FINLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

In the midst of the controversy and record-breaking attendance for the film "The Passion of the Christ," which focuses on Jesus' suffering and death, it's exciting to read a book that focuses on a relationship with the risen Christ.

In "One Day He Beckoned: One Woman's Story of the Difference Jesus Made," author Antoinette Bosco — an award-winning Catholic writer, a veteran Catholic News Service columnist and my friend — tells the story of how the risen Lord has been the central influence in her life.

Bosco begins by telling how Jesus brought himself to her attention when she was 15 years old and hasn't left her heart since. Along the way she tells true stories from her own life, stories that eschew the sweetly inspirational pious messages of some religion writers.

Instead, Bosco tells us real stories about how Jesus entered her life through a failed marriage, through the suicide of one son and murder of another, through time spent praying in her home cathedral or reading the lives of the saints, through the influence of her father and of The Christophers founder Maryknoll Father James Keller, and last, but far from least, through her work over the years as a journalist.

Bosco writes about her past — her history with Jesus, if you will — but her book also focuses on contemporary issues. For example, she declares rightly that Jesus "respected women, and bypassing male attitudes of the day, regarded them as intelligent people who were as privy to his teachings as were men. ... He beckons us with a hard offer. You follow me and I'll give you a heart transplant so you can be me."

"One Day He Beckoned" is more than the author's personal story. It's an account of a life lived as a faithful, thinking Catholic, a story of one woman's life with Jesus that will reinvigorate your own faith a hundred-fold.

George Weigel is the best-selling biographer of Pope John Paul II, a theologian and a prolific writer who rarely, if ever, disappoints. In "Letters to a Young Catholic" Weigel aims to explain for "young Catholics — and not-so-young Catholics, and indeed curious souls of any religious persuasion or none — what it means to be a Catholic today."

Weigel chose as his method "to take an epistolary tour of the Catholic world, or at least those parts of the Catholic world that have shaped (his) own understanding of the church, its people, its teaching and its way of life."

Join Weigel, then, as he travels from Baltimore, Md., to Milledgeville, Ga., St. Peter's in Rome, Jerusalem, the Olde Cheshire Cheese pub in London and other noteworthy locations on the Catholic map. Taking each place as his inspiration, he explains Catholicism not as an abstraction but as a real way of life for real people who live in the real world.

Along the way, Weigel makes everything from history to Christian doctrines and traditional Catholic devotional practices come alive. If Weigel's take on being Catholic is sometimes a tad too far right of center for some readers, his breadth and depth of knowledge demand to be taken seriously.

Weigel does a first-rate job of injecting new life into what it means to be Catholic, and both younger and older readers will appreciate his clarity of insight.

Noteworthy is the way he packs abundant insight into relatively few words on the role of the mother of Jesus in Catholicism: "Mary is the first disciple of the son she bore and nursed and raised; because all Christians are grafted onto Christ in baptism, Mary is the Mother of the Church, the mystical body of Christ extended into history. Through Mary's 'fiat' we glimpse one of the primary lessons of discipleship, a lesson it takes a lifetime to learn. And the lesson is that we are not in charge of our lives — God is in charge of our lives."

"Letters to a Young Catholic" is guaranteed to keep you turning the pages. Though you may not agree with all that Weigel says, you'll find yourself struck again and again with the wisdom of his insights.

WORD TO LIFE

SUNDAY SCRIPTURE READINGS: MAY 9, 2004

Sunday Scripture Readings: May 9, 2004

May 9, Fifth Sunday of Easter Cycle C. Readings:

1) Acts 14:21-27
Psalm 145:8-13
2) Revelation 21:1-5a
3) Gospel: John 13:31-33a, 34-35

BY JEFF HENSLEY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Seldom do any particular Sunday's readings line up so beautifully to give an overview of the life of the church as they do this particular day. The psalm reminds us of God's mercy and compassion, admonishing us to make his dominion known to all the generations.

In the Gospel, Jesus admonishes us to love one another with the same love with which he has loved us so that those who see our love for each other will know we are his disciples. In Acts, Paul (after being revived by the prayer of his disciples after a stoning) goes about encouraging the church and establishing church communities, raising up presbyters. And in Revelation we have the establishment of a new heaven and a new earth, and the presentation of a new Jerusalem in which God shall dwell among his people, wiping away every tear. It's a pretty complete picture.

It helps us answer the question, How did we accumulate so much hierarchical structure and order? How did we come so far from simply loving each other? Furthermore, where is all of this leading?

Each part is necessary. We must hear God's promise of mercy and compassion to all generations. We must hold fast to the central message of living out our love in the flesh as Jesus did. We need structure and order to be able to carry the message forward to the generations, and we must know that, in the end, God himself will finish the story, bringing about the perfection of all things in love.

For 200 years, after the Westerners were driven out of Japan, there was no visible church there. A complex system of catechists and prayer leaders was established by the remnants of the Japanese Catholic Church to keep the faith alive in the absence of priests. One leader would be in formation for five years while another was leading the community in covert prayers and instruction. Then the leader in formation would take over while forming another prayer leader under his instruction.

When Japan was reopened to Western contact in the mid-1800s after two centuries of intense persecution, the faith that tells us to love with the love of Jesus had survived. Faithfulness of God; love of one another with Jesus' love; structure to carry it forward. God brings the ultimate things to pass. It is a pattern we can trust.

Question:

How can keeping in mind that love of other believers is one of the last things Jesus told his disciples to do help to clear away distractions from living out your faith?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"I give you a new commandment: Love one another" (John 13:34a).

Movie Capsules

"Man on Fire" (20th Century Fox)
Dark and depraved revenge tale about an ex-soldier of fortune turned professional bodyguard (Denzel Washington), who unleashes his lethal fury on a ring of Mexican kidnappers after they abduct the little girl (Dakota Fanning) he has been hired to protect. As directed by Tony Scott, the film poses interesting questions concerning sin and forgiveness, but its superficial theological pretensions quickly give way to a grisly procession of torture and death, which, though unbearable to watch at times, ends on a redemptive note. Excessive graphic violence, a rationalization of vengeance, much rough and crude language, and a suicide. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is O — morally offensive. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

"Johnson Family Vacation" (Fox Searchlight)
Tiresome comedy in which a family patriarch (Cedric the Entertainer) piles his wife (Vanessa Williams) and kids and travels cross-country from California to Missouri for a family reunion, on the way sidelined by several obstacles. Director Christopher Erskin's film runs out of gas before it backs out of the driveway with contrived scenarios, jokes about as funny as a flat tire and an underused cast lost on the uneven script's road. A few sexual references, some scatological humor and fleeting drug content. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

TOLEDO, Ohio — There's one more actor in the famed Murray clan that begat Oscar-nominated Bill Murray and Brian Doyle-Murray: their sister, Dominican Sister Nancy Murray, who does a one-woman show on St. Catherine of Siena.

St. Catherine was a woman of her time but also a woman who transcended her time, according to Sister Nancy.

"In reading her letters, I found this feisty, spirited woman who was both affectionate and straightforward," she told the Catholic Chronicle, Toledo's diocesan newspaper.

"She would start a letter to a prostitute, for example, very formally, like, 'I implore you in the name of Jesus Christ and his holy mother to act your age, take to heart what it means to be an example to young people.' Then she'd write 'You must not forget that you have a good heart,' ending with a loving, warm affirmation," Sister Nancy said.

It's obvious she has an appreciation of her subject and for her subject's hardships and her humanity.

Sister Nancy said more than 400 of the saint's letters exist.

"Some are to her mother who's complaining that none of her children — Catherine was the 24th of 25 — visit her. And some letters are to her brother, admonishing him for not visiting their mother. There were difficult issues in her life, too," she said.

Sister Nancy to date has done more than 200 performances of the one-woman show on the saint. Her schedule this spring included stops in Ohio, Wisconsin, New York, New Jersey and Georgia.

This summer she will take the play to the Philippines, East Timor, South Vietnam, Peru and Italy.

"Some Italian sisters have invited me to perform, saying, 'We want to give this saint back to the youth of this country. They don't have a clue about her,'" Sister Nancy said.

"There is a personality here no one had told us about," she said of St. Catherine. As they watch the play, "people have found in her this fire and spark, and it has resonated across the world," she added.

It's no surprise the energetic Sister Nancy could play the feisty saint to such acclaim. Indeed, being the oldest daughter in a large family sharpened her sense of the absurd, she said.

In her years as a religious Sister Nancy has had many jobs, including high school drama teacher, director of vocations and campus minister.

She entered the Dominicans in Adrian, Mich., in 1966 at age 18 and received her bachelor's degree in theater from Barry University in Miami. Her master's degree in pastoral studies is from Loyola University of Chicago, her hometown.

Combining love of theater and love of people with her spirituality is rewarding, Sister Nancy said.

"I always knew I had to do something that involved people, something with a lot of variety. I was 12 years old when I told my father I wanted to meet everyone in the world," she said. "He told me, 'Nance, you won't like them all.' And I told him that wouldn't matter."

Traveling the world to introduce St. Catherine to others has been a journey, she said. "People can have a stereotype of a sister's life. This helps give them a realistic picture."

Sister Nancy added, "We must not be afraid of the influences in the world. We have to believe that God continues to call individuals to himself and that he can work with it. He has redeemed the world, and that redemption is ongoing."

Bishops receive new liturgy instructions

Communion is given under both kinds, that is under forms of both bread and wine.

The instruction says the wine is to be poured into different chalices before it is consecrated, to avoid spilling consecrated wine during the transfer from one vessel to another.

Msgr. Moroney said the wine could still be brought up to the altar in a larger container at the presentation of the gifts, but then it should be distributed into the chalices during the preparation of the gifts, not just before Communion when it has already been consecrated.

Father Ronald Krisman, a former executive director of the Secretariat for Liturgy, raised the objection that the U.S. practice of distributing the consecrated wine into separate chalices at the time of the breaking of the bread has been adopted as particular law in the United States, in a provision approved by the Holy See March 22, 2002. It is a principle of church law that where there is a conflict between approved law and an instruction, the approved law prevails, he said.

But Msgr. Moroney said the Vatican congregation decided that change was needed after hearing concerns from around the world about occasional accidents that resulted in spilling the sacred species while transferring it to the chalices at Communion time.

Another instruction says any collection money or symbolic gifts for the poor brought up at the presentation of gifts "should be placed in an appropriate place which should be away from the eucharistic table."

Msgr. Moroney said parishes with deacons would have to look at an instruction that suggests deacons wear the dalmatic, an outer vestment similar to the priest's chasuble, when he is assisting at Mass.

The instruction reiterates the norm in the new General Instruction of the Roman Missal that all priests at a Mass should either concelebrate or "wear their proper choir dress or a surplice over a cassock," setting them apart from the laity in attendance. Before the new general instruction, it was not uncommon for priests attending Mass in the United States to sit in the pews in street dress if they were not concelebrating, he said.

The document insists laity called upon to distribute Communion should be called "extraordinary ministers of holy Communion." It says "Communion" must be used because only the priest can properly be called a "minister of the Eucharist" and it rejects "special" as a substitute word for the technical term "extraordinary." In church parlance, priests and deacons are "ordinary" ministers of Communion because it is one of the rights and duties attached to ordination; by calling the others "extraordinary" the church simply means that their participation in this ministry is not ordinary.

The instruction says even if extraordinary ministers are regularly used, whenever an extra priest or deacon is present he should be the first to be called upon; extraordinary ministers should be used only when all available ordained ministers are brought up and there is still additional need.

Msgr. Moroney said one of the abuses cited in the instruction as particularly serious is pouring the remainder of the Precious Blood after Mass into the sacrarium, the special sink in a church sacristy that feeds directly into the ground instead of into the waste-water system.

The instruction says anyone who throws away the consecrated wine or bread is automatically excommunicated under Canon 1367 of the Code of Canon Law, and pouring the sacred species into the sacrarium violates that canon.

Elsewhere the instruction says that all consecrated wine left over after Communion is to be consumed by the priest or another minister. The chalice is then to be cleaned and dried with the purificator, a linen cloth.

USCCB Publishing, the bishops' publishing office, said April 23 that it will publish the new instruction. It suggested visiting the bishops' Web site, www.usccb.org, for ordering information.

Sacred vessels used at Mass include, clockwise from left, a chalice, ciborium and paten. According to the new Vatican document on liturgy, vessels for the Lord's body and blood "must be made in strict conformity with the norms of tradition and of the liturgical books." Common vessels, those lacking in quality or devoid of all artistic merit, those made from glass, earthenware, clay, or other materials that break easily, should not be used, according to the document.

Straight talk about wills

BY GINA RHODES
SPECIAL TO THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

If you die without a will or other such document, the state will decide how to disburse your estate. And if you have minor children, the state will decide who will raise and care for them.

If you want to leave certain assets to specific persons or make charitable gifts to various causes, then you must have a will. If you die without a will, the state will follow its own agenda.

Each state has its own written policies for the distribution of your estate. So much will go here and so much there — places and persons for whom you may not want to provide. The state will assign someone to oversee the administration of your estate.

It will all be done "by the book." No special gifts to your parish, the diocese, the Foundation, Catholic school, agency or other causes you would want to honor. No special gifts to people outside your family. No concern for your thoughts on the size of any bequests.

Just imagine the difficulties this may cause for your family and friends. Imagine the added expense for this oversight. Imagine people you never knew making decisions on your behalf.

There are many reasons people never prepare a will: fear of death, uncertainty about estate distribution, family conflicts, difficulty doing an estate inventory, inconvenience, expense, procrastination, no lawyer and so forth. However, the plain fact is, every excuse is a bad one if it causes you to die without a will.

You don't need all the answers to get a will started. You can start with what you know and make changes and additions later. It's better to have something workable in place that reflects your wishes than nothing at all.

To help you create a valid will, I have put together a "Will Information Kit" that includes brochures and suggestions to prepare you for a conference with your attorney. This kit is interesting and informative, and it is free for the asking.

Do you have an estate-planning attorney who can assist you? Talk to your trusted friends and see whom they use. Another possibility is to contact a local bank for their recommendations. In any case, I urge you to get legal assistance so you can have peace of mind, knowing your will has been drafted properly.

For more information regarding wills, please contact me, Gina Rhodes, at (704) 370-3320 or gmrhodes@charlottediocese.org. I look forward to hearing from you soon.

Sister Elizabeth Berry, former Greensboro resident, dies

EMMITSBURG, Md. — Daughter of Charity Sister Elizabeth Berry died April 11, 2004 at Villa St. Michael, the province's retirement residence. She was 91.

Born Mary Elizabeth as one of 13 children in Middlesboro, Ky., Sister Berry moved to Greensboro with her family. She graduated from St. Joseph's

High School in Emmitsburg, Md., in 1930. She attended the University of North Carolina's Business College in Greensboro and the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., where she received a bachelor's degree in nursing in 1948.

She earned a master's degree in hospital administration from St. Louis University in St. Louis, Mo., in 1951.

Sister Berry worked as her father's bookkeeper and secretary in the family business, the Berry Coal Company (later known as Berico Fuels, Inc.) for several years before entering the Daughters of Charity in 1938.

After completing her seminary in 1939, she worked as a bookkeeper and in healthcare for many years in New York, Missouri and Washington, D.C. In 1952, she was appointed administrator and local superior of Providence Hospital in Detroit, Mich., where she remained until she was sent to DePaul Medical Center in Norfolk, Va., and served in the same duty there until 1962.

Ever mindful of social justice, Sister Berry requested permission to serve in the missionary field. She left for Bolivia in February 1962 and ministered there for 23 years.

After her return to the United States in 1985, Sister Berry served briefly at Our Lady of the Valley Church in Langley, S.C., before being assigned to the pastoral care department at Providence Hospital in Washington, D.C., where she remained for 11 years. In 1997, when her health began to decline, Sister Berry returned to Emmitsburg and became a resident of the Villa.

Memorial contributions may be made to the Daughters of Charity Support Fund for the Elderly and Infirm Sisters, 333 S. Seton Avenue, Emmitsburg, MD 21727.

ORB feeds local projects

CHARLOTTE — Each Lent, parishes and schools in the Diocese of Charlotte participate in Operation Rice Bowl (ORB), the Catholic Relief Services (CRS) program of prayer, fasting, learning and giving.

The majority of funds from the ORB collection go to the national CRS office for anti-poverty programs worldwide, with the balance remaining in the diocese. From this share, the diocesan CRS committee sponsors a mini-grants program for local initiatives on international issues or projects. The project or program can be part of a larger initiative.

Grants of up to $500 will be awarded to projects that cover a range of international, immigrant or migrant issues; reflect a social justice or empowerment component; represent a range of approaches (e.g., education, advocacy, media, linking faith and justice); and will be incorporated into parish, school or organization life.

To be eligible for a grant, a project must satisfy the following criteria:

1. It must be carried out under the auspices of a Catholic organization, such as a parish, parish faith formation program, school, campus ministry or vicariate organization.

2. It must undertake an initiative dealing with Catholic social teaching and action on issues of international justice and peace, or with local immigrant or migrant issues.

3. At the end of the grant cycle, grant recipients will submit a one- to two-page typewritten evaluation describing the project, its accomplishments and how well the group or organization met its goals with the grant money.

Applications must be postmarked by May 15, 2004. Mail to: Terri Jarina, Program Director, Parish Social Ministry, Office of Justice and Peace, CSS, Diocese of Charlotte, 1123 South Church Street, Charlotte, NC 28203-4003.

Not without a doubt

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

After all the weeks of a solemn Lent, what a wonderful relief to embrace the joy of the paschal season. We think of Lent, and certainly Holy Week, as a time of prayer and penance, but it occurs to me that we sometimes ignore the range and depth of emotions revealed in the Gospel stories of the Passion of Jesus.

Consider the wild enthusiasm of the crowds who cheered Jesus as they welcomed him triumphantly into Jerusalem. Consider the depths of agony he endured in the garden on the Mount of Olives. He anticipated the betrayal of Judas, his friend, and the denial of Peter, the rock of his church.

Consider not only the brutal physical pain of the passion that Jesus faced, but also the fear and despair of his disciples.

And their doubt. After all, Jesus' followers had heard about God's loving mercy, after all the miracles they had seen, how could their hopes end in the most ignominious death the Roman Empire could impose? Surely, the faith of the disciples was as shaken as, I think, mine would have been.

But then came Sunday morning. The faithful women went to the tomb to finish anointing Jesus — and it was empty. What happened next not only shook them but also changed our world forever.

"Suddenly two men in dazzling robes stood beside them ... (and) said to them, 'Why do you look for the living among the dead? He is not here, but has risen.'" (Luke 24:4-5)

And the women believed it. But not everyone would accept it when they heard the news.

"Now it was Mary Magdalene ... and the other women... who told this to the apostles. But these words seemed to them an idle tale, and they did not believe them." (Luke 24:10-11)

I can imagine these guys thinking, "Poor women. They're just imagining things. Of course, we'd love to believe them, but it can't be true!"

So God, as usual, came to the rescue.

"Jesus came and stood among them and said, 'Peace be with you.' After He said this, He showed them His hands and His side. Then the disciples rejoiced when they saw the Lord." (John 20:19-20)

Then came the incident that has been synonymous with doubt ever since: "But Thomas ... was not with them when Jesus came. So the other disciples told him, 'We have seen the Lord.' But he said to them, 'Unless I see the mark of the nails in His hands, and put my finger in the mark of the nails and my hand in His side, I will not believe.' A week later his disciples were again in the house, and Thomas was with them. ... Jesus came and stood among them and said, 'Peace be with you.' Then He said to Thomas, '... Reach out your hand and put it in my side. Do not doubt but believe.' Thomas answered him, 'My Lord and my God!' Jesus said to him, 'Have you believed because you have seen me? Blessed are those who have not seen and yet have come to believe." (John 20:24-29)

Many people have doubts at different times. And that uncertainty can be frightening. Certainly, God wants us to believe, just as he wants us to hope and to love. But he understands us better than we do ourselves. After all, God created us with reason and free will. He expects us to use our minds as well as our hearts. Never be afraid to think about God.

There's a quote that's said to have been found cut into the walls of a Nazi concentration camp: "I believe in the sun even when it is not shining. I believe in love even when I feel it not. I believe in God even when He is silent."

Peace be with you!

Trust in God brings comfort in times of loss, loneliness, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — During times of loneliness or loss, trust in God brings comfort, said Pope John Paul II at his weekly general audience in St. Peter's Square.

On a warm and sunny spring day April 28, the pope reflected on Psalm 27, which he said illustrates the psalmist's trust and hope in God despite his facing much tribulation.

The psalm shows that "there is an aggressive evil in the world which has Satan as its guide and inspiration," the pope said.

Yet despite the threat of adversaries and even abandonment by his parents, the psalmist displays "the serene faith of the believer," he said.

"Even in solitude and with the loss of one's dearly beloved, the psalmist never is completely alone because merciful God kneels before him," he said.

The pope said this particular psalm has special meaning for those people who have been forgotten or abandoned by family and society.

The Pope Speaks

"To all the elderly, the sick, those forgotten by all, to those who will never be caressed by another, let us remember these words by the psalmist and prophet, so that they may feel the paternal and maternal hand of the Lord silently touch with love their suffering faces, perhaps lined with tears," the pope said.

The pope spoke in a clear voice as he read small portions of a one-and-a-half-page catechesis. Before praying the "Regina Coeli," he offered greetings in 10 different languages to the tens of thousands of pilgrims gathered in the square.

Mothers never die

Guest Column

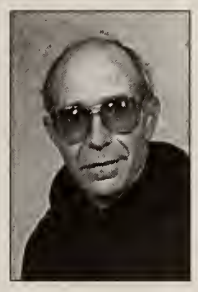
FATHER JOHN AURILIA, OFM Cap



There is something special about a mother. More than any other person, she lends herself to sentimentality and poetry. That's not surprising, because she brought us into existence and cared for us in our helpless years called infancy.

When we made the first leap of faith called the first fearful step, she was there. She was also there when we uttered the first word, chopping up consonants and vowels at the same time. The list may go on endlessly. We feel that our mother is always alive in our lives, even when her body lies in the grave and her soul enjoys heaven.

Abraham Lincoln has been quoted as saying: "All that I am or hope to be, I owe to my angel mother." It is right to give thanks and praise to our mothers with the joyful celebration of Mother's Day, which has a long and interesting history.

The Encyclopedia Britannica informs us that ancient Greeks as well as Asians were honoring Rhea, the mother of all gods. That tradition was christianized and became the Mother Church. The "she" pronoun used to designate the Catholic Church is not an accident.

In the United States, Mother's Day began in 1872 with Julia Ward Howe. The least we can do is to dedicate one day a year to the most important person in our lives: our mother. The best we can do is to honor our mother every day of our lives.

As I think of Mother's Day, I find myself facing a difficult question: What can be said about mothers that has not been said a thousand times or more? The answer is: probably nothing. However, things need to be said not because they are new, but because they are true.

I wish to make clear that mothers are very important, but they are not all angels or saints (mine is!). Mothers are people too. We are inclined to idealize mothers to the point of making them unreal. The mother for me is the person who meets our needs and she herself has needs as well. Mothers get lonely and need friendship, they get tired and need rest, they get hurt and need healing, they are misunderstood and they need love.

There is a beautiful description of a mother recorded in the Second Book of Kings. The title is "The Shunammite's son restored to life." About the upcoming year, Elisha said, "You will hold a son in your arms."

"No, my Lord," she objected. "Don't mislead your servant, o man of God!"

But the woman became pregnant, and the next year about that same time she gave birth to a son, just as Elisha had told her. The child grew, and one day he went out to his father, who was with the reapers.

"My head! My head!" he said to his father.

His father told a servant, "Carry him to his mother."

After the servant had lifted him up and carried him to his mother, the boy sat on her lap until noon, and then he died. " (II Kings 4:14–18)

Fortunately, the sad story has an happy ending: Elisha brought her son back to life, but the picture of that mother, who held her son for hours, is the perfect statue of courage and heroism. We are not talking here about muscle and brawn. We are talking about character and strength. This life is no bowl of cherries, but the ability to keep on going when everything inside of you wants to quit.

Just like the son who did not want to get up and go to school. His mother said: "Rise and shine. Don't be late for your first day back to school."

The son answers: "I don't want to go, I have a stomachache, my head hurts and I think I have a fever. Anyway, give me two reasons why I should go to school."

The mother promptly replies: "First, you are 42 years old. Second, you are the principal of the school."

Don't forget: Mother knows best and she deserves our love, our attention, as well as the best gift.

John Whitehall, a wealthy Texan, wanted to send his mother an unusual, expensive gift for Mother's Day. The owner of a pet shop told him of a mynah bird worth well over $10,000.

"What makes this bird so valuable?" asked Whitehall.

The owner responded, "This mynah bird is the only one in the world that can recite the Lord's Prayer, the 23rd Psalm and 1 Corinthians 13."

"I'll take it," said the Texan. "I don't care how much it costs. Mother is worth it and will get so much comfort hearing it recite Scripture."

So he wrote a check and had it shipped off to his mother. The Monday after Mother's Day, he called her long distance. "Did you get my present?"

"I certainly did, and thank you."

"And how did you like the bird?

"Oh son, it was delicious!"

My friends, there are two special people in our lives: your mother and mine.

Don't postpone joy!

Spirituality for Today

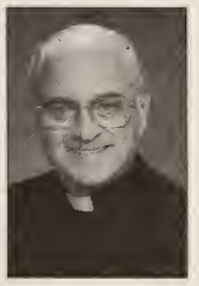
FATHER JOHN CATOIR CNS Columnist



We've all heard this slogan before: Don't postpone joy! But does it mean don't put off your next expensive vacation? Or don't forget to shop for a new outfit?

Obviously, it must mean more than acquiring things or experiences.

Happiness is not something that comes from the outside world, like a martini on New Year's Eve. Eating, drinking and acquiring temporal goods can be uplifting for a time. Getting money and power will surely lift your spirits temporarily, but when you lose your job, or your big car, or your house, that kind of happiness evaporates.

There is a deeper happiness — which comes from within — called joy. It is a way of life! Joy is more the byproduct of a meaningful life than a temporary state of euphoria.

What does "Don't postpone joy" mean to someone like Mother Teresa? She taught us so much by her own example because she listened attentively to Jesus who said: "Seek first the kingdom of God, and everything else will be given to you.... I tell you this that your joy may be full." She followed him.

Jesus taught us that joy will come by forgiving when you feel resentful, by being kind when you want to be mean, by persevering when you want to quit, by beginning again when others have ruined your plans, by giving your best when no one pays the slightest attention to your best efforts.

Mother Teresa put it more poetically:

"People are often unreasonable, illogical and self-centered;

"Forgive them anyway.

"If you are kind, people may accuse you of selfish, ulterior motives;

"Be kind anyway.

"If you are successful, you will win some false friends and some true enemies;

"Be successful anyway.

"If you are honest and frank, people may cheat you;

"Be honest and frank anyway.

"What you spend years building, someone could destroy overnight;

"Build anyway.

"If you find serenity and happiness, they may be jealous;

"Be happy anyway.

"The good you do today, people will often forget tomorrow;

"Do good anyway.

"Give the world the best you have, and it may never be enough;

"Give the world your best anyway.

"You see, in the final analysis it is between you and God;

"It was never between you and them anyway."

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN CNS Columnist

Q. Seven years ago I filed bankruptcy, and my debts were discharged. Am I required to pay these debts in order to forgive the sin of being careless with God's blessings?

I will not likely have the money to pay them off; it amounts to a great sum, and my salary now is just enough to live on. Other people in my life think I have an obligation to go back and take care of these debts. (Ohio)

A. First, if you took reasonable care of your finances before your bankruptcy and did not plan to defraud your creditors, there is no sin to forgive. Recent years have seen a great increase in personal and commercial bankruptcies. I'm sure in most of them the individuals responsible say to themselves, with hindsight: "If only I had done this, or that, results would have been different."

Harsh as it may sound, however, bad financial judgments, incompetence or just "bad luck" may result in a lot of pain, but they are not sins.

After bankruptcy is declared, all possessions are disposed of according to the requirements of civil law. These dispositions, including any properties the insolvent individual is allowed to retain for personal and family support, for example, are morally binding, as long as there is nothing intrinsically sinful involved.

In the United States, the common juridical opinion is that all debts are contracted with the implied condition that they will be canceled in case of an honest bankruptcy. In other words, a voluntary forgiveness of the person's debts is assumed.

The common language in the law is that "a discharge in bankruptcy shall release a bankrupt from all his provable debts." This language, and the practice of our courts in applying it, gives solid basis for the moral opinion that after a legitimate bankruptcy all debts are canceled in conscience as well as in law.

Again, malicious or "arranged" bankruptcy that deliberately defrauds someone else does not excuse from restitution. Such sinful intent, however, is never to be presumed without weighty evidence.

Homemade wine for Mass?

Q. May homemade wine be used at Mass? (New York)

A. Yes. Wine for the Eucharist should be pure, natural, unadulterated grape wine, that is, with no preservatives, flavoring or other additives. As long as it is made this way, it makes no difference whether it is produced commercially or at home. (General Instruction of the Roman Missal, 322)

St. Barnabas Church celebrates decades of growth for Arden Catholics

File Photo

St. Barnabas Church in Arden expanded its facility in 1994 to accommodate parish growth, 10 years after the dedication of a new church building.

ARDEN — The history of St. Barnabas Church began in 1964, when a structure in Arden was purchased from local Baptists for use as a Catholic church. The first Mass was celebrated in November of that year, and the new church was dedicated by then-Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh a month later. Thirty-six families made up that early church community.

Originally designated as a mission of St. Lawrence Church in Asheville, St. Barnabas Church was first served by Msgr. George Lynch, who later became auxiliary bishop of the Diocese of Raleigh. The congregation of 50 families later welcomed Oblate Father Joseph Maule as the first pastor when the church attained parish status in early 1966. Oblate Father Joseph Cutter became pastor in 1968, and St. Barnabas Church continued to flourish in both spirituality and in numbers.

The parish not only saw its first holy Communion and confirmation classes receive their respective sacraments, but it also soon formed a pastoral committee, ladies' guild and musicians group, all of which became vital to the church community.

Long-range planning took place during the 1970s to coincide with a continuing influx of Catholics settling in the Arden area. Meanwhile, efforts to pay off the church mortgage were completed by 1976, thus allowing the parish to attend more closely to expansion projects. A residence for the pastor was purchased, and in 1980, land transfers brought the construction of a new church facility a step closer to reality.

The original building was sold, and the parish celebrated Mass under a tent and in a roller skating rink during the construction of a new church.

The parish welcomed its third pastor, Jesuit Father Frank Bourbon, in June 1982, and four months later then-Bishop Michael J. Begley of Charlotte granted permission to proceed with building plans. A groundbreaking ceremony took place Sept. 19, 1983.

In 1984, the parish saw the completion of the new St. Barnabas Church, which was dedicated by Bishop Begley on July 22. With a church featuring a native stone sanctuary wall, a locally crafted crucifix and educational facilities, the parish now had a spiritual home reflecting the beauty of both faith and the North Carolina mountains.

Father Bourbon was reassigned in September 1984 and Jesuit Father Joseph Newell became the fourth pastor of St. Barnabas Church. As the years passed, the St. Barnabas Church religious education program was enhanced. During the 1980s came the expansion of the parish's Cursillo and Knights of Columbus council (named after Father Maule).

During this period, the church also celebrated the ordination of its first deacon, Rev. Mr. Art Kingsley in July 1988 and the ordination and first Mass of one of the parish's own, Father Joseph Mack in May 10, 1989. When Father Newell was reassigned, Father John Schneider became the church's pastor in July 1990. By that time, the parish had grown to 300 families.

For the next several years, Father Schneider continued the devoted work of his predecessors, forming and developing an enthusiastic youth ministry comprised of middle and high school students.

Ever-increasing in size and participation, the parish began to explore the possibility of again expanding the facility in February 1990. After a lengthy series of meetings, the project was underway. New classrooms, offices, meeting rooms and an expanded library highlighted the augmentation of the church. In July 1994, then-Bishop William G. Curlin blessed the expansion, 10 years after the dedication of the new St. Barnabas Church.

Father Schneider served as pastor to some 620 households that made up the religious, educational, social and, in part, administrative strengths of St. Barnabas Church. With its enthusiastic variety of committees, ministries, groups and projects, the parish offered a spirited affirmation of service as a faith community.

Father Roger Arnsparger was assigned as administrator in July 1999. On Oct. 24 of that year, the church doors were symbolically "sealed" as St. Barnabas Church began its Jubilee 2000 celebration, getting a head start on a similar ceremony that took place in the Vatican on the first Sunday in Advent. The doors of St. Barnabas Church and St. Peter's Basilica in Rome both were unsealed on Christmas Eve of that year. Father Arnsbarger, now pastor, blessed the parish's "Jubilee Doors."

In November 1999, parishioners made 15 quilts and sent them to victims of Hurricane Floyd in Goldsboro, N.C.

The parish continued expansion of religious education to youth and adults. Each year has seen "Parish Vision Meetings" to assist parishioners with effective evangelization of the parish. The church's Respect Life Committee has increased its pro-life apostolate through prayer, direct services, education and legislative efforts.

The church hosts two Rachel's Vineyard Post-Abortive Healing Retreats annually and sponsors "Triumph of the Cross," an annual Catholic conference, and a Catholic Men's Conference. On March 10, 2003, the church began perpetual adoration of the Eucharist.

The parish now consists of 760 families. Because of projected future growth, the parish has purchased five acres of adjacent land and plans are being made for improved access and additional facilities for the church's work.

New poll shows growing shift toward pro-life position

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The results of a new poll indicate increasing support for a pro-life position, according to representatives of several pro-life organizations.

The April 15-17 poll conducted by Zogby International showed that 56 percent of those responding said that abortion should never be legal or be legal only when the mother's life is in danger or in cases of rape and incest.

Forty-two percent of the respondents said abortion should be legal for any reason

Catholics, Lutherans look back, forward as dialogue ends one phase

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WAUWATOSA, Wis. — As Lutheran and Catholic scholars completed five years of work on a document about their churches' structures and ministries, they looked back on the 10 rounds of dialogue that began in 1965 and ahead in anticipation of the 11th topic for discussion.

"In working toward church unity, the challenge is to find a common lens that bypasses old differences," Susan Wood, a dialogue participant and professor at St. John's University in Collegeville, Minn., told the Catholic Herald, the Milwaukee archdiocesan newspaper.

"In the past, things have been seen through juridical eyes — that didn't get us very far," said Wood.

The end of the 10th round of dialogue between the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America and the Roman Catholic Church was announced at Redemption Lutheran Church in Wauwatosa April 22.

The dialogue is co-chaired by Catholic Auxiliary Bishop Richard J. Sklba of Milwaukee and retired Lutheran Bishop Charles Maahs.

SEEING THROUGH CHRIST'S EYES

Father Richard Saelzler, a counselor at St. Thomas More University Parish in Bowling Green, Ohio, poses at his computer, which has software that speaks to him. The priest, who lost his sight two years ago after undergoing surgery for cancer of the esophagus, says blindness has made him a better counselor.

Blind priest says own suffering has made him better counselor

TOLEDO, Ohio (CNS) — Father Richard Saelzler, who lost his eyesight two years ago, is a firm believer that those who are "willing to share in the blessings" have to also be "willing to share in the cup" and endure struggles.

"I'm struggling to take up my cross every day, just like everybody else," Father Saelzler told the Catholic Chronicle, newspaper of the Toledo Diocese.

The priest, known to most as Father Ric, is in residence at St. Thomas More University Parish in Bowling Green. He works at the parish as a counselor.

He went blind when he suffered complications following surgery for cancer of the esophagus. He almost died when his blood pressure dropped dramatically and he "crashed," he said.

His doctors saved his life, but a lack of oxygen to his optic nerve destroyed his eyesight. He was in a coma in intensive care for days.

When he lost his sight, Father Saelzler said, his immediate reaction was to ask, "What am I going to do?"

"My world was so visual. My favorite hobbies were gardening, watching movies, photography. After I left the hospital for the nursing home, I started praying that I would die," he said.

But now he has a different outlook, and even though there are still some depressing times he does not give in to despair. The priest said he has felt lonely, but never angry.

"Anger is useless. I saw my blindness as a part of nature," he said. "There's no one to be angry at. I could be angry at the world for spending money on war but ignoring AIDS in Africa. No, anger's not it."

What has carried him through, he said, has been uniting his suffering to that of Jesus. And he is quick to point out that his faith isn't just a crutch to get him through the rough times.

"In the midst of suffering, there is redemption, transformation. If there isn't resurrection, this is, indeed, a curse," he said. "There is a constant transformation going on in me."

Father Saelzler said the transformation has made him "more positive when counseling people."

"I listen better now. I encourage people to celebrate their victories and not beat themselves up over failures," he added.

Repression of Christians in Vietnam 'grave concern,' U.S. bishop says

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The violent repression of the Montagnard people in Vietnam is a matter of "grave concern," the head of the U.S. bishops' international policy committee said in a letter to Vietnam's ambassador to the United States.

In his April 28 letter to Ambassador Nguyen Tam Chien, Bishop John H. Ricard of Pensacola-Tallahassee, Fla., also called for the release of Father Thaddeus Nguyen Van Ly, who was sentenced to 15 years in jail following his 2001 testimony to the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom.

Bishop Ricard told the ambassador that by imprisoning Father Ly, "an otherwise obscure human rights advocate, your government has converted him into one of the world's better-known prisoners of conscience and given greater reason for criticism of Vietnam's record on human rights and religious freedom."

Human Rights Watch reported that Montagnards, mainly Protestants, were beaten and some killed during Easter Week demonstrations in Vietnam's Central Highlands, and the Montagnards were seeking to "peacefully press for religious freedom and return of ancestral land in the Central Highlands."

The Vietnamese government charged that antigovernment elements are inciting the Montagnards to seek a separatist state, Human Rights Watch said.

"Vietnam's policy of repression on Montagnard Christians is only fueling the unrest," said Brad Adams of the Asia Division of Human Rights Watch.

Human Rights Watch said it "continues to receive credible reports" of Vietnamese officials forcing Montagnard Christians to "abandon Christianity and cease all political or religious activities in public self-criticism sessions or by signing written pledges."

Vatican official calls on Christians, Buddhists to help children

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Christians and Buddhists must address the needs of children, especially those who have been abandoned, abused by adults, or are affected by HIV/AIDS, said a top Vatican official.

"As religious believers, we must turn our gaze to the needs of children, in our own families and in society as a whole," said Archbishop Michael Fitzgerald in an annual message to Buddhists.

The Vatican released the message April 29 as Buddhists worldwide prepared for the May 4 feast of Vesakh, which commemorates the principal events in the life of Buddhism's founder, Siddhartha Gautama.

Archbishop Fitzgerald, who heads the Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue, said children must be "protected, loved and educated."

However, many children lack a stable and loving family, he said.

"Even worse, there are little ones who have been profoundly hurt by the violence of adults through sexual abuse, prostitution, forced begging, involvement in the sale and use of drugs, conscription, etc.," said Archbishop Fitzgerald.

The tragedy of HIV/AIDS also has brought immense suffering to many children's lives, he said.

The archbishop said Buddhists and Christians should mobilize their "forces and resources," and if Buddhists and Christians help children "governments, civic bodies and all people of good will, through our own example, can be inspired to greater involvement in the welfare of all children."

Pope calls for renewed missionary zeal based on love for Eucharist

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II called for renewed missionary zeal based on a "constant relationship" with the Eucharist.

In his message for World Mission Sunday 2004, the pope said the church's mission of evangelization was "still only at the beginning" even after 2,000 years of service.

"The social and religious challenges facing humanity in our day call believers to renew their missionary fervor. Yes. It is necessary to relaunch mission 'ad gentes' with courage," he said in his written message, released by the Vatican April 29, ahead of World Mission Sunday, which will be celebrated Oct. 24 in most dioceses.

Addressing this year's theme, "Eucharist and Mission," the pope focused on the importance of the Eucharist in sparking and sustaining the call to spread the Gospel.

He asked, "How could the church fulfill her vocation without cultivating a constant relationship with the Eucharist, without nourishing herself with this food which sanctifies, without founding her missionary activity on this indispensable support?"

The keys to helping the church fulfill that vocation are dedicated priests — "apostles who are 'experts' in the celebration, adoration and contemplation of the Eucharist," he wrote.

The pope said that the Eucharist is vital for men and women missionaries.

"The Eucharist is the comfort and the pledge of final triumph for those who fight evil and sin; it is the 'bread of life' which sustains those who, in turn, become 'bread broken' for others, paying at times even with martyrdom their fidelity to the Gospel," he said.

The pope made an appeal to the faithful to help support "spiritually and materially" the church's apostolic activities by the pontifical mission societies so that "through their contribution, the proclamation of the Gospel may reach all peoples of the earth."

THIS MONTH IN —1917

OUR LADY OF FATIMA

Beginning May 13, 1917, three Portuguese children received apparitions of Our Lady. Mary asked them to pray the rosary and gave them three secrets. The first concerned devotion to the Immaculate Heart of Mary. The second was a vision of hell.

Pope John Paul II directed the third secret to be revealed in 2000; it spoke of a 'bishop in white' being shot with bullets and arrows. Many people linked this to the assassination attempt against the pope May 13, 1981.

New poll shows growing shift toward pro-life position

for the first, first and second, or all three trimesters of pregnancy.

Asked if they considered themselves "pro-life" or "pro-choice," 49 percent said pro-life while 45 percent said pro-choice. By a 61-34 percent margin, poll respondents said abortion should not be permitted after the fetal heartbeat has begun.

Zogby interviewed 1,209 Americans by telephone. The poll's margin of error was plus or minus 2.8 percent. It was made public April 23 in Washington.

By even greater margins:

— Sixty-five percent agreed that abortion should not be permitted after fetal brainwaves are detected; 28 percent disagreed with that statement.

— Seventy-four percent said tax dollars should not be used to pay for abortion, while 22 percent said they should.

— Seventy-seven percent favored laws requiring that before they have an abortion, women who are 20 or more weeks pregnant be given information about fetal pain caused by an abortion. Sixteen percent disagreed.

Carol Tobias, political director for the National Right to Life Committee, which commissioned the poll, said "only 13 percent of the public" supports the "extreme position" taken by leaders of the April 25 March for Women's Lives of "abortion on demand throughout pregnancy."

She made her comments at a Washington press conference where the poll results were released.

In the poll, 25 percent of those surveyed favored abortion for any reason for the first trimester; 4 percent approved of abortion for any reason during the first two trimesters; and 13 percent favored abortion at any time during pregnancy.

Poll results also indicate a greater pro-life stance among African-Americans, Hispanics and young people.

Twenty percent of those polled were ages 18-29. Of this group, 60 percent said abortion should never be legal or be legal only when the mother's life is in danger or in cases of rape and incest, as opposed to 39 percent who favored abortion for any reason during the first trimester, the first and second trimester, or all three trimesters.

Of all those surveyed, African-Americans accounted for 11 percent of respondents; Hispanics made up 8 percent.

Of the African Americans, 62 percent said abortion should never be legal or be legal only when the mother's life is in danger or in cases of rape and incest; 38 percent favored abortion for any reason during the first trimester, the first and second trimester, or all three trimesters. Among Hispanic respondents, the margin was 78 percent to 21 percent.

"A poll released last year by UCLA showed that just a slim majority of 54 percent of college students support abortion, down from 67 percent a decade ago," said Cathy McLeod, mid-Atlantic regional coordinator for American Collegians for Life.

"The abortion lobby has failed to capture the hearts and minds of college women my age because they offer us one choice: abortion," she said.

Cathy Cleaver Ruse, director of planning and information for the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, talked about other numbers related to abortion that have not yet been quantified.

"After 31 years we know almost nothing about abortion's impact on women's health, on marriages, or on surviving siblings. We don't even know with certainty how many children have died," Ruse said. "Legalized abortion has been an unchecked, unstudied experiment."

She cited a 2003 study by the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention showing that "multiple abortions are now the norm."

Ruse added, "The survey didn't ask why these abortions occurred," but she referred to an Alan Guttmacher Institute study from the late 1980s that suggested some reasons.

"The two overarching reasons that women have abortions are a lack of financial and emotional support," she said. "In other words, women abort their babies because they need practical help and emotional support, and no one will give it to them."

New Vietnamese church dedicated

Vietnamese Church dedicated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis during a special Mass May 2. The celebration included fireworks and a festival featuring Vietnamese music and food.

"Even though the culture may be foreign to some Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte, the parish of St. Joseph Vietnamese is another wonderful example of God's presence in our world," said Bishop Jugis.

"The growth of the Vietnamese community and this church is testament that wherever the seed of Jesus Christ is planted, good things will grow," he said.

Concelebrating the Mass with Bishop Jugis was Father Peter Tan Van Le, pastor; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor; Capuchin Father Stan Kobel, parochial vicar of St. Thomas Aquinas Church; visiting clergy Msgr. Francis Pham Van Phuong; Msgr. Peter Nguyen Van Tai; and other Vietnamese priests.

The dedication was a visual pageant, featuring native Vietnamese dress, music and expression of worship. Wide-eyed children peered around parents for glimpses of the procession to the church. Smiling men and women donned traditional costumes of celebration. Balloons, banners and drums accentuated the din of excitement.

After Bishop Jugis cut the ceremonial ribbon across the church's entrance, firecrackers exploded as parishioners and guests filed into the modern church that features a tabernacle, altar, baptismal font, Stations of the Cross and furniture from Vietnam.

The $1.8 million facility, which includes offices and an education center, totals almost 22,300 square feet. The worship space can accommodate 725 people, more than double the existing church that connects to the new facility.

Despite all the room, worshippers overflowed into the church's vestibule, the cry room and the old church, where the Mass was shown on closed-circuit television.

The Vietnamese Catholic community began in 1981 as a mission program of three churches, Our Lady of the Assumption, Our Lady of Consolation and St. Ann. The 20 or so original Vietnamese families were political refugees, resettled in North Carolina by a number of humanitarian organizations including Catholic Social Services.

Many of the Vietnamese Catholics had been imprisoned by the Communists for their beliefs prior to coming to Charlotte in search of jobs and religious freedom, said Father Tan Van Le.

The priest, who was imprisoned for 13 years and had to celebrate Mass in secret, came to Charlotte from the Diocese of Vinh Long in Vietnam via a diocesan sponsorship.

The parish continued to grow and purchased a Baptist church in 1998. Then-Bishop William G. Curlin dedicated the church and cultural center in November 1999.

The church's congregation has since blossomed to 385 families. The Vietnamese community in the 46-county Diocese of Charlotte is now estimated at 9,200 people.

"We have the first Vietnamese church in Charlotte, and our community is growing," said Neilson Chung, a parishioner. "We are very proud of what we have done."

"The church allows Charlotte's Vietnamese community to have a place of worship, a place of education for young people and a place for us to preserve the mother language, tradition and morals of our culture," said Father Tan Van Le.

Week to appreciate school bus drivers

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — The best part of Patrick Loftus' day is seeing the kids.

"I greet them every morning by name," he said.

A school bus driver for Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools for almost two years, Loftus and the other drivers will be honored during School Bus Driver Appreciation Week May 10-16.

"The drivers are a big asset," said Ty Canipe, MACS transportation director. "They're the first and last person the students see every day. If the driver starts the students' day positive, their whole day may be positive."

Canipe oversees 14 school buses for the eight MACS schools and a half a dozen for Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville. The drivers "all take their jobs very seriously," he said.

"They take pride in their job responsibilities, including keeping the bus clean inside and out," said Canipe. "But most of all they take a very professional approach when it comes to dealing with the parents, school staff and the students."

"Being on time is very important," said Regina Horne, a driver of eight years. "Many parents depend on it."

The drivers begin their day at 5:30 a.m. by reporting in and checking their buses for mechanical problems. They complete morning runs by about 8:30 a.m.

They return around 2:30 p.m. and most drivers finish between 5-5:30 p.m.

"However, on many days if the traffic is not cooperative, the last bus may not return until well after 6 p.m.," said Canipe.

The drivers also are called upon to transport classes on field trips, an average of four a day, "from the mountains to the zoo," said Canipe. "The motto for the department is 'you call, we haul.'"

During the spring and fall, the number of field trips can get as high as 10-12 per day, he said.

Because of the traffic congestion and pollution in Charlotte, the MACS transportation department encourages parents to utilize the school buses.

"Yearly cost is $650, a bargain considering the cost of fuel and time spent on the road," said Canipe.

Gov. Michael Easley proclaimed School Bus Driver Appreciation Week because "every month of the year, in darkness and daylight, bitter cold and brutal heat, North Carolina's school bus drivers travel thousands upon thousands of miles on everything from dirt paths to multilane highways in order to deliver our precious school students to their places of learning and then home again."

Easley proclaimed April 25-May 1, 2004 to celebrate the week, but Canipe said MACS chose to celebrate their bus drivers the second week of May.

"We're having a lunch for them on May 11, and a little something special planned each day," he said. "The schools are welcome to do something for them, too."

Loftus likes to do kind things for the students — such as give them good news.

"On Friday, or before a holiday, I tell them the bus will not be in operation tomorrow," he said. "That usually gets a cheer."

Crossing the border

Migrants regroup at Tijuana church-run shelter

BY JASON LANGE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

TIJUANA, Mexico — As darkness descended, Juan Balerio nervously went over his plan to cross an arid stretch of mountains into the United States.

First, he would buy a gallon of water and several boxes of crackers. The hike can take anywhere from eight hours to two or three days, so food and water were important.

Then, at 8 p.m., he planned to take a bus to the outskirts of Tijuana to a mountainous slum called "Nido de las Aguilas," or the Eagle's Nest. That's where the border fences end as rolling hills give way to dusty crags. Balerio said that with a little patience and luck he would be in San Diego the next afternoon.

"If I survive," he said with a smile.

The 22-year-old has illegally crossed the border near Tijuana three times since he left his impoverished home town in central Mexico at age 15 in search of work, and he is aware of the dangers.

Speaking from the staging ground of his plan, a Catholic migrant shelter in Tijuana called Casa del Migrante, he said: "It can get very cold or very hot, and there are many snakes. You hear stories about people dying."

By the hundreds.

Deadly crossings

Last year alone, more than 400 migrants perished trying to cross the 2,000-mile border that divides the United States and Mexico, according to migrant groups that keep tabs on the deaths.

Most died of exposure as they braved deserts and mountains. Others suffocated after migrant smugglers locked them in sweltering truck trailers. Many drowned swimming the Rio Grande.

The deaths amount to a small portion of the estimated 300,000 Mexicans that cross illegally every year.

CNS PHOTOS BY DAVID MAUNG

Above: Migrants chat in the courtyard of Casa del Migrante in Tijuana, Mexico, April 19. The center, run by Scalabrinian missionaries, offers temporary shelter to travelers migrating to the United States through the Tijuana border crossing. Below: Migrant workers pray before the evening meal at Casa del Migrante April 19.

Around Balerio, some 30 men with worn clothes and tired faces walked about the migrant shelter's central courtyard. Most of them had traveled hundreds of miles to cross the border before running out of luck in Tijuana.

"Many were robbed and were sleeping on the streets before coming here," said Scalabrinian Father Luis Kendzierski, who runs Casa del Migrante.

Desert shelter

Casa del Migrante, run by Scalabrinian missionaries, provides hot meals, showers and a place to sleep for about 80 migrants each night. Since its founding in 1987, Casa del Migrante has sheltered some 130,000 migrants.

Residents can stay for two weeks. Father Kendzierski knows many plan their next move — usually an attempt to cross the border.

Doctors come to the shelter twice a week, usually to treat blistered feet or wounds from a beating.

"Thugs here know all too well migrants arrive with money to pay the coyote," or migrant smuggler, said Father Kendzierski.

The shelter's staff also works to educate the migrants on sexually transmitted diseases and drug addiction, ills often not found in their home communities but more common along the border and in the United States.

Father Kendzierski and another priest offer spiritual guidance to the migrants, who are mostly Catholic.

Originally founded to assist Italian migrants arriving in the United States and South America in the late 19th century, the Scalabrinians now operate migrant shelters in 25 countries, including France, Australia, the Philippines and the United States.

Searching for work

Most of the migrants who pass through Casa del Migrante hope to cross the border, said Father Kendzierski. The shelter also assists migrants from other parts of Mexico drawn to work in Tijuana's many factories.

Julian Toledo, 23, said at least Tijuana has electricity and jobs, something his home town in the mountains of southern Oaxaca state does not have.

"I don't want to leave my country," Toledo said.

The young men sharing the bench with Toledo do not hesitate to ridicule him.

"In Tijuana you'll earn $10 or $15 a day," Francisco Santiago, a one-time construction worker in San Francisco, told Toledo. "Up there (in America) you can make that in an hour."

Jobs are relatively plentiful in Tijuana, where the North American Free Trade Agreement triggered a boom in low-wage, low-skill factory jobs in the 1990s.

The factories send vans to the migrant shelter every morning looking for people to work their assembly lines.

Oscar Sandoval earned 150 pesos (US$13) earlier in the day at a food processing plant. That money will not go far in Tijuana, where living expenses are higher than in the rest of Mexico.

"They tell us that should be enough to rent a room, buy food and pay for bus fare to work," Sandoval said.

A week earlier, Sandoval was earning $18 per hour as a truck driver in Los Angeles. He was deported after police discovered he did not have a valid driver's license.

"If I return and they catch me, the border patrol agents said I'd do two years in a federal prison," Sandoval said.

High stakes

About 16,000 foreign migrants, or 10 percent of the U.S. federal prison population, are currently locked up for migration offenses — namely illegal border crossings, according to statistics from the U.S. Federal Bureau of Prisons.

U.S. migration authorities said Sandoval could re-enter the United States after one year; the Sonora state native plans to do his best in Tijuana until then.

Father Kendzierski said about 40 percent of the migrants who come to Casa del Migrante are deportees, dropped off by U.S. Border Patrol agents in Tijuana.

Those with family in the United States try to convince relatives there to pay a migrant smuggler's fee — usually $1,000-$1,500.

Those who cannot raise the money might try to cross anyway, although they risk jail time if caught on multiple occasions.

"I'm going to try one more time tomorrow," said 31-year-old Gaspar Torres after returning from the food processing plant.

The money he earned during the week would be enough for food and water for his hike from Nido de las Aguilas and for a bus to Los Angeles, if he is not caught.

"I'll be praying that they don't catch me," he said.

'WELCOMING THE STRANGER'

Diocese of Charlotte reaches out to Hispanic immigrants

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — As Hispanic ministry in the Diocese of Charlotte moves forward, ministry leaders and Hispanics are looking back and reassessing their needs.

The diocese's three-year Hispanic Pastoral Plan is being reviewed to ensure its success in light of the U.S. bishops' November 2002 document, "Encuentro and Mission: A Renewed Pastoral Framework for Hispanic Ministry."

"That document has some very important aspects of Hispanic ministry that the bishops are asking us to focus on and take into consideration," said Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of diocesan Hispanic Ministry.

"We're also halfway through the plan and we wanted to stop and see how we were doing, and what we can be doing with the new focus that the bishops asked us to consider," said Sister Inkrott.

The Hispanic Pastoral Plan 2002-2005, an updated and diocese-focused version of three previous national Hispanic pastoral plans developed by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, was adopted by the Diocese of Charlotte in November 2002 after almost a year of meetings of Hispanic ministry coordinators, social service personnel, vicars forane and Hispanic community leaders.

With the growing number of Hispanics in the Diocese of Charlotte — estimated to be more than 203,000 — the Hispanic Pastoral Plan addresses their ever-developing pastoral, health and human services needs. Diocesan members will review the plan at the Catholic Conference Center May 19.

"The immigrants who are arriving in North Carolina are bearers of gifts," said Sister Inkrott. "If I look at persons who are different from me as objects of fear or suspicion, I will miss seeing the gifts that they offer and I will be the poorer for it."

An ideal home

Hispanic Catholics are quickly becoming the majority in the 46-county Diocese of Charlotte.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis discussed the Hispanic growth with Pope John Paul II during a private audience March 29, part of the bishop's "ad limina" weeklong visit to the Vatican.

Bishop Jugis described the warm reception Catholics in the diocese have given to the Hispanics living in western North Carolina. The pope expressed surprise that so many had come to the diocese.

"I told him that there are many people moving into our area because of the job opportunities and the quality of life," said Bishop Jugis. "I also told him of the efforts of diocesan priests to minister to the Latino population."

Bishop Misael Vacca Ramirez of Yopal, Columbia, and Father Jose Juya, Hispanic apostolate at St. Michael Church in Gastonia, lead a procession honoring the Lady of the Rosary of Chiquinquira outside the church Sept. 13, 2003. Many parishes are finding different ways to reach out to the diverse Hispanic cultures in their churches.

Jugis in September 2003, a month before his ordination as bishop. The meeting allowed the bishop to become familiar with the priests and their needs, and discuss the Hispanic Pastoral Plan.

Parishes with strong Hispanic congregations throughout the diocese have begun Spanish-language Masses and Hispanic ministries. Recent church dedications have featured bilingual Masses and celebrations.

But the Catholic Church is challenged to develop ministries that respond to the needs of Hispanics coming from different countries with different traditions despite their common heritage.

"A mariachi Mass is not for Salvadorans or Argentines or Chileans," said Ronaldo Cruz, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Hispanic Affairs.

In January 2003, the U.S. and Mexican bishops issued their first joint pastoral letter pledging cooperation on pastoral care of migrants. Within the Diocese of Charlotte, parishes are finding ways to welcome the diverse Hispanic cultures.

Gastonia has a strong Colombian presence, according to Sister Inkrott. Father José Juya, Hispanic apostolate at St. Michael Church, invited Bishop Misael Vacca Ramirez of Yopal, Colombia, to lead a special Mass for Colombians honoring the Lady of the Rosary of Chiquinquira at the Gastonia parish in September 2003.

"Every Latin American country has a version of Mary," said Juan Garcia, a St. Michael parishioner. He likened the Lady of Chiquinquira to the Lady of Guadalupe, who helped convert millions chance to draw strength from each other in their faith."

To coincide with an annual fiesta honoring the Lady of the Incarnation, the patron saint of Aquacatan in Guatemala, the large Guatemalan population of St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton held a weekend celebration April 30-May 2. Father Kenneth Whittington, pastor, and Father Luis Ixcoy, a priest from the Diocese of Huehuetenango in Guatemala, participated in the celebrations.

"It's important to serve the people in your parish and increase our awareness of what the church really is, which is unity," said Father Whittington.

The Diocese of Charlotte and Belmont Abbey provided grants to help Lissette Westover, a St. Michael parishioner, establish La Casa Latinoamericana de las Carolinas at Belmont Abbey in 2003. La Casa provides interpretation, translation and other services, as well as doctor and job referrals.

Continuing efforts

Diocesan offices of Catholic Social Services continue to address the needs of Hispanics around the Diocese of Charlotte.

Since 1990, Casa Guadalupe, a CSS program with offices in Winston-Salem and Greensboro, has provided critical services and information to the Piedmont-Triad Hispanic community, including helping immigrants achieve legal, permanent residency and citizenship.

Between the two offices, Casa Guadalupe assists an estimated 600-700 people per week, according to Lisa Reyna, program director.

"Immigration, interpreting, translating — anything where language is a barrier, we help with," said Reyna. "We defend the rights of those who can't speak for themselves."

For its efforts, in 2002 Casa Guadalupe was honored with a Defenders of Justice Award in the Grassroots Empowerment category, given by the North Carolina Justice and Community Development Center.

Casa Guadalupe participated in N.C. United Power's First Statewide Assembly in Durham April 25. More than 1,400 delegates from across North Carolina, representing more than 30 countries, discussed issues including a repeal of the new DMV policy restricting driver's licenses to immigrants and expanded bilingual services.

The Hispanic Center of High Point, a CSS program originally located in Christ the King Church, provides classes, counseling, individual and group therapy, victim assistance and child and youth services.

Program Esperanza, a program of the CSS Charlotte Regional Office that grew out of a partnership with United Way of Central Carolinas in 1997, helps link Hispanics to community resources and services such as English classes, health care, employment, immigration services, school and legal representation.

Uniting over dividing

"The right to emigrate also certainly exists," said Pope John Paul II in a December 2003 message for the 2004 celebrations of World Day for Migrants and Refugees.

Marked by Catholics on different days in different countries, the United States celebrated National Migration Week Jan. 4-10 of this year.

The earth and its resources belong to all people, the pope said, and while governments have a right to regulate migration, people have the right to seek safety and dignified lives for themselves and their families abroad.

While people may be afraid of the impact immigrants will have on their country and economy, overcoming the fear and welcoming newcomers (as brothers and sisters) is a contribution to peace all are called to make, he said.

"If the dream of a peaceful world is shared by many and if the contribution of migrants and refugees is valued, humanity can become increasingly the family of all and our Earth (can become) a real common home," the pope said.

"If one promotes a gradual integration of migrants while respecting their identities and safeguarding the cultural patrimony of the population welcoming them, one reduces the risk that immigrants will concentrate in one area, creating real ghettoes," he said.

Isolation from one's neighbors and from the culture of the host country, he said, "sometimes ends up increasing the desire for a gradual conquest of the territory," which creates further tension.

When peoples of different races, religions and cultures live side by side and work or study together, the pope said, they have an opportunity to discover "values common to every culture capable of uniting rather than dividing."

BREAKING DOWN BARRIERS

Task force forming to address Hispanics' needs

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Catholics are continuing to reach out to Hispanics in western North Carolina.

"The Western Region Office of Catholic Social Services (CSS/WRO) is spearheading a task force which is the outgrowth of a Latino Steering Committee (LSC) that has met monthly for networking," said Debra Braese, CSS/WRO's area director.

The LSC meets, Braese said, "in response to concerns expressed by parishes about Hispanic needs and is the Western Region Office's way to explore, collaborate and find solutions."

LSC's May 19 meeting at St. Eugene Church will include the steering committee plus pastors, parishioners and anyone else who is a member of or interested in working with the Hispanic community in CSS/WRO's service area: western North Carolina, from Alleghany, Wilkes, Caldwell, Burke and Rutherford counties to the Tennessee border.

"The meeting May 19 will be to see if we want to move from networking to advocacy and, if so, how Catholic Social Services can help that," said Ada Volkmer, CSS/WRO immigration specialist. The meeting is for anyone "who wants to get together to brainstorm about creating ways to break down barriers that Latinos face."

The meeting will explain what the LSC does and where there are gaps in services to western North Carolina's Hispanic population.

"The Latino Steering Committee has always been hosted and moderated by CSS," Volkmer said.

LSC is made up of western North Carolinians who want to work with Hispanics. Included are health department employees, Realtors, Girl Scout leaders, legal aid staffers, University of North Carolina at Ashville students and educators, among others.

LSC's database contains about 250 names, with 25-30 people attending meetings the third Wednesday of each month at CSS/WRO's office at 50 Orange St. in Asheville. They network and share concerns and event announcements. Sometimes guest speakers present programs, such as updates in various areas of the law.

Concerns include the need for more education about the fact that Hispanics in western North Carolina come from many countries, not just Mexico.

"Community advocates have reported that Puerto Ricans (who are U.S. citizens) have been asked for their Mexican birth certificates," Volkmer said. "Or birth certificates from countries other than Mexico are regarded as fake."

No reservations are required to attend the May 19 meeting. Anyone wanting to stay after the meeting to mingle and get acquainted should bring a bag lunch and something to drink. For more information, call Ada Volkmer at (828) 258-2617, ext. 22.

The Latino Steering Committee's first meeting is May 19, 10-11:30 a.m. at St. Eugene Catholic Church, 1 Culvern St., Asheville. Directions: Exit 5 off I-240, turn right at end of exit. Go about 11 stoplights to intersection of Beaverdam Road. Turn right, then make the first left. The church is at the end of the street.

Migration en masse

The U.S. Census Bureau estimates that 52 percent of the nation's 32.5 million foreign-born population in 2002 came from Latin America. While the entire foreign-born population comprises only 11.5 percent of the U.S. total, the massive flow from Latin America is radically changing the demographics of the U.S. church.

Hispanics are estimated to constitute about 40 percent of the current U.S. Catholic population and their number is projected to continue growing. Latin Americans plus U.S.-born Latinos make Hispanics the fastest growing ethnic group in the U.S. church.

The church's attitude toward immigrants is expressed by a 2000 document by the U.S. bishops: "Welcoming the Stranger Among Us: Unity in Diversity."

The infusion of so many Latinos, especially clandestine flows across the U.S.-Mexican border, has raised concerns among some groups — accelerated since the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11 — for tighter border controls.

The Center for Immigration also raises the issue that so many Spanish-speaking immigrants may form a closed community hindering "assimilation and integration of immigrants by creating a critical mass necessary to foster linguistic and spatial isolation."

Ronaldo Cruz, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Hispanic Affairs, discounts such concerns. Immigrants are highly motivated, coming to better their lives and they know that they have to learn English to succeed, he said.

"They will become English-speaking. If the first generation doesn't, the next generation will speak English," he said.

The same is true of adapting to U.S. ways of doing things and to incorporating U.S. values, said Cruz.

"People are born in different countries, but their kids are as American as can be," he said.

EL DÍA DE LOS NIÑOS

Children's Day celebrated in Canton

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

CANTON — Just for the kids, Immaculate Conception Church held its first El Día de los Niños.

El Día de los Niños (Children's Day) is celebrated in Latin American schools on April 30. (Several Asian countries also celebrate Children's Day.) Immaculate Conception's El Día de los Niños roared into action May 2, with 31 preteen children, their parents and older siblings piling into the balloon-festooned church hall after Father Shawn O'Neal celebrated a Hispanic Mass.

The day is especially tailored for children up to sixth-grade age.

Rainy weather put a crimp in the planned outdoor games, but everyone enjoyed chocolate cake and Neapolitan ice cream in the church hall. The children also received small bags of sweets and toys.

A story in the Idaho Press-Tribune last year, shortly before Idaho became the first state to have an official Children's Day, noted that, "El Día de los Niños began in Latin American countries as a day to recognize youth. It is widely celebrated in Mexico, where movie theaters show free movies, ice cream flows freely and kids dress up in costumes and parade through town."

Martha Calderon was at Immaculate Conception with her children. She recalls that in her native Mexico, teachers also dressed in costumes the children chose. They demolished piñatas and played musical chairs and hide-and-seek. There was a special lunch, with sweets later in the afternoon.

"It was a whole day from beginning to end devoted to the children — games and food," she said. "The whole day was nothing but for the kids."

Spanish Benedictines' 'Chant' CD returns

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The music world has had to deal with its share of pop stars who would just as soon make their music and then be left alone.

But nobody takes it to the level of the Benedictine Monks of Santo Domingo de Silos in Spain, who recorded their Gregorian chants between 1973 and 1979 while maintaining their cloistered lifestyle.

It took more than a decade, but the monks' chants caught on. The first wave of success came from their native Spain. That was followed in 1994 by top-10 status for "Chant" on Billboard's pop charts for eight weeks; it spent 25 weeks atop Billboard's classical music chart.

Before the phenomenon subsided, "Chant" had sold 3 million copies over two years. And it's still selling at a clip of about 300 copies a week, according to Mark Forlow, vice president of classics for EMI Classics and Virgin Classics, which distribute the monks' recordings on the Angel label.

In a telephone interview from New York, Forlow told Catholic News Service that at the peak of the "Chant" craze "I remember there were reporters who were showing up at the door of the monastery, and the monks just wishing they'd go away."

Also, Forlow recalled, "there were certain monks who were no longer with the order who came out of the woodwork and said, 'We want to be paid!'"

Forlow said the craze was fueled by an Associated Press story about the Spanish success of the monks' music "that seemed to run simultaneously in every newspaper available."

The "Chant" success story resulted in three additional CDs of chant music that also was recorded during the 1970s by the Santo Domingo de Silas monks. A feminine counterpart to the monks' music was released, also by Angel, called "Vision: The Music of Hildegard von Bingen" by Emily Van Evera and Benedictine Sister Germaine Fritz.

And before it was all over, popular greeting card artist Sandra Boynton, who had studied Latin at a Quaker day school, put together the Ad Hog Camerata for a gentle porcine spoof called "Grunt: Pigorian Chant from Snouto Domoinko de Silo."

Now, the monks' original music is returning. EMI-Virgin's Spanish subsidiary, which started the "Chant" madness, developed a "greatest hits" compilation of sorts for European audiences — selling 300,000 copies — and offered it to EMI-Virgin in the States.

Forlow said EMI-Virgin tweaked it somewhat, using new liner notes and cover art, and has named it "Chant: The Anniversary Edition," a two-CD set. It was to be available in record stores May 4, retailing for the cost of a single CD.

"We've got almost everything from the original 'Chant' as well as material from the last three albums," Forlow told CNS. He added that only the original "Chant" and its immediate successor, "Christmas Chants," are still available, but the other two albums are not.

Forlow said the first "Chant" benefited from the "stress-busting" trends at the time. He added the 10th anniversary edition will be marketed to religious bookstores as well as publications that focus on meditation and healing.

"We're certainly going to look to the Christian community to get the word out again," he said.

But any sales that come will have to be generated by the quality of the music. The Benedictine Monks of Santo Domingo de Silos continue to be unavailable for interviews.

SUNDAY SCRIPTURE READINGS: MAY 16, 2004

May 16, Sixth Sunday of Easter

Cycle C Readings:
1) Acts 15:1-2, 22-29
Psalm 67:2-3, 5, 6, 8
2) Revelation 21:10-14, 22-23
3) Gospel: John 14:23-29

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

About 15 years ago when I was pregnant with our second child, I was completing a master's thesis — no small feat with a husband, a household, a 4-year-old, a job and no word processor. What made it all possible was the tremendous support I received from family and friends.

A sister-in-law stepped in with child care one day a week, friends gave me a key to their house so I could use their computer day or night and my husband took over household chores. They lifted numerous burdens so that I could finish my degree before baby No. 2 came along.

It's hard to overestimate the positive impact of burdens lifted, whether those encumbrances are physical, psychological or social. A person freed from unnecessary burdens is one free to dream, to create, to achieve and to love.

Both the readings from Acts and from the Gospel of John highlight the presence of the Holy Spirit as having this effect. The apostles are prompted by the Spirit to reduce religious restrictions for the gentile converts. Jesus gives the Spirit to free our hearts from the burden of fear.

Every time you or I lighten the load of another human being, we are acting in the power of the Spirit. The amazing truth is that often what we perceive as small, inconsequential words or actions have great capacity to make another's life less burdensome. I'm sure that my colleagues don't realize how much their words of encouragement and their daily acts of kindness free me to be my best self, and yet this happens daily.

St. Paul says in Galatians 6:2: "Bear one another's burdens, and so you will fulfill the law of Christ." The law of Christ is life in the Spirit and the lifting of burdens in a variety of life-giving ways.

Questions:

How has someone lifted a burden for you, and in what way did that free you? What is one burden that you can lift for another today?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"It is the decision of the holy Spirit and of us not to place on you any burden beyond these necessities" (Acts 15:28).

'Laws' breaks rules of attraction

Two rival divorce lawyers (Julianne Moore and Pierce Brosnan) wake up married after a drunken evening and must continue as opposing attorneys on a bitter court case while carrying on a spousal charade in the underwhelming romantic comedy "Laws of Attraction." Implied sexual encounters following inebriation, impersonation of a cleric, a few crude expressions and an instance of profanity. ## Cloning dilemma lost in standard ghost-story devices

BY DAVID DICERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — When a tragedy takes their young son's life, a couple strikes a Faustian bargain to get him back, with unforeseen consequences, in the cautionary thriller "Godsend" (Lions Gate).

Fueled by the debate surrounding advances in reproductive technologies, the film touches on important issues concerning bioethics and the moral implications of artificially creating human life. But while the questions raised are thought-provoking, the only thing the movie itself provokes in viewers is the urge to check their watches.

Greg Kinnear and Rebecca Romijn-Stamos star as Paul and Jessie Duncan, a couple whose lives are shattered when their 8-year-old son, Adam (Cameron Bright), is killed in a traffic accident. Robert De Niro plays Richard Wells, an enigmatic geneticist with the incredible offer to clone Adam and give them back their happy life.

The couple resettles near Wells' Godsend Fertility Clinic, and they sever all ties with their former life to keep the illegal procedure secret. Jessie is fertilized with stem cells carrying Adam's DNA, and soon after gives birth to second "Adam."

As Adam reaches his eighth birthday — the age his duplicate died — things begin to take an ominous turn. He starts to have vivid nightmares, and his lovable personality darkens, revealing a sinister streak.

Adam's cryptic references to "another boy" spark fears that he is somehow "remembering" things from the first Adam's life, forcing Paul and Jessie to come to terms with their decision and setting in motion a series of chilling revelations about Wells' shadowy past.

Kinnear and Romijn-Stamos both convincingly convey the devastation of losing a child, allowing viewers to empathize with their pain-prompted decision. However, Catholics should be careful not to interpret such emotional commiseration as justification for condoning their course of action.

The film wisely relies on subtlety and suggestion to create an atmosphere of psychological suspense. The movie is full of allegorical references and images that underscore the themes explored. Adam, an obvious allusion to Genesis, is the first child ever successfully cloned.

Unfortunately, after an intelligent setup, the story's philosophical pretensions quickly give way to spooky atmospherics and standard ghost-story devices which detract from the central moral dilemma posed. The rickety script's emotionally unsatisfying ending leaves too much unresolved.

The church teaches that medical science does not have the moral right to do something simply because that something is now doable — especially when that something denies the sacred dignity of the human person, and reduces humans to mere objects which can be manipulated.

Due to a sexual encounter, a problematic theme of cloning, recurring profanity, sporadic crude language and some scary sequences, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Catholic-Lutheran dialogue ends one phase

document on "The Church as Koinonia of Salvation: Its Structures and Ministries" — which includes 10 recommendations to the churches — was to be made public May 5.

At a joint celebration and worship service April 23 at the Cathedral of St. John the Evangelist in Milwaukee, Bishop Maahs said the adoption of the document "really is kind of a culmination. In many ways, (it is) building on the foundation of the work that has been done in the past by theologians and scholars of both of our communions."

He reiterated earlier comments by Bishop Sklba about the friendships that have developed from the dialogue.

"Those who work so closely together (are) kind of a model of the way in which the two faiths can celebrate our oneness in Christ and our understanding of the Gospel which is so similar," Bishop Maahs said.

Wood said the basic church structure is the congregation for Lutherans and the parish for Catholics. The congregation or parish, in turn, belongs to a regional structure, such as a synod (for Lutherans) or a diocese (for Catholics).

While Lutherans have no equivalent to the Catholics' national structure, such as the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, both have worldwide structures — the Lutheran World Federation, defined as a communion of churches, and the "universal church" under the direction of the pope.

For Lutherans, Wood said, "the congregation is considered to have the fullness of church." In Catholicism, the diocese is the basic unit of church.

"Lutherans don't have a well-developed theology of the episcopacy, and Catholics don't have one of the parish," she said.

Michael Root, a Lutheran seminary professor, said while some might say the 10th round of dialogue "deals with internal structures rather than the needs of the real world" the talks were changed by the signing in 1999 of a Lutheran-Roman Catholic declaration on justification, in which both churches agreed that people are saved by grace alone.

"How does a Christian stand before a righteous God? That was 'the' issue of the Reformation," Root said. "Now this needs no longer divide Lutherans and Catholics."

Root added that "the remaining problems deal with church ministry and authority. Lutherans and Roman Catholics can't share Eucharist because of differences over appropriate eucharistic ministers. The ministry issue is at the heart of what divides Lutherans and Roman Catholics nationally and internationally."

"These questions seem trivial, lower in the hierarchy of truths, not essential to the faith yet in some ways more difficult," he said. "Not being able to solve it is more of a rub. Ecumenism is about relationships between churches — concrete communities, real people."

Structural questions about people and actions they take, he said, require "a certain minimum agreement about structure. It's where the ecumenical rubber meets the institutional road."

Bishop Maahs said the next step in the dialogue is to recommend a topic for the 11th round to both traditions' advisory boards, but "we're still in the process of working on that right now. I can't tell you what that might be."

Previous rounds included discussions of Mary and the saints, Eucharist, papal primacy, baptism, teaching authority, Scripture and tradition, justification by faith, and the Nicene Creed.

Guest Column

FATHER MATTHEW BUETTNER
GUEST COLUMNIST

During a recent retreat in Toronto, I perused a local newspaper and was struck by an article about a woman "nipped, tucked for 18 years." Indeed, the woman "has spent as many years creating a new body as she did living with the old one."

The article catalogues the woman's 18-year quest to achieve happiness with her appearance from her first plastic surgery at 18 years old (breast reduction). Since then, she has undergone the following procedures: "a brow lift, Botox injections for forehead frown lines, laser vision surgery, blepharoplasty (eyelid tightening) for droopy eyelids, carbon dioxide laser beam treatments for dark under-eye bags, electrolysis for upper lip hair, adult braces, dental bleaching, microdermabrasion (skin sanding) for acne scars, liposuction under her chin, upper abdomen, stomach, upper buttocks and inner thighs, a tummy tuck, cellulite treatments and varicose vein removal."

In all, the woman admits to spending "somewhere in the ballpark of $40,000 on cosmetic surgery, about what her ... degree in business administration cost." And, if asked, she would say that "reshaping her body has been worth more to her than training her mind."

This story is not all that unique in our western society. The article states "new statistics show 2003 was a banner year for the [plastic surgery] profession, with double-digit increases in everything from facelifts to fat injections to plump up sunken skin. And the upward curve shows no sign of falling." Indeed, the prevailing secular culture, which is so often dominated by trends and fads, sees its disfigured image in the mirror and is attempting to perfect it at all costs.

Such is the popularity behind the "reality" television show "Extreme Makeover" (which I have not seen, but is mentioned in the newspaper article). Considering that plastic surgery itself is not intrinsically evil, what is fundamentally wrong with this obsession with appearance? Rather than delivering a theological treatise on the resurrection of the body, I seek to demonstrate the practicality of the Catholic belief in the resurrection of the body and life everlasting, a timely topic for the Easter season, a timely topic for our world.

Let us begin with the truth that has been professed since the Twelve Apostles: "I believe in the resurrection of the body and the life everlasting."

In the fifth century, St. Augustine commented, "On no point does the Christian faith encounter more opposition than on the resurrection of the body" (Catechism of the Catholic Church, 996). This fundamental, yet controversial belief has informed and shaped Catholic faith and practice for 2,000 years. Belief in the resurrection of the body is rooted deeply in the cleansing and restorative power of baptism. But we must first take into account the state of man before baptism.

Created in the image and likeness of God, man is an integral union of body and soul (CCC 362). The whole human person, body and soul, damaged by original sin, is afflicted by sin and death and in need of redemption by Jesus Christ through the sacraments of the Church (CCC 405; 1122-1130). Beginning in baptism, the body and soul are cleansed of original and personal sin and are therefore, perfected, consecrated, set-apart; hence, the body becomes a "temple of the Holy Spirit" (CCC 1265).

Consequently, the baptized person, body and soul, continues to be sanctified throughout life by the other sacraments: anointed with sacred chrism in Confirmation, nourished by the body and blood of Christ in Holy Communion, forgiven in the sacrament of penance, healed in the sacrament of anointing of the sick, etc. Both the body and the soul are redeemed and sanctified by God in the sacraments. It is this truth that governs Catholic doctrine and practice. It is this truth that forms the basis for the Catholic "golden mean" (navigating safely between two extremes).

In the Catholic "golden mean," the body is considered good, consecrated and therefore, must be respected. We are stewards of our bodies, since they are a divine gift. We ought to eat and drink and exercise in moderation, carefully avoiding extremes.

Less than 100 years ago, journalist G.K. Chesterton wrote a prophetic statement for our day: "The true religion of today does not concern itself with dogmas and doctrines. It concerns itself almost entirely with diet."

Many people are religious about their diet and appearance. With tremendous zeal and fervor, many even "evangelize" about the benefits of their respective diets. And certainly we have sufficient examples of this extreme in our society (thank you multimillion dollar diet industry, et al). So, the obsession with the body's perfection is tempered by the belief that the body is created to be perfected by grace in this life and enjoy final perfection in heaven.

But the opposite extreme is to be avoided as well. The body is indeed sacred and has an eternal destination and purpose. We should avoid extremes of food and drink and smoking, which often increase our attachment to bodily pleasures.

Indeed, the body, though deeply wounded by original sin and imperfect in appearance, is perfected and sanctified by our Lord. As a result, the body is considered good and is to be respected; the body is not, however, a god and is not to be worshipped.

Putting the belief of the resurrection of the body into practical application means avoiding two extremes: obsession with appearance or health on the one hand and blatant disregard on the other. Only by following the "golden mean" will we ensure eternal happiness and possibly save ourselves $40,000 in the meantime.

Humans, all creation are part of God's plan for salvation, pope says

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Human beings are not bits of dust randomly scattered in the universe, but were created by a loving God and are destined for salvation in Christ, Pope John Paul II said.

At a May 5 general audience threatened by rain, the pope offered what he said would be the first of several reflections on the hymn to Christ in St. Paul's Letter to the Colossians.

The canticle proclaims that all things created in heaven and on earth were created in Christ and that Christ reconciled all creation to himself through his sacrifice on the cross.

"In the hymn," the pope said, "there emerges the great figure of Christ, Lord of the cosmos."

The canticle proclaims that God is at work in every aspect of creation through his Son, the pope said.

"He also is the lord of the history of salvation, which is manifest in the church and is accomplished by 'the blood of his cross,' the source of peace and harmony for humanity," he said.

Pope John Paul said the canticle reassures believers that everything in creation and everything in history is subject to God's power and that Christ will triumph no matter what happens.

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

"In this way, the hymn paints a stupendous fresco of the universe and of history, inviting us to trust," he said.

"We are not a useless speck of dust lost in a senseless space and time, but we are part of a wise plan flowing from the love of the Father," the pope said.

Speaking in Polish, the pope said, "The whole world that surrounds us, and especially the human person, carries in itself the fingerprint of the eternal word of God and, simply by its existence, it witnesses to God and his love."

At the end of the audience, the bishops of Michigan and Ohio joined Pope John Paul in blessing an estimated 12,000 people in St. Peter's Square.

The bishops were in Rome for their "ad limina" visits, which bishops make every five years to report on the status of their dioceses.

The strangers among us

Working Matters

JOANITA M. NELLENBACH

"Him? Been here a few days I guess. Not from around here; I couldn't understand a word he said. The clerk down at the builder's supply said he heard the guy was trying to get work as a carpenter."

What kind of a reception did Joseph get when he and his family showed up in some Egyptian town? We don't know from Matthew 2:13-15 what their refugee lives were like.

I like to think their neighbors helped the family settle in, helped Joseph find work.

But what if they had a terrible time in their new home? Maybe one of their neighbors, another refugee from Israel and one who'd learned to speak the local language, said there'd been talk: "Just what we need, another one moving in to take our jobs," he'd heard someone say. "Why don't these people stay home? They don't have any right to be here."

"Both the Old and New Testaments tell compelling stories of refugees forced to flee because of oppression," Franciscan Father Thomas Betz writes in "A Guide to Understanding Catholic Social Teaching on Immigration and the Movement of Peoples" (hereafter, Guide), which the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops published in 2003.

Guide, based on the USCCB's "Welcoming the Stranger Among Us: Unity in Diversity," published in 2000, is a resource your parish can use "as a study guide, discussion starter, and guide to action ...."

Oppression can be political or economic. Whatever the reason, Catholic social teaching makes these points: migration is a right, nations can regulate their borders and the regulation must be just.

As defined in Guide, the first principle is that "People have the right to migrate to sustain their lives and the lives of their families."

Because we are all equal in God's sight, we all have the same rights, as Guide says, to "what is necessary for life —food, clothing, shelter. Moreover, every person has the right to education, medical care, religion, and the expression of one's culture."

"In many places people live in fear, danger, or dehumanizing poverty," Guide continues. "Clearly, it is not God's will that some of his children live in luxury while others have nothing .... When a person cannot achieve a meaningful life in his or her own land, that person has the right to move."

In a perfect world, of course, all of the earth's resources would be equally divided and none of us would be scarfing up more than our share (we would even be willing to do with less so that others could have more) but, since that hasn't happened yet, we have immigration.

However, the second principle states, "A country has the right to regulate its borders and to control immigration." Guide explains that, "while people have the right to move, no country has the duty to receive so many immigrants that its social and economic life are jeopardized."

So, do these principles cancel each other out? Not if read in the context of the third principle: "A country must regulate its borders with justice and mercy."

For instance, "A merciful immigration policy will not force married couples or children to live separately from their families for long periods." Yet, as Elizabeth Dudas said in "Making Room at the Table," it normally takes five years for an immigrant with residency status to bring his or her family to this country.

How would similar immigration policies have affected Jesus, Mary and Joseph? Would they have been considered criminals because they didn't have legal permission to live in Egypt? Would they have had to live apart for years as they struggled to establish residency? Would they have been exploited because they feared that if they complained they'd be deported? What would their lives have been like as "undocumented aliens"?

A column for dummies

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

I used to breeze by the section of the bookstore that displays the "For Dummies" books.

I'm sure you've seen the familiar black-and-yellow covers with the words "For Dummies" in a yellow chalk-like font to give you the impression that you are in grade school. Since the mascot of the book, "Dummies Man," has a triangular face that looks like an upside-down dunce cap, I assumed the books weren't for me. That is until I came across "Catholicism For Dummies."

At first glance it looks a little insulting, because as anyone at Mass will tell you, Catholicism isn't for dummies. But two priests, Father John Triglio and Father Kenneth Brighenti, authored the book, so surely it wasn't making fun of our religion. And the book carries an Imprimatur, meaning a church authority has reviewed it and it is free of doctrinal error.

"Catholicism for Dummies" makes understanding the faith far easier than any book I've ever read. The "For Dummies" books are written so that a casual reader can find information fast. The table of contents is eight pages, the index runs for 19. You know you are reading a good reference book when you flip to a page and find something that interests you and then leads you to another topic. That happened to me several times while glancing through the book.

The book is also full of icons with titles such as "From the Bible" and "Remember" that direct the reader to important points. Some of the catchy chapter and subchapter titles border on blasphemy: "The Official Scoop on Mary" describes the Blessed Mother; the section on celibacy is called "Flying Solo for Life." Despite the attempt at mirth, the scholarship beneath the titles is solid.

Father Trigilio of Marysville, Pa., and Father Brighenti of Raritan, N.J., wrote the book after being approached by an agent. The two, who have been friends since seminary in the mid 1980s, are celebrities to anyone who watches Eternal World Television Network (EWTN), where they are featured on the program "Council on Faith." Their goal was to write a book that was similar to the "Catechism of the Catholic Church," but was easier to read.

You'd be surprised at who is reading the book. Although it was written for non-Catholics and non-practicing Catholics, the two priests find that many Catholics enjoy the easy-to-read prose. The book is also being used as a college textbook at Seton Hall University and in RCIA courses around the country.

"We've gotten very positive feedback on the book especially from the parents of fallen-away Catholics who say the book helped their adult children come back to the faith," said Father Triglio.

"Part of being a priest is to be a teacher," said Father Brighenti. "It's nice to live in a technological age where we can use TV and books to get out the good news of Christ."

The book has sold well. The "For Dummies" series is one of the most successful brands in book publishing with more than 950 titles in print. The authors of "Catholicism for Dummies" say their book has sold 49,000 copies in its first year. The publisher, Wiley Publishing, won't discuss specifics about sales but says the book is doing very well.

Father Brighenti finds it all very humbling. "I'm just doing my job as a priest," he said.

Father Trigilio feels the book is part of a renaissance. "In an uncertain world, with the war and the economy as they are, people seem to want to know the content of their faith as well as the practice of it."

Both men donate their proceeds from the book and others they have co-authored — Father Brighenti to the Religious Teachers Filippini, Father Trigilio to Sister Angelica and EWTN.

"Catholicism for Dummies" has traveled far. Father Trigilio sent a copy to Pope John Paul II and received a note from the pope's office congratulating the priests for their ministry.

The next book they are thinking about has a working title of "The Papacy for Dummies." I wonder how the Holy Father would react to that?

The intersection of prayer and fitness

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

Prayer gradually has been re-entering hospital rooms and doctors' offices over the past decade. A number of recent studies are stacking up in favor of faith and spirituality in the healing process and in the treatment of many illnesses, diseases and psychiatric disorders.

But now prayer is going even further into the world of health. Yoga studios and gyms are beginning to "see the light," incorporating faith into various fitness and wellness programs.

The most obvious example is The Lord's Gym. Founded in 1997 as an alternative to the "meat market" environment of most fitness centers, the Lord's Gym fosters an "environment where men and women can exercise without the discomfort of gawkers and those flaunting their bodies openly."

Aiming to be a "morally wholesome" environment, the gyms play Christian music, feature huge murals of Jesus carrying a cross, and include Scripture cards on the treadmills, stationary bikes and weight benches.

Members can participate in Chariots of Fire (spinning), Praise and Stretch, Stairway to Heaven (step aerobics) or Karate for Christ, among several exercise programs. A cycling class takes participants on a virtual trip through the streets of Jerusalem.

Another example, the Ridgely Retreat facility in Annapolis, Md., began as a place where people with arthritis could exercise. However, now it offers everything from Candlelight Yoga to retreat rooms to a Creative Playhouse with group activities for children.

The intersection of prayer and fitness doesn't surprise me and many in my generation. As a runner from the time I was a high school freshman, I've always used that quiet time to pray (and to distract me from the pain I feel at the second mile). I'll either have a casual conversation with God, recite the prayer of St. Francis or say a novena.

When I ran around the University of Notre Dame campus as a student, I'd visit the grotto as my last water stop, pause to say a prayer and sometimes light a votive candle for a special intention. There I'd see a half dozen students doing the same at the beginning, middle or end of their runs.

As a Catholic I've always believed in the power of prayer to heal. As someone who enjoys food too much, I've always exercised. And when I put the two together I feel twice as empowered. In an age when we desperately need prayer and exercise, it makes sense to combine the two.

St. Joseph Vietnamese Church symbolizes religious freedom for growing community

The new St. Joseph Vietnamese Church in Charlotte was dedicated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis May 2. The 22,300-square foot facility includes a new church, offices, an education center and the original worship space.

CHARLOTTE — Many at St. Joseph Vietnamese Church have crossed oceans of water and endured unbelievable hardships to build their new church.

Immediately following the evacuation of U.S. troops from Vietnam in 1975, some 135,000 Vietnamese — mostly ex-military and government officials who had worked for the United States during the war, and their families — fled to America.

In the nearly 30 years since Saigon fell to the Communists, Vietnamese have come to comprise the largest population of Southeast Asian refugees to have settled in the United States. With their American-born children, they number nearly 1 million.

Through worldwide humanitarian efforts and sponsorships from American individuals and organizations, including Catholic Social Services, Vietnamese refugees received opportunities to come to North Carolina.

Ministry to Vietnamese immigrants developed in the Diocese of Charlotte during the early 1980s, with the small community gathering for Mass at Our Lady of the Assumption Church, Our Lady of Consolation Church and St. Ann Church in Charlotte.

Charlotte's Vietnamese Catholic community numbered about 20 families when they chose St. Joseph as their patron in May 1981. By 1988, the community was 400 strong and growing.

Through a diocesan sponsorship, Father Peter Tan Van Le arrived to serve as chaplain to the Vietnamese community in April 1993 from the Diocese of Vinh Long, which was home to some 300,000 Catholics south of Ho Chi Minh City, Vietnam.

Many members of the Vietnamese Catholic community had been imprisoned by the Communists for their beliefs prior to coming to Charlotte in search of jobs and religious freedom, said Father Tan Van Le.

Having been imprisoned for 13 years and celebrating Mass in secret, Father Tan Van Le came via a diocesan sponsorship.

In September 1994, the St. Joseph community began meeting weekly for Mass and other activities at St. Ann Church. In May 1995, the community received permission from then-Bishop William G. Curlin to build its own church.

Almost three years of enthusiastic fund-raising activities ensued, and in February 1998, the community purchased the former Steele Creek Baptist Church, a nearby house and the surrounding property. The first Mass was celebrated Aug. 30 of that year.

The 300-seat church served as a cultural center for the 1,500 Vietnamese Catholics in the Charlotte area at the time, as well as the locality's greater Vietnamese population of close to 10,000.

The Vietnamese Catholic community of Charlotte dedicated its new church and cultural center Nov. 29, 1999. Then-Bishop Curlin concelebrated the Mass with Father Tan Van Le. The dedication Mass and festivities, attended by some 2,500 people, crystallized a dream which had been almost 20 years in the making.

The liturgy highlighted two days of celebrating the dedication of St. Joseph Vietnamese Church. Youth activities, the sacrament of reconciliation and a Mass honoring Vietnamese saints added to the weekend occasion.

Regular Masses celebrated in Vietnamese continued over the years, with Vietnamese-language classes being taught to children and catechism classes in Vietnamese and English offered to both children and adults.

Almost 2,000 people crowded the new St. Joseph Vietnamese Church dedicated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis May 2, 2004. Like the previous church's dedication, the event included a weekend-long celebration with traditional music, food and expression of worship.

The $1.8 million facility, which includes offices and an education center, totals almost 22,300 square feet. The worship space, featuring religious items from Vietnam, can accommodate 725 people, more than double the existing church that connects to the new facility.

Masses in Vietnamese are celebrated daily, with perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament Monday through Saturday.

The Vietnamese community in the 46-county Diocese of Charlotte is now estimated at 9,200 people.

David Irion observes the crucifix at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Marshall, Alaska. Some parishioners claimed the crucifix began to bleed from the nail markings during the Easter Vigil April 10. Bishop Donald J. Kettler of Fairbanks sent a representative to investigate and later said the person "couldn't see any changes" on the crucifix.

Reports of bleeding crucifix bring pilgrims to Alaska

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (CNS) — Reports that a crucifix started bleeding from classic stigmata points has drawn visitors to a remote Alaskan village church.

Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Marshall, an Eskimo village of about 360 people, has been abuzz since the Easter Vigil, when a group of parishioners say the church's main crucifix began to bleed from the feet, hands and side.

Anna Polty, 73, and her friend Sophie Shorty claim they saw something happening to the crucifix during the April 10 Easter Vigil. A closer inspection after the vigil revealed the crucifix was bleeding.

"Where they nailed his hands, and on his feet and on that cut on his side it was starting to bleed," Polty said. "His knee starting to bleed too, and his elbow too. Started sliding down, all that blood."

Polty and Shorty asked three remaining parishioners and the visiting priest — Marshall does not have a resident pastor — to go look at the crucifix.

Everyone agreed something strange was going on, Polty said. The visiting priest was unable to be reached for comment, but Polty said the priest couldn't explain why the crucifix was bleeding.

By Easter morning, the village was astir with the reports, and locals poured into the church to see for themselves. Some noticed a change in the crucifix and others didn't, according to Immaculate Heart parish administrator Clara Shorty.

Over the next few days, people from surrounding villages started showing up to pray and study the crucifix. Clara Shorty estimated that in the three weeks after Easter, at least two dozen visitors had flown into Marshall — there are no roads to the village — some from hundreds of miles away.

Bishop Donald J. Kettler of Fairbanks, whose diocese includes Marshall, sent a representative to check out the crucifix a few days after Easter. He said the representative "looked carefully and couldn't see any changes." But, the bishop added, that report does not mean that nothing happened.

"As long as people are using it to strengthen their faith and are staying within the message of Jesus Christ, we can see it as a blessing, whatever it is," he said.

The bishop sent a letter about the crucifix to the parishes of his diocese, saying he will "continue to gather information and will proceed slowly, carefully and prayerfully."

Judge overturns feeding tube law; court battles likely to continue

CLEARWATER, Fla. (CNS) — Despite a Florida judge's May 6 ruling overturning Terri's Law as "unjustifiable state interference" with constitutionally protected privacy rights, the court battles over brain-damaged Terri Schiavo's feeding tube were likely to continue.

Schiavo, 40, was left brain-damaged in 1990 after a heart stoppage and has received nutrition and hydration through a feeding tube. But her estranged husband, Michael, has been battling in court to have the feeding tube removed, saying Terri would not want to be kept alive artificially.

Six days after Terri's feeding tube was removed in October 2003, the Florida Legislature approved a bill allowing Florida Gov. Jeb Bush to issue an executive order that tube-feeding be resumed.

In his May 6 decision, Pinellas Circuit Court Judge Douglas Baird of Clearwater said the Florida Constitution "guarantees to every citizen the right to be the master of his or her own personal private medical decisions."

But the new law allows "unjustifiable state interference with the privacy right of every individual without any semblance of due process protection," he added.

Gov. Bush plans to defend the constitutionality of the law, and the issue is expected to reach the Florida Supreme Court.

Burke Balch of the Robert Powell Center for Medical Ethics, a department of the National Right to Life Committee, said he hoped Baird's decision would be reversed on appeal. He also expressed support for the Florida Starvation and Dehydration of Persons with Disabilities Prevention Act, a more comprehensive version of Terri's Law that failed to pass in Florida's recently ended legislative session.

Iraq abuse stories belie work of 'great democracy'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The abuse of Iraqi prisoners by U.S. soldiers represented an "unequivocal and inadmissible contrast with the principles of a great democracy," the Vatican newspaper said.

The report May 6 in L'Osservatore Romano was the first Vatican comment on the scandal over revelation of alleged torture and abuse of Iraqi captives at the Abu Ghraib prison in Baghdad.

"The detailed revelations about the torture — in some cases deadly — inflicted on prisoners by forces engaged in Iraq and Afghanistan are affecting world public opinion and especially public opinion in the United States," the newspaper said.

Beyond global criticisms, it said, "it is precisely the U.S. people who have been most wounded in learning that this disfigurement of the human person, represented by torture, could be perpetrated under its flag."

It said the photos of the Iraqi prisoners, "humiliated physically and morally in order to weaken their resistance to interrogators," have rightly triggered widespread indignation.

The scandal erupted after CBS released pictures showing grinning U.S. soldiers allegedly abusing and humiliating prisoners, some of them naked, in the Iraqi prison.

Administrative and criminal investigations have begun and President George W. Bush, in interviews broadcast on Arab TV stations May 5, promised that the soldiers responsible would be punished.

Pope urges U.S. bishops to be close to their priests, encourage them

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Bishops must love, listen to, support and correct the priests in their diocese, Pope John Paul II told bishops from Michigan and Ohio.

"As a spiritual father and brother to his priests, the bishop should do everything in his power to encourage them in fidelity to their vocation and to the demands of leading a life worthy of the calling they have received," the pope told the bishops May 6 as part of their "ad limina" visit.

The bishop, he said, must be close to all the people in his diocese, and built up the unity and communion of the church "in faith, hope and love" by establishing "an ever-closer relationship with your priests."

Pope John Paul said each bishop should relate to his priests "as a father and brother who loves them, listens to them, welcomes them, corrects them, supports them, seeks their cooperation and, as much as possible, is concerned for their human, spiritual, ministerial and financial well-being."

The pope said the "bonds of fraternal unity" with and among priests must be strengthened, particularly through reinforcing the spiritual life and identity they share and their "life of celibate chastity."

Pope John Paul urged the bishops to take seriously their personal responsibility for the seminaries in their dioceses and for the training of candidates to the priesthood to produce men with "mature and balanced personalities, men capable of establishing sound human and pastoral relationships, knowledgeable in theology, solid in the spiritual life and in love with the church."

Bishops also must ensure that ongoing formation programs are in place for men who already have been ordained.

"In this way, they will grow ever more fully into 'men of the church,' imbued with a truly catholic spirit and authentic missionary zeal," the pope said.

It has traveled throughout the United States since its unveiling during Pope John Paul II's 1999 visit to St. Louis.

OUT OF THE SHADOWS

CSS learns to spot trafficking victims

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

HICKORY — Catholic Social Services of the Diocese of Charlotte is continuing its efforts to bring the hidden problem of human trafficking out of the shadows.

Seventy CSS employees learned to identify the signs and symptoms of human trafficking and how to assist victims during an in-service training day at St. Aloysius Church in Hickory April 22.

The day's featured presenter was Laurie Latuda, a grants and programs administrator with the Office of Refugee Programs in the U.S. bishops' Migration and Refugee Services (MRS).

"Oftentimes the only contact that people who have been trafficked have with the outside world is through religious ministers," said Latuda.

While those who profit from the trade in human beings often keep their victims under close watch, attending weekly Mass might be the only activity that the trafficker allows them to do alone.

"In almost all cases, language barriers, lack of contacts in the new land, beatings and fear of reprisals on family members left behind combine to keep the victims silent and unable to flee to safety," said Joe Purello, director of the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace of CSS.

An estimated 18,000 to 20,000 victims of human trafficking — most of them women and children — enter the United States each year. The number of people brought across international borders worldwide for the sex trade or other forced labor is placed at anywhere from 400,000 to a million or more annually.

These victims "often believe they are coming here to find the American dream," said Latuda. Instead, she said, many victims find forced labor, sexual exploitation or other contemporary forms of slavery.

Because of the lack of legal immigration options, they sometimes pay people to smuggle them into the United States "and sometimes (the smugglers) turn out to be traffickers who enslave them," she said.

"It's quite profitable," Latuda added. "There are networks ... who traffic in people, just like there are networks of drug traffickers or arms traffickers."

"We must do all we can to fight our culture's overwhelming trend to turn sexual activity into a commodity to be bought and sold," said Purello, adding that, "the trend to turn sex into a commodity (on TV, in movies, in popular music) often involves packaging sex with violence."

"We are also called to be much more conscious of the working conditions of laborers who make and provide the goods we buy," he said. "If a serious dent can be made in the demand side of the human trafficking business, then we will also see a significant fall in the number of people being trapped and exploited."

Anyone who suspects a trafficking situation that has not yet been reported or investigated should start by calling the Justice Department's Trafficking in Persons and Worker Exploitation Task Force complaint line at (888) 428-7581, advised Latuda. That will initiate a federal investigation into the matter.

People also can help the trafficked person obtain free or low-cost legal services from an attorney familiar with the provisions of the federal law.

Latuda and others like her at MRS, who can be reached at (202) 541-3385, can help the trafficked person connect with local social service agencies that will help them before and after they are certified as trafficking victims.

CSS welcomes new area director

BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — Making the Catholic Social Services Western Region Office (CSS/WRO) very visible and better known so that it's a place where people "can come and get help when they're hurting" is one of Debra Braese's goals.

Braese has succeeded Sister Marie Frechette as CSS/WRO's area director. Sister Frechette, of the Missionary Servants of the Most Blessed Trinity, is now heading the order's mission advancement office in Philadelphia.

"I saw this as an opportunity to work in an environment that supported my faith belief," said Braese, a parishioner at St. Andrew the Apostle in Mars Hill.

"I don't think that opportunity comes along very often, so it was a good mix of my experience and my faith," said Braese. "This position includes all the parts of social work and ministry that I like: counseling, outreach to the community, working with parishes and program development."

Braese has been a social worker for 24 years. She has worked in child protective services in the Buncombe County Department of Social Services (DSS), as a children's outpatient therapist in a mental health center in Burlington, as assistant director of Haywood County DSS and as program manager for Buncombe County DSS.

Braese holds a master's degree in social work from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

She said that it's "important ... that CSS not be seen as a nonprofit agency that stands on its own, but that it is an extension of God's light, that there's hope and healing and outreach in the services that we provide. If parishes can embrace us as an agency that can help take care of our community, that's a unique position to be in."

Located in Asheville, WRO/CSS serves western North Carolina from Alleghany, Wilkes, Caldwell, Burke and Rutherford counties to the Tennessee border.

Staff members, in addition to Braese, who provides individual counseling, are Lori Gilcrist, office manager; Ada Volkmer and Jerry Tudela, immigration specialists; Svetlana Gundorin, refugee specialist for people from the former Soviet Union; Carol Meyerriecks and Michele Sheppard, international and domestic adoption workers; and Shelly Kilgore, adoption administrative assistant. Sheppard also handles pregnancy support.

How to Identify a Trafficked Person

1. Why and how did the person come into the country?

Many trafficking victims are smuggled into the U.S. or come on legitimate visas with the promise of a good job. Once here, they may be forced into a different job and/or work off their travel "debt."

2. How was the person recruited?

Many victims are recruited by acquaintances/people in their ethnic group who offer "success stories" in the U.S. Terms of their contract before departure are vague and they are surprised to learn they owe exorbitant debts for travel, lodging, food, etc.

3. Does the person have identification papers?

Many victims have their documents seized upon arrival by their traffickers or employers.

4. Does the person owe money to his/her employer?

The person may have been promised a good job with pay but learned he/she must work off his/her travel debt. While doing so, he/she is charged exorbitant fees for rent, food and clothes leading them into a cycle of debt to his/her employer.

5. Does the person get paid a fair wage?

How many hours does he/she work? Does he/she receive compensation or does it go directly to the employer?

6. Where does the person live? Is their freedom restricted in any way?

Victims may be forced to live in the same place where they work. They may not be allowed to leave the premises and/or may be frightened into staying inside due to their immigration status and lack of documents (if the employer is holding them).

7. Has the person been threatened to prevent him/her from leaving?

In addition to physical harm, the person may be subject to psychological intimidation and/or coercion through threats to family members if he/she tries to leave.

Orphaned sisters find new home through CSS prospects for the stability and love of an adoptive home weren't good.

But thanks to Catholic Social Services (CSS) and a loving couple from Minnesota, Marina and Olivia traveled more than 6,000 miles from southeastern Russia to the Midwestern prairie of the United States. They now have a new country, a new home and new parents.

The story of the sisters and the adoptive parents, Randy and Rita Ward of Eden Prairie, Minn., is heartwarming and typical for the International Adoption Program, based in the Western Regional Office of Catholic Social Services in Asheville.

"We are the only Catholic agency in the country with a direct placement program in Russia," said Carol Meyerriecks, international adoption director.

Direct placement means the CSS office deals directly with Russian authorities in placing children in U.S. homes, usually making the adoption faster and less expensive than an agency that does not have direct placement capability.

Still, adoption is expensive; according to Meyerriecks, the average cost of an international adoption is $24,000.

The Wards, married for 16 years, decided several years ago that they wanted to adopt.

COURTESY PHOTO

Marina and Olivia traveled more than 6,000 miles from southeastern Russia to the United States to live with Randy and Rita Ward. The adoption was made possible by the Western Region Office of Catholic Social Services in Asheville.

"Our lives forever changed after Randy's parents died and then my 20-year-old son died," said Rita Ward. "All we could do was turn to God and trust God to hold us through each day. When we thought about older kids who have lost parents, we knew that grief and loss was something we had experience with."

The Wards are somewhat unusual in that they are older than the typical adoptive parents. Randy is 50, Rita is 46.

"Because of our ages, we wanted to adopt sisters so that the children would always have someone they could to cling to, no matter what happens to us," said Rita.

"I prayed for this for a long time. My husband thought we would never get what we wanted, but every day I got on the Internet and sent out a few e-mails," she said. "Last summer, I found a list of agencies certified for adoption by the Russian government, and that's when I wrote to Carol."

The Wards have never met Meyerriecks in person, although they've talked on the telephone and exchanged e-mails many times. Usually in an adoption, the initial contact is followed by a home study, which is an in-depth background check that certifies an applicants' fitness to be adoptive parents.

Since a home study had already been completed for the Wards, their adoption of the girls, which began in August, was completed by the fall.

"International adoptions usually go quickly because there is a tremendous need for adoptive parents and the Wards were willing to take older children," said Meyerriecks.

The CSS staff in Asheville arranges happy endings, like the Wards and their new children, all the time. But Meyerriecks would like to do more.

"Most couples prefer infant adoptions," she said. "There are lots of great older kids out there who need a home."

In October 2003, the Wards traveled to Kirov, a five-hour drive from Moscow, and met their daughters-to-be.

"Everyone was so very nice to us. It was very emotional for the orphanage since ours was their first adoption," said Rita. "On the first night, we stayed in a hotel with the girls and got to know one another. They got very giggly and we all had a great time."

As with most adoptive parents, it was love at first sight, even though there was a language barrier. Neither of the Wards speaks Russian.

"Randy and I have gotten very good at charades and sign language," said Rita. "The girls always laugh whenever I try to pronounce something in Russian."

Marina and Olivia, who are in the second grade and kindergarten respectively, are adjusting to life in the United States with ease; they make regular trips to the nearby Mall of America and are learning about the Catholic faith at the Pax Christi Catholic community in Eden Prairie.

Marina and Oliva will be baptized over the Memorial Day weekend.

"They had no experience with church or prayer before coming here. They are celebrities at our parish," said Rita. "Olivia gets mixed up sometimes and thinks Father Tim Power is Jesus, to which he responds 'I'm a close personal friend.'"

Nearly 200 Abbey seniors join in 126th commencement exercises

The college presented to 193 graduates Bachelor of Arts and Bachelor of Science degrees.

Faculty achievements were also recognized, including Dr. Sheila Reilly as the recipient of the 2004 Adrian Award. Bishop Peter J. Jugis was one of three leaders in the Charlotte community to receive honorary doctorates during the ceremonies.

Ordained bishop of the Diocese of Charlotte at St. Matthew Church Oct. 24, 2003, Bishop Jugis previously served as pastor of Our Lady of Lourdes Church in Monroe and judicial vicar of the diocesan tribunal.

A native of Charlotte, Bishop Jugis is a graduate of South Mecklenburg High School and earned a bachelor's degree in business administration from the University of North Carolina at Charlotte before he entered Pontifical North American College, a seminary in Rome.

He was ordained in 1983 by Pope John Paul II in St. Peter's Basilica in Rome. In 1993, Bishop Jugis received his doctorate in church canon law from Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C.

Other recipients of honorary doctorates were Rev. Richard Boyce, professor of preaching and pastoral leadership at Union Theological Seminary and Presbyterian School of Christian Education in Charlotte, and Jim Palermo, executive in residence at Johnson & Wales University in Charlotte.

Belmont Abbey College was named one of the country's leading private liberal arts colleges by U.S. News and World Report. The 650-acre campus consists of the college, the monastery and the Abbey Basilica.

Nearly a thousand students call Belmont Abbey home. The students, with diverse religious and cultural backgrounds, represent more than 18 countries and 34 states and pursue undergraduate degrees in a number of liberal arts course offerings.

Founded in 1876, the college celebrates its heritage and is inspired by the Benedictine monastic tradition. Listed on the National Register of Historic Places, the college and Abbey Basilica greet thousands of visitors each year.

Bishop McGuinness hosts Special Olympics

600 Olympians compete in Spring Games

KERNERSVILLE — Special athletes ages eight and up walked, ran, raced in wheelchairs, long-jumped and threw balls for winning ribbons during the Forsyth County Special Olympics Spring Games held at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School.

The games, held on the school's field April 19-21, were part of the countywide Special Olympics program.

The program allows children and adults with mental retardation or other closely related developmental disabilities to train and compete in a wide array of sports. It allows winning athletes to advance to international competitions.

Approximately 600 athletes from schools throughout the county competed in the Spring Games, which were attended by approximately 1,200 parents, volunteers and athletes, according to Lisa Kiser, Forsyth County Special Olympics volunteer coordinator.

"Every student in our school participated in some way," said Ann Lynch, Bishop McGuinness director of advancement. "Bishop McGuinness has a long history of being involved with the Special Olympics as volunteers."

According to Shirley Shaw, Bishop McGuinness Spanish teacher, who coordinated the event and has been involved with Special Olympics for the past 10 years, this year's Spring Games were held at the school rather than at Wake Forest University, their regular location, because of construction at the university.

"Our folks loved it and would like to do it again," said Shaw. "It just turned out really well and was really exciting."

Kiser said Bishop McGuinness' long history of involvement made it a great choice for the Spring Games.

"They are heavily involved," said Kiser. "A quarter of their students are involved with Special Olympics sometime during the year."

Shaw said the volunteers have found through the years that by being involved, they receive even more than the athletes do.

"The fact that they care so much and work so hard is really inspiring to us," said Shaw.

According to Lynch, although students had classes on Monday and Wednesday, the entire day Tuesday was devoted to volunteering at the games.

Tuesday, which was the day the elementary-age Olympians competed, the school hosted a carnival, complete with games, food and drinks, a Krispy Kreme doughnut decorating machine and over 5,000 prizes, all of which were donated.

The games began on Monday with an opening ceremony, at which all the elementary, middle, high school and adult competitors were present.

Athletes were able to compete in various categories, including motor activities, jumps, shot puts, softball and tennis ball throws, relays, dashes, walks and wheelchair races. Game winners were awarded ribbons throughout the event.

Brittany Shoemaker, 13, who has competed in Special Olympics for the past two years, said she enjoys everything about the event.

"Everything is fun about it," said Shoemaker. "I especially like running and swimming, and we only get like one minute of school."

Highlanders sign Smith in late signing period

RADFORD, Va. — Radford University men's basketball coach Byron Samuels announced his first signing of the late signing period, inking Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School student Branden Smith to a National Letter of Intent April 29.

A senior at Bishop McGuinness in Kernersville, Smith will add more athleticism to Radford's perimeter game. The 6-3, 180-pound combo-guard averaged 21.0 points per game and 5.0 rebounds per game. Smith also tallied 4.4 assists and 4.1 steals per game at Bishop McGuinness.

Smith has a 43-inch vertical leap, giving him the ability to play under the basket, but he also has skill from beyond the arc, shooting 46 percent from three-point land.

"Branden Smith is a difference maker. He's an excellent shooter and strong athlete. His size and strength help us immediately," said Samuels.

"What sets Branden apart are his love for playing and his love for competing. I'm 100 percent confident in Branden as a person, student and basketball player," he said.

In addition to his athleticism and shooting ability, Samuels is also excited about what role Smith, a native of Chesapeake, Va., will play for the Highlanders.

"I envision him ... giving us one of the best backcourts in the Big South Conference and beyond," said Samuels. "Branden can flat-out play, and I'm proud to have him in the Radford basketball family."

Smith will join Radford University this fall as a freshman with four years of eligibility. Smith is the third committed recruit the Highlanders have in place.

Priest returns to discuss mission work in Zambia

CHARLOTTE — From Charlotte to Zambia and back again, Capuchin Father Steve Hoyt is living his dream.

Father Hoyt, former chaplain at Charlotte Catholic High School, departed for Zambia in September 2002. His journey was the fulfillment of a dream to serve as a missionary since joining his order almost 20 years ago.

Father Hoyt will return to the school to discuss his work in Zambia on Sunday, May 16. The free event will include presentations about issues facing young Zambians and how they can be assisted through prayer, service and awareness.

Father Hoyt first got a taste of mission life in February 2002, when his order arranged a visit to the Capuchin mission headquarters in Zambia's capital. He described the experience as humbling.

"So many Zambians expressed their honor and pleasure to meet me," he said. "They gave me so much more than I could possibly give them. I witnessed their endurance, suffering and the beauty of their faithfulness and love stemming from the family."

When he left for Zambia in September 2002, he was one of 35 Capuchins working at three mission sites separated by 300-400 miles.

Capuchin mission work in Zambia, which is about the size of Texas, originated in 1932 when the Irish Capuchins established the first mission in Loanja. In 1965, U.S. Capuchins took over missions in Chinyingi and Zambezi. They have continued to expand their reach and establish new missions.

WANT TO GO?

The "meet and greet" with Capuchin Father Steve Hoyt will take place in the chapel of Charlotte Catholic High School on Sunday, May 16. Mass is at 1 p.m.; Father Hoyt's presentation is at 2 p.m.

Holy Angels honors volunteers at annual banquet

Missy Tiber, Dr. Richard Rankin, Lora Grant and Brittany Hampton display their awards at Holy Angels' 14th Annual Volunteer Appreciation Banquet April 22.

BELMONT — Holy Angels presented volunteer awards during the 14th Annual Volunteer Appreciation Banquet April 22 as part of Volunteer Appreciation Week celebrations.

Founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy, Holy Angels is a nonprofit corporation providing residential services programs for children and adults with varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities, some of whom are medically fragile.

Volunteer of the Year went to Brittany Hampton of Stanley.

Hampton has been a volunteer in the Oakcrest Fox Run ICF/MR (Intermediate Care Facilities for the Mentally Retarded) since September 2003. A junior at East Gaston High School, Hampton developed an interest in volunteering following a presentation on Holy Angels at her school.

Volunteer Group of the Year went to Gaston Day School in Gastonia.

This past year, Holy Angels and Gaston Day School formed a unique partnership. The two organizations have similar goals for the students they serve — to help each individual reach his or her highest potential through creative programs and services.

Both organizations were committed to making this a most interesting and innovative partnership, filled with opportunities for the students to participate in a variety of educational and service activities. The students were offered opportunities with the potential to change the way they view the community and accept the differences of the people who live there.

The Holy Angels residents enjoyed soccer, basketball and volleyball games — many for the first time. Several students volunteered during their after-school hours.

Gaston Day School students also raised over $9,000 during the Hands Around Our School fundraiser.

The Ed Sabatini Advocacy Award went to Lora Grant of Belmont.

Named in honor of the late Ed Sabatini, the award recognizes an individual or group who serves as an advocate of Holy Angels.

Grant has been a creative, enthusiastic and driving force behind many Holy Angels programs. She was often an ambassador to recruit volunteers for activities for Holy Angels, such as the Angel Bowl, and worked to promote Holy Angels' Cherubs Café & Candy Bouquets in Belmont.

The Dennis McClain Volunteer of the Year Award went to Missy Tiber of Cramerton.

Dennis McClain was a classroom volunteer at the former Maria Morrow Center who signed up as a volunteer after learning he had a terminal illness. McClain came with his wife, Maria, two hours each week to assist students with a variety of classroom activities. His last visit was just days prior to his death.

Tiber, Belmont Abbey College's women's basketball coach, has been a volunteer since August 2003. She has accompanied residents on field trips, assisted the Holy Angels Foundation with the Hands Around Our School project, and recently ran for Holy Angels in the "Run for the Money" race where she won second place in her division.

Protecting the pope

Swiss Guard to celebrate 500 years of service

moment to sacrifice his life for the pope.

The papal Swiss Guard tradition has been marching on for nearly 500 years — making it the oldest, continually active military corps in history.

On May 5, the corps unveiled plans for its 2006 jubilee celebration. Events will include a commemorative march from Switzerland to Rome to re-enact the Guard's entry into Rome half a millennium ago and to reaffirm that the corps' spirit and dedication to protect the pope have never dimmed.

Poised and ready

Many people, however, do not see that side of the guards as they stand duty at one of the Vatican's entrances. Most tourists see them as the perfect setup for a souvenir snapshot.

"They're not just buttoned up, ready for show; they're very highly trained for any emergency," said Msgr. Charles Burns, a church historian who spent more than 25 years as an official of the Vatican archives.

"And they're not sloppy guards. You won't see them slouching or hanging around smoking a cigarette like the carabinieri," he said, referring to the Italian military police.

The Swiss Guards "take their job very seriously and bring great commitment to it," he said.

Pope John Paul paid tribute to that centuries-old commitment in a May 6 address to 33 new recruits before they took their oath of allegiance later that day in the Vatican.

"Thank you for your service to the successor of Peter and his collaborators here in the Vatican. It is a demanding commitment and perhaps sometimes tiresome, but God will reward you," he said.

Enduring 24-hour shifts, most Swiss Guards find their greatest battle is putting up with thousands of tourists asking the same questions: "Is there a bathroom?" "Which way to the museum?" and "Why can't I see the pope?"

The Swiss Guards attend to the same questions day after day with poise and sometimes even a smile.

The pope's speech to the new recruits came on the day the Vatican honored the 147 Swiss Guards who lost their lives defending Pope Clement VII in the sack of Rome in 1527. Only 42 guards survived.

On this anniversary the Vatican holds a swearing-in of all new guards to help remind them of the seriousness of their commitment.

History of loyalty

The sack of Rome marked the bloodiest day in Swiss Guard history. After that, no other combat deaths have been recorded.

Wielding nothing but Renaissance weaponry, this tiny army kept Nazi soldiers out of Vatican City as Germany occupied Rome during World War II.

The last time the Swiss Guard ever lost to an invader was in 1798 when Napoleon swept through, disarmed and disbanded the corps and abducted two popes in two years. One of those popes, Pius VI, died in captivity.

After that, the guard's record is impeccable, keeping popes and papal territory safe and protected since their troops regrouped in 1800.

It was an undercover Swiss Guard who helped shield Pope John Paul II during the assassination attempt against his life May 13, 1981, in St. Peter's Square.

Perhaps the darkest moment in the Guard's history occurred in 1998 when its former commander, Col. Alois Estermann, and his wife, were murdered by a disgruntled corpsman, Cedric Tornay, who then turned the gun on himself.

Today, numbering 110 men, the Swiss Guard may still be the world's smallest army.

The long march

Pope Julius II formally requested the service of Swiss mercenaries — famed for their courage and loyalty — in June 1505. Just three months later, a regiment left Switzerland and headed on foot for Rome.

One hundred and fifty Swiss soldiers arrived at the Vatican Jan. 22, 1506, the day that marks the official founding of the corps.

Now, nearly 500 years later, the Swiss Guard is gearing up for a full year-and-a-half of jubilee celebrations.

Lt. Gen. Beat Fischer, commander of the Swiss Army Corps and president of the Swiss Guard jubilee committee, said at a Vatican press conference May 5 that at least 100 former guards will leave from Bellinzona, Switzerland, in early April 2006 and head to Rome on foot. After Milan, Italy, they will follow the historical pilgrims' route, the Via Francigena.

By leaving in April, the modern-day marchers will avoid trekking across the Alps in the winter. They will also make just 26 stops along the way — representing Switzerland's 26 cantons — to arrive in Rome a month later in time for the annual swearing-in ceremony for new guards May 6, 2006, in the Vatican.

Any likelihood of there someday being a Miss Swiss Guard? Nixed.

"Not under my command," said Col. Elmar Mader, commander of the Swiss Guard.

"It's a very ecclesial environment" and "60 percent of our corps is under the age of 25; women in the same barracks (as the men) would create big problems," he said.

Avoiding the battle of the sexes just might be their riskiest campaign yet.

Revival energizes black Catholics attending national convocation

By Mary Ann Wyand
Catholic News Service

INDIANAPOLIS — An hour of praise and worship and a nearly-two-hour revival energized participants at the National Black Catholic Convocation April 20 at St. Rita Parish in Indianapolis.

During the revival, Father Patrick Smith, pastor of St. Teresa of Avila Parish in Washington, challenged black Catholics to grow in faith and to reach out to young people who desperately need to hear about the good news of Jesus Christ.

His talk was based on Ezekiel's vision of dry bones that are brought to life by God, as described in chapter 37, verses 1-14.

"What God wants to do is change the lyrics of your life. We need to take the time to listen to the word," Father Smith said.

"We need to talk about teen pregnancy and abortion, stuff we don't talk a whole lot about sometimes," he said. "But, realistically, why talk about the teen pregnancy rate or the abortion rate or the divorce rate or the illiteracy rate or the teacher turnover rate in inner-city schools or the crime rate or the homicide rate or the unemployment rate? Why talk about all that if there is no solution?"

The priest added, "Unless we bring this stuff into the light, we'll never be healed of it. Things change when they get brought into the light. But I think we're just basically afraid."

God brings life to dry bones, he said, referring to Ezekiel.

"He wants you to see just what it looks like when he's not present," Father Smith said. "He wants you to see the mess as it really is. He wants you to know that you can't fix it yourself. ... I can't revive anybody. That's not my job. It's God's job. The question is: Are we ready to be revived by him?"

After the revival, Father Smith said "young people are ready for the radical Gospel, of truly imitating Christ. They're waiting for the (church) leadership to say, 'OK. Let's go.' They need to hear it."

Msgr. Ray East, director of the Office of Black Catholics for the Archdiocese of Washington, led the praise and worship.

After the revival, Msgr. East said many teenagers and young adults are very involved in ministry and mission outreach. The challenge is to involve all youths in church ministries.

"They're today's church leaders," he told The Criterion, newspaper of the Indianapolis Archdiocese. "All we need to do is give them the microphone. The Lord is already using them. They're already in ministry."

During the National Catholic Youth Conference last November in Houston, Msgr. East said, he heard teens share powerful mission stories.

"Young people had already gone on mission trips," he said. "They had already been to Guatemala, Honduras, El Salvador and Haiti, and they were sharing their mission stories. They were trained missioners, and they were only 14 and 16 years old. I couldn't believe it.

"What we need to do is highlight what they're doing and support them in the ministry that God has already given them," he said. "I think they have so much to teach us. It's like God speaks to us through the young people and, with open minds and open hearts, we'll learn from them. I believe that our young people will lead us."

JOURNEY INTO HERITAGE

Black Catholics com

by KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

BALTIMORE — Forty-seven Catholics made a heritage pilgrimage to Baltimore and Washington, D.C., April 30-May 2, the second such trip sponsored by the African American Affairs Ministry (AAAM) of the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We selected sites that were of particular interest to black Catholics and those interested in the contributions of blacks to our faith and our society," said Rev. Mr. Curtiss Todd, vice-chancellor of the diocese and vicar for the AAAM.

The AAAM was established in 1985 "to coordinate the efforts of black Catholics in the Charlotte Diocese," wrote then-Bishop John F. Donoghue. "This coordination would give visibility to the work of black Catholics in the diocese and educate various diocesan groups to the needs and contributions of black Catholics in the church."

The pilgrims, most of whom are parishioners of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte and of St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem, first visited the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, where the highlight of the tour was Our Mother of Africa Chapel.

A gift of African-American Catholics under the leadership of the Black Bishops of the United States and the National Black Catholic Congress (NBCC), the chapel was dedicated by Cardinal James Hickey Aug. 30, 1997.

The pilgrims were notably excited when they reached the chapel, several murmuring, "Here's our chapel," and "This one is ours."

A few members of the group took a moment to pray at the foot of the bronze statue of Mary and the infant Jesus, while others snapped photos of the sculptures of the four gospel writers, each depicted with African features.

According to the NBCC Web site, Our Mother of Africa Chapel is characterized by the term "sacred conversation" — the integration of sacred persons into a single scene, illustrated by a narrative bas-relief sculpture chronicling the African-American odyssey. A black ebony Christ was created using a centuries-old African carving tradition.

The marble inlay at the threshold of the chapel shows the "Henrietta Marie," a 17th-century slave ship. The mahogany vault ceiling is reminiscent of the hulls of such sailing vessels.

Saturday afternoon was devoted to visiting the Great Blacks in Wax Museum in Baltimore. Committed solely to the study and preservation of African-American history, the museum contains more than 100 wax figures depicting nearly 3,500 years of black history, from the pharaoh Akhenaton, who ruled Egypt 1380-1362 B.C., to current U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell.

A somber mood overtook the group as they walked through the slavery exhibit depicting the inhumane conditions slaves endured on "The Middle Passage" — the crossing of the Atlantic Ocean from West Africa to the Americas — as well as the horrible conditions of their captivity.

However, the museum focuses primarily on the contributions blacks have made to the world — from the writings of Alexander Pushkin and Phyllis Wheatley to the space exploration of Dr. Mae Jemison and Dr. Ronald McNair. It also celebrates the achievements of Harriet Tubman; Frederick Douglass; educators George Washington Carver and Booker T. Washington; Bishop Richard Allen, founder of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, and many others.

Sunday morning the pilgrims attended Mass at St. Francis Xavier Church, the first Catholic church in the United States officially established for blacks. The church was founded in 1863 by a group of black Catholic San Domingo refugees and the Sulpician Fathers, who had fled the French Revolution and settled in Baltimore.

The pilgrimage concluded with a visit to the motherhouse for the congregation of the Oblate Sisters of Providence, the first order of black nuns. Led by Mother Mary Lange (nee Elizabeth Clarissa Lange), four free black Catholic women founded the Oblates in 1828.

morated, celebrated

Despite being a free black in a slave-holding state, a woman in a male-dominated society, Catholic at a time when it was not popular to be Catholic and French-speaking in an American city, Lange was determined to serve the Catholic Church and to serve her people. Through her leadership, the Oblates offered vital services to blacks in the Baltimore area, including educating children and providing homes for orphans.

Today, Oblate sisters work in the areas of parish planning, administration, adult education and retreats, with education continuing to be their primary focus. They can be found in ministries in seven states, the District of Columbia, Costa Rica and the Dominican Republic.

When Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte had a parochial school, it was administered by Oblates sisters, so several of the pilgrims received an enthusiastic welcome from their former teachers and principal.

Rev. Mr. Todd said he hoped the pilgrims came away from the trip with a sense of pride and a deeper knowledge and appreciation of what early black Catholics endured. For example, the Oblate sisters faced severe prejudice and discrimination, and still do today.

He also hoped the pilgrims gained a sense of gratitude and a deepening of their own faith and commitment as a result of the trip.

THE POPES

Pope St. Victor I

Born in Africa, St. Victor served as pope from 189 until 198. St. Victor condemned and excommunicated Theodore of Byzantium for his denial of the divinity of Jesus Christ. He was buried near the body of the apostle Peter in St. Peter's Basilica. Some reports relate that St. Victor died of natural causes, while other accounts state he suffered martyrdom.

Pope St. Melchiades

St. Melchiades occupied the papacy from 311 to 314. St. Melchiades decreed that none of the faithful should fast on Sunday or on the fifth day of the week, because this was the custom of the pagans. St. Melchiades led the church to final victory over the Roman Empire.

Pope St. Gelasius I

St. Gelasius occupied the papacy from 492 until 496. He delivered the city of Rome from the peril of famine. He was known for his austerity of life and liberality to the poor.

THE SAINTS

St. Augustine

St. Augustine was born in Tegaste, Africa. The Christian training by his mother, St. Monica, influenced his entire life. He was highly educated and used his great abilities to lead men to love God. His letters, sermons, tracts and books instructed the early church and have relevance for the church today. Two of his most famous books are his autobiography, "Confessions," and "City of God."

St. Benedict the Moor

St. Benedict the Moor was born in Sicily in 1526. The son of African slaves, he was freed at an early age. When he was 21, he was insulted because of his color, but his dignified bearing caused a group of Franciscan hermits to invite him to join their community. In 1564, he joined the Franciscan friary in Palermo and worked in the kitchen until 1578, when he was chosen superior of the group. He carried through the adoption of stricter interpretation of the Franciscan rule.

St. Martin de Porres

At age 11, St. Martin took a job as a servant in the Dominican priory and was later placed in charge of the infirmary, where he became known for his care of the sick and his miraculous cures. In recognition of his deep devotion, his superiors dropped the stipulation that "no black person may be received to the holy habit or profession of our order." On May 16, 1962, Pope John XXIII made Martin de Porres the first black American saint.

St. Monica

Through her patience, gentleness and prayers, St. Monica converted her pagan husband. She gave thorough religious training to her son, only to see him later scorn all religion and live a life of disrepute. Before her death, St. Augustine had returned to God and was using all his energies to build Christ's Church.

New Jersey nun writes coloring book on life of Pope Pius XII

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — Of the myriad books — pro and con — written about Pope Pius XII in recent years, "Pius XII: The Children's Pope" is certainly one-of-a-kind.

It is a coloring book with a narrative text that touches on the late pope's ecclesial career, his assignment as nuncio to Germany during the Nazi rise to power, his actions during the Holocaust and his relations with the United States — all in 28 pages.

Written by Sister Margherita Marchione, a member of the Religious Teachers Filippini order in Morristown, N.J., the coloring book has been released in two bilingual editions: English/Spanish in the United States and Italian/English in Italy.

New Jersey Sister Margherita Marchione displays a portrait of Pope Pius XII in St. Peter's Square in early December. The member of the Religious Teachers Filippini order recently wrote "Pius XII: The Children's Pope," a 28-page coloring book with a narrative text that touches on the late pope's ecclesial career, his assignment as nuncio to Germany during the Nazi rise to power, his actions during the Holocaust and his relations with the United States.

"I took a copy to (Pope John Paul II's) secretary, and he was delighted. I told him we should have it translated into Polish, too," Sister Marchione said during a visit to Rome in late April.

Sister Marchione has been one of the staunchest defenders of Pope Pius XII against the accusation of "silence" during the Nazi persecution of Jews. In several books, she has presented evidence that the pope quietly worked to help save the lives of Jews and others.

Her coloring book, not surprisingly, takes a sympathetic tone and avoids any hint of controversy. Written in very simple language, it describes the pontiff as a gentle, caring soul who battled adversity all his life.

"I think it's important that children discover the goodness of this man. By getting the children interested, you'll get the parents interested," she said.

In a page titled "The Holocaust," the book says, "In Germany, Adolf Hitler killed thousands of Jewish people and others. The pope saved many by hiding them in the Vatican and in convents and monasteries. He also provided them with money, food and clothing."

It cites a letter from Jewish concentration-camp survivors thanking the pope for his actions. Elsewhere, it relates that as a young priest he helped a Jewish family flee to Jerusalem when they were treated badly by Italians.

The coloring book recalls how Pope Pius once found an injured bird in the Vatican Gardens and nursed it back to health. It would perch on his shoulder during mealtimes, hopping down to eat from its own dish of seeds and keeping him company.

Sister Marchione said these are human touches that risk being overlooked in the debate about the pope's wartime role.

The nun said Paulist Press is publishing this book in the United States at the price of $1.

The Vatican is in the early stages of considering the sainthood cause of Pope Pius XII, which involves the drafting of a "positio" or dossier with thousands of pages of evidence and testimonials.

BY BEVERLY CORZINE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Easter Season that we anticipated through the long weeks of Lent is itself drawing to a close. For me, the Vigil this year began on a cold wet Saturday night that seemed more like November than early April.

Outside the church the Boy Scouts, not deterred in their efforts to build the Easter fire, proudly stood watch over the Easter flames. Our priest prepared the candle with ancient words of prayer that mark the passage of another year of our Lord; then the great paschal candle began its journey into the warm darkness of the church.

"Christ Our Light!" the deacon chanted at the threshold of the church. Our community responded with joy, "Thanks be to God!" Once the paschal candle reached its destination by the baptismal font, the words of the Easter Proclamation filled the darkened church, reminding us with each verse that this holy night was like no other in the year.

"This is our Passover feast." The repetitive "This is the night" continued rhythmically through the Exultet, bringing home the truth of God's love for us and the importanc of remembering the stories of salva tion history.

In the candlelight, I looked int the faces of our candidates for bap tism and of those who had been bap tized in other Christian communitie and soon would be received into th church. Joy and expectation fille their faces. Here were ordinary people, both young and older, wh had stories of how the God of th universe somehow had invited each o them to this very moment.

I have been blessed this past yea because I have come to know each o them and have been entrusted wit their stories of struggle and comin to faith. In the life of each perso there, listening to the Easter Procla mation and waiting to receive the sac raments for the first time, there wer people who pointed the way to Jesus Some, in fact, may never know hov important they have been i someone's journey of faith.

In John's Gospel, Jesus prays no just for the disciples "but also fo those who will believe in me throug their word so that they may all b one, as you, Father, are in me."

'Fog of War' makes clear the mind of former defense secretary

BY ANNE NAVARRO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Director Errol Morris' documentary "The Fog of War" is a riveting look at a man, a government and a turbulent time in a country's history that both examines the past and contemplates the present.

Morris peers into the mind of Robert McNamara, the U.S. secretary of defense under Presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, and what is revealed is at turns intimate, anticipated and surprising.

Still full of energy and opinions at age 85, McNamara is a fine subject, an entertaining character as well as a man of substance. He seems like a man trying to make amends, but on his own terms. It is as if he wants to reshape his image into one of a more gentle, thoughtful man, even during the time of his appointment.

It is easy to see why "The Fog of War" won the Academy Award for Best Documentary. Morris tightly weaves varying elements into his story, from history to personalities to morality, using McNamara as a guide. Yet Morris clearly conveys to the audience the guide's biases and inclinations. (McNamara fully admits he has learned to answer not the question that was asked, but the question he would have wanted asked.)

It is a film as much about McNamara as a high-powered government official attempting to balance power, ambition and moral responsibility as it is about the Vietnam War and Cold War.

On its surface, the film is visually slick, using precise editing, gripping wartime footage and clever illustrations to drive home a point. All of this is tied together with a synergetic score that punctuates the film's theme that humans are fallible creatures and war is messy business.

McNamara, eyes twinkling, imparts lessons he has learned along the way about human nature and the nature of warfare. Morris divides these into 11 title cards, encapsulating each tutorial succinctly with headings such as "No. 1, Empathize with your enemy," "No. 8, Be prepared to re-examine your reasoning," and "No. 9, In order to do good, you may need to engage evil."

Although it is not closely examined, the morality of going to war weighs heavily in the air. McNamara describes World War I as a celebration in the belief that the world could now avoid war among great nations. There is no need to elaborate any more on the irony of his point. He declares, "War is so complex, we can't comprehend all the variables," a thought that resonates with Americans, especially now.

It is in his revelations of closed-door discussions that the viewer can begin to grasp the machinations of engaging the enemy. And given our own turbulent times, the viewer anticipates that McNamara will comment on the war in Iraq, which he disappointingly does not do.

"The Fog of War" engages with its pitch-perfect tone and finely crafted storytelling, leaving the viewer wanting more.

Because of some frightful scenes of war and a few instances of profanity, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

'Minute' is double-trouble fun

Mary-Kate and Ashley Olsen star in "New York Minute," a cotton-candy comedy about twin sisters with polar opposite personalities who wind up being pursued around Manhattan by a bungling gangster and an overzealous truant officer. The frothy but forgettable fluff keeps its screwball silliness sanitary while promoting a family-value message, that, compared to harder-edged teen fare, most parents would take in a New York minute. Some slight sibling issues and mild sensuality. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

Movie capsules

"Mean Girls"

Catty teen comedy about an insecure 15-year-old, home-schooled for most of her life and raised in the African bush, who gets a crash course in the law of the social jungle when she is thrust into a public high school and gets stung by its reigning queen bee.

The film explores the psychological minefields navigated by many young girls and imparts a positive self-esteem message, but its hard-edged sexual references make it unsuitable for the 'tween and teen audience it seems aimed at.

Recurring crude language and humor, some drug references and implied underage drinking. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

"Van Helsing"

Dreadful action adventure about a notorious monster hunter sent to Transylvania by a secret Vatican agency and charged with helping a local vampire slayer rid the world of Count Dracula and other fiendish creatures including werewolves and Frankenstein's monster.

Despite stylishly gothic atmospherics, this long, loud and ludicrous monster mash amounts to little more than overwrought special-effects sequences without any thought given to story — let alone characters to sink your teeth into.

Incessant comic-book violence, an implied sexual encounter, some innuendo and frightening images. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Immigration bill to fix system

said would go far to repair an inadequate immigration system.

The Safe, Orderly Legal Visas and Enforcement, or SOLVE, Act would allow people who have entered the country illegally to apply for legal residency if they have been here for more than five years and held jobs. It also would break through backlogs in applications for family reunification visas and create two programs for workers in low-skilled, temporary jobs.

In a statement the same day, Coadjutor Bishop Thomas G. Wenski of Orlando, Fla., offered his support for the bill as chairman of the migration committee.

The bill reforms "crucial areas of our immigration system in a way that protects the rights of U.S. and foreign workers; promotes family unity; and grants migrant workers and their families in the United States the opportunity to become permanent residents, and if they so choose, U.S. citizens," Bishop Wenski said in the statement.

In introducing the bill in the Senate, Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said much of the nation's economy depends upon immigrant labor, yet millions of those workers lack the legal right to be in the country.

"These workers and their families live in constant fear of deportation and are easy targets of abuse and exploitation by unscrupulous employers and by criminals," he said. "Many risk great danger and even death to cross our borders."

Bishop Wenski said the legislation will help create legal avenues for migrants to come to the United States and join their families.

"It will significantly repair an immigration system which is inadequate to meet the migration flows of the 21st century and which all too often undermines the basic rights and dignity of the human person," his statement said.

The U.S. bishops "witness almost daily the exploitation and abuse of migrant workers who seek to support themselves and their families; the discord in local communities, especially along our southern border, which are impacted by immigration; and, most disturbingly, the deaths of migrants, including women and children in remote areas of the American Southwest," Bishop Wenski said.

Kennedy said the legislation would benefit both workers and businesses by improving wages and working conditions, and would strengthen national security by encouraging people without legal documentation to come forward and legalize their status.

A statement from the National Council of La Raza said it is unlikely that the SOLVE Act would pass this legislative year, but that it offers the best approach to immigration reform of the several bills introduced so far.

"It neither increases nor decreases immigration," said the statement from council president Raul Yzaguirre.

"Rather, it makes legality the norm by bringing hard-working immigrants out of the shadows and allowing them to earn their legal status, and by creating the necessary legal channels for needed workers to enter the United States in the future," he said.

The bishops of the United States and Mexico in 2003 issued a joint pastoral letter in which they called for the governments of both countries to change policies, including making it easier to legally immigrate to the United States, creating a system for illegal immigrants to legalize their status and better protecting the civil rights of migrants.

Bishop Wenski's statement said the new bill would make necessary reforms in those areas.

Besides commending the sponsors of the bill, Bishop Wenski also credited President George W. Bush's proposals to reform the immigration system and said the bishops look forward to working with him and member of Congress "to enact legislation which provides a measure of justice to the migrant, while also serving the common good of all."

Bill would require hospitals to report illegal immigrants

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Legislation that would require hospitals to report on patients' immigration status would create a new role for hospital personnel, "that of border patrol agents," according to the Catholic Health Association.

The bill, HR 3722, would require hospitals to ask patients about their immigration status, get fingerprints or photos of those who cannot prove their legal residency if asked, and send the information on to the Department of Homeland Security's Immigration and Customs Enforcement bureau.

Compliance with the reporting law would be a requirement for hospitals to be reimbursed by the federal government for treating illegal immigrants who have no medical insurance and cannot afford to pay their bills.

In a letter Congress urging them to oppose the legislation, the Catholic Health Association and six other hospital groups said the bill "would virtually ensure that illegal immigrants will avoid getting the appropriate and timely life-saving health care they need, when they need it."

The bill's sponsor, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said the bill would help address "the greatest threat to the American people ... the still uncontrolled flood of illegal immigration into our society."

Marcela Urrutia, of the National Council of La Raza, said HR 3722 "will create such fear among immigrant families it will lead to deaths," because people will not seek medical care for fear of being deported.

Current federal law requires hospitals to provide treatment to anyone seeking it and prohibits asking patients about their immigration status. If passed, Rohrabacher's bill would supercede that provision.

Would a woman in labor have to be sure she takes her immigration papers with her to the hospital to avoid triggering an inquiry as she is giving birth? asked Eliseo Medina, vice president of the Service Employees International Union.

"Will everyone be asked for their documents or only some people? On what basis? Skin color? Last name?" Medina asked.

"It's a quagmire the health system doesn't need," he said. "It's baffling that Congress would waste time on this."

The bill also would require hospitals to ask illegal immigrants for information about their employers, who would then be billed for the patients' treatment.

Mexican woman helps migrants deal with life as amputees

BY JO TUCKMAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

TAPACHULA, Mexico — Wilmer Dubon said every day he thanks God he is still alive after members of a violent youth gang pushed him off a freight train laden with hundreds of Central American migrants heading for the United States.

Dubon, who lay for eight hours on the track before he was taken to a hospital to have his left leg amputated at the thigh, said learning to feel grateful has not been easy.

"At first I wanted vengeance. I wanted to kill the people who had done this to me," said the 25-year-old Honduran farmer who left his tiny village for the United States because it was the only hope he felt he had to pull his family out of poverty.

"I didn't feel like living any more," Dubon said, telling of a feeling of uselessness after waking up from the anesthesia to discover he had lost a leg. "But now things are getting a bit better."

Dubon has found some solace in a threadbare charity shelter for Central American amputees in the sticky lowland Mexican city of Tapachula, near the Guatemalan border where the train begins its journey north.

The Good Shepherd Shelter was set up by a Mexican charismatic Catholic, Olga Sanchez, who promised God to dedicate her life to others 13 years ago after she recovered from cancer. She decided to concentrate on helping the train's victims after witnessing their struggle to come to terms with their broken bodies and shattered dreams.

"I know what it is like to feel that everything is over, to feel helpless," Sanchez said. "I tell them my experience and I tell them that you don't need arms or legs to live and do God's work."

Sanchez, 46, recounted her own depression when doctors told her she had six months to live. She said she was close to committing suicide when a woman she met in church persuaded her to visit a herbalist she now credits with her recovery.

Undocumented workers from Central America hop rail cars in an attempt to escape Mexican authorities in the state of Chiapas, Mexico, in autumn 2003. Hopeful of finding work, immigrants board trains headed for the United States, but some lose their limbs in accidental falls or from train-gang violence. The Good Shepherd Shelter run by Olga Sanchez in Tapachula, Mexico, provides physical and spiritual care for amputees.

"I believed in God before, but not the way I do now," said Sanchez, who runs a prayer meeting in the shelter every night. "He rescued me."

Sanchez said there are three types of amputees who end up in her shelter: those who fell while trying to jump onto a train, those who slipped off from exhaustion and those, like Dubon, pushed off by gangs.

"They all come traumatized, and many don't want to live, especially the ones who have lost their legs," said Sanchez before cleaning out the wounds of a recent amputee.

"They are ashamed to go back to their own countries; they think that they cannot work anymore," she said.

Dressed in white with her black hair flowing down her back and a heavy crucifix swinging around her neck, Sanchez seeks to keep the atmosphere positive in the shelter she set up five years ago after running out of space to tend to the patients in her own house.

Honduran Wilmer Dubon, his leg amputated after he was pushed off a freight train headed for the United States, regains his life at the Good Shepherd Shelter in Tapulcha, Mexico, April 23.

With 25 to 30 amputees at any one time, the shelter is at capacity; Sanchez said she dreams of building a larger shelter on the outskirts of Tapachula.

Sanchez said the Good Shepherd Shelter is run entirely from donations garnered from knocking on doors and selling second-hand clothing. She recently received a more substantial gift from a Swiss benefactor for the purchase of artificial limbs for her guests to take with them when they are deported by the Mexican authorities.

Massive migration from Central America to the United States dates back to the region's civil wars of the 1980s. Now migrants are striking out for economic reasons.

Enough make it for the risks to seem worthwhile, even though it is common knowledge that their chances of being caught and deported are high and the possibility of mutilation or death is real.

Last year, Mexican authorities detained 155,000 undocumented Central Americans, sending the vast majority home within hours. During the first three months of 2004, they detained nearly 65,000 — 50 percent more than during the same period in 2003.

The huge increase reflects not only the rising tide of Central American migration, but also a Mexican crackdown along traditional routes such as the freight trains that start just before Tapachula and crisscross the country, headed for the northern border 1,300 miles away.

More and better-organized raids are pushing migrants to take more risks. Each day, for the hundreds who take the train, this means constantly leaping on and off moving train cars.

The migrants also are frequent victims of a violent Salvadoran and Honduran gang, Mara Salvatrucha, which uses the railways in southern Mexico as its new domain.

The vast majority of the current wave of Central Americans heading north are from Honduras, Guatemala and El Salvador. The contingent from Honduras is growing particularly fast as Hondurans give up hope that their economy will recover from the devastating blow dealt by Hurricane Mitch. Most of the patients in the Good Shepherd Shelter are Honduran.

This has prompted Sanchez to begin exploring the possibility of setting up a workshop for the amputees from that country so that they might have some job skills once they return home.

"Honduras is a difficult place for them," said Sanchez.

She said she has driven many of her patients back to their tiny hillside hamlets where moving around with artificial limbs or in wheelchairs poses particular challenges.

Leticia Melia looks with suspicion at her two new legs lying on her bed in the shelter. She set out from Honduras a few months ago with a cousin and a friend, leaving her baby and two young children with her mother.

The threesome traveled through Guatemala with relatively little trouble, but once in Mexico Melia bungled her jump onto the train near Tapachula and lost both her legs as a result.

"Sometimes I don't want to go," Melia says of her impending return home, weighing the desire to see her children again with the shame she feels at the manner of her return. "I went to work to help my family, and now I am just going to be a burden."

Pro-life official praises FDA denial of 'morning-after pill'

Plan B, marketed by Barr Pharmaceuticals, is designed to be taken within 72 hours after unprotected intercourse. It involves a large dose of progestin-only birth control pills, which are available only by prescription.

Ruse said Plan B is "marketed and advertised as a 'contraceptive' but its own proponents admit that it works before and after conception."

"The Plan B distributor may argue that it's all the same, but preventing human life from beginning is not the same as destroying life that has already begun," Ruse said. "Women deserve to know the truth about drugs that are marketed to them, and teenage girls should not be sold potentially dangerous abortifacient drugs off the shelf."

In its decision, the FDA left the door open for approval of over-the-counter sales of Plan B in the future.

"You have not provided adequate data to support a conclusion that Plan B can be used safely by young adolescent women for emergency contraception without the professional supervision of a practitioner licensed by law to administer the drug," said Dr. Steven Galson, acting director of the FDA's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research, in a letter to Barr.

The letter suggested that Barr "provide additional data demonstrating that Plan B can be used safely by women under 16 years of age without professional supervision" or submit a revised application for approval of over-the-counter sales only to those 16 and over, while keeping a prescription-only option for those under 16.

Bruce Downey, chairman and CEO of Barr, said the company was encouraged by the FDA's suggestions, and looked forward "to working with the agency toward approval of Plan B for over-the-counter use."

"It is frightening to think that young women could potentially be able to obtain this drug over the counter," said Maggi Nadol, program director of the diocesan Respect Life office.

"Even more frightening is the way it is attempting to pretend that actions have no consequences — just pop a pill and all traces of having sex are removed," said Nadol. "What about the emotional repercussions, the possibility of sexually transmitted diseases and the most ignored issue, the moral implications?"

The FDA's decision also drew comment from officials of the American Life League and the Population Research Institute, among other groups.

"While we are quite pleased" with the FDA action, it "is far from being totally satisfactory," said Judie Brown, president of American Life League, in a statement.

"There are no studies indicating the long-term side effects of these pills when used by adolescents, nor are there studies to help us understand what will happen to a young woman who relies solely on the megadoses these pills dump into her system each time she takes the pills," she said.

"The best thing the FDA can do now for American women and their progeny is to take the next logical step and remove these pills from the market altogether," Brown added.

Stephen W. Mosher, president of the Population Research Institute, said approval of over-the-counter sales of Plan B "would be an act of almost unprecedented recklessness where women's lives are concerned — especially the lives of very young women."

"The law has a teaching role," he added. "How many people — especially teenage girls — are inclined to think, 'It's legal, so it must be OK; if it weren't safe, they wouldn't legalize it'?"

Pope, at audience, encourages faithful to always trust in God

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — In the face of serious trouble and even death, believers are called to trust in God, "who remains ever faithful to his promises" to save those he created and loves, Pope John Paul II said.

At his May 12 weekly general audience, the pope said Psalm 30 "demonstrates that we must never let ourselves be entrapped by the dark snare of desperation when it appears that all is lost."

The human longing for God's help in overcoming trials and death is, in the end, an expression of a hope for eternal life, he said.

"The satisfaction of this powerful aspiration was fully assured with the resurrection of Christ, for which we can never thank God enough," the pope said.

The crowd of 15,000 people at the general audience in St. Peter's Square included some 900 religious women from more than 65 countries participating in the assembly of the International Union of Superiors General, as well as a handful of Polish children who received their first Communion in Rome.

Speaking in Polish, the pope said, "I entrust to God all of the children who, at this time of year, are receiving Christ in their hearts for the first time."

"May they learn to love Jesus with their whole lives and, with the help of the mother of God, may they always persevere in the faith," he said.

Pope John Paul also prayed that as children receive first Communion their parents and siblings will grow in faith.

The pope also welcomed 180 military officers participating in courses at the Rome-based NATO Defense College, which offers programs on political, military and security issues and prepares officers for NATO command positions.

Speaking in English, the pope offered the college personnel "prayerful good wishes for their efforts to promote international peace and security."

Also attending the audience were residents and supporters of Rondine-Cittadella della Pace, an experiment in building a model town dedicated to peace education and hospitality.

"To them and to everyone present, I renew my call to pray for peace in the world, especially in Iraq and in the Middle East," the pope said.

"With the support of the international community, may those beloved populations set out with determination on the path of reconciliation, dialogue and cooperation," he said.

An emotional connection with God?

Spirituality for Today

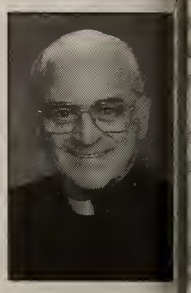
FATHER JOHN CATOIR



"I liked your article on contemplation," a reader wrote, "but there is still something nagging at me. Why is it so hard for me to connect with the ever-present, loving, pure, brilliant Supreme Being?"

Alas, St. Augustine had the same problem. He said, "Our hearts are restless until they rest in Thee O Lord."

We all feel the same frustration, yet the Holy Spirit is dwelling within us. Some ask in exasperation: "Is he really there? If so, why doesn't he make his presence felt?"

Good people from the beginning of time have done everything from sacrificing their young to almost starving themselves to death in order to connect with their Creator. We all wonder about it. If you love someone and that person loves you, shouldn't there be some way to experience that person's presence? Shouldn't there be an emotional connection with God?

With human relationships, the answer is yes, but in the realm of the supernatural we have to do it God's way. Occasionally he does lift someone up to mystical heights, but only rarely. More often than not, prayer can be terribly dry. Disappointment is inevitable, unless you persevere.

Why not begin to approach prayer differently? Why not freshen it with joy? "Choose" to be joyful. "Believe" deeply in God's love, and "reject" those negative thoughts and feelings.

When Mary and Martha complained to Jesus about his not being there when their brother Lazarus died, he answered, "Your brother will rise again."

Martha didn't like that answer: "I know that he will rise again in the resurrection at the last day."

Jesus interrupted: "I am the resur rection and the life. Those who believe i me will live, even though they die, an everyone who lives and believes in m will never die" (Jn 11:25).

This is a strange way of sayin "Trust me." He doesn't apologize. H doesn't offer an excuse. He simply cha lenges Martha. He is telling her to disre gard her feelings of confusion and doub He wants her to make a leap of faith.

Here's a little test for you:

When Jesus says, "The kingdom c God is within you," do you believe him This belief is not a matter of feelings; it a matter of intellectual acceptance. Fait is knowledge given by someone yo trust. Either you believe or you don't.

God is present to your soul no ma ter what you may be feeling at any give moment. When you say yes to this trut you come alive. Listen to these words the Psalms: "In your presence there the fullness of joy; in your right hand a pleasures forevermore." "You make u glad with the joy of your presence." "Yo turn our mourning into dancing."

These are all expressions of exube ance. Such feelings are repeated over an again in the Bible. Usually they a manifest within the context of commu nal prayer. When you have a who community around you singing prais

Vote me off the island, please

Vote me off the island, please. This particular Average Jane has had quite enough of the bachelors, big brothers, idols and survivors that have come to rule our cultural roost the past few years.

I was standing in line at the drugstore with aspirin and Altoids, killing time by paging through a magazine. On the cover was a picture of a square-jawed, handsome man — the new "Bachelor," the caption said. Behind me, two women were engaged in an anti-Trump tirade, cursing out the real-estate czar for sacking Kwame. Over the speaker system, "American Idol" finalist Clay Aiken sang about invisibility.

It was too much. I hoped to find a refuge from the reality-show onslaught in my car, where a local DJ took calls from listeners defending American Idol contestant LaToya London.

"Yo, vote for Fantasia! It's more important than the presidential election!" he joked.

After hoping desperately that people don't actually believe him, I conceded that the DJ may be partially right. My drugstore experience only goes to show how omnipresent reality shows are and how much influence they've had on pop culture and the way we look at the world.

And I'm not sure that's a good thing.

On MTV's "The Real World" each season — come on, you know the drill — eight strangers are picked to live in a house together. Their every move is filmed and aired once a week to millions who watch them fight, talk on the phone and spill their secret confessions to MTV cameras.

While I enjoyed the show, there was nothing "real" about it. The houses were huge, with amenities the average 20-something couldn't hope to own: private docks, new furniture, backyard Jacuzzis and gourmet kitchens. And interactions sometimes rang hollow due to the blatant black-and-white stereotypes that ruled over a few seasons — the ultrareligious Christian girl, the punk-rock atheist, the fashionista, the homophobe, the gay man, the macho jock.

To win on "Survivor," you have to outfox people intent on stabbing you in the back while you attempt to do the same to them. Never mind that if I were stranded in the middle of nowhere with only a bathing suit, a set of brains and eight other people, I'd probably want them around to help me hunt, gather and construct some decent shelter.

For many world cultures, community ties — helping each other out, creating a better world for one another — are crucial to an individual's very existence. For our TV survivors, having those ties and loyalties are signs of weakness. Scrambling to the top on the backs of others, forsaking friends and betraying neighbors are cardinal virtues.

"Survivor" is not the kind of world want to live in.

I watched "The Bachelor" for a litt while, only to succumb to a sense of naus watching him smooch, snog and woo girls at once. (They really want a guy wh goes from girl to girl like that? Ugh!) Th girls change who they essentially are survive the rose ceremonies and stay the Bachelor's good side, sublimating the own special qualities in order to mo themselves into the Bachelor's ide woman.

Whatever happened to loving som one for who he or she is?

I think there's very little truth in t backstabbing and bickering of "Survivo in the forced "love" of "The Bachelor" and the homes of the "Real World." Yet, it's st everywhere: in our conversations, o books, our schools, our music and o philosophies.

And, in the process, they are becomi our reality.

How much is a parish secretary worth?

Parish Diary

FATHER PETER J. DALY
CNS COLUMNIST

One of the few pieces of practical pastoral advice I got in the seminary was, "When you get to the parish make friends with two people, the cook and the secretary."

Since our parish does not have a cook, there is one crucial person to make friends with: the secretary.

People not intimately connected with parish life probably don't have an appreciation of how essential a parish secretary is to a healthy parish. She — generally a she — is often the first point of contact for people with our parish. If she is friendly, the parish is perceived as friendly.

Our parish secretary is unfailingly friendly, greeting people with sympathy and kindness.

The parish secretary is also, in many ways the repository of the parish memory. She keeps the sacramental records and the parish rolls. She remembers who is coming and who is going; who has had a baby, wedding, funeral or tragedy.

The parish secretary, in many parishes, outlasts the pastor. Our secretary has served three pastors here and understands the different styles and plans of each one. In my case we have worked together for nine years, and she still knows more about the community and the families than I ever will.

Like the pastor, the parish secretary has to be skilled at a variety of tasks and has to have seemingly contradictory or at least "contrasting" skills. She has to be a detail person, recording Mass intentions and paying bills with accuracy.

She also has to be a people person, ready to stop and talk with the people who come in about a funeral or a sick loved one.

Being a parish secretary often calls for long hours, low pay and hard work. Our parish secretary works six days per week. We pay her for five, but she donates each Saturday as her gift to the parish as part of her tithing of her time, talent and treasure.

People sometimes presume too much of her. They always presume that she will be there to unlock the door whenever they arrive. They presume that she will not only reserve a room for their group but find them trash bags, set aside a can of coffee for them and put up signs advertising their meeting.

She does all those things, besides getting the bulletin out, running off inserts and recording all the contribution records.

Secretaries in parishes always are working under deadlines. They have the liturgical season, with feasts that require programs to be run off and schedules to go out for all the various ministries.

They also have the endless details that people expect to be exactly right. Each year our secretary has the huge task of getting out about 1,000 statements of contributions so that people can take deductions on their taxes. That means she has to record all their gifts every week. People sometimes presume she should know that the unmarked $20 in the collection should have been attributed to them.

This past week, I certainly found out how much our parish secretary does. Ours was out sick for her first sick day in 18 years. That is an unbelievable record. With the constant flow of people on the phone and through the door, I realized how indispensable she really is and how much any pastor depends on a secretary.

I am happy to do my own cooking, but I know I could never replace our parish secretary.

The forms of absolutions

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. At my parish before Easter, we have five priests in different locations for the sacrament of penance. After some Scripture, prayers and music, people line up by each priest to confess their sins and receive absolution.

Since there is such a shortage of priests, why can't one priest give a general absolution to everyone? (Iowa)

A. The Catholic Church's Rite of Penance provides three forms for ministering and receiving this sacrament. The first is the one-on-one encounter with the priest, which was the exclusive form most of us older Catholics grew up with.

Second is the form you describe. The ritual prescribes a ceremony of Scripture readings, homily, examination of conscience and prayers, and usually some music, with all penitents present and participating.

The pastor tries to recruit a sufficient number of priests from the surrounding area who provide opportunity for individual confession and absolution. This way of celebrating the sacrament of penance is common and popular in many parishes today.

Among other advantages, as the official ritual notes, it emphasizes the fact that none of our sins are "private." They all involve other people, in fact the whole church community, in some way. Admitting our sins and asking absolution together emphasize that critical aspect of sin and forgiveness.

The third official form for the rite of penance is the one you suggest. All the first part of the ceremony remains, but after necessary explanations one priest ministers absolution to everyone at the same time.

By church regulations, this third rite may now be used only on certain very limited occasions, to be determined, if necessary, by the bishop of the diocese.

The Holy Land village of Ein Karem

Q. I am searching for information about a village in the Holy Land called Ein Karem. I am Lebanese American, and our family name is similar. We've been told that it comes from that little town, where supposedly the visitation of Mary to Elizabeth took place. We'd be grateful for any information you can give. (Ohio)

A. Ain Karem (the name means spring of the vineyard) is a lovely village about five miles from Jerusalem, surrounded for thousands of years by olive trees and vineyards.

Since the time of St. Helena (fourth century), tradition has identified it as the home of Zechariah and Elizabeth, and birthplace of John the Baptist. It would thus have been Mary's destination when she "set out and traveled to the hill country of Judah, where she entered the house of Zechariah and greeted Elizabeth" (Lk 1:39-40).

For centuries the town was mostly Arab, predominantly Muslim, but about 10 percent Christian. It has changed dramatically, however, in the last two generations. Since 1948 it has been part of the Palestinian territory occupied by Israel, and the population is mostly Jewish. Some monasteries and convents still exist however.

The ancient Church of the Visitation was totally rebuilt during the last century. It, along with the Church of St. John the Baptist, are two jewels of the Holy Land.

More information than you will want to absorb is available by an Internet Google search for "ain karem."

The selling of religion

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

During a visit to Malta, I took a liking to the Maltese Cross. Its two crossbars are even in length, with two points at each of their four ends. The eight points on a Maltese Cross represent the eight Beatitudes.

I thought, "What a wonderful gift this would make for friends." I bought several of the crosses and later was sorry I hadn't purchased more.

Most people would think my desire to buy crosses was normal, perhaps even thoughtful. But after reading Vincent Miller's book "Consuming Religion: Christian Faith and Practice in a Consumer Culture," I am revisiting that question.

Miller encourages readers to reflect on the pros and cons of a consumer age glutted with commodities, and the effect this has on religion. He asks whether in selling religious goods, religion makes itself all too much like other marketers.

The Maltese Cross symbolizes noble knights who fought for religious principles. More important, it symbolizes a way of life according to Christ that is antithetical to the way people usually live. Did those to whom I gave this cross see it as jewelry that would be admired or was it cherished as a reminder of how they should live?

Miller raises other soul-searching questions. For example, Pope John Paul II is a celebrity whom people will travel thousands of miles to hear. When he is on television, they make it a point to watch him. As a commodity, Pope John Paul II sells well. But when people hear him, do they hear his message and act upon it?

Miller gives another example of religion as a best-selling commodity. Before and during Holy Week, there were a number of Scripture scholars on television commenting on variations in the Scripture accounts of the Passion. How, for example, did a large crowd appear to condemn Christ, especially since this was a high Jewish feast time when they would be busy preparing their sacrifices?

I don't mean to be crass, but programs of this type sell well. People need religion. Marketers know this and also know how to package it. But in consuming such programs, are people consciously or unconsciously seeking the bizarre or are they searching for a way to better know Christ?

We live in an era of new needs. There is the need for therapy and things that both soften and invigorate our lives, bringing comfort and energy. It is an era that also challenges us to take a better look at how consumerism sells religion and about our intentions and goals in purchasing what is sold.

CHARLOTTE — In a month closely associated with honoring mothers, Catholics choose May to honor Mary as the mother of Jesus and of the church.

Following the Ecumenical Council of Nicea II in 787, public veneration of icons and images of Jesus, Mary and the saints was no longer persecuted by some in the church as a form of idolatry. Consequently, the tradition arose of crowning a statue of Mary in recognition of her position as Queen of Heaven and Earth.

Coronation ceremonies have been a tradition in the Catholic Church since the 16th century. Today, young girls and boys who have recently received their first Communion are typically selected to crown a statue of Mary during a special Mass in the month of May.

BULLETING HISTORY

Joy Ebnet, a secretary at Five Saints Faith Community in Bowlus, Minn., adjusts the tray that catches parish bulletins as they come off the copier in late April. Bulletins can be a source of historical records for some parishes.

Bulletins seen as communications tool but also historical record

ST. CLOUD, Minn. (CNS) — These days, it is rare for Catholics to exit weekend Mass without a bulletin in hand.

"It's valuable in that it's bringing something tangible home — a souvenir of the Mass, so to speak," said Father James Hahn, pastor of Christ the King Church in Cambridge.

James Thoennes, archivist for the Diocese of St. Cloud, said he recalls that when taking Communion to the homebound he would "bring along the bulletin, and that was like a letter from home."

Bulletins are an important vehicle for communication between the pastor and congregation and within the congregation itself. But for some parishes, bulletins are a source of important historical records.

The bulletins at Holy Spirit Church in St. Cloud recently became an invaluable source of information when someone stole the parish safe. Losing $4,000 in checks and cash was bad, said Father Virgil Helmin, pastor, but so was losing the parish documents.

While records of baptisms, marriages and deaths were copied to the chancery archives, Father Helmin said what was printed in the bulletins about parishioners' deaths, baptisms, weddings, first Communions and confirmations serves as the only record of those events from November 1999 to the night of the burglary.

The most important bulletin feature was — and still is — the listing of Mass times and intentions, Thoennes said, and these are usually the first items to go onto the page. As bulletins became more common, they began to feature times for confessions as well as requests for prayer, he said.

With the growth of parish organizations, Father Hahn said bulletins eliminate "the need of rattling off a lot of data" in verbal announcements and "help people focus more on the Mass, especially the Liturgy of the Word. It frees up the Mass itself for a better worship experience."

To those who ask that their event be announced from the pulpit "because nobody reads the bulletin" — a highly mistaken assumption, according to many — Father Hahn has this rule of thumb: Only those events that follow immediately after Mass are announced during Mass.

Bishops' official calls for recommitment to just educational system

WASHINGTON (CNS) — On the 50th anniversary of the Supreme Court's Brown vs. Board of Education desegregation ruling, the U.S. Catholic bishops' education secretary said the Supreme Court decision should "renew our commitment to a just educational system."

"Without the Brown decision, it is hard to imagine any serious efforts to improve education for all children in the United States," said Dominican Sister Glenn Anne McPhee May 17.

She noted that the ruling, with its declaration that "separate educational facilities are inherently unequal," represented what was a "long-overdue victory" at the time and also shows "how far our nation has come" in the 50 years since it was issued.

She said the May 17, 1954, decision — which said that segregation had no valid purpose and was also unconstitutional — "benefits all American children, regardless of race."

Sister McPhee noted that although "many implementation struggles ensued in the years following Brown, and many continue today, the spirit of hope captured in the Brown decision lives on."

She also referred to a 1995 document, prepared by the U.S. bishops' education committee and approved by their Administrative Board, titled "Principles for Educational Reform in the United States."

"We have a deep concern that all children will be provided with a means to attain a quality education that will prepare them to be good citizens, lead productive lives, and be socially and morally responsible," it said.

In a reformed educational system, it said, parents, teachers, administrators and government policy-makers fully accept their responsibility to students, who are "the central focus of all education." The bishops also advocated policy decisions that would allow school choice.

Pope praises pontifical mission societies as 'authentic missionaries'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II said the pontifical mission societies represent a solid point of reference for those searching for truth in a troubled world.

"You offer a message of love and hope" as "you help bring the good news to the ends of the earth," he said May 11 in an audience address to heads of the four pontifical mission societies.

"In these tumultuous times that humanity is living, the pontifical missionary societies ... represent a reliable reference for those who are seeking the truth which saves," the pope said.

Because their message is one of hope, "you must pay special attention to the people of the world where their suffering is greater and their needs are more acute: the people of the so-called Third World," he said.

Some 117 national directors of the world's pontifical mission societies met with the pope at the Vatican May 11 during their May 6-14 general assembly in Rome.

The pope called them "authentic missionaries in a globalized world where suffering for truth and justice surpassed every national border."

By their concern for the suffering of others and working to help those in need, mission society workers are also working "to help one's own people escape from narrow selfishness, suffocating abundance and from emptiness and behavior which are at times unworthy of human beings," the pope said.

Performing works of mercy and charity is not a matter of simple almsgiving, but is "fulfilling the duty inherent in one's Christian identity in helping the other in need," he said.

Seashells adorn the bicycles of Dutch pilgrims Henk de Muynck, Wim Vermeulen, Peter Uipkes and Kees Langejan, who stopped in Chartres, France, in early May on their journey to Santiago de Compostela. They had at that point traveled 400 miles from their homes in the southern Netherlands and had just more than 1,000 miles to go. The scallop shell has long been associated with pilgrims making their way to the shrine of St. James.

Airport chaplains gather, discuss ministry

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

WASHINGTON — Catholic airport chaplains from across the country, including one from the Diocese of Charlotte, converged in Washington, D.C., to discuss their unique ministry to people on the move.

The 18th annual meeting of the National Conference of Catholic Airport Chaplains (NCCAC), who staff airport chapels and provide pastoral care to travelers and airline workers, was held April 27-30.

Participants included Rev. Mr. Ben Wenning, chaplain to Charlotte-Douglas International Airport and coordinator of the permanent diaconate for the Diocese of Charlotte; Archbishop Agostino Marchetto, secretary of the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers; and Dominican Father Anthony Chinh quang Dao, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Office for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Refugees.

Archbishop Marchetto's keynote address, "Challenges for the Pastoral Care of Civil Aviation," echoed Pope John Paul II's description of the airport as "a true crossroads of humanity," where the airport chaplain, offering pastoral assistance, especially in the celebration of the Eucharist, "reminds travelers of God's loving presence and bears witness to the fundamental truths affecting all human life."

Since the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, more travelers and staff have sought out airport chapels and chaplains, according to Father John Jamnicky, coordinator for the Human Mobility Apostolate of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

"More and more people ... are taking advantage of time in chapels, participation in services, time to talk with chaplains, whether there are security issues or not," said Father Jamnicky.

Rev. Mr. Wenning, who has been Charlotte's airport chaplain since 1988, said airport chapels and chaplains do much for travelers.

"Within the hustle and bustle of the airport, the chapel is a physical place to come that's relatively quiet for prayer and meditation," he said. "Associated with that is the office of the chaplain, where we can meet with people if needed."

However, said Rev. Mr. Wenning, the chaplain is often out in the concourses to assist with emergencies and be available for airport employees and travelers, from helping those who have "lost their tickets or lost their way" to those looking for a place to eat, the bathroom, a "German newspaper," and so on.

"It's not so much a ministry of faith as it is helping others," said Rev. Mr. Wenning.

"Many times people are traveling due to grief, such as a death in the family, and you can spot them sitting in the waiting areas," he said. "You sit next to them, usually a seat apart, introduce yourself and see what you can do for them. Many times you are met with dead silence, and sometimes they open their hearts."

At the recent gathering, chaplains heard presentations on "The Mission of the NCCAC" and "Airport Ministry is Ecumenical and Interreligious," which dealt with how to have a Catholic presence in a multireligious chapel open to people of all faiths.

There was also a presentation entitled "Boundaries" by Dr. Kathleen McChesney, executive director of the U.S. bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection, and Father J. Cletus Kiley, director of the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Priestly Life and Ministry.

The presentation dealt with the issue of sexual abuse of minors and the liability to which priests and deacons are subject, even at airports, said Rev. Mr. Wenning.

"Many children travel alone, and we try to be of assistance to them," he said.

Birthday ordinary day, but with cake

The only change from the pope's normal schedule, he said, was that the pope had invited "his closest collaborators from the Curia" to lunch.

The spokesman said birthday greetings from heads of state and from individuals around the world had arrived in the pope's mailbox.

During the ordinary part of his workday, Pope John Paul met with Portugal's prime minister and witnessed the signing of a new treaty regulating relations between the Catholic Church and the country. The treaty, guaranteeing the juridical status of the church and religious freedom, updated a concordat signed in 1940.

The visiting delegation sang "Happy Birthday" to the pope in Portuguese. The same tune was used a short time later, when members of the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers sang their birthday greetings at an audience with the pope.

The pope also met with four U.S. bishops making their "ad limina" visits.

"I did take the occasion to extend birthday wishes to him," said Archbishop Eusebius J. Beltran of Oklahoma Cit, who was making his sixth "ad limina" visit. "He had a big smile, was very gracious and very happy."

Parishioners explore ministries, enjoy carnival

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY

GREENSBORO — The "boardwalk" was bustling at St. Pius X Church.

After being inspired by Bishop J. Kevin Boland of Savannah during a diocesan stewardship program in Charlotte, parishioners crafted the "Boardwalk at St. Pius X" stewardship carnival at the church May 16.

"We actually have two goals today," said Patti Dinning, head of the parish stewardship committee. "The first and primary reason for this carnival is to increase the awareness of our church ministries. The second is to do a better job of following up on all those who volunteer time and talents."

The event was designed to bring together the parish community in order to discover those who are capable and willing to contribute their time and talent, according to Pat Spivey, pastoral associate.

In preparation for the "Boardwalk," packets were mailed to each family in the parish. Each packet contained a letter from Msgr. Anthony Marcaccio, pastor; a list of all parish ministries; a list of the skills parishioners might offer the parish; and a card indicating how much of a financial commitment a family was willing to offer to the parish.

As the cards were turned in, the parishioners received free food or activity tickets to the carnival. In addition, parishioners were given a "passport" to be punched at each ministry table visited for a chance to win door prizes donated by each of the ministries.

One of the joint ministries featured at the carnival was Mobile Meals and Senior Wheels, headed by parishioner Dolores Ahrens. Both are outreach ministries to the elderly of the community — one brings meals to the disabled and elderly, while the other transports those who need transportation.

Rev. Mr. Bill Shaw and wife Ann greeted parishioners in front of their booth for Adult Faith Formation. The adult classes, which take place between Masses on Sundays, offer discussions on contemporary topics. There is an average of 35 adults in attendance at any given session.

"I am fairly new to the parish and I think this is a fantastic way to go," said Scott Voegele. "I am finally being informed about the opportunities for stewardship within the church."

"This is a great way for new parishioners to get involved," agreed Emily Voegele. "Even our two children are getting a sense of volunteerism."

"The best part of the day's activities is the friendliness and fellowship," said Clifford Barr, a greeter. "The idea is good for recruiting other parishioners to participate and get involved in the parish activities."

PRAYERS IN THE AIR

Greensboro prayer group thrives for three decades

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

GREENSBORO — It was the summer of 1973 when Hannah Hammer received a call from her daughter about a prayer group forming at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro. Although wary at first, she decided to give it a try.

"After Msgr. (Hugh) Dolan said Mass, they sat in a circle and prayed for about an hour," recalled Hammer. "I did not pray nor did I sit in the circle. I sat outside and listened. The whole thing seemed a little odd to me ...."

Yet Hammer felt drawn to the group and continued going week after week. She finally asked the purpose of the meetings.

The reply, said Hammer, was, "Only to worship and pray. We have a special devotion to the Holy Spirit."

That devotion has helped the group to thrive for almost 31 years. Eighty-five people attended the group's 30th anniversary in October 2003, including half a dozen of the original prayer group members.

"Almost 31 years — that's a lot of prayers," commented Hammer, who wrote about the group's history for its 30th anniversary celebration.

"Our group is the mother group for prayer groups that meet in other parishes— we've helped others get started," said Hammer. "Almost every year, we have a get-together and invite prayer groups from other parishes."

The St. Pius X group met for 21 years before someone suggested they come up with a name, she said.

"Everyone had a different name. After a lively discussion, we prayed about it for a few minutes and then everyone voted unanimously for the same name: St. Joseph's Intercessors," said Hammer. "This in itself was a miracle."

The Intercessors have met in every Catholic Church in Greensboro through the years, said Hammer, and they picked up some "rules" from the priests who joined them.

"Father (Thomas) Burke told us to stay close to the church, so we have. Father (now Msgr.) Bill Pharr told us to end at 9 p.m., so we do. Father Larry Dunn told us not to limit the prayer time for any reason, so we don't," said Hammer.

Despite the modifications in rules and location, the format of the prayer group has remained consistent and simple, said Hammer. Although they had to omit Mass due to the consideration of priests' schedules, the group still focuses on what they consider their "main work" — prayer.

"We pray for the church, priests, deacons, all religious, those who are ill, wounded and bruised, our country and government," said Hammer. "It is our privilege to pray for any needs that Msgr. Anthony (Marcaccio) or anyone else gives us during the week."

Often the group will have a "soaking prayer" session — they will gather outside the normal meeting time and pray for two hours for one person, one intention. Earlier in the week, more than a dozen people spent two hours praying for a parishioner with cancer.

"It's good to have 14 people stop what they're doing to go and pray for someone they don't necessarily know," said Hammer. "We soaked that person with prayer. We asked God to do a miracle."

Those who attend the weekly gatherings vary in number and purpose, said Hammer. Some come for a spiritual "pick me up," some come when they need prayer for themselves or a loved one.

"We have had hundreds of hurting people of all denominations move through the group," said Hammer. "Everyone is welcome to come and go as they wish."

The "regulars," she said, are there every week.

"Weekly attendees believe intercessory prayer to be an important part of their stewardship ministry," said Hammer. "Prayer develops an intimacy with Jesus. A prayer group is one way to avail yourself of the power that is available."

Pope John Paul II has often stressed the importance of prayer.

"We encounter Our Lord, especially in the liturgy and in personal prayer, as we journey toward that day when we shall see him 'face to face,'" said the pope during his weekly audience at the Vatican April 28.

"We've seen a lot of answered prayers. We have been a part of many wonderful signs and wonders," said Hammer, "but we know that no matter how hard, long and fervently we pray, the results are in the hands of our wise and merciful God."

Down syndrome students visit Pastoral Center, uptown Charlotte

Pilot program at St. Patrick School produces progress

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — With smiles on their faces, three students moved eagerly through the diocesan Pastoral Center.

"Nice to meet you," said one student, shaking hands with staff members. "My name is Matthew."

Matthew Isley, 13, was joined by Morgan Grier, 17, and Jenna Clayton, 13, all of whom have Down syndrome, a congenital condition characterized by moderate to severe mental retardation.

They are all students in the Matthew-Morgan Pilot Classroom at St. Patrick School. Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools, offered the students and their teachers a tour of the Pastoral Center before treating them to lunch in uptown Charlotte.

Kitty Cypert, special-education teacher, and Heleen Hogan, teacher's assistant, joined the students on their tour.

Named for its original students, Matthew and Morgan, the program — now in its second year — teaches basic academic curriculum as well as life skills based on the students' levels of ability.

Cherry was especially impressed with the progress the students have made since joining the program. They were very outgoing and able to interact with adults, such as at the restaurant and on the Gold Rush trolley bus, she said.

"Matthew sat at the front of the bus and greeted everyone who came aboard," said Cherry.

"Since the beginning of the year, there's been a lot of progress especially in social skills," said Cypert. "We've taught them that when they meet people, they should say hello and shake their hands."

Those with Down syndrome often like to hug people, she said.

"Getting them out in the community, teaching them the appropriate skills and hopefully getting the world to accept them — that's what it's all about," said Cypert.

Hogan, a parishioner of St. Matthew Church, was influential in instituting the pilot program. She has 17 years of experience working with children, the last 10 of which have been spent with special-needs children.

"The parents and I wanted a Catholic-based education, one with a Christian emphasis including prayer, in a loving atmosphere," explained Hogan.

Both Hogan and Cypert praised the students and faculty of St. Patrick School for their inclusion of Jenna, Matthew and Morgan. Students often assist them in their studies and other classroom work.

"When we go into the lunchroom students always ask Jenna, Morgan and Matthew to sit with them," said Cypert. "They feel very included, and are really happy to be here."

"Catholic education should be for all children, incorporating all types of students into mainstream society," said Angela Montague, principal of St. Patrick School. "They are a part of our community, and we would be lost without them."

graders in the Diocese of Charlotte will be sealed with the gift of the Holy Spirit as they receive the third sacrament of initiation: confirmation.

According to Father John Triglio, Jr. and Father Kenneth Brighenti, co-hosts of the EWTN program "Council of Faith," "Confirmation ... builds on what was begun in baptism and what was nourished in holy Eucharist."

"It completes the process of initiation into the Christian community and it matures the soul for the work ahead," said Father Triglio.

Having been gifted with the Holy Spirit, confirmed Catholics are assisted in living their faith with a greater degree of intensity and integrity, said Father James Hawker, vicar of education for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"When we talk about the Holy Spirit, we should be sensitive to the gifts of the Holy Spirit and the fruits of the Holy Spirit," he said.

One of the premier fruits of the Holy Spirit is peace, said Father Hawker.

"If there is anything we need in our world today, it is internal peace, as well as peace around us and peace in our world."

It is also extremely important, said Father Hawker, to be gifted with the gifts of wisdom, understanding, courage and fortitude in any culture.

One sacrament, two traditions

"Confirmation, in one sense, is one of the more intriguing sacraments in the (Catholic) Church," said Father Hawker, "because there have been traditionally two approaches to the celebration of the sacrament."

In the theological approach, which is intended to be the norm, confirmation and communion are received at the same time as baptism. The Eastern Catholic churches celebrate the three sacraments of initiation in this manner.

In the Rite of Christian Initiation of Adults, candidates within the Roman Catholic Church also receive the sacraments together during the Easter Vigil .

"It should be remembered that the sacrament is looked at as being a great gift of God through the Catholic Church," said Father Hawker. "There is no need for the recipient to be aware of having received the sacrament as an infant. His or her response will be manifested as life unfolds."

According to Father Hawker, the second approach — the psychological school — emphasizes that the sacrament should be received after the age of reason (seven years old) or older. Therefore, the recipient of the sacrament is aware of the wonder, gift and grace of the sacrament at the time of baptism.

A sacrament with a past

The sacrament of confirmation is, in reality, a reconfirmation of the gift of the Holy Spirit to the person within the community of believers.

"There's no question that the recipient of the grace and the wonder of baptism receives the Holy Spirit at that time," said Father Hawker.

The faith given in baptism is made stronger in confirmation as a Catholic accepts the responsibility for his faith and destiny. The gifts and fruits of the Holy Spirit give Catholics the courage to practice their faith, according to Father Triglio and Father Brighenti.

Therefore, the sacrament is a reconfirmation of what has happened previously in a person's life, and a tool for living out one's faith in the future.

Rooted in the birth of the church

Confirmation is traditionally celebrated near the time of Pentecost, when Catholics celebrate the coming of the Holy Spirit upon the Apostles as "a great wind and tongues of fire resting on the head of each, and that beautifully symbolizes the church," said Father Hawker.

"We are a community of spirited people, and the Holy Spirit rests on each one of us personally," he said.

"The church has a responsibility to be faithful to the Gospel of Jesus," Father Hawker said. "Each one of us has the responsibility to be faithful to the Gospel and to be witnesses of that Gospel and of Jesus Christ."

A new name

According to Father Hawker, "The significance of taking a name in confirmation is so that we might be reminded of some person within the tradition of the church who was faithful to the Lord Jesus, to his or her identity as a follower of Jesus and to the mission he or she had within the context of his or her own contemporary situation."

"So the taking of the name of this person reminds us of our calling to be faithful, to be disciples of Jesus just as that person was," he said.

Food and fashion in Salisbury

SALISBURY — St. Ann's Circle, a women's group at Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury, held a Spring Lunch and Fashion Show May 5.

One hundred women attended the event to honor St. Ann, grandmother of Jesus, preview fashions from Mary Elizabeth's of Salisbury, and enjoy food prepared by chefs Mary Frances Roueche and Angie Mooney.

Roueche received an award for outstanding leadership in guiding the event to completion. Charlotte Taylor received an award for marketing and selling tickets to the affair.

Female students from Sacred Heart School donned white aprons to serve ice tea during the luncheon. Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church, was the only man allowed at the "girls-only" event to accept a check for the new church building fund.

Catholics, Muslims work together on peaceful values

Intifada impacts schools, patriarchate determined to go on

BY JUDITH SUDILOVSKY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BEIT JALLA, West Bank — Schools in the Latin-rite Patriarchate of Jerusalem provide Islamic as well as Christian religious instruction in an effort to help educate all their students, a schools official said.

"Our schools are an opportunity to give (Muslims) an insight into our values. We don't want them to become Christian, but we want to spread our peaceful values in a world where peaceful values are not accepted," said Father Majdi al-Siryani, director of the patriarchate schools in the Palestinian territories.

"We ... need to educate them in their religion. We make sure they get the right teachings; otherwise, someone else will teach them the wrong Muslim teachings," he said.

The Latin Patriarchate parish schools have come a long way since being founded 150 years ago in the Holy Land with a handful of students and a group of determined priests.

Father al-Siryani said in those days it was difficult to recruit students, because families needed their sons to work.

"The schools were established mostly in remote villages where schools didn't exist," said Father al-Siryani.

Growing together

Today the patriarchate runs 41 schools — including 30 high schools — in Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian territories. The schools have 20,000 students and 15,000 teachers and staff, he said.

Father al-Siryani said the main mission of the schools is to teach catechism to Catholic children. The schools also serve as a way of helping the Muslim community get to know the Christians since many students are Muslim, he said.

The patriarchate aims to maintain the Christian character of the schools even when Christian students are in the minority, he said. The parish priest is always director of the school, parish nuns are always involved in some way, and many of the teachers are Christian.

Until the outbreak of the intifada, Father al-Siryani was responsible for the patriarchate schools in Israel, but the closures and Israeli checkpoints have made travel difficult and time-consuming. Now, schools in Israel are overseen by a priest in northern Israel.

The schools' students normally reflect the religious ratio of their communities. The school in Beit Sahour is 90 percent Christian and 10 percent Muslim; the school in Nablus is the opposite.

In the village of Aboud, most of the students are Muslim, Father al-Siryani said. School officials are hoping to expand the school into a high school, he added.

In Jifna, the parish elementary school is the only school. One-third of the students are Muslim, many from a neighboring refugee camp, said Father Rick van de Water, the parish priest.

"There are a lot of children from the refugee camp in the school, and it is one main way we establish good relations with the people around us," Father van de Water said.

Alumni from the Latin Patriarchate schools include Suha Arafat, wife of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. Suha Arafat was raised Greek Orthodox and converted to Islam to marry Yasser Arafat.

Other alumni are political and religious leaders, including Ramallah Mayor Ayoub Rabah, a Catholic; Parliament member Razi Hanania; and Lutheran Bishop Mounib Younan.

"It helped build my personality," said Rabah, who graduated in 1964. "Compared to the others schools in Ramallah at the time, it was one of the best in town. It helped me prepare for college."

Intifada impact

Last year, because of dwindling enrollment in some schools due to emigration and the checkpoints, the patriarchate laid off 100 teachers and will lay off another 20 teachers at the end of this school year, said Father al-Siryani.

The Nablus school has seen its enrollment slashed in half from 800 to 400 because of all the intifada-related issues, Father al-Siryani said.

Aside from the decline in enrollment, many families cannot afford to pay the $150 annual tuition; the cost to the school is $789 per student, Father al-Siryani said.

Nida Hijazi listens to Muslim student Firas Wahsh read from the Quran in a classroom of a parish school in Beit Jalla, West Bank.

Many Palestinian communities have unemployment rates of at least 70 percent, so the patriarchate has to scramble to find supporters. Funding comes from the Knights of the Holy Sepulcher, the Vatican and other sources.

Some schools were in danger of closing because of a lack of resources, Father al-Siryani said.

"We still have to be there and educate them. If we don't assume this responsibility, nobody will," he said.

Educating the masses

The patriarchate schools in Israel and Jordan function under a more normal situation, he said.

"In Israel it is different; their life is just about normal; they don't have the financial problems we have. Most schools are subsidized by the (Israeli) government, and the (Israeli) Ministry of Education follows up on the schools. Here we don't have government follow-up, we have curfews," Father al-Siryani said.

The first schools were established in the West Bank between 1854 and 1858. A photograph from 1870 shows the Beit Sahour parish priest, Father Jean Moretain, in a school picture with his four students.

In 1866, the patriarchate decided to allow girls at a school in Jordan, but it was not easy to get girls to enroll, Father al-Siryani said.

"The parents believed education was not good for the girls; they would learn how to write romantic letters," he said. "It took some time (to catch on) in the remote villages; they were Bedouin communities. It was not an easy job to direct a school."

Dialogue, respect key to relations with migrants, Muslims, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Pope John Paul II said dialogue and respect must underpin Catholics' relations with immigrants, especially Muslims.

It is vital "to approach all cultures with a respectful attitude in which one is aware that he doesn't just have something to say and offer, but also much to listen to and receive," he said.

The pope made his remarks May 18 to the Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers during its May 17-19 plenary meeting at the Vatican.

"In every culture, an approach can be found to the mystery of mankind even in its religious dimension and that explains, as the Second Vatican Council affirmed, why some facets of truth are found even outside the revealed (Christian) message," he said.

But integrating people of different cultures and religions is "never without unforeseen events or difficulties," especially when it comes to Muslim immigrants "who pose specific problems," said the pope.

"Fraternal dialogue and reciprocal respect are never a limit or hindrance in proclaiming the Gospel. Rather, love and welcoming constitute the first and most effective form of evangelization," he said.

Priests must take the lead in helping the faithful pay authentic Christian witness to their Muslim brothers and sisters, the pope said.

"It is, therefore, necessary that individual churches open up to welcoming (these newcomers) even with pastoral initiatives aimed at meeting and dialogue, but above all helping the faithful overcome prejudices" and teaching them to be missionaries at home, he said.

The pope said respect for all cultures is not just necessary because communities are more ethnically diverse than before, but also because such respect "is necessary so that the Gospel message can reach all people."

He said globalization makes it necessary to more actively engage in cultural exchange and interreligious dialogue.

""Social integration and cultural interaction have become a necessary prerequisite for peoples and nations to live together in true peace," he said.

In new book, pope wonders if he has been strict enough as a leader

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ROME — In a new autobiographical book, Pope John Paul II says he thinks he may have been too lenient as a pastor.

"The pastor's role also includes admonishing. I think that, in this category, I have perhaps done too little," the pope wrote in "Get Up, Let Us Go," a book distributed in Italian and other languages May 17.

"There's always a problem of balance between authority and service. Perhaps I should rebuke myself for not having tried hard enough to command," the pope said.

"In a certain sense, that's a result of my temperament," he added.

The book reviews his 20 years as a bishop in Poland and includes reflections on activities following his election as pope in 1978. An English edition was expected to be published in coming months.

The pope reflected on his authoritarian shortcomings in a chapter that recalled his ordination as bishop in 1958. He said how to wield episcopal authority is a question faced by every bishop.

All bishops try to keep Christ as a model, who spoke in terms of serving his flock and not ordering them around, he said.

"Naturally, authority belongs to the bishop, but a lot depends on how it is exercised. It the bishop depends too much on authority, people think that he only knows how to command," the pope said.

A nun passes a shop window displaying a new book by Pope John Paul in Rome May 18. "Get Up, Let Us Go" focuses on his 20 years as a bishop in Poland.

"A certain balance is needed. If a bishop says: 'Here I alone command,' or 'I'm only here to serve,' something is missing. He should serve by governing and govern by serving," he said.

The pope said that, despite his temperament, he had tried to strike that balance over the years.

"Notwithstanding the inner resistance I felt in reprimanding, I think I made all the necessary decisions," he said.

He said that in discussing important issues, he always liked to ask two questions of his collaborators: What truth of faith sheds light on this problem, and who can we find to help us?

Paul and Shirley live in the country between a small city and Appalachia — close enough to both to have a foot in each. Paul is a retired forester, and their house is on the edge of the national forest where he worked for many years. He knows the region and its people very well.

Paul's neighbor Pearl is an 86-year-old mountain woman who still prefers the Spartan life she's always lived, with no electricity or running water in her house. She chops wood for heat and daily carries in water from a well.

Paul sometimes helps with her harder chores, but when he noticed she needed some big repairs she could neither afford nor do herself, he asked his parish youth group to help.

The ensuing project was a perfect model of Pentecost — the Holy Spirit of God working through a community with a power and effectiveness greater than the sum of its parts.

On an early fall morning, 20 sleepy teenagers arrived with 10 accompanying adults and assembled on the dewy grass in Pearl's front yard. Their youth minister, wondering how the rag-tag group possibly could accomplish the daunting array of tasks Paul had planned, gave a pep talk and prayed for the Spirit's guidance.

One could almost see the tongues of spiritual fire parting as Paul divided the youths into small crews and instructed them.

Throughout the morning Pearl talked with her helpers as they worked together, sharing tools, jokes, water and a glorious day.

Within five hours they had painted three outbuildings, screened in her back porch, replaced a door, painted her front porch, replaced all her gutters, trimmed her trees, cut a winter's worth of firewood and built a crib to hold it.

Also established, as the Spirit naturally will, was a bond of love and care. As they finished the lunch that Shirley provided, Pearl told them, "You are all my family." Hugs — the sign of peace.

That's the message of Pentecost — God working as community. One God but one with the Son, one with the Holy Spirit and one with us, God's people. God's Spirit is poured out on each one and gathers strength as we join together to breathe life and love into the world.

Return of the ogre

Shrek, the big green ogre, appears in a scene from the computer-animated comedy "Shrek 2."

'Shrek' sequel is solid summer fun

BY DAVID DiCERTO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Everyone's favorite green ogre is back in "Shrek 2," the whimsical sequel to 2001's smash storybook send-up.

Dishing out the same blend of clever pop culture references and double-layered dialogue as the original, the film is an enchanting animated fairy tale farce that should leave viewers feeling happily ever after.

The new film opens with Shrek (voiced by Mike Myers) honeymooning with his new ogre bride, Fiona (voiced by Cameron Diaz), the not-so-fair princess whose hand — and heart — he had won in the original.

Returning home to their swamp love nest, the newlyweds receive an invitation to visit Fiona's parents (voiced by John Cleese and Julie Andrews), the king and queen of the comically coined kingdom, Far Far Away.

Against Shrek's better judgment, the lovers set off, with Shrek's jive-talking burro buddy, Donkey (voiced by Eddie Murphy), tagging along for the ride.

As feared, the joyous homecoming turns sour when the royals catch sight of their ogrefied daughter and new ogre-in-law son.

Apparently, Fiona was supposed to have been rescued by Prince Charming (voiced by Rupert Everett), a narcissistic ninny whose kiss would have returned her beauty by breaking the curse which keeps Fiona in her troll-like state. Instead, Shrek beat him to the smooch.

In an effort to write his own storybook ending, the king, in cahoots with a scheming Fairy Godmother (voiced by Jennifer Saunders), hatches a plot to undo Shrek and Fiona's chances of living happily ever after.

"Shrek 2" raises the bar for cutting-edge computer animation set by its predecessor. But it is the actors' voices that truly bring the cartoon confections to life, especially the returning trio of Myers, Diaz and Murphy.

Joining the cast is Antonio Banderas as Puss-and-Boots, a Zorro-like feline who, without letting the cat out of the bag, serves as a cat-alyst for much of the make-believe mischief.

With its welcome mix of adventure, romance and satire, "Shrek 2" echoes both the wit and charm, if not the freshness, of the original — a rare achievement in the world of sequels. The film is driven by an irreverence that spoofs and subverts the very fairy tale conventions it celebrates; fairy godmothers used to grant happy endings, not try to sabotage them.

The wall-to-wall humor will keep young viewers laughing, with the bawdier zingers above their heads. Adults will also have fun spotting the parodies of both current and classic Hollywood fare, including an amusing takeoff of the famous surf-and-sand kiss in "From Here to Eternity."

And while the follow-up's message of self-acceptance is somewhat recycled from the earlier installment, it is one well worth repeating, especially in our superficial society which puts such a premium on surface appearance at the exclusion of inner worth.

This is one summer movie that will cast a spell over young and old alike and should leave the competition green with envy.

Due to some mildly crude and suggestive humor, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

Pope, at audience, says God's mercy breaks cycle of sin, punishment

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — In God the human cycle of sin and punishment is replaced by a cycle of sin and forgiveness that gives a sense of peace and hope to believers, Pope John Paul II said.

"God is not indifferent to the evil perpetrated by his creatures because he is the guardian of justice and truth," the pope said May 19 during his weekly general audience.

Some 15,000 pilgrims from around the world gathered with the pope in St. Peter's Square to hear his reflections on Psalm 32 and to continue offering him best wishes for his 84th birthday, which was May 18.

A small group of Polish war veterans who had fought at Monte Cassino, Italy, during World War II were present for the audience.

The battle, in which 860 Polish soldiers died and some 2,800 Poles were injured, "opened the way for the Allies to reach Rome," the pope told the veterans.

"This has become a symbol of the noblest values of the Polish spirit and, especially, of the courage and readiness to give one's life 'for our freedom and theirs,'" the pope said.

"After the end of the war, Poland had to wait a long time before this hope was fulfilled," he said, referring to the years of communist domination.

"Today, however, we can thank God for the great grace which is the freedom of the Polish people. It is a gift and a task for today's generation," he said, praying that the Polish people would cultivate their freedom in love and respect for their traditional moral values.

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

In his main audience talk, the pope said Psalm 32 is a hymn of praise to God for his mercy and willingness to forgive.

The psalmist initially lacks the courage to acknowledge his errors, but when he finally says, "I confess my faults to the Lord," God responds "immediately with generous forgiveness" and the sinner is filled with peace, the pope said.

When Catholics approach the sacrament of confession, he said, the same thing occurs.

In the sacrament, the pope said, "one experiences an awareness of sin — frequently obscured in our day — together with the joy of forgiveness."

"The strict logic of sin-punishment has been replaced, through God's grace, by the joyful reality of sin-forgiveness," Pope John Paul said.

A story missed

Confronting evil with love is a story worth covering

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

The old slogan, "no news is good news," is appropriate when you are waiting for a jury verdict or for the IRS to ask you questions about your tax return. But a situation in Asheville over a recent weekend unfortunately shows that the opposite is also true, "Good news is no news."

The good news is how a group of churches in Asheville reacted to a recent demonstration outside their doors as Sunday services were starting. Six churches, including St. Eugene Church, were picketed by a group call "God Hates Fags" (GHF).

GHF is the deluded battle cry of a group of people from the Westboro Baptist Church in Topeka, Kan. After visiting the group's Web site, it's difficult to describe them as a church, which is a place of love and worship, or as Baptists, who in my experience are people who love the Lord deeply and demonstrate their faith with countless acts of witness and charity.

To show how little connection the picketers have with mainline Baptists, one of the churches where picketers showed up was the First Baptist Church of Asheville. Other denominations targeted by the group included Presbyterian, Lutheran, Episcopal and Methodist.

GHF travels the country picketing churches, schools and any organization that has anything positive or nurturing involving homosexuals. The Asheville churches were targeted because of outreach programs that minister to the gay community.

The demonstration, if you can call it that, consisted of a few people who got out of a car, marched outside St. Eugene Church for a few minutes and then left. One television station, WLOS, did a story on the gathering, quoting both the demonstrators and the churchgoers in equal measure. This is the standard journalistic approach that presents both sides of a story and lets readers or viewers decide about the message. Other than that, there was no coverage.

At first blush, it would look like a wacko fringe group got the lack of coverage that its strange ideas deserve. And maybe that's OK. But there was a far more compelling story that occurred in response to GHF — a story of interfaith cooperation that exemplifies the biblical call to turn the other cheek and to love your brother.

Here's what happened upon learning of the impending demonstration. The six churches that were targeted for picketing got together and wrote a letter to their parishioners responding to the demonstration. The letter, much of which was written by Father Frank Cancro, pastor of St. Eugene Church, is a model of ecumenism and a faith-based response to an adversarial event. It was evident in the news quotes from the people who walked past the protestors on their way into Sunday service that the message in the pastor's letter got through.

"We, the pastors of the six churches targeted for protest here in Asheville, have come together to show our solidarity in the faith," the letter states. It goes on to say that "hate can never be used as a means to describe the actions of God in relation to people."

That's a polite way of saying that the loathsome slogan, "God Hates Fags," is a contradiction, since God is a being filled only with love. God's love is the basic message of every Mass and service celebrated at Christian churches. We hear this message in the pews over and over; seeing it in action in response to a hate group is further proof of the spirit of God's love.

Newsrooms take note: confronting evil and hatred with love and good will is a story worth covering.

The pastor's letter ends by inviting "all people of faith and good will to pray with us as we gather peacefully in prayer and song, as every Sunday, with our congregations."

Amen.

The story of a family

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

When Amy Biancolli, an enthusiastic college student, came into my office one day back in the early 1980s, I had no way of knowing this would be the beginning of a friendship I forever shall cherish.

I was editor of a Connecticut newspaper, and she was a college student asking if she could be an intern reporter. How could I refuse someone so enthusiastic, already committed to this profession? Her father, Louis Biancolli, after all, had been music critic for the World Telegram and Sun, a much respected New York newspaper, for some 40 years.

What I could not have known that day was how connected I was to become to Amy and her family — especially her mother, Jeanne Mitchell, the renowned violinist of the '50s, and her sister Lucy, with striking violet-blue eyes and fingers that made everything she touched, be it a grand piano or typesetter keys, send a perfect offering into the world.

But my lifelong connection to Amy and her family is not because of their incredible talents. It is because of the love and faith we shared (all the Biancollis were converts to the Catholic Church), the pain we endured together and the blessings we acknowledge.

As Amy developed into an outstanding writer, accepted into the Columbia School of Journalism, I got to know her mother and her sister very well. Her mother and I had become instant sisters in our faith and our motherhood. We were united in pain, as we both faced parallel illnesses that afflicted her daughter Lucy and my son Peter, both of whom had contemplated suicide. We had high hopes for their progress in health, but their beautiful brains gave out.

A year after Peter's suicide, Lucy killed herself.

Unbelievably, Amy, newly married, was all too soon to face the deaths of her father and, not too long after, her mother. Jeanne's death was a blow to me for she had become my best friend as we supported each other after the suicides of our beloved children.

This month I received a gift from Amy, now a mother of three — a book she has written about her loss, being the only survivor of her family, lovingly titled "House of Holy Fools: A Family Portrait in Six Cracked Parts." She said she wrote the book for her children so that they will know her sister and parents through her words, memories and pictures framed with love.

I read Amy's book the week after I came home from burying my son Sterling, my third son to die. I was so moved. Her pain was my pain, too, especially her words that no one knows better than the living the excruciating pains of death.

She writes: "I know where to find [my loved ones] because I find them in myself.... I love them still; and still, forever leaving, they remain."

Amy writes about the tragedy of Lucy's suicide, and my heart was pierced again: "Suicide is always senseless because the suffering that leads to it makes no sense at all.... Only God knows why Lucy had to kill herself; only God knows why her brain waged war against her."

This memoir by a daughter of a family that loved music, laughter and joy so much is a memorable love story. Amy Biancolli writes of them and speaks only of blessings — especially of her own conversion to the Catholic faith, which has led her to say, "I was given so much. I can't doubt anything in my life."

Importance of church unity

Spirituality for Today

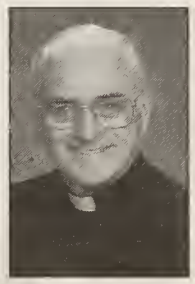
FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS COLUMNIST



The word "inculturation" refers to the way different cultures around the world affect our Catholic faith. There is need for dialogue in each country where serious differences exist. Those devoted to protecting the faith are usually at odds with those defending local customs.

Pope John Paul II offered these criteria for true inculturation:

—The teaching must always be compatible with the Gospel, and the teacher must always be in communion with the universal church.

—Accepting the morality of each culture can damage the integrity of the faith. It can also shatter the universal church's unity.

"We Americans, like others, tend to assume that the church should govern herself by the processes to which we are accustomed in our political and industrial life," said Cardinal Avery Dulles. "The Catholic Church has thus far remained resistant to such absorption. Her stable traditions and worldwide organization enable her to be in some respects counterculture, and to speak out against certain values and practices that are generally accepted in the secular culture."

At what point does the church refuse to be absorbed by the secular culture? How are Catholics supposed to remain ecumenical in these circumstances?

Is it a matter of reaching agreements through compromise or a process of mutual enrichment where each Christian church offers something in the interest of church unity? The Catholic Church offers the papacy as a symbol of universal unity and as a faithful defender of doctrinal integrity against the popular culture. This is an exceedingly important point.

In the recent controversy over gay and lesbian marriages, we know these are our brothers and sisters in Christ. As Americans, they deserve to be treated as equal citizens under the law.

Vatican II's Declaration of Religious Freedom teaches us that "the human person has a right to religious freedom. This freedom means that all men are to be immune from coercion on the part of individuals or of social groups, and of any human power.... No one is to be forced to act in a manner contrary to his religious beliefs."

But as a group they can't redefine the church's traditional teaching on the sacrament of matrimony.

There are principles at stake, and they cannot be tossed aside in the name of peace.

Teens and their first jobs

Hard work, but earned pride

Coming of Age

KASE JOHNSTUN
CNS COLUMNIST

I've mentioned in previous columns how my first jobs taught me so much about working with people, being responsible and having a good time while working. But I failed to mention something else: cash.

Those jobs provided cash for my social life — cash for gas, cash for movies, cash for clothes, cash for cash — relieving my parents of the expense.

First jobs are not glamorous. They are not cushy. They do not provide health benefits, and they usually do not boast titles such as "executive director." First jobs do not pave the way to an illustrious career once you depart their doors. I made shakes. I scrubbed cars. I got dirty.

These jobs were not the world's best. Standing on blacktop, baking in the more than 100-degree weather, waiting for a car to come out to wipe down, then waiting again for the customer to complain about the job I had done and walk away without tipping, is not fabulous. Many times I hated my first jobs and loathed going to work to get bossed around by an uptight manager: "Mop the floor, clean the ashtray and clean the grill."

High school or junior high students have — and had — no experience to land a nice office job with a computer, the Internet, e-mail and paid vacation. So, we need to push those ideas straight out the office door of our heads.

Talking with a young man recently, I heard something fly from his mouth I couldn't believe. "I want an office job from 3 to 5 in the afternoon and will work around my practice."

I thought, sure, there are a lot of good positions for teens in telemarketing, and they pay pretty good money.

"I don't want to do telemarketing. I want a real job," he added.

At this point I had to burst his bubble. He was above fast food. He was above car washing. He was above manual labor. I told him, "Good luck."

There is nothing wrong with fast-food jobs or manual-labor jobs. They are very respectable and honorable. The paychecks from these jobs buy the same clothes as office jobs.

First jobs are just that, first jobs, and they offer one important thing that teens need: cash. They also offer the many issues and responsibilities that go along with having $20 in your pocket from serving people slaw on Saturday night or $40 from filling gas tanks Friday afternoon. With the money come many things, including budgeting skills and bank account management, both important skills to learn young.

But the most important thing that comes from holding $50 in your hand from working late into the night on Thursday — when everyone else is at the game — is pride. This is not the pride that hurts people or takes from others. It is not the pride that gloats. It is not the pride that makes your head expand to a point that makes it difficult to fit it through the door.

It is the pride that gives a little upbeat step as you leave your work knowing that your first job is a pain but that you mopped the floor or filled the drink or built a solid frame the best that you could. Then with cash in pocket you have more freedom to buy the extra hamburger without worrying about giving your parents the change at the end of the night.

That's nice, and it's worth it.

WINSTON-SALEM — The parish of St. Benedict the Moor was established in 1940 to serve the spiritual needs of Winston-Salem Catholics. Now one of four Winston-Salem parishes, it has helped shape the Catholic landscape in the Winston-Salem Vicariate.

Bishop Eugene McGuinness of Raleigh established St. Benedict the Moor Church in response to the needs of African-American Catholics living in the Winston-Salem area. Placing it under the direction of the Franciscans, the bishop welcomed Franciscan Father Ronald Scott as the founding pastor.

About a dozen local African-American Catholics made up the original parish family. The first Masses were celebrated in the home of a lawyer, Hosea Price, and his wife. Working closely with Father Scott, parishioners began searching for a site on which to build a church. Property for that church, along with a parish hall and rectory, was purchased in April 1940 from a bishop of the AME Zion Church. The site is that of the present St. Benedict the Moor Church.

As construction proceeded, the congregation continued gathering for Mass at the Price home and, in November 1940, in a local funeral home. Bishop McGuinness dedicated the new church the following year.

Father Scott continued as pastor, and in August 1943 he welcomed an associate pastor to assist in developing the parish. Parishioners found spiritual and social opportunities in a number of parish groups and organizations, including the Legion of Mary, Third Order of St. Francis, St. Monica's Guild and St. Benedict's Men's Club.

To enhance the educational aspect of the faith, the Sisters of St. Francis of Allegany, N.Y., arrived in Winston-Salem, and in early September 1946 opened St. Anne Academy. Later that month, Bishop Joseph Waters of Raleigh dedicated the academy, a convent and a residence for girls.

In September 1950, the Sisters of St. Francis helped found a parish grammar school, enrolling 116 students in its first year. In addition to education and spiritual nourishment, the school also turned out championship basketball teams throughout the 1950s, '60s and '70s. The school continued operation until 1979.

St. Benedict the Moor Church assumed responsibility for its first mission, Our Lady of Fatima Chapel in downtown Winston-Salem, in 1969. The following year, the Catholic community to the east in Kernersville became a mission of St. Benedict the Moor Church and continued as such until 1973. Catholics to the north in King were also ministered to by St. Benedict the Moor clergy. That community, now known as Good Shepherd Church, remains a mission of St. Benedict the Moor Church, while Our Lady of Fatima Chapel is now a mission of Our Lady of Mercy Church in Winston-Salem. The Kernersville congregation was given parish status in 1973, when Holy Cross Church was founded.

St. Benedict the Moor parishioners observed the 50th anniversary of their church in November 1990 with a Mass celebrated by then-Bishop (now Archbishop of Atlanta) John F. Donoghue. Among the concelebrants were Jesuit Father Lawrence Hunt, pastor; and Father Francis O'Rourke and Father Thomas Gaunt, former pastors.

Parish formation continued through the 1990s under the pastorate of Father Hunt, who has served at St. Benedict the Moor Church since 1990. Parishioners continue to be involved in an active prayer group, altar servers group, youth group, religious education, choir and a variety of commissions.

The parish also places a high priority on community involvement. Local groups and efforts such as the Crisis Control ministry, Red Cross donor program and Samaritan Soup Kitchen have benefited from St. Benedict the Moor parishioner support. The church building is host to Narcotics Anonymous and Community Watch meetings.

Parishioners are also actively involved with the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry. Several parishioners joined members of Our Lady of Consolation Church in Charlotte for a heritage pilgrimage to Baltimore and Washington, D.C. in May 2004.

The parish family of St. Benedict the Moor celebrated the church's 60th anniversary with a retreat, spring picnic, fall festival and a dinner celebration for 150 parishioners in December 2000.

In the past year, the Community Knowledge Center was established at the church. Sponsored by Winston-Salem State University, the center features 10 computers and offers classes for senior citizens, tutoring for middle-school students and a tax-filing service for Hispanics.

As pastor of St. Benedict the Moor Church in Winston-Salem and Good Shepherd Church in King, Father Hunt ministers to hundreds of Catholics in Forsyth and Stokes counties.

CHARLOTTE — When fifth-grader Hunter Smith took over as the student council president of Our Lady of the Assumption School last September, she dreamed of helping other schoolchildren.

So she paid a visit to her principal, Patricia Murphy.

"Hunter approached me with the idea of collecting donations to help children in Africa," said Murphy.

Into the picture came Caroline Glickman, whose sister is a Daughter of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul. For the past 18 months, Sister Pat Beyrau has worked with three other Daughters of Charity to build and equip schools in West Pokot, a re-

Catholic leaders issue fourth criminal justice statement

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

MARTIN, Ky. — The fourth in a series of criminal justice statements from the Catholic bishops of Southern states calls for alternatives to incarceration to be used whenever possible.

"Prisons, like wars, are public admissions of defeat for humanity," said the statement: "'I Have Come to Heal ...' Restorative Justice."

Alternatives to imprisonment "must be searched for and implemented," it said, explaining that the criminal justice system was created in the face of violence, as a way to provide public safety.

The statement issued in April is part of a planned six-part series on criminal justice issues from the bishops of 12 Southern states.

HONORING HEROES

A quote from President Harry S. Truman appears on a granite wall at the new National World War II Memorial in Washington May 19. The memorial, which will be formally dedicated May 29, is located between the Washington Monument and the Lincoln Memorial on the National Mall. Its design and features pay tribute to the 16 million who served in the U.S. armed forces and the more than 400,000 who died in the war.

Catholic World War II vets on new memorial: It's about time

WASHINGTON (CNS) — World War II veterans say it's about time a memorial honoring their service and that of their fallen comrades be built.

After years of wrangling over its design and the site for it, the memorial will be dedicated May 29. The structure lies east of the Reflecting Pool in the shadow of the Washington Monument on the National Mall.

Three Catholic veterans of the war residing at the Armed Forces Retirement Home in Washington hoped to attend the dedication.

"It's about time" for a monument, said Jewell Miggins, 80, who served stateside in the Women's Army Corps in Illinois while her late husband fought in the Pacific theater.

Joseph Kuhar, 87, served in Europe in the Special Service unit of the armed forces that mounted entertainment for the troops. Performers he worked with included Marlene Dietrich, Dinah Shore, Eddie Cantor and Mickey Rooney.

Kuhar's job wasn't cushy. Soldiers received five points for every battle they were in, and one point for every area they were in where there was fighting. Kuhar received 65 points before he left the Special Service unit.

He said he remembered how chaplains would offer Mass in Europe to meet soldiers' hunger for the divine.

"We'd come from four miles around at night to see Father say Mass in the back of a Jeep if we had to," he noted.

"I think it should have been built a long time ago," Kuhar said of the memorial.

Robert Cooper, 81, stayed out of combat as a Navy mechanic fixing airplanes, first in Florida and then at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii.

"I never had a shot fired at me," he said, but "I saw plenty of dying — 21 people in one day in Pensacola," Cooper said. "I lost a number of fairly good friends" in crashes during training exercises.

Cooper learned about the Catholic faith from a priest, a Navy chaplain, while stationed in Florida. He became a Catholic in 1949.

The memorial, built on a new plaza on the Mall, features 24 bas relief panels depicting America's war years. Two 43-foot arches serve as markers on the memorial's north and south ends. Each state, the District of Columbia, and every U.S. territory at that time will be represented by a 17-foot granite pillar — 56 in all — to symbolize national unity during World War II.

Missouri to vote on constitutional amendment to define marriage

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo. (CNS) — Catholic officials in Missouri will support a proposed amendment to the Missouri Constitution defining marriage as a union between one man and one woman.

Missourians will vote on the proposed amendment at either the August primary election or the November general election.

"This is not a vote against people who are homosexual," said Rev. Mr. Larry Weber, executive director of the Missouri Catholic Conference, which lobbies the state General Assembly.

"It is a vote in favor of preserving the traditional family unit in this state. Families are and always have been the foundation of our society. We believe that without stable families, our society will collapse," he said.

State law already defines marriage as existing only between one man and one woman. A constitutional amendment would prevent state courts or lawmakers from striking down that law.

"Marriage between persons of the same sex, and full faith and credit of that marital status entered into in another state, will not be recognized as marriage in Missouri," the bill said.

Missouri's Catholic bishops wrote and urged lawmakers to send to the voters a constitutional amendment defining marriage.

"If our laws redefine marriage to include same-sex unions, then marriage simply becomes a menu for choosing a variety of relationships," the bishops said. "If that is all marriage is, then there is no reason why polygamy and other relationships cannot be added along with same-sex unions to the banner of 'marriage.'"

"Our laws can uphold traditional marriage or they can attempt to validate a variety of sexual relationships, but they cannot do both," the bishops said.

FROM THE VATICAN

Parents obligated to control what children see in media, pope says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Parents have a serious obligation to control what their children are allowed to watch or see on television, at the movies and on the Internet, Pope John Paul II said.

But government authorities also have a duty to ensure that the media, especially those using public airwaves to communicate, "are always respectful of the truth and the common good," the pope said.

Pope John Paul spoke about the media during his midday "Regina Coeli" address May 23, the church's World Communications Day.

The pope said the church looks toward communications professionals "with attention, kindness and a desire to establish with them a frank and open dialogue in order to encourage a commitment on behalf of the authentic progress of humanity."

Pope John Paul said the media offer individuals and families "the vast resources of communication and information" that can contribute to "education, cultural enrichment and spiritual growth."

But the media also can cause "serious damage to the family when they present an inadequate or even distorted vision of life, of the family itself, of religion and of morality," he said.

"Therefore, one must learn to use them with wisdom and prudence," the pope said.

Pope pleads for interreligious effort for Middle East peace

ROME (CNS) — As Rome's Jewish community celebrated the 100th anniversary of its monumental synagogue, Pope John Paul II pleaded for new interreligious efforts to bring peace to the Middle East.

"The God of justice and peace, of mercy and reconciliation calls us to collaborate without hesitation in our modern world, which is lacerated by confrontations and hostility," the pope wrote to the community.

The pope's message was read at the May 23 anniversary celebration, which the city's Jewish community marked by renewing its commitment to dialogue with Christians and Muslims.

The synagogue, built between 1901 and 1904, replaced the five small synagogues of Rome's Jewish ghetto, where the city's Jews were forced by papal order to live beginning in 1556.

When the pope visited the synagogue in 1986, it was considered a breakthrough gesture that did much to strengthen the bonds of friendship between Christianity and Judaism. It was the first time a modern pope had entered a synagogue.

Pope John Paul recalled the church's condemnation of anti-Semitism and its request for forgiveness for the times when church members have harmed the Jewish people.

"Nevertheless, while it is obligatory, it is not enough to express disapproval and condemnation of the hostility toward the Jewish people that frequently marked history. We also must develop friendship, esteem and fraternal relations with them," the pope said.

The pope said Christians and Jews couldn't help but worry about the continuing violence in the Holy Land where "too much innocent blood" has been shed by Israelis and Palestinians.

"For this, we want today to raise a fervent prayer to the Eternal in faith and in hope, to the God of 'shalom' so that hostility will no longer overwhelm with hatred those who call Abraham father — Jews, Christian and Muslims," the pope said.

"If we learn to unite our hearts and our hands to respond to the divine call, the light of the Everlasting will draw near to enlighten all peoples, showing us the path of peace," the pope said. "We all want to follow it with one heart."

Students raise money for Africa schools

mote mountainous region of Kenya in east Central Africa.

Thus began the "OLA Builds a School in Africa" campaign.

Students gave up buying pizza, ice cream and CDs to contribute their savings to the fund. Teachers asked for donations instead of Christmas presents. Quarter by quarter, dollar by dollar, the fund gradually grew to $1,700.

Sister Beyrau paid a visit to Our Lady of the Assumption School May 20 to accept the check and to share her experiences in Africa with the fourth- and fifth-grade students.

The monies collected by the students will help fund the work of the Daughters of Charity by allowing them to purchase "Trunks on the Go" — trunks filled with a variety of school supplies such as charts and numbers and letters made of wood, which can then be used in several different schools.

School buildings in this area of Kenya are made of mud and sticks and have little or no furniture, Sister Beyrau explained to the students. As many as 80 students crowd into a single unfurnished classroom, sitting on benches fashioned out of logs. They attend school from 8 a.m. until 5 p.m., learning without books, paper or pencils.

Sister Pat Beyrau shows an African carving to the students and faculty of Our Lady of the Assumption School May 20.

Even in these crowded conditions, discipline is never a problem, Sister Beyrau said, because the children all want so badly to learn.

"The most glorious time is when they're in school," she said, explaining how difficult the children's lives are outside of school.

Children are expected to work at home, helping to take care of the family's animals and land. West Pokot girls typically begin their days at 4 a.m. to haul water for the family. Students then walk as far as two miles to school.

Attending school is a new concept to many Kenyans, Sister Beyrau said. In 2003, the current president, Mwai Kibaki, decreed that education would be provided free to all students through the eighth grade. Hundreds of children are taking advantage of this opportunity and attending school for the first time.

This opportunity for Kenyan children means more work for teachers and missionaries such as Sister Beyrau. The Daughters of Charity, along with Kenyan mothers, are building a child development center in the village of Chepenyal, which will prepare three- to six-year-old children to attend primary school.

This is an example of children helping other children, Murphy said.

"It's good for the students to learn how to gather their resources in school to directly benefit children in Kenya," she said.

'Tales of Wonder' at St. Ann School

Student body performs annual spring musical

BY PEGGY ANDERSON
SPECIAL TO THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — Students sang and danced their way through stories of the Catholic faith during St. Ann School's annual spring musical May 22.

The entire student body came together to celebrate God's gifts with the musical "Tales of Wonder." Approximately 240 students in kindergarten through fifth-grade, dressed in brightly colored T-shirts, formed a rainbow of voices offering praise to God.

"To my knowledge, this is the first time an elementary school has performed a musical of this caliber," said Karen Charlton, school choir director and parent of two students.

Songs included "I Say 'Yes,' My Lord" in both English and Spanish, along with a rousing rendition of "All You Works of God" that had the audience on their feet, clapping and singing.

The school choir, which consists of students in grades three, four and five, participated in leading many of the songs.

Marty Haugen, a composer of liturgical music for both Catholic and Protestant congregations, developed "Tales of Wonder" after he observed a small village community in Hawaii. He has spent 20 years presenting workshops and concerts around the world for those interested in the renewal of worship.

"Tales of Wonder" was recently performed at St. Eugene Church in Asheville.

"It was appropriate for St. Ann School, because we, too, are a close-knit community," said Charlton. "Everyone in the school worked together as a village to pull the show together."

The program was directed by Charlton; Maryanne Jackson and Shelley Earnhardt, parents of St. Ann School students; and school music teacher Harry Booth.

"So many people volunteered hours and hours of their time to make this happen," said parent Dottie Sue Fowler. "It was just phenomenal. The choice of music and the children's voices were incredibly moving."

Bill Ballard, a grandfather of a student, and guidance counselor Nancy Russo served as storytellers. Musicians were teacher Kari Jenkins and members of the professional group Bethany from St. Luke Church in Mint Hill.

In addition, every teacher participated, encouraging the students and helping the show to run smoothly.

All areas of the St. Ann School cultural arts curriculum were represented in the show. Spanish teacher Maritza Ortiz-Romero worked with students on the Spanish song. Students in the Art Club, led by teacher Angie Olle, created artwork and props, including blooming sunflowers, bolts of lightning and a huge rainbow on the stage.

"It was fun," said Sarah Loesch, a kindergarten student. "I got to be a bird."

"Marty Haugen's vision of a global village was truly exemplified Saturday night as people of all ages and many nationalities joined together to sing the songs of our faith," said Charlton. "It is this diversity and community that make St. Ann School such a special place."

UNDER THE SEA

Student mural adds ocean view to Bishop McGuinness

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

KERNERSVILLE — Life under the sea just got a little clearer at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School.

To help liven up the school hallways, senior Jackie Taylor led a team of students in painting a giant mural depicting an ocean ecosystem.

"This type of project gives the kids a chance to showcase their talents," said Rick Eklund, biology teacher.

Eklund was instrumental in getting the project underway. When students and faculty moved into the new high school in 2001, the building seemed rather "clinical." So Eklund and other faculty got together to determine what could be done to "liven up" the place.

"We recruited art students who would be willing to paint a 12-feet-by-9-feet mural of a rainforest on the staircase landing leading up to the science department," he said.

"The concept of painting murals ... humanizes the school by making it more than just a building," said Leslie Hiatt, art teacher.

It was junior Megan Witzke who volunteered to head up a team of students to add character to the school last year.

This year, Eklund encouraged his students to leave a positive memorial of their years at the school. Once Eklund approved Jackie's ocean design, she organized a new team of artists — senior Erica Lawrence and freshmen Melissa Taylor, Teri Walsh and Jessica Hogan.

The students worked on the mural after school, often 10-12 hours each week. In order not to become overwhelmed with the massive project, the students worked for several weeks and then took a week or so off until the mural was finished.

In order to cover the staircase wall, located a level below the rainforest mural, the students utilized a lift from the drama department to reach the high spots.

"The ocean scene is real nice," said sophomore Richard Dudley. "I especially like how the forest is above it. It's like going under water as you go down the stairs."

"While I thought the ocean was a cool idea, painting it became very mundane," said Jackie. "What I thought would be very difficult was the best part, because it included painting a variety of multicolored fish."

Ecklund wasn't surprised that Jackie volunteered to head up the project.

"She is very dedicated and independent," he said.

Described as an in-charge person with an upbeat outlook on school and life, Jackie — a black belt in karate — was recently appointed to the U.S. Air Force Academy in Colorado.

"I am looking forward to getting a pilot's license," said Jackie.

"The Air Force Academy did not make a mistake in appointing her," said Hiatt. "She is and will be an excellent student there."

Students and faculty are pleased with the new mural.

"It is edifying to see these students express themselves through the medium of art," said Loretta Bednar, head of the religious studies department.

"(The mural) allows students to look at something in the morning and get a sense of joy," said Richard. "It's a morale booster, knowing that someone was willing to put that much time and effort into it."

Students to journey down under

KERNERSVILLE — Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School students are preparing to go "down under" this summer.

Forty students and parents will spend 14 days exploring the South Pacific in mid-June. Students travel to the South Pacific every second year.

An educational and adventure field trip, the "Journey Down Under" begins in New Zealand with a visit to Rotorura and the Maori culture. The group then travels to Sydney, Australia, and on to Cairns in Queensland, where they will spend a day on the Great Barrier Reef and become familiar with the Tjapuki aboriginal culture.

Next is a trip north to Cape Tribulation to spend two days deep in the rainforest spotting and learning about the importance of environmental issues. Students will visit several animal habitats, do an early morning climb of the Sydney Harbor bridge and immerse themselves in cultures thousands of years old.

The tour will end with two days in Honolulu, Hawaii.

Catholic siblings are among top karate experts

CHARLOTTE — Ryan and Alex Kilmartin have lofty goals in life — Ryan, 13, wants to be a marine biologist specializing in sharks; Alex, 11, wants to become a doctor.

In the meantime, the brothers are both second-degree black belts who rank among the top two in the world in their respective age brackets for tae kwon do.

Tae kwon do, a 2,000-year-old Korean martial art, was introduced to the Olympics in Korea in 1988, according to the Tae Kwon Do Network.

Ryan, a student at Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School, and Alex, a student at St. Matthew School, both started tae kwon do when each was around four years old. Between them, they have won 27 AAU national championships and gold medals. Plaques, clippings and magazine covers of their achievements, and 400 trophies — half of which are taller than both boys — decorate their recreation room walls.

"In team sports, there's always someone to lean on, someone to cover your mistakes," said the boys' father, Sean Kilmartin. "In this sport (tae kwon do), it's just you. What they learned at a young age was if you want to win, you have to do it yourself."

"And their success was their own," he said. "They've competed against some of the best."

Ryan has won as the overall top competitor in U.S. Junior Karate.

Alex was the youngest person in America ever to participate in the Junior Olympic Games when he was 5 years old. He competed in the 8-and-under division; he didn't win that first year but came back to win the next three years. When he turned 8, he moved to the 10-and-under division and won that competition as well.

During their careers, Ryan and Alex have competed in the Battle of Atlanta and the U.S. Open. Last year, they finished the North American Sports Karate Association Tour with Alex ranked No. 1 in the world and Ryan No. 1 in the United States and No. 2 in the world.

Kilmartin said discipline and respect involved in tae kwon do have done much for his children.

"It reinforces a lot of the basic principles and consistencies that we as parents and as Catholics want to instill in their lives," he said. "They have never raised their hands to anyone outside of the sport."

Torture warnings not heeded, says prelate

by the United States.

Today, in the wake of Iraqi prisoner abuse, Cardinal Stafford wonders why others did not see it coming.

"All of this outcry by the Democrats in Congress, the Republicans in the White House and by the press is deceitful in light of the silence that took place when torture was being talked about in 2001, 2002, 2003," Cardinal Stafford said in an interview with the Catholic magazine, Inside the Vatican.

In a February 2003 statement reported by Catholic News Service, Cardinal Stafford said, "The government of the United States has compromised its own basic principles by implicitly endorsing the use of torture since Sept. 11, 2001."

At that time, the cardinal was concerned that political leaders of both major parties, as well as some leading legal experts, supported the torture of terrorist suspects and that media reports of their statements had produced no outcry.

"What's incredible is that nobody at that time made any comments about these articles," he said in his latest interview, published on the magazine's Web site in mid-May.

"If American soldiers and superiors in Iraq had known that there had been an explicit, absolute refusal to go along that route, that fatal choice of torture ... then they would have thought a long time before allowing it," he said.

Cardinal Stafford said the revelations and photos of prisoner abuse will infuriate Arabs and raise fundamental questions about the type of democracy the United States is trying to export.

"Muslims are outraged and deceived because Americans appear to be imposing the same type of life upon Iraqi society that we said we were going to rescue them from. It's the very opposite of what we said we were going to do," he said.

"Not only have we humiliated the Iraqi people, but we've deceived them. We've deceived the Arab peoples," he said.

"Is this what American democracy is producing? Men and women who, just below the surface, are barbarians. Just below the surface of American civilization, of American popular culture, we are becoming barbaric. Is that what American democracy is producing today?" he said.

In early 2003, Cardinal Stafford was a strong critic of the U.S. decision to go to war, saying there appeared to be no hard evidence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. He now says the fact that no such weapons were found represents an intelligence failure and a moral failure.

"Why did the president, the vice president and the secretary of defense say there was an immediate danger to the peace of American society by the proximate use of weapons that would come from Iraq, either directly or through al-Qaida? Why did they say that when they didn't have the documentation to back it up?" he said.

Cardinal J. Francis Stafford, shown here speaking at a 2002 press conference, warned more than a year ago that "war on terror" would lead to the torture of Iraqi prisoners.

"They tried to convince an intelligent citizenry, an enlightened citizenry who are ultimately responsible, whether a government should remain or not remain, but we were not presented with the real reasons," he said.

"I think the real reason was to try to create this democracy in the Middle East, and I think it was wishful thinking. But nevertheless, that was their intention, as we found out once they got in there," he said.

Living Light catechetical journal to cease publication

40-year run ends due to low circulation, rising production costs

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The Living Light, a quarterly catechetical journal published by the U.S. bishops' Department of Education, will end publication with its summer issue after a 40-year run.

The Living Light was established in 1964 by the National Center for the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, forerunner to today's U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops. In 1966, it became a publication of the education department.

Over the years, Our Sunday Visitor, William H. Sadlier Inc. and Mercer University Press produced and distributed The Living Light. For the last decade, USCCB Publishing had produced it and distributed it.

The journal was projected to lose $44,000 in the coming year.

"The decision to close the journal is strictly a financial one. We simply could no longer underwrite the journal's expense," said Dominican Sister Glenn Anne McPhee, USCCB secretary of education, in a statement.

Circulation of The Living Light was 1,500, according to the 2004 Catholic Press Directory, although Conventual Franciscan Father Berard Marthaler, executive editor, said it was "less than 1,000."

Subscriptions sold for $29.95, and individual issues cost $8.

Mary Perkins Ryan served as executive editor for the first 10 years of The Living Light. For the last 30 years, Father Marthaler, now a professor emeritus at The Catholic University of America in Washington, served as executive editor.

Father Marthaler told Catholic News Service the professional journal nearly closed down after its first two years of operation, "then Our Sunday Visitor came to the rescue." But no publisher or distributor could stem ongoing losses to produce it, he said.

"We changed the format almost every time we changed publishers," he said, adding, "Anything that's a money loser they're not going to make a top priority."

He told CNS he had first mentioned stepping down from his editor's post two years ago. Recently, he added, "I finally said, 'We've got to do something.'"

Although Father Marthaler said he would step down and some possible successors were considered, Sister McPhee said that played no part in the decision to close the quarterly.

Father Marthaler said The Living Light's subscription base was strong in European libraries, but weaker in U.S. libraries.

"That reflects what's happening in diocesan religious education," he added, alluding to staff cuts in individual dioceses.

Still, "it was a good run. I think we served the field well. It was an exciting time," Father Marthaler said.

In the wake of The Living Light's closing, books that cull articles from back issues are being considered. A book on adolescent catechesis taken from the journal's articles has already been published.

"Why is grass green?"

Parents of curious pre-school age children are not surprised by such questions. Most will have enough basic scientific information to offer a cogent answer. But knowledge of facts is one thing; wisdom is another.

Parents who are merely knowledgeable will sit young questioners down and launch into their best imitation of Mr. Wizard, speaking earnestly about chlorophyll and sunshine and the miracle of photosynthesis. They will draw colorful diagrams. And after they've finished their carefully detailed explanations, they'll be frustrated at their children's uncomprehending stares.

Wise parents, on the other hand, will tailor their response to the age and capacity of the children. They won't try to turn preschoolers into botanists, but will give them just enough information to lay some groundwork for later developmental stages when the children will be capable of embracing more of the details and grasping more fully the concepts behind the facts.

In the Gospel for Trinity Sunday Jesus takes the wisdom approach with his disciples: "I have much more to tell you, but you cannot bear it now." He knows they haven't the capacity to receive a fuller explanation of his identity and mission. That's why Jesus sends his Spirit — to "guide you to all truth."

The mystery of the Trinity, of the inner life of Father, Son and Holy Spirit celebrated this Sunday, is at the heart of that truth to which we are led over time. But even the church's understanding of this mystery wasn't clearly expressed until almost 300 years of controversy and reflection and dialogue and prayer had taken place.

The challenging news is that we are called to embrace truths and mysteries utterly beyond our capacity to comprehend. The good news is that we have the patient testimony of the Spirit to lead us deeper and deeper into their truth.

Questions:
What is one area of truth which you have come to understand more deeply over time? Through whom has the Spirit helped you grasp more fully the mystery of God's presence in the world?

CHARLOTTE —Helen Harris (Kate Hudson) has it all — she's moving up the ladder at the model agency where she works for fashionista Dominique (Helen Mirren), she lives in a stylish one-bedroom apartment in Manhattan and she dates male models.

On top of that, she has five adoring nieces and nephews, who live just close enough — two taxi rides and a train ride away — to not interfere with her swinging single lifestyle.

But her perfect world crumbles when her oldest sister, Lindsay (Felicity Huffman) and Lindsay's husband, Paul (Sean O'Bryan), die in a car accident.

After the funeral, Helen hides in the closet, comforting Lindsay's kids, Audrey (Hayden Panettiere), Henry and Sarah (played by real-life siblings Spencer and Abigail Breslin), while pregnant middle sister Jenny (Joan Cusack) makes sure there are enough three-ply blue dinner napkins for the guests.

It's obvious Jenny will be the logical choice to raise the Davis children, so it comes as a shock to both sisters when the estate lawyers inform them Lindsay and Paul have chosen Helen as guardian.

Suddenly, Helen's perfect, easy-going lifestyle is turned upside down. She and the kids move into the only apartment she can afford — in Queens. She enrolls them in a Lutheran school by pretending to be followers of the faith. Pastor Dan Parker (John Corbett), the school's principal, informs her that, like most religious schools, the school enrolls non-Lutherans.

Helen finds herself on the outs again when her child-phobic boss, Dominique, fires her for bringing the children to a fashion show, then ruining a photo shoot when Sarah's kindergarten class gives the model a makeover — using permanent markers. Unable to get a job at another modeling agency, a neighbor helps Helen find work as a receptionist at a used-car dealership.

Attracted to the lively blond, Pastor Dan sets off to woo Helen. One of the film's funniest moments happens when he asks her out on a date and Helen exclaims, "I've made you break your vow!" Set straight again, Helen nevertheless rebukes the handsome pastor's advances — for the time being.

"Raising Helen" does an excellent job interspersing the serious with the fun, as Helen and the kids adjust to their new lives while mourning the loss of Lindsay and Paul.

A particularly poignant moment comes when Henry admits that he no longer plays basketball because he doesn't think it's fair that he should be having fun when his parents are in heaven. Helen explains that his parents would want him to do the things he loves, and that doing so honors their memory.

All seems to be going smoothly for a while, until Helen and Jenny catch 15-year-old Audrey at a motel on prom night.

Convinced she is not cut out for motherhood, Helen relinquishes guardianship to Jenny and goes back to her old lifestyle. She soon discovers that dancing all night no longer fulfills her and she retrieves the children, ready to leave behind the fun-loving aunt she once was for the tough but loving mom Audrey, Henry and Sarah need her to be.

"Raising Helen" showcases how effective parenting is executed with equal parts discipline and love, and how experienced parents can help guide the novices through the demanding job of parenting in the 21st century.

Because of brief, mild sexual innuendo, implied underage drinking and a few instances of crass language, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification of "Raising Helen" is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

"THE DAY AFTER TOMORROW"

Visually spectacular doomsday drama about a scientist (Dennis Quaid) trying to reunite with his son (Jake Gyllenhaal) during a worldwide environmental catastrophe triggered by global warning which, in addition to unleashing monstrous hurricanes, killer tornadoes and biblical-proportion floods, threatens to rapidly plunge Earth into a new ice age.

The film is brimming with eye-popping special-effects sequences; director Roland Emmerich plays fast and loose with scientific facts to craft a high-concept rollercoaster ride full of escapist thrills but without much of a story beyond its nature-gone-mad premise.

Intense scenes of natural disasters. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

"SAVED!"

Tart teen comedy about a senior (Jena Malone) at an evangelical high school, who, after her boyfriend (Chad Faust) tells her that he thinks he is gay, sleeps with him in an attempt to "cure" him and winds up getting pregnant, sending her into a spiritual tailspin and putting her at odds with her sanctimonious best friend (Mandy Moore).

Directed by Brian Dannelly, the film uses satire to offer a scalding critique of hypocrisy and puffed-up piety, but its wall-to-wall bashing of conservative Christians, which at times stoops to irreverent lows, displays the same sort of insensitivity which the movie purportedly decries.

Religious stereotypes, an implied teen sexual encounter, homosexual references, recurring rough and crude language, profanity and several sacrilegious jokes. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is L — limited adult audience, films whose problematic content many adults would find troubling. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Bishops call for alternatives to imprisonment

Previous statements have dealt with juvenile justice, the privatization of the prison industry and an overview of criminal justice problems in the South.

The newest statement said the current criminal justice system "is based on retribution — those who cause suffering by committing crime are to be punished by the government for what they have done wrong."

But many people, including crime victims, think that system simply is not working, the bishops said. One option is to allow the legal system to consider restorative justice programs.

Unlike the criminal justice system, "restorative justice focuses first on the victim and the community harmed by the crime," it explained.

"This shift in focus affirms the hurt and loss of the victim, as well as the harm and fear of the community, and insists that offenders come to grips with the consequences of their actions," the bishops' statement said.

Such approaches are not "soft on crime," because offenders are brought to face their victims and communities — and in a way that "offers victims a much greater sense of peace and accountability. Offenders who are willing to face the human consequences of their actions are more ready to accept responsibility, make reparations and rebuild their lives."

Not all victims or all perpetrators are ready for a restorative justice approach, the bishops said. The idea is not to replace the current court system, but to offer, for example, programs such as mediated victim-offender community conferences.

In such conferences, victims and offenders seek reconciliation and resolution. If the parties are unwilling or unable to reach a resolution, the case goes back to regular criminal court.

In some communities, victims, representatives of the community and law enforcement officers meet with an offender, the statement explained. The programs require that the harm to the victim and the community be repaired somehow, that the offender demonstrate understanding of how his or her behavior harmed the community, and that a plan be drafted for the criminal to avoid such behavior in the future.

A goal of restorative justice is to find an alternative to putting so many people in jail. "We have a higher percentage of our people in prison than any country in the world," noted the statement.

The bishops said while they recognize a role for prisons and that sometimes offenders must be imprisoned to protect society, such incarceration "should be about more than punishment."

"Our society seems to prefer punishment to rehabilitation, and retribution to restoration, thereby indicating a failure to recognize prisoners as human beings," it said. "A Catholic approach never gives up on those who violate laws. We believe that both victims and offenders are children of God."

Prisons should be places where offenders are challenged, encouraged and rewarded for efforts to change their behaviors and attitudes, it said.

"Programs in jails and prisons that offer offenders education, life skills, religious expression and recovery from substance abuse greatly reduce recidivism, benefit society and help the offenders when they reintegrate into the community," the bishops' statement continued.

GLENMARY FATHER JOHN S. RAUSCH

Several years ago, I received a call from a group of workers in an industrial laundry in eastern Kentucky. The 65 workers had voted for union representation 10 months earlier, but negotiations had stalled in securing a first contract. The union wanted some church people to listen to the workers because it recognized the Catholic teachings on workers' rights.

The plant launders bed linens and uniforms from hospitals and nursing homes, plus fire-retardant garments from heavy industry. Started as a family business, it was sold years before to a national firm. The family atmosphere of the early days changed to more standard and impersonal work rules.

The testimonies at the hearing ranged from wages to work conditions. One worker after more than 40 years at the laundry still made only $6.25 an hour, a wage that kept a family of three in poverty. Another worker testified that when summer temperatures outside reached 90 degrees, she recorded a 118-degree temperature at her workstation in the plant.

Other workers complained of rigid work rules, crowded conditions and unclean bathrooms. After two hours of roundtable discussion, I puzzled over my next step.

Labor laws currently favor the employer. Nationally, one-third of the workplaces that unionize never negotiate a first contract, and one-fourth more never get a second contract. The law requires employers to bargain in good faith, which essentially means meeting on a regular basis. The only correction for bargaining in bad faith — however defined — is a flimsy order to bargain in good faith. No fines, no penalties, no punitive damages.

As a sympathetic listener, I had no legal power. But, as a person of faith, I could use moral suasion. I discovered that the owner of the laundry business was a devout Catholic living in New York, so I wrote a letter outlining the social teachings of the church, emphasizing the dignity of every worker and the right to a just wage.

Next, I contacted his bishop and asked him to hand deliver the letter, which he did — on the golf course.

Ten days later, the negotiating team came to the meeting, letter in hand, and negotiated a contract giving everyone a $1-an-hour raise.

The hearing that I and the other church representatives convened, instinctively, at the industrial laundry reflects a major program of Jobs with Justice (JwJ), a community organization dedicated to improving workers' standard of living. JwJ organizes Workers' Rights Boards composed of community and religious leaders, academics, elected officials and other prominent members of the community to review workers' complaints.

With no legal authority, yet with great moral authority coming from upright community members, these boards invite employers to the public hearings, then seek follow-up meetings with management to discuss the findings. If talking and mediation prove ineffective, the Workers' Rights Boards may pursue publicity through letter writing to customers, newspapers and stockholders, or more direct action through picketing and demonstrations.

These boards are operating in 20 cities and have helped janitors and factory workers, food service folks and immigrant laborers affirm their dignity in labor struggles.

Maintaining a vibrant middle class depends on protecting and advancing workers' rights. Unfortunately, anti-union sentiment appears pervasive and the right to organize must fight an increasingly hostile legal system. Union busting represents a $500 million industry that plays the system to ensure property rights over human rights.

Workers' Rights Boards offer communities a way to affirm justice until labor laws are reformed. No workplace is off limits or a "none-of-your-business" situation. Developing a just society demands involvement, and fairness needs community support.

Pope says even in times of trial Christians must praise God

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY — Even in times of trial, Christians must continue giving praise to God, whose victory over sin and evil already has been won, Pope John Paul II said.

Praise fills the hearts of "those who await in hope the coming of the Lord to fill with light human history, so often immersed in the darkness of sin, injustice, lies and violence," the pope said May 26 at his weekly general audience.

Under a cloudless blue sky, Pope John Paul continued his series of audience talks about the psalms and canticles used in the church's evening prayer, focusing on a hymn about God's justice from the Book of Revelation.

The pope described the last book of the Christian Bible as a "book of struggle and of hope."

Revelation's hymn to "the Lord God almighty" underscores the "just and resolute judgment" of God, the pope said.

As the hymn emphasizes, he said, God's justice and judgment do not rely on condemnation alone.

"Yes, he is the judge, but he is also the savior; he condemns evil, but he rewards fidelity; he is justice, but most of all he is love," the pope said.

While the Book of Revelation takes seriously the figure of Satan and his attacks on the faith of believers, it also makes clear that the victory already has been won by the death and resurrection of Christ, the pope said.

"May the victory of the Lamb-Messiah over sin and evil be a source for our joy as well and an encouragement to persevere amid the trials that mark our earthy existence," he said.

At the end of the audience, a delegation from St. John's University in Collegeville, Minn., presented Pope John Paul with a copy of the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles from The Saint John's Bible.

The Bible, a work in progress, is being written and illuminated by a team of calligraphers under the artistic direction of Donald Jackson, a master calligrapher.

The New Testament facsimile was presented to the pope by Jackson and his wife, Mabel; Benedictine Abbot John Klassen of St. John's Abbey; and Benedictine Brother Dietrich Reinhart, president of the university.

The university said theirs is the first handwritten and illuminated Bible to be produced since the early 1500s. The calligraphers and artists are writing on vellum, using quills, natural handmade inks and hand-ground pigments and gold leaf.

When group members gave the pope his copy of the Gospels and Acts, they held it open to a full-page painting of Jesus with the words "And the word became flesh" written in gold and platinum. The painting faces the first page of the Gospel of St. John, the source of the quote.

Jackson said he chose that page "because it is the beginning, it's big and it's quite dramatic."

Abbot Klassen said when the pope saw it "his eyes lit up."

While the abbot explained the project to the pope, Jackson remained silent.

"I let the book speak," he said later.

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

Browsing through some Christo-her files from a while back, I came pon a wonderful story based on a Buddhist koan. A koan is a paradox sed for meditation and to gain en-ightenment. This tale is about happi-ess — and about attitude.

There were two Buddhist monks, ne somber and one joyful. The first nonk prayed all day in deep, motion-ess silence. The second sang and lanced his praise of God near a great ree in the monastery garden.

One day an angel appeared to the irst monk, saying, "I have come from God and you have been given per-nission to ask him one question. What is your question?"

The somber monk quickly asked, 'How many more lives must I live before I will attain self-realization?"

The angel then went to the second nonk and gave him exactly the same nessage. And the second monk asked he angel exactly the same question.

A week later, the angel returned o the first monk and said, "I have your answer. You must live three nore lives before you will attain self-realization." The first monk started to weep and moan, "Three more lives. Oh no! Three more lives."

The angel went to the second monk and said, "I have your answer. You must live as many more lives as there are leaves on that tree before you will attain self-realization."

The second monk looked up at the tree and said, "Why there must be 10,000 leaves on that tree! Only 10,000 more lives!" And he began to sing and dance joyfully.

Suddenly, a voice spoke from heaven, saying, "My son, this day you have attained self-realization."

They say it can take years to get all the wisdom from a koan. But it's certainly obvious that while attitude may not be everything, it can be pretty close.

How many people do you know who go though life always seeing a glass that's half empty? What are their lives like? I'll bet they are the negative, critical, pessimistic folks that you go out of your way to avoid.

On the other hand, there are the "half full" sort of people who exude optimism and positive thinking. These are the men and women we enjoy being around. More importantly, I suspect these are people who enjoy their own company, as well.

Beyond that, while most of us say we want to be happy, too many of us spend more time pursuing the things we think will make us happy rather than simply choosing to be happy wherever and whatever we are. If we decide that such-and-such will make us happy, then how can we possibly be happy without it — whatever "it" may be.

So what's the relationship between attitude and happiness?

A wise man named Abraham Lincoln put it this way: "Most people are about as happy as they make up their minds to be."

Have you made up your mind yet?

Fighting sows seeds

Coming of Age

KASE JOHNSTUN
CNS COLUMNIST

Seeing four fights in four days, I witnessed the lowest common denominator of human behavior.

Waiting to interview someone at a local park, I sat on a bench and relaxed. Mid-spring air streamed through canyon onto the surface of the pond.

A rumble came from the parking lot. A truck pulled up, and out of the back jumped six high school students. I went back to trying to escape the world outside the tree-fenced park.

Another car pulled up and five high school students jumped out. Like a flock of geese averting a dog, the students began flailing around the park until two of them met in the middle and within seconds blows were thrown and red blood stained the green grass.

Startled, I jumped up and walked in a seemingly calm manner to my car to call the police. Taunts flew. Chants from supporters spat from their mouths.

Again, the boys interlocked. One pulled away for a slight second and within that second a punch landed on his nose releasing a crackling sound.

I picked up my cell and began to call when I noticed the fight had ended. Both of the boys were walking and heading back to their cars.

I thought, "Well at least it was a fair fight, one on one, no weapons."

This was my relief? One on one? No weapons?

I hung up the phone because the cops would never make it in time.

Fighting. It's just a way high school kids get out their aggressions, I tried to convince myself. It's harmless. Both boys walked away just a little bloody.

The other three fights were between grown men in public places.

—Finishing my run, I noticed two men on the corner calling each other on, and then the first punch flew.

—At a baseball game, one guy turned to another and said, "'Life,' remember that word before you talk to me again," and they proceeded to bump chests and scream.

—The last happened at the pool in my apartment complex. One man stood at the pool and yelled up to the other, and after half an hour of cursing and taunting, the man at the pool headed up the stairs to confront the man on the balcony, kids standing around and watching, learning from their fathers.

I would be tempted to say that the fight in the park is inconsequential because no one really got hurt, but I am guessing those same grown men spent some time with their friends in the park when they were young.

Sacramentally confessing a crime

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. I'm a recent convert to Catholicism, but am stymied by one aspect of the sacrament of reconciliation. A priest, explaining the procedure on television, said he once had to refuse absolution because the penitent wouldn't promise to "come clean" with the law about a crime he committed.

Though I haven't committed any crime, I'd still like to know whether a priest in confession can require, as a condition of absolution, a promise that some incriminating action must be taken by a penitent who has gotten himself into a jam. Could I have misunderstood? (Pennsylvania)

A. Normally, a person who has committed a sin that is also a crime punishable by law is not required to confess that crime to civil authorities to obtain absolution. If the usual requirements for sacramental absolution (sincere contrition and firm purpose to avoid sin in the future) are present, absolution should be given.

If the priest has good reason to do so, he might suggest that the penitent "come clean" as you say, but that would not be required. Processes of discovery and prosecution of the offender are left in the hands of the proper civil authorities.

The situation changes drastically, however, if someone else, an innocent person, is being punished for the crime. One condition for genuine contrition in the sacrament is that the penitent is not planning, or is not in the process of doing, something that is in fact another serious sin.

Let's suppose a person commits a crime, the sentence for which is a long prison term. If another innocent person is charged with the crime and sentenced to prison, the real offender would be seriously obliged to confess to the appropriate authorities or in some other way save the innocent person from suffering for the crime he himself committed.

Not to do so, to simply walk away and ignore the terrible injustice to someone else, would be a serious sin against charity.

If such an offender goes to confession and deliberately intends to allow another person to suffer imprisonment for the sin he himself committed, he has by his own admission the intention to remain in mortal sin, a sin against the virtue of charity. A priest would be correct to withhold absolution until that intention changes.

All this and possibly other circumstances of the case must, of course, be weighed by both the priest and the penitent carefully, honestly and compassionately at the time of the celebration of the sacrament.

Perhaps this is the kind of confessional experience the priest you heard was referring to.

Definition of basilica

Q. What is a basilica? Is a church built as such or is it designated a basilica later? (Wisconsin)

A. A basilica (the word comes from Greek for a royal hall) is simply a church that has been so designated because of its historical, liturgical or cultural significance. A variety of spiritual privileges (indulgences, special blessings, etc.) are granted to pilgrims and other visitors to basilica churches.

Some ancient governmental Roman structures were built in a distinctive "basilica" style, which has since been adopted in many Christian churches.

The exact status of many basilicas is confusing, but among what are called "major" basilicas are St. Peter's, St. Paul's on the Ostian Way, St. Mary Major and St. John Lateran, all in Rome; and the church of St. Francis in Assisi, where St. Francis is buried.

Popes have named hundreds of "minor" basilicas around the world, approximately 45 of them in the United States. The most noted, the Basilica of the Immaculate Conception in Washington, the largest Catholic church in North and South America, was designated a basilica by Pope John Paul II in 1990.

Christ the King Church has ministered to the needs of Catholics in High Point since its founding by the Franciscan Friars of the Atonement in 1940.

HIGH POINT — Christ the King Church was founded in 1940 to serve the African-American Catholics in High Point, and has since become a multi-ethnic parish celebrating both the diversity and unity of the Catholic faith and tradition.

Then-Bishop Eugene F. McGuinness of Raleigh invited the Franciscan Friars of the Atonement of Graymoor, N.Y., to staff the new church in High Point in 1940. Father Bernardine Watson served as the first pastor, originally celebrating Mass in a funeral home.

Through the generosity and perseverance of Father Watson and several benefactors, a clothing shop was acquired for use by the church. While Mass continued to be celebrated there during much of 1941, the parishioners turned their attention to building a new church and rectory on Kivett Drive.

The new colonial-style church was dedicated by Bishop McGuinness Dec. 14, 1941.

During the 1940s and into the '50s, the Christ the King parish community continued to grow. A school building and convent were built in 1949, and in 1950 the Franciscan Handmaids arrived from New York City to staff the school. The African-American communities, both Catholic and non-Catholic, of High Point, Thomasville and Greensboro were served by the new Christ the King School, which opened its doors to 50 students in September 1950.

The friars continued their pastorate in High Point for the next several decades, cultivating a faith community that became continually more culturally diverse over time. A stained-glass window behind the church's choir loft depicts that diversity, with Jesus surrounded by four individuals representing the African, Asian, European and Indian bloodlines that make up much of the parish community today.

Lowering enrollment, financial difficulties and the recalling of the sisters to New York forced Christ the King School to close in 1981. The diocesan office of education converted the school for use as a day care center, which began its operation in August 1981.

Upon the friars' leaving High Point in 1991, Christ the King Church became a diocesan parish in December of that year. Fathers Martin Madison and John Hoover served the parish until December 1994 when Father Philip Kollithanath, present pastor, was appointed to Christ the King Church.

In 2000, 10 members of the Congregation of Sisters of Charity of St. Vincent de Paul arrived at Christ the King Church to conduct the religious education program and other ministerial work, including operating the day care center. DePaul Academy serves as a multicultural preschool and after-school for the local community, particularly Hispanics.

In January 2004, Bishop Peter J. Jugis dedicated a new gymnasium to serve as a multicultural center and host activities for children and youth programs which are funded by a variety of local foundations.

Assisting in the advancing growth of the Christ the King community have been many commissions and ministries focusing on the spiritual, educational, multicultural and evangelical dimensions of the parish.

Parishioners gather to engage in Bible study, to learn English as a Second Language, to put their faith into action in the local community and to celebrate their ethnicity. A bilingual religious education program provides sharing and learning opportunities for English- and Spanish-speaking parishioners, and the parish African-American Ministry offers outreach programs benefiting the local region.

The Women's Guild, Altar Guild, 55+ Club and Young & Spirited Group are active in parish and community services, and the evangelization commission provides for the spiritual needs of homebound parishioners through its Visitation Ministry.

The community of Christ the King Church looks ahead to expansion and renovation projects that will accommodate the needs of a growing parish. More than 450 families currently make up the parish community.

SPELLING SUCCESS

David Scott Tidmarsh of South Bend, Ind., expresses relief before winning the 77th annual Scripps National Spelling Bee contest in Washington June 3. The 14-year-old won in the 15th round of the contest by correctly spelling the word "autochthonous," which means indigenous.

Spelling bee champ says he was nervous but likes spotlight

SOUTH BEND, Ind. (CNS) — Be forewarned, future young spellers of the United States, that David Scott Tidmarsh, the 2004 national spelling bee champion, may bequeath his talents to younger brother Kevin.

Besides admitting he probably will pass on his word lists to his sibling, Tidmarsh, 14, said June 7 he is enjoying his time in the spotlight following his besting 264 other spellers June 3 at the 77th annual Scripps National Spelling Bee in Washington.

He spelled 39 words correctly and won the competition with the word "autochthonous," meaning indigenous.

"The place just exploded" with enthusiasm, he said in an interview with Today's Catholic, newspaper of the Fort Wayne-South Bend Diocese.

He came home, he thinks, with $18,000 and plaques, one for him and another for his school, Edison Intermediate Center, a South Bend public school.

Among his strong supporters was English teacher and spelling bee coach Brian Ginzer, who said he was so nervous he had to stay home to watch the nationally televised competition.

To be a good speller, Ginzer said, "a person has to be an avid reader. David reads and reads and reads. I gave him 'Dracula' at the beginning of the year; it was a difficult read ... but he pummeled through it.

"He did read the dictionary. He has a photographic memory and can commit it to memory. He not only sees the word but also its pronunciation and origin and part of speech and definition," he said.

Since the third grade, he said, Tidmarsh has shown he is a "raw talent and continued to improve."

Tidmarsh, whose parents and three siblings belong to Little Flower Church in South Bend, said besides really liking to read, he also enjoys "playing board games, chess, checkers, Monopoly, things like that."

"And I like sports, like soccer and baseball, and I like to swim. I play the piano," he said, with a little laugh, and although he began seven years ago, "I'm not very good at it."

He isn't sure who or what triggered his interest in spelling.

"It's just something I always liked to do. When I had spelling bees in elementary school, I thought it would be fun," he said.

With no more spelling bees ahead for him, he thinks he might get more involved at his parish. Until now, "I just haven't had time to do more," he said.

Bush cites Catholic programs as examples of faith-based success

WASHINGTON (CNS) — President George W. Bush recognized Migration and Refugee Services of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops as an example of faith-based initiatives that work.

Speaking at a White House conference on faith-based and community initiatives June 1, Bush cited the cases of two refugees whose resettlement in the United States has been handled through Catholic agencies as examples of people whose lives have been changed through their association with faith-based organizations.

Operating on a contract basis for the federal government, the Catholic Church has for decades resettled more refugees in the United States than any other entity.

Like people with addictions or children with parents in prison, refugees are among those who benefit from social service programs run by people whose motivation comes from religious faith, Bush said.

"That's what the faith-based and community initiative is all about," Bush said.

The Bush administration's faith-based initiatives have included creating centers in federal agencies to assist small community and religious organizations provide social services through federal government programs. It also has focused on eliminating administrative barriers that previously might have kept faith-based organizations from participating in federal programs.

"I fully understand it's important to maintain the separation of church and state. ... But I do believe that groups should be allowed to access social service grants so long as they don't proselytize or exclude somebody simply because they don't share a certain faith," Bush said.

Bush said there is a way to accomplish the separation of church and state "and at the same time, accomplish the social objective of having America become a hopeful place and a loving place," which he said faith-based institutions are better equipped to do than government acting on its own.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican official: Arms spending robs citizens of basic needs

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Arms spending robs citizens of their basic needs, said the Vatican's secretary of state.

Bringing a dignified standard of living to all people would do more in guaranteeing greater stability and peace than the latest weaponry, Cardinal Angelo Sodano said to members of the Organization of American States, who held their general assembly June 6-8 in Quito, Ecuador.

"Even today, so much wealth continues to be wasted on procuring ever more sophisticated instruments of war while that which is necessary for full human development is lacking," Cardinal Sodano said.

The cardinal noted that the OAS' commission on security in the Americas defined peace as being based on "democracy, justice, respect of human rights, solidarity, security and respect for international law."

These foundations of peace are based upon the fundamental right to life that cannot be fully realized in conditions where there is a lack of food, housing, education, health care, work and freedom, he said.

"In order to guarantee these conditions, huge economic resources are needed, but they unfortunately are often lacking," Cardinal Sodano said.

Cardinal Sodano urged donor countries and financial institutions to "make a generous effort" in offering help to those countries in dire economic straits or in need of financing for development projects.

"A donation made today may result in substantial savings tomorrow and help contribute toward peace and security," he said.

Pope urges U.S. bishops to counter acceptance of abortion, gay unions

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II urged U.S. bishops to counter "erroneous yet pervasive thinking" that has paved the way for acceptance of social evils like abortion, pornography and homosexual unions.

The pope said that over the last 40 years in the United States, human rights have become detached from the search for truth and have sometimes turned into "self-centered demands."

The pope made his critique June 4 to bishops from Arizona, Colorado, New Mexico, Utah and Wyoming who were making their "ad limina" visits to the Vatican.

The theme of the pope's speech was "evangelization of culture," which he said touched upon the fundamental dynamic of the church's activity, enabling people of every culture to be transformed by the power of the Gospel.

But he said this essential task is challenged today by a loss of transcendent values and goals. He cited a "growing reluctance to acknowledge that all men and women receive their essential and common dignity from God and with it the capacity to move toward truth and goodness."

"Detached from this vision of the fundamental unity and purpose of the whole human family, rights are at times reduced to self-centered demands: the growth of prostitution and pornography in the name of adult choice, the acceptance of abortion in the name of women's rights, the approval of same-sex unions in the name of homosexual rights," he said.

This is a sign that "false secularist forms of humanism" can turn into a "veritable idolatry" in the modern age, the pope said.

In the face of such a mistaken approach, he said, bishops should "do everything possible" to encourage lay Catholics to take seriously their responsibility for evangelizing culture, and to teach that human dignity is tied to creation by God and redemption by Christ.

"So again I say to the people of the United States, it is the paschal mystery of Christ that is the only sure point of reference for all of humanity on its pilgrimage in search of authentic unity and true peace," he said.

HELP FOR HAITI

St. Matthew Church donates 20 tons of food, supplies to Caribbean nation

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — As the pallets were loaded into the truck, weeks of hard work were finally coming to a close.

"We had such a great turnout from the parish," said Joe George. "We hope it will turn into an annual event."

George coordinated the five-week food drive during which parishioners of St. Matthew Church amassed 20 tons of food and supplies for the people of Haiti.

The pallets were loaded June 9 onto a truck bound for Fort Lauderdale, Fla. From there, they will venture via cargo ship to the Cape Haitian mission of the Missionaries of the Poor, an order of Catholic priests and brothers who care for the homeless and destitute.

Cape Haitian, home to about 1.8 million people, is in the heart of a ghetto surrounded by often-impassable mountains. The Missionaries of the Poor will use the food and supplies in their mission and to help feed hungry residents.

Haiti, a Caribbean nation where 85 percent of the residents are illiterate, has long been a country of crisis.

A drought last year was followed by flash floods in December. In February of this year, a violent insurgency by rebels forced out the country's first freely elected president, Jean-Bertrand Aristide, leaving the country in shambles.

May brought several days of heavy rain, resulting in floods that have killed more than 1,000 people and left more than 50,000 homeless and hungry.

In Baltimore, Catholic Relief Services, the U.S. bishops' international relief and development agency, announced it would provide emergency funds to assist flooded communities in Haiti and the Dominican Republic.

A youth does his part to help pack items for the St. Matthew Church's food drive for Haiti.

The people of St. Matthew wanted to do their part to help, too.

"It emanated from an ongoing relationship with the Missionaries of the Poor," said George.

The parish has been involved with the Missionaries of the Poor in Kingston, Jamaica since February 1998. In October 2002, a group from the parish visited Haiti.

"As a result of that trip, we decided we needed to do something to help out and collect food," said George.

Parishioners of St. Matthew Church in Charlotte sort items for the church's food drive for Haiti. The parish collected 20 tons of food and supplies.

Last year, the parish collected and donated 10 pallets of food and supplies for the Haitian mission. Haiti's recent troubles in the news helped this years food drive double that amount.

A banner was hung outside of the church; flyers were distributed calling for needed items, including white rice, cornmeal, dry pinto beans and pasta, flour, powdered milk, peanut butter and tuna.

"It's a neat project because people could help on different levels," said Sandy Farrelly, head of the parish mission board.

Parish priests spoke of the food drive from the pulpit. Volunteers attended weekend Masses to hand out empty banana boxes and lists of where to purchase needed items. Some parishioners went shopping, others did packing. St. Matthew School students brought in food, and many wrote and drew cards of love and support for the Haitians.

The result was 40,000 pounds of aid lining the church's gymnasium for people the majority of the 5,000-household parish had never met.

"The response was so enthusiastic," said Farrelly. "What impressed me the most was the spirit the people had — they were so excited to help out."

The response was an example of Catholics living out their faith, said George.

"It was rewarding and encouraging to see all the people getting involved," he said.

And the students who participated learned the importance of helping others in need, said George.

"That will benefit them later on, and the people of Haiti benefited from their efforts," he said.

The shipment of food will last about three to four months, said George. St. Matthew Church has partnered with Catholic churches in New Jersey and Georgia to rotate drives and keep food going to Haiti on a regular basis.

"I think it was a very nice way to do something," said parishioner Beth Pannenberg, who delivered food for the drive June 3. "It was a very worthy cause."

Bishop Peter J. Jugis exchanges confidences with 2-year-old Vanessa Games during Immaculate Conception Church's 50th anniversary celebration June 6.

Immaculate Conception Church celebrates 50 years

was purchased and Immaculate Conception Church became a reality. The first Mass was celebrated in June 1954.

"Bishop (Vincent S.) Waters was here," Bonarrigo said. "It was a very moving experience. We finally had a church. It was a great thing to drive past the church and say 'That's our church.'"

For the church's 50th anniversary celebration, held June 6, Bishop Peter J. Jugis was principal celebrant. Since Immaculate Conception seats only about 80 people, the Mass was held in the Colonial Theater in downtown Canton. Some 200 people nearly filled the theater's main seating space; a few more watched from the balcony.

An embroidered white cloth covered the folding table that served as an altar on the theater stage decorated with palms in woven baskets. At the rear of the stage, Immaculate Conception Church's combined Anglo and Hispanic choirs sang, the congregation joining in.

"On this solemn feast of the Holy Trinity, we give thanks for this Catholic presence in the mountains," Bishop Jugis said in his homily.

He emphasized that, "The source of our unity is the Eucharist. Regardless of our country of origin or the first language we speak, when we partake of the Eucharist, we become one body in Christ."

Concelebrating were Augustinian Father Dennis McGowan, pastor of Immaculate Conception Church and of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville; retired Father James Cahill, former pastor of St. Mary Church in Sylva; and Father C. Morris Boyd, administrator of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Jefferson and St. Frances of Rome Church in Sparta.

Before going on a Spanish-immersion sabbatical in Mexico in 2002-2003, Father Boyd, then pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin, drove to Canton every Sunday for a year to celebrate Hispanic Mass at Immaculate Conception Church.

Father McGowan celebrates the English-language Mass each Sunday morning for the parish's 33 Anglo families. On Sunday evenings, Father Shawn O'Neal, administrator of St. Joseph Church in Bryson City and Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Cherokee, celebrates Hispanic Mass about once a month, often with 100 or more Hispanic worshipers. The crowd is smaller when a communion service is offered rather than Mass.

June 6 was the parish's second Mass that Anglos and Hispanics attended together.

Following Mass, the Immaculate Conception Dancers performed on the theater stage. Then six of the church's original parishioners were recognized: Bonarrigo, Mildred Pharr, Lucille and Steve Czarnicke, and Edna and Morris Kelley.

Bishop Jugis commended the fortitude that brought people to the mountains in the past and still brings them there today.

"How blessed you are to have founding parishioners still with you," he said. "As the current bishop of Charlotte, I want to thank you for your pioneer spirit .... I think it's a good sign, that the parish is growing so much that you could not even have the celebration in the church."

Three priests ordained

bishop ordained the men to the transitional diaconate at St. Vincent de Paul Church Dec. 21, 2003.

During his homily, the bishop encouraged the priestly candidates to use their ministry to tell the people the truth of Christ.

"St. Peter reminds us that Christ made all his people a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people set apart," said Bishop Jugis in his homily. "Yet our Lord decided to establish a priestly office in his church, and to do this he chose certain men, Apostles, so that he could continue visibly to exercise his office of teacher, priest and shepherd in the church."

The bishop said that through the sacrament of holy orders, the new priests will be "configured to Christ through a sacramental identification with the Eternal High Priest."

Teaching, sanctifying and shepherding in the name of Christ are sacred duties, said Bishop Jugis.

"By your ministry, the spiritual sacrifices of the Christ's people will be made perfect, as they are united to the sacrifice of Christ which you will offer," he said.

"May the holiness of the sacrifices you celebrate consecrate you interiorly so that you can put to death whatever is not of Christ, and the life of the risen Christ may shine in you," he said.

The bishop told the new priests that Christ's people would look to them for direction.

"Strive to bring Christ's people together into one family in unity, and lead them together to God the Father," said Bishop Jugis. "Through your living ministry of this holy gift of priesthood, which you receive today, may God make you true pastors who nourish the faithful with the world of life and with the body of Christ, the bread of everlasting life."

Concelebrants of the Mass included Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and diocesan chancellor; Father Philip Scarcella, administrator of Our Lady of the Assumption Church; Father John Allen, diocesan vocations director; and other priests serving in the Diocese of Charlotte. In attendance was Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin.

During the rite of ordination, the candidates made their promises to fulfill the office of priesthood. Kneeling, each man placed his hands between Bishop Jugis' hands in a promise of obedience to the bishop and his successors.

The congregation was invited to join in prayer for the candidates, the church and its people as the candidates lay prostrate before the altar.

During the rite's most solemn moment, the candidates knelt in silence before Bishop Jugis, who laid his hands on their heads. The celebration of the sacrament of holy orders was completed as the bishop extended his hands over the kneeling candidates and prayed the prayer of consecration.

Each new priest was vested with a stole and a chasuble — outer garments of the priestly office. The bishop anointed their hands with sacred chrism and each was then presented with a chalice and paten signifying his role as celebrant of the Eucharist.

The newly ordained Father Conway, Father Reid and Father Starczewski then joined their brother priests to concelebrate the Mass, thus opening new chapters in their lives.

"They each bring unique gifts and very generous hearts to the service of God's people," said Father Allen. "I'm sure their diverse gifts and professional backgrounds will equip them to be very effective priests."

The road to the priesthood is marked by a series of milestones: lector, acolyte, candidacy, transitional deacon and priestly ordination.

"Now the real journey begins," said Father Reid.

Father Reid was employed in the Office of Migration and Refugee Services of the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops in Washington, D.C. prior to his acceptance as a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"I hope to be an instrument of God's mercy," said Father Reid, "to love people as Christ loved them and to help sanctify them."

"It's the fulfillment of a dream that I've always had to serve God's people," said Father Conway. "Through the grace of God, I'll be worthy to serve them."

Widowed in 1988, Father Conway worked as a corporate accountant in New Jersey before entering the seminary.

"He's going to be a priest of the people," said Msgr. James J. McGovern, pastor of Our Lady of Good Counsel in Morristown, N.J., and Father Conway's former pastor. "He's really extends his heart to people."

"It's a wonderful power of God that he can take any one of us and use us for his will," said Father Starczewski.

A native of Utica, N.Y., Father Starczewski worked for several years in manufacturing research and development in western North Carolina before entering the seminary.

"I would like to do what all good clergy are called to do — to bring the compassion of Christ to all people," he said.

St. Leo students celebrate graduations

WINSTON-SALEM — Students at St. Leo the Great School are celebrating big changes in their lives.

The eighth-graders bid a fond farewell to the school at their graduation ceremony June 1.

The students were treated to memories of distinguished alumna Karen Wiggins Jacobsen, a 1984 graduate. Jacobsen said that, while the school's appearance may have been changed and expanded over the years, its core is still built upon a strong Catholic foundation.

Several academic awards were presented during the ceremony. Sister of St. Joseph Dennis Eileen Gamber, minister to the sick at St. Leo the Great Church, presented a $1,000 scholarship award to Casey Moore that will go toward her first year's tuition at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville.

Sister Dennis Eileen said that in her mind the award stands for the "three Cs" — consideration, courtesy, and cooperation.

The graduates made two presentations. The first was a class gift to the school of a new cross for the front entrance and restored lettering of "St. Leo School." Second, as a sign of their love and gratitude, the students presented their parents with red roses.

Seventh graders saluted the graduates by singing "We're the Future of Tomorrow" and "May the Road Rise to Meet You."

Father Thomas Kessler, pastor o St. Leo the Great Church, blessed th graduates and their families, an wished them well as they begin thei new educational and life journeys.

Father Kessler also bestowed a spe cial blessing upon the kindergarten clas during its graduation ceremony May 2

The students sang a song to th tune of "New York, New York" to sa "goodbye" to kindergarten and "hell to the first-grade.

'G is for Grace'

School unveils anniversary book at ceremony

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

GREENSBORO — Students, faculty and staff at Our Lady of Grace School proclaim, "G is for Grace."

"It was the jubilee year for Our Lady of Grace and we wanted to do something very special to celebrate our 50th birthday, so we decided to write a book," said Shirley Kinlaw, assistant principal.

During the past school year, the student body — with help from faculty and staff — has planned, written, drawn and colored numerous poems, articles and pictures based on the alphabet for the book "G is for Grace — An A to Z Celebration."

An unveiling ceremony of the finished book for the students, faculty, parents and invited guests was held in the school gymnasium May 27. Afterward, Father Francis O'Rourke, pastor of Our Lady of Grace Church, blessed the books.

"The words and work that went into this book bring the alphabet alive while expressing the thread and fabric of the faith," said Father O'Rourke.

According to Kinlaw, all of the school's 415 students, from kindergarten through eighth grade, have had some of their work incorporated into the book, which opens with a poem from Celia McMullen's kindergarten class:

"A is for angels
Who guard you at night.
If you ask them to help
They come with great might."

Each class worked with a different letter of the alphabet — students and teachers collaborated to create a four-line poem based on the assigned letter for each page of the book. Working with church historian Jim Patton and using materials available in the school library, each class developed appropriate historical text for its page that tied its assigned letter into important elements of the school's 50-year history and school life of its students.

With help from artists from ArtQuest, part of the Greenhill Art Gallery in Greensboro, graphics depicting each letter and using different media were created to illustrate the book.

"We had to brainstorm our ideas. We all made (the poems and letters) and put it together. We all drew pictures," said fifth-grader Stephen Marrujo.

"We wrote poems and essays, then put them all together," said sixth-grader Mary Kate Young. "One of the poems went into the book. That's what I liked best."

After receiving a grant to offset some of the production costs, the school contacted Carole Crane, author of alphabet books such as "T is for Tarheel" and "P is for Pilgrim."

Crane held a faculty workshop detailing the "how-tos" of creating an alphabet book, then met with each class to explain to the students what was needed for their projects.

"It was fun because we were one of the only schools to publish a book," said seventh-grader Sandra Merlini.

"It's a good book because it's inspiring," added seventh-grader Tommy King.

Bishop McGuinness holds commencement

Graduates of Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville leave the Stevens Center in Winston-Salem after the commencement ceremony May 29.

cises for Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville took place at the Stevens Center in Winston-Salem May 29.

"Tonight we are on the threshold of our future," said Kimberly Marie Burke, valedictorian. "Four years ago we were little ducks in a big pond. But we rose to every occasion .... This rite of passage has been earned by all those special moments that got us to this point."

"This year's graduation is most notable because this graduation class is the last class that has any connection whatsoever with the old Bishop McGuinness (school)," said Principal George Repass.

The original Bishop McGuinness High School was located in Winston-Salem. The Kernersville school opened in August 2001; the old Bishop McGuinness facility is now used by Our Lady of Mercy elementary school.

The event was also notable, said Repass, becuase the two salutatorians, Kyle Jordan Barbour and Michael Joseph Lee, were separated by 1/10,000th of a point.

"Tonight is a celebration of all of the experiences of our high school years," said Barbour during his salutatory address. "It is a time to look back ... to remember those times we enjoyed with each other ... and everything we did."

"Our decisions have molded us into what we are today," said Lee. "High school is a lot of work and stress, but is also filled with fun and happiness ... to which we must seek a good balance. We have spent four years developing, now we must move on."

The guest speaker at the event was Daniel Morrison, a 1985 graduate and member of Secretary of State Colin Powell's speech writing staff.

"In a world which has changed from my class to yours, you have the privilege of growing up as Americans," said Morrison.

He urged the graduates to write their own stories, their own plots and their own dialogue.

"The story must read like you ... Be original to be successful," he said. "You must walk out (of here) with the obligation to show the difference Bishop McGuinness has made for you."

The graduating class, which earned $1 million in scholarships, was honored during a baccalaureate Mass at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro May 27.

"Watching the baccalaureate Mass with Bishop (Peter J.) Jugis and the many parish priests concelebrating brought forth the real purpose of our schools — our Catholic faith," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools.

"When the seniors presented roses to the mothers or mother-figures in their lives, it was done with the honor that is associated with the Blessed Mother," said Cherry. "Nowhere else at a graduation ceremony this spring would you have experienced this occurring, except at our Catholic high schools."

During the commencement ceremony, graduates were excited yet apprehensive about graduating.

"I'm speechless. It still hasn't hit me yet," said graduate Lauren Michelle Croughan.

"I'm happy and very sad at the same time because I will probably not see my friends again," said graduate Leslie Bowen. "I loved Bishop (McGuinness), especially the relationships that existed between the teachers and the students."

"In the name of the Diocese of Charlotte, I acknowledge the dedication of the faculty, administration and the families for the students at Bishop McGuinness," said Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the diocese. "We congratulate these graduates and leave them our love and support."

Charlotte Catholic graduates celebrate lessons learned in and out of the classroom

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Spring inevitably brings with it warms days, summer vacation and, for many ecstatic teenagers everywhere, the culmination of 12 years of school.

There was no deviation from this schedule as the 228 seniors of Charlotte Catholic High School's class of 2004 proudly walked across the stage of Ovens Auditorium to receive their diplomas June 3.

The Charlotte Catholic Band played the traditional "Pomp and Circumstance," graduates clad in navy robes filled the center section of the auditorium while proud family and friends watched.

The diplomas were conferred by Mgsr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and diocesan chancellor; Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools; and Gerald Healy, principal of Charlotte Catholic High School.

"The diploma I receive tonight will be hung up on a wall somewhere ... but in time, the ink will fade," said Alex Queen, salutatorian. "But the imprints you won't see on it, the lessons you can't learn with your mind but with your heart, those will last me a lifetime and beyond."

Soon these close-knit students will take their first steps into the world beyond high school. In the fall, they will attend universities as diverse as the members of the class of 2004 — including University of Georgia, Appalachian State University, Loyola Marymount University, several of the University of North Carolina campuses and both Miami University (Ohio) and University of Miami (Florida).

Seventy-seven members of Charlotte Catholic's class of 2004 were awarded scholarships totaling more than $4.3 million. Scholarships were bestowed by institutions as prestigious as Vanderbilt University, Catholic University of America and University of North Carolina-Chapel Hill. Four students — valedictorian Michael Florack, Sarah Knish, Stephen Norris and Geoffrey Sholler — were among 8,000 National Merit Scholarship finalists.

"There are so many gifts and talents, so much faith and courage among the seniors," said Mary Jayne Dawson, campus minister.

The commencement exercises for Charlotte Catholic High School reflected the Catholic faith that is taught alongside French, American history and algebra.

"From the baccalaureate Mass with Bishop Jugis to the opening and closing prayers by seniors at the actual graduation, our Catholic faith was evident," said Cherry.

"Watching some little kindnesses at the baccalaureate Mass and graduation ceremony ... assures me that these seniors will carry forth their Christian attitudes and Catholic faith as they go out to the many corners of the world," she said. "I wish them much success and happiness."

"I have been privileged to listen as they shared their stories on retreats and offered so much of their time reaching out among the community," said Dawson. "When help has been needed, they are there without question, without complaint, with enthusiasm and effort."

"I look forward with pride to what this generation, specifically these seniors, will do to help make the world a better place," she said.

In his salutatory address, Queen listed the twelve most important lessons he learned as a student at Charlotte Catholic High School.

Lesson Four, he said, was "Sometimes, it's best to plan ahead in life. Other times, live for the moment."

"You need to work hard to accomplish your goals, but remember to play hard also," he said was Lesson Two.

"Life is much tougher than any course you could ever take. ... There is no set syllabus telling you exactly what you need to do," said Queen. "And you can't take it over again when it's done. Luckily, you have more than one teacher to guide you along the way."

"God didn't give us a world free of fear, pain and suffering, but what he did give us to make these things bearable is each other," said Queen.

Following the closing prayer, the euphoric graduates marched out into the open green space outside the auditorium. After tossing their caps into the air against a soft evening sky, young men and women embraced each other as if for the first time and the last.

Queen's sixth lesson: "It's great to get hugs. It's even better to give them."

SEIZING THE DAY

Pre-K, eighth-graders celebrate graduations at Asheville Catholic School

BY CAROLE McGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — During the school year, Asheville Catholic School's eighth-graders devoted some of their time to the school's pre-kindergarten class as part of the Big Friends/Little Friends program.

The older students acted as mentors, helping with arts and crafts, projects and assignments. After school, they ensured that the pre-K students were safe in the car pickup line. Throughout the year, they forged memories and made friends.

On May 28, the Big Friends/Little Friends shared another memory — both classes held graduation ceremonies.

In the morning, the pre-K students marched to the front of St. Eugene Church for their graduation ceremony. Teacher's assistant Tracey Stage held a picture that each student had drawn as he or she came forward to talk about what each had learned that year. Topics ranged from bugs and dinosaurs to space shuttles and planets.

After singing "You Are My Sunshine," the students presented yellow roses to their parents. Diplomas were awarded, and the students moved the tassels around on their caps. During a reception following the ceremony, eighth-graders gave gifts to their Little Friends.

Later that evening, 20 eighth-graders — many who had been classmates since their own preschool days — marched into the church for their baccalaureate Mass and graduation ceremony.

"Don't ever stop appreciating and giving thanks to God for what he has accomplished in each and every one of you," said Father Francis Cancro, pastor of St. Eugene Church, to the graduates.

Father Cancro, Principal Virginia Hutton and teacher Sue Banks presented class awards and certificates. Honor graduate Caitlin Bradley, who received attendance and first honors awards, delivered a message to her fellow graduates. She encouraged her classmates to believe in themselves and "seize the day," saying each graduate was "like the piece of paper that waits for the poet to write on it."

Like their Little Friends, the eighth-graders presented yellow roses to their parents. The faculty then came forward and placed their hands on the graduates' shoulders as Father Cancro offered a prayer and a blessing for the outgoing class.

Portraying Olympians

To celebrate the upcoming summer Olympics in Athens, Greece, St. Patrick School in Charlotte held an Olympic Field Day on the last day of school, June 4. The event, organized by Candace Mazze, physical education teacher, involved each class picking a country to represent and creating a flag to display for that country on the field. The students also made T-shirts or wore colors of that country.

ONE LAST KISS OF YOUR LIFETIME

"LAST KISS" by Rich Staley

"'Last Kiss' by Richard Staley is the superbly written story of Patrick, an ordinary man who is always busy...perhaps too busy to give one last kiss to one near and dear to him. Yet an extraordinary angel shows him the importance of never taking people for granted in this often chaotic and ever-changing world. 'Last Kiss' is commended as an especially thoughtful, original, and heartwarming novel."

Calligrapher transcribes Psalms into illuminated manuscript

BY JOSEPH YOUNG
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

ST. CLOUD, Minn. — Donald Jackson had a special hand in producing the "Book of Psalms." It's an artistic hand that used a quill and flowing elliptic motions to produce an illuminated manuscript version of the biblical text.

The "Book of Psalms," 150 songs traditionally ascribed to King David, is the third volume to be completed of the Saint John's Bible. Six pages of the 80-page volume were unveiled in late April at the Minneapolis Institute of Arts.

The completion of Psalms marks "the midpoint of this great endeavor," said Benedictine Brother Dietrich Reinhart, president of St. John's University, which commissioned the project in 1998. The illuminated Bible is scheduled to be completed by 2007.

Jackson is artistic director of the Saint John's Bible and a former longtime scribe to Queen Elizabeth's Crown Office at the House of Lords in London. In the field of calligraphy and illumination, Jackson is also regarded as royalty.

Calligraphy is beautiful handwriting. Illumination is decorating a page with gold, silver, copper, platinum and brilliant colors, or with elaborate designs or miniature pictures.

"As the page turns, what is drawn there captures light, delighting the eye," Jackson said. "That's what it means to illuminate."

Jackson is not illuminating and doing calligraphy for all 1,150 or so calfskin pages of the seven volumes. A team of 14 calligraphers and artists is creating this Bible, directed by Jackson from his scriptorium in Monmouth, Wales.

It will be the first handwritten and illuminated Bible since the early 1500s.

Jackson said he created a font with a lighter weight script for the "Book of Psalms" which befits their more poetic and melodic nature compared to the text of the other completed volumes: "Gospels and Acts of the Apostles" and the "Pentateuch," the first five books of the Hebrew Scriptures.

Each volume measures about 16-by-24 inches.

The content of the "Book of Psalms" is not prose, "not even poetry. This is song," Jackson said as he demonstrated calligraphy by making a huge blue cursive "R" on an easel, his arm arcing elliptically like a blade on an eccentric windmill.

"The psalms are so powerful," he said. "In them there is anguish, fear, love, joy, regret that type of thing. Yet, they are contained within the page. It is passion contained."

Jackson, however, finds it difficult to contain his passion for his artistry, a passion fashioned when his aunt, to keep her precocious young nephew occupied, propped him at a table with a pen and bottle of red ink.

Pope John Paul II views illuminated works of art that illustrate The Saint John's Bible May 26.

"I was just a little kid, but I still can feel the joy of dribbling that red wet stuff all over the page," said Jackson, 66.

The bulk of the work of the Saint John's Bible, using the text of the New Revised Standard Version, requires less flourish and more nourishing one's concentration and attention to textual detail.

To hint at how handwritten fonts are fashioned, Jackson drew an "o" on the easel, then drew over it successively, producing an "a," "c" and "g."

"Inside that 'o' live an 'a' and 'c' and 'g'," he said. "People are used to type, they're not used to calligraphy. We're not trying to sell beer on a highway billboard here. People are not going to be driving past this Bible at 70 miles per hour."

St. John's plans to make available trade reproductions of each volume of the Saint John's Bible, as well as limited-edition, full-size facsimiles, fine art prints and a CD-ROM computer version for worldwide distribution.

Undertaking a project that has been his lifelong dream has made a difference in Jackson's life, but in subtle ways.

"Has it made me more spiritual? No. But my spirituality has more of a workout than that of the average guy," said Jackson, who said he goes "to an Anglican church because it's nearby, but I'm not a regular churchgoer."

Jackson admits, however, to being moved by what he renders artistically.

"My soul thirsts for the Lord like a deer thirsts for flowing streams," he said, alluding to Psalm 42. "How can you remain unaffected when you're playing with words like this? You're writing like God with words that are megaphonable, mega-explosive."

The remaining volumes of the Saint John's Bible are "Prophets," scheduled for completion in February 2005; "Wisdom Books and Poetry," scheduled for completion in November 2005; "Historical Books," scheduled for completion in August 2006; and "Letters and the Book of Revelation," scheduled for completion in July 2007.

Then Jesus said to them, "But who do you say that I am?" (Luke 9:20)

At certain ages, it is not uncommon for human beings to take stock of their lives and assess what they are really all about. For many of my friends, it is the "women in their 50s" syndrome: Children are grown (or at least less dependent), parents often have passed away and long-cherished or habitual roles are shifting.

Most of the time a wisdom born of surviving life's challenges enables one to assess what is most important and what is peripheral in the larger scheme of things. When all the roles, accomplishments and possessions are stripped away, one naturally asks, "Who am I really?"

Jesus' disciples are called upon in today's Gospel to answer this question, not about themselves but about their friend and teacher. When Peter finally gets it right, Jesus warns him to remain silent, explaining that much suffering and rejection must occur before his messiahship can be affirmed.

Most of the persons I know who are "finding themselves," in the truest sense, are those who have suffered loss, rejection and heartache. An older gentleman in an adult confirmation class describes the awakening that came with his widower status; an aunt whose children are grown goes back to school to acquire a degree that no one thought was practical or possible.

Even among the young, the crucibles of lack or tragedy, like the refiner's fire, often create a clearer self-identity and a stronger sense of direction. While none of us are messiahs in the way that Jesus is, we are in fact "anointed" (the meaning of the word "Messiah") in baptism and confirmation to recognize and fulfill our God-given purposes. Emptied of our false selves through trial and trouble, losing our lives for Christ's sake, we find our best — and blessed — selves.

Questions:

What experience of loss or brokenness has enabled me to recognize my true self more clearly? What have I learned about myself and my purpose through that experience?

Scripture to Illustrate:

"But you — who do you say that I am?" (Luke 9:20a)

'Camel' carries tender tale

"The Story of the Weeping Camel" is a captivating docudrama set against spectacular expanses of the Gobi Desert about a family of nomadic Mongolian herders who summon a musician from a far-off village to perform an ancient ritual, which they hope will coax a mother camel into nursing the newborn calf which she rejected at birth. Though it doesn't sound like much of a plot, the film is a tender tale — beautiful both cinematically and narratively — whose message of family bonds, the importance of tradition and the centrality of love for survival is both heartbreaking and heartwarming. Subtitles. Thematic content. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG — parental guidance suggested.

New Harry Potter movie darker yet delightful

BY GERRI PARE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — With a new director at the helm of "Harry Potter and the Prisoner of Azkaban," the franchise forges forward.

This is the third adaptation of J.K. Rowling's wildly successful Harry Potter fantasy novels about the boy wizard.

Chris Columbus, who directed "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" and "Harry Potter and the Chamber of Secrets" in 2001 and '02, switches to a producer's hat this time, as Alfonso Cuaron ("A Little Princess") slips into the director's chair.

Cuaron brings a more cinematic sensibility to the tale just as Steve Kloves' screenplay is less concerned with a literal translation of Rowling's novel. The resulting visuals are impressive, sometimes glorious — and occasionally frightening. In other words, too intense for young children unable to distinguish between reality and fantasy, for whom nightmares about snapping monsters would be a natural aftermath.

The story opens as wizard Harry (Daniel Radcliffe), now 13, is seething under the insulting remarks made by his Uncle Vernon's cruel sister (Pam Ferris) about his tragically murdered parents. Unable to rein in his temper or his promise not to perform magic outside his Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry, Harry bloats her and floats her up and away like a giant blimp.

This is a scene of comic delight that precedes the darker emotional territory Harry is headed for: Storming out of the house, he's picked up by a magical purple bus and taken on a warp-speed ride eventually ending up with his best buds, Hermione (Emma Watson) and Ron (Rupert Grint), back at school.

Danger lurks there as prison escapee Sirius Black (Gary Oldman), accused of killing Harry's folks, is in the area, and said to be set on adding Harry's scalp to his belt. Just as fearful are the Dementors, black-hooded spirits who can suck the soul from their prey and have Harry in their sights.

On the plus side, giant Hagrid (Robbie Coltrane) has been promoted to teacher status and the new Defense Against the Dark Arts teacher, Professor Lupin (David Thewlis), helps Harry defend himself against the Dementors while harboring a shocking secret.

There are fewer classroom scenes, although Emma Thompson as a heavy-goggled, clueless soothsayer, contributes periodic comic relief. Nor does the swooping game of Quidditch figure much in the telling of this tale. Overall, the film is visually enthralling and displays an equally intoxicating sense of fun and of danger.

The three teen leads are showing growth in their acting skills and Cuaron has especially been able to tone down Grint's tendency to make Ron hammy. More seasoned performers such as Maggie Smith and Michael Gambon (replacing the late Richard Harris' Professor Dumbledore) do well in their small roles and the ever-reliable Alan Rickman's sinister Snape does not disappoint.

But all is not goodness and light as the story centers on Harry's learning about those involved in his parents' deaths and coping with a deep desire for revenge.

It's seen as sheer fantasy when Harry makes the arrogant aunt inflate (she's rescued later and none the worse for wear) but his wish to destroy Black is grounded in reality, just as it's problematic when Hermione is cheered and congratulated when she slugs her classmate-tormentor, Malfoy.

Happily, Harry gradually matures through the narrative as he uncovers the truth, stays loyal to his friends and gleans lessons in living from his experiences. To its credit, this is accomplished in well-paced, polished fashion, and — as in the two previous movies — it remains very clearly a fantasy, in no way a textbook for teaching black magic, and thus is no threat to Catholic teaching.

"The Prisoner of Azakaban" is likely to hold a worldwide audience captive.

Due to some frightening images and scenes of intense menace, the USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-II — adults and adolescents. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG— parental guidance suggested.

Former U.S. President Ronald Reagan meets Pope John Paul II at the Fairbanks International Airport in Alaska May 2, 1984. The former president was on a return trip from Thailand and the pontiff was en route to Seoul, South Korea. Reagan, president from 1981 to 1989, died June 5 at his home in Bel Air, Calif., after a long struggle with Alzheimer's disease. During eight years in office, he drew Catholic support on abortion issues and aid to private schools. He was 93.

Pope pays tribute to Reagan

Switzerland when Reagan, president in 1981-89, died at age 93. He had suffered for more than a decade from Alzheimer's disease.

"The pope recalled the contributions of President Reagan to the historical events that changed the lives of millions of people, especially in Europe," Joaquin Navarro-Valls, the Vatican spokesman, told reporters.

The pope also noted Reagan's contributions to U.S. society, Navarro-Valls said. The spokesman said the Vatican would send a representative to Reagan's funeral, which was to take place June 11 in Washington.

The spokesman said that when President George W. Bush visited the Vatican June 4 the pope knew Reagan was very sick and sent a warm message to the late president's wife, Nancy.

Reagan met with the pope four times as president — twice at the Vatican and twice in the United States.

It was under Reagan that the United States finally established full diplomatic relations with the Vatican in 1984.

The president and the pope, along with former Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev, are considered by many to have been the main protagonists in the disbanding of the Soviet empire and the fall of communist governments throughout Eastern Europe.

In unpublicized visits and through diplomatic channels, Reagan administration officials provided information to the pope and his aides on events in Eastern Europe, particularly in the pope's native Poland.

While Reagan oversaw an arms buildup in the United States and Western Europe aimed at pressuring the Soviets, the pope pressed for respect for human rights throughout Soviet-bloc nations.

Despite their agreement on the bankruptcy of the Soviet system, the pope and Reagan sometimes disagreed over tactics. For example, the pope and other church leaders opposed U.S. economic sanctions imposed against Poland during the 1980s, on the grounds that they took a bigger toll on the country's people than its leaders.

ZIMMERMAN BEST EXEMPLIFIES NUN'S MOTTO TO 'DO SMALL THINGS WITH GREAT LOVE'

JEFFERSON — Father C. Morris Boyd, administrator of St. Francis of Assisi Church, presented Bernadette Zimmerman with the 2004 Mother Teresa Memorial Award June 6.

The N.C. State Council of the Knights of Columbus, who selected Zimmerman for the award, also presented a $500 check to New Beginnings, a program that works to enhance the lives of Ashe County children in foster care or in crisis situations. Zimmerman is the program's director.

The Knights of Columbus created the award in 1998 to be given annually to two parishioners in North Carolina (one in each diocese) who best exemplify one of Mother Teresa's mottoes, "Do small things with great love."

The Knights ask pastors in the dioceses to submit nominations for the award. Recommendations are judged on the nominee's dedication to serving the Catholic Church, community, families and God with true humility and love.

The institution of the award was approved by Sister Nirmala Joshi, superior general of the Missionaries of Charity. In her letter she accepted, with gratitude, the Knights' request "as a token of love for our dearest Mother."

In addition to helping found New Beginnings in 1997, Zimmerman has been instrumental in arranging meal deliveries to homebound parishioners, as well as transportation to doctors' appointments and other treatments.

She speaks on behalf of children of Ashe County at local churches and organizations, on radio shows, at business and civic clubs. Her other accomplishments include various fundraising efforts for community organizations and a phone card drive for Ashe County military personnel who are serving overseas.

The Knights of Columbus, the world's largest Catholic service organization with nearly 1.7 million members in over 12,000 local councils, provides members and their families with volunteer opportunities in service to the Catholic Church, the community, families and young people.

In 2002, the last year for which figures are available, Knights of Columbus at all levels of the organization raised and distributed a record $125 million to charitable causes and volunteered 60 million hours of service. There are over 12,000 knights in 116 local councils in North Carolina.

A look at the death penalty moratorium

Guest Column

JOE PURELLO
DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF JUSTICE & PEACE

A Death Penalty Moratorium Bill (Senate Bill 972) was passed by the N.C. Senate in April of 2003. Members of the N.C. House of Representatives will likely have the opportunity to vote on this bill during the current legislative session in the General Assembly.

The moratorium bill calls for a two-year halt on executions so that there can be a comprehensive review of the administration of the death penalty. The bill's primary concerns are to investigate whether bias exists in the way the death penalty is applied and whether the death penalty process adequately safeguards against sentencing and executing the innocent.

The Catholic Church's social teaching does not consider the use of the death penalty, against those for whom culpability for serious crimes has been conclusively established, an intrinsic moral evil. The church teaching, however, does state that if the death penalty must be applied to protect the innocent in society, albeit extremely rarely, it must be implemented only against those for whom no doubt of culpability exists. In the Revised Catechism of the Catholic Church, Sec. 2267, one finds the church's position on the death penalty clearly stated as follows:

"Assuming that the guilty party's identity and responsibility have been fully determined, the traditional teaching of the Church does not exclude recourse to the death penalty, if this is the only possible way of effectively defending human lives against the unjust aggressor. If however, non-lethal means are sufficient to defend and protect people's safety from the aggressor, authority will limit itself to such means, as these are more in keeping with the concrete conditions of the common good and more in conformity with the dignity of the human person.

"Today, in fact, as a consequence of the possibilities which the state has for effectively preventing crime, by rendering one who has committed an offense incapable of doing harm — without definitely taking away from him the possibility of redeeming himself — cases in which the execution of the offender is an absolute necessity are very rare, if not practically non-existent."

Our society might very well have already executed some innocent persons. Such a possibility is difficult to prove, given the destruction of evidence and the closing of files after executions. Yet the high number of innocent people who have been released from death row in the United States after having been duly convicted of capital crimes — at least 113 to date since 1976 in 25 states; four in North Carolina — certainly begs the question whether only those truly guilty of capital crimes have been executed.

In his March 26, 2004 letter of support for the death penalty moratorium bill in the N.C. General Assembly, Bishop Peter J. Jugis wrote:

"Another fundamental principle of the Church's teaching on the death penalty (expressed in the very first sentence of the catechism's statement on the death penalty) is that this most severe and final of all punishments is to be used only when the guilty party's identity and responsibility have been fully determined ....

"Even assuming that there may be a limited and just reason to use the death penalty to protect society, the death penalty process must ensure that innocent persons are not executed. Since the evidence clearly suggests that we are not sure that this will always be the case, further study of the death penalty process is warranted. It only seems prudent that executions should be halted while a study of the death penalty process takes place ....

"The church's opposition to the use of the death penalty in modern society and the church's current concern that the death penalty process needs to be studied (to eliminate bias and errors in its application) in no way diminish the Church's heartfelt concern for the victims of terrible acts.

"I call on all the faithful to reach out to those who have experienced the violent death of loved ones. Let us pray for their healing and for the souls of their departed loved ones."

The death penalty moratorium has received support from both those who oppose the death penalty in all circumstances and those who believe capital punishment is a justifiable response to particularly heinous acts of violence. Even supporters of the death penalty want to make sure the death penalty is only imposed on the truly guilty and applied without bias against those who are poor and members of minority groups.

An April 2004 survey of North Carolinians indicates that public support for a moratorium is strong, with 63 percent of state residents supporting a temporary suspension of executions so that the capital punishment process can be studied. ## Young people should discover harmony between faith, life, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY — Young people should discover the harmony between faith and life in order to be ready to fulfill God's plan with joy, Pope John Paul II said at his weekly general audience.

In his June 9 address to pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square, the pope reflected on his June 5-6 visit to Switzerland.

He said he encouraged young people there to answer God's call with enthusiasm.

"This message, which is very dear to me, can be summed up in three words: 'rise,' 'listen,' and 'follow him.' It is Christ himself, risen and alive, who offers these words to every young man and woman of our time," he said.

Following Christ "gives full meaning to one's life," he said.

"Only Christ, redeemer of mankind, can help young people 'rise again' from negative experiences and mentalities in order to grow to their full human, spiritual and moral stature," he said.

The pope extended this message to all young people around the world.

"May the young people of Switzerland and the whole world discover the wonderful harmony between faith and life and so prepare to carry out the mission which God calls them to with enthusiasm," he said.

Looking rested and alert, the pope read almost all of his one-page statement. He gave greetings in seven different languages to some 10,000 pilgrims — many of whom sought respite from the scorching sun under colorful umbrellas and handkerchiefs.

SOME FACTS ON THE DEATH PENALTY IN NORTH CAROLINA

On North Carolina's death row, 191 men and women await execution, more than 5 percent of the total U.S. death row population.

In 2003, North Carolina executed seven people, a number exceeded only by Texas and Oklahoma. In 2003, North Carolina's rate of executions increased, while nationally the execution rate has dropped significantly in the last 10 years.

Nearly every person on North Carolina's death row is a person without means, with more than 90 percent defended by court-appointed attorneys. A recent Columbia Law School study, "A Broken System: Error Rates in Capital Cases," found that 71 percent of all death penalty convictions in North Carolina between 1973 and 1995 involved serious error at the trial court level.

A 1989 study in North Carolina showed that a defendant's chances of receiving the death penalty were 3.5 times greater if the victim was white than if the victim was a member of a minority group no matter the race of the defendant.

The Internet: A new addiction

Our Turn

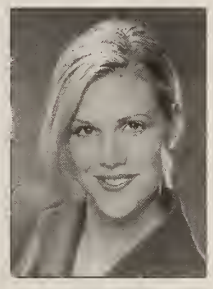
THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST



Just when I think I have licked all my addictions, my husband tells me that I am obsessed and need help.

Cigarettes? I used to smoke socially — until I was socializing all the time. Caffeine? My daughter's irregular heartbeat (arrhythmia) that my obstetrician detected when I was seven months pregnant put a quick end to full-leaded lattes. And alcohol has been out of the picture since before high school graduation.

So now, sober as I can be this hour, I battle yet another foe: e-mail and Internet addiction.

Yes. It keeps me up at night. I can't stop checking the sales rank of my last book on Amazon.com and BarnesandNoble.com. I can't resist clicking on "Receive Messages" when the last thing I need to read is an e-mail from a stranger who claims to be my secret admirer (or my husband's?), or information on losing 60 pounds in five weeks.

But I scan and delete when I should be praying, or cleaning, or reading, or something other than staring at pixels on a screen that only make me dizzy.

I thought this loopy behavior didn't haunt normal people, but I was pleasantly surprised to read that many young adults (and people in general) suffer from the same neurosis. In fact, this condition is so prevalent that computer scientist David Levy has organized a conference in Seattle called "Information, Silence and Sanctuary" for those like me, who, unable to escape their virtual office, can't resist using their cute laptops even if the information overload is robbing them of inner peace.

Much like environmentalists gathered and lobbied their causes in the 1960s, Levy is leading a movement to fight for something just as valuable as endangered wetlands that is at risk of becoming extinct: quiet time.

An observant Jew, he literally unplugs on the Sabbath. No e-mail, Internet, telephone or television for him from Friday's sundown to Saturday's sundown. And although he acknowledges that the primary responsibility for quiet times lies with the individual, he is encouraging businesses and government to offer more paid vacation time hours to do, well, nothing.

I can't go that far right now. Just last weekend I told myself the computer was staying off for a day. I made it one hour before I had to check the weather forecast, and since I was logged on I might as well check how my book was doing.

An hour later, my fingers were still doing the walking, as I sipped on a decaffeinated coffee, needing some kind of distraction to drag me away.

Thankfully, as a mom I get that about twice a minute: God's subtle way of directing me to dirty diapers and spilled apple juice, which are much better for my soul than junk mail.

Drinking to the point of sin

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. When drinking alcohol, how do you know when you have committed a serious sin? What is the line you cross, making drinking more than just a "little" sin? (Missouri)

A. The line, as you call it, isn't that hard to tell in theory, but in practice a lot of common sense and personal honesty is necessary.

As everyone knows, any use of alcohol affects our thinking and emotional processes somehow. It's sometimes called social drinking because people expect it to "loosen us up" and make social activities a bit freer and more congenial.

Any drinking, however, that deliberately causes loss of reason is a serious sin. One can know when the use of reason is lost, for example, if one cannot later remember what he or she said or did while under the influence of alcohol. The "lost weekend" syndrome is not unusual for people who drink heavily.

Hours, or in some instances days, may become a fog. People cannot remember where they were or what they did. Everything is a haze the next morning when they find themselves at home and wonder how they got there.

Others will drive long distances, even travel to other cities, or visit friends and never remember a minute of what occurred during these episodes.

Another sign is that one cannot distinguish between right and wrong, good and bad, while under the influence. Those who drink heavily frequently discover later that they have done things while drinking that they wouldn't think of doing otherwise.

Inhibitions are lost, moral compasses cease to exist, people are violated or injured — all, we realize, as a result of the fact that we were "drunk." Eventually, if this tendency isn't caught, one will almost inevitably end up inflicting terrible physical, emotional and spiritual damage on oneself or someone else.

Of course, the usual three conditions for mortal sin apply here as anywhere else: serious matter, sufficient reflection and full consent of the will. The first time one drinks to intoxication there may not be real consent. The individual just doesn't know how that amount of alcohol will affect him.

After a bit of experience, however, the person knows that drinking a certain quantity of alcohol will render him or her out of touch, unable to judge right from wrong, unable even to remember what happened during the drinking binge. The resulting intoxication is then not "accidental," but deliberate and sinful. When this point is reached, one can know she or he is in heavy sin territory.

It should go without saying that these dangerous circumstances do not normally arise suddenly, though they may do so, especially in younger people who have no experience of alcoholic intake but whose initial experience is so severe it causes critical trauma, even death.

Usually, warning signs are present long in advance, signs that tell us we're headed for trouble unless we change the track we're on. It's when we ignore those signs that we end up in serious loss of ability to control ourselves and in serious sin.

Obviously other important factors may enter the picture as well, how one's use of alcohol affects one's family, work and personal health, to mention only three.

Two more points are appropriate. First, to deliberately cause another person to come under the influence of alcohol or other dangerous drug is also gravely sinful, a serious sin at least against charity, love of neighbor.

Second, we all have seen movies of frontier days when injured people were deliberately made drunk with whiskey in preparation for painful surgery. Here, as in more modern forms of general anesthesia, the physical good of the patient justifies rendering him or her partially or fully unconscious during surgery.

The newly ordained

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

As I concelebrated with a newly ordained priest at his first Mass, my thoughts drifted back to all the unexpected happenings I experienced when I was newly ordained.

I knew I would be sent to a parish, but never expected to be with a pastor who was a model of kindness. From my first day on the job, he was there to help me as best he could. He could be firm, but he was never overbearing.

He was concerned that I keep up my studies, take my day off and stay healthy.

The parish had a school and two full-time assistants. Never did I expect that one assistant would become a good friend and support me throughout my 41 years of priesthood. We still call each other on a regular basis, even though I am hundreds of miles away from him.

Other priests helped us on a regular basis because of a heavy Mass schedule. They were the first priests truly to teach me about the fraternity of the priesthood. We debated theology, competed in golf and were forever chiding each other.

As a newly ordained priest, I received lessons from them that I still follow and pass on to other priests:

—Don't overextend yourself!
—Keep a sense of humor!
—Don't neglect prayer!
—Get away every so often!
—Shorten, simplify your homilies!

Our honesty with each other was fraternal correction at its best because we cared for each other.

What deeply touched me was hearing first confessions and experiencing how seriously the laity lived their spiritual life. Often I felt nowhere near their level of spirituality. In fact, the more I ministered to parishioners and saw the deep faith they had when suffering, the more I realized that here were theological lessons you can't find in textbooks.

The celebration of Mass was and is an awesome experience for me. At age 25, giving a homily was also awesome. Many of the parishioners were much older than I and knew much more about life and God's place in it for them. Yet they came to listen to a young priest and his view of God and life.

This May and June, many newly ordained priests are beginning a life of new, unexpected experiences. I pray their first pastor is a model pastor, that they experience the fraternity of the priesthood in its fullness, that they are awed by the spirituality of those they serve and they fully appreciate all that ordination gives them and empowers them to do.

Mission of St. John the Evangelist Church, Waynesville

Augustinian Father Dennis McGowan

CANTON — Immaculate Conception Church traces its beginnings back to the 1940s, when Catholics in the area gathered for Mass in private homes. Father Ambrose Rohrbacker, then-pastor of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville, celebrated those liturgies; later a mission was established in Canton.

During the gasoline-rationed World War II years, a school bus transported Canton Catholics through the mountains to Waynesville for Mass. The local Catholic population increased when veterans, Catholics among them, returned home after the war. Catholics were also included in the workforce who gained employment at a new paper mill in town.

Through the 1950s, the clergy of St. John the Evangelist Church began ministering to more and more Catholics throughout North Carolina's westernmost counties. From 1951, St. John the Evangelist Church became responsible for missions in Fontana, Murphy, Franklin, Canton and Sylva. Several became parishes in later years, with Immaculate Conception Church staying on as the Waynesville church's only mission.

In Canton, Mass was celebrated in the YMCA building during the early '50s. An altar was set up on a bare floor, and parishioners sat on slatted wooden chairs. A hallway served as the confessional. The visiting priest brought a makeshift altar: a suitcase containing vestments and altar furnishings, which folded out and was propped on legs.

Father (later Msgr.) Lawrence Newman was pastor of St. John the Evangelist Church when one of his parishioners, Mrs. R. E. Davis, informed him that suitable property for a church in Canton was for sale. The lot was purchased, the house on it was torn down and a parking lot was constructed.

All this activity made way for construction of the new Immaculate Conception Church to begin. A church hall and kitchen were included on the lower level of the new building. The redbrick structure is simple in design, with a native pine ceiling and ornate stained-glass windows highlighting the church's nave.

In 1954, the 54 members of the Canton mission gathered with Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh, Father Newman and more than 20 other priests during the dedication service. The event had added significance for one group of parishioners, who received the sacrament of confirmation during the Mass.

Like many churches in the Diocese of Charlotte, Immaculate Conception Church serves an ever-increasing Hispanic population. Before embarking on a Spanish-immersion sabbatical in Mexico in 2002-2003, Father C. Morris Boyd, then pastor of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin, drove to Canton every Sunday for a year to celebrate Hispanic Mass at Immaculate Conception Church.

Presently, Father Shawn O'Neal, administrator of St. Joseph Church in Bryson City and Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Cherokee, celebrates Mass in Spanish about once a month for about 100 Hispanic worshipers in Canton.

Immaculate Conception Church celebrated its 25th anniversary in 1979 with a Mass concelebrated by Bishop Michael J. Begley, the Diocese of Charlotte's founding bishop, and a dozen priests who had served the area's Catholics.

More than 200 Anglo and Hispanic parishioners gathered at the Colonial Theater in Canton to celebrate the church's 50th anniversary June 6 with a special Mass concelebrated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis; Augustinian Father Dennis McGowan, pastor of Immaculate Conception Church and of St. John the Evangelist Church in Waynesville; retired Father James Cahill, former pastor of St. Mary Church in Sylva; and Father C. Morris Boyd, administrator of St. Frances of Assisi Church in Jefferson and St. Francis of Rome Church in Sparta.

Immaculate Conception Church continues to maintain a close relationship with St. John the Evangelist Church. Father McGowan, pastor of the two congregations, celebrates Mass each Sunday in the Canton church.

Registered membership in the mountain mission has both declined and swelled since those early years. Retirees now make up a significant percentage of today's parish and Mass attendance goes up each summer as Catholic visitors flock to the area to take in Haywood County's cool mountain air and slow-paced lifestyle.

Bishops approve 2004 child sex abuse policy audits

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DENVER — The U.S. bishops have approved on-site audits this year of all U.S. dioceses and Eastern-rite eparchies to monitor compliance with child sex abuse prevention policies.

The vote was 207-14 in favor with one abstention, according to a June 15 news release issued in Denver by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The vote was taken during the bishops' June 14-19 closed-door spring meeting, held this year in a Denver suburb.

Kathleen McChesney, executive director of the bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection, which conducts the audits, said the vote leaves enough time to do the 2004 audits.

"Last year's audits began at the end of June. This leaves us approximately the same amount of time," she said.

The hierarchy also directed its all-lay National Review Board to prepare, in conjunction with the bishops' Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse, proposals for a study

HICKORY — While many parishes sponsor mission trips to far-away places such as Jamaica, Mexico and Africa, St. Aloysius Church hosted its first adult mission trip to the western borders of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Seventeen parishioners and Father Edward Sheridan, pastor, spent June 6-11 assisting people in Clay and Cherokee counties.

"You don't need to leave our state to find many people who live in substandard housing," said Rev. Mr. Thomas Rasmussen, permanent deacon at St. Aloysius Church, who helped organize the trip.

Ranging in age from 30 to 75, the group members worked in two teams — one team installed vinyl siding on the home of a 75-year-old

DEPARTING PRAYERS

Father Robert Cannon is one of two chaplains serving the U.S. military mortuary at the Dover Air Force Base in Delaware. In the last 15 months, the facility has taken in the remains of nearly 800 people — most of them U.S. soldiers who died in Iraq.

Chaplain says military mortuary work deepens his respect for life

DOVER AIR FORCE BASE, Del. (CNS) — Father Robert Cannon confronts "the face of evil" every day as he prays over the remains of U.S. military personnel being returned from Iraq and ministers to mortuary workers as they prepare those bodies for a final trip home.

Amid the horrific results of war that he sees, Father Cannon said he maintains his mental and spiritual health by approaching his work "as a man of faith."

"It is very easy for anyone to recoil from the face of evil; I see the wounds of war as part of the reflection of the evil of our day and time," he said. "I confront that with prayer, with Scripture."

The priest, 52, is a lieutenant colonel and a reservist who was called to active duty 18 months ago.

Father Cannon is the only Catholic chaplain at the base's Charles C. Carson Center for Mortuary Services, the Defense Department's only mortuary in the continental United States.

The center handles remains of U.S. troops from around the world. Over the past 15 months most of those remains — nearly 800 bodies — have come from Iraq.

While Father Cannon deals with death, he said his work has deepened his respect for life.

"Life is a gift," said the priest, a consultant to the U.S. Catholic bishops' pro-life office. "You understand how fleeting life is and how precious it is."

Father Cannon views his ministry as putting the spiritual works of mercy into action, especially the admonition to pray for the living and the dead. He said it was his vocation to pray for those who have died.

"And to pray for the families, that the Lord's peace and consolation will come upon them in their grieving, that they can find some consolation and some hope in the sacrifice that has been made for our country, for peace in the world," he said.

Recently, Father Cannon's phone rang — it was Base Operations, telling him that a plane with remains would arrive in 25 minutes. As he got up and prepared to start the cycle again, to board a plane and pray over the remains of dead soldiers, he offered a final tribute.

"It is an absolute honor and a sacred privilege to serve our men and women who are defending our freedoms, and to contribute a little something back to them for the freedoms I enjoy," he said. "To be able to worship freely in this country comes at a cost. I am grateful to those in the past and present who defend my freedom to worship freely."

Conference lauds women religious' role in fighting human trafficking

ROME (CNS) — The Catholic Church and especially women religious are playing a crucial role in the global battle against human trafficking, said participants in a June 17 conference sponsored by the U.S. Embassy to Holy See.

Between 600,000 and 2 million people each year are smuggled across international borders as cheap labor, sex workers, child soldiers and organ donors, according to the International Organization for Migration. A disproportionate number of victims are women and children, the organization said.

Religious orders offer "spiritual, material and social support to victims of human trafficking, whose psychological and physical health has been jeopardized" by the experience, said Stefano Volpicelli of the organization's Rome bureau.

"Religious play an important role" in exposing trafficking networks, protecting victims' rights and giving victims a way out of forced labor, Volpicelli said.

Volpicelli works with religious superiors in training nuns who already have had experience in social work and human trafficking.

Italian Sister Eugenia Bonetti, who was honored recently by the U.S. State Department for her work in the fight against trafficking of sex workers, said men religious felt uneasy talking about an issue that mostly affects women.

"They don't feel they can get involved because they have ideas that this is a woman's problem," said Sister Bonetti. "But instead it is a man's problem, too ... trafficking in human beings is destroying families," she said.

"It's logical bishops' conferences or other faith-based religious structures should be involved" in the battle, said Sister Mary Ellen Dougherty, a School Sister of Notre Dame and project administrator for the U.S. bishops' Migration and Refugee Services grant on human trafficking.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope: God is refuge, especially in times of danger and fear

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — God is always with us to help us, especially at times of great danger or fear, said Pope John Paul II at his weekly general audience.

The pope focused his catechesis June 16 on Psalm 46, which he said "expresses an indestructible faith in God who 'is our refuge and our strength, an ever-present help' in our distress."

The psalm celebrates the city of Jerusalem as "the city of God, 'the holy place where the most high dwells,'" he said.

It is God's presence there that reaffirms the psalmist's conviction that despite any chaos or trouble, "Jerusalem 'will not be disturbed; God will help it,'" the pope said.

"Despite the turmoil which makes peoples shudder and kingdoms totter, the faithful find in Zion the peace and serenity that come from communion with God," he said.

The pope read only a small portion of his one-and-a-half-page catechesis to the more than 10,000 pilgrims gathered in St. Peter's Square.

With God, wars end in peace and "wartime instruments of death turn into tools for the development of mankind," he wrote.

"The Lord from his throne in Zion intervenes with great vigor against wars and establishes the peace that all people long for," the pope said.

The Christian tradition then turns to Christ as "our peace and liberator from evil through his death and resurrection," the pope said.

At the end of the audience, the pope gave his greetings in eight different languages and spent more than an hour offering his blessings to the long line of people who came to greet him.

Pope urges people to give 'gift of life' and donate blood

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II urged people worldwide to give "a gift of life" and donate blood.

At the end of his Angelus prayer June 13, the pope said blood donors perform an act of "great moral and civic value."

"Donating one's own blood voluntarily and without compensation is a gesture of great moral and civic value," he said. "It's a gift for life."

"May blood donors, to whom all are grateful, increase in every part of the world," he said.

The pope made special mention that June 14 marked World Blood Donor Day — an event organized in part by the World Health Organization, the International Federation of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies and world blood donor organizations.

A large majority of the world's people have no access to safe blood supplies, according to the World Blood Donor Day Web site. Of the millions of units of blood donated every year, 38 percent of them are collected in developing countries where more than 80 percent of the world population lives, it said.

World Blood Donor Day is meant to pay tribute to the anonymous donors who give blood voluntarily and with no compensation. According to the Web site, voluntary unpaid blood donors offer the safest blood supplies as they have shown to be less likely to carry potentially life-threatening viruses such as HIV and hepatitis.

NCCC presents service award to Greensboro parishioner

JOHNSON EXEMPLIFIES DIVERSITY, RICHNESS OF COUNCIL

GREENSBORO — The North Carolina Council of Churches presented a distinguished service award to Bridget Brown Johnson, a parishioner of St. Paul the Apostle Church.

Given in recognition of an exceptional and extended record of service to the council, the award was presented at the council's house of delegates' annual meeting in Greensboro. Johnson and fellow former council president Rev. Joseph Brown, pastor of the AME Zion Church in Wilmington, were honored with the award.

"I'm glad that we can recognize Bridget and Joe together. They embody many of the diversities that contribute to the richness of the N.C. Council of Churches — differences in church, race, gender, geography, even in leadership styles," said George Reed, the council's executive director.

"They have in common a strong personal faith, a deep commitment to the Council's work for Christian wholeness, and a rich longing for justice — racial justice, economic justice, gender justice," said Reed.

Johnson served as president from 1999 to 2001. Her service included work with the Caring Program for Children, which was a precursor to the state's Health Choice program, and service on the Equal Rights Amendment Committee and on the advisory board for Jubilee. She worked for several years for Catholic Social Services in Greensboro.

Previous recipients of the award include Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville; and Christian Community Sister Evelyn Mattern, founder of the Diocese of Raleigh's Peace and Justice Department.

The North Carolina Council of Churches is a statewide organization representing 15 Christian denominations and committed to the twin goals of ecumenism and social justice. More than 1.5 million North Carolinians are members of congregations under the Council's umbrella.

Charlotte Catholic students serve homeless, special-needs athletes

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Students at Charlotte Catholic High School spend hours in the classroom, on athletic fields and at extracurricular activities. They also spend hours helping their fellow Charlotteans in a variety of ways.

Throughout the winter months, students work the first and second Tuesdays of each month at Charlotte's Emergency Winter Shelter.

Since 1981, Emergency Winter Shelter (EWS) has operated from December through March, serving as the overflow from the Uptown Men's Shelter on North Tryon St. As many as 1,400 men receive food and shelter at the EWS each winter.

"The students are our main workforce (of the volunteers from St. Patrick Church)," said Dick Kelly, a parishioner of St. Patrick Church and volunteer at the shelter. "They have a strong Christian faith and devotion to this work."

The students work serving food, entering identification information into the computer for recording purposes, distributing blankets and other miscellaneous duties.

"These students should be praised for all their good work," he said. "Working with these young people has been, and I hope will continue to be, the greatest satisfaction of my life."

In addition to their on-going work at the shelter, 75 students spent the first three days of their summer vacation volunteering at the Special Olympics Athletic Retreat (Camp SOAR), held at the Jewish Community Center in south Charlotte June 9-11.

More than 180 athletes of all ages participated in the fourth annual SOAR games. The event gives people with special needs an opportunity to try activities they don't normally participate in during Special Olympics games, including golf, tae kwon do and horseback riding. Participants also enjoyed cheerleading, arts and crafts and bingo. A dance for athletes and volunteers concluded the days' festivities.

The camp also emphasizes that all participants are winners, regardless of how fast they run a race.

Camp SOAR is the dream and vision of Bob Bowler, Special Olympics volunteer, coach and "jack-of-all-trades" for more than 20 years.

"(The athletes) deserve a camp of their own, and they deserve to be the stars of the camp and have a good time, meet new friends, meet new families," said Bowler.

Some of those "new friends" were the volunteers from Charlotte Catholic High School.

"At first I was really nervous, but over the days, I had a lot of fun," said Chris Needham, a rising sophomore.

"It was a great experience to help other kids," said Megan Reynolds, a rising senior.

"All of our volunteers were terrific this year and the more than 50 students from Charlotte Catholic ... they not only had a great experience but were a credit to their school with the exemplary way they pitched in to do whatever needed to be done," said Al Tinson, media relations volunteer for Special Olympics Mecklenburg County.

Students enriched by unusual pen pal

Long-haul trucker sends cards, letters to Our Lady of Mercy School

WINSTON-SALEM — Fourth-graders at Our Lady of Mercy School have been "traveling" the highways and byways of the United States without leaving the classroom.

The class has been corresponding with Lee Tibbets, a truck driver, as part of the Wal-Mart Trucker Buddy Program for the last five years.

Tibbets, also known as "Lost Navigator" over citizens band (CB) radio, has sent more than 100 postcards and letters to the fourth-graders, allowing them to track his travels throughout the country. On several occasions, Tibbets has driven to the school to visit the class.

Barb Burke, fourth-grade teacher, said the pen pal experience has enriched the lives of her students by not only allowing them to see the world as a long-haul trucker, but by opening the eyes of the students "to the immense size of the United States."

"He has been very dedicated to the children," said Burke. "He has been very influential in broadening the students' horizons."

Burke said Tibbetts recently joined the National Guard and may be joining the U.S. Armed Forces in the Middle East. The class with stay in touch with him and pray for him, she said.

'A great devotion'

Parishioner endows funds for St. Joseph Church

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

NEWTON — Charles Harold Carpenter was a self-described "true Southern gentleman."

Many who knew Carpenter, a parishioner of St. Joseph Church in Newton before his death on June 4, 2003, adored him.

"He was the last of the aristocracy," said Denny Schell, a fellow parishioner and friend.

Descendant of a pioneer family in Lincoln County, Carpenter had ancestors who participated in both the Revolutionary and Civil wars. As such, the former professor in higher education had a great love of and respect for history — he was a member of Sons of the Revolution, Sons of the Confederacy, Organization of American Historians and Catawba County Historical Association, among others.

Born in 1924 and a lifelong bachelor, Carpenter converted to Catholicism at age 70 at an Easter Vigil Mass in 1994. It was then that his love of Catholicism truly began to blossom.

"He had a great devotion to the Blessed Mother and the rosary," said Schell.

It was Carpenter who was instrumental in establishing a monthly rosary service after the Sunday Mass.

"He initiated it before I came to St. Joseph and even though he's gone, it still continues today," said Father Jim Collins, pastor. "He was a great motivator, and he will definitely be missed because he made his presence very known."

Carpenter also served as a lay minister, a Prime Timer (seniors group) and as a greeter in the parish.

"He took his role as greeter at St. Joseph very seriously," noted Schell.

Carpenter also supported numerous Catholic organizations, including the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, the Legion of Christ in America, the Church of St. John in New York City, the Salesian Missions of the World and the Society of St. Jude (his patron saint).

Carpenter's love of his church motivated him to continue assisting it after his death.

"In his will, he instructed that $200,000 of his assets be used to set up a trust for the benefit of St. Joseph Church," said Schell, whom Carpenter named executor of his will.

"The endowment was very generous," said Father Collins. "I never expected it. I was very surprised."

"He lived in a humble home and drove a simple car," said Schell. "The only sign of his being well-to-do was his generosity."

The Alma Mae Hoover Carpenter and Charles Harold Carpenter Endowment Fund for the Benefit of St. Joseph Parish was soon established through the Foundation for the Diocese of Charlotte.

The endowment was named after both Carpenter and his mother, Alma Mae, who died in 1995. The endowment's name "was his way to honor his mother," said Schell.

An endowment is a permanent fund placed in the diocesan foundation that earns income over time. The original amount is not spent, but the income can be used in a manner stipulated in a person's estate plan or in an endowment agreement, according to Jim Kelley, foundation director.

Currently, the diocesan foundation has 118 endowments.

The Carpenter endowment will assist in the general, non-budgeted needs of the parish, said Schell.

"We hope to use proceeds from the endowment for things like repairs, maintenance or other non-budgeted items, or for outreach programs to help the community," said Father Collins.

"Anyone from the parish can contribute to the endowment, and thereby continue to give perpetually to the needs of the parish," said Schell.

The foundation is a non-profit organization established to provide endowments for the Diocese of Charlotte and its parishes, schools, agencies and organizations.

People in the diocese are giving not only of their current income, said Kelley, but more and more people are taking another step in stewardship by giving their cumulative assets to take care of the church.

Carpenter's endowment will continue to take care of St. Joseph Church for a long time to come.

"He left his mark on the church, and we will not be able to forget him," said Father Collins.

ENDOWMENTS AND PLANNED GIVING

In addition to a bequest in a will — in which you can stipulate that the diocesan foundation or named endowment receives a specific amount, a percentage of your estate, or remainder after other bequests are filled — there are five other primary ways to donate an endowment to the diocese, according to Gina Rhodes, diocesan director of planned giving. They are:

— Gifts of cash, securities or real estate.

— Gifts of life insurance, which allow you to make a gift that might be larger than if you were to give an asset outright. You can donate a paid policy that you already own or you can purchase a policy to donate.

— Life income arrangements, which allow you to make a gift during your lifetime while retaining and even increasing your income from those assets for the remainder of your life. These include trusts and charitable gift annuities.

— Gifts from retirement plans, which you can designate your endowment as the remainder beneficiary of an IRA, 401K, or annuity to receive what is left in your retirement plan after your death.

— A gift of life estate in real property, which allows you to enjoy your home or vacation property during your lifetime, while giving you the satisfaction of knowing your church will benefit from the gift after your death.

To learn more about planned giving or to set up an endowment, call Jim Kelley at (704) 370-3301 or e-mail jkkelley@charlottediocese.org, or Gina Rhodes at (704) 370-3320 or e-mail gmrhodes@charlottediocese.org.

A decade of devotion

Ten years of perpetual adoration celebrated at Maryfield Chapel

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

HIGH POINT — The feast of Corpus Christi, this year celebrated June 13, marked the 10th consecutive year of perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament in Maryfield Chapel at Pennybyrn at Maryfield, a continuing care retirement community founded by the Sisters of the Poor Servants of the Mother of God.

"It is truly unbelievable that 10 years have passed since perpetual adoration started here at Maryfield," said Sister Lucy Hennessy, chief executive officer of Maryfield Inc.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated Mass in honor of the feast of Corpus Christi and the anniversary of perpetual adoration in the Maryfield Chapel.

Perpetual adoration is a practice in some parishes and religious communities of exposing the Eucharist 24 hours a day in a chapel for continuous adoration. Communities that establish perpetual adoration of the Blessed Sacrament are expected to assure that there is always someone present in prayer before the exposed Eucharist.

The sisters, staff and residents of Pennyburn at Maryfield and laity from the Triad area spend at least 720 hours per month in silent prayer and devotion to Jesus, who is present in the Eucharist. The volunteers are present both day and night, including the early hours of the morning.

"Perpetual adoration has drawn people from the surrounding Triad area to greater prayer life," said Sister Hennessy.

"Adoration has been a blessing to Maryfield. People have opened up to the spiritual side of what we have to offer," she said. "Maryfield is more than a care center. It is, more importantly, a prayer center."

"The body and blood of Christ is, indeed, the center of the Catholic faith," said Bishop Jugis. "That is why the tabernacle (the repository for the Eucharist) is placed in a prominent place in the church."

The bishop said the Eucharist was born out of Jesus' suffering and death, and it is the living memorial to his sacrifice.

"'This is my body' connects the sacrifice with the words 'which is given up for you,'" said Bishop Jugis. "'This is my blood' connects the sacrifice with the words 'which will be shed for you for the forgiveness of sins.'"

"Jesus wanted all of his followers from then (the Last Supper) until the end of the world to share his sacrifice. Through the Eucharist, we are all present at the cross," he said.

The paschal mystery is the mystery of Jesus' death and resurrection, said Bishop Jugis.

"Jesus said, 'He who eats my body and drinks my blood has eternal life.' This shows that eternal life begins now," said the bishop, "yet it comes to fullness on the last day at the Resurrection. Through the Eucharist, we look forward to the fulfillment of the promise of eternal glory."

After the Mass, Bishop Jugis led a eucharistic procession around the facility's rose garden. He was accompanied by Rev. Mr. Joseph Smith, permanent deacon at Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in High Point; Rev. Mr. David King, permanent deacon at Pennyburn at Maryfield; Msgr. Joseph Showfety, retired; Father Robert Ferris, pastor of St. Benedict Church in Greensboro; Father Andrew Lasko, retired; Father Patrick Gavigan, retired; Father Joseph Kelleher, retired; Father Francis O'Rourke, pastor of Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro; and Father Jonathan Hanic, parochial vicar at St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem.

Following the procession was a blessing of the sick and infirm, as well as a Benediction, a service consisting of prayers and hymns with the Eucharist displayed.

Pope announces year dedicated to the Eucharist for 2004-2005

YEARLONG DEDICATION FOR FAITHFUL TO 'START AFRESH FROM CHRIST'

ROME — Pope John Paul II announced a special year dedicated to the Eucharist, saying the church needs to highlight its importance for spiritual life and missionary tasks of the 21st century.

The eucharistic year will begin with the International Eucharistic Congress in Guadalajara, Mexico, this Oct. 10-17 and will end with the Synod of Bishops on the Eucharist in Rome Oct. 2-29, 2005.

The pope made the announcement June 10, the feast of the Body and Blood of Christ, during a Mass at the Rome Basilica of St. John Lateran. Afterward he led a traditional eucharistic procession through the streets of Rome, while seated in the back of a modified flatbed truck.

The pope last year wrote an encyclical on the Eucharist, emphasizing its centrality for every aspect of church life.

At the Rome Mass, he said there was a close connection between the Eucharist and announcing Christ. To enter into communion with Christ in the Eucharist means becoming missionaries of the message of his sacrifice, he said.

"All those who come worthily for nourishment at his table become living instruments of his presence of love, mercy and peace," he said.

At his noon blessing June 13, the pope said the eucharistic year was part of a pastoral project for the whole church, in which he was inviting the faithful to "start afresh from Christ."

A better understanding of Christ's presence in the Eucharist will lead to a better prayer life, which in turn will favor evangelization, the pope said.

Eucharist unites Christians to Jesus, says bishop

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

BELMONT — Youth from around the diocese and as far away as Lexington, N.C., learned they all make up the body of Christ.

The diocesan offices of youth ministry, campus ministry, young adult ministry and Hispanic youth and young adult ministry sponsored a Corpus Christi celebration at Belmont Abbey College June 12.

More than 100 youths participated in the bilingual celebration, which featured a keynote address from Bishop Peter J. Jugis, workshops in English and Spanish, games, a eucharistic procession and a Benediction.

During the opening prayer, participants brought together pieces of a banner to form a giant image of Jesus. The banner was then displayed on the gymnasium wall as Bishop Jugis gave his address.

The bishop said he was delighted to attend the event, "especially considering the beautiful theme we have chosen for the day — Corpus Christi."

"The body and blood of Christ is the center of our lives as Catholics," said Bishop Jugis. "It is the center of the life of our parishes. Even physically speaking, the tabernacle is placed at a prominent place in the church where the body of the Lord is reserved for adoration."

The bishop said it was Jesus who made the Eucharist the center of the church's life.

"He told the Apostles at the Last Supper, 'Do this in remembrance of me,' and in that way indicated that he wanted this sacred rite to be the principal worship of his church," said Bishop Jugis.

"Here, in the sacrament, his real presence remains in the church in a physical, tangible, substantial way — Jesus remaining in his church all days until the end of time, uniting all of us in himself, and uniting in himself all the generations of Christians who have received the holy Eucharist since the first century," he said.

Bishop Jugis said, "Holy Communion wipes away venial sins, increases Christ's grace in us, makes us grow in our union with Christ, preserves us from future mortal sins and is the promise of eternal life."

"This is the love of Christ in which we are allowed to participate in a most profound and personal way — a love that goes to the end, a love that knows no measure," said the bishop.

UNITED IN CHRIST

Corpus Christi conference educates, nourishes Catholics

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte celebrated the feast of Corpus Christi with the Corpus Christi Conference June 11-12.

The event, the first such conference held in the diocese, was sponsored by Catholics United for the Faith, Catholic Scripture Study and The Friends of St. John Vianney, a group of diocesan priests.

More than 800 people attended a day and a half of worship and presentations at Charlotte Catholic High School. Many of those in attendance were young married couples and families with young children.

Two of the featured speakers for the conference were Catholic apologists Dr. Scott Hahn and Kimberly Hahn.

The purpose of the Corpus Christi Conference is "to educate, nourish and fulfill," said Gail Buckley, sponsor and organizer of the conference.

Specifically, organizers of the conference wanted "to proclaim the Gospel and to bring into a mission territory (the Diocese of Charlotte) a Catholic conference to help shape the culture here in the South," said Father Patrick Winslow, parochial vicar of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte.

Father Matthew Kauth, administrator of St. Francis of Assisi Church in Franklin, said one of the initial goals of the conference was to create "counter presence."

"You can't simply denounce the evil going on in the world," he said. "You have to offer an alternative."

"Rather than just condemning the present culture, (the conference) is an attempt to lift the people up by the beauty of their Catholic faith," said Father Kauth.

Other diocesan priests involved in the initial planning of the conference were Father John Putnam, diocesan judicial vicar and pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury; Father Ray Williams, pastor of St. Mary Church in Sylva; Father Christopher Roux, parochial vicar of St. Mark Church in Huntersville; Father Christopher Gober, administrator of Saint Lucien Church in Spruce Pine; Father Matthew Buettner, parochial vicar of St. Gabriel Church in Charlotte; Father Roger Arnsbarger, pastor of St. Barnabas Church in Arden; Father Frank Seabo, administrator of St. Margaret Mary Church in Swannanoa; and Father John Allen, vocations director for the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We are called to faithfulness ... first and foremost in our relationship with Jesus and because of that, our relationship with the Catholic Church," said Kimberly Hahn, who addressed the subject of "The Eucharist as Life-Giving Love."

"The greatest discovery for us (in becoming Catholics) ... was the idea of family — that God is our father, Christ is the firstborn among many brothers and sisters, and that through the Holy Spirit, the Blessed Virgin Mary becomes our mother," said Scott Hahn, who spoke on the topic of "Swear to God, the Bible and the Sacraments."

"The flesh and blood of Christ united us (with the saints and Christians)," he said.

Father Winslow, Father Kauth and Buckley all hoped participants left the conference with a great confidence in the veracity of their Catholic faith and a renewed interest in Catholic Scripture study.

"This weekend has been an absolute joy," said Father Winslow.

Surprise! Priests are happy

Book compiles research on priesthood

REVIEWED BY FATHER DAN DANIELSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Catholic priests in the United States are "on average happy, mature and self-fulfilled men." They like being priests and doing what priests do. And the vast majority would do it again if they had to do it over.

Those are sociologist Father Andrew Greeley's conclusions in "Priests: A Calling in Crisis."

Father Greeley has been a controversial writer and opinion-giver on Catholic issues for decades. But to my knowledge, no one has ever disputed his justified reputation as a sociologist.

"Priests: A Calling in Crisis" is above all a book of sociology. Those looking for inspiration, spirituality or personal testimony will be disappointed. While there are plenty of Father Greeley's tentative conclusions and recommendations — enough to stimulate controversy — above all, he establishes a scientifically verifiable view of the priests of the United States today, one that is not drawn from anecdotal evidence or personal opinions.

In the light of the scandals created by the sexual abuse crisis, all sorts of theories of causation are trotted forth, focusing usually on the clergy's low morale. Father Greeley takes a careful, critical look at those untested assumptions and, as a social scientist, finds them wanting.

Using research data from as far back as 1970 and as recent as the two Los Angeles Times studies in 1993 and 2002, he establishes the church sexual abuse scandal's cause is not the celibacy requirement for priests nor homosexuality.

He dwells on some related matters, such as the laity's dissatisfaction with the clergy's professionalism, especially with their sermons and liturgy. He also notes the clear majority of the lower clergy and laity hold views that are at considerable variance from the official Roman position on such matters as the ordination of married men, artificial birth control and the election of bishops by the people.

He makes a number of recommendations that have some basis in the data. They touch on seminary and ongoing formation programs, on the appointment of bishops and on the vocation shortage.

Father Greeley does an admirable job of giving objective data from which to discern the appropriate responses and actions regarding the future of priestly ministry in the United States.

Along the way, he offers his suggestions, all of which deserve to be considered, though they need to be balanced by other factors that Father Greeley does not consider. There are also many issues regarding multiculturalism among priests and parishioners that have a major impact on priestly ministry today.

There is no simple set of answers, but Father Greeley has contributed an important piece of the framework within which the answers need to be worked out. For that we can only be grateful.

1) Isaiah 66:10-14c
   Psalm 66:1-7, 16, 20
2) Galatians 6:14-18
3) Gospel: Luke 10:1-12, 17-20

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

It gives one pause in reading this week's Gospel to see the Lord — the one to whom we look for protection and care — saying, "Behold, I am sending you like lambs among wolves."

Why? Why would Jesus purposely send his beloved disciples among the wolves? But then, having just emerged from another season of high school and college graduations, I see the same scenario: parents, families, close friends sending their innocents like lambs among wolves — and seemingly pleased to be doing it!

(I remember the words of my daughter: "Mom, if Dad says 'Welcome to the NFL' one more time I'm going to scream.")

Why do we send them? Because it's the next step in their journey through human life. The wolves are out there, and it's time to go.

The notes I wrote on graduation cards to my young friends this year spoke to each one's responsibility to her or his own giftedness, values and faith:

"You are going to do great things," "You will touch many people," "You have a lot going for you," "You will make a difference in the lives of those you meet," "Stand by what you know to be true and right," "Be attentive to the needs of people around you," "You will be a role model for your peers."

Why did I say these things? Because that's who they are and that's who we, their community, need them to be — because they are going among the wolves.

God's abundant harvest awaits. But the laborers are few. Jesus needed his disciples to grow up and take the next step, to continue the work for which he'd prepared them. His advice suggested that they would be OK if they followed it.

It was much the same as what we tell our grads: Carry no money bag, no sack, no sandals (you're good; be yourself — no need for pretense). Go in peace. If people reject your values, stand by those values anyway — but don't hang around. Stay where you find welcome, accept what God will provide there and care for everyone in need.

Show people God's love, and let them know it is theirs to have. And you'll be happy.

'The Notebook' sparks poignant love story

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — "The Notebook," North Carolina-based author Nicholas Sparks' best-selling first novel, is the latest to be translated into a major motion picture.

Like the previous two films, "Message in a Bottle" and "A Walk to Remember," "The Notebook" is an endearing love story.

"'The Notebook' is a very simple story," said Sparks, a Catholic, in a telephone interview. "It's a story about a couple who fell in love, and then stayed in love through thick and thin through the rest of their lives, no matter what life threw at them."

The film opens in a nursing home with an elderly man (James Garner) visiting a fellow resident — an Alzheimer's patient (Gena Rowlands). Reading from a well-worn notebook, he tells her the story of Noah Calhoun and Allie Hamilton, who meet as 17-year-olds in the small town of Seabrook, South Carolina.

Switching between past and present, Garner's character narrates this extraordinary love story throughout the film.

Noah (Ryan Gosling) is instantly attracted to Allie (Rachel McAdams), who is spending the summer in Seabrook. When they meet at a carnival in early June 1939, he sets off to win her heart.

Despite their differences — Allie is the daughter of a refined Southern family and Noah works in a lumberyard — they begin the kind of whirlwind courtship of which romantics dream — laughing, arguing, kissing in the Atlantic surf — and Noah and Allie seem destined for a happy ending.

Allie's parents and World War II step in, however, and drive the young couple apart.

After Allie's mother forbids her to see Noah, the teen-agers argue over whether they are right for each other or if it is just a summer romance.

Before Noah and Allie can reconcile, the Hamiltons return home to Charleston. A heart-wrenching scene shows Allie rushing to the lumberyard to see Noah, only to learn that he is not there. Later, a heartbroken Noah drives into the locked gate of the Hamiltons' now-deserted home.

Allie tries to forget Noah by immersing herself in studies at Sarah Lawrence College. Noah does the same, moving to New York City to find work, then enlisting in the army to fight on the European front in World War II.

Soon after the war, Allie finds herself swept into a relationship with Lon Hammond (James Marsden). As a member of a well-to-do Southern family, Lon, unlike Noah, is quickly accepted by Allie's parents.

Although Noah and Allie each fill their lives with distractions, the other is never far from mind. Just weeks before her wedding to Lon, Allie seeks out Noah.

Seven years after they first met, their passions reunite. Allie is faced with a difficult choice — return to Charleston and marry the man who fits so well into the life she had always known, or stay with the man who has never left her heart.

Relative newcomers to film, Gosling and McAdams create a convincing on-screen chemistry and transition well from their portrayals of naïve 17-year-olds to worldly young adults. Equally captivating are veterans Garner and Rowlands, as well as Joan Allen and Sam Shepard as Allie's mother and Noah's father.

Ultimately, "The Notebook" is about everlasting, unconditional love, says Sparks.

"It's a relevant story, because it's universal," Sparks said. "It's a story that will be timeless a hundred years from now."

Sparks said he believes that dating in the 21st century is not different from the past and that it is realistic for people to look for a love story like Noah and Allie's in their own lives.

"People have changed less than people think they have," he said.

Sparks said his Catholic faith affects his writing in a number of ways.

"It impacts the things I will write and the things I won't write," he said. "I won't write stories of adultery ... or stories I think are wrong — an older man and a young girl, for instance."

"If I do include a love scene, it's very tame," Sparks said. "There is always a sense that the couple is going to end up together."

"Film is an entirely different medium (from novels)," said Sparks. "There are certain things that, although I could try to capture them with words on paper, they're not quite strong enough to resonate as well as any picture could."

The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Bishops approve audits

on the causes and context of the clergy sex abuse crisis. The study is called for by the bishops' policies contained in the 2002 "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People," but the financing has to be approved by the bishops.

"The National Review Board is pleased with the decision to move forward with the audits and to begin further research into the causes and context of these crimes," said Justice Anne M. Burke, interim chairwoman of the review board.

"The message is clear: Children will be safe from harm in the Catholic Church and the bishops and lay people will work together on this," said Burke, an Illinois Appellate Court judge.

The 2004 audits will be the second yearly report on how dioceses and eparchies are complying with policies. The 2003 audits showed 90 percent compliance.

The bishops' Office of Child and Youth Protection has been directed to conduct this year's audits and any future national audits pending the outcome of the policy review.

Praising the vote was Archbishop Harry J. Flynn of St. Paul-Minneapolis, chairman of the sexual abuse ad hoc committee.

The bishops' actions were "a clear indication of our commitment to the charter and to the protection of children and young people," said Archbishop Flynn.

Agreeing was Cardinal Roger M. Mahony of Los Angeles, who had previously supported 2004 audits and said that opponents were a minority among the bishops.

In a separate news release, the cardinal said that the audit vote "indicates that the bishops are serious about continuing the important task of making sure that our church is safe for everyone, especially for children and youth."

Burke said the bishops also agreed to do further studies with the John Jay College of Criminal Justice in New York based upon the data the college collected last year for its massive statistical study on the nature and scope of the crisis during the years 1950-2002.

John Jay researchers, using detailed questionnaires sent to dioceses and eparchies, reported last February that 4,392 priests and deacons were credibly accused of child sex abuse involving 10,667 people during the time period.

Burke said that the review board will meet June 27-28 to chart its future work, make suggestions for the bishops' November policy review and prepare guidelines for new members.

Youth from Saint Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem don safety vests and rubber gloves to join city workers in cleaning up the river and streets surrounding Hanes Park June 9. Other youth passed out flyers throughout the neighborhood informing residents of the effects that trash and storm drainage have on park. This activity was part of the "Works of Mercy Week" organized by the parish's youth ministry for middle school-age youth. Delivering Meals on Wheels, visiting shut-ins, working at the local food kitchen and providing free babysitting were other helpful projects of the week. Several teens from the senior high youth group assisted John Egan, parish youth minister, in organizing and supervising the weeklong activities. Father Thomas Kessler, pastor, celebrated Mass for the group toward the end of the week.

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

In September 1989, I was a television reporter assigned to cover a hurricane. I thought I was going to have an easy couple of days because I was sent to Charleston, S.C. The storm was projected to make landfall farther north. A little wind, a couple of nights in a hotel and I would return home.

But Hurricane Hugo was a monster Category 4 storm. It would hammer both Charleston and me before heading inland.

Around 11:30 p.m., the worst winds of the storm came ashore — 140 miles per hour and I unfortunately found myself out of doors, trying to find my hotel after a failed attempt at doing a live report for my station. I had just crossed Market Street in the heart of Charleston and thought my hotel was a few feet to my right.

The hotel was hard to find because I couldn't see — there was no electricity and it was pitch black. Because of the wind, the rain was falling horizontally and pummeling my eyes shut. No matter what direction I turned, I could not open them wide enough to orient myself. I was helplessly caught up in something that overwhelmed me.

I thought of that terrible night recently when I was introduced to an information campaign of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops called "Renewing the Mind of the Media" — the topic of this year's campaign is pornography and violence in the media.

Thanks to things like cable television and the Internet, America is being overwhelmed with violent and pornographic images. We are surrounded, pounded and shocked to numbness on a daily basis by media-delivered images of sex, sex and more sex. Like the hurricane, the images come at us from every direction — network television presents images of hotel heiress Paris Hilton mockingly seducing a boy; "Sex and the City," a raunchy HBO show, is celebrated as it moves to a more widely available tier of cable TV.

These examples are the rule, not the exception. The development of the Internet and cable television are the two horns on this Satan that have moved pornography from the back alleys of America to its living rooms.

Remember the day of the seedy "adult" bookstore? Cesspools of crime and perversion, they were raided regularly by police who donned rubber gloves to remove videotapes and magazines while leading small-time owners away in handcuffs.

The stores, for the most part are gone. But pornography is far more pervasive than it ever was. Why do we have fewer porn shops but more pornography? Because our country is woven with the wires of cable and the Internet and is now sprayed with wireless access that puts the images of violence and porn at our fingertips on computers and TVs, anytime we get bored with surfing the 150 or so other channels.

How far down this slippery slope have we gone? The touchstone of modern porn is the magazine "Hustler." Larry Flynt, the magazine's publisher, once said in an interview that the kind of images that were appearing in his magazine in 1974 could now be found on network TV.

Whom do we blame? AOL Time-Warner, AT&T and General Motors are a few of the companies that built the cable, Internet and satellite infrastructure that delivers this garbage. Should the CEOs of these corporations, who make millions in profits from porn, be dragged away in handcuffs like the adult bookstore owners?

It's tempting to point a finger of blame, but first maybe we should look at ourselves. How much porn is in our lives because it is just so easy, so convenient and so private? How often do we breeze by designer clothing ads that debase women and young girls?

The "Renewing the Mind of the Media" campaign is a good place to start. Check out the video and other information at www.renewingmedia.org and consider signing the pledge.

No one can stop the force of nature that is a hurricane, and I was lucky the night I was trapped by Hugo to find the shelter of my hotel. Thankfully, there are things we can do to stop the twisted cyclone of violence and pornography that comes at us from every direction. We can stop watching TV shows and avoid offensive, pornographic Web sites. We can write the sponsors and the above-mentioned mega-corporations and tell them to stop spreading smut.

Yes, you may feel like a candle in the wind, but given time a positive, prayerful force that is an example of the Lord's love will prevail. The alternative, to simply live with these sad images that confront us on a daily basis, is simply unacceptable.

Only Christ fulfills humanity's thirst for justice, truth, pope says

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY — Justice, truth and love are desired by all cultures and religions, but only Christ can fully satisfy those needs, said Pope John Paul II.

"All the nations will come and worship before the Lord" to recognize his "righteous acts or rather the interventions throughout history of staunching evil and praising good," the pope said at his June 23 general audience.

Some 8,000 pilgrims from all over the world packed into the Paul VI audience hall, where the weekly audience is held during Rome's hot summer months.

The pope focused his catechesis on Chapter 15 of the Book of Revelation. He said the book's canticle was "beautiful" in its "universal breath of religiousness and hope."

The chapter speaks of the seven last plagues through which "God's fury is accomplished." The pope said the plagues symbolize "a judgment upon evil, oppression and violence in the world."

"For this reason it is also a sign of hope for the righteous" who are "the just of this earth who stand before the risen Lamb of God," he said.

Having conquered the beast, the enemy of God, the chosen ones raise up to the Lord a hymn of praise, the pope said.

"True prayer, in fact, other than asking for something, is also praise, thanks, a blessing, celebration, a profession of faith in the Lord who saves," he said.

Care of refugees — a faith-based response

Guest Column

JOE PURELLO
DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF JUSTICE & PEACE

According to U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees Ruud Lubbers, there are 17.1 million refugees, asylum seekers and internally displaced persons worldwide. Though this number reveals a horrendous level of suffering, it is 22 percent less than three years ago. Part of the decrease is that relative peace has come to once war-torn areas (e.g. Sierra Leone, Liberia, the Balkans) and refugees are returning home.

The decrease may appear as just a statistic in what seems to be an endless, unsolvable problem; yet Lubbers recently stated that the decrease represents for more than 4 million people "the end of long years in exile and the start of a new life with renewed hope for the future."

The theme of World Refugee Day (June 20) was "A Place to Call Home." It honors both the considerable efforts to improve some pressing refugee situations (such as the lengthy ordeal of the Sudanese "Lost Boys," many of whom have found a new home in North Carolina) and challenges wealthier nations that much work is left to be done to aid refugees seeking "a place to call home."

After Sept. 11, 2001, refugee admissions into the United States and other nations slowed dramatically, with U.S. admissions falling from approximately 70,000 per year to fewer than 30,000 per year. This drop is one of Sept. 11's terrible aftereffects, as tens of thousands of refugees in camps throughout the world saw their dreams of finding a new home crushed as the United States and other governments grew more cautious about whom they admitted.

While our government is bound by the 1951 U.N. Convention Relating to the Status of Refugees to assist refugees, the non-profit work of faith communities receives inspiration to care for refugees from a standard higher than any international agreement. The dignity and value of people transcends any governmental policy, for all people are created in the likeness of God.

The prophets of the Hebrew Scriptures call the people of Israel to care for the "anawim" — a Hebrew word meaning the "little ones," or those without power. Traditionally, "anawim" is used to identify "the widow, the orphan and the stranger."

That the Hebrew people were once strangers in foreign lands is used as a teaching point by Moses and the prophets: "You shall treat the alien who resides with you no differently than the natives born among you; have the same love for him as yourself; for you too were once aliens in the land of Egypt." (Leviticus 19:33-34)

The Gospel parable of the Good Samaritan teaches us to reach out in kindness to those not of our land. The Holy Family, seeking safety in Egypt to escape King Herod's wrath, knew firsthand the fear and struggles of those fleeing for their lives and what it meant to depend on the kindness of strangers. In Matthew 25, Jesus says our eternal fate will be determined by how we treat those who suffer — "as you do to these little ones [anawim] you do unto me."

The Catholic Church resettles nearly one-fourth of all refugees admitted to the United States each year, a ministry offered regardless of the race, nationality or religion of the refugee. The Refugee Resettlement Office (RRO) of Catholic Social Services is the largest provider of refugee resettlement services in the area served by the Diocese of Charlotte.

Over the past two years, the RRO has resettled more than 300 Montagnard refugees from Vietnam. This summer, the RRO is preparing to receive more than 100 Hmong refugees from Laos and an additional 110 Bantu refugees from Somalia (51 Bantu refugees have already arrived). Some of these refugees have only known life in camps circled by barbed wire, even raising families in confinement.

Please remember refugees in your prayers, and especially consider prayers for the Montagnard, Hmong and Bantu refugees currently resettling in our diocese. May our prayers help us to see in the struggles of our refugee brothers and sisters the struggles of the Holy Family fleeing to Egypt.

WANT TO HELP?

In addition to your prayers, newcomers to our diocese will need different types of assistance: furniture, household items, food vouchers, English language training and employment opportunities that offer benefits. Those interested in making financial or other types of donations, or willing to offer volunteer assistance, please contact the Refugee Resettlement Office at (704) 370-3283 or (704) 370-3277.

The crowning of Mary

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. A local Catholic high school is embroiled over a May crowning that some parents want to observe with the students. The head of the religion department objects that this ceremony started in the Middle Ages to entice nonbelievers into adoration of Mary and that this ritual was denounced at Vatican Council II.

What is the church's position? Is there a reason not to have them? (New York)

A. I realize this response will not reach you during May, but I have no idea why this woman would think Vatican II "denounced" May crowning ceremonies. Just the opposite. If it is a form of devotion to the mother of Christ that enhances honor for him, the rite is encouraged.

The Council of Ephesus (431) defended the teaching that Mary is the Mother of God, not first to honor Mary but to clarify Catholic belief that Jesus is one (divine) person with two natures, human and divine.

Following this council, Catholic honor of Mary increased greatly, a fact which the church generally saw as fulfilling her words in the Magnificat, "From now on will all ages call me blessed; the Mighty One has done great things for me, and holy is his name."

Through the centuries certain forms of devotion to Our Lady tended to cloud the vital distinction between her role and the role of her Son. Some prayers appeared, for example, seeming to place her on an equal footing with Jesus as redeemer of the world.

So it is true that Vatican II told theologians and preachers to be alert to treat correctly the unique dignity of the Mother of God. They should, said the council, "equally avoid the falsity of exaggeration on the one hand, and the excess of narrow-mindedness on the other" (Constitution on the Church, No. 67).

It insists, however, that traditional practices and exercises of devotion toward her be treasured, as approved by the church through the centuries, since "Mary shines forth on earth ... as a sign of sure hope and solace for the pilgrim people of God" (No. 68).

If there's a problem with Mary being called, or crowned as, queen, that too is unfounded.

The concept of Mary as Queen Mother, a prestigious title often given to the mother of a king in ancient times to signify her particular influence with her son, has good scriptural and traditional roots. (See, for example, Solomon and his mother Bathsheba.)

The church, of course, has a feast of the Queenship of Mary, celebrated now on Aug. 22.

There is no need, therefore, to see May crownings as anything more than a legitimate form of paraliturgical prayer, a way of appropriately honoring the mother of Jesus.

Almost any devotions, from the Stations of the Cross to novenas, can be abused, distorted or misunderstood. But that is only a reason to be thoughtful and careful that these celebrations fit within authentic Catholic tradition and teaching. It is not a reason to forbid them.

Moment shared with bishop a blessing

Guest Column

VERONICA ANTHONY
GUEST COLUMNIST

I am a parishioner of St. John Baptist de La Salle Church in North Wilkesboro and have been for more than three decades. I attended the ordination of Bishop Peter J. Jugis in Charlotte in October 2003, and our vicariate Mass in Boone with the bishop in November 2003. Both the ordination and vicariate Masses were spiritually uplifting experiences for me and they strengthened my faith in the Catholic Church.

I requested a few minutes after the vicariate Mass to speak to the bishop, and he very kindly talked to me for several minutes. I told him about my mom, Razia Anthony, who converted from Islam to Catholicism and sacrificed a lot for her faith. My mom is ailing and is in a nursing home, and I requested the bishop pray for her. He listened very attentively and asked for her name and assured me of his prayers.

After a confirmation Mass at St. John Baptist de La Salle Church June 9, 2004, I saw Bishop Jugis and he asked me about my mom. I do not have the words to express my happiness and pleasant surprise that the bishop remembered her, despite the fact that he meets thousands of people in the Diocese of Charlotte.

After the confirmation reception, Bishop Jugis visited my mom at the nursing home in Wilkesboro. He prayed the rosary and gave her the most holy blessing. I deeply appreciate that Bishop Jugis took time from his busy schedule to make an unplanned visit to bless my mom — we are very fortunate to have had this unique experience. The director of nursing commented that this was the first time a bishop had visited the nursing home.

I later shared my experience with parishioners of St. John Baptist de La Salle Church before the Saturday Mass. They thanked me for narrarating this story; one parishioner commented that it renewed his faith in the Diocese of Charlotte.

I regretted not having a camera to capture the image of the bishop blessing my 84-year-old mother, but I am sure the spiritual image, as well as Bishop Jugis' piety, meekness, humility and simplicity, will interminably be embedded in my mind. I will never forget Bishop Jugis and will always remember him in my prayers.

God bless Bishop Jugis, now and always.

widow; the other team stained and sealed a wheelchair ramp and installed a new roof on the home of an 84-year-old widow.

The group's efforts were inspired by the youth of St. Aloysius Church, who have made mission trips for the past five summers. The adult group wanted to stay in North Carolina, and Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William Church in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary Church in Hayesville, recommended the Hinton Rural Life Center in Hayesville.

A mission agency of the United Methodist Church, the center is a resource and advocate for rural and smaller membership churches in the Southeast. For 10 weeks of the summer, adult and youth groups come to the center to repair 80 to 90 houses in Clay and Cherokee counties in North Carolina and Union Towns County in Tennessee.

The Office of Economic Opportunity, a program of the diocesan Catholic Social Services' Office of Justice and Peace, partners with the center on a number of grants and projects.

The St. Aloysius Church group became more aware of the economic problems in western North Carolina. During the trip, they met with Joan Furst, program director of the Office of Economic Opportunity; Father Kloster; and a center representative and learned about the collaborative efforts of the above agencies and projects undertaken in some of the poorest counties of North Carolina.

The group shared their experiences during a prayer reflection on the last workday of the trip. Many felt they had left a loving legacy in the homes that were rehabilitated and the lives of their inhabitants.

"I got so much more out of this week than I gave," said parishioner Carol Rasmussen.

"It was a privilege to be literally the hands, feet and eyes of Jesus in service to others," said parishioner Mark Sinclair.

"I believe that these mission trips are a wonderful opportunity for urban Catholics in our diocese to see what the Catholic Church is doing in Appalachia," said Furst.

"We hope that Catholics from around the diocese will continue to visit this beautiful region and volunteer their time serving others," she said. "There is much to be done in these poverty stricken counties and the volunteers' hours are so very much appreciated by the people out here."

Pictured above are: Matthew McDonald, Phillip Corsi, Miles Dunning, Max Karaffa and Peter McAnulty. The Ad Altare Dei (to the altar of God) program, developed by the National Catholic Committee on Scouting, helps Catholic Scouts develop a fully Christian way of life in a faith community. Dick McDonald, adult Scout leader and parishioner at St. Aloysius Church, served as counselor for the program that is organized in chapters based on the seven sacraments. Rev. Mr. James Johnson, diocesan Scout chaplain, presented the emblems to the scouts. A special reception honoring this achievement was held at St. Aloysius Church following the Mass.

'STARVIN' FOR JUSTICE'

Marianist Brother Brian Halderman demonstrates against capital punishment in front of the Supreme Court building July 1. Brother Halderman and 30 other abolitionists participated in the annual "Starvin' for Justice '04" fast and vigil.

Marianist brother protests death penalty with fast at Supreme Court

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Just as "Mary stood at the cross as Christ was killed in a state-sanctioned execution," Brother Brian Halderman said he was at the Supreme Court to stand with those on death row who face what he feels is a violent and unjust death.

"The death penalty creates more victims," said the Marianist brother June 30, after he had begun a four-day fast in front of the court to protest the death penalty.

Brother Halderman, along with about 30 other abolitionists, began the annual fast and vigil, "Starvin' for Justice '04," with songs, prayer and sharing of stories at midnight June 29.

The abolitionists carried large signs with quotes from former Supreme Court justices, and handed out educational pamphlets. They also were selling ball caps and T-shirts and talking with hundreds of Washington residents and tourists as they passed by the Supreme Court.

Brother Halderman said he was "asking people, 'Hey, look at this for yourself,'" because he thinks too often news accounts present a sterilized version of executions.

The Abolitionist Action Committee organized the vigil in association with other sponsoring groups, including Journey of Hope, an organization founded by relatives of murder victims who oppose the death penalty.

Brother Halderman, a board member of Journey of Hope, began protesting the death penalty while he was a student at the University of Dayton after a "powerful experience" he had at a vigil outside an Ohio penitentiary on the eve of an execution.

He counts the inspiration of Sister Helen Prejean, a Sister of St. Joseph of Medaille and prominent death-penalty opponent, as one of his reasons for joining the Society of Mary and for opposing capital punishment.

People's reactions to the fasters were varied, Brother Halderman said. "Some people pat you on the back and stop and thank you." As for those in favor of the death penalty who stopped to talk, he said, "It's good that people want to debate."

He said his goal is to educate people and let them know that he believes the death penalty is a violent solution that contributes to evil in the world.

The dates of the vigil, June 29-July 2, mark the anniversaries of two landmark Supreme Court cases, in 1974 and 1976, that required states to rewrite their death penalty laws and resulted in sentence reductions for about 600 death-row inmates.

Jewish leaders fear anti-Semitism among Hispanic immigrants

ROME (CNS) — U.S. Jewish leaders met with Vatican officials in late June to raise what they consider a growing problem: anti-Semitism among Hispanic immigrants to the United States.

According to surveys, new Hispanic arrivals in the United States are "44 percent infected" with anti-Semitic attitudes, reflecting lower sensitivity to the problem throughout their Latin American countries of origin, said Abraham Foxman, national director of the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League.

The rate of anti-Semitism among the immigrants is more than twice that of U.S.-born Hispanics, Foxman said. A high percentage of the immigrants believe the Jews were responsible for Christ's death, he said.

"For us, this is very important, because the Hispanic community is growing in the United States. And at the end of the day that will also have an impact on the Catholic Church," Foxman said.

Foxman and other ADL leaders spoke with reporters after meeting with Vatican officials. Foxman said he believes anti-Semitism is more prevalent in Latin America in part because of poverty and lack of education, and in part because the church hasn't promoted its recent pronouncements on Judaism as effectively as it could.

Because the vast majority of Hispanics coming into the United States are Catholic, the ADL believes the church can use its leverage to sensitize these communities to the strong teaching against anti-Semitism that has come out of the Vatican over the last 40 years.

The Jewish leaders think a particular teaching moment in Latin America may be offered by next year's 40th anniversary of the landmark decree of the Second Vatican Council, "Nostra Aetate," which condemned all forms of anti-Semitism and affirmed the continuing validity of God's covenant with the Jews.

FROM THE VATICAN

Pope praises transfer of power in Iraq, expresses hope for peace

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II praised the transfer of power to an interim government in Iraq and expressed hope that peace, freedom and prosperity would soon come to the nation.

The message came in a telegram sent on behalf of the pope by the Vatican's secretary of state, Cardinal Angelo Sodano. It was addressed to Iraq's new president, Ghazi al-Yawer.

"On the happy occasion of the transfer of power to the interim government of the state of Iraq, the Holy Father sends his cordial greetings to your excellency and to the citizens of your country," the telegram said.

The pope said that, "as a new chapter begins in the life of the nation," he was praying that "the hopes of the Iraqi people for peace, freedom and prosperity will soon be fulfilled."

The U.S.-led coalition government formally handed over power June 28 to an interim government with limited powers led by Prime Minister Iyad Allawi. Elections slated for January will install a transitional government charged with drawing up a constitution before full elections are held by the end of next year.

As the new caretaker government and the president take up their offices, the pope said, "the Catholic Church throughout the world offers you every support and encouragement in the task of building a new Iraq."

He said he was "confident that all religious groups within the country will be able to make their voices be heard and to play their rightful part in forging a new society committed to true freedom of conscience, to justice for all and to peaceful dialogue."

Summer days: No signs of slowdown as pope prepares for vacation

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II may have been packing his bags for a summer vacation, but events at the Vatican showed no sign of winding down in late June and early July.

From ecumenical encounters to liturgical celebrations, from political pronouncements to pastoral messages, the Vatican was bubbling over with activity.

Passing through the Vatican were groups of U.S. bishops, Jewish leaders, the Spanish prime minister, a Spanish royal couple, the Maltese president and others.

The pope welcomed Ecumenical Orthodox Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople to the Vatican, where the two professed the faith and shared a sermon during a liturgy for the distribution of palliums to new archbishops.

Meanwhile, the Vatican released a papal letter on sports, a message on globalization, a message on the family and massive documentation from the Vatican's World War II archives. It also issued an unusual public complaint about the arrest of bishops in China.

At the Vatican Observatory, some 13 scientific and theological experts gathered for a major conference on evolution. Creationism didn't even come up; these experts view religion and science as complementary, not rivals, and were looking for a balance between scientific discoveries and metaphysics.

The pope was to head for a two-week stay in northern Italy's Aosta Valley on July 5. No public activities are planned, and no stream of visitors will be visiting his wood-and-stone chalet.

Then the pope returns to his summer villa at Castel Gandolfo until the end of September. In Castel Gandolfo, aides try to keep his audiences to a minimum, but it's not unusual for the pope to meet with three or four sets of people in a single morning.

A SAINT YOU SHOULD KNOW

Blessed Kateri Tekakwitha (1656-1680) was the first person born in North America to be beatified. The daughter of a Christian Algonquin woman, Kateri was moved by the words of missionaries and at age 19 converted to Christianity. She was always in danger, for her conversion and holy life created great opposition. For three years she grew in holiness giving herself totally to God in long hours of prayer, charity and strenuous penance. She practiced extremely severe fasting as penance for the conversion of her nation. She died the afternoon before Holy Thursday and was beatified in 1980. Her feast day is July 14.

Teen's artwork wins Catholic Daughters education contest

ASHEVILLE — Michael Keleher, a 13-year-old parishioner of St. Joan of Arc Church in Asheville, knows how to let freedom ring.

In May, Michael's pencil-drawn artwork won first place on both the local and state levels for "Let Freedom Ring," a theme of the Catholic Daughters of the Americas Education Contest. Court St. Joan of Arc No. 2471 sponsored the contest on the local level.

"He really did capture the essence of the theme," said G.G. Hampton, vice regent and education coordinator of Court No. 2471. "You can tell he put a lot of thought and effort into it."

The court awarded Michael $25 for winning the local contest. Marge Thomas, state secretary for the Catholic Daughters, presented Michael with a certificate for winning the state competition.

Michael's artwork has been submitted for the national contest. If he wins, he will receive a $100 prize.

"This young man has a gift, and I hope he'll pursue it," said Hampton. "Maybe by being in and winning this contest, he'll be encouraged to do so."

SOUL FOOD

Catholic women teach children about Eucharist, sacraments at retreat

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Think "summer" and "food" and most people probably picture hot dogs, watermelon and ice cream cones. The sons and daughters of members of the Charlotte Catholic Women's Group (CCWG), however, were thinking about food for the soul, specifically the Eucharist, during a retreat June 24.

"The Eucharist is the center of our faith," said Mary Summa, president of the CCWG. "We start there to teach the other sacraments."

Margaret Gustafson, chair of the retreat, wrote the entire program, which linked the biblical events of the Hebrews receiving manna in the desert to the Last Supper.

The mothers of CCWG put new twists on old games to teach the children about the Ten Commandments and the sacraments, especially the Eucharist. They participated in races, hopscotch and a "fill-in-the-blank" Ten Commandments relay.

In addition to the physical activities, the children learned about the origins of the Eucharist by making "manna" and "pots" out of clay.

"Manna is the pre-figuration for the parable of the Loaves and Fishes and Christ's statement 'whoever eats this bread will live forever' in the Gospel of John," said Summa.

Also on hand to offer spiritual guidance and the sacrament of reconciliation were Father Paul Moreau and Father Eamonn Shelly, members of the Legionaries of Christ. CCWG has been associated with Legionaries of Christ priests since the group's inception in 2000. The priests visit monthly to provide catechesis and spiritual direction to the members of CCWG.

"We're teaching the children to know and love Christ and how to use their knowledge to serve Christ," said Summa.

Black Catholics gather for interdiocesan conference

become more involved in their parishes and diocesan programs.

The conference, which drew 250 black Catholics from the dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh, featured keynote addresses, workshops, Mass and other liturgical activities.

Keynote speaker Nancy J. Mays, an intern with the Catholic Campaign for Human Development in the Archdiocese of Cincinnati, said it is the right and responsibility of black Catholics to "make sure our black Catholic culture is present in our churches."

"Our faith lies in the cotton fields, picket lines, sit-ins and at home with our mothers and fathers," said Mays, echoing the theme of the conference, "Rooted in Faith — Transformed by the Spirit — Empowered for Ministry."

Mays, who also works with the archdiocesan offices of youth ministry and African American ministry, spoke of "transformation in the midst of hardship."

"Transformation of the Spirit tells us we must not only be rooted in the faith but be ready to move when God says move.'"

"Young Catholic adults need to affirm themselves as young people in the Catholic Church, so that they will not only stay in the church, but take leadership in the church," said Father Charles Smith, administrator of St. Rita Church in Indianapolis, who, with his brother, Father Chester Smith, conducted a workshop on building a church of leaders and empowering Catholics of all ages to active church leadership, parish life and stewardship.

"We must take ownership in the church and feel good about who we are," said Father Charles Smith.

Msgr. Raymond G. East, director of the Office of Black Catholics in Washington, D.C., led an afternoon workshop addressing the issue of "Incorporating your Culture and Traditions into the Liturgy."

"Culture was the first thing to be eliminated when Africans were brought to America," he said. "Is culture something to be checked at the door when you come to worship?"

Msgr. East encouraged the participants to incorporate their cultures into the Catholic liturgy through language, dress and music.

"Merging is good, but we've lost our cultural identity and tradition and (the Catholic Church) has lost people because of it," said Lettie W. Polite, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville. Polite was one of 12 individuals who received a recognition award for outstanding contributions to black Catholics in the dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh.

The conference emphasized how black Catholics can be a more integral part of the Catholic Church.

"The Catholic Church has to be inclusive in her evangelization and in her personnel and programs," said Msgr. Thomas P. Hadden, vicar for African Americans in the African Ancestry Ministry of the Diocese of Raleigh. Msgr. Hadden was also a recognition award recipient.

"The church has to present an inviting appearance to people seeking a church home," he said.

"It's nice to see so many black Catholics in the state of North Carolina — from both the dioceses — put on a conference together," said Veronica Sartor, a parishioner of the Basilica of St. Lawrence.

"All God needs from us is a willing spirit," said Mays. "As long as we say 'yes,' he will always transform us."

Three sisters commemorate milestones in ministerial service

Jubilee ceremony held at St. Gabriel Church

CHARLOTTE — Three Sisters of Mercy recently celebrated milestones as women religious.

Mercy Sisters Mary Louise Wiesenforth, Bessie McCarthy and Patricia Ann Pepitone celebrated their respective platinum (70), golden (50) and silver (25) jubilees at St. Gabriel Church June 26.

Born Mary Ann Wiesenforth in Troy, N.Y, in 1913, Sister Wiesenforth decided upon finishing high school that she wanted to become a sister to serve God.

"I kept trying to tell myself I didn't have a call," she said. "It was hard to think that I wouldn't have my own family."

After listening to what seemed to be a persistent call from God, Sister Wiesenforth said the most profound moment of her life was her profession of vows Feb. 3, 1939.

She began teaching in parochial schools in North Carolina in the early 1940s until she was assigned to help form a community of sisters in Guam in October 1946. Within a year of arriving, Sister Wiesenforth, serving as director of postulants and novices, helped receive 10 young women as postulants and had 10 more applicants waiting to be received as Sisters of Mercy. She also taught religion, church history and home economics.

She returned to the convent in Belmont 19 years later, where she served as principal of Sacred Heart Elementary School.

Sister Wiesenforth returned to Guam for her 50th anniversary in 1996. She is now retired.

Born Bessie Florence McCarthy in Newport News, N.J, in 1933, Sister McCarthy entered the Sisters of Mercy in August 1953. While earning nursing degrees in the 1960s, she was known as Sister Mary Camillus. Following Vatican II, she became known as "Sister Bessie."

She has spent 50 years with her heart dedicated to helping the poor, sick and uneducated. She's hoping to learn Spanish with the possibility of ministering in a Spanish-speaking country.

Born in Jamaica, N.Y., in 1955, Sister Pepitone heard God's call while attending Sacred Heart College with the Sisters of Mercy.

"The idea gnawed at me and when I would lean toward entering [the convent], it gave me a sense of peace," she said.

She entered the Sisters of Mercy in August 1977 and currently serves as principal of St. John the Evangelist School in Pensacola, Fla. She gives workshops on discipline and teacher observation, oversees a popular children's choir and is one of the first five principals in Florida to be involved in the Opportunity Scholarship Program.

Teens travel to Georgia for Catholic HEART workcamp

GREENSBORO — While some teen-agers went on vacation, a group of Greensboro teens spent a week of their summer sleeping on the floor and helping the needy.

Nineteen youths from St. Pius X Church participated in a Catholic HEART Workcamp in Atlanta, Ga., June 6-12. The workcamps, which are held in dioceses around the United States, were established to offer service projects and evangelical programs for Catholic youth, and typically involve helping improve low-income families, children and the elderly within the host diocese.

The St. Pius X group helped raise the money to attend the workcamp by offering carwashes and babysitting services and assisting at parish events.

Projects during the workcamp included painting, yard work, home maintenance, helping at daycare centers for low-income families and distributing food to the needy. In the evenings, the youth attended programs featuring personal testimonies, motivational speakers and skits to inspire them in their efforts.

Many in the group felt the week was a positive, faith-filled and community-building experience.

Maryland who participated in Catholic HEART Workcamp 2004 in Charlotte June 27-July 2. Charlotte Catholic High School served as one of the 24 Catholic HEART (Helping Everyone Attain Repairs Today) camps throughout the United States and Jamaica.

Based in Orlando, Fla., the summer camps are in more than 20 states with between 300 and 500 teens at each camp. The camps offer service projects for Catholic youths by working with local agencies in needy neighborhoods.

This was the fifth year the Diocese of Charlotte hosted a camp. Service projects around Charlotte included working with agencies such as Holy Angels, House of Mercy, Catherine's House, Love Inc., Room at the Inn and Catholic Social Services, among others.

Evenings were filled with sharing, prayer, skits, games and fun.

At Charlotte Catholic, the students were divided into 58 teams that painted, built wheelchair ramps, and assisted with daycare and yard work, among other duties.

At Holy Angels, a nonprofit organization providing services for child and adult residents with varying degrees of mental retardation, the 12 youths, ages 15-17, and two adults spent the week offering much-needed manual labor; primarily, emptying storage buildings to prepare for upcoming construction around the facility.

"They've been extremely helpful in getting that done," said Mercy Sister Nancy Nance, community relations director for Holy Angels. "They're an awesome group with a lot of energy."

"What we did in three days saved them important time with the residents," said Kristen Espinoza, 15, from Woodbridge, Va. "I've had so much fun. The hard work really pays off."

Sister Nance said it's a common misconception that teen-agers are lazy and self-centered. "For them to come in and do hard labor is very impressive," she said.

The group also provided classroom help by interacting with the residents, some of whom have physical disabilities and are medically fragile. Sister Nance said the residents benefited from having personal contact with the teen-agers.

"I was at first discomforted and insecure (around the residents), but I knew God wanted me to be there," said Erin French, 15, from Woodbridge. "It was a worthwhile experience. I realized they're like me, but we have different needs."

"They have special talents like anyone else," said Tom Bennington, 14, from Annapolis, Md. "I wish we had more time with them."

"The residents gave me a better appreciation for life, and not to take things for granted," said Kristen.

Sister Nance said the group shared their experiences during lunch hours. "They're a very spiritually-based group," she said.

"The experience has exceeded my expectations," said Kristen.

"I thought this would be a good way to spend my summer vacation," said Erin. "It definitely helped my relationship with God."

College students spread God's love in Costa Rica

BY JULIE OSTERGAARD
SPECIAL TO THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

ALAJUELITA, Costa Rica — While many college students relaxed at home for the Christmas holidays, several collegians from the Diocese of Charlotte ventured to make a difference in Costa Rica.

Eleven students from Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem helped refurbish and improve the neglected Tejarcillos Elementary School Jan. 2-11. The school serves more than 1,000 children of undocumented immigrants to the Central American country.

The trip was conceived by Catholic students at Wake Forest University who wanted an international service trip with a Catholic flavor. Participating students were required to help raise funds for the trip and ask 30 people to pray for them while away. A Catholic Relief Services' Operation Rice Bowl mini-grant from the diocesan Office of Justice and Peace helped purchase supplies.

Operation Rice Bowl is the Lenten program of Catholic Relief Services.

Accompanying the students were their Catholic campus ministers, Conventional Franciscan Father Jude DeAngelo and Julie Ostergaard, along with Karen Anderson, a parishioner of Our Lady of Mercy Church in Winston-Salem.

Alcoholism, domestic violence and family abandonment are common among Alajuelita's population of 10,000, which consists mostly of undocumented immigrants from Nicaragua. Homes in the area are mainly shacks of corrugated metal and scraps.

"I saw just a glimpse of how much poverty and suffering there is in the world and how easy, and how much fun, it is to put a smile on so many people's faces," said sophomore Will Brown.

The students learned that Nicaraguans are largely looked down upon by the Costa Rican population. They felt that working at the school was a good way to make a positive difference in the immigrant children's lives.

Julie Ostergaard, a Catholic campus minister at Wake Forest University in Winston-Salem, holds a child during the ministry's mission trip to Costa Rica.

"There were graffiti-riddled bathrooms where the sanitary conditions were unfathomable," said Jim Fitzpatrick, who graduated from Wake Forest University in May. "Sinks did not function, toilets were broken, gutters were filled with dirt and trash. The walls looked like they hadn't been painted in decades."

"It was our goal to do what we could for this school," he said.

Despite the daunting task, Fitzpatrick said no one in the group complained about the work.

The students cleaned and painted three sets of bathrooms and walls, cleaned out gutters and cut grass.

"We left the school looking nothing like the place we entered," said Fitzpatrick.

The true testament to their work, he said, was the principal's reaction.

"As she looked around at the work we had done, she was astonished," said Fitzpatrick. "Unable to contain her emotions, she cried."

In addition to fixing up the school, the college students colored, painted and played soccer with the children on an uneven field called los Pinos ("the Pines").

Pedro, the first child encountered on the walk from Tejarcillos to los Pinos, led the group to the central area in the Verbana Community, where kids burst out of their shacks to play soccer.

"I don't know exactly how it will affect my future plans, but that trip definitely planted a seed in the back of my mind," said Brown. "I will never forget those kids."

Evenings on the trip were spent in prayer, reflection and celebrating the Eucharist.

"Those things, coupled with the experiences at the school and with the kids, made me feel so intimate with God," said Fitzpatrick. "I have never felt more intimate with God than during those 10 days."

Wake Forest's Catholic Campus Ministry plans to return to Costa Rica with another group of students in January 2005.

"There are so many people out there that need help. It can get overwhelming at times when you think about how much poverty is actually out there," said Fitzpatrick. "Those kids in Tejarcillos were not looking for money, but they need help. They need someone to believe in them, to love them, to let them know that they are special."

"I never thought I would find an abundance of love in Alajuelita, Costa Rica, but that is exactly what I found," he said. "Love opened my eyes and my heart."

BECOMING FAITHFUL SERVANTS OF CHRIST

Youths, young adults immersed in Catholic leadership institute

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — The Catholic leaders of tomorrow spent an intense week of work and worship at the "Faithful Servant" retreat held at Queens University June 20-25.

Fifty-eight youths, young adults and adults from the dioceses of Charlotte, Raleigh and Johnson City, Tenn. participated in the annual retreat, which was sponsored by the dioceses of Charlotte and Raleigh.

"'Faithful Servant' is an institute blending Catholic theology and spirituality with universal, secular leadership skills," said Paul Kotlowski, director of diocesan youth ministry.

The retreat is designed "to provide an opportunity to develop leadership skills through an intense week of experiential learning within the context of Christian community," Kotlowski said.

The Diocese of Charlotte is a pioneer in the creation of the weeklong leadership conference, said Kotlowski. The conference originated as the Christian Leadership Institute about 27 years ago.

Participants were divided into seven small "communities" that focused on skills such as organization, communication, leadership styles, group dynamics, planning, diversity training and consensus seeking.

Members then exercised those skills through the planning of Christian experiences for the large group, Kotlowski said.

"The leadership qualities workshops were amazing," said David Robertson, a rising junior at North Durham High School and a parishioner of St. Matthew Church in Durham. "I learned so much to take back to my youth group."

"Faithful Servant" is rooted in being Eucharist, said Kotlowski.

"At the center of the week stands a theological session on the body of Christ," he said. "Just as the Eucharist stands at the center of our lives as Catholic Christians."

"I grew closer to Christ and learned how to become a better leader in ministry," said Jonathan Bradburn, a rising junior at Science Hill High School and a parishioner of St. Mary Church, both in Johnson City, Tenn.

Kotlowski said the purpose of the retreat is "to assist young people in realizing the beauty, rights and responsibilities of their baptism."

"It is also constructed to equip them with skills that will enhance the quality of their lives when they utilize them," he said.

"Even though everyone is from different places, in coming together, we are whole and stronger," said Kiersten Shelton, a rising senior at University of North Carolina-Charlotte and a parishioner of St. Thomas Aquinas Church.

The story of four chaplains who died together in World War II

REVIEWED BY MAUREEN E. DALY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

"No Greater Glory" is the story of four World War II U.S. Army chaplains who died together when their troop ship sank in the freezing North Atlantic.

The Dorchester, a U.S. Army troop ship, was carrying 900 men to Greenland from Nova Scotia when it was torpedoed by a German U-boat near midnight on Feb. 3, 1943. More than 600 men died that night — some from wounds but most from drowning or freezing in the cold, rough seas.

Many of the survivors witnessed the calm bravery of the four chaplains — Catholic, Methodist, Dutch Reformed and Jewish — who helped others to safety and were last seen standing together and praying as the ship went down.

The four men came to symbolize interfaith understanding, selflessness and heroism. They were commemorated on a postage stamp issued shortly after their deaths, while the war was still going on. It read: "These immortal chaplains: Interfaith in action."

Dan Kurzman, former foreign correspondent for The Washington Post, interviewed dozens of witnesses who saw what happened that night as well as friends and families of the four chaplains.

He brings alive the truly admirable qualities of these four men. All four were educated and gifted; they had spent years preparing for their professions and then years in ministry, with little financial reward. They had bunked together only a short time, but the character that showed when they were in crisis was the result of a lifetime of preparation.

The four immortal chaplains were a Methodist minister, the Rev. George Lansing Fox, 41, from Gilman, Vt.; Rabbi Alexander Goode, 31, of York, Pa.; a Dutch Reformed minister, the Rev. Clark Poling, 32, from Schenectady N.Y.; and a Catholic priest, Father John Washington, 33, of Kearney, N.J. The rabbi and the two ministers were all happily married with children. Father Washington, a gifted musician, was close to his recently widowed mother. He was one of three sons she lost in the war. She never recovered from her grief over his death.

The book also includes photos of the four chaplains and survivors, the U.S. and German ships, the postage stamp and church stained-glass windows memorializing the men. Most striking is a photo of a reconciliation ceremony between German and American veterans who survived that night. The now elderly survivors were brought together in 2000 by the Immortal Chaplains Foundation, a fitting end to an inspiring story.

SUNDAY SCRIPTURE READINGS: JULY 18, 2004

July 18, Sixteenth Sunday of Ordinary Time

Cycle B Readings.
1) Genesis 18:1-10a
Psalm 15:2-5
2) Colossians 1:24-28
3) Gospel: Luke 10:38-42

BY JEFF HENSELY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I've been blessed to know people who possessed a tremendous sense of hospitality and generosity, like that displayed by Abraham in the Genesis reading.

Scripture doesn't tell us why Abraham begged the three strangers passing by to stop so he could refresh them. But they acquiesced and one guest, identified in the passage collectively as God, offers a prophecy.

In a year, when he passes that way again, Sarah will have a child. This is an impossibility in the eyes of men, but very much possible if your guest and prophet happens to be God himself.

So have the rules changed in the Mary and Martha story? Is Martha doing wrong by doing right; Mary doing right by neglecting the duties of hospitality? No, it's a matter of timing, discernment and recognizing who the guest is. Mary, who takes "the better part," sitting at Jesus' feet, listening to him, basking in his presence, is doing the right thing at the right time.

Perhaps that's why the Colossians reading points us to the centrality of Jesus. Paul speaks of his suffering for Christ on behalf of his body, the church, and makes it clear how important, how central, Jesus and his incarnation are.

Martha missed out on an opportunity to attend to Jesus, God's Word made flesh, instead of cooking for him.

Perhaps the next time we entertain guests, we'll get more out of their visit if we use at least part of our time to seek out the presence of Jesus in them. Perhaps it was recognizing and honoring that divine presence in the wanderers that moved Abraham to his great acts of hospitality in the first place.

'Fahrenheit 9/11' generates heat, little light

BY DAVID DiCERTI
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — Michael Moore's documentary "Fahrenheit 9/11" is a scathing indictment of the Bush administration's domestic and international policies leading up to and following the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001.

Unabashedly biased in its inflammatory assertions, the controversial film is certain to provoke strong reactions from bashers and backers alike of President George W. Bush.

However, in mounting such a one-sided ad hominem attack, director Moore walks a perilous line between investigative journalism and partisan propaganda. And, though artfully packaged, as a political polemic the case made by Moore ultimately falls short of convincing.

The terrain covered by "Fahrenheit 9/11" is as sprawling as it is contentious. The film revisits the events surrounding the hotly disputed presidential election of 2000, then rushes into a relentless pillorying of Bush, who is caricatured throughout as a lazy, incompetent buffoon.

Moore's livid litany consists mainly of warmed-over accusations, leading him to investigate territory already charted in exposes by Bush insiders like Richard Clarke and Paul O'Neill. While Moore lands some body blows on Bush, his rant offers little in the way of new information or stop-the-presses revelations.

In a nutshell, Moore contends that Bush sought to capitalize on Sept. 11 by fanning the flames of fear in order to stifle dissent and hoodwink the American public into an immoral war with Iraq. Moore also rehashes allegations that Bush both profited from and was influenced by his family's financial ties to prominent Saudi oil sheiks, including members of the ultra-wealthy bin Laden clan.

The film soon loses focus, unraveling into a shapeless and discursive diatribe that goes everywhere and nowhere. The accompanying analysis is superficial at best. Its title notwithstanding, while the film has certainly generated much heat, it provides little light.

Moore hits viewers over the head with an angry screed of statistics, jettisoning any pretense of impartiality. Nowhere is this lack of objectivity more evident than in his choice of interviewees, all of whom are in lockstep agreement with the film's overriding thesis. Such an unbalanced approach mutes the credibility of his arguments, a pitfall that could have been avoided by a more evenhanded inclusion of voices from both sides of the political divide.

The film unfairly subscribes to a blame-Bush-for-everything attitude that fails to take into account wider geopolitical realities, including the foreign-policy missteps of previous administrations.

Moore buttresses his version of the story with carefully selected images and sound bites — strung together without context or, in some cases, even sources — which conveniently support his oversimplified conspiracy theories, resulting in a misleading, manipulative and at times self-contradicting interpretation of facts.

Viewers will most likely leave with the same political baggage that they came in with. To critics of Bush, Moore's hoop-jumping is simply preaching to the choir. However, the question remains: Will the choir loft become more crowded as a result?

From a filmmaker with his evident passion and satirical skill, one would have expected more.

Three diocesan principals embark on new journeys

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — The principals of three diocesan Catholic schools have bid farewell to their students, faculty and staff as they seek new challenges and opportunities.

Bob Wehde, principal of Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point, left the post to become principal of Bishop Kelly High School in Boise, Idaho, the state's only Catholic high school.

Boise will be a homecoming of sorts, as Wehde earned his master's degree from Idaho State University and an educational specialist doctorate from University of Idaho.

Wehde said the greatest asset to his job as principal was "the people that I was blessed with, to work with supporting parents, parishioners and the loving students and families of Immaculate Heart of Mary."

As principal of Immaculate Heart of Mary, Wehde initiated a collaborated curriculum for the Triad Area Catholic Schools.

"Bob left his mark here, even after only one year with the diocese," said Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools.

Walt Przygocki, principal of St. Mark School in Huntersville, left the diocesan schools after 35 years of service as a teacher, administrator and coach.

In June, he had a manuscript addressing teacher retention in Catholic schools published in the research journal Catholic Education: A Journal of Inquiry and Practice.

This accomplishment led him to make the decision to pursue a full-time writing career, while continuing to teach at University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

Przygocki earned his bachelor's degree in history from Belmont Abbey College and a master's degree in educational administration and a doctorate in education leadership from University of North Carolina at Charlotte.

"We have wonderful students here at St. Mark School," he said. "That's been the real joy — to see the halls fill up with 470 students who are excited to be here."

Ginny Hutton, principal of Asheville Catholic School, is departing after a lifelong career in Catholic education to enter "semi-retirement."

"I'll be spending the summer in Florida with my seven grandchildren," she said. "After that, I'll look for a position in lay ministry, such as in faith formation or as a pastoral associate."

"I am truly impressed by and amazed by (Asheville Catholic School teachers') love, dedication, experience and their strong academic backgrounds," she said. "We have tremendous support and involvement of the parents, who bring a wealth of gifts, talents, enthusiasm and joy."

"I now look forward to working with adults and children of all ages," Hutton said.

Vatican looks to speed up processing of sex abuse cases

concern by both U.S. bishops and Vatican officials that more manpower is needed to break through the logjam of abuse cases at the Vatican.

Since new norms went into effect last year, hundreds of cases have arrived at the doctrinal congregation, which has oversight responsibility for all priestly sex abuse cases involving minors. The congregation has added some staff, but the workload has been described by some as overwhelming.

The result is that it may take months to remove even an acknowledged abuser from the priesthood, and longer if an extensive investigation or church trial is involved. U.S. Catholics should be aware that as the cases are reviewed and investigated, the priests are not in active ministry.

Archbishop Sean P. O'Malley of Boston was the latest U.S. prelate to express frustration at what he called the "very slow" pace of processing abuse cases. Speaking to Boston media in Rome, he cited two causes for the lag: lack of Vatican personnel, and reluctance by alleged victims of abuse to share their allegations with church investigators.

Archbishop O'Malley told Catholic News Service that the plan to bring over U.S. canon lawyers should help address the problem.

"I think that will be a big help, because they're understaffed," he said of the Vatican congregation.

The archbishop said the Vatican was very open to the idea of sending the U.S. experts, and that it looked like it would happen this fall.

A Vatican official confirmed that two church U.S. canon law experts were expected in Rome this fall to help prepare clerical abuse cases for processing. They were likely to be assigned for an 18-month period.

"We are getting extra help, and we are doing everything we can to handle these cases fairly. It is important that we do things as quickly as possible; it is also important that we ensure protection of everyone's rights," said another informed Vatican source.

The source emphasized that because of the nature of the abuse cases, many cannot be handled quickly. Allegations often are made many years after the abuse occurred, making it difficult to gather evidence and interview witnesses, and the allegations sometimes are denied — by an accused priest or, more rarely, by a victim.

Review board's interim head sees more cooperation with bishops

BY AGOSTINO BONO
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — The outgoing interim chairwoman of the bishops' National Review Board said that she expects more collaboration between the lay board and the bishops now that the board has demonstrated its independence.

Another aid to cooperation is that the board has shown the high quality of its work in helping the bishops implement policies to prevent clergy sex abuse of minors, said Justice Anne M. Burke.

Burke, an Illinois Appellate Court judge, spoke to Catholic News Service after the review board met June 27-28 to plan future activities.

Because the board was appointed by the president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, "we worked hard at autonomy" from the hierarchy to establish credibility, she said.

Initially, the board needed a wall between it and the hierarchy "to avoid the view that we are a rubber stamp for the bishops," said Burke.

"The board will remain independent but be more collaborative," she said.

Burke said that in a June 11 letter to her, Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, head of the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, praised the work done by the board as an example of lay cooperation with the bishops.

The cardinal's letter came in response to her offer for board members to hold a second meeting with the cardinal to discuss the U.S. situation, she said.

The doctrinal congregation has overall church authority in clergy sex abuse cases.

She quoted the cardinal's letter as saying: "Your offer is most generous and is also appreciated, especially in light of our conviction regarding the benefit to be derived from a close collaboration between bishops and the lay faithful on issues such as those dealt with in the National Review Board's two reports."

The two reports were a statistical study on the nature and scope of the crisis and a report on some of the possible reasons behind the scandal.

At its June meeting, the review board discussed future activities such as the planned study on the "causes and context" of the crisis, Burke said.

The study will include an in-depth look at "what was the nature of the environment that allowed victims and perpetrators to come together," said Burke.

She estimated that the study would take three to four years and involve interviews with numerous victims and perpetrators as well as control groups such as priests not guilty of abusing children.

The board is working with the bishops' Ad Hoc Committee on Sexual Abuse to have a detailed proposal for the study ready in September so that qualified research centers can bid to do the report, she said.

The study also aims to inform the general public about child sex abuse that Burke called "a public health crisis" and "not just a Catholic Church problem."

Abortion vs. War

Targeting of innocent life makes all the difference

Guest Column

FATHER FRANK PAVONE
GUEST COLUMNIST

This column requires extra effort to explain what it is not. It is not an evaluation of the war in Iraq or of any national leaders.

It is, however, an observation, on the level of moral principle, about the relationship between abortion, war and being pro-life. And even there, I am limiting myself to a couple of very simple and specific points and not an exhaustive analysis.

In his historic speech to the United Nations in 1965, Pope Paul VI cried out, "War never again, war never again!" The world must heed these words. They don't just mean, "Don't fight." They mean that we have to make justice and human rights so secure that the need to fight disappears.

Many ask whether one can be a good Catholic or be pro-life and support the war. The answer is yes, which is to say that Catholic and pro-life teaching do allow for circumstances in which war is justified, because sometimes war has to be waged precisely for the defense of life.

Even when war is justified, life is always lost in the process. But innocent life is never targeted, and that makes all the difference in the world. How many innocent lives, and how many children, have been deliberately targeted for destruction in the current war?

By comparison, every abortion deliberately targets and destroys a child; otherwise, it isn't even an abortion.

The purpose of war is not to kill the enemy, but rather to deprive the enemy of his ability to wage war and to destroy others' rights. There's a big difference between targeting military and communications equipment to disrupt the operations of the enemy and just trying to kill as many people as we can.

No doubt, some will read this column and begin arguing with me that the war in Iraq is not justified. The column is not arguing with them, but precisely pointing out that it is OK for them to come to that conclusion. It is also OK for someone else to come to the conclusion that the war is justified.

What is not OK is for someone to say, "You are not pro-life because you support the war." In fact, one may support the war precisely because he or she is pro-life and concludes that in this case, force is the only way to protect human life, human rights and human freedom from the hands of those who would destroy it. Others may disagree, which is fine — but don't deny the other person's right to come to a different conclusion.

And do not miss the profound difference with abortion. There is no room for interpretations or evaluations of whether abortion may be justified. It cannot be, because its very essence is the deliberate targeting and destruction of a child. In war, we do not target a single child, whereas every abortion targets a child.

Catholic teaching allows more than one position on war, but it does not allow more than one position on abortion.

Pope begins northern Italian vacation, says all need time for rest

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Editor's note: There will be no weekly general audiences while the pope is on vacation until July 17.

POPE JOHN PAUL II

INTROD, Italy — Pope John Paul II began his mountain vacation in northern Italy under heavy security, stopping briefly to listen to local schoolchildren recite a poem of welcome.

After a flight from Rome, the pope arrived July 5 in Les Combes, near Introd in the Aosta Valley. His chalet-style residence was fenced off and dozens of Italian police guarded the perimeter.

Passing through the village, the pope's car stopped briefly so he could accept flowers, listen to the mayor's greeting and hear the children's poem. Other than recital of the Angelus July 11, the pope had no public activities planned before his return to Rome July 17.

Before leaving Rome, the pope wished everyone a happy vacation, saying people need an annual period of "serene relaxation." He said those who cannot take a real vacation should at least be able to break up their work schedule to include recreation and leisure activities.

Speaking at his noon blessing July 4, the pope also reflected on the three-day visit to the Vatican of Orthodox Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew of Constantinople.

The pope said his various encounters with the patriarch, including a major liturgy in St. Peter's Square, had "confirmed and advanced the commitment of Catholics and Orthodox to the service of the great cause of full communion among Christians."

He said they had both agreed to continue and intensify doctrinal dialogue and practical cooperation. Their encounters, he said, represented an example of "how Christians can and should always cooperate, even in the presence of divisions and conflicts."

The pope said their talks were especially fruitful on the issue of Catholic-Orthodox cooperation in Europe, a continent that "should not forget its Christian roots."

The pope did not give other specifics of his talks with the patriarch, but he ended his reflection by saying: "May God bring to fulfillment the proposals formulated in these meetings."

In his final major audience before beginning his vacation, the pope met July 3 with European church leaders meeting to discuss Catholic education on the continent.

The pope said he was concerned that the increasing focus on scholastic formation and professional training was leaving too little space for the "full development of young people." This has left many young Europeans confused, he said.

He said Europe has a rich humanistic tradition that should not be sacrificed in an age when educational programs are often driven by economic interests. Europe's educational traditions also have strong Christian elements, he said. By emphasizing "being" and not just "having," the traditional Christian approach helps young people mature, he said.

Letter to the Editor

Roosevelt quote unfairly edited

In the politically correct climate that continues to wreak havoc on our nation and in our families and churches, here is but another flagrant example of our efforts not to offend anyone.

Part of Roosevelt's speech is engraved on the Pacific side of the WW II memorial in Washington ("Catholic World War II vets on new memorial: It's about time," May 28), but in our country's grandiose efforts to be tolerant, the final words of his proclamation have not been included — Roosevelt's speech to the nation ends with "so help us God."

Roosevelt's words are engraved on the hearts of those who heard them but each year there are fewer of them. How long will we rewrite history to the detriment of our children and our nation?

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

Anytime I'm able to pass along a complimentary word about a fellow priest, I'm glad to do so even when I don't personally know the priest in question. In this case, though, I do know people who know him well, and they've convinced me that he's the kind of priest, and the kind of man, who rates a special mention.

I can't think of a better time to do this than right now, as the country is about to come together to celebrate the Fourth of July. It's a wonderful time to salute this priest and his special calling, and what it means to every one of us.

His name is Father Tim Vakoc, a priest of the St. Paul-Minneapolis Archdiocese. More important, for our consideration at the moment, he is an Army chaplain. His men have known him as Father Tim, or Maj. Vakoc, and just plain "Padre." Late in May, he was seriously wounded in Iraq, the first chaplain to suffer that fate.

He was returning to his barracks after celebrating Mass for some of the troops. He was driving his Humvee when a roadside bomb went off, leaving him with some terrible wounds. He came home to the United States early in June, but those who tried to visit him at Walter Reed Medical Center in Bethesda, Md., were frustrated. He was still heavily sedated, and early attempts at communication were not successful.

This is a man — a priest, a hero — who needs our prayers. By all accounts he will continue to need them for some time to come.

One thing that Father Tim Vakoc said stands out above all others, and helps me to explain why I'm singling him out here. In a letter to his sister during an earlier deployment in Bosnia, here's what Father Tim, the Padre, had to say: "The safest place for me to be is in the center of God's will — and if that is in the line of fire, that is where I will be."

What a testimony of faith that is, and what an eloquent expression of service. Here's how the Wall Street Journal treated this all-embracing commitment: In our sardonic age, the Journal reflected, "the phrase 'for God and Country' may be greeted in some quarters with cynicism. But we take the measure of Father Tim and fellow chaplains by their willingness to put their lives on the line for these words. Where others see a mass of troops, they see individuals with souls and troubles that need tending."

And that, of course, is what military chaplains are all about. Archbishop Edwin F. O'Brien of the U.S. Military Archdiocese, which oversees the spiritual care of Catholic men and women in the armed forces and those who serve them as chaplains, said Father Tim is a perfect example of what a good chaplain should be.

"I've known him fairly well from his earlier assignments," Archbishop O'Brien said. "He impresses you as any good parish priest would. He loves his work and he loves the people assigned to his care. He's mature and he's agreeable. To sum it up, he's perfectly at home in the role that God gave him."

Maj. Vakoc is part of a tradition that goes back to the earliest days of this nation, when the Continental Congress authorized a corps of chaplains to serve the newly formed Army. Then as now, chaplains of all faiths would remind soldiers and sailors at war that they were still responsible to a higher calling. As the Wall Street Journal put it, the chaplain is the unarmed soldier whose job it is to serve those who serve.

Maj. Vakoc is one of those chaplains, and as it happens he is one of the very best. He and others like him have been serving with distinction ever since the United States came into being. As once again we prepare to celebrate all that our nation's independence has meant to us, that's a thought worth remembering.

Pastors' decisions on baptizing children

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Our pastor gave a beautiful homily recently on baptism, saying children have a right to baptism as soon as possible after birth. However, this seems to vary from pastor to pastor.

Certain pastors refuse baptism to an innocent child if they judge parents are not "Catholic" enough. Others welcome infants with open arms, even if their parents are out in left field of their faith. How do you explain this? (Illinois)

A. I think we need first to clarify the church's policy on the matter. When Catholic parents (or a Catholic partner in an interfaith marriage) are seriously deficient in their Catholic practice, the pastor is obliged to delay baptism until he can help the parents rethink their faith.

True, children should be baptized "within the first weeks" after birth (Canon 867). The law assumes, however, that parents are practicing their faith, prepared to raise their children as faithful Catholic men and women.

Thus, the same law requires that immediately after birth or before, the parents go to their parish priest to request the sacrament of baptism and to be properly prepared for it. A priest may not, in fact, lawfully baptize a child unless he has a solidly founded hope that the baby will be raised properly as a member of the Catholic religion.

If evidence for this hope is lacking, he should delay the baptism and explain the reason to the parents (Canon 868).

The ritual for baptism emphasizes the point. At least twice during the ceremony, Catholic parents profess adherence to the faith in which the child is being baptized and promise to give the example needed for the child to be raised in their faith.

Normally, this promise cannot be made unless the Catholic parents themselves are faithful in their Catholic practice and are not simply bringing the child for baptism because of family tradition or a vague feeling that "it's the right thing to do."

In other words, the church is concerned that parents not be placed in the position of making a profession of faith they do not honestly believe.

But — and this is a crucial point — the story does not end there. The parish priest is obliged to help parents who are not yet ready genuinely to profess their faith, to assist them in assuming responsibility for the religious education of their children and then to decide the right time for baptism.

I realize this may startle some Catholics. But being realistic, our situation is vastly different from when we almost automatically baptized children of baptized Catholic parents.

Anyone familiar with Catholic history of the last few centuries knows that by automatic baptisms, first Communions and confirmations, whole populations of people remained at an almost primitive level of faith. One generation of baptized, nonpracticing Catholic parents succeeded another. Few were called to open themselves to the possibility of growth to a fuller Christian Catholic life.

As someone put it well, a church which never says "no" to parents who are seriously deficient in their belief and practice of their faith never will allow them to become deeply believing parents.

Obviously various subjective judgments come into play here, which could be one reason for the differences you experience. It's also possible that sometimes these concerns of the church are neglected.

It remains vital that Catholic parents desire in their own hearts that the baptism of their child will be what it was meant to be, an earnest recommitment of all their family to the faith they hope to share with their child.

What is the right way to reconcile

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

During the Prayers of the Faithful at daily Mass two days before the April 25 women's pro-choice march on Washington, a woman prayed in a vengeful tone: "May this weekend's march end in disaster! Let us pray to the Lord."

There was dead silence among those present. Then a few parishioners quietly whispered, "Lord hear our prayer."

The next morning another woman prayed, "Let us pray that those marching, for purposes contrary to God's will, will have a change of mind and heart." The response from the congregation was a loud, "Let us pray to the Lord!"

In the book "The Idea of a University," Cardinal John Henry Newman gave a profound definition of a gentleman as a person who avoids all vengefulness, cutting remarks or anything that will discomfort another. This reflects Christ, the Suffering Servant.

When Christ stood trial and saw the injustice of it all, he could have lashed out and brought the curse of God down upon the Romans and Jews. Rather, he remained silent and suffered injustice out of love for us. He turned the other cheek and in doing so taught us the peaceful way of bringing about reconciliation.

Christ is a martyr who witnesses to what he believes and loves, and because of that belief and love our hearts have been changed forever.

In the proverb, "You can attract more bees with honey than with vinegar." If we substitute the words "love" and "self-sacrifice" for "honey," we have the model of reconciliation that Christ foremost used to bring about our salvation.

Yet, the Scriptures tell us to be vigilant, not to put our light under a bushel basket and to stand steadfast.

In baptism we receive the gift of prophecy, and like the prophets we are expected to speak out boldly when we experience people ignoring God's will. In his public life, Christ often spoke out boldly when people were breaking God's law. In fact, he was rather ferocious with the money changers in the Temple.

One of the biggest challenges the church faces in catechizing its people is understanding when we all are called to be Christ the Suffering Servant and when we are called to be Christ the vigilant, bold prophet.

We need to better reconcile these two approaches, an important challenge for the church in a society where citizens hold such diverse views on matters of great concern.

Mourners, including former U.S. president, remember Mattie Stepanek

BY HENRIETTE GOMES
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WHEATON, Md. — Former President Carter told the congregation at a Wheaton church June 28 that he had met kings and queens, presidents and prime ministers, but the "most extraordinary person I have ever known in my life is Mattie Stepanek."

Thirteen-year-old Mattie, who died June 22 in Washington after battling a rare form of muscular dystrophy, was remembered as a peacemaker, poet and philosopher during his funeral Mass at St. Catherine Laboure Church in the Washington suburb of Wheaton.

Included among the hundreds of mourners were two of his friends and heroes, Carter and talk-show host Oprah Winfrey.

Mattie met the former president as one of his final wishes three years ago on television's "Good Morning America." The two of them had an "instantaneous bond," said Carter.

Knowing the boy, he said, "literally changed my life for the better." When Carter received the Nobel Peace Prize, he said, he remembered feeling that Mattie had shared in the award.

Mattie suffered from dysautonomic mitochondrial myopathy, a rare form of muscular dystrophy that disrupts heart rate, digestion and breathing. He used a motorized wheelchair with an attached ventilator to assist his breathing.

He gained international acclaim as a peace advocate and captured the hearts of many with his "Heartsongs" — a five-book series of poetry. Three of the books reached The New York Times' best-seller list.

In his homily, Father Isidore Dixon, pastor of Most Holy Rosary Parish in Rosaryville, where Mattie and his mother, Jeni, were longtime parishioners before moving to Rockville, said, "Mattie gave us a great example of embracing the cross."

Mattie shared, he said, in the sufferings of Christ and made many sacrifices. The priest told the crowd, which included hundreds of firefighters, some Harley Davidson riders and people from all walks of life, that Mattie "gave us a great example of what it means to be a believer."

He was remembered as a peacemaker, poet and philosopher during his funeral Mass. Mattie is pictured with one of his five best-selling books of poetry.

While at Most Holy Rosary Parish, Mattie had served as a lector and member of the choir along with his mother.

Mattie also raised awareness of muscular dystrophy and appeared on the "Jerry Lewis MDA Telethon" to help raise money for the Muscular Dystrophy Association, which named him good-will ambassador two years in a row. Displayed at the front of the church near the bouquets of flowers were pictures of Mattie smiling from ear to ear.

Winfrey said when she first met Mattie, as a guest on her show three years ago, "I fell in love with him."

"I found him to be magical," she said. He appeared on her show to spread the message of peace and hope, as the second of his final wishes.

Continuing their friendship through e-mail, they discussed, among other things, their feelings about death. She told the standing-room-only crowd in the church that Mattie had taught her a lot and had given her a lot of advice.

Those who were lucky enough to have met Mattie, said Winfrey "will feel the glow." She added, "His heart song has left a heart print in my life."

One of Mattie's most important philosophies was to "always remember to play after every storm."

"He had adult thoughts, but he was a child," said Murray Pollack, chairman of the Division of Pediatric Services at Children's Hospital in Washington.

He said Mattie was a "world-class prankster." At his request, Mattie had with him in his casket a favorite stuffed animal and his remote-control whoopee cushion.

In his remarks, Carter noted that, just as Jesus was fully human and fully divine, Mattie had the character of an adult but was still a child.

"Mattie was an angel of God," he said.

The youngster, who believed in peace, justice, humility, service, compassion and love, was concerned about a legacy, Carter said. "His legacy is forever because his heart songs will resonate in the hearts of people forever."

In one poem, Mattie wrote he would continue to be a peacemaker in heaven.

Instead of a hearse, a fire truck carried Mattie's body to the cemetery as he had requested and was escorted by bikers he had met at the Muscular Dystrophy Association telethon.

Mattie was buried at Gate of Heaven Cemetery in Silver Spring next to his siblings, Jaime, Katie and Stevie, who as toddlers died of the same disease Mattie had. His mother suffers from the adult form of the disease.

After the service at the cemetery, family and friends gathered at the Montgomery County Fairgrounds for a reception to celebrate his life.

WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA — Soon the 10 empty trailers would fill with Hispanic migrant tomato pickers.

Located in a "park" in Bryson City, a couple of trailers had boards piled inside and looked as if they were getting new floors. Others weren't that fortunate. In at least one trailer, rat droppings littered the floor and the kitchen ceiling was falling in.

"These (trailers) are among the worst I've ever seen," said Hector Rodriguez, executive director of the Catholic Migrant Farmworker Network (CMFN), an Idaho-based organization of farmworkers and their pastoral agents.

SHORTS? NO SERVICE

A visitor wearing shorts looks over the dress requirements for entering St. Peter's Basilica at the Vatican in mid-July. Adults wearing shorts or those with uncovered shoulders are not permitted in the basilica.

Vatican conference underscores universal issues of tourism industry

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — As long lines of tourists were waiting to clear security to get into St. Peter's Basilica, a Vatican office was discussing short pants.

The Pontifical Council for Migrants and Travelers' Sixth World Congress on the Pastoral Care of Tourism, held July 5-8 in Bangkok, Thailand, included talks about paid annual leave as a benefit or a right, the human need for rest and relaxation, the benefits of traveling abroad, the obligation to respect local laws and customs, and the responsibility of host communities to be welcoming.

But a much-discussed Vatican custom, but one which still takes many visitors by surprise, is that people wanting to enter St. Peter's Basilica as sightseers or pilgrims must dress appropriately.

The long-standing rule is that adults are not permitted to enter wearing shorts and that shoulders must be covered — no tank tops or spaghetti straps.

Those responsible for preserving the decoration as well as the decorum in the basilica, however, have rescinded a 2003 decision that, for women, "shorts" include the mid-shin-reaching slacks known variously as capris or pedal pushers.

"This year short pants are OK, as long as the knees are covered," an official at the basilica said. Men are still asked to wear full-length slacks.

Three young nurses visiting from Denver were disappointed that the one wearing shorts could not go into the church, but as Michelle Lancaster said, "I don't want to offend anyone. When you travel, you should try to blend in as much as possible."

At the Bangkok conference, retired Indian Archbishop Raul N. Gonsalves of Goa and Daman identified a lack of modesty as one of the chief offenses of individual tourists visiting his diocese's famed beaches.

Too often, he said, "the permissive lifestyle of foreign tourists, nudity, massages on the beaches, infatuations and drug use induce local youths to experiment with drugs and sex."

The archbishop said that in sending and receiving tourists, in working with local officials and in cooperation with the World Tourism Organization, Catholics should promote a "renewed tourism in which people can enrich themselves culturally by promoting the dignity of others, respecting their differing cultural baggage, protecting and promoting the safeguarding of the earth, thereby encouraging harmony and peace."

Another topic at the Bangkok conference was the human need for rest and relaxation, the development of paid leave policies and the consequent expansion of foreign travel among people who are not seriously rich.

Pro-life official praises vote on funds for U.N. population agency

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The defeat in a House committee of a proposal to give $25 million in U.S. funds to the U.N. Population Fund was "a victory for women and children around the world, and for the U.S. taxpayer," said the U.S. bishops' chief spokeswoman on pro-life issues.

Cathy Cleaver Ruse, director of planning and information in the bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, praised the July 12 vote in the House Appropriations Committee on an amendment proposed by Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y.

The committee vote was 32-26 against Lowey's amendment.

"The United States should remain out of the business of financing the exploitation of women through coercive programs supported" by the U.N. population agency, Ruse said in a July 12 statement.

She pointed out that in July 2002 Secretary of State Colin Powell said the U.N. Population Fund's support of China's population planning activities "allows the Chinese government to implement more effectively its program of coercive abortion."

As long as the U.N. agency "supports these barbaric policies imposed on families, it must remain ineligible for U.S. funding, period," said Ruse.

Gail Quinn, executive director of the pro-life secretariat, had asked committee members in a letter to oppose the amendment.

"Current federal policy ... reflects a broad international consensus among member nations of the United Nations" which have "condemned 'forced sterilization and forced abortion' as 'acts of violence against women,'" Quinn wrote.

Pope offers prayers for victims of school fire in India

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II offered prayers for the victims of a school fire that killed 90 children and left another 100 injured in southern India.

In a telegram sent to Indian authorities in the pope's name, the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Angelo Sodano, said, "The Holy Father was deeply saddened to learn of the devastating school fire in Kumbakonam which has taken the lives of so many young children and has left so many others injured."

Told of the tragedy while vacationing in the Alps, Pope John Paul "was particularly struck and prayed" for the children, spokesman Joaquin Navarro-Valls said.

Police said the July 16 blaze at the Lord Krishna Middle School started in a makeshift kitchen and quickly spread through the school. More than 30 of the victims were burned to death, while the others were killed in a stampede. A witness said the school's main door was locked when the blaze began, but was unlocked by the escaping teachers. Most primary schools in India keep the main door locked to keep children from running out into the street, The Associated Press reported.

In a July 17 statement, the Catholic Bishops' Conference of India asked for "more safety measures for schools, especially in the rural areas of the country." It said government should provide the best facilities for education "so that a similar tragedy may not be repeated."

The school students came from all faiths. Some Catholics said they enrolled their children there because church schools had refused them admittance, UCA News reported.

Vatican seminar looks at ways to meet U.N. anti-poverty goals by 2015

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In support of the U.N.-defined millennium development goals, Pope John Paul II encouraged efforts to drastically reduce poverty, debt and poor health conditions in Third World nations by 2015.

The pope's backing for the U.N. objectives came at a time when many were questioning whether achieving the millennium goals 11 years from now was realistic.

The pope's remarks, in a letter to Cardinal Renato Martino, president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, were made public during a July 9 Vatican seminar, "Poverty and Globalization: Financing for Development, Including the Millennium Development Goals."

The Vatican's minisummit brought together government leaders, representatives of nongovernmental organizations, U.N. development directors and financial strategists who discussed ways of financing the development goals.

The millennium development goals, endorsed by world leaders at the U.N. Millennium Summit in September 2000, set several concrete objectives to be achieved by 2015; they included reducing by half the number of poor around the world and improving health and education in the developing world.

Cardinal Martino said the pope's support of the project would spark greater international support at a time of growing skepticism that the U.N. goals can be met.

In his letter, the pope said that while much work has been done to reduce the debt of poor countries, "more is needed if developing nations are to escape from the crippling effects of underinvestment and if developed countries are to fulfill their duty of solidarity with their less fortunate brothers and sisters in other parts of the world."

"In the short to medium term, a commitment to increase foreign aid seems the only way forward," the pope said.

Other solutions discussed at the seminar included plans to create an international tax on the trade of armaments and high technology, a strategy balked at by some, such as Germany, Japan and the United States.

Cardinal Martino, citing a remark made by Pope John Paul on another occasion, said that "to make promises to the world's poorest and then break them is unpardonable." He said the U.N. goals should be reassessed every 15 years after 2015.

JOURNEYING DOWN UNDER

High schoolers explore ancient cultures in South Pacific

KERNERSVILLE — For many in the group, it was the trip of a lifetime.

"I climbed the Sydney Harbor Bridge, surfed at Bondi Beach and scuba dived in the Great Barrier Reef," said Teddy Lynch, a sophomore at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School. "When will I ever get to do that again?"

Teddy was one of 38 Bishop McGuinness students and parents to take the "Journey Down Under" June 16-July 2, an educational adventure trip that included stops in New Zealand, Australia and Hawaii.

The group first explored the Maori culture at Rotorura on New Zealand's North Island. Attending a Maori "hangi," the travelers enjoyed a traditional feast while experiencing the Maori creation story in song.

Later, the group attended Mass at St. Michael's, a predominantly Maori parish. A lasting impression was a Maori Communion song, sung by congregation members, said Mike Streich, a history teacher at Bishop McGuinness who was on his fourth South Pacific tour.

The trip continued to cosmopolitan Sydney, Australia, where the group toured the world-famous Opera House and enjoyed a harbor cruise. Students also scaled the landmark Harbor Bridge and learned to surf at Bondi Beach.

The tour continued to tropical Cairns, Australia, where the Great Barrier Reef meets the rain forest. The group spent two days at the remote Fern Tree Resort and explored the aboriginal community at Kuranda and Tjapukai near Cairns.

They then departed for Honolulu, Hawaii, where they visited Pearl Harbor and the USS Arizona Memorial.

Tentatively, the 2006 South Pacific sojourn will include Raratonga, Cook Islands.

Is there a nurse in the house?

Parish nurses provide vital link between parishioners, health services

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — In the earliest days of the Catholic Church, members of the community would first go to their parish priest for healing.

Throughout the centuries, as medical practices improved and became more accepted, people turned to physicians for health services.

Over the past 20 years, churches have begun to return to their historical status as a link between parishioners and the healthcare community through parish nursing programs, also known as congregational nursing.

As a member of a church's ministry team, a parish nurse combines professional nursing expertise with faith concepts to facilitate the healing mission of a congregation. A parish nurse is also a pastoral connection between faith and health, helping people connect what they believe with life choices.

Several churches in the Diocese of Charlotte have parish nurses, most of whom are not paid for their time. Most parish nurse programs are funded through hospital grants and parish assessment.

"We serve as educator, advocate and facilitator," said Linda Sheridan, parish registered nurse for St. Francis of Assisi Church in Jefferson. The church is one of 12 members of the Ashe Congregational Health Ministry Program.

Sheridan said she works with parishioners to counsel them about medications, to educate them on healthcare issues and to connect them with various health and service agencies.

Another major part of her parish nurse ministry is home and hospital visits to the sick and dying, for whom "I facilitate the administration of the sacraments of anointing of the sick and the Eucharist by a priest," she said.

Parish nurses act as personal health counselors to discuss health concerns with parishioners and make home/hospital/nursing home visits.

"Our role (as parish nurses) is to promote healthy lifestyles and disease prevention based on the whole person — body, mind and spirit," said Christine Judge, parish registered nurse at St. Pius X Church in Greensboro.

Established in 1998, the Congregational Nurse Program in Greensboro initially had 10 churches as members. Today, 31 faith communities, including the Jewish congregation, are members. Ten more communities will begin participation in 2005.

Because they do not operate under the supervision of a physician, parish nurses do not perform "hands-on" nursing care, such as providing wound care or injections. Rather, they serve as a health educator to promote an understanding of the relationship between lifestyle, attitudes, faith and well-being.

Nurses in the parish setting also are referral sources to help people utilize community resources and services and are facilitators to recruit and coordinate volunteers and support groups within the congregation.

Cheryl Fleming is the parish registered nurse coordinator for the Belmont parish nurse ministry and serves as the parish nurse for three Belmont-area churches including Queen of the Apostles Church.

Fleming sees herself as a "champion of the underdog" for people having a difficult time navigating the increasing complex healthcare system.

"(Parish nurses) wear many hats — we're not just educators, not just counselors — we do a bit of everything," she said.

Fleming's work as a parish nurse extends beyond the church into the community at large. With a $2,000 grant from the diocesan development office, she has organized a health and safety fair for the Belmont community to be held July 31.

"We hope to find ways to build bridges between faith and ethnic communities," said Lelia Moore, congregational nurse coordinator of Moses Cone Health System.

Moore said she is trying to make connections within the Hispanic, Montagnard and Korean communities to serve their medical needs.

One way to accomplish this bridge building is events such as the Festival of Health and Hispanic Culture, held at Our Lady of Grace Church in Greensboro in October 2003. The festival featured cultural exhibits and activities as well as health and wellness exhibits.

According to Caring Congregations, Inc., an educational nonprofit organization whose mission is to educate and support parish nurses and other health ministers, the goal of parish nursing is "to allow God to comfort another person through the nurse, to put the person being cared for in a position to be conscious of the presence of God in his or her life and current situation."

"In the early Christian Church, the Catholic community took care of its own people," Judge said. "Now, we're getting back to those roots."

Sisters of St. Joseph set priorities, elect congregational leaders

PHILADELPHIA — More than 400 Sisters of St. Joseph, including several from the Diocese of Charlotte, gathered at Chestnut Hill College for sessions of Chapter 2004.

Every five years, the sisters convene a Chapter of Affairs and Chapter of Elections to establish priorities, set directions for the foreseeable future and elect congregational leaders.

During the June 25-July 4 sessions at the Catholic liberal arts college, the sisters adopted a five-point chapter document, calling themselves to realize its goals over the next five years through processes involving contemplation, education, conversion and courageous action.

Attending from the Diocese of Charlotte were Sister Joan Pearson, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Hickory Vicariate; Sister Mary Karalis, a teacher at Our Lady of Mercy School in Winston-Salem; and Sister Helene Nagle, principal of St. Ann School in Charlotte.

During the gathering, delegates elected Sister Patricia Kelly to a second term as congregational president. Sisters Anne Myers, Mary Barrar, Mary Dacey and Dorothy Urban were elected to serve on the General Council of the Congregation.

Sisters who are residents of Saint Joseph Villa, the congregation's nursing home, adopted delegates as prayer partners and, bearing the "wisdom of the elders," five residents attended a morning session to address the delegates. Sister Florentine Scanlon, who at 101 claims the title of "Eldest Resident," shared her words of wit and wisdom in an endearing, handwritten letter.

Sisters of Mercy elect leadership team, set goals

BELMONT — With the conclusion of their Chapter of Assembly July 24, the Sisters of Mercy have announced their new leadership team and its 2004 Chapter Actions to be implemented over the next four years.

A Chapter of Assembly is conducted and attended by Sisters of Mercy delegates once every four years. They prayerfully consider actions that will call the community to specific action as well as elect its new leadership team for the next four years.

Those elected to the Sisters of Mercy Regional Community of North Carolina Leadership Team for 2004-2008 include Mercy Sister Paulette Rose Williams as president and Mercy Sister Pauline Mary Clifford as vice president.

Three councilors were also elected to the leadership team: Mercy Sisters Mary Angela Perez, Donna Marie Vaillancourt and Jill Katherine Weber.

The new team will assume office Sept. 24.

Sister Williams, a native of Concord, spent much of her life within the Catholic educational system. She has served as vice president of the regional community and at Charlotte Catholic High School as assistant principal and principal.

A native of Ireland, Sister Clifford served as president from 1988 until 1996 and as vice president from 1996 until 2000. She recently worked in Ireland at Mercy International Center.

Sister Perez, a native of Guam, has taught in North Carolina and Guam and served in Guam as a councilor. In 1996, she was elected president of the Guam Region of the Regional Community of North Carolina.

Sister Vaillancourt was born in Asheville and has served in many ministries, including education, director of formation, novice and vocations director, and co-director of a spiritual sanctuary for adults.

A native of Mount Vernon, N.Y., Sister Weber has served as a teacher and principal. She later began ministering as a home health physical therapist in addition to her primary ministry at Holy Angels. She also serves as co-chair of Life Development and Life Planning for her regional community.

Tour exposes 'horrid' camp conditions

Hendersonville July 7 to assess the situation faced by migrant farmworkers.

The group on the tour in Bryson City and Cullowhee included Augustinian Father Francis J. Doyle, pastor of St. Margaret Church in Maggie Valley; Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott, director of diocesan Hispanic ministry; and Eduardo Bernal, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate.

Escorting the group was Josie Ellis, a registered nurse with Vecinos Incorporados (VI), which provides healthcare and advocacy for migrants.

VI ministers in five counties and camps throughout the area that are just as bad as these, Ellis said.

"We've done clinics in these trailers and actually had rats running across the floor," Ellis said. "We asked the landlord to put screens in the windows last year because so many of the babies were covered with flies, and he said, 'We don't beautify.'"

Ellis had high praise for Father Shawn O'Neal, pastor of St. Joseph Church in Bryson City and Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Cherokee. He's willing to go to the camps, she told Rodriguez.

"(Father Shawn) came out here and sat on the floors of these nasty trailers and talked to them and talked to the children and gave them all the instruction they needed (to be baptized)," Ellis said.

Critical conditions

Last year, Ellis said, 147 men stayed in the 10 trailers. The landlord charged $600 to $800 per month per trailer.

At a park in Cullowhee, the few people already in residence were away or staying indoors. Other trailers, now unoccupied, would soon house migrant tobacco pickers. Those trailers — with broken, screenless windows — looked just like they did last year, Ellis said.

"They're just hardworking, nice people trying to survive," Ellis said. "It's profound. It's really profound."

Hector Rodriguez (left), executive director of the Catholic Migrant Farmworker Network, chats with year-round residents in Hendersonville July 7. Roberto Morales (sitting nearest the wall) is a gardener; Ruben Lopez works in construction.

"The lack of healthcare, the horrid living conditions, the degradation of the human spirit, it's the most immoral situation I've ever seen ..." — Josie Ellis

Trailers with broken windows, just as they were when migrants lived in them last year, will soon house migrant tobacco pickers in Cullowhee.

Ellis was sometimes moved to tears as she described to Rodriguez the conditions faced by migrants.

"The lack of healthcare, the horrid living conditions, the degradation of the human spirit, it's the most immoral situation I've ever seen, and I see it 12 hours a day," Ellis said. "We're all culpable. Everyone who eats is culpable."

Meeting the needs

Founded in 1986, CMFN works to bring the Catholic Church's pastoral presence to thousands of migrant farmworkers throughout the country.

Rodriguez will add what he learns at camps in the Diocese of Charlotte (and later in the Diocese of Raleigh) to data collected by CMFN.

"In 1995, the network had its first national consultation," he said. "We had done a survey to assess the needs of migrants. One of the needs was for pastoral formation."

CMFN is conducting surveys of diocesan Hispanic ministry directors and migrants to develop its next national gathering.

"The data will serve as the basis for reflection on the migrant reality today and for planning how to address those needs," said Rodriguez.

Welcoming the stranger

Although it was his first visit to North Carolina, Rodriguez said he already had a "very favorable impression of Hispanic ministry in this diocese."

"I'm fascinated by all these coordinators," he said. "In many dioceses, it's a one-person office. So, we have these leaders ... and they have leaders (that they are developing in the Hispanic community)."

The Diocese of Charlotte has nine Hispanic ministry coordinators who serve its 10 vicariates; but helping migrants is a job for all, not just the diocese's coordinators, Rodriguez pointed out.

"It's [everyone's] vocation as baptized Christians," he said. "It's their vocation as a Christian to love their neighbor; that's straight from Jesus' mouth, not from me."

"Welcoming the stranger is what true religion is all about, and as people who consume food, it wouldn't be a bad idea for them to know who puts it on their plates," he said.

That evening, Capuchin Franciscan Father John Salvas, parochial vicar of Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville, escorted Rodriguez to visit migrant fieldworkers and permanent residents in Henderson County.

Father Salvas said that there are about 10,000 permanent Hispanic residents in Henderson County. Mid-July through October each year, 5,000 migrants arrive to pick apples, peppers, string beans and tomatoes.

Workers, some of them as young as 15 or 16, were unloading boxes of tomatoes at a distribution point in another area of the county. Two of the men asked Father Salvas for a blessing. They dropped to their knees on the loading dock while he extended his hands and prayed over them.

"The overall challenge is church being church," Rodriguez said later. "We need to be who we would be to any of our brothers and sisters, and yet these folks are so hidden that for the most part we pay them no mind because we don't know they're there."

"It is up to (Sister) Andrea and Eduardo and others to educate us; they're the facilitators to help us get out of our pews and into the camps," he said.

Assistance for victims

tors are located in each of the three regional offices of Catholic Social Services. David Harold is the assistance coordinator for the Winston-Salem region, Michele Sheppard serves the Asheville area and Nancy Miller-Campbell works out of the Charlotte office.

So far, each assistance coordinator has worked with two victims — some have reported incidents that took place within the diocese; others said they were abused elsewhere and later moved to the diocese.

In either situation, the assistance coordinators work to help the survivors of sexual abuse — they ensure both civil and diocesan authorities review their cases; coordinate appropriate therapy, for which the diocese pays; and help the survivors cope with their experiences.

"It takes a tremendous amount of courage to come forward, because there is such confusion about sexual abuse," said Miller-Campbell.

Survivors are revisiting a crime, she said, and at the same time many feel "they are speaking out against their church."

But the assistance coordinators want to assure any survivors who have not come forward that their cases will be handled with: confidentiality, to ensure privacy; thoroughness, to assure that the case is properly investigated; and resolve that will bring reconciliation and the proper therapeutic solution to the victim.

Harold has counseled hundreds of sexual abuse survivors during his career as a counselor, although none have been victims of sexual abuse at the hands of clergy.

"I guess that gives you an idea of how rampant the problem is for our society and not just the church," he said.

Although all three assistance coordinators are qualified to counsel victims of sexual abuse, their role as an assistance coordinator prohibits them from offering counseling. Miller-Campbell said there is often a fine line between assisting and counseling.

Assistance coordinators work with victims of sexual abuse to ensure both civil and diocesan authorities review their cases; coordinate appropriate therapy; and help the victims cope with their experiences.

"When we are contacted, we offer counseling services through a non-diocesan counselor. We also ask the victim to give us a written statement of the incident that took place. This is then presented to the chancery, the (diocesan) Review Board and to civil authorities," she said.

"Some people just need to be told 'I'm sorry,'" said Sheppard. "We are here to stand by them and help them get the services they need. Some people just need someone to listen to them. They have been afraid to step forward, they are worried that no one will listen."

"The good news is that there are therapies available that are very effective" in helping survivors cope with their trauma, said Harold.

Cognitive behavior therapy, for example, teaches survivors to relax when they recall traumatic events, he said. The technique removes the pain and suffering associated with the event.

"A third to one half of the survivors are able to achieve significant relief after four to six sessions with a therapist," said Harold.

The assistance coordinators agree that the diocese puts the concerns of the survivors first and acts quickly to investigate allegations that are made. But they also worry that there are other's out there who are suffering needlessly because they are afraid to come forward.

"Sex abuse is a taboo subject to begin with, but these people often feel they are speaking out about a priest who tends to be put on a pedestal," said Miller-Campbell. "And so it takes a tremendous amount of courage for them to come forward when the dynamic of religion is included."

The Diocese of Charlotte reported no incidents of sexual abuse at the hands of clergy during the 2003-04 fiscal year. Future plans to remain vigilant in the protection of children and young people include the publication of a guide for victims and survivors. This guide will be distributed to churches in the diocese.

Catholic efforts to prevent child sex abuse needed in public schools, says educator

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Because of the prevalence of child sex abuse, public schools must develop prevention programs that include educating staff, parents and students, said an educator who prepared a federally mandated study for Congress on the issue.

Sex abuse of students by teachers and other adults in the public school system "is a problem that needs to be taken care of," said Charol Shakeshaft, professor of educational policies at Hofstra University in Hempstead, N.Y.

Her study, commissioned in June by the U.S. Department of Education, estimated about 4.5 million public school students have been abused by public school employees or adult volunteers.

When informed of child sex abuse prevention programs that involve educating children, parents and employees in Catholic dioceses, Shakeshaft praised these as a "good idea" and a "good step" toward curbing child sex abuse.

Her study showed that 9.6 percent of public school students from kindergarten through 11th grade reported unwanted sexual harassment or abuse by public school employees. Students listed teachers and other educators as being responsible for 57 percent of the incidents.

Shakeshaft hopes her report will lead to a national survey devoted exclusively to gathering data on child sex abuse in public schools.

Bishop Wilton D. Gregory of Belleville, Ill., president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, has said that child sex abuse is a national problem and has expressed hope that efforts to curb it in the church will spur similar efforts by other organizations.

As some U.S. dioceses face financial crisis, Vatican has own problems

Church hierarchy prevents intervention in diocesan budgetary affairs

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — When the Archdiocese of Portland, Ore., filed for bankruptcy in early July, some people wondered why the Vatican didn't bail it out.

The head of a sex abuse victims group in Portland said the Vatican needs to "sell a few paintings if they think they can't afford to pay for this." The archdiocese had been hit hard by sex abuse settlements totaling more than $50 million.

But the Vatican is highly unlikely to start selling its paintings or statues in order to rescue a diocese from financial ruin. The Vatican does not see its role as that of overseeing diocesan budgets or financial crises.

And besides, the Vatican doesn't think it's rich.

"I wish we were. If we had so much money, we wouldn't have to go around holding out our hands to the world's dioceses," said Cardinal Sergio Sebastiani, head of the Prefecture for the Economic Affairs of the Holy See.

As for selling part of its artistic patrimony, the cardinal said, "The Vatican's paintings have no commercial value. There are a lot of fables about the riches of the Vatican ... but the reality is much more prosaic."

In fact, a popular saying among Vatican number crunchers is one attributed to a Latin American archbishop: "I can do more with one dollar than the pope can do with Michelangelo's 'Pieta.'"

While the universal church's hierarchical structure can mean direct Vatican intervention in pastoral and dogmatic affairs, budget problems are left to the local church to resolve. The Vatican does not assume responsibility for diocesan financing in nonmissionary countries, although it may be called upon to approve major sales of church properties.

Even the budget for the Diocese of Rome — the pope's own diocese — is managed independently of the Vatican.

The Portland bankruptcy was being followed by some Vatican offices, but not with a view toward financial intervention.

"The Vatican would never get involved in the budget affairs of a diocese. Financially, a diocese is an autonomous entity. If it were a case of gross mismanagement by a bishop, the Vatican could intervene, but not to resolve a budget crisis," said one Vatican official.

The Vatican has enough problems managing its own budget these days. In 2003, the Holy See ran a sizable deficit for the third straight year, despite cutting back costs. It blamed the falling dollar and sluggish investment markets for the shortfall.

Archbishop John G. Vlazny of Portland, Ore., along with his cabinet and advisers, announces July 6 that the Archdiocese of Portland is filing for bankruptcy. It is the first U.S. Catholic diocese to seek the legal protection of Chapter 11.

What's often overlooked when the Vatican discloses its annual financial figures is the size of the total numbers. The Vatican has only a yearly operating budget of just $260 million.

That's less than half the budget of major universities like Notre Dame, and about one-third the budget of U.N. specialized agencies like the Food and Agriculture Organization.

The Vatican's net worth is difficult to gauge, but has been estimated at close to $1 billion. That would be less than the endowment funds of many major universities in the United States.

In the wake of huge settlement payments on abuse cases, a few U.S. dioceses have announced plans to sell off property. At the Vatican, property sales are never seriously considered. Most of its choice property lies inside the Vatican walls; the buildings used for institutional purposes are listed as having no commercial value.

The pope's six-story Apostolic Palace, with its gilt ceiling and frescoed walls, is entered as a debit, reflecting cleaning and upkeep costs.

The perennial problem at the Vatican is generating income, so the Vatican asks dioceses to pitch in. Despite the abuse scandals, donations from Catholics, dioceses and religious orders in the United States have remained steady in recent years, Vatican officials said.

To spur more generosity, the Vatican in the 1980s began publishing a consolidated financial statement, detailing expenses and income.

The Holy See financial statement covers the costs of running the Roman Curia — congregations, councils, tribunals, commissions, media, and several educational and cultural institutions, along with 118 nunciatures around the world.

But figured separately are the budgets for Vatican City State, the administration of St. Peter's Basilica, the Vatican bank, the Vatican's missionary aid societies, and several other institutions connected with the Holy See.

There is one major oversight body for all the Vatican's financial operations, the 15-member "Council of Cardinals for the Study of the Organizational and Economic Problems of the Holy See." Pope John Paul II established it as a type of "wise men" panel to provide guidance on a host of issues, including the Vatican bank scandal of the early 1980s.

In early July, the council met to review the Vatican's latest deficit figures and suggest ways to resolve the problem.

Priest's decade of research yields book on Mother Henriette Delille

Sisters of the Holy Family founder may become first African-American saint

BY FLORENCE L. HERMAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW ORLEANS — Henriette Delille, a free black woman born in New Orleans around 1810 and descended from a long line of free black women, set aside the life expected of her and made a courageous choice to live for God, said her biographer.

She founded the Sisters of the Holy Family, a religious community for black women.

Researching and writing the biography of Mother Henriette Delille was like putting together the pieces of a jigsaw puzzle, said Benedictine Father Cyprian Davis.

His forthcoming book, "Henriette Delille, Servant of Slaves, Witness to the Poor," chronicles her life.

Father Davis, a professor of church history at St. Meinrad School of Theology in Indiana, said he wanted the book to be a "serious scholarly work" and has spent the past 10 years assembling the various pieces of Mother Henriette's life.

In 1994 the Sisters of the Holy Family chose Father Davis to write the biography of their foundress, whose canonization cause was accepted in 1988 by the Vatican. If her cause advances, she could become the first African-American saint.

Because there were few letters or diaries, Father Davis found his information in civil records, church records and financial records, and in the archives of the Sisters of the Holy Family.

In the middle of some bookkeeping records, Father Davis found Mother Henriette's rules for the sodality or confraternity that she was planning to form.

The Delille family became free because Mother Henriette's great, great grandmother, Nanette, who was brought to America as a slave, was freed after the death of her owner. Years later, Nanette had amassed enough money to buy her daughter and two of her grandchildren out of slavery.

In about 1836, Henriette underwent a religious experience during which she wrote, "I wish to live and die for God."

"She was active in baptizing slaves and encouraging marriages among them," said Father Davis.

Additionally she was active in the St. Claude School, an establishment for the education of young girls of color.

During the 1840s, Mother Henriette began assembling the group of women who would become the Sisters of the Holy Family, who received full ecclesiastical approval in 1851.

Judging by the sisters' library and archives, Father Davis concluded that the fledgling group was made up of educated and literate women.

Mother Henriette had been sick periodically during her life. In 1852, she drew up a will in which she left a gift to help "continue the charitable works that I have founded."

Mother Henriette died in 1862, probably of tuberculosis, Father Davis said.

Father Davis said he enjoyed doing the research for his book.

"Trying to put it all together was more difficult," he said. "I don't think of this as definitive, because I think others can continue digging and go further."

Pausing in the midst of a busy day to go to lunch has become part of the fabric of American life. For harried workers, lunch, though it may be quick, provides a bit of peace in an otherwise hectic day. Friends who infrequently see one another find that lunch provides a time to catch up on each other's lives.

Whether the eatery drips with high-dollar elegance or caters to those living on a shoestring, meeting for lunch has the ability to nourish the body and, surprisingly, sometimes the soul.

Two of my friends and I meet frequently. On any one day our luncheon discussion can lead to side-splitting laughter, a time to safely vent or misty, tear-clouded eyes. Sometimes the thread of conversation leads us into little trips down memory lane where we begin to shed light on the persons we have become.

One of us grew up in a middle-class Texas family, one grew up in poverty, one grew up with everything money could buy. During this particular meal we came around to discussing our divergent backgrounds and what life had been like for us as children who had everything or its opposite.

Out of such divergence we discovered that in each of our lives there was a person of wisdom who mentored us, laughed with us and loved us when we were impressionable children. The loving wise one in each of our lives was a grandparent who took the time and had the patience to help us discover the kind of treasure that lasts forever.

In the Gospel reading for this Sunday, we find a member of the ever-present crowd trying to get Jesus to settle an inheritance dispute between two siblings. Jesus removes himself from the argument, but also uses this feud over possessions to teach a greater lesson with the familiar parable of the wealthy farmer whose only solution for a bountiful harvest is to build bigger barns rather than to share his wealth.

This familiar parable is sandwiched between two admonitions, one from Jesus to the crowd and one from God to the rich farmer: "Life does not consist of possessions," but "in what matters to God."

Both of these admonitions found their way into the wisdom that our grandparents shared with us long ago.

Survey: Impact of 'Passion' doesn't match viewers' enjoyment of it

ONLY 18 PERCENT OF MOVIEGOERS SAID FILM CHANGED RELIGIOUS BEHAVIOR

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — A telephone survey examining the attitudes of moviegoers who saw "The Passion of the Christ" found that while a solid majority liked the film seeing the movie brought about few changes in individuals' faith or beliefs.

"The Passion" has become the eighth-biggest domestic-grossing film of all time, with receipts of $370 million.

Nine out of 10 viewers rated "The Passion" as either excellent or good, according to a survey conducted by the Barna Group of Ventura, Calif. Barna called 1,618 adults chosen at random; of those, 646 respondents had seen the movie.

But only 18 percent of the moviegoers said they had changed their religious behavior as a result of the film; 16 percent said they had changed their religious beliefs because of the movie's content; and 10 percent said they had done both.

"Among the most startling outcomes drawn from the research is the apparent absence of a direct evangelistic impact by the movie," the survey said. "Despite marketing campaigns labeling the movie the 'greatest evangelistic tool' of our era, less than one-tenth of 1 percent of those who saw the film stated that they made a profession of faith or accepted Jesus Christ as their savior in reaction to the film's content."

The survey added, "Equally surprising was the lack of impact on people's determination to engage in evangelism. Less than one-half of 1 percent of the audience said they were motivated to be more active in sharing their faith in Christ with others as a result of having seen the movie."

Only 6 percent of those surveyed said they had seen a movie in the past two years that led them to change something they believe about the Christian faith. Of that group, "The Passion of the Christ" was cited by 53 percent, while "Left Behind," "A Walk to Remember" and "Joshua" all registered 7 percent or less.

According to the survey report, when "pressed to describe specific shifts in their spiritual perspectives," those who said their religious beliefs changed because of the film listed: the perceived importance of how they treat other people; more concern about the effect of their life choices and personal behavior; and a deeper understanding of, or appreciation for, what Christ had done for them through his death and resurrection.

Those who said their religious behavior changed said they prayed more often, attended church services more often and/or became more involved in church-related activities.

"Immediate reaction to the movie seemed to be quite intense," said Barna Group research director George Barna in a statement, "but people's memories are short and are easily redirected in a media-saturated, fast-paced culture like ours."

"The typical adult had already watched another six movies at the time of the survey interview, not including dozens of hours of television programs they had also watched," he said.

But Barna added, "Don't lose sight of the fact that about 13 million adults changed some aspect of their typical religious behavior because of the movie and about 11 million people altered some pre-existing religious beliefs because of the content of that film. That's enormous influence."

Of those surveyed who saw "The Passion of the Christ," 53 percent said they were born-again Christians. If those numbers are reflective of the moviegoing public, the Barna survey said, then 36 million born-again adults saw the movie, as did 31 million adults who do not define themselves as born-again.

According to the survey, 68 percent of Catholics who saw "The Passion" rated it as excellent, as did 78 percent of born-again Christians. The movie was judged excellent by 67 percent of all surveyed who saw it.

The survey, conducted during the last week of May, claims a 2.4 percent margin of error among all respondents, and a 3.9 percent margin of error among "The Passion" viewers.

A supreme film is 'Bourne'

Matt Damon and Julia Stiles star in "The Bourne Supremacy," a frenetic film about a CIA amnesiac assassin struggling with disturbing memories of a violent incident in which he may have played a part. Fine performances but extremely fast editing take this a couple of notches below the excellence of the first film, "The Bourne Identity." Scenes of intense action violence and a brief instance of crude language. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is PG-13 — parents are strongly cautioned. Some material may be inappropriate for children under 13.

Abbey honors former N.C. senator and local artist

Marshall and Jeanne Rauch receive 2004 Grace Award

BELMONT — Belmont Abbey College presented its annual 2004 Grace Award to Marshall and Jeanne Rauch in a special ceremony celebrating their accomplishments May 27.

More than a hundred guests attended the event at the college, including members of the Rauch family; Abbot Placid Solari, OSB, then-interim president of the college; and Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor of the Diocese of Charlotte.

Named for Charles L. "Chuck" Grace, president of Cummins Atlantic, Inc., of Charlotte and a longtime supporter of Belmont Abbey College, the Grace Award honors an individual in the Gaston/Mecklenburg County area who has made significant contributions to the college and the community.

The Rauches were selected by the Belmont Abbey College Associates and the Belmont Abbey College Board of Advisors in recognition of their public service and commitment to the community.

Recipients of the Grace Award include Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin and Msgr. West.

Loyal and devoted friends of the college, the Rauches have dedicated their lives to improving not only ties between Gaston County and the greater Charlotte area, but also communities across the state. From the N.C. Senate floor in Raleigh (where Marshall served as a senator for the 25th District for 23 years) to the Country Art and History Museum (where Jeanne served as its first president in 1976), Marshall and Jeanne Rauch continue to leave their mark and make a difference.

As spiritual leaders, the couple serves as examples with their committed ministry and service to their Jewish faith.

Marriage amendment fails

eral secretary of the U.S. bishops' conference and a panel of clergy and activists.

"Marriage is not an arbitrary social arrangement that can be altered by either the church or the state," said Msgr. William P. Fay at a July 12 Capitol event.

"It is God's will for humanity and the keystone of every human community," he said.

Msgr. Fay was among a dozen speakers, including Christian and Jewish clergy. But even supporters of the amendment had conceded it was unlikely to pass on its first hearing.

"The protection of marriage is essential to the health and well-being of our nation, and the vast majority of Americans know it," he said. "The truths about marriage that we seek to protect are truths that are present in the order of nature and can be perceived, even without faith, by the light of natural reason."

After the vote July 14, Bishop Wilton D. Gregory, president of the U.S. bishops' conference, said the bishops were disappointed that the Senate failed to keep discussion open and ultimately hold a vote on the legislation itself.

Senate backers of the bill said they would bring the issue back at a later date.

Many of the speakers at the July 12 event said the marriage amendment is not about legislating discrimination against homosexuals, as some opponents of the effort have said.

Defining a marriage

In a July 6 letter to U.S. senators, Bishop Gregory said preserving marriage as the union of one man and one woman "is not simply a Catholic concern" but "part of the common moral heritage of humanity" shared by "believers and nonbelievers, Christians and non-Christians alike."

"It is precisely this moral heritage that must be protected today from the small but vocal minority that would alter the definition of marriage by making same-sex unions the legal equivalent of marriage," he said.

"A same sex union is not equivalent to marriage," added Bishop Gregory. "It is not based on the natural complementarity of male and female; it cannot cooperate with God to create new life; it cannot be a true conjugal union."

"The institution of marriage has been weakened and eroded by many forces," he wrote. "The social cost is already too high."

Support of the amendment is necessary, he had told the senators, in order "to preserve and protect this vital institution that undergirds the well-being of spouses, children, families, communities and society itself."

Defending traditional families

Last September, the bishops' Administrative Committee issued a formal statement calling for efforts at all levels of government to support traditional marriage, including a federal constitutional amendment.

Bishop Gregory encouraged other bishops to use that statement, "Between Man and Woman: Questions and Answers About Marriage and Same-sex Unions," as an educational resource in dioceses and as a source of background information for pastoral leaders.

In a July 2 statement, Supreme Knight Carl Anderson called on all Knights of Columbus to contact their senators and express support for the proposed marriage amendment.

"Amending the Constitution is something that we should never take lightly," Anderson said. "But the recent same-sex marriage decision by the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court leaves no alternative. The danger that other state or federal courts will adopt their reasoning and strike down laws protecting traditional marriage is now very great."

In the Diocese of Charlotte, the Family Life Office of Catholic Social Services will explore ways to encourage advocacy aimed at state and national levels for the preservation of traditional marriage.

"As we do on a variety of other issues, an important part of the mission of the Family Life Office is to support the advocacy efforts of the church," said Gerard Carter, Family Life Office director.

"In this case, we will be involved in ensuring that parishioners are made aware of the church's statements on the threat to traditional marriage posed by recent judicial decisions on same-sex marriage," he said.

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

The first time a human solo and non-stop flew across the Atlantic Ocean, it was a news event of epic proportions. Everyone knew how lucky Lindy was and for the rest of his life, based on a single 33-hour airplane flight, Charles Lindbergh was a cultural icon.

Today, crossing the great pond that separates us from Europe is as newsworthy as a sunrise. It happens every day.

Who was the next person to make that flight? Who knows? Who cares?

It is a given with the news media that being first is noteworthy and that being second doesn't matter because repetition is boring. Nowhere is this "star factor" for being first more amply demonstrated than the recent release of a report about the sexual abuse of minors at the hands of adults.

I'm not referring to the February release of the John Jay study that detailed sexual abuse in the Catholic Church over a 50-year period. This new study was released on June 30. Its findings are far more shocking than those of the John Jay study and its application is much broader, but it has received very little attention from the media. The Charlotte Observer buried the story on page three; the article did not show up in an archive search of newspapers in Winston-Salem, Greensboro and Asheville.

The study, entitled "Educator Sexual Misconduct: A Synthesis of Existing Literature," was ordered by the U.S. Congress. The author, Charol Shakeshaft of Hofstra University in Hempstead, N.Y., reviewed hundreds of scholarly reports on sexual abuse of minors by adults in the public schools.

Using accepted statistical practices, she found that 4.5 million children — 10 percent of all who are in public schools — have been abused by public school employees or adult volunteers. The majority of abuse, 67 percent, takes place at the hands of teachers and other educators with the remainder of the offenses committed by adult volunteers.

The abuse includes inappropriate language and touching, pedophilia and sexual activity of every description. By contrast, the John Jay study found approximately 10,600 cases of abuse involving clergy.

This would be a good place for Catholics to say something like, "See, I told you it wasn't only our problem." Some might assume that the lack of coverage is proof of a media plot to protect public schools or degrade Catholics. But all of that overlooks the greater good that was accomplished through the Catholic Church's commitment to the "Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People" — it brought a serious social problem into the open.

Even though the findings of the Shakeshaft study are shocking, they may be only a peek beneath the covers. One of its recommendations is that a more comprehensive, nationwide study be undertaken to determine the full scope and nature of the problem. If that sounds like the description of a John Jay study for public schools, it's because the John Jay report is the beacon that lights the way to other institutions investigating the serious problem of the abuse of children. Presumably, the public schools will also take the bold steps necessary to root out the sinful crimes.

Scouting, organized sports, private schools and summer camps, to name a few, are likely to have sordid stories in the closet that should, for the sake of the children, be brought into the light of day. In the coming years, these institutions either will examine themselves or be called upon to do so.

As Catholics, we can be proud of the fact that our church led the way in identifying and removing a serious problem that affects defenseless children. Because the church was first to be so forthcoming about this problem, it will be remembered more than the second or the third institution that does the same.

But don't expect the media or the public to forgive or forget the sins that were uncovered in the John Jay study. Given the media preference for titillation over a substantive response to a serious problem, Catholics are likely to be reminded over and over of the sin and not of the reconciliation. Being first may make the Catholic Church the brunt of crude jokes on late night television for years to come, but that is a small price to pay for a world in which children are safer.

Something good arising from suffering — that has a familiar ring to it, doesn't it?

Following God's word brings strength, serenity, says pope

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY — Following God's word faithfully and consistently brings strength and serenity to one's life, said Pope John Paul II.

The Lord's teachings and commandments are "clear and give light" to the faithful as they face the sometimes dark moments in life, he said in his July 21 weekly general audience.

By being "wholly faithful to the will of God ... one will find peace in one's soul and will be able to overcome the dark entanglements in life's trials and reach true joy," he said.

The large number of people requesting free tickets to this week's general audience prompted the pope to briefly leave his summer residence of Castel Gandolfo and hold his weekly catechesis back in Rome.

The courtyard of his summer residence — some 18 miles southeast of the capital — holds about 1,000 people. More than 5,000 people packed into the Vatican's Paul VI audience hall to hear the pope give his July 21 address and blessings.

The Vatican said other Wednesday audiences also may be held in the air-conditioned auditorium as the need arises.

Pope John Paul focused on verses 105-112 of Psalm 119, which gives praise to God's law.

The psalmist swears to accept, safeguard and follow God's commands, saying, "Your decrees are my inheritance forever; the joy of my heart they are," the pope said.

The pope said this "peaceful conscience is the strength of the believer; his consistency in obeying divine decrees is the source of serenity."

Just as a father's "bidding is a lamp and teaching a light," God's laws are "a lamp for one's feet and light to one's path," he said.

Christ, too, offered this same image when he revealed, "I am the light of the world. Whoever follows me will never walk in darkness but will have the light of life," the pope said.

Children's status after an annulment

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Recently I had a conversation with a 42-year-old divorced friend who never receives Communion. I asked if she ever thought of seeking an annulment. She answered, "No. I love my children [both grown], and was told by 'others' that they would be labeled illegitimate." Is this true? (Wisconsin)

A. No, it is not true. If the couple were free to marry in the first place, children born during their legal union are considered legitimate, even after an annulment.

Even in civil law, such a union is called a "putative marriage." That is, everyone thought it was a marriage, and there was no overt reason to think otherwise. The fact that some condition was present that enabled the marriage to be annulled years later does not change the fact that this couple was thought to be married by everyone, including even themselves.

Their children are legitimate for all purposes of church law.

What is greatness?

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

The death of President Ronald Reagan has begun an animated discussion about his life and legacy. The coverage of his passing was monumental. In fact, it put so much emphasis on his administration and his style of leadership that many have been reminded of what they lived through but had forgotten.

At so many levels, this was a remarkable man. Reagan's childhood was difficult. His father struggled with alcohol. Money was never plentiful. As Reagan himself said: "I guess we'd be called poor people, but we truly didn't even know that we were."

He was blessed with a "can do" spirit and eternal optimism, and much is now being written about his strong faith and dedicated Americanism.

Ronald Reagan's success in getting the former Soviet Union to consider a change of structure and approach would seem to be his high point as president. Surely his efforts for a lasting peace did work to alter a world too long on the brink of nuclear annihilation.

But with all due respect to his many national and international accomplishments, I'd like to focus on one central strength that, for me, made Ronald Wilson Reagan a truly great person. He was someone who made mistakes. And some of them were sizable.

For example, as governor of California, Reagan signed into law one of the most permissive abortion standards ever. But rather then defend his mistake, or simply blame it on being badly advised by others, he did something remarkable. He owned up to the wrong decision.

And more to the point, he spent the rest of his life proclaiming the absolute sacredness of human life. He was, for his eight years as president, unapologetically pro-life.

The same trait revealed itself when it came to deficits. Reagan had been elected based on a platform of shrinking government, lowering taxes and balancing the budget. But, in truth, of the three goals, he only achieved the lowering of taxes. Government grew under his leadership and the deficit soared.

Again, others might have blamed those around him, but not Reagan. His farewell address as president was notable for its honesty. The president, after outlining his successes, also voiced his sorrow over his failures.

On a personal level, Reagan lived more of the same. Being a champion of family values doesn't mean that living those values is easy. Clearly, Reagan had a difficult time relating to his own four children. That's not uncommon in any family. But what he did to correct the estrangement is, I believe, uncommon.

We're told that Reagan spent his early retirement years rebuilding bridges to his children. Before Alzheimer's Disease incapacitated him, he worked at trying to fix that which had been broken. In other words, he accepted the failure and then saw to it that it was never too late for reconciliation.

In each of these situations we find a remarkable leader. We find someone who can admit error, attempt to heal the problem, and keep on learning and growing until the end. For me, more then any international accolade, this is where the greatness of President Ronald Reagan is most clearly reflected.

Ronald W. Reagan, R.I.P.

Catholic commitment to Christ

Ask the Bishop

BISHOP PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF CHARLOTTE

Q: Thirty years ago, I responded to a call at a Billy Graham Crusade and made a commitment to Christ. Are Catholics given a similar opportunity to respond to the full Gospel via a personal commitment to Jesus Christ? (Ronald Schuck, Cornelius)

A: Our commitment to Christ and our response to him begin at our baptism.

"The Catechism of the Catholic Church" (CCC) reminds us that through baptism we are freed from sin and reborn as children of God. Baptism configures us to Christ, and seals us with the indelible spiritual character of belonging to Christ. (CCC 1213, 1272)

At baptism, we first become committed to Christ. The grace of baptism accomplishes in us this unique belonging to Christ.

Confirmation, in turn, completes baptism and seals us with the Holy Spirit. The grace of confirmation unites us even more firmly to Christ, and thus strengthens our belonging to Him. We receive a special strength from the Holy Spirit to be a witness to Christ and to our faith. Our commitment to the Lord and his teaching is a lived daily reality. (CCC 1303, 1304)

Holy Eucharist further increases our belonging to Christ, for in the holy sacrament is the real and substantial presence of Christ himself. When we enter into sacramental communion with the Lord, we share in a most intimate way in Christ's life.

It is a belonging to Him, and a being with Him, which Christ promised at the Last Supper: "Whoever eats my flesh and drinks my blood remains in me and I in him." (Jn. 6:56)

These are the sacraments of initiation, which establish and increase the life of grace in us. These and the other sacraments root us in Christ.

Each day, our commitment to Christ is also nurtured through prayer, spiritual reading, works of charity and sacrifices. Our commitment to Christ is demonstrated in a most public way by our participation in the celebration of the Eucharist every Sunday.

The problem of pain

Babies feel it, abortion doctors don't

In the 17th century, Philosopher Rene Descartes was notorious for believing that animals do not feel pain. Some Descartes scholars argue that what he denied was not the animal's ability to be conscious of pain, but rather its ability to be self-conscious about it — that is, to sense that the feelings are associated with that animal's own self.

In America today, there are federal animal welfare laws because we recognize that animals do feel pain, regardless of whether they experience what some call existential suffering. There are laws on the humane slaughter of farm animals and on how research laboratory animals may be treated, among others.

But this compassion does not reach the unborn human baby. One culprit here is the U.S. Supreme Court's 1973 ruling in Roe v. Wade, which requires the U.S. government to be blind to the unborn child's claim on life where abortion is concerned. This has encouraged many to be blind to the child's pain and suffering as well.

Every year 20,000 unborn children are killed in abortions done at 21 weeks' gestation or beyond, according to the Alan Guttmacher Institute and the Centers for Disease Control.

Yet testimony from recent federal trials regarding the Partial-Birth Abortion Ban Act made known to the general public a fact that has been known to researchers for years: that unborn children can experience pain at 20 weeks, if not before. Pain expert Dr. Kanwaljeet Anand testified that abortions at this stage will cause pain to the unborn child, and "it will be severe and excruciating pain."

Witnesses from the abortion industry made it clear they didn't know the research on fetal pain, and what's more, they didn't care.

Judge Richard Casey asked Dr. Stephen Chasen, a plaintiff in a New York lawsuit, "Does it hurt the baby?" He answered, "I don't know." Later in the exchange, Judge Casey asked, "I asked you if you had any care or concern for the fetus whose head you were crushing." His answer: "No."

Testimony also revealed that the very women making the decision to abort are kept in the dark about this important information. An exchange between Judge Casey and Dr. Marilynn Fredriksen is illustrative:

THE COURT: Do you tell [the women] whether or not it will hurt the fetus?

THE WITNESS: The intent [is] that the fetus will die during the process of uterine evacuation.

THE COURT: Ma'am, I didn't ask you that. You will deliver the baby partially and then insert a pair of scissors in the base of the fetus' skull. ... Do you tell them whether or not that hurts the fetus?

THE WITNESS: I have never talked to a fetus about whether or not they experience pain.

Thankfully, Senator Sam Brownback and Congressman Chris Smith have begun efforts to right this wrong by introducing the Unborn Child Pain Awareness Act, requiring that mothers be notified about the pain caused by abortions at 20 weeks. If the United States has enough compassion to pass laws on the well-being of animals, surely it can find the compassion to acknowledge the pain that abortion causes to human children.

THE SOUND OF SILENCE

Pope John Paul II looks out at the view of Mont Blanc from northern Italy July 16. The pontiff described the area where he spent 12 days of vacation as an "enchanting place." During his holiday, the pope preached on the value of silence.

thing in our lives," the pope told hundreds of visitors gathered July 18 in the courtyard of his summer villa south of Rome.

The pope arrived at the villa in Castel Gandolfo July 17, after a 12-day vacation in the northern Italian Alps. The pope spent his days there taking drives through the mountains and putting the finishing touches on a book about philosophy.

He also spoke to some 6,000 people who gathered in a field near Les Combes, and told them the communications overload of modern society has reduced the space for silence and contemplation.

It sometimes reaches the point of "making people incapable of reflecting and praying," he said.

"In reality, only in silence can man listen deep in his conscience to the voice of God, which truly makes him free. And vacations can help people rediscover and cultivate this indispensable inner dimension of human existence," he said.

Reciting the midday Angelus prayer with pilgrims at the villa July 18, the pope said, "Christ is always among us and wants to speak to our hearts."

"We can listen to him by meditating with faith on the sacred Scriptures, gathering ourselves in private or community prayer and pausing in silence before the tabernacle where he speaks to us of his love," the pope said.

The commandment to keep the Lord's day holy, he said, must include participating in a Sunday liturgy, "but other moments of prayer and reflection, of rest and brotherhood can contribute to sanctifying the day of the Lord."

Pope John Paul told the visitors he was happy to be at Castel Gandolfo, where he will be spending most of his time until late September.

The pope will leave Castel Gandolfo Aug. 14-15 for a trip to the Shrine of Our Lady of Lourdes in France.

Before leaving his vacation spot in Les Combes, a village in the Aosta Valley, the pope met with the local mayor and city council and with a variety of police and forest service agents.

He told the law enforcement personnel, "you have been like guardian angels, who with efficiency and discretion" ensured the vacation went smoothly.

In his remarks to the mayor and city council, the pope thanked the area's residents for the care and concern they showed him.

Describing the area as "an enchanting place," the pope prayed that "the Lord, whose omnipotent providence is very evident in these Alpine landscapes, continue to protect the community."

Dear Brothers and Sisters in the Diocese of Charlotte,

This week, two other bishops of the South and I are jointly issuing a statement entitled, "Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion." In this statement, we are addressing the question of pro-abortion Catholic politicians and the reception of Holy Communion.

The consistent support of abortion legislation by some Catholic public officials is a gravely sinful act. This public stance precludes the politicians from being admitted to Holy Communion as long as they persist in their pro-abortion stance. The reception of Holy Communion by pro-abortion Catholic public officials is a scandal to the Catholic faithful, which risks leading them into error regarding the true teaching of the Church on the intrinsic evil of procured abortion.

At our Special Assembly in June, the bishops of the United States discussed the topic of "Catholics in Political Life." In that statement, we reminded Catholic politicians of the moral teaching of our church in regard to abortion: "... The killing of an unborn child is always intrinsically evil and can never be justified."

We also appealed to pro-abortion Catholic politicians to have a change of heart and stop supporting abortion legislation:

"It is with pastoral solicitude for everyone involved in the political process that we will also counsel Catholic public officials that their acting consistently to support abortion on demand risks making them cooperators in evil in a public manner. We will persist in this duty to counsel, in the hope that the scandal of their cooperating in evil can be resolved by the proper formation of their consciences."

I ask that you pray, as I do, for all those involved in the political process, and that you pray also for a greater respect in our country for the dignity of the life of the unborn child.

Wishing God's blessings upon each of you, I promise you a remembrance in my prayers.

Sincerely yours in Christ,

Most Reverend Peter J. Jugis

Bishop Misael Vacca Ramirez of Yopal, Colombia, and Father Jose Juya, Hispanic ministry coordinator for the Gaston Vicariate, lead a procession at St. Michael Church in Gastonia Sept. 13, 2003. Bishop Vacca was recently kidnapped but freed unharmed July 27 by a leftist group in Colombia.

Kidnapped Colombian bishop released unharmed by captors

Bishop Vacca attempted to foster unity in Colombia and Diocese of Charlotte

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — A Colombian bishop, who visited the Diocese of Charlotte last year, was kidnapped by armed rebels in Colombia but freed unharmed by his captors the same day Pope John Paul II appealed for his release.

Bishop Misael Vacca Ramirez of Yopal was set free July 27 after he was taken prisoner three days earlier by members of the leftist rebel group, the National Liberation Army, known by its Spanish initials of ELN.

"I was treated well and there was never any lack of respect," said the bishop, according to a July 28 report.

Bishop Vacca walked for three hours after he was released to reach the Diocese of Trinidad. Bishop Vacca was then flown by helicopter to his residence in Yopal and, after a medical examination, was found to be tired but in good health.

The bishop thanked all those who worked for his release, including Colombia's church leaders and Pope John Paul, who had urgently appealed for his immediate liberation.

In September 2003, Bishop Vacca visited St. Michael Church in Gastonia to help promote unity among Colombians and other Hispanic parishioners and to encourage prayers for Colombia, which has struggled with civil war for decades.

The Vatican had called the bishop's capture "an unjustifiable criminal act."

In a July 27 written statement, the Vatican said it was "extremely distressing and objectionable" for a bishop to be "impeded from freely exercising his pastoral ministry in such a despicable manner."

Bishop Vacca and two other priests were kidnapped by ELN members July 24 while on a pastoral visit in the town of Morcote, northeast of Colombia's capital, Bogota.

The mayor of Nunchia also was kidnapped by the same group of armed abductors.

After the two priests and the city official were released the next day, the priests said the rebels planned to release the bishop after giving him a message for the government.

The National Liberation Army is Colombia's second-largest rebel group with at least 3,500 guerrillas. They and the larger Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia have been locked in a 40-year armed struggle against the government and right-wing death squads.

In June the government offered to stop operations against the ELN and restart stalled negotiations if the groups called a cease-fire. The Catholic Church has long acted as a channel for dialogue between left- and right-wing groups and the government. It has helped negotiate previous peace deals and guarantee the release of civilian hostages.

Bishop Vacca had been involved in peace efforts among rebels, paramilitary groups and the government that are vying for control of the petroleum-rich regions of Casanare and Boyaca.

New program provides Catholic priests on two cruise lines

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A new program under the Apostleship of the Sea's direction is providing approved and certified Catholic priests on board two cruise lines operating in the United States — Celebrity and Holland America.

An announcement of the program said the two companies "can now promise their guests and crews that they will have an approved Roman Catholic priest on every one of their cruises."

Other cruise lines are being encouraged to join the priest program for cruise ships "so that they too can provide the best quality of Catholic pastoral care and ministry to guests and crews," the announcement said.

Priesthood Sunday set for Oct. 31 this year

CHICAGO (CNS) — Priesthood Sunday, a celebration of the American priesthood set for Oct. 31 this year, will be marked in Catholic parishes throughout the United States with prayer, dialogue and social events.

Father Robert J. Silva, president of the Chicago-based National Federation of Priests' Councils, said the purpose of the day is to engage "a national conversation about the priesthood."

Priesthood Sunday was first observed in October 2003 as a reaction to the shadows cast over all priests by the sex abuse crisis.

Ten percent of U.S. parishes took part in the event last year, but as many as 25 percent are expected to be involved this year.

Lay people at each parish and school are asked to develop their own way of marking the day and honoring both the priesthood and their own priests. A Web site — www.priestsunday.org — offers ideas.

There are about 44,000 priests in the United States, and only 4,000 of the 19,000 U.S. parishes currently have more than one priest.

Pope calls on Muslims, Christians to unite after Iraqi church attacks

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Deploring a string of deadly car bomb attacks on five Catholic churches in Iraq, Pope John Paul II called on Muslims and Christians to unite against "all forms of violence" and to work together to bring peace and stability to the country.

The pope said Aug. 2 he was saddened and "deeply struck" upon hearing the news of the Aug. 1 attacks that left at least 11 people dead and 50 others wounded.

A wave of explosions ripped through churches in Baghdad and the northern city of Mosul early Aug. 1 just when parishioners were attending or leaving their places of worship. Iraq accused a terrorist group linked to al-Qaida with the attacks.

"At this time of trial, I am spiritually close to the church and the Iraqi people," read the pope's message, which was sent to the head of the Assembly of the Catholic Bishops of Iraq, Chaldean Patriarch Emmanuel-Karim Delly.

The pope renewed his "heartfelt solidarity with priests and the faithful," assuring them of his prayers and "constant commitment to a climate of peace and reconciliation being established in this beloved country, as a soon as possible."

He called on Muslims and Christians, "all believers in the one compassionate and merciful God, to unite and deplore every form of violence and to cooperate for the return of harmony on Iraq's tormented soil."

Vatican and Iraqi church leaders condemned the latest attacks. A top Iraqi church official in Rome said those responsible for the blasts were intent on "demolishing the new Iraq and its new freedoms."

Bishop says pope to visit Lourdes to praise God, not seek healing

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II will make an Aug. 14-15 pilgrimage to Lourdes, France, not to seek physical healing but to praise God for his great gifts, including the gift of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

"Lourdes is not just a place to seek healing, it is a place where people demonstrate their faith in God and their devotion to Mary," said Bishop Renato Boccardo, the papal trip organizer.

The 84-year-old Pope John Paul has billed his trip to the shrine in the French Pyrenees as part of his commemoration of the 150th anniversary of the solemn proclamation of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception.

"The Holy Father is not going to Lourdes because he is sick," Bishop Boccardo said. "He is going because he is the pope, and he will carry the whole church with him to offer adoration to Mary and to God."

In 1858, 14-year-old Bernadette Soubirous claimed she had seen Mary 18 times in a grotto near Lourdes. When Bernadette asked her name, Mary replied, "I am the Immaculate Conception."

In the Lourdes apparitions, Mary called for prayer and penance, and she told Bernadette to drink the water of the small spring in the grotto. Five days later, a friend of Bernadette's bathed her injured arm in the spring and was healed.

The pope will drink water from the Lourdes spring upon his arrival at the grotto Aug. 14.

"The water is a sign of reconciliation and of baptism," the bishop said.

Bishop Boccardo said that Pope John Paul will not bathe in the waters of the spring, which is a ritual of faith and hope carried out by more than 300,000 ailing people each year.

"I can exclude that the pope is going to ask for healing" while at Lourdes, the bishop said. "Rather, he will praise God for his great works, one of which was Mary."

According to the shrine's official Lourdes Magazine, 66 healings have been recognized as miraculous since the time of the apparitions.

MANY MINISTRIES

Sister Schmidt leaves North Carolina after four decades of service

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

BELMONT — After nearly 40 years in North Carolina, Mercy Sister Antonette Schmidt is moving on.

Sister Schmidt, director of diocesan young adult ministry, is beginning a new ministry as vice president for mission and values at Mercy Suburban Hospital in Norristown, Pa.

"The Catholic Church has a specific mission in health care — caring for the poor and those who can afford to pay," said Sister Schmidt. "It's a constant balancing act, and attention between caring for the poor and making sure the mission endures."

Sister Schmidt, who will be chairing the ethics and bio-ethics committee at the hospital, looks forward to ensuring a respect for life from conception to death. Her new duties in Pennsylvania are similar to those she had at St. Joseph Hospital in Asheville in the 1990s.

"You have ethical directives that must be applied to sometimes very difficult medical decisions," she said. She will also be responsible for ensuring the "respect for the dignity of each person — staff and patients. You treat everyone with dignity."

Sister Schmidt said she would miss the sense of community among Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"The interconnectedness has been a wonderful gift," she said. "You get to know people who are as committed to the Kingdom of God as you are."

Moving up North will be "very exciting. It will be different working in a diocese that's old and established," said Sister Schmidt. "But it is my home — it's where I came from."

A "great deal" of her family still resides in Pennsylvania.

"It (the transition) is not as unsettling as going somewhere where there is no family present," she said. "But I will miss my sisters in community. I'll miss the proximity to the sisters I have literally become an adult with."

Growing up in Berwyn, Pa., Sister Schmidt heard her calling to the life of a woman religious in the form of a whisper in her head at the age of 10 or 11. She was at Benediction and looking at the monstrance when she heard the words, "I want you."

Mercy Sister Antonette Schmidt chats with diocesan personnel during her farewell party at the Pastoral Center July 27.

As a child, she was aware of the meaning of the words, but did not understand their significance for her life. She heard the call again in high school.

"I was sitting there, and the thought came, uninvited and intrusive," she said. "I said, 'go knock on someone else's door.' I was clear about wanting to be married and wanting to have children."

She became a Catholic schoolteacher but could not ignore her calling. After serious soul-searching, she spoke with a sister in a local community.

"She told me to look for a community that had teaching as a ministry, and I happened to be working with the Sisters of Mercy at the time," said Sister Schmidt.

In 1965, Sister Schmidt entered the Sisters of Mercy of the Americas Regional Community in North Carolina when she was 21.

"I remember being homesick only once. I had the feeling that I was home; it was where I was meant to be," said Sister Schmidt, who professed her final vows in 1971 at her childhood parish.

Living and working in the Diocese of Charlotte has been a great experience, she said.

"Service in a mission diocese is filled with possibilities for spreading the Word and ministry," she said. "I've been blessed in being able to serve in many ministries."

She continued with her first love of teaching for more than 22 years. She earned a bachelor's degree in education from Sacred Heart College in Belmont in 1973 and a master's degree in religious studies from LaSalle University in Philadelphia in 1980.

She studied for a year in Rome and received an advanced certificate in Scripture and theology and had diocesan training for spiritual direction.

She worked as a retreat director at Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center in Maggie Valley during the summers from 1986 to 1991, and as a hospital chaplain at St. Joseph Hospital in Asheville from 1990 until 1998 after receiving certification in clinical pastoral services from Carolinas Medical Center.

In 2000, she became a member of the American Red Cross' Spiritual Response Team for national incidents involving mass casualties.

In addition to her work in young adult ministry, she served as co-director of McArthur Spirituality Center for youth and young adults and House of Hospitality for young adults, both in Belmont.

She said that she can see a continuous thread throughout her work and ministry.

"I have always tried to communicate the wonder of God's love through my ministry. I really believe that's my mission," she said.

The diocesan Education Vicariate gave a farewell party for her at the Pastoral Center July 27.

"The Diocese of Charlotte has been blessed greatly by her spiritual leadership in relation to the young adults of the diocese," said Father James Hawker, vicar for education and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill.

"As she leaves for new areas of ministry, we are so deeply grateful for her unique contribution here in the diocese by her generous, gracious, competent and consistent service to the young adults," he said.

"I hope I leave behind the impression that one can be a woman who thirsts for God and enjoys life," said Sister Schmidt. "No matter what I did, I hope that would be what I leave behind."

Catholic Daughters add new court

Thirty-nine women from three parishes join national organization

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

SYLVA — The North Carolina Catholic Daughters of the Americas recently added to its roster with the institution of a new court at St. Mary Church.

Thirty-nine women from three churches — St. Joseph Church in Bryson City, Our Lady of Guadalupe Church in Cherokee and St. Mary Church — have joined the new court since its inception June 27.

During the June 27 ceremony, 30 women were received by Joyce Rachid, state regent, into the national organization of Catholic Daughters. Father Ray Williams, pastor of St. Mary Church, became the court's first chaplain.

Additionally, two women were inducted July 4 and seven women were inducted July 11.

"There was a very generous response from the women in the parishes," said Father Williams. "It shows there is a real need for women in a cooperative role. They've launched something that is going to take off."

Many benefits

The new court, Court St. Mary, Mother of God, joins a dozen other Catholic Daughters courts (chapters) in North Carolina; there are now six courts in the Diocese of Raleigh, seven in the Diocese of Charlotte.

"We meet to see what is needed at the three parishes," said Sandy Beauchemin, court regent. "Many ladies were already helping with their church's needs, but now we have an umbrella under which to operate."

"We have a group of women who are organized," she said. "With an organized group, you can do so much more."

Both Beauchemin and Father Williams said that the court, in addition to assisting the parishes, offers socialization for women.

"It's something we did for the churches and something we did for ourselves," she said. "Since the court's inception, the women are so motivated."

Beauchemin credits Rita Goffinet, the court's recording secretary, for Court St. Mary's existence. After attending the funeral of a local Knight of Columbus, Goffinet, whose mother was a Catholic Daughter, thought it would be ideal to have a local court to support grieving widows.

"She decided it needed to be done and she did it, with my blessing," said Father Williams. "She's done a marvelous job."

"She was instrumental in getting the 38 women together," said Beauchemin.

A court needs 15 members before it can be founded, but Goffinet didn't stop there.

"She was always shooting for more," said Beauchemin.

Recruiting and retaining members were topics discussed during the North Carolina Catholic Daughters of the Americas' leadership seminar at the Catholic Conference Center in August 2003. The seminar was not part of their biennial convention — since 1956, the state's Catholic Daughters have met every other year for a conference that is part business meeting, part spiritual retreat.

"(The) seminar was something new to try and get new members," said Ruth Carlisle, a parishioner of St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte and Catholic Daughters state treasurer.

Helping others

From its inception in 1903, Catholic Daughters of the Americas has grown and developed into the largest organization of Catholic women in the Americas. Headquartered in New York with 100,000 members in the United States, Guam, Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, Dominican Republic and Mexico, Catholic Daughters of the Americas' purpose is to help the church in its religious, charitable and educational works.

The organization, open to Catholic lay and religious women 18 years of age or older, supports Covenant House, which provides shelter and services to homeless and runaway youths; Support Our Aging Religious, a national agency that helps religious orders meet retirement needs; Holy Cross Family Ministries; the U.S. bishops' Apostleship of the Seas; Teachers of Exceptional Children in conjunction with the National Catholic Educational Association; Morality in Media; Catholic Relief Services; and Habitat for Humanity.

It also provides scholarships and support for seminarians.

The Junior Catholic Daughters of the Americas, the national program for girls ages 6-18, was founded in 1925.

Court St. Mary, Mother of God will be having a luau and auction as a fundraiser in late August, but Beauchemin was looking forward to the court's first official charitable work, a local Habitat for Humanity project that was held June 31.

"We're providing lunch for the workers and homeowners," she said. "We got the call and we responded. It's all falling into place."

WINSTON-SALEM — The Life Teen youth ministry from St. Leo the Great Church in Winston-Salem recently participated in "Rise Up: A Catholic Revolution," the high school youth conference held June 25-27 on the campus of Franciscan University of Steubenville, Ohio.

Fifty teens and adults from St. Leo the Great Church were among 2,300 participants from the United States and Canada who experienced speakers, music and skits. Their weekend was highlighted with a procession and adoration of the Blessed Sacrament.

A growing number of participants from St. Leo the Great Church have been attending the Steubenville conferences for six consecutive years. The teens say they come back home on fire for their love of God and ready to live their faith every day.

ing to do, had yet to experience this wonderful opportunity to reach out to others in need," said Brynne Beal, youth group member. "However, many of the boys that went in years past have continued to attend this trip every year, fund raising and saving their money in order to go."

The group spent the week living at a Franciscan Sisters of Allegheny convent while working during the day with the Missionaries of the Poor, an international monastic order of brothers started in 1981 by Father Richard Ho Lung.

The group worked in teams at four of the five centers run by the brothers; the shelters were mainly for homeless men, women and children, while one was for the homeless and AIDS patients and children.

"We had a chance to see them all, and spend time where we felt most called," said Brynne.

The days began with a Mass celebrated by Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church.

"For me, the highlight of the day was Mass and receiving the grace necessary to fulfill what was asked of us throughout the day," said Chris Beal, parish youth minister.

Brynne said her first day at Bethlehem House was overwhelming.

"As we walked in the door children surrounded us. They were longing for attention and glowing from ear to ear, extremely happy to see us," she said. "...Seeing the children brought a tear to my eye. They embraced us and even called some of us women 'mommy.'"

Teams reported similar experiences at all the shelters.

"Everyone wanted to play a game with you, hold your hand and talk to you," said Brynne. "... You wanted to be there with all of the people doing whatever they needed."

Needed tasks at the centers included bathing, clothing, diapering, feeding, applying lotion, clipping nails and dressing wounds.

"You end up doing things you never imagined you could or would do," said Brynne. "It is a lot of hard work that cannot be accomplished without prayer."

"One of the brothers told me, 'In whatever you do, remember that you are doing it for Jesus, and do it to the best of your ability,'" said Brynne. "This stuck with me and it was in the back of my mind the whole trip."

Each night, group members would share the day's events and how they saw Christ in the people and each other.

"I found out many things about myself. I went to Jamaica on a mission trip to help others, but in reality I was the one that was helped," said Brynne.

"I was humbled by my experience," she said.

FIGHTING FOR LIFE

Rachel's Vineyard leaders attend conference

Post-abortion ministry help healing process

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

GREENSBORO — Helping women who have had abortions receive forgiveness and healing is an important ministry in the fight for life.

Approximately 100 people from the United States, including the Diocese of Charlotte; Ireland; and Canada spent five days in June receiving in-depth training, learning how to minister to women and men who have been affected by abortion and how to continue the fight for the unborn.

The Rachel's Vineyard-Rachel Network Leaders in Ministry Conference was co-sponsored by the diocesan Respect Life Office and Rachel Network and took place at Greensboro College June 20-25. The event provided training sessions for pastors, lay ministers, Christian counselors, pregnancy care center volunteers and peer counselors involved in respect life ministries.

"The conference was primarily designed to help leaders of post-abortion ministries be better leaders," said Dr. Martha Shuping, a volunteer with Rachel's Vineyard and a member of its board of directors. "It also helped post-abortive women be better equipped to speak publicly about their abortion if they want to."

Five simultaneous tracks offered specialized training for various ministries: those new to post-abortion ministry or to Rachel's Vineyard; therapists and other clinicians; those wanting training in team development; those wanting to learn how to speak to groups, write a press release or conduct a press conference; and childbirth educators, doulas and nurses.

Key topics discussed at the conference included abortion and post-traumatic stress disorder; men and abortion; the effects of trauma; the "disenfranchised grief" of abortion; forgiveness; after-care resources; "telling your story"; and managing the media.

"There are so many, both men and women, suffering from the emotional, spiritual and physical damage caused by abortion," said Maggi Nadol, diocesan Respect Life director. "Rachel's Vineyard is a beginning in the journey to forgiveness and healing."

Participants use sign language to sing during a worship and praise session at the International Rachel's Vineyard Leadership Conference at Greensboro College in June.

"People often do not realize that men are affected by abortion as well as women," Shuping said. For that reason, a workshop was presented by two men who shared their stories about their involvement in abortion.

Rachel Network is a ministry set up to provide a range of post-abortion services. Rachel's Vineyard retreats are centered around Scriptural meditations, called "Living Scriptures," during which people listen to a passage of Scripture, imagine themselves in that story and then are directed to the healing it represents.

"As people of faith, we are fortunate to be able to turn to a loving God, who calls us to healing," said Nadol.

Bishops warn politicians who consistently back legal abortion

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Politicians who act "consistently to support abortion on demand" risk "cooperating in evil and sinning against the common good," the U.S. Catholic bishops said in a June statement released in Washington.

"Those who formulate the law" are obliged in conscience "to work toward correcting morally defective laws," they said in a 1,000-word statement titled "Catholics in Political Life."

"The killing of an unborn child is always intrinsically evil. ... To make such intrinsically evil actions legal is itself wrong," they said.

Noting that "the question has been raised" whether it is necessary to deny Communion to Catholics in public life who support abortion on demand, the bishops said that "all must examine their consciences" about their worthiness to receive Communion, including with regard to "fidelity to the moral teaching of the church in personal and public life."

They added that "given the wide range of circumstances involved in arriving at a prudential judgment" in that matter, the bishops "recognize that such decisions rest with the individual bishop in accord with established canonical and pastoral principles."

"Bishops can legitimately make different judgments on the most prudent course of pastoral action" in confronting individual cases, they said, but the bishops share an "unequivocal commitment to protect human life and dignity."

They urged Catholics in public life to oppose legal abortion "lest they be guilty of cooperating in evil" — which in Catholic teaching is itself sinful.

The statement said respect for the Eucharist "demands that it be received worthily and that it be seen as the source for our common mission in the world."

They cited the First Letter to the Corinthians, in which St. Paul warns that "whoever, therefore, eats the bread or drinks the cup of the Lord in an unworthy manner will be guilty of profaning the body and blood of the Lord."

'Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion'

As bishops, we have the obligation to teach and guide the Catholic Faithful whom we shepherd in the Body of Christ. A fundamental teaching of our Church is respect for the sacred gift of life. This teaching flows from the Natural Law and from Divine Revelation.

Life is a gift bestowed upon us by God, a truth underscored by the commandment: "You shall not kill" (Deut 5: 17). The Old Testament also teaches us that human life in the womb is precious to God: "...I formed you in the womb..." (Jer 1: 5). The right to life is a value "which no individual, no majority and no State can ever create, modify or destroy, but must only acknowledge, respect and promote" (Pope John Paul II, Evangelium vitae, 71a).

A law, therefore, which legitimizes the direct killing of innocent human beings through abortion is intrinsically unjust, since it is directly opposed to the natural law, to God's revealed commandments, and to the consequent right of every individual to possess life, from the moment of conception to the moment of natural death.

Catholics in political life have the responsibility to exemplify in their public service this teaching of the Church, and to work for the protection of all innocent life. There can be no contradiction between the values bestowed by Baptism and the Catholic Faith, and the public expression of those values. Catholic public officials who consistently support abortion on demand are cooperating with evil in a public manner. By supporting pro-abortion legislation they participate in manifest grave sin, a condition which excludes them from admission to Holy Communion as long as they persist in the pro-abortion stance (cf. Canon 915).

Holy Communion is where Catholics meet as a family in Christ, united by a common faith. Every Catholic is responsible for being properly prepared for this profound union with Christ. Participation in Holy Communion requires certain dispositions on the part of the communicant, namely, perseverance in the life of grace, and communion in the faith of the Church, in the sacraments, and in the hierarchical order of the Church (Pope John Paul II, Ecclesia de Eucharistia, 35-38).

The Church also recognizes that there is a manifest lack of a proper disposition for Holy Communion in those whose outward conduct is "seriously, clearly, and steadfastly contrary" to the Church's moral teaching (Ecclesia de Eucharistia, 37b). A manifest lack of proper disposition for Holy Communion is found to be present in those who consistently support pro-abortion legislation. Because support for pro-abortion legislation is gravely sinful, such persons should not be admitted to Holy Communion.

We also take this opportunity to address all Catholics whose beliefs and conduct do not correspond to the Gospel and to Church teaching. To receive the great gift of God — the Body, Blood, Soul and Divinity of our Lord Jesus Christ — we must approach Holy Communion free from mortal sin. Those who are conscious of being in a state of grave sin should avail themselves of the Sacrament of Reconciliation before coming to Holy Communion. To partake of the Eucharist is to partake of Christ Himself, and to enter into sacramental communion with our Lord we must all be properly disposed.

Because of the influence that Catholics in public life have on the conduct of our daily lives and on the formation of our nation's future, we declare that Catholics serving in public life espousing positions contrary to the teaching of the Church on the sanctity and inviolability of human life, especially those running for or elected to public office, are not to be admitted to Holy Communion in any Catholic church within our jurisdictions: the Archdiocese of Atlanta, the Dioceses of Charleston and Charlotte. Only after reconciliation with the Church has occurred, with the knowledge and consent of the local bishop, and public disavowal of former support for procured abortion, will the individual be permitted to approach the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist.

We undertake this action to safeguard the sacred dignity of the Most Holy Sacrament of the Altar, to reassure the faithful, and to save sinners.

'Faithful Citizenship' to guide platforms

Statement prompts how basic values should shape political choices

cal letters to party leaders.

The letters were addressed to Bill Harris, convention chairman and CEO for the Republican National Committee, and Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn., who chairs the platform drafting committee for the Democratic National Committee.

Msgr. Fay said the church teachings summarized in "Faithful Citizenship" are "rooted in a commitment to defend the life and dignity of every human being and to further the common good."

"We believe they can inform the choices of all people who share our commitment to justice and peace in our nation and world," he added. "We ask that you review the statement, including the final section which focuses on specific issues, and take these ideas into consideration as you carry out your work."

The 8,500-word document, designed to offer a blueprint for electoral decisions based on Catholic social teaching, calls on American Catholics to "participate now and in the future in the debates and choices over the values, vision and leaders that will guide our nation."

A similar document has been issued before every presidential election for the last 28 years.

In his letter, Msgr. Fay said "hundreds of thousands of copies" of "Faithful Citizenship" have been distributed in Catholic parishes and organizations and downloaded from the USCCB Web site since last fall.

"Through the introduction of 'Faithful Citizenship' in classrooms, workshops and other events across the country, we are prompting Catholics and non-Catholics alike to contemplate how basic values should shape political choices," he added.

Reflecting values

In the document, approved unanimously by the 47-member Administrative Committee, the bishops said the U.S. Catholic Church must be "engaged but not used."

"We welcome dialogue with political leaders and candidates, seeking to engage and persuade public officials," they said. "But we must be sure that events and 'photo ops' are not substitutes for work on policies that reflect our values."

The Administrative Committee — made up of the executive officers of the USCCB, elected committee chairmen and elected regional representatives — is the highest policy- and decision-making body of the bishops apart from the entire body when it meets twice a year in general assembly.

Much of the document is devoted to a discussion of issues that church leaders would like to see taken up in the presidential campaigns.

"As bishops, we do not wish to instruct persons on how they should vote by endorsing or opposing candidates," it said. "We hope that voters will examine the position of candidates on a full range of issues, as well as on their personal integrity, philosophy and performance."

The document described "a consistent ethic of life" as the "moral framework" from which Catholic voters should address all issues in the political arena. It quoted extensively from the "Doctrinal Note on Some Questions Regarding the Participation of Catholics in Political Life," issued in January 2003 by the Vatican's Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

"For Catholics, the defense of human life and dignity is not a narrow cause, but a way of life and a framework for action," the bishops said. "As Catholics, we need to share our values, raise our voices and use our votes to shape a society that protects human life, promotes family life, pursues social justice and practices solidarity. These efforts can strengthen our nation and renew our church."

Table of life

The bishops asked Catholics to look at the political arena in light of the question: "Who has a place at the table of life?"

"Where is the place at the table for a million of our nation's children who are destroyed every year before they are born?" they asked. "How can we secure a place at the table for the hungry and those who lack health care in our own land and around the world? Where is the place at the table for those in our world who lack the freedom to practice their faith or stand up for what they believe?"

The document reviewed Catholic social teaching on a wide range of topics — abortion and assisted suicide, same-sex marriages and school vouchers, affordable housing and foreign aid, workers' rights and the Middle East.

The bishops said some Catholics, looking at the array of issues, "may feel politically homeless, sensing that no political party and too few candidates share a consistent concern for human life and dignity."

"However, this is not a time for retreat or discouragement," they said. "We need more, not less, engagement in political life. We urge Catholics to become more involved — by running for office; by working within political parties; by contributing money or time to campaigns; and by joining diocesan legislative networks, community organizations and other efforts to apply Catholic principles in the public square."

Poetry as a way to prayer

REVIEWED BY JEFF JOHNSON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Contemporary poetry is a form of prayer in these two recent books from St. Anthony Messenger Press.

Poetry offers "a way to hope in violent times," writes Peggy Rosenthal in "Praying Through Poetry: Hope for Violent Times."

Rosenthal, a Catholic convert who holds a doctorate in English literature, offers a method of poetry-based prayer developed in response to the violent terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. Her four-step method is modeled on "lectio divina," an ancient method for reading and meditating on Scripture.

Rosenthal's prayer method consists of four movements.

Upon first reading the poem, she asks, "How does the poem lead me to hope?" Next, she enters into a more reflective mode by suggesting "And so I might pray —." Third, she moves to the invitation: "And, finally, I might ponder —." The fourth step brings Rosenthal back to the original poem as she looks for images or phrases that offer themselves up for contemplative reflection.

By way of 10 example poems, Rosenthal demonstrates her prayer method. Rosenthal provides the full text of poems by Daniel Berrigan, Scott Cairns, Denise Levertov, Jane Hirshfield, Yehuda Amichai and others. She gives an account of her own interior, spiritual reactions to each poem, followed by explanations of where these poems "took" her spiritually and literarily.

Rosenthal's method for meditation on poetry could be very useful for individuals or groups who seek new ways of praying. While I know that response to poetry is highly subjective, I felt that her examples were not as helpful as they could have been.

Her choice of poems is also disappointing. Rather than selecting poetry for quality, she opted to let content and subject take precedence.

Meanwhile, Franciscan Father Murray Bodo's collection, "The Earth Moves at Midnight and Other Poems," provides a generous sampling of accomplished poetry in the tradition of some of America's best confessional poets. The poems, written over the past 20 years, are dedicated to Denise Levertov and show her influence in both style and subject.

The poems are chiefly about loss and the experiences of faith, change and growth. Father Bodo primarily uses free verse as he directly engages nature and his childhood home of New Mexico. The strongest poems in the collection are those speaking of loss — deeply interior, lyrical elegies.

Combined with Rosenthal's prayer method, Father Bodo's poems would serve well those who grieve loss and are looking for a way to develop their prayer. Father Bodo's treatment of his deeply personal experiences of faith and loss, although at times a bit wordy, are never sugarcoated.

There are plenty of good poems out there that would work well with Rosenthal's method. Poems that ably offer transformative visions stand ready to clear or, better yet, till the interior ground, leaving it open for prayer.

Begin with Seamus Heaney's "Glanmore Sonnets," whose opening line best explains how poetry can lead to prayer: "Vowels ploughed into other: opened ground."

Mary's assumption gives hope in Christ's victory over death

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

When picking a girl for the coveted role of Mary in my childhood parish's annual re-enactment of the Christmas story, the director instinctively ruled out talkers, the brash girls, the challengers of the status quo. She wanted a placid girl who knew how to be silent.

The incompleteness of this image of Mary, reinforced through centuries of artistic representations, is evident in Sunday's Gospel for the Feast of the Assumption.

The feast honors Mary's unique role in human salvation, and it glorifies the fidelity and saving power of God which freed her "from the corruption of the tomb" so that "when the course of her earthly life was finished, [she] was taken up, body and soul, into the glory of heaven" (Pius XII, "Munificentissimus Deus," 1950).

The doctrine of Mary's assumption gives us hope in Christ's absolute victory over death through resurrection and the promise of an entirely transformed way of living, not only in the spiritual dimension of our lives, but in our totality — "body and soul."

It is noteworthy that the church chooses for this feast a passage stressing not only Mary's humble receptivity, but her triumph and victory over injustice as well: the mighty cast down, the lowly lifted up; the rich sent away empty, the poor gathered in and fed.

Some might call such language an example of "class warfare." Catholic tradition recognizes it as the truth, the "good news" about God's priorities, about faithfulness to his promises of mercy.

It is a topsy-turvy world Mary proclaims here, and it reflects powerfully the revolutionary hope of Christ's Gospel and the kingdom of God which his coming inaugurates. There, not only do the blind see and the deaf hear and the imprisoned walk free, but death itself becomes a pathway to life for the whole person, body and soul.

A near-perfect 'Candidate'

Denzel Washington and Meryl Streep star in "The Manchurian Candidate," a pulse-pounding political thriller involving a conspiracy about a soldier running for U.S. vice president. The film is a tautly paced tapestry of spine-tingling suspense that falls short of the 1962 original film's masterpiece status. Several scenes of graphic violence and torture, as well as some crude language and profanity. The USCCB Office for Film & Broadcasting classification is A-III — adults. The Motion Picture Association of America rating is R — restricted.

Film industry chief's legacy will be movie ratings system

Valenti, a Catholic, to step down in September

BY MARK PATTISON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — If anything, Jack Valenti will be remembered as the man behind movie ratings.

Valenti, a Catholic, is stepping down Sept. 1 as head of the Motion Picture Association of America after spending 38 years at the helm of a fractious industry that has survived not only occasional congressional and consumer revolts over content and regulation, but plenty of infighting from its member studios.

The ratings took shape in 1968.

The concept of ratings, Valenti said, was "to put the authority of which kid goes to which movie in the hands of parents, and not anyone else, because parents are responsible for the behavior of their children, not the government. I think the school and the church have a lot to do with that, but in the end parents make that decision."

Valenti, 82, managed to get virtually all Hollywood studios to voluntarily submit their films for ratings, and to get the National Association of Theater Owners to enforce the system's guidelines and keep children from seeing certain movies unaccompanied by adults or from seeing them at all.

One of the people Valenti consulted in constructing the ratings system was Father Patrick J. Sullivan, head of the old National Catholic Film Office (now known as the Office for Film & Broadcasting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops). The film office, like its successor, evaluated movies in terms of their moral suitability, a role first taken on by the Legion of Decency.

The Legion of Decency may best be known by its "C" rating, which stood for "condemned."

"When I was a small boy growing up Catholic and going to Mass in Houston," Valenti said, "I have to tell you that when the priest said a certain picture was condemned, that made me want to see it."

Valenti said the indispensable need of the rating system is to have integrity.

"I have no problem with a misjudgment where people think we gave a film the wrong rating," he said. "But I want no mistakes to come from malfeasance or pressure or something that has a nefarious ring to it."

A recent study by the Harvard University School of Public Health, which examined 1,906 movies between 1992 and 2003, criticized "ratings creep," the phenomenon whereby more violent and sexual content and racier dialogue are getting into more leniently rated films.

Valenti said he hadn't seen the methodology behind the study.

"Has the society changed in the past 15 to 20 years? I think it has," he said. "I think that you're seeing things on television today that 15 or 20 years ago you didn't see. I don't know whether that's good or bad. All I know is that it's change, and I don't fight change. I try to live with it and adjust to it."

The USCCB has been joined by several other organizations in issuing their own ratings based on a movie's content and quality.

"I have no problem with that," Valenti said. "I always say find out all you can about a movie from anybody else. Expand your knowledge of movies."

Valenti, who got a job at age 15 at a theater in Houston doing a little bit of everything, noted that at movies, "I eat popcorn. I'm like Pavlov's dog. I salivate every time I go into a movie theater. I need popcorn."

Vatican: Battle of sexes not part of God's design

cause of women by seeing men as enemies to be defeated or by claiming that no real difference exists between male and female have had "lethal effects," particularly on the family, the congregation said.

The congregation's "Letter to the Bishops of the Catholic Church on the Collaboration of Men and Women in the Church and in the World" was released July 31.

Rather than compete for power or ignore the God-given differences between men and women, "the church, enlightened by faith in Jesus Christ, speaks instead of active collaboration between the sexes," said the document, approved by Pope John Paul II.

In the United States the same day, Bishop Wilton D. Gregory, president of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, called the letter "a timely reminder of both the equality of men and women and also of the distinctive difference between them with which God endowed them in creation."

Washington Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick, who heads the U.S. bishops' Committee on Domestic Policy, said that "too often in our contemporary society the differences between men and women are minimized in the apparent belief the sexes must be the same to be equal."

He said an "us versus them" attitude and an emphasis on the individual and individual rights above all else also are addressed by the letter.

Cardinal McCarrick said the letter reminds the world that "God created men and women as equals, not to oppose each other, but to collaborate and work together in mutual respect for the good of each other and of society."

Only by embracing, valuing and respecting the differences between men and women "do we have the humanity that is in the 'image of God,'" he said.

"It is through respect for and collaboration with each other that we can best develop social policies to eliminate sexual discrimination, support the gifts of all people and, in particular, support women who, as the givers of life, are so often caught trying to successfully balance family and work," the cardinal said.

Collaboration is needed in the world, particularly in formulating political and social policies to help the poor and advance the cause of peace, the document said.

The church, too, needs collaboration in order to bring "feminine values" of listening, faithfulness, humility, understanding and caring more to the forefront, it said.

While reaffirming church teaching that only men can be ordained priests, the doctrinal congregation said the role of women in the church is not "a passivity inspired by an outdated conception of femininity."

The Blessed Virgin Mary, held up in the document as an example of discipleship for all Christians, is a model of the proper power of femininity, it said.

The document said attempts to convince people that differences between men and women are simply cultural have inspired ideologies "which, for example, call into question the family in its natural two-parent structure of mother and father."

The affirmation that differences are only social constructs also "make homosexuality and heterosexuality virtually equivalent in a new model of polymorphous sexuality," it said.

The doctrinal congregation also said that although potential motherhood is a key part of a woman's identity "this does not mean that women should be considered from the sole perspective of physical procreation," an attitude which often is "accompanied by dangerous disrespect for women."

By upholding the vocation of virginity, it said, Christianity "refutes any attempt to enclose women in mere biological destiny."

Father Michael J. Buttner, pastor (center right), and Father Adrian Porras, former parochial vicar (center left), break ground for the new Holy Family Church in Clemmons June 5. Joining the priests in manning the shovels were Rev. Mr. Jerry Schumacher; Rev. Mr. Guy Piche, diocesan property manager; Bill Lawler and Ray Miller representing the Capital Campaign committee; and Jerry Long, chairman of the Building Committee.

Father Buttner and Father Porras concelebrated a Mass of thanksgiving to celebrate the progress towards the new church prior to the groundbreaking. The Knights of Columbus led a procession at the beginning of the Mass; escorted the offertory gifts to the altar, including a gold shovel and a hardhat; and led the procession out to the site of the new building for the groundbreaking ceremony.

Parishioners of Holy Family Church brought small, decorated stones that will become the part of the building's foundation under the altar in the completed church.

A call to prison ministry?

Guest Column

REV. MR. JIM JOHNSON
GUEST COLUMNIST

Why would we go to visit someone in jail or prison — a criminal, a person who broke the law and deserves whatever punishment the court gives them? What if we caught something from one of them? What if they tried to hurt us, hold us hostage or, heaven forbid, tried to rob us? You know how "they" are.

We are too busy doing God's work to be bothered with "them." Let someone else do it. After all, they have chaplains that are paid to take care of them. We don't know what to say to one of them. We hear that some of them cannot speak English.

Do any of these thoughts come into your mind when you are asked to visit or minister to someone in prison? Matthew tells us what Jesus expects from us: "I was in prison and you visited me. Whatever you did for one of these least brothers of mine, you did it for me."

We cannot all be actively involved in prison ministry. For many, our schedules do not allow us to take on additional ministries. Many people have indicated that they would go to a prison if needed but not regularly. This would definitely fill a need that occurs from time to time and can make a difference in someone's life.

My prison ministry began more than 16 years ago at the request of a brother deacon, Rev. Mr. Tim Rohan. He asked me to visit the son of a fellow parishioner who was in the youth prison in Morganton. This young man was a joy to visit each week. Both of us looked forward to the visit.

I did not catch anything from him and he did not rob me. I did not solve any of his problems, but I did a lot of listening. I think that the most important thing I did was just be present for him. The person I was when visiting the young man was not me but Jesus ministering through me.

I have learned things through the years at the prison. I have learned that each inmate is a unique person; all are on faith journeys, are at different points in their lives and have different needs. Some are satisfied having a visit once a month; some would like a Bible and a rosary and know that if they wanted a visit, someone would come. Some would like to be baptized and/or confirmed, while others would like a visit from a priest.

In some inmates, I have planted seeds; in others, I have watered and nourished seeds that were planted by others; and in some, I have been there for the harvest. I think it is not so important, although it is very satisfying, to be a harvester. I think that more of us are seed planters and waterers.

In our work, many young inmates, 14–18 years of age, seem to just want someone to give them some attention and show some concern. This is something that many of the young men have never had in their lives.

In this ministry, I have been fortunate to have the support and encouragement of Father Ken Whittington, pastor of St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton. There are several volunteers from the parish who teach Bible studies and share their faith with prisoners. In addition, Hispanic volunteers minister to the Spanish-speaking inmates by offering a weekly Bible study for them.

The chaplain at the prison has become a good friend and is very cooperative and supportive in our Catholic ministry at the prison. And last, but not least, we have the blessing, support and prayers of our bishop.

Pope, at audience, adapts to relaxed pace of August in Italy

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy — Pope John Paul II welcomed an estimated 3,500 visitors to the courtyard of his summer residence, hosting a shortened, almost intimate version of his weekly general audience.

For the Aug. 4 audience, the courtyard of the villa at Castel Gandolfo, south of Rome, was packed. While the pope continued his series of talks about psalms and canticles used in the church's evening prayer, the Vatican decided to shorten the gathering by skipping the usual summaries of the pope's talk in French, English, German, Spanish and Polish.

In his audience talk, Pope John Paul offered a meditation on a canticle from the Letter to the Philippians about Jesus, "who, though he was in the form of God, did not regard equality with God something to be grasped. Rather, he emptied himself, taking the form of a slave, coming in human likeness."

The pope told his guests that the canticle shines a light on the Christian understanding of who Jesus is: He is "recognized and proclaimed our brother in humanity, but also Lord of the universe."

While he truly was God, the pope said, Jesus "stripped himself and almost emptied himself of that glory," becoming "similar to human beings and going so far as to assume that sign of limitedness and finiteness which is death."

But through his cross and resurrection, Jesus ascended "from humiliation to exaltation," offering all human beings a chance to be saved, the pope said.

Hardball would better benefit harvesters

Regarding the "Harvesters of sorrow" story (July 23), rather than telling about what a great ministry the church has for the migrants, would it not have been more productive to expose those responsible for the "horrid" conditions?

— John O'Malley
Pisgah Forest

Editor's note: We shared the details of "Harvesters of sorrow" with other newspapers in the region and encouraged them to pursue this worthy story.

History won't be kind

David Hains' guest column ("Church scrutiny leads fight against abuse," July 23) seeks to compare the February release of the John Jay study detailing sexual abuse in the Catholic Church with a June study on sexual misconduct by educators.

Hains says the church's acknowledgement of this "serious social problem" will be remembered more than that of subsequent institutions because the church was "first to be so forthcoming about this problem." And he says, "As Catholics, we can be proud of the fact that our church led the way in identifying and removing a serious problem that affects defenseless children."

Indeed, the church will be remembered more — not because it was first but because it was supposed to be better.

In this sorry scandal, Mr. Hains there is absolutely nothing of which our church can be proud.

War in Iraq not justified

In regard to Father Frank Pavone's column ("Abortion vs. War," July 9), I do agree that every abortion does in fact target innocent life and is always morally unacceptable. However, I cannot agree with him on the point that it is "OK for someone else to come to the conclusion that the war (in Iraq) is justified."

Faithful Catholics need to look no farther than the Catholic Church's teachings on just war to see "the Church has raised serious moral concerns and questions about preemptive or preventative use of force" (pg. 19 of "Faithful Citizenship: A Catholic Call to Political Responsibility," by the USCCB).

I would urge every person in our community to read No. 2309 in our Catholic Catechism to plainly see that the rigorous conditions for moral legitimacy have not been met.

The vineyard of the church

Rachel's Vineyard offers Christ's healing power for abortion

Guest Column

FATHER FRANK PAVONE
GUEST COLUMNIST

"I cannot think of another work of this kind so well done," Father Benedict Groeschel has written of Rachel's Vineyard. "A most difficult and painful human problem is engaged with faith, psychological insight and trust."

Having been involved for years in these retreats for people wounded by abortion, I could not agree more with the above assessment. That is why I was so pleased when Theresa and Kevin Burke, the founders of Rachel's Vineyard, approached me at the end of last year with the request that this retreat program become a ministry of Priests for Life.

As such, it is now becoming even better known by the priests of the nation and provides yet another way for them to extend the healing power of Christ through the sacrament of reconciliation, through counseling and through preaching. Moreover, the Rachel's Vineyard retreat can also be conducted in an ecumenical format, allowing Christians of all denominations to take part in a way that is consistent with their own background.

Rachel's' Vineyard is a weekend retreat experience for women and men who have lost children through abortion. With the assistance of counselors and clergy, they explore the emotional and spiritual pain of their abortion in the presence of the Lord and in a confidential and supportive atmosphere.

Because the wound of abortion is compounded by its secrecy and in fact consists of a destructive isolation of the individual, the person on the retreat finds a new freedom by sharing his or her pain with the others on the retreat, who have all had similar experiences, and benefits from their understanding, acceptance and additional insight.

One of the most powerful and unique aspects of the retreat is the use of "Living Scriptures." This is essentially a group reflection on various Scriptural events, utilizing a traditional method of meditation on Scripture by which a person imagines him- or herself present at the event and involved in it.

But instead of having this reflection within oneself and only in thought, the group dramatizes it together, again utilizing a very traditional Catholic approach; namely, using signs, symbols and gestures to make spiritual realities more tangible.

A simple example of this is the healing of Bartimaeus in chapter 10 of Mark's Gospel. At Rachel's Vineyard, this passage is read in the presence of all; the priest then goes to each person, along with a team member, who says, "Have courage, he is calling you." The person says, "Jesus, Son of David, have pity on me." The priest then says Jesus' words: "What do you want me to do for you?" The person then makes her request, in his or her own words. The priest bestows an individual blessing.

Thousands of Rachel's Vineyard retreats are taking place around the United States and around the world. Many dioceses have officially adopted this program for their abortion healing ministry. As more and more people come forward, breaking out of their guilt and shame-filled isolation, let us welcome them together to the Vineyard of the Church!

Communities of joy

Jesus challenges us to accept his gift

Spirituality for Today

FATHER JOHN CATOIR
CNS GUEST COLUMNIST

Since joy is the infallible sign of the presence of the Holy Spirit, creating a community of joy should be the goal of every parish. Every pastor should do his best to foster this atmosphere of joy and emotional comfort, so that his people can worship God joyfully. In the Holy Spirit, we pray with one voice.

Joyful worship is the best way to participate in the life of the Trinity. By sharing in God's Trinitarian life, we become an "Easter people, and Alleluia becomes our song" (St. Augustine).

Second Vatican Council documents teach us that the church is the people of God. It is not primarily an institution or a group of buildings. The church is essentially a community of joy; a community different from all other human groupings because the joy of the Holy Spirit informs and inspires it.

The mystery of the church transcends human life. Two of the three branches of the church are already living joyfully. The members of the church who are in heaven and purgatory lift us up to greater heights.

The church triumphant consists of those who have attained the bliss of heaven, namely, the beatific vision.

The church suffering consists of those in purgatory. This title is a misnomer because those in purgatory have the deep joy of knowing that they are exceedingly close to the beatific vision. They experience God's presence as never before, and are confirmed in grace.

Though they still await the fullness of joy, they know a happiness that they have never known before. St. Thomas Aquinas said that the worst day in purgatory is better than the best day anyone could spend on earth.

We on earth are called the church militant. We know we are saved by the sacrificial death of Jesus, but we are not yet free of the woes of this world. We are still capable of sin. The tensions we experience in trying to combat evil is a constant source of pain, emotional and physical.

Jesus said, "I am the Way." When we follow him, we receive in us a joy that this world cannot give.

The people of joy consist of those in heaven, in purgatory, as well as those on earth who participate in God's life. The church militant must live in a sea of human hatred and violence. Jesus predicted it, "In this world you will have many troubles but cheer up, take heart, for I have overcome the world."

All three parts of the church share in the life of the blessed Trinity, which is a life of intense love and joy. As members of the church militant we do not as yet have the fullness of joy, but by faith we can claim a greater share of it.

Jesus told us that he wants our joy to be full. We must rise to his challenge and accept his gift. And we can do a better job by not trying to go it alone — by forming little cells of joy we can make progress. Prayer groups can find prayers and readings, which lift the spirits.

By forming little communities of joy, we can become carriers of Divine Joy. This is our goal: to choose joy over sorrow because joy is our vocation and our destiny.

Openly discussing another's wrongdoing

Destroying a person's good name is sinful

Q. I'm an old senior, still typing on my manual typewriter, but I am concerned about some "forgivers" who insist on telling others about the persons and deeds that need forgiveness. Twice this has happened recently that the one doing the forgiving tells friends about it, and the offender's reputation is destroyed.

Even if you're willing to forgive, isn't it wrong to expose someone's faults? Perhaps the person who has been hurt "feels better" emotionally after talking about the problem, but it still sounds like pure gossip to me. (Illinois)

A. Your instincts are correct. There is something wrong with a person who feels that willingness to forgive bestows the right to discuss what happened with everyone else.

It is true that forgiving and forgetting are not the same. If someone deliberately injures us or someone we love, it is possibly beyond our power to totally forget. Despite our best intentions, the memory may resurface often, especially if later circumstances create the opportunity for a repeat of the injury.

An essential element of authentic forgiveness, however, is willingness to give up resentment and ill will, to let go of the desire to "get even" and take revenge on the person who has done us wrong. To willfully destroy another's good name is a serious injury and sinful. The fact that the other person has done harm to us doesn't change that.

Up to the challenge

Youth ministers to receive training resource

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Diocesan youth ministers now have a comprehensive resource to aid them in their ministries.

Promulgated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis in April 2004, "The main purpose of the new 'Youth Ministry Handbook' is to have a resource for every youth minister, whether they are experienced or new to the job," said Peg Ruble, associate director for the diocesan Office of Youth Ministry.

More than three years ago, realizing that the need for such a resource was far-reaching in the diocese, Paul Kotlowski, director for the diocesan Office of Youth Ministry, and Ruble set about forming a team of volunteers to compile the resource for all youth ministers in the Diocese of Charlotte.

A team of youth ministers consisting of Marilyn Kravitz, Mary Herr, Steve Bernardi, Marie Martino, Debbie Kovachik, Connie Cupello and Maryann Poli set about to develop the handbook.

Although each volunteer took charge of one section of the book, Ruble said it was a collaborative effort as they critiqued the work-in-progress, everyone adding their own input.

According to Ruble, Sister Mary Timothy Warren, vicar for women religious in the Diocese of Charlotte, also provided valuable editorial support.

After countless hours of writing, discussion and editing by the team of volunteers, the "Youth Ministry Handbook" was completed in Spring 2004.

"In part, what Bishop Jugis promulgated for the Diocese of Charlotte is a ministry formation process which adopts the recently published 'National Certification Standards for Lay Ecclesial Ministers,' approved by the U.S. bishops' Commission on Certification and Accreditation," said Kotlowski.

The national standards were developed by the National Federation for Catholic Youth Ministry, the National Association of Lay Ministers and the National Conference of Catechetical Leadership, three organizations which advocate and support Catholic ministry on the national, diocesan and local levels.

The National Federation has developed a code of ethics for youth ministry leaders that outlines the obligations of youth ministers, including their ministerial role, liability, accountability and conduct.

Each parish within the diocese will receive a handbook for use by their youth minister. The book will also be available online on the diocesan Web site and the learning platform Blackboard.com.

The handbook will serve as a learning tool to help youth ministers meet the national standards, Kotlowski said. The handbook may be the first of its kind, in that it contains the competency-based formation.

Kotlowski said the basis of youth ministry training and formation is derived from the Code of Canon Law 231,

Paul Kotlowski, director for the diocesan Office of Youth Ministry, and Peg Ruble, associate director for the diocesan Office of Youth Ministry, examine the new "Youth Ministry Handbook."

which states, "Lay persons who devote themselves permanently or temporarily to some special service of the church are obliged to acquire the appropriate formation which is required to fulfill their function properly and to carry it out conscientiously, zealously and diligently."

"What's exciting about competency-based formation and certification based on nationally approved standards is that it introduces accountability born through evidence as people demonstrate their proficiency and knowledge," said Kotlowski.

"This is the dawn of a brand-new era in the area of ministry formation for the Diocese of Charlotte and the United States," he said. "We're happy to be a part of this emerging formation process."

"Heretofore, having a degree (in ministry) has been good enough, without demonstrating the ability to assimilate that degree into ministerial practice," said Kotlowski.

What these competency standards call for is a demonstration of skills, not just a diploma, said Ruble.

"Youth ministry is challenging," said Kotlowski. "All too often people are asked to take part in youth ministry with little or no training."

"This is a learner-driven practice that calls people to national standards," said Kotlowski. "Ministers will be able to set their own pace as they work toward achieving the standards."

"I welcomed the opportunity to promulgate the 'Youth Ministry Handbook,'" said Bishop Jugis. "It is a rich resource that addresses three vital areas of ministry to youth: the call to and promotion of holiness; the creation of a safe and secure environment; and the formation of the ministers as persons commissioned to teach the truth in love."

CHARLOTTE — Priests, laity and pro-life advocates throughout the Diocese of Charlotte are applauding Bishop Peter J. Jugis' stance on Catholic teaching and abortion.

The bishop has joined with Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta and Bishop Robert J. Baker of Charleston in a statement that Catholic politicians or candidates who persistently support abortion may not be admitted to holy Communion in their dioceses.

"The breath of life — the spirit of God — was breathed into us. We are carriers of God's spirit, carriers of the divine," said Sister Patricia Haley.

The Sister of Charity of Nazareth was the featured speaker at "Revival of the Spirit 2004," the fifth annual revival sponsored by the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry, held at Our Lady of Consolation Church Aug. 12-15.

"It is a time of encouragement and a renewing of our commitment to service," said Sister Haley, coordinator of the Black Catholic Ministries office in the Diocese of St. Petersburg, Fla., and a faculty member of that diocese's adult formation program.

SYNCHRONIZING IN ATHENS

Amanda Laird and Leonie Nichols of the Australian synchronized swimming team perform during a training session at the Olympic swimming complex in Athens, Greece, Aug. 8. Pope John Paul II urged that the Olympics be used "to promote peace and understanding among all peoples" during his Sunday Angelus message delivered at Castel Gandolfo, Italy, Aug. 8.

Pope says Olympics can show good relations among nations

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II invoked God's blessings on Olympic participants and said the international games can show the world that violence does not have to mark relations among different nations.

In an Aug. 11 telegram to President Constantinos Stephanopoulos of Greece, host of the Aug. 13-29 Summer Games, the pope invoked "divine blessings" on everyone participating in or watching the games, including television viewers around the world.

"I hope these games will be an occasion of fraternity between peoples and cultures, because sports are a universal language of human relations," the pope wrote in the telegram released Aug. 12 at the Vatican.

Through international sporting events, he said, people can develop "a familial spirit," which can help "overcome the violence that marks the modern world."

The athletes' Catholic chaplains gathered in Athens' Roman Catholic cathedral Aug. 11 for a concelebrated Mass before the games began.

Archbishop Nikolaos Foscolos of Athens told Vatican Radio Aug. 10 that he hoped that, at least during the games, "all people would feel like brothers and sisters and that throughout the world there would be an armistice as there was during the ancient Olympic Games."

The archbishop said the Olympic Village includes an ecumenical chapel where Orthodox and Catholic priests will celebrate their liturgies each morning and evening and where Anglican and Protestant ministers will offer services.

Separate rooms alongside the Christian prayer space have been set up for Muslim, Jewish and Buddhist athletes, he said.

Msgr. Carlo Mazza, director of the Italian bishops' office for leisure, tourism and sport, traveled to Athens as Italy's official Catholic chaplain.

He carried with him 1,500 copies of a special booklet developed just for Italian Catholic athletes.

The booklet, he told the Catholic newspaper Avvenire, contains a copy of a papal prayer from the 2000 Jubilee for Athletes, the Scripture readings for the last three Sundays of August and five prayers for "spiritual accompaniment."

"Entrusting yourself to God during a sporting competition is both human and spiritual," Msgr. Mazza said. "During all our human adventures and, therefore, even in sports, as God's creatures we entrust ourselves to the Father who created us."

He said even missing a bronze, silver or gold medal could bring spiritual benefits: "It is experiencing our weakness and our need for God."

San Francisco gay marriages 'misguided,' says archbishop

SAN FRANCISCO (CNS) — The California Supreme Court said Aug. 12 that the nearly 4,000 same-sex marriages performed in San Francisco earlier in the year were void because the city's mayor lacked statutory authority to approve them.

All seven justices said that in authorizing the city to issue marriage licenses and perform ceremonies, San Francisco Mayor Gavin Newsom violated a 1977 California law that defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

San Francisco Archbishop William J. Levada in February called the mayor's recognition of gay marriage "misguided."

"To extend the meaning of marriage beyond a union of man and woman, their procreative capacity, and their establishment of family represents a misguided understanding of marriage itself," the archbishop said Feb. 12.

Lawsuits over the constitutionality of same-sex marriages in California are working their way through the state courts.

Priest, former congressman gets ABA honor

ATLANTA (CNS) — Jesuit Father Robert F. Drinan, a Georgetown University Law Center professor and former Congressman, received the American Bar Association's 2004 ABA Medal, the association's highest honor, Aug. 9.

The medal, which recognizes exceptional distinguished service to the cause of American jurisprudence, has been given since 1929 to some of the most important legal figures in American history, including eight Supreme Court justices.

"In an amazing career that has spanned more than half a century, Father Drinan has never faltered in his extraordinary humanitarian efforts and support for justice under the law," said ABA president Dennis Archer.

A professor at the Georgetown University Law Center since 1981, Father Drinan represented the Fourth District of Massachusetts in the House of Representatives from 1971 to 1981.

FROM THE VATICAN

Cardinal says Vatican ready to help mediate end to Iraqi standoff

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican said it was ready to help mediate a solution to a standoff between U.S. troops and Shiite militants in the Iraqi holy city of Najaf.

"If it is asked of us, the pope will very willingly agree to (support) a mediation," whose "aim is for all sides to come round the table to talk," said the Vatican's secretary of state, Cardinal Angelo Sodano.

The Vatican "is always available. The pope would certainly never back away" from helping disputing parties sit down to talks, he said Aug. 15.

Since Aug. 5, U.S. troops backed by Iraqi government forces in Najaf have been locked in intense fighting with militants supporting Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Much of the fighting has centered on the Shiite Imam Ali Shrine, where many of the militants have been hiding; al-Sadr is also believed to be inside the shrine. The Shiite Muslim cleric called for followers to rise up and fight against what he has called the U.S. occupation of Iraq.

The Imam Ali Shrine represents one of the holiest places for Shiite Muslims, who consider Ali the true successor of the prophet Mohammed. For centuries, Shiites have flocked to Najaf and Ali's tomb to pay their respects.

Meanwhile, the U.N.'s special envoy to Iraq also said the United Nations is willing to help negotiate a solution to the fighting in Najaf if all sides agree.

Pope shares physical weakness of pilgrims while praying at Lourdes

LOURDES, France (CNS) — Sharing the physical weakness of thousands of his fellow pilgrims at the Shrine of Our Lady of Lourdes, Pope John Paul II prayed for comfort for those who suffer, for the protection of every human life and for peace in the world.

Although fine for most of the Aug. 14-15 pilgrimage, when temperatures tipped toward the 90s, the pope's initial visit of the weekend to the Massabielle grotto, where the Blessed Virgin Mary appeared to St. Bernadette Soubirous, was emotional and difficult.

Pushed in his wheeled throne to the grotto and helped to his knees, the pope was able to stay erect for less than a minute. He began to slump over, and his private secretaries came to his assistance, lifting him back into his chair.

In his text read by retired French Cardinal Roger Etchegaray, the pope said he always has relied on and benefited from the prayer offerings of those who suffer. He asked the sick to join him "in offering to God, through the intercession of the Virgin Mary, all the intentions of the church and the world."

During Mass Aug. 15, the pope struggled through his long homily, even gasping "help me" in Polish at one point and muttering, "I must finish." When the pope seemed to run out of breath, the crowd estimated at 250,000 applauded their encouragement.

In his homily, Pope John Paul asked others — especially women — for signs of faith and courage.

"Appearing here, Mary entrusted her message to a young girl, as if to emphasize the special mission of women in our own time, tempted as it is by materialism and secularism: to be in today's society a witness of those essential values which are seen only with the eyes of the heart," he said.

"I appeal urgently to all of you, brothers and sisters, to do everything in your power to ensure that life — each and every life — will be respected from conception to its natural end," he said. "Life is a sacred gift, and no one can presume to be its master."

The pope emphatically repeated the phrase calling on people "to ensure that life — each and every life — be respected."

Diocesan Support Appeal may reach $4 million mark

DSA campaign was $3,775,000. As of Aug. 16, $3,992,168 had been pledged.

"Being over our goal indicates that more people are embracing stewardship as a way of life beyond their own parish," Gaddy said.

To date, 18,137 people within the Diocese of Charlotte have contributed to the DSA campaign.

Fifty-two parishes and missions have surpassed their goal in pledges. Seventeen more churches have reached at least 90 percent of their goal in pledges and actual contributions.

"A few parishes in the diocese have gone over their goal for the first time in several years," said Gaddy.

According to Gaddy, those parishes that had a layperson coordinating their DSA campaign had "great success" in meeting or surpassing their goal.

"A major advantage to putting a layperson in charge of the campaign is that it frees the pastor to shepherd the parish and focus on the spiritual health of his parishioners," she said.

The DSA provides partial funding for the 36 outreach ministries of the diocese, including multicultural ministry, education, vocations and social services.

"DSA monies have a direct impact on our brothers and sisters in the diocese," said Gaddy. "Good things are happening in the diocese right now because of the DSA — programs like Hearts on Fire catechist training and the Lighting the Fires of Faith educational program."

"Being part of the Catholic Church calls us to look beyond our own personal and parish needs and respond with prayer and generosity to everyone in the diocese," Gaddy said.

Lighting the Fires of Faith

Hundreds brave weather for annual event

BY REV. MR. GERALD POTKAY
CORRESPONDENT

KERNERSVILLE — With the threat of Hurricane Charley looming off the Eastern coastline, nearly 200 faithful and determined catechists still gathered at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School for the 10th annual Lighting the Fires of Faith conference Aug. 14.

"I wanted to be here and the hurricane couldn't stop me," said Faby Solis, a parishioner of Our Lady of the Highways Church in Thomasville.

Solis, who teaches fourth- and fifth-grade faith formation students, said she came to the event "to learn more about Jesus so I can teach my children better."

Lighting the Fires of Faith, a bilingual event sponsored by the diocesan Office of Faith Formation, was designed to bring easy means for obtaining certification and commissioning as required by the Diocese of Charlotte for people serving Catholic youth and children. The event was also open to all interested adults.

"The purpose of the Fires of Faith is two fold," said Franciscan Sister Bernadette Svatos, northern region coordinator of faith formation. "First, it brings us into compliance with the general directive, which says the people should be prepared for their work. Then, we give easy access to those who need courses that are recommended for their certification in faith formation."

The keynote speaker, Oratorian Father David Valtierra of The Oratory in Rock Hill, S.C., said he was impressed by the dedication of the participants who braved the possible hurricane.

"Those who are lifted up in the Spirit are both affirmed and challenged by their life experiences," he said.

During his talk on adult spirituality, Father Valtierra tied life experiences — such as the Olympics, the Easter vigil and the burning bush experienced by Moses — into the effects and symbolism of fire and water.

"Jesus is transparent in all of what we do (and) when we see the light of faith through the eyes of a child," said Father Valtierra.

The Word of God inspires, especially through the sharing of faith and in the central sacramental rituals, he said.

"The Word of God is fuel to fire our faith," he said.

Thus, the catechist, so inspired, lights the fire of faith in those who will carry on the truth after we are gone, he said.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis, who addressed the participants in both English and Spanish, said they, as Catholics and catechists, were stewards of God's gifts. Catechists are responsible for forming children and their consciences as they become better acquainted with the faith, he said.

"You are assisting the bishop in his duty," he told them.

Bishop Jugis reaffirmed his Aug. 4 statement, "Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion," which he signed with Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta and Bishop Robert J. Baker of Charleston.

"As Catholics, we must speak clearly about good and evil," said Bishop Jugis. "That when distance is placed between public life and teachings of the church ... this is a contradiction."

Bishop Jugis said that his public announcement gives the youth in the diocese a means to learn more about their Catholic faith.

"It is an opportunity to share our teachings and to evangelize," he said.

The event also featured workshops on ecumenism, the sacraments, contemporary moral issues and other topics. Mercy Sister Larretta Rivera-Williams conducted a workshop on "The Call to be a Catechist."

"I especially liked the way that Sister Laretta included how we can encourage children when we give classes by incorporating different aspects of the faith, like the Stations of the Cross, while being open to the fact that they may not even know what the Stations are," said Carol Leach, a catechist at Holy Infant Church in Reidsville.

"At the same time she stressed that, as catechists, we cannot go against the magisterium (the teaching authority of the Catholic Church)," she said.

Reviving the spirit

"It's also an opportunity to get rejuvenated to stay in the ministry and give thanks and praise for God's good gifts," she said.

The revival is designed to be reminiscent of the early days of outdoor preaching and is an opportunity to publicly worship in the spirit of the black church, according to Rev. Mr. Curtiss Todd, vice chancellor and vicar for African American Affairs Ministry.

"The revival is open to all people, regardless of ethnicity or religious preference, to break down existing misconceptions about the Catholic faith and black Catholic worship," he said.

In addition to three nights of preaching by Sister Haley, the revival featured invigorating gospel music by Our Lady of Consolation Church's Perpetual Hope Gospel Choir and choir members from First Baptist Church West in Charlotte and other Protestant churches.

Msgr. Mauricio W. West, diocesan vicar general and chancellor, was the celebrant and homilist of the closing Mass on Sunday.

Sister Haley said everyone was a divine image of God.

"In the divine image we are made. Precious in God's sight we are," she said.

As such, each and every person has been promised and been given the Holy Spirit. "That spirit will renew your strength," said Sister Haley.

People need the Spirit's strength to endure and be saved, she said.

"The Word enables us to remain strong on this journey we call life. It is by faith that we are able to move so that new graces, blessings and possibilities can happen to us," said Sister Haley. "Every moment in our lives is a new opportunity to be blessed."

Jesus suffered and died for all our sins, she said.

"By the power of the spirit, if we were not worth it, he (Jesus) wouldn't have come," said Sister Haley. "Jesus died for good folks, for our essence is good."

"Christ left us with his spirit, knowing we have the power and authority to live a more Christ-like life," said Rev. Mr. Todd.

Good people sometimes perform actions that are not good, said Sister Haley. "But any behavior less than good is not worthy of God's image."

Because we are endowed with the Spirit, we can reject Satan, who provides choices, said Sister Haley.

"If we sin, it's by choice. God's spirit is better than anything. If we'd listen to that spirit, it would give us the power to tell Satan 'no,'" she said. "There's nothing the devil can offer us that God hasn't already promised us."

"In the Bible, the first definition of power is the ability to make change. And we, through the power of the Spirit, can change," said Sister Haley. "No matter what we have done in or with our lives, we can change. Any moment, we can change, and that's the grace."

"You can run this race called life, reach landmark after landmark, moment after moment, from grace to grace," she said. "In this hope is our salvation."

Archaeologists say John the Baptist might have used Israeli cave

Carvings, foot-washing stone constitutes evidence, says expert

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

JERUSALEM — Archaeologists believe a cave they uncovered in the Judean Hills south of Jerusalem may have been the cave used by St. John the Baptist, The Associated Press reported.

Although some scholars dispute the claim, the archaeologists say it is at least the oldest baptismal site yet discovered.

"The site we've uncovered is seemingly the connecting link between Jewish and Christian baptism," British archaeologist Shimon Gibson was quoted as saying in the Israeli Ha'aretz newspaper Aug. 17.

Gibson is the director of the private Jerusalem Archaeological Field Unit and supervises the dig. The University of North Carolina at Charlotte helped sponsor the dig.

Though the cave houses a huge water cistern decorated with Byzantine-era wall carvings that the excavation's archaeologists believe depict John the Baptist and others, some archaeologists say there is no actual proof John the Baptist ever used the cave, said Ha'aretz.

The carvings include the image of what the archaeological dig team says is John the Baptist and a cross-shaped carving, reported Ha'aretz.

Among the findings was an imprint of a foot which archaeologists believe would have contained oil and where early Christians would have placed their right foot for cleansing after descending 28 stone steps, said Ha'aretz.

Gibson told AP that the carvings, the foot-washing stone and other finds, taken together with the proximity of John's home town, constituted strong circumstantial evidence that the cave was used by St. John.

The cave is located some 2.5 miles from Ein Kerem, the traditional birthplace of John the Baptist. The French Catholic monastery of St. John in the Wilderness is also located nearby.

Archaeologists also pulled about 250,000 pottery shards — the apparent remnants of small water jugs used in the baptismal rite — from the cave, AP reported.

Gibson said the cave — 80 feet long, 13 feet wide and 13 feet deep — was originally formed in the Iron Age, somewhere between 800 and 500 B.C., and was apparently first used by the Israelites as an immersion pool.

Archeologists working west of Jerusalem recently unearthed this cave they believe was used by St. John the Baptist. The entrance, shown in this Aug. 16 photo, leads down 28 steps to an underground cistern. Archeologists uncovered about 250,000 pottery shards from the cave, which British archeologist Shimon Gibson, who headed the dig, believes are remnants of small water jugs used for baptism. Wall carvings of a man with a staff and wearing animal skin also point to John the Baptist.

DID YOU KNOW? JOHN THE BAPTIST

— Also known as John the Baptizer

— Cousin of Jesus Christ; son of Zachary, a priest of the order of Abia, and of Elizabeth, a descendent of Aaron and kinswoman of Mary.

— As Zachary was ministering in the Temple, an angel brought him news that Elizabeth would bear a child filled with the Holy Spirit from the moment of his birth. Zachary doubted and was struck dumb until John's birth.

— John lived as a hermit in the desert of Judea until about A.D. 27. He began his ministry around age 27, wearing a leather belt and a tunic of camel hair, living off locusts and wild honey, and preaching a message of repentance to the people of Jerusalem. He converted many, and prepared the way for the coming of Jesus.

— He baptized Christ, after which he stepped away and told his disciples to follow Jesus.

— He was imprisoned by King Herod and died a victim of the vengeance of a jealous woman. He was beheaded and his head brought to her on a platter.

— Feast day is June 24.

Communion statement inspires discussions on church teaching

In a joint letter issued Aug. 4, "Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion," the bishops said that only after the politician's "public disavowal of former support for procured abortion" and "with the knowledge and consent of the local bishop" can the politician be admitted to holy Communion.

"We undertake this action to safeguard the sacred dignity of the most holy sacrament of the altar, to reassure the faithful and to save sinners," they said.

"It's a good teaching moment for the bishops," said Father Mark Lawlor, pastor of St. Vincent de Paul Church in Charlotte. "It's a very courageous statement because not everyone in the church and the general public will understand it."

As of Aug. 17, the diocesan Pastoral Center had received numerous phone calls and nearly 200 letters and e-mails — 112 in support of the bishops' statement and 81 opposed.

Bishop Jugis said he also has received numerous personal expressions of support from lay people and clergy around the diocese where he has been attending Masses, meetings or other gatherings since the statement's release.

In his homily at St. Patrick Cathedral in Charlotte Aug. 7, the bishop said he was grateful for the responses.

"Some people have also reminded me not to forget the other important moral issues — euthanasia, embryonic stem-cell research, death penalty, preemptive war, health care," said Bishop Jugis. "I assure you the church will continue to speak on all these moral issues, while realizing that not all moral issues have the same moral weight."

"Procured abortion is always intrinsically evil and can never be justified. It is a direct attack on an innocent human life," he said. "The pope wrote in the encyclical on the Gospel of Life in 1995 that today many people have lost a sense of how grave abortion is."

"Because it is accepted in the popular mind, in behavior, and in the law, people are losing the ability to distinguish between good and evil, even on so fundamental an issue as the right to life of the unborn," said the bishop.

Reception of Communion

As stated in "Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Politics and Reception of Holy Communion," Catholic politicians or candidates who support keeping abortion legal will be admitted to Communion after their "public disavowal of former support for procured abortion" and "with the knowledge and consent of the local bishop."

State of grace

Father Herbert Burke, pastor of Immaculate Conception Church in Forest City; Father Christopher Davis, pastor of Holy Infant Church in Reidsville; and Father Lawlor reported mostly positive feedback and support from their parishioners regarding the statement.

"A few people didn't understand it. I think they were listening to the secular media or didn't read the statement," said Father Lawlor.

In their letter, the bishops admonished "all Catholics whose beliefs and conduct do not correspond to the Gospel and to church teaching" that they "must approach holy Communion free from mortal sin."

"Those who are conscious of being in a state of grave sin should avail themselves of the sacrament of reconciliation before coming to Communion," they added.

"The statement is not a penalty," explained Father Lawlor. "Communion means a union with Christ. The statement addresses that all Catholics need to be in a state of grace ... free from mortal sin ... prior to receiving Communion."

"Certain people have chosen to be outside of the union," he said, "but the church has reconciliation to help people reconcile with past errors."

"Catholics in political life have the responsibility to exemplify in their public service" the church's teaching against abortion, "and to work for the protection of all innocent life," the bishops' statement said.

"It is the Catholic politician's choice to accept or deny basic Catholic teaching," said Diane Hoefling, Respect Life coordinator at St. Vincent de Paul Church. "Denying the Eucharist is a last resort after attempts to counsel."

Some critics of the statement accused it of being political.

"It's not about politics, it's about church teaching," said Father Burke.

"In the eyes of the world, there's a difference between the killing of a 5-year-old girl and a 5-month-old in the womb," he said. "In the eyes of God, there is no difference. It's our job to take this stand."

"The bishops, as successors of the Apostles, stand up for life as a precious gift from God," said Father Lawlor.

"The problem with the United States is that we are so individually-minded. We don't want people telling us what to do or think," said Father Davis. "This leads to a breakdown of morality in society."

"In a world where we don't see the sand, the bishop's statement draws the line in it. And that's a good thing," he said.

Cooperating in evil

"For over 30 years, pro-abortion Catholic politicians have strongly supported partial-birth abortion, abortion for minors without parental consent, abortion-funding worldwide and, most recently, embryonic stem cell research and human cloning, to name a few of their positions contrary to church moral teaching," said Hoefling.

"As a Catholic pro-life activist, I have witnessed the confusion and discord among Catholics caused by allowing these politicians to continue their anti-life leadership without public reprimand," she said. "I greatly appreciate the courage of Bishop Jugis, Bishop Baker and Archbishop Donoghue who now want this deadly scandal to end."

At their June meeting near Denver, the U.S. bishops approved a statement on Catholics in political life that said politicians who act "consistently to support abortion on demand" risk "cooperating in evil and sinning against the common good."

In that statement, approved by a 183-6 vote, the bishops said that "all (people) must examine their own consciences" about their worthiness to receive Communion, including with regard to "fidelity to the moral teaching of the church in personal and public life."

But decisions about any sanctions to be imposed rest with each bishop in his own diocese, the statement concluded.

"In the cases of Iraq and the execution of criminals, these are gray areas," said Father Burke. "You can't compare a guilty criminal being executed or the Iraqi war, where you can possibly apply the just-war theory, with the murder of an innocent child. That is always a black-and-white issue and always wrong."

"Because of the bishops' leadership, Catholics are beginning to realize that, while many issues are important, the right to life is the foundational issue making all others conditional," said Hoefling.

"The destruction of human embryos for stem-cell research is also intrinsically evil, as is euthanasia, and can never be justified because all these directly target and destroy innocent human life," said Bishop Jugis.

"The encyclical on the Gospel of Life reminds us: The death penalty may be justified in very limited instances: 'in cases of absolute necessity ... when it would not be possible otherwise to defend society ... (and today) such cases are very rare, if not practically nonexistent (Gospel of Life, 56)," said the bishop. "War also may be justified under certain defined conditions (Catechism, 2309)."

"But procured abortion may never be justified. Euthanasia may never be justified. Destruction of human embryos for stem-cell research may never be justified," said Bishop Jugis. "There is a lot of work for the church to do on many fronts."

"I'm proud of the bishop for taking a stand when so few people are willing to stand up for what's right," said Father Davis. "It says much for the kind of leader he is and the example he wants us to follow."

Vatican official says pro-life stand doesn't impede religious freedom

PARIS (CNS) — A pro-life stance does not infringe on the freedom of religion; rather, all governments have a duty to protect life from the moment of conception to its natural end, said a top Vatican official.

Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, head of the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, said protecting human life "is not a position of faith"; it is an obvious fact born from reason. His remarks appeared Aug. 13 in a magazine of the French newspaper Le Figaro.

However, anyone opposed to protecting the right to life also would be acting against the Catholic faith, said the cardinal.

"A politician who takes a different position, who does not respect the image of God (in man) and the inviolability of the human person, is also in opposition to the rational elements of faith" and to the "fundamental elements of the Christian conscience," he said.

Cardinal Ratzinger's comments follow an ongoing debate within the Catholic community on whether a priest or bishop should deny Communion to a Catholic politician who supports public policies that stand in opposition to church teachings — particularly on right-to-life issues.

In June, U.S. bishops approved a statement that said politicians who act "consistently to support abortion on demand" risk "cooperating in evil and sinning against the common good."

They determined that "all must examine their consciences" about their worthiness to receive Communion, including with regard to "fidelity to the moral teaching of the church in public and private life."

The bishops also added that decisions about any sanctions to be imposed, such as denying Communion, rest with each bishop in his own diocese.

Cardinal Ratzinger's congregation published a document in January stating that Catholics must not promote or vote for any laws that would lead to attacks on human life.

The "Doctrinal Note on Some Questions Regarding the Participation of Catholics in Political Life" said that, while the freedom of conscience leaves Catholics free to choose among political parties and strategies for promoting the common good, they cannot claim that freedom allows them to promote abortion, euthanasia or other attacks on human life.

Cardinal Ratzinger said that document and its teaching do not seek to infringe on political or religious freedom, but favor pluralism.

He added that the church is "convinced that faith is a light for reason" and that the Catholic politician must shed that light in the political realm.

Pope John Paul II smiles at a child after delivering his Sunday Angelus prayer at Castel Gandolfo, Italy, Aug. 8. The pope greeted five mothers who decided against abortion and their children after the prayer.

Pope meets with women who decided against abortion, kept children

CASTEŁ GANDOLFO, Italy (CNS) — Pope John Paul II met with five women who decided against an abortion and chose to deliver and keep their babies.

Before thousands of pilgrims gathered at his summer residence at Castel Gandolfo, the pope gave an "affectionate greeting" to "some mothers who refused an abortion and to their children."

After the pope's Aug. 8 Angelus prayer, the five women and their toddlers were part of the procession of well-wishers who lined up to greet the pope.

The women — two from Albania and one each from Ukraine, Kazakhstan and Italy — were part of the "Opera Mater Dei" community in Castel Gandolfo.

With the encouragement of the pope, the community was asked by its bishop four years ago to help pregnant, disadvantaged women.

While the number of Italian women requesting an abortion has steadily declined over the years, the number of foreign women in Italy requesting the procedure is on the rise.

The Italian news agency ANSA reported the number of women undergoing an abortion in Italy has dropped more than 44 percent since 1982. For the past decade, the average number of women terminating their pregnancies has hovered around nine out of 1,000 women each year.

Blackouts to vaccinations: Book records Vatican activities

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Most of what happens at the Vatican never makes the newspapers, but a lot of it is published.

The "inside story" about the Vatican and its operations is reported and put on sale each summer in the "Attivita della Santa Sede" ("The Activity of the Holy See").

The tome summarizing the work of every Vatican congregation, council, office and tribunal in 2003 ran to more than 1,400 pages — excluding the 31-page, full-color "photo chronicle" inserted in the middle.

The 25th anniversary of Pope John Paul II's election, the beatification of Mother Teresa of Calcutta and the naming of 30 new cardinals dominated the book's introduction as well as the reports of 2003 activities of the master of papal liturgical ceremonies and the Vatican press office.

Big news of the year included the Sept. 28 electrical blackout that left all of Italy in the dark and cut off power to the Vatican. The Vatican's backup systems have since been reinforced.

The first 611 pages of the book are devoted to a day-by-day account of the activities, meetings and appointments of Pope John Paul.

The book also includes reports on documents published or being worked on by Vatican offices, major restoration work on Vatican buildings and art, and reports on roadwork, telephone traffic and visitors' passes.

The 2003 edition, unlike some earlier volumes, did not provide figures for the liters of milk produced by the cows at the papal villa in Castel Gandolfo or the tons of garbage collected within Vatican City State.

The following information gleaned from the book includes:

— The Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith continues to consult with local bishops and bishops' conferences about "presumed 'apparitions' and 'supernatural' phenomena."

"The first case that comes to mind," the report said, is that of Medjugorje, Bosnia-Herzegovina, where the bishops have said, "it is not possible to affirm" that the Blessed Virgin Mary appeared there and, therefore, parishes or dioceses should not organize pilgrimages to the site.

On the other hand, it said, the congregation has worked with the Rwandan dioceses of Butare and Gikongoro, and the local bishops have recognized as authentic the apparition of Mary to three young women in the town of Kibeho.

— The Congregation for Divine Worship and the Sacraments confirmed the designation of Our Lady of the Street (in Italian, "Madonna della Strada") as the patron saint of Rome's street sweepers and taxi drivers.

No mention was made about a patron saint for taxi passengers, and nothing was reported about the ongoing search for a patron of the Internet.

— In addition to witnessing the canonization of 12 saints and the beatification of 21 other holy men and women, the Congregation for Saints' Causes received: 39 formal diocesan reports on miracles attributed to a candidate's intercession; seven diocesan investigations of presumed martyrdom; and 48 diocesan reports on the life and heroic virtues of men and women being considered for sainthood.

— Three Oblate Sisters of the Holy Child Jesus clean, mend and iron the pope's liturgical vestments and the linens used for papal Masses. Members of the order began offering the service to Pope Innocent XI in 1688.

— Experts responded to a "biological attack" — described only as leaving a white film over frescoes — in the Catacombs of St. Callistus. The catacombs are part of a major international study on treating bacterial attacks on rocks in underground burial places.

— In St. Peter's Basilica and the Vatican parish of St. Anne, 658 baptisms were celebrated during the year, 391 people were confirmed, and 105 weddings were performed.

— The Vatican telephone service registered 3.9 million calls within Vatican City State, 3.6 million telephone calls to Rome and 1.7 million long distance calls during the year.

BY SHARON K. PERKINS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Last summer I was invited to be the vocalist at the out-of-town wedding of a cousin. After the wedding liturgy, we all adjourned to the reception hall for the dinner and dance.

Because of the large crush of guests, my family and I had to scramble to secure seats at the same table. I was kept busy for the next several minutes fetching beverages and appetizers for my parents and aunts.

Just as I was sitting down to enjoy my own plate, I was startled by an invitation to join the wedding party at the head table. Much to my surprise, I was ushered to a place near the bride and groom and served by a waiter — something I hadn't experienced since my own wedding years earlier.

My hosts' intent was to "exalt" me to a place of honor, but my introverted self was challenged by the move. I would be surrounded by people I had never met or barely knew. How could I push beyond my comfort zone and make conversation when the people I was most comfortable with were seated several tables away?

The situation presented a dilemma that was both pleasant and problematic.

Eventually I was able to relax, socialize with my tablemates, and make some new acquaintances in the process — a reward I had not expected.

In today's Gospel, Jesus relates a parable set in the context of social situations common to people of his place and time. He emphasizes that simplicity and humility are desirable traits for the disciple — if for no more noble reason than to avoid social embarrassment!

Even more importantly his story points out the importance of the virtue of hospitality toward those you don't normally associate with. This kind of hospitality requires you to move beyond your comfort zone and extend yourself without expectation of return.

Of course, the ultimate outcome of such generosity is repayment at the "resurrection of the righteous." But ask anyone who invites displaced college students to Thanksgiving dinner or takes in foster children or serves the poor, the infirm, and the marginalized in their own surroundings, and they will tell you that the reward begins here and now.

Gibson's 'Passion' tops readers' list of 'pro-Catholic' films

Anti-Catholic movies rated poor at box office, says NCR editorial

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NORTH HAVEN, Conn. — Mel Gibson's movie "The Passion of the Christ" topped a list of "pro-Catholic" films submitted by readers of Faith & Family magazine and the National Catholic Register newspaper.

Readers of the two publications, sponsored an online poll, which garnered responses from more than 1,000 people, according to Father Owen Kearns, a priest of the Legionaries of Christ who is publisher of the two periodicals.

An eight-member panel of critics was also asked to nominate what it felt were the most "anti-Catholic" movies.

The panel's top choice was last year's "The Order," a thriller about intrigue at the Vatican over an arcane medieval ritual known as "sin eating," a heretical rite by which a person takes on the sins of another.

For readers to nominate a film for the pro-Catholic list, guidelines stipulated that the film had to "explicitly show Catholic customs and beliefs and had to be unambiguously positive," according to a National Catholic Register editorial. The editorial also pointed out that the poll was "unscientific."

"The Passion of the Christ" received more votes from readers than the next three films on the list combined: "The Sound of Music," "A Man for All Seasons" and "The Song of Bernadette."

Rounding out the 10 most pro-Catholic movies were "It's a Wonderful Life," "The Ten Commandments," the made-for-TV movie "The Scarlet and the Black," the TV miniseries "Jesus of Nazareth," "Schindler's List," and "The Bells of St. Mary's."

Anti-Catholic films following "The Order" was "The Magdalene Sisters," "Sister Mary Explains It All," "Chocolat," "Stigmata," "Dogma," "Elizabeth," "The Last Temptation of Christ," "Priest" and "Agnes of God."

"Look at the list of pro-Catholic movies, and you'll see some of the top-grossing movies of all times," the National Catholic Register editorial said. "Look at the list of anti-Catholic movies, and you'll see films moviegoers largely rejected."

Of the anti-Catholic films on the list, six were classified O for morally objectionable by the U.S. bishops' Office for Film & Broadcasting. The office had given three films A-IV classifications, for adults, with reservations — indicating films that, while not morally offensive in themselves, are not for casual viewing because they require some analysis and explanation to avoid false impressions and interpretations.

Five of the pro-Catholic films were given A-I classifications, for general patronage; one was classified A-II, for adults and adolescents; two were classified A-III, for adults.

"A Man for All Seasons," "It's a Wonderful Life" and "Schindler's List" also made the Pontifical Council for Social Communications' list of the top 45 films of the century deemed to have special artistic and religious merit. The list was issued in 1995 to mark the 100th anniversary of cinema.

Staubach CEO announces massive Belmont Abbey development plan

New college president presents award to former NFL quarterback

BELMONT — The Staubach Company has announced a plan for a large complex mixed-use development on property adjacent to Belmont Abbey College.

Roger Staubach, chairman and CEO of The Staubach Company, offered details of what will be one of the largest land development projects in the Southeast at the college July 29.

It was the result of a six-month study by the Southern Benedictine Society of North Carolina, Inc.; Pharr Yarns, Inc.; Parkdale Mills, and R.L. Stowe Mills, Inc. The study examined land along Interstate 85 in Gaston County that is adjacent to Belmont Abbey College and runs from the Catawba River to McAdenville.

The Staubach Company, a global, full-service real estate advisory firm, said the development could ultimately include up to a million square feet of office space and more than a million square feet of retail space, with the remainder dedicated to residential and medical development. The magnitude of the project will place it as one of the largest developments in the Charlotte/Gastonia region.

The development project also is expected to help bring jobs and property tax revenue sources to the local economy.

"It has always been important for us, as the Southern Benedictine Society and as Belmont Abbey College, to continue our careful stewardship of the land entrusted to us, but also to be good members of the community, with an important commitment in mind — to keep the members of the greater Gaston/Mecklenburg community updated on our efforts," said the Abbot Placid Solari, abbot and chancellor of Belmont Abbey.

The land, consisting of connected tracts of about 1,100 acres, has belonged for generations to the four member organizations, which represent some of North Carolina's most respected historic corporate citizens.

Staubach said it has been important for him to sit down with the group to discuss the regional and national importance of this key property.

"We are committed to assisting these great organizations in the creation of a development which will be a strong benefit to the area and region," said Staubach. "We are excited about the strategy and look forward to great success with this project."

Belmont Abbey College also took the opportunity to honor the former Dallas Cowboy quarterback with a special award, The Pope Pius XII Sport at the Service of the Spirit Award, presented by Dr. William Thierfelder, college president.

"We're trying to recognize something often neglected in today's society, an individual who is actually living today's virtues," said Thierfelder. "It may be hard to believe Mr. Staubach could surpass his greatness off the field as a role model — a father, a husband, a business professional. But remarkably he's done exactly that."

Catholic and Protestant crosses

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Why do Catholics have crucifixes, with the image of Jesus on the cross, and Protestants have plain crosses? Some friends told me this is because Protestants emphasize the resurrection of Jesus, and Catholics emphasize the suffering and death of Jesus. Is that true? (Michigan)

A. I don't think so. The answer to your question involves a bit of history about how veneration of the cross was viewed by Christians through the centuries.

We Catholics are so accustomed to having crucifixes that we assume it was always that way. This is not true. For most of the Christian era, until about 800 years ago, Christian art and devotion rarely showed the suffering Jesus on the cross. In fact, during the first 500 years or so after Jesus' death and resurrection, the body of Christ in any form was almost never portrayed on crosses.

Crucifixion was a shameful death, and remained so for centuries in the cultures in which Christians found themselves. In spite of St. Paul's claim that we are proud of, we boast in, the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ (Galatians 6:14), willingness to embrace that truth, especially to publicly depict Christ crucified in art and worship, didn't come easily or quickly.

The conviction that our Lord's passion and death were part of the whole paschal, or Easter, event was so deeply imbedded in the church that heaviest emphasis was placed on the resurrection.

When crosses finally came to be more widely used, in the late fifth and sixth centuries, they were adorned with color or jewels (the "crux gemmata," jeweled cross) for the same reason. Jesus is risen, our faith climaxes in the glory of the resurrection.

When the body of Christ itself did begin to appear more frequently on crosses, it was usually some portrayal of the risen Lord, rather than the dying or dead Christ that became common later.

Around the 1200s, the suffering of Christ came dramatically more to the front in European theology and spirituality. The wars, crusades, plagues and other sufferings of that period brought Christianity to a greater awareness of their share in the suffering and death of Jesus, an awareness that showed itself in all forms of Christian art and devotion, including the way they saw the cross.

From then on, crosses displaying the suffering Christ with stark realism, often in grisly detail, were widely popular, and remained so until our own time.

With today's renewed emphasis on the resurrection and its focal place in the history of salvation, something like jeweled crosses and crucifixes with the body of the risen Lord are again seen more in Catholic Churches.

I'm not sure anyone has a final answer to your question. Perhaps the reason you give is part of it, in light of the long tradition of the cross without the body, which I just described. The emphasis on the intensity and horror of the suffering of Christ was certainly at least as strong, however, in the theologies of the Reformation as in the Catholic Church of those days.

Probably the feelings of many early Protestants against the presence of any statues or other images in church buildings had something to do with it, along with a perhaps inevitable tendency of leading Protestant figures at that time to define themselves in opposition to the traditional faith, contrasting their beliefs and practices to those of the Catholic Church.

Crucifixes are not completely unknown in Protestant churches even today. Some Lutherans and parts of other Protestant communities habitually still use the crucifix.

Who is 'Worthy to Receive the Lamb'?

Ask the Bishop

MOST REV. PETER J. JUGIS
BISHOP OF CHARLOTTE

Editor's note: Bishop Peter J. Jugis responds to readers' questions regarding his recent statement, "Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion."

Q. Why does the statement only deal with abortion? What about the other sanctity-of-life issues, such as capital punishment, euthanasia and pre-emptive war?

A. The statement intentionally addresses only a very specific issue: pro-abortion Catholic lawmakers and holy Communion. It is the result of reflection that Archbishop John F. Donoghue, Bishop Robert J. Baker and I engaged in after the June meeting of the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The matter of pro-abortion Catholic lawmakers and holy Communion was discussed by all the bishops at that June meeting. After the meeting, the USCCB issued a statement, "Catholics in Political Life," in which the U.S. bishops noted that the decision not to admit pro-abortion Catholic lawmakers to holy Communion was to be left to the individual bishop.

Archbishop Donoghue, Bishop Baker and I decided to address, by means of our own statement, only the specific issue that was brought up at the June meeting, namely pro-abortion Catholic lawmakers and holy Communion.

There are many moral issues which our Church is addressing in our society today. We wish to bring our teaching on the inviolable dignity of all innocent human life, from conception to natural death, into the public arena for the betterment of our society.

The killing of an unborn child is always intrinsically evil and can never be justified. Likewise, euthanasia and the destruction of human embryos for stem cell research are always intrinsically evil and can never be justified. Each of these practices involves a direct attack on innocent human life. They are directly contrary to the moral law.

Capital punishment, however, may be justified under certain clearly defined conditions, even though such instances "are very rare, if not practically non-existent" today (Gospel of Life, 56). War, for instance, may also be justified under certain clearly defined conditions (CCC 2309).

Not all moral issues have the same moral weight as abortion and euthanasia and destruction of human embryos for stem cell research.

The Church has a lot of work to do on many different fronts.

Q. If this is an important church teaching, why didn't it come from the Vatican?

A. In November 2002, the Vatican did issue, with the approval of the Holy Father, a document entitled, "Doctrinal Note on Some Questions Regarding the Participation of Catholics in Political Life." This document was issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith.

The document addressed the matter of Catholic lawmakers in political life, stating that "those who are directly involved in lawmaking bodies have a 'grave and clear obligation to oppose' any law that attacks human life" (n. 4). The document drew upon the 1995 encyclical, The Gospel of Life, in which the Holy Father addressed the same problem of support for abortion legislation (n. 73).

Canon 915 of the Code of Canon Law provides that those "who obstinately persist in manifest grave sin are not to be admitted to Holy Communion." This canon applies to the situation of pro-abortion Catholic lawmakers: they "obstinately persist" in promoting evil in a very public way by their support for abortion legislation. Their public support for what is objectively a grave sin, i.e. abortion on demand, is the reason for the application of canon 915 to their particular situation.

The teaching on the absolute inviolability of innocent human life, of course, does come from the Vatican. It is the teaching of the universal church. It is the responsibility of the bishop to apply the teaching to particular situations in his diocese.

Back to school: Engaging the world

Guest Column

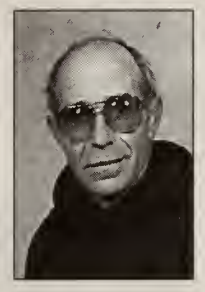
FATHER JOHN AURILIA, OFM Cap



The beginning of a new academic year is never routine: somebody is new, the students of last year will be challenged by a higher grade and new frontiers will be explored.

Education, after all, is not simply an academic exercise of knowledge; it is, most of all, a growing process in knowledge, wisdom and faith. We are engaged in changing the world; otherwise the world will change us.

When looking at our world, I never cease to be amazed at its beauty and grandeur. While I strongly believe in the magnificence of this world, I also recognize that this world is still in the process of being redeemed, so there is some misery, sin, pollution, drugs, child abuse, murder, rape, war and terrorism somewhere.

Our youngsters are actively engaged in returning the original beauty to this ugly world. The institutions of school and church have the specific mission to engage the world, recognizing all the while that it is a world that belongs to God. He possesses it by virtue of being its creator. God loves this world, even though sinners have turned beauty into ugliness and magnificence into misery.

This world is in desperate need of better education and stronger faith. The school has the task of freeing from prejudice, delivering moral values and releasing the power of knowledge to recover the lost treasures.

How do we do that? By learning from our glorious and sometimes humiliating history of the world, by loving and forgiving, and by setting priorities not according to selfishness, but according to goodness.

Students know that good schools teach us that this is still a beautiful world, and when it is made ugly by terrorism, we don't want to react with terrorism, or worse, with hatred. When life closes in or gets blocked by hatred, we open it up with love.

The walls of cynicism, prejudice, hatred, fear, must crumble or be jumped over. Labels, divisions, intolerance, ignorance will engage our new generation of student to change all of the above into hope and success. Do we engage in discrimination every day? Yes we do and we should not.

I remember the lovely lady who went to the U.S. Post Office to buy stamps for her Christmas Cards. She says to the clerk, "May I have 50 Christmas stamps?" The clerk says, "What denomination?"

The woman says, "God help us. Has it come to this? Give me 6 Catholics, 12 Presbyterians, 10 Lutherans and 22 Baptists."

From DIA to OSA

Augustinian friar leads fight on many fronts

Working Matters

JOANITA M. NELLENBACH
GUEST COLUMNIST

Counterterrorism analyst turned Augustinian friar studying for the priesthood, Brother Joseph Narog has undergone a major career change.

Known as Brother Joe to parishioners of St. Margaret of Scotland Church in Maggie Valley, he's spent this summer at the church in a pastoral internship required for his master of divinity degree at Washington Theological Union.

"I didn't know what to expect," he said of the parish, "but from the day I got here I've been overwhelmed by how warm and spirit-filled this place is."

Shadowing Augustinian Father Francis Doyle, pastor, Brother Joe's observed "the amount of things you have to be conversant in, everything from keeping the budget to ministering to the sick to being involved in the broader community. If you're really going to put your heart into it, you'll find things to become involved in, because you're not in a little enclave."

Brother Joe, 45, holds degrees in international relations and foreign affairs. During 15 years with the Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) and the Joint Special Operations Command, Joe became a counterterrorism analyst, then a training manager for the DIA's counterterrorism training project. Worldwide, he trained analysts from the military services and civilians from the FBI and CIA.

"I loved what I was doing," Brother Joe said. "I'd studied foreign affairs. I got to apply my degree. I got to work at the (1996 Atlanta) Olympics, but when I came back from that trip I had this nagging feeling that something was missing, that I wasn't doing what I was supposed to do."

Raised Catholic, "I'd always go to church on Sunday; I always prayed. People told me I would be a priest, but I'd say, 'No, no way. This is what I studied for. I'm doing my thing.'"

He met with an Air Force chaplain for guidance and spiritual direction, who told him, "If I didn't know better, I'd think you were being called to the priesthood or religious life."

"I thought, 'Oh, my God, I'm 38. What does this mean?" he asked himself.

Hiking in the Rockies, he found out.

"One day in the mountains," he said, "I had one of those aha moments: God is incredible — look at all these mountains. Look at all God has done for me. How can I not respond?"

A friend put him in touch with friars at Augustinian College, the house of formation of the Province of St. Thomas of Villanova in Washington, D.C. Joe began attending Mass there and getting to know the friars.

He entered the Order of St. Augustine in 1998.

It hasn't been all smooth sailing. In his third year of formation, he learned that his mother was dying of cancer and took a leave of absence to be with her. She died the day after her 54th wedding anniversary. Joe remained at home with his father, who became ill three weeks after the funeral and died 11 months later.

One of Joe's deepest memories is of his mother's commitment to her marriage — so strong that she refused to remove her wedding ring, even in the hospital. It never left her finger until the day of her funeral. As a symbol of his own vocation commitment, Joe had his mother's ring incorporated into the ring he receive at his solemn profession of vows last October.

In counterterrorism, he said, "I felt that I was helping people, protecting lives, but what was missing was the spiritual dimension. If I was going to work with people, I wanted it to be on the spiritual level. Working in counterterrorism, I was working with the negative — bombings, kidnappings and threats. Even then I couldn't help believing there was goodness in people."

He's bringing that vision to his Augustinian life.

"More than anything," he said, "I want to help people see the goodness in themselves and others. We are part of the body of Christ and are there not only to help one another but to reach out to the broader community, and to be with people in the sacramental life of the Church, to be with them in baptism, Eucharist, marriage, death — the key moments in people's lives."

Pope thanks God for allowing him to make pilgrimage to Lourdes

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CASTEL GANDOLFO, Italy — Pope John Paul II offered God thanks for allowing him to make a pilgrimage to Lourdes, France, and offered special thanks to his fellow Poles for "having supported me with your prayers" during the Aug. 14-15 trip.

The pope, appearing a bit tired, read only about a quarter of the main Italian text prepared for his Aug. 18 weekly general audience, although he did read the entire texts of his messages of thanks in French and in Polish.

The audience was held in the courtyard of the papal summer villa at Castel Gandolfo and, as in weeks past, did not include the usual multilingual summaries of the pope's main address.

Greeting French speakers, the pope said, "This morning I want to give thanks to God who, in his benevolence, allowed me to go on pilgrimage to Lourdes," the town in the French Pyrenees where the Blessed Virgin Mary appeared in 1858 to St. Bernadette Soubirous.

Pope John Paul also thanked Mary for "the climate of profound recollection and intense prayer" that surrounded his visit.

He told an estimated 3,500 people gathered for the audience that he would remember "with emotion" the huge crowds that joined him, especially the sick, "who came seeking comfort and hope."

The pope also remarked on the thousands of young people present at Lourdes as volunteers and as pilgrims and prayed that they would use the experience "to draw the strength to become free men and women in Christ."

"May the Virgin Mary, the Immaculate Conception, watch over each one of you, accompany you and guide your journey to the encounter with her son," he told the French pilgrims.

Addressing Polish pilgrims, the pope said, "I thank you for having supported me with your prayers during my pilgrimage to Lourdes. From the first day of my pontificate, I have asked you for them, and I know I can always count on them."

St. Lucien Church epitomizes Catholic Church in N.C. mountains

SPRUCE PINE — A small number of Catholics lived in the Spruce Pine area during the 1920s, but one of the faithful in particular, who had family ties in Tennessee, was indirectly responsible for bringing regularly scheduled Masses to the mountain town.

Margaret Wilson Tappan, a resident of Johnston City, Tenn., and grandmother of Spruce Pine citizen Jack Tappan, suggested to a local priest to make weekly train trips from Tennessee to Spruce Pine to celebrate Mass. The priest began in 1928, celebrating Mass at a hotel in town. On a monthly basis, a Jesuit priest from Revere, N.C., also celebrated Mass at the hotel.

In March 1935, Bishop William J. Hafey of North Carolina received a gift of property from Ella Clapp Thompson, an Episcopalian from New York, on which the present church stands. A house on the property was remodeled to ready it for a chapel and priest's residence.

Originally named St. Bernadette, it became the first Catholic church to serve Mitchell, Avery and Yancey counties. The first Mass was celebrated there June 28, 1935, by Father Thomas Carney, the administrator appointed by the bishop.

When Father Stephen Sullivan assumed the pastorate at St. Bernadette Church, he began making plans to build a new church and rectory. Construction began in November 1939, and the church was completed in April of the next year.

At the order of the bishop, the church was renamed St. Lucien because the principal donors placed as a condition of their gifts that the church be christianed in memory of their daughter, Lucien Price. The new church and rectory were dedicated and blessed Aug. 17, 1940.

No sooner than Spruce Pine had its church, a 30-seat chapel was being built in nearby Linville. In March 1942, Linville's new St. Patricia became a mission of the Spruce Pine parish.

Father Walter Higgins was named pastor of the Spruce Pine and Linville churches in 1951, and was celebrating Mass in Burnsville by mid-decade.

Glenmary priests took responsibility for the churches in 1956. An energetic period of evangelization and building followed: Sacred Heart Church was constructed in Burnsville; St. Lucien Church was renovated; and catechetical classes and preaching took place in communities throughout the area.

The Glenmary priests remained until 1968. Diocesan priests have served the Spruce Pine parish since.

The church was again remodeled in the late 1960s, and in the years following catechetical classes were begun and expanded. Two years later, Father John Pagel was appointed to the parish and he immediately expanded the faith formation programs and other parish and community-level activities.

Increasingly larger crowds at Mass — both residents and visitors — led to a building program in 1985, which involved the construction of a new rectory and an expansion of the church. Ground was broken for the rectory in 1987 and it was completed within six months. The former rectory was transformed into the parish social hall, complete with offices and classrooms.

Meanwhile, Father Pagel also turned his attention to building a new church in Linville. The diocese purchased land facing Grandfather Mountain in November 1984, and three years later construction was begun. The first Mass at the new 300-seat church named St. Bernadette was celebrated on New Year's Eve in 1988.

The Spruce Pine pastorate assumed responsibility for the new Linville mission. Burnsville's Sacred Heart Church was elevated to parish status in September 1986, while the St. Patricia facility, which no longer adequately provided for Catholics in the area, was returned to its donating family by the diocese.

St. Lucien Church experienced continued growth over the next decade. Expansion and renovations to the church more than doubled its seating capacity and improved the facility. Also, a house adjacent to the property was purchased and the parking lot was paved.

During the pastorate of Father Aloysius D'Silva in the 1990s, an active faith formation program was developed and continues today — every fourth Sunday, the parish youth lead a pro-life rosary to pray for an end to abortion and a deeper respect for the gift of human life.

Other active ministries include a Rosary Makers Group and a Women's Guild, and many parishioners assist with Habitat for Humanity. St. Lucien Church also offers adoration of the Blessed Sacrament and First Friday devotions.

Father Christopher Gober became administrator of St. Lucien Church in July 2003 and was appointed pastor by Bishop Peter J. Jugis July 6, 2004.

Nearly 80 years have passed since a Tennessee priest celebrated those first Masses in Spruce Pine. Since then, St. Lucien Church has both epitomized and promoted evangelization of the Catholic Church in the North Carolina mountains

ALTERNATIVE ALTAR BREAD

Benedictine novice Kathy Becker prepares low-gluten hosts at the Benedictine Sisters of Perpetual Adoration convent in Clyde, Mo., in March. The U.S. bishops' liturgy secretariat said the convent provides the only "true, low-gluten altar bread ... approved for use at Mass in the United States."

Gluten-Free Living endorses nuns' low-gluten Communion hosts

WASHINGTON (CNS) — A magazine devoted to people with celiac disease has endorsed a low-gluten Communion host made by Catholic nuns in Missouri as "perfectly safe" for celiac sufferers.

Gluten-Free Living came out shortly before a public controversy emerged over a New Jersey mother's fight this summer to change the Catholic rules for such hosts. The church requires bread made from wheat, containing at least some gluten, for the celebration of the Eucharist.

Gluten is a protein in wheat, rye, barley and oats that binds the baked bread. In people who have the genetic disorder known as celiac disease or celiac sprue, gluten causes an immune reaction that can lead to severe damage of the intestinal lining and a number of other health problems.

In the magazine, a nun-pharmacist wrote that she analyzed the low-gluten hosts produced by the Benedictine Sisters of Perpetual Adoration in Clyde, Mo. Her conclusion: "On average, a whole host could contain no more than 37 micrograms of gluten."

Two experts from the University of Maryland's Center for Celiac Research told the magazine that a celiac sufferer could consume that much gluten daily with no ill effects.

The article's author, Sister Jeanne Patricia Crowe, is a member of the Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary and professor at Immaculata University in Pennsylvania. She is a doctor of clinical pharmacy and is on Gluten-Free Living's editorial advisory board.

In an editorial on Sister Crowe's article, Gluten-Free Living editor Ann Whelan said she easily understands the concern of Catholics with the disease, and especially parents of children who have it, about the church's insistence on at least some gluten in hosts.

"To help Catholic celiacs keep their concern in perspective, I went to the experts to ask them if it would be safe to consume a host that might contain up to 37 micrograms of gluten," Whelan wrote.

"It's the daily exposure to gluten that counts" for those with celiac disease, the editorial said. "The best current information shows that 10 milligrams a day should be safe."

Since 10 milligrams is 10,000 micrograms, someone consuming no other gluten would have to eat 270 of the low-gluten wafers a day to reach that threshold, it said.

Sister Crowe described the low-gluten hosts as "very, very light" wafers, about an inch in diameter, yellowish and weighing a little more than one-quarter gram each. "They remind you of a bubbly potato chip," she said.

The Benedictine convent's hosts are the only ones the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Liturgy has approved as a true low-gluten wheat bread suitable for liturgical use.

Respect Life program kits ready for dioceses, parishes

WASHINGTON (CNS) — The U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities has published the 2004-05 Respect Life Program kit materials in English and Spanish for use in Catholic dioceses, parishes and organizations.

The theme for this year's observances is "Made in His Image," or, in Spanish, "A imagen de Dios los creo." Most U.S. Catholic parishes observe the first Sunday of October — Oct. 3 this year — as Respect Life Sunday.

The 2004-05 kit includes a poster in English and Spanish, fliers on the theme in English and Spanish, six educational essays on life issues, clip art for church bulletins or newsletters, a liturgy guide and a catalog of pro-life publications and resources.

The fliers, essays and liturgy guide are also available online at www.usccb.org/prolife, along with electronic versions of essays and other resources from past programs going back to 1996.

Essay topics are suicidal behavior by youth, advances in surgery for unborn patients, a critique of assisted reproductive technologies, effective strategies for pro-life advocacy, the human dignity of those in a "vegetative" state and a discussion of sex and marriage from sociological and theological perspectives.

The printed kit includes the essays only in English, but they are available online in English and Spanish.

In addition to homily tips and sample intercessions for life for use at Mass, this year's liturgy guide includes a novena to Sts. Anne and Joachim and offers rosary meditations on the five "mysteries of light," based on events in Christ's public life, that Pope John Paul II introduced in 2002.

FROM THE VATICAN

Vatican refuses to comment on reports it won't be terrorist target

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Vatican press office would not comment on reports that a terrorist group linked to al-Qaida allegedly said the Vatican would not be a target when it attacks Italy.

The Vatican, while declining comment Aug. 30, pointed to an Aug. 28 statement by Cardinal Angelo Sodano, Vatican secretary of state, saying that he hoped everyone would recognize that Pope John Paul II has been an untiring supporter of peace and of human rights for all peoples.

In a statement posted on an Islamic Web site Aug. 29, the Abu Hafs al-Masri Brigades-European Battalion — the same group that claimed responsibility for the March train bombings in Madrid — repeated its earlier threats to turn Italy "into hell" unless the government withdraws its troops from Iraq.

"We declare that the Vatican will never be one of our targets," said the posting, translated from the Arabic by a French news agency.

It was impossible to verify if the Abu Hafs al-Masri Brigades really posted the message.

While it is Vatican practice not to comment on security matters, Vatican officials have said the Italian government keeps the Vatican informed when threats are received.

The Vatican increased security during the 2000 Holy Year celebrations, making visitors who attended large ceremonies with Pope John Paul pass through airport-style metal detectors. The scanning became a fixture for public events after Sept. 11, 2001.

Since late 2003, all visitors to St. Peter's Basilica have had to pass through the metal detectors whether the pope was present or not.

Pope condemns wave of terrorism, says violence unworthy of any cause

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II condemned a wave of terrorist actions in Iraq, Russia and Israel, saying recourse to violence was "unworthy" of any cause.

The papal appeal was read at a general audience Sept. 1 as another hostage drama was unfolding in southern Russia, where armed attackers seized a school full of children and teachers.

The pope said he was pained at the recent bombings in Russia and Israel, which left many "defenseless and innocent" victims. Russian authorities suspected Chechen rebels were behind the explosion of two passenger jets in late August and a suicide bombing outside a Moscow subway stop Aug. 31.

Officials said the attack on the school in the southern Russian republic of North Ossetia also bore the hallmarks of Chechen rebel actions. More than 15 attackers, some strapped with explosives, were believed to have mined the school and threatened to kill those inside. The Itar-Tass news agency said the militants were demanding the release of imprisoned Chechen fighters.

In Israel, two suicide bus bombings in Beersheba Aug. 31 left 18 people dead. The Palestinian militant group Hamas claimed responsibility for the blasts.

The pope said that in Iraq there has been no end to the "chain of blind violence that prevents the return to civil harmony." He condemned the "barbarous execution" of 12 Nepalese workers kidnapped in late August in Iraq and expressed worry for the fate of two French journalists seized by militants there.

"I make a pressing appeal that everywhere there be an end to the recourse to violence, which is always unworthy of any good cause, and that the two French journalists be treated with humanity and returned unharmed to their loved ones as soon as possible," he said.

The executed Nepalese were reportedly were working for a Jordanian services company; Nepal does not have armed forces in Iraq.

DID YOU KNOW?

Angels are spirits without bodies who are sometimes sent as messengers from God. The feast of the Archangels is Sept. 29, which honors the three archangels Michael, Gabriel and Raphael. Michael is revered as the leader of the angelic army. He has always been the warrior angel, fighting first Satan and his demons and then in the course of time all enemies of God's people. Gabriel is the messenger angel who appears in the Old and New Testaments; he announced the birth of John the Baptist and later told Mary she would become the mother of Jesus. Raphael cured the Old Testament hero Tobit of his blindness. Raphael acted as a guide to God's people and healed others.

N.C. Catholic Daughter visits convention, memorial

Members called to 'feminine genius'

TACOMA, Wash. — A local Catholic Daughter recently ventured across the country on a trip of exploration and affirmation.

Marjorie Thomas, N.C. state secretary and past regent of Court St. Joan of Arc, attended the 50th Biennial National Convention of the Catholic Daughters of the Americas. Nearly 1,000 members, speakers and guests from 40 U.S. states, Guam and Puerto Rico attended the organization's convention July 18-23 in Tacoma.

Resolutions adopted by delegates to the convention expressed support for keeping the phrase "under God" in the Pledge of Allegiance; affirmed that marriage is between a man and a woman only; agreed to promote breast cancer awareness during October; backed the U.S. bishops' "Faithful Citizenship" program for political action by Catholics; and supported the National Safe Kids Campaign to prevent accidental deaths and injuries among children under 15.

Invoking the words of Pope John Paul II, Archbishop Alex J. Brunett told the Catholic Daughters July 22 that every woman's mission "is to recognize and live her vocation of feminine genius."

The Seattle archbishop spoke at a Mass at St. Anne Church in Tacoma marking the installation of new officers for the Catholic Daughters, which describes itself as the oldest and largest organization of Catholic women in the Americas.

In his homily at the convention's opening Mass at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Tacoma, Cardinal Edward M. Egan of New York, the organization's national chaplain, urged the Catholic Daughters to be like Martha and Mary in the New Testament.

"Today's Gospel reading of Martha and Mary is right on target with the CDA," he said. "Mary is often remembered as a sinner, which troubles some people. Martha is not as controversial, but we all know Marthas — upset, complainers, pointing fingers, but they get things done."

Reminding the congregation that "if we say we have no sin we deceive ourselves," the cardinal added. "The greatest heroes in the church are sinners who repent."

During a post-convention trip to Hawaii, Thomas, a World War II veteran and charter and lifetime member of the Catholic War Veterans Post in Asheville, visited the USS Arizona Memorial. The USS Arizona was sunk during the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor Dec. 7, 1941.

Upcoming collection to benefit priests' retirements

BY KEVIN E. MURRAY
EDITOR

CHARLOTTE — Catholics in the Diocese of Charlotte soon will have the opportunity to show they care about the priests who have faithfully served the Diocese of Charlotte.

The annual Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection will be taken up in every parish the weekend of Sept. 11-12.

The collection helps provide monthly benefits for the 26 retired diocesan priests, including Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin.

"These men have served us for years, they've given their lives to us, so it's important for us to support them, now and in their retirement," said Father Tim Reid, who was ordained by Bishop Peter J. Jugis at Our Lady of Assumption Church in June this year.

Father Reid appears with Msgr. William Pharr on this year's poster and brochure promoting the collection.

"The collection is a tremendous help," said Msgr. Pharr, who was ordained in May 1960 and retired in July 2001.

"It's important for retired priests so they can take care of their needs in retirement," he said. "It gives us a sense of independence and ability to do things we were unable to do in the past due to lack of time or finances."

Since retiring, Msgr. Pharr has been involved in chaplaincy work and assisting parishes, as well as a travel study program.

"It also helps us be charitable to parishes and institutions that we'd like to help out," he said.

Contributions also help provide for the future retirements of the 82 diocesan priests currently involved in active ministry, as well as the retirement funds of the 53 religious order priests serving in the diocese.

"I have been privileged to serve as parochial vicar, deacon or seminarian under many of our retired priests," said Bishop Jugis. "Others have served as pastor in my own home parish during my childhood and youth. They are all very dear to me."

The campaign's goal is to collect $1,120,000 — $782,500 to fund the diocesan priests' retirement and benefits plans; $320,000 to support the retirement funds of religious order priests currently serving in our diocese; and $17,500 to cover campaign expenses.

Each parish is assessed 3.5 percent of its annual offertory collection to raise funds needed to support the Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection. In most parishes, that amount is slightly less than two times the regular Sunday offertory.

Proportionate contributions on the weekend of Sept. 11-12 will help parishes pay the assessment.

"The people of the diocese have been very generous," said Msgr. Pharr. "We do feel that we've been appreciated."

CHARLOTTE — Two men in black suits walked back and forth, back and forth outside the diocesan Pastoral Center in early July.

The men were priests, but they were posing for a camera.

"Okay, that's great, but can we try it a little slower this time?" asked the photographer.

Despite the sweltering heat July 8, the two priests nodded and got back into position for another take.

"I'm thinking, 'It's hot out here. Can't we do this inside?'" joked Father Timothy Reid, parochial vicar at St. Mark Church in Huntersville.

Father Reid, ordained in June 2004, and Msgr. William Pharr, who retired in July 2001, were modeling for a poster and brochure to promote the annual Priests' Retirement and Benefits Collection. The collection will be taken up in every parish this year the weekend of Sept. 11-12.

The poster, depicting a new priest passing a retired priest, was sent to parishes across the 46-county Diocese of Charlotte.

"I had some people mention they saw it and that it came out nicely," said Msgr. Pharr, who mused about his new "modeling career."

"They took so many pictures, I figured one or two would have to come out decent," he said.

"My parishioners are having a good time with it, and I'm getting calls from other priests in the diocese," said Father Reid of the feedback. "But as a newly ordained priest, it's nice to help out our retired priests any way that I can."

Contributions also help provide for the future retirements of the 82 diocesan priests currently involved in active ministry, as well as the retirement funds of the 53 religious order priests serving in the diocese.

Catholics explore strengths of Eucharist, liturgy at annual conference

BY CAROLE McGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

HENDERSONVILLE — Catholics in western North Carolina were encouraged recently to walk in the footsteps of Jesus.

Approximately 60 people attended the "Walking in the Footsteps of Jesus: Living as Eucharistic People Conference" held at Immaculata School Aug. 21. The Asheville Vicariate Faith Formation Leadership Team sponsored the annual conference.

"We hoped everyone could find in their daily lives a way to live as Jesus did," said Elizabeth Girton, a team member and faith formation director at the Basilica of St. Lawrence in Asheville.

"We looked at ways to become like Christ and gather our strength from the Eucharist," she said.

Augustinian Father Francis Doyle, pastor of St. Margaret of Scotland Church and a staff member of Living Waters Catholic Reflection Center in Maggie Valley, gave the keynote address on walking in Jesus' footsteps.

"In living our daily lives, we are living sacred lives that play a roll in fulfillment of God's promise that all would be one," said Father Doyle.

The Eucharist is the "source and summit of Christian life," said Father Doyle, and a "sense of fullness and completion is achieved" when a person heads toward this summit.

Workshops were also held for the conference participants.

Ann Stowe, an Asheville Vicariate Faith Formation Leadership Team member and parishioner of St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill, led a workshop on prayer.

Prayer has "a healing effect because we cannot meet the living God and not be affected," she said.

Elizabeth Girton, an Asheville Vicariate Faith Formation Leadership Team member, speaks during the "Walking in the Footsteps of Jesus" conference at Immaculata School Aug. 21.

Elaborating on the types of prayer — praise, petition, intercession and contrition — Stowe said the most important aspect of prayer is to remember that "we are on a journey to God."

Girton offered a session on the liturgy.

"I spoke about how the Catholic liturgy is framed and the history of how it developed into its present form," she said.

Through proclamation of the Word, Christ is encountered in the liturgy of the Word, one of four signs of God's presence, said Girton.

"The other signs are creation, the liturgy of the Eucharist and the ecclesiastical community," she said.

Girton said it is Christ who speaks when Scriptures are read, and he is always present, especially at liturgical celebrations. For example, she said, when someone is baptized, it is Christ who is baptizing.

"We get grace even when we are not aware of it. If you open up your heart, you get more grace," said Girton. "We can choose to just get by or fill up the whole room with grace. Christ is there whether we put anything in or not."

In addition to the conference, Asheville Vicariate Faith Formation Leadership Team also sponsors an annual catechist reflection day in January and a catechist appreciation Mass and dinner in May.

SETTING FAITH ABLAZE

Workshop educates, enriches diocesan catechists

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — More than 400 catechists in the southern region of the Diocese of Charlotte attended the "Hearts on Fire" workshop at St. Matthew Church Aug. 28.

Sponsored by the southern region of the diocesan Office of Faith Formation, the workshop provided catechists and other ministers with enrichment and education for adult education, youth ministry and RCIA ministries.

"The workshop provided spiritual enrichment, creative approaches and sound methods for enriching our faith formation programs in our parishes," said Franciscan Sister Ann Lyons, southern region coordinator of faith formation.

Breakout sessions addressed topics including teaching religion and the Bible; fostering a Catholic identity in young people; helping adults learn about and live out their faith; multiculturalism; and prayer labyrinths.

Norbertine Father Alfred McBride presented the keynote address, "A Season of New Beginnings: Bringing Faith and Love to Your Faith Formation Programs." Father McBride teaches homiletics at Pope John XXIII Seminary and is the author of several books.

Bishop Peter J. Jugis celebrated the closing liturgy.

"The day served as an energizing force and gave catechists information for the new school year," said Sister Lyons.

How she spent her summer

Teen-ager collects shoes for Biscoe parishioners

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

MATTHEWS — While her classmates worked at fast food restaurants or sunned themselves on Myrtle Beach, Kelly Santore spent her summer collecting 142 pairs of shoes.

Most didn't fit her feet. Many weren't her style. And none of them were added to the 20 pairs already in her closet.

Instead, Kelly and her family sorted each pair by size and style, packed them in the family car and drove to Our Lady of the Americas Church in Biscoe Aug. 8.

Kelly, a sophomore at Piedmont High School and a parishioner of St. John Neumann Church, decided in mid-June to collect shoes for the children of Our Lady of the Americas Church, most of whom are Hispanic.

"They don't have what we have — many of them can't go back-to-school shopping," Kelly said.

When she first considered the idea for a shoe drive, she asked Father Thomas Meehan, pastor of St. John Neumann Church, if she could ask the parishioners for donations of new shoes.

Father Meehan encouraged Kelly to "go for it" said Debbie Santore, Kelly's mom.

"He was proud that a teen-ager would want to do something like that," Kelly said.

Initially, she made 60 shoe-shaped tags and posted them on a bulletin board in the church. Within a week, all the tags were gone and Kelly made 50 more. When those disappeared as well, her aunt made a sign for the church saying that although the tags were all taken, Kelly was still taking donations.

Connie Milligan, director of religious education at St. John Neumann Church, was impressed that Kelly took the initiative to start the shoe-drive project.

"I hope that other teen-agers will be inspired to follow Kelly's example and take steps toward helping others."

-- Connie Milligan

"I hope that other teen-agers will be inspired to follow Kelly's example and take steps toward helping others," said Milligan.

Kelly is planning on collecting shoes again next summer, and hopes to accumulate even more pairs by including her neighbors as well as the parishioners of St. John Neumann Church.

"I'd like to get 150 or even 200 pairs next year," she said.

"They were so grateful," said Kelly of the approximately 200 parishioners who came to Mass early to select a pair of shoes. "A bunch of the kids thanked me for them and their parents were so happy."

Back to school in diocese

Numerous staff meetings were held over the summer for new principals, new teachers and all teachers' assistants. Additionally, all new teachers attended a religious in-service day with Mercy Sister Maureen Meehan, director of religious education in schools.

"When meeting so many of the new teachers in the diocese in early August, you can't help but be re-energized by their enthusiasm," said Cherry.

"Overall enrollment is up in the diocese again, and we expect this trend to continue," she added.

Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools saw its highest enrollment in its 14-year history, with Charlotte Catholic High School at more than double its enrollment when the MACS system began in 1992.

Other Catholic schools in the diocese are growing also. A pre-kindergarten class has been added to Our Lady of the Assumption School in Charlotte and a seventh-grade class has been added at St. Mark School in Huntersville.

"What a privilege it is for our community to ensure that Catholic schools continue to flourish as centers of faith, hope and love within the Diocese of Charlotte," said Father James Hawker, vicar of education and pastor of St. Luke Church in Mint Hill.

"Our Lady of Mercy School has gotten off to a wonderful start," said Sandra McMonagle, principal. "Open houses were well-attended, orientation of new parents eased the transition into their new school community and a second second-grade class was opened."

The new school year also features three new principals to the diocesan school system.

Asheville Catholic School has Donna Gilson, formerly a teacher at Asheville Catholic; Immaculate Heart of Mary School in High Point has Wanda Garrett, formerly a music teacher at the school; and St. Mark School has Debbie Butler, who was previously assistant principal at St. Gabriel School in Charlotte.

Broadening horizons

The National Catholic Educational Association (NCEA) reports 34 new Catholic schools opened during the last school year, while 123 were closed or consolidated for a net loss of 45 schools. Although the national Catholic enrollment declined by 2.7 percent during last year, 2,801 Catholic schools — more than one-third of the total — have waiting lists.

Michael Guerra, NCEA president, said that the closings come at a crossroads in the history of Catholic schools.

"This past year, NCEA marks its centennial celebration and is observing 100 years of U.S. Catholic education," he said. "For more than a century, Catholic schools have been a force in the nation, providing a strong academic and Christian education for students. The loss of these schools is a significant loss for our country."

"The Charlotte Diocese is proud of our increase in enrollment and no school closings on the horizon," said Cherry. "The Catholic community continues to grow in the diocese and that is reflected in a growing interest in our Catholic schools."

Catholic education

Catholic schools in the Diocese of Charlotte "propose to create an environment in which the teachings of Jesus are promoted and proclaimed as the basis of values they teach and uphold," as stated on the diocesan Web site.

"It is important in today's society for students to have a safe haven to practice their religious beliefs," said Roberta Hutchcraft, principal of Our Lady of Grace School in Greensboro. "A Catholic school offers such an opportunity within an environment of excellent academic education."

"The Catholic school is a graced environment in which the participants are invited and enabled to grow in their knowledge and love of God," said Father Hawker.

"At the same time, students are assisted to cultivate their talents and gifts even as they are challenged to respond to the needs of others," he said. "There is no doubt, then, that the Catholic school contributes uniquely to the educational mission of the Catholic Church."

PREPARING FOR CLASS

New teachers learn Scripture, Catholic identity at in-service days

BY SUSAN DEGUZMAN
CORRESPONDENT

WINSTON-SALEM — Preparations for the 2004-05 Catholic school year recently brought new teachers in the diocese together.

In-service workshops for teachers on Scripture and Catholic identity were held at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem Aug. 5 and Holy Trinity Catholic Middle School Aug. 6.

Linda Cherry, superintendent of diocesan Catholic schools, joined the gathering of 17 teachers at St. Leo the Great School.

"Mrs. Cherry encouraged teachers in their responsibility to share the Catholic faith," said Georgette Schraeder, principal.

Danita McDonald, a workshop presenter and religion teacher at Bishop McGuinness Catholic High School in Kernersville, felt that Cherry was the real "star of the show."

"How many superintendents of school systems took the time to attend their new teacher meetings?" asked McDonald. "It was a great blessing that Mrs. Cherry could be there with us."

The in-services, organized by Mercy Sister Maureen Meehan, director of diocesan religious education in schools, featured presentations by Mercy Sister Mary Hugh Maudlin, associate professor of mathematics and religion at Limestone College in Gaffney, S.C.

"Sister Maureen arranged a very informative program for beginning teachers to our Catholic school system, especially for those who are not Catholic," said Mercy Sister Emma Yondura.

Sister Yondura, first-grade teacher and religion coordinator at St. Leo the Great School, addressed the primary grade teachers about the Sadlier Religion Program.

Similar workshops were offered at both in-services by McDonald at St. Leo the Great and by Mary Jane Dawson, campus minister at Charlotte Catholic, at Holy Trinity.

The workshops addressed sixth- through 12th-grade teachers on the diocese's youth ministry model for working with adolescents. McDonald and Dawson outlined the characteristics of the "Net generation" and augmented it with examples of a student-directed model for learning.

Sister Meehan will hold additional workshops for Catholic schoolteachers throughout the school year, including several simultaneous workshops with nationally known speakers at various locations in the diocese Sept. 17.

Students learn importance of being 'blessed and happy'

BY CAROLE MCGROTTY
CORRESPONDENT

ASHEVILLE — The back-to-school buzz was evident at Asheville Catholic School's "welcome back" Mass for students, faculty and staff Aug. 20.

During the evening Mass, the congregation extended their hands to join in the blessing of the school's faculty and staff. Each class also chose a symbol and placed it before the altar to be blessed by Father Francis Cancro, pastor of St. Eugene Church. The symbols will be kept in each classroom to remind the students of God's love for them.

The new school year's theme is the beatitudes — students will explore the eight beatitudes both in and out of the classroom.

In his homily, Father Cancro urged the students "to begin the school year knowing that work is blessed and happy."

"You will learn more about yourselves, your teachers; have new opportunities; make new friends; learn new things and how to show others God's presence by showing how blessed and happy God makes all of us," said Father Cancro.

After Mass, students, parents, faculty and staff adjourned to the school cafeteria for a catered dinner.

IHM athletic director receives DSA

HIGH POINT — The North Carolina Athletic Officials Association has honored Kathy Brasiskis with its 2004 Distinguished Service Award.

Brasiskis, physical education and athletic director at Immaculate Heart of Mary School, is a member of the Triad Volleyball Officials Association. She received the award for her more than 10 years of officiating middle and high school volleyball matches throughout the Triad area.

IHM student essays win LAOH competitions

HIGH POINT — An essay written by Austin Grant, a student at Immaculate Heart of Mary School, recently represented North Carolina at the national Ladies Ancient Order of Hibernians (LAOH) Irish history competition.

Grant's essay on Maureen O'Hara won first place in the middle school category at the LAOH's state competition earlier this year.

Elizabeth Sheffield, also a student at Immaculate Heart of Mary School, won third place in the middle school category of the state competition for her essay on Anne McCaffrey, which was also presented at the national competition.

IHM students' poetry published

HIGH POINT — The poetry of seven students from Immaculate Heart of Mary School has been selected for publication in the 2004 edition of the Anthology of Poetry by Young Americans.

Submissions are selected based on originality, rhythmic sounds, rhymes and audience appeal. This is the 14th year the book has been printed by Anthology of Poetry, Inc.

The students are Christa Dolan, Elizabeth Gooding, Hope Griffin, Katie Shank, Zachary Scott, Kara Walker and Liza Watkins. All are students of Lynn Hamilton, sixth-through-eighth-grade English teacher.

WINSTON-SALEM — One student at Our Lady of Mercy School will soon experience a unique enrichment opportunity.

Amanda was nominated by her fifth-grade teacher, Jean Degnan, for her academic achievements and potential leadership ability. Amanda will spend the week at the program for rising sixth- and seventh-graders and have the opportunity for leadership development, educational experiences and personal growth. She will also be able to visit national monuments and museums.

OLG teacher bears witness to anti-Semitism

GREENSBORO — A middle school teacher at Our Lady of Grace School recently got an eye-opening look at anti-Semitism.

Bobbie Gaski, an arts and literature teacher at the school, participated in the five-day 2004 Bearing Witness Summer Institute in Washington, D.C., June 25-30.

The institute is offered to Catholic schoolteachers to help them become better equipped to teach not only about the Holocaust, but also about the evils of prejudice, hatred and bigotry. The program's objectives include understanding the core components of anti-Semitism after the Holocaust, acquiring tools to recognize anti-Semitism and understanding the continued need to fight anti-Semitism.

Gaski and all other Bearing Witness participants were invited to travel to Poland to visit the concentration camp sites and to participate in the Holocaust Memorial March on May 5, 2005. The trip is fully funded by the institute.

Olympics, song and fish during OLG's first week

GREENSBORO — It was a busy back-to-school week at Our Lady of Grace School.

Middle school students held an Olympic celebration Aug. 25. Teams dressed in the colors of the Olympic rings and enjoyed an afternoon of tossing Frisbees, softball, relays and other tests of athletic prowess.

The Olympic torch and United States flag were brought into the gymnasium by eighth-graders Ross Diachenko and Matthew Armstrong to the cheers of the participants and spectators.

The school choir, composed of second-graders and higher, performed during the opening Mass of the school year, celebrated by Father Frank O'Rourke, pastor of Our Lady of Grace Church, Aug. 29. The liturgy for the Mass was provided by the eighth-grade class.

Students and parents enjoyed the film "Finding Nemo" during Back-to-School Movie Night in the cafeteria Aug. 20. A highlight of the evening, sponsored by the school's Parent-Teacher Organization, was a drawing for "Nemo's cousin," Nomo, a fish swimming in his own fishbowl.

Divino Redentor dedicated in Boonville

Divino Redentor Church was dedicated by Bishop Peter J. Jugis Aug. 21.

"It's a blessing to dedicate our church to the holy Eucharist," said Father Fidel Melo, pastor.

The establishment of Divino Redentor (Divine Redeemer) unites the mission churches of La Iglesia del Sagrado Corazon de Jesus in Dobson and Christo Rey Hispanic Center in Yadkinville.

"(This church) is very important for this area," said Gabriel Carvajal, a seminarian for the Diocese of Charlotte and a native of Mexico. "It is a great opportunity for Hispanics to express their faith while keeping the values of their culture."

During the two-hour bilingual Mass, more than 600 parishioners and special guests watched as Bishop Jugis blessed the church with holy water, holy chrism oil and incense, "to signify the superabundant grace and holiness of the sacrifice of Christ."

By the early 1980s, a significant number of Hispanics had arrived in Yadkin County to work in the tobacco and textile industries.

This population was predominately Catholic, and the Diocese of Charlotte responded by establishing a migrant ministry, eventually named Cristo Rey (Christ the King), in Yadkinville in the summer of 1982.

In 1985, La Iglesia del Sagrado Corazon de Jesus (Sacred Heart of Jesus Church) was established 20 miles north in Dobson. The local community converted a former housing facility for migrant workers into a church.

"We are very happy and humbly proud to be here and to be part of the pioneers in this area as Catholics and Hispanics," said Father Melo.

Within a few years, the Hispanic population had grown so significantly that the parishioners of Sagrado Corazon de Jesus and Christo Rey had outgrown their facilities. By 2000, plans were underway for a new 18,000 square-foot facility that would serve as worship, educational and gathering space for Yadkin County's Catholics. Twenty acres of land were purchased in Boonville, at the midpoint between Cristo Rey and Sagrado Corazon de Jesus.

The $1.5 million facility was completed in January 2003 and Father Melo began celebrating Mass soon after. Following the episcopal ordination of Bishop Jugis in October 2003, the process of selecting a name for the new Hispanic center was underway.

To keep in line with the largely Hispanic population, the Spanish name Divino Redentor was chosen for the church.

Father Melo said the new church was designed to make the Hispanic parishioners, most of whom are natives of Mexico, feel at home. The exterior features stucco walls and a red tile roof. The crucifix and altar that adorn the church were crafted in Mexico.

"We have a heavy responsibility to be a strong presence of the Catholic Church, especially by showing what is the essence of us as Catholic Christians," said Father Melo. "We must communicate the kindness of God to each of us through the way we behave within our relationships with others."

Survey: Hispanics want to keep culture while integrating into U.S. life

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Many Hispanics believe that they can be a part of the U.S. mainstream and still retain a distinctive culture and language, according to a national survey.

The poll of 2,288 Hispanic citizens and noncitizens showed that 83 percent view the United States as made up of many cultures. Only 10 percent agreed that "the United States has a single core Anglo-Protestant culture."

Regarding assimilation, 38 percent said it is very important for "racial and ethnic groups to change so that they blend into the larger society, as in the idea of a melting pot of cultures" and 35 percent said that such blending is somewhat important.

However, 66 percent said that it is very important for Hispanics to maintain their distinct culture and 63 percent said that it is very important that future generations of U.S. Hispanics speak Spanish.

The national survey, conducted by the Pew Hispanic Center and the Kaiser Family Foundation to report on Hispanic political views, was based on telephone interviews conducted April 21-June 9. The survey had a margin of error of plus or minus 2.83 percent.

Roberto Suro, Pew Hispanic Center director, said the results indicate a "seeming paradox" in the willingness to blend in and the desire to maintain a distinctive culture and preserve Spanish.

But these are not perceived as mutually exclusive by Hispanics, said Suro.

"There is a perception that this is a country where it is possible to be in the mainstream and maintain a distinct identity," he said.

Regarding what an immigrant has to do to be part of U.S. society, 79 percent said an immigrant has to believe in the Constitution; 65 percent said vote in elections; 55 percent said speak English and 54 percent said be a citizen.

A parallel survey of all Americans showed that 92 percent believed the United States is made up of many cultures and only 5 percent said it has a single Anglo-Protestant culture.

Scout earns award for work at bishop emeritus' house

CHARLOTTE — Clayton Strickland, a member of Boy Scout Troop 174 at St. Gabriel Church, earned his Eagle Scout award by doing some unique handiwork at Bishop Emeritus William G. Curlin's house.

"My Eagle Scout project was to build and construct a prayer garden patio, including an arbor to house a statue of Mary," said Clayton, 17, a Charlotte Catholic High School senior.

In late 2002, Clayton approached Msgr. Richard Bellow about doing work at the parish to earn the award. Instead, Msgr. Bellow spoke about the "perfect project" at Bishop Curlin's house, said Clayton.

Clayton and his father, Erving, then met with Bishop Curlin.

"The bishop was very open to everything. He had a few suggestions and we went from there," said Clayton.

The Scout took photographs and measurements of the backyard. In addition to doing research, Erving advised his son to discuss the project with his troop's leaders who had assisted other Scouts with their service projects.

Clayton also researched the Charlotte area to find other grottos and arbors to measure and photograph for reference.

"I looked in magazines and landscaping books for inspiration and ideas on the design and layout of patios and arbors," he said. "From our initial meeting and through my research, I attempted to incorporate in my design and plan the wishes and ideas of Bishop Curlin."

Clayton compiled the ideas and formulated a plan.

"I developed a three-dimensional computer generated model of the project and presented it to Bishop Curlin for his approval," said Clayton. "From there, I set out to compile a list of materials and contact people to assist on the project."

The enterprising teen-ager gathered volunteers at troop meetings. "I sought the advice of Eagle Scouts from our troop, whom I have helped previously, for assistance with my project," he said.

With his team assembled, Clayton served on the project as organizer and leader of the other Scouts, making sure everyone was assigned a task that fit his ability.

"I was responsible for making sure that the tasks were being completed in a safe, satisfactory and efficient manner," he said.

Clayton had planned to complete the project by September 2003. But the project's scale increased along with other challenges, such as coordinating schedules. In the end, the project, completed in January 2004, cost almost $2,000 and involved more than 300 hours of labor.

Clayton, who plans to become an officer in the U.S. military, didn't mind all the hard work.

"My life purpose is to help others," he said. "I have learned from firsthand experience that a strong faith and family on which you can depend are most critical to personal happiness and the inner strength to face all of life's challenges."

Clayton is proud of his project, and said the bishop has received many compliments on his handiwork.

"The final appearance of the grotto has greatly added to the beauty of the backyard," he said. "The project is the focal point of the backyard and can been seen from any of the windows at the back of the house, especially the living room through the glass doors.

"It is very durable and will last for many years," he added. "It turned out better than we could have imagined."

Irish cardinal says action needed to prevent environmental disaster

BY CIAN MOLLOY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

DUBLIN, Ireland — Effective action must be taken soon at the international, national and local levels to prevent an environmental catastrophe and growing interracial conflicts, said retired Cardinal Cahal Daly of Armagh, Northern Ireland.

Speaking at the launch of his new book, "The Minding of Planet Earth," in Belfast Aug. 23, the cardinal said: "Much of what has been done up to now is mere tokenism, given the scale of looming crisis. There must be changes of life and lifestyle, and these do not come without cost."

"Life in accordance with the Gospel of Jesus Christ is relevant to the survival of life on this planet, as much as it is relevant to the salvation of souls," he said. "Christian conversion and ecological 'conversion' converge."

The book has been in development for a long time, the cardinal said in a telephone interview with Catholic News Service.

"My interest began when teaching philosophy in Queens," he said, referring to the 21 years he spent as a lecturer in scholastic philosophy at Queen's University, Belfast, before becoming a bishop in 1967.

"My interest increased when I became bishop, because of my pastoral duties," he said. "I was very concerned during my ministry about the problem of poverty and the link between poverty and violence in Northern Ireland."

The cardinal said poor people are not violent, but when people perceive themselves as excluded from society or that society is hostile or an enemy to them, it is easier for those who wish to foment violence to find an audience.

The cardinal said he takes Pope John Paul II's 1990 World Day of Peace message as a call for "positive action," and that message motivated him to write his book. He said he could not begin writing regularly until his retirement in October 1996.

"There was a great deal of reading, preparation and reflection required," the cardinal said.

In his book, the cardinal argues that religion and science are not incompatible.

"Contemporary culture has inherited a centuries-old mind-set, to the effect that religion, and specifically Christianity, is inherently hostile to science," he said at the book launch. "My book questions this mind-set. It contends that, on the contrary, Christianity made a vital contribution to the birth of modem science."

The cardinal said the last chapter of his book challenges the idea that humans have been given dominion over the planet.

"Men and women are stewards, not masters, of the universe. They are given a duty to care for the planet, not a plunderer's license. Stewardship implies justice within and between nations, and especially between rich and poor nations, and between rich and poor citizens within the same nation," he said.

BY JEAN DENTON
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I hadn't thought much about John since he dropped out of the confirmation program months ago. But when I saw his mom after Mass the other day, the mixed emotions he'd left me with, the parish youth director, all came back.

For the first two years of high school, John had been excited about his growing relationship with God. He was active in youth ministry and emerging as a leader among his peers. Encouraged in his faith journey by both adults and youth, who described him as "on fire" with his faith, he was chosen for the leadership team of a diocesan retreat program. Then he slipped away.

He dropped out of religious education class and quit the retreat team because of work (to pay for a car) and athletics. Then he decided he didn't need to be confirmed. He never talked to me about it — he e-mailed. In his chip-on-the-shoulder complaint about confirmation, he said he didn't need the church's approval of his faith or the tiresome classes in which he learned nothing new.

I immediately fired back that he hadn't learned anything in class because obviously he'd never listened to the discussions about sacrament and church, as his ill-informed comments demonstrated.

I deleted the message without sending it.

It was just emotion, written out of my angry disappointment that we had failed to reach him.

Not two days later, another youth minister asked about him, and we wondered what had pulled John away from our community. As I said the words, "I don't think we'll get him back," I had the feeling I was abandoning an innocent young man.

And when I said, "At least not anytime soon," I sensed that I was failing to trust God's desire for John's companionship.

Today, I read the Scripture passages for this commentary and saw the angry, disappointed Old Testament God at first desiring to punish his people for giving his invitation a cold shoulder. Then I saw Jesus, the New Covenant, lovingly doing whatever it takes to bring in the lost sheep. Finally, I saw the senior class, and me — going to find John.

Film calls Bush presidency 'most faith-based' in history

BY TRACY EARLY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

NEW YORK — A new film about the religious life of President George W. Bush calls his presidency "the most faith-based administration in American history."

"George W. Bush: Faith in the White House," offered for preview by reporters and delegates at the Republican National Convention in New York, is advertised as "an alternative program" to Michael Moore's "Fahrenheit 9/11."

At a press conference and showing Aug. 30, producer/director David W. Balsiger of Loveland, Colo., said he decided to do the film because Bush "seemed to be walking the talk of his faith more than others." He did not consult anybody in the Bush administration, he said.

Balsiger said people in the Christian community wanted to know if Bush actually lived the faith he professed, and felt more comfortable when they learned the president was a man who began his day with prayer and Bible reading, and who was a "caring and compassionate person."

Janet Parshall, a Washington-based talk-show host, narrates the film, and declares Bush's view of the role of religion is "right in line with the Founding Fathers."

The official release date is Oct. 5, but Balsiger said the film would be shown at the American Film Renaissance film festival Sept. 10-12 in Dallas. It is also available for sale in DVD and VHS formats.

Balsiger, who said he had done 85 biblical programs as well as other "family-friendly shows," described himself as a "secular commercial" producer. But he said he attended Resurrection Fellowship, a congregation of the Assemblies of God, and an independent congregation, Crossroads Church.

Financing for the film, estimated at nearly $400,000, was put up by Ted and Audrey Beckett, land developers in Colorado Springs. There, Balsiger said, he attends New Life Church, a congregation led by the Rev. Ted Haggard.

Rev. Haggard, president of the National Association of Evangelicals, is among numerous individuals the film shows commenting favorably on Bush's religious life.

Balsiger said that although some presidents had depended on one religious adviser, Bush drew on the counsel of many, including Rev. Haggard.

Expressing a desire to maximize impact on the election, Balsiger said the film would be shown on Christian TV stations in September and October, and a marketing effort was under way to get it into each of the nation's churches for viewing in connection with the presidential campaign. He expects to sell a million DVDs, he said.

It was produced under the auspices of Grizzly Adams Productions, a company named for an NBC-TV series it once produced and plans to revive.

The film emphasizes the change in Bush from the time he was a heavy drinker to his later decision to give up that and other bad habits such as cursing. But it also stresses his inner religious change.

In an opening scene, "George W. Bush: Faith in the White House" shows candidate Bush saying his favorite philosopher was Christ and explaining that "he changed my heart."

According to the film, a 1984 meeting with a visiting evangelist in Midland, Texas, was the beginning of Bush's "born-again Christian experience."

The experience culminated the following year, the story continues, in a meeting with the Rev. Billy Graham at the Bush family home at Kennebunkport, Maine.

During a walk on the beach, Rev. Graham reportedly asked Bush, "Are you right with God?" and got the answer, "No, but I want to be."

Calling Bush's religious commitment today a "tough faith," Parshall concludes in the film that Christians should engage in the religious and cultural conflicts of the 21st century, and will prevail "if we all join our faith to his."

Depiction of religion on TV goes in cycles, says newspaper TV critic

BY CHUCK MOODY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

PITTSBURGH — Everything in television goes in cycles, and that includes the depiction of religion and the religious lives of TV characters, said Rob Owen, TV editor of the Pittsburgh Post-Gazette.

"Sometimes we can find it in the most unlikely of places," said Owen of religious content on series.

"For instance, that episode of 'The West Wing' ... entitled 'Two Cathedrals,' where President (Josiah) Bartlet is cursing at God inside the National Cathedral in Latin," he said. "A powerful scene."

"It dealt with religion in a way that real people deal with it," Owen said. "Real people get angry at God. Real people have doubts about God. But too often on television you don't see that depicted. Instead, you see the saccharine 'Touched by an Angel' quasi-spiritual element of purported relationships with God."

"There are ways that religion deals with TV that are both obvious and simplistic, and perhaps not as obvious and a little more complex," he said.

Owen, who also is the lead TV writer for Scripps-Howard News Service, said TV shows tend to deal more with spirituality and less with religion.

"'Joan of Arcadia' doesn't really deal with a religion specifically," he said. "It deals more with an idea of God that comes out of probably Judeo-Christian tradition, but it deals more with God than it does with the idea of organized religion certainly."

"'Joan,' though, is a show that actually has a little of both ways," he said. "It's often a feel-good show, but it's not saccharine sweet like 'Touched by an Angel.' Therefore, because of that, I actually think that makes it a little more relatable. The idea of seeing God's influence on people's lives is more in line with what some people actually can experience than (to) have someone appear to them claiming to be an angel."

In addition to "Joan of Arcadia" and "The West Wing," Owen said other television series that have had at least somewhat of a religious theme from time to time include: "7th Heaven" on the WB, "The Sopranos" on the HBO pay-cable channel, "The O.C." on Fox and "NYPD Blue" on ABC.

He said he knew of no new series on the fall schedule in which religion is a recurring theme.

Owen said he tends to pay more attention to how prime-time entertainment shows cover religion than how broadcast network news shows do. However, the news media in general tend to cover religion more from a "what's wrong" rather than a "what's right" perspective, he said.

"To some degree, that's the definition of news," Owen said. "When something's right, you don't report it. When something's wrong, that's what makes it news."

Nurse sees other side of Iraq prison

other story as well, says 1st Lt. Deanna Steinmetz, an Army nurse stationed there.

The Abu Ghraib story that everybody knows, of course, is that of American soldiers, some of whom now face prosecution, taunting and abusing naked prisoners. Photos of the abuse shocked the world when they were published in May.

Steinmetz, 24, who comes from Holy Angels Church in Basehor, Kan., said there are also stories of hope from Abu Ghraib. She is part of Task Force Oasis, a medical unit from the 67th Combat Support Hospital in Wurtzburg, Germany, which was deployed to Iraq early this year to serve the medical needs of the prisoners and guards at Abu Ghraib.

While many Iraqi prisoners openly express their hatred of Americans, Steinmetz said in an e-mail interview with The Leaven, Kansas City archdiocesan newspaper, that she went to Iraq with a commitment to treat those prisoners just as she would any other patient — with concern and professionalism.

She said it wasn't easy at first, especially since she knew that many of the prisoners had possibly targeted — and maybe even killed — U.S. soldiers.

"My Catholic faith definitely has guided me through this experience," said Steinmetz, a nursing school graduate of Jesuit-run Creighton University in Omaha, Neb.

She said that after she arrived in Iraq she had many talks with her chaplain and e-mail discussions with her former pastor at Holy Angels, Father Anthony Williams, reflecting on her work with the prisoners.

"I realized that it is not my position to judge these people," she said.

And it's paid surprising dividends.

She recalled the time an Abu Ghraib prisoner was brought to the intensive care ward vomiting blood.

"I got a washcloth, started dabbing his forehead, and wiped the tears from his eyes — as my mom would do for me when I was sick," Steinmetz said. "The patient started saying, 'I will never forget this. ... No, no, I will not forget.'"

In mid-June, she said, a 30-year-old Iraqi man injured by U.S. troops was brought to the prison's hospital with wounds to his abdomen, back and left arm. Despite the fact that the surgery was not yet completed when the anesthesia wore off, the Iraqi profusely thanked Steinmetz and her fellow nurses for the good care he had received.

"He kept saying, 'I love America,' and 'America is good,'" Steinmetz said. "Just a few weeks ago, he disliked the United States enough to harm us, but now he's praising us. It is knowing that I'm able to change the views of a few that keeps me going out here."

One of her worst experiences was on April 20, when insurgents hit the prison with a mortar attack. She and her fellow doctors and nurses escaped injury, but 22 detainees were killed and 93 injured. "I have never seen so much blood in my life," she said.

Steinmetz admits to being homesick, but sees continued importance in her work in Iraq.

"It's imperative," she said, "to stay and finish the job we started."

"Americans do not realize all that is being done out here because the media only focuses on the bad," she said. "They need to realize that the Iraqis are finally getting a choice. ... We need to provide support for the Iraqis until they are ready to do that for themselves."

Her parents, Tom and Debbie Steinmetz, said their daughter has always been compassionate and quick to put empathy into action. They said she spent her first summer after nursing school as a nurse in the Dominican Republic, helping provide health services to those without any.

"Her feeling is that the Iraqis are human beings and need to be cared for," her father said simply.

Jesus, Father Wally and Auntie Mame

Evangelization Matters

FRANK VILLARONGA
GUEST COLUMNIST

On this mountain the LORD of hosts will provide for all peoples a feast of rich food and choice wines, juicy, rich food and pure, choice wines. On this mountain he will destroy the veil that veils all peoples, the web that is woven over all nations; he will destroy death forever. Isaiah 25: 6-8

I would venture to say that few of you have heard of Father Wally McGowan. Father Wally, who died Aug. 14 at the age of 81, was both a friend and a mentor to me when I was living in Miami.

He was a man of unconventional wisdom who had a spirituality which, though seemingly simple, revealed a remarkable depth. He was a man who enjoyed life and found beauty in all things. On Gaudete and Laetare Sunday, he wore not only a rose chasuble, its removal would reveal a pink liturgical shirt and a pair of pink socks.

There are many things I will remember about him, but the one that stays in my mind deals with a homily he once delivered. When preaching on the heavenly banquet passage from Isaiah, he opened with a line that Rosalind Russell delivers in the film "Auntie Mame": "Life's a banquet and most poor suckers are starving to death!"

So what does this have to do with evangelization? Everything.

For me, this line captures not only the spirit of a dear priest friend who embraced life in all its artistic splendor, it also captures one of the great, yet easily ignored, truths about our faith: God's overabundant love is truly good news for everyone, yet so many people don't realize this.

Our challenge is to bring this good news to everyone — but first we must believe it ourselves.

For me, evangelization is about sharing the joy of our faith; relishing the fact that God's inclusive love is unconditional, and inviting others to experience the fullness of joy God offers us. Yet so many people choose to starve.

We can begin to look at these "starving suckers" in our pews and I bet we will find many who are there out of duty or obligation, worshipping a God who is "keeping tabs" on what we do and waiting to punish our minute faults, instead of one who, as Jesus proclaims in John 10:10, offers us fullness of life. As Pope Paul VI affirmed and Pope John Paul II has echoed, "the church begins the work of evangelization by evangelizing herself."

We can then look outward to those who have not fully heard the good news of the Gospel message. Perhaps they have not heard of God's love through the divine plan of salvation. More importantly, perhaps they have not witnessed the inclusiveness of God's love because all they have seen or heard from the church or its members is condemnation.

Our task is to mirror the compassion we have received while staying true to Gospel values. Evangelization, in this case, consists not only of preaching, but also of living out our faith.

We can continue to look and find those who are unable to live the abundant life of the good news because they are enslaved through some of the many evils and injustices in society. In this case, our task is to remove those shackles which society itself creates.

Put another way, the goals of evangelization, as stated by the U.S. bishops in the document "Go and Make Disciples," include: to bring about in all Catholics such an enthusiasm for their faith that, in living their faith in Jesus, they freely share it with others; to invite all people in the United States, whatever their social or cultural backgrounds, to hear the message of salvation in Jesus Christ so they may come to join us in the fullness of the Catholic faith; to foster gospel values in our society, promoting the dignity of the human person, the importance of the family and the common good of our society so that our nation may continue to be transformed by the saving power of Jesus Christ.

At times the task may seem daunting; however, it makes sense when one remembers Jesus' parable about the king who gives a feast in which the invited guests turn down the invitation and refuse to attend. He then orders his servants to invite all those out in the streets. I often wonder why someone would turn down the invitation, yet marvel at how the banquet is not cancelled, but rather other guests are sought out and found.

Such is the love of God — he does not want all those "poor suckers" to starve, but, rather, to enjoy the fullness of life which he offers. It is a lesson that Jesus taught, Auntie Mame proclaimed and Father Wally lived.

Pope says people lose human dignity by worshiping false idols

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Anyone who worships the idols of wealth, power and success loses human dignity, said Pope John Paul II.

"He who turns to the vanity of idols is transformed to become like that which he worships, becoming stone," the pope said Sept. 1 at his weekly general audience.

The pope was driven from his summer residence of Castel Gandolfo to hold the audience in the Vatican's air-conditioned Paul VI hall. The Vatican hall allows for more pilgrims to attend the public audience while the smaller, outdoor courtyard in Castel Gandolfo holds just a few thousand people.

In his catechesis, the pope focused on Psalm 115, which speaks of "the greatness and goodness of the true God."

The psalm compares the pagan gods which "speak not ... see not ... and hear not" with the living God of the people of Israel.

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Lifeless idols do not intercede to help their believers while those faithful to the Lord "know they have in the living God their help and their shield," the pope said.

The Lord is "the omnipotent creator" of heaven and earth, "love and truth" are his virtues, and "the cosmos and history are under his sovereignty of love and salvation," he said.

Even though "idolatry is a temptation for all of humanity in every place and at every time," those who look to the one true God "receive the characteristics of the divine and the strength to reject the enticement of worldly idols," said the pope.

A crisis of awareness

Guest Column

JOE PURELLO
DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF JUSTICE & PEACE

Catholic Relief Services (CRS) is at the forefront of keeping our nation's leaders aware of the atrocities and humanitarian crisis taking place in the Darfur region of western Sudan (go to www.catholicrelief.org for up-to-date information).

CRS estimates that this crisis has displaced 1.2 million people and that total deaths exceed 50,000. The death toll could increase exponentially if the refugees do not receive essential food supplies and medicines, clean water and shelter, and if the killing does not stop.

The horror that is taking place in Sudan is racist, systematic and targets the innocent. The situation threatens to destabilize the entire region of north-central Africa. The nation of Chad, one of the poorest nations in the world, has already received nearly 200,000 refugees.

Even though the crisis in Darfur has been raging for many months, as of mid-July 2004, a majority of Americans were unaware of the situation. A national poll conducted July 9-15 by the Program on International Policy Attitudes at the University of Maryland revealed some startling results. Asked how much they had heard about the situation in Darfur, Sudan, "where there is a conflict between the local black African Darfuris and the central government, dominated by Arabs," only 14 percent said "some or a lot," 28 percent said "not very much" and 56 percent said "nothing at all."

Another crisis facing Africa is the epidemic of HIV/AIDS. Nearly 30 million Africans are infected with HIV/AIDS (70 percent of people infected with HIV/AIDS worldwide) and the disease kills more than 2 million people a year in Africa. Medicines widely available in well-to-do nations are financially out of reach for most African nations. The disease has decreased economic production, created a demographic surge in orphans throughout Africa, and exhausted government resources that could have been spent on education, sanitation, and other public services.

While most Americans are aware that AIDS in Africa is a very serious problem and agree that the United States should offer support to address HIV/AIDS there, a June 13-23, 2002 poll by the Kaiser Foundation/Washington Post/Harvard Poll revealed that 50 percent of Americans feel the United States is spending either too much (16 percent) or about the right amount (34 percent) to address the HIV/AIDS crisis in developing countries (with 20 percent saying they did not know).

This same poll reported that 56 percent of Americans also believe the United States spends too much on overall foreign aid, and 22 percent think the right amount of foreign aid is being distributed. Given the need for a far greater response to address the extent of poverty, disease, suffering and conflict in Africa, the wealthier nations of this world must raise their awareness of the cry for help from Africa.

The September Sunday Gospel readings have the common theme that, in order to be faithful disciples and gain God's favor, we must use our possessions in a just and compassionate fashion. In the Gospel parable of Lazarus (Sunday, Sept. 26), Jesus teaches us that our surplus resources are to be used in service to the poor as called for by the Law of Moses.

On Sept. 10, Father Robert J. Vitillo will speak at the Just Second Fridays program at St. Peter Church in Charlotte. In addition to being the executive director of the Catholic Campaign for Human Development, Father Vitillo serves as the special advisor on HIV/AIDS for Caritas Internationalis (a federation of Catholic social service and development organizations).

He will speak on the topic "Looking at the HIV/AIDS Epidemic through the Lens of Catholic Social Teaching." Please come and learn more about the HIV/AIDS crisis in Africa.

The fifth commandment

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Is the proper translation of the fifth commandment "Thou shalt not kill" or "Thou shalt not murder"? An evangelist was answering a question of whether God condones war or not. The actual commandment, he said, was not to murder. I never heard that, but thought about it much when I was in the Marines. (Illinois)

A. The commandment, as passed down in Hebrew tradition, probably does mean murder, the deliberate immoral killing of another human being.

First of all, to claim it prohibits all killing would fly against what were understood as the teachings of God throughout Old Testament times. Killing animals (ritually or for food) and sometimes even humans (in war, tribal retribution, etc.) often was seen as not only approved but required.

There is more to it than that, however. The Decalogue (Ten Commandments) did not make up the whole body of law for the Jews. For example, they do not touch on many personal moral responsibilities. Rather they focus on actions that protect the needs and good of the community, the violation of which could injure the covenant between God and his people or between the people themselves.

Thus, apart from the obligation to keep the Sabbath and the prohibition of images, the commandments are in fact similar to the general human experience we find echoed in the laws of other ancient communities. A society whose members routinely lie, murder, violate marriages, steal or destroy another's property or reputation will soon destroy itself.

The fifth commandment must be understood in that context. When ancient Hebrews killed a rebellious slave, for example, or killed another in revenge for killing one's relative, it was not considered immoral. Just as the commandment itself was meant to protect human life in Israelite society, so murder was not a private affair; it weakened the whole Hebrew community, and in the name of that community could be avenged.

What is forbidden, therefore, is all killing that is not explicitly authorized within the framework of God's commands. The commandment has no direct connection, for example, with killing animals, killing enemies in war or capital punishment.

I hope it doesn't need saying that our attitude, at least as Christians, toward these latter killings has gone far beyond ancient Israel. The teaching, example and laws imposed on us by Jesus Christ drastically change the way we see our obligations to our human brothers and sisters as common children of God.

In addition, we have learned much in human society over the centuries about other, more humane and effective ways of dealing with human wrongdoing than resorting to "an eye for an eye." It is revealing that the United States is now the only country in the developed, civilized world that still imposes the death penalty. It is, others have discovered, not only inhuman, but counterproductive.

As you likely have discovered, there are several forms of enumerating the Ten Commandments, mostly based rather loosely on the two major listings in the Hebrew Scriptures, Exodus 20:1-17 and Deuteronomy 5:6-21. In Roman Catholic tradition the prohibition against killing is No. 5. For other Christians, including most Protestants and ancient and modern Greek churches, that commandment is No. 6.

The pain of painkillers

Faith & the Marketplace

GLENMARY FATHER JOHN S. RAUSCH

Danny knew pain most of his life from a chronic ear disease. He found relief with antibiotics, but he lived with a dull pain inside his head. In 1990, he suffered a gunshot wound and his doctor prescribed a pill containing the opiate oxycodone to treat the pain. The painkiller unwittingly gave Danny his ticket to a life-long roller coaster ride.

When the medicine wore off, the pain returned, and with it came Danny's eight-year quest for more and better painkillers.

As his addiction advanced, Danny visited doctors seeking painkillers for one malady after another — stomach trouble, insomnia, ear pain, the gunshot wound, vertebrae or nerve problems. In his final hours, Danny locked himself in the bathroom and snorted OxyContin, a potent time-released oxycodone hydrochloride.

Then with a single blast from his hunting rifle, Danny administered his last painkiller.

Nearly a half million people in 2000 — 43 percent of those coming to hospital emergency rooms from drug overdoses — were treated for misusing prescription drugs. Federal statistics in 2002 estimated that 6.2 million Americans misused prescription drugs, compared to 2 million misusing cocaine and 700,000 misusing ecstasy.

Part of the increase of prescription drug use lies with the pharmaceutical firms whose relentless marketing creates an appetite for the promised nirvana of pain-free living. The largest drug companies now spend nearly three times more money marketing and promoting their products than doing basic research and development.

In today's medical climate, patients expect a pill to relieve their pain. The culture of instant gratification seizes on the allusion of pain-free living to deny the life struggle from birth through death.

Given that harsh pain might require chemical intervention, an increasing number of folks are seeking holistic alternatives to drugs with their unwanted side effects and possible addiction.

Judy, a woman with severe allergies, quit western medicine for acupuncture and herb therapy. Jeanie, with lupus, found pain relief through foot and hand massage. Agnetta, suffering acute pain from lymphadema, abandoned morphine for reflexology, the application of alternating pressure causing a physiological change in the body.

Alternative folks train themselves to accept the daily pain of life by visioning a serene place without pain rather than sedating themselves with chemicals. Treating pain apparently requires a balance between mind, body and spirit.

During the 1980s, a significant number of Hispanics arrived in Yadkin County, northwest of Winston-Salem, as migrants working in the tobacco industry.

This population was predominately Catholic, and the Diocese of Charlotte responded by establishing a migrant ministry, eventually named Cristo Rey (Christ the King), in Yadkinville in the summer of 1982 to serve families in Yadkin and south Surry counties. The four Catholic parishes of Winston-Salem — Our Lady of Mercy, St. Leo the Great, St. Benedict the Moor and Our Lady of Fatima — founded the ministry in a joint effort.

In 1985, La Iglesia del Sagrado Corazon de Jesus (Sacred Heart of Jesus Church) was established 20 miles north in Dobson. The local community converted a former housing facility for migrant workers into a church. Although the structure had no running water and relied on kerosene heater for warmth, it was utilized as the church for eight years.

Father Joseph J. Waters, a pioneer in ministry to Hispanics in the Diocese of Charlotte, was appointed director of diocesan migrant ministry in 1982. He led a search for Spanish-speaking priests to celebrate Mass for the Hispanic communities in the western Piedmont.

For several years, the Hispanic community of the Yadkinville area gathered in the American Legion Hall in nearby East Bend for Masses.

By 1986, the growth of Hispanics in the area prompted the Diocese of Charlotte to purchase a former hardware store just south of Yadkinville to provide a permanent pastoral center for the local community.

Father Joseph Mack, then-pastor of St. Joseph Church in Asheboro, celebrated the first Mass in the hardware-store church July 8, 1990. In August, Franciscan Sister Andrea Inkrott was hired as director of the center, and in December then-Bishop John. F. Donoghue blessed the facility, giving it the name Cristo Rey.

The number of migrant families permanently settling the Yadkinville area continued to rise. By 1995, the number of people attending Sunday liturgies was such that some worshippers were forced to stand on the porch or outside on the property.

Cristo Rey served as a church and as a place of assisting Hispanics by offering interpretation and translation needs, English classes and cultural and practical orientation.

Franciscan Sister Linda Scheckelhoff joined the Cristo Rey staff in August 1992, and also assisted in Hispanic ministry with Father Waters in nearby Dobson and Wilkesboro.

For the next several years, they promoted lay leadership, participation in lay ministry and formation of small Christian communities.

An acre of land and a building that once housed a restaurant were purchased along Route 601 south of Dobson. The Hispanic community renovated the building, and on Dec. 12, 1993, members gathered for the first Mass celebrated there.

Msgr. John McSweeney, then-diocesan administrator, blessed and dedicated the chapel in January 1994. Mass attendance increased with the dedication of the new church facility, and a faith formation program was begun for children.

Father Waters worked diligently with migrant settled families in the area, traveling to Dobson to celebrate Saturday evening Mass, visiting families, preparing parishioners for the sacraments and transporting members to and from the church.

Soon, the Hispanic population outgrew both the Sagrado Corazon de Jesus and Cristo Rey facilities. Both communities commenced plans to unite the two parishes and construct a new church between the two existing centers of worship.

By 2000, plans were underway for a new 18,000 square-foot facility that would serve as worship, educational and gathering space for Yadkin County's Catholics. Twenty acres of land were purchased in Boonville, at the midpoint between Dobson and Yadkinville.

The new church was designed to make the Hispanic parishioners, most of whom are natives of Mexico, feel at home. The exterior features stucco walls and a red tile roof. The crucifix and altar that adorn the church were crafted in Mexico.

The $1.5 million facility was completed in January 2003 and Father Fidel Melo, pastor, began celebrating Mass soon after. Following the episcopal ordination of Bishop Peter J. Jugis in October 2003, the process of selecting a name for the new Hispanic center was underway.

To keep in line with the largely Hispanic population, the Spanish name Divino Redentor (Divine Redeemer) was chosen for the church. On Aug. 21, 2004, Bishop Jugis formally dedicated the church in the presence of nearly 600 worshippers during a Mass celebrated in English and Spanish.

Father Melo says Divino Redentor will strive to be a spiritual home to Yadkin County's 2,000 Catholics as well as making its Mexican parishioners feel at home in North Carolina.

MOURNING AFTER

Local residents walk past flowers Sept. 6 and view the gym where heavily armed rebels held hostage hundreds of school children and adults in the town of Beslan in the Russian province of North Ossetia. At least 335 people were killed in the siege that ended Sept. 3 in a firefight between the hostage-takers and police. The pope called the school takeover a "vile and heartless act."

Pope prays for siege victims, calls deaths 'cruel epilogue'

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Pope John Paul II prayed for the more than 330 victims of the Russian school siege, calling their deaths a "cruel epilogue" to a savage attack.

In a telegram Sept. 4, the pope said the takeover of the school in the North Ossetia province town of Beslan was a "vile and heartless act of aggression against defenseless children and families."

The pope once again condemned "every form of terrorism" and said he hoped that a "spiral of hatred and violence would not prevail."

The school siege ended Sept. 3 in a shootout between police and the hostage-takers, believed to be Chechen rebels. More than 700 people were injured and some 450 hospitalized. About half of the dead and injured were children.

Some feared the tragedy could set off revenge attacks in the area. Most residents of North Ossetia are Orthodox Christians, while the neighboring breakaway republic of Chechnya is predominantly Muslim.

The papal telegram offered prayers for the eternal repose of the victims and words of comfort for the families. He also expressed his affection for the Russian people "in this moment of anguish."

He prayed that the Virgin Mary, "so deeply venerated by the Christians of Russia," would inspire wisdom and efforts toward reconciliation in the region.

At a papal Mass in Loreto, Italy, Sept. 5, the pope and others offered prayers "for the Russian people, stricken by the inhuman violence of this tragic hostage-taking, for all the dead, for the wounded, for the many innocent young victims, and for the families so sorely tried."

When reports of the death toll began to arrive at the Vatican Sept. 3, the pope, who was staying at his residence outside Rome, went to a private chapel to pray, a spokesman said.

In Milan, Orthodox Bishop Teofan of Stravropol and Vladikavkaz, the Russian Orthodox diocese that includes the town of Beslan, described to hundreds of religious leaders from around the world how he personally carried wounded and dead children away from the school.

The bishop spoke Sept. 5 at a meeting on religions and peace sponsored by the Rome-based Community of Sant'Egidio.

"How can they claim to be fighting for freedom when they kill children?" he said.

The bishop asked all people of good will to unite "against the evil of terrorism, which can strike in New York as well as in Madrid or in Beslan or anywhere."

Election materials available for students, parishes, individuals

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Three religious organizations have produced nonpartisan materials to educate voters about political responsibility.

The U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, Catholic Relief Services and the Interfaith Alliance each has made election-related materials available recently.

The USCCB released a bulletin insert that summarizes the bishops' teachings on the role of Catholics in the public arena, drawn from their document: "Faithful Citizenship: A Catholic Call to Political Responsibility."

It can be ordered by calling USCCB Publishing at (800) 235-8722 or online at www.usccb.org/publishing.

CRS is offering a 12-week program to guide college students through political issues addressed in "Faithful Citizenship." The program includes election issues such as trade and foreign aid and how they relate to church teaching.

The online sessions are designed for students, campus ministers or university faculty and staff. Materials can be printed from the Web site, at www.crscampusconnection.org. Information also is available by calling Kevin Kostic, CRS campus ministry coordinator, at (410) 951-7430.

The Interfaith Alliance, a nonpartisan, grass-roots public advocacy organization of more than 75 faith traditions, has produced an election year program, "One Nation, Many Faiths. Vote 2004."

It offers five questions for candidates about faith, religious liberty and pluralism. There also are guides for candidates and houses of worship on how churches, synagogues and mosques may be involved in the election process without violating U.S. law and tradition.

Information can be found online at www.interfaithalliance.org or by calling (202) 639-6370.

Vatican official says, especially on kids, assisted suicide is murder

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — The Catholic Church believes assisted suicide is murder, especially when discussing patients under the age of 12 who, in no way, can be said to make an informed request for help in dying, a Vatican official said.

Bishop Elio Sgreccia, vice president of the Pontifical Academy for Life, wrote an article for L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper, Sept. 3 condemning attempts to extend the Netherlands' assisted suicide law to patients under the age of 12.

Italian newspapers in late August reported a judge had authorized a pediatrics clinic to extend assisted suicide to children, something outlawed under Dutch law enacted in 2002.

The current law allows assisted suicide for patients 12-16 years old suffering from an incurable disease or uncontrollable pain if the patient and the patient's guardians formally request it.

Bishop Sgreccia said children under age 12 are not capable of making an informed request, nor are they "capable of evaluating or defining 'unsupportable' suffering."

When doctors and parents find a child's level of pain to be too much, "is it not perhaps their suffering" and not the patient's that they find overwhelming? he asked.

In the case of children, Bishop Sgreccia said, "one cannot talk about 'helping them to die' or of 'assisted suicide,' but rather death inflicted to 'free them from pain,' which is precisely euthanasia" and not assisted suicide.

Extending the assisted suicide laws, he said, is a misguided attempt to deal with suffering "with the violence of an early death."

Not on the radar: No one at Vatican asks about Bush, Kerry

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — With the race for the White House under way, U.S. bishops at the Vatican for their "ad limina" visits found it strange than no one asked them for their opinions on who the next president will be.

"It's just not on their radar," said Bishop John B. McCormack of Manchester, N.H., Sept. 2, the last day of the Republican National Convention in New York.

"I'm really surprised no one is asking," said Ukrainian Bishop Basil H. Losten of Stamford, Conn.

While the presidential race did not come up with Vatican officials, the bishops from Maine, Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut did talk about it among themselves, Bishop Losten said.

Although specific candidates were not named during their Sept. 1 visit to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the bishops did discuss publicly denying the Eucharist to Catholic politicians who support abortion.

"The Holy Office thinks the statement the U.S. bishops made (in June) does agree with and complement the statement of Cardinal (Joseph) Ratzinger, even though some people want to believe it doesn't," Bishop McCormack said.

Cardinal Ratzinger, congregation prefect, sent the bishops a letter before their June meeting outlining the circumstances under which a bishop or priest could deny Communion to Catholic politicians who consistently support abortion.

A few days later, the U.S. bishops approved a statement saying that politicians who act "consistently to support abortion on demand" risk "cooperating in evil and sinning against the common good."

While making it clear that those who cooperate with evil should not present themselves for Communion, the bishops said that the decision to publicly impose sanctions on a person, such as denying Communion, rests with each bishop in his own diocese.

While the Republican convention and politics topped the news at home, the New England bishops were focused on prayer, their meetings with Pope John Paul II and their discussions with Vatican officials.

"We are not here to give a business report, but to express our faith, have our faith strengthened by the successor of Peter and to return home, in turn, to strengthen the faith of others," said Bishop William E. Lori of Bridgeport, Conn.

Hibernians meet in Philly, re-elect officers

PHILADELPHIA — Several members of the Diocese of Charlotte attended the Ancient Order of Hibernians' 92nd biennial convention in Philadelphia in July.

"It was quite an experience," said Jeanmarie Schuler, vice president of the Ladies Ancient Order of Hibernians' St. Brigid Division 1, based in Charlotte.

Schuler attended the convention with women from her division and the Our Lady of Knock Division in Greensboro.

"The sisterhood among the members was evident," said Schuler. "Although I came home exhausted, I am also inspired to try and live up to our motto: Friendship, Unity and Christian Charity."

The AOH, founded in 1836, describes itself as the oldest lay Catholic organization in the United States. The organization promotes Irish culture and defends the Catholic faith.

Held every two years, the Hibernian conventions include business meetings, elections and other social activities.

"This wonderful gathering of over 1,200 Irish Americans ... was truly an inspiration to me and to the other officers to continue our work," said Ned McGinley of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., who was re-elected as AOH president.

The LAOH, a nonprofit organization comprised of Catholic women of Irish descent, was founded in 1884 as the Daughters of Erin to protect young immigrant Irish girls. The group officially became the LAOH in 1984.

Schuler was one of the original founders of North Carolina's first LAOH division in June 1998. The St. Brigid Division 1, which meets at St. John Neumann Church, has more than 20 members from around the Charlotte area.

The convention was overshadowed in part, however, when Father Patrick Healy, senior priest at St. Mary of the Assumption Parish in Scranton, Pa., and deputy national chaplain of the Hibernians, became ill July 8, the first day of the convention, and died the next day. He had been a priest for 53 years.

"That naturally put a bit of a sadness on the convention," said Schuler.

Two former mayors of Belfast, Northern Ireland, attended the meeting to praise the work of Father Aidan Troy, chairman of the board of governors of Holy Cross School in North Belfast, who received the Hibernians' JFK Medal.

At the convention, delegates approved resolutions opposing Senate ratification of the proposed extradition treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom and reaffirming the organization's opposition to abortion.

The closing Mass in the Cathedral Basilica of SS. Peter and Paul was concelebrated by more than a dozen priests and followed with the installation of both the AOH and LAOH national officers.

CHARLOTTE — Scrolls were recently presented to seven Knights and Ladies of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre of Jerusalem.

The scrolls are significant in welcoming and honoring members in the long-standing lay order.

The Scroll Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral Aug. 7 was concelebrated by Bishop Peter. J Jugis; Father Paul Gary, rector of the cathedral; and Father John Putnam, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Salisbury. Bishop Jugis, Father Gary and Father Putnam are all members of the Holy Order.

Bishop Jugis and Lieutenant John Piunno presented four scrolls from Rome confirming admission to Kerney and Jane McNeil of Asheville and Raymond and Lois Paradowski of Salisbury.

Promotion to the rank of commander was confirmed to General Albert Esposito and Theresa Esposito of Winston-Salem; and Joseph A. Tronco, Jr. of Charlotte.

Thirty-five area Knights and Ladies attended the Mass and reception, as well as the 2004 nominees for investiture, William Augerot, Jane and Michael Balbirnie and Philip Witt, all of Charlotte.

The history of the Equestrian Order of the Holy Sepulchre dates to 1099, when the Knights were established by Godfrey de Bouillon to guard and protect the Holy Sepulcher, the tomb in Jerusalem in which Jesus is believed to have been buried.

According to Alice Cella, regional representative for the Diocese of Charlotte, the Order, whose members must be invited to join, continues its work in the modern world. The weapons of today are prayer and funding aimed at supporting and aiding the church and the Catholic faith in the Holy Land. The propagation and preservation of the faith are coupled with assistance to the Catholic missions in that area.

It sustains the efforts of Catholic working to exist in a land torn by strife and bloodshed, laboring to make their lives more tolerable. Generous aid to the weak and those without protection, striving for justice and peace are the characteristic virtues of the Order of Holy Sepulchre.

Donated cart allows Holy Angels to cruise the outdoors

BELMONT — Holy Angels now has a new set of wheels.

A specially designed wheelchair-accessible limousine golf cart has been donated to Holy Angels, a nonprofit corporation that provides programs and services for child and adult residents with varying degrees of mental retardation.

The cart, named "Holy Rollers" and donated by Carolina Golf Cars, will take residents for trips around the campus while enjoying the built-in radio system.

Gary Babcock, president of Carolina Golf Cars and longtime supporter of Holy Angels, worked on this cart since before Christmas 2003. He, his family and staff took the time and effort to ensure the comfort and safety of the residents in the cart.

He also wanted to make sure they have a great time and experience unique opportunities.

"When I was in college, I visited a place for children with disabilities. Ever since then, it is important for me, my family and company to do something special for people that are less fortunate," said Babcock.

After meeting with Regina Moody, president and CEO of Holy Angels, and the staff and residents, Babcock said he conceived a "stretch golf cart designed for wheelchairs that would be fun and something different."

"To have the kids get outside and have an opportunity to ride around and see a few different sights appealed to me and hopefully to all the people and staff of Holy Angels," he said.

"We are so grateful to Mr. Babcock and his family and staff for their dedication and personal commitment to the residents of Holy Angels," said Moody. "He has demonstrated a generous and kind spirit with his donation of this cart and his attention to every detail about the cart."

"Holy Angels is dedicated to providing unique opportunities for our residents to experience the highest quality of life regardless of disability," she said. "We are able to do this because of the generosity and thoughtfulness of our friends such as Mr. Babcock who understands our mission."

Holy Angels was founded in 1956 by the Sisters of Mercy. Holy Angels' residents have varying degrees of mental retardation and physical disabilities, and many are medically fragile.

Programs include the Holy Angels Residential Center, four Community Group Homes, four Intermediate Care Facilities for the Mentally Retarded group homes, Little Angels Child Development Center, Great Adventures, Camp Hope and Cherubs Café & Candy Bouquets in downtown Belmont.

Asheville Catholic teacher to visit Japan

ASHEVILLE — Pamela Budd, librarian at Asheville Catholic School, will be among 200 educators from across the United States to attend a three-week program in Japan this November.

"I can't wait. It's something that I've been preparing for," said Budd. "I read every night about the country."

Budd was selected from a national pool of more than 2,000 applicants by a panel of educators to take part in the Fulbright Memorial Fund (FMF) Teacher Program, which allows distinguished primary and secondary educators in the United States to travel to Japan in an effort to promote greater intercultural understanding between the two nations.

In total, 600 educators from all 50 U.S. states and the District of Columbia will visit Japan (in groups of 200) in June, October and November this year. Upon their return, the educators will share what they have learned about Japan with their students and communities through a variety of outreach programs.

"I feel this is such a great opportunity for me professionally, as well as for personal growth," said Budd.

Beginning in Tokyo, Budd and her group will receive a practical orientation to Japanese culture and meet officials and educators. Next, they will travel in groups of 20 to prefectures (states) outside of Tokyo to meet with local teachers and students at primary and secondary schools.

"When I return, I'll target the seventh-grade, which is studying Japan," said Budd. "I hope to make Japan more real because I've been there."

She plans to compare and contrast U.S. schools and Japanese schools, religion, food and other cultural aspects. She said she also would take "hundreds of photos" to "give the students a sense that Japan is a real place as opposed to a faraway place."

Budd's group is scheduled to visit cultural sites and local industries; in addition the educators will spend a night with Japanese families.

"I'll be taking Japanese at a local community college, so hopefully I'll be able to communicate with the family," said Budd.

The program is sponsored by the Japanese government and was launched in 1997 to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the U.S. government Fulbright Program, which has enabled more than 6,000 Japanese citizens to study in the United States on Fulbright fellowships for graduate education and research.

The program is administered by the Japan-United States Educational Commission. The Institute of International Education, the nation's largest nonprofit educational and cultural exchange agency, coordinates FMF in the United States.

To date, more than 4,000 primary and secondary educators have visited Japan through the FMF Teacher Program.

Educators throughout the United States can apply to take part as guests of the Japanese government in one of the three scheduled trips to Japan in 2005. Teachers and administrators of all disciplines are encouraged to apply. Applicants are not required or expected to have prior knowledge of Japanese culture.

Community programs provide valuable support for Catholic schools

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — Candles, magazines, wrapping paper. For almost as long as children have attended school, their loving parents, grandparents and even cash-strapped aunts and uncles have been asked to purchase such items during annual fundraising campaigns.

There are many items people can purchase to help schools, including bread, milk, cereal and juice.

Bread, milk, cereal and juice?

Through programs such as Harris Teeter's Together in Education, Bi-Lo's A+ for Schools, Food Lion's LionShop & Share, Campbell's Labels for Education and General Mills' Box Tops for Education, contributing to schools can be as easy as buying a loaf of bread or a gallon of milk.

"It's a simple way to make a donation without opening your checkbook," said Lisa Kehoe, a parent of a second-grade student at St. Patrick School in Charlotte.

Through the store-sponsored programs, every time a customer purchases certain products, the store contributes a portion of the proceeds to the schools that customer has registered to support.

These programs are available to schools throughout the Diocese of Charlotte, but individual schools must register with each store to receive contributions.

Customers need not live in the same city as the school they are supporting. For instance, someone shopping in Boone, where no Catholic school exists, can sign up to support Sacred Heart School in Salisbury.

Customers can also collect the labels from Campbell's products and box tops from General Mills products and turn them into the school they want to support. Schools then redeem Campbell's labels for supplies to be used in the classroom. For each box top received, General Mills contributes 10 cents directly to the school.

In the six years since it instituted the Together in Education program, Harris Teeter has donated $5,049,604.

Each supermarket program works differently in terms of how many schools a customer can sponsor, how long each enrollment period lasts (from three to nine months) and which products qualify for donations.

Harris Teeter contributes a portion of the sale of select non-perishable Harris Teeter products. Customers can designate up to five schools they want to support by "linking" their VIC card to those schools and must re-link their VIC cards annually.

Each time a customer shops at Food Lion and uses the MVP card, LionShop & Share donates a portion of the total grocery purchase to the school, church or other local not-for-profit organization the customer selected. Customers may register for one organization per quarter, but have the option to change the organization they wish to support before each new quarter begins. There is a limit of $350 per organization per quarter.

Bi-Lo customers can support up to three schools using their Bi-Lo BONUSCARD. Like Food Lion, Bi-Lo contributes a portion of the total grocery purchase.

Angela Montague, principal of St. Patrick School, estimated they received $3,500-$4,000 from the various programs during the 2003-04 school year. This school year, their goal is to collect $8,000.

Joe Puceta, principal of St. Michael School in Gastonia, said the school's Parent-Teacher Organization uses the donations to purchase science equipment and materials for teachers.

"These programs provide an unexpected income that always helps, especially for enrichment activities for our students," Puceta said.

"The need for outreach to our own people and to others who speak Spanish is very great."

El Salvador nuns spread Gospel to N.C. Hispanics

coordinator for the Smoky Mountain Vicariate, invited Mother Villaran and one of her nuns, Sister Maribel Ruiz, from El Salvador to work in western North Carolina Aug. 4-23.

Mother Villaran spent her time in Andrews in Cherokee County. Sister Ruiz worked in Cashiers, Sapphire Valley and Glenville Lake in Jackson County. They visited several families or groups each day.

"We announce the Gospel of Jesus," Mother Villaran said. "It's a very good experience for me (here) because this is my work in El Salvador — to announce the Gospel, the salvation from Jesus Christ."

"The need for outreach to our own people and to others who speak Spanish is very great," said Father Carl T. Del Giudice, pastor of Sacred Heart Church in Brevard and its mission, St. Jude Church, in Sapphire Valley.

The small faith communities in the United States engage mainly in faith sharing, but in Latin America, they also train people for various ministries such as music and Eucharistic ministers.

"Everything is guided by the church," Mother Villaran said.

In El Salvador, a nun from the Franciscan Missionaries of Mercy visits a community for a week to invite the residents to start a small Christian community (SCC), a parish-based group that meets to pray, study Scripture and help others. The nuns spend about 15 weeks establishing the community, after which they have a conversion-to-Christ retreat.

PHOTOS BY JOANITA M. NELLENBACH

Mother María Trinidad Villaran leads a small faith community prayer service in Andrews Aug. 21. Jose Martinez plays guitar for the opening hymn. Also attending are Claudia Huerta and her son Guadalupe.

Mother Villaran listens as Claudia Huerta makes a point during a discussion of the story of Jesus and Zacchaeus at a prayer service Aug. 21.

Following that retreat, SCC members can evangelize others.

While Martinez and others at the prayer service attend Holy Redeemer, many feel having an SCC is important.

Martinez explained that people are in church for an hour a week, but the small faith community is where they live their faith the rest of the time.

"In the small communities, we are here to hear not only the word of God but to hear the needs of others," he said.

"It's a way to bring people's faith and their relationship to Jesus right into their homes," said Father Michael Kottar, administrator of Holy Redeemer Church in Andrews and Prince of Peace Church in Robbinsville. "It makes it very personal."

The Franciscan Missionaries of Mercy, an order formed three years ago, have seven sisters, who work in Santa Tecla and Mizata, El Salvador. They minister to the very poor, including war refugees and farmworkers looking for urban jobs. They give food and clothing to the unemployed, but their main work is evangelization.

During the Aug. 21 meeting, Martinez read the story of Jesus and Zacchaeus (Luke 19), while the others followed along in their Bibles. They reread the story in silence, then discussed it.

Mother Villaran explained that it's not enough to hear God's word, but that one must act upon it. Zacchaeus, she said, didn't keep Jesus to himself but invited others to share, so those present at this meeting should not keep Jesus just for themselves but should invite others to the community.

Claudia Huerta said she did not read the Bible much in Mexico because she didn't understand it, but the discussions she has heard in the small faith community have helped her to understand it more.

The small Christian community, she said, is a unique experience and has a spirit she hasn't felt before.

"It was a great help what (Mother Villaran) was doing with the evangelizing, visiting the trailer parks and bringing God's word (to people)," said Father Kottar.

"It was nice to see the presence of a Spanish-speaking nun, and she worked with some of our core people in the Hispanic community," he said.

The prayer service concluded with everyone joining hands in a circle, praying for special intentions and saying together the "Our Father," "Hail Mary" and "Glory Be to the Father."

Afterward people stayed to chat and share a meal of roast pork and spicy refried beans.

This SCC started on the feast of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, celebrated on June 19 this year, so the community took that as its name. Another SCC, composed of about a dozen men, has formed since Mother Villaran's visit.

"When Mother comes back," said Guadalupe Martinez, Jose's uncle, "I hope she will find two or three communities established."

In northeastern Chad's heat and rain, refugee graves are added daily

Thousands flee war, devestation

BY STEPHEN STEELE
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

FARCHANA REFUGEE CAMP, Chad — About 100 graves of Sudanese refugees line the cemetery of the Farchana refugee camp in northeastern Chad.

New bodies are added every day, with most of the deceased being young children or the elderly who have succumbed to the harsh conditions of the African desert. The young adults buried there are women.

Missing are the young men: The bodies of those who were killed are buried or rotting throughout the Darfur region of neighboring Sudan, where government-backed Arab militias have waged a campaign of ethnic cleansing against the black Africans who inhabit the region.

"This cemetery is the symbol of our suffering," said Abdullah Abdulaye.

In northeastern Chad, temperatures reach 130 degrees. Dirt roads washed away by unrelenting rains prevent food and other supplies from reaching the refugees.

In Farchana and Bredjing, the refugees say they do not receive enough food and that their children suffer from chronic diarrhea and other maladies. Their tents are no more than 8-feet-by-10-feet, with new arrivals — families as large as 11 — placed in 4-foot-by-6-foot tents.

U.N. officials describe conditions in Farchana as "good."

One Doctors Without Borders official said 30 percent of the 1,200 patients the agency sees each week in Bredjing suffer from chronic diarrhea. The official said those numbers were "alarming" and could indicate a potential for more serious maladies, such as dysentery or cholera.

"We want to give them more food, but we can't," said Couldjim Madibe, camp director of Farchana. "We have to work within the (U.N.) guidelines," he said.

Those guidelines include per-person-per-day servings of 425 grams of cereal; 50 grams of beans; 25 grams of a corn-soy mix; 25 grams of oil; 15 grams of sugar; and 5 grams of salt.

More than 12,000 refugees are in Farchana. In Bredjing, the numbers have swelled to more than 40,000, with new refugees arriving every day.

About 200,000 Sudanese refugees are in Chad, with a million more displaced within Sudan. The United Nations estimates that about 30,000-50,000 people have been killed since early 2003.

The World Health Organization said Aug. 31 that in Darfur hepatitis cases have increased due to insufficient clean water and poor sanitary conditions, with more than 2,400 cases and more than 40 deaths reported since late May. In Chad, about 30 deaths have been linked to hepatitis, the U.N. agency reported.

Sudan is under intense international pressure to control the Arab militias, known as the Janjaweed. A U.N. deadline to improve the situation in Darfur expired Aug. 30, leaving Sudan facing international sanctions.

The United Nations says Darfur is the world's worst humanitarian crisis.

Farchana was the first refugee camp for Sudanese in Chad. Now 11 camps are under the direction of the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees, and other unofficial camps have been established along the Chad-Sudan border.

Abdulaye said he arrived at Farchana in late May. He fled his village of Guerendi in February during a late-night ambush by the Janjaweed and government forces.

He drew lines in the sand to describe how Sudanese soldiers in vehicles surrounded his village while the Janjaweed on camels attacked. Government aircraft shot at fleeing villagers.

"If you succeed in escaping, the planes follow and shoot at you," he said.

His story is similar to the stories other refugees and the displaced have told humanitarian aid workers for months. Sometimes the government aircraft dropped bombs on villages, followed by a militia raid. Others say the Janjaweed arrived first, with government aircraft finishing the job.

Many of the Farchana refugees said they wanted to return home, but realized it might be a long time before peace is restored to Darfur.

"How do we forget what we witnessed? People killed by planes, women and children shot. How do we forgive such a thing? It is clear in my mind, I want revenge," he said.

"Every day we are dying as a people," Abdu Gammar said Aug. 28 as he pointed to the grave of a young mother buried earlier that morning in Farchana.

OEO assists many in western N.C.

the diocesan Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) at the Bishop Begley Center for Economic Development in Murphy.

Gaffey is enrolled in the OEO's Assets Building Matched Savings Program (ABLE), which will help her to expand her small businesses: selling silver jewelry at a local flea market and building an aviary to house the cockatiels, macaws and conyers she raises and sells.

ABLE — which promotes economic self-sufficiency through training and savings programs for schools, businesses and housing — is just one way that the OEO reaches out to residents of Cherokee, Swain, Graham and Clay counties.

Since Catholic Social Service's Office of Justice and Peace in the Diocese of Charlotte founded it in 1999, the OEO has given grants totaling $101,000 to 47 nonprofit and faith-based organizations and community groups.

The OEO will celebrate its fifth anniversary this year with a festival in the pavilion behind St. William Church in Murphy Sept. 24-25.

Granting community

The OEO, said Father George Kloster, pastor of St. William in Murphy and Immaculate Heart of Mary in Hayesville, is "a visible sign by the Catholic Church that we are concerned about the people in this area, especially the poor, who have been left behind in many ways."

The OEO, he said, shows that the Catholic Church wants to partner with people to help them achieve better lives.

"This region is being forced to make an adjustment from a traditional wage labor economy to a service-oriented '9 to 5' career track," an ABLE brochure states. "Without some assistance through this transition period, families are left behind."

The "adjustment" is forced by the fact that there is little industry in the four western counties.

"The growth areas (now) are small entrepreneurs and heritage tourism," said Joan Furst, the OEO's director.

"OEO does a wonderful job," said Claudie Burchfield of the Graham County Travel & Tourism Authority (GCTTA). "Joan (Furst) and (Father) George (Kloster) are really involved. It makes a difference in these small western communities."

The GCTTA in Robbinsville and the Cherokee County Cooperative Extension Service in Murphy received grants this year toward fairs that help preserve the area's heritage and bring needed dollars into the community.

A $2,500 grant helped revive the Graham County Heritage Festival, held July 4. More than 1,000 people attended, some from as far away as Florida. Events included logrolling, Appalachian music and dance, vendor booths and booths focused on activities of local community organizations, a Native American exhibit and a "taste of Robbinsville," with tickets sold to allow purchasers to sample food at various restaurants.

Any money taken in, over and above festival costs, went back into the community, this time to buy beds for Emergency Medical Service workers to use during their long shifts.

"We've really had nothing that's used to grow community," Burchfield said. "It was just a wonderful event. It brought people together, and we've already had a spinoff. We've having a festival of trees, which will be held in conjunction with our Christmas parade."

During the three-day tree festival, people will buy and decorate trees for display in the town. Tree-purchase proceeds will buy Christmas gifts for needy children and groceries for the local food pantry.

"People were really skeptical about what the festival could be — until after the event," Burchfield said. "Now, everybody's talking about how much bigger and better it can be next year."

Debi Gaffey feeds baby jenday conyers. Handfeeding makes the birds easier to handle. Enrolled in the Office of Economic Opportunity's ABLE matched-savings program, Gaffey expanded her small business by saving money and completing training programs.

A $1,700 grant helped the continued revival of the Cherokee County Heritage Fair, held Sept. 4.

"We're trying to rekindle what we used to have," said Jessica Roberson, family and consumer agent with the Cherokee County Center of the North Carolina Cooperative Extension Service. "I remember growing up here in the '70s when we had a county fair."

In the early 1980s, the fair was discontinued. Last year, though, it returned, combined with the county's third annual heritage walk. More than 3,000 people attended the combined event.

At least as many came this year. Ribbons went to the best vegetables and canned goods, flowers, needlework and woodcarving. A cakewalk and auction were held; clubs and homemaker groups were exhibited.

"It went very well," Roberson said. "Everybody seemed to like the fair and the walk. People kept pouring in."

Gaffey hopes that people will pour into the businesses she's expanding through ABLE. When an ABLE participant has saved $1,000 — to start or expand small businesses, build a house, or further his or her education — ABLE doubles that with another $2,000. Participants can save more but only $1,000 is matched.

Matching success

Gaffey, divorced and raising a 12-year-old daughter, suffers from fibromyalgia and mild lupus.

Nothing has stopped her entrepreneurship, however. Despite setbacks, including the driver who crashed into her front yard about 18 months ago, taking out her car, well and pump and damaging a storage shed, she's forging ahead.

"I make jewelry and I'm planning things all the time that I would like to do if I had the resources," she said.

Those resources would include a computer so that she could expand her jewelry business. At present, she has to use the computer at the local public library to order her materials. She could advertise her products if she had a Web site.

Gaffey enrolled in ABLE, began saving and completed the small-business training program through the Consumer Counseling Service of Western North Carolina Inc. that ABLE requires of all participants. The course teaches a variety of skills, including budgeting and money management, and each participant completes a business plan. Those who don't complete the training get back their savings but without the matching funds.

The materials Gaffey acquired during her training have helped her organize her businesses. "I know where I am at any time," she said. "I never did that before."

ABLE requires participants to save at least $20 a month. Gaffey is saving $20 a week and will finish saving in March 2005, just in time to buy birds for spring breeding.

"There have been a couple of weeks," she said, "when I thought, 'I can really use that money for something else, but I haven't taken it; I've put it in (the bank)."

U.S. bishops back FCC bid to make stations tape their shows

Procedure to help fight indecency in television broadcasts

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — A representative of the U.S. bishops said the bishops back a Federal Communications Commission proposal to compel radio and TV stations to keep tapes of what they've broadcast in case citizens make complaints against them for airing indecent material.

"The current procedure for indecency complaints, which puts the initial burden on listeners and viewers to obtain a transcript from the broadcaster of the program at issue but does not require the broadcaster to provide it when requested by the listener or viewer, inhibits the appropriate enforcement of indecency rules," said Katherine Grincewich, assistant general counsel to the U.S. bishops, in testimony delivered Aug. 27.

"Absent a transcript or tape, the (Federal Communications) Commission is forced to make its initial decision based on a listener's or viewer's memory alone, a situation unfair to the complainant, the broadcaster and the commission," Grincewich added.

"The fleeting nature of indecent broadcast programs — and the need for the proposed new program archives — has, of course, been known from the incipiency of the commission's regulation of indecent broadcasts," she said.

Archiving programs would help community groups determine whether to challenge the renewal of a broadcaster's license, Grincewich said. She asked for rules to be developed "so that citizens will have much-needed information" on which to base such a challenge.

In its drive to deregulate broadcasting, the FCC in 1981 and 1983 "eliminated much of the documentation formerly required of broadcast renewal applicants," according to Grincewich. Since then, she said, "the public must rely instead on time-consuming and elaborate viewer — or listener — logs of programs or on broadcasters' vague quarterly program/issues lists."

The FCC itself, Grincewich added, "has recognized that licensees can easily defeat petitions to deny based on the quarterly lists by providing information they did not include on those lists."

Should the FCC approve the new archiving rule, Grincewich suggested "on-air, primetime announcements and notices on station Web sites are two methods of educating the public of its right to acquire copies of programs."

Grincewich asked the FCC to "take the next necessary step by defining what 'program content' will satisfy the statutory requirement that broadcasters serve the public interest."

"The commission must move decisively ... to establish clear, enforceable requirements that broadcasters determine the needs and interests of their communities of license, air at least a minimum amount of public affairs, news and independently produced programs which meet those needs and interests, and report to the public their actions," she said.

In a July interview with Catholic News Service, FCC Commissioner Michael Copps said the proposed rule became necessary because broadcasters did not respond to an FCC request to voluntarily make and keep tapes.

"The industry could do so much more if it would voluntarily step up to the plate," he said.

2) 1 Timothy 2:1-8
3) Gospel: Luke 16:1-13

BY DAN LUBY
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

Political candidates all seem to want voters to see them as champions of the middle class. Since most Americans consider themselves part of this socio-economic group, it's unsurprising when candidates situate themselves as tireless defenders of middle-class rights and privileges.

Most of us have worked hard for what we have, and a candidate who makes defense of our hard-won comfort is appealing.

But that's not the kind of thinking that motivates the Hebrew prophets, especially not Amos, tree-surgeon-turned-incendiary prophet, who speaks in the first reading of Sunday's liturgy.

For Amos — as for Jesus and an unbroken line of his followers up to the present day pope — those needing courageous and plainspoken defense against the depredations of unjust and corrupt power are the most voiceless among us. In Amos' time, about 750 years before Christ, the scandal of Israel was the heartless treatment of widows, children, servants, tenant farmers, laborers, peasants. Such people had no voice in the corridors of power.

Those who held the reins of economic and social and religious influence had grown so deaf to the cries of the poor that they not only ignored their plight, but actively exploited their powerlessness. Even the byproducts of agricultural production — chaff from threshed wheat — were denied the hungry, for the sake of profit.

Amos' fiery prophecy aimed to shake the privileged from their complacency and confront them with the God who is the champion not of the comfortable and secure, but of the poor.

In the remaining days of the political campaign, let Amos shake us from our complacency as well. Let us mirror God's passionate concern for the defenseless — children (born and unborn), the elderly poor, the mentally handicapped, all those with little or no access to political and economic clout. Let us challenge candidates at every level to be champions of those most in need.

Missionary's fight against Mexican drug dealers made into film

BY GEORGINA STARK
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

CORPUS CHRISTI, Texas — Prayer was often all Oblate Father Ted Pfeifer could fall back on while working as a missionary among poor communities in the mountainous state of Oaxaca in southern Mexico.

When he arrived in 1963, he never imagined the area would be taken over by gun-toting drug traffickers, who forced his dirt-poor parishioners to grow heroin poppy and marijuana.

His defiance of their violence and manipulation eventually led to the drug traffickers, known as "narcos," turning their AK-47s on him.

He survived the attack. "Only the Eucharist and prayer are what kept me going. I had nothing else," said Father Pfeifer, now 71.

Father Pfeifer's story has been made into an independent film, "The Oath," which was shown in a private screening Aug. 6 at the Texas Independent Filmmakers Festival in San Antonio.

Father Pfeifer began working with the poor Zapotec Indians in the town of San Pedro Martir di Quiechapa in Oaxaca a few years after his 1959 ordination in San Antonio as an Oblate of Mary Immaculate priest.

The area was home to around 25,000 Catholics, scattered in small villages across a large mountain range. The villagers had never seen electricity or running water, and had not had a priest in more than 40 years.

More than 30 missions "needed to be visited, by mule or on foot because there were no roads at that time and they were scattered," said Father Pfeifer.

The residents had no health care facility or doctors, so he became a paramedic and set up a clinic. He eventually lost count of the hundreds of babies he delivered and baptized.

"We saved a lot of lives, especially infants who often suffered from diarrhea which could kill them in hours," he said.

In 1975, the priest started noticing visits from northern Mexicans looking forv families to grow the red heroin poppy.

The priest said the families did not know what they were involved in by growing the drugs, except that it paid them 10 times what they could make from their vegetables and beans.

The traffickers had confiscated the Indians' choicest lands, leaving them little acreage to grow the food they subsisted on. The traffickers used violence against those who complained, whose drug crop was not up to par or who disagreed over payment.

In an area with no police force and no telephones, they abused the women and started assassinating the local people.

Father Pfeifer began keeping a record of his murdered parishioners — up to 150 names in 10 years.

Father Pfeifer turned in information of the murders to the attorney general in Mexico City and the district attorney in Oaxaca. He even turned in the names of traffickers believed to be responsible, but complained that officials did little.

In 1987, six traffickers attempted to assassinate the priest on a mountain road. Word had already gone around the villages that the "narcos" had a contract out on the priest.

Father Pfeifer wondered how the townspeople would react to the shooting. His answer came when the parish called a meeting to ask their priest what they could do for him. He offered to leave, knowing that they might also be targeted just to get to him. But they begged him to stay, and he did for eight more years.

The violence continued, along with Father Pfeifer's efforts to bring the perpetrators to justice.

But he saw little being done. He suspected many of the officials to whom he turned in names were involved in the drug trade or had been bribed.

The stress, paranoia and lack of sleep from living in fear took its toll on Father Pfeifer's health. "My blood pressure shot way up and I'm like a walking pharmacy with all the stuff I have to take," he joked.

Maria Luisa Zapata, the director and writer of the film, "The Oath," said she was inspired after hearing him give an account of his missionary work in San Antonio. Plans for release of the movie are still in the works.

"It's an exciting story of someone who truly believes in the Gospels, of God working through a dedicated missionary," said Father Pfeifer's brother, Bishop Michael D. Pfeifer of San Angelo.

Little Flower blossoms in Charlotte

The Little Flower assisted living residence had its groundbreaking ceremony in Charlotte Sept. 6, 1995. The Little Flower residence, named for St. Therese of Lisieux, was the first Catholic-oriented assisted living residence in the Diocese of Charlotte. It was opened to accommodate senior adults who could no longer live comfortably on their own or as safely as they would like, but did not require 24-hour medical care of a nursing home.

Vatican official: Terrorism has unleashed 'fourth world war'

The cardinal, president of the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, spoke Sept. 6 at an interreligious meeting for peace sponsored by the Rome-based Community of Sant'Egidio.

Terrorism on the scale seen since Sept. 11, 2001, has become a type of war outside the bounds of "all of the political and juridical canons consolidated by a very long tradition" for defining war and regulating combat, he said.

The reaction, the cardinal said, particularly in the "preventative war" on Iraq proclaimed by the United States and its coalition partners, is also outside the bounds of traditionally accepted definitions of national self-defense.

Cardinal Martino previously has said that the war on Iraq was not justified, but that once the coalition forces invaded they had an obligation to stay and to provide security while the new Iraqi government is formed and consolidated.

The cardinal said two aspects of "the war of terrorism and the war on terrorism" are completely new.

The first regards the ability of terrorists to strike in one place, yet make an "interruption" into the daily lives of people around the globe, he said.

The immediacy of news coverage brings images of the attacks into everyone's homes, the cardinal said, and the unexpected and horrifying acts make people feel that they may not be safe anywhere, including their offices or their schools.

> "The war ... is particularly disturbing because these acts sometimes are committed in the name of God."
> Cardinal Renato Martino

"With terrorism, war is no longer a far-off event, but is terribly close," Cardinal Martino said.

The cardinal also said that, while war always has been horrible and has "sinisterly shone light on the abyss" of human hearts, "the war we are living through at this moment is particularly disturbing because these acts sometimes are committed in the name of God."

Cardinal Martino said neither politicians nor people of faith could afford to be simplistic when looking at what triggers or contributes to terrorism.

The new world tensions combine more than one motivation: historical tensions among peoples, "economic recriminations caused by great poverty," the search for new political assets, "the vindication of cultural diversity," or other factors, he said.

The cardinal said people also cannot ignore the fact that the international arms trade makes it easy for disgruntled groups to get weapons, frequently using them against the country that provided them.

Because the factors contributing to terrorism are so complex, he said, the response must be as well. Because the causes are complex, "they can be removed only with joint action by a number of local and international actors," he added.

The Christian contribution, he said, must be a more concerted effort to teach and live the truth that God is love and demands that those who believe in him love all men and women.

Cathedrals and stadiums

Modern structures share similarities with ancient churches

Catholics & the Media

DAVID HAINS
GUEST COLUMNIST

The Bank of America football stadium is a short punt from the diocesan Pastoral Center in Charlotte. Driving by its concrete and steel majesty makes me wonder: What does this building remind me of?

Maybe it is elegance on a grand scale, like an ocean liner that has somehow docked itself in the center of a city, ready to take on passengers for a weekly excursion into a fantasy war game. Other times, when I am hungry, it looks more like a giant cereal bowl, waiting for its breakfast of champions. And then I thought of a cathedral. Whoa! Now there's an interesting comparison.

In the Middle Ages when Europe went on a church construction binge, cathedrals were the stadiums of the day. Cathedrals represented the collective wisdom and state of the art engineering skill of people who wanted to create a monument to the most important thing in their lives — their relationship to God. Inspiring spires built by puny men and women, without the benefit of a sky crane or a welding torch, soared hundreds of feet to the heavens. A cathedral was at the center of a community. It was its most important structure.

If you look at the skyline of a modern American city, the monuments are made of steel, glass and concrete, nearly all of them erected to further commerce. Thanks to media hype, community pride is literally and figuratively built upon the foundation of these structures.

Like the cathedrals of yore, the stadiums of today are built with large amounts of donated funds. In modern times, we refer to these contributions as taxes and municipal bonds.

But then the similarities between the two structures drift. Craftsmen often labored a lifetime without seeing their cathedral completed. Modern work crews erect a stadium in 30 months after condemning the houses, usually of poor people, to "progress."

But the big difference between the two structures is, oddly enough, the chief reason for the existence of each. Both were built for worship. It is a fitting tribute to our Lord that as soon as humans had the wherewithal to envision something as grand as a cathedral, they were being built. Cathedrals are a way of saying, "Thanks, God, for giving me the brains to dream this up and pull it off."

On the other hand, a stadium only says, "Let's have a tailgate party and then watch some wealthy muscular men beat the stuffing out of one another." Sports, unfortunately, are a religion for many.

Perhaps the best thing about our faith when comparing cathedrals to the frenzy of the new religion of sports is the fact that the cathedrals have withstood so much. Stone statues of the Apostles are built into the facade of the front entrance of Salisbury Cathedral in England. Peter, James and John and all the rest are weathered by time but they still peer out to all who enter. And once inside a cathedral, what did the people, whose lives were short and hard, do? They knelt and prayed.

On the other hand, to be admitted to a stadium you must first pass through a metal detector. Once inside, video screens flicker images that change every few seconds. Your space within is a comfortable seat complete with its own cup holder.

Perhaps the trump card in this discussion is the fact that the cathedrals have survived. Salisbury Cathedral is more than 775 years old. Most stadiums are described as hopelessly outdated after 20 or 30 years and the wrecking ball is called.

I like football and tailgate parties and the Carolina Panthers. But an awesome game isn't even close to the awe I feel when I attend Mass at St. Patrick Cathedral a mile and a half away or even at the gymnasium that serves as a church at St. Mark in Huntersville.

So if your plans this fall include attending a big game, enjoy the weather and the spectacle that unfolds before you. But don't forget that every church in the Diocese of Charlotte is a cathedral to God's glory. Don't miss out on the awesome miracles taking place there.

Pope says slaughter of children 'cannot leave anyone indifferent'

BY CINDY WOODEN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

The Pope Speaks

POPE JOHN PAUL II

VATICAN CITY — The slaughter of Russian schoolchildren and the countless examples of the killing and exploitation of children around the world "cannot leave anyone indifferent," Pope John Paul II said.

Marking the Sept. 8 feast of the Birth of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the pope called on Catholics to stand before her cradle and take seriously "the obligation we all have to safeguard and defend these fragile creatures and to build for them a future of peace."

The pope turned his weekly general audience into a prayer service for the more than 320 children and adults killed Sept. 3 at a school in Russia's North Ossetia province and for all children around the world who suffer at the hands of adults.

Celebrating Mary's birth, he said, "How can we not think of the many defenseless little ones from Beslan, Ossetia, who were barbarously taken hostage and tragically slaughtered?"

"They were in a school, a place for learning the values that give meaning to the history, culture and civilization of peoples: mutual respect, solidarity, justice and peace," he said.

"But, instead, within those walls, they experienced abuse, hatred and death — tragic consequences of a ruthless fanaticism and of an insane contempt for the human person," Pope John Paul said.

The pope asked the estimated 7,500 people at his audience at the Vatican to be mindful of "all the innocent children who, in every part of the world, are the victims of the violence of adults."

He prayed for children who are forced to take up weapons "and educated to hate and to kill," for children forced to beg, for those who are physically or sexually abused, for those who are abandoned, for those killed in war and for those who die of hunger each day.

An official of the Vatican Secretariat of State then led the assembly in prayers, first for the children killed in Beslan, for their parents and friends. More than 1,200 people were taken hostage in the incident, and more than 700 were injured.

Audience participants also prayed that "the Lord would soften the hardness of heart" of those who make children suffer.

They also prayed for the increasing number of civilians kidnapped in Iraq, including two 29-year-old Italian women working for a volunteer organization who were kidnapped Sept. 7 in Baghdad.

The pope closed the service with his own prayer: "God, our father, you created men and women to live in communion with each other. Make us understand that every child is a richness for humanity and that violence is a dead end that does not lead to the future."

All this talk about values!

The Bottom Line

ANTOINETTE BOSCO
CNS COLUMNIST

First it was George Bush, then John Kerry, and then it was just about every media commentator. Doing what? Talking about values.

I was maybe one of the few listening Americans who rather liked the idea that candidates for the nation's highest office were talking about values. I have long taken that word, in its spiritual meanings, quite seriously.

On the other hand, in the term's material definitions, like "value investing," or monetary worth — such as "this house, furniture, jewelry, etc, has a value of...," I have been left quite cold. There's a simple reason why. It's because such value can change with the wind. What was valuable one day might be trash the next.

Not so with spiritual values. These are enduring, and, boy, do we need enduring values like honesty, respect for others, justice, forgiveness, nurturing care for the earth and praise for the God who gave us life and everything needed to maintain it.

In the presidential campaign now entering its final weeks, we're probably going to hear less about values. My guess is that the media has made such fun of the presidential candidates' use of that word that they won't want to take the risk. We'll probably hear about "American values" a few times because that sounds patriotic. But I doubt we'll hear anyone get up and say, "Hey, values are important because the quality of our lives depends on the values of the society we live in."

I really got interested in this matter of values back in the late '60s when society was undergoing quite a shake-up. The question of values was coming up then in high volume. Family life was shaken by what was called the "authority crisis" resulting from the "generation gap."

Teens were "rebellious," many becoming "hippies," and no one knew where the "new sexual freedom" was taking us. Anti-Vietnam war protesters were challenging national leaders and the whole political system, and seriously questioning what many felt were the overwhelming material values of our society.

As a reporter for the Long Island Catholic, I did some major stories on the question of what values are and why we should be concerned about them.

I interviewed a university student who said, "You have to question the material values of a society where millionaires get off tax free and the poor get the basics of life slashed to an impossible minimum, as in the recent New York state welfare cuts. It's human sacrifice all over again for the preservation of the 'haves.'"

That was written 35 years ago.

Back then I asked a philosophy professor, Stephen Pepper, why we should be concerned about values. We "had better" study them, he said, because the basic question always challenging humans as we confront each new situation, individually and in society, is, "What is a more just and moral society, and how are we going to get it?"

That's a values question.

Columnist Sidney Harris once wrote about values, saying that the crucial questions are "'What does it mean to be a human person?' And, 'What kind of society will best fit the needs of this person?'... Unless these two [questions] are worked out, society will extinguish itself by the ignorant mishandling of the very tools technology has provided us with."

I hope our candidates are equally insightful when they speak of values.

What? No special place for campers at Mass?

Uncle Dan

DAN MORRIS
CNS COLUMNIST

If you are an inveterate camper like myself, you have probably wondered the same thing I have: If parishes can have "crying rooms" for families with youngsters prone to tantrums during Mass, why could we not also have a "Campers' Room"?

They could be equipped with things like bandages, fish-lure resistant pews, Handi Wipes and breath mints.

I was wondering that last Sunday when an unfamiliar family arrived at our church. I suspected they had come to Mass during a camping vacation in that the 5-year-old's hair was matted with burned marshmallow, and there was a slight scent of campfire smoke and mosquito repellent surrounding the group.

The father's eyes looked like two tiny pepperoni pizzas and the mother's hair was tied into a ponytail with 10-pound fishing leader. The toddler was playing with a plastic tent peg, doing his best to stick it into his brother's ear.

It sure took me back to the days when we camped with our children. We would desert life's comforts for the thrills of sleeping with small boulders jammed against our kidneys, cooking-kerosene flavored pancakes and slapping mosquitoes on our foreheads. It was great.

The family sat in front of us.

"Daddy," whispered the 10-year-old, "Jason's breath smells like fish guts."

"Does not," responded the accused.

"Shh you two," said the mother.

"Mommy," said Miss Marshmallow, "is it OK to say 'fish guts' in church?"

"Only if you're the priest," said dad. "Be quiet and pray."

Three seconds of silence, then: "I pray that Killer doesn't get sick in the van like he did when we left him in there the last time we went to church when we were camping," one of the kids said.

"Is that him I hear barking?" the mother whispered.

"Does the priest really say 'fish guts'?" giggled Miss Marshmallow.

"Jason, go check on Killer," instructed the father.

"But don't breathe on him or you'll make him sick," said his sister.

"Can I go with Jason?" asked Miss Marshmallow.

"No" and "Yes" said mom and dad simultaneously.

I loved it. Maybe a Campers' Room would not be such a good idea after all.

Oh, Killer was just fine.

Examining the Bible's 'hidden' books

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. In our interfaith Bible-study group, we frequently run into problems with the apocrypha, books that are in the Catholic Bible but not in the Protestant Bible. If one of us refers to the book of Maccabees, for example, someone else will say that's not really part of the Bible.

What exactly are these books? Why do some Bibles have them and others don't? (Florida)

A. Catholic Bibles contain all or part of several books in the Hebrew Scriptures (Old Testament) that are not recognized in Protestant biblical tradition. These books include Tobias, Judith, Baruch, First and Second Maccabees, Ben Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), Wisdom, and parts of Daniel and Esther.

Typically, Protestants refer to them as apocryphal ("hidden") books. Catholic biblical literature generally calls them deuterocanonical, or second canon, books.

Most of the Old Testament was, of course, written in some idiom of Hebrew. Eventually a Greek translation was needed because of the growing presence of Greek people and culture in Jewish territories.

Probably around 130 B.C., the most influential translation of the Old Testament into Greek, called the Septuagint, was completed in Alexandria, North Africa, and it included the so-called apocryphal books. This was the version widely accepted by the early Christian church. Most quotations from the Old Testament in the Gospels, for example, whether spoken by Jesus or someone else, are based on the Septuagint.

The aprocryphal books were not accepted, however, by the Pharisees, who, about the year 100 A.D., established the list of canonical books for dispersed Jewish communities. Because they were written in Greek and because they originated rather late in the Old Testament period, perhaps 150 or 200 years before Christ, it was not considered proper to include them in the Jewish Scripture.

The history of these apocryphal books in Christianity is long and complex. Eventually, however, in the 16th century, the Protestant reformers desired to return as much as possible to biblical purity. Accepting only the Hebrew canon of the Old Testament, without the books in the Greek version, seemed one way to do that. Thus began this difference between "Protestant" and "Catholic" Bibles.

Interestingly, the aprocrypha often found their way into Bibles published under Protestant auspices. Martin Luther himself included them as an appendix to his translation, noting that they "are useful and good to be read."

Early English Bibles, including the King James version, regularly contained the apocrypha at least in a separate section between the Old and New Testaments. Only in 1644, under Puritan influence, were these books excluded.

All the books discussed above are considered apocryphal by Protestants and recognized as authentic Scripture by Catholics.

It is important to distinguish these, however, from a host of other writings which both Catholics and Protestants view as nonbiblical, apocryphal literature. A number of them originated in the centuries before our Lord, but many were written by early Christians. Some are Gospels (the Gospels of Thomas, Peter, Nicodemus, James, for example), some are Acts (Acts of John, Paul, Andrew, Peter, purporting to portray certain aspects of Christian life and teaching); others are letters or apocalyptic writings.

Nearly all of these apocryphal writings betray the influence of gnosticism or other heretical tendencies which beset early Christianity. While they often provide valuable windows into conditions under which the first Christian generations lived, they are not part of Scripture.

St. Joan of Arc Church celebrates 76 years of Catholic ministry

St. Joan of Arc Church in Asheville began as a 12-room house purchased in 1927.

ASHEVILLE — In its 76th year, St. Joan of Arc Catholic Church is breaking the mold.

On Aug. 1, 2004, Bishop Peter J. Jugis came to a farm field west of town — the site for a new St. Joan of Arc Church — to both celebrate Mass and lend his support to what the parish calls "Our Journey of Faith."

The first Catholic churches in the eastern United States and their attendant parochial schools were built in the urban centers by first- and second-generation European immigrants.

As these families worked their way up into the suburbs, they rebuilt their churches where they lived. The continuing migration of Catholics meant overcrowded parishes had to expand or relocate — a process that continues today.

The difference with St. Joan of Arc Church is that it is moving in advance of the demographic wave. The reasons lie rooted in the history of the parish.

In 1927, to serve the growing Catholic population in west Asheville, a group of St. Lawrence Church parishioners, under the leadership of Father Louis Bour, purchased the 12-room Gardner House at Blue Ridge Avenue and Haywood Road.

One room was remodeled as a chapel; the rest served as the first parochial school in western North Carolina. Bishop William J. Hafey of Raleigh named it for St. Joan of Arc. About 70 youngsters comprised the student body.

A year later, Father Frank Gallagher was appointed as St. Joan of Arc Church's first pastor.

In 1936, St. Joan of Arc Church built an auditorium that became the temporary chapel, the plan being to build a permanent church "within a year or two." But the remodeled and expanded "auditorium" remains the worship area today.

In 1950, the first part of the present brick building — four classrooms and an auditorium — was built.

In 1955, St. Lawrence Church opened its own parochial school in north Asheville. The bishop decided to split the St. Lawrence parish, establishing St. Eugene Church next door to the school and changing the school's affiliation to St. Eugene.

In 1960, Bessie Prime, an elderly St. Joan of Arc parishioner who lived in a stately home, bequeathed her residence to the church. The house, a block from the church and school, became a convent for the sisters teaching at St. Joan of Arc School.

During the 1962-63 school year, St. Joan of Arc School built a brick addition that housed additional classrooms, a kitchen and gymnasium/cafeteria to serve the 210 students in kindergarten through eighth grades. The Gardner House was demolished for a parking lot.

In 1968, the Franciscans could no longer shoulder the financial strain of operating St. Anthony School in south Asheville for African-American children. St. Joan of Arc School accepted all the children who wanted to continue with their parochial education.

A decline in religious available to teach in the parochial school led to St. Joan of Arc School's closing in 1980; students transferred to the renamed Asheville Catholic School at St. Eugene Church.

The convent became offices for Catholic Social Services after the school closed and later became the church's rectory when CSS moved their offices in 1997.

Although St. Joan of Arc Church was the smallest of Asheville's three parishes, it continued its tradition of reaching out — to Hispanics and other minority Catholics, to seniors, to gay and lesbian Catholics and to AIDS and HIV-positive individuals — through its Caring Hearts ministry.

Father John Pagel, assigned as St. Joan of Arc Church's 23rd pastor in 1998, balanced the parish budget but discovered that the former school buildings constituted a large and continuing financial drain on the parish.

A parish planning committee organized "listening" sessions to discern the hopes of the parishioners and launched an evaluation of the options facing the parish.

Doing nothing meant the eventual demise of the parish, but money was not available to renovate the obsolete buildings or rebuild in place.

Although there is a great deal of affection for the "little brown church," the parish agreed that relocating was the only viable option. It will become affordable with help from the diocese and the sale of the commercially valuable property on Haywood Road.

By moving 10 minutes to the west, St. Joan of Arc Church will be centrally located to serve what the diocese expects to be an explosive growth in Catholic families, making it one of those rare parishes that is ahead of the demographic wave rather than swamped by it.

The parish's "Journey of Faith" capital campaign kicks off this fall.

DATA COLLECTED HELPS LOCAL TV NEWS, NATIONAL WEATHER SERVICE

BY PEGGY ANDERSON
SPECIAL TO THE CATHOLIC NEWS & HERALD

CHARLOTTE — As remnants of Hurricane Frances whipped through Charlotte Sept. 7, students at St. Ann School tracked the storm on the school's WeatherNet computer site.

On the roof of the south Charlotte school, a sophisticated set of instruments collected weather data and transmitted it to the American Weather Service (AWS), the world's largest private weather network.

A year ago, St. Ann School and Providence Day School in southeast Charlotte became the only two elementary schools in Mecklenburg County to install AWS WeatherNet reporting stations.

"My fourth grade students were able to follow Hurricane Frances and see how it changed from a hurricane to a tropical storm," said Lisa Horton, St. Ann School computer science teacher. "They were so excited. It gives them real, hands-on science that they can touch and feel. You can't get that from a book."

The weather instruments at St. Ann School measure temperatures, wind speeds, rainfall amounts, humidity and air pressure. Data is collected automatically and fed

THE WRATH OF IVAN THE TERRIBLE

A child stands near his family home destroyed by Hurricane Ivan outside Kingston, Jamaica, Sept. 12. At least 68 people lost their lives to the violent storm as it made its way across the Caribbean.

Grenada bishop says after Hurricane Ivan diocese must be rebuilt

PORT-OF-SPAIN, Trinidad (CNS) — The bishop of the Caribbean island of Grenada said the entire diocese will have to be completely rebuilt after being devastated by a powerful hurricane churning its way toward the United States.

Bishop Vincent Darius of St. George's in Grenada said all church structures there had been damaged following the passage of Hurricane Ivan, the most powerful storm to hit the region in a decade.

"Like all the other buildings here, our churches, presbyteries, convents and schools have received structural damage," he said Sept. 12.

Ivan, traveling through the Caribbean, killed at least 68 people, including 19 in Grenada and 19 in Jamaica. Ninety percent of Grenada's buildings were flattened or badly damaged, and the Red Cross estimated 60,000 of the island's 90,000 people were left homeless.

Bishop Darius said the roof of the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception in St. George's had caved in. The eye of "Ivan the Terrible" — as the hurricane has been dubbed by locals — passed directly over the capital Sept. 7.

More than 200 inmates of the island's prison escaped during the hurricane as its roof blew away; some were recaptured. Looting of businesses and homes persisted, and a dusk-to-dawn curfew was imposed.

Bishop Darius said few parishes celebrated Mass Sept. 11-12 because of the damage, but many hoped to resume services the weekend of Sept. 18-19.

He described the situation as "chaotic" because electricity, water and communications had not yet been restored.

"I think people are still in a state of shock," he said. "Many are concerned about what will happen tomorrow in terms of their survival."

Bishop Darius said he was currently working on putting together a diocesan disaster relief committee to coordinate the distribution of incoming relief to parishes on the predominantly Catholic island.

He said residents might be shaken but "we have not lost our faith."

"Life has changed, and people are now talking about living as one in community," he said.

After leaving Grenada in its wake as a Category 3 hurricane with winds in excess of 100 miles per hour, Ivan gathered strength over the Caribbean Sea and clipped Jamaica Sept. 11. On Sept. 13, it had strengthened to a Category 5 hurricane and was headed for western Cuba and, eventually, the United States.

Judge's decision against partial-birth abortion ban called 'callous'

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Terming it a "callous opinion," a spokeswoman for the U.S. bishops criticized a federal judge's Sept. 8 ruling that the law prohibiting the procedure known as partial-birth abortion is unconstitutional.

U.S. District Judge Richard Kopf in Nebraska said the 2003 law should have included an exception allowing that type of abortion to be used in cases where the woman's health is in danger. The only exception to the ban is when the mother's life is at risk.

In a statement, Cathy Cleaver Ruse, director of planning and information in the U.S. bishops' Secretariat for Pro-Life Activities, said Kopf's decision shows the reach of an "abortionist's veto" that she said was established by the Supreme Court in a ruling four years ago.

In a 5-4 decision June 28, 2000, the high court struck down Nebraska's law banning partial-birth abortion.

She said with their majority decision, the five justices ruled "that the Constitution will allow no legal protection for children from the violence of partial-birth abortion, as long as there are abortion doctors who favor it. Judge Kopf's ruling shows this 'abortionist's veto' in action."

She said the Supreme Court "should be untainted by abortion ideology and respectful of the right to life of every human being without exception."

Kopf is the third federal judge this summer to declare the law unconstitutional.

The partial-birth abortion cases are expected to be appealed eventually to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court typically declines to take appeals where lower courts are in agreement.

Nuncio says resumed Israeli-Vatican negotiations result in progress

ROME (CNS) — Stalled negotiations between Israel and the Holy See resumed in Jerusalem and resulted in "considerable progress," said the region's papal nuncio.

"A few difficulties persist, but I hope the willingness to fulfill the 'fundamental agreement' fully continues," Archbishop Pietro Sambi said Sept. 10.

Israel and the Holy See signed the "fundamental agreement" in 1993; they established diplomatic relations in 1994.

Concordats within the agreement were to follow to guarantee the rights and freedom of the Catholic Church in Israel, but Israel has not enacted the agreement.

Further negotiations over the bilateral accord came to a standstill when Israel withdrew its delegation from talks in August 2003.

Archbishop Sambi, the pope's representative to Israel and the Palestinian territories, headed the Vatican delegation in the resumed talks with Israel's Foreign Ministry Sept. 6-9. But two major sticking points still persist: guaranteeing church property rights and tax exemptions.

"All the Catholic Church wants is for the agreement to include a sentence that says, as a property owner, the church has the right to access to the courts" to protect any of its property, said Franciscan Father David Jaeger, an expert on church-state relations in Israel.

U.S. government officials helped persuade Israel to restart negotiations with the church this year, and Father Jaeger said the United States must continue to encourage Israel to resolve the current impasse.

The next round of talks between the Holy See and Israeli delegates is scheduled in late October.

Remembering Sept. 11, Vatican says enemies of humanity won't prevail

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — Under the banner headline, "Darkness in the history of humanity," the Vatican newspaper remembered the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks in the United States and subsequent terrorist attacks around the world.

"But the enemies of humanity can never prevail," said the subheadline in the Sept. 11 edition of L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper.

The newspaper, distributed to journalists Sept. 10, called for acts of courageous peacemaking and reconciliation around the globe.

"Hope is the only real force that can lead the world toward a future of peace where terrorism is only a sad memory," the front-page editorial said.

"Now more than ever, there is a need for authentic peacemakers, for men and women who have the courage to build bridges and not to dig ditches between peoples. It is a courage that only hope can increase," the newspaper said.

"On Sept. 11, 2001, a threatening shadow was spread over humanity, darkening it," the newspaper said.

In addition to the attacks on New York and Washington, the newspaper highlighted later terrorist attacks: the October 2002 bombing in Bali, Indonesia, which left 202 people dead; the March bombing of several trains in Madrid, Spain, in which 191 people died; and the deaths of more than 320 people, mostly children, Sept. 3 after they were taken hostage in a school in Russia.

To the terrorists, "it matters little if the victims are tourists or commuters on their way to work," the newspaper said. "The important thing, in the terrorists' perverse strategy, is to spread a generalized feeling of panic."

The newspaper quoted what Pope John Paul II said at his general audience the day after the U.S. attacks: "Even if the forces of darkness seem to prevail, believers know that evil and death will not have the last word."

The certainty that goodness will triumph, the newspaper said, must be the force that "sustains humanity at this troubled moment of history."

and Oct. 17, 12:30-2 p.m. in the Parish Family Center. Each session will cover politics, elections, candidates and issues. No pre-registration or fees, just bring yourself, and a friend, too! # Facilitators to train adults to protect God's children three-hour Protecting God's Children awareness programs, mandatory for all employees and volunteers in the diocese. The course is designed to strengthen faith communities through education, awareness and training on sexual misconduct prevention.

"Our goal is to train our diocesan employees and volunteers, especially those who work with children," said Rev. Mr. Curtiss Todd, vice chancellor and director of diocesan Human Resources. "We want the people of the Diocese of Charlotte to take steps, recognize, report, prevent abuse and ensure it doesn't happen."

"We teach the warning signs of an offender, and teach adults how to protect children through a five-step process," said Chestnut.

That process, she said, involves: knowing and recognizing warning signs related to sexual abuse of a minor; knowing who has access to children; monitoring programs attended by children; encouraging people to communicate with children; and communicating concerns to children.

VIRTUS is affiliated with the National Catholic Risk Retention Group, an insured, not-for-profit insurance company of which the diocese is a shareholder. Chestnut said it was important to note that VIRTUS' Protecting God's Children program began in the late 1990s in an effort to further the work of God's kingdom.

"It was not established as a result of difficulties befallen on the Catholic Church in the last two years," she said.

And, she said, the Diocese of Charlotte was one of the first dioceses to institute the program.

It was the fulfillment of a promise made by then-Bishop William G. Curlin who, in April 2002, announced the implementation of the nationally recognized program to train all diocesan employees and volunteers to identify and correctly address aspects of sexual misconduct.

In June and July 2002, priests and principals serving in the Diocese of Charlotte were the first to receive the training. Then in August 2002, the first group of diocesan facilitators, comprised of 30 diocesan employees and volunteers, was trained and certified; they in turn began training the more than 7,000 clergy, volunteers and employees of the Diocese of Charlotte.

VIRTUS' training raises awareness in the adult community, "so it's not on the children to protect themselves but on the adults," said Chestnut. "If we know the signs of an offender, as a faith community we are all better informed and can better protect children."

"Those who work with children, no matter what age, must be aware of the signs and the things that can happen to them," said Mercy Sister Emma Yondura, newly trained facilitator and first-grade teacher at St. Leo the Great School in Winston-Salem.

"The training will help people to think deeper and not take things for granted (when it comes to children's safety)," she said.

During the first day of training, videos and in-depth discussions helped the facilitators learn about VIRTUS' programs, history and online continuing education for employees and volunteers.

"After the three-hour awareness session, people can get more information (on VIRTUS' Web site) about how to protect children," said Chestnut.

On the second day, the group covered policies and procedures, challenges that may be encountered during an awareness session and how to present VIRTUS' online continuing education components.

"One of the great things about this training is we now have people in key locations around the diocese to train others," said Shannon Ganoe, a Protecting God's Children program facilitator and human resources assistant with the Diocese of Charlotte.

"By having more facilitators in the parishes, it will make a big difference," said Barbara Kohler, newly-trained facilitator and coordinator for kindergarten-through-eighth-grade faith formation at St. Matthew Church in Charlotte.

"It's imperative and most appropriate for all people who work with children to take this class," she said. "It's a wonderful awareness program and one from which we can all benefit."

"We needed a facilitator in our area," said Migdalia Ortiz, newly trained facilitator and director of religious education at St. Mary Church in Greensboro.

Ortiz, who is bilingual, will be able to present the training for both English- and Spanish-speakers.

"We have lots of volunteers who need the class. Now, we can hold the training here at St. Mary Church," she said.

Chestnut, a non-Catholic with a master's degree in counseling psychology, has seen first-hand how abuse can affect people. She believes the Catholic Church is setting the standard when it comes to combating sexual abuse of minors.

"In five years, the Catholic Church will be a model for protecting children," she said.

In a Feb. 19, 2004 letter to members of the Diocese of Charlotte, Bishop Peter J. Jugis pledged his ongoing determination to stamp out the sexual abuse of children.

"Please be assured that I am personally committed to the safety of children," he wrote, "and that our diocese is adhering to the Charter for the Protection of Children and Young People that was adopted by the (U.S.) bishops in June of 2002."

Secular Franciscans discuss Eucharist, spirituality

Council elected during annual gathering

CORRESPONDENT

CHARLOTTE — Singing "I Shall Praise the Savior's Glory," 170 Secular Franciscans followed the Blessed Sacrament to the adoration chapel.

Although the Brothers and Sisters of St. Francis Region (BSSF) of the Secular Franciscan Order had had meditation chapels at previous Annual Regional Gatherings, this was the first year for around-the-clock adoration.

Conventual Franciscan Father Linus DeSantis, regional spiritual assistant, placed the Eucharist, in its golden monstrance, on a white-covered table for adoration during this year's gathering held at the Wyndham Garden Hotel in Charlotte Sept. 10-12.

The twelve folding chairs in front of the Eucharist were often full, both with those who had signed up for specific hours and others who dropped in to spend some time. Many visited more than once.

"Franciscan spirituality is marked by a great devotion to Jesus present in the Eucharist," said Father DeSantis. "[St. Francis'] love for the Eucharist was rooted in his admiration for the humility of God. He was overwhelmed that God would deign to humble himself and to become present to us under the form of simple bread and wine."

"I think that the Blessed Sacrament has been neglected in many of our churches for too many years," said Rev. Mr. Dennis Arcand, SFO (Secular Franciscan Order), chosen leader of St. Benedict the Moor Reactivating Fraternity in Macon, Ga.

"We as Secular Franciscans should start here and move from here to changing that in our parishes," he said. "I hope we do this every year."

During the gathering, Father DeSantis spoke about the Eucharist's power and as the basis of community.

"The Eucharist is what truly allows us to live in community," he said. "All things are capable of making Christ present. The bread and wine are transformed into the body, blood, soul and divinity of Christ Jesus. ... When we receive the body and blood of Christ, we are transformed. We must proclaim that transformation."

In a breakout session, the Secular Franciscans divided into 12 groups to discuss the Eucharist and other key points of Franciscan spirituality: Incarnation, love of Scripture, reliance on the Holy Spirit, devotion to the mother of God, dedication to prayer, communal life, poverty and simplicity, humility, joyful spirit, peacemaking and solidarity with all creation.

The BSSF region encompasses all of North and South Carolina and areas of Alabama, Georgia and Tennessee. BSSF has 328 professed Secular Franciscans, 71 candidates and 70 inquirers among 24 established fraternities, a reactivating fraternity, an emerging community and six newly forming groups.

Six fraternities are in the Diocese of Charlotte: St. Clare, Asheville; St. Maximilian Kolbe, Charlotte; St. Francis of the Living Waters, Franklin; Franciscan Family of Greensboro; St. Francis of the Hills, Hendersonville; Fraternity of Brother Francis, Hickory.

Minister-elect Judy Haupt lights a candle for Flossie Stewart while Bill Stewart waits his turn during the annual gathering of the Brothers and Sisters of St. Francis Region of the Secular Franciscan Order in Charlotte Sept. 10-12. The candlelighting was part of a presentation on apostolates. The Stewarts are members of the St. Francis of the Hills Fraternity in Hendersonville; Haupt is from Sacred Hearts of Jesus and Mary Fraternity in Hilton Head Island, S.C.

At the annual gathering, the group celebrated their Franciscan spirituality and community through Eucharist, prayer and fellowship by learning more about apostolates and through spiritual talks. Candles were lighted in honor of 11 Secular Franciscans who had died within the last year and for 31 others who had made their perpetual professions since last year's annual gathering.

Talking about the Franciscan virtues of poverty, simplicity and humility, Father DeSantis compared Jesus' and Franciscan poverty.

"The purpose of your promises, my vows, is so that nothing gets in the way (of focusing on God)," he said. "Jesus blesses poverty. We empty ourselves so that we can keep a keen eye on what's really important. Jesus comes to the shepherds because the shepherds are the lowliest. Who did Francis meet? The leper."

Franciscan spirit in encountering "the poor, the fragile, the leper," he added, "provides an opportunity to know God through a genuine caring presence. Francis mirrors Christ. He sees the beauty, the wealth of each person."

Father DeSantis; Franciscan Father Louis Canino, director of the Franciscan Center in Greensboro; and Conventual Franciscan Father Terry Pescatore, spiritual assistant to Our Lady of the Blessed Sacrament Fraternity in Burlington, concelebrated Mass on Saturday and the Mass of installation of the newly-elected regional council on Sunday.

This year's gathering included election of the new BSSF council. Every three years, the region elects a minister (president), vice minister, secretary, treasurer, formation director and area councilors. Voters are the fraternity ministers or their designated representatives.

From the Diocese of Charlotte, Skyler Harvey, SFO with the St. Maximilian Kolbe Fraternity, was elected to a second term as regional secretary, and Pat Cowan, SFO with the St. Francis of the Hills Fraternity, was elected as an area councilor.

"It's a chance to serve my family," Harvey said. "Franciscans believe in servant leadership."

"I think that holding us up to the Blessed Sacrament has made all the difference in the world," Rev. Mr. Arcand said. "I think this will be a momentous start for the new leadership that's coming in."

Libby Lerner, a math teacher at Charlotte Catholic High School, meets Barbara Morgan, who was teacher Christa McAuliffe's backup in 1986 and is now expected to be the first teacher in space when she rides the space shuttle in 2005. Lerner placed among the top-ranking applicants for the NASA Educator Astronaut position.

CCHS teacher earns top marks at NASA

CHARLOTTE — A math teacher at Charlotte Catholic High School has caught the attention of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration.

Libby Lerner placed among the top-ranking applicants for the NASA Educator Astronaut position and also participated in the NASA Educator Astronaut Program's first Network of Educator Astronaut Teachers (NEAT) workshop in June.

"The workshop was a wonderful experience," said Lerner. "There were some of the top teachers in the country. We had a lot of sharing of ideas."

NASA launched the Educator Astronaut Program in January 2003 to recruit and select the best educators from around the United States to become full-fledged astronauts.

"These Educator Astronauts will use the combination of their educational background and astronaut experience to truly ignite the curiosity and desire to learn within our students," said Adena Loston, NASA chief education officer.

"I would like to get students excited about mathematics, science and technology, and show them the opportunities that are there," said Lerner.

A team of experts reviewed the credentials of thousands of applicants against specific criteria exhibited by exemplary educators, said Loston. Lerner was among the 197 applicants referred to the NASA Johnson Space Center Astronaut Office to be evaluated by the Astronaut Selection Board for consideration.

Three of the 197 applicants were selected in May for the Educator Astronaut position. While Lerner and the other 193 applicants remain in the "top tier of applicants," Loston said they are not alternates for the position and would have to reapply during additional selection phases to be considered for a future class of astronaut candidates.

NASA began its first NEAT workshop at Johnson Space Center in Houston, Texas, June 15. The event provided Lerner and the other applicants with knowledge of NASA resources, special access to NASA facilities, strategies for utilizing NASA content in the classroom, components of astronaut training and other NASA mission and education activities.

"During the NEAT workshop, educators also exchanged strategies and ideas with representatives from NASA field centers across the country," said Loston.

Upon completion of the training, the teachers become active NEAT members.

"The active NEAT teachers have expressed a willingness and commitment to share the NASA information they have acquired with their colleagues and communities," said Lofton. "They have the potential to foster a remarkable collaborative relationship with NASA Education Specialists that will benefit their assigned schools, school districts and communities."

"We'll be working with NASA to develop curriculum for teachers who want to bring NASA into their classroom," said Lerner.

Catholic students raise funds for Florida school devastated by hurricanes

CHARLOTTE — Students at St. Gabriel School in Charlotte recently raised funds to help a Catholic school in Florida.

Hurricane Charley hit the Florida peninsula Aug. 13 as a Category 4 storm, with winds reaching 145 mph and a surge of sea water 13 to 15 feet. It devastated the communities of Punta Gorda and Port Charlotte.

St. Gabriel School students gave voluntary donations totaling $541 to wear clothes of their choice instead of their uniforms on a dress-down day Sept. 14. Money raised will go to St. Charles Borromeo School in Port Charlotte, just eight miles from Punta Gorda.

"The devastation hit close to home," said Sharon Broxterman, principal of St. Gabriel School, referring to Michele Snoke, a new first-grade teacher.

Snoke just relocated to North Carolina from Punta Gorda. Her daughter had attended St. Charles Borromeo School in Port Charlotte.

"They lost half the school," said Snoke. "Many books, teacher resource materials and classrooms were destroyed."

Snoke shared the devastation with her class; her daughter, a student at St. Gabriel School, shared it with her teacher and class.

"By putting names and faces with the situation, the students know who they are helping and it makes a bigger impact for them," said Snoke.

She said the students' donations will go a long way at St. Charles Borromeo School.

"Many of the teachers lost their homes but came back to work right away to help set up makeshift classrooms," she said. "The students' donations will help the school get back up and running."

through a computer to AWS, which shares the information with more than 6,000 school sites and 100 television stations across the country, including WBTV in Charlotte.

"We use the data from St. Ann School several times a day during our broadcasts," said Al Conklin, WBTV meteorologist.

"During the heavy rain with Frances, we were able to gauge how much rain was falling in different parts of the city," said Conklin. "Charlotte is such a huge place, these school sites help us fill in the gaps."

AWS also has weather stations at WBTV, the University of North Carolina at Charlotte and Charlotte Douglas International airport.

St. Ann School applied for a grant from the Mecklenburg Area Catholic Schools Foundation to cover the $5,000 cost of the WeatherNet equipment. Along with the measuring equipment, the WeatherNet program offers a wide-ranging curriculum of on-line activities for students of all ages.

"I've used it with all our classes, from kindergarten to fifth grade," said Horton. "It's not just for teaching science, either. We work on math, computer skills, history, geography, graphing. It's a wonderful tool."

Last week, a group of third-grade students were eager to share their experiences with a visitor.

"We've learned a lot about hurricanes," said third-grader Nicole Balas. "The wind and water start spinning and it picks up speed and makes a hurricane."

Classmate Ella Little pointed to rainfall estimates on the computer screen.

"You can see where the storm took water from the ocean and left it somewhere else," she said.

Since AWS coordinates efforts with the National Weather Service, the WeatherNet station also provides an opportunity for St. Ann School to assist the U.S. Homeland Security Department in the event of a national emergency, such as a chemical/biological airborne attack.

"In an emergency, our weather station will feed our wind coordinates to the police and fire department, so they can create evacuation routes based on wind speed and direction," said Horton.

St. Ann School flies a flag below the American flag, which identifies it as a member of the Homeland Security WeatherNet Network.

Last week, as the tornado warnings were cancelled for Mecklenburg County, students at St. Ann were watching and learning.

"You can see that the storms are moving to the north," said third-grader Caroline Bryson.

Scott Moore, another third-grade student, checked the screen and nodded his head.

"I like knowing that I'm safe," he said.

More than $2,000 in prizes to be awarded

NEW YORK — Attention all teens! The Christophers invite all high school students to share their unique ideas and creative talents by entering the Fifteenth Annual Christophers Poster Contest for High School Students.

Students are asked to interpret the theme "You Can Make a Difference" in an original poster.

Last year's contest drew a record-breaking 2,752 entries from public, private and parochial schools across the United States and around the world, including Uganda, Bulgaria and Hong Kong. Winning posters included paintings, photographs and computer-generated work.

"This contest is a great opportunity for young people to express themselves creatively and, we hope, think about The Christophers' message," said Dennis Heaney, president of The Christophers. "Each year, the obvious work they put into their entries shows us that they really want to make the world a better place."

Students in grades nine through 12 are eligible to enter. Posters must be 15 by 20 inches and include the words, "You Can Make a Difference." They will be judged on overall impact, effectiveness in conveying theme, originality and artistic merit. Eight prizes will be awarded, with a first prize of $1,000.

Entries must be received by Jan. 21, 2005. Winners will be announced April 22, 2005. Posters become the property of The Christophers and will not be returned.

The Christophers, a nonprofit organization founded in 1945, uses mass media to encourage all individuals to recognize and use their unique abilities to raise the standards of public life. The Christophers' motto is: "It is better to light one candle than to curse the darkness."

Prison ministers hold inaugural gathering

prison ministry gathered for the inaugural Prison Ministry Appreciation Day held at the Catholic Conference Center in Hickory Sept. 11.

During the gathering, the new prison ministry logo was unveiled and the Deacon John Gallen Award was presented.

"This ministry is about never ever turning your back on any prisoner because they are not Catholic," said Rev. Mr. Jim Johnson, permanent deacon at St. Charles Borromeo Church in Morganton and coordinator of diocesan Prison Ministry.

Prison Ministry was established in the Diocese of Charlotte by then-Bishop John F. Donoghue in February 1991. Ongoing services and programs include the distribution of Bibles, reading and writing materials and greeting cards to inmates imprisoned throughout the diocese; as well as Bible studies and Communion services.

Bill Matevie, who serves as a full-time chaplain in the Mecklenburg County Jail and as a liaison between the diocese and the North Carolina Division of Prisons, spoke about the various aspects of diocesan prison ministry for both inmates and their families, including meeting their spiritual needs, creating and expanding educational opportunities, and one-on-one visits.

Rev. Mr. Johnson, who has served for about 10 years at both the Western Youth Institute and the adult Foothills Correctional Institute in Morganton, has a range of duties as diocesan prison ministry coordinator, including: acting as conducting ongoing training seminars for Catholic clergy and volunteers; assisting in resolving issues involving Catholic inmates, clergy (including permanent deacons involved in prison ministry) and prison administrators; and soliciting funding for and distributing of inmate resource materials.

During his presentation, Rev. Mr. Johnson shared a letter he received from a young inmate who expressed appreciation for the deacon's presence at the prison. Rev. Mr. Johnson emphasized that one of the most important aspects of prison ministry was being Jesus to those in need.

"We can bring something positive (for the inmates) to hold on to as they leap into the unknown," said Rev. Mr. Scott Gilfillan, permanent deacon at St. Joseph Church in Newton, who has been visiting prisoners at Newton's Catawba Correctional Center for more than three years.

Rev. Mr. Gilfillan said he meets with inmates on a weekly basis and, as a lead sponsor, is permitted to take out prisoners with "leave passes" to attend Mass and have breakfast afterward. He also teaches 40-hour re-entry classes to inmates who are ready for release. Topics include interviewing skills, filling out applications and setting career goals.

He also preaches on Sunday nights at prison religious services.

"You cannot go in and not be changed by those you minister to," he said. "You become intertwined in their lives. You are there with them."

"We cannot meet every need," said Rev. Bill Hall, chaplain at the Western Youth Institute in Morganton. "Our main goal is trying to help the inmates to understand who they are in relation to God."

The John Gallen Award was presented to Mary Ann Sullivan of St. Peter Church in Charlotte for her work in prison ministry.

Rev. Mr. Gallen, explained Matevie, had dedicated his ministry to promoting the development of the diocesan prison ministry before his death in 1991.

"His ministry is best described as one called to minister to the unloved, the unwanted, and the unknown," said Matevie.

Present at the award ceremony were Mary Gallen, Rev. Mr. Allen's widow, and his sons and daughters.

"This is very humbling," said Sullivan. "It is not easy to try to bring the love of God and hope into the lives of these men and women. You are special and each of you merits this award and eternal awards for choosing to serve God in this ministry."

Rev. Mr. Wenning unveiled the new prison ministry logo, which is in the shape of a shield and designed by inmate Sergio Gomez to expresses the essence of the prison ministry. The logo includes prison walls; praying hands symbolizing the ministers who meet the spiritual needs of the prisoners; a dove symbolizing God's grace; an altar symbolizing the presence of the Catholic Church to the inmates; a broken chain symbolizing the freedom gained through God's Word; and a cross with a heart in the center showing that God loves all peoples, including inmates.

AIDS affects entire planet, says priest

tears in the very fabric of society," said Father Robert Vitillo at the Just Second Fridays event at St. Peter Church Sept. 10 in Charlotte regarding "The Human and Pastoral Challenges of HIV and AIDS."

Father Vitillo is the special advisor on HIV and AIDS to Caritas Internationalis, a confederation of 162 Catholic organizations working to improve living and working conditions in more than 200 countries and territories. He also is the executive director of Catholic Campaign for Human Development, the U.S. bishops' domestic anti-poverty, social justice program.

An epic pandemic

In sub-Saharan Africa, 10 percent of the world's population is home to nearly two-thirds of all people living with AIDS. So great is the pandemic that two generations of orphans have been created, Father Vitillo said. Twelve million children have lost one or both parents to the disease.

"In many cases, these children are cared for by grandmothers, but these women themselves often suffer from severely limited resources," said Father Vitillo.

Although AIDS affects every socio-economic segment of the world population, the poor and hungry suffer most, Father Vitillo said.

"In Southern Africa and Zambia, studies of AIDS-affected households found that monthly income fell by 66 to 80 percent," he said. "In Thailand, households that saw the AIDS-related death of one of their members showed an overall lifetime income loss of 20 percent."

HIV and AIDS also have a significant impact on the educator and health care worker populations of Africa.

According to the newspaper The Correspondent, 30 percent of all Zimbabwean teachers are living with HIV; such rates in Zimbabwe and other sub-Saharan nations will severely affect the future supply of trained teachers in the region. If Namibia continues to train teachers at its current rate of 1,000 per year, it will have a shortfall of more than 7,000 teachers by 2010.

HIV and AIDS have similarly affected the health sector, said Father Vitillo. AIDS-related illnesses have caused 19 to 53 percent of all deaths among health care workers in several African countries.

God's unconditional love

Father Vitillo expressed his concern at the stigmatization and marginalization of HIV-infected people.

"Attempts to cast out those affected by the disease ... have been experienced in virtually all parts of the world and among all racial and ethnic groups, as well as in all social and economic classes," he said. "Sadly, some priests and ministers have refused pastoral care and church burial to the HIV-infected."

Such discriminatory behavior creates fear and secretive activity, Father Vitillo asserted. In some countries with a high prevalence of HIV, women refuse to be tested, or fail to return for their test results.

Research conducted in Nigeria showed that one in 10 care providers refused to serve HIV-positive patients, Father Vitillo said. In addition, 20 percent believed that many people living with HIV had "behaved immorally and deserved to be infected."

"Pope John Paul II has made frequent and emotional appeals to avoid discriminatory treatment of people living with HIV and AIDS," he said. "In his 1989 visit to AIDS patients in the United States, he held out the unconditional love of God himself as the guideline to be followed: 'God loves you all, without distinction, without limit. ... He loves those of you who are sick, those suffering from AIDS. He loves the friends and relatives of the sick and those who care for them.'"

Bishops of the Southern Africa Catholic Bishops' Conference stated in 2001, "AIDS must never be considered as a punishment from God. ... It is for us a sign of the times challenging all people to inner transformation and to the following of Christ in his ministry of healing, mercy and love."

"Despite the fact that the rejection and scapegoating of people affected by HIV and AIDS finds no basis in theological scholarship, such incidences continue to occur," said Father Vitillo. "I believe that members of the hierarchy, clergy and laity alike have the responsibility to stop such poor pastoral practices as soon as they occur."

Turning the tide

While HIV and AIDS are spreading most rapidly in Africa and Asia, 40,000 Americans are infected each year, Father Vitillo said. Many of these newly infected are young, heterosexual and/or African American. African Americans are infected at 11 times the rate of their representation of the general population.

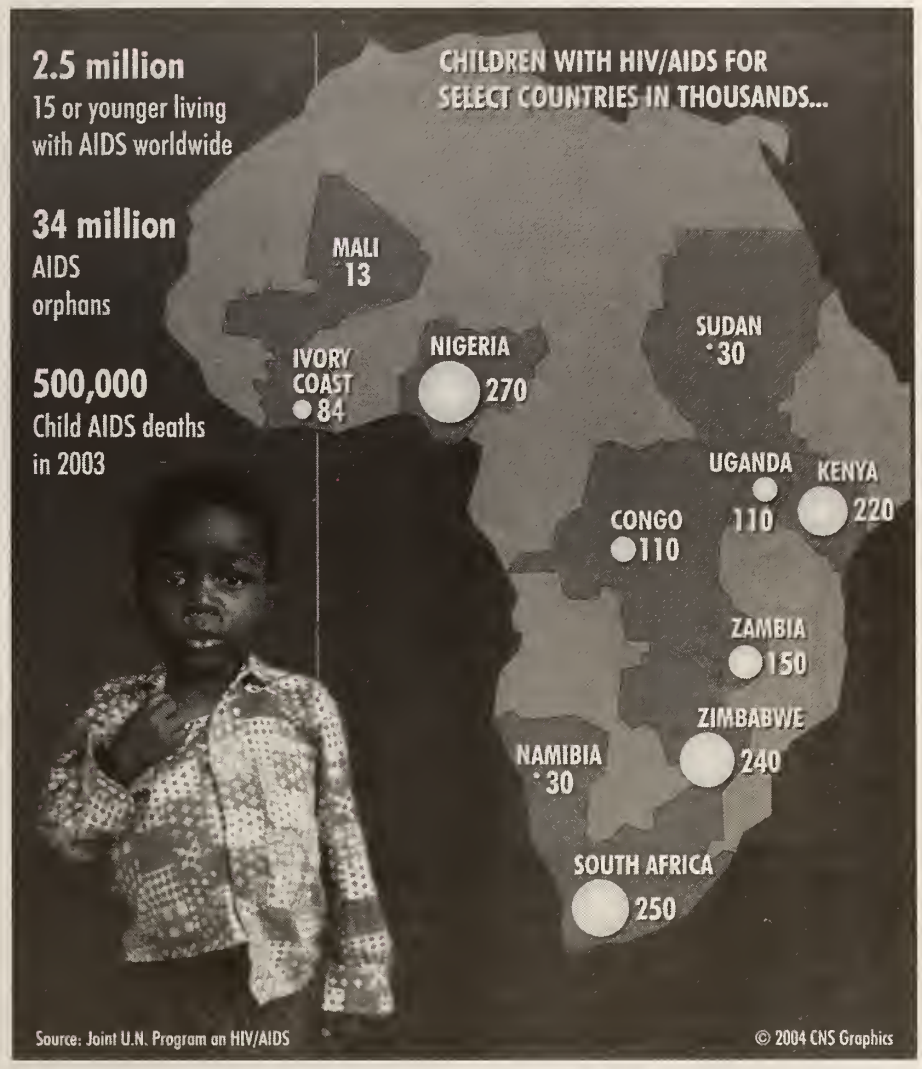
Although scientists have long advocated the use of latex condoms to prevent the spread of HIV, Father Vitillo emphasized that the sole guaranteed method of prevention is abstinence outside of a marriage between two uninfected spouses.

"The strong and public positions taken by the (Catholic) Church against promoting condom use have led to a mistaken perception among AIDS educators, some governments, health care professionals and the media that the church is obstructing HIV and AIDS prevention efforts and therefore might be a 'promoter of death,'" said Father Vitillo.

"The fact is that the Catholic Church sponsors some excellent educational programs designed to prevent the sexual transmission of AIDS," he said.

"Chastity is the only safe and virtuous means to put an end to the tragic plague of AIDS," Pope John Paul II told Ugandan youth during a 1993 visit.

Recent research indicates the most effective means of reducing the prevalence of HIV and AIDS are methods in line with Catholic teaching: partner reduction, delayed onset of sexual activity and, most importantly, abstinence outside of marriage.



"Our Catholic Church has taken a tremendous leadership role in responding to HIV and AIDS," said Father Vitillo. "In many countries, the Catholic Church is responsible for up to one-half of the health care (provided)."

According to Father Vitillo, the Catholic Church has been on the forefront of providing home care and orphan care programs; helping families to take of people with AIDS; helping HIV-infected people, many of whom have lost their jobs, to start their own businesses; and, most recently, helping to get anti-retro-viral medications into developing countries.

Global epidemic, local consequences

"With our globalized world, no matter how much some Americans want to have this 'island mentality' — 'who cares about those other people?' — everything that is done anywhere in the world affects other parts of the world, including us," he said.

"The more the workforces in those countries are affected (by AIDS), the less they're going to be able to produce for us," he said.

An example of the effect of this workforce depletion can be found in Zambia, whose population of copper miners has the highest infection rate in the country. With copper extraction as a primary economic source, the economy has been shattered.

Father Vitillo said Americans should lobby pharmaceutical companies to work toward making anti-retroviral medications more affordable and more widely available, especially in the poorer nations of the world.

"We must dedicate more of the Church's economic and human resources to eliminating poverty as well as the tragic consequences of HIV and AIDS," said Father Vitillo. "Individual Christians and church institutions must, in the words of Pope John Paul II, give not just of their 'surplus' but of their 'substance.'"

Catholics aim to inform voters by Web sites, booklets, advertisements

BY CAROL ZIMMERMAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — This year's election campaign, with religious issues frequently front and center, has prompted a variety of voter guides, booklets and advertisements which aim to inform Catholics on topics they should consider in the voting booth.

For starters, the U.S. Catholic bishops' document, "Faithful Citizenship: A Catholic Call to Political Responsibility," outlines the bishops' teachings on the role of Catholics in the public arena. The bishops have also recently released bulletin inserts summarizing key issues of contemporary politics in the form of 10 questions for Catholics to consider during the campaign.

Meanwhile, a lay group in San Diego called Catholic Answers published a 10-page booklet, "Voter's Guide for Serious Catholics." The booklet, which is also available online at www.catholic.com, identifies five issues the group describes as non-negotiable — abortion, euthanasia, fetal stem-cell research, human cloning and homosexual marriage.

If a candidate supports any of these issues, according to the guide, that person should not be considered. A copy of the voter guide ran as a full-page advertisement in the Aug. 31 issue of USA Today.

In some races, the guide points out, "each candidate takes a wrong position on one or more of the five non-negotiables." When this occurs, the guide suggests that voters choose the candidate "who takes the fewest such positions or who seems least likely to be able to advance immoral legislation, or you may choose to vote for no one."

Jimmy Akin, director of apologetics and evangelization for Catholic Answers, said the voter's guide has generated a lot of interest and has been purchased in bulk by parishes and a few dioceses.

The guide has been criticized by some who say it does not comply with the Internal Revenue Service guidelines for voter materials that are provided by nonprofit groups.

Akin told Catholic News Service Sept. 3 that Catholic Answers had sought legal advice for this matter and had determined that the guide is "well within U.S. laws and regulations."

He said the group had never produced a voters' guide before, but did so this year to help educate Catholics about the need to elect candidates who support "fundamental human rights and values."

Another Catholic voter guide became available online Aug. 30 at www.votingcatholic.org. The guide, produced by the Catholic Voter Project, a nonpartisan group of lay Catholics, shows how the presidential candidates match up with Catholic social teaching and public policy issues outlined by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops.

The site includes a quiz to help users evaluate how their views compare with the candidates and the U.S. bishops on a wide range of issues including abortion, the death penalty, war, global trade, nuclear weapons, health care, worker rights, immigration and poverty. It also has a forum to encourage discussion about the upcoming election.

Chris Korzen, a spokesman for the Catholic Voting Project, told CNS that this kind of guide could play an important role in helping Catholics determine how they might vote.

He said it is clear from the bishops' "Faithful Citizenship" document that "the decisions Catholics face in determining how to vote are incredibly complicated," and trying to narrow down Catholic doctrine to only a few issues "ignores the integrity and fullness of the Catholic faith."

John Hartz, who also worked on the Web site, stressed that what they have done with a handful of volunteers provides a "resource for Catholics everywhere in the United States — to help them make sense of this election."

Religious views in politics have also been appearing in recent full-page newspaper advertisements. The same day USA Today ran the full-page ad by Catholic Answers, The Washington Times published an advertisement sponsored by the American Life League that accused some Catholic politicians of "fraudulently claiming Catholic faith" while supporting laws favoring abortion.

And on Aug. 30, a full-page ad with the headline "God is not a Republican or a Democrat" appeared in The New York Times.

The advertisement was sponsored by Sojourners, a Christian organization based in Washington that publishes a monthly magazine and is dedicated to social justice issues. The advertisement stressed that Christians and people of other faiths were not single-issue voters, but instead were concerned about poverty, the environment, war, human rights, the response to terrorism and a consistent ethic of human life.

It said religious leaders who called on Christians to re-elect President George W. Bush were promoting "bad theology and dangerous religion."

It also published hundreds of names of the 50,000 people who have signed the advertisement, including Franciscan Father Richard Rohr, director of the Center for Action and Contemplation in Albuquerque, N.M., and Benedictine Sister Joan Chittister, founder and head of Benet Vision, a spirituality center in Erie, Pa.

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

I stood by the coffin of a good and godly man last night. Cycil Adrian was a Nazarene pastor of a small church on the West Side of Fort Worth.

Above his casket was a Bible, and it was open to a passage in Timothy — it may have been the one in this week's reading; the tone and message were, at the least quite similar. The passage consisted of Paul's instructions to his disciple and fellow minister to God's people, Timothy.

Cycil had underlined a portion of the Scripture and claimed it for his own. More importantly he had lived out his service to God and his people in his little church, a life of fervent devotion, preaching of the Gospel, and attending to the needs, physical and spiritual, of the people he pastored, all the while not neglecting his love for his wife and children.

It is being said by those who knew him and his ministry that Cycil will be impossible to replace, that he "spoiled" his people, rushing to their bedsides whenever illness laid them low.

May we all have the privilege of "spoiling" those we love and serve.
May we all at our own deaths find that we have been worthy of the instructions Paul gave to Timothy: "Fight the good fight of faith. Take firm hold on the everlasting life to which you were called when, in the presence of many witnesses, you made your noble profession of faith."

Vatican presents German director with spiritual filmmaking award

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VENICE, Italy — A top Vatican official presented German director Wim Wenders with a spiritual filmmaking award during the annual Venice Film Festival.

U.S. Archbishop John P. Foley, head of the Pontifical Council for Social Communications, praised "the director's courage in asking the essential questions about man's existence," as he presented Wenders with the annual Bresson Prize Sept. 8.

Wenders' films "offer a starting point for constructive reflection" and "show that cinema is an appropriate instrument for spreading values and culture," the archbishop said in his speech.

The 59-year-old cinematographer is best known for the films "Paris, Texas" in 1984, "Wings of Desire" in 1987, and the "Buena Vista Social Club" in 1998.

Wenders was attending the northern Italian film festival to present his recent film, "Land of Plenty," which deals, Wenders said, with "poverty, paranoia and patriotism" in present-day America.

Archbishop Foley told Vatican Radio Sept. 8 it was "important the church take part in a showcase like the one in Venice."

"It is even more important to recognize the role film directors play in cinema, since they can touch people's hearts," he added.

In his speech, the archbishop said Wenders' work helps "people reflect upon the needed task all people are called upon to spread — the universal values which humanity still requires" for its progress.

The Bresson Prize, named after French director Robert Bresson, was established in 2000 to recognize artists who "give significant witness" in the spiritual meaning of life.

The award is organized by the Italian Magazine of Cinematography and the pontifical councils for Culture and Social Communications.

Catholic TV director says touchy topics can be made relevant to youth

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Film and television director Sean McNamara has made his living appealing to young TV viewers and moviegoers.

McNamara, a Catholic, said it's possible, despite the target age of 9-12 for most of his TV series and movies, to present relevant issues in understandable ways.

He said he's been able to tackle prejudice, junk food and body image on different episodes of the current Disney Channel series "That's So Raven."

In a telephone interview with Catholic News Service from his car in Hollywood, McNamara pointed out that TV and film can tackle sensitive subjects "by couching it in a way people can understand."

One episode of "That's So Raven," he said, featured kids congregating in a mall's food court and chowing down exclusively on its fast-food fare. By episode's end, they were sick — and sick of the fast food. McNamara said he was inspired by the recent documentary, "Super Size Me," in which its filmmaker-subject ate every meal for 30 days at McDonald's restaurants.

McNamara got his start in this line of work 20 years ago as a producer on a series called "Kids Incorporated." Nearly a decade later, he said, "we did a pilot called 'The Secret World of Alex Mack' (for) Nickelodeon. And it's just taken off from there."

He's also been associated with the kids' series, "Even Stevens," which gave Shia LaBeouf his start, and "Phil of the Future." He's part of the creative team of Brookwell McNamara Entertainment, which creates and produces TV series for kids on various cable channels.

McNamara also gave current teen sensation Hilary Duff her first starring role six years ago in the movie sequel "Casper Meets Wendy." Now, they've teamed up again in the upcoming feature film, "Raise Your Voice."

He waxes enthusiastic about the young star, saying she's come a long way in just six years.

When he first directed her, she was just learning to act, he recalled.

"I would give her direction in one scene to 'hug the couch and hit your mark,' and every time she did, she'd fall out of the (camera) frame," McNamara said. "When I got out from behind the camera to see what was going on, I found that she would kneel down and hug the couch, literally," not walking really close to it as he had meant.

Another scene in "Casper Meets Wendy" called for a goat. The goat's real name was Meaner. When the goat was in the same scene as Duff, McNamara tried to give the goat direction by calling its name, he said. But when he called out "Meaner, Meaner" about five times, he said, "I turned to Hilary and she's got this scrunched-up, mean look on her face!"

Back then, McNamara said, Duff "was so cute, she got by on that." Now, as an established singer and actor, he added, "I think she's going to be like Sally Field and win an Academy Award one day."

McNamara is a member of St. Agatha Church in Los Angeles, which is also the parish of fellow director Tom Shadyac ("Bruce Almighty"). McNamara said he knew Shadyac first through the parish, then later as a fellow filmmaker.

Shadyac's latest venture isn't movie-related, but a fund-raising venture, McNamara said. Shadyac sells "H to O" (Help to Others) bottled water, with proceeds going to dig water wells and combat AIDS in Africa.

Visiting Polish priest celebrates feast day in Arden

ARDEN — St. Barnabas Church recently celebrated the feast day of St. Maximilian Kolbe with a little help from a Polish priest.

Approximately 100 parishioners celebrated the feast day with Mass and breakfast Aug. 14. The breakfast featured both American and Polish foods in honor of Father Pawel Rytel-Andrianik, visiting from the Diocese of Drohiczyn in Poland.

Father Rytel-Andrianik, who is studying sacred Scripture in Rome, visited St. Barnabas Church June 28-Sept. 3. Both Father Rytel-Andrianik and Father Roger Arnsparger, pastor, are involved in promoting the canonization of Blessed Pier Giorgio Frassati, a wealthy Italian who gave his money and goods to the poor but maintained an active faith life with his peers in early 20th-century Italy.

As Father Rytel-Andrianik's bishop wanted him to practice English and experience pastoral life in a U.S. parish, Father Arnsparger invited Father Rytel-Andrianik to visit.

After breakfast, Father Rytel-Andrianik gave a talk on St. Maximilian, the Polish Conventual Franciscan who gave his life to save another prisoner at the former Nazi-run concentration camp of Auschwitz in 1941, and founded in 1917 his Militia of the Immaculate to work for the evangelization and sanctification of all peoples through the mediation of Mary.

COURTESY PHOTO

Father Pawel Rytel-Andrianik, a visiting priest from the Diocese of Drohiczyn in Poland, enjoys Polish and American food during a celebration on the feast of St. Maximilian Kolbe at St. Barnabas Church Aug. 14.

Father Rytel-Andrianik also explained the influence of St. Maximilian on Pope John Paul II.

St. Maximilian's action had "a profound resonance in the environment of that concentration camp where every human being was treated with deep contempt and was trampled upon," said the pope to some 10,000 youths and young adults during a prayer vigil at the Vatican April 1, 1999.

The Polish saint acted in imitation of Christ, the pope said. But while St. Maximilian's sacrifice saved the life of one fellow Pole, Christ's death on the cross brought life to all men and women.

After his stay at St. Barnabas Church and a visit with his family in Poland, Father Rytel-Andrianik was scheduled to return to Rome for his second year of studies.

Despite evil, God's plan leads toward people's redemption, says pope

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — No matter what destruction is brought about by evil in today's world, God's plan leads toward humanity's redemption, said Pope John Paul II.

"The Lord has established his reign, intervening in history with supreme authority," he said in his Sept. 15 weekly general audience.

Though God has entrusted mankind to be free "to generate good and evil," history "has as its ultimate seal the choice of divine providence," said the pope.

No matter what "storms, wounds and devastation" are wrought by evil, "the book of the Apocalypse celebrates the end toward which history is guided through the efficacious work of God," he said.

For the first time since mid-June, the pope's weekly general audience returned to St. Peter's Square, where some 10,000 pilgrims gathered under dark clouds and a sprinkling of rain.

During Rome's hot summer months, the Wednesday audience is held either in the Vatican's air conditioned Paul VI hall or in the small outdoor courtyard of the pope's apostolic palace in Castel Gandolfo, in the hills south of Rome.

The pope focused his Sept. 15 audience talk on a Book of Revelation canticle that looks at the link between history and eternity.

POPE JOHN PAUL II

Through the word "Alleluia," the faithful on earth join their "song of praise" of the Lord "with that of the righteous" in heaven, said the pope.

"This establishes a channel of communication between history and eternity" that unites the earthly and heavenly liturgies in a common song of praise, he said.

With this "communion of praise," the faithful celebrate God's saving power and glory, his "divine plan of redemption" and the "nuptial meeting of the lamb, who is Christ, and the purified bride," which is humanity redeemed, said the pope.

During greetings in Italian at the end of the audience, the pope recalled that Sept. 15 was the feast of Our Lady of Sorrows, "who faithfully stood by the cross of Jesus."

He asked that people "be able to find in her consolation and help to overcome all the obstacles" in their daily lives.

Reflections on marriage and divorce

Our Turn

THERESE J. BORCHARD
CNS COLUMNIST

Boy, it's a bad time to be a newlywed, particularly if you're looking to couples in the news for guidance on how to make it to your silver or golden anniversary. This summer and fall have seen a flurry of pretty horrific examples.

First Mark Hacking reportedly confesses to family members that he shot his wife in her sleep and dumped her in a landfill.

Scott Peterson is accused of murdering his wife Laci and their unborn child while wining and dining his mistress, Amber Frey.

Robert Howard, the Olympic triple jumper, is believed to have stabbed his wife, Robin Mitchell, before he jumped to his own death from a window out of a University of Arkansas dormitory.

And let's not forget New Jersey Gov. Jim McGreevey's shocking announcement that he is, in fact, gay, and had been involved with another man whom he hired. The governor confessed all this to the public with his wife, mother to their children, by his side.

Of course, you need not open the papers or turn on the tube to learn about cheating, lying and the other rather big termites that eat into a healthy relationship. About half of American marriages end in divorce. One need only show up at a high school or college reunion to see those statistics at work or talk to some neighbors and friends.

"She changed into a different person," one friend of mine told me when I, being the nosy Barbara Walters that I am, asked him why his marriage fell apart.

How specifically did she change?

"She got lazy, fat and selfish," he told me.

Another couple I know just split because, immediately after uttering the words "I do," he failed to hold a stable job. They went to marriage counseling, they prayed, but the damage was done.

"It's scary. You roll the dice when you marry," says a marriage psychologist friend of mine who counsels couples experiencing marital problems. "You don't know how that person is going to change."

His words scare me because I know how true they are. Just the other day my husband and I discussed the marriages of our friends (since we ourselves are so perfect). We classified them as "happy," "unhappy" and "ask again in a few years."

We didn't predict any imminent divorces, but then we realized that in most of the marriages at least one of the partners had been married before, the first marriage lasting anywhere from six months to three years.

There are those statistics again!

As products of two divorced families, my husband and I took our vows pretty seriously. The words "until death do us part" weren't spoken on a whim but after a period of discernment and deliberation. For nowhere in the Catholic sacrament of marriage are these words written or understood: "unless you or I change too radically or we decide we want something else in life."

What you see is fortunately or unfortunately what you get.

Small is beautiful

Fulfillment, meaning gained by taking less for ourselves

The Human Side

FATHER EUGENE HEMRICK
CNS COLUMNIST

When I asked my German friend about his impressions of Americans, he replied, "You have big appetites!"

This remark turned our conversation toward the philosophy of E.F. Schumacker, who wrote "Small is Beautiful," a book that challenges the ideas that bigger is better, more is desired over less.

It is very true that a great many people strive for the bigger, the better and more. How many, for example, have a love affair with big cars, SUVs and fast sports cars that guzzle gas? To accommodate all this, we have the largest highways ever experienced by humankind.

Our moderately sized homes that once housed large families are now becoming tear-downs and being replaced by luxury homes that house much smaller families.

Shopping malls are glutted with enormous inventories that never are depleted.

Most restaurant food is twice to three times what we should eat.

Sporting events are jammed by thousands of fans, and each year's Super Bowl outdoes the past in enormity.

TV screens are now wall size, and their sound systems create noise louder than our ears can endure.

The yearning for bigger, better and more is not solely American. With the exception of poor nations, most countries equal us in this category.

In light of this propensity, what would philosophers like Schumacker have us do?

We should first remember that throughout history civilizations never have been satisfied with the status quo. They forever were expanding.

Even Christ spoke of expansion when he pointed us to the mustard seed that grows to great size. As it did, so did the church, its monasteries and followers.

Philosophy would counsel us that the quest for bigness is an integral part of human nature that, like a new set of tires, needs to be balanced lest they vibrate and self-destruct.

The best way to maintain balance is to block the quest for bigness and more from possessing us and governing our lives. This must not be the primary factor giving meaning to our lives. If it is, we, like so many before us, will wake up and find that we have lived an empty life.

True fulfillment and meaning are gained primarily by taking less for ourselves so that others less fortunate will have more.

Philosophy would also counsel us not to lose our sense of true satisfaction. Constantly striving for what is bigger, seeking to acquire more, never leaves us time to be satisfied and enjoy what we have.

Yes, small is beautiful when seen through the eyes of philosophy and lived in our everyday lives.

Get out the vote

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

It's time to vote.

If that message seems to be a couple of months early, you're half right. Election Day in the United States this year falls on Tuesday, Nov. 2. However, as you probably know, you can't vote if you aren't registered.

What's gotten me excited about this right now are some facts I came across from the U.S. Census Bureau. They concern the election of 2000 and they really bother me. Only 60 percent of eligible voters in this country registered to vote, and of that number only 86 percent actually went to the polls.

While I wish that 100 percent of eligible Americans would vote (OK, 99 percent to allow for emergencies), what amazes me is the 40 percent who aren't even registered. I cannot for the life of me figure out how people justify that apathy.

Every vote counts, not just in the so-called "swing" states, not just in presidential election years. Every vote counts in every election for every office. This is your chance to hire the people who run our local, state and federal governments. If that isn't worth making a little time on your schedule, I don't know what is.

Too busy? Don't like the candidates? Just not interested? There is too much at stake in your community, in your country, in your world to excuse your absence from any election.

If you're a regular voter, good. Keep it up. If you need to register, do it.

Most states have a deadline about a month before each election. Your local library is a great resource; so is the League of Women Voters and the Web, of course. And when you get the information, spread it around. Surely, you have relatives, friends or coworkers who either boast about not bothering to vote, or make excuses for not voting. Not this year. This year you're going to have your own "Get Out the Vote" campaign.

Why?

Each of us has a personal responsibility to be an intelligent, involved and active voter. Educate yourself about issues and candidates; make decisions about what really matters. Accept your obligation to go beyond personal interests, to consider the welfare of others, both now and in the future. Whatever your political party, whatever candidates or issues you favor, how you vote is between you and your conscience, you and God. Yes, your vote, your involvement as a citizen does matter.

James Madison, fourth president of the United States, known as the Father of the Constitution, said, "We have staked the whole future of America, not on the power of government — far from it — but on the capacity of mankind for self-government."

If I sound a little like a cheerleader for getting out the vote, so be it. But, frankly, how can some people be only too happy to express their opinions, and then not take the time to reinforce their words with a thoughtful decision inside a voting booth.

It seems to me that no citizen has the right to complain — or be complaisant —on Nov. 3, if he or she did not exercise the right to vote on Nov. 2.

Giving is an important part of every Catholic's life

Guest Column

GINA RHODES
GUEST COLUMNIST

Giving is an important part of every Catholic's life. It is through giving that we grow as Christians and are able to carry out Christ's work in the world.

Many people don't feel they have the financial resources to give as much as they would like, while also carrying out their responsibilities to their loved ones and others.

If you have ever felt this way, I believe you will be interested in information and assistance offered by the Diocese of Charlotte's Office of Planned Giving. In fact, every Catholic interested in making the best use of his or her resources will want to know more about gift planning.

What is gift planning?

Quite simply, gift planning is a process that helps you identify ways of giving that suit you best. Some methods are familiar, such as giving by cash or check, while others may be new to you, such as giving through life insurance or in your will.

The gift-planning process helps you form a giving strategy so that you, your loved ones and others for whom you care will be provided for as you desire. At the same time, you may discover new ways of giving to your parish, Catholic schools, Catholic agencies, the diocese or the foundation that you never realized were possible.

For example, by giving through your will, you can fulfill a desire to make a special gift without diminishing financial security for yourself or your loved ones. A bequest can be arranged as part of the will-making process. That simple addition can speak volumes about your faith.

A stronger mission

Why does the diocese offer information and assistance with gift planning? First, as people grow in their stewardship life, they realize that limiting their stewardship of treasure to just their income doesn't really reflect all that they have. Hence, more and more people are including their assets in their long-range plans related to stewardship of treasure.

Second, the diocese hope to provide information that will be helpful to you and your loved ones as you make plans for your future security.

Third, we are ever mindful of the needs for future financial stability to carry out the church's mission in our diocese and know that gift planning can help strengthen the base of financial support for parishes, Catholic schools, Catholic agencies, the diocese and the foundation.

Ready to help

The diocese also has a responsibility to Catholics in our area to provide information about ways to enhance their stewardship. The Office of Planned Giving will be happy to answer questions you may have about methods of giving (at no obligation, of course). We can also work with you and your attorney or other financial advisor as you consider a particular method of giving.

The size of a gift to the church is not what is important. But all believers are called upon to participate in the act of giving and the exercise of good stewardship. Our gift-planning program can assist you to that end.

You may discover surprising benefits for yourself and Christ's mission.

The length of time Christ is present in the Eucharist

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. Your article several weeks ago concerning how long Christ is present with us after Communion was somewhat similar to what a priest told me last year.

After Communion, he said, Christ continues present with us for 15 or 20 minutes. This must have been personal conjecture on his part. I had always assumed our Lord remained in us until we lost sanctifying grace by mortal sin. Is there a church teaching on this? (Louisiana)

A. Your priest was talking about how long the sacramental presence of Jesus remains after Communion, not how long grace endures.

Catholic doctrine is that when bread and wine become the body and blood of Christ in the celebration of the Eucharist, our Lord's Eucharistic presence remains as long as the species (appearance) of bread and wine remain.

This means that whenever, for whatever reason, the consecrated bread and wine no longer look or taste like bread and wine, Christ is no longer present as a sacrament.

Obviously, once we receive the consecrated wine and bread in Communion, our digestive processes affect them just as other food, until they are no longer identifiable as the bread and wine we consumed. When that happens, after maybe 15 or 20 minutes, Christ is no longer present as a sacrament.

However, the relationship with the life and person of Christ, which we call grace, is greatly enhanced by our celebration and reception of the Eucharist. It is a major way God invites and unites us to an ever greater friendship with him.

This intimate presence of Jesus, which grows also through the other sacraments, prayer, charitable works and a good life, does not cease when the sacramental presence of our Lord ceases. It continues to develop unless it is diminished or lost by sin, which is a deliberate turning away and rejection of that relationship.

Churches, schools commemorate anniversary of terrorist attacks

BY CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — Memorial services in churches across the country Sept. 11 marked the third anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

New York Cardinal Edward M. Egan concelebrated a Mass at St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York in remembrance of firefighters who died while attempting to rescue people in the rubble of the World Trade Center, brought down when terrorists crashed two planes into the center's twin towers.

The same day, Washington Auxiliary Bishop Kevin J. Farrell told the congregation at the Basilica of the National Shrine of the Immaculate Conception in Washington that the Gospel invites people to create "a new culture of peace."

"The challenge before us is to bring peace back into the world," he said.

He also said that terrorism exists because of "terrible situations of injustice" and that terrorism will cease when there is equal distribution of benefits in the world.

But he added that no matter how great the injustice, it does not justify violence, pointing out that "violence engenders more violence."

Bishop Farrell called on individuals to seek peace in their daily lives and in their relationships and to remain tolerant and respectful of views that differ from their own.

The Knights of Columbus called on people of all faiths to join in making Sept. 11 a Worldwide Day of Prayer for Peace. The Catholic lay fraternal organization sponsored full-page ads in Time magazine and The Washington Post that showed hands folded in prayer. With the image was a message calling Sept. 11 "a day we can all pray for peace."

Supreme Knight Carl A. Anderson said the 2001 terrorist attacks "produce many emotions, ranging from anger to profound sorrow. But as we recall the losses of that awful day and honor those who died, we should also remember that peace and understanding, not revenge and retribution, must be our ultimate goal."

"We can best achieve that goal," he said in a statement, "by raising our voices to God, reminding him that we share his deep and abiding desire for peace on earth, and asking his divine guidance and help."

L'Osservatore Romano, the Vatican newspaper, remembered the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States with the banner headline, "Darkness in the history of humanity."

The front-page editorial called for acts of courageous peacemaking and reconciliation around the globe, saying that "hope is the only real force that can lead the world toward a future of peace where terrorism is only a sad memory."

In addition to the attacks on the United States, the newspaper also highlighted other terrorist attacks including: the October 2002 bombing in Bali, Indonesia, which left 202 people dead; the March bombing of several trains in Madrid, Spain, in which 191 people died; and the deaths of more than 320 people, mostly children, Sept. 3 after they were taken hostage in a school in Russia.

To the terrorists "it matters little if the victims are tourists or commuters on their way to work," the newspaper said. "The important thing, in the terrorists' perverse strategy, is to spread a generalized feeling of panic."

Canonist says bishops must deny Communion to dissident politicians

SEMINAR EXAMINES MERITS OF TOPICS, CHURCH LAW

BY JERRY FILTEAU
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

WASHINGTON — According to a canonist and other theologians, Bishop Peter J. Jugis' recent statement on Communion is in line with church law.

Franciscan Father John J. Coughlin, a civil and canon lawyer, said church law obliges bishops to deny Communion to politicians who obstinately refuse to budge from a public position upholding legal abortion despite warnings and efforts to educate them on why their view is contrary to church teaching.

CCHD-funded projects empower the poor, refugees

BY KAREN A. EVANS
STAFF WRITER

CHARLOTTE — According to the Gospel of John, Jesus said, "You always have the poor with you."

"That doesn't mean that is what God wants or Jesus wants," said Father Robert Vitillo. "It's due to our own sinfulness."

"It's not until we all look deep into our own behavior and see how we benefit by keeping other people poor that we will make changes," he said.

Father Vitillo, executive director of the Catholic Campaign for Human Development (CCHD), recently spent four days in the Diocese of Charlotte visiting projects funded in part by CCHD and speaking to various groups.

CCHD is the domestic anti-poverty, social justice program of the U.S. Catholic bishops. Its mission is to address the root causes of poverty in the United States through promotion and support of community-controlled, self-help organizations and education.

While Father Vitillo does not believe CCHD alone can or will make significant changes in eliminating poverty alto-

Back to basics: Pope begins renewed focus on Eucharist

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — After an intense quarter-century of teaching, writing and traveling, Pope John Paul II is going back to the basics with a renewed focus on the Eucharist.

He has convened a special eucharistic year that begins in October. Last year he wrote an encyclical extolling the Eucharist as the source and culmination of the church's life. He has convened a Synod of Bishops on the same topic for the fall of 2005.

And more frequently he speaks of the importance of the Eucharist in the life of each Catholic.

The Eucharist has a "transforming power" that provides the courage to live the faith and to spread the Gospel, the pope said in June before leading a eucharistic procession through downtown Rome.

REGULATING RELIGION

Saudi Arabia, Vietnam, Eritrea cited for religious freedom abuses

WASHINGTON (CNS) — Saudi Arabia, Vietnam and Eritrea were among the countries singled out for the first time by a U.S. State Department report for severe abuses of religious freedom.

Myanmar, China, Iran, North Korea and Sudan again were designated as "countries of particular concern" in the State Department's sixth International Religious Freedom Report, issued Sept. 15.

Under the International Religious Freedom Act, a "country of particular concern" designation can lead potentially to sanctions or other penalties.

"Millions of people around the world live under totalitarian regimes where religious belief and practice are tightly controlled," the report said.

It said states use varying methods of restricting religious freedom, from enforcing discriminatory laws and policies or by forcing religious adherents to join "state-approved" churches.

The report said that Saudi Arabia denies religious freedom "to all but those who adhere to the state-sanctioned version of Sunni Islam."

"Freedom of religion does not exist" in Saudi Arabia, with the government prohibiting all public non-Muslim religious activities, the report said. Mosque preachers, whose salaries were paid by the government, were cited for frequently using violent anti-Jewish and anti-Christian language in their sermons.

Preeta D. Bansal, chairwoman of the U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom, said that since 1999 the commission has recommended that the State Department cite Saudi Arabia for its abuse of religious freedom.

"This has been based not only on the Saudi government's violations of religious freedom within its own borders, but also on reports of its propagation and export of an ideology of religious hate and intolerance throughout the world," Bansal said in a statement.

Walt Grazer, the U.S. bishops' policy adviser for religious liberty and human rights, said the report focuses needed attention on religious liberty.

"It's helpful to have these types of reports because it keeps the issue of religious liberty in the forefront and holds it up as a foundation for human rights," he said.

Grazer said that, although the United States has never acted against countries cited in its own report for violations of religious liberty, he believed that the U.S. report influences offending nations to improve their record on religious rights.

"The report moves religious liberty to an international norm," he said. "Countries don't want to be labeled 'countries of particular concern' or seen that they don't respect human rights, even as they're violating those same rights."

Appeals court judges reject attempt to reopen Roe vs. Wade decision

NEW ORLEANS (CNS) — A federal appeals court has rejected an attempt to reopen Roe vs. Wade, the 1973 Supreme Court decision that legalized abortion.

The case was brought before a three-judge panel in the 5th U.S Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans Sept. 14 by Norma McCorvey, the woman known as Jane Roe in the Supreme Court case 31 years ago, who now publicly speaks out against abortion.

A law firm representing McCorvey filed a motion last year asking the federal courts to overturn the Roe decision, saying it was not "fair or just" and submitting evidence claiming that abortions harm a woman's mental and physical health, including nearly 1,000 affidavits from women who had abortions and claim they've suffered emotional damage and impaired relationships as a result of their decision.

In its ruling, the court said McCorvey's appeal was moot because it was based on the case challenging Texas law that made abortions illegal, but that law no longer exists.

Judge Edith Jones, one of the panel judges, concurred with the ruling, but acknowledged that McCorvey's appeal brought up some legitimate issues and she noted that the U.S. Supreme Court may one day re-evaluate its Roe decision.

Jones said that if the courts were to "delve into the facts underlying Roe's balancing scheme with present-day knowledge, they might conclude that the woman's 'choice' is far more risky and less beneficial, and the child's sentience far more advanced, than the Roe court knew."

She concluded that the "perverse result of the (Supreme) Court's having determined through constitutional adjudication of this fundamental social policy, which affects over a million women and unborn babies each year, is that the facts no longer matter."

FROM THE VATICAN

Fight against poverty needs greater funding, Vatican official says

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — More funding is needed in the global fight against hunger and poverty, the Vatican's secretary of state told world leaders at the United Nations.

Cardinal Angelo Sodano said there is a "lack of sufficient funds for a worldwide food security program to make headway" during a Sept. 20 gathering of government leaders who met to discuss ways to eradicate hunger and poverty in the world.

In September 2000, all 191 U.N. member states pledged to cut by half the number of people suffering from hunger and living on less than $1 a day.

In order to implement these goals by 2015, nations promised to provide 0.7 percent of their gross national product as development aid to poor nations.

But out of 24 donor nations, only Sweden, Denmark, Norway, the Netherlands and Luxembourg actually reached or surpassed the 0.7 target.

Cardinal Sodano reminded nations of their funding commitments, and said that while world efforts to alleviate hunger caused by natural disasters and wars were "praiseworthy," the problem of hunger was "much more vast."

The fight against food insecurity must include investments in health care, education, technology and in "guaranteeing fair international trade," he said.

In a separate ceremony the same day, Cardinal Sodano was presented with the 2004 Path to Peace Award, presented by the Path to Peace Foundation.

Archbishop Celestino Migliore, Vatican nuncio to the United Nations, said Cardinal Sodano was being honored as a way of "recognizing the important contribution that papal diplomacy has made to the international community."

Commission warns new technology threatens human biological integrity

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — In a new document on the created world, the International Theological Commission warned that science and technology today offer the dangerous ability to "alter man himself" and destroy the biological integrity of human beings.

The 46-page document, "Communion and Stewardship: Human Persons Created in the Image of God," said the biblical call to "stewardship" over the natural environment extends in a special way to safeguarding human life, which is created in God's image. This understanding clearly rules out human cloning, destruction of embryos, genetic enhancement, abortion or euthanasia, it said.

The International Theological Commission is headed by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, the Vatican's chief doctrinal official.

In discussing people's relationship with creation, the document emphasized Christian teachings against unrestrained economic development and environmental damage. It also said evolutionary explanations of biological development were acceptable as long as they did not exclude God as a transcendent cause or exclude the universe as a setting for "a radically personal drama" involving God and man.

Addressing the question, "How far is man allowed to remake himself?", the document said while human beings are agents and not just passive subjects of evolutionary development, they do not have a "right of full disposal" over their biological natures, it said.

"Man is created in the image of God, but he is not God himself," it said.

The document cited several areas where the biological integrity of human beings may be threatened, including:

— Human cloning is "an infringement of the identity of the person."

— Genetic engineering aimed at producing a "superhuman" is radically immoral.

— Assisted suicide, direct euthanasia, and direct abortion — however tragic and complex the personal situations may be — wrongly sacrifice physical life for a "self-selected finality."

— Birth control and sterilization render "incomplete" the mutual gift of men and women.

The document views these issues through the lens of "imago Dei," a theology that affirms that humans are created in "the image of God" in order to enjoy personal communion with God and among themselves and in order to exercise responsible stewardship of the created world.

This theology emphasizes that man is not an isolated individual and that he cannot be made subservient to systems that are of this world only.

Computer grandpa honored by Catholic students

WINSTON-SALEM — St. Leo the Great School recently celebrated a special grandparent.

Joe Carella, a grandfather of three students, was honored during the school's Grandparents Day Sept. 9. Carella maintains the school's computers and computer network.

"If not for Joe's computer expertise, our school might still be technologically behind the times," said Donna Birkel, administrative assistant.

Students presented Carella with three gifts: a golf shirt embroidered with the St. Leo lion head and the words "St. Leo Computer Grandpa"; a certificate recognizing his many hours of selfless dedication and a chain adorned with a computer mouse; and a photograph of all of the St. Leo the Great School students holding a large sign that read "Thank You."

After the children and parents watched a video about baptism, Girton explained the significance of the baptismal candle, holy water, stole and sacramental oils, allowing the children to touch the items and smell the oils.

Breaking into small groups, the parents and children chose symbols that represented their love for Jesus. Each group designed a small square to be added, along with a square depicting the basilica, to baptismal stoles to be given to babies during their baptisms at the basilica.

Catholic student's short story to be published

Elliot joins seven other IHM students to feature works

HIGH POINT — Immaculate Heart of Mary School will soon have another published writer in its student body.

A short story by seventh-grader Donna Ashley Elliot has been selected for publication in the 2004 edition of the Anthology of Short Stories by Young Americans. Elliott's story, "Haunted Mansion," was selected as "one of the most creative submissions."

Now in its third year, the Anthology of Short Stories by Young Americans was created by Anthology of Poetry, Inc. in Asheboro in response to requests by teachers in almost every state to assist in the development of young writers, according to the organization's Web site.

The publications of Anthology of Poetry, Inc. are "a forum for young poets to see their work and the work of other young poets published in an actual book," the site states. "The encouragement and confidence gained by seeing their work published will help fuel the enthusiasm needed to develop the writing skills so necessary in adult life."

As reported in the Sept. 3 issue of The Catholic News & Herald, seven other students at Immaculate Heart of Mary School will be published in another company publication, the 2004 edition of the Anthology of Poetry by Young Americans. They are seventh-graders Christa Dolan, Elizabeth Gooding, Hope Griffin, Katie Shank, Zachary Scott, Kara Walker and Lynn Hamilton.

gether, he said the funding CCHD provides does break the cycle of poverty for many families.

"These programs form poor people into leaders in the community — they teach them how to analyze the problem, to research laws and policies and to propose and advocate for solutions," said Father Vitillo. "CCHD works with the poor, rather than for the poor."

CCHD supports local groups as they create jobs, improve neighborhoods, train adults for employment at a living wage, keep schools safe and enriching for children and raise leaders for the future.

Father Vitillo and members of the diocesans committee for the CCHD visited the Montagnard Agricultural Project south of Asheboro and the Boys and Girls Club of Asheboro Sept. 11.

The Montagnard Agricultural Project, which received a $1,500 CCHD local grant in 2004, consists of 101 acres of land south of Asheboro. Volunteers teach Montagnard refugees to use modern farming techniques on land purchased by veterans of the U.S. Army Special Forces, who were aided by Montagnards during the Vietnam War.

"Our goal is to teach them to be self-sustaining by raising crops and poultry and sell to other Montagnards," said George Clark, president of Save the Montagnard People, the organization that established the Montagnard Agricultural Project.

"We're empowering them to run the property," he said. "Ultimately our job is to put ourselves out of a job."

Clark regards other important goals of the project to be the preservation of the Montagnard culture and mutual cooperation among the various tribes.

During its 30-year history, CCHD has funded more than 4,000 self-help projects developed by grassroots groups of poor persons. Each year CCHD distributes national grants to more than 300 community-based projects. In addition, hundreds of smaller projects are funded through the 25 percent share of the CCHD collection retained by dioceses.

The success of CCHD is due to Catholic parishioners whose contributions to the annual parish appeal have made possible meeting CCHD's objectives over the years. Eighty-five cents out of every dollar received by CCHD goes directly to community empowerment, economic development and education programs that work to break the cycle of poverty.

In the United States, 33 million people, or 11 percent of the total population, live below the poverty line, earning less than $18,100 a year for a family of four, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

"When poor people get together and they learn how to advocate for themselves, they do tremendous things," said Father Vitillo.

While in Randolph County, Father Vitillo also visited the Boys and Girls' Club of Asheboro. The East Side Improvement Association, Inc., which sponsors the club, received a $2,000 CCHD local grant to help defer the operating costs of this safe haven for at-risk youth.

"This program is desperately needed," said Addie Luther, a retired teacher and social worker who was instrumental in the forming of the East Side Improvement Association. "These teen-agers have nowhere else to go."

For a yearly $2 membership fee, Boys and Girls' Club members can take advantage of a variety of enrichment activities — "Power Hour," which provides tutoring; programs to teach leadership skills and self-sufficiency; "Smart Moves," a pregnancy prevention program; and physical fitness activities.

"I was very pleased with the work of volunteers and staff at both projects," said Patricia Vasil, a member of the diocesan CCHD committee who accompanied Father Vitillo on his visits. "They have used their resources very wisely."

"It was affirming of the importance of the good work going on in the world, and CCHD is a big part of that," said Mark Siler, another member of the diocesan CCHD committee. "There aren't many funds like the CCHD that see the importance of a community taking charge to solve their own problems."

Hispanic ministry a 'great pastoral challenge,' says priest

Father Brzoska to oversee pastoral formation, Hispanic ministry at seminary

LATROBE, Pa. — Father David Brzoska, former administrator of St. Andrew the Apostle Church in Mars Hill and Sacred Heart Church in Burnsville, has been named director of pastoral formation and director of Hispanic ministries at St. Vincent Seminary in Latrobe, Pa.

Father David Brzoska

Father Brzoska was ordained to the priesthood in June 2000 after earning a master's degree in theology with a concentration in Sacred Scripture in 1999 and a master of divinity degree in 2000 from St. Vincent Seminary.

He was the recipient of the Honorable Judge Bernard F. Scherer Award from the seminary in 1999.

"I'm excited to join the staff of St. Vincent Seminary and to be directly involved in the priestly formation of the seminarians," said Father Brzoska. "I had a very enriching experience at St. Vincent and I hope to contribute to a similar experience for those currently in formation."

"I believe that an important role in the formation of future priests is their gaining practical experience and their implementing this, along with their learning, into their priestly and pastoral identity," he said.

Many dioceses such as the Diocese of Charlotte are experiencing rapid growth in Hispanic Catholics, which poses a "great pastoral challenge," said Father Brzoska, whose parish and mission in North Carolina included significant Hispanic communities.

"One challenge is to be able to minister to their particular needs and situation and to find ways to integrate this community into the existing community," he said. "Therefore, pastoral formation in Hispanic ministry is a great necessity."

Pope refocuses on Eucharist

"There's a very close connection between the Eucharist and announcing Christ," he said.

In fact, said Cardinal Jozef Tomko, who heads the Vatican's committee for international eucharistic congresses, the pope is convinced that unless Catholics have a firm understanding of the Eucharist, the church's many missionary and social activities lose meaning.

"More and more, the Holy Father is turning back to the central mysteries of the faith," Cardinal Tomko said in an interview Sept. 8.

"He is focusing now on the Eucharist as the special presence of Jesus Christ among us. But this is a mystery — the idea that Christ has given his own body for us to eat. It is a very hard language for people to accept," he said.

Cardinal Tomko will be the pope's personal representative at the International Eucharistic Congress in Guadalajara, Mexico, Oct. 10-17, when the eucharistic year is inaugurated. The pope would have liked to go, but his poor health makes the trip impossible. Instead, he'll speak to the assembly via a TV link.

In the United States, most discussion of the Eucharist this year has revolved around the controversy over Catholic politicians who disagree with church teaching on abortion. Some bishops have said they would refuse to give Communion to such politicians, including Bishop Peter J. Jugis, who in August, along with Archbishop John F. Donoghue of Atlanta and Bishop Robert J. Baker of Charleston, issued "Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion."

Despite the risk of politicizing the Eucharist, many observers in Rome and at the Vatican are not unhappy the Communion issue has been raised.

"The whole question of being in a proper disposition to receive the Eucharist is something that's been practically untouched for decades in many parts of the world," said U.S. Father Thomas D. Williams, a member of the Legionaries of Christ who teaches at Rome's Regina Apostolorum University.

"In the aftermath of the political debate, I think the coming year will be an opportunity for instruction on what this means," he said.

Father Williams said he also expects deeper reflection on other questions — for example, what the host is made of. Controversy was stirred in August when a New Jersey bishop said a local girl's first Communion was invalid because it used a no-gluten wafer made of rice instead of wheat.

After reading blogs — Web journals — full of people slamming the church on this issue, Father Williams said, "There's a lot of ignorance out there, and I think this will be a year of instruction."

Of course, the pope's focus will go beyond liturgical details. He is most concerned that Catholics understand how the Eucharist embodies fundamental truths for the church, including Jesus' redemptive sacrifice and his continued presence in the world.

"It's part of his continual hammering of the theme: 'The world needs Jesus Christ, and Jesus Christ comes to us in an exceptional way through the Eucharist.' I think he sees this as essential," Father Williams said.

Archbishop John J. Myers of Newark, N.J., said his archdiocese has begun preliminary planning for the eucharistic year. He said most of his parishes already have regularly scheduled eucharistic adoration, and some have perpetual adoration. It's part of a U.S. trend that owes something to the pope's consistent teaching on this issue, he said.

During a visit to Rome, Archbishop Myers said that in his experience the more the Eucharist is integrated into parish and diocesan life "the more fruitful the vocations, the more confessions are heard and the more the life of the church is enriched."

The Eucharist in all its implications seems a perfect theme for the final years of this papacy, but it's been dear to the pope his whole life.

As an archbishop in Poland, he would complain loudly and publicly every year that authorities had kept the annual Corpus Christi procession out of Krakow's central square. It wasn't right, he said, that the Eucharist — the body of Christ — should be carried over the "uneven and potholed roads" of the city's periphery.

And, addressing a vast crowd at the procession in 1978, he deftly linked the Eucharist with a call for recognition of the church's legal status. The church "is building itself on the Eucharist," he said, and the nation's authorities cannot deny that truth.

Father Williams predicted the 2004-2005 year of the Eucharist would have a ripple effect throughout the church. He said it's very much in keeping with the pastoral style of this pope, who has dedicated years to Mary, the rosary and the family, among other things.

"He just keeps throwing out the net, and every time these things affect a lot of people positively," he said.

Church law: Bishops may deny holy Communion to dissident politicians

J. Baker of Charleston, issued in August 2004 "Worthy to Receive the Lamb: Catholics in Political Life and the Reception of Holy Communion," a letter stating that Catholic politicians who persistently support abortion may not be admitted to Communion in their dioceses.

Franciscan Coughlin was one of several speakers at a daylong conference, "Public Witness/Public Scandal," on "the controversy over Catholic politicians who consistently advocate and vote against pro-life positions." The conference was held at the National Press Club in Washington Sept. 16.

Father Coughlin, who teaches law at the University of Notre Dame, said that while bishops should deny Communion to pro-abortion politicians, there might be good pastoral reasons for not doing that during an election campaign.

The question has led to a national controversy this year, sparked in large part by the candidacy of the Democratic presidential nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry, a Catholic who supports keeping abortion legal.

Father Coughlin said the relevant law for most Catholics is Canon 915 in the Code of Canon Law, which says that Catholics "obstinately persevering in manifest grave sin are not to be admitted to holy Communion."

Documenting church law

Father Coughlin said recent Vatican documents make it clear that Catholic politicians are in "manifest grave sin" if their voting record "shows a definite pro-abortion or pro-euthanasia position."

He cited this summer's statement of principles, "Worthiness to Receive Holy Communion," by Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger, prefect of the Vatican Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, as a key document spelling out the theological and canonical principles for the determination that Catholic politicians who support legal abortion are in manifest grave sin, as well as the procedures to be followed by church authorities for dealing with those politicians.

The cardinal sent the statement in a confidential letter to Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington, head of a task force of U.S. bishops examining that issue, shortly before the bishops' June special assembly, at which the question was discussed.

At the June meeting near Denver, the U.S. bishops approved by a 183-6 vote a statement on Catholics in political life that said politicians who act "consistently to support abortion on demand" risk "cooperating in evil and sinning against the common good."

"In that statement, we reminded Catholic politicians of the moral teaching of our church in regard to abortion: '... The killing of an unborn child is always intrinsically evil and can never be justified,'" said Bishop Jugis.

In "Worthy to Receive the Lamb," Bishops Jugis and Burke and Archbishop Donoghue said that only after the politician's "public disavowal of former support for procured abortion" and "with the knowledge and consent of the local bishop" can the politician be admitted to Communion.

Father Richard John Neuhaus discusses Catholic politicians and church teachings at the National Press Club Sept. 16.

"We undertake this action to safeguard the sacred dignity of the most holy sacrament of the altar, to reassure the faithful and to save sinners," they said.

Turning point for Americans

During the conference Sept. 16, Father Richard John Neuhaus agreed that Catholic politicians who persist in supporting legalized abortion should be denied Communion.

Father Neuhaus, a New York priest and editor in chief of First Things magazine, described the current debate over how bishops should deal with Catholic politicians who dissent from church teachings in public policy stands on fundamental issues "a turning point of considerable consequences in American history."

How the bishops handle the issue with have significant implications for "the future of Christian witness to the Gospel of Jesus Christ" in the United States, he said.

Father Coughlin said Cardinal Ratzinger's "Worthiness to Receive Holy Communion" presents an "authoritative protocol" for pastors to follow in confronting politicians who publicly dissent from church teaching on abortion or euthanasia, seeking to persuade them to change their views, but ultimately denying them Communion if they obstinately persevere in their position.

Both Fathers Coughlin and Neuhaus praised Archbishop Raymond L. Burke of St. Louis who last winter, when he was still bishop of La Cross, Wis., communicated with three local politicians whose voting records he judged to be pro-abortion. When the politicians declined to change their positions, he issued a formal canonical notification, made public in January, that they should not present themselves for Communion and must be denied the sacrament if they did present themselves to receive it.

Those who disagree with Archbishop Burke's position "disregard church law," Father Coughlin said.

When politicians who publicly oppose church teaching on abortion are permitted to receive Communion, "it is a source of scandal for all devout believers," he said.

Always the prominent issue

Father Neuhaus noted that some people have accused those bishops who have followed Archbishop Burke's lead of "speaking recklessly" by addressing the issue in the midst of a presidential campaign.

But with Kerry, who supports keeping abortion legal, as the first major-party Catholic presidential nominee in 44 years, the priest said, "it is precisely because of this moment that this issue needed to be addressed now."

"Rome has made it clear. ... It's intrinsically evil to take innocent human life," he said, adding that the abortion issue "is singular and it does have priority" over issues like the minimum wage, capital punishment or the war in Iraq.

Among the U.S. bishops "the center has moved dramatically," he said.

"The issue now is not whether this will be publicly addressed," he explained, but how to address it and to make policy decisions "in the case of persistent, unrepentant, public and scandalous defiance of the church's teaching that will range from urging the person not to present himself or herself for Communion to publicly refusing Communion (to that person). That is a great move on the part of the bishops. That is the range of discussion. That was not true a year ago."

Father Neuhaus said he has "great sympathy for the politicians and other public figures who are asking the question, 'Why, all of a sudden, is it a big deal?'"

"The answer, of course, is that it was always a big deal," he said. "But the bishops were negligent, and in some cases timorous and in some cases, perhaps it is not kind to say, cowardly."

Father Coughlin offered several observations in defense of bishops who may not seek to bar dissident politicians from Communion immediately.

"Canon law was never intended to influence an election," so it might be pastorally prudent to wait until after the current elections to begin the process of educating and warning dissenting politicians. He reminded the audience that when Archbishop Burke acted in Wisconsin, it was not during an election period.

"A bishop must consider the effect on his diocese," he said.

Noting that Kerry comes from Boston, he said that with the church in Boston embroiled in two years of turmoil over the clergy sexual abuse scandal, he said, Boston Archbishop Sean P. O'Malley "could reasonably conclude that it was not realistic at this time" to begin the process to bar the Democratic candidate from Communion.

He suggested bishops might begin to give dissident politicians notice that "after a certain time" they are going to begin enforcing the provisions of Canon 915 — "outside the context of an election contest" and in the pastoral context of seeking to get dissenting politicians to understand and accept the church's teaching.

In an August letter, Bishop Jugis asked the people of the Diocese of Charlotte to "pray, as I do, for all those involved in the political process, and ... also for a greater respect in our country for the dignity of the life of the unborn child."

Vatican dismay: Memo on politicians touches nerve in U.S. campaign

Bishops struggle to preserve church teaching

BY JOHN THAVIS
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY (CNS) — When Cardinal Joseph Ratzinger sent out a brief memo in June about politicians and Communion, he probably never imagined it would ignite a heated discussion about Catholics and voting.

The document, leaked to an Italian reporter but never officially acknowledged by the Vatican, focused on the grounds for denying Communion to pro-abortion Catholic politicians.

Almost as an afterthought, it added two sentences about Catholic voters:

First, it said, a Catholic who deliberately voted for a candidate precisely because of the candidate's pro-abortion (or pro-euthanasia) stand would be guilty of "formal cooperation in evil" and should exclude himself from receiving Communion.

Second, when a Catholic does not share a candidate's stand in favor of abortion but votes for that candidate for other reasons, it is considered "remote material cooperation," which is "permitted in the presence of proportionate reasons."

Reaction to those two sentences has been simmering all summer, fueled in part by election-year politics.

One self-styled "traditional" Catholic publication criticized Cardinal Ratzinger, who heads the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, saying his words would be taken as a "license to vote for pro-abortion politicians."

In a New York Daily News column headlined "Catholics can vote for Kerry," Father Andrew Greeley said Cardinal Ratzinger had correctly underlined that Catholics should not be single-issue voters, but should weigh all the issues.

Other conservative Catholic Web sites have criticized Father Greeley's column and disputed the idea that Cardinal Ratzinger has given a green — or at least yellow — light to Catholic voters who intend to vote for pro-abortion candidates.

Vatican officials are dismayed because a private communication was leaked. Moreover, they say, the ensuing discussion has mixed up two very different issues — the public actions of Catholic politicians and the private moral decisions faced by Catholic voters.

Vatican officials also are concerned that the discussion of "leeway" in voting for pro-abortion candidates may eclipse a more important point Pope John Paul II and others have been hammering home for years: That Catholics are morally obligated to try to limit the evil of abortion and euthanasia, and that those life-and-death issues should have unique moral weight with Catholic voters.

'Moral object' of voting

The one-page memo that started the discussion was sent with a letter from Cardinal Ratzinger to Cardinal Theodore E. McCarrick of Washington, who heads the U.S. bishops' Task Force on Catholic Bishops and Catholic Politicians. Sources described the memo as an unsigned "staff document" aimed at summarizing basic principles.

They said it did not begin to explore the complexity of voting and sin, which, in the words of one official, is pretty much "terra incognita" for moral theologians.

"The memo was certainly not intended to clear the way for Catholics to vote for candidates who are in favor of laws permitting abortion or euthanasia, but rather to clarify that the simple act of voting for such candidates might not per se justify one's exclusion from holy Communion," said U.S. Dominican Father Augustine DiNoia, undersecretary of the Vatican's doctrinal congregation.

The problem is that it's difficult to determine the purpose, or "moral object," of an act of voting, Father DiNoia said.

"The only thing we could say is, a person might come to be in the state of mortal sin and therefore unworthy to receive Communion if they voted precisely with the moral object of extending abortion or the provision of abortion," he said.

Formal vs. material cooperation

For the church, there's no question about the sinfulness of abortion, but there are serious questions about how far culpability extends beyond those directly involved in abortion.

That's where the concepts of "formal" and "material" cooperation come in. These are traditional terms in theology, although their application to the act of voting is quite new.

Cooperation in evil concerns people who are drawn into the bad act of another person. In general, "formal" cooperation means culpability, whereas "material" cooperation — being more remote — does not, Father DiNoia said.

In the case of abortion, the church considers as the principal agents the person procuring it and the doctor performing it. In his 1995 encyclical, "Evangelium Vitae," Pope John Paul II spoke at length about cooperation in acts against human life — but did not mention voting.

"Christians, like all people of good will, are called upon under grave obligation of conscience not to cooperate formally in practices which, even if permitted by civil legislation, are contrary to God's law," the pope said.

"Such cooperation occurs when an action, either by its very nature or by the form it takes in a concrete situation, can be defined as a direct participation in an act against innocent human life or a sharing in the immoral intention of the person committing it," he said.

'Proportionate reasons'

The recent doctrinal memo's mention of "proportionate reasons" has led some people to suggest a set of reasons that could justify voting for pro-abortion politicians — or to argue that no "proportionate reason" can exist in such a case.

Father DiNoia said one obvious proportionate reason would be when, as often occurs, Catholic voters must choose between two candidates who support legalized abortion but to widely differing degrees. In that situation, not to vote at all would seem to go against a Christian's responsibility to participate politically.

But further defining what may or may not be "proportionate reasons" in these cases is extremely difficult, Father DiNoia said. The situation of individual Catholic voters is different, so it's impossible to have a standard list of acceptable reasons, he said.

In the end, theology is not able to say categorically in every circumstance when a Catholic voter sins or does not sin. What it can do — and what the recent memo attempted to do — is offer principles that are applied to the different situations.

Vatican officials have been reluctant to comment at all on the voting issue, saying it is a complex question that is easily muddled. They say the best thing that could come out of the recent discussion is that Catholics in general think more seriously about their worthiness for Communion.

Believing unborn are of less value bears 'false witness' at altar

Guest Column

FATHER FRANK PAVONE
GUEST COLUMNIST

An important perspective to consider on the question of whether pro-abortion politicians should receive Communion is Jesus' teaching about the need to reconcile with our brothers and sisters before coming to the altar.

"Therefore, if you are offering your gift at the altar and there remember that your brother has something against you, leave your gift there in front of the altar. First go and be reconciled to your brother; then come and offer your gift." (Mt 5:23-24)

Those who allow abortion are not reconciled with their unborn brothers and sisters. To fail to see the equal dignity of children in the womb with children outside the womb is prejudice. To consider the unborn as "non-persons" and unworthy of Constitutional protection is an insult. And to consider one's unborn brothers and sisters as "tissue" or "parasites" is name-calling of the worst kind.

Those who do this must first be reconciled with their unborn brothers and sisters before they can present their gift at the altar.

Communion is bestowed in the context of the Sacrifice of the Mass. That sacrifice is not only the sacrifice of Jesus, but of each of us along with Jesus. We offer him everything — our thoughts, our opinions, our choices. At the altar, we want to be reconciled to God, but we must be one with our neighbors — all of them.

To do so, we first have to recognize them. The command "Love your neighbor as yourself" actually means, "Love your neighbor as a person like yourself." Recognize that no matter how different your neighbor may seem, he or she has equal dignity to you, and therefore demands your respect and love. Failure to protect the unborn is rooted in the failure to recognize them, which is the most fundamental kind of failure to love.

We have to respond appropriately to our neighbor's needs. "How can God's love survive in one who has enough of this world's goods but turns his back on his brother when he sees him in need?" (1 Jn. 3:17) Is there anyone more in need than the child in the womb?

To be reconciled to our neighbors, we must avoid false witness. To hold that the unborn are of less value than the rest of us, is to "bear false witness against your neighbor." If we are doing that, we are not ready to present our gift at the altar.

Communion means union, which requires reconciliation. How much more does it apply to those who, as public officials, have the opportunity to pass laws that either grant or remove protection from their most vulnerable neighbors?

'The Da Vinci Code' banned in Lebanon based on Catholic input

Best-selling novel attempts to destroy church history, says Maronite priest

BY DOREEN ABI RAAD
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

BEIRUT, Lebanon — "The Da Vinci Code," Dan Brown's best seller, has been banned in Lebanon at the recommendation of Catholic officials.

A government spokesman said that "as a standard procedure, any book or publication that may offend the Christian or Muslim faith is referred to the religion's appropriate leadership for commentary."

"We have the power, under the law, to stop any book or publication from coming into the country if it might provoke any feelings against a religion," the government spokesman added.

"The Da Vinci Code" was referred to the Catholic Center for Information, which serves as a clearinghouse for the church in Lebanon.

Maronite Father Georges Rahme, professor of theology at the Lebanese and Antoine universities, said government authorities asked him to read the book and submit a report.

Father Rahme said that, after careful review, the church recommended that "The Da Vinci Code" not be sold in Lebanon. The General Security Department's office then issued an order to booksellers to pull the book from their shelves.

"I gave my evaluation with all the documentation to back it up after carefully reading the book, and we (the church) are conscientious that, with Dan Brown and other authors, there are sects who are working in the world, even today, to make Christ out to be an ordinary man and to destroy the church," said Father Rahme.

"We must remember that we are in an area (the Middle East) in which Muslims are the majority," said Father Rahme. "Meddling with the core of the sacredness of Christianity in such a way as this book does is blowing up the foundation of Christianity.

"What has been said in Dan Brown's novel is very far from the historic truth," said Father Rahme.

The Virgin Megastore in Beirut has sold several thousand copies of "The Da Vinci Code" in English, French and Arabic, said Assaf Boulos, assistant manager of the book department.

"This is censorship," he said. "People should read what they want. It's fiction, not a religious book."

"The Da Vinci Code" begins with the premise that Leonardo da Vinci used his art to communicate secret knowledge about the Holy Grail. It then claims that early Christians did not see Jesus as divine and criticizes the church for keeping secret thousands of texts that detail Christ's humanity.

The book has been criticized for its claims of historical accuracy.

As of Sept. 21, "The Da Vinci Code" had been on the New York Times Best Seller List for 78 weeks.

CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

My friend Carole and her husband Frank have been dynamos at the heart of their parish for most of their adult years. Their children are grown now, and Frank has a degenerative muscular disease, ALS, one of the most difficult blows that can come to a human being — and those close to him.

Carole and her hubby have responded with a courage that is inspiring to all who know them. They laugh a lot, and in the silence of their rooms, I am sure, they cry a lot.

But the other day Carole was sharing with a group of her co-workers how much she missed being active in the service of others in her parish. She had so internalized the message of Jesus in the passage from Luke in this week's readings — "When you have done all you have been commanded to do, say 'We are useless servants. We have done no more than our duty'" — that even in the most stressful and stretched of circumstances, she was looking to serve her Lord in his people.

Little does she know that each time she opens her mouth, displaying her courage, she is living out the response to Timothy's exhortation from Paul in this week's reading from 2 Timothy: "For this reason, I remind you to stir into flame the gift of God bestowed when my hands were laid on you. The Spirit God has given us is no cowardly spirit, but rather one that makes us strong, loving and wise."

The call to service of God's people that comes to both the ordained and all the baptized comes with the anointing with oil and the touch of the Holy Spirit.

German film portrays priest's struggle with conscience in Dachau

BY MICHAEL SWAN
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

TORONTO — The German-language film "The Ninth Day" might seem on the surface to be another film trying to burn the memory of the Holocaust onto celluloid, but it is really about a man faced with temptation.

Director Volker Schlondorff said he made the movie "not because it is morally important; it's just because the human story is so deep and so suspenseful."

The film is the true story of Msgr. Jean Bernard, the prewar head of the International Catholic Film Organization and postwar editor of the Luxembourg daily Luxemburger Wort. In between, Msgr. Bernard was arrested and sent to the Dachau concentration camp in 1941.

He was one of nearly 2,600 priests sent to Dachau as punishment for speaking out against Nazi policies. More than half of them died there.

The diary Msgr. Bernard kept of his 20 months in Dachau became a best seller in Luxembourg in 1945. A strange episode from the diary forms the basis for "The Ninth Day."

Msgr. Bernard was released from Dachau and sent home to Luxembourg for nine days, during which Nazi occupation forces wanted him to persuade his bishop to endorse cooperation with the occupying force and agree to Nazi policy on the church.

If Msgr. Bernard went underground, tried to escape or failed to persuade his bishop, the Gestapo promised to start killing occupants of Dachau's priest cellblock.

In the film, Msgr. Bernard becomes Father Henri Kremer. He is tempted to violate his conscience by Gestapo Untersturmfuhrer Gebhardt, a baby-faced ex-seminarian who forsook the priesthood for a career in Nazi administration just two days before his ordination.

August Diehl plays Gestapo Untersturmfuhrer Gebhardt and Ulrich Matthes plays Father Henri Kremer in "The Ninth Day," a film based on the true story of Msgr. Jean Bernard, a Dachau concentration camp survivor imprisoned for speaking out against Nazi policies. Msgr. Bernard died in 1994.

Gebhardt combines Nazi ideology with Catholic theology to present an argument for accommodating Nazi ideals.

Jesus may have been a Jew, but it was his will to overcome his Jewishness that makes Jesus a model for humanity, Gebhardt says in dialogue scriptwriters lifted from the writings of Nazi propaganda master Joseph Goebbels.

"By defeating the Jew in me, I am doing the Lord's work," Gebhardt says. Then he tries to persuade Father Kremer to make Judas his model.

"I claim Judas was pious," he says. Without Judas there would have been no Catholic Church, according to the Nazis.

The arguments form the basis of the film. Will Father Kremer choose the comfort of doing what he is told or the uncertainty of following his conscience?

"The Ninth Day" is an intimate movie that takes place mainly in conversations between two men.

"The church as an institution is not my subject," Schlondorff said after the Toronto screening. "I think it's more interesting to tell the story of individuals."

Schlondorff, a Protestant, was educated for three years in France by Jesuits, who encouraged the young man to become a filmmaker.

For the film, Schlondorff went back to his Jesuit friends for advice about how to dramatize the theological puzzle of temptation.

After seeing Alain Resnais' 1955 documentary on the death camps, "Night and Fog," a young Schlondorff vowed never to try to dramatize a concentration camp. He said that at the time he thought, "This is one thing that is beyond staging." Now he has made a film that begins with a crucifixion in a Nazi camp.

"Fifty years later you think better of it," he said.

No North American distributor has been announced for the film.

Schlondorff is known for directing "The Tin Drum," which tied with "Apocalypse Now" for the 1979 Cannes Palm D'Or and won an Oscar for Best Foreign Film in 1980.

Event raises funds for upcoming parade

CHARLOTTE — The editor of The Catholic News & Herald was honored recently for his work.

Kevin Murray received the Irish in Media award during the inaugural Irish American Awards Dinner at the historic Palmer Building, also known as Fireman's Hall, Sept. 16.

The dinner was held to recognize local Irish Americans and raise funds for Charlotte's annual St. Patrick's Day Parade, which will be March 12, 2005.

"The parade is getting huge and we thought this dinner would be a nice way of helping raise money, and honoring some of the leading Irish Americans in our community," said Linda Dyer Hart, an organizer of both the dinner and parade.

Other award winners were Moira Quinn, chief operating officer of Charlotte Center City Partners, as Irishwoman of the Year; Jim Babb, president of Babb Communications, as Irishman of the Year; Pat Mumford, Charlotte city councilman, as Irish Civic Leader; Marty Hurney, general manager of the Carolina Panthers, as Irish in Sports; Tommy Timmins and Kevin Devin, owners of Connally's Irish Pub, as Irish Philanthropists; and Ronan Cleary, of Connally's Irish Pub, as Irish Bartender.

Charlotte Mayor Pat McCrory received the Irish Hall of Fame Award.

"I think the awards and dinner are a great idea," said Murray, who has been with the diocesan newspaper since February 2002.

"They show that there are a lot of Irish in our area doing great things," he said. "I'm honored to be included among them."

Catholics & the Media

It was front-page news recently when the pastor of a non-denominational Christian church in Charlotte resigned his position. His crime was that he admitted to plagiarizing someone else's sermons. He borrowed the words of other ministers and proclaimed them without giving credit.

In a secular sense, the pastor had committed the crime of plagiarism. News organizations, which have a vested interest in protecting the value of the written word, are very sensitive to this topic. Not surprisingly, a local editorial said the resignation was justifiable punishment.

But the incident raises the question: Can anyone own the Word of God? The Bible isn't copyrighted, but what about the words and thoughts that are derived from God's Word? Can man lay claim to those? The answer can be found on an icon.

Before the software giants co-opted the word so we would know what to call those little trash bins on our computer screens, an icon referred to a piece of religious art. Icons are traditionally associated with Russian and Eastern Orthodox churches. They may look like a painting on a piece of wood, but they aren't. Icons are a form of prayer that connects the artist and those who gaze upon the icons to the divinity of Jesus and the spirituality of the Blessed Virgin or the saints. As our prayers are conversations with God, so too is an icon a dialogue with the Almighty.

So how are icons connected to plagiarism? Icons are also beautiful works of art; many are considered masterpieces. Who painted them? Who should get the credit? Should icon artists, iconographers, profit from their work?

In most cases the artist of an icon is unknown. Credit for an icon, a signature, is purposely left off the finished work. The artist, knowing he or she was entering into a prayerful act when applying the paint, accepted no credit for the inspiring work that followed. Occasionally, a master iconographer might sign with words such as "Through the hands of ...", meaning that the icon was not an individual expression so much as it was a representation of God's will.

And once an icon was created, dozens, if not hundreds, of other iconographers copied it. In the art world that is considered forgery. In the church, repeating something that gives praise to God is called prayer.

Icons and the way in which they are freely copied are admissions that the things we accomplish here on earth are possible only because of the love of God. Should commercial artists like Picasso not profit from their work? What about music composers, or structural engineers? Shouldn't they benefit from their talent and their years of training, hard work and experience?

You can make an argument that God-given talent should praise God and not an individual. But in an age in which paintings sell for millions of dollars, you would have a hard time convincing anyone, other than an iconographer, of the value of your argument.

Pope John Paul II made headlines recently when he returned an icon to the Russian Orthodox Church. The 18th century relic, The Mother of God of Kazan, was a copy of an icon created hundreds of years earlier. It depicts the Blessed Mother and the infant Jesus. The original and the copies have been credited with working miracles, including the repulsion of an invasion of Russia by a Polish army.

How different is the work of an iconographer from that of a priest or pastor or any layperson who reads Scripture, contemplates God's sacred Word and then writes about it in such a way that the audience gains a better understanding of God's will? Shouldn't we all benefit from the gifts of wisdom that God has given to the few who are able to put that wisdom into words?

The person who has the courage to repeat the words spoken by another, in praise of God, shouldn't have to worry about lawsuits and exposure as a thief when the result of the act of repetition gives praise to God.

Like copying an icon, sharing insight into God's Word is an act of prayer that should be celebrated, not branded as a criminal act.

Justice is found through redemption by God, not revenge, pope says

The Pope Speaks

POPE
JOHN PAUL II

BY CAROL GLATZ
CATHOLIC NEWS SERVICE

VATICAN CITY — Broken by violence or injustice, humanity can find justice not through revenge, but by trusting in God's saving power, said Pope John Paul II at his weekly general audience.

Christ walked toward "the fierce path of his passion without objecting to the injustice and violence, without recrimination and complaint, but by delivering himself and his painful circumstances 'to the one who judges justly,'" he said.

The pope's Sept. 22 audience in St. Peter's Square centered on a canticle from the First Letter of Peter, which presents "the suffering face of Christ" and the Christian example in a hostile world.

Before a crowd of some 13,000 pilgrims, the pope struggled through the reading of his catechesis, skipping over large portions and gasping for air after almost every word.

But his perseverance, despite the increased difficulty in reading aloud, made more poignant his message of God's healing power.

Christ "endured our sufferings, he bore our infirmities ... by his wounds we have been healed," said the pope's written catechesis.

Christ suffering with patience did not represent "blind and passive resignation," but reflected "courageous trust, destined to be an example to all disciples who will travel the dark road of tribulation and persecution," he said.

By being born of the Virgin Mary, Jesus became our brother so he could "be near us, share our pain," and "carry our sins," the pope said.

Through Christ's solidarity, a poor and weakened humanity is "snatched from mistaken and evil pathways and brought back to 'justice,' that is, to God's beautiful plan" for our lives, he said.

At the end of the two-hour audience, the pope offered his greetings in eight different languages and met with hundreds of pilgrims as is his practice.

He was later driven back to his summer residence in Castel Gandolfo outside of Rome, where he is scheduled to remain until the end of September.

Gaining from gratitude

Light One Candle

MSGR. JIM LISANTE
GUEST COLUMNIST

I find it remarkable that a person can appear to have so much — family, home, health, affluence, talent, success — and it still isn't enough. Time and again, people who should literally be counting their blessings seem to be so dissatisfied with their lives.

Yet every day I meet others who have far less in many ways, but who are obviously far happier. The only way I can account for the difference is that the second group has a spirit of gratitude that the first lacks.

People who have a sense of entitlement, as though they somehow deserve good things — either because they earned them or because they are innately worthy of being treated well by life — strike me as having a sadly immature attitude. It's a way of thinking which refuses to take into account how much we actually owe to other people — to say nothing of the gratitude we should feel for God's unceasing generosity.

But it is the gratitude of those who have little success by the world's standards or who have suffered greatly that is truly extraordinary to witness.

Two spiritual writers I admire have looked at what gratitude means — and how it affects us. The first is the late Rev. Henri Nouwen who wrote an account of his experiences in Peru and Bolivia in Gracias: "A Latin American Journal." He found a great sense of gratitude among people whose difficult, often destitute lives would seem to give them every reason to feel despondent.

"I saw thousands of poor and hungry children, I met many young men and women without money, a job, or a decent place to live," he said. I spent long hours with sick, elderly people, and I witnessed more misery and pain than ever before in my life. But in the midst of it all, that word lifted me again and again to a new realm of seeing and hearing: Gracias! Thanks!"

Father Nouwen found that his Latin American friends received as gifts things that he took for granted. Through them, he came to realize that "everything that is, is freely given by the God of love."

The second author also believes that gratitude is "the fundamental religious emotion." In his latest book, "The Lord Is My Shepherd: Healing Wisdom of the Twenty-third Psalm," Rabbi Harold Kushner says, "God would have us develop the habit of gratitude for all the blessings of our lives, not because He needs our thanks but because when we acknowledge those blessings we come to feel differently about His world and live happier lives as a result. ...

"Reading between the lines, we can infer that the author of the Twenty-third Psalm did not have a life free from pain and problems. He has had to confront enemies. He has known the feeling of finding himself in the valley of the shadow of death. He can praise and thank God for all that God has done for him, not because his life has been easy but precisely because his life has often been hard and God has seen him through the hard times."

Rabbi Kushner concludes, "Our ability to receive God's blessings with thanksgiving will never outstrip God's ability to bless us. For those who have cultivated the habit of gratitude, no matter how large a bowl we set out to receive God's blessings, it will always overflow."

Beyond every other gift God has given us, he has given us himself. If each one of us were to truly believe that "the Lord is my shepherd" — how could we want for anything else?

Stewards of God's gifts

Adult learning should be cultivated in parishes

Guest Column

FATHER JAMES HAWKER
GUEST COLUMNIST

What an inspiring sight! Recently, dozens of catechists from St. Luke Church in Mint Hill gathered in the parish family life center. Within a matter of weeks, the children, youth and young adults would be initiating another year of catechetical formation. It was fitting, then, that their teachers should meet for prayer, reflection and conversation.

What a privilege to be in their presence. It was abundantly clear to me that these people were open to being touched and transformed by the spirit of the Lord so that they might be faithful to their calling to teach as Jesus did.

In surveying this magnificent mosaic of selfless stewards, the image of those gathered in the upper room on Pentecost came to mind. Those disciples of the risen Christ were enveloped as by a great wind and tongues of fire rested on each. As community, they were one in the Spirit, one in the Lord. As unique, valuable witnesses of Jesus, each was permeated by the Holy Spirit so that all might manifest by their words and works that they were faithful friends, devoted disciples and wonder-filled witnesses of Jesus himself.

Just as the spirit of God was present in power in that upper room, so is that same spirit with catechists today to enrich and encourage, refresh and renew, strengthen and support each of them. Those who would be stewards of God's gifts, as they teach the truth in love, appreciate that their strength is rooted in and sustained by the spirit of the Lord.

There is no doubt that the children, youth and young adults within our parishes must be formed in the vision and values proclaimed and lived by Jesus Christ. Catechists, then, are commissioned to echo the message of our teacher both by the fidelity of their words and the example of their works. It is in that manner that they teach with authority. They are called and enabled to proclaim a culture of life rather than a culture of death, to share a message of hope instead of despair, to be bearers of light within a milieu of darkness.

When one considers the complexity of contemporary society, is it any wonder that the formation of adults should be perceived as a priority within the Catholic Church's catechetical mission? Individualism (all that really matters is the "I"), relativism (there really isn't any objective morality) and materialism (things are more important than people) are all too present and pervasive phenomena in the fabric of our culture. It is essential, then, that every parish incorporates adult education in the faith as integral to its catechetical experience.

One of the most fruitful adult formation experiences at St. Luke Church is entitled "Enrich." Society of the Holy Child Jesus Sister Veronica Grover, together with a team of collaborators, meets weekly with parents while the children are attending their classes. During these sessions the parents pray, reflect on Scripture and discuss the relevance of church teaching to their daily lives. The degree of enthusiasm manifested by the participants is truly inspiring.

As the leadership in each parish exemplifies a commitment to being stewards of God's gifts, surely the creation and cultivation of a learning environment for adults should be viewed as an essential component of a parish's catechetical program.

Caskets for funeral Masses and cremation

Question Corner

FATHER JOHN DIETZEN
CNS COLUMNIST

Q. In your recent column on cremation, you said it is possible for the body to be taken to church for the funeral Mass before cremation. My husband died not long ago, but in order to have the body present for Mass in church I had to purchase a "disposable" casket at a cost of $600, which was then also cremated. The funeral director told us this is state law. I thought you should know of this ramification. (Ohio)

A. The law, in your state and most others, states that the body being cremated must be in a sturdy container box that is burned during cremation. Simple containers for this purpose, usually cardboard of some sort, cost anywhere from $50 to $200.

These containers, however, are normally not appropriate for viewing the body at a visitation or for presence at a funeral liturgy in church. At least two options are possible in this case. A more attractive casket, which is burned at the cremation, may be purchased for several hundred dollars. This apparently is what happened in your case.

Or a more traditional coffin, specially designed to hold the simpler box in which the body will be cremated, may be rented for public viewing and funeral services. Afterward, the body with the box are removed for cremation.

State laws generally call for 24 or 48 hours delay after death before cremation can take place.

Those considering cremation for themselves or a loved one should check with a funeral director well in advance. Options, procedures and costs may vary and can get a bit complicated.

In addition, Catholics should check with their parish priest about arrangements for funeral rites, especially for Mass with the body or cremated remains present.

Our Lady of Consolation Church serves spiritual needs in Charlotte

PHOTO BY GEORGE COBB

Our Lady of Consolation Church is the only African American Catholic parish in Charlotte. The church was established when Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church and St. Mary Church were combined in 1955.

CHARLOTTE — Our Lady of Consolation Church, Charlotte's only African American parish, was founded in 1955, but the roots of the parish go back to the 1940s when the Redemptorist Fathers came to Charlotte.

In those days, 13 black Catholics made up the congregation of Our Lady of Perpetual Help Church. Years passed and the number of Catholics in the area grew to the extent that a second church, St. Mary, was added to the area. In 1955, Our Lady of Perpetual Help and St. Mary were joined, establishing Our Lady of Consolation Church on Dec. 15 of that year.

In the spring of 1956, construction began on the current parish buildings, consisting of the rectory, school, auditorium and convent for the Oblate Sisters of Providence, who arrived the next year. In attendance at the dedication of the new church on March 25, 1957, were Archbishop Amleto Giovanni Cicogani, apostolic delegate to the United States; Bishop Vincent S. Waters of Raleigh; Father Clarence Howard, the first black North Carolina native to be ordained a priest; and Bishop James J. Navagh, auxiliary bishop of Raleigh and the first pastor of the church.

Of special note is the fact that three bishops have come from the Our Lady of Consolation congregation. The founding pastor, Bishop Navagh, later became bishop of Ogdensburg, N.Y. and then bishop of Patterson, N.J. One of the parish's assistant pastors, Father Moss Anderson, became auxiliary bishop of the diocese of Detroit. Another assistant pastor, Father Joseph Howze, became auxiliary bishop of the Diocese of Natchez-Jackson, Miss. and later the first bishop of Biloxi, Miss. when that diocese was established, making him the first African American to function as ordinary in the United States.

In 1999 the Capuchin Friars assumed administration of the parish, and Capuchin Father Jude Duffy was named as pastor.

According to former pastor Father Cecil Tice, one of the aspects of the parish mission statement is to blend the richness of the African American culture with that of Catholicism. Keeping that goal in mind, and using the African principles of Nia (purpose) and Imani (faith), the parish established Perpetual Hope Gospel Choir in 1980.

Other activities in the parish that have large participation are the African Drum and Dance group Kabaka and the Shepherd's Care Ministry, a program that addresses the needs of those living with HIV/AIDS.

Our Lady of Consolation Church also has active Boy and Girl Scouts programs, Knights of St. John and Knights of Columbus, a food pantry and St. Martin de Porres outreach to the poor.

Father Tice said these and other groups make the congregation unique.

"These groups have gone out in the name of the parish to show not only the blending of the cultures, but also how they both become richer by proclaiming the name of Jesus, " he said. "We are truly a blessed and grateful people."

In recent years, Our Lady of Consolation Church has hosted an annual revival sponsored by the diocesan African American Affairs Ministry. Designed to be reminiscent of the early days of outdoor preaching, the revival is an opportunity to publicly worship in the spirit of the black church while breaking down misconceptions about the Catholic faith and black Catholic worship.

As the congregation grew, the parish desperately needed more space to better serve its current 600 families.

"We have no facility where we can adequately gather as a family or use as outreach to the community around us," said Father Duffy.

To meet these needs, the parish broke ground on a new 14,000-square-foot community life center Aug. 29. Bishop Peter J. Jugis; Msgr. Mauricio W. West, vicar general and chancellor; Capuchin Friars serving Immaculate Conception Church in Hendersonville and St. Thomas Aquinas Church in Charlotte; diocesan representatives and city and county government officials were in attendance during the special outdoor Mass.

The building, expected to be completed in July 2005, will be used for community outreach programs such as English as a Second Language, Boy and Girl Scouts, senior citizens' events, Bible study and other educational and cultural enrichment activities.

With an ever-growing population of more than 600 families worshipping at Our Lady of Consolation Church each weekend, Father Duffy said the parish hopes to build a new church in the near future.
